But Belarus President Alexander Lukashenko, last year branded "the last dictator in Europe" by the US, had previously sworn not to give in to Moscow's demands and to charge Russia in full for all services Belarus provided to Russia.

The suspension also comes as a further shock to the EU, which has calculated it will depend on Russia for 70 per cent of its energy by 2030, and will tomorrow unveila new energy strategy.

Andris Piebalgs, energy commissioner, asked for an "urgent" explanation from Moscow and Minsk over the cut, which hit central Europe. Mr Piebalgs convened a meeting of EU energy officials this week with a view to possibly invoking "solidarity" measures, in which the bloc might in the longer term share its strategic oil reserves with countries affected by shortages.

But his spokesman said there was "no reason for alarm now", pointing out that Poland and Germany had strategic reserves.

Michael Glos, the German economics minister, said Germany, which currently chairs the EU, "will do all in its power to ensure that this bottleneck does not affect European companies and consumers. I am urging the Russian and Belarusan governments to honour their supply and transit commitments."

DOJ_NMG_0114267

Russia is Germany's biggest oil supplier, providing 34.3 per cent of its crude imports of an estimated 109m tons last year. A fifth of German oil imports transit through the Druzhba pipeline.

Berlin said it was not considering tapping the strategic oil reserves, which cover 90 days of consumption. Two refineries in eastern Germany - PCK in Schwedt, operated by a consortium, and Total's Raffinerie Mitteldeutschland in Leuna - rely on oil from the Druzhba pipeline.

Polish authorities stressed that the country was not in danger because of the suspension. Poland's two leading oil companies, PKN Orlen and Grupa Lotos, have access to 80 days of reserves held by the government. Orlen said it also had its own crude reserves.

"Both refineries are preparing for emergency supplies of crude by sea, through the oil terminal in Gdansk," said Piotr Naimski, the deputy minister of the economy.

Poland imports about 96 per cent of its oil from Russia. "We are completely dependent on these imports," said Mr Naimski.

Russian Oil Cutoff Rouses Europe's Doubt (WSJ)

By Guy Chazan And Gregory L. White And Marc Champion

Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

The sudden suspension of Russian oil exports through Belarus amid a dispute over fuel subsidies will exacerbate Europe's concerns about its dependence on its huge eastern neighbor for energy supplies.

Russian officials yesterday said Moscow had shut off crude exports through Belarus in retaliation for what Russian officials said was illegal siphoning by Belarus of oil from the main pipeline that carries Russian crude to Europe. The move led to a halt in deliveries to Germany and Poland, which depend on the pipeline for the bulk of their oil supplies, and sharply reduced flows to Hungary, Slovakia and Czech Republic. 1

European officials said they have adequate stocks to survive any disruption, and the response in oil markets was modest. But Moscow's sudden cutoff of a vital energy conduit to the Continent widened questions about Russia's reliability as an energy supplier, a year after a dispute over the price of natural gas with neighboring Ukraine briefly reduced vital Russian gas shipments to Europe.

"This shows us once again that arguments among various countries of the former Soviet Union, between suppliers and transit countries, mean that from our perspective, these deliveries are unreliable," Poland's deputy economy minister, Piotr Naimsky, told Poland's TVN24 television.

"It really shakes confidence in oil and gas supply," said a person in the German administration. "It's very unfortunate." Russia is the world's largest exporter of natural gas and its No. 2 oil exporter, after Saudi Arabia.

'Detailed Explanation' Demanded

European Union energy chief Andris Piebalgs demanded an "urgent and detailed explanation" from Minsk and Moscow. Though he said the cutoff poses "no immediate risk to the supply of oil to the European Union," Mr. Piebalgs said he might convene the EU's Oil Supply Group later this week to decide if countries should draw on their strategic stocks.

The conflict comes at a moment when energy security is back at the top of the EU's agenda. On Wednesday, the European Commission, the EU's executive arm, will publish proposals for the bloc's first energy strategy, to be discussed at a summit of EU leaders.

The affected pipeline -- named Druzhba, or friendship, when it was built in the 1960s to carry Soviet crude to clients in Eastern Europe -- carries about half of Russia's oil exports to Europe, roughly 1.5 million barrels a day, or 12.5% of European crude consumption.

'Broadens the Question'

"It's really surprising that the situation has escalated as far as it has," said Jeffrey Woodruff, an analyst at Fitch Ratings in London. "It broadens the whole question of European energy security from being just focused on gas to including oil and gas."

A Belarussian delegation left Minsk last evening for Moscow to begin talks on the dispute, which comes little more than a week after the two countries narrowly avoided a cutoff of Russian natural-gas shipments in a New Year's Eve price dispute.

DOJ_NMG_0114268

The conflict comes amid growing tensions between the two erstwhile allies and shows the depth of Russian disenchantment with Belarussian President Alexander Lukashenko, whom the U.S. calls Europe's last dictator.

Russia and Belarus have for years been in talks to unify, a project that Russian President Vladimir Putin hoped would crown his presidency. But Moscow has watched in frustration as Mr. Lukashenko, apparently fearing a loss of power, has cooled on the idea.

"Lukashenko has shown that his interests don't coincide with ours," said Mikhail Margelov, chairman of the International Affairs Committee in Russia's Senate.

Seeking to raise the pressure on Mr. Lukashenko, OAO Gazprom, Russia's state-controlled gas company, demanded a doubling of the discounted rate Belarus pays for Russian gas. Moscow also said it would end duty-free crude sales to Belarus, eliminating what Russian officials said amounted to a $3.5 billion annual subsidy to Minsk.

Belarus responded last week by imposing a new transit fee on Russian crude shipments across its territory, a levy Moscow denounced as illegal.

Over the weekend, Belarus began taking oil from the Russian export line as payment, Russian officials said. In retaliation, Moscow cut off shipments, Andrei Sharonov, deputy economics minister, told Russian television.

Working on Other Routes

The Russian state pipeline monopoly OAO Transneft said it is working to increase exports to Europe by other routes. "I'm sure this won't affect our reputation as a reliable energy supplier," Transneft Vice President Sergei Grigoriev said.

Officials in Germany and Poland said that their countries have significant reserves of crude and face no immediate threat of fuel shortages.

Poland has more than 70 days of oil reserves and Germany about 130 days, according to EU officials. Polish refiner PKN Orlen SA said it is working at full capacity and could easily switch to seaborne supplies via an oil terminal at the Baltic Sea port of Gdansk.

The roots of the current crisis lie in Russia's drive to slash energy subsidies to its neighbors and have them pay what it says are market rates for its oil and gas. There are signs that drive is backfiring economically for Russia, though.

Azerbaijan yesterday said it will stop exporting crude through Russian pipelines in order to keep more of the fuel at home, where it is needed to run power plants that had depended on Russian gas imports until Moscow's latest price increase made those too expensive, Interfax reported.

Belarus And Russia Spar Over Crude Oil Cutoff (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

New York Times, January 9, 2007

MOSCOW, Jan. 8 — Supplies of Russian crude oil headed to European markets came to a halt overnight, officials said Monday, in the latest manifestation of rapidly deteriorating relations between Russia and Belarus.

The head of Russia's oil pipeline monopoly accused Belarus of illegally siphoning oil beginning Saturday in an escalating dispute over duties and transit fees. Belarus's foreign ministry acknowledged the halt but denied responsibility, suggesting that the Russians had instead caused the stoppage at their common border.

Regardless of the cause, the disruption along the Druzhba, or Friendship, pipeline affected supplies of crude oil headed to Poland, Germany and Ukraine. In the short term, at least, the halt should have a minimal effect, because refineries in those countries maintain reserves. In the longer term as well, the disruption is not as threatening as a shut-off of natural gas, because alternative sources of oil are more readily available.

Still, a prolonged disruption could be worrisome. Oil prices rose on the news, and the dispute rekindled concerns in Europe about the reliability of energy supplies from Russia.

"This shows us once again that arguments among various countries of the former Soviet Union, between suppliers and transit countries, mean that these deliveries are unreliable from our perspective," Poland's deputy economics minister, Piotr Naimski, said in televised remarks, according to The Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0114269

The shutdown of Druzhba, one of the highest-capacity pipelines in the world, took place a week after Russia and Belarus negotiated a last-minute agreement that sharply raised the price Belarus would have to pay for natural gas. The deal came after brinkmanship by each side that raised the specter of disruptions of natural gas deliveries across Europe, like one that followed a dispute between Ukraine and Russia in 2006.

Belarus, led by an autocratic president, Aleksandr G. Lukashenko, has reacted furiously to the terms of that deal and to Russia's tactics in the talks that led to it. Last week, Belarus called Russia's conduct shameless.

Russia has responded by saying that it is simply raising the costs of oil and gas to market prices. Belarus and other former republics of the Soviet Union have long bought oil and gas at a discount, compared with European customers.

"Belarus has cast prudence to the wind," Andrei V. Sharonov, a deputy economic development minister, said in remarks on the Moscow radio station Ekho Moskvy, referring to what he, too, called the illegal siphoning of oil. "This looks like a trade war."

He later said that Russia would suspend all oil shipments through Belarus, blaming it for the initial disruptions. His remarks suggested that the disruption could last indefinitely.

For the last decade, Russia and Belarus, two countries bound by history and deep ethnic, cultural and social ties, have moved haltingly toward the creation of a union, with a common currency and even, ultimately, the creation of a single unified state, as negotiated in a 1996 treaty between Mr. Lukashenko and President Boris N. Yeltsin.

The union has never come to fruition under President Vladimir V. Putin. In the past month, the two countries have seemed instead to be negotiating the terms of their divorce, which, like many, is becoming nasty.

Beginning New Year's Day, Russia began charging Belarus $100 per thousand cubic meters of natural gas, compared with the $46 it charged last year. The price is to increase steadily to the level charged in Europe — now $265 on average — by 2011.

As those negotiations dragged on bitterly, Russia also imposed a separate duty of $180 a ton on oil it sold to Belarus, which has been sold at steeply subsidized prices. Mr. Lukashenko's government responded to the oil duty last week by announcing a $45 a metric ton fee on shipping oil across Belarus on its way to other parts of Europe.

These are the fees are at the heart of the dispute that has shut down the pipeline.

Mr. Sharonov, in his radio interview, said Mr. Lukashenko's government had begun seizing the oil as payment for the transit fee.

The head of Russia's pipeline monopoly, Semyon M. Vainshtok, said in a statement that Belarus had siphoned 79,900 metric tons of oil since Saturday "without warning anyone."

He said, "Transit is a sacred cow," and vowed to use other means of transport to supply customers in Europe.

On Sunday, prosecutors in Belarus filed suit against Mr. Vainshtok, accusing him of having violated customs duties by not paying the new transit fee. A hearing scheduled for Monday, however, was canceled.

In Belarus, there were conflicting reports about what had unfolded. While the foreign ministry denied responsibility, an official from the Druzhba pipeline told Russian news agencies that operations had been halted on orders from Belneftekhim, the Belarus pipeline monopoly. Neither the ministry nor the companies would elaborate.

Belarus has used its cheap supplies of oil and gas to shore up a Soviet-style economy and earn hard currency, in the case of oil, by exporting refined products at world prices. For Mr. Lukashenko's government, the changing economics could weaken his iron control on the country of 10 million.

"The Belarussian people may not realize the extent to which they have been propped up by Russian energy, the extent to which the Belarussian miracle that Lukashenko talks about was built on legs of clay," said Rory MacFarquhar, an economist with Goldman Sachs in Moscow.

The impact in Belarus, where the news media is tightly controlled by the state, remains uncertain.

Pavel Daneyko, the director of the Institute for Privatization and Management, a business consultancy in Minsk, the capital of Belarus, said Mr. Lukashenko's government faced two difficult options: a liberalization of the country's economy or a populist propaganda war against Russia.

"If there is a clear war with Russia," he said by telephone, "then the society may be able to weather the situation."

DOJ_NMG_0114270

Belarus Cuts Off Russian Oil To Europe (CSM)

By Fred Weir

Christian Science Monitor, January 9, 2007

Germany, Poland, and Lithuania are hit by latest energy dispute between Russia and its neighbors.

MOSCOW

For the second time in just over a year, a political squabble between Russia and one of its ex-Soviet neighbors has cut off energy supplies to Europe, triggering anxieties about Moscow's reliability as an economic partner.

On Monday, Russia accused Belarus of shutting down the northern leg of the 2,500-mile-long Druzhba pipeline, which carries up to 2 million barrels of Siberian crude daily to European customers, causing shortages in Poland, Germany, and Lithuania.

The disruption is reminiscent of last year's shutdown of Russian gas supplies to Ukraine, which caused similar energy jitters in Europe. Though Poland and Germany have ample reserves on hand to ride out any temporary squeeze, the dispute underscores increasing concerns about Europe's dependency on Russian energy.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel, whose country assumed the EU and G-8 presidencies on Jan. 1, worried in a weekend TV interview about Moscow's tendency to change prices - and rules - for EU countries that depend on Russia for about a third of their energy supplies.

"Russia was a dependable delivery partner in the past," said Mrs. Merkel, who has made energy security a key priority of Germany's G-8 presidency. "But we are wrestling with Russia right now about strengthening [its energy commitments]. We also need to know that we have reliable prices and reliable cooperation with Russia." Tit-for-tat energy dispute

The most recent energy scare, which comes amid a deepening rift between the Kremlin and Belarussian leader Alexander Lukashenko over long-stalled plans to reunify the two former Soviet nations, is the latest in a chain of tit-for-tat measures. On Dec. 31, Belarus reluctantly agreed to a doubling in price of Russian gas, to $100 per thousand cubic meters - still well below global market levels of around $250. Belarus also agreed to sell 50 percent of its pipeline network, Beltransgaz, to Russia's gas monopoly Gazprom.

But last week Belarus retaliated by imposing a special $45 transit duty on each metric ton of Russian crude pumped through the Druzhba pipeline, a move Russia has called "illegal." By Monday, Polish officials said no oil was flowing through the line, which carries about a fifth of all Russian crude exports to Europe. Russia accused Belarus of "siphoning the oil off" to meet its own energy needs.

Monday Germany shut down two refineries, in Leuna and Schwedt, though both it and Poland have enough reserves on hand to last at least two months.

"[Europe] is not at any kind of chokepoint, the market can cover a great deal of this if needed," says Ambassador William Ramsay, deputy executive director of the International Energy Agency in Paris. "[there are] a lot of other options to procure energy and gas, by ship and pipeline." Stalled plans for a 'neo-Soviet' union

Belarus, a heavily industrialized Slavic nation of 10 million, has been Russia's closest ally in the post-Soviet region since Mr. Lukashenko came to power a dozen years ago. Lukashenko and former Russian President Boris Yeltsin drew up a grand plan to join their countries in a neo-Soviet union, but Vladimir Putin has been less enthusiastic. Still, Moscow has repaid Lukashenko's geopolitical loyalty with subsidies estimated at as much as $8 billion annually, in the form of cheap gas, duty-free oil, and favored access to Russian markets for Belarussian industrial goods.

But Lukashenko has been a growing embarrassment to Moscow. Human rights groups accuse him of rigging elections, closing down independent media, and imprisoning dissidents. Experts say Lukashenko has employed Russian subsidies to create a neo-communist welfare state, which tamps down popular discontent but has also become an obstacle to the economic expansion for Russia's industrial conglomerates.

"Russia has been subsidizing Belarus because we thought there was going to be a full alliance between our countries," says Sergei Markov, a Kremlin-connected analyst. "But Lukashenko has been blocking [Russia's goals] and, if that's the way it's going to be, then he should have to pay full market prices for energy." Regime change in Belarus?

DOJ_NMG_0114271

Some Russian experts suggest Mr. Putin may be angling for regime change in Minsk, the Belarussian capital, or at least sweeping revisions in the relationship. "Russia doesn't see any returns on its investments in Belarus," says Gennady Chuffrin, deputy director of the Institute for World Economy and International Relations. "The Kremlin believes it has a strong hand to play and that Lukashenko, a political outcast, has little chance of holding out for long against Russian pressure."

Ariel Cohen, senior research fellow at the Heritage Foundation in Washington, says Russia's and Belarus's behavior is "an example of how high oil prices embolden people to take destabilizing steps. It's what I call the oil chutzpah factor," he says, citing Iran, Venezuela, the Middle East oil embargo of the 1970s, and now Russia.

However, it would be wrong to simply view Russian energy policy as "imperial posturing," counters Rainer Lindner, a Russian expert at Stiftung Wissenschaft und Politik, a foreign affairs think tank in Berlin. "By ditching privileged oil and gas deals with its neighbors and increasing prices, Russia complies with demands of the World Trade Organization [WTO]. The WTO doesn't accept privileged prices of the type that existed between Russia and its neighbors so far."

To safeguard its own energy security, the EU should offer to mediate between Russia and its neighbors, says Dr. Lindner. Germany in particular "has good relations with Russia and should bring these to bear in the interest of the EU's energy security."

But the EU would require Belarus to make reforms, he adds. "The EU doesn't readily accept a regime like Belarus at the negotiating table without conditions. "The message is simple: 'If you want us to moderate, you have to meet certain political standards.' This could effect a kind of regime change there."

Moscow Stops Oil Exports To Belarus (WT)

By Michael Mainville

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

MOSCOW -- Russia yesterday halted oil exports to Belarus amid a bitter trade dispute between Moscow and Minsk, cutting off supplies to several European countries and highlighting concerns over Russia's reliability as an energy supplier.

Accusing Belarus of stealing oil headed for Europe, Russia suspended exports via the Druzhba ("Friendship") pipeline, halting supplies to several countries, including Germany and Poland.

Authorities in Belarus said oil was taken as a form of transit payment imposed on Jan. 1 that Moscow has refused to pay.

The halt in oil exports comes a year after Russia cut off supplies of natural gas to Ukraine because of a price dispute, disrupting supplies to parts of Europe during a chilly January 2006.

The oil cutoff is unlikely to cause a repeat of last year's panic over gas supplies because European refineries typically carry several months of inventory.

Nevertheless, yesterday's cutoff renewed concerns over Russia's willingness to use its vast oil and gas exports as a political weapon.

It marked a major escalation of a crisis in relations between Russia and Belarus, a country long considered one of Moscow's closest allies.

"Belarus has cast caution to the wind by starting to take oil because Russia is not paying a duty it illegally imposed. This looks like a trade war," Andrei Sharonov, Russia's deputy economic development minister, told Ekho Moskvy radio.

He warned Russia was ready to take economic steps against its neighbor: "One must not forget that Russia is the biggest market and No. 1 economic partner for Belarus. Therefore, we have the possibilities to apply measures to Belarus."

Russian pipeline monopoly, Transneft, said in a statement yesterday that it had been forced to act after Belarus "began tapping oil destined only for customers in Western Europe from the Druzhba pipeline unilaterally, without any warning."

The company said Belarus had siphoned off 79,000 metric tons of oil since Saturday.

Belarus insisted it was not to blame for the crisis and was acting legitimately.

"The Belarusian side is not at fault for the drop in pressure at the entrance of the Druzhba oil pipeline," Foreign Ministry spokesman Andrei Popov said. "Belarus was forced to take measures to avoid economic damage and a shortage of vital fuel and energy resources."

A Belarusian delegation headed to Moscow last night for urgent talks.

DOJ_NMG_0114272

German Economy Minister Michael Glos said reserves would guarantee oil supplies even in the event of lengthy disruptions.

But he also said the incident demonstrated that "one-sided dependencies must not be allowed to develop."

Europe is heavily dependent on energy supplies from Russia, the world's second-largest oil exporter after Saudi Arabia.

The 2,500-mile-long Druzhba pipeline, built in the 1960s to tie then-communist Eastern Europe to Soviet energy supplies, carries 18 million metric tons of oil to Poland each year and 22 million metric tons to Germany, or one-fifth of its oil imports.

The pipeline has a southern branch that supplies oil to Ukraine, Hungary, Slovakia and the Czech Republic.

The dispute began when Russia this year imposed new export duties on oil sold to Belarus, where the economy is heavily dependent on refining Russian crude.

Belarus retaliated by imposing a $45-per-ton transit fee on Russian oil headed for Europe that Moscow has refused to pay.

The oil row follows a dispute over the more than doubling of Russian natural-gas prices for Belarus. The gas dispute was resolved on New Year's Eve, only hours before Russia was set to cut off supplies to the country of 10 million.

The energy disputes are severely straining ties between the two traditional allies, who in the past have discussed forming a political union.

Belarusian President Alexander Lukashenko -- branded Europe's last dictator by the United States -- has been showing signs of increasing independence from Moscow since his re-election last year.

Moscow insists it is seeking market prices for energy supplies and that its neighbors no longer deserve Soviet-era subsidies.

But critics accuse the Kremlin of using its vast energy reserves as a political tool to restore its international influence.

Oil Line To Europe Is Cut Off (LAT)

By David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

MOSCOW — A dispute between longtime allies Russia and Belarus over oil taxes escalated Monday, leading to a cutoff in the flow of crude oil through a pipeline serving European customers.

Officials in Minsk, the Belarusian capital, issued conflicting statements as to whether Belarus had intentionally cut off the flow of oil through the Druzhba (Friendship) pipeline, which crosses Belarus to link Russia and the European Union. Later in the day, Russia said it had stopped supplying oil to the pipeline, blaming Belarus for the move.

"I would like to stress that Belarus was the first to suspend the transit of Russian oil intended for third countries via its territory," Andrei Sharonov, Russia's deputy trade and economic development minister, said in an interview with Vesti-24 television. "Russia moved to suspend supplies to Belarus in response."

The incident reignited a debate about the reliability of Russia as an energy supplier. The European Union relies on Russia for about 40% of its natural gas imports and about 30% of its oil imports. Russia is the world's largest exporter of natural gas and the second-largest oil exporter, after Saudi Arabia.

News of Monday's pipeline shutdown initially drove oil futures higher in New York and London as traders worried about energy shortages. But the rally couldn't be sustained on the New York Mercantile Exchange because warm weather in the U.S. has put a damper on demand for petroleum products, and crude for February delivery closed Monday at $56.09 a barrel, off 22 cents. In London, the European benchmark Brent crude fell 4 cents to $55.60 a barrel.

"We have much more of a cushion in crude and gasoline supplies than we had last year after the hurricanes in the Gulf [of Mexico]. That cushion is offering a little bit of a buffer to these stories," said Phil Flynn, vice president and senior market analyst for Alaron Trading Corp. in Chicago.

The oil dispute was triggered by Russia's new customs duty of $180 per metric ton on oil exports to Belarus. The tax took effect Jan. 1. Belarus retaliated by imposing a charge of $45 per ton for oil shipped through the pipeline to the European Union, which Minsk initially called a customs duty but now describes as a transit fee.

The oil dispute erupted immediately after Moscow and Minsk worked out a last-minute New Year's Eve deal ending an argument over natural gas prices. Belarus yielded to a Russian demand to pay in the new year slightly more than double the 2006 price. Belarusian officials had expressed unhappiness with that deal, which averted the threat of a midwinter disruption of gas supplies to European customers.

DOJ_NMG_0114273

Despite the significant price hike, Belarus still receives Russian natural gas for less than half the amount charged to other European Union customers.

The natural gas standoff in late December resembled a pricing dispute a year earlier between Russia and Ukraine. In that case, failure to reach a contract by Jan. 1, 2006, led to a brief disruption of gas supplies to European Union countries

Officials in European capitals expressed concern Monday about the oil cutoff but said there was no immediate risk to sufficient energy supplies in the European Union. The pipeline delivers 20% of Germany's yearly oil supply, but Berlin was not panicked: The winter has been mild, and officials said the country had 130 days' worth of reserves.

"I view the closure of the important Druzhba pipeline with concern," German Economics Minister Michael Glos said. "I expect the deliveries through the pipeline to resume completely as soon as possible."

Crude oil shipped through the pipeline is refined into products such as gasoline and heating fuel. The current Russia-Belarus spat over oil has resulted in European politicians calling for less reliance on Russian oil and gas.

Guido Westerwelle, chairman of Germany's Free Democrats, said Monday that the new dispute demonstrated a need for his nation "to get more independent from foreign energy supplies."

"It would be much more sensible if we would have a mix of energy resources," Westerwelle said. "This is not only an ecological or economic question. It is also an issue of foreign relations, which would make us more independent and less subject to blackmail."

Belarus and Russia accuse each other of violating bilateral economic agreements on duty-free trade by instituting the new charges on oil. Semyon Vainshtok, head of the state-owned Russian oil pipeline monopoly Transneft, accused Belarus of siphoning off oil illegally.

Belarusian President Alexander G. Lukashenko has been widely criticized in the West as "Europe's last dictator," and he has been heavily dependent on economic and political support from Moscow.

Until Russia imposed the new customs duty on oil, Belarus was able to import Russian oil at domestic Russian prices, refine it into petroleum products at Soviet-era factories and export the goods at a high profit. That provided an important subsidy to Belarus' state-controlled economy, helping Lukashenko to keep his grip on power. The cutoff of the Russian subsidy could have political as well as economic effects in Belarus.

Although Moscow has at times shown frustration with Lukashenko's heavy-handed rule and preservation of a largely Soviet-style economy, Russia and Belarus have maintained close ties and discussed uniting into a single state. If such an agreement were reached, that would be a small step toward restoring a semblance of the Soviet Union, which collapsed in 1991.

The bitterness evident in the gas and oil disputes appears to be rapidly undercutting any prospects for unity talks, which had never appeared very likely to most observers.

The oil spat threatens more-tense relations. As one example, a Belarusian customs spokesman told Russian news agency Interfax on Monday that Belarus would require Russian citizens entering the country by car to obtain temporary entry permits for their vehicles.

At a government meeting in Minsk on Wednesday, Lukashenko accused Russia of "extremely unfriendly steps" in the natural gas pricing dispute and indicated that he was prepared to take wide-ranging risks in his relationship with Moscow to fight for better economic terms.

Lukashenko instructed officials "to send proposals to Russia in the first quarter of the year concerning payments for everything they are receiving here free now — starting from military facilities."

Russian Defense Minister Sergei B. Ivanov said Saturday that he believed Belarusian authorities would not allow economic disputes to affect military ties, Interfax reported. The two countries have prepared an agreement on unifying their air defense systems, he said, expressing hope that it would be signed soon.

A Belarusian delegation left Monday evening for Moscow for oil talks expected to begin today.

Russia Halts Oil Flow To Belarus In Dispute (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0114274

By Peter Finn

Washington Post, January 9, 2007

MOSCOW, Jan. 8 -- Russia on Monday shut off crude oil supplies that flow by pipeline across Belarus to Germany, Poland and other parts of Eastern Europe, charging that Belarus was illegally siphoning off oil meant for the other countries.

The dispute between two erstwhile allies will have little immediate effect because the end-customer countries have strategic reserves for at least two months. But it is rekindling discussion in Europe about the reliability of Russia as a supplier of energy.

"This shows us once again that arguments among various countries of the former Soviet Union, between suppliers and transit countries, mean that these deliveries are unreliable from our perspective," Poland's deputy economy minister, Piotr Naimski, said in a television interview. Poland has long been suspicious of Russia's dominance of energy supplies on the Continent.

Belarus, led by authoritarian President Alexander Lukashenko, has poor relations with the United States and Western Europe. It is unlikely to garner the kind of international sympathy that Ukraine, for example, enjoyed when Russia cut off its natural gas in a pricing dispute last January.

The convulsions over Russia's pricing of energy supplies to its neighbors also extend to Azerbaijan, which announced Monday that it had halted the export of oil to Russia. Officials in the Caspian Sea nation said they planned to divert the oil to power stations in their country to replace Russian natural gas.

Russia doubled the price of natural gas for Azerbaijan on Jan. 1, but the country refused to accept the rate of $230 per 1,309 cubic yards, the price that Western European countries pay.

The disputes with Belarus and Azerbaijan, following Russian confrontations with Ukraine and Georgia, are likely to give new urgency to efforts in parts of Europe to diversify the supply chain and reduce dependence on Russia, one of the Continent's most important suppliers. In 2004, it provided about 27 percent of the oil consumed in the European Union, according to the bloc.

For years, Russia and Belarus have been bound together by Moscow's provision of cheap energy in return for political loyalty. But the Kremlin appears to have tired of subsidizing Lukashenko, whose government could face an economic crisis brought on by higher energy costs.

The two countries have flirted with the idea of forming a political union, but Russia is interested in absorbing Belarus as a province, while Lukashenko has insisted on a union of equal states, an idea the Kremlin finds ludicrous. The idea appears finished, at least under the current leadership of both countries, according to Irina Kobrinskaya, an analyst at the Institute of World Economy and International Relations in Moscow. "The union state is a myth," she said in an interview.

The European Union's energy commissioner, Andris Piebalgs, said he wanted an "urgent and detailed explanation" from both Belarus and Russia as to why the pipeline carrying Russian crude was closed. European officials said Germany has enough oil in reserve to last 130 days, and Poland has enough for 70 days.

Each year, approximately 100 million tons of Russian oil crosses Belarusan territory in pipelines. Russian officials said they were examining ways of rerouting oil. The pipeline network crossing Belarus also supplies the Czech Republic, Hungary, Lithuania and Slovakia.

Belarus's command economy has been heavily dependent on subsidized natural gas and crude oil from Russia, which is now insisting that the government in Minsk pay more.

On New Year's Eve, Belarus reluctantly agreed to a doubling of natural gas prices and a gradual shift to market prices by 2011. The deal also provided for the Russian state-controlled energy giant Gazprom to acquire a 50 percent stake in the gas pipeline system owned by Belarus.

But the two countries continued to spar over cheap crude oil. Belarus has earned billions of dollars from processing cheap Russian oil and then exporting it to Western Europe. Last month, Russia imposed an export duty of $180 per ton of oil sold to Belarus, a severe blow to the country's reprocessing industry and government revenue. Belarus responded by imposing an import duty of $45 per ton of Russian oil that crossed its territory.

Russia accused Belarus of siphoning off 79,000 tons of crude oil since Saturday and threatened retaliation.

DOJ_NMG_0114275

"This looks like a trade war," Andrei Sharonov, Russia's deputy economic development and trade minister, said on Echo Moskvy radio. "One should not forget that Russia is the biggest market and number one economic partner for Belarus. Therefore we have the possibility to apply measures to Belarus and get the duty canceled."

A Belarusan delegation flew to Moscow Monday evening for emergency talks.

Moscow-Minsk Dispute Leaves Europe In A Quandary (FT)

By Arkady Ostrovsky And Quentin Peel

Financial Times, January 9, 2007

Russia has very few friends among the former Soviet republics. Its spat with Belarus suggests it is fast losing one of the last.

In spite of the mercurial moods of Alexander Lukashenko, Belarus's authoritarian ruler, the country has long been one of Russia's closest allies, enjoying its generous subsidies in the form of cheap oil and gas. In reality, the Kremlin has been getting increasingly irritated with the antics of the man it has kept in power.

Kremlin officials seem to have decided that the dubious political benefits of supporting Mr Lukashenko are now outweighed by his failure to show respect for the Russian president. In a Russian election year, they seem determined to inflict a serious blow to his prestige and demonstrate their own strength.

For the European Union, the confrontation between the two erstwhile allies presents a dilemma: the EU members have no love for Mr Lukashenko and have long sought to persuade Moscow to cut off his sub-sidies. But equally, they do not want to encourage the Kremlin to use its energy supplies for political purposes, and nor do they want the pipelines to dry up.

On paper, Moscow and Minsk were supposed to be working towards a political and economic union, including a single currency. In practice, the idea has lost its appeal to Mr Lukashenko, ever since he realised that the merger was more likely to be a takeover and his own role in the new union would be reduced to that of local governor.

Observers in Moscow say there is no love lost between Vladimir Putin, Russia's president, and Mr Lukashenko. But they also say that while Mr Putin loathes his Belarusan counterpart, he is even less well-disposed to the idea of Belarus being swept by a pro-western uprising. Hence the Russian support for Mr Lukashenko's re-election last year.

But despite his material backing, Mr Putin has seen little in return from his Belrusan colleague, and his patience appears finally to have snapped.

Belarus used to receive Russian crude oil duty free and resold it in the form of refined products at a hefty profit. It was supposed to hand on 85 per cent of the profit to Moscow but had long stopped doing so. Moreover, according to Andrei Sharonov, Russia's deputy minister for economic development, Mr Lukashenko imposed arbitrary taxes on Russian oil companies and made them sell oil to Belarusan intermediaries.

On January 1, Russia introduced a standard $180 export duty on its crude oil, depriving Mr Lukashenko of an annual profit of nearly $2bn. But the Belarusan leader responded by slapping a duty of $45 per tonne on Russian oil transiting through Belarus.

"If those in Russia, choking on this influx of petrodollars and other sources of hard currency, are still willing to make a scapegoat of Belarus . . . then let's ask the Russian Federation – so huge and so rich – to pay us in full for our services," Mr Lukashenko said.

Moscow says the unilateral imposition of an export duty on oil transit breaks every international norm and refuses to pay. But Mr Lukashenko decided to play a hard-ball game and on Saturday started to take Russian oil from the pipeline as "a payment in kind".

Whatever the cause, this latest interruption of Russian energy supplies to Europe in just over a year is likely to dent further its reputation as a reliable supplier. But Belarus has more to lose. Some 50 per cent of all Belarus exports go to Russia and a full trade war would be disastrous for the Belarusan economy and its political regime. Mr Lukashenko has no support in Europe or in the US. Russia is his only lifeline.

For the EU, the dispute opens the awful prospect of having to choose between an authoritarian but relatively independent Belarus, or an unpredictable change of regime with Moscow calling the shots.

Russian Extortion, Continued (WP)

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114276

Now an oil pipeline through Belarus runs dry. Will its customers in Western Europe finally be stirred?

RUSSIA'S CONTINUING attempt to squeeze neighboring Belarus yesterday led to the shutdown of a pipeline carrying oil to Europe -- another stark reminder of how the Kremlin's aggressive use of energy as a political tool threatens Western democracies as well as its neighbors. Just days after forcing Belarus to accept a huge increase in the price of natural gas, the government of Vladimir Putin stopped oil deliveries in an attempt to impose a large new duty that would eliminate a longstanding and lucrative subsidy. Because the pipeline carrying oil to Minsk also serves the rest of Europe, Poland, Germany and other European Union countries also did not receive Russian oil deliveries. Those countries have reserves to fill the gap for the near future. But once again the message should be clear: Countries that depend on Russia for energy can be subject to capricious and politically motivated demands -- and interruptions of supplies if those demands are not met.

Belarus has been a faithful ally of Russia; its autocratic president, Alexander Lukashenko, has made himself a pariah in the West by stealing elections, imprisoning and murdering opposition leaders, and supplying weapons to rogue states. But Mr. Lukashenko has irritated Mr. Putin by failing to follow through on an agreement to merge his country with Russia. Now he is getting his punishment: an abrupt withdrawal of energy subsidies that in recent years have propped up his state-dominated economy. The Belarusan president consequently must choose between giving Mr. Putin what he wants or trying to make Belarus a genuinely independent country. Since the latter would require groundbreaking political and economic liberalization, the Kremlin's risk may not be great. Belarus has already agreed to hand control of its gas pipeline to Russia, a concession Mr. Lukashenko had long resisted.

Other Russian neighbors are fighting back against its energy imperialism. Azerbaijan last week stopped buying Russian gas rather than agree to a huge price increase; it then reduced the amount of oil it pumps through a Russian-controlled pipeline. Azerbaijan offended Mr. Putin by agreeing to supply its own gas from a field soon to come online to neighboring Georgia, whose democratic and pro-Western government is Moscow's first target. Both Caucasian countries have the prospect of ending reliance on Russian supplies in the near future; in that respect, they are considerably better off than the European Union, which gets a quarter of its gas from Russia.

Western governments are watching Mr. Putin's hardball tactics with concern; yesterday they called for an immediate resumption of supplies through the Belarusan pipeline. They do not, however, have a policy for countering the Russian threat. Even the members of the European Union cannot agree among themselves on whether to appease Russia -- by offering new long-term contracts and capital for investment in oil and gas projects -- or push back, which they could do by insisting that Mr. Putin sign an international "energy charter" that would curtail his monopolistic practices. The attack on Belarus ought to rule out the appeasement option.

The Face Of El Salvador's Charm Offensive (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

Like much of Washington's diplomatic corps, El Salvador's consul general, Ana Margarita Chavez, spends her days conferring with U.S. officials and her nights cruising to parties in a black sport-utility vehicle with diplomatic plates.

That is where the similarity ends.

While her counterparts from other nations stick to such traditional consular services as renewing passports and helping their countrymen sort out immigration problems, Chavez, a petite 49-year-old with long black curls and a bubbly laugh, is more like a social worker on steroids.

During weekly appearances on the area's main Spanish radio shows, Chavez regularly gives out her cellphone number so that immigrants in need of help can reach her directly.

The phone's constant trill is a testament to how many listeners take her up on the offer. During one recent week, Chavez dropped by the Silver Spring home of a Salvadoran construction worker injured in a car accident last year to check on his progress; lined up a job for an out-of-work landscaper in Woodbridge and then personally drove him to the interview; and convinced a young father fighting a bitter custody battle with his estranged wife that their daughter is better off staying with her grandparents in El Salvador.

DOJ_NMG_0114277

As for her evening social schedule, Chavez usually skips high-powered bashes in Washington's downtown restaurants or Embassy Row manses in favor of pupusa and wine mixers hosted in suburban churches and community centers by immigrant Salvadoran nurses, restaurant owners and construction contractors seeking to raise money for the impoverished villages they left behind.

Her approach dovetails with a wider charm offensive recently launched by Salvadoran President Elias Antonio Saca, of the pro-business ARENA party, to cement his support among Salvadoran expatriates.

The stakes are high. The Salvadoran government estimates that more than a fourth of the country's citizens live in the United States. The expatriates have been lobbying hard for the right to vote from abroad, and it is generally considered a matter of just a few years before they will get it. Even now, they are believed to exercise enormous sway over voters back home thanks to the estimated $3 billion they send their relatives annually.

During the presidential election in 2004, Saca and his opponent campaigned personally in the Washington area. And shortly after taking office, Saca expanded the foreign ministry to include a vice ministry exclusively dedicated to overseas Salvadorans.

The 16 consulates in the United States are the vice ministry's principal vehicle of operations. The Washington area is among its most important targets. The U.S. Census estimates there are 130,000 foreign-born Salvadorans in the Washington region. The embassy estimates the size of the local Salvadoran community -- including those born here of Salvadoran parents -- at half a million.

At first glance, Chavez might not seem the most obvious choice to win them over. The daughter of a former chief supreme court justice, she hails from the upper crust of a society still highly stratified between rich and poor 14 years after peace accords ended its bloody civil war. Originally an architect, Chavez said that friends in El Salvador's military encouraged her to pursue national security studies and later a career as head of El Salvador's anti-drug commission before she was tapped for the consul general position.

Although she still encounters cynics, Chavez's effervescent, informal style has clearly captivated many local Salvadorans, who quickly fall into addressing her with the familiar "t?" rather than the formal "usted" in Spanish. A year and a half into the job, Chavez has emerged as one of the most recognizable figures within the Salvadoran community -- even as she remains almost completely unknown outside of it.

"Previous consuls have tried to get close to our community, of course. But no one has shown her enthusiasm," said Luis Felipe Romero, president of Salvadorans Associated of Maryland, as he watched Chavez lead a conga line around the dance floor at the charity's annual fundraising party in Northwest Washington on a recent evening. "She comes to every event. She is always insisting that we call her Ana Margarita, not Se?ora Consul. She really identifies with the working-class Salvadoran overseas."

Much of Chavez's work is conducted without fanfare -- including her periodic visits to Roger Menendez, the construction worker recovering from his car accident in Silver Spring.

"Hello, Roger! How's my sweetheart?" Chavez cooed as she stepped into his darkened bedroom on a recent evening.

Menendez, 28, who lay on a hospital bed and had a feeding tube protruding from his stomach, could only manage a loud, "Mmmmmm."

Chavez, a divorced mother of three grown children, beamed. "You should have seen him when he came out of the coma a couple months ago," she said. "He could only move his eyes. . . . This is great progress."

Chavez maintains that such extracurricular activities are a natural outgrowth of her job as consul.

"You're supposed to be your people's representative over here. So that means you're going to be called on to be everything from mayor, to priest, to psychologist," she said.

During a recent interview in her office in an ultra-modern, government complex in San Salvador, Margarita Escobar, head of the vice ministry for overseas Salvadorans, confirmed that strategy and ticked off an array of other outreach initiatives she and her staff have undertaken so far -- including inviting several hundred expatriate Salvadorans to a forum with Saca late last year, developing pension and health insurance plans for Salvadorans who want to retire in El Salvador and opening a satellite consulate in Woodbridge so that area Salvadoran immigrants don't have to travel as far or wait as long for services.

DOJ_NMG_0114278

The unifying theme, Escobar said, is that, "we're trying to make our Salvadorans overseas understand that this government truly cares about them."

Whether the expatriates are receptive to the message is another story.

At the Salvadorans Associated of Maryland fundraiser, Hugo Carballo, a union organizer who has lived in Fairfax for nearly 20 years, said he appreciated Chavez's presence at the event, as well as her help coordinating local immigrant relief efforts after Hurricane Stan launched mudslides across El Salvador and other Central American nations in 2005.

"But what I really want from this government is for them to give us the right to vote, and it just seems like there's no political will to make it happen quickly," he said. "God knows we Salvadorans in the United States do so much for our country. They need to take us into account, to recognize our contribution -- maybe even give us our own representative in the National Assembly."

Emily Castro, a special education teacher living in Northern Virginia, was even more indignant.

"As a representative of the Salvadoran government, she should be ashamed to be here," Castro muttered, glancing over at Chavez after Romero made a presentation highlighting the desperate poverty of the Salvadoran children for whom the association buys school supplies and bemoaning the fact that the association could not help more of them.

"The government should be solving these problems, not asking this community that is working so hard over here and that has so little of our own to take care of it," she said.

About an hour later, Castro confronted Chavez directly -- telling her that three Salvadoran girls at her school were pregnant and asking bluntly, "What the hell do you guys ever do for us?"

Chavez's smile wavered slightly. But she quickly regained her composure and began peppering Castro with questions about the case and assuring her that the consulate would be eager to form a partnership to combat teen pregnancy.

"She doesn't believe me now. But she'll see when I call her next week to follow up," Chavez whispered to a colleague as Castro strode off. "I bet you I win her over."

South Africans See Hope Of Unity In A Prospect For Presidency (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

JOHANNESBURG, Jan. 8 -- The purported presidential ambitions of a gregarious multimillionaire have sent South Africa into a frenzy of political speculation this week, while offering a glimpse into the normally secretive struggle over picking the nation's next leader.

Several top African National Congress leaders approached Tokyo Sexwale, a seasoned politician and businessman, about running for the party presidency, the Sunday Times newspaper reported under the banner headline "Tokyo guns for presidency." The job, to be filled at a national convention in December, is widely regarded as the steppingstone to becoming elected president of the nation in 2009.

Sexwale -- whose knack for publicity was honed during a stint playing the Donald Trump role in South Africa's version of "The Apprentice" -- dismissed the report as "spurious" in a statement issued Monday afternoon. "They are kite-flying, nothing more than a red herring, and we treat them with disdain," he said.

The denial by Sexwale, 53, was widely disregarded by South Africans familiar with the ways of the ANC; leaders running for party office traditionally pretend that they would be just as happy being, say, municipal dogcatcher as president. In the past year a succession of leading contenders for the party presidency have reacted similarly -- in public at least -- to news reports that they coveted the top job.

The Sexwale news dominated newspaper headlines and radio call-in shows on Monday both because of the specificity of the Sunday Times report, which laid out several apparently strategic maneuvers by Sexwale in anticipation of a run, and because he is widely seen as a conciliatory figure in a deeply divided party.

"He's seen as somebody who is above the fray," said political analyst Xolela Mangcu, speaking from the judicial capital of Bloemfontein, where he was traveling. "The whole bloodletting that's been happening to the ANC has to stop. . . . This country can't move forward with a divided ruling party."

DOJ_NMG_0114279

The ANC, whose massive advantage in voter support allows it to dominate South African politics at every level, fractured in June 2005 when President Thabo Mbeki fired his deputy and heir apparent, Jacob Zuma, over allegations of corruption.

Supporters of Zuma, a populist with close ties to South Africa's Communist Party and labor movement, reacted with fury, at one point burning a flag bearing the image of Mbeki. Zuma's political comeback gained momentum after a pair of legal judgments in 2006 cleared him of rape charges and dismissed corruption charges. And though his legal troubles may not be over, Zuma is seen both as the leader of the ANC's left wing and of the nation's large population of ethnic Zulus. Analysts say he remains a contender for the presidency.

Mbeki, meanwhile, has seen his influence ebb during a bruising succession struggle carried out almost entirely behind closed doors. His second five-year term as national president is due to end in 2009, and though he is constitutionally barred from running for the office again, Mbeki has not ruled out seeking the party presidency in December. He has not publicly backed a candidate for either job, though he has said he believes that South Africa's next president should be a woman.

"The ANC knows it needs a compromise candidate because the party is split down the middle," said Rhoda Kadalie, a political columnist based in Cape Town.

Sexwale's politics are difficult to label, despite his stint in the 1990s as premier of South Africa's bustling Gauteng province, which includes Johannesburg, Soweto and Pretoria. A student leader in the 1960s, he later joined the ANC's armed wing in exile in Swaziland and did military training in the Soviet Union. He was a close friend of Communist Party leader Chris Hani, who was assassinated in 1993.

He reportedly remains close to former president Nelson Mandela, with whom he spent years while behind bars at the notorious Robben Island prison during the apartheid era.

He left politics in 1998 for what became a lucrative career in the private sector, founding Mvelaphanda Holdings, a huge mining and energy company, and establishing himself as one of the most visible members of the nation's growing group of elite black businessmen who found riches after the ANC came to power.

Sexwale's history of strained relations with Mbeki was long rumored to be one of the reasons he left politics. In 2001, he was accused of being part of a plot to overthrow Mbeki, but he and the others accused were exonerated.

The Sunday Times reported that Sexwale recently invited Mbeki's wife to join in some business deals.

Analysts also note that Sexwale's wife is white, a fact that some believe could, if he were president, diminish the polarized nature of racial discussion in South Africa.

"Somebody like Tokyo could take us out of that and put us on a new path," Mangcu said.

Another popular businessman often mentioned as a candidate for president is former ANC activist Cyril Ramaphosa, though he too has denied seeking the job. The list of possible candidates also includes party Secretary General Kgalema Motlanthe, Deputy President Phumzile Mlambo-Ncguka, Foreign Minister Nkosazana Dlamini-Zuma, Finance Minister Trevor Manuel and Defense Minister Mosiuoa Lekota.

U.S. To Drop Charges In '99 Uganda Killings (WT)

By Jim McElhatton

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

Federal prosecutors in the District yesterday sought to drop felony murder charges against three Rwanda citizens who faced possible death sentences in connection with the 1999 kidnapping and killing of two American tourists in Uganda.

The move comes five months after U.S. District Judge Ellen Huvelle suppressed confessions by defendants Francois Karake, Leonidas Bimenyimana and Gregoire Nyaminani, who were reputed members of the Liberation Army of Rwanda.

The government's case relied heavily on the defendants' confessions, but Judge Huvelle barred prosecutors from using the statements. The judge ruled the confessions were inadmissible because evidence showed the defendants were tortured while imprisoned by Rwandan authorities.

"The United States is unable to proceed to trial at this time...," assistant U.S. attorneys Jonathan M. Malis and Jeffrey Beatrice stated in a court memo filed yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0114280

U.S. officials charged the men more than three years ago in the bludgeoning deaths of U.S. citizens Robert Haubner and his wife, Susan Miller, of Portland, Ore.

The couple, on a safari vacation, was killed with six other tourists from New Zealand and Britain after men armed with automatic weapons, axes and machetes raided their tourist camp in a national park in Uganda on March 1, 1999.

In court documents, prosecutors called the killings "brutal murders" intended to send a message to the United States against supporting the Rwandan government.

Prosecutors said the men charged were among a band of about 100 that invaded the Bwindi Impenetrable Forest National Park, a remote rain forest in the southwestern region of Uganda known for the presence of rare mountain gorillas. The group attacked the park's guards and sentries, killing four, including one guard who was burned alive to discourage resistance.

The attackers rounded up more than 20 tourists from the campground and separated 17 who spoke English. The captives were marched by force into the forest toward the border of the Democratic Republic of Congo. Two other Americans were among those captured and later released. Three women, including Mrs. Miller, were raped before being killed.

Despite the prosecutors' setback, they said other evidence might lead to a new trial.

"While the United States is unable to proceed to trial at this time, it may be able to do so in the future based on evidence apart from the defendants' confessions," they said.

A hearing date hasn't been set on the government's motion. If granted, it's expected the defendants will be released from the D.C. Jail. They also could be deported.

"Once the court official dismisses the indictment... the defendants will be handled as would any other person or persons who do not have legal immigration status to remain in the U.S.," said Channing Phillips, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office.

However, returning the defendants to Rwanda raises other legal questions, said David I. Bruck, a lawyer and death penalty authority at Washington and Lee University.

"If the problem with the case is that they were tortured by the people who gave them to us, how do we send them back?" he asked. "What do we do with them next?"

Mr. Bruck said the case was "extremely unusual" from the start because the federal government was prosecuting murders that occurred in another country.

"It eventually became quite obvious that when you import a defendant from another jurisdiction, you import with them all of the human rights violations and chaos from the country where they were found."

In announcing the arrests in 2003, then-Assistant U.S. Attorney General Michael Chertoff, who is now secretary of the federal Department of Homeland Security, said the indictment should "serve as a warning."

"Those who commit acts of terror against Americans will be hunted, captured and brought to justice," he said.

The move to dismiss the charges in the Ugandan killings marks the second recent setback for federal prosecutors in the District in a capital punishment case.

D.C. law bars the death penalty, but capital punishment can be sought in federal cases.

In October, U.S. District Judge Richard W. Roberts said prosecutors could not seek the death penalty against reputed leaders of the so-called Congress Park Crew street gang, citing a missed filing deadline.

Meanwhile, jury selection is beginning this week in another capital murder case in federal court in the District. The defendant, Larry Gooch, is charged with killing five persons in his role as enforcer for the M Street Crew, a PCP ring that operated in Northeast.

The Troubles Of Sista P. (NYT)

By Orlando Patterson

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

Kingston, Jamaica

DOJ_NMG_0114281

Thirty-two years ago, a young working-class woman, Portia Simpson, exploded onto the Jamaican political scene with an unexpected electoral victory in the slums of southwestern Kingston, the heart of opposition party turf, dominated by armed political gangs.

Soon after, I accompanied her on a tour of the area in the hope of laying plans for an urban upgrading project. As we approached Rema, a notorious opposition holdout, five gunshots pierced the heat. Dashing for cover, I looked back to see Simpson being reluctantly pulled away by two of her aides. Left to herself, she would have carried on, so deep was her hunger to help the people from whom she had just risen. I thought then that this woman would go far.

She did. Last February, Portia Simpson-Miller stunned the political establishment by outmaneuvering the heir apparent, Peter Phillips, in the struggle to succeed Prime Minister P. J. Patterson, who retired in midterm, and in March she took office as Jamaica's first female leader. There was national jubilation, especially among women, who wept at the sight of "Momma," "Auntie Portia" or "Sista P.," as they lovingly call her.

Even skeptics felt that it was hard to do worse than what the men had achieved for the mass of Jamaicans in abysmal poverty, after four decades of modernization that had benefited only the middle and upper classes. Simpson's approval ratings soared, and for a heady few weeks the claims of her supporters that the healing hand of a woman was what the country needed seemed borne out. And an almost tactile sense of unity and good will soothed the anxieties of daily life in this overheated polity.

The honeymoon was brief. Hardly two months into her leadership, opposition forces and the media unleashed a barrage of criticisms against her, the gist being that she was hopelessly unqualified for the job. Her modest education, undistinguished performance in Parliament, Creole speech, populism and refusal to face the press have been grist for the media and opposition mill. What turned a tidal wave of criticism into a tsunami, however, was the revelation that a Dutch commodities firm, Trafigura Beheer BV, which does business with the government, had misrepresented a campaign donation of $470,000 that it made to her party. In fact, Jamaica has no campaign finance laws to break, and there is a long tradition of businesses donating to political parties. The government, however, handled the revelation ineptly before returning the money, providing endless fodder for the media.

On Sunday, I had a candid two-hour conversation with Sista P. at her official residence. She is as defiant as ever. At 61, she appears in her early 40s, her youthfulness emphasized by deep bangs hanging over dark, sparkling eyes. She noted that in 2006 the economy grew at one of its fastest rates in years, 2.4 percent, inflation was low, 5.3 percent, and that major crime fell by 20 percent. So why the criticisms?

"Because I'm a woman in a field dominated by men, and because of my background," she insisted. Why has she been avoiding the press? "I've been beaten, banged and bashed by the media," she said. "They are trying to kill my charisma" because "every time they see me they are looking at the majority of Jamaicans who are poor and they can only think, 'How dare this uppity woman.' " She added later, "As leader, I have the right to refuse to speak to those who misrepresent what I say."

She dismissed the Trafigura affair as a media exaggeration, the only impropriety coming from the company, which, to circumvent Dutch laws, misrepresented the donation. She is confident of winning the coming elections, although her approval rating in polls is down to 30 percent.

Mistakes have been made, and Sista P. has to change her attitude toward the press, but I share her belief that Jamaica's patriarchalism and class biases are stacked against her. So, too, is the British parliamentary system that operates here, which requires of leaders a demanding mix of political, debating and executive skills.

Sista P. embraced me and kissed me on the cheek as we parted, and I wished her luck in the coming elections, required by October. She is going to need it.

DOJ_NMG_0114282

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, JANUARY 9, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Padilla Wants Statements Made In Navy Brig Suppressed (AP) .. 4
Man Gets 30 Years In Subway Bomb Plot (NYT) 4
Pakistani Sentenced To 30 Years For New York Subway Bomb Plot (AFP) 5
Would-be NY Subway Bomber Gets 30 Years (BOS/AP)..... 6
30 Years For Bomb Plotter Is A Milestone, Kelly Says (NYS)..... 7
Subway Bomb Plotter Sentenced To 30 Years (NSDY)..... 7
Herald Square Bomb Plotter Gets 30 Yrs. (NYDN)..... 7
Prosecutors: Suburban Man Bankrolled Terrorists (CHIT)..... 8
U.S. Prosecutors Wrap Up Case Against Alleged Hamas Financiers (FINDLAW/AP)..... 9
Who Is The Mysterious Informant Jack Mustafa? (SOUTHNH).... 9
Supreme Court Refuses Case Challenging Group's Designation As Terrorists (NYT)..... 10
High Court Won't Block Terror Trial (LAT)..... 11
Court Turns Down Iran Opposition Group (WP/AP)..... 12
Outgoing Detroit Chief Defends FBI (DEN)..... 12
German Court Hands Moroccan Max For 9/11 (AP)..... 13
Accomplice In 9-11 Attacks Gets 15-year Sentence (MCT)..... 14
9/11 Associate Is Sentenced In Germany To 15 Years (NYT).... 15
More Gitmo Detainees Join Hunger Strike (AP)..... 16
Lawyer To Face Court-Martial (NYT/AP)..... 16

Homeland Response:

House Democrats' Security Bill Draws Doubts (NYT)..... 16
House Bill Backs Additional Reforms From 9/11 Report (WP).... 18
House Nears Passage Of Resolution To Add Intelligence Oversight Panel (WP)..... 19
Democrats Defend Intelligence Panel Plans (WT)..... 19
Security Bill Picks Up Ideas Of 9/11 Panel (CSM)..... 20
A Bad Investment (WP)..... 21
Adapt, Change Or Die (WP)..... 22
Court Challenge Of ID Requirement Fails (USAT)..... 22
Package Is Second False Alarm At Port (MH)..... 23
Authorities: Miami Package Was Harmless (NSDY/AP)..... 24
False Alarm At Miami Port -- Again (UPI)..... 24
Charges Dismissed After Port Scare (MCT)..... 24
Dead Birds Litter Street In Austin; Tests Continue (USAT)..... 25
For Airport Screeners, More Training About Muslims (CSM)..... 26
TSA Screeners May Get Union Rights (WP)..... 27
A Rotten Smell Raises Alarms And Questions (NYT)..... 28
Public Safety And Profit: On The Same Wavelength? (WP)..... 29
Study: People Outside Senate Office Infected With Anthrax (USAT)..... 30
State Farm Is Settling Gulf Claims (NYT)..... 31
In New Orleans, These Gumshoes Can Float Your Boat (WSJ) 32

War News:

Bush Considers Expansion Of Up To 20,000 Troops (USAT) 33
Bush To Reveal New Iraq Strategy (WT)..... 34
White House Gears Up To Sell Plan For Troop Increase In Iraq (NYT)..... 35
A Big Speech Is A First Step; Follow-up Key (USAT)..... 37
Lawmakers Get Private Surge Pitch (LAT)..... 37
Bush Works To Rally Support For Iraq 'Surge' (WP)..... 38
Not All Republicans Convinced Of Bush's Iraq Plan (LAT)..... 40
Most Say No To Iraq Buildup (USAT)..... 40
Senator: Bush Plans Iraq Troop Surge (AP)..... 41
Bush's Task: Thrusting New Strategy On 'a Sovereign Nation' (NYT)..... 42
Bush Policy Means Second Tours In Iraq, Military Says (LAT)... 44
Third Round In Iraq To Test US Troops (CSM)..... 45
The Bravest Front Of All (WP)..... 46
Working Syria, Iran Into Talks On Iraq (LAT)..... 48
Crafting An Iraq Plan (WSJ)..... 49
Widening War? If Iraq Worsens, Allies See 'Nightmare' Case (WSJ)..... 50
Past Time To Get Real On Iraq (NYT)..... 52
No More Middle East Crusades (LAT)..... 53
An Escalation Of American Blood (NYT)..... 54
The Least Immoral Choice (WP)..... 55
Democrats Split Over Their Approach To Iraq (NYT)..... 56
Democrats May Deny Funds For Iraq Surge (AP)..... 57
Congress Is Loath To Pull Purse Strings (LAT)..... 58
Dems Grapple With 'surge' (HILL)..... 60
Murtha Outlines Strategy To Restrict Troop Surge (WSJ)..... 61
Bush To Name Khalilzad For U.N. Job (AP)..... 61
Iraq-linked Reshuffle Continues With Switch Of US Baghdad Envoy (AFP)..... 62
Bush Ready To Announce New Iraq Plans (FT)..... 63
Our 'Viceroy' To The U.N. (LAT)..... 63
U.S. Strike Targets Al-Qaida In Somalia (AP)..... 64
U.S. Airstrike Aims At Qaeda Cell In Somalia (NYT)..... 64
U.S. Warplanes Fly Missions Over Somalia (AP)..... 65
U.S. Strike In Somalia Targets Al-Qaeda Figure (WP)..... 66

U.S. Strike In Somalia Aims At 3 Fugitives (LAT)..... 67
Interim Leader Rejects U.S. Approach In Somalia (MCT)..... 68
Rain Slows U.S. Offensive (LAT)..... 69
Hussein's Voice Speaks In Court In Praise Of Atrocities (NYT).. 70
Saddam's Voice, Aura Still Fill Courtroom (WT/AP)..... 72
Court Drops Kurd Charges Against Saddam (AP) 72
New Video Of Saddam's Corpse On Internet (AP)..... 74
Execution Sparks Arab Support For Saddam (AP) 74
Saddam's Trial Stirs Obama Ire (HILL)..... 76
Irrational Is As Irrational Does (WP) 77
Iraqi American Escapee Plans Return To U.S. (WP) 77
British Troops Winning The Conflict With The Taliban, Commander Says (AFP) 78

DOJ:

U.S. Attorney Christie Says He's Staying In His Job (AP)..... 79

Corporate Scandals:

Ex-Aspen Technology Head Surrenders On Securities Fraud Charges (FINDLAW/AP)..... 79
Stock Options Backdating Issue Haunts Jobs (USAT)..... 80
CEO Politics (WSJ)..... 81

Criminal Law:

House Democrats May Aid Corruption Inquiry (NYT)..... 82
CIA Digs In Its Heels (WSJ)..... 82
Judges Look To New Congress For Changes In Mandatory Sentencing Laws (NYT)..... 84
Criminal Complaint: Alderman Accepted Bribe (CHIT)..... 85
Ald. Troutman Arrested On Corruption Charges (CHIST)..... 87
Chicago Alderman Accused Of Taking Payoff (AP) 88
Bevilacqua To Wait In Jail For Court Hearing (PROJO)..... 88
Judge Allows 2 More Parties Into Polygamist Leader Evidence Case (SDUT/AP) 89
Battle Over Evidence Expands In Jeff Case (DESERET)..... 90
Twins' Birth Mother Returns To U.S. To Face Kidnapping Charge (AP)..... 91
Birth Mom Heads To U.S. Leaves Cda To Face Kidnapping Charge (CP)..... 91
Man Reportedly Accused Of Extorting Oprah Winfrey Waives Preliminary Hearing (MACT)..... 91
Five Plead Guilty In FEMA Fraud Cases (BSH)..... 92
Judge Delays Dowie's Sentencing In Fraud Case (LAT) 92
Towers Perrin Laptops, Client Data Stolen (WSJ) 93
Duke President Renews Call For District Attorney To Leave Case (NYT)..... 93

Civil Law:

Framed Men Take Stand At Trial (BOS) 94
Wrongly Convicted Men Describe Decades In Prison (AP) 95

Civil Rights:

Former Terrorism Suspect Can Sue County Over Treatment In Jail, U.S. Judge Rules (FINDLAW/AP)..... 96
Brooklyn Man, 38, Dies After Jolt From Police Taser (NYT) 96
Killing Stirs Racial Concerns In North Woods Of Wisconsin (NYT) 97

Antitrust:

GE Sets Private-Equity Limits (WSJ)..... 98
GE Reportedly Shopping Plastics Business (AP)..... 99
GE Seeks $10 Billion For Plastics Unit, People Say (Update1) (BLOOM)..... 100
GE Imposes Private Equity Conditions On Plastics Deal (FT) .. 100
Waste Services Buy Of Fla. Unit Gets OK (AP) 101
Caremark Rejects Bid From Express Scripts (WP/AP) 101
Express Scripts Moves To Derail A Merger (NYT) 102
Express Scripts Seeks Caremark Seats After Rejection (Update16) (BLOOM) 103

Environment/Indian Affairs:

EU Calls For New Low-Carbon Power Era (AP) 104
Polluted Waters Stain D.C.'s Shining Vision (WP) 105
Tribe Keeps Fighting For Treaty Rights (AP)..... 107

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Seven Programs To Watch In 2007 (GCN)..... 108
Farmington Hills Pot Bust Is Oakland's Second In Four Days (DN)..... 108
Oakland County Drug Bust Nets $33,000, Marijuana (FREEP) 109
Owners Of Medical Marijuana Dispensary Arrested (KESQ).... 109
CannaHelp Owner And Managers Being Booked At Indio Jail (DS)..... 109
3 From Pot Store Facing Charges (PE)..... 110
Robbers Posed As DEA (AT) 110
Tape Shows Robbers Dressed As Feds (KRQE)..... 111
Meth Smoke Taints Motels (DENP)..... 111
Federal Officials Pursuing More Gun-related Prosecutions (AP)112

Immigration:

Illegal Immigrants' Rearrest Rate High (AP)..... 113
Some Illegal Immigrants Arrested Repeatedly, Report Finds (MCT)..... 114
U.S. Supreme Court Refuses To Hear Asylum Case Of Colombian Drug Informant Fearing For His Life (AP) 114
Hispanic Leaders Call For Reform On Immigration Within 100 Days (HILL)..... 115
Guardsmen Retreat At Border Deemed Appropriate (WT) 116
Illegals Become Repeat Criminals (WT)..... 116

Congress-Administration:

Fielding Picked For White House Counsel (AP)..... 117
Bush Picks Reagan White House Counsel Fielding To Succeed Miers (WP)..... 118
Bush Turns To Capital Insider (LAT) 119
Reagan Lawyer Ready To Return To White House (NYT) 120
Fielding Subpoenas (WSJ) 121
Bush Issues Democrats Challenge On Earmarks (WT)..... 122
Reid's 'earmark' Gets Veto Of Home County (HILL)..... 122
House Votes To Tighten Rules On Tariff Breaks (WP)..... 124
White House To Unveil Medicare Overhaul (FT)..... 125
Bush, Lawmakers Meet On Education Bill (AP) 125
Republicans Seek Flexible School Funds (WT) 126
Democrats Push For Changes To No Child Left Behind Law (NYT) 127

DOJ_NMG_0114284

Senate Torn Over Ethics Panel Measure (AP) 128
Senate Takes Up Ethics Bill Promoted By Democrats (WT) 129
Senate Democrats Begin Work On Ethics Law Changes (BLM) 130
Freshman Democrats Back Senate Ethics Bill (CQ) 131
Push For Lobby Database Fades (RC) 131
Bundles Of Influence (WP) 133
Senators Vow Ethics Reform, But Will Deeds Match Words? (USAT) 133
Campaign Photo Shows Bush With Abramoff (AP) 134
Jersey Judge Up For Circuit Court Post (NSL) 134
Tenet Memoir Under Scrutiny (WT) 135
An Instant Raise For Federal Judges (NYT/AP) 136
Senate Restores Pay Raise For Judges (AP) 136
Poll: Americans Want Democrats, Not Bush, At Helm (USAT) . 136
Donnelly, Freshman Democrats Tell Pelosi To Stick To The Center (BLOOM) 137
Industry Measures Up Dems, Picks Its Battles (HILL) 138
Military Seeks Oil Savings (WSJ) 139
White House Honors Cultural Institutions (AP) 140
Inside The Beltway (WT) 141
The Reliable Source (WP) 142
PIN Money (WSJ) 143
Common Sense On The Census (NYT) 144

Other News:

Health-care Spending Rose At Twice The Rate Of Inflation In '05 (USAT) 145
Healthcare Spending Eases Off (LAT) 145
Health Care Spending Up 6.9 Pct. In '05 (NYT/AP) 146
Growth In U.S. Health-Care Spending Slows Again (WSJ) 147
Sweeping State Health Plan Governor's Proposal: Coverage For All Californians -- Everyone To Share Cost (SFC) 148
Schwarzenegger Proposes Universal Health Coverage (WP) .. 150
Calif. Gov Calls For Universal Coverage (AP) 150
Gov. Seeks Sweeping Health System Reforms (LAT) 151
Schwarzenegger Proposes Health Plan (USAT) 152
Schwarzenegger Embarks On Fight For Health Plan (WSJ) 153
California's Governor Seeks Universal Care (NYT) 154
Gov. Offers Bold Prescription (LAT) 155
A Flawed Cure (LAT) 158
Life At America's Bottom Wage (CSM) 158
Fed's No. 2 Chills Hopes For A Rate Cut (WSJ) 161
Drop In Oil Price And Some More Mergers Lift Shares (NYT/AP) 162
Dow Industrials Gain 25.48 While Oil's Early Rally Fades (WSJ) 162
Reapportionment: Good News For GOP? (RC) 163
In Fla., GOP Hopes For Two Pick-ups Where It Just Suffered Two Losses (HILL) 165
New Districts Cause Headaches For Ga. Reps. (RC) 166
Sununu Has Big Target On His Back (RC) 167
Johnson's Re-election Plans On Hold (RC) 168
Romney Makes It Official And Asks For '08 Cash In A Big Way (NYT) 170
Romney, High-profile Friends Call For Election Cash (WT) 171
Romney Kicks Off Fundraising Campaign (AP) 171
Romney Raises $6.5 Million In One-Day Blitz (WP) 173
Mitt Rakes In Dough, Proves His Political Viability (SLT) 173
Romney Event Nets More Than $6.5m (BOS) 175
Decisions On The Horizon (NYT) 176
Obama's Folly Of Youth Shouldn't Hinder Rise (USAT) 176
Roberta Wohlstetter, Codebreaker (WSJ) 177
Europe, US Squeeze Iran On Nuclear Plans (FT) 178
Iranian Leader Vows To Resist U.N. Sanctions (NYT) 178
Israeli Defense Minister Proposes New Peace Plan (AFP) 179
Fatah Frees Kidnapped Hamas Official (AP) 179
Don't Play With Maps (NYT) 180
Condi Gets Israel's R-E-S-P-E-C-T (WSJ) 181
A Green Line In The Sand (NYT) 182
Bush: Important To Complete Doha Talks (AP) 183
Bush, Barroso Discuss Trade, Darfur (AFP) 184
Some Progress In Global Trade Effort (NYT) 185
U.S. Sub And Japanese Vessel Collide (NYT) 186
Chavez To Nationalize 'Strategic' Sectors (WT/AP) 186
Chávez To Nationalise Telecoms, Power (FT) 187
Venezuela's Chavez: Nationalize Electricity, Phones (USAT) .. 188
Chávez Moves To Nationalize Two Industries (NYT) 189
Chavez Sets Plans For Nationalization (WP) 190
Chávez Moves New Socialism To Faster Track (WSJ) 191
Bolivia Leader Lets Venezuela Send Soldiers, Angering Foes (NYT) 193
Bush Discusses Cooperation With Nicaragua's Ortega (AFP) .. 194
Russia Shuts Oil Pipeline To Europe (FT) 194
Russian Oil Cutoff Rouses Europe's Doubt (WSJ) 195
Belarus And Russia Spar Over Crude Oil Cutoff (NYT) 197
Belarus Cuts Off Russian Oil To Europe (CSM) 198
Moscow Stops Oil Exports To Belarus (WT) 199
Oil Line To Europe Is Cut Off (LAT) 200
Russia Halts Oil Flow To Belarus In Dispute (WP) 201
Moscow-Minsk Dispute Leaves Europe In A Quandary (FT) 202
Russian Extortion, Continued (WP) 203
The Face Of El Salvador's Charm Offensive (WP) 204
South Africans See Hope Of Unity In A Prospect For Presidency (WP) 205
U.S. To Drop Charges In '99 Uganda Killings (WT) 206
The Troubles Of Sista P. (NYT) 207

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0114285

TERRORISM NEWS:

Padilla Wants Statements Made In Navy Brig Suppressed (AP)

By Jennifer Kay

AP, January 9, 2007

MIAMI - Attorneys for alleged al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla asked a federal judge Monday to keep statements he made during his detention in a Navy brig out of evidence in the U.S. government's terror support case against him.

Padilla has claimed he was tortured during 3 1/2 years in military custody as an "enemy combatant" - allegations the Justice Department and Pentagon officials have repeatedly denied.

The former Chicago gang member's prolonged confinement and abuse from interrogators renders any statements he made during his time in the brig involuntary, according to a motion filed in U.S. District Court.

"The action of the government agents in this case constitute police coercion and overreaching at its highest. Consequently, the government has forfeited the right to use these statements for any purpose at Mr. Padilla's trial," the motion states.

A spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office declined comment Monday. Messages left for Padilla's federal public defenders were not immediately returned.

Federal prosecutors, meanwhile, asked the court Monday to reconsider its deadline for completing mental examinations to determine if Padilla is competent to stand trial.

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke last week gave prisons officials until Friday to complete the examinations, which she insisted be finished before his scheduled Jan. 22 trial date so she can rule on a number of other outstanding issues, including Padilla's claim that the case should be dismissed because he was tortured in military custody.

Two mental experts hired by the defense have concluded that Padilla suffers from post-traumatic stress disorder and is unable to adequately assist his attorneys. The competency tests were originally supposed to be completed by Jan. 5.

Bureau of Prisons officials want until Jan. 30 to finish the tests, and until Feb. 15 to submit their report. They have said in court papers that Padilla is not "compliant with psychological testing" and must be observed by staff members to complete the evaluation.

"The deadlines set by the court may negatively affect the examination process and may prejudice the government's ability to demonstrate the fallacy of Padilla's competency allegations as well as the court's ability to make adequate findings, subject to appellate review, regarding this issue," the prosecutors' motion reads.

Padilla, a 36-year-old U.S. citizen, is charged along with two others in the U.S. with being part of a support cell that provided money, recruits and supplies to violent Islamic extremists around the world. All three have pleaded not guilty. Two others charged in the case are in custody overseas.

Padilla was arrested in 2002 at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport for what U.S. officials originally called a plot to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in the United States. President Bush designated him an "enemy combatant" and he was held without criminal charge at a Navy brig in South Carolina until he was added to the Miami terror support case in late 2005.

The "dirty bomb" allegations are not mentioned in the Miami indictment.

Aside from the competency issue, the Jan. 22 trial date is in jeopardy because federal prosecutors have appealed Cooke's dismissal of a key terrorism count in the case. The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals is scheduled to hear oral arguments on that issue Wednesday in Atlanta; Cooke has said the trial will not proceed until that question is settled.

The dismissed count carries a potential life prison sentence, while the two remaining terror support counts carry possible 15-year sentences each. Cooke ruled that the dismissed count improperly duplicated other parts of the same indictment.

Man Gets 30 Years In Subway Bomb Plot (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

A federal judge sentenced a 24-year-old Pakistani immigrant yesterday to 30 years in prison for plotting to bomb the Herald Square subway station in 2004, moments after the defendant apologized to the judge and prosecutors but blamed a police informer for his fate.

The immigrant, Shahawar Matin Siraj, who has been held without bail since he and another man were arrested on Aug. 27, 2004, three days before the Republican National Convention, stood with his shoulders slumped as the judge, Nina Gershon of United States District Court in Brooklyn, meted out his sentence.

DOJ_NMG_0114286

Dressed in a blue short-sleeved prison smock with a white long-underwear shirt beneath it, Mr. Siraj offered a brief, disjointed apology before the judge pronounced sentence. He paused briefly to take two long sips of water when his voice began to break.

He cited statements he had made about his plan to blow up the subway and his anger at America, statements that were secretly recorded by a Police Department informer who defense lawyers argued lured him into the plot. The tapes were played at the trial.

"Your honor I want to apologize about whatever I said in the tapes — I wish I could take those words back but it already happened, I already said those things," he said. "I'm taking responsibility for 34th Street, but I was manipulated by this person."

But the jury in the case, which deliberated 10 hours over two days, rejected his entrapment defense. It had centered on the paid informer, who defense lawyers said had stoked Mr. Siraj's rage with images of Muslims abused at the hands of Americans, including photographs of soldiers abusing inmates at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq. Mr. Siraj was convicted on May 24 on four counts of conspiracy, including the most serious, plotting to bomb a public transportation system.

Judge Gershon, when she handed down the sentence, noted that while some of the recordings captured Mr. Siraj saying the attack should occur at the time the station was the least busy, it would nonetheless have been deadly and devastating.

"The crimes committed here were extremely serious," she said. "They had the potential, if not thwarted, to wreak havoc with the New York City transportation system, indeed, the tristate-area transportation system."

She added that such an attack would have meant enormous economic losses, disruption and loss of life.

The men never obtained explosives, there was no timetable for an attack, and the men were not linked to any known terrorist group.

Indeed, the informer, Osama Eldawoody, 50, told Mr. Siraj and the other man who was arrested, James Elshafay, that he worked for a fictitious group called the Brotherhood and said he would be able to provide the explosives for the plot. Mr. Elshafay began cooperating with prosecutors shortly after his arrest and also testified against Mr. Siraj.

Under federal sentencing guidelines, Mr. Siraj, who came to the United States from Pakistan with his parents in 1999, faced 30 years to life in prison. He had turned down a plea deal offered by prosecutors under which he would have been sentenced to 10 years in prison.

The hours of tapes played at trial revealed an angry man who raged against America, praised Osama bin Laden and predicted additional terror attacks in the United States, all while discussing his bomb plot.

Yesterday, the courtroom was crowded, largely with news reporters and law enforcement officials. Mr. Siraj's parents, appearing stunned when the sentence was dispensed, were also in the courtroom, and his uncle sat in the last row. His mother, Shahina Parveen, dressed in a patterned light blue tunic and pants, and a white head scarf, clutched a string of pale green prayer beads that she had carried during the trial.

After the proceeding, she began to cry as she sat on a bench outside the courtroom and talked to one of her son's lawyers, Khurrum B. Wahid, slipping a tissue behind her glasses. Later, she spoke briefly to reporters, maintaining her son's innocence and saying he would appeal.

"The N.Y.P.D., through a paid informant, tricked my son and got him stuck in this," Ms. Parveen said, as Mr. Wahid translated from the Urdu. "He didn't do anything. I didn't get any justice. It was not a fair sentence."

But the Police Department, which investigated the case, the first in which a terrorism inquiry by its Intelligence Division led to a prosecution in federal court, hailed the sentence, calling it "a milestone in the safeguarding of New York City."

"It says that those who conspire against New York will pay a severe price," Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly said in a statement, praising the Intelligence Division, saying it "uncovered a murderous plot in its infancy and stopped it before lives were lost."

After the sentencing, Mr. Siraj's lead lawyer, Martin J. Stolar, called the prison term "outrageous."

"The New York City Police Department was able to create a crime in order to solve it, and claim a victory in the war on terror, and that's what he was sentenced as, rather than a dimwit who was manipulated" by an informer, he said.

But the prosecutors in the case, Todd Harrison and Marshall L. Miller, argued that Mr. Siraj was in control.

"He knew exactly what was going on and was the initiator of all the steps," Mr. Harrison said. He added that Mr. Siraj had come up with the plan, conducted surveillance of the station on his own and directed how the bombers should dress, where the bomb should be placed and what their escape route should be.

Pakistani Sentenced To 30 Years For New York Subway Bomb Plot (AFP)

AFP, January 9, 2007

A Pakistani man was sentenced to 30 years in jail for his part in a plot to blow up a New York subway station just ahead of a major Republican Party congress being held nearby in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0114287

Shahawar Matin Siraj, 24, was convicted in May last year of conspiring to plant explosives at the 34th Street subway station near Madison Square Garden, ahead of the Republican National Convention there.

"Thanks to the extraordinary work of law enforcement, the defendants' plot did not advance beyond the planning stage, and the public was never at risk," prosecutor Roslynn Mauskopf said after the sentence was handed down.

"We remain steadfast in our commitment to stop would-be terrorists before they act, and will apply all available resources to secure the safety of our residents," she said.

Another man, James Elshafay, pleaded guilty in October 2004 to participating in the plot and later testified against Siraj. He has yet to be sentenced.

The federal jury in Siraj's five-week trial heard hours of secretly recorded conversations between him and an Egyptian nuclear engineer who became a paid informant for the New York City Police Department, the Justice Department said.

In the calls, Siraj declared his hatred for the United States and openly discussed his desire to place explosives on various bridges and in subway stations in New York, including his plan to bomb the 34th Street station, the department said.

Siraj and Elshafay scoped out the subway station on August 21, 2004, and later drew diagrams as part of their plot, it said. They were arrested six days later, even though they were not in possession of any explosive material.

Would-be NY Subway Bomber Gets 30 Years (BOS/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

The Boston Globe, January 9, 2007

NEW YORK --A Pakistani immigrant was sentenced to 30 years in prison Monday for hatching an unsuccessful plot to blow up a busy Manhattan subway station as revenge for wartime abuses of Iraqis.

Shahawar Matin Siraj, 24, was arrested on the eve of the 2004 Republican National Convention. Though there was no proof he ever obtained explosives or was linked to any terror organizations, prosecutors said his intentions were ominous: He wanted to blow up the Herald Square subway station, a bustling transportation hub located beneath Macy's flagship department store.

Siraj showed no reaction as the sentence was read. He faces deportation when his prison term is completed.

Defense attorneys had sought to convince U.S. District Judge Nina Gershon that Siraj's sentence should not exceed 10 years, arguing in recent court filings that their client was "not a dangerous psychopath but more of a confused and misguided youngster."

Siraj claimed he was entrapped by a paid police informant who inflamed him by showing him photos of inmates being abused at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq and then secretly recorded his escalating threats -- called "trash talk" by his lawyer -- against the United States.

"I apologize for all the stuff I said on those tapes," Siraj said before sentencing. "I'm taking responsibility for 34th Street, but I was manipulated by this person."

Prosecutors countered that Siraj deserved at least 30 years behind bars as the "driving force" behind a "workable terrorist plot."

Siraj was convicted of conspiracy last year based partly on the testimony of a police informant, Osama Eldawoody, who was recruited to monitor radical Muslims at mosques and elsewhere following the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Inside an Islamic bookstore near a Brooklyn mosque, Eldawoody wore a wire and chatted up an employee who lived with his parents in Queens -- Siraj. When the topic turned to the war in Iraq, Siraj ranted about rumors among radicals that U.S. soldiers were sexually abusing Iraqi girls.

"That was enough for me," he said in one of series of secretly recorded conversations played for the jury. "I'm ready to do anything. I don't care about my life."

Eldawoody, assuming the role of a co-conspirator, assured Siraj that any plan he concocted would have the backing of a fictitious faction called The Brotherhood. Siraj considered other options to harm the U.S. economy, including destroying several New York area bridges or killing Microsoft founder Bill Gates.

Testifying in his own defense, Siraj admitted taking preliminary steps to attack the subway station, including scouting locations to place a bomb, but only at Eldawoody's prompting. He also claimed he never had a violent thought before he fell under the spell of the 50-year-old Eldawoody.

Siraj said the older man became a mentor and instructed him that there was a fatwa, or religious edict, permitting the killing of U.S. soldiers and law enforcement agents.

Outside court Monday, Siraj's mother, Shahina Parveen, said the informant "tricked my son and got him stuck in this."

"My son is innocent," she said. "He didn't do anything."

DOJ_NMG_0114288

In a statement, police Commissioner Raymond Kelly called the outcome a "milestone" in safeguarding the city. He said, "Our detectives uncovered a murderous plot in its infancy and stopped it before lives were lost."

30 Years For Bomb Plotter Is A Milestone, Kelly Says (NYS)

By Joseph Goldstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, January 9, 2007

The clerk at an Islamic bookstore who plotted to put a bomb in the Herald Square subway station will spend the next 30 years in prison, a federal judge decided yesterday. Police Commissioner Kelly, whose department led the investigation that resulted in the arrest of Shahawar Matin Siraj, lauded the sentence.

"The Siraj sentence is a milestone in the safeguarding of New York City," Mr. Kelly said in a statement sent via email. "It says that those who conspire against New York will pay a severe price."

Lawyers for Siraj, 24, had asked for a sentence as short as five years. When the judge, Nina Gershon of U.S. District Court in Brooklyn, said she was instead considering imposing a sentence of between 30 years and life, Siraj jerked his head in surprise toward two of his lawyers. Later, when he was led away by deputy marshals, Siraj raised a hand in greeting to his mother and father, who stood in the back of the courtroom. Siraj offered no other reaction to the sentence.

Federal prosecutors from the U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn had based their request for a strict sentence not only on the bomb plot for which Siraj was convicted, but also because they said they believed Siraj would resume plotting if released.

Prosecutors arrived at this assessment from a recorded statement Siraj made to a police informant that was introduced as evidence at trial, according to a letter to the court from assistant U.S. attorneys Todd Harrison and Marshall Miller.

Subway Bomb Plotter Sentenced To 30 Years (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 9, 2007

A Pakistani immigrant convicted of plotting to bomb the 34th Street subway station at Herald Square was sentenced to 30 years in prison yesterday by a federal judge who called the crime an "extremely serious" attempt to wreak havoc on the city's economy.

Rejecting defense arguments that Shahawar Matin Siraj, 24, was nothing more than a dupe of a police undercover operative, Brooklyn federal Judge Nina Gershon said the defendant played a central role in the bombing conspiracy.

Gershon, who presided over last year's trial of Siraj, said the evidence showed that he intended the planned bombing to lead to severe economic disruption in the city and surrounding metropolitan area, and to result in loss of life.

"The defendant's role in the bombing plot was central," said Gershon, adding that there was ample evidence that Siraj lied during a pretrial hearing and also during his trial, in an effort to deceive the jury.

Siraj was convicted in May of the bombing conspiracy and faced a possible life term. Investigators said he aimed to set off the bomb around the time of the August 2004 Republican National Convention in Manhattan.

Evidence showed that Siraj came up with ideas about setting off bombs on Staten Island and on the Verrazano-Narrows Bridge. Prosecutors introduced evidence that Siraj, who had failed to win asylum in the United States, had made statements supporting jihad and Osama bin Laden when he talked with a New York Police Department undercover detective.

In a statement, Police Commissioner Ray Kelly said detectives uncovered the plot in its infancy and moved with federal prosecutors to stop it. He praised the sentence as a "milestone in the safeguarding of New York City.

"It says those who conspire against New York will pay a severe price," he said.

But Siraj's attorney Martin Stolar blasted the sentence.

"I think it is pretty outrageous that they are sentencing him as a terrorist," Stolar said. "The NYPD created a crime to claim a victory in the war on terror."

Stolar had argued before sentencing that Siraj was of subpar intelligence and was easily manipulated by informants and the detective. He later told reporters Siraj was sentenced as a hardened terrorist "rather than a 24-year-old dimwit."

Siraj gave a brief statement of apology to Gershon and said he wished he could take back the anti-American statements that were caught on surveillance tapes. Admitting he was part of the plot to bomb the subway station, Siraj nonetheless insisted he was manipulated by the undercover detective.

Siraj's mother gave a tearful statement outside the courtroom to reporters. Speaking through an interpreter, Shahina Pareeven said her son was innocent and was ensnared into the plot by the NYPD.

"My son is not a terrorist," Pareeven said. "He didn't do anything. I didn't get justice."

Herald Square Bomb Plotter Gets 30 Yrs. (NYDN)

DOJ_NMG_0114289

By John Marzulli, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, January 9, 2007

Insisting to the end that he was unfairly duped by an NYPD informer, a Queens man was slammed with a 30-year jail sentence yesterday for plotting to bomb the Herald Square subway station.

"I told [the informer], 'I don't want to do it,'" Shahawar Matin Siraj, 24, whimpered in a last-minute plea for mercy to Brooklyn Federal Judge Nina Gershon. "I told him I wanted to ask my mother's permission."

Siraj, 24, had admitted planning to slaughter commuters and wreak havoc on the city's economy because he was angered by the U.S. government's treatment of Muslims in Iraq.

"I take responsibility for 34th St., but I was manipulated by this person," Siraj said. "I wish I could take those words back."

Despite Siraj's apology for the hatred he spewed on hours of secretly recorded tapes in which he also discussed destroying city bridges and attacking cops, Gershon said the sentence must be sufficient to punish Siraj and deter other would-be terrorists.

The Pakistani immigrant, who never obtained explosives, could have gotten life in prison.

Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly credited his revamped Intelligence Division with thwarting the scheme before anyone was hurt and hailed the verdict as a "milestone in the safeguarding of New York City."

"It says those who conspire against New York will pay a heavy price," Kelly said.

But defense lawyer Martin Stolar said Siraj was a dimwit who was manipulated by a crafty paid informer trying to impress his police handlers. Siraj was arrested just before the Republican National Convention opened in New York in 2004.

"The NYPD was able to create a crime in order to solve it and claim a victory in the war on terrorism," Stolar said.

Siraj's mother, clutching green prayer beads, wept in the courthouse hallway.

"My son is innocent. It was not a fair sentence," Shahina Parveen said.

Prosecutors: Suburban Man Bankrolled Terrorists (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush

Chicago Tribune, January 9, 2007

Muhammad Salah distributed hundreds of thousands of dollars to militant operatives in Gaza and the West Bank while coordinating violent plots as a leading member of the Palestinian group Hamas, federal prosecutors argued Monday.

For nearly seven hours, Assistant U.S. Atty. Joseph Ferguson chronicled the case against Salah, a Bridgeview businessman accused of serving as a top Hamas commander, and Abdelhaleem Ashqar, a university professor from suburban Washington, D.C.

Ferguson's closing argument was aimed largely at undermining defense claims that Israeli authorities tortured Salah into falsely admitting he was a Hamas operative in 1993.

He reminded jurors that they had witnessed an unprecedented event, the testimony of two Israeli security agents in a U.S. courtroom.

Jurors could judge for themselves whether the interrogators, who appeared under the aliases "Nadav" and "Benny," testified truthfully that Salah was well-treated, Ferguson said.

He also pointed to evidence he said corroborated Salah's confession, including information Salah allegedly provided about the hidden burial site of a murdered Israeli soldier and a series of money transfers between him and Hamas leader Mousa Abu Marzook.

"There's only one conclusion to draw from that," Ferguson said of information Salah provided about the dead soldier's body. "Muhammad Salah is Hamas. He is the Hamas military. He's part of the inner-sanctum of trusted individuals."

The soldier Ferguson referred to, Ilan Sa'doan, was kidnapped and murdered by Hamas in 1989. His body was buried in an undisclosed location.

Salah was arrested by Israeli authorities in Gaza in January 1993 on suspicion of transferring hundreds of thousands of dollars for the Hamas military wing.

Ferguson argued that Marzook had provided Salah with information about Sa'doan's body, which Salah tried to use as a bargaining chip with his interrogators.

"This was about control," Ferguson said.

Far from being a tortured detainee willing to tell his interrogators anything they wanted to hear, Salah was playing cat and mouse with his captors, the prosecutor said.

Israeli authorities did launch a search for Sa'doan's body in 1993 based on Salah's information, the prosecutor said.

The body was not found, however, until 1996 in a location 3 miles north of the site Salah allegedly described.

Ferguson argued Salah's information was all but "dead on" about the site.

"They were one juncture off. He got the wrong exit [off the highway]," Ferguson said.

Throughout the day, Ferguson outlined a money trail he said further corroborated Salah's guilt.

He was captured in Israel with $100,000 in cash. Bank records show Marzook had transferred him nearly $1 million, the prosecutor said.

Before he was captured, he had put some $240,000 in the hands of militant operatives, Ferguson argued.

Salah's lawyers have argued that he never provided money for violence but carried money to Gaza and the West Bank to provide charitable services to Palestinians suffering under a stifling and oppressive Israeli occupation.

Salah, an American citizen, was set up by Israeli authorities to help convince the U.S. government that Hamas was actively creating cells in this country, his lawyers have argued.

Ferguson referred regularly Monday to a series of confessions Salah gave Israeli interrogators as well as to a handwritten statement he provided to fellow prisoners he allegedly believed were fellow Hamas members.

The statement to the fellow prisoners, known as "the Birds," is perhaps the most damning piece of evidence against Salah and something his attorneys have argued was manufactured out of whole cloth by abusive interrogators and Palestinian collaborators.

Ferguson sought to show that the statement was a voluntary attempt to communicate with other Hamas members.

When an Israeli interrogator confronted Salah with it in March 1993, Salah was recorded asking his captors how they got the statement.

"That tells you he gave it to somebody he thought was Hamas," Ferguson said.

Ferguson is expected to continue his argument Tuesday morning. Salah's attorney, Michael Deutsch, is expected to respond in the afternoon.

U.S. Prosecutors Wrap Up Case Against Alleged Hamas Financiers (FINDLAW/AP)

By Mike Robinson, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 9, 2007

(AP) - CHICAGO-Federal prosecutors wrapped up their case against two men accused of aiding the militant Palestinian group Hamas, saying the men furnished funds and fresh recruits to spread "death, destruction, fear and terror."

Former Chicago grocer Muhammad Salah and co-defendant Abdelhaleem Ashqar were "important players" with the Hamas terrorist network, Assistant U.S. Attorney Joseph M. Ferguson told a federal court jury in closing arguments capping a three-month trial that included testimony by torture experts and Israeli agents adopting assumed identities.

"The Hamas organization engaged in a purposeful and strategic campaign to spread death, destruction, fear and terror in pursuit of its overall objective to remove the State of Israel from the map," Ferguson said.

Salah, 53, and Ashqar, 48, a former assistant professor of business at Washington's Howard University, are charged with a racketeering scheme that provided money and men to the Hamas organization in the early 1990s.

Both men deny that they are Hamas members and say that nothing they did violated the law, even though they hold strong anti-Israel views.

The first two prosecution witnesses were Israeli Shin Bet agents who interrogated Salah after his January 1993 arrested in Israel, where he served about five years in prison.

The agents testified under aliases in a courtroom cleared of spectators to protect them against possible reprisals by Hamas. Reporters were allowed to hear their testimony on closed-circuit TV in another room.

Both men denied Salah ever was tortured. Salah did not take the stand, but his attorneys say he was put in a freezing cell with no blanket, forced to wear a foul-smelling hood and otherwise mistreated for weeks.

Defense attorneys have not yet delivered their closing arguments.

Ferguson warned jurors not to allow themselves to be diverted from their main task by being caught up in the Israeli-Palestinian debate and the nuances of Mideast politics.

"People have been in conflict over that little plot of land for hundreds and thousands of years," Ferguson said. He said the issue was that the two men have violated American laws against financing murder, kidnappings and terror.

Ferguson said Mousa Abu Marzouk, the deputy head of Hamas' political bureau who is in , furnished Salah with "cold hard cash" to deliver to Hamas forces in Israel. Abu Marzouk is in exile in Syria.

Who Is The Mysterious Informant Jack Mustafa? (SOUTHNH)

By Ray Hanania

Southwest (Chicago) News-Herald, January 9, 2007

I've tried everything to reach the man they call "Jack Mustafa," aka "Jawad al-Arouri," but have failed.

DOJ_NMG_0114291

Mustafa is the informant the U.S. Justice Department used to build a "terrorism" case against Mohammed Salah and co-defendant Abdelhaleem Ashqar.

Months after the Iraq invasion, U.S. Attorney John Ashcroft alleged Salah provided "material support" to terrorists.

The nation sighed. President Bush needed to point to someone having failed to capture the real terrorist, Osama Bin Laden. Salah was a far better "terrorist" than Jose Padilla, the high school dropout we're told who knew enough to build a "dirty bomb."

Salah's arrest was based on two things: He pled guilty in an Israeli court to being associated with Hamas, which the U.S. declared was a terrorist group long after Salah had left the group. If Salah was really a threat, why did the Israelis release him after only fives years in prison?

Ironically, a deal was about to be signed letting Salah off the hook when Sept. 11 happened. Our failed "war on terrorism" needed a trophy to hold high, and Salah was the best they could come up with.

The second more important evidence Ashcroft relied upon was the "testimony" of Jack Mustafa, who was paid as much as $6,000 a month.

By the time they got to trial three years later, Salah's defense attorneys asked to see all information on the mysterious Mustafa.

In response to that simple request, the Justice Department dropped their "material support" for terrorism charge.

As it turns out Mustafa probably made up all the evidence turned over to the FBI. Why not? At a reported $6,000 a month, you could probably get evidence to arrest half the customers at Wal-Mart.

That left two remaining "charges," the broader "racketeering conspiracy" charged used to nail people who don't commit crimes but are members of criminal organizations, like the Mafia. And, the last charge, "making false statements" to the government, maybe something that government might consider against Mustafa?

One must wonder why the government continues with this case.

Hamas is involved in terrorist activities in Israel. But that's not surprising since any idiot knows Palestinians and Israelis don't get along and have been warring with each other since 1948.

I know what Salah is going through.

In 1975, after I completed two years active duty in the Air Force during the Vietnam War, the FBI investigated me.

They spent thousands of dollars interviewing neighbors and "informants" like Mustafa. They produced a revealing 45-page report that began claiming I was "suspected" of terrorist involvement. The report failed to mention my father and uncle served during World War II, or that I served 10 more years in the Illinois Air National Guard, while the probe was being conducted.

They hassled so many people, I lost friends faster than disgraced Florida Congressman Mark Foley.

After all the talk, the BS and lies, two years of investigations, thousands of wasted taxpayer dollars, and 45 useless pages, the "Hanania investigation" concluded I just wanted to help my community become more involved in America.

You just hope somewhere, someone has enough common sense to stop wasting taxpayer dollars and valuable time so our country can focus on "real" terrorist threats.

Now that the case is about to go to the jury, I'm hoping Salah's judge, U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve, might just be that kind of person.

(Ray Hanania writes about everything under the sun. You can reach him at rayhanania@aol.com.) Visit www.tvchicagoland.com to view Hanania's interviews with local Chicagoland politicians and community leaders.

Supreme Court Refuses Case Challenging Group's Designation As Terrorists (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — The Supreme Court refused on Monday to intervene in the federal prosecution of seven Iranian refugees for providing financial support to an opposition group in Iran that the State Department has designated as a terrorist organization.

The seven defendants, who are now all United States citizens, argue that they are constitutionally entitled to challenge the validity of that designation as part of their defense. The law under which they were charged, enacted in 1996, gives limited appeal rights to a group that is officially labeled a terrorist organization, but specifically precludes individual defendants, charged with supporting such an organization, from challenging the designation at their trial.

Under the statute, providing financial or other material support to a foreign terrorist organization is a crime that carries a prison sentence of up to 10 years. The seven defendants were indicted in Los Angeles in March 2001 for soliciting money for an organization usually known as the People's Mojahedin of Iran, which the State Department designated as a foreign terrorist organization in 1997.

DOJ_NMG_0114292

That designation has been heatedly disputed, both in federal court and in Congress. After a ruling by the federal appeals court here in 1999 found the designation improper, the State Department reissued it and was permitted by the appeals court to make the new designation retroactive to 1997, which is when the defendants began their fund-raising activities.

A brief submitted to the Supreme Court on the defendants' behalf by a group of members of Congress described the People's Mojahedin as "a legitimate political opposition group that Americans should be able to freely and openly support."

The brief, filed on behalf of the Iran Human Rights and Democracy Caucus of the House of Representatives, described the organization as "the primary opposition group in Iran" and as "a legitimate political resistance movement that seeks a transition from the current theocratic regime to a secular democracy."

Noting that President Bush has described the current government in Iran as part of the "axis of evil," the brief said the People's Mojahedin was not the type of organization Congress had in mind when it gave the executive branch broad authority to designate foreign terrorist organizations and to bar all types of contributions to them.

The justices on Monday made no comment in turning down the case, Rahmani v. United States, No. 06-241. The prosecution has received relatively little publicity as it has made a slow way through the federal courts. But a trial, if one finally takes place, could shine a spotlight on the sweeping authority that Congress handed the secretary of state in the 1996 statute, the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act.

Originally, a terrorist designation was to last for two years, renewable at the discretion of the secretary of state. A 2004 law, the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act, gave the secretary added power by making an initial designation permanent. In another change, the USA Patriot Act increased the maximum sentence to 15 years from 10.

The defendants in the case before the court on Monday were originally successful in persuading the Federal District Court in Los Angeles to dismiss their indictment. But a three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, after considering the case for more than two years, reinstated the indictment in October 2005.

The appeals court said that while "no doubt Congress was well aware that some might claim that 'one man's terrorist is another man's freedom fighter,' " Congress nonetheless chose to give the president and the State Department the authority to designate a group as a terrorist organization "and to keep such policymaking authority out of the hands of United States attorneys and juries."

Consequently, the court said, "it does not matter whether the designation is correct or not." The crime occurs, it explained, when someone gives support to such an organization, whether or not properly designated as a terrorist group.

An 11-judge panel of the appeals court then considered whether to rehear the case and split 6 to 5 in deciding to let the original decision stand. Judge Alex Kozinski, writing for the five dissenters, said the case "perfectly illustrates the patent unconstitutionality of the terrorist organization designation process." Judge Kozinski added that Roya Rahmani, the lead defendant, "is being prosecuted — and will surely be sent to prison for up to 10 years — for giving money to an organization that no one other than some obscure mandarin in the bowels of the State Department had determined to be a terrorist organization."

In their appeal to the Supreme Court, the defendants argued that the "sweeping implications" of the appeals court's decision would permit the government "to criminalize activities that would otherwise be First Amendment-protected" and to bar judicial review of its determination.

Urging the justices not to hear the case, the government said the issue was not one of free speech but rather of the "broad authority" that the court has long recognized for the regulation of "financial interactions between United States nationals and foreign entities."

In another case on Monday, the justices turned down an airline passenger's challenge to the airport screening policy adopted in an unpublished directive by the Transportation Security Agency.

The passenger, John Gilmore, was not permitted to board domestic flights from San Francisco and Oakland, Calif., because he refused to show identification. He argued that a secret directive actually gave passengers the choice of submitting to an intensive screening as an alternative to providing identification. The government lacked a basis for refusing to make the full policy public, he argued.

Responding to Mr. Gilmore's lawsuit, the government did not concede that it had such a policy. Nonetheless, the Ninth Circuit granted the government's request to dismiss the case, holding that whatever identification policy existed did not violate any constitutional rights, including the right to travel and the right against unreasonable search and seizure. The case was Gilmore v. Gonzales, No. 06-211.

High Court Won't Block Terror Trial (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114293

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court refused Monday to block the trial of seven Los Angeles residents charged with raising money for an Iranian opposition group that was designated a "foreign terrorist organization" by the U.S. government.

Lawyers for the seven had argued the charges were unconstitutional because they had a free-speech right to raise money for a political group. That claim was rejected by the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, which noted the Iranian opposition group — Mujahedin Khalq, also known as the MEK — had a record of supporting assassinations and bombings.

"Sometimes money serves as a proxy for speech, and sometimes it buys goods and services that are not speech. Guns and bombs are not speech," said Judge Andrew J. Kleinfeld for the appeals court.

In their appeal, the lawyers said the accused deserved the right to challenge the group's designation as a "foreign terrorist organization" as part of their defense.

Although the justices turned down the appeal without comment, they could take up the issue later if the seven are convicted of the charges.

"We are very disappointed the court decided not to hear this case. We believe the decision poses a threat to the civil liberties of any person who wants to contribute to a political organization in this country," said Stacey M. Leyton, a lawyer in San Francisco.

She said the law was written so broadly that organizations such as Greenpeace or the African National Congress in South Africa could be deemed foreign terrorist organizations. And once the group is on the government's list, "the individual doesn't have a right to challenge it," she said.

In the Antiterrorism Act of 1996, Congress gave the secretary of State the authority to designate foreign groups that "engage in terrorist activity" that threatens the security of Americans. Once a group makes this list, it is a crime for anyone to "knowingly" provide "material support" to it.

The MEK was founded as an Iranian Marxist group in the 1960s with a mission of overthrowing Mohammed Reza Shah Pahlavi and establishing a Marxist regime. But after the shah's fall in 1979, the new Iranian regime was dominated not by Marxists but by Muslim clerics.

Later, the MEK participated in terrorist activities that targeted Americans, the government said. In a federal court in Washington, the group also admitted it supported assassinations of Iranian officials and mortar attacks on Iranian facilities.

The group first made the list of "foreign terrorist organizations" in 1997. Over the next four years, the seven defendants were charged with soliciting contributions at Los Angeles International Airport and wiring at least several hundred thousand dollars to an MEK bank account in Turkey.

Court Turns Down Iran Opposition Group (WP/AP)

The Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Supporters of an Iranian opposition group lost a Supreme Court appeal Monday that was intended to let them challenge the United States' designation of the group as a foreign terrorist organization.

Justices declined to review the case of seven people who were indicted in 2001 on charges they raised money for the People's Mujahedeen, also known as the MEK. The State Department first said in 1997 that the group engaged in terrorist activities.

In 2002, 150 members of Congress called on the State Department to withdraw the designation.

The seven people have sought to dismiss the charges against them by demonstrating that the Iranian group has no terrorism ties. The 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals said the indictment could proceed.

They were accused of soliciting money from travelers at Los Angeles International Airport. The indictment, in March 2001, followed a three-year FBI investigation.

The People's Mujahedeen participated in the 1979 ouster of the former shah of Iran, Mohammad Reza Pahlavi. But it fell out with the clerical government and launched a campaign of assassinations and bombings. For years it fought Iran's Islamic rulers from Iraq with the backing of Saddam Hussein's regime.

During the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, the U.S. military briefly bombed MEK camps until the group capitulated and agreed to disarm.

The case is Rahmani, etal., v. U.S., 06-241.

Outgoing Detroit Chief Defends FBI (DEN)

By Paul Egan

Detroit News, January 9, 2007

Roberts supports using economic charges in terror fight

The outgoing top man at the Detroit FBI defended the agency from criticism Monday that it is purporting to fight terrorism by charging defendants with fraud and other economic crimes.

Daniel Roberts, the special agent in charge of Detroit who is leaving to become deputy director of the FBI's criminal division in Washington, said it's important to use the charges that are most likely to get convictions when targeting suspected supporters of terrorism.

Roberts made his comments Monday as he packed up his office, preparing to start his new job next week. Roberts' successor, Andrew Arena, starts in March.

In the case of Detroit-area restaurateur Talal Chahine and others, critics have pointed out the government has alleged, but not charged, links to terrorism that are virtually impossible to defend.

"Chahine I'd love to see come back, if he had the guts to do it," Roberts said.

Chahine, the owner of the La Shish restaurant chain, is charged with tax evasion. He is a fugitive, having flown to Lebanon after his offices were searched but before he was indicted last May. The government says Chahine owes about $20 million in taxes, interest and penalties and used money skimmed from his restaurants to support Hezbollah.

Chahine has denied supporting terrorism.

Dearborn Heights lawyer Nabih Ayad said Detroit's Muslim and Arab community feels unfairly targeted. The FBI would uncover economic crimes in any ethnic community put under scrutiny, he said.

"If you're saying that you're fighting terrorism, how come we have so many individuals charged with mortgage fraud, insurance fraud, so many matters that are not terrorism related?" he said.

Roberts, 46, who headed the Detroit FBI office since July 2004, conceded that authorities in Detroit have brought few charges of supporting terrorism. But he said there have been many more terrorism-related cases.

Most involve monetary support for terrorist causes and the use of illegal means to raise that money, he said.

Roberts said he is proud to leave Detroit after a series of major events -- including the Ryder Cup, Major League Baseball's World Series and the National Football League's Super Bowl -- that went off without major incidents.

"Because of my 20 years in the FBI, I've had a chance to be assigned across the country," Roberts said. "The law enforcement community gets along better here than anywhere else I've ever worked."

You can reach Paul Egan at (313) 222-2069 or pegan@detnews.com.

German Court Hands Moroccan Max For 9/11 (AP)

By Simone Utler

AP, January 9, 2007

A Moroccan man convicted of aiding three of the four suicide pilots who committed the Sept. 11 attacks was sentenced Monday to the maximum of 15 years in prison for his role in the terror plot.

A German federal appeals court convicted Mounir el Motassadeq in November of knowingly helping the hijackers and sent the case to a state court in Hamburg for sentencing.

"Anyone who helped in this has earned stiff punishment," presiding Judge Carsten Beckmann said after announcing Monday's verdict. Defense lawyers said they would appeal.

Shortly before the verdict was announced, the 32-year-old defendant exchanged emotionally charged words with an American whose mother died on one of the two planes that crashed into the World Trade Center.

Dominic Puopolo Jr. fought back tears and held up pictures of his mother, Sonia Morales Puopolo, an American Airlines flight attendant, as he joined prosecutors in calling for the maximum penalty. He urged the judges to consider the "human and emotional cost" of the 2001 attacks. The American man is a co-plaintiff in the case under the German court system.

When the court granted El Motassadeq a final chance to speak, the slightly built, bearded man turned to Puopolo to say: "I understand your suffering. ... The same thing is being done to me, my kids, my parents, my family — my future is ruined."

Puopolo said he forgave el Motassadeq, and reminded him that he will one day be freed.

"You have a chance to rebuild your life and be back with your family. Others don't," Puopolo said. "Your life is not over, but my mom's is."

The federal appeals court had ruled that the Hamburg judges wrongly acquitted el Motassadeq in 2005 of direct involvement in the attacks, even though the Hamburg court sentenced him to seven years in prison for belonging to a terrorist group.

The appeals court convicted el Motassadeq as an accessory to the murder of the 246 passengers and crew members aboard the four jetliners used in the attacks, and ordered the state court to set a new sentence.

DOJ_NMG_0114295

El Motassadeq's attorneys said they intended to challenge the sentence before a federal appeals court. They have already appealed the conviction to the Federal Constitutional Court, arguing that the court failed properly to hear evidence from other terror suspects. It is unclear when that court, Germany's highest, will consider the complaint.

Defense lawyer Ladislav Anisic said they might also appeal to the European Court of Justice.

"We have a clear mandate, and that is to ensure that our client receives the acquittal," he said.

El Motassadeq was a close friend of pilots Mohamed Atta, Marwan al-Shehhi and Ziad Jarrah when they lived and studied in Hamburg. He has acknowledged training at an al-Qaida camp in Afghanistan and that he was close to the three hijackers although he insists he knew nothing of their plans.

However, the federal appeals court said evidence showed el Motassadeq knew that the men planned to hijack and crash planes. It found that his actions — for example, transferring money, and helping the hijackers keep up the appearance of being regular university students by paying tuition and rent fees — facilitated the attacks.

The federal court also said it was irrelevant to el Motassadeq's guilt whether he knew of the plot's timing, dimension or targets.

Monday's decision was the latest step in a tangled legal saga that started with el Motassadeq's arrest in November 2001 and featured two full trials.

He was convicted and sentenced to the maximum 15 years in prison in 2003, but that verdict was overturned by a federal court the following year — largely because of a lack of evidence from al-Qaida suspects in U.S. custody.

At a retrial that resulted in the 2005 conviction, the U.S. provided limited summaries from the interrogation of, among others, Ramzi Binalshibh, a suspected liaison between the Hamburg hijackers and al-Qaida.

El Motassadeq has already spent about three years in custody, time that would count against a final sentence.

Asked by reporters outside the court if he felt German laws were too lenient, Puopolo said it was "a little bit frustrating" but praised the work of the prosecutors.

"It's not going to bring my mom back, but it's a part of a process of closure. I'm glad that I came to Hamburg."

Accomplice In 9-11 Attacks Gets 15-year Sentence (MCT)

By Matthew Schofield

McClatchy Newspapers, January 9, 2007

BERLIN - The last remaining member of the Hamburg sleeper cell that planned and carried out the 9-11 terror attacks was sentenced to 15 years in prison in a German courtroom Monday.

"My future is ruined," exclaimed Mounir el Motassadeq, a 32-year-old former engineering student from Morocco, after the verdict.

El Motassadeq received the harshest penalty possible under German law for the crime - accessory to murder for the 246 people who died on the four airliners that crashed on Sept. 11, 2001.

Dominic Puopolo Jr., whose mother was on one of the planes that crashed into the World Trade Center in New York, had asked the court to "consider the human and emotional cost" for the crime and deliver a harsh sentence.

"I understand your suffering," el Motassadeq later said in court, addressing Puopolo. "The same thing is being done to me, my kids, my parents, my family. My future is ruined."

Puopolo responded: "You have a chance to rebuild your life and be back with your family. Others don't. Your life is not over, but my mom's is."

El Motassadeq was first convicted in 2003 of being an accessory to the deaths of all the victims of the Sept. 11 attacks, and he was sentenced to 15 years in prison. But a German federal court ruled on appeal that there wasn't enough evidence to prove that el Motassadeq knew the scope of the attacks.

A sticking point throughout the trials was el Motassadeq's contention that testimony from alleged co-conspirators being held at the Guantanamo Bay prison in Cuba would vindicate him.

The Bush administration was unwilling to allow Ramzi Binalshibh, another suspected facilitator of the attacks, to testify or be deposed by German court officials. As a result, el Motassadeq was convicted for membership in a terrorist organization rather than as an accessory to murder.

Following another appeal and a decision by the German high court, German prosecutors reinstated the accessory to murder charge but narrowed the scope to include only those who died on the four jetliners.

El Motassadeq was a close friend of 9-11 hijackers Mohamed Atta, Marwan al Shehhi and Ziad Jarrah. He had signed wills, taken over power of attorney for the hijackers and wired money for logistical support, including flight training, according to German investigators.

DOJ_NMG_0114296

El Motassadeq remained quiet through the five years of prosecution, until Friday, when he screamed out that he was innocent, and again on Monday, when he claimed that he was little more than a piece in a game.

"There was nothing in Hamburg," he said, spitting out his words. "You're twisting everything to fit the way you want. To you, this is nothing but a game, with winners and losers. But I'm asking you to think about what you've done to me."

Judge Carsten Beckmann, in announcing Monday's verdict, noted that, "Anyone who helped in this has deserved stiff punishment."

9/11 Associate Is Sentenced In Germany To 15 Years (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

FRANKFURT, Jan. 8 — A German court on Monday sentenced a friend of the Sept. 11 hijackers to 15 years in prison for being an accessory in the murders of 246 people aboard the commercial planes used in the terrorist attacks.

The sentencing of the man, a Moroccan named Mounir el-Motassadeq, is a potentially decisive milestone in a complex and politically delicate case that has wended its way through the German courts for five years.

In 2005, the court, in Hamburg, found Mr. Motassadeq, 32, guilty of belonging to a terrorist organization — a lesser crime — and sentenced him to seven years in jail. But last November, an appeals court overturned that ruling, saying he had played a direct role in plotting the hijackings.

“It was a violent crime that was carried out,” the presiding judge of the Hamburg court, Carsten Beckmann, said Monday, explaining the sentence, which was the stiffest possible under the criminal guidelines.

In one way, the 15-year prison term brings the case full circle: after his first trial, in 2003, Mr. Motassadeq was found guilty of 3,066 counts of accessory to murder and sentenced to the same jail term by the Hamburg court. But that verdict was overturned on appeal and he was put on trial a second time.

Mr. Motassadeq, who came to Germany in 1993 to study engineering and fell in with a radical Islamic group in Hamburg that included two of the hijackers, Mohamed Atta and Marwan al-Shehhi, is one of only two people to be convicted in the 9/11 attacks. The other — Zacarias Moussaoui, a French citizen of Moroccan descent — is serving a life sentence in Colorado.

German prosecutors struggled to build a case against Mr. Motassadeq, in part because of what they said was a lack of cooperation from the United States in sharing evidence obtained from other terrorism suspects. On Monday, however, the court handed them a clear victory.

Mr. Motassadeq’s lawyer, Udo Jacob, said he planned to appeal, either to the European Court of Human Rights or by demanding a third trial in Hamburg based on new evidence. He has already filed an appeal with the Federal Constitutional Court, the highest German court.

“This ruling was not a surprise,” he said in an interview. “The court had no choice but to give him a tough punishment.”

Witnesses in the courtroom said Mr. Motassadeq reacted impassively as the judge read the sentence. But earlier, when given a chance to address the court, Mr. Motassadeq turned to the son of one of the victims, Dominic J. Puopolo, and delivered an emotional statement.

“I understand your suffering,” Mr. Motassadeq said, according to The Associated Press. “The same thing is being done to me, my kids, my parents, my family; my future is ruined.”

Mr. Puopolo, a 40-year-old computer consultant from Miami Beach, Fla., whose mother was on one of the planes flown into the World Trade Center, replied that Mr. Motassadeq would be free one day.

“You have a chance to rebuild your life and be back with your family,” said Mr. Puopolo, who represented the victims as co-plaintiffs. “Your life is not over, but my mom’s is.”

In a telephone interview later, Mr. Puopolo said the confrontation caught him off guard. More than that, though, he said the outburst showed Mr. Motassadeq’s desperation in the waning moments of his trial. During most of his court appearances, Mr. Motassadeq, a slight man with a long beard, had projected a tranquil, even occasionally cheerful, demeanor.

“This is the end of the road for him,” Mr. Puopolo said. “It’s real justice for the 9/11 families, and for my family.”

Mr. Motassadeq’s links to the hijackers were never in dispute. He was a friend of Mr. Atta and Mr. Shehhi while they lived in Hamburg, and had wired money to Mr. Shehhi. He also admitted to attending a terrorist training camp in Afghanistan sponsored by Osama bin Laden.

But Mr. Motassadeq denied knowing about the impending attacks and said he had helped the hijackers unwittingly. In 2005, the Hamburg court accepted his contention that he played no direct role.

The appeals court, however, ruled that the evidence showed that Mr. Motassadeq was aware of the plot to hijack and crash commercial airlines, even if he did not know the targets of the attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0114297

Because there was no proof that he knew about the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, he was charged in his second trial with accessory to murder in the deaths of those on the planes, rather than in the deaths of everyone killed.

Mr. Jacob says he can present new evidence from another Moroccan, Abdelghani Mzoudi, who was acquitted of complicity in the 9/11 attacks by a Hamburg court in 2004. Mr. Mzoudi, who was deported from Germany, has offered to testify on behalf of Mr. Motassadeq.

For that to happen, however, the court would have to rule that the evidence is vital enough to warrant yet another trial.

More Gitmo Detainees Join Hunger Strike (AP)

By Michael Melia

AP, January 9, 2007

The number of Guantanamo Bay detainees participating in a hunger strike has more than doubled in recent weeks to 11, including five who are being force-fed, the U.S. military said Monday.

Military officials describe the hunger strike as an attempt to build public sympathy and opposition to the detention center, which on Thursday marks its fifth anniversary of existence at the isolated U.S. military base in Cuba.

"The hunger strike technique is consistent with Al-Qaida practice and reflects detainee attempts to elicit media attention to bring international pressure on the United States to release them back to the battlefield," said Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand, a Guantanamo Bay spokesman.

A Human rights group said the strike reflects prisoners' despair.

"I don't see it as at all curious that they should be desperate enough to starve themselves," said Jumana Musa, advocacy director for Amnesty International USA.

The number of participants stood at five just one month ago, officials said. No information on who the new hunger strikers are was immediately available. The military rarely releases details on individual detainees.

The jump in the number of strikers comes as Guantanamo's critics are using its fifth anniversary to call for the prison to close.

The U.S. government says it needs to keep men deemed "enemy combatants" under guard, but many prisoners protest they are innocent. Guantanamo Bay received its first prisoners on Jan. 11, 2002, and currently holds about 395 foreign men on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban.

Among the hunger strikers are two prisoners who began refusing food in August 2005, near the start of a hunger strike that reached a peak participation of 131 that year, Durand said. Most detainees abandoned the protest as the military adopted more aggressive force-feeding methods, including a restraint chair.

Those on the hunger strike have not made any specific demands or requests, Durand said.

Lawyer To Face Court-Martial (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

A Navy lawyer accused of passing secret information about detainees at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, to an unauthorized person was ordered to face a court-martial, the Navy said. The lawyer, Lt. Cmdr. Matthew M. Diaz, who was stationed at the base at Guantánamo from July 2004 to January 2005, could face more than 36 years in prison if convicted. No trial date was set. The Navy has said the recipient of the information notified the authorities; it has declined to identify that person. A complaint does not specify what type of information Commander Diaz is accused of copying and transmitting, but a Navy spokeswoman previously described it as a document containing names and other identifying information about detainees. Commander Diaz's civilian lawyer, Victor Kelley, did not return a call seeking comment.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

House Democrats' Security Bill Draws Doubts (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — House Democrats intend to fulfill a campaign promise this week by passing broad new antiterrorism legislation, but some Senate Democrats and the Bush administration object to security mandates in the plan, citing concerns about their cost and practicality.

DOJ_NMG_0114298

The House measure, the Sept. 11 Commission Bill, is intended to write into law recommendations by the group that investigated the 2001 terror attacks. They include initiatives intended to disrupt global black markets for nuclear weapons technology and to enhance cargo inspection.

"Today marks a giant leap forward toward a safer and more secure America," said Representative Bennie Thompson, Democrat of Mississippi, the new chairman of the House Committee on Homeland Security, as he unveiled the bill Friday.

But the proposed legislation, which could come to a vote as early as Tuesday, goes beyond what the Sept. 11 commission recommended, taking up measures previously favored by Democratic lawmakers but opposed by the Department of Homeland Security.

The bill requires that within three years, all cargo on passenger jets be inspected for explosives, as checked baggage is now. The House bill also requires that within five years all ship cargo containers headed to the United States be scanned overseas for components of a nuclear bomb.

Homeland Security Department officials say there is no proven technology for such comprehensive cargo screening, at least at a reasonable cost or without causing worldwide bottlenecks in trade. The screening for air cargo is estimated to cost $3.6 billion over the next decade, and ship inspections could cost even more. "Inspecting every container could cause ports to literally shut down," said Russ Knocke, a Homeland Security spokesman.

Many Republicans and some Senate Democratic committee chairmen said that the goal of 100 percent inspections was worthy, but that they were not convinced that mandates should be included in the bill.

"Airplane passengers must be assured that any cargo on a passenger jet will not pose a terrorist threat," said Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, independent of Connecticut, who now leads the Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee. "But we must achieve these goals in an efficient manner to allow for the free flow of commerce without placing undue economic burdens on importers or bringing air traffic to a standstill."

The Sept. 11 commission said in its 2004 report that any proposed new security measures must be carefully considered, weighing the cost and benefit of any one step, like inspecting cargo, against others that could be taken, like protecting planes against shoulder-fired missiles.

The commission recommended, for example, that passenger planes be equipped with hardened, bomb-resistant containers for some cargo, instead of moving immediately to inspect every cargo shipment.

Homeland Security Department officials said they were researching ways to inspect more air and sea cargo. The agency has tests planned this year at three ports in Pakistan, Honduras and England, where all ship containers headed for the United States will be checked for radioactive substances or dense objects that might be hiding a bomb.

Until then, the department intends to follow its existing security procedures, which include mandatory inspections of the small fraction of cargo containers deemed suspicious because of the sender, the destination or the contents, among other factors.

Currently, about 30 percent of air cargo on passenger planes is inspected by dogs or screening devices, while about 5 percent of all incoming ship containers are sent through a device like an X-ray machine.

Mr. Lieberman and Senator Daniel K. Inouye, Democrat of Hawaii, the new chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, want the security department to complete its tests on new technology before mandating inspection of all cargo.

But Mr. Thompson, the chief author of the House bill, and Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said the timetables were essential to push the department to move faster.

"We need firm deadlines to end the administration's foot-dragging," Mr. Schumer said Monday.

The push for 100 percent screening of all ship cargo containers first became a top priority for Democrats last year after the Bush administration proposed allowing a Dubai company to assume management of a half-dozen United States ship terminal operations. Democrats said then that they recognized the idea was compelling not only to increase security, but also as a political pitch as they tried to buttress their credentials as a party that takes domestic security seriously.

Part of the skepticism about the mandate for 100 percent screening is that even if the equipment is installed, it is not clear it would do much to prevent an attack, some security experts said.

The radiation detection equipment now in use, for example, probably would not pick up a crucial radioactive substance for a nuclear weapon if the material was shielded. And even if all cargo containers were checked, terrorists could find other ways to smuggle weapons into the United States, including on private boats or ships that carry cars, which would not be not covered by the inspection mandates.

"Tax dollars should not be spent on what makes for the best election-year bumper sticker, but on initiatives that offer the most security for the dollar spent," said James Jay Carafano, a senior fellow at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative research group in Washington, and a critic of the 100 percent inspection requirement.

DOJ_NMG_0114299

Aside from the cargo inspection mandates, other security measures proposed by Democrats have a greater chance of becoming law.

The House bill calls for changes in the way some $2 billion a year in state and local domestic security grants are distributed, so that the money is more based on risk. A separate bill has been introduced in the Senate that would provide antiterrorism grants for Amtrak, freight railroads and other transit systems, a plan that previously passed the Senate but was opposed by House Republican leaders.

Mr. Thompson said that with the Democrats now in charge the party had a chance to push forward at least some of these measures, although he said he recognized compromise might be necessary before they were signed into law.

House Bill Backs Additional Reforms From 9/11 Report (WP)

By Dan Eggen And Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

House Democrats announced legislation yesterday aimed at implementing many of the remaining reforms suggested by the Sept. 11 commission, including calls for more thorough cargo screening, better emergency communications and more money for cities at the highest risk of terrorist attack.

Democratic leaders plan to push through votes this week on a long list of Sept. 11-related changes that were rejected by the previous Republican-controlled Congress. The proposals signal an early willingness on the part of House Democrats to pressure their colleagues in the Senate, where lawmakers from both parties are cooler to some of the ideas and where no similar package of legislation has been proposed.

Democrats say that the House proposals would implement nearly all the remaining reforms recommended in 2004 by the bipartisan commission on the 2001 attacks, including ways to beef up funding and training for first responders as well as calls to rewrite many U.S. policies for controlling weapons of mass destruction and nuclear proliferation.

Former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), who served as vice chairman of the panel, estimated that the previous Congress had enacted half the commission's recommendations, including creating a director to oversee the federal government's intelligence agencies. He said the "American people will be safer" if the remaining proposals become law.

"It carries out the recommendations that we have made," Hamilton said at a news conference yesterday with House Majority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and other Democrats. "And if this bill is enacted, then almost all of the recommendations of the commission will have been put into law."

Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, said the changes would, among other things, result in "100 percent" screening of air cargo and baggage and major ports' cargo within four years.

The legislation calls for the establishment of a presidential office to coordinate prevention of terrorism and the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. Supporters of the measure described it as necessary to direct activities and budgets on an issue that is now spread among numerous departments and agencies. The bill also would create an outside commission to monitor government nonproliferation initiatives.

The Sept. 11 commission gave the administration a grade of D in following up on its general recommendations for preventing the development and spread of weapons of mass destruction. The Democratic legislation proposes a wide range of initiatives to expand the scope of international cooperation and sanctions for countries that do not cooperate.

Noting that the commission called for a significant expansion of resources for international broadcasting and promotion of democracy, the bill calls for a "surge capacity" of additional funding "to support United States foreign policy objectives during a crisis abroad."

Congress's ability to push for change in these areas is limited.

"When you start on the domestic side, Congress has a lot more room to act," said Andrew Grotto, a nonproliferation expert at the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank. "On public diplomacy and the proliferation elements, Congress's role starts to shift from direct action to more oversight and to funding."

Republicans on the Homeland Security committee offered immediate criticism of the package, arguing that Democrats had not followed through on promises to enact all of the remaining commission recommendations. They complained that Democrats were limiting debate and that many Democrats previously opposed the changes that they are now advocating.

Ranking Republican Rep. Peter T. King (N.Y.), whom Thompson replaced, called it a "missed opportunity."

The Sept. 11 commission report focused heavily on reorganizing the U.S. intelligence community and congressional oversight, the global dimension of terrorism in Afghanistan, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and elsewhere, and the threat of weapons of mass destruction. Domestic recommendations focused on border security, transportation security and protection of critical infrastructure.

DOJ_NMG_0114300

The GOP-controlled Congress acted on many of those findings, including targeting terrorist travel, consolidating watch lists and securing commercial aviation. But many of the other changes stalled, such as attempts to set up a biometric border entry and exit system, establish secure ID documents for all Americans and develop plans to protect key private-sector targets.

While the House considers its legislation, the Senate's homeland security panel plans to hold a hearing today on the status of commission recommendations and expects to vote on a bill by the end of the month, said a spokeswoman for the committee's chairman, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.).

But the Senate has opposed some of the key proposals in the House bill, such as reducing grant funds awarded to all states in favor of those most at risk, and it is unclear how much the new Democratic majority will alter that stance.

Michael O'Hanlon, a security analyst at the Brookings Institution, said House Democrats' embrace of their interpretation of the Sept. 11 commission's recommendations was designed to make a political point of swift action, not necessarily to make the best policy.

"I don't understand why we have to assume that everything that came out of the 9/11 commission is accurate and it should be axiomatic that the House should approve everything they proposed," O'Hanlon said.

Michael Greenberger, a University of Maryland law professor who heads the Center for Health and Homeland Security there, praised House Democrats for taking on the proposals but said they will have a tough time convincing many of their colleagues in the Senate.

"It's a very aggressive proposal, more aggressive than I would have thought," Greenberger said. "I wouldn't be optimistic that it will all make it through the Senate, but I'm surprised it got this far."

House Nears Passage Of Resolution To Add Intelligence Oversight Panel (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

The House is scheduled to pass a resolution as early as today to add a select intelligence oversight panel within the Appropriations Committee, but this change is far different from the proposal to enhance congressional oversight of intelligence proposed in 2004 by the Sept. 11 commission.

In past years, the House and Senate intelligence committees authorized intelligence spending, and the two chambers' appropriations panels approved the funding for the director of national intelligence and the 17 agencies that make up the community.

The panel on the 2001 attacks had recommended a House-Senate committee or smaller, single committees in each chamber that would both authorize and appropriate funds for the intelligence community -- thereby reducing the number of lawmakers involved but giving a sharper focus to oversight.

It also recommended that the overall intelligence budget, now an estimated $42 billion a year, be made public. The House resolution to be voted on soon does not deal with the overall budget number, whose disclosure the Bush administration opposes.

The Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, which last year approved making the overall number public, is expected to pass this week or next the still-pending fiscal 2007 Intelligence Authorization Bill, which contains the public-disclosure language.

However, neither the House nor Senate appears ready to accept the idea of merging the authorization and appropriation functions. Rep. David Obey (D-Wis.), chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, said his panel "had to fund the Army, Navy, Air Force, as well as the intelligence community, and so we didn't feel that there ought to be a single-shot appropriations operation."

The resultant "hybrid" 13-member panel, he said, would have 10 lawmakers from Appropriations and three from the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence. In addition, it would have what Obey described as a "beefed-up staff" to replace the staff member assigned to the issue last year, as well as subpoena power to carry out its own oversight investigations.

As for funding, however, the new panel would only "make recommendations" and prepare a report for the Appropriations defense subcommittee, which would continue to prepare the classified intelligence spending bill.

Yesterday, the Republican staff of the House Homeland Security Committee criticized the idea of the new panel within the Appropriations Committee as "another layer of bureaucracy to intelligence oversight." It said the new panel would have "no real appropriations power" and could only "make recommendations to the appropriators, who can choose to completely ignore those recommendations."

Democrats Defend Intelligence Panel Plans (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114301

House Democrats yesterday deflected criticism that their plan to create a dual committee to oversee funding and oversight for intelligence agencies does not conform to the recommendations of the September 11 commission.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said the hybrid panel is a first step toward reducing the number of committees with oversight over intelligence and homeland security.

"Reducing the number of committees ... will happen, but we have to be assured that this panel will work," Mrs. Pelosi said.

Democrats were criticized by Republicans and some members of their own party last week for veering from the recommendations of the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States.

"The commission recommended a merger of authorization and oversight, and we could not do that because appropriations has to allocate spending to areas of intelligence outside of the intelligence community for the Army, Navy and other armed services," said Rep. David R. Obey, Wisconsin Democrat and chairman of the Appropriations Committee.

Under the plan, intelligence agencies will report to the hybrid panel and the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence. The hybrid panel will have control of agency spending, and the intelligence committee will have oversight.

The hybrid panel, whose members would be appointed by Mrs. Pelosi, would have subpoena powers and be required to issue an annual report on classified and unclassified intelligence spending.

"This is so the intelligence community knows that they are not just dealing with the individual members of the panel, but the speaker of the House," Mr. Obey said.

Republican leaders said Democrats are playing politics and using smoke and mirrors.

"This is one of the most baffling, incoherent and discombobulated 'streamlining' proposals the House has ever seen, and we're not just talking about catering contracts for the Capitol cafeteria. This is our national security," said a Republican leadership aide. "Whether this was the result of ineptitude or an inability to make legislation out of a silly campaign sound bite, it's pretty frightening."

Democrats are ready to begin House debate on a bill to implement the remaining recommendations of the September 11 commission.

They hope to increase the share of homeland security grants to cities at highest risk of a terrorist attack, and to create a stand-alone grant program to provide first responders with direct communications among different agencies.

"We will have 100 percent cargo screening at airports within three years, 100 percent of in-line baggage screening for explosives in three years, and 100 percent scanning of U.S.-bound shipping containers in five years," said Rep. Bennie Thompson, Mississippi Democrat and chairman of the Homeland Security Committee.

The bill also creates a U.S. coordinator for the prevention of weapons of mass destruction proliferation and terrorism and a blue-ribbon commission to recommend further reforms strengthening efforts to eliminate nuclear black-market networks.

Security Bill Picks Up Ideas Of 9/11 Panel (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON

In a bid to fulfill campaign promises, House Democrats are bringing to the floor - without new hearings or, perhaps, even the possibility of amendment - a sweeping bill to implement more of the 9/11 commission recommendations.

The bill includes new directives for allocating more homeland-security resources on the basis of risk and threat assessment, requiring inspection of all sea and air cargo, and adding funding for the interoperability of first responders. It also moves up reporting deadlines for the department of Homeland Security on work to improve aviation security, terrorist trafficking, port security, and a system to track foreign visitors.

"Let us be the Congress that strongly honors our responsibility to protect the American people from terrorism," said Speaker Nancy Pelosi in her acceptance speech last week. On the eve of last November's elections, then-minority leader Pelosi promised that Democrats would implement all the 9/11 commission recommendations in their first day in office.

But it leaves out key provisions of that prestigious panel that were considered and rejected in the GOP-controlled Congress:

· It does not take up panel recommendations to declassify the top line of the intelligence budget.

· It would not shift covert paramilitary operations from the Central Intelligence Agency to the Defense Department.

· It skirts the lead recommendation of the 9/11 commission for members of Congress: to dramatically reduce the number of committees that claim oversight over homeland security.

"In only their first few days in the majority, House Democratic leadership has already fallen short on the key security promise they made to the American people," chided Rep. Peter King of New York, the ranking Republican on the Committee on Homeland Security. "Republicans have already enacted an overwhelming majority of the recommendations, and the opening of the 110th Congress was a terrific opportunity to finish the job. Unfortunately, it is amounting to nothing more than a missed opportunity."

DOJ_NMG_0114302

Others take a more optimistic view. "The 108th Congress passed half of the 9/11 commission reforms. The 109th Congress did nothing. The 110th Congress seeks to finish the job and pass all the remaining reforms," says Timothy Roemer, a former 9/11 commissioner.

He praised Pelosi for creating a new subcommittee in the House Appropriations panel to include representatives of both authorizing and spending committees. "We recognize that congressional oversight is one of the most difficult reforms yet and one of the most important. It's a very important step to tie intelligence oversight to the budget," he adds.

A key recommendation of the 9/11 commission was to allocate limited homeland-security resources by setting "risk-based priorities," rather than using a formula based on population or political clout. Democrats protested that rural states, such as Wyoming, were awarded bigger grants per capita than target cities like New York and Washington in fiscal year 2006.

"Hard choices must be made in allocating limited resources. The US government should identify and evaluate the transportation assets that need to be protected, set risk-based priorities for defending them, select the most practical and cost-effective ways of doing so, and then develop a plan, budget, and funding to implement the effort," said the panel, known officially as the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States, in its final report in 2004.

In a nod to the 9/11 commission recommendation to streamline congressional oversight, House Democrats are creating the House subcommittee that includes both appropriators and authorizers. But leaders of the Department of Homeland Security still appear before dozens of congressional panels.

"Gov. Tom Ridge [former secretary of Homeland Security] estimated that he spent at least 40 percent of his time, maybe more, testifying before Congress. The number of committees with oversight has been reduced from 80 to 55," says Al Felzenberg, former spokesman for the 9/11 commission.

"Of all our recommendations, strengthening congressional oversight may be among the most difficult and important," said the 9/11 commission in its final report. "Few things are more difficult to change in Washington than congressional committee jurisdiction and prerogatives."

Meanwhile, the Senate is also planning to take up a bill to implement the 9/11 commission's recommendations as one of its first pieces of legislation in the new Congress. This will include enhanced screening of containers and cargo in ships and planes at the point of origin, improved security at chemical and nuclear plants, and more resources for first responders.

The bill also calls for greater diplomacy and programs for "enhancing the authority of moderates and undermining violent extremists in the Middle East." And it would call for securing "loose nuclear materials" that terrorists could use to build nuclear weapons or dirty bombs.

A Bad Investment (WP)

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

WHAT'S MORE important, Coast Guard patrols or collecting fingerprints at border crossings? Running checked bags through X-ray machines at airports or installing blast barriers at nuclear plants?

Given a limited amount of money and an endless list of programs and procedures that could make Americans safer, it's essential to buy the most homeland security possible with the cash available. And as the little list above demonstrates, that can be a tough job. That's all the more reason not to waste money on the kind of political shenanigan written into a sprawling Democratic bill -- up for a vote in the House this week -- that would require the Department of Homeland Security to ensure that every maritime cargo container bound for the United States is scanned before it departs for American shores.

Container scanning technology is improving, but it is not able to perform useful, speedy inspections of cargo on the scale House Democrats envision. Congress has already authorized pilot programs to study the feasibility of scanning all maritime cargo. The sensible posture is to await the results of those trials before buying port scanners, training the thousands who would be needed to operate them and gumming up international trade.

The Democrats don't offer a realistic cost estimate for the mandate they will propose today. But the cost to the government and the economy is sure to be in the tens of billions and quite possibly hundreds of billions annually. The marginal benefit isn't close to being worth the price. Under recently expanded programs, all cargo coming into the country is assessed for risk and, when necessary, inspected, all without the cost of expensive scanning equipment, overseas staff and long waits at foreign ports. Perhaps that's why the Sept. 11 commission didn't recommend 100 percent cargo scanning.

The newly installed House leadership will bring the bill, which contains a range of other homeland security proposals both deserving and undeserving, directly to the floor, bypassing the Homeland Security Committee. Luckily, the Senate will give more thought to its homeland security bill and probably won't approve a 100 percent container inspection plan. House Democrats can figure those odds as well as anyone. But why not score some easy political points in your first 100 hours?

DOJ_NMG_0114303

Adapt, Change Or Die (WP)

By Tim Roemer

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

As our republic enters 2007, Washington is still primarily organized to prevail in the Cold War against the former Soviet Union. Yet today, America and the community of democracies face very different threats -- evolving terrorism, global warming and energy supply disruptions. Recognizing this, the new Democratic leadership has pledged to pass all of the remaining recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission this week, in the first "100 hours" of the 110th Congress. This is essential -- yet it is only a first step.

The Sept. 11 commission recommended 41 reforms; roughly half of those have been implemented. These reforms represent the most basic fixes to the vulnerabilities exploited by al-Qaeda more than five years ago. A terrorist attack or natural disaster could wreak as much damage and confusion today as happened on Sept. 11 or during Hurricane Katrina. Our executive and legislative branches need to finish the job.

As Congress gets to work, it must legislate first and oversee second. Communications spectrum needs to be transferred to our first responders, and interoperable, survivable networks need to be established. Fissile materials must be decommissioned, secured and inventoried around the world, accelerating the timetable of measures such as the Nunn-Lugar program. Homeland security funding must be allocated on the basis of objective criteria. Emergency response plans must be put in place by states and localities -- and they must be practiced regularly. But congressional committees preparing to use their investigative powers cannot point their fingers at other federal shortcomings without fixing their own dysfunctional oversight system.

Once Congress does its legislative work, members must turn to overseeing the executive branch. FBI reform has been far too slow. Information sharing among government agencies is still lagging. Airplane baggage and cargo, incredibly, are still largely unscreened. Passenger screening against a comprehensive terrorism watch list still eludes the Transportation Security Administration. The Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board needs independent, strong powers to protect the foundations of our democracy. And our foreign policy must support effective public diplomacy, ensuring that our actions and words win the battle for hearts and minds and defeat the seductive message of Osama bin Laden.

Even the best congressional oversight cannot overcome the personnel problems plaguing the Bush administration. The resignation of John Negroponte as director of national intelligence is a reminder of how important it is to have the right people stay in the right jobs long enough to build the foundations for change. Instead, we find the Office of the Director of National Intelligence engaged in a game of musical chairs. The critical deputy position under Negroponte has been vacant since Gen. Michael Hayden's departure to the CIA last spring. Instead of the streamlined and steady agency that the Sept. 11 commission recommended, we have tumultuous turnover.

Competent, capable and stable leadership is indispensable. And passing and implementing the Sept. 11 commission reforms would provide an essential foundation for our security. But together these fundamentals are no longer sufficient; they will get us only to where we should have been in 2004. The threats facing America in 2007 are different from what our commission addressed when we first convened nearly four years ago.

In the near term, al-Qaeda continues to evolve and adapt. It is utilizing the Internet, motivating more suicide bombers and communicating with millions of people through its TV production unit, al-Sahab. Al-Qaeda is spreading around the globe and popping up in self-generated cells in London, Madrid and Bali. Its shadow is looming in Europe.

The bigger picture is even more unsettling. Our ground forces are tied down in the asymmetrical Iraq war, yet most federal agencies and congressional committees are structured to fight the Cold War. We are backsliding in Afghanistan as well as losing ground in the broader Middle East. Global warming is an undeniable transnational threat, trade imbalances are staggering and our energy supply is tenuous.

It will take tough, bipartisan work to compose a comprehensive strategy to address these converging threats.

That requires a positive, long-term vision founded on a sustainable global economy, an expanding community of democracies and a sharing of the global security burden. Harry Truman, with diplomat George F. Kennan's help, launched a strategy that would contain the Soviets with our military and our allies but would defeat them with our economic opportunity and freedom.

America needs to change now as much as it did after World War II, embracing government's vital role and reorganizing government to execute and oversee a new global strategy. The alternative is too dire to contemplate.

The writer, president of the Center for National Policy, was a member of the Sept. 11 commission and is a former member of the House intelligence committee from Indiana.

Court Challenge Of ID Requirement Fails (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0114304

By Joan Biskupic
USA Today, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court on Monday rebuffed a challenge to the federal government's policy of requiring airline passengers to show identification before they board flights, spurning arguments that the well-known but unpublished policy would lead to more secret laws.

John Gilmore, a founder of Sun Microsystems and an advocate of libertarian causes, sued the government because it has long refused to disclose the text of the regulation that forces air travelers to present an ID.

The question before the justices was whether travelers have sufficient notice of the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) ID policy to satisfy constitutional due process of law, which typically requires a law to be published so people know how to comply with it.

On July 4, 2002, Gilmore tried to board two flights from California to the Washington, D.C., area without showing identification. Airline workers told him that if he would not show an ID, he would have to undergo more extensive screening. He refused.

"I believe I have a right to travel in my own country without presenting what amounts to an internal passport," Gilmore told USA TODAY in 2004. "I have a right to be anonymous."

Gilmore's lawsuit drew support at the high court from several media groups, including the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, the Electronic Frontier Foundation, the American Association of Law Libraries and the Electronic Privacy Information Center.

In court briefs, the groups stressed the importance of the public knowing what the law says and the need to hold officials accountable as they impose anti-terrorism measures.

U.S. Solicitor General Paul Clement told the justices in a brief that telling passengers about the ID requirement at airports is sufficient, and he emphasized that the TSA directive is part of "sensitive security information." He said the directive is part of a broad policy aimed at preventing hijackings and other potential threats to passenger jets.

In denying Gilmore's appeal, the high court gave no explanation and had no public vote, as is its usual practice in declining to hear cases. The justices let stand a lower court's ruling that said Gilmore had enough notice of the policy because airline workers had told him about it.

Gilmore's attorney, Thomas Goldstein, said the federal government's refusal to disclose the TSA directive has the effect of misinforming people. "Passengers are consistently advised that federal law requires them to show identification," Goldstein wrote in the appeal. "Passengers in reality can generally travel even without showing proper identification … (if) they undergo a more extensive security screening."

Package Is Second False Alarm At Port (MH)

By Luisa Yanez, Erika Beras And Evan S. Benn
The Miami Herald, January 9, 2007

A sensor detected explosives in a package of sprinkler parts being loaded onto a cruise ship getting ready to depart Monday at the Port of Miami-Dade. Police dogs and a bomb squad soon determined the metal parts were harmless, and passengers evacuated from a Royal Caribbean ship were allowed to reembark.

The day before, another scare at the port started when three Middle Eastern men aroused suspicions of security officers. Police later described the incident as a misunderstanding, and misdemeanor charges against the men were dropped Monday.

"The fact that we've had several incidents here recently is indicative of the type of screening and how serious we take security here," said James Maes, the port's assistant security director. ``Travelers can rest assured at the decisive reactions to these types of potential threats."

Screeners checking baggage and supplies going onto Royal Caribbean's Majesty of the Seas got a positive signal for military-grade C-4 explosives about 2 p.m., according to Michael Sheehan, a spokesman for the Miami-based cruise company. The suspect package was tested six times, each time resulting in a detection of explosives.

Passengers, who had already boarded the ship before its scheduled 5 p.m. departure, and several other people in a nearby port terminal were ordered to evacuate.

Police dogs were unable to detect explosives in the small pallet, which contained metal parts for the cruise ship's sprinkler system. The Miami-Dade bomb squad detonated the package about 3:30 p.m. in a secure area of the port, determining that no explosives or explosives residue were present.

"It doesn't look like there was anything particularly menacing in the package," Maes said.

The sprinkler parts had similar chemical characteristics to C-4 explosives, which may have caused them to set off the sensors, but they did not contain any actual dangerous substances, said Miami-Dade police Detective Robert Williams.

DOJ_NMG_0114305

The ship's 2,340 passengers were allowed back on the ship, which departed about 6 p.m., an hour after its scheduled time. The delay would not affect the cruise's four-night itinerary around the Bahamas, Sheehan said.

On Sunday, federal, state and local agents rushed to the port after an Iraqi man tried to enter the port in an 18-wheel cargo truck without proper paperwork.

Amar al Hadad, 28, was driving the truck along with two passengers: his brother Hussain al Hadad, 24, and Hassan el Sayed, 20. The Hadad brothers are from Iraq, and Sayed is from Lebanon, police said. All are legal U.S. residents who live in Dearborn, Mich.

Police charged the men with trespassing and resisting arrest without violence, but the charges were dropped Monday, court records show.

During a standard security check, a port security officer thought Amar al Hadad told him he was alone in the truck. But when officers saw the two other men, one of whom had no identification, the three men were detained for questioning while the cargo in their truck was inspected.

The truck contained electrical wiring for cars, which were listed on the truck's cargo manifest.

"We wanted to be as prudent and deliberate as we could in conducting a thorough investigation in one of our nation's busiest ports," Williams wrote in a release.

Miami Herald staff writer Rob Barry contributed to this report.

Authorities: Miami Package Was Harmless (NSDY/AP)

By Kelli Kennedy, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 9, 2007

MIAMI -- The Port of Miami was hit by its second terrorism scare in two days Monday when a package that was to be loaded onto a cruise ship tested positive for plastic explosives. Authorities later determined it was just a box of sprinkler parts.

The package was initially tested six times, and each time it came back positive for the military-grade explosive known as C4, the Coast Guard said.

The package was destroyed, and a Miami-Dade County police bomb squad determined the sprinkler parts contained a substance that "closely resembles" plastic explosives, said police spokesman Bobby Williams.

Williams said the instruments used to test the package sometimes give false positives.

"We still need to check it out," Williams said.

The package was included in provisions that were to be loaded aboard Royal Caribbean International's Majesty of the Seas. Explosives detection instruments gave the positive reading about 2 p.m., the cruise line said.

The FBI was monitoring the situation, spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said.

The developments came a day after three Middle Eastern men in a cargo truck sparked a brief terrorism scare at the port. After a bomb squad search, authorities concluded that the men were carrying automotive parts and that the scare stemmed from miscommunication. A judge dropped all charges against the three men Monday.

The Port of Miami is among the nation's busiest. More than 3.6 million cruise ship passengers traveled through it in 2005, making it the world's top terminal for cruise vacationers.

False Alarm At Miami Port -- Again (UPI)

United Press International, January 9, 2007

MIAMI, Jan. 8 (UPI) -- For the second day in a row, authorities rushed to the Port of Miami because of unfounded reports there were dangerous explosives on the premises.

Security at the port Monday discovered what was thought to be explosives amid cargo belonging to a cruise ship at the port.

A police bomb squad removed the suspicious item and destroyed it in a controlled explosion. Later authorities said the item was in fact a part of a sprinkler system and not considered dangerous, a police official told United Press International.

Monday's incident follows another false alarm at the port when a truck driver arriving at the entrance drew the suspicion of security personnel when he said he was uncertain of the contents of his truck. The driver -- reportedly of Middle Eastern descent -- and two other men were detained and questioned by authorities. FBI officials said there was no threat and the incident was the result of miscommunication.

Charges Dismissed After Port Scare (MCT)

By David Ashenfelter, Detroit Free Press

McClatchy Newspapers, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114306

A judge dismissed misdemeanor charges Monday against three Middle Eastern men from Dearborn, Mich., who were arrested during a mix-up Sunday that triggered a terrorism scare at the Port of Miami.

Authorities said they arrested the men because they were suspicious, but an Arab-American civil rights group in Dearborn called it another case of so-called driving while Arab.

"We understand that mistakes happen, but when they happen this often, it makes you wonder," Imad Hamad , regional director of the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee in Dearborn said, referring to the arrests last summer of five Middle Eastern men in Marietta, Ohio, and Caro, Mich., on terrorism charges after they bought hundreds of cell phones for resale.

Terrorism charges in those cases eventually were dropped.

The men in Sunday's incident - Amar Al Hadad , 28; his brother, Hussain Al Hadad , 24; and Hassan El Sayed , 20 - were taken into custody after Amar Al Hadad allegedly told a security guard that he was alone in a cargo truck that was delivering a load of automotive parts.

The FBI said the guard directed the driver to a Miami-Dade police checkpoint to obtain the proper credentials to enter the port. When an officer at the second checkpoint asked the driver if anyone else was in the vehicle and he didn't reply, the officer climbed into the cab and found the other two men. One of the men, El Sayed, couldn't produce identification.

Amar Al Hadad, who insisted that he never told anyone he was alone in the truck, was charged with resisting an officer without violence. His companions were charged with trespassing. The Al Hadad brothers are from Iraq. El Sayed is from Lebanon. All are permanent U.S. residents.

Miami-Dade County Court Judge Gerald Klein dismissed the charges during a short bond hearing in Miami, agreeing with a public defender that there was no evidence that they had done anything wrong. They were released a short time later.

Authorities said the arrests were warranted.

"Due to a miscommunication between the gate security personnel and the truck driver, we believe there was a discrepancy in the number of people in the vehicle," Miami-Dade police spokeswoman Nancy Goldberg said. "This, and the fact that one of the individuals did not have any form of ID, raised our level of concern."

Hamad said all of the men would continue to live under a cloud because the charges are part of their criminal records.

Despite early media reports, the Port of Miami wasn't closed Sunday and the Dearborn men didn't appear on a terrorist watch list.

The families of the men could not be reached to comment.

Dead Birds Litter Street In Austin; Tests Continue (USAT)

By William M. Welch, Usa Today

USA Today, January 9, 2007

Ten city blocks in front of the Texas Capitol in Austin were closed and the city triggered its terrorism-response plan Monday when dozens of dead birds were discovered along a main thoroughfare.

Congress Avenue was reopened before 1 p.m. after city officials and health experts concluded there was no threat to people.

Initial tests provided no explanation for the deaths of 63 birds. The birds — pigeons, sparrows and grackles — were sent to state and federal veterinary labs for tests.

Adolfo Valadez, medical director of the Austin/Travis County Health and Human Services Department, said the birds may have been deliberately poisoned. Grackles — which are large, noisy blackbirds — and pigeons are often regarded as nuisances.

"We don't have a final cause," Valadez said. "Given all the information we have … we do not feel this was any type of terrorist threat, an intentional poisoning trying to hurt humans."

Police found the dead birds about 3 a.m., city spokesman Gene Acuna said. City officials ordered Congress Avenue and adjacent streets closed well before workers began arriving at downtown offices. Workers in hazardous-materials suits tested the air for contaminants, and workers dissected one of the birds in a search for an obvious cause of death.

"Downtown Austin was shut down pretty much until noon as additional testing was done," Acuna said. "There was nothing in our air sampling that we found that posed any public threat."

Concern about a threat was heightened by the location, directly in front of the state Capitol, and the timing, a day before the Texas Legislature convenes for its 2007 session. That led officials to trigger the terrorism-response plan as a precaution, Valadez said.

"If anything, we've become much more suspicious and prepared" since 9/11 and the anthrax attacks of 2001, he said.

Dead birds were sent to the Texas A&M University veterinary school in College Station and the U.S. Department of Agriculture's National Animal Disease Center in Ames, Iowa. It could take several weeks for tests to be completed, Valadez said.

DOJ_NMG_0114307

Besides poisoning, the labs are looking for signs of bacteriological or viral diseases. "These birds might have died a natural death due to infection," Valadez said.

For Airport Screeners, More Training About Muslims (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, January 9, 2007

NEW YORK

Say you're a security screener at the airport. You notice a large group of people wearing white robes, speaking a strange language. The women have head scarves and the men long beards. They look nervous. One of them is holding a Koran. Another appears to be praying. What do you do?

According to the Transportation Security Administration (TSA), simply assume they're devout Muslims returning from the annual hajj in Mecca.

During the next few weeks, as many as 20,000 American Muslims will be returning to the United States from their pilgrimage to Saudi Arabia. The TSA has ramped up cultural-awareness training for all 43,000 of its screeners. The goal: to remind screeners what to expect from devout Muslims and how to go about screening them so it's in concert with their religious beliefs.

Arab-American and Muslim-American leaders are applauding the effort. But they say it's part of a much-needed larger cultural and political conversation about Islam and Arab culture that can help the nation as it heals from the aftereffects of 9/11.

"Their efforts are a modest but important beginning," says Jack Shaheen, professor emeritus of mass communications at Southern Illinois University. "But until such time that we react to the vilification of and discrimination against Arabs in the same way we react to the vilification of others like Jews, blacks, and Hispanics, I'm not going to go dancing in the streets."

The 9/11 attacks ushered in a new era for the nation's Arabs and Muslims. Many of the almost 7 million who have lived in the country for years, if not generations, suddenly felt suspect simply because of their religion or the way they looked. A poll conducted last year by the Council on American-Islamic Relations found that almost half of Americans have a negative view of Islam, even though 60 percent say they're not knowledgeable about it. More than 1 in 4 believes such statements as: "The Muslim religion teaches violence and hatred." Heightened sensitivities at airports

And it's at the airports, with the intense focus on security, that many American Muslims and Arab-Americans say they are more keenly aware of those misperceptions.

"After 9/11 things were bad, but they weren't as bad as they are now," says Rafat Arain, a dentist and mother of four from Brookfield, Wis.

Dr. Arain, who's lived in the US for 30 years, wears a head scarf known as the hijab. Every time she's flown in the past five years, she's been taken aside for extra screening, whether she was traveling to Europe, Pakistan, or Saudi Arabia for the hajj. She believes, in part, that's because of her head covering. Immediately after 9/11, she says, she understood the extra scrutiny: The country had been traumatized. Now, she's simply come to expect it.

A year ago, when she was at Chicago's O'Hare Airport, she realized that time for one of her five daily prayers was running out. She went to a corner and quietly began to pray. A few minutes later, she noticed a security guard standing at her side.

"He didn't say anything to me. I finished my prayer, then I said 'Hi' to him and just walked away," she says. "But I could tell the people around were scared of me, and that's not good for us or good for our children."

In its hajj training refresher, the TSA is reminding officers that devout Muslims pray five times a day, and to expect it. The TSA also maintains that it does not in any way target individuals based on their background or religious affiliation.

"Our model looks only at behavior and in a way is the antidote to racial profiling," says Christopher White, a TSA spokesman.

He also says the TSA and other law-enforcement agencies are working hard to ensure that no one's civil rights are violated, which is why officials believed the hajj merited additional training.

"We expect a large number of pilgrims, and the hajj training involves providing our security officers reminders about how to screen individuals with head coverings [and] our policies concerning the transport of holy water and other Muslim religious practices, like praying," says Mr. White.

The Council on American-Islamic Relations applauds the special attention. It says it will be checking airports around the country during the next few weeks to ensure all goes smoothly. Complaints about detentions

But at the same time, the civil rights organization says it's seen an increase in reports about perceived discrimination against Muslims, or people who look Muslim. Many of the complaints concern incidents such as individuals being routinely detained for several hours at the airport and being asked intimate questions about their beliefs - whether they pray and at which mosque. "These are things that really aren't the business of security personnel," says Ibrahim Hooper, spokesman for the Council on American-Islamic Relations.

DOJ_NMG_0114308

Muslim-American leaders say their goal is to reach out to all Americans so they can understand Islam as a religion of peace, respect for neighbors, and devotion to God.

"We're afraid of what we don't understand, and these people look different from us. They have different sounding names," says Nawar Shora, director of diversity and law-enforcement outreach at the American Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee in Washington. "In the post-9/11 era, there's an absolute need for the average Joe and the average Jane to be able to look at their neighbor that looks like one of those brown people and know that different isn't necessarily bad."

TSA Screeners May Get Union Rights (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

Take it as a sign of the times.

As part of a bill to follow through on recommendations of the 9/11 commission, House Democrats have included a provision that would give union rights to about 43,000 airport screeners at the Transportation Security Administration.

The TSA has not allowed federal screeners to join unions -- like other federal employees -- since Congress created the agency in 2001 after the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. The Bush administration's ban has drawn steady opposition from federal unions, especially the American Federation of Government Employees.

The provision in the House bill, scheduled for floor action today, is based on a measure sponsored last year by Rep. Nita M. Lowey (D-N.Y.) aimed at permitting screeners to engage in collective bargaining. The Lowey proposal drew bipartisan support but failed to move out of committee by one vote.

The decision by Rep. Bennie G. Thompson (D-Miss.), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, to include the union-rights provision can be taken as a signal that the new Congress will be open to the arguments of organized labor on federal personnel issues.

Thompson's provision would require the Homeland Security Department to apply the same management system to all TSA employees, including screeners. With that change, screeners would have the right to decide whether they wanted to be represented by a union and would be given job protections if they blow the whistle on waste, fraud and abuse.

The 9/11 commission did not address union rights or personnel rules but urged improvements in airport screening operations. AFGE maintains that collective bargaining rights help smooth agency operations because labor-management contracts provide a structure for addressing employee issues, including job performance.

Peter Winch, an organizer with AFGE, said the union had asked Democrats to put bargaining rights for TSA screeners "on the agenda for the first 100 hours." He continued, "It does not make sense to keep these employees from collective bargaining rights when other Department of Homeland Security employees have those rights."

The TSA has said that collective bargaining is not appropriate for airport passenger and baggage screeners because of their national security mission and because the agency requires the ability to make personnel staffing changes rapidly in response to threats. In the law creating the TSA, Congress left it to the Bush administration to determine such issues as union rights for screeners.

Asked for a comment yesterday, a spokesman for the Homeland Security Department said he could not discuss pending legislation.

AFGE has fought the TSA ban but has been rebuffed in federal courts. The union has signed up about 1,500 screeners as members and helps them deal with disciplinary actions, workers' compensation and equal employment opportunity, Winch said.

The House provision, if approved, would go to the Senate. Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, will support the House provision, his spokeswoman said yesterday.

"The senator doesn't see any national security reason to single out the TSA screeners," spokeswoman Leslie Phillips said. "Other security personnel like customs agents and the Border Patrol have the right to collective bargaining, and that has not impaired their ability to protect American security."

John Gage, AFGE president, said yesterday that "now is the time for change." The screeners, he said, "deserve equality."OPM Nominee

Howard C. Weizmann has been selected by the president to serve as the next deputy director at the Office of Personnel Management, the White House announced.

Weizmann is the president of the Private Sector Council, a part of the nonprofit Partnership for Public Service.

The council, founded in 1983 by David Packard and other executives, grew out of the Grace Commission, which was chartered by President Ronald Reagan to find ways to save taxpayer dollars and improve government efficiency.

DOJ_NMG_0114309

Weizmann has worked for nearly 30 years in a variety of corporate and nonprofit positions. He is a former managing consultant for the Washington, Philadelphia and Richmond offices of Watson Wyatt Worldwide, the human resources consulting firm. His nomination requires Senate confirmation.

A Rotten Smell Raises Alarms And Questions (NYT)

By Sewell Chan

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

It was the odor associated with natural gas — the telltale, unpleasant sulfur scent that typically signals a gas leak. But this time, it was lingering in many areas of Manhattan and northeastern New Jersey, coursing through buildings and leading to fears that it could ignite or that a dangerous chemical had been deliberately released.

Schools and office buildings were evacuated. A subway station was shut, and commuter trains were rerouted. Government security officials were put on alert. Fire trucks raced through the streets, while Coast Guard vessels patrolled New York Harbor, communicating with tugboats and container ships. Twelve people with complaints of minor illnesses or injuries were taken to hospitals.

The source of the odor? As of last night, city officials still did not know. But it lingered for an hour after first being reported around 9 a.m., leaving New York with another mystery on its hands and more than a few conspiracy theories to sort through.

With anxieties about gas leaks rattling the nerves of the city, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg held a press conference to assure residents that the city's air-quality detectors had found no cause for alarm. He hypothesized that the odor could have been caused by the release of mercaptan, a compound that smells like rotting eggs and is added to natural gas so people can detect and report leaks.

Throughout the day, possible culprits — among them a minor gas leak in Greenwich Village and natural-gas pipelines in northeastern New Jersey — were considered and ruled out.

The olfactory mystery in the New York region was matched by strange activity elsewhere. In Austin, Tex., police cordoned off 10 blocks of the downtown business district early yesterday after more than 60 birds were found dead overnight along Congress Avenue, which leads to the State Capitol. Air testing there failed to find a cause, but preliminary results determined that people were not at risk.

In New York, the piercing odor was the talk of Manhattan, and it called to mind another mystery: the maple syrup odor that people reported smelling on separate days in late 2005 and whose source has never been established. In yesterday's case, several people said they were overcome by the odor.

"I feel faint," said Ivolett Bredwood, a legal assistant who noticed the odor once she stepped off a New Jersey Transit train at Pennsylvania Station around 8:45 a.m. The smell trailed her as she walked to her office, at 99 Park Avenue, which was briefly evacuated. "It's an awful, nasty smell."

The widespread uncertainty and potential for danger led the authorities to take numerous precautions as thousands of reports of the odor flooded into 911 and utility hot lines.

The Metropolitan Transportation Authority briefly closed the subway station at 23rd Street and Avenue of the Americas, as well as a control tower at West Fourth Street. Service was temporarily halted on PATH lines terminating at 33rd Street.

The major gas utilities — Consolidated Edison in New York and Public Service Electric and Gas in New Jersey — checked their transmission lines and reported no leaks, changes in pressure or other abnormalities.

The city's Department of Environmental Protection dispatched a mobile laboratory to the West Side with meters to test for ammonia, chloride, cyanide, methane, carbon monoxide, hydrogen sulfide and volatile organic compounds. "That's the hardest part, finding the source," said Christopher Haas, a department specialist in hazardous materials. "Air is very dynamic."

Officials were reluctant to discuss terrorism precautions in great detail, but they said that the city regularly monitors the air with machines that can detect the presence of chemical, biological or radiological substances.

At the Port Authority Bus Terminal, some alarmed passengers thought that their buses had problems. And at the Equitable Center, on Seventh Avenue between 51st and 52nd Streets, air vents were closed to keep the odor out. Two schools were evacuated. Norman Thomas High School in Midtown was emptied for about 50 minutes beginning at 9:30 a.m., while students at Public School 11 in Chelsea were taken to Public School 33 nearby.

Jeremy Fleishman, a worker at a computer repair shop in Chelsea, said it smelled as if "somebody left the Bunsen burner on" in chemistry class. By 10:30 a.m., he said, "it mostly dissipated — or maybe we just got used to it."

At 980 Avenue of the Americas, a building that was briefly evacuated, a guard, Ralph Supino of Secaucus, N.J., said he called Con Edison but reached only recorded messages. "They were overwhelmed," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0114310

For some, it seemed logical that the odor was tied to some sort of terrorist plot. At 1250 Broadway, which was also briefly closed, a guard, Miguel Contreras of Irvington, N.J., said that thought raced through his mind when he noticed the smell upon arriving at the bus terminal on his way to work.

"You pray to God that everything is fine and it's just a leak somewhere," he said.

Adding to the alarm was the strength and duration of the odor, which may have been aggravated by a weather phenomenon known as a temperature inversion. Inversions, which often occur when a warm front moves over a cooler, denser air mass, cause the temperature closer to the ground to be cooler and the air higher up to be warmer — a reversal of the usual pattern. Inversions can trap pollutants and odors, preventing them from being dispersed upward.

David Wally, a meteorologist at the National Weather Service's forecast office in Upton, N.Y., said a warm front approached the city between 7 and 8 a.m., making it "very possible" that an inversion trapped the pollutants and gaseous odor closer to the ground. The inversion eroded later in the morning, he said.

The city recorded 4,500 more 911 calls than usual between 9 and 11 a.m., with most of the increase in Manhattan. The Fire Department responded to 450 calls, 41 of them for emergency medical assistance.

Dr. Kristin E. Harkin, an emergency-medicine physician at NewYork-Presbyterian Hospital/Weill Cornell Medical Center, said that strong odors can worsen the symptoms of people with chronic respiratory ailments like asthma and emphysema.

Some suspicion fell on New Jersey, given the path of the prevailing winds and the prevalence of chemical and petroleum facilities in the state. Calls about the smell were received in West New York,Weehawken and other places.

In Hoboken, the downtown police headquarters and several office buildings were briefly evacuated, according to Mayor David Roberts, who said he took an anxious call about the smell from his wife.

Jack Burns, coordinator of the Hudson County Office of Emergency Management, in Secaucus, said that officials had ruled out the possibility of a mercaptan spill there. He added, "If it's in New York and people can smell it in western Hudson County, that's a lot of it, whatever it is."

Michael Williams, an accountant in Jersey City, said he delayed taking a smoking break for more than an hour because the odor was so intense. "I didn't want to spark an explosion or anything," he said.

Public Safety And Profit: On The Same Wavelength? (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

Morgan O'Brien got rich the old-fashioned way, cobbling together small companies to make a big one that you've come to know as Nextel Communications.

Now O'Brien wants to get rich the Washington way -- using lobbyists. He's hired a bunch of big guns to get control of more than $5 billion worth of broadband spectrum. He wants it for a noble cause: to help first responders communicate during emergencies. But O'Brien also hopes to manage the valuable space, and that work just might make him his second fortune.

Several lawmakers, economists and interest groups are outraged. They wonder why the government should, essentially, hand over such a prime asset. "It's a get-rich-quick scheme to the tune of billions of dollars," said Jeffrey A. Eisenach, a former policy aide at the Federal Trade Commission and the White House budget office.

O'Brien defends his idea as a prudent investment for Americans who have too often seen medical and police services fall apart when serious crises strike. "I can't imagine a better or more satisfying business," he said.

O'Brien's company, Cyren Call Communications, wants Congress to set aside 30 megahertz of radio spectrum (that's a lot) now scheduled to be auctioned off early next year. Cyren Call's consultants include Wexler & Walker Public Policy Associates, the Fritts Group (run by Eddie Fritts, the ex-president of the National Association of Broadcasters), and soon (O'Brien hopes) Tom Ridge, the former secretary of Homeland Security.

Cyren Call wants the government to place the spectrum into a trust, which would, with private funding, build a nationwide wireless network for emergency workers intended to prevent the kind of communications breakdowns that happened after Hurricane Katrina and the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. When first responders are not using the system, commercial customers could.

By managing the venture, Cyren Call hopes to make its money. Thanks to the company's prodding, the proposal has been endorsed by the International Association of Chiefs of Police and the Association of Public-Safety Communications Officials-International, among other first-responder groups.

"It's a Robin Hood plan," Fritts said. "It takes from the rich and gives to the poor -- first responders."

But others see it as a money grab using first responders as a front, and they are fighting to stop it. "O'Brien's proposal is based on a lot of promises that we believe he can't keep," said Christopher Guttman-McCabe of CTIA-the Wireless Association. Also opposed are Rep. Fred Upton (R-Mich.), former chairman of the House's telecommunications subcommittee, and the Consumer Electronics Association.

Opponents note that public safety agencies are already guaranteed by law to receive 24 megahertz of spectrum and have not found a way to use it all. They also question O'Brien's financing and doubt that he can attract enough money to construct the system.

At first, O'Brien wanted the spectrum to be placed into trust without any fees to the U.S. Treasury. But after an outcry, he now proposes to pay $5 billion, an amount he would raise with the aid of federal loan guarantees -- a distinction without a difference to Cyren Call's many critics.

O'Brien said he chose the company's name because it is a high-tech version of "siren," which means both a mythological nymph whose beautiful songs lured ancient ships into the rocks and a loud blast that warns people to get out of the way.

So far, it has a lot of people wailing.The Majority Begins to Cash In

If you're a lobbyist, you can't even buy a burger for House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) under new House rules. But on Jan. 31, you can give "Hoyer for Congress" $1,000 and join him at a reception at the Hay-Adams Hotel.

For $5,000 from your political action committee, you can get really cozy with him at a "VIP private reception" that same night.

Hoyer's event will benefit his own reelection committee. But the Democratic National Committee is looking to cash in on its members in top spots on the Hill and will be featuring some new committee chairmen at fundraisers in the coming months.

Next Wednesday it's soliciting up to $15,000 per PAC for an event at Johnny's Half Shell honoring the new chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, Rep. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.).

Lobbyists will donate lavishly and show up in droves, but they will also point out the hypocrisy. "I am prohibited from buying a staff member a $20 lunch, but I can pay $1,000 or more to talk with that staffer's boss at a political fundraiser," said Howard Marlowe, former president of the American League of Lobbyists. "That's not what I call reform."Stop That Spin

Democrats have promised to practice the highest ethics as they take the reins on Capitol Hill. But the House's new travel ban is "being hyped as broader than it is," said Jan W. Baran of Wiley Rein & Fielding.

For instance, lobby groups can still take lawmakers and staffers on short trips -- limited to a day and a night or, possibly, two nights. Institutions of higher education, which spend hugely on lobbying, and nonprofit foundations can provide travel without restrictions. And lawmakers can use campaign funds to visit lobbyists' meetings -- and then hold a fundraiser once they get there to offset the costs.

"It's a partial ban," said Baran, one of Washington's top ethics experts. "But it doesn't have as many holes as the gift ban, which has 23 exceptions."Democratic Hires of the Week

The Federalist Group, to no one's surprise, was once all-GOP, but it's been on a Democratic hiring spree. Its latest addition: Moses Mercado, ex-deputy executive director of the Democratic National Committee. It also plans to change its name to something less, well, Republican-sounding.

Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld last week snared a top Democratic tax lobbyist, Robert J. Leonard, formerly chief counsel of the Ways and Means Committee. Citigroup has hired two D's: Paul Thornell, who worked in the Clinton White House, and Robert D. Getzoff, formerly with Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.). And the law firm Covington & Burling added former representative Michael Barnes (D-Md.) as a senior of counsel.

The revolving door rotated the other way, too. Daniel A. Turton, a former lobbyist for Timmons & Co., which represents corporate clients such as the American Petroleum Institute and DaimlerChrysler, is chief of staff to the House Rules Committee. Sean Kennedy, a former lobbyist for AT&T, has also returned to Congress as chief of staff to Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.).

Study: People Outside Senate Office Infected With Anthrax (USAT)

By Steve Sternberg

USA Today, January 9, 2007

A Navy-led analysis of the anthrax attack on Sen. Tom Daschle's office in October 2001 has uncovered evidence that anthrax spores released in the Hart Senate Office Building infected people outside the building.

The researchers could not pinpoint where the four exposed people worked or where they encountered the airborne spores. They apparently fought off infection without getting sick, but they turned up in a group of 20 people who were "outside the building and presumed to be unexposed," says the study in the Jan. 15 Journal of Infectious Diseases.

"We couldn't believe it," says Navy Cmdr. Daniel Freilich, one of the study's authors.

Samples from people who were exposed and from those outside the building were collected during the initial investigation, when epidemic investigators collected 6,000 swabs from noses and throats of people in and near the Hart Building and tested them for anthrax. The investigators also collected blood from people who were known to have been exposed and from people serving as controls.

DOJ_NMG_0114312

The surprise finding supports previous analyses indicating that the spores were engineered to float long distances in the air. Environmental samples revealed that spores penetrated so far into the Hart Building that the structure had to be fumigated.

The study's objective was to examine how the body's defenses respond to inhaled anthrax. Researchers focused on 124 people inside and outside the Hart "exposure zone." Two subjects had been vaccinated against anthrax before the attacks. All those with known or presumed exposure were vaccinated and given antibiotics.

Researchers found for the first time that anthrax exposure activates both major arms of the immune system. It unleashes biological antibodies to the anthrax bacteria's two deadly toxins and activates killer white blood cells that wipe out infected cells.

The presence of white blood cells in samples taken from those far from the exposure zone tipped researchers off that people outside the Hart Building were infected. The finding suggests that, in future attacks, these cells may help identify infected people and map the exposure zone, Freilich says.

Stephen Morse of the Center for Public Health Preparedness at Columbia University says the paradox that those outside the Hart Building were infected by anthrax but didn't get sick suggests that if you're young and healthy, "you might be able to get a few spores, get an immune response that's protective and survive."

Morse, who wasn't involved in the study, says it "reopens a critical question: How big a dose is necessary to cause disease?"

An encouraging finding is that anthrax vaccine, designed to protect against one of two toxins that make anthrax lethal, boosts immunity to both in people who are injected after they've been exposed.

"If you give antibiotics and vaccine early on, no matter how high the exposure, it looks like people generally will do fine," Freilich says.

State Farm Is Settling Gulf Claims (NYT)

By Joseph B. Treaster

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

State Farm, the biggest home insurer in the nation, is in the final stages of settling hundreds of lawsuits over its payments for homes wrecked by Hurricane Katrina along the Mississippi Gulf Coast, lawyers briefed on the talks said yesterday.

The settlement of 639 lawsuits for $80 million could be the first step in resolving a bitter legal battle between homeowners and their insurers that had threatened to drag on for years and has already slowed Mississippi's recovery since the storm in August 2005.

As part of the proposed deal, which other insurers are expected to adopt, State Farm has agreed to review and possibly increase payments to as many as 35,000 additional homeowners. In some cases, these homeowners received only a few thousand dollars for homes along the Mississippi coast that suffered major damage or were destroyed.

The talks do not apply to homeowners in New Orleans and the rest of Louisiana.

State Farm, under the tentative accord, would provide an average of about $125,000 to homeowners who filed lawsuits, although the payments would range from as little as about $2,000 to about $2 million.

The treatment of those cases would serve as a guide for increasing payments to any of the 35,000 homeowners who request a review of their claim, according to lawyers privy to the details.

Similar settlements with the dozen or so other insurers in Mississippi could provide hundreds of millions of dollars for recovery along the coast. It would also close a painful chapter in the public relations history of the carriers who have been portrayed by opposing lawyers as coldhearted in refusing to pay for much of Katrina's devastation.

"This is an opportunity to change public perception," said Randy Maniloff, a lawyer in Philadelphia who represents insurance companies, and who has not been involved in the talks.

The heart of the dispute in Mississippi as well as in Louisiana has been over the coverage of flood damage. Flooding was far worse in Katrina than in most previous hurricanes.

The insurers argued successfully in Mississippi that their policies did not provide coverage for any kind of flooding. But Judge L. T. Senter Jr., of Federal District Court in Gulfport, Miss., rejected the argument by insurers that if any flooding damaged a house, the insurers then had no responsibility for any other damage caused by Katrina's high winds.

More than 2,000 homeowners in Mississippi alone filed suit against their insurers. Under terms of the tentative settlement, State Farm would pay at least $50 million for claims that were previously closed, and some lawyers say the cost for State Farm could run into the hundreds of millions of dollars, depending upon how many homeowners requested their files be reopened and the extent of damage to their houses. A similar deal with other insurers could lead to an estimated 100,000 other closed claims being re-examined, lawyers briefed on the talks said.

Insurance experts said State Farm's willingness to engage in settlement talks should not be interpreted as a concession that it did anything wrong. They said a final agreement would almost certainly say, in effect, that State Farm was neither acknowledging nor denying objectionable practices. Further, they said, State Farm would not want to set precedent on future payments for flood damage from hurricanes.

DOJ_NMG_0114313

"They're willing to settle," said Gary S. Thompson, a Washington lawyer who represents individual and commercial policyholders, "because they know they would have to go through a long, arduous journey examining each and every claim."

That could take years, some lawyers said. In the meantime, State Farm's reputation would be further battered and, facing any jury drawn from the ranks of Mississippi's hurricane victims, State Farm could easily "lose most of the cases," Mr. Thompson said.

Jury selection began yesterday in federal court in Gulfport for the first trial against State Farm over Katrina damage. That case, which was not part of the settlement talks, was filed by Norman and Genevieve Broussard. Only the foundation slab of their home in Biloxi remained after the hurricane. State Farm refused to pay their claim, saying all the damage was caused by floodwaters.

The insurers have already paid $5.2 billion for damage to homes throughout Mississippi for Katrina and $10.3 billion for damage in New Orleans and other parts of Louisiana.

To close the deal, State Farm wants the approval of Mississippi's attorney general, Jim Hood, and the state's insurance regulator, George Dale, lawyers close to the talks said. As a condition of the deal, these lawyers said, Mr. Hood would be required to drop a criminal investigation into State Farm's handling of claims as well as a civil lawsuit against State Farm and other insurers.

In a statement late yesterday, Mr. Hood said: "I am working day and night attempting to get our coastal residents a fair shake in the insurance litigation." He added, "It would not help our negotiations to disclose any details at this time."

Lee Harrell, a deputy to the insurance commissioner, would not comment on the talks but said that the regulators consistently monitored insurance agreements to make sure that they were fair to both policyholders and the insurers.

Phil Supple, a spokesman for State Farm, acknowledged that the insurer had been in settlement talks but he said that a final agreement had not yet been reached. "At this point," he said, "we have no settlement."

He said State Farm would absolutely like to settle the cases: "We see it in the best interest of policyholders, the Gulf Coast of Mississippi and State Farm."

Richard F. Scruggs, who has been leading a team of about a dozen lawyers against State Farm, said that talks toward a settlement began early last fall and that he hoped to see a final agreement this week. "All the details are finalized," he said.

The last element, he said, was the approval of the attorney general and the insurance commissioner. "We are awaiting," he said, "a decision from the state officials who have helped craft the settlement."

In New Orleans, These Gumshoes Can Float Your Boat (WSJ)

By Daniel Machalaba

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

NEW ORLEANS -- Scott Chappuis was relieved when he returned to his New Orleans neighborhood after Hurricane Katrina and saw that his house had survived a 17-foot-high surge of flood water.

But there was one problem. A big shrimp trawler called the Chris & Shane was marooned in the yard. More than a year later, it was still there.

Nobody showed up to claim the 63-foot boat. The U.S. Coast Guard refused to haul it away because it is responsible only for vessels in navigable waterways. A contractor who had volunteered to help quit when the Chris & Shane started leaking diesel fuel. He didn't want to incur potential environmental liability.

The mess landed on the desks of John Rogers and R. Bruce Hammatt, of the Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality. They became gumshoes of last resort for an estimated 1,000 to 2,000 commercial and recreational boats that are still strewn across parking lots, roads, marshes and other odd spots throughout southeastern Louisiana.

It takes a lot of detective work to reunite orphaned boats with their owners. Many phone lines were never restored after the hurricane. Some owners scattered by the storm haven't returned, while others either figured that their boats had sunk or had been sucked out to sea. Some just don't care because they were paid off by insurers. Katrina also left some boat owners too poor to afford removal costs that can run as high as $90,000 for large vessels that need cranes, trucks and other heavy equipment to haul them away.

The flotilla of abandoned boats is a reminder of the fitful recovery. The city's population is still less than half the prestorm level of about 437,000 in July 2005. Population has rebounded in some suburbs, but many areas remain wrecked. Whole neighborhoods that were flooded, such as the Lower Ninth Ward, are largely empty and uninhabited. Currently only 49% of the public schools have reopened and only 17% of city buses in New Orleans are running, according to Brookings Institution, which publishes monthly updates on the city's post-Katrina recovery.

One pontoon dock beached near the hurricane-ravaged city of Slidell sprouted a cypress tree, and residents had plans to trim it with Christmas lights, tinsel and ornaments. "We were going to make a real party out of it," says Danny Green, a retired state trooper. But after the Times-Picayune ran a newspaper story about it, local officials had the hulk hauled away by truck.

Ruptured fuel tanks are seeping diesel fuel and oil into the ground and marshes. Cars must maneuver around a thicket of fishing vessels encroaching on a state highway in eastern New Orleans. About six boats are piled up at one end of a bridge in Empire, La., near the mouth of the Mississippi. After Katrina, the Coast Guard quickly restored boat traffic up and down the river, but many marshes and bayous remain snarled with boats and debris.

Coast Guard officials removed about 800 boats that were deemed a threat to shipping. Then a joint state-federal disaster-management team asked the Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality to take over the job, which involves dealing with frazzled boat owners and residents.

Messrs. Rogers and Hammatt barely knew each other before they teamed up in May, when Mr. Hammatt started wrangling with contractors hired to remove marooned boats. An administrator and adviser at the Department of Environmental Quality, he brought intensity to their detective work. "It's Hammatt, like damn it," said Mr. Hammatt, 52 years old, to one property owner recently.

Mr. Rogers, 61, spent weeks on the case of a pontoon-style party barge bearing a registration number that didn't pop up in a computer search. The break came when he realized that a "6" in the number actually was a storm-battered "8." The owner didn't want the boat, so it was sold for $1,251 through an online auction, with the proceeds going to the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which picks up certain boat-removal costs.

Once or twice a week, the two men sign out a vehicle from the DEQ motor pool in Baton Rouge and hit the road to hunt for clues and wrestle with the paperwork and personalities that must be navigated in every boat rescue. Lyle Stockstill, who runs his family's fuel dock and the Ugly Duck bar in Empire, was cooking oxtail soup last month when Messrs. Rogers and Hammatt pulled up with a "right to entry" form that would give a contractor permission to haul away crushed boats near his three-story house.

"It's terrible," Mr. Stockstill said later. "I have my place fixed up, but I have this junkyard in front." He said his wife would sign the form, adding that he would be happy to see the boats removed.

Messrs. Rogers and Hammatt are patient with struggling boat owners who show signs of trying to take responsibility for their beached vessels. At a stop to check on a trawler called Lucky Boat, they saw wooden blocks under the boat and a cleared section of sugar-cane field. "This is excellent," Mr. Hammatt said.

They have spent the past six months working on the Chris & Shane project next to Mr. Chappuis's house. It wasn't hard to track down the shrimp boat's owner, Jules B. Kain Sr., who had tied the craft to a dock as Katrina was approaching. Mr. Kain didn't have the money to move his boat, named for the children of its original owner. He lives in a FEMA trailer because Katrina wrecked his house in the Violet community of St. Bernard Parish.

"The last two years of trawling weren't that great," says Mr. Kain, 70. "We were just surviving."

This time, the roadblock was that Mr. Chappuis, a New Orleans Fire Department captain, refused to sign a "hold harmless" agreement waiving his right to sue over any damage or injuries that might occur during the boat's removal. Mr. Rogers, who had lined up $114,000 in federal funding to pay for getting rid of the trawler, says that for months the department cajoled Mr. Chappuis to sign the document. Finally, he threatened to simply leave the Chris & Shane in Mr. Chappuis's yard forever. The homeowner relented.

Last month, giant air bags were inflated under the boat, and a tractor pushed on the stern, plunging the Chris & Shane back into the water. A work boat towed away the freed vessel to be sliced into scrap metal.

Mr. Rogers joked that Mr. Chappuis wouldn't have the "biggest lawn ornament" anymore. "Right," Mr. Chappuis replied, then walked away. He says he'll miss the boat "like a headache or a hemorrhoid."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Considers Expansion Of Up To 20,000 Troops (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush will address the nation at 9 p.m. ET Wednesday about his new approach for the war in Iraq, the White House said. Bush is expected to announce an increase of up to 20,000 U.S. troops.

DOJ_NMG_0114315

White House press secretary Tony Snow said Monday that Bush "understands there is a lot of public anxiety" about the war. On the other hand, he said that Americans "don't want another Sept. 11" type of terrorist attack and that it is wiser to confront terrorists overseas in Iraq and other battlegrounds rather than in the United States.

Snow said he contacted television networks Monday morning to request air time for the president's speech, to be delivered at the White House. He said the administration welcomes a debate about Bush's new policy.

ON DEADLINE: Your comments | Video

"I think it's important to get congressional support," the spokesman said. Yet he would not say whether Bush will seek specific congressional approval for his new strategy.

"Rather than me jumping out and talking about resolutions and budget items and all that, I'm not going to do it," Snow said. "But there will be a debate about the particulars in the way forward, as there should be. We welcome it."

Bush's decisions, more than two months in the making, already are drawing criticism from new Democratic leaders in Congress who say it is time to begin ending the war, not to send in more U.S. forces.

The proposal also includes new programs for jobs, reconstruction and political assistance in Iraq, according to two administration officials who have been briefed on it.

The officials, who spoke on the condition they not be identified because the president has not made final decisions, said increases would come in phases that could add up to 20,000 troops over the next several months. It is unclear how long the additional troops would stay.

The plan includes up to $1 billion in economic assistance, such as job creation and reconstruction projects, the officials said. It also calls for political assistance, including help for human rights groups and political organizations, in an effort to promote peaceful reconciliation among warring Shiite and Sunni factions.

Previous reconstruction efforts have faced serious problems and controversies, including repeated power outages and the awarding of no-bid contracts to U.S. companies.

Elements of the plan emerged over the weekend in The Wall Street Journal and The New York Times.

The Times reported today that the new policy will set out a series of benchmarks that the Iraqi government will be expected to meet to try to ease sectarian tensions and stabilize the country politically and economically.

The newspaper, quoting unidentified senior administration officials, said these goals would include measures to bring more Sunnis into the political process, finalize a plan for distributing oil revenue and ease the government's policy toward former Baath Party members.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has announced plans to increase the number of local forces in Baghdad.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., appearing on CBS' Face the Nation, said Sunday that Bush would have to justify any troop hike to the new Congress. "This is new for him because up until now, the Republican Congress has given him a blank check with no oversight, no standards, no conditions," she said.

On Friday, Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., sent a letter to Bush opposing any U.S. troop increase. The letter said, "Surging forces is a strategy that you have already tried and that has already failed."

White House spokesman Alex Conant noted that Pelosi said she wants to succeed in Iraq, and "we're interested in any ideas that lead to success."

"The president looks forward to addressing the American people next week on the way forward in Iraq," Conant said.

In developing a new Iraq policy, the administration has changed the military leadership in Iraq.

Gen. David Petraeus, a supporter of U.S. force increases in Iraq, will head the multinational force there. He'll replace Gen. George Casey, who expressed skepticism over whether an increased U.S. military presence would be productive, and is being promoted to Army chief of staff.

Bush has also accepted the Pentagon's recommendation that Adm. William Fallon replace the retiring John Abizaid as head of the U.S. Central Command, which includes Iraq.

The administration is stepping up diplomatic efforts in the region. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to the Middle East soon to discuss negotiations between the Israelis and Palestinians. Bush has been skeptical, however, about direct talks with Syria and Iran.

Bush would have support for a troop surge from at least two prominent senators, John McCain, R-Ariz., and Joe Lieberman, I-Conn. Both said a troop increase would help quell sectarian violence.

Bush To Reveal New Iraq Strategy (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114316

President Bush is hoping to reset the political debate tomorrow night and spur Congress to reconsider what can be accomplished in Iraq when he lays out his new war strategy, which is expected to include a temporary increase of 20,000 troops.

The president put the finishing touches on the new diplomatic and military teams yesterday that will put his plan into place, tapping the current ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, to become ambassador to the United Nations and naming Ryan C. Crocker, the ambassador to Pakistan, to replace Mr. Khalilzad in Baghdad.

That comes two months after Mr. Bush named a new secretary of defense and just days after he nominated new military leaders to oversee the conflict.

The Pentagon has drawn up options for sending about 20,000 troops, or four brigades, whose main task would be to quell the violence in Baghdad, block by block, and not let insurgents return once they are routed.

Some of the increase would come from keeping some units in Iraq longer than planned, sending other units earlier than planned and possibly diverting troops from other regions.

The White House is also creating an economic package that will be tied to certain conditions. The figure of $5 billion has been mentioned. Congress has appropriated more than $30 billion in reconstruction and redevelopment money since the war began in 2003.

White House press secretary Tony Snow would not talk about details of the president's 9 p.m. speech but said the president knows he has a job to do persuading lawmakers and the American public to support the effort.

"It's important to rebuild the sense of political unity," he said.

Many Democrats have already lined up against the strategy, saying Mr. Bush is trying to escalate U.S. involvement rather than begin withdrawing U.S. forces, as they want. But it was not clear what options are open to them.

Sen. Barack Obama yesterday said he is "investigating" whether Congress could block funding for a troop surge "without potentially reducing the resources that are available to the troops that are" in Iraq.

"It's not clear that that can be done, that you can segment off budgets for the troops that are already there from additional troop levels," said Mr. Obama, Illinois Democrat. "It creates a difficult situation for Democrats."

House Appropriations Committee Chairman David R. Obey, Wisconsin Democrat, said it is "very complicated" to chop a troops appropriations bill into pieces, and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said withholding funds for U.S. troops is "off the table."

Mr. Snow said the White House hopes critics take time to evaluate what Mr. Bush proposes.

"I know it's tempting to think: Boy, this is going to set off big old political firestorm, and it very well may. But on the other hand, it may actually set off a period of reflection and constructive activity," Mr. Snow said.

The president does have some supporters.

Sen. Joe Lieberman yesterday renewed his calls for Congress to support sending roughly 20,000 more troops to Iraq.

"In war, there are two exit strategies. One is called victory. The other is called defeat," said Mr. Lieberman, Connecticut independent. "America has too much on the line in Iraq to accept defeat."

He and Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, sent a letter to the president urging him to increase troop levels and calling redeployment and withdrawal "the option of losing."

British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Mr. Bush's strongest Iraq war ally, said he will make it clear this week that Britain will not send more troops to Iraq, London's Daily Mail reported. It said Mr. Blair will insist that the United Kingdom will stick to its own strategy of gradually handing over to the Iraqi army.

In the run-up to the speech, Mr. Bush has revamped his diplomatic and military teams.

Last week, Mr. Bush nominated John D. Negroponte to assume the open slot as deputy secretary of state and tapped retired Navy Adm. Mike McConnell to take Mr. Negroponte's old post as director of national intelligence.

As for the military team, Mr. Bush accepted the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld a day after the November elections, saying he wanted a "fresh perspective" on Iraq. He is also replacing Gen. John Abizaid, his top regional commander for Iraq, with his Pacific commander, Adm. William J. Fallon. In doing so, he is bypassing the man who many thought would get the job, Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, who served last year as the tactical commander in Iraq.

The top commander in Iraq, Army Gen. George Casey, is being replaced by Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, who led the training of Iraqi forces earlier in the war. Gen. Casey will be nominated as Army chief of staff, as Gen. Peter Schoomaker retires.

White House Gears Up To Sell Plan For Troop Increase In Iraq (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114317

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — The White House is planning an aggressive effort to sell Congress and the American public on President Bush's new strategy for Iraq, beginning with a prime-time address to the nation on Wednesday night, followed Thursday by a presidential trip to Fort Benning, Ga., and appearances on Capitol Hill by the secretaries of state and defense.

With Democrats vowing to oppose any plan to send more troops to Iraq, and some Republicans openly skeptical, Mr. Bush and his aides are already in the thick of an intense sales pitch. It began on Monday, when the president had back-to-back meetings with Republican senators, urging them to hear him out before passing judgment on his plan.

The sessions stood in stark contrast to the bipartisan meetings Mr. Bush held with lawmakers on Friday. Senators attending those sessions said that Mr. Bush was careful not to reveal his thinking about whether he was committed to the plan to increase troops. By Monday, though, he made his intentions clear.

"It was clear that he has thought long and hard about this change in strategy," said Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, who supports the troop increase. "He emphasized that this is not just about more troops. That's just one small component of it. It's a change in economic, military and political strategy."

White House officials were still planning details of the speech on Monday. The president's aides were contemplating having Mr. Bush deliver it from the White House Map Room, a site replete with the history and imagery of World War II — imagery that Mr. Bush has invoked as he has sought to compare the campaign against terrorism to the struggle against totalitarianism and the Nazis. But the Oval Office, a more traditional setting, was also being considered.

Mr. Bush's aides are planning a highly orchestrated introduction of the plan. Before Wednesday night's speech, which is expected to last about 25 minutes, reporters will receive briefings from senior administration officials, and leading members of Congress will be notified of the president's intentions.

On Thursday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates are scheduled to testify before Congress, and both are expected to make trips to the Middle East soon to drum up support from international allies.

"All the world is really watching," the White House press secretary, Tony Snow, said Monday, "and it is important to get this right."

The president himself will go on the road on Thursday, to Fort Benning, a site chosen because its soldiers are heavily involved in operations in Iraq. A senior administration official involved in shaping the strategy said the president would follow Wednesday night's speech with less formal remarks to the troops.

"He will thank them, and explain, just like he will have the night before to the American people, some of the specifics of the new way forward," the official said.

The official said the strategy also included continuing consultation with members of Congress. "It's not just one speech. This is so complicated you couldn't do it all in one speech. So there will be an ongoing and sustained effort to educate the American people."

Despite Mr. Bush's insistence that he does not govern by polls, the White House is acutely aware that the vast majority of the American public disapproves of the job Mr. Bush is doing in Iraq. But advisers to the president believe that the public is willing to give Mr. Bush another chance — especially if he puts forth a policy that is heavy on specifics.

The president's advisers are also mindful of polls showing that while the public wants the situation to improve in Iraq, it does not necessarily favor immediate withdrawal.

"They're going to cast it as a choice between withdrawal and surge," said one Republican strategist close to the White House. "The public is not for immediate withdrawal or even a quick withdrawal, but they're not for the status quo. I think they feel as if the public is more likely to support the president's position, which is putting a stake in the ground in Iraq and saying were going to try to win."

The hope is that Mr. Bush can win over the public, and bring Congress along. But it might be a tough sell. At the White House, Mr. Bush told skeptical senators that he came away from a recent meeting in Jordan with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq persuaded that Mr. Maliki was committed to moving toward national reconciliation.

At least two Republicans, Senators Gordon Smith of Oregon and Olympia Snowe of Maine, said they were not convinced.

"I expressed reservations," Ms. Snowe said. "I said, 'Why should we expect any different result than previously,' that I didn't believe the Maliki government had demonstrated the political will or capacity or resoluteness for reconciliation, that the reason Americans are not supporting the war is because they see Iraqis fighting among themselves rather than for themselves, and I didn't see the surge addressing the root causes of the violence."

Mr. Smith, who delivered a speech on the Senate floor before Christmas saying he was at the end of his rope on Iraq, said: "What this sets up is a classic war powers confrontation between the White House and the Congress. Clearly he has the powers to commit troops; the question is whether the Congress has the convictions to deny funding."

The senator said he, for one, does not have the appetite for that. "It would be a dishonorable thing," he said, "to budget away the bullets."

DOJ_NMG_0114318

A Big Speech Is A First Step; Follow-up Key (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — When President Bush addresses the nation Wednesday about a "new way forward" in Iraq, it will be just the first of many steps he'll take to sell his plan to Congress and the public.

Presidents have long made the most of their bully pulpit to set the tone for the nation or to deliver news, whether it was Franklin Roosevelt telling a Depression-ravaged nation in 1933 that "the only thing we have to fear is fear itself" or Lyndon Johnson shocking the country in 1968 by using a speech about Vietnam to say he would not run for re-election.

Whether a presidential speech can make a difference depends on the follow-up, analysts say.

"All he can do is start a long-term process, which is going to require performance much more than promise," says George Edwards, a political science professor at Texas A&M University.

Bush addresses the nation at 9 p.m. ET Wednesday, then goes to Fort Benning in Georgia on Thursday to discuss the war in Iraq with Army troops there. Bush has been considering many options for the Iraq war, including a temporary increase in the number of U.S. troops in Iraq.

Members of Bush's Cabinet, including Defense Secretary Robert Gates and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, will explain the plan to Congress during hearings that begin Thursday.

Kathleen Hall Jamieson, director of the Annenberg Public Policy Center at the University of Pennsylvania and co-author of a book on presidential rhetoric, Deeds Done in Words, says it is rare for presidents to turn around public opinion with a single speech. Major addresses, however, can set the stage for public support later if policy changes are working.

"He's confronting the public perception this is a failed policy," Jamieson says.

Presidential counselor Dan Bartlett declined to discuss details of Bush's speech or the marketing plans for any policy changes. He says the address will explain a new strategy and try to convince the country that failure in Iraq would undermine national security.

"The American people need a steady diet of information and context for what's happening," he says.

Bartlett played down expectations for Bush's speech. "Facts on the ground and events determine public opinion more than anything," he says.

Bush's speech comes nearly four years after the war in Iraq began. Since then, the public has grown more skeptical that the war can be won, according to the latest USA TODAY/Gallup Poll.

Diane Heith, an associate professor of government and politics at St. John's University in New York City, says the public could reward Bush for attempting to change course in Iraq. She notes, however, that the public has become "almost used to the negativity associated with the war. I think they're going to be pretty skeptical about a change of plans."

Bush hopes words will carry weight

President Bush has delivered several memorable speeches during his six years in office, most of them dealing with the aftermath of the 9/11 terrorist attacks. Bush has billed these addresses as critical to building support for his initiatives, but the results have been mixed.

Lawmakers Get Private Surge Pitch (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush began a weeklong hard sell of his new Iraq policy Monday, meeting with groups of senators at the White House in an effort to convince them that the best way to bring U.S. troops home from Iraq is to send more, at least for a while.

Some said the president accomplished that goal; others said he did not.

"Iraq is the central front in the global war against radical Islamic terrorism. If we abandon that nation today, we risk the very same situation that gave rise to the Taliban in Afghanistan and one that created a safe harbor for terrorists like Al Qaeda to plan attacks against our people," said Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee who attended one of the meetings.

"I'm not for the surge," said Sen. Gordon H. Smith (R-Ore.), who attended another. "Does political process beget security or does security beget political process?

"I think he understands that he's betting his presidency, his place in history, on this coming out well."

DOJ_NMG_0114319

Bush did not detail the proposal he will lay out Wednesday evening, senators said. But Smith said the president appeared to be planning to send 20,000 additional troops to Iraq, primarily to stop sectarian violence and foster a better climate for political reconciliation.

"It was clear to me that a decision was made for a surge of 20,000 additional troops," said Smith, who also serves on the Armed Services Committee. "He did not affirm that that would be the number, but he said roughly … that amount. I understood it as a hypothetical."

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), who supports a troop increase and is also on the committee, said Bush "understands that giving the Iraqis the ability to stabilize their government … is not an unending commitment by the American people."

But Graham said Bush believed that setting a timeline would be a mistake.

"He'll be supportive of benchmarks, but not timetables," Graham said.

The outcome of November's election — in which public dismay over the war led to large Republican congressional losses — has put the administration under increasing pressure to withdraw U.S. forces from Iraq.

That pressure was heightened by the report of the Iraq Study Group, also known as the Baker-Hamilton commission, which called for troops' return to start by 2008.

Instead, military leaders and the White House have begun to argue for a troop increase, which they say will turn the tide against the insurgency.

Critics deride the "surge," as it is known in Washington, as an escalation that will lead to more American deaths.

In his meetings Monday, Bush made his case for the surge, arguing that it was more likely than previous plans to work because it was drafted by Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki and his government.

In particular, Smith said, Maliki is to pledge a specific number of Iraqi troops, reduce factionalism in his own forces and stop shielding key Shiite militia leaders.

The troop increase "is based on the president's belief that the political processes have been overtaken by sectarian violence, and sectarian violence needs to be quelled so political processes can be restored," Smith said. "It is his faith in Prime Minister Maliki that leads him to tack into the winds of American public opinion."

Smith is one of a number of moderate Republicans who are skeptical of the president's plan. Most Democrats oppose it.

Bush is expected to meet with more members of Congress today.

"My own sense is that what is driving the president is his belief that this is winnable — that the Iraqis are now coming to the table to keep their part of the bargain and that ultimately the American people want victory and a way forward to success," Smith said.

"He hopes to lay out a path to that success [Wednesday] night that will rewin the support of the American people. There are a lot of ifs in that."

On Thursday, Bush plans to fly to Ft. Benning, Ga., the home of Army infantry, to visit with soldiers.

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said that despite the opposition of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) to an increase in troops, they and the president were not necessarily headed for collision.

He suggested that when the scope and details of the plan became known, some criticism might be toned down. He took issue with the idea that the speech represented Bush's last chance to win support for the war.

Bush understands, Snow said, that "there's a real sense of urgency within the United States for assurance" that the administration has a plan for Iraq that will boost American security, and that Iraqis will take "leading positions sooner rather than later."

Bush Works To Rally Support For Iraq 'Surge' (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

President Bush yesterday began promoting his plan to send more troops to Iraq, bringing more than 30 Republican senators to the White House as part of a major campaign to rally the American people behind another effort to stabilize the country.

Senators who met with Bush said the president made it clear that he is planning to add as many as 20,000 U.S. troops to help quell violence in Baghdad. They also said the president is arguing that his new plan has a better chance for success than past plans because of a greater willingness of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to commit Iraqi forces against all perpetrators of violence, including Shiite militias.

DOJ_NMG_0114320

"It was clear to me that a decision has been made for a surge" of at least 20,000 additional troops, Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.) said in a conference call with reporters. Smith said Bush believes "that the political processes have been overtaken by sectarian violence and that sectarian violence must be quelled so political processes can be restored."

Aides said Bush will formally unveil his new plans for Iraq in a nationally televised address from the White House tomorrow night; the speech looms as one of the most significant of his tenure. Even administration officials and friendly Republicans said the bar is much higher for Bush than with past speeches on Iraq, given the widespread disenchantment over the war and the deep skepticism, shared even by some Republicans, that more troops are part of the answer.

In the latest Washington Post-ABC News poll, six in 10 respondents said the war is not worth fighting, three-quarters disapproved of how Bush has handled the situation, and there was no consensus about how the United States should adjust its policies in Iraq. Only 17 percent called for an increase in U.S. forces, the "surge" believed to be a centerpiece of the new Bush plan.

Bush intends to present his revised strategy as being in support of Maliki's new plan for securing Baghdad, which the prime minister outlined on Saturday, senior U.S. officials said. The mission will include an understanding that joint U.S.-Iraqi forces will confront the Mahdi Army -- the biggest, best-armed militia and one that Maliki, a fellow Shiite, has been reluctant to face down -- as well as other illegal armed factions, both Shiite and Sunni.

The United States hopes to avoid conducting large-scale operations that take it into Sadr City -- the capital's sprawling Shiite slum, with about 2 million people who overwhelmingly support Mahdi Army leader Moqtada al-Sadr. "Iraqis will take on this plan and lead it. We will be there to support them and be there to help them hold it," said a senior U.S. official briefed on the plan.

But in practice, U.S. forces have often ended up in the forefront of joint combat operations.

The president will also announce expanded U.S. teams, combining civilian and military personnel, to deploy immediately after neighborhoods have been cleared of insurgents or sectarian militias, a U.S. official said.

"It's the biggest speech of his six years," said Ken Duberstein, who was White House chief of staff under President Ronald Reagan. "If the American people tune him out, the next two years will be very rocky. He really needs to sell the American people that this is a strategy that can be accomplished."

Duberstein said Bush "needs to explain to the American people the lessons that he has learned, which will persuade them that he has gotten the message for a new approach to Iraq."

Glen Bolger, a Republican pollster, said the speech is "going to be a crucial component of how the American people re-look at the president for the last two years" of his term. The challenge facing the White House, he said, "is people have to view the speech and say, 'Oh, this is something different, and he's got a plan and it's got a shot at improving the situation. It's not just, quote, stay the course, unquote.' "

As they began previewing the speech, administration aides indicated that the president plans to address the skepticism head-on. They indicated that he will talk about the lessons the United States has learned from the past several years of failing to quell the insurgency, as well as explain why he has confidence that the Maliki government can deliver on promises that it has not met so far.

One senior White House official acknowledged it will seem "counterintuitive" to many Americans that Bush believes it is necessary to add troops in the short term to be able to withdraw them in the future. But the official -- like others, speaking on the condition of anonymity because the president has yet to formally disclose his plans -- said Bush has concluded more troops are needed to arrest the violence that he believes is impeding the Iraqi government's ability to achieve political reconciliation and economic improvements.

This official noted that the president will be proposing many more steps, including political benchmarks for the Iraqi government and an economic development program that will be heavily shaped by additional spending by Baghdad.

"An increase in troops is not a strategy in and of itself," this official said. "It is a tactic to make the new strategy successful."

Democrats continued to voice skepticism that much new and effective will come from the White House. "This is a historic speech the president is about to make. The president, faced with a choice, is choosing escalation," said Richard C. Holbrooke, a U.N. ambassador in the Clinton administration and a leading Democratic voice on foreign policy. "I don't understand what he thinks is going on in Iraq, but whatever it is, he doesn't care about politics or the Congress or his successor when it comes to Iraq. He wants to either win the war or, since that is an impossibility, pass it on to his successor."

Only Republican senators came to the White House yesterday, a sign perhaps of the president's desire to rebuild his base on the eve of a critical speech. Several seemed mixed in their comments about the president's course.

"He seemed very confident," said Sen. Thad Cochran (Miss.), the ranking Republican on the Appropriations Committee, who was in one group. "I'm convinced he's come up with a proposal that he thinks will work."

But he said he was struck by the degree of discord at his meeting. "I think I was the only senator who acted like he would be supportive," Cochran said. "I was surprised that no one said it but me."

DOJ_NMG_0114321

Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell (Ky.), who met with Bush on Friday and yesterday, said he is "convinced that this plan is substantially different than anything that has been tried in the past." He added: "I am convinced that the American people want to prevail. This gives us a chance to do that."

Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) said he "felt much better" about the plan after his 20-minute meeting with Bush, although he was reserving judgment until he saw the details. Domenici said the president's plan has been mischaracterized in recent weeks and is more complex than just a buildup of troops in Baghdad, adding that the Iraqis have agreed to spend at least $10 billion and will be in charge of the security plan.

"The plan is not 20,000 soldiers -- I wouldn't even consider the plan if it was 20,000 American soldiers, because that's too small a number for a surge," he said. "The people coming out of these meetings saying it's the lead ingredient just didn't get it. There are a lot of other important elements."

Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) said the president was asked during her meeting what would be different about his new plan, and he replied that Maliki has had a "sea change" in attitude. But she said she came away unconvinced.

"I have deep skepticism about it -- about a surge addressing the root causes of the mistrust and hatred that sects have for each other," Snowe said. "That's what I expressed. The fact of the matter is that the American people don't support this war and the way it has evolved because they see the Iraqis fighting among themselves instead of for themselves."

Staff writers Peter Baker, Jon Cohen, Lyndsey Layton, Shailagh Murray and Robin Wright contributed to this report.

Not All Republicans Convinced Of Bush's Iraq Plan (LAT)

By Joel Havemann And Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush held a second day of meetings today with senators about his stance in Iraq, but at least one senator of his own party came away unconvinced of the wisdom of Bush's reported plan to beef up U.S. troops.

Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.) said he didn't want American forces caught in the crossfire of sectarian violence that has broken out in Iraq since the United States toppled Saddam Hussein.

But Smith said he would not support a resolution to "cut off money for bullets" for the American troops ordered into combat by the commander-in-chief.

Bush had better luck today with two other senators who urged a troop build-up.

"We believe that America has too much on the line in Iraq to accept defeat," said Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, an Independent, who caucuses with the Democrats. "We also believe, based on our most recent visit there, that victory is still attainable."

"Withdrawal and redeployment is a heartbreaking signal to send to those who are fighting and dying for their freedom in Iraq," added Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), "and it is welcomed news to the extremists who want to own that country."

Bush has scheduled a nationally televised address from the White House at 6 p.m. (PST) Wednesday to disclose his Iraq plan. He is expected to announce additional troops, although such details as the size of the reinforcements apparently remain uncertain.

Smith was one of about a dozen senators invited to the White House to talk Iraq strategy with the president. He was the only one who spoke with reporters waiting outside the White House.

At a similar session last Friday, Bush heard some hardliners, including Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), urge him to make sure the "surge" in American troops strength contained enough muscle to be effective.

McCain predicted that most of the Senate's 49 Republicans, who are now outnumbered by the 51 Democrats, would ultimately fall in line behind Bush.

Smith, at least for now, did not.

"We went there to knock off a dictator, a tyrant," he said. "We've done that." Now it's up to Iraq's political leaders to put together the kind of country they want.

"I think he's betting his presidency — his place in history — on how this comes out," he said.

Smith said it would take more than the additional 20,000 U.S. troops that are commonly discussed — on top of the roughly 140,000 now in Iraq — to defeat insurgents and quell sectarian violence between Sunnis and Shiites. American forces would need at least a decade to accomplish these goals, he said.

Most Say No To Iraq Buildup (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114322

WASHINGTON — President Bush will outline his "new way forward" in Iraq on Wednesday to a nation that overwhelmingly opposes sending more U.S. troops and is increasingly skeptical that the war can be won.

A USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Friday through Sunday shows a daunting sales job ahead for the White House, which is considering a plan to deploy up to 20,000 additional U.S. troops to Iraq.

POLL RESULTS: Bush approval | Feelings on Iraq

Those surveyed oppose the idea of increased troop levels by 61%-36%. Approval of the job Bush is doing in Iraq has sunk to 26%, a record low.

"He certainly has the wind in his face," says Michael Franc, a former congressional aide now at the conservative Heritage Foundation. "But that's not to say if he were to pursue a change in policy that proved to be successful, that those numbers wouldn't flip."

Views of the war will be difficult to change with rhetoric alone, says Steven Kull, director of the Program on International Policy Attitudes at the University of Maryland. And if the public expresses strong opposition to Bush's plan, he says, Congress "may feel emboldened to exert what control they have to stop or at least make it more difficult for the president to move forward."

The survey of 1,004 adults, which has a margin of error of +/—3 percentage points, shows Americans pessimistic about the war and inclined to hold Bush responsible.

Among key findings:

·Nearly half of those surveyed say the United States can't achieve its goals in Iraq regardless of how many troops it sends. One in four say U.S. goals can be achieved only with an increase in troop numbers.

·Eight in 10 say the war has gone worse than the Bush administration expected. Of those people, 53% say Bush deserves "a great deal" of blame; 41% place a great deal of blame on Iraqi political leaders.

·By 72%-25%, Americans say Bush doesn't have a clear plan for handling the situation in Iraq. Congressional Democrats fare only a little better: 66%-25%.

Even so, Democrats take control of Congress amid a wave of good feeling. By 2-to-1, Americans say they want congressional Democrats, not Bush, to have more influence over the direction of the nation.

The president's overall job approval rating is 37%, up 2 percentage points from mid-December.

White House spokesman Tony Snow parried with reporters Monday over congressional and public opposition to the idea of sending more troops.

"I think the public opinion and public support is a very important part of this, and it is not static," he said. "You know, this is going to be fairly complex, and it's going to take people a little bit of time to think through, and we will spend a lot of time talking about it because it's important to do so."

While Bush has often said his war strategy won't be based on polls, three of four Americans say the government's decisions on Iraq ought to be influenced at least a moderate amount by what the public wants.

Views on increased troop levels differ sharply by party. Even among Republicans, though, 30% oppose the idea; 67% support it. Independents are against it by nearly 2-to-1. Democrats oppose it, 85%-12%.

And there is a yawning gender gap: 69% of women oppose an increase, compared with 52% of men.

Senator: Bush Plans Iraq Troop Surge (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, January 9, 2007

President Bush will call for sending more American troops to Iraq to calm two troubled areas — Baghdad, where sectarian violence flares daily, and the western Anbar Province, a base of the Sunni insurgency, a Republican senator said Monday. Another GOP lawmaker put the number of additional troops at 20,000.

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas, one of about 30 lawmakers who discussed Iraq with Bush at the White House on Monday, said the president offered no specifics on how many extra U.S. troops would be involved. The White House remained mum on the details of Bush's revamped strategy for the nearly four-year-old war, saying the president would announce them during a speech to the nation at 9 p.m. EST Wednesday.

"There will be surge in those two (areas), but it wasn't clear how much," Hutchison said. White House officials did not dispute her remarks.

Sen. Gordon Smith, R-Ore., said Bush told the senators that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki presented him with the plan for a U.S. troop increase several weeks ago when they met in Jordan. Bush indicated to the lawmakers he was willing to send more troops because the Iraqis pledged to meet certain criteria, which he did not outline.

"I wish I had the faith in Maliki that Bush did," Smith said of the prime minister, who has failed in the past to meet agreed-upon goals.

DOJ_NMG_0114323

Smith said the president only hypothetically discussed increasing troop numbers by specific amounts, "but it was clear to me a decision has been made for 20,000 additional troops."

About 140,000 troops are in Iraq now.

Military officials have said that Bush is considering sending two to five more brigades — between about 8,000 and 20,000 troops — to fight alongside promised additions of Iraqi security forces. Some military officials familiar with the discussions say the president could initially dispatch 8,000 to 10,000 new troops to Baghdad, and possibly to Anbar Province, and leave himself the option of sending more later.

The war has claimed the lives of more than 3,000 members of the U.S. military and was a major factor in the Republican Party losing control of Congress in the November election. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., told the president last week that "we do not believe that adding more U.S. combat troops contributes to success."

Some leading Republicans have echoed those concerns, as have top military officials who worry that sending more troops would overly strain the armed forces without assurances of success.

A central aim of the long-awaited address is to explain why success in Iraq matters to the average person. The White House knows the public is weary of war and has seen several previous campaigns by Bush to show changes in policy and win back support.

An intense campaign for the plan's rollout will unfold the day after the speech.

Bush will hold a White House ceremony to give the Medal of Honor posthumously to Marine Cpl. Jason Dunham of Scio, N.Y., who was killed in 2004. Afterward, the president will travel to Fort Benning, Ga., to talk with soldiers. Bush plans a series of other appearances in the coming days.

Smith said the president told lawmakers that he wants to "re-win the support of the American people."

The changed political reality in Washington will deny the White House complete message control.

The day after Bush's speech, Defense Secretary Robert Gates and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice are due on Capitol Hill for tough questioning on the president's policies at hearings convened by the newly-in-charge Democrats.

The White House, meanwhile, pushed back against the widespread criticism of a troop increase.

Presidential spokesman Tony Snow noted that some military officials have said, if done right, it could help bring the day closer when Iraq would be stable enough for the U.S. military presence to end. Snow also asserted that Bush's plan will include political, diplomatic and economic components that will answer many critics' concerns.

"I think what you have to do is to take a look at the whole package and how it fits together," Snow said. "What will happen is that, when the president's plan becomes known in detail, then people will be able to talk sensibly."

In addition to the troop increase, Bush is likely to call for the Shiite-led Iraqi government to take certain steps, such as reining in Shiite militias that have terrorized the Sunni minority, particularly in Baghdad. Bush also wants the Iraqi leadership to make the political process more attractive to Sunnis by enacting a plan to distribute oil revenues and easing the government's policies toward members of former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein's Baath Party.

The military escalation is expected to be accompanied by short- and long-term jobs programs. Also on Bush's agenda is a renewed effort to jump-start Israeli-Palestinian peace talks.

Bush will talk in broad terms about the cost of such efforts, with more specific budget numbers to be fleshed out later, Snow said.

Since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Congress has approved about $500 billion for Iraq, Afghanistan and other terrorism-fighting efforts. The White House is working on its largest-ever appeal for more war funds — a record $100 billion, at least. It will be submitted along with Bush's Feb. 5 budget.

Many of the approaches Bush is expected to embrace are not new. A year ago, for example, he touted efforts to remake U.S. reconstruction programs to focus on smaller goals that make more of an immediate difference in everyday Iraqis' lives.

But the Bush administration hopes that by doing such things differently — alongside an Iraqi government that, while still fragile, has matured — they will meet with greater success this time.

Snow said the White House will not seek specific congressional approval for Bush's new strategy.

While Democratic leaders have indicated that they are not considering cutting off funding for troops already in Iraq, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., said it is "under discussion" whether to prohibit any money from being spent on a troop buildup.

Bush's Task: Thrusting New Strategy On 'a Sovereign Nation' (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — It's a refrain that President Bush and his top deputies have uttered many times over:

DOJ_NMG_0114324

"Iraq is a sovereign nation, and we stay because they have asked us to be there," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in October.

"Iraq is a sovereign nation which is conducting its own foreign policy," President Bush said in November.

"It's a sovereign nation; it's their system, they make those decisions," Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the American command's chief spokesman in Iraq, said last week.

Now, as President Bush prepares to unveil his new strategy for Iraq on Wednesday night, the question is this: Can American officials compel the Iraqis to follow the new American plan?

"Let me put it this way: at the end of the day, we're going to have to do some forcing," said Kenneth M. Pollack, an expert on Iraq at the Saban Center for Middle East Policy at the Brookings Institution.

"We have to make it impossible," he said, for Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki "not to do the right thing; for him to say, 'Look, we have no choice, the Americans are forcing us.' "

But Mr. Pollack and other foreign policy experts said that may require American ultimatums that, thus far, the Bush administration has been unwilling to issue.

Taking American officials at their word, Iraq has embraced its sovereignty. Mr. Maliki exercised it in October when he contradicted American officials who said the Iraqi government had agreed to a timetable for security measures.

He exercised it again in November when he ordered United States forces to abandon checkpoints and roadblocks they had set up in Baghdad to look for a missing American soldier. He did it one more time in the last days of 2006, when he ignored American requests that Saddam Hussein's execution be delayed until legal issues were cleared up.

The tension between American will and Iraqi action — or inaction — has been growing ever since the United States transferred sovereignty back to Iraq in 2004.

That has left the United States facing a paradox. An assertive Iraqi government, responsible for security and for running the country, is needed if American troops are ever going to be able to hand over control to Iraqi soldiers and leave. But an assertive Iraqi government may not always do what it is told, which could result in an American script that the Iraqis refuse to follow.

Part of the problem is uncertainty over whether American and Iraqi leaders even have the same objectives. The Bush administration favors reconciliation, in the form of an Iraqi government representative of the country's major ethnic and religious groups: Shiites, Sunni Arabs and Kurds.

But the heavy-handed approach taken by Mr. Maliki's Shiite-dominated government toward Mr. Hussein's execution has raised questions about its commitment to reconciliation, some experts say.

Brian Katulis, director of democracy and public diplomacy with the Center for American Progress, a research and advocacy group, said he could not reconcile Mr. Maliki's approach, which caused outrage among Iraq's Sunnis, "with his stated expression in favor of national unity."

Mr. Bush's new Iraq strategy also calls on Mr. Maliki to complement h an expected American troop increase with an increase in Iraqi troops. But already, administration officials acknowledge that doubts remain about whether the promised Iraqi force, to be made up of Kurdish militia units from northern Iraq, will actually show up in Baghdad committed to quelling sectarian fighting.

The United States has requested more Iraqi troops in the past and then been disappointed. Last summer, American military commanders asked for six Iraqi battalions, as part of an effort aimed at quelling violence in Baghdad.

But that effort foundered when the United States and Iraqi authorities failed to marshal sufficient forces to hold neighborhoods after they were cleared of insurgents and militias.

"I do think it's a very serious problem in Iraq because so much of what we need done depends on the Iraqis," said Daniel P. Serwer, the former diplomat who served as executive director of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group.

To be sure, the United States is not without significant leverage — 140,000 American troops — to prod Mr. Maliki's and Iraqi leaders to dance to the American tune.

Zalmay Khalilzad, the outgoing American ambassador to Iraq, has often sought to warn Iraq's leaders that American support is not unlimited. But that effort has not had much resonance, Iraq experts say, in part because Mr. Bush has repeatedly assured the Iraqi leadership that the United States will not desert Iraq.

"We're totally going to have to start being a little more arbitrary," said Mr. Pollack of the Brookings Institution. "We hand them back sovereignty and now we continue to live by that charade."

He said that with the exception of the radical anti-American cleric Moktada al-Sadr, most of the Shiite militia leaders do not want to see the United States pull out of Iraq, and that the United States should try to use that sentiment as a lever to push its agenda.

Certainly, the Bush administration could have forced the issue of Mr. Hussein's execution, to delay it; he was, after all, in American custody, and it was an American unit that turned him over to Iraqi officials in the early hours of Dec. 30.

DOJ_NMG_0114325

"My guess is if we really wanted to delay the execution of Saddam, we could have done it," said Mr. Serwer, who is also a vice president at the United States Institute of Peace. But, Mr. Serwer said, "you can't do that every day," or American officials would undercut their own protestations that Iraq is sovereign.

Bush Policy Means Second Tours In Iraq, Military Says (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

Washington — Top U.S. military officials, expecting President Bush to order an increase in the size of the force in Iraq, have concluded that such a buildup would require them to reverse Pentagon policy and send the Army's National Guard and reserve units on lengthy second tours in Iraq, defense officials said Monday.

Under Pentagon policy, guard and reserve units have been limited to 24 months of mobilization for the Iraq war. Under that rule, most reserve units already sent to Iraq are ineligible to return.

But the Joint Chiefs of Staff have concluded that a significant buildup would require the Pentagon to overturn the policy and send Guard and reserve units for additional year-long tours.

Such an order likely would be controversial among state governors, who share authority over the Guard, and could heighten concerns in Congress over the war and Bush's plans for a troop increase.

In addition, National Guard leaders also are skeptical of calls for additional combat tours, which they fear could hurt recruiting and retention.

"If you have to sustain a surge long term, you have to use the Guard and reserve," said a defense official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the president has not unveiled his strategy shift.

Bush, set to announce his new policy Wednesday, met Monday with about a dozen Republican senators to discuss the plan. After the meeting, Sen. Gordon Smith, R-Ore., said Bush appeared to be planning a surge of 20,000 troops.

Any boost in combat forces would require some increase in reserve support units, such as engineering or intelligence teams. Because of training requirements, National Guard infantry forces are unlikely to be part of the initial surge. However, they would be needed later in the year to sustain a higher level of forces.

Defense officials say it would be difficult to build up an extra 20,000 soldiers and Marines quickly. Although there is a reserve brigade in Kuwait, building up to the full expansion might take until late March or April, an Army official said.

The increase is likely to rely heavily on speeding up the deployments of units that had been scheduled to ship to Iraq in the summer, while extending the tours of Marine Corps and Army units already in Iraq that had been due to return home in the late spring and summer.

It is unclear which National Guard units would be tapped to go, although officials said it is likely that the first Guard units sent into Iraq would be considered for the first return tours.

In early 2005, the National Guard and reserves made up nearly half the fighting force In Iraq. Today, of the 15 combat brigades in Iraq, one is from the National Guard, although there are other smaller reserve units also deployed there.

Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, a member of the Joint Chiefs, has complained publicly that the policy against involuntary second tours has forced the National Guard to cobble together units from dozens of states, rather than sending whole battalions or brigades that have worked and trained together.

"Current policies restrict our ability to remobilize reserve component units, and, in my view, the current policies are more restrictive than need be under the law and hamper our ability to remobilize the best-trained, best-led and best-equipped units," Schoomaker said in December.

In the internal debates over whether the military should send extra troops into Iraq, the service chiefs have been persuaded that sustaining an increase would require sending National Guard combat brigades for return tours as part of what the military is calling "assured access" to the reserves.

"If you increase (the force in Iraq), part of that requirement will require assured access to the guard," said a second Army official. "If you look at the brigades that are available you are going to have to require the assured access."

Some civilians inside the Department of Defense remain deeply skeptical of a change in policy -- in particular, David Chu, the undersecretary for personnel and readiness, a defense official said.

Chu and other officials have argued that the military should try to find other ways to fill the need for reservists -- by tapping Navy and Air Force units, for example -- rather than sending Guard and reserve units for second tours.

Pentagon officials said leaders of the National Guard remain skeptical of calling up their combat brigades for a second tour. Before a surge was considered, no National Guard brigade combat team was scheduled to deploy to Iraq until 2009, to give the force time to replace personnel and equipment.

DOJ_NMG_0114326

National Guard officials have argued that their units can sustain one-year deployments every six years. But recruiting and retention could suffer if the policy is changed and Guard units are remobilized too quickly, a Pentagon official said.

"They can sustain 1 in 6. Anything other than that becomes problematic," said a Pentagon official opposed to sending the Guard as part of a surge. "If there is a real and imminent danger, the National Guard people will go. They are willing to go, but they have to believe in what they are doing."

Nearly 206,000 Army National Guard soldiers have been deployed to Iraq or Afghanistan. Under current policy, those soldiers would be sent for a second tour only if they specifically volunteered. According to the Pentagon, more than 23,500 Army Guard soldiers have been on more than one deployment.

"Depending on how they execute the formula, it could leave everyone who has deployed eligible (to return) since our deployments are typically 18 months," said a National Guard officer.

National Guard leaders, the Pentagon official said, are worried that employers would be less likely to support Guard participation by their employees if units are sent to Iraq more often.

"We have the soldier, we have the employer and we have the family," the official said. "All of these need to support the war effort and if they don't, we have problems."

Times staff writers Maura Reynolds in Washington and Rone Tempest in California contributed to this report.

Third Round In Iraq To Test US Troops (CSM)

By Patrik Jonsson

The Christian Science Monitor, January 9, 2007

HINESVILLE, GA.

When he returned from Baghdad to Hinesville, Ga., last February, Army Pvt. Eric Mapes had an immediate goal: to get back to Iraq as fast as he could.

The lanky Chicagoan found in Iraq the ultimate adventure - part gritty war, part dusty romance of counterterrorism patrols that hunted insurgents across Baghdad. By contrast, he sees Hinesville, the military town outside the gates of Fort Stewart, as offering little but a Wal-Mart, seedy apartment buildings, and the detritus of a broken courtship.

"For a lot of these guys, they can't have steady girlfriends, they can't settle down, so there's nothing left for them in the US," says Private Mapes. "A lot of them - including me for a time - would rather be in Iraq."

As Mapes's Third Infantry Division redeploys this month - the first Army unit to pull three tours in Iraq - the war's wear on soldiers poses a challenge for the Pentagon and, in all probability, President Bush. The president's purported plan to boost US troop levels in Iraq, set to be unveiled this week, would require longer stays in Iraq and shorter rotations at home, raising concerns among experts and some Army brass that the new demands will push America's foot soldiers past the limits of physical and mental endurance.

"War is coming to be a constant. These [soldiers] are expatriates spending more time there than they are back here, and they're facing this experience without people back here really understanding very well what that means," says Tom Palaima, a classics professor at the University of Texas-Austin who specializes in the experience of war through history. In the thick of the action

The soldiers of the Third Infantry Division have continuously found the thick of the action. In the 19-day charge into Iraq, they stormed Baghdad. In the division's second tour, which lasted 14 months, it tried to keep the peace in the run-up to elections in December 2005. Now the Third is headed into the mouth of the dragon again: Anbar Province, one of the most deadly corners of Iraq for US troops.

The division's troubleshooting duties have taken their toll: more than 300 deaths, or about 10 percent of total US troop losses, since the war began in March 2003.

Of the Army's 650,000 soldiers who have been to Iraq so far, about 170,000 have served more than one tour, according to the Army. The incidence of post-battle stress goes up by over 50 percent for the second tour, Army surveys show. Moreover, battlefield dangers are ubiquitous: 76 percent of soldiers know someone who has been killed or seriously injured, and 55 percent have experienced a nearby explosion of an improvised bomb.

Outgoing Army Chief of Staff Peter Schoomaker told Congress on Dec. 15 that the existing deployment policy is untenable in the long term unless the Army can add a massive number of soldiers or get access to more reservists to relieve active-duty troops.

"These units continue to hit the mark when it comes to their effectiveness, their cohesion, the willingness of their leaders to stay the course," says retired Army Col. Andrew Bacevich, an international relations professor at Boston University and the author of "The New American Militarism."

DOJ_NMG_0114327

"Yet I would take seriously the expressed concerns by [Schoomaker] that a continuation of this tempo will break the Army," adds Mr. Bacevich. "He's sending up a flare that says, 'This is serious,' and his concern is very serious." Watching for stress signs

The core of the concern is the physical and mental health of the ranks, says retired Army Col. Bob Killebrew, a military analyst. He classifies soldiers into three types - those who love war, those who don't like fighting but enjoy the rest of military experience, and those who treat it as a serious profession with a duty to both country and the Army as an institution.

It's that third group, made up mostly of noncommissioned officers (NCOs), that is the most crucial to watch, says Mr. Killebrew.

"If the sergeants start leaving, then it's like the canary in the coal mine," he says. "But the NCO ranks are holding very, very firm and getting better all the time, though they're probably overtaxed."

Pvt. Jordan Brasseur, a 19-year-old from the cold reaches of Newport, Vt., leaves Tuesday for his first trip to Iraq. In an interview before going, he said the enthusiasm of the officers in his Third Division unit has rubbed off.

"All the guys have been telling me what a great time it is," said the tank mechanic. "I feel like the training has been really excellent and that I'm ready to go."

That bravado is evident in Hinesville. Around base, when they're not practicing on the Red Cloud Alpha tank range, soldiers drive beefy new trucks and souped-up Asian cars, many purchased using combat bonuses. Even the bumper stickers have attitude: "US 2, Iraq 0," one reads. Another one, on a truck plastered with Army slogans, reads: "2 MUCH 4 U." Spirits droop as public support sags

Yet all is not well in Hinesville, says Mapes, the private from Chicago. Behind the busy preparation, he describes a simmering despair, with morale dipping as soldiers see an ambivalent US public. There's also the old training equipment - which a soldier in the field takes as a sure sign of faltering public support. Mapes says the prevalence of billboards that warn of the dangers of drunken driving or of riding motorcycles too fast is the Army's acknowledgment that some problems exist.

A Military Times survey of soldiers, released Dec. 30, found that almost four years of war has hardly dented Army morale - but that fewer soldiers support Mr. Bush's course in Iraq and that a growing number believe the US public is no longer behind the military.

One difficulty for the Army is that some veterans appear to have trouble adjusting to public attitudes outside their base towns, say war experts. Part of that can be attributed to the challenge, described by soldiers throughout history, of describing their wartime experiences to civilians. In the field, battlefield realities quickly trump ideology - but the former are difficult for nonveterans to understand, says poet Charles Patterson, a Vietnam vet and author of "The Petrified Heart."

"You aren't fighting for any kind of ideology," says Mr. Patterson. "You're fighting solely to keep everybody alive. All this [stuff] about whether it's right or wrong [that] we're there doesn't matter at all" to the wartime soldier. A disquieting desire for war

In that way, overzealousness to return to the front can be a warning sign. It reminds Mr. Palaima, the classics professor, of an account written by Xenophon, a writer-soldier of ancient Greece, who described one comrade as looking happy "[only] when there was the prospect of fighting, basically exhibiting all the symptoms of post-traumatic stress," says Palaima.

Xenophon might also have been describing Mapes. After two combat tours, he begged the Army to return him to Iraq - an insistence his superiors found disquieting.

After counterterrorism patrols that netted him 10 medals, dozens of firefights, and at least three close calls with mortars and snipers, Mapes says he has received counseling for post-traumatic stress and has decided to leave the Army at the end of his contract. He will not be going for a third time to Iraq, and plans to return to Chicago to work for his dad.

He says he feels disillusioned with the war, betrayed by Bush and the military leadership, and resentful of the physical and emotional effect the fighting has had on him, including sleepless nights and a "jumpy" demeanor.

"I consider myself a realist, and I did learn something from the experience," Mapes says. "But I've come to realize I need a new chapter in my life."

The Bravest Front Of All (WP)

By Tamara Jones

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

On the day that he left, the alarm clock went off just after 4, in that shadow hour between darkness and dawn. L'Angel Hardgrove slipped out of bed while her husband was showering to brew their favorite coffee, and would remember the cozy aroma of hazelnuts filling up the hotel room. She put on a pink sweater and matching eye shadow, and Mike buttoned his uniform.

DOJ_NMG_0114328

They made their way across the parking lot to Shoney's, where the tables were full of men in fatigues. The Fredericksburg National Guard Armory was just down the road, and this past Sunday was the morning the 116th Brigade Special Troops Battalion was leaving. Mike was going to Iraq.

He was wide awake already, full of nervous energy. L'Angel watched Mike pick at some fruit, but she couldn't eat at all. They'd been married for 2 1/2 years, but she would say it was only now that she realized he belonged more to his country than to her.

At the armory, they sat on folding chairs in an auditorium full of families in huddled farewell. She nuzzled his shoulder and he breathed in the shampoo scent of her silky brown hair.

On the day that he left, she promised him that she wouldn't cry.

Mike is 25, a sergeant with intense, dark eyes and a stripe of thick black hair across the top of his shaved head. In civilian life, he was training to become the manager of a GNC vitamin store, but his voice fills with a passion L'Angel can't ignore when he says he always wanted to be a soldier. His uncle was a Marine, and his grandfather was on the USS Missouri during World War II. Mike dabbled in college for a while but joined the Guard and dreamed of becoming an officer. A high school friend introduced him to L'Angel, and they were engaged when Mike got orders for Afghanistan. He deployed a month after the wedding and was gone for a year.

L'Angel is 24, working as a babysitter and tutor in their Fauquier County home and thinking she might go back to college this fall. She thought they were both looking for their way in the world, and didn't fully grasp that he had found his until he announced that he would join the Army full time after this 18-month tour. L'Angel is still surprised to find herself a military wife. They grew up in this area, and she figured they would save their money, buy a house and raise a family here.

They hoped L'Angel would get pregnant before Mike left, but it didn't work out that way. So the spare room in their Strasburg, Va., apartment won't be a nursery, after all, while Mike is away. L'Angel might put a sewing machine in there instead. A hobby like that might be good to fill the hours alone.

On the day that he left, Mike reminded L'Angel to send him SpongeBob fruit gummies. And Swedish fish, but remember, only the red ones.

The commander called the Alpha Company to formation, and Mike lined up with the other men and shouted "Sir, yes, sir!," looking straight ahead now, not at L'Angel. A soldier in the front row had tears streaming down his ruddy face.

A giant vinyl backdrop of white stars against a field of blue decorated the stage where officers and local dignitaries waited importantly to wish the soldiers Godspeed. Vending machines hummed against the wall, and a Christmas tree still twinkled beneath the basketball scoreboard.

One by one, the speakers mentioned sacrifice and courage and pride and patriotism, and no one said the word "war."

Mike has his ex-history-major's explanation for joining Operation Iraqi Freedom, and he has the one he would remember giving his 4-year-old nephew when the little boy called him as he readied for deployment.

Where you at, Uncle Mike?

I'm with the Army guys.

Why?

We have to go fight the bad guys.

Why?

So the bad guys don't come here and hurt you.

Mike and L'Angel spent these last weeks together savoring the everyday rituals, knowing this time around that it was the ordinary moments they would miss most, like tuna fish sandwiches for dinner and watching TV together on the couch.

"Give them hell, Alpha Company!" a speaker shouted, and the men whooped back while their families applauded.

"You are the face of America! God bless you, and God bless America!"

Then the commander ordered his men to move out. The chartered buses were waiting out front.

L'Angel staked out a spot on the damp grass, and a stranger handed her a small souvenir flag. Behind her, two little girls jumped up and down in their ruby-glittered "Wizard of Oz" shoes, shouting "Bye, Daddy! Bye, Daddy!" while their mother stood silently weeping. A bulldog of an old man in an American Legion uniform held a stiff salute, waiting for the last bus to pull away.

Mike lumbered up, loaded down with his duffel, rucksack, laptop and a box lunch for the ride to Fort Dix, N.J., where Alpha Company would train briefly before shipping out to Iraq.

"Are you . . . ?" L'Angel started to ask.

"I'm going to drop my stuff," Mike answered, heading for the first bus in line. "I can't hold you with all this."

He came back and opened his arms.

"All right," he said softly.

DOJ_NMG_0114329

They held each other and kissed, swaying gently back and forth, a slow dance to the rumble of bus engines. He kissed her neck, her lips, the top of her head. "Do you want me to cry?" she teased. They had talked about this already. She knew it would just make it harder for him. Joking was the only way she could hold it together now. "I can cry if you want me to."

No, no, please don't cry.

Mike's best friend came up to give L'Angel a friendly nudge to the shoulder. "Peace out," he said, heading toward the bus. "Take care of him!" she called back.

Mike hugged her hard, and she promised to give the cats a kiss from him, and he said he would call tonight after they reached the base, and the big numbers on his soldier's wristwatch read 9:18 when he turned and walked away.

He held a piece of paper to the grimy bus window.

I {heart} you.

She blew him a kiss.

She cried on the drive home.

She stopped at the grocery store and found herself reaching for a package of razors before remembering he wasn't there to need them. She spent the afternoon dusting and vacuuming, because cleaning distracts her. She made herself some chicken noodle soup, and Mike called to say good night and tell her how proud he was of her, how strong she was, on the day that he left.

Working Syria, Iran Into Talks On Iraq (LAT)

By Paul Richter, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — Although President Bush has rejected proposals for direct talks with Syria and Iran over the future of Iraq, officials in his administration are working to find a way to include those countries in negotiations in a way that might be acceptable to Bush.

The president and top aides have insisted they will not talk to Iran until it suspends its nuclear program, and they have shunned Syria over its meddling in Lebanon. However, the White House has come under growing domestic and international pressure to negotiate with the two countries as it revamps its troubled strategy in Iraq.

Bush plans to address the nation within days on a new U.S. war strategy, which is expected to involve additional troops and stepped-up pressure on the government in Baghdad to devise political compromises to share power and oil revenue.

Last month, the Iraq Study Group, a U.S. commission whose report has topped best-seller lists, urged the administration to hold talks with Iran and Syria as a necessary step toward addressing the violence in Iraq and potential instability throughout the Middle East.

The White House brushed off the panel's recommendation that the diplomatic efforts begin before the end of 2006. But administration officials said a new multinational effort not yet underway could involve Iran and Syria.

One U.S. official familiar with administration talks said there was substantial support for "revitalizing" the effort to involve influential neighbors in seeking solutions on Iraq.

"This is something that Iran and Syria could be part of, if they wanted, but that would not be seen as us reaching out specifically to them," said the official, who declined to be identified because of the sensitivity of the talks.

The official said the effort might entail expanding a United Nations-led effort to help Iraq's economy "into the political realm" — allowing regional neighbors and world powers to use their influence to calm sectarian violence.

By including political issues, the new effort would be broader than either the U.N.-led effort, called the International Compact for Iraq, or a U.S.-led collaboration involving the United States, six Persian Gulf Arab states, Jordan and Egypt.

Those familiar with the White House discussions said they weren't certain whether any such diplomatic initiative would be announced as part of the shift in Iraq strategy that Bush is expected to lay out in his upcoming speech. One official speculated that any announcement would come later in the year.

It is unclear whether Bush approves of the efforts to find a way to involve Iran and Syria. He and top officials have opposed direct talks with either country, saying Iran is using its civilian nuclear program to develop atomic weapons and Syria is working to destabilize Lebanon.

But top aides have said those concerns don't exclude the possibility of group collaborations that could put U.S. officials in close contact with Syrians and Iranians on issues of mutual interest.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, for example, noted in a recent interview that U.S. officials met with representatives of Syria, Iran and more than 30 other countries last fall to discuss the International Compact for Iraq, a 3-month-old effort.

"We need an international approach to Iraq…. It's been our policy for some time," Rice said then.

Administration officials said such group talks differed from one-on-one negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0114330

"This is not at all equivalent to having direct bilateral talks," said a State Department official, who also declined to be identified. "But we have no objection to being in the same room with all of Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria. We want Iraq to have good relations with all of its neighbors."

Former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell and other U.S. officials worked side by side with Iranians and Syrians in an international conference convened by the Iraqi government in November 2004 in Sharm el Sheik, Egypt. The gathering, aimed at building more international support for Iraq's U.S.-appointed government, was supported by the Bush administration.

The Iraq Study Group, headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), said a new effort could help push Iraq toward political reconciliation.

"Iraq's leaders may not be able to come together unless they receive the necessary signals and support from abroad," the panel said in its report. "This support will not materialize of its own accord, and must be encouraged by the United States."

Syrian officials indicated a willingness to meet with U.S. counterparts after the release of the report, but Iran's government rebuffed a recent U.S. offer for a meeting involving Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq.

Although the administration has rejected the Iraq Study Group's recommendation for "extensive and substantive" talks with Syria and Iran, some proponents point out that the collaboration now under consideration could lead to a quiet broadening of the conversations.

James Dobbins, a former administration envoy and advisor to the Baker-Hamilton commission, predicted the administration would take part in a new regional collaboration on Iraq involving Iran and Syria.

"That's probably how the administration will square the circle of needing to move forward without actually appearing to be inconsistent" with demands that Iran and Syria cease their objectionable conduct, he said.

But Dobbins questioned whether such meetings would be fruitful without one-on-one conversations on broader differences.

"You've had multilateral meetings before, but they haven't amounted to much," said Dobbins, director of the Rand Corp.'s International Security and Defense Policy program. "The question is whether the administration takes advantage of this to engage in the kind of bilateral exchanges that would make the gatherings productive."

Other experts doubt the administration would talk to Tehran and Damascus.

"Bush is committed to the idea that these guys just aren't going to help us," said Steven A. Cook, a Middle East analyst at the Council on Foreign Relations.

*

paul.richter@latimes.com

Crafting An Iraq Plan (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON -- When President Bush addresses the nation tomorrow night, the strategies he offers for Iraq will represent months of work by J.D. Crouch, an academic turned deputy national security adviser.

Mr. Crouch, who once led graduate students on hikes, now aims to chart a new path to stabilize Iraq. He will see his belief in American military power reflected in the president's expected call to send tens of thousands of additional U.S. combat personnel to Iraq. The 48-year-old volunteer sheriff has been an advocate of the so-called surge of new troops to Iraq, administration officials said. In addition to the call for new troops, aides said tomorrow Mr. Bush also will seek a U.S.-funded effort to spur job creation and economic growth in Iraq.

The president and senior officials like Defense Secretary Robert Gates and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice are the administration's public face when it comes to foreign policy. But as in other policy arenas, the crafting of specific proposals falls to mid-level aides like Mr. Crouch. Although few in Washington know his name, Mr. Crouch has become one of the most influential figures in the administration when it comes to Iraq, the signature issue of Mr. Bush's presidency.

"He has what is definitely an inside job," said National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, Mr. Crouch's boss. "But if you care about the nuts-and-bolts of policy making -- and he does -- it's an important position to hold."

Mr. Crouch, who declined to comment for this article, received a doctorate in international relations from University of Southern California.

He came to Washington to work as an officer in the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency during the Reagan administration. When George H.W. Bush became president, Mr. Crouch moved to the Pentagon, where he was deputy to Mr. Hadley, then an assistant secretary of defense. By the early 1990s, Mr. Crouch was ready for a change. When his mentor at USC, William Van Cleave, offered him a tenure-track position at Southwest Missouri State University, Mr. Crouch accepted. Mr. Crouch was asked to return to Washington after George W. Bush took office in 2001. But his nomination as Mr. Bush's assistant secretary of defense for international security policy set off fireworks on Capitol Hill, where Democrats derided Mr. Crouch as a conservative ideologue during his confirmation hearing.

DOJ_NMG_0114331

The Democrats expressed alarm over an academic article he wrote in 1995 that called for dispatching more troops to South Korea, redeploying American tactical nuclear weapons to the country, and bombing North Korea if Pyongyang refused to abandon its nuclear program. Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the top Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, described Mr. Crouch's North Korea proposals as "reckless."

Mr. Van Cleave said the portrait painted by Democrats at the hearing was unfair. "J.D. has principles about national security: He recognizes that arms-control agreements haven't always worked well, that American strength depends on our military power, and that there are times when we need to use the military," Mr. Van Cleave said. "But those aren't 'radical' positions. The only thing he's fanatical about is USC football."

Mr. Crouch was ultimately confirmed by the Senate, and served in the Pentagon for two years before Mr. Bush named him ambassador to Romania. Mr. Crouch returned to the White House in January 2005 after Mr. Hadley asked him to serve as his deputy, and has since been in the catbird seat on a range of key national security issues.

Last fall, Mr. Hadley asked Mr. Crouch to lead an internal administration review to identify weaknesses in current U.S. policy on Iraq and to propose ways to fix them.

Mr. Crouch assembled a team of 12 midlevel aides from the Pentagon, State and Treasury departments, intelligence community, and the office of Vice President Dick Cheney. Members of the panel included Meghan L. O'Sullivan, deputy national security adviser for Iraq and Afghanistan, and John Hannah, Mr. Cheney's national security adviser.

The team began a review of the situation in Iraq. Mr. Bush wanted to sit down with senior members of his national security team the Sunday after Thanksgiving to discuss what Mr. Hadley describes as "the general contours of the way forward in Iraq," so the team met daily through November.

The panel, which held face-to-face meetings and regular videoconferences with senior U.S. commanders in Baghdad, quickly came to two conclusions about Iraq: that the situation in Iraq was dire and deteriorating, and that there weren't enough U.S. military personnel in the country to stabilize the country, said participants in Mr. Crouch's review.

The panelists had a harder time reaching consensus on how to move forward in Iraq. Participants said they considered, and rejected, an array of possible policy shifts. One idea that was ultimately discarded was the "80-percent" solution, which called for the U.S. to abandon its outreach efforts to Iraqi Sunnis and instead focus on the country's Shiites and Kurds, who together comprise about 80% of the country's 26 million residents.

Mr. Hadley said the U.S. decided to instead redouble efforts to build a coalition of moderate political figures from all three sectarian groups. This idea, along with the troop surge and the new economic-growth initiative, will be among the main themes of Mr. Bush's speech to the nation this week, other administration officials said.

Widening War? If Iraq Worsens, Allies See 'Nightmare' Case (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As President Bush prepares to unveil his latest Iraq strategy, Arab allies are worried about what might happen if the plan fails: that worsening strife could engulf the entire region, sparking a wider war in the middle of the world's largest oil patch.

The potential of a much larger regional conflict that pits Sunnis against Shiites is increasingly on the minds of both Arab leaders and U.S. military planners, according to regional diplomats and U.S. officials. Some are calling such a possible outcome the "nightmare scenario." A wider conflict appears more plausible now because, even as Iraq is separating along sectarian lines, regional dynamics are shoving neighboring nations into two rival camps.

On one side is a Shiite-led arc running from Iran into central Iraq, through Syria and into Lebanon. On the other side lie American allies Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Egypt, along with Persian Gulf states such as Qatar and the United Arab Emirates. These Sunni regimes are horrified at the emerging, increasingly radicalized Shiite bloc, largely financed and inspired by Iran, Arab diplomats say.

In the middle is Iraq, which looks less and less like a buffer between these two axes of Middle East power, and more of a no-man's land that is bringing them into conflict. Arab officials fear that if the U.S. withdraws from there, or diminishes its troop numbers in ways that Iraq's own weak military can't fill, the two sides could come into direct and bloody conflict.

The U.S. is now eager to tamp down these rising jitters over a wider clash within the Arab world. Mr. Bush, in a televised speech tomorrow night, will detail plans for reconstruction aid and a temporary surge in the number of U.S. troops in Iraq. The troop boost is meant in part to calm regional fears of a U.S. pullout. Mr. Bush is expected to send Secretary of State

DOJ_NMG_0114332

Condoleezza Rice to the region soon to help explain his new Iraq strategy in what could be her most comprehensive trip there in more than a year.

The U.S. is also pushing a wide-ranging strategy to persuade its Sunni allies that it is serious about counteracting the rise of Iran -- in exchange for Arab help in Iraq and the Palestinian territories.

Key to the effort is the continued promise to keep U.S. forces in Iraq for as long as necessary. But the U.S. is also beefing up U.S. forces in the Persian Gulf and plans to deepen security cooperation with Gulf allies. The Pentagon has proposed sending a second carrier battle group to the Gulf region. There are also advanced plans under way to knit together the air-defense systems of the six smaller Gulf states, including Qatar, Oman and the United Arab Emirates, and to build a U.S.-administered missile-defense system. Similarly, the Air Force is laying plans to step up exercises with Arab allies in the region. One proposal calls for the U.S. to hold combined air exercises with Oman and the UAE.

Contingency Plans

Arab governments are putting in place their own contingency plans in case Iraq begins to fall apart.

The Saudis have warned the Bush administration that they are prepared to aid the Sunni militias in Iraq if the Sunni population there becomes imperiled, a Saudi diplomat said. Jordanian officials have told the Pentagon that they may move troops into Iraq's uninhabited western desert as a buffer if events there spiral out of control, according to U.S. military officials. Turkish officials, who are grappling with a separatist Kurdish movement in their country, say they would oppose the creation of an independent Kurdistan in northern Iraq. They also say they are prepared to defend Iraq's Turkmen population, who share a common ethnicity with Turkey's majority population, should it come under attack. Even Syria, which the U.S. alleges has been abetting the conflict, is expressing alarm over the potential fracturing of Iraq.

"Can you imagine the effect of Iraq breaking apart and each group looking for a regional or international power to support their territorial claims or their ethnic claims?" asks Imad Moustapha, Syria's ambassador to Washington. "The repercussions will be terrible, not just for Iraq but for all the countries."

An all-out civil war in Iraq that drags in bordering countries would send shockwaves through the global oil market, potentially pushing oil prices to more than $100 a barrel, oil analysts predict. Iraq, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and Iran together hold about two-thirds of the world's proven oil reserves.

Two scholars, Kenneth Pollack at the Brookings Institution and Daniel Byman of the Rand Corp., have worked for months on a study that lays out possible consequences in a worst-case scenario, from skyrocketing oil prices to huge, destabilizing refugee flows. They argue that Iraq could become the world's premier sanctuary for terrorism and that strife there could spark minority uprisings in Saudi Arabia, Iran, Syria -- and even among Turkey's sizable Kurdish population.

Iraq's neighbors fear the increasing reach of Shiite Iran, whose expansion has been held in check for centuries by the Sunnis of Iraq. Among all of Iraq's neighbors, Iran is the one country that could clearly benefit from a possible breakup of Iraq along sectarian lines. The emergence of a large, oil-rich and devoutly Shiite Arab state carved from Iraq's southern half, with a government closely tied to Iran, would radically alter the face of the Middle East and grant more leverage to Shiite leaders in Tehran.

Core Fear

Another core fear is that a sectarian bloodbath in Iraq could draw in neighboring states, which would feel pressed to defend their own interests or to protect their brethren in Iraq.

Last month's bipartisan Iraq Study Group report sketched out such a potential sequence of events, based on interviews of senior Arab diplomats by the panel's top advisers. In one of the bleakest public assessments to date of what it called the "consequences of continued decline in Iraq," the report describes a potential cauldron of ethnic cleansing in Iraq that could draw in the country's main neighbors: Turkey from the north to prevent the Iraqi Kurds from declaring independence; Iran from the west to secure the country's south and gain control over oil fields in that region.

"Ambassadors from neighboring countries told us that they fear the distinct possibility of Sunni-Shia clashes across the Islamic world," the report notes. "Such a broader sectarian conflict could open a Pandora's box of problems -- including the radicalization of populations, mass movements of populations, and regime changes -- that might take decades to play out."

Some of the study group's top advisers contend that the process of ethnic cleansing, particularly by Iraqi Shiites trying to rid cities and regions of their Sunni populations, is already under way. "We may be about one-third through the process, with little ability to do anything about it," says Wayne White, a former Middle East intelligence official at the State Department.

But critics of the panel's core recommendation -- that the U.S. begin a rapid drawdown of American combat forces in Iraq that would culminate in a full withdrawal of combat troops by early 2008 -- say such a move would leave a military vacuum in Iraq that could open the way for an upsurge in Shiite violence against the Sunnis in Iraq.

The Sunni-Shiite split goes back to the early days of Islam, when a bloody feud broke out over which of the Prophet Muhammad's descendants should lead the Muslim faithful. Sunnis now predominate throughout the Middle East, with the exception of Iran. Shiites have recently experienced a resurgence in influence in the region, not just with the rise of Iran but also with the Shiite ascendancy in Iraq and Hezbollah's success in fighting Israel in Lebanon last summer.

DOJ_NMG_0114333

High-level Arab officials have been warning for months that if left unchecked, the current slide into chaos in Iraq could spark a regional sectarian clash, according to U.S. and Arab diplomats. They have begun to share their contingency plans with top U.S. officials, in part because they hope to jolt the Bush administration into taking stronger action in Iraq and to secure the continued presence of U.S. troops there.

Jordanian officials have suggested that if Iraq were to fall into a full-out civil war, Jordan would push troops to the border, and possibly across it, as far west as Rutbah about 80 miles inside Iraq, to stem an expected flow of Sunni refugees, says a U.S. military planner who recently met with leaders in the region.

"The danger is that if the Jordanians carve out a security zone or buffer zone inside Iraq, that the Syrians, Saudis and Turks will all follow," says the military planner. The Syrians could move into western Nineveh province, while the Turks could send troops to protect the Sunni Turkmen population in the north, he says.

Jordanian officials say they are driven by two main concerns. The first is that Sunnis fleeing Shiite oppression could turn Amman into the center of Sunni resistance against the Shiite-dominated government in Baghdad. Already the Jordanian capital is home to about 900,000 Iraqis, who make up as much as 15% of the population. The Jordanians worry that Iraq's Shiite militias could send small teams of militants to Amman to launch assassination campaigns or terror attacks against the Sunni insurgency.

"We have quite enough instability in Jordan as it is," says one senior Jordanian official.

Jordan's other big fear is shared by the U.S.'s other Sunni allies throughout the region -- that an Iraqi Shiite government closely allied with Iran could dominate the region. Jordan is one of the most uniformly Sunni countries in the Gulf. But when U.S. military officials visited the region recently, their Jordanian counterparts described with alarm how 200 of their Sunni citizens had converted to Shia Islam in recent months. The Jordanians said the converts were motivated by the Shiite-dominated Hezbollah's tough stand against Israel over the summer and the growing power of radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr in Iraq.

"It seems preposterous, but it shows how hyper-reactive they are to it," says the U.S. military planner.

Saudi Arabia, which has a Sunni-majority population but significant pockets of Shiites in many of its oil-rich provinces, has also voiced alarm over the growing popularity of both Hezbollah and the Sadr movement in its own eastern expanses. "The Shiites in those provinces love Sadr and Nasrallah," Hezbollah's leader, the U.S. military planner says. Saudi officials also fret over the prospect of a deepening civil war in Iraq.

Huge Challenge

A huge challenge for the U.S. is that many of its Sunni allies in the region already view the current situation in Iraq as a defeat for their cause and a near-complete victory for Iran. "They refer to the Shiite Islamic parties in Iraq as the Persians," the military planner says, using the historical term for Persian-speaking Iranians.

In recent weeks, some of the U.S. allies in the Gulf have quietly advocated breaking up the Iraqi government in favor of a military dictatorship, governed by a secular Shiite, a Sunni and a Kurd, according to the military planner. The military dictatorship would rule until the country could be stabilized and new elections held. Religious parties, like those that currently dominate Iraqi politics, would be banned from participating in future elections.

U.S. officials have ruled out such an option, saying that it runs contrary to their desire to bring democracy to Iraq and that it would never be accepted by Iraq's Shiites, who are already largely in control.

Some Middle East analysts dismiss the possibility of intervention in Iraq by its Sunni-led neighbors, saying these fragile regimes are interested foremost in their own survival. But U.S. officials say the paranoia surrounding Iran and the rise of Shiite influence could lead them to conclude that their survival depends on intervening on behalf of Iraq's Sunni minority. Some of the war-gaming, both within the Bush administration and among outside experts, focuses on such potential scenarios.

Under one scenario, sketched by Mr. White of the Iraq Study Group, Iraq's Shiites would launch an extensive campaign to drive the Sunnis out of large areas of central Iraq. Fearing a rout of the Sunni population, Saudi Arabia would finance a large-scale counteroffensive, funneling aid to former Iraqi military officers through Jordan, which has longstanding ties to Iraq's Sunni military class. Egypt would do its part by providing guns, munitions, artillery and vehicles.

"What people forget is that the Sunnis comprise nearly the entire top brass of the former Iraqi army and nearly all of the old Republican Guard," says Mr. White. "You give them the guns and proper equipment and they will become a formidable force against the Shiite militias."

The possibility of a full-blown civil war in Iraq dissolving into a regional conflict "is a scenario that nearly everyone was rejecting just a few months ago," he says. "Not anymore."

Past Time To Get Real On Iraq (NYT)

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114334

We've been down this road before. This time, it has to be different.

There have been too many times that President Bush has promised a new strategy on Iraq, only to repeat the same old set of failed approaches and unachievable objectives. Americans need to hear Mr. Bush offer something truly new — not more glossy statements about ultimate victory, condescending platitudes about what hard work war is, or aimless vows to remain "until the job is done."

If the voters sent one clear message to Mr. Bush last November, it was that it is time to start winding down America's involvement in this going-nowhere war.

What they need is for the president to acknowledge how bad things have gotten in Iraq (not just that it is not going as well as he planned) and to be honest about how limited the remaining options truly are. The country wants to know how Mr. Bush plans to end its involvement in a way that preserves as much of the nation's remaining honor and influence as possible, limits the suffering of the Iraqi people and the harm to Iraq's neighbors, and gives Iraqi leaders a chance — should they finally decide to take it — to rescue their country from an even worse disaster once the Americans are gone.

The reality that Mr. Bush needs to acknowledge when he speaks to the nation tomorrow night is that the Iraqi government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki is feeding rather than restraining Iraq's brutal civil war. The Iraqi Army cannot be relied on to impose order even in Baghdad, while the Iraqi police forces — dominated by sectarian militias — are inciting the mayhem.

Mr. Bush must acknowledge that there is no military solution for Iraq. Whatever plan he offers needs to start with a tough set of political benchmarks for national reconciliation that the Iraqi government is finally expected to meet. It needs to concentrate enough forces in Baghdad to bring some security to streets and neighborhoods, giving Iraq's leaders one last opportunity to try to bargain their way out of civil war.

His plan needs to lay out tight timetables in which the Iraqis must take major steps to solve fundamental issues, including equitably dividing their oil wealth and disarming vengeful militias. There must also be a clear and rapid timetable for achieving enough stability in Baghdad to hand back significant military responsibilities to the Iraqis.

The last time America presented Mr. Maliki with a set of political benchmarks, he bluntly rejected them. If he does that again, there is no way America can or should try to secure Iraq on its own. Mr. Bush must make clear to both Iraqis and Americans that without significant progress, American forces will not remain.

We're under no illusions. Meeting those challenges is going to be extremely tough. And Iraq's unraveling may already be too far gone.

For Mr. Bush, this means resisting any vague Nixonian formula of "peace with honor" that translates into more years of fighting on for the same ever-receding goals. Democrats in Congress should also resist euphemistic formulas like "phased redeployment," which really means trying to achieve with even fewer troops what Washington failed to achieve with current force levels.

Nor can America simply turn its back on whatever happens to Iraq after it leaves. With or without American troops, a nightmare future for Iraq is a nightmare future for the United States, too, whether it consists of an expanding civil war that turns into a regional war or millions of Iraq's people and its oil fields falling under the tightening grip of a more powerful Iran.

Mr. Bush is widely expected to announce a significant increase in American troops to deploy in Baghdad's violent neighborhoods. He needs to explain to Congress and the American people where the dangerously tapped-out military is going to find those troops. And he needs to place a strict time limit on any increase, or it will turn into a thinly disguised escalation of the American combat role.

The Washington Post reported yesterday that just under 23,000 Iraqi civilians and police officers died violently in 2006, more than 17,000 of them in the last six months. That is a damning indictment of the Maliki government, and of current American military strategy.

That is the Iraq that Americans want Mr. Bush to deal with tomorrow night.

No More Middle East Crusades (LAT)

By Dimitri K. Simes, Dimitri K. Simes Is Publisher Of The National Interest Magazine.

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

Europeans couldn't export Christianity 1,000 years ago; what makes us think we can export democracy now?

JUST 10 DAYS after Iraq's government managed to transform Saddam Hussein's execution from an act of justice into a sectarian revenge killing, the Bush administration is planning a troop "surge" to try to help a leadership that is simultaneously too brutal and too wimpy to bring stability and democracy to Iraq.

But sending more brigades to pursue the same crusade is unlikely to bring success — at least not on an American political timetable. The problem is not just the incompetent management of the war's aftermath. The problem is that the crusade to reshape the Middle East that led to the U.S. invasion of Iraq precludes anything that could be legitimately called victory.

DOJ_NMG_0114335

The debacle that is Iraq reaffirms the lesson that there is no such thing as a good crusade. This was true a thousand years ago when European Christian knights tried to impose their faith and way of life on the Holy Land, pillaging the region in the process, and it is equally true today. Divine missions and sensible foreign policy just don't mix.

For President Bush and his neoconservative supporters, the invasion of Iraq was from the outset about much more than dismantling (as we now know nonexistent) weapons of mass destruction, cutting Hussein's (also nonexistent) ties to Al Qaeda and removing a murderous and unpredictable dictator from power. They also sought to depose an Iraqi regime hostile to the United States and Israel — and to demonstrate to Arabs and others in the greater Middle East who was the real master of the region.

The dismantlement of the Iraqi army and government machinery, now conveniently blamed on L. Paul Bremer III, was a logical outcome of the crusading mind-set. Bush wanted an Iraqi government to catalyze his transformational plan for the region. That is why less radical approaches than "remaking" Iraq were contemptuously dismissed.

Instead, group-think buttressed the shaky propositions that democracy could easily take root, that a democratic Iraq could move to recognize Israel and continue to contain Iran, that a small force could get the job done. That Iraq's neighbors — which in 2003 were often and quite publicly warned that they were next in line for forcible regime change — would accept American-style stabilization of Iraq defies belief.

Yet faith is once again demanded of the American people. Just as the Crusaders a millennium ago blamed their defeats in the Middle East on a lack of faith, we are told today that it is the realists — those heretics with an insufficient faith in the ability of American values and power to rapidly transform the world — who are poised to sabotage the entire project for spreading freedom throughout the region, that the realists and their false gods of stability and national interest will seduce Americans away from their true calling of spreading liberty throughout the world, even at the barrel of a gun.

The truth is that no surge and no amount of faith can rescue this crusade from failure. The alternative is not to "cut and run" or to withdraw troops but rather to seek a difficult solution that is the only plausible one: reshape U.S. policy in the Middle East to establish a manageable political context for the war. The Iraq Study Group was right on two counts: Sending more troops to Iraq and continuing to work with the current Iraqi government is a nonstarter. And Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria, need a stake in stabilizing Iraq and won't help without U.S. assurances that they will not be next in line for regime change.

A new approach to the Israeli-Palestinian dispute is also essential. The perception that the United States fully supports Israeli policies makes it more difficult for friendly neighbors of Iraq, such as Saudi Arabia and Jordan, to provide much help. And we should accept that democracy in Iraq, to say nothing about a democratic Iraq as a role model for the region, might have to wait for better times.

Under current circumstances, the emergence of a tough but relatively benign leader who could establish law and order may not be the worst outcome. Of course, it is not appropriate for the United States to select a new strongman for Iraq. But many Iraqis are now tempted to put someone in charge who could quell the chaos. Washington might do well to ponder the limits of the U.S. responsibility to defend the corrupt and inept government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki — a government heavily infiltrated by the very militias that the troop surge is supposed to destroy.

While not as murderous as Hussein, such a leader is unlikely to look like a knight in shining armor in the Bush administration's pro-democracy crusade — but he may just allow the United States to get out of the Iraqi quagmire without losing its prestige or leaving a sanctuary for Al Qaeda.

An Escalation Of American Blood (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

A surge in the number of troops in Iraq might have helped in 2003 or early 2004.

But in 2007, President Bush's plan seems to represent a warmed-over variant of approaches that have already been tried and mostly failed, that are opposed by some top American military commanders and ordinary Iraqis alike, and whose most likely outcome will be many more Americans in body bags or wheelchairs.

The reality is that we've already tried surges. There was one of 20,000 troops in early 2004, a similar one in the fall of 2005, and one a bit smaller in the summer of 2006.

As recently as July, Mr. Bush cheerily described a plan "to deploy additional American troops and Iraqi security personnel in Baghdad in the coming weeks." He explained that this would "bring greater security to the Iraqi capital ... [and] root out those who instigate violence."

By October, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the chief U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, was acknowledging that the recent troop increases "had not met our overall expectations of sustaining a reduction in the levels of violence."

DOJ_NMG_0114336

Proponents of escalation cite the example of Tal Afar, a town in northwestern Iraq. U.S. forces there have met some genuine success since September 2005 with the "clear, build and hold" strategy that Mr. Bush apparently now favors for Baghdad.

But Tal Afar is only about one-thirtieth the size of Baghdad, and it isn't even Arab: its people are mostly members of the Turkmen minority. Trying to replicate that (limited) success in Baghdad is a fool's errand.

In Tal Afar, there was one U.S. soldier for every 40 residents. Using the same ratio in Baghdad would require 150,000 troops, sustained for more than a year. That's impossible.

Mr. Bush's surge may be just big enough to expose more troops to danger and to let the Iraqi government off the hook, without being big enough to achieve security.

Don Rumsfeld was wrong on just about everything in Iraq — except the downside of additional troops there: "More forces, U.S. and coalition forces, create the impression of an occupation," he said. Indeed, any expansion of our military presence is likely to bolster anti-American radicals, like Moktada al-Sadr.

Sure, Iraq promises to help in the crackdown. But my bet is that — once again — Iraqi leaders will make big pledges and then let us do the heavy lifting.

In any case, sending in even more young Americans won't help counterinsurgency efforts when, according to an American-sponsored poll conducted in September, 78 percent of Iraqis believe that the American troop presence is "provoking more conflict than it is preventing." That's why Iraqis overwhelmingly favor a timetable for a U.S. withdrawal, and it's one reason I do as well.

Mr. Bush is right about the risks of withdrawal: our pullout could be followed by a vast bloodbath and by a regional war in which Iran backs Iraqi Shiite militias and Saudi Arabia and Jordan back Iraqi Sunnis (with Turkey marching into Kurdistan). But all that may unfold anyway, and the prospect of withdrawal may be the best hope to galvanize Iraqi factions to take steps to avert such a catastrophe.

If Mr. Bush succeeds in escalating our military involvement, it's almost inevitable that many more Americans will be killed and injured. The focus has been on fatalities, but by some counts there have been 16 American service injuries for every death. That's partly a tribute to improvements in military medicine, for in Vietnam there were 2.6 injuries per American fatality.

All told, between 22,000 and 50,000 Americans have been injured so far in Iraq (depending on who does the counting); the higher number is one-third as many as in the entire Vietnam War. Linda Bilmes, a Harvard scholar who has written a new report on the war injuries, notes that the backlog for veterans' disability claims has risen more than fivefold since 2000, and she cites horror stories like that of a staff sergeant who suffered severe brain injuries and then had his pay stopped and utilities cut because of a bureaucratic error.

"If the new Congress really wants to support our troops," Ms. Bilmes writes, "it should start by spending a few more pennies on the ones who have already fought and come home."

That's a responsibility Mr. Bush should assume as well. And when he speaks to the nation to urge more troops in Iraq, he needs to explain why the back alleys of Baghdad are the best places to invest additional buckets of American blood.

The Least Immoral Choice (WP)

By Sally Quinn

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

I am an Army brat. I have seen the effects of war firsthand. My father fought in World War II and in the Korean War. I lived on Army posts and saw or heard about the human devastation of war each day.

During the Korean War my father served on the front lines, leaving us behind in Tokyo. Every day I read in the newspaper Stars and Stripes about soldiers being killed. I fell ill because of the emotional stress of having him at war, and at age 10 I ended up in Tokyo General Hospital.

The hospital was filled with severely wounded soldiers who had been airlifted from Korea. It was decided that having parents visit their sick children would be too disruptive, so my mother wasn't allowed to see me for months at a time.

Finally, after nearly nine months, I was transferred to Brooke General Hospital in San Antonio. My mother, younger brother, younger sister and I were placed on an Army hospital plane with the most seriously wounded soldiers, who were to fly back with us. There were no seats on the plane, only three rows of litters, five high, all filled with badly wounded and dying soldiers, most of them still kids themselves. I was strapped to my litter, as they were, but my mother, brother and sister were ambulatory.

The thing I remember most vividly is the soldiers screaming in pain and crying out for their mothers. My mother went up and down the aisles holding their hands, stroking their brows, giving them sips of water. My sister helped light their cigarettes. Many of them were amputees. Some had no stomachs, some had no faces.

DOJ_NMG_0114337

The soldiers in the litters above and below me both died, blood dripping from their wounds. Many other soldiers died while we were in the air. We had to stop in Hawaii overnight to refuel and to leave the bodies.

I hope that when President Bush discusses sending more troops to Iraq, knowing that we will have to pull out sooner rather than later, that the conversation comes around to the human suffering. Does anyone at the table ask about the personal anguish, the long-term effects, emotional, psychological and financial, on the families of those killed, wounded or permanently disabled?

When I hear about the surge, all I can think of is those young soldiers on the plane to Texas. We have already lost more than 3,000 soldiers, and many more have been wounded and disabled.

We have three choices here. All three are immoral. We can keep the status quo and gradually pull out; we can surge; or we can pull out now. When I think about those young soldiers on that plane coming back from Japan years ago, I believe pulling out now is the least immoral choice.

The writer is a co-moderator of On Faith, an online conversation on religion athttp://newsweek.washingtonpost.com/onfaith.

Democrats Split Over Their Approach To Iraq (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — The new Democratic majority in Congress is divided over how to assert its power in opposing President Bush's plan to send more troops to Baghdad, as leaders explore ways to block financing for a military expansion without being accused of abandoning American forces already in Iraq.

While Democrats find themselves unusually united in their resistance to a troop increase, party leaders are locked in an internal debate over how far to go in objecting to the administration's Iraq strategy. The White House has invited some Democrats to meet with Mr. Bush before he gives his Iraq speech on Wednesday, even as others have scoured the history books to find cases when Congress has reined in the commander in chief.

In the most aggressive of the new tactics, Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, has said he will introduce legislation on Tuesday to require the president to gain new Congressional authority before sending more troops to Iraq. The bill is the first proposal in the Senate that would prohibit paying for an increase in American troops over their level on Jan. 1.

"Is there any American in this country who thinks the United States Senate would vote to support sending American troops into a civil war in Iraq today?" Mr. Kennedy said Monday in an interview. "Is there any American that believes this? I don't think so, but that is what's happening, and we have to do everything we can to insist on accountability."

The Kennedy plan is intended to provide Democrats with a road map for how to proceed in Iraq. Mr. Kennedy, as he begins his 45th year in the Senate, recalled that Congress interceded during conflicts in Vietnam and Lebanon, and he said Democrats should not hesitate to do so in Iraq.

The new House speaker, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, has similarly suggested that Democrats consider blocking financing for a troop increase, and the Senate majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, vowed Monday "to take a look at it."

But the House majority leader, Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, has not endorsed the idea. Other Democrats, either looking ahead to a possible presidential candidacy or their own re-elections, have also distanced themselves from such a proposal, fearful of being cast as opposing the troops.

"I don't think we should be pulling back any funds," said Senator Amy Klobuchar, a Minnesota Democrat who was elected in November. She said she would oppose a proposal to block money for a troop increase.

The Democratic Party sailed to victory in midterm elections in the fall on a promise to change course in Iraq. Still, there is little consensus over how to proceed.

Some Democrats are urging an immediate withdrawal of troops and a drastic reduction in war spending. Others are calling for a gradual re-deployment of troops to move them out of Iraq. Still other Democrats are waiting for Mr. Bush to present his plan before criticizing it.

The expectations set by the elections, Democrats say, present a complicating challenge as they begin to govern.

Take, for example, Mr. Reid, who said on Dec. 17 that he would support a plan for a temporary increase in increase troops. Two weeks later, he announced his opposition, saying his change had nothing to do with other Democratic senators having spoken out against it, but rather with military officials having disagreed with a call for more troops.

Senator Russell D. Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin, said he believed that his party lost the White House in 2004 because of Iraq. "My concern now is that too many Democrats are going to want to play it safe on this issue and not take the strong stand that American people demand," he said Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0114338

The pressure from war critics on the Democratic left has been particularly intense. “The bottom line is that they were elected on a mandate to get the nation out of the mess in Iraq,” said Eli Pariser, the executive director of MoveOn.org, a liberal political action committee.

By law, Congress can limit the nature of troop deployments, cap the size of military deployments and cut financing for existing or prospective deployments.

Since 1970, there have been dozens of occasions in which Congress has tried to step into military action, from Haiti to Bosnia to Kosovo, according to a memorandum being sent Tuesday to lawmakers by the Center for American Progress, a liberal policy group.

Representative Adam Smith of Washington, vice chairman of the moderate New Democratic Coalition, said he feared that withholding financing — even for new troops being sent to Iraq — could have a detrimental effect on all forces.

“I don’t want our troops to be caught between the president and Congress in a political fight,” said Mr. Smith, who was to receive a briefing on Tuesday at the White House. “If there are any risks that our efforts to slash the budget would place them at greater risk, that would be unacceptable to me.”

But Democrats who are trying to stop Mr. Bush’s proposed troop increase, a group led by Mr. Kennedy, say their proposal to block financing will apply only to new troops. Mr. Kennedy said he hoped that his legislation would be urgently considered by the full Senate, but acknowledged that it remained an open question whether his Democratic leaders would schedule it for a quick vote.

“The importance of this legislation is that it will apply now before we could get the escalation,” he said. “If you wait, this thing is going to be past. I’m not sure that all of our colleagues in the Senate understand that, quite frankly.”

Democrats May Deny Funds For Iraq Surge (AP)

By David Espo

AP, January 9, 2007

In a blunt challenge to President Bush, the leader of the Senate's new Democratic majority said Monday he will "look at everything" within his power to wind down the war in Iraq, short of cutting off funding for troops already deployed.

"I think we've got to tell the president what he's doing as wrong. We've got to start bringing our folks home," said Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, in remarks that portend a struggle if, as expected, Bush announces plans later this week for an increase in troop strength of 20,000.

Another senior Democrat, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, said one option under consideration would be for lawmakers to vote on denying the use of funds for any increase in the U.S. deployment. Officials said late Monday night that the Massachusetts Democrat was preparing legislation that would require Congress to approve the deployment of more troops, and was hoping for a roll call on the topic swiftly — before any increase is implemented.

More broadly, Reid signaled that Bush's expected call for an additional $100 billion for the war would receive close scrutiny from newly empowered Democrats.

"We have a platform we didn't have before, Leader Pelosi and I, and we're going to ... focus attention on this war in many different ways," said Reid. Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., suggested over the weekend using Congress' power of the purse to restrain any troop buildup.

More than 3,000 U.S. troops have lost their lives in Iraq in a war nearing the end of its fourth year, and many Democrats attribute their success in last fall's elections to public opposition to the conflict.

The election results, combined with an assessment by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group that the situation in Iraq was "grave and deteriorating," coincided with Bush's effort to begin work on a revised policy.

He is expected to make a nationwide televised address on the issue on Wednesday. Several officials have said one leading option for Bush is a so-called "surge" in troop strength, in which about 20,000 troops would be added to the force already in place, in hopes that sectarian violence can be quelled.

The debate over the war has overshadowed the early days of the new Democratic-controlled Congress and a politically potent domestic agenda that leaders had planned.

The Senate began debate Monday on legislation to toughen ethics rules and crack down on lobbyists' influence. The bill is a response to what Democrats have called a Republican "culture of corruption." In the House, Democrats have already passed some ethics changes.

On security matters, they intend to begin work Tuesday on legislation to implement nearly all of the remaining recommendations of the commission that investigated the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. "If this bill is enacted, funded and implemented, the American people will be safer," said Lee Hamilton, who was a member of the commission.

DOJ_NMG_0114339

That legislation carries no price tag, and the money to pay for the increased protections will have to be approved separately. At a news conference, Pelosi sidestepped when asked about the cost, saying that any increases in spending would be offset to make sure they did not increase the deficit.

Legislation that Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., proposed in the Senate last year would have implemented the 9/11 commission's recommendations at an estimated cost of $53.3 billion over five years.

Bush met with several members of Congress during the day, part of a series of meetings held in advance of announcing his new Iraq policy.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said the president "understands there is a lot of public anxiety" about the war. Yet he said that Americans "don't want another Sept. 11" type of terrorist attack and it is wiser to confront terrorists overseas in Iraq and other battlegrounds rather than in the United States.

As commander in chief, Bush has wide constitutional authority to direct the military. Congress' principal power lies in its ability to control federal funding.

Yet the Democratic takeover in Congress means that for the first time since the war began, persistent critics of the administration's policy are in control in both the House and Senate.

"We ought to insist that the Congress and the Senate take action, so that before we're going to have a surge (of troops), the members of Congress and the members of the Senate will have an opportunity to speak on this issue," said Kennedy.

He noted that Congress could prohibit the money it authorizes for Iraq from being spent on a troop buildup. "It's something that's under discussion," said the Massachusetts Democrat.

Other alternatives have emerged in recent days, although several officials said Democratic leaders had not yet settled on a course of action.

Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the Senate's second-ranking Democrat, has suggested a limit on the number of troops that could be deployed to the war.

"It is time for us to announce we achieved our goals in Iraq and now the American people need to hand this responsibility over to the people of that nation in Iraq," he said.

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., a potential presidential candidate, said that while he opposes any measure that would increase the risk to troops already deployed, "the central question then becomes, is there a way of conditioning appropriations so that the president is constrained and that's something that we're investigating right now."

Other Democrats have discussed the possibility of forcing votes on nonbinding legislation calling on Bush to begin a troop withdrawal — the type of measure that served as a flashpoint in the election-year debate over the war.

In addition, Democrats intend to require senior administration officials to run a virtual gantlet of hearings at which the war policy could be explored in great detail — from the mission of the troops to alleged fraud in the use of funds to rebuild Iraq.

Officials said a few Democrats have discussed holding a fresh vote on authorizing the war, which Congress approved before Bush dispatched troops more than four years ago.

Bush's recent decision to name a new ambassador to Baghdad and shuffle the military commanders in the region will lead to Senate confirmation hearings.

Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said another option is to limit "a particular military program or effort." He offered no elaboration.

Congress Is Loath To Pull Purse Strings (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — As they prepare for weeks of oversight hearings on the war in Iraq, Democratic congressional leaders are ruling out funding cuts to force President Bush to withdraw American troops.

But such cuts would hardly be unprecedented.

Since the early 1970s, Congress has intervened in at least five foreign conflicts on three continents by dictating what U.S. forces could do or how long they stay.

In the most dramatic and politically provocative cases, including during the latter years of the Vietnam War, lawmakers used their power over the federal budget to dramatically restrict operations they opposed.

At other times, they passed laws that specified where American forces could operate in Central America in the 1980s and set a timeline for withdrawing American troops from Somalia in the 1990s.

In the late 1970s, Congress barred the CIA from participating in a civil war in Angola.

*

No appetite for showdown

DOJ_NMG_0114340

"This isn't a monarchy. The president doesn't have the authority to do anything he wants," said former Rep. Sam Gejdenson (D-Conn.), who worked to limit President Reagan's support for the Nicaraguan Contras two decades ago. "When Congress wants to move, it clearly has the authority to force the president to cease and desist."

Democratic leaders have shown no appetite for such a showdown.

Although House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) last week sent Bush a letter urging him to begin pulling out troops, Pelosi reiterated Monday that Democrats would not force the issue by withholding funding.

There is a long history of congressional discomfort with challenging the commander in chief over how to conduct a war.

"Congress is very sensitive of being accused of not supporting the troops," said Louis Fisher, a constitutional law specialist at the Library of Congress who has written extensively about struggles between the White House and Congress over war powers.

Even when popular opinion turned against the Vietnam War, congressional war opponents took years to muster the majorities necessary to impose restrictions on the conflict.

But after President Nixon's controversial 1970 expansion of the war into Cambodia, the tide began to turn.

That year, Sens. John Sherman Cooper (R-Ky.) and Frank Church (D-Idaho) overcame months of legislative opposition and attached an amendment to a foreign aid package that barred the use of U.S. troops in Cambodia.

The next year, Congress went further, approving a measure sponsored by Sen. Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) that required Nixon to set a timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops from Vietnam.

Only after U.S. forces withdrew following the 1973 peace accords did Congress actually cut funding for assistance to South Vietnam. Two years later, after more congressional funding cuts, the country succumbed to a North Vietnamese invasion.

The fall of Saigon in 1975 fed accusations that Congress had undermined the U.S. war effort in Southeast Asia.

Within a year, however, lawmakers on Capitol Hill imposed new limits on American intervention in another foreign conflict.

In 1976, Congress prohibited the CIA from conducting military operations in Angola, which was in the middle of a fierce civil war that pitted a Soviet-backed government against rebels supported by America's allies.

And less than a decade after the end of the Vietnam War, Congress faced off against the White House over another controversial foreign war, this time in Central America.

In the mid-1980s, the Reagan administration was aggressively trying to overthrow the Marxist government of Nicaragua and to prop up an American-backed government in El Salvador against communist-backed rebels.

"There was a great deal of unhappiness with the way the Reagan administration was characterizing the conflict," said Cynthia Arnson, a former congressional aide who now directs the Latin American program at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars.

Amid reports of atrocities committed by America's allies, Democrats on Capitol Hill grew increasingly wary of U.S. involvement.

Then-Rep. Edward P. Boland (D-Mass.) led a congressional effort to prohibit the use of funding from the CIA or the Defense Department in support of the Contras in Nicaragua.

Lawmakers later went further, restricting U.S. forces from operating in Nicaragua and within 20 miles of the Nicaraguan border in Honduras and Costa Rica. (At the time, U.S. troops were still advising the Contras.)

Those limits would become central to the Iran-Contra scandal in which Reagan administration officials sought to fund the Contras by using the proceeds of arms sales to Iran.

Congressional intervention in Southeast Asia and Central America proved politically controversial for Democrats.

And wariness over being accused of abandoning America's allies diminished congressional interest in limiting support for the government of El Salvador, Arnson said.

*

Continuing limits

Yet even into the 1990s, lawmakers continued to place limits on American military action abroad.

In 1991, Congress authorized President George H.W. Bush to use military force only to liberate Kuwait rather than fight on into Iraq.

And after 18 American soldiers were killed in a 1993 firefight in Mogadishu, Somalia, Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) led a successful effort to set a deadline for withdrawing U.S. troops from Somalia.

Today, Democrats are again challenging an administration over a war. But advocates of legislation to require the withdrawal of U.S. troops — such as Sen. Russell D. Feingold (D-Wis.) — remain a minority.

None of the new Democratic congressional committee leaders who plan hearings on Iraq over the next month have expressed interest in legislation that would place limits on U.S. forces in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0114341

And last week, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) would only say that he might reintroduce a nonbinding resolution calling on the president to set a timetable for withdrawing troops.

Dems Grapple With 'surge' (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, January 9, 2007

Having quickly pivoted last weekend to address the Iraq war during their 100-hour legislative blitz, House Democratic leaders are hurrying, amid the new pressures of having to govern, to craft a unified response to President Bush's plan to increase the number of U.S. troops deployed there.

Democrats appeared to have a chaotic and busy Monday as freshman lawmakers returned from a Congressional Research Service retreat in Virginia and other members remained in their districts or attended the Bowl Championship Series football game between the University of Florida and Ohio State University.

As they address the president's plan for Iraq, House Democrats will also begin the 100-hour offensive by considering reforms suggested by the commission that investigated the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. While the commission's recommendations address spending priorities, port and aviation security and other security issues, Democrats have proposed creating a new intelligence oversight panel within the House Appropriations Committee.

The goal is to make oversight more focused by reducing the number of committees involved but increasing Congress's power to scrutinize intelligence spending and programs. The new panel will have more authority and more staffers to review intelligence agency budgets.

Former Rep. Tim Roemer (D-Ind.), who served on the 9/11 Commission, told reporters yesterday that the congressional moves were "bold," but he acknowledged that this is "a first step in a long path toward reform."

The panel, if created, would also enhance the power of Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) because she would appoint its Democratic members. During the past week, Pelosi has moved to augment her power by continuing to place term limits on chairmen and place staff in key jobs within her caucus.

Meanwhile, antiwar lawmakers revved up their opposition this week and put themselves on a collision course with Democratic leaders who oppose the hard-line tactic of changing Iraq policy by cutting off funds for operations there.

At a press conference yesterday, Pelosi reiterated that she opposes cutting off funding for military operations in Iraq. But there is a wide gulf between her liberal rank-and-file members of the caucus.

"Many of the new members know how they got here," said Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio), who was in New York City yesterday pitching a plan to withdraw U.S. forces from Iraq. "We'll make sure [the second 100 hours] is about Iraq."

Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), a former Marine whose opposition to the war gave Democratic candidates political cover during the election to emphasize the issue, plans to begin hearings "shortly" in his new perch as chairman of the Defense Appropriations subcommittee, said House Appropriations Chairman David Obey (D-Wis.).

The chairwomen of the Progressive Caucus are hosting a forum this Friday with former Sen. George McGovern (D-S.D.), who has authored a book offering a plan to withdraw from Iraq. Murtha has maintained a low profile since the campaign and his unsuccessful bid to become majority leader. But in conversations on the House floor, he told Rep. Lynn Woolsey (D-Calif.) that he would attend the forum with McGovern.

Murtha is scheduled to offer the first response to McGovern, said Bill Goold, a spokesman for Woolsey.

As liberal lawmakers voiced greater opposition to escalating the war, the White House appears to be trying to ward off criticism for appearing to ignore the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, which proposed more diplomacy, notably with Iran and Syria.

President Bush has conducted a series of bipartisan briefings with lawmakers. He is meeting today with 14 lawmakers, including Reps. Todd Tiahrt (R-Kan.) and Adam Smith (D-Wash.). Last Friday, the president met with seven Republicans and six Democrats who serve on the Armed Services Committee. These included Rep. Chet Edwards (D-Texas), who represents Bush's hometown of Crawford, and freshman Rep. Chris Carney (D-Pa.), who served in the Pentagon as a Naval intelligence officer during the Iraq war.

Some of the newly elected Democrats, who aggressively criticized Bush on the campaign trail, are taking a much more cautious approach in the wake of their victories.

"Instead of sending more American troops overseas, we should be training Iraqis to handle the jobs themselves. For every Iraqi battalion we train, we need to bring an American battalion home. This should be our focus," said Carney.

Rep. Heath Shuler (D-N.C.) said he wants to hear from military leaders in Iraq that more soldiers are necessary, said Andrew Whalen, Shuler's press secretary.

Rep. Brad Ellsworth (D-Ind.) is skeptical of an increase in troops, said Elizabeth Farrar, his spokeswoman.

DOJ_NMG_0114342

Murtha Outlines Strategy To Restrict Troop Surge (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON -- With President Bush seeking more U.S. forces in Iraq, a House Democratic chairman outlined options that would restrict any troop surge if it meant depleting readiness at home or extending the tours of troops now in the war zone.

The strategy laid out by Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.) is the clearest statement yet on how House Democrats may respond to anticipated White House proposals to add 20,000 troops and pump new money into economic programs to help Iraqi civilians.

Mr. Bush will address the nation tomorrow on Iraq, and the Pentagon is preparing to add four brigades plus support personnel in the coming months. In the same period, Congress will be considering an emergency bill to pay for continuing overseas military operations, and the restrictions could be added prior to enactment in late March and before the White House has deployed all the added brigades overseas.

Mr. Bush is sure to claim wide discretion as commander in chief under the Constitution; most Democrats want to avoid what they see as a fruitless and politically damaging fight to deny money for the war. "We're not about to cut off funding for troops," House Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton (D., Mo.) said.

But Mr. Murtha, chairman of the House Appropriations defense subcommittee, believes the November election results show voters want Congress to be more of a check on Mr. Bush's handling of Iraq. His goal is to build bipartisan support by focusing the debate on whether increasing troop levels would be too much of a strain on the military.

"Most of the military commanders say we can't afford to send more troops," Mr. Murtha said, and he has urged the president's national-security adviser, Stephen Hadley, to expedite submission of the war-funding requests to facilitate hearings and debate.

The chairman met recently at the White House with Mr. Hadley, Vice President Cheney and the president regarding Iraq policy, but remains skeptical of the administration's approach. He is planning a set of hearings beginning this month on the state of Army and Marine Corps readiness; as chairman, he can recommend that the restrictions be part of the text of the funding bill and challenge others to take out the language.

"They will say we're micromanaging the Defense Department. Well they need to be micromanaged," he said. "What we decide is the direction of the country on this war."

Among the options is a provision that proscribes the use of new funds to extend the deployment of Army and Marine troops beyond 365 and 210 days, respectively. A second provision would bar the dispatch of more troops if a fixed percent of units left at home fall below readiness standards.

The readiness of Army units for combat is measured on a scale of one to four. Units rated at the lower ends of the spectrum -- three and four -- are missing key leaders, training or pieces of equipment that make them ineligible to deploy. The exact readiness levels of U.S. units are classified. But senior Army officials and lawmakers have acknowledged in recent weeks that almost all the big active-duty combat brigades in the U.S. currently aren't ready to deploy.

Forcing the Bush administration to maintain a certain percentage of units in the U.S. at high readiness levels could constrain the president's ability to follow through on his plan to "surge" troops into Baghdad. It could also force the administration to call some National Guard and reserve units back for a second year-long tour of duty in Iraq.

Bush To Name Khalilzad For U.N. Job (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

President Bush will nominate Zalmay Khalilzad to be the U.S. envoy to the United Nations and veteran diplomat Ryan Crocker to replace him as ambassador to Iraq, the administration said Monday.

Both changes had been revealed in news reports last week.

"If confirmed, Ryan and Zal will have two of the hardest and most consequential jobs in the world," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said announcing the changes. White House spokesman Tony Snow had confirmed the plans earlier Monday.

Khalilzad, who is Afghan born, has also served as ambassador to Afghanistan. He will replace John Bolton, who could not win Senate confirmation and resigned last month as his temporary appointment as U.N. ambassador was about to expire.

Crocker, a four-time ambassador who is now U.S. envoy to Pakistan, will replace Khalilzad in Baghdad.

Bush is shuffling his teams of military and diplomatic advisers as he plans to announce a new Iraq strategy on Wednesday.

"The next two years may well be the most significant ones in this mission so far," Rice said. "New challenges on the ground call for changes to our strategy."

"There will be new leadership in both our military and our diplomatic efforts, and the person President Bush wants to lead Embassy Baghdad is Ryan Crocker," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0114343

Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander overseeing the military theater that includes Iraq, will be succeeded by Adm. William Fallon, now Abizaid's counterpart in the Pacific. Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus is the president's choice to be the new chief commander in Iraq, replacing Gen. George Casey.

Casey in turn will replace the retiring Gen. Peter Schoomaker as Army chief of staff.

Bush has also decided to shift John Negroponte, the national intelligence director, to the State Department to become No. 2 to Rice. Replacing Negroponte will be retired Vice Adm. Mike McConnell, a veteran of more than 25 years in intelligence.

Iraq-linked Reshuffle Continues With Switch Of US Baghdad Envoy (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, January 9, 2007

President George W. Bush pursued a major reshuffle of his Iraq policy team by nominating the current ambassador to Baghdad as the next US envoy to the UN and replacing him with one of Washington's most experienced diplomats.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice confirmed the long-expected decision to name Zalmay Khalilzad, an Afghan-born Muslim who has been the US ambassador in Iraq for 18 months, to the United Nations.

He will be replaced in Baghdad by Ryan Crocker, a fluent Arabic speaker who has already served as US ambassador to Syria, Kuwait, Lebanon and, since November 2004, Pakistan, she said.

Both appointments must be confirmed by the US Senate, though they are not expected to encounter stiff resistance from the opposition Democrats who won control of Congress in November elections.

"If confirmed, Ryan and Zal will have two of the hardest and most consequential jobs in the world," Rice said in announcing the nominations.

"But President Bush and I have the utmost confidence that they are more than equal to the challenges of their posts," she said.

The nominations followed a flurry of other changes in the upper echelons of Bush's intelligence and military teams that included replacing his top commanders for Iraq and the Middle East and shifting his top intelligence aide, John Negroponte, to the State Department to become Rice's deputy.

The reshuffled leadership will be tasked with implementing a new Iraq strategy that Bush is scheduled to unveil in a nationally televised speech Wednesday night.

The new plan is expected to include a "surge" in US troop numbers to curb sectarian and insurgent violence while shifting security responsibility to Iraqi forces to allow for an eventual drawdown of the US presence.

The choice of Khalilzad, 55, the Bush administration's highest-ranking Muslim, had been expected since former UN envoy John Bolton resigned in December after failing to gain Senate endorsement.

Rice said the past year of intensive diplomacy at the United Nations, which resulted in sanctions against North Korea and Iran over their nuclear programs as well as action to end conflicts in Lebanon and Sudan's Darfur region, had "shown very clearly how important the UN is for America".

"This work is a tall order. It demands a skilled and experienced diplomat ... and few Americans have distinguished themselves in this regard as much as Zal," she said.

While considered an effective diplomat, Khalilzad, a Sunni Muslim, struggled during his 18 months in Baghdad to gain the confidence of Iraq's now dominant Shiites and failed to bring about the national reconciliation that had been one of his primary duties as ambassador.

The appointment of such a high-profile figure to the UN was welcomed by some foreign policy experts as a sign that Bush intends to continue pursuing important diplomatic goals through the world body he once famously dismissed as a "debating society."

But some have worried the diplomat may focus too much on Iraq to the detriment of other pressing issues.

Edward Luck, an expert on international organizations at Columbia University's School of International and Public Affairs, said Khalilzad's close ties to Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney would be a plus at the UN, as long as he was not seen as tasked "simply to push an American agenda regarding Iraq and a smoother exit strategy" for Washington from the embattled nation.

Rice hailed Crocker, 57, as a near perfect choice to replace Khalilzad in Baghdad.

"Few diplomats have the kind of experience in the broader Middle East that Ryan has amassed in his three decades of service," she said.

"He knows the language and the culture of the region, as well as the leaders and the societies that they lead."

DOJ_NMG_0114344

Crocker will need all his diplomatic talents to carry out Bush's new policy in Iraq, which for him should focus on forging a political accommodation among Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds, while reviving moribund efforts to get the Iraqi economy back on its feet.

But he is no stranger to turmoil, having survived the 1983 bombing of the US embassy in Beirut as well as perilous assignments in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Bush Ready To Announce New Iraq Plans (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, January 9, 2007

President George W. Bush will announce his new war plans for Iraq in a prime-time address to the nation on Wednesday night that is expected to focus on a combined military-economic push for victory.

The final link in the reshuffled team to carry out the new strategy was revealed by the White House on Monday. Ryan Crocker, a veteran diplomat and Arabist, is to become the next US ambassador in Baghdad, replacing Zalmay Khalilzad who is nominated to fill the vacant post of envoy to the United Nations. Mr Crocker will oversee the largest US embassy, working with Lt Gen David Petraeus, the counter-insurgency expert named last week to take over from Gen George Casey as commander of multinational forces in Iraq.

Democrats in Congress have warned Mr Bush that he should not expect an easy ride in gaining approval for the emergency supplemental budget of at least $100bn (€77bn, £51bn) he is likely to request for Iraq next month.

Many Republicans are sceptical, too, saying this is the "last chance" for the Iraqi government led by Nouri al-Maliki, the Shia prime minister, whose botched handling of the execution of Saddam Hussein has lowered his standing even further in Washington.

But the appointments of Mr Crocker and Lt Gen Petraeus, both respected and already veterans of the Iraq war, will help the administration get through three weeks of tough committee hearings in the Democrat-controlled Congress.

Senator Barbara Boxer, a Democrat on the foreign relations committee, gave a taste of what lies in store, commenting in reference to Gen Casey's early removal: "It looks like the president went shopping for a general who agreed with him."

Lt Gen Petraeus, who led the drafting of the military's new counter-insurgency manual, is said to have disagreed with the "light footprint" strategy of Gen Casey. He is expected to have an infusion of up to 20,000 more troops for a long-term attempt at "clear and hold" in Baghdad.

The neo-conservative camp that appears to have achieved success in lobbying Mr Bush to ramp up the US's military and economic commitment wants the focus on clearing "high-violence Sunni and mixed Sunni-Shia neighbourhoods".

Analysts say this approach, if adopted, would place Mr Crocker in a difficult position of carrying out the other expected half of the Bush plan, a broad-based push for reconciliation with the Sunni – the former ruling minority – backed by more money.

Mr Khalilzad, the departing ambassador, pursued this approach but ran into opposition from the Shia-dominated coalition. His background as a Sunni Muslim (he is Afghan by birth) also raised suspicions that some former officials say made his position untenable.

Mr Crocker is not only an experienced Arabist who served in hot-spots, including Beirut. He is one of the few remaining US diplomats with experience in Iran before relations were severed following the 1979 Islamic revolution.

Mr Crocker, currently ambassador to Pakistan, was involved in successful talks with Iran in late 2001 after the fall of the Taliban in Afghanistan that led to the formation of the Karzai government.

His two predecessors in Baghdad – Mr Khalilzad and John Negroponte – both received the green light to make contact with their Iranian counterparts. It is not known if Mr Crocker will receive similar dispensation.

Tony Snow, White House spokesman, rejected suggestions that the new strategy represented the "last chance" for success. But he also dodged questions on whether Mr Bush would talk about achieving "victory". Pressed whether the speech would tackle the consequences of failure, Mr Snow said

Our 'Viceroy' To The U.N. (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

An Afghan-born Sunni Muslim, Zalmay Khalilzad would be a strong symbol in representing the U.S.

ZALMAY KHALILZAD is not the kind of soft-spoken diplomat who goes over well at the United Nations. President Bush's choice for U.S. ambassador to the U.N., dubbed "the viceroy" during his stint as ambassador to Afghanistan from 2003 to 2005, is a neoconservative hawk known for his autocratic style. Yet he is also charismatic and can be charming; certainly compared to his predecessor, he's a breath of fresh air.

DOJ_NMG_0114345

Former Ambassador John R. Bolton was a spectacularly poor choice for the U.N., given that he was appointed at a time when the U.S. should have been focusing on mending fences with the international community after ignoring its reservations on the invasion of Iraq. His arrogant refusal to compromise in a forum in which compromise is a necessity for progress only exacerbated American isolation. Bush's decision in 2005 to install him as a recess appointment when it became clear that he wouldn't be approved by the Senate was an unconscionable end run around constitutional checks and balances.

Khalilzad is a polished and experienced foreign service official who is quite capable of flexibility, as he proved during tough negotiations over the governance of both Afghanistan and Iraq. Insiders expect him to sail through the Senate confirmation process.

In what would be a testament to this nation's diversity, the Afghan-born Khalilzad would become the first Muslim U.S. ambassador to the United Nations. His religious and ethnic background have strong symbolic value in countering Muslim suspicions that the U.S. is engaged in a religious crusade against Islam around the world. It also makes him particularly qualified to mediate conflicts over the best approach to such hotspots as Iran and Lebanon.

Khalilzad has been an able U.S. representative in Baghdad, even if his religious affiliation has caused some Iraqis to grumble about his allegiances. A Sunni Muslim, he has been a strong advocate for increasing Sunni participation in Iraqi politics and for cracking down on Shiite death squads accused of murderous rampages against Sunnis, going so far as to say that the militias pose the greatest threat to Iraq's stability. He is right, and Bush's choice for Khalilzad's successor in Iraq — experienced diplomat Ryan C. Crocker — will no doubt continue making this case.

U.S. Strike Targets Al-Qaida In Somalia (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

The U.S. military launched a strike against several suspected members of al-Qaida in Somalia, a government official said Monday night.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the operation's sensitivity, said at least one AC-130 gunship was used in the attack.

CNN, NBC and CBS first reported the military action. Citing Pentagon officials, CBS said the targets included the senior al-Qaida leader in East Africa and an al-Qaida operative wanted for his involvement in the 1998 bombings of the American embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

The same operatives are also believed responsible for a 2002 attack on Israeli tourists in Kenya and an attempt to shoot down an Israeli aircraft the same day, NBC News reported.

The 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania killed more than 250 people. The 2002 attack on an Israeli-owned hotel in Kenya killed 15.

The White House on Monday night would not confirm the incident. Air Force Lt. Col. Todd Vician, a Defense Department spokesman, said he could neither confirm nor deny the reports of an airstrike.

There was no confirmation that the Air Force had killed either of the al-Qaida targets.

Air Force AC-130 gunships are heavily armed aircraft with elaborate sensors that can go after discreet targets — day or night. They are operated by the Special Operations Command and have been used heavily against the Taliban in Afghanistan.

U.S. Navy vessels have been deployed off the coast of Somalia to make sure al-Qaida or allied jihadists don't escape the country, the State Department said last Wednesday.

Somalia's effective central government fell in 1991, when clan-based warlords overthrew a military dictator and then turned on each other. The government was formed two years ago with the help of the United Nations, but has been weakened by internal rifts.

Soldiers loyal to Somalia's U.N.-backed government and Ethiopia's military late last month drove out a radical Islamic group that had been in control of the country for six months.

The U.S. has believed for years that a group of al-Qaida operatives has been hiding in Somalia.

U.S. Airstrike Aims At Qaeda Cell In Somalia (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — A United States Air Force gunship carried out a strike Sunday night against suspected operatives of Al Qaeda in southern Somalia, a senior Pentagon official said Monday night.

The attack by an AC-130 gunship, which is operated by the Special Forces Command, is believed to have produced multiple casualties, the official said. It was not known Monday night whether the casualties included members of a Qaeda cell that American officials have long suspected was hiding in Somalia.

DOJ_NMG_0114346

Special Forces units operating from an American base in Djibouti are conducting a hunt for Qaeda operatives who have been forced to flee Mogadishu, the Somali capital, since Islamic militants were driven from there by an Ethiopian military offensive last month.

The American attack was first reported by CBS News.

The Special Forces attack is the first military action in Somalia that Pentagon officials have acknowledged since American troops departed the lawless country in the wake of the infamous "Black Hawk Down" episode in 1993, when 18 American soldiers were killed in street fighting in Mogadishu.

American officials have long suspected that a handful of Qaeda suspects responsible for the 1998 embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania have been hiding inside Somalia, a country that has not had a central government since 1991.

The search for the terrorist suspects has driven American policy toward Somalia for several years.

Earlier this year, the Central Intelligence Agency began making cash payments to a group of Somali warlords who pledged to help hunt down members of the Qaeda cell.

After Islamist militias took control of Mogadishu in the summer, officials in Washington charged that the Islamists had ties to the terror suspects, and made demands for their handover to American custody.

The Ethiopian military offensive that began last month recently drove the Islamists from the seaside Somali capital, raising hopes within Washington that the Qaeda operatives might surface as they fled the protection of the Islamists. The Islamists have retreated to areas around the southern port city of Kismayo. Ethiopian officials have said they have intelligence reports that members of the Qaeda cell were hiding near the city.

The AC-130 gunship is a heavily armed propeller plane that, because of its slow speed, operates primarily at night and can direct an immense barrage of gunfire onto a target as it circles overhead.

The attack against suspected Qaeda operatives is the sort of targeted operation that senior Bush administration officials have been pressing the Special Operation Command, based in Tampa, Fla., to undertake in recent years.

But officials have said that Special Operations forces have had difficulty carrying out targeted strikes in the past because of the difficulty establishing the whereabouts of wanted terrorists or getting forces in place when a suspected militant is located.

The Central Intelligence Agency has killed a small number of suspected Qaeda members, using a pilotless drone armed with a missile. Among them were five people killed in Yemen in 2002.

U.S. Warplanes Fly Missions Over Somalia (AP)

By Jim Krane

AP, January 9, 2007

In a further escalation of American involvement in Somalia, the USS Dwight D. Eisenhower arrived off the war-ravaged country's coast and its aircraft have begun flying intelligence-gathering missions over Somalia, the military said Tuesday.

The U.S. Central Command reassigned the aircraft carrier to Somalia last week from its mission supporting NATO-led forces in Afghanistan, said U.S. Navy spokesman Lt. Cmdr. Charlie Brown in Bahrain, where the Navy's Fifth Fleet is based.

The announcement comes a day after at least one U.S. Special Forces AC-130 gunship carried out a strike against several suspected members of al-Qaida in Somalia. Brown said the Navy had no supporting role in the attack.

The carrier joins three other U.S. warships — two guided-missile cruisers and an amphibious landing ship — already conducting anti-terror operations off the Somali coast.

Brown said he did not know how long the Eisenhower's redeployment would last. "We'll be there as long as required," he told The Associated Press.

Soldiers loyal to Somalia's U.N.-backed government and Ethiopia's military late last month drove out a radical Islamic group that had been in control of the country for six months.

The U.S. military dispatched the Eisenhower from its battle station in the Arabian Sea to the Indian Ocean coastal waters of Somalia "due to rapidly developing events in Somalia," the Bahrain-based Fifth Fleet announced in a statement.

Brown said the guided missile cruisers USS Bunker Hill and USS Anzio and the amphibious landing ship USS Ashland were already patrolling the Somali coast in search of al-Qaida members thought to be fleeing Somalia in the wake of Ethiopia's December invasion.

Navy crews aboard the Bunker Hill, Anzio and Ashland have been boarding and searching commercial ships off the Somali coast, Brown said. No terror suspects have been found aboard any of the ships, he said.

"That's a sign that what we're doing is working," Brown said. "We're trying to deter the terrorists from using the sea. If we haven't detained anyone, that shows us that it's working."

DOJ_NMG_0114347

The Eisenhower's complement of F/A-18 Hornet and Superhornet fighter-bombers, EA-6B Prowler electronic warfare aircraft and E-2C Hawkeye airborne command-and-control craft had been operating over Afghanistan, Brown said. The Eisenhower also carries H-60 helicopters.

U.S. Strike In Somalia Targets Al-Qaeda Figure (WP)

By Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

A U.S. Air Force AC-130 gunship attacked suspected al-Qaeda members in southern Somalia on Sunday, and U.S. sources said the operation may have hit a senior terrorist figure.

The strike took place near the Kenyan border, according to a senior officer at the Pentagon. Other sources said it was launched at night from the U.S. military facility in neighboring Djibouti. It was based on joint military-CIA intelligence and on information provided by Ethiopian and Kenyan military forces operating in the border area.

It was the first acknowledged U.S. military action inside Somalia since 1994, when President Bill Clinton withdrew U.S. troops after a failed operation in Mogadishu that led to the deaths of 18 Army Rangers and Delta Force special operations soldiers.

Sources said last night that initial reports indicated the attack had been successful, although information was still scanty.

"You had some figures on the move in a relatively unpopulated part of the country," said one source confirming the attack, who, like several others, would discuss the operation only on the condition of anonymity. "It was a confluence of information and circumstances," he said. The attack was first reported by CBS News.

One target of the strike, sources said, was Abu Talha al-Sudani, a Sudanese who is married to a Somali woman and has lived in Somalia since 1993 -- the year of the attack against U.S. troops that was chronicled in the book and movie "Black Hawk Down." In a 2001 U.S. court case against Osama bin Laden, Sudani was described by a leading witness as an explosives expert who was close to the al-Qaeda leader.

More recently, Sudani was identified by U.S. intelligence as a close associate of Gouled Hassan Dourad, head of a Mogadishu-based network that operated in support of al-Qaeda in Somalia. Dourad is one of 14 "high-value" prisoners transferred last September from CIA "black sites" to the U.S. military base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The Office of the Director of National Intelligence then disclosed that Dourad "worked for the East African al-Qaeda cell led by . . . al-Sudani" and carried out at least one mission for him, related to a plan to bomb the U.S. military base in Djibouti.

Others have identified Sudani as the financier for Fazul Abdullah Mohammed and Saleh Ali Saleh Nabhan, believed responsible for the 1998 bombing of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. All are among the senior al-Qaeda operatives the Bush administration has charged were sheltered by Somalian Islamic fundamentalists controlling Mogadishu, the country's capital. They are believed to have fled late last month when Ethiopian troops drove the fundamentalists out of the capital and toward the Kenyan border.

The Bush administration has been leading an international diplomatic effort to stabilize Somalia, including organizing an African peacekeeping force. It has called on leaders of Somalia's new transitional government to negotiate a power-sharing arrangement with moderate members of the Islamic leadership who are not seen as terrorist facilitators and who are supported by a significant segment of Somali clans.

Neither effort has met with much success. African countries have been reluctant to offer troops and the new Somalian leaders have resisted negotiations.

Sources would not confirm that U.S. forces are operating on the ground along the border between Somalia and Kenya, although one emphasized that "we are working very, very closely" with Kenyan forces.

The aircraft carrier USS Eisenhower was deployed in the Indian Ocean to provide air cover for the operation and, if needed, to evacuate downed airmen and other casualties. It joined several Navy ships from the Fifth Fleet, based in Bahrain, that have been patrolling the area to prevent al-Qaeda members from fleeing Somalia by sea, a Navy spokesman said. Approximately 1,500 U.S. personnel, including Special Operations forces, are assigned to the Djibouti-based Combined Joint Task Force-Horn of Africa.

The AC-130 gunship is a heavily armed aircraft, with four cannons and a six-barrel Gatling gun capable of firing 1,800 rounds a minute. But its most striking weapon is a computer-operated 105mm howitzer that juts sideways from the middle of the aircraft. An offensive behemoth that is relatively defenseless against counterattack, it is flown only at night.

The Bush administration has long claimed the right to launch discrete military attacks in other countries when terrorist targets have been identified.

A strike by a U.S. Predator drone was ordered by the CIA last January in response to intelligence placing Ayman al-Zawahiri, the second-ranking al-Qaeda leader and bin Laden's chief deputy, at a compound near the Afghanistan border in Pakistan. The attack killed a reported 17 people, including six women and six children, but not Zawahiri, who apparently was not at the compound at the time.

DOJ_NMG_0114348

U.S. Strike In Somalia Aims At 3 Fugitives (LAT)

By Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — Under cover of the Ethiopian move into Somalia, U.S. officials launched an intensive effort to capture or kill three key suspects in the bombings of U.S. embassies in Africa more than eight years ago that killed 224 people.

A U.S. Air Force Special Operations gunship struck a location in southern Somalia where some of the suspects were believed to be hiding, a U.S. Defense Department official said Monday.

Witnesses and Somalian government officials said there were many people killed or wounded but that they had no exact numbers. U.S. military and counter-terrorism officials said they did not know whether the strike, made within the previous 24 hours, killed any of the three fugitives.

"It's not clear what the outcome is at this point," said the counter-terrorism official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the operation was classified.

Abdirahman Dinari, the Somalian government spokesman, said early reports suggested that among the dead were several leaders of the fleeing Islamic Courts Union recently driven from the capital, Mogadishu, along with "one of the leaders of Al Qaeda in East Africa." He declined to identify the leader.

The strikes targeted small villages in the vicinity of the port city of Kismayo, he said.

"The explosions shook our village," said Hussein Abdi, a resident of Afmadow. He said refugees from a nearby village told him at least six were killed.

A government official in Kismayo said soldiers captured 28 suspected Islamist fighters amid the chaos.

Dinari said leaders of the transitional government requested U.S. support and were aware of the impending strike.

U.S. officials have secretly been negotiating with Somalian clans who are believed to have sheltered the three embassy bombing suspects, hoping to obtain information about their locations. It could not be determined Monday whether the airstrike was based on information provided by the clans.

A U.S. intelligence official said it was unlikely that all three fugitives were traveling together but added that U.S. military operatives had been tracking the men for some time, waiting for an opportunity to strike.

"They were on the move, it was a thinly populated area, and this is what you got," the official said, adding that the AC-130 gunship used in the attack "is not the kind of weapon you generally deploy in downtown Mogadishu."

"This thing does some violence; it would not be the most surgical event," the official said.

The gunship was based in Djibouti, just north of Somalia. The strike was first reported by CBS News and independently confirmed by The Times.

CIA, FBI and military teams have been tracking the men, particularly their alleged leader, Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, for years, but the fugitives have proved elusive.

U.S. officials and their African and European allies in the negotiations believe that one Somalian sub-clan in particular has been harboring Mohammed and his associates, whom the U.S. describes as the leaders of an East African Al Qaeda cell. Mohammed, a native of the Indian Ocean island nation of Comoros, faces terrorism charges in the United States that could bring the death penalty if he is captured and convicted.

Intelligence gathered over the last week indicates that Mohammed and aides Abu Taha al Sudani of Sudan and Saleh Ali Saleh Nabhan of Kenya recently fled their haven in Mogadishu and headed for the Kenyan border as Ethiopian troops entered the capital and routed the Islamic militias that controlled it.

U.S. officials believe that influential members of the Ayr sub-clan, which they say has sheltered the three, have been in touch with the fugitives. Clan members could provide their pursuers with detailed intelligence about where the men might go and who else within their network of extremists might be hiding them, according to several U.S. counter-terrorism and diplomatic officials familiar with the negotiations.

"We are working through the clans to get at these people," one U.S. diplomatic official said. "That's a political reality in Somalia. The clan is the biggest institution, as much as there are any institutions."

But negotiations with the militant Ayr could raise questions about whether the Bush administration is bargaining with terrorists or those harboring them. The U.S. diplomatic official denied that, saying that engaging the groups, either directly or through intermediaries, was the only realistic way of gathering useful intelligence on the men and perhaps apprehending them.

DOJ_NMG_0114349

Mohammed, who has a $5-million U.S. bounty on his head, was indicted in 1998 by a federal grand jury along with Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden and others for his alleged role in the bombings that year of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

U.S. officials also accuse the three fugitives of involvement in the 2002 bombing of a hotel in which 15 people were killed and an attempt to shoot down an Israeli airliner, both near the Kenyan port city of Mombasa.

It remains unclear whether U.S. authorities would take any of the three men into custody if captured, because Kenya and other countries also have expressed interest in trying them.

Officials said they could not discuss the details of the talks with Somalian clans, saying they were extremely sensitive and being conducted at a particularly delicate time. The International Contact Group on Somalia, composed of the U.S. and European and African nations, has recently begun working to disarm the various Somalian factions and provide foreign aid.

Although no one is offering clan leaders amnesty for harboring suspected Al Qaeda operatives, U.S. officials said, the negotiations aim for something just short of that, such as inclusion in the political process in exchange for cooperation on the counter-terrorism front.

The Islamic Courts Union, which last year seized control of Mogadishu and other key Somalian cities, is made up of at least 15 small, clan-based "courts," some of which are moderate, others showing signs of militancy. U.S. officials believe the Ayr sub-clan plays important roles in the Islamic courts, and that at least one of its influential members has direct ties to senior Al Qaeda leaders in Afghanistan, according to U.S. intelligence officials and reports by independent terrorism analysts.

Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys, an Ayr cleric who has been instrumental in establishing and running the Islamic Courts Union, is wanted by the U.S. government for allegedly having ties to Al Qaeda leaders, including Bin Laden.

U.S. officials say Aden Hashi Farah Ayro, a young Ayr leader in charge of one of the union's most violent militias, received military training at an Al Qaeda camp in Afghanistan before the U.S.-led military invasion of that country in late 2001.

Ayr leaders have publicly denied such allegations.

U.S. officials described the hunt for the suspected Al Qaeda operatives as confounding, as they tried to figure out who could speak for the clan, whom to trust and who could deliver intelligence on the fugitives or hand them over to authorities.

One of those intermediaries is apparently Somalian Prime Minister Ali Mohammed Gedi, who held a closed-door meeting Jan. 2 with Ayr leaders at a Mogadishu hotel and requested that they hand over their weapons and support the United Nations-backed transitional government he heads.

Jendayi E. Frazer, the U.S. assistant secretary of State in charge of African affairs, was unavailable for comment, as she was returning Monday from Nairobi, the Kenyan capital, where she had been part of the International Contact Group meeting, a spokesman said.

In congressional testimony in June, Frazer said the three suspects posed "an immediate threat to both Somali and international interests in the Horn of Africa…. We must deny them the ability to plan and operate."

She added at the time that the administration was "constantly reviewing and updating our approach to reflect the fluid dynamics inside Somalia," and that it would "continue working with Somalis, regardless of clan, religious or secular affiliation."

John Prendergast, a former Africa policy official in the National Security Council and State Department under President Clinton, said he was skeptical of the secretive talks.

Prendergast, who visits Somalia frequently as a senior advisor at the nonprofit International Crisis Group, said the clans are deeply mistrustful of the Bush administration, particularly because of clandestine efforts by the CIA to fund some warlords and undermine the authority of others.

Also, Prendergast said, though clan members may support the three fugitives, they don't control them and are extremely unlikely to engage in any betrayal of them unless other powerful Somalian clans and political leaders promise a significant prize in return.

What's more, Prendergast said, the fugitives have managed to elude capture for nearly a decade and are not likely to sit around and wait for someone to turn them in. "I'd be surprised if those guys didn't get out of the way a long time ago. They'd be stupid to have hung around this long," he said.

Interim Leader Rejects U.S. Approach In Somalia (MCT)

By Shashank Bengali

McClatchy, January 9, 2007

NAIROBI, Kenya - In a rebuff to the United States, Somalia's interim president, Abdullahi Yusuf, on Monday rejected U.S. requests to bring moderate Islamists into his weak transitional government.

Negotiations with Islamists "will not happen," he told Al Jazeera television before flying to Mogadishu, Somalia's lawless seaside capital. "We will crack down on the terrorists in any place around the nation."

Yusuf had indicated the opposite position in meetings in the Kenyan capital over the weekend with assistant U.S. secretary of state Jendayi Frazer, U.S. officials said.

There was no immediate reaction from U.S. officials, but Yusuf's remarks underscored the difficulties that Western governments face as they try to shore up Somalia's fragile regime after Ethiopian troops ousted Somalia's popular Islamist rulers last month.

Frazer, the top U.S. diplomat for Africa, had said late Sunday in Nairobi that Yusuf's government, which was formed by an international conference in 2004 and has never controlled Mogadishu, needed to bring moderate Islamists into the regime.

"I support reaching out to the ... Islamic Courts," Frazer said. "We see a role in the future of Somalia for all who renounce violence and extremism."

The message signaled a more conciliatory U.S. stance on the Islamic Courts Movement, which had seized Mogadishu in June from U.S.-backed warlords. Initially U.S. officials based in Kenya had some contact with moderates within the movement, including Sheik Sherif Ahmed, a geography teacher who emerged as their leader.

But Ahmed soon was edged out by hard-liners, led by suspected al-Qaida operative Hassan Dahir Aweys, who laid claims to territory in neighboring countries and called for jihad against Ethiopia. Frazer made a series of statements starting in November claiming that al-Qaida terrorists had overrun the courts movement.

U.S. officials think that the militants are sheltering three terrorists who masterminded the 1998 attacks on U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. The Bush administration is widely thought to have given neighboring, Christian-led Ethiopia the green light to expel the Islamists.

The whereabouts of Sherif Ahmed, Aweys and other top Islamist leaders remained uncertain Monday as Ethiopian and Kenyan troops continued to pursue remnants of the fleeing Islamist militias in a heavily wooded area of southern Somalia, near the border with Kenya.

Analysts who had been critical of U.S. policy in Somalia said the Bush administration might be focusing on achieving political stability there after years of being preoccupied with preventing al-Qaida cells from taking root.

"If the U.S. is indeed doing more than making a few public statements in support of dialogue with moderates, then it does represent a shift in the public face of its policy," said John Prendergast, senior adviser to the International Crisis Group, a research center on global conflict.

The Islamists' ouster left a power vacuum in Mogadishu, where the transitional government has little support. The city's powerful Hawiye clan accuses Yusuf, who's of a rival clan, of being a puppet of Ethiopia.

"If southern Somalia is to stabilize, it is essential that the transitional government hold substantial power-sharing talks with the Hawiye clan elders and Islamic Courts officials," Prendergast said.

Trying to sweeten the deal, the U.S. has pledged $40 million in new aid to Somalia, including $14 million to support a proposed African peacekeeping mission. Frazer said the money wasn't conditional on the transitional government negotiating with the Islamists.

Rain Slows U.S. Offensive (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

30 Tamuz , Iraq — A five-day-old offensive into the troubled rural region east of Baghdad bogged down in the mud Monday after U.S. forces staged a bombardment of a warren of tunnels and canals where Sunni Arab insurgents were believed to be holed up.

An icy downpour turned rural dirt lanes into muck that stuck to boots and wheels like cement and stopped heavy armored American vehicles. U.S. commanders poised for what they described as a final push against al-Qaida in Iraq militants fired phosphorous shells to burn dead weeds and sent out foot patrols to search through fields and farm buildings. Despite the adverse conditions, U.S. military officials remained optimistic about their offensive in Diyala province.

"Time is on our side," said Capt. Stephen Dobbins, a troop commander in the 5th squadron, 73rd Cavalry. "If the enemy is there in the canals they're running out of food, and we have just bombed the hell out of them."

U.S. and Iraqi forces have swept through sprawling farmland, combing isolated hamlets for fighters, weapons and intelligence. Soldiers have found numerous arms caches in the mostly Sunni 30 Tamuz village. One man led soldiers to a canal at the back of his house and pulled an AK-47 assault rifle and a magazine from the murky depths.

Most of the village's families have abandoned their homes or left only women and children behind since U.S. planes dropped leaflets last week indicating they were on their way.

DOJ_NMG_0114351

U.S. soldiers had faced fierce resistance when they last pressed through the region in November, following the discovery of large weapons caches during reconnaissance flights. Highly trained fighters including organized squad-sized bands fought the Americans.

In the new offensive, about 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi government forces are on the move, backed with air support. On Sunday, the U.S. military said, 21 armed men were killed and a stash containing 1,169 Katyusha rockets, small arms and ammunition was uncovered.

Before dawn Monday, U.S. aircraft unleashed strikes in the region that continued into mid-morning, sending orange fireballs into the sky.

Throughout the day, soldiers observed small groups of men maneuvering through nearby canals. In one case, they said, it appeared that four insurgents were practicing an attack.

Insurgents have riddled the main roads leading to their hideouts with anti-tank mines, part of an elaborate defense system. After U.S. and Iraqi forces rolled through, they said individuals were seen planting mines in the road for their return.

"The IEDS are bad, the mud is worse," said Specialist Richard Cooper, still joking after spending more than an hour trying to maneuver a Humvee down a mud-slicked road.

As vehicles skidded and sank in the mud, Staff Sgt. Allen Brown, the squadron supply officer, rolled up in a Humvee to deliver diesel fuel to a mortar truck stranded in the muck. As a soldier tossed the jerry-cans to the other side of the canal, Brown popped his head out of the gun turret and yelled, "Welcome to hell."

"Any chance for some gloves?" shouted back Staff Sgt. Steve Robert Lynn, whose hands were red and raw from the cold. "I fell in the mud -- my gloves are useless now."

"Sure," Brown replied with a grin. "I got plenty back at Base Caldwell, drop by any time."

Lynn spent the better part of the day extracting his truck and a trailer full off mortar tubes and other equipment after they had slipped down an incline into a field. "It's not mud, it's slush."

A local farmer finally came to his aid, providing a tractor to haul out Lynn's trailer and a number of other vehicles.

As the temperature dropped to the low 30s and it started to rain again, soldiers kept themselves warm as best they could. A U.S. gunner wrapped himself in a plastic sheet inside his turret as a group of Iraqis huddled in the mud underneath the open-topped personnel carrier.

As darkness fell, soldiers pulled out sleeping bags and settled down in their trucks for a few hours of rest in between guard shifts.

Hussein's Voice Speaks In Court In Praise Of Atrocities (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 8 — The courtroom he dominated for 15 months seemed much smaller on Monday without him there to mock the judges and assert his menacing place in history.

But the thick, high-register voice of Saddam Hussein was unmistakable. In audio recordings made years ago and played 10 days after his hanging, Mr. Hussein was heard justifying the use of chemical weapons against the Iraqi Kurds in the late 1980s, predicting they would kill "thousands" and saying he alone among Iraq's leaders had the authority to order chemical attacks.

In the history of prosecutions against some of the last century's grimmest men, there can rarely have been a moment that so starkly caught a despot's unpitying nature.

On one recording, Mr. Hussein presses the merits of chemical weapons on Izzat Ibrahim al-Douri, his vice-president, and now, the Americans believe, the fugitive leader of the Sunni insurgency that has tied down thousands of American troops. Mr. Douri, a notorious hard-liner, asks whether chemical attacks will be effective against civilian populations, and suggests that they might stir an international outcry.

"Yes, they're very effective if people don't wear masks," Mr. Hussein replies.

"You mean they will kill thousands?" Mr. Douri asks.

"Yes, they will kill thousands," Mr. Hussein says.

Before he was hanged Dec. 30 for offenses in another case, Mr. Hussein had used the so-called Anfal trial, involving the massacre of as many as 180,000 Iraqi Kurds, as a platform for arguing that the chemical weapons attacks of the kind that devastated the town of Halabja on March 16, 1988, were carried out by Iranian forces then fighting Iraq in an eight-year war.

But the recordings told another story. Court officials gave no hint as to how they obtained the recordings, which Iraqis familiar with Mr. Hussein's voice said seemed to be authentic. But they appeared to have been made during meetings of his Revolutionary Command Council and of the Baath Party High Command, two groups that acted as rubber stamps for his decisions. Mr. Hussein regularly ordered meetings to be recorded, according to Iraqis who knew the inner workings of Mr. Hussein's dictatorship.

DOJ_NMG_0114352

Mr. Hussein sounds matter of fact as he describes what chemical weapons will do. "They will prevent people eating and drinking the local water, and they won't be able to sleep in their beds," he says. "They will force people to leave their homes and make them uninhabitable until they have been decontaminated."

As for the concern about international reaction, he assures Mr. Douri that only he will order the attacks. "I don't know if you know this, Comrade Izzat, but chemical weapons are not used unless I personally give the orders," he says.

When Iraq resumed the genocide trial of its former leaders on Monday, Mr. Hussein's high-backed, black vinyl seat at the front of the dock was left ominously empty. Something about the six remaining defendants, including Ali Hassan al-Majid, Mr. Hussein's cousin, who was known among Iraqis as Chemical Ali for his role in overseeing the attacks on the Kurds, suggested that they felt orphaned without the commanding presence of Mr. Hussein.

Gone were the cries of "Mr. President!" as Mr. Hussein entered the court to join them in the dock, and gone, too, was the emboldened posture they took from Mr. Hussein, with frequent challenges and insults to witnesses, prosecutors and judges. Perhaps Mr. Hussein's hanging, and the humiliating taunts he endured from witnesses and guards as he stood with the noose around his neck, had broken the last illusions among those surviving him that they could somehow evade a similar end.

When the chief judge, Muhammad Ureibi al-Khalifa, began the proceedings by abruptly cutting the microphone as Mr. Majid stood to intone a prayer in memory of Mr. Hussein, the former dictator seemed to be judicially, as well as existentially, dead. But the anticlimactic beginning swiftly gave way to the most astonishing day of testimony since Mr. Hussein and his associates went on trial. Once more, it was Mr. Hussein, this time in an involuntary orgy of self-incrimination, who dominated.

In the sequence of scratchy recordings — some with the dialogue quite clear, some barely decipherable — Mr. Hussein repeatedly showed the ready resort to brutality that seized Iraq with fear during his 24 years in power. At one point, he is heard telling a general to summarily execute field commanders who fail to adequately prepare their defenses against Kurdish guerrilla raids.

He cites as a precedent "some commanders who abandoned their positions when they found themselves in an awkward situation, who deserved to have their necks cut, and did." At another point, he tells subordinates to execute any internal security officials who fail to stop Iraqi soldiers sneaking home from the Iranian front on fake passes.

"If you arrest any of them, cut off their heads," he says. "Show no mercy. They only joined the security to avoid having to join the army and fight Iran."

One recording revealed, more clearly than anything before, Mr. Hussein's personal involvement in covering up Iraq's attempts to acquire weapons of mass destruction, the program that ultimately led to President Bush sending American troops to overthrow him. Talking to the general who led Iraq's dealings with United Nations weapons inspectors until weeks before the 2003 invasion, he counseled caution in the figures being divulged on the extent of Iraq's raw supplies for chemical weapons, so as to disguise the use of unaccounted-for chemicals in the attacks on the Kurds.

But it was Mr. Hussein's chilling discussion of the power of chemical weapons against civilians that brought prosecutors and judges to the verge of tears, and seemed to shock the remaining defendants. One of the recordings featured an unidentified military officer telling Mr. Hussein that a plan was under development for having Soviet-built aircraft carry containers, packed with up to 50 napalm bombs each, which would be rolled out of the cargo deck and dropped on Kurdish towns.

"Yes, in areas where you have concentrated populations, that would be useful," Mr. Hussein replies.

Another recording involves a General Thabit, who was not further identified by the prosecutors, telling Mr. Hussein that his forces had used chemical weapons in the northern sector of Kurdistan, but that "our supplies of the weapons were low, and we didn't make good use of the ones we had." The general notes that Iraq's production of mustard gas and sarin, a nerve gas, was "very low," and says they should be used sparingly. "We're keeping what we have for the future," he says.

Before they recovered enough to begin pleading their innocence, Mr. Hussein's erstwhile companions in the dock buried their heads in their hands, gazed at the floor, and glanced furtively toward TV cameras transmitting live coverage of the trial. Mr. Majid shifted uneasily in his seat as one recording had him telling officials to warn Kurdish refugees that they would be attacked with chemical weapons if they attempted to return to their villages.

The prosecutor, Munkith al-Faroun, came to court as almost the only person who attended Mr. Hussein's execution on Dec. 30 to emerge with an unsullied reputation. It was he, as he and others confirmed, who attempted to halt the taunts hurled at Mr. Hussein as he stood with the noose around his neck, moments before the trapdoor opened. Over the hubbub, an illicit camera phone recording showed Mr. Faroun calling out for silence, "Please, no!" he said. "The man is about to be executed."

But back in the courtroom, Mr. Faroun became, again, the man holding Mr. Hussein to account and, in one poignant moment, counseling restraint among those who have expressed outrage over the manner of the former ruler's execution. That moment came after the court watched television images taken after the Halabja attack, which more than any other event focused world attention on the atrocities committed under Mr. Hussein.

DOJ_NMG_0114353

The video showed the horrors: a father wailing in grief as he found his children lying along a street littered with bodies; dead mothers clutching gas-choked infants to their breasts in swaddling clothes; young sisters embracing each other in death; and trucks piled high with civilian bodies. “I ask the whole world to look at these images, especially those who are crying right now,” Mr. Faroun said, referring to the outpouring of sympathy for Mr. Hussein.

The recordings played at Monday’s trial session, seemingly eliminating any doubt about Mr. Hussein’s role in the attacks on the Kurds, may go a long way to answering criticism of the government for executing him before he was judged for the worst of his crimes.

American justice department lawyers, who have done much of the behind-the-scenes work in sifting tons of documents and other evidence gathered after the invasion of 2003, had never hinted that they held the trump card, judicially and historically, that the audio recordings seem likely to be.

Saddam's Voice, Aura Still Fill Courtroom (WT/AP)

By Lauren Frayer

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Saddam Hussein had been dead nine days but his voice resounded through the courtroom yesterday as he and his cousin "Chemical Ali" discussed killing thousands of Kurds in the 1980s, according to audiotapes played at their war-crimes trial.

Saddam's physical presence was gone -- his chair in the white metal pen where the defendants sit was empty -- but his aura still hung over the proceedings against his former regime members.

The trial reconvened for the first time since Dec. 21 and a little more than a week since Saddam was hanged for the killing of 148 Shi'ites after an assassination attempt in the town of Dujail in 1982.

Meanwhile, new video of Saddam's corpse shortly after the hanging was posted on the Internet. It showed a gaping wound on Saddam's neck, with his head unnaturally twisted at a 90-degree angle to his right.

The court's first order of business yesterday was to dismiss all charges against Saddam. His co-defendants -- including his cousin Ali Hassan al-Majid, known as "Chemical Ali" -- remain in the dock on charges of killing 180,000 Kurds in the 1980s as Iraq fought a protracted war with Iran.

Prosecutor Munqith al-Faroon aired graphic video of scores of bodies in trucks and in piles on the street, overlaid with a voice purported to be that of al-Majid saying, "I will hit them with chemical weapons."

"Damn the international community if they say anything. I will strike them all with chemical weapons," the voice continued.

Another audiotape had a voice identified as Saddam's warning, "These weapons are used only at my orders." He also reassured colleagues that the weapons "kill by the thousands."

"It will force them out of their homes without water or food. It makes them evacuate their homes naked," the voice said.

In court, al-Majid described the video as painful, but said it showed the work of Iranian troops, not Iraqis. As for the audio, al-Majid did not deny the voices were his and Saddam's.

The tapes "not only condemn me, but the whole path that I was part of -- the path of Saddam Hussein," al-Majid said.

Legal analysts said they hoped Saddam's six co-defendants would be more forthcoming with the dictator no longer listening.

Also yesterday, the U.S. military announced the deaths of two more American soldiers: one from combat wounds in Salahuddin province, which includes Saddam's hometown, and another from small-arms fire north of Baghdad.

Iraqi police, meanwhile, reported the discovery of 27 tortured bodies in the capital and the deaths of 23 other persons, including nine Shi'ite workers shot in a minibus on their way to the Baghdad airport.

Meanwhile, in Geneva, the U.N. refugee agency made an emergency appeal yesterday for $60 million to help the 40,000 to 50,000 Iraqis who flee their homes every month and the 3.7 million who have been displaced.

"The current exodus is the largest long-term population movement in the Middle East since the displacement of Palestinians following the creation of Israel in 1948," said the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

Court Drops Kurd Charges Against Saddam (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

Saddam Hussein's trial for the killing of 180,000 Kurds in the 1980s resumed Monday with the late dictator's seat empty, nine days after he went to the gallows. The court's first order of business was to drop all charges against Saddam.

DOJ_NMG_0114354

Six co-defendants still face charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity stemming from a military campaign code-named Operation Anfal during the 1980-88 Iraq-Iran war.

Shortly after the court reconvened Monday, a bailiff called out the names of the accused and the six men walked silently into the courtroom one after another.

Chief Judge Mohammed Oreibi al-Khalifa said the court decided to stop all legal action against the former president, since "the death of defendant Saddam was confirmed."

All seven defendants in the Anfal case, including Saddam, had pleaded innocent to charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity. Saddam and one other man also pleaded innocent to the additional charge of genocide.

Saddam was sentenced to death for the killing of 148 Shiites and hanged on Dec. 30 in a chaotic execution that has drawn global criticism for the Shiite-dominated government. An illicit video from inside the former leader's execution chamber showed him being taunted on the gallows.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair believed the manner in which Saddam was executed was "completely wrong," his office said Sunday.

"He believes that the manner of the execution was completely wrong, but that should not lead us to forget the crimes that Saddam Hussein committed, including the deaths of hundreds of thousands of Iraqis," a spokeswoman for Blair's office said on condition of anonymity in line with policy.

Human Rights Watch said Saddam's speedy execution illustrated the Iraqi government's disregard for human rights, and urged Iraqi officials to halt two upcoming hangings.

"The tribunal repeatedly showed its disregard for the fundamental due process rights of all of the defendants," said Richard Dicker, director of Human Rights Watch's International Justice Program.

Saddam's half brother and former intelligence chief, Barzan Ibrahim, and former head of Iraq's Revolutionary Court, Awad Hamed al-Bandar, were sentenced to death after being convicted along with Saddam of involvement in the killings in the town of Dujail after a 1982 assassination attempt there against Saddam.

Their executions were postponed, however, until after the Muslim holiday of Eid al-Adha, which ended six days ago. They were expected in the coming days, though Jaafar al-Mousawi, the chief prosecutor in the separate Dujail case, said the timing would "be determined by the government."

Sami al-Askari, an adviser to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, declined to give reasons for the delay and said only that "no date has been made yet" for al-Bandar and Ibrahim's hangings.

The six remaining defendants in the Anfal case _ all senior members of Saddam's ousted regime _ include his cousin Ali Hassan al-Majid, known as "Chemical Ali" for his alleged use of chemical weapons against Iraqi Kurds.

As al-Majid took his seat in court Monday, he tried to turn on his microphone to speak publicly. The judge quickly shut it off, preventing him from being heard.

The other defendants are former Defense Minister Sultan Hashim al-Tai, who was the commander of Task Force Anfal and head of the Iraqi army 1st Corps; Sabir al-Douri, Saddam's military intelligence chief; Taher Tawfiq al-Ani, former governor of Mosul and head of the Northern Affairs Committee; Hussein Rashid Mohammed, former deputy director of operations for the Iraqi Armed Forces and Farhan Mutlaq Saleh, former head of military intelligence's eastern regional office.

Legal experts said the Anfal trial would proceed more smoothly without Saddam.

"The trial will be more elastic and easy. It will clarify and expose more facts because Saddam Hussein's disappearance from dock will encourage other defendants to mention some facts that they were afraid to divulge when he was with them," said Tariq Harb, an Iraqi lawyer and legal expert.

In Monday's session, prosecutor Munqith al-Faroon presented a document allegedly signed by al-Ani, calling for the execution of 10 members of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, the party headed by current Iraqi President Jalal Talabani. Al-Ani later denied the handwriting was his.

"This is not my signature and I'm sure of that," he told the court.

The prosecutor also aired a video showing the aftermath of chemical weapons attacks on Kurdish areas, with dozens of dead men, women and children. Accompanying audio allegedly contained the voice of al-Majid saying "I will hit them with chemical (weapons)."

Another audiotape was played for the court, allegedly with Saddam saying, "These weapons are only used at my orders."

Violence continued Monday, with nine people killed in an ambush near Baghdad's airport. Gunmen attacked a bus full of workers en route to the airport, showering them with bullets, a hospital paramedic said on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk to reporters. The victims were mainly Shiite Muslims from Baghdad's Sadr City neighborhood, the official said.

The U.S. military also reported the deaths of two American soldiers north of Baghdad a day earlier.

DOJ_NMG_0114355

Six bodies were discovered in the primarily Sunni neighborhood of Dora in southern Baghdad, police said. They were a father and his three sons, and a mother and her son, who had been returning to Baghdad from relatives' funerals in Najaf, a police officer said on condition of anonymity out of security concerns.

A tribal council chief was kidnapped near Samarra, on his way home from the Muslim pilgrimage to Mecca, said Capt. Muthanna Ibrahim, director of the Salahaddin governor's office. Samarra is 60 miles north of Baghdad.

New Video Of Saddam's Corpse On Internet (AP)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra

AP, January 9, 2007

A new video of Saddam Hussein's corpse, with a gaping neck wound, was posted on the Internet early Tuesday, the second leaked release of clandestine pictures from the former leader's hanging.

The video appeared to have been taken with a camera phone, like the graphic video of the hanging which showed guards taunting Saddam in the final moments of his life.

The footage pans up the shrouded body of the former leader from the feet. It apparently was taken shortly after Saddam was executed and placed on a gurney. He was hanged shortly before dawn on Dec. 30.

As the panning shot reaches the head region, the white shroud is pulled back and reveals Saddam's head and neck.

His head is unnaturally twisted at a 90 degree angle to his right. It shows a gaping bloody wound, circular in shape, about an inch below his jaw line on the left side of his neck. His left cheek is marked with red blotches, and there is blood on the shroud where it covered his head.

The newest video leak was likely to increase the angry reaction over the way the execution was carried out. There already has been a global outcry about the undignified manner in which the Shiite-dominated government hanged Saddam, a Sunni.

The 27-second video was posted on an Iraqi news Web site that is known to support Saddam's outlawed Baath Party.

"A new film of the late immortal martyr, President Saddam Hussein," the web site said in a headline over a link to the video.

Voices could be heard on the video. As the shroud is pulled back, one voice says, "Hurry up, hurry up. I'm going to count from one to four. One, two ... . Hurry up you're going to get us into a catastrophe."

Then another voice, apparently the man taking the pictures, says, "Just one second, just one second, Abu Ali. I'm about finished."

Then a third voice says, "Abu Ali, you take care of this."

It was the second clandestine video to have leaked, the first showing Saddam being taunted in his final moments. That clandestine video showed the former leader dropping through the gallows floor as he offered chanted prayers. It ends with his dead body swinging at the end of a rope.

The hanging video was in sharp contrast with an official video that was broadcast not long after Saddam's execution which showed him standing silently on the gallows as the noose was put around his neck. The official video was muted.

The leaked hanging video, however, was shot from the floor of the gallows chamber, looking up at Saddam. Voices could be heard taunting him with cries of "Muqtada, Muqtada, Muqtada," referring to radical anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, the leader of the Shiite Mahdi Army militia and a key support of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

The prime minister pushed for Saddam to be executed before the end of 2006 and just four days after the death sentence was upheld by the appeals court. U.S. official sought to delay the execution.

Execution Sparks Arab Support For Saddam (AP)

By Nadia Abou El-magd

AP, January 9, 2007

Another leaked video from Saddam Hussein's execution carried fresh adulation Monday of the fallen dictator, who in death has become a martyr and hero of Arab nationalism for some in the Middle East.

Saddam's stature has grown since his execution — when he answered insults and taunts with disdain — overshadowing the memories in much of the Arab world of the massacres and other atrocities committed by his regime.

The new video, showing Saddam's corpse with a gaping neck wound, was posted on the Internet early Tuesday. It was apparently shot with a camera phone minutes after he was hanged Dec. 30.

"A new film of the late immortal martyr, President Saddam Hussein," the web site said in a headline over a link to the video.

The independent Egyptian newspaper Al-Karama splashed Saddam's photo over a full page Monday, with an Iraqi flag behind him, declaring him an "Arab martyr."

"He lived as hero, died as a man," another Egyptian opposition newspaper, Al-Osboa, proclaimed in a headline, showing a photo of Saddam at the gallows.

DOJ_NMG_0114356

The praise has angered the governments of Iraq and Kuwait, which Saddam's soldiers invaded in 1990. On Monday, Kuwaiti lawmakers denounced Arab countries where Saddam has been lauded as a hero and demanded the government reconsider ties and financial aid to them.

Indignation over the execution in the Sunni Arab world has increased resentment of the United States and Iraq's Shiite-led government. It could fuel support for Iraq's Sunni insurgency and complicate U.S. efforts to enlist Arab nations in efforts to reconcile Iraq's warring Sunni and Shiite communities.

In large part, it was the unruly scene at the gallows that catapulted Saddam to hero's status. In video footage smuggled out of the execution room, Shiite executioners are heard shouting curses at Saddam — who stands erect, and smiles contemptuously. "Is this manly?" he retorts.

The latest video seems only to have aggravated the anger provoked by the earlier video.

Saddam's iconic exeuction has, it seems, come to symbolize dignified Arab resistance in the face of humiliation at the hands of a Shiite government.

Some Arabs regard that government as illegitimate because it is backed by the U.S. military and closely allied to mainly Shiite Iran.

Some media reports compared Saddam to another hero of Arab nationalism who opposed Western domination: Omar al-Mokhtar, the leader of resistance against Italy's military occupation of Libya. He was executed by hanging in 1931.

Egypt's nationalist weekly newspaper Al-Arabi published a cartoon Sunday showing an open book with pictures of Saddam and al-Mokhtar on facing pages.

The reaction was in contrast to the shock that followed Saddam's capture by U.S. troops in December 2003. At the time, Saddam was shown bearded and bedraggled in photos as he was pulled out of the hole where he was hiding by U.S. troops.

The images sparked debate across the Middle East. Many pointed out his weakness in the face of U.S. forces. Over the years that followed, Arab media dealt more frankly with the mass killings carried out by Saddam's regime.

Languishing in U.S. custody, Saddam faded into irrelevance, and coverage of his trial waned in Arab media.

But after the execution, even some Arabs critical of Saddam said he had achieved a heroic status, despite his record of crimes and atrocities.

"Five sublime minutes at the hanging rope created the myth," columnist Abdel-Halim Qandil wrote in Al-Karama. "The story of Saddam the bloody dictator was over, replaced by Saddam's image similar to Omar al-Mokhtar."

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, a U.S. ally, suggested the execution could worsen the situation in Iraq.

"It was disgraceful and very painful," Mubarak said in an interview with Israeli daily Yediot Ahronot. "They (the Iraqi government) have made him into a martyr, while the problems within Iraq remain."

On Saturday, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki denounced other governments for criticizing the execution, accusing them of meddling in Iraqi affairs.

But the execution deepened opposition in the Arab world — where the majority of the population are Sunni Muslims — against Iraq's Shiite-led government.

Many also blamed the United States, which handed Saddam over for execution — even though U.S. officials said they tried to persuade al-Maliki to postpone the hanging and later criticized the way it was carried out.

On Friday, hundreds in the Egyptian capital demonstrated after prayers at al-Azhar Mosque, chanting against the United States and allied Arab governments, expressing support for the Iraqi insurgency.

In Jordan, columnist Ibrahim Jaber Ibrahim lashed out at the Iraqi prime minister, deriding him as "Emperor al-Maliki, standing on a precious Persian carpet" — a reference to the Iraqi Shiites' close ties Persian Iran.

Talal Salman, publisher of the Lebanese daily As-Safir, warned that the al-Maliki government's "vindictiveness, political blindness and shortsightedness ... are establishing divisions that will spare no one, whether in Iraq or in the territories around it, including all the Arabs."

Still, some voices in the Arab media insisted Saddam's crimes should not be ignored.

"One can't but be surprised at shameful Arab weeping (for Saddam) ... glorifying him and considering him a hero and martyr," wrote Palestinian writer Khaled al-Horoub in the United Arab Emirates daily Al-Itihad on Monday.

He warned that other Arab dictators will manage "to hide (their) crimes behind volatile speeches that stir up people's feelings but destroy their present and future."

Sami Moubayed wrote in the daily Oman Times, that he "tried hard" to sympathize with Saddam while watching the execution. "But I could not find a single thing worth praising about Saddam."

"However, the fact that he was executed under the watchful eye of the United States, at a time when Iraq is occupied, makes him a national hero to the Arabs," he wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0114357

Saddam's Trial Stirs Obama Ire (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, January 9, 2007

Potential 2008 presidential contender Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and other top Democrats sharply criticized the execution of Saddam Hussein as President Bush readied to introduce a new military and foreign policy strategy for the war-ravaged country the Iraqi dictator once controlled.

Obama, a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said Saddam was hanged before all charges against him were heard. In particular, Obama said that the court pushed aside testimonials about the mass murder of Iraqi Kurds in the late 1980s in order to rush Saddam to the gallows.

"I think that was unfortunate and did not assist in the process of bringing the country together," Obama said in a short interview last week.

However, Obama said in a statement released on the day of Saddam's hanging: "The Iraqi people have found justice in the death of a dictator who brutalized, tortured and killed thousands of innocent men, women and children." Obama also took the opportunity then to call on the Iraqi government to "work harder" to find a political solution to its burgeoning civil war.

On Monday, nine days after the former dictator's death, the Iraqi court dropped all outstanding charges against him. Six of his associates face charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity for their roles in the killing of 180,000 Iraqi Kurds during the Iraq-Iran war as part of a 1980s-era military campaign code-named Operation Anfal.

Saddam, a Sunni Muslim, was sentenced to death and hanged Dec. 30 for the killing of 148 Shiites. The trial and execution have drawn global criticism of the current Shiite-dominated government. Saddam's final moments were filmed on a cell phone, recording the sectarian jeers with which Shiite officials taunted him as he stood on the scaffold; the viral spread of the footage online has generated further outrage in the international community.

"I think that the fact that it became an Internet spectacle was very unfortunate and diminished the seriousness with which the whole process should have ended," Obama said last week.

Iraqi officials are defending the manner in which the execution was conducted, but Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government is investigating the circumstances surrounding it. President Bush said the hanging could have been held in a more "dignified way" but is leaving the probe to the Iraqis.

Another potential 2008 presidential hopeful, Sen. Joseph Biden Jr. (D-Del.), called on Iraq's leader to condemn publicly the hanging.

"If I were Maliki's adviser, I'd say, 'Now is the time you have to make a dramatic move to hold accountable the Sunnis who engaged in that,'" Biden said Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press with Tim Russert." Biden likened the fallout from Hussein's execution to that resulting from the military detainee torture scandal at Abu Ghraib prison: "It had the same […] poisonous impact."

Like Obama, Biden released a statement shortly after the execution saying it closed "one of the darkest chapters in [Iraq's] history and rid the world of a tyrant." Biden, the chairman of the foreign relations panel, is planning to hold hearings on Iraq this week.

Other top Democrats said that the execution created more problems within Iraq and in the Middle East.

"It was a disaster, it really was," said Sen. Chris Dodd (Conn.), another Democrat who may vie for a presidential nomination. "Saddam Hussein is a dreadful human being and I respect the right of the Iraqi people to bring him to justice, but the way the execution was handled created more problems," Dodd told The Hill last week.

The chaos surrounding the hanging demonstrated a lack of organization in Iraq, according to Dodd, and before transferring custody of Saddam to the Iraqis, the United States should have better understood the mechanics of the planned execution.

"No one should shed any tears for Saddam Hussein; justice has been served," Dodd said in a statement released shortly after Hussein's sentence was carried out.

Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), a leading critic of the war who has been pushing for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq, said that the execution will worsen relations between Sunnis and Shiites.

"I think it was disastrous for Iraq to have the execution carried out in that manner," said Levin, who in recent months has insisted the solution to Iraq's problems is political rather than military.

Levin also said that he hoped his colleagues in the Senate would speak out about increased sectarianism resulting from Saddam's execution.

It is unclear whether Biden or Levin, both of whom are holding hearings on Iraq this week, will raise the issue of Saddam's hanging therein.

DOJ_NMG_0114358

Even now that more details of the execution have emerged, not everyone in the Senate is concerned about the circumstances surrounding it.

Sen. Saxby Chambliss (R-Ga.) said that the execution was left to the people of Iraq to "do … in a way they thought was appropriate. It is not our business to comment" on how it was carried out, Chambliss said.

Minority Whip Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) said the United States should not dwell on the execution and the video, but rather concentrate on how to move forward.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) said Sunday on "Meet the Press" that the way the hanging occurred was a "setback," but contended that the insult Saddam endured on the day of his death "pales in comparison to the way he treated his own people."

Other Republican senators, including John McCain (Ariz.), a top contender for the Republican 2008 presidential nomination, called the fallout from the execution "harmful."

Irrational Is As Irrational Does (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

George W. Bush has executed 153 people, 152 of them in Texas and one so far in Iraq. The Iraqi, of course, is Saddam Hussein, who went to his burlesque of a death with more dignity than the Iraqi government, which so hurried him to the gallows that in much of the world the hanging looked a lot like a lynching. The president, we are told, did not bother to view the spectacle on tape. Maybe he feared he would learn something.

I bring up Bush's appalling record of executions not because I have once again mounted my anti-capital-punishment hobbyhorse but because his record offers an insight into why the United States will stay in Iraq and with even more troops than before.

Let me explain. In Iowa, during the 2000 presidential campaign, Bush answered a question about why he so ardently supported capital punishment. He offered a number of reasons, but one -- deterrence -- prompted me to raise my hand and ask a follow-up: But, sir, there is absolutely no evidence that capital punishment is a deterrent. To my astonishment, Bush conceded my point: "You're right. I can't prove it. But neither can the other side prove it's not."

Ponder that answer for a while. What it means is not just that Bush embraced a famously irrational way of thinking -- the logical fallacy often called "proving a negative" -- but in this case he used it to overwhelm all evidence to the contrary. Once you know this, you can appreciate what Bush means when he calls himself The Decider. It means that evidence, arguments, proof and logic cannot be conclusive when, as is often the case, the president proceeds on what can be called a matter of faith. I am not referring here just to religion -- although surely that is paramount to Bush -- but to supremely secular matters of state: when to go to war, why go to war and when to remain at war. In Bush's mind, the bad guys will lose and the good guys will win and Iraq will become a democracy. This will happen not because Bush can prove that it will but because nobody can prove it won't.

This is why we are in Iraq today and why we are going to stay there. All this time, it did not matter that Iraq was going to hell, or that the terrorists were never there in the first place, or that weapons of mass destruction were never present, or that Saddam Hussein had no role in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, or that democracy for Iraq was never really in the cards -- none of that mattered, because nobody could prove otherwise. All the things Bush believed were true because you, rational fool that you are, could not prove them false.

Up against this kind of mentality, the rational man seeks comfort in fantasy. It was our fantasy that a new Iraqi government, formulated months ago, would so turn things around that Bush would begin a phased withdrawal. It was our fantasy that the November congressional elections would make a difference -- and that Bush would be forced, when he saw the clear sentiment of the American people, to reverse himself. It was our fantasy that the report of the Iraq Study Group would compel the president to rethink everything -- so vast was the panel's expertise, so sound its reasoning and so comforting its appropriately thinning hair. In fact, so wasted was its effort. The members were the mullers. Bush was the decider.

And so those who have decided otherwise -- a couple of four-stars, maybe the chief spook and all those awfully smart people throughout government and academia -- are ignored and/or are heading out the door. Bush listened to them when he agreed with them and refused to listen when he did not. A so-called surge is a-coming, an escalation all decked out with an Orwellian-sounding name. An edifice built on a wobbly foundation -- a profound and enduring ignorance of Iraqi society -- will be patched up, but really, the whole thing is a tear-down. It will collapse no matter what we do.

The execution of Saddam Hussein was Iraq in a nutshell. Aside from the dead man at the end of the rope, nothing went the way the Americans wanted. It was sloppy, putrid with the stench of sectarian hatred and, as always, totally unnecessary. George Bush saw it differently by not, as is his custom, seeing it at all.

Iraqi American Escapee Plans Return To U.S. (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0114359

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 8 -- Iraq's most publicly available fugitive held a news conference in the United Arab Emirates on Monday, announcing his plans to return to Chicago rather than the Baghdad jail he escaped from last month.

Aiham al-Sammarae, the former Iraqi electricity minister who escaped from an Iraqi-run jail inside Baghdad's fortress-like Green Zone on Dec. 17, told reporters at a Dubai hotel that he "didn't break any U.S. laws" and denied he was a fugitive from justice.

Sammarae, a dual U.S.-Iraqi citizen and engineer who lived outside Chicago for many years, was jailed last year on corruption charges and accused of misusing about $2 billion as electricity minister. He told reporters that he left Iraq because he was afraid for his life and that he would go to the United States if he was assured he would not face legal issues.

"All indications are that I can return," he said.

Radhi al-Radhi, head of Iraq's Commission on Public Integrity, an organization created by the United States that had been investigating Sammarae, said last month that he escaped with the help of private security agents who appeared to be American.

The Iraqi government insists it will attempt to bring Sammarae back to Baghdad, according to government spokesman Ali Dabbagh.

"There are many cases against him, and he should face these ones," Dabbagh said. Speaking of the U.S. government, Dabbagh said: "It is their job and their duty to ask al-Sammarae to come back in a different way if he is not coming back on his own."

U.S. Embassy spokesman Lou Fintor declined to comment about whether Sammarae would be allowed to live freely in the United States. But Fintor said that although an Iraqi court overturned his conviction, "we understand that there are additional charges against Mr. al-Sammarae."

Also on Monday, gunmen attacked a bus carrying janitors to work at the Baghdad airport. The gunmen killed four people and injured nine, said Raad Mohammed of the Interior Ministry. The passengers were believed to be Shiite Muslims and were attacked in a predominantly Sunni area near the airport. Reports of the death toll varied, with as many as 15 people said to have been killed.

Two U.S. soldiers were killed Sunday, one by small-arms fire while on patrol in Baghdad, and another during unspecified "combat operations" in Salahuddin province north of Baghdad, the U.S. military said Monday. The soldiers' names were not released.

More than 35 other people were killed in Iraq on Monday in shootings, bombings and mortar attacks, according to Interior Ministry officials. Police also found 24 unidentified bodies at a cemetery near Haifa Street in Baghdad, where the Iraqi army clashed with insurgents last week. They had been shot in the head and exhibited signs of torture, said Brig. Salim Hassan of the Interior Ministry.

The violence in Iraq has precipitated a massive exodus of refugees, the largest displacement in the Middle East since the flight of Palestinians during the creation of Israel in 1948, according to the U.N. refugee agency. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees requested another $60 million to help deal with Iraq's refugee crisis. About 1.7 million Iraqis have been displaced within their country, and as many as 2 million have fled Iraq, the agency estimates.

British Troops Winning The Conflict With The Taliban, Commander Says (AFP)

AFP, January 9, 2007

British troops are inflicting heavy losses on a resurgent Taliban militia while "making great progress in winning the hearts and minds" of the people of Afghanistan, a British commander said.

Brigadier Jerry Thomas, the commander of the UK task force in Afghanistan, said the situation in the southern province of Helmand had improved "markedly" since September when a television documentary aired Monday night was filmed.

With harrowing footage showing bullets buzzing troops and the filmmaker, the documentary shown on Channel 4 television follows British and Afghan troops as they struggle to regain control of the key town of Garmsir.

The documentary also shows British troops gathering corn found in a nearby field because of supply problems.

"Since then (September), British forces have moved into new areas throughout the province, including Garmsir, and made real improvements to security," Thomas said in a statement distributed by the Ministry of Defence.

"We have inflicted heavy losses on the Taliban, denied them freedom of movement, and made great progress in winning the hearts and minds of the local people," he said in response to the documentary.

"This remains a very challenging mission, but we are winning," he said.

Thomas said that only last week Royal Marines "engaged and destroyed a Taliban training camp" in northeast Helmand, which will allow contractors to carry out repairs to a hydro-electric dam in Kajaki.

DOJ_NMG_0114360

The facility will produce electricity for 1.8 million people in the south of Afghanistan "who until now have had none," he said.

"This success would not have been possible unless our forces were properly equipped and supplied," Thomas said.

"To be clear, I have not asked for additional helicopters and the supply system is working well, with no soldiers or marines running out of food," he said.

"It is the nature of the conflict that they do not take more supplies than they need to carry; but we have an extraordinary resupply system in place to ensure that they do not run out," he said.

Britain has about 5,600 troops in Afghanistan as part of the NATO-led reconstruction and security force, most of them in rugged and remote Helmand province.

Forty-four British troops have been killed in Afghanistan since US-led forces toppled the Taliban regime in 2001.

Around 120 foreign soldiers have been killed in action in the country this year, which has seen the worst Taliban-linked violence since the extremists were driven from power.

DOJ:

U.S. Attorney Christie Says He's Staying In His Job (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

TRENTON: The U.S. attorney for New Jersey, a Republican long rumored to be a contender for U.S. Senate, said today he plans to stay in his current job into next year, effectively ruling out a 2008 campaign.

""I have every intention of being here through the end of '07 and into early 2008," Christopher Christie told The Associated Press on Monday. ""We'll see what happens when '08 starts."

Federal laws and Justice Department regulations bar a sitting U.S. attorney from running for political office. Political observers believe most candidates for U.S. Senate from New Jersey would have to start raising money for the costly campaign by June 2007.

Christie, 44, who also is considered by some to be a possible GOP pick for governor, was tapped by President George W. Bush in 2001 to be New Jersey's top federal prosecutor though he lacked criminal court experience. During the AP interview, Christie would not discuss a possible gubernatorial bid in 2009.Over the past five years, Christie has built a reputation as a tough corruption fighter by prosecuting cases including that of former Senate President John A. Lynch, now in prison for corruption, and some in Monmouth County that resulted in the arrests of more than a dozen public officials.

Christie's comments effectively end speculation he would challenge Democratic Sen. Frank Lautenberg, who has said he will seek re-election in 2008.

Come summer, Christie will have been in his current job longer than any U.S. attorney in New Jersey in the past 50 years.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Ex-Aspen Technology Head Surrenders On Securities Fraud Charges (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

(AP) - NEW YORK-The former chief executive officer of software company Aspen Technology Inc. surrendered Monday to face securities fraud charges that he illegally inflated the company's software revenues as he competed to become its chief executive.

David McQuillin, 48, was accused in U.S. District Court in Manhattan of plotting to exaggerate the company's software revenues between January 2001 and September 2002.

Prosecutors alleged in court papers that McQuillin tried to inflate the revenues while he was competing against the company's other chief operating officer for the position of chief executive officer, which he received in October 2002. Aspen Technology develops and sells computer software to oil refineries and other industries.

Prosecutors said McQuillin and unidentified coconspirators manipulated Aspen's revenues by entering side agreements with a customer to control when certain revenues would be counted, by backdating software sales agreements into earlier financial quarters and by providing false information to its auditors.

McQuillin allegedly engaged in the scheme after learning at the end of December 2000 that Aspen was not going to meet the estimates of securities analysts, the government said.

In one instance, McQuillin sent a letter to an oil company saying he needed the company's support "on a matter of the most extreme urgency" prior to reporting quarterly earnings, prosecutors said.

They said he asked the oil company to let him include a software license it had conditionally signed with Aspen in its fourth quarter financial results "to meet our targets."

After Aspen signed a side letter with the oil company, McQuillin and other senior Aspen officers and employees later falsely represented to its auditor that the oil company sales agreement was not subject to side agreements, prosecutors said.

McQuillin was charged with one count of conspiracy to commit securities fraud and one count of securities fraud.

If convicted, he could face up to 25 years in prison and more than $5 million (â,¬3.8 million) in fines.

Stock Options Backdating Issue Haunts Jobs (USAT)

By Greg Farrell And Jon Swartz

USA Today, January 9, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO — When Steve Jobs steps to the podium today at the Macworld Conference here to introduce what is expected to be the newest Apple iPod, he won't be just another CEO hawking a fad product.

Instead, Apple's iconoclastic founder will be greeted by most attendees as the visionary who changed the way the world works and the messiah who saved Apple from oblivion a decade ago. His address is considered the crowning achievement of the year for Apple and its legion of fervent customers.

Yet on the day of Jobs' triumphant moment, he finds himself on the defensive over an issue that swept through Silicon Valley and a swath of Corporate America in 2006 like a California brushfire: the backdating of stock options.

Federal prosecutors and the Securities and Exchange Commission are poring over an internal Apple investigation that examined two huge options grants to Jobs in 2000 and 2001. The 2001 grant was the most problematic. It gave Jobs options to buy 7.5 million shares at $18.30 a share instead of the $21.01 market price of Apple's shares on the date the grant was finalized two months later.

The investigation also disclosed that more than 6,400 stock option grants made on 42 dates from 1997 to 2002 were backdated to give employees a lower strike price.

Apple's report on its internal investigation said that Jobs was aware of or recommended some favorable grant dates but that he did not appreciate the accounting implications. It found no evidence of misconduct by current management, it said.

The company also said Jobs didn't benefit financially from the backdating. Indeed, the two grants to Jobs, totaling 17.5 million options, were canceled in March 2003 (when Apple's stock price was below the options' strike price) and replaced with an award of 5 million shares of restricted stock.

According to data from Thomson Financial, Jobs has never sold shares of Apple stock for profit. His one sale of stock last March — in which he returned 4.5 million shares to the company for nearly $300 million — was to satisfy tax withholding requirements.

But Lucian Bebchuk, director of Harvard Law School's program on corporate governance, says that Jobs clearly gained from the favorable backdating.

Even if one accepts Apple's explanation that Jobs didn't benefit because his options were canceled, the options' replacement with a grant of restricted stock meant they were worth something, Bebchuk says.

Apple says it is cooperating with authorities. What happens next depends on whether the SEC or the U.S. Attorney's office in San Francisco determines that laws were broken.

The backdating of options grants isn't illegal if companies and recipients make the proper SEC disclosures and follow accounting and tax rules. In Apple's case, the improper accounting forced the company to make a financial restatement of $84 million to correct misdated grants from 1997 to 2006.

Apple's board has affixed all blame for the backdating on two unnamed former executives who have left the company. Lawyers for two former executives — former general counsel Nancy Heinen, who left Apple last year, and former chief financial officer Fred Anderson, who left Apple's board last year — deny that either of them did anything wrong.

Bebchuk has trouble believing that the widespread practice of options backdating at Apple was the work of only two executives.

"They are two former executives who had positions that usually don't involve primary responsibility for attracting and compensating people. What incentive did they have to engage in improper dating without implicit support from senior members of the executive team?" Bebchuk asks.

Like most of the 200-plus companies that have admitted to engaging in some form of options backdating, Apple also has to contend with civil suits claiming that shareholders were defrauded by the practice. A lawsuit filed last month in federal court in San Jose accuses Jobs and other top Apple executives of using backdating to benefit themselves. The lawsuit also alleges there was backdating at another company Jobs ran, the animation studio Pixar now owned by Disney.

DOJ_NMG_0114362

Apple's report on its investigation, contained in SEC filings on Dec. 29, left legal experts with new questions. In particular, Apple said one options grant was recorded as approved at a special board meeting on Oct. 19, 2001, but no such meeting took place.

"The statement Apple put out is a little bit pregnant with ambiguity," says John Coffee, an expert in securities law at Columbia University. "It wasn't a strong statement, in which the board investigated and determined that he had done nothing wrong. Instead, they said, 'We haven't caught him red-handed.' "

"When Apple said Jobs was aware of the options-granting process, and recommended them, they are saying Jobs tacitly orchestrated plans to produce phony records," says Christopher Bebel, a former SEC counsel and prosecutor.

But because Jobs did not exercise his options, it will make prosecutors hesitant to pursue criminal charges. "There was a wrong committed, but he didn't line his pockets," Bebel says.

As for the board's statement that Jobs did not "appreciate the accounting implications" of backdating, longtime observers were bemused. Jobs likes to keep track of everything at his company, they say.

"The notion that he doesn't know (the full implications of Apple's accounting procedures) is ludicrous," says Alan Deutschman, author of The Second Coming of Steve Jobs. He interviewed dozens of Apple employees, analysts and industry insiders shortly after Jobs returned to the company he co-founded.

Jobs' exacting attention to detail is most apparent when demanding minuscule changes to product designs or rehearsing for hours to perfect product introductions. And it is Jobs' perfectionism that rescued Apple from almost certain doom in the late 1990s. He pruned the company's then-bloated product line and engineered the release of mega-hit products such as the iPod, say financial analysts.

"Steve is the only person who could have saved Apple and made it what it is today," says analyst Charles Wolf, who has followed Apple for more than a decade, expressing a widely held view in the financial community. "Apple is Steve."

Most financial analysts and investors so far have shrugged off the ongoing stock-option scandal. They expect little impact as long as Jobs remains untouched. "We're not concerned, given the depth of Apple's internal review," says Gene Munster of Piper Jaffray.

Reflecting that faith, investors have boosted Apple's stock to $86.18 a share, near its 10-year high.

CEO Politics (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

January 9, 2007; Page For an excellent example of why federal agencies so rarely admit mistakes, look no further than the recent uproar over the Securities and Exchange Commission's flip-flop on stock-option disclosure. House Financial Services Chairman Barney Frank is already planning to ride this error through the next election as part of his campaign against CEO pay.

The SEC has been under attack since it announced -- on the eve of Christmas weekend -- that it was modifying its July disclosure rule on executive compensation. The commission's new order tweaks the way stock option grants are disclosed, with the goal of making total annual compensation figures more accurate and consistent. Chairman Christopher Cox admitted that the SEC had inadvertently adopted the wrong version of one part of the rule, and was simply trying to set things right.

That mea culpa counted little with Mr. Frank, who denounced the SEC for loosening reporting requirements to provide a "Christmas Eve" gift to corporate America. He also declared that this "backtracking" by the agency meant his committee now had an obligation to dive into the "problem" of "unconstrained" executive compensation -- as if he needed an excuse.

This political opportunism is especially unfortunate because the new SEC rule is entirely in keeping with Mr. Cox's goal of bringing more "clarity and consistency" to corporate pay disclosure. Even Mr. Frank praised the SEC's decision last year to require companies to aggregate all of their top executives' compensation -- pay, bonuses, perks, options -- into one bottom-line figure. When these reports begin to become public later this year, investors will get a better look at management costs and be able to compare those numbers across companies.

Under the flawed SEC rule, companies would have had to include, in their annual total compensation reporting, any stock option grants awarded during the year. This would have been highly misleading to the extent such grants weren't yet exercisable and thus might never be "in the money." Under the new rule, companies will instead include any options that actually vest that year -- meaning options that executives can truly turn into cash or stock.

Contrary to most media descriptions, the new rule won't necessarily result in lower reported compensation numbers. Under the old rule, a big grant would only appear in the year it was awarded, then disappear in subsequent disclosures. Under the new rule, the final figure will include any and all previous option awards that vest in that year -- leading, in many cases, to more substantial bottom-line figures. Meanwhile, information about big annual option grants is still readily available to investors, albeit in a different section of the SEC compensation form.

DOJ_NMG_0114363

This change will also harmonize the new compensation disclosure forms with other corporate financial statements. Under current accounting rules, companies only expense options in their financial statements as the options become exercisable. Given that the SEC's goal with its disclosure rule was to make compensation figures more consistent and understandable for investors, it would have made little sense to set up two completely different ways of counting options.

The SEC's mistake is regrettable, but the agency might be forgiven for overlooking what was a relatively minor point in its gigantic 450-page July rule. And one reason it didn't hold a public meeting on the new amendment is that all five SEC Commissioners -- including its two Democrats -- unanimously agreed that the change was necessary.

Mr. Frank surely knows all this, but he is hunting bigger political game -- namely, running against "excessive" CEO pay and alleged "inequality" as Democrats gin up a campaign issue for 2008. The left believes its neo-populism paid off in November's election, and it wants to ratchet up the rhetoric this year in Congress.

As part of his investigation, we can only hope Mr. Frank explores the role that the last Democratic Congress played in encouraging CEO stock option grants by limiting to $1 million the amount of executive cash compensation that companies could deduct from taxes. (Bob Nardelli, Frank Raines and Hank McKinnell, among others, are grateful.) But then again, that would mean admitting that Congress made a mistake; it's so much easier to demagogue CEOs and the SEC.

CRIMINAL LAW:

House Democrats May Aid Corruption Inquiry (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — The new Democratic House leaders are negotiating with federal prosecutors about complying with subpoenas related to former Representative Randy Cunningham's corrupt sale of military contracts, potentially accelerating a dormant inquiry.

The subpoenas, disclosed late last month in the Congressional Record, request documents from the House Appropriations, Intelligence and Armed Services Committees and demand a response by Jan. 11.

Mr. Cunningham, a California Republican, pleaded guilty more than a year ago to steering tens of millions of dollars in federal money to military contractors in exchange for over $2.4 million in bribes, using his position on the House military spending panel to insert special provisions for contracts into military bills.

All these provisions required involvement by the panel's chairmen and staff as well as military or intelligence officials, so the investigation has the potential to ensnare others. A recent internal report by the House Intelligence Committee, for example, concluded that committee staff had supported Mr. Cunningham's requests despite many "red flags."

The subpoenas are also freighted with Constitutional issues, pitting an executive branch investigation against Congress's claims of immunity and confidentiality for its official business.

The federal prosecutors, based in San Diego, sought for months without success to reach agreement with the former House Republican leaders to obtain the documents without subpoenas. The subpoenas coincide with the takeover of the House by Democrats, who campaigned on a promise to replace corruption with honesty and openness. The Democrats also have less incentive to protect the Republican former committee chairmen and staff members.

People informed about the talks over the subpoenas say the prosecutors may extend the subpoena deadline while they try again to work out an agreement to disclose relevant documents.

"The House is actively working with the Department of Justice to resolve this issue," said Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for Representative Nancy Pelosi, the California Democrat sworn in last week as speaker of the House.

CIA Digs In Its Heels (WSJ)

By Scot J. Paltrow

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

A federal criminal investigation of the Central Intelligence Agency's former third-highest official has stalled because of CIA reluctance to turn over classified documents requested by prosecutors, people close to the investigation say.

The U.S. attorney's office in San Diego has been investigating former CIA Executive Director Kyle "Dusty" Foggo to determine whether he committed illegal acts in influencing the awarding of CIA covert contracts. Mr. Foggo resigned from the CIA in May 2006, shortly after The Wall Street Journal disclosed the investigation1.

· The Issue: An investigation is delayed as federal prosecutors and the CIA wrangle over what classified data can be disclosed if former CIA executive director Kyle Foggo is indicted.

DOJ_NMG_0114364

· What's Unique: Mr. Foggo was the third-ranking CIA official, with access to a huge range of secrets.

· What's at Stake: Prosecutors may have to alter or scale back charges they seek against him.

Among the contracts under investigation is one the CIA awarded to the company of a lifelong friend of Mr. Foggo's, Brent Wilkes, a California defense contractor. Last year, former Congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham pleaded guilty to soliciting bribes from individuals including Mr. Wilkes.

The Foggo inquiry is part of a chain of pending criminal investigations sparked by the Cunningham case. Its progress is important both because of the nature of the contracts involved, and because a trial may shed light on additional contracting improprieties first hinted at in the Cunningham case.

Wrangling between prosecutors and the CIA isn't unusual in cases involving espionage or other criminal activity by agency employees, because of the risk that important secrets could be divulged in a trial.

Despite such difficulties, prosecutors have obtained espionage and other criminal convictions of some intelligence agency personnel. But no CIA official who held a position as high as Mr. Foggo's has ever been prosecuted. His case is sensitive because of Mr. Foggo's former top-level status at the agency, his knowledge of a huge range of covert activities, and the fact that the investigation involves the awarding of contracts that the CIA is reluctant to have disclosed, the people with knowledge of the inquiry said.

Mark J. MacDougall, Mr. Foggo's lawyer, declined to comment on details of the investigation, but said "Mr. Foggo has served his country with honor and has committed no crime and has violated no law in that service."

If there is an indictment in such cases, a common strategy by defense lawyers is to demand classified material they say is needed for the defense, hoping that the government will refuse and the case will be dismissed. So prosecutors try to work out ahead of time what information can be disclosed and sometimes tailor the specific charges to evidence only in declassified materials. But prosecutors also can try to get as much evidence as possible declassified in advance, in hope of persuading the accused to negotiate a guilty plea and averting a trial in which secrets might be divulged. That happened with CIA turncoat spy Aldrich Ames, now serving a life sentence after he pleaded guilty in 2004 to divulging secrets to the former Soviet Union.

Negotiations Stall Case

Officials at the U.S. attorney's office in San Diego declined to comment on the investigation, though people with knowledge of it say it still appears that the declassification conflicts with the CIA can be worked out. But slow negotiations have substantially delayed the case. Prosecutors in San Diego had expected to get a grand jury indictment of Mr. Foggo some months ago.

The CIA doesn't appear to be trying to prevent charges against Mr. Foggo, say those familiar with the investigation. Rather, it has taken the position that the Justice Department can successfully complete its investigation of him without getting access to all the classified material they requested.

CIA Spokesman Mark Mansfield said the agency wouldn't comment "other than to emphasize that the CIA has been cooperating with the Department of Justice in their investigation and continues to do so."

Jeffrey Smith, a former CIA general counsel, said the agency traditionally has been eager to help prosecutors convict agency employees who committed crimes. He noted that a federal law, the Classified Information Protection Act, was adopted specifically to make it possible to prosecute spies and intelligence agency employees while protecting vital secrets.

Former CIA Director Porter Goss in November 2004 named Mr. Foggo, then a mid-level CIA official, to take on the high-level post. Mr. Foggo's close friendship with Mr. Wilkes emerged in December 2005 as a result of the Cunningham investigation. The Journal reported last spring that Mr. Foggo attended poker games arranged by Mr. Wilkes in Washington hotel suites, and that prosecutors were investigating evidence that during some of these games Mr. Wilkes had supplied Mr. Cunningham with prostitutes in the suites. A CIA spokeswoman confirmed at the time that Mr. Foggo had been present in the hotel "hospitality suites," but said Mr. Foggo denied that anything improper had occurred while he was there.

Arousing Suspicion

In May, Federal Bureau of Investigation and other federal agents searched Mr. Foggo's office at CIA headquarters in Langley, Va., and his home, days after he had announced his intention to resign. While Mr. Foggo was executive director, the CIA awarded at least one contract to one of Mr. Wilkes's companies, Archer Logistics, to provide water and other supplies to CIA agents in Iraq and Afghanistan. People close to the investigation say Mr. Wilkes paid for expensive vacations for Mr. Foggo and his wife, flying them on his corporate jet to Hawaii and Scotland, among other places. He also gave gifts to Mr. Foggo. An investigation by the CIA's inspector general, the results of which haven't been disclosed, looked into the contracts and whether Mr. Foggo, as required by agency rules, had informed the agency of the free trips and gifts.

Mr. Wilkes hasn't been charged but remains under investigation by San Diego federal prosecutors. His lawyers have strongly denied that he was involved in any illegal activity.

A House intelligence committee document made public in the fall disclosed that Mr. Foggo also has been under investigation for awarding contracts to the company of another individual, subsequently identified as Richard Wenzel, president of Global Transportation Systems in Sterling, Va. The firm received "several large contracts" from the CIA, the document said. People involved in the case say these included delivering equipment and supplies abroad, making use of the company's fleet of specialized Ilyushin 76 jet cargo planes. These aircraft can use makeshift runways and unload heavy cargo without requiring ground-based equipment.

DOJ_NMG_0114365

Mr. Wenzel is aiding prosecutors and isn't a target of the investigation. His lawyer, James Hamilton, said, "My client is solely a cooperating witness."

Judges Look To New Congress For Changes In Mandatory Sentencing Laws (NYT)

By Lynette Clemetson

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — Federal sentencing laws that require lengthy mandated prison terms for certain offenses are expected to come under fresh scrutiny as Democrats assume control of Congress.

Among those eagerly awaiting signs of change are federal judges, including many conservatives appointed by Republican presidents. They say the automatic sentences, determined by Congress, strip judges of individual discretion and result in ineffective, excessive penalties, often for low-level offenders.

Judges have long been critical of the automatic prison terms, referred to as mandatory minimum sentences, which were most recently enacted by Congress in 1986 in part to stem the drug trade. Now influential judges across the ideological spectrum say that the combination of Democratic leadership and growing Republican support for modest change may provide the best chance in years for a review of the system.

“With a changing of the guard, there should at least should be some discussion,” said William W. Wilkins, chief judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, who was nominated by President Ronald Reagan.

The House Judiciary Committee, under the new leadership of Representative John Conyers Jr., Democrat of Michigan, is planning hearings on the laws, starting later this month or in early February. One of the first issues planned for review is the sentencing disparity between offenses involving powder and crack cocaine.

The possession or trafficking of crack brings much harsher penalties than those for similar amounts of the powder form of the drug. Mr. Conyers, a longtime critic of mandatory minimum sentences, favors treating both drugs equally.

The Senate Judiciary Committee has no immediate plans for hearings. But Senator Jeff Sessions, Republican of Alabama, also supports some changes in the sentencing policy for crack cocaine convictions (though more modest than Mr. Conyers and some other Democrats favor), and Judiciary Committee staff members say a serious Senate review of the issue is likely in the current Congress.

Many law enforcement officials support tough, automatic sentences and argue that weakening existing laws will cause an increase in drug trafficking and violent crime. Many judges say current laws have clogged jails and too often punish low-level offenders. Some judges also argue that automatic lengthy sentences give prosecutors an unfair bargaining tool that they can use to tailor charges and press defendants into plea bargains.

“These sentences can serve a purpose in certain types of cases involving certain types of offenders,” said Judge Reggie B. Walton of Federal District Court in the District of Columbia, who was appointed by President Bush, “but when you apply them across the board you end up doing a disservice not just to individuals but to society at large.”

Several judges say that broad inclusion in the coming Congressional hearings on sentencing would mark a notable departure from Judiciary Committee activity under the former Republican chairman, Representative F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. of Wisconsin, who many judges say maintained an antagonistic stance toward judges.

“There was no question that judges were targeted under the Sensenbrenner committee for speaking out,” said Judge Nancy Gertner, a Federal District Court judge appointed by President Bill Clinton who teaches a course on sentencing policy at Yale Law School.

Judge Gertner and others point to the example of Judge James Rosenbaum, a Reagan appointee who, in 2003, faced a Congressional review of his sentencing decisions under a barrage of criticism that he and other federal judges were too lenient. Many in the judicial community argued that Judge Rosenbaum was singled out because he criticized a proposal to increase federal sentences in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee.

Most judges shy away from direct formal involvement in legislative matters. But many say private interactions with legislators that do not focus on specific cases but on policy matters of concern to the judiciary are appropriate.

Judge Wilkins, a former legislative assistant to Senator Strom Thurmond, said he believed private conversations on mandatory minimum sentences with his own congressman, Representative Bob Inglis, Republican of South Carolina, helped change the legislator’s position.

DOJ_NMG_0114366

Mr. Inglis, once a supporter of tough automatic sentences, said during a 1995 House vote that he would never vote for them again and has since become a Republican leader on sentencing reform.

"I was delighted that he took a principled stand, and I would like to think I was of some benefit to him in getting there," said Judge Wilkins, who served as the first chairman of the Federal Sentencing Commission, the body charged by Congress with developing sentencing guidelines and collecting and analyzing statistics.

Some judges have expressed displeasure with the system from the bench or in written opinions.

At a sentencing last January Judge Walter S. Smith Jr., of the Western District of Texas, was required to add 10 years to the already mandated 10-year sentence in a crack distribution case because a gun was found under the defendant's bed. During the sentencing, the judge stated, "This is one of those situations where I'd like to see a congressman sitting before me."

In an impassioned written opinion in 2004, Judge Paul G. Cassell of the Federal District Court in Utah, who was appointed by President Bush, called the mandatory 55-year sentence he was forced to give a low-level marijuana dealer who possessed, but did not use or brandish, a firearm "simply irrational."

In the opinion, Judge Cassell recommended a commutation of the sentence by the president, noting that the sentence, with consecutive 25-year terms for firearm possession, was longer than those required for an airport hijacker, second-degree murderer or a rapist.

The Supreme Court declined last fall to hear the case. But an amicus brief urging the court to take the case included signatures from legal figures like William Sessions, the former F.B.I. director; Janet Reno, attorney general during the Clinton administration; and Griffin Bell, attorney general under Jimmy Carter.

Many opponents of mandatory minimum sentences would like to see a full repeal of the laws. "After so many years of this, people have forgotten that we should be asking for the whole fix, not just little pieces," said Julie Stewart, president of Families Against Mandatory Minimums.

But most legal, legislative and judicial experts agree that repeal, or even broad-ranging overhaul of existing laws, is unlikely. More probable is serious review of crack cocaine sentencing laws.

Currently, possessing five grams of crack brings an automatic five-year sentence. It takes 500 grams of powder cocaine to warrant the same sentence. Similarly disparate higher amounts of the drugs results in a 10-year sentence. The 100-to-1 disparity, opponents of the law say, unfairly singles out poor, largely black offenders, who are more likely than whites to be convicted of dealing crack cocaine.

At a sentencing commission hearing in November, Judge Walton, associate director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy under the first President George Bush and a onetime supporter of tough crack cocaine sentences, said it would be "unconscionable to maintain the current sentencing structure" on crack cocaine.

Mr. Sessions is a co-sponsor of a bill that would change the ratio for the two drugs to 20 to 1, increasing the amount of crack that brings a five-year sentence to 20 grams from 5, and lowering the powder cocaine trigger from 500 grams to 400 grams.

If judges say they are hopeful for new debate on sentencing policy, they are quick to add that they are not naïve. After all, many say, even politicians who are critical of current laws fear looking soft on crime.

"Candidly, the Democrats were never particularly courageous on this issue either," Judge Gertner said. "But at least now it seems judges may be encouraged to be a part of the discussion. And if asked to speak up, I think many will."

Criminal Complaint: Alderman Accepted Bribe (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen And Gary Washburn, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, January 9, 2007

Video: Alderman faces federal corruption charges

Chicago Ald. Arenda Troutman was charged Monday with taking bribes to grease a development in her ward in an undercover sting in which she was recorded brashly asking one informant: "What do I get out of it?"

Troutman, a minor player at City Hall despite her 16 years on the City Council, was arrested at her home early Monday by FBI agents who had to break a window to open a door. Authorities said she first spoke to agents from a third-floor window at 6:30 a.m. but had refused to come down.

The complaint alleged Troutman (20th) took $5,000 in cash and was promised $10,000 more to smooth licensing and zoning for a development at 57th and Halsted Streets, where she also had arranged to have a residence and commercial space. The development deal never existed; it was invented by the FBI as part of the sting.

After receiving the $5,000 on Nov. 29, Troutman allegedly went to work for the development immediately.

"Say no more, hand me that phone," Troutman allegedly said after the cash was in hand, placing a call to the city's zoning administrator on the developer's behalf.

DOJ_NMG_0114367

The charges hark back to the days when the federal government snared one alderman after another in sting operations. Between 1972 and 1999, an average of one alderman a year was convicted of wrongdoing.

Troutman was allegedly caught on tape comparing politics with prostitution: "Most aldermen, most politicians are hos."

First Assistant U.S. Atty. Gary Shapiro described the complaint as another Chicago "civics lesson" in the history of corruption in the city.

"This time on how things get done in the 20th Ward of Chicago," Shapiro said.

"You want to build something? You want to improve your property? You need permits from the city?" Shapiro said. "You need zoning? You need the alderman's support? You want the alderman's support? You pay the alderman—you pay Arenda Troutman."

Troutman allegedly was taped by a cooperating witness who had fraudulently helped her refinance her mortgage in the past, prosecutors said. She allegedly lent money to the witness, taking it from a cash-filled box in her basement.

Witness was probe target

The witness was a target of a federal mortgage-fraud investigation until he came forward with information on his relationship with the alderman, authorities said. In addition to the cash payments and the space in the building, Troutman also demanded the contact buy $15,000 in tickets for a campaign fundraiser.

She directed her contact to have the developer simply pass on the cost of the extra bribe, authorities said.

"He know[s] 15 [expletives] ... his builder, his plumber ...," she allegedly said on the tapes.

The federal complaint unsealed Monday outlines two bribery schemes, the one last year involving the fictitious development and the other alleged dealings that prosecutors said showed Troutman's propensity to accept bribes.

The first scheme spanned 2002 and 2003, authorities said, and involved a witness shaken down after an employee of Troutman's office noticed he was rehabbing a two-flat without permits. The witness paid $8,000 to finish the work without interference from the alderman, the complaint states, and another $12,000 for support for a zoning change.

Agents searched Troutman's home in the 6500 block of South Kimbark Avenue on Monday, along with her 20th Ward offices. Authorities said it took nearly a half hour from the time agents arrived at her home until she was taken into custody, and investigators said there was some evidence that a shredder had been used in the home.

Troutman was released on a signature bond Monday afternoon after a hearing before Magistrate Judge Michael Mason and was expected back at the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse on Friday.

Troutman had brushes with scandal before Monday's arrest. In 2004, it became public that she had an association with Donnell "Scandalous" Jehan, an alleged Black Disciples gang leader who is being sought on drug conspiracy charges. In 2005, the Chicago Sun-Times reported that members of Troutman's family ran a trucking company that won more than $1 million from the Hired Truck Program.

"I don't think the press treated me fairly with either of those things," Troutman said in an interview with the Tribune late last year. "There is a cloud over my administration, though I have done nothing wrong."

Her lawyer, Sam Adam Jr., said the bribery case was at worst an example of Troutman's trying to help someone in her ward and might constitute entrapment. He said Troutman would plead not guilty.

"I can tell you that we categorically deny every single allegation made in here," Adam said of the complaint. "This did not take place in the way, manner, shape and form that they claim."

No zoning change

Adam said there was no zoning change for the property and nothing was built there.

"Ald. Troutman never took money to do something," said Adam, who acknowledged Troutman has been aware the government has been interested in her activities for some time.

As for the FBI's having to break in to Troutman's home to arrest her, Adam said Troutman was not willfully avoiding authorities.

"The lady was asleep in her own home, with two kids," he said. "Sleeping, and, bam, her window breaks open with the FBI banging on her door."

In Springfield for the inauguration of Gov. Rod Blagojevich, Mayor Richard Daley declined to comment on the charges.

Some aldermen were supportive.

"Arenda is a sweet girl, and I am sorry to see her in any sort of difficulties," said Ald. Bernard Stone (50th). "I don't know anything about her problems, and whatever it is will work itself out." The charges against Troutman are the first criminal allegations against a council member since former Ald. Percy Giles was accused of racketeering, fraud and tax evasion in 1999 and was found guilty of the charges and sentenced to prison.

Troutman made her way to the City Council in tried and tested fashion—as a loyal member of the Regular Democratic Organization, with time on the streets as a precinct captain. .

Troutman was a member of the ward organization of the late Cecil Partee, the former Illinois Senate president, Cook County state's attorney and city treasurer, whom she considered a mentor.

Daley, a Partee ally, selected her to fill the vacant position of 20th Ward alderman in 1990. Troutman was elected by the voters of her ward the following year, re-elected in three subsequent races and is running for another term in the February election.

Degree in political science

Troutman, a divorced mother of three boys, attended Calumet High School and earned a degree in political science from Southern Illinois University. She once worked as a miner in Southern Illinois for Inland Steel and Coal.

Tribune reporters Todd Lighty, Ray Gibson and Dan Mihalopoulos contributed to this report.

jcoen@tribune.com

gwashburn@tribune.com

Ald. Troutman Arrested On Corruption Charges (CHIST)

By Natasha Korecki And Fran Spielman, Federal Courts Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, January 9, 2007

Agents had to break a window to get in to Troutman's home. She wouldn't answer the door but had been seen peering through a window.

Among other acts, Troutman is accused of bribe-taking, a source with knowledge of the investigation said.

Troutman's attorney, Sam Adam Jr., said he was told his client is being accused of accepting a bribe in connection with a mall development in her ward.

"There are certainly some ugly allegations that are being spread, but we categorically deny any wrongdoing," Adam said. "She never accepted a bribe from anybody. This has to do with a mall somewhere in her ward. But I don't even think a mall went up."

Adam said he would not comment further until he sees the charges, which are expected to be unsealed this afternoon.

Troutman has been under scrutiny by law enforcement for years. Investigators are seeking her cooperation.

Searches were under way at her aldermanic office and home.

Troutman was questioned by the FBI in 2004 about her alleged love affair with fugitive Donnell "Scandalous" Jehan, a reputed street-gang leader, as part of an investigation into the Black Disciples street gang. In June, the FBI announced a $10,000 reward for information leading to Jehan's capture.

In a recent interview, Troutman said of Jehan: "There was never, ever anyone who proved there was any kind of relationship with anybody. Those were all allegations."

The Chicago Sun-Times subsequently reported that investigators wanted to know how an envelope addressed to Troutman with a return address of the Chicago Police Department ended up in the hands of the Black Disciples.

Troutman responded by holding a raucous news conference at her ward office at which she said she had met with top gang members under the impression they were legitimate businessmen and accepted their help during aldermanic elections. She would not discuss whether she had a personal relationship with Jehan.

The alderman said that two envelopes addressed to her from the police department might have ended up in Jehan's home because her office routinely recycles office materials. Asked whether Jehan had ever driven her Cadillac Escalade, Troutman said, "For years, I have let everybody drive my car."

Asked about her relationship with Jehan, Troutman responded by talking instead about her own family's struggle with drugs and say she would never associate with anyone bringing that "poison" into the community.

"There is no way I would be involved with any criminal activity. No way. I understand what dope has done to my community," she said then.

Three hours before that news conference, Troutman's brother was arrested in a drug-related sting.

Last summer, Troutman was embarassed again when the Sun-Times reported that her family had created and run Hobtat Trucking Co., which was paid more than $1.1 million by the city's Hired Truck Program. It was the first tme that an alderman's relatives had been linked to the scandal-ridden rogram.

At the time, the alderman said she never made a dime from the program and had "done nothing wrong."

Troutman was appointed by Mayor Daley in 1990, after the death of Ald. Ernest Jones (20th). The mayor stuck with her even after her opponents circulated police reports detailing her 1978 arrest for shoplifting. She admitted the crime, but the case was dropped.

Troutman is to appear before a federal magistrate judge at 2:30 this afternoon for her initial court appearance, a court clerk said.

DOJ_NMG_0114369

Chicago Alderman Accused Of Taking Payoff (AP)

By Deanna Bellandi

AP, January 9, 2007

CHICAGO - FBI agents had to break a window at a city alderman's home to get inside Monday to arrest her on a federal bribery charge for allegedly accepting $5,000 to help a fictitious developer move forward on a building project, authorities said.

In return for the money and the promise of more, Alderman Arenda Troutman agreed to back the bogus developer in getting zoning changes and alley access for a proposed development in her South Side ward, according to federal authorities who unsealed a criminal complaint against Troutman on Monday after an undercover investigation.

First Assistant U.S. Attorney Gary Shapiro said the complaint offers a civics lesson on how things get done in Troutman's ward.

"You wanna build something, you wanna improve your property, you need permits from the city, you need zoning, you need the alderman's support, you want the alderman's support? You pay the alderman, you pay Arenda Troutman," Shapiro said.

For her support, Troutman also allegedly expected to receive another $10,000 cash and a $5,000 political contribution, authorities said. They said she also negotiated for both commercial and residential space at the proposed development.

Defense attorney Sam Adam Jr. said Troutman is innocent and plans to plead not guilty.

"I can tell you that we categorically deny every single allegation," Adam said after her court appearance.

Troutman's arrest comes just weeks before the Feb. 27 city election. Five opponents have filed papers to get on the ballot to challenge her. Troutman has served on the City Council since 1990, when Mayor Richard M. Daley appointed her to fill a vacancy.

Daley, who was in Springfield Monday, declined to comment on Troutman's arrest.

In court, federal Magistrate Michael T. Mason set a $10,000 unsecured bond for Troutman, releasing her on her own recognizance.

Troutman, who was rousted from her home and taken into custody about 7 a.m. Monday, wore a black track suit with a black and white checked hat pulled down over pig tails. Authorities also searched her ward office.

Troutman had opened a third-floor window when FBI agents knocked on the door of her home but closed it after the agents said they wanted to talk with her, according to Robert Grant, special agent in-charge of the FBI's Chicago office.

The agents also asked a nanny, who spoke through another window, to let them inside and made several telephone calls to the home with no response, Grant said. After 20-30 minutes, the agents broke a window to open a door and enter the house.

Troutman does not have to resign as alderman while dealing with the charges against her, but would lose her City Council seat if she is convicted.

Since 1971, 27 Chicago aldermen have faced a variety of corruption charges, said University of Illinois at Chicago political science professor Dick Simpson.

The charge against Troutman stems from a series of recorded conversations beginning in May 2006 between Troutman and an undercover informant, according to court documents. The informant is a target of a separate mortgage fraud investigation who began cooperating with authorities in April 2006, according to federal officials.

Troutman allegedly helped the bogus developer by sending a letter to the city's department of transportation supporting alley access at the proposed site and asking for permits to be issued, the court documents said.

Troutman has been the subject of public scrutiny before.

In 2004, she wouldn't say whether she had a personal relationship with an alleged high-ranking gang member as federal authorities investigated the Black Disciples. She said two envelopes addressed to her from the Chicago Police Department that the FBI found during a raid of the alleged gang member's home may have come from recycled office materials her aides use and somehow wound up elsewhere. Her attorney said then that Troutman was not a target of that investigation and was not suspected of any wrongdoing.

Troutman got more attention in 2005 when a published report said her relatives ran a trucking firm that had gotten business as part of the city's scandal-plagued program that outsourced hauling jobs to private trucking companies.

That investigation into the city's Hired Truck Program has since expanded into a broad look at City Hall hiring practices. More than 40 people have been convicted.

Bevilacqua To Wait In Jail For Court Hearing (PROJO)

By W. Zachary Malinowski, Journal Staff Writer

The Providence Journal, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114370

BOSTON — Joseph A. Bevilacqua Jr., once one of the state's more prominent criminal defense lawyers, is headed back to jail.

Bevilacqua, who had been serving the final portion of an 18-month sentence on work release, was ordered held at the Barnstable County House of Correction on Cape Cod after his arrest last week on charges that he participated in a scheme to pocket $150,000 from drug-dealer clients.

Yesterday, Bevilacqua, 57, of West Warwick, learned that he will remain locked up in the county jail through Jan. 17. The next day, he will be taken back to U.S. District Court in Boston to be arraigned on a felony count of conspiracy.

At that time, the court indicated that he would probably be released and placed on strict supervision by federal probation officials.

Bevilacqua, known for his fine-tailored suits during his days as a lawyer, shuffled yesterday into the seventh-floor courtroom of the John Joseph Moakley United States Courthouse in leg irons and handcuffs. Two federal marshals escorted him to the defense table.

Bevilacqua, who looked like he had lost weight in recent months, wore jeans and a yellow long-sleeved Ralph Lauren polo shirt. His hair was askew and it appeared that he had just awoken from a long slumber in the courthouse lockup.

Jonathan Shapiro, Bevilacqua's court-appointed lawyer, asked Judge Joyce London Alexander to let Bevilacqua serve out the final days of his sentence in work release.

"It doesn't make a lot of sense to lock him up for a week," he said.

Shapiro said that Thomas Tarro, of East Greenwich, will serve as Bevilacqua's lawyer.

In 2005, Bevilacqua was sentenced to 18 months in federal prison for leaking a confidential FBI videotape to Jim Taricani, a Rhode Island television reporter. The conviction led to Bevilacqua's disbarment from practicing law.

Assistant U.S. Attorney William D. Weinreb told the judge that it was the Bureau of Prisons — not the court — that determined Bevilacqua should return to jail. He pointed out that the federal prison system still has control over the former lawyer's freedom.

On Friday, Bevilacqua and John M. Cicilline, the brother of Providence Mayor David N. Cicilline, were charged in the same plot to manipulate the criminal-justice system through two clients who are admitted drug dealers. Cicilline, 49, of Cranston, was released on $10,000 unsecured bail.

The 21-page indictment, unsealed on the day of the arrests, alleges that the lawyers conspired with interpreters/paralegals, Juan A. Giraldo and Lisa Torres, to provide the authorities with information on other drug dealers, which would then be used to bargain for more-lenient sentences for their clients.

Giraldo, 41, who was close friends with both lawyers, is serving a federal prison sentence on drug charges in Youngstown, Ohio. No date for his appearance in federal court in Boston has been announced.

Torres, 39, appeared in court briefly yesterday and arraigned on charges of conspiracy, obstruction of justice and making false statements. She was ordered held, pending a detention hearing on Thursday.

Judge Allows 2 More Parties Into Polygamist Leader Evidence Case (SDUT/AP)

By Ken Ritter, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 9, 2007

LAS VEGAS – A federal judge on Monday broadened the legal tug-of-war over cash, computers and other materials seized from a vehicle during the southern Nevada arrest of polygamist church leader Warren Jeffs.

In a quick decision, U.S. District Court Judge Robert Jones said two other parties may join the government and Jeff's lawyers in arguing the civil case – the United Effort Plan Trust, which holds $110 million in Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints property, and a former Jeffs follower who won a $338,000 judgment from Jeffs after being fired from his job.

Lawyers for Jeffs did not oppose the motion.

The judge did not address questions about the materials, which have been held by the federal government since they were seized from a Cadillac Escalade during Jeffs' arrest Aug. 28 outside Las Vegas. Police reported seizing $54,000 in cash, letters and other papers, four laptop computers, 15 cell phones, and other items, including wigs. The contents of the letters and information on computers has not been made public.

"He didn't deal with the merits of the sealing or who gets access," said Jeffrey L. Shields, a Salt Lake City-based lawyer for the United Effort Plan Trust. "He just granted intervention."

Jeffs 51, the leader of the FLDS, remains in a Utah jail pending an April trial on two felony charges of rape as an accomplice stemming from allegations he arranged the 2001 marriage between a 14-year-old girl and her cousin.

Lawyers Richard Wright and Margaret Stanish, representing Jeffs, declined comment outside court.

Wright contends in court documents that the information is “sacred and confidential” because it includes matters of church doctrine and private communications between Jeffs and his followers.

Accountant Bruce Wisan, representing the trust, wants to know if Jeffs' papers and electronic records will lead to church assets that rightfully belong to the trust and should benefit all current and former church members.

A Utah judge made Wisan overseer of the trust in 2005 after finding Jeffs and other church leaders were fleecing it for personal gain. The trust is comprised of nearly all the property in Hildale, Colorado City, Ariz., and British Columbia, where church members live in assigned housing.

Lawyers for Shem Fischer, the former Jeffs follower awaiting payment after winning a court judgment last May, said the documents “may shed more information as to where (church) assets have been hidden, in what form they are held and where they are held.”

In 2002, Fischer sued Jeffs, the church and a church-controlled cabinet company, for religious discrimination. Fischer said he was fired after he left the FLDS faith. He won a default judgment and now wants to collect the balance of what he is owed.

No date was immediately set for arguments about whether to release the seized evidence.

Battle Over Evidence Expands In Jeff Case (DESERET)

By Ben Winslow, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, January 9, 2007

LAS VEGAS — The hearing lasted about as long as it takes to lose $20 at the slot machines.

Warren Jeffs But it was just enough time for a federal judge here to allow more lawyers to get involved in the fight over a trove of papers, ledgers, documents, cash and other items the FBI seized when it arrested Fundamentalist LDS Church leader Warren Jeffs.

With no one voicing any opposition, U.S. District Court Judge Robert Jones allowed lawyers for the court-appointed special fiduciary of the United Effort Plan Trust and an ex-FLDS member trying to collect on a civil judgment against Jeffs to intervene in the upcoming evidence fight.

The move allows the attorneys to try to get their hands on what the FBI found inside the red Cadillac Escalade that Jeffs was riding in when he was arrested during a traffic stop outside Las Vegas in August 2006.

"We felt like we needed to be involved," said Jeffrey L. Shields, an attorney for Bruce Wisan, the UEP's court-appointed special fiduciary. The $110 million UEP Trust, the financial arm of the FLDS Church, was taken over by a judge in Salt Lake City's 3rd District Court in 2005.

Just as the hearing ended, Jeffs' Las Vegas lawyer, Richard Wright strode in only to discover it was all over. Still, he did not object.

"One is a judgment creditor, the other an interested party," Wright told the Deseret Morning News outside of court. "It doesn't mean they acquire anything."

Shortly after Jeffs was arrested, Wright filed an emergency motion in federal court demanding the return of the evidence, claiming some of the documents constitute "sacred" and privileged communications between the FLDS leader and some of his followers.

Lawyers pushing to see the evidence anticipate an uphill battle.

"I expect Mr. Wright is going to vigorously represent his client in a zealous manner," said William Bryson, another lawyer for the UEP fiduciary.

Among the $54,000 in cash, wigs, cell phones, computers and other evidence seized from the Escalade, FBI agents have told the Deseret Morning News they found ledgers that may detail who had been helping to keep Jeffs on the run. The FLDS leader was on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted list until his capture.

The U.S. Attorney's Office in Utah, which is handling the case, declined to comment Monday on the outcome of the hearing. An FBI agent from Salt Lake City was in the audience to keep track of the developments.

Shem Fischer, an ex-FLDS member who won a religious discrimination lawsuit against Jeffs, has been doggedly pursuing him through federal courts in several states trying to collect on a $338,000 judgment.

"There's probably data that shows where assets are. We want to be able to see that," Fischer's attorney James Stewart said outside of court.

So far, Stewart said Fischer has been able to collect approximately $132,000 — mostly from what authorities seized when they arrested Jeffs' brother Seth during a traffic stop in Pueblo, Colo., last year.

Seth Jeffs later pleaded guilty in a Denver federal court to harboring a fugitive, admitting he was a courier taking money and documents to help keep his brother on the run.

"There's some money we simply want to collect," Stewart said.

DOJ_NMG_0114372

Meanwhile, the Utah Attorney General's Office wants to see what the FBI seized and is considering wading into the evidence fight.

"We are absolutely interested in taking a look at what's in the papers and the computer and whether it has any evidence of any crimes committed here in Utah," spokesman Paul Murphy said.

Utah Attorney General Mark Shurtleff has acknowledged his office is conducting an organized crime investigation into Jeffs and the FLDS Church.

Jeffs, 51, is scheduled to face trial in St. George's 5th District Court on two counts of rape as an accomplice, a first-degree felony. He is accused of forcing a 14-year-old girl into a marriage with her 19-year-old cousin. Jeffs remains in the Purgatory Jail without bail.

Those aren't the FLDS leader's only criminal problems.

Across the border in Mohave County, Ariz., Jeffs is facing numerous charges accusing him of arranging child bride marriages. Federal prosecutors in Utah and Arizona also have refused to drop a warrant against him for unlawful flight to avoid prosecution, threatening to seek grand jury indictments should he ever be granted bail.

Twins' Birth Mother Returns To U.S. To Face Kidnapping Charge (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

OTTAWA: A woman accused of kidnapping her 17-month-old twins from their adoptive parents returned to the United States, escorted by Canadian police.

Allison Quets waived her right to an extradition hearing. Her lawyer, Jeff Schroeder, said she did so to return home more quickly to continue the custody fight for the twins, whom she says she gave up while suffering from postpartum illness.

A custody agreement allowed Quets to take the children from Denise and Kevin Needham for a brief visit just before Christmas, but authorities said she never returned the twins.

The FBI said Quets crossed the Canadian border with the twins Dec. 23. They were found on Dec. 29 in Ottawa, Ontario.

Quets was released on bail Thursday after her lawyer argued she presents a low flight risk.

Today in Americas

Bush will seek Iraq troop increase

California's governor seeks universal health care

Chávez pushes closer to socialism

In an affadavit, FBI Agent Michael Sutton wrote Quets and the Needhams argued over money and almost derailed the adoption in the first place.

Birth Mom Heads To U.S. Leaves Cda To Face Kidnapping Charge (CP)

Canadian Press, January 9, 2007

OTTAWA — A woman accused of kidnapping her 17-month-old twins from their adoptive parents headed back to the United States on Monday, escorted by RCMP and city police officers.

Released on bail Friday, Allison Quets returned to court after spending the weekend in nearby Renfrew, Ont. with friends. The couple, with whom she had stayed before she was arrested for suspected kidnapping Dec. 29, agreed to post money and bonds for her release and to vouch for her whereabouts until her court appearance.

Quets was turned over to police early Monday after she waived her right to an extradition hearing and special protection under a law which would have precluded her from being charged with anything other than the U.S. federal charge of international parental kidnapping once she crossed the border.

Her lawyer, Jeff Schroeder, said his client did that so that she could return home more quickly to continue to fight for the custody of the twins, whom she says she gave up while still suffering the effects of post-partum illness.

“I commend her for that,” said Shroeder. “She decided upon reflection it was better for her to return, better for her children and the possibility of being reunited with them.

“She has an appeal before the Florida civil courts and that’s what she wants to do.”

Quets was to be met at the border by a U.S. marshall and taken to a magistrate’s court in Syracuse, N.Y., for her first hearing.

She was arrested in Ottawa almost two weeks ago after fleeing to Ontario with the twins. An FBI warrant had been issued after the children were not returned to their adoptive parents following a scheduled visit in Raleigh, N.C., on Christmas Eve.

Man Reportedly Accused Of Extorting Oprah Winfrey Waives Preliminary Hearing (MACT)

By Megan Reichgott

DOJ_NMG_0114373

The Macon Telegraph, January 9, 2007

CHICAGO - The case against an Atlanta man reportedly accused of trying to extort $1.5 million from Oprah Winfrey is likely headed to a grand jury.

Keifer Bonvillain, 36, was scheduled to appear before a federal magistrate on Monday but waived the preliminary hearing, said Randall Samborn, spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office.

A grand jury may be asked instead to determine whether there is enough evidence to warrant a trial.

Samborn refused to confirm Winfrey was the target, and the criminal complaint only identified Bonvillain's aim as "Individual A," who was "a public figure and the owner of a Chicago-based company." The Chicago Tribune and the Chicago Sun-Times, citing unnamed sources, have reported his target was Winfrey.

There was no response to phone messages Monday seeking comment from Harpo Productions Inc., Winfrey's company.

Bonvillain's attorney, Kent Carlson, also did not return a phone call.

According to the complaint, Bonvillain met a California-based employee of the Chicago company at a party more than two years ago, then recorded conversations with the employee about the owner and her business.

In mid-October he sent the owner an e-mail, telling her an employee said awful things about her, the complaint states. A month later, Bonvillain sent a letter saying he had tapes of the conversations, an FBI agent alleges in the complaint.

Over the next few weeks, Bonvillain told the associate he wanted to publish a book based on the tapes and claimed he had received offers of $500,000 to $3 million from tabloids and book publishers, the complaint said.

The associate, who was working with the FBI, agreed to a $1.5 million price, wired Bonvillain $3,000 and arranged to meet him, the complaint said.

Bonvillain was arrested Dec. 15 in the parking lot of an Atlanta hotel and released on $20,000 bond.

Five Plead Guilty In FEMA Fraud Cases (BSH)

By Robin Fitzgerald

Biloxi Sun Herald, January 9, 2007

GULFPORT - Five South Mississippi residents pleaded guilty today to fraud cases involving disaster-relief assistance from FEMA.

The defendants who appeared before U.S. District Judge Louis Guirola Jr. are Emily Fuqua, Duane Adams, Clarence Hall, Patty Richards and Hassie Baker. They remain free to await sentencing on April 9 at 9 a.m.

They each face a maximum penalty of five years in prison, three years of supervised release, a $250,000 fine and a mandatory $100 special assessment fee. Guirola said a lesser sentence may be considered as part of their plea agreements. They also could be ordered to pay back the money they weren't entitled to receive.

Four of them pleaded guilty to making a false claim for disaster-relief assistance following Hurricane Katrina. Fuqua pleaded guilty to making a false statement to FEMA on Adams' behalf. Fuqua and Adams both worked at FEMA's Biloxi office until they were arrested on the job in September 2006.

The Sun Herald provides details coverage of the court hearings in Tuesday's editions.

Judge Delays Dowie's Sentencing In Fraud Case (LAT)

By John Spano, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

Judge will let the defense challenge the method of calculating the length of the PR executive's term.

A federal judge on Monday delayed sentencing for former public relations executive Douglas R. Dowie, but not before making comments favorable to both sides in the fraud case.

Dowie was convicted last fall of masterminding a long-running overbilling scheme that cost city taxpayers at least $6 million in unearned fees to public relations giant Fleishman-Hillard, whose local office he headed. Before joining the firm, Dowie was managing editor of the Daily News of Los Angeles.

"In my view, the government has more than adequately proved its case," U.S. District Judge Gary Feess said in court Monday. "I felt the jury's verdict was fully supported by the evidence. And I would have reached the same verdict."

But Feess delayed sentencing until Jan. 30 to allow full airing of a defense argument that prosecutors had miscalculated the number of months Dowie should serve in federal prison. The judge agreed that Dowie's lawyers could question an FBI agent who was responsible for the figures.

Defense lawyer Thomas E. Holliday said Dowie's maximum sentence should be 30 months in prison, while co-defendant John Stodder Jr. should face no more than 24 months — both well below the sentences sought by prosecutors. Stodder's sentencing also was delayed.

DOJ_NMG_0114374

The scandal rocked Los Angeles City Hall, spurred ethics reform and helped persuade voters to elect Antonio Villaraigosa mayor. It bloodied one of the nation's top public relations firms. Two years ago, Fleishman-Hillard paid almost $6 million to the city of Los Angeles to cover the fraudulent billings. The firm was never charged with a crime, though a succession of top executives at its L.A. office including Dowie were alleged to having participated in the scheme.

Fleishman paid $1 million to defend Dowie, then dropped him. Dowie has run up $3 million in additional defense costs, largely unpaid. His lawyers tried hard to persuade Feess that his employer threw him to the wolves, thus compromising Dowie's constitutional rights.

When Holliday suggested, as he has at many earlier hearings, that others at Fleishman-Hillard should have been tried in addition to Dowie, Feess suggested the issue is interesting but legally irrelevant.

"I'd be very interested to see people above [Dowie and Stodder] in court," Feess said at one point.

john.spano@latimes.com

Towers Perrin Laptops, Client Data Stolen (WSJ)

By Theo Francis

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

Five laptops containing data about tens of thousands of retirement-plan participants at multiple companies were reported stolen by benefits consulting giant Towers Perrin last month, the latest in a string of thefts across industries raising concerns about privacy and identity theft.

Towers Perrin reported the laptops missing on Dec. 7, and New York City police made an arrest on Dec. 28, but the computers haven't been recovered, people familiar with the matter said. A criminal complaint filed in New York suggests the laptops were stolen from a locked room in the building housing Towers Perrin's Manhattan office on Nov. 27.

In a written statement late Monday, Towers Perrin confirmed the theft of "a small number" of laptops containing "personal information" about clients' "current and, possibly, former employees."

"We deeply regret the inconvenience this may cause," the company said in its statement. "We take seriously our commitment to safeguarding our clients' confidential information and notified our affected clients as quickly as possible."

Consulting firms can have access to considerable sensitive data about benefit-plan participants, including names, addresses, Social Security numbers and retirement-account information.

One person familiar with the investigation said the theft didn't appear focused on identity theft, but rather on selling the computer hardware.

In its statement, Towers Perrin said it has "no knowledge that any of this information has been misused," but said it would offer employees of its clients credit monitoring services and advice on identity theft. The company said it was working closely with police and a private investigation firm.

Towers Perrin is among the largest U.S. benefits-consulting firms, offering administrative services for pension and 401(k) plans, executive compensation and other benefits. The company's Web site says its clients include three-quarters of the world's largest companies and most of the largest U.S. companies.

A spokeswoman for the Manhattan district attorney's office said that Dewayne Rivers, 30, a Towers Perrin employee until mid-December, was arrested Dec. 28 and arraigned the next day before being released on $10,000 bail.

High-profile laptop thefts have repeatedly raised consumer privacy and identity-theft concerns in recent months. Privacy Rights Clearinghouse, a consumer-advocacy group, counts more than 80 thefts since early 2005 in which laptops containing sensitive employee, customer, student or patient data were stolen.

Last month, Boeing Co. fired an employee whose laptop -- containing the personal information on 382,000 workers and retirees -- was stolen after the employee left it unattended. It was the third such incident at Boeing in 13 months, prompting Chairman and Chief Executive Jim McNerney to take a tougher stance on protecting sensitive employment information. In a memo to employees, Mr. McNerney said Boeing had taken steps to safeguard such data, "but the best policies, procedures, encryption software and awareness-raising in the world can't force people to use them." In addition to firing the employee, the employee's managers were reprimanded.

In May 2006, thieves took a laptop from a U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs analyst's home that contained information on 26 million people. In March 2006, a laptop containing data on 196,000 current and former Hewlett Packard Co. employees was stolen from the rental car of an employee at Fidelity Investments, which manages H-P's 401(k) and pension plans.

In many cases, thieves have appeared intent on reselling the laptops, rather than using the sensitive data on their hard drives, but privacy experts say the information could still be available to subsequent users.

Duke President Renews Call For District Attorney To Leave Case (NYT)

By Duff Wilson

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

DURHAM, N.C., Jan. 8 — The president of Duke University renewed his call on Monday for the district attorney to step aside from the sexual offense case against three former lacrosse players and give control to an independent party "who can restore confidence in the fairness of the process."

In an open letter to the Duke community as a new semester began, the president, Richard H. Brodhead, reviewed recent events in the case and sought to explain the university's responses since last March, when a stripper accused three students of raping her at a lacrosse team party.

Mr. Brodhead said that from the early, confusing days of the case, the university had been guided by two principles: If true, the accusations were "grave and should be taken very seriously." At the same time, "our students had to be presumed innocent until proven guilty through the legal process."

Now, he wrote, in the wake of developments that have raised questions about the district attorney's handling of the case, the need for a fair legal process demands that he recuse himself.

Early on, Mr. Brodhead recalled, the district attorney, Michael B. Nifong, said publicly that he was certain a rape had taken place. But on Dec. 22, Mr. Nifong dropped the rape charges, saying the accuser was no longer sure what had penetrated her. He is proceeding with sexual offense and kidnapping charges, which carry equally stiff sentences.

Given the certainty of the prosecutor's early statements, Mr. Brodhead said then and restated in his letter on Monday, the decision to drop the rape charges called the entire case into question.

"We entrust our conflicts to the law to provide a path to a fair resolution," Mr. Brodhead wrote. "But to earn this faith from the public, those who work in the legal process must behave with elemental fairness and regard for the rights of those involved. We need and deserve for that faith to be restored."

In recent weeks, Mr. Nifong has faced rising criticism and calls to step aside. At a court hearing in mid-December, it was revealed that he withheld potentially exculpatory DNA evidence from the defendants' lawyers; he could face a charge of prosecutorial misconduct. Two weeks later, the North Carolina State Bar filed ethics charges against him, saying he had made inflammatory statements about the team and had misled the public about evidence. And soon after, the North Carolina Conference of District Attorneys suggested he recuse himself "in the interest of justice."

Mr. Nifong did not respond to requests for comment. Previously, he has said he regretted some of his public statements. Last week, after he was sworn in for a four-year term at a private ceremony, he said he intended to do the job for which he was elected.

Over the course of the case, Mr. Brodhead himself has come under criticism from supporters of the lacrosse team for what they viewed as a failure to support the players' presumption of innocence.

Mr. Brodhead canceled the lacrosse season and sought the coach's resignation on April 4. He also set up five inquiries into the university and the lacrosse team. His letter on Monday referred to the Campus Culture Initiative, charged broadly with reviewing responsibility and respect across lines of sex, race and wealth.

The accuser is a local black woman and single mother of three, while the defendants are white.

Last week, because of what Mr. Brodhead's letter called the "new circumstances" of the case, Duke invited two defendants to return to school. They said they would consider it. The third defendant had already graduated.

CIVIL LAW:

Framed Men Take Stand At Trial (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 9, 2007

Tearfully recall decades in prison

Tears rolled down Joseph Salvati's face yesterday as he took the stand in federal court, recounting the family milestones he missed as his four young children grew up without him while he spent 30 years in prison for a murder he didn't commit.

Describing a jailhouse meeting with his parents shortly after his arrest in a 1965 gangland slaying, Salvati said, "I just sat with them and cried. I said: 'Don't believe none of this. This is a nightmare. It's a lie.' "

Salvati, who was 35 years old when he went to prison in 1967, spent 29 years and five months behind bars for the murder of petty thief Edward "Teddy" Deegan in a Chelsea alley before he was freed in March 1997, after William Weld, then governor, commuted his life sentence.

DOJ_NMG_0114376

Four years later, Salvati's codefendant, Peter Limone , was set free and the convictions of both men were overturned after it was revealed that long-secret FBI documents indicated they had been framed by a Mafia hitman-turned-government witness, Joseph "The Animal" Barboza .

"I couldn't believe the FBI would do a thing like that," said Salvati, wiping his eyes with a handkerchief. "These are people you look up to. They didn't care 40 years ago, and they don't care now."

Salvati and Limone testified yesterday in a civil trial over a wrongful imprisonment suit they have filed against the government, along with the families of two other men, Henry Tameleo and Louis Greco , who died in prison before they were exonerated in Deegan's slaying. They are seeking more than $100 million in damages.

Limone, also a father of four, who served 33 years in prison, described how Greco, a highly decorated World War II veteran and boxer, confided as he grew ill, "I'm going to end up dying in these prisons for nothing."

Salvati said he didn't know Deegan and suspected Barboza framed him because he had borrowed $400 from a loan shark, then got the better of bat-wielding thugs sent by Barboza to collect the debt.

Salvati said his wife of 53 years, Marie, visited him every week in prison while raising their children alone and "never doubted me."

Salvati's son, Anthony, who was 5 when his father went to prison, sobbed as he testified yesterday about how he tried to become the man of the family and was 8 years old when he gave his older sister away at her wedding.

"I cried my eyes out," said Anthony Salvati, now 44. "At 8 years old, I was taking his place. My father wasn't there so I knew it was my job to do it."

Salvati and Limone said they were able to go home on furloughs occasionally in the 1970s and 1980s, until the Dukakis administration halted the furlough program in 1987.

Anthony Salvati said his father missed his graduation, his wedding, and the birth of his two children .

Sharon Salvati, who was 11 when her father went to prison, broke into tears on the stand yesterday as she told the government lawyers that she was being forced to relive a nightmare by going through the trial.

"It's just very unfair for my family and all the families bringing this up," Sharon Salvati testified. "You took all our lives away, all of our childhoods. You'll never replace 30 years. You can never give it back to us. And, to think that you knew."

Wrongly Convicted Men Describe Decades In Prison (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

BOSTON - Joseph Salvati was 35, with a wife and four young children, when he was arrested in the 1965 gangland murder of Edward "Teddy" Deegan.

It would be more than 29 years, eight grandchildren and three great-grandchildren later before he left prison.

On Monday, Salvati, now 74, broke down and sobbed on the witness stand as he described his shock when he was arrested, his decades in prison and his feelings when he learned that the FBI knew he and three other men had been framed.

"I couldn't believe it - that the FBI could do a thing like this," he said. "This is people who protect you, people you look up to.

"They don't care - that's the bottom line," he said, burying his face in a handkerchief.

Salvati, Peter Limone Sr. and the families of two other men who died in prison - Henry Tameleo and Louis Greco - are suing the federal government for $100 million for false imprisonment.

The lawsuit accuses the government of malicious prosecution, intentional infliction of emotional distress, conspiracy and negligent supervision of FBI agents.

Salvati and Limone were exonerated in 2001 after a state judge found that FBI agents hid evidence from state prosecutors that could have cleared the men in order to protect an informant.

Lawyers for the men claim the FBI did not disclose that Joseph "The Animal" Barboza, a former mob hitman and FBI informant, and his cohort, Vincent "Jimmy" Flemmi were overheard on FBI wiretaps asking for permission to kill Deegan shortly before his murder.

The FBI also had internal memos that showed Barboza - who was the key witness against the four men at their trial - was framing the four men and protecting Flemmi, who was also an FBI informant at the time Deegan was killed.

Salvati was sentenced to life in prison as an accessory to murder. He was released from prison when his sentence was commuted in 1997, after serving a little more than 29 years. Limone served 33 years in prison before being freed in 2001.

Justice Department lawyers have argued during the civil case that federal authorities had no duty to share information with state prosecutors and cannot be liable for the results of a separate state investigation.

Salvati's lawyers say FBI memos showed the FBI believed Flemmi had killed Deegan, as well as six other people, but agents continued to use him as an informant.

DOJ_NMG_0114377

The memos were made public in 2001 after they were discovered by a Justice Department task force probing the FBI's relationship with gangsters and FBI informants James "Whitey" Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi, Vincent Flemmi's brother.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Former Terrorism Suspect Can Sue County Over Treatment In Jail, U.S. Judge Rules (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

(AP) - DETROIT-A former suspect in a federal terrorism case who says he was mistreated while in jail can sue the county, a federal judge has ruled.

Moroccan immigrant Karim Koubriti, 28, was held for three years in the Wayne County jail and claims he was strip searched, held in isolation for 23 hours a day and not allowed to exercise.

U.S. District Judge Bernard Friedman last week rejected the county's request to dismiss Koubriti's lawsuit, the Detroit Free Press reported Sunday. No trial date has been set.

"The decision means he'll get his day in court and his say at trial," said Koubriti's lawyer, Ben Gonek of Detroit. He is seeking unspecified damages.

Friedman's order dropped one count - that being served pork at the jail violated Koubriti's Muslim faith and his constitutional rights. But he upheld three other counts, including Koubriti's claim that he was "repeatedly subjected to unlawful and unnecessary strip searches designed to humiliate and degrade him because of and in retaliation for his religious beliefs."

The Wayne County Sheriff's Department had no immediate comment.

Koubriti and three other Middle Eastern immigrants had been accused of forming a terror cell in the Detroit area. In 2003, Koubriti and Abdel-Ilah Elmardoudi were convicted of conspiracy to aid terrorists and document fraud. A third man was convicted of document fraud, and the fourth was acquitted of all charges.

A federal judge later dismissed the convictions at the request of the Department of Justice, which said federal prosecutors in Detroit withheld evidence beneficial to the defendants.

Koubriti is free on bail and staying in a halfway house. The government is seeking to retry him on charges of attempting to commit insurance fraud.

Brooklyn Man, 38, Dies After Jolt From Police Taser (NYT)

By Andy Newman

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

The day after a disturbed man died after being shocked with a Taser stun gun in Queens by a police sergeant, a city police official yesterday provided a fuller account of the moments before the man apparently went into cardiac arrest.

The man, Blondel Lassegue, 38, a former schoolteacher, struggled with the police on Sunday afternoon in a kitchen of a house near Kennedy International Airport. Family members at the house said late yesterday that they would issue a statement today about the circumstances of Mr. Lassegue's death.

The Nassau County medical examiner's office, which is investigating the death, said the cause had not been determined.

The sergeant who shot Mr. Lassegue appeared to have been following departmental guidelines, said Chief Michael Collins, a New York Police Department spokesman. The Taser is widely used by police departments to subdue people, although there have been questions about its safety. Amnesty International says more than 220 people have died after being shot by Tasers.

Mr. Lassegue, a deeply religious man who lived in Flatbush, Brooklyn, had a history of mental illness and, according to family members, had recently stopped taking his medication, Chief Collins said. Four times in recent years, the police had been summoned to incidents involving Mr. Lassegue in Brooklyn, he added.

Shirley Donis, Mr. Lassegue's sister, described him as a scholarly man who spoke seven languages, including the Creole of his native Haiti, had a master's degree in psychology, and studied theology. Two weeks ago, she said, he went to Las Vegas to be ordained a Pentecostal minister. She said he was a kind, gentle person.

"He's a giver," she said. "He doesn't go out. He's always preaching. He always says you need to go to church."

On Sunday afternoon, the police said, Mr. Lassegue visited his aunt and uncle at 240-12 141st Avenue in Rosedale, Queens, on a tidy street lined with boxy houses and miniature lawns. He began behaving erratically, refused to leave and at one point grabbed a 1-year-old child, Chief Collins said.

The aunt called other relatives at Mr. Lassegue's home in Brooklyn, who called 911, Chief Collins said.

DOJ_NMG_0114378

A caravan of police cars and ambulances drove up around 5 p.m., drawing the attention of neighbors. Sandy Ronquillo crossed the street to the Lassegue house and was met by Mr. Lassegue's uncle, Clausel Lassegue, who told her his nephew was "acting crazy."

Chief Collins offered the following account of the events inside the house:

Four officers approached Mr. Lassegue in the kitchen to try to calm him down. He eventually agreed to be placed in handcuffs and taken to a hospital, but after the police had cuffed his left hand, he lashed out with his right, punching a sergeant in the face repeatedly.

The officers wrestled Mr. Lassegue down. "They have his hands behind his back," Chief Collins said. "They're sitting on his legs as he's kicking in the air."

A second sergeant warned Mr. Lassegue that he would shoot him with the Taser if he continued to resist. When he did, the sergeant fired a Taser dart, which typically delivers a shock of 50,000 volts.

The officers were able to finish handcuffing Mr. Lassegue. Paramedics had arrived, and they "declared him O.K.," Chief Collins said. The paramedics left the room.

The police officers were preparing to carry Mr. Lassegue "from the building when he becomes unresponsive," Chief Collins said. The paramedics were called back, but were unable to revive Mr. Lassegue. He was taken to Franklin Hospital Medical Center, just over the Nassau County line in Valley Stream, where he was pronounced dead at 6:39 p.m.

The sergeant who was struck and the other three officers were treated for minor injuries. The 1-year-old child was unharmed. The names of the officers and sergeants were not released by the police.

The spokeswoman for the Nassau County medical examiner's office, Diane Markunas, said that an autopsy was performed yesterday but that a finding on the cause of death awaited the results of toxicological and other tests.

The Taser gun, which fires barbs attached to fine wires and is used by more than 10,000 police departments around the world, has been the subject of conflicting studies about its safety.

Officials at Taser International, which makes it, say that it has been tested on volunteers about 200,000 times, and that tests financed by the United States Justice Department found that the Taser did not change heart rhythms or damage hearts. But a University of Wisconsin study found last year that the guns' shocks applied directly to the hearts of healthy pigs could cause them to stop beating. Chief Collins said he did not know where the Taser dart struck Mr. Lassegue.

Killing Stirs Racial Concerns In North Woods Of Wisconsin (NYT)

By Barbara Miner

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

MILWAUKEE, Jan. 8 — Law enforcement officials said Monday that a Hmong hunter found dead Saturday in northern Wisconsin had been murdered after an "accidental meeting" between the victim and another small game hunter.

The killing has reignited racial tension in Wisconsin's northern woods, where two years ago a Hmong hunter killed six white hunters and injured two others in a confrontation that included racial epithets.

Details remain sketchy about the latest killing, although there have been news reports that the two men had a confrontation.

"While there is much I would like to tell you, there is much I cannot tell you," Sheriff James Kanikula said at a news conference Monday in Marinette, Wis., The Associated Press reported.

The finding that the death of the Hmong hunter, Cha Vang, 30, had been intentional was based on an autopsy. The case has been turned over to Wisconsin's newly elected attorney general, J. B. Van Hollen.

The other hunter, James Nichols, 28, of Peshtigo, Wis., is being detained, but has not been charged in the killing. Mr. Nichols is being held on charges of violating parole and being a felon in possession of a firearm. A convicted burglar, he has been in custody since Saturday, when he showed up at a medical center with a gunshot wound.

Many members of the Hmong community here are urging caution.

"There are a lot of rumors, and there is a lot of talking, but I don't have all the information at this point," Yia Thao, president of the United Hmong Community Center in Green Bay, said in a telephone interview. "I believe in the law, and I hope that whoever caused the crime, I hope they will be put into justice."

The body of Mr. Vang, a father of five children age 3 to 10, was found partly concealed Saturday in the Peshtigo Harbor Wildlife Area. The hunting spot is an hour's drive north of Green Bay, where Mr. Vang lived, and about 250 miles north of Chicago.

He had been hunting small game with friends on Friday, and they reported him as missing when he did not show up at day's end. A search, which included tracking dogs, took place. The authorities did not find Mr. Vang's body until after questioning Mr. Nichols.

Hunting is deeply ingrained in both the Hmong and Wisconsin northern woods cultures. Distrust among the Hmong and other residents has been high since Chai Soua Vang of St. Paul killed six hunters and wounded two others in 2004 in north-central Wisconsin. The hunters had ordered Chai Soua Vang off private land. Mr. Vang is serving a life sentence.

About 40,000 Hmong live in Wisconsin, which has the third-highest Hmong population in the United States, after California and Minnesota. Roughly 6,000 live in the Green Bay area. The Hmong, who are from the mountain regions of Laos, were granted refugee status after the end of the Vietnam War.

Cha Vang was among the final wave of Hmong refugees from Thailand and emigrated to Wisconsin two years ago. He spoke little or no English and had recently been laid off from a manufacturing job, said Mr. Thao, of the Hmong community center.

After the killings two years ago, many Hmong felt nervous about hunting. "Everybody was worried," said Zongsae Vang, a community organizer with the Hmong American Friendship Association in Milwaukee, where most of the state's Hmong population lives.

Pang Vue Vang, Cha Vang's wife, does not speak English and she and the children are having difficulty coping with all that is happening, Mr. Thao said. "I see the wife crying all day, and the little one is asking for their dad," he said.

ANTITRUST:

GE Sets Private-Equity Limits (WSJ)

By Randall Smith And Kathryn Kranhold

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

In Auction of Plastics Unit, Restrictions on Team Bids Reflect Antitrust Concerns

General Electric Co. has asked for bids on its plastics business, valued at as much as $10 billion, in an auction that appears to reflect new concerns from the Justice Department about the lack of competition among possible private-equity buyers.

GE has told a handful of private-equity firms contacted about the possible plastics-unit sale that they face restrictions on their ability to team up with other private-equity bidders, according to people familiar with the sale effort. Although the exact nature of the restrictions isn't known, one of the people said the contacted firms aren't allowed to call other buyout funds about teaming up.

The restrictions may effectively limit the formation of so-called clubs, the teams of two or more private-equity firms that pool their resources to pursue a single acquisition deal.

A spokesman for GE, which is based in Fairfield, Conn., declined to comment.

GE has been weighing the future of its plastics business, which has been plagued by higher raw-materials costs and keen competition. The business, where former GE Chief Executive Jack Welch made an early mark as boss and which also employed current CEO Jeffrey Immelt, has an estimated value of between $8 billion and $10 billion and annual revenue of about $7 billion. In the first nine months of 2006, its revenue rose 1% to $5 billion, but operating profit fell 13% to $560 million.

Acting on GE's behalf, Wall Street investment bank Goldman Sachs Group Inc. has conveyed the bidding restrictions on the plastics unit to four private-equity firms, the people familiar with the matter said. Goldman has also contacted two potential bidders in the plastics industry, they added. Goldman declined to comment.

The "club" issue has taken on greater significance since October, when the Justice Department launched an antitrust probe of private-equity funds. The probe followed a trend in the past few years toward club bids. While the ostensible goal of forming buyout clubs has been to spread the risk of larger investments among the members of the club, some takeover professionals have voiced concern that clubs may also limit the number of competing bidders and the value of potential bids.

Amid such concerns, restrictions on clubs may become more common among companies auctioning substantial business assets. Although similar restrictions have been tried in the past, they have often been dropped as auctions proceeded and no single bidder proved willing to put up a large enough sum, takeover experts said.

In some recent cases, teams of three to five private-equity funds have been involved in major buyouts, with the value of some of these deals topping $30 billion, including debt. The value of the GE plastics unit, however, may be small enough for the restrictions to stick.

Since Mr. Immelt became CEO in 2001, he has transformed GE by selling slow-growth and underperforming businesses including reinsurance, industrial diamonds and motors. Among them are GE Insurance Solutions, which Swiss Reinsurance Co. acquired last year for $7.8 billion in cash and securities, plus assumption of $1.7 billion in debt. GE also spun off its consumer-insurance group, renamed Genworth Financial Inc.

DOJ_NMG_0114380

Large Acquisitions

Mr. Immelt has also expanded GE into health-care information technology, water treatment and security technologies. His biggest acquisitions include the British biosciences and medical-diagnostic firm, Amersham PLC, for about $9 billion, and Universal's entertainment assets for about $14 billion, which formed NBC Universal.

GE last month completed the sale of its silicon-and-quartz business for $3.4 billion to Apollo Management LP, a private-equity firm. The business had annual sales of roughly $2.5 billion. Since that sale, analysts have focused on a possible sale of all or part of the plastics unit.

GE has been shifting from commodity products such as plastics used in compact discs into higher-priced specialty materials used in autos, aviation and health care. For example, GE has developed lightweight materials including resins for car roofs, fenders and steering wheels.

Last month, Mr. Immelt said GE would "evaluate" the case for keeping plastics, but that he wasn't "necessarily" committed to wait for a turnaround. He noted that there was "infinite capital" to sell underperforming businesses to private-equity firms or strategic buyers.

Using Lots of Debt

Private-equity firms buy companies or divisions of companies using lots of debt on behalf of their investors, which include pension funds, endowments and wealthy families. They are called private-equity because the acquired companies are taken private.

Although some investment banks conducting auctions have sought to stimulate competition among rival private-equity bidders, in the past few years no agreed-to private-equity deal has been topped by a higher bid from a rival buyout firm.

In one auction that included restrictions on clubs, Goldman Sachs in March 2005 told potential private-equity bidders for luxury-goods retailer Neiman Marcus Group Inc. they could contact only a single additional buyout firm about forming a bidding "team."

The result was that two buyout firms that have both specialized in retailing deals, Texas Pacific Group and Bain Capital LLC, weren't able to join forces on a Neiman bid. The idea was to keep the two firms viewed as able to mount the strongest bids in competition against each other.

Within a month, one of the private-equity teams gained permission to bring in a third member. The winning bid of $5.1 billion from Texas Pacific and Warburg Pincus LLC topped bids from two other private-equity teams, one of which included Bain.

Flush with cash from investors seeking higher returns fueled by a rising market and amplified by debt, the buyout firms have completed ever-larger corporate takeovers. Last year, one group completed a buyout valued at $33 billion, including debt, of hospital chain HCA Inc., based in Nashville, Tenn.

The HCA board also sought to stimulate competition in the form of a rival bid by barring three initial members of the private-equity bidding group from adding additional members. However, a rival bid didn't materialize.

Faced with the antitrust probe, the buyout firms have launched a Washington lobbying effort. Last month, 11 of the largest fund groups formed the Private Equity Council, to be led by a former lobbyist for the videogame industry.

-- Henny Sender contributed to this article.

Write to Randall Smith at randall.smith@wsj.com4 and Kathryn Kranhold at kathryn.kranhold@wsj.com5

GE Reportedly Shopping Plastics Business (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

Report: General Electric Seeks to Sell Its $10 Billion Plastics Business

FAIRFIELD, Conn. (AP) -- General Electric Co. is seeking bids on its $10 billion plastics business, which has been hit hard by inflation in raw materials, The Wall Street Journal reported late Monday.

In seeking bids, GE has told several private-equity buyout firms contacted about the possible sale that they could be restricted in joining other private-equity bidders, the newspaper reported on its Web site, citing unidentified sources.

Gary Sheffer, a spokesman for GE, would not comment.

The possible restrictions among bidders reflect concerns by the U.S. Department of Justice about lack of competition among possible private-equity buyers, the newspaper reported.

Last October, the Justice Department began an antitrust probe of private-equity funds, looking particularly at private-equity firms that team up and prompting fears among some sellers that the number of bidders and size of the bids would be limited.

GE chief executive Jeff Immelt, in a conference call with analysts last October, called GE's plastics segment "the business we really need to remain focused on."

He said higher-than-expected commodities prices pushed down margins.

The plastics unit has current estimated revenues of $7 billion. Its value is estimated at between $8 billion and $10 billion. In the first nine months of 2006, its revenue rose 1 percent, to $5 billion, but operating profit fell 13 percent, to $560 million.

GE has been shifting from commodity products such as plastic used in compact discs into higher-priced specialty materials used in autos, aviation and health care. GE has developed lightweight materials including resins for car roofs, fenders and steering wheels.

GE Seeks $10 Billion For Plastics Unit, People Say (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Rachel Layne And Dana Cimilluca

Bloomberg, January 9, 2007

Jan. 8 (Bloomberg) -- General Electric Co., the world's second-biggest company by market value, is seeking bids for its plastics unit and may be offered as much as $10 billion, people with direct knowledge of the auction said.

The bids may come from private equity firms, said the people, who asked not to be identified because the talks are private. GE spokesman Russell Wilkerson declined to comment.

A sale would free Chief Executive Officer Jeffrey Immelt of one of the drags on GE's recent earnings. He said at a December investor meeting that the Fairfield, Connecticut-based company's plastics unit is ``in a difficult spot'' and that he's not necessarily committed to waiting for its fortunes to improve.

``It's nice to see them get away from the low-margin businesses like this,'' said Mike McGarr, an analyst at Becker Capital Management in Portland, Oregon, which owns about 800,000 GE shares. ``A lot of the hard work at GE is starting to pay off a bit and we are pleased with what Immelt has done steering toward services and infrastructure.''

GE has been weighing the sale after the high cost of benzene, the main oil-based material used in much of its plastic, cut earnings last year.

Immelt made almost $70 billion in acquisitions since becoming CEO in 2001 to enter faster-growing areas including healthcare, and he sold assets such as insurance that are volatile or capital intensive and hurt profit.

Shares of GE slipped 1 cent to $37.55 in New York Stock Exchange trading at 4:01 p.m. The stock has gained 5.9 percent in the past 12 months.

Early Talks

The negotiations are in the early stages, one person said. Goldman Sachs Group Inc., which has been hired to look for buyers, is restricting the ability of private equity firms to form groups in the auction, two of the people said.

Such restrictions aren't unheard of, though in this case it comes as the Justice Department investigates possible anticompetitive behavior on the part of buyout firms, which often team up to buy multibillion-dollar assets.

A sale could generate a hefty tax bill, since GE has owned the unit for a long time and likely carries it on the books at less than half its current value, one of the people said.

GE Plastics probably had an operating profit of about $738 million last year on sales of $6.7 billion, Citigroup analysts Jeffrey Sprague and P.J. Juvekar said in a Dec. 13 note. A sale may slice 3 cents to 4 cents off profit in 2007, Sprague said. He includes that possibility in his estimate of $2.22 a share.

Immelt's Efforts

Immelt last month forecast as much as 13 percent growth in earnings this year. The plastics unit is one dark spot. In the quarter ended in September, benzene prices rose 31 percent and the business posted a 23 percent drop in profit. GE had expected earnings in the unit to be little-changed.

``The chronically disappointing performance of GE Plastics increases the odds that the business gets sold,'' Sprague and Juvekar wrote. BASF of Germany and Midland, Michigan-based Dow Chemical Co. are the most likely buyers, they said.

Saudi Basic Industries Corp., the world's largest chemicals maker by market value, said last month it may bid for the plastics unit if it was put up for sale.

The more likely buyer could be a private-equity firm, McGarr said. GE last year sold its advanced materials unit, a maker of adhesives and sealants, to private equity firm Apollo Management LP for $3.8 billion.

Today, the company said it would buy drilling-equipment maker Vetco Gray Inc. for $1.9 billion as dwindling oil and gas reserves prompt energy companies to boost investments in opening new oil fields.

The Wall Street Journal reported the auction earlier today.

GE Imposes Private Equity Conditions On Plastics Deal (FT)

By Francesco Guerrera Andjames Politi In New York

Financial Times, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114382

General Electric has put its underperforming plastics business up for sale but has told private equity groups not to team up to bid for the unit, valued at about $10bn, for fear of antitrust objections to the deal.

The move by the US industrial conglomerate is the first sign that an ongoing investigation by the US Department of Justice into potential collusion among buy-out funds is prompting companies to revise the way they deal with private equity groups.

These groups have been able to buy ever-larger companies by joining forces in "club deals" such as the $33bn takeover of hospital operator HCA by a consortium of Bain Capital, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Merrill Lynch.

However, people close to the situation said that GE had demanded bids from individual buy-out funds only for its plastics unit in an apparent move to foster competition in the auction.

Jeffrey Immelt, GE's chairman and chief executive, has repeatedly told investors the company was reviewing the future of the $7bn-a-year plastics business, which has been hit by the rising costs of raw materials and natural gas.

"Am I committed to waiting for that to right itself? Not necessarily. But I will say that the business is in a difficult spot right now and a spot that almost nobody would have forecast . . . But look, we're going to evaluate stuff like that," he told investors last month

Mr Immelt has been a supporter of the growing influence of private equity on takeover markets, arguing that it makes it easier for large diversified companies like GE to reshape their portfolio by trading assets with buy-out groups.

GE has already found private equity groups to be attractive buyers for non-core businesses it is considering selling. In September, the group agreed to sell its advanced materials business, a supplier of sealants, adhesives, and ceramics materials, to Apollo Management in a deal worth $3.8bn.

A sale of the plastics business would be an emotional affair for Mr Immelt, who cut his managerial teeth in the unit, as did his famous predecessor Jack Welch.

However, he has been under pressure to sell the underperforming parts of GE's locomotive-to-washing machines portfolioto revive the company's share price.

GE and Goldman Sachs, its adviser on the sale, declined to comment.

Waste Services Buy Of Fla. Unit Gets OK (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

Justice Department OKs Waste Services $61M Acquisition of Allied Waste's Florida Operations

NEW YORK (AP) -- Waste Services Inc., a Canada-based solid waste management company, said Monday its previously announced acquisition of Allied Waste's South Florida operations has been cleared by the U.S. Department of Justice.

Under a deal signed in July, Waste Services agreed to pay $61 million in cash for Allied Waste's collection company, transfer station and recovery facility located in Miami-Dade County. In return, Waste Services agreed to sell its Arizona operations to Allied Waste for $53 million.

Shares of Waste Services Inc. dipped 3 cents to close at $9.90 on the Nasdaq. Shares of Allied Waste Industries Inc. rose 5 cents to $12.56 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Caremark Rejects Bid From Express Scripts (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

NASHVILLE, Jan. 8 -- Caremark Rx rejected a buyout offer by a rival pharmacy-benefits manager Monday and pledged to continue to pursue a bid from drugstore operator CVS.

Express Scripts responded by launching an effort to salvage its $26 billion stock-and-cash offer by reshaping the Caremark board of directors. The CVS deal, valued at $21 billion in stock, has passed antitrust scrutiny by the Federal Trade Commission and is expected to go to a shareholder vote and be completed by the end of March.

Express Scripts of Maryland Heights, Mo., contends that its proposal represents a 13 percent premium for shareholders over what Woonsocket, R.I.-based CVS is offering, but Caremark hasn't been swayed.

"The board has unanimously concluded that pursuing discussions with Express Scripts is not in the best financial or strategic interests of Caremark and its shareholders," Nashville-based Caremark said in a statement Monday.

Express Scripts said a few hours later that it had notified Caremark of its intentions to nominate four candidates to the Caremark board at the company's next shareholder meeting.

The only obstacle in the way of a shareholder vote on a deal between Caremark and CVS is a pending lawsuit filed in state court in Delaware, where Caremark is incorporated, by a Louisiana pension company with a block of Caremark stock. An injunction hearing is set for March 20 or earlier if a shareholder meeting to vote on the CVS deal is set, documents show.

The lawsuit seeks to block the CVS deal, claiming it is designed to benefit Caremark insiders at the expense of the shareholders. A similar lawsuit filed in federal court in Nashville was dismissed in favor of the Delaware suit.

DOJ_NMG_0114383

Express Scripts Moves To Derail A Merger (NYT)

By Milt Freudenheim

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

EXPRESS SCRIPTS opened a proxy war in the pharmacy benefits industry yesterday, moving to derail the pending acquisition of its rival Caremark Rx by the drugstore chain CVS.

Express Scripts said it would nominate four directors to the 11-member board of Caremark. But Caremark said the vote would need to wait for its annual meeting, which is normally held in May but which the company said yesterday it had not yet scheduled.

The action came after the Caremark board voted unanimously on Sunday to reject a $26 billion hostile takeover offer by Express Scripts, even though the offer values Caremark at about 13 percent higher than the CVS deal. Caremark said in a statement yesterday that the Express Scripts offer, which was made on Dec. 18, would create "significant, if not insurmountable, antitrust risks."

Express Scripts yesterday dismissed the antitrust issue as "a red herring" that Caremark was wielding to distract stockholders.

Caremark is currently the second-largest player and Express Scripts is No. 3 in pharmacy benefits management — the business of acting as a middleman between drug companies and health plans that offer drug benefits to workers, retirees and Medicare enrollees. The current leader is Medco Health Solutions, but a combined Caremark-Express Scripts would be much larger.

The question of how much competition prevails in the pharmacy benefit business is likely to be at the center of the proxy war. Express Scripts asked the Federal Trade Commission last week to review its bid and analysts expect the commission to seek further information later this month.

A second request could start a lengthy process and potentially cast a pall of uncertainty over the Caremark-CVS deal, which has already received antitrust clearance from the F.T.C. Caremark has said it would ask its shareholders to approve the CVS offer at a special meeting before March 31.

Edwin M. Crawford, Caremark's chairman, said in the company statement yesterday that the "certainty" of having the antitrust clearance "and the opportunity to close our merger promptly translate in a strong financial benefit."

Since the Express Scripts bid three weeks ago, Caremark investors have indicated hopes that the CVS deal would be sweetened, one way or another, but this has not yet happened. "Some investors may be figuring that a higher bid is worth waiting for, even with the uncertainty of the antitrust issue," said Sheryl Skolnick, a health care analyst with CRT Capital in Stamford.

Shares of Caremark gained 29 cents, to $56.64 yesterday, which analysts noted, was well above the CVS cash and stock offer for Caremark, which was worth a total of $52.35 at yesterday's CVS price.

Shares of CVS rose 18 cents, to $31.35. Express Scripts dropped 8 cents, to $68.78.

In the hope of speeding the antitrust review, Express Scripts has already dispatched its lawyers to start arguing its case before the commission staff. "Most people think this will get through the F.T.C.; granted it will take some time," said Kemp Dolliver, a health care analyst with Cowen & Company.

The pharmacy benefit business is "probably less consolidated than it looked 18 months ago," Mr. Dolliver said. With the advent of Medicare Part D drug coverage last year, the largest health insurers — WellPoint, UnitedHealth Group and Aetna — have aggressively expanded their in-house pharmacy benefits units.

Employers and smaller health plans can choose from the insurers' drug management services along with those of the big pharmacy benefit managers: Medco, Caremark and Express Scripts.

Trying to reduce drug costs, the pharmacy benefit managers bargain with drug manufacturers for rebates and discounts on brand-name drugs, and they work to switch patients to lower-cost generic versions of expensive brands. With taxpayers footing much of the bill for elderly Medicare enrollees and low-income people in Medicaid programs, the benefit managers' effectiveness became an issue in some Congressional races last fall.

Express Scripts yesterday nominated to the Caremark board Stuart L. Bascomb, chief executive of Amerisight, a privately held laser eye surgery company and former Express Scripts executive; Duke K. Bristow, an economist at the University of California, Los Angeles; John J. Jones, a former executive of the Argosy Gaming Company, and Todd E. Warnock, a health care investor and former investment banker at Credit Suisse First Boston.

In press releases yesterday, Express Scripts and Caremark each said that the merger it preferred could achieve $500 million in savings by cutting costs.

DOJ_NMG_0114384

Caremark said that combining with CVS would create an integrated health care product that would include mail-order and retail drug sales and "personalized pharmaceutical and disease management services." A forced merger with Express Scripts would require debt that would diminish the financial strength of the combined company, Caremark contended.

Express Scripts stressed that Citigroup and Credit Suisse had committed to fully finance the transaction. But even if Caremark and CVS shareholders reject CVS-Caremark merger, some analysts say that investor approval of the Express Scripts offer would be far from certain.

"I would be very surprised if Express Scripts and Caremark ever get together," said Andrew L. Speller, an analyst with A.G. Edwards & Sons in St. Louis.

Express Scripts Seeks Caremark Seats After Rejection (Update16) (BLOOM)

By Lisa Rapaport

Bloomberg, January 9, 2007

Jan. 8 (Bloomberg) -- Express Scripts Inc. will nominate four directors to Caremark Rx Inc.'s board in an effort to push through the $26 billion hostile bid that was rejected by Caremark earlier in favor of a lower offer from CVS Corp.

Express Scripts is seeking the seats in light of the Caremark board's ``refusal to even discuss our superior proposal," the St. Louis-based company said in a statement today. Caremark rejected the Express Script bid by saying the deal ``would result in a highly leveraged and weakened business" and ``insurmountable antitrust risks."

Caremark, a manager of prescription benefits for employee health plans, accepted a $21 billion bid on Nov. 1 from CVS, the No. 2 U.S. drugstore chain. CVS and Express Scripts, which is about a third of Caremark's size, want Caremark to help them gain clout in negotiating discounts on medicine and to lure customers from rivals such as Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and Medco Health Solutions Inc.

``Express Scripts has opened up a whole new ballgame," said Matt Kaufler, a portfolio manager at Clover Capital Management in Rochester, New York, in a telephone interview today. ``They may need to sweeten the bid and CVS may also need to sweeten their bid."

Kaufler said Caremark doesn't have a ``poison pill," or shareholder rights provision, that would make it difficult for Express Scripts to advance a hostile takeover by purchasing large blocks of Caremark shares.

``Other than the breakup fee with CVS, buying up shares shouldn't be a problem," Kaufler said.

Board Nominations

Express Scripts said it will nominate to the Caremark Board Stuart Bascomb, chief executive officer and chairman of Amerisight Inc.; Duke Bristow, an economist who teaches corporate finance at the University of Southern California; John Jones, a director of Topps Co., and Todd E. Warnock, founding partner of RoundTable Health Care Partners.

``Since we made our offer for Caremark public, Caremark stockholders and the marketplace as a whole have demonstrated their strong support for our offer," the Express Scripts statement said. ``We clearly provide Caremark stockholders with superior value to the proposed acquisition of Caremark by CVS."

Caremark said in a Jan. 7 statement that the Express Scripts proposal ``would result in a highly leveraged and weakened business" and ``insurmountable anti-trust risks."

Financing

In a subsequent regulatory filing, Caremark said it rejected that offer because Express Scripts didn't ``disclose its financing." Caremark also said it couldn't ``envision any scenario where it would be willing to trigger the imposition of a $675 million break up fee" to CVS ``without having a competing party obligated to fund that payment."

Express Scripts said its acquisition would be partially financed through Citigroup and Credit Suisse. The company retained Skadden, Arps, Slate Meagher & Flom LLP as legal counsel.

Earlier in the day, Express Scripts said in a statement that Caremark was using ``antitrust as a red herring to distract stockholders from the real value differential at issue." Express Scripts, with a market value of $9.33 billion compared with Caremark's $24 billion, had threatened to file a proxy to take its offer directly to Caremark shareholders.

``The premium alone argues for a rejection of the current CVS bid," Matt Perry, an analyst with Wachovia Capital Markets LLC in New York, wrote in a Jan. 4 note to clients.

Shares

Caremark's shares rose 29 cents to $56.64 at 4:01 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, while shares of Woonsocket, Rhode Island-based CVS rose 18 cents to $31.35. Shares of Express Scripts fell 8 cents to $68.78 in Nasdaq stock market composite trading.

DOJ_NMG_0114385

Caremark's stock has climbed 17 percent since Nov. 1, when Woonsocket, Rhode Island-based CVS offered $48.53 a share. The shares have traded closer to Express Scripts' Dec. 18 offer of $58.50 each. CVS shares have gained 7.3 percent since the Nov. 1 bid, while the stock of Express Script have dropped 1.5 percent since its offer.

Caremark's directors met Dec. 22 to discuss Express Scripts' proposal and spoke again by teleconference Dec. 27 before voting unanimously to reject the offer on Jan. 5, Caremark said today in a regulatory filing.

``We look forward to closing our transaction during the first quarter of 2007," CVS Chief Executive Officer Tom Ryan said today in a regulatory filing. In a later filing, Ryan called the Express Scripts nomination of four directors ``nothing more than a publicity stunt."

3Q Completion

Express Scripts said today at a meeting with investors in San Francisco that it expected its takeover of Caremark to be completed by the end of the third quarter of 2007.

``Express Scripts' latest actions illustrate its desperation to disrupt our merger with CVS due to fear of competition," Caremark CEO Mac Crawford said in a statement released today on Business Wire.

Employers hire Caremark and rivals to hold costs down by seeking out drug manufacturers and pharmacies with the best prices. Health insurance plans and employers are turning to such companies to help counter rising health-care costs. Spending on prescription drugs in the U.S. increased 5.4 percent to $251.8 billion in 2005.

CVS, which has 6,200 outlets in 43 states, wants to buy Caremark to gain size and power to negotiate prices with drugmakers and prevent foot traffic lost to mail-order medicines from hurting sales of razors, sodas and makeup.

The offer from Express Scripts would reduce the number of major competitors in the drug-benefits industry to two from three, CVS Chief Executive Officer Tom Ryan said in a statement last week. CVS is the fourth-biggest U.S. pharmacy-benefit manager through its PharmaCare unit.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

EU Calls For New Low-Carbon Power Era (AP)

By Aoife White, Ap Business Writer

AP, January 9, 2007

EU Calls for New Low-Carbon Power Revolution As It Seeks to Cut Oil Imports

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- The European Union will call for "a new industrial revolution" on Wednesday as it tries to rein in oil imports and slash the carbon emissions blamed for global warming.

In a draft paper seen by the Associated Press, the European Commission says the days of secure, cheap energy for Europe are over.

Surging world demand for limited stocks of oil and gas has sent prices higher. The EU executive said Europe has to look at alternatives: using more renewable energy such as wind power and biofuels.

It also suggests that current plans to cut back nuclear power -- which it calls "one of the cheapest sources of low carbon energy" -- will endanger the goal of curbing greenhouse gas emissions.

Electricity generation will be "heavily dependent" on natural gas, it said, warning a number of countries reliant on one main supplier that they should diversify.

The EU said it is confident that relationships with oil and gas suppliers Norway, Russia and Algeria will strengthen but also that it needs to open up a range of sources, suppliers, transport routes and methods.

European concerns about the reliability of Russian supplies were underscored Monday when shipments of oil via a pipeline running through Belarus were disrupted by a trade dispute between the two former Soviet republics.

Germany and Poland said earlier Monday Russian supplies had been halted, and Russia accused Belarus of siphoning off oil destined for Europe since the weekend.

Russian state pipeline operator Transneft said Belarus, which is furious that Russia is demanding it pay new oil duties, had diverted 79,000 tons of oil so far.

In an effort to diversify supply, the EU plans to start negotiations with Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan, build on agreements with Azerbaijan and Kazakhstan and cement relations with Turkey, Egypt and other nations, including Libya "if possible," it said.

It will also explore bilateral pacts with the Gulf state of Qatar and energy exporting nations in the Caribbean and Latin America, it said.

The world also needs to make a global effort to cut energy use, it suggests, proposing an energy efficiency agreement for industrialized nations plus China, India and Brazil to be signed at the Beijing Olympics in July 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0114386

Supply uncertainties mean the EU has to rely on power in its own backyard, boosting renewables and making clean coal technology a reality.

The EU executive suggests setting a new target -- no figure appears in the draft -- for renewable power by 2020, with a binding target for biofuels to replace oil in vehicles. It says that biofuels could take up 14 percent of that market by 2020.

"Major investment" in renewable energy is needed to create the economies of scale that would make it viable, it said, acknowledging that many EU nations will fail to make existing goals to draw 12 percent of all EU energy from renewables by 2010.

Vast amounts of money also need to be pumped into Europe's electricity network with some 900 billion euros ($1.17 trillion) needed just to provide more power generation alone in the next 25 years as demand grows.

The EU recognizes serious problems with the way the electricity and gas markets work, highlighting the control huge energy companies have over production and sales. These issues will be detailed in a parallel report from EU antitrust regulators on Wednesday.

It said these market problems are causing governments to cap power prices, leading to less investment in the sector that could cause future supply crunches. "This situation cannot continue," it warns, saying it believes a series of measures need to be taken to create a competitive market within three years.

Polluted Waters Stain D.C.'s Shining Vision (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

The Anacostia River, planned as the scenic centerpiece of massive redevelopment in the District, remains heavily polluted by sewage, trash and toxic chemicals, environmentalists say -- and it might be years before the river's health catches up with its new cachet.

In the city's plans, the Anacostia will soon be surrounded by a necklace of new stadiums, office buildings, condominiums and parks. A river that has come to symbolize neglect, both of its water and of the neighborhoods near its banks, will become a new hub of urban life.

But that bright vision is hard to square with the Anacostia of the present. Its channels are choked with mud and floating debris. Its catfish have tumors on their livers and lips. And, dozens of times a year, it actually stinks, from human waste dumped out by the District's sewer system.

Now, activists wonder whether a dirty river will start to hold this development back. Or maybe, they hope, all this building will speed the Anacostia's recovery by making activists out of people who are seeing its plight for the first time.

"You really cannot build a world-class city on a wrecked river," said Thomas Arrasmith, a leader at the Anacostia Watershed Citizens Advisory Committee. "You cannot have a world-class city with a sewer running through it."

The Anacostia winds its entire course inside the Capital Beltway, beginning near Bladensburg and emptying into the Potomac River 8.4 miles downstream at the District's Hains Point. It is often out of sight, though, even to those who live near the river. People have been kept away by the U.S. National Arboretum, the Anacostia Freeway and other barriers -- and the historical perception that the river isn't worth visiting.

"One of the sad things about the Anacostia: It's been so dirty for so long that people shunned it," said Joseph Glover, a Southeast Washington resident who helps monitor the health of an Anacostia tributary, Pope Branch.

If the plans on city drawing boards are followed, however, it will not be that way for long.

The marquee project of the new waterfront development effort is the Washington Nationals baseball stadium, whose steel skeleton is rising near the Frederick Douglass Memorial Bridge. City officials hope to surround it with a new entertainment and residential district. They also plan to remake the area just to the east, adding office buildings and a three-block Washington Canal Park.

They want to turn the area around the old D.C. General Hospital into a neighborhood, extending Capitol Hill to the riverside. On the south side, a stretch of empty land called Poplar Point could be converted into a D.C. United soccer stadium or perhaps a park surrounded by a crescent of residential buildings.

"The whole purpose here is to think of the river as a great centerpiece of the city and not a dividing line," said Uwe Brandes, a vice president of the city-chartered Anacostia Waterfront Corp.

Most of the pollution the Anacostia suffers from is not the kind for which miscreants are tracked down and fined. Instead, most of it comes from obvious sources, such as lawns, sewage plants and storm drains -- within the law, or at least not the target of stringent enforcement.

Brandes said he worried that development will slow if the river doesn't get clean.

DOJ_NMG_0114387

Douglas Jemal, whose Douglas Development Corp. plans to build near the new baseball stadium, said he believed that development and new public attention would lead to a cleaner river.

"I can't imagine it's not going to get taken care of," he said.

Today, though, the Anacostia is not ready for its close-up.Maryland

Across the street from a shopping center in Prince George's County, and a few feet into some thorny woods, James Connolly stopped at a 12-foot-deep gully. Its bottom was littered with plastic bags, chunks of brick, even campaign signs from the fall election.

Connolly, executive director of the Anacostia Watershed Society, pointed out what made the gully: a storm sewer pipe. Running downhill from the shopping center, he said, the rainwater in the pipe moves fast enough to carve earth.

The water flows to the Northwest Branch, a tributary of the Anacostia, carrying dirt and trash.

Environmentalists have nicknamed this gully and others like it "The Gorges of Prince George's," although there are similar problems in Montgomery County tributaries. These deep channels are a stark example of what they call a major problem in Maryland, home to more than 80 percent of the Anacostia's roughly 176-square-mile watershed: Suburbanization has supplanted trees and paved over dirt with concrete. Rainwater is funneled swiftly downstream, carrying with it dirt, trash and chemicals.

The dirt: One survey found that sediment levels in the river needed to be reduced 77 percent to meet water-quality standards. At Bladensburg, where in Colonial times the river was deep enough for oceangoing ships, so much sediment has built up that there is often exposed mud in the middle.

The trash: An estimated 20,000 tons come downstream every year. There are coffee cups, soft drink bottles -- an astounding number of basketballs, river aficionados say -- plus tree trunks and other more dangerous debris.

The University of Maryland men's crew team, which practices on the Anacostia, had six boats damaged this season by things in the water. "After a big rain, we've had to turn around," said Chris Mattingly, the team's president. "It's just a lot of shopping carts, big stuff that gets down there after a rain."

And the chemicals: They wash off roads and parking lots and include oil and grease and exhaust byproducts called PAHs. The high concentration of PAHs, known to cause cancer, was cited when a survey found that more than half of the river's brown bullhead catfish had tumors. It was equal to the highest tumor levels ever seen in a U.S. river.

There have been efforts to fix that problem by using filters to capture trash and using plants and artificial wetlands to absorb stormwater upstream.

But in Montgomery and Prince George's, officials say the problem is much bigger than the solution. It will be very hard to retrofit entire neighborhoods, they say, because many of the changes would have to be made on private property.The District

In the District's section of the Anacostia, the problem is not water running too fast; it's the opposite. The Anacostia in the District is beyond languid. It can take more than 30 days for water to make the trip from Bladensburg to the Potomac.

That means the river doesn't flush out pollution quickly. It remembers insults. One of the biggest came from Washington Navy Yard, where runoff from ship maintenance and munitions-building washed down hazardous metals and other chemicals.

The Navy Yard is an Environmental Protection Agency Superfund cleanup site, though some of the most toxic soil and groundwater has been removed or cleaned. One current research project has put down layers of sand and absorbent materials a foot thick on the river bottom there, hoping to bury the remaining pollutants.

Another problem is the District's sewer system, designed more than a century ago to dump out raw sewage during moderate rainstorms. It still does. At last count, the system dumped 2.14 billion gallons of mixed rainwater and waste into the Anacostia. The river's count of fecal coliform bacteria has been found to be 21 times the EPA's limit.

Being on the river when waste is flowing in is "like being in a toilet," said Connolly, the watershed society's director.

When he said it, he was steering a boat to show the location of one sewage "outfall" -- within sniffing distance of the new Nationals ballpark.

"It's going to be stinky, especially after a rain," Connolly said. "You'll stand up in the seventh-inning stretch and get a big whiff of sewage."

The D.C. Water and Sewer Authority is working to solve this problem, with a plan to dig enormous tunnels under the city where water can be stored during a rainstorm, then treated to remove the sewage.

WASA Chief of Staff Johnnie Hemphill said 30 percent of the problem had been eliminated. But fixing the bulk, he said, will probably take close to 20 years and $2 billion.The Future

The Anacostia today provides stark contrasts of beauty and ugliness, sometimes on the same day.

Gabriel Horchler, a Library of Congress employee who often commutes from Cheverly in a rowing shell, said he sees beavers and deer on the river's wooded shorelines -- but he has had people spit at him and throw rocks from the Benning Road bridge. He has seen the bald eagles that have recently come back -- and dodged car bumpers and baby carriages in the current.

DOJ_NMG_0114388

"Sometimes, it's depressingly dirty and noxious," Horchler said. "And sometimes, it's very beautiful."

New parks and high-dollar developments could sharpen the contrast between what the Anacostia is and what it should be. Environmentalists hope that will translate into a greater public demand for cleanup.

Already, though, there have been battles over pollution control at the stadium. Environmentalists say they're happy that the city plans to try to corral stormwater, but they had also hoped for a green roof of plants on the stadium.

Planners say that would take away from one of the ballpark's signature features: its sweeping silvery roof canopy.

"This is a great opportunity for the river, and it still can be, hopefully," said Brian Van Wye, an activist whose title is Anacostia riverkeeper. "But the stadium has so far been fundamentally disappointing."

Thinking about the future, city officials tick off encouraging stories from other cities, where waterside development led to environmental improvements: the Chicago River, Boston Harbor.

But skeptics in Washington can also think of a counterexample, less than 40 miles north. It's got a ballpark and shops near the water -- and, still, one of the worst pollution problems in the mid-Atlantic.

"I'd take that person up to the Inner Harbor" in Baltimore, said Ed Merrifield, who serves as the riverkeeper for the Potomac. "And have them jump in the water there."

Tribe Keeps Fighting For Treaty Rights (AP)

By Ken Ritter, Associated Press Writer

Associated Press, January 9, 2007

LAS VEGAS (AP) -- The way Allen Moss sees it, vast stretches of the West and all of their wealth belong to the Indians.

And despite being turned back in lawsuit after lawsuit for decades, the Western Shoshone leader says he won't rest until the U.S. government honors a 19th-century treaty that, according to the tribe, entitles it to reclaim ancestral lands extending from California through Nevada and Utah to Idaho.

The lands include much of the Las Vegas area. The Shoshones say they are not interested in Sin City - too many people, too many problems. But they want the rugged desert hills that have yielded tens billions of dollars worth of gold over decades.

At issue is the 1863 Treaty of Ruby Valley, which the Shoshone say gave the tribe - not the federal government - royalties and final say over water, mineral and property rights for land covering 93,750 square miles, an area roughly the size of Maine.

Moss, a representative to the eight-member tribal council in Nevada, estimates the number of Shoshone at 5,000 to 8,000 - descendants of people who lived from the Snake River Valley in Idaho to the Salt Lake Valley in Utah, across most of eastern and central Nevada, and in Death Valley and the Mojave Desert in California.

The tribe has taken its case to fence lines, courts, international tribunals and the public.

It sued to block the nation's nuclear waste from being stored in Nevada. It succeeded in postponing government plans to explode a non-nuclear bomb that would send the first mushroom cloud in decades over the desert. And it went all the way to Switzerland to ask the United Nations to intervene in the land dispute.

The tribe keeps losing on most fronts, but also keeps appealing - and some cases its members have notched a place in Western lore.

Tribal elder Carrie Dann and her sister Mary became folk heroes for defying the government in a losing, quarter-century battle to graze cattle on federal land without authorization.

The Supreme Court ruled against the tribe in another case in 1979, saying the Treaty of Ruby Valley gave the U.S. trusteeship over the tribal lands. And in September, the Court of Claims in Washington accepted the government position that the treaty was "merely one of friendship and that it conveyed no treaty rights."

Lawyer Bob Hager, who has been handling Western Shoshone cases for free since 1983, maintains the tribe is losing on technicalities. He said the tribal claim finally got traction - and attention - with the U.N. Committee for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination last year in Geneva.

The panel said the U.S. government is trampling on Shoshone rights. It cited the privatization of Shoshone ancestral lands for mining and energy developers and federal efforts to open a nuclear waste dump at Yucca Mountain, 90 miles from Las Vegas.

Cynthia Magnuson, a U.S. Justice Department spokeswoman in Washington, said the government would not comment on the dispute because the case is still in court.

The government has offered tribal members money, arguing it is unrealistic to expect the U.S. to give back lands acquired through "gradual encroachment" and now dotted with cities, crisscrossed by interstate highways and railroads, and used for mining, ranching and recreation.

A law signed by President Bush in 2004 approved the distribution to tribal members of more than $145 million, including some $26 million that a federal Indian claims commission awarded in 1979.

DOJ_NMG_0114389

Some Shoshones have said they would take the cash, but others balked. Moss, who loads preprinted newspaper advertisements for a living, said the money will not be touched because to take it would be to concede the government's position.

"Our land is not for sale," he said. The money continues to collect interest.

Moss is not sure his sons, now 25 and 21, will take up the decades-long fight.

"They can't believe how long the battle has taken," said Moss, 52. "They were taught in school this is a land of laws. I sit here saying, `This is how the laws have been manipulated and twisted.'"

"The whole thing boils down to, `How many times can you break the law or twist the law in your favor?' That's what the government has done."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Seven Programs To Watch In 2007 (GCN)

By Wilson P. Dizard III, Jason Miller, Mary Mosquera And Patience Wait

Government Computer News, January 8, 2007

SBINet

Impact in '07: The SBINet program, an ambitious effort to gain control of the borders via improved technology, combines a high political profile with daunting technology and program risks.

SBINet's success or failure in 2007 will stand as both a defining legacy of Homeland Security Department secretary Michael Chertoff, who has given it high priority, and a watershed for DHS' shaky program management capabilities.

Previous border technology programs, such as the Border Patrol's scuttled America's Shield program, have alerted Congress and oversight agencies to the high risk of failure in the border security arena.

As a result, SBINet faces skeptical oversight from the House Homeland Security Subcommittee on Management, Integration and Oversight, DHS inspector general Richard Skinner and the Government Accountability Office.

One major criticism of SBINet is that the program management office is understaffed. In response, program manager Greg Giddens pledged during a hearing of the House subcommittee to hire more than 200 additional program management office employees by mid-2007.

But Skinner testified at the same hearing that when Giddens completes that hiring, "The emerging organizational structure [will include] 65 percent of the 252 positions as contractors," a proportion he called "excessive."

SBINet will begin 2007 by launching a Common Operating Picture project this month, completing the system design in April and deploying it immediately along parts of the southwest border.

Another 2007 priority is the $20 million Project 28, to deploy unattended ground sensors, radars, cameras and towers in the Sasabe area of the southern border's Tucson, Ariz., sector.

DHS plans to integrate sensor data via a network that will shuttle information among computers in Border Patrol trucks, partner agencies and mobile command centers.

An additional $55 million SBINet project for 2007 aims to gain control over a military weapons testing zone in the Yuma, Ariz., sector, using IT as well as improved roads and fences.

Farmington Hills Pot Bust Is Oakland's Second In Four Days (DN)

Detroit News, January 8, 2007

FARMINGTON HILLS -- For the second time in four days Oakland County police say they have stopped a major marijuana dealing operation.

Over the weekend three county residents were arrested in the seizure of 70 pounds of marijuana, valued at nearly $500,000, bound from Arizona to West Bloomfield.

Charged were: Jerry Jadan, 39, and Fred Jadan, 38, both of West Bloomfield; and Randy A. Rabban, 39, of Farmington Hills. The arrests stemmed from an investigation begun by the Wichita, Kan., office of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), which discovered a scheme to bring the marijuana into Oakland County.

"We expect other charges and arrests, possibly in other states, to result from this," said Farmington Hills Police Chief William Dwyer, who credited the arrests and seizures to the South Oakland Narcotics Intelligence Consortium, the DEA, and the Oakland County Prosecutor's Office.

Jerry Jadan and Rabban were charged with conspiracy to deliver controlled substances, five to 45 kilograms of marijuana and delivery of 5-45 kilograms of marijuana. The charges are felonies punishable by seven years in prison and $500,000 fines. Both were arraigned and released after posting $100,000 bond each.

Fred Jadan was charged with possession of marijuana, a misdemeanor punishable by up to a year in jail and a $2,000 fine.

Last Thursday, Richard N. Nash, 48, of Troy was charged in an alleged marijuana growing operation after members of the Oakland County Narcotics Enforcement Team raided his basement on Webb Street and found 96 plants, a sophisticated growing operation, guns, financial records and $80,000 in cash, according to police. Nash is similarly charged and held in the Oakland County Jail in lieu of $25,000 bond and a Jan. 17 preliminary examination.

Oakland County Drug Bust Nets $33,000, Marijuana (FREEP)

Detroit Free Press, January 8, 2007

Two Oakland County men face were arraigned in district court Sunday on felony drug charges after law enforcement agents raided homes in Farmington Hills and West Bloomfield, resulting in the seizure of 70 pounds of marijuana and more than $33,000 in cash.

Jerry Jadan, 39, of West Bloomfield, and Randy Rabban, 39, of Farmington Hills, were charged with conspiracy to deliver a controlled substance and manufacturing of 5 to 45 kilograms of marijuana. They were arraigned in 47th District Court in Farmington Hills and released on $100,000 bonds. Each charge is punishable by seven years in prison and fines of up to $500,000.

A third man, Fred Jadan, 38, also of West Bloomfield, was charged with possession of marijuana, a misdemeanor punishable by up to a year in jail and a $2,000 fine. He also posted bond and was released.

Farmington Hills Police Chief William Dwyer said Monday the seizure was the result of an investigation conducted by the South Oakland Narcotics Intelligence Consortium, which is made up of officers from Farmington Hills, Novi, West Bloomfield and the Oakland County Sheriff's Office.

"This is an outstanding example of cooperation across the full spectrum of law enforcement," Dwyer said Monday. SONIC officers also recovered several firearms.

"We are working with the DEA, and more arrests will be coming," Dwyer said. Police said information that lead to the arrest came from the DEA office in Wichita, Kan. "Here's a perfect example of drugs that came in out of state and were bound for communities in Oakland County," Dwyer added.

Owners Of Medical Marijuana Dispensary Arrested (KESQ)

KESQ-TV, January 8, 2007

The owners of a local medicinal marijuana dispensary are behind bars tonight after turning themselves in.

It is the latest chapter in CanaHelp's ongoing saga to stay open for business and stay legitimate.

This time, the owners of the medicinal marijuana dispensary, Stacy Hochanadel and his two partners, turned themselves in at the Indio Police Department jail.

Volunteers who continue to operate CannaHelp say the county issued an arrest warrant last week. The charges include possession and distribution of marijuana and maintaining and operating CannaHelp.

"They've not violated any laws," said one volunteer we spoke with. "They are standing up and trying to be forthcoming again, even though they're being persecuted by Riverside County Sheriff's."

Police and federal agents once raided CannaHelp on suspicion it sold marijuana for profit. And more recently, the city of Palm Desert issued an order to stop doing business.

This came after an undercover cop allegedly bought pot from the dispensary without the necessary medical credentials.

"That's a civil issue which is separate of whatever criminal investigation Riverside County Sheriff's is enacting at this time."

Still, supporters say CannaHelp's owners have done nothing wrong at least on the state level.

"I'm not sure why they're trying to take away all forms provided to qualified patients."

CannaHelp Owner And Managers Being Booked At Indio Jail (DS)

Desert Sun, January 8, 2007

The owner and two managers of the CannaHelp medical marijuana dispensary who have been charged with felonies turned themselves in this morning at the Indio Police Department Jail.

CannaHelp owner Stacy Hochanadel and managers James Campbell and John Bendar are being booked at the jail, according to jail representatives.

The three are facing three felony charges each related to marijuana possession, sales and transport, as well as "keeping a place to sell controlled substances."

Bail and court dates for the three have yet to be set.

The dispensary at 73-350 El Paseo remains open, said Ryan Michaels, a volunteer.

3 From Pot Store Facing Charges (PE)

Press-Enterprise, January 6, 2007

INDIO - The Riverside County district attorney's office has filed felony drug charges against the owner and two employees of an embattled Palm Desert medical marijuana dispensary.

Ingrid Wyatt, spokeswoman for the district attorney's office, said the case against Cannahelp shop owner Stacy Hochanadel and his employees, James Campbell and John Reynolds, could be precedent-setting because it is the first time in Riverside County that anyone associated with a storefront marijuana dispensary has been prosecuted.

Hochanadel, Campbell and Reynolds are charged with the same three felony drug counts: one of unlawful possession; one of sales, furnishing and transporting; and one of maintaining a place for the purpose of selling a controlled substance. If convicted, they face up to three years in state prison.

Wyatt said arrest warrants have been issued for all three and that Hochanadel has indicated that he plans to surrender to authorities Monday.

None of the defendants was available for comment Friday, and Hochanadel's San Diego-based attorney did not return a telephone call.

California's 10-year-old medical marijuana law allows patients with prescriptions from a doctor to grow and use marijuana, but not to sell it for profit. Federal law prohibits any cultivation, sale or use of marijuana.

"We're not targeting individuals who have a prescription and are in need of marijuana for medicinal purposes," Wyatt said. "We're targeting people who are using the guise of medicinal marijuana to actually sell marijuana. We believe there are people out there selling marijuana (illegally) for profitable purposes."

Wyatt said individuals with medical prescriptions may possess 8 ounces of dry marijuana or six mature plants or 12 small plants.

"If you have more than that, we believe it's a prosecutable case," she said.

Wyatt said authorized caregivers may dispense legally prescribed medicinal marijuana.

"It's not just anybody who can do this," she said. "You have to be a designated caregiver for the person who has the prescription. There is a process to this whole medicinal-marijuana thing."

The Palm Desert business stayed open even after the city revoked its license Dec. 18. In a letter to Cannahelp, City Attorney David Erwin said the business failed to comply with conditions of an agreement that came out of a hearing before the City Council on Feb. 23.

"Because of your failure to comply with the agreement of April 10, 2006, your license is hereby revoked and your operation must cease immediately," Erwin wrote.

City officials have said undercover authorities were able to purchase marijuana from Cannahelp without proper credentials.

Riverside County supervisors on Oct. 3 banned marijuana dispensaries in unincorporated areas and joined other counties that are challenging state medical-marijuana laws.

The board stopped short of an outright prohibition on marijuana-growing cooperatives but banned the distribution of marijuana to caregivers, qualified patients or patients with a state identification card even at marijuana-growing co-ops, which are legal under state law.

Then-District Attorney Grover Trask said he would not prosecute patients who use marijuana in accordance with state laws. His successor, Rod Pacheco, agreed that the district attorney's office has no authority to prosecute patients who are following state laws.

Robbers Posed As DEA (AT)

Albuquerque Tribune, January 8, 2007

The two men who robbed a truck stop and exchanged gunfire with police before ultimately eluding a dragnet early Sunday may have been involved in two previous burglaries in the city, Albuquerque police say.

The common denominator in all three robberies: The suspects wore pieces of uniform identifying them as DEA agents.

Police say it's pretty clear the men are not real DEA agents. But how they got the uniforms and how they escaped from police moments after a gun battle near I-40 and and 6th Street Northeast on Sunday remains unclear.

"Given their willingness to use law enforcement clothing as a guise and the fact that they tried to kill police officers today, our interest in finding these two is as high as it can be," Albuquerque police Capt. Larry Sonntag said Sunday evening.

Sonntag said police have surveillance tape of Sunday's burglary and hope that will help in the hunt for the two men. Anyone with information is asked to call Crimestoppers at 843-STOP.

DOJ_NMG_0114392

Sonntag said the surveillance tape shows two men - one wearing a black and yellow DEA jacket and one a DEA baseball cap - walking into the Love's truck stop off I-40 at 3 a.m. Sunday.

The men demanded money and also took car keys from an employee. Police arrived as the two men fled in the employee's car, and the men may have fired at police at the truck stop, Sonntag said.

Police followed the vehicle to a residential area west of 6th Street where the men opened fire on police, police fired back, and the men fled on foot.

Sonntag said a SWAT team was called in and set up a perimeter around the area. Canine units were also called in to aid in the search. Officers went door to door but found no sign of the suspects. Six hours later, the search was called off.

Sonntag said the men did not leave a vehicle at the truck stop, and the fact they apparently arrived there on foot added to the possibility that they were from, or had some connection to, the nearby neighborhood.

"But it's also possible they escaped before the perimeter was in place, and the neighborhood had nothing to do with it," he said.

The source of the DEA outfits may be less of a mystery. Sonntag said he believed a DEA agent had reported his car burglarized about a month ago.

"It's also possible to buy those type of uniforms on the Internet," he said.

Tape Shows Robbers Dressed As Feds (KRQE)

KRQE-TV, January 8, 2007

ALBUQUERQUE -- Police have their pictures, but the search for a pair of armed robbers continues.

Surveillance video recorded the of the robbery at the Loves truck stop on 6th Street NW at Interstate 40 on Sunday morning.

The suspects appeared to be dressed as Drug Enforcement Agents--one in a raid jacket, the other in a DEA cap--when they walked into the business and terrorized employees, according to Albuquerque police.

Officers said the men forced a security guard to the floor, then held another employee at gunpoint while they took money out of the register.

The men then led another employee to the parking lot and forced him to give up the keys to his car, police said.

The two suspects shot at police and are considered to be armed and dangerous.

Call Albuquerque police at 843-STOP (843-7867) if you have any information on the suspects.

Meth Smoke Taints Motels (DENP)

Denver Post, January 8, 2007

Montrose - The motel on a popular strip of Montrose inns was busy with Thanksgiving travelers when drug agents used a passkey to enter room 108.

Inside they found a woman lying on a bed. A glass pipe for smoking methamphetamine was next to her. Meth was found in her purse.

Her boyfriend was arrested when he came back to the room where they had been living for weeks. He was found with more meth and a disassembled shotgun. The pair had allegedly sold meth to undercover agents from this base of operation in the weeks preceding the bust.

As in the majority of motel and hotel busts, a maid with a vacuum, disinfectant sprays and dust cloths cleaned the room in the normal way. And it was rented again within days.

While no official data are available, experience shows that meth dealers and users love to stay in hotels, said Tom Gorman, agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration in Grand Junction.

"I can't think of an investigation we've done that doesn't connect to a hotel or motel," he said.

But motel owners and managers don't need to do anything out of the ordinary when meth is smoked in a room. They don't need to inform health authorities or have anyone evaluate the room for contamination. And they don't need to inform the next party renting the room that meth had been smoked there.

That is troublesome for researchers at National Jewish Hospital, who have found residues the day after the simulated smoking of meth in a motel room. The residue levels far exceeded safe levels set by the state for cleanups after meth labs are found.

"We know it sticks around up to 24 hours later and the levels don't go down much," said Mike VanDyke, an industrial hygienist at National Jewish. "We're guessing it is at least days, likely weeks and possibly months before it goes down."

National Jewish is waiting on federal funding to do further testing to determine that time frame and also to determine what kind of health hazard that residue might pose.

DOJ_NMG_0114393

Many questions linger

Rob Derrera, an estimator with COCAT restoration contractors in Denver, said his workers have found higher levels of residue in rooms where meth has only been smoked than in rooms where it has been cooked. He said the unknown is how much smoking over what period of time it takes to push levels to the hazardous zone.

Until those answers come, the smoking of meth in hotel and motel rooms is under the radar of health regulations.

If a motel owner decides to do testing and cleanup, it could cost thousands of dollars for a single room. Tests for residues on furniture, walls, rugs and other surfaces cost upwards of $100 each. Cleanup might not be as extensive as the mandated cleanups for meth labs, but would still range from about $3,000 to $7,000 for the average 300- square-foot room, Derrera said.

He said cleanup could range from disposing of anything porous, such as carpet and drapes, and scrubbing the walls multiple times with special chemicals to entirely gutting a room - tearing out drywall and vanities and discarding all furnishings as his company sometimes has to with meth labs.

"Hotels and motels have a built-in disincentive to report. The testing and remediation is very expensive," Colorado Attorney General John Suthers said.

He said that a recently formed statewide meth task force might take up an educational effort to deal with the motel problem.

Focus still on meth labs

The danger posed by the residue left behind by meth smokers has fallen between the cracks as efforts to deal with the drug's dangers to the general public focus primarily on labs.

The noxious mix of chemicals - acetone, anhydrous ammonia, starter fluid, paint thinner and red phosphorous - that goes into making the stimulant drug creates a known health hazard. Inhalation or skin exposure to those chemicals can cause burns, breathing problems and neurological difficulties.

The airborne residue from smoked meth is not considered as dangerous because the residue does not contain all the chemicals from a "cook."

Colleen Brisnehan, an environmental protection specialist with the Colorado Department of Public Health and Environment, said the statutory definition of contamination is broad enough to include the smoking of meth even though the regulations only apply to manufacturing. She said local agencies would have authority to force a cleanup if the contamination levels were high enough - and if they were notified.

"But it would be difficult or impossible to do," she admitted, because smoking does not trigger any notification.

Derrera agreed.

"Do I think there should be something in place to deal with this? Absolutely, positively yes," he said. "But how do you mandate it and who pays for it?"

Staff writer Nancy Lofholm can be reached at 970-256-1957 or at nlofholm@denverpost.com.

Tom Gorman, the father of DEA agent Tom Gorman and the director of the High Intensity Drug Task Force in Colorado, summed up the problem of meth in motels as "a mess."

Drug agents say lower-end motels seem to be the worst - drug dealers are also looking for bargains. But that doesn't mean only flophouses are of concern. Many midrange motels have been the sites of drug busts.

"The more expensive the motel, the better the chance that kind of activity has not occurred there," said Jack Haynes, supervisor of the Delta/Montrose Drug Task Force.

There is no easy way for the public to protect themselves. Test kits are sold online but are too complex or expensive for general use or don't give consistent results.

"From a personal level I'm very concerned," said Tim Hersee, commander of the North Metro Task Force that covers Adams and Broomfield counties.

Mike VanDyke, an industrial hygienist at National Jewish Hospital in Denver, said he is particularly concerned about children in rooms with the residue from meth smoking.

"That definitely concerns me because of their hand-to-mouth behavior," he said.

He said research shows that simple activity - including vacuuming or jumping on the bed - increases the levels of airborne meth residue.

Colorado Hotel & Lodging Association President Ilene Kamsler said her organization in the past has helped to educate hotel and motel owners about ways to avoid becoming havens for drug users and dealers but there is no such effort currently.

She said many of the association members are the higher end hotels that don't have a problem.

Federal Officials Pursuing More Gun-related Prosecutions (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

LOUISVILLE, Ky. - Police and prosecutors are using a different strategy in western Kentucky to convict suspects of gun-related crimes.

If suspects can't be prosecuted in state court, cases are being sent to federal court, where the sentences are harsher and plea bargains are fewer, prosecutors and defense attorneys say.

That's what happened when state police found ammunition in the van of William West, a convicted felon. Since police didn't find a gun, West couldn't be charged under state law - so the case was turned over to federal prosecutors, said assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Dyke, who oversees prosecutions in Louisville.

West, 51, of Eddyville, was charged with being a felon in possession of ammunition and is serving a 15-year sentence in prison, Dyke said.

The strategy has arisen from the federal Justice Department's "Safe Neighborhoods" program, which in Kentucky is known as "Project Backfire." Gun violators are targeted in both the state and federal court systems.

Gun-related cases in U.S. District Court in western Kentucky increased from 56 in 2004 to 79 in 2005, after U.S. Attorney Dave Huber announced an effort to increase Project Backfire federal prosecutions. By late last year, there had been 66 cases.

Jefferson County's state court handled 1,162 cases in 2005 by the county attorney's office as part of Project Backfire.

Huber said the federal prosecutions are designed to help local prosecutors and law enforcement agencies. They're "only being federalized," he said, because of inadequate funding at the state level "for state prosecutors and state prisons."

"If you don't want it to be federalized, support your prosecutors and state prisons," he said, adding that only a small number of cases are elevated to federal court. "We're not a panacea. We're just trying to help where we can."

Federal public defender Scott Wendelsdorf questioned whether the federal prosecutions were worth the trouble. Wendelsdorf said that federal prosecutions should be limited to crimes "uniquely federal in nature," such as interstate trafficking in child pornography or drugs - crimes local law enforcement isn't equipped to tackle.

But gun violators are taken to federal court solely to hand out stiff punishments, Wendelsdorf said.

"I'm not sure that's a legitimate reason, but it's legal and they do it, and God knows, it's effective," Wendelsdorf said.

IMMIGRATION:

Illegal Immigrants' Rearrest Rate High (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, The Associated Press

AP, January 9, 2007

A Justice Department audit looks at how authorities who get funding are cooperating to stem "catch and release."

Washington - Illegal immigrants who were caught but released in the United States may have been rearrested as many as six times, Justice Department data released Monday indicate.

The findings by Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine are based on a sampling of 100 illegal immigrants arrested by local and state authorities in 2004, the latest complete data available. They show that 73 of the 100 immigrants were arrested, collectively, 429 times - ranging from traffic tickets to weapons and drug charges.

Fine's office said its audit could not conclude precisely how many of the 262,105 illegal immigrants charged with criminal histories that year had been rearrested. "But if this data is indicative of the full population of 262,105 criminal histories, the rate at which released criminal aliens are rearrested is extremely high," the audit noted.

The audit was required by Congress in 2005. It looked at how local and state authorities who receive Justice Department funding to help catch and detain illegal immigrants are working with the Homeland Security Department.

It also examined the arrest rates of immigrants who were released before they could be turned over to Homeland Security's bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

In all, 752 cities, counties and states participating in the program received $287 million in 2005, the audit noted. Five states - California, New York, Texas, Florida and Arizona - received the bulk of the money, pulling in more than $184 million.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff four months ago declared an end to the "catch and release" practice that for years helped many illegal immigrants stay in the United States unhindered.

At the time, the department was holding 99 percent of non- Mexican illegal immigrants in its custody until they could be returned to their home nations. The policy generally does not apply to Mexicans, who are almost immediately returned to Mexico after being stopped by Border Patrol agents.

The audit also looked at whether local and state authorities fully cooperated with Homeland Security efforts to remove illegal immigrants, and tried to determine how many had been released because of jail space or funding shortages. In both cases, Fine's office said it was unable to draw definitive conclusions.

DOJ_NMG_0114395

It also found that at least one area - San Francisco - was receiving funding even though local policy specifically limits the information it gives to Homeland Security about immigration enforcement. San Francisco, which won $1.1 million, defines itself as a "city and county of refuge" and does not allow federal agents to view immigration jail records without permission from local police.

Some Illegal Immigrants Arrested Repeatedly, Report Finds (MCT)

By Marisa Taylor, McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON - Illegal immigrants are being released from prison only to be arrested on new charges despite government efforts to deport them and keep them out of the country.

The findings are part of an audit by Justice Department Inspector General Glenn Fine that suggest authorities are still struggling to deport illegal immigrants who commit crimes, even though most state and local authorities are notifying immigration authorities of the imminent release of prisoners.

Fine's office analyzed the cases of 100 immigrants who had served time in prison and found 73 of them were re-arrested for committing a crime after being released.

On average, each immigrant was re-arrested six times, ranging from traffic violations to assault.

Fine's office couldn't determine how many illegal immigrants had been re-arrested overall because immigration authorities don't keep track. If the sample was any indication, "the rate at which released criminal aliens are re-arrested is extremely high," the report said.

Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials questioned whether the audit's small sample should reflect negatively on their agency's efforts to deport criminal immigrants. The audit did not determine whether ICE failed to deport the immigrants after being notified by prison officials.

But Heather Mac Donald, a fellow with the conservative Manhattan Institute, said ICE continues to have problems with deporting criminal immigrants because the agency doesn't always have enough detention space to hold immigrants once they're released from prisons.

"What this speaks to is the fact that we're not up to speed on immigration enforcement in general," she said.

Last year, Homeland Security's inspector general said immigration authorities expected that most of the 300,000 illegal and legal immigrants eligible to be deported would be released. Federal officials said they would need 34,000 additional beds at a cost of $1.1 billion to detain and remove all of them.

David Martin, a University of Virginia law professor and former top immigration official, said he was surprised that the re-arrest numbers in the most recent report were "so high."

U.S. immigration officials appeared to be making progress working with state and local officials who now notify them before a criminal immigrant is released, he said. That way, the immigrant is quickly deported.

Congress requested the audit because of questions about compliance with a federal program meant to reimburse cities and states for the costs of incarcerating illegal immigrants.

California, New York, Texas, and Florida receive the most funding. States and cities often are not completely reimbursed for what they spend on prisoners because the program doesn't get enough funding, the audit said.

U.S. Supreme Court Refuses To Hear Asylum Case Of Colombian Drug Informant Fearing For His Life (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The Supreme Court on Monday refused to consider the case of an informant against the Cali drug cartel who says he and his family will be murdered if the U.S. government returns them to Colombia.

Immigration officials have refused to grant asylum to Diego Castillo-Arias, who came to the United States with his wife and two young sons about a decade ago after telling police in Cali about the location of cartel bank accounts and property.

The Board of Immigration Appeals says that volunteer, noncriminal informants working against the drug cartel do not constitute a "particular social group," a requirement for asylum under the Immigration and Nationality Act.

The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals deferred to the board's interpretation, saying it was doing so with "consternation" and expressing dismay that "informants who risk their lives have been ignored by our nation."

The appeals court said it regretted that Congress has not taken action on behalf of Castillo-Arias and others similarly situated.

DOJ_NMG_0114396

Castillo-Arias' attorney, Michael Dean Ray of Miami, said Monday it is now up to the Department of Homeland Security to decide whether to send the family back to Colombia, adding that the department could use its discretion to defer removing them from the United States. The family is living in the state of Florida.

Hispanic Leaders Call For Reform On Immigration Within 100 Days (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, January 9, 2007

National Hispanic leaders are pressing House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) to make immigration reform a top priority within the first 100 days of the new Congress, citing the large numbers of Hispanics who turned out to vote for Democrats in November.

Several of the largest Hispanic advocacy groups in the country, the League of United Latin American Citizens, the Southwest Voter Registration Education Project and the Hispanic Federation, plan to stage a massive grassroots campaign to pressure House lawmakers to move quickly on immigration. They will team with America Votes, one of the nation's largest liberal voter-mobilization groups, to push reform.

"As you prepare to lead the 110th Congress of the United States of America, we urge you to make immigration reform one of your top priorities during the first 100 days of the new Congress," the president of LULAC, Rosa Rosales, and the president of the Hispanic Federation, Lillian Rodriguez-Lopez, wrote in a letter delivered to Pelosi and Reid over the weekend.

LULAC describes itself as the country's largest and oldest Hispanic civil rights organization. The Hispanic Federation is a coalition of about 100 local groups, most based in the New York area.

Hispanic leaders expect the Senate to take up immigration this year, and Reid has included the issue among his top 10 legislative priorities. But the House is a different story, say advocates of reform.

Pelosi and other House Democrats have said little about what legislation they will take up after completing their 100-hour agenda, a collection of relatively uncontroversial bills over which Democrats have reached consensus.

Beyond the first 100 hours it's hard to speculate" about what Democrats will focus on, Pelosi spokesman Drew Hammill said. Hammill said Pelosi has discussed immigration reform with President Bush and that both have agreed it should be a "priority."

Hammill said immigration reform proposals would undergo the regular order of the legislative process, a series of subcommittee and committee hearings and markups, which would affect the timing.

Hispanic leaders are making two clear statements: Reform should include a path to legal residency for the 12 million illegal immigrants now working in the U.S., and a guest-worker program supported by President Bush, which would require foreign workers to return home after several years, is inadequate. They also oppose the building of a fence along the Mexican border intended to stem the flow of immigration.

"Immigrants have dedicated themselves to this country through hard work and determination and America has benefited accordingly," Rosales and Rodriguez-Lopez wrote. "[T]hey deserve an orderly pathway to legalize their status in the U.S. so they can emerge from society's shadows into the light of day."

Hispanic support for Democrats shot up in November compared to 2004. Sixty-nine percent of self-identified Latino voters cast ballots for Democratic candidates, according to national exit-poll data. Only 30 percent voted for Republican candidates. Republican pollsters have said that GOP candidates must receive 40 percent of Hispanic votes to win future elections. Strategists have come to see these voters as crucial because the Hispanic population is the fastest-growing major racial demographic in the country.

But in recent months House Democrats have shied away from the issue for fear of angering conservative-leaning white voters, whom Republican strategists hoped to court in 2006 by pushing strict and punitive immigration proposals.

House Democrats did not mention immigration in "A New Direction for America," the broad agenda document they made public shortly before the election. The omission drew angry responses from congressional leaders such as Reps. Jose Serrano (D-N.Y.), a senior member of the Appropriations Committee, and Luis Gutierrez (D-Ill.), who heads the Congressional Hispanic Caucus's Immigration Task Force.

"I'm very sad and disappointed that comprehensive immigration reform is not a key and pivotal point for the Democrats," Gutierrez told The Hill in September.

Political strategists who have concentrated on Hispanic outreach say that Democrats have a golden opportunity to capitalize on the increased political attention of Hispanics because of last year's immigration debate, but that chance could soon pass.

DOJ_NMG_0114397

"I think if Democrats want to take advantage of this great disenchantment of Latinos of Republicans, they're going to have to pass immigration reform this year," said Simon Rosenberg, president of the New Democrat Network, an advocacy group that spent $2 million before the election to promote Democratic candidates to Hispanics.

"When Democrats got elected in 2006, they got elected to solve immigration," he said. "I think Hispanics were about 8 percent of the national electorate and there was an enormous swing in the number of Hispanics who turned out."

Immigration reform that creates a path to citizenship for illegal workers is seen as having strong support in the Senate. Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), two of the most influential lawmakers of their respective parties, teamed up to craft a popular bill last year. Lobbyists said they expect the Senate to take up and pass reform before the House, a reversal from the usual course of most bills that first pass the lower chamber.

Rosales said in an interview that LULAC's board of directors would meet Feb. 8 and 9 to discuss the upcoming lobbying campaign.

"What we'll decide there [at the meeting] is that comprehensive immigration reform is a top priority," she said. "I can assure you that our 115,000 members will reach out to their election officials."

Rosales said her organization would team with America Votes and the Southwest Voter Registration Education Project.

Guardsmen Retreat At Border Deemed Appropriate (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

National Guard soldiers who abandoned an observation post on the U.S.-Mexico border after spotting armed men approaching their position acted appropriately by retreating to a safer location, the U.S. Border Patrol said yesterday.

Border Patrol spokesman Mario Martinez at the agency's D.C. headquarters said that although the National Guard troops were armed and authorized to use force in self-defense, they determined they were not in imminent danger and retreated to call for help.

"The Border Patrol responded within minutes with air and ground units, but found no one in the area," Mr. Martinez said. "In this situation, the National Guard troops did exactly what was expected of them, exactly what they should have done.

"The Guard troops are not there to engage, interdict or arrest anyone but to man observation posts," he said.

The troops were members of an entry-identification team, assigned to monitor major illegal-alien and drug-smuggling corridors.

Mr. Martinez said that no shots were exchanged and that no one was injured in the incident, which occurred Wednesday shortly after 11 p.m. near Sasabe, Ariz., about 70 miles southwest of Tucson. He said agents who responded to the site found footprints leading back to Mexico.

The armed men had come within 100 yards of the observation post.

Mr. Martinez said the Border Patrol has not identified the four or five armed men involved in the incident but said the Guard troops spotted them with their night-vision equipment and confirmed they were carrying rifles.

Several Border Patrol field agents said the armed men could have been a scouting party for drug smugglers or might have been testing the National Guard's response to a cross-border intrusion.

In that same area in July 2005, two Border Patrol agents were shot and wounded by assailants in what law-enforcement authorities called a planned ambush by drug smugglers a mile north of the U.S.-Mexico border.

More than 50 rounds were fired at the agents after they spotted suspected drug smugglers in a canyon east of Nogales, Ariz., authorities said. Although most of the smugglers fled, one man used a hand-held radio to point out the agents' location to other shooters hidden nearby, they said.

The agents, who were tracking a previous marijuana load on foot, were shot in the leg with high-powered weapons. Authorities said the gunmen withdrew from the canyon using military-style cover and concealment tactics to escape back into Mexico.

Authorities later found 500 pounds of marijuana near the site.

About 6,000 National Guard troops deployed along the 1,951-mile U.S.-Mexico border are part of President Bush's $760 million Operation Jump Start. They have been deployed from California to Texas to upgrade border security and give the Border Patrol time to recruit, hire and train 6,000 new agents by the end of 2008.

The Guard troops are not empowered to get involved in law-enforcement duties. They cannot detain, arrest or interdict anyone or anything coming across the border -- only report them to the Border Patrol.

Illegals Become Repeat Criminals (WT)

By Jerry Seper

DOJ_NMG_0114398

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

Criminal aliens set free on the streets of America -- instead of being deported after serving their time -- are being rearrested as many as six more times by U.S. authorities, according to a government audit released yesterday.

But the Justice Department's Office of Inspector General said it did not know how many of 262,105 illegals in the audit, who had been charged with a crime and then released, had been rearrested.

Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said that the volume of available files "was too great to search manually and quantify the results" and that investigators instead selected a sample of 100 illegal aliens arrested in 2004 and reviewed their criminal histories for evidence of rearrests.

Mr. Fine noted that although the limited audit did not find any instances of "outright failure" to cooperate with Homeland Security in the removal of criminal aliens from the United States, a review of the 100 criminal histories "produced results that, if indicative of the full population of criminal aliens identified, suggest that the rate at which released criminal aliens are re-arrested is extremely high."

The 91-page audit, which was requested by Congress, said the limited sampling found that of the 100 selected aliens, 73 had an average of six arrests each after being released from custody. They were arrested, collectively, 429 times on 878 charges, ranging from traffic violations and trespassing to drug crimes, burglary, robbery, assault and weapons violations.

The audit found that local jurisdictions "prioritize enforcement of state and local laws, while sometimes permitting or encouraging law-enforcement officers" to work with Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE).

Last year, Congress required an annual audit as part of the Justice Department's State Criminal Alien Assistance Program (SCAAP), which provides federal funding to states and localities for the costs of incarcerating criminal aliens on state or local charges. The program is administered by the Justice Department in conjunction with ICE, which is part of Homeland Security.

During fiscal 2005, Justice distributed $287.1 million in SCAAP payments to 752 state, county and local jurisdictions -- nearly 70 percent of which went to 10 jurisdictions: the states of California, New York, Texas, Florida, Arizona, Illinois and Massachusetts; New York City; and two California counties, Los Angeles and Orange.

The report also said investigators identified an official "sanctuary" policy for two jurisdictions that received at least $1 million in SCAAP funding: Oregon, which received $3.4 million, and the city and county of San Francisco, which received $1.1 million and has designated itself a "city and county of refuge."

In addition, an executive order issued in New York City limits the enforcement of immigration law by local authorities, the report said.

The audit defined "sanctuary" as a jurisdiction that may have state laws, local ordinances or departmental policies limiting the role of local authorities in the enforcement of immigration laws.

The audit also examined the level of cooperation among federal, state and local authorities, but found "conflicting views between ICE and local jurisdictions as to what actions constitute full cooperation."

"Congress did not define 'fully cooperate,' nor did our review of immigration legislation disclose any specific steps that localities are required to take to help effect the removal of criminal aliens from the United States," the audit said.

The report also found that among 164 state and local agencies surveyed:

·30 jurisdictions do not generally ask those arrested about their immigration status.

·17 said they do not inform ICE when they have someone they suspect may be an illegal alien in custody. Some agencies said they do not inform ICE about possible illegals in custody because they don't think ICE will respond.

·18 jurisdictions do not alert ICE before releasing undocumented criminal aliens.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Fielding Picked For White House Counsel (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, January 9, 2007

President Bush has chosen Fred Fielding, formerly the top lawyer in the Reagan administration, to be his White House counsel.

The announcement will be made Tuesday, according to a Bush administration official who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the appointment had not been made.

Fielding will become Bush's counsel just as newly empowered Democrats in Congress plan deeper scrutiny of the administration. From the Iraq war to environmental policy and secret surveillance, the Democrats who now control both the House and Senate are armed with subpoena power and ready to summon panels of witnesses.

DOJ_NMG_0114399

Fielding, a longtime Washington lawyer, will replace Harriet Miers, Bush's failed Supreme Court nominee and longtime adviser. She submitted her resignation Thursday after six years in the White House, and it will take effect Jan. 31.

Fielding served as President Reagan's counsel from 1981 to 1986, where one of his assistants was John Roberts, now the chief justice of the Supreme Court. Under President Nixon, Fielding served as deputy White House counsel from 1972 to 1974 and associate counsel from 1970 to 1972.

More recently, he served on the bipartisan panel that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks.

Fielding is a partner at the firm of Wiley, Rein and Fielding.

He is known as an expert in business litigation and government relations law, representing corporations in high profile regulatory investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Justice Department and others.

"As soon as I heard they were looking for someone with a great investigation background, Fred Fielding was the only one I thought of," said Sheila Tate, a public relations executive who worked in the Reagan administration.

Ron Kaufman, who served in the administrations of Reagan and Bush's father, said he was not surprised that Fielding would take the job.

"Guys like him can't say no to a president," Kaufman said.

Fielding's appointment was first reported Monday by Time magazine on its Web site.

Bush Picks Reagan White House Counsel Fielding To Succeed Miers (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

President Bush has selected Fred F. Fielding to be his White House counsel, recruiting a seasoned Washington veteran to represent the president with Democratic congressional investigators and reprise the job he held under Ronald Reagan, sources close to the process said yesterday.

The White House plans to announce the appointment today, just days after longtime Bush loyalist Harriet Miers was eased out as the president's top lawyer in preparation for the anticipated struggle with a new Democratic Congress eager to investigate the administration. A White House official confirmed the appointment but insisted on anonymity because it has not been announced.

Fielding, 67, brings the experience and political heft that White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten has been seeking to counter any aggressive moves to probe the most controversial decisions of the Bush presidency. Smooth and soft-spoken yet battle-hardened, Fielding is considered a Republican "wise man" who Bush aides believe will be able to negotiate compromise without surrendering on the most important priorities.

"It sends the perfect signal that we are serious about the president's position and the principles he has articulated but we're also going to be reasonable and work together to get some of these issues resolved," said Helgi C. Walker, a former Bush White House associate counsel who works with Fielding at his firm, Wiley Rein & Fielding. "He brings stature and gravitas, and he also brings a very healthy perspective, the ability to prioritize in crafting a settlement."

Fielding served as deputy to White House counsel John W. Dean III under President Richard M. Nixon and was the first to tell Dean about the Watergate break-in. Yet Fielding was one of the few to emerge untainted by Watergate. In fact, he was suspected, wrongly, of being "Deep Throat," the inside source who helped Washington Post reporters Bob Woodward and Carl Bernstein uncover the scandal.

Fielding served as White House counsel for Reagan from 1981 to 1986, handling a spate of conflict-of-interest situations and telling Secretary of State Alexander M. Haig he was wrong to assert that he had command authority when the president was shot. Fielding was Bush's transition counsel after the 2000 election, vetting the backgrounds of new administration officials. And he served as a member of the commission that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

"Fred will be a formidable person to deal with," said Democrat Richard Ben-Veniste, a Watergate prosecutor who served with Fielding on the Sept. 11 commission. "This change reflects the understanding by the president and his advisers in the administration that they will be in for a much more robust period of congressional oversight."

Ben-Veniste said Fielding sometimes played intermediary with the White House in conflicts over the release of information to the commission. "At times, Fred was somewhat dismayed by the positions taken by White House counsel and other agencies," Ben-Veniste said. "But by the same token, he was someone with whom the White House was in frequent contact."

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), the new chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, said he does not know Fielding but understands that "he has a very distinguished record." Waxman, who plans to begin hearings on Feb. 6 into waste, fraud and abuse in Iraq contracting, said, "I hope he advises the president on ways to work with Congress."

The move to bring back a White House counsel from another era is reminiscent of President Bill Clinton's decision in the midst of the Whitewater investigation in 1994 to hire Lloyd N. Cutler as his chief lawyer, many years after Cutler served in the same position under President Jimmy Carter. Like Clinton, Bush is reaching out to a pillar of the Washington establishment in hopes of tamping down political troubles.

In Bush's case, he faces congressional demands for information on politically sensitive topics such as whether officials authorized the abuse of U.S.-held detainees, whether the administration turned a blind eye to profiteering by politically connected contractors in the Iraq war, how the White House responded to Hurricane Katrina and whether senior officials complied with the law in ordering heightened domestic surveillance. The White House counsel also monitors staff ethics issues and screens judicial nominations, including potential Supreme Court justices.

"Fred Fielding's been in the White House before and he understands how the place works, which is very important," said Leonard A. Leo, executive vice president of the Federalist Society, who informally advises the White House on legal matters. "He understands how the Hill works, which is important. And he has widespread respect from all points on the spectrum."

Bush Turns To Capital Insider (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — Turning to a man described as "the truly quintessential Washington, D.C., inside lawyer," President Bush has chosen Fred F. Fielding as his White House counsel, a White House official said Monday.

Bush will be the third president whom Fielding has served in the counsel's office. As deputy counsel, he defended Richard M. Nixon during the Watergate investigation; as the chief White House attorney from 1981 to 1986, he directed Ronald Reagan's responses to smaller scandals.

The official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because the appointment had not been formally announced, said that Fielding, 67, would replace Harriet E. Miers, who submitted her resignation Thursday.

Fielding, who served on the independent commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks, is a partner in a Washington law firm, Wiley Rein & Fielding.

His appointment, which could be announced as early as today, is part of a White House personnel overhaul that began in April with the arrival of Joshua B. Bolten as chief of staff. In a White House in which few senior aides, and even fewer midlevel staff members, served in high-level posts in previous administrations, Fielding's arrival would represent a rare reliance on a Washington insider.

The counsel's office is likely to be particularly busy in coming months.

The new Democratic majorities in the House and the Senate have pledged to conduct vigorous oversight of administration policies and investigations of its actions — with the possibility of issuing subpoenas.

"It's going to be a contentious time. There will be repeated demands for executive-branch witnesses to testify on Capitol Hill" and a push for internal documents, said Douglas W. Kmiec, a professor at Pepperdine University School of Law, who worked with Fielding during the Reagan administration. "Some of it is likely to be quite testy on Iraq and contracts for the rebuilding of Iraq."

Fielding will bring to the White House a resume nearly unmatched among Republicans in Washington: a history of dealing with congressional investigations and constitutional issues at the heart of the separation of powers of the executive and legislative branches, experience working with Democrats, and a reputation for delivering bad news to presidents in a straightforward manner.

"He knows how to deliver tough news. He is not cowed by the office of the presidency," said Kenneth M. Duberstein, who served as one of Reagan's chiefs of staff. "He doesn't get cotton in his mouth when he walks into the Oval Office."

As Reagan's White House counsel for five years, Fielding oversaw the administration's response to legal issues that snared then-Labor Secretary Raymond Donovan and to scandal at the Environmental Protection Agency.

He also was involved in the search that led to the nomination of Sandra Day O'Connor as the first woman on the Supreme Court. Among his young aides was John G. Roberts Jr., now chief justice of the United States.

As deputy White House counsel during Nixon's second term, he worked at first with John W. Dean III, constructing the initial responses to the Watergate investigation. For a time, he was believed to have been Deep Throat, a key source for Washington Post reporters Bob Woodward and Carl Bernstein. (That mysterious figure was identified in May 2005 as W. Mark Felt of the FBI.)

Like many of his predecessors in the Oval Office, when Bush came to Washington he placed longtime associates, with whom he was comfortable, in particularly sensitive jobs.

And when problems arose, predecessors turned to Washington veterans.

DOJ_NMG_0114401

The appointment recalls President Clinton's decision in 1994, during the initial investigations of the Whitewater land deal, to name Lloyd N. Cutler as special counsel. Cutler, a Democratic insider with decades of Washington experience, had served President Carter as White House counsel almost two decades earlier.

Bush's first two White House counsels — Alberto R. Gonzales, now attorney general, and Miers — were longtime loyalists who came with the president from Texas.

By selecting Fielding, said former Solicitor General Kenneth W. Starr, "the president has gone inside — he has chosen the truly quintessential Washington, D.C., inside lawyer."

"Fred has probably unparalleled experience. He's very well known for his great wisdom, common sense and very discerning judgment," said Starr, now dean of Pepperdine's law school, who as an independent counsel conducted the investigation that led to Clinton's impeachment in 1998.

The selection of Fielding was first reported Monday on Time magazine's website.

Reagan Lawyer Ready To Return To White House (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — President Bush has chosen Fred F. Fielding as the new chief White House lawyer, adding to his team a longtime Washington legal hand and veteran of the post.

Mr. Fielding forged his skills in politically charged episodes like Watergate and the air traffic controllers' strike in 1981.

White House officials said Mr. Bush would announce as early as Tuesday that Mr. Fielding would return as White House counsel, succeeding Harriet E. Miers, who announced her resignation last week. The officials insisted on anonymity to discuss an unannounced personnel decision.

Mr. Fielding's agreement to take the job surprised some of his closest friends. The friends said last week, when his name surfaced as a contender for the position, that they would be surprised if he would give up a successful corporate practice for another stint of what promises to be heavy partisan battle at age 67.

Mr. Fielding was deputy counsel to President Richard M. Nixon under John W. Dean III and was White House counsel for the first five years of Ronald Reagan's presidency.

Since then, he has kept a hand in politics and government, helping screen job candidates for President Bush during and after his transition, and serving on the bipartisan Sept. 11 commission.

Several friends said they believed that he had been under heavy pressure to return as White House counsel by an administration girding for a raft of investigations by the new Democratic Congress.

The news of his selection was first reported on Monday afternoon on the Time magazine Web site.

Officials said Mr. Fielding was always a leading candidate of the White House chief of staff, Joshua B. Bolten, who is said to have been seeking a possible change in the counsel's office from the moment he took over as chief of staff in April.

But several Republicans close to the White House said Mr. Bush swiftly dismissed that notion. Ms. Miers had been Mr. Bush's lawyer in Texas and followed him here. Mr. Bush nominated her to the Supreme Court in 2005, but she withdrew amid criticism of her qualifications.

Mr. Bolten pushed again for a new White House counsel after the Democrats won control of both chambers of Congress in November and he concluded that the president would need a more seasoned Washington creature in the months ahead, Republicans close to the administration said.

He found one in Mr. Fielding, known as such an expert player of the inside game of Washington politics that he had even been suspected as Deep Throat, the confidential source of information who led to the disclosures of the Watergate scandal.

Mr. Fielding was not Deep Throat, but he is likely to bring a more sophisticated sense of the interplay among Congress, the news media and the White House than Ms. Miers.

The selection of such a battle-hardened hand as Mr. Fielding for the counsel post underscores the degree to which the White House is girding for potentially intense battles with Democrats. He would help prepare for the possibility that the new Congress may use hearings and, possibly, subpoenas to challenge Mr. Bush's broad assertions of executive power.

Representative Henry A. Waxman, the California Democrat who is chairman of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, sounded a somewhat combative note.

"I'm hopeful that he will understand that the best way to represent his client is to cooperate when the Congress asks for information," Mr. Waxman said in a telephone interview.

Mr. Fielding has a nuanced record on executive privilege and partisan confrontation. Associates say he is as likely to head for the negotiating table as to the wrestling mat.

DOJ_NMG_0114402

Lee H. Hamilton, the Democratic vice chairman of the Sept. 11 commission, said Mr. Fielding had a major role in securing information and testimony from the White House that it was initially loathe to share.

"He understood the problems for the White House and he understood the demands of the commission," Mr. Hamilton said. "He played a key role in working it out for us in an amicable way, and it didn't come easily."

In the counsel's position, Mr. Fielding will lead a White House legal team that includes David S. Addington, the powerful chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney. Both officials have advocated a tough line in protecting executive power against perceived intrusions by Congress.

A Republican close to the White House said Mr. Fielding had maintained close ties to Mr. Cheney, whom he has known for decades, and had occasionally been an informal adviser to him.

J. Michael Luttig, a former federal judge who worked with Mr. Fielding in the Reagan administration and remains close to him, said:

"He has a firm, clear view of executive prerogative, but he also understands as well as anyone in Washington the constitutional need for compromise. He is not someone that takes an absolutist position and then drives the presidency and the branches together off the brink. He has judgment."

Mr. Luttig said Mr. Fielding had wrestled somewhat with the decision to become White House counsel, but ultimately, "He did this out of a sense of obligation and patriotism, and that was the sole reason."

Republicans close to the White House said Mr. Fielding had assurances of having a wide berth that he apparently received last week in a meeting with Mr. Bush.

Kenneth M. Duberstein, a chief of staff for Mr. Reagan, said because Mr. Fielding had been an aide to two presidents he would not be cowed by the Oval Office or so charmed by the president that he would shy from giving potentially unwelcome advice.

"Fred has an independence of judgment and independence of stature," Mr. Duberstein said. "He knows how to deliver tough news."

All the same, Mr. Fielding is clearly being brought in to draw legal lines in the sand.

"He brings enormous credibility to both sides, but he's the president's counsel," said Wayne Berman, a Republican lobbyist who is friendly with Mr. Fielding and whose wife is the White House social secretary, Lea Berman. "He's not there to represent the views of the Congress."

Fielding Subpoenas (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

For a President said to be irrelevant, George W. Bush has certainly managed to hire a big name to be his next chief White House counsel. In recruiting Fred Fielding, Chief of Staff Josh Bolten has donned some necessary armor for the subpoena assault that is sure to come from Democrats in Congress.

Mr. Fielding replaces Harriet Miers, a Texan and personal friend of the President. Ms. Miers was an ill-fated nominee for the Supreme Court, but she served Mr. Bush well both on judicial selection and preserving Presidential powers. Both of those areas are likely to get fiercer as Democrats look to bloody the White House in the run-up to 2008.

It's hard to imagine a more experienced choice than Mr. Fielding on the subject of executive power. As deputy White House counsel from 1972 to 1974, he witnessed the modern low tide of Presidential authority as Richard Nixon was besieged by Watergate. And as Ronald Reagan's counsel from 1981 to 1986, he had to cope with a Democratic House that unleashed special prosecutors on the executive branch.

The "independent counsel" law has happily expired, but this Congress will be looking to assert itself in particular on war powers. Mr. Fielding understands the importance of fighting off such poaching -- for the sake of Mr. Bush and the Office of the Presidency. This ought to mean recommending that Mr. Bush veto any weakening of last year's law on military tribunals, as well as resisting any further delegation of executive power to the judiciary for approving warrantless wiretaps of al Qaeda.

The question of responding to the avalanche of subpoenas will be more politically delicate. Congress has every right to conduct oversight of the executive branch, and the White House will be obliged to supply numerous documents. However, the principle of executive privilege is vital to Presidential decision-making, and preserving the privacy of that deliberative process will be one of Mr. Fielding's primary tasks.

Another duty will be offering Mr. Bush advice on judicial selection. The conventional Beltway wisdom is that Senate Democrats will block all but liberal nominees to the appellate courts, and that might be right. But the judges issue proved to be a good one for Republicans in both the 2002 and 2004 campaigns, and the White House shouldn't shrink from appointing capable members of the Federalist Society simply because they might not be confirmed.

DOJ_NMG_0114403

This is an issue that deserves to be framed for 2008 -- all the more so if Mr. Bush gets another Supreme Court nomination. Democrats may want to block any Bush nominee, but they won't find it politically painless to do so if the President selects nominees as capable and conservative as Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito.

Amid all the Washington talk of "bipartisanship," the reality of our current political division means inevitable conflict. It's good to see Mr. Bush recruiting some experienced generals for the battles ahead.

Bush Issues Democrats Challenge On Earmarks (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

Twice in the last week, President Bush has challenged Democrats to cut pork-barrel spending projects in half this year -- but the administration won't say how much earmark spending happens now, nor what the 50 percent target cut would mean.

As Republicans adjust to being the minority party on Capitol Hill, both Mr. Bush and his fellow party members in Congress are flexing their newfound freedom to take shots from the sidelines without the responsibility of having to back it up by passing the bills or meeting the goals.

For Mr. Bush, that meant making the bold challenge Wednesday in the White House Rose Garden "to cut the number and cost of earmarks next year by at least half," but not backing it up with any specifics.

A spokesman for the Office of Management and Budget said to stay tuned for the details.

"We're looking right now at the peak levels that we've seen occur over the last three years, and what you'll see in the coming future, particularly the budget itself, is a more clear understanding of what is meant by that phrase," said Sean Kevelighan, press secretary at the OMB, which handles the White House's fiscal affairs.

But Democrats found the timing of Mr. Bush's goal to be curious.

"It is interesting that the administration stayed quiet as the number of earmarks exploded under a Republican Congress and set this target now that Democrats are in control," said House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, who also supports cutting the number of earmarks.

Meanwhile, congressional Republicans are finding freedom in being in the minority.

At their session-opening press conference, House Republican leaders were asked what alternatives they would offer to the new Democratic leadership's package of reforms.

"I think we have to see the base of what we're dealing with, what hand are we dealt," said Rep. Adam H. Putnam of Florida, chairman of the House Republican Conference.

It's a strategy that political observer Charlie Cook called the "just throw rocks" approach in last week's issue of National Journal.

Rep. David R. Obey, Wisconsin Democrat and the new chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, bristled at the president's challenge, saying Mr. Bush is just as guilty of spending money to gain politically.

"If we are going to talk about earmarks, then let's talk about the guy who does the most earmarking. That's the guy in the big white house at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue," Mr. Obey said.

Mr. Obey said last year the president provided fire-grant money to 30,278 projects, but 62 percent of those grants were in congressional districts represented by Republicans.

"Every single one of those fire grants is the functional equivalent of an earmark," Mr. Obey said.

Both sides agree that earmarks are in the eye of the beholder, and there are a host of guesses as to how much earmarked spending there is in the budget.

Citizens Against Government Waste, which publishes the annual "Pig Book" looking at pork-barrel spending, put the figure at $29 billion in 2006; Republicans on the House Appropriations Committee said it was $17 billion; and Bloomberg News service, citing the Congressional Research Service, put the 2006 figure at $71.77 billion, covering 15,832 special projects.

Mr. Obey supports more transparency in earmarks, but cautioned against thinking it will affect the budget deficit. Cutting earmarks doesn't save any money because earmarks themselves don't increase the size of a spending bill; rather, they direct money to a specific project.

Mr. Hoyer said Mr. Bush has a chance to prove he is serious with next month's budget proposal.

"I hope that the president is truly looking to work together to reduce earmarks. An important first step would be for him to put forward an honest and credible budget."

Reid's 'earmark' Gets Veto Of Home County (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114404

From securing money for a modern national park visitors' center to landing an alternative-energy grant for a local school, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has come through over the years for rural and cash-poor White Pine County.

But a White Pine lands bill that Reid attached to the 109th Congress's final legislation lost the official endorsement of the very county it affects, leaving disappointed Nevadans in its wake.

White Pine officials wanted funding added to the bill for a study of the Southern Nevada Water Authority's (SNWA) plan for a 285-mile pipeline snaking through their region, sending groundwater south to glittering Las Vegas. County commissioners said Reid and Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.) told them the addition would sink the bill, but the commission was willing to take the risk.

Both senators and several local groups praise the bill for designating more than a half-million acres of newly protected wilderness. But some in White Pine and elsewhere in the West contend that the requested water study fell victim to Reid's support for a pipeline sought by Clark County, home of Las Vegas, where the majority leader's son Rory is board chairman.

"Reid's always told us in private … that we should sell some of our water," said John Chachas, a Democratic White Pine commissioner. "He says, 'You're bankrupt, sell your water, let Clark County build their $2 billion pipeline into northern Nevada and everybody will be happy.' Well, we're at opposite ends of the rainbow."

Reid laid the foundation for wilderness preservation coupled with private development in Nevada with a 1998 bill that authorized the sale of thousands of acres of public land in Clark County. The Nevada delegation ensured that proceeds from the sales would stay within the state, including 10 percent headed to the SNWA, where Rory Reid is vice chairman of the board.

White Pine also will gain access to those land-sale proceeds, one of several changes the county requested in the final version of last month's land bill, Reid spokesman Jon Summers said in an e-mail.

During a town hall in August, Summers said, "the senators emphasized that the bill was a land bill — not a water bill — and that they did not intend to give preference to either side of the water debate by putting in water provisions."

Two Southern California water provisions that were high priorities for the SNWA were included in the final version of the White Pine bill: a canal-lining project and a new reservoir, paid for by the state of Nevada, that would provide billions of gallons of water each year for Clark County.

Both Summers and White Pine's chief commissioner, Brent Eldridge, said the California projects could alleviate the immediate need for the water pipeline. Eldridge missed the board's vote to pull support from the lands bill but defended the lawmakers' refusal to add funding for the water study.

"We understand that they're Nevada's senators, not White Pine County's senators," Eldridge said, adding the county "seriously eroded our credibility with the senators" by pushing for a study that "could appear to be an affront" to the SNWA.

Reid helped pass two more Nevada land sales bills in 2002 and 2004, each combining new wilderness designations with public land sales. He took GOP heat after media reports revealed benefits in the 2004 bill for Harvey Whittemore, a friend of the senator whose planned Clark County development would tap the water pipeline.

Still, White Pine was the first county to raise questions about a congressional lands bill written to help replenish its coffers. The initial draft of the bill included almost $1 billion of water-related projects for Clark County — a red flag for some.

"I'm going to be fighting this project hard. But these political games, the fact that Reid has this power as majority leader, it bothers me quite a bit," said Gary Perea, a Democratic commissioner who voted to resist the bill without the water study.

Perea acknowledged that Whittemore and Rory Reid stand to gain from the water pipeline. But he attributed Reid's last-minute move on the White Pine bill primarily to the delegation's reliance on thirsty Las Vegas for political clout.

Reid, Ensign and Gov.-elect Jim Gibbons (R-Nev.), a former House member, all lent muscle to the White Pine bill. Reid requested its addition to the year-end tax and trade omnibus, however, according to a Congressional Record statement by former Rep. Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) and media reports.

"I just don't trust [Reid]. Not with water," said Chachas, sufficiently scarred by the water fight that last month he stepped down from the commission. "He's too close to the water authority and their efforts down there."

Summers and Ensign chief of staff John Lopez stressed that the proposed pipeline is under state jurisdiction, with its fate to be determined sometime this year in a ruling by the state engineer. Ensign believed "the inclusion of the water study would unwisely move the focus of this bill away from economic development and natural resources protection," Lopez said in an e-mail.

The SNWA focused its lobbying effort not on the White Pine issues but on the new reservoir and canal-lining projects, water authority spokesman Scott Huntley said.

"That was our interest in the bill, not any of this other matter — though we did oppose the study," Huntley said. The SNWA believes another water study, required by a settlement of federal protests to the pipeline, would address the county's concerns.

The SNWA lobbying team includes Kai Anderson, a former Reid aide now with the Rhoads Group, and Marcus Faust, a Mormon lobbyist who has worked for the church. Huntley referred questions about Rory Reid's role in the process to Sen. Reid's office, where Summers said, "To our knowledge, Commissioner [Rory] Reid had no involvement" with SNWA's action on the bill.

DOJ_NMG_0114405

Environmental groups are split on the White Pine bill. The Nevada Wilderness Project and the Eastern Nevada Landscape Coalition lent support, but the Sierra Club, Environmental Defense and the Seattle-based Western Lands Project (WLP) have expressed concern.

"With one hand, he's essentially giving them land for development, and with the other hand, he's [taking] away their water," WLP director Janine Blaeloch said of Reid.

The WLP has filed suit against Whittemore and the federal agency that manages public lands, the Bureau of Land Management (BLM), in a bid to halt progress on his development.

Then-Rep. Richard Pombo (R-Calif.), who led the House Resources Committee until losing his reelection bid, appeared blindsided by the White Pine bill's presence in last month's year-end omnibus.

Pombo said he was unaware who inserted the White Pine provisions but labeled them a "probable earmark" in a letter to then-Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) "Their ill-advised inclusion undermines valuable natural resources, cheats taxpayers out of their investment in our public lands and benefits special interest groups on a completely unprecedented scale," Pombo wrote on Dec. 8.

"It quacks like an earmark, it walks like an earmark," said Steve Ellis, vice president of programs at Taxpayers for Common Sense. "You could say this is one last hurrah for the old way of doing things, but it certainly runs counter to what the Democrats in both chambers are trying to enact for the 110th Congress."

RaLeene Makley, who will join the county commission next year, said lingering hard feelings could lead the county to take a savvier approach with its congressmen, perhaps even hiring a lobbyist.

"I believe that White Pine was thinking something different was happening than what really was," Makley said.

House Votes To Tighten Rules On Tariff Breaks (WP)

By Joe Stephens

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

The House voted last week to shine a spotlight into the murky world of import-tariff suspensions, a little-known form of special-interest legislation that has cost taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars in lost revenue.

The House overwhelmingly approved a bill that, for the first time, officially equates tariff suspensions with a better-known variety of legislative pork, the congressional earmark. The new rules require public disclosure of each measure's sponsor, purpose and cost whenever lawmakers slip one into legislation.

The rules also require that congressional sponsors identify each person or corporation "reasonably anticipated to benefit" from the breaks on import taxes.

The rules direct sponsoring lawmakers to certify that they and their spouses have no financial stake in the tax breaks, and they ban the practice of trading provisions for members' votes.

In one of the first official acts of the new Democratic majority, the House approved the rule changes 280 to 152. Some analysts predicted the changes would encourage increased scrutiny of a practice that, a Washington Post study found, often benefits large foreign-based corporations.

The Senate is expected to take up similar legislation this week.

In recent months, the number of congressionally approved tariff suspensions has soared. It rose from 440 at the end of 2004 to more than 800 in the just-concluded 109th Congress, including provisions covering such products as shoes, camcorders and boiled oysters.

Lawmakers rolled 520 of the suspensions into just one must-pass bill that was approved in December, in the final hours of the last Congress.

Such suspensions often apply to one product imported by one company, according to The Post's analysis in September. The provisions rarely, if ever, identify the company that initiated the legislation. Some provisions do not identify the product, either, referring instead to strings of numbers keyed to massive volumes of tariff tables.

Individual tariff suspensions are supposed to cost the Treasury no more than $500,000 a year in lost revenue. But in recent years the authors of a number of the provisions managed to file multiple measures aimed at a single product.

Supporters of the suspensions say they create jobs and lower consumer prices by reducing costs for U.S. manufacturers. The proponents say that proposed suspensions are reviewed by the Commerce Department, customs officials and the U.S. International Trade Commission. Congressional committees also seek industry comment on the proposed suspensions and recently began posting any objections on their Web sites. Lawmakers say they generally drop a measure if a domestic producer objects.

Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich.), who is expected to chair the House Ways and Means subcommittee on trade, hailed the changes as "a useful step forward."

DOJ_NMG_0114406

"The more transparency the better," Levin said. "It will be easier for people to verify the basic rules are being followed; outside groups will be able to more readily check."

Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.) said the changes will help root out what he described as "old-fashioned pork."

"This should be one more lesson to my party: We were fired with cause. We got lazy, we got too cozy with K Street, and this is an example where flipping the majority cleans out the closet. I very reluctantly give kudos to the majority."

The House bill applies only to tariff suspensions that benefit 10 or fewer companies. Ryan Alexander, president of Taxpayers for Common Sense, hailed the legislation as a "good start" but said it should apply to suspensions that benefit as many as 100 companies.

"Ten doesn't really pass the smell test," Alexander said.

White House To Unveil Medicare Overhaul (FT)

By Krishna Guha In Washington

Financial Times, January 9, 2007

The White House budget to be unveiled on February 5 will include plans to expand means-testing in Medicare, the government-sponsored health insurance programme for the elderly, the Financial Times has learned.

The greater use of means-testing, which would require richer Americans to make a bigger contribution, will be accompanied by other steps to increase efficiency and bear down on Medicare costs.

The proposed Medicare changes form part of the White House plan to meet President George W. Bush's goal of eliminating the federal government deficit by 2012 while making his tax cuts permanent.

A senior administration official said the Medicare reforms set out in the budget would be "significant" though they would not add up to "unrealistic full-blown reform" of the programme.

He likened them to changes negotiated in 1997 as part of a bipartisan effort to balance the budget in five years.

The White House will also revise down its estimate of the underlying growth rate of Medicare costs, based on the lower than anticipated cost of the Medicare prescription drug benefit and new actuarial forecasts.

The administration expects that a combination of the policy reforms and slower growth in underlying costs will free up tens of billions of dollars annually by 2012 to help meet the zero deficit goal.

The official acknowledged that the administration had failed to win Congressional support for changes to Medicare in the recent past. However, he said the political context – with both parties now at least talking about balancing the budget by 2012 – has changed.

"I am not saying it is easy," he said. "But it is easier."

Stuart Butler, a policy expert at the Heritage Foundation, said "greater means-testing is the only way to contain the huge tsunami of Medicare spending that is scheduled for the next several decades."

The White House budget will also impose tight ceilings on growth in discretionary spending on non-security related programmes. However, in an effort to show that its budget plan is politically credible, the White House will not demand a nominal freeze in spending in these areas, as it did in last year's budget.

"We will show some flexibility," the official said.

This will involve budgeting for growth in total non-defence discretionary spending, though this will almost certainly be set below the expected rate of inflation.

Some defence costs included in supplemental budgets for the Iraq war will be brought into the administration's budget. But there will be no amount set aside for unforeseen military costs in 2012 and beyond.

Bush, Lawmakers Meet On Education Bill (AP)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

AP, January 9, 2007

President Bush pushed for renewal of the No Child Left Behind education law Monday in a meeting with congressional leaders but was noncommittal on their request for more money to help schools meet the law's requirements.

"In our discussions today, we've all agreed to work together to address some of the major concerns that some people have on this piece of legislation, without weakening the essence of the bill," Bush said following the White House meeting with Democratic and Republican lawmakers.

The law seeks to ensure all children can read and do math at grade level by 2014, which has placed many new demands on schools. They have had to step up testing, boost teacher quality and pay more attention to the achievements of minority children.

DOJ_NMG_0114407

Schools that get federal aid but do not make enough progress must provide tutoring, offer public school choice to students or initiate other reforms such as overhauling their staffs.

First Lady Laura Bush, a former teacher and school librarian, and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings attended the meeting Monday, a day the Bush administration chose to mark the fifth anniversary of the law.

Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., and Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass. — who chair committees overseeing education — said they urged the president to propose funding increases for the law. Bush made no commitments, according to a congressional aide who was briefed on the discussions and spoke on the condition of anonymity because the meeting was private.

Democrats, who won control of Congress in November, say the administration and Republican lawmakers have underfunded the law by about $50 billion, compared to what was originally called for. Republicans say it is common practice for legislation to be funded at less than the full level.

While partisan sniping over the law has been common in recent years, the lawmakers attending Monday's meeting struck a bipartisan note and pledged to work together to get the law renewed for five more years. The united front is part of a strategy to fend off critics who want to see the law scrapped or drastically changed.

"This issue now has its detractors and those that are opposed to it. That's true in the Democratic party and the Republican party," Kennedy said.

Spellings listed a few areas of concern that came up during Monday's meeting. They included how to test special education and limited-English speaking students, a desire to give schools credit for progress even when they fall short of annual targets and ways to get students access to high-quality free tutoring.

Spellings also indicated she was willing to consider providing financial incentives to states that want to align their standards with more rigorous ones in place elsewhere.

The administration, and Republicans generally, have consistently resisted anything that resembles national standards dictating what students across the country should know and learn.

"I think anytime there's a carrot approach, as opposed to a stick for continuing to raise the bar, I think that will be well received," Spelling said.

The No Child Left Behind law has pushed some states to weaken their standards to avoid consequences that arise when schools miss annual targets.

Kennedy and Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., have introduced legislation addressing the issue. The National Education Association, the largest teachers' union, has endorsed Dodd's bill calling for voluntary national standards.

Republicans Seek Flexible School Funds (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

Key Republicans yesterday said President Bush's education reform law, which is up for renewal this year, should be changed to give states more control over funding and results, arguing that the federal government remains far too involved in local classrooms.

Exactly five years after signing the No Child Left Behind Act, Mr. Bush met with a separate group of lawmakers, including Senate education panel chairman Edward M. Kennedy, to ask them to renew the law, one of Mr. Bush's signature domestic accomplishments.

But across town, Republican Sens. Jim DeMint of South Carolina and John Cornyn of Texas teamed up with the conservative Heritage Foundation to offer a proposal that would let states opt out of many of the federal education funding formulas and instead use the money to best fit their own classroom needs.

"You can't have quality development with a top-down approach," Mr. DeMint said. "It's time to change the way we're thinking about this because it's not working."

Mr. Cornyn agreed that the best option at this point is "moving decision-making power out of Washington and closer to parents and teachers."

Their idea -- which they'll fight to include in the law's renewal -- would keep high standards in place but let states choose to enter a five-year performance agreement with the federal government in exchange for less regulation and more flexibility in how they would use federal dollars and would track their progress. A similar idea was included in Mr. Bush's original NCLB proposal but was watered down by the time the bill became law, according to Heritage.

Mr. Bush and administration officials yesterday praised the bipartisan law, which requires states to test third- to eighth-graders annually and once in grades 10 to 12, with the goal of ensuring that all students can read and do math at grade level by 2014. States had to set paths to meet that goal and track the progress of their schools. Consistently failing schools must offer students public-school choice and tutoring services.

DOJ_NMG_0114408

New standards were also set for teachers' ability.

"I think it's made an enormous difference," the president said, after meeting with Mr. Kennedy, House education panel chairman George Miller of California, and the panels' top Republicans, Sen. Michael B. Enzi of Wyoming and Rep. Howard P. "Buck" McKeon of California.

Mr. Bush said he was "confident" that the group can work together to address some of the major concerns about the law without weakening it.

"We have learned some things over the last five years, but we know we're on the right track," said Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, who also attended, along with first lady Laura Bush.

The four lawmakers all expressed hope that they could reauthorize the act, with some changes, and Mr. Enzi said there could be "quick progress."

Democrats said they asked Mr. Bush to increase funding for the bill, insisting that states need more help to meet requirements. Federal education funding has jumped about $7 billion in the past five years under the law, but Democrats have long complained that it's still about $40 billion short of levels set out in the original law.

"It's an issue of priority -- of budgetary priority," Mr. Kennedy said yesterday.

"It will make the reauthorization process far more difficult if it's not there," Mr. Miller said.

Helping limited-English-speaking students and ensuring that more students in failing schools access the tutoring and school-choice options are among other issues being discussed, Mrs. Spellings said.

Conservatives likely will resist a further spike in education funding. But many conservatives on Capitol Hill are also "spooked" at the prospect of Mr. Bush cutting a deal with Democrats to expand the NCLB fully into high school, a House Republican aide said.

"If they do it the way they did the first one, then we're looking at a massive new entitlement," the aide said.

Mr. Bush included a proposal in his budget last year that expanded the annual testing to high school.

The White House praised the NCLB law yesterday, noting that all states now have accountability and testing plans in place, the number of highly qualified teachers has increased and 9-year-olds are scoring better than ever on reading and math.

Still, there has been relatively low participation in the tutoring and school-choice options offered under the law for students in consistently failing schools.

Mr. DeMint said schools are "squawking" that the law is too onerous. He said schools are focused so intently on meeting its requirements that they're not trying creative solutions for education.

"This will require results ... but it won't be so focused on process," Mr. Cornyn said of their proposal.

White House spokesman Chad Colby said the administration would wait to see details of the DeMint-Cornyn proposal.

"We're all for allowing states and districts to have flexibility as long as they adhere to the core principles of NCLB though. We can't get away from those core principles or reduce accountability in any way," he added.

Democrats Push For Changes To No Child Left Behind Law (NYT)

By Diana Jean Schemo

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — Democratic Congressional leaders on Monday called President Bush's signature education law too punitive in its sanctions on public schools and pledged to increase educational spending, signaling the stance they will take this year in negotiations over the law's renewal.

The comments came as Mr. Bush discussed renewal of the law, No Child Left Behind, at a White House meeting with legislators of both parties on the law's fifth anniversary. The measure prods schools to improve students' yearly achievement with the threat of sanctions and requires them to bring all students to grade level in reading and math by 2014.

In remarks after the meeting, Mr. Bush predicted a strong bipartisan effort to address "major concerns" about No Child Left Behind "without weakening the essence of the bill."

He added, "We showed in the past that we can work together to get positive results, and I'm confident we can do so again."

While the tenets of the law enjoy strong bipartisan support, No Child Left Behind has also become a partisan battleground, with Democrats accusing Republicans of underfinancing it by $56 billion. Groups across the political spectrum are looking for changes and refinements, including removal of sanctions and imposition of a single national standard for academic performance.

The Democrats, now in the majority, began to stake out their own positions. The Senate majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, who did not attend the president's meeting, said that "accountability measures have proven far too punitive, and states have been given little flexibility in implementing the law's requirements."

DOJ_NMG_0114409

Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, who took over as chairman of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, said after the meeting with the president, “We’ve learned a lot from the past five years, and we know changes are needed to help improve and strengthen the law.”

His aides said Mr. Kennedy was proposing incentives for states to work together toward common academic standards that would help them and meet the demands of college, work and military service. Currently, states vary wildly in what they consider sufficient progress under the law.

Mr. Kennedy has also suggested expanding social programs for low-income children and putting outreach workers in every impoverished school, as a way of raising achievement. He is also proposing a new federal role in school construction and renovation.

Under existing rules, students have the right to transfer from subpar schools to ones with higher test scores, even if overcrowding would result. The Democratic proposal is intended to reduce crowding.

Representative George Miller, Democrat of California, the new chairman of the House Committee on Education and Labor who also attended the White House meeting, urged the president and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings to make sharp increases in spending on the impoverished schools singled out by No Child Left Behind.

“The No Child Left Behind Act has brought important changes to our public education system, for example, by shining a spotlight on the persistent achievement gap that exists among different groups of students in our country,” Mr. Miller said. “But if we are going to fulfill our original commitment to children and parents, then the law, its implementation and its funding must be improved.”

Mr. Bush did not indicate whether he would seek additional financing. But Ms. Spellings indicated that the administration would be amenable to changes in a number of areas the Democrats were suggesting, including the incentives to make state standards more rigorous and uniform. She also said that areas of common concern included how to test special education students and those with limited English.

Senate Torn Over Ethics Panel Measure (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, January 9, 2007

Presidential candidates from both parties are urging the Senate to set up an independent office to probe ethical questions involving fellow senators. That could be a tough sell.

There is some "institutional resistance," said Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., a potential candidate who has long championed the notion of an independent office of public integrity that would take over some of the self-policing duties of the Senate ethics committee.

"A lot of members are concerned about the use of an independent commission as a political club to beat them over the head," Obama said at a news conference Monday as debate on ethics legislation opened.

A possible rival in 2008, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., is also pressing to amend the ethics bill, the first legislation Democrats are taking up in their new majority role, to include the office of public integrity.

The ethics legislation, based on a bill that stalled in the last Congress, would ban gifts and travel paid for by lobbyists, slow the movement of former senators to lobbying jobs, require lobbyists to provide more information on their activities and oblige senators to be more open about their special projects, or earmarks. The Senate is expected to spend up to two weeks on the legislation.

The House passed a rules package last week with tough bans on receiving gifts and travel from lobbyists and their employers and banning the use of corporate jets.

Obama and McCain argue that, after the lobbying and ethics scandals that contributed to the Republican defeat in the 2006 midterm elections, the Senate must create an independent office to ensure voters it is serious about enforcing its own ethics rules.

But Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., a member of the six-senator ethics panel, said the nonpartisan group has done its job, and the new office would simply add another step to the ethics process. He added that the office of public integrity was "in danger of becoming a backboard for political tennis balls" with each side filing partisan charges against the other.

"Our ethics process in the Senate works very well," said Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., another ethics committee member. "We have not broken down like the House has."

The House ethics committee, torn by partisan wrangling, was dormant for about 16 months until May of last year. It did carry out an extensive investigation of disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., last fall.

DOJ_NMG_0114410

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., in an interview with Nevada reporters Monday, said that as a former ethics committee member he believed an outside body should be considered only after extensive hearings. "I think it would be a gross error in judgment for the Senate just to leap in and do something without holding any hearings," he said.

Last year, led by ethics committee members, the Senate rejected a proposal for an office of public integrity by an 11-5 vote in the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee and then by 67-30 on the Senate floor.

Asked how that result might change this year, Obama pointed to eight Democratic freshmen that also attended the news conference. "We've got a whole bunch of freshmen and I also think the election changed the dynamics," he said.

The independent office proposal that Obama and Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., will likely offer as an amendment is identical to the idea being put forward by McCain, Sen. Joseph Lieberman, I-Conn., and Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, in separate ethics legislation.

It would create an independent congressional agency that would audit financial disclosure and lobbying reports and investigate alleged ethics violations. It could refer cases of possible violations to federal and state authorities. It would report to the House and Senate ethics committees, which would retain the authority to determine violations and penalties against members.

Feingold said they also would push for changes to move the Senate closer to the House, which last week effectively barred lawmakers from traveling by corporate jets. "It is one of these things that really sticks in the craw" of voters, he said. "It also has a corrupting influence."

Reid said his office was working on various measures to expand the gift and travel ban to include companies that hire lobbyists, stop lawmakers from sneaking provisions into legislation at the last minute and strengthening the definition of what constitutes an earmark.

"This is just a start," he said of the bill he and Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., introduced on the Senate floor. "We're going to improve this bill."

Senate Takes Up Ethics Bill Promoted By Democrats (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

The Senate yesterday began debate on the Democrats' ethics-reform package, with one of their chief spokesmen on the issue accusing lawmakers of being loath to support a ban on free private-jet flights for reasons of personal privilege.

Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois noted at a press conference held yesterday to announce the package -- which Democrats hope to pass Friday -- that such flights, usually funded by lobbyists or their corporate sponsors, let lawmakers avoid security lines.

"Why do you think there is resistance?" he said. "Well, because corporate jets are nice. They are convenient. They are waiting for you. You don't have to take your shoes off."

Mr. Obama, who has all but announced his run for president in 2008, said he voluntarily gave up flying corporate-class last year and now pays for chartered flights out of his hefty campaign account.

Critics of the proposals -- which also include prohibitions on accepting gifts, meals or junkets funded by lobbyists -- say monied special interests still could buy influence with campaign contributions. Mr. Obama promised to tackle campaign-finance reform later this year.

Democrats say the sight of senators and congressmen whizzing around in Learjets nettles a public that must endure the long lines and security checks of commercial air travel.

"When they find out that members of Congress can use a corporate jet and have that kind of convenience that the average person can't have, it is one of those things that really stick in the craw," said Sen. Russ Feingold, Wisconsin Democrat and co-sponsor of the ethics bill with Mr. Obama, adding that the free flights have a "corrupting influence."

"When a lobbyist is in that plane with you, he or she has all kinds of time to lobby you, bend your ear," Mr. Feingold said. "It is something the average citizen does not have. So to me, [a ban] is both substantive and symbolic, and it is a very important point."

The Senate ethics bill closely mirrors legislation that began to move through the House last week. Both include measures to stop earmarks, the local spending provisions widely derided as pork that lawmakers bury in complicated bills, and to break up close ties between lobbyists and members of Congress.

Voter outrage over corruption in Washington, including the scandal involving disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, is widely credited as a factor in the Democrats' gains in the midterm elections. The issue became the first taken up by the new Democrat-controlled Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0114411

"The American people demanded change, and the Democrats are ready to deliver," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said at the press conference. "In the end, the Senate will pass the most sweeping reforms since Watergate."

Public backing for a crackdown makes supporters of the reforms confident that lawmakers will vote for the new rules, even if they have to give up flying free or at reduced rates on corporate jets.

Mr. Obama acknowledged that some lawmakers depend on private jets for legitimate congressional business. But he said they can find ways to pay for it themselves.

"In fairness, for folks who are traveling a lot or live in remote areas or have to travel to areas of the state that are difficult to get to or have irregular commercial flight schedules, there may be legitimate reasons for them to be concerned," he said. "I just pay for it out of my campaign funds."

Senate Democrats Begin Work On Ethics Law Changes (BLM)

By Jonathan D. Salant

Bloomberg, January 9, 2007

Jan. 8 (Bloomberg) -- Democrats who now control the U.S. Senate will spend the next two weeks on overhauling ethics and lobbying laws, after the House voted to amend its own rules.

ADVERTISEMENT

The proposed Senate measure would bar lawmakers from accepting free gifts and meals from lobbyists. Lobbyists would have to file disclosure reports online four times a year, instead of filing paper reports twice a year. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada said he'll support amendments to strengthen the measure, which is similar to a plan passed by the Senate last year that was criticized by advocacy groups as too weak.

``No issue facing this body is more fundamentally important," Reid said on the Senate floor today. ``When we make leaders accountable to the people, not to special interests, there's no limit to what we can accomplish."

House Democrats approved more extensive restrictions last week as their first order of business since taking power. Democrats won control of both houses in November's election for the first time in 12 years, with 42 percent of voters in a CNN exit poll saying the ethics issue was ``extremely important."

Republican Senator John Cornyn of Texas, a member of the Senate Ethics Committee, said the two parties should work together on a final measure.

``Ethics and lobbying reform are issues that deserve and demand a bipartisan solution as Congress works to strengthen the American people's faith and trust in their government," Cornyn said.

Corporate Jets

The Senate proposal is co-sponsored by Reid and Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, a Republican from Kentucky. Reid said the Senate plans to spend the next two weeks debating the legislation and amendments before voting.

The House rules approved last week will ban lawmakers from flying on corporate jets and accepting gifts and meals from lobbyists. They also can't accept overnight trips from lobbyists and their organizations. Nonprofit foundations affiliated with lobbying groups can continue to pay for trips approved in advance by the House ethics committee.

The new House rules also require that the sponsors of pet spending projects, known as earmarks, be identified publicly.

The House new rules will take effect with no further action, while the proposed Senate legislation would need House approval and SEARCH

News | News Photos | Images | Web" /> President George W. Bush's signature. The House can continue to require members to follow its rules if legislation enacted by Congress is weaker.

Proposed Amendments

Democratic Senators Russell Feingold of Wisconsin and Barack Obama of Illinois are proposing amendments to the Senate legislation that would duplicate the House rules on travel, except that it would let senators fly on corporate jets as long as they pay the charter rate. Their proposal also would double to two years the waiting period before former lawmakers can become lobbyists.

Feingold and Obama would require Senate campaigns to file electronically with the SEARCH

News | News Photos | Images | Web" /> Federal Election Commission, as do House campaigns, political parties and political action committees. Until now, Senate campaigns have filed their reports on paper.

``We may finally have a bill that is an appropriate response to the clear message we got from the American people," Feingold said at a news conference with Reid, Obama and eight of the nine Democratic Senate freshmen.

The Feingold-Obama proposal also would include an independent ethics office to enforce the new law and investigate complaints.

`Outside Mechanism'

DOJ_NMG_0114412

``Some sort of outside mechanism is the key," said former FEC Chairman Trevor Potter, who now heads the Washington-based Campaign Finance Institute, an advocacy group. ``What we've learned is without some outside prod, the system won't work."

Potter and others who support stronger ethics laws have said the Senate is not as motivated to act on the issue as the House. House Democrats have said they won eight Republican-held seats in November because of ethics issues, more than half of the 15 they needed to win control of the chamber.

``It's a much tougher sell on the Senate side," said Gary Kalman, a lobbyist with the Washington-based U.S. Public Interest Research Group. ``The biggest disappointment is they are starting with the bill that passed the Senate last year. It passed at a very different time, a very different understanding of where the public was on the topic of corruption."

Freshman Democrats Back Senate Ethics Bill (CQ)

By Martin Kady II

Congressional Quarterly, January 9, 2007

Freshmen in the Senate are generally supposed to be seen and not heard.

But when it comes to the ethics and lobbying bill (S 1) on the Senate floor, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid seems willing to shine the spotlight on the new Democratic senators who gave the party its majority.

Reid stood on a dais Monday with eight of the nine new Democrats in the Senate to tout the ethics and lobbying bill meant to be a reaction to scandals of the past two years that focused popular anger against Republicans.

The news conference had a decidedly populist feel, as Sen. Bernie Sanders, an independent from Vermont who describes himself as a socialist, derided “lobbyists who represent the wealthy.” Freshman Democrat Amy Klobuchar of Minnesota, talked about how she drove to Washington in her family Saturn and brought her “Minnesota moral compass” to the Senate. And new Sen. Sherrod Brown, D-Ohio, complained that in the past, the “drug industry wrote the Medicare drug law.” Sen. Claire McCaskill, D-Mo., tried to sum up the moment: “The fact that we are here [on the stage] speaks volumes” about the importance of lobbying and ethics.

Reid said the intent of bringing the freshmen to the stage was to showcase their support for “the most sweeping reforms since Watergate.”

The Senate meanwhile formally took up the ethics and lobbying bill, and there is widespread agreement for a crackdown on lobbyist-funded travel, gifts and meals.

Sens. Barack Obama, D-Ill., and Russ Feingold, D-Wis., are leading a charge to create an independent Office of Public Integrity with the authority to investigate ethics violations. Obama and Feingold will likely team up with Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., Joseph I. Lieberman, D-Conn., and Susan Collins, R-Maine, but they don’t necessarily have the support of the incoming freshmen Democrats.

Sen. Bob Casey, D-Pa., who beat Republican Rick Santorum on Nov. 7, said in a brief interview that he believes the Office of Public Integrity should be studied further by the Rules Committee in hearings. And freshman Sen. Jon Tester, D-Mont., who beat Republican Conrad Burns in the general election, said he thinks the Senate should police itself.

“I would rather see the enforcement done by an existing body,” Tester said. “But there needs to be teeth in enforcement.”

Without the support of these freshmen senators, the Office of Public Integrity is likely to be rejected. The idea failed on a 67-30 roll call last year, and at least 10 new senators would have to approve the idea for the amendment to have a chance.

“There is some institutional resistance,”Obama said. “But it’s very important that whatever we do, the laws will be enforced.”

Push For Lobby Database Fades (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, January 9, 2007

Lobbyists bracing for tough new disclosure requirements from the Democrats’ ethics reform drive can breathe a little easier.

Democratic leaders appear to be backing away from a provision included in ethics proposals last year that would require lobbyists to detail their contacts with Members of Congress.

The plan was met with stiff resistance from labor and nonprofit groups, which argue that the requirement would be onerous, impossible to apply consistently and could chill contact on politically sensitive topics.

Democrats, who last year pushed the measure as key to shedding light on lobbyists’ role in the lawmaking process, are now suggesting the disclosure standard is too problematic.

DOJ_NMG_0114413

"That is a provision that raised a lot of concerns with a lot of people," said Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.). "We haven't gotten through all of them. We're going to take another look at it."

House Democratic aides said that while the measure still could find its way into a reform bill the chamber is expected to take up later this month, it isn't topping anybody's priority list.

The new posture, in part, reflects the challenge for Democrats seeking to make good on last year's promises, made when they were out of power and trying to rally voters with an anti-corruption message.

The then-minority party grabbed for the high ground in the debate over ethics rules by proposing bold reform measures. Now that they are in power, Democrats are trying to pursue the strongest reforms possible while ensuring the overhaul doesn't cause unintended consequences or spur a filibuster in the Senate.

As Senators take up the bill this week, public interest groups are preparing for fights over grass-roots lobbying disclosure and reimbursement rates for lawmakers taking rides on corporate jets.

The House Democrats' package last year — offered as an alternative to a Republican version derided as pitiful by outside watchdog groups — would have required lobbyists to file quarterly reports listing every lawmaker they contacted over that period. The information would be available to the public in a searchable online database.

Feingold went a step further. His proposal narrowed the definition of a contact only to "oral communications," to exclude widely circulated letters and blast faxes that would have swamped lobbyists' reports. The Senator would have required lobbyists to report not only every lawmaker and executive branch official they contacted, but also the date that contact occurred.

Feingold left the provision out of a bill he introduced Monday with Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) as a high-water mark for the debate. Neither is it likely to appear in a substitute bill Senate Democratic leaders are negotiating with Republicans to strengthen the base measure, tagged S.1. "There was a recognition that too much specificity would be unhelpful and not workable," a Senate Democratic aide said of the proposal.

Ellen Miller, executive director of the Sunlight Foundation, a watchdog group that advocates for greater transparency, called the current reporting requirements "ridiculous."

"The legislation has to provide a requirement that lobbyists provide detailed reporting — what issues they are talking about and who they are meeting with," she said. "If somebody is a paid lobbyist, and their business is to contact Members of Congress and senior staff to talk about legislation, they know who they're talking to and what about."

Gary Kalman, of U.S. PIRG, pointed to the controversy surrounding Vice President Cheney's closed-door meetings in 2001 to formulate White House energy policy. "That's a prime example of how disclosure would have helped the public understand how policy is being made," he said.

But while most reform groups agree an ideal bill would include the disclosure requirement, they are training their fire elsewhere, on travel, earmark and enforcement measures.

Democracy 21, for example, left the reporting requirement off a checklist of reforms, including those addressing lobbyist disclosure, the group released last week as its agenda for the weeks ahead. "It's not among the things we're focused on," President Fred Wertheimer said.

Despite the lack of interest on Capitol Hill, the specter of the new rule has generated plenty of buzz on K Street, where lobbyists of all stripes have tried to throw cold water on the idea by arguing it would provide too much information — or not enough — to be meaningful.

"While we haven't really spent a lot of time looking at this provision, it seems to us it would be reporting for reporting's sake," said Bill Miller, a top lobbyist for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Another lobbyist, who requested anonymity, suggested a better rule would require lawmakers to disclose their fundraising pitches to lobbyists.

"For me to go talk to a Member or staff about an issue — is that corrupting? I don't think so," he said. "The corruption comes from the fundraising, and that all emanates from the Members to the lobbyists, not the other way around."

A common complaint focused on the difficulty of defining a reportable contact, since lobbyists do so much of their work in unscheduled hallway conversations, or after hours, at fundraisers and restaurants. Lobbying law expert Tom Susman said in addition to potentially spawning hundreds of thousands of new reports, the requirement could generate untold opportunities for mischief while yielding little usable information.

Senators are expected to spend the next week and a half, at least, on the ethics rewrite, taking up the bill that the chamber passed last spring and debating amendments.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) held a press conference Monday with Obama and Feingold — the party's point-people on the ethics rewrite — and a group of freshman Democrats to renew his commitment to strengthening that package. "We're going to improve this bill," he said. "At the end of the day, the Senate is going to pass the most substantive reforms since Watergate."

DOJ_NMG_0114414

Reid, Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) and a bipartisan group of other leaders on the issue are expected to offer a substitute amendment as soon as today.

Bundles Of Influence (WP)

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

THE MOST pernicious aspect of the relationship between lawmakers and lobbyists doesn't involve skybox tickets or golf junkets. It centers on the role that lobbyists play in providing lawmakers with the campaign cash they need to survive. Lobbyists write their own checks, which must be disclosed. But lobbyists are even more valuable to politicians in their role as bundlers, tapping their clients and other networks to deliver campaign cash far in excess of what they are permitted to contribute personally. The master of the bundling game was President Bush, with his $200,000-and-up Rangers and his $100,000-and-up Pioneers.

Yet while you can be assured that lawmakers and their campaigns know who their big bundlers are, and that the bundlers keep careful track of how much they help bring in, the people aren't let in on the news. That information ought to be made public, especially regarding those who make their livings seeking to influence Congress.

A provision that would require such disclosure is part of a strong package of ethics and lobbying reforms introduced yesterday by Sens. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.). It would require lobbyists to disclose not only their contributions but also the donations they collect or arrange, along with checks going to presidential libraries, inaugural committees and lawmakers' charities. No single change would add more to public understanding of how money really operates in Washington.

Unfortunately, this change is not expected to be part of the reform package to be introduced today by the new Senate leadership, though its bill promises to be a significant improvement over the measure passed by the Senate last year. But Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) has promised to permit an open amendment process. "I'm here to show that the Democratic caucus's commitment to giving America a government as good and honest as the people it serves really does exist," Mr. Reid said at a news conference yesterday. We look forward to the vote on the bundling amendment, with the new leader providing strong support.

Senators Vow Ethics Reform, But Will Deeds Match Words? (USAT)

USA Today, January 9, 2007

Senate Democrats held a press conference Monday to declare themselves champions of ethics reform, just days after House members of both parties actually did something about ethics reform in that chamber.

As the ethics debate unfolds this week in the Senate, never was the old adage — watch what we do, not what we say — more apt.

The Democrats, who now lead the Senate, are talking a good game but, then again, so did Republicans last January when they ran the Senate and muffed an opportunity to clean up Capitol Hill's sleazy ways.

Last year's failed attempt — which skirted the real problems and preserved senators' favorite perks — is the starting point for this year's try. Senate reformers say they've heard the anti-corruption message from voters and will make the reform package stronger. We'll see.

Here are three ways to judge whether senators are serious about changing:

Corporate jets.

For years, lawmakers have avoided the annoyances of commercial air travel by flying on elite corporate jets at cut-rate prices. Company lobbyists, who fly along, get priceless access. Last week, the House banned this egregious practice for its members.

Senators can't bring themselves to go that far. Democratic senators Russell Feingold of Wisconsin and Barack Obama of Illinois are pushing a measure that would allow the trips but at least require members to pay the full charter rates. But, as of Monday, it wasn't part of a bipartisan bill touted by Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. Reid has been a leading user of this perk, according to PoliticalMoneyLine, which compiles data on money in politics.

Earmarks. The senators' proclaimed reforms do little to rein in earmarks — the "spending with a Zip code" provisions stuck in bills to direct your tax dollars to politically favored recipients. There were almost 14,000 of them last year, according to a count by Citizens Against Government Waste.

The Senate bill requires senators who sponsor these often-secret expenditures to attach their names to them. That's hardly going to deter noted Senate pork-barrelers such as Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., and Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, who take great pride in their earmarks. A Stevens earmark was responsible for the infamous "bridge to nowhere." If senators were serious, they'd change rules that make earmarks virtually impossible to challenge and reduce.

DOJ_NMG_0114415

Enforcement. Reforms will be only as good as the enforcement behind them. Neither the House nor Senate has embraced adding an independent panel to hold members to any new, stricter rules. The Senate rejected a similar idea last year. Monday, when Obama championed the independent panel, senators from both parties squealed in disapproval.

Many lawmakers much prefer the moribund ethics committees of their peers that self-police the House and Senate now. Last year, those panels sat by meekly while Congress wallowed in scandals.

After watching voters bounce ethically challenged incumbents in November and give Democrats the majority, the House made a start last week on its cleanup. And some of the Senate proposals — requiring more public disclosure, banning lobbyist-provided gifts and slowing the revolving door between Capitol Hill and lobbying firms — sound promising.

But promises can be fleeting. Just last month, House leaders promised five-day work weeks. This week, the second of the new Congress, House members took Monday off so some of them could attend the college football championship game.

How serious is Capitol Hill about reform?

Watch what they do, not what they say.

Campaign Photo Shows Bush With Abramoff (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

A liberal watchdog group published on its Web site Monday a picture of President Bush and imprisoned lobbyist Jack Abramoff, the kind of photo the White House has refused to release.

The picture was taken at a campaign fundraiser in December 2003, according to the Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington. It was taken by a private photo contractor who posted it on a Web site, but then was removed before it made it into distribution, said Melanie Sloan, CREW's director.

A previous photo of Bush and the disgraced lobbyist surfaced last year but Abramoff was in the background, slightly blurry.

"This is the one they didn't want you to see," Sloan said.

Kim Eisler, Washingtonian magazine writer and a friend of Abramoff's, confirmed the photo's authenticity for The Associated Press. He said he had seen the picture at Abramoff's house.

In response to the photo being posted, a Bush spokeswoman, Emily Lawrimore, said: "The White House has previously acknowledged that they've met."

Abramoff helped raise more than $100,000 for Bush's 2004 re-election campaign. He is serving nearly six years in prison for a fraudulent Florida casino deal and is cooperating with the FBI in a bribery investigation involving members of Congress and the Bush administration.

Jersey Judge Up For Circuit Court Post (NSL)

By Robert Cohen, Star-ledger Washington Bureau

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), January 9, 2007

Hillman is expected to be Bush's nominee

WASHINGTON -- President Bush is expected to nominate Noel Hillman, a longtime prosecutor and a newly appointed federal judge in New Jersey, to an opening on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Reliable political sources said Hillman is currently undergoing a background investigation needed before he can be formally nominated to fill the federal appeals court seat vacated a year ago by U.S. Supreme Court Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.

"It's pretty close. It's what the White House wants to do," said one knowledgeable source who asked not to be identified.

Hillman, 50, a former assistant U.S. attorney in New Jersey and most recently the lead Justice Department prosecutor in the Jack Abramoff Capitol Hill lobbying scandal, was just confirmed in June to the U.S. District Court in New Jersey.

He had the support then of New Jersey Democratic Sens. Robert Menendez and Frank Lautenberg, and will need their backing again to win a promotion to the prestigious appeals court.

"Sen. Menendez supported Noel Hillman's confirmation to the federal bench last year, but it would be presumptuous to comment on any future nomination until the president makes the choice," said Matt Miller, a spokesman for the senator.

Alex Formuzis, a spokesman for Lautenberg, declined comment on the possible Hillman nomination.

After Hillman was nominated for the federal trial court a year ago, Lautenberg said he was "well qualified" and described him and several other judicial nominees from the state as individuals who "understand the concerns and values of ordinary New Jerseyans."

Hillman, who sits in Camden, declined to comment.

Those familiar with the selection process said the White House decided against picking someone who was clearly ideologically conservative, settling on Hillman because of his qualifications, his integrity and the political calculation that he could easily win confirmation in a Senate now controlled by the Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0114416

Lautenberg and Menendez each could use the Senate rules to block consideration of a New Jersey judicial nominee they opposed.

Hillman also had the backing of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, his former boss at the U.S. Attorney's Office in New Jersey and a former federal appeals court judge.

Prior to going on the bench last year, Hillman was chief of the Justice Department's Office of Public Integrity in Washington.

In that role, he headed the Abramoff corruption probe and was involved in the prosecution of former Clinton administration National Security Adviser Sandy Berger, who was charged with stealing classified documents from the National Archives.

Hillman also played a role in the still-pending corruption investigation of Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), and a number of other high-profile cases.

Before coming to the nation's capital in 2001, Hillman worked for nine years in the U.S. Attorney's Office in Newark. He served there under Chertoff and later became deputy chief of the office's criminal division.

While in New Jersey, he helped direct the campaign finance investigation involving former New Jersey Sen. Robert Torricelli (D-N.J.). That probe led to several prosecutions, including the conviction of David Chang, a wealthy New Jersey commodities broker who made illegal contributions to Torricelli.

Tenet Memoir Under Scrutiny (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

The CIA has submitted portions of a book manuscript by George J. Tenet to the White House for review amid speculation the former CIA director's memoirs will be critical of President Bush.

The book, "At the Center of the Storm," is still being analyzed by the CIA's Publications Review Board. It was during that process that portions of the manuscript were sent to the White House's National Security Council (NSC).

CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield said in response to questions from The Washington Times yesterday that the book portions were sent to the White House for "classification review purposes." He said the book was not submitted because of any negative comments about Mr. Bush, as an intelligence source told The Times. The spokesman declined to comment on the book's contents.

He said the sole criterion for review is whether a book contains classified information, which cannot be published legally by former CIA employees. In this role, the White House would have the power to delete information, or perhaps scenes, it views as classified.

The White House is getting an early peek at one of the most anticipated publishing events of the year because of the former spymaster's close involvement in virtually all of Mr. Bush's war decisions. Mr. Tenet was President Clinton's CIA director, and won reappointment from Mr. Bush.

Mr. Tenet formed a close professional relationship with Mr. Bush, including personally delivering the President's Daily Brief, a highly classified presentation on world events. He sat at the war Cabinet table as the president made decisions on invading Afghanistan and Iraq.

It was the Iraq invasion, coupled with the agency's earlier failure to stop the September 11 attacks, that earned the CIA years of criticism on Capitol Hill. The intelligence community's 2002 National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction (WMD) turned out to be largely wrong. Saddam Hussein no longer possessed stockpiles of usable chemical weapons and had not restarted his nuclear weapons program, as the NIE said.

As the invasion neared, Mr. Tenet told Mr. Bush it was a "slam dunk" that Saddam still possessed WMD, as reported by author Bob Woodward.

New York publishers have enjoyed brisk sales of books that bash Mr. Bush's handling of Iraq and the broader war on terrorism.

Amazon.com has packaged "At the Center of the Storm" with books highly critical of Mr. Bush, such as "Hubris: The Inside Story of Spin, Scandal, and the Selling of the Iraq War" by Michael Isikoff and David Corn.

Amazon.com markets books together that have similar subject matter, tone and perspective. It lists a publication date of Feb. 6, a date that cannot be met because the administration is still reviewing the book.

Mr. Mansfield said other former CIA directors have seen their books submitted to the White House to review subjects with which it is more familiar. The standard is always to check for classified information, he said.

He said Mr. Tenet, who resigned in 2004, first submitted a portion of his book in October and then more pages in November and December. He said Mr. Tenet "hasn't completely finished the book yet."

"Written submissions by former CIA employees are also referred to classification review specialists at other government agencies that may have equities with regard to classification issues," Mr. Mansfield said. "For example, that agency may be in a better position to know if a certain factor or piece of information is classified. Portions of Mr. Tenet's manuscript were referred to the classified review specialists at the NSC and that's in line with what we would do with other CIA employees."

DOJ_NMG_0114417

Mr. Bush bestowed the Presidential Medal of Freedom on Mr. Tenet at a December 2004 White House ceremony. The president also honored two other key players in the Iraq war retired Gen. Tommy Franks and former Iraq administrator L. Paul Bremer. Mr. Bush hailed Mr. Tenet as "one of the first to recognize and address the threat to America from radical networks."

An Instant Raise For Federal Judges (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

The Senate passed legislation awarding federal judges their annual cost-of-living pay raise immediately rather than keeping their pay frozen along with that of lawmakers. Members of Congress voted last month to deny themselves their annual cost-of-living raise, though only through Feb. 15; Democrats had pledged during the midterm election campaign to freeze Congress's pay until the minimum wage is raised from $5.15 per hour. That move also had the effect of freezing the pay of federal judges, who had been scheduled to receive a 1.7 percent raise on Jan. 1.

Senate Restores Pay Raise For Judges (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, January 9, 2007

The Senate passed legislation awarding federal judges their annual cost-of-living pay raise immediately rather than keeping their pay frozen along with that of lawmakers.

U.S. lawmakers last month voted to deny themselves their annual cost-of-living pay raise — though only through Feb. 15 — keeping a promise made by Democrats in the campaign to freeze Congress' pay until raising the $5.15 per hour minimum wage.

That move also had the effect of freezing the pay of federal judges, slated to receive a 1.7 percent hike on Jan. 1. The Senate bill, which passed Monday by unanimous voice vote, lifts the COLA freeze for judges.

For Chief Justice John Roberts, who currently makes $212,100 per year, the bill would make up for about $400 in lost pay — the total of his scheduled raise between Jan. 1 and Feb. 15. He's slated to start receiving the rest of his approximately $3,600 pay hike on Feb. 16. The associate justices currently make $203,000 per year, while district judges make $165,200, the same amount as members of Congress.

The controversy is separate from Roberts' crusade for higher pay for federal judges, who are rapidly falling behind contemporaries such as law school deans and senior professors.

A spokeswoman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said that chamber would act on the measure shortly.

Poll: Americans Want Democrats, Not Bush, At Helm (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — Democrats have taken control of Congress this month amid a wave of good feeling from the public.

A USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Friday-Sunday shows that Americans by nearly 2-to-1 want congressional Democrats, not President Bush, to have more influence over the direction the nation takes during the next year.

POLL RESULTS: Opinions on new Congress

Democratic congressional leaders get their highest rating since Bush took office in 2001; 59% of those surveyed say their policies would move the country in the right direction. Republican congressional leaders get their lowest rating: 35% endorse their approach.

"Looks like a honeymoon," says Gary Jacobson, a political scientist at the University of California at San Diego. "People can project all their hopes on to this new majority … but I wouldn't expect that kind of favorable image to keep up forever."

When Republicans took over Congress in January 1995, he notes, the early glow had faded by fall, when congressional Republicans had a budget showdown with then-President Clinton.

Half or more of those polled identify four issues as "extremely important" for the White House and Congress to deal with in 2007: Iraq, terrorism, government corruption and health care.

That's a shift from recent years. At the beginning of 2005 and 2006, terrorism and Iraq essentially were tied as the issues of highest importance to the most Americans. The war in Iraq has grown in importance each year and now has clearly moved into the top spot.

DOJ_NMG_0114418

The focus on problems caused by Hurricane Katrina has ebbed. Last year 35% said Katrina issues were "extremely important;" now 28% feel that way.

And concern about corruption — not even on most lists two years ago — has risen to 52%.

The telephone survey of 1,004 adults nationwide has a margin of error of +/-3 percentage points.

At least for the moment, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California can bask in a 2-to-1 favorable rating: 44% say they have a favorable impression of her, 22% an unfavorable one. When the GOP took over 12 years ago, incoming speaker Newt Gingrich was considerably more controversial. His favorable rating in December 1994 was 27%, his unfavorable 35%.

Americans express confidence that Congress will raise the minimum wage and that the economy will improve this year. They're pessimistic that political stability around the world will improve or violence in Iraq ease.

And will Bush and congressional Democrats be able to work more closely together? On that, Americans are split down the middle: 50%-50%.

Donnelly, Freshman Democrats Tell Pelosi To Stick To The Center (BLOOM)

By William Roberts

Bloomberg, January 9, 2007

Jan. 9 (Bloomberg) -- Representative Joe Donnelly, a freshman Democrat from Indiana, has a blunt message for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi: Stick to a ``middle-of-the-road agenda'' or their party's control of Congress may last just two years.

If Pelosi ``goes too far one way or another, we're not coming back,'' Donnelly says. He sees his party's victory in the November elections as less an endorsement of its agenda than a rejection of Republican rule: ``People just got real tired of this bunch, and they fired them.''

Donnelly's view reflects those of many of the 30 House Democrats elected in districts previously held by Republicans. Their fragile hold on their seats means they'll be pushing their new speaker, who represents heavily Democratic San Francisco, to limit confrontations with President George W. Bush and the Republicans over taxes, the war in Iraq, stem-cell research and abortion.

``Pelosi needs to show she can govern,'' says James Thurber, a professor at American University in Washington who specializes on Congress and the presidency. To pass her agenda, Pelosi must build coalitions with lawmakers, ``especially those from moderate districts'' such as Donnelly's, he says.

Democrats hold 233 seats in the House, while Republicans have 202. In the Senate, Democrats hold only 51 of the 100 seats -- and one Democrat, Tim Johnson of South Dakota, remains hospitalized after brain surgery.

Medicare and Minimum Wage

Donnelly, 51, says he likes most of the legislation Pelosi is trying to push through in the first 100 hours of Democratic control of the House, including an increase in the minimum wage and a plan to allow Medicare to negotiate the cost of drugs with pharmaceutical companies, both scheduled for votes this week.

It may be more difficult for him to support other parts of the party's agenda. Donnelly, a practicing Catholic, opposes abortion and is also against federal funding stem-cell research that uses human embryos, which most Democrats back.

He also may clash with the Democratic leadership over how to handle the war in Iraq. While he describes the war as a ``disaster,'' he says he doesn't support the fixed timetable for withdrawal proposed by Pennsylvania Democrat John Murtha that Pelosi, 66, has endorsed. Instead, like Bush, he opposes any withdrawal until Iraq is ``stabilized.''

``My goal is to help the president,'' he said in an interview. ``I am not going to rip him to shreds. If he does a better job, then our soldiers can be more successful, Iraq can be stabilized and our troops can come home.''

First Test

A first test may come this week when Bush announces a change in strategy in Iraq, which may include a plan to send more troops. Last week, Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada said in a letter to Bush that they oppose a troop increase.

Donnelly, a lawyer, represents an industrial district that backed Bush in the 2000 and 2004 presidential elections. He lost his first bid for Congress in 2004; in November, he defeated his opponent, two-term incumbent Chris Chocola, with 54 percent of the vote -- an upset Donnelly says was largely due to the national wave of voter dissatisfaction with Republican mismanagement of Congress and Bush's policies.

Next year's elections may be more difficult for Donnelly and other Democrats who won in Republican-leaning districts, says Michael Genovese, chairman of the Institute for Leadership Studies at Loyola Marymount University in Los Angeles. An attractive Republican presidential candidate in 2008 might draw back some of the Republican voters who switched in 2006, he says: ``That's what the Democrats fear and the Republicans hope.''

Preparing for 2008

DOJ_NMG_0114419

Democratic leaders have already taken steps to help lawmakers from these districts prepare for 2008. Almost immediately after the Nov. 7 elections -- and before the freshmen lawmakers had even arrived in Washington -- the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee established a re- election program for new members. The program includes coaching on fund-raising and constituent outreach, says the DCCC's chairman, Representative Chris Van Hollen of Maryland.

``We fully recognize that in districts where Republican presidential candidates have won majorities in the past, the Republicans will try to target our members," Van Hollen says.

Tom Gallagher, a senior managing director at the International Strategy & Investment Group Inc. in Washington, says 60 House Democrats represent districts carried by Bush in 2004, while only eight Republicans represent districts carried by Massachusetts Senator John Kerry, the Democratic presidential nominee.

High-Profile Committees

To increase their re-election chances, some freshmen have been given seats on high-profile committees, positions that increase a lawmaker's appeal to donors.

Donnelly, for example, will serve on the Financial Services Committee, which regulates commercial banks, insurance companies and securities and investment firms. In the 2006 election cycle, committee members received an average of about $180,000 in campaign contributions from the financial-services industry, according to the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics, a Washington-based group that tracks campaign giving.

Watching Pelosi take the Speaker's gavel on Thursday was a jubilant moment for Donnelly. Sitting with his fellow freshmen congressmen in the chamber, Donnelly noticed actor Richard Gere and singer Carole King sitting together in the gallery and waved to his son Joe Jr., also in the gallery, to point them out.

Donnelly cast his first vote on Jan. 4 to elect Pelosi as House speaker. He then supported rules changes to ban gifts from lobbyists and identify lawmakers who originate requests for pet spending projects, known as ``earmarks."

With the House in session only two days, Donnelly has a 100 percent record of voting with his party. Still, the lawmaker says, he is determined to try to find common ground with Republicans.

Last week, he signed up with the ``Blue Dog" Democrats, a group of 44 self-described conservative lawmakers who support balanced budgets and less business regulation and are open to accommodation with moderate Republicans.

``I want to represent Democrats and Republicans," he says. ``I am going to hit the ball down the middle."

Industry Measures Up Dems, Picks Its Battles (HILL)

By Jessica Holzer

The Hill, January 9, 2007

Major business groups have revamped their legislative wish lists, resurrecting some longstanding but moribund items and backing off of others, in the hopes of scoring some victories in a Democratic-controlled Congress.

At this time last year, boosting domestic energy supply was a top priority for both the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers (NAM). Though they haven't abandoned that goal, the industry groups are now trumpeting their support for expanded research into alternative fuels and clean-energy technologies, a popular cause among Democrats.

Meanwhile, they've shifted the modernization of the transportation system, long a concern of the business community, to center stage. Last week, the Chamber announced the launch of a new initiative to promote investment in the nation's highways, rail network, ports and waterways.

It is characterizing that initiative, as well as a plan to pour money into energy infrastructure, as government-backed jobs programs in a clear effort to appeal to Democrats.

"With the right kind of rebuilding program, not just in transportation but in energy and power as well, we could employ a massive number of Americans for a long, long time," said Thomas J. Donohue, the president of the Chamber, at a press briefing on Thursday.

A deal on immigration that includes a guest worker program and a path to citizenship for law-abiding aliens is perhaps the most feasible business goal, thanks to the informal agreement of Democrats, several labor unions and the White House on the issue.

On the defensive side, the business lobby seems intent on picking its battles, to judge by its capitulation on minimum-wage legislation, which is expected to pass the House this week.

Meanwhile, Donohue vowed to fend off any attempt by Congress to change the law to make it easier for workers to form unions. Most Democrats and some labor-friendly Republicans back the legislation, but industry groups are vowing to defeat it.

"They're going to have a major fight on their hands," Donohue said.

DOJ_NMG_0114420

A week after the election, America's Health Insurance Plans (AHIP) announced a proposal to expand access to health insurance coverage to every American — an idea that is touted by most Democrats. For years, AHIP has engaged in many policy battles with Rep. Pete Stark (D-Calif.), the new Ways and Means health subcommittee chairman.

AHIP, whose PAC has significantly favored Republicans in recent elections, says it is planning to work with all members of Congress on its new proposal.

Where they are stymied in Congress, business interests are likely to turn to the executive branch to accomplish their goals. While hopes still run high among corporate lobbyists for legislation that follows on the heels of last year's bill that opened up acreage in the Gulf of Mexico for oil and gas drilling, they see the Minerals Management Service (MMS) as another route to achieve that goal.

"They could as well begin to open up other portions of the Gulf and follow up what Congress enacted last year," said Bruce Josten, the executive vice president of the Chamber, which has filed a comment to the MMS on its plans to expand oil and gas exploration on federal lands.

The Chamber already spends 60 percent of its efforts on the regulatory agencies, estimates William Kovacs, who heads up lobbying on environmental, energy and other issues at the association. "The real work is done by the regulatory agencies," he says, noting that some 192,000 regulations are overseen by the executive branch.

Several business lobbyists denied they would change tack to navigate a more hostile environment in Washington, insisting their agenda does not shift with the political winds.

"The good news for us is that we don't have to change the game plan. We don't lick our finger and stick it up in the air and see what our policy will be," said Charles Drevna, a lobbyist at the National Petrochemical & Refiners Association.

Many are pinning their hopes on the Democratic leadership working across the aisle to achieve legislative accomplishments.

"Those that govern most successfully govern from the center," said Jay Timmons, NAM's senior vice president for government relations.

"Of course, we would have the backstop of the legislative branch," he added.

Military Seeks Oil Savings (WSJ)

By Masood Farivar

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

Rising Demand, Supply Risks Spur Conservation Move

Recent energy-market disruptions have added urgency to the U.S. military's efforts to curb its use of oil and other fuels. But the effort faces considerable obstacles, including the difficulty in figuring out how much it spends on energy to begin with.

In the year ended Sept. 30, the Defense Department spent, by its estimate, $13 billion on fuel amounting to 134 million barrels of oil for the year, up from 107 million barrels of oil in 2000. The wars in Afghanistan and Iraq led to a surge in fuel use in that period, according to the Defense Energy Support Center, a government agency that buys fuel from private-sector companies and supplies it to the armed forces.

The most recent figure is more than the entire nation of Sweden consumed in 2005. (Still, it adds up to less than 2% of daily U.S. consumption.)

As energy prices have surged and volatility has increased in important oil-producing regions, the military is redoubling efforts to rein in consumption through conservation, increased fuel-efficiency measures and greater use of alternative energy. The effort picked up in earnest following the 2005 Atlantic Ocean hurricanes, which devastated the Gulf Coast, lifted prices to records and highlighted the vulnerability of supplies.

"Katrina was a wake-up call," says Michael Aimone, assistant deputy chief of staff of the Air Force who oversees the force's energy-conservation efforts.

The Pentagon is planning to spend more than $2 billion in the next five years on energy initiatives, which could help spur development of energy sources for use in other sectors. "The contribution [the military's efforts] will make will be in leadership rather than actual conservation," said Rep. Roscoe Bartlett, a Maryland Republican, who last year formed a bipartisan panel called the Defense Energy Working Group to study the issue.

James Woolsey, a former Central Intelligence Agency director who heads the policy panel of one of two Pentagon energy task forces, said the drive to curb energy use is being fueled less by high prices than an increasing awareness about the "vulnerability and insecurity of supplies" world-wide.

The effect of the Pentagon's interest in conservation and alternative energy can be seen from military bases and hangers to the battlefields of Iraq and Afghanistan. In late July, Marine Corps Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer, commander of U.S. forces in

DOJ_NMG_0114421

Iraq's insurgent al-Anbar province, asked for a shipment of mobile solar panels and wind turbines to supplement gas-guzzling generators at bases under his command.

Cutting "the military's dependence on fuel for power generation could reduce the number of road-bound convoys" and U.S. casualties resulting from insurgent attacks on U.S. supply convoys, Gen. Zilmer wrote in a memo. The Army's Rapid Equipping Force, the unit responsible for processing such requests, has contracted SkyBuilt Power of Arlington, Va., to build four hybrid power stations for delivery this spring.

So far, the impact of the military's efforts has been modest. In the past 20 years, it has cut energy use at facilities 28%. Still, oil accounts for roughly 75% of total energy use. The military's focus has been on saving power -- also a laudable goal, critics say, but not an answer to dependence on oil.

Also, it isn't clear how much energy the military consumes and how much it pays. The 134 million-barrel figure for fuel use is the government's official estimate, as is the dollar amount. Some inside and outside the military think actual consumption is higher partly because the figure doesn't include a lot of unpaid oil and oil contracted to U.S. bases.

"I've looked at all the information that is publicly available and I haven't seen any single number," said Sohbet Karbuz, a former official at the International Energy Agency, the industrialized world's energy watchdog, and an expert on military energy use. "We don't know where much of the oil comes from and how much it exactly costs. If you don't know the number how do you calculate fuel efficiency?"

According to Mr. Karbuz, the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq have increased military fuel use by as much as 56,000 barrels a day. In addition, the military's improved ability to deploy troops to battlefields comes at the cost of increased fuel use: today, more than half of the fuel consumed in combat theaters is used not by front-line soldiers but by supply convoys of the type that worried Gen. Zilmer. Mr. Karbuz estimates the military uses fuel at twice the rate it did in the first Persian Gulf War and four times the rate it did in the Second World War.

The Air Force, which accounts for 53% of military fuel use, has stepped up use of biodiesel fuel -- where vegetable oils are substituted for petroleum -- at bases in the U.S. In December it conducted a test flight of its B-52 strategic bomber using a blend of synthetic fuel and jet fuel on all eight engines and is planning further test flights this year. At a cost of $23 per gallon compared with $2 to $3 per gallon for jet fuel, however, that option isn't considered viable. The B-52 uses 48,000 gallons of fuel in a single mission.

The Air Force also has adopted measures from commercial airliners to save fuel on its three most fuel-guzzling aircraft. It better plans the amount of fuel onboard to reduce weight, gets overflight clearance from foreign governments to avoid circuitous routes, and more efficiently schedules midair refueling missions.

Mr. Aimone of the Air Force says that the service wants to promote a "culture of conservation" and hopes to build on its success on the facilities side to improve fuel efficiency in operations. He says the Air Force's goal is to reduce fuel use by 10% over the next five years, though "it is too soon to tell" the impact of current efforts.

Other services are exploring similar long-term projects designed to reduce the military's dependence on oil. The Army is studying designs to replace the Humvee with 30% to 40% lighter, more fuel-efficient models. The Navy is studying alternate propulsion systems as well as proposals for an all-nuclear Navy.

Today, almost 9% of the electricity used by military facilities comes from renewable energy sources, and the Pentagon plans to raise that to 25% by 2025. The Air Force has installed modern lighting and replaced Second World War-era buildings with better-insulated structures. Four Air Force bases rely entirely on renewable energy for power, while several others use a combination of solar, wind and land gas production for power.

Similar efforts have been under way at other services, with the Navy installing wind turbines at several overseas bases, including four at Guantanamo Bay in 2005 to supply as much as 25% of the base's electricity needs and cut diesel use by more than 600,000 gallons a year. The Army is developing similar systems for bases in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Critics say these efforts aren't enough. The military has long taken access to fuel for granted, but in a world of dwindling and endangered supplies, "I don't think politically it is possible for the military to stay ahead of the line," said Byron King, a former Navy pilot and geologist who writes frequently on the subject.

Write to Masood Farivar at masood.farivar@dowjones.com1

White House Honors Cultural Institutions (AP)

By Natasha T. Metzler

AP, January 9, 2007

The White House honored six cultural institutions Monday for their creativity and public service in what first lady Laura Bush described as one of her favorite events.

DOJ_NMG_0114422

Mrs. Bush and Anne-Imelda Radice, director of the federal Institute of Museum and Library Services, recognized innovative outreach programs at three public libraries, a museum, a zoo and an aquarium.

"At every library and museum across our country we feel at home, thanks to the librarians and the curators who are eager to serve their communities," Mrs. Bush said, later adding "your reach is so much farther than you'll ever, ever know."

Radice thanked the first lady for her commitment to libraries and museums and said her work is "more than symbolic, or merely ceremonial."

"Whether it's a train conductor hauling art masterpieces across the United States, the zookeeper introducing children to a red-foot tortoise, or that friendly librarian asking, 'may I help you?' the people behind each of today's winning institutions have made their organizations indispensable to the communities they serve," the first lady said.

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

Ford postmark

Hats off to Rep. Mark Udall, Colorado Democrat, for beating to the punch congressmen from Michigan, Virginiaand California -- all states where Gerald R. Ford lived during his illustrious career -- by introducing legislation to name the post office in Vail after the 38th president.

"I believe this legislation is appropriate as another means of honoring the legacy of President Ford, in large part because of his special connection to Colorado and the Vail Valley," Mr. Udall says.

Mr. Ford and his family first visited Vail in 1968 to ski and celebrate Christmas. They later bought a home there, dubbed the "Western White House" after he became president.

Utmost sacrifice

We'd written recently about the confusion surrounding two congressmen now serving on Capitol Hill named "Mike Rogers." Both are Republicans to boot.

Rep. Mike D. Rogers represents Alabama, whereas Rep. Mike Rogers hails from Michigan.

Now we learn that the latter Mr. Rogers was absent from the formal swearing-in ceremony in the House last week. What could have been more important?

"I was unavoidably detained," he later explained to the speaker, "while paying my respects to a fallen soldier from my district at his funeral in Arlington National Cemetery."

Mr. Rogers took his oath upon his return to the U.S. Capitol.

Safe 'bunt'

They own the majority in the 110th Congress, but already Democrats and their leader, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, have gone on the defensive with an unprecedented threat to block any proposal by President Bush to send additional U.S. troops to Iraq.

Not that Republican Rep. Jack Kingston of Georgia was impressed with their agenda.

"The Democrats were getting a lot of good credit for what I would say is kind of a 'golden oldies' agenda, bringing out no original ideas: minimum wage, stem cells and student loans," he opined during recent floor debate.

"And I understand those are safe things. But it is kind of like starting out the World Series by bunting instead of trying to get on base with real serious hits. The reason why I submit that criticism is there is nothing in your agenda about immigration reform, Social Security reform, Medicare reform, the heavy-lifting ideas of entitlement."

... Quidditch, by golly

For several years, Inside the Beltway has observed the mysterious bike-riding habits of President Bush.

Members of the White House press corps, who regularly accompany the president deep into the woods of suburban Maryland or else onto the dusty terrain of his Texas ranch, seldom if ever actually see Mr. Bush atop a bicycle.

The big question is why? Could something secretive or covert be taking place that doesn't involve two wheels?

For instance, did Mr. Bush in 2004 really fall off of a bicycle and cut his chin, upper lip, nose, both knees and right hand (when his Democratic opponent, Sen. John Kerry, inquired: "Did the training wheels fall off?"), or did something more unusual cause his injuries?

Was the president actually "enjoying" a bike ride so much during a major terrorist scare in Washington that the Secret Service, or so we were told, didn't bother to tell him that his own wife, Laura, and Vice President Dick Cheney had been rushed into a secure bunker?

DOJ_NMG_0114423

And how about the Sunday morning not long ago when Mr. Bush's church attire was unusually "bulky"? Immediately after the sermon, the president in the space of seconds had shed his suit of clothes and appeared in a brightly colored outfit that the White House insisted was "bike-riding gear."

'I've never seen a man who hasn't been drinking get out of a suit faster," noted Julie Mason of the Houston Chronicle.

Now, we learn of yet another bizarre twist involving a presidential biking trek this past weekend. Mr. Bush had been participating in an "extended" intelligence briefing in the Oval Office with his national security team, when suddenly a half-dozen young men and women showed up dressed in the same colorful gear worn by Mr. Bush.

The entire group, including the president, immediately climbed into several heavily protected vehicles and sped off. But wait, there's more, discovered in the official White House pool report:

"Four of them carried rakes and brooms along with their riding gear; why they had the rakes and brooms with them was unclear."

The Reliable Source (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

Your Questions Answered About Gilbert Arenas's 25th Birthday Party

So Gilbert Arenas celebrated his 25th birthday with approximately 7,500 of his closest friends at Love nightclub. Why?

Good question. The offbeat Wizards star has never been a big partyer. Yet in this season of his breakout success on the court, Arenas has expressed some hunger to emerge as a crossover superstar whose name extends beyond D.C. and the NBA. On his blog he describes his plan for "The Takeover": "This is the time where, you know, me as a person is gonna get bigger."

How did Gil make his entrance?

Around 12:30 a.m., he drove his Lamborghini convertible into the concert tent and right up to the stage.

Who was there?

In addition to host Diddy and performers Busta Rhymes, Lil Wayne, The Game and T.I. (who tried his hand at bartending in the VIP lounge), guests included rappers Doug E. Fresh and Fabolous (who Saturday dropped by Legal Seafoods with a bodyguard and six pals), Redskins Jason Campbell and Clinton Portis, the Eagles' Donovan McNabb, the Caps' Alexander Ovechkin, starlet Megan Good, go-go star/actor Big G, and scads of Wizards (Etan Thomas, Antawn Jamison, Jarvis Hayes and Caron Butler sporting a black beanie).

We saw the pics of the Arenas Express card in Jamie Foxx's name. Was he there?

No.

Who most rocked the house?

Experts agree that T.I. tore the place up. Though the crowd also went nuts for Lil Wayne's "The Block Is Hot."

How much did the reserved tables cost?

Most were about $4,000, though tables near T.I. fetched as much as $16K.

OMG!!! Were those painted naked ladies really naked? We're told they may have been wearing some kind of body stocking. But they sure looked naked.

How late did Gilbert stay?

Until the end, which was sometime after 4 a.m. If you didn't get much face time with the birthday boy, it's probably because he was hanging out in the fourth-floor VIP lounge.A Chance to Be in Good Standing With the Mayor

Okay, maybe new D.C. Mayor Adrian Fenty deserved a standing ovation -- but not for four hours!

Inaugural balls are notoriously bad parties, and Saturday's bash for Fenty was plagued by rookie mistakes that took the fest out of the festivities. The line snaked around the block as party guests (more than 15,000 tickets were distributed for the free celebration) spent an hour or more waiting to get through the security checkpoints. Once inside the Washington Convention Center, they discovered that all the tables and chairs had been snapped up five minutes after the party started at 7 p.m. "Black tie optional" meant that all those strappy high heels had no place to rest, leaving plenty of folks plenty sore. (And let's not even talk about the cash bar.)

"We had approximately 1,500 chairs," said Fenty spokeswoman Mafara Hobson. "The thought process behind that was more chairs would mean less room for people. The whole point is that this was an event for the whole city." The ballroom, she said, was designed with exhibits and cocktail tables to "encourage mingling."

But the largest mayoral ball in D.C. history ended up being another crowded, not-that-much-fun, over-hyped letdown. If we've told you once, we've told you a thousand times: If you insist on going to an inaugural ball, wear sneakers.

HEY, ISN'T THAT . . . ?

DOJ_NMG_0114424

? Jenna and Barbara Bush on the town! After months on the road, the first daughters made a rare joint appearance in D.C. this weekend: Barbara at Smith Point Friday night with several pals from New York, and both twins at Town Hall on Saturday night with a well-heeled entourage -- crushed-velvet sport coats for the men, trendy leggings, silk dresses and platform heels for the women. Both daughters spent the Christmas holidays with the first family; alas, Barbara is headed back to New York and her job at the Cooper-Hewitt museum; Jenna is returning to her UNICEF gig in Central America.

? Michael Hayden at the International Spy Museum Saturday afternoon. The CIA director, dressed in navy corduroy pants and a light blue long-sleeved polo shirt, toured the museum with a dozen family members and friends.

? Cedric the Entertainer at the Chi Cha Lounge Friday night. The comedian and three friends arrived in a white stretch, and he turned over both his ID and hat (club policy) to the doorman who didn't recognize him. Trust us -- he's over 21!LOVE, ETC.

? Dating: Jason Campbell and Mercedes Lindsay. The Redskins quarterback and the newly crowned Miss District of Columbia USA 2007 were one of the cutest couples at the mayor's inaugural bash. That's one completed pass in the off-season.

* * *

"Shiloh seemed so privileged from the moment she was born. I have less inclination to feel for her. . . . I have to make sure I don't ignore her needs, just because I think the others are more vulnerable."

PIN Money (WSJ)

By Robert C. Pozen

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

Democrats have consistently refused to discuss any Social Security reform requiring a carve-out account: where workers can invest a portion of the 12.4% of their payroll taxes. Recently, Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson has shown a readiness to explore bipartisan approaches to Social Security reform without any prerequisites. A bipartisan plan for reform can be built on a modified version of progressive indexing, without carve-out accounts in Social Security but with enhancements of existing retirement accounts.

Progressive indexing (PIN) preserves the current schedule of Social Security benefits for the lowest 30% of wage earners, as well as for already retired-workers and those who will retire before 2012. By contrast, PIN slows the growth of initial Social Security benefits for the top wage earners to the annual increase in consumer prices (price indexing), as opposed to the annual increase in wages (wage indexing). For all those workers in between, PIN provides for lower benefits than the current schedule, but benefits that grow faster than increases in consumer prices through a blend of price and wage indexing. In total, PIN reduces the present value of the 75-year deficit of Social Security by 70%, close to $4 trillion to approximately $1.2 trillion.

A progressive approach to Social Security is justified because federal taxes forgone from 401(k)s and IRAs exceed $50 billion per year -- which primarily benefit high and middle earners. Yet PIN should be modified to deal with four major criticisms. First, because Social Security benefits are growing faster for lower-wage workers than middle- and higher-wage workers, the benefits for all workers would become roughly the same at some date in the next century. This criticism can easily be rebutted by stopping PIN after 75 years, when there will still be substantial benefit differences between wage groups.

Second, while wages have historically grown over 1% faster per year than prices, critics have pointed out this relationship could possibly reverse at some point over the next 75 years. In this unlikely event, the initial Social Security benefits for high earners would grow faster than those of low earners under PIN as originally designed. To avoid this anomaly, initial Social Security benefits should be indexed to wage growth for all workers if, during the 30 years prior to their retirement, prices rose faster than wages.

Third, the original form of PIN did not address the complex issues involved with Social Security benefits for the disabled. Additional savings to hold harmless the disabled could be generated by combining PIN with longevity indexing after 2027. Under longevity indexing, the benefit schedule at normal retirement age (NRA) would be adjusted to keep constant (relative to the average wage level) the estimated lifetime benefits from Social Security in response to increasing life expectancy -- without changing the NRA itself. For example, if life expectancy rises to 88 from 87 between 2027 and 2039, the benefit schedule for Social Security under longevity indexing would be the same (in wage-indexed dollars) for a worker retiring at age 68 in 2039, as for someone retiring at age 67 in 2027 (with the same average career earning). This combination would generate enough savings not only to preserve current Social Security benefits for the disabled, but also to improve the benefit schedule for median wage workers under PIN -- thus, dealing with the fourth major criticism of PIN.

Since a combination of PIN and longevity indexing would not include a carve-out account, this would present a political challenge to Republicans. One response could be an expansion of other types of private accounts for retirement. Most workers earning more than $120,000 per year do not meet the eligibility requirements for the Roth Individual Retirement Account (IRA) -- which allows investment earnings from after-tax contributions to be excluded permanently from federal income taxes. If all income limits were taken off the Roth IRA, higher wage workers would be eligible for its tax advantages. This would promote retirement savings by these higher earners, whose Social Security benefits would be growing at the slowest rate under PIN.

DOJ_NMG_0114425

Congress could also expand the existing savers credit for retirement plan contributions by low-income households. That nonrefundable credit is limited to joint filers with adjusted gross annual income of $50,000 or less. However, the credit is poorly designed because most families below that income level do not pay income taxes. Congress could make the credit partially refundable to help those low-wage workers whose Social Security benefits will grow a little slower under PIN -- between $35,000 and $50,000 in annual earnings.

Some Democrats would support the combination of PIN and longevity indexing because it substantially improves the solvency and fairness of Social Security without raising taxes. Nevertheless, other Democrats may object to this combination because it relies too heavily on benefit changes rather than revenue increases. Although President Bush has rejected any increase in the 12.4% rate for the Social Security tax, he has reserved judgment on increasing the maximum wages (not income) subject to Social Security taxes. In 2012, when most Social Security reforms start to be implemented, this maximum would be approximately $113,000 per year. For these reasons, some commentators have proposed raising the maximum wage base subject to the Social Security tax to $150,000 or $170,000 per year. However, this would be an unfair and huge tax increase for those with annual earnings in the $170,000 range. They would be subject to an additional 12.4% tax on all or almost all of the earnings; by contrast, those earning $2 million or more annually would be subject to the 12.4% tax on a tenth or less of their earnings.

A better approach would be a 2% surcharge, 1% from the employee and 1% from the employer, on all earnings above the maximum wage base (like the Medicare tax). In 2012, for example, that would mean 12.4% on the first $113,000 in earnings and 2% on all earnings above that amount. Such a 2% surcharge would close approximately 18% of the current long-term deficit of Social Security if no incremental benefits were associated with the surtax. The revenues from the surcharge could be applied to improve the benefit schedule for median-wage workers under PIN. However, a 2% surcharge on high-wage workers without any incremental benefits would violate the fundamental principle of Social Security as a social insurance program. In the long run, this could undermine political support among high earners for the program -- a major concern among Democrats. One alternative would be to provide a modest stream of benefits for every $1,000 in surcharge paid by the employee. But even a modest stream will result in a very large and unseemly annual benefit from Social Security for multimillionaires.

A better alternative would be to devote the 1% from the employer to restore the solvency of Social Security and to allow all of the 1% from the employee to be contributed to a Roth IRA (or half of the 1% over $1 million per year). This alternative would link the surcharge to additional retirement benefits and permit a further improvement in PIN's benefit schedule for median workers. It would also make the surcharge more palatable to Republicans.

In short, there are a number of workable plans to reform Social Security with enhanced retirement accounts if both political parties are willing to compromise.

Common Sense On The Census (NYT)

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

Last November, the director of the Census Bureau, C. Louis Kincannon, and the deputy director, Hermann Habermann, abruptly decided to quit, acknowledging tensions with their bosses in the Bush administration but giving no other details. Both men are statisticians who had served in their positions since 2002 and, before that, had decades of experience as civil servants.

The leadership problems — on top of severe budget cuts — threaten to throw the preparations for the 2010 census into disarray. At stake is the accuracy of the next count and, with it, the legitimacy of important decisions that are rooted in the census, including the drawing of electoral districts and the allocation of government resources.

Various steps must be taken now to ensure an accurate count, starting with an investigation by the committees that oversee the bureau — Oversight and Government Reform in the House, and Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs in the Senate — into why the men quit. This will clear up a distracting mystery and is necessary to ensure that the new directors do not confront the same obstacles.

Equally important, the appropriations committees in the House and Senate must quickly act to restore the roughly $50 million cut by the previous Congress from President Bush's 2007 budget request for the bureau. Otherwise, the agency may have to forgo using hand-held computers for the next census, relying instead on paper and pencil, which is less accurate and would probably be more expensive in the long run because of its inefficiency.

An alternative and equally unacceptable way to cut costs would be to delay the economic census, which is currently conducted every five years and which serves as the benchmark for dozens of other government surveys, including reports on inflation, construction activity and retail sales.

DOJ_NMG_0114426

Carlos Gutierrez, the secretary of commerce, should be pounding the tables in Congress to get this money; failure to do so would suggest that the administration is trying to undermine the census. For his part, Mr. Bush must swiftly nominate a new director — a nonpartisan, professional statistician with solid management experience.

Mr. Kincannon has graciously agreed to remain until his replacement is confirmed, but moving forward requires a new director. For the deputy director position, administration officials must resist any temptation to make a political appointment and should choose instead a top-notch statistician from the bureau's career ranks.

OTHER NEWS:

Health-care Spending Rose At Twice The Rate Of Inflation In '05 (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, January 9, 2007

Spending on health care rose at twice the rate of general inflation in 2005, with consumers facing increased deductibles and co-pays finding themselves spending more of their own money, government researchers said in a report out Tuesday.

Spending went up 6.9%, with the total amount spent by individuals, insurers and the government on health care hitting almost $2 trillion, or $6,697 per person. That's the slowest rate since 1999, when spending rose 6.2%.

Hospital spending continued to be a main factor in spending growth, growing at nearly 8%, with increases in both in-hospital care and out-patient services.

A slower rate of growth in spending was attributed to a drop in spending on prescription drugs, mainly from a growing use of lower-cost generics and the safety-related withdrawal from the market of some expensive pain relievers such as Vioxx, government economists say in their annual report, published Tuesday in the journal Health Affairs.

"This might be an encouraging sign for the individuals, businesses and governments that finance health care; however, it is unclear whether this … is temporary or indicative of a long-term trend," says the report by the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, Office of the Actuary.

Economist Paul Ginsburg of the Center for Studying Health System Change, who did not work on the report, says the growing economy could lead to higher spending in the coming years.

"We have a strong growth in jobs and sharp pay increases," says Ginsburg. "These are the conditions that will lead to a cyclically higher rate of spending, say in '08 or '09."

Health insurance premium rates went up by 6.6% in 2005, continuing a moderating trend seen in the past couple of years and well below the double-digit increases seen in the late 1990s and early 2000s.

Employers continued to shift some of those costs to workers by adding deductibles, co-payments or eliminating coverage for specific treatments or certain drugs.

Those moves helped push so-called out of pocket spending up, by 5.8%, an increase over the 5% reported in 2004. At the same time, increases in overall premiums outpaced that growth, the report says, meaning out of pocket costs for workers as a share of total spending fell.

The report also found:

· Spending on prescription drugs increased 5.8%, to $200.7 billion, well down from the peak increase of 18.2% noted in 1999. Reasons included slower growth in spending by state Medicaid programs, which had instituted cost-control programs, and increased use of generic drugs and the withdrawal of Vioxx and Bextra over safety concerns.

· Overall drug prices rose by 3.5%, about the same rate as in 2004, although brand-name drugs prices rose 6%.

·Hospital spending continued as the largest piece of the health spending pie, accounting for 31% of all money spent on medical care. Spending on hospital rose nearly 8%,

Healthcare Spending Eases Off (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — Government figures released today show that Americans may be getting a respite from the torrid pace of increases in healthcare spending, but experts cautioned that it was too soon for a national sigh of relief.

The data show that in 2005, spending on healthcare grew 6.9%. That was the smallest rate of increase since 1999, and marked the third straight year in which the pace had moderated. In 2004, for example, spending grew by 7.2%. Because of the time required to collect and analyze data, the 2005 numbers are the latest to be released.

DOJ_NMG_0114427

Although the rate of increase declined, healthcare spending in 2005 still grew faster than wages, inflation and the economy as a whole. And with employers continuing to shift more of the cost of job-based medical insurance to workers, the pressure on individuals and families remained high.

"It would be a disaster if people thought these [spending] numbers mean the crisis is over," said Henry Simmons, president of the National Coalition on Health Care, which advocates for covering the uninsured. "Even if costs are only going up at 6.9%, that is still two or three times the rate of growth in take-home pay. It is still unsustainable."

Said economist Joseph Minarik, "I suspect that what we're seeing is something like we observed in the early 1990s, that as costs go up some resistance is being thrown in their path. But the resistance is not a fundamental change, and the fundamentals in the system will continue to push costs higher."

Minarik is a senior vice president of the Committee for Economic Development, a group of chief executives that tries to influence public policy on major issues.

Nationwide, health spending reached nearly $2 trillion, accounting for 16% of all economic activity and averaging $6,697 for every man, woman and child, according to the figures released by the Department of Health and Human Services and published in the journal Health Affairs.

A slowdown in spending on prescription drugs was the main reason for the improvement in 2005, the government report found. Analysts credited a continuing shift to generic medications, as well as aggressive cost-control efforts by state Medicaid programs. The report did not factor in the new Medicare prescription benefit, not yet in effect in 2005.

Government experts also found another glimmer of hope in an arcane but important statistic that measures the amount of spending on the sickest people. Traditionally 5% of patients — the most frail — have accounted for more than half of all spending in any given year.

But in 2003, the share of spending on these very ill patients dipped to 49%, suggesting that doctors are reducing costly hospitalizations through better management of chronic diseases such as diabetes.

"It's nice that overall health costs have slowed down a little," said Richard Foster, Medicare's chief number cruncher. "It's nice that the economy is doing well. It's a happy occurrence. [But] it's not something we can expect to happen all the time."

The release of the numbers, an annual snapshot of the healthcare system, coincides with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's call for broad healthcare reforms in California. He is the second GOP governor to engage in a major effort to cover the uninsured and rein in costs. Last year, then-Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney pushed a plan through in his state that requires all residents to get coverage.

Nationally, the number of uninsured stands at about 47 million, as government programs have failed to keep up with the continued erosion of employer-sponsored coverage. The share of employees covered on the job fell from 81% in 2001 to 77% in 2005.

The federal cost report also came on the heels of a study that found the United States spends far more on healthcare than some of its closest economic competitors in the global marketplace. The U.S. spent more than 2 1/2 times as much as Japan per person, and a little less than twice as much as Germany. Both those countries cover all residents. The analysis, for the Kaiser Family Foundation, used data from 2003, but experts said the pattern has not changed.

"The Europeans are worried that with their current rate of growth, they are going to be spending 12% of their gross domestic product on healthcare, but for us 12% would be a miracle," said researcher Gary Claxton, author of the Kaiser study. Higher healthcare costs translate into higher prices for some U.S. goods and services, making them less competitive both at home and abroad.

Health Care Spending Up 6.9 Pct. In '05 (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Health care spending grew in 2005 at the slowest pace in six years thanks in part to a greater reliance on generic drugs.

Health spending went up 6.9 percent in 2005, approaching $2 trillion. That represents about $1 out of every $6 spent in the U.S., compared with about $1 out of every $10 in the early 1980s.

Private and public payers for health care, such as insurers, states and the federal government, have said such a spending pattern cannot be sustained without harming the economy. Some of the tools they've put in place to slow health care spending appear to have had an impact.

The slower growth in 2005 is good news for consumers and taxpayers, but economists aren't confident that the trend will last.

DOJ_NMG_0114428

Richard Foster, the chief actuary for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said there is a growing demand for expensive lifesaving equipment and procedures.

"We don't see much that is going to change that for a long time to come," Foster said.

The data on health care spending was compiled by the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. The complete study was published in the journal Health Affairs.

Officials said prescription drugs played the most important factor in slowing health-care spending in 2005. The growth in spending on medicine was lower than overall spending on health care for the first time since the early '90s.

In the past five years, insurers have sought to slow drug spending by giving customers an incentive to buy generics or low-cost brand name drugs. For example, they require customers to pay only a nominal fee for certain medicines, say $3. However, for medicines they'd rather the customer not take, they'll require the customer to pick up a much larger share of the drug's costs, say 20 percent. The use of such tiering has become standard practice by insurers.

States also took steps to rein in costs. They pooled together to negotiate lower prices for the medicine they provide the poor and elderly in Medicaid. They also encouraged the use of generics. As a result, drug spending by states went from an 11.6 percent increase in 2004 to just 2.8 percent in 2005.

The slower growth in drug spending in 2005 had nothing to do with the new Medicare benefit, which did not go into effect until 2006. However, the slower growth in drug spending should help lower the cost of the program, which was implemented using the higher projections for the coming decade.

Meanwhile, the growth in spending on hospital care was comparable in 2005 to previous years -- about 7.9 percent. The growth rate is greatly influenced by labor costs. During the past five years, the pay and benefits provided hospital workers increased 8.2 percent annually, which is about the same as the increase in overall hospital spending.

"This continued increase in labor costs was driven in part by a sustained shortage of hospital workers," said government economists who wrote about the spending patterns in a health journal article released Tuesday.

Among other health care providers, spending on nursing home care went up 6 percent. Spending on care provided at physician offices and clinics went up 7 percent.

Officials also noted that spending on health care is concentrated. About 2 percent of U.S. consumers account for about a third of expenditures.

The economists said that health-care spending often increases at a much faster rate than the overall economy during recessions and in the years immediately following. The trend in 2005 was consistent with past post-recession periods.

Growth In U.S. Health-Care Spending Slows Again (WSJ)

By Jane Zhang

Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Growth in U.S. health-care spending slowed in 2005 for the third consecutive year, reflecting a sharp slowdown in the rise of prescription-drug spending, the federal government reported.

The study, considered the most comprehensive tally of the nation's annual health spending, found that the U.S. spent $1.988 trillion, or $6,697 per person, on health care in 2005, the latest year for which data are available. That was a rise of 6.9%, down from 7.2% in 2004 and the lowest growth rate since 1999.

It isn't clear whether the deceleration in health-care spending is temporary or part of a longer-term trend, said economist Aaron Catlin, who wrote the report with colleagues at the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. The study is being published today in the journal Health Affairs.

The authors note that health-care spending will be dictated by factors such as the aging of the population, the development of new technology and utilization patterns by patients and doctors.

The rise in health-care spending was barely faster than the growth in the overall economy. As a result, health-care spending edged up to 16% of the gross domestic product from 15.9% the year before. Federal and state governments footed 40% -- or $736.3 billion -- of the bill for health services and supplies. This public-sector spending rose 7.8% in 2005, compared with growth of 7% for businesses and 6.2% for households.

"Health-care costs continued to grow faster than the underlying rate of inflation, faster than the rest of the economy and faster than the growth in average wages," said Jack Ebeler, a health-care consultant in Washington. While some critics say that government spending on Medicare and Medicaid is driving up health costs, the trend, he said, "is a health-care cost issue generally for the nation, not just a public-spending issue."

Still, the slowdown in prescription-drug spending has been notable; it increased 5.8% in 2005, down from 8.6% in 2004 and a peak of 18.2% in 1999, the report said. The drop was partly caused by a sharp deceleration in drug expenditures by Medicaid, the state-federal program for the poor. Drug spending by Medicaid rose 2.8% in 2005, compared with average annual increases of 15.4% for the program from 1994 to 2004. To restrain costs, states have worked together to get higher rebates on certain drugs and steered recipients to use those drugs. Medicaid also pushed for the use of less expensive generic drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0114429

Meanwhile, the study noted, private insurers also promoted generics by setting up tiered benefit plans, which require higher co-payments for brand-name drugs. In addition, companies were slower in introducing new drugs, which tend to be more expensive. Also, the withdrawal of the big-selling painkiller Vioxx also damped spending, the report said. The study added that strong growth in mail-order drugs -- often in larger, cheaper supplies -- also helped slow increases in drug spending. Drug makers increased prices for brand-name prescription medicines an average of 6% in 2005, the authors said.

The study doesn't include data on the effect of the Medicare drug benefit, which was implemented in January 2006. Since then, Medicare -- not Medicaid -- has started paying for the drug costs of low-income enrollees who are eligible for both programs. The government will likely release new data on the issue next month. A Health Affairs study published last year predicted that the new drug benefit would produce "a dramatic shift in spending across payers" but have "little net effect on aggregate spending growth."

While the growth for prescription-drug spending slowed, spending for other sectors, such as hospital and physician and clinical services grew at rates similar to those of 2004, the authors said. Hospitals accounted for 31% of all dollars spent on health care.

Despite the slowdown in health-care spending, the study said, the percentage of personal income going for health care is rising. Out-of-pocket spending for health care grew to $249.4 billion in 2005, compared with $235.8 billion in 2004. One in five out-of-pocket dollars went to pay for prescription drugs.

Personal spending on prescription drugs also contributed to another trend: from 1996 to 2003, health-care costs became more evenly distributed throughout the population, according to a separate study published in Health Affairs. The study, by economists at the federal Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality said outlays by the top 5% of spenders dropped to 49% of all health-care spending in 2003 from 56% in 1996. Almost all the top 1% of spenders were patients who ran up big hospital bills after some type of catastrophic illness or injury. But in recent years, with more people buying prescription drugs, the health-care spending has become more evenly spread throughout the population.

"It's becoming less concentrated so care is shifting from very catastrophic to more preventive and maintenance treatment," said the lead author, Samuel Zuvekas.

Sweeping State Health Plan Governor's Proposal: Coverage For All Californians -- Everyone To Share Cost (SFC)

By Tom Chorneau, Chronicle Sacramento Bureau

San Francisco Chronicle, January 9, 2007

(01-09) 04:00 PST Sacramento -- Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger proposed Monday extending medical insurance to all Californians, including illegal immigrants, with a far-reaching plan that would transform the health care market by spreading the $12 billion cost of universal coverage among employers, individuals, insurers, government and health care providers.

The proposal, which the governor called a model for bringing universal coverage to the nation, would deliver both pain and reward to the many powerful interests in the health care industry, giving the plan an uncertain future before the Legislature.

But Schwarzenegger said the problem of covering the state's million uninsured must be undertaken.

"We have more than 6.5 million people without insurance, nearly one-fifth of our population -- so the rest of us pay their bills," the governor said during a news conference in Sacramento through a satellite television link from his office in Los Angeles.

Schwarzenegger said his solution is to make sure everyone in the state has health insurance.

To get there, Schwarzenegger would require all Californians to have insurance and to take more responsibility for staying healthy.

He would require employers with more than 10 workers to provide insurance or pay into a fund that would purchase policies. He would require insurance carriers to accept all applicants regardless of their health, and he would limit insurers' profits.

Schwarzenegger's plan also would redirect billions of dollars now spent subsidizing the care of the uninsured at hospitals to a pool for purchasing policies for those without insurance.

And he would impose a tax on doctors and hospitals under the theory that once all Californians have insurance, medical businesses no longer would be burdened by the cost of the uninsured, and the higher rates that providers now charge insured patients could be used to help buy more insurance.

By getting all parts of the economy and the industry sharing in the solution, Schwarzenegger said, he believes the price of care will fall, benefiting all.

DOJ_NMG_0114430

"In each case where it appears to be we're taking something from someone -- if you do the math, everyone is left with a better deal here," he said.

But some skeptics pointed out that the plan's symmetry might also leave Schwarzenegger few proponents willing to fight alongside him.

"He's counting on a groundswell of public opinion," said Larry Gerston, a political scientist at San Jose State, noting a recent Field Poll that showed nearly 80 percent of California voters support expanding health care programs to cover the uninsured.

"My question is, what is the intensity of that belief?" he said. "How many people go to sleep at night thinking about this problem? I think the intensity is uneven and really only among those who are already not in the system."

Although complaints about the governor's plan were largely muted Monday, there were hints of the rhetoric that could be used in the coming political fight.

A "coverage dividend" was how Kim Belshe, the governor's Cabinet secretary for health care issues, described a 2 percent tax on doctors and a 4 percent tax on hospitals.

Dr. Anmol Singh Mahal, president of the California Medical Association, called it a tax.

"A tax on physicians is really a tax on those who are sick, because it is the sick who go see their doctors," he said.

Allan Zaremberg, president of the California Chamber of Commerce -- a group that is already on record opposing a mandate on employers to provide insurance -- said he is worried that business profits will not keep pace with health care costs.

Labor unions and consumer groups are opposed to Schwarzenegger's mandate on individuals to have insurance because there is nothing in the plan to make sure policies will be affordable.

Hospitals are concerned about losing subsidies for uncompensated care in a time when so many already are losing money.

"Part of the problem is that health care is one of the few places in our society where we haven't made the commitment to include everybody," said Anthony Wright, director of Health Access, a Sacramento consumer group.

"We don't have a fire system where the fire trucks don't go to certain houses on the block," said Wright. "We have a public education system where we say we're going to include all children. Yet the United States has never made the commitment to include everybody in health care, which creates further disfunction."

Assembly Speaker Fabian Núñez, D-Los Angeles, said one certainty is that whatever changes are made to the state's health care system, not everyone will be completely happy with the results.

"But I think the key here is to really do what's most effective," he said. "Do what is going to have the most positive impact on a progressive health care system for California and not do what is politically convenient because it's helpful to this or that group. As long as we do that, I think we'll end up in the right place."

Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata, D-Oakland, went even further, saying there is something in Schwarzenegger's plan "for everyone to hate." Perata said that is usually an indicator of being on the right track.

The governor's plan also contemplates extending coverage to undocumented immigrants -- something that has been criticized by Republican lawmakers whom Schwarzenegger might need to support any spending legislation.

"There is no debate about whether to provide medical care for people who are in California illegally," Schwarzenegger said. "I know this is controversial, but federal law requires us to treat anyone who shows up at an emergency room in need of care."

In addition to getting employers to provide private insurance, the governor also would expand the existing Medi-Cal and Healthy Families programs. The state will subsidize the estimated 1.2 million low-income people who do not currently qualify for coverage under Medi-Cal.

The governor's plan would also provide insurance for all children whose families earn less than $60,000 per year, regardless of their residency status.

Like other parties affected by Schwarzenegger's proposal, hospitals complimented the governor for his proposal but insisted it contain enough money for their emergency rooms.

"Even when coverage is broadly expanded, the reality is that many individuals will inevitably fall through the cracks," said Duane Dauner, California Hospital Association president. "The health care safety net must be funded in such a manner that persons served by safety-net hospitals continue to have access to the care they need."

Among the harsher critics of the governor's plan was the California Nurses Association, a political enemy of Schwarzenegger since he relaxed higher nurse-to-patient staffing requirements in hospitals, something the nurses had sought for more than decade.

"Little more than a fresh coat of paint on a collapsing house" and a "huge gift to the insurance industry" was the description of the plan by Deborah Burger, the president of the nurses association. "There are no limits on skyrocketing health premiums, no requirements on what will be included in the required plans."

DOJ_NMG_0114431

Small businesses are especially wary of the mandates on employers.

"I don't see anything about the cost containment," said Jot Condie, president of the California Restaurant Association, which helped defeat a ballot measure to require that employers provide insurance to their employees. "Our position is, fix the system first, then maybe you don't have to require employers to contribute 4 percent of payroll."

Page

Schwarzenegger Proposes Universal Health Coverage (WP)

By Sonya Geis And Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 8 -- Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) on Monday proposed a system of universal health insurance for Californians that would make the nation's most populous state the third to guarantee medical coverage for all its residents.

"Prices for health care and insurance are rising twice as fast as inflation, twice as fast as wages. That is a terrible drain on everyone, and it is a drain on our economy," Schwarzenegger said. "My solution is that everyone in California must have insurance. If you can't afford it, the state will help you buy it, but you must be insured."

Much of the opposition to Schwarzenegger's program, which requires legislative approval, is expected to come from his fellow Republicans, who object that the plan will be costly for small businesses. But the governor said California cannot afford not to do it. Nearly one in five California residents does not have health insurance -- a total of 6.5 million people, many of whom seek expensive care in emergency rooms.

Nationwide, the ranks of the uninsured are growing. Census figures show that a record 46.6 million Americans, including 8.3 million children, had no health insurance in 2005, up from 45.3 million in 2004. Among those who did have coverage, fewer were receiving it through their jobs as employers scaled back their health plans.

Analysts say the California proposal is illustrative of the resurgence of interest among politicians at all levels in expanding health coverage to the uninsured and that it provides fresh evidence that, with Congress stalled on enacting comprehensive health-care reform, the states are beginning to take matters into their own hands.

In the past year, Massachusetts and Vermont have passed laws requiring all their residents to obtain health insurance, with help from the state if necessary. Other states considering expanding coverage to reduce the number of uninsured include Washington, Montana, Rhode Island, Wisconsin and Illinois.

"Health care for the uninsured is back on the agenda," said Diane Rowland, executive vice president of the Kaiser Family Foundation, a nonprofit, nonpartisan organization that researches health-care issues. "The governors are trying to lead the way, but it's also going to take national action to try to address this problem."

Schwarzenegger's plan would require everyone living in California -- even illegal immigrants -- to have health insurance, at an estimated cost of $12 billion. Individuals who refuse to carry insurance could face reductions in their state income tax refunds or the garnishment of their wages. All businesses with 10 or more employees would have to offer coverage or pay a fee of 4 percent of their payroll into a fund to help the uninsured buy health insurance.

Schwarzenegger also recommended expanding the state's existing program for children's health insurance to families that earn less than three times the poverty level, or about $60,000 for a family of four.

The governor also wants to force insurers to offer coverage to people with existing medical conditions. Currently many insurers will not cover older people, those with major illnesses or even people with relatively minor complaints such as asthma or varicose veins.

Schwarzenegger also would require insurance providers to use 85 percent of their premium proceeds on patient care.

The state would increase reimbursements to doctors and hospitals by a total of $4 billion. Money for the program would come from new taxes on doctors (2 percent of their revenue) and hospitals (4 percent), federal funds, and county funds that now pay for emergency care for the uninsured.

In addition to objections from small business, Schwarzenegger is sure to face opposition to taxes on doctors and hospitals, additional regulation of insurance providers and the extension of coverage to illegal immigrants.

"Imposing a new jobs tax on employers of any size and expanding costly government mandates is the wrong approach, one which will devastate our economy," the Assembly's Republican leader, Mike Villines, said in a statement Monday.

But Schwarzenegger said that while the plan will cost money, it will pump funds back into the health system because of the expanded coverage. "Everyone ends up with a better deal," he said.

Calif. Gov Calls For Universal Coverage (AP)

By Laura Kurtzman

AP, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114432

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger on Monday proposed to extend health coverage to nearly all of California's 6.5 million uninsured people, promising to spread the cost among businesses, individuals, hospitals, doctors, insurers and government.

The plan contains elements that are likely to provoke opposition from a wide range of powerful interests, including doctors, hospitals and insurers, as well as employers and unions. But it also contains incentives for each of them.

All children, regardless of their immigration status, would be covered through an expansion of the state and federal Healthy Families program.

"I don't think it is a question or a debate if they ought to be covered. ... The federal courts have made that decision — that no one can be turned away," Schwarzenegger said. "The question really isn't to treat them or not to treat them. The question really is how can you treat them in the most cost-effective way."

Under Schwarzenegger's plan, all Californians would be required to have insurance, although the poorest would be subsidized. Businesses with 10 or more employees would have to offer insurance to their workers or pay 4 percent of their payroll into a state fund. Smaller businesses would be exempt.

Also, insurers would no longer be allowed to deny coverage to people because of their medical problems.

Business groups and Republican legislators are likely to object to the extra costs imposed on businesses.

The state would subsidize the estimated 1.2 million poor people who do not currently qualify for state health coverage. They would be able to buy insurance through a state-run pool and would have to make a small contribution toward their premiums.

Schwarzenegger is betting that his plan will save $10 billion a year by cutting health care costs. He says the savings would offset the new fees he is asking doctors and hospitals to pay — 4 percent of revenue for hospitals and 2 percent for doctors.

The state also would increase what it pays doctors and hospitals through Medi-Cal, the state insurance plan for the poor.

The governor was supposed to give his address in person to a panel of health care officials. Instead, he spoke via video link since he is still recuperating from broken leg suffered in a skiing accident.

Gov. Seeks Sweeping Health System Reforms (LAT)

By Jordan Rau

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

SACRAMENTO — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger today proposed upending just about every portion of the healthcare industry in one of the country's most elaborate efforts at holding down medical costs and expanding insurance to those who don't have it.

Schwarzenegger's plan, which he publicly unveiled at noon, would require employers with 10 workers or more to buy insurance for their workers or pay a fee of 4% of their payroll into a program to help provide coverage for the uninsured.

Schwarzenegger would tax doctors 2% of their gross revenue and place a 4% tax on hospitals. He campaigned for reelection on an anti-tax platform, but his administration argues that so many more people would have insurance that medical providers would make more money.

The governor also wants to ban insurers from refusing to offer coverage to some individuals because of their prior medical conditions. Insurers would also have to spend at least 85% of their premium revenues on patient care, a move that would limit the amount companies spend on administrative costs and profits.

In an effort to cover all Californian children, including ones in the state illegally, Schwarzenegger's plan would expand the state's Healthy Families program, providing insurance to children whose parents make less than three times the poverty level. That works out to about $60,000 for a family of four.

And Schwarzenegger said his plan would require every Californian to have health insurance.

"If you can't afford it, the state will help you buy it," he said, "but you must be insured."

Schwarzenegger called the delivery and payment of healthcare in California "disastrous," noting that nearly 1 in 5 residents is uninsured.

"The problem with that is, of course, that the rest of the people who have insurance pay for them," said the governor. "Those that are fortunate enough to have coverage — we are paying a hidden tax."

Schwarzenegger spoke by satellite from Los Angeles. Doctors treating his broken leg have ordered him not to fly more than once a week. The governor will fly to Sacramento on Tuesday to deliver his annual State of the State address.

All of these ideas are sure to engender opposition from the healthcare industry and their allies in the Legislature, which must approve any plan before it becomes law.

Anticipating a hostile reaction to his plan from many quarters, Schwarzenegger said that although it appears that some people lose and others win under this proposal, in fact the whole system would benefit.

"Everyone has been left here with a better deal," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0114433

But Republican lawmakers and business groups have long argued against additional requirements on employers.

Two hours before Schwarzenegger unveiled his plan, Assembly Republican Leader Mike Villines (R-Clovis) joined with a trio of small business owners in a Thai restaurant a few blocks from the Capitol to announce that his caucus will resist any plan that places a mandate on employers. He called such mandates a "job tax," and stood at a podium alongside a large poster with those words circled and crossed through in red.

"If we put any form of mandate on a business, we are seeing a jobs tax," he said. "This isn't a philosophical discussion. This is a jobs discussion. This is the difference between employees having a job and a jobs tax that says no to that."

The governor's plan matches some elements of proposals put forth last month by the Legislature's top two Democrats. All plans build on an existing system, in which 71% of California employers offer workers health insurance.

All plans also include a "pay or play" element by which employers who don't offer health benefits must pay a fee to a state agency that would then negotiate with private insurers for worker coverage.

Last month, Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata (D-Oakland) proposed taxing workers and employers to cover an estimated 4.2 million of 6 million uninsured Californians, with a requirement that all employers — even those with a single employee — offer health insurance or pay the state a percentage of payroll. Perata would also require workers to prove when they pay taxes that they have health insurance.

The plan of Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez (D-Los Angeles) would not force workers to show they have health insurance. He would exempt businesses with less than two workers, those with a payroll less than $100,000 and firms less than three years old.

This afternoon, Nunez called Schwarzenegger's plan "pretty much in sync with the proposal I laid out in December." He also called it "a good start."

Schwarzenegger agrees with Assembly Democrats, Nunez said, on many areas, including giving all California children health insurance, requiring insurers to accept all people regardless of their health status and requiring employers to either offer health benefits or help pay the cost of extending it to their workers.

"When it's all said and done, employers in California will pay a portion of their payroll deductions toward the cost of insuring their employees," said Nunez. "That will happen."

The speaker said the governor's plan could pass the Legislature on a simple-majority vote, which would not require any Republican support.

Republican lawmakers, who are a minority in the Assembly and Senate, have a seat at the table, Nunez said. But they are out of touch with mainstream Californians, he said, when they insist that children in the country illegally get no state-assisted health insurance. And they are wrong, Nunez said, in characterizing the governor's plan as a new tax.

"I don't think . . . that the governor and the Democratic Legislature ought to roll over or steamroll the Republicans in this process," said Nunez. "But I think we need to have an honest discussion about what's a real mandate and what's not a real mandate.

"The mandate is a hidden tax of $1,200 that each of us has to pay because there are employers out there who would rather increase that rate of profit and put it in their pocket than to pay a portion of the healthcare costs of their employees," Nunez said. "That's a tax."

Schwarzenegger Proposes Health Plan (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, January 9, 2007

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger outlined a plan Monday to provide health insurance to all Californians by requiring health insurers to offer coverage and individuals to carry it — with the state's doctors, hospitals, insurers, taxpayers and employers all helping pay for it.

His proposal is significant not only for its scope, but also because what happens in the nation's most-populous state often has ripple effects across the country. California, for example, helped lead the way on automobile-smog controls and smoking bans in public places.

"We want to make health care more affordable and accessible and equitable for everyone," said Schwarzenegger.

If his plan wins approval — and heated debate is expected — California would be the second state to require health insurance. Massachusetts lawmakers approved a plan last year.

SMALL BUSINESS BLOG: Do you support Schwarzenegger's health plan? Take this quick quiz — and see how other readers responded, too

"This is bigger than Massachusetts," said Jay Gellert, CEO of insurer Health Net. Gellert was among a panel representing business, labor, consumers, doctors and counties who were asked for their opinions on the proposal at a press conference.

DOJ_NMG_0114434

They generally praised the governor for raising the issue, while questioning some of the details. Anthony Wright from consumer group Health Access said he feared the plan doesn't have a cap on how much consumers would have to pay for insurance, while the California Medical Association said doctors will not like a proposed revenue tax. Safeway CEO Steve Burd said a proposed 4% payroll tax for businesses that don't offer insurance may not be high enough.

While the plan aims to reduce the state's 6.5 million uninsured — currently about 20% of the non-elderly population — the governor also emphasized its benefits to the insured.

The insured could see premium discounts for living healthy lifestyles, the governor said. Further savings may come if everyone is insured, because premiums are now estimated to include 10% to 17% in "hidden taxes" — money used to pay medical providers to make up for the uninsured and low payments for those on state programs.

Under the proposal:

· Individuals would have to buy insurance, with government subsidies for people earning up to 250% of the federal poverty level, about $24,500 for an individual and $50,000 for a family of four.

· State programs for children would expand to include families earning up to 300% of poverty, about $60,000 for a family of four.

· Employers with 10 or more workers would have to offer coverage or pay a tax equal to 4% of payroll. Under 10 are exempt.

· Insurers could not turn away prospective policyholders because they've got health problems.

· Insurers and hospitals would have to devote 85% of revenue to direct patient care.

· Hospitals would pay a 4% tax on revenue and doctors a 2% tax to help provide coverage subsidies.

· The state would boost by $4 billion the amount it pays to medical providers through the Medicaid program.

Schwarzenegger Embarks On Fight For Health Plan (WSJ)

By Jim Carlton

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger proposed a sweeping plan to mandate universal health care in the nation's most-populous state, putting forth measures that would require employers to pay into the health-care system as well as tax hospitals and doctors to help offset medical coverage's spiraling costs.

The move makes Mr. Schwarzenegger, a Republican, the latest governor to try to tackle a problem -- covering the uninsured -- that the federal government has been unable to solve. Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who is seen as a Republican contender for the presidency, struck a bipartisan deal with his state's legislature last year mandating universal health care in the Bay State. Mandates for some employers to pay more of their share if they don't already have been passed in Vermont and Maryland, as well as New York City and San Francisco. Maryland's law was thrown out by a federal judge last year after a legal challenge.

California, with 36 million residents, could influence other states to follow suit. But Mr. Schwarzenegger also faces potentially one of the fiercest battles of his political career, because his plan calls for some level of sacrifice from many of the parties affected.

The governor anticipated criticism in his remarks yesterday to a Sacramento gathering of his staff and business executives, saying the long-term rewards of having lower medical costs would make the pain worthwhile. "It appears we are taking something away from everyone here," Mr. Schwarzenegger said by video link as he recuperated from a broken leg injury he suffered while skiing over the holiday break in Sun Valley, Idaho. "But when you look at the math, they actually benefit. Everyone is left with a better deal, even though everyone has to chip in."

The governor said his plan to charge a "dividend" of 2% on doctors' revenue and 4% on hospitals' would be more than offset by what his office estimates would be $10 billion to $15 billion in new money coming into the medical system from so many people being insured, as well as a proposed increase in the state's Medi-Cal plan.

California now has about 6.5 million people who are uninsured or underinsured, a higher level than any other state. According to the Census Bureau, 15.9% of Americans lacked health insurance in 2005; in California, it was 19.4%.

The Schwarzenegger plan drew some skepticism. "There may be some unintended consequences," said Joel Fox, president of the Small Business Action Committee in Sacramento, in a panel discussion organized by the governor's administration after the speech. "For example, will some businesses opt out of covering employees and go into the pool [of state-insured workers], thus overwhelming the pool? Will some companies cherry-pick their employees so that they hire those more easily covered, instead of guys like me that are older?"

DOJ_NMG_0114435

Allan Zaremberg, president of the California Chamber of Commerce, questioned whether the plan would really make health care more affordable for those who already are insured. Mr. Zaremberg said the taxes on doctor and hospital revenues could be passed onto consumers and the companies that already provide insurance in higher premiums.

Others praised the plan. Officials of Blue Cross of California called it "bold and visionary," singling out the provision to provide medical coverage to all uninsured children in the state, even those of illegal immigrants. "Taking each part separately, there's something for everyone to hate, but taken as a whole, there's a lot to like," said Bruce Bodaken, chairman, president and Chief Executive of Blue Cross of California.

Some other business leaders, including the chief executive of California-based grocery titan Safeway Inc., are also backing the plan. One reason: They already pay to fund medical plans for their employees, and resent the competitors who don't. On balance, the governor likely will have a tougher time persuading members of his own party to back the measure than the Democratic lawmakers who control the California Legislature. Indeed, Mr. Schwarzenegger's plan isn't hugely different from versions recently proffered by state Senate President Don Perata and Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez. Mr. Nuñez said in an interview that he just had a few issues with the governor's plan -- most important, that it would shift money from one program for the poor into this health-care program. "On its face, this is a good start," Mr. Nuñez said.

California's Governor Seeks Universal Care (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 8 — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger on Monday proposed extending health care coverage to all of California's 36 million residents as part of a sweeping package of changes to the state's huge, troubled health care system.

A total of 6.5 million people, one-fifth of the state's population, do not have health insurance, far more than in any other state. At least one million of the uninsured are illegal immigrants, state officials say.

Under Mr. Schwarzenegger's plan, which requires the approval of the Legislature, California would become the fourth and by far the largest state to attempt near universal health coverage for its citizens. The other three states are Maine, Massachusetts and Vermont.

The governor outlined his proposal to an audience of health care experts and reporters via satellite from Los Angeles. He made it clear that a variety of mechanisms would be used to provide all Californians with insurance and that the responsibility of providing it would fall on the government, employers, health care providers and the uninsured themselves.

The plan, which Mr. Schwarzenegger estimated would cost $12 billion, calls for many employers that do not offer health insurance to contribute to a fund that would help pay for coverage of the working uninsured. It would also require doctors to pay 2 percent and hospitals 4 percent of their revenues to help cover higher reimbursements for those who treat patients enrolled in Medi-Cal, the state's Medicaid program.

"Everyone in California must have health insurance," Mr. Schwarzenegger said.

As he made his proposal, the federal government announced that health care spending in 2005 showed the slowest growth in six years. [Page A13.]

Mr. Schwarzenegger's plan includes elements that quickly provoked opposition from many powerful interests, including doctors and the governor's Republican colleagues in the Legislature.

But the speaker of the State Assembly, Fabian Núñez, a Democrat, said in a statement, "I'm glad the governor is on board with coverage for all kids."

Over the last two years, state legislatures have grown increasingly concerned with how to provide health insurance to citizens as the number of employers offering coverage has fallen and the number of workers entering fields where health insurance is not an option has grown.

Because of its great size, California is likely to set the stage for a national conversation about health care this year.

"This is a very significant proposal," said Karen Davis, president of the Commonwealth Fund, a nonprofit foundation. "It is not just children he is talking about. It is really dealing with the whole problem of the uninsured, with concrete positions to raise revenues to pay for that coverage, and the philosophy of shared responsibility. I think this shows health care is going to be a major issue in the 2008 presidential election."

In many ways, Mr. Schwarzenegger's proposal mirrors the plan in Massachusetts, the most comprehensive of its sort, which is projected to cover about 515,000 of the state's 550,000 uninsured. The law enacted there transformed a $1 billion pool that had long paid for health care for uninsured patients into a mechanism to help subsidize insurance for those who could not afford it.

DOJ_NMG_0114436

In many states, spending on Medicaid, the federal government's health program for the poor, has surpassed that for education in recent years. In New York, Gov. Eliot Spitzer has vowed to insure all the state's children and enroll all eligible adults in Medicaid. And New Jersey is among a handful of states considering some form of universal coverage.

Under Mr. Schwarzenegger's proposal, Medi-Cal would be extended to adults who earn as much as 100 percent above the federal poverty line and to children, regardless of their immigration status, living in homes where the family income is as much as 300 percent above that line, about $60,000 a year for a family of four. Medi-Cal is currently limited to adults with children, and children with documented residency are covered if their family's income is up to 250 percent above of the poverty line.

Adult illegal immigrants would continue to be barred from Medicaid benefits but would still be entitled to health services from their counties and the state's hospital system.

Employers would have new responsibilities as well. Businesses with 10 or more workers that choose not to offer coverage would be required to pay 4 percent of their total Social Security wages to a state fund that would be created to subsidize the purchase of coverage by the working uninsured. The cost of such coverage would be measured on a sliding scale depending on what an employee earned, and employees would be able to pay for it using pretax dollars.

This component seems intended to give employers an incentive to offer health insurance, and to level the playing field between employers that do not offer insurance — and are therefore essentially paying lower wages — and those that do.

"If you look at where the uninsured lie," said Laura Tobler, a health policy analyst for the National Conference of State Legislatures, "most of them are working, and most work for small businesses."

On the provider side, the governor's plan contains privileges and responsibilities. Doctors and hospitals, which have long complained about Medi-Cal's low reimbursement rates, would benefit from a $4 billion increase in annual reimbursement. But the state would tax doctors 2 percent of their total revenues, and hospitals 4 percent, to help pay for the greater reimbursement.

The proposal would prohibit insurance companies from denying coverage to people because of their age or health status. They would also be required to put 85 percent of their profits directly into health care services.

Aides to the governor said financing for the program would come from roughly $5 billion in federal money the state believes it will be owed through restructuring of its health care programs, and through a redirection of state money that now goes toward what is basically charity care, among other measures.

The chief executive of Blue Shield of California, Bruce G. Bodaken, described what might happen once the Legislature began to debate the governor's proposal.

"Taking each part separately, there's something for everyone to hate," Mr. Bodaken said. "But taken as a whole, there's a lot to like."

The governor's plan signals a growing trend among state legislatures. "What we are seeing this year," said Enrique Martinez-Vidal, acting director of the State Coverage Initiatives, a program that assists states looking to expand health care programs, "is that instead of just trying to take on reform in an incremental way, there are some states trying to do this in a comprehensive way, by trying to get buy-ins from all the different players."

But it is likely to set Mr. Schwarzenegger, a Republican, on a collision course with many state lawmakers from his party, who are the minority in the Legislature.

"Some of the areas he put out there we are probably not going to support," said State Senator Dick Ackerman, the minority leader. Among his concerns, Mr. Ackerman said, were the coverage of illegal immigrants, which he said his members would not support, and a tax on doctors or providers.

"We don't think taxing folks is something that is popular in California," he said in a telephone interview from Sacramento. "But this isn't going to be an up-or-down vote on one bill. It will be a debate. And we welcome it."

Gov. Offers Bold Prescription (LAT)

By Jordan Rau

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

SACRAMENTO — Calling for massive changes throughout a healthcare system he called "broken," Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger on Monday proposed a $12-billion plan that would require all Californians to obtain medical insurance while helping the poorest to afford it.

The plan, which both critics and supporters called the most audacious in the country, would dramatically reshuffle the financial underpinnings of an already fragile industry. The governor said his plan would control spiraling health costs while ensuring coverage for the quarter of a million children and 5.6 million adults who lack insurance.

"Everyone in California must have health insurance," Schwarzenegger said via teleconference from Los Angeles, where he is recuperating from a broken leg. "If you can't afford it, the state will help you buy it, but you must be insured."

DOJ_NMG_0114437

Only Massachusetts has required all residents to carry insurance, but California's larger population of uninsured and poor makes Schwarzenegger's goals much more challenging. To pay for the plan, Schwarzenegger proposed placing new fees and obligations on doctors, hospitals, employers and insurers — all powerful lobbies in Sacramento.

Schwarzenegger was widely praised for tackling such a huge issue so comprehensively. But many leading consumer advocates, academics and business leaders said they feared that the governor's proposal was inadequately financed and would shift more responsibility for healthcare to families while unintentionally encouraging businesses to drop or downgrade the coverage they now offer.

Employers with 10 or more workers would have to offer plans that cost them at least 4% of their payroll. Those who refuse would be required to pay an equivalent amount into the state's insurance fund for people with no other option. That mandate, while greeted skeptically by businesses, was criticized as too lax by advocates who said that a majority of companies that now provide insurance already contribute much more money.

"It's the equivalent of setting the minimum wage at $3 an hour," said Anthony Wright, executive director of Health Access California, a consumer advocacy group.

Those earning more than 2 1/2 times the federal poverty level — a total of $41,500 a year for a family of three — would not receive a subsidy but would still have to buy insurance if their employer did not offer it. The cheapest plan would require families to pay $2,000 a year in premiums, and as much as $10,000 in out-of-pocket medical costs.

"By setting this as a minimum, the tendency will be to undermine and reduce the current level offered by some employers, who will use this to justify reducing their benefits much more," said E. Richard Brown, director of the UCLA Center for Health Policy Research, who nonetheless called the proposal "very impressive" in its reach.

Steven A. Burd, chairman of the Safeway grocery chain, who was invited by the administration to comment on the proposal, also lauded the effort but said it did not ask enough of employers. Their required contribution, he said, "is frankly too low and should be higher."

The plan was welcomed by the Democrats who control the Legislature, which must approve any proposal. Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles) called it "good work" and "a good start."

But he said that he could not agree to requiring everyone, whether working or not, to obtain health insurance "until and unless we solve the problem of the costs of the premiums."

Schwarzenegger's fellow Republicans showed little enthusiasm for the plan, saying that the governor's strategy of funding it through mandated employer contributions and assessing a portion of earnings of doctors, hospitals and health plans violated the anti-tax cornerstone of his reelection campaign.

*

Republican opposition

"If we put any form of mandate on a business, we are seeing a jobs tax," said Assembly Republican leader Michael Villines of Clovis, echoing the argument that Schwarzenegger himself made in 2004 when he successfully campaigned against Proposition 72. That Democratic plan would have required employers to provide health insurance or pay into a state fund.

The administration insisted that its plan did not include taxes, instead labeling the levies "coverage dividends." The debate is more than semantic: A measure with taxes needs two-thirds support in the Legislature, giving the GOP veto power. Otherwise, it needs only a simple majority that could be obtained solely with Democratic votes.

Another part of the plan provoking Republican resistance would provide healthcare for impoverished children who are in the United States illegally. Senate Republican leader Dick Ackerman of Irvine called such a provision a "nonstarter."

The governor said emergency rooms are required by federal law to treat anyone who shows up, regardless of status. "So the decision for my team was, do we treat them in emergency rooms at the highest cost available or do we do it right and do it efficiently?" he said.

The plan, which has been anticipated for weeks as the governor's biggest initiative of the year, gave virtual coronaries to leaders of California's hospitals, doctors' groups and insurers — the most politically influential players in a $169-billion industry that spends $22 million annually on lobbying in Sacramento.

The guiding philosophy of Schwarzenegger's plan was that fixing California's healthcare system was a responsibility to be shared, and the complex plan gave each sector some benefits that are offset by new burdens.

He proposed a $4-billion annual increase in Medi-Cal reimbursements, which are among the lowest in the nation. That would help hospitals and doctors who treat many poor people, and encourage more providers to participate in the program.

But doctors also would have to pay 2% of their gross earnings back to the state to help expand coverage. The physicians' lobby said many doctors would simply pass that cost on to patients and insurers through higher bills.

DOJ_NMG_0114438

If all Californians were indeed covered under his plan, hospitals would be able to bill insurance for the costs of the uninsured they must absorb now. But hospitals also would have to pay 4% of their earnings back to the state, and would lose $2 billion they now get from the government for uncompensated care.

"I did get a little bit of pain in the side when I heard that part," said Jim Lott, executive director of the Hospital Assn. of Southern California.

And hospitals may still have to deal with uninsured patients. The homeless, unemployed and illegal immigrants might not obtain insurance even if fully subsidized, and the administration plans to enforce the mandate through the state's income tax boards.

Insurers would receive a huge business boon, since the mandate for coverage would provide them with a captive audience, but without having their rates regulated as those of auto and home insurers are. The governor would require insurers to offer coverage to all people regardless of their health, and would limit to 15% the amount of premiums insurers could spend on administration and keep as profits.

Much of Schwarzenegger's plan was designed to allow the state to qualify for $5.5 billion in additional federal money. But many questioned whether, even with that boost, the contributions from employers would be enough to allow workers to buy anything more than bare-bones catastrophic coverage.

Premiums rising

Healthcare premiums have been rising at the rate of 8.2% annually, nearly twice the rate of wage growth. Yet employers would pay only 4% of their payroll amounts, something that disturbs both labor and business leaders.

"How will the inevitable shortfall in funding be addressed?" asked Allan Zaremburg, president of the California Chamber of Commerce. "Will the tax have to be doubled in 10 years?"

The proposal was devised by a team of policy experts who were hired last year specifically for that task. They spent months interviewing representatives of all segments of the healthcare industry across the nation. But the final decisions were delayed until Sunday night because of Schwarzenegger's injury, which occurred in a skiing accident Dec. 23.

All of the plan's details can be altered and its questions can be resolved in negotiations with lawmakers, and Schwarzenegger said he looked forward to forging a bipartisan agreement as he had last year with a massive public works building project.

But because so many parts of Schwarzenegger's plan hinge on one another, deleting the areas of greatest disagreement could unravel the entire plan.

"Health insurance reform is as delicate as an egg," said Jamie Court, president of the Foundation of Taxpayer and Consumer Rights, a Santa-Monica based watchdog group. "One little crack and the egg is lost."

Among other provisions, the governor's proposed health overhaul would:

· Require every Californian to have health insurance.

· Require employers with 10 or more workers to offer health benefits or pay 4% of the payroll to a coverage program.

· Extend government insurance for poor children to more families.

· Ban insurers from denying coverage because of medical conditions, occupation or age.

Source: Governor's office

**

Breaking down costs

U.S. healthcare spending reached almost $2 trillion in 2005, an average of $6,697 per person--and far more than any other industrialized country's spending. Where the money comes from, and what it goes toward:

Where it comes from*

Private insurance: 35%

Medicare: 17%

Medicaid: 16%

Other public programs: 13%

Private out-of-pocket: 13%

Other private programs: 17%

--

Where it goes

Hospital: 30%

Doctors/Clinical: 21%

Prescription drugs: 10%

Administrative costs: 7%

DOJ_NMG_0114439

Nursing homes: 6%

Other spending : 25%

*Medicaid includes State Children's Health Insurance Program; other public programs include worker's comp and military healthcare; other private programs include charity.

Includes dental care, home health, over-the-counter medicines, research and more.

Note: Totals may not add to 100% because of rounding.

A Flawed Cure (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

THE DEVIL, AS THEY SAY, is in the details, and that cliche was repeatedly thrown back and forth across Sacramento on Monday as lawmakers, business groups, doctors and consumer advocates studied Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's sweeping proposal to change the way healthcare is bought and sold in California.

But it may be a little early for this cliche. Schwarzenegger's plan is ambitious in scope and laudable in its goals, especially in its coverage for all children, including children of illegal immigrants. But the plan has a substantial chunk of devil before you even reach the details.

The problem is this: It makes no sense to legally and permanently make Californians' access to healthcare dependent on their employers. Companies hire workers and pay them for their time, talent, muscle and brains. Employers must meet certain standards to do business in the state — complying with workplace safety laws, paying the minimum wage, providing workers' compensation insurance, etc. But they should not become the primary mechanism for the state to deliver vital services to citizens.

This is more true here than elsewhere because so many Californians who need insurance have only marginal or temporary relationships with employers. Companies, meanwhile, face plenty of challenges just staying in business and keeping up with the dynamics of the modern marketplace without being saddled with a new health insurance tax.

And make no mistake, it is a tax. Employers currently have the option of offering health insurance to entice workers, but they are not required to do so. Under Schwarzenegger's proposal, every business with 10 or more employees that does not offer workers health insurance would have to pay 4% of its payroll into a state fund. And like most employer taxes, workers ultimately will pay it — in the form of lower wages or lost jobs.

The governor is loath to call it a tax because, like everyone else in Sacramento, he does not want to be seen as the kind of politician who proposes tax increases. He rode into office in part on his promise to slash the vehicle license fee, or car tax, and he did. He devoted much of his first term and reelection campaign to protecting California's tax-cutting heritage. But fancy wordplay doesn't change the fact.

The plan requires money — about $12 billion — and although some of it would come from the federal government, some from counties and presumably some from cuts in other state programs, some must come from new revenue.

Schwarzenegger has promised a new era for California, and his determination to fix the state's broken healthcare system is a welcome sign of his commitment. He should also make candor a part of the agenda. An employer tax should be out of the equation. So who should be taxed instead? Shouldn't we all? And how would it be imposed? All these questions are likely to get a full hearing in Sacramento in the next few months.

The governor certainly knows that the final version of the plan will deviate from the proposal he unveiled Monday. As for how much devil will be left in the details, only time, and plenty of intense horse trading, will tell.

Life At America's Bottom Wage (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, January 9, 2007

MUSKOGEE, OKLA.

It's the kind of December evening when the Hosier family might want to stay home.

At work all day, John Hosier has been resting on the living-room couch. Tina, his wife, has had her hands full taking care of their two young children. Yet, here they are, rolling 18-month-old Rose in a stroller with 5-year-old Donald tagging along, on a half-mile walk to the Salvation Army Church in Muskogee, Okla.

It's not just a place of worship and fellowship. The Salvation Army's affiliated store offers discounted goods and employs Mr. Hosier full time. The $6-an-hour job is the family's sole paycheck, which amounts to barely $200 a week. Even with government aid, such as food stamps, the family is on poverty's doorstep. "If it wasn't for the Salvation Army, I don't know where I'd be," Hosier says.

DOJ_NMG_0114440

Wednesday, Congress formally begins considering helping families like the Hosiers by raising the nation's minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, up from the $5.15 rate that has held steady since 1997.

By one estimate, the expected hike would directly affect the paychecks of 6.6 million low-wage workers like John Hosier. Another 8 million workers have wages that, while a bit too high to be forced upward by the law, stand to gain from an upward ripple effect when the wage floor is adjusted.

A glimpse into the lives of people who live at bottom-rung pay rates illustrates why, to supporters of the change, the minimum wage is long overdue for a raise. But it also reveals that such a boost isn't a one-step solution for the challenges that face America's poorest workers.

In fact, many families are poor today even though they earn far above $7.25 an hour.

"Until you're making $10 or $12 an hour, if you're [a single-income household] with dependents, you're going to have a really tough time making ends meet without public assistance," says David Blatt, a poverty expert at the Community Action Project of Tulsa County, about 40 miles from Muskogee in the state's northeastern section. Oklahoma family's needs: $33,000

Oklahoma doesn't have high living costs, compared with some other states. But to cover the basic needs of a family of four here typically requires an income of more than $33,000, according to an online budget calculator created by the liberal Economic Policy Institute in Washington.

At $5.15 an hour, it would take three full-time jobs for a family to earn that much.

Many minimum-wage workers, it's true, don't have children. Often they are young people on their first job.

But the Hosier family is not unusual. Of the workers who stand to reap higher pay if Congress raises the wage floor, the vast majority are adults, most work full-time, and about 1 in 4 have dependent children, according to the Economic Policy Institute.

Moreover, they are often the sole breadwinner in the household. Of families with children, nearly half of those who would be affected by a minimum-wage hike get all their earned income from one low-wage worker.

The issue is important politically. Democrats, now in control of Congress, have made raising the minimum wage a top priority in their 100-hour legislative push for change. It would also have its most significant economic effect - positive and negative - in the South and Great Plains where states generally haven't set their own higher minimum wage.

Few states will see a greater impact than Oklahoma. As of last year, the Sooner State led the nation in the share of hourly workers (4 percent) who earn no more than $5.15 per hour.

That means many families such as the Hosiers will see a boost in pay if the law changes. But it means that negative ripple effects will also be magnified, as businesses confront a big jump in labor costs. Many employers will have to raise prices, and some are likely to hire fewer people as a result.

In the end, the law may exert only a modest influence on the arc of Oklahoma's economy, experts say. (The income gains and job setbacks would be greater if the hike, say, doubled the wage instead of boosting it by the proposed 40 percent.)

Yet the proposed raise would have a big effect on the households that would be directly affected.

The legislation calls for the wage floor to rise in three steps, reaching $7.25 after two years.

A pay jump from $6 to $7.25 an hour would put 21 percent more money in each paycheck for Hosier. "That would help a lot," he says. A 'soldier' in Salvation Army

A sturdy, soft-spoken man born in Arkansas, Hosier has spent about 15 years in this unassuming city of 39,000. He's worked as a mechanic on lawnmowers and other small motors. And for six years, he's been a "soldier" - a worker - at the Salvation Army. He rides a big truck, loading and unloading furniture, toys, boxes of clothing, and other items that county residents donate for sale in the store.

It's work that he believes in, but he also works there because the people - including the manager known as "Major" - believe in him.

"It's the people in Salvation Army who help you out," John says.

And he has needed help. His life story, as he recounts it, includes physical abuse from his father as a boy, various forms of drug abuse ("I did it all") and a prison term. And he struggles now with illiteracy.

As he sought a new life, he credits God and Tina with helping him forward. The church here has also been a haven of support.

The gathering on this night is not for formal worship but for a mix of activities. Mrs. Hosier settles in for some games of Bingo. As John heads to a vending machine and treats the family to drinks, a friend hands Tina a little gift. It's a typical-looking mug, but it makes her smile when it turns out to be a music box, too.

Meanwhile, Donald has joined some older children throwing a football in the parking lot. Other youngsters are dressed as angels, rehearsing a play to be performed on Sunday.

DOJ_NMG_0114441

The Salvation Army is the core of this family's world. They don't have a car, but live within walking distance of both the church and the store where John works.

The store is a source not only of a paycheck, but also of used goods available at deep discounts.

The family also gets substantial government aid, for everything from clothing to food and healthcare. But paying their bills is a stretch, the Hosiers say.

Rent is $400 a month for their modest, yellow-sided home. They've lived there just a few months, so they're still figuring out how much to budget for utilities. And medical costs add up each month.

Donald takes medicines to cope with hyperactivity, and Hosier lists a range of ailments of his own, from asthma to an ulcer.

The state's Medicaid program covers many of these health costs, but the medications all require small monthly copayments that add up, John says.

"It's hard on a small income," he says. "You've got to get out and hustle and bustle to make a living."

When they need to go on an errand, the Hosiers rely on a Volunteers of America van, or ride with friends and relatives. Life without a car

Mrs. Hosier says they'd like to get a car of their own, but that remains a far-off goal.

Their discretionary spending, for now, is on smaller items: some music CDs and for Donald on his birthday a toy truck and Spiderman underwear.

They like life in this quiet city that has long been a gateway for east-west and north-south commerce. Riverboats, railroads, and semitrailer trucks have successively rolled through this town. The historic brick downtown has given way to Wal-Mart on the edge of town as the new trading post for commerce.

The city was also the end point of the Trail of Tears, by which the Cherokee and Creek nations were forcibly resettled in the 1830s and '40s. In 1969, country legend Merle Haggard immortalized it a different way when he sang "I'm proud to be an Okie from Muskogee."

Oklahoma, like the rest of the states, got its first taste of a federally mandated minimum wage in 1938, during Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal. It was 25 cents at the time - worth about $3.57 in today's dollars - and was adjusted upward, at infrequent intervals, in an effort to keep pace with rising costs of living.

The current level of $5.15 was reached in 1997, and Congress has never waited so long to raise it.

As a result, the purchasing power of a minimum-wage paycheck is now at its lowest point in half a century. Also earning the minimum: teenagers

The people who earn minimum, or close to it, are as different as John Hosier and Megan Sistanich.

She also lives in Muskogee but is still in high school. She's earning $5.15 an hour at a downtown cafe called Breadworks. She aims to go to a nearby college and become a pharmacist, which almost certainly would mean much better pay in a few years.

Serving behind the counter here, taking orders for sandwiches and baked goods, is her first job. She's using the money for a cellphone and a coming band trip to Texas.

Drawing on government data on the American workforce, labor economists highlight several patterns in the low-wage workforce:

· Most workers don't work the minimum wage for very long. Of workers who are 10 years into their careers, only about 13 percent have spent half or more of their career earning within $1.50 of the minimum wage, according to a 2001 study.

· Minimum-wage workers are concentrated in low-skill service-sector occupations, including food service, retail, and motel housekeeping. Among Labor Department occupations, "leisure/ hospitality" leads the pack with 14.3 percent of workers earning $5.15 or less per hour. (Workers in some occupations such as food service can earn less than $5.15 if they earn enough tips to equal the minimum.) By contrast, just 0.4 percent of manufacturing workers earn minimum wage.

· Of the 6.6 million workers who would be directly affected by the proposed minimum-wage hike to $7.25 an hour, 61 percent are female, 29 percent are age 16 to 19, 21 percent are Hispanic, 16 percent are black, and 9 percent are single parents, according to the Economic Policy Institute.

Those numbers are all higher than the share of those groups in the total workforce. By contrast, 16 percent of those affected will be married parents - many fewer than the 29 percent of all workers who are in that group.

· Many low-wage workers also face a high level of job insecurity. People with low skills are more likely to be unemployed, according to government data. And many low-wage workers have only part-time jobs. Of those directly affected by the proposed wage hike, 21 percent work fewer than 20 hours per week, whereas just 5 percent of the overall workforce is in that category. In addition to low skills, barriers to employment can include substance abuse or mental illness and other disabilities. Low wages only a part of the problem

DOJ_NMG_0114442

"There are two problems the poor have. One is low wages.... The other is not enough work hours, consistently, over time," says Timothy Bartik, an economist at the Upjohn Institute for Employment Research in Kalamazoo, Mich.

Here in Oklahoma, Hosier is grateful for full-time work. He figures that, for now, none of the other jobs available to him would be better paying.

And he likes working for an organization that's in the business of helping others, just as he has been helped by those around him.

"If I had a dollar in my pocket and someone asked me for 50 cents, I would give them that dollar," he adds. "The would make me feel good."

Fed's No. 2 Chills Hopes For A Rate Cut (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

Despite a recent decline in the nation's underlying inflation, it is "too early to relax our concerns" about price pressures, a top Federal Reserve official said, suggesting interest-rate cuts aren't yet on the table.

Fed Vice Chairman Donald Kohn also warned that long-term interest rates could jump if the Fed fails to cut short-term rates as much as the market expects or if there were a reversal in other factors holding down long-term rates.

A recent drop in core inflation, which excludes food and energy is "encouragingly consistent" with the Fed's forecast for a gradual decline in inflation, Mr. Kohn said in a speech to the Atlanta Rotary Club yesterday.

But he cautioned against "extrapolating trends from a couple of months of data," and said some of the recent slowdown in inflation may reflect "one-time influences," in particular the indirect effects of the big drop in energy costs. Moreover, companies may be holding the line on prices to keep inventories from rising, and "that restraint on pricing will dissipate" once inventories are in line with sales.

The remarks by Mr. Kohn, the Fed's most influential policy maker after Chairman Ben Bernanke, suggest little has changed in the central bank's outlook since it last met in December. At that meeting, it kept its short-term interest-rate target at 5.25%, said its principal concern remained inflation, and its main choice in coming months would be whether to raise rates or leave them unchanged.

Since that meeting, manufacturing activity and business investment have softened and inflation was reported to be low for the second month in a row. That has left investors wondering whether the Fed, at its next meeting Jan. 30-31, will release a "neutral" policy statement -- one that implies a rate increase is as likely as a rate cut. The Fed isn't expected to change rates at the meeting.

Mr. Kohn didn't address the prospect for any change in the Fed's stance. Still, his remarks suggest he continues to see higher inflation as a greater risk to the economy than weaker growth. The softening in manufacturing and capital spending "is not the leading edge of general economic weakness, but instead an adjustment to a sustained pace of expansion that, necessarily, is less rapid than that from mid-2003 to mid-2006," he said.

He did, however, strike a note of caution on the housing market. "Tentative signs have begun to emerge that the housing market may be stabilizing," he said, and "housing starts may be not very far from their trough." But he added: "The risks around this outlook still are largely to the downside."

Housing prices are still high relative to their fundamental determinants, such as interest rates and residential rents, he said. The uncertainty is magnified by the fact housing isn't weakening for the usual reason: high interest rates. Rather, he said, the sector is weakening because sales and construction had risen so much, and it wasn't clear why.

Mr. Kohn also noted that long-term rates are "relatively low," which is supporting housing. He said long-term rates could rise if short-term rates "fail to follow the downward path currently built into market expectations," or if "term premiums" rise. The term premium is the additional interest rate a lender charges for a long-term loan, compared with a short-term one, that can't be explained by expectations of Fed policy.

Fed officials believe a lower term premium, while difficult to measure, is the main reason long-term rates are so low -- perhaps because of the market's increased faith in low, stable inflation. That is why they don't think the "inverted yield curve" -- or long-term rates that are lower than short-term ones -- foreshadows recession, as it has in the past. Indeed, low term premiums are one reason the Fed has decided not to lower short-term rates.

But because the reasons for the low term premium are unclear, there remains the chance of a sharp reversal. That could weaken the U.S. economy and encourage the Fed to lower short-term rates.

Meanwhile, a report released by the Fed yesterday showed that U.S. consumer credit grew more strongly than expected in November, as shoppers put their credit cards to heavy use.

DOJ_NMG_0114443

Consumer credit, which excludes mortgage debt, rose at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of about $12.4 billion, or 6.2%, in November to $2.390 trillion. Analysts had predicted a $3 billion increase. Revolving credit, which mainly reflects credit-card financing, jumped 11.9% in November to $872.6 billion. Nonrevolving credit, mostly auto loans, rose 3% to $1.517 trillion.

Drop In Oil Price And Some More Mergers Lift Shares (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

Wall Street overcame early losses to close higher yesterday as a drop in oil prices and a fresh round of acquisition activity helped raise investors' confidence in the economy.

Gap, the clothing retailer, surged on a report that it was considering strategic alternatives for its business, which could include a sale. Some $6 billion worth of deals were announced, indicating that activity in mergers and acquisitions was off to a strong start in 2007 after reaching record levels last year.

Low energy prices also helped stocks reverse course from their earlier losses. Oil prices continued last week's decline, as a mild winter in the Eastern United States eased pressure on heating oil supplies. A barrel of light crude fell 22 cents, to $56.09, on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Investors turned their attention toward fourth-quarter earnings reports, which start today when Alcoa posts results. Several profit warnings from companies including the airline company UAL, the electronics maker Molex and the telecommunications firm Tellabs prevented indexes from gaining broader momentum.

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 25.48, or 0.21 percent, to 12,423.49. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index was up 3.13, or 0.22 percent, at 1,412.84, and the Nasdaq composite index added 3.95, or 0.16 percent, to 2,438.20.

Gap rose $1.37, or 7.3 percent, to $20.26, after CNBC reported the retailer had hired Goldman Sachs to plot its future.

General Electric agreed to acquire Vetco Gray, a supplier of equipment for oil and gas fields, for about $1.9 billion. Shares of G.E. fell 1 cent, to $37.55, in regular trading, but rose 5 cents after the close.

The pharmacy benefit manager Caremark Rx rose 29 cents, to $56.64. Late Sunday, it rejected a $26 billion bid from a rival, Express Scripts, preferring a $22.2 billion offer from the drugstore chain CVS. Express Scripts was off 8 cents at $68.78, while CVS rose 18 cents, to $31.35.

A profit warning from Molex sent shares down $1.52, or 4.9 percent, to $29.28. Tellabs, which makes telecommunications equipment, reduced its fourth-quarter guidance and its shares fell 47 cents, or 4.4 percent, to $10.25.

UAL, the parent of United Airlines, picked up 25 cents, to $46.80, despite saying it expected to post a loss during the fourth quarter because of December snowstorms in the Midwest. After trading hours, UAL dropped 9 cents, to $46.71.

Shares of St. Jude Medical, a maker of implantable defibrillators, climbed $1.95, or 5.57 percent, to close at $36.95 after it announced that fourth-quarter sales would come in at the upper end of its forecast. Analysts said St. Jude's announcement suggested that the market for the devices could be coming back.

St. Jude and two rivals, Boston Scientific and Medtronic, have struggled with falling sales since 2005 because of highly publicized safety problems. Medtronic's chief executive, Art Collins, said yesterday that his company planned to expand its presence in the implantable defibrillators market. Its shares rose 34 cents, to $53.70. Boston Scientific reported a 13 percent gain in defibrillator sales in the fourth quarter compared with the previous period. Its shares rose 71 cents, to $17.81.

Wal-Mart Stores dipped 39 cents, to $47, after it was downgraded by Goldman Sachs.

Bond prices were flat, and the yield on the 10-year Treasury note remained at 4.65 percent.

Following are the results of yesterday's auctions for three- and six-month Treasury bills:

Dow Industrials Gain 25.48 While Oil's Early Rally Fades (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

The stock market tiptoed higher, helped by a drop in oil prices, a speech by a central banker and upbeat comments from analysts on International Business Machines.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average inched up 25.48 points, or 0.21%, to 12423.49, off 0.3% on the year. Among the blue-chip indicator's components, the biggest gainer was IBM, which rose 1.5% after UBS analysts upgraded the technology bellwether to a buy rating from neutral.

The broader Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 0.22%, or 3.13 points, to 1412.84, off 0.4% on the year.

The Nasdaq Composite Index inched up 3.95 points, or 0.16%, to 2438.20, up 0.9% on the year. The tech-stock-led indicator's gains have been a rare bright spot for investors in this year's early going, which has otherwise been lackluster.

DOJ_NMG_0114444

"I think we're seeing a little bit of payback for an extremely strong fourth quarter," said Philip Schlakman, a managing director at J.P. Morgan Private Bank, referring to modest early-2007 losses in the S&P and Dow, which enjoyed a run of record closes late last year.

An early rally in crude oil yesterday spooked stock investors, as crude contracts for February delivery jumped $1.41 to their intraday high on supply concerns and forecasts for colder weather in the Northeast.

As the session wore on, however, the gains evaporated, reflecting the strong bearish sentiment that has gripped the energy markets since last week.

February crude-oil contracts finished down 22 cents, or 0.39%, at $56.09 a barrel, down 8.1% after just four trading sessions this year on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Stock investors generally like to see energy prices fall because lower fuel prices leave more money in consumers' pocketbooks, which helps the profits of most companies.

Investors also received good news yesterday on interest rates, another key area of concern. In a speech to the Atlanta Rotary Club, Federal Reserve Vice Chairman Donald Kohn said that inflation appears to be easing in the economy -- a signal to some investors that the way may be clear for the central bank to begin cutting its key interest-rate target soon.

Looking ahead, aluminum giant Alcoa, a Dow component, is due to announce its earnings after today's market close, kicking off the fourth-quarter corporate-earnings season.

Outside the U.S., stocks eased in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, declined 0.04%, or 0.09 point, to 239.53.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose.1 Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.75 billion shares, as 1,952 stocks advanced and 1,349 fell.

Bond prices fell.2 The 10-year note fell 3/32 point, or 93.75 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.658%.

The dollar was mixed.3 Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 118.75 yen, compared with 118.68. The euro rose to $1.3022, compared with $1.3003.

Reapportionment: Good News For GOP? (RC)

By Louis Jacobson

Roll Call, January 9, 2007

When Election Data Services late last month released projections of which states are poised to gain and lose Congressional seats based on the 2010 Census, Republicans cheered.

The numbers showed that GOP-leaning states in the Sun Belt continue to outpace the more Democratic Northeast and Midwest in population growth. But projecting whether the Republicans truly will gain ground after the post-2010 reapportionment requires a more micro-level look at the states in question.

According to the EDS, the states that are set to gain at least one seat after 2010 — if current demographic trends hold — are Arizona, Florida, Georgia, Nevada, Texas and Utah. Each voted for President Bush in 2000 and 2004, and the GOP controls both the Legislature and the governorship in Florida, Georgia, Texas and Utah. The GOP also controls one chamber plus the governorship in Nevada.

Here is a rundown of what may be in store in the states that could gain seats after 2010:

Arizona. On Nov. 7, the Arizona delegation shifted from 6-2 Republican to a 4-4 tie. Both new Democratic House Members — Reps. Gabrielle Giffords and Harry Mitchell — likely will get serious GOP challenges in 2008, and given the state's historical red tinge, Republicans will look to gain ground if new seats materialize after 2010. The problem for the GOP is that an independent redistricting commission, not the Republican-controlled Legislature, is charged with drawing the lines.

Currently, Republican and independent registration levels are healthy, said one GOP lobbyist in the state. But the growth of the Hispanic population — and the evolution of Latinos' political leanings — remains a wild card.

Florida. There's little question that the Florida GOP has worked hard to maximize Republican seats. But some demographic realities may make it harder for Republicans to do so in the future.

There are at least three factors that could play a role, said University of South Florida political scientist Susan MacManus. One is the growing number of independents, who account for almost one in four voters and whose voting patterns fluctuate tremendously, she said. Another factor — which already emerged in the 2006 midterms, she said — is population shifts from expensive areas of the state to more affordable jurisdictions.

And the third issue will have to do with how Florida Hispanics divide their vote. "Generational cracks are evident in the once solidly Republican Cuban population, and the non-Cuban population now outnumbers the state's Cuban electorate," MacManus said.

DOJ_NMG_0114445

Georgia. While few states have been moving as steadily in the Republicans' direction, partisanship may be less of a consideration during the next round of redistricting.

After an aggressive pro-Democratic map was enacted after the 2000 Census and a more pro-Republican map enacted by a newly installed GOP Legislature prior to the 2004 elections, Gov. Sonny Perdue (R) convened a task force to study how redistricting should be done in the future. Late last year the panel recommended the formation of an independent commission that would present maps to the Legislature for an up-or-down vote. It remains to be seen whether this idea will be enacted.

No matter what happens, Democratic Reps. John Barrow and Jim Marshall, who won very narrow victories in 2006, remain vulnerable for the foreseeable future.

Nevada. If the Legislature remains under divided control, as it currently is, the consensus is that Nevada probably will end up with its current allotment of one safe GOP seat, one safe Democratic seat, one competitive seat that Rep. Jon Porter (R) consistently has held, plus one newly created seat that will be competitive between the parties.

Even beyond the question of who controls the Legislature after 2010, it will be difficult for the GOP to craft a new safe GOP seat "because rock-ribbed GOP voters mostly live in rural Nevada," said Las Vegas-based political columnist Jon Ralston. "That's not growing and is now only 15 percent of the vote."

Given that reality, carving out another safe GOP seat would require not just creative line-drawing but also a dilution of the GOP strength in either the Porter seat or the district held by freshman Rep. Dean Heller (R). While the latter district is fairly solid for the GOP, it was competitive when it came open in 2006.

"The question really will come down to whether the state Legislature has the courage to make two districts out of rural Nevada, meaning that both would have some of Clark County, too," said one Republican in the state, referring to the heavily urbanized county that includes Las Vegas. "The debate will have more to do with whether rural Nevada will be better represented with a single Member or by having two Members looking out for its interests — but also for Las Vegas."

Texas. The re-redistricting pushed by then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R) prior to the 2004 elections may have made the Lone Star State Congressional delegation more reflective of Texas' GOP leanings, but it also may have maxed out potential GOP gains.

While Republicans may be able to flip a seat in 2008 by ousting DeLay's Democratic successor, Rep. Nick Lampson, the longer-term demographic trends point in the Democrats' direction. They are "little Anglo growth, pretty good increases in the black and Asian populations, and explosive Hispanic growth," said University of Houston political scientist Richard Murray.

Even if the Texas GOP operates with total control of the redistricting process, as is the case now, Hispanic-dominated areas in the Dallas-Fort Worth and Houston areas could benefit.

"A very big variable, of course, is who controls the presidency, and with it the Voting Rights Division of the Department of Justice," Murray said. "A Democratic DOJ would put great pressure on the Texas Legislature to recognize the additional 3 million Hispanics the census will count — they will go from 6.6 [million] to 9.5 million, Anglos from 10.5 [million] to 11.1 million — with additional urban-based seats."

In a special runoff last month, Republican Rep. Henry Bonilla lost his House seat to now-Rep. Ciro Rodriguez (D) following a Supreme Court ruling that required redrawing of districts to conform with the Voting Rights Act.

Utah. Unlike the other states on this list, Utah already has drawn a map with an additional district, as a preparatory step for proposed legislation that would add one Utah Congressional seat in tandem with one for the District of Columbia. The plan did not win passage in the 109th Congress, but it is given decent odds in the 110th.

The map approved by the Legislature appears to strengthen Democratic Rep. Jim Matheson, a frequent GOP target, by taking away most of the rural portions of his 2nd district. (Earlier proposals to try to create four winnable districts for the GOP fell by the wayside after pressure from GOP Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr., among others.)

"It's nearly certain that a new fourth seat will be safe Republican," said Utah-based GOP consultant LaVarr Webb. "If Democratic Rep. Jim Matheson is given a district that leans Democratic, then mathematically, the three remaining districts will be Republican. It would be possible to create four Republican-leaning districts, but since Matheson has shown he can win among Republicans, the prevailing sentiment in the Legislature seems to be to concentrate the strong Democratic areas — mostly around Salt Lake City and Park City — in his district, which leaves three strong Republican districts."

In the meantime, Iowa, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Missouri, New York, Ohio and Pennsylvania risk losing seats after the next Census, according to the EDS. The potential partisan consequences in these states remain a bit muddy, but Democrats will have to worry about potentially losing seats in hurricane-ravaged Louisiana as well as in Massachusetts, where a one-seat reduction almost certainly would result in a Democratic setback since the state delegation is now entirely Democratic.

On the other hand, if the Democrats can keep their winning streak going in New York, they may be able to erase the decades-old GOP hold on the state Senate. With unified Democratic control, they likely would be able to squeeze out a GOP Congressional seat.

DOJ_NMG_0114446

Setting aside the Congressional consequences of population growth and reapportionment, Republicans can feel safe look forward to one new favorable development after 2010. Gaining a seat each in Georgia, Texas and Utah essentially would give the Republicans three more assured electoral votes for president. Arizona, Florida and Nevada would offer electoral votes that are more competitive, even though these states lean Republican at the presidential level.

In Fla., GOP Hopes For Two Pick-ups Where It Just Suffered Two Losses (HILL)

By Sam Youngman

The Hill, January 9, 2007

Sid Dinerstein, chairman of the Republican Party of Palm Beach County, left for a Caribbean cruise Monday following a midterm election season that saw Republican losses in both of the area's congressional districts, one amid a national scandal.

"That's why we're going on the cruise," Dinerstein said. "We've had a hell of a year."

With Rep. Clay Shaw Jr. and state Sen. Joe Negron, who ran a late race for disgraced Rep. Mark Foley's seat, defeated, Dinerstein said he immediately turned his attention to reclaiming the seats in 2008.

Those districts, now represented by Democratic Reps. Ron Klein and Tim Mahoney, have already begun to draw serious interest from local Republicans looking at 2008.

Both races were close last year, with Klein defeating Shaw 51 percent to 47 percent, and Negron, despite having to run on the ballot as Mark Foley, narrowly losing with 48 percent to Mahoney's 50 percent.

In Mahoney's 16th district, Dinerstein said Negron is considering another run, and state Rep. Gayle Harrell, who stepped aside for Negron after Foley resigned with little time on the clock, said she is eyeing the seat as well.

"I am certainly looking at that possibility," Harrell said. "I'm looking at the whole situation, whether it's a primary or certainly the general."

For his part, Mahoney said he will fight hard for reelection. His early positioning and leadership on ethics reform — a fitting topic given the Foley scandal — could serve as a cornerstone issue for his reelection campaign, Mahoney said.

"My concern is much greater than the page scandal," Mahoney said, pointing to a comment piece he wrote about the need for congressional ethics reform months before the Foley scandal broke.

"The things I'm doing today are things I promised to voters more than 15 months ago, and that's only in the first two days," Mahoney said. "I think we're off to a very, very good start here."

As for Klein's seat, Dinerstein confirmed that Shaw would not try to retake the seat he held for 26 years, citing health issues and a desire to spend more time with his family. Dinerstein did say he has spoken with four potential candidates who "claim to be seriously interested."

Though he wouldn't disclose the names of those who might run, Dinerstein said he would meet with the four when he returned from his cruise and try to cut that number to two viable candidates.

Klein said he has already spoken with the new Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee chairman, Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.), about the need to start raising money and the importance of opening constituent offices quickly.

"We're hitting the ground running," Klein said. "I don't think anyone is taking it for granted. I'm certainly not."

Klein and Mahoney are two of five freshmen appointed to the House Financial Services Committee, seats that allow them to focus time and energy on the issue of rising homeowner insurance costs. In the hurricane-prone area of South Florida, such representation is crucial, Klein said.

As for the anger aimed at Republican incumbents, especially in these two Florida districts, Dinerstein said in many ways it was deserved.

"The voters down here were angry at us Republicans before the Foley thing," he said, adding that the party had virtually conceded their strongest issues of fiscal responsibility and ethics.

"All of the sudden, Republicans in Washington have found fiscal religion," he said.

Those issues aside, Dinerstein said the tsunami that was the Foley scandal remained in the district long after the national attention had moved to former Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). That said, Dinerstein believes that much of the local fury directed at the party has subsided, and that now is the time for the GOP to get back to its core issues of fiscal responsibility, ethics and strong foreign policy.

And while attempting to retake the two Florida seats they lost in 2006, Dinerstein said Palm Beach County Republicans' first priority is to deliver the notorious electoral area to a Republican presidential candidate in 2008.

The early polling leader and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani is Dinerstein's odds-on favorite to do well in South Florida.

"The people that I bump into love Rudy Giuliani," he said. "He's king down here."

DOJ_NMG_0114447

Giuliani, who stumped in the area twice for Shaw in 2006 and twice for President Bush in 2004, "owns South Florida on our side of the aisle and gets huge crossovers" from Democrats and independents for his desire to cut taxes and for "standing up to bad guys."

Dinerstein said some Republicans' concerns about Giuliani's social leanings are similar to those he saw with new Gov. Charlie Crist (R), which, in the end, fell by the wayside to a pragmatic GOP looking to retain the governor's mansion.

And while South Florida may be Giuliani territory, Dinerstein said he has heard that much of the rest of the state is excited about former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, whom the chairman is trying to lure to South Florida early this year for either a rally or a small meeting with area donors.

But Dinerstein said that like Giuliani, Romney's social leanings are of concern to many Republicans.

"Here's a guy who in the past minute and a half has gone from being a social centrist … to Jerry Falwell," Dinerstein said, adding that such perceived repositioning caused significant damage to Crist's primary challenger, Tom Gallagher.

Dinerstein said plans for an October 2007 straw poll — one way to determine the early leader for the state's crucial votes — are again in the works.

New Districts Cause Headaches For Ga. Reps. (RC)

By Elizabeth Brotherton

Roll Call, January 9, 2007

Aside from redoing the stationery, changing those office signs and reaching out to new constituents, there is one very important thing the four Georgia Representatives who switched district numbers for the 110th Congress have to deal with: misdirected e-mail.

In 2005 the Georgia Legislature decided to redo the state's Congressional districts. By the time the process was completed, four Members saw their district numbers flip — Republican Rep. Lynn Westmoreland exchanged the 8th district for Rep. Jim Marshall's (D) 3rd, while Rep. Nathan Deal (R), the former 10th district Representative, began to serve residents of Georgia's 9th, switching numbers with Rep. Charlie Norwood (R).

Mix those changes with new district lines, and it's a recipe for confusion.

"Our people are having to figure out who their Member is, for one thing," said Brian Robinson, Westmoreland's press secretary. "And we're having to reprogram the computer system to let it know who our constituents are."

The e-mail confusion mainly comes into play when constituents type their ZIP code into the "Write Your Representative" feature on the House Web site. While the computer can find the district, it is not aware of the number change.

"A lot of our mail is getting e-mailed to Jim Marshall's office, and a lot of Marshall's constituent e-mail is being sent to us," Robinson said. "We're having to work that out with the computer people."

And don't forget that the Georgia Members still have to deal with the other logistics that came with a new Congress in which leaders are promising to work five days a week.

"It is kind of challenging," said Doug Moore, communications director for Marshall. "We spent two terms being the 3rd district. Now they switch us to the 8th, so we have to get all-new everything. New letterhead, new business cards for everybody, even down to changing the voice mail that everybody has."

On the e-mail front, both Moore and Robinson said information technology staffers are working to correct the problem as quickly as possible, although overcoming the glitches isn't an easy task.

"I do feel for them, because it does seem like a gratuitous job," Moore said.

And until that work is done, the two offices plan to work together to deliver constituent e-mail, despite their party differences.

"Their hands are tied, too, because we have their constituent mail," Robinson joked. "We both have hostages to negotiate over."

While Marshall and Westmoreland are forced to exchange constituent e-mails, things are going a bit smoother for Deal and Norwood — but there's still work to be done.

Chris Riley, Deal's chief of staff, said the most difficult part of the transition came during the elections, because while Deal represented the 10th district, he was running for the 9th.

After Deal was re-elected in November, IT staffers were able to do much of the groundwork for the transition, Riley said.

"We haven't had that many hiccups," he added. "We may have a few, but those haven't been brought to my attention yet. ... That's not to say you can't go to our Web page and find a problem."

(In fact, as of Monday night, Deal's Web site still him listed at the 10th district Representative.)

For veteran Norwood staffers, the change to representing the 10th district might be a bit of a headache but isn't unheard of. Norwood has gone through three district-number changes and four redistricting efforts since becoming a Congressman in 1995.

DOJ_NMG_0114448

When Norwood first entered Congress, he actually represented Georgia's 10th district, which is geographically different from the 10th district of today.

"At this time, Charlie's represented probably a third of Georgia," said John Stone, Norwood's communications director.

With that experience, staffers knew ahead of time they would need to make the transition a priority. Last year, Norwood's office reached out to constituents through e-mails and news releases, letting those Georgians in counties affected by redistricting know whom their new Representative would be.

Marshall did the same thing, Moore said, paying particular attention to counties the Congressman wouldn't be representing once 2007 arrived.

"We have a lot of territory and counties we lost, so they still call us," Moore said. "A lot of time, they have a relationship with us."

After the 109th Congress adjourned, technology staffers began to go through Norwood's Web site, page by page, to make sure everything that needed to be changed to the 10th district was fixed, Stone said.

"We have to get everything changed over. We're doing it first on the Web, then stationery," Stone said. "There's still some cleanup work."

Of course, the district number confusion isn't just limited to office logistics. Many publications — including Roll Call — mixed up the district numbers in various election results articles and features, Robinson said.

"Every single major media outlet did that," Moore added. "I had to call and correct them repeatedly."

For his part, Riley predicted Morrison and Westmoreland would have their constituent e-mail reaching them soon.

"Mr. Westmoreland has the smartest IT guy on the Hill," Riley said. "So if Brian Tyson can't figure it out, it's hopeless for the rest of us."

Sununu Has Big Target On His Back (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, January 9, 2007

New Hampshire was good to Democrats last year, handing them both House seats in the midterm elections. Now the resurgent party thinks a Senate seat can be wrested from GOP control as well.

Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.) recently called first-term Sen. John Sununu (N.H.) one of the three most vulnerable Republican Senators up for re-election in 2008. His claim echoes what Granite State Democrats believe.

"I think Sununu will have problems in 2008 that go beyond [President] George Bush and goes to John Sununu, his voting record, and who he is," said Kathy Sullivan, chairwoman of the state Democratic Party.

On election night, when New Hampshire voters tossed out Republican Reps. Charles Bass and Jeb Bradley, Democratic activists immediately turned their attention to Sununu, saying "he's next," Sullivan related.

At least one potential Democratic challenger, Portsmouth Mayor Steve Marchand, is seriously readying for a bid.

Marchand, who turns 33 on Wednesday, said he's looking at the feasibility of a Senate run and determining if he can raise the considerable amount of money it will take to unseat Sununu.

"I have people in position to work on a campaign," he said. "I am interviewing folks and will continue to so that if and when we decide to do it, we're in a position to begin with a running start."

Marchand, who was first elected mayor of the 23,000-population seacoast town in 2005, said he will decide sometime in February.

Having worked on his own campaign and those of others, Marchand said he has "a good appreciation" for how challenging a Senate campaign will be. He has reached out to national and state Democrats and is looking at the financial picture.

While he has not spoken to Schumer yet, Marchand said doing so is a "high priority."

Other potential candidates include state Sen. David Gottesman (D) and Gary Hirshberg, president of Stonyfield Farm, the Londonderry, N.H.-based yogurt company.

Former Gov. Jeanne Shaheen (D), who narrowly lost to Sununu in 2002, has been touted as another top potential contender. But while she and her husband, David, remain active in Granite State politics, the former governor is the president of the Institute of Politics at the John F. Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University and is not likely to try again, knowledgeable Democrats privately concede.

"Jeanne is really enjoying her work with students and faculty at the Institute of Politics, and has no other plans at this time," said Esten Perez, communications director for the institute.

Hirshberg, who did not return calls for this story, is a regular contributor to Democratic candidates and parties.

DOJ_NMG_0114449

During the 2004 and 2006 cycles, he and his wife, Meg, gave $36,450 to candidates and parties, including $10,000 to the Democratic National Committee.

Gottesman just said: "At this time, I can only say that I have not ruled out any options that I have for elected office, but am focused on my job as a New Hampshire state Senator."

Democrats have just taken control of the New Hampshire Legislature for the first time in decades.

"After what happened in 2006, I don't think we'll have trouble finding someone to run," Sullivan said.

Sununu, who had more than $560,000 in his campaign account as of Sept. 30, did not address Democrats' enthusiasm about unseating him, nor was he ready to discuss the upcoming campaign in detail. Sununu spent $3.5 million on his first Senate race, and Shaheen spent $5.8 million that year.

Year-end campaign finance reports are not due until Jan. 31.

"As they have always been, our campaign in 2008 will be an aggressive town to town, person to person effort — strong on grassroots organization and focused on the issues that matter most to New Hampshire citizens," Sununu said in a statement.

Officials for the New Hampshire Republican Party declined to comment, as did the National Republican Senatorial Committee.

Meanwhile, Marchand already seems to have his sound bites and campaign themes ready.

He describes himself as fiscally conservative, moderate on social issues and progressive on environmental issues — a mix he says meshes very well with New Hampshire voters, who tend to be more libertarian than conservative or liberal.

"Sen. Sununu in general has become more conservative on many key issues over time, while New Hampshire continues to moderate in a lot of important ways," Marchand said.

As for his relative youth, Marchand, who previously worked for The Concord Coalition and the AARP, said he has enough experience to make up for it.

"I'll be 34 in 2008 and I'll have been a mayor," Marchand said. "That should trump being the son of a former governor."

Sununu's father, John Sununu, was a Republican governor of New Hampshire and chief of staff to former President George H.W. Bush.

"Sununu first ran for federal office in 1996 when he was 32 and never held elected office," Marchand pointed out.

At 42, Sununu currently is the youngest member of the Senate.

Sullivan said she thinks the 2006 elections may have represented a "fundamental change" in New Hampshire voting patterns.

Even so, New Hampshire soon will be caught up in the whirlwind of the presidential primary, which could take focus off the Senate race.

Sullivan said she does not think that will happen.

"We were able to unseat a first-term governor in 2004 during a very hotly contested presidential contest," she said.

Marchand said he thinks the presidential focus actually may bring more attention to the Senate race.

"I'd argue it's a unique opportunity to gain exposure," he said. "This is going to be a closely contested Senate for the foreseeable future and every seat is going to matter."

Party leaders, and presidential hopefuls, understand that and will not let the Senate race fall by the wayside, he said.

"I've had conversations with many [presidential hopefuls] personally, and certainly their staffs, and they understand how critical the race is," Marchand said. "The New Hampshire [presidential] primary can never be a hindrance."

Johnson's Re-election Plans On Hold (RC)

By David M. Drucker, Roll Call Staff

Roll Call, January 9, 2007

Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.), experiencing a slow but encouraging recovery from a Dec. 13 collapse, has put his re-election plans on hold, plunging a key Senate battleground into uncertainty.

A spokeswoman said Monday that the Senator's health will dictate whether a 2008 bid, which had been on track until illness struck, can eventually resume.

Johnson had long ago started raising money, and he was beginning to assemble a campaign staff and mull over when to announce his bid for a third term when he was hospitalized for a brain hemorrhage. Those re-election plans are now in limbo as his health and ability to wage what could be a very demanding Senate race are assessed.

"Things are on hold to prioritize the most important thing, and that's got to be his health," Johnson spokeswoman Julianne Fisher said. "It's just a matter of how long the recovery process is going to be. We're still in a holding [pattern] on that one."

Johnson, who turned 60 two weeks ago, had nearly $651,000 in cash on hand as of Sept. 30.

Despite Johnson's good standing at home and the fact that he held off now-Sen. John Thune (R) in a tough re-election bid back in 2002, the Democrat likely faced a battle in 2008 because of his state's strong Republican tilt and the fact that GOP candidates often have an advantage in South Dakota when they run in presidential cycles.

Thune, after losing to Johnson by 524 votes in the off year of 2002, beat then-Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle (D) by 2 points in 2004 while President Bush was defeating Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) by 22 points.

Johnson's ability to run a race that could be every bit as rigorous as his 2002 victory, when he and Thune spent a combined $12.1 million in a campaign for 334,438 total votes, could be determined not just by his overall health — which doctors say is improving — but by how long his recovery takes.

Patrick Davis, a Denver-based Republican consultant and native South Dakotan who served as political director of the National Republican Senatorial Committee in 2004, speculated that Johnson would ultimately choose not to run for re-election. He said the rigors required to wage a successful South Dakota Senate race — particularly in a presidential cycle — would be significant considering his current health problems.

"I don't think Tim runs again," Davis said.

The latest battery of tests conducted on Johnson last week indicated no traces of the condition that caused his illness. The Senator was diagnosed with a congenital blood vessel disorder known as arteriovenous malformation after being admitted to the hospital in December.

Johnson's aides said this week that Johnson was still breathing with the aide of a tube, though to a lesser extent than in recent weeks, as he is now able to breathe on his own most of the time.

For fear of appearing impolitic and insensitive, both Democrats and Republicans have been reluctant to comment on how Johnson affects South Dakota's status as a target on the 2008 Senate map, let alone the political plans of prospective candidates.

But it's clear that should Johnson choose not to run for re-election, a race that was sure to be hotly contested could get even hotter.

Rep. Stephanie Herseth, currently seen as the candidate Democrats are most likely to turn to should Johnson retire, has declined to go anywhere near the issue. Her spokesman would say only that Herseth looks forward to Johnson making a full recovery.

"It's too soon for any kind of speculation like that," Herseth spokesman Russ Levsen said, when asked if his boss would consider running for Senate if Johnson doesn't.

Steve Hildebrand, a Democratic consultant based in South Dakota and former Daschle adviser, argued that it's far too soon to discuss what happens if Johnson retires. He said Johnson's approval ratings were solid prior to his illness and that it wasn't necessarily a given that he was going to face a tough challenge from a formidable Republican.

The state has rallied around the Senator since his collapse, with churchgoers praying for his return to good health every Sunday, Hildebrand said.

With approval ratings that Hildebrand said are higher than Thune's and above what Daschle's were in 2004, Hildebrand believes only popular Gov. Mike Rounds (R) could pose a serious challenge to the Democratic incumbent. But Hildebrand described Rounds as risk-averse — a sentiment echoed by Davis — and therefore doesn't expect him to run.

"Any of us who firmly believe Tim will make a full recovery are not considering any 'what-if' scenarios," Hildebrand said. "All of us have hope and faith that Tim will be back in full health and running for re-election."

Republicans have five candidates who are considered by GOP sources to be serious contenders regardless of what Johnson does, beginning with Rounds.

Davis predicted Rounds would run only if Johnson retires. Davis said Rounds would be all but unbeatable if the seat opens up — including against Herseth, who he speculated would not run against the governor, as the 36-year-old Congresswoman's House seat appears to be hers for as long as she wants it.

Absent a Rounds candidacy, which would clear the GOP primary field, Republicans could be in trouble, Davis said. He believes South Dakotans as a whole are more likely to support a "middle-of-the-road" GOP candidate in 2008 than one positioned on the far right of the party, but he said such a candidate is exactly what the GOP will probably nominate if the governor doesn't run.

"I do think [Rounds] runs if it's an open seat. But I don't think he runs against Johnson — healthy or not," Davis said. "Johnson is a street fighter; he's a great, great politician."

Rounds, who was working Monday on his State of the State address, declined through a spokeswoman to comment on whether he is considering a run for Senate in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0114451

In addition to Rounds, the potential Republican field includes former Lt. Gov. Steve Kirby, who probably could afford to self-finance a Senate race if he chose to; current Lt. Gov. Dennis Daugaard; state Sen. Dave Knudson; and Public Utilities Commission Chairman Dusty Johnson.

Romney Makes It Official And Asks For '08 Cash In A Big Way (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

BOSTON, Jan. 8 — Presidential campaign fund-raising operations are usually run well out of public sight, reflecting their status as essential, if slightly unseemly, requirements for running for the White House.

That is what made what happened here early Monday morning striking. Over 400 people, including corporate executives, governors, wealthy Republican donors and party operatives, gathered around telephones and computer screens stretched out over a huge convention center room for a day of public fund-raising on behalf of Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor who created a presidential exploratory committee last week. Television camera crews and reporters circled the room as Mr. Romney's aides provided a running tally of how much had been raised.

For Mr. Romney, this high-tech fund-raiser, with new fund-raising software rolled out to mark the occasion, amounted to a public declaration for the White House, as he marched out with his family for his first major event since leaving the Statehouse.

And as Mr. Romney announced at day's end that he had drawn a $6.5 million one-day haul in cash and commitments, it was also a striking example of just how important fund-raising has become as a test for presidential viability, this year more than most, with the race dominated by high-profile candidates, most of whom are unlikely to participate in the public financing system.

"This has never been done before," Mr. Romney said, standing in the middle of an elaborate set, a wireless microphone planted on his body. "This is the most advanced technology ever employed as a fund-raising effort."

Politically, the display of fund-raising and organizational prowess was intended to put Mr. Romney back on the map after a tough month in which his conservative credentials have come under attack because of questions about his evolving positions on abortion and gay rights. If the immediate audience for this fund-raising event were his own supporters and the press, it was aimed just as much at other prospective Republican candidates. Those include Senator John McCain of Arizona and Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former New York mayor, but also some lesser-known candidates on the right, like Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas and Mike Huckabee, the former governor of Arizona, who have been emboldened at the sight of Mr. Romney struggling.

"It's going to send a strong message to McCain as well as to Giuliani, but also to all those other guys who might be thinking of getting in," said Thomas R. Tellefsen, who was recruited from the upper ranks of President Bush's fund-raisers to spend a day sitting in front of a computer screen.

Spencer Zwick, a longtime Romney associate who is now his national finance director, said: "We do know in political fund-raising, money talks, but early money screams. That's what we're trying to do."

No expense was spared for "The National Call Day" in the gleaming new Boston Convention and Exhibition Center. Callers were delivered boxed lunches at their seats. Huge video screens displayed a biographical film of Mr. Romney, who dutifully emphasized his opposition to abortion rights and same-sex marriage. The software, based on programs used by telemarketing sales forces, was designed exclusively for Mr. Romney and called ComMITT.

"People are waiting to see Ed McMahon flash up the latest number on the tote board," said Tom Rath, a veteran New Hampshire Republican leader who is a senior adviser to Mr. Romney.

The Romney campaign, indulging in a rather old trick from the political book, started off the day with a low-ball prediction that they would gather $1 million in pledges and commitments. With a group this large, and this well connected, a take like that would have been disappointing, so the final result gave Mr. Romney a chance to come out and announce he was "blown away" by the outcome.

Mr. Romney's supporters came armed with lists of friends and, in the case of politicians, their own contributors. A lot of internal planning had gone into the day, so the recipients of calls asking for donations of $2,100, the legal limit, were not surprised. And Mr. Romney was certainly not taking any chances. When it came time for him to make a fund-raising call, piped over the loudspeaker and in front of a crush of cameras, he chose to call his older sister, Lynn Keenan, at her home outside Detroit.

Still the image of, say, the governor of Missouri, Matt Blunt, sitting at one table, and the head of a major corporation dialing for dollars was certainly unusual.

"I've never done anything like this before," said Meg Whitman, the chief executive of eBay, in a break from her callers. "I start out by saying: 'You won't believe where I am! I'm at the Boston Convention Center with four or five hundred other people dialing for contributions for Mitt Romney.' "

DOJ_NMG_0114452

The figure put out by Mr. Romney includes pledges as well as checks, Mr. Romney's aides said they were confident that most of that money would also come in. It also was the result of going after what Mr. Tellefsen called "low-hanging fruit."

Mr. Romney laughed when asked if he thought the campaign would be able to keep up this pace, though he characterized it as an affirmation of the potential appeal of a candidate who remains relatively little-known outside Republican circles.

"I don't think $6.5 million a day is likely to be sustained," he said, adding, "This is not a big flash and disappearance."

Mr. Romney's advisers have said they would like to raise around $100 million before the primaries. With the presidential primary contests coming fast and early next year, there is a premium on candidates' raising money as quickly as possible so they can leave the telephones and be free to do public events in early primary states.

Romney, High-profile Friends Call For Election Cash (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

BOSTON -- Mitt Romney figured he needed something to wow the politicos for the first event of his young presidential campaign, so he put together yesterday's first-ever telemarketing fundraiser featuring governors and high-powered CEOs gathered together to dial for dollars -- more than $6.5 million raised in one day.

"I'm overwhelmed by the support, I'm heartened by the friendships and I'm optimistic about the future," Mr. Romney, a Republican, said as he announced the total to reporters yesterday evening, adding that it was a major statement about the ability to compete for "a guy who is not terribly well-known -- me."

It was an impressive entry for the former governor of Massachusetts into the so-called "invisible primary," the period before the actual 2008 primaries and caucuses, when candidates flaunt their fundraising prowess, show off their organizational skills and even try a few gimmicks to prove they can compete and to scare other potential candidates from entering the field.

"I think it's going to be a very strong message today to everybody -- I think it's going to be a strong message to [Sen. John] McCain as well as to [former New York Mayor Rudolph W.] Giuliani, and I think it's going to be a strong message to those that are considering or haven't really yet laid the groundwork," said Thomas Tellefsen, one of the co-chairmen of Mr. Romney's national finance team, naming the top Republican candidates in current primary polling.

Mr. Romney ended his term as governor of Massachusetts last week, the day after he announced formation of a committee to explore a run for president. An announcement on an official presidential committee is expected some time this winter.

In addition to yesterday's event to prove his fundraising credentials, Mr. Romney has also used this first official week to try to quell concerns among social conservatives about past remarks.

"Now, I wasn't always a Ronald Reagan conservative. Neither was Ronald Reagan, by the way. And perhaps some in this room have had the opportunity to listen, learn and benefit from life's experience -- and to grow in wisdom, as I have," he told a gathering of conservatives and major Republican donors in Sea Island, Ga.

"My life experience convinced me that Ronald Reagan was right. I'm a conservative that gets the job done. And you don't just have to take my word for it, you can just look at my record," he said.

While that weekend appearance was about honing a message, yesterday's event was all about proving fundraising and organizational skills.

The campaign rented out the grand ballroom at the Boston Convention and Exhibition Center and had nearly 400 stations set up with telephones and laptops computers for the high-powered callers to take credit-card information down on the spot.

After a legal briefing by the campaign's lawyer, an introductory inspirational video about Mr. Romney and some opening remarks from the candidate and his wife, the calls began. The callers -- among them Meg Whitman, the president and CEO of EBay, and Missouri Gov. Matt Blunt, a Republican -- called their own lists of friends and colleagues to ask them to contribute. The campaign said the volunteers made about 15,000 outbound calls.

"In political fundraising, money talks, but early money screams," said Spencer Zwick, the campaign's finance director.

Mr. Tellefsen, who was one of the elite fundraisers for President Bush in 2004, attended Harvard Business School with both Mr. Bush and Mr. Romney and said Mr. Romney "was much smarter than both of us."

"The president and governor and I were all in the business school, but he also was in the law school and he graduated in the top part of his class in both of those things," Mr. Tellefsen said.

Romney Kicks Off Fundraising Campaign (AP)

By Glen Johnson

AP, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114453

White House hopeful Mitt Romney and 400 of his backers raised more than $6.5 million on Monday in a glitzy fundraising blitz that will force all Republican rivals to take notice.

"They've come together and blown us away today, and humbled us at the same time," said the former Massachusetts governor as he clutched the hand of his wife, Ann.

The figure dwarfed the $2 million that Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., raised and the $1 million collected by former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani. Like Romney, the two have created committees exploring bids for the GOP's presidential nomination.

While Romney said he was not trying to send a message to anyone but his supporters, one of his national fundraising co-chairman disagreed.

"I think it's going to be a very strong message today — to everybody," said Tom Tellefsen, a classmate of Romney's at Harvard Business School and a top fundraiser for President Bush. "I think it's going to be a strong message to McCain as well as Giuliani, and I think it's going to be a strong message to those that are considering or haven't really yet laid the groundwork that maybe they should have."

The event at the Boston Convention & Exhibition Center featured a four-screen projection TV system hung from the center of a ceiling, displaying pictures that included Romney in the Oval Office and at the presidential lectern.

Besides the "National Call Day" event, Romney also sought over the weekend to shore up his support among evangelicals who have been dismayed to learn that he ran as a moderate for the U.S. Senate in 1994, as well as for Massachusetts governor in 2002.

He now is staunchly opposed to gay marriage, and says he supports a state-by-state approach to abortion rights.

"Now, I wasn't always a Ronald Reagan conservative. Neither was Ronald Reagan, by the way. And perhaps some in this room have had the opportunity to listen, learn, and benefit from life's experience — and to grow in wisdom, as I have," Romney said at a conservative gathering in Sea Island, Ga.

"My life experience convinced me that Ronald Reagan was right. I'm a conservative that gets the job done. And you don't just have to take my word for it, you can just look at my record," he added.

While Romney's presidential committee is still labeled "exploratory," he and his staff have made it clear they are in the race to win.

In e-mails sent last week, two of Romney's sons estimated he would need to raise $100 million to be among the "serious contenders" for the nomination. The stated goal on Monday was $1 million.

___

NEW YORK (AP) — Civil rights activist Al Sharpton said Monday he is seriously considering a run for president.

"I don't hear any reason not to," Sharpton, 52, said in an interview during an urban affairs conference sponsored by another civil rights leader, the Rev. Jesse Jackson.

"If we're talking about the urban agenda, can you tell me anybody else in the field who's representing that right now?" Sharpton asked. "We clearly have a reason to run, and whether we do it or not we'll see over the next couple of months."

Sharpton mounted a long-shot bid for the White House in 2004, in which his wit and fiery denunciation of President Bush often enlivened Democratic primary debates. He dropped out of the race after losing several state primaries and endorsed the eventual nominee, Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry.

Despite widespread interest in the likely candidacy of another influential black Democrat, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, Sharpton said he's heard little substantive discussion of issues that might influence his decision about running.

"Right now we're hearing a lot of media razzle dazzle," Sharpton said. "I'm not hearing a lot of meat, or a lot of content. I think when the meat hits the fire, we'll find out if it's just fat or if there's some real meat there."

Sharpton said the candidate who impressed him most so far was former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, who has made poverty the central issue of his campaign. Sharpton ran for the Senate from New York in 1988, 1992 and 1994, and ran for New York City mayor in 1997.

___

ORANGEBURG, S.C. (AP) — Democrats will hold the first debate of the 2008 campaign on April 26, 2007 in South Carolina.

The hour and a half debate will be held at South Carolina State University, a historically black college, and will be televised by MSNBC, state party officials said Monday.

South Carolina was selected as an early voting state in a move intended to add racial and geographic diversity to the early voting.

The university has a storied history in the civil rights movement. On Feb. 8, 1968, three people were killed and 27 injured after the South Carolina Highway Patrol fired on protesters demonstrating against segregation, an event known as the Orangeburg Massacre.

South Carolina's GOP plans its first debate May 15 at the University of South Carolina's Koger Center in Columbia.

___

Associated Press Writers Beth Fouhy in New York and Jim Davenport in South Carolina contributed to this report.

Romney Raises $6.5 Million In One-Day Blitz (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

Former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney raised $6.5 million for his presidential exploratory committee yesterday, sending a powerful message to his potential opponents about the seriousness of his bid for the Republican nomination.

Romney gathered about 400 of his largest financial backers for an all-day call-a-thon at the Boston convention center. The group included politicians such as Missouri Gov. Matt Blunt, former Massachusetts governor William F. Weld and former lieutenant governor Kerry Healey, as well as deep-pocketed fundraisers such as Utah billionaire Jon Huntsman Sr., eBay chief executive Meg Whitman and Tennessee money man Ted Welch.

The politicos and fundraisers hit up friends and colleagues, and many of them wrote their own checks to contribute to the day's total. Less than four hours into the effort, Romney had surpassed his goal of raising $1 million; 90 minutes later, he announced that more than $2.5 million had been collected and urged callers to "keep on dialing for dollars." The day's total included actual contributions and what a Romney spokesman called "signed pledges."

Romney has said he hopes to raise $100 million in 2007 to support his presidential aspirations. An internal campaign document for former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, which a rival campaign leaked to the media last week, set the same goal. By comparison, then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush collected $69 million in 1999 for his campaign.

That gap speaks to the increasingly high fundraising bar that a candidate must clear to be taken seriously in the 2008 sweepstakes. With such high-powered fundraisers as Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) likely to run, Federal Election Commission Chairman Michael Toner estimated recently that the 2008 race could cost as much as $1 billion.

Alex Vogel, a Republican lobbyist not affiliated with any of the potential candidates, described Romney's one-day haul as an attempt at "shock and awe," adding that the former governor is seeking to quickly dispose of questions about whether he can raise the money to be competitive with McCain and Giuliani in the primaries.

In some ways, Romney's dynamic day of cash collection is not terribly surprising because of the variety of connections he has built. He has ties to the business world, having been a top executive at the Boston-based consulting firm Bain & Co. After four years as governor and two years as chairman of the Republican Governors Association, Romney boasts deep roots in the GOP giving community. And his stewardship of the Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City in 2002 gave him access to a group of nonpolitical donors.

While the Romney campaign touted its huge one-day total, the planning for the event had been going on for some time.

Participants gathered for dinner Sunday night and after breakfast yesterday before they began their calls. Each person was supplied a laptop computer and given access to new sales-based software, known as ComMitt, developed for Romney's presidential exploratory committee.

"In a presidential campaign, it's one thing to talk about your organizational strength but it's another to showcase it," said Romney spokesman Kevin Madden.

Mitt Rakes In Dough, Proves His Political Viability (SLT)

By Thomas Burr

Salt Lake Tribune, January 9, 2007

BOSTON - Sending a clear signal he wants to be in the top tier of presidential candidates, and using showmanship skills honed in heading the 2002 Salt Lake Winter Olympics, Republican Mitt Romney amassed more than $7 million Monday in political pledges.

In a room flanked by flags from all 50 states, Mitt and Ann Romney brought the crowd to its feet and then, on their first day of fundraising, pulled in almost as much as then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush did during the first three weeks of his presidential campaign exploration in 1999.

Romney was out to show that he can raise money like a frontrunner, and he did. But the former Massachusetts governor also wanted to show he has support from across Former Massachusetts Gov., Mitt Romney, R-Mass. (Josh Reynolds/The Associated Press) the nation and is organized to mount a convincing campaign should he choose to run for the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0114455

"I'm overwhelmed by the support," Romney, a 59-year-old venture capitalist-turned-politician told reporters. "I'm heartened by the friendships and I'm optimistic about the future."

Romney's camp initially told reporters they hoped to collect $1 million at the event, a figure they reached by 11 a.m. MST.

Craig Holman is the campaign finance lobbyist for the government watchdog group Public Citizen and a critic of the bundling model pioneered by Bush and, it appears, perfected by Romney. Holman called Romney's one-day collection "tremendous" and "disheartening," noting it does not bode well for the future of public financing.

Advertisement

Still, Holman had to admire Romney's achievement.

"That puts him overnight on the steps of credible candidates," Holman said. "If he can raise that kind of money in one day, he's in the game."

That was the goal.

Some 400 Romney supporters - from the chief executive of eBay to Missouri Gov. Matt Blunt to enthusiastic bloggers - called friends and associates begging for donations in what Romney's staffers said was a novel approach in politics. The money raised was in donations by check or credit card or a signed pledge.

Supporters huddled around 40 horseshoe-shaped tables with IBM laptops and black phones at the Boston Convention Center dialing people from their Roladexes. A four-sided JumboTron carried images of Romney as he glad-handed the room and joined in to make the pitch on calls.

"Money talks but early money screams," Romney's national finance director, Spencer Zwick, said.

If Romney fully commits to the race, he needs momentum as he faces better-known opponents for the GOP nomination, mainly Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani. Political observers predict potential 2008 candidates need to raise $25 million to $30 million in the first three months, and up to $100 million this year alone.

It's unclear whether Romney's committee can sustain that kind of pace. Rich Hanley, director of graduate programs in the school of communication at Quinnipiac University, likened Monday's yield to that of a movie on opening weekend. "But it's ultimately not the opening weekend that matters. It's what happens after that."

Romney countered that he doesn't plan on making Monday's effort the standard, but that, "The opening box office is kind of important for a movie and the opening box office for a campaign is kind of important as well."

Earlier that morning, Romney emerged to the Goo Goo Dolls' "Give a Little Bit," and rallied his troops to call everyone they knew to help boost his vision for a "new American dream."

Some 15 Utahns, including Lt. Gov. Gary Herbert, entrepreneur James Sorenson Jr. and the state's lobbyist, Bill Simmons, were among the callers, and many of the supporters had worked with Romney during the Olympics. Richard and Linda Eyre, who write inspirational books, were there, as were executives from Utah companies Xango and Nuskin.

"It's not a hard sale in Utah because people know Mitt Romney," Herbert said during a break from his calls to friends back home. But his boss, Utah Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr., is supporting McCain.

Monday's dialing-for-dollars campaign wasn't just a Boston event.

Supporters around the country spent the day phoning potential donors from their homes and offices, Romney's longtime friend and Utah developer Kem Gardner said between fundraising calls. Gardner, who stayed in Salt Lake City to close a business deal, knows of at least 50 people in Utah who were working the phones. By 1:30 p.m., Gardner had raised $52,000, he said.

"It's coming in great from all over the country," Gardner said.

And that's key.

Romney, a member of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, must prove his support base extends beyond Utah and the Mormon community. Polls indicate he needs to raise his profile.

In a Jan. 1-3 CBS nationwide survey of 1,000 adults, 85 percent of respondents were either undecided or didn't know enough about Romney to even have an opinion. Of those who did have an opinion, twice as many respondents viewed him unfavorably (10 percent) as favorably (5 percent).

Romney's first call Monday, placed on speakerphone for everyone to hear, met with success. He phoned his older sister, Lynn Romney Keenan, in Bloomfield Hills, Mich., and could hardly get a word in as Keenan praised her brother for his success.

"This is an exciting day, isn't it?" she asked.

Romney didn't even finish his request for $2,100, the federal limit, before Keenan interrupted: "Of course."

Romney has a history of creative fundraising. To plug holes in the 2002 Olympics budget, he assembled a team of 20 "Utah ambassadors" to hit up philanthropists for donations.

DOJ_NMG_0114456

He also came up with the controversial idea to sell prime Olympic tickets and hotel rooms for several times their face value, in one case through an online auction in which the first set of 20 tickets sold for nine times their original price.

After the telethon, just about everyone there planned to meet at a hotel to watch the Florida Gators, coached by former University of Utah football coach Urban Meyer, face off against Ohio State for the BCS national championship.

Romney Event Nets More Than $6.5m (BOS)

By Scott Helman

The Boston Globe, January 9, 2007

Former governor Mitt Romney put on an unusual public fund-raising display for his presidential campaign yesterday, raising more than $6.5 million in an effort observers say was designed to intimidate rivals looking to challenge him for the conservative vote.

But one of those likely opponents, Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas, chose to highlight Romney's past moderate positions on abortion rights and gay rights, announcing that seven conservative Massachusetts activists will back him over Romney.

Romney's highly choreographed event, held at the Boston Convention & Exhibition Center, drew 400 of his biggest supporters, who spent all day soliciting money from friends and contacts around the country.

"They blew me away with their success," Romney told reporters at an evening news conference. "And we will be able to continue to build slowly but surely a highly successful financial effort and campaign. This is not, if you will, a big flash and disappearance."

Tom Tellefsen, a private investor from California and one of Romney's national finance cochairmen, said the daylong blitz would "send a very strong message" to others in the race, both to top-tier rivals such as Senator John McCain of Arizona and former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani, and to "those that are considering or haven't really yet laid the groundwork that maybe they should have."

But if that was the message, the Brownback campaign didn't get it. Spokesman Rob Wasinger said in an e-mail that Brownback's conservative record was "an asset that money just cannot buy" and released a list of activists who he said "are tired of all the compromise and double-speak and are eager to support a true conservative."

The list included Dwight Duncan of Cambridge, a professor at Southern New England School of Law; Anne Fox of Needham, a past chairwoman of Massachusetts Citizens for Life; and R.T. Neary of Medfield, a past president of Massachusetts Citizens for Life.

Neary explained his decision yesterday by saying that Brownback, who is expected to formally announce his candidacy Jan. 20 in Topeka, has "established credentials" on life issues. "Our governor, Mitt Romney, is a latecomer, if he is even a prolifer," Neary said.

In 1994 and 2002, Romney expressed support for abortion rights, but says he has since shifted to a "firmly prolife" position. The resurfacing of his remarks has stirred political trouble for Romney in recent weeks.

James Gilmore, a former Virginia governor and former chairman of the Republican National Committee, said at a GOP event last week that he intends to run as the race's true conservative, according to the Hotline, the political newsletter; Gilmore is expected to file papers today setting up a presidential exploratory committee. Governor Mike Huckabee of Arkansas is also eyeing a run as a conservative for the 2008 nomination.

But while Brownback, Gilmore, and Huckabee may challenge Romney for the conservative vote, none has built nearly the base of donors and activists in key primary states that Romney has. Observers say that if Romney can continue doing what he did yesterday, tapping into that infrastructure to raise millions of dollars, he could position himself as the one viable presidential candidate most palatable to conservative voters.

"That could be one of Romney's real advantages over the other candidates who are trying to market themselves to social conservatives," said Dante Scala, a political science professor at Saint Anselm College in Goffstown, N.H.

James A. Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University, said, "That's why he's doing this and getting out front and trying to marginalize some of those second-tier candidates."

Romney denied yesterday that he was trying to signal anything to his opponents.

"No message to rivals today," Romney said. "This is a message to Ann and me, to our family, and to our friends that what we stand for and what we're going to fight for has been heard, that our friends are behind us, that they're supporting us in remarkable ways. And that gives us the energy and the enthusiasm and the motivation to go forward with our message."

Romney's campaign said before yesterday's event that it hoped to raise $1 million, but it's clear it expected more. His supporters commanded a 38,000-square-foot room on the third floor of the convention center, which was filled with tables with phones and laptops.

DOJ_NMG_0114457

At the lead table was William F. Weld, former Massachusetts governor, who alternated between making phone calls and checking his BlackBerry, and Kerry Healey, former lieutenant governor, and her husband, Sean. "We're going to do our best to make sure that Mitt has the best send-off possible," Kerry Healey said yesterday morning.

After entering the hall to the Supertramp anthem "Give a Little Bit" (as covered by the Goo Goo Dolls), Romney spoke about why he was running and proceeded to a phone to make his first fund-raising call to his oldest sister, Lynn, who lives outside Detroit.

"How are you?" Romney asked her.

"Good, how are you, Mitt?" she said. "This is an exciting day, isn't it?" She pledged $2,100, the maximum allowable contribution.

Romney's army of volunteers used an Internet-based database built by his campaign that it's calling ComMitt, which allows fund-raisers to log donations and access information about Romney's positions on various issues. The idea, according to Romney finance director Spencer Zwick, was for his supporters to use their own contacts -- Christmas card lists, for example -- and not to be handed a list of names to cold-call.

"While you see every one person here at the phone, what's behind them . . . [are] legions of other people and other supporters that they've worked with," said Romney campaign spokesman Kevin Madden.

One of Romney's top advisers, Tom Rath, an influential Republican National Committee member from New Hampshire, told reporters yesterday that any serious presidential candidate must raise $60 million to $75 million this year.

Much of that has to be done in the next six to eight months, he said, before candidates are too busy doing events in primary states to headline many fund-raisers. "Early money is really the mother's milk to these things," Rath said.

Four of Romney's sons were also on hand for the fund-raising kickoff, including his oldest, Tagg, 36.

"I don't know that you can ever be totally prepared because you can't really know what's going to happen," he said. "But everyone understands that there will be personal sacrifices, that you give certain things up. And that's what's required right now."

Decisions On The Horizon (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny And Patrick Healy

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

Don't look for presidential announcements from Senators Barack Obama and Hillary Rodham Clinton anytime soon, but stay tuned.

At least that is the word from their associates. Mr. Obama, Democrat of Illinois, is not likely to say whether he intends to seek the party's presidential nomination until after President Bush's State of the Union address on Jan. 23. As he walked out of the Capitol on a recent afternoon, Mr. Obama only smiled when asked about his timing. Then, he rushed to change the subject.

Initially, Mr. Obama said he intended to announce his decision after returning from a holiday vacation in Hawaii, where he was visiting his grandmother and other relatives. Now, several people close to the senator say, he needs a little more time to make up his mind.

Still, Mr. Obama has been busy telephoning crucial Democrats in Iowa, New Hampshire and other states. There is, of course, only one reason for him to be making such inquiries.

Last week on Capitol Hill, Mr. Obama bumped into Ethel Kennedy, who has been a big admirer. When asked about him, she said, "He can't run soon enough."

Mrs. Clinton, meanwhile, plans to announce her decision in the next several weeks, her advisers say. According to several Democrats who have spoken to her, as well as advisers, Mrs. Clinton has given every indication that she is running, short of saying so, and no signals that she is not.

She is making phone calls to Democratic officials, labor leaders and supporters in early nominating states. And she continues to talk to possible consultants and donors, yet she has not made any travel plans to kick off a campaign.

Obama's Folly Of Youth Shouldn't Hinder Rise (USAT)

By Dewayne Wickham

USA Today, January 9, 2007

I knew it would come to this.

The widespread adulation that Barack Obama received with the release last year of his second book, The Audacity of Hope, pushed the junior U.S. senator from Illinois to begin making soundings about a run for the presidency in 2008.

And the initial response was downright giddy.

During visits to Iowa and New Hampshire — early testing grounds for presidential hopefuls — women swooned over Obama, and men rushed to be photographed with the man NBC News' Meredith Vieira called a political "rock star." Seasoned journalists gushingly spoke of Obama as a new force in U.S. politics who has chased everyone except New York Sen. Hillary Clinton from the field of viable contenders for the Democratic Party's 2008 presidential nomination.

DOJ_NMG_0114458

But Obama's meteoric rise felt the pull of a political black hole last week when The Washington Post reported that in an earlier book, he had admitted to using illegal drugs while in high school and college.

"Junkie. Pothead. That's where I'd been headed: the final, fatal role of the young would-be black man. Except the highs hadn't been about that, me trying to prove what a down brother I was. … I got high for just the opposite effect, something that could push questions of who I was out of my mind, something that could flatten out the landscape of my heart, blur the edges of my memory," Obama wrote about the reasons for his youthful experimentation with marijuana and cocaine.

Far from being a prelude to his flirtation with presidential politics, this admission came before Obama entered political life. It was a catharsis — the kind of revelation about a troubled time that can produce emotional freedom and moral rejuvenation.

But in the world of politics, such honesty often runs afoul of the holier-than-thou crowd. I suspect, it's why Bill Clinton, when confronted on the issue, admitted having smoked marijuana but tried to mitigate this offense by saying he never inhaled. And I think it explains why George W. Bush deflected questions about his suspected drug use by quipping: "When I was young and irresponsible, I was young and irresponsible."

Like many other young people of his generation, Obama experimented with illegal drugs. That's nothing to be proud of — and what he wrote in his first book, Dreams from My Father, doesn't come across that way. But it is a window into the thinking of a young man who, like his country, struggles with the issue of race and identity.

"Everybody was welcome into the club of disaffection," Obama wrote of that period in his life. "And if the high didn't solve whatever it was that was getting you down, it could at least help you laugh at the world's ongoing folly and see through all the hypocrisy and bullshit and cheap moralism."

Fortunately for Obama, he escaped that reckless period with no apparent, lasting damage. And fortunately for the rest of us, many Americans are willing to excuse such bad behavior by public officials when it happened in the distant past — and the person in question has moved on to a better life.

I don't know if Obama is of presidential timber. I don't know if he possesses the deep intellect, courage and character that this nation so badly needs in its chief executive. I don't know if he is as studious as he is bright; or if he is as feeling as he is outspoken about the problems of this nation's old and poor.

But what I do know is this: Given the candor and honesty with which he revealed his youthful drug use, and the fact that he did so long before mounting the national political stage, Barack Obama deserves to be judged on his public service, not some old demons.

He deserves to be given a chance to show us the kind of man he has become — and the kind of president he could be.

Roberta Wohlstetter, Codebreaker (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

When Roberta Wohlstetter set out, in the early 1960s, to explain why the U.S. had been surprised by the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, she confronted a puzzle that to some seemed like a conspiracy.

Unlike classic military surprises, the U.S. had received ample intelligence that the Japanese were prepared to attack the Hawaiian base. That nothing was done to remove American ships to safety was proof, for Clare Booth Luce among others, that Franklin Roosevelt had "lied us into war because he didn't have the courage to lead us into it." But Wohlstetter, who died Saturday at age 94, knew better, and she spelled it all out in "Pearl Harbor: Warning and Decision," perhaps the most important book ever written on military intelligence.

Yes, the U.S. had intelligence that Pearl Harbor was a potential Japanese target. But other intelligence suggested Siberia could be a target, or the Panama Canal, or the Philippines. Previous indications of an impending attack had served, like so many false alarms, to lower America's guard. And American planners had trouble believing the Japanese would launch a war against the United States that they couldn't possibly hope to win.

From this, Wohlstetter drew the essential conclusion that the U.S. failed to anticipate the attack on Pearl Harbor because, amid mountains of incomplete and often conflicting data -- what she called "noise" -- intelligence analysts couldn't distinguish the information that really mattered. This tended to lead, as the future Nobelist Thomas Schelling wrote in his preface to Wohlstetter's book, to "a routine obsession with a few dangers that may be familiar rather than likely."

The lessons are timeless, and foretold the findings of the 9/11 Commission. Contrary to the views of many so-called realists, nations do not always act from rational calculations of their self-interests: They can be reckless gamblers, something that should give pause to those who see nothing to worry about in the prospect of an Iranian nuclear weapon. And contrary to the instincts of many CIA "professionals," the best intelligence analysis requires judgment and imagination, not simply the widest possible data set.

DOJ_NMG_0114459

Wohlstetter was also remarkable not simply as a woman working in what was then a "man's field," but also as the wife and intellectual partner of the late Albert Wohlstetter, the legendary nuclear-strategy theorist. Both Albert and Roberta were great friends of this page, as well as great patriots.

Europe, US Squeeze Iran On Nuclear Plans (FT)

By Daniel DombeyAnd Gareth Smyth

Financial Times, January 9, 2007

Western Europe and the US are seeking to ratchet up pressure on Iran over its controversial nuclear programme in the wake of a United Nations Security Council resolution last month that declared almost all of Tehran's nuclear activities illegal.

Some European Union diplomats have indicated a growing readiness to impose additional bilateral sanctions on Iran above and beyond those mandated by the UN – a course of action long championed by the US.

One source of such measures is an "à la carte" list of possible EU sanctions on Iran drawn up by Javier Solana, EU foreign policy chief, almost a year ago. This includes a possible crackdown on export credits for companies doing business with Iran and the declaration of a formal arms embargo on Iran.

At the same time, the new UN regime – which took months to negotiate in New York – appears to have surprised parts of Iran's leadership, with differences emerging on how best to respond. After a period in which Iran saw its regional influence increase at relatively little cost, Tehran now faces greater isolation.

"We know that they won't meet their obligations to the UN during the 60-day deadline set by the resolution," said an EU envoy, referring to the resolution backed by the Security Council on December 23. "After that, a big issue is going to be what the EU and others can do beyond what the UN called for."

Many of the specific steps called for by the UN resolution are focused on preventing Tehran from acquiring "dual-use" goods that could be used in its nuclear and missile programmes. The resolution does not impose broad-based economic sanctions, but prohibits UN member states from financing Iran's nuclear activities.

However, it goes much further than the UN's earlier actions in outlawing a wide range of Iran's nuclear activities, including research and development and a heavy water reactor for which Tehran had requested UN funding only a few months earlier. The previous resolution – which carried a deadline of August 31 last year – had merely demanded that Iran suspend uranium enrichment, a process that can generate both nuclear fuel and weapons grade material.

A regime insider told the FT last week there was no chance Iran would accept the resolution within the 60-day deadline, and would go ahead with plans to extend the number of centrifuges – devices for enriching uranium – in the research plant at Natanz.

But pragmatists in Tehran have become bolder in pronouncements, because of their concern at the scope of the UN resolution and because of the reverse suffered by President Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad in elections last month. The mood has shifted but not yet policy," the insider said. "There may well be changes in the leadership's approach, but not immediately."

In December, Kazem Vaziri-Hamaneh, oil minister, admitted Tehran was having trouble financing oil projects in a rare acknowledgment of the economic cost of its nuclear dispute.

However, Germany, which currently holds the EU presidency, has reservations about further sanctions. "Responsible policy would be to look at how to bring this back to a political process rather than studying what else you can do in the way of sanctions," said a European diplomat.

Iran's Fars news agency on Monday ran a long interview with Hossein Mousavian, a former nuclear negotiator close to former president Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, in which he described the UN Security Council as the "highest international legislative authority" and criticised the government of Mr Ahmadi-Nejad for attacking the council's resolution as "illegal".

But on Monday, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader, reiterated that nuclear energy was "a source of pride for the Iranian nation and Islamic world" and that Iran would not give up its "right".

Iranian Leader Vows To Resist U.N. Sanctions (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

TEHRAN, Jan. 8 — Iran's supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, said Monday that Iran would not back down from developing its nuclear program, despite sanctions imposed by the United Nations Security Council last month.

Ayatollah Khamenei, 67, has the final word on state matters, including nuclear policies.

He was making his first public appearance since rumors spread on several Web sites on Thursday that he had died.

"The Iranian people will definitely not give up their right and the authorities have no right to give up this great achievement," Ayatollah Khamenei said, addressing a crowd in Qum, 82 miles south of Tehran.

DOJ_NMG_0114460

The Security Council passed a resolution on Dec. 23 with sanctions intended to curb Iran's uranium enrichment program, which Iran says is for peaceful purposes but the United States and some European nations contend is for the purpose of creating nuclear weapons. The measure bars the trade of goods or technology related to Iran's nuclear program. Enriched uranium can be used for making nuclear fuel but also for making nuclear weapons.

The resolution also gave Iran a two-month deadline to halt the program or face tougher sanctions.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has also brushed off the resolution and vowed that Iran will not suspend the nuclear program.

In his remarks, Ayatollah Khamenei also warned neighboring Arab countries not to join an alliance with the United States and Britain against Iran.

"The nuclear program is a native achievement and is a source of pride for Iran and the Islamic world," Ayatollah Khamenei said.

"If some Arab and Islamic governments think that by joining an alliance with Britain and the United States and imposing sanctions on Iran they can earn the satisfaction of the Zionist regime, they should know that they are making a political blunder," he said.

Israeli Defense Minister Proposes New Peace Plan (AFP)

AFP, January 9, 2007

Israeli Defense Minister Amir Peretz has proposed a fresh plan for peace in the Middle East that includes talks on the future borders of a Palestinian state within six months, army radio said.

"We need a new roadmap which will combine the Saudi initiative with the larger principles of the (current) roadmap," Peretz was quoted as telling a meeting of Labour MPs on Monday.

Peretz's three-stage plan calls for the creation of a new economic and security policy vis-a-vis the Palestinians, negotiations on a future Palestinian state to begin within six months and negotiations on the details of a final accord to take place over 18 months.

The long-stalled "roadmap" to peace agreed by the Middle East quartet of the United States, European Union, Russia and the United Nations also calls for a three-stage solution.

The Saudi initiative, which stipulated a normalization of ties after Israel vacates its post-1967 conquests, was endorsed by the Arab League at its 2002 summit in Beirut but was rejected by Israel.

Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni last month announced she was spearheading a new peace initiative that "offers a complete solution to the problem of the Palestinian people and the Palestinian refugees," though she offered few details.

Fatah Frees Kidnapped Hamas Official (AP)

By Ali Daraghmeh

AP, January 9, 2007

Fatah gunmen on Monday released a top Hamas official after holding him hostage for two days and displaying him in an al-Qaida like video, but factional tensions remained high as pro-Fatah militants torched stores owned by Hamas sympathizers.

The firebombings marked the first time that militants have targeted civilians in the West Bank, widening the political violence in the Palestinian areas.

Until this week, most of the violence centered on the Gaza Strip, where more than 30 people have been killed in clashes between forces loyal to the rival groups. Now Fatah militants in the West Bank have begun retaliating for Hamas attacks in Gaza.

At a news conference in Gaza after sundown Monday, Hamas official Fawzi Barhoum said Fatah was trying to violently oust the Hamas-led Palestinian government. "We will not allow those seeking a coup to drag our people into the flames of a civil war, and will never let them drag our people into a family war," Barhoum said.

Another Hamas official, Ismail Radwan, called on Palestinians to use their weapons against Israel, not each other.

On Monday evening, former Finance Minister Salam Fayyad, a political independent who served in the Fatah-led Cabinet, said gunmen fired on his office earlier in the day. Police investigating the shooting said one of Fayyad's bodyguards accidentally discharged his weapon.

The kidnapping of Mahdi al-Hanbali, a top Hamas official in the West Bank's commercial center of Nablus, was the strongest sign yet that fighting could soon reach the West Bank.

Al-Hanbali, unshaven and his shoes covered in mud, was hoisted on the shoulders of his supporters inside the city council after his release. He said he was not hurt in captivity, but he appeared nervous during a news conference, twitching his lips and fidgeting.

DOJ_NMG_0114461

"They treated me well. They didn't ask me for anything special," he told reporters. He thanked Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, of Fatah, and other officials for working for his release.

His captors released a video on Sunday showing him surrounded by masked gunmen. In the video, resembling tactics used by Iraqi insurgents, the captors threatened widespread attacks against Hamas targets.

Fatah militants, in return, threatened more attacks against Hamas.

"Any attack on a Fatah member or a Fatah institution will have a response in the West Bank, and a violent one too," Nasr al-Kharaz, a Fatah militant, told the Associated Press. Hamas' stronghold is in Gaza, while Fatah is stronger in the West Bank.

Fatah and Hamas have been in a vicious power struggle since the Islamic group defeated Fatah in parliamentary elections last year. Hamas controls the legislature and most government functions, while Fatah holds the powerful presidency.

Abbas, a moderate, favors peace talks with Israel, while Hamas rejects the Jewish state's right to exist, despite an international boycott against its government. Abbas has urged Hamas to join Fatah in a more moderate unity government, but months of negotiations collapsed in late November, sparking the latest round of factional violence.

In the West Bank town of Ramallah on Monday, Fatah militants set fire to six stores belonging to Hamas supporters, security officials said. A large clothing store and a money changing shop were destroyed, the officials said.

In the town of el-Bireh, outside Ramallah, militants fired shots at the house of the Hamas-allied mayor, the officials said, speaking on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak to the media. No one was hurt.

Don't Play With Maps (NYT)

By Dennis Ross

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

Washington

I BECAME embroiled in a controversy with former President Jimmy Carter over the use of two maps in his recent book, “Palestine Peace Not Apartheid.” While some criticized what appeared to be the misappropriation of maps I had commissioned for my book, “The Missing Peace,” my concern was always different.

I was concerned less with where the maps had originally come from — Mr. Carter has said that he used an atlas that was published after my book appeared — and more with how they were labeled. To my mind, Mr. Carter’s presentation badly misrepresents the Middle East proposals advanced by President Bill Clinton in 2000, and in so doing undermines, in a small but important way, efforts to bring peace to the region.

In his book, Mr. Carter juxtaposes two maps labeled the “Palestinian Interpretation of Clinton’s Proposal 2000” and “Israeli Interpretation of Clinton’s Proposal 2000.”

The problem is that the “Palestinian interpretation” is actually taken from an Israeli map presented during the Camp David summit meeting in July 2000, while the “Israeli interpretation” is an approximation of what President Clinton subsequently proposed in December of that year. Without knowing this, the reader is left to conclude that the Clinton proposals must have been so ambiguous and unfair that Yasir Arafat, the Palestinian leader, was justified in rejecting them. But that is simply untrue.

In actuality, President Clinton offered two different proposals at two different times. In July, he offered a partial proposal on territory and control of Jerusalem. Five months later, at the request of Ehud Barak, the Israeli prime minister, and Mr. Arafat, Mr. Clinton presented a comprehensive proposal on borders, Jerusalem, Palestinian refugees and security. The December proposals became known as the Clinton ideas or parameters.

Put simply, the Clinton parameters would have produced an independent Palestinian state with 100 percent of Gaza, roughly 97 percent of the West Bank and an elevated train or highway to connect them. Jerusalem’s status would have been guided by the principle that what is currently Jewish will be Israeli and what is currently Arab will be Palestinian, meaning that Jewish Jerusalem — East and West — would be united, while Arab East Jerusalem would become the capital of the Palestinian state.

The Palestinian state would have been “nonmilitarized,” with internal security forces but no army and an international military presence led by the United States to prevent terrorist infiltration and smuggling. Palestinian refugees would have had the right of return to their state, but not to Israel, and a fund of $30 billion would have been created to compensate those refugees who chose not to exercise their right of return to the Palestinian state.

When I decided to write the story of what had happened in the negotiations, I commissioned maps to illustrate what the proposals would have meant for a prospective Palestinian state. If the Clinton proposals in December 2000 had been Israeli or Palestinian ideas and I was interpreting them, others could certainly question my interpretation. But they were American ideas, created at the request of the Palestinians and the Israelis, and I was the principal author of them. I know what they were and so do the parties.

DOJ_NMG_0114462

It is certainly legitimate to debate whether President Clinton's proposal could have settled the conflict. It is not legitimate, however, to rewrite history and misrepresent what the Clinton ideas were.

Indeed, since the talks fell apart, there has emerged a mythology that seeks to defend Mr. Arafat's rejection of the Clinton ideas by suggesting they weren't real or they were too vague or that Palestinians would have received far less than what had been advertised. Mr. Arafat himself tried to defend his rejection of the Clinton proposals by later saying he was not offered even 90 percent of the West Bank or any of East Jerusalem. But that was myth, not reality.

Why is it important to set the record straight? Nothing has done more to perpetuate the conflict between Arabs and Israelis than the mythologies on each side. The mythologies about who is responsible for the conflict (and about its core issues) have taken on a life of their own. They shape perception. They allow each side to blame the other while avoiding the need to face up to its own mistakes. So long as myths are perpetuated, no one will have to face reality.

And yet peace can never be built on these myths. Instead it can come only once the two sides accept and adjust to reality. Perpetuating a myth about what was offered to justify the Arafat rejection serves neither Palestinian interests nor the cause of peace.

I would go a step further. If, as I believe, the Clinton ideas embody the basic trade-offs that will be required in any peace deal, it is essential to understand them for what they were and not to misrepresent them. This is especially true now that the Bush administration, for the first time, seems to be contemplating a serious effort to deal with the core issues of the conflict.

Of course, one might ask if trying to address the core issues is appropriate at a moment when Palestinians are locked in an internal stalemate and the Israeli public lacks confidence in its government. Can politically weak leaders make compromises on the issues that go to the heart of the conflict? Can the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, compromise on the right of return and tell his public that refugees will not go back to Israel? Can Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, tell his public that demography and practicality mean that the Arab neighborhoods of East Jerusalem will have Palestinian and not Israeli sovereignty?

The basic trade-offs require meeting Israeli needs on security and refugees on the one hand and Palestinian needs on territory and a capital in Arab East Jerusalem on the other. But producing such trade-offs won't simply come from calling for them. Instead, an environment must be created in which each side believes the other can act on peace and is willing to condition its public for the difficult compromises that will be necessary.

So long as mythologies can't be cast aside, and so long as the trade-offs on the core issues can't be embraced by Israelis or Palestinians, peace will remain forever on the horizon. If history tells us anything, it is that for peace-making to work, it must proceed on the basis of fact, not fiction.

Condi Gets Israel's R-E-S-P-E-C-T (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

Last Friday, a senior delegation of U.S. defense officials was briefed in Jerusalem by members of the Knesset's Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee on Israel's threat perceptions in the wake of last summer's failed war with Hezbollah. The Israelis warned that the Syrian army is at its highest state of readiness since 1982, when the two sides clashed over Lebanon. They also warned that Egypt is actively funneling arms to Hamas in Gaza. The claim astonished the Americans. Why, they asked, had they never been told of it through formal Israeli channels?

Ties between Israel and the U.S. are famously friendly, and as in many friendships the demands of comity often get in the way of those of frankness -- as in Israel's official reluctance to expose its peace with Egypt as a sham. That's a lesson Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice might keep in mind as she plans her forthcoming Mideast tour, beginning later this week in Jerusalem and Ramallah and moving on to Amman, Cairo, Riyadh and Kuwait, and perhaps Beirut or Baghdad.

The trip is yet another effort to rally Sunni Arabs on behalf of the government of Iraq, first of all by showing the U.S. intends to make a major push toward an Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement. Perhaps that will impress the secretary's Arab hosts. But it doesn't impress the Israelis, who unofficially bill Ms. Rice's visit as tihzuk, or "maintenance," an attitude nicely captured by a popular Israeli comedy skit in which an actress playing Ms. Rice belts out Aretha Franklin's "Respect" while a stand-in for Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni sings back-up vocals.

Respect of the "Yes, Minister" kind is what Ms. Rice can mainly expect on her visit to Jerusalem. Sure, optical diplomacy -- the diplomacy of being seen to try -- has its political uses, especially when it comes to papering over differences or waiting on events.

But circumstances always impose limits on what diplomacy can achieve, and in the case of the Israeli-Palestinian peace process the limits are sharp. In Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, Ms. Rice confronts a leader who, as the Israeli political analyst Anshel Pfeffer puts it, has "all the practical authority of the Chicago chief of police circa 1925." Never mind the internecine killing sprees, now approaching outright civil war, between Hamas and Mr. Abbas's ostensible partisans in Fatah. The real problem is that Mr. Abbas no longer controls Fatah, where effective authority has devolved to local chieftains and power-brokers like the suave Gaza security chief Mohammed Dahlan.

DOJ_NMG_0114463

On the Israeli side, the government of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is probably the weakest in the country's history. In a recent poll, Israelis disapproved of Mr. Olmert's job performance by a three-to-one margin; 60% doubt his personal integrity because of questions surrounding a shady real-estate deal. The rest of his government is also marinating in scandal; it does not have the political capital to spare on bold diplomatic moves.

The larger problem for Israel is strategic. Until Ariel Sharon suffered a stroke a year ago last week, and for a few months thereafter, Israelis were broadly prepared to make significant unilateral withdrawals from the West Bank, not because they thought the Palestinians were prepared to make peace but because they believed that Israel was more secure putting its enemies on the opposite side of its borders.

But Israel's manifest vulnerability last summer in the face of Hezbollah's rocket attacks -- coupled with its failure to defeat the threat -- raises reasonable questions about that assumption. If Israel faces a missile threat along its border with Gaza as well as one on its border with Lebanon, should it then allow a third front to be created along its much longer border with the West Bank? Nor were Israeli insecurities assuaged when Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak declared, after last Thursday's summit meeting with Mr. Olmert, that he would do nothing to stop money transfers to Hamas coming through the Sinai, and that he might well consider building a nuclear arsenal of his own if Israel and Iran were to be seen getting into an arms race.

The upshot is that even if America's predicaments in Iraq really could be eased by the appearance of progress on the Israeli-Palestinian front, such progress is exceedingly unlikely to happen. Yes, the administration can try to bolster Mr. Abbas by supplying funds through which he can extend his patronage, and perhaps enhance his authority and prestige, at the expense of Hamas. But tens of millions of dollars have already gone down that hole without plugging the drain. As for Israel, the U.S. might help Mr. Olmert by demanding of Mr. Mubarak that he cut off the flow of funds to Hamas and take more aggressive steps to prevent the flow of arms. Frankly, the best the U.S. can hope for is the collapse of Mr. Olmert's crippled and feckless government, something that may take another year.

In the meantime, Ms. Rice surely has better things to do than to chase after this fool's gold of international diplomacy. Contrary to the views of much of her bureaucracy, the U.S. cannot, as former National Security Adviser Brent Scowcroft advised in a recent op-ed, merely butt Israeli and Arab heads together and arrive, through an act of American leadership, at a negotiated compromise that has already eluded American diplomats going back to the Eisenhower administration.

When Ms. Rice arrives in Jerusalem, she will no doubt mouth the pieties that have now defined American policy in the Middle East for a generation -- an Israeli and a Palestinian state living side by side in peace and security -- along with some of the Bush administration's coinage: democracy, respect for human rights, an absolute cessation to terrorism. These are the right pieties, and the Israelis will surely mouth them as well.

But perhaps her case, and Israel's, would be better served by a bit of mutual frankness. As with the Palestinians, Israel's problems today are largely of its own making, and no amount of U.S. diplomacy is going to save the respective sides from themselves. On the other hand, nothing Israel can give by way of concessions to the Palestinians is going to make much of a difference in terms of America's credibility in Baghdad, Beirut, Cairo, Kabul or anywhere else on the proverbial Arab street. Maybe once that is mutually understood, r-e-s-p-e-c-t will actually spell respect for Ms. Rice.

A Green Line In The Sand (NYT)

By David Newman

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

Beersheba, Israel

NEARLY 40 years after it was removed from official maps, atlases and school books, the Green Line has made a significant comeback. Israel's education minister, Yuli Tamir, has ordered the Green Line border, which separates Israel from the West Bank, to be reintroduced in all texts and maps used in the Israeli school system. From now on, Israeli children will know exactly where the Green Line is and what it signifies — a political border that, at some point, will almost certainly become the line separating neighboring Israeli and Palestinian sovereign territories.

It was shortly after the Six-Day War of 1967 that the Green Line was removed from atlases produced by the Israeli government. The border, hastily drawn at the Rhodes armistice talks after Israel's war of Independence in 1948, had always been regarded as nothing more than an artificial line of separation eventually to be reworked. For most Israeli leaders in 1967, the occupation of the West Bank was a sign that the future territorial order would be vastly different from the one they had lived with for the previous 19 years.

DOJ_NMG_0114464

According to Abba Eban — Israeli ambassador to the United States and the United Nations in the 1950s and foreign minister at the time of the Six-Day War — his attempts to negotiate with the Arab states to transform the border into a permanent recognized international boundary had been rejected in the early 1950s by Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion, who had argued that the more elastic and less permanent the boundary, the easier it would be to change in the future — as indeed seemed to be the case in the aftermath of the 1967 war.

The Green Line's removal from maps was meant to signify that it existed no longer, but in reality it never disappeared. It remained the administrative boundary separating Israel from the occupied territories, with one law for the Jewish and Arab citizens of Israel, and quite another one for the stateless Palestinian residents of the West Bank. Even Israeli settlers who moved to the occupied territories and continued to enjoy Israeli citizenship were ultimately subject to the military authorities — just to show the world that Israel had not formally annexed these territories or, as the Israeli government preferred to put it, had extended civilian law to these areas over which they did not enjoy sovereign rights.

But in the past decade, for most Israelis, the Green Line has once again become the line separating the relatively safe roads of Israel from the danger of the West Bank. Few Israelis, other than the settlers, venture beyond it, even when doing so would make their route shorter. It is along the Green Line that the unilateral West Bank separation barrier has been constructed in large sections.

Where the barrier has deviated from the Green Line, in practice annexing some parts of the West Bank to Israel, the International Court of Justice has ruled it illegal. Many Palestinians are caught in a state of territorial limbo: they live east of the Green Line inside the West Bank, but west of the separation barrier, in effect spatial hostages to this exercise in redrawing the border.

At last year's Herzliya Conference, an annual gathering arranged by the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya and attended by the prime minister and leading political figures, a group of Israeli geographers, planners and cartographers proposed that the Green Line serve as the foundation for any future territorial agreement, based on the principles of the road map and a two-state solution to this never-ending conflict. They identified certain areas along the line where, given the variations that have occurred during almost 40 years of occupation, territorial exchanges could be made between the two sides — as opposed to returning to a line that even 60 years ago was not ideal and that today is out of touch with the region's demographic realities.

The international legal status of the Green Line is not clear. On the one hand, it is no more than an armistice line — it is not a recognized boundary, unlike the borders separating Israel from both Egypt and Jordan, which were drawn up and ratified as part of peace agreements. Yet the Oslo accords make mention of the West Bank as constituting the future Palestinian state. This region has a clearly defined boundary — the Green Line — and many international jurists argue that this is sufficient to recognize it as the formal line of political separation. The jurists' time in court is yet to come, but the groundwork has already been prepared by international boundary experts on both sides.

If some Israelis were unclear about the long-term significance of the Green Line, the education minister's decision to return the border to the geography and history textbooks will have left no one in doubt.

There may never be peace in this troubled region. But if there is to be a return to the negotiation table, the issue of boundary demarcation will be of paramount importance in determining the territorial configuration of the respective sovereignty to be practiced by each of the two states. On the ground, there are many reasons for drawing a completely new line, but it will always be easier for the politicians to return to what was once — however briefly — there. The Green Line is the default boundary, and it has finally been recognized anew by the Israeli government.

Bush: Important To Complete Doha Talks (AP)

By Foster Klug

AP, January 9, 2007

President Bush and European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso agreed Monday that the United States and Europe must resolve deep differences over farm subsidies that are stalling global free trade talks.

"We both recognize that the best way to help impoverished nations is to complete this Doha Round," Bush said, referring to the world trade talks, "and to encourage the spread of wealth and opportunity through open and reasonable and fair trade." Bush spoke after he and Barroso met at the White House.

Barroso said the two leaders instructed their negotiators "to come up with a solution as soon as possible."

"There is now the defining moment. We are really at defining moment," he said. "It will be a very important signal for the world community if we show that it is possible to have a global approach to trade and development."

The two talked in the Oval Office for nearly an hour, and then continued meeting over lunch.

DOJ_NMG_0114465

The World Trade Organization talks collapsed in July, in a disagreement over how much the European Union, the United States and other wealthy countries should reduce the farm subsidies and tariffs that poorer nations in Africa, Asia and Latin America say prevent them from selling their agricultural goods abroad.

Before leaving for Washington, Barroso said "the U.S. holds the key to making a deal possible in 2007."

The United States was criticized for refusing to cut the government handouts it pays American farmers. But Washington partly blamed the standstill on the European Union for refusing to make deeper cuts in tariffs on agricultural imports.

Supporters of a trade deal are eager to find a resolution to the impasse. The Democrat-controlled Congress will consider this year whether to extend Bush's authority to negotiate trade deals that can be submitted to Congress for simple yes-or-no votes without amendments.

The loss of the that "fast-track" authority, set to expire in July, would make it much harder for any treaty to gain congressional approval, without which any global trade deal would be meaningless.

Barroso also met with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

Barroso, who had been expected to push Bush to sign on to international efforts to combat global warming, issued a gentle nudge in public.

"When you think about climate change, it's not just about the environment. Of course, the environment is crucially important, but it is also about global security. It's also about economic development and sustainability," Barroso said. "And so we are hoping to deepen our dialogue on climate change, on technologies, on curbing emissions, on progress in terms of energy efficiency, energy security."

Bush did not mention global warming specifically, but nodded while Barroso spoke.

The president spoke only about "the importance of energy independence and at the same time being wise stewards of the environment. " As he usually does, he said new technologies are the key to making that happen.

The two also talked about the Israeli-Palestinian dispute, Iran, Syria and Iraq.

Bush and Barroso planned to spend some of the lunch discussing the situation in Sudan's wartorn Darfur region.

"It is outrageous that people are being treated the way they are," Bush said.

Added Barroso, who said he visited Darfur recently: "We cannot accept that tragedy going on without a firm, united response of the international community."

Bush, Barroso Discuss Trade, Darfur (AFP)

AFP, January 9, 2007

European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso said he and President George W. Bush agreed stalled Doha trade talks had hit a "moment of truth" and urged action to end the Darfur "tragedy." Bush welcomed Barroso to the White House for talks which also ranged through climate change, a controversial US visa waiver program, European Union enlargement and the crisis in Iraq.

The US president said he and Barroso had discussed efforts to revive the so-called Doha Round of World Trade Organization talks, now hung up by a dispute over agricultural subsidies.

"We talked about the importance for Europe and the United States to resolve any differences we have when it comes to the Doha round for trade, so that we can promote international trade," said the US president.

"We believe we can achieve more if we look at it in a comprehensive manner," Barroso said during a joint public appearance in the Oval Office.

"We are really at defining moment, and we had a very good exchange, and we gave instructions to all negotiators to come with a solution as soon as possible," said Barroso.

Later, at a press conference, Barroso told reporters the Doha round talks had reached a critical point for the world's largest economic partners, which trade more than one billion dollars a day in goods.

"President Bush and I agreed that we now face a moment of truth if we want to make progress on the Doha trade negotiations," Barroso said, as EU Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson met US Trade Representative Susan Schwab.

"We risk losing all the substantial economic benefits that are on the table, it is too important to fail, we cannot fail."

Mandelson told Monday's edition of London's Times newspaper that the trade talks were on a "knife edge" and would only succeed with Bush's support.

The two leaders said they had discussed the situation in the Darfur region in Sudan, where fighting has claimed at least 200,000 lives and displaced 2.5 million people, according to the United Nations, though some sources say the toll is much higher.

"I've been in Darfur recently. I can tell you that it's really a tragedy, what's going on, and we cannot accept that tragedy going on without the united response of the international community," said Barroso.

DOJ_NMG_0114466

"I know that Jose is as committed as I am to helping solve what I've called a genocide. It is outrageous that people are being treated the way they are, and I'm confident Europe and the United States can work with other friends and allies around the world to help solve that difficult problem," said Bush.

The two leaders also said they had discussed the Israel-Palestinian situation, Iran, Iraq, Syria and efforts to combat climate change.

And Barroso also bemoaned the situation where US citizens can travel to all EU countries without a visa, while the citizens of 10 EU states cannot benefit from the US visa waiver program.

Some Progress In Global Trade Effort (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — Trade envoys from the United States and Europe said on Monday that they had made progress in resolving differences to break an impasse on global trade negotiations, but they declined to say specifically where the differences had narrowed.

"We are clearly making progress," the United States trade representative, Susan C. Schwab, said after a day of talks with Peter Mandelson, the European Union's commissioner for trade. "Perhaps there's some showing of momentum here."

Mr. Mandelson, who has tangled sometimes bitterly with Ms. Schwab in the last year, said he had come to Washington "looking for new impetus, and I believe we've found it."

He said his new confidence was inspired not only by his talks with President Bush but also by those with the House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, and the new Senate majority leader, Harry Reid. The Democratic leaders and many members of Congress were recently elected on promises to be more skeptical of trade deals.

The comments of Ms. Schwab and Mr. Mandelson came after a session between Mr. Bush and José Manuel Barroso, president of the European Commission. Both pledged in general terms to try again to complete a world trade accord in coming weeks.

Mr. Barroso, speaking at the White House, said he and the president had instructed trade envoys "to come up with a solution" on issues that have divided the United States and Europe for years. The principal issue has been over lowering barriers to trade of agriculture products.

"There is now the defining moment," Mr. Barroso said. "Of course, it is important to engage also others, because this is a real global agreement that we are trying to build."

Mr. Bush said that both the United States and Europe recognized "that the best way to help impoverished nations" would be to complete the current round of talks, known as the Doha round, after the city in Qatar where the talks started.

The trade talks were suspended last summer by the director general of the World Trade Organization, Pascal Lamy, when it became apparent that Europe and the United States could not reach agreement on lowering tariffs and subsidies on farm goods.

The final offer of the United States then was to limit farm subsidies to $22.5 billion a year, less than half what the United States is entitled to impose under current agreements. But because the actual amount of subsidies for 2005 was $19.7 billion, Europeans claimed that the United States was trying to increase subsidies, not lower them.

The Bush administration has called on Europe to lower its tariffs on farm products by more than 50 percent of their current level. A coalition of rich and poor nations has called on Europe to lower tariffs by 36 percent.

Mr. Lamy has said that a final trade agreement can occur only if the United States and Europe increase what they are willing to do, and decrease what they are demanding from the other side. But on both sides, farmers make up powerful political blocs, even though they account for less than 5 percent of the population and of the economy.

By itself, a European and American agreement on farm subsidies would not produce a breakthrough. A global deal on trade would require participation by India and some other poor countries that are resisting demands that they lower their barriers on farm goods and on manufactured goods and services.

With millions of its citizens depending on subsistence farming, India is resisting lower tariffs for farm goods. Kamal Nath, the top Indian trade envoy, has said that the Doha trade talks should recognize the plight of poor farmers and not ask them to sacrifice in order to get rich countries to open their markets.

Negotiators are operating under a timetable that top officials say may be impossible to meet. Bush's legislative authority to negotiate a trade deal, and to get an up-or-down vote on it, expires June 30. Many experts say it will be impossible to meet that deadline for wrapping up a trade deal.

DOJ_NMG_0114467

Mr. Lamy has said that if the broad outlines of a trade accord can be negotiated by March, then he hopes the Bush administration may ask Congress to extend Mr. Bush's trade negotiating authority by another six months so that the deal can be completed.

But Democrats and Republicans in Congress said they doubted that Congress would be willing to extend trade negotiating authority past June 30. More likely, they say, Congress will let the deadline slip and allow a new Congress and president in 2009 to negotiate over trade authority.

European officials say that Europe has signaled a willingness to lower tariffs on specific products that the United States hopes to export, particularly poultry, beef and pork.

But Europe has other sorts of trade barriers that American farmers and ranchers say are blocking exports to Europe, like rules barring certain kinds of cleaning processes for chicken used by American producers. Also barred are the levels of hormone for beef used by Americans.

It was not clear whether any of these barriers were on the table in the talks this week.

Canada Seeks Talks Over Subsidies

OTTAWA, Jan. 8 — Canada has asked the World Trade Organization to start talks between it and the United States about American farm subsidies in general and its support of corn growers in particular.

"Canada is concerned that these U.S. subsidies continue to cause economic harm to our corn farmers," the Canadian agriculture minister, Chuck Strahl, said in a statement.

"That's why we took the action we did, in order to provide the best possible support for our producers by pushing for a level playing field so that they can compete." Jennifer Chiu, a spokeswoman for David Emerson, the international trade minister, said that Canada did not have specific demands at this point. The Canadian government, however, noted in its statement that if the United States does not reduce its farm subsidies, Canada will ask the W.T.O. to begin a formal dispute settlement hearing on the issue.

U.S. Sub And Japanese Vessel Collide (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — An American nuclear-powered attack submarine has collided with a Japanese commercial vessel in the Arabian Sea. Initial reports from the area said there were no injuries and only slight damage, a Pentagon spokesman said Monday night.

The collision, south of the Strait of Hormuz, was first reported by the Kyodo news agency in Japan, which said the Foreign Ministry in Tokyo had been officially notified of the accident by American officials.

A Pentagon spokesman identified the submarine as the U.S.S. Newport News. The Japanese vessel was thought to be a tanker. American military officials in Washington were seeking a fuller accounting.

The U.S.S. Newport News is a nuclear-powered, fast-attack submarine in the Los Angeles class of vessels, and was commissioned in 1989, according to Pentagon records.

The Japanese oil company Showa Shell Sekiyu K. K. said the ship involved is the tanker Mogamigawa, operated by Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd., The Associated Press reported, citing a report from the Kyodo news agency. It was traveling from the Persian Gulf to Singapore and was carrying a crew of eight Japanese and 16 Filipinos.

In February 2001, a United States Navy submarine rammed into a Japanese fishing vessel in waters off Hawaii, killing nine people. The American captain's delay in apologizing for the crash set off protests by the victims' families.

Chavez To Nationalize 'Strategic' Sectors (WT/AP)

By Ian James, Associated Press

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela -- President Hugo Chavez announced plans yesterday to nationalize Venezuela's electrical and telecommunications companies, pledging to create a socialist state in a bold move with echoes of Fidel Castro's Cuban revolution.

"We're moving toward a socialist republic of Venezuela, and that requires a deep reform of our national constitution," Mr. Chavez said in a televised address after swearing in his new Cabinet. "We are in an existential moment of Venezuelan life. We're heading toward socialism, and nothing and no one can prevent it."

Mr. Chavez, who will be sworn in tomorrow to a third term that runs through 2013, also said he wanted a constitutional amendment to eliminate the autonomy of the Central Bank and would soon ask the National Assembly, solidly controlled by his allies, to give him greater powers to legislate by presidential decree.

DOJ_NMG_0114468

The nationalization appeared likely to affect Electricidad de Caracas, owned by Arlington-based AES Corp., and C.A. Nacional Telefonos de Venezuela, known as CANTV, the country's largest publicly traded company.

"All of that which was privatized, let it be nationalized," Mr. Chavez said, referring to "all of those sectors in an area so important and strategic for all of us as is electricity."

"The nation should recover its ownership of strategic sectors," he said.

Before Mr. Chavez was re-elected by a wide margin last month, he promised to take a more radical turn toward socialism.

Mr. Chavez said lucrative oil projects in the Orinoco River basin involving foreign oil companies should be under national ownership. He didn't spell out whether that meant a complete nationalization, but said any vestiges of private control over the energy sector should be undone.

"I'm referring to how international companies have control and power over all those processes of improving the heavy crudes of the Orinoco belt -- no -- that should become the property of the nation," Mr. Chavez said.

In the oil sector, it didn't appear Mr. Chavez was ruling out all private investment. Since last year, his government has sought to form state-controlled "mixed companies" with British Petroleum PLC, Exxon Mobil Corp., Chevron Corp., ConocoPhillips Co., Total SA and Statoil ASA to upgrade heavy crude in the Orinoco. Such joint ventures already have been formed in other parts of the country.

Mr. Chavez threatened in August to nationalize CANTV, a Caracas-based former state firm that was privatized in 1991, unless it adjusted its pension payments to current minimum-wage levels, which have been repeatedly increased by his government.

After Mr. Chavez's announcement yesterday, American Depositary Receipts (ADRs) of CANTV immediately plunged 14.2 percent on the New York Stock Exchange to $16.84 before the exchange halted trading. An NYSE spokesman said it was not known when trading might resume for CANTV, the only Venezuelan company listed on the Big Board.

Investors with sizable holdings in CANTV's ADRs include some well-known names on Wall Street, such as Deutsche Bank Securities Inc., UBS Securities LLC and Morgan Stanley & Co. But the biggest shareholder, according to Thomson Financial, appears to be Brandes Investment Partners LP, an investment advisory company in California. Also holding a noteworthy stake is Julius Baer Investment Management LLC, a Swiss investment manager.

Mr. Chavez's nationalization announcement came in his first speech of the year, a fiery address in which he used a vulgar word roughly meaning "idiot" to refer to Organization of American States Secretary-General Jose Miguel Insulza.

Mr. Chavez lashed out at Mr. Insulza for questioning his government's decision not to renew the license of an opposition-aligned TV station.

"Dr. Insulza is quite an idiot, a true idiot," Mr. Chavez said. "The insipid Dr. Insulza should resign from the Secretariat of the Organization of American States for daring to play that role."

Cuba nationalized major industries shortly after Mr. Castro came to power in 1959, and Bolivia's Evo Morales moved to nationalize key sectors after taking office last year. The two countries are Mr. Chavez's closest allies in Latin America, where many leftists have come to power in recent years.

Tomorrow, hours after Mr. Chavez is sworn in for another term, former revolutionary Daniel Ortega returns to the presidency in Nicaragua.

In Managua, Venezuelan Ambassador Miguel Gomez indicated yesterday that the two countries planned to work closely together, and said Nicaragua could become Venezuela's top aid recipient -- getting even more help than Cuba and Bolivia, which benefit heavily from Venezuela's petro-diplomacy.

The United States remains the top buyer of Venezuelan oil, which provides Mr. Chavez billions of dollars for social programs aimed at helping the poor in countries around the region.

Mr. Gomez said Mr. Chavez and Mr. Ortega planned to sign an agreement on Thursday providing Nicaragua with resources -- he described them as loans -- for infrastructure, health, education, agricultural development and the construction of 200,000 houses, as well as energy and debt forgiveness.

Chávez To Nationalise Telecoms, Power (FT)

By Andy Webb-Vidal

Financial Times, January 9, 2007

Hugo Chávez, Venezuela's left-wing president, Monday night fulfilled his radical pledges with sweeping nationalisation plans for the country's main telecommunications company and the biggest private power group.

He also said existing "strategic association" projects that process heavy crude oil in the Orinoco belt – which account for about a quarter of output from the world's fifth-biggest oil exporter – should become state property.

DOJ_NMG_0114469

Mr Chavez, who has been in power for eight years, has often clashed with domestic business interests but now appears to be significantly raising the political stakes by targeting big international companies.

The surprise announcement, only hours before Mr Chávez was due to be sworn in for his third term as president on Wednesday, sent shock waves through Venezuela's business community and foreign investors.

The news provoked selling of Venezuela's debt, with the benchmark 2027 Global bond fell in price and its yield rose 10 basis points above Treasuries in JPMorgan's emerging markets bond index late on Monday.

The moves, if carried out, would most immediately affect Compañía Anónima Teléfonos de Venezuela and its principal shareholder, a wholly owned subsidiary of US-based Verizon Communications, although this stake has already been earmarked for a possible sale. Spain's Telefónica holds a 6.9 per cent stake.

Trading in Cantv's American depositary receipts in New York was halted after the stock dropped by 14 per cent.

"All of those sectors that are in an area as important and strategic for all of us, such as electricity, should be nationalised," Mr Chávez said in a televised speech made shortly after he swore in his new cabinet.

"The nation needs to recover its property of strategic sectors," he added. "Nacional Teléfonos de Venezuela – nationalise it."

Mr Chávez also said he wanted a constitutional amendment to eliminate the autonomy of the central bank. "We're moving toward a socialist republic of Venezuela, and that requires a deep reform of our national constitution," Mr Chávez said.

It was not clear on Monday night whether the government would offer compensation for the expropriation of the assets or stakes in Cantv or Electricidad de Caracas which are held by foreign investors.

Cantv said Monday night that it had received no official communication from the government regarding its nationalisation announcement.

EdC, the power group that supplies energy to the capital, Caracas, has always been a privately held company, although a majority stake in the utility was bought by Arlington, Virginia-based AES for $1.6bn in 2000, following a hostile takeover.

The magnitude of the impact on oil companies such as ChevronTexaco, Total and Statoil, which have invested some $17bn in the Orinoco over the past decade, was not immediately clear, as the government has already embarked on negotiations to secure a majority stake in the projects.

"If there was any doubt about Chávez's economic orientation, he's made it very clear on the eve of his inauguration, and it's that the state must assume full and direct control of key sectors of the economy," said Orlando Ochoa, an independent financial consultant based in Caracas.

Venezuelan debt in JPMorgan's emerging markets bond index was around seven basis points wider on Monday night, while credit insurance on Venezuela's risk of a default widened to 149 from 139 basis points in the credit derivatives market.

Tighter government control over Cantv is also likely to have repercussions for Venezuela's hitherto tolerated black market in foreign exchange, which uses Cantv ADRs as a mechanism to allow investors to buy dollars.

In Caracas, the dollar was on Monday night quoted at 3,600 Bolívars, brokers said, up about 10 per cent from the close of last week, and leaving it at a premium of 67 per cent over the official exchange rate of 2,150 Bolívars to the dollar.

Venezuela's Chavez: Nationalize Electricity, Phones (USAT)

By David J. Lynch, Usa Today

USA Today, January 9, 2007

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez said Monday he would nationalize the country's electricity industry and its largest telecommunications provider, which could have an impact on major U.S. investors in his oil-rich country.

In a televised address, Chavez, who will be sworn in Wednesday to a second six-year term, also said he would ask the legislature, controlled by his allies, to let him rewrite Venezuela's economy through presidential decree.

"All of that which was privatized, let it be nationalized," Chavez said. "The nation should recover its ownership of strategic sectors."

In the crosshairs: Electricidad de Caracas, owned by Arlington, Va.-based AES, and C.A. Nacional Telefonos de Venezuela (CANTV) the country's largest publicly traded company. AES and Verizon Communications, which owns 28.5% of CANTV, declined comment.

CANTV's American depositary receipts plunged 14.2% on the New York Stock Exchange to $16.84 before trading was halted. An NYSE spokesman said it was unknown when trading might resume for CANTV, the only Venezuelan company listed on the Big Board.

In his speech, Chavez also alluded to potential changes in the oil-producing nation's relationship with foreign oil companies, such as ExxonMobil and ChevronTexaco, which are involved in Venezuela's Orinoco River basin. "I'm referring to how international companies have control and power over all those processes of improving the heavy crudes of the Orinoco belt — no — that should become the property of the nation," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0114470

Despite the president's often-fierce rhetoric, foreign companies have thrived amid Venezuela's oil-fueled boom. From carmaker Audi to the producer of Heinz ketchup and the major oil companies, all have enjoyed fat profits.

U.S.-based analysts cautioned that Chavez often makes sweeping public statements that are followed with more limited action. "The foreign investors that are there are doing very well. … The country is flush with oil money," says Christopher Sabatini, senior policy director of the Council of the Americas.

Chavez critics, however, warned that he is intent on recreating Cuban-style socialism. "Chavez idolizes Fidel," says Antonio Szabo, a former Venezuelan oil official. "Before all is said and done, he is going to nationalize everything."

Chávez Moves To Nationalize Two Industries (NYT)

By Simon Romero

New York Times, January 9, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela, Jan. 8 — President Hugo Chávez signaled a vigorous new effort to assert greater control over Venezuela's economy on Monday by announcing plans to nationalize companies in the telecommunications and electricity industries.

Mr. Chávez, who will be sworn in Wednesday to another six-year term, announced his plans at the swearing-in of his new cabinet to a cheering crowd of supporters, sending a chilling message to foreign investors.

American corporations, including Verizon Communications, have large stakes in Venezuela's largest telecommunications company, CANTV, and its biggest publicly traded electricity company, Electricidad de Caracas.

"Let it be nationalized," Mr. Chávez said of CANTV. "All that was privatized, let it be nationalized."

Financial markets appeared to be caught off-guard by Mr. Chávez's announcement, as speculators reacted with a sell-off of assets that would be affected by the decision. Shares in CANTV plunged 14 percent in New York trading. Venezuela's currency, the bolívar, fell as much as 20 percent in black market trading here on Monday, traders said.

The announcement was the latest in a series of bold steps Mr. Chávez has taken since his re-election in December to consolidate his power and move Venezuela toward what he calls a socialist revolution. Mr. Chávez said he would also seek a "revolutionary enabling law" from Congress that would allow him to approve bills by decree, as well as a measure stripping the central bank of its autonomy.

"While this is a break with the past, it is consistent with Chávez's drive to concentrate ever greater power in his hands and the hands of his government," said Robert Bottome, editor and publisher of Veneconomía, a business newsletter.

Last month, Mr. Chávez announced plans to meld the broad coalition of parties that support him into a single socialist party, raising concerns that he was following in the footsteps of Fidel Castro.

On Monday, in addition to the telecommunications and electricity nationalizations, Mr. Chávez also appeared to signal that he wanted control over four multibillion-dollar oil projects in the Orinoco River basin, which he said should become "state property."

It was not clear what Mr. Chávez meant, however, since Venezuela's government already has stakes in those ventures together with some of the world's largest private oil companies, including Exxon Mobil, Chevron, BP and ConocoPhillips.

Venezuela, which has the largest conventional oil reserves outside the Middle East, has already increased its control over numerous oil production ventures in the past year. The largest consumer of Venezuelan oil, of course, remains the United States, despite efforts by Mr. Chávez to export larger quantities of oil to China and other Asian markets.

Details were vague as to how any of the nationalization plans would play out. For instance, Mr. Chávez omitted from his remarks whether Venezuela would compensate foreign investors for their holdings or expropriate them outright. He has already clashed with investors over small-scale takeovers of farms and even a tomato-processing plant owned by H. J. Heinz, but his government has negotiated settlements with owners in those cases.

The nationalizations would, at least for Venezuela, reverse a trend that got under way in Latin America in the 1990s, when governments throughout the region sold many of their assets, particularly state telephone companies, to private investors. Those deals, together with the auction of licenses to provide wireless phone services, led to a sharp increase in the usage of such services among poorer Venezuelans.

They would also be a significant shift of Mr. Chávez's economic policies since he became president in 1999. Though Mr. Chávez steadily adopted more strident rhetoric, he let most of Venezuela's private companies operate unfettered as long they did not actively engage in politics.

But with his re-election in December, Mr. Chávez seems determined to use the momentum — and margin — of his victory to solidify his power and deepen his socialist policies in ways that are increasingly unnerving his opponents.

DOJ_NMG_0114471

Supporters of Mr. Chávez already control every institution in the federal government, including Congress and the Supreme Court, so it was unclear what hindrances Mr. Chávez was attempting to overcome by seeking expanded powers.

Mr. Chávez is also going forward with a plan to effectively take RCTV, a television station that persistently criticizes his government, off the air in May by not renewing its broadcast license. The move has drawn fierce criticism both here and abroad, with critics claiming it will restrict freedom of expression.

On Monday, Mr. Chávez described one of the most prominent critics of the decision, José Miguel Insulza, the general secretary of the Organization of American States, in a vulgar term that loosely translates as "idiot." Mr. Chávez also called on Mr. Insulza to resign.

Flush with more than $50 billion in revenue from oil exports, Mr. Chávez is also retooling Venezuela's economy to focus on what his economic theorists describe as "endogenous development" that prioritizes the domestic production of agricultural goods and industrial products from worker-owned cooperatives.

Venezuela has undergone a nationalization push before, when the populist government of Carlos Andrés Pérez took control of companies in various sectors, including the oil industry, in the 1970s. The economy, however, suffered from poor growth and inefficient services after oil prices crashed in the 1980s, leading subsequent administrations to privatize state companies and open the oil industry to foreign investment.

American companies reacted cautiously to Mr. Chávez's comments on Monday. "Verizon has of course been carefully monitoring the news reports on President Chávez's comments today," said Eric Rabe, a spokesman for Verizon, which has had a large stake in CANTV since the early 1990s. "We are not aware of the details of the government's plan and therefore cannot comment at this time."

While Mr. Chávez referred specifically to the telephone company CANTV, his nationalization plans for the electricity sector remained unclear. The AES Corporation of Arlington, Va., controls Electricidad de Caracas, but did not acquire the company through a privatization auction. Robin Pence, a spokeswoman for AES, declined to comment.

CMS Energy of Jackson, Mich., controls an electricity utility that provides power to Margarita Island that it bought from the Venezuelan government in the 1990s. Jeffrey Holyfield, a spokesman for CMS, said the company had a "good relationship" with Mr. Chávez's government but was awaiting more details about its plan before it could comment.

Chavez Sets Plans For Nationalization (WP)

By Juan Forero

Washington Post, January 9, 2007

BOGOTA, Colombia, Jan. 8 -- Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez on Monday announced plans to nationalize the country's electrical and telecommunications companies, take control of the once-independent Central Bank and seek special constitutional powers permitting him to pass economic laws by decree.

"We're heading toward socialism, and nothing and no one can prevent it," Chavez, who won a third term in a landslide election in December, said in a speech in Caracas, the Venezuelan capital.

The announcements were made as the president swore in a 27-member cabinet that includes ministers who analysts say will likely be more closely allied with the president's far-reaching goals.

Those appointments, combined with the new economic measures, are sure to escalate tension with the Bush administration, which regards the Venezuelan leader as a threat to democratic institutions. Chavez's administration, in turn, has accused the United States of meddling in its affairs.

"The people of the world, little by little, are increasingly expressing that idea: no more imperialism," Jorge Rodr?guez, the new vice president and a former electoral board official, said at the ceremony Monday. "We are obligated and committed because the people have given us a clear message once and again, and that message is, we must rise up to construct a socialist country and move the Bolivarian revolution forward."

In the ceremony, marked with revolutionary fervor at the Teresa Carre?o theater, the government also announced two new ministries, for telecommunications and indigenous peoples. Since Ch?vez's presidency began in 1999, the number of ministries has risen from 13 and the number of public sector workers has doubled to nearly 2 million.

Political analysts said they were not surprised by the measures and the tone of Chavez's speech, because he had previously pledged to take what he describes as his "revolution" into overdrive.

Last week, Chavez decided to not renew the broadcast license of RCTV, a Caracas television station long critical of his administration. That move prompted swift condemnation from press freedom groups.

"In effect, we're living a process of radicalization," said Luis Vicente Le?n, who directs the Datanalisis polling firm. "He had announced that there would be a new stage in the production of the revolution, and here it is."

DOJ_NMG_0114472

In his bid to accelerate economic reforms, Chavez said he would seek to have the National Assembly give him special powers that would permit him to approve economic laws by decree. The plan would have little or no opposition in the 167-member body, which has not had an opposition politician in its ranks since the president's foes boycotted elections in 2005.

"I move forward with my request for a revolutionary enabling law," he said. "We already have the document prepared. We are making the final revisions, and we solicit special powers."

The president also spoke about the need for Venezuela's most important oil fields, those in the Orinoco belt in the northeast, to be brought under state control. The projects in that region, which the government says contains more oil than any other patch in the world, were developed in the late 1990s by foreign multinational firms such as Exxon Mobil, BP, Chevron and Total of France.

The government has already increased taxes and royalties, but the companies continue to mine and refine. Chavez provided little detail about his plans in his speech, but he railed against the privatizations that preceded his administration -- including those in the country's huge oil sector, which exports most of its crude to the United States.

If Chavez moves forward with nationalization -- which could mean anything from outright expropriation to higher taxes or more state intervention -- it would likely affect CANTV, the dominant provider of fixed-line telephone service in Venezuela and the country's largest publicly traded company, as well as the utility Electricidad de Caracas.

Arlington, Va.-based AES Corp. has an 86 percent equity in Electricidad de Caracas, the largest private utility in Venezuela. The Venezuela operation -- five power plants serving more than 1 million customers -- is a major investment for AES. In 2005, the firm had revenue of $613 million from its Venezuela business. In filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission, it listed the value of its plants and equipment in Venezuela at $1.85 billion.

Chavez also said Monday that the government would soon exert more control over the Central Bank, one of the few Venezuelan institutions that has shown itself to be independent of the Chavez administration. Two of the seven directors of the bank's board, including Domingo Maza Zavala, who often criticized government economic policy, are on their way out.

"The Central Bank must not be autonomous," Chavez said. "That is a neoliberal idea."

Last week, the government replaced one of Chavez's most loyal aides, Jos? Vicente Rangel, the vice president. In an ambitious cabinet shake-up, Chavez also replaced the heads of such key ministries as interior, justice, finance and education. He appointed his brother, Adan, to run education.

"He's gotten rid of a couple of people who have their own separate identity, particularly Rangel, who has contacts in Venezuelan society and internationally," said Mark L. Schneider, a senior vice president of the International Crisis Group in Washington, a policy group that regularly compiles reports on Venezuela's political situation. "Rangel is not a yes man, I suspect, and my guess is that he may not be in tune with the way Chavez likes to run things."

Chávez Moves New Socialism To Faster Track (WSJ)

By David Luhnow And José De Córdoba And Raúl Gallegos

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez took a big step toward what he calls "21st-century socialism" by vowing to nationalize the country's biggest telecommunications and electricity companies, both controlled by U.S. firms. He also said he would throw out the country's commercial code and strip the central bank of all remaining traces of its autonomy.

The moves by Mr. Chávez, a populist who won a landslide re-election last month, are the latest in a flurry of actions to tighten his grip on power and use his country's oil riches to create a model of development different from the market-oriented economics that have dominated Latin America and much of the developing world for the past two decades.

Some Venezuelans fear that Mr. Chávez, a close ally and disciple of Cuba's ailing dictator, Fidel Castro, is reshaping Venezuela along Cuban lines, with the state controlling economic and political power. The Venezuelan leader has denied the comparison in the past, but critics said his latest moves belie the denial.

"Let's call a spade a spade. This is communism," said Eric Ekvall, a political analyst in Caracas. "He's clearly saying the state should own the means of production."

Mr. Chávez, whom the ailing Cuban leader sees as the successor to his revolutionary mantle in Latin America, used a speech yesterday to his new cabinet members to flaunt his ties to Mr. Castro. He ended his speech using the Cuban's signature sign-off: "Fatherland or death, we will triumph!" Mr. Chávez's longtime ally, former Vice President José Vicente Rangel, chimed in at the ceremony with another signature Castro phrase: "Always towards victory, Comandante!"

Years after the collapse of Soviet communism and the embrace of free-markets by countries around the world, Mr. Chávez is taking this Andean nation of 26 million in the other direction, greatly expanding the role of government in the economy. In the past few years, he has claimed a greater share of the country's giant oil industry for the state. But he has stopped shy of going directly after other major private industry, until now.

DOJ_NMG_0114473

Although he revealed no details, Mr. Chávez said he would nationalize the country's largest publicly traded private company, Compania Nacional de Teléfonos de Venezuela, known as CANTV. The company, privatized in 1991, is controlled by the U.S. telecom giant Verizon Communications Inc. He also vowed to nationalize Electricidad de Caracas, controlled by Arlington, Va.-based AES Corp.

The choice of two U.S.-controlled companies will surely not be missed elsewhere in Latin America, where Mr. Chávez has struggled to convince nations to follow his lead and not Washington's.

Since Mr. Chávez took office in 1999, he has engaged in vigorous verbal combat with Bush administration officials, going as far as to compare Mr. Bush to the devil in an appearance last year at the United Nations. But despite all the rhetorical flourishes, the two countries are bound at the hip. Venezuela remains the U.S.'s fourth largest oil supplier and the U.S. is by far Venezuela's most important trading partner. Neither seems ready to cut that economic tie.

Washington has tried of late to avoid being drawn into the fray. Yesterday, there was no official reaction by U.S. government officials to Mr. Chávez's announcement.

Mr. Chávez offered no details of how the nationalization would proceed or whether shareholders in the private companies would receive market value for their stakes. As one of the world's top 10 oil-producing nations and founding member of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, Venezuela is flush with cash from high oil prices and could easily pay compensation.

In a statement, Verizon said it wasn't aware of the details of the government's plan and couldn't issue a comment. It had agreed to a 60-day extension -- through Feb. 28 -- of its agreement to sell its 28.5% stake in CANTV to Mexico's America Móvil, the mobile-phone company controlled by billionaire Carlos Slim, for $676.6 million. On the New York Stock Exchange, CANTV shares fell 14% to $16.84 before trading was halted shortly after 3 p.m. Eastern time.

People familiar with the matter said Verizon had known since August that Mr. Chávez was considering nationalizing the company. They said the company was hopeful it might still reach an agreement with the fiery leader allowing the sale to proceed. A spokesman for Mr. Slim had no comment.

AES spokesman Robin Pence said the company had no comment.

Mr. Chávez also is consolidating power in the political arena. Soon after the recent election, he unveiled plans to join his coalition of some 20 center and leftist parties into a single party controlled by him called the United Venezuelan Socialist Party -- a move some analysts say leads the country down the road to a single-party state. Yesterday, he said he would ask Congress for special powers to pass bills by decree.

In recent years, Mr. Chávez has rewritten the constitution and stacked the Supreme Court with loyalists. Venezuela's Congress, entirely made up of supporters to Mr. Chávez after the opposition didn't field candidates, plans to amend the constitution again to allow him indefinite re-election.

In addition, Mr. Chávez is going after one of the few institutions he doesn't control -- the media. He recently said he would yank the broadcast license of one of the country's oldest TV broadcasters and most outspoken critics of his policies, RCTV. Yesterday, Mr. Chávez repeatedly called the secretary-general of the Organization of American States, José Miguel Insulza, an "idiot" for condemning the Venezuelan's decision not to renew the channel's license.

Since the price of oil began to rise a few years ago, many countries from Russia to Nigeria have reclaimed a bigger share of their energy industries to cash in. But Venezuela appears to be going further. Daniel Yergin, chairman of Cambridge Energy Research Associates, a U.S. oil-industry consulting firm, says Mr. Chávez's move represents "a return to another era: the 1970s," when it was commonplace for developing nations to own utilities and energy companies and manage them inefficiently.

Venezuelans had mixed reactions to the news. Nieves de Marquez, 53 years old, a hotel receptionist, applauded Mr. Chávez's move. "I've always criticized CANTV's high pricing. They also fired a lot of people when they privatized the company and some never got their severance." But others remembered the days when the government managed the phone company. Phone lines were hard to come by, and service was lousy -- it sometimes took less time to drive across town to talk to an acquaintance than to get a dial tone.

Analysts worry that Mr. Chávez isn't finished and will use his latest inauguration tomorrow to announce new measures, including increasing the government's role over private education. Last week, he tapped his brother Adán, the former Venezuelan envoy to Havana, as education minister. In Caracas, José Barcia, an economist for Metroeconomica consulting firm, said he expects Mr. Chávez to make moves against other industries as well as private property such as commercial farms.

Mr. Chávez's antimarket politics have spawned some imitators, whom he has supported rhetorically and often with loans and subsidies. In Ecuador, newly elected President Rafael Correa also wants a new constitution and a big hike in the government's take from Ecuador's oil industry.

DOJ_NMG_0114474

In Nicaragua, where former Sandinista leader and Chávez ally Daniel Ortega is slated to assume the presidency this week, Venezuela's ambassador said Mr. Chávez planned to announce a big aid agreement on Thursday which could eventually make the impoverished central American country the most important recipient of Venezuelan aid, outstripping Bolivia and Cuba.

But Venezuela's oil riches may make it a special case when it comes to buying out big companies. In Bolivia, President Evo Morales began to nationalize the country's natural-gas industry, but he has struggled to carry out his plan because his impoverished country lacks money and expertise. Meanwhile, more moderate leftist politicians such as Brazil's Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva and Chile's Michelle Bachelet have ignored Mr. Chávez' attempt to turn back the clock on the free market.

During his speech, Mr. Chávez also suggested he would further expand the state's role in the oil industry, taking a harder line with major oil firms that operate in the country's Orinoco region, where companies upgrade tarlike oil deposits into lighter grades of crude. Those include BP PLC, Exxon Mobil Corp., Chevron Corp., ConocoPhillips, and Total SA and Statoil ASA.

Until now Venezuelan oil officials have said that companies operating in the Orinoco region would have to give the state at least a 51% stake in upstream oil operations, but would allow its foreign partners to maintain control of multibillion-dollar upgraders that convert the tar oil. Yesterday, Mr. Chávez said the upgrading side of the business must also pass on to the state.

"International companies have the control and domination of the process of upgrading heavy crudes from the Orinoco. That should become property of the Venezuelan state," he said.

But so far, Mr. Chávez's power grabs have weakened the Venezuelan oil industry, once the pride of this nation. He ended a tradition of allowing state-run oil company Petróleos de Venezuela SA to run itself like a professional company rather than a source of government patronage and sinecures. Mr. Chávez has used the firm to fund numerous social programs that have left the company short on investment. As a result, oil output has fallen sharply, leaving the country vulnerable to a downturn in prices.

Mr. Chávez's free spending may ultimately undermine his expansion plans. Some analysts say that if the price of oil drops well below $50 a barrel, Venezuela could have a harder time paying its domestic and international commitments. Already, the country's policies last year generated 17% inflation.

Venezuela's move is unlikely to rattle investors in other developing countries, say market watchers. "Luckily Chávez is one of a kind," says Don Hanna, head of emerging-market economic analysis at Citigroup in New York. Mr. Hanna says he doesn't think Venezuela's nationalization moves have any ramifications for the larger markets in the region such as Brazil and Mexico.

Fund managers say that there could be some impact on countries viewed as aligned with Mr. Chávez's economic philosophy, such as Bolivia and, to a lesser degree, Ecuador. Venezuela's nationalizations could push businesspeople or multinationals to reconsider their investments in those countries, says Carlos Asilis, a portfolio manager at Vega Plus Capital Partners in Miami.

Bolivia Leader Lets Venezuela Send Soldiers, Angering Foes (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela, Jan. 8 — Political opponents of President Evo Morales of Bolivia have in recent days stepped up criticism of the country's strengthening military relationship with Venezuela after Bolivian officials acknowledged that more than two dozen uniformed members of the Venezuelan military had recently entered the country without congressional approval.

Jorge Quiroga, a former president of Bolivia and a prominent critic of Mr. Morales's alliance with President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela, accused Mr. Morales in a statement on Saturday of "trampling national sovereignty."

Legislators from Santa Cruz, a redoubt of anti-Morales sentiment in eastern Bolivia, previously criticized the unannounced arrival of about 30 Venezuelan military officials at Trompillo Airport there on Dec. 28.

President Morales has been facing increasing tension in eastern provinces seeking greater political autonomy from his administration. Part of the dispute stems from the Bolivian Congress's approval of a wide-reaching military cooperation pact with Venezuela, in a legislative session in November that opponents say was marred by irregularities.

Mr. Morales has also begun an ambitious land reform program that could encourage tens of thousands of highland peasants to move to the east, unsettling regional leaders there who view the project as a threat to their interests.

Venezuela's defense minister, Gen. Raúl Isaías Baduel, rushed to defend the deployment to Bolivia. The presence of Venezuelan soldiers in Bolivia does not violate Bolivian sovereignty, he said in comments issued Friday night through Venezuela's official news agency.

"This could be qualified as humanitarian aid, with what we know of Bolivia's economic limitations," General Baduel said.

Venezuelan officials, including the country's ambassador in Bolivia, have been on the defensive in recent weeks as critics of Mr. Morales have raised fears over growing Venezuelan military involvement in Bolivia. The Bolivian defense minister, Walker

DOJ_NMG_0114475

San Miguel, said last week that the Venezuelans were there to assist in the piloting and maintenance of two Super Puma helicopters that Venezuela had put at Mr. Morales's disposal for travel within Bolivia.

Venezuela is also helping the Bolivian Army to build border posts and improve its military presence in the eastern lowlands, efforts that Mr. Morales's opponents say have more to do with intimidating his critics than protecting Bolivia's frontier from Brazil or Paraguay.

As United States influence in Bolivia has waned, Venezuela has stepped in to provide as much as $50 million in loans for military spending since Mr. Morales assumed the presidency a year ago.

In addition, Venezuela has counseled Mr. Morales on his economic policies and formed ventures with Bolivia's national energy company as he took greater control over the energy industry last year from multinational companies. As Venezuela raises its profile in Bolivia, Mr. Morales has emerged as Mr. Chávez's closest ally in South America. Resistance to the alliance has been vocal in Bolivia and here in Caracas.

Still, Mr. Morales seems to have cannily asserted his influence over a wary officer corps as he presses forward with efforts to promote more indigenous soldiers into the upper ranks of the armed forces, where a light-skinned, Europeanized elite remains dominant.

One of Mr. Morales's first moves as president was a purge of senior generals and other officials from the army after a scandal in which they were accused of allowing military technicians from the United States to dismantle more than two dozen antiquated Chinese-made shoulder-fired missiles, considered Bolivia's sole antiaircraft defense.

Some of the deposed officials have been explicitly critical of Mr. Morales's ties to Mr. Chávez and to Cuba's government. Gen. Marcelo Antezana, who was fired by Mr. Morales as army commander, said in September that there was discontent in the armed forces over what was viewed as subjugation to "Caribbean mulattoes" of a "Cuba-Venezuela axis."

An outcry followed published remarks by Julio Montes, Venezuela's ambassador in La Paz, who said last month that Venezuela would consider military intervention on Mr. Morales's behalf in case of a crisis. Mr. Montes later amended his comments, saying he was referring to assistance in general and not the deployment of troops.

Bush Discusses Cooperation With Nicaragua's Ortega (AFP)

AFP, January 9, 2007

US President George W. Bush told Nicaraguan president elect and former US foe Daniel Ortega that he hoped to work together on a range of issues, the White House said.

Bush telephoned Ortega, who assumes office this week, "to congratulate him and the Nicaraguan people on their commitment to democracy," said national security spokesman Gordon Johndroe.

"The president expressed his strong commitment to the well-being of the Nicaraguan people and our continued interest in a relationship with Nicaragua, noting such ongoing areas of cooperation" as trade and reform-driven economic development, he said.

"The president also noted that reconciliation, unity, democracy, and job creation -- the agenda outlined in Daniel Ortega's election platform -- are areas for possible cooperation," said Johndroe.

Ortega, 61, on Wednesday is to be sworn in to a five-year term as Nicaragua's president.

Bush also spoke with outgoing Nicaraguan President "Enrique Bolanos to thank him for his service to his country, commitment to democracy, and friendship with the United States," said Johndroe.

Ortega was the Marxist leader of the leftist Sandinista National Liberation Front that ousted US-backed dictator Anastasio Somoza in 1979. The Soviet-backed Sandinista government seized private assets, distributed land to poor farmers and battled US-financed Contra rebels throughout the 1980s.

Ortega was voted out of power in 1990, at the end of a bloody civil war against the Contras, and lost two subsequent presidential elections, before prevailing in his third earlier this month to succeed Bolanos on January 10.

During his campaign against US-backed conservative rival Eduardo Montealegre, Ortega toned down his revolutionary rhetoric. But Washington, and particularly its ambassador in Managua, urged Nicaraguans to defeat him.

The White House also announceed that US Secretary of Health and Human Services Michael Leavitt would lead the US delegation to Ortega's inauguration.

The goup will also include the head of the US Millenium Challenge Corporation that rewards free-market and democratic reforms with aid, and the assistant US secretary of state for the Western Hemisphere, and the US ambassador to Nicaragua.

Russia Shuts Oil Pipeline To Europe (FT)

By Arkady Ostrovsky, George Parker, Bertrand Benoit, Jan Cienski And Roman Olearchyk

Financial Times, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114476

Russia yesterday halted its oil exports to Europe passing through Belarus as it accused its neighbour of siphoning oil from the Druzhba transit pipeline, threatening further disruptions to European supplies.

Transneft, Russia's oil pipeline monopoly, said it was forced to stop pumping oil through the pipeline, which carries about 30 per cent of its exports to Europe, claiming that Belarus was effectively stealing it.

Senior Russian officials said Minsk's actions "smelled of a trade war".

The shutdown is the latest interruption of Russian energy supplies to Europe and could further dent Russia's reputation as a reliable supplier of energy after last year's gas supply stand-off between Russia and Ukraine.

Moscow's action spurred a $1 rise in the price of crude oil on US markets in early trade yesterday, though West Texas Intermediate gave up its gains and traded 23 cents lower at $56.08 in midday New York trade.

Poland, which with Germany is one of the main recipients of the Russian crude passing via Belarus, reported that oil shipments had stopped overnight and admitted it was "completely dependent" on Russia to meet its oil needs. Germany demanded an "immediate and full re-opening" of the pipeline.

The European Union also called for an "urgent and detailed" explanation for the interrupted supply.

However, Andrei Sharonov, Russia's deputy minister for Trade and Economic Development, told the Financial Times that Belarus had been siphoning off oil since January 6, and that Russia had no choice but to act. "This is a force majeure situation," he said.

The dispute is the most serious blow to Russia's relationship with Belarus. The two countries are supposed to be moving towards an economic and political union but a series of trade disputes - which could still develop into a trade war - have jeopardised the plans.

On January 1, Russia ended a cosy arrangement whereby Belarus processed cheap Russian oil and sold it to Europe at a profit. The erstwhile allies then slapped tit-for-tat duties on each others' crude and petroleum products, which both refused to pay.

On January 6 Belarus informed Russia that it had started taking oil from the pipeline as a payment in kind. Russia yesterday responded by halting transits of oil through Belarus.

A Belarus delegation was last night heading for Moscow to resolve the situation.

But Belarus President Alexander Lukashenko, last year branded "the last dictator in Europe" by the US, had previously sworn not to give in to Moscow's demands and to charge Russia in full for all services Belarus provided to Russia.

The suspension also comes as a further shock to the EU, which has calculated it will depend on Russia for 70 per cent of its energy by 2030, and will tomorrow unveila new energy strategy.

Andris Piebalgs, energy commissioner, asked for an "urgent" explanation from Moscow and Minsk over the cut, which hit central Europe. Mr Piebalgs convened a meeting of EU energy officials this week with a view to possibly invoking "solidarity" measures, in which the bloc might in the longer term share its strategic oil reserves with countries affected by shortages.

But his spokesman said there was "no reason for alarm now", pointing out that Poland and Germany had strategic reserves.

Michael Glos, the German economics minister, said Germany, which currently chairs the EU, "will do all in its power to ensure that this bottleneck does not affect European companies and consumers. I am urging the Russian and Belarusan governments to honour their supply and transit commitments."

Russia is Germany's biggest oil supplier, providing 34.3 per cent of its crude imports of an estimated 109m tons last year. A fifth of German oil imports transit through the Druzhba pipeline.

Berlin said it was not considering tapping the strategic oil reserves, which cover 90 days of consumption. Two refineries in eastern Germany - PCK in Schwedt, operated by a consortium, and Total's Raffinerie Mitteldeutschland in Leuna - rely on oil from the Druzhba pipeline.

Polish authorities stressed that the country was not in danger because of the suspension. Poland's two leading oil companies, PKN Orlen and Grupa Lotos, have access to 80 days of reserves held by the government. Orlen said it also had its own crude reserves.

"Both refineries are preparing for emergency supplies of crude by sea, through the oil terminal in Gdansk," said Piotr Naimski, the deputy minister of the economy.

Poland imports about 96 per cent of its oil from Russia. "We are completely dependent on these imports," said Mr Naimski.

Russian Oil Cutoff Rouses Europe's Doubt (WSJ)

By Guy Chazan And Gregory L. White And Marc Champion

Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

The sudden suspension of Russian oil exports through Belarus amid a dispute over fuel subsidies will exacerbate Europe's concerns about its dependence on its huge eastern neighbor for energy supplies.

DOJ_NMG_0114477

Russian officials yesterday said Moscow had shut off crude exports through Belarus in retaliation for what Russian officials said was illegal siphoning by Belarus of oil from the main pipeline that carries Russian crude to Europe. The move led to a halt in deliveries to Germany and Poland, which depend on the pipeline for the bulk of their oil supplies, and sharply reduced flows to Hungary, Slovakia and Czech Republic. 1

European officials said they have adequate stocks to survive any disruption, and the response in oil markets was modest. But Moscow's sudden cutoff of a vital energy conduit to the Continent widened questions about Russia's reliability as an energy supplier, a year after a dispute over the price of natural gas with neighboring Ukraine briefly reduced vital Russian gas shipments to Europe.

"This shows us once again that arguments among various countries of the former Soviet Union, between suppliers and transit countries, mean that from our perspective, these deliveries are unreliable," Poland's deputy economy minister, Piotr Naimsky, told Poland's TVN24 television.

"It really shakes confidence in oil and gas supply," said a person in the German administration. "It's very unfortunate." Russia is the world's largest exporter of natural gas and its No. 2 oil exporter, after Saudi Arabia.

'Detailed Explanation' Demanded

European Union energy chief Andris Piebalgs demanded an "urgent and detailed explanation" from Minsk and Moscow. Though he said the cutoff poses "no immediate risk to the supply of oil to the European Union," Mr. Piebalgs said he might convene the EU's Oil Supply Group later this week to decide if countries should draw on their strategic stocks.

The conflict comes at a moment when energy security is back at the top of the EU's agenda. On Wednesday, the European Commission, the EU's executive arm, will publish proposals for the bloc's first energy strategy, to be discussed at a summit of EU leaders.

The affected pipeline -- named Druzhba, or friendship, when it was built in the 1960s to carry Soviet crude to clients in Eastern Europe -- carries about half of Russia's oil exports to Europe, roughly 1.5 million barrels a day, or 12.5% of European crude consumption.

'Broadens the Question'

"It's really surprising that the situation has escalated as far as it has," said Jeffrey Woodruff, an analyst at Fitch Ratings in London. "It broadens the whole question of European energy security from being just focused on gas to including oil and gas."

A Belarussian delegation left Minsk last evening for Moscow to begin talks on the dispute, which comes little more than a week after the two countries narrowly avoided a cutoff of Russian natural-gas shipments in a New Year's Eve price dispute.

The conflict comes amid growing tensions between the two erstwhile allies and shows the depth of Russian disenchantment with Belarussian President Alexander Lukashenko, whom the U.S. calls Europe's last dictator.

Russia and Belarus have for years been in talks to unify, a project that Russian President Vladimir Putin hoped would crown his presidency. But Moscow has watched in frustration as Mr. Lukashenko, apparently fearing a loss of power, has cooled on the idea.

"Lukashenko has shown that his interests don't coincide with ours," said Mikhail Margelov, chairman of the International Affairs Committee in Russia's Senate.

Seeking to raise the pressure on Mr. Lukashenko, OAO Gazprom, Russia's state-controlled gas company, demanded a doubling of the discounted rate Belarus pays for Russian gas. Moscow also said it would end duty-free crude sales to Belarus, eliminating what Russian officials said amounted to a $3.5 billion annual subsidy to Minsk.

Belarus responded last week by imposing a new transit fee on Russian crude shipments across its territory, a levy Moscow denounced as illegal.

Over the weekend, Belarus began taking oil from the Russian export line as payment, Russian officials said. In retaliation, Moscow cut off shipments, Andrei Sharonov, deputy economics minister, told Russian television.

Working on Other Routes

The Russian state pipeline monopoly OAO Transneft said it is working to increase exports to Europe by other routes. "I'm sure this won't affect our reputation as a reliable energy supplier," Transneft Vice President Sergei Grigoriev said.

Officials in Germany and Poland said that their countries have significant reserves of crude and face no immediate threat of fuel shortages.

Poland has more than 70 days of oil reserves and Germany about 130 days, according to EU officials. Polish refiner PKN Orlen SA said it is working at full capacity and could easily switch to seaborne supplies via an oil terminal at the Baltic Sea port of Gdansk.

The roots of the current crisis lie in Russia's drive to slash energy subsidies to its neighbors and have them pay what it says are market rates for its oil and gas. There are signs that drive is backfiring economically for Russia, though.

DOJ_NMG_0114478

Azerbaijan yesterday said it will stop exporting crude through Russian pipelines in order to keep more of the fuel at home, where it is needed to run power plants that had depended on Russian gas imports until Moscow's latest price increase made those too expensive, Interfax reported.

Belarus And Russia Spar Over Crude Oil Cutoff (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

New York Times, January 9, 2007

MOSCOW, Jan. 8 — Supplies of Russian crude oil headed to European markets came to a halt overnight, officials said Monday, in the latest manifestation of rapidly deteriorating relations between Russia and Belarus.

The head of Russia's oil pipeline monopoly accused Belarus of illegally siphoning oil beginning Saturday in an escalating dispute over duties and transit fees. Belarus's foreign ministry acknowledged the halt but denied responsibility, suggesting that the Russians had instead caused the stoppage at their common border.

Regardless of the cause, the disruption along the Druzhba, or Friendship, pipeline affected supplies of crude oil headed to Poland, Germany and Ukraine. In the short term, at least, the halt should have a minimal effect, because refineries in those countries maintain reserves. In the longer term as well, the disruption is not as threatening as a shut-off of natural gas, because alternative sources of oil are more readily available.

Still, a prolonged disruption could be worrisome. Oil prices rose on the news, and the dispute rekindled concerns in Europe about the reliability of energy supplies from Russia.

"This shows us once again that arguments among various countries of the former Soviet Union, between suppliers and transit countries, mean that these deliveries are unreliable from our perspective," Poland's deputy economics minister, Piotr Naimski, said in televised remarks, according to The Associated Press.

The shutdown of Druzhba, one of the highest-capacity pipelines in the world, took place a week after Russia and Belarus negotiated a last-minute agreement that sharply raised the price Belarus would have to pay for natural gas. The deal came after brinkmanship by each side that raised the specter of disruptions of natural gas deliveries across Europe, like one that followed a dispute between Ukraine and Russia in 2006.

Belarus, led by an autocratic president, Aleksandr G. Lukashenko, has reacted furiously to the terms of that deal and to Russia's tactics in the talks that led to it. Last week, Belarus called Russia's conduct shameless.

Russia has responded by saying that it is simply raising the costs of oil and gas to market prices. Belarus and other former republics of the Soviet Union have long bought oil and gas at a discount, compared with European customers.

"Belarus has cast prudence to the wind," Andrei V. Sharonov, a deputy economic development minister, said in remarks on the Moscow radio station Ekho Moskvy, referring to what he, too, called the illegal siphoning of oil. "This looks like a trade war."

He later said that Russia would suspend all oil shipments through Belarus, blaming it for the initial disruptions. His remarks suggested that the disruption could last indefinitely.

For the last decade, Russia and Belarus, two countries bound by history and deep ethnic, cultural and social ties, have moved haltingly toward the creation of a union, with a common currency and even, ultimately, the creation of a single unified state, as negotiated in a 1996 treaty between Mr. Lukashenko and President Boris N. Yeltsin.

The union has never come to fruition under President Vladimir V. Putin. In the past month, the two countries have seemed instead to be negotiating the terms of their divorce, which, like many, is becoming nasty.

Beginning New Year's Day, Russia began charging Belarus $100 per thousand cubic meters of natural gas, compared with the $46 it charged last year. The price is to increase steadily to the level charged in Europe — now $265 on average — by 2011.

As those negotiations dragged on bitterly, Russia also imposed a separate duty of $180 a ton on oil it sold to Belarus, which has been sold at steeply subsidized prices. Mr. Lukashenko's government responded to the oil duty last week by announcing a $45 a metric ton fee on shipping oil across Belarus on its way to other parts of Europe.

These are the fees are at the heart of the dispute that has shut down the pipeline.

Mr. Sharonov, in his radio interview, said Mr. Lukashenko's government had begun seizing the oil as payment for the transit fee.

The head of Russia's pipeline monopoly, Semyon M. Vainshtok, said in a statement that Belarus had siphoned 79,900 metric tons of oil since Saturday "without warning anyone."

He said, "Transit is a sacred cow," and vowed to use other means of transport to supply customers in Europe.

On Sunday, prosecutors in Belarus filed suit against Mr. Vainshtok, accusing him of having violated customs duties by not paying the new transit fee. A hearing scheduled for Monday, however, was canceled.

DOJ_NMG_0114479

In Belarus, there were conflicting reports about what had unfolded. While the foreign ministry denied responsibility, an official from the Druzhba pipeline told Russian news agencies that operations had been halted on orders from Belneftekhim, the Belarus pipeline monopoly. Neither the ministry nor the companies would elaborate.

Belarus has used its cheap supplies of oil and gas to shore up a Soviet-style economy and earn hard currency, in the case of oil, by exporting refined products at world prices. For Mr. Lukashenko's government, the changing economics could weaken his iron control on the country of 10 million.

"The Belarussian people may not realize the extent to which they have been propped up by Russian energy, the extent to which the Belarussian miracle that Lukashenko talks about was built on legs of clay," said Rory MacFarquhar, an economist with Goldman Sachs in Moscow.

The impact in Belarus, where the news media is tightly controlled by the state, remains uncertain.

Pavel Daneyko, the director of the Institute for Privatization and Management, a business consultancy in Minsk, the capital of Belarus, said Mr. Lukashenko's government faced two difficult options: a liberalization of the country's economy or a populist propaganda war against Russia.

"If there is a clear war with Russia," he said by telephone, "then the society may be able to weather the situation."

Belarus Cuts Off Russian Oil To Europe (CSM)

By Fred Weir

Christian Science Monitor, January 9, 2007

Germany, Poland, and Lithuania are hit by latest energy dispute between Russia and its neighbors.

MOSCOW

For the second time in just over a year, a political squabble between Russia and one of its ex-Soviet neighbors has cut off energy supplies to Europe, triggering anxieties about Moscow's reliability as an economic partner.

On Monday, Russia accused Belarus of shutting down the northern leg of the 2,500-mile-long Druzhba pipeline, which carries up to 2 million barrels of Siberian crude daily to European customers, causing shortages in Poland, Germany, and Lithuania.

The disruption is reminiscent of last year's shutdown of Russian gas supplies to Ukraine, which caused similar energy jitters in Europe. Though Poland and Germany have ample reserves on hand to ride out any temporary squeeze, the dispute underscores increasing concerns about Europe's dependency on Russian energy.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel, whose country assumed the EU and G-8 presidencies on Jan. 1, worried in a weekend TV interview about Moscow's tendency to change prices - and rules - for EU countries that depend on Russia for about a third of their energy supplies.

"Russia was a dependable delivery partner in the past," said Mrs. Merkel, who has made energy security a key priority of Germany's G-8 presidency. "But we are wrestling with Russia right now about strengthening [its energy commitments]. We also need to know that we have reliable prices and reliable cooperation with Russia." Tit-for-tat energy dispute

The most recent energy scare, which comes amid a deepening rift between the Kremlin and Belarussian leader Alexander Lukashenko over long-stalled plans to reunify the two former Soviet nations, is the latest in a chain of tit-for-tat measures. On Dec. 31, Belarus reluctantly agreed to a doubling in price of Russian gas, to $100 per thousand cubic meters - still well below global market levels of around $250. Belarus also agreed to sell 50 percent of its pipeline network, Beltransgaz, to Russia's gas monopoly Gazprom.

But last week Belarus retaliated by imposing a special $45 transit duty on each metric ton of Russian crude pumped through the Druzhba pipeline, a move Russia has called "illegal." By Monday, Polish officials said no oil was flowing through the line, which carries about a fifth of all Russian crude exports to Europe. Russia accused Belarus of "siphoning the oil off" to meet its own energy needs.

Monday Germany shut down two refineries, in Leuna and Schwedt, though both it and Poland have enough reserves on hand to last at least two months.

"[Europe] is not at any kind of chokepoint, the market can cover a great deal of this if needed," says Ambassador William Ramsay, deputy executive director of the International Energy Agency in Paris. "[there are] a lot of other options to procure energy and gas, by ship and pipeline." Stalled plans for a 'neo-Soviet' union

Belarus, a heavily industrialized Slavic nation of 10 million, has been Russia's closest ally in the post-Soviet region since Mr. Lukashenko came to power a dozen years ago. Lukashenko and former Russian President Boris Yeltsin drew up a grand plan to join their countries in a neo-Soviet union, but Vladimir Putin has been less enthusiastic. Still, Moscow has repaid Lukashenko's geopolitical loyalty with subsidies estimated at as much as $8 billion annually, in the form of cheap gas, duty-free oil, and favored access to Russian markets for Belarussian industrial goods.

DOJ_NMG_0114480

But Lukashenko has been a growing embarrassment to Moscow. Human rights groups accuse him of rigging elections, closing down independent media, and imprisoning dissidents. Experts say Lukashenko has employed Russian subsidies to create a neo-communist welfare state, which tamps down popular discontent but has also become an obstacle to the economic expansion for Russia's industrial conglomerates.

"Russia has been subsidizing Belarus because we thought there was going to be a full alliance between our countries," says Sergei Markov, a Kremlin-connected analyst. "But Lukashenko has been blocking [Russia's goals] and, if that's the way it's going to be, then he should have to pay full market prices for energy." Regime change in Belarus?

Some Russian experts suggest Mr. Putin may be angling for regime change in Minsk, the Belarussian capital, or at least sweeping revisions in the relationship. "Russia doesn't see any returns on its investments in Belarus," says Gennady Chuffrin, deputy director of the Institute for World Economy and International Relations. "The Kremlin believes it has a strong hand to play and that Lukashenko, a political outcast, has little chance of holding out for long against Russian pressure."

Ariel Cohen, senior research fellow at the Heritage Foundation in Washington, says Russia's and Belarus's behavior is "an example of how high oil prices embolden people to take destabilizing steps. It's what I call the oil chutzpah factor," he says, citing Iran, Venezuela, the Middle East oil embargo of the 1970s, and now Russia.

However, it would be wrong to simply view Russian energy policy as "imperial posturing," counters Rainer Lindner, a Russian expert at Stiftung Wissenschaft und Politik, a foreign affairs think tank in Berlin. "By ditching privileged oil and gas deals with its neighbors and increasing prices, Russia complies with demands of the World Trade Organization [WTO]. The WTO doesn't accept privileged prices of the type that existed between Russia and its neighbors so far."

To safeguard its own energy security, the EU should offer to mediate between Russia and its neighbors, says Dr. Lindner. Germany in particular "has good relations with Russia and should bring these to bear in the interest of the EU's energy security."

But the EU would require Belarus to make reforms, he adds. "The EU doesn't readily accept a regime like Belarus at the negotiating table without conditions. "The message is simple: 'If you want us to moderate, you have to meet certain political standards.' This could effect a kind of regime change there."

Moscow Stops Oil Exports To Belarus (WT)

By Michael Mainville

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

MOSCOW -- Russia yesterday halted oil exports to Belarus amid a bitter trade dispute between Moscow and Minsk, cutting off supplies to several European countries and highlighting concerns over Russia's reliability as an energy supplier.

Accusing Belarus of stealing oil headed for Europe, Russia suspended exports via the Druzhba ("Friendship") pipeline, halting supplies to several countries, including Germany and Poland.

Authorities in Belarus said oil was taken as a form of transit payment imposed on Jan. 1 that Moscow has refused to pay.

The halt in oil exports comes a year after Russia cut off supplies of natural gas to Ukraine because of a price dispute, disrupting supplies to parts of Europe during a chilly January 2006.

The oil cutoff is unlikely to cause a repeat of last year's panic over gas supplies because European refineries typically carry several months of inventory.

Nevertheless, yesterday's cutoff renewed concerns over Russia's willingness to use its vast oil and gas exports as a political weapon.

It marked a major escalation of a crisis in relations between Russia and Belarus, a country long considered one of Moscow's closest allies.

"Belarus has cast caution to the wind by starting to take oil because Russia is not paying a duty it illegally imposed. This looks like a trade war," Andrei Sharonov, Russia's deputy economic development minister, told Ekho Moskvy radio.

He warned Russia was ready to take economic steps against its neighbor: "One must not forget that Russia is the biggest market and No. 1 economic partner for Belarus. Therefore, we have the possibilities to apply measures to Belarus."

Russian pipeline monopoly, Transneft, said in a statement yesterday that it had been forced to act after Belarus "began tapping oil destined only for customers in Western Europe from the Druzhba pipeline unilaterally, without any warning."

The company said Belarus had siphoned off 79,000 metric tons of oil since Saturday.

Belarus insisted it was not to blame for the crisis and was acting legitimately.

"The Belarusian side is not at fault for the drop in pressure at the entrance of the Druzhba oil pipeline," Foreign Ministry spokesman Andrei Popov said. "Belarus was forced to take measures to avoid economic damage and a shortage of vital fuel and energy resources."

A Belarusian delegation headed to Moscow last night for urgent talks.

DOJ_NMG_0114481

German Economy Minister Michael Glos said reserves would guarantee oil supplies even in the event of lengthy disruptions.

But he also said the incident demonstrated that "one-sided dependencies must not be allowed to develop."

Europe is heavily dependent on energy supplies from Russia, the world's second-largest oil exporter after Saudi Arabia.

The 2,500-mile-long Druzhba pipeline, built in the 1960s to tie then-communist Eastern Europe to Soviet energy supplies, carries 18 million metric tons of oil to Poland each year and 22 million metric tons to Germany, or one-fifth of its oil imports.

The pipeline has a southern branch that supplies oil to Ukraine, Hungary, Slovakia and the Czech Republic.

The dispute began when Russia this year imposed new export duties on oil sold to Belarus, where the economy is heavily dependent on refining Russian crude.

Belarus retaliated by imposing a $45-per-ton transit fee on Russian oil headed for Europe that Moscow has refused to pay.

The oil row follows a dispute over the more than doubling of Russian natural-gas prices for Belarus. The gas dispute was resolved on New Year's Eve, only hours before Russia was set to cut off supplies to the country of 10 million.

The energy disputes are severely straining ties between the two traditional allies, who in the past have discussed forming a political union.

Belarusian President Alexander Lukashenko -- branded Europe's last dictator by the United States -- has been showing signs of increasing independence from Moscow since his re-election last year.

Moscow insists it is seeking market prices for energy supplies and that its neighbors no longer deserve Soviet-era subsidies.

But critics accuse the Kremlin of using its vast energy reserves as a political tool to restore its international influence.

Oil Line To Europe Is Cut Off (LAT)

By David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

MOSCOW — A dispute between longtime allies Russia and Belarus over oil taxes escalated Monday, leading to a cutoff in the flow of crude oil through a pipeline serving European customers.

Officials in Minsk, the Belarusian capital, issued conflicting statements as to whether Belarus had intentionally cut off the flow of oil through the Druzhba (Friendship) pipeline, which crosses Belarus to link Russia and the European Union. Later in the day, Russia said it had stopped supplying oil to the pipeline, blaming Belarus for the move.

"I would like to stress that Belarus was the first to suspend the transit of Russian oil intended for third countries via its territory," Andrei Sharonov, Russia's deputy trade and economic development minister, said in an interview with Vesti-24 television. "Russia moved to suspend supplies to Belarus in response."

The incident reignited a debate about the reliability of Russia as an energy supplier. The European Union relies on Russia for about 40% of its natural gas imports and about 30% of its oil imports. Russia is the world's largest exporter of natural gas and the second-largest oil exporter, after Saudi Arabia.

News of Monday's pipeline shutdown initially drove oil futures higher in New York and London as traders worried about energy shortages. But the rally couldn't be sustained on the New York Mercantile Exchange because warm weather in the U.S. has put a damper on demand for petroleum products, and crude for February delivery closed Monday at $56.09 a barrel, off 22 cents. In London, the European benchmark Brent crude fell 4 cents to $55.60 a barrel.

"We have much more of a cushion in crude and gasoline supplies than we had last year after the hurricanes in the Gulf [of Mexico]. That cushion is offering a little bit of a buffer to these stories," said Phil Flynn, vice president and senior market analyst for Alaron Trading Corp. in Chicago.

The oil dispute was triggered by Russia's new customs duty of $180 per metric ton on oil exports to Belarus. The tax took effect Jan. 1. Belarus retaliated by imposing a charge of $45 per ton for oil shipped through the pipeline to the European Union, which Minsk initially called a customs duty but now describes as a transit fee.

The oil dispute erupted immediately after Moscow and Minsk worked out a last-minute New Year's Eve deal ending an argument over natural gas prices. Belarus yielded to a Russian demand to pay in the new year slightly more than double the 2006 price. Belarusian officials had expressed unhappiness with that deal, which averted the threat of a midwinter disruption of gas supplies to European customers.

Despite the significant price hike, Belarus still receives Russian natural gas for less than half the amount charged to other European Union customers.

The natural gas standoff in late December resembled a pricing dispute a year earlier between Russia and Ukraine. In that case, failure to reach a contract by Jan. 1, 2006, led to a brief disruption of gas supplies to European Union countries

DOJ_NMG_0114482

Officials in European capitals expressed concern Monday about the oil cutoff but said there was no immediate risk to sufficient energy supplies in the European Union. The pipeline delivers 20% of Germany's yearly oil supply, but Berlin was not panicked: The winter has been mild, and officials said the country had 130 days' worth of reserves.

"I view the closure of the important Druzhba pipeline with concern," German Economics Minister Michael Glos said. "I expect the deliveries through the pipeline to resume completely as soon as possible."

Crude oil shipped through the pipeline is refined into products such as gasoline and heating fuel. The current Russia-Belarus spat over oil has resulted in European politicians calling for less reliance on Russian oil and gas.

Guido Westerwelle, chairman of Germany's Free Democrats, said Monday that the new dispute demonstrated a need for his nation "to get more independent from foreign energy supplies."

"It would be much more sensible if we would have a mix of energy resources," Westerwelle said. "This is not only an ecological or economic question. It is also an issue of foreign relations, which would make us more independent and less subject to blackmail."

Belarus and Russia accuse each other of violating bilateral economic agreements on duty-free trade by instituting the new charges on oil. Semyon Vainshtok, head of the state-owned Russian oil pipeline monopoly Transneft, accused Belarus of siphoning off oil illegally.

Belarusian President Alexander G. Lukashenko has been widely criticized in the West as "Europe's last dictator," and he has been heavily dependent on economic and political support from Moscow.

Until Russia imposed the new customs duty on oil, Belarus was able to import Russian oil at domestic Russian prices, refine it into petroleum products at Soviet-era factories and export the goods at a high profit. That provided an important subsidy to Belarus' state-controlled economy, helping Lukashenko to keep his grip on power. The cutoff of the Russian subsidy could have political as well as economic effects in Belarus.

Although Moscow has at times shown frustration with Lukashenko's heavy-handed rule and preservation of a largely Soviet-style economy, Russia and Belarus have maintained close ties and discussed uniting into a single state. If such an agreement were reached, that would be a small step toward restoring a semblance of the Soviet Union, which collapsed in 1991.

The bitterness evident in the gas and oil disputes appears to be rapidly undercutting any prospects for unity talks, which had never appeared very likely to most observers.

The oil spat threatens more-tense relations. As one example, a Belarusian customs spokesman told Russian news agency Interfax on Monday that Belarus would require Russian citizens entering the country by car to obtain temporary entry permits for their vehicles.

At a government meeting in Minsk on Wednesday, Lukashenko accused Russia of "extremely unfriendly steps" in the natural gas pricing dispute and indicated that he was prepared to take wide-ranging risks in his relationship with Moscow to fight for better economic terms.

Lukashenko instructed officials "to send proposals to Russia in the first quarter of the year concerning payments for everything they are receiving here free now — starting from military facilities."

Russian Defense Minister Sergei B. Ivanov said Saturday that he believed Belarusian authorities would not allow economic disputes to affect military ties, Interfax reported. The two countries have prepared an agreement on unifying their air defense systems, he said, expressing hope that it would be signed soon.

A Belarusian delegation left Monday evening for Moscow for oil talks expected to begin today.

Russia Halts Oil Flow To Belarus In Dispute (WP)

By Peter Finn

Washington Post, January 9, 2007

MOSCOW, Jan. 8 -- Russia on Monday shut off crude oil supplies that flow by pipeline across Belarus to Germany, Poland and other parts of Eastern Europe, charging that Belarus was illegally siphoning off oil meant for the other countries.

The dispute between two erstwhile allies will have little immediate effect because the end-customer countries have strategic reserves for at least two months. But it is rekindling discussion in Europe about the reliability of Russia as a supplier of energy.

"This shows us once again that arguments among various countries of the former Soviet Union, between suppliers and transit countries, mean that these deliveries are unreliable from our perspective," Poland's deputy economy minister, Piotr Naimski, said in a television interview. Poland has long been suspicious of Russia's dominance of energy supplies on the Continent.

DOJ_NMG_0114483

Belarus, led by authoritarian President Alexander Lukashenko, has poor relations with the United States and Western Europe. It is unlikely to garner the kind of international sympathy that Ukraine, for example, enjoyed when Russia cut off its natural gas in a pricing dispute last January.

The convulsions over Russia's pricing of energy supplies to its neighbors also extend to Azerbaijan, which announced Monday that it had halted the export of oil to Russia. Officials in the Caspian Sea nation said they planned to divert the oil to power stations in their country to replace Russian natural gas.

Russia doubled the price of natural gas for Azerbaijan on Jan. 1, but the country refused to accept the rate of $230 per 1,309 cubic yards, the price that Western European countries pay.

The disputes with Belarus and Azerbaijan, following Russian confrontations with Ukraine and Georgia, are likely to give new urgency to efforts in parts of Europe to diversify the supply chain and reduce dependence on Russia, one of the Continent's most important suppliers. In 2004, it provided about 27 percent of the oil consumed in the European Union, according to the bloc.

For years, Russia and Belarus have been bound together by Moscow's provision of cheap energy in return for political loyalty. But the Kremlin appears to have tired of subsidizing Lukashenko, whose government could face an economic crisis brought on by higher energy costs.

The two countries have flirted with the idea of forming a political union, but Russia is interested in absorbing Belarus as a province, while Lukashenko has insisted on a union of equal states, an idea the Kremlin finds ludicrous. The idea appears finished, at least under the current leadership of both countries, according to Irina Kobrinskaya, an analyst at the Institute of World Economy and International Relations in Moscow. "The union state is a myth," she said in an interview.

The European Union's energy commissioner, Andris Piebalgs, said he wanted an "urgent and detailed explanation" from both Belarus and Russia as to why the pipeline carrying Russian crude was closed. European officials said Germany has enough oil in reserve to last 130 days, and Poland has enough for 70 days.

Each year, approximately 100 million tons of Russian oil crosses Belarusan territory in pipelines. Russian officials said they were examining ways of rerouting oil. The pipeline network crossing Belarus also supplies the Czech Republic, Hungary, Lithuania and Slovakia.

Belarus's command economy has been heavily dependent on subsidized natural gas and crude oil from Russia, which is now insisting that the government in Minsk pay more.

On New Year's Eve, Belarus reluctantly agreed to a doubling of natural gas prices and a gradual shift to market prices by 2011. The deal also provided for the Russian state-controlled energy giant Gazprom to acquire a 50 percent stake in the gas pipeline system owned by Belarus.

But the two countries continued to spar over cheap crude oil. Belarus has earned billions of dollars from processing cheap Russian oil and then exporting it to Western Europe. Last month, Russia imposed an export duty of $180 per ton of oil sold to Belarus, a severe blow to the country's reprocessing industry and government revenue. Belarus responded by imposing an import duty of $45 per ton of Russian oil that crossed its territory.

Russia accused Belarus of siphoning off 79,000 tons of crude oil since Saturday and threatened retaliation.

"This looks like a trade war," Andrei Sharonov, Russia's deputy economic development and trade minister, said on Echo Moskvy radio. "One should not forget that Russia is the biggest market and number one economic partner for Belarus. Therefore we have the possibility to apply measures to Belarus and get the duty canceled."

A Belarusan delegation flew to Moscow Monday evening for emergency talks.

Moscow-Minsk Dispute Leaves Europe In A Quandary (FT)

By Arkady Ostrovsky And Quentin Peel

Financial Times, January 9, 2007

Russia has very few friends among the former Soviet republics. Its spat with Belarus suggests it is fast losing one of the last.

In spite of the mercurial moods of Alexander Lukashenko, Belarus's authoritarian ruler, the country has long been one of Russia's closest allies, enjoying its generous subsidies in the form of cheap oil and gas. In reality, the Kremlin has been getting increasingly irritated with the antics of the man it has kept in power.

Kremlin officials seem to have decided that the dubious political benefits of supporting Mr Lukashenko are now outweighed by his failure to show respect for the Russian president. In a Russian election year, they seem determined to inflict a serious blow to his prestige and demonstrate their own strength.

For the European Union, the confrontation between the two erstwhile allies presents a dilemma: the EU members have no love for Mr Lukashenko and have long sought to persuade Moscow to cut off his sub-sidies. But equally, they do not want to encourage the Kremlin to use its energy supplies for political purposes, and nor do they want the pipelines to dry up.

DOJ_NMG_0114484

On paper, Moscow and Minsk were supposed to be working towards a political and economic union, including a single currency. In practice, the idea has lost its appeal to Mr Lukashenko, ever since he realised that the merger was more likely to be a takeover and his own role in the new union would be reduced to that of local governor.

Observers in Moscow say there is no love lost between Vladimir Putin, Russia's president, and Mr Lukashenko. But they also say that while Mr Putin loathes his Belarusan counterpart, he is even less well-disposed to the idea of Belarus being swept by a pro-western uprising. Hence the Russian support for Mr Lukashenko's re-election last year.

But despite his material backing, Mr Putin has seen little in return from his Belrusan colleague, and his patience appears finally to have snapped.

Belarus used to receive Russian crude oil duty free and resold it in the form of refined products at a hefty profit. It was supposed to hand on 85 per cent of the profit to Moscow but had long stopped doing so. Moreover, according to Andrei Sharonov, Russia's deputy minister for economic development, Mr Lukashenko imposed arbitrary taxes on Russian oil companies and made them sell oil to Belarusan intermediaries.

On January 1, Russia introduced a standard $180 export duty on its crude oil, depriving Mr Lukashenko of an annual profit of nearly $2bn. But the Belarusan leader responded by slapping a duty of $45 per tonne on Russian oil transiting through Belarus.

"If those in Russia, choking on this influx of petrodollars and other sources of hard currency, are still willing to make a scapegoat of Belarus . . . then let's ask the Russian Federation – so huge and so rich – to pay us in full for our services," Mr Lukashenko said.

Moscow says the unilateral imposition of an export duty on oil transit breaks every international norm and refuses to pay. But Mr Lukashenko decided to play a hard-ball game and on Saturday started to take Russian oil from the pipeline as "a payment in kind".

Whatever the cause, this latest interruption of Russian energy supplies to Europe in just over a year is likely to dent further its reputation as a reliable supplier. But Belarus has more to lose. Some 50 per cent of all Belarus exports go to Russia and a full trade war would be disastrous for the Belarusan economy and its political regime. Mr Lukashenko has no support in Europe or in the US. Russia is his only lifeline.

For the EU, the dispute opens the awful prospect of having to choose between an authoritarian but relatively independent Belarus, or an unpredictable change of regime with Moscow calling the shots.

Russian Extortion, Continued (WP)

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

Now an oil pipeline through Belarus runs dry. Will its customers in Western Europe finally be stirred?

RUSSIA'S CONTINUING attempt to squeeze neighboring Belarus yesterday led to the shutdown of a pipeline carrying oil to Europe -- another stark reminder of how the Kremlin's aggressive use of energy as a political tool threatens Western democracies as well as its neighbors. Just days after forcing Belarus to accept a huge increase in the price of natural gas, the government of Vladimir Putin stopped oil deliveries in an attempt to impose a large new duty that would eliminate a longstanding and lucrative subsidy. Because the pipeline carrying oil to Minsk also serves the rest of Europe, Poland, Germany and other European Union countries also did not receive Russian oil deliveries. Those countries have reserves to fill the gap for the near future. But once again the message should be clear: Countries that depend on Russia for energy can be subject to capricious and politically motivated demands -- and interruptions of supplies if those demands are not met.

Belarus has been a faithful ally of Russia; its autocratic president, Alexander Lukashenko, has made himself a pariah in the West by stealing elections, imprisoning and murdering opposition leaders, and supplying weapons to rogue states. But Mr. Lukashenko has irritated Mr. Putin by failing to follow through on an agreement to merge his country with Russia. Now he is getting his punishment: an abrupt withdrawal of energy subsidies that in recent years have propped up his state-dominated economy. The Belarusan president consequently must choose between giving Mr. Putin what he wants or trying to make Belarus a genuinely independent country. Since the latter would require groundbreaking political and economic liberalization, the Kremlin's risk may not be great. Belarus has already agreed to hand control of its gas pipeline to Russia, a concession Mr. Lukashenko had long resisted.

Other Russian neighbors are fighting back against its energy imperialism. Azerbaijan last week stopped buying Russian gas rather than agree to a huge price increase; it then reduced the amount of oil it pumps through a Russian-controlled pipeline. Azerbaijan offended Mr. Putin by agreeing to supply its own gas from a field soon to come online to neighboring Georgia, whose democratic and pro-Western government is Moscow's first target. Both Caucasian countries have the prospect of ending reliance on Russian supplies in the near future; in that respect, they are considerably better off than the European Union, which gets a quarter of its gas from Russia.

DOJ_NMG_0114485

Western governments are watching Mr. Putin's hardball tactics with concern; yesterday they called for an immediate resumption of supplies through the Belarusan pipeline. They do not, however, have a policy for countering the Russian threat. Even the members of the European Union cannot agree among themselves on whether to appease Russia -- by offering new long-term contracts and capital for investment in oil and gas projects -- or push back, which they could do by insisting that Mr. Putin sign an international "energy charter" that would curtail his monopolistic practices. The attack on Belarus ought to rule out the appeasement option.

The Face Of El Salvador's Charm Offensive (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

Like much of Washington's diplomatic corps, El Salvador's consul general, Ana Margarita Chavez, spends her days conferring with U.S. officials and her nights cruising to parties in a black sport-utility vehicle with diplomatic plates.

That is where the similarity ends.

While her counterparts from other nations stick to such traditional consular services as renewing passports and helping their countrymen sort out immigration problems, Chavez, a petite 49-year-old with long black curls and a bubbly laugh, is more like a social worker on steroids.

During weekly appearances on the area's main Spanish radio shows, Chavez regularly gives out her cellphone number so that immigrants in need of help can reach her directly.

The phone's constant trill is a testament to how many listeners take her up on the offer. During one recent week, Chavez dropped by the Silver Spring home of a Salvadoran construction worker injured in a car accident last year to check on his progress; lined up a job for an out-of-work landscaper in Woodbridge and then personally drove him to the interview; and convinced a young father fighting a bitter custody battle with his estranged wife that their daughter is better off staying with her grandparents in El Salvador.

As for her evening social schedule, Chavez usually skips high-powered bashes in Washington's downtown restaurants or Embassy Row manses in favor of pupusa and wine mixers hosted in suburban churches and community centers by immigrant Salvadoran nurses, restaurant owners and construction contractors seeking to raise money for the impoverished villages they left behind.

Her approach dovetails with a wider charm offensive recently launched by Salvadoran President Elias Antonio Saca, of the pro-business ARENA party, to cement his support among Salvadoran expatriates.

The stakes are high. The Salvadoran government estimates that more than a fourth of the country's citizens live in the United States. The expatriates have been lobbying hard for the right to vote from abroad, and it is generally considered a matter of just a few years before they will get it. Even now, they are believed to exercise enormous sway over voters back home thanks to the estimated $3 billion they send their relatives annually.

During the presidential election in 2004, Saca and his opponent campaigned personally in the Washington area. And shortly after taking office, Saca expanded the foreign ministry to include a vice ministry exclusively dedicated to overseas Salvadorans.

The 16 consulates in the United States are the vice ministry's principal vehicle of operations. The Washington area is among its most important targets. The U.S. Census estimates there are 130,000 foreign-born Salvadorans in the Washington region. The embassy estimates the size of the local Salvadoran community -- including those born here of Salvadoran parents -- at half a million.

At first glance, Chavez might not seem the most obvious choice to win them over. The daughter of a former chief supreme court justice, she hails from the upper crust of a society still highly stratified between rich and poor 14 years after peace accords ended its bloody civil war. Originally an architect, Chavez said that friends in El Salvador's military encouraged her to pursue national security studies and later a career as head of El Salvador's anti-drug commission before she was tapped for the consul general position.

Although she still encounters cynics, Chavez's effervescent, informal style has clearly captivated many local Salvadorans, who quickly fall into addressing her with the familiar "t?" rather than the formal "usted" in Spanish. A year and a half into the job, Chavez has emerged as one of the most recognizable figures within the Salvadoran community -- even as she remains almost completely unknown outside of it.

"Previous consuls have tried to get close to our community, of course. But no one has shown her enthusiasm," said Luis Felipe Romero, president of Salvadorans Associated of Maryland, as he watched Chavez lead a conga line around the dance floor at the charity's annual fundraising party in Northwest Washington on a recent evening. "She comes to every event. She is always insisting that we call her Ana Margarita, not Se?ora Consul. She really identifies with the working-class Salvadoran overseas."

DOJ_NMG_0114486

Much of Chavez's work is conducted without fanfare -- including her periodic visits to Roger Menendez, the construction worker recovering from his car accident in Silver Spring.

"Hello, Roger! How's my sweetheart?" Chavez cooed as she stepped into his darkened bedroom on a recent evening.

Menendez, 28, who lay on a hospital bed and had a feeding tube protruding from his stomach, could only manage a loud, "Mmmmmm."

Chavez, a divorced mother of three grown children, beamed. "You should have seen him when he came out of the coma a couple months ago," she said. "He could only move his eyes. . . . This is great progress."

Chavez maintains that such extracurricular activities are a natural outgrowth of her job as consul.

"You're supposed to be your people's representative over here. So that means you're going to be called on to be everything from mayor, to priest, to psychologist," she said.

During a recent interview in her office in an ultra-modern, government complex in San Salvador, Margarita Escobar, head of the vice ministry for overseas Salvadorans, confirmed that strategy and ticked off an array of other outreach initiatives she and her staff have undertaken so far -- including inviting several hundred expatriate Salvadorans to a forum with Saca late last year, developing pension and health insurance plans for Salvadorans who want to retire in El Salvador and opening a satellite consulate in Woodbridge so that area Salvadoran immigrants don't have to travel as far or wait as long for services.

The unifying theme, Escobar said, is that, "we're trying to make our Salvadorans overseas understand that this government truly cares about them."

Whether the expatriates are receptive to the message is another story.

At the Salvadorans Associated of Maryland fundraiser, Hugo Carballo, a union organizer who has lived in Fairfax for nearly 20 years, said he appreciated Chavez's presence at the event, as well as her help coordinating local immigrant relief efforts after Hurricane Stan launched mudslides across El Salvador and other Central American nations in 2005.

"But what I really want from this government is for them to give us the right to vote, and it just seems like there's no political will to make it happen quickly," he said. "God knows we Salvadorans in the United States do so much for our country. They need to take us into account, to recognize our contribution -- maybe even give us our own representative in the National Assembly."

Emily Castro, a special education teacher living in Northern Virginia, was even more indignant.

"As a representative of the Salvadoran government, she should be ashamed to be here," Castro muttered, glancing over at Chavez after Romero made a presentation highlighting the desperate poverty of the Salvadoran children for whom the association buys school supplies and bemoaning the fact that the association could not help more of them.

"The government should be solving these problems, not asking this community that is working so hard over here and that has so little of our own to take care of it," she said.

About an hour later, Castro confronted Chavez directly -- telling her that three Salvadoran girls at her school were pregnant and asking bluntly, "What the hell do you guys ever do for us?"

Chavez's smile wavered slightly. But she quickly regained her composure and began peppering Castro with questions about the case and assuring her that the consulate would be eager to form a partnership to combat teen pregnancy.

"She doesn't believe me now. But she'll see when I call her next week to follow up," Chavez whispered to a colleague as Castro strode off. "I bet you I win her over."

South Africans See Hope Of Unity In A Prospect For Presidency (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

JOHANNESBURG, Jan. 8 -- The purported presidential ambitions of a gregarious multimillionaire have sent South Africa into a frenzy of political speculation this week, while offering a glimpse into the normally secretive struggle over picking the nation's next leader.

Several top African National Congress leaders approached Tokyo Sexwale, a seasoned politician and businessman, about running for the party presidency, the Sunday Times newspaper reported under the banner headline "Tokyo guns for presidency." The job, to be filled at a national convention in December, is widely regarded as the steppingstone to becoming elected president of the nation in 2009.

Sexwale -- whose knack for publicity was honed during a stint playing the Donald Trump role in South Africa's version of "The Apprentice" -- dismissed the report as "spurious" in a statement issued Monday afternoon. "They are kite-flying, nothing more than a red herring, and we treat them with disdain," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0114487

The denial by Sexwale, 53, was widely disregarded by South Africans familiar with the ways of the ANC; leaders running for party office traditionally pretend that they would be just as happy being, say, municipal dogcatcher as president. In the past year a succession of leading contenders for the party presidency have reacted similarly -- in public at least -- to news reports that they coveted the top job.

The Sexwale news dominated newspaper headlines and radio call-in shows on Monday both because of the specificity of the Sunday Times report, which laid out several apparently strategic maneuvers by Sexwale in anticipation of a run, and because he is widely seen as a conciliatory figure in a deeply divided party.

"He's seen as somebody who is above the fray," said political analyst Xolela Mangcu, speaking from the judicial capital of Bloemfontein, where he was traveling. "The whole bloodletting that's been happening to the ANC has to stop. . . . This country can't move forward with a divided ruling party."

The ANC, whose massive advantage in voter support allows it to dominate South African politics at every level, fractured in June 2005 when President Thabo Mbeki fired his deputy and heir apparent, Jacob Zuma, over allegations of corruption.

Supporters of Zuma, a populist with close ties to South Africa's Communist Party and labor movement, reacted with fury, at one point burning a flag bearing the image of Mbeki. Zuma's political comeback gained momentum after a pair of legal judgments in 2006 cleared him of rape charges and dismissed corruption charges. And though his legal troubles may not be over, Zuma is seen both as the leader of the ANC's left wing and of the nation's large population of ethnic Zulus. Analysts say he remains a contender for the presidency.

Mbeki, meanwhile, has seen his influence ebb during a bruising succession struggle carried out almost entirely behind closed doors. His second five-year term as national president is due to end in 2009, and though he is constitutionally barred from running for the office again, Mbeki has not ruled out seeking the party presidency in December. He has not publicly backed a candidate for either job, though he has said he believes that South Africa's next president should be a woman.

"The ANC knows it needs a compromise candidate because the party is split down the middle," said Rhoda Kadalie, a political columnist based in Cape Town.

Sexwale's politics are difficult to label, despite his stint in the 1990s as premier of South Africa's bustling Gauteng province, which includes Johannesburg, Soweto and Pretoria. A student leader in the 1960s, he later joined the ANC's armed wing in exile in Swaziland and did military training in the Soviet Union. He was a close friend of Communist Party leader Chris Hani, who was assassinated in 1993.

He reportedly remains close to former president Nelson Mandela, with whom he spent years while behind bars at the notorious Robben Island prison during the apartheid era.

He left politics in 1998 for what became a lucrative career in the private sector, founding Mvelaphanda Holdings, a huge mining and energy company, and establishing himself as one of the most visible members of the nation's growing group of elite black businessmen who found riches after the ANC came to power.

Sexwale's history of strained relations with Mbeki was long rumored to be one of the reasons he left politics. In 2001, he was accused of being part of a plot to overthrow Mbeki, but he and the others accused were exonerated.

The Sunday Times reported that Sexwale recently invited Mbeki's wife to join in some business deals.

Analysts also note that Sexwale's wife is white, a fact that some believe could, if he were president, diminish the polarized nature of racial discussion in South Africa.

"Somebody like Tokyo could take us out of that and put us on a new path," Mangcu said.

Another popular businessman often mentioned as a candidate for president is former ANC activist Cyril Ramaphosa, though he too has denied seeking the job. The list of possible candidates also includes party Secretary General Kgalema Motlanthe, Deputy President Phumzile Mlambo-Ncguka, Foreign Minister Nkosazana Dlamini-Zuma, Finance Minister Trevor Manuel and Defense Minister Mosiuoa Lekota.

U.S. To Drop Charges In '99 Uganda Killings (WT)

By Jim McElhatton

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

Federal prosecutors in the District yesterday sought to drop felony murder charges against three Rwanda citizens who faced possible death sentences in connection with the 1999 kidnapping and killing of two American tourists in Uganda.

The move comes five months after U.S. District Judge Ellen Huvelle suppressed confessions by defendants Francois Karake, Leonidas Bimenyimana and Gregoire Nyaminani, who were reputed members of the Liberation Army of Rwanda.

The government's case relied heavily on the defendants' confessions, but Judge Huvelle barred prosecutors from using the statements. The judge ruled the confessions were inadmissible because evidence showed the defendants were tortured while imprisoned by Rwandan authorities.

DOJ_NMG_0114488

"The United States is unable to proceed to trial at this time...," assistant U.S. attorneys Jonathan M. Malis and Jeffrey Beatrice stated in a court memo filed yesterday.

U.S. officials charged the men more than three years ago in the bludgeoning deaths of U.S. citizens Robert Haubner and his wife, Susan Miller, of Portland, Ore.

The couple, on a safari vacation, was killed with six other tourists from New Zealand and Britain after men armed with automatic weapons, axes and machetes raided their tourist camp in a national park in Uganda on March 1, 1999.

In court documents, prosecutors called the killings "brutal murders" intended to send a message to the United States against supporting the Rwandan government.

Prosecutors said the men charged were among a band of about 100 that invaded the Bwindi Impenetrable Forest National Park, a remote rain forest in the southwestern region of Uganda known for the presence of rare mountain gorillas. The group attacked the park's guards and sentries, killing four, including one guard who was burned alive to discourage resistance.

The attackers rounded up more than 20 tourists from the campground and separated 17 who spoke English. The captives were marched by force into the forest toward the border of the Democratic Republic of Congo. Two other Americans were among those captured and later released. Three women, including Mrs. Miller, were raped before being killed.

Despite the prosecutors' setback, they said other evidence might lead to a new trial.

"While the United States is unable to proceed to trial at this time, it may be able to do so in the future based on evidence apart from the defendants' confessions," they said.

A hearing date hasn't been set on the government's motion. If granted, it's expected the defendants will be released from the D.C. Jail. They also could be deported.

"Once the court official dismisses the indictment... the defendants will be handled as would any other person or persons who do not have legal immigration status to remain in the U.S.," said Channing Phillips, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office.

However, returning the defendants to Rwanda raises other legal questions, said David I. Bruck, a lawyer and death penalty authority at Washington and Lee University.

"If the problem with the case is that they were tortured by the people who gave them to us, how do we send them back?" he asked. "What do we do with them next?"

Mr. Bruck said the case was "extremely unusual" from the start because the federal government was prosecuting murders that occurred in another country.

"It eventually became quite obvious that when you import a defendant from another jurisdiction, you import with them all of the human rights violations and chaos from the country where they were found."

In announcing the arrests in 2003, then-Assistant U.S. Attorney General Michael Chertoff, who is now secretary of the federal Department of Homeland Security, said the indictment should "serve as a warning."

"Those who commit acts of terror against Americans will be hunted, captured and brought to justice," he said.

The move to dismiss the charges in the Ugandan killings marks the second recent setback for federal prosecutors in the District in a capital punishment case.

D.C. law bars the death penalty, but capital punishment can be sought in federal cases.

In October, U.S. District Judge Richard W. Roberts said prosecutors could not seek the death penalty against reputed leaders of the so-called Congress Park Crew street gang, citing a missed filing deadline.

Meanwhile, jury selection is beginning this week in another capital murder case in federal court in the District. The defendant, Larry Gooch, is charged with killing five persons in his role as enforcer for the M Street Crew, a PCP ring that operated in Northeast.

The Troubles Of Sista P. (NYT)

By Orlando Patterson

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

Kingston, Jamaica

Thirty-two years ago, a young working-class woman, Portia Simpson, exploded onto the Jamaican political scene with an unexpected electoral victory in the slums of southwestern Kingston, the heart of opposition party turf, dominated by armed political gangs.

Soon after, I accompanied her on a tour of the area in the hope of laying plans for an urban upgrading project. As we approached Rema, a notorious opposition holdout, five gunshots pierced the heat. Dashing for cover, I looked back to see Simpson being reluctantly pulled away by two of her aides. Left to herself, she would have carried on, so deep was her hunger to help the people from whom she had just risen. I thought then that this woman would go far.

She did. Last February, Portia Simpson-Miller stunned the political establishment by outmaneuvering the heir apparent, Peter Phillips, in the struggle to succeed Prime Minister P. J. Patterson, who retired in midterm, and in March she took office as Jamaica's first female leader. There was national jubilation, especially among women, who wept at the sight of "Momma," "Auntie Portia" or "Sista P.," as they lovingly call her.

Even skeptics felt that it was hard to do worse than what the men had achieved for the mass of Jamaicans in abysmal poverty, after four decades of modernization that had benefited only the middle and upper classes. Simpson's approval ratings soared, and for a heady few weeks the claims of her supporters that the healing hand of a woman was what the country needed seemed borne out. And an almost tactile sense of unity and good will soothed the anxieties of daily life in this overheated polity.

The honeymoon was brief. Hardly two months into her leadership, opposition forces and the media unleashed a barrage of criticisms against her, the gist being that she was hopelessly unqualified for the job. Her modest education, undistinguished performance in Parliament, Creole speech, populism and refusal to face the press have been grist for the media and opposition mill. What turned a tidal wave of criticism into a tsunami, however, was the revelation that a Dutch commodities firm, Trafigura Beheer BV, which does business with the government, had misrepresented a campaign donation of $470,000 that it made to her party. In fact, Jamaica has no campaign finance laws to break, and there is a long tradition of businesses donating to political parties. The government, however, handled the revelation ineptly before returning the money, providing endless fodder for the media.

On Sunday, I had a candid two-hour conversation with Sista P. at her official residence. She is as defiant as ever. At 61, she appears in her early 40s, her youthfulness emphasized by deep bangs hanging over dark, sparkling eyes. She noted that in 2006 the economy grew at one of its fastest rates in years, 2.4 percent, inflation was low, 5.3 percent, and that major crime fell by 20 percent. So why the criticisms?

"Because I'm a woman in a field dominated by men, and because of my background," she insisted. Why has she been avoiding the press? "I've been beaten, banged and bashed by the media," she said. "They are trying to kill my charisma" because "every time they see me they are looking at the majority of Jamaicans who are poor and they can only think, 'How dare this uppity woman.' " She added later, "As leader, I have the right to refuse to speak to those who misrepresent what I say."

She dismissed the Trafigura affair as a media exaggeration, the only impropriety coming from the company, which, to circumvent Dutch laws, misrepresented the donation. She is confident of winning the coming elections, although her approval rating in polls is down to 30 percent.

Mistakes have been made, and Sista P. has to change her attitude toward the press, but I share her belief that Jamaica's patriarchalism and class biases are stacked against her. So, too, is the British parliamentary system that operates here, which requires of leaders a demanding mix of political, debating and executive skills.

Sista P. embraced me and kissed me on the cheek as we parted, and I wished her luck in the coming elections, required by October. She is going to need it.

DOJ_NMG_0114490

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, January 10, 2007 8:10 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Wednesday, January 10, 2007
Attachments:	agnb070110.pdf; agnb070110.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 10, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

House Passes Anti-Terror Bill....4
Prosecutor Finishes Closing Argument At Hamas-Funding Trial....4
Siraj Family Arrested On Immigration Charges....5
Lawyer For CIA Agent Quits Italy Case....5
British To Email Terror Alerts....5

Homeland Response:

Man Pleads Not Guilty To Chicago Mall Attack Plot....5
Leahy To Hold Hearing On Data Mining Programs....6
Chertoff Announces Infrastructure Grants Targeting High-Risk Cities....6
Testimony Begins In Katrina Insurance Suit....6

War News:

Bush To Announce Troop Boost, Timetable For Iraqis To Take Over....6
Democrats To Hold Votes On "Surge," With 10 GOP Senators "Likely" To Oppose Bush....10
Major Action Against Insurgents Underway In Baghdad....12
Iraqi Vice President Ask US Not To "Give Up On Iraq."....13
Expert Says Iraq War Has Shifted Alliances In Middle East....13
Blair Criticizes Manner Of Saddam Execution....13
Lawyer Remembers Combat In Iraq....13
US Strikes Al Qaeda In Somalia....13
Government Changes Recruiting Practices....15

Corporate Scandals:

US Alleges Conrad Black Committed Insider Trading....15
DOJ Wants More Time To Consider Rehearing In Westar Conviction Reversal....16
Home Depot Board May Feel Effects Of Nardelli Ouster....16
Mills May Seek Bankruptcy Filing After Accounting Probe....16
Writers Decry Options Backdating Prosecutions....17

Criminal Law:

House Report Contradicts DOJ On Archives Document Theft....18
House Committees Delay Response To Cunningham Subpoenas....18
New Orleans Attempts To Curb Crime Wave....19
Former Interior Deputy Is Target In Abramoff Probe....20
Judge Rejects Media Request For Libby Trial Audio Recordings....21
Lack Of Cooperation From Agencies Prompted FBI To Quit Leak Probes....21
Judge Appoints Federal Prosecutor To Help Israeli Criminal Probe....21
Former New Jersey Mayor Pleads Guilty To Taking Bribes....22
Tennessee Waltz Trial Jurors See FBI Video Of Alleged Bribe....22
FBI Arrests California College Official On Bribery Charges....22
Judge Rejects Devecchio Bid For Federal Trial....23
9th Circuit Panel Rules Gang Attorneys Cannot Have Access To Witness Identities....23
Grand Jury Mulls Idaho Kidnapping, Murder Charges....23
Los Angeles To Shift Anti-Gang Tactics....23

Civil Law:

Judge Dismisses Challenge To VA's Use Of Religion In Veteran's Treatment....24

Civil Rights:

Jury Continues Deliberations In Texas Smuggling Death Trial....24
DOJ Rules Against Appointment Of Alabama County Commissioner....24
Michigan Islamic Group Urges FBI Probe Of Shiite Mosque Vandalism....25
LAPD Board Will Not Punish Officer In Fatal Shooting Of Teen....25

NYTimes Applauds Spitzer's Move On Inmates' Calls 26

Antitrust:

Newspapers Plan Joint Sales Of Web Site Advertisements 26
Senate Plans Hearing On Impact Of Airline Merger 26
Micron Settles Chip Antitrust Suit 26
Congress To Take Up Net Neutrality Bills 27
Aloha Airlines Takes Mesa To Court 27
FTC Gives Antitrust Nod To Hain-Avalon Deal 27
Supreme Court Lowers Threshold For Patent Lawsuits 27

Environment:

DOJ Probing Possible Ethical Violations At Mineral Agency .. 28
Florida City To Target Ex-Utility Heads After DOJ Drops Probe 29
NOAA Affirms Human Role In Climate Change 29
US To Raise Royalty Rates For Gulf Oil And Gas Drilling 30

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

SF Chronicle Argues DOJ Undercut Its Case In BALCO Probe 30
Four Get Prison Sentences In Virginia Cocaine Conspiracy Case 31
Arizona Man Sentenced For 2005 Shootout With US Marshals 31
Mexico Extradites Man To Face Charges In California Deputy's Slaying 31

Immigration:

Demjanjuk To Appeal Deportation Again 32
GOP Lawmakers Ask DOJ To Help Convicted Border Agents Remain Free 32
Border Region Officials Appeal To Congress To Stop Construction Of Wall 32

Tax:

IRS Urged To Drop Private Debt Collection Program 32
Taxpayer Advocate Cites AMT, Income Underreporting As Top Two IRS Problems 33

Congress-Administration:

Bush Withdraws Four Judicial Nominations 34
Bush Renominates Recess Appointments Myers And Sauerbrey 35
Petraeus, Fallon Expected To Be Confirmed Quickly 35
Top State Department Arms Control Official Resigning 35
Tomlinson Withdraws His Nomination For Broadcasting Board Post 35
SMU Faculty Questions Bush Library Plans 35
GOP Senators Reportedly Considering Filibuster Of Minimum Wage Hike 36
House Drug Benefit Bill Spurs Resurgence Of Healthcare Debate 37
Senators Predict Five-Day Work Weeks Won't Last 37
Hoyer Aide Monitors "Hundred Hours Clock." 37
Senate Ethics Reforms Include Gift Ban, Waiting Period 37
Johnson's Condition Upgraded To Fair 38
NYTimes Says Congress Should Support Embryonic Stem Cell Research 38
WSJournal Urges Supreme Court To Back "Paycheck Protection." 38

Other News:

Stocks Finish Mixed 39
Kentucky GOP Eager To Challenge Yarmuth 39
DeMint Endorses Romney 39
Iowa GOP Leaders Cool To McCain 39
Vilsack Says Congress Should Block Funds For Additional Iraq Troops 40
Gilmore Forms Exploratory Committee 40
Clinton Campaign Likely To Be Headquartered In DC Area .. 40
Greens Question Obama's Support For Coal 40
Bayh Donor Base A Sought After Commodity 41
Schwarzenegger Proposes Universal Healthcare Coverage . 41
Schwarzenegger Backs Infrastructure, Renewable Fuels 42
Texas State House Reelects Craddick As Speaker 43
Santorum Takes Post At DC Think Tank 43
Treasury Department Imposes Sanctions On Iranian Bank ... 43
Israel Arrests Muslim Cleric Deported From US 44
Hezbollah Continues Lebanon Protests Despite Smaller Turnout 44
Rice To Leave Friday For Mideast 44
US General Says Pyongyang May Conduct Nuclear Test 45
Rice To Announce Creation Of New Public Diplomacy Award 45
New Congress Likely To Take Harder Stance On Russia 46
Merkel Blasts Russia Over Suspension Of Oil Exports Through Belarus 46
US Criticizes Chavez Plan As Investors Pull Back 46
Cuban Economists Prepare Plans For Post-Castro Market ... 47
Ortega To Be Sworn In Wednesday 47
WTO Welcomes Push To Restart Doha Talks 47
ETA Claims Responsibility For Airport Bomb 48
Violence Erupts In Bangladeshi Capitol Ahead Of Election 48

DOJ_NMG_0114493

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages..... 48

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 49

TERRORISM NEWS:

House Passes Anti-Terror Bill. The House passed a package of anti-terror measures yesterday. Fox News' Special Report (1/9, Hume) reported, "The bill sets a three-year deadline to inspect all air cargo for explosives. The bill affects only the 6 billion lbs. of cargo loaded each year on passenger jets. … Republicans complain that the technology does not exist to inspect passenger jet cargo in a timely fashion."

USA Today (1/10, Hall, 2.27M) notes Rep. Jerry Lewis, former chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, "chided Democrats for passing a bill 'without any indication as to where the money might be coming from.'" He "said 'tens of billions of dollars' would be needed, meaning the bill amounted to 'a statement of policy that is little more than a press release.'"

But the New York Times (1/10, Lipton, 1.16M) says that "after failing to delay action on the bill, many Republicans felt they had no choice but to vote in favor of it -- and 68 did." The AP (1/10, Espo) reports, "The vote was a bipartisan 299-128, and Speaker Nancy Pelosi took the rostrum to announce the passage of the first legislation to clear under the new Democratic majority." Democrats "said the bill's passage was a top priority." The AP adds "several Republicans criticized the legislation as little more than political posturing in the early hours of a new Democratic-controlled Congress. … In a written statement, the Bush administration listed several objections and said it could not support the measure as drafted, but stopped short of a veto threat."

The Washington Times (1/10, DeBose, 88K) notes that in "a statement of administration policy, which usually consists of a dry list of approvals and disapprovals, the White House took a shot at the Democrats. 'The Administration is disappointed that, in a nearly 300-page piece of legislation entitled "Implementing the 9/11 Commission Recommendations Act of 2007," Congress does not address the two outstanding recommendations that apply to the Legislative Branch, which the 9/11 Commission states may be among the most important of all,' the White House said yesterday." The bill "neither reduces the number of congressional committees with oversight and spending authorization over homeland security matters nor does it do the same for intelligence matters, both steps the September 11 commission has suggested."

The Washington Post (1/10, A3, Hsu, 690K) reports, "The bill's biggest detractor, or patron, could be Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), who chairs the Senate's Homeland Security panel and who held his own hearing yesterday. He stopped short of promising -- as House leaders had -- to implement all remaining recommendations of the commission that investigated the 2001 terrorist attacks." Lieberman "said that he hopes by month's end, as requested by Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), to draft and pass a Senate bill 'that will take steps forward to adopt some of the unadopted, unimplemented or inadequately implemented parts' of proposals recommended in 2004 by the bipartisan commission." The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Galouette, 850K) also reports the story.

Democrats Leave Congressional Reform Out Of Security Legislation. CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (1/9, 10:09 pm, Johns) broadcasted that though the House passed "virtually all of the 9/11 commission's reforms" Tuesday, it "did not look at the reform about fixing its own role in homeland security. Ever since its creation, and especially after Hurricane Katrina, the Homeland Security Department has earned the reputation of the government gang that couldn't shoot straight. That mess comes in large part because, according to the 9/11 commission report, dozens of committees and even more subcommittees in congress control a piece of homeland security. … Congress did not do anything about really reducing the committee bureaucracy because that would be stripping new Democratic committee chairmen of all that power. Democratic leaders point out Republicans didn't do it either when they had a chance, because it would have been a complete mess, a jurisdictional food fight."

Prosecutor Finishes Closing Argument At Hamas-Funding Trial. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/10, Robinson) reports Muhammad Salah co-defendant Abdelhaleem Ashqar "was an important Hamas terrorist leader directing thousands of dollars to families of members who were jailed or killed, a prosecutor said Tuesday. 'He's Hamas and he's assisting the murderous terrorist activities of Hamas,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Joseph M. Ferguson told jurors." The AP adds, "Ferguson pointed to testimony that Ashqar directed money to families of Hamas 'martyrs' killed in terrorist operations and those captured and jailed by Israeli authorities." Ashqar was a University of Mississippi graduate student at the time. He "had a telephone in a bogus name and a fax in a different alias, Ferguson said. … Federal agents found that Ashqar spoke on his telephone 568 times in several years with Mousa Abu Marzook, an alleged top Hamas leader who also is charged in the case and is a fugitive believed living in Damascus, Syria."

DOJ_NMG_0114495

Siraj Family Arrested On Immigration Charges. The New York Times (1/10, Rashbaum) reports, "The parents and sister of a man convicted of conspiring to bomb the Herald Square subway station were detained yesterday by federal immigration authorities, who have been seeking to deport them to Pakistan." Shahawar Matin Siraj's "family, who came to the United States in 1999, had been seeking asylum since 2003, citing religious persecution in their home country." ICE spokesman Mark Thorn "could not explain why the action was taken yesterday, other than to say that the detention was part of an administrative process and that criminal cases take priority over administrative ones. It was unclear why the criminal case against Mr. Siraj would have delayed the detentions."

Lawyer For CIA Agent Quits Italy Case. The Washington Times/AP (1/10, Barry) reports a lawyer for a CIA agent "accused in the 2003 kidnapping of an Egyptian cleric in Milan withdrew from the case shortly after a court opened hearings yesterday on whether to indict him and 25 other Americans." Shortly after the proceedings began, the attorney for Robert Seldon Lady withdrew from the case, "saying the former CIA station chief did not want to cooperate." The CIA has refused to comment on the case, the AP notes.

British To Email Terror Alerts. The Washington Post (1/10, A9, Sullivan, 690K) reports, "The British government is offering an e-mail bulletin service to notify people of changes to the nation's terror threat level, a development that illustrates increasing fears of extremist attacks in Britain and the rising power of digital communications. The domestic security agency, MI5, announced the new service Tuesday and said it will also provide e-mail bulletins on 'major developments in national security affairs.'" It "plans to add a service providing the same information in text messages to cellphones, officials said. People would have to register on the MI5 Web site to receive the alerts."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Man Pleads Not Guilty To Chicago Mall Attack Plot. The AP (1/10, Reichgott) reports from Chicago, "A 22-year-old Muslim convert accused by U.S. authorities of being willing to commit acts of 'violent jihad' pleaded not guilty Tuesday to charges that he planned an attack at a shopping mall. … 'I feel well,' Derrick Shareef said at his arraignment. He told U.S. District Judge David Coar he had never been hospitalized for psychiatric treatment." The AP continues, "Shareef was arrested Dec. 6 after allegedly meeting an undercover agent to trade stereo speakers for a pistol and four grenades. … He planned to 'commit acts of violent jihad' by blowing up garbage cans at the mall during the Christmas shopping rush, according to a federal complaint. The complaint also said Shareef considered attacking city halls and courthouses. … 'Any place that's crowded, like a mall is good, anything, any government facility is good,' he allegedly told a secret FBI informant when they talked about possible attack targets. The informant secretly tape-recorded his plans. 'I swear by Allah man, I'm down for it too, I'm down for the cause, I'm down to live for the cause and die for the cause, man.' … Prosecutors have said they were convinced Shareef operated alone and there had been no imminent danger to the public."

The Rockford (IL) Register Star (1/10, Wiser) reports, "Coar asked Shareef standard questions about his education and physical and mental health at the outset of what turned out to be a very brief hearing. … Shareef answered clearly and politely, ending most of his replies with the word 'sir'. He told the judge that he did not graduate high school but obtained his general equivalency diploma, or GED, and had "some college" under his belt. … He said he was not being treated for any physical or mental ailments." The Star adds, "The Justice Department says Shareef, who identified himself as Derrick Omar Shareef in court, had plotted to attack the patrons of CherryVale Mall by placing hand grenades in garbage cans in order to wage jihad. … Authorities said Shareef revealed his plans to an informant who was working with the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Joint-Terrorism Task Force. The informant arrested the 22-year-old former Genoa resident after he exchanged stereo speakers for four non-functioning grenades and a pistol. … Tuesday in court was the first time Shareef was actually able to read the charges against him, Mann said, adding his client doesn't have access to court files where he is being housed and that he himself had only just received a copy of the formal indictment, which was handed down last week."

DOJ_NMG_0114496

Leahy To Hold Hearing On Data Mining Programs. McClatchy Newspapers (1/10, Gordon) reports, "In his first hearing Wednesday as the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Democratic Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont plans to examine federal 'data-mining' programs, the computerized hunt for terrorists that can implicate innocent people." McClatchy cites the case of American Airlines pilot Kieran O'Dwyer, who "said Tuesday that US Customs agents detained him for 90 minutes in 2003 when he got off an international flight in New York, telling him his name matched one on a government terrorist watch list." TSA spokeswoman Amy Kudwa said "an average of 1,500 airline travelers applied each week for redress on the grounds that they'd been mistakenly included on terrorist watch lists." Leahy's chief spokesman, David Carle, said Wednesday's "inquiry had gained import because of powerful new technologies, the outsourcing of data mining to private firms and 'the Bush administration's lack of cooperation' with Congress' attempts to police these surveillance programs."

Chertoff Announces Infrastructure Grants Targeting High-Risk Cities. The Washington Times (1/10, Hudson, 88K) reports DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff yesterday "announced $450 million in security funding for ports, transit systems, and chemical and nuclear plants," targeting "cities most at risk of terrorist attacks, including Washington and New York." Chertoff said last year's grants, which were distributed with "very little guidance," were followed by "a rash of stories ... about communities that spent money on leather jackets or gym equipment or things of that sort." Chertoff said DHS has altered that "willy-nilly approach," replacing it with "a risk-driven allocation of eligibility." USA Today (1/10, Hall, 2.27M) adds that Chertoff said DHS is "investing resources where risk is greatest and where the funds will have the most significant impact." USA notes, "Port security programs will get the largest share of the money: $210 million. Transit security will receive $172 million." Although "New York City and its surrounding communities will come out on top when the money goes out," some lawmakers "still complained that the area wasn't getting enough money."

Testimony Begins In Katrina Insurance Suit. The AP (1/10, Kunzelman) reports from Gulfport, MS, "State Farm Fire & Casualty Co. used a new 'protocol' after Hurricane Katrina to deny claims to many policyholders, a lawyer for a homeowner suing the company said Tuesday in the trial for one of hundreds of pending insurance lawsuits spawned by the massive storm." The AP continues, "William Walker, attorney for State Farm policyholders Norman and Genevieve Broussard of Biloxi, told an eight-member jury in his opening statement that the company refused to pay for any damage to any home that Katrina reduced to a slab in August 2005, including the Broussards'." The AP adds, "State Farm and other companies say their homeowner policies cover damage from wind but not from water - and exclude damage that could have been caused by a combination of both, even if hurricane-force winds preceded a storm's rising water. … 'They denied (the couple's claim) based on this wind/water protocol, this thing that's not in the policy,' Walker told jurors. 'This is a case in which State Farm promised to do something. This is a case in which State Farm decided not to follow those promises.' … The Broussards claim a tornado destroyed their home before any flooding, but State Farm concluded that all the damage was caused by Katrina's storm surge and isn't covered by their policy."

WAR NEWS:

Bush To Announce Troop Boost, Timetable For Iraqis To Take Over. ABC World News (1/9, story 2, 1:30, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported that in his nationally-televised speech tonight, President Bush "will announce…an increase of troops…of more than 20,000 troops. We all along thought it would be around 20,000. They say it will be more than 20,000. Two brigades will be in Iraq within 30 days or, perhaps, a bit longer. … And also, the President will announce he hopes the Iraqis can take over of all of the provinces in Iraq, at least take the lead in battle, by the end of the year." The CBS Evening News (1/9, story 2, 1:05, Axelrod, 7.66M) noted "a member of Congress who met with the President this afternoon says Mr. Bush settled on a surge of 22,000 troops -- 11,000 to be deployed almost immediately over the next couple of weeks, a second wave of 11,000 to be phased in over March, April, May." But "the second wave is somewhat conditional, a carrot, if you will. In other words, Mr. Bush essentially says to the Iraqis you become more effective partners in making Baghdad and Iraq safer or there is no second wave."

DOJ_NMG_0114497

The Wall Street Journal (1/10, A4, Jaffe, Dreazen, 2.04M) reports the new Iraq strategy also "calls for modest, relatively inexpensive efforts to spur job creation and economic growth, a marked shift from the large-scale reconstruction projects and free-market dogmatism of earlier White House efforts." But "with the appetite for new spending for Iraq low across Washington, the downsized ambitions are being matched by similarly reduced amounts of money, prompting some senior military commanders to express skepticism the plan will improve conditions in Iraq." Bush "will propose a micro-finance effort to aid Iraqi entrepreneurs and a sizable expansion of a program giving military commanders money for small-scale reconstruction and job-creation projects, according to administration and Pentagon officials. Mr. Bush described both initiatives in closed-door meetings with senators this week, according to several participants." Meanwhile, "senior Pentagon officials have been touting a push to get 193 Iraqi factories that have shuttered since the 2003 invasion up and running in the next three years. The officials say the reopened plants can provide jobs to tens of thousands of Iraqis who might otherwise join a militia or insurgent groups."

But the New York Times (1/10, Glanz, 1.16M) says that "even before the measures are announced, Iraqi political and business leaders have been expressing skepticism that any effort to transform a system of state-owned enterprises that has fallen so far into dysfunction could become an engine for job creation in Iraq." The Times adds, "Among the economic measures under consideration is new support for a program that allows local American military commanders to finance small reconstruction projects." However, "recent statements by administration officials suggest that the plan is also likely to include an effort to revive parts of what was a vast Iraqi military and industrial base before it was destroyed by war, sanctions and looting."

The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Richter, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports, "Bush is expected to announce plans to double the number of provincial reconstruction teams and call for big new jobs and loans programs and a renewed reconstruction effort. Administration officials consider the economic and political aspects of Bush's plan more important than the expected troop increase." The Times adds "officials say their plan has two stages. Once troops have pacified key areas of Baghdad and Anbar province, officials will offer economic and political benefits, including jobs that they hope will win the loyalty of young men who are now fighting with the militias."

The AP (1/10, Baldor) reports Bush is also "expected to urge friendly Mideast countries to increase their aid to Iraq but will ignore the recommendation of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group that he include Syria and Iran in an effort to stanch Iraqi bloodshed nearly four years after the US invasion, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the plan has not yet been announced."

NBC Nightly News (1/9, lead story, 3:10, Gregory, 9.87M) reported that "even White House allies say the President must educate the American people about the problems in Iraq and his own plan to fix them instead of offering broad assurances." David Frum, former Bush speechwriter: "Instead, what he has to do is offer a highly detailed explanation of why this time the strategy and tactics on offer can work."

The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Reynolds, Levey, 850K) says "Bush spent hours Tuesday practicing in front of cameras, preparing to make his case," and "members of Congress who met with Bush said he appeared to understand that, after years of upbeat rhetoric and positive assessments that belied a lack of progress inside the country, his credibility was on the line." Sen. Trent Lott "said both Republicans and Democrats would be listening for a note of contrition in the president's voice. 'As important as what he says is how he says it,' Lott told reporters."

McClatchy (1/10, Hutcheson, Talev) says Bush "is about to take a gamble that could make or break his presidency and his place in history." The "nationally televised speech, and the reaction to it, will determine the next step in Iraq, test his relations with the new Democratic-led Congress and set the tone for his final two years in office. Some analysts say it could increase pressure for withdrawal if the solutions Bush offers don't bring quick results."

In an article titled "Bush Must Sell Public, Congress" the Atlanta Journal Constitution (1/10, Herman) quotes longtime Bush media advisor Mark McKinnon saying, "This may be the last, best chance to shape policy and opinion on the issue that will define his presidency." He "is among those, including Bush aides in the White House, who believe that nothing the president says tonight is likely to move numbers in his direction. It's the results that will matter." McKinnon adds, "The plan for more troops has to be clear and provide metrics for success in order to win support."

DOJ_NMG_0114498

The Washington Times (1/10, Dinan, 88K) reports, "The White House yesterday said Mr. Bush has lost the country's support. 'It's important to bring the public back to this war and restore public confidence and support for the mission,' spokesman Tony Snow said." Jeffrey D. McCausland, a defense specialist and former National Security Council staffer, "said Mr. Bush will be addressing three audiences: Congress, which controls the funding; the American public, whose patience is slipping; and Iraq, which will have to exhibit a more solid commitment."

The AP (1/10, Raum) reports, "Bush's new plan for Iraq sounds a lot like his old one. Send in more troops, set goals for the Iraqi government and assure Americans it's better to wage war there than here. … Bush's challenge in Iraq: show what's different now. The plan the president will outline to the nation Wednesday night is the latest repackaging of a program that's been wrapped and rewrapped many times."

Bush Won't Refer To A "Surge" Tonight. ABC World News (1/9, story 2, 1:30, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported Bush will announce an increase of troops, but "he will not call it a surge." Meanwhile, the war over semantics ("surge" versus "escalation") rages on. The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Neuman, 850K) asks, "Is it harmless semantics? Is it disingenuous spin? One thing is clear: Using the word 'surge' to describe President Bush's forthcoming plan for reshaping US efforts in Iraq has ignited a fiery political brouhaha. … What infuriates critics of the war, including many liberal Democrats, is that they see 'surge' as a manipulative and deceptive word. It implies a relatively short-term increase in the US military commitment, they say, when the White House intends to keep the additional troops in Iraq much longer, perhaps for several years. Even worse, critics say, the news media have uncritically accepted the word and thus contributed to deceiving the public."

The New York Times (1/10, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports, "'Cut and run' versus 'stay the course' is so 2006. This week has ushered in a new political battle over the language of the war: 'Surge,' meet 'escalation.'" The Times also notes Tony Snow "last night said that the president would not be using the word 'surge' in his speech, adding that it implied what he called a 'rush hour' approach to a serious policy."

The Washington Post (1/10, C1, Farhi, 690K) reports, "It's one of those words -- like 'chad' or 'blog' or 'waterboarding' -- that's suddenly become the go-to phrase to describe a contemporary phenomenon." Surge is "the country's latest catchword." Its "very vagueness…might make it the politically perfect word for what is likely to be a controversial policy." Rep. Nancy Pelosi "framed her apparent opposition to sending more troops to Iraq by using a more freighted substitute: 'escalation.' In that context, surge is a euphemism for a euphemism. 'Escalation' was variously ascribed to both President Lyndon Johnson's policy of increased military aid to Vietnam, and the US 'incursion' -- yet more euphemisms! -- into Laos and Cambodia in 1970 under President Richard Nixon. Perhaps to avoid echoes of that war, 'surge' is the Pentagon and White House's preferred coinage."

While most media outlets are sidestepping the debate by referring to an troop "increase," others are choosing sides: The Washington Post (1/10, A1, Abramowitz, Wright, Ricks, 690K), in a story about Pentagon commanders and their reaction to Bush's proposals, calls Bush's plan a "military escalation." The Christian Science Monitor (1/10, Feldmann, 59K) also refers to Bush's proposed "escalation of the US troop presence in Iraq."

Military Commanders Said To Oppose Troop Boost. The Washington Post (1/10, A1, Abramowitz, Wright, Ricks, 690K) reports, "When…Bush goes before the American people tonight to outline his new strategy for Iraq, he will be doing something he has avoided since the invasion of Iraq in March 2003: ordering his top military brass to take action they initially resisted and advised against." The Post adds, "Pentagon insiders say members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff have long opposed the increase in troops and are only grudgingly going along with the plan because they have been promised that the military escalation will be matched by renewed political and economic efforts in Iraq. Gen. John P. Abizaid, the outgoing head of Central Command, said less than two months ago that adding US troops was not the answer for Iraq." Bush's decision "appears to mark the first major disagreement between the White House and key elements of the Pentagon over the Iraq war since Gen. Eric K. Shinseki, then the Army chief of staff, split with the administration in the spring of 2003 over the planned size of the occupation force, which he regarded as too small." It "may also be a sign of increasing assertiveness from a commander in chief described by former aides as relatively passive about questioning the advice of his military advisers."

Fox News' Special Report (1/9, Hume) reported Democrats "charge that General George Casey and John Abizaid, who are leaving their Iraq posts, flatly oppose any surge and the President simply ignored them."

DOJ_NMG_0114499

Commanders, added Fox, "have been skeptical of the surge without a specific purpose, but they said recently it depends on what the surge is for."

The New York Times (1/10, Cloud, Shanker, 1.16M) says "Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq is expected to require the Army eventually to send as many as six National Guard combat brigades to Iraq, beginning in 2008. The increased demand on the National Guard in coming years is a likely byproduct of Mr. Bush's decision, expected to be announced in a speech Wednesday night, to send five active-duty combat brigades, or about 20,000 troops, to Iraq, starting at the end of this month, according to current and former officials."

Survey Finds Troops Disapprove Of Bush's War Policies 42% To 35%. The Dallas Morning News (1/9, McLemore, 500K) reported "more active-duty troops now disapprove of the president's war policies than support them, according to a year-end survey by Military Times newspapers. Experts say the results, drawn from some of the more conservative career-track military, reflect a growing weariness and frustration over lack of progress in Iraq and Afghanistan." The survey, "mailed to 6,000 active-duty subscribers to Military Times' four newspapers aimed at the military services, showed that 42 percent of those surveyed disapprove of Mr. Bush's handling of the war, compared with 35 percent who support it." It "marks the first time that the president's Iraq war policies failed to gain majority support since the Military Times began its annual survey four years ago."

GAO Issues Highly Critical Report On Iraq. AFP (1/9) reports, "US government auditors released a grim report card of the American record in violence-wracked Iraq, on the eve of President George W. Bush's televised rollout of a new strategy." The GAO study "ran a critical rule over a previous failed US plan for victory, the malfunctioning Iraqi government and security forces and fearsome insurgent and sectarian violence. It said the Pentagon had failed to allow proper congressional oversight of Iraqi armed forces, and warned of an increasing strain on US forces pressed into repeated tours of duty and shortages of military supplies."

More Commentary. The Los Angeles Times (1/10, 850K) editorializes, "The notion that the 'surge' in US troops under discussion -- about 20,000 combat troops on top of the 132,000 already in Iraq -- amounts to a new policy is laughable." A troop increase is acceptable "only as part of a comprehensive -- and comprehensible -- plan to secure and democratize Iraq. ... It's been leaked that Bush also will advocate a new, $1-billion jobs program for Iraqis," but "What is this additional $1 billion going to accomplish that the $30 billion already spent on that nation's reconstruction failed to do? ... The president needs to articulate the conditions under which the US will pull out altogether, in the near future. As painful as that would be, it sure beats becoming embroiled in someone else's civil war."

Bill O'Reilly, in the opening segment of Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (1/9) contended that President Bush "has little credibility left in the country," and "at this stage" he "should try to secure Baghdad one last time without sniping from Ted Kennedy or anybody else. … The President should understand the window is closing. But at this point for the sake of those who have been killed and wounded, let's give it one more shot."

Conservative radio host Laura Ingraham, appearing on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (1/9), said, "I don't think Americans at this point frankly care much about what's good for the Iraqi people. Americans want to know that whatever we're doing in Iraq or in Somalia or around the world, is making America safer. And if the debate is about that, then I think…Bush has a chance, perhaps, might be a small chance, of turning things around."

Maureen Dowd, in the New York Times (1/10, 1.16M), "With the Surge, as with the invasion of Iraq, W. is like the presumptuous date 'who reserves a hotel room and then asks you to the prom,' as my friend Dana Calvo put it. … In other words, the president will ask us to the prom once he reserves the hotel room."

In the Washington Post (1/10, A13, 690K), Harold Meyerson writes, "If any Americans could truly understand Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, George Bush and Karl Rove should. All three firmly believe that the successful politician must above all cultivate his base -- not that any of them can point to recent successes. … Yet tonight, President Bush will announce that Maliki has changed. He will also announce that he is sending additional US forces to Iraq, but he's done that before, in almost comparable numbers, to no good effect. What's different this time, we are to believe, is that the Iraqis will join us in trying to suppress the sectarian violence."

Los Angeles Times (1/10, 850K) columnist Max Boot writes pessimistically, "If we wind up losing the war in Iraq, as now appears likely (though not inevitable), many conservatives know who to blame: the press, or, in bloggerspeak, the MSM (mainstream news media). Just as it did during the Vietnam War, a myth is likely to develop in which America's valiant fighting men and women were stabbed in the back by unpatriotic, even treasonous, reporters. ... That isn't to deny that there has been some biased, slipshod news coverage. ... But by now the dismal conditions on the ground have caught up with, if not surpassed, the media's bleak outlook." To blame the press "deflects blame from those who deserve it, in the upper echelons of the administration and the armed forces." Boot adds that former Secretary Rumsfeld is "likely to go down in history as Robert McNamara redux."

DOJ_NMG_0114500

Los Angeles Times (1/10, 850K) contributor and law professor Bruce Ackerman suggests that Congress "set a price tag on the long-run cost of the war -- say $500 billion -- and tell the president that he won't be getting a penny more." Only a ceiling "will force the president to recognize that the American people are no longer willing to give him a blank check for an endless series of mistakes."

In USA Today (1/10, 2.27M), Emory University lecturer Don Campbell writes that "contrary to Bush's claim of a year ago, no one seems to have learned anything in Iraq that might inform national security policy and military strategy in the future. Wisdom gained from hindsight becomes foresight and is better than no wisdom at all."

Washington Post (1/10, 690K) columnist David Ignatius writes that lessons can be found in the counterinsurgency manual authored by Lt. Gen. David Petraeus: "Two themes stood out for me as I read the document. The first is that success in counterinsurgency requires a political strategy as much as a military one. The second is that broad political support back home -- which buys time on the battlefield -- is the crucial strategic asset in fighting such wars." Ignatius adds, "The abiding lesson of this manual ... ought to be engraved as the cornerstone of U.S. policy going forward, regardless of whether there is a troop surge: 'The Host Nation Doing Something Tolerably Is Normally Better than Us Doing It Well.'"

Democrats To Hold Votes On "Surge," With 10 GOP Senators "Likely" To Oppose Bush.

The New York Times (1/10, Zeleny, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "Democratic leaders said Tuesday that they intended to hold symbolic votes in the House and Senate on President Bush's plan to send more troops to Baghdad, forcing Republicans to take a stand on the proposal and seeking to isolate the president politically over his handling of the war." The Senate vote "is expected as early as next week." Meanwhile, "the office of Nancy Pelosi, speaker of the House, followed with an announcement that the House would also take up a resolution in opposition to a troop increase." Democrats "did not rule out eventually considering more muscular responses, like seeking to cap the number of troops being deployed to Iraq or limiting financing for the war -- steps that could provoke a Constitutional and political showdown over the president's power to wage war." The Times adds "Republican officials conceded that at least 10 of their own senators were likely to oppose the plan to increase troops levels in Iraq. And Democrats were proposing their resolution with that in mind, hoping to send a forceful message that as many as 60 senators believed strengthening American forces in Baghdad was the wrong approach. … In an interview on Tuesday, Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, said he was becoming increasingly skeptical that a troop increase was in the best interest of the United States."

Dana Milbank, in his "Washington Sketch" column in the Washington Post (1/10, A2, 690K), said Republicans "emerged from their weekly party luncheon yesterday displaying more dance steps than the Joffrey Ballet. 'We should listen to what the president has to say,' proposed Sen. John Warner (R-Va). 'I want to hear the president's plan,' Sen. Susan Collins (Maine) concurred. 'I want to see what he's proposing before I make dramatic statements,' an unusually skittish Trent Lott (Miss.), the No. 2 Republican, told a thick knot of reporters." Milbank adds, "And you didn't want to get too close to Sen. George Voinovich (Ohio). 'We need more information, okay?' he insisted." But "the Republicans' principal dancer yesterday was Sen. John Sununu (N.H.), perhaps the most endangered of all GOP senators in 2008. 'We haven't discussed "the plan,"' he maintained. 'That would suggest that we were told exactly what is going to be announced tomorrow, and that is certainly not the case. … I don't really know what they're thinking about proposing, so given that, it wouldn't be wise for me to suggest that I do or don't know whether their conditions are appropriate."

Roll Call (1/10, Stanton) reports, "A White House aide said Reid's nonbinding resolution likely would serve to put lawmakers on record as a way to gauge support for future efforts to block the plan." The Administration's "GOP allies in the Senate quickly lined up behind the president Tuesday, setting the stage for an intense floor clash next week. Following a meeting at the White House, Senate GOP leaders announced their support for the plan. Minority Leader

DOJ_NMG_0114501

Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said, 'I know enough about it to know that I will support it,' adding that members of Republican leadership have met with Bush on a number of occasions to discuss the plan." Roll Call adds, "A veteran Democratic aide said that while the vote on the resolution will be the first test of Reid's abilities, there likely will be much more significant challenges later this year -- particularly if the Senate moves to either cut off funding or restrict Bush's ability to prosecute the war." Reid "told reporters he believes he can count on the support of at least nine Republicans in his effort to corral the 60 votes needed to end a potential filibuster by backers of Bush's plan."

Democrats are acting under strong pressure from members of their base. The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Hook, 850K) reports, "It did not take long for Rep. Nancy Boyda, a freshman Democrat from Kansas, to learn the price of defying her party's liberal base. After she said she would support President Bush if he proposed an increase in US troop levels in Iraq, antiwar bloggers fumed and MoveOn.org, the liberal advocacy group, considered running a television ad attacking her. … That kind of political pressure is already being applied, not just to junior lawmakers, but also to Democratic leaders." It "prodded them into making Iraq more central to their first 100 hours in control of Capitol Hill than they had planned. And it is creating tension between many Democrats and the liberal activists who will be increasingly important as the 2008 presidential campaign gets into gear."

Kennedy Announces Resolution Blocking Additional Troops. The Democratic move comes on the same day Sen. Ted Kennedy announced his own strategy against the Iraq troop increase. ABC World News (1/9, story 3, 2:00, Tapper, 8.78M) reported, "Today, the liberal lion of the US Senate roared." Kennedy was shown saying, "Iraq is George Bush's Vietnam." Kennedy "introduced legislation that would block President Bush from sending to Iraq one more soldier or spending one more dollar as part of a surge in troops, without first getting clear Congressional approval, an up or down vote." Kennedy's position "puts him at odds with some of his fellow Democrats, including Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joe Biden, who says the Constitution does not give Congress the power to stop the Commander in Chief from waging this war however he wants."

Sen. Edward Kennedy, on MSNBC's Hardball (1/9) said voters "want their members of Congress to do more than just make speeches. They want action. And this gives an opportunity for action. We have done it in the past. We did if in times of Lebanon, in limiting the increased number of US troops in Lebanon. We have done it in Vietnam. We should do it now in Iraq." Asked how he plans to get a vote on his resolution, Kennedy said he would probably "take this up as an amendment to appropriations." USA Today (1/10, Kiely, 2.27M) reports Kennedy "said Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., will introduce similar legislation in the House."

The Washington Times (1/10, Ward, 88K) titles its report "Kennedy Proposal Uncovers Party Rift," noting comments from Senate Democratic Whip Richard J. Durbin and House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer .

Republican strategist Karen Hanretty, on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (1/9), said, "I think it's actually very interesting what Ted Kennedy is doing. … At least is he putting his money where his mouth is. And I would be very curious to see where other members of the Senate. … Let's see, we have Hillary Clinton running for president. Barack Obama, Joe Biden, where do they stand on this bill? Do they want to put up a vote on this bill? Because it seems like Democrats are very reluctant to come out and say 'we don't support the war. We think it's immoral. And, yet, we are going to continue to fund it.'" Hanretty added that "it looks like Ted Kennedy is the only liberal in America right now who is standing up for the far left."

Bush Briefs Democratic Lawmakers. The Washington Post (1/10, A10, Kessler, Weisman, 690K) reports Bush "gravely warned House Democrats yesterday that America's credibility would be shattered if the United States pulled its troops from Iraq, forcing close ally Saudi Arabia to look elsewhere for protection and potentially destabilizing Egypt, the region's most populous country, according to participants in the meeting." Bush "did not say during the half-hour meeting with Democrats where else he thought Saudi Arabia would seek 'protection,' but he made it clear that he was simply informing Democrats of his decisions on Iraq, not consulting with them. He said that he understands the challenges and thinks his plan has the best chance of success." The House Democrats "included Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton (Mo.), intelligence committee Chairman Sylvestre Reyes (Tex.), Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Tom Lantos (Calif.), Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John D. Dingell (Mich.), Rep. Norm Dicks (Wash.), Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.) and Rep. Robert E. Andrews (N.J.). Vice President Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary

DOJ_NMG_0114502

Robert M. Gates and White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten attended the meeting."

Additional US Troops Already In Place To Carry Out Bush's New Strategy. Fox News' Special Report (1/9, Hume) reported, "Even if Democrats disapprove of the troop surge in Iraq, they will not able to keep at least part of it from taking place right away. Additional American forces are already in the region, locked and loaded." Fox went on to report, "Senior military officials tell Fox that the Second Brigade of the Army's Eighty Second Airborne division that just arrived in Kuwait from Fort Bragg, N.C., will move into Baghdad soon after the President's speech Wednesday night. Sources say that the paratroopers will be the first wave of the President's troop surge, the overall increase, sources tell us, will be gradual. Republican lawmakers who have been briefed on the plan called it a 'three-front surge' -- military, diplomatic, and economic – with a series of benchmarks for the Iraqis to meet and a clear indication the US effort is not open-ended."

Pelosi, Reid Block Effort To Air Democratic Rebuttal To Bush's Speech. On MSNBC's Hardball (1/9, Matthews) correspondent David Shuster reported that "some Democratic lawmakers believe a Democrat should give a televised response similar to what happens following the State of the Union address to take advantage of the attention and focus by the broadcast and cable networks. But Democratic leaders have not requested air time to make a formal response. Nancy Pelosi and Senator Harry Reid say it's the President alone who must articulate and implement a policy for Iraq."

Major Action Against Insurgents Underway In Baghdad. The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Roug, 850K) reports, "In fierce, day-long fighting, 1,000 American and Iraqi troops assisted by U.S. attack helicopters and warplanes battled gunmen in a Sunni Arab downtown neighborhood Tuesday, killing at least 51 militants, according to Iraqi officials." The offensive, "the heaviest fighting in the capital in months, came in response to a buildup of insurgents in the Haifa Street neighborhood adjacent to the highly fortified Green Zone government complex."

ABC World News (1/9, lead story, 2:35, McCarthy, 8.78M) reported, "The most dangerous address in Baghdad, Haifa Street. Locals call it Sniper Street. Today, the US military arrived in force, determined to wipe out a concentration of Sunni insurgents and fighters who long make this street their killing zone. Apache attack helicopters and F-15 fighters zeroed in on this near-deserted neighborhood, as 1,000 US and Iraqi troops, move from building-to-building. As this CNN video shows, looking for an enemy who's looking for them. These helicopters have been circling over the Haifa Street district for the past several hours. We've seen them fire rockets into targets. And there's been a lot of gunfire. The fighting started over the weekend, when Iraqi police who were trying to pick up bodies on the street, came under fire. They called in the Iraqi army. And this morning, the Americans got involved."

The CBS Evening News (1/9, lead story, 2:35, Logan, 7.66M) reported, "The battle on Haifa Street continued into the night, spreading fear amongst the minority Sunni population here, many of whom believe the Shiite led Iraqi government is using this crackdown as a cover to drive the Sunnis from the capital with the help of US forces."

The New York Times (1/10, Santora, 1.16M) reports, "An American military officer familiar with the operation said that it was part of an effort to stabilize Baghdad, but was not directly linked to the president's new security plan." However, "the location of the fight has particular significance. Nearly two years ago, after much bloodshed and toil, the American military wrested control of the area from insurgents." NBC Nightly News (1/9, story 2, 2:00, Colt, 9.87M) also recounts that "two years ago the insurgents were targeted in a high profile assault dubbed 'Operation Lightning.' But as so often happens here, when the soldiers left, the militants returned. That has long been the problem here. Clean up one area, move on, then the insurgents return."

The Financial Times (1/10, Negus) says "US and Iraqi forces moved in against insurgents, in an area once viewed as a showcase for the ability to control Baghdad neighbourhoods, by 'saturating' them with military forces."

The Washington Times/AP (1/10, Hurst, Abdul-Zahra) reports Iraqi Prime Minister Al-Maliki "appeared to have ordered the stepped-up fight with Sunni Arab fighters to put an Iraqi face on the latest bid to tame the capital. Several al-Maliki aides and confidants have told The Associated Press that the prime minister plans to focus his troops, with American backing, on Sunni insurgents in western Baghdad at the outset of the drive. They spoke on condition of anonymity because the details of the plan had not been disclosed." Al-Maliki, the associates said, "then plans to challenge al-Sadr to disarm and disband his militia because there would no longer be a reason for them to roam the streets with Sunni Arab insurgent forces crippled."

DOJ_NMG_0114503

The Washington Post (1/10, A1, Raghavan, Partlow, 690K) reports, "Sunni legislator Khalaf al-Alayan, in an interview on al-Jazeera television, described the fighting on Haifa Street as a way to 'clean Baghdad of the remaining Sunni elements.'" Alayan "said he had contacted organizations such as the Arab League and the United Nations in hopes of stopping 'these massacres that the Sunnis are subjected to.'" In a statement, "the Sunni Iraqi Islamic Party described the 50 killed as 'innocent citizens.' It asserted that Sunnis on Haifa Street were 'under siege' by Shiite militias backed by the Iraqi army."

Iraqi Vice President Ask US Not To "Give Up On Iraq." In the Washington Post (1/10, A13, 690K), Iraqi Vice President Tariq Al-Hashimi writes, "Both of our nations have invested too much to walk away now. If this battle is lost, the entire region could be destabilized. Second, despite the chaos in my country, not all bridges of patriotism have been burned." Hashimi points to evidence "from the most unlikely of venues," the unity behind the Iraqi soccer team at the Asian Games. He continues, "If those soccer players taught us anything, it is that a proper strategy for eliminating sectarianism and fostering nationalism is key. Reconstituting the Iraqi Armed Services and then reforming, retraining and properly arming them must be a central component of this strategy. Another should be revising Iraq's constitution to give our central government effective powers but prevent any sort of dictatorship by the prime minister." Hashimi also suggests "gainful employment" for Iraqi youths, "a coordinated effort to secure Baghdad," and "a greater focus on the militias."

Expert Says Iraq War Has Shifted Alliances In Middle East. Edward N. Luttwak, a senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/10, 2.04M) reports, "It was the hugely ambitious project of the Bush administration to transform the entire Middle East by remaking Iraq into an irresistible model of prosperous democracy. Having failed in that worthy purpose, another, more prosaic result has inadvertently been achieved: divide and rule, the classic formula for imperial power on the cheap." For example, Luttwak says the "Sunni-US alignment in Lebanon, which interestingly coexists with the US-Shiite alliance in Iraq, may yet achieve results of strategic importance if Syria is successfully detached from its alliance with Iran." He goes on to note that "when the Bush administration came into office, only Egypt and Jordan were functioning allies of the US." However, the Iraq war, he concludes, "has indeed brought into existence a New Middle East, in which Arab Sunnis can no longer gleefully disregard American interests because they need help against the looming threat of Shiite supremacy, while in Iraq at the core of the Arab world, the Shia are allied with the US."

Blair Criticizes Manner Of Saddam Execution. The AP (1/10, Stringer) reports, "British Prime Minister Tony Blair said Tuesday that the manner of Saddam Hussein's execution was completely wrong and unacceptable -- his first public comments about the Dec. 30 hanging." However, "Blair told a London news conference he hoped disputes over the taunting of the former Iraqi dictator and the release of illicit video footage of the execution would not lead people to forget the gravity of Saddam's crimes."

Lawyer Remembers Combat In Iraq. The Washington Post (1/10, C1, Carlson, 690K) reports on Washington attorney Adam Tiffen, who practices "at the law firm of Porter Wright Morris & Arthur, a few blocks from the White House, looking at pictures from his year in Iraq. His law degree hangs on the wall near his Bronze Star." Tiffen "joined Army ROTC in 2000, while he was studying at George Washington University Law School. He graduated in 2003 and was commissioned as a lieutenant in the Maryland National Guard. He was working on an insider-trading case at Porter Wright when the unit he'd trained with was called up for duty in Iraq." During his service "he wrote a blog .... Armchair General, a military history Web site, printed part of his blog (http://thereplacements.blogspot.com). So did the liberal journal Mother Jones. Last October, several of his stories were posted on The Sandbox, a military blog founded by 'Doonesbury' cartoonist Garry Trudeau." Tiffen was "stunned" to read after returning to the US that the town his unit had protected "went to [excrement] when they pulled U.S. troops out."

US Strikes Al Qaeda In Somalia. NBC Nightly News (1/9, lead story, 3:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The US has opened a new front in the war on terrorism. This time in Africa, where American Special Forces are hitting targets in Somalia."

The AP (1/10, Duhul) reports, "Attack helicopters strafed suspected al-Qaida fighters in southern Somalia on Tuesday, witnesses said, following two days of airstrikes by US forces -- the first U.S. offensives in the African country since 18 American soldiers were killed here in 1993. In Washington, a US intelligence official said American forces killed five to 10 people in an attack on one target in southern Somalia believed to be associated with al-Qaida. The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the operation's sensitivity, said a small number of others present, perhaps four or five, were wounded." But "a Somali lawmaker said 31 civilians, including a newlywed couple, died in Tuesday's assault by two helicopters near Afmadow, a town in a forested area close to the Kenyan border. The report could not be independently verified." Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman "spoke of one strike in southern Somalia, but would not confirm any of the details or say whether any al-Qaeda militants were killed."

DOJ_NMG_0114504

Similarly, the New York Times (1/10, A8, Gettleman, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports Somali officials said "dozens of people were killed" in the airstrike and "news of the attack immediately set off new waves of anti-American anger in Mogadishu." Meanwhile, American military and intelligence officials "expressed confidence that at least one senior Qaeda leader in Somalia," Abu Taha al-Sudani, "had been killed in the American attack or subsequent strikes by Ethiopian troops." Pentagon and intelligence officials also said the Ethiopian offensive "had unearthed fresh intelligence about the location of Qaeda operatives whose trail had long gone cold."

The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Sanders, Albadri, 850K) says "State Department spokesman Sean McCormack declined to comment on details about the strikes, but defended the U.S. interest for intervening in Somalia's conflict. 'Very clearly, the US government has had a concern that there are terrorists and Al Qaeda-affiliated terrorists that were in Somalia,' he said. 'We have a great interest in seeing that those individuals not be able to flee to other locations.'"

The Washington Times (1/10, Scarborough, 88K) reports the US targets "were thought to be al Qaeda operatives who carried out the 1998 bombings of two U.S. embassies in East Africa. The trio and Islamist allies have been working to make the ungoverned Somalia a terrorist safe haven."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/10, Baldauf, Pflanz, 59K) says "a key question is whether the US, in its first overt military operation in Somalia since the infamous 'BlackHawk Down' intervention in 1992 and '93, has managed to hit the prime targets -- Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, Saleh Ali Saleh Nabhan, or Abu Taha al-Sudani." Sudani "is listed on Washington terror watch lists as Al Qaeda's point man in East Africa. Mr. Mohammed, from the Comoros archipelago in the Indian Ocean, is suspected of orchestrating a 2002 suicide attack on an Israeli-owned Kenyan hotel."

Fox News' Special Report (1/9, Hume) reported, "It appears tonight that a US airstrike in Somalia has achieved some of its intended results. Early intelligence showed that between 5-10 people believed to be associated with al-Qaeda have been killed. … A US official also told us that the leader of al-Qaeda in east Africa may also be among the dead."

The Washington Post (1/10, A7, DeYoung, McCrummen, 690K) reports "US officials declined yesterday to provide details of who, or what, was hit." In Mogadishu, reports "circulated that as many as 50 people, many of them civilians, were killed in the attack," but US officials "said they are fairly certain that at least one targeted individual was hit; they said they had no information about civilian deaths." The US confirmed that a "principal target" of the airstrike was Abu Talha al-Sudani, but officials "cautioned against reports that Fazul Abdullah Mohammed and Saleh Ali Saleh Nabhan…may have been killed in the attack." US officials "said that no further information would be released until US personnel could assess directly the results of the strike and identify any dead."

The Wall Street Journal (1/10, A8, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "Administration officials described military actions in Somalia as part of an intensifying campaign to root out al Qaeda leaders allegedly operating in the country. But Pentagon involvement risks stoking greater instability in a region already racked by strife, analysts said." Some critics of the US action said there is "scant evidence" that Somalia's Islamic militants are "linked to al Qaeda."

The CBS Evening News (1/9, story 3, 2:05, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "One intelligence report says the strike killed eight and wounded three, but there is still no confirmation that any of the Al Qaeda operatives they were after are among the dead. With an aircraft carrier keeping watch offshore, a US Air Force gunship blasted away at the suspected hideout of the three most notorious Al Qaeda terrorists in Africa." Former Assistant Secretary Susan Rice told CBS, "The role that Ethiopia played which was critical, was to help flush the hardcore Islamist elements out of the capital and push them south." CBS said the US military "is ready to carry out more strikes, but that depends on getting good intelligence on the whereabouts of any al Qaeda operatives still alive."

DOJ_NMG_0114505

ABC World News (1/9, story 4, 2:05, Kerley, 8.78M) said it "has learned FBI agents were sent to northern Kenya to capture any suspects fleeing over the border." Meanwhile, "American intelligence officials are hearing reports of less than 20 dead and wounded in the US attack. One source says they will not identify who they killed or how many, until Americans see the bodies," which "could be difficult."

Europeans, UN Express Concerns About US Strike. The Financial Times (1/10, England) says the European Commission Tuesday "criticized the US strike, saying it could set back efforts to reach a deal between Somalia's provisional government and moderate Islamists." A spokesman for Louis Michel, EU development Commissioner, said, "We need a political process which is inclusive in order to bring about stability. Any incident of this kind is not helpful in the long term."

Meanwhile at the United Nations, the AP (1/10, Lederer) reports Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon is "concerned" that the attack "could escalate hostilities and harm civilians," spokeswoman Michele Montas said Tuesday. "Notwithstanding the motives for this reported military action, the Secretary-General is concerned about the new dimension this kind of action could introduce to the conflict and the possible escalation of hostilities that may result."

WSJournal Welcomes Somalia Strikes. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (1/10, 2.04M) says "the attacks -- along with the deployment of a carrier battle group off the African coast -- are welcome evidence that the US has learned the lessons of May 19, 1996. That's the date Osama bin Laden and his associates left Sudan for Afghanistan on a chartered plane. The Clinton Administration was aware that Sudan intended to expel bin Laden, and the US might have easily tracked and destroyed the flight en route. The consequences of its failure to do so is only too well known, and the Bush Administration is right to be determined not to let terrorists get away again, whether by land, air or sea." The strikes in Somalia are "also a reminder that in the war on terror there is no 'exit strategy' short of victory." In the 1990s, "America's sheepish withdrawal from the country had consequences. Bin Laden viewed it as yet another sign that America can't take casualties and will retreat when hit hard."

Government Changes Recruiting Practices. The New York Times (1/10, Liptak, 1.16M) reports, "The Defense Department yesterday announced changes in how it will treat information in an enormous military recruiting database. The changes are part of the settlement of a lawsuit brought by the New York Civil Liberties Union on behalf of six New York City high school students that challenged the legality of the way information in the database was collected and used." The "Joint Advertising, Market Research and Studies Program, is, according to court papers, probably the largest repository of information concerning 16-to-25-year-olds. ... The Defense Department agreed to use the database only for recruiting, giving up the possibility of sharing it with law enforcement and intelligence agencies. It agreed to destroy information on individuals after three years rather than five years or longer. The department also agreed to collect Social Security numbers only from the Selective Service System. Perhaps most significantly, it established a way for people to opt out of the database." The NYCLU "said it was frustrated that the department refused to stop collecting information about students' race and ethnicity."

The AP (1/9, Neumeister) reports, "Last year's lawsuit claimed the department was flouting a 1982 military recruitment law that specifies that it refrain from collecting information on students under 17, that it store the information for no more than three years and that the information be kept private." About 50 sites carried this story. The Washington Post/AP (1/10, A3) includes an abbreviated version of the AP story.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

US Alleges Conrad Black Committed Insider Trading. The AP (1/10, Heher) reports, "Less than two months before the start of a fraud and racketeering trial, federal prosecutors leveled new allegations against former newspaper tycoon Conrad Black, saying he engaged in insider trading and illegally posted information about his former company on a financial message board." The AP continues, "A lengthy filing this week in U.S. District Court in Chicago spells out a dozen alleged misdeeds by the former Hollinger International Inc. chairman and CEO, who's accused of plundering millions of dollars from the company's coffers. … Black was forced from the helm of the company and is scheduled to go to trial March 1." The AP adds, "The newspaper empire, which once included The Daily Telegraph of London, The Jerusalem Post and a major Canadian newspaper group, since has been largely dismantled. The Chicago Sun-Times is the last remaining major property of the company, now called the Sun-Times Media Group Inc. … Prosecutors on Monday asked U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve to include the newest allegations as evidence in the ongoing case against Black. … 'Black did not make a distinction between his money and that belonging to a public company,' prosecutors wrote. 'It is this mind-set that contributed to his fleecing of International.' … Black is charged with misusing company money to bankroll his lavish lifestyle and cheating on his taxes. He has pleaded not guilty."

DOJ_NMG_0114506

DOJ Wants More Time To Consider Rehearing In Westar Conviction Reversal. The Topeka (KS) Capital-Journal (1/10, Boczkiewicz) reports from Denver, "Federal prosecutors aren't tipping their hand, but Tuesday they said they may ask an appeals court to reconsider its decision that overturned all convictions of David Wittig and Douglas Lake in the Westar Energy looting case." The Capital-Journal continues, "Prosecutor Richard Hathaway told the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in a new filing that more time is needed to decide whether to ask the court's full contingent of judges to rehear the case that was decided Friday by a three-judge panel. … Hathaway, of Topeka, asked the Denver-based court to give prosecutors until Feb. 19 to decide whether to ask for a rehearing. Without an extension, the deadline for prosecutors to decide is Jan. 19." The Capital-Journal adds, "Wittig, Westar's former chairman, president and chief executive officer, and Lake, Westar's former executive vice president, were convicted in 2005 of wire fraud, money laundering, circumvention of internal controls and conspiracy. … The panel ruled there was insufficient evidence to convict Wittig and Lake of wire fraud. Because of that, and because the alleged crimes were so intertwined, their convictions for money laundering also were overturned. … The panel overturned the convictions for circumvention of internal controls, ruling that the trial judge, Julie Robinson, of the U.S. District Court in Topeka, seriously erred by failing to properly instruct jurors on what evidence was needed to convict on those charges."

Home Depot Board May Feel Effects Of Nardelli Ouster. The New York Times (1/10, Creswell) reports, "Now that the board has ousted Home Depot's chairman and chief executive, Robert L. Nardelli, shareholders are expecting big changes at the home improvement retailing giant. … But the biggest hammer could fall on the board itself, warn some corporate governance advocates." The Times continues, "When Home Depot announced the departure of Mr. Nardelli last week, it also said that three directors — including one who has been on the board for nearly three decades — would remain on the board even though they were due to retire this spring after having reached the mandatory retirement age of 72. … Corporate governance watchdogs say the move illustrates that Home Depot's board, whose members have been criticized for their close ties to one another and to Mr. Nardelli's former employer, General Electric, is doing a poor job of succession planning for itself. … Furthermore, these critics argue that the three directors, Milledge A. Hart III, John L. Clendenin, and Claudio X. Gonzalez, played crucial roles in approving Mr. Nardelli's excessive pay package that ultimately led to his ouster." The Times adds, "The outcry over Mr. Nardelli's compensation, including his $210 million exit package, could result in another aggressive campaign to withhold votes from Home Depot's directors at the company's annual shareholder meeting this spring. … Or, if a competing slate of directors is put up against the incumbents, as one shareholder activist, Ralph V. Whitworth, has threatened to do, shareholders could throw their support to them if they believe they are qualified for the job, said Mr. Ferlauto."

Mills May Seek Bankruptcy Filing After Accounting Probe. The Washington Post (1/10, D1, Hedgpeth, Hilzenrath) reports, "Mills Corp., the struggling shopping mall developer, said yesterday that possible misconduct by management contributed to widespread accounting errors, and the company warned that it may be forced to seek bankruptcy protection if it cannot reach agreement with its lenders." The Post continues, "Mills, of Chevy Chase, said in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission that the errors total $347 million to $352 million. The document said it remains unknown what effect the accounting corrections would have on the company's financial statements for 2005 and earlier. A company spokesman declined to elaborate yesterday." The Post adds, "Mills has not released an earnings report since the third quarter of 2005, and last year, its chief executive Laurence C. Siegel retired. It plans to restate its financial results from 2001 to 2004 and for the first three quarters of 2005. The company is under investigation by the SEC, which declined to comment on the case. … Mills issued a statement late yesterday, saying it has 'taken several important remedial steps' in the past year that include 'a near-complete change of executive management personnel.'" The Post notes, "Mills's 'overall culture and "tone at the top" were heavily focused on meeting external and internal financial expectations,' Mills said in a report summarizing the results of a long-running investigation by the audit committee of its board of directors. The report found that 'possible misconduct' played a role in its accounting troubles, including at least one instance in which management overrode a decision by the company's accounting department."

DOJ_NMG_0114507

Writers Decry Options Backdating Prosecutions. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (1/10, A17), Richard Marmaro, a former federal prosecutor, and Ryan Weinstein, both attorneys at Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom who are currently representing the former CEO and chairman of Brocade Communications in connection with stock option issues, write, "Steve Jobs recently became the latest chief executive thrown into the options-timing imbroglio. … Rather than fret, investors actually bid up Apple's stock by more than $5 per share. … Given the stock bump, the board's exoneration and Mr. Jobs's lack of accounting experience, could this possibly be a case of criminal securities fraud? Believe it or not, in the minds of some prosecutors applying a far-reaching and unproven theory of fraud, it is. Just last summer, the government indicted Gregory Reyes, the former CEO of Brocade Communications, despite the fact that Mr. Reyes, like Mr. Jobs, was a non-accountant who didn't personally benefit one cent from the option grants at issue." Marmaro and Weinstein continue, "The problem with the government's theory is that it conflates books-and-records violations with criminal securities fraud. In the process, the government untethers securities fraud from the legal elements that help safeguard executives from conviction for inadvertent accounting violations resulting in little or no harm to companies or to investors. … Fundamental to American law is the notion that a defendant cannot be punished absent intent to commit a crime. Yet prosecutors are alleging that non-accountants violated an accounting rule -- known as APB 25 -- so opaque even auditors didn't understand it. Many in Silicon Valley are still scratching their heads: How can someone intentionally violate a rule that they and most others don't even comprehend? … Prosecutors and regulators have alleged just that. Not surprisingly, the first and only federal court confronting the issue so far found that APB 25 was so obscure that its violation could not demonstrate evidence of fraudulent intent as a matter of law." Marmaro and Weinstein conclude, "It is understandable, in an era when public concern is growing over rising executive compensation, that attention should be turned to stock options. Individual companies may want to reconsider how and at what volume they grant options. Yet a thoughtful look at the elements of securities fraud may help observers distinguish between accounting issues and criminal acts."

In his "Business World" column for the Wall Street Journal (1/10), Holman W. Jenkins, Jr., writes, "We can only wonder what Al Gore is making of his experience as the No. 1 defender of today's No. 1 backdating miscreant. … Mr. Gore, an Apple director, was a member of the special two-man committee that investigated and exonerated Steve Jobs in the backdating matter. By now, we presume he is well-versed in what backdating is and isn't. But how easily Mr. Gore -- the scourge of Big Pharma, etc. -- could have been the one braying about greed, CEO theft, the defrauding of shareholders." Jenkins continues, "Mr. Jobs's famed marketing magic was on display yesterday at the Macworld Expo in San Francisco. In another way, his case has performed a magical feat in prompting a few more voices to question whether backdating is really the crime of the century, or merely a business curiosity blown way out of proportion by poorly reasoned coverage. … Here and there, in the New Yorker, at the Fortune magazine Web site, in the bloggings of law Prof. Larry Ribstein and journalist John Carney, the intellectual fallacies that have permeated the coverage are gradually poked away. … No such understanding was emoted for Brocade's Greg Reyes or Comverse's Kobi Alexander, CEOs indicted in backdating scandals much like Apple's. But this is still progress." Jenkins adds, "Much reporting has made it sound like backdating was the equivalent of executives taking erasers and white-out to their paychecks to add a couple of zeroes -- and public understanding still suffers from this bum steer. But all that backdating comes down to is a nonmaterial accounting irregularity (yes, readers, accounting rules should be obeyed!) involving a defective judgment about whether "in the money" options needed to undergo expensing. … We're still at the beginning of the so-called scandal, and many executives will likely end up paying a price for this poor decision. But in no way does it implicate theft of shareholder money or even substantive accounting fraud. Here, we propose to violate a cardinal newspaper ordinance that logic should never be discussed in a newspaper. The beginning of all error was the media's unwarranted assumption, to put a fine point on it, that backdating was somebody's way of paying an employee more than, um, er, that same somebody intended (er, sputter, gurgle)."

DOJ_NMG_0114508

CRIMINAL LAW:

House Report Contradicts DOJ On Archives Document Theft. The Washington Post (1/10, A4, Smith) reports, "The Justice Department and the National Archives improperly assured the Sept. 11 commission that its members had access to all relevant materials about the Clinton administration's terrorism policies, without knowing if original, uncopied documents had been removed from the archives by former national security adviser Samuel R. 'Sandy' Berger, a Republican congressional report said yesterday." The Post continues, "The report, issued by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), accused both agencies of inadequately investigating the theft Berger admitted had occurred on two occasions in 2003. It quoted two Archives officials as saying that they had no way of knowing whether Berger took other documents from the files during two earlier visits." The Post adds, "Davis is the former chairman of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform. He issued the report after Republican staff members conducted interviews with Archives and Justice Department officials and gained access to unredacted material from a probe by the National Archives inspector general. … His report includes new details of what Berger did, and how the Archives staff, the Justice Department and the FBI reacted to the discovery of missing documents. It depicts Berger as aggressively insisting during his visits to the Archives that he be left alone with the documents, giving him what he later admitted was a calculated opportunity to hide the papers in his clothing." The Post notes, "The report also depicts Berger as lying to Archives staff about thefts that an unnamed senior Archives official said had made her and her staff feel 'almost physically ill.' It said Berger knowingly made false statements to the media after word of the FBI probe surfaced and improperly allowed a spokesman, Joe Lockhart, to depict him as a victim in the affair. … The Justice Department said yesterday that it had no evidence Berger's actions had deprived the commission of any documents."

The AP (1/10, Margasak) reports, "Davis' report quoted Noel Hillman, then-chief of the department's Public Integrity Section, as stating at the time of the 2005 plea that Berger did not have an intent to hide any of the documents or conceal facts from the commission." The AP adds, "Matt Bennett, a spokesman for Berger attorney Lanny Breuer, said, 'I can state unequivocally that no documents were withheld, and that all documents that Mr. Berger took were disclosed to the Justice Department and the inspector general of the archives.'"

The Washington Times (1/10, Seper) reports, "Mr. Davis described the Justice Department's assertion that Mr. Berger's statements were credible after being caught as 'misplaced.' He said, 'One wouldn't rely on the fox to be truthful after being nabbed in the henhouse. But the Justice Department apparently did.' … Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said the department 'has no evidence that Sandy Berger's actions deprived the 9/11 commission of documents, and we stand by our investigation of this matter.'"

House Committees Delay Response To Cunningham Subpoenas. The AP (1/10, Werner) reports, "Three House committees are delaying responding to grand jury subpoenas issued in connection with the bribery case against jailed former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham." The AP continues, "The subpoenas were issued to the Appropriations, Armed Services and Intelligence committees by the federal grand jury in San Diego that has been considering evidence in a defense contracting investigation stemming from the Cunningham case." The AP adds, "The subpoenas set a Jan. 11 deadline for compliance but prosecutors and House lawyers have agreed to extend that until Jan. 31, congressional staffers said Tuesday. … 'The initial deadline was 'obviously impossible to meet,' said Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey, D-Wis. 'I just got the job.' … 'We essentially have to dig into Republican files. We have no idea what's in there,' Obey said." The AP notes, "The subpoenas for documents were disclosed in the Dec. 27 edition of the Congressional Record by the committee chairmen, as required by House rules. Those Republican chairmen have since handed over power to Democrats who now control the House. … Rep. Peter Hoekstra of Michigan, top Republican on the House Intelligence Committee, wouldn't say what the subpoenas ask for, but said he was concerned the scope was overly broad."

DOJ_NMG_0114509

New Orleans Attempts To Curb Crime Wave.

The AP (1/10) reports from New Orleans, "Mayor Ray Nagin, his hurricane-stricken city under siege by a crime wave that has claimed nine lives since the start of 2007, stopped short of imposing a curfew but said police will set up checkpoints in early-morning hours when about one-third of the city's violent crime occurs." The AP continues, "The checkpoints, scheduled to start Wednesday, would operate between 2 a.m. and 6 a.m. and target drug and alcohol violations as well as motorist insurance. The first one was to be held in a crime-ridden area of the city. … Increased foot patrols, using 20-25 sheriff's deputies to supplement police, increasing the number of surveillance cameras in high-crime areas and speeding homicide cases through the court system were other elements of Nagin's plan to attack crime." The AP adds, "A curfew had been opposed by the city's tourism leaders, who said businesses struggling since Hurricane Katrina could be further hurt. While Nagin did not declare a curfew, he said the message to citizens was to stay off the streets in high-crime areas and in early morning hours. … Nagin, acknowledging the criminal justice breakdown extended beyond the police force, said a corps of volunteers will be recruited to monitor homicide cases moving through the courts." The AP notes, "Gov. Kathleen Blanco said today that her office has been talking with New Orleans police for almost two months about a plan to curb the violence and made a formal request for one a couple of weeks ago as a prelude to additional state funding."

Landrieu Seeks Federal Help With Rising New Orleans Violent Crime. The Washington Times (1/10, Pierce) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, Sen. Mary Landrieu "said yesterday that Congress can -- and should -- do more to help stop the recent wave of violent crime plaguing New Orleans. Landrieu urged adoption of her 10-point plan, which grants federal funds and beefs up drug and violence task forces disrupted by Hurricane Katrina in 2005. She sent a letter to President Bush asking that his budget include funds to double the size of a Drug Enforcement Administration task force and an FBI gang task force."

The Baton Rouge Advocate (1/10) writes, "In both her letter to the president and in her crime-fighting plan, Landrieu asked that more FBI and Drug Enforcement Administration agents be sent to New Orleans. She called for doubling the size of the DEA's High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area Task Force Group and the FBI's Violent Gang Safe Streets Task Force."

WGNO-TV, ABC 26, New Orleans (1/10, Murphy) reports, "The murder rate in the Big Easy is now four and a half times the national average. .. 'There is no doubt that this crime wave is putting a damper on our aggressive efforts to rebuild and re-image the city and to encourage not only residents to return, but tourists to continue to come,' said Senator Mary Landrieu/D-Louisiana." WGNO-TV adds, "Senator Landrieu announced a 10-point plan to fight crime in the New Orleans region. … She is asking for additional federal dollars to help rebuild criminal justice facilities like NOPD headquarters and the local police academy. … The senator is also requesting 60-million dollars to help rebuild the police department. … 'I urge the President and the Department of Justice to make an emergency grant to the city under the emergency cops program,' said Landrieu." WGNO-TV notes, "LSenator Landrieu is also asking the Justice Department to send additional drug enforcement and FBI agents to New Orleans. … FBI Special Agent in Charge Jim Bernazzani says those plans are already in the works. … 'Washington has committed to do a national canvass relative to agents who have homicide investigative experience,' said Bernazzani. 'To come to New Orleans on temporary status for about 90 to 120 days to work as a stop gap measure until we get another squad down here.' … The United States Attorney in New Orleans Jim Letten says the city must also address issues outside of law enforcement. … 'Fixing our school system and building the best system possible and rebuilding this economy,' said Letten. 'We have to create education and opportunities for our youth if we're going to get a handle on this thing for the mid and long term.'"

KTBC-TV, Austin, TX (1/9, 5:00 p.m.) broadcasted that Louisiana Sen. Mary Landrieu is "asking the Feds for help." She says "she has written to President Bush and will personally call Attorney General Alberto Gonzales." She continued, "Louisiana has not just been sitting around in New Orleans doing nothing but again we're in a very tough and unprecedented situation and not only need to step up and do our part but ask the Federal agencies to do more if they can and I think they can New Orleans officials are worried crime will deter tourists from Mardi Gras, which is just over a month away." WSJV-TV, South Bend, Elkhart, IN (1/9, 5:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "New Orleans leaders are worried the crime wave will keep tourists away from the city with Mardi Gras coming up next month."

First Lady Addresses Murder Wave During New Orleans Visit. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (1/10, Williams) reports First Lady Laura Bush "entered the brightly lighted theater of the Louisiana Children's Museum in the Warehouse District on Tuesday afternoon and without hesitation picked up a drumstick and a Senegalese songba drum, joining dozens of New Orleans-area elementary school students in a rousing performance of a funga, an African welcome song." Bush "smiled broadly as she pounded the drum and studied the faces of the children, who were among the many she met on a three-stop tour, her 11th post-Katrina visit to the city. … Her tour also included a lunch of catfish and greens and conversation at Cafe Reconcile, a job-training restaurant in the heart of Central City." The NOTP notes Bush's visit "was not without reference to the city's recent crime wave. She mentioned an antiviolence program used in Chicago that is based on the notion that violence is taught. 'If you grow up in a neighborhood where violence is common, you think it's normal,' Bush said. 'Because violence is taught, it can be unlearned. 'But I think people in the community really need to speak out and do whatever they can to get the message across that it's not acceptable,' she said."

DOJ_NMG_0114510

Judge Jails New Orleans Public Defender For Contempt. The New York Times (1/10, Drew) reports from New Orleans, "The chief judge in the city's juvenile courts had a top public defender arrested Tuesday in a bizarre escalation of a fight over changes in the city's troubled program for representing indigent defendants." The Times continues, "The judge, David Bell, was upset that no public defender was in his courtroom when he was ready to start this morning, and he drove to the defender's office and waited outside for Stephen Singer, the chief of trials, to arrive. … The judge took Mr. Singer to his courtroom, where he found him in contempt for not being prepared to provide representation and ordered him jailed for 36 days, three days for each of the 12 items on Tuesday's docket. Mr. Singer then spent about five hours in jail before a state appeals court stayed the order." The Times adds, "The events were the latest in a series of confrontations between judges and the public defender's office, which has long been overwhelmed and went broke after Hurricane Katrina. … A new board has shifted how the office uses its 30 lawyers to try to provide more thorough representation on the most serious cases. But the changes have made the day-to-day coverage more spotty, and the criminal court judges also have threatened to hold the office in contempt over the problems."

Former Interior Deputy Is Target In Abramoff Probe. The Washington Post (1/10, A3, Schmidt) reports, "Federal prosecutors have notified a former deputy secretary of the interior, J. Steven Griles, that he is a target in the public corruption investigation of Jack Abramoff's lobbying activities, sources knowledgeable about the probe said." The Post continues, "The sources, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said that among the possible criminal charges being investigated is whether Griles made false statements to the Senate Indian Affairs Committee in 2005 about job discussions Abramoff initiated while Griles was deputy secretary. … Justice Department prosecutors met with Griles on Friday to outline possible charges. The investigation has examined donations made by Abramoff's Indian tribal clients to an environmental advocacy group run by Italia Federici, who was involved with Griles socially, the sources said. Also under scrutiny are donations made to Federici's group by energy and mining companies, the sources said." The Post adds, "E-mails released last year by the Senate Indian Affairs Committee showed that Griles had more than half a dozen contacts with Abramoff or with Federici, head of the Council of Republicans for Environmental Advocacy, who was working as the lobbyist's go-between to Griles. Griles has said that he never tried to intercede on behalf of Abramoff's clients. … The Indian Affairs Committee, in a report issued after a series of investigative hearings, said that further inquiry 'appears warranted' into the 'veracity' of Federici's public testimony. Federici's testimony before the committee included discussions of her relationship with Abramoff, his tribal clients and Griles."

Abramoff's Interior Connection Sentenced To Two Years Probation. NBC News (1/10, Seidman) reports, "A former Interior Department official linked to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff was sentenced Tuesday in federal court to two years probation and a fine of $1000. The official, Roger Stillwell, pleaded guilty to a single misdemeanor count of filing a false financial statement with the department." NBC continues, "Magistrate Judge Alan Kay disregarded a recommendation by both the Department of Justice and Stillwell's attorney for a lesser sentence of six months probation. … Judge Kay said that Stillwell's actions amounted to a 'serious violation considering his position' and his years of government service. Kay admonished Stillwell saying there is 'no such thing as a free lunch, particularly as provided by lobbyists.'" NBC adds, "The charges against Stillwell are the first connected to the Abramoff scandal to touch the Interior Department. The charges also mark an expansion of the government's investigation into the influence peddling scandal involving the convicted lobbyist. Prosecutors acknowledged in court that there is still an ongoing investigation involving Abramoff and his contacts with the Department of Interior. … Stillwell, a former desk officer for the Commonwealth of the Northern Marianas - a lucrative Abramoff client - acknowledged receiving four tickets to a Redskins football game and two tickets to a Simon and Garfunkle concert in Washington - all paid for by Abramoff - which Stillwell did not report."

DOJ_NMG_0114511

Judge Rejects Media Request For Libby Trial Audio Recordings. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/10) reports US District Judge Reggie Walton "said Tuesday he would not make available daily audio recordings of the upcoming trial of Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff," Lewis "Scooter" Libby. "News organizations had asked that recordings of testimony and arguments be released for broadcast," but Walton said in his ruling that "the only recording of court proceedings is done by the court stenographer to help ensure an accurate transcript. … Broadcasting court proceedings -- along with commentary and analysis -- could prejudice jurors and lead to an unfair trial, Walton said."

Lack Of Cooperation From Agencies Prompted FBI To Quit Leak Probes. Under the headline "Leak Probes Stymied, FBI Memos Show," the New York Sun (1/10, Gerstein) reports, "A lack of cooperation from one or more intelligence agencies led the FBI to abandon several recent criminal investigations into leaks of classified information to the press, records obtained by The New York Sun indicate." The Sun adds, "In an exchange of e-mails in September 2005, FBI agents handling a leak investigation codenamed 'May Apple,' complained about difficulties in getting basic information about who saw classified documents key to the case. … A few weeks later, the head of the FBI's leak-sleuthing section, Michael Donner, wrote to the Justice Department's counterespionage chief, John Dion, asking to close the probe. The FBI's Washington field office 'concluded that the investigation had languished due to repeated requests for information…that have not been fulfilled in a timely manner,' Mr. Donner wrote." In an interview yesterday with the Sun, Donner, now retired, "acknowledged some instances where agencies were not enthusiastic about helping the FBI." He "said the current drive to share intelligence information made his job even harder." The Sun notes, "The friction apparent in the records…calls into question assurances by senior government officials that law enforcement and the intelligence community are working hand-in-glove to ferret out leaks." On its Web site, the Sun also provides a link to copies of the documents.

Judge Appoints Federal Prosecutor To Help Israeli Criminal Probe. The Mobile (AL) Register (1/10, Kirby) reports, "A federal judge in Mobile last week appointed Assistant U.S. Attorney George May to assist the Israeli government with a criminal investigation that touches southern Alabama." The Register continues, "As a commissioner of the court, May will gather information under a treaty between the United States and Israel that commits law enforcement officials to helping their counterparts when investigations cross international borders. … Chief U.S. District Judge Ginny Granade's order empowers May to collect documents and subpoena witnesses. He will certify and submit the evidence he gathers to the U.S. Department of Justice's Office of International Affairs." The Register adds, "The judge's order states only that it was prompted by a request by Israel. May, the anti-terrorism coordinator at the U.S. attorney's office in Mobile, said the probe relates to allegations involving bogus diplomas. … He said the Alabama connection is a small piece of a much larger investigation that also involves other parts of the country. Citing the beginning stages of the investigation, he declined to discuss the case in detail. He said the Israeli government has sought help from federal prosecutors in other districts. … May said he does not believe the targets of the probe live in Alabama." The Register notes, "The United States has signed 57 mutual legal assistance treaties, although not all have been ratified by the Senate, according to the Justice Department. … Bryan Sierra, a spokesman for the department, said most of the pacts are bilateral agreements with other countries, but others involve international organizations. For instance, the United States has a treaty with the Organization of American States, a collection of 35 countries in the Western Hemisphere, he said. … Sierra said the Justice Department does not keep statistics on the number of requests made by foreign governments, and he added that he could not even estimate how frequently a treaty is invoked."

DOJ_NMG_0114512

Former New Jersey Mayor Pleads Guilty To Taking Bribes. The Newark Star-Ledger (1/9, Sterling, Spoto) reported that on Monday, "A mayor who presided over a period of substantial growth in Brick Township…admitted taking more than $5,000 in bribes in exchange for helping a developer gain approval for a number of unspecified projects." Joseph C. Scarpelli "told a federal judge he accepted the bribes over five years." The Star-Ledger noted, "Court papers provided few de tails about the bribes, and law enforcement agents were equally quiet after court." FBI Newark SAC Leslie G. Wiser Jr. "showed up for the plea but also offered little information. When asked if the bureau considered Scarpelli a 'big fish' in its continuing probe of official corruption in New Jersey, Wiser said: 'Every public official is important to us, as is maintaining the integrity of the system.' He did note the FBI and U.S. Attorney's Office have had particular success making cases against public officials in Monmouth and Ocean counties of late, though he said there also are corruption cases in the pipeline from other counties."

Former Committeeman Loses Appeal Of Bribery Conviction. In a front-page story, the Holmdel (NJ) Independent (1/10, Bowes) reports, "Former Middletown Committeeman Raymond O'Grady lost his appeal on Friday and is now scheduled to begin his 43-month jail sentence Jan. 22. O'Grady was convicted in June on five corruption-related charges as part of the FBI's Operation Bid Rig investigation. The one-time director of the Monmouth County Central Motor Pool was found guilty of accepting at least $8,000 in cash bribes in exchange for official favors through his position in county government." The Independent notes defense lawyer Kevin Roe "argued that O'Grady's trial was unfair because of the suicide attempt of the FBI's star witness after only one day on the stand."

Tennessee Waltz Trial Jurors See FBI Video Of Alleged Bribe. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (1/10, Buser, 163K) reports, "A federal court jury Tuesday watched a secretly recorded videotape showing a former Shelby County official accepting $1,500 in cash from an informant that authorities say was a bribe. The money -- 15 $100 bills -- was supplied by the FBI, as was the tiny camera hidden in a briefcase." Calvin Williams "says he believed the payment was a legitimate business dividend due him from his associate, Tim Willis." The Commercial Appeal notes, "Williams is accused of using -- or claiming to use -- his influence with the County Commission to secure a $100,000 county grant for the Glenview Neighborhood Development Partners Inc. to provide low-interest loans for home improvements." Federal public defender Doris Randle-Holt "said Willis was a partner with Williams in several businesses and that the $1,500 represented Williams' 30 percent share of a $5,000 media services contract Willis had with Glenview to help win the grant. Willis testified, however, that they shared office space…but that their business enterprises were completely separate. Randle-Holt noted that Willis was paid $6,000 a month by the FBI for more than two years for his cooperation and that he had never been charged for admittedly submitting false invoices in 2001 when he had a consulting contact at Juvenile Court."

Judge Rejects Dixon's Bid For Release From Prison Pending Appeal. WMC-TV Memphis (1/9) reported on its Web site, "A handwritten plea from Roscoe Dixon, sent in December from his cell at the Oakdale Correctional Center in Louisiana, proved fruitless. Federal Magistrate Jon McCalla denied Dixon's request to be released pending his appeal of his federal bribery trial. In his letter, Dixon -- who was sentenced to five years behind bars -- describes overcrowding conditions which have, according to his letter, left him in solitary confinement until space becomes available. He has 'to eat the same food as those who are in "the hole,"' he wrote."

FBI Arrests California College Official On Bribery Charges. The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Lin, 850K) reports, "Federal agents arrested a UC Riverside administrator Tuesday on suspicion of bribing a general contractor in charge of building the school's new psychology building, authorities said." UCR Office of Design and Construction Associate Director Theodore Chiu "is accused of soliciting a $50,000 bribe from Irvine contractor FTR International Inc. last Halloween. Chiu allegedly asked for the payment when the company's president, Nizar Katbi, raised concerns about the $35-million project, including Chiu's choice of a subcontractor, according to an FBI affidavit filed in federal court. In exchange for the alleged bribe, Chiu agreed to sign a change order that would modify the university's original agreement with the company, the affidavit said." The Times notes, "Katbi cooperated with investigators by recording his meetings and conversations with Chiu, said Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles."

DOJ_NMG_0114513

Judge Rejects Devecchio Bid For Federal Trial. The AP (1/10) reports, "A former FBI agent accused of helping a ruthless mobster plot gangland slayings in Brooklyn more than a decade ago won't go to trial in federal court, a judge ruled Tuesday. Attorneys for R. Lindley DeVecchio had argued his case belonged in federal court because there -- unlike in state court -- they would be allowed to argue that he was immune from criminal charges arising from his duties as a federal agent." The AP notes, "The Brooklyn district attorney's office had fought to keep the case in state court after charging DeVecchio last year with four counts of murder in what it billed as one of the worst law enforcement corruption cases in U.S. history." The New York Times (1/10, Brick) also reports the ruling in "Metro Briefing."

9th Circuit Panel Rules Gang Attorneys Cannot Have Access To Witness Identities. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/10, B - 2, Egelko) reports, "Federal prosecutors in the death penalty trial of alleged members of a violent San Francisco gang don't have to give defense lawyers police reports that identify witnesses before the trial, a federal appeals court ruled Monday." The Chronicle continues, "The 2-1 decision by the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco overturned a ruling last year by the trial judge, who ordered prosecutors to release police reports on the witnesses, including their identities. U.S. District Judge William Alsup had also said prosecutors would be prohibited from calling witnesses whose names they refused to provide to the defense." The Chronicle adds, "Prosecutors say they fear for the witnesses' safety if they are identified, citing the killing in May of a witness who had testified in another San Francisco murder case. Defense lawyers and Alsup said prospective witnesses would be protected by orders prohibiting the defense from revealing the information to outsiders. … A federal grand jury issued racketeering indictments in October 2005 against 12 alleged members of the Down Below Gang, which authorities say has terrorized the Sunnydale public housing complex in Visitacion Valley since the late 1990s. Prosecutors say the defendants dealt drugs, toted guns and murdered seven people, including a 7-week-old baby." The Chronicle notes, "Eight defendants pleaded guilty last month to racketeering and conspiracy charges that carry prison sentences of up to 23 years. Of the remaining defendants, one is a fugitive and has not been publicly identified. The others are Emile Fort and Edgar Diaz, who could both be sentenced to death if convicted, and Terrell Jackson, whose case is still being evaluated by the U.S. Justice Department for possible death penalty charges. Their trial is scheduled to start in September."

Grand Jury Mulls Idaho Kidnapping, Murder Charges. The AP (1/10, Dininny) reports from Boise, ID, "A decision on whether to indict convicted murderer Joseph Duncan III on federal charges for kidnapping two north Idaho children and slaying one of them could come in the next few weeks, the U.S. attorney's office said Tuesday. … In the meantime, the federal agency that secures prisoners said it would recommend that the trial be held in Boise, rather than Coeur d'Alene, if a grand jury indicts Duncan." The AP continues, "Duncan, 43, drew national attention in 2005 with the kidnapping of then 8-year-old Shasta Groene and her 9-year-old brother, Dylan. … A Tacoma, Wash., native, Duncan had been living in Fargo, N.D., and was on the run from a child molestation charge in Minnesota when he drove past the Groene home on Interstate 90 east of Coeur d'Alene and spotted the children playing outside. Duncan stalked the family for several days and, on May 16, entered the home, bludgeoning the children's mother, Brenda Groene; her fiance, Mark McKenzie and Groene's 13-year-old son, Slade." The AP adds, "According to court documents, Duncan kidnapped Shasta and Dylan, traveling into the mountains near St. Regis, Mont., where he sexually abused them for seven weeks before killing Dylan. … Shasta was rescued when she and Duncan walked into a restaurant in Coeur d'Alene early on the morning of July 2, 2005. … Duncan pleaded guilty in state court last year to three counts of first-degree murder and three counts of first-degree kidnapping for the murders at the Groene home. A judge sentenced him to life in prison without parole on the kidnapping charges. … However, the sentence on the murder counts will be deferred while the federal government pursues its case against Duncan for the kidnappings and murder across state lines."

Los Angeles To Shift Anti-Gang Tactics. The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Mcgreevy, Winton) reports, "Los Angeles' top law enforcement officials have agreed on a new attack on gang violence, one that focuses more enforcement on smaller neighborhood gangs and uses a new legal tool tried last year on skid row." The Times continues, "The effort comes as L.A. officials are trying to quell a 14% increase in gang-related crime during the last year, marked by several high-profile incidents of race-motivated violence. … LAPD Chief William J. Bratton met this week with Dist. Atty. Steve Cooley and representatives of City Atty. Rocky Delgadillo to begin formulating the plan." The Times adds, "Bratton announced Tuesday that his department is developing a 'Top 10' list of gangs to target based on a complex formula — and then the three agencies will devote additional officers and attorneys specifically to those gangs. … The campaign will include targeting the leaders and headquarters of the worst gangs. … Police have identified 720 street gangs in Los Angeles, with 39,315 members. But officials said a small number of them are causing a disproportionate amount of crime in the hardest-hit neighborhoods. … The new strategy is something of a shift for law enforcement officials, who have until now focused much attention on larger gangs that run drug rings and other criminal enterprises."

DOJ_NMG_0114514

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Dismisses Challenge To VA's Use Of Religion In Veteran's Treatment. The AP (1/9, Foley) reports from Madison, WI, "The Department of Veterans Affairs' increasing use of religion in treating ailing veterans does not violate the separation of church and state, a federal judge has ruled." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge John Shabaz dismissed a lawsuit by the Madison-based Freedom From Religion Foundation and defended the agency's practices in his decision Monday, saying religion can help patients heal and is legal when done on a voluntary basis. … The foundation, a group of atheists and agnostics which has challenged the Bush administration's mix of government and religion, said it was the first time a judge upheld the constitutionality of the VA's use of religion in treating millions of veterans. The ruling averts a trial that was scheduled to begin later this month. … The group's president, Annie Laurie Gaylor, said Tuesday it would appeal the ruling." The AP adds, "The lawsuit challenged the agency's practice of giving most patients spiritual assessments that ask questions about faith, such as how often they attend church and how important religion is in their lives. Agency officials say the assessments help them determine patients' needs. … The suit also targeted VA drug and alcohol treatment programs that incorporate religion, the integration of its chaplain program into patient care and the expansion of chaplain services for outpatient veterans instead of just those at VA hospitals." The AP notes, "The veterans' agency, which treated 5.3 million people at its facilities in 2005, acknowledged it believes spirituality should be integrated into care but said it allows patients to decide whether that involves religion. … Jean Lin, a U.S. Department of Justice lawyer who represented the veterans' officials, declined comment. DOJ spokesman Charles Miller said the opinion speaks for itself."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Jury Continues Deliberations In Texas Smuggling Death Trial. The AP (1/10, Lozano) reports from Houston, "Jurors deliberated today without deciding whether to impose a death sentence for the truck driver in the nation's deadliest human smuggling attempt, in which 19 illegal immigrants who were locked in a sweltering trailer for hours eventually died from dehydration, overheating and suffocation. … The six men and six women on the jury deliberated for about six hours today. They were to resume Wednesday." The AP continues, "Jurors must decide whether to sentence Tyrone Williams to death or life in prison without parole, or to let the judge issue a sentence ranging from no incarceration time to life in prison without parole. … Williams was convicted last month on 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting immigrants, including 20 counts that were death-penalty eligible." The AP adds, "During the 2003 smuggling attempt, more than 70 immigrants were packed inside Williams' trailer, with no air conditioning. … They were heading from South Texas to Houston when the heat became unbearable and the immigrants began to panic, tearing holes in the trailer doors with their hands in order to breathe. Williams eventually opened the trailer doors and abandoned the container near Victoria, about 100 miles southwest of Houston. … Defense attorney Craig Washington told jurors Williams never intended for the immigrants to die. Washington said it was unfair that Williams was the only defendant in the case who is facing the death penalty when others were equally responsible. … But Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Rodriguez told jurors Williams had no compassion and he deserves to die because he alone could have freed them but chose not to open the trailer's doors."

DOJ Rules Against Appointment Of Alabama County Commissioner. The Mobile Press-Register (AL) (1/9, Murtaugh) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice on Monday objected to Gov. Bob Riley's appointment of Juan

DOJ_NMG_0114515

Chastang to the Mobile County Commission, saying it 'appears to diminish the opportunity of minority voters to elect a representative of their choice.'" The Press-Register continues, "The decision is the latest step in a long legal battle designed to oust Chastang, a black Republican, from representing District 1, a majority-black district that has historically elected Democrats. … Riley appointed Chastang to replace Sam Jones on the commission after Jones was elected mayor of Mobile in October 2005." The Press-Register adds, "Cecil Gardner, the attorney who filed the lawsuit against Chastang's appointment, said he will file a motion today asking that a panel of federal judges in Montgomery declare Chastang's seat vacant and order a special election to fill it. … The state can still appeal the Justice Department decision to the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia or ask the U.S. attorney general to reconsider the objection, according to the ruling."

WPMI-TV, NBC 15, Mobile, AL (1/10) reports, "According to the Justice Department, that appointment may have violated the federal Voting Rights Act. .. 'We predicted quite accurately that the governor would appoint a Republican. That commission district has never voted Republican in the entire history of the county commission,' says Cecil Gardner who initially brought the lawsuit over Chastang's appointment a year and a half ago. Tuesday, he filed a motion asking a federal court to order the seat vacated and that a special election be conducted 'Representatives of the people ought to be elected by the people and not chosen by executive fiat,' Gardner maintains. … But Chastang says the legal fight to get him out of office isn't' about the people. 'Partisan politics is what this whole thing is all about right now.'"

Michigan Islamic Group Urges FBI Probe Of Shiite Mosque Vandalism. The AP (1/10, Karoub) reports, "An Islamic coalition representing southeast Michigan Sunni groups and centers said Tuesday that the vandalism of Shiite mosques and businesses over the weekend could be hate crimes and called on the federal government to investigate. Late Saturday night or early Sunday, vandals broke windows of two mosques and five businesses…owned by Iraqi Shiites." Detroit Police Sgt. Eren Stephens Bell "said the department is investigating the vandalism and could not confirm if the incidents were hate crimes. … The FBI said in a statement Tuesday that it has talked to the Council on American-Islamic Relations and leaders of other community groups. If the Detroit police find information that links the vandalism to federal civil-rights violations, the FBI would 'pursue it accordingly.'"

DOJ Asked To Help Fight Anti-Arab Bigotry. UPI (1/10) reports that Arab American leaders have urged U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "to fight anti-Arab bigotry. … 'In response to concerns about the increasing level of negativity openly directed towards Arab and Muslim Americans, leaders from the Arab American Institute and other key Arab American and Muslim American organizations met with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to request that the federal government help quell the recent tide of bigotry,' the Washington-based AAI said in a statement Monday. … 'AAI and leaders from the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, Muslim Public Affairs Council, Islamic Society of North America and Muslim advocates also sought clarification and action on policies concerning racial profiling, suspension of habeas corpus, oversight of watch lists, and donations to charities in the Middle East,' the statement said." UPI adds, "AAI said the delegation 'also urged the attorney general to support the termination of the National Security Entry-Exit Registration System or 'special registration,' a program that began as an initiative of the Justice Department.' … AAI Chairman George Salem and AAI President James Zogby also requested (the department) to 'provide leadership for the country in helping to reverse this disturbing and increasingly accepted trend of anti-Arab and Muslim bias,' the statement said."

LAPD Board Will Not Punish Officer In Fatal Shooting Of Teen. The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Lait, Glover) reports, "A Los Angeles Police Department disciplinary board has secretly decided not to punish the officer who fatally shot 13-year-old Devin Brown two years ago, rejecting an earlier ruling by the civilian Police Commission that the act violated department policy, sources confirmed Tuesday." The Times continues, "Members of an LAPD Board of Rights, meeting behind closed doors on Monday, determined that Officer Steven Garcia was justified in shooting Brown as the youth allegedly tried to back a stolen car into the officer following a brief pursuit." The Times adds, "The shooting sparked outrage in the surrounding South Los Angeles community, with citizens and activists alleging that Garcia overreacted and used excessive force. Last year the city paid $1.5 million to settle a wrongful death lawsuit filed by Brown's family. .. .Monday's decision, reached by two high-ranking LAPD officials and a civilian representative, effectively negates the earlier finding by the Police Commission that the shooting was 'out of policy' and that Garcia should be punished. … It also reflects a dramatic change in the way the LAPD metes out discipline. For decades, the LAPD has heard evidence publicly when serious misconduct is alleged. Last summer, however, the California Supreme Court ruled that police officer personnel documents were not public records. Responding to that ruling — and over the objections of news organizations and civil libertarians — the LAPD moved to close its disciplinary hearings."

DOJ_NMG_0114516

NYTimes Applauds Spitzer's Move On Inmates' Calls. The New York Times (1/10, 1.16M) editorializes that Gov. Eliot Spitzer "set an important national example this week when he announced that the state corrections department would back away from a longstanding policy of charging prison inmates and their families more than six times the going rate for collect calls made from prison."

ANTITRUST:

Newspapers Plan Joint Sales Of Web Site Advertisements. The Wall Street Journal (1/10, A1, Angwin) reports, "The nation's three largest newspaper publishers are gearing up to sell advertising jointly on their newspapers' Web sites, believing their survival depends on seizing new online revenue." The Journal continues, "Gannett Co., McClatchy Co. and Tribune Co. are planning to offer advertisers one-stop shopping for display ads on Internet sites. The goal is to attract big advertisers such as car makers and phone companies that want to reach a nationwide online audience but don't want the hassle of negotiating ad deals with each company or newspaper." The Journal adds, "The joint effort, code-named 'Open Network,' marks a big new bid to win back advertisers that are defecting in droves to the Web. Currently, national advertisers buy the bulk of their online display ads -- banners and boxes -- from big portals such as Yahoo Inc., Time Warner Inc.'s AOL or Microsoft Corp.'s MSN. Yahoo has announced plans to work with seven other newspaper publishers to build a similar one-stop-shopping spot for advertisers. Google Inc. has also reaped a bonanza with advertising links that appear next to search results. … The three newspaper companies, known in the industry as GMT, are likely to each contribute 10% of their online-advertising space to the network, according to people familiar with the situation. They hope to announce something early this year, although the deal isn't finalized and could still fall apart." The Journal notes, "The venture is designed to help the chains tackle a vexing problem: They have long had trouble attracting national advertisers. In their print editions, this is largely because of price. Newspapers can jack up ad prices for local retailers that have few other ways to reach a hometown audience. But national advertisers often find it cheaper to buy a TV spot or magazine ad than to buy space in dozens of newspapers. National advertisers also account for about 75% of advertising on the Internet, according to PricewaterhouseCoopers. … Efforts by the chains to coordinate their print-advertising sales have shown little success, partly because individual papers weren't enthusiastic about standardizing ad sizes or giving up control of their relationships with advertisers. But with the industry under severe stress, that reluctance to band together may change."

Senate Plans Hearing On Impact Of Airline Merger. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/10, Grantham) reports, "Prompted by US Airways' bid to acquire Delta Air Lines and merger talk at other carriers, the U.S. Senate Commerce Committee has scheduled a hearing later this month on the likely effects of a potential wave of airline mergers." The AJC continues, "The Jan. 24 hearing will be on the state of the airline industry and the "potential impact of airline mergers and industry consolidation," the committee said Tuesday in a press release. … Then-Delta Chief Executive Leo Mullin testified to the same committee in hearings shortly after the 9/11 terrorist attacks. Congress later approved a multibillion-dollar aid bill after airlines were temporarily grounded in response to the 2001 attack." The AJC adds, "Congress had been expected to weigh in on the airline merger issue, although the U.S. Justice Department would have to independently review any combinations. After US Airways' hostile $8 billion-plus bid for Delta in November, local and national politicians from Atlanta and communities that would be affected expressed concern about the deal. … Delta management opposes the proposal but its bankruptcy court creditors will have the final say."

Micron Settles Chip Antitrust Suit. Bloomberg (1/10, Gullo) reports, "Micron Technology Inc., the biggest U.S. memory chip maker, said it cut previously reported first-quarter earnings by as much as $80 million to reflect a settlement resolving claims it conspired to fix chip prices." Bloomberg continues, "The accord resolves private antitrust lawsuits filed over U.S. sales of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, from 1999 to 2002. The claims were brought by manufacturers and individuals alleging that a price-fixing conspiracy drove up costs for the chips, a memory component used in personal computers, laptops and video game consoles. … 'It is expected that the settlement will result' in a reduction 'in an amount not to exceed $80 million,' Micron said today in a statement." Bloomberg adds, "Micron has been in settlement talks to end similar claims by state attorneys general who sued the company and other DRAM makers in July, said company spokesman Dan Francisco. The private antitrust suits against chip makers stemmed from a 2002 Justice Department probe of the DRAM market. Micron cooperated with U.S. officials in exchange for not being charged with a crime. … The settlement dismisses Micron from the class action, or group lawsuit, originally filed in San Francisco federal court. The accord is subject to court approval."

DOJ_NMG_0114517

Congress To Take Up Net Neutrality Bills. The New York Times (1/10, Labaton, 1.16M) reports, "Senior lawmakers, emboldened by the recent restrictions on AT&T and the change in control of Congress, have begun drafting legislation that would prevent high-speed Internet companies from charging content providers for priority access." The "first significant so-called net neutrality legislation of the new Congressional session was introduced Tuesday by Senator Byron L. Dorgan, Democrat of South Dakota, and Senator Olympia J. Snowe of Maine, one of the few Republicans in Congress to support such a measure." Rep. Ed Markey, Chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Telecommunications and the Internet, "said recently that he would introduce legislation soon and planned to hold hearings." But the "proposals face significant political impediments and no one expects that they will be adopted quickly," and the debate "promises to be a bonanza for lobbyists and a fund-raising tool for lawmakers. It pits Internet giants like Google, Yahoo, eBay and Amazon, which support the legislation, against telecommunication titans like Verizon, AT&T and large cable companies like Comcast."

Aloha Airlines Takes Mesa To Court. The AP (1/10) reports, "Aloha Airlines announced that it will pursue further legal action against Mesa Air Group Inc. in federal court." The AP continues, "Aloha sued Mesa in state court in October, alleging the Phoenix-based company improperly used data it obtained as a potential investor to try to drive Aloha out of business. … 'Upon further legal review of the federal antitrust laws, and given findings of federal Bankruptcy Judge Robert Faris in the Hawaiian Airlines matter, we believe our claims would be best pursued in the federal court system,' David A. Banmiller, Aloha's president and chief executive, said Monday. 'Aloha will continue to proceed vigorously against Mesa to stop the illegal and improper conduct.'" The AP adds, "Mesa, which had been considering investing in Aloha when the island carrier was undergoing bankruptcy reorganization, launched go! airlines in June as a competing carrier in Hawaii, entering the market dominated for decades by Hawaiian and Aloha airlines. … Hawaiian, now a unit of Hawaiian Holdings Inc., sued Mesa in February for the alleged illegal use of confidential information and trade secrets obtained during Hawaiian's Chapter 11 bankruptcy proceedings,"

FTC Gives Antitrust Nod To Hain-Avalon Deal. The AP (1/10) reports, "Hain Celestial Group Inc., an organic food company, received antitrust approval for its planned $120 million acquisition of Avalon Natural Products Inc." The AP continues, "The Federal Trade Commission approved early termination of a waiting period required under antitrust law on Friday." The AP adds, "Melville, N.Y.-based Hain, whose brands include Garden of Eatin', Earth's Best and Celestial Seasonings, is buying Avalon from private equity firm North Castle Partners LLC. … Avalon, located in Petaluma, Calif., sells personal care products under the Avalon Organics, Alba Botanica and Unpetroleum brands."

Supreme Court Lowers Threshold For Patent Lawsuits. The New York Times (1/10, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports the Supreme Court "opened the door Tuesday to a category of patent lawsuits that a lower court had barred, issuing a decision that will probably shift power in the courtroom from bigger patent-owning companies to smaller start-up companies that rely on obtaining licenses for patented technology." The court's "8-to-1 decision held that the holder of a patent license can sue to challenge the patent's validity without first refusing to pay royalties and putting itself in breach of the license agreement." This "seemingly technical question, in a dispute by two biotechnology companies, MedImmune and Genentech, has considerable practical importance. A license holder is much less likely to sue if it must first stop paying royalties and thereby risk becoming the target of a patent infringement suit, with the potential for triple damages and the loss of the right to continue selling its product."

DOJ_NMG_0114518

The Wall Street Journal (1/10, Bravin, Chase, 2.04M) reports the decision "weakens intellectual-property protections by making it easier for legal challenges to patents. The 8-1 decision put the justices on the side of those who have complained that existing rules stifle innovation, and it is their latest rebuke to the specialized panel that hears patent appeals, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, for rulings skewing property rights in favor of patent holders. The high court this term has also heard a separate case appealing obstacles imposed by the Federal Circuit against challenges to a patent on grounds that the invention is 'obvious.' A decision on that is pending." The "implications could be greatest for the biotechnology industry, where huge profits can turn on a relatively small number of patents, according to Pamela Samuelson, co-director of the Center for Law and Technology at the University of California, Berkeley."

SCOTUS Patent Ruling Could Spark Surge In Challenges. The AP (1/10, Elias) reports, "Biotechnology analysts and lawyers said a key U.S. Supreme Court ruling Tuesday could help companies who license patents get out of bad deals easier." The AP continues, "The Supreme Court ruled that Gaithersburg, Md.-based MedImmune Inc. could sue Genentech Inc. for patent infringement even though MedImmune continues to pay fees to Genentech to use the disputed technology to develop the drug Synagis that treats childhood respiratory problems. The high court didn't rule on the merits of MedImmune's claims Tuesday, the outcome of which analysts said is more important to the patent landscape of the biotechnology industry." The AP adds, "Licensing the rights to use another company's patent technology is the lifeblood of the biotechnology industry. Many smaller companies have long complained that larger companies with extensive patent portfolios often hold monopolistic grips on certain manufacturing processes. For instance, several biotechnology companies pay Genentech royalties to access the technology at the heart of the MedImmune dispute. … 'This is definitely a major ongoing controversy,' said Jason Kantor, an analyst with RBC Market Capitals. 'The decision today does not have far-reaching implications.'"

The Legal Times (1/10, Mauro) reports, "Patent litigation could explode in the wake of the Supreme Court's ruling Tuesday in a closely watched dispute over patent validity between two biotechnology firms." The Times continues, "The Court, by an 8-1 vote, reinstated a lawsuit by MedImmune challenging a Genentech patent related to Synagis, a popular drug for treatment of respiratory disease in children. The opinion in MedImmune v. Genentech, written by Justice Antonin Scalia, says patent licensees no longer have to breach the license in order to have standing to challenge the patent that they dispute. Patent lawyers say the ruling could lead to a flurry of challenges to existing patents. … 'It's a rare patent where you can't find something to challenge. There will be an explosion in litigation by these licensees,' says Jim Badke, a partner at Ropes & Gray. 'Companies can have their cake and eat it too.'" The Times adds, "The Jan. 9 ruling overturns a decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, which since 2004 had held that a breach -- such as ceasing royalty payments -- was necessary in order to establish the "case or controversy" required to challenge the patent. Critics of the Federal Circuit's doctrine said it discouraged challenges against invalid patents, because breaking a license agreement can be risky. Such a breach can prompt the patent holder to retaliate by suing for infringement and seeking an injunction against further sales of the product, along with treble damages. .. Now a licensee can challenge a patent while still honoring it and paying royalties -- as MedImmune did in the case before the Supreme Court -- and patent challenges will be safer and easier to file without fear of retaliation."

ENVIRONMENT:

DOJ Probing Possible Ethical Violations At Mineral Agency. The Denver Post (1/10, Raabe) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department has begun two criminal investigations into the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service over possible ethics violations." The Post continues, "One of the investigations focuses on individuals at the agency's office in the Denver Federal Center, officials said." The Post adds, "The investigations mark the first time that federal officials are targeting possible criminal activity at the Minerals Management Service. .. The agency already has been the subject of noncriminal federal inquiries and audits alleging problems in its mission to collect royalty payments on oil and gas production from federal property." The Post notes, "Allegations of criminal ethics violations are unrelated to the previous inquiries and audits, the agency said in a statement. … 'The Minerals Management Service requested an investigation by the Inspector General into two possible ethics violations. These cases have been referred to the Justice Department,' the statement said. … 'Both cases involve individual personnel, and therefore cannot be discussed outside the investigation itself.' … Earlier this month, a report from the Interior Department's inspector general concluded that the Minerals Management Service may be allowing royalty underpayments because of weaknesses and inconsistencies in the agency's audits of energy-company payments."

DOJ_NMG_0114519

Florida City To Target Ex-Utility Heads After DOJ Drops Probe. The Sarasota (FL) Herald Tribune (1/10, Quinlan) reports from Venice, FL, "The city will consider filing lawsuits or taking other legal action against the former utility department employees believed to be responsible for the illegal dumping to which the city pleaded guilty in federal court in 2005." The Tribune continues, "The City Council's decision Tuesday to weigh legal options comes days after city leaders learned that federal prosecutors have given up trying to bring criminal charges against any former utility department employees." The Tribune adds, "The Justice Department's decision to drop the case has angered council members, who say that the actions of a few former employees ultimately cost taxpayers more than $2 million in fines and engineering and legal fees. … 'The city felt that it had no choice but to enter into a guilty plea based on the evidence,' said council member John Moore, a former judge. 'I felt that they should have been prosecuted.'" The Tribune notes, "The Department of Justice would not comment on why it closed the case. The City Council instructed the city attorney Tuesday to seek an explanation. .. The investigation began after several former utility department employees accused colleagues of illegally dumping excess treated waste water into Curry Creek and spraying it onto a field at Knights Trail in 2001, even though the systems designed to measure and limit flow were not working. … In 2004, the city purged the department, hiring a private firm, Operations Management International, to run the city waste-water operations. … The city pleaded guilty to three felony violations of the Clean Water Act, receiving the minimum fine allowable, $110,000. As part of the plea deal, city officials agreed to cooperate in any further investigation of the supervisors or managers responsible, whom court papers refer to only as the 'Executive Group.' … But some former employees who claim to be members of the 'Executive Group' say that federal prosecutors' decision to walk away from the case proves their innocence. They say current city administrators capitulated to federal prosecutors and used the case and allegations to stage a coup."

NOAA Affirms Human Role In Climate Change. The New York Times (1/10, Revkin, 1.16M) reports, "President Bush has said it. A lot of government scientists have said it. But until yesterday, it appeared that no news release on annual climate trends out of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration under the Bush White House had said unequivocally that a buildup of greenhouse gases was helping warm the climate." The Times adds, "The statement came in a release that said 2006 was the warmest year for the 48 contiguous states since regular temperature records began in 1895. ... 'A contributing factor to the unusually warm temperatures throughout 2006 also is the long-term warming trend, which has been linked to increases in greenhouse gases,' the release said, emphasizing that the relative contributions of El Niño and the human influence were not known."

The CBS Evening News (1/9, story 8, 2:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Scientists confirmed today that 2006 was the warmest year on record in America, more than two degrees warmer than the 20th century average." CBS (Alfonsi) added, "Scientists blame El Niño , the weather phenomenon that warms the waters in the Pacific, shifting the location and intensity of the jet streams, making our weather just weird."

The Washington Post (1/10, A1, Kaufman, 690K) says 2006 capped "a nine-year warming streak 'unprecedented in the historical record' that was driven in part by the burning of fossil fuels, the government reported yesterday." The Post adds, "According to the government's National Climatic Data Center, the record-breaking warmth...was the result of both unusual regional weather patterns and the long-term effects of the buildup of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere. 'People should be concerned about what we are doing to the climate,' said Jay Lawrimore, chief of the climate monitoring branch of [NOAA]. 'Burning of fossil fuels is causing an increase in greenhouse gases, and there's a broad scientific consensus that is producing climate change.'"

DOJ_NMG_0114520

USA Today (1/10, O'Driscoll, 2.27M) reports, "The climate center says the current El Niño, the periodic warming of Pacific waters, is the biggest factor for 2006, and global warming is 'a contributing factor.' This is believed to be the first time the annual temperature report mentions climate change as a cause."

The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Hotz, 850K) reports, "Based on an analysis of readings from 1,200 weather stations around the country, the average annual temperature in the Lower 48 states last year was 2.2 degrees higher than the mean temperature for the 20th century and fractionally warmer than in 1998, which previously held the temperature record, the researchers reported."

US To Raise Royalty Rates For Gulf Oil And Gas Drilling. The New York Times (1/10, Andrews, 1.16M) reports, "The Bush administration, accused of failing to collect billions of dollars from companies that drill for oil and gas in federal waters, announced on Tuesday that it would demand higher royalties on all new deepwater leases in the Gulf of Mexico. The Interior Department said it would raise the royalty rate to 16.7 percent from 12.5 percent of oil and gas sales, a change that it estimated would increase government revenue by $4.5 billion over 20 years." The "change will not alter any of the thousands of existing offshore leases, nor will it affect a mistake in hundreds of leases that could allow companies to escape as much as $10 billion in royalties over the next five years. The Interior Department has been trying to renegotiate those leases for the last six months, but has managed to reach voluntary agreements with only 5 of the 56 companies that hold them." The Times adds, "Next week, House Democrats hope to pass legislation that would punish companies that refuse to renegotiate, either by imposing a stiff new tax on their production or by prohibiting them from acquiring new leases."

The Wall Street Journal (1/10, A2, Fialka, Gold, 2.04M) says the royalty increase is "apparently to appease critics in Congress who say the government has failed to collect all of the royalty payments owed it from past Gulf production."

Democrats Face Hurdles As They Target Oil Industry Tax Incentives. The Chicago Tribune (1/10, Neikirk, 617K) reports, "Democrats are pushing a cleaner, greener energy policy that they will try to drive through the House later this month. But its ultimate outlook is uncertain—and so is its impact." House Democrats "want to do away with billions of dollars in oil industry tax incentives and force oil companies to pay higher royalties on Gulf of Mexico leases. The extra money would be used to give a dramatic boost to renewable energy sources." The Tribune adds, "Although President Bush increasingly has talked about development of such energy sources, funding has been spotty." The "new legislation faces two big hurdles—a Senate where Democrats have a razor-thin margin and a White House that backed the tax breaks in the first place." And "some energy analysts said they doubt that the bill would contribute greatly to easing the nation's energy problem any time soon, even if the House bill should become law."

Bush Administration Lifts Moratorium On Drilling In Alaska's Bristol Bay. The Washington Post (1/10, D1, Mufson, Eilperin, 690K) reports, "The Bush administration yesterday moved to boost U.S. oil and gas supplies by lifting a long-standing moratorium on drilling in Alaska's Bristol Bay, as OPEC accelerated plans to reduce supplies in order to prop up sagging crude prices." Congress "first barred drilling in Bristol Bay in 1989 after the huge Exxon Valdez oil tanker spill damaged Alaska's coast. Congress lifted the ban in 2003," but "a moratorium President Bill Clinton declared on drilling in the area in 1998 remained in effect, so it took Bush's action yesterday to open it to development. Bush also lifted a presidential moratorium on part of the Gulf of Mexico that Congress opened for drilling in December." Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne "said the offshore drilling in both areas and the increase in royalty fees would 'enhance America's energy security by improving opportunities for domestic energy production, and will also increase the revenues that the federal government collects from oil and gas companies on behalf of American taxpayers.'"

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

SF Chronicle Argues DOJ Undercut Its Case In BALCO Probe. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/10, Page B - 5, Egelko) reports, "The Chronicle told a federal appeals court Monday that a secret government filing in support of fines against the newspaper and prison sentences for two of its reporters actually undermines prosecutors' case against the journalists for refusing to disclose the sources of grand jury leaks about athletes and steroids." The Chronicle continues, "Federal prosecutors submitted the documents under seal last month to the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco, saying they contained new information about their efforts to identify the sources of the information supplied to the reporters, Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams. The court has scheduled a hearing Feb. 12 on a judge's contempt-of-court orders against the reporters and The Chronicle. .. Their sealed filing came a day after reports by the Associated Press and Yahoo.com that the FBI was investigating a former defense lawyer in the steroid case as a possible source of the leak." The Chronicle adds, "In Monday's filing, lawyers for the reporters and the newspaper argued that prosecutors were effectively conceding they had failed to pursue alternative sources of information about the leaks before going after the reporters. … The Justice Department says it issues subpoenas to journalists only as a last resort. The Chronicle contends the same standard is part of the constitutional guarantee of freedom of the press and was not met in this case."

DOJ_NMG_0114521

Four Get Prison Sentences In Virginia Cocaine Conspiracy Case. The Martinsville (VA) Bulletin (1/9) reported four men "have been sentenced by a federal judge in a cocaine distribution conspiracy case." Those sentences range from four to ten years in prison. The federal indictment "included charges of conspiracy to distribute 5,000 grams or more of cocaine powder [and] possession with intent to distribute cocaine." The DEA and the Virginia State Police "investigation into the alleged drug ring began in February when a man was arrested in the Eastern District of Virginia while allegedly in possession of more than 50 grams of cocaine. … On Nov. 2, former Henry County sheriff H. Frank Cassell, along with 12 former members of his department and seven residents, were charged in a…48-count federal indictment which includes allegations of racketeering conspiracy, obstruction of justice, misprision, money laundering, firearms offenses, drug charges, perjury and other charges."

Arizona Man Sentenced For 2005 Shootout With US Marshals. The Arizona Republic (1/10, Arnold) reports, "A 25-year-old man has been sentenced to 40 years in prison in connection with a 2005 gunbattle in Gilbert (AZ)." The Republic continues, "Joshua Wayne Trotter was sentenced Monday afternoon after he pleaded guilty in September to seven counts of assaulting a federal officer, unlawful possession of a firearm and use of a firearm during and in retaliation to a crime of violence. … Trotter was accused of shooting at U.S. Marshals, injuring one, June 3, 2005, as they attempted to arrest him on a probation violation federal warrant, according to the U.S. Attorney for Arizona." The Republic adds, "Trotter has five previous felony convictions, including assaulting police officers, and a case pending in Coconino County Court on a charge of assault on a family member, the U.S. Attorney's Office said. .. The Marshals tracked Trotter, a suspected methamphetamine user, to Gilbert after he is believed to have terrorized his family three weeks earlier near the Grand Canyon, a U.S. Marshals Service representative told The Arizona Republic in 2005. … According to the U.S. Attorney's Office, marshals attempted to block Trotter's path with their vehicles as he drove away from a house east of Lindsay and Pecos roads."

The AP (1/10) reports, "A Marshal opened fire as Trotter pushed the other Marshal's car backwards, and Trotter returned fire with a pistol, striking one deputy in the hand. Trotter eventually was shot twice and surrendered. He had five previous felony convictions and has an assault case pending in Coconino County Court. … (US District Judge Paul K.) Rosenblatt described Trotter as a 'poster-boy for the effects of methamphetamine,' at the sentencing, the U.S. Attorney's office said."

Mexico Extradites Man To Face Charges In California Deputy's Slaying. The AP (1/10) reports, "A Mexican man was extradited to the United States on Tuesday in connection with the slaying of a deputy sheriff in California." The AP continues, "Jorge Arroyo Garcia, alias Jorge Rubo or Armando Garcia, was flown to the northern city of Tijuana, across the border from San Diego, California, and formally handed over to agents from the United States Marshals Service, the Mexican Attorney General's Office said in a news release. … According to U.S. authorities, Arroyo is believed to have shot Los Angeles County Deputy Sheriff David March during a traffic stop in April 2002. In addition to murder, Arroyo is accused of illegal weapons possession." The AP adds, "Arroyo was first captured by Mexican authorities in 2004 and he has been held in a Mexican prison since. He filed various appeals fighting his extradition that eventually were dismissed. … The Attorney General's Office described Arroyo as one of the United States Marshal Service's most-wanted fugitives."

The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Enriquez, Blankstein) reports, "The extradition marks a victory for L.A. prosecutors and local police, who have been trying for several years to get Garcia to stand trial. Detectives allege that after shooting March during a traffic stop in Irwindale, Garcia fled to Jalisco, Mexico. He was arrested last year." The Times adds, "Mexican police were said to be helping in the search, but at that time the extradition of fugitives to the U.S. from Mexico was in dispute. Mexican judges balked at allowing Mexican nationals to be returned to a country where they could face the death penalty or life in prison. … In 2004, Mexico's Supreme Court ended a four-year argument with the U.S. over extradition by ruling that thousands of slaying suspects could be returned."

DOJ_NMG_0114522

IMMIGRATION:

Demjanjuk To Appeal Deportation Again. The AP (1/10) reports, "A retired Ohio auto worker ordered deported over accusations that he was a Nazi death camp guard during World War II has started another appeal in a federal court, his lawyer said Tuesday." The AP continues, "John Demjanjuk, 86, of suburban Cleveland, on Dec. 21 lost his previous attempt to avoid deportation when the Board of Immigration Appeals in Falls Church, Va., rejected his appeal of an immigration judge's 2005 deportation order. … But Demjanjuk still has the right to appeal that ruling in federal courts, so the filing of a petition for review in the 6th Circuit in Cincinnati was expected. The filing Monday starts the next appeal process, defense lawyer John Broadley said. … The immigration appeals board said Demjanjuk's Nazi guard past is conclusively established." The AP adds, "Demjanjuk's case dates back nearly 30 years. He was cleared in 1993 in Israel of being the notorious 'Ivan the Terrible,' a sadistic guard at the Treblinka concentration camp in Poland. But the Justice Department said World War II documents prove he was a Nazi guard at various death or forced labor camps."

GOP Lawmakers Ask DOJ To Help Convicted Border Agents Remain Free. The El Paso Times (1/10, Gilot) reports, "Five congressmen said they will have a news conference today in Washington, D.C., to support the efforts of two former El Paso Border Patrol agents to remain free on bond while they appeal their convictions in the case of a drug smuggler who was shot in the buttocks in 2005 near Fabens." The Times continues, "The elected officials said they wrote to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales requesting the Justice Department to direct federal prosecutors to not oppose a motion for bond continuance by Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean. If a federal judge denies the motion, Ramos and Compean have to surrender on Jan. 17 to start their prison sentences. … The lawmakers are U.S. Reps. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., Ted Poe, R-Texas, Walter Jones, R-N.C., Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., and Duncan Hunter, R-Calif."

Border Region Officials Appeal To Congress To Stop Construction Of Wall. McClatchy (1/10, Montgomery) reports, "With Democrats now in charge on Capitol Hill, a 700-mile fence that swept through the previous Republican-controlled Congress is apt to come under a scathing re-evaluation amid reports of skyrocketing costs and widening opposition along the U.S.-Mexican border. Mayors from Texas border cities will meet with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff next week with what they say is a unified message: Don't build the fence. The meeting is scheduled for Jan. 17 in the office of Texas Republican Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison." According to McClatchy, "The growing outcry from local officials parallels renewed concerns over costs following a report that the price tag for building and maintaining the fencing could reach nearly $50 billion over a 25-year period. The cost projections were prepared by the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service."

TAX:

IRS Urged To Drop Private Debt Collection Program. The New York Times (1/10, Browning) reports, "The national taxpayer advocate called on Congress yesterday to repeal the authority of the Internal Revenue Service to use private debt collectors." The Times continues, "In her annual report, the taxpayer advocate, Nina E. Olson, said the private debt collection program was economically inefficient and prone to abuse. In particular, she faulted the I.R.S. for not disclosing certain 'psychological techniques' used by the private contractors to try to collect unpaid taxes." The Times adds, "The office of the taxpayer advocate was created by Congress to identify problems within the I.R.S. that affect taxpayers and to promote their interests before the agency and Congress, which writes the tax code. … Ms. Olson's office provided its most extensive review yet of the private debt-collection program, which it has been monitoring for two years since plans for it were announced. The program, which formally started in September, is meant to farm out easily collectible tax bills, typically owed by low-income taxpayers, to private collection agencies. When the

DOJ_NMG_0114523

I.R.S. announced the program, it said that the private entities would abide by the same publicly disclosed rules as I.R.S. employees." The Times notes, "Private debt collection has drawn criticism that it is not cost-efficient and that some of the private firms hired by the I.R.S. have questionable business practices. One firm hired by the agency was the law firm of Linebarger Goggan Blair & Sampson of Austin, Tex., whose former partner, Juan Peña, pleaded guilty to federal bribery charges for his role in winning a collection contract from the city of San Antonio."

The Washington Post (1/10, D3, Day) reports, "Olson's recommendations were greeted warmly by the Democrats who will chair the two congressional committees that oversee the IRS, Max Baucus of Montana of the Senate Finance Committee and Charles B. Rangel of New York of the House Ways and Means Committee. Baucus and Rangel have strongly criticized the use of private debt collectors and have said the job should stay within the government, a position both reiterated yesterday. … Both also repeated their vow to tackle the alternative minimum tax, or AMT, and the tax gap -- the $290 billion to $350 billion in uncollected taxes -- in legislation this year."

Repeal Of Phaseouts Urged. In his "Tax Report" column for the Wall Street Journal (1/10, D1), Tom Herman writes, "Millions of people are paying taxes at higher rates than they probably realize because of tricky provisions that can reduce -- or even eliminate -- major tax breaks based on their income. … These so-called phaseouts (because some benefits begin to phase out when your income exceeds certain levels) and similar provisions should be repealed, or at least simplified, said Nina Olson, the Internal Revenue Service's National Taxpayer Advocate, in a report to Congress released yesterday. Ms. Olson, who isn't a political appointee, heads an IRS unit designed to help taxpayers cut through red tape and deal with problems that typically couldn't be resolved through normal channels." Herman continues, "The report says more than 60 million individual income-tax returns, about 44% of the total filed last year, are affected each year by one or more of these provisions, which can drive up a taxpayer's marginal tax rate well above his or her official tax rate. … It's doubtful that Congress will eliminate phaseouts. Repealing them would cost the U.S. Treasury Department billions of dollars each year at a time when lawmakers are focusing more on cutting budget deficits than on simplifying the nation's notoriously complex tax system. Yet the report throws a new spotlight on a dimly lit corner of the tax world that many taxpayers need to understand more thoroughly in order to make intelligent tax and investment-planning decisions."

Taxpayer Advocate Cites AMT, Income Underreporting As Top Two IRS Problems.

The AP (1/10, Abrams) reports, "A tax law meant to crack down on wealthy tax dodgers has instead become the most serious problem facing millions of other taxpayers. For the government, the biggest problem is billions of dollars in unpaid taxes, National Taxpayer Advocate Nina E. Olson said Tuesday in a report to Congress on the hurdles Americans face in meeting their tax obligations. Olson, who works independently within the Internal Revenue Service, also urged Congress to repeal IRS authority to contract out to private collection agencies, saying the IRS is better trained and more efficient in collecting delinquent taxes." The advocate "is required to submit an annual report to Congress listing at least 20 of the most serious problems encountered by taxpayers. This year the list was topped by the alternative minimum tax. … The second most serious problem was the gap between what taxpayers should be paying and what the IRS is collecting, estimated at $290 billion a year. The advocate said that noncompliance by some taxpayers requires good-faith taxpayers to pay an additional $2,200 a year."

Congressional Budget Rules Seen As Stifling IRS Debt-Collection Effort. Under the headline, "Tax Collection Debate Is A Product Of Budget Battles," the Washington Post's (1/10, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The idea of using private-sector debt collection companies to get small-time tax delinquents to pay up has been controversial since Congress gave the green light to the program in 2004. Some members of Congress have questioned whether the program will prove effective, and the National Treasury Employees Union, which represents IRS workers, is lobbying on Capitol Hill to ban such outsourcing. Under the program, the debt-collection companies get a commission of up to 25 cents for every dollar they collect. The IRS has estimated that the outsourcing program will bring in about $1.4 billion, less costs, over 10 years and should free up revenue agents to focus on more complex cases and big-time tax cheats." The Post adds that the outsourcing program, "grew out of the pull-and-push over annual IRS budgets. The congressional appropriations process each year has kept the agency from getting a little extra money that could bring in a lot more tax revenue," according to Nina E. Olson, taxpayer advocate, who the Post adds, "thinks the risks are too great." Olson "recommended that Congress consider revising its budget rules" and "increase IRS personnel funding by 2 to 3 percent each year to allow the agency to increase staffing."

DOJ_NMG_0114524

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Withdraws Four Judicial Nominations.

Fox News' Special Report (1/9, Hume) reported, "In light of the new Democratic majority in Congress four of President Bush's federal appeals court appointees have asked that their nominations be withdrawn. … Confirmation of all four had been blocked previously in the Senate judiciary committee." The AP (1/10, Espo) reports that in "a concession" to Senate Democrats, President Bush "won't rename four controversial federal appeals court nominees whose confirmations were blocked last year." William Haynes, William G. Myers III and Michael Wallace all "asked to have their appointments withdrawn," while Judge Terrence Boyle "was informed of the White House's decision, according to an ally." Deputy White House spokeswoman Dana Perino "said the president was disappointed about the withdrawals. … 'Unfortunately, a few selected senators prevented these nominees from receiving fair consideration. The president is disappointed in this inaction, and hopes that the days of judicial obstructionism are beyond us.'" McClatchy (1/10, Barrett, Rosen) reports Boyle "refused" to withdraw his nomination, "saying in an interview Tuesday that it wasn't his place. 'I didn't quit,' said Boyle, whose case may be the longest nomination-in-waiting in U.S. history. He was first nominated for the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals in 1991 by President George H.W. Bush and was nominated six more times by the current President Bush."

The New York Times (1/10, Lewis, 1.16M) reports the announcement of the nominees' withdrawal "was widely taken to mean that the president had decided that renominating them would be a needlessly provocative act, one that would anger Democrats without sufficient political payoff from conservatives for sticking by the nominees. … After Tuesday's announcement, some Democrats expressed appreciation for the decision." Sen. Patrick Leahy, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, "praised Mr. Bush for not resubmitting the three nominees. 'This new Congress presents an opportunity for a fresh start on judicial nominations, one that emphasizes qualifications and bipartisan consensus over game-playing." Sen. Charles Schumer said, "It's the first whiff of conciliation we've had on the issue of judges." According to the Times, "At least one nominee had told friends he was interested in withdrawing long ago but agreed to keep his name in to satisfy the White House if the president wanted to continue pressing the nominations."

Bloomberg (1/10, Rowley) reports, "Senator Charles E. Schumer, a New York Democrat, welcomed the administration's retreat as a sign Bush 'is heeding the message from the November election.' He said Democrats would work with the administration 'to confirm judges who are not extremists, either left or right.'"

Bush Renominates Thirty-Two Other Judiciary Candidates. The Washington Post (1/10, A3, Smith, 690K) reports, "Signaling at the same time that President Bush is committed to placing more conservatives on the bench, the White House renominated 32 other federal judicial candidates that the previous Senate did not confirm. Bush also nominated a previous candidate for a federal district court to fill one of the four appellate positions."

WSJournal Blames Graham For Haynes' Withdrawal. The Wall Street Journal (1/10, 2.04M), in an editorial, writes Haynes "is a victim of…Lindsey Graham's desire for the media spotlight. … Graham joined Democrats in blocking him to settle a political score." Haynes "is general counsel of the Pentagon, where his transgression in the days following the 9/11 attacks was to do his job with too much determination to protect the country. That meant offering legal analysis to Secretary Donald Rumsfeld on the treatment of detainees -- advice that critics later distorted as condoning 'torture.'" The Journal Claims Graham "basked in media attention for opposing President Bush on detainees" and "for reasons of ego or retribution or something, he has also insisted on embarrassing the White House by blocking Mr. Haynes's nomination." The Journal concludes: "Graham's treatment of a favorite son is a disgraceful episode, and one that South Carolina Republicans will want to consider if the Senator faces a primary challenge in 2008."

WPost Welcomes Bush's Move. The Washington Post (1/10, A12, 690K), in an editorial, writes that Bush's decision "is a welcome sign from an administration that, in the realm of judicial selection, has too often chosen confrontation over compromise. … Bush deserves credit for putting some action behind his rhetoric of bipartisanship." The Post adds, "Now the onus is not only on the president to avoid more thumb-in-their-eye nominees, but also on Democrats…to make good on their end of the bargain: to give the president's nominees the timely and reasonable consideration that nominees have not always received in the past."

DOJ_NMG_0114525

Bush Renominates Recess Appointments Myers And Sauerbrey. The Washington Times (1/10, 88K) reports President Bush "renominated Julie L. Myers to head U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement a year after he was forced to make her a recess appointment during questions about her qualifications for the job. … Myers' recess appointment expired at the end of the last Congress. During her year in office, ICE expanded enforcement, but many members of Congress said they wanted to see still more operations. Her nomination will give both Democrats and Republicans in Congress a platform to criticize the president's immigration policy. She was one of several recess appointees Mr. Bush renominated yesterday. Another was Ellen R. Sauerbrey, the former Republican candidate for Maryland governor, who Mr. Bush has tapped to be assistant secretary of state for population, refugees and migration. Her nomination proved to be contentious because of her pro-life views."

Petraeus, Fallon Expected To Be Confirmed Quickly. The Hill (1/10, Tiron) reports, "Despite stepping up opposition to President Bush's yet-to-be-announced troop-surge plan, the Democratic-led Senate is likely to swiftly confirm military officers selected by the administration to carry out its new plan for Iraq. … Lt. Gen. David Petraeus "has been chosen to replace Gen. George Casey as the top commander in Iraq with a promotion to four-star general, while Casey will be nominated to become the new Army chief of staff. Meanwhile, Adm. William Fallon will take over U.S. Central Command from Gen. John Abizaid, who is retiring. All three nominations require Senate confirmation." According to the Hill, "Democrats and some Republicans who have been more cautious about supporting the White House's troop-surge denied they would use the nomination process to force the president's hand." Casey "may face tough questions" from Sen. John McCain and Sen. Lindsey Graham "both of whom have been pushing for more troops in Iraq."

Top State Department Arms Control Official Resigning. Al Kamen, in his Washington Post "In the Loop" column (1/10, A11) writes, "State Department. Buzz is Robert Joseph, undersecretary for arms control and international security, is going to be moving on, possibly at the end of this month. The date is uncertain, we're told, because it has changed a few times. Apparently Secretary Condoleezza Rice wanted Joseph, who we're told has been frozen out of some important issues, to stay on for a bit given all the openings."

Tomlinson Withdraws His Nomination For Broadcasting Board Post. Fox News' Special Report (1/9, Hume) reported that Kenneth Tomlinson, Chairman of the Broadcasting Board of Governors "which manages the government's international broadcasting offices, has told the president that he would rather write a book about his experiences than undergo another confirmation process. Tomlinson was formerly chairman of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting where he was criticized by congressional Democrats and liberal public broadcasters for his efforts to add a conservative viewpoint to programming. … An internal investigator found he violated the board's code of ethics." The Washington Times (1/10, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Tomlinson said, "I think it's a good story that will help the public understand how Washington operates. There's been a criminalization of political differences." The Times adds that during Tomlinson's tenure at the Broadcasting Board of Governors, it "worked to open news operations in parts of the world where authoritarian regimes blocked access to information. As a result of these initiatives, an Arabic language satellite TV network now broadcasts in Iraq and other Muslim nations, Persian language satellite news is fed daily into Iran, and radio and television broadcast signals are sent into Afghanistan and Cuba."

SMU Faculty Questions Bush Library Plans. The New York Times (1/10, Blumenthal, 1.16M) reports, "Intimates of President Bush have singled out Southern Methodist University as the likely site of his presidential library, but faculty members, complaining of being bypassed, are raising sharp questions about the school's identification with his presidency. In a meeting Tuesday, faculty members complained of a lack of consultation over the emerging agreement and all but demanded answers from the university's president, R. Gerald Turner, on the relationship that would develop between the university and the library. … The session grew out of the uproar after an op-ed article in the student newspaper, The Daily Campus, by two professors at the university's Perkins School of Theology complaining about the library selection process.

DOJ_NMG_0114526

GOP Senators Reportedly Considering Filibuster Of Minimum Wage Hike. The New York Times (1/10, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports, "As part of their 100-hour legislative blitz, House Democrats are expected to vote today to increase the minimum wage for the first time in a decade, to $7.25 an hour, in a move that economists say will raise pay for 13 million workers. The bill's chances are less certain in the Senate, largely because of friction over a Republican push to include tax breaks for small business in the bill. Senate Republicans have hinted that, without such tax cuts, they will filibuster the measure, a move that the bill's supporters would need 60 votes to overcome." The Times adds, "After opposing a minimum-wage increase for years, many Republicans now say they favor one, but only if it is coupled with a tax cut for restaurants and other small businesses -- the groups they say would be hurt most by the wage increase. … President Bush has said he might accept a higher minimum wage, but only if it is tied to tax cuts to soften the blow for business."

The Washington Post (1/10, A1, Finkel, 690K), in a front-page story titled, "Life At $7.25 An Hour," reports, "Today in Washington, the House is scheduled to vote on whether to increase the federal minimum wage. … Passage is expected, with Senate approval soon to follow, and if President Bush signs the resulting bill into law, as he indicated he would, the U.S. minimum wage would rise for the first time since 1997, ending a debate about whether such a raise would be good or bad for the economy."

Kennedy Opposes Baucus Tax Cut Proposal. The Hill (1/10, Schor, Young) reports, "The Senate Finance Committee today will examine options for tax breaks that the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions (HELP) Committee can successfully pair with the wage hike. But HELP Chairman Edward Kennedy and ranking Republican Mike Enzi (Wyo.) are already dissenting from party leaders' positions on the minimum wage. Kennedy will push for a Senate wage hike without business tax breaks at an event today with House Majority Whip Steny Hoyer, House Education and Labor Committee Chairman George Miller, AFL-CIO President John Sweeney, and freshman Reps. Betty Sutton and Carol Shea-Porter. At least two members of Kennedy's panel, freshman Sens. Sherrod Brown and Bernie Sanders backed his approach."

Northern Mariana Islands Provision Added To Minimum Wage Bill. The Hill (1/10, Crabtree) reports, "House Democrats plan to bring the Northern Mariana Islands in line with U.S. minimum wage laws under legislation that comes to the floor today, thus ending a decade of policy favoring island businesses secured by lobbyist Jack Abramoff and former Rep. Tom DeLay. … The bill would increase the islands' minimum wage to $7.25 over the next four years, compared to the two years and two months it gives other U.S. employers to phase in the increase." The article goes on to describe, in great detail, how the territory's relationship with congress has fared since DeLay's resignation and the Democrats'' midterm victories.

Baucus Criticized Over Planned Tax Cut Hearings. The Washington Post's Steven Pearlstein (1/10, D1) writes, "you'd think raising the minimum wage for the first time in a decade would be a political and economic no-brainer for the new Democratic Congress. But you'd be forgetting about Max Baucus. Baucus is a Democratic senator from the Republican-leaning state of Montana, which means he is on the political equivalent of the endangered-species list. So you can understand Baucus's need to vote with his constituents on things like sugar subsidies and gun control and grazing fees on public lands. But while Baucus is surely entitled to his opinions, and entitled to do what is necessary to assure his own political survival, he is not entitled to be chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, which handles such key Democratic issues as health care, trade and tax policy. That position ought to be reserved for a statesman with enough political confidence and backbone that he isn't constantly sacrificing the interests of his party and his country to the narrow interests of his subsidy-addicted constituents."

House GOP Backs Small Business Health Insurance Amendment. The Wall Street Journal (1/10, A6, Rogers, 2.04M) reports, "Playing against type in the new Congress, Republicans are talking up health care while Democrats talk up tax breaks for small business. Democrats are embracing billions of dollars in tax breaks to ease the effect on small employers. But as Republican governors in California and Massachusetts bring forward state plans to help uninsured families, Republicans in Congress recognize the health-care issue's populist appeal and propose to help small employers deal with covering their workers. The result is a three-issue Washington triangle that could have unintended consequences. Paying for small-business tax breaks, for example, may mean tightening tax shelters for the wealthy and big corporations." Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus "will hold a hearing today to weigh tax breaks to help small employers, especially the restaurant industry, which wants a substantial acceleration in depreciation for new construction. … Hoping to trump the Democrats, House Republicans are pushing legislation to let employers with fewer than 100 workers seek coverage through trade-association health plans that could operate on a national scale exempt from state regulation."

DOJ_NMG_0114527

House Drug Benefit Bill Spurs Resurgence Of Healthcare Debate. USA Today (1/10, Wolf, 2.27M) reports that on Friday House Democrats "plan to pass legislation requiring the government to negotiate for lower Medicare prescription-drug prices. They see it as one way to reduce the impact of the program's coverage gap, which forces seniors and disabled Americans with high drug costs to pay their full cost for a period of months. … Debate over this issue could signify a series of political conflicts over health care policy reminiscent of the Clinton administration's first two years." USA Today notes the debate "comes as the Medicare prescription-drug program is rebounding from a troubled start last January, when millions of low-income beneficiaries were mistakenly dropped or overcharged. More than 90% of seniors have some type of drug coverage. Individual premiums and overall taxpayer costs have come in substantially lower than projected. And for the first time in Kaiser's surveys, a majority of seniors approve of the program." Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt "has called the House bill a 'surrogate for government-run health care.' He met Tuesday with House Republicans to drive home the administration's opposition to the House bill."

Senators Predict Five-Day Work Weeks Won't Last. Roll Call (1/10, Billings) reports, "Senators are adjusting their travel plans to comply with the newly implemented five-day work schedule, but few believe Majority Leader Harry Reid will actually keep the chamber operating at that clip for long. Opinions vary over how long Reid will insist on the Monday-through-Friday calendar, but Senators and aides on both sides of the aisle have little faith it will last beyond August and the unofficial start of the 2008 election season. About a third of the Senate is up for re-election in two years, and the contest for the White House — likely featuring several sitting Senators — already is in play."

Hoyer Aide Monitors "Hundred Hours Clock." The New York Times (1/10, Leibovich, 1.16M) reports Rob Cogorno's title is floor director for House majority leader Steny Hoyer "but for all practical purposes, he is the Keeper of The Clock. That is the digital timepiece on Mr. Hoyer's Web site marking the passage of legislative time as House Democrats push their 'Hundred Hours for a New Direction' agenda through Congress."

Morris Claims House Democrats Hurt Themselves By Taking Day Off For Football. In his column for The Hill (1/10) Dick Morris writes, "House Democrats lost considerable credibility yesterday when their opening session was cancelled so that members could attend the Ohio State-Florida State football game. This is not a joke. It is, however, a blunt metaphor for how genuinely out of touch the members of Congress really are. How many other Americans do you suppose were given the same perk? A day off because of an evening football game? And how many school kids would like to have time off to watch their own favorite teams? What kind of message is the House leadership sending?"

Pelosi's Swearing-In Stagecraft Praised. The Washington Post's Ruth Marcus (1/10, A13) writes, "when the newly minted speaker of the House invited her own grandchildren and the other children in the chamber to join her on the podium and touch the speaker's gavel, my first thought was: This is so choreographed. My second thought was: Awwwww. … This plays to Pelosi's advantages, humanizes her image as shrill San Francisco Democrat. As a woman and a mother, especially as a mother of daughters, I was quietly thrilled. About the marble ceiling cracking, yes, but also about the way Pelosi cracked it -- reveling in, not minimizing, her mother- and grandmother-hood."

Senate Ethics Reforms Include Gift Ban, Waiting Period. The AP (1/10, Abrams) reports, "Picking up on the anti-corruption theme that helped bring them to power, Democrats in both the House and Senate have started off with legislation to ban gifts and meals from lobbyists, limit privately paid travel and shine more light on the special projects, or earmarks, that have proliferated in legislation." Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid and minority leader Mitch McConnell "offered several alternatives aimed at strengthening the Senate bill, which has been criticized as being inadequate in several key areas. Among the proposals were to require lawmakers to pay the full price of tickets to sporting and entertainment events and to expand the definition of earmarks to include targeted tax and tariff benefits and projects routed through a federal agency that benefit only one nonfederal entity." The AP notes the Senate bill, "in addition to requiring a two-year waiting period before former members can lobby Congress, would bar lawmakers from negotiating for jobs with lobbying firms while still in office. 'We should not tolerate a committee chairman shepherding the Medicare prescription drug bill through Congress at the same time that he is negotiating a job with the pharmaceutical industry to become their top lobbyist,' said Sen. Barack Obama. The AP notes Obama was referring to former Rep. Billy Tauzin "who left Congress in 2005 to head the trade group representing pharmaceutical companies."

DOJ_NMG_0114528

Corporate Jet Provision Faces Bipartisan Opposition. Roll Call (1/10, Newmyer) reports Reid's plan "most controversially, would force Senators to pay charter rates for rides they catch on corporate jets. The corporate jet proposal already has met with opposition from Senators who will play a key role in the reform debate. Both Rules and Administration Chairwoman Dianne Feinstein and ranking member Bob Bennett who are helping manage debate on the bill — spoke out against the change, arguing it would make it impossible for Members representing large, rural states to travel and reach constituents."

The New York Times (1/10, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes that Reid, "like most of his colleagues on both sides of the aisle, is an admitted frequent flier on posh lobbyist-provided corporate jets. So we were very pleased yesterday when he proposed legislation that would require senators to pay the full charter-flight fare if they wanted to ride in the style of a C.E.O. Speaker Nancy Pelosi took the issue further with a full House ban on private jet perks, enacted through a rules change, not legislation. But Senator Reid's initiative could be just as effective, provided no loopholes creep in as the Senate takes up wide-ranging proposals for ethics reform."

The Los Angeles Times (1/10, 850K) editorializes, "The Senate prides itself on being different than…the more plebian and poll-driven House of Representatives. But do members of the World's Greatest Deliberative Body really want to define themselves by their greater willingness to hop aboard a corporate jet? You might think so, judging from the rumblings from senators unhappy about the pressure to follow the ethically energized House in banning travel by members on corporate planes."

Johnson's Condition Upgraded To Fair. The AP (1/10, Jalonick) reports Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson's "condition has been upgraded from critical to fair, four weeks after he was hospitalized for a brain hemorrhage, and he no longer needs a ventilator to help him breathe." Doctor Vivek Deshmukh said Johnson is "breathing independently after using a ventilator for several weeks, most recently only at night." Johnson spokeswoman Julianne Fisher said the Senator "remains in intensive care at George Washington University Hospital." The Senator is "expected to leave intensive care but remain in the hospital when he begins the rehabilitation process. His office has said that his recovery is expected to take several months." The Washington Post (1/10, A11, 690K) runs an abbreviated version of the AP story.

NYTimes Says Congress Should Support Embryonic Stem Cell Research. The New York Times (1/10, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "House Democrats are poised to push through a bill this week that would loosen President Bush's restrictions on federal support of embryonic stem cell research. The bill will be opposed by legislators beholden to religious conservatives. Many are likely to cite a new study suggesting that broadly useful stem cells can be derived from amniotic fluid without destroying embryos to get them." But the "new study, while certainly intriguing, in no way lessens the need to widen the array of embryonic stem cells available for research and ultimately therapy. The Democrats' proposal is extremely modest — about the least that could be done to accelerate progress in this promising field. It deserves support from veto-proof majorities in both houses."

WSJournal Urges Supreme Court To Back "Paycheck Protection." The Wall Street Journal (1/10, A16, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "Compulsory dues are the financial foundation of Big Labor's political power. So you can bet union officials will be paying special attention today as the Supreme Court hears oral arguments in a case that could affect how that money may be spent." The appeal "consolidates two cases from Washington state, where even nonmembers of unions can be forced to pay collective-bargaining dues as a condition of employment." In 1992, Washington "voters rebelled against that obligation; they overwhelmingly approved a paycheck protection law that requires unions to get 'affirmative authorization' from workers who don't belong to the union before spending their dues money on politics." The state teachers union, "the Washington Education Association, challenged the voter-passed law, and a state Supreme Court ruling last year struck it down on the grounds that it violated the First Amendment free-speech rights of union officials. It's a novel rationale, to say the least." Washington is "one of a half-dozen states to pass a paycheck protection law. And if the lower court ruling is upheld on the principle that unions have a constitutional right to extract money for political activities from even nonmembers, these laws could be jeopardized everywhere."

DOJ_NMG_0114529

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Finish Mixed. NBC Nightly News (1/9, story 8, :10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Here in New York on Wall Street the Dow off almost 7 points [to close at 12,416.60]. NASDAQ was up nearly six points [to close at 2,443.83] at the end of today's trading."

Kentucky GOP Eager To Challenge Yarmuth. The Hill (1/10, Youngman) reports that although Kentucky Republicans "will focus 2007 on maintaining the governor's mansion, those in the 3rd congressional district already are gunning to retake a congressional seat lost in last year's Democratic wave." Democratic Rep. John Yarmuth, "who narrowly defeated five-term congresswoman Anne Northup with 51 percent of the vote, is facing a local and state GOP bitter over Northup's defeat." Northup reportedly will "throw her hat in the primary ring against embattled Republican Gov. Ernie Fletcher," but "a number of Louisville Republicans are chomping at the bit to win back the congressional seat that is comprised almost wholly of Louisville, the commonwealth's largest metropolitan area." Potential challengers "to Yarmuth include Erwin Roberts, a former Fletcher administration official and member of the University of Kentucky Board of Trustees, and Chris Thieneman, a builder and contractor popular in the growing southern area of the district, according to a source familiar with Louisville Republican politics."

DeMint Endorses Romney. The AP (1/10, Davenport) reports Sen. Jim DeMint of South Carolina "has endorsed former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney in the 2008 presidential race, according to a letter the South Carolina senator is sending to state Republicans." Sen. John McCain of Arizona "is favored by Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina's senior senator."

Fox News' Special Report (1/9, Hume) reported, "One day after the former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney raised $6.5 million for his campaign, he picked up support from Republican Sen. Jim Demint of the South Carolina, another key early primary state. Romney is already well organized in New Hampshire, not so Rudy Giuliani. He has done little work in New Hampshire and Republicans here and across the country continue to question whether or not he will enter the race."

Romney, McCain Compete For House GOP Support. The Hill (1/10, Crabtree) reports GOP House members have "been enjoying the attention of two powerful politicians," Romney and McCain, who are both "racing to recast their reputations as moderates." They "recognize that by courting House Republicans, they can silence critics early and tap into a large swath of grassroots support that will be key in determining the outcome of the GOP primary contest early next year." GOP Conference Chairman Adam Putnam said, "A lot of people wonder how a conservative got elected governor in Massachusetts. I'm still learning about Romney and his policies." The Hill adds while Romney and McCain's efforts in South Carolina "have been making headlines recently, the two also are keeping a close watch on conservative support in the House. Romney was the first to reach out to House Republicans last year, taking advantage of some conservatives' 'anybody but McCain' mentality and disdain for the Arizona lawmaker's campaign-finance reform and immigration agendas. Romney has to contend with his own record on gay marriage and opposition to the Contract with America." Nearly "all of the dozen GOP members interviewed for this article had been contacted by one of the two candidates — many of them during the first week of 2007."

Iowa GOP Leaders Cool To McCain. Roll Call (1/10, Drucker) reports that despite his "status as the national frontrunner for the Republican presidential nomination, Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) appears to have an uphill climb in the make-or-break caucus state of Iowa, where a majority of county Republican chairmen say he is far from the first choice of likely caucus voters." The "prevailing sentiment in recent interviews with 63 of Iowa's 99 GOP county chairmen was one of respect for McCain as a war hero and public servant but disdain for his politics — particularly his handling of President Bush's judicial nominees and his association with the issue of campaign finance reform. Disenchantment with his candidacy reaches all corners of the state, including the pivotal Republican stronghold of northwest Iowa and vote-rich counties such as Polk, Linn and Scott." Most, "even those who complimented the campaign organization the Arizona Senator and 2000 presidential candidate is assembling, said he is not conservative enough — he is too much of a 'maverick,' several county chairman said — to win."

DOJ_NMG_0114530

New Hampshire Voting Trends Said To Disadvantage McCain. Fox News' Special Report (1/9, Hume) reported that in New Hampshire, independents have "outnumbered both Democrats and Republicans" at the polls, "but they have tended to vote GOP. Last year, Democrats won huge electoral gains and that has dramatically changed the presidential campaign trail of 2008. That may be bad news" for McCain, "who won the New Hampshire primary in 2000 because of independent votes. Longtime GOP powerbroker Ed DuPont backed to McCain in 2000, but suggests that in the wake of the Democratic wins in New Hampshire, independents now lean left. … Polls suggest independents are turned off by McCain's support for sending more US troops to Iraq."

Vilsack Says Congress Should Block Funds For Additional Iraq Troops. The AP (1/10, Davenport) reports Democrat Tom Vilsack "called on Congress to block funds for additional troops in Iraq but expressed misgivings about using the power of the purse to reduce U.S. forces." Vilsack said, "I think it's one way of absolutely putting that on the table. Mr. President, you don't have a blank check. Congress basically made a mistake by giving him a blank check at the beginning of this process. Now they are basically saying you don't get a second blank check." The AP adds that in "one of his last acts as Iowa governor, Vilsack asked state lawmakers to take a stand against the war in Iraq."

Gilmore Forms Exploratory Committee. The AP (1/10, Lewis) reports Jim Gilmore, "Virginia's former tax-slashing Republican governor, on Tuesday took the first step in a long-shot bid for the presidency." Aide Matt Williams said Gilmore "filed papers with the Federal Election Commission in Washington to form the Jim Gilmore for President Exploratory Committee." He is "the sixth Republican to form an exploratory committee — a year before the first primary votes are cast." Like "several other Republican hopefuls, Gilmore said he entered the race because the GOP field lacks a true conservative and argues his candidacy will resonate with conservatives disillusioned with the party."

The Washington Times (1/10, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Gilmore "became the latest Republican to form an exploratory committee in advance of a potential 2008 White House campaign." Virginia GOP Chairman Ed Gillespie said, "Jim Gilmore is a former governor of a very important state with a strong conservative record." But Gillespie "said he is neutral on the field of Republican presidential primary candidates." The Times adds Gilmore "last year traveled to key primary states such as Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina. In August, a group of supporters started a Web site to encourage the former governor to run for the White House."

Clinton Campaign Likely To Be Headquartered In DC Area. The New York Times (1/10, Healy, 1.16M) reports that "among the signs that the Clinton presidential kabuki is ending -- that Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton will, in fact, announce her campaign for the White House soon -- is a decision, Democrats close to her say, that she plans to base her campaign headquarters in or around Washington instead of in White Plains or New York, which had been under consideration." Clinton aides say that "running from a base in Washington would make the most practical and financial sense," and "they note that she would have satellite offices in New York and elsewhere. Still, a few advisers and supporters are concerned about the decision, saying it could reinforce her image as a Washington insider (if it is possible for that to be any more of an issue) and increase the possibility of leaks to the press corps (as if, ditto)."

Greens Question Obama's Support For Coal. The Washington Post (1/10, A11, Williamson, 690K) reports that while Democratic Sen. Barak Obama "gets stellar marks from greens," environmentalists wonder why Obama is "backing a law supporting the expanded use of coal, whose emissions are cooking the globe? It seems the answer is twofold: his interest in energy independence -- and his interest in downstate Illinois, where the senator's green tinge makes the coal industry queasy." The coal industry "praises Obama's reintroduction, with Sen. Jim Bunning (R-Ky.), of the Coal-to-Liquid Fuel Promotion Act of 2007 last week, which would provide incentives for research and plant construction.

DOJ_NMG_0114531

The industry says the technology, which converts coal into diesel engine fuel, would reduce America's dependence on foreign oil through a new, home-mined fuel that burns as cleanly as gasoline." But environmentalists "say focusing on coal does nothing to arrest climate change. Instead, they say, lawmakers should back cleaner alternative fuels and stricter automobile and industrial emissions standards."

Bayh Donor Base A Sought After Commodity. The Hill (1/10, Bolton) reports, "Democratic White House hopefuls such as Sens. Barack Obama (Ill.), Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and former Sen. John Edwards (N.C.) are rushing to capitalize on an impressive national fundraising network Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) built in the mold of President Bush's pioneers program. The strength of Bayh's connections could boost his profile when the Democratic nominee selects a running mate next year." Just prior to Bayh's decision against an '08 run in December, "about 160 of his biggest donors were scheduled to fly to Washington to craft a fundraising campaign. Several of Bayh's advisers said that 'well over' 150 donors in his network had pledged to raise $150,000 each for the campaign, and a smaller group of fundraisers had promised to raise $500,000 apiece." Bayh advisers say a "unique quality of the network" is that "it includes many donors — a group cultivated by the lawmaker, who has strong ties to the business community and espouses centrist policies — that are not in other national candidates' databases. Combined, the donors helped stockpile more than $10 million in cash on hand to Bayh's reelection fund, which can be transferred immediately to a presidential campaign and would enhance the senator's viability as a vice presidential nominee." Bayh's chief fundraising aide, Nancy Jacobson, who helped to build the network, already has signed on to Clinton's presidential campaign. But Edwards and Obama are also trying to snag a piece of Bayh's pie."

Schwarzenegger Proposes Universal Healthcare Coverage. ABC World News (1/9, story 6, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported on Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's proposal to "insure all Californians, even undocumented immigrants. The cost? $12 billion. He says he has a way to pay for it." ABC (Rooney) added, "The most ambitious feature in Schwarzenegger's plan is requiring health insurance for all 6.5 million Californians that don't have it now." The details include "universal coverage regardless of age or existing health condition, expand coverage for poorer children, regardless of immigration status, require companies with ten or more employees to provide or subsidize health insurance." How would "he pay for it? In part, the 2% gross tax on doctors. 4% from the hospitals. And getting $5.5 billion more in Federal aid."

The CBS Evening News (1/9, story 4, 2:25, Hughes, 7.66M) reported, "The plan also calls for doctors and hospitals to pay into a state insurance pool. Insurance companies will be forced to cut administrative costs." Jamie Court, Foundation for Taxpayer & Consumer Hights: "The problem I have is he's also forcing every individual in the state to buy health insurance without telling insurers what they have to charge for it." Hughes: "Love it or hate it, California's health care plan is a maverick and once again, the state leads where the Federal Government fears to tread."

NBC Nightly News (1/9, story 5, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported Schwarzenegger's plan "is ambitious and will require a lot of different interests to get along and corporate for it to work." NBC (Lewis) added, "The plan would require companies with 10 or more employees to offer health insurance or contribute to a state insurance fund. The business lobby opposes that idea." Allan Zaremberg, California Chamber of Commerce: "It's important to have access to healthcare, but we can't lose jobs over it." Lewis: "In spite of the critics, California is joining a national trend. Spurred by the increasing number of Americans without health insurance and by the lack of action in Washington, state legislatures are making healthcare reform a top priority. California would join three other states that are implementing universal healthcare plans."

The New York Times (1/10, McKinley, 1.16M) reports, "Democrats and Mr. Schwarzenegger's fellow Republicans are already in agreement: his first big idea of his second term — a sweeping plan unveiled Monday to assure health care to all Californians — is promising and ambitious, but faces a long, hard fight before enactment. Chief among the challenges, politicians and policy analysts said Tuesday, is the enormous number of political players — from big labor and big insurance to small-county government — that would be affected by any universal health care bill." Schwarzenegger's plan "would provide care to the 6.5 million Californians who currently have no insurance, including an estimated one million illegal immigrants. That is just one of the elements to which Republicans are objecting." The California Medical Association, "which represents more than

DOJ_NMG_0114532

34,000 doctors in the state, gave the proposed overhaul mixed reviews. Though the association praised the idea of universal coverage, the fee on doctors could be a deal breaker."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/10, Wood, 59K) reports Schwarzenegger's "sweeping plan" to "guarantee health insurance for all Californians - including children of illegal immigrants - is being characterized both as a bold model for improving healthcare access and as a costly government intrusion that will hurt the state's economy." The "sheer numbers involved in Governor Schwarzenegger's proposal - a $12 billion price tag and coverage for 6.5 million people who currently don't have health insurance - are guaranteed to raise the stakes as the California legislature considers whether to approve it."

Massachusetts Faces Challenge In Enrolling Working Poor. The New York Times (1/10, Belluck, 1.16M) reports that in its "drive to provide health insurance to nearly all its residents, Massachusetts has already signed up more than half of the poorest people who are eligible." But "experts and politicians agree that the bigger challenge will be the next 150,000 people: the working poor who will get a state-subsidized rate but will still have to pay for insurance, typically $18 to $170 a month depending on their income." Paul Ginsburg, an economist who leads the Center for Studying Health System Change, said, "This group is going to be much more challenging. They're dealing with people who don't even think about having health insurance."

Schwarzenegger Plan Criticized For Reliance On Regulation. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (1/10), David Henderson, a research fellow at Stanford's Hoover Institution, says Schwarzenegger's "proposal is almost indistinguishable -- except in details -- from that of the Democrats who dominate the California Assembly and Senate." The Democrats "tend to favor solutions involving regulations, government spending and taxes, and Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata's proposal -- the main contending Democrat plan -- hits the trifecta." Schwarzenegger's "solution hits the trifecta also. He would require employers with 10 or more workers to provide health insurance or pay a 4% tax on all wages covered by Social Security: Look for employers with 10 to 12 employees to get creative about outsourcing. And look as well, as Harvard economist Jonathan Gruber has documented, for wages to fall in firms that offer health insurance because of the mandate." California "should not, contra Gov. Schwarzenegger, do new regulatory harm; rather it should repeal existing regulations that cause harm -- so as to make health insurance even more affordable."

Schwarzenegger Backs Infrastructure, Renewable Fuels. The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Warren, 850K) reports, "Urging lawmakers to think big and act boldly, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger today outlined a sweeping 2007 agenda that proposes borrowing more than $43 billion to improve California's roads, prisons, schools and water supply." In his fourth State of the State speech, Schwarzenegger "also vowed to make California a leader in the fight against global warming, pledged to provide health insurance for those who lack it and restated his desire to re-map legislative districts to increase political competition." Schwarzenegger "acknowledged during his speech to the Legislature that his goals at the dawn of his final term were ambitious. But he said leaders 'must be ambitious to get California to the future,'' and he urged lawmakers to set aside their partisan predilections and find solutions that best serve the state." The Times adds, "Although Schwarzenegger has made a handful of recent appearances by satellite, tonight's address marks only his second in-the-flesh event since he fractured the femur in his right leg while skiing in Sun Valley just before Christmas."

The Washington Post (1/10, A3, Geis, 690K) reports Schwarzenegger has "unleashed a torrent of proposals to shake up everything in his state from health care to road-building to politics itself, all in an effort to reshape his party and set a national agenda." The ""most recent offering, in Schwarzenegger's State of the State address Tuesday, is a plan to cut vehicle emissions of greenhouse gases by 10 percent. He will require petroleum refineries to reduce the carbon content of their fuel over the next 13 years -- a signal to any doubters that his recent aggressive positioning as an environmentalist is not mere political theater." The "action-hero governor hopes to flex the state's muscles in the national arena starting next year. Schwarzenegger told Newsweek this week that he wants to move California's primary elections to February, giving the state more clout in presidential elections."

The New York Times (1/10, Steinhauer, Barringer, 1.16M) reports Schwarzenegger's order to reduce greenhouse gases, "which the governor wants completed by 2020, follows California's trademark pattern of hitching its environmental aspirations to its market muscle. It also represents one of the first examples of a state or a national government regulating the fuel in its passenger vehicles as part of a strategy to reduce both emissions that contribute to climate change and dependence on foreign oil." It is the "first example of the practical impact of a deal made last summer between the Legislature and the governor to reduce carbon dioxide emissions by about 25 percent by 2020."

DOJ_NMG_0114533

LATimes Praises Schwarzenegger's Big Ambitions. The Los Angeles Times (1/10, 850K) says in an editorial, "It's one thing for the governor to be ambitious. Arnold Schwarzenegger came from Hollywood, where success is impossible without ambition. It's quite another thing for the Legislature, which has historically rewarded timidity and resistance, to match his audacity. Yet that's exactly what will have to happen for California to reach the heights Schwarzenegger set for it in his State of the State speech Tuesday."

Political Initiatives Could Increase Demand For Ethanol. The Wall Street Journal (1/10, Fialka, 2.04M) reports that in addition to Schwarzenegger's mandate to cut carbon emissions, "governors of 37 states" are "prepared to push for a new federal rule to require greater use of ethanol fuel." Both efforts are "designed to reduce global warming and the U.S.'s reliance on imported oil, but they also could raise consumer prices for food and fuel. The initiatives also signal the increasing urgency of climate change as an issue both in state capitals and in Washington." President Bush is "expected to express more support for domestically produced ethanol when he gives his State of the Union address later this month. Meanwhile, Democratic leaders in Congress are talking up the need for alternative fuels and national emissions controls." While the "details of the proposal have yet to be worked out, California officials explained that the program would leave it up to oil suppliers in the state to figure out how to reduce carbon content, but that using more ethanol, which contains less carbon, would be the most likely way. The move, they estimated, would triple the size of the state's market for ethanol and other renewable fuels."

Texas State House Reelects Craddick As Speaker. The Dallas Morning News (1/10, Brooks, 500K) reports Texas state House Speaker Tom Craddick (R) "was overwhelmingly re-elected to his leadership post Tuesday night after Rep. Jim Pitts of Waxahachie withdrew from the race." Craddick "was re-elected 121-27, the first major piece of business that lawmakers conducted at the start of their 140-day regular session." Craddick, R-Midland, "faced a stiff challenge from members angry over his management style, saying that he often forced them to vote against the wishes of their constituents. But other members stood with Mr. Craddick, saying he had been a strong leader that had accomplished much as the first Republican to lead the House in modern times."

The New York Times (1/10, Evans, 1.16M) reports Craddick, "an ally of the former United States House majority leader, Tom DeLay, survived a strong challenge on Tuesday from a fellow Republican to win his third term in the leadership position on the first day of the 80th session of the Legislature." After "more than five hours of haggling about procedures, Representative Jim Pitts withdrew." Pitts, "of Waxahachie, whom Mr. Craddick appointed chairman of the Appropriations Committee, has been in the House since 1992. He has at times disagreed with Mr. Craddick's leadership, which is often compared to Mr. DeLay's."

Santorum Takes Post At DC Think Tank. The Washington Times' "Inside Politics" column (1/10, Pierce) reports former Sen. Rick Santorum "yesterday became a senior fellow at the Ethics and Public Policy Center. … He hopes to remain in the public spotlight as director of the EPPC's brand-new America's Enemies program, Mr. Miller writes. 'It's a stark name,' Mr. Santorum said. 'But we wanted to be candid about the fact that America really does have enemies and to point out that the nature of these enemies is much more complex than what people realize. It's not just Islamic fascism, but also Venezuela, North Korea, and, increasingly in my opinion, Russia.'" The Washington Post "In the Loop" column also notes Santorum's move.

Treasury Department Imposes Sanctions On Iranian Bank. The New York Times (1/10, A3, Weisman, 1.16M) reports the US Treasury Department, "moving to raise pressure on Iran," Tuesday barred American financial institutions from doing business with "a major Iranian bank after concluding that it had been involved in illicit weapons programs." The move against Bank Sepah "also affected North Korea, which American officials said had used the bank to facilitate payments to a North Korean group that exports missile technologies." Stuart Levey, the Treasury under secretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, said, "Bank Sepah is the financial linchpin of Iran's missile procurement network, and has actively assisted Iran's pursuit of missiles capable of carrying weapons of mass destruction," said Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0114534

Levey said Bank Sepah had been involved in transactions for Iran's Aerospace Industries Organization and two Iranian missile companies. These three entities were mentioned in the Security Council resolution approved in late December calling on all countries to avoid doing business with various groups in Iran." Levey also said the United States had "been in touch with authorities in Britain, France, Italy and Germany to discuss the need to persuade local financial institutions to stop doing business with Bank Sepah."

The Financial Times (1/10, Dinmore) says the move "will have limited impact as US trade with Iran is severely limited by sanctions imposed in the 1990s." The Washington Post (1/10, A8, Linzer, 690K) notes that the action is "part of a larger White House plan, put in place last year, to cut off Iran's access to US and European currencies." Though US officials say the effort is aimed at Tehran, "it is also likely to affect millions of Iranian citizens who conduct personal business in US dollars and who travel overseas."

The Wall Street Journal (1/10, A3, Simpson, Crawford, 2.04M) reports the Administration's "attempt to isolate Iran's economy will get a significant boost this month when the last European bank known to be clearing large volumes of that country's dollar transactions in the US halts the practice." Commerzbank AG, Germany's second-largest bank, said it will stop handling dollar transactions for Iran at its New York branch by Jan. 31. Meanwhile, US analysts "say there is evidence that Iranian firms are feeling the pinch of the US-led drive. Iranian banks and companies, for instance, are now having to put up large deposits -- as high as 100% -- in foreign banks to get them to issue letters of credit for foreign transactions, they claim."

Iran Arrests Spy For Selling Nuclear Secrets To Opposition Group. The AP (1/10) reports Iran said Tuesday it has arrested a man "on suspicion of selling nuclear secrets to an exiled Iranian opposition group," state radio reported. The report did not identify the suspected spy, "but said he had been working at the Iranian Parliament's Research Center, an organization that advises lawmakers on foreign and strategic issues." The report said the individual "transferred classified information, including a bulletin on nuclear activities, to the hypocrites," referring to the People's Mujahedeen of Iran.

Israel Arrests Muslim Cleric Deported From US. The AP (1/10, Friedman) reports Israel "arrested the former imam of Ohio's largest mosque after he was deported from the United States last week, the Shin Bet internal security service confirmed Tuesday." Fawaz Damra was arrested "because of his ties to Islamic Jihad," Shin Bet told the AP, but "gave no other details." Damra was deported by American authorities last week "because he concealed his ties to Islamic Jihad when he applied for American citizenship in 1994."

Hezbollah Continues Lebanon Protests Despite Smaller Turnout. The Washington Post (1/10, A7, Shadid, 690K) reports Hezbollah "and its allies widened their campaign Tuesday to force the Lebanese government's resignation, backing what they vowed would be a series of daily protests scattered across the capital." However, Tuesday's gathering was seen as "a sedate affair compared with the convergence of hundreds of thousands twice last month in Beirut's downtown." The demonstration was "more symbolic than dramatic," and the "relatively small size of the protest gave rise to speculation" about "divisions between Hezbollah and its partners, particularly Michel Aoun, a populist Christian politician who has forcefully called for an escalation in the protests."

Rice To Leave Friday For Mideast. AFP (1/10, Millikin) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice Friday will travel to the Middle East "in a bid to sell a new US strategy for Iraq to wary allies and to take another shot at reviving Israeli-Palestinian peace efforts." State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Rice would visit Israel, the Palestinian territories, Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait "before stop-offs in Germany and Britain during the January 12-19 trip." While in Kuwait, Rice will meet with her counterparts from the six Gulf monarchies plus Egypt and Jordan where "a major part" of Rice's discussions will focus on "the perception of a common threat posed by Iran and other forces of extremism and violence in the region," McCormack said. Rice will also seek regional support for Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Siniora, McCormack said. In the Palestinian territories, the Secretary will "pursue a months-long effort to bolster Abbas in a power struggle between" his Fatah party and Hamas.

The Washington Times (1/10, Kralev, 88K) notes that Rice will "return to Europe on Jan. 24 for an international donors conference in Paris to raise funds for Lebanon." Meanwhile, US officials and diplomats from some of the countries she will visit "said that, despite the low expectations, it is important for the secretary to return to the Middle East, given the dire situation in Iraq, the tensions between the Palestinian Fatah faction and Hamas, and the new domestic political realities in the United States." The Times also notes that the Bush administration "has been under pressure from its European allies to become more active in working toward a resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict."

DOJ_NMG_0114535

Expert Says Iraq War Has Shifted Alliances In Middle East. Edward N. Luttwak, a senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/10, 2.04M) reports, "It was the hugely ambitious project of the Bush administration to transform the entire Middle East by remaking Iraq into an irresistible model of prosperous democracy. Having failed in that worthy purpose, another, more prosaic result has inadvertently been achieved: divide and rule, the classic formula for imperial power on the cheap." For example, Luttwak says the "Sunni-US alignment in Lebanon, which interestingly coexists with the US-Shiite alliance in Iraq, may yet achieve results of strategic importance if Syria is successfully detached from its alliance with Iran." He goes on to note that "when the Bush administration came into office, only Egypt and Jordan were functioning allies of the US." However, the Iraq war, he concludes, "has indeed brought into existence a New Middle East, in which Arab Sunnis can no longer gleefully disregard American interests because they need help against the looming threat of Shiite supremacy, while in Iraq at the core of the Arab world, the Shia are allied with the US."

US General Says Pyongyang May Conduct Nuclear Test. The AP (1/10, Kim) reports the top US general on the Korean Peninsula, Army Gen. B.B. Bell, "said Tuesday he believes North Korea might conduct another nuclear test." At a news conference in Seoul, Gen. Bell said, "There is no reason to believe that at some time in the future, when it serves their purposes, that they won't test another one. So I suspect someday they will." The AP notes that concerns about North Korea "heightened abruptly last week in Asia after ABC News reported Pyongyang might be preparing for another test." On its front page, the Washington Times (1/10, A1, Salmon, 88K) says Bell "also vented his frustration at a range of issues bedeviling Washington's military alliance with Seoul," expressing "concerns about the relocation of the headquarters of the US forces in South Korea, the transfer of wartime command of South Korean forces to South Korean leadership, and budgetary shortfalls."

Stealth Fighters To Be Deployed To South Korea. AFP (1/10) reports, "The United States is sending between 15 and 24 radar-evading Stealth fighters to South Korea this month, the US military has said, amid increasing speculation over a second North Korean nuclear test." US Forces Korea spokesman Kim Yong-Kyu called the decision "a routine deployment."

Seoul Urges Pyongyang To Accept US Proposal On Nuclear Program. The AP (1/10, Kim) reports South Korea Wednesday "renewed a call for North Korea to seriously consider US proposals" before returning to six-party talks on its nuclear weapons program. The US "has offered security guarantees, a peace treaty and normalization of relations as well as removal of North Korea from Washington's list of states sponsoring terrorism" if it dismantles its atomic weapons program, according to South Korean officials. The next round of talks is tentatively set to begin on January 22.

US Human Rights Envoy Urges Says Foreign Salaries Help North Korea's Nuclear Program. Jay Lefkowitz, President Bush's special envoy for human rights in North Korea, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/10, A16, 2.04M) that "there is a growing consensus in the international community that North Korea's conduct is unacceptable. Nevertheless, several countries engage in practices that funnel cash to the regime in a manner that violates the spirit of a recent United Nations resolution and raises serious human rights concerns." These countries, including Russia and the Czech Republic, "contract" North Korean labor. However, Lefkowitz warns that "because the North Korean government takes a major portion of workers' salaries, these arrangements provide material support for a rogue government, its nuclear ambitions, and its human-rights atrocities." While "some argue that labor arrangements like those in Russia and Kaesong are positive developments," Lefkowitz says "it is more likely that the hard currency these countries are sending to North Korea will end up funding the regime's nuclear aspirations instead of improving living conditions for the people of North Korea."

Rice To Announce Creation Of New Public Diplomacy Award. The Washington Post (1/10, A4, Kessler, 690K) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will announce today the creation of "a new annual award to honor a company, academic institution or other nongovernmental entity that does the most to promote the US image abroad through intercultural understanding," State Department officials said. The Benjamin Franklin Award for Public Diplomacy is "designed to prod corporations and other nongovernmental groups to play a bigger role in public diplomacy at a time when the image of the US government has been battered by a backlash, especially in the Arab world, from the invasion of Iraq." Rice will highlight the award during a speech at a conference of public relations organizations at the State Department.

DOJ_NMG_0114536

New Congress Likely To Take Harder Stance On Russia. The Financial Times (1/10, Kirchgaessner, Dinmore) reports the Bush administration's relationship with the Kremlin "has chilled considerably since the moment in 2001 when the US president famously looked into the soul of his Russian counterpart and declared that Vladimir Putin was 'very straightforward and trustworthy.' And Washington's stance towards Moscow could become even more frosty in coming months, potentially colliding with expected attempts by Russia to use its new found oil and natural gas wealth to step up its investment in the US." While the Republican-controlled Congress took "the White House's lead in their stance toward Russia," the Times says "experts predict that mounting concerns on Capitol Hill, on issues ranging from Mr. Putin's commitment to democracy to questions about the security of western investments in the Russian energy sector, could see lawmakers taking a more robust, sceptical approach." The Democratically-controlled Congress is "also likely to renew the focus on allegations of human rights abuses in Russia."

Merkel Blasts Russia Over Suspension Of Oil Exports Through Belarus. The Financial Times (1/10, Parker, Ostrovsky, Crooks, Flood) reports, "Vladimir Putin on Tuesday faced an angry European backlash about his decision to halt oil supplies through the pipelines crossing Belarus. As the Russian president made clear his determination not to back down in his dispute with Belarus, Angela Merkel, the German chancellor, denounced his actions as 'not acceptable,' noting that even during the height of the cold war, Russia had been a reliable energy supplier to Europe." Putin "stressed he wanted to do all he could to ensure that oil supplies to western Europe were not affected. But he escalated the dispute by telling his government to tell Russian companies to cut output because of the transit dispute."

The Washington Post (1/10, A9, Finn, 690K) says Merkel "forcefully condemned Russia...for failing to consult the European Union before it cut off part of its oil exports to Europe ... . 'Even during the Cold War, Russia was a stable energy supplier,' said Merkel, whose country holds the rotating presidency of the European Union." The Post adds, "Russian officials say they feel deeply aggrieved by the tactics of Belarus, which they accuse of stealing crude oil destined for Western Europe, but the Kremlin is nonetheless getting another black eye over its reliability as an energy supplier."

The New York Times (1/10, Schwirtz, 1.16M) reports, "An unyielding President Vladimir V. Putin on Tuesday raised the possibility of diverting oil transit routes away from Belarus, a day after Moscow cut off pipeline deliveries of crude oil headed to customers in Eastern and Central Europe through the country. Such a change, which would be years in the making, would cut Belarus out of any role in the transshipment of oil to Europe without offering the customers any immediate assurance that their supplies were reliable." The Times adds, "Officials from Belarus flew to Moscow to negotiate, and one delegation submitted a draft agreement to the Russian Trade Ministry, the Russian news agency Interfax reported."

The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Holley, 850K) says the dispute "may drag on long enough to force Moscow to cut production, Russian President Vladimir V. Putin said Tuesday."

Moscow's Moves Fuel Fears Over European Oil Supplies. The Wall Street Journal (1/10, White, Chazan, 2.04M) reports, "Russia's threat to reduce oil production in a worsening trade war with neighboring Belarus is fueling fears of a drawn-out conflict that could slice Europe's main supply of crude." European "officials warned that the European Union might have to take the costly step of releasing oil from its strategic reserve if the cutoff is prolonged." The EC "said it would convene a special meeting tomorrow to discuss how to make up for the lost Russian supplies."

US Criticizes Chavez Plan As Investors Pull Back. McClatchy (1/10, Bachelet) reports the Bush administration Tuesday "slammed Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's plans to nationalize his country's power and telecommunications companies and demanded that US firms be properly compensated." White House spokesman Tony Snow noted that nationalization "has a long and inglorious history of failure around the world," calling this week's move "an unhappy day" for the people of Venezuela. Separately, NSC spokesman Gordon Johndroe said the US expects that American companies affected by Chavez's moves will be "promptly and fairly compensated." The Washington Post (1/10, A7, Forero, 690K) reports the US Energy Department "also expressed concern" that Chavez would "increase state control over four major oil projects in which American and other foreign companies have invested $17 billion."

DOJ_NMG_0114537

The AP (1/10, Pearson) reports investors "spooked" by the plans "rushed to sell off Venezuelan stocks Tuesday." The New York Times (1/10, Romero, Krauss, 1.16M) reports investors "reacted with alarm" in markets in the United States and throughout Latin America. The Times notes Verizon "could possibly lose up to several hundred million dollars" due to the nationalization.

The Christian Science Monitor (1/10, Catan, 59K) says Chávez has "laid the groundwork for a sharp leftward shift and launched a clampdown on dissent, in what analysts see as a broad-based effort to strengthen his grip on power."

More Commentary. In an editorial, the New York Times (1/10, 1.16M) says "while the Bush administration needs to condemn any seizure of American assets, it should choose its words carefully so as not to play into Mr. Chávez's Yanqui-baiting game. The administration can best advance American interests, and those of the people of Latin America, through more active engagement of the region's many democracies. It also needs to press ahead with trade agreements and other forms of economic assistance and cooperation. That is the smartest way to counter Mr. Chávez's demagoguery."

In an editorial, the Washington Post (1/10, A12, 690K) writes, "Some will see in Mr. Chavez's actions a threat to US interests. Certainly, those who caution that it is unwise to count on Venezuela to continue supplying up to 15 percent of US oil imports have a point. If assets of US companies are seized without fair compensation, Venezuela should be subject to penalties. But the main threat posed by Mr. Chavez is to Venezuela's 26 million people. If he follows through on his threats, they can look forward to steadily diminishing freedom and -- if the history of socialism is any guide -- national impoverishment."

Cuban Economists Prepare Plans For Post-Castro Market. In a front page article, the Wall Street Journal (1/10, A1, Davis, 2.04M) reports, "With Fidel Castro ailing and absent from the public stage, some influential Cuban intellectuals are laying plans for a more market-oriented approach to fortify the island's ailing communist economy." The Journal says such "debate over economic experimentation…offers a glimpse of what a post-Castro Cuba could look like." Among the steps under discussion are "decentralizing control, expanding the power of managers at privately owned agricultural cooperatives, extending private ownership to other sectors, boosting investment in infrastructure and increasing incentives to workers." However, none of the plans would "shuck communism for capitalism or open the island further to foreign investment," but "the fact that the government is permitting -- and perhaps even encouraging -- the debate suggests regime officials might find these kinds of changes acceptable, though it may take Mr. Castro's death to put them into action."

Ortega To Be Sworn In Wednesday. The AP (1/10, Carl) reports Daniel Ortega will be sworn in Wednesday as the next president of Nicaragua while "promising to respect free trade and private business and maintain relations with Washington." However, he will be sworn in as president in a ceremony "attended by some of the United States' biggest enemies, including Venezuela's Hugo Chavez and a representative of Iran." The AP calls the ceremony a "reflection of Ortega's delicate balancing act." Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt, who is heading the US delegation at Wednesday's inauguration, met privately with Ortega Tuesday where he told Ortega he wanted to "make clear that our desire is to work with you."

WTO Welcomes Push To Restart Doha Talks. The Financial Times (1/10, Beattie) reports the "trans-Atlantic push to conclude the troubled Doha round of global trade talks got a wary welcome from the head and some members of the World Trade Organization on Tuesday." Although details "of any deal to reconcile the US and European Union positions remain elusive," WTO director-general Pascal Lamy "said the determination expressed this week by US president George W. Bush and José Manuel Barroso, president of the European Commission, was a marked advance." In an interview with the Times, Lamy said, "The signs we are seeing now are qualitatively different from what we heard last year."

Schwab To Meet With Lamy Later This Week. The Wall Street Journal (1/10, A4, Hitt, 2.04M) reports "in a fresh sign of the intensifying efforts to revive moribund global trade talks," US Trade Representative Susan Schwab will travel to Geneva late this week for consultations with Lamy. In the last two weeks, Schwab has "conferred directly with top trade officials from Brazil, Europe and Japan, and has reached out by telephone to India's lead negotiator." A senior US trade official said the meeting with Lamy will "help lay the groundwork for additional discussions to be held later this month at an international conference in Davos, Switzerland." However, the official cautioned that there have been no breakthroughs.

DOJ_NMG_0114538

ETA Claims Responsibility For Airport Bomb. The New York Times (1/10, Sciolino, 1.16M) reports Basque separatist organization ETA "said Tuesday that the 'permanent cease-fire' it announced last March was still in effect, even as it formally claimed responsibility for the deadly bomb attack on Madrid's main airport terminal" last week. In a statement sent to Gara, the pro-independence Basque-language newspaper, ETA said it "affirms that the permanent cease-fire started on March 24, 2006, still stands."

Violence Erupts In Bangladeshi Capitol Ahead Of Election. The Christian Science Monitor (1/10, Haider, 59K) reports democracy in Bangladesh "has struggled to preserve for two decades appears to be facing one of its most severe tests this week." The streets of the capital, Dhaka, "resemble a war zone, with police and protesters exchanging volleys of tear-gas shells and Molotov cocktails." The street clashes are the result of "a struggle for power between the country's two major political parties, the Awami League and the Bangladesh National Party (BNP), over the upcoming elections," but "attempts to reconcile the two groups have so far failed, leading analysts to suggest that the violent political crisis may deepen in coming months."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Fido's Little Helper."
"U.S. Teams Try To Rebuild A War-Torn Nation."
"Gov. Calls On State To Borrow And Build More."
"Officer Who Killed Boy, 13, Is Cleared."
"1,000 Troops Strike Heart Of Baghdad."
"Record Warmth (Again) In 2006."
"Apple Seeks To Redefine Phone."

USA Today:
"Poll: Low Support For Iraq Buildup."
"Obesity Of China's Children 'Shocking'."
"Jockey's Bid For A Second Chance Is Ride Of His Life."

New York Times:
"U.S. And Iraqis Hit Insurgents In All-Day Fight."
"Democrats Plan Symbolic Votes Against Bush's Iraq Troop Plan."
"Steroid Cloud Stops McGwire From Entering Hall."
"Venezuelan Plan Shakes Investors."
"Apple Introduces Innovative Cellphone."
"New York Tries To Think Outside The Sandbox."

Washington Post:
"U.S. Airstrikes Back Troops In Baghdad Clash."
"D.C. Bill Would Mandate Vaccine."
"With Iraq Speech, Bush To Pull Away From His Generals."
"United Airlines Wins Right To Fly To China From Dulles."
"Overhaul Sought Of Pr. George's High Schools."
"Climate Experts Worry as 2006 Is Hottest Year On Record In U.S.."
"Va. Roads Deal Near, Say GOP Leaders."
"Life at $7.25 an Hour

Washington Times:
"House OKs Reforms Urged By 9/11 Panel."
"Kennedy Proposal Uncovers Party Rift."
"Ripken Streaks Into Hall Of Fame."
"US Targets Al Qaeda In Somalia Air Strike."
"Still Smoking In The District."
"General Sees Another N. Korea Nuclear Test."

Detroit Free Press:
"Ford's Millions For Michigan."
"Medicare Drug Cost No Bargain For Many."
"Detroiter Is Charged In Boy's Death."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Governor Turns His Radar On Speeders."
"New Strategy."
"Carter, Clinton, Woo Baptist To New Convention."
"Milk Exhibit Could Be Last Of Its Magnitude."

Houston Chronicle:
"Craddick re-Elected Speaker In landslide."
"Vaccine Proposal Likely To Stir Debate."
"'Like Watching Grass Grow'."

DOJ_NMG_0114539

"'Homicidal' Soldier Was Returned To Duty."
"How About This Apple?

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Securing Haifa Street-Iraq; New Iraq Strategy; New Iraq Strategy-Democratic Position; US Air Strike-Somalia; The I Phone; State Affordable Healthcare; Baseball Hall Of Fame; Auto Show; A Soldiers Story.

CBS: Securing Haifa Street-Iraq; New Iraq Strategy; US Air Strike-Somalia; California Healthcare Plan; The I Phone; A Soldiers Story; Oil Prices; Warm Winter Weather; Auto Show.

NBC: New Iraq Strategy; Securing Haifa Street-Iraq; US Air Strike Somalia; Countering RPGs; State Health Insurance-California; California Wildfires; The I Phone; Stock Market; The Princes Girlfriend.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

ABC: Bush's Iraq Strategy; Somalia-U.S. Military Strikes; Apple's I Phone; Bangor, ME-Smoking Banned In Cars With Children; Blackwell's List Of Worst Dressed Celebrities; Tokyo Stock Exchange.

CBS: Bush's Iraq Strategy; Somalia-U.S. Military Strikes; Congress-Anti-Terror Bill; Congress-Minimum Wage; White House-Judicial Nominees; Wall Street; New Orleans-Crime Cameras; Los Angeles-Increased Adoption Fees For Rodents.

NPR: Congress-Anti-Terror Bill; Bush's Iraq Strategy; Democrats-Additional Troops In Iraq; Farmers Branch, TX-Illegal Immigrant Ordinance; Tokyo Stock Exchange; US Ambassador To Mexico Praises Extradition Of Murder Suspect To US; Cuba-Protests On 5th Anniversary Of Guantanamo Bay Opening; Wall Street.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — 9 p.m. Addresses the nation on Iraq.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — Speaks to a Joint Session of the Virginia General Assembly, Jamestown Memorial Church, Jamestown, Va.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION AND FORESTRY _ Full Committee. Hearing on agriculture and the role of rural America regarding energy security. Philip Sharp, Resources for the Future;USDA Chief Economist Keith Collins; J. Read Smith, 25x'25 Steering Committee; Michael Pacheco, National Renewable Energy Laboratory, Golden, Colo.; Ron Miller, Aventine Renewable Energy Holdings, Pekin, Ill.; Roger Webb, Georgia Institute of Technology; Gene Gourley, Iowa Pork Producers Association; Loni Kemp, The Minnesota Project, Canton, Minn.; John Sellers, Iowa State Soil Conservation Committee. Location: Room 328A, Russell.

9:30 a.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the current situation in Iraq. Phebe Marr, U.S. Institute of Peace; Michael O'Hanlon, Brookings Institution; Yahia Said, Centre for the study of Global Governance at the London School of Economics; Paul Pillar, former National Intelligence Officer for the Near East and Asia. Location: Room 216, Hart.

9:30 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Hearing on the privacy implications of government data mining programs. Former Rep. Bob Barr; James Carafano, Heritage Foundation; Jim Harper, Cato Institute; Leslie Harris, Center for Democracy and Technology; Kim Taipale, Center for Advanced Studies in Science and Technology Policy. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

9:45 a.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing on global oil supplies and the impact on the U.S. economy and national security. Faith Birol, International Energy Agency; Robert Harmats, Goldman Sachs; retired Gen. Charles Wald, former Deputy Commandere, U.S. European Command; Flynt Leverett, New America Foundation. Location: Room G-50, Dirksen.

10 a.m. FINANCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on tax incentives for business in response to a minimum wage increase. Jared Bernstein, Economic Policy Institute; Joseph Sabia, University of Georgia; Matthew Kadish, Small Business Counsel of America; Dave Ratner, Daves Soda & Pet City, Agawam, Mass.; Bruce Obenour, Akwen, LTD, Dublin, Ohio. Location: Room 215, Dirksen.

10 a.m. HEALTH, EDUCATION, LABOR AND PENSIONS _ Full Committee. Organizational meeting, followed by a hearing on chlalenges and opportunities relating to health care. Location: Room 430, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Closed. Discussion of pending matters. Location: Room 219, Hart.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10 a.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: H.R. 2 - Minimum Wage Increase Without Assistance for Small Business.

DOJ_NMG_0114540

11 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Full Committee. Organizational meeting. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

2 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Organizational meeting. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

2 p.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Full Committee. Organizational meeting. Location: Room 1100, Longworth.

Other: DEFENSE PERSONNEL _ The Department of Defense holds its 2007 Worldwide Personnel Recovery Conference and Exhibition. Highlights: 8:10 a.m. Army Maj. Gen. Gene Higgins. 8:50 a.m. Air Force Lt. Gen. Carroll H. Chandler. 10 a.m. Michael Mason, FBI. 10:40 a.m. Kevin C. Whaley, DEA. Location: Omni Shoreham Hotel, 2500 Calvert St. NW.

AGRICULTURE WORKERS _ 9 a.m. Senator Dianne Feinstein, Larry Craig, Edward Kennedy, and Barbara Boxer;and Representatives Howard Berman and Chris Cannon hold a news conference to announce the reintroduction of legislation to address the agriculture worker shortage. They will be more than two dozen representatives from national and regional agriculture organizations. Location: Room 301, Russell Senate Office Building.

COUNTERFEITING _ 9:30 a.m. The US Chamber of Commerce hosts the launch of an industry organization to promote the use of authentication technology to combat counterfeiting. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

BRAIN DRAIN _ 10 a.m. The Partnership for Public Service will hold a news conference to propose a plan for retiring workers to consider the Federal Government for an ``encore" career to ease the Federal `` brain drain." Location: National Press Club.

DEMOCRATS _ 10 a.m. House Democratic leaders hold a press availability following the Democratic Caucus meeting. Location: House Radio/TV Gallery.

LEARNING-GLOBAL ECONOMY _ 10 a.m. The Association of American Colleges and Universities holds a news conference to release two polls on how well schools are preparing students for today's global challenges. Location: Room 205 Old North, Georgetown University.

REPUBLICANS _ 10 a.m. Stakeout for the media availability with House Republican Conference Chairman Adam Putnam following closed meeting. Location: Location: Stakeout at Room 345, Cannon House Office Building.

UNION-TSA _ 10 a.m. Reps. Bennie Thompson and Nita Lowey, AFGE President John Gage, others, hold a news conference to discuss the union's work representing Transportation Security Administration workers. Location: AFGE, 11th floor, 80 F St. NW.

DRUG IMPORTATION _ 11 a.m. Senate and House members introduce drug importation legislation that will reduce the cost of prescription drugs. Participants include Sens. Byron Dorgan, Olympia Snowe, Chuck Grassley, Debbie Stabenow and Reps. JoAnn Emerson, Rahm Emanuel, and Rosa DeLauro. Location: Senate Radio-TV Gallery.

HISPANICS-MINIMUM WAGE _ 11:15 a.m. Representatives Baca, Grijalva, Linda Sanchez, mebers of the Hispanic Caucus, hold a press briefing on the minimum wage. Location: House Studio.

INCOME INEQUALITY _ 12 p.m. The Cato Institute hosts a policy forum, ``Has U.S. Income Inequality Increased?," with Alan Reynolds, Cato Institute; and Diana Furchtgott-Roth, Hudson Institute; and Gary Burtless, Brookings Institution. Location: Cato Institute, 1000 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

TEACHER CASE-SUPREME COURT _ 12 p.m. News conference with employee rights advocates providing legal aid to teachers in the tow Washington state teacher union cases being heard today in the Supreme Court. Participants include Mark Mix of the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation, lead petitioner Gary Davenport, others. Location: Steps of the Supreme Court.

AMERICAN HEART ASSOCIATION _ 12 p.m. - 1 p.m. American Heart Association President Raymond Gibbons, M.D., professor of medicine at Mayo Clinic College of Medicine in Rochester, Minnesota, will discuss the Associations 2007 health policy agenda and the potential impact of low-level funding on heart and stroke research at a media roundtable. Location: American Heart Association, Suite 300, 1150 Connecticut Ave. NW.

DEMOCRATS-IRAQ _ 12:15 p.m. Democratic Conference Vice Chairman Charles Schumer, Conference Secretary Patty Murray, and Senator Jack Reed joins former NATO Supreme Allied Commander General Wesley Clark and John Soltz, a veteran of the war in Iraq, for a press conference to call on President Bush to offer a new plan that will change course in Iraq and bring that war to a close. Location: Room S-211, U.S. Capitol.

STEM CELL LEGISLATION _ 12:15 p.m. Representatives Pence and Pitts, others, hold a news briefing on stem cell legislation. Location: House Studio.

DOJ_NMG_0114541

TEACHER UNION CASE _ 12:15 p.m. The Evergreen Freedom Foundation, others, hold a news conference immediately following oral arguments before the Supreme Court in the Washington state teacher union dues cases. Participants include Washington state Attorney General Rob McKenna, foundation President Bob Williams, others. Location: Steps of the Supreme Court.

UNION DUES _ 1:30 p.m. The Federalist Society holds a panel discussion the limits on the use of union dues, with Washington state Attorney General Rob McKenna, Milton Chappell of the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation, others. Location: National Press Club.

ALLEN _ 1:45 p.m. Coast Guard Commandant Adm. Thad Allen gives keynote remarks on joint service operations and strategic alignment at the 19th annual Surface Navy Association symposium. Location: Hyatt Regency-Crystal City, 2799 Jefferson Davis Hwy., Arlington, Va.

MEDICARE DRUG PRICES _ 3:30 p.m. Sen. Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, and Dr. Mark McClellan, former Administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, hold a news briefing to discuss the implications of government negotiation of Medicare Part D drug prices. Location: Senate Daily Press Gallery, Room S-316, Capitol.

MINIMUM WAGE _ 3:45 p.m. Congressional, labor and business leaders hold a news conference following House passage of the bill raising the minimum wage. Participants include House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, Sen. Edward Kennedy, AFL-CIO President John Sweeney, others. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

USTR-JAPAN _ 5:30 p.m. USTR Susan Schwab meets with Japanese Agriculture, Forestry and Fisheries Minister Matsuoka. Location: Winder Building.

ALLEN _ 7 p.m. Coast Guard Commandant Adm. Thad Allen gives keynote remarks on the Coast Guard's Strategic direction for the Military Strategy Forum of the Center for Strategic and International Studies. Location: Ritz-Carlton Hotel, 1150 22nd St. NW.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 10, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
House Passes Anti-Terror Bill ... 3
Prosecutor Finishes Closing Argument At Hamas-Funding Trial .. 3
Siraj Family Arrested On Immigration Charges ... 3
Lawyer For CIA Agent Quits Italy Case ... 4
British To Email Terror Alerts ... 4

Homeland Response:
Man Pleads Not Guilty To Chicago Mall Attack Plot ... 4
Leahy To Hold Hearing On Data Mining Programs ... 4
Chertoff Announces Infrastructure Grants Targeting High-Risk Cities ... 5
Testimony Begins In Katrina Insurance Suit ... 5

War News:
Bush To Announce Troop Boost, Timetable For Iraqis To Take Over ... 5
Democrats To Hold Votes On "Surge," With 10 GOP Senators "Likely" To Oppose Bush ... 8
Major Action Against Insurgents Underway In Baghdad ... 10
Iraqi Vice President Ask US Not To "Give Up On Iraq." ... 11
Expert Says Iraq War Has Shifted Alliances In Middle East ... 11
Blair Criticizes Manner Of Saddam Execution ... 11
Lawyer Remembers Combat In Iraq ... 11
US Strikes Al Qaeda In Somalia ... 11
Government Changes Recruiting Practices ... 13

Corporate Scandals:
US Alleges Conrad Black Committed Insider Trading ... 13
DOJ Wants More Time To Consider Rehearing In Westar Conviction Reversal ... 13
Home Depot Board May Feel Effects Of Nardelli Ouster ... 13
Mills May Seek Bankruptcy Filing After Accounting Probe ... 14
Writers Decry Options Backdating Prosecutions ... 14

Criminal Law:
House Report Contradicts DOJ On Archives Document Theft ... 15
House Committees Delay Response To Cunningham Subpoenas ... 15
New Orleans Attempts To Curb Crime Wave ... 16
Former Interior Deputy Is Target In Abramoff Probe ... 17
Judge Rejects Media Request For Libby Trial Audio Recordings 18
Lack Of Cooperation From Agencies Prompted FBI To Quit Leak Probes ... 18
Judge Appoints Federal Prosecutor To Help Israeli Criminal Probe ... 18
Former New Jersey Mayor Pleads Guilty To Taking Bribes ... 18
Tennessee Waltz Trial Jurors See FBI Video Of Alleged Bribe .. 19
FBI Arrests California College Official On Bribery Charges ... 19
Judge Rejects Devecchio Bid For Federal Trial ... 19
9th Circuit Panel Rules Gang Attorneys Cannot Have Access To Witness Identities ... 19
Grand Jury Mulls Idaho Kidnapping, Murder Charges ... 20
Los Angeles To Shift Anti-Gang Tactics ... 20

Civil Law:
Judge Dismisses Challenge To VA's Use Of Religion In Veteran's Treatment ... 20

Civil Rights:
Jury Continues Deliberations In Texas Smuggling Death Trial ... 21
DOJ Rules Against Appointment Of Alabama County Commissioner ... 21
Michigan Islamic Group Urges FBI Probe Of Shiite Mosque Vandalism ... 21
LAPD Board Will Not Punish Officer In Fatal Shooting Of Teen . 22
NYTimes Applauds Spitzer's Move On Inmates' Calls ... 22

Antitrust:
Newspapers Plan Joint Sales Of Web Site Advertisements ... 22
Senate Plans Hearing On Impact Of Airline Merger ... 22
Micron Settles Chip Antitrust Suit ... 23
Congress To Take Up Net Neutrality Bills ... 23
Aloha Airlines Takes Mesa To Court ... 23
FTC Gives Antitrust Nod To Hain-Avalon Deal ... 23
Supreme Court Lowers Threshold For Patent Lawsuits ... 23

Environment:
DOJ Probing Possible Ethical Violations At Mineral Agency ... 24
Florida City To Target Ex-Utility Heads After DOJ Drops Probe . 25
NOAA Affirms Human Role In Climate Change ... 25
US To Raise Royalty Rates For Gulf Oil And Gas Drilling ... 25

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
SF Chronicle Argues DOJ Undercut Its Case In BALCO Probe . 26
Four Get Prison Sentences In Virginia Cocaine Conspiracy Case ... 26
Arizona Man Sentenced For 2005 Shootout With US Marshals . 27

Mexico Extradites Man To Face Charges In California Deputy's Slaying ... 27

Immigration:

Demjanjuk To Appeal Deportation Again ... 27
GOP Lawmakers Ask DOJ To Help Convicted Border Agents Remain Free ... 27
Border Region Officials Appeal To Congress To Stop Construction Of Wall ... 28

Tax:

IRS Urged To Drop Private Debt Collection Program ... 28
Taxpayer Advocate Cites AMT, Income Underreporting As Top Two IRS Problems ... 28

Congress-Administration:

Bush Withdraws Four Judicial Nominations ... 29
Bush Renominates Recess Appointments Myers And Sauerbrey30
Petraeus, Fallon Expected To Be Confirmed Quickly ... 30
Top State Department Arms Control Official Resigning ... 30
Tomlinson Withdraws His Nomination For Broadcasting Board Post ... 30
SMU Faculty Questions Bush Library Plans ... 30
GOP Senators Reportedly Considering Filibuster Of Minimum Wage Hike ... 31
House Drug Benefit Bill Spurs Resurgence Of Healthcare Debate ... 32
Senators Predict Five-Day Work Weeks Won't Last ... 32
Hoyer Aide Monitors "Hundred Hours Clock." ... 32
Senate Ethics Reforms Include Gift Ban, Waiting Period ... 32
Johnson's Condition Upgraded To Fair ... 33
NYTimes Says Congress Should Support Embryonic Stem Cell Research ... 33
WSJournal Urges Supreme Court To Back "Paycheck Protection." ... 33

Other News:

Stocks Finish Mixed ... 33
Kentucky GOP Eager To Challenge Yarmuth ... 33
DeMint Endorses Romney ... 34
Iowa GOP Leaders Cool To McCain ... 34
Vilsack Says Congress Should Block Funds For Additional Iraq Troops ... 34
Gilmore Forms Exploratory Committee ... 34
Clinton Campaign Likely To Be Headquartered In DC Area ... 35
Greens Question Obama's Support For Coal ... 35
Bayh Donor Base A Sought After Commodity ... 35
Schwarzenegger Proposes Universal Healthcare Coverage ... 35
Schwarzenegger Backs Infrastructure, Renewable Fuels ... 36
Texas State House Reelects Craddick As Speaker ... 37
Santorum Takes Post At DC Think Tank ... 37
Treasury Department Imposes Sanctions On Iranian Bank ... 37
Israel Arrests Muslim Cleric Deported From US ... 38
Hezbollah Continues Lebanon Protests Despite Smaller Turnout38
Rice To Leave Friday For Mideast ... 38
US General Says Pyongyang May Conduct Nuclear Test ... 39
Rice To Announce Creation Of New Public Diplomacy Award ... 39
New Congress Likely To Take Harder Stance On Russia ... 39
Merkel Blasts Russia Over Suspension Of Oil Exports Through Belarus ... 40
US Criticizes Chavez Plan As Investors Pull Back ... 40
Cuban Economists Prepare Plans For Post-Castro Market ... 41
Ortega To Be Sworn In Wednesday ... 41
WTO Welcomes Push To Restart Doha Talks ... 41
ETA Claims Responsibility For Airport Bomb ... 41
Violence Erupts In Bangladeshi Capitol Ahead Of Election ... 41

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 41

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington ... 42

DOJ_NMG_0114544

TERRORISM NEWS:

House Passes Anti-Terror Bill. The House passed a package of anti-terror measures yesterday. Fox News' Special Report (1/9, Hume) reported, "The bill sets a three-year deadline to inspect all air cargo for explosives. The bill affects only the 6 billion lbs. of cargo loaded each year on passenger jets. … Republicans complain that the technology does not exist to inspect passenger jet cargo in a timely fashion."

USA Today (1/10, Hall, 2.27M) notes Rep. Jerry Lewis, former chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, "chided Democrats for passing a bill 'without any indication as to where the money might be coming from.'" He "said 'tens of billions of dollars' would be needed, meaning the bill amounted to 'a statement of policy that is little more than a press release.'"

But the New York Times (1/10, Lipton, 1.16M) says that "after failing to delay action on the bill, many Republicans felt they had no choice but to vote in favor of it -- and 68 did." The AP (1/10, Espo) reports, "The vote was a bipartisan 299-128, and Speaker Nancy Pelosi took the rostrum to announce the passage of the first legislation to clear under the new Democratic majority." Democrats "said the bill's passage was a top priority." The AP adds "several Republicans criticized the legislation as little more than political posturing in the early hours of a new Democratic-controlled Congress. … In a written statement, the Bush administration listed several objections and said it could not support the measure as drafted, but stopped short of a veto threat."

The Washington Times (1/10, DeBose, 88K) notes that in "a statement of administration policy, which usually consists of a dry list of approvals and disapprovals, the White House took a shot at the Democrats. 'The Administration is disappointed that, in a nearly 300-page piece of legislation entitled "Implementing the 9/11 Commission Recommendations Act of 2007," Congress does not address the two outstanding recommendations that apply to the Legislative Branch, which the 9/11 Commission states may be among the most important of all,' the White House said yesterday." The bill "neither reduces the number of congressional committees with oversight and spending authorization over homeland security matters nor does it do the same for intelligence matters, both steps the September 11 commission has suggested."

The Washington Post (1/10, A3, Hsu, 690K) reports, "The bill's biggest detractor, or patron, could be Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), who chairs the Senate's Homeland Security panel and who held his own hearing yesterday. He stopped short of promising -- as House leaders had -- to implement all remaining recommendations of the commission that investigated the 2001 terrorist attacks." Lieberman "said that he hopes by month's end, as requested by Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), to draft and pass a Senate bill 'that will take steps forward to adopt some of the unadopted, unimplemented or inadequately implemented parts' of proposals recommended in 2004 by the bipartisan commission." The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Galouette, 850K) also reports the story.

Democrats Leave Congressional Reform Out Of Security Legislation. CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (1/9, 10:09 pm, Johns) broadcasted that though the House passed "virtually all of the 9/11 commission's reforms" Tuesday, it "did not look at the reform about fixing its own role in homeland security. Ever since its creation, and especially after Hurricane Katrina, the Homeland Security Department has earned the reputation of the government gang that couldn't shoot straight. That mess comes in large part because, according to the 9/11 commission report, dozens of committees and even more subcommittees in congress control a piece of homeland security. … Congress did not do anything about really reducing the committee bureaucracy because that would be stripping new Democratic committee chairmen of all that power. Democratic leaders point out Republicans didn't do it either when they had a chance, because it would have been a complete mess, a jurisdictional food fight."

Prosecutor Finishes Closing Argument At Hamas-Funding Trial. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/10, Robinson) reports Muhammad Salah co-defendant Abdelhaleem Ashqar "was an important Hamas terrorist leader directing thousands of dollars to families of members who were jailed or killed, a prosecutor said Tuesday. 'He's Hamas and he's assisting the murderous terrorist activities of Hamas,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Joseph M. Ferguson told jurors." The AP adds, "Ferguson pointed to testimony that Ashqar directed money to families of Hamas 'martyrs' killed in terrorist operations and those captured and jailed by Israeli authorities." Ashqar was a University of Mississippi graduate student at the time. He "had a telephone in a bogus name and a fax in a different alias, Ferguson said. … Federal agents found that Ashqar spoke on his telephone 568 times in several years with Mousa Abu Marzook, an alleged top Hamas leader who also is charged in the case and is a fugitive believed living in Damascus, Syria."

Siraj Family Arrested On Immigration Charges. The New York Times (1/10, Rashbaum) reports, "The parents and sister of a man convicted of conspiring to bomb the Herald Square subway station were detained yesterday by federal immigration authorities, who have been seeking to deport them to Pakistan." Shahawar Matin Siraj's "family, who came to the United States in 1999, had been seeking asylum since 2003, citing religious persecution in their home country." ICE spokesman Mark Thorn "could not explain why the action was taken yesterday, other than to say that the detention was part of an administrative process and that criminal cases take priority over administrative ones. It was unclear why the criminal case against Mr. Siraj would have delayed the detentions."

DOJ_NMG_0114545

Lawyer For CIA Agent Quits Italy Case. The Washington Times/AP (1/10, Barry) reports a lawyer for a CIA agent "accused in the 2003 kidnapping of an Egyptian cleric in Milan withdrew from the case shortly after a court opened hearings yesterday on whether to indict him and 25 other Americans." Shortly after the proceedings began, the attorney for Robert Seldon Lady withdrew from the case, "saying the former CIA station chief did not want to cooperate." The CIA has refused to comment on the case, the AP notes.

British To Email Terror Alerts. The Washington Post (1/10, A9, Sullivan, 690K) reports, "The British government is offering an e-mail bulletin service to notify people of changes to the nation's terror threat level, a development that illustrates increasing fears of extremist attacks in Britain and the rising power of digital communications. The domestic security agency, MI5, announced the new service Tuesday and said it will also provide e-mail bulletins on 'major developments in national security affairs.'" It "plans to add a service providing the same information in text messages to cellphones, officials said. People would have to register on the MI5 Web site to receive the alerts."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Man Pleads Not Guilty To Chicago Mall Attack Plot. The AP (1/10, Reichgott) reports from Chicago, "A 22-year-old Muslim convert accused by U.S. authorities of being willing to commit acts of 'violent jihad' pleaded not guilty Tuesday to charges that he planned an attack at a shopping mall. … 'I feel well,' Derrick Shareef said at his arraignment. He told U.S. District Judge David Coar he had never been hospitalized for psychiatric treatment." The AP continues, "Shareef was arrested Dec. 6 after allegedly meeting an undercover agent to trade stereo speakers for a pistol and four grenades. … He planned to 'commit acts of violent jihad' by blowing up garbage cans at the mall during the Christmas shopping rush, according to a federal complaint. The complaint also said Shareef considered attacking city halls and courthouses. … 'Any place that's crowded, like a mall is good, anything, any government facility is good,' he allegedly told a secret FBI informant when they talked about possible attack targets. The informant secretly tape-recorded his plans. 'I swear by Allah man, I'm down for it too, I'm down for the cause, I'm down to live for the cause and die for the cause, man.' … Prosecutors have said they were convinced Shareef operated alone and there had been no imminent danger to the public."

The Rockford (IL) Register Star (1/10, Wiser) reports, "Coar asked Shareef standard questions about his education and physical and mental health at the outset of what turned out to be a very brief hearing. … Shareef answered clearly and politely, ending most of his replies with the word 'sir'. He told the judge that he did not graduate high school but obtained his general equivalency diploma, or GED, and had "some college" under his belt. … He said he was not being treated for any physical or mental ailments." The Star adds, "The Justice Department says Shareef, who identified himself as Derrick Omar Shareef in court, had plotted to attack the patrons of CherryVale Mall by placing hand grenades in garbage cans in order to wage jihad. … Authorities said Shareef revealed his plans to an informant who was working with the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Joint-Terrorism Task Force. The informant arrested the 22-year-old former Genoa resident after he exchanged stereo speakers for four non-functioning grenades and a pistol. … Tuesday in court was the first time Shareef was actually able to read the charges against him, Mann said, adding his client doesn't have access to court files where he is being housed and that he himself had only just received a copy of the formal indictment, which was handed down last week."

Leahy To Hold Hearing On Data Mining Programs. McClatchy Newspapers (1/10, Gordon) reports, "In his first hearing Wednesday as the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Democratic Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont plans to examine federal 'data-mining' programs, the computerized hunt for terrorists that can implicate innocent people." McClatchy cites the case of American Airlines pilot Kieran O'Dwyer, who "said Tuesday that US Customs agents detained him for 90 minutes in 2003 when he got off an international flight in New York, telling him his name matched one on a government terrorist watch list." TSA spokeswoman Amy Kudwa said "an average of 1,500 airline travelers applied each week for redress on the grounds that they'd been mistakenly included on terrorist watch lists." Leahy's chief spokesman, David Carle, said Wednesday's "inquiry had gained import because of powerful new technologies, the outsourcing of data mining to private firms and 'the Bush administration's lack of cooperation' with Congress' attempts to police these surveillance programs."

DOJ_NMG_0114546

Chertoff Announces Infrastructure Grants Targeting High-Risk Cities. The Washington Times (1/10, Hudson, 88K) reports DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff yesterday "announced $450 million in security funding for ports, transit systems, and chemical and nuclear plants," targeting "cities most at risk of terrorist attacks, including Washington and New York." Chertoff said last year's grants, which were distributed with "very little guidance," were followed by "a rash of stories ... about communities that spent money on leather jackets or gym equipment or things of that sort." Chertoff said DHS has altered that "willy-nilly approach," replacing it with "a risk-driven allocation of eligibility." USA Today (1/10, Hall, 2.27M) adds that Chertoff said DHS is "investing resources where risk is greatest and where the funds will have the most significant impact." USA notes, "Port security programs will get the largest share of the money: $210 million. Transit security will receive $172 million." Although "New York City and its surrounding communities will come out on top when the money goes out," some lawmakers "still complained that the area wasn't getting enough money."

Testimony Begins In Katrina Insurance Suit. The AP (1/10, Kunzelman) reports from Gulfport, MS, "State Farm Fire & Casualty Co. used a new 'protocol' after Hurricane Katrina to deny claims to many policyholders, a lawyer for a homeowner suing the company said Tuesday in the trial for one of hundreds of pending insurance lawsuits spawned by the massive storm." The AP continues, "William Walker, attorney for State Farm policyholders Norman and Genevieve Broussard of Biloxi, told an eight-member jury in his opening statement that the company refused to pay for any damage to any home that Katrina reduced to a slab in August 2005, including the Broussards'." The AP adds, "State Farm and other companies say their homeowner policies cover damage from wind but not from water - and exclude damage that could have been caused by a combination of both, even if hurricane-force winds preceded a storm's rising water. … 'They denied (the couple's claim) based on this wind/water protocol, this thing that's not in the policy,' Walker told jurors. 'This is a case in which State Farm promised to do something. This is a case in which State Farm decided not to follow those promises.' … The Broussards claim a tornado destroyed their home before any flooding, but State Farm concluded that all the damage was caused by Katrina's storm surge and isn't covered by their policy."

WAR NEWS:

Bush To Announce Troop Boost, Timetable For Iraqis To Take Over. ABC World News (1/9, story 2, 1:30, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported that in his nationally-televised speech tonight, President Bush "will announce…an increase of troops…of more than 20,000 troops. We all along thought it would be around 20,000. They say it will be more than 20,000. Two brigades will be in Iraq within 30 days or, perhaps, a bit longer. … And also, the President will announce he hopes the Iraqis can take over of all of the provinces in Iraq, at least take the lead in battle, by the end of the year." The CBS Evening News (1/9, story 2, 1:05, Axelrod, 7.66M) noted "a member of Congress who met with the President this afternoon says Mr. Bush settled on a surge of 22,000 troops -- 11,000 to be deployed almost immediately over the next couple of weeks, a second wave of 11,000 to be phased in over March, April, May." But "the second wave is somewhat conditional, a carrot, if you will. In other words, Mr. Bush essentially says to the Iraqis you become more effective partners in making Baghdad and Iraq safer or there is no second wave."

The Wall Street Journal (1/10, A4, Jaffe, Dreazen, 2.04M) reports the new Iraq strategy also "calls for modest, relatively inexpensive efforts to spur job creation and economic growth, a marked shift from the large-scale reconstruction projects and free-market dogmatism of earlier White House efforts." But "with the appetite for new spending for Iraq low across Washington, the downsized ambitions are being matched by similarly reduced amounts of money, prompting some senior military commanders to express skepticism the plan will improve conditions in Iraq." Bush "will propose a micro-finance effort to aid Iraqi entrepreneurs and a sizable expansion of a program giving military commanders money for small-scale reconstruction and job-creation projects, according to administration and Pentagon officials. Mr. Bush described both initiatives in closed-door meetings with senators this week, according to several participants." Meanwhile, "senior Pentagon officials have been touting a push to get 193 Iraqi factories that have shuttered since the 2003 invasion up and running in the next three years. The officials say the reopened plants can provide jobs to tens of thousands of Iraqis who might otherwise join a militia or insurgent groups."

But the New York Times (1/10, Glanz, 1.16M) says that "even before the measures are announced, Iraqi political and business leaders have been expressing skepticism that any effort to transform a system of state-owned enterprises that has fallen so far into dysfunction could become an engine for job creation in Iraq." The Times adds, "Among the economic measures under consideration is new support for a program that allows local American military commanders to finance small reconstruction projects." However, "recent statements by administration officials suggest that the plan is also likely to include an effort to revive parts of what was a vast Iraqi military and industrial base before it was destroyed by war, sanctions and looting."

DOJ_NMG_0114547

The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Richter, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports, "Bush is expected to announce plans to double the number of provincial reconstruction teams and call for big new jobs and loans programs and a renewed reconstruction effort. Administration officials consider the economic and political aspects of Bush's plan more important than the expected troop increase." The Times adds "officials say their plan has two stages. Once troops have pacified key areas of Baghdad and Anbar province, officials will offer economic and political benefits, including jobs that they hope will win the loyalty of young men who are now fighting with the militias."

The AP (1/10, Baldor) reports Bush is also "expected to urge friendly Mideast countries to increase their aid to Iraq but will ignore the recommendation of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group that he include Syria and Iran in an effort to stanch Iraqi bloodshed nearly four years after the US invasion, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the plan has not yet been announced."

NBC Nightly News (1/9, lead story, 3:10, Gregory, 9.87M) reported that "even White House allies say the President must educate the American people about the problems in Iraq and his own plan to fix them instead of offering broad assurances." David Frum, former Bush speechwriter: "Instead, what he has to do is offer a highly detailed explanation of why this time the strategy and tactics on offer can work."

The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Reynolds, Levey, 850K) says "Bush spent hours Tuesday practicing in front of cameras, preparing to make his case," and "members of Congress who met with Bush said he appeared to understand that, after years of upbeat rhetoric and positive assessments that belied a lack of progress inside the country, his credibility was on the line." Sen. Trent Lott "said both Republicans and Democrats would be listening for a note of contrition in the president's voice. 'As important as what he says is how he says it,' Lott told reporters."

McClatchy (1/10, Hutcheson, Talev) says Bush "is about to take a gamble that could make or break his presidency and his place in history." The "nationally televised speech, and the reaction to it, will determine the next step in Iraq, test his relations with the new Democratic-led Congress and set the tone for his final two years in office. Some analysts say it could increase pressure for withdrawal if the solutions Bush offers don't bring quick results."

In an article titled "Bush Must Sell Public, Congress" the Atlanta Journal Constitution (1/10, Herman) quotes longtime Bush media advisor Mark McKinnon saying, "This may be the last, best chance to shape policy and opinion on the issue that will define his presidency." He "is among those, including Bush aides in the White House, who believe that nothing the president says tonight is likely to move numbers in his direction. It's the results that will matter." McKinnon adds, "The plan for more troops has to be clear and provide metrics for success in order to win support."

The Washington Times (1/10, Dinan, 88K) reports, "The White House yesterday said Mr. Bush has lost the country's support. 'It's important to bring the public back to this war and restore public confidence and support for the mission,' spokesman Tony Snow said." Jeffrey D. McCausland, a defense specialist and former National Security Council staffer, "said Mr. Bush will be addressing three audiences: Congress, which controls the funding; the American public, whose patience is slipping; and Iraq, which will have to exhibit a more solid commitment."

The AP (1/10, Raum) reports, "Bush's new plan for Iraq sounds a lot like his old one. Send in more troops, set goals for the Iraqi government and assure Americans it's better to wage war there than here. … Bush's challenge in Iraq: show what's different now. The plan the president will outline to the nation Wednesday night is the latest repackaging of a program that's been wrapped and rewrapped many times."

Bush Won't Refer To A "Surge" Tonight. ABC World News (1/9, story 2, 1:30, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported Bush will announce an increase of troops, but "he will not call it a surge." Meanwhile, the war over semantics ("surge" versus "escalation") rages on. The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Neuman, 850K) asks, "Is it harmless semantics? Is it disingenuous spin? One thing is clear: Using the word 'surge' to describe President Bush's forthcoming plan for reshaping US efforts in Iraq has ignited a fiery political brouhaha. … What infuriates critics of the war, including many liberal Democrats, is that they see 'surge' as a manipulative and deceptive word. It implies a relatively short-term increase in the US military commitment, they say, when the White House intends to keep the additional troops in Iraq much longer, perhaps for several years. Even worse, critics say, the news media have uncritically accepted the word and thus contributed to deceiving the public."

The New York Times (1/10, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports, "'Cut and run' versus 'stay the course' is so 2006. This week has ushered in a new political battle over the language of the war: 'Surge,' meet 'escalation.'" The Times also notes Tony Snow "last night said that the president would not be using the word 'surge' in his speech, adding that it implied what he called a 'rush hour' approach to a serious policy."

The Washington Post (1/10, C1, Farhi, 690K) reports, "It's one of those words -- like 'chad' or 'blog' or 'waterboarding' -- that's suddenly become the go-to phrase to describe a contemporary phenomenon." Surge is "the country's latest catchword." Its "very vagueness…might make it the politically perfect word for what is likely to be a controversial policy." Rep. Nancy Pelosi "framed her apparent opposition to sending more troops to Iraq by using a more freighted substitute: 'escalation.' In that context, surge is a euphemism for a euphemism. 'Escalation' was variously ascribed to both President Lyndon Johnson's policy of increased military aid to Vietnam, and the US 'incursion' -- yet more euphemisms! -- into Laos and Cambodia in 1970 under President Richard Nixon. Perhaps to avoid echoes of that war, 'surge' is the Pentagon and White House's preferred coinage."

DOJ_NMG_0114548

While most media outlets are sidestepping the debate by referring to an troop "increase," others are choosing sides: The Washington Post (1/10, A1, Abramowitz, Wright, Ricks, 690K), in a story about Pentagon commanders and their reaction to Bush's proposals, calls Bush's plan a "military escalation." The Christian Science Monitor (1/10, Feldmann, 59K) also refers to Bush's proposed "escalation of the US troop presence in Iraq."

Military Commanders Said To Oppose Troop Boost. The Washington Post (1/10, A1, Abramowitz, Wright, Ricks, 690K) reports, "When…Bush goes before the American people tonight to outline his new strategy for Iraq, he will be doing something he has avoided since the invasion of Iraq in March 2003: ordering his top military brass to take action they initially resisted and advised against." The Post adds, "Pentagon insiders say members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff have long opposed the increase in troops and are only grudgingly going along with the plan because they have been promised that the military escalation will be matched by renewed political and economic efforts in Iraq. Gen. John P. Abizaid, the outgoing head of Central Command, said less than two months ago that adding US troops was not the answer for Iraq." Bush's decision "appears to mark the first major disagreement between the White House and key elements of the Pentagon over the Iraq war since Gen. Eric K. Shinseki, then the Army chief of staff, split with the administration in the spring of 2003 over the planned size of the occupation force, which he regarded as too small." It "may also be a sign of increasing assertiveness from a commander in chief described by former aides as relatively passive about questioning the advice of his military advisers."

Fox News' Special Report (1/9, Hume) reported Democrats "charge that General George Casey and John Abizaid, who are leaving their Iraq posts, flatly oppose any surge and the President simply ignored them." Commanders, added Fox, "have been skeptical of the surge without a specific purpose, but they said recently it depends on what the surge is for."

The New York Times (1/10, Cloud, Shanker, 1.16M) says "Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq is expected to require the Army eventually to send as many as six National Guard combat brigades to Iraq, beginning in 2008. The increased demand on the National Guard in coming years is a likely byproduct of Mr. Bush's decision, expected to be announced in a speech Wednesday night, to send five active-duty combat brigades, or about 20,000 troops, to Iraq, starting at the end of this month, according to current and former officials."

Survey Finds Troops Disapprove Of Bush's War Policies 42% To 35%. The Dallas Morning News (1/9, McLemore, 500K) reported "more active-duty troops now disapprove of the president's war policies than support them, according to a year-end survey by Military Times newspapers. Experts say the results, drawn from some of the more conservative career-track military, reflect a growing weariness and frustration over lack of progress in Iraq and Afghanistan." The survey, "mailed to 6,000 active-duty subscribers to Military Times' four newspapers aimed at the military services, showed that 42 percent of those surveyed disapprove of Mr. Bush's handling of the war, compared with 35 percent who support it." It "marks the first time that the president's Iraq war policies failed to gain majority support since the Military Times began its annual survey four years ago."

GAO Issues Highly Critical Report On Iraq. AFP (1/9) reports, "US government auditors released a grim report card of the American record in violence-wracked Iraq, on the eve of President George W. Bush's televised rollout of a new strategy." The GAO study "ran a critical rule over a previous failed US plan for victory, the malfunctioning Iraqi government and security forces and fearsome insurgent and sectarian violence. It said the Pentagon had failed to allow proper congressional oversight of Iraqi armed forces, and warned of an increasing strain on US forces pressed into repeated tours of duty and shortages of military supplies."

More Commentary. The Los Angeles Times (1/10, 850K) editorializes, "The notion that the 'surge' in US troops under discussion -- about 20,000 combat troops on top of the 132,000 already in Iraq -- amounts to a new policy is laughable." A troop increase is acceptable "only as part of a comprehensive -- and comprehensible -- plan to secure and democratize Iraq. ... It's been leaked that Bush also will advocate a new, $1-billion jobs program for Iraqis," but "What is this additional $1 billion going to accomplish that the $30 billion already spent on that nation's reconstruction failed to do? ... The president needs to articulate the conditions under which the US will pull out altogether, in the near future. As painful as that would be, it sure beats becoming embroiled in someone else's civil war."

Bill O'Reilly, in the opening segment of Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (1/9) contended that President Bush "has little credibility left in the country," and "at this stage" he "should try to secure Baghdad one last time without sniping from Ted Kennedy or anybody else. … The President should understand the window is closing. But at this point for the sake of those who have been killed and wounded, let's give it one more shot."

Conservative radio host Laura Ingraham, appearing on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (1/9), said, "I don't think

DOJ_NMG_0114549

Americans at this point frankly care much about what's good for the Iraqi people. Americans want to know that whatever we're doing in Iraq or in Somalia or around the world, is making America safer. And if the debate is about that, then I think…Bush has a chance, perhaps, might be a small chance, of turning things around."

Maureen Dowd, in the New York Times (1/10, 1.16M), "With the Surge, as with the invasion of Iraq, W. is like the presumptuous date 'who reserves a hotel room and then asks you to the prom,' as my friend Dana Calvo put it. … In other words, the president will ask us to the prom once he reserves the hotel room."

In the Washington Post (1/10, A13, 690K), Harold Meyerson writes, "If any Americans could truly understand Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, George Bush and Karl Rove should. All three firmly believe that the successful politician must above all cultivate his base -- not that any of them can point to recent successes. … Yet tonight, President Bush will announce that Maliki has changed. He will also announce that he is sending additional US forces to Iraq, but he's done that before, in almost comparable numbers, to no good effect. What's different this time, we are to believe, is that the Iraqis will join us in trying to suppress the sectarian violence."

Los Angeles Times (1/10, 850K) columnist Max Boot writes pessimistically, "If we wind up losing the war in Iraq, as now appears likely (though not inevitable), many conservatives know who to blame: the press, or, in blogger-speak, the MSM (mainstream news media). Just as it did during the Vietnam War, a myth is likely to develop in which America's valiant fighting men and women were stabbed in the back by unpatriotic, even treasonous, reporters. ... That isn't to deny that there has been some biased, slipshod news coverage. ... But by now the dismal conditions on the ground have caught up with, if not surpassed, the media's bleak outlook." To blame the press "deflects blame from those who deserve it, in the upper echelons of the administration and the armed forces." Boot adds that former Secretary Rumsfeld is "likely to go down in history as Robert McNamara redux."

Los Angeles Times (1/10, 850K) contributor and law professor Bruce Ackerman suggests that Congress "set a price tag on the long-run cost of the war -- say $500 billion -- and tell the president that he won't be getting a penny more." Only a ceiling "will force the president to recognize that the American people are no longer willing to give him a blank check for an endless series of mistakes."

In USA Today (1/10, 2.27M), Emory University lecturer Don Campbell writes that "contrary to Bush's claim of a year ago, no one seems to have learned anything in Iraq that might inform national security policy and military strategy in the future. Wisdom gained from hindsight becomes foresight and is better than no wisdom at all."

Washington Post (1/10, 690K) columnist David Ignatius writes that lessons can be found in the counterinsurgency manual authored by Lt. Gen. David Petraeus: "Two themes stood out for me as I read the document. The first is that success in counterinsurgency requires a political strategy as much as a military one. The second is that broad political support back home -- which buys time on the battlefield -- is the crucial strategic asset in fighting such wars." Ignatius adds, "The abiding lesson of this manual ... ought to be engraved as the cornerstone of U.S. policy going forward, regardless of whether there is a troop surge: 'The Host Nation Doing Something Tolerably Is Normally Better than Us Doing It Well.'"

Democrats To Hold Votes On "Surge," With 10 GOP Senators "Likely" To Oppose Bush. The New York Times (1/10, Zeleny, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "Democratic leaders said Tuesday that they intended to hold symbolic votes in the House and Senate on President Bush's plan to send more troops to Baghdad, forcing Republicans to take a stand on the proposal and seeking to isolate the president politically over his handling of the war." The Senate vote "is expected as early as next week." Meanwhile, "the office of Nancy Pelosi, speaker of the House, followed with an announcement that the House would also take up a resolution in opposition to a troop increase." Democrats "did not rule out eventually considering more muscular responses, like seeking to cap the number of troops being deployed to Iraq or limiting financing for the war -- steps that could provoke a Constitutional and political showdown over the president's power to wage war." The Times adds "Republican officials conceded that at least 10 of their own senators were likely to oppose the plan to increase troops levels in Iraq. And Democrats were proposing their resolution with that in mind, hoping to send a forceful message that as many as 60 senators believed strengthening American forces in Baghdad was the wrong approach. … In an interview on Tuesday, Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, said he was becoming increasingly skeptical that a troop increase was in the best interest of the United States."

Dana Milbank, in his "Washington Sketch" column in the Washington Post (1/10, A2, 690K), said Republicans "emerged from their weekly party luncheon yesterday displaying more dance steps than the Joffrey Ballet. 'We should listen to what the president has to say,' proposed Sen. John Warner (R-Va). 'I want to hear the president's plan,' Sen. Susan Collins (Maine) concurred. 'I want to see what he's proposing before I make dramatic statements,' an unusually skittish Trent Lott (Miss.), the No. 2 Republican, told a thick knot of reporters." Milbank adds, "And you didn't want to get too close to Sen. George Voinovich (Ohio). 'We need more information, okay?' he insisted." But "the Republicans' principal dancer yesterday was Sen. John Sununu (N.H.), perhaps the most endangered of all GOP senators in 2008. 'We haven't discussed "the plan,'" he maintained. 'That would suggest that we were told exactly what is going to be announced tomorrow, and that is certainly not the case. … I don't really know what they're thinking about proposing, so given that, it wouldn't be wise for me to suggest that I do or don't know whether their conditions are appropriate."

DOJ_NMG_0114550

Roll Call (1/10, Stanton) reports, "A White House aide said Reid's nonbinding resolution likely would serve to put lawmakers on record as a way to gauge support for future efforts to block the plan." The Administration's "GOP allies in the Senate quickly lined up behind the president Tuesday, setting the stage for an intense floor clash next week. Following a meeting at the White House, Senate GOP leaders announced their support for the plan. Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said, 'I know enough about it to know that I will support it,' adding that members of Republican leadership have met with Bush on a number of occasions to discuss the plan." Roll Call adds, "A veteran Democratic aide said that while the vote on the resolution will be the first test of Reid's abilities, there likely will be much more significant challenges later this year -- particularly if the Senate moves to either cut off funding or restrict Bush's ability to prosecute the war." Reid "told reporters he believes he can count on the support of at least nine Republicans in his effort to corral the 60 votes needed to end a potential filibuster by backers of Bush's plan."

Democrats are acting under strong pressure from members of their base. The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Hook, 850K) reports, "It did not take long for Rep. Nancy Boyda, a freshman Democrat from Kansas, to learn the price of defying her party's liberal base. After she said she would support President Bush if he proposed an increase in US troop levels in Iraq, antiwar bloggers fumed and MoveOn.org, the liberal advocacy group, considered running a television ad attacking her. … That kind of political pressure is already being applied, not just to junior lawmakers, but also to Democratic leaders." It "prodded them into making Iraq more central to their first 100 hours in control of Capitol Hill than they had planned. And it is creating tension between many Democrats and the liberal activists who will be increasingly important as the 2008 presidential campaign gets into gear."

Kennedy Announces Resolution Blocking Additional Troops. The Democratic move comes on the same day Sen. Ted Kennedy announced his own strategy against the Iraq troop increase. ABC World News (1/9, story 3, 2:00, Tapper, 8.78M) reported, "Today, the liberal lion of the US Senate roared." Kennedy was shown saying, "Iraq is George Bush's Vietnam." Kennedy "introduced legislation that would block President Bush from sending to Iraq one more soldier or spending one more dollar as part of a surge in troops, without first getting clear Congressional approval, an up or down vote." Kennedy's position "puts him at odds with some of his fellow Democrats, including Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joe Biden, who says the Constitution does not give Congress the power to stop the Commander in Chief from waging this war however he wants."

Sen. Edward Kennedy, on MSNBC's Hardball (1/9) said voters "want their members of Congress to do more than just make speeches. They want action. And this gives an opportunity for action. We have done it in the past. We did if in times of Lebanon, in limiting the increased number of US troops in Lebanon. We have done it in Vietnam. We should do it now in Iraq." Asked how he plans to get a vote on his resolution, Kennedy said he would probably "take this up as an amendment to appropriations." USA Today (1/10, Kiely, 2.27M) reports Kennedy "said Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., will introduce similar legislation in the House."

The Washington Times (1/10, Ward, 88K) titles its report "Kennedy Proposal Uncovers Party Rift," noting comments from Senate Democratic Whip Richard J. Durbin and House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer .

Republican strategist Karen Hanretty, on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (1/9), said, "I think it's actually very interesting what Ted Kennedy is doing. … At least is he putting his money where his mouth is. And I would be very curious to see where other members of the Senate. … Let's see, we have Hillary Clinton running for president. Barack Obama, Joe Biden, where do they stand on this bill? Do they want to put up a vote on this bill? Because it seems like Democrats are very reluctant to come out and say 'we don't support the war. We think it's immoral. And, yet, we are going to continue to fund it.'" Hanretty added that "it looks like Ted Kennedy is the only liberal in America right now who is standing up for the far left."

Bush Briefs Democratic Lawmakers. The Washington Post (1/10, A10, Kessler, Weisman, 690K) reports Bush "gravely warned House Democrats yesterday that America's credibility would be shattered if the United States pulled its troops from Iraq, forcing close ally Saudi Arabia to look elsewhere for protection and potentially destabilizing Egypt, the region's most populous country, according to participants in the meeting." Bush "did not say during the half-hour meeting with Democrats where else he thought Saudi Arabia would seek 'protection,' but he made it clear that he was simply informing Democrats of his decisions on Iraq, not consulting with them. He said that he understands the challenges and thinks his plan has the best chance of success." The House Democrats "included Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton (Mo.), intelligence committee Chairman Sylvestre Reyes (Tex.), Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Tom Lantos (Calif.), Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John D. Dingell (Mich.), Rep. Norm Dicks (Wash.), Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.) and Rep. Robert E. Andrews (N.J.). Vice President Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten attended the meeting."

DOJ_NMG_0114551

Additional US Troops Already In Place To Carry Out Bush's New Strategy. Fox News' Special Report (1/9, Hume) reported, "Even if Democrats disapprove of the troop surge in Iraq, they will not able to keep at least part of it from taking place right away. Additional American forces are already in the region, locked and loaded." Fox went on to report, "Senior military officials tell Fox that the Second Brigade of the Army's Eighty Second Airborne division that just arrived in Kuwait from Fort Bragg, N.C., will move into Baghdad soon after the President's speech Wednesday night. Sources say that the paratroopers will be the first wave of the President's troop surge, the overall increase, sources tell us, will be gradual. Republican lawmakers who have been briefed on the plan called it a 'three-front surge' -- military, diplomatic, and economic – with a series of benchmarks for the Iraqis to meet and a clear indication the US effort is not open-ended."

Pelosi, Reid Block Effort To Air Democratic Rebuttal To Bush's Speech. On MSNBC's Hardball (1/9, Matthews) correspondent David Shuster reported that "some Democratic lawmakers believe a Democrat should give a televised response similar to what happens following the State of the Union address to take advantage of the attention and focus by the broadcast and cable networks. But Democratic leaders have not requested air time to make a formal response. Nancy Pelosi and Senator Harry Reid say it's the President alone who must articulate and implement a policy for Iraq."

Major Action Against Insurgents Underway In Baghdad. The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Roug, 850K) reports, "In fierce, day-long fighting, 1,000 American and Iraqi troops assisted by U.S. attack helicopters and warplanes battled gunmen in a Sunni Arab downtown neighborhood Tuesday, killing at least 51 militants, according to Iraqi officials." The offensive, "the heaviest fighting in the capital in months, came in response to a buildup of insurgents in the Haifa Street neighborhood adjacent to the highly fortified Green Zone government complex."

ABC World News (1/9, lead story, 2:35, McCarthy, 8.78M) reported, "The most dangerous address in Baghdad, Haifa Street. Locals call it Sniper Street. Today, the US military arrived in force, determined to wipe out a concentration of Sunni insurgents and fighters who long make this street their killing zone. Apache attack helicopters and F-15 fighters zeroed in on this near-deserted neighborhood, as 1,000 US and Iraqi troops, move from building-to-building. As this CNN video shows, looking for an enemy who's looking for them. These helicopters have been circling over the Haifa Street district for the past several hours. We've seen them fire rockets into targets. And there's been a lot of gunfire. The fighting started over the weekend, when Iraqi police who were trying to pick up bodies on the street, came under fire. They called in the Iraqi army. And this morning, the Americans got involved."

The CBS Evening News (1/9, lead story, 2:35, Logan, 7.66M) reported, "The battle on Haifa Street continued into the night, spreading fear amongst the minority Sunni population here, many of whom believe the Shiite led Iraqi government is using this crackdown as a cover to drive the Sunnis from the capital with the help of US forces."

The New York Times (1/10, Santora, 1.16M) reports, "An American military officer familiar with the operation said that it was part of an effort to stabilize Baghdad, but was not directly linked to the president's new security plan." However, "the location of the fight has particular significance. Nearly two years ago, after much bloodshed and toil, the American military wrested control of the area from insurgents." NBC Nightly News (1/9, story 2, 2:00, Colt, 9.87M) also recounts that "two years ago the insurgents were targeted in a high profile assault dubbed 'Operation Lightning.' But as so often happens here, when the soldiers left, the militants returned. That has long been the problem here. Clean up one area, move on, then the insurgents return."

The Financial Times (1/10, Negus) says "US and Iraqi forces moved in against insurgents, in an area once viewed as a showcase for the ability to control Baghdad neighbourhoods, by 'saturating' them with military forces."

The Washington Times/AP (1/10, Hurst, Abdul-Zahra) reports Iraqi Prime Minister Al-Maliki "appeared to have ordered the stepped-up fight with Sunni Arab fighters to put an Iraqi face on the latest bid to tame the capital. Several al-Maliki aides and confidants have told The Associated Press that the prime minister plans to focus his troops, with American backing, on Sunni insurgents in western Baghdad at the outset of the drive. They spoke on condition of anonymity because the details of the plan had not been disclosed." Al-Maliki, the associates said, "then plans to challenge al-Sadr to disarm and disband his militia because there would no longer be a reason for them to roam the streets with Sunni Arab insurgent forces crippled."

The Washington Post (1/10, A1, Raghavan, Partlow, 690K) reports, "Sunni legislator Khalaf al-Alayan, in an interview on al-Jazeera television, described the fighting on Haifa Street as a way to 'clean Baghdad of the remaining Sunni elements.'" Alayan "said he had contacted organizations such as the Arab League and the United Nations in hopes of stopping 'these massacres that the Sunnis are subjected to.'" In a statement, "the Sunni Iraqi Islamic Party described the 50 killed as 'innocent citizens.' It asserted that Sunnis on Haifa Street were 'under siege' by Shiite militias backed by the Iraqi army."

DOJ_NMG_0114552

Iraqi Vice President Ask US Not To "Give Up On Iraq." In the Washington Post (1/10, A13, 690K), Iraqi Vice President Tariq Al-Hashimi writes, "Both of our nations have invested too much to walk away now. If this battle is lost, the entire region could be destabilized. Second, despite the chaos in my country, not all bridges of patriotism have been burned." Hashimi points to evidence "from the most unlikely of venues," the unity behind the Iraqi soccer team at the Asian Games. He continues, "If those soccer players taught us anything, it is that a proper strategy for eliminating sectarianism and fostering nationalism is key. Reconstituting the Iraqi Armed Services and then reforming, retraining and properly arming them must be a central component of this strategy. Another should be revising Iraq's constitution to give our central government effective powers but prevent any sort of dictatorship by the prime minister." Hashimi also suggests "gainful employment" for Iraqi youths, "a coordinated effort to secure Baghdad," and "a greater focus on the militias."

Expert Says Iraq War Has Shifted Alliances In Middle East. Edward N. Luttwak, a senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/10, 2.04M) reports, "It was the hugely ambitious project of the Bush administration to transform the entire Middle East by remaking Iraq into an irresistible model of prosperous democracy. Having failed in that worthy purpose, another, more prosaic result has inadvertently been achieved: divide and rule, the classic formula for imperial power on the cheap." For example, Luttwak says the "Sunni-US alignment in Lebanon, which interestingly coexists with the US-Shiite alliance in Iraq, may yet achieve results of strategic importance if Syria is successfully detached from its alliance with Iran." He goes on to note that "when the Bush administration came into office, only Egypt and Jordan were functioning allies of the US." However, the Iraq war, he concludes, "has indeed brought into existence a New Middle East, in which Arab Sunnis can no longer gleefully disregard American interests because they need help against the looming threat of Shiite supremacy, while in Iraq at the core of the Arab world, the Shia are allied with the US."

Blair Criticizes Manner Of Saddam Execution. The AP (1/10, Stringer) reports, "British Prime Minister Tony Blair said Tuesday that the manner of Saddam Hussein's execution was completely wrong and unacceptable -- his first public comments about the Dec. 30 hanging." However, "Blair told a London news conference he hoped disputes over the taunting of the former Iraqi dictator and the release of illicit video footage of the execution would not lead people to forget the gravity of Saddam's crimes."

Lawyer Remembers Combat In Iraq. The Washington Post (1/10, C1, Carlson, 690K) reports on Washington attorney Adam Tiffen, who practices "at the law firm of Porter Wright Morris & Arthur, a few blocks from the White House, looking at pictures from his year in Iraq. His law degree hangs on the wall near his Bronze Star." Tiffen "joined Army ROTC in 2000, while he was studying at George Washington University Law School. He graduated in 2003 and was commissioned as a lieutenant in the Maryland National Guard. He was working on an insider-trading case at Porter Wright when the unit he'd trained with was called up for duty in Iraq." During his service "he wrote a blog .... Armchair General, a military history Web site, printed part of his blog (http://thereplacements.blogspot.com). So did the liberal journal Mother Jones. Last October, several of his stories were posted on The Sandbox, a military blog founded by 'Doonesbury' cartoonist Garry Trudeau." Tiffen was "stunned" to read after returning to the US that the town his unit had protected "went to [excrement] when they pulled U.S. troops out."

US Strikes Al Qaeda In Somalia. NBC Nightly News (1/9, lead story, 3:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The US has opened a new front in the war on terrorism. This time in Africa, where American Special Forces are hitting targets in Somalia."

The AP (1/10, Duhul) reports, "Attack helicopters strafed suspected al-Qaida fighters in southern Somalia on Tuesday, witnesses said, following two days of airstrikes by US forces -- the first U.S. offensives in the African country since 18 American soldiers were killed here in 1993. In Washington, a US intelligence official said American forces killed five to 10 people in an attack on one target in southern Somalia believed to be associated with al-Qaida. The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the operation's sensitivity, said a small number of others present, perhaps four or five, were wounded." But "a Somali lawmaker said 31 civilians, including a newlywed couple, died in Tuesday's assault by two helicopters near Afmadow, a town in a forested area close to the Kenyan border. The report could not be independently verified." Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman "spoke of one strike in southern Somalia, but would not confirm any of the details or say whether any al-Qaeda militants were killed."

Similarly, the New York Times (1/10, A8, Gettleman, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports Somali officials said "dozens of people were killed" in the airstrike and "news of the attack immediately set off new waves of anti-American anger in Mogadishu." Meanwhile, American military and intelligence officials "expressed confidence that at least one senior Qaeda leader in Somalia," Abu Taha al-Sudani, "had been killed in the American attack or subsequent strikes by Ethiopian troops." Pentagon and intelligence officials also said the Ethiopian offensive "had unearthed fresh intelligence about the location of Qaeda operatives whose trail had long gone cold."

DOJ_NMG_0114553

The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Sanders, Albadri, 850K) says "State Department spokesman Sean McCormack declined to comment on details about the strikes, but defended the U.S. interest for intervening in Somalia's conflict. 'Very clearly, the US government has had a concern that there are terrorists and Al Qaeda-affiliated terrorists that were in Somalia,' he said. 'We have a great interest in seeing that those individuals not be able to flee to other locations.'"

The Washington Times (1/10, Scarborough, 88K) reports the US targets "were thought to be al Qaeda operatives who carried out the 1998 bombings of two U.S. embassies in East Africa. The trio and Islamist allies have been working to make the ungoverned Somalia a terrorist safe haven."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/10, Baldauf, Pflanz, 59K) says "a key question is whether the US, in its first overt military operation in Somalia since the infamous 'BlackHawk Down' intervention in 1992 and '93, has managed to hit the prime targets -- Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, Saleh Ali Saleh Nabhan, or Abu Taha al-Sudani." Sudani "is listed on Washington terror watch lists as Al Qaeda's point man in East Africa. Mr. Mohammed, from the Comoros archipelago in the Indian Ocean, is suspected of orchestrating a 2002 suicide attack on an Israeli-owned Kenyan hotel."

Fox News' Special Report (1/9, Hume) reported, "It appears tonight that a US airstrike in Somalia has achieved some of its intended results. Early intelligence showed that between 5-10 people believed to be associated with al-Qaeda have been killed. … A US official also told us that the leader of al-Qaeda in east Africa may also be among the dead."

The Washington Post (1/10, A7, DeYoung, McCrummen, 690K) reports "US officials declined yesterday to provide details of who, or what, was hit." In Mogadishu, reports "circulated that as many as 50 people, many of them civilians, were killed in the attack," but US officials "said they are fairly certain that at least one targeted individual was hit; they said they had no information about civilian deaths." The US confirmed that a "principal target" of the airstrike was Abu Talha al-Sudani, but officials "cautioned against reports that Fazul Abdullah Mohammed and Saleh Ali Saleh Nabhan…may have been killed in the attack." US officials "said that no further information would be released until US personnel could assess directly the results of the strike and identify any dead."

The Wall Street Journal (1/10, A8, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "Administration officials described military actions in Somalia as part of an intensifying campaign to root out al Qaeda leaders allegedly operating in the country. But Pentagon involvement risks stoking greater instability in a region already racked by strife, analysts said." Some critics of the US action said there is "scant evidence" that Somalia's Islamic militants are "linked to al Qaeda."

The CBS Evening News (1/9, story 3, 2:05, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "One intelligence report says the strike killed eight and wounded three, but there is still no confirmation that any of the Al Qaeda operatives they were after are among the dead. With an aircraft carrier keeping watch offshore, a US Air Force gunship blasted away at the suspected hideout of the three most notorious Al Qaeda terrorists in Africa." Former Assistant Secretary Susan Rice told CBS, "The role that Ethiopia played which was critical, was to help flush the hardcore Islamist elements out of the capital and push them south." CBS said the US military "is ready to carry out more strikes, but that depends on getting good intelligence on the whereabouts of any al Qaeda operatives still alive."

ABC World News (1/9, story 4, 2:05, Kerley, 8.78M) said it "has learned FBI agents were sent to northern Kenya to capture any suspects fleeing over the border." Meanwhile, "American intelligence officials are hearing reports of less than 20 dead and wounded in the US attack. One source says they will not identify who they killed or how many, until Americans see the bodies," which "could be difficult."

Europeans, UN Express Concerns About US Strike. The Financial Times (1/10, England) says the European Commission Tuesday "criticized the US strike, saying it could set back efforts to reach a deal between Somalia's provisional government and moderate Islamists." A spokesman for Louis Michel, EU development Commissioner, said, "We need a political process which is inclusive in order to bring about stability. Any incident of this kind is not helpful in the long term."

Meanwhile at the United Nations, the AP (1/10, Lederer) reports Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon is "concerned" that the attack "could escalate hostilities and harm civilians," spokeswoman Michele Montas said Tuesday. "Notwithstanding the motives for this reported military action, the Secretary-General is concerned about the new dimension this kind of action could introduce to the conflict and the possible escalation of hostilities that may result."

WSJournal Welcomes Somalia Strikes. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (1/10, 2.04M) says "the attacks -- along with the deployment of a carrier battle group off the African coast -- are welcome evidence that the US has learned the lessons of May 19, 1996. That's the date Osama bin Laden and his associates left Sudan for Afghanistan on a chartered plane. The Clinton Administration was aware that Sudan intended to expel bin Laden, and the US might have easily tracked and destroyed the flight en route. The consequences of its failure to do so is only too well known, and the Bush Administration is right to be determined not to let terrorists get away again, whether by land, air or sea."

DOJ_NMG_0114554

The strikes in Somalia are "also a reminder that in the war on terror there is no 'exit strategy' short of victory." In the 1990s, "America's sheepish withdrawal from the country had consequences. Bin Laden viewed it as yet another sign that America can't take casualties and will retreat when hit hard."

Government Changes Recruiting Practices. The New York Times (1/10, Liptak, 1.16M) reports, "The Defense Department yesterday announced changes in how it will treat information in an enormous military recruiting database. The changes are part of the settlement of a lawsuit brought by the New York Civil Liberties Union on behalf of six New York City high school students that challenged the legality of the way information in the database was collected and used." The "Joint Advertising, Market Research and Studies Program, is, according to court papers, probably the largest repository of information concerning 16-to-25-year-olds. ... The Defense Department agreed to use the database only for recruiting, giving up the possibility of sharing it with law enforcement and intelligence agencies. It agreed to destroy information on individuals after three years rather than five years or longer. The department also agreed to collect Social Security numbers only from the Selective Service System. Perhaps most significantly, it established a way for people to opt out of the database." The NYCLU "said it was frustrated that the department refused to stop collecting information about students' race and ethnicity."

The AP (1/9, Neumeister) reports, "Last year's lawsuit claimed the department was flouting a 1982 military recruitment law that specifies that it refrain from collecting information on students under 17, that it store the information for no more than three years and that the information be kept private." About 50 sites carried this story. The Washington Post/AP (1/10, A3) includes an abbreviated version of the AP story.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

US Alleges Conrad Black Committed Insider Trading. The AP (1/10, Heher) reports, "Less than two months before the start of a fraud and racketeering trial, federal prosecutors leveled new allegations against former newspaper tycoon Conrad Black, saying he engaged in insider trading and illegally posted information about his former company on a financial message board." The AP continues, "A lengthy filing this week in U.S. District Court in Chicago spells out a dozen alleged misdeeds by the former Hollinger International Inc. chairman and CEO, who's accused of plundering millions of dollars from the company's coffers. … Black was forced from the helm of the company and is scheduled to go to trial March 1." The AP adds, "The newspaper empire, which once included The Daily Telegraph of London, The Jerusalem Post and a major Canadian newspaper group, since has been largely dismantled. The Chicago Sun-Times is the last remaining major property of the company, now called the Sun-Times Media Group Inc. … Prosecutors on Monday asked U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve to include the newest allegations as evidence in the ongoing case against Black. … 'Black did not make a distinction between his money and that belonging to a public company,' prosecutors wrote. 'It is this mind-set that contributed to his fleecing of International.' … Black is charged with misusing company money to bankroll his lavish lifestyle and cheating on his taxes. He has pleaded not guilty."

DOJ Wants More Time To Consider Rehearing In Westar Conviction Reversal. The Topeka (KS) Capital-Journal (1/10, Boczkiewicz) reports from Denver, "Federal prosecutors aren't tipping their hand, but Tuesday they said they may ask an appeals court to reconsider its decision that overturned all convictions of David Wittig and Douglas Lake in the Westar Energy looting case." The Capital-Journal continues, "Prosecutor Richard Hathaway told the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in a new filing that more time is needed to decide whether to ask the court's full contingent of judges to rehear the case that was decided Friday by a three-judge panel. … Hathaway, of Topeka, asked the Denver-based court to give prosecutors until Feb. 19 to decide whether to ask for a rehearing. Without an extension, the deadline for prosecutors to decide is Jan. 19." The Capital-Journal adds, "Wittig, Westar's former chairman, president and chief executive officer, and Lake, Westar's former executive vice president, were convicted in 2005 of wire fraud, money laundering, circumvention of internal controls and conspiracy. … The panel ruled there was insufficient evidence to convict Wittig and Lake of wire fraud. Because of that, and because the alleged crimes were so intertwined, their convictions for money laundering also were overturned. … The panel overturned the convictions for circumvention of internal controls, ruling that the trial judge, Julie Robinson, of the U.S. District Court in Topeka, seriously erred by failing to properly instruct jurors on what evidence was needed to convict on those charges."

Home Depot Board May Feel Effects Of Nardelli Ouster. The New York Times (1/10, Creswell) reports, "Now that the board has ousted Home Depot's chairman and chief executive, Robert L. Nardelli, shareholders are expecting big changes at the home improvement retailing giant. … But the biggest hammer could fall on the board itself, warn some corporate governance advocates." The Times continues, "When Home Depot announced the departure of Mr. Nardelli last week, it also said that three directors — including one who has been on the board for nearly three decades — would remain on the board even though they were due to retire this spring after having reached the mandatory retirement age of 72. … Corporate governance watchdogs say the move illustrates that Home Depot's board, whose members have been criticized for their close ties to one another and to Mr. Nardelli's former employer, General Electric, is doing a poor job of succession planning for itself. … Furthermore, these critics argue that the three directors, Milledge A. Hart III, John L. Clendenin, and Claudio X. Gonzalez, played crucial roles in approving Mr. Nardelli's excessive pay package that ultimately led to his ouster." The Times adds, "The outcry over Mr. Nardelli's compensation, including his $210 million exit package, could result in another aggressive campaign to withhold votes from Home Depot's directors at the company's annual shareholder meeting this spring. … Or, if a competing slate of directors is put up against the incumbents, as one shareholder activist, Ralph V. Whitworth, has threatened to do, shareholders could throw their support to them if they believe they are qualified for the job, said Mr. Ferlauto."

DOJ_NMG_0114555

Mills May Seek Bankruptcy Filing After Accounting Probe. The Washington Post (1/10, D1, Hedgpeth, Hilzenrath) reports, "Mills Corp., the struggling shopping mall developer, said yesterday that possible misconduct by management contributed to widespread accounting errors, and the company warned that it may be forced to seek bankruptcy protection if it cannot reach agreement with its lenders." The Post continues, "Mills, of Chevy Chase, said in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission that the errors total $347 million to $352 million. The document said it remains unknown what effect the accounting corrections would have on the company's financial statements for 2005 and earlier. A company spokesman declined to elaborate yesterday." The Post adds, "Mills has not released an earnings report since the third quarter of 2005, and last year, its chief executive Laurence C. Siegel retired. It plans to restate its financial results from 2001 to 2004 and for the first three quarters of 2005. The company is under investigation by the SEC, which declined to comment on the case. … Mills issued a statement late yesterday, saying it has 'taken several important remedial steps' in the past year that include 'a near-complete change of executive management personnel.'" The Post notes, "Mills's 'overall culture and "tone at the top" were heavily focused on meeting external and internal financial expectations,' Mills said in a report summarizing the results of a long-running investigation by the audit committee of its board of directors. The report found that 'possible misconduct' played a role in its accounting troubles, including at least one instance in which management overrode a decision by the company's accounting department."

Writers Decry Options Backdating Prosecutions. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (1/10, A17), Richard Marmaro, a former federal prosecutor, and Ryan Weinstein, both attorneys at Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom who are currently representing the former CEO and chairman of Brocade Communications in connection with stock option issues, write, "Steve Jobs recently became the latest chief executive thrown into the options-timing imbroglio. … Rather than fret, investors actually bid up Apple's stock by more than $5 per share. … Given the stock bump, the board's exoneration and Mr. Jobs's lack of accounting experience, could this possibly be a case of criminal securities fraud? Believe it or not, in the minds of some prosecutors applying a far-reaching and unproven theory of fraud, it is. Just last summer, the government indicted Gregory Reyes, the former CEO of Brocade Communications, despite the fact that Mr. Reyes, like Mr. Jobs, was a non-accountant who didn't personally benefit one cent from the option grants at issue." Marmaro and Weinstein continue, "The problem with the government's theory is that it conflates books-and-records violations with criminal securities fraud. In the process, the government untethers securities fraud from the legal elements that help safeguard executives from conviction for inadvertent accounting violations resulting in little or no harm to companies or to investors. … Fundamental to American law is the notion that a defendant cannot be punished absent intent to commit a crime. Yet prosecutors are alleging that non-accountants violated an accounting rule -- known as APB 25 -- so opaque even auditors didn't understand it. Many in Silicon Valley are still scratching their heads: How can someone intentionally violate a rule that they and most others don't even comprehend? … Prosecutors and regulators have alleged just that. Not surprisingly, the first and only federal court confronting the issue so far found that APB 25 was so obscure that its violation could not demonstrate evidence of fraudulent intent as a matter of law." Marmaro and Weinstein conclude, "It is understandable, in an era when public concern is growing over rising executive compensation, that attention should be turned to stock options. Individual companies may want to reconsider how and at what volume they grant options. Yet a thoughtful look at the elements of securities fraud may help observers distinguish between accounting issues and criminal acts."

In his "Business World" column for the Wall Street Journal (1/10), Holman W. Jenkins, Jr., writes, "We can only wonder what Al Gore is making of his experience as the No. 1 defender of today's No. 1 backdating miscreant. … Mr. Gore, an Apple director, was a member of the special two-man committee that investigated and exonerated Steve Jobs in the backdating matter. By now, we presume he is well-versed in what backdating is and isn't. But how easily Mr. Gore -- the scourge of Big Pharma, etc. -- could have been the one braying about greed, CEO theft, the defrauding of shareholders." Jenkins continues, "Mr. Jobs's famed marketing magic was on display yesterday at the Macworld Expo in San Francisco. In another way, his case has performed a magical feat in prompting a few more voices to question whether backdating is really the crime of the century, or merely a business curiosity blown way out of proportion by poorly reasoned coverage. … Here and there, in the New Yorker, at the Fortune magazine Web site, in the bloggings of law Prof. Larry Ribstein and journalist John Carney, the intellectual fallacies that have permeated the coverage are gradually poked away. … No such understanding was emoted for Brocade's Greg Reyes or Comverse's Kobi Alexander, CEOs indicted in backdating scandals much like Apple's. But this is still progress." Jenkins adds, "Much reporting has made it sound like backdating was the equivalent of executives taking erasers and white-out to their paychecks to add a couple of zeroes -- and public understanding still suffers from this bum steer. But all that backdating comes down to is a nonmaterial accounting irregularity (yes, readers, accounting rules should be obeyed!) involving a defective judgment about whether "in the money" options needed to undergo expensing. … We're still at the beginning of the so-called scandal, and many executives will likely end up paying a price for this poor decision. But in no way does it implicate theft of shareholder money or even substantive accounting fraud. Here, we propose to violate a cardinal newspaper ordinance that logic should never be discussed in a newspaper. The beginning of all error was the media's unwarranted assumption, to put a fine point on it, that backdating was somebody's way of paying an employee more than, um, er, that same somebody intended (er, sputter, gurgle)."

DOJ_NMG_0114556

CRIMINAL LAW:

House Report Contradicts DOJ On Archives Document Theft. The Washington Post (1/10, A4, Smith) reports, "The Justice Department and the National Archives improperly assured the Sept. 11 commission that its members had access to all relevant materials about the Clinton administration's terrorism policies, without knowing if original, uncopied documents had been removed from the archives by former national security adviser Samuel R. 'Sandy' Berger, a Republican congressional report said yesterday." The Post continues, "The report, issued by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), accused both agencies of inadequately investigating the theft Berger admitted had occurred on two occasions in 2003. It quoted two Archives officials as saying that they had no way of knowing whether Berger took other documents from the files during two earlier visits." The Post adds, "Davis is the former chairman of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform. He issued the report after Republican staff members conducted interviews with Archives and Justice Department officials and gained access to unredacted material from a probe by the National Archives inspector general. … His report includes new details of what Berger did, and how the Archives staff, the Justice Department and the FBI reacted to the discovery of missing documents. It depicts Berger as aggressively insisting during his visits to the Archives that he be left alone with the documents, giving him what he later admitted was a calculated opportunity to hide the papers in his clothing." The Post notes, "The report also depicts Berger as lying to Archives staff about thefts that an unnamed senior Archives official said had made her and her staff feel 'almost physically ill.' It said Berger knowingly made false statements to the media after word of the FBI probe surfaced and improperly allowed a spokesman, Joe Lockhart, to depict him as a victim in the affair. … The Justice Department said yesterday that it had no evidence Berger's actions had deprived the commission of any documents."

The AP (1/10, Margasak) reports, "Davis' report quoted Noel Hillman, then-chief of the department's Public Integrity Section, as stating at the time of the 2005 plea that Berger did not have an intent to hide any of the documents or conceal facts from the commission." The AP adds, "Matt Bennett, a spokesman for Berger attorney Lanny Breuer, said, 'I can state unequivocally that no documents were withheld, and that all documents that Mr. Berger took were disclosed to the Justice Department and the inspector general of the archives.'"

The Washington Times (1/10, Seper) reports, "Mr. Davis described the Justice Department's assertion that Mr. Berger's statements were credible after being caught as 'misplaced.' He said, 'One wouldn't rely on the fox to be truthful after being nabbed in the henhouse. But the Justice Department apparently did.' … Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said the department 'has no evidence that Sandy Berger's actions deprived the 9/11 commission of documents, and we stand by our investigation of this matter.'"

House Committees Delay Response To Cunningham Subpoenas. The AP (1/10, Werner) reports, "Three House committees are delaying responding to grand jury subpoenas issued in connection with the bribery case against jailed former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham." The AP continues, "The subpoenas were issued to the Appropriations, Armed Services and Intelligence committees by the federal grand jury in San Diego that has been considering evidence in a defense contracting investigation stemming from the Cunningham case." The AP adds, "The subpoenas set a Jan. 11 deadline for compliance but prosecutors and House lawyers have agreed to extend that until Jan. 31, congressional staffers said Tuesday. … 'The initial deadline was 'obviously impossible to meet,' said Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey, D-Wis. 'I just got the job.' … 'We essentially have to dig into Republican files. We have no idea what's in there,' Obey said." The AP notes, "The subpoenas for documents were disclosed in the Dec. 27 edition of the Congressional Record by the committee chairmen, as required by House rules. Those Republican chairmen have since handed over power to Democrats who now control the House. … Rep. Peter Hoekstra of Michigan, top Republican on the House Intelligence Committee, wouldn't say what the subpoenas ask for, but said he was concerned the scope was overly broad."

DOJ_NMG_0114557

New Orleans Attempts To Curb Crime Wave. The AP (1/10) reports from New Orleans, "Mayor Ray Nagin, his hurricane-stricken city under siege by a crime wave that has claimed nine lives since the start of 2007, stopped short of imposing a curfew but said police will set up checkpoints in early-morning hours when about one-third of the city's violent crime occurs." The AP continues, "The checkpoints, scheduled to start Wednesday, would operate between 2 a.m. and 6 a.m. and target drug and alcohol violations as well as motorist insurance. The first one was to be held in a crime-ridden area of the city. … Increased foot patrols, using 20-25 sheriff's deputies to supplement police, increasing the number of surveillance cameras in high-crime areas and speeding homicide cases through the court system were other elements of Nagin's plan to attack crime." The AP adds, "A curfew had been opposed by the city's tourism leaders, who said businesses struggling since Hurricane Katrina could be further hurt. While Nagin did not declare a curfew, he said the message to citizens was to stay off the streets in high-crime areas and in early morning hours. … Nagin, acknowledging the criminal justice breakdown extended beyond the police force, said a corps of volunteers will be recruited to monitor homicide cases moving through the courts." The AP notes, "Gov. Kathleen Blanco said today that her office has been talking with New Orleans police for almost two months about a plan to curb the violence and made a formal request for one a couple of weeks ago as a prelude to additional state funding."

Landrieu Seeks Federal Help With Rising New Orleans Violent Crime. The Washington Times (1/10, Pierce) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, Sen. Mary Landrieu "said yesterday that Congress can -- and should -- do more to help stop the recent wave of violent crime plaguing New Orleans. Landrieu urged adoption of her 10-point plan, which grants federal funds and beefs up drug and violence task forces disrupted by Hurricane Katrina in 2005. She sent a letter to President Bush asking that his budget include funds to double the size of a Drug Enforcement Administration task force and an FBI gang task force."

The Baton Rouge Advocate (1/10) writes, "In both her letter to the president and in her crime-fighting plan, Landrieu asked that more FBI and Drug Enforcement Administration agents be sent to New Orleans. She called for doubling the size of the DEA's High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area Task Force Group and the FBI's Violent Gang Safe Streets Task Force."

WGNO-TV, ABC 26, New Orleans (1/10, Murphy) reports, "The murder rate in the Big Easy is now four and a half times the national average. .. 'There is no doubt that this crime wave is putting a damper on our aggressive efforts to rebuild and re-image the city and to encourage not only residents to return, but tourists to continue to come,' said Senator Mary Landrieu/D-Louisiana." WGNO-TV adds, "Senator Landrieu announced a 10-point plan to fight crime in the New Orleans region. … She is asking for additional federal dollars to help rebuild criminal justice facilities like NOPD headquarters and the local police academy. … The senator is also requesting 60-million dollars to help rebuild the police department. … 'I urge the President and the Department of Justice to make an emergency grant to the city under the emergency cops program,' said Landrieu." WGNO-TV notes, "LSenator Landrieu is also asking the Justice Department to send additional drug enforcement and FBI agents to New Orleans. … FBI Special Agent in Charge Jim Bernazzani says those plans are already in the works. … 'Washington has committed to do a national canvass relative to agents who have homicide investigative experience,' said Bernazzani. 'To come to New Orleans on temporary status for about 90 to 120 days to work as a stop gap measure until we get another squad down here.' … The United States Attorney in New Orleans Jim Letten says the city must also address issues outside of law enforcement. … 'Fixing our school system and building the best system possible and rebuilding this economy,' said Letten. 'We have to create education and opportunities for our youth if we're going to get a handle on this thing for the mid and long term.'"

KTBC-TV, Austin, TX (1/9, 5:00 p.m.) broadcasted that Louisiana Sen. Mary Landrieu is "asking the Feds for help." She says "she has written to President Bush and will personally call Attorney General Alberto Gonzales." She continued, "Louisiana has not just been sitting around in New Orleans doing nothing but again we're in a very tough and unprecedented situation and not only need to step up and do our part but ask the Federal agencies to do more if they can and I think they can New Orleans officials are worried crime will deter tourists from Mardi Gras, which is just over a month away." WSJV-TV, South Bend, Elkhart, IN (1/9, 5:00 p.m.)

DOJ_NMG_0114558

broadcasted, "New Orleans leaders are worried the crime wave will keep tourists away from the city with Mardi Gras coming up next month."

First Lady Addresses Murder Wave During New Orleans Visit. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (1/10, Williams) reports First Lady Laura Bush "entered the brightly lighted theater of the Louisiana Children's Museum in the Warehouse District on Tuesday afternoon and without hesitation picked up a drumstick and a Senegalese songba drum, joining dozens of New Orleans-area elementary school students in a rousing performance of a funga, an African welcome song." Bush "smiled broadly as she pounded the drum and studied the faces of the children, who were among the many she met on a three-stop tour, her 11th post-Katrina visit to the city. … Her tour also included a lunch of catfish and greens and conversation at Cafe Reconcile, a job-training restaurant in the heart of Central City." The NOTP notes Bush's visit "was not without reference to the city's recent crime wave. She mentioned an antiviolence program used in Chicago that is based on the notion that violence is taught. 'If you grow up in a neighborhood where violence is common, you think it's normal,' Bush said. 'Because violence is taught, it can be unlearned. 'But I think people in the community really need to speak out and do whatever they can to get the message across that it's not acceptable,' she said."

Judge Jails New Orleans Public Defender For Contempt. The New York Times (1/10, Drew) reports from New Orleans, "The chief judge in the city's juvenile courts had a top public defender arrested Tuesday in a bizarre escalation of a fight over changes in the city's troubled program for representing indigent defendants." The Times continues, "The judge, David Bell, was upset that no public defender was in his courtroom when he was ready to start this morning, and he drove to the defender's office and waited outside for Stephen Singer, the chief of trials, to arrive. … The judge took Mr. Singer to his courtroom, where he found him in contempt for not being prepared to provide representation and ordered him jailed for 36 days, three days for each of the 12 items on Tuesday's docket. Mr. Singer then spent about five hours in jail before a state appeals court stayed the order." The Times adds, "The events were the latest in a series of confrontations between judges and the public defender's office, which has long been overwhelmed and went broke after Hurricane Katrina. … A new board has shifted how the office uses its 30 lawyers to try to provide more thorough representation on the most serious cases. But the changes have made the day-to-day coverage more spotty, and the criminal court judges also have threatened to hold the office in contempt over the problems."

Former Interior Deputy Is Target In Abramoff Probe. The Washington Post (1/10, A3, Schmidt) reports, "Federal prosecutors have notified a former deputy secretary of the interior, J. Steven Griles, that he is a target in the public corruption investigation of Jack Abramoff's lobbying activities, sources knowledgeable about the probe said." The Post continues, "The sources, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said that among the possible criminal charges being investigated is whether Griles made false statements to the Senate Indian Affairs Committee in 2005 about job discussions Abramoff initiated while Griles was deputy secretary. … Justice Department prosecutors met with Griles on Friday to outline possible charges. The investigation has examined donations made by Abramoff's Indian tribal clients to an environmental advocacy group run by Italia Federici, who was involved with Griles socially, the sources said. Also under scrutiny are donations made to Federici's group by energy and mining companies, the sources said." The Post adds, "E-mails released last year by the Senate Indian Affairs Committee showed that Griles had more than half a dozen contacts with Abramoff or with Federici, head of the Council of Republicans for Environmental Advocacy, who was working as the lobbyist's go-between to Griles. Griles has said that he never tried to intercede on behalf of Abramoff's clients. … The Indian Affairs Committee, in a report issued after a series of investigative hearings, said that further inquiry 'appears warranted' into the 'veracity' of Federici's public testimony. Federici's testimony before the committee included discussions of her relationship with Abramoff, his tribal clients and Griles."

Abramoff's Interior Connection Sentenced To Two Years Probation. NBC News (1/10, Seidman) reports, "A former Interior Department official linked to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff was sentenced Tuesday in federal court to two years probation and a fine of $1000. The official, Roger Stillwell, pleaded guilty to a single misdemeanor count of filing a false financial statement with the department." NBC continues, "Magistrate Judge Alan Kay disregarded a recommendation by both the Department of Justice and Stillwell's attorney for a lesser sentence of six months probation. … Judge Kay said that Stillwell's actions amounted to a 'serious violation considering his position' and his years of government service. Kay admonished Stillwell saying there is 'no such thing as a free lunch, particularly as provided by lobbyists.'" NBC adds, "The charges against Stillwell are the first connected to the Abramoff scandal to touch the Interior Department. The charges also mark an expansion of the government's investigation into the influence peddling scandal involving the convicted lobbyist. Prosecutors acknowledged in court that there is still an ongoing investigation involving Abramoff and his contacts with the Department of Interior. … Stillwell, a former desk officer for the Commonwealth of the Northern Marianas - a lucrative Abramoff client - acknowledged receiving four tickets to a Redskins football game and two tickets to a Simon and Garfunkle concert in Washington - all paid for by Abramoff - which Stillwell did not report."

DOJ_NMG_0114559

Judge Rejects Media Request For Libby Trial Audio Recordings. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/10) reports US District Judge Reggie Walton "said Tuesday he would not make available daily audio recordings of the upcoming trial of Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff," Lewis "Scooter" Libby. "News organizations had asked that recordings of testimony and arguments be released for broadcast," but Walton said in his ruling that "the only recording of court proceedings is done by the court stenographer to help ensure an accurate transcript. … Broadcasting court proceedings -- along with commentary and analysis -- could prejudice jurors and lead to an unfair trial, Walton said."

Lack Of Cooperation From Agencies Prompted FBI To Quit Leak Probes. Under the headline "Leak Probes Stymied, FBI Memos Show," the New York Sun (1/10, Gerstein) reports, "A lack of cooperation from one or more intelligence agencies led the FBI to abandon several recent criminal investigations into leaks of classified information to the press, records obtained by The New York Sun indicate." The Sun adds, "In an exchange of e-mails in September 2005, FBI agents handling a leak investigation codenamed 'May Apple,' complained about difficulties in getting basic information about who saw classified documents key to the case. … A few weeks later, the head of the FBI's leak-sleuthing section, Michael Donner, wrote to the Justice Department's counterespionage chief, John Dion, asking to close the probe. The FBI's Washington field office 'concluded that the investigation had languished due to repeated requests for information…that have not been fulfilled in a timely manner,' Mr. Donner wrote." In an interview yesterday with the Sun, Donner, now retired, "acknowledged some instances where agencies were not enthusiastic about helping the FBI." He "said the current drive to share intelligence information made his job even harder." The Sun notes, "The friction apparent in the records…calls into question assurances by senior government officials that law enforcement and the intelligence community are working hand-in-glove to ferret out leaks." On its Web site, the Sun also provides a link to copies of the documents.

Judge Appoints Federal Prosecutor To Help Israeli Criminal Probe. The Mobile (AL) Register (1/10, Kirby) reports, "A federal judge in Mobile last week appointed Assistant U.S. Attorney George May to assist the Israeli government with a criminal investigation that touches southern Alabama." The Register continues, "As a commissioner of the court, May will gather information under a treaty between the United States and Israel that commits law enforcement officials to helping their counterparts when investigations cross international borders. … Chief U.S. District Judge Ginny Granade's order empowers May to collect documents and subpoena witnesses. He will certify and submit the evidence he gathers to the U.S. Department of Justice's Office of International Affairs." The Register adds, "The judge's order states only that it was prompted by a request by Israel. May, the anti-terrorism coordinator at the U.S. attorney's office in Mobile, said the probe relates to allegations involving bogus diplomas. … He said the Alabama connection is a small piece of a much larger investigation that also involves other parts of the country. Citing the beginning stages of the investigation, he declined to discuss the case in detail. He said the Israeli government has sought help from federal prosecutors in other districts. … May said he does not believe the targets of the probe live in Alabama." The Register notes, "The United States has signed 57 mutual legal assistance treaties, although not all have been ratified by the Senate, according to the Justice Department. … Bryan Sierra, a spokesman for the department, said most of the pacts are bilateral agreements with other countries, but others involve international organizations. For instance, the United States has a treaty with the Organization of American States, a collection of 35 countries in the Western Hemisphere, he said. … Sierra said the Justice Department does not keep statistics on the number of requests made by foreign governments, and he added that he could not even estimate how frequently a treaty is invoked."

Former New Jersey Mayor Pleads Guilty To Taking Bribes. The Newark Star-Ledger (1/9, Sterling, Spoto) reported that on Monday, "A mayor who presided over a period of substantial growth in Brick Township…admitted taking more than $5,000 in bribes in exchange for helping a developer gain approval for a number of unspecified projects." Joseph C. Scarpelli "told a federal judge he accepted the bribes over five years." The Star-Ledger noted, "Court papers provided few de tails about the bribes, and law enforcement agents were equally quiet after court." FBI Newark SAC Leslie G. Wiser Jr. "showed up for the plea but also offered little information. When asked if the bureau considered Scarpelli a 'big fish' in its continuing probe of official corruption in New Jersey, Wiser said: 'Every public official is important to us, as is maintaining the integrity of the system.' He did note the FBI and U.S. Attorney's Office have had particular success making cases against public officials in Monmouth and Ocean counties of late, though he said there also are corruption cases in the pipeline from other counties."

DOJ_NMG_0114560

Former Committeeman Loses Appeal Of Bribery Conviction. In a front-page story, the Holmdel (NJ) Independent (1/10, Bowes) reports, "Former Middletown Committeeman Raymond O'Grady lost his appeal on Friday and is now scheduled to begin his 43-month jail sentence Jan. 22. O'Grady was convicted in June on five corruption-related charges as part of the FBI's Operation Bid Rig investigation. The one-time director of the Monmouth County Central Motor Pool was found guilty of accepting at least $8,000 in cash bribes in exchange for official favors through his position in county government." The Independent notes defense lawyer Kevin Roe "argued that O'Grady's trial was unfair because of the suicide attempt of the FBI's star witness after only one day on the stand."

Tennessee Waltz Trial Jurors See FBI Video Of Alleged Bribe. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (1/10, Buser, 163K) reports, "A federal court jury Tuesday watched a secretly recorded videotape showing a former Shelby County official accepting $1,500 in cash from an informant that authorities say was a bribe. The money -- 15 $100 bills -- was supplied by the FBI, as was the tiny camera hidden in a briefcase." Calvin Williams "says he believed the payment was a legitimate business dividend due him from his associate, Tim Willis." The Commercial Appeal notes, "Williams is accused of using -- or claiming to use -- his influence with the County Commission to secure a $100,000 county grant for the Glenview Neighborhood Development Partners Inc. to provide low-interest loans for home improvements." Federal public defender Doris Randle-Holt "said Willis was a partner with Williams in several businesses and that the $1,500 represented Williams' 30 percent share of a $5,000 media services contract Willis had with Glenview to help win the grant. Willis testified, however, that they shared office space…but that their business enterprises were completely separate. Randle-Holt noted that Willis was paid $6,000 a month by the FBI for more than two years for his cooperation and that he had never been charged for admittedly submitting false invoices in 2001 when he had a consulting contact at Juvenile Court."

Judge Rejects Dixon's Bid For Release From Prison Pending Appeal. WMC-TV Memphis (1/9) reported on its Web site, "A handwritten plea from Roscoe Dixon, sent in December from his cell at the Oakdale Correctional Center in Louisiana, proved fruitless. Federal Magistrate Jon McCalla denied Dixon's request to be released pending his appeal of his federal bribery trial. In his letter, Dixon -- who was sentenced to five years behind bars -- describes overcrowding conditions which have, according to his letter, left him in solitary confinement until space becomes available. He has 'to eat the same food as those who are in "the hole,"' he wrote."

FBI Arrests California College Official On Bribery Charges. The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Lin, 850K) reports, "Federal agents arrested a UC Riverside administrator Tuesday on suspicion of bribing a general contractor in charge of building the school's new psychology building, authorities said." UCR Office of Design and Construction Associate Director Theodore Chiu "is accused of soliciting a $50,000 bribe from Irvine contractor FTR International Inc. last Halloween. Chiu allegedly asked for the payment when the company's president, Nizar Katbi, raised concerns about the $35-million project, including Chiu's choice of a subcontractor, according to an FBI affidavit filed in federal court. In exchange for the alleged bribe, Chiu agreed to sign a change order that would modify the university's original agreement with the company, the affidavit said." The Times notes, "Katbi cooperated with investigators by recording his meetings and conversations with Chiu, said Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles."

Judge Rejects Devecchio Bid For Federal Trial. The AP (1/10) reports, "A former FBI agent accused of helping a ruthless mobster plot gangland slayings in Brooklyn more than a decade ago won't go to trial in federal court, a judge ruled Tuesday. Attorneys for R. Lindley DeVecchio had argued his case belonged in federal court because there -- unlike in state court -- they would be allowed to argue that he was immune from criminal charges arising from his duties as a federal agent." The AP notes, "The Brooklyn district attorney's office had fought to keep the case in state court after charging DeVecchio last year with four counts of murder in what it billed as one of the worst law enforcement corruption cases in U.S. history." The New York Times (1/10, Brick) also reports the ruling in "Metro Briefing."

9th Circuit Panel Rules Gang Attorneys Cannot Have Access To Witness Identities. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/10, B - 2, Egelko) reports, "Federal prosecutors in the death penalty trial of alleged members of a violent San Francisco gang don't have to give defense lawyers police reports that identify witnesses before the trial, a federal appeals court ruled Monday." The Chronicle continues, "The 2-1 decision by the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco overturned a ruling last year by the trial judge, who ordered prosecutors to release police reports on the witnesses, including their identities. U.S. District Judge William Alsup had also said prosecutors would be prohibited from calling witnesses whose names they refused to provide to the defense." The Chronicle adds, "Prosecutors say they fear for the witnesses' safety if they are identified, citing the killing in May of a witness who had testified in another San Francisco murder case. Defense lawyers and Alsup said prospective witnesses would be protected by orders prohibiting the defense from revealing the information to outsiders. … A federal grand jury issued racketeering indictments in October 2005 against 12 alleged members of the Down Below Gang, which authorities say has terrorized the Sunnydale public housing complex in Visitacion Valley since the late 1990s. Prosecutors say the defendants dealt drugs, toted guns and murdered seven people, including a 7-week-old baby." The Chronicle notes, "Eight defendants pleaded guilty last month to racketeering and conspiracy charges that carry prison sentences of up to 23 years. Of the remaining defendants, one is a fugitive and has not been publicly identified. The others are Emile Fort and Edgar Diaz, who could both be sentenced to death if convicted, and Terrell Jackson, whose case is still being evaluated by the U.S. Justice Department for possible death penalty charges. Their trial is scheduled to start in September."

DOJ_NMG_0114561

Grand Jury Mulls Idaho Kidnapping, Murder Charges. The AP (1/10, Dininny) reports from Boise, ID, "A decision on whether to indict convicted murderer Joseph Duncan III on federal charges for kidnapping two north Idaho children and slaying one of them could come in the next few weeks, the U.S. attorney's office said Tuesday. … In the meantime, the federal agency that secures prisoners said it would recommend that the trial be held in Boise, rather than Coeur d'Alene, if a grand jury indicts Duncan." The AP continues, "Duncan, 43, drew national attention in 2005 with the kidnapping of then 8-year-old Shasta Groene and her 9-year-old brother, Dylan. … A Tacoma, Wash., native, Duncan had been living in Fargo, N.D., and was on the run from a child molestation charge in Minnesota when he drove past the Groene home on Interstate 90 east of Coeur d'Alene and spotted the children playing outside. Duncan stalked the family for several days and, on May 16, entered the home, bludgeoning the children's mother, Brenda Groene; her fiance, Mark McKenzie and Groene's 13-year-old son, Slade." The AP adds, "According to court documents, Duncan kidnapped Shasta and Dylan, traveling into the mountains near St. Regis, Mont., where he sexually abused them for seven weeks before killing Dylan. … Shasta was rescued when she and Duncan walked into a restaurant in Coeur d'Alene early on the morning of July 2, 2005. … Duncan pleaded guilty in state court last year to three counts of first-degree murder and three counts of first-degree kidnapping for the murders at the Groene home. A judge sentenced him to life in prison without parole on the kidnapping charges. … However, the sentence on the murder counts will be deferred while the federal government pursues its case against Duncan for the kidnappings and murder across state lines."

Los Angeles To Shift Anti-Gang Tactics. The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Mcgreevy, Winton) reports, "Los Angeles' top law enforcement officials have agreed on a new attack on gang violence, one that focuses more enforcement on smaller neighborhood gangs and uses a new legal tool tried last year on skid row." The Times continues, "The effort comes as L.A. officials are trying to quell a 14% increase in gang-related crime during the last year, marked by several high-profile incidents of race-motivated violence. … LAPD Chief William J. Bratton met this week with Dist. Atty. Steve Cooley and representatives of City Atty. Rocky Delgadillo to begin formulating the plan." The Times adds, "Bratton announced Tuesday that his department is developing a 'Top 10' list of gangs to target based on a complex formula — and then the three agencies will devote additional officers and attorneys specifically to those gangs. … The campaign will include targeting the leaders and headquarters of the worst gangs. … Police have identified 720 street gangs in Los Angeles, with 39,315 members. But officials said a small number of them are causing a disproportionate amount of crime in the hardest-hit neighborhoods. … The new strategy is something of a shift for law enforcement officials, who have until now focused much attention on larger gangs that run drug rings and other criminal enterprises."

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Dismisses Challenge To VA's Use Of Religion In Veteran's Treatment. The AP (1/9, Foley) reports from Madison, WI, "The Department of Veterans Affairs' increasing use of religion in treating ailing veterans does not violate the separation of church and state, a federal judge has ruled." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge John Shabaz dismissed a lawsuit by the Madison-based Freedom From Religion Foundation and defended the agency's practices in his decision Monday, saying religion can help patients heal and is legal when done on a voluntary basis. … The foundation, a group of atheists and agnostics which has challenged the Bush administration's mix of government and religion, said it was the first time a judge upheld the constitutionality of the VA's use of religion in treating millions of veterans. The ruling averts a trial that was scheduled to begin later this month. … The group's president, Annie Laurie Gaylor, said Tuesday it would appeal the ruling." The AP adds, "The lawsuit challenged the agency's practice of giving most patients spiritual assessments that ask questions about faith, such as how often they attend church and how important religion is in their lives. Agency officials say the assessments help them determine patients' needs. … The suit also targeted VA drug and alcohol treatment programs that incorporate religion, the integration of its chaplain program into patient care and the expansion of chaplain services for outpatient veterans instead of just those at VA hospitals." The AP notes, "The veterans' agency, which treated 5.3 million people at its facilities in 2005, acknowledged it believes spirituality should be integrated into care but said it allows patients to decide whether that involves religion. … Jean Lin, a U.S. Department of Justice lawyer who represented the veterans' officials, declined comment. DOJ spokesman Charles Miller said the opinion speaks for itself."

DOJ_NMG_0114562

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Jury Continues Deliberations In Texas Smuggling Death Trial. The AP (1/10, Lozano) reports from Houston, "Jurors deliberated today without deciding whether to impose a death sentence for the truck driver in the nation's deadliest human smuggling attempt, in which 19 illegal immigrants who were locked in a sweltering trailer for hours eventually died from dehydration, overheating and suffocation. … The six men and six women on the jury deliberated for about six hours today. They were to resume Wednesday." The AP continues, "Jurors must decide whether to sentence Tyrone Williams to death or life in prison without parole, or to let the judge issue a sentence ranging from no incarceration time to life in prison without parole. … Williams was convicted last month on 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting immigrants, including 20 counts that were death-penalty eligible." The AP adds, "During the 2003 smuggling attempt, more than 70 immigrants were packed inside Williams' trailer, with no air conditioning. … They were heading from South Texas to Houston when the heat became unbearable and the immigrants began to panic, tearing holes in the trailer doors with their hands in order to breathe. Williams eventually opened the trailer doors and abandoned the container near Victoria, about 100 miles southwest of Houston. … Defense attorney Craig Washington told jurors Williams never intended for the immigrants to die. Washington said it was unfair that Williams was the only defendant in the case who is facing the death penalty when others were equally responsible. … But Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Rodriguez told jurors Williams had no compassion and he deserves to die because he alone could have freed them but chose not to open the trailer's doors."

DOJ Rules Against Appointment Of Alabama County Commissioner. The Mobile Press-Register (AL) (1/9, Murtaugh) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice on Monday objected to Gov. Bob Riley's appointment of Juan Chastang to the Mobile County Commission, saying it 'appears to diminish the opportunity of minority voters to elect a representative of their choice.'" The Press-Register continues, "The decision is the latest step in a long legal battle designed to oust Chastang, a black Republican, from representing District 1, a majority-black district that has historically elected Democrats. … Riley appointed Chastang to replace Sam Jones on the commission after Jones was elected mayor of Mobile in October 2005." The Press-Register adds, "Cecil Gardner, the attorney who filed the lawsuit against Chastang's appointment, said he will file a motion today asking that a panel of federal judges in Montgomery declare Chastang's seat vacant and order a special election to fill it. … The state can still appeal the Justice Department decision to the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia or ask the U.S. attorney general to reconsider the objection, according to the ruling."

WPMI-TV, NBC 15, Mobile, AL (1/10) reports, "According to the Justice Department, that appointment may have violated the federal Voting Rights Act. .. 'We predicted quite accurately that the governor would appoint a Republican. That commission district has never voted Republican in the entire history of the county commission,' says Cecil Gardner who initially brought the lawsuit over Chastang's appointment a year and a half ago. Tuesday, he filed a motion asking a federal court to order the seat vacated and that a special election be conducted 'Representatives of the people ought to be elected by the people and not chosen by executive fiat,' Gardner maintains. … But Chastang says the legal fight to get him out of office isn't' about the people. 'Partisan politics is what this whole thing is all about right now.'"

Michigan Islamic Group Urges FBI Probe Of Shiite Mosque Vandalism. The AP (1/10, Karoub) reports, "An Islamic coalition representing southeast Michigan Sunni groups and centers said Tuesday that the vandalism of Shiite mosques and businesses over the weekend could be hate crimes and called on the federal government to investigate. Late Saturday night or early Sunday, vandals broke windows of two mosques and five businesses…owned by Iraqi Shiites." Detroit Police Sgt. Eren Stephens Bell "said the department is investigating the vandalism and could not confirm if the incidents were hate crimes. … The FBI said in a statement Tuesday that it has talked to the Council on American-Islamic Relations and leaders of other community groups. If the Detroit police find information that links the vandalism to federal civil-rights violations, the FBI would 'pursue it accordingly.'"

DOJ Asked To Help Fight Anti-Arab Bigotry. UPI (1/10) reports that Arab American leaders have urged U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "to fight anti-Arab bigotry. … 'In response to concerns about the increasing level of negativity openly directed towards Arab and Muslim Americans, leaders from the Arab American Institute and other key Arab American and Muslim American organizations met with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to request that the federal government help quell the recent tide of bigotry,' the Washington-based AAI said in a statement Monday. … 'AAI and leaders from the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, Muslim Public Affairs Council, Islamic Society of North America and Muslim advocates also sought clarification and action on policies concerning racial profiling, suspension of habeas corpus, oversight of watch lists, and donations to charities in the Middle East,' the statement said." UPI adds, "AAI said the delegation 'also urged the attorney general to support the termination of the National Security Entry-Exit Registration System or 'special registration,' a program that began as an initiative of the Justice Department.' … AAI Chairman George Salem and AAI President James Zogby also requested (the department) to 'provide leadership for the country in helping to reverse this disturbing and increasingly accepted trend of anti-Arab and Muslim bias,' the statement said."

DOJ_NMG_0114563

LAPD Board Will Not Punish Officer In Fatal Shooting Of Teen. The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Lait, Glover) reports, "A Los Angeles Police Department disciplinary board has secretly decided not to punish the officer who fatally shot 13-year-old Devin Brown two years ago, rejecting an earlier ruling by the civilian Police Commission that the act violated department policy, sources confirmed Tuesday." The Times continues, "Members of an LAPD Board of Rights, meeting behind closed doors on Monday, determined that Officer Steven Garcia was justified in shooting Brown as the youth allegedly tried to back a stolen car into the officer following a brief pursuit." The Times adds, "The shooting sparked outrage in the surrounding South Los Angeles community, with citizens and activists alleging that Garcia overreacted and used excessive force. Last year the city paid $1.5 million to settle a wrongful death lawsuit filed by Brown's family. .. .Monday's decision, reached by two high-ranking LAPD officials and a civilian representative, effectively negates the earlier finding by the Police Commission that the shooting was 'out of policy' and that Garcia should be punished. … It also reflects a dramatic change in the way the LAPD metes out discipline. For decades, the LAPD has heard evidence publicly when serious misconduct is alleged. Last summer, however, the California Supreme Court ruled that police officer personnel documents were not public records. Responding to that ruling — and over the objections of news organizations and civil libertarians — the LAPD moved to close its disciplinary hearings."

NYTimes Applauds Spitzer's Move On Inmates' Calls. The New York Times (1/10, 1.16M) editorializes that Gov. Eliot Spitzer "set an important national example this week when he announced that the state corrections department would back away from a longstanding policy of charging prison inmates and their families more than six times the going rate for collect calls made from prison."

ANTITRUST:

Newspapers Plan Joint Sales Of Web Site Advertisements. The Wall Street Journal (1/10, A1, Angwin) reports, "The nation's three largest newspaper publishers are gearing up to sell advertising jointly on their newspapers' Web sites, believing their survival depends on seizing new online revenue." The Journal continues, "Gannett Co., McClatchy Co. and Tribune Co. are planning to offer advertisers one-stop shopping for display ads on Internet sites. The goal is to attract big advertisers such as car makers and phone companies that want to reach a nationwide online audience but don't want the hassle of negotiating ad deals with each company or newspaper." The Journal adds, "The joint effort, code-named 'Open Network,' marks a big new bid to win back advertisers that are defecting in droves to the Web. Currently, national advertisers buy the bulk of their online display ads -- banners and boxes -- from big portals such as Yahoo Inc., Time Warner Inc.'s AOL or Microsoft Corp.'s MSN. Yahoo has announced plans to work with seven other newspaper publishers to build a similar one-stop-shopping spot for advertisers. Google Inc. has also reaped a bonanza with advertising links that appear next to search results. … The three newspaper companies, known in the industry as GMT, are likely to each contribute 10% of their online-advertising space to the network, according to people familiar with the situation. They hope to announce something early this year, although the deal isn't finalized and could still fall apart." The Journal notes, "The venture is designed to help the chains tackle a vexing problem: They have long had trouble attracting national advertisers. In their print editions, this is largely because of price. Newspapers can jack up ad prices for local retailers that have few other ways to reach a hometown audience. But national advertisers often find it cheaper to buy a TV spot or magazine ad than to buy space in dozens of newspapers. National advertisers also account for about 75% of advertising on the Internet, according to PricewaterhouseCoopers. … Efforts by the chains to coordinate their print-advertising sales have shown little success, partly because individual papers weren't enthusiastic about standardizing ad sizes or giving up control of their relationships with advertisers. But with the industry under severe stress, that reluctance to band together may change."

Senate Plans Hearing On Impact Of Airline Merger. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/10, Grantham) reports, "Prompted by US Airways' bid to acquire Delta Air Lines and merger talk at other carriers, the U.S. Senate

DOJ_NMG_0114564

Commerce Committee has scheduled a hearing later this month on the likely effects of a potential wave of airline mergers." The AJC continues, "The Jan. 24 hearing will be on the state of the airline industry and the "potential impact of airline mergers and industry consolidation," the committee said Tuesday in a press release. … Then-Delta Chief Executive Leo Mullin testified to the same committee in hearings shortly after the 9/11 terrorist attacks. Congress later approved a multibillion-dollar aid bill after airlines were temporarily grounded in response to the 2001 attack." The AJC adds, "Congress had been expected to weigh in on the airline merger issue, although the U.S. Justice Department would have to independently review any combinations. After US Airways' hostile $8 billion-plus bid for Delta in November, local and national politicians from Atlanta and communities that would be affected expressed concern about the deal. … Delta management opposes the proposal but its bankruptcy court creditors will have the final say."

Micron Settles Chip Antitrust Suit. Bloomberg (1/10, Gullo) reports, "Micron Technology Inc., the biggest U.S. memory chip maker, said it cut previously reported first-quarter earnings by as much as $80 million to reflect a settlement resolving claims it conspired to fix chip prices." Bloomberg continues, "The accord resolves private antitrust lawsuits filed over U.S. sales of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, from 1999 to 2002. The claims were brought by manufacturers and individuals alleging that a price-fixing conspiracy drove up costs for the chips, a memory component used in personal computers, laptops and video game consoles. … 'It is expected that the settlement will result' in a reduction 'in an amount not to exceed $80 million,' Micron said today in a statement." Bloomberg adds, "Micron has been in settlement talks to end similar claims by state attorneys general who sued the company and other DRAM makers in July, said company spokesman Dan Francisco. The private antitrust suits against chip makers stemmed from a 2002 Justice Department probe of the DRAM market. Micron cooperated with U.S. officials in exchange for not being charged with a crime. … The settlement dismisses Micron from the class action, or group lawsuit, originally filed in San Francisco federal court. The accord is subject to court approval."

Congress To Take Up Net Neutrality Bills. The New York Times (1/10, Labaton, 1.16M) reports, "Senior lawmakers, emboldened by the recent restrictions on AT&T and the change in control of Congress, have begun drafting legislation that would prevent high-speed Internet companies from charging content providers for priority access." The "first significant so-called net neutrality legislation of the new Congressional session was introduced Tuesday by Senator Byron L. Dorgan, Democrat of South Dakota, and Senator Olympia J. Snowe of Maine, one of the few Republicans in Congress to support such a measure." Rep. Ed Markey, Chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Telecommunications and the Internet, "said recently that he would introduce legislation soon and planned to hold hearings." But the "proposals face significant political impediments and no one expects that they will be adopted quickly," and the debate "promises to be a bonanza for lobbyists and a fund-raising tool for lawmakers. It pits Internet giants like Google, Yahoo, eBay and Amazon, which support the legislation, against telecommunication titans like Verizon, AT&T and large cable companies like Comcast."

Aloha Airlines Takes Mesa To Court. The AP (1/10) reports, "Aloha Airlines announced that it will pursue further legal action against Mesa Air Group Inc. in federal court." The AP continues, "Aloha sued Mesa in state court in October, alleging the Phoenix-based company improperly used data it obtained as a potential investor to try to drive Aloha out of business. … 'Upon further legal review of the federal antitrust laws, and given findings of federal Bankruptcy Judge Robert Faris in the Hawaiian Airlines matter, we believe our claims would be best pursued in the federal court system,' David A. Banmiller, Aloha's president and chief executive, said Monday. 'Aloha will continue to proceed vigorously against Mesa to stop the illegal and improper conduct.'" The AP adds, "Mesa, which had been considering investing in Aloha when the island carrier was undergoing bankruptcy reorganization, launched go! airlines in June as a competing carrier in Hawaii, entering the market dominated for decades by Hawaiian and Aloha airlines. … Hawaiian, now a unit of Hawaiian Holdings Inc., sued Mesa in February for the alleged illegal use of confidential information and trade secrets obtained during Hawaiian's Chapter 11 bankruptcy proceedings,"

FTC Gives Antitrust Nod To Hain-Avalon Deal. The AP (1/10) reports, "Hain Celestial Group Inc., an organic food company, received antitrust approval for its planned $120 million acquisition of Avalon Natural Products Inc." The AP continues, "The Federal Trade Commission approved early termination of a waiting period required under antitrust law on Friday." The AP adds, "Melville, N.Y.-based Hain, whose brands include Garden of Eatin', Earth's Best and Celestial Seasonings, is buying Avalon from private equity firm North Castle Partners LLC. … Avalon, located in Petaluma, Calif., sells personal care products under the Avalon Organics, Alba Botanica and Unpetroleum brands."

Supreme Court Lowers Threshold For Patent Lawsuits. The New York Times (1/10, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports the Supreme Court "opened the door Tuesday to a category of patent lawsuits that a lower court had barred, issuing a decision that will probably shift power in the courtroom from bigger patent-owning companies to smaller start-up companies that rely on obtaining licenses for patented technology." The court's "8-to-1 decision held that the holder of a patent license can sue to challenge the patent's validity without first refusing to pay royalties and putting itself in breach of the license agreement." This "seemingly technical question, in a dispute by two biotechnology companies, MedImmune and Genentech, has considerable practical importance. A license holder is much less likely to sue if it must first stop paying royalties and thereby risk becoming the target of a patent infringement suit, with the potential for triple damages and the loss of the right to continue selling its product."

DOJ_NMG_0114565

The Wall Street Journal (1/10, Bravin, Chase, 2.04M) reports the decision "weakens intellectual-property protections by making it easier for legal challenges to patents. The 8-1 decision put the justices on the side of those who have complained that existing rules stifle innovation, and it is their latest rebuke to the specialized panel that hears patent appeals, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, for rulings skewing property rights in favor of patent holders. The high court this term has also heard a separate case appealing obstacles imposed by the Federal Circuit against challenges to a patent on grounds that the invention is 'obvious.' A decision on that is pending." The "implications could be greatest for the biotechnology industry, where huge profits can turn on a relatively small number of patents, according to Pamela Samuelson, co-director of the Center for Law and Technology at the University of California, Berkeley."

SCOTUS Patent Ruling Could Spark Surge In Challenges. The AP (1/10, Elias) reports, "Biotechnology analysts and lawyers said a key U.S. Supreme Court ruling Tuesday could help companies who license patents get out of bad deals easier." The AP continues, "The Supreme Court ruled that Gaithersburg, Md.-based MedImmune Inc. could sue Genentech Inc. for patent infringement even though MedImmune continues to pay fees to Genentech to use the disputed technology to develop the drug Synagis that treats childhood respiratory problems. The high court didn't rule on the merits of MedImmune's claims Tuesday, the outcome of which analysts said is more important to the patent landscape of the biotechnology industry." The AP adds, "Licensing the rights to use another company's patent technology is the lifeblood of the biotechnology industry. Many smaller companies have long complained that larger companies with extensive patent portfolios often hold monopolistic grips on certain manufacturing processes. For instance, several biotechnology companies pay Genentech royalties to access the technology at the heart of the MedImmune dispute. … 'This is definitely a major ongoing controversy,' said Jason Kantor, an analyst with RBC Market Capitals. 'The decision today does not have far-reaching implications.'"

The Legal Times (1/10, Mauro) reports, "Patent litigation could explode in the wake of the Supreme Court's ruling Tuesday in a closely watched dispute over patent validity between two biotechnology firms." The Times continues, "The Court, by an 8-1 vote, reinstated a lawsuit by MedImmune challenging a Genentech patent related to Synagis, a popular drug for treatment of respiratory disease in children. The opinion in MedImmune v. Genentech, written by Justice Antonin Scalia, says patent licensees no longer have to breach the license in order to have standing to challenge the patent that they dispute. Patent lawyers say the ruling could lead to a flurry of challenges to existing patents. … 'It's a rare patent where you can't find something to challenge. There will be an explosion in litigation by these licensees,' says Jim Badke, a partner at Ropes & Gray. 'Companies can have their cake and eat it too.'" The Times adds, "The Jan. 9 ruling overturns a decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, which since 2004 had held that a breach -- such as ceasing royalty payments -- was necessary in order to establish the "case or controversy" required to challenge the patent. Critics of the Federal Circuit's doctrine said it discouraged challenges against invalid patents, because breaking a license agreement can be risky. Such a breach can prompt the patent holder to retaliate by suing for infringement and seeking an injunction against further sales of the product, along with treble damages. .. Now a licensee can challenge a patent while still honoring it and paying royalties -- as MedImmune did in the case before the Supreme Court -- and patent challenges will be safer and easier to file without fear of retaliation."

ENVIRONMENT:

DOJ Probing Possible Ethical Violations At Mineral Agency. The Denver Post (1/10, Raabe) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department has begun two criminal investigations into the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service over possible ethics violations." The Post continues, "One of the investigations focuses on individuals at the agency's office in the Denver Federal Center, officials said." The Post adds, "The investigations mark the first time that federal officials are targeting possible criminal activity at the Minerals Management Service. .. The agency already has been the subject of noncriminal federal inquiries and audits alleging problems in its mission to collect royalty payments on oil and gas production from federal property." The Post notes, "Allegations of criminal ethics violations are unrelated to the previous inquiries and audits, the agency said in a statement. … 'The Minerals Management Service requested an investigation by the Inspector General into two possible ethics violations. These cases have been referred to the Justice Department,' the statement said. … 'Both cases involve individual personnel, and therefore cannot be discussed outside the investigation itself.' … Earlier this month, a report from the Interior Department's inspector general concluded that the Minerals Management Service may be allowing royalty underpayments because of weaknesses and inconsistencies in the agency's audits of energy-company payments."

DOJ_NMG_0114566

Florida City To Target Ex-Utility Heads After DOJ Drops Probe. The Sarasota (FL) Herald Tribune (1/10, Quinlan) reports from Venice, FL, "The city will consider filing lawsuits or taking other legal action against the former utility department employees believed to be responsible for the illegal dumping to which the city pleaded guilty in federal court in 2005." The Tribune continues, "The City Council's decision Tuesday to weigh legal options comes days after city leaders learned that federal prosecutors have given up trying to bring criminal charges against any former utility department employees." The Tribune adds, "The Justice Department's decision to drop the case has angered council members, who say that the actions of a few former employees ultimately cost taxpayers more than $2 million in fines and engineering and legal fees. … 'The city felt that it had no choice but to enter into a guilty plea based on the evidence,' said council member John Moore, a former judge. 'I felt that they should have been prosecuted.'" The Tribune notes, "The Department of Justice would not comment on why it closed the case. The City Council instructed the city attorney Tuesday to seek an explanation. .. The investigation began after several former utility department employees accused colleagues of illegally dumping excess treated waste water into Curry Creek and spraying it onto a field at Knights Trail in 2001, even though the systems designed to measure and limit flow were not working. … In 2004, the city purged the department, hiring a private firm, Operations Management International, to run the city waste-water operations. … The city pleaded guilty to three felony violations of the Clean Water Act, receiving the minimum fine allowable, $110,000. As part of the plea deal, city officials agreed to cooperate in any further investigation of the supervisors or managers responsible, whom court papers refer to only as the 'Executive Group.' … But some former employees who claim to be members of the 'Executive Group' say that federal prosecutors' decision to walk away from the case proves their innocence. They say current city administrators capitulated to federal prosecutors and used the case and allegations to stage a coup."

NOAA Affirms Human Role In Climate Change. The New York Times (1/10, Revkin, 1.16M) reports, "President Bush has said it. A lot of government scientists have said it. But until yesterday, it appeared that no news release on annual climate trends out of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration under the Bush White House had said unequivocally that a buildup of greenhouse gases was helping warm the climate." The Times adds, "The statement came in a release that said 2006 was the warmest year for the 48 contiguous states since regular temperature records began in 1895. ... 'A contributing factor to the unusually warm temperatures throughout 2006 also is the long-term warming trend, which has been linked to increases in greenhouse gases,' the release said, emphasizing that the relative contributions of El Niño and the human influence were not known."

The CBS Evening News (1/9, story 8, 2:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Scientists confirmed today that 2006 was the warmest year on record in America, more than two degrees warmer than the 20th century average." CBS (Alfonsi) added, "Scientists blame El Niño , the weather phenomenon that warms the waters in the Pacific, shifting the location and intensity of the jet streams, making our weather just weird."

The Washington Post (1/10, A1, Kaufman, 690K) says 2006 capped "a nine-year warming streak 'unprecedented in the historical record' that was driven in part by the burning of fossil fuels, the government reported yesterday." The Post adds, "According to the government's National Climatic Data Center, the record-breaking warmth...was the result of both unusual regional weather patterns and the long-term effects of the buildup of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere. 'People should be concerned about what we are doing to the climate,' said Jay Lawrimore, chief of the climate monitoring branch of [NOAA]. 'Burning of fossil fuels is causing an increase in greenhouse gases, and there's a broad scientific consensus that is producing climate change.'"

USA Today (1/10, O'Driscoll, 2.27M) reports, "The climate center says the current El Niño, the periodic warming of Pacific waters, is the biggest factor for 2006, and global warming is 'a contributing factor.' This is believed to be the first time the annual temperature report mentions climate change as a cause."

The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Hotz, 850K) reports, "Based on an analysis of readings from 1,200 weather stations around the country, the average annual temperature in the Lower 48 states last year was 2.2 degrees higher than the mean temperature for the 20th century and fractionally warmer than in 1998, which previously held the temperature record, the researchers reported."

US To Raise Royalty Rates For Gulf Oil And Gas Drilling. The New York Times (1/10, Andrews, 1.16M) reports, "The Bush administration, accused of failing to collect billions of dollars from companies that drill for oil and gas in federal waters, announced on Tuesday that it would demand higher royalties on all new deepwater leases in the Gulf of Mexico. The Interior Department said it would raise the royalty rate to 16.7 percent from 12.5 percent of oil and gas sales, a change that it estimated would increase government revenue by $4.5 billion over 20 years." The "change will not alter any of the thousands of existing offshore leases, nor will it affect a mistake in hundreds of leases that could allow companies to escape as much as $10 billion in royalties over the next five years. The Interior Department has been trying to renegotiate those leases for the last six months, but has managed to reach voluntary agreements with only 5 of the 56 companies that hold them." The Times adds, "Next week, House Democrats hope to pass legislation that would punish companies that refuse to renegotiate, either by imposing a stiff new tax on their production or by prohibiting them from acquiring new leases."

DOJ_NMG_0114567

The Wall Street Journal (1/10, A2, Fialka, Gold, 2.04M) says the royalty increase is "apparently to appease critics in Congress who say the government has failed to collect all of the royalty payments owed it from past Gulf production."

Democrats Face Hurdles As They Target Oil Industry Tax Incentives. The Chicago Tribune (1/10, Neikirk, 617K) reports, "Democrats are pushing a cleaner, greener energy policy that they will try to drive through the House later this month. But its ultimate outlook is uncertain—and so is its impact." House Democrats "want to do away with billions of dollars in oil industry tax incentives and force oil companies to pay higher royalties on Gulf of Mexico leases. The extra money would be used to give a dramatic boost to renewable energy sources." The Tribune adds, "Although President Bush increasingly has talked about development of such energy sources, funding has been spotty." The "new legislation faces two big hurdles—a Senate where Democrats have a razor-thin margin and a White House that backed the tax breaks in the first place." And "some energy analysts said they doubt that the bill would contribute greatly to easing the nation's energy problem any time soon, even if the House bill should become law."

Bush Administration Lifts Moratorium On Drilling In Alaska's Bristol Bay. The Washington Post (1/10, D1, Mufson, Eilperin, 690K) reports, "The Bush administration yesterday moved to boost U.S. oil and gas supplies by lifting a long-standing moratorium on drilling in Alaska's Bristol Bay, as OPEC accelerated plans to reduce supplies in order to prop up sagging crude prices." Congress "first barred drilling in Bristol Bay in 1989 after the huge Exxon Valdez oil tanker spill damaged Alaska's coast. Congress lifted the ban in 2003," but "a moratorium President Bill Clinton declared on drilling in the area in 1998 remained in effect, so it took Bush's action yesterday to open it to development. Bush also lifted a presidential moratorium on part of the Gulf of Mexico that Congress opened for drilling in December." Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne "said the offshore drilling in both areas and the increase in royalty fees would 'enhance America's energy security by improving opportunities for domestic energy production, and will also increase the revenues that the federal government collects from oil and gas companies on behalf of American taxpayers.'"

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

SF Chronicle Argues DOJ Undercut Its Case In BALCO Probe. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/10, Page B - 5, Egelko) reports, "The Chronicle told a federal appeals court Monday that a secret government filing in support of fines against the newspaper and prison sentences for two of its reporters actually undermines prosecutors' case against the journalists for refusing to disclose the sources of grand jury leaks about athletes and steroids." The Chronicle continues, "Federal prosecutors submitted the documents under seal last month to the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco, saying they contained new information about their efforts to identify the sources of the information supplied to the reporters, Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams. The court has scheduled a hearing Feb. 12 on a judge's contempt-of-court orders against the reporters and The Chronicle. .. Their sealed filing came a day after reports by the Associated Press and Yahoo.com that the FBI was investigating a former defense lawyer in the steroid case as a possible source of the leak." The Chronicle adds, "In Monday's filing, lawyers for the reporters and the newspaper argued that prosecutors were effectively conceding they had failed to pursue alternative sources of information about the leaks before going after the reporters. … The Justice Department says it issues subpoenas to journalists only as a last resort. The Chronicle contends the same standard is part of the constitutional guarantee of freedom of the press and was not met in this case."

Four Get Prison Sentences In Virginia Cocaine Conspiracy Case. The Martinsville (VA) Bulletin (1/9) reported four men "have been sentenced by a federal judge in a cocaine distribution conspiracy case." Those sentences range from four to ten years in prison. The federal indictment "included charges of conspiracy to distribute 5,000 grams or more of cocaine powder [and] possession with intent to distribute cocaine." The DEA and the Virginia State Police "investigation into the alleged drug ring began in February when a man was arrested in the Eastern District of Virginia while allegedly in possession of more than 50 grams of cocaine. … On Nov. 2, former Henry County sheriff H. Frank Cassell, along with 12 former members of his department and seven residents, were charged in a…48-count federal indictment which includes allegations of racketeering conspiracy, obstruction of justice, misprision, money laundering, firearms offenses, drug charges, perjury and other charges."

DOJ_NMG_0114568

Arizona Man Sentenced For 2005 Shootout With US Marshals. The Arizona Republic (1/10, Arnold) reports, "A 25-year-old man has been sentenced to 40 years in prison in connection with a 2005 gunbattle in Gilbert (AZ)." The Republic continues, "Joshua Wayne Trotter was sentenced Monday afternoon after he pleaded guilty in September to seven counts of assaulting a federal officer, unlawful possession of a firearm and use of a firearm during and in retaliation to a crime of violence. … Trotter was accused of shooting at U.S. Marshals, injuring one, June 3, 2005, as they attempted to arrest him on a probation violation federal warrant, according to the U.S. Attorney for Arizona." The Republic adds, "Trotter has five previous felony convictions, including assaulting police officers, and a case pending in Coconino County Court on a charge of assault on a family member, the U.S. Attorney's Office said. .. The Marshals tracked Trotter, a suspected methamphetamine user, to Gilbert after he is believed to have terrorized his family three weeks earlier near the Grand Canyon, a U.S. Marshals Service representative told The Arizona Republic in 2005. … According to the U.S. Attorney's Office, marshals attempted to block Trotter's path with their vehicles as he drove away from a house east of Lindsay and Pecos roads."

The AP (1/10) reports, "A Marshal opened fire as Trotter pushed the other Marshal's car backwards, and Trotter returned fire with a pistol, striking one deputy in the hand. Trotter eventually was shot twice and surrendered. He had five previous felony convictions and has an assault case pending in Coconino County Court. … (US District Judge Paul K.) Rosenblatt described Trotter as a 'poster-boy for the effects of methamphetamine,' at the sentencing, the U.S. Attorney's office said."

Mexico Extradites Man To Face Charges In California Deputy's Slaying. The AP (1/10) reports, "A Mexican man was extradited to the United States on Tuesday in connection with the slaying of a deputy sheriff in California." The AP continues, "Jorge Arroyo Garcia, alias Jorge Rubo or Armando Garcia, was flown to the northern city of Tijuana, across the border from San Diego, California, and formally handed over to agents from the United States Marshals Service, the Mexican Attorney General's Office said in a news release. … According to U.S. authorities, Arroyo is believed to have shot Los Angeles County Deputy Sheriff David March during a traffic stop in April 2002. In addition to murder, Arroyo is accused of illegal weapons possession." The AP adds, "Arroyo was first captured by Mexican authorities in 2004 and he has been held in a Mexican prison since. He filed various appeals fighting his extradition that eventually were dismissed. … The Attorney General's Office described Arroyo as one of the United States Marshal Service's most-wanted fugitives."

The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Enriquez, Blankstein) reports, "The extradition marks a victory for L.A. prosecutors and local police, who have been trying for several years to get Garcia to stand trial. Detectives allege that after shooting March during a traffic stop in Irwindale, Garcia fled to Jalisco, Mexico. He was arrested last year." The Times adds, "Mexican police were said to be helping in the search, but at that time the extradition of fugitives to the U.S. from Mexico was in dispute. Mexican judges balked at allowing Mexican nationals to be returned to a country where they could face the death penalty or life in prison. … In 2004, Mexico's Supreme Court ended a four-year argument with the U.S. over extradition by ruling that thousands of slaying suspects could be returned."

IMMIGRATION:

Demjanjuk To Appeal Deportation Again. The AP (1/10) reports, "A retired Ohio auto worker ordered deported over accusations that he was a Nazi death camp guard during World War II has started another appeal in a federal court, his lawyer said Tuesday." The AP continues, "John Demjanjuk, 86, of suburban Cleveland, on Dec. 21 lost his previous attempt to avoid deportation when the Board of Immigration Appeals in Falls Church, Va., rejected his appeal of an immigration judge's 2005 deportation order. … But Demjanjuk still has the right to appeal that ruling in federal courts, so the filing of a petition for review in the 6th Circuit in Cincinnati was expected. The filing Monday starts the next appeal process, defense lawyer John Broadley said. … The immigration appeals board said Demjanjuk's Nazi guard past is conclusively established." The AP adds, "Demjanjuk's case dates back nearly 30 years. He was cleared in 1993 in Israel of being the notorious 'Ivan the Terrible,' a sadistic guard at the Treblinka concentration camp in Poland. But the Justice Department said World War II documents prove he was a Nazi guard at various death or forced labor camps."

GOP Lawmakers Ask DOJ To Help Convicted Border Agents Remain Free. The El Paso Times (1/10, Gilot) reports, "Five congressmen said they will have a news conference today in Washington, D.C., to support the efforts of two former El Paso Border Patrol agents to remain free on bond while they appeal their convictions in the case of a drug smuggler who was shot in the buttocks in 2005 near Fabens." The Times continues, "The elected officials said they wrote to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales requesting the Justice Department to direct federal prosecutors to not oppose a motion for bond continuance by Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean. If a federal judge denies the motion, Ramos and Compean have to surrender on Jan. 17 to start their prison sentences. … The lawmakers are U.S. Reps. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., Ted Poe, R-Texas, Walter Jones, R-N.C., Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., and Duncan Hunter, R-Calif."

DOJ_NMG_0114569

Border Region Officials Appeal To Congress To Stop Construction Of Wall. McClatchy (1/10, Montgomery) reports, "With Democrats now in charge on Capitol Hill, a 700-mile fence that swept through the previous Republican-controlled Congress is apt to come under a scathing re-evaluation amid reports of skyrocketing costs and widening opposition along the U.S.-Mexican border. Mayors from Texas border cities will meet with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff next week with what they say is a unified message: Don't build the fence. The meeting is scheduled for Jan. 17 in the office of Texas Republican Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison." According to McClatchy, "The growing outcry from local officials parallels renewed concerns over costs following a report that the price tag for building and maintaining the fencing could reach nearly $50 billion over a 25-year period. The cost projections were prepared by the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service."

TAX:

IRS Urged To Drop Private Debt Collection Program. The New York Times (1/10, Browning) reports, "The national taxpayer advocate called on Congress yesterday to repeal the authority of the Internal Revenue Service to use private debt collectors." The Times continues, "In her annual report, the taxpayer advocate, Nina E. Olson, said the private debt collection program was economically inefficient and prone to abuse. In particular, she faulted the I.R.S. for not disclosing certain 'psychological techniques' used by the private contractors to try to collect unpaid taxes." The Times adds, "The office of the taxpayer advocate was created by Congress to identify problems within the I.R.S. that affect taxpayers and to promote their interests before the agency and Congress, which writes the tax code. … Ms. Olson's office provided its most extensive review yet of the private debt-collection program, which it has been monitoring for two years since plans for it were announced. The program, which formally started in September, is meant to farm out easily collectible tax bills, typically owed by low-income taxpayers, to private collection agencies. When the I.R.S. announced the program, it said that the private entities would abide by the same publicly disclosed rules as I.R.S. employees." The Times notes, "Private debt collection has drawn criticism that it is not cost-efficient and that some of the private firms hired by the I.R.S. have questionable business practices. One firm hired by the agency was the law firm of Linebarger Goggan Blair & Sampson of Austin, Tex., whose former partner, Juan Peña, pleaded guilty to federal bribery charges for his role in winning a collection contract from the city of San Antonio."

The Washington Post (1/10, D3, Day) reports, "Olson's recommendations were greeted warmly by the Democrats who will chair the two congressional committees that oversee the IRS, Max Baucus of Montana of the Senate Finance Committee and Charles B. Rangel of New York of the House Ways and Means Committee. Baucus and Rangel have strongly criticized the use of private debt collectors and have said the job should stay within the government, a position both reiterated yesterday. … Both also repeated their vow to tackle the alternative minimum tax, or AMT, and the tax gap -- the $290 billion to $350 billion in uncollected taxes -- in legislation this year."

Repeal Of Phaseouts Urged. In his "Tax Report" column for the Wall Street Journal (1/10, D1), Tom Herman writes, "Millions of people are paying taxes at higher rates than they probably realize because of tricky provisions that can reduce -- or even eliminate -- major tax breaks based on their income. … These so-called phaseouts (because some benefits begin to phase out when your income exceeds certain levels) and similar provisions should be repealed, or at least simplified, said Nina Olson, the Internal Revenue Service's National Taxpayer Advocate, in a report to Congress released yesterday. Ms. Olson, who isn't a political appointee, heads an IRS unit designed to help taxpayers cut through red tape and deal with problems that typically couldn't be resolved through normal channels." Herman continues, "The report says more than 60 million individual income-tax returns, about 44% of the total filed last year, are affected each year by one or more of these provisions, which can drive up a taxpayer's marginal tax rate well above his or her official tax rate. … It's doubtful that Congress will eliminate phaseouts. Repealing them would cost the U.S. Treasury Department billions of dollars each year at a time when lawmakers are focusing more on cutting budget deficits than on simplifying the nation's notoriously complex tax system. Yet the report throws a new spotlight on a dimly lit corner of the tax world that many taxpayers need to understand more thoroughly in order to make intelligent tax and investment-planning decisions."

Taxpayer Advocate Cites AMT, Income Underreporting As Top Two IRS Problems. The AP (1/10, Abrams) reports, "A tax law meant to crack down on wealthy tax dodgers has instead become the most serious problem facing millions of other taxpayers. For the government, the biggest problem is billions of dollars in unpaid taxes, National Taxpayer Advocate Nina E. Olson said Tuesday in a report to Congress on the hurdles Americans face in meeting their tax obligations. Olson, who works independently within the Internal Revenue Service, also urged Congress to repeal IRS authority to contract out to private collection agencies, saying the IRS is better trained and more efficient in collecting delinquent taxes." The advocate "is required to submit an annual report to Congress listing at least 20 of the most serious problems encountered by taxpayers. This year the list was topped by the alternative minimum tax. … The second most serious problem was the gap between what taxpayers should be paying and what the IRS is collecting, estimated at $290 billion a year. The advocate said that noncompliance by some taxpayers requires good-faith taxpayers to pay an additional $2,200 a year."

DOJ_NMG_0114570

Congressional Budget Rules Seen As Stifling IRS Debt-Collection Effort. Under the headline, "Tax Collection Debate Is A Product Of Budget Battles," the Washington Post's (1/10, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The idea of using private-sector debt collection companies to get small-time tax delinquents to pay up has been controversial since Congress gave the green light to the program in 2004. Some members of Congress have questioned whether the program will prove effective, and the National Treasury Employees Union, which represents IRS workers, is lobbying on Capitol Hill to ban such outsourcing. Under the program, the debt-collection companies get a commission of up to 25 cents for every dollar they collect. The IRS has estimated that the outsourcing program will bring in about $1.4 billion, less costs, over 10 years and should free up revenue agents to focus on more complex cases and big-time tax cheats." The Post adds that the outsourcing program, "grew out of the pull-and-push over annual IRS budgets. The congressional appropriations process each year has kept the agency from getting a little extra money that could bring in a lot more tax revenue," according to Nina E. Olson, taxpayer advocate, who the Post adds, "thinks the risks are too great." Olson "recommended that Congress consider revising its budget rules" and "increase IRS personnel funding by 2 to 3 percent each year to allow the agency to increase staffing."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Withdraws Four Judicial Nominations. Fox News' Special Report (1/9, Hume) reported, "In light of the new Democratic majority in Congress four of President Bush's federal appeals court appointees have asked that their nominations be withdrawn. … Confirmation of all four had been blocked previously in the Senate judiciary committee." The AP (1/10, Espo) reports that in "a concession" to Senate Democrats, President Bush "won't rename four controversial federal appeals court nominees whose confirmations were blocked last year." William Haynes, William G. Myers III and Michael Wallace all "asked to have their appointments withdrawn," while Judge Terrence Boyle "was informed of the White House's decision, according to an ally." Deputy White House spokeswoman Dana Perino "said the president was disappointed about the withdrawals. … 'Unfortunately, a few selected senators prevented these nominees from receiving fair consideration. The president is disappointed in this inaction, and hopes that the days of judicial obstructionism are beyond us.'" McClatchy (1/10, Barrett, Rosen) reports Boyle "refused" to withdraw his nomination, "saying in an interview Tuesday that it wasn't his place. 'I didn't quit,' said Boyle, whose case may be the longest nomination-in-waiting in U.S. history. He was first nominated for the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals in 1991 by President George H.W. Bush and was nominated six more times by the current President Bush."

The New York Times (1/10, Lewis, 1.16M) reports the announcement of the nominees' withdrawal "was widely taken to mean that the president had decided that renominating them would be a needlessly provocative act, one that would anger Democrats without sufficient political payoff from conservatives for sticking by the nominees. … After Tuesday's announcement, some Democrats expressed appreciation for the decision." Sen. Patrick Leahy, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, "praised Mr. Bush for not resubmitting the three nominees. 'This new Congress presents an opportunity for a fresh start on judicial nominations, one that emphasizes qualifications and bipartisan consensus over game-playing." Sen. Charles Schumer said, "It's the first whiff of conciliation we've had on the issue of judges." According to the Times, "At least one nominee had told friends he was interested in withdrawing long ago but agreed to keep his name in to satisfy the White House if the president wanted to continue pressing the nominations."

Bloomberg (1/10, Rowley) reports, "Senator Charles E. Schumer, a New York Democrat, welcomed the administration's retreat as a sign Bush 'is heeding the message from the November election.' He said Democrats would work with the administration 'to confirm judges who are not extremists, either left or right.'"

Bush Renominates Thirty-Two Other Judiciary Candidates. The Washington Post (1/10, A3, Smith, 690K) reports, "Signaling at the same time that President Bush is committed to placing more conservatives on the bench, the White House renominated 32 other federal judicial candidates that the previous Senate did not confirm. Bush also nominated a previous candidate for a federal district court to fill one of the four appellate positions."

WSJournal Blames Graham For Haynes' Withdrawal. The Wall Street Journal (1/10, 2.04M), in an editorial, writes Haynes "is a victim of…Lindsey Graham's desire for the media spotlight. … Graham joined Democrats in blocking him to settle a political score." Haynes "is general counsel of the Pentagon, where his transgression in the days following the 9/11 attacks was to do his job with too much determination to protect the country. That meant offering legal analysis to Secretary Donald Rumsfeld on the treatment of detainees -- advice that critics later distorted as condoning 'torture.'" The Journal Claims Graham "basked in media attention for opposing President Bush on detainees" and "for reasons of ego or retribution or something, he has also insisted on embarrassing the White House by blocking Mr. Haynes's nomination." The Journal concludes: "Graham's treatment of a favorite son is a disgraceful episode, and one that South Carolina Republicans will want to consider if the Senator faces a primary challenge in 2008."

DOJ_NMG_0114571

WPost Welcomes Bush's Move. The Washington Post (1/10, A12, 690K), in an editorial, writes that Bush's decision "is a welcome sign from an administration that, in the realm of judicial selection, has too often chosen confrontation over compromise. … Bush deserves credit for putting some action behind his rhetoric of bipartisanship." The Post adds, "Now the onus is not only on the president to avoid more thumb-in-their-eye nominees, but also on Democrats…to make good on their end of the bargain: to give the president's nominees the timely and reasonable consideration that nominees have not always received in the past."

Bush Renominates Recess Appointments Myers And Sauerbrey. The Washington Times (1/10, 88K) reports President Bush "renominated Julie L. Myers to head U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement a year after he was forced to make her a recess appointment during questions about her qualifications for the job. … Myers' recess appointment expired at the end of the last Congress. During her year in office, ICE expanded enforcement, but many members of Congress said they wanted to see still more operations. Her nomination will give both Democrats and Republicans in Congress a platform to criticize the president's immigration policy. She was one of several recess appointees Mr. Bush renominated yesterday. Another was Ellen R. Sauerbrey, the former Republican candidate for Maryland governor, who Mr. Bush has tapped to be assistant secretary of state for population, refugees and migration. Her nomination proved to be contentious because of her pro-life views."

Petraeus, Fallon Expected To Be Confirmed Quickly. The Hill (1/10, Tiron) reports, "Despite stepping up opposition to President Bush's yet-to-be-announced troop-surge plan, the Democratic-led Senate is likely to swiftly confirm military officers selected by the administration to carry out its new plan for Iraq. … Lt. Gen. David Petraeus "has been chosen to replace Gen. George Casey as the top commander in Iraq with a promotion to four-star general, while Casey will be nominated to become the new Army chief of staff. Meanwhile, Adm. William Fallon will take over U.S. Central Command from Gen. John Abizaid, who is retiring. All three nominations require Senate confirmation." According to the Hill, "Democrats and some Republicans who have been more cautious about supporting the White House's troop-surge denied they would use the nomination process to force the president's hand." Casey "may face tough questions" from Sen. John McCain and Sen. Lindsey Graham "both of whom have been pushing for more troops in Iraq."

Top State Department Arms Control Official Resigning. Al Kamen, in his Washington Post "In the Loop" column (1/10, A11) writes, "State Department. Buzz is Robert Joseph, undersecretary for arms control and international security, is going to be moving on, possibly at the end of this month. The date is uncertain, we're told, because it has changed a few times. Apparently Secretary Condoleezza Rice wanted Joseph, who we're told has been frozen out of some important issues, to stay on for a bit given all the openings."

Tomlinson Withdraws His Nomination For Broadcasting Board Post. Fox News' Special Report (1/9, Hume) reported that Kenneth Tomlinson, Chairman of the Broadcasting Board of Governors "which manages the government's international broadcasting offices, has told the president that he would rather write a book about his experiences than undergo another confirmation process. Tomlinson was formerly chairman of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting where he was criticized by congressional Democrats and liberal public broadcasters for his efforts to add a conservative viewpoint to programming. … An internal investigator found he violated the board's code of ethics." The Washington Times (1/10, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Tomlinson said, "I think it's a good story that will help the public understand how Washington operates. There's been a criminalization of political differences." The Times adds that during Tomlinson's tenure at the Broadcasting Board of Governors, it "worked to open news operations in parts of the world where authoritarian regimes blocked access to information. As a result of these initiatives, an Arabic language satellite TV network now broadcasts in Iraq and other Muslim nations, Persian language satellite news is fed daily into Iran, and radio and television broadcast signals are sent into Afghanistan and Cuba."

SMU Faculty Questions Bush Library Plans. The New York Times (1/10, Blumenthal, 1.16M) reports, "Intimates of President Bush have singled out Southern Methodist University as the likely site of his presidential library, but faculty members, complaining of being bypassed, are raising sharp questions about the school's identification with his presidency. In a meeting Tuesday, faculty members complained of a lack of consultation over the emerging agreement and all but demanded answers from the university's president, R. Gerald Turner, on the relationship that would develop between the university and the library. … The session grew out of the uproar after an op-ed article in the student newspaper, The Daily Campus, by two professors at the university's Perkins School of Theology complaining about the library selection process.

DOJ_NMG_0114572

GOP Senators Reportedly Considering Filibuster Of Minimum Wage Hike. The New York Times (1/10, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports, "As part of their 100-hour legislative blitz, House Democrats are expected to vote today to increase the minimum wage for the first time in a decade, to $7.25 an hour, in a move that economists say will raise pay for 13 million workers. The bill's chances are less certain in the Senate, largely because of friction over a Republican push to include tax breaks for small business in the bill. Senate Republicans have hinted that, without such tax cuts, they will filibuster the measure, a move that the bill's supporters would need 60 votes to overcome." The Times adds, "After opposing a minimum-wage increase for years, many Republicans now say they favor one, but only if it is coupled with a tax cut for restaurants and other small businesses -- the groups they say would be hurt most by the wage increase. … President Bush has said he might accept a higher minimum wage, but only if it is tied to tax cuts to soften the blow for business."

The Washington Post (1/10, A1, Finkel, 690K), in a front-page story titled, "Life At $7.25 An Hour," reports, "Today in Washington, the House is scheduled to vote on whether to increase the federal minimum wage. … Passage is expected, with Senate approval soon to follow, and if President Bush signs the resulting bill into law, as he indicated he would, the U.S. minimum wage would rise for the first time since 1997, ending a debate about whether such a raise would be good or bad for the economy."

Kennedy Opposes Baucus Tax Cut Proposal. The Hill (1/10, Schor, Young) reports, "The Senate Finance Committee today will examine options for tax breaks that the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions (HELP) Committee can successfully pair with the wage hike. But HELP Chairman Edward Kennedy and ranking Republican Mike Enzi (Wyo.) are already dissenting from party leaders' positions on the minimum wage. Kennedy will push for a Senate wage hike without business tax breaks at an event today with House Majority Whip Steny Hoyer, House Education and Labor Committee Chairman George Miller, AFL-CIO President John Sweeney, and freshman Reps. Betty Sutton and Carol Shea-Porter. At least two members of Kennedy's panel, freshman Sens. Sherrod Brown and Bernie Sanders backed his approach."

Northern Mariana Islands Provision Added To Minimum Wage Bill. The Hill (1/10, Crabtree) reports, "House Democrats plan to bring the Northern Mariana Islands in line with U.S. minimum wage laws under legislation that comes to the floor today, thus ending a decade of policy favoring island businesses secured by lobbyist Jack Abramoff and former Rep. Tom DeLay. … The bill would increase the islands' minimum wage to $7.25 over the next four years, compared to the two years and two months it gives other U.S. employers to phase in the increase." The article goes on to describe, in great detail, how the territory's relationship with congress has fared since DeLay's resignation and the Democrats'' midterm victories.

Baucus Criticized Over Planned Tax Cut Hearings. The Washington Post's Steven Pearlstein (1/10, D1) writes, "you'd think raising the minimum wage for the first time in a decade would be a political and economic no-brainer for the new Democratic Congress. But you'd be forgetting about Max Baucus. Baucus is a Democratic senator from the Republican-leaning state of Montana, which means he is on the political equivalent of the endangered-species list. So you can understand Baucus's need to vote with his constituents on things like sugar subsidies and gun control and grazing fees on public lands. But while Baucus is surely entitled to his opinions, and entitled to do what is necessary to assure his own political survival, he is not entitled to be chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, which handles such key Democratic issues as health care, trade and tax policy. That position ought to be reserved for a statesman with enough political confidence and backbone that he isn't constantly sacrificing the interests of his party and his country to the narrow interests of his subsidy-addicted constituents."

House GOP Backs Small Business Health Insurance Amendment. The Wall Street Journal (1/10, A6, Rogers, 2.04M) reports, "Playing against type in the new Congress, Republicans are talking up health care while Democrats talk up tax breaks for small business. Democrats are embracing billions of dollars in tax breaks to ease the effect on small employers. But as Republican governors in California and Massachusetts bring forward state plans to help uninsured families, Republicans in Congress recognize the health-care issue's populist appeal and propose to help small employers deal with covering their workers. The result is a three-issue Washington triangle that could have unintended consequences. Paying for small-business tax breaks, for example, may mean tightening tax shelters for the wealthy and big corporations." Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus "will hold a hearing today to weigh tax breaks to help small employers, especially the restaurant industry, which wants a substantial acceleration in depreciation for new construction. … Hoping to trump the Democrats, House Republicans are pushing legislation to let employers with fewer than 100 workers seek coverage through trade-association health plans that could operate on a national scale exempt from state regulation."

DOJ_NMG_0114573

House Drug Benefit Bill Spurs Resurgence Of Healthcare Debate. USA Today (1/10, Wolf, 2.27M) reports that on Friday House Democrats "plan to pass legislation requiring the government to negotiate for lower Medicare prescription-drug prices. They see it as one way to reduce the impact of the program's coverage gap, which forces seniors and disabled Americans with high drug costs to pay their full cost for a period of months. … Debate over this issue could signify a series of political conflicts over health care policy reminiscent of the Clinton administration's first two years." USA Today notes the debate "comes as the Medicare prescription-drug program is rebounding from a troubled start last January, when millions of low-income beneficiaries were mistakenly dropped or overcharged. More than 90% of seniors have some type of drug coverage. Individual premiums and overall taxpayer costs have come in substantially lower than projected. And for the first time in Kaiser's surveys, a majority of seniors approve of the program." Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt "has called the House bill a 'surrogate for government-run health care.' He met Tuesday with House Republicans to drive home the administration's opposition to the House bill."

Senators Predict Five-Day Work Weeks Won't Last. Roll Call (1/10, Billings) reports, "Senators are adjusting their travel plans to comply with the newly implemented five-day work schedule, but few believe Majority Leader Harry Reid will actually keep the chamber operating at that clip for long. Opinions vary over how long Reid will insist on the Monday-through-Friday calendar, but Senators and aides on both sides of the aisle have little faith it will last beyond August and the unofficial start of the 2008 election season. About a third of the Senate is up for re-election in two years, and the contest for the White House — likely featuring several sitting Senators — already is in play."

Hoyer Aide Monitors "Hundred Hours Clock." The New York Times (1/10, Leibovich, 1.16M) reports Rob Cogorno's title is floor director for House majority leader Steny Hoyer "but for all practical purposes, he is the Keeper of The Clock. That is the digital timepiece on Mr. Hoyer's Web site marking the passage of legislative time as House Democrats push their 'Hundred Hours for a New Direction' agenda through Congress."

Morris Claims House Democrats Hurt Themselves By Taking Day Off For Football. In his column for The Hill (1/10) Dick Morris writes, "House Democrats lost considerable credibility yesterday when their opening session was cancelled so that members could attend the Ohio State-Florida State football game. This is not a joke. It is, however, a blunt metaphor for how genuinely out of touch the members of Congress really are. How many other Americans do you suppose were given the same perk? A day off because of an evening football game? And how many school kids would like to have time off to watch their own favorite teams? What kind of message is the House leadership sending?"

Pelosi's Swearing-In Stagecraft Praised. The Washington Post's Ruth Marcus (1/10, A13) writes, "when the newly minted speaker of the House invited her own grandchildren and the other children in the chamber to join her on the podium and touch the speaker's gavel, my first thought was: This is so choreographed. My second thought was: Awwwww. … This plays to Pelosi's advantages, humanizes her image as shrill San Francisco Democrat. As a woman and a mother, especially as a mother of daughters, I was quietly thrilled. About the marble ceiling cracking, yes, but also about the way Pelosi cracked it -- reveling in, not minimizing, her mother- and grandmother-hood."

Senate Ethics Reforms Include Gift Ban, Waiting Period. The AP (1/10, Abrams) reports, "Picking up on the anti-corruption theme that helped bring them to power, Democrats in both the House and Senate have started off with legislation to ban gifts and meals from lobbyists, limit privately paid travel and shine more light on the special projects, or earmarks, that have proliferated in legislation." Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid and minority leader Mitch McConnell "offered several alternatives aimed at strengthening the Senate bill, which has been criticized as being inadequate in several key areas. Among the proposals were to require lawmakers to pay the full price of tickets to sporting and entertainment events and to expand the definition of earmarks to include targeted tax and tariff benefits and projects routed through a federal agency that benefit only one nonfederal entity." The AP notes the Senate bill, "in addition to requiring a two-year waiting period before former members can lobby Congress, would bar lawmakers from negotiating for jobs with lobbying firms while still in office. 'We should not tolerate a committee chairman shepherding the Medicare prescription drug bill through Congress at the same time that he is negotiating a job with the pharmaceutical industry to become their top lobbyist,' said Sen. Barack Obama. The AP notes Obama was referring to former Rep. Billy Tauzin "who left Congress in 2005 to head the trade group representing pharmaceutical companies."

Corporate Jet Provision Faces Bipartisan Opposition. Roll Call (1/10, Newmyer) reports Reid's plan "most controversially, would force Senators to pay charter rates for rides they catch on corporate jets. The corporate jet proposal already has met with opposition from Senators who will play a key role in the reform debate. Both Rules and Administration Chairwoman Dianne Feinstein and ranking member Bob Bennett who are helping manage debate on the bill — spoke out against the change, arguing it would make it impossible for Members representing large, rural states to travel and reach constituents."

DOJ_NMG_0114574

The New York Times (1/10, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes that Reid, "like most of his colleagues on both sides of the aisle, is an admitted frequent flier on posh lobbyist-provided corporate jets. So we were very pleased yesterday when he proposed legislation that would require senators to pay the full charter-flight fare if they wanted to ride in the style of a C.E.O. Speaker Nancy Pelosi took the issue further with a full House ban on private jet perks, enacted through a rules change, not legislation. But Senator Reid's initiative could be just as effective, provided no loopholes creep in as the Senate takes up wide-ranging proposals for ethics reform."

The Los Angeles Times (1/10, 850K) editorializes, "The Senate prides itself on being different than…the more plebian and poll-driven House of Representatives. But do members of the World's Greatest Deliberative Body really want to define themselves by their greater willingness to hop aboard a corporate jet? You might think so, judging from the rumblings from senators unhappy about the pressure to follow the ethically energized House in banning travel by members on corporate planes."

Johnson's Condition Upgraded To Fair. The AP (1/10, Jalonick) reports Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson's "condition has been upgraded from critical to fair, four weeks after he was hospitalized for a brain hemorrhage, and he no longer needs a ventilator to help him breathe." Doctor Vivek Deshmukh said Johnson is "breathing independently after using a ventilator for several weeks, most recently only at night." Johnson spokeswoman Julianne Fisher said the Senator "remains in intensive care at George Washington University Hospital." The Senator is "expected to leave intensive care but remain in the hospital when he begins the rehabilitation process. His office has said that his recovery is expected to take several months." The Washington Post (1/10, A11, 690K) runs an abbreviated version of the AP story.

NYTimes Says Congress Should Support Embryonic Stem Cell Research. The New York Times (1/10, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "House Democrats are poised to push through a bill this week that would loosen President Bush's restrictions on federal support of embryonic stem cell research. The bill will be opposed by legislators beholden to religious conservatives. Many are likely to cite a new study suggesting that broadly useful stem cells can be derived from amniotic fluid without destroying embryos to get them." But the "new study, while certainly intriguing, in no way lessens the need to widen the array of embryonic stem cells available for research and ultimately therapy. The Democrats' proposal is extremely modest — about the least that could be done to accelerate progress in this promising field. It deserves support from veto-proof majorities in both houses."

WSJournal Urges Supreme Court To Back "Paycheck Protection." The Wall Street Journal (1/10, A16, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "Compulsory dues are the financial foundation of Big Labor's political power. So you can bet union officials will be paying special attention today as the Supreme Court hears oral arguments in a case that could affect how that money may be spent." The appeal "consolidates two cases from Washington state, where even nonmembers of unions can be forced to pay collective-bargaining dues as a condition of employment." In 1992, Washington "voters rebelled against that obligation; they overwhelmingly approved a paycheck protection law that requires unions to get 'affirmative authorization' from workers who don't belong to the union before spending their dues money on politics." The state teachers union, "the Washington Education Association, challenged the voter-passed law, and a state Supreme Court ruling last year struck it down on the grounds that it violated the First Amendment free-speech rights of union officials. It's a novel rationale, to say the least." Washington is "one of a half-dozen states to pass a paycheck protection law. And if the lower court ruling is upheld on the principle that unions have a constitutional right to extract money for political activities from even nonmembers, these laws could be jeopardized everywhere."

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Finish Mixed. NBC Nightly News (1/9, story 8, :10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Here in New York on Wall Street the Dow off almost 7 points [to close at 12,416.60]. NASDAQ was up nearly six points [to close at 2,443.83] at the end of today's trading."

Kentucky GOP Eager To Challenge Yarmuth. The Hill (1/10, Youngman) reports that although Kentucky Republicans "will focus 2007 on maintaining the governor's mansion, those in the 3rd congressional district already are gunning to retake a congressional seat lost in last year's Democratic wave." Democratic Rep. John Yarmuth, "who narrowly defeated five-term congresswoman Anne Northup with 51 percent of the vote, is facing a local and state GOP bitter over Northup's defeat." Northup reportedly will "throw her hat in the primary ring against embattled Republican Gov. Ernie Fletcher," but "a number of Louisville Republicans are chomping at the bit to win back the congressional seat that is comprised almost wholly of Louisville, the commonwealth's largest metropolitan area." Potential challengers "to Yarmuth include Erwin Roberts, a former Fletcher administration official and member of the University of Kentucky Board of Trustees, and Chris Thieneman, a builder and contractor popular in the growing southern area of the district, according to a source familiar with Louisville Republican politics."

DOJ_NMG_0114575

DeMint Endorses Romney. The AP (1/10, Davenport) reports Sen. Jim DeMint of South Carolina "has endorsed former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney in the 2008 presidential race, according to a letter the South Carolina senator is sending to state Republicans." Sen. John McCain of Arizona "is favored by Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina's senior senator."

Fox News' Special Report (1/9, Hume) reported, "One day after the former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney raised $6.5 million for his campaign, he picked up support from Republican Sen. Jim Demint of the South Carolina, another key early primary state. Romney is already well organized in New Hampshire, not so Rudy Giuliani. He has done little work in New Hampshire and Republicans here and across the country continue to question whether or not he will enter the race."

Romney, McCain Compete For House GOP Support. The Hill (1/10, Crabtree) reports GOP House members have "been enjoying the attention of two powerful politicians," Romney and McCain, who are both "racing to recast their reputations as moderates." They "recognize that by courting House Republicans, they can silence critics early and tap into a large swath of grassroots support that will be key in determining the outcome of the GOP primary contest early next year." GOP Conference Chairman Adam Putnam said, "A lot of people wonder how a conservative got elected governor in Massachusetts. I'm still learning about Romney and his policies." The Hill adds while Romney and McCain's efforts in South Carolina "have been making headlines recently, the two also are keeping a close watch on conservative support in the House. Romney was the first to reach out to House Republicans last year, taking advantage of some conservatives' 'anybody but McCain' mentality and disdain for the Arizona lawmaker's campaign-finance reform and immigration agendas. Romney has to contend with his own record on gay marriage and opposition to the Contract with America." Nearly "all of the dozen GOP members interviewed for this article had been contacted by one of the two candidates — many of them during the first week of 2007."

Iowa GOP Leaders Cool To McCain. Roll Call (1/10, Drucker) reports that despite his "status as the national frontrunner for the Republican presidential nomination, Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) appears to have an uphill climb in the make-or-break caucus state of Iowa, where a majority of county Republican chairmen say he is far from the first choice of likely caucus voters." The "prevailing sentiment in recent interviews with 63 of Iowa's 99 GOP county chairmen was one of respect for McCain as a war hero and public servant but disdain for his politics — particularly his handling of President Bush's judicial nominees and his association with the issue of campaign finance reform. Disenchantment with his candidacy reaches all corners of the state, including the pivotal Republican stronghold of northwest Iowa and vote-rich counties such as Polk, Linn and Scott." Most, "even those who complimented the campaign organization the Arizona Senator and 2000 presidential candidate is assembling, said he is not conservative enough — he is too much of a 'maverick,' several county chairman said — to win."

New Hampshire Voting Trends Said To Disadvantage McCain. Fox News' Special Report (1/9, Hume) reported that in New Hampshire, independents have "outnumbered both Democrats and Republicans" at the polls, "but they have tended to vote GOP. Last year, Democrats won huge electoral gains and that has dramatically changed the presidential campaign trail of 2008. That may be bad news" for McCain, "who won the New Hampshire primary in 2000 because of independent votes. Longtime GOP powerbroker Ed DuPont backed to McCain in 2000, but suggests that in the wake of the Democratic wins in New Hampshire, independents now lean left. … Polls suggest independents are turned off by McCain's support for sending more US troops to Iraq."

Vilsack Says Congress Should Block Funds For Additional Iraq Troops. The AP (1/10, Davenport) reports Democrat Tom Vilsack "called on Congress to block funds for additional troops in Iraq but expressed misgivings about using the power of the purse to reduce U.S. forces." Vilsack said, "I think it's one way of absolutely putting that on the table. Mr. President, you don't have a blank check. Congress basically made a mistake by giving him a blank check at the beginning of this process. Now they are basically saying you don't get a second blank check." The AP adds that in "one of his last acts as Iowa governor, Vilsack asked state lawmakers to take a stand against the war in Iraq."

Gilmore Forms Exploratory Committee. The AP (1/10, Lewis) reports Jim Gilmore, "Virginia's former tax-slashing Republican governor, on Tuesday took the first step in a long-shot bid for the presidency." Aide Matt Williams said Gilmore "filed papers with the Federal Election Commission in Washington to form the Jim Gilmore for President Exploratory Committee." He is "the sixth Republican to form an exploratory committee — a year before the first primary votes are cast." Like "several other Republican hopefuls, Gilmore said he entered the race because the GOP field lacks a true conservative and argues his candidacy will resonate with conservatives disillusioned with the party."

DOJ_NMG_0114576

The Washington Times (1/10, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Gilmore "became the latest Republican to form an exploratory committee in advance of a potential 2008 White House campaign." Virginia GOP Chairman Ed Gillespie said, "Jim Gilmore is a former governor of a very important state with a strong conservative record." But Gillespie "said he is neutral on the field of Republican presidential primary candidates." The Times adds Gilmore "last year traveled to key primary states such as Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina. In August, a group of supporters started a Web site to encourage the former governor to run for the White House."

Clinton Campaign Likely To Be Headquartered In DC Area. The New York Times (1/10, Healy, 1.16M) reports that "among the signs that the Clinton presidential kabuki is ending -- that Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton will, in fact, announce her campaign for the White House soon -- is a decision, Democrats close to her say, that she plans to base her campaign headquarters in or around Washington instead of in White Plains or New York, which had been under consideration." Clinton aides say that "running from a base in Washington would make the most practical and financial sense," and "they note that she would have satellite offices in New York and elsewhere. Still, a few advisers and supporters are concerned about the decision, saying it could reinforce her image as a Washington insider (if it is possible for that to be any more of an issue) and increase the possibility of leaks to the press corps (as if, ditto)."

Greens Question Obama's Support For Coal. The Washington Post (1/10, A11, Williamson, 690K) reports that while Democratic Sen. Barak Obama "gets stellar marks from greens," environmentalists wonder why Obama is "backing a law supporting the expanded use of coal, whose emissions are cooking the globe? It seems the answer is twofold: his interest in energy independence -- and his interest in downstate Illinois, where the senator's green tinge makes the coal industry queasy." The coal industry "praises Obama's reintroduction, with Sen. Jim Bunning (R-Ky.), of the Coal-to-Liquid Fuel Promotion Act of 2007 last week, which would provide incentives for research and plant construction. The industry says the technology, which converts coal into diesel engine fuel, would reduce America's dependence on foreign oil through a new, home-mined fuel that burns as cleanly as gasoline." But environmentalists "say focusing on coal does nothing to arrest climate change. Instead, they say, lawmakers should back cleaner alternative fuels and stricter automobile and industrial emissions standards."

Bayh Donor Base A Sought After Commodity. The Hill (1/10, Bolton) reports, "Democratic White House hopefuls such as Sens. Barack Obama (Ill.), Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and former Sen. John Edwards (N.C.) are rushing to capitalize on an impressive national fundraising network Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) built in the mold of President Bush's pioneers program. The strength of Bayh's connections could boost his profile when the Democratic nominee selects a running mate next year." Just prior to Bayh's decision against an '08 run in December, "about 160 of his biggest donors were scheduled to fly to Washington to craft a fundraising campaign. Several of Bayh's advisers said that 'well over' 150 donors in his network had pledged to raise $150,000 each for the campaign, and a smaller group of fundraisers had promised to raise $500,000 apiece." Bayh advisers say a "unique quality of the network" is that "it includes many donors — a group cultivated by the lawmaker, who has strong ties to the business community and espouses centrist policies — that are not in other national candidates' databases. Combined, the donors helped stockpile more than $10 million in cash on hand to Bayh's reelection fund, which can be transferred immediately to a presidential campaign and would enhance the senator's viability as a vice presidential nominee." Bayh's chief fundraising aide, Nancy Jacobson, who helped to build the network, already has signed on to Clinton's presidential campaign. But Edwards and Obama are also trying to snag a piece of Bayh's pie."

Schwarzenegger Proposes Universal Healthcare Coverage. ABC World News (1/9, story 6, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported on Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's proposal to "insure all Californians, even undocumented immigrants. The cost? $12 billion. He says he has a way to pay for it." ABC (Rooney) added, "The most ambitious feature in Schwarzenegger's plan is requiring health insurance for all 6.5 million Californians that don't have it now." The details include "universal coverage regardless of age or existing health condition, expand coverage for poorer children, regardless of immigration status, require companies with ten or more employees to provide or subsidize health insurance." How would "he pay for it? In part, the 2% gross tax on doctors. 4% from the hospitals. And getting $5.5 billion more in Federal aid."

The CBS Evening News (1/9, story 4, 2:25, Hughes, 7.66M) reported, "The plan also calls for doctors and hospitals to pay into a state insurance pool. Insurance companies will be forced to cut administrative costs." Jamie Court, Foundation for Taxpayer & Consumer Hights: "The problem I have is he's also forcing every individual in the state to buy health insurance without telling insurers what they have to charge for it." Hughes: "Love it or hate it, California's health care plan is a maverick and once again, the state leads where the Federal Government fears to tread."

DOJ_NMG_0114577

NBC Nightly News (1/9, story 5, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported Schwarzenegger's plan "is ambitious and will require a lot of different interests to get along and corporate for it to work." NBC (Lewis) added, "The plan would require companies with 10 or more employees to offer health insurance or contribute to a state insurance fund. The business lobby opposes that idea." Allan Zaremberg, California Chamber of Commerce: "It's important to have access to healthcare, but we can't lose jobs over it." Lewis: "In spite of the critics, California is joining a national trend. Spurred by the increasing number of Americans without health insurance and by the lack of action in Washington, state legislatures are making healthcare reform a top priority. California would join three other states that are implementing universal healthcare plans."

The New York Times (1/10, McKinley, 1.16M) reports, "Democrats and Mr. Schwarzenegger's fellow Republicans are already in agreement: his first big idea of his second term — a sweeping plan unveiled Monday to assure health care to all Californians — is promising and ambitious, but faces a long, hard fight before enactment. Chief among the challenges, politicians and policy analysts said Tuesday, is the enormous number of political players — from big labor and big insurance to small-county government — that would be affected by any universal health care bill." Schwarzenegger's plan "would provide care to the 6.5 million Californians who currently have no insurance, including an estimated one million illegal immigrants. That is just one of the elements to which Republicans are objecting." The California Medical Association, "which represents more than 34,000 doctors in the state, gave the proposed overhaul mixed reviews. Though the association praised the idea of universal coverage, the fee on doctors could be a deal breaker."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/10, Wood, 59K) reports Schwarzenegger's "sweeping plan" to "guarantee health insurance for all Californians - including children of illegal immigrants - is being characterized both as a bold model for improving healthcare access and as a costly government intrusion that will hurt the state's economy." The "sheer numbers involved in Governor Schwarzenegger's proposal - a $12 billion price tag and coverage for 6.5 million people who currently don't have health insurance - are guaranteed to raise the stakes as the California legislature considers whether to approve it."

Massachusetts Faces Challenge In Enrolling Working Poor. The New York Times (1/10, Belluck, 1.16M) reports that in its "drive to provide health insurance to nearly all its residents, Massachusetts has already signed up more than half of the poorest people who are eligible." But "experts and politicians agree that the bigger challenge will be the next 150,000 people: the working poor who will get a state-subsidized rate but will still have to pay for insurance, typically $18 to $170 a month depending on their income." Paul Ginsburg, an economist who leads the Center for Studying Health System Change, said, "This group is going to be much more challenging. They're dealing with people who don't even think about having health insurance."

Schwarzenegger Plan Criticized For Reliance On Regulation. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (1/10), David Henderson, a research fellow at Stanford's Hoover Institution, says Schwarzenegger's "proposal is almost indistinguishable -- except in details -- from that of the Democrats who dominate the California Assembly and Senate." The Democrats "tend to favor solutions involving regulations, government spending and taxes, and Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata's proposal -- the main contending Democrat plan -- hits the trifecta." Schwarzenegger's "solution hits the trifecta also. He would require employers with 10 or more workers to provide health insurance or pay a 4% tax on all wages covered by Social Security: Look for employers with 10 to 12 employees to get creative about outsourcing. And look as well, as Harvard economist Jonathan Gruber has documented, for wages to fall in firms that offer health insurance because of the mandate." California "should not, contra Gov. Schwarzenegger, do new regulatory harm; rather it should repeal existing regulations that cause harm -- so as to make health insurance even more affordable."

Schwarzenegger Backs Infrastructure, Renewable Fuels. The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Warren, 850K) reports, "Urging lawmakers to think big and act boldly, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger today outlined a sweeping 2007 agenda that proposes borrowing more than $43 billion to improve California's roads, prisons, schools and water supply." In his fourth State of the State speech, Schwarzenegger "also vowed to make California a leader in the fight against global warming, pledged to provide health insurance for those who lack it and restated his desire to re-map legislative districts to increase political competition." Schwarzenegger "acknowledged during his speech to the Legislature that his goals at the dawn of his final term were ambitious. But he said leaders 'must be ambitious to get California to the future,'' and he urged lawmakers to set aside their partisan predilections and find solutions that best serve the state." The Times adds, "Although Schwarzenegger has made a handful of recent appearances by satellite, tonight's address marks only his second in-the-flesh event since he fractured the femur in his right leg while skiing in Sun Valley just before Christmas."

The Washington Post (1/10, A3, Geis, 690K) reports Schwarzenegger has "unleashed a torrent of proposals to shake up everything in his state from health care to road-building to politics itself, all in an effort to reshape his party and set a national agenda." The ""most recent offering, in Schwarzenegger's State of the State address Tuesday, is a plan to cut vehicle emissions of greenhouse gases by 10 percent. He will require petroleum refineries to reduce the carbon content of their fuel over the next 13 years -- a signal to any doubters that his recent aggressive positioning as an environmentalist is not mere political theater." The "action-hero governor hopes to flex the state's muscles in the national arena starting next year. Schwarzenegger told Newsweek this week that he wants to move California's primary elections to February, giving the state more clout in presidential elections."

DOJ_NMG_0114578

The New York Times (1/10, Steinhauer, Barringer, 1.16M) reports Schwarzenegger's order to reduce greenhouse gases, "which the governor wants completed by 2020, follows California's trademark pattern of hitching its environmental aspirations to its market muscle. It also represents one of the first examples of a state or a national government regulating the fuel in its passenger vehicles as part of a strategy to reduce both emissions that contribute to climate change and dependence on foreign oil." It is the "first example of the practical impact of a deal made last summer between the Legislature and the governor to reduce carbon dioxide emissions by about 25 percent by 2020."

LATimes Praises Schwarzenegger's Big Ambitions. The Los Angeles Times (1/10, 850K) says in an editorial, "It's one thing for the governor to be ambitious. Arnold Schwarzenegger came from Hollywood, where success is impossible without ambition. It's quite another thing for the Legislature, which has historically rewarded timidity and resistance, to match his audacity. Yet that's exactly what will have to happen for California to reach the heights Schwarzenegger set for it in his State of the State speech Tuesday."

Political Initiatives Could Increase Demand For Ethanol. The Wall Street Journal (1/10, Fialka, 2.04M) reports that in addition to Schwarzenegger's mandate to cut carbon emissions, "governors of 37 states" are "prepared to push for a new federal rule to require greater use of ethanol fuel." Both efforts are "designed to reduce global warming and the U.S.'s reliance on imported oil, but they also could raise consumer prices for food and fuel. The initiatives also signal the increasing urgency of climate change as an issue both in state capitals and in Washington." President Bush is "expected to express more support for domestically produced ethanol when he gives his State of the Union address later this month. Meanwhile, Democratic leaders in Congress are talking up the need for alternative fuels and national emissions controls." While the "details of the proposal have yet to be worked out, California officials explained that the program would leave it up to oil suppliers in the state to figure out how to reduce carbon content, but that using more ethanol, which contains less carbon, would be the most likely way. The move, they estimated, would triple the size of the state's market for ethanol and other renewable fuels."

Texas State House Reelects Craddick As Speaker. The Dallas Morning News (1/10, Brooks, 500K) reports Texas state House Speaker Tom Craddick (R) "was overwhelmingly re-elected to his leadership post Tuesday night after Rep. Jim Pitts of Waxahachie withdrew from the race." Craddick "was re-elected 121-27, the first major piece of business that lawmakers conducted at the start of their 140-day regular session." Craddick, R-Midland, "faced a stiff challenge from members angry over his management style, saying that he often forced them to vote against the wishes of their constituents. But other members stood with Mr. Craddick, saying he had been a strong leader that had accomplished much as the first Republican to lead the House in modern times."

The New York Times (1/10, Evans, 1.16M) reports Craddick, "an ally of the former United States House majority leader, Tom DeLay, survived a strong challenge on Tuesday from a fellow Republican to win his third term in the leadership position on the first day of the 80th session of the Legislature." After "more than five hours of haggling about procedures, Representative Jim Pitts withdrew." Pitts, "of Waxahachie, whom Mr. Craddick appointed chairman of the Appropriations Committee, has been in the House since 1992. He has at times disagreed with Mr. Craddick's leadership, which is often compared to Mr. DeLay's."

Santorum Takes Post At DC Think Tank. The Washington Times' "Inside Politics" column (1/10, Pierce) reports former Sen. Rick Santorum "yesterday became a senior fellow at the Ethics and Public Policy Center. … He hopes to remain in the public spotlight as director of the EPPC's brand-new America's Enemies program, Mr. Miller writes. 'It's a stark name,' Mr. Santorum said. 'But we wanted to be candid about the fact that America really does have enemies and to point out that the nature of these enemies is much more complex than what people realize. It's not just Islamic fascism, but also Venezuela, North Korea, and, increasingly in my opinion, Russia.'" The Washington Post "In the Loop" column also notes Santorum's move.

Treasury Department Imposes Sanctions On Iranian Bank. The New York Times (1/10, A3, Weisman, 1.16M) reports the US Treasury Department, "moving to raise pressure on Iran," Tuesday barred American financial institutions from doing business with "a major Iranian bank after concluding that it had been involved in illicit weapons programs." The move against Bank Sepah "also affected North Korea, which American officials said had used the bank to facilitate payments to a North Korean group that exports missile technologies." Stuart Levey, the Treasury under secretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, said, "Bank Sepah is the financial linchpin of Iran's missile procurement network, and has actively assisted Iran's pursuit of missiles capable of carrying weapons of mass destruction," said Mr. Levey said Bank Sepah had been involved in transactions for Iran's Aerospace Industries Organization and two Iranian missile companies. These three entities were mentioned in the Security Council resolution approved in late December calling on all countries to avoid doing business with various groups in Iran." Levey also said the United States had "been in touch with authorities in Britain, France, Italy and Germany to discuss the need to persuade local financial institutions to stop doing business with Bank Sepah."

DOJ_NMG_0114579

The Financial Times (1/10, Dinmore) says the move "will have limited impact as US trade with Iran is severely limited by sanctions imposed in the 1990s." The Washington Post (1/10, A8, Linzer, 690K) notes that the action is "part of a larger White House plan, put in place last year, to cut off Iran's access to US and European currencies." Though US officials say the effort is aimed at Tehran, "it is also likely to affect millions of Iranian citizens who conduct personal business in US dollars and who travel overseas."

The Wall Street Journal (1/10, A3, Simpson, Crawford, 2.04M) reports the Administration's "attempt to isolate Iran's economy will get a significant boost this month when the last European bank known to be clearing large volumes of that country's dollar transactions in the US halts the practice." Commerzbank AG, Germany's second-largest bank, said it will stop handling dollar transactions for Iran at its New York branch by Jan. 31. Meanwhile, US analysts "say there is evidence that Iranian firms are feeling the pinch of the US-led drive. Iranian banks and companies, for instance, are now having to put up large deposits -- as high as 100% -- in foreign banks to get them to issue letters of credit for foreign transactions, they claim."

Iran Arrests Spy For Selling Nuclear Secrets To Opposition Group. The AP (1/10) reports Iran said Tuesday it has arrested a man "on suspicion of selling nuclear secrets to an exiled Iranian opposition group," state radio reported. The report did not identify the suspected spy, "but said he had been working at the Iranian Parliament's Research Center, an organization that advises lawmakers on foreign and strategic issues." The report said the individual "transferred classified information, including a bulletin on nuclear activities, to the hypocrites," referring to the People's Mujahedeen of Iran.

Israel Arrests Muslim Cleric Deported From US. The AP (1/10, Friedman) reports Israel "arrested the former imam of Ohio's largest mosque after he was deported from the United States last week, the Shin Bet internal security service confirmed Tuesday." Fawaz Damra was arrested "because of his ties to Islamic Jihad," Shin Bet told the AP, but "gave no other details." Damra was deported by American authorities last week "because he concealed his ties to Islamic Jihad when he applied for American citizenship in 1994."

Hezbollah Continues Lebanon Protests Despite Smaller Turnout. The Washington Post (1/10, A7, Shadid, 690K) reports Hezbollah "and its allies widened their campaign Tuesday to force the Lebanese government's resignation, backing what they vowed would be a series of daily protests scattered across the capital." However, Tuesday's gathering was seen as "a sedate affair compared with the convergence of hundreds of thousands twice last month in Beirut's downtown." The demonstration was "more symbolic than dramatic," and the "relatively small size of the protest gave rise to speculation" about "divisions between Hezbollah and its partners, particularly Michel Aoun, a populist Christian politician who has forcefully called for an escalation in the protests."

Rice To Leave Friday For Mideast. AFP (1/10, Millikin) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice Friday will travel to the Middle East "in a bid to sell a new US strategy for Iraq to wary allies and to take another shot at reviving Israeli-Palestinian peace efforts." State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Rice would visit Israel, the Palestinian territories, Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait "before stop-offs in Germany and Britain during the January 12-19 trip." While in Kuwait, Rice will meet with her counterparts from the six Gulf monarchies plus Egypt and Jordan where "a major part" of Rice's discussions will focus on "the perception of a common threat posed by Iran and other forces of extremism and violence in the region," McCormack said. Rice will also seek regional support for Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Siniora, McCormack said. In the Palestinian territories, the Secretary will "pursue a months-long effort to bolster Abbas in a power struggle between" his Fatah party and Hamas.

The Washington Times (1/10, Kralev, 88K) notes that Rice will "return to Europe on Jan. 24 for an international donors conference in Paris to raise funds for Lebanon." Meanwhile, US officials and diplomats from some of the countries she will visit "said that, despite the low expectations, it is important for the secretary to return to the Middle East, given the dire situation in Iraq, the tensions between the Palestinian Fatah faction and Hamas, and the new domestic political realities in the United States." The Times also notes that the Bush administration "has been under pressure from its European allies to become more active in working toward a resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict."

DOJ_NMG_0114580

Expert Says Iraq War Has Shifted Alliances In Middle East. Edward N. Luttwak, a senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/10, 2.04M) reports, "It was the hugely ambitious project of the Bush administration to transform the entire Middle East by remaking Iraq into an irresistible model of prosperous democracy. Having failed in that worthy purpose, another, more prosaic result has inadvertently been achieved: divide and rule, the classic formula for imperial power on the cheap." For example, Luttwak says the "Sunni-US alignment in Lebanon, which interestingly coexists with the US-Shiite alliance in Iraq, may yet achieve results of strategic importance if Syria is successfully detached from its alliance with Iran." He goes on to note that "when the Bush administration came into office, only Egypt and Jordan were functioning allies of the US." However, the Iraq war, he concludes, "has indeed brought into existence a New Middle East, in which Arab Sunnis can no longer gleefully disregard American interests because they need help against the looming threat of Shiite supremacy, while in Iraq at the core of the Arab world, the Shia are allied with the US."

US General Says Pyongyang May Conduct Nuclear Test. The AP (1/10, Kim) reports the top US general on the Korean Peninsula, Army Gen. B.B. Bell, "said Tuesday he believes North Korea might conduct another nuclear test." At a news conference in Seoul, Gen. Bell said, "There is no reason to believe that at some time in the future, when it serves their purposes, that they won't test another one. So I suspect someday they will." The AP notes that concerns about North Korea "heightened abruptly last week in Asia after ABC News reported Pyongyang might be preparing for another test." On its front page, the Washington Times (1/10, A1, Salmon, 88K) says Bell "also vented his frustration at a range of issues bedeviling Washington's military alliance with Seoul," expressing "concerns about the relocation of the headquarters of the US forces in South Korea, the transfer of wartime command of South Korean forces to South Korean leadership, and budgetary shortfalls."

Stealth Fighters To Be Deployed To South Korea. AFP (1/10) reports, "The United States is sending between 15 and 24 radar-evading Stealth fighters to South Korea this month, the US military has said, amid increasing speculation over a second North Korean nuclear test." US Forces Korea spokesman Kim Yong-Kyu called the decision "a routine deployment."

Seoul Urges Pyongyang To Accept US Proposal On Nuclear Program. The AP (1/10, Kim) reports South Korea Wednesday "renewed a call for North Korea to seriously consider US proposals" before returning to six-party talks on its nuclear weapons program. The US "has offered security guarantees, a peace treaty and normalization of relations as well as removal of North Korea from Washington's list of states sponsoring terrorism" if it dismantles its atomic weapons program, according to South Korean officials. The next round of talks is tentatively set to begin on January 22.

US Human Rights Envoy Urges Says Foreign Salaries Help North Korea's Nuclear Program. Jay Lefkowitz, President Bush's special envoy for human rights in North Korea, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/10, A16, 2.04M) that "there is a growing consensus in the international community that North Korea's conduct is unacceptable. Nevertheless, several countries engage in practices that funnel cash to the regime in a manner that violates the spirit of a recent United Nations resolution and raises serious human rights concerns." These countries, including Russia and the Czech Republic, "contract" North Korean labor. However, Lefkowitz warns that "because the North Korean government takes a major portion of workers' salaries, these arrangements provide material support for a rogue government, its nuclear ambitions, and its human-rights atrocities." While "some argue that labor arrangements like those in Russia and Kaesong are positive developments," Lefkowitz says "it is more likely that the hard currency these countries are sending to North Korea will end up funding the regime's nuclear aspirations instead of improving living conditions for the people of North Korea."

Rice To Announce Creation Of New Public Diplomacy Award. The Washington Post (1/10, A4, Kessler, 690K) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will announce today the creation of "a new annual award to honor a company, academic institution or other nongovernmental entity that does the most to promote the US image abroad through intercultural understanding," State Department officials said. The Benjamin Franklin Award for Public Diplomacy is "designed to prod corporations and other nongovernmental groups to play a bigger role in public diplomacy at a time when the image of the US government has been battered by a backlash, especially in the Arab world, from the invasion of Iraq." Rice will highlight the award during a speech at a conference of public relations organizations at the State Department.

New Congress Likely To Take Harder Stance On Russia. The Financial Times (1/10, Kirchgaessner, Dinmore) reports the Bush administration's relationship with the Kremlin "has chilled considerably since the moment in 2001 when the US president famously looked into the soul of his Russian counterpart and declared that Vladimir Putin was 'very straightforward and trustworthy.' And Washington's stance towards Moscow could become even more frosty in coming months, potentially colliding with expected attempts by Russia to use its new found oil and natural gas wealth to step up its investment in the US." While the Republican-controlled Congress took "the White House's lead in their stance toward Russia," the Times says "experts predict that mounting concerns on Capitol Hill, on issues ranging from Mr. Putin's commitment to democracy to questions about the security of western investments in the Russian energy sector, could see lawmakers taking a more robust, sceptical approach." The Democratically-controlled Congress is "also likely to renew the focus on allegations of human rights abuses in Russia."

DOJ_NMG_0114581

Merkel Blasts Russia Over Suspension Of Oil Exports Through Belarus. The Financial Times (1/10, Parker, Ostrovsky, Crooks, Flood) reports, "Vladimir Putin on Tuesday faced an angry European backlash about his decision to halt oil supplies through the pipelines crossing Belarus. As the Russian president made clear his determination not to back down in his dispute with Belarus, Angela Merkel, the German chancellor, denounced his actions as 'not acceptable,' noting that even during the height of the cold war, Russia had been a reliable energy supplier to Europe." Putin "stressed he wanted to do all he could to ensure that oil supplies to western Europe were not affected. But he escalated the dispute by telling his government to tell Russian companies to cut output because of the transit dispute."

The Washington Post (1/10, A9, Finn, 690K) says Merkel "forcefully condemned Russia...for failing to consult the European Union before it cut off part of its oil exports to Europe ... . 'Even during the Cold War, Russia was a stable energy supplier,' said Merkel, whose country holds the rotating presidency of the European Union." The Post adds, "Russian officials say they feel deeply aggrieved by the tactics of Belarus, which they accuse of stealing crude oil destined for Western Europe, but the Kremlin is nonetheless getting another black eye over its reliability as an energy supplier."

The New York Times (1/10, Schwirtz, 1.16M) reports, "An unyielding President Vladimir V. Putin on Tuesday raised the possibility of diverting oil transit routes away from Belarus, a day after Moscow cut off pipeline deliveries of crude oil headed to customers in Eastern and Central Europe through the country. Such a change, which would be years in the making, would cut Belarus out of any role in the transshipment of oil to Europe without offering the customers any immediate assurance that their supplies were reliable." The Times adds, "Officials from Belarus flew to Moscow to negotiate, and one delegation submitted a draft agreement to the Russian Trade Ministry, the Russian news agency Interfax reported."

The Los Angeles Times (1/10, Holley, 850K) says the dispute "may drag on long enough to force Moscow to cut production, Russian President Vladimir V. Putin said Tuesday."

Moscow's Moves Fuel Fears Over European Oil Supplies. The Wall Street Journal (1/10, White, Chazan, 2.04M) reports, "Russia's threat to reduce oil production in a worsening trade war with neighboring Belarus is fueling fears of a drawn-out conflict that could slice Europe's main supply of crude." European "officials warned that the European Union might have to take the costly step of releasing oil from its strategic reserve if the cutoff is prolonged." The EC "said it would convene a special meeting tomorrow to discuss how to make up for the lost Russian supplies."

US Criticizes Chavez Plan As Investors Pull Back. McClatchy (1/10, Bachelet) reports the Bush administration Tuesday "slammed Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's plans to nationalize his country's power and telecommunications companies and demanded that US firms be properly compensated." White House spokesman Tony Snow noted that nationalization "has a long and inglorious history of failure around the world," calling this week's move "an unhappy day" for the people of Venezuela. Separately, NSC spokesman Gordon Johndroe said the US expects that American companies affected by Chavez's moves will be "promptly and fairly compensated." The Washington Post (1/10, A7, Forero, 690K) reports the US Energy Department "also expressed concern" that Chavez would "increase state control over four major oil projects in which American and other foreign companies have invested $17 billion."

The AP (1/10, Pearson) reports investors "spooked" by the plans "rushed to sell off Venezuelan stocks Tuesday." The New York Times (1/10, Romero, Krauss, 1.16M) reports investors "reacted with alarm" in markets in the United States and throughout Latin America. The Times notes Verizon "could possibly lose up to several hundred million dollars" due to the nationalization.

The Christian Science Monitor (1/10, Catan, 59K) says Chávez has "laid the groundwork for a sharp leftward shift and launched a clampdown on dissent, in what analysts see as a broad-based effort to strengthen his grip on power."

More Commentary. In an editorial, the New York Times (1/10, 1.16M) says "while the Bush administration needs to condemn any seizure of American assets, it should choose its words carefully so as not to play into Mr. Chávez's Yanqui-baiting game. The administration can best advance American interests, and those of the people of Latin America, through more active engagement of the region's many democracies. It also needs to press ahead with trade agreements and other forms of economic assistance and cooperation. That is the smartest way to counter Mr. Chávez's demagoguery."

DOJ_NMG_0114582

In an editorial, the Washington Post (1/10, A12, 690K) writes, "Some will see in Mr. Chavez's actions a threat to US interests. Certainly, those who caution that it is unwise to count on Venezuela to continue supplying up to 15 percent of US oil imports have a point. If assets of US companies are seized without fair compensation, Venezuela should be subject to penalties. But the main threat posed by Mr. Chavez is to Venezuela's 26 million people. If he follows through on his threats, they can look forward to steadily diminishing freedom and -- if the history of socialism is any guide -- national impoverishment."

Cuban Economists Prepare Plans For Post-Castro Market. In a front page article, the Wall Street Journal (1/10, A1, Davis, 2.04M) reports, "With Fidel Castro ailing and absent from the public stage, some influential Cuban intellectuals are laying plans for a more market-oriented approach to fortify the island's ailing communist economy." The Journal says such "debate over economic experimentation…offers a glimpse of what a post-Castro Cuba could look like." Among the steps under discussion are "decentralizing control, expanding the power of managers at privately owned agricultural cooperatives, extending private ownership to other sectors, boosting investment in infrastructure and increasing incentives to workers." However, none of the plans would "shuck communism for capitalism or open the island further to foreign investment," but "the fact that the government is permitting -- and perhaps even encouraging -- the debate suggests regime officials might find these kinds of changes acceptable, though it may take Mr. Castro's death to put them into action."

Ortega To Be Sworn In Wednesday. The AP (1/10, Carl) reports Daniel Ortega will be sworn in Wednesday as the next president of Nicaragua while "promising to respect free trade and private business and maintain relations with Washington." However, he will be sworn in as president in a ceremony "attended by some of the United States' biggest enemies, including Venezuela's Hugo Chavez and a representative of Iran." The AP calls the ceremony a "reflection of Ortega's delicate balancing act." Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt, who is heading the US delegation at Wednesday's inauguration, met privately with Ortega Tuesday where he told Ortega he wanted to "make clear that our desire is to work with you."

WTO Welcomes Push To Restart Doha Talks. The Financial Times (1/10, Beattie) reports the "trans-Atlantic push to conclude the troubled Doha round of global trade talks got a wary welcome from the head and some members of the World Trade Organization on Tuesday." Although details "of any deal to reconcile the US and European Union positions remain elusive," WTO director-general Pascal Lamy "said the determination expressed this week by US president George W. Bush and José Manuel Barroso, president of the European Commission, was a marked advance." In an interview with the Times, Lamy said, "The signs we are seeing now are qualitatively different from what we heard last year."

Schwab To Meet With Lamy Later This Week. The Wall Street Journal (1/10, A4, Hitt, 2.04M) reports "in a fresh sign of the intensifying efforts to revive moribund global trade talks," US Trade Representative Susan Schwab will travel to Geneva late this week for consultations with Lamy. In the last two weeks, Schwab has "conferred directly with top trade officials from Brazil, Europe and Japan, and has reached out by telephone to India's lead negotiator." A senior US trade official said the meeting with Lamy will "help lay the groundwork for additional discussions to be held later this month at an international conference in Davos, Switzerland." However, the official cautioned that there have been no breakthroughs.

ETA Claims Responsibility For Airport Bomb. The New York Times (1/10, Sciolino, 1.16M) reports Basque separatist organization ETA "said Tuesday that the 'permanent cease-fire' it announced last March was still in effect, even as it formally claimed responsibility for the deadly bomb attack on Madrid's main airport terminal" last week. In a statement sent to Gara, the pro-independence Basque-language newspaper, ETA said it "affirms that the permanent cease-fire started on March 24, 2006, still stands."

Violence Erupts In Bangladeshi Capitol Ahead Of Election. The Christian Science Monitor (1/10, Haider, 59K) reports democracy in Bangladesh "has struggled to preserve for two decades appears to be facing one of its most severe tests this week." The streets of the capital, Dhaka, "resemble a war zone, with police and protesters exchanging volleys of tear-gas shells and Molotov cocktails." The street clashes are the result of "a struggle for power between the country's two major political parties, the Awami League and the Bangladesh National Party (BNP), over the upcoming elections," but "attempts to reconcile the two groups have so far failed, leading analysts to suggest that the violent political crisis may deepen in coming months."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Fido's Little Helper."
"U.S. Teams Try To Rebuild A War-Torn Nation."
"Gov. Calls On State To Borrow And Build More."

DOJ_NMG_0114583

"Officer Who Killed Boy, 13, Is Cleared."
"1,000 Troops Strike Heart Of Baghdad."
"Record Warmth (Again) In 2006."
"Apple Seeks To Redefine Phone."

USA Today:
"Poll: Low Support For Iraq Buildup."
"Obesity Of China's Children 'Shocking'."
"Jockey's Bid For A Second Chance Is Ride Of His Life."

New York Times:
"U.S. And Iraqis Hit Insurgents In All-Day Fight."
"Democrats Plan Symbolic Votes Against Bush's Iraq Troop Plan."
"Steroid Cloud Stops McGwire From Entering Hall."
"Venezuelan Plan Shakes Investors."
"Apple Introduces Innovative Cellphone."
"New York Tries To Think Outside The Sandbox."

Washington Post:
"U.S. Airstrikes Back Troops In Baghdad Clash."
"D.C. Bill Would Mandate Vaccine."
"With Iraq Speech, Bush To Pull Away From His Generals."
"United Airlines Wins Right To Fly To China From Dulles."
"Overhaul Sought Of Pr. George's High Schools."
"Climate Experts Worry as 2006 Is Hottest Year On Record In U.S.."
"Va. Roads Deal Near, Say GOP Leaders."
"Life at $7.25 an Hour

Washington Times:
"House OKs Reforms Urged By 9/11 Panel."
"Kennedy Proposal Uncovers Party Rift."
"Ripken Streaks Into Hall Of Fame."
"US Targets Al Qaeda In Somalia Air Strike."
"Still Smoking In The District."
"General Sees Another N. Korea Nuclear Test."

Detroit Free Press:
"Ford's Millions For Michigan."
"Medicare Drug Cost No Bargain For Many."
"Detroiter Is Charged In Boy's Death."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Governor Turns His Radar On Speeders."
"New Strategy."
"Carter, Clinton, Woo Baptist To New Convention."
"Milk Exhibit Could Be Last Of Its Magnitude."

Houston Chronicle:
"Craddick re-Elected Speaker In landslide."
"Vaccine Proposal Likely To Stir Debate."
"'Like Watching Grass Grow'."
"'Homicidal' Soldier Was Returned To Duty."
"How About This Apple?

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Securing Haifa Street-Iraq; New Iraq Strategy; New Iraq Strategy-Democratic Position; US Air Strike-Somalia; The I Phone; State Affordable Healthcare; Baseball Hall Of Fame; Auto Show; A Soldiers Story.
CBS: Securing Haifa Street-Iraq; New Iraq Strategy; US Air Strike-Somalia; California Healthcare Plan; The I Phone; A Soldiers Story; Oil Prices; Warm Winter Weather; Auto Show.
NBC: New Iraq Strategy; Securing Haifa Street-Iraq; US Air Strike Somalia; Countering RPGs; State Health Insurance-California; California Wildfires; The I Phone; Stock Market; The Princes Girlfriend.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Bush's Iraq Strategy; Somalia-U.S. Military Strikes; Apple's I Phone; Bangor, ME-Smoking Banned In Cars With Children; Blackwell's List Of Worst Dressed Celebrities; Tokyo Stock Exchange.
CBS: Bush's Iraq Strategy; Somalia-U.S. Military Strikes; Congress-Anti-Terror Bill; Congress-Minimum Wage; White House-Judicial Nominees; Wall Street; New Orleans-Crime Cameras; Los Angeles-Increased Adoption Fees For Rodents.
NPR: Congress-Anti-Terror Bill; Bush's Iraq Strategy; Democrats-Additional Troops In Iraq; Farmers Branch, TX-Illegal Immigrant Ordinance; Tokyo Stock Exchange; US Ambassador To Mexico Praises Extradition Of Murder Suspect To US; Cuba-Protests On 5th Anniversary Of Guantanamo Bay Opening; Wall Street.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — 9 p.m. Addresses the nation on Iraq.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — Speaks to a Joint Session of the Virginia General Assembly, Jamestown Memorial Church, Jamestown, Va.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION AND FORESTRY _ Full Committee. Hearing on agriculture and the role of rural America regarding energy security. Philip Sharp, Resources for the Future;USDA Chief Economist Keith Collins; J. Read Smith, 25x'25 Steering Committee; Michael Pacheco, National Renewable Energy Laboratory, Golden, Colo.; Ron Miller, Aventine Renewable Energy Holdings, Pekin, Ill.; Roger Webb, Georgia Institute of Technology; Gene Gourley, Iowa Pork Producers Association; Loni Kemp, The Minnesota Project, Canton, Minn.; John Sellers, Iowa State Soil Conservation Committee. Location: Room 328A, Russell.

DOJ_NMG_0114584

9:30 a.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the current situation in Iraq. Phebe Marr, U.S. Institute of Peace; Michael O'Hanlon, Brookings Institution; Yahia Said, Centre for the study of Global Governance at the London School of Economics; Paul Pillar, former National Intelligence Officer for the Near East and Asia. Location: Room 216, Hart.

9:30 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Hearing on the privacy implications of government data mining programs. Former Rep. Bob Barr; James Carafano, Heritage Foundation; Jim Harper, Cato Institute; Leslie Harris, Center for Democracy and Technology; Kim Taipale, Center for Advanced Studies in Science and Technology Policy. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

9:45 a.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing on global oil supplies and the impact on the U.S. economy and national security. Faith Birol, International Energy Agency; Robert Harmats, Goldman Sachs; retired Gen. Charles Wald, former Deputy Commandere, U.S. European Command; Flynt Leverett, New America Foundation. Location: Room G-50, Dirksen.

10 a.m. FINANCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on tax incentives for business in response to a minimum wage increase. Jared Bernstein, Economic Policy Institute; Joseph Sabia, University of Georgia; Matthew Kadish, Small Business Counsel of America; Dave Ratner, Daves Soda & Pet City, Agawam, Mass.; Bruce Obenour, Akwen, LTD, Dublin, Ohio. Location: Room 215, Dirksen.

10 a.m. HEALTH, EDUCATION, LABOR AND PENSIONS _ Full Committee. Organizational meeting, followed by a hearing on chlalenges and opportunities relating to health care. Location: Room 430, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Closed. Discussion of pending matters. Location: Room 219, Hart.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10 a.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: H.R. 2 - Minimum Wage Increase Without Assistance for Small Business.

11 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Full Committee. Organizational meeting. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

2 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Organizational meeting. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

2 p.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Full Committee. Organizational meeting. Location: Room 1100, Longworth.

Other: DEFENSE PERSONNEL _ The Department of Defense holds its 2007 Worldwide Personnel Recovery Conference and Exhibition. Highlights: 8:10 a.m. Army Maj. Gen. Gene Higgins. 8:50 a.m. Air Force Lt. Gen. Carroll H. Chandler. 10 a.m. Michael Mason, FBI. 10:40 a.m. Kevin C. Whaley, DEA. Location: Omni Shoreham Hotel, 2500 Calvert St. NW.

AGRICULTURE WORKERS _ 9 a.m. Senator Dianne Feinstein, Larry Craig, Edward Kennedy, and Barbara Boxer;and Representatives Howard Berman and Chris Cannon hold a news conference to announce the reintroduction of legislation to address the agriculture worker shortage. They will be more than two dozen representatives from national and regional agriculture organizations. Location: Room 301, Russell Senate Office Building.

COUNTERFEITING _ 9:30 a.m. The US Chamber of Commerce hosts the launch of an industry organization to promote the use of authentication technology to combat counterfeiting. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

BRAIN DRAIN _ 10 a.m. The Partnership for Public Service will hold a news conference to propose a plan for retiring workers to consider the Federal Government for an ``encore" career to ease the Federal `` brain drain." Location: National Press Club.

DEMOCRATS _ 10 a.m. House Democratic leaders hold a press availability following the Democratic Caucus meeting. Location: House Radio/TV Gallery.

LEARNING-GLOBAL ECONOMY _ 10 a.m. The Association of American Colleges and Universities holds a news conference to release two polls on how well schools are preparing students for today's global challenges. Location: Room 205 Old North, Georgetown University.

REPUBLICANS _ 10 a.m. Stakeout for the media availability with House Republican Conference Chairman Adam Putnam following closed meeting. Location: Location: Stakeout at Room 345, Cannon House Office Building.

UNION-TSA _ 10 a.m. Reps. Bennie Thompson and Nita Lowey, AFGE President John Gage, others, hold a news conference to discuss the union's work representing Transportation Security Administration workers. Location: AFGE, 11th floor, 80 F St. NW.

DRUG IMPORTATION _ 11 a.m. Senate and House members introduce drug importation legislation that will reduce the cost of prescription drugs. Participants include Sens. Byron Dorgan, Olympia Snowe, Chuck Grassley, Debbie Stabenow and Reps. JoAnn Emerson, Rahm Emanuel, and Rosa DeLauro. Location: Senate Radio-TV Gallery.

HISPANICS-MINIMUM WAGE _ 11:15 a.m. Representatives Baca, Grijalva, Linda Sanchez, mebers of the Hispanic Caucus, hold a press briefing on the minimum wage. Location: House Studio.

INCOME INEQUALITY _ 12 p.m. The Cato Institute hosts a policy forum, ``Has U.S. Income Inequality Increased?," with Alan Reynolds, Cato Institute; and Diana Furchtgott-Roth, Hudson Institute; and Gary Burtless, Brookings Institution. Location: Cato Institute, 1000 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

TEACHER CASE-SUPREME COURT _ 12 p.m. News conference with employee rights advocates providing legal aid to teachers in the tow Washington state teacher union cases being heard today in the Supreme Court. Participants include Mark Mix of the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation, lead petitioner Gary Davenport, others. Location: Steps of the Supreme Court.

DOJ_NMG_0114585

AMERICAN HEART ASSOCIATION _ 12 p.m. - 1 p.m. American Heart Association President Raymond Gibbons, M.D., professor of medicine at Mayo Clinic College of Medicine in Rochester, Minnesota, will discuss the Associations 2007 health policy agenda and the potential impact of low-level funding on heart and stroke research at a media roundtable. Location: American Heart Association, Suite 300, 1150 Connecticut Ave. NW.

DEMOCRATS-IRAQ _ 12:15 p.m. Democratic Conference Vice Chairman Charles Schumer, Conference Secretary Patty Murray, and Senator Jack Reed joins former NATO Supreme Allied Commander General Wesley Clark and John Soltz, a veteran of the war in Iraq, for a press conference to call on President Bush to offer a new plan that will change course in Iraq and bring that war to a close. Location: Room S-211, U.S. Capitol.

STEM CELL LEGISLATION _ 12:15 p.m. Representatives Pence and Pitts, others, hold a news briefing on stem cell legislation. Location: House Studio.

TEACHER UNION CASE _ 12:15 p.m. The Evergreen Freedom Foundation, others, hold a news conference immediately following oral arguments before the Supreme Court in the Washington state teacher union dues cases. Participants include Washington state Attorney General Rob McKenna, foundation President Bob Williams, others. Location: Steps of the Supreme Court.

UNION DUES _ 1:30 p.m. The Federalist Society holds a panel discussion the limits on the use of union dues, with Washington state Attorney General Rob McKenna, Milton Chappell of the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation, others. Location: National Press Club.

ALLEN _ 1:45 p.m. Coast Guard Commandant Adm. Thad Allen gives keynote remarks on joint service operations and strategic alignment at the 19th annual Surface Navy Association symposium. Location: Hyatt Regency-Crystal City, 2799 Jefferson Davis Hwy., Arlington, Va.

MEDICARE DRUG PRICES _ 3:30 p.m. Sen. Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, and Dr. Mark McClellan, former Administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, hold a news briefing to discuss the implications of government negotiation of Medicare Part D drug prices. Location: Senate Daily Press Gallery, Room S-316, Capitol.

MINIMUM WAGE _ 3:45 p.m. Congressional, labor and business leaders hold a news conference following House passage of the bill raising the minimum wage. Participants include House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, Sen. Edward Kennedy, AFL-CIO President John Sweeney, others. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

USTR-JAPAN _ 5:30 p.m. USTR Susan Schwab meets with Japanese Agriculture, Forestry and Fisheries Minister Matsuoka. Location: Winder Building.

ALLEN _ 7 p.m. Coast Guard Commandant Adm. Thad Allen gives keynote remarks on the Coast Guard's Strategic direction for the Military Strategy Forum of the Center for Strategic and International Studies. Location: Ritz-Carlton Hotel, 1150 22nd St. NW.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, January 10, 2007 8:11 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Wednesday, January 10, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070110.pdf; dojclips070110.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 10, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Democrats In House Push Through Anti-terror Package (USAT) 4
House Passes Security Bill; Senate Stance Is Uncertain (NYT) 5
House Passes Anti-terror Legislation (AP) 6
House OKs Reforms Urged By 9/11 Panel (WT) 7
House Passes Bill To Implement More Of 9/11 Panel's Suggestions (WP) 8
House Votes To Enact More 9/11 Panel Points (LAT) 9
Miss. Grad Student Headed Terrorist Group, Prosecutor Says (AP) 11
3 Relatives Of Plotter Are Held By Officials (NYT) 12
Lawyer Quits In Italy CIA Case (WT/AP) 13
Britain To E-Mail Terror Threat Alerts (WP) 14

Homeland Response:

Man Accused Of Plotting Illinois Mall Attack Pleads Not Guilty (FINDLAW/AP) 15
Not Guilty Plea Entered In Mall Plot Case (RRSTAR) 15
`Data Mining' May Implicate Innocent People In Search For Terrorists (MCT) 16
Security Grants Tightly Targeted (WT) 17
Homeland Chief: Risk Determines Who Gets 2007 Anti-terror Grants (USAT) 18
Testimony Begins In Hurricane Katrina Insurance Lawsuit (FINDLAW/AP) 19

War News:

U.S. Pares Reconstruction Effort In Iraq (WSJ) 20
Bush To Propose Restoring Iraqi Factories To Create Jobs (NYT) 21
U.S. Teams Try To Rebuild A War-torn Nation (LAT) 22
New Wave Of Troops Set For Iraq (AP) 24
Bush To Request More Troops (LAT) 26
Bush's Speech May Be The Most Important Of His Presidency (MCT) 27
Bush Must Sell Public, Congress Iraq Speech May Define President's Legacy (AJC) 28
Bush Faces Tough Sell On Iraq (WT) 29
Analysis: Bush's New Plan Not All New (AP) 30
Storm Rises Over 'Surge' (LAT) 31
Democrats Rush To Frame Political Debate Over Troops (NYT) 33
Surge (surj) N. 1. A Sudden Increase . . . In Political Parlance (WP) 33
With Iraq Speech, Bush To Pull Away From His Generals (WP) 34
How Will Bush Sell His New Iraq Plan To The Public? (CSM) 36
Bush's Troop-Increase Plan Is Expected To Draw Six Guard Brigades To Iraq (NYT) 37
Military Backing Of Bush War Policies Takes A Hit (DMN) 38
Grim Picture Of Iraq From US Government Watchdog (AFP) 41
Iraq Policy Surgery (LAT) 41
Love Among The Ruins (NYT) 42
A Couple Of Polarizers (WP) 43
The Media Aren't The Enemy In Iraq (LAT) 44
Set A Spending Limit On Iraq (LAT) 45
A Time For Candor (USAT) 46
Lessons For One Last Try (WP) 47
Democrats Plan Symbolic Votes Against Bush's Iraq Troop Plan (NYT) 48
For GOP Senators, Bush's Next Step In Iraq Means A Delicate Dance (WP) 50
Reid Takes On Iraq Surge Plan (RC) 51
Democratic Leaders Face Pressure Over Iraq War (LAT) 53
Kennedy Opposes Money For Troop Boost (USAT) 54
Kennedy Proposal Uncovers Party Rift (WT) 55

Bush Warns Democrats About Effects Of Troop Pullout From Iraq (WP) ... 57
Baghdad Sees Heaviest Fighting In Months (LAT) ... 58
U.S. And Iraqis Hit Insurgents In All-Day Fight (NYT) ... 60
'Saturation' Attack On Iraq Insurgents (FT) ... 62
50 Insurgents Slain In Baghdad Raids (WT/AP) ... 63
U.S. Airstrikes Back Troops In Baghdad Clash (WP) ... 64
Don't Give Up On Iraq Yet (WP) ... 65
Two Alliances (WSJ) ... 66
Blair: Manner Of Saddam Execution Wrong (AP) ... 68
Fighting Words (WP) ... 68
Helicopters Strafe Al-Qaida In Somalia (AP) ... 71
Airstrike Rekindles Somalis' Anger At The U.S. (NYT) ... 73
U.S. Aircraft Launch 2nd Wave Of Somalia Attacks (LAT) ... 75
U.S. Targets Al Qaeda In Somalia Air Strike (WT) ... 76
US Takes Hunt For Al Qaeda To Somalia (CSM) ... 77
U.S. Is Not Saying Who, Or What, Was Hit In Somalia Raid (WP) ... 79
U.S. Push In Somalia Targets Al Qaeda (WSJ) ... 80
US Confirms Air Strikes In Somalia Conflict (FT) ... 81
U.S. Raid In Somalia Concerns U.N. Chief (AP) ... 82
No Exit In Somalia (WSJ) ... 83
Defense Dept. Settles Suit On Database For Recruiting (NYT) ... 84
Gov't Changes Student-recruit Practices (AP) ... 84
Pentagon Agrees To Protect Privacy In Database Of Potential Recruits (WP/AP) ... 85

Corporate Scandals:

Prosecutors Claim Conrad Black Committed Insider Trading (FINDLAW/AP) ... 85
Feds Request More Time (TOPCJ) ... 86
Home Depot Board Faces New Outcry (NYT) ... 87
In Cash Crunch, Mills May Seek Bankruptcy Filing (WP) ... 89
Should Steve Jobs Go To Jail? (WSJ) ... 90
Apple's Gore (WSJ) ... 91

Criminal Law:

Document-Theft Probe Is Criticized (WP) ... 93
GOP Contradicts Justice Department (WP/AP) ... 93
Damage From Berger's Theft Understated, Davis Says (WT) 94
House Panels Delay Response To Subpoenas (AP) ... 95
Nagin Stops Short Of Curfew But Plans Checkpoints On N.O. Streets (AP) ... 96
Inside Politics (WT) ... 97
N.O. Unveils Plan To Fight Violence (BRADV) ... 99
Landrieu Wants Federal Crime Fighting Help (WGNO) ... 100
RECOVERY TOUR Laura Bush Visits School, Cafe, Museum (NOTP) ... 101
Judge Sends Public Defender To Jail (NYT) ... 102
Ex-Interior Deputy A Target In Abramoff Probe (WP) ... 102
Abramoff's Interior Link Gets 2 Years Probation (MSNBC) ... 103
Judge Rejects Media Request (NSDY/AP) ... 104
Leak Probes Stymied, FBI Memos Show (NYS) ... 105
Federal Prosecutor To Help Israeli Investigation (MR) ... 107
Former Brick Twp. Mayor Admits Taking Bribes (NSL) ... 108
Judge Orders O'Grady To Begin Sentence Jan. 22 (HOLMIND) ... 108
Tape Shows Williams Taking Cash (MCA) ... 109
Roscoe Dixon's Handwritten Plea For Release Denied (WMC) ... 109
UC Riverside Official Is Accused Of Bribery (LAT) ... 110
Bklyn Judge Nixes Fed Trial Bid By FBI Agent Accused Of Mob Ties (NSDY/AP) ... 110
Brooklyn: Case Against Ex-F.B.I. Agent Can Proceed (NYT) 111
SAN FRANCISCO Gang Case Defense Can't Get Witness List (SFC) ... 111
Prosecutors Expect Grand Jury To Reach Duncan Decision Soon (AP) ... 111
L.A. Shifts Tactics Against Gangs (LAT) ... 112

Civil Law:

Judge Upholds Religion In Veterans' Care (LAT/AP) ... 114

Civil Rights:

Jury Reaches No Decision In Truck-deaths Trial (AP) ... 114
Ruling Goes Against Chastang (MR) ... 115
County Commissioner Finds Self Embroiled In Controversy (WPMI) ... 116
Islamic Group Calls For Federal Probe Into Vandalism Of Buildings (AP) ... 116
Fight Anti-Arab Bigotry, Gonzalez Told (UPI) ... 117
LAPD Board Decides Not To Punish Devin Brown (LAT) ... 117
A Good Call In New York (NYT) ... 119

Antitrust:

Newspapers Set To Jointly Sell Ads On Web Sites (WSJ) ... 120
U.S. Senate Plans Hearing On Airline Merger Impact (AJC) 122
Micron Settles Chip Suit, Predicts $80 Million Cost (Update3) (BLOOM) ... 122
Congress To Take Up Net's Future (NYT) ... 123
Aloha Taking Mesa To Federal Court (AP) ... 124
Hain Gets Antitrust OK For Avalon (AP) ... 125
Ruling Seen As Giving An Edge To Challengers Of Patents (NYT) ... 125

DOJ_NMG_0114589

High Court Eases Way For Patent Challenges (WSJ).....126
U.S. Supreme Court Ruling May Alter Biotech Patent Deals (AP).....127
High Court Ruling Could Spark Surge In Patent Challenges (LAW).....128

Environment:

Minerals Agency Targeted In Probe (DENP).....129
Venice May Target Ex-utility Heads (HTRIB).....129
Agency Affirms Human Influence On Climate (NYT).....130
Climate Experts Worry As 2006 Is Hottest Year On Record In U.S. (WP).....131
El Niño Gives USA Its Hottest Year In '06 (USAT).....132
The Heat Just Keeps On Coming In The U.S. (LAT).....133
U.S. To Raise Royalty Rates For Oil And Gas Leases In The Gulf (NYT).....134
U.S. Is Raising Gulf Royalties For Oil And Gas (WSJ).....135
Democrats Push Green Energy Plans (CHIT).....135
Bush Lifts Oil-Drill Ban In Alaska's Bristol Bay (WP).....137

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

SAN FRANCISCO Justice Dept. Undercut Its Own Case, Chronicle Argues (SFC).....138
In Cocaine Case: Four Men Get Terms In Prison (MARTBULL).....139
Man Sentenced In '05 Gunbattle (AZREP).....140
Gilbert Man Sentenced To 40 Years For Shootout With U.S. Marshals (AP).....140
Mexican Man Extradited To U.S. To Face Charges In Slaying Of California Deputy Sheriff (AP).....140
Man Charged In L.A. Deputy's Killing Extradited (LAT).....141

Immigration:

86-year-old Man With Reputed Nazi Past Again Appeals Deportation (AP).....142
Lawmakers Support 2 Convicted Agents (ELPT).....142
Plans For Border Fence Draw Renewed Scrutiny (MCT).....142

Tax:

I.R.S. Use Of Private Debt Collectors Is Criticized (NYT).....143
IRS Urged To Abandon Private Debt Collection (WP).....144
The Tax Hit You May Not See Phaseouts, Which Limit Tax Breaks Based On Income, Come Under Renewed Fire; What To Watch Out For (WSJ).....145
AMT, Tax Gap Called Gravest Tax Problems (AP).....147
FEDERAL DIARY: Tax Collection Debate Is A Product Of Budget Battles (WP).....148

Congress-Administration:

Bush Judicial Nominees Ask To Withdraw (AP).....149
Bush Drops 4 Embattled Judicial Nominees (MCT).....150
Bush Drops Plans To Renominate 3 Judges (NYT).....151
Four Appeals Court Choices Dropped From Consideration (Update2) (BLOOM).....152
4 Nominees To Appeals Courts Are Dropped (WP).....153
The Haynes Disgrace (WSJ).....154
Benched Nominees (WP).....155
Myers Among 100 Bush Nominations (WT).....155
Bush's Military Nominations Likely To Get Dems' OK Despite Iraq Concerns (HILL).....156
Avoiding Sun-Kissed Tuscany, And Other Tips For The Prudent Junketer (WP).....157
Chief Quits Broadcasting Board, Plans Book (WT).....158
S.M.U. Faculty Complains About Bush Library Plan (NYT)...159
Tax Cut Measure Could Be A Stumbling Block For Increase In Minimum Wage (NYT).....160
Life At $7.25 An Hour (WP).....161
Success Of 100 Hours Hinges On Few Uncertain Senate Votes (HILL).....165
Island Rights And Wage Bill Intertwined (HILL).....167
Minimum Wage, Maximum Myth (WP).....168
Minimum-Wage Wrangling Has Parties Switching Roles (WSJ).....169
House Dems Ready To Push Medicare Negotiations (USAT).....170
Skeptical Senate Eyes 5-Day Week (RC).....171
Among His Official Duties, Keeping On Top Of The 100-Hour Clock (NYT).....173
Taking Day Off For Football Costs Dems Credibility (HILL) .173
Grandma With A Gavel (WP).....174
Senate Moving On Ethics Bill (AP).....176
Ethics Debate Begins (RC).....176
Well-Grounded Ethics Reform (NYT).....177
Down-to-earth Ethics (LAT).....178
Sen. Johnson Upgraded To Fair Condition (AP).....179
S.D. Sen. Johnson's Condition Improves (WP).....179
Moving Ahead On Stem Cells (NYT).....180
Labor's Money Grab (WSJ).....180

Other News:

Some Kentucky Voters May Have 'buyer's Remorse' Over Yarmuth (HILL).....181
DeMint Endorses Romney For President (AP).....182
Romney, McCain Vie For House Supporters (HILL).....183
Iowa GOP Chairs Cool To McCain (RC).....185

DOJ_NMG_0114590

Ex-Gov. Gilmore Eyes GOP White House Bid (AP) 188
Gilmore Moves On White House Bid (WT) 188
A Hopeful Ponders Where To Plant Her Flag (NYT) 189
The Green Gripe With Obama: Liquefied Coal Is Still . . . Coal. (WP) 190
Poaching Red State Donors (HILL) 191
Schwarzenegger's Health Care Plan Draws A Large Dose Of Skepticism (NYT) 192
In California, Big Plans To Expand Health Coverage (CSM) 193
Massachusetts Could Serve As A Guide In California's Health Insurance Bid (NYT) 195
Terminatorcare (WSJ) 196
Gov. Urges Cooperation And An Improved Infrastructure (LAT) 197
Schwarzenegger Agenda Could Flex California's Muscle (WP) 199
Schwarzenegger Orders Cuts In Emissions (NYT) 201
The State Of Ambition (LAT) 202
Ethanol Bandwagon Picks Up Speed (WSJ) 203
Craddick Retains Speaker's Post (DMN) 204
Texas Speaker Wins Challenge And Keeps Post (NYT) 205
U.S. Prohibits All Transactions With A Major Iranian Bank (NYT) 205
US Imposes Sanctions On Iran Bank (FT) 207
U.S. Bars Iranian Bank To Curb Access To Dollars (WP) 207
U.S. Effort To Isolate Iran Gains Ground As European Bank Restrictions Take Hold (WSJ) 208
Iran Says It Has Arrested A Nuclear Spy (AP) 210
Israel Says It's Arrested Muslim Cleric (AP) 210
Hezbollah Widens Anti-Government Campaign (WP) 211
Rice To Visit Mideast For Talks On Iraq, Israeli-Palestinian Ties (AFP) 212
Rice To Visit Middle East (WT) 213
General: N.Korea May Conduct Nuclear Test (AP) 213
General Sees Another N. Korea Nuclear Test (WT) 214
US Stealth Fighters To Be Deployed In South Korea (AFP) 215
SKorea Urges North To Mull U.S. Proposal (AP) 216
For A Few Dollars More (WSJ) 216
U.S. Overseas Image Gets New Focus (WP) 217
Congress On Collision Course With Moscow (FT) 218
Anger As Russia Digs In Over Oil To Belarus (FT) 219
Germany's Merkel Assails Russia Over Cutoff Of Oil (WP) 220
Russia Considers Alternatives To Oil Pipeline Through Belarus (NYT) 221
Russia May Cut Oil Production Amid Dispute With Belarus (LAT) 222
Oil Spat Deepens Worry Over Russia's Reliability (WSJ) 224
U.S. Criticizes Venezuela's Nationalization Plan As A Sure Failure (MCT) 225
Chavez's Economic Plans Set Latin Markets Reeling (WP) 225
Analysts Hit Venezuela Nationalization (AP) 227
Venezuelan Plan Shakes Investors (NYT) 228
Venezuela's Ch?vez Tightens Grip (AP) 230
Venezuela Inc.'s Hostile Takeover (NYT) 232
Venezuela's Leap Backward (WP) 232
Cuban Economists Envision Role For Markets In Post-Castro Era (WSJ) 233
Ortega Returns To Power In Nicaragua (AP) 235
Latest Push To End Doha Talks Welcomed (FT) 236
Trade Official To Meet With Head Of WTO (WSJ) 237
Separatists Admit To Madrid Airport Attack But Stand By Cease-Fire (NYT) 237
Violence Precedes Bangladesh Vote (CSM) 238

TERRORISM NEWS:

Democrats In House Push Through Anti-terror Package (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, January 10, 2007

In their first piece of legislation since assuming control of the House of Representatives for the first time in 12 years, Democrats on Tuesday pushed through sweeping homeland security requirements.

Their bill aims to tighten security at ports and on airplanes, improve emergency planning and prevent future terrorism. It passed 299-128.

"The terrorist threat has not diminished five years after 9/11," said Carie Lemack, a security activist whose mother died in the 2001 terrorist attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0114591

The House vote fulfilled a campaign promise by Democrats to enact recommendations made three years ago by the commission that investigated 9/11. "The 9/11 Commission gave us a blueprint for better security, which was not meant to sit on a shelf and collect dust," Rep. Carolyn Maloney, D-N.Y., said.

Some Republicans complained that the bill, which is expected to be considered in the Senate in the next month, was rammed through the House with little debate and no input from them. Others said it would be impossible to implement.

Rep. Jerry Lewis, R-Calif., former chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, chided Democrats for passing a bill "without any indication as to where the money might be coming from." He said "tens of billions of dollars" would be needed, meaning the bill amounted to "a statement of policy that is little more than a press release."

Here are six provisions and their potential impact:

House Passes Security Bill; Senate Stance Is Uncertain (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 — Delivering on a major campaign promise, House Democrats used their new majority Tuesday to push through a bill that would write into law several remaining recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission.

The measure includes more than a dozen initiatives like tightening cargo security and distributing antiterrorism grants based more on risk rather than on a political formula.

The vote put Republicans in a difficult spot. They opposed major elements of the bill, saying they went beyond panel recommendations and would be prohibitively expensive without significantly aiding security.

But after failing to delay action on the bill, many Republicans felt they had no choice but to vote in favor of it — and 68 did. The measure passed 299 to 128.

House Democrats said the rapid vote reflected their commitment to eliminating important vulnerabilities that remain in the nation's antiterrorism programs.

"Our first and highest responsibility as members of this Congress is to protect the American people, defend our homeland and strengthen national security," said Representative Steny H. Hoyer, Democrat of Maryland and the House majority leader.

The effort faces an uncertain future in the Senate, as some Democrats have expressed concerns that the bill's mandate on inspecting ship containers may be unreasonable. The bill says that before any United States-bound ship container leaves an overseas port, it must be checked for radioactive material that could be used to build weapons.

The Bush administration also opposes major parts of the bill.

The legislation includes no formal estimate of its cost, but it clearly would be in the billions of dollars.

One of its most far-reaching provisions would require that all air cargo on passenger jets be inspected for explosives; now only high-risk shipments are inspected.

The bill also calls for the United States to develop, with other nations, an agreement on how to handle detainees of the Iraq war or counterterrorism efforts, and for creation of a new federal coordinator of efforts to prevent the spread of unconventional weapons.

And it would require that Transportation Security Administration workers be subject to the same labor rules as other federal workers, perhaps allowing them to unionize.

Republicans said that 39 of the commission's 41 recommendations had already been adopted — a claim Democrats do not accept. They also said that many of the bill's provisions did not reflect changes explicitly called for by the panel.

"I hope the 9/11 families do not give you a pass on this," said Representative Phil Gingrey, Republican of Georgia, who called the bill an overtly political measure.

But the Democrats called each section essential. "Hurricanes Katrina and Rita reminded us all again how unprepared we all are to deal with catastrophe whether caused by nature or terrorist attack," said Representative Bill Pascrell Jr., Democrat of New Jersey.

Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, independent of Connecticut, who held a hearing Tuesday as the Senate prepared for its version of this bill, noted that one major recommendation — not in the House measure — was strengthening Congressional oversight of intelligence and counterterrorism efforts. “We found it a lot easier to reform the rest of the government than we did to reform ourselves post-9/11,” Mr. Lieberman said. “That’s unfinished work.”

DOJ_NMG_0114592

House Passes Anti-terror Legislation (AP)

By David Espo

AP, January 10, 2007

Anti-terror legislation sailed through the House on Tuesday, the first in a string of measures designed to fulfill campaign promises made by Democrats last fall.

Patterned on recommendations of the commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks, the far-reaching measure includes commitments for inspection of all cargo carried aboard passenger aircraft and on ships bound for the United States.

The vote was a bipartisan 299-128, and Speaker Nancy Pelosi took the rostrum to announce the passage of the first legislation to clear under the new Democratic majority.

Democrats said the bill's passage was a top priority.

"Our first and highest duty as members of this Congress is to protect the American people, to defend our homeland and to strengthen our national security," said Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md.

Several Republicans criticized the legislation as little more than political posturing in the early hours of a new Democratic-controlled Congress. Democrats want to "look aggressive on homeland security. This bill will waste billions of dollars, and possibly harm homeland security by gumming up progress already under way," said Rep. Hal Rogers, R-Ky.

In a written statement, the Bush administration listed several objections and said it could not support the measure as drafted, but stopped short of a veto threat.

Democrats have pledged to make fiscal responsibility a priority in the new Congress, but they advanced the bill — their first of the year — without even a bare-bones accounting of the estimated cost. The funding will require follow-up legislation.

Legislation introduced in the Senate a year ago to implement the recommendations of the 9/11 commission had a price tag of more than $53 billion over five years.

The terrorism legislation is the first of six measures the House is expected to pass in its first 100 hours in session under Democratic control.

Next up is an increase in the minimum wage — set for passage on Wednesday — followed by relaxation of the limits on stem cell research conducted with federal funds and a measure directing the administration to negotiate with drug companies for lower prices for Medicare recipients.

Next week, the Democrats intend to clear legislation to cut the interest rate on student loans and to curtail tax breaks for the energy industry.

Each of the six bills would go to the Senate, and it could be months — if then — before they reach the White House.

Already, President Bush has signaled he would veto the stem cell bill, which is opposed by abortion foes. House supporters of the measure conceded at a news conference during the day that they do not have the two-thirds support needed to override a veto.

Depending on the outcome of that struggle, said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., "400,000 embryos will either be wasted or utilized to cure a disease."

The House labored over the terrorism bill as the Senate began work on legislation enacting stricter ethics rules — and Democrats continued to gain from last fall's elections.

Officials said that four of Bush's controversial appeals court appointees, their chances for confirmation doomed in the Democratic-controlled Senate, would not be renominated.

The four are William Haynes, William Myers, Terrence Boyle and Michael Wallace, all of whom were prevented from coming to votes last year when the Senate was under Republican control.

"The president is disappointed in this inaction and hopes that the days of judicial obstructionism are beyond us," said Dana Perino, deputy White House spokeswoman.

DOJ_NMG_0114593

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., saw it differently. "Democrats stand ready to work with the administration to confirm judges who are not extremists, either left or right," he said.

In the House, passage of the anti-terror bill coincided with an email from the Democratic campaign committee touting the party's agenda for its first 100 hours in power, and asking for a contribution for the 2008 elections.

Democrats said the bill would enact virtually all of the unfulfilled recommendations of the 9/11 commission, and several members of the rank and file remarked that Republicans had failed to do so in five years since planes slammed into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon and scarred the Pennsylvanian countryside.

"Don't be fooled by those who say that this bill is moving too quickly," said Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss. "It has been five years since 9/11. It has been three years since the 9/11 commission issued its report."

"The fact is that the bipartisan 9/11 commission gave the last Congress F's and D's in implementing its recommendations," said Rep. Jim Moran, D-Va. "This Congress is determined to earn its A's in implementing its recommendations."

Rep. John Mica, R-Fla., noted disapprovingly that screeners at the Transportation Security Agency would receive collective bargaining rights under the bill.

And Rep. Peter King, R-N.Y., said the measure "gives false hope to the American people" because technology for scanning all cargo containers is not yet available.

The legislation directs the Homeland Security Department to establish a system for inspecting all cargo carried on passenger aircraft over the next three years. It also requires scanning of all containers bound for the U.S., using the best available technology. Large ports would be given three years to comply, smaller ports five years.

While much of the debate revolved around the provisions dealing with cargo, the bill also requires the government to take the risk of terror attacks into greater account when distributing homeland security grants to the 50 states.

The measure also would centralize the government's efforts at preventing nuclear weapons from falling into the hands of terrorists and would take steps to disrupt the black market for nuclear material.

"We will not be safe here as long as the worst weapons can fall into the worst hands," said Rep. Rick Larsen, D-Wash.

The measure also establishes a new program of grants to make sure local governments can communicate effectively in the event of a crisis.

One of the tragedies of 9/11 was the deaths of New York firefighters who were trapped inside the World Trade Center and could not hear urgent warnings to evacuate that were broadcast on police radios.

A companion measure, to establish a new House subcommittee with jurisdiction over intelligence matters, cleared on a vote of 239-188.

House OKs Reforms Urged By 9/11 Panel (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

House Democrats yesterday passed a bill that strengthens the homeland security reforms recommended by the September 11 commission, but Republicans said the legislation could undermine a program designed to slow the proliferation of technology used to make weapons of mass destruction.

The bill, which passed by a vote of 299-128, would increase the role of the United Nations in the Proliferation Security Initiative by asking the world body to force countries to agree to searches and seizures of ships and aircraft for the technology.

Republicans called the proposal, which would let the United Nations define what is permitted under the initiative, "unrealistic and dangerous."

"It will result in the imposition of unpredictable limitations, conditions and interpretations, and result in a regulatory straightjacket overseen by an international bureaucracy," said Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, Florida Republican and ranking member on the House International Relations Committee.

The proliferation initiative announced by President Bush in 2003 is a voluntary working group of more than 70 countries investigating and stopping the trade and acquisition of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons technology by terrorists and rogue states. The member countries also interdict ships and aircraft that carry such materials.

DOJ_NMG_0114594

Democrats dismissed the Republicans' assertions, saying the bill strengthens the initiative because international law does not allow seizures and impoundments in international waters, or in the territorial waters or airspace of nonmember countries.

"This bill has nothing to do with the United Nations. It simply says that you have to screen ships abroad before they leave port for nuclear and biological weapons materials and seal them abroad before they can leave," said Rep. Jerrold Nadler, New York Democrat.

Republicans said they expect the provision to be stricken when the Senate begins to consider the bill later this year.

Passage of the legislation posed Democrats' first test of the president to see how far they can go on homeland security matters, about which he largely had a free hand under the Republican-led Congress.

In a statement of administration policy, which usually consists of a dry list of approvals and disapprovals, the White House took a shot at the Democrats.

"The Administration is disappointed that, in a nearly 300-page piece of legislation entitled 'Implementing the 9/11 Commission Recommendations Act of 2007,' Congress does not address the two outstanding recommendations that apply to the Legislative Branch, which the 9/11 Commission states may be among the most important of all," the White House said yesterday.

The bill neither reduces the number of congressional committees with oversight and spending authorization over homeland security matters nor does it do the same for intelligence matters, both steps the September 11 commission has suggested.

However, the White House did not say whether it would veto the bill, and the statement supported those parts that increase the percentage of homeland security grant funding allocated on the basis of risk.

But the administration opposes portions of the bill that call for 100 percent screening of plane cargo within four years and ship cargo within five years, because the necessary technology does not exist. It also said the costs would be exorbitant, adding billions of dollars to the federal budget each year.

Democrats say their bill addresses the September 11 panel's concern about congressional duplication by creating a hybrid subcommittee of members of the appropriations and intelligence panels to oversee intelligence spending. The House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence will continue to oversee intelligence operations, possibly with the hybrid subcommittee.

But Republicans scoffed at the plan and any notion that it reduces the bureaucracy that led to poor oversight of the various homeland security and intelligence agencies.

"We enacted 39 of the 41 recommendations the commission sent to us, so that means the other two were not good ideas," said House Minority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican. "Democrats are not doing it because they don't think it is a good idea. They just don't want to admit it."

Family members of victims of the September 11 attacks said they were disappointed that those recommendations would not be enacted but supported the legislation as a continuing effort to protect Americans from terrorism.

"We do think that Congress has to reform itself in the intelligence and homeland security oversight; the process has to be streamlined, but we will continue the fight," said Carie Lemack, president of Families of September 11 Inc.

House Passes Bill To Implement More Of 9/11 Panel's Suggestions (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

In a lopsided vote that masked underlying divisions, House Democrats approved legislation yesterday to implement many of the remaining recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission even as portions of the sprawling package faced immediate problems in the Senate.

Voting 299 to 128, congressional Democrats, backed by scores of Republicans, delivered on a key part of their "100 hours" agenda. The nearly 300-page anti-terrorism measure sets new mandates to scrutinize air- and ship-borne cargo, send more federal aid to areas at the greatest risk of terrorism, improve emergency communications, fight nuclear proliferation overseas, and strengthen a civil liberties watchdog board.

DOJ_NMG_0114595

But critics questioned the cost and feasibility of new cargo requirements -- raising issues that helped stall action by the previous, Republican-controlled Congress -- and industry and the Department of Homeland Security added their opposition. The greatest skepticism focused on requirements in the House bill that airlines be able to physically inspect 100 percent of cargo put aboard passenger planes within three years and that shippers scan 100 percent of U.S.-bound cargo for radiation at overseas ports within five years.

The bill's biggest detractor, or patron, could be Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), who chairs the Senate's Homeland Security panel and who held his own hearing yesterday. He stopped short of promising -- as House leaders had -- to implement all remaining recommendations of the commission that investigated the 2001 terrorist attacks.

Lieberman said that he hopes by month's end, as requested by Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), to draft and pass a Senate bill "that will take steps forward to adopt some of the unadopted, unimplemented or inadequately implemented parts" of proposals recommended in 2004 by the bipartisan commission.

Just four months ago the Senate rejected mandatory scanning overseas for nuclear and shielding material of 11 million shipping containers sent to U.S. ports every year.

Fifty-six of the chamber's members, including seven Democrats, voted to kill a requirement to scan all such containers by 2010 as part of broader port-security legislation, concluding that existing technology could not do the job without crippling the flow of commerce.

That claim was repeated this week by major industry lobbies, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Retail Industry Leaders Association, which warned that unilateral action by the administration could lead to retaliation by trading partners and disruption, with little added security.

Instead, the Homeland Security and Energy departments last month announced a congressionally required pilot program to spend $60 million to scan 7 percent of U.S.-bound cargo originating from six ports by year's end. The program would start with ports in Pakistan, South Korea and Britain, with a goal of eventually expanding to 30 percent of U.S.-bound cargo. Scanning 100 percent of cargo would involve about 700 ports worldwide.

Other provisions of the House bill also carry a big price tag, which House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has said she expects airlines and shippers to help fund. For example, inspecting all cargo placed aboard passenger aircraft by 2009 could cost $3.6 billion to $6 billion for equipment, installation and screening personnel, the Congressional Research Service and the Transportation Security Administration estimate, House Republican officials said.

The Bush administration also formally opposed several elements of the House bill, saying in a statement that it could not support the measure as drafted, but stopping short of a veto threat.

David Schanzer, who was Democratic staff director and chief counsel of the House Homeland Security Committee from 2003 to 2005, criticized major portions of the House bill as "aspirational" rather than substantive. He warned that the new Democratic majority will find it difficult to find billions for promised tax changes, homeland security measures and the ongoing war in Iraq.

"Democrats have put a lot of spending priorities on the table," Schanzer said. "Where this is going to fit in them will tell a lot.

Seth M.M. Stodder, former director of policy and planning for U.S. Customs and Border Protection, said the Senate will be a key battleground between the administration and more aggressive House Democrats. Stodder said he thinks Lieberman, Commerce Committee Chairman Daniel K. Inouye (D-Alaska) and ranking Republicans will play decisive roles.

Separately yesterday, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff announced $445 million in new grants to secure ports, transit systems, vital facilities such as chemical and power plants, and bus and trucking lines. The total is $46 million more than last year. The Washington-Baltimore area will receive $18.3 million in transit aid.

Also yesterday, the House voted 239 to 188 to create an Appropriations subcommittee to increase oversight of intelligence spending.

House Votes To Enact More 9/11 Panel Points (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114596

WASHINGTON — The House passed a broad domestic security bill Tuesday that requires all cargo on U.S.-bound ships and passenger planes to be scanned for explosives, expands programs to track weapons of mass destruction and bolsters intelligence gathering along the border.

The bill, which implements many of the recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission, is the first in the 100-hour legislative drive spearheaded by Democratic Speaker Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco.

It passed 299-128, with 68 Republicans joining Democrats.

While it could bolster the Democratic Party's national security credentials, it could also fall short of its aims. Democrats did not designate funding for most of the costly initiatives, and critics also charge that some of them are impractical.

Industry groups and the Bush administration objected to the requirement that within three years all shipping cargo arriving in the U.S. from major overseas ports be scanned. Republicans complained about the lack of hearings on the 279-page bill, and Democratic allies in the Senate questioned whether it is too ambitious.

House Democrats defended the legislation, which is based on and sometimes exceeds suggestions by the bipartisan panel that examined the response to the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11. That report was issued in July 2004.

"Don't be fooled by those who say this bill moves too quickly," said Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), the chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee. Criticizing Republican inaction on some of the Sept. 11 commission recommendations, Thompson cited an Irish proverb.

"You have never plowed a field, if you've only turned it over in your mind," he said. "It's been five years since 9/11, three years since the 9/11 recommendations. Now it's time to plow the field."

About half of the recommendations were enacted under the Republican-controlled Congress, but the commission has given Congress and the administration a slew of failing grades for its performance on implementing its reforms.

The House also passed a resolution to create a panel to monitor intelligence spending, which Republicans criticized as adding unnecessary bureaucracy without improving oversight.

"While the 9/11 commission recommended one committee, we will have three committees. As far as I can tell, their only job will be to write a report and give it to themselves," said Rep. David Dreier (R-San Dimas), who led the Republican side of the debate with several feisty denunciations of the Democrats' decision not to hold hearings.

The intelligence panel resolution, which passed 239 to 188, with the support of just eight Republicans, does not follow the Sept. 11 commission's recommendation to combine the committee that authorizes intelligence spending with the one that appropriates the funds. But Pelosi said the creation of the new panel was a step in that direction.

"We have to show that this panel that we're putting together can do the job," Pelosi said. "To the extent that we can reduce the number of auspices under which the intelligence community has to come to Congress, we have to move in that direction."

Pelosi glossed over the issue of funding the programs authorized in the domestic security bill when she discussed it. The bill contains only one authorization — for an airport checkpoint screening fund that will get $250 million in 2008.

"I would have probably wanted to put some money there," Thompson said, "but in the spirit of let's get it done, we'll work it out." The bill, H.R. 1, is the first in a series that Democrats plan to pass in their 100-hour agenda before the president's State of the Union speech later this month. Today, they will take up a bill to increase the minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour.

As lawmakers debated the domestic security measure, the administration issued a statement declaring it "cannot support … the bill in its current form."

While the White House lauded a proposal to make risk a greater part of the criteria for allocating about $2 billion for state and local domestic security grants, it objected to the creation of a new grant program for local law enforcement to participate in border-state centers that would concentrate federal, state and local intelligence gathering.

The administration opposed a measure that would greatly empower a civil liberties oversight board that has been criticized as ineffectual. The panel was established two years ago under White House control as a check on executive power in the war on terrorism. The legislation would create a new independent agency with the power to subpoena testimony and documents.

And the administration argued against a section recommending that the U.S. develop with allies a common approach toward detainees and suspected terrorists, dismissing it as unnecessary and unconstitutional.

DOJ_NMG_0114597

One controversial measure would require screening all shipping containers coming from foreign ports within five years, with larger ports obliged to meet that deadline in three years. American inspectors would scan and seal every container loaded onto U.S.-bound ships, then provide the Department of Homeland Security with copies of the scans.

Republicans debated instituting overseas scanning of all cargo under the 2006 SAFE Port Act but decided to conduct pilot projects first, an approach that industry groups support.

At the Port of Long Beach, which receives 3 million to 4 million foreign containers annually, spokesman Art Wong questioned the practicality of the proposal.

"People in Washington need some perspective on how big this would be," Wong said. "Each person scanning — how long would it take? Who would pay for the equipment to do this, and how many people would it take to get done? Would overseas ports even allow us to have Americans doing inspections? Would it be disruptive to trade?"

Administration officials also questioned the potential cost. "Risk management does not mean risk elimination, which would cost billions upon billions of dollars to implement, disrupt the flow of commerce and quite possibly shut down our ports," said Russ Knocke, a Homeland Security spokesman.

He said that all elevated-risk cargo has been screened since October.

Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.), chairman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, indicated that he was cool to the idea of screening all shipping containers. "We're going to look at it," he said. "But it's not practical to impose it immediately."

The bill contains a similar proposal to screen all cargo placed on passenger planes within three years — at an estimated cost of $3.6 billion for the next decade.

"There needs to be a hearing to make sure they don't unnecessarily place a burden on the airline industry that would accomplish the objectives of security but wouldn't allow the airlines to survive," said Asa Hutchison, a former Homeland Security undersecretary.

Despite the criticism, 9/11 commission co-chairman Lee H. Hamilton, a former Democratic congressman from Indiana, spoke in firm support of the bill. "The bottom line is … that if this bill, H.R. 1, is enacted, funded and implemented, then the American people will be safer."

Miss. Grad Student Headed Terrorist Group, Prosecutor Says (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, January 10, 2007

CHICAGO - A graduate student living in Mississippi was an important Hamas terrorist leader directing thousands of dollars to families of members who were jailed or killed, a prosecutor said Tuesday.

"He's Hamas and he's assisting the murderous terrorist activities of Hamas," Assistant U.S. Attorney Joseph M. Ferguson told jurors in his closing argument, pointing at defendant Abdelhaleem Ashqar, who was a graduate student at the University of Mississippi in the early 1990s.

Ashqar, 48, later an assistant professor of business at Washington's Howard University, is accused along with former Chicago grocer Muhammad Salah, 53, of being high-ranking members of the Hamas terrorist network.

The two men are charged in a racketeering indictment with funneling thousands of dollars and fresh recruits to the anti-Israeli organization.

In the second day of his closing argument, Ferguson was warned as he headed toward the 10-hour mark that he would have to wrap it up by the end of the day.

"I will," Ferguson said. "I don't want to do this tomorrow."

"You won't be allowed to," St. Eve, a former colleague of Ferguson's in the U.S. attorney's office in Chicago, said with a smile.

Ashqar, of Springfield, Va., does not support terrorism and has done nothing illegal, according to his defense attorney, William Moffitt. Moffitt says Ashqar merely was trying to get charitable contributions to poverty-plagued Palestinians on the West Bank under Israeli army occupation.

DOJ_NMG_0114598

Moffitt is likely to get his chance Wednesday to address jurors, who have listened during a three-month trial to witnesses that have included an expert on torture and Israeli agents who testified under aliases.

Salah was arrested in January 1993 while in Israel and served almost five years in prison. Police confiscated $97,400 they say was meant to bankroll Hamas terrorism and he says was for charity.

Ashqar, then a graduate student in business at the University of Mississippi, was briefed on statements Salah made to Israel's Shin Bet security service. The briefing came from a Salah traveling companion who also was arrested and released after six months.

Ashqar summarized in writing what he learned from the Salah companion. Ferguson pointed to testimony that the written material, found among documents in Ashqar's home, was signed with an alias.

"There is only one reason for Ashqar signing that report with an alias - Ashqar is Hamas," Ferguson told the jury.

When asked by a federal grand jury in Chicago if he was Hamas, Ashqar refused to answer.

Ferguson pointed to testimony that Ashqar directed money to families of Hamas "martyrs" killed in terrorist operations and those captured and jailed by Israeli authorities.

"We're talking about someone who is a graduate student at the University of Mississippi, Oxford, Miss., and you see hundreds of thousands of dollars coursing through his accounts," Ferguson said.

While living in Oxford, Ashqar had a telephone in a bogus name and a fax in a different alias, Ferguson said. "He was concealing his name because he was aiding Hamas," the prosecutor said.

Federal agents found that Ashqar spoke on his telephone 568 times in several years with Mousa Abu Marzook, an alleged top Hamas leader who also is charged in the case and is a fugitive believed living in Damascus, Syria.

Ferguson also pointed to testimony that Ashqar served as an archivist, keeping extensive file of Hamas-related documents involving matters ranging from electronic jamming equipment to terrorist operations to so-called dead drops used by spies to pass documents without getting caught.

Ferguson traced a series of steps through which money to bankroll Hamas terrorists allegedly was collected by Marzook in Europe and the Mideast, funneled through accounts controlled by Marzook and associates and then sent to Salah and Ashqar in the United States.

From here it allegedly was transferred to the Mideast and turned into cash allegedly distributed to Hamas operatives.

"Abdelhaleem Ashqar is a conduit himself and directed others to steer money to the military operations of Hamas in Israel," Ferguson said.

3 Relatives Of Plotter Are Held By Officials (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

The parents and sister of a man convicted of conspiring to bomb the Herald Square subway station were detained yesterday by federal immigration authorities, who have been seeking to deport them to Pakistan.

The arrests came a day after the convicted man, Shahawar Matin Siraj, 24, was sentenced in United States District Court in Brooklyn to 30 years in prison.

The family, who came to the United States in 1999, had been seeking asylum since 2003, citing religious persecution in their home country.

A spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement said that Mr. Siraj's father, Siraj Abdul Rehman, 54, was arrested because a final deportation order had been filed against him. But a lawyer for the family said his case was still under appeal.

The agency spokesman, Mark Thorn, said that the man's mother, Shahina Parveen, 50, and his sister, Sanya Siraj, 19, were arrested and detained on immigration violations.

Mr. Thorn said that the mother and daughter would be given due process and that their cases would be heard by an immigration judge. He said he could provide no more information, because it was the agency's policy not to discuss case details. Mr. Thorn could not explain why the action was taken yesterday, other than to say that the detention was part of an administrative process and that criminal cases take priority over administrative ones. It was unclear why the criminal case against Mr. Siraj would have delayed the detentions.

The lawyer for the family, Mona Shah, disputed that a final order of removal had been entered against Mr. Rehman. She said he still has an appeal pending before the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

"It's absolutely disgusting that they've picked him up under the guise of a deportation order," Ms. Shah said yesterday. "Fine, punish the son. But why punish them like this?"

She could not offer an explanation for the timing of the move, but suggested that it might stem from pressure on the authorities because the family's immigration status was cited in news reports about Mr. Siraj's case.

The immigration status of Mr. Rehman's wife and daughter hinge on his asylum case, Ms. Shah said. All three were picked up at their home in Jackson Heights, Queens, early yesterday morning. Mr. Thorn said they will be held at an Immigration and Customs Enforcement facility in Elizabeth, N.J.

Mr. Siraj, who was convicted on May 24 of conspiring to place an explosive device in the Herald Square subway station in 2004, had also filed for asylum on the same grounds as his father, religious persecution.

Ms. Shah said that all members of the family are Ismaili Muslims, a sect that she said has been mistreated in Pakistan. She said family members had been robbed and attacked several times. "They would be subject to torture and harassment if they returned," she said.

But prosecutors during Mr. Siraj's trial in the bomb plot suggested that he had lied to immigration authorities in his asylum request. They cited his own testimony in an earlier hearing, when he had first told immigration authorities that he did not fear harm if he returned to his native Pakistan. But later, in Mr. Siraj's asylum application, prosecutors pointed out that he said he was afraid.

Also, on tapes secretly recorded by a police informer and played at his trial, he said he had no fear of returning to Pakistan and spoke about influential family members who served as judges and magistrates. He also said he had rich and influential friends and friends on the police force.

He was recorded telling the informer that he planned to conduct surveillance of the subway station tied to his bomb plot immediately after attending an immigration hearing in Lower Manhattan. Testimony also showed that he had discussed entering into a marriage only to get citizenship.

Ms. Shah acknowledged that immigration authorities have some discretion about how to proceed and whether to detain people whose cases are pending, but she was bothered by yesterday's arrests.

"They're not supposed to detain halfway through a case," she said, calling the action "an absolute uneven use" of the discretion.

"You do not give someone the freedom of being not detained and then suddenly pick them up," she said.

Lawyer Quits In Italy CIA Case (WT/AP)

By Colleen Barry

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

MILAN, Italy -- A lawyer for a CIA agent accused in the 2003 kidnapping of an Egyptian cleric in Milan withdrew from the case shortly after a court opened hearings yesterday on whether to indict him and 25 other Americans.

Five Italian secret service officials also are facing indictment in the case that highlights the CIA's purported extraordinary rendition program, in which terrorism suspects are transferred to third countries where critics say they may face torture.

Shortly after the proceedings began, the attorney for Robert Seldon Lady withdrew from the case, saying the former CIA station chief did not want to cooperate.

"Robert Seldon Lady says that this case should have had a political solution and not a judicial solution," attorney Daria Pesce said. "The Italian government could have decided it was a state secret -- remember, this was a terror suspect. It would have been possible if the Italian government had had the courage to reach an agreement with the U.S. government."

Prosecutors say the operation was a breach of Italian sovereignty that compromised their own anti-terrorism efforts.

None of the defendants attended the closed session, which lasted about three hours and ended without a decision. The next hearing was scheduled for Jan. 29.

Mr. Lady was the only American who had hired a lawyer rather than have a court-appointed one. He was still in Italy when the case broke, and owns a home in Italy that was searched by police.

Miss Pesce, who met with Mr. Lady four or five times in the United States, mostly recently in September, said the court had already appointed a new lawyer for him.

All but one of the Americans have been identified by the prosecution as CIA agents, including former station chiefs in Rome and Milan, and the 26th as a U.S. Air Force officer stationed at the time at Aviano Air Base near Venice. The Italians include the former head of Italian military intelligence, Nicolo Pollari.

In Italy, defendants are not required to attend preliminary hearings, or even trials. Prosecutor Armando Spataro has asked Romano Prodi's center-left government to seek the extradition of the American suspects, but there has been no response. The previous prime minister, conservative Silvio Berlusconi, who was a close ally of President Bush, refused.

Mr. Pollari's defense lawyers said yesterday they intend in the next session to try to add both Mr. Prodi and Mr. Berlusconi to the witness stand, as well as their respective defense ministers.

Even if the request were made -- a move bound to irritate U.S.-Italian relations -- it was unlikely that the CIA agents would be turned over for trial abroad.

The CIA has refused to comment on the case.

Mr. Spataro has entered into evidence a handwritten letter by Osama Moustafa Hassan Nasr, describing his abduction from a Milan street on Feb. 17, 2003, and his journey, blindfolded and bound, to Egypt, where he said he had been left in an underground cell, repeatedly tortured and threatened with rape.

Britain To E-Mail Terror Threat Alerts (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 9 -- The British government is offering an e-mail bulletin service to notify people of changes to the nation's terror threat level, a development that illustrates increasing fears of extremist attacks in Britain and the rising power of digital communications.

The domestic security agency, MI5, announced the new service Tuesday and said it will also provide e-mail bulletins on "major developments in national security affairs." It plans to add a service providing the same information in text messages to cellphones, officials said. People would have to register on the MI5 Web site to receive the alerts.

"It is important that we are as open as possible with the general public about security matters," said Phyllis Starkey, a member of Parliament from Prime Minister Tony Blair's Labor Party.

Britain began disclosing the terror threat level to the public only last August, following government inquiries into the official handling of the July 2005 attacks on London's public transit system. After those attacks, in which 52 passengers and four bombers were killed and about 700 people injured, investigators concluded that the government did a poor job of communicating with the public about potential security threats.

In August, the government began posting the threat level on the MI5 Web site and a new government Web site (http://www.intelligence.gov.uk) set up to disseminate information about security matters. The new system was used that month for the first time when officials uncovered an alleged plot to blow up jetliners flying from Britain to the United States. The threat level was increased from severe, which means an attack is highly likely, to critical, which means an attack is expected imminently.

Although the threat has since been reduced again to severe, British officials continue to warn that religious extremists are aggressively plotting new attacks in Britain. In November, the head of MI5, Eliza Manningham-Buller, said in an unusual public speech that the agency was monitoring 30 potential terrorist plots involving more than 200 radical groups and 1,600 suspects who were "actively engaged in plotting or facilitating terrorist acts."

Last month, Home Secretary John Reid warned that a terrorist attack in Britain was "highly likely" during the Christmas holidays. None occurred.

DOJ_NMG_0114601

Starkey said the widespread use of computers and cellphones allows the government to communicate information about potential threats far faster now. She recalled the days when the government placed posters in public places asking people to be vigilant for activity by the Irish Republican Army.

"This is a rather more effective technology," she said. "And if individuals are aware of an imminent threat, they are more likely to notice odd behavior. They are added eyes and ears for the security services."

But Starkey acknowledged that the government was also battling a "significant level of cynicism" among the public and that many people believe the government could manipulate the terror threat level for political purposes. Many Britons believe the U.S. government has used threat alerts to scare the public for political gain, she said.

"That's only added to the problem here," she said, "because it makes people in this country think our government is going down the same route."

Patrick Mercer, a Conservative member of Parliament who specializes in security issues, said the new system was "sensible" but needed improvements.

"The problem is that the only sort of people who are going to get this are big security corporations and security wonks like me," he said. "Mr. and Mrs. John Doe are not going to go on the MI5 Web site and register for this."

For a terror alert system to work efficiently, he suggested, "we've got to learn from the American model." In addition to e-mail alerts, he said, the threat level should be indicated on highway signs and broadcast on television and radio, and government Web sites and publications should also offer more specific warnings about key bridges, tunnels and other potential targets during extremely high alerts.

"All this says," he said of MI5's new system, "is: 'Terrorism is dangerous. Be afraid. Be very afraid.' "

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Man Accused Of Plotting Illinois Mall Attack Pleads Not Guilty (FINDLAW/AP)

By Megan Reichgott, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 10, 2007

(AP) - CHICAGO-A 22-year-old Muslim convert accused by U.S. authorities of being willing to commit acts of "violent jihad" pleaded not guilty Tuesday to charges that he planned an attack at a shopping mall.

"I feel well," Derrick Shareef said at his arraignment. He told U.S. District Judge David Coar he had never been hospitalized for psychiatric treatment.

Shareef was arrested Dec. 6 after allegedly meeting an undercover agent to trade stereo speakers for a pistol and four grenades.

He planned to "commit acts of violent jihad" by blowing up garbage cans at the mall during the Christmas shopping rush, according to a federal complaint. The complaint also said Shareef considered attacking city halls and courthouses.

"Any place that's crowded, like a mall is good, anything, any government facility is good," he allegedly told a secret FBI informant when they talked about possible attack targets. The informant secretly tape-recorded his plans. "I swear by Allah man, I'm down for it too, I'm down for the cause, I'm down to live for the cause and die for the cause, man."

Prosecutors have said they were convinced Shareef operated alone and there had been no imminent danger to the public.

Shareef was charged with one count of attempting to damage or destroy a building by fire or explosion and one count of attempting to use a weapon of mass destruction.

The arson and explosives count carries a possible sentence of five to 20 years in prison. The weapons of mass destruction charge carries a possible sentence of life in prison.

Defense attorney Michael B. Mann declined to comment on specifics of the case, telling reporters he did not want to try the case in the media.

Not Guilty Plea Entered In Mall Plot Case (RRSTAR)

By Mike Wiser, ROCKFORD REGISTER STAR

DOJ_NMG_0114602

Rockford (IL) Register Star, January 10, 2007

CHICAGO — A 22-year-old accused of being jihadist told a federal judge "I feel well" moments before his lawyer entered a plea of not guilty on his behalf.

Derrick Shareef has been in federal custody in Chicago since his Dec. 6 arrest for allegedly plotting to injure and kill holiday shoppers at CherryVale Mall.

Wearing an orange jumpsuit and with a shaven head and unruly beard, Shareef appeared Tuesday in front of Judge David H. Coar.

Coar asked Shareef standard questions about his education and physical and mental health at the outset of what turned out to be a very brief hearing.

Shareef answered clearly and politely, ending most of his replies with the word "sir." He told the judge that he did not graduate high school but obtained his general equivalency diploma, or GED, and had "some college" under his belt.

He said he was not being treated for any physical or mental ailments.

Coar also asked Shareef if he needed the government's charges against him read aloud, an option Shareef's attorney, Michael Mann of Maywood, waived.

Shareef faces up to life in prison on charges of attempting to use a weapon of mass destruction and attempting to use explosives to injure people or property.

The Justice Department says Shareef, who identified himself as Derrick Omar Shareef in court, had plotted to attack the patrons of CherryVale Mall by placing hand grenades in garbage cans in order to wage jihad.

Authorities said Shareef revealed his plans to an informant who was working with the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Joint-Terrorism Task Force. The informant arrested the 22-year-old former Genoa resident after he exchanged stereo speakers for four non-functioning grenades and a pistol.

Tuesday in court was the first time Shareef was actually able to read the charges against him, Mann said, adding his client doesn't have access to court files where he is being housed and that he himself had only just received a copy of the formal indictment, which was handed down last week.

Staff writer Mike Wiser can be reached at 815-987-1377 or mwiser@rrstar.com.

`Data Mining' May Implicate Innocent People In Search For Terrorists (MCT)

By Greg Gordon

McClatchy Newspapers, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON - In his first hearing Wednesday as the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Democratic Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont plans to examine federal "data-mining" programs, the computerized hunt for terrorists that can implicate innocent people.

Consider the case of American Airlines pilot Kieran O'Dwyer of Pittsboro, N.C.

O'Dwyer said Tuesday that U.S. Customs agents detained him for 90 minutes in 2003 when he got off an international flight in New York, telling him his name matched one on a government terrorist watch list.

Over the next 22 months or so, O'Dwyer said, he was temporarily detained 70 to 80 times by authorities who apparently were worried that he was a fugitive member of the Irish Republican Army.

It's not clear how O'Dwyer came under suspicion or how his name wound up on a terrorist watch list, but critics charge that such miscues can occur during the data-mining process, in which computers analyze multiple databases in search of suspicious patterns.

Amy Kudwa, a TSA spokeswoman, said she couldn't comment on O'Dwyer's circumstance, but that an average of 1,500 airline travelers applied each week for redress on the grounds that they'd been mistakenly included on terrorist watch lists. She said 33,000 had applied as of last April.

In a speech last month, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said his agency was working to put a system of "one-stop redress" in place in 2007.

Leahy, a longtime congressional champion on privacy issues, plans to make "a signature issue" of protecting civil rights in the face of a "proliferation of government databanks and data mining" in the war on terrorism, said his chief spokesman, David Carle.

"He believes Congress is way overdue in taking stock of the surge in data mining by the government," Carle said.

Carle said the inquiry had gained import because of powerful new technologies, the outsourcing of data mining to private firms and "the Bush administration's lack of cooperation" with Congress' attempts to police these surveillance programs.

For years now, the Bush administration has invested heavily in data mining, viewing it as a valuable intelligence tool that can alert U.S. authorities to terrorist plots in their early stages. The government is reported to have spent tens of millions on such surveillance systems.

Among witnesses summoned to Wednesday's hearing is Jim Harper of the Cato Institute, a libertarian research center. Harper co-authored a paper last year that concluded data mining is a poor use of tax dollars, won't identify terrorists and will lead to "false positives" implicating innocent people.

In the paper, Harper and IBM engineer Jeff Jonas charge that "the one thing predictable about predictive data mining for terrorism is that it would be consistently wrong."

In testimony prepared for delivery Wednesday, Harper says data mining uses "massive amounts of data about Americans' lifestyles, purchases, communications, travels and many other facets of their lives. . . . This raises a variety of privacy concerns."

Coinciding with the hearing, Democratic Sen. Russ Feingold of Wisconsin plans to reintroduce a bill, co-sponsored by Leahy, that would require federal agencies to disclose all data-mining activities to Congress and the public.

In a 2004 report, the General Accountability Office identified at least 10 data-mining programs being used in the hunt for terrorists, and several others have emerged publicly since then.

Senate Democrats also are expected to closely question John Michael McConnell, President Bush's nominee to serve as the new intelligence czar, about 13 Pentagon data-mining contracts that his consulting firm has obtained since 1997.

Recently, the Transportation Security Administration revealed that it has conducted a program known as the Automated Targeting System, which assigns a risk assessment to every international air traveler, for four years.

O'Dwyer, the pilot, said he tried multiple ways to end his detentions but that customs agents dismissed a TSA letter clearing him, saying "it could be a forgery."

Not even persistent calls to the TSA and FBI from aides to Rep. Bob Etheridge, D-N.C., and Sen. Richard Burr, R-N.C., could solve the problem.

O'Dwyer said customs agents came to greet him by his first name, and one joked that "this was profiling against the Irish."

After missing numerous connecting flights home and having to pay to stay in New York hotels, O'Dwyer gave up flying internationally last May, forgoing about $10,000 in annual bonus pay.

Security Grants Tightly Targeted (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

Homeland Security officials yesterday announced $450 million in security funding for ports, transit systems, and chemical and nuclear plants and said they avoided a "willy-nilly approach" in earmarking the funds to ensure money won't be wasted.

The funding is an increase of $46 million over last year's amount and targets cities most at risk of terrorist attacks, including Washington and New York.

Previous grants were distributed with "very little guidance," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said during the announcement.

"Predictably, we had a rash of stories ... about communities that spent money on leather jackets or gym equipment or things of that sort," Mr. Chertoff said.

"And so, to move away from that kind of willy-nilly approach, we have put in place a risk-driven allocation of eligibility," he said. "We're investing resources where risk is greatest and where the funds will have the most significant impact."

DOJ_NMG_0114604

The grant process also was widely criticized in June after funding was slashed 40 percent for Washington and New York and increased for lower-risk Midwestern cities.

The bulk of the funding, more than $200 million, will go toward port security, and more than $171 million will be spent on transit systems. Bus security funding topped nearly $12 million, as did trucking security, and $48 million has been earmarked for buffer-zone protection.

Cities and states must submit detailed plans on how the money will be spent before receiving the funding.

The National Capital Region will receive up to $18 million for transit security, the second largest grant awarded. The New York and New Jersey region received the largest grant: $61 million.

More than $8 million has been incorporated this year for Amtrak security enhancements.

The Norfolk area was included in a second tier of nearly 30 cities that will compete for $14 million in grants for transit security.

Port security grants went to the New York area ($27 million), New Orleans ($17 million), Houston ($16 million), Los Angeles ($15 million), Puget Sound, Wash., ($12 million), San Francisco Bay area ($11 million), Delaware Bay ($11 million), and Port-Arthur/Beaumont, Texas ($11 million).

Baltimore and Hampton Roads, Va., will compete with 15 cities in a second tier of funding, amounting to $40 million.

Washington will receive up to $1.5 million for buffer-zone protection, and Maryland and Virginia will pick up $770,000 each. That grant covers protection for financial institutions, chemical facilities, nuclear and electrical power plants, dams and stadiums.

States that received buffer-zone grants in previous years but were dropped this year include Alaska, Colorado, New Mexico, North Dakota, South Dakota, Vermont and the Virgin Islands.

Overall, the Homeland Security Department will award $1.7 billion in grants for counterterrorism efforts this year.

Mr. Chertoff said that previous questionable spending was not fraud, but that grant requirements "were defined so broadly and so generally that anything that could be tied to homeland security, in theory, was eligible."

Homeland Chief: Risk Determines Who Gets 2007 Anti-terror Grants (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON — Seaports, rail and bus systems, trucking companies and other private industries at risk of terrorist attack will divvy up nearly a half-billion dollars in anti-terrorism grants this year, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff announced Tuesday.

"We're investing resources where risk is greatest and where the funds will have the most significant impact," said Chertoff, responding to critics who complained that the highest-risk cities didn't get a big enough share of federal homeland security money last year.

Chertoff said the process of deciding which cities would get the grant money this year was driven by threat-based intelligence information and "common sense."

Chertoff said $445 million will be distributed this spring through five grant programs aimed at helping cities shore up security at vulnerable sites. Port security programs will get the largest share of the money: $210 million. Transit security will receive $172 million.

Within those categories, New York City and its surrounding communities will come out on top when the money goes out.

Members of Congress who had accused the Homeland Security Department of giving New York short shrift last year said there was some improvement — but still complained that the area wasn't getting enough money.

"We're glad this is a modest increase in funding for New York City, but we're still not close to our fair share or what we need," Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said.

Highest danger, biggest allotments

These port areas were deemed to be at "highest risk status" and eligible for the most grant money:

•New York-New Jersey, $27.1 million

DOJ_NMG_0114605

•New Orleans, $17.3 million
•Houston-Galveston, $15.7 million
•Los Angeles-Long Beach, $14.7 million
•Puget Sound, Wash., $12.2 million
•Delaware Bay, $11.3 million
•San Francisco Bay, $11.2 million
•Sabine-Neches River, Texas, $10.9 million.

Transit systems in eight major urban areas were found to be at highest risk of attack and eligible for the biggest grants. They are:

•New York-Connecticut-New Jersey, $61 million
•Washington, D.C., and its Maryland and Virginia suburbs, $18.2 million
•Boston, $15.3 million
•San Francisco Bay Area, $13.8 million
•Chicago, $12.8 million
•Philadelphia, $9.7 million
•Greater Los Angeles, $7 million
•Atlanta, $3.4 million.

Testimony Begins In Hurricane Katrina Insurance Lawsuit (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Kunzelman, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 10, 2007

(AP) - GULFPORT, Mississippi-State Farm Fire & Casualty Co. used a new "protocol" after Hurricane Katrina to deny claims to many policyholders, a lawyer for a homeowner suing the company said Tuesday in the trial for one of hundreds of pending insurance lawsuits spawned by the massive storm.

William Walker, attorney for State Farm policyholders Norman and Genevieve Broussard of Biloxi, told an eight-member jury in his opening statement that the company refused to pay for any damage to any home that Katrina reduced to a slab in August 2005, including the Broussards'.

State Farm and other companies say their homeowner policies cover damage from wind but not from water - and exclude damage that could have been caused by a combination of both, even if hurricane-force winds preceded a storm's rising water.

"They denied (the couple's claim) based on this wind/water protocol, this thing that's not in the policy," Walker told jurors. "This is a case in which State Farm promised to do something. This is a case in which State Farm decided not to follow those promises."

The Broussards claim a tornado destroyed their home before any flooding, but State Farm concluded that all the damage was caused by Katrina's storm surge and isn't covered by their policy.

In his opening statement, State Farm attorney Scott Corlew told jurors: "We think after you've reviewed all the evidence that you will agree with us that water was the destructive mechanism at the Broussard home."

The first day of testimony in the federal trial came as Mississippi's attorney general negotiates a separate potential settlement with State Farm that could impact hundreds of other policyholders with Katrina damage.

People with direct knowledge of the settlement talks told The Associated Press on Monday that State Farm, Mississippi's largest home insurer, is considering paying hundreds of millions of dollars (euros) to settle more than 600 lawsuits and resolve hundreds of other disputed claims.

A mass settlement would be the first of its kind to follow the wave of litigation spawned by Katrina.

State Farm, Hood and plaintiffs' lawyers are nearing an agreement that calls for the insurer to pay at least $50 million(euro38 million)- but possibly hundreds of millions more - to roughly 35,000 policyholders who have not sued the company for denying their claim, people with knowledge of the talks said.

A Mississippi settlement would not involve any claims filed by State Farm policyholders in other states.

DOJ_NMG_0114606

Hundreds of Mississippi homeowners have sued their insurance companies for refusing to cover billions of dollars (euros) in damage from Katrina's storm surge. The Broussards' case is only the second to be tried since the storm destroyed or severely damaged tens of thousands of homes.

WAR NEWS:

U.S. Pares Reconstruction Effort In Iraq (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe And Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration's new Iraq strategy calls for modest, relatively inexpensive efforts to spur job creation and economic growth, a marked shift from the large-scale reconstruction projects and free-market dogmatism of earlier White House efforts.

But with the appetite for new spending for Iraq low across Washington, the downsized ambitions are being matched by similarly reduced amounts of money, prompting some senior military commanders to express skepticism the plan will improve conditions in Iraq.

When he addresses the nation tonight, President Bush will propose a micro-finance effort to aid Iraqi entrepreneurs and a sizable expansion of a program giving military commanders money for small-scale reconstruction and job-creation projects, according to administration and Pentagon officials. Mr. Bush described both initiatives in closed-door meetings with senators this week, according to several participants.

Meanwhile, senior Pentagon officials have been touting a push to get 193 Iraqi factories that have shuttered since the 2003 invasion up and running in the next three years. The officials say the reopened plants can provide jobs to tens of thousands of Iraqis who might otherwise join a militia or insurgent groups.

Just after the invasion, U.S. officials focused on big, U.S.-run infrastructure projects, such as rebuilding hospitals, water-treatment plants and electrical power plants. The administration eventually devoted $20.9 billion to the effort, much of which was consumed by security costs or lost to mismanagement. Officials also talked ambitiously about jettisoning Iraq's centralized economic system -- in which hundreds of thousands of Iraqis worked for state-owned firms -- and privatizing its state-run oil industry. Officials didn't spend money to reopen shuttered Iraqi factories because they believed such a move would prevent more-efficient, privately owned businesses from taking root.

Now, U.S. officials are working with Iraqi officials to reopen Iraqi factories as a means of creating tens of thousands of Iraqi jobs, said Paul Brinkley, the deputy undersecretary of defense tapped to lead the effort.

Military officials say the focus on getting Iraqis back to work represents a much-needed change. But some say the improved approach could be hampered by a lack of resources. Army Col. Bill Hix, who served 13 months as a senior strategist in Iraq and now works in the Pentagon, recently wrote an article proposing the U.S. set aside another $20 billion for reconstruction in Iraq. The Iraq Study Group called for the U.S. to provide $5 billion a year in economic assistance.

The Bush administration plans to spend just a few billion dollars on Iraq reconstruction in 2007. It plans to ask Congress for $1.46 billion in aid to the Iraqi government as part of Mr. Bush's new push to stabilize the country, though it will seek additional money for Iraqi security forces.

No U.S. money is being set aside to reopen state-owned Iraqi factories, which employed about 12% of the Iraqi population in 2003. Instead, U.S. officials say they will push Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to find the millions of dollars needed to open as many as 30 factories this year. Mr. Brinkley said the military would help the Iraqi enterprises by contracting with them for essentials like cement and water.

The job-creation and military-reconstruction efforts will also be given only comparatively modest funding. Administration officials say the amount of money devoted to the micro-finance program will most likely be in the tens of millions of dollars. The Commander's Emergency Response Program, which gives military officers money they can use on small-scale reconstruction and jobs programs, is likely to double in size, but the total cost of the program will be close to only $1 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0114607

The administration's retrenchment of its ambitions for Iraq began last year, when the White House's fiscal 2007 budget included no new "Iraq Relief and Reconstruction" money, the name of the initial, $20.9 billion effort. The White House wouldn't comment on any aspect of its latest effort.

Bush To Propose Restoring Iraqi Factories To Create Jobs (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 9 — A new effort to revitalize some of the world's most outdated and decrepit factories for making vegetable oil, fertilizer, road signs and sulfuric acid is expected to be at the center of the plan for Iraq that President Bush will present Wednesday.

But even before the measures are announced, Iraqi political and business leaders have been expressing skepticism that any effort to transform a system of state-owned enterprises that has fallen so far into dysfunction could become an engine for job creation in Iraq.

The administration describes the steps as a way to employ more Iraqis and to keep them away from more destructive pursuits such as joining the insurgency or fighting in a militia.

Among the economic measures under consideration is new support for a program that allows local American military commanders to finance small reconstruction projects.

But recent statements by administration officials suggest that the plan is also likely to include an effort to revive parts of what was a vast Iraqi military and industrial base before it was destroyed by war, sanctions and looting.

That plan would involve pumping expertise and money for reconstruction into enterprises still owned by the Iraqi government, or privatizing some or all of the companies to force them to become more competitive.

Either way, Iraqi political and business leaders were dubious about the prospects for success. "I doubt it very much in view of the current challenges and dangers facing the country," said Mehdi Hafedh, a member of Parliament a former planning minister.

The state-owned enterprises are already a huge drain on Iraq's budget, Mr. Hafedh said, and most of them produce little or nothing. Many are filled with no-show jobs.

"The Americans should have made some consultations because this is ridiculous, frankly," Mr. Hafedh said. "What Iraq needs to do is reduce the number of employees in the state sector."

The focus on jobs and reconstruction is in many ways a return to the earliest days of the occupation, when the top American administrator here, L. Paul Bremer III, pressed the idea that economic initiatives were as important as military action in stabilizing the country and convincing ordinary Iraqis that the invasion would have tangible benefits for them.

That philosophy led to a reconstruction program financed by $30 billion in American taxpayer money that had a marginal impact on the quality of life here, attracted ceaseless attacks on rebuilding projects and produced little but derision among Iraqis.

In addition, American officials, who declined to comment before the president's speech, have never produced evidence that those enormous expenditures have lessened the attractions of the insurgency.

Nor have those officials solved what appears to be a logical flaw in the plan: how does the United States get credit for reconstruction projects when it must keep its participation secret to prevent attacks on those projects?

The employment picture in Iraq is without doubt grim, said Batea al-Kubaisi, a government economics expert. Depending on how it is measured on the chaotic streets of Iraq, the unemployment rate ranges from 30 percent to 60 percent, Mr. Kubaisi said.

Given those numbers, making use of the state-owned companies has distinct attractions. Overall, the 192 companies employ more than 500,000 Iraqis, which amounts to roughly half of all Iraqi government employees, Mr. Hafedh said.

But while the companies may appear alluring in reducing unemployment and sparking the economy, businessmen here said they are far from a solution.

Many of those employees actually do nothing but collect monthly paychecks and go home, says Mahmoud Othman, an Iraqi businessman who favors increasing support for the companies and privatizing some.

DOJ_NMG_0114608

"They are still on the payroll of the government although they have nothing to do," Mr. Othman, who is not to be confused with the Iraqi politician of the same name. "They were not dismissed for social reasons."

The very names of the companies have the musty air of government institutions in a closed nation: the General Company for Vegetable Oils, the State Company for Battery Manufacturing, al-Mishraq Sulfur Industry Company.

And any remaining illusions about the status of those companies would be shattered by evaluations by Mr. Bremer's administration here when privatization was in the air in 2003.

A company that produced metal castings, traffic signs and military medals was so damaged in the invasion, one evaluation said, that the "sign factory is only one that doesn't need to be completely rebuilt from the ground up."

The sulfur company had "heavy damage to offices, plant and equipment," the evaluation said. "Entire facility is almost completely destroyed."

Other companies, like a heavy engineering business called Nasco, have been damaged less severely but have different problems: Nasco is in Doura, now one of the deadliest districts in Baghdad.

The Pentagon official at the center of the program to revitalize the state-owned enterprises is Paul A. Brinkley, the deputy undersecretary for business transformation, who has surveyed some of the companies in Iraq.

"What we are doing is assessing these factories," Mr. Brinkley told American Forces Press Service last week. "We are bringing in expertise. We are bringing international industry to bear to create demand for these factories."

Mr. Brinkley told the service he hoped that within a year, around a quarter of the $4 billion that the United States spends to support its troops in Iraq — food, fuel and outfitting of bases that is mostly bought outside the country — could be spent instead on the Iraqi companies. Some Iraqi officials, including Layla Kadhum, the minister of labor and social affairs, appeared to support the initiative.

"If these ideas are applied, they will have a great role in diminishing the violence that the country is witnessing, because a great part of the violence is caused by the unemployment," Ms. Kadhum said.

Others sounded notes of alarm, particularly if Mr. Bush planned the sort of privatization that was tried and abandoned as unworkable early in Mr. Bremer's tenure.

"I hope the president doesn't make that the linchpin of his short-term strategy," said Basil Rahim, an Iraqi financial expert, "because that's just going to backfire on him."

U.S. Teams Try To Rebuild A War-torn Nation (LAT)

By Paul Richter And Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

KIRKUK, IRAQ — For nearly a year, a team of U.S. civilian and military officials has worked from small, sparsely furnished offices here trying to help Iraqi officials with their most urgent needs: building a local government and providing basic public services.

"Provincial reconstruction teams" like this one are expected to be central to the economic component of the new Iraq policy that President Bush plans to unveil today. But in emphasizing such steps, Bush and his aides are courting widespread skepticism. Many U.S. officials and outside Iraq experts view the economic and political portion of Bush's package, like his expected proposal to increase the number of U.S. troops in the country, to be a big gamble with a limited chance of success.

"There's reason to try all of these ideas, and that's why we have tried them before," said one U.S. official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because Bush had not yet detailed his new strategy. "We're reliving all of the issues that have been discussed since 2003. It's like 'Groundhog Day.' "

The 35-member team in this northern Iraqi city has funneled money to aid and reconstruction projects, helped set up temporary job and job-training programs, and assisted local officials with budgets and other issues. Yet it has been hampered by shortages of skilled staff and money and a lack of security, problems that have undermined previous multibillion-dollar U.S. reconstruction efforts across the country since the American-led invasion of Iraq in March 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0114609

The current Kirkuk effort is being conducted by an eclectic group, including a former member of the British Parliament, a high school chemistry teacher, a commercial pilot, a marketing manager, a retired state trooper and a career diplomat. One member, a lawyer who helps set up local courts, refers to the group as "the Peace Corps with guns."

Some team members caution that the tough problems they face can't be solved through a quick infusion of money or personnel.

"There's no cheap surge," said Kirkuk team leader Jim Bigus, a career diplomat who came to Iraq from Afghanistan, where he was deputy director of the U.S. Bureau for International Narcotics Law Enforcement Affairs. "You've got to get more attractive salaries to people here, and you've got to get more security, and more locations. And that's hard to do quickly."

Bush is expected to announce plans to double the number of provincial reconstruction teams and call for big new job and loan programs and a renewed reconstruction effort. Administration officials consider the economic and political aspects of Bush's plan more important than the expected troop increase.

The plan has two stages, officials say. Once troops have pacified key areas of Baghdad and Al Anbar province, officials will offer economic and political benefits, including jobs that they hope will win the loyalty of young men who are now fighting U.S. and Iraqi government security forces.

Shortage of civilian help

U.S. military officials have long complained about the shortage of civilian American officials available to work with local governments. Senior U.S. officials are calling for an increase in civilian workers to accompany the expected addition of up to 20,000 troops.

The provincial reconstruction teams at work in Iraq were modeled on organizations used in Vietnam and Afghanistan and are expected to be a principal channel for new aid.

Members of the Kirkuk team say senior U.S. officials have hinted at the possibility of added resources and have urged State Department officials on the team not to close a regional embassy office that might be needed in the future.

"We've been asked a lot in the last month how many more people we could use, or money," said team leader Bigus.

The team's routine, four days a week, is to strap on armor and helmets and pile into a convoy of armored Humvees for trips into the field to confer with Iraqi officials and others. None of its members, however, speaks Arabic or Kurdish, though there are five interpreters on staff.

The usual destination is the faded gray and yellow Kirkuk Government Building, which is safe enough to allow them to shed their weapons and armored vests while they sip tea with officials.

Since arriving last spring, the Kirkuk team has helped arrange $744 million in spending from Iraqi, Pentagon and USAID sources for 599 development projects. U.S. officials view the Kirkuk team as a showcase.

Yet it has faced major obstacles. It has not been able to recruit all the civilian specialists it would like, and has had to turn to military personnel to pick up the slack. Only about one-third of its members are civilians. The original plan called for a 50-50 split.

Still, the work is considered vital. Bigus said that better public services could turn Iraqis away from the insurgency, but worried that more troops could lead to more casualties, hurting the team effort.

"Dead officers don't do reports, and the more deaths we have, the more problems we have recruiting," he said.

Similar teams in other parts of Iraq face more severe problems. Teams in the more dangerous Al Anbar and Basra provinces are so understaffed and hamstrung by security concerns that the U.S. Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction urged in an October audit that they be closed. Of the 13 main and satellite offices studied, only four were "generally able" to carry out their missions, the audit said.

One U.S. official said plans for an increase in civilians were causing anxiety in the State Department, which, like other civilian agencies, has struggled to find enough people willing to accept the dangerous assignments. Senior U.S. officials have considered involuntary assignments, but have so far rejected that step.

Other components of the economic effort also have raised questions, including proposals for new job programs, which one official said would cost up to $1 billion.

A calming effect

DOJ_NMG_0114610

U.S. military commanders are enthusiastic backers of temporary job programs, citing their effect in calming cities such as Tall Afar after bitter fighting. Commanders contend that many young Iraqis would rather take such jobs than work for the insurgency.

"The vast majority of the terrorists we fight are not ideologically bound. They're doing this mostly for economics," said Army Col. Patrick Stackpole, commander of the 3rd Brigade Combat Team of the 25th Infantry Division in Kirkuk, which works with the provincial reconstruction team.

To help provide jobs, the administration's plan calls for a sharp expansion of the Commander's Emergency Response Program, which gives field commanders cash that they can use at their discretion to put civilians to work.

However, many civilian officials and former government administrators believe the economic benefits of the job programs have proved fleeting. In the currently volatile atmosphere, job offers are unlikely to lure away men who are deeply committed to the fight, they say.

Frederick D. Barton, a former U.S. Agency for International Development official and specialist on postwar reconstruction, said temporary job programs employed about 50,000 Iraqis at their peak more than two years ago, but would be less attractive now.

"Cleaning up garbage and digging ditches for a few bucks a day for six weeks doesn't give you much of a time horizon and might put your life at risk," said Barton, now with the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

Maj. Chris Mitchiner, an intelligence officer with the 3rd Brigade, 25th Infantry Division, in Kirkuk, said most Sunni insurgents "can't see past tomorrow" and are unlikely to be swayed by job programs.

James Dobbins, a former senior U.S. diplomat and advisor to the Iraq Study Group, said the job programs had not had lasting economic effects.

Factories reopen

Pentagon officials have begun reopening some of the 200 state-owned factories that were closed after the U.S. invasion. Military leaders hope that the factories can produce basic goods to be sold to the U.S. military and to commercial customers. Pentagon officials said they had opened one such factory, and hoped to open nine more by the end of the month, eventually providing 11,000 permanent jobs.

But critics said that it would be difficult to make the rundown factories function profitably and argued that many of the former employees would be unwilling or unavailable to go back to work.

"Most of them were unprofitable and for the most part irredeemable four years ago, and they're mostly in worse shape today," said Dobbins, who now directs Rand Corp.'s International Security and Defense Policy program.

The administration could face resistance from the Democratic-controlled Congress in funding the effort. Democrats, unhappy with the $20 billion already spent on reconstruction, have signaled that they may pare back new requests.

New Wave Of Troops Set For Iraq (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, January 10, 2007

The first of up to 20,000 additional U.S. troops will move into Iraq by month's end under President Bush's new war plan, a senior defense official said Tuesday. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi pledged to hold a vote on the increase, which many Democrats oppose.

Details of a gradual military buildup emerged a day before Bush's planned speech to the nation, in which he also will propose a bit over $1 billion to shore up the country's battered economy and create jobs, said a second U.S. official.

Bush is expected to urge friendly Mideast countries to increase their aid to Iraq but will ignore the recommendation of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group that he include Syria and Iran in an effort to stanch Iraqi bloodshed nearly four years after the U.S. invasion, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the plan has not yet been announced.

Bush is expected to link the troop increase to promised steps by the Iraqi government to build up its own military, ease the country's murderous sectarian tensions, increase reconstruction and enact a plan to distribute oil revenues among the country's religious sects.

DOJ_NMG_0114611

Even before he delivers his speech, Bush's plan has drawn sharp criticism from the leaders of the new, Democratic-controlled Congress. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said he hoped for a bipartisan measure that would declare, "We don't support this escalation of the war." If it passes, "the president's going to have to take note of that. I think that's the beginning of the end, as far as I'm concerned," he said.

Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for Pelosi, said Tuesday night, "The House will vote on the president's proposal." She said she had no details.

The president met during the day with lawmakers, practiced his speech and briefed key foreign allies, including calls to the leaders of Britain, Australia and Denmark. Bush was expected to practice his speech a couple of more times before addressing the nation at 9 p.m. EST Wednesday from the White House Library.

Under Bush's plan, thousands of troops will be alerted that they may be needed in Iraq — including units already there whose service would be extended, or others that could be sent earlier than initially scheduled, said one official.

Moving first into Iraq would be the 2nd Brigade, 82nd Airborne Division, which is now in Kuwait and poised to head quickly into the country, the defense official said. The brigade, numbering about 3,500 troops, is based at Fort Bragg, N.C.

Other units, including Marine brigades in western Iraq, could be asked to extend their deployment. And the military buildup is also likely to include moving the aircraft carrier USS John C. Stennis into the Persian Gulf region, as a show of force and a warning to Iran and Syria.

There are already about 132,000 U.S. troops in Iraq.

According to the defense official, Bush also will discuss the need to address how often the Pentagon can tap the National Guard and Reserves, although he may provide few details. And Bush will again endorse the need to increase the size of the Army and Marine Corps.

The speech looms as a key one for Bush, who is beginning the final two years of his presidency waging a war that has scant public support and whose own popularity has plummeted as well.

The public has heard several previous campaigns by Bush to defend his Iraq policies and show that he is changing with changing circumstances. Since the war's start in March 2003, there have been at least seven public relations offensives by Bush on the war, with some of these speech series timed to milestone events and others to dips in polls.

In Iraq Tuesday, U.S. jets screamed low over the capital and helicopter gunships swooped in to pound a central Baghdad battleground as Iraqi and American troops waged a daylong fight that officials said killed 50 insurgents in a militant Sunni Arab stronghold.

Iraqi police, meanwhile, reported finding 52 bodies dumped in three cities, 41 of them in Baghdad, all apparent victims of sectarian reprisal killings.

Bush has met with more than 110 lawmakers in recent days to discuss his plan, and some offered details Tuesday.

"The president believes that the Iraqi forces aided by American forces will be able to clean out Baghdad and stabilize Baghdad and leave as he put it 'space' for a political reconciliation process to unify the country and stabilize Iraq," said Rep. Robert Andrews, D-N.J., one of 12 Democratic lawmakers who met with Bush Tuesday.

Andrews said the meeting was "dominated by our skepticism of whether the Iraqi forces are willing to fight for their own government."

Sen. Carl Levin, a Michigan Democrat who chairs the Senate Armed Services Committee, said he expected Bush to announce that up to 20,000 additional troops will be sent to Iraq but not to say how long the extra forces will be there. He said he believed Bush will signal that the overall U.S. commitment in Iraq is not open-ended.

A key element of the plan will be the increased responsibilities taken on by the Iraqis. Bush is expected to link the troop increase to efforts by the Iraqi government to curb Shiite militias that have terrorized the Sunni minority, as well as moves to ease government restrictions on members of the late Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein's Baath Party.

Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, said Tuesday that he believes the Baghdad government suggested some of the conditions, such as their ongoing efforts to get more Iraqi forces trained and equipped for battle and committing more money for reconstruction.

DOJ_NMG_0114612

Leading the opposition, Sen. Edward Kennedy, a longtime critic, introduced legislation that would deny the president the billions needed to send more troops unless Congress agreed first. It was unclear whether the bill would ever reach the full Senate, but it could serve as a rallying point for critics.

White House press secretary Tony Snow conceded that Bush has a challenge in convincing a war-weary public.

"The president will not shape policy according to public opinion, but he does understand that it's important to bring the public back to this war and restore public confidence and support for the mission," Snow said.

Bush To Request More Troops (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds And Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush spent hours Tuesday practicing in front of cameras, preparing to make his case for increasing the U.S. military commitment in Iraq in a prime-time address to the nation tonight, even as congressional Democrats readied legislation to block any increase in the number of troops.

Members of Congress who met with Bush said he appeared to understand that, after years of upbeat rhetoric and positive assessments that belied a lack of progress inside the country, his credibility was on the line.

"He told us what he planned to say tomorrow," said Rep. Jane Harman (D-Venice), one of about a dozen House members who met with the president and his top advisors for more than an hour Tuesday afternoon. "In terms of tough moments in his presidency, this is it."

Sen. Trent Lott of Mississippi, the Senate's second-ranking Republican, said both Republicans and Democrats would be listening for a note of contrition in the president's voice.

"As important as what he says is how he says it," Lott told reporters.

Lawmakers who have met with Bush this week say he intends to ask for about 20,000 additional troops to shift the strategy in Iraq toward ending sectarian violence and increasing security on the ground for Iraqi civilians in restive areas. According to the lawmakers, the troubled Iraqi government has agreed to meet benchmarks of political progress as a condition of the troop increase.

Supporters of the strategy say a decrease in violence will foster political reconciliation between Iraqi factions. Detractors say a "surge" in troops is just another term for "escalation."

"His speech is going to clearly show that he is calling for an escalation in Iraq," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) told reporters.

In the White House meeting, Bush gave a rundown of the speech to House Democrats, who gave him a tepid response. Rep. Adam Smith (D-Wash.) said no lawmaker in his meeting supported the new policy.

"We were more in a question-and-answer mode, but a fair amount of skepticism was voiced," Smith said.

"It was not a confrontational meeting," said Rep. Ellen O. Tauscher (D-Alamo), who said she emphasized the importance of the Iraqi government making political progress. "I think he understands that, at some level, this is the last best chance."

"I said a surge in troops was a good idea three years ago — but not now," Harman said. "Other strategies — political and diplomatic — right now are more critical."

Rep. C.W. "Bill" Young of Florida, who joined other senior House Republicans at the White House on Tuesday, said he wanted to hear more from Bush.

"I'm anxious to hear the speech," he said, "because I think there's going to be a lot more in the speech than he told us today."

Reid said he intended to bring at least a nonbinding resolution to the Senate floor next week to permit Democrats and Republicans to vote against a troop increase. A similar measure is planned in the House.

In addition, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) introduced legislation Tuesday to cut off funding for any troops above the current level of 132,000. It would also require the president to seek congressional approval before sending additional military forces to Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0114613

Kennedy said his legislation, which is being sponsored in the House by Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), would "reclaim the rightful role of Congress and the people's right to have a full voice in the president's plan to send more troops to Iraq."

Kennedy was careful Tuesday to insist that he and other Democrats did not plan to cut off funding for troops now in Iraq.

Reid did not commit to bringing Kennedy's proposal to a Senate vote. "His is an idea," Reid said, "and certainly we'll look at it in an intelligent way. We'll look at it giving everyone every right they have to be part of a solution to this problem."

Kennedy detailed his proposal at the National Press Club in a speech rich with allusions to Vietnam.

"Echoes of that disaster are all around us today. Iraq is George Bush's Vietnam," said Kennedy, who joined the Senate in 1962, three years before the major escalation of American military involvement in Southeast Asia. "As with Vietnam, the only rational solution to the crisis is political, not military."

Kennedy helped lead the efforts to limit military aid to South Vietnam after U.S. forces withdrew following the 1973 peace accords. Since then, Congress has acted several times to put legislative limits on military operations.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), who has been a leading champion of sending more troops, said congressional limitations for Iraq would be a "devastating precedent."

"I can't think of a stronger signal to send to the extremists in the world, not just Iraq — 'Hang in there, you're winning' — other than the United States Congress calling this war over," he said.

P. Edward Haley, a political scientist at Claremont McKenna College and a former congressional staffer, said "the founders knew what they were doing when they gave the legislature the power of the purse."

"The abuse of the power to make war was one of the worst forms of monarchical misrule, and the quickest road to tyranny, and the founders were determined to prevent both in the new constitution," Haley said.

"Of course, having the power is one thing; finding the votes to exercise it is another," Haley added. "It will be very difficult for the Democrats to refuse funding without falling into a political trap the administration has set in order to blame them for failure in Iraq."

Bush's Speech May Be The Most Important Of His Presidency (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson And Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush is about to take a gamble that could make or break his presidency and his place in history.

In a speech scheduled for Wednesday night, he'll try to convince a war-weary nation to commit more troops and money to a struggle in Iraq that's already cost more than 3,000 American lives and at least $300 billion.

His nationally televised speech, and the reaction to it, will determine the next step in Iraq, test his relations with the new Democratic-led Congress and set the tone for his final two years in office. Some analysts say it could increase pressure for withdrawal if the solutions Bush offers don't bring quick results.

White House aides acknowledge that the president faces a skeptical audience when he goes before television cameras at 9 p.m..

Nearly four years after Bush led the nation to war, most Americans think he made a big mistake. A Gallup poll conducted last weekend for USA Today and CNN found that only 1 in 4 Americans approve of his handling of Iraq. Only about a third said they'd support his expected call for as many as 20,000 more troops.

Even Bush's allies concede that he may not get another chance to revise a war plan that's failed to meet shifting challenges from Iraqi insurgents, Islamic terrorists and bloody sectarian violence.

"This may not be our last chance, but it's as close to our last chance as anything I can think of," Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said.

Bush's toughest challenge may be trying to convince Americans that the war is worth the mounting cost, in both lives and money. In addition to a troop increase, his plan is expected to include an ambitious new jobs program for Iraqis that could cost as much as $1 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0114614

As Bush put the final touches on his plan, congressional Democrats looked for ways to block any troop surge. Calling Iraq "George Bush's Vietnam," Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said he would introduce legislation that would require congressional approval for any troop increase.

"We cannot simply speak out against an escalation of troops in Iraq; we must act to prevent it," he said in a speech at the National Press Club. "As with Vietnam, the only rational solution to the crisis is political, not military. Injecting more troops into a civil war is not the answer."

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Bush would try to shore up support for the war by raising hopes for victory and spelling out the consequences of defeat. The White House has sought to frame the Iraq debate as a choice between Bush's plan and abject failure.

"The president will not shape policy according to public opinion, but he does understand that that it's important to bring the public back to this war and restore public confidence," Snow said. "I think what the American people will ask themselves is, do we want to win this war?"

But some who share Bush's view of the dire consequences of failure worry that by raising expectations for progress, Bush runs the risk of a backlash if his new approach fails to get positive results soon.

"After a couple of months, people will say, `Well, look, the situation hasn't changed. That demonstrates it's hopeless,'" former national security Brent Scowcroft said on ABC last weekend. "The pressure to get out will increase."

Bush stayed out of public view Tuesday as he promoted his plan in private talks with members of Congress and foreign leaders. Meeting participants said Bush stressed his goal of turning security responsibility over to Iraqis. He also told visitors that the plan would include new efforts by Iraqi leaders to disarm sectarian militias and restore order in Baghdad.

Rep. Norm Dicks, D-Wash., said administration officials indicated that the Iraqi commitment for Baghdad would include about 10,000 more Iraqi troops and as many as 18,000 additional police. He said the officials suggested they'd know by February whether the plan would be a success.

"This is being presented as an Iraqi plan," Rep. Adam Smith, D-Wash., said after meeting with Bush and other top administration officials. "They will be taking the lead in Baghdad. They want to show that the Iraqi government can actually function."

Smith said he remained "very skeptical" that the plan would succeed.

Bush also sketched out his ideas in phone calls to British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Australian Prime Minister John Howard and Danish Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen.

Senate Democratic leaders said they would introduce a non-binding resolution that would test Senate support for Bush's plan. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said a vote against the plan, even if only symbolic, could force the president to change course.

Some Republicans said they were prepared to back Bush, but suggested that their enthusiasm would depend on the details of the plan and his speech. "As important as what he says is how he says it," said Sen. Trent Lott, the Senate's No. 2 Republican.

Some Iraqi officials were also skeptical about Bush's plans.

Baha Araji, a member of the parliamentary bloc loyal to Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, said he believes neither the Iraqi nor American military can stop Iraq's eroding security. He called for a political solution. But when asked how to achieve that goal, he shrugged his shoulders.

Nancy A. Youssef in Baghdad and Kevin Diaz, Les Blumenthal, Dave Montgomery and Renee Schoof in Washington contributed to this report.

Bush Must Sell Public, Congress Iraq Speech May Define President's Legacy (AJC)

By Ken Herman

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 10, 2007

Washington — President Bush's legacy will be on the line when he goes on national television tonight seeking public support for his new strategy in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0114615

"This may be the last, best chance to shape policy and opinion on the issue that will define his presidency," said Mark McKinnon, a longtime communications adviser to Bush.

His plan to send more troops to Iraq will be a tough sell. A Gallup/USA Today poll released Tuesday showed that 61 percent oppose the idea, and 47 percent said they do not think the United States can attain its goals in Iraq no matter how many troops are sent.

McKinnon is among those, including Bush aides in the White House, who believe that nothing the president says tonight is likely to move numbers in his direction. It's the results that will matter.

"The plan for more troops has to be clear and provide metrics for success in order to win support," McKinnon said.

The troop increase is expected to be tied to Iraqi government commitments to crack down on Shiite militias' attacks on the Sunni minority. Also included will be economic incentives to bolster the Iraqi economy with rebuilding projects.

White House spokesman Tony Snow has talked about the speech as a beginning of a process.

"The president will not shape a policy according to public opinion," Snow said. "But he does understand that it's important to bring the public back to this war and restore public confidence in support for the mission."

Democrats, now running Congress, already have challenged the wisdom of sending more troops.

"The American people sent a clear message in November that we must change course in Iraq and begin to withdraw our troops, not escalate their presence," said Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), who has proposed legislation that would require congressional approval for any escalation.

White House aides acknowledge the opposition and the battle to come.

"This is a very complex subject to take people through in what is a fairly brief set of remarks," a Bush aide said of tonight's 25-minute speech. The aide talked of "other opportunities," including a Thursday appearance at Georgia's Fort Benning, for Bush "to talk to the American people about it."

But it is not just the public that needs to be convinced.

"This one is a particularly tough task because he has two broad sets of audience that have doubts," said presidential historian John Geer of Vanderbilt University. "The first is the American public that is concerned about Iraq and continuing to stay there and have more troops there. The second, of course, is a Congress that is no longer Republican." Convincing either audience would be a tall order, Geer said, but "two makes it even a taller order."

Still, he may have little to lose.

"His popularity is pretty low now," said Geer. "It's not likely to go a lot lower."

Political scientist George Edwards of Texas A&M's Bush School of Government and Public Service agreed.

"In some ways it does make sense to take a risk," he said, noting that without the support of public and the Congress, the president's major remaining power is the veto.

"It is an inherently negative power and not one that requires a lot of political capital," he said.

Bush Faces Tough Sell On Iraq (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

President Bush faces a difficult task tonight when he lays out his new strategy for Iraq in a prime-time address, with the White House acknowledging that he needs to recapture public support for a war effort that has stumbled in the past year.

Mr. Bush is expected to announce an increase of up to 20,000 troops to help secure Baghdad, with the first wave to be shipped out this month and the rest prepared to deploy more gradually. He also is expected to lay out obligations for Iraq, in effect tying a deeper commitment of government leaders to an escalation of U.S. forces.

Public opinion polls show the president will have a tough sell.

A Gallup-USA Today poll taken over the weekend showed that 61 percent of Americans oppose a troop increase and 36 percent support it, and that Mr. Bush's job approval for Iraq has dropped to 26 percent.

The White House yesterday said Mr. Bush has lost the country's support.

DOJ_NMG_0114616

"It's important to bring the public back to this war and restore public confidence and support for the mission," spokesman Tony Snow said.

Jeffrey D. McCausland, a defense specialist and former National Security Council staffer, said Mr. Bush will be addressing three audiences: Congress, which controls the funding; the American public, whose patience is slipping; and Iraq, which will have to exhibit a more solid commitment.

Mr. McCausland said he expects Mr. Bush to explain that Iraqis have to show they have earned a new wave of U.S. forces.

He said Mr. Bush must establish a measurement of progress in order to win public support.

The last time the U.S. announced a troop increase, Iraqis were to match it with six battalions but sent only two, he said.

"The real question is, the president's in the middle of a moral dilemma. He has to threaten to do the one thing he's said he's ultimately unwilling to do, and that's walk away from this," Mr. McCausland said.

Democrats said Mr. Bush must prove that his policy is taking a new direction.

"Nearly three years after launching a war that has taken more than 3,000 American lives, cost more than $300 billion and left tens of thousands of Americans wounded, President Bush has an obligation to tell the American people how his new 'strategy' will diverge from his policies of the last three years," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, Illinois Democrat and chairman of the House Democratic Caucus.

Mr. Snow noted that George Washington, Abraham Lincoln and Winston Churchill sustained setbacks in war.

"Was Winston Churchill responsible for the Blitz? What Winston Churchill did was talk about the conditions for victory," Mr. Snow said, adding that Mr. Bush is "adjusting and talking about conditions for victory."

Analysis: Bush's New Plan Not All New (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, January 10, 2007

President Bush's new plan for Iraq sounds a lot like his old one. Send in more troops, set goals for the Iraqi government and assure Americans it's better to wage war there than here.

And now the U.S. military is back in Somalia, too, once again attacking suspected terrorist targets.

Bush's challenge in Iraq: show what's different now.

The plan the president will outline to the nation Wednesday night is the latest repackaging of a program that's been wrapped and rewrapped many times.

The White House recognizes that a majority of Americans disapprove of Bush's handling of Iraq and that Democrats are eager to assert their new leadership on Capitol Hill by challenging his proposal to send in more troops.

But Bush advisers also believe that Americans do not necessarily support an immediate withdrawal and might be willing to give the president the benefit of the doubt if he presents a feasible, detailed plan that points the way to an eventual U.S. drawdown.

It's different this time, Bush supporters say of his new strategy — always words to beware.

For one thing, administration officials contend that the Iraqi government, while still fragile, has matured and will do much more of its part this time.

They note that Bush has reshuffled his military and diplomatic team in Iraq and has a new defense secretary, Robert Gates, to carry out the revised plan.

Bush has told lawmakers he plans to send about 20,000 more troops to Iraq. There are roughly 132,00 there now. The White House also is working on its largest-ever appeal for more war funds — a record $100 billion, at least — to be submitted along with Bush's Feb. 5 budget.

"He does understand that it's important to bring the public back to this war and restore public confidence in support for the mission," spokesman Tony Snow said Tuesday.

Still, there's clearly a been-there, done-that feel to Bush's new plan.

It's an old story: The U.S. before has temporarily raised troop levels, taken steps to encourage democracy, spent money on education and public works and set benchmarks for the Iraqi government.

DOJ_NMG_0114617

In the fall of 2005, the president gave a series of speeches around the country on the way forward in Iraq. To mark the campaign, the White House issued a glossy 35-page document titled "Our National Strategy for Victory in Iraq," spelling out a series of military, political and economic initiatives.

"This last summer there was a troop increase that really did no good in my opinion whatsoever," says Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., the new chairman of the House Armed Services Committee.

That was after Bush went to Baghdad and announced a joint effort with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to beef up security in Baghdad — and after an earlier joint effort failed to stem the tide of sectarian violence. The newer one failed too.

Skelton suggests too much attention is being paid to the latest plan's rollout.

"Whatever the president does, it is still up to the Iraqis to make or break it themselves. So let's not put any more spotlight on this decision any more than those in the past, which sadly have not been good ones," he says.

As Bush outlines his new Iraq strategy, he may well mention the new U.S. airstrikes in Somalia that targeted Islamic extremists.

He can cite the war on terrorism's multiple fronts. It fits in with his fight-them-abroad-not-at-home thesis. Administration allies suggest the U.S. withdrawal from Somalia in 1993 helped strengthen the al-Qaida terror network.

"Just as the Soviet defeat in Afghanistan emboldened and enlarged al-Qaida, just as our withdrawal from Somalia encouraged them to go find more targets, our defeat in Iraq would expand the numbers of terrorists and embolden them to seek new strategic targets," said Rep. Mac Thornberry of Texas, a Republican member of the House Armed Services Committee.

Analysts and lawmakers have mixed views on whether Bush can do anything to turn the tide in Iraq. Some say it's possible, but that the odds are low after nearly four years of war.

"Anything that would work now would have worked even better two years ago," said Michael O'Hanlon, a foreign policy analyst at Brookings Institution who served as an adviser to the Iraq Study Group. "Increasing troops has always been an option. But this is probably the least promising time to try it of the past almost four years."

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton, called for beginning to withdraw combat troops — a central recommendation Bush apparently has chosen to ignore.

Many Democrats and some Republicans await Bush's speech with skepticism.

"There is the troubling issue of the capacity of the struggling government in Iraq, consumed as it is by fractional fighting, to establish any kind of sustained governing coalition," said Ray DuBois, a Pentagon official until last March who is now with the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Rep. David Obey, D-Wis., chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, complained that Bush initially promised that Americans would stand down as Iraqis stood up. "Now it sounds like we're being told that Americans will stand up as the Iraqis are standing up. That's a confusing difference to me."

Storm Rises Over 'Surge' (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON — Is it a "surge?" Is it an "escalation?" Is it harmless semantics? Is it disingenuous spin?

One thing is clear: Using the word "surge" to describe President Bush's forthcoming plan for reshaping U.S. efforts in Iraq has ignited a fiery political brouhaha.

The plan, which Bush is scheduled to unveil today, is widely expected to include a proposal for increasing the number of American troops in Iraq. And the increase has been widely referred to by Pentagon officials and others as a "surge."

That's how the furor began, raging over the Internet, in complaints to reporters and in the blogosphere. News organizations across the country have been drawn into the fray, including NPR, CBS News, the Los Angeles Times and the Wall Street Journal.

What infuriates critics of the war, including many liberal Democrats, is that they see "surge" as a manipulative and deceptive word. It implies a relatively short-term increase in the U.S. military commitment, they say, when the White House intends to keep the additional troops in Iraq much longer, perhaps for several years.

Even worse, critics say, the news media have uncritically accepted the word and thus contributed to deceiving the public.

DOJ_NMG_0114618

"I've noticed a complete acceptance on the part of most of the MSM [mainstream media] (and Congress) to accept the White House nomenclature," blogger Nicole Belle wrote in a complaint posted on crooksandliars.com.

"After six years of this, I think we all know that he who frames the debate and chooses the vocabulary wins from the beginning. Let's be sure to not accept the White House framing, no matter how wimped out the MSM is."

Some profess to see Machiavellian intrigue by White House political guru Karl Rove.

"It seems like it comes from Karl Rove … renaming things, reframing, making it sound acceptable," James A. Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University, said Tuesday on NPR's "Diane Rehm Show" when a listener called in to complain about the word.

"Please stop buying into the misleading nomenclature calling it a surge," the caller, identified as Mike from Monkton, Md., said. "Misleading the public by misnaming things might be acceptable in politics, though I find it treasonous, but it's time for the Fourth Estate to do its job."

Choosing words to one's advantage is hardly new. Advertising copy writers do it all the time. So do political advocates, as in the struggle over the "estate tax" versus the "death tax."

"These are theological disputes," said S. Robert Lichter, director of the Center for Media and Public Affairs at George Mason University. The dust-up over the word "surge" seemed to some a metaphor for the passions unleashed by the war itself. Lichter compared the debate to the struggle "for every inch, like Stalingrad."

The controversy has not been diminished by the fact that Bush and senior White House officials have steered clear of "surge" themselves.

The Wall Street Journal, on its website, declared as early as Dec. 25 that there was a "new war of words brewing over the Iraq War."

Although critics blame pro-war spinmeisters, some military officials say "surge" has long been used in the armed forces to indicate a quick, not necessarily short-term, increase.

Army Chief of Staff Peter J. Schoomaker, for example, used the term in testimony before the House Armed Services Committee in 2003, saying, "Now there is no question that there's parts of Iraq that we need to surge troops into."

In 2004, Gen. John P. Abizaid was quoted by Army Times as saying to a group of senior U.S. commanders, "So you have this notion of using surge forces to deal with specific military problems…. The combination of base forces plus surge forces … is pretty important."

None of that has mollified critics. Complaining about the use of the word in The Times on Sunday, an e-mailer identified as Carlileb said, "What's with the uncritical use of the euphemism 'surge?' … You know, this kind of thing makes the LAT look like a propaganda flack for the Bush administration, even if that wasn't the intent."

And some bloggers claimed a measure of success with their attacks. Initially, some Democratic members of Congress had suggested they might support Bush on a "surge," but by the end of last week, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco described the plan as an escalation, as did Democrats making appearances on the Sunday talk shows.

Ironically, Frederick Kagan of conservative think tank the American Enterprise Institute, who is widely credited with helping sell the increase proposal to the White House, was quoted on the blog Media Nation as complaining that reporters were misrepresenting his ideas when they used the word "surge" to imply a short-term commitment.

"The media has been using the term 'surge' very loosely," Kagan was quoted as saying. "And I think that's actually a bit of a problem, because there have been various ideas floated for very short-term troop surges of relatively small numbers of troops. And I think that that would be a big mistake, and it's not what we're calling for."

What Kagan wants is at least 25,000 additional troops, and not for a short time.

If all that seemed a bit confusing, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow had a solution Tuesday. Braced on "surge" versus "escalation," Snow said it was up to the reporters:

"You guys do words for a living," he said. "Rather than trying to ask Democratic or even Republican lawmakers what the proper descriptive term is, you figure it out."

DOJ_NMG_0114619

Democrats Rush To Frame Political Debate Over Troops (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 — "Cut and run" versus "stay the course" is so 2006.

This week has ushered in a new political battle over the language of the war: "Surge," meet "escalation."

The Democrats introduced the latter word to portray President Bush's expected proposal for a troop increase in Iraq in a negative light.

"An escalation, whether it is called a surge or any other name, is still an escalation, and I believe it will be an immense new mistake," Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, said Tuesday in a speech critiquing Mr. Bush's as-yet-unannounced Iraq plan.

Should the significance of the word be lost on those too young to remember its loaded usage during the Vietnam War, Senator Kennedy added: "The Department of Defense kept assuring us that each new escalation in Vietnam would be the last. Instead, each one led only to the next."

On Sunday, the new House speaker, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, used "escalate" or "escalation" six times during an interview on the CBS News program "Face the Nation."

Asked at his regular briefing on Tuesday about the Democrats' use of the "E" word, Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, initially said, "I think a lot of times people are going to try to find a one-word characterization that allows them to make a political point without perhaps diving into the details."

But, pressed further by a reporter to address the new "Democratic Party language," Mr. Snow said, "Well, ask the guys who do their focus groups."

Finally, he said, given that President Bush would not announce his new plan until his speech on Wednesday night, "It seems a little silly for me to start quibbling about adjectives without discussing what they purportedly describe, don't you think?"

Mr. Snow last night said that the president would not be using the word "surge" in his speech, adding that it implied what he called a "rush hour" approach to a serious policy.

Surge (surj) N. 1. A Sudden Increase . . . In Political Parlance (WP)

By Paul Farhi

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

It's one of those words -- like "chad" or "blog" or "waterboarding" -- that's suddenly become the go-to phrase to describe a contemporary phenomenon.

"Surge," the country's latest catchword, is what President Bush intends to propose tonight in a prime-time speech -- a "surge" of troops, perhaps 20,000, to bolster the American military presence in Iraq.

A surge. It conjures: the rush of the ocean tides. Or what a young person feels upon the first blush of love. Or what a sports team does late in the game. Among its definitions, "any sudden, strong increase, as of energy, enthusiasm, etc.," according to Webster's New World College Dictionary.

What we have here is shorthand for a very long debate.

The very vagueness of "surge" might make it the politically perfect word for what is likely to be a controversial policy. Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the new House speaker, framed her apparent opposition to sending more troops to Iraq by using a more freighted substitute: "escalation."

In that context, surge is a euphemism for a euphemism. "Escalation" was variously ascribed to both President Lyndon Johnson's policy of increased military aid to Vietnam, and the U.S. "incursion" -- yet more euphemisms! -- into Laos and Cambodia in 1970 under President Richard Nixon. Perhaps to avoid echoes of that war, "surge" is the Pentagon and White House's preferred coinage.

"Surge," though, has no real history or meaning as a military construct -- unlike, say, "tank" or "M-16." It doesn't appear in reference books such as the Oxford Companion to Military History, the Encyclopedia of the Vietnam War or the Encyclopedia of the U.S. Military. Nor does it show up in the Department of Defense's official Dictionary of Military and Associated Terms.

DOJ_NMG_0114620

"It just seems to be a term that cropped up that seemed useful," says Lewis Sorley, a retired Army officer and prominent military historian.

Sorley notes that the word is politically savvy because "surge" seems to suggest a sharp but passing event. "If you're trying to engender support from those who have doubts about the war, it's a useful word," he says. "Because if this is a temporary event, it might be more palatable."

It's not clear who coined the word "surge" to describe troop increases. But it gained quick currency -- that is, it surged -- in November. Its first apparent journalistic use in reference to Iraq was in the New York Times on Nov. 21. A day after The Washington Post reported that the Pentagon was considering whether to deploy more troops, the Times said unnamed Pentagon officials had dubbed this "the surge option."

Thereafter, variations of the phrase "surge option" appeared in newspaper stories and TV reports, then was quickly shorthanded to "surge." (The brevity of the word even might account for its popularity in headlines -- taking up far less space than more neutral phrases, such as "troop increase.")

And that raises a question: Should the news media adopt the terminology favored by policymakers when those words can be construed as politically loaded? That question has haunted journalists for decades, stretching back to debates over abortion ("pro-choice" or "pro-life"), the Mideast ("terrorists" or "militants") and, of course, Iraq itself ("sectarian conflict" or "civil war").

"Surge" falls into "the Orwellian zone between language and politics," says Tom Rosenstiel, director of the Project for Excellence in Journalism, which studies and evaluates the media. "The president and his advisers would be remiss if they didn't come up with a term suited to their new policy. But journalists would be equally remiss if they just thoughtlessly repeated the term without pondering the policy and its implications."

The word has achieved so much currency that it was in the running to be the year's most notable, as chosen by the American Dialect Society, a 117-year-old organization of linguists, lexicographers and other "word people," at its annual meeting last week.

Wayne Glowka, an English professor at Georgia College and State University who chairs the society's new-words committee, says the group considered the word as a euphemism. That's nothing new for words with military origins, he notes. The military has long been a prime source of such words: "collateral damage" to describe civilian war deaths; "daisy cutter," for a bomb with a huge blast area; "friendly fire," for shooting at those on the same side.

"Surge" failed to win the group's word-of-the-year competition (that honor went to "Plutoed" -- to demote or devalue something, as happened to the planet last year). "The argument was that 'surge' really didn't emerge until late in the year, so it couldn't be the word for all of 2006," Glowka says. But he thinks that seems destined to change:

"I'd say it's likely to be a very important word for 2007."

With Iraq Speech, Bush To Pull Away From His Generals (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Robin Wright And Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

When President Bush goes before the American people tonight to outline his new strategy for Iraq, he will be doing something he has avoided since the invasion of Iraq in March 2003: ordering his top military brass to take action they initially resisted and advised against.

Bush talks frequently of his disdain for micromanaging the war effort and for second-guessing his commanders. "It's important to trust the judgment of the military when they're making military plans," he told The Washington Post in an interview last month. "I'm a strict adherer to the command structure."

But over the past two months, as the security situation in Iraq has deteriorated and U.S. public support for the war has dropped, Bush has pushed back against his top military advisers and the commanders in Iraq: He has fashioned a plan to add up to 20,000 troops to the 132,000 U.S. service members already on the ground. As Bush plans it, the military will soon be "surging" in Iraq two months after an election that many Democrats interpreted as a mandate to begin withdrawing troops.

Pentagon insiders say members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff have long opposed the increase in troops and are only grudgingly going along with the plan because they have been promised that the military escalation will be matched by renewed political and economic efforts in Iraq. Gen. John P. Abizaid, the outgoing head of Central Command, said less than two months ago that adding U.S. troops was not the answer for Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0114621

Bush's decision appears to mark the first major disagreement between the White House and key elements of the Pentagon over the Iraq war since Gen. Eric K. Shinseki, then the Army chief of staff, split with the administration in the spring of 2003 over the planned size of the occupation force, which he regarded as too small.

It may also be a sign of increasing assertiveness from a commander in chief described by former aides as relatively passive about questioning the advice of his military advisers. In going for more troops, Bush is picking an option that seems to have little favor beyond the White House and a handful of hawks on Capitol Hill and in think tanks who have been promoting the idea almost since the time of the invasion.

"It seems clear to me that the president has taken more positive control of this strategy," said Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), one of those pushing for more troops. "He understands that the safety of the nation and his legacy is all on the line here."

Others familiar with Bush's thinking said he had not been happy with the military's advice. "The president wasn't satisfied with the recommendations he was getting, and he thought we need a strategy that was more purposeful and likely to succeed if the Iraqis could make that possible," said Philip D. Zelikow, who recently stepped down as State Department counselor after being involved with Iraqi policy the past two years.

This impulse may well expose Bush to more criticism from Democrats on Capitol Hill, who have sharply condemned him for not listening to Shinseki's counsel in the beginning. "That lesson was pretty dramatic," Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), the new chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said yesterday. "I think a number of our military leaders have pulled their punches, and will continue to pull their punches publicly."

There is little question that more troops for Iraq seemed far from the conventional wisdom in Washington after the beating Bush and the Republican Party took in the midterm elections Nov. 7. Indeed, when Bush met with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Amman, Jordan, on Nov. 30, Maliki did not ask for more American troops as part of a new Baghdad security plan he presented to Bush, U.S. officials said.

Maliki's idea was to lower the U.S. profile, not raise it. "The message in Amman was that he wanted to take the lead and put an Iraqi face on it. He wanted to control his own forces," said a U.S. official familiar with the visit.

Another problem for the administration was the Iraq Study Group, the prestigious bipartisan panel headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III, a Republican, and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.). Soon after Bush returned from Jordan, the group delivered its recommendations, including proposing a high-level dialogue with Iran and Syria to help stabilize Iraq and setting a goal of early 2008 for the removal of almost all U.S. combat troops.

Although the president was publicly polite, few of the key Baker-Hamilton recommendations appealed to the administration, which intensified its own deliberations over a new "way forward" in Iraq. How to look distinctive from the study group became a recurring theme.

As described by participants in the administration review, some staff members on the National Security Council became enamored of the idea of sending more troops to Iraq in part because it was not a key feature of Baker-Hamilton. One senior administration official disputed that, arguing that staff members were attracted to the "surge" option to address long-standing concern that earlier efforts failed because of insufficient security forces.

A troop increase also dovetailed with ideas being championed by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.).

From only a few months after the start of the war in 2003, McCain has argued that the U.S. troop presence in Iraq is too light, and he and a handful of allies sought to use the post-election policy review to press their case. For three years, their entreaties had been blocked by then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, but after Rumsfeld was ousted by Bush the day after the election, they found their message had a more receptive audience at the White House. "There has always been within the armed forces a group of people that believes we never had the right strategy in Iraq, and they have been suppressed," Graham said.

Frederick W. Kagan of the American Enterprise Institute drafted a plan with retired Army Gen. Jack Keane for sending seven more Army brigades and Marine regiments to Iraq to provide greater security. Keane and several other experts met with Bush on Dec. 11.

DOJ_NMG_0114622

But from the beginning, the Joint Chiefs resisted. They had doubts that Maliki would really confront the militias controlled by fellow Shiites, notably Moqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army. Sadr held 30 seats in Maliki's parliamentary bloc and five ministries in his cabinet.

The Joint Chiefs were also worried that sending more troops would set up the U.S. military for an even bigger failure -- with no backup options. They were concerned that the Iraqis would not deliver the troops to handle their own security efforts, as had happened in the past. They were particularly alarmed about the prospect of U.S. troops fighting in a political vacuum if the administration did not complement the military plan with political and economic changes, according to people familiar with their views.

Pentagon officials cautioned that a modest troop increase could lead to more attacks by al-Qaeda, provide more targets for Sunni insurgents and fuel the jihadist appeal for more foreign fighters to flock to Iraq to attack U.S. troops.

Even the announcement of a time frame and mission -- such as for six to eight months to secure volatile Baghdad -- would play to armed factions by allowing them to game out the new U.S. strategy, the chiefs warned the White House.

Then there was the thorny problem of finding enough troops to deploy. Those who favored a "surge," such as Kagan and McCain, were looking for a sizable force that would turn the tide in Baghdad. But the Joint Chiefs made clear they could muster 20,000 at best -- not for long, and not all at once.

The Joint Chiefs came to accept Bush's wishes, especially after new Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates traveled to Iraq last month with the Joint Chiefs chairman, Gen. Peter Pace, said a U.S. official familiar with the trip. Gates met with Maliki, who laid out more details about the Iraqi plan for Baghdad.

"That gave them enough to define a mission and its objectives," the official said. "They came back satisfied."

In the end, the White House favored the idea of more troops as one visible and dramatic step the administration could take. One senior White House official said this week the president concluded that more troops are not the only ingredient of a successful plan -- but they are a precondition to providing the security the Iraqi government needs for political reconciliation and other reforms.

Tonight, this source said, the president will explain "that we have to go up before we go down."

Staff researcher Julie Tate contributed to this report.

How Will Bush Sell His New Iraq Plan To The Public? (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON

George W. Bush has always said he wanted to be president so he could undertake bold initiatives, not just hold the title. Now, as he enters the final quarter of his presidency, he stands on the verge of his boldest move since the start of the Iraq war: an escalation of the US troop presence in Iraq, as part of a new strategy for the war.

Convincing the American people and Congress that his plan is worth supporting may be nearly as challenging as achieving some sort of victory in the war itself. But President Bush and his team have taken the plunge, launching a highly orchestrated effort to explain the plan to the public, the press, and a Congress that is talking tougher to the executive branch now that the Democrats control the majority. Bush will address the nation Wednesday at 9 p.m. EST.

With a majority of the public unhappy with the war and support for Bush's handling of Iraq hovering below 30 percent, generating much public enthusiasm for expanded US operations will be tough. Bush's new strategy could also embolden the antiwar movement. But in changing course, he is at least demonstrating to Americans that he too sees the need for change, while holding out hope that the US can achieve something positive in a situation many Americans find hopeless.

Still, in taking this move toward troop increases - combined with more money for reconstruction and required political benchmarks by the Iraqi government - he risks losing the support of people who have stuck with him on Iraq. And so, analysts say, the packaging and presentation do matter.

DOJ_NMG_0114623

"Ten percent of Democrats support the president on the war, and 21 percent of independents," says independent pollster John Zogby, citing his own latest numbers. "So it's got to be a good sale, and it's not going to be enough for him to pick up some Republicans that he's lost."

The Bush administration has been building up to a change in Iraq strategy for weeks, but officials say the firm shape of the plan only emerged recently, after extensive conversations with experts and the release of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group report last month. The hard sell began in earnest on Monday, when Bush held meetings with more than 30 Republican senators at the White House. After his 25-minute speech on Wednesday night, Bush will travel to Fort Benning, Ga., on Thursday to visit with troops and make a statement to the press.

Also on Thursday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert Gates are expected to testify on Capitol Hill and later travel to the Middle East to meet with allies on the new US strategy.

White House officials argue that the vast majority of Americans do not want an immediate withdrawal from Iraq, as the polls show, and that therefore there is some openness to a new approach to the war.

"There may be something to that, but it's temporary," says John Mueller, an expert on public opinion and war at Ohio State University. "They tried that at the end of 2005, with all those speeches about victory, but nothing happened."

Now, with the expected plan to send up to 20,000 additional troops to Iraq to quell the violence and allow political and economic reform to take hold, the stakes are higher. And what Bush needs to do, says Mr. Mueller, is demonstrate how sending more troops can break the insurgency and alleviate communal warfare.

The latest wrinkle is the growing split among Democrats over how to approach Bush's plan. Some Democratic leaders are considering ways to block funding for additional troops, a potentially risky move that could open Democrats to charges that they are undermining American men and women in harm's way. Some Democrats have argued that, as commander in chief, Bush has the ultimate power to conduct war, while others, such as Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, was expected to introduce legislation Tuesday that would require approval by Congress for the cost of any troop levels above where the figure stood on Jan. 1.

On Sunday, the new Democratic House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, said on CBS's "Face the Nation" that the White House would no longer have a "blank check" for conducting the Iraq war, though she stressed that Congress was not about to cut funding.

Other Democrats, such as Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and a candidate in the 2008 presidential race, have stated that there is no constitutional way for Congress to authorize war but then cut back on funding.

Divisions among Republicans over the war are also becoming increasingly apparent. While some members, such as Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, strongly support boosting troop levels, others remain skeptical. But others, such as Sens. Gordon Smith of Oregon and Olympia Snowe of Maine, continue to express reservations.

Bush's Troop-Increase Plan Is Expected To Draw Six Guard Brigades To Iraq (NYT)

By David S. Cloud And Thom Shanker

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 — President Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq is expected to require the Army eventually to send as many as six National Guard combat brigades to Iraq, beginning in 2008.

The increased demand on the National Guard in coming years is a likely byproduct of Mr. Bush's decision, expected to be announced in a speech Wednesday night, to send five active-duty combat brigades, or about 20,000 troops, to Iraq, starting at the end of this month, according to current and former officials.

Two of those brigades are likely to be in place in Iraq by mid-February, with the rest flowing in one a month until May, according to a military official with access to a recent version of the plan. The Bush blueprint also envisions sending two additional Marine battalions to Anbar Province, as well as delaying the departure of 2,200 additional Marines now in the province.

In a governmentwide effort to expand the American commitment to Iraq, a program to operate Provincial Reconstruction Teams in Iraq will be doubled and renamed as Provincial Support Teams, a senior administration official said Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0114624

Currently, the United States operates seven of these teams and allies operate three; the Bush plan will call for adding nine more. They will be staffed by personnel from across the government — the Departments of State, Defense, Agriculture and Justice — to help neighborhoods manage economic and political development, the official said.

It remains unclear whether Mr. Bush will discuss the heightened future demand on the National Guard during his much-anticipated address but identifying the additional units for possible deployment is likely to begin in the days and weeks after he delivers the speech. That process would raise the political stakes for Mr. Bush, since it would highlight the increased contribution his plan would require from reserve units.

The full extent of the National Guard role in future years will also depend on whether conditions in Iraq improve enough to permit significant overall troop reductions. Of the 15 combat brigades now in Iraq, only one is from the Guard. Depending on how it is organized, an Army brigade typically has between 3,500 and 5,000 troops, and a battalion about 1,200.

National Guard combat units that have already gone to Iraq and returned may have to be sent back for second tours in order to relieve some of the stress on the active duty Army, Pentagon officials said Tuesday. Such a move would most likely require revising a Pentagon policy that has limited mobilization of Guard units to 24 months every five years, officials said.

National Guard officials said Tuesday that they had not been notified that Mr. Bush would require a greater combat role for the Guard beginning next year. Guard officials have spent the last several months fighting attempts by some Army officials to have the 24-month deployment limit loosened.

But several Guard officials said Tuesday they would not be surprised to see Mr. Bush make changes in mobilization time limits so that Guard units would be eligible for duty in Iraq sooner.

Maj. Gen. Roger Lemke, the head of Nebraska National Guard and of the association that represents state Guard officials, said in an interview that many guard units were short of equipment and would need to be re-equipped to be useful in Iraq. He also said the Guard would like to shorten the predeployment training in the United States, and do more of it in the units' home states to lessen the burden on their soldiers, who must leave civilian jobs to serve.

The first active-duty unit that are likely to move to Baghdad would be a brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division now in Kuwait, Pentagon officials said Tuesday. The elite light infantry of the brigade is especially useful in urban operations.

Should Mr. Bush want other brigades to accelerate their arrival in Iraq, he then would look to a brigade of the Third Infantry Division, from Fort Stewart, Ga., that is already set to head for Iraq later this month but whose departure could be pushed up. The next brigade in line for Iraq is one from the First Infantry Division at Fort Hood, Tex., military officials said.

Pentagon and military officials said Tuesday that large and continued deployments in Iraq would put particular strain on those performing certain military tasks in the National Guard and Reserve, in particular military police, engineers, civil affairs, and transportation and trucking units. But efforts are under way to fill the need through volunteers from within the Guard and Reserve before resorting to forced remobilizations.

A range of senior Army officials have said since the autumn that the Iraq mission could not be sustained without fuller access to the reserves.

The question of how best to manage them presents the Bush administration with a political conundrum: how to balance the pressing need for troops in the field against promises to limit overseas deployments for the Guard.

While the National Guard's goal is to guarantee five years at home between foreign deployments, it has been sending units every three to four years, according to Guard officials. The Guard and Reserve were used most extensively in Iraq and Afghanistan in 2004, and have regularly supplied brigades throughout the fighting.

Also presenting a problem is that many Guard members have been deployed to Iraq or Afghanistan as individuals, and not with their full units, and in that process have come close to fulfilling their 24 months under the president's current mobilization order.

In what officers call "Swiss cheese units," some military units have been hollowed out by members who could be off-limits for overseas duty, restricting the ability to send the entire team, unless the restrictions are reinterpreted or erased so that these individual members, who have already deployed, could be sent overseas again with their entire units.

Military Backing Of Bush War Policies Takes A Hit (DMN)

DOJ_NMG_0114625

By David McIemore

The Dallas Morning News, January 10, 2007

As President Bush prepares to announce his plans to add troops in Iraq, more active-duty troops now disapprove of the president's war policies than support them, according to a year-end survey by Military Times newspapers.

Experts say the results, drawn from some of the more conservative career-track military, reflect a growing weariness and frustration over lack of progress in Iraq and Afghanistan.

And, according to Paul Rieckhoff, founder and executive director of Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America, the result could be increased problems with retention and recruitment.

"What's not reflected in the poll is the sense of exhaustion and stress placed on the troops and their families," Mr. Rieckhoff said. "We've seen tremendous sacrifices by soldiers and their families with two or more deployments, a lot of dead and wounded, and for what?"

Also Online

Graphic: Falling support (.pdf)

Graphic: Military survey (.pdf)

On Wednesday, Mr. Bush is expected to announce his plan for Iraq and call for a surge in troops of at least 20,000. Democrats and Republicans alike have assailed the surge as too little, too late.

The survey, mailed to 6,000 active-duty subscribers to Military Times' four newspapers aimed at the military services, showed that 42 percent of those surveyed disapprove of Mr. Bush's handling of the war, compared with 35 percent who support it.

It marks the first time that the president's Iraq war policies failed to gain majority support since the Military Times began its annual survey four years ago.

A spokesman for the Defense Department declined to comment, noting that the survey was not a representative sampling of the entire military.

Michele Flournoy, senior adviser for international security at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said the results are significant in that they demonstrate the growing divide between the military and the Bush administration.

"The military is a consistently conservative swath of the population that is now showing significant decline in support of the war," she said. "However, I don't see it influencing the administration's views on the conduct of the war. The White House is aware there is significant debate nationally that reflects a deep divide over Iraq, but they've just named new commanders who will salute smartly and go forward."

This year's survey also showed a 15 percentage point decline in those who believe the U.S. should have gone to war in Iraq – to 41 percent from 56 percent reported last year.

The "findings are consistent with what we hear from our membership – and it results from a growing sense of frustration over the lack of progress in Iraq," said Mr. Rieckhoff.

Not surprised

John Pike, executive director of the defense startegy think tank Globalsecurity.org, does not find the results so surprising.

"I'd be more concerned if the results didn't reflect a similarity with the general public," Mr. Pike said. "It's not good news for President Bush, though I don't see this as a problem for continuing his Iraq policy. It doesn't reflect anything like the disaffection in the ranks we saw in Vietnam, when some units declined combat towards the end of the war."

Phillip Carter, whose military analysis blog Intel Dump is popular with veterans and armchair generals alike, said the military's disillusionment stems, in part, from weariness from three years of repeated and lengthy deployments and an uncertain war plan. The president's proposal to "surge" an additional 20,000 to 30,000 troops into Iraq to better secure violence-racked Baghdad for a beleaguered Iraqi government hasn't made things better, he said.

"The military establishment is skeptical of the president's plan to surge more troops," said Mr. Carter, an attorney and Army Reserve captain who served in Iraq in 2004. "They may be more quick to ascribe political motives to a plan they are skeptical will actually work.

DOJ_NMG_0114626

"What I don't see is a liberalizing of the military," he said. "The real gap is between the expectations of 2002 and the realities of 2007. ... The military has worked its butt off in Iraq and Afghanistan, and they will accept the sacrifice of being in harm's way if it's going to work. If it's not going to work, they're going to ask if it's worth it."

It's not just the junior and midlevel officers and enlisted ranks that find little to like about the surge.

Gen. John Abizaid, soon to be replaced as commander of the Central Command, told Congress recently that bringing additional U.S. troops would not add to the ability to achieve success.

And syndicated columnist Oliver North, one of the president's staunchest allies on Iraq, wrote in a Jan. 5 column, "A 'surge' or 'targeted increase in U.S. troop strength' or whatever the politicians want to call dispatching more combat troops to Iraq isn't the answer. Adding more trainers and helping the Iraqis to help themselves, is. Sending more U.S. combat troops is simply sending more targets."

Morale implications

Mr. Pike of GlobalSecurity.org does not see a decline in military morale in the survey's findings.

"It's simply that this was not a well-planned nor well-executed war," he said. "There is a failure on the part of leadership to communicate to the military and to the nation why we're fighting in Iraq.

"Historians will find that war policy is not this administration's strong point. But the reasons to be in Iraq will withstand scrutiny," Mr. Pike said. "The policies in Iraq can be salvaged and must be salvaged. The alternative of just simply pulling out and leaving is hard to think about."

According to Robert Hodierne, senior managing editor at Army Times Publishing Co., the mail survey was conducted Nov. 13 through Dec. 22 of 6,000 subscribers to Army Times, Navy Times, Air Force Times and Marine Times. The margin of error is plus or minus 3 percentage points.

The Military Times publications are independent of the military and its annual survey should not be read as representative of the military as a whole, he said. Nor should the survey be considered anti-Bush, since his overall performance as president surveyed at 52 percent, still significantly higher than the mid-30s polled among the general population.

"Our subscribers are older, averaging about 36, and are largely the more career-oriented senior enlisted and field-grade officers or above," Mr. Hodierne said. "This is the professional core of the military, and I hope that the Bush administration is paying attention to what the troops say.

"These are not some liberal, cut-and-run types. These are the people who stand and give the orders that put other lives at risk, and they're saying they don't have confidence in how the war is being conducted."

Disconnect shown

The findings also show a disconnect between the military and their civilian leadership.

Some 32 percent agreed that the civilian leadership has the military's best interest at heart, while 59 percent disagreed. And 72 percent believe the military is stretched too thin because of the war to be effective.

That tracks closely with sentiments expressed throughout the ranks of Iraq and Afghanistan war veterans, Mr. Rieckhoff said.

"The management of the war has been consistently problematic, and a lot of troops see the surge as just another [half-baked] policy to wage war on the cheap," Mr. Rieckhoff said. "There's a lot of concern that we just continue to sacrifice while everyone else goes shopping."

"What we're hearing military folks say is that the GOP got us in the mess and the Democrats don't have a plan to get us out," Mr. Rieckhoff said. "We're a people without a party."

Nor should anyone fear the military will slack off on its combat responsibilities, Mr. Rieckhoff said.

Over time, the military's disaffection with Bush administration war policies may translate into recruitment and retention problems, he said.

"We're working under an operational tempo that is grinding our people down," Mr. Rieckhoff said. "The military is stretched thin, equipment is worn out and needs replacing and a lot of people who truly love the military are opting out for civilian jobs. And we're losing a lot of excellent people we really can't afford to lose."

DOJ_NMG_0114627

Grim Picture Of Iraq From US Government Watchdog (AFP)

AFP, January 10, 2007

US government auditors released a grim report card of the American record in violence-wracked Iraq, on the eve of President George W. Bush's televised rollout of a new strategy.

The report by the Government Accountability Office (GAO) ran a critical rule over a previous failed US plan for victory, the malfunctioning Iraqi government government and security forces and fearsome insurgent and sectarian violence.

It said the Pentagon had failed to allow proper congressional oversight of Iraqi armed forces, and warned of an increasing strain on US forces pressed into repeated tours of duty and shortages of military supplies.

Though admitting that Iraq experienced three successful elections, adopted a constitution and installed its first elected government since the 2003 US invasion, the report underlined systemic problems in the US record in the country.

"Increasing Iraqi security forces and transferring security responsibilities to them have not resulted in reduced violence," David Walker, US Comptroller General wrote in an accompanying letter to Congress.

"Rather, attacks increased throughout 2006. Although more Iraqi troops have been trained and equipped, high absenteeism and divided loyalties have limited their overall effectiveness."

As Bush prepared to lay out his new strategy on Iraq in a prime time televised address on Wednesday, the GAO audit said his previous plan for victory in Iraq contained serious flaws.

Though the "National Strategy for Victory in Iraq" unveiled in November 2005 was an improvement over previous plans, it failed to identify key government agencies supposed to carry the strategy out, the report said.

It also did not address how the US will integrate its goals with those of Iraqis and foreign nations, and only partially identified current and future costs of US involvement in Iraq, the report said.

The survey, intended to prepare lawmakers to mount effective congressional oversight of Bush's new strategy for Iraq, also warned that oil and electricity production in Iraq were falling well short of US goals.

As Democrats who won control of Congress in November warn that Bush will have no "blank check" to continue operations in Iraq, the GAO said the United States is likely to incur costs in the foreseeable future "in the hundreds of billions of dollars."

The report also raised new questions as to the combat readiness of US-trained Iraqi troops and security forces, crucial to the prospect of the US forces returning home.

As of December 2006, around 323,000 members of the Iraqi security forces had been trained and equipped, and 128 army units had specific security responsibilities, the report said.

But the GAO raised questions about the quality of the units. It said the Pentagon had repeatedly refused access to Transition Readiness Assessments (TRA) prepared by coalition advisors embedded with the units.

"This serves to limit congressional oversight over the progress achieved towards a critical US objective," the report said.

Iraq Policy Surgery (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

Bush needs to present a realistic plan tonight that includes conditions for bringing the troops home.

TWO COMPETING realities are vying for center stage as President Bush prepares to address the American people tonight on his "new way forward" in Iraq.

In the tidy Washington narrative, the future of American involvement in Mesopotamia has been reduced to a simplistic "to surge or not to surge" question. Once again, a complicated, life-and-death geopolitical matter is reduced to a scoreboard friendly, blue team vs. red team framework.

The notion that the "surge" in U.S. troops under discussion — about 20,000 combat troops on top of the 132,000 already in Iraq — amounts to a new policy is laughable. Adding troops is a tactic, a means toward an end, not a serious strategy — except maybe in the Washington reality in which politicians on both sides of the debate benefit from pretending that a short-term number is a question for the ages.

DOJ_NMG_0114628

It allows Bush to pretend he is taking bold action to alter the course of a deteriorating war. And it allows Democrats to oppose something concrete and possibly to atone for their original support for the war without having to risk their political fortunes by calling for a complete withdrawal.

The commander in chief needs to set aside his wearisome spin, transcend the phony Washington reality and confront squarely the all-too-real tragedy unfolding in Iraq, a nation whose civil war is intensifying on our watch.

As we have argued before, a temporary increase in troops may be necessary, especially to pacify Baghdad. But only as part of a comprehensive — and comprehensible — plan to secure and democratize Iraq. The president needs to explain tonight exactly what he will do with the U.S. military force should the government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki fail to carry out a minimum of stability enhancing measures.

Washington must issue an ultimatum to Baghdad to disrupt Shiite militias linked to the government and to forge an equitable distribution of political power and national riches across sectarian divides. The question for Bush tonight isn't so much whether to send in 20,000 additional troops, it's whether the reinforcements will have a goal worth fighting for and a plan with a chance of success.

It's been leaked that Bush also will advocate a new, $1-billion jobs program for Iraqis. That sounds like a significant enhancement to the military escalation, but Americans are no doubt weary of the administration's repeated claims that victory is right around the corner. What is this additional $1 billion going to accomplish that the $30 billion already spent on that nation's reconstruction failed to do?

Bush needs to spell out a realistic plan for ameliorating the ongoing disaster in Iraq. But if he wants to reassure Americans and give warning to Shiite leaders in Baghdad, he must do something more. The president needs to articulate the conditions under which the U.S. will pull out altogether, in the near future. As painful as that would be, it sure beats becoming embroiled in someone else's civil war.

Love Among The Ruins (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON

It isn't really a romance turned sour, because it was never sweet.

The American military's cocky heroes were supposed to sweep in and carry off a poor, grateful Iraq to security and bliss, like Richard Gere did Debra Winger in the finale of "An Officer and a Gentleman." The strategy was: Love lift us up where we belong/Where the eagles cry/On a mountain high.

Didn't happen. Yet the search goes on, in this country obsessed with hookups and breakups, for the right relationship metaphor to describe our deadly embrace of Iraq.

My colleague Tom Friedman wrote last week: "Whenever I hear this surge idea, I think of a couple who recently got married but the marriage was never very solid. Then one day they say to each other, 'Hey, let's have a baby, that will bring us together.' It never works. If the underlying union is not there, adding a baby won't help."

Juan Williams repeated Tom's metaphor on Fox News, agreeing that "a bad relationship" cannot afford the "pressure" of a newborn.

One reporter who writes about the war told me he thinks of the American entrenchment in Iraq more like a marriage that's run out of gas, but you decide to stay together because of the kids.

Bill Maher used a bawdier metaphor of a man who promises his date a glorious romp, doesn't deliver, and then just refuses to admit it and get out.

Some women say that the Surge will not work because it's like starting over with an old boyfriend: you think you've learned the pitfalls and can resume with more success — you can set benchmarks! — but instead you're swiftly ensnared by the same old failures. And the most maddening romances, of course, are those in which you think you have the power, you should have the power, but somehow in the end, you don't have the power.

DOJ_NMG_0114629

Many Bush officials and lawmakers now talk about the Iraqis with impatience, as though they are deadbeat relatives who have got to stop putting the pinch on us for a billion a week and try harder, in the immortal words of Rummy, "to pull up their socks."

They may still speak diplomatically, but in body language, Condoleezza Rice and her chosen new deputy, John Negroponte, radiate irritation with the Iraqis, as though they are the most irksome of cousins or in-laws who have long overstayed their welcome, or children who not only don't thank you for presents but also leave the playroom a mess.

The favorite analogy of Rummy and others who pushed the war was parent-child. "If you never take the training wheels off a kid's bicycle," Paul Wolfowitz would say, "he'll never learn to ride without them."

But that is too Norman Rockwell for a scene straight out of Hieronymus Bosch.

At times, the American-Iraqi relationship seems so cursed that the most apt metaphor would be a fairy tale like "The Golden Goose" of the Brothers Grimm, in which a girl sees a bling bird that belongs to a despised boy and tries to pluck a feather for herself, but instead her hand gets stuck fast to the goose. Her sister comes along, thinking she can snatch a feather, but she gets stuck as soon as she touches the first girl. Then there's a Surge, when the third sister rushes to help but ends up stuck in a daisy chain of disaster.

With the Surge, as with the invasion of Iraq, W. is like the presumptuous date "who reserves a hotel room and then asks you to the prom," as my friend Dana Calvo put it.

Teddy Kennedy gave a speech at the National Press Club yesterday about his new legislation that would require Congressional approval before troop levels can be increased. Afterward, he was asked if he would try to block the escalation with an amendment to an upcoming Iraq spending request.

"The horse will be out of the barn by the time we get there," Senator Kennedy replied. "The president makes his speech now. We're going to get the appropriation request probably the end of January, early February." He said it could take eight more weeks for Congress to act. "By that time, the troops will already be there," he said. "And then we'll be asked, are we going to deny the body armor to the young men and women over there?"

In other words, the president will ask us to the prom once he reserves the hotel room.

A Couple Of Polarizers (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

If any Americans could truly understand Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, George Bush and Karl Rove should. All three firmly believe that the successful politician must above all cultivate his base -- not that any of them can point to recent successes.

In refusing to do anything to curtail the anti-Sunni pogroms of Moqtada al-Sadr's legions, Maliki, after all, is just dancin' with the ones that brung him. He owes his office to Sadr. More broadly, he is the governmental leader of the Shiites at the very moment they and the Sunnis have embarked on a ghastly civil war. He is nominally also Iraq's prime minister, but if there was even a scintilla of doubt about the true object of his loyalties, it was dispelled by his execution of Saddam Hussein. Maliki is the prime minister of Shiite rage, a position that offers a good deal more security than that of dispassionate prime minister of a nation at war with itself.

Yet tonight, President Bush will announce that Maliki has changed. He will also announce that he is sending additional U.S. forces to Iraq, but he's done that before, in almost comparable numbers, to no good effect. What's different this time, we are to believe, is that the Iraqis will join us in trying to suppress the sectarian violence.

Maliki will order his forces to swarm Sadr City. He'll deploy Kurdish battalions throughout Baghdad, since Sunnis and Shiites aren't suited for the task (assuming, however improbably, that the Kurds want to hurl themselves into the middle of the Sunni-Shiite war).

Why Bush believes the Iraqi prime minister will actually do this is anybody's guess. For Maliki to cordon off Sadr City is a little like Bush blockading Southern Baptist churches, or surrounding the headquarters of the National Rifle Association and telling everyone to come out with hands up. Bush expects Maliki to turn against his own -- a gambit nowhere to be found in Bush and Rove's own political playbook.

DOJ_NMG_0114630

America's most polarizing president is telling Iraq's polarizing prime minister to stop polarizing. It's possible, I suppose, Bush told Maliki that the lesson of our November election is that polarizing doesn't always work to your advantage, but the fact that Bush has only stepped up his commitment to his ruinous policy in Iraq, against overwhelming bipartisan advice to the contrary, suggests that that idea hasn't even crossed his mind.

Bush, we're told, is now interested chiefly in the verdict of history, hoping that historians hence will view him as another Harry Truman, who fought for American values and interests even after the electorate had turned against him. But neither the presidents nor their wars are analogous. As was not the case in the war between the Koreas, neither side in Iraq's civil strife is aligned with our values or interests. Unlike Bush, Truman sought and obtained U.N. support for our efforts.

But suppose Maliki is interested in the verdict of history, too. Suppose he wants his lifelong commitment to the Shiite cause to be crowned by his transformation of majority-Shiite Iraq into a fundamentally (though not necessarily fundamentalist) Shiite republic. Why, again, does Bush expect Maliki to change his spots when Bush hasn't changed his?

Indeed, one of Bush's defining characteristics is his unyielding adherence to the same policies even as the justifications for those policies shift or negate themselves. He first sought his tax cuts because our peacetime budget surplus was too large, then because we were at war and consumers needed to spend as though we weren't, then because our deficit could best be closed by the rich retaining more money to invest (albeit in China). He sought the war in Iraq to rid the world of Saddam Hussein and his weapons of mass destruction and to stop Hussein from sheltering al-Qaeda. As Ted Kennedy reminded us yesterday, the weapons didn't exist, Hussein is gone and Bush's war has only brought al-Qaeda more recruits. But our presence in Iraq continues unabated and, if Bush gets his way, will be escalated.

Bush's speech tonight will contain some alterations of policy, of course. Way too late, he's calling for a Marshall Plan for Iraq, with New Dealish public employment projects supplanting the flat-tax policies he had hoped to bring to the Middle East. But our basic policy remains basically the same, the expressed desire of the American electorate to reverse course notwithstanding. Unless and until Congress stops him, Bush will keep on doing what he's doing, and the hard-core conservatives will stick with him. The mystery is why he believes Maliki, and the hard-core Shiites, will behave any differently.

The Media Aren't The Enemy In Iraq (LAT)

Max Boot

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

Blaming the press for the problems in Iraq deflects the blame from where it belongs.

IF WE WIND UP losing the war in Iraq, as now appears likely (though not inevitable), many conservatives know who to blame: the press, or, in blogger-speak, the MSM (mainstream news media). Just as it did during the Vietnam War, a myth is likely to develop in which America's valiant fighting men and women were stabbed in the back by unpatriotic, even treasonous, reporters.

Administration spokesmen and many soldiers have been saying for years that things aren't so bad in Iraq. "If you just watched what's happening every time there's a bomb going off in Baghdad, you'd think the whole country's aflame," Donald Rumsfeld declared for the umpteenth time just before leaving office. "But you fly over it, and that's just simply not the case."

Such protestations are natural from someone who's likely to go down in history as Robert McNamara redux. But this refrain has been taken up by even the most sophisticated and disinterested observers on the right. James Q. Wilson, a longtime professor at Harvard, UCLA and Pepperdine, published a scathing essay in the autumn issue of the Manhattan Institute's City Journal in which he complained that "positive stories about progress in Iraq were just a small fraction of all the broadcasts." He went on to draw an analogy with the Tet offensive in 1968, which the press widely reported as an American failure even though it was a military defeat for North Vietnam.

"We won the Second World War in Europe and Japan," he concluded, "but we lost in Vietnam and are in danger of losing in Iraq and Lebanon in the newspapers, magazines and television programs we enjoy."

Actually, it's not at all clear that the Vietnam War was lost in the media. Reporters were initially gung-ho about the war; they went into opposition only after it became clear that the military and the Johnson administration had no plan for victory.

DOJ_NMG_0114631

In any case, the Tet analogy is dubious, because it is hard to find any signs of U.S. progress in the Iraq conflict comparable to the devastation the Viet Cong suffered in 1968.

Even if you go by the Bush administration's own assessment, conditions today are bleak. In November, the Defense Department issued a congressionally mandated report that found that violence was "escalating" to "the highest [levels] on record." Meanwhile, the report found, attempts at national reconciliation have "shown little progress." In short, the apocalyptic condition of Iraq (at least of the non-Kurdish regions) is not an invention of the news media. It's reality.

THAT ISN'T TO deny that there has been some biased, slipshod news coverage. To my mind, there has been too much emphasis on American casualties and American abuses, both of which are low by historical standards. There has been too much Baghdad-centric reporting, which slights differing conditions in outlying regions. And, of course, in Iraq, as elsewhere, media coverage inevitably focuses on daily disasters at the expense of long-term trends.

Initially, I thought that this institutional bias toward sensationalism distorted public understanding of the war. But by now the dismal conditions on the ground have caught up with, if not surpassed, the media's bleak outlook.

Whatever the shortcomings of some reporting, there has been a lot of first-rate coverage by a heroic corps of correspondents that has persevered in the face of terrible danger. (At least 109 journalists have been killed and many others wounded or kidnapped, making this the deadliest conflict on record for the Fourth Estate.) I am thinking of reporters such as John Burns, Dexter Filkins and Michael Gordon of the New York Times; Greg Jaffe and Michael Philips of the Wall Street Journal; Tom Ricks of the Washington Post; Tony Perry of the Los Angeles Times and former Times reporter John Daniszewski; Sean Naylor of Army Times; Bing West and Robert Kaplan of the Atlantic Monthly; and George Packer of the New Yorker. They've risked their necks to get the truth — and not, as Rumsfeld suggested, by flying over Iraq.

If you wanted to figure out what was happening over the last four years, you would have been infinitely better off paying attention to their writing than to what the president or his top generals were saying. If we fail to achieve our goals in Iraq — which the administration defines as a "unified, stable, democratic and secure nation" — it won't be the fault of the ink-stained wretches or even their blow-dried TV counterparts. To argue otherwise deflects blame from those who deserve it, in the upper echelons of the administration and the armed forces. Perhaps that's the point.

Set A Spending Limit On Iraq (LAT)

By Bruce Ackerman, Bruce Ackerman Is A Professor Of Law And Political Science At Yale And The Author Of "Before The Nex

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

Congress should creatively use its power of the purse to keep Iraq from becoming an indefinite quagmire.

THERE ARE LOTS of bad ways for Congress to respond to President Bush's escalation in Iraq. But there is one good way: Set a price tag on the long-run cost of the war — say $500 billion — and tell the president that he won't be getting a penny more.

Without counting the cost of the much-anticipated "surge," we will have spent about $350 billion on the war by spring. Setting a long-term ceiling is the only step that will force the president to recognize that the American people are no longer willing to give him a blank check for an endless series of mistakes.

We have been suffering under a false dichotomy: Either Congress immediately cuts off funds, or the president can do what he wants. But there is a third way: Congress sets the ultimate financial constraint, leaving it to the president and his generals to figure out the most sensible way to spend their limited resources. The president is given a significant time horizon to plan and execute. But he can't run a war without money and must either succeed or prepare a serious exit strategy as the ceiling is reached.

Congress should engage in vigorous oversight in the meantime, but it should resist the temptations of micromanagement. As long as the president stays within the half-trillion-dollar limit, Congress should grant requests for funds without pretending that it can condition particular appropriations on the Iraqis meeting benchmarks. That is a pointless shell game. The president would predictably say that the Iraqis are making substantial progress, and when the money runs out, he would confront Congress with another demand: Give me another $75 billion or you will be undercutting the troops.

DOJ_NMG_0114632

We have already learned this lesson. The war has never been funded in a straightforward fashion. The administration has refused to present Congress with clear-cut requests as part of the standard appropriations process. Claiming uncertainty, the White House has muddled its way forward with a series of ad hoc demands for emergency appropriations, which are now adding up to the hundreds of billions.

The Democrats, to their credit, have already made it plain that this muddle must come to an end. The new Congress will insist that the Defense Department treat its war expenditures as part of its regular budgetary request for fiscal 2008. Now all that is needed is a resolution denying the administration a blank check into the indefinite future.

During its first 100 hours, the House has reintroduced budget-balancing rules for the civilian side of the budget. It should act to restore a similar sense of fiscal reality on the military side. Congress should add a rider to the next Iraq appropriations bill that imposes a sensible ceiling on the entire operation. The president won't have any choice but to sign the bill if he wants the money.

Under plausible budget scenarios, Congress will reach another decision point some time in 2008, when the cumulative military appropriations begin to move toward the half-trillion-dollar mark. The president can try to persuade Congress to repeal this limit and argue for more money. But we will then be in the middle of an election campaign, and few politicians will be brave enough to buck the tide of public opinion. Unless voters experience a remarkable conversion on Iraq, Republicans will be joining Democrats in insisting that the remaining money should be spent on a realistic exit strategy.

This moment is comparable to 1968, when Americans voted against President Johnson's escalation of the Vietnam War. Despite this clear message, it took seven more years before President Ford presided over the painful defeat. We may find ourselves in the same quagmire unless Congress proves more creative than its predecessors in exercising the powers of the purse.

A Time For Candor (USAT)

By Don Campbell

USA Today, January 10, 2007

The nation will again hear President Bush's recalibration of the strategy to 'win' the war in Iraq. For any student of history, or simply any American who lived through the Vietnam War, the echoes are unmistakable.

As President Bush prepares tonight to share his latest strategy for Iraq in a nationally televised speech to the American people, it's appropriate to recall some things he had to say on this subject in his State of the Union address almost a year ago.

Bush talked about how "our coalition" had learned from our experience in Iraq and how we were winning. He held out the prospect for troop reductions, but said, "those decisions will be made by our military commanders, not by politicians in Washington."

He promised to reach out to Congress and seek "your good advice" in the coming year. And then, in an obvious attempt to inoculate himself against criticism, he drew repeated applause with these memorable words: "Yet there is a difference between responsible criticism that aims for success and defeatism that refuses to acknowledge anything but failure. Hindsight alone is not wisdom, and second-guessing is not a strategy. With so much in the balance, those of us in public office have a duty to speak with candor."

Amen to that last line.

But candor is the one thing that has been missing since before the invasion of Iraq even began. Under the category "responsible criticism," I'd submit that Bush's record in this area has gone from bad to worse. He has a chance this week, and again in his sixth State of the Union address later this month, to change that.

Where things went wrong

I don't know how much "good advice" he got from Congress on increasing troop levels in Iraq, but he's the commander in chief; if he thinks we need 20,000 more troops in Iraq, he'll have my support. Frankly, I wish he'd sent 10 times that many additional troops to Iraq back in 2003 instead of strutting around the deck of that aircraft carrier in the Pacific under the banner that declared "Mission Accomplished."

DOJ_NMG_0114633

The problem with the debate over Iraq is that we spend too much time arguing about how we got into this predicament— the war is really about oil or about a Bush family grudge against Saddam Hussein or about a seductively simple geopolitical theory, which holds that if you sprinkle the seeds of democracy in a barren desert, they will sprout and bloom like Texas bluebonnets. Or it's about whether we invaded that country under false pretenses.

Meanwhile, contrary to Bush's claim of a year ago, no one seems to have learned anything in Iraq that might inform national security policy and military strategy in the future. Wisdom gained from hindsight becomes foresight and is better than no wisdom at all. In ignoring that, Bush has squandered the goodwill and credibility he earned by his admirable performance in the first days after 9/11.

He has refused to ask the American people to share in the sacrifice that the war on terror and our commitments in Afghanistan and Iraq have placed disproportionately on the volunteers in the armed forces. But it's either everybody's war or nobody's war. At a minimum, he should have proposed a broad-based special tax to refurbish the military and create a global network of anti-terrorist operatives.

He misjudged what it would take to stabilize Iraq once Saddam was ousted, because of a misplaced optimism about the appeal of freedom and democracy in a sectarian culture in which too many people would rather kill each other than co-exist. At a minimum, he should have sealed the borders, flooded the country with half a million troops, bribed Saddam's army officers and cut through the bureaucratic red tape that impeded re-construction.

Bush was unprepared for the transition from fighting a conventional war with forces trained to kill people and break things to waging a counterinsurgency where troops become the Peace Corps in cammies trying to win the hearts and minds of the people.

Despite his overtures to Congress in that speech a year ago, he has refused, whether out of hubris or because of a blind spot, to listen to those wary of administration war tactics and strategies. If he had, he'd have heard predictions that Iraq was a quagmire waiting to happen.

And he has not convinced enough Americans that fighting terrorism is the greatest challenge of the 21st century and will remain so, regardless of the outcome in Iraq — and maybe even more so because of the outcome in Iraq.

Optimism and Vietnam

It's not too late for President Bush to acknowledge reality, and perhaps improve his legacy before media pundits and historians carve it in stone. Some of us are old enough to remember the last two White House years of another president from Texas, Lyndon Johnson, and that he left office dispirited and reviled because of the war in Vietnam.

In his penultimate State of the Union speech, in 1968, LBJ was still talking optimistically about the elections that had been held in South Vietnam, how America would persevere and how "aggression will never prevail." In his last State of the Union address, just days before he left office in 1969, he talked of how the prospects for peace in Vietnam were better than at any time since North Vietnam invaded the South, and how the North Vietnamese knew they could not win.

After that speech, and before we abandoned Saigon six years later, another 21,000 Americans died in Vietnam.

Vietnam and Iraq have few similarities, but on two counts they are identical twins. In both wars, the commander in chief underestimated the enemy. And in both wars, the commander in chief failed to "speak with candor."

Don Campbell, a lecturer in journalism at Emory University in Atlanta, is a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors.

Lessons For One Last Try (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

What makes sense in Iraq? The political debate is becoming sharply polarized again, as President Bush campaigns for a new "surge" strategy. But some useful military guideposts can be found in a new field manual of counterinsurgency warfare prepared by the general who is about to take command of U.S. forces in Baghdad.

Lt. Gen. David Petraeus supervised the development of the manual when he ran the Army's training center at Fort Leavenworth, before he had any idea he would be heading back to Baghdad as the top commander. In that sense, the document reflects a senior officer's best judgment about what will work and what won't -- independent of the details of the current "to surge or not to surge" debate. The manual was published by the Army last month and can be downloaded at http://www.leavenworth.army.mil.

DOJ_NMG_0114634

Two themes stood out for me as I read the document. The first is that success in counterinsurgency requires a political strategy as much as a military one. The second is that broad political support back home -- which buys time on the battlefield -- is the crucial strategic asset in fighting such wars.

The manual doesn't offer any specific advice for the current debate. But its precepts do raise some basic questions for Bush as he frames his new strategy: Will the new approach build bipartisan support for Iraq policy? And will it open a path toward an Iraqi political solution, as opposed to an American military effort to impose order?

"Counterinsurgency is not just thinking man's warfare -- it is the graduate level of war," reads a quotation from a Special Forces officer in Iraq that opens the first chapter. And this theme runs throughout the manual: Many of the prescriptions that apply to normal wars don't apply to counterinsurgencies. Indeed, if they are used, they will backfire. In a summary of "unsuccessful practices," here's the No. 1 mistake: "Overemphasize killing and capturing the enemy rather than securing and engaging the populace."

The field manual summarizes some of the lessons that commanders have learned in Iraq: Long-term success "depends on the people taking charge of their own affairs and consenting to the government's rule." Killing insurgents "by itself cannot defeat an insurgency." Local commanders "have the best grasp of their situations" and should have the freedom to adapt and react to local conditions. As many officers ruefully admit, the Army is learning these lessons three years late -- but perhaps that's still in time to make a difference.

My favorite part of the manual, which I suspect Petraeus had a big hand in drafting, is a section titled "Paradoxes of Counterinsurgency Operations." The headings give the flavor of these unconventional ideas: "Sometimes, the More You Protect Your Force, the Less Secure You May Be." (Green Zone residents, please note: "If military forces remain in their compounds, they lose touch with the people, appear to be running scared, and cede the initiative to the insurgents.") "Sometimes Doing Nothing Is the Best Reaction." "Some of the Best Weapons for Counterinsurgents Do Not Shoot." And this military version of the Zen riddle: "The More Successful the Counterinsurgency Is, the Less Force Can Be Used and the More Risk Must Be Accepted." (As the host nation takes control, "Soldiers and Marines may also have to accept more risk to maintain involvement with the people.")

The abiding lesson of this manual comes in one of Petraeus's paradoxes, and it ought to be engraved as the cornerstone of U.S. policy going forward, regardless of whether there is a troop surge: "The Host Nation Doing Something Tolerably Is Normally Better than Us Doing It Well." In making this point, Petraeus cites the godfather of counterinsurgency warriors, Gen. Creighton Abrams, who said when he was U.S. commander in Vietnam in 1971: " We can't run this thing. . . . They've got to run it."

It's Petraeus's luck, good or bad, that he has a chance to see whether these precepts of counterinsurgency warfare can still work in Iraq, despite all the mistakes made over the past three years. His chances will be slim if President Bush and the Democratic Congress can't agree on a bipartisan plan for Iraq. Newt Gingrich, the Republican former House speaker, put it succinctly on "Meet the Press" last month: "This can't be Bush's war" -- it has to be the country's. That's the real danger of a troop surge: It sets up a showdown between the president and his critics that could shred the chances for a stable, sustainable policy that might embody some of the military lessons we have finally learned.

The writer co-hosts, with Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria, PostGlobal, an online discussion of international issues athttp://blog.washingtonpost.com/postglobal. His e-mail address isdavidignatius@washpost.com.

Democrats Plan Symbolic Votes Against Bush's Iraq Troop Plan (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny And Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 — Democratic leaders said Tuesday that they intended to hold symbolic votes in the House and Senate on President Bush's plan to send more troops to Baghdad, forcing Republicans to take a stand on the proposal and seeking to isolate the president politically over his handling of the war.

DOJ_NMG_0114635

Senate Democrats decided to schedule a vote on the resolution after a closed-door meeting on a day when Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts introduced legislation to require Mr. Bush to gain Congressional approval before sending more troops to Iraq.

The Senate vote is expected as early as next week, after an initial round of committee hearings on the plan Mr. Bush will lay out for the nation Wednesday night in a televised address delivered from the White House library, a setting chosen because it will provide a fresh backdrop for a presidential message.

The office of Nancy Pelosi, speaker of the House, followed with an announcement that the House would also take up a resolution in opposition to a troop increase. House Democrats were scheduled to meet Wednesday morning to consider whether to interrupt their carefully choreographed 100-hour, two-week-long rollout of their domestic agenda this month to address the Iraq war.

In both chambers, Democrats made clear that the resolutions — which would do nothing in practical terms to block Mr. Bush's intention to increase the United States military presence in Iraq — would be the minimum steps they would pursue. They did not rule out eventually considering more muscular responses, like seeking to cap the number of troops being deployed to Iraq or limiting financing for the war — steps that could provoke a Constitutional and political showdown over the president's power to wage war.

The resolutions would represent the most significant reconsideration of Congressional support for the war since it began, and mark the first big clash between the White House and Congress since the November election, which put the Senate and House under the control of the Democrats. The decision to pursue a confrontation with the White House was a turning point for Democrats, who have struggled with how to take on Mr. Bush's war policy without being perceived as undermining the military or risking criticism as defeatists.

"If you really want to change the situation on the ground, demonstrate to the president he's on his own," said Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. "That will spark real change."

The administration continued Tuesday to press its case with members of Congress from both parties. By the time Mr. Bush delivers his speech, 148 lawmakers will have come to the White House in the past week to discuss the war, White House aides said Tuesday night, adding that most met with the president himself.

While Mr. Kennedy and a relatively small number of other Democrats were pushing for immediate, concrete steps to challenge Mr. Bush through legislation, Democratic leaders said that for now they favored the less-divisive approach of simply asking senators to cast a vote on a nonbinding resolution for or against the plan.

They also sought to frame the clash with the White House on their terms, using language reminiscent of the Vietnam War era to suggest that increasing the United States military presence in Iraq would be a mistake.

"We believe that there is a number of Republicans who will join with us to say no to escalation," said the Senate mority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada. "I really believe that if we can come up with a bipartisan approach to this escalation, we will do more to change the direction of that war in Iraq than any other thing that we can do."

On the eve of the president's Iraq speech, the White House sent Frederick W. Kagan, a military analyst who helped develop the troop increase plan, to meet with the Senate Republican Policy Committee.

But Republican officials conceded that at least 10 of their own senators were likely to oppose the plan to increase troops levels in Iraq. And Democrats were proposing their resolution with that in mind, hoping to send a forceful message that as many as 60 senators believed strengthening American forces in Baghdad was the wrong approach. Democratic leaders said they expect all but a few of their senators to back the resolution.

In an interview on Tuesday, Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, said he was becoming increasingly skeptical that a troop increase was in the best interest of the United States. "I'm particularly concerned about the greater injection of our troops into the middle of sectarian violence. Whom do you shoot at, the Sunni or the Shia?" Mr. Warner said. "Our American G.I.'s should not be subjected to that type of risk."

But the Senate minority leader, Mitch McConnell, Republican of Kentucky, said Congress could not supplant the authority of the president. "You can't run a war by a committee of 435 in the House and 100 in the Senate," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0114636

The White House press secretary, Tony Snow, criticized the Democrats' plans. "We understand that the resolution is purely symbolic, but the war — and the necessity of succeeding in Iraq — are very real," he said Tuesday night.

On Thursday, Democrats in the House and Senate will open a series of hearings on the Iraq war. Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice are among those who have agreed to testify.

Senator Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat who is the new chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said that if he was not satisfied that Mr. Bush's plan has sufficient incentives and penalties for the Iraqis, he might support a resolution or amendment to cap the number of American troops in Iraq.

"We have got to force the Iraqis to take charge of their own country," Mr. Levin said at a breakfast meeting with reporters. "We can't save them from themselves. It is a political solution. It is no longer a military solution."

Lawmakers said Senate Democrats appeared broadly united in opposition to Mr. Bush's approach during their private luncheon on Tuesday. While there were a few senators who favored cutting off money for any troop increase, a handful of others expressed uncertainty about challenging the president on a potential war-powers issue.

"We have to be very careful about blocking funding for any troops because we don't want to leave our troops short-changed," said Senator Mary L. Landrieu, Democrat of Louisiana.

Yet a large share of the House Democratic caucus supports a stronger stance against the plan. It remained unclear whether a resolution would satisfy constituents.

"Twice in the past 12 months the president has increased troop levels in a last-ditch effort to control the rapidly deteriorating security situation in Iraq," said Representative Martin T. Meehan, Democrat of Massachusetts, who proposed a resolution opposing a troop increase. "Rather than cooling tensions in Baghdad, the situation has descended further into chaos."

For GOP Senators, Bush's Next Step In Iraq Means A Delicate Dance (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

Senate Republicans, dreading President Bush's prime-time address tonight calling for more U.S. troops in Iraq, emerged from their weekly party luncheon yesterday displaying more dance steps than the Joffrey Ballet.

"We should listen to what the president has to say," proposed Sen. John Warner (R-Va).

"I want to hear the president's plan," Sen. Susan Collins (Maine) concurred.

"I want to see what he's proposing before I make dramatic statements," an unusually skittish Trent Lott (Miss.), the No. 2 Republican, told a thick knot of reporters.

And you didn't want to get too close to Sen. George Voinovich (Ohio). "We need more information, okay?" he insisted.

But the Republicans' principal dancer yesterday was Sen. John Sununu (N.H.), perhaps the most endangered of all GOP senators in 2008. "We haven't discussed 'the plan,' " he maintained. "That would suggest that we were told exactly what is going to be announced tomorrow, and that is certainly not the case."

Reporters had barely digested that one when Sununu offered a second disavowal: "I don't really know what they're thinking about proposing, so given that, it wouldn't be wise for me to suggest that I do or don't know whether their conditions are appropriate."

Is the escalating White House headed for a conflict with the antiwar Congress? "I don't know. I don't know," Sununu repeated. "Because we don't know what the president has proposed."

Sununu kept punting, for a painful 15 minutes before reporters released him. "There's clearly no one else in the hall to talk to," he quipped.

The Democrats, by contrast, were happy to talk. Though utterly divided on a solution for Iraq, pretty much every Democrat lined up in opposition to Bush's plan to "surge" thousands more troops into Iraq. And they were itching for a chance to put Republicans on the spot with a symbolic but toothless vote opposing the surge.

"We've all made our speeches, we've said what we want to say, and pretty soon it'll be time for votes," Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) challenged.

DOJ_NMG_0114637

Even some Republicans, though professing no knowledge of the Bush plan, were lining up against its reported contents. "I don't believe an expansion of 20,000 troops in Iraq will solve the problems," said Sen. Norm Coleman (Minn.). Sen. Olympia Snowe (Maine) also had "concerns."

Those Republicans defending the White House labored to play down the troop increase. Suggested Sen. Pete Domenici (N.M.): "We should throw 'surge' out the window."

None, however, seemed quite so tortured about the issue as Sununu, whose state suffered a Democratic landslide in the November elections. Torn between loyalty to Bush and fear of the electorate, he treated reporters to a mix of sarcasm and pedantry that brought to mind the poem Calvin Trillin wrote about the senator's father, the first President Bush's chief of staff:

If you knew what Sununu
Knows about quantum physics and Greek
And oil explorations and most favored nations
And the secret handshake of Deke,
Maybe you too, like Sununu,
Would adopt as your principal rule
That you are the brightest, you're lit the lightest,
And everyone else is a fool

The younger Sununu made the mistake of being the first senator out of the GOP lunch, causing reporters to surge forward with surge questions. The senator cautioned that "I don't know what the administration might propose" but suggested that "there are other aspects of this" than force escalation.

How worried was he about a split between Congress and the White House?

"Are my choices there 'high,' 'medium' or 'low'?" Sununu inquired.

Another reporter asked Sununu how many times he had consulted with the White House on the Iraq plan. The senator pretended to count in his head and then answered, "Once."

Sununu fled that group of questioners, only to fall prey to a second mob, this one encircling him with more queries about the "surge" and how long it would last.

"Well," Sununu said, "I don't think you were really quite listening to my answer, because the precise number of troops, or a date months in the future is far less important to our success than how the troops are going to be used."

Pressed again for a time frame, he retorted: "I think that is as clear an answer as anyone here can give you without making things up."

Will Congress cut off funding for a troop surge? "I think you ought to ask people on the Appropriations Committee," he said, "preferably after the president actually makes a proposal."

A reporter observed that Sununu was laying out a fairly fuzzy position. "No, it's not," he replied. "I think it's very clear. There's got to be a very strong set of proposals to deal with those things that are necessary for long-term success: reconciliation, revenue distribution and provincial elections."

Left unanswered, quite deliberately, was where Sununu stood on Bush's surge.

"Senator," a reporter asked, "do you like what you've heard from the White House?"

"I think that's it, thanks," Sununu answered. He turned and walked away.

Reid Takes On Iraq Surge Plan (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, January 10, 2007

Sen. Harry Reid's (D-Nev.) plan to bring a nonbinding, bipartisan resolution to the floor next week condemning President Bush's "surge" strategy in Iraq likely will be a major test of the new Majority Leader's ability to face down the White House and muster bipartisan coalitions on controversial issues.

DOJ_NMG_0114638

With Bush expected to lay out his surge plan to boost troop levels in Iraq in an address to the nation tonight, Democratic Senators and outside interest groups already have begun to put pressure on Reid to block the increase. Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) on Tuesday denounced the surge proposal, predicting that it would lead to significant U.S. troop casualties and announced that he would look to force the White House to seek Congressional approval for any escalation of the Iraq War.

A White House aide said Reid's nonbinding resolution likely would serve to put lawmakers on record as a way to gauge support for future efforts to block the plan.

The Bush administration's GOP allies in the Senate quickly lined up behind the president Tuesday, setting the stage for an intense floor clash next week.

Following a meeting at the White House, Senate GOP leaders announced their support for the plan. Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said, "I know enough about it to know that I will support it," adding that members of Republican leadership have met with Bush on a number of occasions to discuss the plan.

A veteran Democratic aide said that while the vote on the resolution will be the first test of Reid's abilities, there likely will be much more significant challenges later this year — particularly if the Senate moves to either cut off funding or restrict Bush's ability to prosecute the war.

"It's one thing to say 'We don't like how this is going,' [and] stomp your foot ... but it's another to cut off funding," the aide said.

Reid told reporters he believes he can count on the support of at least nine Republicans in his effort to corral the 60 votes needed to end a potential filibuster by backers of Bush's plan.

Independent-Democrat Sen. Joe Lieberman (Conn.) will vote with the president on the issue, while Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) is sidelined for an unspecified time frame as he recovers from illness. Johnson has been upgraded from critical to fair condition and doctors at George Washington University Hospital have removed his ventilator, his office announced Tuesday.

Reid also will have to contend with the fact that Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) backs an increase in troops. McCain, a 2008 presidential hopeful, is popular among the small group of moderate GOP lawmakers Reid is targeting and could make it difficult to pry their votes away from the administration.

Although the specific language of the resolution has yet to be written, Reid said Democrats are "going to work towards ... a bipartisan statement on the president's escalation."

Republicans on Tuesday attacked Kennedy's proposal as irresponsible, chiding the veteran lawmaker for vowing to block Bush's plans for the Iraq War before they are announced formally.

"It's a sad commentary on politics in Washington, D.C., today when the Democrats seek to cut off funding for our troops before even hearing what our commander in chief has to say regarding a new way forward in Iraq," said Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas).

Echoing White House and GOP leadership charges that blocking funding for the surge would undermine the military, Cornyn argued, "Our obligation as legislators is to assist the commander in chief and our troops as they confront our nation's enemies. This proposal does nothing to assist them. In fact, it is designed to undercut the president before he's even presented his plan, and to reduce the ability of our military men and women to get the job done."

In the House, Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said that while he believes Bush must have the cooperation of Congress to increase troop levels significantly, the House does not yet have plans to take up a similar resolution.

"I don't have plans" to bring up a resolution, Hoyer said Tuesday, explaining that such a move is unlikely before the House holds oversight hearings.

But Rep. Ed Markey (D-Mass.) was expected to introduce a House version of Kennedy's legislation late Tuesday. Markey's office could not be reached for comment.

Rep. Raúl Grijalva (D-Ariz.) confirmed Tuesday that he will co-sponsor the bill.

It was not immediately clear whether or when Democratic leaders would put the legislation on the House calendar.

Meanwhile, as early as the end of this week, the Senate could adopt its organizing resolution. Because some committees still have not ratified their new membership and leadership structures, and final details of the 51-49 funding percentage split on committees still is being worked out, committees continue to be under the control of Republicans. But a Republican aide familiar with the issue said a final deal should be reached soon.

DOJ_NMG_0114639

Reid and McConnell are likely to stay the bipartisan course on domestic issues for the next several weeks, with the two lawmakers closing in on a deal to jointly sponsor minimum wage legislation, Democratic and Republican aides said Tuesday.

With the Finance Committee today taking up a package of small-business tax cuts that could be included in a compromise bill, a GOP leadership aide said it was all but certain the two leaders would end up co-sponsoring the bill, which will come to the floor following completion of the ethics reform package.

Following the minimum wage debate, which Democrats hope will take less time than the ethics bill, Reid is expected to move to prescription drug legislation, followed by a new stem-cell research bill.

Democratic Leaders Face Pressure Over Iraq War (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON — It did not take long for Rep. Nancy Boyda, a freshman Democrat from Kansas, to learn the price of defying her party's liberal base. After she said she would support President Bush if he proposed an increase in U.S. troop levels in Iraq, antiwar bloggers fumed and MoveOn.org, the liberal advocacy group, considered running a television ad attacking her.

"If a member of Congress is wrong on Iraq, that is not what we voted for," said Tom Matzzie, MoveOn's Washington director. "There will be people watching to make sure they do the right thing."

That kind of political pressure is already being applied, not just to junior lawmakers, but also to Democratic leaders. It prodded them into making Iraq more central to their first 100 hours in control of Capitol Hill than they had planned. And it is creating tension between many Democrats and the liberal activists who will be increasingly important as the 2008 presidential campaign gets into gear.

Antiwar protester Cindy Sheehan, demanding a troop withdrawal, disrupted House Democratic leaders at their first-day news conference on ethics. Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada was deluged with complaints when he appeared to be open to a troop increase and posted a notice on a liberal blog to explain that he was misunderstood. Dozens of demonstrators rallied outside a Washington think tank when Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.) spoke in support of a troop escalation.

Antiwar activists, who believe that Democrats owe their 2006 election victories to voter discontent with the Iraq war, are thrilled that most congressional Democrats oppose Bush's proposed troop increase. But lawmakers are divided over how far to go in fighting the plan, and activists worry that the party will not have the political stamina to block the escalation and, beyond that, force a withdrawal of all troops.

"We have to look closely, not at what they say, but how they vote," said John Isaacs, president of Council for a Livable World, an arms control advocacy group.

Some moderate Democrats worry that the pressure being applied by the antiwar left is misguided, arguing that voters want a change of course in Iraq but not a rapid withdrawal.

"Conventional wisdom says that presidential candidates who want to be responsible on this are going to hurt themselves with the angry, impassioned activist left," said Will Marshall, president of the Progressive Policy Institute, a centrist Democratic think tank. "But the activist left is out of sync with the American public. Americans don't want to concede this is a total debacle."

For now, Democratic leaders are navigating the political crosscurrents by loudly criticizing Bush's troop buildup plan while sidestepping questions about the alternatives. They are also treading carefully around the question of whether Congress would try to block or restrict funding because many Democrats worry that will be seen as undercutting troops already in Iraq. "We understand the concerns [of antiwar activists] and we'll agree with them to the extent possible," said Jim Manley, Reid's spokesman. "But Democrats feel we need to do everything we can to give the troops what they need."

Democratic leaders had planned to emphasize domestic policy issues, not Iraq, in the opening weeks of their reign on Capitol Hill. The agenda for the first 100 hours in the House included quick action on a minimum-wage increase, lower drug prices for Medicare participants and other domestic issues; Iraq was to be relegated to a strung-out series of oversight hearings.

DOJ_NMG_0114640

That is, in part, why Sheehan led a small group of protesters to interrupt a news conference on new ethics rules by Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) and other House leaders on the first day of the new Congress.

"De-escalate, investigate, troops home now!" they shouted.

Pressure on Democrats to take a more aggressive stand increased as word spread that Bush would propose a troop increase. When Reid was asked about it in a television interview in mid-December and indicated he might be willing to consider an increase, he came under withering fire from liberal activists. Two days later, he backed away from his support in a statement filed with the Huffington Post, a liberal blog.

Last week, Reid and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) sent a letter to Bush opposing the troop increase and calling instead for a phased withdrawal. But they did not say what, if anything, Congress would do to force his hand.

Liberal activists have looked to other Democrats to be less cautious. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) introduced a bill Tuesday that would prohibit paying for an increase in U.S. troops unless Congress voted to approve it. Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio), a Democratic presidential candidate, Monday outlined his "comprehensive exit plan" and criticized party leaders.

"Democratic leaders well understand we regained control of the Congress because of the situation in Iraq," Kucinich said. "However, two months later, the Congress is still searching for a plan."

Liberal activists are plotting ways to keep up the pressure. Win Without War, a coalition of antiwar groups, is urging people to go to a website, www.americasaysno.org, to locate demonstrations to be held 24 hours after Bush's speech. Website visitors can download protest signs saying: "NO!"

The group also is urging war critics to confront members of Congress in their home districts when they return in February for the first recess.

Tom Andrews, a former Democratic congressman from Maine who heads the coalition, said that how the Democratic presidential contenders respond will be key to how liberals assess the field.

"We want true leaders to take the president on head on," said Andrews. "How political figures respond to this challenge is going to be a key barometer."

MoveOn.org, meanwhile, is planning a series of radio and television ads attacking lawmakers who support the Iraq war and its expansion.

Matzzie said the first ads will target Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) — the GOP presidential front-runner in many polls who has long called for a troop increase — and will air in states that hold early presidential primaries and caucuses. Later ads also will criticize Democrats, such as Boyda, who stray from antiwar orthodoxy.

Just hours before she was sworn in, Boyda said on ABC that she would support funding for a troop increase because Bush, not Congress, had the authority to make the decision. "I think we're going to vote to support what the commander-in-chief and head of the military asks," said Boyda, who won an upset victory over a Republican incumbent in a conservative-leaning district.

Her staff did not respond to a request for comment.

Her statement on television was met with angry responses on the website of the Lawrence Journal-World.

"As a constituent who gave money to and campaigned for Nancy Boyda, my disappointment is deep and real," said one correspondent. "Boyda will be a one-termer if she does not get this one right."

Kennedy Opposes Money For Troop Boost (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON — On the eve of President Bush's announcement of a new Iraq policy, Sen. Edward Kennedy put Congress on a collision course with the White House by proposing legislation that would deny Bush money for sending more troops to the war unless the president gets "clear and specific new authorization" from Congress.

Bush will address the nation Wednesday night to present a new war strategy that is expected to include sending 20,000 additional troops to the war-torn country.

As a senior member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Kennedy has been a leading voice of opposition against the war in Iraq and has called for a political solution to the conflict.

DOJ_NMG_0114641

"The American people sent a clear message in November that we must change course in Iraq and begin to withdraw our troops, not escalate their presence," the Massachusetts Democrat said in remarks at the National Press Club. "The way to start is by acting on the President's new plan."

He called any escalation of troops "an immense new mistake."

But Kennedy said it was not enough to "simply speak out" against an increase in troops "we must act to prevent it."

The wording of Kennedy's bill is blunt: "President George W. Bush should not be permitted to increase the number of United States troops in harm's way in the civil war in Iraq without a new authorization from Congress that reflects the reality on the ground in Iraq."

Kennedy said Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., will introduce similar legislation in the House.

Kennedy said his bill would not affect soldiers already in the field, but is aimed at any increase in troops.

"The best immediate way to support our troops is by refusing to inject more and more of them into the cauldron of a civil war that can be resolved only by the people and government of Iraq," he said.

White House press secretary Tony Snow, without specifically addressing Kennedy's charges, said today the president "understands there is a lot of public anxiety" about the war. Yet he said that Americans "don't want another Sept. 11" type of terrorist attack and it is wiser to confront terrorists overseas in Iraq and other battlegrounds rather than in the United States.

Democrats, while generally opposing Bush's Iraq policy, are divided over how to use the budget process to pressure Bush over Iraq. Under the Constitution, the president has broad war-making powers, while Congress controls spending.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., says Democrats will "look at everything" in their power to curb the war short of cutting money for troops already in the field.

Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., said Sunday on NBC's Meet the Press that attempts by Congress to "micromanage" the president's role as commander-in-chief might be unconstitutional.

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., the new chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said he would only consider an increase in U.S. forces in Iraq if Bush agreed to start withdrawing troops within six months.

"We've got to focus the attention of the Iraqis on their responsibility for their own country," Levin told the Detroit Free Press. "The only way to tell them is that we're going to redeploy our forces in 4 to 6 months."

After meeting with the president on Monday, several senators, including Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, said the plan calls for sending 20,000 extra troops to Baghdad and the western Anbar province, a base of the mostly Sunni insurgency and foreign al-Qaeda fighters.

Senators who attended the White House briefing indicated that the increase in troops would be to "benchmarks" that the Iraqi government must meet. These include sending more Iraqi troops to Baghdad and reaching a political settlement that will including sharing the nation's oil resources, particularly with the minority Sunnis.

The senators said the president expressed confidence that the Iraqi government could meet the benchmarks, but several of the senators remained skeptical.

"We've had these benchmarks before and to no avail," Sen. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, said after the meeting. "Why should we increase our exposure to risk?"

But whether Snowe and other GOP skeptics of Bush's plan, including Gordon Smith of Oregon and Sen. Susan Collins of Maine, will agree to Kennedy's plan is doubtful.

"It would be a dishonorable thing for the Congress to budget away the bullets at a time when their commander in chief had ordered them to hold their place in the battlefront," said Smith.

Kennedy Proposal Uncovers Party Rift (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's proposal yesterday to require congressional approval for a troop surge was generally dismissed by fellow Democrats, revealing the deep divisions within the party over how to handle the war in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0114642

"I'm not going to rule it out, but we are trying to work out a resolution that would be broader and attract bipartisan support," said Senate Democratic Whip Richard J. Durbin of Illinois.

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland also cast doubt on the proposal. The Constitution's Article II, he said, "probably does" give the president authority to prosecute a war.

President Bush will address the nation at 9 p.m. today with a speech that is expected to propose an increase this year of about 20,000 troops in Iraq -- at an estimated cost of $5 billion. U.S. officials said the president will also propose another $1 billion in economic aid to Iraq and lean on friendly Arab regimes to increase their assistance to Baghdad.

Many top Democrats credit their opposition to the war in Iraq for their huge victories in November. But their party is divided between those who want to retreat as soon as possible by cutting off funding and those who want to nudge the Bush administration toward a gradual withdrawal.

Mr. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, sought some middle ground that would at least hamper Mr. Bush's ability to increase the number of troops in Iraq by requiring that he first seek approval from Congress.

"There can be no doubt that the Constitution gives Congress the authority to decide whether to fund military action," Mr. Kennedy said during a speech at the National Press Club. "President Bush should not be permitted to escalate the war further and send an even larger number of troops into harm's way, without a clear and specific new authorization from Congress."

Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, told reporters last night that "the House will vote on the president's proposal" for a troop surge, although she provided no details.

Although Democrats on Capitol Hill have roundly criticized Mr. Bush's proposal even before it has been made, they are unlikely to go along with Mr. Kennedy's plan.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said yesterday that he hopes to round up nine Republicans who might sign their names to a bipartisan resolution that would express disapproval of a troop surge but would have no concrete effect on policy.

"If there is a bipartisan resolution ... the president is going to have to take note of that," said Mr. Reid, Nevada Democrat. "That's the beginning of the end as far as I'm concerned."

Mr. Kennedy's proposal, Mr. Reid said, "is an idea, and we'll certainly look at it in an intelligent way."

Democratic Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, Carl Levin of Michigan and Jack Reed of Rhode Island were crafting the resolution yesterday afternoon, Mr. Reid said, adding that he hopes to bring the resolution to the floor next week.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, and Mr. Reed will hold a press conference today with retired Gen. Wesley Clark, to call on the president "to end our open-ended commitment in Iraq."

But not even Mr. Kennedy's proposal, however, goes far enough to please hard-line war opponents.

Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio on Monday called for Mr. Bush to withdraw all troops from Iraq and close all military bases there.

"A U.S. declaration of an intention to withdraw troops and close bases will help dampen the insurgency which has been inspired to resist colonization and fight invaders," he said in his announcement.

In addition, peace activist Cindy Sheehan and a group of protesters last week drove Rep. Rahm Emanuel, Illinois Democrat, from his own press conference and then demanded that Mrs. Pelosi block funding for the war.

"We are the ones that put them in power, and they are not including the peace movement. ... It needs to be at least included in the discussion," Mrs. Sheehan said.

But Mr. Kennedy said that trying to use the appropriations process against any troop surge is a losing strategy.

"The horse will be out of the barn by the time we get there," Mr. Kennedy said.

He said that by the time an appropriations request is submitted later this month or in early February and by the time Congress responds six weeks later, "the troops will already be there."

"And then we'll be asked: 'Are we going to deny the body armor to the young men and women that are over there?' ... We have to take the action now ... or it's going to be a lot of meaningless statements and comments," Mr. Kennedy said.

Mr. Kennedy's proposal states that the 2002 vote to authorize force in Iraq no longer applies to the current conflict and is therefore no longer binding.

DOJ_NMG_0114643

White House spokesman Tony Snow said at a midday briefing that he had not seen Mr. Kennedy's proposal, but said that "the debates continue to be conducted in a vacuum, [in] anticipation that the president's going to say something."

"It makes more sense to wait until the president lays out not only military but also diplomatic, economic and other actions that he intends to take," Mr. Snow said.

Bush Warns Democrats About Effects Of Troop Pullout From Iraq (WP)

By Glenn Kessler And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

President Bush gravely warned House Democrats yesterday that America's credibility would be shattered if the United States pulled its troops from Iraq, forcing close ally Saudi Arabia to look elsewhere for protection and potentially destabilizing Egypt, the region's most populous country, according to participants in the meeting.

But Democrats in both the House and the Senate signaled that they will actively oppose his plan to send several additional U.S. combat brigades to Iraq, the first of which -- made up of about 3,500 troops from the 82nd Airborne Division -- could move relatively quickly into position from its current assignment in Kuwait. Bush's decision, which he will announce in a speech tonight, is rapidly becoming the first test of wills between the Republican president and the new Democratic-controlled Congress.

Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said the Senate will debate and vote next week on a resolution opposing any increase in U.S. troop strength in Iraq. He predicted that the resolution will pass with overwhelming support from Democrats and Republicans alike.

"If there is a bipartisan resolution saying, 'We don't support the escalation of the war,' the president's going to have to take note of that," Reid said. "I think that's the beginning of the end, as far as I'm concerned."

Bush did not say during the half-hour meeting with Democrats where else he thought Saudi Arabia would seek "protection," but he made it clear that he was simply informing Democrats of his decisions on Iraq, not consulting with them. He said that he understands the challenges and thinks his plan has the best chance of success.

"He's made his decision," said Rep. Ellen O. Tauscher (D-Calif.). "He's going to put in more troops."

The House Democrats included Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton (Mo.), intelligence committee Chairman Sylvestre Reyes (Tex.), Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Tom Lantos (Calif.), Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John D. Dingell (Mich.), Rep. Norm Dicks (Wash.), Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.) and Rep. Robert E. Andrews (N.J.).

Vice President Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten attended the meeting. Tauscher said that Cheney emphasized his concerns about Saudi Arabia.

The White House said that Bush also briefed the leaders of Australia, Britain and Denmark -- all of which have combat units in Iraq -- on his plans.

The State Department announced yesterday that Rice will leave for the Middle East and Europe on Friday in another U.S. effort to revive Israeli-Palestinian peace efforts and to seek Arab help to stabilize Iraq. The Saudis have pressed for greater U.S. involvement in restarting the moribund peace process. Rice will visit Israel, the Palestinian territories, Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Germany and Britain.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.) will introduce legislation that goes significantly further than Reid's plan. Under Kennedy's and Markey's bill, Congress would have to approve any additional troop deployments and any additional funding for the president's plan.

"Congress must have a genuine debate over the wisdom of the president's plan," Kennedy said in a speech to the National Press Club. "Let us hear the arguments for it and against it. Then let us vote on it in the light of day."

A top Senate Democrat said that he does not expect any attempt to stop the flow of funds for the Iraq war. "We're not going to cut off funding to the troops," said Sen. Carl M. Levin (Mich.), the new chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. "No one wants to do that."

But, he said at a breakfast with a group of defense reporters, other steps might be taken. For example, he said it is possible that Congress might impose a cap on the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, or pass a resolution requiring the president to seek congressional approval for troop increases, or require that any increase be linked to a long-term plan for troop reductions.

DOJ_NMG_0114644

Levin expressed concern that the president might have the rhetoric of change in his speech without actually taking the steps necessary to force change. "What are the consequences if they don't meet the milestones?" he asked, referring to the Iraqi government.

Meanwhile, a senior official said the administration is struggling to keep a supplemental budget request for Iraq and Afghanistan under $100 billion, as promised. Defense budget analysts outside the administration say a 20,000-troop increase for Iraq could add $6 billion to $10 billion to the 2008 budget, depending on the form it takes.

Staff writers Thomas E. Ricks and Lori Montgomery contributed to this report.

Baghdad Sees Heaviest Fighting In Months (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

BAGHDAD — In fierce, day-long fighting, 1,000 American and Iraqi troops assisted by U.S. attack helicopters and warplanes battled gunmen in a Sunni Arab downtown neighborhood Tuesday, killing at least 51 militants, according to Iraqi officials.

The offensive, the heaviest fighting in the capital in months, came in response to a buildup of insurgents in the Haifa Street neighborhood adjacent to the highly fortified Green Zone government complex. Sunni gunmen had erected fake checkpoints in recent days, residents said, and in one case, pulled out passengers from a minibus, killing them and stringing their bodies from electricity poles.

American airstrikes continued through the day and plumes of smoke rose over the neighborhood while explosions and shooting echoed through the streets. Snipers fought back from high-rise apartment buildings, supporting fellow insurgents armed with machine guns, rocket-propelled grenades and mortars.

Troops went door-to-door, searching for militants. No U.S. or Iraqi troops were killed, nor were any civililans, Iraqi officials said.

The bloody fighting broke out a day before President Bush was expected to announce the deployment of at least 20,000 more U.S. troops to Iraq, and underscored some of the possible challenges of an escalation of American troops in Baghdad. Some military commanders believe violence could actually increase with more American troops in the capital. Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, who is retiring soon as the top American commander in the Mideast, has opposed troop increases in the past in part because he has argued that they offer more targets for insurgents. Rather than increasing the feeling of security, additional troops can add to the feeling of chaos, in Abizaid's view, if insurgents set off bombs every time an American convoy moves through.

Advocates of a troop increase maintain that a larger U.S. force, especially in urban areas like Baghdad, could deter insurgents and armed Shiite militias through the visible presence of heavily armed Americans who could also respond quickly to hostile action.

Just last week, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki and a top U.S. military commander on the ground announced a new plan to secure the capital. But past plans, including the most recent dubbed "Together Forward" have failed -- in part because rebels tend to regroup elsewhere and return once the troops have left, making the American military's efforts akin to a game of "whack-a-mole," critics say.

The Haifa Street neighborhood, where Saddam Hussein had once given away free real estate to army officers and party officials, emerged after the U.S.-led 2003 invasion as a place of visible and widespread resistance. For a while, locals openly flew black flags, declaring holy war against the Americans. Then known as "Purple Heart Boulevard" because of a high number of U.S. casualties, Haifa Street was declared a success story by President Bush in late 2005 after elite Iraqi security forces brought down the number of attacks. At the time, American and Iraqi troops established a presence on the streets, prompting a clean-up of the area. Potholes from bombs and mortars were filled and violence ebbed.

Iraqi government forces were left responsible for maintaining order in the neighborhood but could not effectively do so on their own.

DOJ_NMG_0114645

In the course of the last year, rebels regrouped in and around this three-mile stretch of road cutting through central Baghdad. Last week, police recovered 27 bodies dumped near a cemetery as militants flooded the neighborhood from other parts of the city.

Then, on Sunday, a security guard said a sniper holed up at a local mosque killed two of the guard's colleagues. The following day, gunmen roamed the streets, distributing leaflets threatening to kill anyone who might enter the area, according to another witness.

When Iraqi security forces tried to clear out the neighborhood, the rebels fought off the troops, according to Iraqi officials and locals.

Shortly before dawn on Tuesday, American and Iraqi troops swarmed the neighborhood, closing it off. Soon, streets were deserted as militants took up their positions and anxious residents stayed at home.

American aircrafts then targeted gunmen in the streets and snipers on the roofs, witnesses said.

"I saw with my own eyes a vehicle filled with gunmen carrying different weapons and rocket launchers," said Abdullah Jassim, one of the few Shiites in the area. "A few moments later, the car was torn to pieces by an air strike, setting the vehicle ablaze and killing all those who were inside."

Jassim, a 37-year-old shop owner who decided to leave the neighborhood as the fighting intensified Tuesday , said Americans bombed at least one well-known hideout used by insurgent snipers.

On Tuesday, Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl,) a U.S. military spokesman, said the joint campaign along Haifa Street will "continue until this area is secured."

Iraqi government spokesman Ali Dabbagh, meanwhile, expressed support for more American troops in Iraq.

"The goal is to protect Baghdad and other areas," he told reporters. "If this is going to be achieved by an increase in friendly coalition forces, we have no objection."

The bitter civil war between Sunnis and Shiites combined with a stubborn insurgency directed at the Americans, has made the streets of the capital increasingly lawless, costing tens of thousands civilian lives.

A 43-year-old Sunni woman who asked to be identified as Um Wissam said she feared the gunmen and had stopped sending her children to school. Still, the raid Tuesday made her feel even less safe.

"We don't know if we will survive this," she said. "When this operation is finished, I will leave Haifa Street for good. We can't live here anymore."

Throughout the morning Tuesday, residents could hear the thunderous explosions of the aerial assault.

"I said to myself --'we are going to die,'" shop owner Jassim said. "Our houses are kind of old and they can be destroyed easily."

He also feared the militants might kill him and his family and so he decided to leave.

"We couldn't leave at the morning because the clashes were very intense," he said. Eventually, however, he and his family made it to a relative's house in another part of town.

"We're really afraid," said Raad Radhi, a 50-year-old Sunni merchant. "All the windows in our buildings and the neighboring ones were completely smashed because of the bombings."

In one apartment, Radhi said, troops harassed an elderly Syrian teacher living with his son, a college student.

Maj. Gen. Ibrahim Shaker, a spokesman from the Ministry of Defense, said 51 suspected insurgents were killed and 21 others -- including three Syrians and a Sudanese -- were captured.

Violence also continued unabated elsewhere in Iraq. At least 40 bodies were found in various parts of Baghdad. North of the capital in the troubled Diyala Province, U.S. forces pounded palm groves and canals with artillery and gunfire as a joint offensive with Iraqi forces entered its sixth day.

Another 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi forces have swept through over 200 square kilometers of rich farmland and isolated hamlets, zeroing in on a vast network of tunnels, spider holes and canals they say has become a safe haven and training ground for Sunni Arab rebels.

At least 74 suspected insurgents have been killed since that offensive began, according to the U.S. military. Troops have also found at least 14 weapons caches, commanders said.

DOJ_NMG_0114646

"We could stay here for eternity," said Lt. Col. Andrew Poppas, commander of the 5th Squadron, 73rd Cavalry, as he toured the battlefield, smoking cigars. "We've got the capability to wait out anybody."

The U.S. military on Tuesday announced that an American soldier assigned to 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, died Tuesday from gunshot injuries sustained during the fighting in Diyala.

Near the city of Kut, a shepherd was killed when he stepped on a land mine close to the Iranian border. Another man was found slain, handcuffed and blindfolded, in the river near that city.

Because of the bloodshed, Iraqis are fleeing their homes in record numbers. As many as one in eight Iraqis have been displaced, making it the biggest refugee problem in the region for almost 60 years, according to the United Nations.

U.S. And Iraqis Hit Insurgents In All-Day Fight (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 9 — More than 1,000 American and Iraqi troops, backed by Apache attack helicopters and fighter jets, battled insurgents all day Tuesday and late into the night in downtown Baghdad, in one of the most dramatic operations in the capital since the invasion nearly four years ago.

The fighting raged less than 1,000 yards from the heavily fortified Green Zone, which houses both the American command and the Iraqi government. It was the latest episode for the troubled neighborhood around Haifa Street, where major campaigns have repeatedly been initiated to rid the area of insurgents, only to have them re-infiltrate.

Iraqi officials said that at least 50 militants were killed Tuesday, but the Americans said they could not provide a count.

Problems in other contested areas across Baghdad came to a crisis point in the fall, causing American commanders to abandon a major push to regain control of the city, and setting off a policy review that led to the changes President Bush will announce in a speech to the nation on Wednesday night.

The president is widely expected to call for 20,000 to 30,000 more soldiers in Iraq, with many coming to Baghdad to help quell the sectarian fighting.

American commanders have said the strategy will emphasize an evenhanded approach in Sunni and Shiite neighborhoods, something that they acknowledge has evaded them as they have worked with Iraq's Shiite-led government in recent months.

The fighting on Haifa Street, a broad two-mile boulevard that cuts through the heart of the capital, began nearly a week ago as an attempt to secure the safety of citizens caught in the middle of the fighting and ended with pitched battles in the street. It is a reminder of how difficult the Baghdad mission will be.

The American crackdown on Tuesday came on the fourth day of intense fighting in the neighborhood of tightly packed, high-rise apartment buildings that was the home of many top-ranking government officials and Baath Party loyalists while Saddam Hussein was in power. American soldiers continued to patrol the area through the night, and an American military spokesman said they would stay there until the situation was firmly under control. Gunfire and explosions could be heard in the neighborhood well after sunset.

An American military officer familiar with the operation said that it was part of an effort to stabilize Baghdad, but was not directly linked to the president's new security plan.

However, the location of the fight has particular significance.

Nearly two years ago, after much bloodshed and toil, the American military wrested control of the area from insurgents.

Haifa Street, the neighborhood's main thoroughfare, used to be called Purple Heart Boulevard by American soldiers. More than 160 soldiers from the First Battalion of the Ninth Cavalry were wounded trying to secure the area. By the spring of 2005, they had largely done so, and it was trumpeted as a signal success.

Tuesday's operation, directed by elements of the Stryker Brigade of the First Cavalry Division and Iraqi Sixth Army Division, occurred after a series of events that, taken together, demonstrated the complexity of the fight for American forces and the maze of competing interests they are trying to navigate.

DOJ_NMG_0114647

It also suggests that even if the Americans try to deal evenhandedly with Shiite militias and Sunni insurgents, which is expected to be a central theme of President Bush's plan, their efforts could end up inadvertently benefiting one party or the other.

Shiites are clearly ascendant throughout Baghdad, systematically taking over Sunni neighborhoods, often using the intimidation of death squads to achieve their goals. But the area around Haifa Street has remained a Sunni bastion.

For the past two years, it has been relatively quiet, but in recent months, as the sectarian fighting has intensified, Iraqi and American military officials suspected it was being used as a base of operations for insurgents concentrating on the Shiite civilian population and American forces.

The violence in the area started to increase markedly after the recent arrest of a senior member of the leading Shiite militia group, the Mahdi Army, who had been operating near the area, according to an American military official.

The arrest, the official said, created an opening for Sunni insurgents, and they began aggressively singling out Shiites who had relocated south from the neighborhood of Kadhimiya, the official said.

On Saturday, 27 bodies were dumped in the Sheik Marouf neighborhood on Haifa Street. They were Shiites, four with their throats slit and the rest shot in the head, according to an Iraqi government official.

When the Iraqi police went to investigate and collect the bodies, they were attacked, according to witnesses and government officials. The Iraqi Army was called in and was also attacked, so finally the Americans were called in.

For residents, the situation was already bleak and getting worse, with no electricity for days and armed men taking control of lawless streets.

But the Sunnis in the area were still hostile to the Iraqi security forces, largely viewed as agents of the Shiite-led government.

"People were disgusted and were enraged by the activity of the security forces," one resident said.

Late Saturday night, Iraqi government officials and witnesses said that Sunni insurgents had set up a fake checkpoint and were pulling Shiites from their cars and executing them, even, some claimed, stringing three bodies from lampposts.

"Some of my friends told me they saw some of the bodies hanging from lampposts," said Jabbar Obeid, 39, who lives in the area.

American officials said Tuesday that while many people were being executed in the area, they found no evidence of people being hanged on lampposts. Many Sunni residents said the claims were nonsense, and had been aimed at inciting more sectarian violence.

On Sunday, Sunni organizations and politicians began condemning the government's security clampdown.

"Day after day, the sectarian crimes against the Sunnis in their neighborhoods in Baghdad are continuing," said Adnan Dulaimi, a member of the largest Sunni bloc in Parliament. The government's actions over the weekend were a "barbarian attack" aimed at clearing the neighborhood of Sunnis, he said in a statement.

In fighting in the neighborhood on Sunday, eleven Iraqi Army soldiers were killed when they ran out of ammunition, Iraqi officials said.

American military officials said that by then they already had solid evidence to suggest that Sunni insurgent leaders were using the neighborhood as a base of operations. They said that the fighters were organized and sophisticated, and included trained snipers and insurgents from foreign countries.

One Sunni resident, who spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of reprisals, confirmed as much, saying that insurgents had taken over to such a degree that a top-ranking official of Al Qaeda had even seized control of the Rafadin bank, set up an Islamic court and began handing out death sentences.

The American and Iraqi forces completed their assault plans at 4 a.m. Tuesday, and before dawn began approaching Haifa Street from different locations around the city, swiftly closing in on Talaa Square in the center of the neighborhood.

About 6:30 a.m. they had reached the square and began arresting suspects. In all, American and Iraqi officials said, they would take some 15 people into custody, including 7 Syrians. Nearly as soon as they began making arrests, they came under heavy bombardment from small-arms fire, rocket-propelled grenades and indirect fire, probably mortars, according to an American military official. As the fighting intensified, insurgents began moving to the rooftops in order to shoot at the armored American attack vehicles on the roads below.

DOJ_NMG_0114648

To deal with the gunmen on the rooftops, rather than fighting for control of entire buildings, the Americans called in Apache helicopters and fighter jets, the official said.

The neighborhood is densely packed, making it difficult to strike targets from the air, and the fighter jets were used to "make a show of force," according to the military official, in an attempt to frighten the gunmen from the rooftops.

For more than an hour on Tuesday morning, the fighter jets could be seen sharply dropping below the cloud cover, swooping low over the neighborhood's roofline, engines roaring, and then pulling up steeply and zooming out of sight, high into the sky.

Meanwhile, the Apaches attacked the insurgents' positions, unleashing a barrage of fire that rocked the neighborhood for hours.

Ali Housin, 56, a resident, said he saw the helicopters direct fire at a cemetery where insurgents were hiding, the resulting explosions blowing out the windows of his home.

Shortly after noon, the aerial assault had largely ended, but scattered clashes continued and could be heard late into the night. Residents reported American armored vehicles patrolling the streets after dark and Iraqi Army soldiers moving to secure control of the rooftops.

The Americans reported no casualties, and early reports indicated that two soldiers in the Iraqi Army had been wounded.

American officials insisted that the information they had on the insurgents in the area was very detailed, and that they had been careful to try to ensure that they were not being used as pawns by the Shiite-dominated government, emphasizing that in recent days they had conducted similarly aggressive raids in Shiite neighborhoods.

'Saturation' Attack On Iraq Insurgents (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, January 10, 2007

Fierce fighting broke out in the central Baghdad district of Haifa Street on Tuesday as US and Iraqi forces moved in against insurgents, in an area once viewed as a showcase for the ability to control Baghdad neighbourhoods, by "saturating" them with military forces.

The battles, in which US and Iraqi ground forces were supported by helicopters and fighter jets, reportedly left at least 50 insurgents dead, and came hours before George W. Bush, US president, was set to announce a plan for Iraq that is expected to feature a "surge" of as many as 20,000 new US troops.

The district, a primarily Sunni Arab area that is virtually adjacent to the heavily fortified Green Zone, was a base for insurgents until a series of operations in early 2005, after which US troops withdrew and Iraqis took the lead in patrolling it.

The scale of Tuesday's fighting suggests that Sunni militants were able to move into the district again in force.

It typifies the shifting nature of the insurgent presence in Sunni communities, in which guerrillas are driven out as US force levels go up and return as force levels fall, and leaves open the question of what a short-term increase in the number of US troops in Iraq can accomplish.

Increased troop concentrations mean more patrols to disrupt insurgent activity, more observation points to monitor areas where guerrillas might gather, more checkpoints at which fugitives might be caught, and other benefits.

The Iraqi government has reacted cautiously to the possibility of a "surge" in US troops, emphasising that they want more control over Iraqi forces, most of which answer to a US or British chain of command.

"We are looking [out] for the Iraqi interest. If it comes from an increase in troops, whether Iraqi or multinational forces, we welcome that. But there should be more control, more [authority] for Iraqis on the security issue . . . That is what we agreed with the Americans," said Ali al-Dabbagh, government spokesman .

But the reaction of ordinary Iraqis to increased US forces appears to be largely determined by where they live, and to which sect they belong. Sunni civilians regularly say that they want US troops to protect them against Shia militias, while Sunni politicians say they oppose US withdrawal for fear they will be left at the mercy of a largely Shia military.

Citizens of mixed areas may also welcome an increased US troop presence to deter the rival armed groups that turn their streets into battlefields.

DOJ_NMG_0114649

On the other hand, any deployment into predominantly Shia areas such as Sadr City, where the US military treads lightly and many inhabitants believe militias such as the Mahdi Army to do a better job protecting them than the authorities, would probably spark a backlash.

The surge that Mr Bush is expected to propose – reportedly increasing the 132,000-strong contingent in Iraq by as much as 20,000 – is unlikely to be on a scale that would allow more long-term "saturation" of dangerous areas.

Still, the short-term suppression of sectarian violence might allow Iraqis and Americans to pursue other goals aimed at undercutting the insurgency: building up state institutions such as the army and police, reaching a political deal between Sunni and Shia communities, and reducing unemployment.

Iraq's army, although hamstrung by administrative problems and poor morale, does appear to be slowly becoming more capable. US officers say that they will hand over full control over Iraqi units and provincial security to Iraqi officials by the end of this year.

However, the army is less suited to gathering intelligence key to counterinsurgency than the police, who are corrupt, politicised, and ineffective even in parts of the country such as the southern city of Basra.

50 Insurgents Slain In Baghdad Raids (WT/AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

BAGHDAD -- U.S. jets screamed low over the capital and helicopter gunships swooped in to pound a central Baghdad battleground yesterday, supporting Iraqi and American troops in a daylong fight that officials said killed 50 insurgents in a militant Sunni Arab stronghold.

The battle raged on Haifa Street about 1½ miles north of the heavily fortified Green Zone -- home to the U.S. Embassy and other facilities. It was the second major confrontation on Haifa Street in the four days since Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki announced a new drive to rid Baghdad of sectarian fighters.

The U.S. military said about 1,000 Iraqi and U.S. soldiers carried out "targeted raids to capture multiple targets, disrupt insurgent activity and restore Iraqi Security Forces control of North Haifa Street."

"This area has been subject to insurgent activity, which has repeatedly disrupted Iraqi Security Force operations in central Baghdad," said a statement quoting Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl, a spokesman for Multi-National Division Baghdad.

He said the U.S. jets did not conduct any air strikes, but "attack helicopters were used to engage targets in support of the ground forces."

Col. Bleichwehl said no American or Iraqi soldiers were killed. He did not address the number of militants killed, while the Iraqi Defense Ministry reported 50 deaths among insurgents.

Elsewhere yesterday, Iraqi police reported finding 52 bodies dumped in three cities, 41 of them in Baghdad, all apparent victims of sectarian reprisal killings.

North of Baghdad, a cargo plane carrying mostly Turkish workers crashed as it apparently tried to land at a U.S. air base in bad weather, killing 34 persons, Iraqi and Turkish officials said. The Turkish Embassy said one Turk survived, but was severely injured.

An Iraqi security official at Baghdad's airport said an Antonov cargo plane crashed near Balad, 50 miles north of the capital. The official said it was not clear whether the aircraft had mechanical problems or was shot down.

A Turkish Foreign Ministry official said initial reports indicated that the plane went down because of bad weather and heavy fog.

At a Saturday ceremony marking the 85th anniversary of the founding of the Iraqi army, Mr. al-Maliki vowed to strike at the Shi'ite and Sunni extremists responsible for the sectarian warfare that has bloodied the country in the past year.

Within hours of the speech, the Iraqi military said 30 militancy suspects were killed in the Haifa Street area after police discovered 27 bodies dumped there, most of them with gunshot wounds in the head and signs of torture. U.S. forces joined the battle after the Iraqi army called for backup.

DOJ_NMG_0114650

Yesterday, Mr. al-Maliki confirmed in a television interview that he had rejected a request from U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad for a delay of up to two weeks in ousted dictator Saddam Hussein's execution because "we did not want to keep a door open for trouble."

"We did not want the families of the victims to go out and demonstrate," he said.

The hanging led to a global outcry after a video appeared on the Internet showing Saddam being taunted in his final moments.

U.S. Airstrikes Back Troops In Baghdad Clash (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan And Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 9 -- With F-15 fighter jets and Apache helicopter gunships providing cover, U.S. and Iraqi troops on Tuesday battled hundreds of Sunni Arab insurgents firing from apartment buildings and houses in downtown Baghdad in one of the fiercest clashes in the capital in recent memory.

"It was the most intense combat I have ever seen," said Maj. Jesse Pearson, operations officer for the 1st Battalion, 23rd Infantry Regiment, Stryker Brigade, on his third tour in Iraq. "We were in a fight for 11 straight hours."

Along Haifa Street, a desolate, mostly Sunni Arab enclave of residential buildings and shops, more than 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops descended early Tuesday to retake the insurgent stronghold. The larger goal was to reassert the authority of the U.S.-backed Iraqi government, weakened by sectarian and political divides and a failure to stem Iraq's violent slide.

Instead, the troops encountered strong resistance as the well-organized insurgents appeared determined to protect their turf or fight their way out, surprising U.S. soldiers who fought in the battle. By evening, as many as 50 insurgents had been killed, Iraqi officials said, while 21 others, including several foreign fighters, were captured, but only after the use of massive U.S. firepower and technology. No American or Iraqi troops were killed, although some suffered light injuries, U.S. military officials said.

With President Bush scheduled to unveil his new strategy for Iraq on Wednesday, the battle on Haifa Street points to the nature of the conflict U.S. forces could face in the weeks and months ahead. U.S. generals and the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki view the taming of Baghdad as vital to the stability of Iraq. But the capital has become polarized more than ever along sectarian lines, with entire neighborhoods in the grip of either Sunni insurgents or Shiite militias.

"All sides are getting more desperate to enforce their will and increasingly they are capable of doing that," said Sgt. Israel Schaeffer, who is on his second tour in Iraq. "It's a pivotal point in the conflict."

"This is obviously their home turf," Pearson said. "They didn't like the idea of government forces entering their territory."

On Saturday, Maliki announced a new Baghdad security plan in which Iraqi forces, with U.S. assistance, will lead the effort to expel militant fighters from neighborhoods. Maliki and other Shiite leaders view Sunni insurgents as the root of the violence infecting Iraq. But Sunni politicians have accused the Shiite-led government of bolstering the power of Shiites at the expense of Sunnis.

Sunni legislator Khalaf al-Alayan, in an interview on al-Jazeera television, described the fighting on Haifa Street as a way to "clean Baghdad of the remaining Sunni elements." Alayan said he had contacted organizations such as the Arab League and the United Nations in hopes of stopping "these massacres that the Sunnis are subjected to."

In a statement, the Sunni Iraqi Islamic Party described the 50 killed as "innocent citizens." It asserted that Sunnis on Haifa Street were "under siege" by Shiite militias backed by the Iraqi army.

The fighting in the area began four days ago, when Iraqi soldiers killed 30 insurgents after uncovering what was described as an unauthorized checkpoint, according to a Defense Ministry spokesman. Pearson said Iraqi army commanders asked for U.S. assistance after insurgents killed several Iraqi soldiers two days ago.

"What you're seeing is a continuing effort to bring down the levels of sectarian violence," said Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl. "It's an ongoing effort to go after militias that have the intent to subvert the Iraqi government."

At 3:30 a.m. Tuesday, about 400 U.S. troops from the Stryker Brigade rolled toward Haifa Street, meeting up with Iraqi army units along the way.

DOJ_NMG_0114651

They arrived about 5:30 a.m. In the pre-dawn darkness, the joint forces took control of the buildings surrounding Tallil Square, a key target of the operation.

"We showed up in their living room for breakfast," Pearson said. About 7 a.m., the trouble began. "As soon as the sun came up, the insurgents began shooting," he said.

"We started taking it from all sides," Schaeffer recalled.

From rooftops and doorways, the gunmen fired AK-47 assault rifles and machine guns. Snipers also were targeting the U.S. and Iraqi soldiers. U.S. soldiers started firing back with 50-caliber machine guns mounted on their Stryker armored vehicles. They used TOW missiles and Mark-19 grenade launchers. The F-15 fighter jets strafed rooftops with cannons, while the Apaches fired Hellfire missiles. But the insurgents kept fighting.

"They were able to coordinate mortars at us. They were able to execute well-aimed shots from the cover of buildings," said Capt. Robert Callaghan, who was coordinating air support for the operation. "There were mortar rounds that went off close to our vehicle. It was difficult to concentrate on my job."

Schaeffer was surprised. He was accustomed to the hit-and-run tactics that the insurgents typically have used over the past few months.

"We fired a TOW missile into a building," he said. "A few minutes later we started taking fire again from the building. Normally, that would have pretty much ended the whole engagement. They were fighting pretty persistently."

"The terrain was in their favor," he added. "It is about as defensible a terrain as you can get."

Still, Schaeffer said, the Iraqi forces appeared to be holding their own -- much better, he said, than in previous operations.

"It never felt like complete chaos," he said.

Building by building, U.S. and Iraqi forces moved a mile or so down Haifa Street, which weaves along the Tigris River. On every block, insurgents attacked them.

"They probably thought we had the whole area surrounded," said Schaeffer. "Which we didn't."

The soldiers said U.S. and Iraqi troops captured several insurgents in possession of gear belonging to the Iraqi soldiers killed two days ago. For the Iraqi troops, it was a special form of retribution.

"It was a big moral victory, and huge for their morale," Pearson said. "This is a statement that the Iraqi army is not going to back down."

"It was a day to remember," Callaghan said.

Also Tuesday, at least 31 people were killed when a cargo plane carrying Turkish citizens crashed while trying to land in thick fog at an airport in Balad, about 50 miles north of Baghdad, Turkish officials told news services.

On Monday, 10 days after Saddam Hussein's hanging, his trial on charges of ordering the killing of as many as 180,000 Iraqi Kurds continued without him. Prosecutors played audiotapes of Hussein's voice justifying the use of chemical weapons that would kill "thousands," the Associated Press reported.

"Kurdish people have been waiting for this moment," said Saad Barazanchi, a Kurdish legislator. "This is evidence that Saddam ordered chemical weapons to be used against the Kurds."

Special correspondents Saad al-Izzi and Waleed Saffar in Baghdad and Muhanned Saif Aldin in Tikrit contributed to this report.

Don't Give Up On Iraq Yet (WP)

By Tariq Al-Hashimi

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

During my recent visit to Washington I found a nation fatigued by news of a faraway battle that seemed to creep closer with each fallen soldier. I found an administration wearied by infighting among an Iraqi government that seems incapable of reaching simple agreements. The chaos and sectarian destruction plaguing my people are slowly becoming just statistics in passing headlines, as we become a nation whose people spend more time each day preparing for death than for life.

Many Americans unfortunately believe that Iraq can no longer be salvaged. Even some in the Bush administration see a civil war as inevitable.

DOJ_NMG_0114652

First, both of our nations have invested too much to walk away now. If this battle is lost, the entire region could be destabilized.

Second, despite the chaos in my country, not all bridges of patriotism have been burned. Iraqis have ties to their beloved country, not only to their sects and ethnicities. Proof of this nationalism recently came from the most unlikely of venues.

During the Asian Games in Qatar last month, Iraq became quiet, if only for a few hours. Citizens united as brothers behind the national soccer team, which against all odds fought its way to the finals. The team didn't battle for a militia or a sect but for an idea -- the nation of Iraq. The players didn't win the medal but gained something far greater: They won us hope. From children on the streets to politicians to parents, we were all one, and we were all Iraqi. This tells me that all is not lost, that a deep-rooted sense of nationalism still lies within all Iraqis, and that it can and must be rekindled.

It is true that terrorism of an unparalleled nature rages in Iraq and that Iraqis are the ones killing each other on the basis of sectarian and ethnic identities. It is also true that reconstruction and economic development have ground to a halt because of the violence. And Iraqis are divided on such fundamental issues as reconciliation and how to bring about security.

Despite all the hardships, however, we Iraqis were able to raise the rudimentary pillars of our nascent democracy by writing a constitution, electing a parliament based on that constitution and granting a vote of confidence to a government through that elected parliament. It is not fair to look at Iraq as a collection of failures without identifying its successes. The birth of a new nation is not easy, but just as your nation has become a beacon for democracy, we hope that Iraq will one day do the same.

All is not lost! Eliminating regional influence is the only way to bring Iraqis back to their senses. Americans understandably find it difficult to support any strategy that prolongs the presence of your troops in Iraq. We do not want to stand in the way of your forces going home. But that decision should not be made under the pressure of car bombs and kidnappings. A precipitous withdrawal of forces would create a security vacuum in Iraq that our forces cannot yet handle -- and would therefore be filled by extremists. This does not serve the interests of Iraq or the United States.

If those soccer players taught us anything, it is that a proper strategy for eliminating sectarianism and fostering nationalism is key. Reconstituting the Iraqi Armed Services and then reforming, retraining and properly arming them must be a central component of this strategy. Another should be revising Iraq's constitution to give our central government effective powers but prevent any sort of dictatorship by the prime minister. The powers that the prime minister holds now must be revised to guarantee that all stakeholders can share in governing. Adherence to the rule of law is also central.

True reconciliation in line with what happened in South Africa and Ireland is needed for resolution of the conflict in Iraq, but that reconciliation must be free from regional stipulations. Economics is also key, as gainful employment keeps Iraqi youths away from the insurgents. All of this must be preceded by a coordinated effort to secure Baghdad, which has become a haven for militia and terrorist activity.

We need a greater focus on the militias, which kill innocent civilians and defy the government with impunity. The Pentagon recently told Congress that the militias pose more of a danger to the security and stability of Iraq than do the terrorist groups operating there. Militias do not differ from other terrorist groups; therefore, the Iraqi government and the United States must classify militias as such and must treat and fight them in the same manner as other terrorists.

A comprehensive plan is needed to save Iraq from disaster. I hope that the administration has considered these critical issues and that the new strategy effectively addresses them.

The writer is vice president of the Republic of Iraq.

Two Alliances (WSJ)

By Edward N. Luttwak

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

It was the hugely ambitious project of the Bush administration to transform the entire Middle East by remaking Iraq into an irresistible model of prosperous democracy. Having failed in that worthy purpose, another, more prosaic result has inadvertently been achieved: divide and rule, the classic formula for imperial power on the cheap. The ancient antipathy between Sunni and Shiite has become a dynamic conflict, not just within Iraq but across the Middle East, and key protagonists on each side seek the support of American power. Once the Bush administration realizes what it has wrought, it will cease to scramble for more troops that can be sent to Iraq, because it has become pointless to patrol and outpost a civil war, while a mere quarter or less of the troops already there are quite enough to control the outcome. And that is just the start of what can now be achieved across the region with very little force, and some competent diplomacy.

DOJ_NMG_0114653

On Dec. 4, 2006, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, head of Iraq's largest political party, went to the White House to plead his case with President Bush. The son of an ayatollah, and himself a lifelong militant cleric, Mr. Hakim is hardly a natural partner for the U.S. -- while living in Iran for 23 years he must have declaimed "death to America" on many an occasion. But as the chief leader of Iraq's Arab Shiite population, he has no choice. Each day brings deadly Sunni attacks, and just as the Sunnis are strengthened by volunteers and money from outside Iraq, the Shiites, too, need all the help they can get, especially American military training for the Shiite-dominated army and police. For President Bush, the visiting Mr. Hakim brought welcome promises of cooperation against his aggressive Shiite rival Moqtada al-Sadr as well as the Sunni insurgents. It no longer even seems strange that the best ally of the U.S. in Iraq is Mr. Hakim's party, the Sciri: the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, whose very title evokes the Iranian model of radically anti-Western theocracy.

Just as the Sunni threat to majority rule in Iraq is forcing Sciri to cooperate with the U.S., the prospect of a Shiite-dominated Iraq is forcing Sunni Arab states, especially Saudi Arabia, the Emirates and Jordan, to seek American help against the rising power of the Shiites. Some Sunnis viewed Iran with suspicion even when it was still under the conservative rule of the shah, in part because its very existence as the only Shiite state could inspire unrest among the oppressed Shiite populations of Arabia. More recently, the nearby Sunni Arab states have been increasingly worried by the military alliance between Iran, Syria and the Hezbollah of Lebanon. But now that a Shiite-ruled Iraq could add territorial contiguity to the alliance, forming a "Shiite crescent" extending all the way from Pakistan to the Mediterranean, it is not only the Sunnis of nearby Arabia that feel very seriously threatened. The entire order of Muslim orthodoxy is challenged by the expansion of heterodox Shiite rule.

Although it was the U.S. that was responsible for ending Sunni supremacy in Iraq along with Saddam Hussein's dictatorship, it remains the only possible patron for the Sunni Arab states resisting the Shiite alliance. Americans have no interest in the secular-sectarian quarrel, but there is a very real convergence of interests with the Sunni Arab states because Iran is the main enemy for both.

At this moment, it is in Lebanon that the new Sunni-U.S. alliance has become active. With continuing mass demonstrations and threatening speeches, the Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah is trying to force the government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora to give way to a new coalition which he can dominate. Syria and Iran are supporting Mr. Nasrallah, while the U.S. is backing Mr. Siniora. He has the support of the Druze and of most Christians as well, but it is also very much as a Sunni leader that Mr. Siniora is firmly resisting so far. That has gained him the financial backing of Saudi Arabia, which is funding Sunni counterdemonstrations and has even tried to co-opt Hezbollah, among other things. It was in their Arab identity that Hezbollah claimed heroic status because they were not routed by the Israelis in the recent fighting, but evidently many Sunni Arabs in and out of Lebanon view them instead as Shiite sectarians, far too obedient to non-Arab Iran. That suits the U.S., for Iran and Hezbollah are its enemies, too.

The Sunni-U.S. alignment in Lebanon, which interestingly coexists with the U.S.-Shiite alliance in Iraq, may yet achieve results of strategic importance if Syria is successfully detached from its alliance with Iran. Originally it was a necessary alliance for both countries because Saddam's Iraq was waging war on Iran, and periodically tried to overthrow the Assad regime of Syria. Now that Iraq is no longer a threat to either country, Iran still needs Syria as a bridge to Hezbollah, but for Syria the alliance is strategically obsolete, as well as inconsistent with the country's Arab identity. True, Syria is ruled primarily by members of the Alawite sect that is usually classified as a Shiite offshoot. But that extremely heterodox faith (it has Christmas and the transmigration of souls) is far different from the Shiism of Iraq, Lebanon or Iran -- where it would be persecuted; and besides, at least 70% of Syrians are Sunnis. That may explain why the Syrian regime has not used its full influence to overthrow Mr. Siniora: His stand against the Shiite Hezbollah resonates with his fellow Sunnis of Syria. But another reason may be the promise of substantial aid and investment from Saudi Arabia and the Emirates for Syria's needy economy, if the regime diminishes its alliance with Iran and Hezbollah, or better, ends it altogether. The U.S., for its part, is no longer actively driving Syria into the arms of the Iranians by threatening a march on Damascus, while even the unofficial suggestions of negotiations by the Iraq Study Group made an impression, judging by some conciliatory Syrian statements.

DOJ_NMG_0114654

The U.S.-Sunni alliance, which is a plain fact in Lebanon, is still only tentative over Syria; but it would be greatly energized if Iran were successfully deprived of its only Arab ally. At the same time, the U.S.-Shiite alliance in Iraq has been strengthened in the wake of Mr. Hakim's visit. The Sunni insurgency is undiminished, but at least other Shiite groups are jointly weakening the only actively anti-American Shiite faction headed by Mr. Sadr.

When the Bush administration came into office, only Egypt and Jordan were functioning allies of the U.S. Iran and Iraq were already declared enemies, Syria was hostile, and even its supposed friends in the Arabian peninsula were so disinclined to help that none did anything to oppose al Qaeda. Some actively helped it, while others knowingly allowed private funds to reach the terrorists whose declared aim was to kill Americans.

The Iraq war has indeed brought into existence a New Middle East, in which Arab Sunnis can no longer gleefully disregard American interests because they need help against the looming threat of Shiite supremacy, while in Iraq at the core of the Arab world, the Shia are allied with the U.S. What past imperial statesmen strove to achieve with much cunning and cynicism, the Bush administration has brought about accidentally. But the result is exactly the same.

Mr. Luttwak, a senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, is the author of "Strategy: The Logic of War and Peace" (Belknap, 2002).

Blair: Manner Of Saddam Execution Wrong (AP)

By David Stringer

AP, January 10, 2007

British Prime Minister Tony Blair said Tuesday that the manner of Saddam Hussein's execution was completely wrong and unacceptable — his first public comments about the Dec. 30 hanging.

However, Blair told a London news conference he hoped disputes over the taunting of the former Iraqi dictator and the release of illicit video footage of the execution would not lead people to forget the gravity of Saddam's crimes.

"The crimes that Saddam committed does not excuse the manner of his execution, but the manner of his execution does not excuse the crimes," Blair said, during a joint news conference with visiting Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe.

Saddam was executed for crimes against humanity for the killing of 148 Shiites in the town of Dujail after an assassination attempt against him there in 1982.

A cellphone video of the execution leaked out shortly after the former dictator was hanged. It showed some of those present in the execution chamber taunting Saddam in the final moments of his life as he stood on the gallows with a noose around his neck. It also showed the moment of his death — a scene that was left out of the official version of the execution broadcast on Iraqi television.

Blair, President Bush's chief ally in the war in Iraq, said he hoped the issues surrounding Saddam's execution would not "blind us to the crimes he committed against his own people." Saddam was responsible for the "death of hundreds of thousands of innocent Iraqis, 1 million causalities in the Iran-Iraq war and the use of chemical weapons against his own people, wiping out entire villages," he said.

The British premier had faced public criticism after choosing not to immediately comment on the execution.

Both Blair's deputy John Prescott and expected successor Treasury chief Gordon Brown had publicly criticized the hanging, but Blair declined to answer questions on the matter after returning from a holiday in Florida last week.

Fighting Words (WP)

By Peter Carlson

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

"The man was standing 100 meters from the explosion and he said there was no explosion," Adam Tiffen says.

He's looking at his computer screen, where a photo shows him in his Army uniform, questioning a kneeling Iraqi who was captured after a roadside bomb exploded near Humvees carrying Tiffen and other soldiers from the Maryland National Guard.

"If he wasn't the triggerman, he was the spotter for the triggerman," Tiffen says. "But I had to let him go. I had nothing on him. What can you do? Iraqis have rights, too."

DOJ_NMG_0114655

Tiffen, 31, is sitting in his office at the law firm of Porter Wright Morris & Arthur, a few blocks from the White House, looking at pictures from his year in Iraq. His law degree hangs on the wall near his Bronze Star. On his desk sit a couple of souvenirs of Iraq -- a .50-caliber machine gun bullet and a hunk of shrapnel from a roadside bomb. His black crew cut matches his black suit.

"Look at me, I'm in my lawyer uniform," he says. "I'm Mr. Attorney on Pennsylvania Avenue with my degrees on the wall. And seven months ago, I was in Iraq wearing body armor and I hadn't slept in three days and I was running around the desert."

While he was in Iraq, leading a 40-man rifle platoon, he wrote a blog about his experiences. He called it "The Replacements" because, he says, "we replaced guys and then other people replaced us -- we were just in a chain, a cycle." His blog contained no editorial comments, no political messages. He just told stories about what he saw every day:

The first round explodes with a shattering crack, and I can hear shouting coming from outside the sandbagged room.

"Incoming! Incoming! Incoming!"

I leap to my feet and quickly settle my advanced combat uniform helmet onto my head. Despite the explosions and yelling coming from outside, somehow my mind registers the inconsequential thought that the helmet pads lining the inside of the helmet feel tacky from days of sweat and grime and will need to be washed.

At first the blog was just for his family and friends but soon word got out and his stories were e-mailed around and he started getting feedback from strangers: "Thank you so much for allowing us to see the human side of the war."

Armchair General, a military history Web site, printed part of his blog (http://thereplacements.blogspot.com). So did the liberal journal Mother Jones. Last October, several of his stories were posted on The Sandbox, a military blog founded by "Doonesbury" cartoonist Garry Trudeau. Last Sunday, two tiny snippets from Tiffen's stories were quoted in the "Doonesbury" comic strip.

The first read: Behind her, I can see that her daughter had tears in her eyes. I turn away from their stricken faces.

The second said: Out in the dark, a blue van stops for a second, its driver confused. The soldier raises his rifle.An Unexpected Call

"People asked me, what are you doing?" Tiffen says, laughing. "You're a nice Jewish boy. You're a lawyer, Why are you in the Army? Why are you in the infantry? Why are you in Iraq?"

When he was a kid, growing up on Long Island, his parents took him to Gettysburg and that sparked an interest in military history. "My heroes were not basketball players, they were soldiers," he says. "I thought, I want that experience. I think I wanted to test myself against those soldiers, to see how I stacked up."

He joined Army ROTC in 2000, while he was studying at George Washington University Law School. He graduated in 2003 and was commissioned as a lieutenant in the Maryland National Guard. He was working on an insider-trading case at Porter Wright when the unit he'd trained with was called up for duty in Iraq. By then, Tiffen was in another unit but he got a call from his old platoon sergeant, Thomas Thompson.

"He's the lieutenant I wanted to go to war with," Thompson says. "I called him on the phone and said, 'I need a platoon leader. Have you thought of coming back?' "

Tiffen volunteered to go. "When soldiers you respect ask you to go with them, I couldn't say no," he explains. "I couldn't stay home and wave goodbye to these guys."

They arrived in Iraq in May of 2005, assigned to an area outside Baghdad, near a town called Saba al-Bor. For a few days, the guys they were replacing showed them around.

"We would drive past Saba al-Bor and they would say, 'Don't go in this town, nobody's been in there for six months, you don't want to go there,' " Tiffen recalls. "So it built up in my mind that it was a town occupied by the boogeyman. And then my company commander came up to me and said, 'Take your platoon and go into Saba al-Bor and occupy the building next to the police station.' "

"Insurgents were using the town as a staging point for moving weapons into Baghdad," says Capt. Brian Borakove, Tiffen's company commander. "That's why it was very important for us to take it under our control."

So Tiffen took his 40-man platoon into Saba al-Bor and occupied the municipal building next to the police station.

"We put .50-caliber machine guns on the roof and parked the Humvee in front of the gate and started sandbagging windows," Tiffen says.

DOJ_NMG_0114656

They called it the Alamo and chalked the name on the roof. In his blog, Tiffen described the place:

Inside the building, soldiers sleep on dirty concrete floors, often using their hard body armor as a pillow. They sleep where they have collapsed, exhausted from a long day and night of continuous dismounted patrols and sandbag details . . . I walk to the north wall of the roof . . . No man's land stretches before me in the darkness, a half kilometer of broken ground, trash, feral dogs, and half-grown, stunted weeds . . . I can't help but reflect that if Hell had a Central Park, it would be a lot like this.

From their base at the Alamo, Tiffen and his platoon patrolled Saba al-Bor and the nearby farmland, setting up roadblocks, searching houses, trying to catch insurgents. Every day or two, whenever he got the chance, Tiffen would take out his laptop, write about what he'd seen and upload it to his blog.

He wrote about the heat: By 12:00 it was 120 degrees. Imagine putting your face into a lit oven, turning a powerful hairdryer on your face and throwing sand in your eyes."

He wrote about searching a house and arresting a suspected insurgent while his wife pled for mercy: Trembling, she turns to me and starts asking questions in Arabic. "What has he done? Where are you taking him?" . . . The pain in her voice is obvious. She is terrified for her family and for her husband. The soldiers have come to take him away, and for all she knows, she may never see him again. My heart is in my mouth.

He wrote about getting hit by shrapnel from a roadside bomb: I feel a sharp blow to my abdomen below my body armor, just as my mind registers the blast. The blow doubles me over, and knocks me back on my feet. I don't want to look. Gingerly reaching down, I feel for wetness, for the sign that I am cut and bleeding. I close my eyes and check for pain. Nothing. Breathing a sigh of relief, I open my eyes.

He was fine, not hurt at all, but the story scared his sister, Margo, who fired back an e-mail saying: "Sheesh, boy! You're giving us heart attacks over here."

His parents checked the blog every day. "It was a lifeline," says his mother, Michelle Goldsmith.

Bill McGrath, his boss at Porter Wright, was reading it, too, and sending back news of the insider-trading case Tiffen had been working on back in Washington. (Their client was convicted on 19 out of 27 charges.)

Tiffen loved getting e-mail from friends and family, of course, but he was really floored by the ones he received from strangers. "If I didn't post something for a few days," he says, "I would get dozens of panicked e-mails from people I'd never met, saying 'Are you okay?' "

Meanwhile, Tiffen was fighting a war, trying to keep his soldiers alive and learning to deal with Iraqis.

"I watched him question prisoners and he was very good," Thompson recalls. "He treated the Iraqis with respect until they gave him reason to do otherwise. But he was no pushover."

The view from the Alamo was confusing. In Saba al-Bor, it was tough to tell what side people were on. Many of the locals supported the Americans and several became informants, providing information on the insurgents. But Tiffen suspected that one of his Iraqi translators was secretly working for the other side. And his men arrested several of the local cops for aiding the insurgents.

"One of them tried to kill one of our informants," Tiffen says. "They were taking him out to execute him and he managed to open the trunk he was in and crawl out of the moving vehicle and he ran to the Alamo and told us about it."

In Saba al-Bor, a death squad was at work. Tiffen wrote about it in his blog: Across from the mosque, in a small woodworking shop, a man has just been murdered. An hour ago, three insurgents entered his shop and shot him in the head. The weapon was held so close to his head that the muzzle blast burned and blackened his ear. Only 300 meters from the Alamo, he was left to die, four AK-47 shell casings lying next to his body.

Still, Tiffen thought he was making progress in Saba al-Bor. "We rolled up some of the insurgent operations there," he says. "We secured the town and we brought in some of the local sheiks and we built a town council to address their problems."

After about six months, Tiffen's soldiers handed Saba al-Bor over to a new group of American replacements, then spent a few months escorting military convoys across the desert near the Syrian border.

Last May, Tiffen and the rest of his 128-man Maryland National Guard company came home -- all of them. Fourteen men were wounded -- two of them seriously injured by a car bomb -- but nobody had been killed in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0114657

"I hadn't set foot in this country in a year and the first American I saw when I got off the plane was this old man wearing a World War II veterans cap," Tiffen says. "He must have been in his 80s and he was standing there shaking the hand of every soldier who came off the plane. It was 6:30 in the morning and this old man must have gotten out of bed before dawn to come to the airport to shake the hand of every soldier coming back."Back Home

"When I first got back, it was very uncomfortable," Tiffen says. He's sitting in an Arlington restaurant, ignoring his cheeseburger and fries.

"It bothered me that people weren't talking about Iraq," he says. "People go through life like nothing is happening when so many Americans are in harm's way. We just hit the 3,000 casualty mark and nobody batted an eye. I mean, Britney Spears is more important."

When he returned, he spent about 10 days seeing his family and friends and his girlfriend, then he flew to Israel.

"I studied religion in a school there for a couple weeks," he says. "They say there are no atheists in the foxholes and after spending a year in Iraq, you sort of come back a little more religious than when you left."

He studied the Torah and lived in the Old City of Jerusalem, near the Wailing Wall, and watched the Israeli soldiers patrolling. "I felt more comfortable there, surrounded by soldiers and checkpoints, than I was here," he says. "I was used to it."

Last August he returned to work at Porter Wright, doing litigation and international trade work. McGrath, his boss, says Tiffen is doing a great job. But Tiffen says the transition is tough.

"It's hard to go back and sit at a desk when you think about all the stuff that's going on and you remember what you've been through," he says. "You come back and you say to yourself: Should I be different? What did it all mean? I don't think anybody comes back the same."

He thought about the war every day. He toyed with the idea of turning his blog into a book. He made a video of the footage he shot in Iraq, set to Loreena McKennit's mournful song "Dante's Prayer," and posted it on YouTube.

Then one day in November, sitting in his office at work, he got an e-mail from one of his soldiers with a link to an article from USA Today. The dateline was Saba al-Bor. The headline read: "Hard-won turf easily lost in transfer to Iraqis."

Saba al-Bor was so peaceful last summer, the article said, that the American troops left, handing the Alamo over to Iraqi police in a ceremony on Sept. 20. "Fifteen days later, on Oct. 5, U.S. troops had to return to Saba al-Bor to restore order," the story continued. "Most of the town's police had fled, Sunni and Shiite residents were at war with each other, and sectarian death squads roamed the town. The progress built over months had evaporated."

Tiffen read on. Sunnis had hit the Shiite section of town with 44 mortar shells. Shiite militants responded by killing Sunnis. American troops found 44 bodies dumped around the city, some of them decapitated.

Tiffen was stunned. He left his office, took a walk. "I needed to get some air," he says. "I walked past the White House. I don't know why. My feet just carried me there. My reaction surprised me. I didn't realize how much I'd invested in that town."

Nearly two months later, the story still bothers him. "It's astonishing," he says. "The whole place went to [excrement] when they pulled U.S. troops out. And yet it was considered a success story -- that's why they turned it over to the Iraqis. All our efforts over all that time -- I don't want to say it was for nothing. All I want to say is that it hit me really hard because we invested so much time and energy in the people that lived there. I felt like I was part of the town. And a year later, to read that because the U.S. troops left, people are being executed, that hurt. That really hit home."

He eats his cheeseburger, sips his Coke, talks about other things for a while. But then he returns to the story of Saba al-Bor.

"What does that say?" he asks, not expecting an answer. "Something has to change. I really don't know what it is. Maybe putting 30,000 more troops in will help. I don't know. I don't think anybody knows."

Helicopters Strafe Al-Qaida In Somalia (AP)

By Salad Duhul

AP, January 10, 2007

Attack helicopters strafed suspected al-Qaida fighters in southern Somalia on Tuesday, witnesses said, following two days of airstrikes by U.S. forces — the first U.S. offensives in the African country since 18 American soldiers were killed here in 1993.

DOJ_NMG_0114658

In Washington, a U.S. intelligence official said American forces killed five to 10 people in an attack on one target in southern Somalia believed to be associated with al-Qaida. The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the operation's sensitivity, said a small number of others present, perhaps four or five, were wounded.

A Somali lawmaker said 31 civilians, including a newlywed couple, died in Tuesday's assault by two helicopters near Afmadow, a town in a forested area close to the Kenyan border. The report could not be independently verified.

A Somali Defense Ministry official described the helicopters as American, but witnesses told The Associated Press they could not make out identification markings on the craft. Washington officials had no comment on the helicopter strike.

The U.S. is hunting down Islamic extremists, said the Somali defense official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk to reporters.

Earlier, Somalia's president said that the U.S. was pursuing suspects in the 1998 bombings of two U.S. embassies in East Africa, and that the effort has his support.

Somali troops and their Ethiopian allies were attacked in the capital late Tuesday by gunmen riding in two pickup trucks who fired two rocket propelled grenades, witnesses said.

The rocket attack was followed by several minutes of rifle fire. One Somali soldier was killed and two other soldiers and a bystander were wounded, said minibus driver Harun Ahmed, who took the injured to a hospital.

Col. Shino Moalin Nur, a Somali military commander, told the AP by telephone late Tuesday that at least one U.S. AC-130 gunship attacked a suspected al-Qaida training camp Sunday on a remote island at the southern tip of Somalia next to Kenya.

Somali officials said they had reports of many deaths.

On Monday, witnesses and Nur said, more U.S. airstrikes were launched against Islamic extremists in Hayi, 30 miles from Afmadow. Nur said attacks continued Tuesday.

"Nobody can exactly explain what is going on inside these forested areas," the Somali commander said. "However, we are receiving reports that most of the Islamist fighters have died and the rest would be captured soon."

In Washington on Tuesday, Defense Department spokesman Bryan Whitman spoke of one strike in southern Somalia, but would not confirm any of the details or say whether any al-Qaida militants were killed.

The assault was based on intelligence "that led us to believe we had principal al-Qaida leaders in an area where we could identify them and take action against them," Whitman said.

Somali Islamic extremists are accused of sheltering suspects in the 1998 embassy bombings. American officials also want to ensure the militants no longer pose a threat to Somalia's U.N.-backed transitional government.

The aircraft carrier USS Dwight D. Eisenhower has arrived off Somalia's coast and launched intelligence-gathering missions over Somalia, the U.S. military said. Three other U.S. warships were conducting anti-terror operations.

U.S. warships have been seeking to capture al-Qaida members thought to be fleeing Somalia by sea after Ethiopia's military invaded Dec. 24 in support of the interim Somali government. The offensive drove the Islamic militia out of much of southern Somalia, including the capital Mogadishu, and toward the Kenyan border.

President Abdullahi Yusuf, head of the U.N.-backed transitional government, told journalists in Mogadishu that the U.S. "has a right to bombard terrorist suspects who attacked its embassies in Kenya and Tanzania."

Other Somalis in the capital said the attacks would increase anti-American sentiment in their largely Muslim country. Many Somalis are already upset by the presence of troops from neighboring Ethiopia, which has a large Christian population.

The U.S. Embassy in Nairobi, Kenya, on Tuesday reissued a terror warning to Americans living in or visiting the Horn of Africa.

It was the first overt military action by the U.S. in Somalia since it led a U.N. force that intervened in the 1990s in an effort to fight famine. The mission led to clashes between U.N. forces and Somali warlords, including the battle, chronicled in the book and movie "Black Hawk Down," that killed 18 U.S. soldiers.

Mohamed Mahmud Burale told the AP by telephone that at least four civilians were killed Monday evening in Hayi, including his young son. His report could not be independently verified.

Government spokesman Abdirahman Dinari said it was not known how many people were killed, "but we understand there were a lot of casualties. Most were Islamic fighters."

DOJ_NMG_0114659

Another attack by an AC-130 gunship reportedly occurred Monday afternoon on Badmadow island, in a group of six rocky islands known as Ras Kamboni — a suspected terrorist training base.

Thickets provide dense cover and the only road to the area is virtually impassable, locals said.

The U.S. military's main target on the island was thought to be Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, who allegedly planned the 1998 attacks on the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania that killed 225 people.

Leaders of Somalia's Islamic movement have vowed from their hideouts to launch an Iraq-style guerrilla war, and al-Qaida chief Osama bin Laden's deputy has called on militants to carry out suicide attacks on Ethiopian troops.

In an interview published Tuesday in the French newspaper Le Monde, Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said that suspected terrorists from Canada, Britain, Pakistan and elsewhere were among those captured or killed during recent military operations.

Somalia has not had an effective central government since warlords toppled dictator Mohamed Siad Barre in 1991. The warlords turned on each other, creating chaos in the nation of 7 million people.

European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana said he told U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon that a U.N. peacekeeping force may be needed to guarantee security and stability in Somalia.

___

Associated Press writers Lolita C. Baldor in Washington; Mohamed Olad Hassan and Mohamed Sheik Nor in Mogadishu and Chris Tomlinson in Nairobi, Kenya, contributed to this report.

Airstrike Rekindles Somalis' Anger At The U.S. (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman And Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Jan. 9 — Somali officials said Tuesday that dozens of people were killed in an American airstrike on Sunday, most of them Islamist fighters fleeing in armed pickup trucks across a remote, muddy stretch of the KenyaSomalia border.

American officials said terrorists from Al Qaeda had been the target of the strike, which they said had killed about a dozen people. But the officials acknowledged that the identities of the victims were still unknown.

Several residents of the area, in the southern part of the country, said dozens of civilians had been killed, and news of the attack immediately set off new waves of anti-American anger in Mogadishu, Somalia's battle-scarred capital, where the United States has a complicated legacy.

"They're just trying to get revenge for what we did to them in 1993," said Deeq Salad Mursel, a taxi driver, referring to the infamous "Black Hawk Down" episode in which Somali gunmen killed 18 American soldiers and brought down two American helicopters during an intense battle in Mogadishu.

The country's Islamist movement swiftly seized much of Somalia last year and ruled with mixed success, bringing a much desired semblance of peace but also a harsh brand of Islam.

Two weeks ago, that all changed after Ethiopian-led troops routed the Islamist forces and helped bring the Western-backed transitional government to Mogadishu. Ethiopian officials said the Islamists were a growing regional threat.

The last remnants of the Islamist forces fled to Ras Kamboni, an isolated fishing village on the Kenyan border that residents said had been used as a terrorist sanctuary before. Starting in the mid-1990s, they said, the Islamists built trenches, hospitals and special terrorist classrooms in the village and taxed local fisherman to pay the costs.

On Sunday, an American AC-130 gunship pounded the area around Ras Kamboni, and also a location father north where American officials said three ringleaders of the bombings in 1998 of the United States embassies in Kenya and Tanzania were hiding. Somali officials said those bombings had been planned in Ras Kamboni after a local Somali terrorist outfit invited Al Qaeda to use the village as a base.

According to Abdul Rashid Hidig, a member of Somalia's transitional parliament who represents the border area, the American airstrike on Sunday wiped out a long convoy of Islamist leaders trying to flee deeper into the bush, though he said he did not know if the specific suspects singled out by the United States had been with them.

DOJ_NMG_0114660

"Their trucks got stuck in the mud and they were easy targets," he said.

Mr. Hidig toured the area with military officials on Tuesday and said he had met several captured foreign fighters who had come from Europe and the Middle East. "I saw two white guys and asked, Where are you from?" Mr. Hidig said. "One said Jordan, the other Sweden. Yeah, it was weird."

Mr. Hidig said two civilians had been killed by the airstrike, but representatives of the Islamist forces said it had killed many more.

The Islamists' health director said dozens of nomadic herdsmen and their families were grazing their animals in the same wet valley that the Islamists were trying to drive across. "Their donkeys, their camels, their cows — they've all been destroyed," he said. "And many children were killed."

He spoke by telephone from an undisclosed location; his account could not be independently verified.

Mustef Yunis Culusow, a former Islamist leader who abandoned the movement days ago, said the once-powerful Islamist movement's top leaders were now trapped in a small village with Ethiopian soldiers in front of them, the Indian Ocean behind them and now American gunships circling above them.

"The leaders know they're finished," Mr. Culusow said in a telephone interview from Kismayo, a large town north of Ras Kamboni. "They've basically told the young fighters they can go, it's over, and that anyone who stays behind should be resigned to die."

For several days, Ethiopian fighter jets and helicopter gunships have been laying down a blanket of fire over the area, and attacks continued on Tuesday.

American military and intelligence officials expressed confidence that at least one senior Qaeda leader in Somalia had been killed in the American attack or subsequent strikes by Ethiopian troops. One official said Abu Taha al-Sudani — a Sudanese aide to Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, who is thought to be the ringleader of Al Qaeda's East African cell — might have been killed.

American military and intelligence officials said that they expected further military strikes but that the terrorism suspects were probably traveling separately and trying to blend into the civilian population.

Pentagon and intelligence officials said the Ethiopian offensive had unearthed fresh intelligence about the location of Qaeda operatives whose trail had long gone cold.

"When you disrupt things and people move around, they become easier to target," said one American counterterrorism official, speaking on condition of anonymity. "They have to make arrangements on the fly, and they become easier to find."

American and Ethiopian forces are sharing intelligence to pinpoint the whereabouts of the terrorism suspects and their entourages. The Pentagon announced that the aircraft carrier Dwight D. Eisenhower had been dispatched to the region to tighten a naval blockade off the Somali coast.

Washington's decision to wade back into Somalia was, in a way, a culmination of America's seesaw policy toward the country in the last five years.

With the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan consuming the attention of national security planners in Washington, the Bush administration's interest in Somalia was driven primarily by fact that a handful of Qaeda operatives responsible for attacks in the Horn of Africa were thought to be hiding there.

America's recent forays into Somalia have tended to backfire. President Clinton abruptly curtailed a large American-led aid mission in the 1990s after the 18 soldiers were killed, leaving the country in a swirl of chaos and bloodshed, where much of it remains.

Then, last summer, American efforts to finance a band of Mogadishu warlords as a bulwark against the growing Islamist movement stumbled when many Somalis learned of the hidden American hand and threw their support behind the Islamists.

With the Pentagon still snakebitten by its experience in Somalia — rendering a ground offensive in the lawless country unpalatable — there was little the thousands of American soldiers and marines stationed in neighboring Djibouti could do to track down the Qaeda suspects.

Until this week, Washington was content to remain behind the scenes and use the Ethiopian invasion as the public face of the effort against the Islamists and their allies.

DOJ_NMG_0114661

Now the Islamists have lost their grip on the country, and Somalia could be close to a turning point. For the first time since 1991, when the military dictator Mohammed Siad Barre fled, plunging the country into anarchy, there is a potentially viable government in the capital. But its survival depends on the thousands of Ethiopian troops still here, and increasingly, it seems, many Somalis do not like them. For their part, the Ethiopians have vowed not to stay much longer.

Some call the Ethiopians infidel invaders because Ethiopia is a country with a long Christian identity, though it is in fact half Muslim. Others do not like them because Ethiopia is a close ally of the United States, which is why American airstrikes could make things difficult for the Ethiopians and transitional government officials.

Some Islamists have vowed to carry on as an Iraq-style insurgency, and on Tuesday night two truckloads of gunmen attacked Ethiopian troops based at a government building, the former Ministry of Skins and Hides, in downtown Mogadishu.

The booms of rocket-propelled grenades echoed across town and set off a two-minute gunfight. As shoppers in a nearby market ducked for cover, spent shells clinked on the pavement. Afterward, residents reported seeing two bodies on the street.

U.S. Aircraft Launch 2nd Wave Of Somalia Attacks (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders And Abukar Albadri

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia — Helicopter gunships resumed attacks today against suspected terrorist holdouts in southern Somalia following U.S. airstrikes in the area Monday, Somali officials said.

The attacks against suspected Al Qaeda members believed to be hiding in Somalia marked the first overt American military intervention in the Horn of Africa nation since the U.S. withdrew its troops from a peacekeeping operation in 1994 after the deaths of 18 American servicemen.

A Pentagon spokesman would only confirm today that U.S. forces were involved in an attack Monday after receiving "credible intelligence." State Department spokesman Sean McCormack declined to comment on details about the strikes, but defended the U.S. interest for intervening in Somalia's conflict.

"Very clearly, the U.S. government has had a concern that there are terrorists and Al Qaeda-affiliated terrorists that were in Somalia," he said. "We have a great interest in seeing that those individuals not be able to flee to other locations."

Somali officials said the U.S. helicopters struck again today in the village of Afmadow, but U.S. officials would not comment on whether their operations were continuing. Some witness accounts suggested that the most recent strikes might have involved Ethiopia. Earlier reports had said the gunships were U.S.

The U.S. military has been patrolling Somalia's Indian Ocean coastline since late last month, when Ethiopian-led troops helped Somalia's transitional government seize control of the capital, Mogadishu, from an alliance of religious leaders known as the Islamic Courts Union.

U.S. and Ethiopian officials accused the Islamic movement's leaders of having links to terrorism. After abandoning Mogadishu, hundreds of Islamic fighters fled south toward the Kenyan border, where they have been cornered in recent days by troops from Somalia and Ethiopia and blocked from crossing into Kenya by that nation's soldiers.

Acting on information that suspects from the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania might be among the Islamic fighters, a U.S. Air Force Special Operations gunship struck at least one target early this week.

Somali officials and witnesses said at least five villages in southern Somalia have been targeted in strikes spanning the past three days. One village, Afmadow, was reportedly struck a second time today.

Details about damage and casualties remained unclear, due in large part to the lack of communications in the remote region near the Kenyan border, where cell phone service is not available.

According to estimates by local officials and witness accounts aired over radio stations, the death toll ranged from 15 to more than 50. There were several reports of civilians being killed or injured, including six members of one family and guests at a wedding ceremony.

"We ask the U.S. to stop the bombing of innocent people," one elderly clan leader told BBC Somalia radio service this afternoon. "The terrorists have all gone."

DOJ_NMG_0114662

According to one Somali government official, among the dead was the Islamic courts former chief of security of Mogadishu, Sheik Abduallahi Moalim Ali. The report could not be confirmed.

On the streets of Mogadishu, the U.S. strikes divided already tense residents. Many already believe the U.S. secretly backed Ethiopia and the transitional government in the battle against the Islamic courts. The airstrikes stirred anti-Western fervor among some Somalis.

Hassan Huddurow Ali, a resident in Mogadishu, condemned the U.S. attack and vowed revenge. "We will retaliate one day, even if it means suicide," he said.

However, shopkeeper Moalim Salad Nur blamed Islamist court leaders for instigating the war. "I urge the Islamist courts to surrender so they won't cause more problems for the people," he said.

The U.S. Embassy in Nairobi today issued a new security warning to Americans living in the region, warning that Somalia's conflict could make them targets of terrorist strikes.

Somali President Abdullahi Yusuf today endorsed the U.S. action.

"They have a right to do so," Yusuf said, speaking at his first news conference in the capital since he was named to head the transitional government in 2004.

Until he arrived Monday, Yusuf, a former military leader who served as president of the Puntland region in northern Somalia, had not stepped foot in Mogadishu for more than 10 years, due to the city's insecurity.

Somali military officials said today they received advance warning about the U.S. airstrikes and were standing by to capture fleeing suspects. Officials said they have apprehended 28 people, who were being held for questioning.

Though the government has offered amnesty to Islamic fighters who lay down their weapons, Yusuf said the government would prosecute the movement's former leaders.

"They committed many crimes," he said. "We will not offer amnesty for criminals."

Relief workers predicted that the strikes would send a flood of new Somali refugees toward the Kenyan border. "Any fighting just increases the fear of the people," said one U.N. worker who did not want to be identified.

But those fleeing the violence may not find refuge. Since Jan. 3, the Kenya government has closed its border with Somalia, citing a security risk from retreating Islamist fighters. An estimated 4,700 refugees remain trapped in the town of Dhobley, near the border, without access to food, medicine and shelter, according to a report issued today the U.N. Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs.

U.N. groups are working with the Kenyan government to allow refugees to enter Kenya safely or to deliver assistance to them across the border in Somalia.

U.S. Targets Al Qaeda In Somalia Air Strike (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

The U.S. has taken its covert war in East Africa public with an air strike this week on suspected al Qaeda leaders in Somalia.

The Pentagon confirmed yesterday that an AC-130 gunship attacked terror suspects in southern Somalia on Monday. The targets were thought to be al Qaeda operatives who carried out the 1998 bombings of two U.S. embassies in East Africa. The trio and Islamist allies have been working to make the ungoverned Somalia a terrorist safe haven.

The strike came amid a mass exodus from Mogadishu, the capital, of Islamist militants who had been routed by a combined force of the Ethiopian and Somali governments.

In a sign that more strikes could come from the U.S. or Ethiopian allies, the Navy has positioned the carrier USS Dwight D. Eisenhower off the coast and begun flying reconnaissance missions over Somalia.

It was the first overt U.S. military strike in Somalia since 1994, shortly after Army Rangers and Delta Force commandos battled Islamist militants and clans in a 1993 street battle immortalized in the book and movie "Black Hawk Down." The battle cost 18 American lives and prompted President Clinton to withdraw all U.S. forces.

DOJ_NMG_0114663

Senior defense sources say the AC-130 was not the first action in and around Somalia since the September 11, 2001, attacks and the subsequent placement of a U.S. military task force in Djibouti a few miles from the Somalia border. The sourc es said the task force has periodically launched special operations missions against militants, but they declined to give specifics of where and when.

In addition, the U.S. has sent a specialized military intelligence unit into Somalia from time to time to try to locate and identify al Qaeda operatives.

The Washington Times learned of one mission in which the unit located an al Qaeda cell in Somalia and passed the information on to Jordanian officials. "They took it from there," one defense source said. Jordanian King Abdullah II is one of America's strongest Arab allies in the war on terror.

The U.S. has been hunting three key al Qaeda leaders on the Horn of Africa who carried out the 1998 bombing of two U.S. embassies. They are Abu Talha al-Sudani, Fazul Abdullah Mohammed and Saleh Ali Saleh Nabhan.

In testimony last summer, Jendayi E. Frazer, the State Department's assistant secretary for African affairs, told Congress the three suspects "pose an immediate threat to both Somalia and international interests in the Horn of Africa."

She said U.S. counterterrorism planning was "directly related to the presence of these foreign terrorists and individuals willing to offer them safe haven within Somalia." She promised "strong measures to deny terrorists safe haven in Somalia. We must deny them the ability to plan and operate."

The U.S. task force in Djibouti was one of the first overseas deployments in the war ordered by former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. One of its key tasks is to train the military of friendly governments, such as Ethiopia, in counterterror ism. Ethiopia, like other East African nations, maintains liaison officers at U.S. Central Command in Tampa, Fla.

"We have close ties to the Ethiopians," said a former Central Command officer.

A Pentagon spokesman confirmed Monday's attack, saying it was based on intelligence on the ground. But the source had no confirmation of who was killed. An intelligence official said the AC-130 volleys killed five to 10 persons.

At the White House, spokesman Tony Snow declined to discuss the specific strike, but reiterated America's right to go after al Qaeda globally.

"It is pretty clear that this administration continues to go after al Qaeda," he said. "We are interested in going after those who have perpetrated acts of violence against Americans, including bombings of embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, and we will continue to conduct whatever operations we can to go after that."

"We've made it clear that this is a global war on terror, and this is a reiteration of the fact that people who think that they're going to try to establish safe haven for al Qaeda anyplace need to realize that we're going to find them."

The Associated Press quoted Abdullahi Yusuf, head of Somalia's U.N.-supported Transitional Federal Government, as saying, the U.S. "has a right to bombard terrorist suspects who attacked its embassies in Kenya and Tanzania."

Former military officials said the two main operational al Qaeda figures who are regarded as key threats are Fazul Mohammed and a fourth operative, Aden Hashi Ayro.

"Ayro is fast outpacing Fazul as the major threat," said a former military official close to the region.

One of the former officials said the U.S. raid was a setback for covert regional efforts to broker a deal among moderate Somali Muslims and the U.N.-backed government.

"The action that took place as of late is none too subtle and counterproductive," the former official said. Initial indications are that "minor players were hit and none of the big fish were fried."

The administration has been low-key in discussing developments in Somalia, as the al Qaeda-linked Islamic Courts Union outfought government forces and captured the capital last year. But privately, it considers last month's rout of Islamists from Mogadishu as a victory in the war on terror.

c Bill Gertz contributed to this report.

US Takes Hunt For Al Qaeda To Somalia (CSM)

By Scott Baldauf And Mike Pflanz

The Christian Science Monitor, January 10, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114664

JOHANNESBURG, SOUTH AFRICA; AND NAIROBI, KENYA

On the heels of US air strikes Monday, US helicopter gunships strafed villages in Somalia Tuesday in an ongoing hunt for Al Qaeda operatives in the Horn of Africa.

US military officials say that Somalia's lawless state had become a safe haven for Al Qaeda activists, including possibly those responsible for the embassy bomb attacks in Nairobi and Dar-es-Salaam in 1998.

This week's attacks illustrate how much US military policy has changed since Sept. 11, 2001. As the US closes or downsizes massive cold war-era bases in Germany and South Korea, its presence is expanding in Uganda, Djibouti, Senegal, and São Tomé and Príncipe, African nations once seen as far beyond American interests. Today, African bases serve both as "jumping off" points for the war in Iraq and also as bulwarks against new threats in volatile regions of Africa.

At press time, the US military had not released the numbers nor the names of those killed in the attacks.

The sites attacked, close to the border with Kenya, were considered the last strongholds of Somalia's Union of Islamic Courts (UIC), which held sway over the country for the past six months until it was driven from power two weeks ago by an alliance between Somalia's transitional government and Ethiopia.

US helicopter gunships Tuesday carried out mopping-up operations, according to Somali officials, who added that "many" people had died in the attacks. Abdirahman Dinari, spokesman for Somalia's interim government said: "Most of them were Islamists." Unconfirmed reports from Somalia say civilians were among those killed, including a 4-year-old boy.

At press time, a key question is whether the US, in its first overt military operation in Somalia since the infamous "BlackHawk Down" intervention in 1992 and '93, has managed to hit the prime targets - Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, Saleh Ali Saleh Nabhan, or Abu Taha al-Sudani.

The three men are believed to be behind the 1998 bombings of the US embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, when more than 250 people were killed by two coordinated truck blasts.

Mr. Sudani is listed on Washington terror watch lists as Al Qaeda's point man in East Africa. Mr. Mohammed, from the Comoros archipelago in the Indian Ocean, is suspected of orchestrating a 2002 suicide attack on an Israeli-owned Kenyan hotel.

The failed attempt to shoot down a tourist airliner as it took off from Mombasa airport on Kenya's coast in 2002, heading for Tel Aviv, also bears Mohammed's signature, intelligence sources have said.

"If the attacks have managed to kill or capture some of the top East Africa people in Al Qaeda then it vindicates the actions of the US and Ethiopia, and it shows the ICU has been deceiving everyone," says Matt Bryden, senior analyst with the International Crisis Group in Nairobi.

"But if they haven't, then it compounds what has in the past been a strategy of errors, and makes the US look like it's been sold a lemon by [Somalia's] transitional federal government."

The European Union issued a statement criticizing the attack. Ethiopia, which has begun unprecedented military coordination with US troops in recent months, has issued no statement about the US air attacks, but Ethiopian officials say that the US and Ethiopia have completely different agendas in Somalia.

"The Ethiopian mission was not to fight terrorism or Al Qaeda per se, it was to defend the territory of Ethiopia from the penetration of groups based in Somalia," says Mohammad Dirir, minister for tourism in the Ethiopian government. "We targeted the Islamic Courts, and the Americans have their agenda, the war on terrorism."

"In Somalia, because of the failed state, it became a safe haven for all sorts of terrorist groups, including Al Qaeda," says Mr. Dirir. "The lieutenant of Osama bin Laden, Mr. Ayman Zawahiri, made statements calling on Muslims to come fight in Somalia. There are some Arab countries who are not allowing terror activities on their own territory, but don't mind if it is exported to the Horn of Africa."

A European diplomat based in Nairobi, and who watches Somalia closely, says that "there is no doubt that people linked to Al Qaeda - not the high command - but sympathizers, were in Somalia, running training camps, recruiting fighters, arming those fighters."

Some of those fighters were recent arrivals from the wide Somali diaspora, it appears.

DOJ_NMG_0114665

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said in an interview with the French daily Le Monde published Monday that "Many international terrorists are dead in Somalia." He said passports from different countries have been collected. "The Kenyans are holding Eritrean and Canadian passport holders. We have injured people coming from Yemen, Pakistan, Sudan, the United Kingdom."

There was no immediate verification of Mr. Meles's claims, but if they are true, he and Washington have the vindication they need to justify their attacks inside Somalia, the European diplomat says.

"That was the crux of it all, that Somalia under the [Union of Islamic] Courts would bring in bad guys from all over the world and train them up into a mercenary force fighting for Islam," he says.

The US airstrikes were likely launched from the former French base, Camp Lemonier, in Djibouti. Starting with about 1,800 troops in 2002, Djibouti has become the main regional base of the US military's counterterrorism task force. It also serves as a major desert warfare training center, an intelligence gathering center, and logistics base for US military forces. Its position right next to Somalia puts American forces within easy striking distance at short notice.

In recent months, the US military has conducted joint exercises with Kenya, the African country that has borne the brunt of terrorist attacks, since the 1998 embassy bombings. US forces have also reportedly been involved in training Ethiopian forces in counterterrorism techniques, ahead of their recent operations against the Islamic Courts Union in Somalia.

The Pentagon is expected to announce soon the formation of a new Africa Command to focus on the troubled continent. Currently, responsibility for Africa is divided among three of the Pentagon's five regional "unified commands," each headed by a four-star general or admiral who reports to the president.

Observers in Africa say the United States' single-minded focus on terrorism in Africa could backfire.

"The potential for transnational terror-related activity emerging from Somalia underscores both the international risk posed by state collapse and the international community's failed and inconsistent response to that collapse," says Kurt Shillinger, a terrorism expert at the South African Institute for International Affairs in Johannesburg. "Establishing an African Command will only be effective if the primary policy thrust is support for internally driven governance-building processes."

Some observers are concerned that Islamic militants will melt away now, but will eventually form an insurgency as they have in Afghanistan and Iraq. The target will be not only Somalia, but Ethiopia.

"Ethiopia is central to the ideology of the Islamists," says Medhane Tadesse, an Ethiopian historian in Addis Ababa and expert on the Islamist movement Al Ittihad.

"One of the issues that divide moderate Muslims from extremists is the position they take on whether Ethiopia should be Islamicized. The prophet Muhammad exempted Ethiopia from jihad, and now the extremists say that Muhammad was wrong.

"By making Ethiopia the enemy, they know they will attract Islamic NGOs (non-governmental organizations) from Saudi Arabia and Iran," Mr. Tadesse says.

U.S. Is Not Saying Who, Or What, Was Hit In Somalia Raid (WP)

By Karen Deyoung And Stephanie Mccrummen

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

Two days after the United States launched an airstrike against alleged al-Qaeda terrorists in southern Somalia, U.S. officials declined yesterday to provide details of who, or what, was hit.

In Mogadishu, the Somali capital, reports circulated that as many as 50 people, many of them civilians, were killed in the attack by a U.S. Air Force AC-130 gunship. U.S. officials said they are fairly certain that at least one targeted individual was hit; they said they had no information about civilian deaths in the strike the Kenyan border.

Several officials suggested that stories reaching Mogadishu of many deaths and continuing U.S. attacks had confused the airstrike with ongoing operations in the area by Ethiopia's military, including helicopters and fixed-wing aircraft. But it was impossible to confirm independently any of the widely differing accounts in Mogadishu or in Washington. The officials agreed to discuss the attack only on the condition of anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity.

DOJ_NMG_0114666

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman confirmed yesterday that a single airstrike occurred on Sunday, targeting "what we believe to be principal al-Qaeda leadership." Officials said that no further information would be released until U.S. personnel could assess directly the results of the strike and identify any dead.

"Let me draw a parallel with a domestic crime scene," one official said. "Imagine that complicated by 100, and that gives you an idea of what we're having to deal with."

Direct U.S. access to the area, where fleeing Islamic fundamentalist forces are being pursued on the ground and from the air by the Ethiopians, is viewed as problematic but necessary.

A principal target of the airstrike was Abu Talha al-Sudani, a Sudanese who U.S. officials have said is a longtime associate of Osama bin Laden and a key figure in an East African al-Qaeda cell based in Somalia.

Officials cautioned against reports that Fazul Abdullah Mohammed and Saleh Ali Saleh Nabhan, two other al-Qaeda operatives said to be responsible for the 1998 U.S. Embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania, may have been killed in the attack.

Also on the U.S. and Ethiopian target list, officials said, are Somali fundamentalist leader Sheikh Hassan Dahir Aweys, the former head of a militant group accused of links to al-Qaeda in the 1990s, and several other Somali Islamic leaders described as terrorists.

"I don't think anybody has packed up and gone home," another official said of U.S. operations in the area.

The aircraft carrier USS Dwight D. Eisenhower was moved into the Indian Ocean near the Somali coast to provide assistance, if needed, to the AC-130 on Sunday, and to use its aircraft to pinpoint the location of targets on land or sea. Four other U.S. naval vessels from the Bahrain-based Fifth Fleet are in the area.

In the chaos of Mogadishu, where invading Ethiopian troops routed the Islamic fundamentalists last month and installed an internationally backed transitional government, word of the U.S. attack provoked rage and anti-Americanism.

"I am angry," biology teacher Ahmed Weli Mohamed, 37, said in a telephone interview. "I am very, very angry. Even if there are terrorists, there are maybe two or three people, but hundreds are killed. . . . Americans don't respect us as human."

The news made shop owner and retired Somali soldier Hussein Farah Guley, 56, recall the early 1990s, when U.S. troops were part of a U.N. force that monitored a cease-fire in the country. Among the many foreigners killed by warring Somali clans during that period were 18 U.S. Army Rangers and Delta Force soldiers, who were attacked in Mogadishu after a Black Hawk helicopter was shot down in 1993.

"The Somalis, they will get angry," Guley said, "and if they see anyone from the outside, they will kill them."

Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi's transitional government, which U.S. officials said gave permission for the airstrike, is perceived by many Somalis as having interrupted a months-long period of unusual calm. The government is also seen as being too closely aligned with its leadership's clan and with outsiders, particularly Ethiopia and the United States. Although many rejected the stern religious laws imposed by the Islamic fundamentalists, who came to power last summer after driving out U.S.-funded warlords, they appreciated a new semblance of order.

Somalis have already begun to express anger toward Ethiopian troops. Last night, a former police building in the capital, now occupied by the Ethiopians, was hit by a rocket-propelled grenade fired from a speeding car. One Ethiopian and one Somali soldier were killed, and three civilians were injured.

The United States is leading an effort to deploy an African peacekeeping force to replace the Ethiopians, and it is pressing Gedi's government to open talks with Islamic leaders who are seen as moderates. No progress was reported on either front yesterday. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said that a possible U.N. force is also being "actively discussed."

Staff researcher Julie Tate in Washington and special correspondent Mohamed Ibrahim in Mogadishu contributed to this report. McCrummen reported from Nairobi.

U.S. Push In Somalia Targets Al Qaeda (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114667

WASHINGTON -- Administration officials described military actions in Somalia as part of an intensifying campaign to root out al Qaeda leaders allegedly operating in the country. But Pentagon involvement risks stoking greater instability in a region already racked by strife, analysts said.

American defense officials yesterday said Sunday's air strike by a U.S. AC-130 gunship was driven by "credible intelligence" that al Qaeda leaders were using Somalia's lawless south as a base to plan regional attacks. The U.S. has also positioned naval ships, including the U.S.S. Dwight D. Eisenhower, off Somalia's coast, in an effort to block any Islamist militants trying to flee the country.

These deployments mark the U.S. military's first action in Somalia in more than a decade and come ahead of a speech by President Bush detailing his latest plans for Iraq, where U.S. involvement has fueled sectarian strife and is charged with boosting al Qaeda's ranks.

In 1993, clan-based militias in Somalia killed 18 U.S. soldiers working on a peacekeeping mission in the capital Mogadishu. The American deaths prompted the Clinton administration to withdraw its troops. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the weekend attack was coordinated with West African leaders who don't "want to see any al Qaeda or terrorist operatives be able to escape Somalia and try to set up camp either in their country or a neighboring country."

Somalia has been without a functioning central government since the early 1990s. The Central Intelligence Agency has long believed that al Qaeda operatives, including those behind the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Ethiopia, are hiding there. Other al Qaeda leaders thought to be sheltering in Somalia include a Sudanese munitions expert. U.S. officials also worry that the country, with its porous borders, could serve as a regional base for Islamic militants.

The international community has been seeking to prevent more civil strife from engulfing Somalia, a majority Muslim nation of just over eight million people. Last month, Ethiopian troops invaded Somalia and drove from Mogadishu the Somali Islamic Courts Council, an Islamist political movement.

Many regional analysts warn that U.S. military actions could further stoke strife in Somalia. The SICC troops which fled Mogadishu are largely massing in Somalia's South and are expected to launch a guerrilla war against the interim Somali government and its foreign backers.

The Associated Press, citing Somali officials and village chiefs, said dozens of civilians were killed in Sunday's U.S. military strike.

An interim authority led by tribal chiefs is running the country, but few Africa experts believe it has much authority outside Mogadishu. U.S. military actions could impede efforts to establish a longstanding transitional government, as many moderate Somali leaders would be reluctant to cooperate with a new government viewed as too closely aligned to the White House, the experts said.

Some critics of the U.S. action said there is scant evidence that the SICC is linked to al Qaeda. "The administration has failed to make a public case on how al Qaeda is present and influencing" the SICC, said David Smock, an analyst at the U.S. Institute of Peace, a Washington-based think tank. He said three al Qaeda leaders might be based in Somalia, but there's "no compelling evidence that there are more."

US Confirms Air Strikes In Somalia Conflict (FT)

By Andrew England

Financial Times, January 10, 2007

US officials on Tuesday confirmed it launched weekend air strikes against alleged al-Qaeda leaders in Somalia, marking Washington's first direct engagement in the Horn of Africa conflict.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said the target of a strike by an AC130 aircraft was "the principal al-Qaeda leadership in the region". The attacks occurred in the country's south, where Ethiopian and Somali government troops are battling retreating Islamist militants.

The attack marked the first overt US military intervention in Somalia since a disastrous peacekeeping mission that ended in 1994. Mr Whitman said the strikes were based on "credible intelligence" but would not comment on their success.

DOJ_NMG_0114668

Somali officials said Monday's raids took place around an area known as Ras Kamboni and targeted "fundamentalists" but there were local reports that civilians as well as Islamic fighters were killed.

There were also reports from within Somalia that US helicopters launched fresh attacks on Tuesday, but Abdirahman Dinari, a Somali government spokesman, said these could not be confirmed. Fighting was continuing in the remote area between an estimated 600 Islamists and Ethiopian and Somali government forces, he told the Financial Times.

US officials believe high-level al-Qaeda operatives have fled the capital Mogadishu since Ethiopia poured thousands of troops into its neighbour in a bid to crush Islamist forces and install a United Nations-backed transitional government.

The European Commission on Tuesday criticised the US strike, saying it could set back efforts to reach a deal between Somalia's provisional government and moderate Islamists.

"We need a political process which is inclusive in order to bring about stability," said a spokesman for Louis Michel, EU development Commissioner. "Any incident of this kind is not helpful in the long term."

Both Addis Ababa and Washington accuse the Islamic Courts Union, which last year took over a large swathe of southern Somalia.

Washington has also given tacit support to the invasion by Ethiopia, a regional US ally. The Islamists have repeatedly denied links to al-Qaeda.

Washington alleges that three suspects believed to be involved in the 1998 US embassy bombings in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam, as well as a 2002 attack on a hotel in Kenya, were hiding in Somalia. They include Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, a Comorian who is on the FBI's most wanted terrorist list. The other two are a Kenyan and a Sudanese national.

Earlier this year, Washington backed a coalition of warlords in Mogadishu in its bid to capture the suspects and is alleged to have paid tens of thousands of dollars to the faction leaders later driven out by the Islamists.

The US Central Command said on Tuesday it had deployed an aircraft carrier off the Somali coast. Other US ships have been patrolling Somalia's coastline, Africa's longest, to prevent Islamists fleeing by sea.

Asked if the US had informed the Somali government about the air assault, Mr Dinari said: "We have good communications and we are collaborating with each other."

Additional reporting by Demetri Sevastopulo in Washington and Daniel Dombey in London

U.S. Raid In Somalia Concerns U.N. Chief (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, January 10, 2007

U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon is concerned that U.S. bombing in southern Somalia could escalate hostilities and harm civilians who are reported to have been killed in the airstrikes, a spokeswoman said Tuesday.

"Notwithstanding the motives for this reported military action, the secretary-general is concerned about the new dimension this kind of action could introduce to the conflict and the possible escalation of hostilities that may result," spokeswoman Michele Montas said.

"He is also concerned about the impact this would have on the civilian population in southern Somalia and regrets the reported loss of civilian lives," she said.

Ban said last week the rout of the Islamic movement by Ethiopian troops and Somali forces supporting the country's U.N.-backed transitional government offered "a new opportunity" for the government to establish full authority throughout the country.

He urged the government to seek political reconciliation, called for the speedy deployment of African peacekeepers, and welcomed Ethiopia's statement it intends to withdraw its forces "expeditiously."

Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, said he told Ban on Monday that a U.N. peacekeeping force may be needed to guarantee security and stability in Somalia, which has not had a functioning government for 15 years.

Solana said Ugandan forces may be the first deployed to replace Ethiopian troops, but he said the African Union is already carrying a "very heavy" peacekeeping burden in Sudan, and the U.N. may have to step in and take over the next phase.

The EU foreign policy chief said he "put that on the table" when he met Ban on Monday and did not expect an answer because the idea would have to be analyzed by U.N. peacekeeping officials.

DOJ_NMG_0114669

Somalia has not had an effective central government since clan-based warlords toppled dictator Mohamed Siad Barre in 1991 and then turned on each other, sinking the Horn of Africa nation of 7 million people into chaos. The current government was established in 2004.

On Dec. 6, the U.N. Security Council authorized an African force to protect the transitional government against the Union of Islamic Courts, which had taken control of the capital and most of southern Somalia. The council also authorized the force to train Somali government troops, and lifted a U.N. arms embargo for the African troops.

Asked whether the U.S. bombing violated the arms embargo, Montas said the council would be discussing Somalia on Wednesday.

The U.N. is trying to gather more information about the situation, she said.

Montas said U.N. humanitarian operations in the area where the bombs were being dropped were suspended and international staff were evacuated before Christmas when the recent fighting started.

No Exit In Somalia (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

It may be some time before we learn whether Sunday's air strikes by an AC-130 gunship in southern Somalia succeeded in killing the terrorists who were the intended targets -- particularly Abu Taha al-Sudani, reportedly an al Qaeda explosives expert, and Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, mastermind of the 1998 East Africa embassy bombings. But the attacks -- along with the deployment of a carrier battle group off the African coast -- are welcome evidence that the U.S. has learned the lessons of May 19, 1996.

That's the date Osama bin Laden and his associates left Sudan for Afghanistan on a chartered plane. The Clinton Administration was aware that Sudan intended to expel bin Laden, and the U.S. might have easily tracked and destroyed the flight en route. The consequences of its failure to do so is only too well known, and the Bush Administration is right to be determined not to let terrorists get away again, whether by land, air or sea.

The strikes in Somalia are also a reminder that in the war on terror there is no "exit strategy" short of victory. The last U.S. military venture in Somalia is broadly remembered as a military and political fiasco, particularly after the notorious "Black Hawk Down" battle in which 18 U.S. servicemen were killed, in part for want of adequate armor.

Yet America's sheepish withdrawal from the country had consequences. Bin Laden viewed it as yet another sign that America can't take casualties and will retreat when hit hard. Somalia descended into anarchy and became a haven for al Qaeda operatives and affiliated terrorist groups. Last June, the capital of Mogadishu fell into their grip, and the rest of the country surely would have fallen as well had it not been for the timely military intervention of neighboring Ethiopia.

That intervention has been criticized by some for running the risk of fueling regional conflict rather than checking it. Thus a British newspaper report from December frets that Ethiopia's invasion offers "Islamic jihadists the chance to establish a new front in Africa after Iraq and Afghanistan, and to wage another proxy war between East and West." Maybe.

Then again, a Taliban-style regime on the horn of Africa, capable of harboring, training, financing and equipping terrorists was an intolerable threat to global security. By contrast, the main risk now is that some Islamists will escape to fight another day, an excellent reason for the U.S. to take action when they are dispersed and on the run. Our forces were able to hit the terrorists this week because Ethiopia's offensive had pushed them out of their safe houses and into the open. It is a useful reminder to other terrorists that the U.S. can hit them anywhere in the world.

None of this requires the U.S. to deploy militarily to Somalia. Our security interests in the region are already well-served by our military deployment in neighboring Djibouti, from where we can monitor the region and, when necessary, rapidly deploy force.

What the U.S. can do for Somalia is offer meaningful logistical, military and humanitarian assistance to the Transitional Federal Government, which the CIA previously eschewed in favor of financing local warlords. TFG President Abdullahi Yusuf may not be a model democrat, but he showed his stripes well enough when he said of Sunday's air strikes that the U.S. "has a right to bombard terrorist suspects who attacked its embassies in Kenya and Tanzania." If only we received the same level of candid cooperation from Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf.

DOJ_NMG_0114670

The story of Somalia is far from over, and America's involvement in the area will not soon end. But U.S. interests are well-served by putting terrorists on the run, wherever they may be. We will be better served still if we take the lesson that the only exit for us in the war against terrorists -- whether in Somalia, Afghanistan and especially Iraq -- is to make sure there is no exit for them.

Defense Dept. Settles Suit On Database For Recruiting (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

The Defense Department yesterday announced changes in how it will treat information in an enormous military recruiting database.

The changes are part of the settlement of a lawsuit brought by the New York Civil Liberties Union on behalf of six New York City high school students that challenged the legality of the way information in the database was collected and used.

The database, the Joint Advertising, Market Research and Studies Program, is, according to court papers, probably the largest repository of information concerning 16-to-25-year-olds. It includes names, ages, sex, races, addresses, phone and Social Security numbers, e-mail addresses, schools attended, fields of study and grades. The information is collected or bought from high schools, motor vehicle departments and commercial vendors, and is used to identify and contact military recruiting prospects.

The Defense Department agreed to use the database only for recruiting, giving up the possibility of sharing it with law enforcement and intelligence agencies. It agreed to destroy information on individuals after three years rather than five years or longer.

The department also agreed to collect Social Security numbers only from the Selective Service System.

Perhaps most significantly, it established a way for people to opt out of the database. The civil liberties group has posted a form letter on its Web site to that end, along with form letters meant to be sent to newspapers applauding the settlement and chastising the Defense Department.

Donna Lieberman, the executive director of the civil liberties group, said that the settlement was a positive step, but that more remained to be done.

"Is it going to stop overaggressive recruiting?" Ms. Lieberman asked. "Of course not. Is it going to stop recruiting that specifically targets people of color? No."

In a statement, the group said it was frustrated that the department refused to stop collecting information about students' race and ethnicity. It said the military was engaged in efforts "to target racial and ethnic minorities, especially from African-American and Latino communities, for aggressive recruitment campaigns."

Maj. Stewart Upton, a Defense Department spokesman, defended the recruiting efforts. "In continuing to ensure that the military is representative of the American populace," Major Upton said, "we must communicate with all audiences to ensure that they are aware of the opportunity to serve in today's military."

Eleni Angelos Healey, a senior at Trinity School in Manhattan and one of the plaintiffs in the suit, said she had been harassed by letters and e-mail from military recruiters. Her repeated efforts to stop them had failed, she said.

"I'm really glad," Ms. Healey said, "that there's going to be a much easier way for kids to get their names off these lists as soon as possible."

Gov't Changes Student-recruit Practices (AP)

By Larry Neumeister,

AP, January 10, 2007

The Department of Defense has agreed to change the database it uses for military recruitment efforts to better protect the privacy of millions of high school students nationwide, a civil liberties group announced Tuesday.

In settling a lawsuit brought last year by the New York Civil Liberties Union on behalf of six high schoolers, the government agreed it will no longer disseminate student information to law enforcement, intelligence and other agencies and will stop collecting student Social Security numbers, the group said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0114671

It said it will also limit to three years the time it retains student information and will clarify procedures by which students can block the military from entering information about them in its database.

Last year's lawsuit claimed the department was flouting a 1982 military recruitment law that specifies that it refrain from collecting information on students under 17, that it store the information for no more than three years and that the information be kept private, the lawsuit said.

The current database includes information on 16-year-olds, is storing the information for five years and is being shared with law enforcement and other agencies, the lawsuit said.

Military officials have said they have about 30 million names in the database. The Pentagon said in 2005 the list includes high school students ages 16-18 and college students, and includes such information as the students' Social Security numbers, gender and race.

The government published the changes in the Federal Register on Tuesday before they were announced by the NYCLU.

Yusill Scribner, a spokeswoman for government lawyers who worked on the case, said the government had no comment.

Pentagon Agrees To Protect Privacy In Database Of Potential Recruits (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

NEW YORK, Jan. 9 -- The Defense Department has agreed to change a military-recruitment database to better protect the privacy of millions of high school students nationwide, a civil liberties group announced Tuesday.

To settle a lawsuit brought last year by the New York Civil Liberties Union, the government agreed to no longer disseminate student information to law enforcement, intelligence and other agencies and to stop collecting student Social Security numbers.

The Pentagon also agreed to limit to three years the time it retains student information and to clarify procedures by which students can block the military from entering information about them in its database.

Last year's lawsuit claimed the department was flouting a 1982 military-recruitment law. Military officials have said they have about 30 million names in the database. The Pentagon said in 2005 that the list includes high school students 16 to 18 years old as well as college students and includes such information as the students' Social Security numbers, sex and race.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Prosecutors Claim Conrad Black Committed Insider Trading (FINDLAW/AP)

By Ashley M. Heher, Ap Business Writer

AP, January 10, 2007

(AP) - CHICAGO-Less than two months before the start of a fraud and racketeering trial, federal prosecutors leveled new allegations against former newspaper tycoon Conrad Black, saying he engaged in insider trading and illegally posted information about his former company on a financial message board.

A lengthy filing this week in U.S. District Court in Chicago spells out a dozen alleged misdeeds by the former Hollinger International Inc. chairman and CEO, who's accused of plundering millions of dollars from the company's coffers.

Black was forced from the helm of the company and is scheduled to go to trial March 1.

The newspaper empire, which once included The Daily Telegraph of London, The Jerusalem Post and a major Canadian newspaper group, since has been largely dismantled. The Chicago Sun-Times is the last remaining major property of the company, now called the Sun-Times Media Group Inc.

Prosecutors on Monday asked U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve to include the newest allegations as evidence in the ongoing case against Black.

"Black did not make a distinction between his money and that belonging to a public company," prosecutors wrote. "It is this mind-set that contributed to his fleecing of International."

Black is charged with misusing company money to bankroll his lavish lifestyle and cheating on his taxes. He has pleaded not guilty.

Edward Greenspan, Black's attorney, said the federal allegations include "misstatements."

DOJ_NMG_0114672

"We're preparing our response now and we will file and we will object to what the prosecutor has put forward," he said. "There are misstatements in the material they have filed."

Federal authorities say Black in 1998 urged a company vice president to respond to a post on a Yahoo message board about Hollinger's seemingly static stock price.

When the executive, Paul Healy, explained responding would violate federal guidelines from the Securities and Exchange Commission, Black posted a response anonymously, prosecutors said in the filing Monday.

But not before chastising Healy for his hesitation.

"Don't be so strait-laced," Black wrote to Healy. "... Get our story out."

Authorities said Black, along with other officials, used insider trading to boost Hollinger stock in 1998, arranging for the Canadian company Brascan to buy Hollinger shares at the same time short-sellers were unloading their stock. At the time, Black was a director at Brascan, now called Brookfield Asset Management.

"While Brascan used its own funds to purchase the shares, Black guaranteed their downside and interest rate, and also guaranteed their profit," prosecutors wrote, saying Black and other executives received cash from the deal.

Katherine Vyse, a spokeswoman for Toronto-based Brookfield, said the company was reviewing the matter and could not comment.

Among the other allegations, prosecutors say Black:

- deliberately withheld documents from prosecutors.

- spent nearly $9 million (â‚¬6.9 million) of Hollinger's money to purchase memorabilia from Franklin Delano Roosevelt, without seeking prior approval from the company's board. The memorabilia, which Black used to pen a 2003 biography of the former president, was stored and displayed at Black's home.

- abused Hollinger's charitable donations, attributing the company's donations to him and his family.

- used company money to pay for handbags, jogging attire, opera tickets and other personal items for himself and his wife.

Meanwhile, Ravelston Corp. Ltd., the Canadian company Black used to control Hollinger International, said it intends to cooperate with U.S. officials and wants to agree to a $7 million (â‚¬5.4 million) fine as part of a deal with prosecutors in Chicago.

The deal still must be approved by a judge in Ontario. Greenspan said Tuesday he plans to object to the guilty agreement.

Feds Request More Time (TOPCJ)

By Robert Boczkiewicz, The Capital-Journal

Topeka (KS) Capital-Journal, January 10, 2007

Wittig, Lake prosecutors want extra month to decide if they'll ask judges for rehearing

DENVER — Federal prosecutors aren't tipping their hand, but Tuesday they said they may ask an appeals court to reconsider its decision that overturned all convictions of David Wittig and Douglas Lake in the Westar Energy looting case.

Prosecutor Richard Hathaway told the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in a new filing that more time is needed to decide whether to ask the court's full contingent of judges to rehear the case that was decided Friday by a three-judge panel.

Hathaway, of Topeka, asked the Denver-based court to give prosecutors until Feb. 19 to decide whether to ask for a rehearing. Without an extension, the deadline for prosecutors to decide is Jan. 19.

Wittig, Westar's former chairman, president and chief executive officer, and Lake, Westar's former executive vice president, were convicted in 2005 of wire fraud, money laundering, circumvention of internal controls and conspiracy.

The panel ruled there was insufficient evidence to convict Wittig and Lake of wire fraud. Because of that, and because the alleged crimes were so intertwined, their convictions for money laundering also were overturned.

The panel overturned the convictions for circumvention of internal controls, ruling that the trial judge, Julie Robinson, of the U.S. District Court in Topeka, seriously erred by failing to properly instruct jurors on what evidence was needed to convict on those charges.

The convictions for the fourth and final crime of which Lake and Wittig were charged, conspiracy, was overturned because the appellate judges concluded the conspiracy convictions were dependent on the evidence and the judge's instructions to jurors regarding the other crimes.

The court's full contingent of judges is about a dozen. The court normally operates in three-judge panels to issue its decisions.

The judges rarely grant rehearings, especially when decisions of a panel were unanimous, as they were Friday.

Washburn University law professor Michael Kaye, who has tracked the case since it started, said Friday it isn't likely that prosecutors will appeal Friday's decision to the U.S. Supreme Court because the ruling about evidence being insufficient was so "straightforward."

Typically, cases can't be appealed from a federal circuit court of appeals to the Supreme Court until an appeals court denies a request for rehearing.

Hathaway, in Tuesday's filing, wrote that attorneys at Justice Department headquarters in Washington, D.C., advised on Saturday "that additional time is required for the Office of Solicitor General to evaluate the case for a possible petition" for rehearing by the court's full contingent of judges. The solicitor general plays a key role in deciding whether prosecutors will appeal cases.

An attorney for Wittig, Gregory Coleman in Austin, Texas, said he doesn't oppose the court giving prosecutors more time to make up its mind. An attorney for Lake, Seth Waxman, in New York City, also said he doesn't oppose the request. It is common for prosecutors to make a request for more time.

Coleman said if they decide to ask for a rehearing, the judges could deny the request outright. But if the judges want to reflect on the request, they could ask attorneys for Wittig and Lake what their position is before deciding whether to rehear the case.

Robert Boczkiewicz can be reached at REB1den@aol.com.

Home Depot Board Faces New Outcry (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

Now that the board has ousted Home Depot's chairman and chief executive, Robert L. Nardelli, shareholders are expecting big changes at the home improvement retailing giant.

But the biggest hammer could fall on the board itself, warn some corporate governance advocates.

When Home Depot announced the departure of Mr. Nardelli last week, it also said that three directors — including one who has been on the board for nearly three decades — would remain on the board even though they were due to retire this spring after having reached the mandatory retirement age of 72.

Corporate governance watchdogs say the move illustrates that Home Depot's board, whose members have been criticized for their close ties to one another and to Mr. Nardelli's former employer, General Electric, is doing a poor job of succession planning for itself.

Furthermore, these critics argue that the three directors, Milledge A. Hart III, John L. Clendenin, and Claudio X. Gonzalez, played crucial roles in approving Mr. Nardelli's excessive pay package that ultimately led to his ouster.

"We were told the G.E. crony group that brought in Nardelli and paid him highly were going to start to move off of the board as they hit retirement age," said Richard Ferlauto, director of pension and benefit policy at the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees. "All last fall we were told that this board was going to evolve significantly because of the mandatory retirements. Now that's not happening."

The outcry over Mr. Nardelli's compensation, including his $210 million exit package, could result in another aggressive campaign to withhold votes from Home Depot's directors at the company's annual shareholder meeting this spring.

Or, if a competing slate of directors is put up against the incumbents, as one shareholder activist, Ralph V. Whitworth, has threatened to do, shareholders could throw their support to them if they believe they are qualified for the job, said Mr. Ferlauto.

The threat of a proxy fight could cause Home Depot's board to cut a deal with Mr. Whitworth, and that could result in the company shedding its construction supply business, which shareholders have been unhappy with, or adding Mr. Whitworth's nominees to the board.

DOJ_NMG_0114674

Brad Shaw, a spokesman for Home Depot, played down the prospects of a proxy battle, saying, "Home Depot's board has acted in the best interests of shareholders and is confident shareholders recognize this."

In a statement, Home Depot's board said it was necessary for the three directors to remain on the board for one more year in order to provide Mr. Nardelli's successor, Frank Blake, with their expertise and deep knowledge of the company. It added that Kenneth G. Langone, Home Depot's co-founder and the lead director, still intends to retire from the board as scheduled in May 2008, when he will be 72.

The company also said it hired an executive search firm last year to help identify candidates to replace the retiring board members. Home Depot did name one new director to its board in mid-November, Helen Johnson-Leipold, the chairwoman and chief executive of sports products company Johnson Outdoors.

Yet, the board should have already named several other replacements for its retiring directors by now, say some critics, who contend that the directors are still firmly on the hot seat as proxy season approaches.

The person driving the changes could be Mr. Whitworth, who runs Relational Investors, a fund that owns about $1 billion worth of Home Depot stock. In December Mr. Whitworth announced plans to form a shareholders' committee to examine the company's strategy and to nominate two individuals, including himself, to the board.

Last week, despite Mr. Nardelli's departure, Mr. Whitworth signaled that his stance and intentions had not changed. He declined yesterday to comment for this article.

If Relational decides to put up a slate of competing directors, Home Depot shareholders might be willing to support those candidates because of Mr. Nardelli's $210 million payout package, much of which was put in place by the board in his original 2000 employment contract, as well as the waiver of the mandatory retirement age for the three directors.

"Relational could take a stance that Home Depot is, in fact, entrenching the status quo by not replacing these directors, and that gives them another opportunity to generate press over the subject and to try to manage an upcoming proxy vote," said Andrew D. Shiftan, a managing director at investment bank Morgan Joseph & Company.

Mr. Shiftan noted that in the 10 or so campaigns that Relational has waged against companies since 1997, it has often agreed to concessions with the company in exchange for board seats and other changes.

A spokesman for Home Depot declined to comment on Relational, pointing to a statement made by the company late last year that said it planned to arrange a meeting with Relational shortly after the first of the year to discuss its concerns.

Shareholders have long been frustrated with Home Depot's stock price, which slumped under Mr. Nardelli. Last Wednesday, the stock surged on news of his resignation, but has since fallen 4 percent.

Last year, shareholders aimed a clear sign of their frustration at Home Depot's board. Of the shareholders who voted, 30 percent or more withheld their votes for 10 of the 11 directors, including Mr. Hart, Mr. Clendenin and Mr. Gonzalez.

"People who withheld votes from the directors last year remember who was there when the compensation contract was approved," said James P. Melican, chairman of Proxy Governance, a firm that advises large shareholders on corporate governance issues.

For instance, one of the directors whose retirement was waived was Mr. Clendenin, the retired president and chief executive of BellSouth. Mr. Clendenin joined Home Depot's board in 1996 and had a close relationship with a co-founder, Bernard Marcus, and their paths often crossed at social and business functions in Atlanta, according to a person close to the board.

Mr. Clendenin was chairman of the compensation committee that signed Mr. Nardelli's employment contract in December 2000. One of the lawyers sitting on the other side of the table helping Mr. Nardelli negotiate the contract was Frank L. Fernandez. Mr. Fernandez was later named Home Depot's general counsel. Mr. Fernandez declined to comment for this article.

It was at Electronic Data Systems, where Mr. Hart was president, that he and Mr. Langone became familiar with one another. As an investment banker, Mr. Langone helped take the company public in 1968 and was a large E.D.S. shareholder for years.

When Mr. Langone was approaching individuals to provide seed money for Home Depot in its early days, Mr. Hart became an early investor in the company and got a board seat. (Another former E.D.S. executive, Richard H. Brown, later became a Home Depot director as well. Mr. Brown left the board before last year's annual meeting.)

DOJ_NMG_0114675

Under stock exchange guidelines, Mr. Hart is not considered an independent director as Home Depot conducts business with an insulation company owned by Mr. Hart.

The third director who was set to retire this spring was Mr. Gonzalez, the longtime chairman and chief executive of Kimberly-Clark de México, a unit of Kimberly-Clark. Mr. Gonzalez joined Home Depot's board in 2001 and, as a director on G.E.'s board, he was very familiar with both Mr. Nardelli and Mr. Langone, who was also a G.E. director.

Mr. Gonzalez, who received the highest number of withheld votes last year at 36 percent of those cast, was a member of the compensation committee last year when it changed its long-term incentive plan for executives to include the effects of share buybacks when measuring earnings per share for compensation package. As Home Depot has been buying back its shares in recent years, such a change would have the effect of boosting the chief's pay.

Moves like that have some shareholder activists declaring that the departure of Mr. Nardelli simply is not enough to right all that is wrong with Home Depot.

"Home Depot's nomination committee and compensation committee needs to be reformed," said Mr. Ferlauto. "The next task is to rebuild the board in a way that creates trust with shareholders and much greater transparency to the decision-making process of the board."

In Cash Crunch, Mills May Seek Bankruptcy Filing (WP)

By Dana Hedgpeth And David S. Hilzenrath

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

Mills Corp., the struggling shopping mall developer, said yesterday that possible misconduct by management contributed to widespread accounting errors, and the company warned that it may be forced to seek bankruptcy protection if it cannot reach agreement with its lenders.

Mills, of Chevy Chase, said in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission that the errors total $347 million to $352 million. The document said it remains unknown what effect the accounting corrections would have on the company's financial statements for 2005 and earlier. A company spokesman declined to elaborate yesterday.

Mills has not released an earnings report since the third quarter of 2005, and last year, its chief executive Laurence C. Siegel retired. It plans to restate its financial results from 2001 to 2004 and for the first three quarters of 2005. The company is under investigation by the SEC, which declined to comment on the case.

Mills issued a statement late yesterday, saying it has "taken several important remedial steps" in the past year that include "a near-complete change of executive management personnel."

Mills stock closed yesterday at $14.82 per share, down $4.12, or 21.8 percent.

Mills owns about 40 large-scale shopping malls, including the discount retail complexes of Potomac Mills in Virginia and Arundel Mills in Maryland. Siegel was credited with pushing the concept of regional mega-malls in the 1990s as places that would be shopping destinations. He eventually embarked on what was to be Mills' most ambitious undertaking, a giant shopping project called Xanadu in northern New Jersey, which was to have an indoor ski slope and a Ferris wheel.

The company, however, has since given up its lead role in the Xanadu project and in its filing yesterday said the company's rapid growth contributed to its accounting errors.

Mills's "overall culture and 'tone at the top' were heavily focused on meeting external and internal financial expectations," Mills said in a report summarizing the results of a long-running investigation by the audit committee of its board of directors. The report found that "possible misconduct" played a role in its accounting troubles, including at least one instance in which management overrode a decision by the company's accounting department.

The report did not name the people involved in the suspected misconduct. The company said, however, that the audit committee found no reason to question the integrity and conduct of current executives.

Some of the larger accounting mistakes appear to have been unintentional, resulting from incompetence or poor internal controls, the report said. But the evidence showed that a "relatively small" number of errors were not reached "in good faith," the report said.

DOJ_NMG_0114676

In one episode, Mills booked a sale as having occurred in April 2002, though the terms of the sale were not negotiated until late 2002 and the deal was not completed until the spring of 2003, the report said. Correcting that problem would add $10.8 million of expenses for 2002.

In another episode, early in 2004, management overrode a decision by the corporate accounting department to put more than $500,000 in reserve. Putting money in reserve can decrease profit.

The report said Mills treated termination payments for two former employees as consulting fees, even though the employees did not perform any consulting services for Mills and were not expected to do so. The payments were improperly capitalized on the financial statements, the report said.

With regard to those problems, the company's audit committee "concluded that the weight of the evidence was contrary to the witnesses' assertions that the accounting judgments at issue were reasonable and reached in good faith," the report said.

Among the items Mills appears to have misstated unintentionally was the compensation of its former chief executive, the report said. The company understated Siegel's long-term incentive pay expense by $1.5 million in 2004 and overstated it by $1.9 million in the first three quarters of 2005. The company underreported other aspects of Siegel's compensation by $132,228 in 2002 and by $28,031 in 2004, the report said.

When Siegel retired as chief executive in October, the company reported that he was being called on to repay "any non-business related perquisites" he may have received, including $362,156 for "personal use of the Company-chartered aircraft and personal flights erroneously paid by the Company."

The audit committee hired the law firm of Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher to assist with the investigation, and the law firm enlisted forensic accountants. The investigation involved a review of more than 4 million pages of documents and 240 interviews with 100 people.

In its SEC filing, Mills said it had adequate cash to operate through March 31 but then must reach a new agreement with its lenders. If those talks fail, Mills "could be forced to seek protection" under the U.S. bankruptcy code, and security holders could "lose their entire investment," the filing said.

The company has spent the past few months selling overseas operations and taking other steps to reduce its debt. At its annual meeting in December, Mills' new chief executive, Mark S. Ordan, assured shareholders that no unexpected "financial disasters" were afoot, telling them "you should not read any of my remarks to say that there is some smoking gun out there that we are hiding."

Should Steve Jobs Go To Jail? (WSJ)

By RICHARD MARMARO And RYAN WEINSTEIN

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

Steve Jobs recently became the latest chief executive thrown into the options-timing imbroglio. Apple disclosed that its CEO was "aware or recommended" favorable grant dates on option grants to employees, but that he did not "receive or benefit" from any of the grants or "appreciate the accounting implications." Apple's board concluded that Mr. Jobs had done nothing wrong, and emphasized its "complete confidence" in its CEO. The markets followed suit. Rather than fret, investors actually bid up Apple's stock by more than $5 per share.

Given the stock bump, the board's exoneration and Mr. Jobs's lack of accounting experience, could this possibly be a case of criminal securities fraud? Believe it or not, in the minds of some prosecutors applying a far-reaching and unproven theory of fraud, it is. Just last summer, the government indicted Gregory Reyes, the former CEO of Brocade Communications, despite the fact that Mr. Reyes, like Mr. Jobs, was a non-accountant who didn't personally benefit one cent from the option grants at issue.

The problem with the government's theory is that it conflates books-and-records violations with criminal securities fraud. In the process, the government untethers securities fraud from the legal elements that help safeguard executives from conviction for inadvertent accounting violations resulting in little or no harm to companies or to investors.

Fundamental to American law is the notion that a defendant cannot be punished absent intent to commit a crime. Yet prosecutors are alleging that non-accountants violated an accounting rule -- known as APB 25 -- so opaque even auditors didn't understand it. Many in Silicon Valley are still scratching their heads: How can someone intentionally violate a rule that they and most others don't even comprehend?

DOJ_NMG_0114677

Prosecutors and regulators have alleged just that. Not surprisingly, the first and only federal court confronting the issue so far found that APB 25 was so obscure that its violation could not demonstrate evidence of fraudulent intent as a matter of law.

Indeed, much of what is pejoratively called "backdating" was actually undertaken in good faith. In many instances during the Internet boom, Silicon Valley high-tech companies were hiring so many new employees and awarding so many options grants that paperwork errors led to changed grant dates. Yet these occasions have been lumped into the so-called "backdating" pool, and portrayed as a harbinger of the next Enron.

Unlike in the typical securities fraud cases -- where revenues are overstated or cash expenses hidden, and when discovered, the company's stock craters -- prosecutors of backdating cases face an enormous challenge in proving that stock-based compensation expense actually cost investors anything. Stock-based compensation is a non-cash expenditure, meaning the expense does not reflect cash flowing into or out of the company's treasury. This fact is often overlooked by those who assume that backdated option grants are the same as cash hand-outs.

In the current regulatory environment, these economic realities too often get lost when addressing past errors in options accounting. Accurate financial reporting is critical to a company's health. But at some point the quest to restate an ideal financial statement risks exalting form over substance, with the company's true financial health becoming virtually irrelevant while an approved income statement is made paramount.

The most basic element of fraud is deception or deceit, and a typical example is when a company misstates revenues or cash expenses. Yet there is no proof of deceit or concealment in alleged backdating cases. In fact, it is remarkable how much companies have disclosed about their option grants. Company 10-Ks, Form 4s, proxy statement and other filings were replete with information about options. Indeed, despite media accounts that suggest that executives were secretly lining their pockets, the economic value of options granted, whether to executives or to the rank-and-file, was no secret at all.

If the alleged backdating did not involve self-dealing or kickbacks, and options expenses were immaterial to investors, how were investors harmed? If the harm was only "mak[ing] a hash of the financial statements," as SEC Chairman Christopher Cox has suggested, shouldn't backdating cases be charged as books-and-records violations rather than securities fraud? Despite the media clamor and various colorful analogies to lightning, lotteries and pick-pocketing, most options backdating cases are not fraud, but books-and-records errors.

It is understandable, in an era when public concern is growing over rising executive compensation, that attention should be turned to stock options. Individual companies may want to reconsider how and at what volume they grant options. Yet a thoughtful look at the elements of securities fraud may help observers distinguish between accounting issues and criminal acts.

Mr. Marmaro, a former federal prosecutor, and Mr. Weinstein are attorneys at Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom. They are currently representing the former CEO and chairman of Brocade Communications in connection with stock option issues.

Apple's Gore (WSJ)

By HOLMAN W. JENKINS, JR.

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

We can only wonder what Al Gore is making of his experience as the No. 1 defender of today's No. 1 backdating miscreant.

Mr. Gore, an Apple director, was a member of the special two-man committee that investigated and exonerated Steve Jobs in the backdating matter. By now, we presume he is well-versed in what backdating is and isn't. But how easily Mr. Gore -- the scourge of Big Pharma, etc. -- could have been the one braying about greed, CEO theft, the defrauding of shareholders.

Mr. Jobs's famed marketing magic was on display yesterday at the Macworld Expo in San Francisco. In another way, his case has performed a magical feat in prompting a few more voices to question whether backdating is really the crime of the century, or merely a business curiosity blown way out of proportion by poorly reasoned coverage.

Here and there, in the New Yorker, at the Fortune magazine Web site, in the bloggings of law Prof. Larry Ribstein and journalist John Carney, the intellectual fallacies that have permeated the coverage are gradually poked away. Asks Business

DOJ_NMG_0114678

Week: "Is the world ready to see one of its greatest innovators sacrificed at the altar of the good-governance gods -- especially when it's not clear how [Mr. Jobs] was enriched or his shareholders damaged?"

No such understanding was emoted for Brocade's Greg Reyes or Comverse's Kobi Alexander, CEOs indicted in backdating scandals much like Apple's. But this is still progress.

Much reporting has made it sound like backdating was the equivalent of executives taking erasers and white-out to their paychecks to add a couple of zeroes -- and public understanding still suffers from this bum steer. But all that backdating comes down to is a nonmaterial accounting irregularity (yes, readers, accounting rules should be obeyed!) involving a defective judgment about whether "in the money" options needed to undergo expensing.

We're still at the beginning of the so-called scandal, and many executives will likely end up paying a price for this poor decision. But in no way does it implicate theft of shareholder money or even substantive accounting fraud. Here, we propose to violate a cardinal newspaper ordinance that logic should never be discussed in a newspaper. The beginning of all error was the media's unwarranted assumption, to put a fine point on it, that backdating was somebody's way of paying an employee more than, um, er, that same somebody intended (er, sputter, gurgle).

You see the problem: Whether options are backdated or not, they must reflect the intentions of whoever designed them. If I'm designing the package, how can I intentionally design it to pay more than I intend?

So the claim that backdating was used to "inflate" pay (compared to what?) can only be nonsense. In any case, if companies wanted to increase executive wages, backdating was a needlessly baroque way of doing it. They could just have handed out more options. Backdating's appeal had to lie elsewhere. The likeliest (even self-evident) explanation is that managements discovered that employees' eyes light up when "in the money" options are put before them. Indeed, if employees are as prone to fallacious thinking as the media in valuing options packages, their delight in "in the money" options allowed them to be taken to the cleaners compared to what they would have received in "at the money" options.

But, you ask, wasn't the purpose to conceal from shareholders how much employees were being paid? Your error is forgivable if you've been getting your information from the press: The entire substance of backdating was to allow the details of these "in the money" options to be accurately reported, albeit without taking an accounting charge for them (remember, companies at the time could pay an employee the GNP of France in "at the money" options without taking a charge).

Blessed is the editor who can say to a writer, "Make sense of Subject X for me," and hope to receive back something more than a distillation of tropes already in the media. Most editors are not so blessed, a factor just now reaching critical mass. On Sunday, a lagging commentator in the New York Times likened backdating to "getting to pick lottery numbers after the winning numbers are drawn." A confused Washington Post editorial called on Mr. Jobs to reimburse Apple for the compensation he stole.

Against this (who would have thunk it) stands Mr. Gore, yelling stop to the lynch mob. In Apple's own backyard, the San Jose Mercury News delivered a critic's delectable complaint that the Gore investigation had "tried to preserve the company's No. 1 asset" in Mr. Jobs. Isn't that exactly what a shareholder wants from the Apple board right now? The Apple case is a marvelous example of why corporate governance reformers do shareholders no favor even as they expand their own bailiwicks by making governance reform a never-ending end in itself. Indeed, Mr. Gore deserves credit for putting himself in the line of fire at all. And worse is surely coming: Mr. Jobs is starting to face insinuations of insider trading for stock sales after the first backdating cases broke but before Apple was implicated.

Mr. Gore might have waved off the special committee assignment and sought to cover his own hindquarters from the lawsuits and criticism aimed at Apple. That's been the tendency of directors since Sarbanes-Oxley enacted greater individual liability for accounting scandals: head for the high grass and hire a lawyer to point fingers at somebody else.

It's no accident that in the last 25 years, the value of America's corporations rose 12-fold, and the corporate reform industry grew right in step to tell us how badly and corruptly our companies are governed. The more successful the stock market is at cultivating strong businesses, the more we're told the whole system is rotten, in need of reform.

We just wonder what Mr. Gore thinks about all this now.

Mr. Jenkins edits "Political Diary," the editorial page's daily e-mail newsletter with commentary analysis and gossip on Washington, D.C. and state politics. With John Fund. Subscribe at www.politicaldiary.com.

DOJ_NMG_0114679

CRIMINAL LAW:

Document-Theft Probe Is Criticized (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

The Justice Department and the National Archives improperly assured the Sept. 11 commission that its members had access to all relevant materials about the Clinton administration's terrorism policies, without knowing if original, uncopied documents had been removed from the archives by former national security adviser Samuel R. "Sandy" Berger, a Republican congressional report said yesterday.

The report, issued by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), accused both agencies of inadequately investigating the theft Berger admitted had occurred on two occasions in 2003. It quoted two Archives officials as saying that they had no way of knowing whether Berger took other documents from the files during two earlier visits.

Davis is the former chairman of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform. He issued the report after Republican staff members conducted interviews with Archives and Justice Department officials and gained access to unredacted material from a probe by the National Archives inspector general.

His report includes new details of what Berger did, and how the Archives staff, the Justice Department and the FBI reacted to the discovery of missing documents. It depicts Berger as aggressively insisting during his visits to the Archives that he be left alone with the documents, giving him what he later admitted was a calculated opportunity to hide the papers in his clothing.

The report also depicts Berger as lying to Archives staff about thefts that an unnamed senior Archives official said had made her and her staff feel "almost physically ill." It said Berger knowingly made false statements to the media after word of the FBI probe surfaced and improperly allowed a spokesman, Joe Lockhart, to depict him as a victim in the affair.

Berger's attorney, Lanny Breuer, responded yesterday with a statement that Republicans had politicized and distorted "a matter that has been thoroughly investigated by the Justice Department for more than two years and effectively closed for more than a year. It is particularly troubling that they have chosen to attack not only Mr. Berger but also the dedicated professionals at the Department of Justice who handled this case."

Breuer added: "The principal allegations in this report are based on pure conjecture; not a single fact is offered to support them." He said Berger had cooperated with the Justice Department and had moved on.

The Justice Department said yesterday that it had no evidence Berger's actions had deprived the commission of any documents.

The report called the FBI and Justice Department's lack of interest in Berger's first two visits to the Archives, in May and June 2003, "disturbing" and "inexplicable," particularly in light of his eventual admission to having improperly removed classified notes he took during one of those visits. It said Berger was never given a polygraph test despite having agreed to it as part of his plea bargain with the Justice Department in 2005.

The report also provided a more vivid account of what an unnamed Archives staff member described as Berger's apparent attempt to take some material out in his pants, an allegation Berger has repeatedly denied. The staff member, one of only four Archives employees cleared to see all the documents that Berger came to review, wrote that "there was clearly something there more than his pants and socks."

The report said Berger took a special interest during his early visits in files from the office of former White House counterterrorism official Richard A. Clarke, which included uninventoried draft documents, memos, e-mail messages and handwritten notes. "Had Berger removed papers . . . it would be almost impossible for Archives staff to know," the report stated.

The report quoted a lawyer at the Archives, Jason R. Baron, as acknowledging that as a result "it is conceivable that the 9/11 commission may not have received" all the requested documents.

A spokeswoman for the Archives, Susan Cooper, said "at the time, the National Archives was confident that the 9/11 commission received all the materials. . . . You can't ever guarantee anything."

GOP Contradicts Justice Department (WP/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0114680

By Larry Margasak, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Some classified documents that were unlawfully removed from the National Archives three years ago may never have reached their intended destination _ the Sept. 11 commission, a House Republican report concluded Tuesday.

The report contradicted Justice Department conclusions that the commission received all the necessary documents. The records were reviewed at the archives by the Clinton administration's national security adviser, Sandy Berger, who pleaded guilty in April 2005 to unlawfully removing several documents.

Released by Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., the report said Berger could have taken White House staff working papers that never were inventoried by the archives. In that case, nobody would know they were gone, the report said.

The Justice Department on Tuesday repeated its original position that no documents were withheld. Spokesman Bryan Sierra said the department "has no evidence that Sandy Berger's actions deprived the 9/11 Commission of documents, and we stand by our investigation of this matter."

Berger pleaded guilty to removing documents on two occasions in 2003. A report by the archives inspector general last month said that Berger acknowledged hiding some of them at a construction site near the archives building in Washington.

The report said, however, that the plea did not account for two earlier visits during which Berger reviewed documents. He conducted the review to prepare himself and other Clinton aides for testimony before the commission investigating the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

"The 9/11 Commission relied on incomplete and misleading information" when it was told it had all the records, said Davis. The ranking Republican on the House Government Reform Committee, Davis started working on the report when he was chairman prior to the Democratic takeover of Congress.

Davis' report quoted Noel Hillman, then-chief of the department's Public Integrity Section, as stating at the time of the 2005 plea that Berger did not have an intent to hide any of the documents or conceal facts from the commission.

Matt Bennett, a spokesman for Berger attorney Lanny Breuer, said, "I can state unequivocally that no documents were withheld, and that all documents that Mr. Berger took were disclosed to the Justice Department and the inspector general of the archives."

The report said that since working papers reviewed by Berger were not inventoried, "the Department of Justice could not assure the 9/11 Commission that it received all responsive documents to which Berger had access. Additionally, the 9/11 Commission was not informed that Berger had access to original documents that he could have removed without anyone's knowledge," the report said.

In September 2005, Berger was sentenced to two years of probation, 100 hours of community service, pay a $50,000 fine and to lose his security clearance for three years.

The report said the Justice Department "was unacceptably incurious" about two of Berger's four visits to the National Archives _ one in May 2002 and the other in July 2003.

The department "never notified the 9/11 Commission that Berger viewed a large number of original documents on these first two visits," the report said.

Damage From Berger's Theft Understated, Davis Says (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

Samuel R. Berger's theft of documents from the National Archives compromised national security "much more than originally disclosed" and resulted in "incomplete and misleading" information being given to the September 11 commission, says the former chairman of the House Government Reform Committee.

"It is now also clear that Mr. Berger was willing to go to extraordinary lengths to compromise national security, apparently for his own convenience," Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, said yesterday.

"No one ever told the commission Mr. Berger had access to original documents he could have taken without detection."

In October, Mr. Davis led an effort by House Republicans to investigate and hold hearings on which documents might have been "destroyed, removed or were missing" after visits to the National Archives by Mr. Berger, President Clinton's national security adviser from 1997 to 2001.

Mr. Davis said the investigation found that the full extent of Mr. Berger's document removal can never be known and, consequently, the Justice Department could not assure the September 11 commission -- which was investigating intelligence and security failures -- it received all the documents to which Mr. Berger had access.

"We now know Mr. Berger left stolen highly classified documents at a construction site to avoid detection," he said. "We know Mr. Berger insisted on privacy at times to allow him to conceal documents that he stole."

Mr. Davis noted that during three visits to the Archives, Mr. Berger was given access to working papers of National Security Council staff members, including Mr. Berger, and their content was not inventoried by the Archives at the document level. He said Mr. Berger focused solely on original documents during his first two visits and there was "no way to determine" whether he "swiped any of these original documents."

The National Archives Office of Inspector General reported last month that Mr. Berger hid documents under a construction trailer where they could be retrieved later.

Lanny Breuer, Mr. Berger's attorney, said the matter was thoroughly investigated by the Justice Department for more than two years and effectively closed for more than a year. He said the report's conclusions were based on "pure conjecture."

"Not a single fact is offered to support them," Mr. Breuer said.

"Sandy Berger made a mistake. But he has admitted that mistake, fully cooperated with the government's investigation, paid his debt to society, and moved on. It's time for the new congressional minority to do the same."

Mr. Davis described the Justice Department's assertion that Mr. Berger's statements were credible after being caught as "misplaced." He said, "One wouldn't rely on the fox to be truthful after being nabbed in the henhouse. But the Justice Department apparently did."

Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said the department "has no evidence that Sandy Berger's actions deprived the 9/11 commission of documents, and we stand by our investigation of this matter."

Mr. Berger pleaded guilty in April 2005 to a misdemeanor charge of unauthorized removal and retention of classified material, including documents outlining the government's knowledge of terrorist threats to the United States.

He was fined $50,000 and barred from access to classified material for three years. He had faced a year in prison and a $100,000 fine, but a plea agreement with the Justice Department reduced the fine and kept him out of prison.

House Panels Delay Response To Subpoenas (AP)

By Erica Werner, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 10, 2007

Three House committees are delaying responding to grand jury subpoenas issued in connection with the bribery case against jailed former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

The subpoenas were issued to the Appropriations, Armed Services and Intelligence committees by the federal grand jury in San Diego that has been considering evidence in a defense contracting investigation stemming from the Cunningham case.

The subpoenas set a Jan. 11 deadline for compliance but prosecutors and House lawyers have agreed to extend that until Jan. 31, congressional staffers said Tuesday.

The initial deadline was "obviously impossible to meet," said Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey, D-Wis. "I just got the job."

"We essentially have to dig into Republican files. We have no idea what's in there," Obey said.

The subpoenas for documents were disclosed in the Dec. 27 edition of the Congressional Record by the committee chairmen, as required by House rules. Those Republican chairmen have since handed over power to Democrats who now control the House.

Prosecutors in San Diego declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0114682

Rep. Peter Hoekstra of Michigan, top Republican on the House Intelligence Committee, wouldn't say what the subpoenas ask for, but said he was concerned the scope was overly broad.

"It's pretty extensive ... I've got some concerns," Hoekstra said. He said House attorneys would negotiate their response with federal prosecutors.

The Justice Department has clashed with Congress in the past over the scope of its investigations of lawmakers.

The San Diego grand jury has been considering evidence against Brent Wilkes, a defense contractor identified as one of Cunningham's coconspirators.

Cunningham, a San Diego-area Republican, was sentenced in March to more than eight years in prison for accepting $2.4 million in bribes in exchange for steering government business to Wilkes and others.

Investigators are also investigating Wilkes' childhood friend Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, a former high-ranking CIA official, for his role in the awarding of a government contract that went to Wilkes.

Also Tuesday, longtime Appropriations staffer Betsy Phillips confirmed she is cooperating with a grand jury subpoena for testimony in the case, but refused further comment.

___

Associated Press Writer Allison Hoffman in San Diego contributed to this report.

Nagin Stops Short Of Curfew But Plans Checkpoints On N.O. Streets (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

NEW ORLEANS — Mayor Ray Nagin, his hurricane-stricken city under siege by a crime wave that has claimed nine lives since the start of 2007, stopped short of imposing a curfew but said police will set up checkpoints in early-morning hours when about one-third of the city's violent crime occurs.

The checkpoints, scheduled to start Wednesday, would operate between 2 a.m. and 6 a.m. and target drug and alcohol violations as well as motorist insurance. The first one was to be held in a crime-ridden area of the city.

Increased foot patrols, using 20-25 sheriff's deputies to supplement police, increasing the number of surveillance cameras in high-crime areas and speeding homicide cases through the court system were other elements of Nagin's plan to attack crime.

"This city will focus on murders," Nagin said, flanked by Police Superintendent Warren Riley, District Attorney Eddie Jordan and others during a news conference held Tuesday afternoon at the site of the city's first murder of 2007. "We're drawing a line in the sand, and we're saying, 'We've had it.'"

A curfew had been opposed by the city's tourism leaders, who said businesses struggling since Hurricane Katrina could be further hurt. While Nagin did not declare a curfew, he said the message to citizens was to stay off the streets in high-crime areas and in early morning hours.

Riley, whose department has struggled since the hurricane to maintain community confidence, also said officers on desk and training duties will be reassigned to on-foot community policing.

Nagin, acknowledging the criminal justice breakdown extended beyond the police force, said a corps of volunteers will be recruited to monitor homicide cases moving through the courts. "We're sending a signal that the system that used to allow you to commit a murder and there were no consequences is over. It has been easier to commit a murder than another crime in New Orleans," Nagin said.

Police officers have been critical of the district attorney's office and judges, who they say have turned loose too many criminals or given light sentences. But Riley said his department will work with the district attorney to ensure that all information needed to prosecute a murder case will be turned over within 28 days.

The news conference took place in a neighborhood of houses with peeling paint, across from a large FEMA trailer park and an abandoned public housing development.

At a mom-and-pop grocery on the corner, children oblivious to the weight of the events around them bought candy and chatted happily.

Beside the podium set up for the news conference, blood spots from the Jan. 1 killing of 28-year-old Corey Hayes were in plain view on the street.

DOJ_NMG_0114683

Absent from today's news conference were state officials.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco said today that her office has been talking with New Orleans police for almost two months about a plan to curb the violence and made a formal request for one a couple of weeks ago as a prelude to additional state funding.

The state budget for the next fiscal year, which begins July 1, is being formulated now and an action plan on crime is needed to secure state funding, Blanco said.

"We obviously can't abandon the city," Blanco said.

Since June 2006, Blanco said the state has spent about $15 million to keep 300 National Guard troops and 60 state police in New Orleans, and another $15 million housing Orleans Parish prisoners in state facilities.

There is funding to keep the guard and state police in town until June 30, she said.

"We know it's going to cost us more next year if they stay," she said. "For one thing, the hotels that were providing free rooms are withdrawing that, so we'll have to pay for them."

New Orleans neighborhoods have become "a haven for criminal activity" and the state needs federal help to stop the recent crime wave there, Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., said today.

Landrieu presented 10 ways the federal government could help relieve the wave of homicides.

"These proposals will not end crime in New Orleans, but they are specific, they are doable," Landrieu said in a Capitol Hill news conference.

She asked for more agents from the FBI and the Drug Enforcement and Administration, an emergency grant from the Justice Department similar to the one awarded to New York City in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks, and money to build a new police academy and put a camera surveillance system in police patrol cars and around the city.

Guns are on the streets of New Orleans in record numbers since Hurricane Katrina, said senior special agent Austin Banks of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

"Since Katrina, we have traced every firearm recovered by the New Orleans Police Department," Banks said. "And our investigation shows we are tracing just as many post-Katrina as pre-Katrina even though we have a much smaller population."

New Orleans population is down from its pre-Katrina total of 455,000 to about 200,000 according to the U.S. Census Bureau.

The ATF has found the length of time it takes a legally purchased gun to become involved in a crime is five years nationally, Banks said.

"In New Orleans it's only six months," he said. "That tells me that people here are buying guns for the bad guys."

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

Santorum's landing

Former Sen. Rick Santorum, Pennsylvania Republican, yesterday became a senior fellow at the Ethics and Public Policy Center, a Washington-based think tank, John J. Miller reports at National Review Online (www.nationalreview.com).

"I want to contribute to the world of ideas," Mr. Santorum said.

After 16 years in Congress -- four in the House, 12 in the Senate -- Mr. Santorum lost his bid for re-election in November. However, he hopes to remain in the public spotlight as director of the EPPC's brand-new America's Enemies program, Mr. Miller writes.

"It's a stark name," Mr. Santorum said. "But we wanted to be candid about the fact that America really does have enemies and to point out that the nature of these enemies is much more complex than what people realize. It's not just Islamic fascism, but also Venezuela, North Korea, and, increasingly in my opinion, Russia."

Landrieu's plan

Sen. Mary L. Landrieu, Louisiana Democrat, said yesterday that Congress can -- and should -- do more to help stop the recent wave of violent crime plaguing New Orleans.

The Democrat urged adoption of her 10-point plan, which grants federal funds and beefs up drug and violence task forces disrupted by Hurricane Katrina in 2005. She sent a letter to President Bush asking that his budget include funds to double the size of a Drug Enforcement Administration task force and an FBI gang task force.

"Regrettably, these abandoned neighborhoods are a perfect breeding ground for crime and drug traffickers that can take advantage of the total absence of witnesses to undertake their operations unobserved," she said.

Mrs. Landrieu said "action must be taken," especially in light of the 12 killings in recent weeks, nine of them since Jan. 1.

Among her proposals was a plan to put up surveillance cameras to monitor crime and for potentially abusive police. She also wants to increase funding to build a new police academy to replace what was damaged during the hurricane.

The city must give a perception of safety in the weeks before next month's Mardi Gras celebration, a major economic boost, she said.

Sharpton again

Black activist the Rev. Al Sharpton said Monday he is seriously considering a run for president.

"I don't hear any reason not to," Mr. Sharpton, 52, said in an interview during an urban-affairs conference in New York sponsored by the Rev. Jesse Jackson.

"If we're talking about the urban agenda, can you tell me anybody else in the field who's representing that right now?" Mr. Sharpton asked. "We clearly have a reason to run, and whether we do it or not we'll see over the next couple of months."

Mr. Sharpton mounted a long-shot bid for the White House in 2004, in which his wit and fiery denunciation of President Bush often enlivened Democratic primary debates. He dropped out of the race after losing several state primaries and endorsed the eventual nominee, Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry.

Despite widespread interest in the likely candidacy of another influential black Democrat, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, Mr. Sharpton said he's heard little substantive discussion of issues that might influence his decision about running, the Associated Press reports.

"Right now, we're hearing a lot of media razzle-dazzle," Mr. Sharpton said. "I'm not hearing a lot of meat, or a lot of content. I think when the meat hits the fire, we'll find out if it's just fat, or if there's some real meat there."

Mr. Sharpton said the candidate who impressed him most so far was former Sen. John Edwards, North Carolina Democrat, who has made poverty the central issue of his campaign.

Johnson's recovery

Sen. Tim Johnson's condition has been upgraded from critical to fair, four weeks after he was hospitalized for a brain hemorrhage, his office said yesterday.

The South Dakota Democrat, who was rushed to the hospital on Dec. 13 and underwent emergency surgery, remains in intensive care, said his spokeswoman, Julianne Fisher.

"The senator continues to make progress," she said. "The next step would be rehabilitation, and we hope that would happen within the week."

Mr. Johnson's office has said that his recovery is expected to take several months. He underwent surgery to correct a condition called arteriovenous malformation, involving tangled arteries in his brain.

The senator's doctors said last week that Mr. Johnson was improving, but still needed a ventilator at night to help him breathe. The ventilator has required a tube to be placed down Mr. Johnson's throat, making it impossible for him to talk.

Court ruling

The Supreme Court yesterday upheld the conviction of a man caught trying to enter the country illegally in a case that initially was seen as a test of whether a flawed indictment could violate a defendant's rights.

But in an 8-1 opinion, the court said that the indictment of Juan Resendiz-Ponce itself was sound. The indictment "did not deprive him of any significant protection that the constitutional guarantee of a grand jury was intended to confer," Justice John Paul Stevens said.

Resendiz-Ponce, a Mexican national, sought to persuade the justices that there was a problem so serious in his indictment that it warranted reversing his conviction, the Associated Press reports. Justice Antonin Scalia, the lone dissenter, agreed.

DOJ_NMG_0114685

Resendiz-Ponce was charged with attempting to enter the country illegally after he was arrested at the border crossing at San Luis, Ariz., on June 1, 2003. He presented his cousin's green card and driver's license to U.S. authorities.

But the grand jury indictment that followed fail to set out any specific acts showing how he tried to enter the United States. The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said the omission was so serious that it violated Resendiz-Ponce's constitutional rights and required automatic reversal of the conviction.

Deputy Solicitor General Michael Dreeben, however, told justices at oral argument that this error was harmless because Resendiz-Ponce received a fair trial at which a jury determined that the government proved beyond a reasonable doubt that he had displayed two false pieces of identification in an effort to enter the country.

Familiar name

Vince Morris, a former political reporter for The Washington Times, has signed on as communications director for the Senate office of John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat.

The hiring of Mr. Morris comes as Mr. Kerry gears up for another run for the presidency, according to washingtonpost.com.

Mr. Morris, who also covered politics for the New York Post, more recently served as communications director for former D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams, who left office last week after two terms.

N.O. Unveils Plan To Fight Violence (BRADV)

By Joe Gyan

Baton Rouge Advocate, January 10, 2007

In an unprecedented show of force and unity, the mayor, police chief and district attorney joined other city, business and community leaders Tuesday at the site of the city's first homicide of 2007 to unveil a crime-fighting package that they hope will make a recent spike in violent crime the last.

In response to nine killings so far this year and four in the final three days of 2006, Mayor Ray Nagin and Police Superintendent Warren Riley stopped short of ordering a mandatory curfew but said drug and alcohol checkpoints between the hours of 2 a.m. and 6 a.m. will be stepped up — or tripled.

Other measures outlined by Nagin, Riley and District Attorney Eddie Jordan include expediting the prosecution of murder cases; having deputies from the Orleans Parish Criminal Sheriff's Office assume some routine New Orleans Police Department duties to free up officers to patrol neighborhoods; putting more crime cameras in "hot spots'' around the city and in patrol cars; and implementing a "Court Watchers'' program to offer community support to victims and witnesses in the courtroom and to hold the criminal justice system accountable with respect to violent crime cases.

"We're here to say collectively that one murder is way too many,'' said Nagin, who was flanked by Riley, Jordan, six of seven City Council members, and a host of other community, religious and business leaders, on a Central City street corner where the first of the city's nine homicides this year occurred.

On the federal front, U.S. Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., fired off a letter to President Bush on Tuesday and unveiled her own 10-point anti-crime plan in Washington, saying it is time to "send the message that we will not surrender to lawlessness.''

Nagin, who applauded Landrieu's actions, said the city is aiming an intense, "laser-beam'' focus on the murder issue in the city. Jordan pledged that his office will "aggressively'' and "vigorously'' prosecute murder cases, and Riley said his department will get evidence to Jordan's office in an expedited fashion.

"Enough is enough, but we've said that before. (Now) we're drawing a line in the sand and saying, 'We've had it,'" the mayor said.

City Council president Oliver Thomas was even more direct and passionate.

"Let me say to the thugs out there: This is not your city. And because it's our city, you can't stay here,'' he said. "Check your thug card at the parish line, because we don't want you.''

In both her letter to the president and in her crime-fighting plan, Landrieu asked that more FBI and Drug Enforcement Administration agents be sent to New Orleans. She called for doubling the size of the DEA's High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area Task Force Group and the FBI's Violent Gang Safe Streets Task Force.

DOJ_NMG_0114686

"I believe that it is vital that New Orleans receive additional federal law enforcement personnel to combat the international narcotics cartels establishing roots in the City,'' Landrieu wrote to the president. "As you are aware, we lost over 200,000 homes during the storm. But unlike the circumstance in Mississippi, these homes were not physically obliterated. Rather, they rotted from the inside, but remain standing. There are vast swaths of the City that remain essentially ghost towns of structures that need to be gutted and restored.

"Regrettably, these abandoned neighborhoods are a perfect breeding ground for crime and drug traffickers that can take advantage of the total absence of witnesses to undertake their operations unobserved,'' she added. "Furthermore, crime and gang turf wars have led to shocking incidences of violent crime. Tragically, this spiraling violence has taken 12 lives in less than two weeks.''

Landrieu's 10-point plan also calls for speeding up remaining reconstruction projects for the police department and other criminal justice facilities in the area; reactivating a drug trafficking intelligence-sharing program between the Department of Defense, the Louisiana National Guard and Louisiana State Police; building a state-of-the-art crime surveillance system in the city, including cameras in patrol cars; and requiring FEMA to "fully cooperate with investigative inquiries from the NOPD and regional law enforcement agencies.''

The latter item would make the Federal Emergency Management Agency turn over records of residents of its trailers and trailer parks to New Orleans police and other agencies investigating crime in the area, a Landrieu spokesman said.

"It's time to get tough on crime. Not get tough with words, but get tough with action,'' Landrieu said. "We need to work together at all levels of government to send the message that we will not surrender to lawlessness.

"In the wake of hurricanes Katrina and Rita and the catastrophic collapse of the federal levee system, our law enforcement community has had to contend with crime with one hand tied behind its back. This situation cannot continue, and I will do everything in my power to halt the unimaginable crime in New Orleans.''

The latest violent crime spike has come despite the presence of about 300 National Guard troops and 60 state troopers who were brought in last June to help patrol the streets because of a surge in killings.

The city had a 60-year low 161 murders last year, but the population was less than half of its pre-Katrina level of about 460,000. The police force also is down from its pre-storm total of 1,700 officers to about 1,400 — but that number includes about 100 officers on leave for injuries or illness.

Riley said more officers on administrative duty will be brought from behind their desks and put on the streets to help officers already on the streets. The chief also said he wants to beef up neighborhood watch groups, which stood at 300 before Katrina but now come in at 100.

Landrieu Wants Federal Crime Fighting Help (WGNO)

By Paul Murphy, ABC26 News

WGNO-TV, ABC 26, New Orleans, January 10, 2007

Feds Say Crime Wave Requires More Than Law Enforcement

NEW ORLEANS, LA — Nine murders in the first eight days of 2007 are keeping law enforcers busy in New Orleans.

The killings come on the heels of four murders in the last three days of 2006.

The murder rate in the Big Easy is now four and a half times the national average.

"There is no doubt that this crime wave is putting a damper on our aggressive efforts to rebuild and re-image the city and to encourage not only residents to return, but tourists to continue to come," said Senator Mary Landrieu/D-Louisiana.

Senator Landrieu announced a 10-point plan to fight crime in the New Orleans region.

She is asking for additional federal dollars to help rebuild criminal justice facilities like NOPD headquarters and the local police academy.

The senator is also requesting 60-million dollars to help rebuild the police department.

"I urge the President and the Department of Justice to make an emergency grant to the city under the emergency cops program," said Landrieu.

DOJ_NMG_0114687

Senator Landrieu is also asking the Justice Department to send additional drug enforcement and FBI agents to New Orleans.

FBI Special Agent in Charge Jim Bernazzani says those plans are already in the works.

"Washington has committed to do a national canvass relative to agents who have homicide investigative experience," said Bernazzani. "To come to New Orleans on temporary status for about 90 to 120 days to work as a stop gap measure until we get another squad down here."

The United States Attorney in New Orleans Jim Letten says the city must also address issues outside of law enforcement.

"Fixing our school system and building the best system possible and rebuilding this economy," said Letten. "We have to create education and opportunities for our youth if we're going to get a handle on this thing for the mid and long term."

"These individuals are a product of institutional dysfunction, and educational system that didn't educate, aspects of a state judicial system that failed to meet out consequences for criminal activity, levels of corruption that drove legitimate business out of the city, thus denying these people their jobs and opportunity," said Bernazzani. "When you add crack cocaine and the AK-47 you have New Orleans today."

Senator Landrieu also wants the government to force FEMA to turn over records of people in it's trailers and trailer parks.

She claims investigators need that information to help hunt down criminals and potential witnesses.

The ACLU strongly objects.

"They shouldn't have to give up their privacy rights to receive a benefit from the government," said ACLU state director Joe Cook. "It's subject to abuse as we have seen."

Here is a complete list of the Landrieu plan:

1. Expedite remaining reconstruction projects for the NOPD and other regional criminal justice facilities.
2. Increase the number of DEA and FBI agents in New Orleans.
3. Reactivate the Gulf State Initiative, a drug trafficking intelligence-sharing program between the Dept. of Defense, and the Louisiana National Guard and State Police.
4. Build a state-of-the-art crime surveillance system for the City of New Orleans, including cameras in patrol cars.
5. Issue an emergency COPS grant to parishes affected by hurricanes Katrina and Rita.
6. Release $13 million in Social Services Block Grant funds to provide drug rehabilitation services in New Orleans.
7. Build a state-of-the-art police academy.
8. Provide an additional $25 million to the Gulf Coast Regional Community Policing Institute for NOPD and regional police training and professional development.
9. Request a comprehensive study of the post-hurricane criminal justice system in Louisiana.
10. Require FEMA to fully cooperate with investigative inquires from the NOPD and regional law enforcement agencies.

RECOVERY TOUR Laura Bush Visits School, Cafe, Museum (NOTP)

By Leslie Williams

New Orleans Times-Picayune, January 10, 2007

Laura Bush entered the brightly lighted theater of the Louisiana Children's Museum in the Warehouse District on Tuesday afternoon and without hesitation picked up a drumstick and a Senegalese songba drum, joining dozens of New Orleans-area elementary school students in a rousing performance of a funga, an African welcome song.

The president's wife smiled broadly as she pounded the drum and studied the faces of the children, who were among the many she met on a three-stop tour, her 11th post-Katrina visit to the city.

