The visit to the museum, intended to highlight its Play Helps program, was the last of the stopovers that began in the morning with a pep talk to more than 200 students assembled in the cafeteria at St. Rosalie Elementary School in Harvey.

Her tour also included a lunch of catfish and greens and conversation at Cafe Reconcile, a job-training restaurant in the heart of Central City.

Job program lauded

Bush's visit was not without reference to the city's recent crime wave.

She mentioned an antiviolence program used in Chicago that is based on the notion that violence is taught.

"If you grow up in a neighborhood where violence is common, you think it's normal," Bush said. "Because violence is taught, it can be unlearned.

"But I think people in the community really need to speak out and do whatever they can to get the message across that it's not acceptable," she said.

Bush said the three stops during her tour of the New Orleans area "really had to do with what we can do to help young people . . . what we can do to help rebuild the community."

Judge Sends Public Defender To Jail (NYT)

By Christopher Drew

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 9 — The chief judge in the city's juvenile courts had a top public defender arrested Tuesday in a bizarre escalation of a fight over changes in the city's troubled program for representing indigent defendants.

The judge, David Bell, was upset that no public defender was in his courtroom when he was ready to start this morning, and he drove to the defender's office and waited outside for Stephen Singer, the chief of trials, to arrive.

The judge took Mr. Singer to his courtroom, where he found him in contempt for not being prepared to provide representation and ordered him jailed for 36 days, three days for each of the 12 items on Tuesday's docket. Mr. Singer then spent about five hours in jail before a state appeals court stayed the order.

The events were the latest in a series of confrontations between judges and the public defender's office, which has long been overwhelmed and went broke after Hurricane Katrina.

A new board has shifted how the office uses its 30 lawyers to try to provide more thorough representation on the most serious cases. But the changes have made the day-to-day coverage more spotty, and the criminal court judges also have threatened to hold the office in contempt over the problems.

After his release, Mr. Singer said the dispute with Judge Bell arose because the defender assigned to his court was on her honeymoon, and her replacement was trying to handle four courtrooms at once.

Judge Bell did not respond to a request for comment. But Mr. Singer said he and the judge had a more congenial meeting about the problems late in the day.

Ex-Interior Deputy A Target In Abramoff Probe (WP)

By Susan Schmidt

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

Federal prosecutors have notified a former deputy secretary of the interior, J. Steven Griles, that he is a target in the public corruption investigation of Jack Abramoff's lobbying activities, sources knowledgeable about the probe said.

The sources, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said that among the possible criminal charges being investigated is whether Griles made false statements to the Senate Indian Affairs Committee in 2005 about job discussions Abramoff initiated while Griles was deputy secretary. Griles's attorneys did not return calls seeking comment yesterday.

Justice Department prosecutors met with Griles on Friday to outline possible charges. The investigation has examined donations made by Abramoff's Indian tribal clients to an environmental advocacy group run by Italia Federici, who was involved with Griles socially, the sources said. Also under scrutiny are donations made to Federici's group by energy and mining companies, the sources said.

E-mails released last year by the Senate Indian Affairs Committee showed that Griles had more than half a dozen contacts with Abramoff or with Federici, head of the Council of Republicans for Environmental Advocacy, who was working as the lobbyist's go-between to Griles. Griles has said that he never tried to intercede on behalf of Abramoff's clients.

The Indian Affairs Committee, in a report issued after a series of investigative hearings, said that further inquiry "appears warranted" into the "veracity" of Federici's public testimony. Federici's testimony before the committee included discussions of her relationship with Abramoff, his tribal clients and Griles.

Federici declined to comment for this article yesterday. Current and former Interior Department officials have appeared in recent weeks at the federal courthouse in Washington where a federal grand jury has been investigating Abramoff's dealings.

With the prospect of Griles's indictment, a senior Justice Department official -- who Interior employees said has been dating Griles -- tendered her resignation this week.

Sue Ellen Wooldridge, assistant attorney general for environment and natural resources for the past year, submitted a letter of resignation Monday saying that she intends to return to the private sector, a Justice Department official said yesterday.

Wooldridge served as Interior Department solicitor and as deputy chief of staff to then-Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton before moving to Justice in November 2005. Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said that Wooldridge would not be available for comment about her departure. "Sue Ellen sent the resignation letter in of her own volition. This is a decision that she made," Magnuson said.

Griles was a controversial figure at Interior, strongly criticized by the department's inspector general for maintaining ties to energy and mining companies that were once his lobbying clients.

Yesterday, another former Interior Department employee was sentenced to two years' probation and fined $1,000 for failing to report gifts that he received from Abramoff. Roger G. Stillwell accepted hundreds of dollars worth of football and concert tickets from Abramoff, who at the time was lobbying for the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands. Stillwell worked in the Interior Department's Insular Affairs Office, which handles issues involving the island government.

Prosecutors say lobbyist-government investigation is still ongoing

WASHINGTON - A former Interior Department official linked to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff was sentenced Tuesday in federal court to two years probation and a fine of $1000. The official, Roger Stillwell, pleaded guilty to a single misdemeanor count of filing a false financial statement with the department.

Magistrate Judge Alan Kay disregarded a recommendation by both the Department of Justice and Stillwell's attorney for a lesser sentence of six months probation.

Judge Kay said that Stillwell's actions amounted to a "serious violation considering his position" and his years of government service. Kay admonished Stillwell saying there is "no such thing as a free lunch, particularly as provided by lobbyists."

The charges against Stillwell are the first connected to the Abramoff scandal to touch the Interior Department. The charges also mark an expansion of the government's investigation into the influence peddling scandal involving the convicted lobbyist. Prosecutors acknowledged in court that there is still an ongoing investigation involving Abramoff and his contacts with the Department of Interior.

Stillwell, a former desk officer for the Commonwealth of the Northern Marianas - a lucrative Abramoff client - acknowledged receiving four tickets to a Redskins football game and two tickets to a Simon and Garfunkle concert in Washington - all paid for by Abramoff - which Stillwell did not report.

He addressed the court saying that he took full responsibility for his failure to report the gifts Abramoff provided. Stillwell said that it was "never my intention to violate the law." And, he said the, "consequences of my actions have devastated my professional career."

Court papers indicate, "Stillwell well knew, the document falsely certified that he did not receive reportable gifts from a prohibited source."

Stillwell is 67 years old and is now a retired Interior Department employee.

Northern Marianas connection

Abramoff's team allegedly cultivated Stillwell at the Interior Department. Prosecutors said Stillwell provided Abramoff with some non-public information but the materials were "not classified" and the documents were not a quid pro quo for the gifts Abramoff provided.

DOJ_NMG_0114690

But, in a report released in July, the Department of Justice's Inspector General Glenn Fine referred one matter to the FBI and his counterpart at the Interior Department for further investigation: the possibility that an Interior Department official leaked to Abramoff a post-9/11 security review of the Northern Marianas that recommended extending federal immigration laws to the islands. There is no indication in the DOJ report that Stillwell is connected to the continuing investigation at the Department of Interior.

The Interior Department's Inspector General also announced last year that it was investigating any contacts Abramoff may have had with officials there, but has yet to issue a report on its probe.

Abramoff made extensive efforts to build relationships with Interior officials, particularly J. Stephen Griles, former deputy secretary at the department. Griles denied any wrongdoing in his dealings with Abramoff during an appearance before the Senate Indian Affairs Committee last year. Griles is now a partner in the lobbying firm Lundquist, Nethercutt & Griles.

Abramoff also tried to place his allies in key positions at Interior, according to e-mails released by the Indian Affairs Committee, focusing on the Bureau of Insular Affairs.

'In awe' of Abramoff

The Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands was important to Abramoff who was hired to lobby Congress to keep open an important trade exemption. That exemption allowed garment makers there to put "Made in the U.S.A." labels in their clothing. Human rights groups argue this has fostered an exploitive working environment in the commonwealth's booming garment industry.

A former aide to Tom DeLay pleaded guilty to conspiracy and corruption charges involving the Marianas. While working in the Delay's leadership office, Tony Rudy helped Abramoff with one of his Marianas clients. According to an internal audit by Commonwealth authorities, the Marianas paid Abramoff more than $7 million in lobbying fees from 1996 to 2001. Rudy's plea agreement did not implicate DeLay in any illegal activities. Rudy has yet to be sentenced.

Stillwell told Mother Jones magazine last year that he was "in awe" of Abramoff's ability to kill a House bill back in 2000 that would have imposed federal immigration policy on the CNMI, one of his most lucrative of his lobbying clients. Abramoff "stopped it dead," said Stillwell. "It could not have been an easy job."

Investigation continues

To date, the investigation has yielded guilty pleas from six defendants, including Abramoff and public officials such as former congressman Bob Ney, and his former chief of staff Neil Volz, former DeLay aide Tony Rudy, and Stillwell.

The investigation has also resulted in the conviction by jury trial of the former chief of staff for the General Services Administration David Safavian who is awaiting sentencing pending appeal of his conviction.

In November, Abramoff began serving a 70-month prison sentence for pleaded guilty to defrauding banks of $23 million in his purchase of the SunCruz casino cruise line six years ago in Florida. Abramoff pleaded guilty in Washington to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials. He is awaiting sentencing in the influence peddling case and is continuing his cooperation with government investigators.

Just before his surrender to a federal prison in Cumberland, MD in November, Abramoff sent friends an e-mail calling the political scandal, "this nightmare," and predicting things were about to get worse.

"This nightmare has gone on for almost three years so far and I expect we are not even half way through," Abramoff wrote.

Former congressman Bob Ney is scheduled to be sentenced later this month. The Justice Department has recommended 27 months of imprisonment.

Judge Rejects Media Request (NSDY/AP)

News organizations had asked that recordings of testimony and arguments be released for broadcast. U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton denied the request, saying the only recording of court proceedings is done by the court stenographer to help ensure an accurate transcript.

"This recording, however, is produced by the court reporter's personal equipment and is not the official record of the proceedings," Walton said. "It is therefore not available to the public."

The Supreme Court releases audio recordings of arguments in major cases, and lower federal courts have started to follow the Supreme Court's lead, lawyers for the news organizations said in court documents.

Broadcasting court proceedings -- along with commentary and analysis -- could prejudice jurors and lead to an unfair trial, Walton said.

The trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby is to begin Jan. 16. He is accused of perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI about his conversations with journalists regarding CIA officer Valerie Plame.

Cheney is expected to testify for his former aide, and other witnesses are expected to include NBC Washington bureau chief Tim Russert.

The organizations that filed the request are ABC, The Associated Press, Bloomberg News, CNN, CBS, Dow Jones, E.W. Scripps, the Hearst Corp., the Los Angeles Times, the McClatchey Co., NBC, National Public Radio, USA Today, The Washington Post, the American Society of Newspaper Editors, the Newspaper Association of America, the Radio-Television News Directors Association, the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press and the Society of Professional Journalists.

Leak Probes Stymied, FBI Memos Show (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, January 10, 2007

A lack of cooperation from one or more intelligence agencies led the FBI to abandon several recent criminal investigations into leaks of classified information to the press, records obtained by The New York Sun indicate.

In January 2005, a top FBI official asked the Justice Department to close three pending leak inquiries because the "victim agency" repeatedly refused to assist the probes. The FBI's contact at the agency "has been uncooperative with the investigating field office and on numerous occasions failed to return phone calls or provide the case agent with requested documents pertinent to the investigation," the memo said, adding that the agency "cancelled personnel interviews, security briefings and meetings at the last minute and failed to reschedule for another time."

"None of the cases can proceed without the cooperation of the substantive unit at the victim agency, therefore the FBI considers all logical leads covered," the FBI official wrote. Within days or weeks, the cases were closed.

The memo, which was among more than 300 pages of leak investigation files released to the Sun this week under the Freedom of Information Act, was heavily redacted by the FBI, which removed the name of the writer, the identity of the intelligence agency involved, and nearly all details about the alleged leaks.

The documents provide a rare window into the Bush administration's effort to combat leaks of classified information that the administration has said are damaging national security in wartime. "At some point in time, it would be helpful if we can find somebody inside our government who is leaking materials, clearly against the law, that they be held to account," the president said at a press conference last month. "Perhaps the best way to make sure people don't leak classified documents is that there be a consequence for doing so."

However the records suggest that reticence on the part of intelligence agencies sometimes contributes to the futility of leak probes, and that, at least when it comes to leak investigations, the much-vaunted full cooperation between the FBI and other intelligence agencies after September 11 has yet to come to fruition. "It turns out you never can find the leaker," Mr. Bush lamented.

In an exchange of e-mails in September 2005, FBI agents handling a leak investigation codenamed "May Apple," complained about difficulties in getting basic information about who saw classified documents key to the case. A meeting was planned with agency lawyers to discuss requests that were pending for a year. "So close it if they stonewall him tomorrow and/or we learn the distribution list is too great, right? I bet the latter will at least point us to closing even if they are totally cooperative," one agent wrote.

A few weeks later, the head of the FBI's leak-sleuthing section, Michael Donner, wrote to the Justice Department's counterespionage chief, John Dion, asking to close the probe. The FBI's Washington field office "concluded that the investigation had languished due to repeated requests for information…that have not been fulfilled in a timely manner," Mr. Donner wrote. "Due to noncompliance from the victim agency and wide dissemination of the classified information, the FBI was unable to determine the source of the leak." In all of the released records, the FBI deleted the name of the agency or agencies about which the investigators complained. However, a former Justice Department official said the vast majority of leak probes originate at the CIA. In the "May Apple" case, references in the files to top-secret cables and to an Office of General Counsel also point to Langley, as the government's other main user of cables, the State Department, does not have a general counsel's post.

A CIA spokeswoman, Michele Neff, flatly denied that her agency has resisted the FBI's efforts to hunt down leakers. "That's simply not the case," she said yesterday. "Why would we not want to get to the bottom of the leaks? The Office of General Counsel works closely with the Department of Justice on investigations regarding unauthorized disclosures."

Ms. Neff pointed to a November interview in which the current CIA director, General Michael Hayden, said recent leaking has caused serious harm to his agency's effectiveness and to individuals. "When that takes place our ability to protect both the security and the freedom of the nation is reduced," General Hayden told WTOP radio. "I can say as a matter of first principle that the unauthorized disclosure of classified information has actually led to the deaths of individuals."

A Justice Department spokesman, Dean Boyd, said it is uncommon for leak investigators to encounter resistance from their counterparts in the intelligence community. "Generally, we feel we receive excellent cooperation from the intelligence agencies and other victimized agencies in leak investigations," he said.

Ms. Neff and Mr. Boyd said they could not comment on specific cases, such as the ones where the agents reported a lack of cooperation. Mr. Dion, the Justice Department official who received the memos detailing the difficulties, and the current head of the CIA's Office of General Counsel, John Rizzo, declined requests to be interviewed for this article.

Mr. Donner, the FBI official who oversaw some of the probes described in the memos, retired last year. In an interview yesterday, he also declined to discuss specific cases, but acknowledged some instances where agencies were not enthusiastic about helping the FBI. "They know if they do not give us more information or refuse to, the case will not push forward. They'd rather have it go away or have it dropped," the former agent said. Many of the leak cases are initiated by the CIA, which sends the Justice Department a standard, 11-item questionnaire. Asked why an agency would refer a leak for investigation and then decline to provide necessary information, Mr. Donner said, "They have a disclosure potentially of a violation of federal law. They're obliged to provide it or refer it to the FBI." He said resistance may sometimes be because of legitimate concerns about further dissemination of sensitive data.

According to the records, the main reason for dropping leak investigations is that the classified information in question was so widely distributed that it is difficult to focus in on suspects. Mr. Donner said the current drive to share intelligence information made his job even harder. "I'm an old-school guy. A lot of people don't 'need-to-know,'" he said.

Mr. Donner, who helped crack some high-profile spy cases, such as that of Aldrich Ames, said the leak chasing was frustrating. "I wish we had better success in this area," he said. "This stuff is a wilderness of mirrors."

The friction apparent in the records obtained by the Sun calls into question assurances by senior government officials that law enforcement and the intelligence community are working hand-inglove to ferret out leaks. In an unusual op-ed piece published in the New York Times in February 2006, the-then director of the CIA, Porter Goss, decried illegal leaks and promised that close coordination to eradicate them was underway. The Justice Department "is committed to working with us to investigate these cases aggressively," Mr. Goss wrote. "In addition, I have instituted measures within the agency to further safeguard the integrity of classified data."

Mr. Goss took over in September 2004, months before the FBI's moves to abandon the probes. However, it is unclear how much control he was able to establish over the agency. The former congressman and his staff clashed repeatedly with veteran CIA officials, some of whom quit. A top aide to Mr. Goss, Patrick Murray, who once oversaw an anti-leak task force for the Justice Department, reportedly crusaded against leaks at Langley. In May 2006, Mr. Goss abruptly resigned, offering no public reason for his departure. A former prosecutor who has accused career CIA officials of waging a leak campaign to undermine President Bush, Joseph diGenova, said yesterday that he suspected the resistance to the investigations was part of that effort. He also questioned why the leak cases were dropped.

"Stopping a leak investigation, assuming it's a serious leak, just because the victim agency won't cooperate is the most absurd thing I've ever heard in my life," Mr. diGenova said. "A grand jury subpoena should issue….It seems to me there should be some sort of Congressional investigation of those instances."

The disclosed records also suggest that many investigations into leaks of top-secret data are abandoned without pursuing some obvious, if intrusive, investigative techniques, such as seeking testimony or phone records from members of the press. Other components of the Justice Department have recently used those tactics in less sensitive cases, such as leaks about planned federal raids of Islamic charities and about a grand jury investigating steroid use in baseball.

"There is a stunning lack of balance in the way all these cases are approached," Mr. diGenova said. The FBI files were released in response to a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit brought in July by this reporter. In November, a federal judge in San Francisco, citing the intense public interest in leak investigations, ordered the government to answer the requests within 30 days. The judge, Maxine Chesney, recently extended the deadline to April for some of the agencies involved.

Last month, the FBI told Judge Chesney that 22 of 94 files believed to relate to recent press leaks were missing with no indication of who had removed them.

Federal Prosecutor To Help Israeli Investigation (MR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), January 10, 2007

A federal judge in Mobile last week appointed Assistant U.S. Attorney George May to assist the Israeli government with a criminal investigation that touches southern Alabama.

As a commissioner of the court, May will gather information under a treaty between the United States and Israel that commits law enforcement officials to helping their counterparts when investigations cross international borders.

Chief U.S. District Judge Ginny Granade's order empowers May to collect documents and subpoena witnesses. He will certify and submit the evidence he gathers to the U.S. Department of Justice's Office of International Affairs.

The judge's order states only that it was prompted by a request by Israel. May, the anti-terrorism coordinator at the U.S. attorney's office in Mobile, said the probe relates to allegations involving bogus diplomas.

He said the Alabama connection is a small piece of a much larger investigation that also involves other parts of the country. Citing the beginning stages of the investigation, he declined to discuss the case in detail. He said the Israeli government has sought help from federal prosecutors in other districts.

May said he does not believe the targets of the probe live in Alabama.

The United States has signed 57 mutual legal assistance treaties, although not all have been ratified by the Senate, according to a the Justice Department.

Bryan Sierra, a spokesman for the department, said most of the pacts are bilateral agreements with other countries, but others involve international organizations. For instance, the United States has a treaty with the Organization of American States, a collection of 35 countries in the Western Hemisphere, he said.

Sierra said the Justice Department does not keep statistics on the number of requests made by foreign governments, and he added that he could not even estimate how frequently a treaty is invoked.

May said it is quite unusual for smaller districts, such as southern Alabama, to be involved. He said in larger districts with a more cosmopolitan flavor, such as New York, it's probably far more common.

May said the mechanics of the investigation -- at least his part of it -- will work much like an attorney taking depositions in a civil case. He will have the power to subpoena witnesses, and a court reporter will be present during questioning to make transcripts.

May said he does not expect his duties to take long -- a couple of months at most. He said he is unsure exactly what rules apply if witnesses refuse to cooperate. He said he imagines they could be held in contempt of court.

Of course, if a witness were to invoke his rights on the Fifth Amendment to remain silent, he presumably would enjoy the same rights as any other witness in a U.S. court proceeding.

"That could be a mixed issue," he said.

May said this is the first time he has been asked to assist a foreign government but added that he is looking forward to the challenge.

"It'll be interesting. It will be something a little bit different," he said. "We have a treaty with Israel, and I'm glad to help out. And I'm sure they'd do the same for us."

Former Brick Twp. Mayor Admits Taking Bribes (NSL)

By Guy Sterling And Maryann Spoto, Star-Ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger, January 10, 2007

Faces prison, fine for accepting cash from developer in exchange for project approval

A mayor who presided over a period of substantial growth in Brick Township yesterday admitted taking more than $5,000 in bribes in exchange for helping a developer gain approval for a number of unspecified projects.

Joseph C. Scarpelli, 67, told a federal judge he accepted the bribes over five years, ending in late 2003, and that one was $500 in cash slipped to him in Ocean County in April of that year. The developer was not named, and no other details were supplied.

"Did you accept these cash payments from the developer knowing that you were not due the money in your capacity as mayor?" U.S. District Judge Susan Wigenton asked Scarpelli.

"Yes," he replied without elaboration at the hearing in Newark.

Scarpelli also acknowledged that, as mayor, he interacted with other local officials, including members of the township council, planning board and board of adjustment, and enjoyed authority over budget appropriations and contract awards.

His plea to a single count of "extortion under the color of official right" came a month after he left his mayor's post in the Ocean County township after 12 years, and amid rumors he'd been caught up in a lengthy federal investigation of public officials at the Shore.

Scarpelli faces a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison, but Marc Larkins, the assistant U.S. attorney assigned to the case, said the actual term will fall somewhere between 24 and 30 months under federal sentencing guidelines.

The Brick resident also could be fined $250,000 at his scheduled sentencing May 29. Until then, he will remain free on a $50,000 unsecured appearance bond. The count against Scarpelli was contained in a pre-indictment accusation known as an information.

Court papers provided few details about the bribes, and law enforcement agents were equally quiet after court yesterday.

PROBE CONTINUES In addition to declining to say anything about the developer, projects or approvals involved in the corruption scheme, they also would not say how much Scarpelli had received in total or how many illegal payments there had been.

NEWARK - Former Middletown Committeeman Raymond O'Grady lost his appeal on Friday and is now scheduled to begin his 43-month jail sentence Jan. 22.

O'Grady was convicted in June on five corruption-related charges as part of the FBI's Operation Bid Rig investigation. The one-time director of the Monmouth County Central Motor Pool was found guilty of accepting at least $8,000 in cash bribes in exchange for official favors through his position in county government.

"The judge set a surrender date because of the Third Circuit Court decision," said Michael Drewniak, spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Newark.

O'Grady's attorney, Kevin Roe, promised an appeal after his client's October conviction. Roe argued that O'Grady's trial was unfair because of the suicide attempt of the FBI's star witness after only one day on the stand. Anthony Palughi, a former friend of O'Grady's, wore a wire for the FBI in order to try to avoid jail time of his own, Palughi said during the trial.

"Without much being heard, a single judge granted it," Drewniak said on Monday, noting appeals are often heard in this way. "Now the Third Circuit Court has denied his motion pending his appeal."

Tape Shows Williams Taking Cash (MCA)

By Lawrence Buser

Memphis Commercial Appeal, January 10, 2007

Was $1,500 payment a bribe or only a business dividend?

A federal court jury Tuesday watched a secretly recorded videotape showing a former Shelby County official accepting $1,500 in cash from an informant that authorities say was a bribe.

The money -- 15 $100 bills -- was supplied by the FBI, as was the tiny camera hidden in a briefcase.

Defendant Calvin Williams, the county commission's former top aide, says he believed the payment was a legitimate business dividend due him from his associate, Tim Willis.

The tape was made on April 24, 2003, at the Mud Island residence of the FBI informant, Willis, who was helping authorities document an alleged payoff he said Williams wanted for helping obtain a county grant for a community development project.

Throughout that tape and two others made that month, Williams repeatedly tells Willis in expletive-filled conversations that half of the money will be given to then-County Commissioner Dr. Cleo Kirk, who was head of the commission's budget commission.

"I'm going to go ahead and drop his cheese off," said Williams, who discourages Willis from accompanying him. "You'll spook him (Kirk) quick."

On another recorded conversation, Williams tells Willis: "You know what I'm going to do with that $1,500? I'm going to take everybody out for drinks."

Kirk, who has been subpoenaed as a witness by both the prosecution and the defense, was seated outside the courtroom throughout most of the day. He declined to talk to reporters.

Williams is accused of using -- or claiming to use -- his influence with the County Commission to secure a $100,000 county grant for the Glenview Neighborhood Development Partners Inc. to provide low-interest loans for home improvements.

Federal prosecutor Tim DiScenza told jurors it is irrelevant whether Kirk knew about or accepted a bribe.

"Calvin Williams saw (the Glenview grant request) as an opportunity to get some money for himself because of his official position," DiScenza said in his opening statement. "This trial will be about his demand and his attempt to utilize that position to gain some money for himself."

His attorney, federal public defender Doris Randle-Holt, said Willis was a partner with Williams in several businesses and that the $1,500 represented Williams' 30 percent share of a $5,000 media services contract Willis had with Glenview to help win the grant.

Willis testified, however, that they shared office space in the 100 North Main Building, but that their business enterprises were completely separate.

Randle-Holt noted that Willis was paid $6,000 a month by the FBI for more than two years for his cooperation and that he had never been charged for admittedly submitting false invoices in 2001 when he had a consulting contact at Juvenile Court.

"You will come in here and say anything today to stay out of jail, won't you?" said Randle-Holt.

"No," replied Willis, who was less animated and chipper than he was on the stand in last summer's bribery trial of former state senator Roscoe Dixon.

The case, which is part of the FBI's broader Tennessee Waltz undercover public corruption investigation, is being tried before U.S. Dist. Court Judge Samuel H. Mays Jr. Testimony resumes this morning.

WMC-TV, January 10, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114696

In his letter, Dixon - who was sentenced to five years behind bars - describes overcrowding conditions which have, according to his letter, left him in solitary confinement until space becomes available. He has "to eat the same food as those who are in 'the hole,'" he wrote.

UC Riverside Official Is Accused Of Bribery (LAT)

By Sara Lin, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

FBI says Theodore Chiu solicited payments from an Irvine contractor constructing a building on campus.

Federal agents arrested a UC Riverside administrator Tuesday on suspicion of bribing a general contractor in charge of building the school's new psychology building, authorities said.

Theodore Chiu, 53, of Riverside is accused of soliciting a $50,000 bribe from Irvine contractor FTR International Inc. last Halloween.

Chiu allegedly asked for the payment when the company's president, Nizar Katbi, raised concerns about the $35-million project, including Chiu's choice of a subcontractor, according to an FBI affidavit filed in federal court.

In exchange for the alleged bribe, Chiu agreed to sign a change order that would modify the university's original agreement with the company, the affidavit said.

As an associate director in UC Riverside's Office of Design and Construction, Chiu managed several construction projects.

Katbi agreed to the proposal but told federal agents before giving Chiu his first payment. Katbi cooperated with investigators by recording his meetings and conversations with Chiu, said Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles.

During a series of meetings, Chiu allegedly received $18,000 in bribes from Katbi, the affidavit said.

University officials said they weren't aware of the investigation until Chiu's arrest Tuesday morning.

Kris Lovekin, the university's director of media relations, said she didn't know of any problems university officials had with Chiu during his 19 years in the school's design office. His salary is $108,000 a year.

Construction of the school's psychology building began in April and is scheduled for completion in June 2008.

At a November meeting between Katbi and Chiu, which federal investigators recorded, the contractor offered to write Chiu a check. But Chiu demanded cash because a check would be traceable. If Katbi didn't pay, Chiu said, he would make life difficult for the contractor and his company, according to the affidavit.

Chiu also told Katbi that he didn't like to handle more than one deal at a time, which Katbi took to mean Chiu might be soliciting bribes from other general contractors on UC Riverside projects, documents show.

Chiu initially demanded the bribe in two installments — $20,000 before Thanksgiving and $30,000 before Christmas. But when Katbi said he was having trouble getting the money, Chiu agreed to accept smaller increments of $7,000. When Katbi was slow paying in December, Chiu withheld his authorization of funds that Katbi needed to pay subcontractors. After Katbi delivered a bribe, the funds were released, the affidavit said.

Chiu is expected to appear at 11 a.m. today for a bail hearing in U.S. District Court in Santa Ana. If convicted, Chiu faces a possible sentence of 10 years in federal prison.

Bklyn Judge Nixes Fed Trial Bid By FBI Agent Accused Of Mob Ties (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, January 10, 2007

NEW YORK (AP) _ A former FBI agent accused of helping a ruthless mobster plot gangland slayings in Brooklyn more than a decade ago won't go to trial in federal court, a judge ruled Tuesday.

Attorneys for R. Lindley DeVecchio had argued his case belonged in federal court because there _ unlike in state court _ they would be allowed to argue that he was immune from criminal charges arising from his duties as a federal agent.

The court "concludes that removal is not warranted because it lacks subject-matter jurisdiction," U.S. District Judge Frederic Block wrote in a decision issued in federal court in Brooklyn.

The Brooklyn district attorney's office had fought to keep the case in state court after charging DeVecchio last year with four counts of murder in what it billed as one of the worst law enforcement corruption cases in U.S. history.

DeVecchio, 65, pleaded not guilty to charges he collected weekly bribes in exchange for feeding classified information to an informant _ Colombo crime family captain Gregory Scarpa Sr. _ during a bloody civil war within the family during the 1980s and '90s. Prosecutors say the tips helped Scarpa knock off rivals and suspected cooperators, including a girlfriend of the Colombo consigliere.

DeVecchio remains free on $1 million bond. If convicted, he could face up to 25 years to life in prison.

Scarpa was convicted of murder and racketeering and died in prison.

Brooklyn: Case Against Ex-F.B.I. Agent Can Proceed (NYT)

By Michael Brick

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

A retired F.B.I. supervisor accused of aiding in Mafia murders is not immune from prosecution in state court, a Federal District Court judge ruled yesterday. The retired agent, R. Lindley DeVecchio, 66, was charged with four counts of murder last March in State Supreme Court. Prosecutors say Mr. DeVecchio, who was responsible for managing confidential informants, played a role in four killings between 1984 and 1992 by giving information to the Colombo crime family. In April, Mr. DeVecchio's lawyers sought to remove the case to federal court, arguing that the evidence was subject to federal grants of immunity and that his defense was based on federal law. But Judge Frederic Block ruled that Mr. DeVecchio had not presented a valid argument.

SAN FRANCISCO Gang Case Defense Can't Get Witness List (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, January 10, 2007

Federal prosecutors in the death penalty trial of alleged members of a violent San Francisco gang don't have to give defense lawyers police reports that identify witnesses before the trial, a federal appeals court ruled Monday.

The 2-1 decision by the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco overturned a ruling last year by the trial judge, who ordered prosecutors to release police reports on the witnesses, including their identities. U.S. District Judge William Alsup had also said prosecutors would be prohibited from calling witnesses whose names they refused to provide to the defense.

Prosecutors say they fear for the witnesses' safety if they are identified, citing the killing in May of a witness who had testified in another San Francisco murder case. Defense lawyers and Alsup said prospective witnesses would be protected by orders prohibiting the defense from revealing the information to outsiders.

A federal grand jury issued racketeering indictments in October 2005 against 12 alleged members of the Down Below Gang, which authorities say has terrorized the Sunnydale public housing complex in Visitacion Valley since the late 1990s. Prosecutors say the defendants dealt drugs, toted guns and murdered seven people, including a 7-week-old baby.

Eight defendants pleaded guilty last month to racketeering and conspiracy charges that carry prison sentences of up to 23 years. Of the remaining defendants, one is a fugitive and has not been publicly identified. The others are Emile Fort and Edgar Diaz, who could both be sentenced to death if convicted, and Terrell Jackson, whose case is still being evaluated by the U.S. Justice Department for possible death penalty charges. Their trial is scheduled to start in September.

Prosecutors have deleted witnesses' names from San Francisco police reports supplied to the defense, and said they would not identify any witnesses until the Friday before they testified. Alsup had ruled that prosecutors were seeking an unfair advantage.

But the appeals court majority, led by Judge Susan Graber, said the police reports were exempt from disclosure under a federal rule that allows prosecutors to withhold evidence gathered by government agents.

Defense lawyer Michael Satris said the ruling "leaves us severely hampered in our ability to prepare for the case."

Prosecutors Expect Grand Jury To Reach Duncan Decision Soon (AP)

By Shannon Dininny, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 10, 2007

BOISE, Idaho -- A decision on whether to indict convicted murderer Joseph Duncan III on federal charges for kidnapping two north Idaho children and slaying one of them could come in the next few weeks, the U.S. attorney's office said Tuesday.

In the meantime, the federal agency that secures prisoners said it would recommend that the trial be held in Boise, rather than Coeur d'Alene, if a grand jury indicts Duncan.

Duncan, 43, drew national attention in 2005 with the kidnapping of then 8-year-old Shasta Groene and her 9-year-old brother, Dylan.

A Tacoma, Wash., native, Duncan had been living in Fargo, N.D., and was on the run from a child molestation charge in Minnesota when he drove past the Groene home on Interstate 90 east of Coeur d'Alene and spotted the children playing outside. Duncan stalked the family for several days and, on May 16, entered the home, bludgeoning the children's mother, Brenda Groene; her fiance, Mark McKenzie and Groene's 13-year-old son, Slade.

According to court documents, Duncan kidnapped Shasta and Dylan, traveling into the mountains near St. Regis, Mont., where he sexually abused them for seven weeks before killing Dylan.

Shasta was rescued when she and Duncan walked into a restaurant in Coeur d'Alene early on the morning of July 2, 2005.

Duncan pleaded guilty in state court last year to three counts of first-degree murder and three counts of first-degree kidnapping for the murders at the Groene home. A judge sentenced him to life in prison without parole on the kidnapping charges.

However, the sentence on the murder counts will be deferred while the federal government pursues its case against Duncan for the kidnappings and murder across state lines.

Charges have not been filed in that case yet. Federal prosecutors expect a grand jury to hear the case in the next few weeks, said Jean McNeil, spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Boise.

Duncan is being housed at the Idaho Maximum Security Institution south of Boise.

Kevin Platts, chief deputy for the U.S. Marshals Service, said his agency would recommend that a trial be held in Boise if the grand jury indicts Duncan.

A number of issues play a role in that decision: Coeur d'Alene lacks a federal judge, and the courthouse in northern Idaho is more than 80 years old and lacks space and security needed for such a case, Platts said.

In addition, the costs to fly Duncan between the prison near Boise to Coeur d'Alene could reach $30,000 per day during a trial there, since he and his guards would have to return to the maximum security prison each night.

"We don't want to do that. We're all taxpayers," Platts said from his office in Boise. "The state has Duncan here. Duncan belongs to them, and we don't like taking them too far from the state."

The federal government has said it intends to seek the death penalty.

Duncan is also considered the prime suspect in the slayings of two children near Seattle and one in Southern California in the 1990s.

L.A. Shifts Tactics Against Gangs (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy And Richard Winton

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

Los Angeles' top law enforcement officials have agreed on a new attack on gang violence, one that focuses more enforcement on smaller neighborhood gangs and uses a new legal tool tried last year on skid row.

The effort comes as L.A. officials are trying to quell a 14% increase in gang-related crime during the last year, marked by several high-profile incidents of race-motivated violence.

LAPD Chief William J. Bratton met this week with Dist. Atty. Steve Cooley and representatives of City Atty. Rocky Delgadillo to begin formulating the plan.

Bratton announced Tuesday that his department is developing a "Top 10" list of gangs to target based on a complex formula — and then the three agencies will devote additional officers and attorneys specifically to those gangs.

The campaign will include targeting the leaders and headquarters of the worst gangs.

Police have identified 720 street gangs in Los Angeles, with 39,315 members. But officials said a small number of them are causing a disproportionate amount of crime in the hardest-hit neighborhoods.

The new strategy is something of a shift for law enforcement officials, who have until now focused much attention on larger gangs that run drug rings and other criminal enterprises.

Bratton told the Police Commission that his office will identify "the most prolific gangs in the city, the top 10, if you will.

"We will be using a matrix that encompasses violent crime committed by the gangs, interracial crime, assaults on police officers," Bratton said. "That's how we will winnow the hundreds of gangs in the city down to those that we will focus most of our attention on."

Deputy Police Chief Charlie Beck, the commanding officer of the South Bureau, said the matrix will give extra weight to certain kinds of activity, such as race-based attacks.

As a result, the 204th Street gang in the Harbor Gateway will probably make the top 10 list even though it has committed fewer crimes than much larger gangs, Beck said.

Police have accused members of that Latino gang of the racially motivated killing of a 14-year-old African American girl.

The LAPD has already deployed an extra 18 officers to the neighborhood, and Beck said the number could double once 204th Street is included in the top 10 list.

Another gang likely to be considered for the list is Canoga Park Alabama, a relatively small gang that police say is responsible for a disproportionate amount of violence in the Valley, where gang crime was up nearly 40%.

Jeff Isaacs, chief of criminal prosecutions for the city attorney's office, agreed that the new strategies on gangs are going to particularly target areas that haven't been traditional gang strongholds: Harbor Gateway and parts of the San Fernando Valley where gang crime climbed at a higher rate than in the more infamous gang territories.

"The San Fernando Valley has seen a real spike in gang crime," Cooley said.

Prosecutors also plan to use "stay-away orders" against gang leaders. Such orders are included in the terms of a suspect's probation and forbid them from being in a certain neighborhood. Officials hope these orders will be more effective than traditional gang injunctions, which prohibit gang members from congregating.

The stay-away orders can be easier to enforce, because they are a condition of probation and a violation can immediately put the offender back in jail. And, under a new early-release policy set to be implemented soon, the Los Angeles County sheriff will no longer hold inmates sentenced to County Jail under gang injunctions for their entire sentences.

In addition to prosecutors targeting leaders of the selected gangs with court orders, Delgadillo said his office plans to file nuisance abatement lawsuits to target gang headquarters.

"We are going to go after the top 10 hangouts in the city of Los Angeles," he said. "Gangs — like other enterprises — need a place to plan."

He said his office successfully used this tactic on an apartment complex at 69th and Main streets, which he said was a home to the East Coast Crips gang.

The situation in Harbor Gateway may end up being a model for the new effort.

Bratton said he has put Beck in charge of a working group to address the problems in the Harbor Gateway area, where some African American residents said Latino gangs do not allow them onto certain streets.

He said the new strategy will include the use of gang injunctions ordering gang members not to loiter or congregate in the area, as well as stay-away orders aimed at gang leaders who have been convicted of crimes.

"There are no injunctions in that area," Beck said.

Cooley said he's ready to seek the stay-away orders.

African American community activist Morris Griffin attended the Police Commission meeting Tuesday to call for action to stop the racial violence, including the installation of surveillance cameras on street corners where crime is occurring.

"I'm a strong advocate for cameras on the streets, to take back our streets, because of this terrorist act with people chasing our people out of the neighborhood, when you talk about the black and the brown," Griffin told the panel.

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Upholds Religion In Veterans' Care (LAT/AP)

By Ryan J. Foley, Associated Press Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

The Department of Veterans Affairs' increasing use of religion in treating ailing veterans does not violate the separation of church and state, a federal judge has ruled.

U.S. District Judge John Shabaz dismissed a lawsuit by the Madison-based Freedom From Religion Foundation and defended the agency's practices in his decision Monday, saying religion can help patients heal and is legal when done on a voluntary basis.

The foundation, a group of atheists and agnostics which has challenged the Bush administration's mix of government and religion, said it was the first time a judge upheld the constitutionality of the VA's use of religion in treating millions of veterans. The ruling averts a trial that was scheduled to begin later this month.

The group's president, Annie Laurie Gaylor, said Tuesday it would appeal the ruling.

"I think the public will be startled to learn that if you're a VA patient and you want a referral to the eye doctor, you have to have a spiritual assessment in order to do that," Gaylor said.

The lawsuit challenged the agency's practice of giving most patients spiritual assessments that ask questions about faith, such as how often they attend church and how important religion is in their lives. Agency officials say the assessments help them determine patients' needs.

The suit also targeted VA drug and alcohol treatment programs that incorporate religion, the integration of its chaplain program into patient care and the expansion of chaplain services for outpatient veterans instead of just those at VA hospitals.

The veterans' agency, which treated 5.3 million people at its facilities in 2005, acknowledged it believes spirituality should be integrated into care but said it allows patients to decide whether that involves religion.

Shabaz said the VA's programs do integrate religion and spirituality but they are legal because they are voluntary and serve valid secular purposes such as giving patients spirituality services.

"The choice to receive spiritual or pastoral care, the choice to complete a spiritual assessment, and the choice to participate in a religious or spiritually based treatment program always remain the private choice of the veteran," he wrote. "Accordingly, there is no evidence of governmental indoctrination of religion."

Jean Lin, a U.S. Department of Justice lawyer who represented the veterans' officials, declined comment. DOJ spokesman Charles Miller said the opinion speaks for itself.

Jury Reaches No Decision In Truck-deaths Trial (AP)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press

AP, January 10, 2007

Jurors deliberated today without deciding whether to impose a death sentence for the truck driver in the nation's deadliest human smuggling attempt, in which 19 illegal immigrants who were locked in a sweltering trailer for hours eventually died from dehydration, overheating and suffocation.

The six men and six women on the jury deliberated for about six hours today. They were to resume Wednesday.

Jurors must decide whether to sentence Tyrone Williams to death or life in prison without parole, or to let the judge issue a sentence ranging from no incarceration time to life in prison without parole.

Williams was convicted last month on 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting immigrants, including 20 counts that were death-penalty eligible.

During the 2003 smuggling attempt, more than 70 immigrants were packed inside Williams' trailer, with no air conditioning.

They were heading from South Texas to Houston when the heat became unbearable and the immigrants began to panic, tearing holes in the trailer doors with their hands in order to breathe. Williams eventually opened the trailer doors and abandoned the container near Victoria, about 100 miles southwest of Houston.

Defense attorney Craig Washington told jurors Williams never intended for the immigrants to die. Washington said it was unfair that Williams was the only defendant in the case who is facing the death penalty when others were equally responsible.

Other major defendants have been sentenced to terms ranging from more than 12 years to more than 23 years in prison. The alleged leader of the smuggling ring was sentenced to more than 17 years.

"The punishment should fit the crime the person committed," Washington said.

Williams' sister, Coretta Williams, told reporters today after jurors finished deliberating for the day that her brother is being made the scapegoat for the immigrants' deaths.

"He's really the person who is taking the fall for everything," she said.

But Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Rodriguez told jurors Williams had no compassion and he deserves to die because he alone could have freed them but chose not to open the trailer's doors.

"Every minute he kept those doors closed knowing those people wanted out was an act of violence against those people," he said.

During the retrial's punishment phase, Williams' relatives testified, telling jurors he was a kind person and asking them to spare his life. Relatives of the 19 victims also testified, asking for justice but not specifying whether that meant a death sentence.

Williams, 35, a Jamaican citizen who lived in Schenectady, N.Y., is the only one of 14 people charged facing the death penalty. In 2005, a jury convicted Williams on 38 transporting counts, but he avoided a death sentence because the jury couldn't agree on his role in the smuggling attempt. The jury deadlocked on the 20 other counts.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejected the verdict, saying the jury failed to specify his role in the crime.

Ruling Goes Against Chastang (MR)

By Dan Murtaugh, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), January 9, 2007

Justice Department says Riley appointment 'appears to diminish' minority voters' choice

The U.S. Department of Justice on Monday objected to Gov. Bob Riley's appointment of Juan Chastang to the Mobile County Commission, saying it "appears to diminish the opportunity of minority voters to elect a representative of their choice."

The decision is the latest step in a long legal battle designed to oust Chastang, a black Republican, from representing District 1, a majority-black district that has historically elected Democrats.

Riley appointed Chastang to replace Sam Jones on the commission after Jones was elected mayor of Mobile in October 2005.

Cecil Gardner, the attorney who filed the lawsuit against Chastang's appointment, said he will file a motion today asking that a panel of federal judges in Montgomery declare Chastang's seat vacant and order a special election to fill it.

The state can still appeal the Justice Department decision to the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia or ask the U.S. attorney general to reconsider the objection, according to the ruling.

Alabama Attorney General Troy King, whose office has represented the state in the suit, said late Monday that he could not comment because he had not received the Justice Department's letter.

Gardner said that appealing such a ruling would be a fruitless endeavor. "Almost all appeals are rejected," he said. "I do not think this will be delayed much longer."

But Chastang said the ruling is not the end of the line for him. "There's nothing in there that says I have to vacate this seat," he said. "If the other side seeks further opinions on this matter, then we'll act appropriately at that time."

Chastang also criticized the Justice Department's decision.

"The ruling is unfair," he said. "It doesn't take into account that my racial makeup is the same as the racial makeup in the district."

Shortly after Chastang's appointment, three Mobile County Democrats -- Reps. Yvonne Kennedy, James Buskey and Bill Clark -- filed a federal lawsuit claiming that Riley failed to follow a provision of the Voting Rights Act that requires the Justice Department to review in advance any changes to Alabama election practices.

In 1985, the Alabama Legislature passed a law requiring a special election to fill any Mobile County Commission vacancy with more than a year remaining in the term. The Justice Department approved that change to Alabama's electoral process.

The Alabama Supreme Court ruled the 1985 law unconstitutional in 1988 because it conflicted with a state law that gave the governor the power to make such appointments.

But the state never received Justice Department approval to go back to gubernatorial appointments, and therefore the appointment violated the Voting Rights Act, a panel of three federal judges ruled in August. The judges forced the state to ask for clearance from the Justice Department.

The Justice Department's objection , written by Assistant U.S. Attorney General Wan J. Kim, states that District 1, which includes downtown Mobile, Prichard and north Mobile County, is 63 percent black.

Riley was elected by a statewide constituency whose racial makeup differs from District 1. Therefore Riley's appointment diminishes minority voting rights, according to the ruling.

"The method of selection for vacancies on the Mobile County Commission by gubernatorial appointment will continue to be legally unenforceable as a matter of federal law," the ruling states.

Chastang said that if his seat is vacated, he will run in the special election to regain it.

County Commissioner Finds Self Embroiled In Controversy (WPMI)

WPMI-TV, NBC 15, Mobile, AL, January 10, 2007

January 9 -- Juan Chastang is currently a Mobile County Commissioner, however, he soon could be unemployed. "We're gonna fight this thing to the end," Chastang tells NBC 15's Leeah Brennan.

The fight Chastang is speaking about is over a decision handed down Monday by the US Department of Justice. When Sam Jones became mayor of Mobile, that left his county commission seat open. Instead of a special election being heldto fill the seat, Governor Bob Riley appointed Chastang.

According to the Justice Department, that appointment may have violated the federal Voting Rights Act.

"We predicted quite accurately that the governor would appoint a Republican. That commission district has never voted Republican in the entire history of the county commission," says Cecil Gardner who initially brought the lawsuit over Chastang's appointment a year and a half ago. Tuesday, he filed a motion asking a federal court to order the seat vacated and that a special election be conducted "Representatives of the people ought to be elected by the people and not chosen by executive fiat," Gardner maintains.

But Chastang says the legal fight to get him out of office isn't' about the people. "Partisan politics is what this whole thing is all about right now."

As of right now, all parties in the upcoming legal battle are moving forward. For someone, this fight will have a bitter end.

NBC 15 News attempted to contact Governor Bob Riley's office for his reaction to the decision, however, we have not yet heard from him. It's possible the governor could appeal the Justice Department's ruling.

Meanwhile, Juan Chastang is one of 3 county commissioners in Mobile County. He tells NBC 15 News if a special election is required, he will run for election to the position he currently holds.

Islamic Group Calls For Federal Probe Into Vandalism Of Buildings (AP)

By Jeff Karoub, The Associated Press

AP, January 10, 2007

DETROIT (AP) — An Islamic coalition representing southeast Michigan Sunni groups and centers said Tuesday that the vandalism of Shiite mosques and businesses over the weekend could be hate crimes and called on the federal government to investigate.

Late Saturday night or early Sunday, vandals broke windows of two mosques and five businesses along Warren Avenue owned by Iraqi Shiites, the second largest Islamic sect after the Sunnis.

The owner of a restaurant whose windows were broken said he had received threatening phone calls before the vandalism that referred to his Shiite creed, according to the Islamic Shura Council of Michigan, based in the Detroit suburb of Bloomfield Hills.

Detroit Police Sgt. Eren Stephens Bell said the department is investigating the vandalism and could not confirm if the incidents were hate crimes. She said police will review security tapes to try to identify the vandals.

The FBI said in a statement Tuesday that it has talked to the Council on American-Islamic Relations and leaders of other community groups. If the Detroit police find information that links the vandalism to federal civil-rights violations, the FBI would "pursue it accordingly."

Mouhib Ayas, president of the Islamic Shura Council, said the incidents appear to be a reaction to events in the Middle East, particularly in Iraq and the execution of Saddam Hussein. Iraq's Shiite-controlled government ordered Saddam hanged before sunrise on Eid al-Hadha, or the Islamic Feast of the Sacrifice.

Ayas said a lot of people felt provoked by the timing of the execution late last month and viewed it more an act of revenge than carrying out justice, but he condemned the vandalism as an unfortunate act of a few individuals.

"They definitely do not reflect the feeling, position of the majority of Sunnis in Michigan," he said.

Ayas said he and others plan a meeting this week between area Sunni and Shiite leaders to ease tensions.

Osama Siblani, a spokesman for the Arab American and Chaldean Council of Metropolitan Detroit and publisher of the Arab American News in the neighboring suburb of Dearborn, said he does not know the motivation for the vandalism. But he said it could be a reaction to celebrations on Dearborn's streets Dec. 29 by Iraqi Shiites following Saddam's execution. The celebrations were close to the buildings that were vandalized.

"If it was in one store, I would have assumed it was a personal feud. But because it happened to multiple stores and Iraqi centers, it leads me to probably conclude that it's a dispute between those who believed (the celebration) was not the right thing."

The schism between Sunni and Shiite stems from early days of Islam and arguments over the Prophet Muhammad's successors as caliph, the spiritual and temporal leader of Muslims. The Shiites wanted the caliphate to descend through Ali, Muhammad's son-in-law. The Sunnis no longer have a caliph.

Fight Anti-Arab Bigotry, Gonzalez Told (UPI)

United Press International, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 (UPI) -- Arab American leaders have urged U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez to fight anti-Arab bigotry.

"In response to concerns about the increasing level of negativity openly directed towards Arab and Muslim Americans, leaders from the Arab American Institute and other key Arab American and Muslim American organizations met with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to request that the federal government help quell the recent tide of bigotry," the Washington-based AAI said in a statement Monday.

"AAI and leaders from the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, Muslim Public Affairs Council, Islamic Society of North America and Muslim advocates also sought clarification and action on policies concerning racial profiling, suspension of habeas corpus, oversight of watch lists, and donations to charities in the Middle East," the statement said.

AAI said the delegation "also urged the attorney general to support the termination of the National Security Entry-Exit Registration System or 'special registration,' a program that began as an initiative of the Justice Department."

AAI Chairman George Salem and AAI President James Zogby also requested Gonzalez's office to "provide leadership for the country in helping to reverse this disturbing and increasingly accepted trend of anti-Arab and Muslim bias," the statement said.

"Sadly, the past year has demonstrated how tolerant our national discourse has become of bigotry toward Arab and Muslim Americans," Zogby said. "We call upon the attorney general and the Department of Justice to provide the leadership and unity--building they did in the days following the Sept. 11 attacks on a more consistent basis."

LAPD Board Decides Not To Punish Devin Brown (LAT)

By Matt Lait And Scott Glover

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

A Los Angeles Police Department disciplinary board has secretly decided not to punish the officer who fatally shot 13-year-old Devin Brown two years ago, rejecting an earlier ruling by the civilian Police Commission that the act violated department policy, sources confirmed Tuesday.

Members of an LAPD Board of Rights, meeting behind closed doors on Monday, determined that Officer Steven Garcia was justified in shooting Brown as the youth allegedly tried to back a stolen car into the officer following a brief pursuit.

The shooting sparked outrage in the surrounding South Los Angeles community, with citizens and activists alleging that Garcia overreacted and used excessive force. Last year the city paid $1.5 million to settle a wrongful death lawsuit filed by Brown's family.

Monday's decision, reached by two high-ranking LAPD officials and a civilian representative, effectively negates the earlier finding by the Police Commission that the shooting was "out of policy" and that Garcia should be punished.

It also reflects a dramatic change in the way the LAPD metes out discipline. For decades, the LAPD has heard evidence publicly when serious misconduct is alleged. Last summer, however, the California Supreme Court ruled that police officer personnel documents were not public records. Responding to that ruling — and over the objections of news organizations and civil libertarians — the LAPD moved to close its disciplinary hearings.

As a result, the charges against Garcia were heard in secret, and the rationale for the board's decision is similarly being withheld.

The Police Commission acts as the civilian oversight body for the LAPD and has the authority to shape policy, but it cannot discipline officers. Its finding in the Brown case — which ran contrary to the recommendation of Police Chief William J. Bratton — was initially hailed by both African American leaders and Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa as a sign that the LAPD, with its long history of officer misconduct cases, now had firm civilian oversight.

John Mack, president of the Police Commission, said Tuesday that he felt as if he and his colleagues on the commission had been undermined.

"I'm very, very disappointed in that finding," said Mack, who was unaware of the ruling before being informed by a reporter. "Our commission felt the facts were clear. It was my expectation that the Board of Rights would see the facts as we saw them and take disciplinary action."

Bratton said he supported the disciplinary panel's conclusion.

"I think that's an appropriate finding," he said. "I'm very comfortable with that."

Asked if the decision undermined his civilian bosses, Bratton replied: "Not at all."

Members of the internal LAPD panel would not explain their rationale for finding in Garcia's favor, citing the Supreme Court ruling that city lawyers have interpreted as giving broad privacy rights to officers involved in disciplinary proceedings.

"I can tell you the board's decision was unanimous and the evidence and testimony to support our finding was compelling," said Capt. Nancy Lauer, a member of the panel. "That is all I feel is prudent to share based on the legal constraints in which we find ourselves."

Capt. Bruce Crosley, who retired from the department in July, but continued to serve as chairman of the disciplinary board, also declined to discuss the case. Ann Reiss Lane, a former police commissioner who served as the civilian member of the LAPD panel, could not be reached for comment.

Bob Baker, president of the Los Angeles Police Protective League, said he had expected Garcia to be exonerated.

"We agree with the Board, who relied on law enforcement expertise and the applicable department standards in deciding that Officer Garcia's actions were in policy on that tragic night," Baker said.

For years, LAPD disciplinary hearings had been open to the public. But late last year, the department changed policy, and prohibited anyone not involved in the case from attending. The department also stopped releasing information about officer discipline that historically had been public.

In November, LAPD officials barred two Times reporters from attending Garcia's disciplinary hearing because of the Supreme Court ruling, which restricted access to law enforcement discipline records in a San Diego case. However, that ruling — in Copley Press Inc. vs. Superior Court of San Diego — did not address whether hearings should be closed.

The Police Commission has also moved to deny public access to police records. Last year, the panel voted to withhold the names of officers involved in shootings and other uses of force, such as baton-strikes, kicks, punches and the use of stun guns. The first case in which the Commission invoked that policy related to Garcia's shooting.

Even though Garcia's case has been cloaked in secrecy, both Bratton and Mack said they wished they could be more open with the public about police conduct and discipline. Both said they feel bound by legal advise given by City Atty. Rocky Delgadillo.

"I like transparency," Bratton said. "In my previous department [in New York City] all reprimands were written and published throughout the department. I'm not in favor of all the limitations that we operate under here, but it is what it is."

The events leading to the shooting of Devin Brown began about 4 a.m. on Feb. 6, 2005. According to police, Garcia and his partner were on patrol when they noticed a red Toyota Camry being driven erratically. When the driver of the Toyota ran a red light and entered the Harbor Freeway, the officers followed.

Suspecting the driver was under the influence of drugs or alcohol, the officers turned on their emergency lights and siren and attempted to pull the car over. But the driver, later identified as Brown, did not stop.

Brown turned off the freeway and led police on 7-minute chase through city streets. He lost control of the car at 83rd Street and Western Avenue, where the vehicle jumped a curb and slammed into a wrought iron fence.

Garcia and his partner pulled up, drew their weapons and took cover behind their open patrol car doors. As they did this, Brown's 14-year-old passenger fled.

Brown, meanwhile, put the car in reverse and began backing up toward police. The Toyota struck the right front fender of the patrol car and continued backing alongside in the direction of Garcia.

The officer fired 10 shots into the Camry. Seven struck Brown, who died at the scene. Officers later learned that the Camry had been reported stolen.

During the department's internal investigation, a re-enactment suggested that Garcia was not in the path of the vehicle when he opened fire. Shooting investigators speculated that he was in the car's path when he drew his weapon, but had stepped to the side before he began pulling the trigger.

After reviewing that investigation, the Los Angeles County District Attorney declined to file charges against Garcia, citing insufficient evidence.

Bratton, finding that Garcia was legitimately in fear for his life, recommended that his actions be deemed appropriate under the circumstances.

The Police Commission, in a 4-1 vote, disagreed. The majority found evidence that the Camry was moving no faster than 2 miles per hour when the shooting occurred and that Garcia was not in the path of the vehicle.

The officer's belief that his life was in danger "was not objectively reasonable," the board concluded.

A Good Call In New York (NYT)

Gov. Eliot Spitzer of New York set an important national example this week when he announced that the state corrections department would back away from a longstanding policy of charging prison inmates and their families more than six times the going rate for collect calls made from prison.

Prisons all over the country began gouging inmates and their families when telephone companies started paying legalized kickbacks — called “commissions” — to the state prison systems in return for a monopoly on the service. These schemes place a huge financial burden on inmate families, who tend to be among the poorest in the nation, and who must often choose between paying phone bills and putting food on the table.

The Spitzer administration, which plans to waive its commission and renegotiate the current contract with its prison telephone carrier, estimates that the cost of a collect call from prison will drop by about half once the program goes into effect. That’s good as far as it goes. But the better solution would be to introduce a cheaper, debit calling system like the one used in federal prisons, where inmates use computer-controlled accounts to pay for calls.

The governor's announcement didn't come out of nowhere. Arguments against New York's collect-call-only system were heard yesterday in the state's highest court. At the same time, laws that would make the system fairer for inmates and their families are pending in the State Legislature.

Whatever the source, fair pricing for prison telephone service is important. In addition to unburdening poor families, it would encourage sustained contact between inmates and their relations. And that would make it more likely that the inmates would forge crime-free lives once they got out.

ANTITRUST:

Newspapers Set To Jointly Sell Ads On Web Sites (WSJ)

By Julia Angwin

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

Gannett, McClatchy And Tribune to Form Nationwide Network Yahoo's Competing Effort

The nation's three largest newspaper publishers are gearing up to sell advertising jointly on their newspapers' Web sites, believing their survival depends on seizing new online revenue.

Gannett Co., McClatchy Co. and Tribune Co. are planning to offer advertisers one-stop shopping for display ads on Internet sites. The goal is to attract big advertisers such as car makers and phone companies that want to reach a nationwide online audience but don't want the hassle of negotiating ad deals with each company or newspaper.

The joint effort, code-named "Open Network," marks a big new bid to win back advertisers that are defecting in droves to the Web. Currently, national advertisers buy the bulk of their online display ads -- banners and boxes -- from big portals such as Yahoo Inc., Time Warner Inc.'s AOL or Microsoft Corp.'s MSN. Yahoo has announced plans to work with seven other newspaper publishers to build a similar one-stop-shopping spot for advertisers. Google Inc. has also reaped a bonanza with advertising links that appear next to search results.

The three newspaper companies, known in the industry as GMT, are likely to each contribute 10% of their online-advertising space to the network, according to people familiar with the situation. They hope to announce something early this year, although the deal isn't finalized and could still fall apart.

The venture is designed to help the chains tackle a vexing problem: They have long had trouble attracting national advertisers. In their print editions, this is largely because of price. Newspapers can jack up ad prices for local retailers that have few other ways to reach a hometown audience. But national advertisers often find it cheaper to buy a TV spot or magazine ad than to buy space in dozens of newspapers. National advertisers also account for about 75% of advertising on the Internet, according to PricewaterhouseCoopers.

Efforts by the chains to coordinate their print-advertising sales have shown little success, partly because individual papers weren't enthusiastic about standardizing ad sizes or giving up control of their relationships with advertisers. But with the industry under severe stress, that reluctance to band together may change.

"Traditionally print newspaper companies have not worked well together to sell national ads in print," says Jack Williams, president of Gannett Digital. "We intend to sell Internet advertising differently." Tribune and McClatchy declined to comment.

The nascent effort faces a challenge from a rival group of newspapers led by Hearst Corp. and MediaNews Group Inc. that own more than 100 newspapers. Known in the industry as the "Seven Amigos," this group has teamed up with Yahoo to sell online recruiting classifieds, and is finalizing a deal to develop its own national ad-sales network. Both sides concede that it would be better for the newspaper industry to have a single effort, but they have competing efforts in online classified ads, making cooperation in display advertising difficult.

Circulation is declining at major papers across the country as readers increasingly find news online and elsewhere. While newspapers are selling more online ads, the growth isn't fast enough to make up for setbacks in print. During the first nine months of 2006, Internet ad revenues including search ads rose 35% to $12.1 billion, according to PricewaterhouseCoopers data compiled for the Interactive Advertising Bureau. During that same period, the local newspaper industry's ad revenues slipped 4% to $17.5 billion, according to TNS Media Intelligence.

Last year, investors frustrated with the poor performance of newspaper stocks forced Knight Ridder Inc. to sell itself to McClatchy. This year, Tribune is expected to sell off portions of its business to satisfy restless shareholders.

Newspaper chains such as Gannett built themselves in the 1970s through 1990s, often buying family-owned papers and investing in labor-saving technologies that boosted profits. As two-paper cities disappeared, many of the chain papers gained an effective monopoly as the only vehicle for reaching big and affluent local audiences. That served them well with local advertisers such as retailers and car dealerships, and allowed them to support the costs of journalists and printing plants.

The newspaper industry has tried to sell national ads before. In 1994, the industry set up a national sales arm, the Newspaper National Network, to sell ads in certain categories that newspapers weren't successfully selling. Most chains also attempt to sell national ads across their properties. Gannett has a team in Chicago that helps big advertisers buy in multiple Gannett papers. However, even with the national newspaper USA Today in its portfolio, national advertising represented only about 16% of Gannett's newspaper advertising revenues during the first 11 months of 2006.

Late last year, more than 50 newspapers began testing a program allowing advertisers to buy print ads automatically through Google's Web site. That effort is targeted at small advertisers that wouldn't be likely to get attention from a newspaper salesperson.

Now, as circulation declines and readers move to the Internet, the chains realize they need to do more.

An early Internet joint venture was CareerBuilder.com, a Web site for classified jobs advertising. Tribune and Knight Ridder bought CareerBuilder in 2000, when it was an also-ran behind Monster.com and Yahoo HotJobs. Gannett joined the venture two years later and the trio built CareerBuilder into the No. 1 online recruiting Web site, with 16.7 million unique visitors in November, according to comScore Media Metrix.

CareerBuilder's success has also driven a wedge in the newspaper industry. CareerBuilder has raised the cut of revenue it takes when its newspaper partners deliver ads to the site or when it delivers an ad to a newspaper, according to people familiar with the arrangements. In the past year, several newspapers defected from CareerBuilder to Monster.com, including the Philadelphia Inquirer, St. Petersburg (Fla.) Times and Akron (Ohio) Beacon Journal.

In a September meeting, MediaNews Chief Executive Dean Singleton complained about CareerBuilder's renegotiated terms and reluctance to take on big new equity partners to Gannett Chief Executive Craig Dubow, according to a person close to the situation. Mr. Dubow refused to loosen the terms, this person says.

So Mr. Singleton threw his weight behind negotiations with Yahoo HotJobs, a competitor to CareerBuilder. In November, Mr. Singleton announced a deal with Yahoo HotJobs, along with Belo Corp., Cox Newspapers Inc., Hearst Newspapers, Journal Register Co., Lee Enterprises Inc., and E.W. Scripps Co.

The "Seven Amigos" also signed a letter of intent to expand the relationship with Yahoo to include a national ad-sales network similar to the one being formed by Gannett, McClatchy and Tribune. Since then, two other newspaper groups have joined the Yahoo consortium: Media General Inc. and Morris Communications Co.

The expanded Yahoo deal is likely to require the newspapers in the consortium to use Yahoo search on their newspaper Web sites, according to people close to the discussions. In addition, Yahoo and the newspapers could sell ads on each others' sites, with revenue being shared among the partners. The deal is being finalized, these people say.

Lincoln Millstein, senior vice president at Hearst Newspapers, said he hopes Gannett, McClatchy and Tribune will join the Yahoo consortium instead of striking out on their own. "We're all struggling to get our fair share of national advertising revenues, and this partnership with Yahoo would go a long way toward achieving that goal," he said.

So far, Gannett has signaled its intent to go a separate route. In a December presentation to investors, Mr. Dubow, the Gannett CEO, first mentioned the troika's efforts to build "the largest network of newspaper-developed local sites for any advertiser to reach local consumers." He said that "unlike past efforts in the industry," the group will "focus on customer needs."

In an interview, Gannett's Mr. Williams confirmed the project is in the works. He said the group would welcome other members so long as they agree to conditions about ad pricing and placement. "If other people are interested in participating, they can join, but only if they are willing to live with the rules," he said. The project would rely in part on McClatchy's existing national online sales network, called Real Cities.

GMT is leery of the Seven Amigos' agreement to use Yahoo's technology to deliver advertising on the newspapers' Web sites, according to a person close to the situation. Yahoo will then gain sensitive information such as which newspaper si tes are doing well and which pages are most popular.

By contrast, the GMT group is considering other technology options that wouldn't involve handing control to a potential competitor. It has held discussions with Centro LLC, a Chicago-based company that places ads on newspaper sites across the country, according to a person close to the situation.

Shawn Riegsecker, the president of Centro, says the two camps need to get together to compete with big portals. "If you break this industry apart, you completely devalue the value proposition to the spot advertiser in the national market," Mr. Riegsecker says.

U.S. Senate Plans Hearing On Airline Merger Impact (AJC)

By Russell Grantham, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 10, 2007

Prompted by US Airways' bid to acquire Delta Air Lines and merger talk at other carriers, the U.S. Senate Commerce Committee has scheduled a hearing later this month on the likely effects of a potential wave of airline mergers.

The Jan. 24 hearing will be on the state of the airline industry and the "potential impact of airline mergers and industry consolidation," the committee said Tuesday in a press release.

Then-Delta Chief Executive Leo Mullin testified to the same committee in hearings shortly after the 9/11 terrorist attacks. Congress later approved a multibillion-dollar aid bill after airlines were temporarily grounded in response to the 2001 attack.

Congress had been expected to weigh in on the airline merger issue, although the U.S. Justice Department would have to independently review any combinations. After US Airways' hostile $8 billion-plus bid for Delta in November, local and national politicians from Atlanta and communities that would be affected expressed concern about the deal.

Delta management opposes the proposal but its bankruptcy court creditors will have the final say.

With the change in control in Congress, the Senate committee is now headed by Daniel Inouye (D-Hawaii).

Micron Settles Chip Suit, Predicts $80 Million Cost (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo

Bloomberg, January 10, 2007

Jan. 9 (Bloomberg) -- Micron Technology Inc., the biggest U.S. memory chip maker, said it cut previously reported first-quarter earnings by as much as $80 million to reflect a settlement resolving claims it conspired to fix chip prices.

The accord resolves private antitrust lawsuits filed over U.S. sales of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, from 1999 to 2002. The claims were brought by manufacturers and individuals alleging that a price-fixing conspiracy drove up costs for the chips, a memory component used in personal computers, laptops and video game consoles.

``It is expected that the settlement will result'' in a reduction ``in an amount not to exceed $80 million,'' Micron said today in a statement.

Micron has been in settlement talks to end similar claims by state attorneys general who sued the company and other DRAM makers in July, said company spokesman Dan Francisco. The private antitrust suits against chip makers stemmed from a 2002 Justice Department probe of the DRAM market. Micron cooperated with U.S. officials in exchange for not being charged with a crime.

The settlement dismisses Micron from the class action, or group lawsuit, originally filed in San Francisco federal court. The accord is subject to court approval.

Micron's Francisco declined to comment on the terms of the settlement. Boise, Idaho-based Micron said it plans to file its quarterly report for the period ended Dec. 21 on Jan. 16.

Other Accords

NEC Electronics America Inc. agreed to pay $36 million and Elpida Memory Inc. agreed to pay $14.7 million in December to resolve claims in the suits. Samsung Electronics Co., Hynix Semiconductor and Infineon Technologies AG agreed to pay $160 million in May.

New York, California and 33 other states sued seven memory- chip makers in July, saying a price-fixing conspiracy added $1 billion to chip costs while driving up retail prices for personal computers and other electronics.

Guido Saveri, an attorney for DRAM purchasers, confirmed the accord while declining further comment on its terms.

Micron shares fell 7 cents to $13.67 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

The case is In Re Dynamic Random Access Memory (DRAM) Antitrust Litigation, 02-1486, U.S. District Court, San Francisco.

Congress To Take Up Net's Future (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 — Senior lawmakers, emboldened by the recent restrictions on AT&T and the change in control of Congress, have begun drafting legislation that would prevent high-speed Internet companies from charging content providers for priority access.

The first significant so-called net neutrality legislation of the new Congressional session was introduced Tuesday by Senator Byron L. Dorgan, Democrat of South Dakota, and Senator Olympia J. Snowe of Maine, one of the few Republicans in Congress to support such a measure.

"The success of the Internet has been its openness and the ability of anyone anywhere in this country to go on the Internet and reach the world," Mr. Dorgan said. "If the big interests who control the pipes become gatekeepers who erect tolls, it will have a significant impact on the Internet as we know it."

In the House, Representative Edward J. Markey, the Massachusetts Democrat who heads the Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Telecommunications and the Internet, said recently that he would introduce legislation soon and planned to hold hearings.

Despite the flurry of activity, the proposals face significant political impediments and no one expects that they will be adopted quickly. But the fight promises to be a bonanza for lobbyists and a fund-raising tool for lawmakers. It pits Internet giants like Google, Yahoo, eBay and Amazon, which support the legislation, against telecommunication titans like Verizon, AT&T and large cable companies like Comcast.

The debate may also affect the plans of the companies to develop new services and to consider certain mergers or acquisitions.

Consumer groups have allied themselves with content providers. The groups maintain that without the legislation, some content providers would be discouraged from offering services while others would impose costs on providers that would either discourage them from offering new services or pass them on to consumers. They also feel that small companies would be unable to compete.

But the telephone and cable companies say that efforts to limit their ability to charge for faster service would discourage the pipeline companies from making billions of dollars in investments to upgrade their networks, and would, as a practical matter, be even more harmful to consumers.

Beyond the debate, the fight over net neutrality is, like most regulatory political battles, a fight over money and competing business models. Companies like Google, Yahoo and many content providers do not want to pay for the kinds of faster Internet service that will enable consumers to more quickly download videos and play games.

In their thirst to continue to grow rapidly, content providers are looking to expand, but they consider any attempt by the telephone and cable companies to charge them for priority services as restricting their ability to move into new areas.

On the other hand, the telephone and cable companies — the so-called Internet pipes — want to be able to charge for access, particularly as they begin competing with content providers by offering their video services and programming.

The phone companies have also been studying a business model not unlike that of the cable TV industry: charging premiums to certain content providers for greater access to their pipes.

They say that existing rules, as well as sound business judgment, would preclude them from trying to degrade or slow their broadband service and that what they oppose is regulation that would prevent them from charging for offering a faster service. They also point out that many content providers are already charging customers for priority services, so that what they are proposing is not unduly restrictive.

While the debate has broken largely along partisan lines — with Democrats among the staunchest supporters and Republicans the biggest foes — there remains considerable Democratic opposition. Last June, a vote on an amendment by Mr. Markey similar to what he plans to introduce failed by 269 to 152, with 58 Democrats voting against the measure.

Many of those Democrats have been allied with unions, which have sided with the phone companies because they believe that the lack of restrictions will encourage the companies to invest and expand their networks.

In the Senate, where the party in the minority has considerably more power than in the House, the measure suffers from similar political problems. Last year the Republicans blocked the measure from reaching the Senate floor.

But several developments have given some momentum to the supporters of the measures. The House is now under the control of the Democrats, and the new speaker, Nancy Pelosi of California, has been a vigorous supporter of the legislation. Ms. Pelosi's district in San Francisco is near Silicon Valley, the home of many companies that have sought the legislation.

Moreover, the conditions that the Federal Communications Commission imposed on AT&T as a condition of its acquisition of SBC Communications represented an important political victory for proponents of the legislation. After one of the five members of the commission removed himself from the proceeding, the commission's two Democrats forced the companies to agree to a two-year moratorium on offering any service that "privileges, degrades or prioritizes any packet" transmitted over its broadband service.

The conditions imposed no significant immediate costs on AT&T. The company does not yet have the equipment in place on its network to offer a priority service on a large scale. But the conditions imposed by the F.C.C. showed that, contrary to assertions of the phone companies, it was possible to draft language that would preclude the companies from discriminating against providers.

The conditions also set a political benchmark of sorts, and gave the supporters of the legislation two years to try to gain more momentum just as all of the companies are trying to figure out their next major sources of revenue.

Aloha Taking Mesa To Federal Court (AP)

AP, January 10, 2007

Aloha Airlines Moving Dispute With Mesa Air to Federal Court

HONOLULU (AP) -- Aloha Airlines announced that it will pursue further legal action against Mesa Air Group Inc. in federal court.

Aloha sued Mesa in state court in October, alleging the Phoenix-based company improperly used data it obtained as a potential investor to try to drive Aloha out of business.

"Upon further legal review of the federal antitrust laws, and given findings of federal Bankruptcy Judge Robert Faris in the Hawaiian Airlines matter, we believe our claims would be best pursued in the federal court system," David A. Banmiller, Aloha's president and chief executive, said Monday. "Aloha will continue to proceed vigorously against Mesa to stop the illegal and improper conduct."

Mesa, which had been considering investing in Aloha when the island carrier was undergoing bankruptcy reorganization, launched go! airlines in June as a competing carrier in Hawaii, entering the market dominated for decades by Hawaiian and Aloha airlines.

Hawaiian, now a unit of Hawaiian Holdings Inc., sued Mesa in February for the alleged illegal use of confidential information and trade secrets obtained during Hawaiian's Chapter 11 bankruptcy proceedings,

Speaking in connection with the Hawaiian case, Faris said in October that there was evidence that "raises real doubts about the propriety of Mesa's conduct."

Mesa has denied Hawaiian's allegations.

A Mesa spokesman said Aloha's lawsuit was a "desperate act by a desperate carrier."

Aloha said it is seeking damages and injunctive relief to stop Mesa from competing unfairly and from threatening the jobs of 3,500 Aloha employees in Hawaii.

Hain Gets Antitrust OK For Avalon (AP)

AP, January 10, 2007

NEW YORK --Hain Celestial Group Inc., an organic food company, received antitrust approval for its planned $120 million acquisition of Avalon Natural Products Inc.

The Federal Trade Commission approved early termination of a waiting period required under antitrust law on Friday.

Melville, N.Y.-based Hain, whose brands include Garden of Eatin', Earth's Best and Celestial Seasonings, is buying Avalon from private equity firm North Castle Partners LLC.

Avalon, located in Petaluma, Calif., sells personal care products under the Avalon Organics, Alba Botanica and Unpetroleum brands.

Hain said in December it expects the deal to close in early 2007.

Shares of Hain fell 21 cents to close at $29.58 on the Nasdaq.

Ruling Seen As Giving An Edge To Challengers Of Patents (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 — The Supreme Court opened the door Tuesday to a category of patent lawsuits that a lower court had barred, issuing a decision that will probably shift power in the courtroom from bigger patent-owning companies to smaller start-up companies that rely on obtaining licenses for patented technology.

The court's 8-to-1 decision held that the holder of a patent license can sue to challenge the patent's validity without first refusing to pay royalties and putting itself in breach of the license agreement.

This seemingly technical question, in a dispute by two biotechnology companies, MedImmune and Genentech, has considerable practical importance. A license holder is much less likely to sue if it must first stop paying royalties and thereby risk becoming the target of a patent infringement suit, with the potential for triple damages and the loss of the right to continue selling its product.

In making its decision, the Supreme Court overturned a ruling by the specialized appeals court that hears all patent appeals. That court, the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, had adopted a rule in a previous case that required a party to breach its license agreement before suing to declare a patent invalid.

As long as royalties were being paid, the Federal Circuit had reasoned, there was no actual controversy between the parties and such a lawsuit would therefore not meet the requirement of Article III of the Constitution, which limits the jurisdiction of the federal courts to resolving actual "cases" or "controversies."

The Declaratory Judgment Act, the federal law that MedImmune invoked when it went to the federal District Court in Los Angeles for a determination of the validity of Genentech's patent, likewise requires the existence of an "actual controversy" before a court can act.

But the dispute between MedImmune and Genentech was indeed a controversy that met the jurisdictional requirements of the statute and the Constitution, Justice Antonin Scalia wrote for the majority in overturning the Federal Circuit's dismissal of the case, MedImmune Inc. v. Genentech Inc., No. 05-608.

Justice Scalia said the rule that a plaintiff must "bet the farm, or (as here) risk treble damages and the loss of 80 percent of its business before seeking a declaration of its actively contested legal rights finds no support in Article III."

The decision did not resolve the underlying dispute, instead reinstating MedImmune's lawsuit and sending the case back to the lower courts.

The case grew out of a license agreement the two companies reached in 1997 as MedImmune, then a new company, was working on a genetically engineered drug, Synagis, used to prevent a respiratory disease in infants. While MedImmune later came to public attention as the maker of the FluMist influenza vaccine, Synagis has been the company's main product, accounting for 80 percent of its sales since 1999.

The license authorized MedImmune to use the technology developed by Genentech and its research partner, the City of Hope National Medical Center in Duarte, Calif. City of Hope is also a party in the case.

The agreement obliged MedImmune to pay royalties for the use of patents "which have neither expired nor been held invalid."

The specific patent at issue in the case was not granted to Genentech until 2001, at which point Genentech wrote to MedImmune demanding royalties. MedImmune paid under protest, while filing its lawsuit to have the patent declared invalid.

Justice Clarence Thomas was the lone dissenter from the ruling. He said there was "no Article III jurisdiction over MedImmune's claim," which he called "hypothetical or conjectural."

High Court Eases Way For Patent Challenges (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin And Marilyn Chase

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Supreme Court continued to reassert its oversight of patent law yesterday with a ruling that weakens intellectual-property protections by making it easier for legal challenges to patents.

The 8-1 decision put the justices on the side of those who have complained that existing rules stifle innovation, and it is their latest rebuke to the specialized panel that hears patent appeals, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, for rulings skewing property rights in favor of patent holders. The high court this term has also heard a separate case appealing obstacles imposed by the Federal Circuit against challenges to a patent on grounds that the invention is "obvious." A decision on that is pending.

REINVENTION

• The News: The Supreme Court ruled that companies can challenge patents even if they are paying royalties to license them.

• The Background: A lower court had forced challengers to infringe and risk damages if they failed.

• What It Means: It'll be easier to weed out bad patents, but may be harder to enforce valid ones.

Yesterday's opinion, by Justice Antonin Scalia, reversed the Federal Circuit's rule that if a company pays royalties for a patent, it forfeits the right to challenge the patent's validity. That has deterred companies from filing challenges because they would be at risk for treble damages for infringement if the patent were found to be valid.

The decision is a victory for MedImmune Inc., a Gaithersburg, Md., pharmaceuticals company that derives about 80% of its revenue from the respiratory-tract drug at issue, Synagis. Under protest, MedImmune paid a royalty to Genentech Inc., of South San Francisco, Calif., to avoid a patent-infringement suit over a component antibody.

Under a 2004 Federal Circuit ruling, the act of paying a royalty precluded challenging the patent's validity. The Federal Circuit reasoned that since the license payment obviated an infringement suit, there was no controversy between the companies. In general, federal courts may only decide cases and controversies, not rule on theoretical disputes or issue advisory opinions.

Justice Scalia wrote that a party shouldn't have to "bet the farm" to challenge a patent. He cited several prior cases where the court allowed parties to challenge laws as unconstitutional without breaking them -- and thus exposing themselves to criminal punishment. Moreover, he wrote, the Supreme Court in 1943 had decided a similar patent case by ruling that "the fact that royalties were being paid did not" make the dispute "hypothetical or abstract."

The Bush administration supported MedImmune, contending that allowing challenges would help weed out invalid patents that stifle innovation. "Public policy strongly favors ridding the economy of invalid patents, which impede efficient licensing, hinder competition, and undermine incentives for innovation," the government said in a friend-of-the-court brief.

The implications could be greatest for the biotechnology industry, where huge profits can turn on a relatively small number of patents, according to Pamela Samuelson, co-director of the Center for Law and Technology at the University of California, Berkeley. Prof. Samuelson said the Supreme Court is telling the Federal Circuit to be "more balanced and less patent-owner friendly."

"Everybody knows there are a lot of weak patents out there," she said. "A lot of inventors take very substantial risks going out into a field of technology, and sometimes they get their foot blown off when some patent is out there like a land mine."

However, some predicted a chilling effect. "This decision allows companies that have taken out licenses to challenge the validity of a patent while also enjoying the benefits of that very same patent," said Charles Barquist, a patent litigator in Morrison & Foerster LLP's Los Angeles office. "MedImmune turns all fundamental assumptions about the stability and finality of a patent license completely on their head," he added in a statement late yesterday. "The Court has upset the risk/benefit calculation that underlies virtually every patent license."

Genentech issued as statement downplaying the significance of the ruling, saying the Supreme Court "only addressed the threshold jurisdictional issue of whether there need to be further proceedings to finally decide this case. It does not express an opinion concerning the merits of MedImmune's claims against Genentech..."

Indeed, MedImmune General Counsel William Bertrand said the victory won't have an immediate impact on his company's bottom line, as it has been paying royalties all along and the ruling doesn't nullify the patent at issue, but it does enable resumption of the challenge.

Eric Schmidt, a biotech analyst at Cowen and Co., sees modest potential impact on Genentech's future earnings from the decision. An adverse decision, should MedImmune prevail at trial, could have an impact of four cents a share on earnings, he said. (See related article on page A12.) Genentech receives royalties from licensees as well as paying some royalties to the City of Hope Hospital, in Duarte, Calif., under the patent, Mr. Schmidt said. The company's annual income from all royalties is approaching $1 billion a year.

MedImmune's Synagis, which racked up $1.24 billion in 2005 sales, is an injectable product containing protective antibodies that help guard infants and young children against respiratory syncytial virus, or RSV, a common childhood infection responsible for about 125,000 hospitalizations a year in the U.S. alone, a spokeswoman said.

U.S. Supreme Court Ruling May Alter Biotech Patent Deals (AP)

By Paul Elias, Associated Press

AP, January 10, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO – Biotechnology analysts and lawyers said a key U.S. Supreme Court ruling Tuesday could help companies who license patents get out of bad deals easier.

The Supreme Court ruled that Gaithersburg, Md.-based MedImmune Inc. could sue Genentech Inc. for patent infringement even though MedImmune continues to pay fees to Genentech to use the disputed technology to develop the drug Synagis that treats childhood respiratory problems. The high court didn't rule on the merits of MedImmune's claims Tuesday, the outcome of which analysts said is more important to the patent landscape of the biotechnology industry.

Licensing the rights to use another company's patent technology is the lifeblood of the biotechnology industry. Many smaller companies have long complained that larger companies with extensive patent portfolios often hold monopolistic grips on certain manufacturing processes. For instance, several biotechnology companies pay Genentech royalties to access the technology at the heart of the MedImmune dispute.

“This is definitely a major ongoing controversy,” said Jason Kantor, an analyst with RBC Market Capitals. “The decision today does not have far-reaching implications.”

The ruling did little to the sector's stock prices and both companies involved in the litigation experienced small rises in their share prices.

South San Francisco-based Genentech's stock rose 89 cents a share to $84.69 at the close of trading on the New York Stock Exchange. MedImmune's share price rose 58 cents to $34.83 at the close of trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Still, lawyers said the ruling will give biotechnology companies locked in bad licensing deals with larger partners an attractive option to change the terms of the agreement without terminating the agreement.

“If their patent challenge fails, that's a big business risk ,” said Bart Showalter, head of intellectual property at the Baker Botts law firm in Dallas. “This is a big win for licensees, who can have their cake and eat it too.”

Showalter predicted the ruling will alter how future contracts are hammered out.

MedImmune Inc. sued Genentech in 2003, claiming a deal between Genentech and British biotechnology company Celltech R&D Ltd. violated antitrust laws. But it was thrown out by the federal courts, which ruled MedImmune didn't have the right to sue because it continued to pay royalties on the patent even as it claimed in court the patent was unfair.

The Supreme Court said MedImmune's "pay and sue" strategy doesn't preclude it from suing. MedImmune said it continued to pay Genentech royalties because if it lost its case, it would be liable for triple damages and unable to use the technology needed to manufacturer Synagis, which accounted for than $1 billion in sales last year.

MedImmune said it would vigorously pursue its case in the lower court. Genentech said it remains confident in the validity of the patent.

High Court Ruling Could Spark Surge In Patent Challenges (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 10, 2007

Patent litigation could explode in the wake of the Supreme Court's ruling Tuesday in a closely watched dispute over patent validity between two biotechnology firms.

The Court, by an 8-1 vote, reinstated a lawsuit by MedImmune challenging a Genentech patent related to Synagis, a popular drug for treatment of respiratory disease in children. The opinion in MedImmune v. Genentech, written by Justice Antonin Scalia, says patent licensees no longer have to breach the license in order to have standing to challenge the patent that they dispute. Patent lawyers say the ruling could lead to a flurry of challenges to existing patents.

"It's a rare patent where you can't find something to challenge. There will be an explosion in litigation by these licensees," says Jim Badke, a partner at Ropes & Gray. "Companies can have their cake and eat it too."

The Jan. 9 ruling overturns a decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, which since 2004 had held that a breach -- such as ceasing royalty payments -- was necessary in order to establish the "case or controversy" required to challenge the patent. Critics of the Federal Circuit's doctrine said it discouraged challenges against invalid patents, because breaking a license agreement can be risky. Such a breach can prompt the patent holder to retaliate by suing for infringement and seeking an injunction against further sales of the product, along with treble damages.

Now a licensee can challenge a patent while still honoring it and paying royalties -- as MedImmune did in the case before the Supreme Court -- and patent challenges will be safer and easier to file without fear of retaliation.

In overturning the Federal Circuit's ruling, Scalia wrote that the dispute leading up to the patent challenge was a real and "lively" controversy that was sufficient to trigger a challenge to the patent's validity, even if the royalties were still being paid.

Badke, who worked on the case for MedImmune at an earlier stage, says that in the long run, the ruling will help clear out invalid patents that impede innovations in areas like biotech and software.

But the decision also introduces more uncertainty into the status of patents, says George Best, senior counsel at Foley & Lardner. Under the old rules, a licensing agreement amounted to an insurance policy against litigation over patent validity or infringement. But now, he says, "unhappy licensees" can challenge patents that both parties previously thought were settled and protected by the license agreement.

"By allowing licensees that are taking full advantage of the benefits of the license, including immunity from a patent infringement lawsuit, to challenge the patents in the agreement, patentees lose the quid pro quo in the arrangement," says Raymond Van Dyke of Nixon Peabody. "Countless licensed patents are now potentially open to a new attack from even good licensees. To the IP community, this is yet another curtailment of the strength of patent rights."

The decision also represents another bad day for the Federal Circuit, which handles patent appeals and is on a long-term losing streak at the Supreme Court. Several analysts on Tuesday said the ruling does not bode well for KSR International v. Teleflex, the other Federal Circuit patent ruling that is under challenge before the Court this term, involving the test for determining whether an innovation is so obvious that it does not deserve patent protection.

Minerals Agency Targeted In Probe (DENP)

By Steve Raabe, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, January 10, 2007

The Justice Department is conducting criminal inquiries into allegations of ethics violations by individual personnel.

The U.S. Justice Department has begun two criminal investigations into the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service over possible ethics violations.

One of the investigations focuses on individuals at the agency's office in the Denver Federal Center, officials said.

The investigations mark the first time that federal officials are targeting possible criminal activity at the Minerals Management Service.

The agency already has been the subject of noncriminal federal inquiries and audits alleging problems in its mission to collect royalty payments on oil and gas production from federal property.

Allegations of criminal ethics violations are unrelated to the previous inquiries and audits, the agency said in a statement.

"The Minerals Management Service requested an investigation by the Inspector General into two possible ethics violations. These cases have been referred to the Justice Department," the statement said.

"Both cases involve individual personnel, and therefore cannot be discussed outside the investigation itself."

Earlier this month, a report from the Interior Department's inspector general concluded that the Minerals Management Service may be allowing royalty underpayments because of weaknesses and inconsistencies in the agency's audits of energy-company payments.

"Our national budget is stretched to the breaking point. And yet the administration seems to be passing on billions in revenue," said U.S. Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., in a statement. "We allow oil and gas companies onto our federal lands with the understanding that the American people will gain not only energy resources, but revenues. We cannot allow a few individuals to bilk the American people out of revenues they rightly deserve."

In a separate federal inquiry, the Minerals Management Service is under investigation for issuing drilling leases in 1998 and 1999 that failed to require royalty payments, a mistake that could cost the government as much as $10 billion unless the leases are fixed.

The agency announced last week that Royal Dutch Shell, BP, ConocoPhillips and Marathon Oil have agreed to pay royalties under the botched leases. Dozens of other oil and gas producers have not reached similar agreements with the government.

Congress earlier this month narrowly defeated a measure that would have forced the companies to renegotiate the contracts.

Venice May Target Ex-utility Heads (HTRIB)

By Paul Quinlan

The Herald Tribune (Southwest Florida), January 10, 2007

City weighs legal options against bosses involved in 2005 illegal dumping.

VENICE -- The city will consider filing lawsuits or taking other legal action against the former utility department employees believed to be responsible for the illegal dumping to which the city pleaded guilty in federal court in 2005.

The City Council's decision Tuesday to weigh legal options comes days after city leaders learned that federal prosecutors have given up trying to bring criminal charges against any former utility department employees.

The Justice Department's decision to drop the case has angered council members, who say that the actions of a few former employees ultimately cost taxpayers more than $2 million in fines and engineering and legal fees.

"The city felt that it had no choice but to enter into a guilty plea based on the evidence," said council member John Moore, a former judge. "I felt that they should have been prosecuted."

The Department of Justice would not comment on why it closed the case. The City Council instructed the city attorney Tuesday to seek an explanation.

The investigation began after several former utility department employees accused colleagues of illegally dumping excess treated waste water into Curry Creek and spraying it onto a field at Knights Trail in 2001, even though the systems designed to measure and limit flow were not working.

In 2004, the city purged the department, hiring a private firm, Operations Management International, to run the city waste-water operations.

The city pleaded guilty to three felony violations of the Clean Water Act, receiving the minimum fine allowable, $110,000. As part of the plea deal, city officials agreed to cooperate in any further investigation of the supervisors or managers responsible, whom court papers refer to only as the "Executive Group."

But some former employees who claim to be members of the "Executive Group" say that federal prosecutors' decision to walk away from the case proves their innocence. They say current city administrators capitulated to federal prosecutors and used the case and allegations to stage a coup.

"It was politically motivated," said former utility department director John Lane. "I had almost 25 years of an unblemished record with the city. I don't appreciate what they have done to me."

Shane Saputo, the pollution control supervisor at the time, said that the city's decision to enter a plea deal with federal prosecutors represented a betrayal and a waste of money.

"They didn't need to accept it, nor should they have accepted it," Saputo said. "Why did it come to this? Why was there so much money spent on this case?"

Agency Affirms Human Influence On Climate (NYT)

By Andrew C. Revkin

New York Times, January 10, 2007

President Bush has said it.

A lot of government scientists have said it.

But until yesterday, it appeared that no news release on annual climate trends out of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration under the Bush White House had said unequivocally that a buildup of greenhouse gases was helping warm the climate.

The statement came in a release that said 2006 was the warmest year for the 48 contiguous states since regular temperature records began in 1895. It surpassed the previous champion, 1998, a year heated up by a powerful episode of the periodic warming of the tropical Pacific Ocean by El Niño. Last year, another El Niño developed, but this time a long-term warming trend from human activities was said to be involved as well.

“A contributing factor to the unusually warm temperatures throughout 2006 also is the long-term warming trend, which has been linked to increases in greenhouse gases,” the release said, emphasizing that the relative contributions of El Niño and the human influence were not known.

A link between greenhouse gases and climate change was also made in a December news conference by Dirk Kempthorne, the secretary of the interior, as that agency proposed listing polar bears as threatened under the Endangered Species Act.

Still, the climate agency’s shift in language came as a surprise to several public affairs officials there. They said they had become accustomed in recent years to having any mention of a link between climate trends and human activities played down or trimmed when drafts of documents went to the Commerce Department and the White House for approval.

James L. Connaughton, chairman of the White House Council on Environmental Quality, said the release reflected longstanding views within the administration.

“It’s helpful for them to describe what is a question in many people’s minds — what is the human factor, what is the El Niño factor,” Mr. Connaughton said of the NOAA release. “From our perspective, what was in the press release was a direct reflection of what the president and folks in his administration have been saying for some time.”

Mr. Bush has made two speeches on climate. He first expressly accepted that humans were contributing to global warming in a news conference in Denmark in July 2005 on the way to an economic summit in Scotland, saying, “Listen, I recognize that the surface of the Earth is warmer and that an increase in greenhouse gases caused by humans is contributing to the problem."

But the government's scientific bureaucracy, where public affairs officials and scientists as recently as last year complained that findings pointing to climate dangers were being suppressed, has taken time to catch up.

"There's been some sensitivity to the fact that some people have complained that NOAA and other parts of the government haven't been as open as they would like them to have been on this," said Jay Lawrimore, a climatologist at the National Climatic Data Center in Asheville, N.C., where the temperature trends are compiled. "Now NOAA is making an effort to be clearer on some of the influences."

Mr. Lawrimore said there was no way to account for the trends, be they the melting of Arctic sea ice or the warming of winters, without including an influence from heat-trapping gases.

"Year after year as we continue to see warmer temperatures," he said, "there are more and more converts convinced that it's not just natural variability and not just something that's going to return back to temperatures we saw 40 or 50 years ago — that in fact we are doing something to the climate."

Climate Experts Worry As 2006 Is Hottest Year On Record In U.S. (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

Washington Post, January 10, 2007

Last year was the warmest in the continental United States in the past 112 years -- capping a nine-year warming streak "unprecedented in the historical record" that was driven in part by the burning of fossil fuels, the government reported yesterday.

According to the government's National Climatic Data Center, the record-breaking warmth -- which caused daffodils and cherry trees to bloom throughout the East on New Year's Day -- was the result of both unusual regional weather patterns and the long-term effects of the buildup of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere.

"People should be concerned about what we are doing to the climate," said Jay Lawrimore, chief of the climate monitoring branch of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration. "Burning of fossil fuels is causing an increase in greenhouse gases, and there's a broad scientific consensus that is producing climate change."

The center said there are indications that the rate at which global temperatures are rising is speeding up.

Average temperatures nationwide in 2006 were 2.2 degrees Fahrenheit higher than the mean temperatures nationwide for the 20th century, the agency said. It reported that seven months in 2006 were much warmer than average, and that last month was the fourth-warmest December on record. Average temperatures for all 48 contiguous states were above or well above average, and New Jersey logged its hottest temperatures ever.

Many researchers are concerned that rising temperatures could lead to widespread melting of the polar ice caps, resulting in higher sea levels and more extreme droughts and storms. But NOAA also pointed to one silver lining: The unusually warm temperatures from October to December helped keep residential energy use for heating 13.5 percent below the average for that period.

NOAA said an El NiÃ±o weather pattern in the equatorial Pacific also contributed to the warm temperatures by blocking cold Arctic air from moving south and east across the nation.

Climate experts generally do not make much of temperature fluctuations over one or two years, but Lawrimore said the record 2006 temperatures were part of a long and worrisome trend. For instance, NOAA said, the past nine years have all been among the 25 warmest years on record for the continental United States.

Advocates for more action to control carbon dioxide emissions also voiced concern.

"No one should be surprised that 2006 is the hottest year on record for the U.S.," said Brenda Ekwurzel, a climate scientist with the Union of Concerned Scientists, a public interest group. "When you look at temperatures across the globe, every single year since 1993 has been in the top 20 warmest years on record."

"Realistically, we have to start fighting global warming in the next 10 years if we want to secure a safe environment for our children and grandchildren," she said.

Lawrimore said other NOAA research has found that the rate of temperature increase has been significantly greater in the past 30 years than at any time since the government started collecting national temperature data in 1895. Globally, 2005 was the hottest year on record, Lawrimore said, and 2006 was slightly cooler.

He said that although there is a scientific consensus that carbon dioxide from cars, power plants and factories is leading to global warming, there is no consensus yet on whether the warming will increase more quickly or more slowly in the future. Some researcher have predicted that temperatures worldwide will increase by a catastrophic 7 to 8 degrees on average by the end of the century, while others project an increase of a more modest 2 degrees by century's end.

The burning of oil and other fossil fuels releases carbon dioxide, which rises, blankets the Earth and traps heat. Climate scientists report that there has not been this much carbon dioxide in the atmosphere in the past 650,000 years.

The Bush administration has rejected proposals to cap carbon dioxide emissions or impose carbon taxes as a way to limit global warming. Lawrimore said he believes the problem could and should be addressed by developing new technologies for powering vehicles and industry.

Late December's springlike temperatures in the eastern two-thirds of the country made it the fourth-warmest December on record in the United States and contributed greatly to the record high for the year. Several Northern cities were unusually warm -- with Boston 8 degrees above average and Minneapolis-St. Paul 17 degrees above average for the last three weeks of the month.

El Niño Gives USA Its Hottest Year In '06 (USAT)

By Patrick O'Driscoll

DENVER — Last summer's deadly heat wave and a balmy December helped make 2006 the warmest year ever recorded in the USA, federal climate officials announced Tuesday.

The National Climatic Data Center says factors include the El Niño climate pattern and "the long-term warming trend" of climate change, due in part to greenhouse gases. The center says drought in the Plains and parts of the West also played a role. Wildfire agencies say warmth helped make it the worst wildfire season ever, with 9.8 million acres burned.

"There's no denying that climate change is occurring, and warmer winters and warmer years are more common for that reason," says Jay Lawrimore, monitoring chief for the center, which keeps the nation's weather records. "What we're seeing (in 2006) is just becoming so much more common."

New York City, still without snow this winter, last week broke a 129-year record for latest date for the first snowfall. In the Northeast, ski resorts report little snow and temperatures too warm to make artificial snow.

Temperatures were above normal even in Colorado, where major snowstorms before Christmas and New Year's paralyzed Denver and socked the Great Plains. The city's average reading for December was still 1.4 degrees warmer than usual.

A side benefit: Residential energy demand for heating was 13.5% lower than normal for October through December, the center said.

An average national temperature of 55.01 degrees pushed 2006 past 1998 as the warmest on record. Fifteen of the years since 1981 rank among the 25 warmest since national record-keeping began in 1895.

The climate center says the current El Niño, the periodic warming of Pacific waters, is the biggest factor for 2006, and global warming is "a contributing factor." This is believed to be the first time the annual temperature report mentions climate change as a cause.

It was the warmest year ever in New Jersey, and five states had their warmest December — Connecticut, Minnesota, New Hampshire, New York and Vermont.

During last summer's heat wave, record highs from South Dakota across the Plains taxed water supplies for crops and livestock. Heat was blamed for at least 140 deaths in California.

The year's warmth wasn't just about extreme highs. Lawrimore says more than 40% of the USA had higher-than-average overnight lows last summer, compared with 10% in a typical year. Daily records for the highest overnight low were tied or broken more than 3,000 times last summer in hundreds of cities and towns, especially in the West. About 100 locations recorded their all-time highest lows for any date, from 88 in Cedar Butte, S.D., to 102 in Death Valley, Calif.

The Heat Just Keeps On Coming In The U.S. (LAT)

By Robert Lee Hotz

Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

On the fever chart of rising temperatures, 2006 was the warmest year on record for the 48 contiguous states, pairing a lethal summer heat wave with a winter so mild that in some places daffodils bloomed out of season and bears forgot to hibernate, government climate experts reported Tuesday.

Based on an analysis of readings from 1,200 weather stations around the country, the average annual temperature in the Lower 48 states last year was 2.2 degrees higher than the mean temperature for the 20th century and fractionally warmer than in 1998, which previously held the temperature record, the researchers reported.

Seven months last year were much warmer than average, concluded the scientists at the National Climatic Data Center in Asheville, N.C., a branch of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

Indeed, January 2006 was the warmest on record in the U.S. and December was the fourth warmest since record-keeping began in 1895. In five states, December temperatures set record highs: Minnesota, New York, Connecticut, Vermont and New Hampshire.

"We are breaking warm records all over the place," said climate scientist Gavin Schmidt at NASA's Goddard Institute for Space Studies in New York, who was not involved in the NOAA analysis.

Even cities now in winter's stranglehold were relatively balmy. Denver, paralyzed by blizzards during its third snowiest December on record, still basked in a monthly temperature 1.7 degrees higher than the average from 1971 to 2000, the researchers said. In Minneapolis-St. Paul, the temperature was 17 degrees above normal for the last three weeks of December.

Temperatures in California, which experienced a searing heat wave in the summer, ran above normal for the year, but not as high as most of the country.

Each of the last nine years all has been among the 25 warmest years on record in the U.S. — an unprecedented hot streak historically, the scientists said.

Overall, annual temperatures in the U.S. and around the world are one degree higher than a century ago and the rate of warming has accelerated threefold in recent decades. Eight of the last 10 years are the warmest on record worldwide. Climate experts at the British Meteorological Office last week predicted that this year could easily become the warmest year globally on record.

If global temperatures continue to rise as projected, melting icecaps could raise sea level worldwide by up to 3 feet by 2100, swamping coastal communities that are home to millions of people, according to estimates from the United Nations. At the same time, rising temperatures could fuel more powerful storms, while disrupting subtle seasonal patterns of plant growth and animal habitats around the world.

"Global warming is pushing these temperatures ever upward," said meteorologist Michael Mann, director of the Earth System Science Center at Penn State University. "We are loading the dice."

The rising temperature trends of recent years appear to closely track the general predictions of computerized climate models analyzing the effects of greenhouse gases on global climate patterns, several scientists said.

"It looks pretty much like what the climate models of global warming expected," said Penn State University climate analyst Richard Alley, who was not part of the research effort. "We have turned up Earth's thermostat."

Rising levels of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases, which can trap heat in the atmosphere, were a key factor in the warming trend, the climate center researchers said. The rate at which carbon dioxide is being released into the atmosphere has doubled since than 1990s, Australian researchers recently reported, with 7.85 billion tons of CO2 released into the atmosphere in 2005 alone.

But other influences, such as a mild El Niño current stirring in the Pacific Ocean, also played a role in blocking Arctic air that might normally chill the country, they said.

In 1998, record high temperatures were driven by an unusually powerful El Niño current that disrupted weather patterns worldwide. The current El Niño, a periodic warming current that took shape last summer, is far weaker and has had only a moderate effective on global climate, several experts said.

"What we are seeing is much more than El Niño," said climate analyst Kevin Trenberth at the National Center for Atmospheric Research in Boulder, Colo. "The overall pattern is consistent with our concepts of global warming."

To those who analyzed last year's temperature records, the effort to attribute the higher temperatures to relatively transitory minor perturbations in the planet's weather systems missed a more crucial trend.

"The important thing is that, in the long term, warmer temperatures are becoming the norm," said Jay Lawrimore, chief of the climate monitoring branch at the National Climatic Data Center, the federal center that prepared the study. "The expectation is that temperatures will continue to warm in the U.S. and globally."

As a consequence, Lawrimore said, "we expect droughts to become more severe and more widespread; we expect heavier precipitation events to be come frequent; heat waves will become more frequent; storm surges will be higher. Being able to adapt to changing climate will become an important part of daily life."

In last year's temperature extremes, the country got a preview of the future of climate change, several experts said.

Last summer, at least half of the country was parched by prolonged drought as the lack of rain helped fuel a record wildfire season in which 9.8 million acres burned in more than 96,000 wildfires. At the same time, a severe heat wave in some areas, as high as 117 degrees, killed at least 225 people nationwide.

Now in the cold season, farmers in the Northeast are worried that temperatures are too high for fruit trees to winter properly, and wineries complain they can't prepare ice wine because their grapes won't freeze on the vine.

Nationwide, the demand for winter heating oil and other home energy needs is as much as 13.5% lower than the demand expected during average climate conditions, the NOAA scientists calculated.

"People say these things must be due to natural variability in the weather, but any reasonable person who looks at the data can see that we are changing the planet," said climate expert Tim Barnett at the Scripps Institution of Oceanography in La Jolla.

"When you look at global warming patterns," Barnett said, "there is a great big coherent pattern of temperature change."

U.S. To Raise Royalty Rates For Oil And Gas Leases In The Gulf (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

New York Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 — The Bush administration, accused of failing to collect billions of dollars from companies that drill for oil and gas in federal waters, announced on Tuesday that it would demand higher royalties on all new deepwater leases in the Gulf of Mexico.

The Interior Department said it would raise the royalty rate to 16.7 percent from 12.5 percent of oil and gas sales, a change that it estimated would increase government revenue by $4.5 billion over 20 years.

“Increased royalty rates will ensure that during this time of high energy prices the American public receives its fair share of the value of oil and gas,” said Gary Strasburg, a spokesman for the department.

But the change will not alter any of the thousands of existing offshore leases, nor will it affect a mistake in hundreds of leases that could allow companies to escape as much as $10 billion in royalties over the next five years.

The Interior Department has been trying to renegotiate those leases for the last six months, but has managed to reach voluntary agreements with only 5 of the 56 companies that hold them. Two of the biggest players in the Gulf of Mexico, Chevron and Exxon Mobil, have refused to sign new deals.

Next week, House Democrats hope to pass legislation that would punish companies that refuse to renegotiate, either by imposing a stiff new tax on their production or by prohibiting them from acquiring new leases.

“Raising the royalty rates will do nothing to help the situation unless this administration expresses a true commitment to actually collecting these payments,” said Representative Nick J. Rahall II, Democrat of West Virginia and chairman of the House Committee on Natural Resources. “The oil and gas royalties system is broken and needs to be fixed.”

In a separate decision, the Bush administration announced that it might lift a longstanding prohibition on drilling in Bristol Bay, an area off the coast of Alaska that is part of the North Aleutian Basin. The area has been closed to oil and gas leasing since 1990, partly in response to the enormous tanker spill in 1989 by the Exxon Valdez.

The Interior Department also announced plans to open a big new area in the central part of the Gulf of Mexico, a move that Congress authorized in December.

U.S. Is Raising Gulf Royalties For Oil And Gas (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka And Russell Gold

Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration said it is raising royalty payments it charges producers of oil and natural gas in the deeper waters of the Gulf of Mexico, apparently to appease critics in Congress who say the government has failed to collect all of the royalty payments owed it from past Gulf production.

The increase, announced by Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne, would raise the required federal payment on new leases from the current equivalent of one barrel out of every eight produced to one barrel out of six. The higher rate will boost federal royalty revenues by $4.5 billion over 20 years, according to the Interior Department. About 25% of U.S. oil production comes from the Gulf.

Mr. Kempthorne also said President Bush is removing federal drilling bans from two five-million-acre tracts, one in the Gulf of Mexico and another in Bristol Bay, in the North Aleutian Basin of Alaska.

Both moves, he said, are designed to increase opportunities for domestic energy production and to increase federal revenues.

The increase in Gulf royalties comes as oil-rich nations around the globe are responding to soaring oil-company profit by raising royalties and taxes on oil production.

A spokesman for BP PLC, one of the largest producers in the Gulf, Neal Chapman, said, "It's another cost increase and costs are increasing across the board. Any additional burden in the cost equation makes an area less attractive because we look at investment decisions globally."

"At a time we are talking about securing domestic energy, this seems to fly in the face of that," said Erik Milito, a spokesman for the American Petroleum Institute, an industry trade group based in Washington. "It is hard to make an argument that raising the cost to industry is good for consumers." Mr. Milito acknowledged, however, that companies might simply offer lower upfront bids for the right to explore offshore blocks because they know they will have to pay higher royalties. This could end up balancing and not increasing the cost of looking for oil in the Gulf.

Kjersti H. Torgersen, a spokesman for Norway's Statoil ASA, warned that drillers may respond to the higher royalty rate by lowering their bids in future lease sales, which could reduce the federal government's estimated take from the royalty increase. In two lease sales in 2006, the Interior Department received winning bids valued at $912 million.

Democrats Push Green Energy Plans (CHIT)

By William Neikirk

Chicago Tribune, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Democrats are pushing a cleaner, greener energy policy that they will try to drive through the House later this month. But its ultimate outlook is uncertain—and so is its impact.

As part of their 100-hour strategy to pass high-profile legislation, House Democratic leaders want to do away with billions of dollars in oil industry tax incentives and force oil companies to pay higher royalties on Gulf of Mexico leases. The extra money would be used to give a dramatic boost to renewable energy sources.

This shift in energy policy has been widely hailed by organizations that stress renewable and alternative sources of energy such as bio-fuels, solar and wind power. Energy efficiency and conservation groups also hope for more money. Although President Bush increasingly has talked about development of such energy sources, funding has been spotty.

"This was never particularly important to Tom DeLay [the former House Republican majority leader]," said Randall Swisher, executive director of the American Wind Energy Association.

He said he is hopeful Congress will use the extra money partly to extend production tax credits for wind energy for at least five years rather than at the current rate of one to two years at a time, a move that would dramatically increase the size of the industry.

But the new legislation faces two big hurdles—a Senate where Democrats have a razor-thin margin and a White House that backed the tax breaks in the first place.

In addition, some energy analysts said they doubt that the bill would contribute greatly to easing the nation's energy problem any time soon, even if the House bill should become law. For now, emphasizing green power at the expense of other steps may be inadequate to the task, they say.

Philip Verleger, an Aspen, Colo. economist who specializes in the energy industry, said the nation needs a more comprehensive energy policy. He would advocate forcing more conservation by raising energy taxes sharply and imposing tougher mileage standards on vehicles. He also favors a minimum price for oil to keep the price from fluctuating so wildly, and encourage more production.

If the Democratic bill passes, he said, "I don't think much would happen" in terms of its broader impact on energy supply. "The real issues are whether it is going to get signed into law, and how they are going to get it through the Senate. I think the likelihood is that we are going to see a stalemate on energy legislation for the next two years."

Andrew Weissman, an energy consultant in Washington, said he also feels the Democratic approach is inadequate to address the longer-range energy problem that he foresees. "When I look at the situation developing beyond the next three or four years, we are facing massive supply deficits," he said. "I don't see Democrats or Republicans addressing them."

Ironically, oil and natural gas prices have declined markedly since last year, and warmer weather in some parts of the country has continued a downward price push.

But looking beyond the immediate period, the energy-supply situation is less certain. Prices have been extremely volatile in the past few years, and that pattern could continueAnother major energy bill is co-sponsored by Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.). It would require a dramatic expansion in the ethanol and biodiesel fuel supply. Now, ethanol comprises about 5 billion gallons of U.S. supply per year. The bill would raise that to 30 billion gallons by 2020 and 60 billion gallons by 2030. It would also require major oil companies to ensure that within 10 years, half of their gasoline stations would be able to pump gasoline containing 85 percent ethanol. Its chances are uncertain.

Sen. Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.), chairman of the Senate Energy Committee, said in an interview, "I think there is great sentiment in this Congress to move ahead with locking in provisions that will get us to a green energy future. A lot of people campaigned on that last fall, and I think the public is interested" in that energy-policy focus.

At the moment, the oil and gas industry is gearing up to fight the House measure by questioning whether Democrats are removing important incentives for production that could wind up discouraging domestic drilling for extra supply. But some Democrats believe the president might sign the bill.

"It sends the wrong signal to investors," said Charles Drevna, executive vice president of the National Petrochemical and Refiners Association. "It says you are not for increasing energy supply. You are not for increasing domestic resources. What you are for is some punitive measure because the oil and gas and refining industries enjoyed some increased profits. It's Alice-in-Wonderland energy policy."

Mark Kibbe, senior tax policy analyst for the American Petroleum Institute, said the Democrats are focusing on a 2004 job-creation bill providing tax deductions for companies, including oil and gas firms and refineries.

Kibbe said much of the new production occurs in the deep waters of the gulf, where drilling is expensive. "What you do at some point is you make U.S. projects non-economic" against foreign producers, he said.

Details of the legislation are still skimpy, but House leaders said it would call for repeal of about $5 billion in 2004 tax cuts for the oil and gas industry. In addition, it would seek to force oil companies to pay higher royalties on oil drilled in the Gulf of Mexico. House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said last week that extra royalty income could total $9 billion to $11 billion.

Precisely how the money would be used to subsidize renewable fuels is also a question mark, and that decision could come after the House passes the revenue-raising legislation. It is also possible that Democrats would seek to reduce some oil and gas incentives in a 2005 energy bill to raise more money.

"We're going to make sure that we're not subsidizing oil companies, but that we're investing in renewable energy sources and alternative energy sources so that in the long term we will be energy independent," Hoyer said.

Scott Skald, president of the Stella Group LTD., a firm that specializes in renewable energy, said it's crucial that any new money not sit idly in a fund but is used for projects and tax credits. In the past, "green" industries have complained that promised funds either have not materialized or have been trimmed.

Kara Saul Rinadli, senior director of policy for the Alliance to Save Energy, said that after Bush signed a bill calling for a sharp increase in funding for energy efficiency measures, his budget last year sharply cut back on these programs. "It is important that Congress go back and take a look at these programs," she said.

Bush Lifts Oil-Drill Ban In Alaska's Bristol Bay (WP)

By Steven Mufson And Juliet Eilperin

Royalties to Rise for Some Offshore Wells in Advance of Democrats' Plans to Roll Back Tax Breaks

The Bush administration yesterday moved to boost U.S. oil and gas supplies by lifting a long-standing moratorium on drilling in Alaska's Bristol Bay, as OPEC accelerated plans to reduce supplies in order to prop up sagging crude prices.

Days before the House is expected to roll back oil industry tax breaks, the Bush administration also decided to boost royalty rates by a third for ultra-deep-water oil and gas drilling. The action eliminates extra incentives that had been given to offset some of the high costs of operating in those offshore areas. The Interior Department said the change would generate an additional $4.5 billion over 20 years.

Meanwhile, as the line between environmental and energy policy continue to blur, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) announced a plan yesterday that would boost alternative fuels by requiring a 10 percent cut in the carbon content of vehicle emissions by 2020. He said it would be good for the nation's energy security while slowing climate change.

In Washington, Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne announced that the administration would open 5.6 million acres in Alaska's North Aleutian Basin for oil and gas development.

Congress first barred drilling in Bristol Bay in 1989 after the huge Exxon Valdez oil tanker spill damaged Alaska's coast. Congress lifted the ban in 2003 at the urging of Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska). But a moratorium President Bill Clinton declared on drilling in the area in 1998 remained in effect, so it took Bush's action yesterday to open it to development. Bush also lifted a presidential moratorium on part of the Gulf of Mexico that Congress opened for drilling in December.

Kempthorne said the offshore drilling in both areas and the increase in royalty fees would "enhance America's energy security by improving opportunities for domestic energy production, and will also increase the revenues that the federal government collects from oil and gas companies on behalf of American taxpayers."

Bob Greco, group director of upstream and industry operations at the American Petroleum Institute, said that "increasing access to those resources is an important step toward meeting our growing energy demand." But he said that goal would be offset in part by the increase in royalty payments, which he said would undercut industry's enthusiasm for drilling in deep waters off U.S. coasts, where a single well can cost $100 million. Higher royalties could also result in lower bids for leases in deep water, Greco said.

"President Bush's decision to lift this moratorium is welcome news for people who live and work in the Bristol Bay region," Stevens said in a written statement. "Imported farmed salmon, high energy costs, and the area's remoteness have limited economic development and contributed to high poverty in the region."

Other Alaskans decried the decision, saying development would bring in less than $8 billion once all the energy was tapped while undermining a fishing industry that brings in $2 billion a year.

"This decision borders on irresponsible, from our perspective," said Eric J. Siy, executive director of the Alaska Marine Conservation Council. The bay has the world's biggest wild sockeye salmon run as well as abundant red king crab, Pacific halibut and Bering Sea pollock and cod fisheries, he said. "The wise thing to do is to invest in the health of that sustainable economy."

Kempthorne said that any proposed project in Bristol Bay or the Gulf of Mexico "would receive thorough environmental reviews."

But Siy noted that a 1985 federal environmental impact statement suggested that the region posed a danger of a major oil spill. "This is a place with hurricane-force winds, with floating sea ice," he said. An oil spill could be "a nightmare" in an area home to 1 million migrating waterfowl and such marine mammals as endangered right whales, he added.

Meanwhile, the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries was trying to control the winds that have been buffeting oil prices over the past week. Prices on the New York Mercantile Exchange for February delivery slipped to $53.88 a barrel yesterday, below a threshold that many technical analysts said supported high prices. Prices rebounded after reports that OPEC would trim half a million barrels a day from its output immediately instead of waiting until Feb. 1 as planned. The price still closed down 45 cents at $55.64 a barrel, the lowest close since June 15, 2005.

The decline in the value of the dollar has prodded OPEC to try to boost crude oil prices. OPEC oil exports are priced in dollars, but its consumer and industrial imports are largely priced in euros.

In California, Schwarzenegger's administration said that the state would require oil companies to reduce the carbon emitted by their fuels by 10 percent by 2020. Linda S. Adams, secretary of the California Environmental Protection Agency, said that transportation fuels accounted for more than 40 percent of greenhouse gases emitted in the state.

Companies that do not meet that standard could buy credits from other companies that had exceeded the state's goals. This system would resemble what are known as cap-and-trade systems in place for sulfur dioxide emissions in the United States and for greenhouse gases in Europe.

State officials said at a briefing that they hoped that the new regulations would spur development of ethanol, biomass, electric vehicles and hydrogen technology. Schwarzenegger said in a written statement that those alternatives reduce a "petroleum dependency" that "contributes to climate change and leaves workers, businesses and consumers vulnerable to price shocks from an unstable global energy market."

But Charles T. Drevna, executive vice president of the National Petrochemical and Refiners Association, said that "even with global climate change, the energy world is going to revolve around the hydrocarbon molecule for a long time." He said he opposed California's plan. "Last time I checked," he said, "the term was global climate change, not Lower 48 climate change."

SAN FRANCISCO Justice Dept. Undercut Its Own Case, Chronicle Argues (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, January 10, 2007

The Chronicle told a federal appeals court Monday that a secret government filing in support of fines against the newspaper and prison sentences for two of its reporters actually undermines prosecutors' case against the journalists for refusing to disclose the sources of grand jury leaks about athletes and steroids.

Federal prosecutors submitted the documents under seal last month to the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco, saying they contained new information about their efforts to identify the sources of the information supplied to the reporters, Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams. The court has scheduled a hearing Feb. 12 on a judge's contempt-of-court orders against the reporters and The Chronicle.

Their sealed filing came a day after reports by the Associated Press and Yahoo.com that the FBI was investigating a former defense lawyer in the steroid case as a possible source of the leak.

In Monday's filing, lawyers for the reporters and the newspaper argued that prosecutors were effectively conceding they had failed to pursue alternative sources of information about the leaks before going after the reporters.

The Justice Department says it issues subpoenas to journalists only as a last resort. The Chronicle contends the same standard is part of the constitutional guarantee of freedom of the press and was not met in this case.

Lawyers for the Hearst Corp., which owns The Chronicle, said Monday the government has now admitted that it was still looking into alternative sources long after a grand jury issued the subpoenas last May, and after the judge found the reporters and the newspaper in contempt last September.

"The information reflected in the ex parte (sealed) filing reveals that the government is not capable of sustaining its burden of demonstrating that it properly exhausted alternative sources before taking the investigative shortcut of subpoenaing the press," Hearst lawyers said.

They asked the appeals court to dismiss the contempt orders, or at least to allow them to see the sealed government filing and answer it before next month's hearing.

Prosecutors have asked the court to uphold the contempt orders and penalties, saying the Supreme Court has made it clear since 1972 that journalists have no special privilege to withhold evidence from a grand jury.

Fainaru-Wada and Williams wrote articles in 2004 quoting closed-door grand jury testimony by Barry Bonds of the Giants, Jason Giambi of the New York Yankees, sprinter Tim Montgomery and other athletes about performance-enhancing drugs supplied by the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, or BALCO.

The athletes were testifying in an investigation that resulted in guilty pleas by the lab's founder, Victor Conte, and four other men to drug-distribution charges. A separate grand jury is looking into whether Bonds committed perjury by denying that he ever knowingly used steroids.

After another grand jury was convened to investigate the leak, U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White upheld the subpoenas to Fainaru-Wada and Williams and ordered them imprisoned for up to 18 months unless they revealed their sources for the grand jury transcripts. White also said he would fine The Chronicle $1,000 a day until it turned over documents sought by prosecutors. The imprisonment and fines have been delayed until the appeals court reviews White's decision.

In Cocaine Case: Four Men Get Terms In Prison (MARTBULL)

By Debbie Hall, Bulletin Staff Writer

Martinsville (VA) Bulletin, January 10, 2007

Four men have been sentenced by a federal judge in a cocaine distribution conspiracy case.

Heidi Coy, public affairs specialist for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Roanoke, said those sentenced Friday were:

• Felipe Nolasco Alvarez, who received a 10-year prison term for his role in bringing drugs into Henry County;

• Rigoberto Avila-Oropeza, who was sentenced to seven years, three months in prison;

• Noel Rios-Munoz, who received a four-year and nine-month sentence;

• and Antonio Degrado-Vasquez, who was sentenced and will serve four years and three months.

All were sentenced by U.S. District Court Judge Jackson Kiser of Martinsville and were among seven people initially indicted in the case last year in a five-count indictment.

All four had pleaded guilty to one count each of conspiracy to distribute more than 5,000 grams of cocaine, Coy said.

A fifth defendant, Tomas Damian Garcia, was scheduled to appear for his Sept. 26 change of plea hearing but he remains at large.

Another defendant, Calvin Rayfield Moore, also pleaded guilty to count one of the indictment, but died in November in a car crash in Franklin County. As a result, federal officials dismissed charges against him in December, Coy said.

A final defendant, Alvin Donnell Hunt, also pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to distribute more than 5,000 grams of cocaine. His sentencing is slated for April, Coy said.

The federal indictment included charges of conspiracy to distribute 5,000 grams or more of cocaine powder (count 1), possession with intent to distribute cocaine (count 2), possession with intent to distribute cocaine powder (count 3), possession with intent to distribute cocaine powder (count 4) and forfeiture (count 5).

Hunt was charged with counts 1 and 5; Moore was charged with counts 1, 2 and 5; Garcia was charged with counts 1 and 5; Avila-Oropeza on counts 1, 2 and 5; Alvarez on counts 1, 3 and 5; Rios-Munoz on counts 1, 4 and 5 and Antonio Delgado-Vasquez on counts 1 and 5, according to Coy.

The drug distribution ring allegedly was responsible for bringing in more than 3.3 kilograms of cocaine worth nearly $3.3 million into Henry County, U.S. Attorney John Brownlee said when the indictments were issued in April.

The Drug Enforcement Administration and the Virginia State Police investigation into the alleged drug ring began in February when a man was arrested in the Eastern District of Virginia while allegedly in possession of more than 50 grams of cocaine, according to a release from Brownlee's office.

The man told investigators that a Henry County man was his source for the drugs, the release stated. Under the supervision of law enforcement, the man allegedly arranged to meet two men in Henry County to buy cocaine, the release added.

On March 14, the release stated that agents executed a search warrant at Moore's Bassett home. They seized 25 kilograms of cocaine, the release stated.

Before his death, Moore also was cooperating with authorities investigating corruption in the Henry County Sheriff's Office, according to Moore's attorney.

On Nov. 2, former Henry County sheriff H. Frank Cassell, along with 12 former members of his department and seven residents, were charged in a 50-page, 48-count federal indictment which includes allegations of racketeering conspiracy, obstruction of justice, misprision, money laundering, firearms offenses, drug charges, perjury and other charges.

Man Sentenced In '05 Gunbattle (AZREP)

By Elias C. Arnold, The Arizona Republic

Arizona Republic, January 10, 2007

A 25-year-old man has been sentenced to 40 years in prison in connection with a 2005 gunbattle in Gilbert.

Joshua Wayne Trotter was sentenced Monday afternoon after he pleaded guilty in September to seven counts of assaulting a federal officer, unlawful possession of a firearm and use of a firearm during and in retaliation to a crime of violence.

Trotter was accused of shooting at U.S. Marshals, injuring one, June 3, 2005, as they attempted to arrest him on a probation violation federal warrant, according to the U.S. Attorney for Arizona.

Trotter has five previous felony convictions, including assaulting police officers, and a case pending in Coconino County Court on a charge of assault on a family member, the U.S. Attorney's Office said.

The Marshals tracked Trotter, a suspected methamphetamine user, to Gilbert after he is believed to have terrorized his family three weeks earlier near the Grand Canyon, a U.S. Marshals Service representative told The Arizona Republic in 2005.

According to the U.S. Attorney's Office, marshals attempted to block Trotter's path with their vehicles as he drove away from a house east of Lindsay and Pecos roads.

Trotter backed the vehicle into one of the cars, pushing it, and marshals fired at the vehicle before it broke loose and backed into a light pole, the office said. He then fired back at the officers, striking Deputy Dennis Harkins in the hand. Marshals returned fire and struck Trotter in the hand and head.

Gilbert Man Sentenced To 40 Years For Shootout With U.S. Marshals (AP)

PHOENIX - A Gilbert man has been sentenced to 40 years in a federal prison for crimes connected to a shootout with deputy U.S. Marshals who were trying to arrest him in 2005, the U.S. Attorney's Office announced Tuesday.

Joshua Wayne Trotter, 25, pleaded guilty in September to seven counts of assaulting a federal officer and two weapons charges. He was sentenced Monday by U.S. District Judge Paul K. Rosenblatt.

Trotter was leaving his Gilbert home on June 3, 2005 when federal agents in two vehicles blocked his car and turned on their emergency lights, according to the U.S. Attorney. Trotter backed up and slammed into a third Marshals' vehicle.

A Marshal opened fire as Trotter pushed the other Marshal's car backwards, and Trotter returned fire with a pistol, striking one deputy in the hand. Trotter eventually was shot twice and surrendered. He had five previous felony convictions and has an assault case pending in Coconino County Court.

Rosenblatt described Trotter as a "poster-boy for the effects of methamphetamine," at the sentencing, the U.S. Attorney's office said.

Mexican Man Extradited To U.S. To Face Charges In Slaying Of California Deputy Sheriff (AP)

Associated Press

AP, January 10, 2007

MEXICO CITY – A Mexican man was extradited to the United States on Tuesday in connection with the slaying of a deputy sheriff in California.

Jorge Arroyo Garcia, alias Jorge Rubo or Armando Garcia, was flown to the northern city of Tijuana, across the border from San Diego, California, and formally handed over to agents from the United States Marshals Service, the Mexican Attorney General's Office said in a news release.

According to U.S. authorities, Arroyo is believed to have shot Los Angeles County Deputy Sheriff David March during a traffic stop in April 2002. In addition to murder, Arroyo is accused of illegal weapons possession.

Arroyo was first captured by Mexican authorities in 2004 and he has been held in a Mexican prison since. He filed various appeals fighting his extradition that eventually were dismissed.

The Attorney General's Office described Arroyo as one of the United States Marshal Service's most-wanted fugitives.

Arroyo's name did not appear Tuesday on the 15 Most Wanted Fugitives list or the Captured 15 Most Wanted list that appear on the service's Web site.

U.S. Ambassador to Mexico Tony Garza lauded the Mexican government's action, saying, "With this very important extradition, it is clear that under the (President Felipe) Calderon administration, the governments of Mexico and the U.S. will continue our unprecedented law enforcement cooperation and that we will bring to justice anyone who does harm to the law enforcement officials who protect our way of life."

Garza noted that last year alone, the administration of then-President Vicente Fox extradited 63 alleged criminals from Mexico to the United States.

Man Charged In L.A. Deputy's Killing Extradited (LAT)

By Sam Enriquez And Andrew Blankstein

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

MEXICO CITY — The Mexican government today turned over to U.S. authorities a man charged with the 2002 killing of Los Angeles County Sheriff's Deputy David March.

Jorge Armando Arroyo Garcia was taken by airplane from Mexico City, where he was in jail, to Tijuana. A SWAT unit from the Mexican federal police escorted him.

A convoy of local and federal authorities then took him into U.S. custody at 5 a.m.

"I felt it would be a day of celebration, instead it's a day of extreme sorrow," Teri March, the deputy's widow, said at an afternoon news conference.

Also attending were L.A. County Sheriff Lee Baca, L.A. County Dist. Atty. Steve Cooley and Mexican officials.

The extradition marks a victory for L.A. prosecutors and local police, who have been trying for several years to get Garcia to stand trial. Detectives allege that after shooting March during a traffic stop in Irwindale, Garcia fled to Jalisco, Mexico. He was arrested last year.

March, 33, was a seven-year veteran who stopped a black Nissan, allegedly driven by Garcia, during a routine morning patrol on April 29, 2002. March, who lived with his wife and stepdaughter in Santa Clarita, was shot several times and later died at a hospital.

Garcia, said to be an illegal immigrant and drug dealer, was identified as a suspect by investigators, but had fled to Mexico.

Mexican police were said to be helping in the search, but at that time the extradition of fugitives to the U.S. from Mexico was in dispute. Mexican judges balked at allowing Mexican nationals to be returned to a country where they could face the death penalty or life in prison.

In 2004, Mexico's Supreme Court ended a four-year argument with the U.S. over extradition by ruling that thousands of slaying suspects could be returned.

Opinion in Mexico on the issue had changed, as Mexican states began imposing harsher penalties on criminals in an effort to curb violent crime.

IMMIGRATION:

AP, January 10, 2007

CINCINNATI (AP) — A retired Ohio auto worker ordered deported over accusations that he was a Nazi death camp guard during World War II has started another appeal in a federal court, his lawyer said Tuesday.

John Demjanjuk, 86, of suburban Cleveland, on Dec. 21 lost his previous attempt to avoid deportation when the Board of Immigration Appeals in Falls Church, Va., rejected his appeal of an immigration judge's 2005 deportation order.

But Demjanjuk still has the right to appeal that ruling in federal courts, so the filing of a petition for review in the 6th Circuit in Cincinnati was expected. The filing Monday starts the next appeal process, defense lawyer John Broadley said.

The immigration appeals board said Demjanjuk's Nazi guard past is conclusively established.

Demjanjuk's case dates back nearly 30 years. He was cleared in 1993 in Israel of being the notorious "Ivan the Terrible," a sadistic guard at the Treblinka concentration camp in Poland. But the Justice Department said World War II documents prove he was a Nazi guard at various death or forced labor camps.

Demjanjuk, a native Ukrainian, has denied he aided the Nazis and came to the United States after the war as a displaced person.

Lawmakers Support 2 Convicted Agents (ELPT)

By Louie Gilot

El Paso Times, January 10, 2007

Five congressmen said they will have a news conference today in Washington, D.C., to support the efforts of two former El Paso Border Patrol agents to remain free on bond while they appeal their convictions in the case of a drug smuggler who was shot in the buttocks in 2005 near Fabens.

The elected officials said they wrote to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales requesting the Justice Department to direct federal prosecutors to not oppose a motion for bond continuance by Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean. If a federal judge denies the motion, Ramos and Compean have to surrender on Jan. 17 to start their prison sentences.

The lawmakers are U.S. Reps. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., Ted Poe, R-Texas, Walter Jones, R-N.C., Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., and Duncan Hunter, R-Calif.

Plans For Border Fence Draw Renewed Scrutiny (MCT)

By Dave Montgomery

McClatchy Newspapers, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON - With Democrats now in charge on Capitol Hill, a 700-mile fence that swept through the previous Republican-controlled Congress is apt to come under a scathing re-evaluation amid reports of skyrocketing costs and widening opposition along the U.S.-Mexican border.

Mayors from Texas border cities will meet with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff next week with what they say is a unified message: Don't build the fence. The meeting is scheduled for Jan. 17 in the office of Texas Republican Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison.

"We all oppose the fence," said Efrain Valdez, mayor of Del Rio, Texas.

The growing outcry from local officials parallels renewed concerns over costs following a report that the price tag for building and maintaining the fencing could reach nearly $50 billion over a 25-year period. The cost projections were prepared by the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service and reported this week by the San Francisco Chronicle.

The doubled-layered fence, which will be built in at least five sections in all four states that border Mexico, was passed overwhelmingly by the Republican-led 109th Congress and signed into law by President Bush. It was the only major immigration and border security initiative to emerge from the last session of Congress and was denounced by Democrats as a blatant political maneuver to court conservative voters.

But with Democrats leading both the House of Representatives and the Senate, many experts in the immigration debate now wonder if the fence will ever be built. For one thing, Congress only partially funded the project, and members of the Democratic leadership may be stingy when it comes to financing an undertaking they opposed in the first place.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and two key House members who'll oversee the debate on immigration this year - Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers, D-Mich., and Rep. Zoe Lofgren, D-Calif., who'll chair the House immigration subcommittee - all voted against the fence when it passed the House 283-138 on Sept. 14.

They were among 132 Democrats who opposed the Secure Fence Act. Only six Republicans voted against it.

In a pre-emptive effort to move the project forward, Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., a leading sponsor of the act, and 37 fellow GOP House members wrote Bush last week, urging the president to continue funding for the fence when he unveils his federal spending priorities next month for fiscal 2008.

"Americans overwhelmingly support the construction of targeted fencing along our southern border," the lawmakers wrote. "The fact remains that fences act as a deterrent and keep people from risking their lives to cross the border."

Other signers of the letter included Reps. Joe Barton, R-Texas; John Doolittle, R-Calif.; and four Republicans from North Carolina - Sue Myrick, Walter Jones, Robin Hayes and Howard Coble. Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., a leader of anti-immigration forces in the House, also signed the letter.

The Congressional Research Service, which briefs lawmakers on issues, said the 2006 legislation could mandate up to 850 miles of fencing. In sharp contrast with initial projections of $2.2 billion for 700 miles of fencing, the researchers said that the cost of building and maintaining a fence over a 25-year lifecycle could range from $16.4 million to $70 million per mile.

The report didn't calculate a total, but, under the highest projections, the cost would be $49 billion for a 700-mile fence.

"At issue for Congress is how best to allocate scarce border resources while safeguarding homeland security," the report stated. "Does border fencing represent the best investment of border security funding, and what is the appropriate mix of border security resources?"

The Department of Homeland Security is charged with overseeing fence construction and has commissioned the Boeing Co. to construct a high-tech border security shield, including cameras and radar, that will be coupled with traditional fencing.

TAX:

I.R.S. Use Of Private Debt Collectors Is Criticized (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

The national taxpayer advocate called on Congress yesterday to repeal the authority of the Internal Revenue Service to use private debt collectors.

In her annual report, the taxpayer advocate, Nina E. Olson, said the private debt collection program was economically inefficient and prone to abuse. In particular, she faulted the I.R.S. for not disclosing certain “psychological techniques” used by the private contractors to try to collect unpaid taxes.

The office of the taxpayer advocate was created by Congress to identify problems within the I.R.S. that affect taxpayers and to promote their interests before the agency and Congress, which writes the tax code.

Ms. Olson’s office provided its most extensive review yet of the private debt-collection program, which it has been monitoring for two years since plans for it were announced. The program, which formally started in September, is meant to farm out easily collectible tax bills, typically owed by low-income taxpayers, to private collection agencies. When the I.R.S. announced the program, it said that the private entities would abide by the same publicly disclosed rules as I.R.S. employees.

Private debt collection has drawn criticism that it is not cost-efficient and that some of the private firms hired by the I.R.S. have questionable business practices. One firm hired by the agency was the law firm of Linebarger Goggan Blair & Sampson of Austin, Tex., whose former partner, Juan Peña, pleaded guilty to federal bribery charges for his role in winning a collection contract from the city of San Antonio.

The taxpayer advocate also criticized some of the techniques used by private collectors. "In an initial draft of this report, we cited sections of a collection script used by one of the contractors which used psychological tricks during the conversation to get the taxpayers to commit to a payment, which is then followed by a belated Fair Debt Collection Practices Act warning at the end of the conversation," the report says.

"The I.R.S. informed us that private collection agencies had designated the 'collection scripts' and operational plans as proprietary and that we could not cite specific portions of the scripts."

She then wrote that the I.R.S. had later asked the three private debt collection firms to release information on their practices. One firm complied, Ms. Olson wrote, the second released partial information, and the third refused to release any information.

In a brief telephone interview yesterday, Ms. Olson said, "Taxes are the lifeblood of government; to have private agents collecting them changes the relationship between the taxpayer and government."

In its written response to Ms. Olson's criticism of the private debt-collection program, the I.R.S. said that it "strives to make certain that P.C.A. employees adhere to the same guidelines and restrictions as I.R.S. employees." P.C.A. refers to private debt collectors.

The I.R.S. also said that it had taken steps to have all three private debt collection firms approve the release of the documents sought by Ms. Olson, and that it was releasing "other appropriate information."

The I.R.S. began using three private debt collectors last September for 12,500 cases considered easy to collect, and expects to process 446,000 cases over two and a half years, Ms. Olson wrote. The collectors keep 25 cents of every dollar they collect. So far they have collected just 8 percent of the dollars assigned to them, she wrote — less than certain I.R.S. units with more difficult collection cases.

"Our conclusion is that this initiative is fatally flawed, risking much for a small return on investment," she wrote.

The commissioner of internal revenue, Mark W. Everson, has said that if the I.R.S. had more money it would not have to outsource tax collection to private firms.

Ms. Olson also noted a 36 percent rise last year in demands, called notices of levy, that the I.R.S. sends to delinquent taxpayers asking them to settle their bills with the agency. A significant portion of such demands were served on elderly or disabled taxpayers, she wrote.

In her report, Ms. Olson also recommended that Congress improve funding for the I.R.S., which received $10.6 billion to collect $2.2 trillion, or 98 percent of all federal revenue. She also recommended, for a second consecutive year, that Congress protect not-guilty spouses from the burdens of tax crimes, by repealing joint and several liability rules. She also called upon Congress to create a federal oversight agency to supervise quasigovernment retirement plans, "to ensure that they are carrying out their fiduciary duties."

Ms. Olson also said that the I.R.S. failed to turn over documents concerning its internal deliberations on tax matters. This was the first time that the I.R.S. failed to turn over documents requested by the office of the taxpayer advocate, she said.

"The effect of this refusal is to thwart Congressional intent in seeking a taxpayer perspective on potential problems within the I.R.S.," Ms. Olson wrote. "As a consequence, Congress is being left in the dark, and taxpayers are being harmed." Ms. Olson did not specify in her report what types of documents she was looking for or what issues they addressed.

In its response, the I.R.S. said that it was "committed to improving the way it manages instructions to staff."

IRS Urged To Abandon Private Debt Collection (WP)

By Kathleen Day

The Internal Revenue Service should abandon its four-month-old program of sending unpaid, uncomplicated tax debts of $25,000 or less to private bill collectors, national taxpayer advocate Nina E. Olson told Congress yesterday.

Olson, the federal official appointed by the Treasury secretary to champion taxpayer rights, said the plan already has proved unfair to consumers because private debt collectors will not make public the policies and procedures they use to extract repayments, as government tax collectors are required to do.

Olson, who heads the Taxpayer Advocate Service, an independent organization within the IRS, a unit of the Treasury Department, said she thinks the IRS could do a better job and for less money. She included the recommendation in a report to Congress that the national taxpayer advocate is required to make each year about issues the officeholder considers the gravest facing the IRS.

In addition to advocating that lawmakers revoke the IRS's authority to use private collection agencies, the report says the alternative minimum tax and the multibillion-dollar tax gap are both fundamentally unfair and are among the top issues facing the nation's tax collector.

Olson's recommendations were greeted warmly by the Democrats who will chair the two congressional committees that oversee the IRS, Max Baucus of Montana of the Senate Finance Committee and Charles B. Rangel of New York of the House Ways and Means Committee. Baucus and Rangel have strongly criticized the use of private debt collectors and have said the job should stay within the government, a position both reiterated yesterday.

Both also repeated their vow to tackle the alternative minimum tax, or AMT, and the tax gap -- the $290 billion to $350 billion in uncollected taxes -- in legislation this year.

The AMT is a parallel tax system Congress created in 1969 to ensure that even the richest people pay some federal tax. But because it hasn't been adjusted for inflation, and the regular tax system has, more and more people could find themselves having to pay higher taxes under the AMT.

The Tax Policy Center, a nonprofit joint research project of the Brookings Institution and the Urban Institute, estimates that if Congress had not frozen the AMT in 2005 at a level where it now affects nearly 4 million filers, it would have applied to more than 12.7 million out of more than 130 million individual tax filings, up from 1 million in 1999. By 2010, if Congress doesn't abolish it or freeze it at current levels, about 30 million taxpayers will be subject to the AMT, or about 92 percent of households with incomes between $100,000 and $500,000.

Financial planners say the tax cuts President Bush has touted pushed more Americans than ever into the AMT. Rangel said jettisoning the AMT will require "a look at the whole tax code" to make it fairer -- and to make up what the AMT brings in each year, estimated to be $70 billion for 2007.

The IRS has said the use of private debt collectors is necessary unless Congress provides the agency with more resources, and Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), outgoing chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said it's too soon to judge the program.

Olson said the IRS is doing a better job of telling taxpayers when the they're suspected of filing bogus requests for refunds. Last year, Olson criticized the IRS's criminal investigation arm for stalling thousands of refunds, sometimes for months and even years, without telling the taxpayers why or allowing them to respond.

The Tax Hit You May Not See Phaseouts, Which Limit Tax Breaks Based On Income, Come Under Renewed Fire; What To Watch Out For (WSJ)

By Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

Millions of people are paying taxes at higher rates than they probably realize because of tricky provisions that can reduce -- or even eliminate -- major tax breaks based on their income.

These so-called phaseouts (because some benefits begin to phase out when your income exceeds certain levels) and similar provisions should be repealed, or at least simplified, said Nina Olson, the Internal Revenue Service's National Taxpayer Advocate, in a report to Congress released yesterday. Ms. Olson, who isn't a political appointee, heads an IRS unit designed to help taxpayers cut through red tape and deal with problems that typically couldn't be resolved through normal channels.

STEALTH TAXES

• Many people stand to lose part or all of key tax benefits because their income is too high.

• Numerous tax benefits include income-based "phaseout" provisions.

• Among the breaks affected: the phaseout of personal exemptions and limits on many itemized deductions.

• A new report by IRS National Taxpayer Advocate Nina Olson urges Congress to repeal, or at least simplify, phaseouts.

Source: IRS National Taxpayer Report

The report says more than 60 million individual income-tax returns, about 44% of the total filed last year, are affected each year by one or more of these provisions, which can drive up a taxpayer's marginal tax rate well above his or her official tax rate.

It's doubtful that Congress will eliminate phaseouts. Repealing them would cost the U.S. Treasury Department billions of dollars each year at a time when lawmakers are focusing more on cutting budget deficits than on simplifying the nation's notoriously complex tax system. Yet the report throws a new spotlight on a dimly lit corner of the tax world that many taxpayers need to understand more thoroughly in order to make intelligent tax and investment-planning decisions.

Phaseouts are also referred to as "stealth" taxes because they're difficult for the average taxpayer to detect. Among the most significant: limits on personal exemption amounts and on many itemized deductions, such as charitable contributions and state and local taxes, for taxpayers whose income exceeds certain levels. (More than 5.7 million individual returns for 2004 were hit by the income limit on itemized deductions. As a result, taxpayers were unable to deduct a total of more than $36.7 billion of itemized deductions for that year.)

DISAPPEARING TAX BENEFIT

See a sampling of major tax benefits.

Other benefits that may be affected include a credit for adopting a child, the child tax credit and education-related incentives. A new deduction for mortgage insurance also has phaseout provisions.

Even sophisticated taxpayers may be unaware of this issue since growing numbers of Americans are paying someone else to do their taxes for them. Last year, more than 60% of all taxpayers used paid preparers, up from 40% in the mid-1980s. And growing numbers of people rely on tax-preparation software to do the number-crunching for them.

"Most of my clients are unaware" of the phaseouts, says Stephen W. DeFilippis, owner of West Suburban Income Tax Service in Wheaton, Ill., and an enrolled agent, which means he is licensed to represent taxpayers before the IRS. He says clients often are amazed their tax bill was significantly higher than expected.

Phaseouts need to be repealed, said Ms. Olson, because they inject "needless complexity" into the tax laws, reduce the effectiveness of tax incentives, and make it tougher for many taxpayers to estimate their tax bills and pay the right amount of withholding or estimated taxes. Also, she argued, they probably reduce overall tax compliance.

"They add quite a bit of complexity to the tax code," agrees Lindy Paull of PricewaterhouseCoopers in Washington. Ms. Paull is a former chief of staff of Congress's Joint Committee on Taxation, which issued a lengthy report in 2001 urging Congress repeal numerous phaseout provisions.

Many phaseouts and other similar provisions affect only upper-income taxpayers, such as the one that applies to personal exemptions. For this year, each personal exemption is a maximum of $3,400, up $100 from 2006. But if your income exceeds a certain level, the most you can claim on your return for 2007 will be $1,133, the IRS says. For a married couple filing jointly, the personal exemption begins to phase out when their income exceeds $234,600 for 2007 and reaches the maximum phaseout amount after $357,100. For most singles, the range is $156,400 to $278,900.

Congress voted to ease this provision starting in 2006, and repeal it entirely in 2010. But nobody knows whether that will happen now that the Democrats have recaptured control of both houses of Congress. Some Democrats say they want to roll back President Bush's tax breaks for higher-income taxpayers.

Other provisions affect people with much less income. For example, there are complex rules for how much of your Social Security benefits may be subject to tax.

Suppose your income -- which, for this purpose, includes such items as tax-exempt interest income and half of your Social Security benefits -- exceeds $32,000 but not more than $44,000. In that case, a maximum of half your Social Security benefits would be reported as part of your adjusted gross income. If your income exceeds $44,000, up to 85% of your Social Security benefits would be included as income and taxed accordingly.

As a result, some lower-income Americans may be paying significantly higher tax rates than they think.

Phaseouts are popular among lawmakers as a revenue-raising device since raising tax rates typically creates much bigger headlines -- and more of a political firestorm -- than tweaking complex phaseouts and other provisions. Thus, it would appear that many stealth taxes are here to stay. * * *

The IRS sets Feb. 3 as the starting date to process returns claiming tax benefits enacted last month.

Congress waited until last month to extend the life of several tax breaks that had expired at the end of 2005. Among the now-resurrected provisions, known as "extenders," is the option for taxpayers who itemize to deduct state and local sales taxes instead of state and local income taxes. Other revived provisions include special deductions for higher-education tuition and fees and for educator expenses.

Any other returns for individuals not claiming the extender provisions can be filed as normal this month, the IRS said. * * *

AMT, Tax Gap Called Gravest Tax Problems (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, January 10, 2007

A tax law meant to crack down on wealthy tax dodgers has instead become the most serious problem facing millions of other taxpayers.

For the government, the biggest problem is billions of dollars in unpaid taxes, National Taxpayer Advocate Nina E. Olson said Tuesday in a report to Congress on the hurdles Americans face in meeting their tax obligations.

Olson, who works independently within the Internal Revenue Service, also urged Congress to repeal IRS authority to contract out to private collection agencies, saying the IRS is better trained and more efficient in collecting delinquent taxes.

The advocate is required to submit an annual report to Congress listing at least 20 of the most serious problems encountered by taxpayers.

This year the list was topped by the alternative minimum tax, which was enacted in 1969 to close loopholes that enable the wealthy to avoid paying taxes. But because the law was not indexed for inflation, a provision that originally affected about 20,000 taxpayers now hits tens of millions.

"Today the AMT is left to punish taxpayers for engaging in such 'classic tax-avoidance behavior' as having children or living in a high-tax state," the report said in its summary.

Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., the incoming chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, and Senate Finance Committee leaders Max Baucus, D-Mont., and Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, have promised to address the AMT issue this year. But repealing the law, under which taxpayers reaching a certain income level lose dependent or state and local tax exemptions, could cost up to $1 trillion over the next decade. There's no consensus on how to make up for the lost revenues.

The second most serious problem was the gap between what taxpayers should be paying and what the IRS is collecting, estimated at $290 billion a year. The advocate said that noncompliance by some taxpayers requires good-faith taxpayers to pay an additional $2,200 a year.

It said the gap could be narrowed by tax simplification, tax withholding on non-wage income in certain situations and improved IRS compliance initiatives.

The report said the government loses billions of dollars because it does not intervene at an early stage on delinquent tax accounts, and does not fully utilize collection payment alternatives such as installment agreements.

It said the IRS also fails to provide the meaningful services that low income taxpayers need to meet their obligations regarding delinquencies, doesn't do enough to help small businesses with professional advice, and lacks adequate oversight over unenrolled return preparers.

"Simplifying the tax code, particularly by repealing the AMT and reducing the inequities caused by the tax gap, will go a long way to helping America's taxpayers," said Olson.

The IRS, in its comments on the report, said it often allows taxpayers in arrears to pay over time, noting there were 2.77 million installment agreements in fiscal 2006, up 5 percent over the previous year.

It also defended the private collection program that was inaugurated last September, saying the program strives to make certain that private collection employees adhere to the same guidelines and restrictions as IRS employees. It said that in fiscal

2007 it expects gross revenues from the program to range from $33.8 million to $62.3 million, with costs between $23 million and $29.3 million.

National Treasury Employees Union President Colleen M. Kelley welcomed the recommendation to end the private collection program, saying paying debt collectors "a bounty of up to 25 percent of the money they collect is a waste of taxpayers' dollars and exposes taxpayers to the risk of identity theft and overly aggressive collection tactics."

The advocate recommended that Congress change its budget-writing procedures under which the IRS must compete with other agencies for federal dollars. "The IRS' lack of resources is a significant impediment to its ability to close the tax gap and thereby to reduce the federal budget deficit," the report said.

It also recommended elimination or simplification of phase-outs, under which various tax benefits are reduced as a taxpayer's income rises. It said such complexity is burdensome to taxpayers and may contribute to increased noncompliance.

The advocate did praise the IRS for making improvements in the Questionable Refund Program, which topped the list in 2005 as the most serious problem. The program came under fire for freezing the refunds of tens of thousands of taxpayers the IRS deemed questionable without telling people they were suspected of fraud. It noted that under new procedures all taxpayers receive notice of an IRS inquiry into a refund.

FEDERAL DIARY: Tax Collection Debate Is A Product Of Budget Battles (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, January 10, 2007

There always seems to be a disagreement over the numbers in government reports these days. Take the latest dispute over how many Internal Revenue Service employees it takes to monitor private tax collection efforts:

According to the national taxpayer advocate's annual report sent to Congress yesterday, the IRS has 65 employees overseeing 75 contract workers hired to collect unpaid tax bills.

Not exactly, the IRS said in comments elsewhere in the report. There are 65 IRS employees who work "as needed," but the time they are putting in is only equivalent to 31 full-time workers, the IRS said.

That jousting is a small part of a big debate over whether tax collection can be outsourced efficiently and in a way that protects the confidentiality of taxpayer records.

Nina E. Olson, the taxpayer advocate, clearly thinks the risks are too great. "It is difficult to fathom how 75 employees can achieve what the IRS cannot with its thousands of collection employees," she wrote.

She warned against "the hidden costs of using private collectors, notably potential erosion of customer service, lack of transparency of private collection operations, potential failure to provide consistent treatment for all taxpayers, and potential erosion of tax compliance."

Olson runs an independent office inside the IRS that hears from taxpayers who think they have been treated unfairly or who think the tax system is broken. The advocate's office sends Congress a report each year listing the most serious problems confronting taxpayers. [See story, Page D3.]

The idea of using private-sector debt collection companies to get small-time tax delinquents to pay up has been controversial since Congress gave the green light to the program in 2004. Some members of Congress have questioned whether the program will prove effective, and the National Treasury Employees Union, which represents IRS workers, is lobbying on Capitol Hill to ban such outsourcing.

Under the program, the debt-collection companies get a commission of up to 25 cents for every dollar they collect. The IRS has estimated that the outsourcing program will bring in about $1.4 billion, less costs, over 10 years and should free up revenue agents to focus on more complex cases and big-time tax cheats.

The outsourcing program, to a large degree, grew out of the pull-and-push over annual IRS budgets. The congressional appropriations process each year has kept the agency from getting a little extra money that could bring in a lot more tax revenue, Olson contended in her report.

If the government were a business, the IRS could be considered the "accounts receivable department" that generates revenue, Olson said. But Congress treats the IRS budget the way it treats other agency budgets, and that means the IRS in recent years has been pitted against housing, transportation and other programs for money and resources.

The budget process "makes little sense," Olson said, because the IRS has said that its employees collect unpaid taxes more cheaply than contractors do. She noted that an IRS study in 2002 calculated the agency received enough money to work only 40 percent of its overdue tax accounts.

In her report, Olson recommended that Congress consider revising its budget rules in a way that lets the IRS receive funding aimed at maximizing tax compliance each year. Olson also recommended that Congress increase IRS personnel funding by 2 to 3 percent each year to allow the agency to increase staffing.

Colleen M. Kelley, president of the Treasury union, recently called for IRS staffing to be restored to 1998 levels to improve tax collection. Since 1998, she said, the number of revenue officers, who collect delinquent taxes, has declined by about 40 percent while the ranks of revenue agents, who audit tax returns, have dropped by about 30 percent.

"If the administration is serious about closing the tax gap," Kelley said, "it needs to ask Congress for more people."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Judicial Nominees Ask To Withdraw (AP)

By David Espo

AP, January 10, 2007

In a concession to the Senate's new Democratic majority, President Bush won't rename four controversial federal appeals court nominees whose confirmations were blocked last year, Republican officials said Tuesday.

William Haynes, William G. Myers III and Michael Wallace all asked to have their appointments withdrawn, these officials said. Judge Terrence Boyle was informed of the White House's decision, according to an ally.

Haynes is the Pentagon's top lawyer, and was an architect of the Bush's now-abandoned policy toward treatment of detainees in the war on terror. He had been tapped for the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Boyle is a federal judge in North Carolina, and his appointment to the 4th Circuit provoked opposition from Democrats who cited his rulings in civil rights and disability cases, as well as his higher-than-average reversal rate by higher courts.

Myers, nominated to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, sparked opposition from environmentalist organizations and their allies among Senate Democrats.

Wallace's appointment to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals drew opposition from Democrats, civil rights groups and the American Bar Association.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, has said only "consensus nominees" are likely to win confirmation under the new Democratic majority — a declaration that effectively doomed the chances for the four men whose appointments were left in limbo when the Senate adjourned last year for the elections.

Deputy White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said the president was disappointed about the withdrawals.

"Each of these nominees was well-qualified to serve as judges and would have been confirmed if they had been given a fair, up-or-down vote in the Senate," Perino said. "Unfortunately, a few selected senators prevented these nominees from receiving fair consideration. The president is disappointed in this inaction, and hopes that the days of judicial obstructionism are beyond us."

One Senate Democrat, Sen. Charles Schumer, issued a statement saying, "This reversal is one of the first tangible signs that the president heard and is heeding the message from Novembers election."

But Ed Whelan, president of the Ethics and Public Policy Center and a former clerk for Justice Antonin Scalia, countered for conservatives. "In support of their own agenda of liberal judicial activism, Senate Democrats have engaged in unprecedented measures of obstruction against the president's highly qualified nominees," he said.

Lars H. Liebeler, a Washington lawyer, said in a telephone interview that Boyle, unlike Wallace, Haynes and Myers, did not submitted a letter asking to be withdrawn but was told of the president's intentions.

Several Republican officials said the White House was likely to make the announcement later in the day.

They said Bush also intends to appoint 33 other judicial nominees, including three whose appointments were not acted on by the Senate in 2006.

The officials who described the developments did so on condition of anonymity, saying they did not want to pre-empt a formal announcement.

Bush Drops 4 Embattled Judicial Nominees (MCT)

By Barbara Barrett And James Rosen

McClatchy Newspapers, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON - After years of struggling to push controversial judicial nominees through a Republican-controlled Senate, President Bush acknowledged Tuesday that if he can't get his nominees through his own party, he has no chance among the Democrats.

Bush declined Tuesday to rename four controversial nominees to serve on the U.S. Court of Appeals. Three nominees withdrew, but U.S. District Judge Terrence Boyle of North Carolina refused, saying in an interview Tuesday that it wasn't his place.

"I didn't quit," said Boyle, whose case may be the longest nomination-in-waiting in U.S. history. He was first nominated for the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals in 1991 by President George H.W. Bush and was nominated six more times by the current President Bush.

"In terms of me throwing in the towel or quitting, that's not what I'm going to do," Boyle said. "I'm not going to let them beat me down."

Bush's decision shocked neither the nominees nor observers.

"Of course not," Boyle said. "I watched the election returns. How could you not be confirmed with a 10-vote majority and expect to be confirmed when you're in the minority?"

Still, Bush renominated the men in mid-November, just after Democrats narrowly won control of the U.S. Senate in midterm elections. The renominations came after months of threats from Democrats to filibuster Boyle and Haynes if then-Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist brought their names to the floor for a vote.

"If you can't confirm nominees when you have a 55-45 majority, it's unlikely you'll confirm them when the other party's in the majority," said Carl Tobias, a University of Richmond law professor.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the new chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said Tuesday that Bush made "the right decision."

The controversies took up valuable time last year, Leahy said, and impeded progress on other judicial nominees.

Now, Leahy said in a statement, Congress can start over and move beyond "political game-playing."

"The White House saw the writing on the wall," said Leslie Proll, director of the Washington office for the NAACP's Legal Defense and Education Fund, which fought the nominations. "With the Democrats in charge, the chances were not good."

Bush's decision also was a victory for Republican South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, a military lawyer. Graham opposed Haynes' appointment because of Haynes' role in formulating tough interrogation techniques for accused terrorist detainees as Defense Department general counsel.

"I appreciate Mr. Haynes' service to our country and know this is a difficult decision," Graham said. "Now is the time for us to push ahead and fill vacancies on the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals ... with solid conservative and confirmable nominees."

In a Dec. 19 letter to Bush, obtained Tuesday by McClatchy Newspapers, Haynes asked the president to withdraw his name from consideration.

"It is not at all clear that any vote would be forthcoming in the 110th Congress and, absent such a vote, you would lose the opportunity to fill the judicial vacancy for which you nominated me," Haynes wrote.

Myers' nomination had received a tepid endorsement from the American Bar Association's review panel and was opposed by environmental groups. Myers, a former Interior Department lawyer and a lobbyist for cattle and mining interests, had compared federal public lands policy to King George III's reign over colonial America.

Wallace, a native of Biloxi, Miss., was found unanimously by the American Bar Association review board to be "not qualified." The ABA committee praised Wallace's intellect and integrity but failed him on "judicial temperament." The ABA, which routinely grades judicial nominees, hadn't unanimously found an appeals court nominee unqualified in 24 years.

Wallace's Senate Judiciary Committee confirmation hearing in September was dominated by the ABA rating, with Republicans questioning the bar association's motives and Democrats questioning Wallace's suitability for a lifetime appointment.

Bush Drops Plans To Renominate 3 Judges (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 — In an apparent effort to lower the temperature in the fierce battle over federal judges — and in a concession to political reality — President Bush said Tuesday that he was dropping plans to nominate three of his choices for the federal appeals courts who have been vigorously opposed by Senate Democrats.

The White House announced that the three candidates, all conservatives, had themselves asked for their names to be withdrawn. But the announcement was widely taken to mean that the president had decided that renominating them would be a needlessly provocative act, one that would anger Democrats without sufficient political payoff from conservatives for sticking by the nominees.

Days after the November election that gave the Democrats control of Congress, Mr. Bush pledged to renominate the three. His words prompted denunciations from Democrats that he had not taken any lessons from the election and that he was not, as he had claimed, prepared to engage them in a bipartisan way.

Democrats were able to block the confirmations of the three — William J. Haynes II, William Myers III and Terrence Boyle — in the last Congress. With the Democrats now in control of the Senate, the three's chances to be confirmed were reduced further.

After Tuesday's announcement, some Democrats expressed appreciation for the decision.

"It's the first whiff of conciliation we've had on the issue of judges," said Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York and a Judiciary Committee member who has been vocal in his complaints that Mr. Bush has sought confrontation on the issue of judges.

"The election demanded much more bipartisanship than they've been giving," Mr. Schumer said. "But this might be the beginning of a path we can walk down together."

Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the Democrat who formally assumes the chairmanship of the Judiciary Committee this week, praised Mr. Bush for not resubmitting the three nominees. "This new Congress presents an opportunity for a fresh start on judicial nominations, one that emphasizes qualifications and bipartisan consensus over game-playing," Mr. Leahy said.

In addition to the three, a fourth federal appeals court nominee who had been opposed by the Democrats, Michael J. Wallace of Mississippi, withdrew last month.

Democrats had vowed to block the confirmations of all four.

Mr. Haynes, who was nominated to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, in Richmond, has been the Pentagon's general counsel and was deeply involved in setting the administration's interrogation and detention policies. Mr. Haynes wrote or supervised memorandums that secretly authorized harsh treatment for detainees at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, and Iraq.

Mr. Myers had been nominated for a seat on the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit. The circuit, based in San Francisco, covers nine states and is frequently at the center of disputes over environmental laws and regulations. He was strongly opposed by many environmental groups for his history as a lobbyist for mining and ranching interests and speeches criticizing restrictions on those groups.

Judge Boyle, a district court judge in North Carolina, drew opposition to his nomination to the Fourth Circuit from Democrats and liberal groups for his rulings in civil rights cases. Mr. Wallace, nominated to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, in New Orleans, was rated unqualified for the court by the American Bar Association.

At least one nominee had told friends he was interested in withdrawing long ago but agreed to keep his name in to satisfy the White House if the president wanted to continue pressing the nominations. When Mr. Bush announced his intention in November to renominate the four, political supporters said it was to keep in place the groundwork for an argument that the Democrats were obstructionist over judges.

Mr. Bush's decision will probably disappoint conservatives who were eager to continue that argument, but on Tuesday, some said they understood the political realities.

Kenneth Y. Tomlinson, the chairman of the agency that supervises most government broadcasts abroad, also asked the White House to withdraw his nomination for another term as chairman of the Broadcasting Board of Governors.

Mr. Tomlinson had also headed the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, but was forced to step down from that organization after an inspector general's report in 2005 found evidence that he had violated rules meant to insulate public television and radio from political influence.

Four Appeals Court Choices Dropped From Consideration (Update2) (BLOOM)

By James Rowley

Bloomberg, January 10, 2007

Jan. 9 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush, bowing to the Senate's new Democratic majority, dropped efforts to win confirmation of four appeals court nominees who generated partisan opposition.

Bush won't resubmit the nominations of Terrence W. Boyle, Defense Department counsel William J. Haynes II and William G. Myers III to seats on federal appeals courts, said White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore. A fourth nominee who also sparked controversy, Michael Wallace, withdrew last month from consideration for a seat on the New Orleans-based 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

``We are obviously disappointed that these nominees did not receive the fair consideration that they deserve,'' Lawrimore said. ``We hope the days of judicial obstruction are behind us."

Senator Charles E. Schumer, a New York Democrat, welcomed the administration's retreat as a sign Bush ``is heeding the message from the November election." He said Democrats would work with the administration ``to confirm judges who are not extremists, either left or right."

Wallace, 55, a Jackson, Mississippi, lawyer, received an ``unqualified" rating by the American Bar Association's judicial screening panel following his nomination last February. In Senate testimony, the panel cited statements from lawyers that Wallace lacked judicial temperament.

Boyle, a 61-year-old federal trial judge in North Carolina who was first nominated in 2001 to the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals based in Richmond, Virginia, was accused by Democrats of showing hostility to employment discrimination lawsuits.

Ranching Lobbyist

Myers, 51, a mining and ranching lobbyist nominated in 2003 to the San Francisco-based 9th Circuit, was accused by environmentalists of promoting corporate interests over enforcement of federal conservation laws when he was the Interior Department's solicitor.

Haynes, 48, nominated in 2003 to the 4th Circuit, was opposed by Republicans and Democrats for helping develop the military's interrogation policies for suspected terrorists. Critics said the policy led to abuse of suspected terrorists in military prisons in Iraq, Afghanistan and at the U.S. Navy base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Boyle declined an invitation last month by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to withdraw his nomination, said Lars H. Liebeler, a Washington lawyer and former Boyle law clerk who spoke on behalf of the judge.

`Not Going to Quit'

``The attorney general called Judge Boyle and told him that Haynes, Myers and Wallace had submitted letters saying their nominations should be withdrawn and asked Judge Boyle what he wanted to do," said Liebeler, who has been championing Boyle's nomination. ``Judge Boyle said, if the president didn't want to renominate him, he would understand that decision but he was not going to quit."

On Jan. 5, Gonzales telephoned Boyle to say that Bush's advisers had concluded that the judge couldn't win Senate confirmation and recommended Bush not resubmit his name to the Senate, Liebeler said. He said Boyle told Gonzales that he understood the political reality. ``It was a cordial conversation," Liebeler said.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse declined to comment about whether Gonzales solicited the withdrawal letters.

Wallace said in a telephone interview that his withdrawal was ``100 percent my own decision" and wasn't solicited by the Bush administration.

He understood from statements by the new Democratic Judiciary Committee chairman, Vermont Senator Patrick Leahy, that ``he had no intention of permitting me to be confirmed," Wallace said.

`Fresh Start'

Leahy said in a statement that the new Congress offers Bush a ``fresh start" on judicial selections, and he called the administration's retreat on the four nominations ``a welcome beginning."

Still, Bush ignored Leahy's recommendation that he resolve a dispute with California Senator Dianne Feinstein over his nomination of Norman Randy Smith, an Idaho lawyer, to a 9th Circuit seat that Feinstein contends should be filled by a Californian.

The vacancy was created by the retirement of Circuit Judge Stephen Trott, who moved to Idaho from California following his confirmation.

Smith appeared on a list of judicial nominations Bush submitted to the Senate today. Last year, Feinstein blocked Smith's confirmation on the basis he should be nominated for a different seat on the 9th Circuit.

Advocacy Groups

Bush could have ended the dispute by asking the Senate to confirm Smith for the seat that Myers had been nominated to fill. There was no immediate comment from the White House about Smith's nomination.

In a statement, Feinstein said Bush ``missed an opportunity to resolve an outstanding nominations issue."

Two advocacy groups opposing the nominations issued statements hailing the withdrawals.

The decision ``underscores the reality that the Senate will no longer rubber stamp far-right judges to lifetime appointments," Nan Aron, president of Alliance For Justice, a Washington-based advocacy group, said in a statement.

The environmental group Earthjustice said Myers was the first judicial nominee opposed primarily because of his record on the environment.

4 Nominees To Appeals Courts Are Dropped (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

The Bush administration officially withdrew four of its most controversial nominations to the federal appellate bench yesterday, bowing to the political reality of a Senate Judiciary Committee under the control of Democrats who show no inclination to confirm them.

Signaling at the same time that President Bush is committed to placing more conservatives on the bench, the White House renominated 32 other federal judicial candidates that the previous Senate did not confirm. Bush also nominated a previous candidate for a federal district court to fill one of the four appellate positions.

Those withdrawn yesterday included Defense Department general counsel William J. Haynes II, nominated for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit, which covers Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia and the Carolinas; U.S. District Judge Terrence W. Boyle, also nominated for the 4th Circuit; and former Interior Department solicitor William G. Myers III, nominated for the 9th Circuit, which covers seven Western states, plus Alaska and Hawaii.

The fourth nominee withdrawn, Mississippi lawyer Michael B. Wallace, had announced in December that he was no longer seeking to become a 5th Circuit appellate judge, with jurisdiction over Mississippi, Louisiana and Texas. White House officials said Leslie H. Southwick, a former Mississippi state appeals judge and chairman of the state's Bush-Quayle steering committee in 1988, will be nominated to fill the slot Wallace had sought.

The withdrawals provoked rare praise from liberal groups People for the American Way and Alliance for Justice, which had lobbied against many of the administration's judicial nominees. They said that they hope the moves herald a shift in Bush's approach to such appointments.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), likewise, praised Bush for making "the right decision in not resubmitting these controversial and problematic nominees who failed to win confirmation from a Republican-controlled Senate." He said the withdrawals are "a welcome beginning" in emphasizing "qualifications and bipartisan consensus."

White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore said in a statement that "the President remains focused on appointing highly qualified nominees who clearly understand that the role of a judge is to interpret the law, not to legislate from the bench. All of today's nominees are highly accomplished . . . and the President is encouraging the Senate to provide them with fair consideration as soon as possible."

The decision was, nonetheless, an abrupt reversal for the White House, which last tried to gain Senate confirmation for the four on Nov. 16, nine days after the election of a Democratic majority with a one-member margin.

Opposition to Haynes had centered on his role in supporting the aggressive interrogations of U.S. military detainees after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Myers, a former mining and grazing industry official nominated to a court with jurisdiction over half of the nation's public lands, had aroused the opposition of environmentalists by denouncing many laws as "regulatory excesses" and demanding industry access to more protected land.

Civil rights groups had accused Boyle, a protege of former senator Jesse Helms (R-N.C.), and Wallace, a former counsel to Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), of hostility to minority rights. The 4th Circuit's jurisdiction has the nation's highest percentage of black citizens. Political disputes over its appellate membership have kept a vacancy there open for 12 years.

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

Republican officials said yesterday that four controversial appeals-court nominees have asked the White House to withdraw their names from Senate consideration. Among them is William "Jim" Haynes II, whom President Bush first nominated to the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Virginia, on September 29, 2003. Call him the latest casualty in the war on terror.

Mr. Haynes is a victim of elite Washington's fickle support for anti-terror measures and South Carolina Republican Lindsey Graham's desire for the media spotlight. Arlen Specter, the former chairman of the Judiciary Committee, was prepared to move Mr. Haynes's nomination to the floor in the last Congress, but Mr. Graham joined Democrats in blocking him to settle a political score. Mr. Haynes obviously has no chance in the new, Democrat-controlled Senate; why stick around for more abuse?

Mr. Haynes is general counsel of the Pentagon, where his transgression in the days following the 9/11 attacks was to do his job with too much determination to protect the country. That meant offering legal analysis to Secretary Donald Rumsfeld on the treatment of detainees -- advice that critics later distorted as condoning "torture."

Mr. Haynes sometimes disagreed with career military lawyers, but there is no evidence he behaved other than honorably. As memories of 9/11 have faded along with the one-time calls for bold executive action, he nonetheless became one of the fall guys for the Administration's policy choices on Guantanamo and military tribunals.

Mr. Graham has basked in media attention for opposing President Bush on detainees, and he has every right to disagree on policy. But for reasons of ego or retribution or something, he has also insisted on embarrassing the White House by blocking Mr. Haynes's nomination. The lesson that other political appointees will learn is that the better part of career ambition is to play it safe and never buck the professional bureaucracy.

Mr. Haynes has many supporters in the Palmetto State, where he has ancestral ties that go back before the Revolution. Mr. Graham's treatment of a favorite son is a disgraceful episode, and one that South Carolina Republicans will want to consider if the Senator faces a primary challenge in 2008.

Benched Nominees (WP)

PRESIDENT BUSH'S decision not to resubmit the nominations of four of his most controversial judicial picks is a welcome sign from an administration that, in the realm of judicial selection, has too often chosen confrontation over compromise. When the president, during the post-election lame-duck session, chose to renominate these appeals court nominees with no prospect they would be confirmed, the move struck us as gratuitously partisan. Now Mr. Bush deserves credit for putting some action behind his rhetoric of bipartisanship. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) correctly called the move "a welcome beginning" and "an opportunity for a fresh start on judicial nominations." As Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) put it, "This reversal is one of the first tangible signs that the president heard and is heeding the message from November's election."

Mr. Bush's move was a wise acknowledgment of political reality, but it was also right on the merits. Democrats had valid objections to the nominations of William J. Haynes II, William G. Myers III, Terrence W. Boyle Jr. and Michael B. Wallace. Mr. Haynes, the Pentagon's general counsel, has been a key player in the military's policies on detentions and interrogations in the war on terrorism. Mr. Myers has a dreadful record of anti-environmental activism. Judge Boyle, who serves on the U.S. District Court in North Carolina, has a troubling history in civil rights cases. And the American Bar Association unanimously rated Mr. Wallace "unqualified" for service on the bench.

Now the onus is not only on the president to avoid more thumb-in-their-eye nominees, but also on Democrats, newly in control of the Senate, to make good on their end of the bargain: to give the president's nominees the timely and reasonable consideration that nominees have not always received in the past.

Myers Among 100 Bush Nominations (WT)

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

From combined dispatches

President Bush yesterday renominated Julie L. Myers to head U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement a year after he was forced to make her a recess appointment during questions about her qualifications for the job.

She was among the more than 100 executive branch and judicial nominations the president sent to the Senate yesterday, even as Republican officials said four high-profile judicial nominees who had been blocked during Republican control of Congress asked that their names be withdrawn.

The officials said that William Haynes, William G. Myers III and Judge Terrence Boyle had all decided to abandon their quest for confirmation. Another nominee, Michael Wallace, let it be known last month that he too had asked Mr. Bush to withdraw his nomination.

Mrs. Myers' recess appointment expired at the end of the last Congress. During her year in office, ICE expanded enforcement, but many members of Congress said they wanted to see still more operations. Her nomination will give both Democrats and Republicans in Congress a platform to criticize the president's immigration policy.

She was one of several recess appointees Mr. Bush renominated yesterday. Another was Ellen R. Sauerbrey, the former Republican candidate for Maryland governor, who Mr. Bush has tapped to be assistant secretary of state for population, refugees and migration. Her nomination proved to be contentious because of her pro-life views.

Among the four judicial nominees to withdraw, Mr. Haynes is the Pentagon's top lawyer, and was an architect of Mr. Bush's now-abandoned policy toward treatment of detainees in the war on terrorism. He had been tapped for the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Judge Boyle is a federal judge in North Carolina, and his appointment to the 4th Circuit provoked opposition from Democrats who cited his rulings in civil rights and disability cases, as well as his higher-than-average reversal rate by higher courts.

Mr. Myers, nominated to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, sparked opposition from environmentalist organizations and their allies among Senate Democrats.

Mr. Wallace's appointment to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals drew opposition from Democrats, civil rights groups and the American Bar Association.

Bush's Military Nominations Likely To Get Dems' OK Despite Iraq Concerns (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, January 10, 2007

Despite stepping up opposition to President Bush's yet-to-be-announced troop-surge plan, the Democratic-led Senate is likely to swiftly confirm military officers selected by the administration to carry out its new plan for Iraq.

But several congressional leaders, both Democrat and Republican, are indicating that nominees will face tough questions on strategy and policy.

Secretary of Defense Robert Gates last week made his officer recommendations to the president, who still has to send the nominations to the Senate. Bush likely will make an announcement on them today.

Lt. Gen. David Petraeus has been chosen to replace Gen. George Casey as the top commander in Iraq with a promotion to four-star general, while Casey will be nominated to become the new Army chief of staff. Meanwhile, Adm. William Fallon will take over U.S. Central Command from Gen. John Abizaid, who is retiring. All three nominations require Senate confirmation.

Because of the nominees' high profile, the Senate Armed Services Committee likely will hold confirmation hearings, according to several Senate aides.

But Democrats and some Republicans who have been more cautious about supporting the White House's troop-surge denied they would use the nomination process to force the president's hand.

"We will ask the [nominees'] position" on the troop surge, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) said. "We will set swift hearings. I do not know what the hearings will produce, but it is not our intent to hold up votes in any way."

Levin is among the strongest proponents of troop withdrawal from Iraq.

As a supporter of increased forces in Iraq, Petraeus is expected to back a rapid troop expansion, in contrast to Casey, who has been skeptical that additional troops would help stabilize the country.

Casey may face tough questions from Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), ranking member of the Armed Services panel, and Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), both of whom have been pushing for more troops in Iraq.

The three Pentagon nominees will undergo rigorous hearings, "perhaps even more so because of the enormity of the responsibilities that they seem to be … taking on," said Sen. John Warner (R-Va.), former chairman of the Armed Services Committee and one of the first top Republicans to speak out about the situation in Iraq before the November elections.

"We can have an intense, thorough confirmation and do it in a short period of time," he added.

Meanwhile, Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.), a member of the Armed Services panel, said members would grill the nominees.

"There are going to be all these guys who are moving into these positions and they are going to get a lot of scrutiny and a lot of hard questions about what they are recommending," he said.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who is not a member of the Armed Services Committee, said that holds are always a possibility, but that she is currently not planning to place any.

As the president prepares to announce his strategy for Iraq tonight, Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) has introduced a resolution prohibiting any federal funds to be expended for troops in Iraq above the current number without congressional authorization.

Sen. Dick Durbin (Ill.), the Democratic whip, said that a resolution capping the number of troops and another requiring the president to get congressional approval for troop strength above a certain level could be possible add-ons to the incoming supplemental request.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said he wants to see a bipartisan resolution in response to the White House's announcement introduced next week.

Avoiding Sun-Kissed Tuscany, And Other Tips For The Prudent Junketer (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

It has come to our attention that certain politicians who recently traveled overseas on the taxpayers' dime were unhappy with press coverage of their journey.

This is hardly the first time government officials and staff members have been upset about criticism of their global travels. And, in truth, the line between junket -- a vacation with spouses to exotic places on a military jet -- and actual work-related travel can be hazy.

So for all travelers on congressional delegations (codels) who want to avoid snarky press coverage, we offer the 2007 In the Loop Guide to Codels.

Rule No. 1: Try to travel to places that have a direct relationship to important foreign policy issues. In addition to such places as China and Russia, this would be Darfur anytime, Gaza in August, Chechnya in February, Waziristan, a week in Anbar province.

Exception: Scores of lawmakers have wandered to Iraq in the past four years, many of them multiple times. All had campaign pictures taken with troops from their districts -- rounded up specially for the occasion -- and were given tours of the Green Zone and Camp Victory. Many came back thumping their chests, saying, "I've been to Iraq." They then touted great progress toward "victory" and blasted the media for willfully ignoring all the good news in Fallujah.

Maybe lawmakers could at least follow the example of Rep. Jim Marshall (D-Ga.), a much-decorated Vietnam vet who strapped on body armor and went on patrol two years ago with the 82nd Airborne in Ramadi.

Rule No. 2: Ditch the spouse. Spouses raise red flags for reporters. Reporters are no longer buying the dodge about spouses traveling "at no extra cost." Understaffed embassy personnel have to schedule separate events, provide vans, maybe security, guides and so forth for day trips, sightseeing and shopping. Given the recent cutbacks at U.S. embassies, this is hardly what those folks need to be doing.

Corollary: On a generic "meetings with foreign leaders" trip, avoid lingering. Spouses tend to lengthen trips, with evenings devoted to receptions and dinners -- as opposed to meeting with dissidents in hiding, with human rights advocates, with harassed religious leaders, with refugees or even just traveling to the next stop.

Rule No. 3: Avoid going north in the summer, south in the winter. Never go anywhere in Italy, at any time, on the taxpayers' dime. Be very careful about the Paris Air Show. European travel in general, especially in the early fall or in the spring, will raise eyebrows. Winter trips to the Caribbean are inherently suspect.

Rule No. 4: Do not go to various wonders of the world -- Petra, the Pyramids, Machu Picchu, the Galapagos, Iguazu Falls, the Great Wall, the Taj Mahal, Angkor Wat or African game parks. Ditto handicraft fairs.

Exception: There will be times when obligatory travel to bad places, or to funerals and inaugurations and such, will bring you near a primo tourist destination. The rule of reason governs. An "unavoidable" stop at St. Peter's Square on Easter Sunday, for example, doesn't pass any laugh test.

Rule No. 5: Do not blow off intelligence briefings at the embassies. You are there, after all, to gather facts. Embassy folks may, or may not, have some.

Rule No. 6: Do not overload your military aircraft with the bargain booty -- rugs, golf clubs, artifacts and such -- you hope to sneak in without regular customs inspection.Once Our Enemy, Now Your Excellency

Speaking of travel, here are some words you never thought you'd see coming out of the White House: " President Bush today announced the designation of a Presidential Delegation to attend the inauguration of His Excellency Jos? Daniel Ortega Saavedra, President of the Republic of Nicaragua on January 10, 2007."

"His Excellency"? Wasn't this guy some random commie thug, pal of Fidel Castro, just a few years back? The late Jeane Kirkpatrick must be spinning. And who drew the short straw to lead this august delegation? That would be Michael Leavitt, secretary of health and human services.

Unclear how they traveled to the ceremony. Maybe they flew to Harlingen, Tex., and then drove? As they used to say in the '80s, Managua's communists were only a two-day drive from there.Changing Times

Good jobs opening up at the State Department. Buzz is Robert Joseph, undersecretary for arms control and international security, is going to be moving on, possibly at the end of this month.

The date is uncertain, we're told, because it has changed a few times. Apparently Secretary Condoleezza Rice wanted Joseph, who we're told has been frozen out of some important issues, to stay on for a bit given all the openings.

There have been a lot of them. Rice finally tapped national intelligence chief John Negroponte for the long-vacant deputy secretaryship and announced Iraq ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad for the U.N. posting. There are still excellent openings for an undersecretary for economic, business and agricultural affairs; for counselor; for coordinator for counterterrorism; and, with last week's departure of John Hillen, for assistant secretary for political-military affairs.Looking Out for the Bad Guys

Former senator Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) is now a senior fellow at the Ethics and Public Policy Center, where he established and directs a program called "America's Enemies," which the center says will "focus on identifying, studying, and heightening awareness of the threats posed to America and the West."

No, the program doesn't appear to focus exclusively on Pennsylvania's Democrats. Seems to be looking more to "a growing array of anti-Western forces" overseas.

Chief Quits Broadcasting Board, Plans Book (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

Broadcasting Board of Governors Chairman Kenneth Y. Tomlinson announced that he is stepping down after four years on the job, citing plans to write a book about his experiences in the public broadcasting sector, which many see as skewed by a liberal bias.

"I think it's a good story that will help the public understand how Washington operates," Mr. Tomlinson said yesterday. "There's been a criminalization of political differences."

President Bush nominated Mr. Tomlinson to serve another term on the board, but the Senate Foreign Relations Committee failed to act on the nomination.

A State Department inspector general investigation ordered by Democratic lawmakers accused Mr. Tomlinson of running a "horse-racing operation" from his government office and said he "improperly put a friend on the payroll." Mr. Tomlinson runs a stable of Thoroughbred racehorses on his private farm in Virginia.

The results of the investigation were turned over to the Justice Department, which has not brought charges against Mr. Tomlinson. The inspector general reported that Mr. Tomlinson spent fewer than three minutes and sent one e-mail per day on his horse-racing ventures.

Mr. Tomlinson described the accusations as "patently untrue."

"My critics will say this is an indicator that Ken Tomlinson is quitting public life," he said. "But I'm just beginning to fight. This book will be a much more effective way to bring to light the injustices done to me."

During Mr. Tomlinson's tenure, the Broadcasting Board of Governors worked to open news operations in parts of the world where authoritarian regimes blocked access to information. As a result of these initiatives, an Arabic language satellite TV network now broadcasts in Iraq and other Muslim nations, Persian language satellite news is fed daily into Iran, and radio and television broadcast signals are sent into Afghanistan and Cuba.

The transmissions into Cuba are jammed by what analysts think is a high-cost effort of Fidel Castro's communist government.

"If what we were doing wasn't important, Castro would not be spending the money to block the signal," Mr. Tomlinson said.

Larry Hart, spokesman for the Broadcasting Board of Governors, said Mr. Bush will select a replacement for Mr. Tomlinson and any other board members whose terms have expired. Board members may serve until the Senate confirms their replacements.

"There may be a number of nominations going forward," Mr. Hart said.

The board includes four Democrats and four Republicans. The secretary of state serves as the ninth member, giving a one-seat edge to whichever party controls the White House.

"I am proud of my record of service during these troubled times," Mr. Tomlinson wrote to Mr. Bush yesterday, "and I have appreciated deeply your repeatedly submitting my name to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee for reconfirmation to this position. Those who oppose my nomination cite charges against me that simply do not stand up to scrutiny."

Before joining the board, Mr. Tomlinson served as editor in chief of Reader's Digest and was director of Voice of America.

S.M.U. Faculty Complains About Bush Library Plan (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

DALLAS, Jan. 9 — Intimates of President Bush have singled out Southern Methodist University as the likely site of his presidential library, but faculty members, complaining of being bypassed, are raising sharp questions about the school's identification with his presidency.

In a meeting Tuesday, faculty members complained of a lack of consultation over the emerging agreement and all but demanded answers from the university's president, R. Gerald Turner, on the relationship that would develop between the university and the library.

"There's been a lack of transparency from the beginning," said Tony Pederson of the journalism faculty, urging the university's administration "to be more forthcoming with detailed information."

Cal Jillson, a political science professor, called for "more rounded information" because, he said, "this train is leaving." He said there could be a final decision on the library before the end of the month.

Rhonda Blair, the president of the faculty senate who convened the meeting even though many professors were still away on winter break, said she would pass on the questions to Dr. Turner on Wednesday.

The session grew out of the uproar after an op-ed article in the student newspaper, The Daily Campus, by two professors at the university's Perkins School of Theology complaining about the library selection process.

The president and Laura Bush created the George W. Bush Presidential Library Site Selection Committee, which is headed by former Commerce Secretary Donald P. Evans and also includes Marvin Bush, the president's brother; Andrew H. Card, the former White House chief of staff; and Craig R. Stapleton, the United States ambassador to France.

Mr. Evans revealed on Dec. 21 that the panel was setting aside two other contenders, Baylor University in Waco and the University of Dallas in Irving, to pursue exclusive discussions with Southern Methodist, the alma mater of Mrs. Bush and an institution long close to the Bushes. Mr. Bush graduated from Yale and Harvard.

Taylor Griffin, a spokesman for Mr. Evans, said Tuesday that he was not granting interviews at this stage of the selection process.

"The selection committee is now focusing their discussions on S.M.U.; however, no final decision has been made," Mr. Griffin said. He said the final decision was expected to be reached within "a few months," although others have estimated the process could be completed within weeks.

Mr. Griffin said he could not discuss the criteria for the selection process, and he said issues concerning financing of the library and control of content, including interaction between the policy institute and the library, had not been decided.

"The committee has been focused on the selection of the site rather than fund-raising decisions," Mr. Griffin said. "It could vary depending on what the site would be. We are in an early phase in the process, and those decisions about how much money will need to be raised will come later."

The complex under discussion would include a public policy institute independent of the university and answerable to a Bush foundation, while the library and a museum would be under the auspices of the National Archives and Records Administration. But control of presidential documents remains a subject of dispute.

About 150 of the university's 600 faculty members attended the meeting, voicing a range of concerns, particularly on whether the school's academic freedom and political independence might appear compromised by an association with not only the Bush library but also a museum that would accompany it.

Thomas J. Knock, a professor of history, said the public might have trouble differentiating between the library, museum and the university.

James K. Hopkins, chairman of the history department who was co-chairman of the meeting with Ms. Blair, a professor of theater, said he had asked Dr. Turner under what circumstances the university would "walk away" from a deal with the library.

"There was this very indirect response to that," Dr. Hopkins said.

Ms. Blair said that it was not clear how much negotiating S.M.U. could do with the presidential library committee but that she would bring it up with Dr. Turner, who she said would soon meet with the faculty himself.

But Rita Kirk, chairwoman of the department of communications and public affairs, said the "wall" that would exist between Southern Methodist and the Bush library would allow for "robust debate" academically and afford scholars important access to papers of Colin L. Powell and Condoleezza Rice, among other administration figures.

Some of the faculty questions dealt with the cost of the library — published accounts have it as high as $500 million — including how much the school would be responsible for and whether raising the money might hurt the school's own financial campaigns.

"We view the discussions that are taking place on campus as a very positive part of the process and one we're very accustomed to here at S.M.U.," said Brad Cheves, the university's vice president for development and external affairs, shortly after leaving the faculty meeting.

"We glad that our colleagues feel comfortable to share their views with each other and with all of us," Dr. Cheves said. But he said that S.M.U. had not detected widespread opposition among the faculty or others about the Bush library.

"At this point we have nothing that indicates that the support is anything but strong," he said. "The feedback we're getting clearly represents the diversity of thought that you would expect in a constituency as large as S.M.U.'s."

Tax Cut Measure Could Be A Stumbling Block For Increase In Minimum Wage (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

As part of their 100-hour legislative blitz, House Democrats are expected to vote today to increase the minimum wage for the first time in a decade, to $7.25 an hour, in a move that economists say will raise pay for 13 million workers.

The bill's chances are less certain in the Senate, largely because of friction over a Republican push to include tax breaks for small business in the bill. Senate Republicans have hinted that, without such tax cuts, they will filibuster the measure, a move that the bill's supporters would need 60 votes to overcome.

The legislation would lift the federal wage floor, currently $5.15 an hour, to $7.25 in three steps between now and 2009.

"Minimum-wage workers desperately need a raise," said Representative George Miller, Democrat of California and chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee. "It is a moral outrage that millions of Americans who work full time still live in poverty."

After opposing a minimum-wage increase for years, many Republicans now say they favor one, but only if it is coupled with a tax cut for restaurants and other small businesses — the groups they say would be hurt most by the wage increase.

"The Democrat leadership's unbalanced proposal may increase the minimum wage, but it leaves small businesses and their workers to fend for themselves," said Representative Howard P. McKeon of California, the ranking Republican on the Education and Labor Committee.

On Tuesday, Mr. McKeon and Jim McCrery of Louisiana, the senior Republican on the House Ways and Means Committee, introduced a competing minimum-wage bill that includes billions of dollars in tax breaks. One such break would allow faster depreciation for newly built restaurants, allowing them to record the building cost on financial statements over 15 years instead of the current rule of 39 years, and thus lower taxes.

President Bush has said he might accept a higher minimum wage, but only if it is tied to tax cuts to soften the blow for business.

Some Democrats and many of their liberal and labor allies assert that the minimum wage should not be used as an excuse to give more tax breaks to business.

DOJ_NMG_0114747

"For the past 10 years, Republican leaders have held the minimum wage hostage," said the A.F.L.-C.I.O.'s president, John J. Sweeney. "Corporations and wealthy Americans have gotten their rewards. Now it's time to do the right thing for low-wage workers, with no payoffs to business."

Frustrated by Congress's inaction, 28 states have adopted minimum wages above the federal floor, affecting 70 percent of the work force.

In an unusual move for a minimum-wage bill — typically it is handled by the House and Senate labor committees — the Senate Finance Committee is scheduled to hold a hearing today on the bill.

"To call a minimum-wage increase 'overdue' is the understatement of the year," said Senator Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana and the committee's chairman. "This Congress promised to raise the minimum wage, and we will. We also need to pass meaningful small-business incentives along with a wage increase. We can do both, and we will."

Many economists, especially conservative ones, insist that raising the minimum wage would not reduce poverty, saying it would ultimately reduce the number of jobs for low-skilled workers. But other economists, especially liberal ones, say a higher minimum would have virtually no effect on job levels while it lifted the pay for millions of low-wage workers.

"The increase will make a big difference for someone who makes the minimum wage — you're talking about thousands of dollars a year in extra earnings," said Jared Bernstein of the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal research group, and one of the economists scheduled to testify before the Finance Committee. "It's important to remember that if you don't have a binding wage floor, a lot of workers are going to end up disconnected from the improving economy and that's exactly what's happened."

Mr. Bernstein's institute estimates that six million workers earn less than $7.25 an hour, but workers earning a dollar or two more than that can also expect to see their wages increase if a new minimum is enacted.

Joseph Sabia, a professor of consumer economics at the University of Georgia, said an increase would do little to lift workers out of poverty.

"Most people who earn the minimum wage are not poor or near poor," Professor Sabia said. "If the goal is to help the working poor, it would be better to raise the earned-income tax credit," which refunds cash to poor workers.

The traditional economists' view has been that a higher minimum wage would mean some job losses for low-wage workers. But a landmark 1994 study by David Card and Alan Krueger upset the common wisdom by finding that there were no overall job losses when New Jersey raised its minimum wage.

David Neumark, a longtime critic of that study and an economics professor at the University of California, Irvine, said most credible studies had concluded that an increase in the minimum wage did hurt employment for unskilled workers, although most studies did not find major job reductions. He said an increase to $7.25 might reduce job levels for the least skilled workers by 4 percent.

"The most affected workers are the ones you'd most like to help," Professor Neumark said. "If the workers who get raises are middle-class teenagers and the ones who lose jobs are unskilled workers in poor jobs, you can increase poverty."

Harry Holzer, a professor of public policy at Georgetown University, acknowledged that there might be some job losses, but he said that they would be minor and would be far outweighed by the wage gains.

"Minimum-wage earners are concentrated in the bottom half of families by income," Professor Holzer said. "They might not be in the bottom 10 percent, but they might be in the bottom 10 to 40 percentile. Will a minimum-wage increase dramatically reduce poverty? Probably not. But it will redistribute income toward the bottom half of American workers."

Life At $7.25 An Hour (WP)

By David Finkel

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

ATCHISON, Kan. -- It was payday. Money, at last. Twenty-two-year-old Robert Iles wanted to celebrate. "Tonight, chimichangas!" he announced.

He was on his way out of the store where his full-time job pays him $7.25 an hour -- the rate that is likely to become the nation's new minimum wage. Life at $7.25: This is the life of Robert Iles, and with $70 in a wallet that had been empty that morning, he headed to a grocery store where for $4.98 he bought not only 10 chimichangas but two burritos as well.

From there he stopped at a convenience store, where for $16.70 he filled the gas tank of the car he purchased when he got his raise to $7.25; then he went to another grocery store, where he got a $21.78 money order to pay down some bills, including $8,000 in medical bills from the day he accidentally sliced open several fingers with a knife while trying to cut a tomato; and then he headed toward the family trailer 19 miles away, where his parents were waiting for dinner.

Today in Washington, the House is scheduled to vote on whether to increase the federal minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25. Passage is expected, with Senate approval soon to follow, and if President Bush signs the resulting bill into law, as he indicated he would, the U.S. minimum wage would rise for the first time since 1997, ending a debate about whether such a raise would be good or bad for the economy.

But even if the matter is settled in Congress, it isn't settled at all in Atchison, and Robert Iles's drive home is proof. Every stop he made on his ride home revealed a different facet of how complicated the minimum wage can be in the parts of America where, instead of a debatable issue, it is a way of life.

At the store where Iles works, for instance, the owner thinks the minimum wage should be increased as a moral issue but worries about which employees' hours he will have to cut to compensate.

At the store where he bought the chimichangas, the cashier who makes $6.25 worries that a raise will force her out of her subsidized apartment and onto the street.

At the convenience store where he bought gas, the owner worries that he will have to either raise prices, angering his customers, or make less money, "and why would I want to make less money?"

At the store where he got the money order, the worries are about Wal-Mart, which not only supports an increase but also built a Supercenter on the edge of town that has been sucking up customers since it opened three years ago.

As for Iles -- who keeps $70 out of every paycheck to cover two weeks' worth of food and gas and in a matter of minutes was already down to $26.54 -- his worry was as basic as how fast to drive home.

Drive too fast and he'd be wasting gas. But his family was waiting. And his chimichangas, best cooked frozen, were starting to thaw.The Meaning of a Dollar

The debate about the minimum wage usually comes down to jobs. If Congress approves the increase, it will result in raises for an estimated 13 million Americans, or about 9 percent of the total workforce. That's a percentage that most economists agree would cause a modest increase in national unemployment. In Kansas, however, "it would have a fairly significant impact," said Beth Martino, a spokeswoman for the state Department of Labor. According to one independent analysis, 16 percent of the workforce, or 237,000 workers, would be affected -- and that doesn't include the 20,000 whose wages aren't governed by the federal Fair Labor Standards Act and earn the state minimum wage of $2.65. That rate, the lowest in the nation and unchanged since 1988, hints at the prevailing wisdom in Kansas about the minimum wage, which is that the only way low-wage earners will make more is through congressional action.

This holds true from Topeka, where the powerful Kansas Chamber of Commerce has long opposed any raise, to rural Mulvane, home of Republican state legislator Ted Powers, who says his futile effort three years ago to raise the state minimum wage resulted in his being branded a "dirty dog," to Atchison, a working-class city of 11,000 where the stores that depend on low-wage workers include one called "Wow Only $1.00!" This is the store where Robert Iles has worked for five years.

"Robert, would you help me a second?" Jack Bower, the owner, called to Iles soon after opening, as the line at the cash register grew. A onetime Wal-Mart vice president, Bower moved back to Atchison several years ago to teach and ended up buying the old J.C. Penney store, and now runs a business where the meaning of a dollar is displayed on shelf after shelf. The jar of Peter Piper's Hot Dog Relish? That's what a dollar is worth. The Wolfgang Puck Odor Eliminator that a customer was looking at as she said to a friend, "I just don't know how I'm ever going to make it. My ex-husband's not paying his child support"? That's a dollar, too, as is the home pregnancy test, the most shoplifted item in the store.

"This is not a wealthy community," Bower explained. "The thing is, a lot of people depend on this store."

Robert Iles has his own version of a dollar's meaning, learned last February when Bower took him aside and said he would be getting a pay raise to $7.25. "Okay," Iles remembers replying, wanting to seem businesslike. "But inside I was doing the cha-cha-cha," he said. "It was like going from lower class to lower middle class."

DOJ_NMG_0114749

Soon after, he bought his car, a used 2005 Dodge Neon, and just about every workday since then he has spent his lunch break in the driver's seat, eating a bologna sandwich with the engine off to save gas, even in winter. An hour later, he was back behind the cash register, telling customers "Thank you and have a nice day" again and again.

And meanwhile, Jack Bower wondered whose hours he will cut if he has to give his employees a raise.

It's not that he's against raising the minimum wage -- "I don't think $5.15 is adequate," he said, adding that $7.25 seems fair -- but his profit margin is thin, and wages are his biggest controllable expense. So if wages go up, he said, hours will have to come down, and the question will become: Whose?

Will it be Neil Simpson, 66, who works six hours a day as a stockman, and then five more hours somewhere else cleaning floors, and takes care of a wife who is blind and arthritic?

Will it be Susan Irons, 57, who was infected with hepatitis C from a blood transfusion, is on a waiting list for a liver transplant and needs more hours rather than fewer?

Will it be Christina Lux, who is 22 years old and 13 weeks pregnant?

Will it be Iles?

"Attention, all shoppers," he said into the microphone. "We will be closing in 10 minutes. Please begin making your final selections." Ten minutes later, he was clocked out and back in his Neon. "My brand-new car," he called it proudly, and he explained how he was able to afford it on $7.25 an hour: a no-money-down loan for which he will pay $313.13 a month until 2012.Small Business 'at Bottom'

Seven dollars and twenty-five cents an hour equals $15,080 per year, and out of that comes $313 for the car loan and $100 for car insurance, Iles said, going over his monthly bills. An additional $90 for the 1995 car with 135,000 miles on it that he is buying from a friend for his mother, $150 for the family phone bills, $35 on his credit card, $100 for gas, $100 toward the mortgage on the trailer. "That's about it. Oh yeah, $20 in doctors' bills," he said, and totaled it up on fingers scarred by surgical stitches. Nine hundred and eight dollars. "I bring home 900 a month," he said. "So I very rarely have any money for myself."

He parked in front of a store called Always Low Prices, which has the cheapest chimichangas in town.

Once it was a full-service grocery store with 28 employees. Then came word that Wal-Mart was looking for land for a Supercenter, and now it has become a bare-bones operation where the starting pay for its few employees is $5.50, and the manager wonders how the store will survive if wages increase.

"We're at the bottom. If the minimum wage went up, I don't know how we would make the cuts to cover it," Michelle Henry said. The lone salaried employee, she works 80 hours a week to make up for the lack of workers. "I have mixed feelings," she continued. "I know that people can't afford to live on $5.15 an hour. But on the business side, small businesses can't afford to pay it."

At the register, meanwhile, Shannon Wilk, 33, who makes $6.25 an hour, said that of course she would like to earn more money. It would help her. It would help her 18-month-old daughter. "It would be good," she said, "but also, for me, I live in income-based housing, and if I get a raise, my rent would go up, and I would lose my assistance." Even the tiniest raise would affect her, she said, and with nowhere to go, the last thing she can afford is a raise to $7.25.

In such an equation, the fact that she was working in Kansas was to her benefit. Atchison sits on the Kansas-Missouri border, and if Wilk worked a few hundred yards to the east, she would already be in jeopardy: In November, Missouri voters supported a ballot initiative increasing the state's minimum wage to $6.50, with an annual adjustment for inflation. Five other states had similar votes, with similar results, bringing to 29 the number that now require an hourly wage above the federal minimum. In the District the minimum is $7, in Maryland it's $6.15, and in Virginia it's $5.15.

Such is the arbitrariness of state-by-state minimum wage laws that Wilk feels lucky to be in Kansas making $6.25 an hour while inside at the first grocery store across the Missouri state line, the cashier was ecstatic that she was in a place where her pay was going from $6.20 to $6.50, explaining, "That's 30 cents more I ain't got."

Iles handed over a $10 bill for his 10 chimichangas and two burritos. He stuffed the change deep in his pocket, and headed next to a convenience store owned by a man named Bill Murphy, who said that if he had the chance to talk to new House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, he would ask one question. "Where does she think the money will come from? And that is the question," he said. "My wages are going to go up 10 percent."

Unlike Jack Bower, who would compensate by cutting hours, Murphy said that in his two convenience stores there are no hours to cut. "I'm going to have to raise my prices," he said -- not only because his workers who make less than the new minimum wage would get raises but also because those who earn more would insist on raises as well. Employees at $7.25 will want $8.25. Those at $8.25 will want $9.25.

Economists classify such workers as the ones who would be indirectly affected by a minimum-wage increase. Of the estimated 13 million workers expected to get raises, 7.4 million are in that category. "You've created this entitlement," Murphy said he would tell Pelosi.

And yet he will pay it, he said, and compensate with price increases, which he worries will be inflationary, even though most economists say that won't happen. He will raise prices, he continued, because the only other option would be to earn less money, which he doesn't want to do because he owes $1.5 million on his businesses and wouldn't want to default.

"Now that might be a stretch in some people's minds, from giving a guy a raise to not being able to pay the bank, but that's the path I'm talking about," he said. Against such a dire backdrop, Iles put $17 worth of gas in his car.

"That'll be $16.70," the clerk said to him, and instead of correcting this, Iles gladly took the change.

Thirty cents, suddenly got.The Wal-Mart Factor

Iles drove past the Atchison Inn, where starting pay is $5.15, past Movie Gallery, where it's also $5.15, and stopped in front of Country Mart, the fanciest grocery store in town, where high school students start at $5.15 and, according to owner Dennis Garrett, "some of them aren't worth that."

A few days earlier, Garrett had gotten a letter from a lobbying consortium called the Coalition for Job Opportunities, urging him to write Congress to protest the minimum-wage increase. It came in the form of a letter already written, to which he merely had to add his congressman's name and send it off to Washington. "We are very concerned," the letter began, and it was signed by 25 organizations.

The most conspicuous signature, though, was the one that wasn't there, that of Wal-Mart, the nation's largest private employer, with 1.3 million workers. Wal-Mart won't say how many of those workers earn less than what the new minimum wage would be, but if the Atchison store is an example, starting pay is $6 an hour.

Nonetheless, in October 2005, Wal-Mart chief executive H. Lee Scott Jr. said in a speech that the "U.S. minimum wage of $5.15 an hour has not been raised in nearly a decade, and we believe it is out of date with the times." He went on to say, "Our customers simply don't have the money to buy basic necessities between paychecks."

When it comes to Wal-Mart, however, just about any announcement that affects public policy is greeted with suspicion, and that has been the case with the minimum wage. Some have said that Wal-Mart, in need of good publicity, is supporting an increase for public relations reasons; others have declared it an attempt to drive small, independently owned stores out of business.

These suspicions exist in Atchison as well. As in many small communities, Wal-Mart defines local retail, and just as Always Low Prices had to retool itself, Country Mart was significantly affected by Wal-Mart's new food-stocked Supercenter several miles away.

What is Wal-Mart up to? What are its true motives? Like many others, Dennis Garrett wonders. He imagines public relations is part of it, but he didn't want to speculate on whether this was an attempt to put him out of business, except to say that raising some wages wouldn't do that. He'd reduce some hours, he said. He'd manage.

Yes, Atchison businesses would be hurt initially, but in the long run, if unemployment increases, those hurt the most would be the very ones Wal-Mart insists would be helped -- the customers, especially the younger ones, "the people who don't advance their education and need a job between the ages of 16 and 21, 22, 23."

In other words, many of the workers in Atchison, one of whom was now at Garrett's service counter buying a money order so he could pay bills. Even though Iles has a checking account, this is the method he prefers because if he were to pay by check, and the check were to bounce because of insufficient funds, the penalty would be devastating. A $25 fee would require more than three hours of work.

And where would those hours come from?'It's Tough for Me'

So go the calculations of a $7.25 worker, now headed home.

DOJ_NMG_0114751

"It's an old trailer," he explained earlier in the day.

The heat doesn't work, he said, and the water heater works sporadically.

One of the bedroom ceilings is caving in. He sleeps in the other bedroom, and his parents sleep in the living room because his father, who has diabetes and had to have several inches of one of his feet amputated, can't really get around.

Also, his father has leukemia. And is legally blind. And his mother, who once made $6.50 an hour as an aide at a nursing home, quit to take care of her husband.

"We're pretty much living off my money," Iles said, and in he went to cook them dinner, bring payday to an end and, the next morning, start the cycle again.

Life at $7.25. Should that be the minimum wage?

"Yes," Iles said.

Even if it hurts job opportunities for people like him, as Dennis Garrett had suggested?

"Yes."

Or causes price increases, as Bill Murphy had suggested?

"Yes."

Or damages businesses such as Always Low Prices?

"I mean, it's tough for me, and I'm already making $7.25 an hour."

Or causes Jack Bower to reduce hours for one of his employees? Perhaps for Iles himself?

"It's just so hard for people. I mean, it's hard," Iles said, and then he went to work.

"I think it'll be bad today," one of the workers suggested as the line at the Wow Only $1.00! cash register began to form.

"Well, it depends on your perspective," Iles said.

Success Of 100 Hours Hinges On Few Uncertain Senate Votes (HILL)

By Elana Schor And Jeffrey Young

Two planks of the House Democrats' "100 Hours" agenda are headed for swift passage this week but risk delay in the Senate, where Republicans and Democrats must navigate intra-party disputes over how to raise the minimum wage and amend the Medicare drug benefit.

Unlike their party colleagues in the House, Senate Democratic leaders are sending high-priority bills through regular order, a move that underscores their promise of bipartisanship. But this could deny them the political benefit of demonstrable progress when there are fractious conference negotiations with the House over different approaches to the minimum wage and Medicare.

"I'm becoming aware of the difficulties of the U.S. Senate in trying to pass a bill dealing with one issue," freshman Sen. Ben Cardin (D-Md.) said yesterday, urging the Senate to follow the lead of his former House colleagues and approve a clean minimum wage increase.

Republicans, however, are seeking tax and regulatory sweeteners for businesses to ease the impact of a phased wage hike to $7.25 per hour. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has indicated that he will back the business breaks, remarking last week that a filibuster-proof margin for a stand-alone minimum wage increase may be achievable, but, "I'm not sure I want to do that."

The Senate Finance Committee today will examine options for tax breaks that the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions (HELP) Committee can successfully pair with the wage hike. But HELP Chairman Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) and ranking Republican Mike Enzi (Wyo.) are already dissenting from party leaders' positions on the minimum wage.

Kennedy will push for a Senate wage hike without business tax breaks at an event today with House Majority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), House Education and Labor Committee Chairman George Miller (D-Calif.), AFL-CIO President John Sweeney, and freshman Reps. Betty Sutton (D-Ohio) and Carol Shea-Porter (D-N.H.).

At least two members of Kennedy's panel, freshman Sens. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio) and Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), backed his approach.

"We need to do serious business tax breaks … [but] don't link them to the minimum wage," Brown said. Sanders also called for a clean bill, saying via e-mail: "After 10 years of inexcusable inaction, I believe that the time is long overdue for Congress to pass a clean minimum wage bill."

Enzi, meanwhile, spent yesterday's GOP policy lunch tamping down enthusiasm among Republicans for adding small-business health plan provisions to the minimum-wage hike. Enzi's small-business health plan bill fell short on the floor last year, and he continues to work carefully on a compromise with Democrats that he hopes to pursue as a stand-alone issue, spokesman Craig Orfield said.

Senate Republicans also endorse other business benefits as add-ons to the wage bill, but support for including small-business health plans is being stoked in the House. There, senior Republicans gathered yesterday to tout Reid's support for a business-friendly wage bill and promote their alternative – which includes small-business health plans.

"Small business health plans would be my choice," Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Texas) said in an interview late last week, adding that a wage increase coupled with health insurance incentives would ensure businesses are "able to give their employees a better life."

The Medicare prescription drug bill slated for House approval on Friday, which would require the Bush administration to negotiate with drug companies on behalf of Medicare beneficiaries, poses considerable challenges of its own for Senate Democrats.

Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) has been granted first dibs on drafting a bill to fulfill the Democratic campaign promise for federal negotiation of Medicare drug prices. He will hold a hearing on the issue one day before the House considers its Medicare bill, strongly opposed by the White House.

But Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.), a Finance Committee member, got 54 votes last year for a bill he and Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) authored that would allow federal negotiation of Medicare drug prices. Wyden and Snowe will release an updated version of their measure today, mandating negotiation in the case of single-source drugs, drugs created with substantial taxpayer funding, or in cases where private insurers request help.

Wyden said yesterday that he and Snowe count 58 votes in the new Congress for their plan, if freshman Democrats were added and Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.), who is ailing, subtracted. Still, even if the pair can reach the crucial 60-vote threshold, Baucus could credibly claim to provide the Democratic leadership with a bigger margin, starting with his own vote.

"I'm going to work very closely with chairman Baucus," Wyden said when asked whether he would consider using his head count for leverage in discussions with Baucus, who voted against two Medicare negotiation bills last year. "I'm pleased with the discussions we've had."

Baucus is under pressure from Democratic leaders, who have vowed to approve negotiation by spring, to get a bill through the Finance Committee. Though Baucus has criticized the Bush administration's handling of the drug benefit, he was one of only two Democrats who participated in the drafting of the law creating the program.

"I suspect there [are] going to be serious questions about it in the Senate," Republican Whip Trent Lott (Miss.) said yesterday of the Medicare negotiation concept. "I'm not sure how or when Reid plans to call it up. I think Democrats have serious questions about it too."

Complicating matters for Baucus is that a majority of his committee voted for the Wyden-Snowe amendment on the floor. Baucus was the only Democrat on the panel who voted against it, while Snowe captured the support of fellow Finance member Gordon Smith (R-Ore.).

Snowe said yesterday that she and Wyden would discuss their new bill at tomorrow's Finance hearing and she hoped "some of the changes will broaden the support [for negotiation]."

Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) was one of two members missing the vote on Wyden-Snowe. Despite Democrats' emphasis on negotiation during their electoral triumph last year, Coleman said yesterday he would continue to oppose government involvement in Medicare drug prices.

"We've got a system now that's working," Coleman said, acknowledging that he would risk political attacks during his reelection run in 2008 but charging that negotiation would "add another layer of bureaucracy."

DOJ_NMG_0114753

The pressure coming from outside interest groups is considerable. Two of Washington's biggest powerhouses, the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, and the AARP, are facing off and are ready to bring the full weight of their influence to bear.

Island Rights And Wage Bill Intertwined (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

House Democrats plan to bring the Northern Mariana Islands in line with U.S. minimum wage laws under legislation that comes to the floor today, thus ending a decade of policy favoring island businesses secured by lobbyist Jack Abramoff and former Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas).

Democrats, however, are finding it difficult to clean up the mess Abramoff and Co. left behind, especially when dealing with the only U.S. territory that lacks a delegate in Washington. The Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands' (CNMI) government has a resident representative in Washington, a position that carries no congressional office or powers, even the right to make statements on the House floor.

For years, DeLay and Abramoff worked to block a delegate bill from coming to the floor. Legislation giving the islands a delegate has passed the House Resources Committee several times in the last few years, but former Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) never placed the bill on the legislative calendar. The presence of a Mariana delegate in Congress would diminish significantly the islands' need for a lobbyist to speak for them in Washington.

Incoming Democratic leadership said it has other reasons for opposing a CNMI delegate. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) was asked in December whether she planned to move the bill with majorities in both houses. She didn't answer directly, and later, staffers amended the press conference transcript to indicate Pelosi's opposition to the creation of a delegate.

"NOTE: Pelosi does not support a new delegate for the Mariana Islands until there are significant human rights and labor reforms there," the released transcript reads.

Education and Labor Chairman George Miller (D-Calif.) also opposes the establishment of a congressional delegate. Following a trip to the islands in the late 1990s, Miller has been a champion for reforms there, arguing that forced abortions and prostitution, as well as other human rights abuses, are rampant in Mariana sweatshops. Garment factories, many of which employ immigrant laborers from China and the Philippines, have been a pillar of the local economy. In recent years, however, international labor laws have eliminated tariffs on Chinese textiles, so Chinese companies no longer have incentive to operate factories in the Marianas.

Miller's support for a delegate has waxed and waned over the years. In 2005, he said he changed his mind on the delegate issue after the islands' governor at the time worked to improve labor conditions.

That year, Miller assailed Abramoff and DeLay during a House Resources committee markup of the bill for continuing to block it from coming to the floor.

"As a result of recent revelations in the press, we now understand far better why those bipartisan reforms and — even this legislation to create a voting delegate — have been obstructed," Miller said.

An aide for Miller says his boss no longer supports the delegate because Ben Fitial, a former garment industry executive who Abramoff and DeLay helped get elected Speaker of the CNMI House, is now governor and has vocally advocated against bringing the islands under U.S. labor and immigration standards.

A spokeswoman for CNMI Resident Representative Pete Tenorio argues that the government has spent millions of dollars to eliminate human rights abuses and ensure that labor standards and laws are enforced.

"This doesn't seem right or very democratic to have the authority and the willingness to make widespread changes to a place and not even have its concerns listened to," said CNMI spokeswoman Melinda Matson.

The islands' failing economy also is creating headaches for Democrats intent on updating labor and immigration laws there. In the late 1990s, when DeLay and Abramoff first worked to block a minimum-wage increase, the islands' garment factory industry was riding high. Now the increase would come as the region struggles to cope with a rapid decline in the industry as the result of international trade rules, and a decrease in tourism. As the garment business has suffered — 12 factories were shuttered in the last few years — the CNMI government has taken in fewer tax dollars and laid off thousands of workers.

The bill would increase the islands' minimum wage to $7.25 over the next four years, compared to the two years and two months it gives other U.S. employers to phase in the increase. Matson said Tenorio is not opposed to an increase in the minimum wage, but objects to the amount.

"What business could handle the doubling of their minimum wage in just a few years' time?" she asked.

Tenorio would like to modify that language to allow for just two 55-cent increases in the next year and a half. The CNMI government also wants to add a wage-review committee similar to the one that exists in American Samoa. The local government of that U.S. territory is concerned about the impact implementing the full minimum wage would have on its tuna-canning industry. Samoa's wage-review committee consults with the U.S. Department of Interior on proposed wage increases' impact, and has managed to keep minimum wages dollars below federal levels.

"We're really concerned that we're going to have businesses fail and the only safety net that we have is food stamps," Matson said.

In terms of the House bill, however, the CNMI government's pleas have fallen on deaf ears. Matson said staffers for Miller told her that modifications came too late and they plan to go forward with the straight minimum-wage increase. On the Senate side, however, informal talks are taking place at the staff level to evaluate whether any modifications could be made that would mitigate the hike's impact on the islands' already weak economy. Senators plan to attach the CNMI minimum wage hike to the broader Senate wage bill scheduled for floor action next week.

Miller did not respond to specific questions about the minimum wage bill's impact on the island.

"Workers in the Northern Marianas have suffered for years without decent workplace standards, and that is finally about to change," Miller spokesman Tom Kiley said in a written statement.

Minimum Wage, Maximum Myth (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

With Wall Street hot shots and corporate chiefs raking in obscene amounts of money, and with pay in the bottom half of the workforce barely keeping up with inflation, you'd think raising the minimum wage for the first time in a decade would be a political and economic no-brainer for the new Democratic Congress.

But you'd be forgetting about Max Baucus.

Baucus is a Democratic senator from the Republican-leaning state of Montana, which means he is on the political equivalent of the endangered-species list. So you can understand Baucus's need to vote with his constituents on things like sugar subsidies and gun control and grazing fees on public lands.

But while Baucus is surely entitled to his opinions, and entitled to do what is necessary to assure his own political survival, he is not entitled to be chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, which handles such key Democratic issues as health care, trade and tax policy. That position ought to be reserved for a statesman with enough political confidence and backbone that he isn't constantly sacrificing the interests of his party and his country to the narrow interests of his subsidy-addicted constituents.

You'd think Baucus would have learned his lesson in 2001, when he won the enmity of Democrats everywhere by striking the deal that led to passage of the Bush tax cuts, including the phase-out of the estate tax. Apparently not. For on the very day the new Democratic House is set to push through a long-overdue minimum-wage increase, over in the Senate, Baucus has called a hearing on how to offset the "economic hardship" caused by the higher minimum wage with yet another round of business tax breaks.

Consider, for a moment, the economic logic that lies behind Baucus's hearing this morning, when senators will hear from a panel of witnesses that includes Dave Ratner, owner of Dave's Soda & Pet City in Agawam, Mass.

No doubt Ratner and the others will point out that workers making at or near the federal minimum wage are nearly all employed by small businesses. We will hear all the sob stories about how struggling small businesses with thin margins will be forced to cut back on hiring, pull back on expansion plans and, in some instances, close their doors. Moreover, this won't be a tragedy just for small-business owners and employees but for the economy as a whole, since everybody knows that small business creates virtually all new jobs. Only another round of tax breaks can keep the great American jobs machine humming.

And here's the thing: Most of it is nonsense.

To begin, both economic theory and history suggest that small business will, in time, pass on its increased costs to its consumers. Small businesses that pay low wages tend to compete with other small businesses that pay low wages, so they will all face the same cost pressures and respond in similar fashion. The worst that can be said is that a higher minimum wage will add, very modestly, to overall inflation.

There is also general agreement among economists that a higher minimum wage, at the levels we are talking about, will have a minimal impact on adult employment. Slightly higher prices might reduce, slightly, the demand for Wendy's hamburgers, cheap hotel rooms and dog-walking services. But largely offsetting those effects will be the increased demand for goods and services by tens of millions of Americans who will finally be getting a raise. A higher minimum wage doesn't lower economic activity so much as rearrange it slightly.

The biggest lie of all is that small businesses have created most of the new jobs in America. This canard, perpetrated by the small-business lobby and embraced by politicians of both parties, has been used for decades to justify all manner of special subsidies for small business. But as economist Veronique de Rugy of the American Enterprise Institute reported in a paper last year, new jobs have been created by both large and small businesses in roughly the same proportion.

In truth, the bulk of new jobs have always been created by a relatively small number of new firms that grow fast and get quite big -- think of companies like Southwest Airlines, Google, CarMax. Most have little in common with the small-business lobby in Washington or fast-food restaurant chains or the members of the Kiwanis Club in Helena, Mont. As a rule, companies like these couldn't care less about the minimum wage or special tax breaks to offset it.

Linking the minimum wage to small-business tax breaks is specious for other reasons, as well.

During the last decade, when inflation-adjusted pay of minimum-wage workers was declining, tax rates for small businesses were also declining, thanks largely to the Bush cuts. If it is now imperative to reduce business taxes when the pay of minimum-wage workers is rising, you have to wonder if there will ever be a time when the small-business lobby thinks it doesn't deserve a tax cut.

It's also worth noting that, according to the Internal Revenue Service, small-business owners, sole proprietors and the self-employed are, as a group, the biggest tax cheats in America, responsible for $153 billion of the estimated $345 billion tax gap in 2001. What these folks deserve are more frequent visits from IRS auditors, not more tax breaks.

Real Democrats know that raising the minimum wage is the right thing to do -- economically, politically, morally. The question is why they have chosen a Senate Finance chairman who can't articulate that position without equivocation or apology even before the first vote is cast.

Steven Pearlstein will host an online discussion at 11 a.m. today at washingtonpost.com. He can be reached atpearlsteins@washpost.com.

Minimum-Wage Wrangling Has Parties Switching Roles (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

Playing against type in the new Congress, Republicans are talking up health care while Democrats talk up tax breaks for small business.

The juxtaposition is striking as the two parties haggle over what it will take to raise the federal minimum wage, a Democratic priority now seen as inevitable after the midterm elections.

Democrats are embracing billions of dollars in tax breaks to ease the effect on small employers. But as Republican governors in California and Massachusetts bring forward state plans to help uninsured families, Republicans in Congress recognize the health-care issue's populist appeal and propose to help small employers deal with covering their workers.

The result is a three-issue Washington triangle that could have unintended consequences. Paying for small-business tax breaks, for example, may mean tightening tax shelters for the wealthy and big corporations.

The action begins today, when the House is poised to adopt its minimum-wage bill raising the hourly rate to $7.25 from $5.15; the change would be phased in over two years, with three 70-cent increments. In the Senate, Finance Committee, Chairman Max Baucus (D., Mont.) will hold a hearing today to weigh tax breaks to help small employers, especially the restaurant industry, which wants a substantial acceleration in depreciation for new construction.

"We're a small-business country, and my state is a small-business state," Mr. Baucus said. He expects to add $8 billion to $10 billion in tax breaks to the Senate wage bill next week.

Hoping to trump the Democrats, House Republicans are pushing legislation to let employers with fewer than 100 workers seek coverage through trade-association health plans that could operate on a national scale exempt from state regulation.

"I think that this leadership has decided to go with health care because that is the most personal decision that families make each and every day, and it affects so many people," said Rep. Eric Cantor (R., Va.), the deputy whip.

"In the last 10 years, it does seem to me that the Republicans have gotten smarter in not opposing everything," said Robert Berenson, a senior fellow at the Urban Institute and a former Clinton-administration Medicare official. "Regarding the uninsured, they have wised up and are pursuing their own solutions."

Powerful Realtor and small-business lobbies have a stake, both for their members and as potential health-plan sponsors. Chief among these is the National Federation of Independent Business, a longtime Republican ally and an opponent of the Clinton administration's 1994 health overhaul plan.

Patient groups argue that the promised cost savings from AHPs will come at the expense of weakening protections for the sickest. State regulators oppose the intrusion on their jurisdiction. And bigger insurers whose small-business health plans are regulated by the states are worried that nonregulated AHPs will have a competitive advantage.

Senate Republicans made some progress toward a compromise last summer but fell short of the 60 votes needed to forestall an election-year filibuster by opponents. The question now is whether movement on the minimum wage can trigger a willingness to take a fresh look at AHP legislation and make the changes needed to reach agreement.

Facing re-election in 2008, Mr. Baucus is hopeful. "Let's see if we can reach an agreement," he said, proposing to move the minimum-wage bill first and then come back to talks on the small-business health plans. Senate Majority Whip Richard Durbin (D., Ill.), also facing the voters in two years, has an interest as well.

"We're definitely optimistic," an NFIB spokesman said later.

So far, the tax side of the political equation has been overshadowed by the health-care skirmishing. But Mr. Baucus is working with his ranking Republican, Iowa Sen. Charles Grassley, and also wants to come up with tax offsets to minimize the impact on the deficit.

The tax breaks under consideration include leasehold and expensing provisions for small employers, work opportunity tax credits as well as a plan to reduce the depreciation period for new restaurant construction from 39 years to 15 years. The 10-year cost of the package is expected to run in the range of $8 billion to $10 billion -- about half of what Congress did in 1996.

House Dems Ready To Push Medicare Negotiations (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

WASHINGTON — Twelve years after Congress rejected President Clinton's effort to redesign the nation's health care system, the debate about the government's role in the marketplace is being joined again this week.

House Democrats on Friday plan to pass legislation requiring the government to negotiate for lower Medicare prescription-drug prices. They see it as one way to reduce the impact of the program's coverage gap, which forces seniors and disabled Americans with high drug costs to pay their full cost for a period of months.

The Medicare prescription-drug law signed by President Bush in 2003 prohibited the government from interfering in negotiations over drug prices. Those negotiations are handled by scores of private insurance plans in each state.

An advertising and lobbying blitz by consumers, insurers and drug manufacturers isn't as extensive as it was in the early 1990s — at least not yet. But the debate over this issue could signify a series of political conflicts over health care policy reminiscent of the Clinton administration's first two years.

"This is about both money and politics," says Tricia Neuman, director of the Medicare Policy Project at the Kaiser Family Foundation, a health care research group. "This is an issue that both seniors and the public feel fairly strongly about."

The debate comes as the Medicare prescription-drug program is rebounding from a troubled start last January, when millions of low-income beneficiaries were mistakenly dropped or overcharged. More than 90% of seniors have some type of drug coverage. Individual premiums and overall taxpayer costs have come in substantially lower than projected. And for the first time in Kaiser's surveys, a majority of seniors approve of the program.

The biggest objection is the coverage gap encountered by seniors whose total drug costs exceed $2,400. Until they have paid $3,850 on their own, they receive no coverage. Proponents of price negotiations by Medicare say that would help narrow the gap.

House Democrats, who have made government price negotiations part of their first "100 hours" agenda, have public anger over drug prices on their side. A Kaiser survey shows that four in five seniors want the government to negotiate for lower prices.

"I think this is one of the reasons the Democrats took the House and the Senate," says Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., who chairs the Energy and Commerce Committee and is sponsoring the bill. If Bush vetoes it or the administration refuses to negotiate over prices, he says, "then we'll see what the political consequences of it are."

Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., has estimated it could save between $61 billion and $96 billion over 10 years. That's disputed by the Congressional Budget Office, which projects no savings, largely because the government would not be able to restrict which drugs are covered.

Private insurers and the Department of Veterans Affairs drive prices down by negotiating with drugmakers over which medicines will be offered to beneficiaries. Companies that don't cut prices risk having their drugs excluded.

A report released Tuesday by the consumer group Families USA says Medicare's prices for seniors' most frequently used drugs are about 58% higher than those provided by the Department of Veterans Affairs. Under the House bill, Medicare could not decide which drugs insurance plans cover.

"Prescription-drug plans were both envisioned and have turned out to have sufficient incentives, market share and tools to negotiate effectively," says Douglas Holtz-Eakin, former CBO director. "It doesn't look like the (government) would bring much more to the table."

AARP, the nation's largest seniors organization, backed the 2003 law but is running ads that blast Medicare for having 43 million beneficiaries "and zero bargaining power" over drug prices.

On the other side are the White House, Senate Republicans, health insurers and drug manufacturers. Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt has called the House bill a "surrogate for government-run health care." He met Tuesday with House Republicans to drive home the administration's opposition to the House bill.

Insurers are touting the current program's success in saving seniors an average of $1,200 on their drug bills while preserving their choices in drugs and pharmacies. "We've exceeded expectations," says Karen Ignagni, president of America's Health Insurance Plans.

And drugmakers are running ads against the House bill. "We're trying to remind people that it took nearly 40 years" to get a Medicare prescription-drug benefit, says Ken Johnson of the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America. "Do we want to risk blowing it up in 100 hours?" The bill, he says, "could ultimately lead to price controls and restrictions on new medicines."

While Democrats have the votes to pass the bill in the House, it faces a closer battle in the Senate. The Senate Finance Committee opens hearings on the issue Thursday. A weaker version that allowed but did not mandate government negotiations got 54 votes in the Senate last year, six short of the 60 required to overcome Republicans' objections. Sens. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, and Ron Wyden, D-Ore., its sponsors, count 58 or 59 votes this year — still short of what's needed.

White House spokesman Tony Fratto said Tuesday that Bush's advisers would recommend he veto the House bill. "The so-called reform sounds nice on a bumper sticker, but it's a solution in search of a problem," he said. "It would limit drug choices for seniors and impede competition."

Skeptical Senate Eyes 5-Day Week (RC)

DOJ_NMG_0114758

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, January 10, 2007

Senators are adjusting their travel plans to comply with the newly implemented five-day work schedule, but few believe Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) will actually keep the chamber operating at that clip for long.

Opinions vary over how long Reid will insist on the Monday-through-Friday calendar, but Senators and aides on both sides of the aisle have little faith it will last beyond August and the unofficial start of the 2008 election season. About a third of the Senate is up for re-election in two years, and the contest for the White House — likely featuring several sitting Senators — already is in play.

"Five-day workweeks will likely last until roughly the Presidents Day recess," offered one Senate Democratic aide.

Reid is vowing to run a tight ship and has promised that the Democratic majority will not repeat the three-days-of-voting weeks that often marked the years of Republican rule. Don't expect a change in course anytime soon, Reid's office says.

"From here on out, to the extent possible, Members and staff should be prepared to have votes on most Mondays and Fridays," said spokesman Jim Manley.

Manley said Senators simply will have to "juggle" their schedules to make it work, and if some are expecting Reid to pare back the workweek, "they are going to end up being surprised."

At least in the first official week of the 110th Congress, Democrats were basking in their new majority status and were publicly unfazed by the Senate clock. Senators said after practically 12 years in the minority, they have to make up for lost time to get things done.

Sen. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.), chairman of the Budget Committee, said he "absolutely" will have to cut back his trips home but called it "very important" to cover the "backlog of work" around here. "It's absolutely essential," he said. "We've got to clear the work from last year. We've got to clear the decks."

Freshman Democratic Sen. Jon Tester (Mont.), whose commute home is lengthier than most, said the Senate schedule will "impede my ability to get home, but we've got a lot of work to do." Tester guessed that if successful in working through some its business, the Senate ultimately could "back off" of the five-day directive.

But, Tester added, "I will tell you that the three-day workweeks are over."

Public posture aside, a different tone may soon take hold among Senators. In the House, some Members already have balked at the calendar, and in fact, Democrats' pledge to hold a five-day workweek fell to four days in this, the first week of business.

"Eventually, Senators are going to say, 'I gotta go, I can't shift my whole schedule by a day to vote on a Sense of the Senate resolution,'" said a senior GOP Senate aide. "It will become a de facto three-day workweek."

One Democratic Senate staffer agreed, noting that Senators already are grumbling over a schedule that prevents them from performing constituent work and fundraising.

"While it makes for a great sound bite, the reality is that a five-day workweek is doing more harm than good," the aide said. "I would not be surprised to see things slowly revert to the old schedule."

As part of that, Senators and aides alike predicted that the Democratic leadership would soon schedule votes late on Mondays and early on Fridays. That would allow Senators to use the beginning and end of the week as travel days, they said.

Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.), who got up at 3:30 a.m. Monday to catch his flight, said while he's more than happy to make concessions to do his work in the Senate, he expects Reid may get some blow-back on the new calendar from within his own ranks. He added that if Senators are required to give up important constituent time to return to Washington, D.C., a day early, they will expect to be voting on legislation of consequence.

"We'll wait to see how long this lasts," Thune said.

Sen. John Ensign (Nev.), who is charged with electing Republicans to the chamber in 2008 as chairman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, said regardless of how many days are on the schedule, it will do little to speed up legislative business. It's less about time spent under the Dome and more about the urgency with which Senators work, he said.

"You aren't going to get any more done" by being in D.C. five days a week, Ensign said. "You can work eight days a week, but unless people decide to get things done it doesn't matter."

Among His Official Duties, Keeping On Top Of The 100-Hour Clock (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 — Rob Cogorno is busy watching the clock. And not just any clock.

It is The Clock, at least as far as Capitol Hill is concerned this week — and early next week, and maybe into late next week, depending on how long House Democrats decide it will run.

Mr. Cogorno's formal title is floor director for Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the House majority leader, but for all practical purposes, he is the Keeper of The Clock. That is the digital timepiece on Mr. Hoyer's Web site marking the passage of legislative time as House Democrats push their "Hundred Hours for a New Direction" agenda through Congress.

Mr. Cogorno, 50, is a neatly dressed, precise and exacting man whose shiny desktop in the majority leader's office holds a neat stack of newspapers and a canister of Purell hand sanitizer. He wakes promptly at 6:20 a.m. (by digital clock radio set to NPR) and has prided himself on being punctual since his parents gave him a Mickey Mouse watch when he was 6.

Mr. Cogorno tells time by his BlackBerry, but charts the official passage of "legislative time" by the stately face clock that looms above the House floor.

"We're only counting legislative hours," Mr. Cogorno says in response to the question he has volleyed repeatedly this week. "Legislative time" he explains, occurs when the House is in session and toiling at some official function — debating, voting or doing anything related to making laws. It does not count designated periods in which members can bloviate on all manner of things (say, the plumage of a state bird or the efforts of a national championship football team).

In the event of a dispute? "We decide what constitutes the 100 hours," said Stacey Bernards, a Hoyer spokeswoman. Chiefly, Mr. Cogorno decides. It is a monumental charge.

The Clock, which is also on Speaker Nancy Pelosi's Web site, was set to start running at noon. (You could imagine parents waking their newborns to catch the epic moment on C-Span.) Alas, noon arrived with a failure to launch or tick. Mr. Hoyer's office issued a news release at 12:02 p.m. titled "Update on House Democrats' 100 Hours Clock." The Clock, it said, "will begin ticking" at approximately 1:30 p.m.

At 1 p.m. many members were contemplating lunch and wondering whether The Clock had started.

"I think it has, yes," said Representative Ellen O. Tauscher, Democrat of California.

"Jeez, I don't know," said Representative Don Young, Republican of Alaska. "I don't have one of those hourglasses."

Mr. Young said he expected that Republicans would be given stopwatches "with those little Mickey Mouse thingies on them" to keep track. Either way, he says, he doesn't give a squeak.

"Hmm, let's find out," said Representative Dennis J. Kucinich, Democrat of Ohio, when asked at 2:20 p.m. if the 100 hours had started. He picked up a phone at a security station, called the Democratic cloakroom and asked for someone named Bob.

Yes, Mr. Kucinich reported, the heady hours commenced at exactly 12:57 p.m. when the House began debate on carrying out the recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission.

Or did they?

"The Clock started at 1 p.m.," Mr. Cogorno corrected, with the certitude of someone who has the final say.

Like many other Congressional staff members, Mr. Cogorno, who joined Mr. Hoyer's office in 2003 after working for Richard A. Gephardt, the former Democratic House leader, finds that these are busy hours. Clockwatching duties fell to him as a top aide to Mr. Hoyer, who is in charge of scheduling bills.

For a keepsake, Mr. Cogorno said he would make a printout of the official clock on Mr. Hoyer's Web site when it hit its 100th hour, which might not occur until the end of next week because of gratuitous speeches (the kinds that do not count as legislative time), motions or scheduling obstacles.

He also said he intended to make a printout of The Clock at 1 p.m., when the 100 hours began — except 1 p.m. had already come and gone almost two hours before this interview took place. So the souvenir would require him to turn back The Clock, which Democrats say they are loath to do these days.

Taking Day Off For Football Costs Dems Credibility (HILL)

The Hill, January 10, 2007

House Democrats lost considerable credibility yesterday when their opening session was cancelled so that members could attend the Ohio State-Florida State football game.

This is not a joke.

It is, however, a blunt metaphor for how genuinely out of touch the members of Congress really are. How many other Americans do you suppose were given the same perk? A day off because of an evening football game? And how many school kids would like to have time off to watch their own favorite teams? What kind of message is the House leadership sending?

Is it that they don't get how bad it looks, or that they don't care?

Their record has been dismal. Last year, the House and Senate worked an average of about two days a week for their salary of $162,500. Nice work if you can find it. Responding to well-deserved criticisms, the new House majority leader, Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), with great fanfare, promised a five-day work week. But that was just talk. When it was the Republicans who were scheduling the eight-day month, Hoyer was outraged. But now that the Democrats control the calendar, he considers a football game to be a legitimate excuse for a vacation day. As he said in reference to the new House minority leader, John Boehner (R-Ohio), "There is a very important event happening Monday night, particularly for those who live in Ohio and Florida. In the spirit of comity, and I know if Maryland were playing, I would want to be accommodated, and I want to accommodate my friend, Mr. Boehner."

Apparently Mr. Hoyer is not familiar with the disdain that American voters feel for members of Congress. A mid-December Gallup poll showed that 74 percent of Americans disapproved of the job that Congress was doing. Hoyer is certainly doing his best to keep those negative poll numbers.

And there won't be a five-day work week at all in January. The Martin Luther King holiday falls next week and the Democrats and Republicans are holding respective retreats during the following two weeks. The Democrats are planning a day of speeches in two weeks, including one by Bill Clinton. Hey folks, ever think about doing this on a weekend?

So the promised "five-day" work week starts on Tuesday at 6:30 and ends at about 2 on Friday — more like a two-and-a-half-day work week.

And that might not even happen if there's another important football game.

Meanwhile in the Senate, while Sens. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.), Susan Collins (R-Maine) and John McCain (R-Ariz.) fight for an independent watchdog to enforce lobbying laws, Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) insists that hearings must first be held on the issue. This is hardly a new idea. It's been proposed for years and makes sense. We've seen how little policing of lobbyists has been done — witness Jack Abramoff and his cohorts. Requiring hearings is just another stalling tactic. And, in any event, Reid is the last person who should be in charge of designing the self-policing of lobbyists. For years, his three sons and son-in-law made millions by lobbying for Nevada interests — often working out of his Senate office. Only when the press called attention to the practice did Reid bar the boys. Talk about the goats guarding the garbage! Sen. Obama spoke of "institutional resistance" to the watchdog provisions. That institutional resistance has led to serious lobbying transgressions that must be stopped.

If the Democrats want to stay in power, and if Congress wants to win the support and trust of the American people, they'd better start thinking about how their actions resonate with the average voter. Looks like it's already time for new Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) to use her "mother-of-five voice" and turn things around in the House. As for the Senate, let's hope the new members speak out and force real and necessary reforms. This time the country is watching.

Grandma With A Gavel (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

DOJ_NMG_0114761

I have to admit: The grandkids got to me. I'm sentimental by temperament, cynical by training and experience, and the longer I work in Washington, the more the latter trait prevails.

So when the newly minted speaker of the House invited her own grandchildren and the other children in the chamber to join her on the podium and touch the speaker's gavel, my first thought was: This is so choreographed. My second thought was: Awwwww.

The images as California Democrat Nancy Pelosi took office last week were striking -- and stirring -- in their unfamiliarity. Pelosi, holding her infant grandson swaddled in a white receiving blanket, as she sat in the well of the House, awaiting her election. Pelosi, with the assurance of a mother experienced at dispensing cookies to impatient toddlers, giving each child his -- and her -- turn with the gavel. Pelosi raising her hand to take the oath as her grandson, at her side, fiddled with grandma's papers.

As a journalist, I understand the calculations at work here: This plays to Pelosi's advantages, humanizes her image as shrill San Francisco Democrat. As a woman and a mother, especially as a mother of daughters, I was quietly thrilled. About the marble ceiling cracking, yes, but also about the way Pelosi cracked it -- reveling in, not minimizing, her mother- and grandmother-hood.

"Powerful" and "mommy" are not concepts we're used to holding simultaneously. We've become accustomed to women who appear comfortable wielding influence without denying their femininity; think Condoleezza Rice in those high-heeled boots or posing for Vogue in a strapless black gown.

But powerful women who also happen to be mommies have tended to play down the mommy thing, almost as if they think it would diminish their ability to be taken seriously. In a world where women are suspected of failing to comprehend throw-weights, having a baby on board isn't a traditional road map for success.

Pelosi is playing it differently: motherhood as preparation for public office. "Having five children in six years is the best training in the world for speaker of the House," she told the AARP Bulletin. "It made me the ultimate multitasker and the master of focus, routine and scheduling."

Asked about national security during the campaign, she would preemptively bring up her mother-of-five-ness: "Think lioness when you think of women in politics. You threaten our cubs, you're dead." As the election drew close, Pelosi made clear that she'd skip town -- even on election night -- if her daughter went into labor with her sixth grandchild.

How different is this? Imagine Margaret Thatcher threatening to deploy her "mother-of-five voice." When her first grandchild was born in 1989, the prime minister declared with regal glee, "We have become a grandmother," and that was it for the cuddliness.

Pelosi's mommy shtick can get a little clunky (the lioness bit never worked for me) and a little treacly ("Let's hear it for the children, we're here for the children.") But it serves as an important confirmation of women's increasing comfort with their dual roles, and the need for society and the workplace to adjust accordingly.

I started my career in the "dress for success" era, in which women were solemnly instructed to dress as much as possible like male wannabes, in somber suits complete with floppy faux-ties. (Compare Pelosi's swearing-in outfit: scoop-necked aubergine suit and pearls-on-steroids.) Even more important than looking like men was acting like them -- to suppress any suggestion that motherhood might compete with career. If you had to cut out of the office for the third-grade play, better to plead an emergency root canal than look like a mom. That is changing -- now men, even men in politics, wave around their family obligations as badges of decency.

But the Pelosi paradigm could use an update: Pelosi 2.0. The new speaker did stay home and bake cookies; she wasn't elected to Congress until she was 47 and her kids were grown. For better or worse, and with or without a wealthy husband, this isn't especially feasible for most women now. For one thing, we tend to have children later; for another, employers aren't eager to hire women with stale degrees and atrophied skills. The key to ensuring future Pelosis is a workplace that accommodates women -- and men -- looking for ways to shuttle in and out of work or to craft flexible schedules that let them be good employees and good parents.

Who better to help accomplish this than a female speaker? As 8-year-old Madeleine said of her grandmother at the women's tea honoring Pelosi last week, "Because my Mimi got this job I think more women will get jobs like hers."

When Madeleine finished, Pelosi gave her a hug, and then, like grandmothers everywhere, brushed the child's hair out of her eyes.

Senate Moving On Ethics Bill (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, January 10, 2007

Senators moved Tuesday to put more muscle into legislation to sanitize their tarnished image with proposals requiring lawmakers to pay charter rates for corporate jet rides and shell out the full cost for Skybox tickets to sporting events.

Members of Congress need to "demonstrate once and for all that we care more about representing the American people than the perks of power," Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., said.

Picking up on the anti-corruption theme that helped bring them to power, Democrats in both the House and Senate have started off with legislation to ban gifts and meals from lobbyists, limit privately paid travel and shine more light on the special projects, or earmarks, that have proliferated in legislation.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and Republican leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., on Tuesday offered several alternatives aimed at strengthening the Senate bill, which has been criticized as being inadequate in several key areas.

Among the proposals were to require lawmakers to pay the full price of tickets to sporting and entertainment events and to expand the definition of earmarks to include targeted tax and tariff benefits and projects routed through a federal agency that benefit only one nonfederal entity.

Feinstein, the incoming Rules Committee chairman, said this would help stop the kind of backroom deals that sent former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., to jail last year for taking bribes from defense for his aid in steering Pentagon spending.

Reid separately offered an amendment to require lawmakers, already barred under the bill from participating in trips involving lobbyists, to pay full charter rates when they catch rides on corporate jets. New House rules adopted last week effectively banned all travel on corporate planes.

Currently lawmakers usually pay the equivalent of a first-class ticket, much less expensive than a charter rate, when they travel by private jet. Members from larger states such as Alaska or Texas argue that they would be unable to visit remote areas of their states without using non-commercial jets.

The amended bill, in addition to requiring a two-year waiting period before former members can lobby Congress, would bar lawmakers from negotiating for jobs with lobbying firms while still in office.

"We should not tolerate a committee chairman shepherding the Medicare prescription drug bill through Congress at the same time that he is negotiating a job with the pharmaceutical industry to become their top lobbyist," said Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill.

He was referring to former Rep. Billy Tauzin, R-La., who left Congress in 2005 to head the trade group representing pharmaceutical companies. Tauzin had chaired the committee that regulated drug makers and was a key player in passing the prescription drug bill that critics said was favorable to the pharmaceutical industry.

The Senate is expected to be on the ethics bill through next week, and it is unclear when they will vote on the proposed amendments.

The legislation, in the wake of the scandals involving former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and Cunningham last year, has strong support, but Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., warned his colleagues to be careful of overreacting and "feckless positioning to make it look good." He said he was "offended that somebody says that for the price of a meal I can be had by a lobbyist or anyone else."

Lott also urged caution in considering another idea that is certain to come up during the debate, the creation of an independent office of public integrity to investigate ethics charges against lawmakers.

But Democratic Whip Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., said the lobbying bill falls short of addressing the bigger question of the financing of political campaigns. The bill would ban a lobbyist from buying him lunch, he said, but "tomorrow that same lobbyist can have me over for lunch at his lobbying firm to provide campaign funds for my reelection campaign and its perfectly legal."

Ethics Debate Begins (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, January 10, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114763

Senate leaders from both parties on Tuesday pushed into a likely two-week lobbying and ethics reform debate by unveiling a package of changes meant to beef up the overhaul bill the chamber passed handily last spring.

But the drive to strengthen ethics rules is off to a slow start in the Senate, where leaders had hoped to pick up momentum from House approval last week of sweeping rules changes. Senators have yet to vote on any amendments, and aside from two proposals offered by Senate leaders, only Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) had offered an amendment by Tuesday evening.

A substitute measure offered Tuesday by Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) broadens the definition of earmarks covered by new disclosure requirements, mandates tickets to sports and entertainment events be priced at market value, strengthens criminal penalties for lobbyist scofflaws, and imposes a number of changes meant to make Senate procedures more open and fair.

But it left out several reforms — touted as critical by public-interest groups — addressing gifts and travel. Reid picked up those proposals and offered them himself in a separate amendment. His plan tightens bans on gifts and privately funded travel and, most controversially, would force Senators to pay charter rates for rides they catch on corporate jets.

The corporate jet proposal already has met with opposition from Senators who will play a key role in the reform debate. Both Rules and Administration Chairwoman Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and ranking member Bob Bennett (R-Utah) — who are helping manage debate on the bill — spoke out against the change, arguing it would make it impossible for Members representing large, rural states to travel and reach constituents.

"An absolute firm ban on any kind of flight unless you're paying hourly commercial rates is saying to the Senator from Alaska, 'You cannot travel around your state,'" said Bennett, referring to Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), another foe of the jet proposal.

Reid is one of the Senate's most frequent users of corporate jets, taking six trips alone through November of last year, according to PoliticalMoneyLine.com. The Majority Leader acknowledged Tuesday that he hasn't been a stranger to corporate planes, saying, "I've been on private airplanes a lot over the years." Still, he said it was important for Senators to start paying charter rates for the flights "to remove even the appearance of impropriety from this body."

Congressional watchdogs said taken together, Reid's proposals marked an encouraging start to the reform process.

"It's a very important beginning in that the fight for three key ethics reform issues are being led on the floor by Senate Majority Leader Reid," said Democracy 21 President Fred Wertheimer. But, he added, "we have votes and fights ahead."

Reform advocates said in addition to the corporate jet provision, they are preparing for struggles over two other priorities: an independent Office of Public Integrity to investigate ethics complaints that Senate reformers are expected to try to add to the bill, and new disclosure requirements for grass-roots lobbying efforts already in the base text.

The grass-roots lobbying measure is being opposed by an array of conservative groups that argue the requirement would pointlessly force small organizations with modest budgets to file disclosure reports. "We just feel it's a gross abuse of our Constitutional rights," said Dick Dingman, senior counsel for the Free Speech Coalition Inc., which represents more than 50 groups opposing the plan.

Bennett last spring tried to strike the grass-roots language from the bill while it was still in committee, but his effort fell short and he did not try again on the floor. A spokeswoman for the Senator said he has no plans to offer any specific amendments to the bill this year.

Vitter proposed banning lawmakers' family members from serving on the payroll of their campaign committees or leadership political action committees. He also offered a campaign finance reform measure aimed at Indian tribes and a plan to impose criminal penalties on lawmakers and executive branch officials who knowingly file inaccurate financial disclosure reports.

Reid said he would keep the chamber in session past noon next Friday if it takes that long to wrap up work on the bill. House Democrats, meanwhile, are waiting to see what the Senate produces before finalizing work on their own reform legislation, aides said.

Well-Grounded Ethics Reform (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0114764

The Senate's new majority leader, Harry Reid, like most of his colleagues on both sides of the aisle, is an admitted frequent flier on posh lobbyist-provided corporate jets. So we were very pleased yesterday when he proposed legislation that would require senators to pay the full charter-flight fare if they wanted to ride in the style of a C.E.O.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi took the issue further with a full House ban on private jet perks, enacted through a rules change, not legislation. But Senator Reid's initiative could be just as effective, provided no loopholes creep in as the Senate takes up wide-ranging proposals for ethics reform.

No less vital to the new Democratic majority's corruption-fighter claims is the need to create a public integrity office of nonpartisan professionals to help Congress police its own misbehavior. The Republican-controlled Senate rejected the idea last year, but voters soon put a new hand on the gavel. Senator Reid and Ms. Pelosi should both move quickly to create such an office.

Senator Reid also wants his chamber to repair its flimsy regulations by banning gifts, travel and entertainment boons — not just from lobbyists, but from their corporate employers. This should be enacted with bipartisan support, along with more measures to strike at the heart of the corruption issue: the mutual back-scratching of lobbyists and lawmakers who routinely barter lucrative campaign donations for lucrative legislative favors.

Strong proposals are to be debated in coming days, including legislation that would require lobbyists and lawmakers to provide fuller public disclosures of who raises how much for whom. Another proposal would shine a bright light on "earmark" trafficking — the process by which lawmakers slip last-minute, debate-free and unsigned amendments into bills on behalf of favored pleaders. A third proposal would curb so-called "Astroturfing," requiring the disclosure of the finances of lobbyists' phony grass-roots pressure groups.

It is far past time for Congress to end all these practices. And far past time for Congress to clean up the lobbying industry and itself.

Down-to-earth Ethics (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

THE SENATE prides itself on being different than the "other body" — the more plebian and poll-driven House of Representatives. But do members of the World's Greatest Deliberative Body really want to define themselves by their greater willingness to hop aboard a corporate jet?

You might think so, judging from the rumblings from senators unhappy about the pressure to follow the ethically energized House in banning travel by members on corporate planes

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who chairs the Rules Committee, worried in an interview with The Times that prohibiting such hitchhiking, or making it too costly — such as requiring senators to pay a charter rate — "would make it very difficult for many members to get to, and around, their states on a timely basis."

Feinstein does support publicizing senators' trips on corporate jets. But in this case, disclosure isn't an adequate remedy for the reality and the appearance of cuddling up to special interests. And although Feinstein's objections may be rooted in a concern about responsiveness to constituents, that's not the only reason senators like to fly corporate.

"Why do you think there's resistance?" Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) asked, and then provided the answer: "Because corporate jets are nice…. They're convenient. They're waiting for you. You don't have to take your shoes off."

We don't know whether he took his shoes off, but according to a watchdog group, Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott (R-Miss.) was a frequent flier on corporate jets from 2001 to 2005, spending $165,724 to "reimburse" the planes' owners at the commercial rate. Under a proposal backed by Obama and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), senators flying on corporate planes would have to pay the much steeper charter rate — a requirement that reformers think would discourage the practice.

The charter option, which we have endorsed in the past, would be a major improvement. Even better would be an outright ban on senators accepting lifts on corporate planes.

The Senate apparently isn't afraid of being accused of "me-tooism" when it comes to matching the House on other ethics reforms, such as refusing to accept gifts from lobbyists. It should be equally open to emulating the "other body" on this issue. Straighten up and fly right, senators.

Sen. Johnson Upgraded To Fair Condition (AP)

By Mary Clare Jalonick

AP, January 10, 2007

Sen. Tim Johnson's condition has been upgraded from critical to fair, four weeks after he was hospitalized for a brain hemorrhage, and he no longer needs a ventilator to help him breathe.

Johnson is breathing independently after using a ventilator for several weeks, most recently only at night, his doctor, Vivek Deshmukh, said Tuesday.

The South Dakota Democrat, who underwent emergency surgery on Dec. 13, remains in intensive care at George Washington University Hospital, said his spokeswoman, Julianne Fisher.

"The senator continues to make progress," Fisher said. "The next step would be rehabilitation, and we hope that would happen within the week."

A tracheotomy tube remains in his neck to guard his airway, and the senator still has not spoken, Fisher said.

The senator is expected to leave intensive care but remain in the hospital when he begins the rehabilitation process. His office has said that his recovery is expected to take several months.

Johnson was diagnosed with the arteriovenous malformation, a condition, often present from birth, that causes arteries and veins to grow abnormally large, become tangled and sometimes burst. He was rushed to the hospital after becoming disoriented on a phone call with reporters, and he underwent surgery hours later.

His long-term prognosis is unclear. Doctors have said he is steadily improving and has been responsive to his family and physicians, following commands, squeezing his wife's hand and understanding speech. He needed the ventilator to assist with his breathing after fluid developed in his lungs as a consequence of his initial hemorrhage, his doctors said.

In cases like Johnson's, doctors often depend on the patient's ability to answer questions to assess any cognitive damage caused by the hemorrhage.

The senator's sudden illness raised questions about the Democrats' one-vote majority in the upcoming Senate session. South Dakota's Republican governor, Mike Rounds, would appoint a replacement if Johnson's seat were vacated by his death or resignation.

A Republican appointee would create a 50-50 tie and could effectively allow the GOP to retain Senate control because of Vice President Dick Cheney's tie-breaking vote.

Johnson's wife, Barbara, called his change in condition "wonderful news."

"Tim has come a long way and we have a long way yet to go, but we celebrate each victory," Barbara Johnson said. "For me, it is like watching a miracle unfold each day."

S.D. Sen. Johnson's Condition Improves (WP)

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

Sen. Tim Johnson's condition has been upgraded from critical to fair, four weeks after he was hospitalized for a brain hemorrhage, his office said yesterday.

The South Dakota Democrat, who was taken to the hospital Dec. 13 and underwent emergency surgery, remains in intensive care.

"The senator continues to make progress," spokeswoman Julianne Fisher said. "The next step would be rehabilitation, and we hope that would happen within the week."

Johnson's office has said that his recovery is expected to take several months. The surgery was done to correct a condition called arteriovenous malformation, which involves tangled arteries.

His long-term prognosis is unclear. He has responded to his family and physicians, following commands, squeezing his wife's hand and understanding speech.

The senator's illness raised questions about the Democrats' one-vote majority in the Senate. South Dakota's Republican governor, Mike Rounds, would appoint a replacement if Johnson resigned or died.

A Republican appointee would create a 50-50 split and could allow the GOP to retain Senate control because of Vice President Cheney's tiebreaking vote.

Moving Ahead On Stem Cells (NYT)

House Democrats are poised to push through a bill this week that would loosen President Bush's restrictions on federal support of embryonic stem cell research. The bill will be opposed by legislators beholden to religious conservatives. Many are likely to cite a new study suggesting that broadly useful stem cells can be derived from amniotic fluid without destroying embryos to get them.

The new study, while certainly intriguing, in no way lessens the need to widen the array of embryonic stem cells available for research and ultimately therapy. The Democrats' proposal is extremely modest — about the least that could be done to accelerate progress in this promising field. It deserves support from veto-proof majorities in both houses.

Under the policy enunciated by Mr. Bush in 2001, federal money can be used to support research on only 20 or so stem cell lines that existed before the policy was set. Many of these cell lines are deteriorating or contaminated. And their number is far too small to allow the full range of research needed to explore the value of stem cells for treating Parkinson's, diabetes, spinal cord injuries and other serious ailments.

The Democrats' bill would expand the number of lines by directing the secretary of health and human services to finance research using human embryonic stem cells regardless of when they were derived. The source of these cells would remain highly restricted. No embryonic stem cells could be tailor-made to study specific diseases or therapies. The stem cells would have to be derived only from surplus embryos that were originally created for fertility treatments and would otherwise be discarded.

An alternative approach that attracted wide attention this week was described by scientists at the Wake Forest University School of Medicine. They extracted stem cells from the amniotic fluid of pregnant women and used them to create muscle, bone, fat, blood vessel, nerve and liver cells. These stem cells, spun off by the developing fetus, seem to have some — though quite probably not all — of the versatility that allows embryonic stem cells to grow into a wide range of body tissues. The fetal cells are easily obtainable from the amniotic fluid during amniocentesis, a diagnostic procedure often performed in the second trimester of a pregnancy.

Even so, it would be a mistake to use this promising research, which has yet to be replicated or fully accepted by other scientists, as another excuse for hobbling embryonic stem cell research. The days-old embryonic cells are likely more versatile than fetal cells extracted months later from amniotic fluid, and they allow a range of research on the very earliest stages of human development.

Stem cell research holds enormous promise, though top researchers say it could take a decade or more to develop useful therapies from it. At this point, it is important to explore all approaches: using "adult" stem cells, which can grow into a very limited range of body tissues; the cells found in amniotic fluid, which may yield a broader range of tissues; and the most versatile cells of all, those derived from early human embryos.

Labor's Money Grab (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

Compulsory dues are the financial foundation of Big Labor's political power. So you can bet union officials will be paying special attention today as the Supreme Court hears oral arguments in a case that could affect how that money may be spent.

The appeal consolidates two cases from Washington state, where even nonmembers of unions can be forced to pay collective-bargaining dues as a condition of employment. In 1992, Washington voters rebelled against that obligation; they overwhelmingly approved a paycheck protection law that requires unions to get "affirmative authorization" from workers who don't belong to the union before spending their dues money on politics.

The state teachers union, the Washington Education Association, challenged the voter-passed law, and a state Supreme Court ruling last year struck it down on the grounds that it violated the First Amendment free-speech rights of union officials. It's a novel rationale, to say the least.

After all, every other special interest group trying to raise money for a political cause has to contact people and persuade them to contribute. That includes the National Rifle Association, Emily's List, the trial lawyers and Chamber of Commerce. But the Washington Supreme Court held that such opt-in provisions were "too heavy an administrative burden" for unions and thus unconstitutional. The state appealed the ruling, and the U.S. Supreme Court now has a chance to decide in Washington v. Washington Education Association and Davenport v. WEA.

Washington is one of a half-dozen states to pass a paycheck protection law. And if the lower court ruling is upheld on the principle that unions have a constitutional right to extract money for political activities from even nonmembers, these laws could be jeopardized everywhere. Such a ruling could also undermine so-called "right to work" laws in 22 states, where workers currently can decide for themselves whether to join or support the union. If the High Court says unions have a First Amendment right to spend nonmember dues on politics, a right-to-work law that prohibits collecting dues from nonmembers becomes problematic.

The good news is that the U.S. Supreme Court has plenty of case law to work with. In its Beck and Abood rulings, the court said workers couldn't be compelled to support a union's political expenditures. And its Hudson decision spelled out procedures for how the competing interests of the union and nonmember workers could be balanced. Namely, the court said workers must be given an opportunity to opt out of political spending and receive a refund for dues money that isn't used for collective-bargaining purposes.

Washington state's law takes this a step further, requiring workers to actually opt into political activities, not merely opt out of them. And that's the way it should be if workers' rights are to be protected. Why should unions be able to take money from someone who objects, put it to use for lobbying and organizing, and then refund it after the fact?

The High Court has an opportunity to clarify these matters -- and in the process stop Big Labor from continuing to trample the rights of employees averse to funding a union's political agenda.

OTHER NEWS:

Some Kentucky Voters May Have 'buyer's Remorse' Over Yarmuth (HILL)

By Sam Youngman

The Hill, January 10, 2007

Though Kentucky Republicans will focus 2007 on maintaining the governor's mansion, those in the 3rd congressional district already are gunning to retake a congressional seat lost in last year's Democratic wave.

Freshman Rep. John Yarmuth (D-Ky.), who narrowly defeated five-term congresswoman Anne Northup with 51 percent of the vote, is facing a local and state GOP bitter over Northup's defeat.

While reports are circulating that Northup, a hero to state Republicans, will throw her hat in the primary ring against embattled Republican Gov. Ernie Fletcher, a number of Louisville Republicans are chomping at the bit to win back the congressional seat that is comprised almost wholly of Louisville, the commonwealth's largest metropolitan area.

In a state that has been trending red since voting for President Bill Clinton twice in the 1990s, Louisville has proven to an exception, culminating most recently with Yarmuth's election.

The chairman of the Jefferson County GOP, Jack Richardson IV, said Louisville continues to be a conservative city, and that Yarmuth's election was less about the two candidates than a poisoned national environment.

Richardson said voters in the district are reeling from "a case of buyer's remorse" despite the brevity of Yarmuth's six-day-old tenure.

"Voters wanted to throw a tantrum to send a message," Richardson said. "[But] it's kind of like when you sober up the next day and you get a hangover and you say, 'What in the world did I do?'"

Richardson said Yarmuth, a wealthy alternative-newspaper publisher, will be "just another rich kid on the block" in Washington who will come to find the congressional workload interferes with his golf game.

"Jack Richardson has about as much credibility as President Bush," Yarmuth said. "I'll have at least a year and a half to demonstrate my commitment to the job and the district and the country, and I have no doubt that I'll do that."

The Republican strategy against Yarmuth from the outset of the midterm race was to mine his hundreds of columns from his alternative newspaper in an effort to paint him as too liberal for the district.

"Louisville is not an overly conservative district, particularly when you're talking about economic issues," Yarmuth said.

State GOP Chairman Darrell Brock admits Louisville is "different than the rest of the state." Kentucky has been a solid red state in both of President Bush's campaigns, but Louisville voted for both former Vice President Al Gore and Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.), though by slim margins.

A longtime political reporter for The (Louisville) Courier-Journal, Al Cross, said the 3rd District is trending Democratic, with a large number of "traditional blue-collar, grey-collar heritage Democrats," who want to vote the party line if presented with a viable option.

"It's not a friendly district, if you will," Brock said. "[But] at the end of the day, the state is trending Republican."

That said, both Brock and Richardson acknowledged that Fletcher's rocky tenure, compounded by at least one primary challenger thus far, creates potentially dangerous ground for the party. Fletcher was the first Republican elected governor in the state in 32 years, but his administration has been haunted by a series of high-profile indictments and subsequent pardons.

Fletcher's approval ratings hovered around, and even below, 30 percent most of last year after he pardoned a number of indicted and unindicted administration officials following an aggressive grand jury investigation into the governor's hiring practices. State Republicans acknowledge that there is some concern that there could be an Ohio-effect, where a troubled state official causes headaches for the entire party.

Richardson pointed to the example of former Ohio Gov. Bob Taft's tainted administration that created an environment in which Democrats were able to make significant gains on every level. Richardson said Taft "practically destroyed the Republican Party there."

The 2007 governor's race will be the first test of party strength in Kentucky, setting the stage for the congressional campaign, Brock said.

"Frankly, if we win the governor's office, it makes it easier to retake the congressional seat," Brock said. "I think the trend is still clearly there. I won't say [the Northup loss and Fletcher troubles] stopped it, but it clearly slowed the momentum."

Possible challengers to Yarmuth include Erwin Roberts, a former Fletcher administration official and member of the University of Kentucky Board of Trustees, and Chris Thieneman, a builder and contractor popular in the growing southern area of the district, according to a source familiar with Louisville Republican politics.

Roberts, who is black and described as "conservative, well-spoken and better looking than Barack Obama," was named one of the unindicted co-conspirators in the hiring scandal, according to reports.

Cross cautioned that Roberts's baggage from his time with the governor could prove to be a substantial liability.

Though Richardson wouldn't comment on the names of potential candidates, he did say he thought a front-runner would emerge quickly despite the attention being paid to what is sure to be a hotly contested governor's race. He added that he thinks it is "a foregone conclusion" that Northup will enter the governor's race, giving her more than a 50 percent chance to win.

The filing deadline for the governor's race is Jan. 30, after which, Richardson said, potential House candidates will begin to come forward, making their intentions known and beginning the process of raising money.

Yarmuth said he expects the fundraising process to run more smoothly this time around, as many of the district's Democratic donors had long thought the seat to be out of reach.

The congressman was not thought to be a favorite of former Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.). Newsweek's Howard Fineman described Yarmuth as "Emanuel's fourth choice."

Yarmuth conceded the notoriously abrasive Emanuel "was skeptical of my chances," but he insists that no bad blood remains and Emanuel has been helpful in securing committee assignments.

As for Roberts, Thieneman or any other Louisville Republican looking to 2008, Yarmuth says he will be ready.

"I'm not taking anything for granted, but I'm not afraid of any candidate," he said.

DeMint Endorses Romney For President (AP)

By Jim Davenport, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0114769

AP, January 10, 2007

Sen. Jim DeMint has endorsed former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney in the 2008 presidential race, according to a letter the South Carolina senator is sending to state Republicans.

The endorsement letter, obtained by The Associated Press on Tuesday, marks a split between the two Republican senators representing South Carolina, which holds the first southern presidential primary.

Sen. John McCain of Arizona is favored by Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina's senior senator.

DeMint's split is seen by some as a move to find a conservative alternative to McCain, but it's not that much of a surprise.

DeMint was elected in 2004.

McCain and Romney have both set up exploratory committees and started raising money for presidential bids but haven't formally declared they're running.

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) — Democratic presidential hopeful Tom Vilsack on Tuesday called on Congress to block funds for additional troops in Iraq but expressed misgivings about using the power of the purse to reduce U.S. forces.

"I think it's one way of absolutely putting that on the table," Vilsack told The Associated Press. "Mr. President, you don't have a blank check. Congress basically made a mistake by giving him a blank check at the beginning of this process. Now they are basically saying you don't get a second blank check."

Vilsack's comments came as President Bush was expected to announce on Wednesday his decision to send 20,000 more troops to Iraq.

"I'm not willing to suggest we have a cutting off of funds that would really put people in greater danger than they are today," Vilsack said.

In one of his last acts as Iowa governor, Vilsack asked state lawmakers to take a stand against the war in Iraq.

"This war has cost us a lot," Vilsack told a joint session of the Iowa Legislature as he gave his eighth and final Condition of the State address. "It has hollowed out our military, it has in my view weakened our National Guard and put our nation at risk."

"Now the president and the Congress are poised to make a big mistake even bigger by escalating America's involvement by adding more troops and investing more resources," said Vilsack, who announced his candidacy last November.

Romney, McCain Vie For House Supporters (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

Some House conservatives are struggling to become acclimated to their marginalized role as minority members, but in recent days at least, they've been enjoying the attention of two powerful politicians: Mitt Romney and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.).

Both potential presidential candidates are racing to recast their reputations as moderates. The senator and the former Massachusetts governor recognize that by courting House Republicans, they can silence critics early and tap into a large swath of grassroots support that will be key in determining the outcome of the GOP primary contest early next year.

"A lot of people wonder how a conservative got elected governor in Massachusetts," remarked GOP Conference Chairman Adam Putnam (R-Fla.), who noted that Romney called to congratulate him the day he was elected conference chairman in November. "I'm still learning about Romney and his policies."

Yesterday Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) formally endorsed Romney, splitting the key primary state's senators between the two GOP presidential frontrunners. Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) is a good friend of McCain's and for months has been making calls on his behalf to help him round up South Carolina GOP supporters. But the endorsement came as no surprise to those watching the race closely; DeMint had held a fundraiser for Romney last year.

While Romney and McCain's efforts in South Carolina have been making headlines recently, the two also are keeping a close watch on conservative support in the House. Romney was the first to reach out to House Republicans last year, taking advantage of some conservatives' "anybody but McCain" mentality and disdain for the Arizona lawmaker's campaign-finance reform and immigration agendas. Romney has to contend with his own record on gay marriage and opposition to the Contract with America. In recent months, he also has made a concerted effort to reach out to Southern religious leaders to mollify any concerns they may have regarding his Mormon faith.

After hearing about Romney's early efforts, McCain began working on cementing the support of a network of House members who backed him in 2000.

Nearly all of the dozen GOP members interviewed for this article had been contacted by one of the two candidates — many of them during the first week of 2007. Although he traveled around the country for numerous GOP candidates during the campaign, former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani appears less focused on developing a dialogue with House conservatives than Romney or McCain.

Romney's decision Friday to tap Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.) as a senior adviser, the first House member to take on such a formal role in a campaign, has fueled speculation about Romney's and McCain's efforts to coax conservatives to join their respective camps. Romney also plans to visit House GOP members on the Hill at the end of this week, according to one knowledgeable GOP aide.

"It's no secret that a governor from Massachusetts needs to reach out to conservatives, especially in the South, if he's going to have any chance of getting the nomination," Blackburn spokesman Matt Lambert said. "He's doing that and making a very big push, especially in Tennessee."

Romney spokesman Kevin Madden said Reps. John Campbell (R-Calif.), Buck McKeon (R-Calif.) and Joe Knollenberg (R-Mich.) have come out in support of the former Massachusetts governor.

"We've reached out to a broad spectrum of the House Republican conference," Madden said. "We expect a number of people to come on board publicly soon — both in the field and the fundraising side of things."

Since Romney is currently out of office, he can spend more time on outreach than McCain, who has spent the last few months at the forefront of national security issues, such as the military commissions bill last fall and the debate over whether to back a surge of U.S. troops in Iraq.

"Certainly, [Romney] has reached out more aggressively than others," Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), who chaired the Republican Study Committee (RSC) last cycle, said. But Pence said he would not discount McCain's efforts, which "unquestionably" resulted in a boost among conservative House Republicans when he endorsed Rep. John Shadegg's (R-Ariz.) campaign for minority whip (even though Shadegg lost that race to Rep. Roy Blunt (R-Mo.).)

Shadegg doesn't have a formal role in the McCain campaign yet, but he has been buttonholing fellow House Republicans on the Arizona senator's behalf, an effort he has stepped up in recent days. McCain, he said, was not 100 percent certain he would run for president until he discussed the possibility in detail over the holidays with his wife, Cindy, and family at their Sedona retreat. Shadegg, a former chairman of the RSC, said last week McCain called to give him the go-ahead to be more aggressive in his recruiting efforts in the House.

"The race is on among House conservatives," Shadegg said, underscoring House Republicans' respect for McCain on national security issues. Shadegg said so far those supporting McCain publicly include Arizona Republican Reps. Rick Renzi and Jeff Flake and that several lawmakers from various areas across the country privately support McCain. Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.) has been an outspoken booster, and Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) is expected to support the fellow champion of campaign-finance reform.

"We have commitments [from House Republicans] but we haven't released them yet," a spokesman for McCain's exploratory committee, Craig Goldman, said. "The big problem right now is that we're still in the exploratory campaign."

Both candidates have been invited to speak at an upcoming Heritage Foundation retreat Feb. 1 and 2 that many conservative House members are scheduled to attend. Romney plans to discuss his efforts as governor of Massachusetts to implement a universal healthcare plan. McCain has been asked to address national defense issues. Goldman did not know whether McCain had accepted the invitation, and a call to McCain's Senate office was not returned

Perhaps the best way for the candidates to demonstrate their concern for House Republicans would be by helping to retire the National Republican Congressional Committee's debt, which escalated to more than $15 million last year. House Republicans, nervous about their own reelection prospects in 2008 and deeply concerned about the debt, may not want to hear about another politician's ambitions right now, but providing some fundraising help could change that dynamic.

House Republicans plan to tap the entire Republican Party leadership structure, including prospective presidential candidates, to help them solicit funds for the debt-retirement effort, one GOP aide said. McCain, Romney and Giuliani already earned plenty of credit for fundraising during the past election cycle. In the final months of the campaign, McCain, as well as Giuliani, crisscrossed the country to appear with candidates at fundraisers and public events.

"As far as trying to help keep the majority, no one worked harder than John McCain in 2006," said Goldman.

McCain's Straight Talk America PAC doled out roughly $280,000 to 75 candidates, $30,000 to the National Republican Senatorial Committee and $15,000 to the NRCC during the 2006 cycle. Romney, for his part, gave $171,000 to 64 candidates, $26,000 to the NRSC and $2,000 to the House Conservatives Fund, the RSC's PAC. Not to be outdone, Giuliani contributed an impressive $366,000 to 71 candidates.

Romney began his conservative outreach early. His $2,000 donation to the RSC's PAC came in September 2005 and he attended a fundraiser for the PAC months before, in June.

"I've spent some time with Gov. Romney and I like what I have seen," said Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.), a prominent RSC member who heads up the PAC. "He seems to be a Ronald Reagan, supply-side Republican."

Feeney's positive reaction is proof that Romney's talks are producing results. Madden said most of the discussions with House Republicans revolve around Romney's commitment to fiscal discipline. Shadegg, meanwhile, said McCain and House conservatives have had their differences in the past, but they largely agree on national security issues.

However, the current Iraq "surge" strategy already is dividing conservative House members. Rep. Pete Hoekstra, the ranking member on the Intelligence Committee and a Republican from Michigan, a key primary win for McCain in 2000, last week said he opposes a dramatic increase in troops, arguing that the Iraqi military is on the verge of being ready to take over.

Hoekstra has not committed to either possible contender and said he remains open to both of their arguments. McCain called him last week and Romney had visited his district a month ago. Meanwhile, Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.) said Romney had planned to visit his district "to meet with some Bush-Cheney" folks last weekend.

Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas), who chairs the RSC, said he has known McCain personally for a number of years but didn't know Romney until he spoke at the fundraiser for the RSC's PAC. He too has not committed to either candidate.

"House Republicans will certainly be a part of any presidential strategy, and my guess is we'll end up having a pretty healthy dialogue about who to support," he said. "House conservatives will be looking for the candidate that most closely resembles conservative values to take up our banner into November and capture the hearts and minds of the American public. That's what we're going to be looking for."

Iowa GOP Chairs Cool To McCain (RC)

By David M. Drucker

Roll Call, January 10, 2007

Despite his status as the national frontrunner for the Republican presidential nomination, Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) appears to have an uphill climb in the make-or-break caucus state of Iowa, where a majority of county Republican chairmen say he is far from the first choice of likely caucus voters.

The prevailing sentiment in recent interviews with 63 of Iowa's 99 GOP county chairmen was one of respect for McCain as a war hero and public servant but disdain for his politics — particularly his handling of President Bush's judicial nominees and his association with the issue of campaign finance reform. Disenchantment with his candidacy reaches all corners of the state, including the pivotal Republican stronghold of northwest Iowa and vote-rich counties such as Polk, Linn and Scott.

There were some county chairmen who either voiced or predicted strong support for McCain in the January 2008 caucus, with a few more saying it is too early to anoint a frontrunner or rule anyone out. But most, even those who complimented the campaign organization the Arizona Senator and 2000 presidential candidate is assembling, said he is not conservative enough — he is too much of a "maverick," several county chairman said — to win.

"Personally, I have no use for him," said Andrea Roys, chairwoman of the Fayette County GOP in northeastern Iowa. "He tries to appeal to the media and make himself liked — and is a RINO Republican as far as I am concerned."

David Roederer, McCain's Iowa chairman, said he takes the opinions of state GOP leaders seriously, but he expressed confidence that McCain will do well in the caucus. Public and private polls have showed McCain running first or second in Iowa, he said, arguing that the Senator has by far the best experience of any Republican running for president, particularly on the key issue of national security that generally finds him in agreement with grass-roots Republicans.

But many Iowa Republicans remain skeptical.

Romney Turning Heads

Of Iowa's 99 county GOP chairmen, 63 responded to interview requests, with 42 of those saying likely caucus-goers in their area are not inclined to support McCain. Fifteen chairmen said opinions on the Senator are mixed, with about half of them suggesting the Arizonan has significant hurdles to clear. A few of those who said their counties remain open to McCain stressed that it simply was too early to accurately gauge the feelings of likely caucus voters.

Only six county chairmen said enthusiasm for the Vietnam War veteran and four-term Senator was high.

When asked blindly which Republican presidential candidate is exciting the base, a majority of those who responded to that question with a name cited former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

Because Iowa's first-in-the-nation caucus is so important in the presidential nominating process, McCain's showing in the Hawkeye State could prove crucial to his 2008 chances. In 2000, the Senator skipped Iowa and proceeded to lose the nomination to then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush.

Several county GOP chairmen said they had either met Romney personally, that their county party had received a donation from his political action committee, or both. Kevin Madden, spokesman for the Massachusetts Republican's presidential exploratory committee, said winning Iowa is a key part of Romney's strategy to win the GOP nomination.

"Iowa is important, and I think that is demonstrated by our efforts there," Madden said.

Despite the overwhelming disaffection for McCain among grass-roots activists in Iowa, such feelings are not unanimous.

Even some McCain detractors highly skeptical of his ability to win the caucus say views on him could change, adding that they will support him in the general election if he secures the Republican nomination.

Dickinson County GOP Chairman Bill Sackett said McCain is "fairly well thought of" in his northwestern portion of the state. Sackett referred to the Arizona Senator as the man to beat in Dickinson County, even though it is a staunchly conservative area.

"I'd say that McCain probably stands the best chance and has not antagonized either one extreme or the other of our Republican voters," Sackett said. "If I were to choose who could win our county right now, I would say McCain."

Support for Bush May Be Crucial

The county chairmen who said McCain is in good shape often cited his strong support for Bush on the Iraq War and the war on terrorism, his foreign policy views generally, and the fact that he is seen as electable nationally. A few others also referred to McCain's efforts to court the Republican base beginning in 2004 as a plus.

And even among Republican county chairmen who were critical of McCain and doubtful of his prospects, there were some who were complimentary of his Iowa staff and the campaign he has waged there so far.

Roederer, the state campaign chairman, had the same role for Bush in 2004. He rounds out an all-star Hawkeye State staff for McCain that includes Marlys Popma, a former executive director of the state GOP and anti-abortion-rights activist who is tight with social conservatives; former state Senator and state GOP Chairman Chuck Larson, considered a very talented Iowa campaign operative; and retired Army officer Evan Hultman, who is chairing McCain's Veterans Advisory Committee.

Additionally, Iowa native Terry Nelson is working for McCain as a senior adviser. Nelson worked as a Republican staffer in the Iowa Senate in 1997 and served as former Rep. Jim Nussle's (R-Iowa) campaign manager from 1992 to 1995. Nelson has been a respected fixture on the Washington, D.C., political scene since the late 1990s.

"In all honesty, the infrastructure of the campaign is just being put together," Roederer said. "Most people will take a little while to assess all candidates. We have been extremely pleased with the response from people we've contacted and visited."

Roederer argued that McCain's positions on foreign policy and national security — issues on which the Senator and grass-roots Republicans tend to agree — will carry far more weight with likely caucus-goers than will the various domestic matters that have found the two at odds.

"What we're finding is that the overwhelming issue is national security," he said. "And by all accounts nobody comes close to Sen. McCain's experience or credentials on international issues."

Over the years, Iowa's presidential caucus has born witness to unlikely victories and shocking defeats, so McCain may yet change minds among the Republican base in the Hawkeye State. But for now, he has barriers to overcome.

A majority of GOP county chairmen were both highly critical of McCain's politics and considerably skeptical of his chances of winning the caucus.

The two issues that rankle activists the most are the Senator's cooperation on campaign finance reform with Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) and his participation in the "Gang of 14," a bipartisan group of Senators in the 109th Congress that worked together to diffuse the partisan divide over Bush's judicial nominees.

A number of county chairmen said the legislation known as McCain-Feingold has made it more costly for their county parties to advertise in local media.

Other points of contention raised by the chairmen include McCain's position on illegal immigration. He is for a guest-worker program and against building a fence along the Mexican border. Republicans disagree with him on this and specifically mentioned their displeasure over his teaming with Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) to propose legislation.

His past positions opposing farm subsidies and government tax breaks for ethanol production also were raised. McCain has softened his stance on the issue, but distrust remains. McCain campaign spokesman Danny Diaz said the Senator remains opposed to subsidies but now favors boosting ethanol production.

"Unlike 2000, ethanol is now a competitive fuel for consumers suffering from huge increases in the price of oil," Diaz said. "Alternative forms of energy like ethanol are obviously better for the environment and have reduced our dependence on foreign sources of energy, which is critical to our national security."

Elephants' Memory

The Senator's decision to skip the Iowa caucus in 2000 and focus on the New Hampshire primary also remains as a blot on his Hawkeye State résumé, with many county chairmen saying GOP activists haven't quite forgiven McCain for bypassing them six years ago.

"I never cared for John McCain and I don't trust him," said Bonnie Hall, chairwoman of the Boone County GOP just northwest of Des Moines. "I think he's perceived as being too middle of the road — too moderate — and you never know where he's going to come down. He's very unpredictable."

Dan Schnur, a top adviser to McCain in his 2000 presidential bid, said the Senator's status as the GOP frontrunner means he could distance himself from the pack with a strong showing in Iowa.

Schnur counseled McCain to skip Iowa in 2000 and believes in hindsight that that was the correct decision, as it allowed McCain to concentrate on New Hampshire. McCain upset Bush in the New Hampshire primary, and in doing so burst onto the national scene and became a candidate to be reckoned with.

But in 2000, McCain was the upstart candidate and Bush was the favorite. As the frontrunner in the 2008 race, McCain does not have the luxury of skipping the Iowa caucus — although he doesn't necessarily have to win it to secure the GOP nod overall, Schnur said.

"A frontrunner can cement his status in Iowa, but it's very rare that a loss there deals a death blow to a frontrunner campaign," Schnur said.

For any Republican running in the 2008 presidential caucus, the contest kicks off in earnest on Aug. 11, when up to 50,000 activists will converge on the campus of Iowa State University in Ames, Iowa, for the Iowa Republican straw poll.

The event is similar to a county fair and does more than simply assess the mindset of likely caucus-goers. Those candidates who finish strong in the voting are considered well-positioned for the January caucus, and those who do not sometimes drop out of the race altogether.

Most Iowa GOP county chairmen believe it will be a tall order for McCain to change minds in their state. Unlike most of the Republicans running, McCain is extremely well-known and opinions on him are strong.

"As we say around here, he has a tough row to hoe," said Benton County GOP co-Chairman Loras Schulte.

Ex-Gov. Gilmore Eyes GOP White House Bid (AP)

By Bob Lewis

AP, January 10, 2007

Jim Gilmore, Virginia's former tax-slashing Republican governor, on Tuesday took the first step in a long-shot bid for the presidency.

Gilmore filed papers with the Federal Election Commission in Washington to form the Jim Gilmore for President Exploratory Committee, said his aide, Matt Williams. He is the sixth Republican to form an exploratory committee — a year before the first primary votes are cast.

Like several other Republican hopefuls, Gilmore said he entered the race because the GOP field lacks a true conservative and argues his candidacy will resonate with conservatives disillusioned with the party.

"I'm here to offer the right program for the people of the United States. I'm the type of mainstream Reagan conservative that has always kept his promises," Gilmore said in a telephone interview.

The one-term governor, little known outside his state, faces an increasingly crowded field. Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, Arizona Sen. John McCain, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy Thompson and Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas also have taken the initial steps in a White House run.

Gilmore, 57, was elected governor in 1997 promising to cut the property tax that local governments in Virginia levy on personal cars and pickup trucks.

Within weeks after he was sworn in, he pushed his popular car tax cut through a legislature then controlled by Democrats. The incremental phaseout obligated Virginia to reimburse city and county treasuries dollar-for-dollar for car tax revenues they lost.

Critics warned that the reimbursements created an enormous state spending program that would eventually wreck the state's finances.

In 2001, after a recession cut deeply into Virginia tax collections and with reimbursements to localities around $700 million annually and soaring, Gilmore rebuffed efforts by fellow Republicans in the state Senate to stop the car tax phaseout.

The resulting legislative stalemate and GOP infighting left Virginia unable to reconcile its budget for the first time ever, and helped Democrat Mark R. Warner upset Republican Mark L. Earley, whom Gilmore had supported.

Warner also blamed Gilmore and the car tax for budget deficits that topped $6 billion in subsequent years.

Gilmore was among the earliest supporters of Texas Gov. George W. Bush's 2000 presidential quest, and Bush rewarded Gilmore by appointing him chairman of the Republican National Committee. Within a year, however, Gilmore left the job after disagreements with senior White House staff.

Gilmore also headed a commission Congress appointed in 1999 to investigate the threat terrorism posed to the nation.

In its report, finished one week before the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the commission recommended creating a Cabinet-level office to battle terrorism at home, better intelligence sharing among federal agencies, better federal cooperation with local and state authorities and increased border security.

Gilmore Moves On White House Bid (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

Former Virginia Governor James S. Gilmore III yesterday became the latest Republican to form an exploratory committee in advance of a potential 2008 White House campaign.

"Today, I filed the papers necessary to explore a candidacy for president because I believe that this nation needs conservative leadership," Mr. Gilmore said. "Alone among those considering a candidacy for the Republican nomination, I have a record of real leadership as a tax cutter and job creator, as a leader on national security issues and as a national leader in our party."

Mr. Gilmore served as head of the Republican National Committee and Republican Governors Association.

Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Sam Brownback of Kansas; former New York City Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani; and former Govs. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts and Tommy G. Thompson of Wisconsin are other Republicans who have formed exploratory committees.

"Jim Gilmore is a former governor of a very important state with a strong conservative record," said Ed Gillespie, chairman of the Republican Party of Virginia. Mr. Gillespie said he is neutral on the field of Republican presidential primary candidates.

Mr. Gilmore last year traveled to key primary states such as Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina. In August, a group of supporters started a Web site to encourage the former governor to run for the White House.

A former Army counterintelligence agent, Mr. Gilmore served as governor from 1998 to 2002. From 1999 through 2003, he chaired the Gilmore Commission, which Congress created to assess the nation's ability to respond to a terrorist attack.

The commission released a report one week before the September 11 attacks recommending a Cabinet-level office in the White House to combat domestic terrorism and improve cooperation between federal agencies and local law-enforcement authorities.

Mr. Gilmore is serving as chairman of the National Council on Readiness and Preparedness, a nonprofit organization working to strengthen homeland security efforts.

Skeptics of Mr. Gilmore's presidential move say he is only increasing his profile in advance of a 2008 Senate campaign or a second run at Virginia's governorship.

Mr. Gilmore was elected governor of Virginia in 1997 after promising to reduce state property taxes and taxes on motor vehicles. However, a 2001 recession led to a confrontation between Mr. Gilmore and Republicans in the state legislature who wanted to reverse his car-tax cuts.

That showdown helped the campaign of Mark Warner, a Democrat who went on to defeat Mr. Gilmore's would-be successor Mark L. Earley.

A Hopeful Ponders Where To Plant Her Flag (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 — Choices, choices. The Four Seasons in Georgetown or the Four Seasons in Midtown? A town full of political leaks or a town full of mysterious odors? Easy access to hundreds of gabby Democratic strategists or easy access to the one gabby Democrat who matters most (one's husband, perhaps)?

Among the signs that the Clinton presidential kabuki is ending — that Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton will, in fact, announce her campaign for the White House soon — is a decision, Democrats close to her say, that she plans to base her campaign headquarters in or around Washington instead of in White Plains or New York, which had been under consideration.

Running from a base in Washington would make the most practical and financial sense, Clinton advisers say, and they note that she would have satellite offices in New York and elsewhere. Still, a few advisers and supporters are concerned about the decision, saying it could reinforce her image as a Washington insider (if it is possible for that to be any more of an issue) and increase the possibility of leaks to the press corps (as if, ditto).

"One group thinks headquarters should be wherever is easiest for her, and another group is worried about public perception, since Washington is an unpopular place," said an adviser who has been involved in the discussions and who insisted on anonymity. "The thing is voters in the end won't really care where she runs from."

The concerns among the pro-New York crowd are twofold. First, the Democrats' success on Nov. 7 was seen, in part, as a repudiation of insider politics. Even more, Mrs. Clinton's likely main rivals for the nomination at this point, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois and former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina, plan to run their campaigns from their home states and portray themselves as Americans who understand the hardships of average citizens.

"Washington is the center of government, but it is a very insular, myopic place," said David Axelrod, a senior adviser to Mr. Obama. "It's hard to see America clearly from Washington, D.C., and that's the danger in rooting a national campaign there."

Logistically, Washington makes sense. Mrs. Clinton, as a member of the razor-thin Democratic majority, will be needed here to cast Senate votes. Most of her advisers live and have families here, including her campaign manger, Patti Solis Doyle, and her pollster, Mark Penn. And unlike Chez Clinton in Chappaqua, N.Y., her spacious home here is convenient for meetings and fund-raisers, situated a few miles from the Capitol and the airport.

Her chief adviser based in New York, Howard Wolfson, is selling his apartment on Central Park West and plans to move here soon. Mr. Wolfson had been planning to do so, Clinton advisers said, because his wife, Terri, is a top aide to Speaker Nancy Pelosi, and they have a young child.

The site of Mrs. Clinton's headquarters is less of a concern in a general election, Democrats say. A top Republican rival, Senator John McCain of Arizona, is expected to base his campaign across the Potomac in Crystal City, Va., for the same logistical reasons as Mrs. Clinton's.

The last winning presidential candidate who ran from Washington and who was not an incumbent or vice president was Ronald Reagan in 1980. His operation was based at home in California until he won the nomination. Ed Rollins, the Republican strategist who was an aide in the 1980 campaign and managed the 1984 re-election effort, said news media leaks could be tougher to manage in Washington, as well as the flow of politicians who want to offer their two cents (welcome or not).

Former Vice President Walter Mondale ran from Washington in 1984, Gov. Michael S. Dukakis from Boston in 1988, Bill Clinton from Little Rock, Ark, in 1992, and Bob Dole from Washington in 1996. Senator John Kerry considered running from Boston in 2004. There were tensions between his Boston advisers and his Washington advisers, and Washington won out.

People involved in those campaigns said logistics were always the concern.

"I won the '88 nomination on long weekends," Mr. Dukakis said, "because Monday through Thursday I wanted to be in the statehouse."

In 2000, Vice President Al Gore started running from Washington and then decamped to his home state, Tennessee, in part to try to shed his insideritis. He went on to lose Tennessee, anyway.

Mr. Edwards ran for the nomination in 2004 from Raleigh, N.C. As Mr. Kerry's running mate that year, he did not carry his home state, either.

At times, Mrs. Clinton has considered home to be in Illinois, Arkansas, Washington and New York, and, advisers say, she thinks she can win all four states next year.

George W. Bush ran from Austin in 2000, when he was governor of Texas. Ken Mehlman, the chairman of the Republican National Committee who worked on Mr. Bush's campaign that year and managed it in 2004, said he viewed the headquarters location as a business decision. Austin was easier and more comfortable for the team in 2000, and an office complex in Virginia helped focus the campaign in 2004.

"I wanted a place with a lot of open spaces and few offices, where it could be collegial and not hierarchical, and a place with a restaurant, parking spaces and a gym," Mr. Mehlman said, "so people would never want to leave."

The Green Gripe With Obama: Liquefied Coal Is Still . . . Coal. (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

Washington Post, January 10, 2007

Who, but who, would soil the environmental reputation of Barack Obama?

The Democratic senator from Illinois gets stellar marks from greens. Just a few months ago he was calling global warming "real," saying: "It is here. . . . We couldn't just keep burning fossil fuels and contribute to the changing atmosphere without consequence."

So why then, environmentalists ask, is Obama backing a law supporting the expanded use of coal, whose emissions are cooking the globe? It seems the answer is twofold: his interest in energy independence -- and his interest in downstate Illinois, where the senator's green tinge makes the coal industry queasy.

The coal industry praises Obama's reintroduction, with Sen. Jim Bunning (R-Ky.), of the Coal-to-Liquid Fuel Promotion Act of 2007 last week, which would provide incentives for research and plant construction. The industry says the technology, which converts coal into diesel engine fuel, would reduce America's dependence on foreign oil through a new, home-mined fuel that burns as cleanly as gasoline.

Environmentalists say focusing on coal does nothing to arrest climate change. Instead, they say, lawmakers should back cleaner alternative fuels and stricter automobile and industrial emissions standards.

"The rationale is, 'We have a lot of coal in the ground, let's put it to some use,' " said Frank O'Donnell, president of the D.C.-based nonprofit group Clean Air Watch. "It's not the best use of the coal and it's one that's almost certain to exacerbate the global warming problem." Obama's advocacy of coal liquefaction, he said, might have to do with his getting "hammered" by Illinois coal interests.

National Mining Association spokesman Luke Popovich counters that "our friends in the green community . . . don't want us to use our most abundant fuel," and adds: "They're sort of indifferent to the trend line toward greater importation of transportation fuels."

Coal liquefaction, Popovich said, is "used quite extensively in countries like South Africa."

David G. Hawkins, of the Natural Resources Defense Council, said in Senate testimony in April that "while it appears that technologies exist to achieve high levels of control for all or most of these pollutants, the operating experience of coal-to-liquids plants in South Africa demonstrates that coal-to-liquids plants are not inherently 'clean.' "

Popovich concedes the point: "Liquefied coal produces a diesel fuel cleaner than other diesel fuels, not necessarily cleaner than conventional gas," he said.

What about Obama? "Senator Obama has introduced legislation to drastically increase the production of biofuels like ethanol, and has authored legislation to increase fuel economy standards that would eventually save us 4.3 million barrels of oil a day and would reduce global warming," Obama spokesman Tommy Vietor said in a statement.

And, oh, yes: "Illinois basin coal has more untapped energy potential than the oil reserves of Saudi Arabia and Kuwait combined. Senator Obama believes it is crucial that we invest in technologies to use these resources to reduce our dependence on foreign oil."

Poaching Red State Donors (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, January 10, 2007

Democratic White House hopefuls such as Sens. Barack Obama (Ill.), Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and former Sen. John Edwards (N.C.) are rushing to capitalize on an impressive national fundraising network Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) built in the mold of President Bush's pioneers program. The strength of Bayh's connections could boost his profile when the Democratic nominee selects a running mate next year.

In December, a few days after Bayh announced his decision not to run for president in 2008, about 160 of his biggest donors were scheduled to fly to Washington to craft a fundraising campaign. Several of Bayh's advisers said that "well over" 150 donors in his network had pledged to raise $150,000 each for the campaign, and a smaller group of fundraisers had promised to raise $500,000 apiece.

A unique quality of the network, say the advisers, is that it includes many donors — a group cultivated by the lawmaker, who has strong ties to the business community and espouses centrist policies — that are not in other national candidates' databases. Combined, the donors helped stockpile more than $10 million in cash on hand to Bayh's reelection fund, which can be transferred immediately to a presidential campaign and would enhance the senator's viability as a vice presidential nominee.

"He was always a top-tier candidate and he should be for reasons of message and his moderate stance, but in addition to that he not only will have in excess of $11 million or $12 million on hand, he has a tremendous network of people willing to raise millions of dollars for him," said Joe Andrew, a former chairman of the Democratic National Committee (DNC) and member of Bayh's network who himself pledged to raise half a million dollars for the senator.

Bayh's chief fundraising aide, Nancy Jacobson, who helped to build the network, already has signed on to Clinton's presidential campaign. But Edwards and Obama are also trying to snag a piece of Bayh's pie.

"I have a feeling she will guard our list pretty strong, but I heard that Sen. Edwards has made inroads with some of our people," said Richard Gordon, a member of Bayh's kitchen cabinet who first met Bayh during his father's presidential campaign.

Bayh's network is especially valuable because many of its members are not "regular David donors," in the words of one Democrat.

Outside observers agree with Bayh's advisers that his fundraising prowess would be valuable next year after a candidate wins the Democratic nomination. That is because the nominee is widely expected to forego public financing for the primary and general elections, which would free him or her from spending limits that have constrained candidates in past years.

"Bayh could be exactly the kind of vice presidential candidate who could be most valuable in 2008 because of his established fundraising abilities," said Michael Toner, who served as Federal Election Commission (FEC) chairman last year. "In the past, the candidates at the top of the ticket didn't look to vice-presidential candidates to be major fundraising magnets.

"That's mainly because past presidential candidates have taken public money for the general election," he added. "If we're headed in 2008 to candidates turning down money for the general election, the ability of a vice-presidential candidate to be instrumental on the fundraising side has never been more important."

In total, Bayh's fundraising network consists of about 500 major donors, ranging from supporters who promised to raise $25,000 to those who pledged to collect $500,000.

One of the factors that hastened Bayh's decision to drop out of the race is that he had scheduled donors from around the country to fly into Washington to convene in the ballroom of the Mandarin Oriental hotel on Dec. 18 and 19 to assemble a fundraising roadmap.

But Bayh was facing dispiriting poll numbers in Iowa, a state where he had to do well to have a chance in the Democratic primary. If Bayh, a Midwestern politician from a farming state, could not post impressive numbers in Iowa, then his chances would have been bleak in New Hampshire.

A public poll of likely Democratic caucus voters conducted by Harstad Strategic Research in October showed that Bayh failed to draw even 1 percent of their support. A poll commissioned at the end of May by the Des Moines Register showed 2 percent of likely Democratic voters in Iowa favoring Bayh. Support for Bayh failed to materialize in Iowa even though he spent more time stumping there than any of his rivals, his advisers said.

The Register's chief political writer, David Yepsen, said Bayh made about a dozen recent visits to Iowa, and that only Edwards appeared as often in the state.

Yepsen said Obama, Bayh, and Edwards attracted the allegiances of many Iowa Democrats, and that Gov. Tom Vilsack, who is also running for president, directly competed with Bayh for centrist voters.

Gordon, Bayh's longtime friend, said that with Clinton, Obama, Edwards and Vilsack virtually guaranteed to win over a portion of the Democratic electorate, there was only a limited share of the vote Bayh could hope to pick up next January.

"If you add up all those segments, the pie shrinks dramatically," he said.

Gordon said that "a couple" of the presidential hopefuls have contacted him about joining their camps, but he told them that he would wait a few weeks before making a decision.

Bill Moreau, who served as Bayh's chief of staff during the lawmaker's first term as Indiana governor, said that though the numbers did not look promising last month, his aspirations for higher office are not finished.

"I think ultimately he came to the conclusion very rationally that this was an exercise in futility," said Moreau of the decision to drop out. "It wasn't shaping up to be something within the realm of the possible — this time around."

Schwarzenegger's Health Care Plan Draws A Large Dose Of Skepticism (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 9 — When Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger took the oath of office last Friday, he called on legislators in Sacramento to set aside party loyalty in favor of "the Party of California."

And sure enough, just 96 hours later, Democrats and Mr. Schwarzenegger's fellow Republicans are already in agreement: his first big idea of his second term — a sweeping plan unveiled Monday to assure health care to all Californians — is promising and ambitious, but faces a long, hard fight before enactment.

Chief among the challenges, politicians and policy analysts said Tuesday, is the enormous number of political players — from big labor and big insurance to small-county government — that would be affected by any universal health care bill.

"I cannot think of another topic that requires so many people to be heard to build consensus," said Don Perata, president pro tem of the State Senate. "You'd have to rent out Madison Square Garden to get them all in there."

Mr. Perata, a Democrat from Oakland, should know, because he wrote his own health care proposal last month, one of a series of efforts that have been undertaken in recent years to fix the state's troubled health system.

Mr. Schwarzenegger's plan would provide care to the 6.5 million Californians who currently have no insurance, including an estimated one million illegal immigrants. That is just one of the elements to which Republicans are objecting.

"Health coverage for illegal aliens is a nonstarter for us," said Robert Huff, chairman of the Assembly's Republican caucus. "It creates a magnet for them coming here rather than staying there."

Like some Democrats, Mr. Huff was also skeptical about the plan's estimated cost, which the governor's office put at $12 billion a year. "I think it's just throwing a dart at the wall," he said. "It's anybody's guess what it would cost."

Then there is the financing, which would require doctors and hospitals to pay 2 percent and 4 percent of their revenue, respectively, into a fund to cover the poor and uninsured. Mr. Schwarzenegger calls those payments a "fee," but other Republicans said that was just another word for "tax."

The California Medical Association, which represents more than 34,000 doctors in the state, gave the proposed overhaul mixed reviews. Though the association praised the idea of universal coverage, the fee on doctors could be a deal breaker.

"We feel it's a regressive tax," said Dr. Anmol Singh Mahal, the group's president.

The distinction between fee and tax is more than semantic: under California law, fees can be adopted by a simple majority vote of each house of the Legislature, while new taxes require a two-thirds majority. Democrats control both houses but do not have enough votes to muster two-thirds without Republican help.

Kim Belshé, the state's health and human services secretary, said the governor had expected people to disagree with elements of his plan.

"Health care reform is hard," Ms. Belshé said. "If these were issues that were easy to address and solve, they would have been addressed and resolved long ago."

Building consensus will be especially important for Mr. Schwarzenegger because of the referendum-addicted nature of California, where laws passed by the Legislature are sometimes overturned by ballot initiatives. In 2004 voters voided one ambitious health care law, the Health Insurance Act, which would have required medium- and large-size employers to offer care to their workers or pay a fee to the state.

Mr. Schwarzenegger's plan would employ similar "play or pay" mechanisms: employers with more than 10 workers would have to offer insurance or pay 4 percent of wages that are subject to Social Security tax into a fund subsidizing the purchase of health care for the uninsured.

Ms. Belshé said the state also expected to pay for the program in part through billions of federal dollars that California would get by increasing its Medi-Cal reimbursements to doctors and hospitals. The increase would automatically bring federal matching funds.

Such increased payments would be critical to health care providers, said Duane Dauner, the president of the California Hospital Association, because it would offset the new "fees" — or are they taxes? — the governor has proposed for doctors and hospitals.

Mr. Dauner said he thought the plan was "very innovative" but stood little chance of passing as is.

"I don't care what the plan is or who introduces it, whether it be the governor of California or the president of the United States," he said. "It goes through a process."

In California, Big Plans To Expand Health Coverage (CSM)

By Daniel B. Wood

The Christian Science Monitor, January 10, 2007

LOS ANGELES

DOJ_NMG_0114780

A sweeping plan by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) to guarantee health insurance for all Californians - including children of illegal immigrants - is being characterized both as a bold model for improving healthcare access and as a costly government intrusion that will hurt the state's economy.

Arguments for and against near-universal healthcare have already been fought out in the few other states that have moved ahead with health-insurance reforms, namely Massachusetts and Vermont. But the sheer numbers involved in Governor Schwarzenegger's proposal - a $12 billion price tag and coverage for 6.5 million people who currently don't have health insurance - are guaranteed to raise the stakes as the California legislature considers whether to approve it.

Among the ranks of the uninsured are about 763,000 children. Of the plan's overall cost, about $400 million would be spent on those minors, no matter what their immigration status is. That aspect, in particular, is winning kudos from family groups nationally, even as it raises the ire of immigration-control advocates who worry the healthcare provision will make California that much more of a magnet for illegal immigration.

The governor, who unveiled the overhaul plan Monday, said he wanted to provide "accessible, efficient, and affordable healthcare to every Californian."

The proposal "will not only be enormously helpful for California children but will also play a very significant role at the national level," says Ron Pollack, executive director of Families USA, a nonpartisan organization that urges affordable healthcare for all Americans. "This will no doubt lend enormous support for the federal government's providing states with significant funding to expand coverage to uninsured children" through the State Children's Health Insurance Program, says Mr. Pollack, noting that the joint federal-state program is up for reauthorization.

Of all the parts of Schwarzenegger's plan, health insurance for all children may prove to be among the least controversial, say those who back the idea. In a poll released Nov. 30 by The United Ways of California (an advocate of universal child health insurance), 81 percent of likely voters in California said they support ensuring that all children have health insurance.

"Elected officials are catching up to where voters are. They know children are the most vulnerable in the population and the least expensive to cover but [that coverage will] buy a lifetime of benefit," says Wendy Lazarus of the Children's Partnership, a nonpartisan child-advocacy group based in Santa Monica, Calif., and Washington. "Governor Schwarzenegger and his advisers are saying, 'We understand.' "

Several states have been floating ideas to expand access to health coverage generally, or for children specifically. Besides Massachusetts and Vermont, New Jersey, Connecticut, Maryland, New Hampshire, Florida, Illinois, Maine, and New York are looking at health-insurance reforms. So far, the California proposal is more comprehensive for children than most - guaranteeing medical coverage for children of families earning up to 300 percent of the poverty level, or $60,000 a year.

To pay for children's coverage, Schwarzenegger calls for expanding the state's Healthy Families program, possibly by using as much as $500 million saved annually by ending state welfare payments to poor families after five years.

"I see discussion over this payment issue as something that will immediately get the backs up of Democrats, [who will be] saying, 'Hey, you can't take it from those who needs it the most,' " says Larry Gerston, a political scientist at San Jose State University.

More broadly, the call to ensure that 6.5 million Californians - 1 in 5 - get health coverage is raising cost concerns among lawmakers in Schwarzenegger's own party, among other players.

Under his plan, employers who do not provide health insurance to workers would be required to pay into a fund that would be used to help cover the working uninsured. Doctors and hospitals in the state would also be tapped - 2 percent of revenues for doctors, 4 percent for hospitals - so that those who treat low-income Medi-Cal patients could be reimbursed for their care at a more generous rate than is now the case. State Republican leaders have already complained that these elements could devastate the state economy.

"Imposing a new jobs tax on employers of any size, and expanding costly government mandates, is the wrong approach," says Assembly Republican leader Michael Villines. "It is vital that lawmakers fully consider the impact our actions will have on jobs, the economy, hard-working families, and the state budget."

Some observers say the plan may falter as legislators try to iron out its details. "I worry that this plan is so comprehensive that it will fall apart," says Arnold Torres of the California Hispanic Health Care Association. "I don't think anyone has yet provided the kind of presentation to explain how all of this is going to come together."

Massachusetts Could Serve As A Guide In California's Health Insurance Bid (NYT)

By Pam Belluck

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

BOSTON, Jan. 9 — In its drive to provide health insurance to nearly all its residents, Massachusetts has already signed up more than half of the poorest people who are eligible.

But experts and politicians agree that the bigger challenge will be the next 150,000 people: the working poor who will get a state-subsidized rate but will still have to pay for insurance, typically $18 to $170 a month depending on their income.

"This group is going to be much more challenging," said Paul Ginsburg, an economist who leads the Center for Studying Health System Change. "They're dealing with people who don't even think about having health insurance."

As California maps out its path to near-universal health insurance, Massachusetts could offer some guideposts.

"We're really changing the culture of providing heath care," said Michael J. Widmer, president of the Massachusetts Taxpayers Foundation, a nonpartisan group that studies state spending. "For some people, it's changing the mind-set from one of showing up at the emergency room or at the local health center with a problem to understanding that they can be insured. Nobody's expecting that would happen overnight."

Devising a plan that all of the state's political stakeholders could accept took hard work and time. It dates back to at least 2004, when Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican and former venture capitalist, proposed requiring an "individual mandate" that everyone get insurance, a feature of the plan now being proposed in California. The president of the State Senate, Robert E. Travaglini, a Democrat, also called for expanded coverage, presenting a more incremental plan than Mr. Romney's.

Then the speaker of the House, Salvatore F. DiMasi, a more liberal Democrat, demanded an expansion of Medicaid and a payroll tax for employers who did not provide insurance. Those provisions were opposed to different degrees by Mr. Romney and Mr. Travaglini, and the legislation almost fell apart.

But several factors helped propel the parties to an agreement: a federal threat to cut $385 million in financing if the number of uninsured was not reduced and the support of Senator Edward M. Kennedy, a Democrat and rival of Mr. Romney.

The plan requires about 515,000 people, most of the state's uninsured, to get health insurance by July 1 or face penalties that could include the loss of a personal income tax deduction. Medicaid was expanded somewhat to pay for those below the poverty line. The state's $1 billion pool to pay for free care was reconfigured to be used for subsidized premiums for people earning up to three times the federal poverty limit.

The state will set rules to help insurance companies create health plans intended to be affordable enough for people with lower-middle incomes.

So far, about 29,000 people at or below the poverty line have enrolled, or slightly more than half of those eligible for this type of enrollment.

The second phase, focusing on the working poor, began this month and is considered much more difficult.

The insurers selling the subsidized health plans have been trying to get the word out.

Christina Severin, executive director of Network Health, the insurer with most of the lowest-priced plans, said her company was advertising in several languages and enlisting hospitals, clinics and churches to recruit the uninsured.

The other major challenge will involve people not eligible for subsidized plans. First, the agency set up to put the law into effect, Commonwealth Connector, will have to set standards for affordable health care plans, deciding, for example, whether to require plans to include prescription coverage.

"On the one hand, there's pressure not to set the bar too low so it's not some sort of inadequate plan," Mr. Widmer said. "On the other hand, you need to have options because you're trying to draw in a lot of different groups.

Massachusetts is clearly breaking new ground, going further than other states.

Vermont's program, passed last May, will require private insurance companies to offer coverage for the uninsured starting in October 2007. To pay for the program, employers who do not offer health insurance will pay $365 per employee, and taxes on cigarettes will increase. Unlike Massachusetts, Vermont will not make participation mandatory.

Maine's program, Dirigo, which started two years ago, has run into several obstacles. Fewer than 20,000 people have been enrolled in the program; the goal was to cover all 130,000 of Maine's uninsured by 2009.

Business and insurance groups have sued over a provision that requires private insurers to pay. And a study group recently recommended considering individual mandates, requiring employers to provide coverage and imposing new taxes.

"Maine has had a fair amount of problems because it was based on a very questionable idea," Stuart H. Altman, a professor of health economics at Brandeis University, said, adding, "It's not going well."

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

MONTEREY, Calif. -- On Monday, Arnold Schwarzenegger presented his proposal for reducing the number of Californians who lack health insurance. His proposal is almost indistinguishable -- except in details -- from that of the Democrats who dominate the California Assembly and Senate.

The Democrats tend to favor solutions involving regulations, government spending and taxes, and Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata's proposal -- the main contending Democrat plan -- hits the trifecta. It would require employers to provide health insurance; give them the option of paying a tax instead of providing health insurance; and increase spending by expanding both the Medi-Cal and Healthy Families programs, which provide care to low-income children -- including children of illegal immigrants and the disabled.

Mr. Schwarzenegger's solution hits the trifecta also. He would require employers with 10 or more workers to provide health insurance or pay a 4% tax on all wages covered by Social Security: Look for employers with 10 to 12 employees to get creative about outsourcing. And look as well, as Harvard economist Jonathan Gruber has documented, for wages to fall in firms that offer health insurance because of the mandate. Gov. Schwarzenegger would throw in a 2% tax on doctors and a 4% tax on hospitals to help fund Medi-Cal, California's name for Medicaid. And he would expand Medi-Cal to adults earning as much as 100% above the poverty line and to children, even those here illegally, in poor and middle-income families. He hopes, by doing this, to shift $5 billion of Medi-Cal's annual cost to the federal government.

There are two problems with such solutions. First, they infringe on economic freedom, preventing, in Robert Nozick's phrase, "capitalist acts between consenting adults." Second, government solutions rarely work.

Why doesn't increased government power tend to solve the problem of the uninsured? There are two main reasons. First, when government provides health insurance, many people who take advantage of it drop their own privately provided health insurance. In a 1996 article in the Quarterly Journal of Economics, Harvard economists David M. Cutler and Jonathan Gruber found a 50% "crowding-out effect." As the federal Medicaid program expanded, for every two people who gained insurance through Medicaid, one dropped private health insurance. Although this is a net addition of one, the costs to taxpayers are much higher than expected because now half of the newly covered, instead of paying their own way as they previously did, become wards of the state.

Second, of the 46 million or so people without health insurance at any given time, about 45% will have health insurance within four months. This is one of the main findings of a 2003 study by the Congressional Budget Office, "How Many People Lack Health Insurance and for How Long?" That shouldn't be surprising in a country where most private health insurance is employer-provided and most unemployment spells last 11 weeks or less. Solutions that involve government mandates on employers or employees will, therefore, miss connecting with about half of the people who are uninsured at a given point in time.

But what if the governor could solve some of the problem by making health insurance cheaper? He can -- not by regulating more, but by deregulating.

Let me explain. In the last few decades, state governments, the main regulators of health insurance in the individual and small-group markets, have mandated coverages for many kinds of health care. According to the Council for Affordable Health Insurance (CAHI), a pro-market association of insurance carriers, there were 1,843 state mandates in 2006. Among the most common, and most expensive, mandates are chiropractic care, treatment for alcoholism and drug abuse, and mental health benefits. California's government mandates coverage for all of the above, as well as for many other benefits, including, for example, infertility treatment -- a very expensive benefit.

Abolishing these mandates would allow people who don't want to be covered for these things to buy cheaper insurance, while still allowing those who want them to buy and pay for them. Would such an approach work? That's like asking whether, if the government currently required new cars to have CD players, eliminating that requirement would lower the price of a car. Of course it would work.

It is important, though, not to overstate its benefits. The gain to Californians from abolishing these mandates would not be huge. CAHI compiled data from America's Health Insurance plan and eHealthInsurance for the individual market and from the federal government for the small-group market and found that in 2003, although California had more mandated coverages than all but six other states, it had among the lowest insurance rates for individual health insurance policies ($1,885 versus a top rate of $6,048 for New Jersey.)

The reason, explains CAHI, is that in other ways California is much less regulatory than many other states. It does not, for example, require guaranteed issue on individual policies -- which drives up premiums by forcing insurance companies to supply policies to all comers, regardless of health status. Yet the governor's proposal would reverse this somewhat and prevent insurance companies from saying no because of age and health.

California should not, contra Gov. Schwarzenegger, do new regulatory harm; rather it should repeal existing regulations that cause harm -- so as to make health insurance even more affordable.

There is one other way to deregulate: The California government could allow any Californian to buy health insurance from any willing insurer in any state and be subject to the regulations of that state. That way, people could shop for the degree of paternalism they want. If they want insurance from a state that requires many coverages, they could do so and pay the high premiums that result. If they want bare-bones coverage, they could do so also. The result would surely be that some of the current uninsured would buy insurance. Were I in the market for individual insurance and given the choice, I would not bother paying for coverage for alcohol or drug abuse.

If a version of Gov. Schwarzenegger's plan passes, the only thing certain is that there will be more regulation, more government spending and more taxes. A better path would be to deregulate, and thus achieve some increase in the number of insured -- without new spending or taxes or regulation.

Mr. Henderson, a research fellow at Stanford's Hoover Institution, was the senior economist for health policy with President Reagan's Council of Economics Advisers (1982-84). He is co-author of "Making Great Decisions in Business and Life" (Chicago Park Press, 2006).

Gov. Urges Cooperation And An Improved Infrastructure (LAT)

By Jenifer Warren

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

Sacramento — Urging lawmakers to think big and act boldly, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger today outlined a sweeping 2007 agenda that proposes borrowing more than $43 billion to improve California's roads, prisons, schools and water supply.

Delivering his fourth State of the State speech, Schwarzenegger also vowed to make California a leader in the fight against global warming, pledged to provide health insurance for those who lack it and restated his desire to re-map legislative districts to increase political competition.

Schwarzenegger, still on the mend from surgery to repair his broken leg, acknowledged during his speech to the Legislature that his goals at the dawn of his final term were ambitious. But he said leaders "must be ambitious to get California to the future," and he urged lawmakers to set aside their partisan predilections and find solutions that best serve the state.

"Rebuilding California is not a burden," Schwarzenegger said. "It is not a chore. It is a privilege. It is a privilege to be able to help this state reach its full potential."

Although Schwarzenegger has made a handful of recent appearances by satellite, tonight's address marks only his second in-the-flesh event since he fractured the femur in his right leg while skiing in Sun Valley just before Christmas. His wife, Maria Shriver, appeared anxious at times as she watched her husband from the Assembly chamber's balcony.

On Friday, the Republican governor delivered an inaugural speech to about 3,000 invited guests. Aside from that, the media and the public have seen him mostly in photos -- sometimes in his hospital bed -- and via satellite feed.

Analysts commended his use of technology to convey the image of a governor whose injury had not slowed his step. But they said tonight's live appearance was critical for the 59-year-old Schwarzenegger as he paints a pathway through his next gubernatorial years.

"This is a very important speech, a chance for him to stake out his priorities in four or five areas," said Barbara O'Connor, director of Sacramento State University's Institute for the Study of Politics and Media.

Unlike the inaugural address, which was heavy on vision, the State of the State is the "nuts and bolts speech," O'Connor said, "where the rubber hits the road." Like the inaugural speech, tonight's emphasized cooperation across party lines as the key to successful policymaking - what the governor dubbed a "post-partisan" approach.

He opened by thanking lawmakers, whom he once derided as "girlie men," for "putting the people above politics last year - an election year." While the federal government was "paralyzed by gridlock and games," Schwarzenegger said, California's political leaders took action and raised the minimum wage, tackled prescription drug costs and committed to reducing greenhouse gases in the atmosphere.

He also noted that his speech was not about his vision, but about "our vision, because I think we all want the same thing for California."

They in turn, treated the governor with warm collegiality -- applauding loudly as he walked, steadily but deliberately on his crutches, in a blue suit, blinding white shirt and green tie, down the Assembly's center aisle. Greeting him with a handshake, Democrat Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez of Los Angeles jokingly told the governor to "break a leg." Lt. Gov. John Garamendi, another Democrat, called him "honorable and courageous."

The legislators treated the governor with warm collegiality -- applauding loudly as he walked, steadily but deliberately on his crutches, in a blue suit, blinding white shirt and green tie, down the Assembly's center aisle. Greeting him with a handshake, Democrat Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez of Los Angeles jokingly told the governor to "break a leg." Lt. Gov. John Garamendi, another Democrat, called him "honorable and courageous."

After that chummy beginning, Schwarzenegger was off and running, speaking for about 25 minutes -- short by historical standards -- and interrupted 21 times by applause.

The centerpiece was a "strategic growth plan" aimed at shoring up the state's infrastructure, including schools, water storage, prisons and roads. Today's proposals build upon $37.3 billion in bond spending authorized in November by voters, as well as a separate $5.4 billion ballot measure for water protection and parks.

Noting that California's population is expected to increase by as much as 30% over the next two decades, Schwarzenegger said, "We still have more roads to build, more schools to construct, more universities to equip to keep up with the future … the job is not finished."

To complete it, he wants to borrow $43.3 billion in bond money over three years. Of that, $29.4 billion in bonds would be put before voters in the 2008 and 2010 elections. The remaining $13.9 billion would be lease-revenue bonds that do not require voter approval.

Schwarzenegger's finance director, Mike Genest, said the state can afford the new borrowing. But some economists called it shortsighted, predicting it would add to the financial burden faced by future generations.

The scale of the borrowing worried even some Democrats. Sen. Mike Machado (D-Linden) said he is concerned about California's bond capacity.

"I applaud the grand vision, but I am very much concerned that the state is giving away its future by bonding us forever," Machado said. "We're out there spending a lot of money and it's almost like what a lot of people do after Christmas time -- they look at their credit cards and they start looking for a new credit card to finance the old."

One of the largest chunks of money would go to the state's distressed prisons, which are floundering due to overcrowding and a medical care system deemed so bad that it was turned over to a federal receiver last year.

This year, the prison population is expected to pass 175,000, nearly twice the number the system was designed to house. More than 16,000 inmates are in triple-decker bunks and areas not designed as sleeping quarters, such as TV lounges and hallways.

"Our prison system is a powder keg," the governor said. "It poses a danger to prisoners, a danger to officers and a danger to the well-being of the public if -- as the federal courts have threatened -- we are forced to release prisoners because of overcrowding."

The governor wants to add 78,000 jail and prison beds, built at a cost of $10.9 billion, while forming a commission to examine sentencing reform. Among other things, the governor proposed:

.Building new dams to increase the state's water supply, at a cost of $4.5 billion. Part of a wide-ranging, $6-billion flood control and water policy package, the dams are portrayed by the administration as vital in a state facing continual population increases and a future water supply threatened by global warming.

While favored by Republicans and farmers, new dams have a long list of foes, including the Legislature's two Democratic leaders, Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez of Los Angeles and Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata of Oakland.

.A $12-billion healthcare reform package, outlined in detail a day earlier, that would require all Californians to obtain medical insurance while helping the poorest residents to afford it.

.Obtaining bond financing to build 15,000 new classrooms and renovate another 40,000.

.Adding to California's landmark global warming law by ordering oil refiners and gasoline sellers to reduce the amount of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases emitted when cars burn fuel. The order, which should be in effect in 18 months, could lead to a 10% reduction in greenhouse gas pollution from motor vehicles by 2020.

"Our cars have been running on dirty fuel for too long," Schwarzenegger said. "Our country has been dependent on foreign oil for too long."

Creating an independent commission to redraw legislative district boundaries. Describing the state's political system as one "petrified by self-interest," Schwarzenegger noted that no state legislature has put redistricting reform on the ballot.

"California can be the leader," he told the joint session of lawmakers gathered in the Capitol's Assembly chambers. "You will not benefit politically from this. I will not benefit politically from this. But the people will benefit from this."

As he begins his final term, analysts say Schwarzenegger is no doubt thinking hard about legacy, the lasting achievements by which he will be measured over time.

In recent weeks, aides say, he has been reading speeches from the 1960s by former Gov. Pat Brown, who launched an unprecedented burst of freeway building, college expansion and water supply improvements and is remembered as a can-do politician Schwarzenegger admires.

The State of the State speech represents the governor's last open-mike moment before the nitty gritty work of carrying out his agenda begins, analysts say.

Tonight, he had the floor. Tomorrow, he must begin to woo wary lawmakers - especially those in his own party - to make his ambitious proposals a reality.

Schwarzenegger Agenda Could Flex California's Muscle (WP)

By Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 9 -- A lesson from California: Never underestimate the ambition of a former Mr. Universe. Over the past week, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) has unleashed a torrent of proposals to shake up everything in his state from health care to road-building to politics itself, all in an effort to reshape his party and set a national agenda.

The most recent offering, in Schwarzenegger's State of the State address Tuesday, is a plan to cut vehicle emissions of greenhouse gases by 10 percent. He will require petroleum refineries to reduce the carbon content of their fuel over the next 13 years -- a signal to any doubters that his recent aggressive positioning as an environmentalist is not mere political theater.

"Let us blaze the way, for the U.S. and for China and for the rest of the world. Our cars have been running on dirty fuel for too long," Schwarzenegger said. "California has the muscle to bring about such change. I say use it."

The proposal requires the California Air Resources Board to set new standards for oil refineries that sell fuel in the state. They can meet those standards by combining gasoline production with that of alternative fuels, such as ethanol, compressed natural gas or hydrogen. Or they could purchase pollution credits from clean-fuel producers.

With Schwarzenegger's plans for big spending, support for issues such as raising the minimum wage and embryonic stem cell research, plus a recent wave of inclusive rhetoric, the governor has styled himself as a newer, bluer Republican, or "post-partisan," as he likes to say. He unabashedly declares that the national GOP ought to take notice.

"Not only can we lead California into the future, we can show the nation and the world how to get there," Schwarzenegger said in his address. "We can do this because we have the economic strength, we have the population and the technological force of a nation-state. We are the modern equivalent of the ancient city-states of Athens and Sparta."

The action-hero governor hopes to flex the state's muscles in the national arena starting next year. Schwarzenegger told Newsweek this week that he wants to move California's primary elections to February, giving the state more clout in presidential elections.

On Monday, he unveiled a proposal to provide health insurance for all California residents, including illegal immigrants. Last year, he used his political strength to push through $42.7 billion in bonds for roads, levees and schools. In the budget proposal he will unveil Wednesday, the governor will ask for $43.3 billion in infrastructure bonds for water supply, disaster preparedness, public safety and education.

The governor has also signaled his willingness to spend money on reforming the state's collapsing prison system -- he is under a federal mandate to reduce overcrowding -- as well as environmental research, career technical-education programs and stem cell research.

Outside California -- a state where 43 percent of registered voters are Democrats, 34 percent are Republican and 19 percent are independent -- Schwarzenegger's example may carry little weight, some observers said.

"We don't know where the Republican Party is going and if Arnold's message is going to be widely received by red-state Republicans," said Bruce Cain, director of the Institute of Governmental Studies at the University of California at Berkeley. "It works for blue-state Republicans, but does it work for red-state Republicans?"

Schwarzenegger could also face opposition from state Democrats, who are already upset by a plan to cut welfare benefits to families whose parents have not moved into the workforce fast enough. The governor would also deny a scheduled 4 percent raise in welfare payments. The plan could save hundreds of millions of dollars in Schwarzenegger's budget proposal, but Democrats in the legislature called it a "non-starter."

Schwarzenegger's ability to refashion the Republican Party is hampered by the fact that, as a naturalized citizen, he cannot lead it as a presidential candidate. In addition, he is not dealing with what many political observers say is the signature issue of the day.

"The problem is, Arnold's message is largely about domestic issues, and the national agenda right now for the foreseeable future is going to be dominated by Iraq," Cain said.

Even within California, Schwarzenegger will no doubt face opposition from his own party. The legislature is controlled by Democrats, but appropriations require a two-thirds majority to pass.

On his health-care plan, Schwarzenegger tried to sidestep Republican orthodoxy against higher taxes by calling for an increase in "fees" to pay for expanded state coverage.

"Whether or not a fee is a tax, whatever you call it, in his proposal we would not support it," said state Senate Republican leader Dick Ackerman. "There's some areas in here which we support and some areas we don't support. He's proposing covering illegal immigrants, and that we do not support."

Schwarzenegger just has to try, though, said Sherry Bebitch Jeffe, a political analyst at the University of Southern California.

"He's Arnold. I mean, really, that's part of the equation," Jeffe said. "He wants to leave something behind. He took a chance, he ran for governor, he won, he won reelection and he's a competitor. He wanted to be Mr. Universe. He wants to be remembered as a serious, effective, successful governor."

Schwarzenegger Orders Cuts In Emissions (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer And Felicity Barringer

New York Times, January 10, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Jan. 9 — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger said Tuesday that he would ask regulators to require the state's petroleum refiners and gasoline sellers to cut by 10 percent the emissions of heat-trapping gases associated with the production and use of their products.

The order for cuts, which the governor wants completed by 2020, follows California's trademark pattern of hitching its environmental aspirations to its market muscle. It also represents one of the first examples of a state or a national government regulating the fuel in its passenger vehicles as part of a strategy to reduce both emissions that contribute to climate change and dependence on foreign oil.

The plan, which Mr. Schwarzenegger delivered to legislators Tuesday night in his State of the State address, was the second part of a one-two policy punch the governor announced this week. On Monday, he proposed providing health care to all the state's residents, which unlike the emissions plan is subject to approval by the Legislature.

"Our country has been dependent on foreign oil for too long," Mr. Schwarzenegger said in his address. "I ask you to set to motion the means to free ourselves from oil and from OPEC. I ask you to encourage the free market to overthrow the old order. California has the muscle to bring about such change. I say use it."

The executive order asks state air regulators to take up the governor's challenge. The California Air Resources Board will be responsible for drawing the blueprints to carry out the order, with the help of advisers from the University of California, Berkeley.

It is the first example of the practical impact of a deal made last summer between the Legislature and the governor to reduce carbon dioxide emissions by about 25 percent by 2020. The transportation sector is responsible for about 40 percent of the state's carbon dioxide emissions, state officials said, and cars make up about half that amount.

The 10 percent cut in emissions would be accomplished, experts said, largely through the use of alternative fuels, like ethanol and other gasoline blends, which would be provided by the refineries and other producers.

Hal Harvey, the environmental program director for the William and Flora Hewlett Foundation, called Mr. Schwarzenegger's plan "a really big deal."

"In my opinion there are no successful rules anywhere in the world, except Brazil, to get carbon out of fuels," Mr. Harvey said. "It is the big, hairy unmentioned problem with cleaning up carbon." The European Union, he added, is considering a similar rule.

Environmentalists expected the order to turbocharge the market demand for corn-based ethanol and biodiesel fuels, and for natural gas, and to jump-start the introduction of experimental fuels like cellulosic ethanol, which is made from plant waste or nonfood crops like switch grass or wood chips.

The contemporary environmental movement links clear air goals to potential profits, and Mr. Schwarzenegger's order, with input and support from lobbyists from Environmental Defense, the Natural Resources Defense Council and the Hewlett Foundation, mirrors that approach. The companies or industries that stand to benefit financially from his plan include producers of corn-based ethanol, biodiesel and other, more experimental forms of renewable fuels.

Mr. Harvey and Fred Krupp, the president of Environmental Defense, said they hoped that the California approach would be a template for other governments, whether in state capitals, in Washington or abroad.

The plan, Mr. Harvey said, is unusual in its focus on the so-called cradle-to-grave emissions associated with each fuel. In the case of ethanol, this can mean carbon emissions generated in the production of fertilizer, in the planting and harvesting of corn, in distilling the fuel and, finally, in transporting it to the distributor and burning it in a car.

Thus, two otherwise identical gallons of ethanol could have different greenhouse-gas ratings, if one were refined using carbon-intensive coal-fired electricity, while the other was refined using relatively carbon-light electricity from natural gas.

At a technical briefing on Tuesday, Bill Jones, the chairman of the board of Pacific Ethanol, a fuel producer, and the former Republican leader of the California Assembly, praised the effort as "the most comprehensive, well-thought-out plan I have ever seen."

The governor's staff said his mandate had the support of the oil industry. But that support was clearly not unanimous. Jay McKeeman, a spokesman for the California Independent Oil Marketers Association, which represents about 85 percent of the state's fuel distributors, said the order required too much of his industry and not enough of the automakers.

"This initiative seems to focus strictly on fuels," Mr. McKeeman said. "And of course a whole part of this equation has to be the technology that uses the fuels. That is at least as important as the carbon content of the fuel."

The auto industry, in turn, believes California has asked plenty, and has sued the state over environmental rules. Charles Territo, a spokesman for the Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers, said the trade group had not taken a position on the proposal, but added: "Currently there are more than nine million alternative fuel automobiles on the road. In 2007, manufacturers are offering 60 different models for consumers to purchase."

"Manufacturers," Mr. Territo said, "must recognize that we need to reduce our reliance on foreign sources of oil."

Mr. Schwarzenegger, who is recovering from a broken leg and appeared somewhat in pain on Tuesday, used his address to hit on other policy goals for the year, including changes to the state's health care system, the creation of thousands of new classrooms and continued investment in infrastructure.

Calling California's severely overcrowded prison system a "powder keg," he said he wanted the state to consider prison construction and hinted at the establishment of a sentencing commission to address the problems that have led to overcrowding.

He also suggested that the Legislature consider an overhaul of the state's redistricting system, which heavily favors incumbents.

"You will not benefit politically from this," Mr. Schwarzenegger said. "I will not benefit politically from this. But the people will benefit from this."

The State Of Ambition (LAT)

IT'S ONE THING for the governor to be ambitious. Arnold Schwarzenegger came from Hollywood, where success is impossible without ambition. It's quite another thing for the Legislature, which has historically rewarded timidity and resistance, to match his audacity. Yet that's exactly what will have to happen for California to reach the heights Schwarzenegger set for it in his State of the State speech Tuesday.

It is certainly audacious, for instance, for a governor to claim that his state can show the United States, China and the rest of the world how to free themselves from dependence on OPEC and fossil fuels. But Schwarzenegger called for nothing less. He proposed new standards that require lower carbon emissions and encourage alternative fuels while letting the market allow producers to make their own decisions about how to comply. If successful, the state would see a 10% reduction in greenhouse gases from motor vehicles by 2020. It's a bold and creative move.

So, too, is his proposal to remake the state's healthcare system to assure that the cost of caring for those who do not have insurance does not continue to fall squarely on those who do have it. His proposal has problems, but he deserves credit for putting the issue on the agenda and remaining flexible on details and open to discussion.

Schwarzenegger also has vowed to fix problems with the state's prisons. To his credit, he has acknowledged that simply building more cells will not, by itself, solve the problem. But cells are needed, and the governor proposes to spend more than $10 billion to build them.

Global warming is expected to greatly reduce the state's snowpack, which means less water in the future for a growing population. Schwarzenegger proposes $6 billion to store and manage water, including new dams and Delta improvements. The governor also proposes more funding for education and transportation. He insists that California look squarely at its booming population, a changing climate and an increasingly competitive world economy — and that it then face reality and plan accordingly.

Unfortunately, in all the planning the governor's team seems to have overlooked the effect on the state's debt. Voters last year approved nearly $43 billion in bonds, a record, to begin rebuilding the state for the future. Now the governor is seeking an even larger amount. Schwarzenegger's vision fits the state perfectly when the economy is booming. But the economy doesn't always boom.

The governor's greatest strength is his infectious, can-do attitude. Many Democrats, almost giddy over the governor's plans, appear ready to spend. His fellow Republicans are more skeptical. The governor's task will be to convince members of both parties of the worth of his ambitions — and California's.

Ethanol Bandwagon Picks Up Speed (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

In separate actions aimed at reducing "greenhouse gases," California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger ordered a cut of "at least 10%" in the carbon content of motor-vehicle fuels used in his state by 2020, while governors of 37 states prepared to push for a new federal rule to require greater use of ethanol fuel.

Both efforts are designed to reduce global warming and the U.S.'s reliance on imported oil, but they also could raise consumer prices for food and fuel. The initiatives also signal the increasing urgency of climate change as an issue both in state capitals and in Washington.

President Bush is expected to express more support for domestically produced ethanol when he gives his State of the Union address later this month. Meanwhile, Democratic leaders in Congress are talking up the need for alternative fuels and national emissions controls.

Announcing his carbon-reduction order in remarks prepared for delivery in his State of the State address last night, Gov. Schwarzenegger said, "California has the muscle to bring about such change."

While the details of the proposal have yet to be worked out, California officials explained that the program would leave it up to oil suppliers in the state to figure out how to reduce carbon content, but that using more ethanol, which contains less carbon, would be the most likely way. The move, they estimated, would triple the size of the state's market for ethanol and other renewable fuels.

Gov. Schwarzenegger said his order would be the first standard in the world that would diminish the use of fossil fuels, which come from deposits that have been buried in the ground for millions of years, and which release carbon into the air when burned. The regulation, which the governor ordered completed by 2008, would also include incentives for more electric and hydrogen-powered vehicles. The governor acted under his state's recently passed law to regulate carbon-dioxide emissions.

Meanwhile, the 37 governors today will propose a new federal standard that would mandate substantially higher use of ethanol fuel and offer new tax incentives for the production of cellulosic ethanol, which can be made from farm wastes and wood chips, and doesn't rely on corn, the feedstock typically used by current ethanol producers.

The proposal would require fuel sellers to increase the use of ethanol to 12 billion gallons a year by 2010, eclipsing an earlier federal mandate, contained in the 2005 Energy Policy Act, of 7.5 billion gallons by 2012. The new standard calls for the use of 15 billion gallons by 2015 and around 37 billion gallons by 2025, which means ethanol could displace about 25% of the nation's expected gasoline use.

A January 2005 proposal by the governors' coalition to mandate greater use of ethanol as fuel was quickly endorsed by President Bush and became the centerpiece of the energy bill passed by Congress.

The governors unveiled their new proposal to the president in a letter, saying, "Oil is the unquestionable epicenter of national-security crises that distort the foreign policies of many nations and that suggest potential scenarios for economic disaster."

While the new moves enjoy considerable political support and the endorsement of environmental groups, experts who watch the nation's food consumption worry that more ethanol use will drive up food prices. Michael Swanson, an economist with Wells Fargo & Co., said the demand for corn has already raised corn prices. Meanwhile, producers are already lowering the number of young chicks they raise and are fattening cattle less because of soaring corn costs, trends that Mr. Swanson predicted will soon raise retail meat prices.

"We're looking at corn futures trading in the range of $4 a bushel. That's as high a price as we've seen in this decade," Mr. Swanson said. Earlier spikes in the price of corn were caused by small crops, but this year's crop "was one of the largest we've ever had," he added.

Currently, ethanol is turned into motor fuel by mixing it with gasoline in blends of 10% or less ethanol. Both the pending California rule and the governors' proposal would require major owners of gas stations to provide pumps that distribute 85% blends of ethanol and give auto makers incentives to make more "flexible fuel" vehicles that can use this blend.

Craddick Retains Speaker's Post (DMN)

By Karen Brooks

The Dallas Morning News, January 10, 2007

AUSTIN – House Speaker Tom Craddick was overwhelmingly re-elected to his leadership post Tuesday night after Rep. Jim Pitts of Waxahachie withdrew from the race.

Mr. Craddick, R-Midland, was re-elected 121-27, the first major piece of business that lawmakers conducted at the start of their 140-day regular session.

ERICH SCHLEGEL / DMN Rep. Jim Pitts, R-Waxahachie, greeted Nadine Craddick, wife of House speaker Tom Craddick, Tuesday morning.

Mr. Craddick acknowledged the other candidates for speaker and praised them for encouraging debate by running. And he said he had heard from many House members about their concerns.

"I can assure you, I listened carefully," he said.

His swift victory followed a long, at times heated debate in the House over whether members should be able to cast their ballots in secret. When members decided to vote publicly, Mr. Craddick's win was clear.

Mr. Pitts, announcing his withdrawal after a week of asserting he had the support to unseat Mr. Craddick, said he wanted to end the divisive contest.

"I do not want the members who are for me to have to put in a public record how they voted," said Mr. Pitts, R-Waxahachie. He added: "It's time to heal. It's time to go on with Texas' business. That's what Texans expected."

Mr. Craddick, R-Midland, faced a stiff challenge from members angry over his management style, saying that he often forced them to vote against the wishes of their constituents. But other members stood with Mr. Craddick, saying he had been a strong leader that had accomplished much as the first Republican to lead the House in modern times.

Mr. Pitts, upon withdrawing, warned that change was necessary for the House to heal. "Members, we cannot continue what we have had," he said.

The House speaker wields extraordinary power, both over individual lawmakers and statewide. He decides which committees lawmakers sit on, and he can boost or sabotage legislation that they offer. Plus, he sets the tone for legislation in the House and, with the governor and lieutenant governor, helps make major decisions on the state budget and other policies.

Mr. Pitts and Mr. Craddick had both lobbied members intensely in recent days, hoping to gain the powerful post. Mr. Pitts' candidacy benefited from the support of many Democrats, who felt particularly marginalized under Mr. Craddick.

Mr. Pitts became the lone challenger to Mr. Craddick last week, when Plano Rep. Brian McCall, the initial lawmaker to take on the incumbent, dropped out of the race and threw his support to Mr. Pitts. But it wasn't enough.

ERICH SCHLEGEL / DMN Mr. Craddick, R-Midland (center), faced a stiff challenge from members angry over his management style.

For Mr. Pitts, the defeat is a potentially crippling blow to his career. He has been chairman of the powerful, budget-writing House Appropriations Committee, but he has said he thinks Mr. Craddick will boot him from that post – even before he decided to take the speaker on.

House members said that the anger vented during the campaign showed that Mr. Craddick's method of running the House needs to change.

"I hope that people don't think this means that bullies win every time," said Rep. Garnet Coleman, D-Houston. "They don't."

Mr. Craddick seemed to address the criticism at the end, but made no apologies. Indeed, he ticked off a list of accomplishments on issues from lawsuit limits to school finance.

"I assure each and every one of you today that I believe my primary responsibility as speaker is to fulfill your elected purpose – your elected purpose, not mine," he said. "If in some way I fall short of your expectations or needs, please tell me, not just think about it, and I will do my best to correct those shortcomings."

Texas Speaker Wins Challenge And Keeps Post (NYT)

By Thayer Evans

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

AUSTIN, Tex., Jan. 9 — Speaker Tom Craddick of the Texas House, an ally of the former United States House majority leader, Tom DeLay, survived a strong challenge on Tuesday from a fellow Republican to win his third term in the leadership position on the first day of the 80th session of the Legislature.

After more than five hours of haggling about procedures, Representative Jim Pitts withdrew.

Slightly more than 30 minutes later, Mr. Craddick was elected, 121 to 27, to close the first floor effort to defeat an incumbent speaker since 1959.

Mr. Pitts, of Waxahachie, whom Mr. Craddick appointed chairman of the Appropriations Committee, has been in the House since 1992. He has at times disagreed with Mr. Craddick's leadership, which is often compared to Mr. DeLay's.

"It's time to heal," Mr. Pitts said in a speech before the House after his withdrawal and before he voted for Mr. Craddick. "It's time to go on with Texas's business."

The victory of Mr. Craddick, of Midland, who has been in the statehouse since 1968, ended a fight that has dominated the political landscape here for three weeks. The House elects a speaker on the first day of each regular session every two years.

The speaker's duties include overseeing floor debates, appointing members to standing committees and referring measures to committees.

Bills on immigration and campaign finance overhaul have been filed for the session, which lasts until May 28.

Mr. Craddick, who has been House speaker since January 2003, when he became the first Republican to hold the post in 130 years, was investigated along with Mr. DeLay over fund-raising in the 2002 legislative races but was not indicted by a grand jury in Travis County.

Mr. DeLay was indicted in September 2005 on charges of violating the campaign finance law. He worked closely with Mr. Craddick in redrawing district maps in 2004 that benefited Republicans.

In his acceptance speech, Mr. Craddick promised to work with Republicans and Democrats.

"I want to assure each and every one of you today," Mr. Craddick said, "that I believe my primary responsibility as your elected speaker is to fulfill your elected purpose, not mine."

Gov. Rick Perry, also a Republican, expressed optimism for the session, mentioning a desire to improve health care, education and border security.

"The success of this session will not be judged by what has happened over the last few hours," Mr. Perry said, "but by what we do in the end."

U.S. Prohibits All Transactions With A Major Iranian Bank (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 — The United States, moving to raise pressure on Iran, on Tuesday barred American financial institutions from doing business with a major Iranian bank after concluding that it had been involved in illicit weapons programs.

The move against Bank Sepah, announced by the Treasury Department, also affected North Korea, which American officials said had used the bank to facilitate payments to a North Korean group that exports missile technologies.

The announcement applies to domestic and foreign branches of American banks, as well as to American citizens working at overseas banks that deal with Bank Sepah anywhere in the world. The department also said that no American bank can transfer dollars to Bank Sepah or its branches and subsidiaries in Rome, London, Frankfurt and Paris.

The Treasury announcement was the second time in the last year that a major Iranian bank had been barred from any dealings with the American financial system. It is the first specific move against an Iranian bank since the imposition of sanctions on Iran by the United Nations Security Council on Dec. 23.

Last year, the United States took similar action against Bank Saderat, another of Iran's major institutions, citing what it said was the bank's involvement in financing terrorism. Both Bank Saderat and Bank Sepah, cited for financial transactions linked to weapons proliferation, are state owned or controlled.

Though the two banks have virtually no direct links to American banks, the designation means that no American bank can help facilitate — by transferring dollars, for example — any transaction between a European bank and Bank Sepah. Thus if an Italian or German bank wanted to supply dollars for a transaction involving Bank Sepah, it would be unable to do so because American banks would be barred from transferring them.

American experts say these steps effectively extend the reach of American law to other countries, though to only a limited degree.

"By taking this action, the United States is putting immense pressure on our allies and trading partners to treat Bank Sepah the same way we do," said Judith Lee, a partner at Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher specializing in sanctions law. "It is an effort to make U.S. actions against Iran extraterritorial."

European countries have opposed moves by the United States to apply the principle of extraterritoriality, a term referring to cases when American law can affect dealings entirely within another country. But the Bush administration recently has stepped up its use of various laws and directives to press forward with the concept.

For example, since oil is traded in dollars, the reach of American directives could be significant, many banking experts say. In theory, Tuesday's action would prevent Bank Sepah from facilitating an oil sale in which dollars are used. Iran has already announced that, because of American directives, it has begun selling oil for euros rather than dollars.

"Bank Sepah is the financial linchpin of Iran's missile procurement network, and has actively assisted Iran's pursuit of missiles capable of carrying weapons of mass destruction," said Stuart Levey, the Treasury under secretary for terrorism and financial intelligence.

Mr. Levey said Bank Sepah had been involved in transactions for Iran's Aerospace Industries Organization and two Iranian missile companies. These three entities were mentioned in the Security Council resolution approved in late December calling on all countries to avoid doing business with various groups in Iran.

Mr. Levey also said the United States had been in touch with authorities in Britain, France, Italy and Germany to discuss the need to persuade local financial institutions to stop doing business with Bank Sepah.

Unlike the United States, Mr. Levey said that European countries, which have not enacted laws like those passed here, "don't have specific authority to act as the United States does" against European banks or businesses engaging in transactions with other banks and businesses linked to terrorism or weapons programs.

Nevertheless, Treasury officials say Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. and Mr. Levey have pressed European authorities and banks to try to isolate both Bank Sepah and Bank Saderat.

Mr. Levey said that the branch of Bank Sepah in Rome had had significant involvement in financial transactions related to Iran's missile program, and that Italian authorities had been alerted to the problem.

There was no immediate comment from the press office of the Italian Embassy in Washington on whether Italy was taking any separate actions in consonance with the United States actions.

When the United States moved against Bank Saderat last year, many banking experts predicted that it was only a matter of time before Washington took action against other financial institutions in Iran.

American officials say already intensive diplomacy has been stepped up after the Security Council resolution adopted in late December as part of a campaign to get Iran to stop enriching uranium in what the West has charged is a clandestine nuclear weapons program.

That resolution ended up being weakened at the request of Russia and China, and some American officials say they need to shift tactics and use other means to exert financial pressure on Iran.

US Imposes Sanctions On Iran Bank (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, January 10, 2007

The US Treasury on Tuesday imposed sanctions against Iran's commercial Bank Sepah, accusing it of assisting Tehran's missile programme and having links with an alleged North Korean missile exporter.

Bank Sepah International, a wholly owned subsidiary in the UK, and Ahmad Derakhshandeh, the parent bank's chairman and director, were also targeted by a notice barring any US citizen from dealing with them and freezing any assets they have under US jurisdiction.

The unilateral moves were the first taken by the US since the United Nations Security Council imposed missile and nuclear-related sanctions on Iran in re-sponse to its refusal to suspend its nuclear fuel development programme.

The US last September banned dollar transactions with Bank Saderat, Iran's largest commercial bank, accusing it of facilitating the transfer of $1m (€770,000) to Lebanon's Hizbollah and other "terrorist organisations".

Stuart Levey, the Treasury under-secretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, said: "Bank Sepah is the financial linchpin of Iran's missile procurement network and has actively assisted Iran's pursuit of missiles capable of carrying weapons of mass destruction. Our action today gives effect to the United Nations' call on all nations to deny financial assistance to Iran's nuclear and missile programmes, and we urge other countries likewise to fulfil this serious obligation."

The action will have limited impact as US trade with Iran is severely limited by sanctions imposed in the 1990s. However, the US is putting pressure on its allies to isolate Iran from the international financial system, using the cover of last month's UN resolution.

Iran is open about its indigenous development of missiles as allowed under international law but denies it has a covert nuclear weapons programme.

[A news agency] cited Ali Larijani, Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, as telling a domestic news agency that US "harassment" of Iran's banking system "are not issues that can affect Iran's will".

U.S. Bars Iranian Bank To Curb Access To Dollars (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

The Bush administration yesterday barred Iran's oldest bank from doing any future business in the United States, accusing the financial institution of transferring Iranian missile payments to North Korea.

The move will prevent Bank Sepah, Iran's fifth-largest bank, from conducting business in U.S. dollars and is part of a larger White House plan, put in place last year, to cut off Iran's access to U.S. and European currencies. Though U.S. officials say the effort is aimed at the Tehran government, it is also likely to affect millions of Iranian citizens who conduct personal business in U.S. dollars and who travel overseas.

Bank Sepah has nearly 300 branches in Tehran plus offices in Paris, Frankfurt and Rome as well as a British subsidiary, Bank Sepah International. U.S. law has long prohibited Iranian government institutions from doing business in the United States, but yesterday's move now bars Sepah from converting international transactions into dollars by routing them through New York banks.

"The only business Sepah could do before today in the United States was U-turn transactions," said Stuart Levey, the Treasury Department's undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence. "They would send it from a European office through a New York bank and then back to Iran. That's the way they would dollarize transactions, but they won't be able to do that anymore," Levey said in an interview.

Yesterday's move, however, will not affect the bank's huge interests in Europe. The Bush administration had tried for months to persuade European allies to take similar, unilateral steps against Iranian government institutions and had hoped that a recent United Nations resolution would encourage France, Britain and other countries to join in the effort. But no European nation has done so, nor has Japan or any Persian Gulf ally.

Last month, the U.N. Security Council ordered all countries to stop supplying Iran with materials and technology that could contribute to its nuclear and missile programs. It also froze the assets of 10 Iranian companies and 12 individuals related to those programs. Among those on the list is the head of Iran's Aerospace Industries Organization, which oversees the country's vast missile program.

The council warned that if Iran refuses to comply, it will adopt further nonmilitary sanctions, but the resolution emphasized the importance of diplomacy in seeking guarantees "that Iran's nuclear program is exclusively for peaceful purposes." The Bush administration is broadly interpreting the resolution to deter as many financial sectors as possible from doing business with Iran. So far, the Europeans seem to be taking a more narrow view of the resolution.

Levey said yesterday that Bank Sepah, mostly through its offices in Rome, has handled millions of dollars of transactions for Aerospace Industries, passing money from Tehran to North Korea, from which Iran buys missile components.

"Sepah provides direct and extensive financial services to Iranian entities responsible for developing missiles capable of carrying weapons of mass destruction," Levey said.

The Bush administration has never offered proof of an Iranian nuclear weapons program, and Iran maintains that its program is for the production of nuclear energy, not bombs.

But since 2004, U.S. intelligence has been in possession of thousands of Iranian drawings that analysts believe detail efforts by Iran's military to reconfigure existing missiles to one day carry nuclear warheads.

In an interview with reporters last month, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice acknowledged that financial sanctions against Iran "will have consequences" for the Iranian people by negatively affecting their economy. "This isn't going to be surgical and you can't perfectly target in that way. But I think we've tried to be sensitive to not doing things that would have an ill effect on the Iranian people, per se," she said.

U.S. Effort To Isolate Iran Gains Ground As European Bank Restrictions Take Hold (WSJ)

By Glenn R. Simpson In Brussels And David Crawford In Berlin

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

The U.S. government's attempt to isolate Iran's economy will get a significant boost this month when the last European bank known to be clearing large volumes of that country's dollar transactions in the U.S. halts the practice.

Commerzbank AG, Germany's second-largest bank, said it will stop handling dollar transactions for Iran at its New York branch by Jan. 31.

CRACKING DOWN

• The Issue: As the U.S. aims to isolate Iran, Commerzbank will join other European banks in halting its dollar transactions.

• What's at Stake: The U.S. says banks provide unwitting support for Iran's efforts to back terrorism and build nuclear weapons.

• The Bottom Line: Few big banks continue cooperating with Iran, forcing it to do business in euros, not dollars, and increasing the cost of international transactions.

Over the past year, most European banks with longstanding relationships with Iran have bowed to U.S. pressure and sharply curtailed transactions with Iran's state-controlled banks, which the U.S. says support terrorism. The U.S. also is seeking to financially quarantine Iran because of Tehran's vows to press ahead with its nuclear program in defiance of international will.

In a related move, the Treasury Department yesterday named Iran's fifth-largest state-owned bank, Bank Sepah, and its subsidiaries as weapons proliferators and barred banks operating in the U.S. from handling any transactions on their behalf. Last year, Commerzbank became Bank Sepah's principal clearer of dollar transactions in the U.S. Stuart Levey, Treasury's undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, said Bank Sepah served as the key financial conduit for Iran's main missile firms, which were singled out in a United Nations sanctions resolution against Iran's nuclear program last month.

U.S. analysts say there is evidence that Iranian firms are feeling the pinch of the U.S.-led drive. Iranian banks and companies, for instance, are now having to put up large deposits -- as high as 100% -- in foreign banks to get them to issue letters of credit for foreign transactions, they claim.

Iranian officials deny the nation's banks handle money for terrorist organizations or purposes. Mohammad Jafar Mojarrad, vice governor of the country's central bank, said that while the U.S. has "put a lot of pressure on Iran" and some foreign banks have scaled back dealings with the country, operations of the country's banks haven't been affected.

Choking off Iran's financial ties to Europe is key to Washington's effort to isolate the country. The European Union is Iran's largest trading partner by far. Trade between the two topped $25 billion last year, but trade growth is stagnating, largely because of U.S. pressure.

Because many big European banks have stopped dealing with Tehran in recent months, the fundamentalist Islamic regime of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has relied on Commerzbank and a handful of smaller banks to handle its dollar-based transactions.

The result: Iran's beleaguered economy is having a harder time moving hard currency around the globe in an easy and cost-effective way. That implies a higher cost of doing business for Iranian companies and the government, which are being forced into more expensive, alternative financial markets.

U.S. pressure isn't likely to bring Iran's economy to its knees, but it could cause serious pain. Iran receives tens of billions of dollars annually in oil revenue. But it spends much of those funds to import refined fuels and other goods. As Iran's access to hard currency becomes more restricted and costly, the country could see a reduction in its ability to pay for heavy machinery and other items essential to keeping its oil industry and other key parts of its economy going.

In response to U.S. pressure on European and other bankers who serve Iranian firms, Iran has said it wants to switch most of its business to euros, the currency of the EU. But oil is Iran's biggest export, and many of the country's trade partners in the Middle East will do business only in dollars -- the currency of the international petroleum industry.

At present, Commerzbank handles both dollar and euro transactions for Iran's state-owned banks. Like several other European banks, it will cease handling only dollar transactions. That is likely to limit the economic damage to Iran, enabling the country's banks to continue paying suppliers who will accept euros or other currencies.

But it is likely to subject Commerzbank and its peers to further U.S. pressure. "The risks of doing business with Iran are the same in all currencies," said Mr. Levey. Intelligence officials say Bank Saderat, a large, state-controlled Iranian bank placed on a U.S. Treasury blacklist in October for allegedly funding terrorism, has been able to process dollar transactions through Commerzbank's New York branch in recent months by using the accounts of two other Iranian banks.

Commerzbank says it ceased dealing with Saderat after it was put on the U.S. blacklist and has no knowledge of any subsequent transactions. "Commerzbank has no knowledge of Bank Saderat directly or indirectly using the accounts of other Iranian banks to process dollar transactions," the bank said in a statement. Commerzbank, in a response to an inquiry from The Wall Street Journal about its dealings with Iran, also said "all such [dollar clearing] transactions are currently being phased out" as of Jan. 31. It added that "any clearing conducted by our U.S. operations is in strict compliance" with U.S. government regulations.

The efforts to isolate Iran also appear to be yielding results in Italy, one of Tehran's largest trading partners. In 2005, trade between the two countries topped $6 billion. In a sign of how some European banks are rethinking their dealings with Iran, Italy's largest bank, Intesa Sanpaolo SpA, says its trade-finance business with the country has dropped significantly in recent months.

U.S. efforts to stop European banks from dealing with Iran are controversial. European banks view the campaign as an attempt to extend the reach of U.S. sanctions on Iran without the backing of the United Nations or the EU.

Indeed, there is no general international ban on providing financial and trade services to Iranian banks. But banks that assist Iran's banks are increasingly exposed to U.S. regulatory scrutiny and political pressure from the U.S. Treasury Department. The U.S., a key market for most international banks, has long unilaterally imposed strict limits on what business banks and companies with operations in the U.S. can conduct with Iran.

In response to U.S. pressure, ABN Amro Holding NV, Credit Suisse Group and UBS AG of Switzerland, Credit Lyonnais and Société Générale SA of France, and Barclays PLC and HSBC Holdings PLC of the United Kingdom all limited or ended their dealings with Iranian banks over the past year.

Iran Says It Has Arrested A Nuclear Spy (AP)

Iran said Tuesday it has arrested a man on suspicion of selling nuclear secrets to an exiled Iranian opposition group, state radio reported.

The report didn't identify the suspected spy, but said he had been working at the Iranian Parliament's Research Center, an organization that advises lawmakers on foreign and strategic issues.

"The man transferred classified information, including a bulletin on nuclear activities, to the hypocrites," state radio said, referring to the People's Mujahedeen of Iran.

The Paris-based group, regarded as a terrorist organization by the United States, has frequently made accusations about Iran's nuclear activities, reporting on what it says is secret information received from insiders in Iran.

In 2002, the group disclosed the existence of two previously secret nuclear facilities, a pilot uranium enrichment plant at Natanz and a research reactor being built in the city of Arak, which turned out to house Iran's uranium enrichment program and a hard-water reactor project. Other claims by the group have not been substantiated.

Iran said in 2004 that it had arrested 10 military officers, nuclear workers and others on charges of revealing its nuclear secrets to Israeli and U.S. intelligence agencies.

But the government said the information passed to the United States and Israel was "without value."

Ahmed Tavakoli, a leading lawmaker, confirmed state radio's report of the arrest of the alleged spy.

"This person has been working in Parliament's Research Center since 2001," Tavakoli told the semiofficial Fars news agency Tuesday. "He was arrested by the Intelligence Ministry."

Tavakoli told Fars that the arrested man will stand trial but gave no date.

The People's Mujahedeen participated in the 1979 ouster of the former shah of Iran, Mohammed Reza Pahlavi. But it fell out with the clerical government and launched a campaign of assassinations and bombings.

For years it fought Iran's Islamic rulers from Iraq with the backing of Saddam Hussein's regime.

During the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, the U.S. military briefly bombed People's Mujahedeen camps until the group capitulated and agreed to disarm.

Israel Says It's Arrested Muslim Cleric (AP)

By Matti Friedman

AP, January 10, 2007

Israel arrested the former imam of Ohio's largest mosque after he was deported from the United States last week, the Shin Bet internal security service confirmed Tuesday.

Fawaz Damra, 46, was arrested because of his ties to Islamic Jihad, a militant Palestinian group classified by Israel and the U.S. as a terrorist organization, Shin Bet told The Associated Press. It gave no other details.

Smadar Ben-Natan, an Israeli lawyer retained by Damra's family to represent him, said he was being held at the Kishon prison and she planned to meet with her client Wednesday.

Damra, imam at the Islamic Center of Cleveland, was deported by American authorities last week because he concealed his ties to Islamic Jihad when he applied for American citizenship in 1994.

Relatives expecting him to enter the West Bank on Friday reported he never showed up and said they had been told by the Red Cross he was detained, but there wasn't any official Israeli confirmation until Tuesday.

"We waited for him all day and he didn't come," said Nabil Damra, the imam's brother. "He is not an extremist and we don't understand why he was arrested."

"My mother is crying. Our house is sad. My father, who is 83, is waiting for his son. We pray that my brother will come home and see his father before he dies," the brother added.

DOJ_NMG_0114797

A spokesman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Greg Palmore, said U.S. agents accompanied Damra to the Allenby Bridge, an Israel-controlled crossing into the West Bank. "Mr. Damra was presented to Israeli immigration officials for admission to the West Bank," Palmore said.

During Damra's trial, jurors were shown evidence that he raised money for Islamic Jihad, a small group with links to Iran and Syria that has carried out dozens of suicide bombings and rockets attacks against Israel.

The jury also saw footage of a 1991 speech in which Damra called Jews "the sons of monkeys and pigs." Damra, whose wife and three daughters remain in the United States, later apologized for making anti-Semitic statements.

Damra's brother, a U.N. worker in the West Bank, said the imam's work in the U.S. revolved around marrying and divorcing Muslims and lecturing to prisoners.

"He always got along with all people. He is a moderate. If he upheld extremist views, people wouldn't have loved him. He wouldn't be helping everyone," Nabil Damra said.

Hezbollah Widens Anti-Government Campaign (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

BEIRUT, Jan. 9 -- Hezbollah and its allies widened their campaign Tuesday to force the Lebanese government's resignation, backing what they vowed would be a series of daily protests scattered across the capital.

Tuesday's gathering of hundreds of flag-waving protesters outside a Finance Ministry office was a sedate affair compared with the convergence of hundreds of thousands twice last month in Beirut's downtown, where demonstrators continue a round-the-clock vigil in hundreds of tents near the barricaded government headquarters.

The demonstration was more symbolic than dramatic, marking the beginning of what officials of the Shiite Muslim group and its leftist and Christian allies have long warned is a second stage of their efforts to form a new government and convene early parliamentary elections.

"The message is sent, and this is what matters to us," said Amin Sherri, a Hezbollah lawmaker.

The struggle between Hezbollah and its allies and the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora has plunged Lebanon into one of its worst political crises since the end of the 15-year civil war in 1990. It may determine which group is ascendant in Lebanese politics: the alliance around Hezbollah, supported by Iran and Syria, or a government coalition, supported by the United States.

Beyond Lebanon, the crisis intersects with tension across the region, as the United States and Iran vie for influence and concerns grow over a Shiite-Sunni conflict becoming ever more pronounced in Iraq.

But unlike in December, when the crisis often had an hour-to-hour urgency, the confrontation has assumed a veneer of normalcy in its second month. Each side has escalated -- Hezbollah with its support for Tuesday's protest led by Lebanese unions, the government by pressing ahead with policy changes over the opposition's objections -- but both appear prepared for a long wait. For their part, Hezbollah officials have stressed that any escalation will remain nonviolent and not break any laws.

So far, both sides can claim victories. The government has refused to resign. But by paralyzing the government, Hezbollah has stanched what it saw as growing U.S. influence here and delayed the convening of an international court to try suspects in the 2005 slaying of former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri, an assassination that government supporters blame on Syria.

"It is a mixed bag," said Paul Salem, director of the Carnegie Middle East Center in Beirut. "But what's interesting is that it's a mixed bag that might have reached an unexpected status quo."

"My suspicion or sense is that we're in kind of a holding pattern," he added.

The protest convened along a usually busy intersection, drawing almost as many police officers and soldiers as demonstrators. Organized by the General Labor Confederation, a coalition of unions, the protesters railed against tax increases, privatization and other policies the government has announced ahead of a conference in Paris this month to solicit international aid for Lebanon. "No to the imposition of new taxes and fees," one placard read. "Siniora is responsible for impoverishing Lebanon," another said.

"We're here because there's no work, there are no jobs in the country," said Ali Tfaili, a 29-year-old protester.

He carried a Lebanese flag and a sign that read: "Real reform." He promised to keep taking part in the protests, including another scheduled for Wednesday, but reflecting the mood there, he suggested nothing dramatic was ahead.

"Anything more than this, and it would be a civil war," he said. "We don't want that."

The relatively small size of the protest gave rise to speculation among foes and supporters of Hezbollah over its intentions. Some government allies said the numbers revealed divisions between Hezbollah and its partners, particularly Michel Aoun, a populist Christian politician who has forcefully called for an escalation in the protests. Others said it suggested the opposition's campaign was flagging after two mass demonstrations and the vigil that has lasted more than five weeks.

"This is a sign that if they -- the opposition and especially Hezbollah -- don't bring people from their houses, no one will come," said Youth and Sports Minister Ahmed Fatfat, who is loyal to the government coalition. "It is also a sign that people are losing patience and that they are starting to question what's the worth of all this."

Officials of Hezbollah, perhaps the most effective group in the Middle East in mobilizing its constituency, were dismissive of suggestions that the numbers Tuesday revealed weakness. They have said the next stage will play out gradually, with protests smaller but more numerous than the more dramatic shows of force in downtown Beirut.

"Why would we bring a million people to participate in a demonstration like that?" said Sherri, the Hezbollah lawmaker. "Numbers are not important. We've proved we have the numbers, and now a few thousand people will be just as efficient in sending the message."

Rice To Visit Mideast For Talks On Iraq, Israeli-Palestinian Ties (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, January 10, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice heads back to the Middle East in a bid to sell a new US strategy for Iraq to wary allies and to take another shot at reviving Israeli-Palestinian peace efforts.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Rice would visit Israel, the Palestinian territories, Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait before stop-offs in Germany and Britain during the January 12-19 trip.

While in Kuwait, Rice will meet with her counterparts from the six Gulf monarchies plus Egypt and Jordan -- a grouping of moderate Arab allies Washington sees as key to countering the influence of Iran, Syria and the radical Shiite groups they support in the region.

A major part of Rice's discussions will focus on "the perception of a common threat posed by Iran and other forces of extremism and violence in the region" McCormack said.

The tour will come just two days after President George W. Bush unveils his long-awaited new plan for resolving the violent crisis in Iraq.

The strategy is expected to involve the deployment of some 20,000 additional US soldiers in a temporary "surge" to quell rampant insurgent and sectarian violence, mainly in Baghdad, along with steps to boost Iraqi security forces, foster political reconciliation and revive the economy.

Rice will defend the plan in testimony Thursday to both chambers of Congress, controlled since November elections by the opposition Democrats who have voiced strong skepticism Bush's new approach can end the spiralling violence in Iraq so that the 130,000 US troops now there can come home.

In the Middle East, she will urge Arab allies worried about Iran's rising influence to back the plan by helping the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki with diplomatic support and debt relief, McCormack said.

"It's no secret that we have encouraged states in the region, whether it's Egypt or Saudi Arabia or the other Gulf states, to offer their support to the government of Iraq," he said.

Rice will also seek regional support for Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Siniora, who is battling a campaign to oust his government by the Syrian-backed Shiite movement Hezbollah, McCormack said.

Rice begins her latest Middle East mission with her eighth trip in two years to Israel and the Palestinian territories aimed at unblocking negotiations to create an independent Palestinian state.

Rice most recently met in late November with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas, but achieved no breakthrough.

Abbas and Olmert also held a rare direct meeting on December 23 at which the Israelis promised to release some withheld funds to the Palestinians and ease travel restrictions in the West Bank -- steps McCormack said had created an "opening" for progress.

But other key steps, including a long-awaited prisoner swap involving hundreds of Palestinians for an Israeli soldier kidnapped by radicals near Gaza in June, have not materialized.

McCormack said Rice would pursue a months-long effort to bolster Abbas in a power struggle between his secular Fatah party and the Islamist movement Hamas, which controls the Palestinian government after winning elections a year ago.

The Hamas victory prompted a crippling political and financial boycott of the Palestinians by the West and Israel.

Negotiations to create a power-sharing government involving Fatah and Hamas collapsed late last year, leading Abbas to call for early elections -- a move that sparked violent clashes between the rivals and raised the specter of a Palestinian civil war.

Israel recently allowed Egypt to provide weapons to Abbas loyalists and the Bush administration is seeking Congressional approval for up to 90 million dollars in "non-lethal" military aid to his security forces, US officials said this week.

McCormack held out little hope that Rice's latest peacemaking venture would produce a breakthrough.

"I would expect that this is a trip that is more about laying the foundations for potential future actions than actually coming to closure on any particular agreements," he said.

Rice To Visit Middle East (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will begin a weeklong trip to the Middle East and Europe on Friday to seek support for President Bush's new Iraq strategy and to push for a new Israeli-Palestinian peace effort, the State Department said yesterday.

Miss Rice will visit Israel, the Palestinian territories, Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Germany and Britain. She will return to Europe on Jan. 24 for an international donors conference in Paris to raise funds for Lebanon, whose economy is still recovering from the war with Israel in the summer.

"I would expect that this is a trip that is more about laying the foundations for potential future actions than actually coming to closure on any particular agreements," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters.

U.S. officials and diplomats from some of the countries Miss Rice will visit said that, despite the low expectations, it is important for the secretary to return to the Middle East, given the dire situation in Iraq, the tensions between the Palestinian Fatah faction and Hamas, and the new domestic political realities in the United States, where Democrats just took control of Congress.

In addition, the Bush administration has been under pressure from its European allies to become more active in working toward a resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, which many in the region consider to be the most divisive issue with the West.

That pressure increased when Germany stated its intention to highlight the matter in its agenda as president of both the European Union and the Group of Eight organization of leading industrialized countries. Even though German Chancellor Angela Merkel met with Mr. Bush in Washington last week, Miss Rice plans to stop in Berlin on her way back from the Middle East and brief Mrs. Merkel on her meetings.

The secretary's trip, beginning two days after Mr. Bush's address to the nation tonight to announce his new Iraq strategy, also will aim to ensure that other states in the region support the new course and the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, Mr. McCormack said.

"It's no secret that we have encouraged states in the region, whether it's Egypt or Saudi Arabia or the other Gulf states, to offer their support to the government of Iraq," he said.

The president is expected to send more troops to Iraq and to propose benchmarks for the withdrawal of U.S. forces.

General: N.Korea May Conduct Nuclear Test (AP)

By Kwang-tae Kim

DOJ_NMG_0114800

AP, January 10, 2007

The top U.S. general on the Korean Peninsula said Tuesday he believes North Korea might conduct another nuclear test.

U.S. Army Gen. B.B. Bell, commander of U.S. Forces Korea, said the communist regime — which conducted its first nuclear test on Oct. 9 — is capable of testing another such device, but he didn't elaborate on recent media reports that the North was preparing to do so.

"There is no reason to believe that at some time in the future, when it serves their purposes, that they won't test another one. So I suspect someday they will," Bell said at a news conference in Seoul.

Concerns about North Korea heightened abruptly last week in Asia after ABC News reported Pyongyang might be preparing for another test. Citing unnamed U.S. defense officials, the network said the moves were similar to steps taken before the October blast.

Top U.S. and South Korean officials dismissed the speculation, saying there was no indication such a development was imminent.

During talks on its nuclear program in 2005, North Korea agreed to dismantle its nuclear program in exchange for security guarantees and aid, but no progress has since been made in implementing the accord.

The U.S. — along with China, Japan, South Korea and Russia — held talks with North Korea in December to try to work out initial steps toward implementation of the breakthrough deal but they failed to produce any progress.

The talks — which also involve South Korea, China, Russia and Japan — ended in a deadlock over the U.S. financial restrictions imposed on the North over its alleged counterfeiting of $100 bills and money laundering.

The U.S. and the North have provisionally agreed to hold the next talks on the financial dispute in the week starting Jan. 22, according to South Korea's foreign minister, Song Min-soon. The previous talks — held on the sidelines of the main nuclear talks in Beijing — ended without any breakthrough.

North Korea says the sanctions are evidence of Washington's "hostile policy" and indicate its intention to overthrow the regime, and the North therefore needs nuclear weapons for protection.

About 29,500 U.S. troops are stationed in South Korea as a deterrent against a North Korean invasion, a legacy of the Korean War. That conflict ended in a cease-fire, not a peace treaty, leaving the two Koreas technically still at war.

General Sees Another N. Korea Nuclear Test (WT)

By Andrew Salmon

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

SEOUL -- The senior U.S. commander in South Korea said yesterday that North Korea will likely conduct another nuclear test, and he also vented his frustration at a range of issues bedeviling Washington's military alliance with Seoul.

"They have self-proclaimed their possession of nuclear weapons, and there is no reason to believe that at some time in the future, when it serves their purposes, that they won't test another one," Gen. Burwell B. Bell said of North Korea, which detonated a nuclear device on Oct 9. "So I suspect some day they will."

The general, speaking to reporters, declined to discuss whether a test was imminent, citing confidentiality of intelligence.

ABC News last week reported Pyongyang might be preparing for another test. Citing unnamed U.S. defense officials, the network said the moves were similar to steps taken before the October blast.

Top U.S. and South Korean officials have dismissed the speculation, saying there is no indication such a development was imminent.

Gen. Bell also expressed concerns about the relocation of the headquarters of the U.S. forces in South Korea, the transfer of wartime command of South Korean forces to South Korean leadership, and budgetary shortfalls.

"I must admit that I was surprised when I read local press reports that [a South Korean] government official stated the relocation of U.S. forces would not occur until after 2013," he said. "This was news to me, and not at all reflective of the agreement we have with [South Korea] to achieve the move by 2008."

Yongsan garrison, home to 6,500 troops and 8,000 civilians -- family members and defense contractors -- has been a bone of contention in the alliance for years. Talks to relocate the central Seoul base have been ongoing since 1990, but only in 2004 did the two countries sign an agreement to relocate it to the city of Pyeongtaek, 55 miles south of the capital, by 2008.

Construction of the new base is under way, but last month, local press reports, quoting an unnamed South Korean government official, stated the move would be delayed until 2013. Seoul officials have not refuted the reports.

Noting that many U.S. personnel and their families were living in dilapidated facilities at Yongsan, Gen. Bell said that with the move planned, he could not construct new facilities on the current base.

The proposal to transfer wartime command of South Korean forces is caught in a similar timeline dispute. U.S. military officials say the transfer of command can be achieved by 2009, but the South Korean side wants to delay it until 2012.

Gen. Bell said future U.S. force commanders would play a "supporting role" to South Korean commanders, and hinted that the transfer of wartime control of troops needs more serious attention than it has so far received.

"The worst things we can do, within minutes, is to transfer command back and forth," he said. "That would be unacceptable."

Gen. Bell also addressed shortfalls in South Korean financial support to fund the ongoing consolidation of U.S. troops across the Korean Peninsula. The U.S. force in Korea has been shrinking -- from 37,500 troops in 2003, to 29,500 today, and there will be 25,000 in 2008. Most of the troops are moving to new, less intrusive base areas.

In negotiations, Seoul had agreed to pay 44 percent of U.S. troops' consolidation costs -- $886 million. However, what Seoul finally offered was $772 million, leaving a shortfall of more than $100 million.

"I'm being put into a bad position, from a policy perspective, of not having the money to do what our two governments told me to do," the general said, adding that he would need to make "significant" cuts in U.S. forces' programs.

Gen. Bell's outspoken tone surprised some analysts.

"Clearly, Washington is expecting Koreans to take greater responsibility for their defense, and behave honorably in the negotiation process as that happens," said Michael Breen, a Seoul-based author of several books about the peninsula and a longtime Korea watcher.

Meanwhile, the overall deterioration in the alliance dismays local conservatives.

"The sharp rise in anti-Americanism here has partly been instigated by North Korean propaganda, but the behavior of our government in the recent two to three years has been rather out of the ordinary in its ability to be diplomatic," said Lee In-ho, a professor at Myongji University.

"Conservatives are concerned here: Even if we are critical of some policy lines pursued by the Bush administration, we do not want to jettison the alliance completely," he said.

US Stealth Fighters To Be Deployed In South Korea (AFP)

AFP, January 10, 2007

The United States is sending between 15 and 24 radar-evading Stealth fighters to South Korea this month, the US military has said, amid increasing speculation over a second North Korean nuclear test.

"One squadron of F-117 Nighthawk Stealth fighters will be deployed this month," said Kim Yong-Kyu, a spokesman for US Forces Korea. One squadron of fighters has between 15 and 24 aircraft.

"This is a routine deployment," he said, adding that the move had nothing to do with any particular threat. He declined to give further details, including where and for how long the fighters will be deployed.

Holloman Air Force Base in New Mexico, where the fighters are based, said in a Web posting that the fighters left earlier this week for South Korea.

General B.B. Bell, the commander of US forces in South Korea, said Tuesday he believes North Korea will test a second nuclear bomb at some time in the future, following its first test on October 9.

"Should North Korea attack the South in any way, the combined forces command will respond and we will win quickly and we will win decisively," he said.

Bell heads 29,000 US troops in the peninsula, supporting South Korea's 680,000-strong armed forces against any attack from the North's 1.1 million military.

A South Korean foreign ministry official said last week that activity had been detected at Punggye in northeast North Korea, near the site of the first test, but there was no sign of preparations for a second detonation.

The latest round of six-nation talks on the North's nuclear programme ended in Beijing in December without a breakthrough. The US State Department has said the talks could resume as early as this month.

Analysts say North Korea could set off a second nuclear device to strengthen its hand in the prolonged stand-off.

SKorea Urges North To Mull U.S. Proposal (AP)

By Kwang-tae Kim

AP, January 10, 2007

South Korea on Wednesday renewed a call for North Korea to seriously consider U.S. proposals before the communist nation returns to international talks on its nuclear weapons program.

The United States has offered security guarantees, a peace treaty and normalization of relations as well as removal of North Korea from Washington's list of states sponsoring terrorism if it dismantles its atomic weapons program, according to South Korean officials.

"I expect North Korea to come to the talks with realistic and positive proposals after seriously reviewing" the U.S. offers, Foreign Minister Song Min-soon said at a regular press conference following meetings last week with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

South Korea and the U.S. will consider taking active and positive steps if the North shows a positive attitude, Song said.

The North has yet to make any response to the U.S. proposals.

Song said it was difficult to predict when the next nuclear talks will occur, but said all the parties shared the need to hold meetings soon.

The nuclear issue will also be on the agenda for summit talks between South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun and his Chinese and Japanese counterparts on Sunday on the sidelines of a regional Asian meeting in the Philippines, said Song.

North Korea returned to international talks on its nuclear arms program in Beijing last month — the first since its Oct. 9 nuclear test — but no progress was made on disarmament because of a dispute over U.S. financial restrictions imposed on the North over its alleged counterfeiting of $100 bills and money laundering.

The North has repeatedly urged the U.S. to lift the financial restrictions and unfreeze its assets worth some $24 million deposited at a Macau bank blacklisted by Washington.

The U.S. held separate financial talks on the sidelines of the nuclear talks but also made no progress. The two sides have provisionally agreed to hold the next financial talks the week of Jan. 22, according to Song.

For A Few Dollars More (WSJ)

By Jay P. Lefkowitz

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

There is a growing consensus in the international community that North Korea's conduct is unacceptable. Nevertheless, several countries engage in practices that funnel cash to the regime in a manner that violates the spirit of a recent United Nations resolution and raises serious human rights concerns. These countries contract labor through historical -- and even new -- agreements with the regime of Kim Jong Il. Because the North Korean government takes a major portion of workers' salaries, these arrangements provide material support for a rogue government, its nuclear ambitions, and its human-rights atrocities.

Three times last year, the U.N. condemned North Korea's dangerous and abusive conduct. In November, the General Assembly's human-rights committee voted 91-21 to express serious concern about the regime's atrocities against its own population. The Security Council also voted unanimously to condemn North Korea's ballistic missile program in July and its nuclear weapons testing in October. The October resolution calls on member states to freeze the financial assets of those aiding North Korea's nuclear weapons program.

Surely such U.N. proclamations should make anyone think twice about engaging in activities that could aid Pyongyang. Yet several countries utilize trafficked North Korean labor in a manner that provides significant resources for the regime. There are approximately 10,000 to 15,000 North Koreans working abroad for their government. Labor arrangements reportedly exist between North Korea and entities in Russia, Czech Republic, Mongolia, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Libya and Angola. It is unclear how much hard currency is generated for Pyongyang by these arrangements, but it can be presumed significant, given the number of workers involved.

Even though Russia voted for both Security Council resolutions, it provides the largest market for North Korean labor. In camps near Khabarovsk in Siberia, North Korean labor gangs harvest Russian timber. This work force used to be populated by North Korean prisoners and others viewed by the North Korean government as disloyal. It filled a labor gap in Siberia that coincided with the decline of the gulag. Today, conditions are so harsh in North Korea that workers actually volunteer for such labor assignments. However, because these workers are not paid directly, much of the capital generated ends up in the coffers of Mr. Kim's regime. Despite promises of cash, some workers reportedly are paid in coupons that turn out to be of little value. This activity runs afoul of a U.N. protocol on trafficking in persons, to which Russia is a party.

The fact that North Koreans eagerly volunteer for these jobs is a testament to how bad things are in Kim Jong Il's socialist paradise. Although it is hard to gain access to these labor facilities, several recent reports reveal that workers in these camps are treated like prisoners and are provided with food and shelter that are barely adequate. Days off are rare -- cumulatively less than a week per year -- and the workers cannot leave the work areas or interact with locals. They are under the control of North Korean security officials and have no recourse to local authorities. There are some accounts of torture and executions. The work day can reach 17 hours, even in temperatures plunging to 40 degrees below zero. Accidents are common, and the workers are prohibited from using healthcare outside the camp. They work under portraits of the "Dear Leader," Kim Jong Il, and are subject to political indoctrination meetings twice a week.

The Czech Republic also hosts several hundred North Korean workers, although it stopped issuing new work visas six months ago. The North Korean government skims their paychecks and funnels the revenue to Pyongyang. Workers' monthly salaries are deposited directly in an account controlled by the North Korean government. After numerous deductions for items including propaganda films, the workers are left with only about 20% of their wages, from which they still must purchase their own food.

Pyongyang's take varies by location, but we know of no instance where North Korean laborers like these receive their wages directly. This is one of the concerns we have with the Kaesong Industrial Complex in North Korea, where workers are supposed to earn a minimum of $57 per month. While there are some welcome indications that South Korea may be reassessing its commitment to this project, several South Korean companies have spent hundreds of millions of dollars to set up shop in Kaesong to use inexpensive local labor. Even advocates of the endeavor, who believe Kaesong will open and liberalize the North, concede that authorities take a portion of the wages paid by the South Korean companies. Indeed, a recent report indicates this take is 45% of a worker's salary. Verified details are elusive, and neither the North or South Korean governments, nor any company, has been able to state definitively how much of his or her wage a Kaesong worker is allowed to keep.

Some argue that labor arrangements like those in Russia and Kaesong are positive developments. They see these activities as a way to open North Korean eyes to the outside world. To date, however, those benefits seem more theoretical than real. Rather, it is more likely that the hard currency these countries are sending to North Korea will end up funding the regime's nuclear aspirations instead of improving living conditions for the people of North Korea.

Mr. Lefkowitz is President Bush's special envoy for human rights in North Korea.

U.S. Overseas Image Gets New Focus (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will announce today the creation of a new annual award to honor a company, academic institution or other nongovernmental entity that does the most to promote the U.S. image abroad through intercultural understanding, State Department officials said.

The Benjamin Franklin Award for Public Diplomacy is designed to prod corporations and other nongovernmental groups to play a bigger role in public diplomacy at a time when the image of the U.S. government has been battered by a backlash, especially in the Arab world, from the invasion of Iraq.

Rice will highlight the award during a speech at a conference of public relations organizations at the State Department. During the meeting, the group will select the 10 best ways that the private sector can promote understanding between the United States and people around the world.

"The award and the summit are part of our greater effort to partner with the private sector," said Assistant Secretary Dina H. Powell. "Public diplomacy is not the government's job alone, and we will be much more successful as American citizens if we work together with corporations, NGOs [nongovernmental organizations], academic institutions and everyday Americans to amplify our efforts."

Powell, along with Undersecretary of State Karen Hughes, has worked with private entities on a number of initiatives in the past year, including bringing journalists from 100 countries to learn U.S. journalistic practices, creating an international women's mentoring program in partnership with Fortune magazine and sending 12 university presidents to Asia to promote educational opportunities in the United States.

The new award would complement another State Department honor, the Award for Corporate Excellence (ACE), which the agency gives annually to U.S. businesses that act as good corporate citizens overseas. Goldman Sachs, for instance, was selected last year for endowing a gift of 680,000 acres of wilderness in Chile for a national reserve. Competition for that award -- presented by the secretary of state -- is intense, and State Department officials hope the Franklin award will prove equally alluring.

Unlike the ACE award, the new honor will be available not just to companies but also foundations, nonprofit organizations, think tanks, universities and other academic institutions, labor organizations and even individuals. The award was named in honor of Franklin because, as the nation's first envoy, he was known for his creative ways of using culture, business and science to attract the attention of foreign audiences, State Department officials said.

James E. Murphy, chief of marketing and communications for Accenture, chairs the PR Coalition, an organization of 20 major public relations groups that is meeting at the State Department today. He said the group previously identified 10 models to help companies promote corporate governance and diversity. The group, concerned about the image of the United States around the world, approached Hughes last year about holding a meeting at State to produce a similar list for public diplomacy.

Murphy said U.S. companies and individuals donate significantly more money overseas than the overall U.S. aid budget. "The most powerful thing we have going for us is the private sector overseas," Murphy said.

The 150 participants will vote on the 10 best models from a list that includes programs for employees and customers that promote understanding of American society and programs that build trust and respect with counterparts abroad.

Congress On Collision Course With Moscow (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, January 10, 2007

The Bush administration's relationship with the Kremlin has chilled considerably since the moment in 2001 when the US president famously looked into the soul of his Russian counterpart and declared that Vladimir Putin was "very straightforward and trustworthy".

And Washington's stance towards Moscow could become even more frosty in coming months, potentially colliding with expected attempts by Russia to use its new found oil and natural gas wealth to step up its investment in the US, including the expansion of Gazprom, its national energy group, into the US market.

For years most lawmakers in the Republican-controlled Congress have taken the White House's lead in their stance toward Russia. Now experts predict that mounting concerns on Capitol Hill, on issues ranging from Mr Putin's commitment to democracy to questions about the security of western investments in the Russian energy sector, could see lawmakers taking a more robust, sceptical approach.

Barney Frank, the Democratic lawmaker who, as chair the House financial services committee has an influential voice on foreign investment issues, exemplified the expected change in tone last week in a speech to the National Press Club.

In remarks that extolled the "absolute security" of the US market, Mr Frank took a shot at the Kremlin when he remarked: "Where do you want to invest? Russia? So Putin can steal your company?"

The 2008 presidential race could also colour relations with Russia. Two of the Kremlin's most vociferous critics are contenders for the White House: Democrat Joseph Biden who heads the Senate foreign relations committee and John McCain, a favourite to win the Republican nomination.

The defeat in the recent midterm elections of Republican congressman Curt Weldon, a staunch defender of the Kremlin, and the ascension of Democrat Tom Lantos to the top ranks of the House international relations committee, are also likely to renew the focus on allegations of human rights abuses in Russia, including the controversy over the forced sale of Yukos, the energy group, and the imprisonment of Mikhail Khodorkovsky, its former chief executive.

One Democratic Senate source said Russia had been "flying under the radar screen" because Washington had largely focused its attention on Iraq, Iran and North Korea, but that concerns had become increasingly hard to ignore.

"To some extent, it's not our business to regulate the Russian economy, but to the extent they use their control over the Russian economy to affect countries that are close friends and partners, that's something we care about," the person said. "I would hope that we don't respond to bad behaviour with protectionism of our own but one can't discount that option entirely."

One Washington business lobbyist, noting the recent storm over Shell ceding control of its Sakhalin-2 oil and gas project in Russia to Gazprom, agreed: "I wouldn't be surprised if Russian investment in the US was subject to higher political attention in Congress given that Russia has basically expropriated western investments."

Marshall Goldman, associate director of the Davis Center for Russian Studies at Harvard, says Russia has $300bn in cash "rolling around" and that the recently proposed $2.3bn takeover of Oregon Steel by Evraz, a Russian steel group, is "just the beginning".

"I think we have to learn there really isn't much to restrain them. But if they engage in these kinds of games, people can play them too," Mr Goldman says.

Ultimately, Congress's ability to affect the US government's overall relationship with Russia will be limited. Critics will not have a formal vote, for example, over an agreement hatched by the White House that paves the way for Russia to join the World Trade Organisation. However, lawmakers could seize an expected request by the White House for Congress to repeal the 1974 Jackson-Vanik amendment as an opportunity to air broad grievances. The amendment subjects Russia's trading status to annual review and must be repealed in order to give Russia permanent normal trade relations.

Don Evans, who served as commerce secretary during Mr Bush's first term and who last year turned down a top position at Rosneft, the Russian energy group, offered to him by Mr Putin, said in an interview with the Financial Times that Russia's inclusion in the WTO would ultimately foster greater understanding between it and the US and would help integrate Russia into the global economy.

"The issues people want to point to all the time will be a few cases within the [Russian] energy sector that get all the attention," said Mr Evans, who heads the Financial Services Forum, banking lobby group. "But all the American companies that are providing other services and goods...are doing very, very well."

Anger As Russia Digs In Over Oil To Belarus (FT)

By George Parker, Arkady Ostrovsky, Ed Crooks And Chris Flood

Financial Times, January 10, 2007

Vladimir Putin on Tuesday faced an angry European backlash about his decision to halt oil supplies through the pipelines crossing Belarus.

As the Russian president made clear his determination not to back down in his dispute with Belarus, Angela Merkel, the German chancellor, denounced his actions as "not acceptable", noting that even during the height of the cold war, Russia had been a reliable energy supplier to Europe.

Ms Merkel, speaking as the new president of the EU, said Russia's latest display of energy muscle "hurts trust and it makes it difficult to build a co-operative relationship."

Mr Putin, speaking in a televised meeting with ministers in Moscow, stressed he wanted to do all he could to ensure that oil supplies to western Europe were not affected. But he escalated the dispute by telling his government to tell Russian companies to cut output because of the transit dispute.

Belarus wants Russia to pay an export duty of $45 per tonne of oil transported through Belarus. This is in retaliation for Russia slapping $180 export duty on crude oil it sells to Belarus.

In a sign of how seriously Germany now questions its reliance on Russia, Ms Merkel said the new dispute cast doubt on the wisdom of her country's plan to phase out nuclear power by 2020.

Yet for all the political furore, oil markets on Tuesday shrugged off the latest geopolitical threat to supply, focusing instead on the warm US winter and strong inventories. At one point the price of oil hit an 18-month low point, dipping below $54 in New York, although it later recovered most of its losses.

The political row in Belarus – and Venezuela's announcement of plans to take state control of its heavy oil projects – did little to deflect the downward trend in the price. The price of oil has fallen by more than 10 per cent since the start of the year and yesterday Mustafa Mohatarem, chief economist of General Motors, forecast it would fall below $50 this year. West Texas Intermediate crude for delivery in February fell to an intra-day low of $53.88 a barrel before recovering. Brent crude fell to an intra-day low of $53.64 a barrel before climbing back.

David Kirsch, manager of the markets intelligence service for PFC Energy, said the weak trend was likely to continue, with oil prices likely to test $50 a barrel. "I don't see any positive news in the next week or so that is likely to lift prices," he said.

The steep fall has caused concern among members of the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, which last month agreed a supply cut of 500,000 barrels a day, with effect from February 1, to try to stabilise the market.

Some Opec members have a target of $60 a barrel for the basket of their output, which is typically about $5 a barrel below the benchmark prices in London and New York.

The US Energy Information Administration, a government agency, trimmed its forecast of world oil demand to 86.2m barrels a day for the first quarter of the year, down 300,000 b/d from its December forecast. The EIA forecasted US oil prices would average $64.42 a barrel in 2007 and $64.58 in 2008

The oil price fall has taken place against a sell-off in the commodities market: copper has fallen 11.3 per cent; zinc 16.2 per cent; and tin 13.1 per cent.

Germany's Merkel Assails Russia Over Cutoff Of Oil (WP)

By Peter Finn

Washington Post, January 10, 2007

MOSCOW, Jan. 9 -- German Chancellor Angela Merkel forcefully condemned Russia on Tuesday for failing to consult the European Union before it cut off part of its oil exports to Europe because of a deepening dispute between Russia and Belarus over subsidized energy.

"Even during the Cold War, Russia was a stable energy supplier," said Merkel, whose country holds the rotating presidency of the European Union. Speaking at a news conference in Berlin, she said Russia's failure to warn the bloc that it planned to shut down a pipeline that crosses Belarus and supplies Germany, Poland and other E.U. countries was "not acceptable."

Russian officials say they feel deeply aggrieved by the tactics of Belarus, which they accuse of stealing crude oil destined for Western Europe, but the Kremlin is nonetheless getting another black eye over its reliability as an energy supplier.

Just over a year ago, the E.U. was in an uproar after Russia cut natural gas supplies to Ukraine, a decision that affected supplies across the Continent. And while there is no great sympathy in Western Europe for Belarus, often called the Continent's last dictatorship, there is increasing concern about Russia's willingness to shut off energy supplies as a first resort in disputes with its neighbors.

The message "to our Russian partners, and to Belarus as well, is that consultations are the least thing to do," said Merkel, whose comments were echoed by other European leaders. "It is not acceptable if there is no consultation on such issues. That destroys confidence, and this is no basis for smoothly building up a constructive relationship."

The E.U., which is heavily dependent on Russian natural gas and oil, has almost no short-term alternatives for energy. Russia supplies about 25 percent of the union's oil and 40 percent of its natural gas.

Besides Germany and Poland, Russian oil supplies were also cut to the Czech Republic, Hungary and Slovakia. All the affected countries have enough strategic reserves to ride out any shutdown for several months.

The dispute began when Belarus imposed a transit fee on Russian oil in retaliation for new Russian duties on exports of Russian oil to Belarus. Russia's western neighbor has long benefited from subsidized Russian energy, but the Kremlin appears to have tired of underwriting its putative ally, which is led by the authoritarian President Alexander Lukashenko.

Belarus, isolated and poor, earned billions of dollars from processing Russian crude and selling it to Western Europe. The new duties will cut into its profits, much of which ended up in government coffers.

On Jan. 1, Russia doubled the price of the natural gas it sells to Belarus, but at $100 per 1,309 cubic yards, it is still cheaper than the price paid by any other country. As part of that deal, the state-controlled Russian energy company Gazprom also took a 50 percent stake in the Belarusan gas pipeline network. "Belarus won't be blackmailed by Russia," Lukashenko said on state television.

At a government meeting Tuesday, Putin expressed frustration with Belarus, noting that Gazprom paid the highest of multiple independent valuations for its stake in the pipeline network and that Belarus continues to be subsidized despite the price increases.

"The Russian Federation has agreed to sell gas not at a market price," Putin said in televised remarks. "Moreover, Russia is not levying an export duty on its gas exports to Belarus, costing it $3.33 billion annually."

A Belarusan delegation flew to Moscow to try to resolve the dispute.

"Everything should be placed on the negotiation table without any preliminary conditions or preliminary demands," Belarusan Deputy Prime Minister Andrei Kobyakov said at a news conference at the Belarusan Embassy. "We are ready for dialogue."

The Russian economic development and trade minister, German Gref, met with Kobyakov on Tuesday evening but said Russia would enter into full negotiations with Belarus only when the oil transit fee is dropped. "These are our unconditional demands, and we will not enter into talks until these conditions are satisfied," Gref told reporters after meeting with Kobyakov.

One sign that Russia may be preparing for a drawn-out affair was an instruction from Putin to ministers that they "discuss with Russian companies the possibility of reducing oil output in connection to problems linked to the transit of oil through Belarus." That would prevent Russia from extracting more oil than it can pump to customers.

Putin also said that "everything must be done to guarantee the interests of Western consumers." Russian officials said they were exploring ways of rerouting oil to Europe.

Russia Considers Alternatives To Oil Pipeline Through Belarus (NYT)

By Michael Schwirtz

New York Times, January 10, 2007

MOSCOW, Jan. 9 — An unyielding President Vladimir V. Putin on Tuesday raised the possibility of diverting oil transit routes away from Belarus, a day after Moscow cut off pipeline deliveries of crude oil headed to customers in Eastern and Central Europe through the country.

Such a change, which would be years in the making, would cut Belarus out of any role in the transshipment of oil to Europe without offering the customers any immediate assurance that their supplies were reliable.

The two-day cutoff has affected supplies to Ukraine, Germany, Poland, Hungary, the Czech Republic and Slovakia. It is the second stoppage of Russian energy supplies to European countries since last winter, when natural gas shipments were shut down briefly during a gas pricing dispute between Russia and Ukraine.

In a meeting with his cabinet ministers, Mr. Putin also urged the government to discuss with Russian companies “the possibility of scaling down the extraction of oil, given problems in transiting crude across Belarus.” That indicated that Russia might not have sufficient storage for oil that was being produced but not exported.

With the new year, Russia began charging Belarus $100 per thousand cubic meters of gas, more than double the old rate of $46. It also imposed a duty of $180 a ton on oil that officials said Belarus was obtaining at subsidized rates and reselling on world markets. In response, Belarus imposed a transshipment fee of $45 a ton on oil going through Belarus in the Druzhba pipeline to Europe.

On Monday, officials in Moscow accused Belarus of siphoning off about 79,000 tons — roughly half a million barrels — of Russian oil bound for Europe, then shut down the pipeline entirely.

Normally the 2,500-mile pipeline pumps 1.2 million barrels a day to Eastern and Central Europe, with one arm running to Poland and Germany and the other to Ukraine, Hungary, Slovakia and the Czech Republic.

In general terms, Mr. Putin told his cabinet members to do whatever was necessary to guarantee the interests of Russian companies as well as the interests of the countries dependent on Russian energy supplies.

He also said the government must continue negotiations with Russia's "Belarussian partners," now estranged but once so close that the countries spoke seriously of merging into a unitary state.

Officials from Belarus flew to Moscow to negotiate, and one delegation submitted a draft agreement to the Russian Trade Ministry, the Russian news agency Interfax reported. According to Belarus's deputy economic minister, Vladimir A. Naidunov, the agreement could "make it possible to mutually settle issues concerned with levying customs duties on oil, and with duties for oil transportation through Belarus."

It is unclear when negotiations will begin. Russian officials have begun formulating their starting positions, but German O. Gref, Russia's trade minister, told reporters Tuesday evening that Moscow would start talks only after Belarus had lifted transit duties and resumed oil transit.

Russia's intransigence irritated European leaders, including Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany, who said it was "not acceptable" for energy suppliers to cut off shipments without consultation, and who renewed her call for diversification of supplies.

But few analysts expected the standoff to last more than a few days. "Belarus's reserves of cheap oil will last a few days, a week at most," Yaroslav Romanchuk, an economist in Belarus, told The Associated Press. "After that, it will have to buy oil taking into account Russian export duties."

In a news conference, the Russian industry and energy minister, Viktor B. Khristenko, said that in time Russia would be able to reroute oil around Belarus, possibly by increasing the capacity of the Baltic pipeline system or hurrying the completion of the East Siberia-Pacific Ocean pipeline.

In the short term, he said, Russia might have to ship more oil by rail and river. "If these measures aren't enough, it could be necessary to reduce oil output," he said.

Russian equity markets slid sharply on the news, with the RTS index dropping 6.4 percent. Shares in Lukoil, a major oil producer, led the way, dropping 9 percent.

Russia May Cut Oil Production Amid Dispute With Belarus (LAT)

By David Holley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

Putin's comments seem to hold out the threat that negotiations could drag on for days or months.

MOSCOW — A Russian-Belarusian oil dispute that has shut down a key pipeline carrying crude oil to European customers may drag on long enough to force Moscow to cut production, Russian President Vladimir V. Putin said Tuesday.

The bitter spat between the longtime allies led to a cutoff Monday in the flow of oil across Belarus, prompting complaints from European officials.

A warm winter has left Europe with abundant oil supplies, triggering falling prices and keeping a lid on the severity of the continent's short-term worries about the cutoff. But the dispute, which concerns oil taxes and transit fees, has revived fears in the European Union about overreliance on Russian energy and has focused attention on efforts to come up with a comprehensive European energy policy.

The tough Russian stance also threatens to undermine Belarusian President Alexander G. Lukashenko. His authoritarian government, often called "the last dictatorship in Europe," has been propped up by energy subsidies from Moscow that are now being eliminated.

"The Kremlin has dumped Lukashenko," Belarusian opposition leader Alexander Milinkevich said in a telephone interview from Minsk, the capital.

The oil dispute was triggered by a new Russian customs duty of $180 per metric ton on crude oil exports to Belarus, a tax that took effect Jan. 1. Belarus retaliated by imposing a transit fee of $45 per ton for oil shipped through the pipeline to the European Union.

Moscow had previously shipped oil to Belarus duty-free under agreements reached in a bid to eventually unite Belarus and Russia into a single state.

That effort has lost steam in recent years, however. It appears that the Kremlin has decided to maximize its oil and natural gas export profits despite the political impact on Lukashenko.

"Since this united economic space is not working out, it was decided in Moscow to make a transition to market relations," said Vyacheslav A. Nikonov, president of the Politika Foundation, a Moscow think tank. "Lukashenko naturally doesn't like it. Of all the foreign partners Putin ever had, Lukashenko has always been the most difficult."

Last month, Belarus was forced to agree to pay slightly more than twice as much for Russian natural gas this year compared with last year, although the cost remains less than half the amount charged to European Union customers. That deal calls for further price hikes in the next few years.

Milinkevich, the opposition leader, said Lukashenko had overreacted to Moscow's decision to raise energy prices toward market levels.

"Despite all these years of preferential terms for oil and gas, Belarus failed to prepare itself for real market relations," he said.

"Belarus has lost its last partner in Europe and found itself in total isolation," he added. "I think eventually Moscow and Belarus will arrive at some temporary compromise, but their good relations are a thing of the past."

In televised remarks made at a meeting of Cabinet ministers, Putin ordered officials "to discuss with Russian oil-producing companies the possibility of reducing oil production in connection with the problems that arose when transporting our oil through Belarus' territory."

That comment appeared to hold out the threat that negotiations could drag on for days or even months. But Putin also called for talks to move forward, and for officials "to do everything to protect the interests of our Western customers."

A similar dispute a year ago between Russia and Ukraine over natural gas prices briefly disrupted supplies to the European Union.

Speaking at a joint news conference in Berlin, German Chancellor Angela Merkel and European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso criticized both Russia and Belarus for the disruption in supplies.

"It is not acceptable when there are no consultations about such moves," Merkel said. "That repeatedly destroys confidence, and you cannot build cooperation based on true mutual trust in this way.... Even during the Cold War, Russia was a stable energy supplier."

The pipeline delivers about 20% of Germany's yearly oil supply. The European Union relies on Russia for about 40% of its natural gas imports and about 30% of its oil imports.

Steven Dashevsky, director of research at Aton Capital Group in Moscow, placed most of the blame for the dispute on Belarus.

"Russia, as a main oil and gas producer, is in the same shoes with Western Europe, as a main oil and gas consumer," he said. "For the second year in a row they become hostages of unstable transit states that can't pay market prices for their energy and resort to creating problems for all of Europe."

Belarusian Deputy Prime Minister Andrei Kobyakov met in Moscow on Tuesday with Russian Economic Development and Trade Minister German O. Gref, but it was unclear whether the talks made any progress.

Oil Spat Deepens Worry Over Russia's Reliability (WSJ)

By Gregory L. White And Guy Chazan

Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

Putin Threat to Cut Output As Belarus Dispute Persists Has EU Weighing Options

MOSCOW -- Russia's threat to reduce oil production in a worsening trade war with neighboring Belarus is fueling fears of a drawn-out conflict that could slice Europe's main supply of crude.

As the main pipeline carrying Russian oil to Europe remained shut off for a second straight day, European officials said refineries were able to maintain production by dipping into stocks. But officials warned that the European Union might have to take the costly step of releasing oil from its strategic reserve if the cutoff is prolonged.

European officials blasted both sides' actions. German Chancellor Angela Merkel said Moscow's failure to warn its customers of the impending cutoff "hurts trust and ... makes it difficult to build a cooperative relationship." Ms. Merkel and EU officials denounced the lack of warning from both sides as "unacceptable," while the European Commission said it would convene a special meeting tomorrow to discuss how to make up for the lost Russian supplies.

In his first public comments on the Belarus dispute, Russian President Vladimir Putin ordered his government to continue negotiations with Minsk, but also said Moscow should discuss with oil companies the possibility of reducing oil production to offset lost exports.

Russia's main pipeline to Europe carries about a third of Russia's five million barrels a day of crude exports. Belarussian officials in Moscow for talks today said no discussions had yet taken place.

Russian oil companies warned that any effort to reduce production would be costly. "That's an extreme option," said Dmitry Dolgov, a spokesman for OAO Lukoil, Russia's largest oil company. But analysts said with Kremlin influence in the energy sector growing, Russia's oil giants would likely toe the line if the authorities demanded cutbacks.

Oil prices fell as markets shrugged off fears about Russia and focused on unseasonably warm weather in the U.S. Crude oil for February delivery settled at $55.64 a barrel, down 45 cents, or 0.8%, on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

The Kremlin blames Minsk for causing the disruption by imposing a fee of $45 a metric ton (about $6.15 a barrel) for Russian oil shipped through the Druzhba pipeline. Minsk imposed the transit duty in retaliation for Moscow's decision late last year to end duty-free crude shipments to Belarus. The Druzhba, or Friendship, brings over one million barrels a day of Russian crude to Germany, Poland and other European countries, and carries about 12.5% of EU oil consumption.

Russia's reputation as a reliable supplier to Europe, which depends heavily on its eastern neighbor for oil and natural gas, has come under increasing question since a price conflict with Ukraine led to a brief cutoff of Russian natural-gas exports to much of Europe a year ago. But that so far hasn't deterred Moscow from continuing to use its vast oil and gas resources as a political tool in its increasingly assertive foreign policy.

Political analysts said the Kremlin appears determined to put the screws to Belarus President Alexander Lukashenko. For Mr. Putin, who has called the 1991 collapse of the Soviet Union "the greatest geopolitical catastrophe of the century," a planned union with its former Soviet neighbor on Moscow's terms is a priority. Russian officials blame Mr. Lukashenko for foot-dragging on the plan despite receiving billions of dollars a year in energy subsidies from Moscow.

Mr. Putin yesterday ordered his government to prepare a full spectrum of economic measures to use against Belarus, whose state-controlled economy is heavily dependent on Russian markets.

With the country's biggest companies deprived of their main export market as well as cheap Russian energy, Mr. Lukashenko may for the first time face mass popular discontent. "The Belarussian population is used to getting everything for free, and they will turn away from Lukashenko if he can no longer come up with the goods," said Jaroslav Romanchuk, head of the Mises think tank in Minsk.

But Mr. Lukashenko, a pariah in the West because of his authoritarian policies, could prove more resistant to pressure in the short term than Moscow, which has cultivated ties in Europe.

U.S. Criticizes Venezuela's Nationalization Plan As A Sure Failure (MCT)

By Pablo Bachelet

McClatchy Newspapers, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON - The Bush administration on Tuesday slammed Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's plans to nationalize his country's power and telecommunications companies and demanded that U.S. firms be properly compensated.

"Nationalization has a long and inglorious history of failure around the world," White House spokesman Tony Snow said. "We support the Venezuelan people and think this is an unhappy day for them."

Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for the White House National Security Council, said the United States expects that American companies affected by Chavez's moves will be "promptly and fairly compensated."

Chavez said Monday that it was time to nationalize CANTV, the country's biggest telecommunications company, as well as electricity and perhaps oil interests. The move was widely viewed as a dramatic leftward tilt for the populist leader, who gave no further details.

If the move is carried out, observers say, the Venezuelan state may have to disburse more than $20 billion to foreign investors.

Reaction among investors was immediate, with the Caracas stock exchange, the IBC, plummeting 19 percent Tuesday, the largest drop since record-keeping began in 1993.

CANTV, which traded at nearly $20 a share before Chavez's speech, saw its price tumble 28 percent on Tuesday to just over $12 a share. Shares of The AES Corp., an Arlington, Va., firm that operates a Caracas electric utility, fell 4 percent.

Though Snow and Johndroe condemned the nationalization announcement, the Bush administration avoided broader criticism of the Venezuelan president. U.S. officials, as well as Venezuelan critics, have accused Chavez of undermining democracy at home and other parts of Latin America. Lately, however, the Bush administration has tried to enter into a dialogue with Caracas.

In 1991 the Venezuelan government sold CANTV to Verizon for $1.8 billion amid a wave of privatizations that swept Latin America. As part of its strategy to divest its Latin American holdings, Verizon announced last April that it would sell its 28-percent stake in CANTV to Mexican phone giant Telmex in a $3.7 billion deal that includes assets in Puerto Rico and the Dominican Republic.

It was unclear how Monday's announcement would affect the transaction, which awaits Venezuelan regulatory authorities' approval.

The Venezuelan government has compensated firms for seized assets in the past, but taking over big utility companies could strain even Venezuela's oil-rich pockets.

Gerver Torres, a former Venezuelan Cabinet minister who played a role in the privatization of CANTV, estimates Verizon's stake in the company now at $3.5 billion and the value of AES's Caracas electrical utility at $1.9 billion.

Chavez also hinted at taking over four oil fields, which Torres estimates could be worth as much as $5 billion each.

He said the takeovers have little economic justification for a poor country and would be "a huge (state) investment for purely ideological reasons."

Chavez's announcement drew the immediate rebuke of Florida Republican Rep. Connie Mack, an outspoken critic of the Venezuelan leader.

"By moving to nationalize key economic sectors, coupled with his continued crackdown on freedom, Chavez is working every day to emulate his mentor, Fidel Castro," Mack said.

Chavez's Economic Plans Set Latin Markets Reeling (WP)

By Juan Forero

Washington Post, January 10, 2007

BOGOTA, Colombia, Jan. 9 -- Financial markets from Buenos Aires to Caracas reeled on Tuesday following Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's announcement that he plans to nationalize some private companies, and the White House warned that it expects U.S.-based corporations to be compensated for any losses.

DOJ_NMG_0114812

The U.S. Energy Department also expressed concern after Chavez, who has pledged to accelerate his socialist "revolution," said Monday that he would nationalize telephone and electric utility companies and increase state control over four major oil projects in which American and other foreign companies have invested $17 billion.

At the White House, Gordon Johndroe, a spokesman for the National Security Council, said that "if any U.S. companies are affected, we would expect them to be promptly and fairly compensated." He also said that a nationalization plan, if it proved far-reaching, could be harmful to Venezuela.

Meanwhile, White House press secretary Tony Snow lambasted Chavez's plan, saying: "Nationalization has a long and inglorious history of failure around the world. We support the Venezuelan people and think this is an unhappy day for them."

The Venezuelan leader did not say whether his nationalization plan would mean outright expropriation, higher taxes or majority state control. And as is often the case after Chavez's announcements, Venezuelans scrambled Tuesday to play down the news, with energy officials saying the president was only reiterating existing policy.

But the announcement, made in a bombastic speech in which Chavez also attacked the Catholic Church and insulted the secretary general of the Organization of American States, sent stocks into a tailspin in Venezuela and generated market jitters across Latin America.

In Venezuela, the stock market suffered its biggest loss on record, plunging 19 percent, according to the Bloomberg news agency. The currency was also hit hard. The bolivar, which is officially pegged at 2,150 to the dollar, dropped to more than 4,000 to the dollar on the black market.

Trading on shares of CANTV, Venezuela's largest telephone company, was suspended for 48 hours after shares fell 30 percent. And trading on shares for the electric utility, Electricidad de Caracas, was halted after a drop of more than 20 percent. On the New York Stock Exchange, shares of AES Corp., the Arlington-based company that owns 86 percent of Electricidad de Caracas, fell 86 cents, or 4 percent, on news of the Chavez speech.

In Mexico, the stock prices of Telefonos de Mexico and America Movil SA also dropped. The two companies, both owned by the richest man in Latin America, Carlos Slim, had launched a joint effort to take control of CANTV, whose largest shareholder is now Verizon Communications Inc. Stocks in Argentina and Colombia, the latter a close trading partner of Venezuela's, dipped, as well.

"Obviously, the markets responded," said Maya Hernandez, an analyst with HSBC in New York. She said that although Chavez had said he would move to consolidate his socialist agenda, "what surprised us was the urgency with which he moved, not the direction."

Still, she said, the government has generated numerous questions that officials in Venezuela say should be answered Wednesday, when Chavez is to be sworn in to a third term.

"It's very unclear how he will go about this, especially the nationalization," Hernandez said. "What will he do? Is he going to compensate the companies? Is he going to expropriate the companies?"

Since first being elected in 1998, Chavez has moved quickly to overturn the old social and economic order, sidelining his opponents and spending billions of dollars in oil revenue to found state-run cooperatives and government companies. He has steadily taken a larger share of the pie from companies such as Exxon Mobil, Chevron, Total of France and BP, multinationals drawn to Venezuela in the 1990s. New state lending agencies have been created, and new regulations have been imposed on banks, which are now required to dedicate a percentage of loans to micro-businesses and other sectors identified by the government as important to the economy.

But Chavez has promised more. Emboldened by a landslide electoral win in December that gave him another six-year term, the former paratrooper has announced he will seek special constitutional "enabling" powers to pass laws affecting the economy, as he did in 2001 when the government first pushed through legislation to increase the state's hold.

Chavez also said the Central Bank, one of the few semi-independent entities in the country, would come under state control as its directors are replaced. The Central Bank controls cash flow and releases economic data, operations the administration wants to wrest away.

One of the bank's outgoing directors, Domingo Maza Zavala, decried the government's moves.

DOJ_NMG_0114813

"The Central Bank must be autonomous," Maza said in an interview Tuesday on Globovision, a Caracas news station. "Otherwise, the people will lose confidence in the currency."

In Venezuela, businessmen were bracing for more details about the government's plan while hoping for the best. Many have long complained that private investment has plummeted under Chavez, hurting industry.

Flavio Fridegotto, a businessman speaking by phone from Venezuela, said the government has to understand that it needs foreign companies to operate freely in the country.

"We don't think that they're going to be that radical," he said. "He needs businessmen. They need to take care of the transnationals."

Analysts Hit Venezuela Nationalization (AP)

By Natalie Obiko Pearson

Investors spooked by President Hugo Chavez's nationalization plans rushed to sell off Venezuelan stocks Tuesday, while U.S. officials and financial analysts warned that increasing government control in the power, telecom and oil sectors is a mistake.

Chavez, who begins another six-year term Wednesday after a sweeping election victory, announced plans Monday to nationalize Venezuela's largest telecommunications company, electrical companies and four lucrative oil projects now run by foreign companies in the Orinoco River basin. He also called for a constitutional amendment to strip the autonomy of the Central Bank.

"Chavez has singled out `strategic sectors' for now, but what could come next?" asked Pedro Palma, an economist at Venezuela's IESA business school. He said Chavez has created "a climate of great uncertainty."

Chavez's plans to impose state control over oil upgrading projects in the Orinoco, now controlled by companies like Exxon Mobil Corp., Chevron Corp. and ConocoPhillips Co., also prompted worries in the U.S., Venezuela's largest oil customer.

"I think the goal here is to enforce the sanctity of contracts," U.S. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman said Tuesday, expressing concerns that Chavez could "violate that principle."

White House press secretary Tony Snow also weighed in, saying: "Nationalization has a long and inglorious history of failure around the world. We support the Venezuelan people and think this is an unhappy day for them."

Investors dumped shares in C.A. Nacional Telefonos de Venezuela, or CANTV, whose American Depository Receipts lost nearly 42 percent of their value since Chavez's announcement. On Tuesday alone, CANTV lost $285.7 million in market capitalization.

Shares in Electricidad de Caracas, owned by Arlington, Virginia-based AES Corp., fell by 20 percent Tuesday morning before the Caracas stock exchange suspended trading. And the U.S. dollar hit a new high of 4,000 Venezuelan bolivars on the black market Tuesday, making a joke of the official exchange rate of 2,150 bolivars.

Government seizures of companies don't appear to be likely: With Venezuelan oil selling above $50 a barrel, Chavez's government has plenty of cash to buy out private-sector stakes in key companies.

Chavez also said he would ask Congress — now completely controlled by his supporters — to grant him special powers to enact "revolutionary laws" to carry out the nationalizations and other changes.

Oil companies are accustomed to operating in politically unstable regions and have so far taken a long-term perspective on abrupt changes by Chavez's government. He's already raised taxes and royalties and brought most oil operations under state-controlled joint ventures.

Brazil's state-owned oil company said Tuesday that Chavez's announcement will not affect its plans to invest in Venezuela.

"(This announcement) should not surprise anyone. ... He has been saying he would do this for a long time," Petrobras Chief Executive Sergio Gabrielli told Brazil's state news agency. Petrobras is not involved in the Orinoco upgrading projects but has other oil and gas interests in the country.

But other sectors are likely to be spooked, and that won't help diversify an economy precariously dependent on oil, Palma said.

DOJ_NMG_0114814

CANTV's nationalization also raises doubts about an April agreement by Verizon Communications Inc. to sell its 28.5 percent stake in CANTV to a joint venture of America Movil and Telefonos de Mexico SA controlled by Mexican billionaire Carlos Slim. The sale had been awaiting Venezuelan government regulatory approval.

Shares of both Mexican phone companies fell Tuesday: America Movil lost 2.6 percent and Telmex dropped 2.9 percent on Mexico's benchmark IPC stock index, which closed down 1.9 percent overall.

Chavez has increased state control over many areas of the economy since coming to power in 1999. The foreign exchange controls he imposed in 2003 make it difficult to repatriate earnings and acquire dollars for international payments, and his government seized ranchlands and company assets deemed idle, moves that scared off many long-term investors.

State-run companies have a poor record in Venezuela: areas now serviced by government-run electricity companies suffer frequent blackouts, and before CANTV was privatized, companies had to employ dozens of operators to work the phones because getting a connection was so difficult.

"The state companies have shown that they're hopeless, they don't know how to manage, they're totally incapable of directing any type of company," said Luis Salazar, 56, an economist walking in downtown Caracas.

The privatized CANTV has also provided another key benefit for Venezuelans — one of the few ways to get around currency exchange controls. Investors could buy its stocks in Venezuelan bolivars and sell them on the New York Stock Exchange to acquire dollars. A government takeover of CANTV would close down this option for preserving wealth in an economy where inflation has been running at 17 percent.

Venezuela's electricity sector is largely state-run already and it wasn't clear if Chavez's call to re-nationalize companies privatized before he took power would affect Electricidad de Caracas, which has never been state-run and is owned by Virginia-based AES Corp. Stockholders, however, were not taking any chances and sold off shares.

Chavez has heightened the risk for anyone doing business in Venezuela, said Emilio Medina-Smith, an economist at Venezuela's University of Carabobo.

"The model that the government is going to follow is feasible with oil at $50 a barrel. But is it possible in the medium-term, long-term? Experience tells us no," he said.

Venezuelan Plan Shakes Investors (NYT)

By Simon Romero And Clifford Krauss

New York Times, January 10, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela, Jan. 9 — Verizon Communications had been looking to lighten its exposure to Latin America for some time when it struck a deal in April to sell investments in three properties in Puerto Rico, the Dominican Republic and Venezuela.

Now, it probably wishes it had disconnected its Latin lines even sooner.

The company could possibly lose up to several hundred million dollars, thanks to President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela, who threatened to nationalize the country's main telephone and electricity companies.

Investors reacted with alarm here and in markets in the United States and throughout Latin America on Tuesday as they measured the impact of the plan by Mr. Chávez to nationalize crucial areas of the economy. Memories of past nationalizations during another turbulent era, in places like Cuba and Chile, helped drive down the Caracas stock exchange's main index by almost 19 percent.

Markets across Latin America declined Tuesday, but the drop was modest in most other countries, with the Bovespa index in Brazil and the Bolsa index of Mexico each falling 1.9 percent. The measured reaction appears to reflect the belief of investors that Mr. Chávez, in spite of his words, has limited influence on the economic policies of other governments in the region.

"It has not turned into a widespread contagion," said David Riedel, president of the Riedel Research Group, who follows emerging market stocks. Compared with the 1990s, "you have a more sophisticated base of investors that understand that Mexico is different from Venezuela."

Still, investors sold shares in American, Argentine and Mexican companies vulnerable to the move by Mr. Chávez to take control over entities that had been privatized by previous administrations.

Owners of Venezuelan steel, banking, cement and hotel companies — even the cable car operator that takes tourists to the top of the Ávila mountain here — could be affected by the push toward nationalization, analysts said.

"Chávez is deepening his revolution, but in doing so will he follow the law and compensate the companies whose assets will be nationalized?" said Miguel Octavio, executive director of BBO Servicios Financieros, a brokerage firm, who calculated the costs of taking over companies in the telecommunications, electricity and oil industries, as well assuming their debts, at more than $15 billion.

"It doesn't seem like the government has thought this project out yet," Mr. Octavio said.

Tony Snow, a White House spokesman, said on Tuesday, "Nationalization has a long and inglorious history of failure around the world. We support the Venezuelan people and think this is an unhappy day for them."

Mr. Chávez further intensified worries with his request for vastly enhanced presidential authority from his Congress. If successful, those new powers would allow him to decree measures into law for one year, bypassing any debate in the legislature, where in any case all 167 deputies are his supporters. On top of that, he made a request to abolish the autonomy of Venezuela's central bank. The Venezuelan government did not immediately contact the American companies, which declined to discuss details.

"There are many ways in which the Venezuelan government could proceed," said Peter Thonis, a spokesman for Verizon. "Since they have not discussed specific plans, it would be premature for us to comment now."

In April, Verizon agreed to sell its 28.5 percent stake in Compañia Anónima Nacional Teléfonos de Venezuela, or CANTV, to América Móvil and Teléfonos de Mexico, for $676 million; the deal has not closed, so Verizon still owns the stake, and it was unclear how much the Chávez government would be willing to pay to take control. Neither América Móvil or Teléfonos de Mexico would comment.

Since taking power eight years ago, President Chávez has imposed stronger political control over the state oil company and has ordered the government to exert greater authority over several ventures with foreign oil firms.

Stopping short of Mexico's nationalization of foreign oil companies in the 1930s, the Venezuelan government has aimed to reach partnership agreements with foreign oil companies while raising its tax rates and royalties on foreign oil companies.

At the very least President Chávez's pledges Monday to nationalize companies in the telecommunications and electricity industries represented another retreat of the trend toward more private control of national economies and free market policies that swept Latin America in the 1990s.

Mr. Chávez has led that reversal, which has taken hold to one extent or another in Argentina and Ecuador, as well as Bolivia.

"We have said for a while that if you are operating a domestic business in Venezuela, you are chronically at risk for something like this happening," said Thierry A. Wizman, a managing director and global emerging market strategist at Bear Stearns in New York. "This is not the first time he has changed the rules for domestic businesses."

Still, Mr. Wizman notes Mr. Chávez cannot afford to seize assets brazenly without compensating corporate owners, because Venezuela owns assets in the United States like Citgo, the energy company, that could be frozen by United States courts.

"He is unlikely to give a fair price, but it won't be outright seizure without compensation," Mr. Wizman said. "He doesn't want to offend everybody simultaneously."

Not all investors are as sanguine, and two American companies, Verizon and the AES Corporation of Arlington, Va., suddenly face the potential of hundreds of millions of dollars of losses. AES declined to comment Tuesday.

The abrupt policy and market jolt in Caracas came amid surging interest in Latin America, Asia and Eastern Europe by investors around the world. Last year, investors in the United States poured $20.3 billion into emerging market funds, up 47 percent from 2005 and accounting for 15 percent of all the money invested in stock-based funds, according to AMG Data Services.

Investors note that even with the recent troubles in Russia, Venezuela and Thailand, conditions remain favorable in Brazil, Chile, China and India. That may explain why stock markets did not buckle across Asia and the declines in Latin America were fairly modest outside Venezuela.

Some investors and business experts expressed optimism that while risks and trepidations were on the rise for business in the region, Mr. Chávez had sometimes stopped short of his pledges in the past.

Others even hoped he would reverse his intentions, or at least fairly pay for the announced nationalization of CANTV.

A sharp fall in the shares of Electricidad de Caracas, a utility controlled by AES, however, seemed to reflect fears that it would be nationalized.

Mr. Chávez's pronouncements prompted expressions of awe and surprise among many of his new cabinet members at their swearing-in ceremony on Monday, suggesting that even they were taken aback. Mr. Chávez also lectured Venezuela's clergy, which has been critical of his plan to refuse a broadcast license to an outspoken television network. He recommended that they read the works of Marx and Lenin, as well as the Bible, "to learn what socialism means."

Mr. Chávez has suddenly moved forward with a revolution that seemed to unfold in slow motion in previous years. He pushed for socialist-inspired economic policies like price controls to slow inflation and the assembly of alliances with Latin American nations with leftist leaders that now include Bolivia, Cuba, Ecuador and Nicaragua.

Since his re-election to the presidency in December with a 23-point margin, Mr. Chávez has quickly accelerated his efforts to remake Venezuelan society. He has dismissed moderate cabinet ministers and his vice president. He also has begun speaking of the need to reform the nation's public schools to focus more on socialist ideals, and of guiding the Venezuelan consumer away from "luxurious consumption" of imported goods.

Few obstacles stand in the way of Mr. Chávez, making his request for enhanced presidential power, as well as a request to abolish the autonomy of Venezuela's central bank, somewhat perplexing. Mr. Chávez and his economic deputies already effectively control monetary policy, for instance by capping interest rates on loans, though they have to go through the bureaucratic procedure of asking the central bank for its reserves of hard currency if they want them.

With 80 billion barrels of conventional crude oil, or about 7 percent of the world's reserves, Venezuela remains the fourth-largest oil supplier of the United States. Much of Mr. Chávez's ambitious project to move Venezuela toward socialism will depend on petroleum revenue, with oil by far the country's leading export.

It was no small surprise that even as Mr. Chávez announced his startling assortment of economic policies this week, his oil minister, Rafael Ramírez, was calling on OPEC to hold a special meeting to discuss falling oil prices. On Tuesday, oil traded near an 18-month low at $55.64 a barrel in New York, down nearly 9 percent since the start of the year.

Venezuela's Ch?vez Tightens Grip (AP)

By Thomas Catan

AP, January 10, 2007

CARACAS, VENEZUELA

As he begins his third presidential term Wednesday, Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez has laid the groundwork for a sharp leftward shift and launched a clampdown on dissent, in what analysts see as a broad-based effort to strengthen his grip on power.

Emboldened by his resounding reelection victory on Dec. 3, Mr. Chávez announced plans this week to nationalize power and telecom companies as part of an accelerated move toward socialism. This comes after he had begun to act on longstanding threats to close media outlets aligned with the opposition, refusing to renew the broadcast license of Venezuela's oldest commercial television station, RCTV.

In the past week, he has purged his cabinet of ministers deemed insufficiently radical, bringing in a new group of loyalists that includes his brother, Adan. He has begun to merge the more than 20 parties in his governing coalition into a single force under his control. And, under a controversial new law, he is set to take control of nongovernmental organizations that could oppose his government.

"I don't think there is a lot of ambiguity about what Chávez is doing," says Michael Shifter, an analyst at Interamerican Dialogue in Washington, DC. "He wants to hold on to power for as long as possible, and even though he just won a resounding reelection, he doesn't want to take any chances of dissent building." Crackdown on dissent

The Venezuelan president's decision to close RCTV, which has been broadcasting since 1953, has been met with strong criticism from the Organization of American States (OAS), the Catholic Church, and from press freedom campaigners like Reporters Without Borders. José Miguel Insulza, OAS secretary general, said the move smacked of "censorship against freedom of speech and a warning to other media, encouraging them to limit their operations so as not to face the same fate."

But Chávez, who referred to Mr. Insulza as an "idiot," says he will defy any international criticism.

Chávez is also moving to take control of civic groups, some of which have been critical of his government. Under a proposed law now in Congress, NGOs will have to reregister with the government, even if they have been operating legally for years. Foreign funding will have to pass through the government, and NGOs would have to open their files to anyone that requests it. Human rights campaigners say it would effectively end their work.

"If approved, it will [effectively] outlaw all nongovernmental organizations" working in Venezuela, says Liliana Ortega of the Venezuelan human rights group, Cofavic. "There will only be groups approved by the government."

Amnesty International has called on Chávez to revoke the bill, with a spokesperson saying it would "restrict the legitimate work of human rights defenders in Venezuela." But Chávez shows no signs of retreating.

Chávez is also gearing up to change the constitution to allow his indefinite re-election - and has vowed to remain in power until 2021.

Mr. Shifter believes Chávez's effort to change the constitution could meet with substantial opposition within his own coalition. That could be a reason why Chávez is moving to take control of both supporters and critical NGOs.

"He would be in better shape to assure his power if there are no independent, critical civic organizations that could offer a channel for dissent and challenge to the regime," says Shifter.

Chávez's defenders deny his latest moves constitute an autocratic power-play. They say the measures are needed to defend the achievements of the "Bolivarian Revolution" from its enemies, such as those who launched a failed coup against Chávez in 2002.

The bill to regulate NGOs, for example, was introduced after Súmate, a voter education group involved in the 2004 recall drive against Chávez, was found to have received more than $30,000 from the US-funded National Endowment for Democracy. They similarly accuse RCTV and other private broadcasters of having supported the failed 2002 coup and subsequent oil strike against the government.

"They became spokesmen for the opposition and allied themselves with the coup-plotters of 2002," says Martín Pacheco, media coordinator for the Chávez reelection campaign. Growing blacklist

With political passions on the rise, Chávez's opponents say they are bracing themselves for a renewed crackdown. Some of the 3.5 million Venezuelans on a political blacklist compiled by his government two years ago say they have noticed a recent upswing in harassment by government officials.

Rocío San Miguel, a lawyer in Caracas, appeared on the blacklist in early 2004 after signing a petition to recall the president. She was fired from her job at Venezuela's border agency a few weeks after the blacklist was posted on the Internet. Last month, her husband, a colonel in the Air Force, was barred from entering his air base.

"Not only have they ended my career, now they are ending his," says Ms. San Miguel, adding that she is now more fearful than ever. "The day after the election, my daughter asked me, 'Is something going to happen to you now that Chávez has won?' "

Opponents say the list is used to screen applicants for jobs, social benefits, identity cards, scholarships, and credit from state banks. Government aides deny this. "It's absurd to think there is political discrimination here," says Mr. Pacheco.

One woman, who requested anonymity for fear of reprisals, says she was fired from her government job just before the Dec. 3 election, along with several others.

"That list is used all the time," she says. "People are very scared." Toward socialism

CARACAS, VENEZUELA - As Venezuela embarked on another six years under Hugo Chávez, the president announced plans to nationalize power and telecommunications companies. He also said he wanted a constitutional amendment to strip the Central Bank of its autonomy and would soon ask the National Assembly, solidly controlled by his allies, to approve "a set of revolutionary laws" by presidential decree.

"We're heading toward socialism, and nothing and no one can prevent it," he said in a televised address after swearing in his new cabinet on Monday.

Chávez also said lucrative oil projects in the Orinoco River basin involving foreign oil companies should be under national ownership. Critics say he is following in the footsteps of Cuban leader Fidel Castro.

Venezuela Inc.'s Hostile Takeover (NYT)

President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela — the very portrait of a modern Latin American strongman — is not content to exercise near-total political and military control of his country. Now he is tightening his grip on the Venezuelan economy. That's bad news for foreign investors, but even more so for the Venezuelan people who will have to pay the price for an economy plagued by increasing inefficiency and corruption.

Mr. Chávez announced this week that he would nationalize electricity and telecommunications companies. Venezuela's biggest telecommunications company is partly owned by Verizon Communications. Its largest publicly traded electricity company is controlled by another American company, the AES Corporation. Mr. Chávez also declared his intention to take control of four multibillion- dollar oil projects with significant investments from foreign companies.

State control is rarely an efficient way to run companies. And nationalizations are not a good way to encourage further foreign investment. Mr. Chávez is already using the state-controlled oil company to reward his cronies at the expense of getting the best return on Venezuela's most lucrative resource.

Exactly what form these nationalizations will take remains unclear. Whatever Mr. Chávez is planning, he needs to fairly compensate shareholders. And while the Bush administration needs to condemn any seizure of American assets, it should choose its words carefully so as not to play into Mr. Chávez's Yanqui-baiting game.

The administration can best advance American interests, and those of the people of Latin America, through more active engagement of the region's many democracies. It also needs to press ahead with trade agreements and other forms of economic assistance and cooperation. That is the smartest way to counter Mr. Chávez's demagoguery.

Mr. Chávez's latest moves serve as yet another reminder of why America needs to curb its insatiable appetite for oil. The United States is the biggest buyer of Venezuelan petroleum products. If a powerful Hugo Chávez is against U.S. interests, we should stop paying for his Russian fighter jets and helicopters — and his nationalizations — with our gas-guzzling cars and trucks.

Venezuela's Leap Backward (WP)

BEFORE HIS reelection as Venezuelan president last month, Hugo Chavez declared that his goal was to receive 10 million votes and thereby a mandate to greatly accelerate what he calls a 21st-century socialist revolution. In the end, despite a one-sided campaign that left a majority of Venezuelans believing they might be punished if they did not cast their ballots for him, Mr. Chavez received only 7 million votes; an opposition candidate won 4 million. The president's push to transform his country nevertheless is well underway -- and the model looks a lot like Cuba in the 20th century.

In the past couple of weeks Mr. Chavez has shaken up his cabinet to eliminate quasi-independent voices, said he will form a single ruling party and announced plans to govern by decree in the coming year. He has said he will close down the country's most popular television network, which has been critical of his government, eliminate the independence of the Central Bank, and nationalize telephone and electricity companies -- including one partly owned by Verizon and another by Alexandria-based AES. The commercial code will be changed; one minister said the intent is to place new limits on the profits of the remaining private companies. Though some private media will remain, Andres Izarra, the head of a state network and a close collaborator of Mr. Chavez's, declared that the regime's plan is "a communications and information hegemony for the state."

The flurry of activity has provoked understandable qualms among Latin America's democratic leaders, some of whom have bent over backward until now to give Mr. Chavez the benefit of the doubt. Jose Miguel Insulza, the Chilean who was elected secretary general of the Organization of American States with Venezuelan support, issued a statement last week saying Mr. Chavez's promise to revoke the license of RCTV "gives the appearance of a form of censorship against free expression" and "has no precedent in the recent decades of [Latin] democracy." The unfailingly vulgar president responded by publicly calling the OAS leader " pendejo," a Spanish word that could be translated as "idiot" but is not nearly so polite.

Some will see in Mr. Chavez's actions a threat to U.S. interests. Certainly, those who caution that it is unwise to count on Venezuela to continue supplying up to 15 percent of U.S. oil imports have a point. If assets of U.S. companies are seized without fair compensation, Venezuela should be subject to penalties. But the main threat posed by Mr. Chavez is to Venezuela's 26 million people. If he follows through on his threats, they can look forward to steadily diminishing freedom and -- if the history of socialism is any guide -- national impoverishment.

Cuban Economists Envision Role For Markets In Post-Castro Era (WSJ)

By Bob Davis

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

With Fidel Castro ailing and absent from the public stage, some influential Cuban intellectuals are laying plans for a more market-oriented approach to fortify the island's ailing communist economy.

The debate over economic experimentation, squelched a decade ago by the Castro regime, offers a glimpse of what a post-Castro Cuba could look like. Now, it is intensifying at a time when Castro disciple Hugo Chávez is steering Venezuela toward the kind of hardline socialism that has failed to produce prosperity in Cuba.

Together, the Cuban economists' proposals would cut down on state interference in businesses and aim to wring more productivity out of the island nation's economy. Among the steps under discussion: decentralizing control, expanding the power of managers at privately owned agricultural cooperatives, extending private ownership to other sectors, boosting investment in infrastructure and increasing incentives to workers.

None of the plans would shuck communism for capitalism or open the island further to foreign investment -- which economists outside Cuba say are critical for the island to prosper. But the fact that the government is permitting -- and perhaps even encouraging -- the debate suggests regime officials might find these kinds of changes acceptable, though it may take Mr. Castro's death to put them into action.

"We are in the midst of a process of debate, which is cautious and controlled, but is happening for the first time in many years," said Pedro Monreal, a senior professor at the Center for Research on the International Economy in Havana. "It's an historic moment," says Julia Sweig, a Cuba specialist at the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington. "The Cuban regime feels confident enough to have voices it once purged be at the center of the economic debate on reform."

The proposals are prompted by the continuing economic privation in Cuba, where state salaries don't come close to covering living costs. But the planning is made more immediate by the 80-year-old Mr. Castro's continuing health problems. The Cuban government hasn't disclosed the nature of Mr. Castro's illness -- a Spanish surgeon recently said it isn't cancer -- but he hasn't been seen in public since temporarily relinquishing power at the end of July, and he is unlikely to return to his presidential duties.

Phony Numbers

Cuba claims its economy grew at 12.5% last year, after an 11.8% gain in 2005, which would make it one of the world's fastest-growing nations, but critics say the numbers are as phony as those once produced by the Soviet Union. Carmelo Mesa-Lago, a professor emeritus at the University of Pittsburgh, who has long tracked the Cuban economy, says Cuba engages in statistical sleights of hand, such as double-counting entries, changing base years to yield better results and failing to show how it estimates revenue produced by Cuban doctors and other professionals working overseas.

"I don't see anything [in Cuban economic statistics] that would warrant this magic rate of growth," says Mr. Mesa-Lago, who figures the government is probably inflating its growth statistics by at least two-thirds.

Whatever growth Cuba manages owes a lot to Venezuela, which provides it with subsidized oil -- some of which Cuba re-exports -- and employs tens of thousands of Cuban professionals. President Chávez sees himself as an heir to Mr. Castro in leading a bloc opposed to U.S. policies, and earlier this week said he would nationalize his country's largest telecommunications and electric-utility companies, aping Mr. Castro's early moves in his turn to communism.

Even with the aid, most Cubans are able to scrape by only by working in black-market enterprises or because of cash sent by relatives in the U.S. and Europe. The disconnect between the Cuban government's claims and the Cuban's people's bleak living standards may increase popular pressure for change. "The Cuban people can believe that the economy is growing statistically, but it's not growing in their homes," says Rafael Hernández, editor of the magazine "Temas" -- "Issues" in English -- a scholarly quarterly in Havana that writes about the Cuban political-economy and society.

Mr. Hernández says the government should pick up the renovation agenda that Mr. Castro and his brother Raúl, now Cuba's acting president, shut down in 1996 for straying too far from socialist ideology and for potentially undermining political control. At the time, the regime approved agricultural co-ops -- which survive today -- where the state continues to own the land but members own the business and equipment. These entities can sell a portion of their output in farmer's markets at prices higher than those set by the state. Now, Mr. Hernández says the co-ops should be used as a model for other sectors.

Small textile or shoe makers should be able to start co-ops that sell in private markets, he said. Currently, the government permits only families to own such private businesses; a co-op would be able to expand and hire employees outside the family. But under Mr. Hernández's concept, co-op members wouldn't be permitted to sell shares in their venture, which might accelerate capital accumulation. "Co-ops are socialist," he says. "You could do it without violating socialist principles."

Omar Everleny Pérez, a senior researcher at the Center for the Study of the Cuban Economy in Havana, agreed "there should be an increase in the space for the private sector and cooperatives, not only in agriculture, but in other sectors," although he isn't as specific as Mr. Hernández or as confident that change is coming.

Mario González-Corzo, an economist at the City University of New York's Lehman College, says the cooperatives would have to be decentralized and revamped to have much of an economic impact. Currently, the government subsidizes co-ops' purchases of fertilizer, machinery and other goods, and sharply limits how much they can sell privately. Managers have to bargain extensively with government officials to get permission to change prices.

Mr. Monreal, the Cuban international economist, says the island's economy needs a more thorough makeover, along the lines of what China and Vietnam managed. Cuba is deficient in "calculation, motivation and innovation," he says. By that he means Cuba doesn't let markets determine prices, provide enough incentives for firms and enterprises to earn money, or encourage Cubans to take economic risks. Following a China model would require far more decentralization and acceptance of private markets than Cuba has ever permitted.

Even to well-connected Cubans, the direction of the debate is difficult to follow.

'Black-Box Process'

"It's a kind of black-box process," says Mr. Monreal. He views Raúl Castro's decision last month to examine agricultural problems, but to defer any decisions for six months until an economic survey is completed, as a template of how the regime will incorporate changes. The president's brother, who has served for decades as defense minister, has frequently backed economic overhauls and the companies owned by Cuba's armed forces -- including tourism firms, cigar marketers and consumer-goods retailers -- are among the best-managed on the island.

But 76-year-old Raúl lacks his brother's commanding presence, and needs to move cautiously to broaden support. He appears to be trying to do so by allowing the economic debate to proceed. In December, he told university students in Havana that they should debate issues "fearlessly."

Cuban economic history under Fidel Castro is a tale of timid liberalization and retrenchment, with purges of reformers caught taking the wrong positions. During one crackdown in 1996, Mr. Monreal, Mr. Hernández and others were forced out of their jobs. Mr. Hernández said he believes that even if the political winds once again shift against him, "that wouldn't shut down the expressions of opposing views."

It may take Mr. Castro's death -- or at the very least, a public declaration that he is permanently incapacitated -- to give government officials the confidence to institute even modest economic retoolings. Mr. Castro has relentlessly opposed any changes that smack of capitalism, and believes Venezuelan oil subsidies have reduced the island's economic problems and need for market-based incentives.

In the past few years, Mr. Castro has led drives to recentralize the economy and stamp out corruption, which has often meant more repression of Cuba's tiny private sector. For instance, he fired thousands of gas-station attendants he suspected of siphoning off gasoline to sell on the black market, and replaced them with "social workers" -- Cuban youths doing government service. The government has even banned private citizens from starting businesses as masseuses and clowns.

Ortega Returns To Power In Nicaragua (AP)

By Traci Carl, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 10, 2007

Daniel Ortega, who led a Marxist government that spent the 1980s fighting U.S.-backed insurgents, returns to power Wednesday promising to respect free trade and private business and maintain relations with Washington.

Yet he will be sworn in as president in a ceremony attended by some of the United States' biggest enemies, including Venezuela's Hugo Chavez and a representative of Iran.

The inauguration is a reflection of Ortega's delicate balancing act. He has pledged to remain close to his leftist allies while assuring opponents he is no longer the radical who imposed a state-run economy, sparked runaway inflation and fought off a bloody, decade-long rebel movement.

The U.S., which openly opposed Ortega during his presidential campaign, has grudgingly welcomed the president-elect's more moderate stance. On Monday, President Bush called Ortega and said he wanted to put the past aside and strengthen the Central American nation's democracy.

Gordon Johndroe, a White House spokesman, said Bush "expressed his strong commitment to the well-being of the Nicaraguan people and our continued interest in a relationship with Nicaragua."

The U.S. government so despised Ortega during the 1980s that aides to President Reagan secretly sold arms to Iran's radical Islamic government to finance clandestine aid for the Contra rebels who were trying to overthrow Ortega.

Bush's father, who followed Reagan as president, sneeringly described Ortega as "this little man" and as an "unwanted animal at a garden party" when both attended a Central American summit in 1989 — a year before Nicaraguans voted Ortega out of office.

U.S. Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt will head the U.S. delegation at Wednesday's inauguration.

Ortega met privately Tuesday with Leavitt. Chatting amicably together in front of reporters beforehand, Leavitt told Ortega he wanted to "make clear that our desire is to work with you."

Ortega replied that he "hopes that this will be the first of several visits."

But one of the most high-profile guests will be Chavez, Venezuela's socialist president who plans a whirlwind visit with offers of economic and political support for Nicaragua, the second-poorest in the Western Hemisphere after Haiti.

Chavez, who calls Bush "the devil," has promised Nicaragua 32 desperately needed electricity plants, low-interest loans to the poor from a branch of his state development bank and help in improving health and education.

Chavez also will receive an honorary doctorate from Nicaragua's National Engineering University.

Other inauguration guests include Bolivian President Evo Morales, an ally of Chavez and Cuban leader Fidel Castro. Morales has expressed doubts about the U.S. drug war in the Andean region and recently announced that U.S. citizens would have to obtain visas to visit Bolivia. The U.S. is wary of Morales' ties to Chavez and Castro.

Nicaraguan officials earlier said that hardline Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has defied international criticism of his country's nuclear program, also planned to attend.

They later said Ahmadinejad would not be coming, and that a lower-level representative would take his place.

The president-elect has been guarded about the direction his new government will take.

While repeatedly assuring investors he doesn't plan radical changes, he also refused to name most of his Cabinet until inauguration day.

He has made few public comments since the week of his Nov. 5 election, speaking mostly through his wife and spokeswoman, Rosario Murillo.

On Tuesday, he met privately with representatives of South Korea, Saudi Arabia and Japan and planned a dinner for arriving dignitaries.

DOJ_NMG_0114822

Ortega will be sworn in at the Omar Torrijos Nonaligned Plaza, which he constructed as president in the 1980s after his Sandinista movement drove out dictator Anastasio Somoza.

It is the same plaza where Ortega conceded defeat to Violeta Chamorro after losing the presidential election on Feb. 25, 1990.

Ortega's Sandinista party has the largest number of lawmakers in Congress, but it is short of the majority needed to pass legislation on its own.

Analysts speculate he might try to renew his past coalition with the party of former President Arnoldo Aleman, who was convicted in 2003 of money laundering and embezzlement.

During the new Congress' first session Tuesday, lawmakers from all opposition parties repeatedly warned Ortega not to try to return Nicaragua to the dark days of his previous leadership.

"The Sandinistas better not fall victim to the totalitarian temptations of before," warned Wilfredo Navarro of Aleman's party.

In an exclusive interview with The Associated Press, outgoing President Enrique Bolanos predicted Ortega's government would be "as strong as it was in the 1980s."

"It won't be a democracy, because democracy requires divided power," said Bolanos, who was jailed twice under Ortega's previous rule and had much of his property seized. "We will see what happens."

Many of Ortega's opponents had threatened to leave the country if he returned to power, but that hasn't happened. Many seem to be waiting to see what his new government will do.

Private security guard Leonel Zuniga, 32, said he is optimistic Ortega will make good on his promises to help the poor without radical policies.

"If he cuts off ties with the United States, he won't be able to do anything," Zuniga said. "Without their support, the country is paralyzed."

Latest Push To End Doha Talks Welcomed (FT)

By Alan Beattie

Financial Times, January 10, 2007

The transatlantic push to conclude the troubled Doha round of global trade talks got a wary welcome from the head and some members of the World Trade Organisation on Tuesday.

Details of any deal to reconcile the US and European Union positions remain elusive, but Pascal Lamy, director-general of the WTO, said the determination expressed this week by US president George W. Bush and José Manuel Barroso, president of the European Commission, was a marked advance.

Similar expressions of enthusiasm from Mr Bush and other heads of government during the Group of Eight summit in St Petersburg last summer were not followed by concessions at the negotiating table, and the Doha talks were suspended in July amid bitter transatlantic recriminations.

But Mr Lamy said prospects were better. “The signs we are seeing now are qualitatively different from what we heard last year,” he told the Financial Times. “The political chemistry is beginning to work.”

Since last July, Mr Lamy said, “the consequences of failure and the risk of a surge of protectionism have become more evident to governments”. Finance ministers had weighed in after becoming more alarmed at the threat to global growth.

But other participants in the round underlined that details of how US and EU positions would be reconciled were still absent.

Dave Salmonsen, trade lobbyist for the American Farm Bureau, said the mood music sounded better, but the US farm community had not been consulted on any further offers of reductions in tariffs by the EU or subsidies by the US. “There is no difference from where we were in July,” he said. “We need to see a lot more market access from the Europeans in return for reductions in domestic support.”

India, the most sceptical of the countries that could influence the talks, is yet to give its views on the prospect of a revived EU-US deal. The first substantial resistance to a deal will most likely come from Delhi, which is a member of the Doha round’s core group of four negotiating partners along with Brazil, the US and EU.

The Indian commerce ministry, which has repeatedly said it will not expose millions of its small, poor farmers to international competition, declined to comment on Tuesday.

France, which has organised a group of 14 EU member states opposing more cuts in European farm protection, reiterated its position that the US would be unlikely to make the cuts in subsidies required.

One official from a sceptical EU nation questioned Washington's willingness to cut farm subsidies further. "We find it very hard to understand on what basis [EU trade commissioner Peter] Mandelson is so optimistic," the official said. "There is great doubt the US administration can put its money where its mouth is."

But other officials noted that if Germany swung its weight behind a deal, it might overcome opposition from agricultural protectionists in the EU.

Trade Official To Meet With Head Of WTO (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON -- In a fresh sign of the intensifying efforts to revive moribund global trade talks, U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab will travel to Geneva late this week for consultations with Pascal Lamy, head of the World Trade Organization.

The one-day visit Friday follows a series of round-robin discussions Ms. Schwab has held with major players in the so-called Doha Round of talks. In the last two weeks, Ms. Schwab has conferred directly with top trade officials from Brazil, Europe and Japan, and has reached out by telephone to India's lead negotiator. A senior U.S. trade official said the meeting with Mr. Lamy will help lay the groundwork for additional discussions to be held later this month at an international conference in Davos, Switzerland. The official said there have been no breakthroughs, but suggested major players have shown "more willingness" to begin hammering out details.

The WTO is overseeing the Doha Round of talks, which were suspended last summer amid sharp differences over how best to lower barriers to trade in farm products, manufactured goods and services.

The U.S., EU and other major players in the WTO are hoping to resume formal negotiations soon and conclude a deal before President Bush's trade-negotiating authority expires at the end of June. Renewal of that authority, which allows the president to submit trade deals to Congress for approval without amendment, is not considered certain with Democrats now in charge on Capitol Hill.

"People are realizing we're down to brass tacks," the U.S. trade official said.

Separatists Admit To Madrid Airport Attack But Stand By Cease-Fire (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

MADRID, Jan. 9 — The armed Basque separatist organization ETA said Tuesday that the "permanent cease-fire" it announced last March was still in effect, even as it formally claimed responsibility for the deadly bomb attack on Madrid's main airport terminal 10 days ago.

ETA made its two-pronged declaration in a statement sent to Gara, the pro-independence Basque-language newspaper that is often used as a vehicle for ETA communiqués.

"ETA affirms that the permanent cease-fire started on March 24, 2006, still stands," ETA said in a long statement that was summarized by Gara. "It claims responsibility for the attack at Barajas," the Madrid airport. In the wake of the bombing, Spain's Socialist government said it had canceled the peace effort that began with ETA after the cease-fire took effect, arguing that ETA had miscalculated and that violence was incompatible with negotiation.

The view that there could be no truce with violence was reiterated Tuesday by Judge Baltasar Garzón, Spain's most prominent investigative magistrate, who has spent nearly two decades looking into and building criminal cases against terrorist networks in Spain.

"ETA gambled that if there were a terrorist attack, it would strike fear in the government and win concessions," Judge Garzón said in an interview. "We would never give in to that kind of blackmail. ETA terrorists don't seem to understand that. They do not yet accept that they are criminals."

ETA, which the State Department and the European Union have called a terrorist organization, said in its declaration that it had not intended to cause casualties in the attack, which killed two Ecuadoreans and injured about two dozen people. It blamed the Spanish authorities for not properly evacuating the five-story parking garage where it had parked a van full of explosives.

"The aim of that armed action was not to cause victims," the ETA statement said. It added that ETA had made three telephone calls more than an hour before the attack, warning that it was impending, describing the explosives-filled van and giving its location.

ETA also blamed Spain's Socialist government for "placing obstacles" in the democratic process, and asked it to end what ETA called police and political pressure, the statement said.

Prime Minister José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero had made reaching a peace accord with ETA after decades of violence one of his policy priorities. The attack on the parking lot of the state-of-the-art airport not only struck one of the country's most visible signs of progress and modernity but also unleashed a torrent of criticism of Mr. Zapatero by his political enemies, who accused him of weakness and naïveté.

When Mr. Zapatero inaugurated the new terminal — the largest in Europe — with much fanfare early last year, he described it as a "marvel" that reflected Spain's "image of modernity."

Mr. Garzón denied that the attack reflected a failure of intelligence or security by the authorities in Spain or France, where ETA also operates and where the van was stolen. "It's very difficult to put an end to an organization like this that has had infrastructural and logistical support for 40 years," he said.

Before the ETA statement was made public on Tuesday, the police arrested two people suspected of being ETA members in southern France linked to the discovery of arms and explosives before and after the attack. They were the first arrests since the attack, although it was not known whether they had been involved.

Violence Precedes Bangladesh Vote (CSM)

By Mahtab Haider

The Christian Science Monitor, January 10, 2007

DHAKA, BANGLADESH

The democracy that this small South Asian state has struggled to preserve for two decades appears to be facing one of its most severe tests this week.

The streets of the capital resemble a war zone, with police and protesters exchanging volleys of tear-gas shells and Molotov cocktails. Hundreds have been injured just weeks before parliamentary elections scheduled for Jan. 22. On the roads outside Dhaka, transport blockades have nearly shut down the country.

Police action peaked on Tuesday, when officers charged with batons and fired over 50 rounds of tear-gas shells and rubber bullets at protesters, who responded with improvised explosives. Wednesday, 60,000 Army troops plan to fan across the country on routine pre-election duty, but armed with the authority to arrest anyone without a warrant.

At the heart of the violent street clashes is a struggle for power between the country's two major political parties, the Awami League and the Bangladesh National Party (BNP), over the upcoming elections.

Attempts to reconcile the two groups have so far failed, leading analysts to suggest that the violent political crisis may deepen in coming months. Although Bangladesh has seen four elections since democracy was restored here in 1991, experts say the Awami League and the BNP seem are undermining its fragile democracy by politicizing the judiciary, the bureaucracy, and the civil society institutions that can ensure fair elections.

The Awami League is leading a grand alliance to boycott the polls, accusing their BNP archrivals of rigging the voter list with phantom names during their five-year tenure, which ended in Oct. 2006.

Last month, a study by the Washington-based National Democratic Institute for International Affairs (NDI) reported that the voter rolls have approximately 12.2 million names that are either "errors or duplicates."

"A voters list containing [only] two-thirds of the population strains credibility," says Owen Lippert, the NDI's representative in Bangladesh.

DOJ_NMG_0114825

The League and its allies also claim that the BNP and its coalition partners, the religious, right-wing Jamaat-e-Islami, have planted party bureaucrats in the country's Election Commission and in the pre-election interim government that Bangladesh's constitution has empowered to run the nation.

The League demands that the elections be deferred until there is a fresh voter list and the interim government's chief resigns - a request that the BNP has threatened to resist at all costs. The League has already announced that it is forming nationwide election-resistance committees to scupper the vote.

"The problem is that the Constitution states that elections must be held within 90 days of the caretaker government assuming power, but it also states that a finalized voter list must be published as a pre-condition to elections," says Shahdeen Malik, a Supreme Court attorney who heads the School of Law at Dhaka's BRAC University.

The Awami League and its allies insist that polls must be delayed to correct and update the voter list, while the BNP has threatened agitation if the caretaker government does not hold the elections within the stipulated 90 days.

Because the caretaker government assumed power from the BNP on Oct. 28, 2006, the 90-day limit will expire on Jan. 25.

"Even if the current crisis is resolved through mediation, we will continue to witness a slow degradation of democracy in the years to come, as none of these parties have any respect for democratic culture," says Dr. Ataur Rahman, a political analyst and professor of political science at Dhaka University.

"It is the invasion of politics by big business that is at the heart of our political crisis," says Mr. Malik. "Both parties now have scores of powerful businessmen in their ranks who look forward to lucrative deals during a tenure in power."

Analysts point to the two parties' efforts to win the loyalty of the popular former dictator H.M. Ershad, whose influence is still far-reaching. Mr. Ershad is accused of having stolen tens of millions of dollars in state funds through crony contracts and downright theft. After he was ousted in 1991, the government filed a slew of charges against him.

While the BNP was in power, it dropped a number of corruption charges against Ershad to win his political support. When Ershad switched his loyalty to the Awami League, however, the BNP-run judiciary resumed proceedings against Ershad, which disqualified him from participating in the upcoming polls.

Although the Awami League had accepted the initial voter list and submitted its nominations to the election commission in December, it changed its position a week later. The League accused the BNP of leaning on the judiciary to resume proceedings.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Democrats In House Push Through Anti-terror Package (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, January 10, 2007

In their first piece of legislation since assuming control of the House of Representatives for the first time in 12 years, Democrats on Tuesday pushed through sweeping homeland security requirements.

Their bill aims to tighten security at ports and on airplanes, improve emergency planning and prevent future terrorism. It passed 299-128.

"The terrorist threat has not diminished five years after 9/11," said Carie Lemack, a security activist whose mother died in the 2001 terrorist attacks.

The House vote fulfilled a campaign promise by Democrats to enact recommendations made three years ago by the commission that investigated 9/11. "The 9/11 Commission gave us a blueprint for better security, which was not meant to sit on a shelf and collect dust," Rep. Carolyn Maloney, D-N.Y., said.

Some Republicans complained that the bill, which is expected to be considered in the Senate in the next month, was rammed through the House with little debate and no input from them. Others said it would be impossible to implement.

Rep. Jerry Lewis, R-Calif., former chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, chided Democrats for passing a bill "without any indication as to where the money might be coming from." He said "tens of billions of dollars" would be needed, meaning the bill amounted to "a statement of policy that is little more than a press release."

Here are six provisions and their potential impact:

House Passes Security Bill; Senate Stance Is Uncertain (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 — Delivering on a major campaign promise, House Democrats used their new majority Tuesday to push through a bill that would write into law several remaining recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission.

The measure includes more than a dozen initiatives like tightening cargo security and distributing antiterrorism grants based more on risk rather than on a political formula.

The vote put Republicans in a difficult spot. They opposed major elements of the bill, saying they went beyond panel recommendations and would be prohibitively expensive without significantly aiding security.

But after failing to delay action on the bill, many Republicans felt they had no choice but to vote in favor of it — and 68 did. The measure passed 299 to 128.

House Democrats said the rapid vote reflected their commitment to eliminating important vulnerabilities that remain in the nation's antiterrorism programs.

"Our first and highest responsibility as members of this Congress is to protect the American people, defend our homeland and strengthen national security," said Representative Steny H. Hoyer, Democrat of Maryland and the House majority leader.

The effort faces an uncertain future in the Senate, as some Democrats have expressed concerns that the bill's mandate on inspecting ship containers may be unreasonable. The bill says that before any United States-bound ship container leaves an overseas port, it must be checked for radioactive material that could be used to build weapons.

The Bush administration also opposes major parts of the bill.

The legislation includes no formal estimate of its cost, but it clearly would be in the billions of dollars.

One of its most far-reaching provisions would require that all air cargo on passenger jets be inspected for explosives; now only high-risk shipments are inspected.

The bill also calls for the United States to develop, with other nations, an agreement on how to handle detainees of the Iraq war or counterterrorism efforts, and for creation of a new federal coordinator of efforts to prevent the spread of unconventional weapons.

And it would require that Transportation Security Administration workers be subject to the same labor rules as other federal workers, perhaps allowing them to unionize.

Republicans said that 39 of the commission's 41 recommendations had already been adopted — a claim Democrats do not accept. They also said that many of the bill's provisions did not reflect changes explicitly called for by the panel.

"I hope the 9/11 families do not give you a pass on this," said Representative Phil Gingrey, Republican of Georgia, who called the bill an overtly political measure.

But the Democrats called each section essential. "Hurricanes Katrina and Rita reminded us all again how unprepared we all are to deal with catastrophe whether caused by nature or terrorist attack," said Representative Bill Pascrell Jr., Democrat of New Jersey.

Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, independent of Connecticut, who held a hearing Tuesday as the Senate prepared for its version of this bill, noted that one major recommendation — not in the House measure — was strengthening Congressional oversight of intelligence and counterterrorism efforts. "We found it a lot easier to reform the rest of the government than we did to reform ourselves post-9/11," Mr. Lieberman said. "That's unfinished work."

House Passes Anti-terror Legislation (AP)

By David Espo

AP, January 10, 2007

Anti-terror legislation sailed through the House on Tuesday, the first in a string of measures designed to fulfill campaign promises made by Democrats last fall.

Patterned on recommendations of the commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks, the far-reaching measure includes commitments for inspection of all cargo carried aboard passenger aircraft and on ships bound for the United States.

The vote was a bipartisan 299-128, and Speaker Nancy Pelosi took the rostrum to announce the passage of the first legislation to clear under the new Democratic majority.

Democrats said the bill's passage was a top priority.

"Our first and highest duty as members of this Congress is to protect the American people, to defend our homeland and to strengthen our national security," said Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md.

Several Republicans criticized the legislation as little more than political posturing in the early hours of a new Democratic-controlled Congress. Democrats want to "look aggressive on homeland security. This bill will waste billions of dollars, and possibly harm homeland security by gumming up progress already under way," said Rep. Hal Rogers, R-Ky.

In a written statement, the Bush administration listed several objections and said it could not support the measure as drafted, but stopped short of a veto threat.

Democrats have pledged to make fiscal responsibility a priority in the new Congress, but they advanced the bill — their first of the year — without even a bare-bones accounting of the estimated cost. The funding will require follow-up legislation.

Legislation introduced in the Senate a year ago to implement the recommendations of the 9/11 commission had a price tag of more than $53 billion over five years.

The terrorism legislation is the first of six measures the House is expected to pass in its first 100 hours in session under Democratic control.

Next up is an increase in the minimum wage — set for passage on Wednesday — followed by relaxation of the limits on stem cell research conducted with federal funds and a measure directing the administration to negotiate with drug companies for lower prices for Medicare recipients.

Next week, the Democrats intend to clear legislation to cut the interest rate on student loans and to curtail tax breaks for the energy industry.

Each of the six bills would go to the Senate, and it could be months — if then — before they reach the White House.

Already, President Bush has signaled he would veto the stem cell bill, which is opposed by abortion foes. House supporters of the measure conceded at a news conference during the day that they do not have the two-thirds support needed to override a veto.

Depending on the outcome of that struggle, said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., "400,000 embryos will either be wasted or utilized to cure a disease."

The House labored over the terrorism bill as the Senate began work on legislation enacting stricter ethics rules — and Democrats continued to gain from last fall's elections.

Officials said that four of Bush's controversial appeals court appointees, their chances for confirmation doomed in the Democratic-controlled Senate, would not be renominated.

The four are William Haynes, William Myers, Terrence Boyle and Michael Wallace, all of whom were prevented from coming to votes last year when the Senate was under Republican control.

"The president is disappointed in this inaction and hopes that the days of judicial obstructionism are beyond us," said Dana Perino, deputy White House spokeswoman.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., saw it differently. "Democrats stand ready to work with the administration to confirm judges who are not extremists, either left or right," he said.

In the House, passage of the anti-terror bill coincided with an email from the Democratic campaign committee touting the party's agenda for its first 100 hours in power, and asking for a contribution for the 2008 elections.

Democrats said the bill would enact virtually all of the unfulfilled recommendations of the 9/11 commission, and several members of the rank and file remarked that Republicans had failed to do so in five years since planes slammed into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon and scarred the Pennsylvanian countryside.

"Don't be fooled by those who say that this bill is moving too quickly," said Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss. "It has been five years since 9/11. It has been three years since the 9/11 commission issued its report."

"The fact is that the bipartisan 9/11 commission gave the last Congress F's and D's in implementing its recommendations," said Rep. Jim Moran, D-Va. "This Congress is determined to earn its A's in implementing its recommendations."

Rep. John Mica, R-Fla., noted disapprovingly that screeners at the Transportation Security Agency would receive collective bargaining rights under the bill.

And Rep. Peter King, R-N.Y., said the measure "gives false hope to the American people" because technology for scanning all cargo containers is not yet available.

The legislation directs the Homeland Security Department to establish a system for inspecting all cargo carried on passenger aircraft over the next three years. It also requires scanning of all containers bound for the U.S., using the best available technology. Large ports would be given three years to comply, smaller ports five years.

While much of the debate revolved around the provisions dealing with cargo, the bill also requires the government to take the risk of terror attacks into greater account when distributing homeland security grants to the 50 states.

The measure also would centralize the government's efforts at preventing nuclear weapons from falling into the hands of terrorists and would take steps to disrupt the black market for nuclear material.

"We will not be safe here as long as the worst weapons can fall into the worst hands," said Rep. Rick Larsen, D-Wash.

The measure also establishes a new program of grants to make sure local governments can communicate effectively in the event of a crisis.

One of the tragedies of 9/11 was the deaths of New York firefighters who were trapped inside the World Trade Center and could not hear urgent warnings to evacuate that were broadcast on police radios.

A companion measure, to establish a new House subcommittee with jurisdiction over intelligence matters, cleared on a vote of 239-188.

House OKs Reforms Urged By 9/11 Panel (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

House Democrats yesterday passed a bill that strengthens the homeland security reforms recommended by the September 11 commission, but Republicans said the legislation could undermine a program designed to slow the proliferation of technology used to make weapons of mass destruction.

The bill, which passed by a vote of 299-128, would increase the role of the United Nations in the Proliferation Security Initiative by asking the world body to force countries to agree to searches and seizures of ships and aircraft for the technology.

Republicans called the proposal, which would let the United Nations define what is permitted under the initiative, "unrealistic and dangerous."

"It will result in the imposition of unpredictable limitations, conditions and interpretations, and result in a regulatory straightjacket overseen by an international bureaucracy," said Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, Florida Republican and ranking member on the House International Relations Committee.

The proliferation initiative announced by President Bush in 2003 is a voluntary working group of more than 70 countries investigating and stopping the trade and acquisition of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons technology by terrorists and rogue states. The member countries also interdict ships and aircraft that carry such materials.

Democrats dismissed the Republicans' assertions, saying the bill strengthens the initiative because international law does not allow seizures and impoundments in international waters, or in the territorial waters or airspace of nonmember countries.

"This bill has nothing to do with the United Nations. It simply says that you have to screen ships abroad before they leave port for nuclear and biological weapons materials and seal them abroad before they can leave," said Rep. Jerrold Nadler, New York Democrat.

Republicans said they expect the provision to be stricken when the Senate begins to consider the bill later this year.

Passage of the legislation posed Democrats' first test of the president to see how far they can go on homeland security matters, about which he largely had a free hand under the Republican-led Congress.

In a statement of administration policy, which usually consists of a dry list of approvals and disapprovals, the White House took a shot at the Democrats.

"The Administration is disappointed that, in a nearly 300-page piece of legislation entitled 'Implementing the 9/11 Commission Recommendations Act of 2007,' Congress does not address the two outstanding recommendations that apply to the Legislative Branch, which the 9/11 Commission states may be among the most important of all," the White House said yesterday.

The bill neither reduces the number of congressional committees with oversight and spending authorization over homeland security matters nor does it do the same for intelligence matters, both steps the September 11 commission has suggested.

However, the White House did not say whether it would veto the bill, and the statement supported those parts that increase the percentage of homeland security grant funding allocated on the basis of risk.

But the administration opposes portions of the bill that call for 100 percent screening of plane cargo within four years and ship cargo within five years, because the necessary technology does not exist. It also said the costs would be exorbitant, adding billions of dollars to the federal budget each year.

Democrats say their bill addresses the September 11 panel's concern about congressional duplication by creating a hybrid subcommittee of members of the appropriations and intelligence panels to oversee intelligence spending. The House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence will continue to oversee intelligence operations, possibly with the hybrid subcommittee.

But Republicans scoffed at the plan and any notion that it reduces the bureaucracy that led to poor oversight of the various homeland security and intelligence agencies.

"We enacted 39 of the 41 recommendations the commission sent to us, so that means the other two were not good ideas," said House Minority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican. "Democrats are not doing it because they don't think it is a good idea. They just don't want to admit it."

Family members of victims of the September 11 attacks said they were disappointed that those recommendations would not be enacted but supported the legislation as a continuing effort to protect Americans from terrorism.

"We do think that Congress has to reform itself in the intelligence and homeland security oversight; the process has to be streamlined, but we will continue the fight," said Carie Lemack, president of Families of September 11 Inc.

House Passes Bill To Implement More Of 9/11 Panel's Suggestions (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

In a lopsided vote that masked underlying divisions, House Democrats approved legislation yesterday to implement many of the remaining recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission even as portions of the sprawling package faced immediate problems in the Senate.

Voting 299 to 128, congressional Democrats, backed by scores of Republicans, delivered on a key part of their "100 hours" agenda. The nearly 300-page anti-terrorism measure sets new mandates to scrutinize air- and ship-borne cargo, send more federal aid to areas at the greatest risk of terrorism, improve emergency communications, fight nuclear proliferation overseas, and strengthen a civil liberties watchdog board.

But critics questioned the cost and feasibility of new cargo requirements -- raising issues that helped stall action by the previous, Republican-controlled Congress -- and industry and the Department of Homeland Security added their opposition. The greatest skepticism focused on requirements in the House bill that airlines be able to physically inspect 100 percent of cargo put aboard passenger planes within three years and that shippers scan 100 percent of U.S.-bound cargo for radiation at overseas ports within five years.

The bill's biggest detractor, or patron, could be Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), who chairs the Senate's Homeland Security panel and who held his own hearing yesterday. He stopped short of promising -- as House leaders had -- to implement all remaining recommendations of the commission that investigated the 2001 terrorist attacks.

Lieberman said that he hopes by month's end, as requested by Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), to draft and pass a Senate bill "that will take steps forward to adopt some of the unadopted, unimplemented or inadequately implemented parts" of proposals recommended in 2004 by the bipartisan commission.

Just four months ago the Senate rejected mandatory scanning overseas for nuclear and shielding material of 11 million shipping containers sent to U.S. ports every year.

Fifty-six of the chamber's members, including seven Democrats, voted to kill a requirement to scan all such containers by 2010 as part of broader port-security legislation, concluding that existing technology could not do the job without crippling the flow of commerce.

That claim was repeated this week by major industry lobbies, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Retail Industry Leaders Association, which warned that unilateral action by the administration could lead to retaliation by trading partners and disruption, with little added security.

Instead, the Homeland Security and Energy departments last month announced a congressionally required pilot program to spend $60 million to scan 7 percent of U.S.-bound cargo originating from six ports by year's end. The program would start with ports in Pakistan, South Korea and Britain, with a goal of eventually expanding to 30 percent of U.S.-bound cargo. Scanning 100 percent of cargo would involve about 700 ports worldwide.

Other provisions of the House bill also carry a big price tag, which House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has said she expects airlines and shippers to help fund. For example, inspecting all cargo placed aboard passenger aircraft by 2009 could cost $3.6 billion to $6 billion for equipment, installation and screening personnel, the Congressional Research Service and the Transportation Security Administration estimate, House Republican officials said.

The Bush administration also formally opposed several elements of the House bill, saying in a statement that it could not support the measure as drafted, but stopping short of a veto threat.

David Schanzer, who was Democratic staff director and chief counsel of the House Homeland Security Committee from 2003 to 2005, criticized major portions of the House bill as "aspirational" rather than substantive. He warned that the new Democratic majority will find it difficult to find billions for promised tax changes, homeland security measures and the ongoing war in Iraq.

"Democrats have put a lot of spending priorities on the table," Schanzer said. "Where this is going to fit in them will tell a lot.

Seth M.M. Stodder, former director of policy and planning for U.S. Customs and Border Protection, said the Senate will be a key battleground between the administration and more aggressive House Democrats. Stodder said he thinks Lieberman, Commerce Committee Chairman Daniel K. Inouye (D-Alaska) and ranking Republicans will play decisive roles.

Separately yesterday, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff announced $445 million in new grants to secure ports, transit systems, vital facilities such as chemical and power plants, and bus and trucking lines. The total is $46 million more than last year. The Washington-Baltimore area will receive $18.3 million in transit aid.

Also yesterday, the House voted 239 to 188 to create an Appropriations subcommittee to increase oversight of intelligence spending.

House Votes To Enact More 9/11 Panel Points (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON — The House passed a broad domestic security bill Tuesday that requires all cargo on U.S.-bound ships and passenger planes to be scanned for explosives, expands programs to track weapons of mass destruction and bolsters intelligence gathering along the border.

The bill, which implements many of the recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission, is the first in the 100-hour legislative drive spearheaded by Democratic Speaker Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco.

It passed 299-128, with 68 Republicans joining Democrats.

While it could bolster the Democratic Party's national security credentials, it could also fall short of its aims. Democrats did not designate funding for most of the costly initiatives, and critics also charge that some of them are impractical.

Industry groups and the Bush administration objected to the requirement that within three years all shipping cargo arriving in the U.S. from major overseas ports be scanned. Republicans complained about the lack of hearings on the 279-page bill, and Democratic allies in the Senate questioned whether it is too ambitious.

House Democrats defended the legislation, which is based on and sometimes exceeds suggestions by the bipartisan panel that examined the response to the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11. That report was issued in July 2004.

"Don't be fooled by those who say this bill moves too quickly," said Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), the chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee. Criticizing Republican inaction on some of the Sept. 11 commission recommendations, Thompson cited an Irish proverb.

"You have never plowed a field, if you've only turned it over in your mind," he said. "It's been five years since 9/11, three years since the 9/11 recommendations. Now it's time to plow the field."

About half of the recommendations were enacted under the Republican-controlled Congress, but the commission has given Congress and the administration a slew of failing grades for its performance on implementing its reforms.

The House also passed a resolution to create a panel to monitor intelligence spending, which Republicans criticized as adding unnecessary bureaucracy without improving oversight.

"While the 9/11 commission recommended one committee, we will have three committees. As far as I can tell, their only job will be to write a report and give it to themselves," said Rep. David Dreier (R-San Dimas), who led the Republican side of the debate with several feisty denunciations of the Democrats' decision not to hold hearings.

The intelligence panel resolution, which passed 239 to 188, with the support of just eight Republicans, does not follow the Sept. 11 commission's recommendation to combine the committee that authorizes intelligence spending with the one that appropriates the funds. But Pelosi said the creation of the new panel was a step in that direction.

"We have to show that this panel that we're putting together can do the job," Pelosi said. "To the extent that we can reduce the number of auspices under which the intelligence community has to come to Congress, we have to move in that direction."

Pelosi glossed over the issue of funding the programs authorized in the domestic security bill when she discussed it. The bill contains only one authorization — for an airport checkpoint screening fund that will get $250 million in 2008.

"I would have probably wanted to put some money there," Thompson said, "but in the spirit of let's get it done, we'll work it out." The bill, H.R. 1, is the first in a series that Democrats plan to pass in their 100-hour agenda before the president's State of the Union speech later this month. Today, they will take up a bill to increase the minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour.

As lawmakers debated the domestic security measure, the administration issued a statement declaring it "cannot support … the bill in its current form."

While the White House lauded a proposal to make risk a greater part of the criteria for allocating about $2 billion for state and local domestic security grants, it objected to the creation of a new grant program for local law enforcement to participate in border-state centers that would concentrate federal, state and local intelligence gathering.

The administration opposed a measure that would greatly empower a civil liberties oversight board that has been criticized as ineffectual. The panel was established two years ago under White House control as a check on executive power in the war on terrorism. The legislation would create a new independent agency with the power to subpoena testimony and documents.

And the administration argued against a section recommending that the U.S. develop with allies a common approach toward detainees and suspected terrorists, dismissing it as unnecessary and unconstitutional.

One controversial measure would require screening all shipping containers coming from foreign ports within five years, with larger ports obliged to meet that deadline in three years. American inspectors would scan and seal every container loaded onto U.S.-bound ships, then provide the Department of Homeland Security with copies of the scans.

Republicans debated instituting overseas scanning of all cargo under the 2006 SAFE Port Act but decided to conduct pilot projects first, an approach that industry groups support.

At the Port of Long Beach, which receives 3 million to 4 million foreign containers annually, spokesman Art Wong questioned the practicality of the proposal.

"People in Washington need some perspective on how big this would be," Wong said. "Each person scanning — how long would it take? Who would pay for the equipment to do this, and how many people would it take to get done? Would overseas ports even allow us to have Americans doing inspections? Would it be disruptive to trade?"

Administration officials also questioned the potential cost. "Risk management does not mean risk elimination, which would cost billions upon billions of dollars to implement, disrupt the flow of commerce and quite possibly shut down our ports," said Russ Knocke, a Homeland Security spokesman.

He said that all elevated-risk cargo has been screened since October.

Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.), chairman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, indicated that he was cool to the idea of screening all shipping containers. "We're going to look at it," he said. "But it's not practical to impose it immediately."

The bill contains a similar proposal to screen all cargo placed on passenger planes within three years — at an estimated cost of $3.6 billion for the next decade.

"There needs to be a hearing to make sure they don't unnecessarily place a burden on the airline industry that would accomplish the objectives of security but wouldn't allow the airlines to survive," said Asa Hutchison, a former Homeland Security undersecretary.

Despite the criticism, 9/11 commission co-chairman Lee H. Hamilton, a former Democratic congressman from Indiana, spoke in firm support of the bill. "The bottom line is … that if this bill, H.R. 1, is enacted, funded and implemented, then the American people will be safer."

Miss. Grad Student Headed Terrorist Group, Prosecutor Says (AP)

By Mike Robinson

CHICAGO - A graduate student living in Mississippi was an important Hamas terrorist leader directing thousands of dollars to families of members who were jailed or killed, a prosecutor said Tuesday.

"He's Hamas and he's assisting the murderous terrorist activities of Hamas," Assistant U.S. Attorney Joseph M. Ferguson told jurors in his closing argument, pointing at defendant Abdelhaleem Ashqar, who was a graduate student at the University of Mississippi in the early 1990s.

Ashqar, 48, later an assistant professor of business at Washington's Howard University, is accused along with former Chicago grocer Muhammad Salah, 53, of being high-ranking members of the Hamas terrorist network.

The two men are charged in a racketeering indictment with funneling thousands of dollars and fresh recruits to the anti-Israeli organization.

In the second day of his closing argument, Ferguson was warned as he headed toward the 10-hour mark that he would have to wrap it up by the end of the day.

"I will," Ferguson said. "I don't want to do this tomorrow."

"You won't be allowed to," St. Eve, a former colleague of Ferguson's in the U.S. attorney's office in Chicago, said with a smile.

Ashqar, of Springfield, Va., does not support terrorism and has done nothing illegal, according to his defense attorney, William Moffitt. Moffitt says Ashqar merely was trying to get charitable contributions to poverty-plagued Palestinians on the West Bank under Israeli army occupation.

Moffitt is likely to get his chance Wednesday to address jurors, who have listened during a three-month trial to witnesses that have included an expert on torture and Israeli agents who testified under aliases.

Salah was arrested in January 1993 while in Israel and served almost five years in prison. Police confiscated $97,400 they say was meant to bankroll Hamas terrorism and he says was for charity.

Ashqar, then a graduate student in business at the University of Mississippi, was briefed on statements Salah made to Israel's Shin Bet security service. The briefing came from a Salah traveling companion who also was arrested and released after six months.

Ashqar summarized in writing what he learned from the Salah companion. Ferguson pointed to testimony that the written material, found among documents in Ashqar's home, was signed with an alias.

"There is only one reason for Ashqar signing that report with an alias - Ashqar is Hamas," Ferguson told the jury.

When asked by a federal grand jury in Chicago if he was Hamas, Ashqar refused to answer.

Ferguson pointed to testimony that Ashqar directed money to families of Hamas "martyrs" killed in terrorist operations and those captured and jailed by Israeli authorities.

"We're talking about someone who is a graduate student at the University of Mississippi, Oxford, Miss., and you see hundreds of thousands of dollars coursing through his accounts," Ferguson said.

While living in Oxford, Ashqar had a telephone in a bogus name and a fax in a different alias, Ferguson said. "He was concealing his name because he was aiding Hamas," the prosecutor said.

Federal agents found that Ashqar spoke on his telephone 568 times in several years with Mousa Abu Marzook, an alleged top Hamas leader who also is charged in the case and is a fugitive believed living in Damascus, Syria.

Ferguson also pointed to testimony that Ashqar served as an archivist, keeping extensive file of Hamas-related documents involving matters ranging from electronic jamming equipment to terrorist operations to so-called dead drops used by spies to pass documents without getting caught.

Ferguson traced a series of steps through which money to bankroll Hamas terrorists allegedly was collected by Marzook in Europe and the Mideast, funneled through accounts controlled by Marzook and associates and then sent to Salah and Ashqar in the United States.

From here it allegedly was transferred to the Mideast and turned into cash allegedly distributed to Hamas operatives.

"Abdelhaleem Ashqar is a conduit himself and directed others to steer money to the military operations of Hamas in Israel," Ferguson said.

3 Relatives Of Plotter Are Held By Officials (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

The parents and sister of a man convicted of conspiring to bomb the Herald Square subway station were detained yesterday by federal immigration authorities, who have been seeking to deport them to Pakistan.

The arrests came a day after the convicted man, Shahawar Matin Siraj, 24, was sentenced in United States District Court in Brooklyn to 30 years in prison.

The family, who came to the United States in 1999, had been seeking asylum since 2003, citing religious persecution in their home country.

A spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement said that Mr. Siraj's father, Siraj Abdul Rehman, 54, was arrested because a final deportation order had been filed against him. But a lawyer for the family said his case was still under appeal.

The agency spokesman, Mark Thorn, said that the man's mother, Shahina Parveen, 50, and his sister, Sanya Siraj, 19, were arrested and detained on immigration violations.

Mr. Thorn said that the mother and daughter would be given due process and that their cases would be heard by an immigration judge. He said he could provide no more information, because it was the agency's policy not to discuss case details. Mr. Thorn could not explain why the action was taken yesterday, other than to say that the detention was part of an administrative process and that criminal cases take priority over administrative ones. It was unclear why the criminal case against Mr. Siraj would have delayed the detentions.

The lawyer for the family, Mona Shah, disputed that a final order of removal had been entered against Mr. Rehman. She said he still has an appeal pending before the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

"It's absolutely disgusting that they've picked him up under the guise of a deportation order," Ms. Shah said yesterday. "Fine, punish the son. But why punish them like this?"

She could not offer an explanation for the timing of the move, but suggested that it might stem from pressure on the authorities because the family's immigration status was cited in news reports about Mr. Siraj's case.

The immigration status of Mr. Rehman's wife and daughter hinge on his asylum case, Ms. Shah said. All three were picked up at their home in Jackson Heights, Queens, early yesterday morning. Mr. Thorn said they will be held at an Immigration and Customs Enforcement facility in Elizabeth, N.J.

Mr. Siraj, who was convicted on May 24 of conspiring to place an explosive device in the Herald Square subway station in 2004, had also filed for asylum on the same grounds as his father, religious persecution.

Ms. Shah said that all members of the family are Ismaili Muslims, a sect that she said has been mistreated in Pakistan. She said family members had been robbed and attacked several times. "They would be subject to torture and harassment if they returned," she said.

But prosecutors during Mr. Siraj's trial in the bomb plot suggested that he had lied to immigration authorities in his asylum request. They cited his own testimony in an earlier hearing, when he had first told immigration authorities that he did not fear harm if he returned to his native Pakistan. But later, in Mr. Siraj's asylum application, prosecutors pointed out that he said he was afraid.

Also, on tapes secretly recorded by a police informer and played at his trial, he said he had no fear of returning to Pakistan and spoke about influential family members who served as judges and magistrates. He also said he had rich and influential friends and friends on the police force.

He was recorded telling the informer that he planned to conduct surveillance of the subway station tied to his bomb plot immediately after attending an immigration hearing in Lower Manhattan. Testimony also showed that he had discussed entering into a marriage only to get citizenship.

Ms. Shah acknowledged that immigration authorities have some discretion about how to proceed and whether to detain people whose cases are pending, but she was bothered by yesterday's arrests.

"They're not supposed to detain halfway through a case," she said, calling the action "an absolute uneven use" of the discretion.

"You do not give someone the freedom of being not detained and then suddenly pick them up," she said.

Lawyer Quits In Italy CIA Case (WT/AP)

By Colleen Barry

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

MILAN, Italy -- A lawyer for a CIA agent accused in the 2003 kidnapping of an Egyptian cleric in Milan withdrew from the case shortly after a court opened hearings yesterday on whether to indict him and 25 other Americans.

Five Italian secret service officials also are facing indictment in the case that highlights the CIA's purported extraordinary rendition program, in which terrorism suspects are transferred to third countries where critics say they may face torture.

Shortly after the proceedings began, the attorney for Robert Seldon Lady withdrew from the case, saying the former CIA station chief did not want to cooperate.

"Robert Seldon Lady says that this case should have had a political solution and not a judicial solution," attorney Daria Pesce said. "The Italian government could have decided it was a state secret -- remember, this was a terror suspect. It would have been possible if the Italian government had had the courage to reach an agreement with the U.S. government."

Prosecutors say the operation was a breach of Italian sovereignty that compromised their own anti-terrorism efforts.

None of the defendants attended the closed session, which lasted about three hours and ended without a decision. The next hearing was scheduled for Jan. 29.

Mr. Lady was the only American who had hired a lawyer rather than have a court-appointed one. He was still in Italy when the case broke, and owns a home in Italy that was searched by police.

Miss Pesce, who met with Mr. Lady four or five times in the United States, mostly recently in September, said the court had already appointed a new lawyer for him.

All but one of the Americans have been identified by the prosecution as CIA agents, including former station chiefs in Rome and Milan, and the 26th as a U.S. Air Force officer stationed at the time at Aviano Air Base near Venice. The Italians include the former head of Italian military intelligence, Nicolo Pollari.

In Italy, defendants are not required to attend preliminary hearings, or even trials. Prosecutor Armando Spataro has asked Romano Prodi's center-left government to seek the extradition of the American suspects, but there has been no response. The previous prime minister, conservative Silvio Berlusconi, who was a close ally of President Bush, refused.

Mr. Pollari's defense lawyers said yesterday they intend in the next session to try to add both Mr. Prodi and Mr. Berlusconi to the witness stand, as well as their respective defense ministers.

Even if the request were made -- a move bound to irritate U.S.-Italian relations -- it was unlikely that the CIA agents would be turned over for trial abroad.

The CIA has refused to comment on the case.

Mr. Spataro has entered into evidence a handwritten letter by Osama Moustafa Hassan Nasr, describing his abduction from a Milan street on Feb. 17, 2003, and his journey, blindfolded and bound, to Egypt, where he said he had been left in an underground cell, repeatedly tortured and threatened with rape.

Britain To E-Mail Terror Threat Alerts (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

LONDON, Jan. 9 -- The British government is offering an e-mail bulletin service to notify people of changes to the nation's terror threat level, a development that illustrates increasing fears of extremist attacks in Britain and the rising power of digital communications.

The domestic security agency, MI5, announced the new service Tuesday and said it will also provide e-mail bulletins on "major developments in national security affairs." It plans to add a service providing the same information in text messages to cellphones, officials said. People would have to register on the MI5 Web site to receive the alerts.

"It is important that we are as open as possible with the general public about security matters," said Phyllis Starkey, a member of Parliament from Prime Minister Tony Blair's Labor Party.

Britain began disclosing the terror threat level to the public only last August, following government inquiries into the official handling of the July 2005 attacks on London's public transit system. After those attacks, in which 52 passengers and four bombers were killed and about 700 people injured, investigators concluded that the government did a poor job of communicating with the public about potential security threats.

In August, the government began posting the threat level on the MI5 Web site and a new government Web site (http://www.intelligence.gov.uk) set up to disseminate information about security matters. The new system was used that month for the first time when officials uncovered an alleged plot to blow up jetliners flying from Britain to the United States. The threat level was increased from severe, which means an attack is highly likely, to critical, which means an attack is expected imminently.

Although the threat has since been reduced again to severe, British officials continue to warn that religious extremists are aggressively plotting new attacks in Britain. In November, the head of MI5, Eliza Manningham-Buller, said in an unusual public speech that the agency was monitoring 30 potential terrorist plots involving more than 200 radical groups and 1,600 suspects who were "actively engaged in plotting or facilitating terrorist acts."

Last month, Home Secretary John Reid warned that a terrorist attack in Britain was "highly likely" during the Christmas holidays. None occurred.

Starkey said the widespread use of computers and cellphones allows the government to communicate information about potential threats far faster now. She recalled the days when the government placed posters in public places asking people to be vigilant for activity by the Irish Republican Army.

"This is a rather more effective technology," she said. "And if individuals are aware of an imminent threat, they are more likely to notice odd behavior. They are added eyes and ears for the security services."

But Starkey acknowledged that the government was also battling a "significant level of cynicism" among the public and that many people believe the government could manipulate the terror threat level for political purposes. Many Britons believe the U.S. government has used threat alerts to scare the public for political gain, she said.

"That's only added to the problem here," she said, "because it makes people in this country think our government is going down the same route."

Patrick Mercer, a Conservative member of Parliament who specializes in security issues, said the new system was "sensible" but needed improvements.

"The problem is that the only sort of people who are going to get this are big security corporations and security wonks like me," he said. "Mr. and Mrs. John Doe are not going to go on the MI5 Web site and register for this."

For a terror alert system to work efficiently, he suggested, "we've got to learn from the American model." In addition to e-mail alerts, he said, the threat level should be indicated on highway signs and broadcast on television and radio, and government Web sites and publications should also offer more specific warnings about key bridges, tunnels and other potential targets during extremely high alerts.

"All this says," he said of MI5's new system, "is: 'Terrorism is dangerous. Be afraid. Be very afraid.' "

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Man Accused Of Plotting Illinois Mall Attack Pleads Not Guilty (FINDLAW/AP)

By Megan Reichgott, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 10, 2007

(AP) - CHICAGO-A 22-year-old Muslim convert accused by U.S. authorities of being willing to commit acts of "violent jihad" pleaded not guilty Tuesday to charges that he planned an attack at a shopping mall.

"I feel well," Derrick Shareef said at his arraignment. He told U.S. District Judge David Coar he had never been hospitalized for psychiatric treatment.

Shareef was arrested Dec. 6 after allegedly meeting an undercover agent to trade stereo speakers for a pistol and four grenades.

He planned to "commit acts of violent jihad" by blowing up garbage cans at the mall during the Christmas shopping rush, according to a federal complaint. The complaint also said Shareef considered attacking city halls and courthouses.

"Any place that's crowded, like a mall is good, anything, any government facility is good," he allegedly told a secret FBI informant when they talked about possible attack targets. The informant secretly tape-recorded his plans. "I swear by Allah man, I'm down for it too, I'm down for the cause, I'm down to live for the cause and die for the cause, man."

Prosecutors have said they were convinced Shareef operated alone and there had been no imminent danger to the public.

Shareef was charged with one count of attempting to damage or destroy a building by fire or explosion and one count of attempting to use a weapon of mass destruction.

The arson and explosives count carries a possible sentence of five to 20 years in prison. The weapons of mass destruction charge carries a possible sentence of life in prison.

Defense attorney Michael B. Mann declined to comment on specifics of the case, telling reporters he did not want to try the case in the media.

Not Guilty Plea Entered In Mall Plot Case (RRSTAR)

By Mike Wiser, ROCKFORD REGISTER STAR

Rockford (IL) Register Star, January 10, 2007

CHICAGO — A 22-year-old accused of being jihadist told a federal judge “I feel well” moments before his lawyer entered a plea of not guilty on his behalf.

Derrick Shareef has been in federal custody in Chicago since his Dec. 6 arrest for allegedly plotting to injure and kill holiday shoppers at CherryVale Mall.

Wearing an orange jumpsuit and with a shaven head and unruly beard, Shareef appeared Tuesday in front of Judge David H. Coar.

Coar asked Shareef standard questions about his education and physical and mental health at the outset of what turned out to be a very brief hearing.

Shareef answered clearly and politely, ending most of his replies with the word “sir.” He told the judge that he did not graduate high school but obtained his general equivalency diploma, or GED, and had “some college” under his belt.

He said he was not being treated for any physical or mental ailments.

Coar also asked Shareef if he needed the government's charges against him read aloud, an option Shareef's attorney, Michael Mann of Maywood, waived.

Shareef faces up to life in prison on charges of attempting to use a weapon of mass destruction and attempting to use explosives to injure people or property.

The Justice Department says Shareef, who identified himself as Derrick Omar Shareef in court, had plotted to attack the patrons of CherryVale Mall by placing hand grenades in garbage cans in order to wage jihad.

Authorities said Shareef revealed his plans to an informant who was working with the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Joint-Terrorism Task Force. The informant arrested the 22-year-old former Genoa resident after he exchanged stereo speakers for four non-functioning grenades and a pistol.

Tuesday in court was the first time Shareef was actually able to read the charges against him, Mann said, adding his client doesn't have access to court files where he is being housed and that he himself had only just received a copy of the formal indictment, which was handed down last week.

`Data Mining' May Implicate Innocent People In Search For Terrorists (MCT)

By Greg Gordon

McClatchy Newspapers, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON - In his first hearing Wednesday as the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Democratic Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont plans to examine federal "data-mining" programs, the computerized hunt for terrorists that can implicate innocent people.

Consider the case of American Airlines pilot Kieran O'Dwyer of Pittsboro, N.C.

O'Dwyer said Tuesday that U.S. Customs agents detained him for 90 minutes in 2003 when he got off an international flight in New York, telling him his name matched one on a government terrorist watch list.

Over the next 22 months or so, O'Dwyer said, he was temporarily detained 70 to 80 times by authorities who apparently were worried that he was a fugitive member of the Irish Republican Army.

It's not clear how O'Dwyer came under suspicion or how his name wound up on a terrorist watch list, but critics charge that such miscues can occur during the data-mining process, in which computers analyze multiple databases in search of suspicious patterns.

Amy Kudwa, a TSA spokeswoman, said she couldn't comment on O'Dwyer's circumstance, but that an average of 1,500 airline travelers applied each week for redress on the grounds that they'd been mistakenly included on terrorist watch lists. She said 33,000 had applied as of last April.

In a speech last month, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said his agency was working to put a system of "one-stop redress" in place in 2007.

Leahy, a longtime congressional champion on privacy issues, plans to make "a signature issue" of protecting civil rights in the face of a "proliferation of government databanks and data mining" in the war on terrorism, said his chief spokesman, David Carle.

"He believes Congress is way overdue in taking stock of the surge in data mining by the government," Carle said.

Carle said the inquiry had gained import because of powerful new technologies, the outsourcing of data mining to private firms and "the Bush administration's lack of cooperation" with Congress' attempts to police these surveillance programs.

For years now, the Bush administration has invested heavily in data mining, viewing it as a valuable intelligence tool that can alert U.S. authorities to terrorist plots in their early stages. The government is reported to have spent tens of millions on such surveillance systems.

Among witnesses summoned to Wednesday's hearing is Jim Harper of the Cato Institute, a libertarian research center. Harper co-authored a paper last year that concluded data mining is a poor use of tax dollars, won't identify terrorists and will lead to "false positives" implicating innocent people.

In the paper, Harper and IBM engineer Jeff Jonas charge that "the one thing predictable about predictive data mining for terrorism is that it would be consistently wrong."

In testimony prepared for delivery Wednesday, Harper says data mining uses "massive amounts of data about Americans' lifestyles, purchases, communications, travels and many other facets of their lives. . . . This raises a variety of privacy concerns."

Coinciding with the hearing, Democratic Sen. Russ Feingold of Wisconsin plans to reintroduce a bill, co-sponsored by Leahy, that would require federal agencies to disclose all data-mining activities to Congress and the public.

In a 2004 report, the General Accountability Office identified at least 10 data-mining programs being used in the hunt for terrorists, and several others have emerged publicly since then.

Senate Democrats also are expected to closely question John Michael McConnell, President Bush's nominee to serve as the new intelligence czar, about 13 Pentagon data-mining contracts that his consulting firm has obtained since 1997.

Recently, the Transportation Security Administration revealed that it has conducted a program known as the Automated Targeting System, which assigns a risk assessment to every international air traveler, for four years.

O'Dwyer, the pilot, said he tried multiple ways to end his detentions but that customs agents dismissed a TSA letter clearing him, saying "it could be a forgery."

Not even persistent calls to the TSA and FBI from aides to Rep. Bob Etheridge, D-N.C., and Sen. Richard Burr, R-N.C., could solve the problem.

O'Dwyer said customs agents came to greet him by his first name, and one joked that "this was profiling against the Irish."

After missing numerous connecting flights home and having to pay to stay in New York hotels, O'Dwyer gave up flying internationally last May, forgoing about $10,000 in annual bonus pay.

Security Grants Tightly Targeted (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

Homeland Security officials yesterday announced $450 million in security funding for ports, transit systems, and chemical and nuclear plants and said they avoided a "willy-nilly approach" in earmarking the funds to ensure money won't be wasted.

The funding is an increase of $46 million over last year's amount and targets cities most at risk of terrorist attacks, including Washington and New York.

Previous grants were distributed with "very little guidance," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said during the announcement.

"Predictably, we had a rash of stories ... about communities that spent money on leather jackets or gym equipment or things of that sort," Mr. Chertoff said.

"And so, to move away from that kind of willy-nilly approach, we have put in place a risk-driven allocation of eligibility," he said. "We're investing resources where risk is greatest and where the funds will have the most significant impact."

The grant process also was widely criticized in June after funding was slashed 40 percent for Washington and New York and increased for lower-risk Midwestern cities.

The bulk of the funding, more than $200 million, will go toward port security, and more than $171 million will be spent on transit systems. Bus security funding topped nearly $12 million, as did trucking security, and $48 million has been earmarked for buffer-zone protection.

Cities and states must submit detailed plans on how the money will be spent before receiving the funding.

The National Capital Region will receive up to $18 million for transit security, the second largest grant awarded. The New York and New Jersey region received the largest grant: $61 million.

More than $8 million has been incorporated this year for Amtrak security enhancements.

The Norfolk area was included in a second tier of nearly 30 cities that will compete for $14 million in grants for transit security.

Port security grants went to the New York area ($27 million), New Orleans ($17 million), Houston ($16 million), Los Angeles ($15 million), Puget Sound, Wash., ($12 million), San Francisco Bay area ($11 million), Delaware Bay ($11 million), and Port-Arthur/Beaumont, Texas ($11 million).

Baltimore and Hampton Roads, Va., will compete with 15 cities in a second tier of funding, amounting to $40 million.

Washington will receive up to $1.5 million for buffer-zone protection, and Maryland and Virginia will pick up $770,000 each. That grant covers protection for financial institutions, chemical facilities, nuclear and electrical power plants, dams and stadiums.

States that received buffer-zone grants in previous years but were dropped this year include Alaska, Colorado, New Mexico, North Dakota, South Dakota, Vermont and the Virgin Islands.

Overall, the Homeland Security Department will award $1.7 billion in grants for counterterrorism efforts this year.

Mr. Chertoff said that previous questionable spending was not fraud, but that grant requirements "were defined so broadly and so generally that anything that could be tied to homeland security, in theory, was eligible."

Homeland Chief: Risk Determines Who Gets 2007 Anti-terror Grants (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

WASHINGTON — Seaports, rail and bus systems, trucking companies and other private industries at risk of terrorist attack will divvy up nearly a half-billion dollars in anti-terrorism grants this year, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff announced Tuesday.

"We're investing resources where risk is greatest and where the funds will have the most significant impact," said Chertoff, responding to critics who complained that the highest-risk cities didn't get a big enough share of federal homeland security money last year.

Chertoff said the process of deciding which cities would get the grant money this year was driven by threat-based intelligence information and "common sense."

Chertoff said $445 million will be distributed this spring through five grant programs aimed at helping cities shore up security at vulnerable sites. Port security programs will get the largest share of the money: $210 million. Transit security will receive $172 million.

Within those categories, New York City and its surrounding communities will come out on top when the money goes out.

Members of Congress who had accused the Homeland Security Department of giving New York short shrift last year said there was some improvement — but still complained that the area wasn't getting enough money.

"We're glad this is a modest increase in funding for New York City, but we're still not close to our fair share or what we need," Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said.

Highest danger, biggest allotments

These port areas were deemed to be at "highest risk status" and eligible for the most grant money:

·New York-New Jersey, $27.1 million
·New Orleans, $17.3 million
·Houston-Galveston, $15.7 million
·Los Angeles-Long Beach, $14.7 million
·Puget Sound, Wash., $12.2 million
·Delaware Bay, $11.3 million
·San Francisco Bay, $11.2 million
·Sabine-Neches River, Texas, $10.9 million.

Transit systems in eight major urban areas were found to be at highest risk of attack and eligible for the biggest grants. They are:

·New York-Connecticut-New Jersey, $61 million
·Washington, D.C., and its Maryland and Virginia suburbs, $18.2 million
·Boston, $15.3 million
·San Francisco Bay Area, $13.8 million
·Chicago, $12.8 million
·Philadelphia, $9.7 million
·Greater Los Angeles, $7 million
·Atlanta, $3.4 million.

Testimony Begins In Hurricane Katrina Insurance Lawsuit (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Kunzelman, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 10, 2007

(AP) - GULFPORT, Mississippi-State Farm Fire & Casualty Co. used a new "protocol" after Hurricane Katrina to deny claims to many policyholders, a lawyer for a homeowner suing the company said Tuesday in the trial for one of hundreds of pending insurance lawsuits spawned by the massive storm.

William Walker, attorney for State Farm policyholders Norman and Genevieve Broussard of Biloxi, told an eight-member jury in his opening statement that the company refused to pay for any damage to any home that Katrina reduced to a slab in August 2005, including the Broussards'.

State Farm and other companies say their homeowner policies cover damage from wind but not from water - and exclude damage that could have been caused by a combination of both, even if hurricane-force winds preceded a storm's rising water.

"They denied (the couple's claim) based on this wind/water protocol, this thing that's not in the policy," Walker told jurors. "This is a case in which State Farm promised to do something. This is a case in which State Farm decided not to follow those promises."

The Broussards claim a tornado destroyed their home before any flooding, but State Farm concluded that all the damage was caused by Katrina's storm surge and isn't covered by their policy.

In his opening statement, State Farm attorney Scott Corlew told jurors: "We think after you've reviewed all the evidence that you will agree with us that water was the destructive mechanism at the Broussard home."

The first day of testimony in the federal trial came as Mississippi's attorney general negotiates a separate potential settlement with State Farm that could impact hundreds of other policyholders with Katrina damage.

People with direct knowledge of the settlement talks told The Associated Press on Monday that State Farm, Mississippi's largest home insurer, is considering paying hundreds of millions of dollars (euros) to settle more than 600 lawsuits and resolve hundreds of other disputed claims.

A mass settlement would be the first of its kind to follow the wave of litigation spawned by Katrina.

State Farm, Hood and plaintiffs' lawyers are nearing an agreement that calls for the insurer to pay at least $50 million(euro38 million)- but possibly hundreds of millions more - to roughly 35,000 policyholders who have not sued the company for denying their claim, people with knowledge of the talks said.

A Mississippi settlement would not involve any claims filed by State Farm policyholders in other states.

Hundreds of Mississippi homeowners have sued their insurance companies for refusing to cover billions of dollars (euros) in damage from Katrina's storm surge. The Broussards' case is only the second to be tried since the storm destroyed or severely damaged tens of thousands of homes.

WAR NEWS:

U.S. Pares Reconstruction Effort In Iraq (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe And Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration's new Iraq strategy calls for modest, relatively inexpensive efforts to spur job creation and economic growth, a marked shift from the large-scale reconstruction projects and free-market dogmatism of earlier White House efforts.

But with the appetite for new spending for Iraq low across Washington, the downsized ambitions are being matched by similarly reduced amounts of money, prompting some senior military commanders to express skepticism the plan will improve conditions in Iraq.

When he addresses the nation tonight, President Bush will propose a micro-finance effort to aid Iraqi entrepreneurs and a sizable expansion of a program giving military commanders money for small-scale reconstruction and job-creation projects, according to administration and Pentagon officials. Mr. Bush described both initiatives in closed-door meetings with senators this week, according to several participants.

Meanwhile, senior Pentagon officials have been touting a push to get 193 Iraqi factories that have shuttered since the 2003 invasion up and running in the next three years. The officials say the reopened plants can provide jobs to tens of thousands of Iraqis who might otherwise join a militia or insurgent groups.

Just after the invasion, U.S. officials focused on big, U.S.-run infrastructure projects, such as rebuilding hospitals, water-treatment plants and electrical power plants. The administration eventually devoted $20.9 billion to the effort, much of which was consumed by security costs or lost to mismanagement. Officials also talked ambitiously about jettisoning Iraq's centralized economic system -- in which hundreds of thousands of Iraqis worked for state-owned firms -- and privatizing its state-run oil industry. Officials didn't spend money to reopen shuttered Iraqi factories because they believed such a move would prevent more-efficient, privately owned businesses from taking root.

Now, U.S. officials are working with Iraqi officials to reopen Iraqi factories as a means of creating tens of thousands of Iraqi jobs, said Paul Brinkley, the deputy undersecretary of defense tapped to lead the effort.

Military officials say the focus on getting Iraqis back to work represents a much-needed change. But some say the improved approach could be hampered by a lack of resources. Army Col. Bill Hix, who served 13 months as a senior strategist in Iraq and now works in the Pentagon, recently wrote an article proposing the U.S. set aside another $20 billion for reconstruction in Iraq. The Iraq Study Group called for the U.S. to provide $5 billion a year in economic assistance.

The Bush administration plans to spend just a few billion dollars on Iraq reconstruction in 2007. It plans to ask Congress for $1.46 billion in aid to the Iraqi government as part of Mr. Bush's new push to stabilize the country, though it will seek additional money for Iraqi security forces.

No U.S. money is being set aside to reopen state-owned Iraqi factories, which employed about 12% of the Iraqi population in 2003. Instead, U.S. officials say they will push Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to find the millions of dollars needed to open as many as 30 factories this year. Mr. Brinkley said the military would help the Iraqi enterprises by contracting with them for essentials like cement and water.

The job-creation and military-reconstruction efforts will also be given only comparatively modest funding. Administration officials say the amount of money devoted to the micro-finance program will most likely be in the tens of millions of dollars. The Commander's Emergency Response Program, which gives military officers money they can use on small-scale reconstruction and jobs programs, is likely to double in size, but the total cost of the program will be close to only $1 billion.

The administration's retrenchment of its ambitions for Iraq began last year, when the White House's fiscal 2007 budget included no new "Iraq Relief and Reconstruction" money, the name of the initial, $20.9 billion effort. The White House wouldn't comment on any aspect of its latest effort.

Bush To Propose Restoring Iraqi Factories To Create Jobs (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 9 — A new effort to revitalize some of the world's most outdated and decrepit factories for making vegetable oil, fertilizer, road signs and sulfuric acid is expected to be at the center of the plan for Iraq that President Bush will present Wednesday.

But even before the measures are announced, Iraqi political and business leaders have been expressing skepticism that any effort to transform a system of state-owned enterprises that has fallen so far into dysfunction could become an engine for job creation in Iraq.

The administration describes the steps as a way to employ more Iraqis and to keep them away from more destructive pursuits such as joining the insurgency or fighting in a militia.

Among the economic measures under consideration is new support for a program that allows local American military commanders to finance small reconstruction projects.

But recent statements by administration officials suggest that the plan is also likely to include an effort to revive parts of what was a vast Iraqi military and industrial base before it was destroyed by war, sanctions and looting.

That plan would involve pumping expertise and money for reconstruction into enterprises still owned by the Iraqi government, or privatizing some or all of the companies to force them to become more competitive.

Either way, Iraqi political and business leaders were dubious about the prospects for success. "I doubt it very much in view of the current challenges and dangers facing the country," said Mehdi Hafedh, a member of Parliament a former planning minister.

The state-owned enterprises are already a huge drain on Iraq's budget, Mr. Hafedh said, and most of them produce little or nothing. Many are filled with no-show jobs.

"The Americans should have made some consultations because this is ridiculous, frankly," Mr. Hafedh said. "What Iraq needs to do is reduce the number of employees in the state sector."

The focus on jobs and reconstruction is in many ways a return to the earliest days of the occupation, when the top American administrator here, L. Paul Bremer III, pressed the idea that economic initiatives were as important as military action in stabilizing the country and convincing ordinary Iraqis that the invasion would have tangible benefits for them.

That philosophy led to a reconstruction program financed by $30 billion in American taxpayer money that had a marginal impact on the quality of life here, attracted ceaseless attacks on rebuilding projects and produced little but derision among Iraqis.

In addition, American officials, who declined to comment before the president's speech, have never produced evidence that those enormous expenditures have lessened the attractions of the insurgency.

Nor have those officials solved what appears to be a logical flaw in the plan: how does the United States get credit for reconstruction projects when it must keep its participation secret to prevent attacks on those projects?

The employment picture in Iraq is without doubt grim, said Batea al-Kubaisi, a government economics expert. Depending on how it is measured on the chaotic streets of Iraq, the unemployment rate ranges from 30 percent to 60 percent, Mr. Kubaisi said.

Given those numbers, making use of the state-owned companies has distinct attractions. Overall, the 192 companies employ more than 500,000 Iraqis, which amounts to roughly half of all Iraqi government employees, Mr. Hafedh said.

But while the companies may appear alluring in reducing unemployment and sparking the economy, businessmen here said they are far from a solution.

Many of those employees actually do nothing but collect monthly paychecks and go home, says Mahmoud Othman, an Iraqi businessman who favors increasing support for the companies and privatizing some.

“They are still on the payroll of the government although they have nothing to do,” Mr. Othman, who is not to be confused with the Iraqi politician of the same name. “They were not dismissed for social reasons.”

The very names of the companies have the musty air of government institutions in a closed nation: the General Company for Vegetable Oils, the State Company for Battery Manufacturing, al-Mishraq Sulfur Industry Company.

And any remaining illusions about the status of those companies would be shattered by evaluations by Mr. Bremer’s administration here when privatization was in the air in 2003.

A company that produced metal castings, traffic signs and military medals was so damaged in the invasion, one evaluation said, that the “sign factory is only one that doesn’t need to be completely rebuilt from the ground up.”

The sulfur company had “heavy damage to offices, plant and equipment,” the evaluation said. “Entire facility is almost completely destroyed.”

Other companies, like a heavy engineering business called Nasco, have been damaged less severely but have different problems: Nasco is in Doura, now one of the deadliest districts in Baghdad.

The Pentagon official at the center of the program to revitalize the state-owned enterprises is Paul A. Brinkley, the deputy undersecretary for business transformation, who has surveyed some of the companies in Iraq.

“What we are doing is assessing these factories,” Mr. Brinkley told American Forces Press Service last week. “We are bringing in expertise. We are bringing international industry to bear to create demand for these factories.”

Mr. Brinkley told the service he hoped that within a year, around a quarter of the $4 billion that the United States spends to support its troops in Iraq — food, fuel and outfitting of bases that is mostly bought outside the country — could be spent instead on the Iraqi companies. Some Iraqi officials, including Layla Kadhum, the minister of labor and social affairs, appeared to support the initiative.

“If these ideas are applied, they will have a great role in diminishing the violence that the country is witnessing, because a great part of the violence is caused by the unemployment,” Ms. Kadhum said.

Others sounded notes of alarm, particularly if Mr. Bush planned the sort of privatization that was tried and abandoned as unworkable early in Mr. Bremer’s tenure.

“I hope the president doesn’t make that the linchpin of his short-term strategy,” said Basil Rahim, an Iraqi financial expert, “because that’s just going to backfire on him.”

U.S. Teams Try To Rebuild A War-torn Nation (LAT)

By Paul Richter And Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

KIRKUK, IRAQ — For nearly a year, a team of U.S. civilian and military officials has worked from small, sparsely furnished offices here trying to help Iraqi officials with their most urgent needs: building a local government and providing basic public services.

"Provincial reconstruction teams" like this one are expected to be central to the economic component of the new Iraq policy that President Bush plans to unveil today. But in emphasizing such steps, Bush and his aides are courting widespread skepticism. Many U.S. officials and outside Iraq experts view the economic and political portion of Bush's package, like his expected proposal to increase the number of U.S. troops in the country, to be a big gamble with a limited chance of success.

"There's reason to try all of these ideas, and that's why we have tried them before," said one U.S. official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because Bush had not yet detailed his new strategy. "We're reliving all of the issues that have been discussed since 2003. It's like 'Groundhog Day.' "

The 35-member team in this northern Iraqi city has funneled money to aid and reconstruction projects, helped set up temporary job and job-training programs, and assisted local officials with budgets and other issues. Yet it has been hampered by shortages of skilled staff and money and a lack of security, problems that have undermined previous multibillion-dollar U.S. reconstruction efforts across the country since the American-led invasion of Iraq in March 2003.

The current Kirkuk effort is being conducted by an eclectic group, including a former member of the British Parliament, a high school chemistry teacher, a commercial pilot, a marketing manager, a retired state trooper and a career diplomat. One member, a lawyer who helps set up local courts, refers to the group as "the Peace Corps with guns."

Some team members caution that the tough problems they face can't be solved through a quick infusion of money or personnel.

"There's no cheap surge," said Kirkuk team leader Jim Bigus, a career diplomat who came to Iraq from Afghanistan, where he was deputy director of the U.S. Bureau for International Narcotics Law Enforcement Affairs. "You've got to get more attractive salaries to people here, and you've got to get more security, and more locations. And that's hard to do quickly."

Bush is expected to announce plans to double the number of provincial reconstruction teams and call for big new job and loan programs and a renewed reconstruction effort. Administration officials consider the economic and political aspects of Bush's plan more important than the expected troop increase.

The plan has two stages, officials say. Once troops have pacified key areas of Baghdad and Al Anbar province, officials will offer economic and political benefits, including jobs that they hope will win the loyalty of young men who are now fighting U.S. and Iraqi government security forces.

Shortage of civilian help

U.S. military officials have long complained about the shortage of civilian American officials available to work with local governments. Senior U.S. officials are calling for an increase in civilian workers to accompany the expected addition of up to 20,000 troops.

The provincial reconstruction teams at work in Iraq were modeled on organizations used in Vietnam and Afghanistan and are expected to be a principal channel for new aid.

Members of the Kirkuk team say senior U.S. officials have hinted at the possibility of added resources and have urged State Department officials on the team not to close a regional embassy office that might be needed in the future.

"We've been asked a lot in the last month how many more people we could use, or money," said team leader Bigus.

The team's routine, four days a week, is to strap on armor and helmets and pile into a convoy of armored Humvees for trips into the field to confer with Iraqi officials and others. None of its members, however, speaks Arabic or Kurdish, though there are five interpreters on staff.

The usual destination is the faded gray and yellow Kirkuk Government Building, which is safe enough to allow them to shed their weapons and armored vests while they sip tea with officials.

Since arriving last spring, the Kirkuk team has helped arrange $744 million in spending from Iraqi, Pentagon and USAID sources for 599 development projects. U.S. officials view the Kirkuk team as a showcase.

Yet it has faced major obstacles. It has not been able to recruit all the civilian specialists it would like, and has had to turn to military personnel to pick up the slack. Only about one-third of its members are civilians. The original plan called for a 50-50 split.

Still, the work is considered vital. Bigus said that better public services could turn Iraqis away from the insurgency, but worried that more troops could lead to more casualties, hurting the team effort.

"Dead officers don't do reports, and the more deaths we have, the more problems we have recruiting," he said.

Similar teams in other parts of Iraq face more severe problems. Teams in the more dangerous Al Anbar and Basra provinces are so understaffed and hamstrung by security concerns that the U.S. Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction urged in an October audit that they be closed. Of the 13 main and satellite offices studied, only four were "generally able" to carry out their missions, the audit said.

One U.S. official said plans for an increase in civilians were causing anxiety in the State Department, which, like other civilian agencies, has struggled to find enough people willing to accept the dangerous assignments. Senior U.S. officials have considered involuntary assignments, but have so far rejected that step.

Other components of the economic effort also have raised questions, including proposals for new job programs, which one official said would cost up to $1 billion.

A calming effect

U.S. military commanders are enthusiastic backers of temporary job programs, citing their effect in calming cities such as Tall Afar after bitter fighting. Commanders contend that many young Iraqis would rather take such jobs than work for the insurgency.

"The vast majority of the terrorists we fight are not ideologically bound. They're doing this mostly for economics," said Army Col. Patrick Stackpole, commander of the 3rd Brigade Combat Team of the 25th Infantry Division in Kirkuk, which works with the provincial reconstruction team.

To help provide jobs, the administration's plan calls for a sharp expansion of the Commander's Emergency Response Program, which gives field commanders cash that they can use at their discretion to put civilians to work.

However, many civilian officials and former government administrators believe the economic benefits of the job programs have proved fleeting. In the currently volatile atmosphere, job offers are unlikely to lure away men who are deeply committed to the fight, they say.

Frederick D. Barton, a former U.S. Agency for International Development official and specialist on postwar reconstruction, said temporary job programs employed about 50,000 Iraqis at their peak more than two years ago, but would be less attractive now.

"Cleaning up garbage and digging ditches for a few bucks a day for six weeks doesn't give you much of a time horizon and might put your life at risk," said Barton, now with the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

Maj. Chris Mitchiner, an intelligence officer with the 3rd Brigade, 25th Infantry Division, in Kirkuk, said most Sunni insurgents "can't see past tomorrow" and are unlikely to be swayed by job programs.

James Dobbins, a former senior U.S. diplomat and advisor to the Iraq Study Group, said the job programs had not had lasting economic effects.

Factories reopen

Pentagon officials have begun reopening some of the 200 state-owned factories that were closed after the U.S. invasion. Military leaders hope that the factories can produce basic goods to be sold to the U.S. military and to commercial customers. Pentagon officials said they had opened one such factory, and hoped to open nine more by the end of the month, eventually providing 11,000 permanent jobs.

But critics said that it would be difficult to make the rundown factories function profitably and argued that many of the former employees would be unwilling or unavailable to go back to work.

"Most of them were unprofitable and for the most part irredeemable four years ago, and they're mostly in worse shape today," said Dobbins, who now directs Rand Corp.'s International Security and Defense Policy program.

The administration could face resistance from the Democratic-controlled Congress in funding the effort. Democrats, unhappy with the $20 billion already spent on reconstruction, have signaled that they may pare back new requests.

New Wave Of Troops Set For Iraq (AP)

The first of up to 20,000 additional U.S. troops will move into Iraq by month's end under President Bush's new war plan, a senior defense official said Tuesday. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi pledged to hold a vote on the increase, which many Democrats oppose.

Details of a gradual military buildup emerged a day before Bush's planned speech to the nation, in which he also will propose a bit over $1 billion to shore up the country's battered economy and create jobs, said a second U.S. official.

Bush is expected to urge friendly Mideast countries to increase their aid to Iraq but will ignore the recommendation of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group that he include Syria and Iran in an effort to stanch Iraqi bloodshed nearly four years after the U.S. invasion, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the plan has not yet been announced.

Bush is expected to link the troop increase to promised steps by the Iraqi government to build up its own military, ease the country's murderous sectarian tensions, increase reconstruction and enact a plan to distribute oil revenues among the country's religious sects.

Even before he delivers his speech, Bush's plan has drawn sharp criticism from the leaders of the new, Democratic-controlled Congress. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said he hoped for a bipartisan measure that would declare, "We don't support this escalation of the war." If it passes, "the president's going to have to take note of that. I think that's the beginning of the end, as far as I'm concerned," he said.

Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for Pelosi, said Tuesday night, "The House will vote on the president's proposal." She said she had no details.

The president met during the day with lawmakers, practiced his speech and briefed key foreign allies, including calls to the leaders of Britain, Australia and Denmark. Bush was expected to practice his speech a couple of more times before addressing the nation at 9 p.m. EST Wednesday from the White House Library.

Under Bush's plan, thousands of troops will be alerted that they may be needed in Iraq — including units already there whose service would be extended, or others that could be sent earlier than initially scheduled, said one official.

Moving first into Iraq would be the 2nd Brigade, 82nd Airborne Division, which is now in Kuwait and poised to head quickly into the country, the defense official said. The brigade, numbering about 3,500 troops, is based at Fort Bragg, N.C.

Other units, including Marine brigades in western Iraq, could be asked to extend their deployment. And the military buildup is also likely to include moving the aircraft carrier USS John C. Stennis into the Persian Gulf region, as a show of force and a warning to Iran and Syria.

There are already about 132,000 U.S. troops in Iraq.

According to the defense official, Bush also will discuss the need to address how often the Pentagon can tap the National Guard and Reserves, although he may provide few details. And Bush will again endorse the need to increase the size of the Army and Marine Corps.

The speech looms as a key one for Bush, who is beginning the final two years of his presidency waging a war that has scant public support and whose own popularity has plummeted as well.

The public has heard several previous campaigns by Bush to defend his Iraq policies and show that he is changing with changing circumstances. Since the war's start in March 2003, there have been at least seven public relations offensives by Bush on the war, with some of these speech series timed to milestone events and others to dips in polls.

In Iraq Tuesday, U.S. jets screamed low over the capital and helicopter gunships swooped in to pound a central Baghdad battleground as Iraqi and American troops waged a daylong fight that officials said killed 50 insurgents in a militant Sunni Arab stronghold.

Iraqi police, meanwhile, reported finding 52 bodies dumped in three cities, 41 of them in Baghdad, all apparent victims of sectarian reprisal killings.

Bush has met with more than 110 lawmakers in recent days to discuss his plan, and some offered details Tuesday.

"The president believes that the Iraqi forces aided by American forces will be able to clean out Baghdad and stabilize Baghdad and leave as he put it 'space' for a political reconciliation process to unify the country and stabilize Iraq," said Rep. Robert Andrews, D-N.J., one of 12 Democratic lawmakers who met with Bush Tuesday.

Andrews said the meeting was "dominated by our skepticism of whether the Iraqi forces are willing to fight for their own government."

Sen. Carl Levin, a Michigan Democrat who chairs the Senate Armed Services Committee, said he expected Bush to announce that up to 20,000 additional troops will be sent to Iraq but not to say how long the extra forces will be there. He said he believed Bush will signal that the overall U.S. commitment in Iraq is not open-ended.

A key element of the plan will be the increased responsibilities taken on by the Iraqis. Bush is expected to link the troop increase to efforts by the Iraqi government to curb Shiite militias that have terrorized the Sunni minority, as well as moves to ease government restrictions on members of the late Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein's Baath Party.

Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, said Tuesday that he believes the Baghdad government suggested some of the conditions, such as their ongoing efforts to get more Iraqi forces trained and equipped for battle and committing more money for reconstruction.

Leading the opposition, Sen. Edward Kennedy, a longtime critic, introduced legislation that would deny the president the billions needed to send more troops unless Congress agreed first. It was unclear whether the bill would ever reach the full Senate, but it could serve as a rallying point for critics.

White House press secretary Tony Snow conceded that Bush has a challenge in convincing a war-weary public.

"The president will not shape policy according to public opinion, but he does understand that it's important to bring the public back to this war and restore public confidence and support for the mission," Snow said.

Bush To Request More Troops (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds And Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush spent hours Tuesday practicing in front of cameras, preparing to make his case for increasing the U.S. military commitment in Iraq in a prime-time address to the nation tonight, even as congressional Democrats readied legislation to block any increase in the number of troops.

Members of Congress who met with Bush said he appeared to understand that, after years of upbeat rhetoric and positive assessments that belied a lack of progress inside the country, his credibility was on the line.

"He told us what he planned to say tomorrow," said Rep. Jane Harman (D-Venice), one of about a dozen House members who met with the president and his top advisors for more than an hour Tuesday afternoon. "In terms of tough moments in his presidency, this is it."

Sen. Trent Lott of Mississippi, the Senate's second-ranking Republican, said both Republicans and Democrats would be listening for a note of contrition in the president's voice.

"As important as what he says is how he says it," Lott told reporters.

Lawmakers who have met with Bush this week say he intends to ask for about 20,000 additional troops to shift the strategy in Iraq toward ending sectarian violence and increasing security on the ground for Iraqi civilians in restive areas. According to the lawmakers, the troubled Iraqi government has agreed to meet benchmarks of political progress as a condition of the troop increase.

Supporters of the strategy say a decrease in violence will foster political reconciliation between Iraqi factions. Detractors say a "surge" in troops is just another term for "escalation."

"His speech is going to clearly show that he is calling for an escalation in Iraq," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) told reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0114848

In the White House meeting, Bush gave a rundown of the speech to House Democrats, who gave him a tepid response. Rep. Adam Smith (D-Wash.) said no lawmaker in his meeting supported the new policy.

"We were more in a question-and-answer mode, but a fair amount of skepticism was voiced," Smith said.

"It was not a confrontational meeting," said Rep. Ellen O. Tauscher (D-Alamo), who said she emphasized the importance of the Iraqi government making political progress. "I think he understands that, at some level, this is the last best chance."

"I said a surge in troops was a good idea three years ago — but not now," Harman said. "Other strategies — political and diplomatic — right now are more critical."

Rep. C.W. "Bill" Young of Florida, who joined other senior House Republicans at the White House on Tuesday, said he wanted to hear more from Bush.

"I'm anxious to hear the speech," he said, "because I think there's going to be a lot more in the speech than he told us today."

Reid said he intended to bring at least a nonbinding resolution to the Senate floor next week to permit Democrats and Republicans to vote against a troop increase. A similar measure is planned in the House.

In addition, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) introduced legislation Tuesday to cut off funding for any troops above the current level of 132,000. It would also require the president to seek congressional approval before sending additional military forces to Iraq.

Kennedy said his legislation, which is being sponsored in the House by Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), would "reclaim the rightful role of Congress and the people's right to have a full voice in the president's plan to send more troops to Iraq."

Kennedy was careful Tuesday to insist that he and other Democrats did not plan to cut off funding for troops now in Iraq.

Reid did not commit to bringing Kennedy's proposal to a Senate vote. "His is an idea," Reid said, "and certainly we'll look at it in an intelligent way. We'll look at it giving everyone every right they have to be part of a solution to this problem."

Kennedy detailed his proposal at the National Press Club in a speech rich with allusions to Vietnam.

"Echoes of that disaster are all around us today. Iraq is George Bush's Vietnam," said Kennedy, who joined the Senate in 1962, three years before the major escalation of American military involvement in Southeast Asia. "As with Vietnam, the only rational solution to the crisis is political, not military."

Kennedy helped lead the efforts to limit military aid to South Vietnam after U.S. forces withdrew following the 1973 peace accords. Since then, Congress has acted several times to put legislative limits on military operations.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), who has been a leading champion of sending more troops, said congressional limitations for Iraq would be a "devastating precedent."

"I can't think of a stronger signal to send to the extremists in the world, not just Iraq — 'Hang in there, you're winning' — other than the United States Congress calling this war over," he said.

P. Edward Haley, a political scientist at Claremont McKenna College and a former congressional staffer, said "the founders knew what they were doing when they gave the legislature the power of the purse."

"The abuse of the power to make war was one of the worst forms of monarchical misrule, and the quickest road to tyranny, and the founders were determined to prevent both in the new constitution," Haley said.

"Of course, having the power is one thing; finding the votes to exercise it is another," Haley added. "It will be very difficult for the Democrats to refuse funding without falling into a political trap the administration has set in order to blame them for failure in Iraq."

Bush's Speech May Be The Most Important Of His Presidency (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson And Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush is about to take a gamble that could make or break his presidency and his place in history.

In a speech scheduled for Wednesday night, he'll try to convince a war-weary nation to commit more troops and money to a struggle in Iraq that's already cost more than 3,000 American lives and at least $300 billion.

His nationally televised speech, and the reaction to it, will determine the next step in Iraq, test his relations with the new Democratic-led Congress and set the tone for his final two years in office. Some analysts say it could increase pressure for withdrawal if the solutions Bush offers don't bring quick results.

White House aides acknowledge that the president faces a skeptical audience when he goes before television cameras at 9 p.m..

Nearly four years after Bush led the nation to war, most Americans think he made a big mistake. A Gallup poll conducted last weekend for USA Today and CNN found that only 1 in 4 Americans approve of his handling of Iraq. Only about a third said they'd support his expected call for as many as 20,000 more troops.

Even Bush's allies concede that he may not get another chance to revise a war plan that's failed to meet shifting challenges from Iraqi insurgents, Islamic terrorists and bloody sectarian violence.

"This may not be our last chance, but it's as close to our last chance as anything I can think of," Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said.

Bush's toughest challenge may be trying to convince Americans that the war is worth the mounting cost, in both lives and money. In addition to a troop increase, his plan is expected to include an ambitious new jobs program for Iraqis that could cost as much as $1 billion.

As Bush put the final touches on his plan, congressional Democrats looked for ways to block any troop surge. Calling Iraq "George Bush's Vietnam," Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said he would introduce legislation that would require congressional approval for any troop increase.

"We cannot simply speak out against an escalation of troops in Iraq; we must act to prevent it," he said in a speech at the National Press Club. "As with Vietnam, the only rational solution to the crisis is political, not military. Injecting more troops into a civil war is not the answer."

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Bush would try to shore up support for the war by raising hopes for victory and spelling out the consequences of defeat. The White House has sought to frame the Iraq debate as a choice between Bush's plan and abject failure.

"The president will not shape policy according to public opinion, but he does understand that that it's important to bring the public back to this war and restore public confidence," Snow said. "I think what the American people will ask themselves is, do we want to win this war?"

But some who share Bush's view of the dire consequences of failure worry that by raising expectations for progress, Bush runs the risk of a backlash if his new approach fails to get positive results soon.

"After a couple of months, people will say, `Well, look, the situation hasn't changed. That demonstrates it's hopeless,'" former national security Brent Scowcroft said on ABC last weekend. "The pressure to get out will increase."

Bush stayed out of public view Tuesday as he promoted his plan in private talks with members of Congress and foreign leaders. Meeting participants said Bush stressed his goal of turning security responsibility over to Iraqis. He also told visitors that the plan would include new efforts by Iraqi leaders to disarm sectarian militias and restore order in Baghdad.

Rep. Norm Dicks, D-Wash., said administration officials indicated that the Iraqi commitment for Baghdad would include about 10,000 more Iraqi troops and as many as 18,000 additional police. He said the officials suggested they'd know by February whether the plan would be a success.

"This is being presented as an Iraqi plan," Rep. Adam Smith, D-Wash., said after meeting with Bush and other top administration officials. "They will be taking the lead in Baghdad. They want to show that the Iraqi government can actually function."

Smith said he remained "very skeptical" that the plan would succeed.

Bush also sketched out his ideas in phone calls to British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Australian Prime Minister John Howard and Danish Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen.

Senate Democratic leaders said they would introduce a non-binding resolution that would test Senate support for Bush's plan. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said a vote against the plan, even if only symbolic, could force the president to change course.

Some Republicans said they were prepared to back Bush, but suggested that their enthusiasm would depend on the details of the plan and his speech. "As important as what he says is how he says it," said Sen. Trent Lott, the Senate's No. 2 Republican.

Some Iraqi officials were also skeptical about Bush's plans.

Baha Araji, a member of the parliamentary bloc loyal to Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, said he believes neither the Iraqi nor American military can stop Iraq's eroding security. He called for a political solution. But when asked how to achieve that goal, he shrugged his shoulders.

Bush Must Sell Public, Congress Iraq Speech May Define President's Legacy (AJC)

By Ken Herman

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 10, 2007

Washington — President Bush's legacy will be on the line when he goes on national television tonight seeking public support for his new strategy in Iraq.

"This may be the last, best chance to shape policy and opinion on the issue that will define his presidency," said Mark McKinnon, a longtime communications adviser to Bush.

His plan to send more troops to Iraq will be a tough sell. A Gallup/USA Today poll released Tuesday showed that 61 percent oppose the idea, and 47 percent said they do not think the United States can attain its goals in Iraq no matter how many troops are sent.

McKinnon is among those, including Bush aides in the White House, who believe that nothing the president says tonight is likely to move numbers in his direction. It's the results that will matter.

"The plan for more troops has to be clear and provide metrics for success in order to win support," McKinnon said.

The troop increase is expected to be tied to Iraqi government commitments to crack down on Shiite militias' attacks on the Sunni minority. Also included will be economic incentives to bolster the Iraqi economy with rebuilding projects.

White House spokesman Tony Snow has talked about the speech as a beginning of a process.

"The president will not shape a policy according to public opinion," Snow said. "But he does understand that it's important to bring the public back to this war and restore public confidence in support for the mission."

Democrats, now running Congress, already have challenged the wisdom of sending more troops.

"The American people sent a clear message in November that we must change course in Iraq and begin to withdraw our troops, not escalate their presence," said Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), who has proposed legislation that would require congressional approval for any escalation.

White House aides acknowledge the opposition and the battle to come.

"This is a very complex subject to take people through in what is a fairly brief set of remarks," a Bush aide said of tonight's 25-minute speech. The aide talked of "other opportunities," including a Thursday appearance at Georgia's Fort Benning, for Bush "to talk to the American people about it."

But it is not just the public that needs to be convinced.

"This one is a particularly tough task because he has two broad sets of audience that have doubts," said presidential historian John Geer of Vanderbilt University. "The first is the American public that is concerned about Iraq and continuing to stay there and have more troops there. The second, of course, is a Congress that is no longer Republican." Convincing either audience would be a tall order, Geer said, but "two makes it even a taller order."

Still, he may have little to lose.

"His popularity is pretty low now," said Geer. "It's not likely to go a lot lower."

Political scientist George Edwards of Texas A&M's Bush School of Government and Public Service agreed.

"In some ways it does make sense to take a risk," he said, noting that without the support of public and the Congress, the president's major remaining power is the veto.

"It is an inherently negative power and not one that requires a lot of political capital," he said.

Bush Faces Tough Sell On Iraq (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

President Bush faces a difficult task tonight when he lays out his new strategy for Iraq in a prime-time address, with the White House acknowledging that he needs to recapture public support for a war effort that has stumbled in the past year.

Mr. Bush is expected to announce an increase of up to 20,000 troops to help secure Baghdad, with the first wave to be shipped out this month and the rest prepared to deploy more gradually. He also is expected to lay out obligations for Iraq, in effect tying a deeper commitment of government leaders to an escalation of U.S. forces.

Public opinion polls show the president will have a tough sell.

A Gallup-USA Today poll taken over the weekend showed that 61 percent of Americans oppose a troop increase and 36 percent support it, and that Mr. Bush's job approval for Iraq has dropped to 26 percent.

The White House yesterday said Mr. Bush has lost the country's support.

"It's important to bring the public back to this war and restore public confidence and support for the mission," spokesman Tony Snow said.

Jeffrey D. McCausland, a defense specialist and former National Security Council staffer, said Mr. Bush will be addressing three audiences: Congress, which controls the funding; the American public, whose patience is slipping; and Iraq, which will have to exhibit a more solid commitment.

DOJ_NMG_0114851

Mr. McCausland said he expects Mr. Bush to explain that Iraqis have to show they have earned a new wave of U.S. forces.

He said Mr. Bush must establish a measurement of progress in order to win public support.

The last time the U.S. announced a troop increase, Iraqis were to match it with six battalions but sent only two, he said.

"The real question is, the president's in the middle of a moral dilemma. He has to threaten to do the one thing he's said he's ultimately unwilling to do, and that's walk away from this," Mr. McCausland said.

Democrats said Mr. Bush must prove that his policy is taking a new direction.

"Nearly three years after launching a war that has taken more than 3,000 American lives, cost more than $300 billion and left tens of thousands of Americans wounded, President Bush has an obligation to tell the American people how his new 'strategy' will diverge from his policies of the last three years," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, Illinois Democrat and chairman of the House Democratic Caucus.

Mr. Snow noted that George Washington, Abraham Lincoln and Winston Churchill sustained setbacks in war.

"Was Winston Churchill responsible for the Blitz? What Winston Churchill did was talk about the conditions for victory," Mr. Snow said, adding that Mr. Bush is "adjusting and talking about conditions for victory."

Analysis: Bush's New Plan Not All New (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, January 10, 2007

President Bush's new plan for Iraq sounds a lot like his old one. Send in more troops, set goals for the Iraqi government and assure Americans it's better to wage war there than here.

And now the U.S. military is back in Somalia, too, once again attacking suspected terrorist targets.

Bush's challenge in Iraq: show what's different now.

The plan the president will outline to the nation Wednesday night is the latest repackaging of a program that's been wrapped and rewrapped many times.

The White House recognizes that a majority of Americans disapprove of Bush's handling of Iraq and that Democrats are eager to assert their new leadership on Capitol Hill by challenging his proposal to send in more troops.

But Bush advisers also believe that Americans do not necessarily support an immediate withdrawal and might be willing to give the president the benefit of the doubt if he presents a feasible, detailed plan that points the way to an eventual U.S. drawdown.

It's different this time, Bush supporters say of his new strategy — always words to beware.

For one thing, administration officials contend that the Iraqi government, while still fragile, has matured and will do much more of its part this time.

They note that Bush has reshuffled his military and diplomatic team in Iraq and has a new defense secretary, Robert Gates, to carry out the revised plan.

Bush has told lawmakers he plans to send about 20,000 more troops to Iraq. There are roughly 132,00 there now. The White House also is working on its largest-ever appeal for more war funds — a record $100 billion, at least — to be submitted along with Bush's Feb. 5 budget.

"He does understand that it's important to bring the public back to this war and restore public confidence in support for the mission," spokesman Tony Snow said Tuesday.

Still, there's clearly a been-there, done-that feel to Bush's new plan.

It's an old story: The U.S. before has temporarily raised troop levels, taken steps to encourage democracy, spent money on education and public works and set benchmarks for the Iraqi government.

In the fall of 2005, the president gave a series of speeches around the country on the way forward in Iraq. To mark the campaign, the White House issued a glossy 35-page document titled "Our National Strategy for Victory in Iraq," spelling out a series of military, political and economic initiatives.

"This last summer there was a troop increase that really did no good in my opinion whatsoever," says Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., the new chairman of the House Armed Services Committee.

That was after Bush went to Baghdad and announced a joint effort with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to beef up security in Baghdad — and after an earlier joint effort failed to stem the tide of sectarian violence. The newer one failed too.

Skelton suggests too much attention is being paid to the latest plan's rollout.

"Whatever the president does, it is still up to the Iraqis to make or break it themselves. So let's not put any more spotlight on this decision any more than those in the past, which sadly have not been good ones," he says.

As Bush outlines his new Iraq strategy, he may well mention the new U.S. airstrikes in Somalia that targeted Islamic extremists.

He can cite the war on terrorism's multiple fronts. It fits in with his fight-them-abroad-not-at-home thesis. Administration allies suggest the U.S. withdrawal from Somalia in 1993 helped strengthen the al-Qaida terror network.

"Just as the Soviet defeat in Afghanistan emboldened and enlarged al-Qaida, just as our withdrawal from Somalia encouraged them to go find more targets, our defeat in Iraq would expand the numbers of terrorists and embolden them to seek new strategic targets," said Rep. Mac Thornberry of Texas, a Republican member of the House Armed Services Committee.

Analysts and lawmakers have mixed views on whether Bush can do anything to turn the tide in Iraq. Some say it's possible, but that the odds are low after nearly four years of war.

"Anything that would work now would have worked even better two years ago," said Michael O'Hanlon, a foreign policy analyst at Brookings Institution who served as an adviser to the Iraq Study Group. "Increasing troops has always been an option. But this is probably the least promising time to try it of the past almost four years."

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton, called for beginning to withdraw combat troops — a central recommendation Bush apparently has chosen to ignore.

Many Democrats and some Republicans await Bush's speech with skepticism.

"There is the troubling issue of the capacity of the struggling government in Iraq, consumed as it is by fractional fighting, to establish any kind of sustained governing coalition," said Ray DuBois, a Pentagon official until last March who is now with the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Rep. David Obey, D-Wis., chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, complained that Bush initially promised that Americans would stand down as Iraqis stood up. "Now it sounds like we're being told that Americans will stand up as the Iraqis are standing up. That's a confusing difference to me."

Storm Rises Over 'Surge' (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON — Is it a "surge?" Is it an "escalation?" Is it harmless semantics? Is it disingenuous spin?

One thing is clear: Using the word "surge" to describe President Bush's forthcoming plan for reshaping U.S. efforts in Iraq has ignited a fiery political brouhaha.

The plan, which Bush is scheduled to unveil today, is widely expected to include a proposal for increasing the number of American troops in Iraq. And the increase has been widely referred to by Pentagon officials and others as a "surge."

That's how the furor began, raging over the Internet, in complaints to reporters and in the blogosphere. News organizations across the country have been drawn into the fray, including NPR, CBS News, the Los Angeles Times and the Wall Street Journal.

What infuriates critics of the war, including many liberal Democrats, is that they see "surge" as a manipulative and deceptive word. It implies a relatively short-term increase in the U.S. military commitment, they say, when the White House intends to keep the additional troops in Iraq much longer, perhaps for several years.

Even worse, critics say, the news media have uncritically accepted the word and thus contributed to deceiving the public.

"I've noticed a complete acceptance on the part of most of the MSM [mainstream media] (and Congress) to accept the White House nomenclature," blogger Nicole Belle wrote in a complaint posted on crooksandliars.com.

"After six years of this, I think we all know that he who frames the debate and chooses the vocabulary wins from the beginning. Let's be sure to not accept the White House framing, no matter how wimped out the MSM is."

Some profess to see Machiavellian intrigue by White House political guru Karl Rove.

"It seems like it comes from Karl Rove … renaming things, reframing, making it sound acceptable," James A. Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University, said Tuesday on NPR's "Diane Rehm Show" when a listener called in to complain about the word.

"Please stop buying into the misleading nomenclature calling it a surge," the caller, identified as Mike from Monkton, Md., said. "Misleading the public by misnaming things might be acceptable in politics, though I find it treasonous, but it's time for the Fourth Estate to do its job."

Choosing words to one's advantage is hardly new. Advertising copy writers do it all the time. So do political advocates, as in the struggle over the "estate tax" versus the "death tax."

"These are theological disputes," said S. Robert Lichter, director of the Center for Media and Public Affairs at George Mason University. The dust-up over the word "surge" seemed to some a metaphor for the passions unleashed by the war itself. Lichter compared the debate to the struggle "for every inch, like Stalingrad."

The controversy has not been diminished by the fact that Bush and senior White House officials have steered clear of "surge" themselves.

DOJ_NMG_0114853

The Wall Street Journal, on its website, declared as early as Dec. 25 that there was a "new war of words brewing over the Iraq War."

Although critics blame pro-war spinmeisters, some military officials say "surge" has long been used in the armed forces to indicate a quick, not necessarily short-term, increase.

Army Chief of Staff Peter J. Schoomaker, for example, used the term in testimony before the House Armed Services Committee in 2003, saying, "Now there is no question that there's parts of Iraq that we need to surge troops into."

In 2004, Gen. John P. Abizaid was quoted by Army Times as saying to a group of senior U.S. commanders, "So you have this notion of using surge forces to deal with specific military problems…. The combination of base forces plus surge forces … is pretty important."

None of that has mollified critics. Complaining about the use of the word in The Times on Sunday, an e-mailer identified as Carlileb said, "What's with the uncritical use of the euphemism 'surge?' … You know, this kind of thing makes the LAT look like a propaganda flack for the Bush administration, even if that wasn't the intent."

And some bloggers claimed a measure of success with their attacks. Initially, some Democratic members of Congress had suggested they might support Bush on a "surge," but by the end of last week, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco described the plan as an escalation, as did Democrats making appearances on the Sunday talk shows.

Ironically, Frederick Kagan of conservative think tank the American Enterprise Institute, who is widely credited with helping sell the increase proposal to the White House, was quoted on the blog Media Nation as complaining that reporters were misrepresenting his ideas when they used the word "surge" to imply a short-term commitment.

"The media has been using the term 'surge' very loosely," Kagan was quoted as saying. "And I think that's actually a bit of a problem, because there have been various ideas floated for very short-term troop surges of relatively small numbers of troops. And I think that that would be a big mistake, and it's not what we're calling for."

What Kagan wants is at least 25,000 additional troops, and not for a short time.

If all that seemed a bit confusing, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow had a solution Tuesday. Braced on "surge" versus "escalation," Snow said it was up to the reporters:

"You guys do words for a living," he said. "Rather than trying to ask Democratic or even Republican lawmakers what the proper descriptive term is, you figure it out."

Democrats Rush To Frame Political Debate Over Troops (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 — "Cut and run" versus "stay the course" is so 2006.

This week has ushered in a new political battle over the language of the war: "Surge," meet "escalation."

The Democrats introduced the latter word to portray President Bush's expected proposal for a troop increase in Iraq in a negative light.

"An escalation, whether it is called a surge or any other name, is still an escalation, and I believe it will be an immense new mistake," Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, said Tuesday in a speech critiquing Mr. Bush's as-yet-unannounced Iraq plan.

Should the significance of the word be lost on those too young to remember its loaded usage during the Vietnam War, Senator Kennedy added: "The Department of Defense kept assuring us that each new escalation in Vietnam would be the last. Instead, each one led only to the next."

On Sunday, the new House speaker, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, used "escalate" or "escalation" six times during an interview on the CBS News program "Face the Nation."

Asked at his regular briefing on Tuesday about the Democrats' use of the "E" word, Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, initially said, "I think a lot of times people are going to try to find a one-word characterization that allows them to make a political point without perhaps diving into the details."

But, pressed further by a reporter to address the new "Democratic Party language," Mr. Snow said, "Well, ask the guys who do their focus groups."

Finally, he said, given that President Bush would not announce his new plan until his speech on Wednesday night, "It seems a little silly for me to start quibbling about adjectives without discussing what they purportedly describe, don't you think?"

Mr. Snow last night said that the president would not be using the word "surge" in his speech, adding that it implied what he called a "rush hour" approach to a serious policy.

Surge (surj) N. 1. A Sudden Increase . . . In Political Parlance (WP)

By Paul Farhi

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

It's one of those words -- like "chad" or "blog" or "waterboarding" -- that's suddenly become the go-to phrase to describe a contemporary phenomenon.

"Surge," the country's latest catchword, is what President Bush intends to propose tonight in a prime-time speech -- a "surge" of troops, perhaps 20,000, to bolster the American military presence in Iraq.

A surge. It conjures: the rush of the ocean tides. Or what a young person feels upon the first blush of love. Or what a sports team does late in the game. Among its definitions, "any sudden, strong increase, as of energy, enthusiasm, etc.," according to Webster's New World College Dictionary.

What we have here is shorthand for a very long debate.

The very vagueness of "surge" might make it the politically perfect word for what is likely to be a controversial policy. Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the new House speaker, framed her apparent opposition to sending more troops to Iraq by using a more freighted substitute: "escalation."

In that context, surge is a euphemism for a euphemism. "Escalation" was variously ascribed to both President Lyndon Johnson's policy of increased military aid to Vietnam, and the U.S. "incursion" -- yet more euphemisms! -- into Laos and Cambodia in 1970 under President Richard Nixon. Perhaps to avoid echoes of that war, "surge" is the Pentagon and White House's preferred coinage.

"Surge," though, has no real history or meaning as a military construct -- unlike, say, "tank" or "M-16." It doesn't appear in reference books such as the Oxford Companion to Military History, the Encyclopedia of the Vietnam War or the Encyclopedia of the U.S. Military. Nor does it show up in the Department of Defense's official Dictionary of Military and Associated Terms.

"It just seems to be a term that cropped up that seemed useful," says Lewis Sorley, a retired Army officer and prominent military historian.

Sorley notes that the word is politically savvy because "surge" seems to suggest a sharp but passing event. "If you're trying to engender support from those who have doubts about the war, it's a useful word," he says. "Because if this is a temporary event, it might be more palatable."

It's not clear who coined the word "surge" to describe troop increases. But it gained quick currency -- that is, it surged -- in November. Its first apparent journalistic use in reference to Iraq was in the New York Times on Nov. 21. A day after The Washington Post reported that the Pentagon was considering whether to deploy more troops, the Times said unnamed Pentagon officials had dubbed this "the surge option."

Thereafter, variations of the phrase "surge option" appeared in newspaper stories and TV reports, then was quickly shorthanded to "surge." (The brevity of the word even might account for its popularity in headlines -- taking up far less space than more neutral phrases, such as "troop increase.")

And that raises a question: Should the news media adopt the terminology favored by policymakers when those words can be construed as politically loaded? That question has haunted journalists for decades, stretching back to debates over abortion ("pro-choice" or "pro-life"), the Mideast ("terrorists" or "militants") and, of course, Iraq itself ("sectarian conflict" or "civil war").

"Surge" falls into "the Orwellian zone between language and politics," says Tom Rosenstiel, director of the Project for Excellence in Journalism, which studies and evaluates the media. "The president and his advisers would be remiss if they didn't come up with a term suited to their new policy. But journalists would be equally remiss if they just thoughtlessly repeated the term without pondering the policy and its implications."

The word has achieved so much currency that it was in the running to be the year's most notable, as chosen by the American Dialect Society, a 117-year-old organization of linguists, lexicographers and other "word people," at its annual meeting last week.

Wayne Glowka, an English professor at Georgia College and State University who chairs the society's new-words committee, says the group considered the word as a euphemism. That's nothing new for words with military origins, he notes. The military has long been a prime source of such words: "collateral damage" to describe civilian war deaths; "daisy cutter," for a bomb with a huge blast area; "friendly fire," for shooting at those on the same side.

"Surge" failed to win the group's word-of-the-year competition (that honor went to "Plutoed" -- to demote or devalue something, as happened to the planet last year). "The argument was that 'surge' really didn't emerge until late in the year, so it couldn't be the word for all of 2006," Glowka says. But he thinks that seems destined to change:

"I'd say it's likely to be a very important word for 2007."

With Iraq Speech, Bush To Pull Away From His Generals (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Robin Wright And Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

When President Bush goes before the American people tonight to outline his new strategy for Iraq, he will be doing something he has avoided since the invasion of Iraq in March 2003: ordering his top military brass to take action they initially resisted and advised against.

Bush talks frequently of his disdain for micromanaging the war effort and for second-guessing his commanders. "It's important to trust the judgment of the military when they're making military plans," he told The Washington Post in an interview last month. "I'm a strict adherer to the command structure."

But over the past two months, as the security situation in Iraq has deteriorated and U.S. public support for the war has dropped, Bush has pushed back against his top military advisers and the commanders in Iraq: He has fashioned a plan to add up to 20,000 troops to the 132,000 U.S. service members already on the ground. As Bush plans it, the military will soon be "surging" in Iraq two months after an election that many Democrats interpreted as a mandate to begin withdrawing troops.

Pentagon insiders say members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff have long opposed the increase in troops and are only grudgingly going along with the plan because they have been promised that the military escalation will be matched by renewed political and economic efforts in Iraq. Gen. John P. Abizaid, the outgoing head of Central Command, said less than two months ago that adding U.S. troops was not the answer for Iraq.

Bush's decision appears to mark the first major disagreement between the White House and key elements of the Pentagon over the Iraq war since Gen. Eric K. Shinseki, then the Army chief of staff, split with the administration in the spring of 2003 over the planned size of the occupation force, which he regarded as too small.

It may also be a sign of increasing assertiveness from a commander in chief described by former aides as relatively passive about questioning the advice of his military advisers. In going for more troops, Bush is picking an option that seems to have little favor beyond the White House and a handful of hawks on Capitol Hill and in think tanks who have been promoting the idea almost since the time of the invasion.

"It seems clear to me that the president has taken more positive control of this strategy," said Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), one of those pushing for more troops. "He understands that the safety of the nation and his legacy is all on the line here."

Others familiar with Bush's thinking said he had not been happy with the military's advice. "The president wasn't satisfied with the recommendations he was getting, and he thought we need a strategy that was more purposeful and likely to succeed if the Iraqis could make that possible," said Philip D. Zelikow, who recently stepped down as State Department counselor after being involved with Iraqi policy the past two years.

This impulse may well expose Bush to more criticism from Democrats on Capitol Hill, who have sharply condemned him for not listening to Shinseki's counsel in the beginning. "That lesson was pretty dramatic," Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), the new chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said yesterday. "I think a number of our military leaders have pulled their punches, and will continue to pull their punches publicly."

There is little question that more troops for Iraq seemed far from the conventional wisdom in Washington after the beating Bush and the Republican Party took in the midterm elections Nov. 7. Indeed, when Bush met with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Amman, Jordan, on Nov. 30, Maliki did not ask for more American troops as part of a new Baghdad security plan he presented to Bush, U.S. officials said.

Maliki's idea was to lower the U.S. profile, not raise it. "The message in Amman was that he wanted to take the lead and put an Iraqi face on it. He wanted to control his own forces," said a U.S. official familiar with the visit.

Another problem for the administration was the Iraq Study Group, the prestigious bipartisan panel headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III, a Republican, and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.). Soon after Bush returned from Jordan, the group delivered its recommendations, including proposing a high-level dialogue with Iran and Syria to help stabilize Iraq and setting a goal of early 2008 for the removal of almost all U.S. combat troops.

Although the president was publicly polite, few of the key Baker-Hamilton recommendations appealed to the administration, which intensified its own deliberations over a new "way forward" in Iraq. How to look distinctive from the study group became a recurring theme.

As described by participants in the administration review, some staff members on the National Security Council became enamored of the idea of sending more troops to Iraq in part because it was not a key feature of Baker-Hamilton. One senior administration official disputed that, arguing that staff members were attracted to the "surge" option to address long-standing concern that earlier efforts failed because of insufficient security forces.

A troop increase also dovetailed with ideas being championed by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.).

From only a few months after the start of the war in 2003, McCain has argued that the U.S. troop presence in Iraq is too light, and he and a handful of allies sought to use the post-election policy review to press their case. For three years, their entreaties had been blocked by then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, but after Rumsfeld was ousted by Bush the day after the election, they found their message had a more receptive audience at the White House. "There has always been within the armed forces a group of people that believes we never had the right strategy in Iraq, and they have been suppressed," Graham said.

Frederick W. Kagan of the American Enterprise Institute drafted a plan with retired Army Gen. Jack Keane for sending seven more Army brigades and Marine regiments to Iraq to provide greater security. Keane and several other experts met with Bush on Dec. 11.

But from the beginning, the Joint Chiefs resisted. They had doubts that Maliki would really confront the militias controlled by fellow Shiites, notably Moqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army. Sadr held 30 seats in Maliki's parliamentary bloc and five ministries in his cabinet.

The Joint Chiefs were also worried that sending more troops would set up the U.S. military for an even bigger failure -- with no backup options. They were concerned that the Iraqis would not deliver the troops to handle their own security efforts, as had happened in the past. They were particularly alarmed about the prospect of U.S. troops fighting in a political vacuum if the administration did not complement the military plan with political and economic changes, according to people familiar with their views.

Pentagon officials cautioned that a modest troop increase could lead to more attacks by al-Qaeda, provide more targets for Sunni insurgents and fuel the jihadist appeal for more foreign fighters to flock to Iraq to attack U.S. troops.

Even the announcement of a time frame and mission -- such as for six to eight months to secure volatile Baghdad -- would play to armed factions by allowing them to game out the new U.S. strategy, the chiefs warned the White House.

Then there was the thorny problem of finding enough troops to deploy. Those who favored a "surge," such as Kagan and McCain, were looking for a sizable force that would turn the tide in Baghdad. But the Joint Chiefs made clear they could muster 20,000 at best -- not for long, and not all at once.

The Joint Chiefs came to accept Bush's wishes, especially after new Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates traveled to Iraq last month with the Joint Chiefs chairman, Gen. Peter Pace, said a U.S. official familiar with the trip. Gates met with Maliki, who laid out more details about the Iraqi plan for Baghdad.

"That gave them enough to define a mission and its objectives," the official said. "They came back satisfied."

In the end, the White House favored the idea of more troops as one visible and dramatic step the administration could take. One senior White House official said this week the president concluded that more troops are not the only ingredient of a successful plan -- but they are a precondition to providing the security the Iraqi government needs for political reconciliation and other reforms.

Tonight, this source said, the president will explain "that we have to go up before we go down."

How Will Bush Sell His New Iraq Plan To The Public? (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON

George W. Bush has always said he wanted to be president so he could undertake bold initiatives, not just hold the title. Now, as he enters the final quarter of his presidency, he stands on the verge of his boldest move since the start of the Iraq war: an escalation of the US troop presence in Iraq, as part of a new strategy for the war.

Convincing the American people and Congress that his plan is worth supporting may be nearly as challenging as achieving some sort of victory in the war itself. But President Bush and his team have taken the plunge, launching a highly orchestrated effort to explain the plan to the public, the press, and a Congress that is talking tougher to the executive branch now that the Democrats control the majority. Bush will address the nation Wednesday at 9 p.m. EST.

With a majority of the public unhappy with the war and support for Bush's handling of Iraq hovering below 30 percent, generating much public enthusiasm for expanded US operations will be tough. Bush's new strategy could also embolden the antiwar movement. But in changing course, he is at least demonstrating to Americans that he too sees the need for change, while holding out hope that the US can achieve something positive in a situation many Americans find hopeless.

Still, in taking this move toward troop increases - combined with more money for reconstruction and required political benchmarks by the Iraqi government - he risks losing the support of people who have stuck with him on Iraq. And so, analysts say, the packaging and presentation do matter.

"Ten percent of Democrats support the president on the war, and 21 percent of independents," says independent pollster John Zogby, citing his own latest numbers. "So it's got to be a good sale, and it's not going to be enough for him to pick up some Republicans that he's lost."

The Bush administration has been building up to a change in Iraq strategy for weeks, but officials say the firm shape of the plan only emerged recently, after extensive conversations with experts and the release of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group report last month. The hard sell began in earnest on Monday, when Bush held meetings with more than 30 Republican senators at the White House. After his 25-minute speech on Wednesday night, Bush will travel to Fort Benning, Ga., on Thursday to visit with troops and make a statement to the press.

Also on Thursday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert Gates are expected to testify on Capitol Hill and later travel to the Middle East to meet with allies on the new US strategy.

White House officials argue that the vast majority of Americans do not want an immediate withdrawal from Iraq, as the polls show, and that therefore there is some openness to a new approach to the war.

"There may be something to that, but it's temporary," says John Mueller, an expert on public opinion and war at Ohio State University. "They tried that at the end of 2005, with all those speeches about victory, but nothing happened."

Now, with the expected plan to send up to 20,000 additional troops to Iraq to quell the violence and allow political and economic reform to take hold, the stakes are higher. And what Bush needs to do, says Mr. Mueller, is demonstrate how sending more troops can break the insurgency and alleviate communal warfare.

The latest wrinkle is the growing split among Democrats over how to approach Bush's plan. Some Democratic leaders are considering ways to block funding for additional troops, a potentially risky move that could open Democrats to charges that they are undermining American men and women in harm's way. Some Democrats have argued that, as commander in chief, Bush has the ultimate power to conduct war, while others, such as Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, was expected to introduce legislation Tuesday that would require approval by Congress for the cost of any troop levels above where the figure stood on Jan. 1.

On Sunday, the new Democratic House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, said on CBS's "Face the Nation" that the White House would no longer have a "blank check" for conducting the Iraq war, though she stressed that Congress was not about to cut funding.

Other Democrats, such as Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and a candidate in the 2008 presidential race, have stated that there is no constitutional way for Congress to authorize war but then cut back on funding.

Divisions among Republicans over the war are also becoming increasingly apparent. While some members, such as Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, strongly support boosting troop levels, others remain skeptical. But others, such as Sens. Gordon Smith of Oregon and Olympia Snowe of Maine, continue to express reservations.

Bush's Troop-Increase Plan Is Expected To Draw Six Guard Brigades To Iraq (NYT)

By David S. Cloud And Thom Shanker

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 — President Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq is expected to require the Army eventually to send as many as six National Guard combat brigades to Iraq, beginning in 2008.

The increased demand on the National Guard in coming years is a likely byproduct of Mr. Bush's decision, expected to be announced in a speech Wednesday night, to send five active-duty combat brigades, or about 20,000 troops, to Iraq, starting at the end of this month, according to current and former officials.

Two of those brigades are likely to be in place in Iraq by mid-February, with the rest flowing in one a month until May, according to a military official with access to a recent version of the plan. The Bush blueprint also envisions sending two additional Marine battalions to Anbar Province, as well as delaying the departure of 2,200 additional Marines now in the province.

In a governmentwide effort to expand the American commitment to Iraq, a program to operate Provincial Reconstruction Teams in Iraq will be doubled and renamed as Provincial Support Teams, a senior administration official said Tuesday. Currently, the United States operates seven of these teams and allies operate three; the Bush plan will call for adding nine more. They will be staffed by personnel from across the government — the Departments of State, Defense, Agriculture and Justice — to help neighborhoods manage economic and political development, the official said.

It remains unclear whether Mr. Bush will discuss the heightened future demand on the National Guard during his much-anticipated address but identifying the additional units for possible deployment is likely to begin in the days and weeks after he delivers the speech. That process would raise the political stakes for Mr. Bush, since it would highlight the increased contribution his plan would require from reserve units.

The full extent of the National Guard role in future years will also depend on whether conditions in Iraq improve enough to permit significant overall troop reductions. Of the 15 combat brigades now in Iraq, only one is from the Guard. Depending on how it is organized, an Army brigade typically has between 3,500 and 5,000 troops, and a battalion about 1,200.

National Guard combat units that have already gone to Iraq and returned may have to be sent back for second tours in order to relieve some of the stress on the active duty Army, Pentagon officials said Tuesday. Such a move would most likely require revising a Pentagon policy that has limited mobilization of Guard units to 24 months every five years, officials said.

National Guard officials said Tuesday that they had not been notified that Mr. Bush would require a greater combat role for the Guard beginning next year. Guard officials have spent the last several months fighting attempts by some Army officials to have the 24-month deployment limit loosened.

But several Guard officials said Tuesday they would not be surprised to see Mr. Bush make changes in mobilization time limits so that Guard units would be eligible for duty in Iraq sooner.

Maj. Gen. Roger Lemke, the head of Nebraska National Guard and of the association that represents state Guard officials, said in an interview that many guard units were short of equipment and would need to be re-equipped to be useful in Iraq. He also said the Guard would like to shorten the predeployment training in the United States, and do more of it in the units' home states to lessen the burden on their soldiers, who must leave civilian jobs to serve.

The first active-duty unit that are likely to move to Baghdad would be a brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division now in Kuwait, Pentagon officials said Tuesday. The elite light infantry of the brigade is especially useful in urban operations.

Should Mr. Bush want other brigades to accelerate their arrival in Iraq, he then would look to a brigade of the Third Infantry Division, from Fort Stewart, Ga., that is already set to head for Iraq later this month but whose departure could be pushed up. The next brigade in line for Iraq is one from the First Infantry Division at Fort Hood, Tex., military officials said.

Pentagon and military officials said Tuesday that large and continued deployments in Iraq would put particular strain on those performing certain military tasks in the National Guard and Reserve, in particular military police, engineers, civil affairs, and transportation and trucking units. But efforts are under way to fill the need through volunteers from within the Guard and Reserve before resorting to forced remobilizations.

A range of senior Army officials have said since the autumn that the Iraq mission could not be sustained without fuller access to the reserves.

The question of how best to manage them presents the Bush administration with a political conundrum: how to balance the pressing need for troops in the field against promises to limit overseas deployments for the Guard.

While the National Guard's goal is to guarantee five years at home between foreign deployments, it has been sending units every three to four years, according to Guard officials. The Guard and Reserve were used most extensively in Iraq and Afghanistan in 2004, and have regularly supplied brigades throughout the fighting.

Also presenting a problem is that many Guard members have been deployed to Iraq or Afghanistan as individuals, and not with their full units, and in that process have come close to fulfilling their 24 months under the president's current mobilization order.

In what officers call "Swiss cheese units," some military units have been hollowed out by members who could be off-limits for overseas duty, restricting the ability to send the entire team, unless the restrictions are reinterpreted or erased so that these individual members, who have already deployed, could be sent overseas again with their entire units.

Military Backing Of Bush War Policies Takes A Hit (DMN)

By David Mclemore

The Dallas Morning News, January 10, 2007

As President Bush prepares to announce his plans to add troops in Iraq, more active-duty troops now disapprove of the president's war policies than support them, according to a year-end survey by Military Times newspapers.

Experts say the results, drawn from some of the more conservative career-track military, reflect a growing weariness and frustration over lack of progress in Iraq and Afghanistan.

And, according to Paul Rieckhoff, founder and executive director of Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America, the result could be increased problems with retention and recruitment.

"What's not reflected in the poll is the sense of exhaustion and stress placed on the troops and their families," Mr. Rieckhoff said. "We've seen tremendous sacrifices by soldiers and their families with two or more deployments, a lot of dead and wounded, and for what?"

On Wednesday, Mr. Bush is expected to announce his plan for Iraq and call for a surge in troops of at least 20,000. Democrats and Republicans alike have assailed the surge as too little, too late.

The survey, mailed to 6,000 active-duty subscribers to Military Times' four newspapers aimed at the military services, showed that 42 percent of those surveyed disapprove of Mr. Bush's handling of the war, compared with 35 percent who support it.

It marks the first time that the president's Iraq war policies failed to gain majority support since the Military Times began its annual survey four years ago.

A spokesman for the Defense Department declined to comment, noting that the survey was not a representative sampling of the entire military.

Michele Flournoy, senior adviser for international security at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said the results are significant in that they demonstrate the growing divide between the military and the Bush administration.

"The military is a consistently conservative swath of the population that is now showing significant decline in support of the war," she said. "However, I don't see it influencing the administration's views on the conduct of the war. The White House is aware there is significant debate nationally that reflects a deep divide over Iraq, but they've just named new commanders who will salute smartly and go forward."

This year's survey also showed a 15 percentage point decline in those who believe the U.S. should have gone to war in Iraq – to 41 percent from 56 percent reported last year.

The "findings are consistent with what we hear from our membership – and it results from a growing sense of frustration over the lack of progress in Iraq," said Mr. Rieckhoff.

Not surprised

John Pike, executive director of the defense startegy think tank Globalsecurity.org, does not find the results so surprising.

"I'd be more concerned if the results didn't reflect a similarity with the general public," Mr. Pike said. "It's not good news for President Bush, though I don't see this as a problem for continuing his Iraq policy. It doesn't reflect anything like the disaffection in the ranks we saw in Vietnam, when some units declined combat towards the end of the war."

Phillip Carter, whose military analysis blog Intel Dump is popular with veterans and armchair generals alike, said the military's disillusionment stems, in part, from weariness from three years of repeated and lengthy deployments and an uncertain war plan. The president's proposal to "surge" an additional 20,000 to 30,000 troops into Iraq to better secure violence-racked Baghdad for a beleaguered Iraqi government hasn't made things better, he said.

"The military establishment is skeptical of the president's plan to surge more troops," said Mr. Carter, an attorney and Army Reserve captain who served in Iraq in 2004. "They may be more quick to ascribe political motives to a plan they are skeptical will actually work.

"What I don't see is a liberalizing of the military," he said. "The real gap is between the expectations of 2002 and the realities of 2007. ... The military has worked its butt off in Iraq and Afghanistan, and they will accept the sacrifice of being in harm's way if it's going to work. If it's not going to work, they're going to ask if it's worth it."

It's not just the junior and midlevel officers and enlisted ranks that find little to like about the surge.

Gen. John Abizaid, soon to be replaced as commander of the Central Command, told Congress recently that bringing additional U.S. troops would not add to the ability to achieve success.

And syndicated columnist Oliver North, one of the president's staunchest allies on Iraq, wrote in a Jan. 5 column, "A 'surge' or 'targeted increase in U.S. troop strength' or whatever the politicians want to call dispatching more combat troops to Iraq isn't the answer. Adding more trainers and helping the Iraqis to help themselves, is. Sending more U.S. combat troops is simply sending more targets."

Morale implications

Mr. Pike of GlobalSecurity.org does not see a decline in military morale in the survey's findings.

"It's simply that this was not a well-planned nor well-executed war," he said. "There is a failure on the part of leadership to communicate to the military and to the nation why we're fighting in Iraq.

"Historians will find that war policy is not this administration's strong point. But the reasons to be in Iraq will withstand scrutiny," Mr. Pike said. "The policies in Iraq can be salvaged and must be salvaged. The alternative of just simply pulling out and leaving is hard to think about."

According to Robert Hodierne, senior managing editor at Army Times Publishing Co., the mail survey was conducted Nov. 13 through Dec. 22 of 6,000 subscribers to Army Times, Navy Times, Air Force Times and Marine Times. The margin of error is plus or minus 3 percentage points.

The Military Times publications are independent of the military and its annual survey should not be read as representative of the military as a whole, he said. Nor should the survey be considered anti-Bush, since his overall performance as president surveyed at 52 percent, still significantly higher than the mid-30s polled among the general population.

"Our subscribers are older, averaging about 36, and are largely the more career-oriented senior enlisted and field-grade officers or above," Mr. Hodierne said. "This is the professional core of the military, and I hope that the Bush administration is paying attention to what the troops say.

"These are not some liberal, cut-and-run types. These are the people who stand and give the orders that put other lives at risk, and they're saying they don't have confidence in how the war is being conducted."

Disconnect shown

The findings also show a disconnect between the military and their civilian leadership.

Some 32 percent agreed that the civilian leadership has the military's best interest at heart, while 59 percent disagreed. And 72 percent believe the military is stretched too thin because of the war to be effective.

That tracks closely with sentiments expressed throughout the ranks of Iraq and Afghanistan war veterans, Mr. Rieckhoff said.

"The management of the war has been consistently problematic, and a lot of troops see the surge as just another [half-baked] policy to wage war on the cheap," Mr. Rieckhoff said. "There's a lot of concern that we just continue to sacrifice while everyone else goes shopping."

"What we're hearing military folks say is that the GOP got us in the mess and the Democrats don't have a plan to get us out," Mr. Rieckhoff said. "We're a people without a party."

Nor should anyone fear the military will slack off on its combat responsibilities, Mr. Rieckhoff said.

Over time, the military's disaffection with Bush administration war policies may translate into recruitment and retention problems, he said.

"We're working under an operational tempo that is grinding our people down," Mr. Rieckhoff said. "The military is stretched thin, equipment is worn out and needs replacing and a lot of people who truly love the military are opting out for civilian jobs. And we're losing a lot of excellent people we really can't afford to lose."

Grim Picture Of Iraq From US Government Watchdog (AFP)

AFP, January 10, 2007

US government auditors released a grim report card of the American record in violence-wracked Iraq, on the eve of President George W. Bush's televised rollout of a new strategy.

The report by the Government Accountability Office (GAO) ran a critical rule over a previous failed US plan for victory, the malfunctioning Iraqi government government and security forces and fearsome insurgent and sectarian violence.

It said the Pentagon had failed to allow proper congressional oversight of Iraqi armed forces, and warned of an increasing strain on US forces pressed into repeated tours of duty and shortages of military supplies.

Though admitting that Iraq experienced three successful elections, adopted a constitution and installed its first elected government since the 2003 US invasion, the report underlined systemic problems in the US record in the country.

"Increasing Iraqi security forces and transferring security responsibilities to them have not resulted in reduced violence," David Walker, US Comptroller General wrote in an accompanying letter to Congress.

"Rather, attacks increased throughout 2006. Although more Iraqi troops have been trained and equipped, high absenteeism and divided loyalties have limited their overall effectiveness."

As Bush prepared to lay out his new strategy on Iraq in a prime time televised address on Wednesday, the GAO audit said his previous plan for victory in Iraq contained serious flaws.

Though the "National Strategy for Victory in Iraq" unveiled in November 2005 was an improvement over previous plans, it failed to identify key government agencies supposed to carry the strategy out, the report said.

It also did not address how the US will integrate its goals with those of Iraqis and foreign nations, and only partially identified current and future costs of US involvement in Iraq, the report said.

The survey, intended to prepare lawmakers to mount effective congressional oversight of Bush's new strategy for Iraq, also warned that oil and electricity production in Iraq were falling well short of US goals.

As Democrats who won control of Congress in November warn that Bush will have no "blank check" to continue operations in Iraq, the GAO said the United States is likely to incur costs in the foreseeable future "in the hundreds of billions of dollars."

The report also raised new questions as to the combat readiness of US-trained Iraqi troops and security forces, crucial to the prospect of the US forces returning home.

DOJ_NMG_0114861

As of December 2006, around 323,000 members of the Iraqi security forces had been trained and equipped, and 128 army units had specific security responsibilities, the report said.

But the GAO raised questions about the quality of the units. It said the Pentagon had repeatedly refused access to Transition Readiness Assessments (TRA) prepared by coalition advisors embedded with the units.

"This serves to limit congressional oversight over the progress achieved towards a critical US objective," the report said.

Iraq Policy Surgery (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

Bush needs to present a realistic plan tonight that includes conditions for bringing the troops home.

TWO COMPETING realities are vying for center stage as President Bush prepares to address the American people tonight on his "new way forward" in Iraq.

In the tidy Washington narrative, the future of American involvement in Mesopotamia has been reduced to a simplistic "to surge or not to surge" question. Once again, a complicated, life-and-death geopolitical matter is reduced to a scoreboard friendly, blue team vs. red team framework.

The notion that the "surge" in U.S. troops under discussion — about 20,000 combat troops on top of the 132,000 already in Iraq — amounts to a new policy is laughable. Adding troops is a tactic, a means toward an end, not a serious strategy — except maybe in the Washington reality in which politicians on both sides of the debate benefit from pretending that a short-term number is a question for the ages.

It allows Bush to pretend he is taking bold action to alter the course of a deteriorating war. And it allows Democrats to oppose something concrete and possibly to atone for their original support for the war without having to risk their political fortunes by calling for a complete withdrawal.

The commander in chief needs to set aside his wearisome spin, transcend the phony Washington reality and confront squarely the all-too-real tragedy unfolding in Iraq, a nation whose civil war is intensifying on our watch.

As we have argued before, a temporary increase in troops may be necessary, especially to pacify Baghdad. But only as part of a comprehensive — and comprehensible — plan to secure and democratize Iraq. The president needs to explain tonight exactly what he will do with the U.S. military force should the government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki fail to carry out a minimum of stability enhancing measures.

Washington must issue an ultimatum to Baghdad to disrupt Shiite militias linked to the government and to forge an equitable distribution of political power and national riches across sectarian divides. The question for Bush tonight isn't so much whether to send in 20,000 additional troops, it's whether the reinforcements will have a goal worth fighting for and a plan with a chance of success.

It's been leaked that Bush also will advocate a new, $1-billion jobs program for Iraqis. That sounds like a significant enhancement to the military escalation, but Americans are no doubt weary of the administration's repeated claims that victory is right around the corner. What is this additional $1 billion going to accomplish that the $30 billion already spent on that nation's reconstruction failed to do?

Bush needs to spell out a realistic plan for ameliorating the ongoing disaster in Iraq. But if he wants to reassure Americans and give warning to Shiite leaders in Baghdad, he must do something more. The president needs to articulate the conditions under which the U.S. will pull out altogether, in the near future. As painful as that would be, it sure beats becoming embroiled in someone else's civil war.

Love Among The Ruins (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON

It isn't really a romance turned sour, because it was never sweet.

The American military's cocky heroes were supposed to sweep in and carry off a poor, grateful Iraq to security and bliss, like Richard Gere did Debra Winger in the finale of "An Officer and a Gentleman." The strategy was: Love lift us up where we belong/Where the eagles cry/On a mountain high.

Didn't happen. Yet the search goes on, in this country obsessed with hookups and breakups, for the right relationship metaphor to describe our deadly embrace of Iraq.

My colleague Tom Friedman wrote last week: "Whenever I hear this surge idea, I think of a couple who recently got married but the marriage was never very solid. Then one day they say to each other, 'Hey, let's have a baby, that will bring us together.' It never works. If the underlying union is not there, adding a baby won't help."

DOJ_NMG_0114862

Juan Williams repeated Tom's metaphor on Fox News, agreeing that "a bad relationship" cannot afford the "pressure" of a newborn.

One reporter who writes about the war told me he thinks of the American entrenchment in Iraq more like a marriage that's run out of gas, but you decide to stay together because of the kids.

Bill Maher used a bawdier metaphor of a man who promises his date a glorious romp, doesn't deliver, and then just refuses to admit it and get out.

Some women say that the Surge will not work because it's like starting over with an old boyfriend: you think you've learned the pitfalls and can resume with more success — you can set benchmarks! — but instead you're swiftly ensnared by the same old failures. And the most maddening romances, of course, are those in which you think you have the power, you should have the power, but somehow in the end, you don't have the power.

Many Bush officials and lawmakers now talk about the Iraqis with impatience, as though they are deadbeat relatives who have got to stop putting the pinch on us for a billion a week and try harder, in the immortal words of Rummy, "to pull up their socks."

They may still speak diplomatically, but in body language, Condoleezza Rice and her chosen new deputy, John Negroponte, radiate irritation with the Iraqis, as though they are the most irksome of cousins or in-laws who have long overstayed their welcome, or children who not only don't thank you for presents but also leave the playroom a mess.

The favorite analogy of Rummy and others who pushed the war was parent-child. "If you never take the training wheels off a kid's bicycle," Paul Wolfowitz would say, "he'll never learn to ride without them."

But that is too Norman Rockwell for a scene straight out of Hieronymus Bosch.

At times, the American-Iraqi relationship seems so cursed that the most apt metaphor would be a fairy tale like "The Golden Goose" of the Brothers Grimm, in which a girl sees a bling bird that belongs to a despised boy and tries to pluck a feather for herself, but instead her hand gets stuck fast to the goose. Her sister comes along, thinking she can snatch a feather, but she gets stuck as soon as she touches the first girl. Then there's a Surge, when the third sister rushes to help but ends up stuck in a daisy chain of disaster.

With the Surge, as with the invasion of Iraq, W. is like the presumptuous date "who reserves a hotel room and then asks you to the prom," as my friend Dana Calvo put it.

Teddy Kennedy gave a speech at the National Press Club yesterday about his new legislation that would require Congressional approval before troop levels can be increased. Afterward, he was asked if he would try to block the escalation with an amendment to an upcoming Iraq spending request.

"The horse will be out of the barn by the time we get there," Senator Kennedy replied. "The president makes his speech now. We're going to get the appropriation request probably the end of January, early February." He said it could take eight more weeks for Congress to act. "By that time, the troops will already be there," he said. "And then we'll be asked, are we going to deny the body armor to the young men and women over there?"

In other words, the president will ask us to the prom once he reserves the hotel room.

A Couple Of Polarizers (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

If any Americans could truly understand Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, George Bush and Karl Rove should. All three firmly believe that the successful politician must above all cultivate his base -- not that any of them can point to recent successes.

In refusing to do anything to curtail the anti-Sunni pogroms of Moqtada al-Sadr's legions, Maliki, after all, is just dancin' with the ones that brung him. He owes his office to Sadr. More broadly, he is the governmental leader of the Shiites at the very moment they and the Sunnis have embarked on a ghastly civil war. He is nominally also Iraq's prime minister, but if there was even a scintilla of doubt about the true object of his loyalties, it was dispelled by his execution of Saddam Hussein. Maliki is the prime minister of Shiite rage, a position that offers a good deal more security than that of dispassionate prime minister of a nation at war with itself.

Yet tonight, President Bush will announce that Maliki has changed. He will also announce that he is sending additional U.S. forces to Iraq, but he's done that before, in almost comparable numbers, to no good effect. What's different this time, we are to believe, is that the Iraqis will join us in trying to suppress the sectarian violence.

Maliki will order his forces to swarm Sadr City. He'll deploy Kurdish battalions throughout Baghdad, since Sunnis and Shiites aren't suited for the task (assuming, however improbably, that the Kurds want to hurl themselves into the middle of the Sunni-Shiite war).

Why Bush believes the Iraqi prime minister will actually do this is anybody's guess. For Maliki to cordon off Sadr City is a little like Bush blockading Southern Baptist churches, or surrounding the headquarters of the National Rifle Association and telling everyone to come out with hands up. Bush expects Maliki to turn against his own -- a gambit nowhere to be found in Bush and Rove's own political playbook.

America's most polarizing president is telling Iraq's polarizing prime minister to stop polarizing. It's possible, I suppose, Bush told Maliki that the lesson of our November election is that polarizing doesn't always work to your advantage, but the fact that Bush has only stepped up his commitment to his ruinous policy in Iraq, against overwhelming bipartisan advice to the contrary, suggests that that idea hasn't even crossed his mind.

Bush, we're told, is now interested chiefly in the verdict of history, hoping that historians hence will view him as another Harry Truman, who fought for American values and interests even after the electorate had turned against him. But neither the presidents nor their wars are analogous. As was not the case in the war between the Koreas, neither side in Iraq's civil strife is aligned with our values or interests. Unlike Bush, Truman sought and obtained U.N. support for our efforts.

But suppose Maliki is interested in the verdict of history, too. Suppose he wants his lifelong commitment to the Shiite cause to be crowned by his transformation of majority-Shiite Iraq into a fundamentally (though not necessarily fundamentalist) Shiite republic. Why, again, does Bush expect Maliki to change his spots when Bush hasn't changed his?

Indeed, one of Bush's defining characteristics is his unyielding adherence to the same policies even as the justifications for those policies shift or negate themselves. He first sought his tax cuts because our peacetime budget surplus was too large, then because we were at war and consumers needed to spend as though we weren't, then because our deficit could best be closed by the rich retaining more money to invest (albeit in China). He sought the war in Iraq to rid the world of Saddam Hussein and his weapons of mass destruction and to stop Hussein from sheltering al-Qaeda. As Ted Kennedy reminded us yesterday, the weapons didn't exist, Hussein is gone and Bush's war has only brought al-Qaeda more recruits. But our presence in Iraq continues unabated and, if Bush gets his way, will be escalated.

Bush's speech tonight will contain some alterations of policy, of course. Way too late, he's calling for a Marshall Plan for Iraq, with New Dealish public employment projects supplanting the flat-tax policies he had hoped to bring to the Middle East. But our basic policy remains basically the same, the expressed desire of the American electorate to reverse course notwithstanding. Unless and until Congress stops him, Bush will keep on doing what he's doing, and the hard-core conservatives will stick with him. The mystery is why he believes Maliki, and the hard-core Shiites, will behave any differently.

The Media Aren't The Enemy In Iraq (LAT)

Max Boot

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

Blaming the press for the problems in Iraq deflects the blame from where it belongs.

IF WE WIND UP losing the war in Iraq, as now appears likely (though not inevitable), many conservatives know who to blame: the press, or, in blogger-speak, the MSM (mainstream news media). Just as it did during the Vietnam War, a myth is likely to develop in which America's valiant fighting men and women were stabbed in the back by unpatriotic, even treasonous, reporters.

Administration spokesmen and many soldiers have been saying for years that things aren't so bad in Iraq. "If you just watched what's happening every time there's a bomb going off in Baghdad, you'd think the whole country's aflame," Donald Rumsfeld declared for the umpteenth time just before leaving office. "But you fly over it, and that's just simply not the case."

Such protestations are natural from someone who's likely to go down in history as Robert McNamara redux. But this refrain has been taken up by even the most sophisticated and disinterested observers on the right. James Q. Wilson, a longtime professor at Harvard, UCLA and Pepperdine, published a scathing essay in the autumn issue of the Manhattan Institute's City Journal in which he complained that "positive stories about progress in Iraq were just a small fraction of all the broadcasts." He went on to draw an analogy with the Tet offensive in 1968, which the press widely reported as an American failure even though it was a military defeat for North Vietnam.

"We won the Second World War in Europe and Japan," he concluded, "but we lost in Vietnam and are in danger of losing in Iraq and Lebanon in the newspapers, magazines and television programs we enjoy."

Actually, it's not at all clear that the Vietnam War was lost in the media. Reporters were initially gung-ho about the war; they went into opposition only after it became clear that the military and the Johnson administration had no plan for victory.

In any case, the Tet analogy is dubious, because it is hard to find any signs of U.S. progress in the Iraq conflict comparable to the devastation the Viet Cong suffered in 1968.

Even if you go by the Bush administration's own assessment, conditions today are bleak. In November, the Defense Department issued a congressionally mandated report that found that violence was "escalating" to "the highest [levels] on record." Meanwhile, the report found, attempts at national reconciliation have "shown little progress." In short, the apocalyptic condition of Iraq (at least of the non-Kurdish regions) is not an invention of the news media. It's reality.

THAT ISN'T TO deny that there has been some biased, slipshod news coverage. To my mind, there has been too much emphasis on American casualties and American abuses, both of which are low by historical standards. There has been too much Baghdad-centric reporting, which slights differing conditions in outlying regions. And, of course, in Iraq, as elsewhere, media coverage inevitably focuses on daily disasters at the expense of long-term trends.

Initially, I thought that this institutional bias toward sensationalism distorted public understanding of the war. But by now the dismal conditions on the ground have caught up with, if not surpassed, the media's bleak outlook.

Whatever the shortcomings of some reporting, there has been a lot of first-rate coverage by a heroic corps of correspondents that has persevered in the face of terrible danger. (At least 109 journalists have been killed and many others wounded or kidnapped, making this the deadliest conflict on record for the Fourth Estate.) I am thinking of reporters such as John Burns, Dexter Filkins and Michael Gordon of the New York Times; Greg Jaffe and Michael Philips of the Wall Street Journal; Tom Ricks of the Washington Post; Tony Perry of the Los Angeles Times and former Times reporter John Daniszewski; Sean Naylor of Army Times; Bing West and Robert Kaplan of the Atlantic Monthly; and George Packer of the New Yorker. They've risked their necks to get the truth — and not, as Rumsfeld suggested, by flying over Iraq.

If you wanted to figure out what was happening over the last four years, you would have been infinitely better off paying attention to their writing than to what the president or his top generals were saying. If we fail to achieve our goals in Iraq — which the administration defines as a "unified, stable, democratic and secure nation" — it won't be the fault of the ink-stained wretches or even their blow-dried TV counterparts. To argue otherwise deflects blame from those who deserve it, in the upper echelons of the administration and the armed forces. Perhaps that's the point.

Set A Spending Limit On Iraq (LAT)

By Bruce Ackerman, Bruce Ackerman Is A Professor Of Law And Political Science At Yale And The Author Of "Before The Nex

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

Congress should creatively use its power of the purse to keep Iraq from becoming an indefinite quagmire.

THERE ARE LOTS of bad ways for Congress to respond to President Bush's escalation in Iraq. But there is one good way: Set a price tag on the long-run cost of the war — say $500 billion — and tell the president that he won't be getting a penny more.

Without counting the cost of the much-anticipated "surge," we will have spent about $350 billion on the war by spring. Setting a long-term ceiling is the only step that will force the president to recognize that the American people are no longer willing to give him a blank check for an endless series of mistakes.

We have been suffering under a false dichotomy: Either Congress immediately cuts off funds, or the president can do what he wants. But there is a third way: Congress sets the ultimate financial constraint, leaving it to the president and his generals to figure out the most sensible way to spend their limited resources. The president is given a significant time horizon to plan and execute. But he can't run a war without money and must either succeed or prepare a serious exit strategy as the ceiling is reached.

Congress should engage in vigorous oversight in the meantime, but it should resist the temptations of micromanagement. As long as the president stays within the half-trillion-dollar limit, Congress should grant requests for funds without pretending that it can condition particular appropriations on the Iraqis meeting benchmarks. That is a pointless shell game. The president would predictably say that the Iraqis are making substantial progress, and when the money runs out, he would confront Congress with another demand: Give me another $75 billion or you will be undercutting the troops.

We have already learned this lesson. The war has never been funded in a straightforward fashion. The administration has refused to present Congress with clear-cut requests as part of the standard appropriations process. Claiming uncertainty, the White House has muddled its way forward with a series of ad hoc demands for emergency appropriations, which are now adding up to the hundreds of billions.

The Democrats, to their credit, have already made it plain that this muddle must come to an end. The new Congress will insist that the Defense Department treat its war expenditures as part of its regular budgetary request for fiscal 2008. Now all that is needed is a resolution denying the administration a blank check into the indefinite future.

During its first 100 hours, the House has reintroduced budget-balancing rules for the civilian side of the budget. It should act to restore a similar sense of fiscal reality on the military side. Congress should add a rider to the next Iraq appropriations bill that imposes a sensible ceiling on the entire operation. The president won't have any choice but to sign the bill if he wants the money.

Under plausible budget scenarios, Congress will reach another decision point some time in 2008, when the cumulative military appropriations begin to move toward the half-trillion-dollar mark. The president can try to persuade Congress to repeal this limit and argue for more money. But we will then be in the middle of an election campaign, and few politicians will be brave enough to buck the tide of public opinion. Unless voters experience a remarkable conversion on Iraq, Republicans will be joining Democrats in insisting that the remaining money should be spent on a realistic exit strategy.

This moment is comparable to 1968, when Americans voted against President Johnson's escalation of the Vietnam War. Despite this clear message, it took seven more years before President Ford presided over the painful defeat. We may find ourselves in the same quagmire unless Congress proves more creative than its predecessors in exercising the powers of the purse.

A Time For Candor (USAT)

By Don Campbell

USA Today, January 10, 2007

The nation will again hear President Bush's recalibration of the strategy to 'win' the war in Iraq. For any student of history, or simply any American who lived through the Vietnam War, the echoes are unmistakable.

As President Bush prepares tonight to share his latest strategy for Iraq in a nationally televised speech to the American people, it's appropriate to recall some things he had to say on this subject in his State of the Union address almost a year ago.

Bush talked about how "our coalition" had learned from our experience in Iraq and how we were winning. He held out the prospect for troop reductions, but said, "those decisions will be made by our military commanders, not by politicians in Washington."

He promised to reach out to Congress and seek "your good advice" in the coming year. And then, in an obvious attempt to inoculate himself against criticism, he drew repeated applause with these memorable words: "Yet there is a difference between responsible criticism that aims for success and defeatism that refuses to acknowledge anything but failure. Hindsight alone is not wisdom, and second-guessing is not a strategy. With so much in the balance, those of us in public office have a duty to speak with candor."

Amen to that last line.

But candor is the one thing that has been missing since before the invasion of Iraq even began. Under the category "responsible criticism," I'd submit that Bush's record in this area has gone from bad to worse. He has a chance this week, and again in his sixth State of the Union address later this month, to change that.

Where things went wrong

I don't know how much "good advice" he got from Congress on increasing troop levels in Iraq, but he's the commander in chief; if he thinks we need 20,000 more troops in Iraq, he'll have my support. Frankly, I wish he'd sent 10 times that many additional troops to Iraq back in 2003 instead of strutting around the deck of that aircraft carrier in the Pacific under the banner that declared "Mission Accomplished."

The problem with the debate over Iraq is that we spend too much time arguing about how we got into this predicament—the war is really about oil or about a Bush family grudge against Saddam Hussein or about a seductively simple geopolitical theory, which holds that if you sprinkle the seeds of democracy in a barren desert, they will sprout and bloom like Texas bluebonnets. Or it's about whether we invaded that country under false pretenses.

Meanwhile, contrary to Bush's claim of a year ago, no one seems to have learned anything in Iraq that might inform national security policy and military strategy in the future. Wisdom gained from hindsight becomes foresight and is better than no wisdom at all. In ignoring that, Bush has squandered the goodwill and credibility he earned by his admirable performance in the first days after 9/11.

He has refused to ask the American people to share in the sacrifice that the war on terror and our commitments in Afghanistan and Iraq have placed disproportionately on the volunteers in the armed forces. But it's either everybody's war or nobody's war. At a minimum, he should have proposed a broad-based special tax to refurbish the military and create a global network of anti-terrorist operatives.

He misjudged what it would take to stabilize Iraq once Saddam was ousted, because of a misplaced optimism about the appeal of freedom and democracy in a sectarian culture in which too many people would rather kill each other than co-exist. At a minimum, he should have sealed the borders, flooded the country with half a million troops, bribed Saddam's army officers and cut through the bureaucratic red tape that impeded re-construction.

Bush was unprepared for the transition from fighting a conventional war with forces trained to kill people and break things to waging a counterinsurgency where troops become the Peace Corps in cammies trying to win the hearts and minds of the people.

Despite his overtures to Congress in that speech a year ago, he has refused, whether out of hubris or because of a blind spot, to listen to those wary of administration war tactics and strategies. If he had, he'd have heard predictions that Iraq was a quagmire waiting to happen.

And he has not convinced enough Americans that fighting terrorism is the greatest challenge of the 21st century and will remain so, regardless of the outcome in Iraq — and maybe even more so because of the outcome in Iraq.

Optimism and Vietnam

It's not too late for President Bush to acknowledge reality, and perhaps improve his legacy before media pundits and historians carve it in stone. Some of us are old enough to remember the last two White House years of another president from Texas, Lyndon Johnson, and that he left office dispirited and reviled because of the war in Vietnam.

In his penultimate State of the Union speech, in 1968, LBJ was still talking optimistically about the elections that had been held in South Vietnam, how America would persevere and how "aggression will never prevail." In his last State of the Union address, just days before he left office in 1969, he talked of how the prospects for peace in Vietnam were better than at any time since North Vietnam invaded the South, and how the North Vietnamese knew they could not win.

After that speech, and before we abandoned Saigon six years later, another 21,000 Americans died in Vietnam.

Vietnam and Iraq have few similarities, but on two counts they are identical twins. In both wars, the commander in chief underestimated the enemy. And in both wars, the commander in chief failed to "speak with candor."

Lessons For One Last Try (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

What makes sense in Iraq? The political debate is becoming sharply polarized again, as President Bush campaigns for a new "surge" strategy. But some useful military guideposts can be found in a new field manual of counterinsurgency warfare prepared by the general who is about to take command of U.S. forces in Baghdad.

Lt. Gen. David Petraeus supervised the development of the manual when he ran the Army's training center at Fort Leavenworth, before he had any idea he would be heading back to Baghdad as the top commander. In that sense, the document reflects a senior officer's best judgment about what will work and what won't -- independent of the details of the current "to surge or not to surge" debate. The manual was published by the Army last month and can be downloaded at http://www.leavenworth.army.mil.

Two themes stood out for me as I read the document. The first is that success in counterinsurgency requires a political strategy as much as a military one. The second is that broad political support back home -- which buys time on the battlefield -- is the crucial strategic asset in fighting such wars.

The manual doesn't offer any specific advice for the current debate. But its precepts do raise some basic questions for Bush as he frames his new strategy: Will the new approach build bipartisan support for Iraq policy? And will it open a path toward an Iraqi political solution, as opposed to an American military effort to impose order?

"Counterinsurgency is not just thinking man's warfare -- it is the graduate level of war," reads a quotation from a Special Forces officer in Iraq that opens the first chapter. And this theme runs throughout the manual: Many of the prescriptions that apply to normal wars don't apply to counterinsurgencies. Indeed, if they are used, they will backfire. In a summary of "unsuccessful practices," here's the No. 1 mistake: "Overemphasize killing and capturing the enemy rather than securing and engaging the populace."

The field manual summarizes some of the lessons that commanders have learned in Iraq: Long-term success "depends on the people taking charge of their own affairs and consenting to the government's rule." Killing insurgents "by itself cannot defeat an insurgency." Local commanders "have the best grasp of their situations" and should have the freedom to adapt and react to local conditions. As many officers ruefully admit, the Army is learning these lessons three years late -- but perhaps that's still in time to make a difference.

My favorite part of the manual, which I suspect Petraeus had a big hand in drafting, is a section titled "Paradoxes of Counterinsurgency Operations." The headings give the flavor of these unconventional ideas: "Sometimes, the More You Protect Your Force, the Less Secure You May Be." (Green Zone residents, please note: "If military forces remain in their compounds, they lose touch with the people, appear to be running scared, and cede the initiative to the insurgents.") "Sometimes Doing Nothing Is the Best Reaction." "Some of the Best Weapons for Counterinsurgents Do Not Shoot." And this military version of the Zen riddle: "The More Successful the Counterinsurgency Is, the Less Force Can Be Used and the More Risk Must Be Accepted." (As the host nation takes control, "Soldiers and Marines may also have to accept more risk to maintain involvement with the people.")

The abiding lesson of this manual comes in one of Petraeus's paradoxes, and it ought to be engraved as the cornerstone of U.S. policy going forward, regardless of whether there is a troop surge: "The Host Nation Doing Something Tolerably Is Normally Better than Us Doing It Well." In making this point, Petraeus cites the godfather of counterinsurgency warriors, Gen. Creighton Abrams, who said when he was U.S. commander in Vietnam in 1971: " We can't run this thing. . . . They've got to run it."

It's Petraeus's luck, good or bad, that he has a chance to see whether these precepts of counterinsurgency warfare can still work in Iraq, despite all the mistakes made over the past three years. His chances will be slim if President Bush and the Democratic Congress can't agree on a bipartisan plan for Iraq. Newt Gingrich, the Republican former House speaker, put it succinctly on "Meet the Press" last month: "This can't be Bush's war" -- it has to be the country's. That's the real danger of a troop surge: It sets up a showdown between the president and his critics that could shred the chances for a stable, sustainable policy that might embody some of the military lessons we have finally learned.

Democrats Plan Symbolic Votes Against Bush's Iraq Troop Plan (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny And Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 — Democratic leaders said Tuesday that they intended to hold symbolic votes in the House and Senate on President Bush's plan to send more troops to Baghdad, forcing Republicans to take a stand on the proposal and seeking to isolate the president politically over his handling of the war.

Senate Democrats decided to schedule a vote on the resolution after a closed-door meeting on a day when Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts introduced legislation to require Mr. Bush to gain Congressional approval before sending more troops to Iraq.

The Senate vote is expected as early as next week, after an initial round of committee hearings on the plan Mr. Bush will lay out for the nation Wednesday night in a televised address delivered from the White House library, a setting chosen because it will provide a fresh backdrop for a presidential message.

The office of Nancy Pelosi, speaker of the House, followed with an announcement that the House would also take up a resolution in opposition to a troop increase. House Democrats were scheduled to meet Wednesday morning to consider whether to interrupt their carefully choreographed 100-hour, two-week-long rollout of their domestic agenda this month to address the Iraq war.

In both chambers, Democrats made clear that the resolutions — which would do nothing in practical terms to block Mr. Bush's intention to increase the United States military presence in Iraq — would be the minimum steps they would pursue. They did not rule out eventually considering more muscular responses, like seeking to cap the number of troops being deployed to Iraq or limiting financing for the war — steps that could provoke a Constitutional and political showdown over the president's power to wage war.

The resolutions would represent the most significant reconsideration of Congressional support for the war since it began, and mark the first big clash between the White House and Congress since the November election, which put the Senate and House under the control of the Democrats. The decision to pursue a confrontation with the White House was a turning point for Democrats, who have struggled with how to take on Mr. Bush's war policy without being perceived as undermining the military or risking criticism as defeatists.

"If you really want to change the situation on the ground, demonstrate to the president he's on his own," said Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. "That will spark real change."

The administration continued Tuesday to press its case with members of Congress from both parties. By the time Mr. Bush delivers his speech, 148 lawmakers will have come to the White House in the past week to discuss the war, White House aides said Tuesday night, adding that most met with the president himself.

While Mr. Kennedy and a relatively small number of other Democrats were pushing for immediate, concrete steps to challenge Mr. Bush through legislation, Democratic leaders said that for now they favored the less-divisive approach of simply asking senators to cast a vote on a nonbinding resolution for or against the plan.

They also sought to frame the clash with the White House on their terms, using language reminiscent of the Vietnam War era to suggest that increasing the United States military presence in Iraq would be a mistake.

"We believe that there is a number of Republicans who will join with us to say no to escalation," said the Senate mority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada. "I really believe that if we can come up with a bipartisan approach to this escalation, we will do more to change the direction of that war in Iraq than any other thing that we can do."

On the eve of the president's Iraq speech, the White House sent Frederick W. Kagan, a military analyst who helped develop the troop increase plan, to meet with the Senate Republican Policy Committee.

But Republican officials conceded that at least 10 of their own senators were likely to oppose the plan to increase troops levels in Iraq. And Democrats were proposing their resolution with that in mind, hoping to send a forceful message that as many as 60 senators believed strengthening American forces in Baghdad was the wrong approach. Democratic leaders said they expect all but a few of their senators to back the resolution.

In an interview on Tuesday, Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, said he was becoming increasingly skeptical that a troop increase was in the best interest of the United States. "I'm particularly concerned about the greater injection of our troops into the middle of sectarian violence. Whom do you shoot at, the Sunni or the Shia?" Mr. Warner said. "Our American G.I.'s should not be subjected to that type of risk."

But the Senate minority leader, Mitch McConnell, Republican of Kentucky, said Congress could not supplant the authority of the president. "You can't run a war by a committee of 435 in the House and 100 in the Senate," he said.

The White House press secretary, Tony Snow, criticized the Democrats' plans. "We understand that the resolution is purely symbolic, but the war — and the necessity of succeeding in Iraq — are very real," he said Tuesday night.

On Thursday, Democrats in the House and Senate will open a series of hearings on the Iraq war. Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice are among those who have agreed to testify.

Senator Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat who is the new chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said that if he was not satisfied that Mr. Bush's plan has sufficient incentives and penalties for the Iraqis, he might support a resolution or amendment to cap the number of American troops in Iraq.

"We have got to force the Iraqis to take charge of their own country," Mr. Levin said at a breakfast meeting with reporters. "We can't save them from themselves. It is a political solution. It is no longer a military solution."

Lawmakers said Senate Democrats appeared broadly united in opposition to Mr. Bush's approach during their private luncheon on Tuesday. While there were a few senators who favored cutting off money for any troop increase, a handful of others expressed uncertainty about challenging the president on a potential war-powers issue.

"We have to be very careful about blocking funding for any troops because we don't want to leave our troops short-changed," said Senator Mary L. Landrieu, Democrat of Louisiana.

Yet a large share of the House Democratic caucus supports a stronger stance against the plan. It remained unclear whether a resolution would satisfy constituents.

"Twice in the past 12 months the president has increased troop levels in a last-ditch effort to control the rapidly deteriorating security situation in Iraq," said Representative Martin T. Meehan, Democrat of Massachusetts, who proposed a resolution opposing a troop increase. "Rather than cooling tensions in Baghdad, the situation has descended further into chaos."

For GOP Senators, Bush's Next Step In Iraq Means A Delicate Dance (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

Senate Republicans, dreading President Bush's prime-time address tonight calling for more U.S. troops in Iraq, emerged from their weekly party luncheon yesterday displaying more dance steps than the Joffrey Ballet.

"We should listen to what the president has to say," proposed Sen. John Warner (R-Va).

"I want to hear the president's plan," Sen. Susan Collins (Maine) concurred.

"I want to see what he's proposing before I make dramatic statements," an unusually skittish Trent Lott (Miss.), the No. 2 Republican, told a thick knot of reporters.

And you didn't want to get too close to Sen. George Voinovich (Ohio). "We need more information, okay?" he insisted.

But the Republicans' principal dancer yesterday was Sen. John Sununu (N.H.), perhaps the most endangered of all GOP senators in 2008. "We haven't discussed 'the plan,' " he maintained. "That would suggest that we were told exactly what is going to be announced tomorrow, and that is certainly not the case."

Reporters had barely digested that one when Sununu offered a second disavowal: "I don't really know what they're thinking about proposing, so given that, it wouldn't be wise for me to suggest that I do or don't know whether their conditions are appropriate."

Is the escalating White House headed for a conflict with the antiwar Congress? "I don't know. I don't know," Sununu repeated. "Because we don't know what the president has proposed."

Sununu kept punting, for a painful 15 minutes before reporters released him. "There's clearly no one else in the hall to talk to," he quipped.

DOJ_NMG_0114869

The Democrats, by contrast, were happy to talk. Though utterly divided on a solution for Iraq, pretty much every Democrat lined up in opposition to Bush's plan to "surge" thousands more troops into Iraq. And they were itching for a chance to put Republicans on the spot with a symbolic but toothless vote opposing the surge.

"We've all made our speeches, we've said what we want to say, and pretty soon it'll be time for votes," Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) challenged.

Even some Republicans, though professing no knowledge of the Bush plan, were lining up against its reported contents. "I don't believe an expansion of 20,000 troops in Iraq will solve the problems," said Sen. Norm Coleman (Minn.). Sen. Olympia Snowe (Maine) also had "concerns."

Those Republicans defending the White House labored to play down the troop increase. Suggested Sen. Pete Domenici (N.M.): "We should throw 'surge' out the window."

None, however, seemed quite so tortured about the issue as Sununu, whose state suffered a Democratic landslide in the November elections. Torn between loyalty to Bush and fear of the electorate, he treated reporters to a mix of sarcasm and pedantry that brought to mind the poem Calvin Trillin wrote about the senator's father, the first President Bush's chief of staff:

If you knew what Sununu
Knows about quantum physics and Greek
And oil explorations and most favored nations
And the secret handshake of Deke,
Maybe you too, like Sununu,
Would adopt as your principal rule
That you are the brightest, you're lit the lightest,
And everyone else is a fool

The younger Sununu made the mistake of being the first senator out of the GOP lunch, causing reporters to surge forward with surge questions. The senator cautioned that "I don't know what the administration might propose" but suggested that "there are other aspects of this" than force escalation.

How worried was he about a split between Congress and the White House?

"Are my choices there 'high,' 'medium' or 'low'?" Sununu inquired.

Another reporter asked Sununu how many times he had consulted with the White House on the Iraq plan. The senator pretended to count in his head and then answered, "Once."

Sununu fled that group of questioners, only to fall prey to a second mob, this one encircling him with more queries about the "surge" and how long it would last.

"Well," Sununu said, "I don't think you were really quite listening to my answer, because the precise number of troops, or a date months in the future is far less important to our success than how the troops are going to be used."

Pressed again for a time frame, he retorted: "I think that is as clear an answer as anyone here can give you without making things up."

Will Congress cut off funding for a troop surge? "I think you ought to ask people on the Appropriations Committee," he said, "preferably after the president actually makes a proposal."

A reporter observed that Sununu was laying out a fairly fuzzy position. "No, it's not," he replied. "I think it's very clear. There's got to be a very strong set of proposals to deal with those things that are necessary for long-term success: reconciliation, revenue distribution and provincial elections."

Left unanswered, quite deliberately, was where Sununu stood on Bush's surge.

"Senator," a reporter asked, "do you like what you've heard from the White House?"

"I think that's it, thanks," Sununu answered. He turned and walked away.

Reid Takes On Iraq Surge Plan (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, January 10, 2007

Sen. Harry Reid's (D-Nev.) plan to bring a nonbinding, bipartisan resolution to the floor next week condemning President Bush's "surge" strategy in Iraq likely will be a major test of the new Majority Leader's ability to face down the White House and muster bipartisan coalitions on controversial issues.

With Bush expected to lay out his surge plan to boost troop levels in Iraq in an address to the nation tonight, Democratic Senators and outside interest groups already have begun to put pressure on Reid to block the increase. Sen. Edward Kennedy

(D-Mass.) on Tuesday denounced the surge proposal, predicting that it would lead to significant U.S. troop casualties and announced that he would look to force the White House to seek Congressional approval for any escalation of the Iraq War.

A White House aide said Reid's nonbinding resolution likely would serve to put lawmakers on record as a way to gauge support for future efforts to block the plan.

The Bush administration's GOP allies in the Senate quickly lined up behind the president Tuesday, setting the stage for an intense floor clash next week.

Following a meeting at the White House, Senate GOP leaders announced their support for the plan. Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said, "I know enough about it to know that I will support it," adding that members of Republican leadership have met with Bush on a number of occasions to discuss the plan.

A veteran Democratic aide said that while the vote on the resolution will be the first test of Reid's abilities, there likely will be much more significant challenges later this year — particularly if the Senate moves to either cut off funding or restrict Bush's ability to prosecute the war.

"It's one thing to say 'We don't like how this is going,' [and] stomp your foot ... but it's another to cut off funding," the aide said.

Reid told reporters he believes he can count on the support of at least nine Republicans in his effort to corral the 60 votes needed to end a potential filibuster by backers of Bush's plan.

Independent-Democrat Sen. Joe Lieberman (Conn.) will vote with the president on the issue, while Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) is sidelined for an unspecified time frame as he recovers from illness. Johnson has been upgraded from critical to fair condition and doctors at George Washington University Hospital have removed his ventilator, his office announced Tuesday.

Reid also will have to contend with the fact that Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) backs an increase in troops. McCain, a 2008 presidential hopeful, is popular among the small group of moderate GOP lawmakers Reid is targeting and could make it difficult to pry their votes away from the administration.

Although the specific language of the resolution has yet to be written, Reid said Democrats are "going to work towards ... a bipartisan statement on the president's escalation."

Republicans on Tuesday attacked Kennedy's proposal as irresponsible, chiding the veteran lawmaker for vowing to block Bush's plans for the Iraq War before they are announced formally.

"It's a sad commentary on politics in Washington, D.C., today when the Democrats seek to cut off funding for our troops before even hearing what our commander in chief has to say regarding a new way forward in Iraq," said Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas).

Echoing White House and GOP leadership charges that blocking funding for the surge would undermine the military, Cornyn argued, "Our obligation as legislators is to assist the commander in chief and our troops as they confront our nation's enemies. This proposal does nothing to assist them. In fact, it is designed to undercut the president before he's even presented his plan, and to reduce the ability of our military men and women to get the job done."

In the House, Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said that while he believes Bush must have the cooperation of Congress to increase troop levels significantly, the House does not yet have plans to take up a similar resolution.

"I don't have plans" to bring up a resolution, Hoyer said Tuesday, explaining that such a move is unlikely before the House holds oversight hearings.

But Rep. Ed Markey (D-Mass.) was expected to introduce a House version of Kennedy's legislation late Tuesday. Markey's office could not be reached for comment.

Rep. Raúl Grijalva (D-Ariz.) confirmed Tuesday that he will co-sponsor the bill.

It was not immediately clear whether or when Democratic leaders would put the legislation on the House calendar.

Meanwhile, as early as the end of this week, the Senate could adopt its organizing resolution. Because some committees still have not ratified their new membership and leadership structures, and final details of the 51-49 funding percentage split on committees still is being worked out, committees continue to be under the control of Republicans. But a Republican aide familiar with the issue said a final deal should be reached soon.

Reid and McConnell are likely to stay the bipartisan course on domestic issues for the next several weeks, with the two lawmakers closing in on a deal to jointly sponsor minimum wage legislation, Democratic and Republican aides said Tuesday.

With the Finance Committee today taking up a package of small-business tax cuts that could be included in a compromise bill, a GOP leadership aide said it was all but certain the two leaders would end up co-sponsoring the bill, which will come to the floor following completion of the ethics reform package.

Following the minimum wage debate, which Democrats hope will take less time than the ethics bill, Reid is expected to move to prescription drug legislation, followed by a new stem-cell research bill.

Democratic Leaders Face Pressure Over Iraq War (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON — It did not take long for Rep. Nancy Boyda, a freshman Democrat from Kansas, to learn the price of defying her party's liberal base. After she said she would support President Bush if he proposed an increase in U.S. troop levels in Iraq, antiwar bloggers fumed and MoveOn.org, the liberal advocacy group, considered running a television ad attacking her.

"If a member of Congress is wrong on Iraq, that is not what we voted for," said Tom Matzzie, MoveOn's Washington director. "There will be people watching to make sure they do the right thing."

That kind of political pressure is already being applied, not just to junior lawmakers, but also to Democratic leaders. It prodded them into making Iraq more central to their first 100 hours in control of Capitol Hill than they had planned. And it is creating tension between many Democrats and the liberal activists who will be increasingly important as the 2008 presidential campaign gets into gear.

Antiwar protester Cindy Sheehan, demanding a troop withdrawal, disrupted House Democratic leaders at their first-day news conference on ethics. Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada was deluged with complaints when he appeared to be open to a troop increase and posted a notice on a liberal blog to explain that he was misunderstood. Dozens of demonstrators rallied outside a Washington think tank when Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.) spoke in support of a troop escalation.

Antiwar activists, who believe that Democrats owe their 2006 election victories to voter discontent with the Iraq war, are thrilled that most congressional Democrats oppose Bush's proposed troop increase. But lawmakers are divided over how far to go in fighting the plan, and activists worry that the party will not have the political stamina to block the escalation and, beyond that, force a withdrawal of all troops.

"We have to look closely, not at what they say, but how they vote," said John Isaacs, president of Council for a Livable World, an arms control advocacy group.

Some moderate Democrats worry that the pressure being applied by the antiwar left is misguided, arguing that voters want a change of course in Iraq but not a rapid withdrawal.

"Conventional wisdom says that presidential candidates who want to be responsible on this are going to hurt themselves with the angry, impassioned activist left," said Will Marshall, president of the Progressive Policy Institute, a centrist Democratic think tank. "But the activist left is out of sync with the American public. Americans don't want to concede this is a total debacle."

For now, Democratic leaders are navigating the political crosscurrents by loudly criticizing Bush's troop buildup plan while sidestepping questions about the alternatives. They are also treading carefully around the question of whether Congress would try to block or restrict funding because many Democrats worry that will be seen as undercutting troops already in Iraq. "We understand the concerns [of antiwar activists] and we'll agree with them to the extent possible," said Jim Manley, Reid's spokesman. "But Democrats feel we need to do everything we can to give the troops what they need."

Democratic leaders had planned to emphasize domestic policy issues, not Iraq, in the opening weeks of their reign on Capitol Hill. The agenda for the first 100 hours in the House included quick action on a minimum-wage increase, lower drug prices for Medicare participants and other domestic issues; Iraq was to be relegated to a strung-out series of oversight hearings.

That is, in part, why Sheehan led a small group of protesters to interrupt a news conference on new ethics rules by Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) and other House leaders on the first day of the new Congress.

"De-escalate, investigate, troops home now!" they shouted.

Pressure on Democrats to take a more aggressive stand increased as word spread that Bush would propose a troop increase. When Reid was asked about it in a television interview in mid-December and indicated he might be willing to consider an increase, he came under withering fire from liberal activists. Two days later, he backed away from his support in a statement filed with the Huffington Post, a liberal blog.

Last week, Reid and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) sent a letter to Bush opposing the troop increase and calling instead for a phased withdrawal. But they did not say what, if anything, Congress would do to force his hand.

Liberal activists have looked to other Democrats to be less cautious. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) introduced a bill Tuesday that would prohibit paying for an increase in U.S. troops unless Congress voted to approve it. Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio), a Democratic presidential candidate, Monday outlined his "comprehensive exit plan" and criticized party leaders.

"Democratic leaders well understand we regained control of the Congress because of the situation in Iraq," Kucinich said. "However, two months later, the Congress is still searching for a plan."

DOJ_NMG_0114872

Liberal activists are plotting ways to keep up the pressure. Win Without War, a coalition of antiwar groups, is urging people to go to a website, www.americasaysno.org, to locate demonstrations to be held 24 hours after Bush's speech. Website visitors can download protest signs saying: "NO!"

The group also is urging war critics to confront members of Congress in their home districts when they return in February for the first recess.

Tom Andrews, a former Democratic congressman from Maine who heads the coalition, said that how the Democratic presidential contenders respond will be key to how liberals assess the field.

"We want true leaders to take the president on head on," said Andrews. "How political figures respond to this challenge is going to be a key barometer."

MoveOn.org, meanwhile, is planning a series of radio and television ads attacking lawmakers who support the Iraq war and its expansion.

Matzzie said the first ads will target Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) — the GOP presidential front-runner in many polls who has long called for a troop increase — and will air in states that hold early presidential primaries and caucuses. Later ads also will criticize Democrats, such as Boyda, who stray from antiwar orthodoxy.

Just hours before she was sworn in, Boyda said on ABC that she would support funding for a troop increase because Bush, not Congress, had the authority to make the decision. "I think we're going to vote to support what the commander-in-chief and head of the military asks," said Boyda, who won an upset victory over a Republican incumbent in a conservative-leaning district.

Her staff did not respond to a request for comment.

Her statement on television was met with angry responses on the website of the Lawrence Journal-World.

"As a constituent who gave money to and campaigned for Nancy Boyda, my disappointment is deep and real," said one correspondent. "Boyda will be a one-termer if she does not get this one right."

Kennedy Opposes Money For Troop Boost (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON — On the eve of President Bush's announcement of a new Iraq policy, Sen. Edward Kennedy put Congress on a collision course with the White House by proposing legislation that would deny Bush money for sending more troops to the war unless the president gets "clear and specific new authorization" from Congress.

Bush will address the nation Wednesday night to present a new war strategy that is expected to include sending 20,000 additional troops to the war-torn country.

As a senior member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Kennedy has been a leading voice of opposition against the war in Iraq and has called for a political solution to the conflict.

"The American people sent a clear message in November that we must change course in Iraq and begin to withdraw our troops, not escalate their presence," the Massachusetts Democrat said in remarks at the National Press Club. "The way to start is by acting on the President's new plan."

He called any escalation of troops "an immense new mistake."

But Kennedy said it was not enough to "simply speak out" against an increase in troops "we must act to prevent it."

The wording of Kennedy's bill is blunt: "President George W. Bush should not be permitted to increase the number of United States troops in harm's way in the civil war in Iraq without a new authorization from Congress that reflects the reality on the ground in Iraq."

Kennedy said Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., will introduce similar legislation in the House.

Kennedy said his bill would not affect soldiers already in the field, but is aimed at any increase in troops.

"The best immediate way to support our troops is by refusing to inject more and more of them into the cauldron of a civil war that can be resolved only by the people and government of Iraq," he said.

White House press secretary Tony Snow, without specifically addressing Kennedy's charges, said today the president "understands there is a lot of public anxiety" about the war. Yet he said that Americans "don't want another Sept. 11" type of terrorist attack and it is wiser to confront terrorists overseas in Iraq and other battlegrounds rather than in the United States.

Democrats, while generally opposing Bush's Iraq policy, are divided over how to use the budget process to pressure Bush over Iraq. Under the Constitution, the president has broad war-making powers, while Congress controls spending.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., says Democrats will "look at everything" in their power to curb the war short of cutting money for troops already in the field.

DOJ_NMG_0114873

Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., said Sunday on NBC's Meet the Press that attempts by Congress to "micromanage" the president's role as commander-in-chief might be unconstitutional.

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., the new chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said he would only consider an increase in U.S. forces in Iraq if Bush agreed to start withdrawing troops within six months.

"We've got to focus the attention of the Iraqis on their responsibility for their own country," Levin told the Detroit Free Press. "The only way to tell them is that we're going to redeploy our forces in 4 to 6 months."

After meeting with the president on Monday, several senators, including Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, said the plan calls for sending 20,000 extra troops to Baghdad and the western Anbar province, a base of the mostly Sunni insurgency and foreign al-Qaeda fighters.

Senators who attended the White House briefing indicated that the increase in troops would be to "benchmarks" that the Iraqi government must meet. These include sending more Iraqi troops to Baghdad and reaching a political settlement that will including sharing the nation's oil resources, particularly with the minority Sunnis.

The senators said the president expressed confidence that the Iraqi government could meet the benchmarks, but several of the senators remained skeptical.

"We've had these benchmarks before and to no avail," Sen. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, said after the meeting. "Why should we increase our exposure to risk?"

But whether Snowe and other GOP skeptics of Bush's plan, including Gordon Smith of Oregon and Sen. Susan Collins of Maine, will agree to Kennedy's plan is doubtful.

"It would be a dishonorable thing for the Congress to budget away the bullets at a time when their commander in chief had ordered them to hold their place in the battlefront," said Smith.

Kennedy Proposal Uncovers Party Rift (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's proposal yesterday to require congressional approval for a troop surge was generally dismissed by fellow Democrats, revealing the deep divisions within the party over how to handle the war in Iraq.

"I'm not going to rule it out, but we are trying to work out a resolution that would be broader and attract bipartisan support," said Senate Democratic Whip Richard J. Durbin of Illinois.

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland also cast doubt on the proposal. The Constitution's Article II, he said, "probably does" give the president authority to prosecute a war.

President Bush will address the nation at 9 p.m. today with a speech that is expected to propose an increase this year of about 20,000 troops in Iraq -- at an estimated cost of $5 billion. U.S. officials said the president will also propose another $1 billion in economic aid to Iraq and lean on friendly Arab regimes to increase their assistance to Baghdad.

Many top Democrats credit their opposition to the war in Iraq for their huge victories in November. But their party is divided between those who want to retreat as soon as possible by cutting off funding and those who want to nudge the Bush administration toward a gradual withdrawal.

Mr. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, sought some middle ground that would at least hamper Mr. Bush's ability to increase the number of troops in Iraq by requiring that he first seek approval from Congress.

"There can be no doubt that the Constitution gives Congress the authority to decide whether to fund military action," Mr. Kennedy said during a speech at the National Press Club. "President Bush should not be permitted to escalate the war further and send an even larger number of troops into harm's way, without a clear and specific new authorization from Congress."

Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, told reporters last night that "the House will vote on the president's proposal" for a troop surge, although she provided no details.

Although Democrats on Capitol Hill have roundly criticized Mr. Bush's proposal even before it has been made, they are unlikely to go along with Mr. Kennedy's plan.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said yesterday that he hopes to round up nine Republicans who might sign their names to a bipartisan resolution that would express disapproval of a troop surge but would have no concrete effect on policy.

"If there is a bipartisan resolution ... the president is going to have to take note of that," said Mr. Reid, Nevada Democrat. "That's the beginning of the end as far as I'm concerned."

Mr. Kennedy's proposal, Mr. Reid said, "is an idea, and we'll certainly look at it in an intelligent way."

Democratic Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, Carl Levin of Michigan and Jack Reed of Rhode Island were crafting the resolution yesterday afternoon, Mr. Reid said, adding that he hopes to bring the resolution to the floor next week.

DOJ_NMG_0114874

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, and Mr. Reed will hold a press conference today with retired Gen. Wesley Clark, to call on the president "to end our open-ended commitment in Iraq."

But not even Mr. Kennedy's proposal, however, goes far enough to please hard-line war opponents.

Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio on Monday called for Mr. Bush to withdraw all troops from Iraq and close all military bases there.

"A U.S. declaration of an intention to withdraw troops and close bases will help dampen the insurgency which has been inspired to resist colonization and fight invaders," he said in his announcement.

In addition, peace activist Cindy Sheehan and a group of protesters last week drove Rep. Rahm Emanuel, Illinois Democrat, from his own press conference and then demanded that Mrs. Pelosi block funding for the war.

"We are the ones that put them in power, and they are not including the peace movement. ... It needs to be at least included in the discussion," Mrs. Sheehan said.

But Mr. Kennedy said that trying to use the appropriations process against any troop surge is a losing strategy.

"The horse will be out of the barn by the time we get there," Mr. Kennedy said.

He said that by the time an appropriations request is submitted later this month or in early February and by the time Congress responds six weeks later, "the troops will already be there."

"And then we'll be asked: 'Are we going to deny the body armor to the young men and women that are over there?' ... We have to take the action now ... or it's going to be a lot of meaningless statements and comments," Mr. Kennedy said.

Mr. Kennedy's proposal states that the 2002 vote to authorize force in Iraq no longer applies to the current conflict and is therefore no longer binding.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said at a midday briefing that he had not seen Mr. Kennedy's proposal, but said that "the debates continue to be conducted in a vacuum, [in] anticipation that the president's going to say something."

"It makes more sense to wait until the president lays out not only military but also diplomatic, economic and other actions that he intends to take," Mr. Snow said.

Bush Warns Democrats About Effects Of Troop Pullout From Iraq (WP)

By Glenn Kessler And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

President Bush gravely warned House Democrats yesterday that America's credibility would be shattered if the United States pulled its troops from Iraq, forcing close ally Saudi Arabia to look elsewhere for protection and potentially destabilizing Egypt, the region's most populous country, according to participants in the meeting.

But Democrats in both the House and the Senate signaled that they will actively oppose his plan to send several additional U.S. combat brigades to Iraq, the first of which -- made up of about 3,500 troops from the 82nd Airborne Division -- could move relatively quickly into position from its current assignment in Kuwait. Bush's decision, which he will announce in a speech tonight, is rapidly becoming the first test of wills between the Republican president and the new Democratic-controlled Congress.

Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said the Senate will debate and vote next week on a resolution opposing any increase in U.S. troop strength in Iraq. He predicted that the resolution will pass with overwhelming support from Democrats and Republicans alike.

"If there is a bipartisan resolution saying, 'We don't support the escalation of the war,' the president's going to have to take note of that," Reid said. "I think that's the beginning of the end, as far as I'm concerned."

Bush did not say during the half-hour meeting with Democrats where else he thought Saudi Arabia would seek "protection," but he made it clear that he was simply informing Democrats of his decisions on Iraq, not consulting with them. He said that he understands the challenges and thinks his plan has the best chance of success.

"He's made his decision," said Rep. Ellen O. Tauscher (D-Calif.). "He's going to put in more troops."

The House Democrats included Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton (Mo.), intelligence committee Chairman Sylvestre Reyes (Tex.), Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Tom Lantos (Calif.), Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John D. Dingell (Mich.), Rep. Norm Dicks (Wash.), Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.) and Rep. Robert E. Andrews (N.J.).

Vice President Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten attended the meeting. Tauscher said that Cheney emphasized his concerns about Saudi Arabia.

The White House said that Bush also briefed the leaders of Australia, Britain and Denmark -- all of which have combat units in Iraq -- on his plans.

The State Department announced yesterday that Rice will leave for the Middle East and Europe on Friday in another U.S. effort to revive Israeli-Palestinian peace efforts and to seek Arab help to stabilize Iraq. The Saudis have pressed for greater U.S.

involvement in restarting the moribund peace process. Rice will visit Israel, the Palestinian territories, Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Germany and Britain.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.) will introduce legislation that goes significantly further than Reid's plan. Under Kennedy's and Markey's bill, Congress would have to approve any additional troop deployments and any additional funding for the president's plan.

"Congress must have a genuine debate over the wisdom of the president's plan," Kennedy said in a speech to the National Press Club. "Let us hear the arguments for it and against it. Then let us vote on it in the light of day."

A top Senate Democrat said that he does not expect any attempt to stop the flow of funds for the Iraq war. "We're not going to cut off funding to the troops," said Sen. Carl M. Levin (Mich.), the new chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. "No one wants to do that."

But, he said at a breakfast with a group of defense reporters, other steps might be taken. For example, he said it is possible that Congress might impose a cap on the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, or pass a resolution requiring the president to seek congressional approval for troop increases, or require that any increase be linked to a long-term plan for troop reductions.

Levin expressed concern that the president might have the rhetoric of change in his speech without actually taking the steps necessary to force change. "What are the consequences if they don't meet the milestones?" he asked, referring to the Iraqi government.

Meanwhile, a senior official said the administration is struggling to keep a supplemental budget request for Iraq and Afghanistan under $100 billion, as promised. Defense budget analysts outside the administration say a 20,000-troop increase for Iraq could add $6 billion to $10 billion to the 2008 budget, depending on the form it takes.

Baghdad Sees Heaviest Fighting In Months (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

BAGHDAD — In fierce, day-long fighting, 1,000 American and Iraqi troops assisted by U.S. attack helicopters and warplanes battled gunmen in a Sunni Arab downtown neighborhood Tuesday, killing at least 51 militants, according to Iraqi officials.

The offensive, the heaviest fighting in the capital in months, came in response to a buildup of insurgents in the Haifa Street neighborhood adjacent to the highly fortified Green Zone government complex. Sunni gunmen had erected fake checkpoints in recent days, residents said, and in one case, pulled out passengers from a minibus, killing them and stringing their bodies from electricity poles.

American airstrikes continued through the day and plumes of smoke rose over the neighborhood while explosions and shooting echoed through the streets. Snipers fought back from high-rise apartment buildings, supporting fellow insurgents armed with machine guns, rocket-propelled grenades and mortars.

Troops went door-to-door, searching for militants. No U.S. or Iraqi troops were killed, nor were any civililans, Iraqi officials said.

The bloody fighting broke out a day before President Bush was expected to announce the deployment of at least 20,000 more U.S. troops to Iraq, and underscored some of the possible challenges of an escalation of American troops in Baghdad. Some military commanders believe violence could actually increase with more American troops in the capital. Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, who is retiring soon as the top American commander in the Mideast, has opposed troop increases in the past in part because he has argued that they offer more targets for insurgents. Rather than increasing the feeling of security, additional troops can add to the feeling of chaos, in Abizaid's view, if insurgents set off bombs every time an American convoy moves through.

Advocates of a troop increase maintain that a larger U.S. force, especially in urban areas like Baghdad, could deter insurgents and armed Shiite militias through the visible presence of heavily armed Americans who could also respond quickly to hostile action.

Just last week, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki and a top U.S. military commander on the ground announced a new plan to secure the capital. But past plans, including the most recent dubbed "Together Forward" have failed -- in part because rebels tend to regroup elsewhere and return once the troops have left, making the American military's efforts akin to a game of "whack-a-mole," critics say.

The Haifa Street neighborhood, where Saddam Hussein had once given away free real estate to army officers and party officials, emerged after the U.S.-led 2003 invasion as a place of visible and widespread resistance. For a while, locals openly flew black flags, declaring holy war against the Americans. Then known as "Purple Heart Boulevard" because of a high number of U.S. casualties, Haifa Street was declared a success story by President Bush in late 2005 after elite Iraqi security forces brought down the number of attacks. At the time, American and Iraqi troops established a presence on the streets, prompting a clean-up of the area. Potholes from bombs and mortars were filled and violence ebbed.

Iraqi government forces were left responsible for maintaining order in the neighborhood but could not effectively do so on their own.

In the course of the last year, rebels regrouped in and around this three-mile stretch of road cutting through central Baghdad. Last week, police recovered 27 bodies dumped near a cemetery as militants flooded the neighborhood from other parts of the city.

Then, on Sunday, a security guard said a sniper holed up at a local mosque killed two of the guard's colleagues. The following day, gunmen roamed the streets, distributing leaflets threatening to kill anyone who might enter the area, according to another witness.

When Iraqi security forces tried to clear out the neighborhood, the rebels fought off the troops, according to Iraqi officials and locals.

Shortly before dawn on Tuesday, American and Iraqi troops swarmed the neighborhood, closing it off. Soon, streets were deserted as militants took up their positions and anxious residents stayed at home.

American aircrafts then targeted gunmen in the streets and snipers on the roofs, witnesses said.

"I saw with my own eyes a vehicle filled with gunmen carrying different weapons and rocket launchers," said Abdullah Jassim, one of the few Shiites in the area. "A few moments later, the car was torn to pieces by an air strike, setting the vehicle ablaze and killing all those who were inside."

Jassim, a 37-year-old shop owner who decided to leave the neighborhood as the fighting intensified Tuesday , said Americans bombed at least one well-known hideout used by insurgent snipers.

On Tuesday, Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl,) a U.S. military spokesman, said the joint campaign along Haifa Street will "continue until this area is secured."

Iraqi government spokesman Ali Dabbagh, meanwhile, expressed support for more American troops in Iraq.

"The goal is to protect Baghdad and other areas," he told reporters. "If this is going to be achieved by an increase in friendly coalition forces, we have no objection."

The bitter civil war between Sunnis and Shiites combined with a stubborn insurgency directed at the Americans, has made the streets of the capital increasingly lawless, costing tens of thousands civilian lives.

A 43-year-old Sunni woman who asked to be identified as Um Wissam said she feared the gunmen and had stopped sending her children to school. Still, the raid Tuesday made her feel even less safe.

"We don't know if we will survive this," she said. "When this operation is finished, I will leave Haifa Street for good. We can't live here anymore."

Throughout the morning Tuesday, residents could hear the thunderous explosions of the aerial assault.

"I said to myself --'we are going to die,'" shop owner Jassim said. "Our houses are kind of old and they can be destroyed easily."

He also feared the militants might kill him and his family and so he decided to leave.

"We couldn't leave at the morning because the clashes were very intense," he said. Eventually, however, he and his family made it to a relative's house in another part of town.

"We're really afraid," said Raad Radhi, a 50-year-old Sunni merchant. "All the windows in our buildings and the neighboring ones were completely smashed because of the bombings."

In one apartment, Radhi said, troops harassed an elderly Syrian teacher living with his son, a college student.

Maj. Gen. Ibrahim Shaker, a spokesman from the Ministry of Defense, said 51 suspected insurgents were killed and 21 others -- including three Syrians and a Sudanese -- were captured.

Violence also continued unabated elsewhere in Iraq. At least 40 bodies were found in various parts of Baghdad. North of the capital in the troubled Diyala Province, U.S. forces pounded palm groves and canals with artillery and gunfire as a joint offensive with Iraqi forces entered its sixth day.

Another 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi forces have swept through over 200 square kilometers of rich farmland and isolated hamlets, zeroing in on a vast network of tunnels, spider holes and canals they say has become a safe haven and training ground for Sunni Arab rebels.

At least 74 suspected insurgents have been killed since that offensive began, according to the U.S. military. Troops have also found at least 14 weapons caches, commanders said.

"We could stay here for eternity," said Lt. Col. Andrew Poppas, commander of the 5th Squadron, 73rd Cavalry, as he toured the battlefield, smoking cigars. "We've got the capability to wait out anybody."

DOJ_NMG_0114877

The U.S. military on Tuesday announced that an American soldier assigned to 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, died Tuesday from gunshot injuries sustained during the fighting in Diyala.

Near the city of Kut, a shepherd was killed when he stepped on a land mine close to the Iranian border. Another man was found slain, handcuffed and blindfolded, in the river near that city.

Because of the bloodshed, Iraqis are fleeing their homes in record numbers. As many as one in eight Iraqis have been displaced, making it the biggest refugee problem in the region for almost 60 years, according to the United Nations.

U.S. And Iraqis Hit Insurgents In All-Day Fight (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 9 — More than 1,000 American and Iraqi troops, backed by Apache attack helicopters and fighter jets, battled insurgents all day Tuesday and late into the night in downtown Baghdad, in one of the most dramatic operations in the capital since the invasion nearly four years ago.

The fighting raged less than 1,000 yards from the heavily fortified Green Zone, which houses both the American command and the Iraqi government. It was the latest episode for the troubled neighborhood around Haifa Street, where major campaigns have repeatedly been initiated to rid the area of insurgents, only to have them re-infiltrate.

Iraqi officials said that at least 50 militants were killed Tuesday, but the Americans said they could not provide a count.

Problems in other contested areas across Baghdad came to a crisis point in the fall, causing American commanders to abandon a major push to regain control of the city, and setting off a policy review that led to the changes President Bush will announce in a speech to the nation on Wednesday night.

The president is widely expected to call for 20,000 to 30,000 more soldiers in Iraq, with many coming to Baghdad to help quell the sectarian fighting.

American commanders have said the strategy will emphasize an evenhanded approach in Sunni and Shiite neighborhoods, something that they acknowledge has evaded them as they have worked with Iraq's Shiite-led government in recent months.

The fighting on Haifa Street, a broad two-mile boulevard that cuts through the heart of the capital, began nearly a week ago as an attempt to secure the safety of citizens caught in the middle of the fighting and ended with pitched battles in the street. It is a reminder of how difficult the Baghdad mission will be.

The American crackdown on Tuesday came on the fourth day of intense fighting in the neighborhood of tightly packed, high-rise apartment buildings that was the home of many top-ranking government officials and Baath Party loyalists while Saddam Hussein was in power. American soldiers continued to patrol the area through the night, and an American military spokesman said they would stay there until the situation was firmly under control. Gunfire and explosions could be heard in the neighborhood well after sunset.

An American military officer familiar with the operation said that it was part of an effort to stabilize Baghdad, but was not directly linked to the president's new security plan.

However, the location of the fight has particular significance.

Nearly two years ago, after much bloodshed and toil, the American military wrested control of the area from insurgents.

Haifa Street, the neighborhood's main thoroughfare, used to be called Purple Heart Boulevard by American soldiers. More than 160 soldiers from the First Battalion of the Ninth Cavalry were wounded trying to secure the area. By the spring of 2005, they had largely done so, and it was trumpeted as a signal success.

Tuesday's operation, directed by elements of the Stryker Brigade of the First Cavalry Division and Iraqi Sixth Army Division, occurred after a series of events that, taken together, demonstrated the complexity of the fight for American forces and the maze of competing interests they are trying to navigate.

It also suggests that even if the Americans try to deal evenhandedly with Shiite militias and Sunni insurgents, which is expected to be a central theme of President Bush's plan, their efforts could end up inadvertently benefiting one party or the other.

Shiites are clearly ascendant throughout Baghdad, systematically taking over Sunni neighborhoods, often using the intimidation of death squads to achieve their goals. But the area around Haifa Street has remained a Sunni bastion.

For the past two years, it has been relatively quiet, but in recent months, as the sectarian fighting has intensified, Iraqi and American military officials suspected it was being used as a base of operations for insurgents concentrating on the Shiite civilian population and American forces.

The violence in the area started to increase markedly after the recent arrest of a senior member of the leading Shiite militia group, the Mahdi Army, who had been operating near the area, according to an American military official.

The arrest, the official said, created an opening for Sunni insurgents, and they began aggressively singling out Shiites who had relocated south from the neighborhood of Kadhimiya, the official said.

On Saturday, 27 bodies were dumped in the Sheik Marouf neighborhood on Haifa Street. They were Shiites, four with their throats slit and the rest shot in the head, according to an Iraqi government official.

When the Iraqi police went to investigate and collect the bodies, they were attacked, according to witnesses and government officials. The Iraqi Army was called in and was also attacked, so finally the Americans were called in.

For residents, the situation was already bleak and getting worse, with no electricity for days and armed men taking control of lawless streets.

But the Sunnis in the area were still hostile to the Iraqi security forces, largely viewed as agents of the Shiite-led government.

"People were disgusted and were enraged by the activity of the security forces," one resident said.

Late Saturday night, Iraqi government officials and witnesses said that Sunni insurgents had set up a fake checkpoint and were pulling Shiites from their cars and executing them, even, some claimed, stringing three bodies from lampposts.

"Some of my friends told me they saw some of the bodies hanging from lampposts," said Jabbar Obeid, 39, who lives in the area.

American officials said Tuesday that while many people were being executed in the area, they found no evidence of people being hanged on lampposts. Many Sunni residents said the claims were nonsense, and had been aimed at inciting more sectarian violence.

On Sunday, Sunni organizations and politicians began condemning the government's security clampdown.

"Day after day, the sectarian crimes against the Sunnis in their neighborhoods in Baghdad are continuing," said Adnan Dulaimi, a member of the largest Sunni bloc in Parliament. The government's actions over the weekend were a "barbarian attack" aimed at clearing the neighborhood of Sunnis, he said in a statement.

In fighting in the neighborhood on Sunday, eleven Iraqi Army soldiers were killed when they ran out of ammunition, Iraqi officials said.

American military officials said that by then they already had solid evidence to suggest that Sunni insurgent leaders were using the neighborhood as a base of operations. They said that the fighters were organized and sophisticated, and included trained snipers and insurgents from foreign countries.

One Sunni resident, who spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of reprisals, confirmed as much, saying that insurgents had taken over to such a degree that a top-ranking official of Al Qaeda had even seized control of the Rafadin bank, set up an Islamic court and began handing out death sentences.

The American and Iraqi forces completed their assault plans at 4 a.m. Tuesday, and before dawn began approaching Haifa Street from different locations around the city, swiftly closing in on Talaa Square in the center of the neighborhood.

About 6:30 a.m. they had reached the square and began arresting suspects. In all, American and Iraqi officials said, they would take some 15 people into custody, including 7 Syrians. Nearly as soon as they began making arrests, they came under heavy bombardment from small-arms fire, rocket-propelled grenades and indirect fire, probably mortars, according to an American military official. As the fighting intensified, insurgents began moving to the rooftops in order to shoot at the armored American attack vehicles on the roads below.

To deal with the gunmen on the rooftops, rather than fighting for control of entire buildings, the Americans called in Apache helicopters and fighter jets, the official said.

The neighborhood is densely packed, making it difficult to strike targets from the air, and the fighter jets were used to "make a show of force," according to the military official, in an attempt to frighten the gunmen from the rooftops.

For more than an hour on Tuesday morning, the fighter jets could be seen sharply dropping below the cloud cover, swooping low over the neighborhood's roofline, engines roaring, and then pulling up steeply and zooming out of sight, high into the sky.

Meanwhile, the Apaches attacked the insurgents' positions, unleashing a barrage of fire that rocked the neighborhood for hours.

Ali Housin, 56, a resident, said he saw the helicopters direct fire at a cemetery where insurgents were hiding, the resulting explosions blowing out the windows of his home.

Shortly after noon, the aerial assault had largely ended, but scattered clashes continued and could be heard late into the night. Residents reported American armored vehicles patrolling the streets after dark and Iraqi Army soldiers moving to secure control of the rooftops.

The Americans reported no casualties, and early reports indicated that two soldiers in the Iraqi Army had been wounded.

DOJ_NMG_0114879

American officials insisted that the information they had on the insurgents in the area was very detailed, and that they had been careful to try to ensure that they were not being used as pawns by the Shiite-dominated government, emphasizing that in recent days they had conducted similarly aggressive raids in Shiite neighborhoods.

'Saturation' Attack On Iraq Insurgents (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, January 10, 2007

Fierce fighting broke out in the central Baghdad district of Haifa Street on Tuesday as US and Iraqi forces moved in against insurgents, in an area once viewed as a showcase for the ability to control Baghdad neighbourhoods, by "saturating" them with military forces.

The battles, in which US and Iraqi ground forces were supported by helicopters and fighter jets, reportedly left at least 50 insurgents dead, and came hours before George W. Bush, US president, was set to announce a plan for Iraq that is expected to feature a "surge" of as many as 20,000 new US troops.

The district, a primarily Sunni Arab area that is virtually adjacent to the heavily fortified Green Zone, was a base for insurgents until a series of operations in early 2005, after which US troops withdrew and Iraqis took the lead in patrolling it.

The scale of Tuesday's fighting suggests that Sunni militants were able to move into the district again in force.

It typifies the shifting nature of the insurgent presence in Sunni communities, in which guerrillas are driven out as US force levels go up and return as force levels fall, and leaves open the question of what a short-term increase in the number of US troops in Iraq can accomplish.

Increased troop concentrations mean more patrols to disrupt insurgent activity, more observation points to monitor areas where guerrillas might gather, more checkpoints at which fugitives might be caught, and other benefits.

The Iraqi government has reacted cautiously to the possibility of a "surge" in US troops, emphasising that they want more control over Iraqi forces, most of which answer to a US or British chain of command.

"We are looking [out] for the Iraqi interest. If it comes from an increase in troops, whether Iraqi or multinational forces, we welcome that. But there should be more control, more [authority] for Iraqis on the security issue . . . That is what we agreed with the Americans," said Ali al-Dabbagh, government spokesman .

But the reaction of ordinary Iraqis to increased US forces appears to be largely determined by where they live, and to which sect they belong. Sunni civilians regularly say that they want US troops to protect them against Shia militias, while Sunni politicians say they oppose US withdrawal for fear they will be left at the mercy of a largely Shia military.

Citizens of mixed areas may also welcome an increased US troop presence to deter the rival armed groups that turn their streets into battlefields.

On the other hand, any deployment into predominantly Shia areas such as Sadr City, where the US military treads lightly and many inhabitants believe militias such as the Mahdi Army to do a better job protecting them than the authorities, would probably spark a backlash.

The surge that Mr Bush is expected to propose – reportedly increasing the 132,000-strong contingent in Iraq by as much as 20,000 – is unlikely to be on a scale that would allow more long-term "saturation" of dangerous areas.

Still, the short-term suppression of sectarian violence might allow Iraqis and Americans to pursue other goals aimed at undercutting the insurgency: building up state institutions such as the army and police, reaching a political deal between Sunni and Shia communities, and reducing unemployment.

Iraq's army, although hamstrung by administrative problems and poor morale, does appear to be slowly becoming more capable. US officers say that they will hand over full control over Iraqi units and provincial security to Iraqi officials by the end of this year.

However, the army is less suited to gathering intelligence key to counterinsurgency than the police, who are corrupt, politicised, and ineffective even in parts of the country such as the southern city of Basra.

50 Insurgents Slain In Baghdad Raids (WT/AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

BAGHDAD -- U.S. jets screamed low over the capital and helicopter gunships swooped in to pound a central Baghdad battleground yesterday, supporting Iraqi and American troops in a daylong fight that officials said killed 50 insurgents in a militant Sunni Arab stronghold.

DOJ_NMG_0114880

The battle raged on Haifa Street about 1½ miles north of the heavily fortified Green Zone -- home to the U.S. Embassy and other facilities. It was the second major confrontation on Haifa Street in the four days since Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki announced a new drive to rid Baghdad of sectarian fighters.

The U.S. military said about 1,000 Iraqi and U.S. soldiers carried out "targeted raids to capture multiple targets, disrupt insurgent activity and restore Iraqi Security Forces control of North Haifa Street."

"This area has been subject to insurgent activity, which has repeatedly disrupted Iraqi Security Force operations in central Baghdad," said a statement quoting Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl, a spokesman for Multi-National Division Baghdad.

He said the U.S. jets did not conduct any air strikes, but "attack helicopters were used to engage targets in support of the ground forces."

Col. Bleichwehl said no American or Iraqi soldiers were killed. He did not address the number of militants killed, while the Iraqi Defense Ministry reported 50 deaths among insurgents.

Elsewhere yesterday, Iraqi police reported finding 52 bodies dumped in three cities, 41 of them in Baghdad, all apparent victims of sectarian reprisal killings.

North of Baghdad, a cargo plane carrying mostly Turkish workers crashed as it apparently tried to land at a U.S. air base in bad weather, killing 34 persons, Iraqi and Turkish officials said. The Turkish Embassy said one Turk survived, but was severely injured.

An Iraqi security official at Baghdad's airport said an Antonov cargo plane crashed near Balad, 50 miles north of the capital. The official said it was not clear whether the aircraft had mechanical problems or was shot down.

A Turkish Foreign Ministry official said initial reports indicated that the plane went down because of bad weather and heavy fog.

At a Saturday ceremony marking the 85th anniversary of the founding of the Iraqi army, Mr. al-Maliki vowed to strike at the Shi'ite and Sunni extremists responsible for the sectarian warfare that has bloodied the country in the past year.

Within hours of the speech, the Iraqi military said 30 militancy suspects were killed in the Haifa Street area after police discovered 27 bodies dumped there, most of them with gunshot wounds in the head and signs of torture. U.S. forces joined the battle after the Iraqi army called for backup.

Yesterday, Mr. al-Maliki confirmed in a television interview that he had rejected a request from U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad for a delay of up to two weeks in ousted dictator Saddam Hussein's execution because "we did not want to keep a door open for trouble."

"We did not want the families of the victims to go out and demonstrate," he said.

The hanging led to a global outcry after a video appeared on the Internet showing Saddam being taunted in his final moments.

U.S. Airstrikes Back Troops In Baghdad Clash (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan And Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 9 -- With F-15 fighter jets and Apache helicopter gunships providing cover, U.S. and Iraqi troops on Tuesday battled hundreds of Sunni Arab insurgents firing from apartment buildings and houses in downtown Baghdad in one of the fiercest clashes in the capital in recent memory.

"It was the most intense combat I have ever seen," said Maj. Jesse Pearson, operations officer for the 1st Battalion, 23rd Infantry Regiment, Stryker Brigade, on his third tour in Iraq. "We were in a fight for 11 straight hours."

Along Haifa Street, a desolate, mostly Sunni Arab enclave of residential buildings and shops, more than 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops descended early Tuesday to retake the insurgent stronghold. The larger goal was to reassert the authority of the U.S.-backed Iraqi government, weakened by sectarian and political divides and a failure to stem Iraq's violent slide.

Instead, the troops encountered strong resistance as the well-organized insurgents appeared determined to protect their turf or fight their way out, surprising U.S. soldiers who fought in the battle. By evening, as many as 50 insurgents had been killed, Iraqi officials said, while 21 others, including several foreign fighters, were captured, but only after the use of massive U.S. firepower and technology. No American or Iraqi troops were killed, although some suffered light injuries, U.S. military officials said.

With President Bush scheduled to unveil his new strategy for Iraq on Wednesday, the battle on Haifa Street points to the nature of the conflict U.S. forces could face in the weeks and months ahead. U.S. generals and the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki view the taming of Baghdad as vital to the stability of Iraq. But the capital has become polarized more than ever along sectarian lines, with entire neighborhoods in the grip of either Sunni insurgents or Shiite militias.

"All sides are getting more desperate to enforce their will and increasingly they are capable of doing that," said Sgt. Israel Schaeffer, who is on his second tour in Iraq. "It's a pivotal point in the conflict."

"This is obviously their home turf," Pearson said. "They didn't like the idea of government forces entering their territory."

On Saturday, Maliki announced a new Baghdad security plan in which Iraqi forces, with U.S. assistance, will lead the effort to expel militant fighters from neighborhoods. Maliki and other Shiite leaders view Sunni insurgents as the root of the violence infecting Iraq. But Sunni politicians have accused the Shiite-led government of bolstering the power of Shiites at the expense of Sunnis.

Sunni legislator Khalaf al-Alayan, in an interview on al-Jazeera television, described the fighting on Haifa Street as a way to "clean Baghdad of the remaining Sunni elements." Alayan said he had contacted organizations such as the Arab League and the United Nations in hopes of stopping "these massacres that the Sunnis are subjected to."

In a statement, the Sunni Iraqi Islamic Party described the 50 killed as "innocent citizens." It asserted that Sunnis on Haifa Street were "under siege" by Shiite militias backed by the Iraqi army.

The fighting in the area began four days ago, when Iraqi soldiers killed 30 insurgents after uncovering what was described as an unauthorized checkpoint, according to a Defense Ministry spokesman. Pearson said Iraqi army commanders asked for U.S. assistance after insurgents killed several Iraqi soldiers two days ago.

"What you're seeing is a continuing effort to bring down the levels of sectarian violence," said Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl. "It's an ongoing effort to go after militias that have the intent to subvert the Iraqi government."

At 3:30 a.m. Tuesday, about 400 U.S. troops from the Stryker Brigade rolled toward Haifa Street, meeting up with Iraqi army units along the way.

They arrived about 5:30 a.m. In the pre-dawn darkness, the joint forces took control of the buildings surrounding Tallil Square, a key target of the operation.

"We showed up in their living room for breakfast," Pearson said. About 7 a.m., the trouble began. "As soon as the sun came up, the insurgents began shooting," he said.

"We started taking it from all sides," Schaeffer recalled.

From rooftops and doorways, the gunmen fired AK-47 assault rifles and machine guns. Snipers also were targeting the U.S. and Iraqi soldiers. U.S. soldiers started firing back with 50-caliber machine guns mounted on their Stryker armored vehicles. They used TOW missiles and Mark-19 grenade launchers. The F-15 fighter jets strafed rooftops with cannons, while the Apaches fired Hellfire missiles. But the insurgents kept fighting.

"They were able to coordinate mortars at us. They were able to execute well-aimed shots from the cover of buildings," said Capt. Robert Callaghan, who was coordinating air support for the operation. "There were mortar rounds that went off close to our vehicle. It was difficult to concentrate on my job."

Schaeffer was surprised. He was accustomed to the hit-and-run tactics that the insurgents typically have used over the past few months.

"We fired a TOW missile into a building," he said. "A few minutes later we started taking fire again from the building. Normally, that would have pretty much ended the whole engagement. They were fighting pretty persistently."

"The terrain was in their favor," he added. "It is about as defensible a terrain as you can get."

Still, Schaeffer said, the Iraqi forces appeared to be holding their own -- much better, he said, than in previous operations.

"It never felt like complete chaos," he said.

Building by building, U.S. and Iraqi forces moved a mile or so down Haifa Street, which weaves along the Tigris River. On every block, insurgents attacked them.

"They probably thought we had the whole area surrounded," said Schaeffer. "Which we didn't."

The soldiers said U.S. and Iraqi troops captured several insurgents in possession of gear belonging to the Iraqi soldiers killed two days ago. For the Iraqi troops, it was a special form of retribution.

"It was a big moral victory, and huge for their morale," Pearson said. "This is a statement that the Iraqi army is not going to back down."

"It was a day to remember," Callaghan said.

Also Tuesday, at least 31 people were killed when a cargo plane carrying Turkish citizens crashed while trying to land in thick fog at an airport in Balad, about 50 miles north of Baghdad, Turkish officials told news services.

On Monday, 10 days after Saddam Hussein's hanging, his trial on charges of ordering the killing of as many as 180,000 Iraqi Kurds continued without him. Prosecutors played audiotapes of Hussein's voice justifying the use of chemical weapons that would kill "thousands," the Associated Press reported.

"Kurdish people have been waiting for this moment," said Saad Barazanchi, a Kurdish legislator. "This is evidence that Saddam ordered chemical weapons to be used against the Kurds."

Don't Give Up On Iraq Yet (WP)

By Tariq Al-Hashimi

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

During my recent visit to Washington I found a nation fatigued by news of a faraway battle that seemed to creep closer with each fallen soldier. I found an administration wearied by infighting among an Iraqi government that seems incapable of reaching simple agreements. The chaos and sectarian destruction plaguing my people are slowly becoming just statistics in passing headlines, as we become a nation whose people spend more time each day preparing for death than for life.

Many Americans unfortunately believe that Iraq can no longer be salvaged. Even some in the Bush administration see a civil war as inevitable.

First, both of our nations have invested too much to walk away now. If this battle is lost, the entire region could be destabilized.

Second, despite the chaos in my country, not all bridges of patriotism have been burned. Iraqis have ties to their beloved country, not only to their sects and ethnicities. Proof of this nationalism recently came from the most unlikely of venues.

During the Asian Games in Qatar last month, Iraq became quiet, if only for a few hours. Citizens united as brothers behind the national soccer team, which against all odds fought its way to the finals. The team didn't battle for a militia or a sect but for an idea -- the nation of Iraq. The players didn't win the medal but gained something far greater: They won us hope. From children on the streets to politicians to parents, we were all one, and we were all Iraqi. This tells me that all is not lost, that a deep-rooted sense of nationalism still lies within all Iraqis, and that it can and must be rekindled.

It is true that terrorism of an unparalleled nature rages in Iraq and that Iraqis are the ones killing each other on the basis of sectarian and ethnic identities. It is also true that reconstruction and economic development have ground to a halt because of the violence. And Iraqis are divided on such fundamental issues as reconciliation and how to bring about security.

Despite all the hardships, however, we Iraqis were able to raise the rudimentary pillars of our nascent democracy by writing a constitution, electing a parliament based on that constitution and granting a vote of confidence to a government through that elected parliament. It is not fair to look at Iraq as a collection of failures without identifying its successes. The birth of a new nation is not easy, but just as your nation has become a beacon for democracy, we hope that Iraq will one day do the same.

All is not lost! Eliminating regional influence is the only way to bring Iraqis back to their senses. Americans understandably find it difficult to support any strategy that prolongs the presence of your troops in Iraq. We do not want to stand in the way of your forces going home. But that decision should not be made under the pressure of car bombs and kidnappings. A precipitous withdrawal of forces would create a security vacuum in Iraq that our forces cannot yet handle -- and would therefore be filled by extremists. This does not serve the interests of Iraq or the United States.

If those soccer players taught us anything, it is that a proper strategy for eliminating sectarianism and fostering nationalism is key. Reconstituting the Iraqi Armed Services and then reforming, retraining and properly arming them must be a central component of this strategy. Another should be revising Iraq's constitution to give our central government effective powers but prevent any sort of dictatorship by the prime minister. The powers that the prime minister holds now must be revised to guarantee that all stakeholders can share in governing. Adherence to the rule of law is also central.

True reconciliation in line with what happened in South Africa and Ireland is needed for resolution of the conflict in Iraq, but that reconciliation must be free from regional stipulations. Economics is also key, as gainful employment keeps Iraqi youths away from the insurgents. All of this must be preceded by a coordinated effort to secure Baghdad, which has become a haven for militia and terrorist activity.

We need a greater focus on the militias, which kill innocent civilians and defy the government with impunity. The Pentagon recently told Congress that the militias pose more of a danger to the security and stability of Iraq than do the terrorist groups operating there. Militias do not differ from other terrorist groups; therefore, the Iraqi government and the United States must classify militias as such and must treat and fight them in the same manner as other terrorists.

A comprehensive plan is needed to save Iraq from disaster. I hope that the administration has considered these critical issues and that the new strategy effectively addresses them.

Two Alliances (WSJ)

By Edward N. Luttwak

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

It was the hugely ambitious project of the Bush administration to transform the entire Middle East by remaking Iraq into an irresistible model of prosperous democracy. Having failed in that worthy purpose, another, more prosaic result has inadvertently been achieved: divide and rule, the classic formula for imperial power on the cheap. The ancient antipathy between Sunni and Shiite has become a dynamic conflict, not just within Iraq but across the Middle East, and key protagonists on each side seek the support of American power. Once the Bush administration realizes what it has wrought, it will cease to scramble for more troops that can be sent to Iraq, because it has become pointless to patrol and outpost a civil war, while a mere quarter or less of the troops already there are quite enough to control the outcome. And that is just the start of what can now be achieved across the region with very little force, and some competent diplomacy.

On Dec. 4, 2006, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, head of Iraq's largest political party, went to the White House to plead his case with President Bush. The son of an ayatollah, and himself a lifelong militant cleric, Mr. Hakim is hardly a natural partner for the U.S. -- while living in Iran for 23 years he must have declaimed "death to America" on many an occasion. But as the chief leader of Iraq's Arab Shiite population, he has no choice. Each day brings deadly Sunni attacks, and just as the Sunnis are strengthened by volunteers and money from outside Iraq, the Shiites, too, need all the help they can get, especially American military training for the Shiite-dominated army and police. For President Bush, the visiting Mr. Hakim brought welcome promises of cooperation against his aggressive Shiite rival Moqtada al-Sadr as well as the Sunni insurgents. It no longer even seems strange that the best ally of the U.S. in Iraq is Mr. Hakim's party, the Sciri: the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, whose very title evokes the Iranian model of radically anti-Western theocracy.

Just as the Sunni threat to majority rule in Iraq is forcing Sciri to cooperate with the U.S., the prospect of a Shiite-dominated Iraq is forcing Sunni Arab states, especially Saudi Arabia, the Emirates and Jordan, to seek American help against the rising power of the Shiites. Some Sunnis viewed Iran with suspicion even when it was still under the conservative rule of the shah, in part because its very existence as the only Shiite state could inspire unrest among the oppressed Shiite populations of Arabia. More recently, the nearby Sunni Arab states have been increasingly worried by the military alliance between Iran, Syria and the Hezbollah of Lebanon. But now that a Shiite-ruled Iraq could add territorial contiguity to the alliance, forming a "Shiite crescent" extending all the way from Pakistan to the Mediterranean, it is not only the Sunnis of nearby Arabia that feel very seriously threatened. The entire order of Muslim orthodoxy is challenged by the expansion of heterodox Shiite rule.

Although it was the U.S. that was responsible for ending Sunni supremacy in Iraq along with Saddam Hussein's dictatorship, it remains the only possible patron for the Sunni Arab states resisting the Shiite alliance. Americans have no interest in the secular-sectarian quarrel, but there is a very real convergence of interests with the Sunni Arab states because Iran is the main enemy for both.

At this moment, it is in Lebanon that the new Sunni-U.S. alliance has become active. With continuing mass demonstrations and threatening speeches, the Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah is trying to force the government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora to give way to a new coalition which he can dominate. Syria and Iran are supporting Mr. Nasrallah, while the U.S. is backing Mr. Siniora. He has the support of the Druze and of most Christians as well, but it is also very much as a Sunni leader that Mr. Siniora is firmly resisting so far. That has gained him the financial backing of Saudi Arabia, which is funding Sunni counterdemonstrations and has even tried to co-opt Hezbollah, among other things. It was in their Arab identity that Hezbollah claimed heroic status because they were not routed by the Israelis in the recent fighting, but evidently many Sunni Arabs in and out of Lebanon view them instead as Shiite sectarians, far too obedient to non-Arab Iran. That suits the U.S., for Iran and Hezbollah are its enemies, too.

The Sunni-U.S. alignment in Lebanon, which interestingly coexists with the U.S.-Shiite alliance in Iraq, may yet achieve results of strategic importance if Syria is successfully detached from its alliance with Iran. Originally it was a necessary alliance for both countries because Saddam's Iraq was waging war on Iran, and periodically tried to overthrow the Assad regime of Syria. Now that Iraq is no longer a threat to either country, Iran still needs Syria as a bridge to Hezbollah, but for Syria the alliance is strategically obsolete, as well as inconsistent with the country's Arab identity. True, Syria is ruled primarily by members of the Alawite sect that is usually classified as a Shiite offshoot. But that extremely heterodox faith (it has Christmas and the transmigration of souls) is far different from the Shiism of Iraq, Lebanon or Iran -- where it would be persecuted; and besides, at least 70% of Syrians are Sunnis. That may explain why the Syrian regime has not used its full influence to overthrow Mr. Siniora: His stand against the Shiite Hezbollah resonates with his fellow Sunnis of Syria. But another reason may be the promise of substantial aid and investment from Saudi Arabia and the Emirates for Syria's needy economy, if the regime diminishes its alliance with Iran and Hezbollah, or better, ends it altogether. The U.S., for its part, is no longer actively driving Syria into the arms of the Iranians by threatening a march on Damascus, while even the unofficial suggestions of negotiations by the Iraq Study Group made an impression, judging by some conciliatory Syrian statements.

The U.S.-Sunni alliance, which is a plain fact in Lebanon, is still only tentative over Syria; but it would be greatly energized if Iran were successfully deprived of its only Arab ally. At the same time, the U.S.-Shiite alliance in Iraq has been strengthened in the wake of Mr. Hakim's visit. The Sunni insurgency is undiminished, but at least other Shiite groups are jointly weakening the only actively anti-American Shiite faction headed by Mr. Sadr.

When the Bush administration came into office, only Egypt and Jordan were functioning allies of the U.S. Iran and Iraq were already declared enemies, Syria was hostile, and even its supposed friends in the Arabian peninsula were so disinclined to help that none did anything to oppose al Qaeda. Some actively helped it, while others knowingly allowed private funds to reach the terrorists whose declared aim was to kill Americans.

The Iraq war has indeed brought into existence a New Middle East, in which Arab Sunnis can no longer gleefully disregard American interests because they need help against the looming threat of Shiite supremacy, while in Iraq at the core of the Arab world, the Shia are allied with the U.S. What past imperial statesmen strove to achieve with much cunning and cynicism, the Bush administration has brought about accidentally. But the result is exactly the same.

Blair: Manner Of Saddam Execution Wrong (AP)

By David Stringer

AP, January 10, 2007

British Prime Minister Tony Blair said Tuesday that the manner of Saddam Hussein's execution was completely wrong and unacceptable — his first public comments about the Dec. 30 hanging.

However, Blair told a London news conference he hoped disputes over the taunting of the former Iraqi dictator and the release of illicit video footage of the execution would not lead people to forget the gravity of Saddam's crimes.

"The crimes that Saddam committed does not excuse the manner of his execution, but the manner of his execution does not excuse the crimes," Blair said, during a joint news conference with visiting Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe.

Saddam was executed for crimes against humanity for the killing of 148 Shiites in the town of Dujail after an assassination attempt against him there in 1982.

A cellphone video of the execution leaked out shortly after the former dictator was hanged. It showed some of those present in the execution chamber taunting Saddam in the final moments of his life as he stood on the gallows with a noose around his neck. It also showed the moment of his death — a scene that was left out of the official version of the execution broadcast on Iraqi television.

Blair, President Bush's chief ally in the war in Iraq, said he hoped the issues surrounding Saddam's execution would not "blind us to the crimes he committed against his own people." Saddam was responsible for the "death of hundreds of thousands of innocent Iraqis, 1 million causalities in the Iran-Iraq war and the use of chemical weapons against his own people, wiping out entire villages," he said.

The British premier had faced public criticism after choosing not to immediately comment on the execution.

Both Blair's deputy John Prescott and expected successor Treasury chief Gordon Brown had publicly criticized the hanging, but Blair declined to answer questions on the matter after returning from a holiday in Florida last week.

Fighting Words (WP)

By Peter Carlson

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

"The man was standing 100 meters from the explosion and he said there was no explosion," Adam Tiffen says.

He's looking at his computer screen, where a photo shows him in his Army uniform, questioning a kneeling Iraqi who was captured after a roadside bomb exploded near Humvees carrying Tiffen and other soldiers from the Maryland National Guard.

"If he wasn't the triggerman, he was the spotter for the triggerman," Tiffen says. "But I had to let him go. I had nothing on him. What can you do? Iraqis have rights, too."

Tiffen, 31, is sitting in his office at the law firm of Porter Wright Morris & Arthur, a few blocks from the White House, looking at pictures from his year in Iraq. His law degree hangs on the wall near his Bronze Star. On his desk sit a couple of souvenirs of Iraq -- a .50-caliber machine gun bullet and a hunk of shrapnel from a roadside bomb. His black crew cut matches his black suit.

"Look at me, I'm in my lawyer uniform," he says. "I'm Mr. Attorney on Pennsylvania Avenue with my degrees on the wall. And seven months ago, I was in Iraq wearing body armor and I hadn't slept in three days and I was running around the desert."

While he was in Iraq, leading a 40-man rifle platoon, he wrote a blog about his experiences. He called it "The Replacements" because, he says, "we replaced guys and then other people replaced us -- we were just in a chain, a cycle." His blog contained no editorial comments, no political messages. He just told stories about what he saw every day:

The first round explodes with a shattering crack, and I can hear shouting coming from outside the sandbagged room.

DOJ_NMG_0114885

"Incoming! Incoming! Incoming!"

I leap to my feet and quickly settle my advanced combat uniform helmet onto my head. Despite the explosions and yelling coming from outside, somehow my mind registers the inconsequential thought that the helmet pads lining the inside of the helmet feel tacky from days of sweat and grime and will need to be washed.

At first the blog was just for his family and friends but soon word got out and his stories were e-mailed around and he started getting feedback from strangers: "Thank you so much for allowing us to see the human side of the war."

Armchair General, a military history Web site, printed part of his blog (http://thereplacements.blogspot.com). So did the liberal journal Mother Jones. Last October, several of his stories were posted on The Sandbox, a military blog founded by "Doonesbury" cartoonist Garry Trudeau. Last Sunday, two tiny snippets from Tiffen's stories were quoted in the "Doonesbury" comic strip.

The first read: Behind her, I can see that her daughter had tears in her eyes. I turn away from their stricken faces.

The second said: Out in the dark, a blue van stops for a second, its driver confused. The soldier raises his rifle.An Unexpected Call "People asked me, what are you doing?" Tiffen says, laughing. "You're a nice Jewish boy. You're a lawyer, Why are you in the Army? Why are you in the infantry? Why are you in Iraq?"

When he was a kid, growing up on Long Island, his parents took him to Gettysburg and that sparked an interest in military history. "My heroes were not basketball players, they were soldiers," he says. "I thought, I want that experience. I think I wanted to test myself against those soldiers, to see how I stacked up."

He joined Army ROTC in 2000, while he was studying at George Washington University Law School. He graduated in 2003 and was commissioned as a lieutenant in the Maryland National Guard. He was working on an insider-trading case at Porter Wright when the unit he'd trained with was called up for duty in Iraq. By then, Tiffen was in another unit but he got a call from his old platoon sergeant, Thomas Thompson.

"He's the lieutenant I wanted to go to war with," Thompson says. "I called him on the phone and said, 'I need a platoon leader. Have you thought of coming back?' "

Tiffen volunteered to go. "When soldiers you respect ask you to go with them, I couldn't say no," he explains. "I couldn't stay home and wave goodbye to these guys."

They arrived in Iraq in May of 2005, assigned to an area outside Baghdad, near a town called Saba al-Bor. For a few days, the guys they were replacing showed them around.

"We would drive past Saba al-Bor and they would say, 'Don't go in this town, nobody's been in there for six months, you don't want to go there,' " Tiffen recalls. "So it built up in my mind that it was a town occupied by the boogeyman. And then my company commander came up to me and said, 'Take your platoon and go into Saba al-Bor and occupy the building next to the police station.' "

"Insurgents were using the town as a staging point for moving weapons into Baghdad," says Capt. Brian Borakove, Tiffen's company commander. "That's why it was very important for us to take it under our control."

So Tiffen took his 40-man platoon into Saba al-Bor and occupied the municipal building next to the police station.

"We put .50-caliber machine guns on the roof and parked the Humvee in front of the gate and started sandbagging windows," Tiffen says.

They called it the Alamo and chalked the name on the roof. In his blog, Tiffen described the place:

Inside the building, soldiers sleep on dirty concrete floors, often using their hard body armor as a pillow. They sleep where they have collapsed, exhausted from a long day and night of continuous dismounted patrols and sandbag details . . . I walk to the north wall of the roof . . . No man's land stretches before me in the darkness, a half kilometer of broken ground, trash, feral dogs, and half-grown, stunted weeds . . . I can't help but reflect that if Hell had a Central Park, it would be a lot like this.

From their base at the Alamo, Tiffen and his platoon patrolled Saba al-Bor and the nearby farmland, setting up roadblocks, searching houses, trying to catch insurgents. Every day or two, whenever he got the chance, Tiffen would take out his laptop, write about what he'd seen and upload it to his blog.

He wrote about the heat: By 12:00 it was 120 degrees. Imagine putting your face into a lit oven, turning a powerful hairdryer on your face and throwing sand in your eyes."

He wrote about searching a house and arresting a suspected insurgent while his wife pled for mercy: Trembling, she turns to me and starts asking questions in Arabic. "What has he done? Where are you taking him?" . . . The pain in her voice is obvious. She is terrified for her family and for her husband. The soldiers have come to take him away, and for all she knows, she may never see him again. My heart is in my mouth.

He wrote about getting hit by shrapnel from a roadside bomb: I feel a sharp blow to my abdomen below my body armor, just as my mind registers the blast. The blow doubles me over, and knocks me back on my feet. I don't want to look. Gingerly reaching down, I feel for wetness, for the sign that I am cut and bleeding. I close my eyes and check for pain. Nothing. Breathing a sigh of relief, I open my eyes.

He was fine, not hurt at all, but the story scared his sister, Margo, who fired back an e-mail saying: "Sheesh, boy! You're giving us heart attacks over here."

His parents checked the blog every day. "It was a lifeline," says his mother, Michelle Goldsmith.

Bill McGrath, his boss at Porter Wright, was reading it, too, and sending back news of the insider-trading case Tiffen had been working on back in Washington. (Their client was convicted on 19 out of 27 charges.)

Tiffen loved getting e-mail from friends and family, of course, but he was really floored by the ones he received from strangers. "If I didn't post something for a few days," he says, "I would get dozens of panicked e-mails from people I'd never met, saying 'Are you okay?' "

Meanwhile, Tiffen was fighting a war, trying to keep his soldiers alive and learning to deal with Iraqis.

"I watched him question prisoners and he was very good," Thompson recalls. "He treated the Iraqis with respect until they gave him reason to do otherwise. But he was no pushover."

The view from the Alamo was confusing. In Saba al-Bor, it was tough to tell what side people were on. Many of the locals supported the Americans and several became informants, providing information on the insurgents. But Tiffen suspected that one of his Iraqi translators was secretly working for the other side. And his men arrested several of the local cops for aiding the insurgents.

"One of them tried to kill one of our informants," Tiffen says. "They were taking him out to execute him and he managed to open the trunk he was in and crawl out of the moving vehicle and he ran to the Alamo and told us about it."

In Saba al-Bor, a death squad was at work. Tiffen wrote about it in his blog: Across from the mosque, in a small woodworking shop, a man has just been murdered. An hour ago, three insurgents entered his shop and shot him in the head. The weapon was held so close to his head that the muzzle blast burned and blackened his ear. Only 300 meters from the Alamo, he was left to die, four AK-47 shell casings lying next to his body.

Still, Tiffen thought he was making progress in Saba al-Bor. "We rolled up some of the insurgent operations there," he says. "We secured the town and we brought in some of the local sheiks and we built a town council to address their problems."

After about six months, Tiffen's soldiers handed Saba al-Bor over to a new group of American replacements, then spent a few months escorting military convoys across the desert near the Syrian border.

Last May, Tiffen and the rest of his 128-man Maryland National Guard company came home -- all of them. Fourteen men were wounded -- two of them seriously injured by a car bomb -- but nobody had been killed in Iraq.

"I hadn't set foot in this country in a year and the first American I saw when I got off the plane was this old man wearing a World War II veterans cap," Tiffen says. "He must have been in his 80s and he was standing there shaking the hand of every soldier who came off the plane. It was 6:30 in the morning and this old man must have gotten out of bed before dawn to come to the airport to shake the hand of every soldier coming back."Back Home

"When I first got back, it was very uncomfortable," Tiffen says. He's sitting in an Arlington restaurant, ignoring his cheeseburger and fries.

"It bothered me that people weren't talking about Iraq," he says. "People go through life like nothing is happening when so many Americans are in harm's way. We just hit the 3,000 casualty mark and nobody batted an eye. I mean, Britney Spears is more important."

When he returned, he spent about 10 days seeing his family and friends and his girlfriend, then he flew to Israel.

"I studied religion in a school there for a couple weeks," he says. "They say there are no atheists in the foxholes and after spending a year in Iraq, you sort of come back a little more religious than when you left."

He studied the Torah and lived in the Old City of Jerusalem, near the Wailing Wall, and watched the Israeli soldiers patrolling. "I felt more comfortable there, surrounded by soldiers and checkpoints, than I was here," he says. "I was used to it."

Last August he returned to work at Porter Wright, doing litigation and international trade work. McGrath, his boss, says Tiffen is doing a great job. But Tiffen says the transition is tough.

"It's hard to go back and sit at a desk when you think about all the stuff that's going on and you remember what you've been through," he says. "You come back and you say to yourself: Should I be different? What did it all mean? I don't think anybody comes back the same."

He thought about the war every day. He toyed with the idea of turning his blog into a book. He made a video of the footage he shot in Iraq, set to Loreena McKennit's mournful song "Dante's Prayer," and posted it on YouTube.

Then one day in November, sitting in his office at work, he got an e-mail from one of his soldiers with a link to an article from USA Today. The dateline was Saba al-Bor. The headline read: "Hard-won turf easily lost in transfer to Iraqis."

Saba al-Bor was so peaceful last summer, the article said, that the American troops left, handing the Alamo over to Iraqi police in a ceremony on Sept. 20. "Fifteen days later, on Oct. 5, U.S. troops had to return to Saba al-Bor to restore order," the story continued. "Most of the town's police had fled, Sunni and Shiite residents were at war with each other, and sectarian death squads roamed the town. The progress built over months had evaporated."

Tiffen read on. Sunnis had hit the Shiite section of town with 44 mortar shells. Shiite militants responded by killing Sunnis. American troops found 44 bodies dumped around the city, some of them decapitated.

Tiffen was stunned. He left his office, took a walk. "I needed to get some air," he says. "I walked past the White House. I don't know why. My feet just carried me there. My reaction surprised me. I didn't realize how much I'd invested in that town."

Nearly two months later, the story still bothers him. "It's astonishing," he says. "The whole place went to [excrement] when they pulled U.S. troops out. And yet it was considered a success story -- that's why they turned it over to the Iraqis. All our efforts over all that time -- I don't want to say it was for nothing. All I want to say is that it hit me really hard because we invested so much time and energy in the people that lived there. I felt like I was part of the town. And a year later, to read that because the U.S. troops left, people are being executed, that hurt. That really hit home."

He eats his cheeseburger, sips his Coke, talks about other things for a while. But then he returns to the story of Saba al-Bor.

"What does that say?" he asks, not expecting an answer. "Something has to change. I really don't know what it is. Maybe putting 30,000 more troops in will help. I don't know. I don't think anybody knows."

Helicopters Strafe Al-Qaida In Somalia (AP)

By Salad Duhul

AP, January 10, 2007

Attack helicopters strafed suspected al-Qaida fighters in southern Somalia on Tuesday, witnesses said, following two days of airstrikes by U.S. forces — the first U.S. offensives in the African country since 18 American soldiers were killed here in 1993.

In Washington, a U.S. intelligence official said American forces killed five to 10 people in an attack on one target in southern Somalia believed to be associated with al-Qaida. The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the operation's sensitivity, said a small number of others present, perhaps four or five, were wounded.

A Somali lawmaker said 31 civilians, including a newlywed couple, died in Tuesday's assault by two helicopters near Afmadow, a town in a forested area close to the Kenyan border. The report could not be independently verified.

A Somali Defense Ministry official described the helicopters as American, but witnesses told The Associated Press they could not make out identification markings on the craft. Washington officials had no comment on the helicopter strike.

The U.S. is hunting down Islamic extremists, said the Somali defense official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk to reporters.

Earlier, Somalia's president said that the U.S. was pursuing suspects in the 1998 bombings of two U.S. embassies in East Africa, and that the effort has his support.

Somali troops and their Ethiopian allies were attacked in the capital late Tuesday by gunmen riding in two pickup trucks who fired two rocket propelled grenades, witnesses said.

The rocket attack was followed by several minutes of rifle fire. One Somali soldier was killed and two other soldiers and a bystander were wounded, said minibus driver Harun Ahmed, who took the injured to a hospital.

Col. Shino Moalin Nur, a Somali military commander, told the AP by telephone late Tuesday that at least one U.S. AC-130 gunship attacked a suspected al-Qaida training camp Sunday on a remote island at the southern tip of Somalia next to Kenya.

Somali officials said they had reports of many deaths.

On Monday, witnesses and Nur said, more U.S. airstrikes were launched against Islamic extremists in Hayi, 30 miles from Afmadow. Nur said attacks continued Tuesday.

"Nobody can exactly explain what is going on inside these forested areas," the Somali commander said. "However, we are receiving reports that most of the Islamist fighters have died and the rest would be captured soon."

In Washington on Tuesday, Defense Department spokesman Bryan Whitman spoke of one strike in southern Somalia, but would not confirm any of the details or say whether any al-Qaida militants were killed.

The assault was based on intelligence "that led us to believe we had principal al-Qaida leaders in an area where we could identify them and take action against them," Whitman said.

Somali Islamic extremists are accused of sheltering suspects in the 1998 embassy bombings. American officials also want to ensure the militants no longer pose a threat to Somalia's U.N.-backed transitional government.

The aircraft carrier USS Dwight D. Eisenhower has arrived off Somalia's coast and launched intelligence-gathering missions over Somalia, the U.S. military said. Three other U.S. warships were conducting anti-terror operations.

U.S. warships have been seeking to capture al-Qaida members thought to be fleeing Somalia by sea after Ethiopia's military invaded Dec. 24 in support of the interim Somali government. The offensive drove the Islamic militia out of much of southern Somalia, including the capital Mogadishu, and toward the Kenyan border.

President Abdullahi Yusuf, head of the U.N.-backed transitional government, told journalists in Mogadishu that the U.S. "has a right to bombard terrorist suspects who attacked its embassies in Kenya and Tanzania."

Other Somalis in the capital said the attacks would increase anti-American sentiment in their largely Muslim country. Many Somalis are already upset by the presence of troops from neighboring Ethiopia, which has a large Christian population.

The U.S. Embassy in Nairobi, Kenya, on Tuesday reissued a terror warning to Americans living in or visiting the Horn of Africa.

It was the first overt military action by the U.S. in Somalia since it led a U.N. force that intervened in the 1990s in an effort to fight famine. The mission led to clashes between U.N. forces and Somali warlords, including the battle, chronicled in the book and movie "Black Hawk Down," that killed 18 U.S. soldiers.

Mohamed Mahmud Burale told the AP by telephone that at least four civilians were killed Monday evening in Hayi, including his young son. His report could not be independently verified.

Government spokesman Abdirahman Dinari said it was not known how many people were killed, "but we understand there were a lot of casualties. Most were Islamic fighters."

Another attack by an AC-130 gunship reportedly occurred Monday afternoon on Badmadow island, in a group of six rocky islands known as Ras Kamboni — a suspected terrorist training base.

Thickets provide dense cover and the only road to the area is virtually impassable, locals said.

The U.S. military's main target on the island was thought to be Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, who allegedly planned the 1998 attacks on the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania that killed 225 people.

Leaders of Somalia's Islamic movement have vowed from their hideouts to launch an Iraq-style guerrilla war, and al-Qaida chief Osama bin Laden's deputy has called on militants to carry out suicide attacks on Ethiopian troops.

In an interview published Tuesday in the French newspaper Le Monde, Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said that suspected terrorists from Canada, Britain, Pakistan and elsewhere were among those captured or killed during recent military operations.

Somalia has not had an effective central government since warlords toppled dictator Mohamed Siad Barre in 1991. The warlords turned on each other, creating chaos in the nation of 7 million people.

European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana said he told U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon that a U.N. peacekeeping force may be needed to guarantee security and stability in Somalia.

Airstrike Rekindles Somalis' Anger At The U.S. (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman And Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Jan. 9 — Somali officials said Tuesday that dozens of people were killed in an American airstrike on Sunday, most of them Islamist fighters fleeing in armed pickup trucks across a remote, muddy stretch of the KenyaSomalia border.

American officials said terrorists from Al Qaeda had been the target of the strike, which they said had killed about a dozen people. But the officials acknowledged that the identities of the victims were still unknown.

Several residents of the area, in the southern part of the country, said dozens of civilians had been killed, and news of the attack immediately set off new waves of anti-American anger in Mogadishu, Somalia's battle-scarred capital, where the United States has a complicated legacy.

"They're just trying to get revenge for what we did to them in 1993," said Deeq Salad Mursel, a taxi driver, referring to the infamous "Black Hawk Down" episode in which Somali gunmen killed 18 American soldiers and brought down two American helicopters during an intense battle in Mogadishu.

The country's Islamist movement swiftly seized much of Somalia last year and ruled with mixed success, bringing a much desired semblance of peace but also a harsh brand of Islam.

Two weeks ago, that all changed after Ethiopian-led troops routed the Islamist forces and helped bring the Western-backed transitional government to Mogadishu. Ethiopian officials said the Islamists were a growing regional threat.

DOJ_NMG_0114889

The last remnants of the Islamist forces fled to Ras Kamboni, an isolated fishing village on the Kenyan border that residents said had been used as a terrorist sanctuary before. Starting in the mid-1990s, they said, the Islamists built trenches, hospitals and special terrorist classrooms in the village and taxed local fisherman to pay the costs.

On Sunday, an American AC-130 gunship pounded the area around Ras Kamboni, and also a location father north where American officials said three ringleaders of the bombings in 1998 of the United States embassies in Kenya and Tanzania were hiding. Somali officials said those bombings had been planned in Ras Kamboni after a local Somali terrorist outfit invited Al Qaeda to use the village as a base.

According to Abdul Rashid Hidig, a member of Somalia's transitional parliament who represents the border area, the American airstrike on Sunday wiped out a long convoy of Islamist leaders trying to flee deeper into the bush, though he said he did not know if the specific suspects singled out by the United States had been with them.

"Their trucks got stuck in the mud and they were easy targets," he said.

Mr. Hidig toured the area with military officials on Tuesday and said he had met several captured foreign fighters who had come from Europe and the Middle East. "I saw two white guys and asked, Where are you from?" Mr. Hidig said. "One said Jordan, the other Sweden. Yeah, it was weird."

Mr. Hidig said two civilians had been killed by the airstrike, but representatives of the Islamist forces said it had killed many more.

The Islamists' health director said dozens of nomadic herdsmen and their families were grazing their animals in the same wet valley that the Islamists were trying to drive across. "Their donkeys, their camels, their cows — they've all been destroyed," he said. "And many children were killed."

He spoke by telephone from an undisclosed location; his account could not be independently verified.

Mustef Yunis Culusow, a former Islamist leader who abandoned the movement days ago, said the once-powerful Islamist movement's top leaders were now trapped in a small village with Ethiopian soldiers in front of them, the Indian Ocean behind them and now American gunships circling above them.

"The leaders know they're finished," Mr. Culusow said in a telephone interview from Kismayo, a large town north of Ras Kamboni. "They've basically told the young fighters they can go, it's over, and that anyone who stays behind should be resigned to die."

For several days, Ethiopian fighter jets and helicopter gunships have been laying down a blanket of fire over the area, and attacks continued on Tuesday.

American military and intelligence officials expressed confidence that at least one senior Qaeda leader in Somalia had been killed in the American attack or subsequent strikes by Ethiopian troops. One official said Abu Taha al-Sudani — a Sudanese aide to Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, who is thought to be the ringleader of Al Qaeda's East African cell — might have been killed.

American military and intelligence officials said that they expected further military strikes but that the terrorism suspects were probably traveling separately and trying to blend into the civilian population.

Pentagon and intelligence officials said the Ethiopian offensive had unearthed fresh intelligence about the location of Qaeda operatives whose trail had long gone cold.

"When you disrupt things and people move around, they become easier to target," said one American counterterrorism official, speaking on condition of anonymity. "They have to make arrangements on the fly, and they become easier to find."

American and Ethiopian forces are sharing intelligence to pinpoint the whereabouts of the terrorism suspects and their entourages. The Pentagon announced that the aircraft carrier Dwight D. Eisenhower had been dispatched to the region to tighten a naval blockade off the Somali coast.

Washington's decision to wade back into Somalia was, in a way, a culmination of America's seesaw policy toward the country in the last five years.

With the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan consuming the attention of national security planners in Washington, the Bush administration's interest in Somalia was driven primarily by fact that a handful of Qaeda operatives responsible for attacks in the Horn of Africa were thought to be hiding there.

America's recent forays into Somalia have tended to backfire. President Clinton abruptly curtailed a large American-led aid mission in the 1990s after the 18 soldiers were killed, leaving the country in a swirl of chaos and bloodshed, where much of it remains.

Then, last summer, American efforts to finance a band of Mogadishu warlords as a bulwark against the growing Islamist movement stumbled when many Somalis learned of the hidden American hand and threw their support behind the Islamists.

With the Pentagon still snakebitten by its experience in Somalia — rendering a ground offensive in the lawless country unpalatable — there was little the thousands of American soldiers and marines stationed in neighboring Djibouti could do to track down the Qaeda suspects.

Until this week, Washington was content to remain behind the scenes and use the Ethiopian invasion as the public face of the effort against the Islamists and their allies.

Now the Islamists have lost their grip on the country, and Somalia could be close to a turning point. For the first time since 1991, when the military dictator Mohammed Siad Barre fled, plunging the country into anarchy, there is a potentially viable government in the capital. But its survival depends on the thousands of Ethiopian troops still here, and increasingly, it seems, many Somalis do not like them. For their part, the Ethiopians have vowed not to stay much longer.

Some call the Ethiopians infidel invaders because Ethiopia is a country with a long Christian identity, though it is in fact half Muslim. Others do not like them because Ethiopia is a close ally of the United States, which is why American airstrikes could make things difficult for the Ethiopians and transitional government officials.

Some Islamists have vowed to carry on as an Iraq-style insurgency, and on Tuesday night two truckloads of gunmen attacked Ethiopian troops based at a government building, the former Ministry of Skins and Hides, in downtown Mogadishu.

The booms of rocket-propelled grenades echoed across town and set off a two-minute gunfight. As shoppers in a nearby market ducked for cover, spent shells clinked on the pavement. Afterward, residents reported seeing two bodies on the street.

U.S. Aircraft Launch 2nd Wave Of Somalia Attacks (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders And Abukar Albadri

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia — Helicopter gunships resumed attacks today against suspected terrorist holdouts in southern Somalia following U.S. airstrikes in the area Monday, Somali officials said.

The attacks against suspected Al Qaeda members believed to be hiding in Somalia marked the first overt American military intervention in the Horn of Africa nation since the U.S. withdrew its troops from a peacekeeping operation in 1994 after the deaths of 18 American servicemen.

A Pentagon spokesman would only confirm today that U.S. forces were involved in an attack Monday after receiving "credible intelligence." State Department spokesman Sean McCormack declined to comment on details about the strikes, but defended the U.S. interest for intervening in Somalia's conflict.

"Very clearly, the U.S. government has had a concern that there are terrorists and Al Qaeda-affiliated terrorists that were in Somalia," he said. "We have a great interest in seeing that those individuals not be able to flee to other locations."

Somali officials said the U.S. helicopters struck again today in the village of Afmadow, but U.S. officials would not comment on whether their operations were continuing. Some witness accounts suggested that the most recent strikes might have involved Ethiopia. Earlier reports had said the gunships were U.S.

The U.S. military has been patrolling Somalia's Indian Ocean coastline since late last month, when Ethiopian-led troops helped Somalia's transitional government seize control of the capital, Mogadishu, from an alliance of religious leaders known as the Islamic Courts Union.

U.S. and Ethiopian officials accused the Islamic movement's leaders of having links to terrorism. After abandoning Mogadishu, hundreds of Islamic fighters fled south toward the Kenyan border, where they have been cornered in recent days by troops from Somalia and Ethiopia and blocked from crossing into Kenya by that nation's soldiers.

Acting on information that suspects from the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania might be among the Islamic fighters, a U.S. Air Force Special Operations gunship struck at least one target early this week.

Somali officials and witnesses said at least five villages in southern Somalia have been targeted in strikes spanning the past three days. One village, Afmadow, was reportedly struck a second time today.

Details about damage and casualties remained unclear, due in large part to the lack of communications in the remote region near the Kenyan border, where cell phone service is not available.

According to estimates by local officials and witness accounts aired over radio stations, the death toll ranged from 15 to more than 50. There were several reports of civilians being killed or injured, including six members of one family and guests at a wedding ceremony.

"We ask the U.S. to stop the bombing of innocent people," one elderly clan leader told BBC Somalia radio service this afternoon. "The terrorists have all gone."

According to one Somali government official, among the dead was the Islamic courts former chief of security of Mogadishu, Sheik Abduallahi Moalim Ali. The report could not be confirmed.

DOJ_NMG_0114891

On the streets of Mogadishu, the U.S. strikes divided already tense residents. Many already believe the U.S. secretly backed Ethiopia and the transitional government in the battle against the Islamic courts. The airstrikes stirred anti-Western fervor among some Somalis.

Hassan Huddurow Ali, a resident in Mogadishu, condemned the U.S. attack and vowed revenge. "We will retaliate one day, even if it means suicide," he said.

However, shopkeeper Moalim Salad Nur blamed Islamist court leaders for instigating the war. "I urge the Islamist courts to surrender so they won't cause more problems for the people," he said.

The U.S. Embassy in Nairobi today issued a new security warning to Americans living in the region, warning that Somalia's conflict could make them targets of terrorist strikes.

Somali President Abdullahi Yusuf today endorsed the U.S. action.

"They have a right to do so," Yusuf said, speaking at his first news conference in the capital since he was named to head the transitional government in 2004.

Until he arrived Monday, Yusuf, a former military leader who served as president of the Puntland region in northern Somalia, had not stepped foot in Mogadishu for more than 10 years, due to the city's insecurity.

Somali military officials said today they received advance warning about the U.S. airstrikes and were standing by to capture fleeing suspects. Officials said they have apprehended 28 people, who were being held for questioning.

Though the government has offered amnesty to Islamic fighters who lay down their weapons, Yusuf said the government would prosecute the movement's former leaders.

"They committed many crimes," he said. "We will not offer amnesty for criminals."

Relief workers predicted that the strikes would send a flood of new Somali refugees toward the Kenyan border. "Any fighting just increases the fear of the people," said one U.N. worker who did not want to be identified.

But those fleeing the violence may not find refuge. Since Jan. 3, the Kenya government has closed its border with Somalia, citing a security risk from retreating Islamist fighters. An estimated 4,700 refugees remain trapped in the town of Dhobley, near the border, without access to food, medicine and shelter, according to a report issued today the U.N. Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs.

U.N. groups are working with the Kenyan government to allow refugees to enter Kenya safely or to deliver assistance to them across the border in Somalia.

U.S. Targets Al Qaeda In Somalia Air Strike (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

The U.S. has taken its covert war in East Africa public with an air strike this week on suspected al Qaeda leaders in Somalia.

The Pentagon confirmed yesterday that an AC-130 gunship attacked terror suspects in southern Somalia on Monday. The targets were thought to be al Qaeda operatives who carried out the 1998 bombings of two U.S. embassies in East Africa. The trio and Islamist allies have been working to make the ungoverned Somalia a terrorist safe haven.

The strike came amid a mass exodus from Mogadishu, the capital, of Islamist militants who had been routed by a combined force of the Ethiopian and Somali governments.

In a sign that more strikes could come from the U.S. or Ethiopian allies, the Navy has positioned the carrier USS Dwight D. Eisenhower off the coast and begun flying reconnaissance missions over Somalia.

It was the first overt U.S. military strike in Somalia since 1994, shortly after Army Rangers and Delta Force commandos battled Islamist militants and clans in a 1993 street battle immortalized in the book and movie "Black Hawk Down." The battle cost 18 American lives and prompted President Clinton to withdraw all U.S. forces.

Senior defense sources say the AC-130 was not the first action in and around Somalia since the September 11, 2001, attacks and the subsequent placement of a U.S. military task force in Djibouti a few miles from the Somalia border. The sources said the task force has periodically launched special operations missions against militants, but they declined to give specifics of where and when.

In addition, the U.S. has sent a specialized military intelligence unit into Somalia from time to time to try to locate and identify al Qaeda operatives.

The Washington Times learned of one mission in which the unit located an al Qaeda cell in Somalia and passed the information on to Jordanian officials. "They took it from there," one defense source said. Jordanian King Abdullah II is one of America's strongest Arab allies in the war on terror.

DOJ_NMG_0114892

The U.S. has been hunting three key al Qaeda leaders on the Horn of Africa who carried out the 1998 bombing of two U.S. embassies. They are Abu Talha al-Sudani, Fazul Abdullah Mohammed and Saleh Ali Saleh Nabhan.

In testimony last summer, Jendayi E. Frazer, the State Department's assistant secretary for African affairs, told Congress the three suspects "pose an immediate threat to both Somalia and international interests in the Horn of Africa."

She said U.S. counterterrorism planning was "directly related to the presence of these foreign terrorists and individuals willing to offer them safe haven within Somalia." She promised "strong measures to deny terrorists safe haven in Somalia. We must deny them the ability to plan and operate."

The U.S. task force in Djibouti was one of the first overseas deployments in the war ordered by former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. One of its key tasks is to train the military of friendly governments, such as Ethiopia, in counterterrorism. Ethiopia, like other East African nations, maintains liaison officers at U.S. Central Command in Tampa, Fla.

"We have close ties to the Ethiopians," said a former Central Command officer.

A Pentagon spokesman confirmed Monday's attack, saying it was based on intelligence on the ground. But the source had no confirmation of who was killed. An intelligence official said the AC-130 volleys killed five to 10 persons.

At the White House, spokesman Tony Snow declined to discuss the specific strike, but reiterated America's right to go after al Qaeda globally.

"It is pretty clear that this administration continues to go after al Qaeda," he said. "We are interested in going after those who have perpetrated acts of violence against Americans, including bombings of embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, and we will continue to conduct whatever operations we can to go after that."

"We've made it clear that this is a global war on terror, and this is a reiteration of the fact that people who think that they're going to try to establish safe haven for al Qaeda anyplace need to realize that we're going to find them."

The Associated Press quoted Abdullahi Yusuf, head of Somalia's U.N.-supported Transitional Federal Government, as saying, the U.S. "has a right to bombard terrorist suspects who attacked its embassies in Kenya and Tanzania."

Former military officials said the two main operational al Qaeda figures who are regarded as key threats are Fazul Mohammed and a fourth operative, Aden Hashi Ayro.

"Ayro is fast outpacing Fazul as the major threat," said a former military official close to the region.

One of the former officials said the U.S. raid was a setback for covert regional efforts to broker a deal among moderate Somali Muslims and the U.N.-backed government.

"The action that took place as of late is none too subtle and counterproductive," the former official said. Initial indications are that "minor players were hit and none of the big fish were fried."

The administration has been low-key in discussing developments in Somalia, as the al Qaeda-linked Islamic Courts Union outfought government forces and captured the capital last year. But privately, it considers last month's rout of Islamists from Mogadishu as a victory in the war on terror.

US Takes Hunt For Al Qaeda To Somalia (CSM)

By Scott Baldauf And Mike Pflanz

The Christian Science Monitor, January 10, 2007

JOHANNESBURG, SOUTH AFRICA; AND NAIROBI, KENYA

On the heels of US air strikes Monday, US helicopter gunships strafed villages in Somalia Tuesday in an ongoing hunt for Al Qaeda operatives in the Horn of Africa.

US military officials say that Somalia's lawless state had become a safe haven for Al Qaeda activists, including possibly those responsible for the embassy bomb attacks in Nairobi and Dar-es-Salaam in 1998.

This week's attacks illustrate how much US military policy has changed since Sept. 11, 2001. As the US closes or downsizes massive cold war-era bases in Germany and South Korea, its presence is expanding in Uganda, Djibouti, Senegal, and São Tomé and Príncipe, African nations once seen as far beyond American interests. Today, African bases serve both as "jumping off" points for the war in Iraq and also as bulwarks against new threats in volatile regions of Africa.

At press time, the US military had not released the numbers nor the names of those killed in the attacks.

The sites attacked, close to the border with Kenya, were considered the last strongholds of Somalia's Union of Islamic Courts (UIC), which held sway over the country for the past six months until it was driven from power two weeks ago by an alliance between Somalia's transitional government and Ethiopia.

US helicopter gunships Tuesday carried out mopping-up operations, according to Somali officials, who added that "many" people had died in the attacks. Abdirahman Dinari, spokesman for Somalia's interim government said: "Most of them were Islamists." Unconfirmed reports from Somalia say civilians were among those killed, including a 4-year-old boy.

DOJ_NMG_0114893

At press time, a key question is whether the US, in its first overt military operation in Somalia since the infamous "BlackHawk Down" intervention in 1992 and '93, has managed to hit the prime targets - Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, Saleh Ali Saleh Nabhan, or Abu Taha al-Sudani.

The three men are believed to be behind the 1998 bombings of the US embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, when more than 250 people were killed by two coordinated truck blasts.

Mr. Sudani is listed on Washington terror watch lists as Al Qaeda's point man in East Africa. Mr. Mohammed, from the Comoros archipelago in the Indian Ocean, is suspected of orchestrating a 2002 suicide attack on an Israeli-owned Kenyan hotel.

The failed attempt to shoot down a tourist airliner as it took off from Mombasa airport on Kenya's coast in 2002, heading for Tel Aviv, also bears Mohammed's signature, intelligence sources have said.

"If the attacks have managed to kill or capture some of the top East Africa people in Al Qaeda then it vindicates the actions of the US and Ethiopia, and it shows the ICU has been deceiving everyone," says Matt Bryden, senior analyst with the International Crisis Group in Nairobi.

"But if they haven't, then it compounds what has in the past been a strategy of errors, and makes the US look like it's been sold a lemon by [Somalia's] transitional federal government."

The European Union issued a statement criticizing the attack. Ethiopia, which has begun unprecedented military coordination with US troops in recent months, has issued no statement about the US air attacks, but Ethiopian officials say that the US and Ethiopia have completely different agendas in Somalia.

"The Ethiopian mission was not to fight terrorism or Al Qaeda per se, it was to defend the territory of Ethiopia from the penetration of groups based in Somalia," says Mohammad Dirir, minister for tourism in the Ethiopian government. "We targeted the Islamic Courts, and the Americans have their agenda, the war on terrorism."

"In Somalia, because of the failed state, it became a safe haven for all sorts of terrorist groups, including Al Qaeda," says Mr. Dirir. "The lieutenant of Osama bin Laden, Mr. Ayman Zawahiri, made statements calling on Muslims to come fight in Somalia. There are some Arab countries who are not allowing terror activities on their own territory, but don't mind if it is exported to the Horn of Africa."

A European diplomat based in Nairobi, and who watches Somalia closely, says that "there is no doubt that people linked to Al Qaeda - not the high command - but sympathizers, were in Somalia, running training camps, recruiting fighters, arming those fighters."

Some of those fighters were recent arrivals from the wide Somali diaspora, it appears.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said in an interview with the French daily Le Monde published Monday that "Many international terrorists are dead in Somalia." He said passports from different countries have been collected. "The Kenyans are holding Eritrean and Canadian passport holders. We have injured people coming from Yemen, Pakistan, Sudan, the United Kingdom."

There was no immediate verification of Mr. Meles's claims, but if they are true, he and Washington have the vindication they need to justify their attacks inside Somalia, the European diplomat says.

"That was the crux of it all, that Somalia under the [Union of Islamic] Courts would bring in bad guys from all over the world and train them up into a mercenary force fighting for Islam," he says.

The US airstrikes were likely launched from the former French base, Camp Lemonier, in Djibouti. Starting with about 1,800 troops in 2002, Djibouti has become the main regional base of the US military's counterterrorism task force. It also serves as a major desert warfare training center, an intelligence gathering center, and logistics base for US military forces. Its position right next to Somalia puts American forces within easy striking distance at short notice.

In recent months, the US military has conducted joint exercises with Kenya, the African country that has borne the brunt of terrorist attacks, since the 1998 embassy bombings. US forces have also reportedly been involved in training Ethiopian forces in counterterrorism techniques, ahead of their recent operations against the Islamic Courts Union in Somalia.

The Pentagon is expected to announce soon the formation of a new Africa Command to focus on the troubled continent. Currently, responsibility for Africa is divided among three of the Pentagon's five regional "unified commands," each headed by a four-star general or admiral who reports to the president.

Observers in Africa say the United States' single-minded focus on terrorism in Africa could backfire.

"The potential for transnational terror-related activity emerging from Somalia underscores both the international risk posed by state collapse and the international community's failed and inconsistent response to that collapse," says Kurt Shillinger, a terrorism expert at the South African Institute for International Affairs in Johannesburg. "Establishing an African Command will only be effective if the primary policy thrust is support for internally driven governance-building processes."

Some observers are concerned that Islamic militants will melt away now, but will eventually form an insurgency as they have in Afghanistan and Iraq. The target will be not only Somalia, but Ethiopia.

DOJ_NMG_0114894

"Ethiopia is central to the ideology of the Islamists," says Medhane Tadesse, an Ethiopian historian in Addis Ababa and expert on the Islamist movement Al Ittihad.

"One of the issues that divide moderate Muslims from extremists is the position they take on whether Ethiopia should be Islamicized. The prophet Muhammad exempted Ethiopia from jihad, and now the extremists say that Muhammad was wrong.

"By making Ethiopia the enemy, they know they will attract Islamic NGOs (non-governmental organizations) from Saudi Arabia and Iran," Mr. Tadesse says.

U.S. Is Not Saying Who, Or What, Was Hit In Somalia Raid (WP)

By Karen Deyoung And Stephanie Mccrummen

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

Two days after the United States launched an airstrike against alleged al-Qaeda terrorists in southern Somalia, U.S. officials declined yesterday to provide details of who, or what, was hit.

In Mogadishu, the Somali capital, reports circulated that as many as 50 people, many of them civilians, were killed in the attack by a U.S. Air Force AC-130 gunship. U.S. officials said they are fairly certain that at least one targeted individual was hit; they said they had no information about civilian deaths in the strike the Kenyan border.

Several officials suggested that stories reaching Mogadishu of many deaths and continuing U.S. attacks had confused the airstrike with ongoing operations in the area by Ethiopia's military, including helicopters and fixed-wing aircraft. But it was impossible to confirm independently any of the widely differing accounts in Mogadishu or in Washington. The officials agreed to discuss the attack only on the condition of anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman confirmed yesterday that a single airstrike occurred on Sunday, targeting "what we believe to be principal al-Qaeda leadership." Officials said that no further information would be released until U.S. personnel could assess directly the results of the strike and identify any dead.

"Let me draw a parallel with a domestic crime scene," one official said. "Imagine that complicated by 100, and that gives you an idea of what we're having to deal with."

Direct U.S. access to the area, where fleeing Islamic fundamentalist forces are being pursued on the ground and from the air by the Ethiopians, is viewed as problematic but necessary.

A principal target of the airstrike was Abu Talha al-Sudani, a Sudanese who U.S. officials have said is a longtime associate of Osama bin Laden and a key figure in an East African al-Qaeda cell based in Somalia.

Officials cautioned against reports that Fazul Abdullah Mohammed and Saleh Ali Saleh Nabhan, two other al-Qaeda operatives said to be responsible for the 1998 U.S. Embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania, may have been killed in the attack.

Also on the U.S. and Ethiopian target list, officials said, are Somali fundamentalist leader Sheikh Hassan Dahir Aweys, the former head of a militant group accused of links to al-Qaeda in the 1990s, and several other Somali Islamic leaders described as terrorists.

"I don't think anybody has packed up and gone home," another official said of U.S. operations in the area.

The aircraft carrier USS Dwight D. Eisenhower was moved into the Indian Ocean near the Somali coast to provide assistance, if needed, to the AC-130 on Sunday, and to use its aircraft to pinpoint the location of targets on land or sea. Four other U.S. naval vessels from the Bahrain-based Fifth Fleet are in the area.

In the chaos of Mogadishu, where invading Ethiopian troops routed the Islamic fundamentalists last month and installed an internationally backed transitional government, word of the U.S. attack provoked rage and anti-Americanism.

"I am angry," biology teacher Ahmed Weli Mohamed, 37, said in a telephone interview. "I am very, very angry. Even if there are terrorists, there are maybe two or three people, but hundreds are killed. . . . Americans don't respect us as human."

The news made shop owner and retired Somali soldier Hussein Farah Guley, 56, recall the early 1990s, when U.S. troops were part of a U.N. force that monitored a cease-fire in the country. Among the many foreigners killed by warring Somali clans during that period were 18 U.S. Army Rangers and Delta Force soldiers, who were attacked in Mogadishu after a Black Hawk helicopter was shot down in 1993.

"The Somalis, they will get angry," Guley said, "and if they see anyone from the outside, they will kill them."

Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi's transitional government, which U.S. officials said gave permission for the airstrike, is perceived by many Somalis as having interrupted a months-long period of unusual calm. The government is also seen as being too closely aligned with its leadership's clan and with outsiders, particularly Ethiopia and the United States. Although many rejected the stern religious laws imposed by the Islamic fundamentalists, who came to power last summer after driving out U.S.-funded warlords, they appreciated a new semblance of order.

DOJ_NMG_0114895

Somalis have already begun to express anger toward Ethiopian troops. Last night, a former police building in the capital, now occupied by the Ethiopians, was hit by a rocket-propelled grenade fired from a speeding car. One Ethiopian and one Somali soldier were killed, and three civilians were injured.

The United States is leading an effort to deploy an African peacekeeping force to replace the Ethiopians, and it is pressing Gedi's government to open talks with Islamic leaders who are seen as moderates. No progress was reported on either front yesterday. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said that a possible U.N. force is also being "actively discussed."

Staff researcher Julie Tate in Washington and special correspondent Mohamed Ibrahim in Mogadishu contributed to this report. McCrummen reported from Nairobi.

U.S. Push In Somalia Targets Al Qaeda (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Administration officials described military actions in Somalia as part of an intensifying campaign to root out al Qaeda leaders allegedly operating in the country. But Pentagon involvement risks stoking greater instability in a region already racked by strife, analysts said.

American defense officials yesterday said Sunday's air strike by a U.S. AC-130 gunship was driven by "credible intelligence" that al Qaeda leaders were using Somalia's lawless south as a base to plan regional attacks. The U.S. has also positioned naval ships, including the U.S.S. Dwight D. Eisenhower, off Somalia's coast, in an effort to block any Islamist militants trying to flee the country.

These deployments mark the U.S. military's first action in Somalia in more than a decade and come ahead of a speech by President Bush detailing his latest plans for Iraq, where U.S. involvement has fueled sectarian strife and is charged with boosting al Qaeda's ranks.

In 1993, clan-based militias in Somalia killed 18 U.S. soldiers working on a peacekeeping mission in the capital Mogadishu. The American deaths prompted the Clinton administration to withdraw its troops. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the weekend attack was coordinated with West African leaders who don't "want to see any al Qaeda or terrorist operatives be able to escape Somalia and try to set up camp either in their country or a neighboring country."

Somalia has been without a functioning central government since the early 1990s. The Central Intelligence Agency has long believed that al Qaeda operatives, including those behind the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Ethiopia, are hiding there. Other al Qaeda leaders thought to be sheltering in Somalia include a Sudanese munitions expert. U.S. officials also worry that the country, with its porous borders, could serve as a regional base for Islamic militants.

The international community has been seeking to prevent more civil strife from engulfing Somalia, a majority Muslim nation of just over eight million people. Last month, Ethiopian troops invaded Somalia and drove from Mogadishu the Somali Islamic Courts Council, an Islamist political movement.

Many regional analysts warn that U.S. military actions could further stoke strife in Somalia. The SICC troops which fled Mogadishu are largely massing in Somalia's South and are expected to launch a guerrilla war against the interim Somali government and its foreign backers.

The Associated Press, citing Somali officials and village chiefs, said dozens of civilians were killed in Sunday's U.S. military strike.

An interim authority led by tribal chiefs is running the country, but few Africa experts believe it has much authority outside Mogadishu. U.S. military actions could impede efforts to establish a longstanding transitional government, as many moderate Somali leaders would be reluctant to cooperate with a new government viewed as too closely aligned to the White House, the experts said.

Some critics of the U.S. action said there is scant evidence that the SICC is linked to al Qaeda. "The administration has failed to make a public case on how al Qaeda is present and influencing" the SICC, said David Smock, an analyst at the U.S. Institute of Peace, a Washington-based think tank. He said three al Qaeda leaders might be based in Somalia, but there's "no compelling evidence that there are more."

US Confirms Air Strikes In Somalia Conflict (FT)

By Andrew England

Financial Times, January 10, 2007

US officials on Tuesday confirmed it launched weekend air strikes against alleged al-Qaeda leaders in Somalia, marking Washington's first direct engagement in the Horn of Africa conflict.

DOJ_NMG_0114896

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said the target of a strike by an AC130 aircraft was “the principal al-Qaeda leadership in the region”. The attacks occurred in the country’s south, where Ethiopian and Somali government troops are battling retreating Islamist militants.

The attack marked the first overt US military intervention in Somalia since a disastrous peacekeeping mission that ended in 1994. Mr Whitman said the strikes were based on “credible intelligence” but would not comment on their success.

Somali officials said Monday’s raids took place around an area known as Ras Kamboni and targeted “fundamentalists” but there were local reports that civilians as well as Islamic fighters were killed.

There were also reports from within Somalia that US helicopters launched fresh attacks on Tuesday, but Abdirahman Dinari, a Somali government spokesman, said these could not be confirmed. Fighting was continuing in the remote area between an estimated 600 Islamists and Ethiopian and Somali government forces, he told the Financial Times.

US officials believe high-level al-Qaeda operatives have fled the capital Mogadishu since Ethiopia poured thousands of troops into its neighbour in a bid to crush Islamist forces and install a United Nations-backed transitional government.

The European Commission on Tuesday criticised the US strike, saying it could set back efforts to reach a deal between Somalia’s provisional government and moderate Islamists.

“We need a political process which is inclusive in order to bring about stability,” said a spokesman for Louis Michel, EU development Commissioner. “Any incident of this kind is not helpful in the long term.”

Both Addis Ababa and Washington accuse the Islamic Courts Union, which last year took over a large swathe of southern Somalia.

Washington has also given tacit support to the invasion by Ethiopia, a regional US ally. The Islamists have repeatedly denied links to al-Qaeda.

Washington alleges that three suspects believed to be involved in the 1998 US embassy bombings in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam, as well as a 2002 attack on a hotel in Kenya, were hiding in Somalia. They include Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, a Comorian who is on the FBI’s most wanted terrorist list. The other two are a Kenyan and a Sudanese national.

Earlier this year, Washington backed a coalition of warlords in Mogadishu in its bid to capture the suspects and is alleged to have paid tens of thousands of dollars to the faction leaders later driven out by the Islamists.

The US Central Command said on Tuesday it had deployed an aircraft carrier off the Somali coast. Other US ships have been patrolling Somalia’s coastline, Africa’s longest, to prevent Islamists fleeing by sea.

Asked if the US had informed the Somali government about the air assault, Mr Dinari said: “We have good communications and we are collaborating with each other.”

U.S. Raid In Somalia Concerns U.N. Chief (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, January 10, 2007

U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon is concerned that U.S. bombing in southern Somalia could escalate hostilities and harm civilians who are reported to have been killed in the airstrikes, a spokeswoman said Tuesday.

"Notwithstanding the motives for this reported military action, the secretary-general is concerned about the new dimension this kind of action could introduce to the conflict and the possible escalation of hostilities that may result," spokeswoman Michele Montas said.

"He is also concerned about the impact this would have on the civilian population in southern Somalia and regrets the reported loss of civilian lives," she said.

Ban said last week the rout of the Islamic movement by Ethiopian troops and Somali forces supporting the country's U.N.-backed transitional government offered "a new opportunity" for the government to establish full authority throughout the country.

He urged the government to seek political reconciliation, called for the speedy deployment of African peacekeepers, and welcomed Ethiopia's statement it intends to withdraw its forces "expeditiously."

Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, said he told Ban on Monday that a U.N. peacekeeping force may be needed to guarantee security and stability in Somalia, which has not had a functioning government for 15 years.

Solana said Ugandan forces may be the first deployed to replace Ethiopian troops, but he said the African Union is already carrying a "very heavy" peacekeeping burden in Sudan, and the U.N. may have to step in and take over the next phase.

The EU foreign policy chief said he "put that on the table" when he met Ban on Monday and did not expect an answer because the idea would have to be analyzed by U.N. peacekeeping officials.

Somalia has not had an effective central government since clan-based warlords toppled dictator Mohamed Siad Barre in 1991 and then turned on each other, sinking the Horn of Africa nation of 7 million people into chaos. The current government was established in 2004.

On Dec. 6, the U.N. Security Council authorized an African force to protect the transitional government against the Union of Islamic Courts, which had taken control of the capital and most of southern Somalia. The council also authorized the force to train Somali government troops, and lifted a U.N. arms embargo for the African troops.

Asked whether the U.S. bombing violated the arms embargo, Montas said the council would be discussing Somalia on Wednesday.

The U.N. is trying to gather more information about the situation, she said.

Montas said U.N. humanitarian operations in the area where the bombs were being dropped were suspended and international staff were evacuated before Christmas when the recent fighting started.

No Exit In Somalia (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

It may be some time before we learn whether Sunday's air strikes by an AC-130 gunship in southern Somalia succeeded in killing the terrorists who were the intended targets -- particularly Abu Taha al-Sudani, reportedly an al Qaeda explosives expert, and Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, mastermind of the 1998 East Africa embassy bombings. But the attacks -- along with the deployment of a carrier battle group off the African coast -- are welcome evidence that the U.S. has learned the lessons of May 19, 1996.

That's the date Osama bin Laden and his associates left Sudan for Afghanistan on a chartered plane. The Clinton Administration was aware that Sudan intended to expel bin Laden, and the U.S. might have easily tracked and destroyed the flight en route. The consequences of its failure to do so is only too well known, and the Bush Administration is right to be determined not to let terrorists get away again, whether by land, air or sea.

The strikes in Somalia are also a reminder that in the war on terror there is no "exit strategy" short of victory. The last U.S. military venture in Somalia is broadly remembered as a military and political fiasco, particularly after the notorious "Black Hawk Down" battle in which 18 U.S. servicemen were killed, in part for want of adequate armor.

Yet America's sheepish withdrawal from the country had consequences. Bin Laden viewed it as yet another sign that America can't take casualties and will retreat when hit hard. Somalia descended into anarchy and became a haven for al Qaeda operatives and affiliated terrorist groups. Last June, the capital of Mogadishu fell into their grip, and the rest of the country surely would have fallen as well had it not been for the timely military intervention of neighboring Ethiopia.

That intervention has been criticized by some for running the risk of fueling regional conflict rather than checking it. Thus a British newspaper report from December frets that Ethiopia's invasion offers "Islamic jihadists the chance to establish a new front in Africa after Iraq and Afghanistan, and to wage another proxy war between East and West." Maybe.

Then again, a Taliban-style regime on the horn of Africa, capable of harboring, training, financing and equipping terrorists was an intolerable threat to global security. By contrast, the main risk now is that some Islamists will escape to fight another day, an excellent reason for the U.S. to take action when they are dispersed and on the run. Our forces were able to hit the terrorists this week because Ethiopia's offensive had pushed them out of their safe houses and into the open. It is a useful reminder to other terrorists that the U.S. can hit them anywhere in the world.

None of this requires the U.S. to deploy militarily to Somalia. Our security interests in the region are already well-served by our military deployment in neighboring Djibouti, from where we can monitor the region and, when necessary, rapidly deploy force.

What the U.S. can do for Somalia is offer meaningful logistical, military and humanitarian assistance to the Transitional Federal Government, which the CIA previously eschewed in favor of financing local warlords. TFG President Abdullahi Yusuf may not be a model democrat, but he showed his stripes well enough when he said of Sunday's air strikes that the U.S. "has a right to bombard terrorist suspects who attacked its embassies in Kenya and Tanzania." If only we received the same level of candid cooperation from Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf.

The story of Somalia is far from over, and America's involvement in the area will not soon end. But U.S. interests are well-served by putting terrorists on the run, wherever they may be. We will be better served still if we take the lesson that the only exit for us in the war against terrorists -- whether in Somalia, Afghanistan and especially Iraq -- is to make sure there is no exit for them.

Defense Dept. Settles Suit On Database For Recruiting (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

DOJ_NMG_0114898

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

The Defense Department yesterday announced changes in how it will treat information in an enormous military recruiting database.

The changes are part of the settlement of a lawsuit brought by the New York Civil Liberties Union on behalf of six New York City high school students that challenged the legality of the way information in the database was collected and used.

The database, the Joint Advertising, Market Research and Studies Program, is, according to court papers, probably the largest repository of information concerning 16-to-25-year-olds. It includes names, ages, sex, races, addresses, phone and Social Security numbers, e-mail addresses, schools attended, fields of study and grades. The information is collected or bought from high schools, motor vehicle departments and commercial vendors, and is used to identify and contact military recruiting prospects.

The Defense Department agreed to use the database only for recruiting, giving up the possibility of sharing it with law enforcement and intelligence agencies. It agreed to destroy information on individuals after three years rather than five years or longer.

The department also agreed to collect Social Security numbers only from the Selective Service System.

Perhaps most significantly, it established a way for people to opt out of the database. The civil liberties group has posted a form letter on its Web site to that end, along with form letters meant to be sent to newspapers applauding the settlement and chastising the Defense Department.

Donna Lieberman, the executive director of the civil liberties group, said that the settlement was a positive step, but that more remained to be done.

"Is it going to stop overaggressive recruiting?" Ms. Lieberman asked. "Of course not. Is it going to stop recruiting that specifically targets people of color? No."

In a statement, the group said it was frustrated that the department refused to stop collecting information about students' race and ethnicity. It said the military was engaged in efforts "to target racial and ethnic minorities, especially from African-American and Latino communities, for aggressive recruitment campaigns."

Maj. Stewart Upton, a Defense Department spokesman, defended the recruiting efforts. "In continuing to ensure that the military is representative of the American populace," Major Upton said, "we must communicate with all audiences to ensure that they are aware of the opportunity to serve in today's military."

Eleni Angelos Healey, a senior at Trinity School in Manhattan and one of the plaintiffs in the suit, said she had been harassed by letters and e-mail from military recruiters. Her repeated efforts to stop them had failed, she said.

"I'm really glad," Ms. Healey said, "that there's going to be a much easier way for kids to get their names off these lists as soon as possible."

Gov't Changes Student-recruit Practices (AP)

By Larry Neumeister,

AP, January 10, 2007

The Department of Defense has agreed to change the database it uses for military recruitment efforts to better protect the privacy of millions of high school students nationwide, a civil liberties group announced Tuesday.

In settling a lawsuit brought last year by the New York Civil Liberties Union on behalf of six high schoolers, the government agreed it will no longer disseminate student information to law enforcement, intelligence and other agencies and will stop collecting student Social Security numbers, the group said in a statement.

It said it will also limit to three years the time it retains student information and will clarify procedures by which students can block the military from entering information about them in its database.

Last year's lawsuit claimed the department was flouting a 1982 military recruitment law that specifies that it refrain from collecting information on students under 17, that it store the information for no more than three years and that the information be kept private, the lawsuit said.

The current database includes information on 16-year-olds, is storing the information for five years and is being shared with law enforcement and other agencies, the lawsuit said.

Military officials have said they have about 30 million names in the database. The Pentagon said in 2005 the list includes high school students ages 16-18 and college students, and includes such information as the students' Social Security numbers, gender and race.

The government published the changes in the Federal Register on Tuesday before they were announced by the NYCLU.

Yusill Scribner, a spokeswoman for government lawyers who worked on the case, said the government had no comment.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Prosecutors Claim Conrad Black Committed Insider Trading (FINDLAW/AP)

By Ashley M. Heher, Ap Business Writer

AP, January 10, 2007

(AP) - CHICAGO-Less than two months before the start of a fraud and racketeering trial, federal prosecutors leveled new allegations against former newspaper tycoon Conrad Black, saying he engaged in insider trading and illegally posted information about his former company on a financial message board.

A lengthy filing this week in U.S. District Court in Chicago spells out a dozen alleged misdeeds by the former Hollinger International Inc. chairman and CEO, who's accused of plundering millions of dollars from the company's coffers.

Black was forced from the helm of the company and is scheduled to go to trial March 1.

The newspaper empire, which once included The Daily Telegraph of London, The Jerusalem Post and a major Canadian newspaper group, since has been largely dismantled. The Chicago Sun-Times is the last remaining major property of the company, now called the Sun-Times Media Group Inc.

Prosecutors on Monday asked U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve to include the newest allegations as evidence in the ongoing case against Black.

"Black did not make a distinction between his money and that belonging to a public company," prosecutors wrote. "It is this mind-set that contributed to his fleecing of International."

Black is charged with misusing company money to bankroll his lavish lifestyle and cheating on his taxes. He has pleaded not guilty.

Edward Greenspan, Black's attorney, said the federal allegations include "misstatements."

"We're preparing our response now and we will file and we will object to what the prosecutor has put forward," he said. "There are misstatements in the material they have filed."

Federal authorities say Black in 1998 urged a company vice president to respond to a post on a Yahoo message board about Hollinger's seemingly static stock price.

When the executive, Paul Healy, explained responding would violate federal guidelines from the Securities and Exchange Commission, Black posted a response anonymously, prosecutors said in the filing Monday.

But not before chastising Healy for his hesitation.

"Don't be so strait-laced," Black wrote to Healy. "... Get our story out."

Authorities said Black, along with other officials, used insider trading to boost Hollinger stock in 1998, arranging for the Canadian company Brascan to buy Hollinger shares at the same time short-sellers were unloading their stock. At the time, Black was a director at Brascan, now called Brookfield Asset Management.

"While Brascan used its own funds to purchase the shares, Black guaranteed their downside and interest rate, and also guaranteed their profit," prosecutors wrote, saying Black and other executives received cash from the deal.

Katherine Vyse, a spokeswoman for Toronto-based Brookfield, said the company was reviewing the matter and could not comment.

Among the other allegations, prosecutors say Black:

- deliberately withheld documents from prosecutors.

DOJ_NMG_0114900

- spent nearly $9 million (â,¬6.9 million) of Hollinger's money to purchase memorabilia from Franklin Delano Roosevelt, without seeking prior approval from the company's board. The memorabilia, which Black used to pen a 2003 biography of the former president, was stored and displayed at Black's home.

- abused Hollinger's charitable donations, attributing the company's donations to him and his family.

- used company money to pay for handbags, jogging attire, opera tickets and other personal items for himself and his wife.

Meanwhile, Ravelston Corp. Ltd., the Canadian company Black used to control Hollinger International, said it intends to cooperate with U.S. officials and wants to agree to a $7 million (â,¬5.4 million) fine as part of a deal with prosecutors in Chicago.

The deal still must be approved by a judge in Ontario. Greenspan said Tuesday he plans to object to the guilty agreement.

Feds Request More Time (TOPCJ)

By Robert Boczkiewicz, The Capital-Journal

Topeka (KS) Capital-Journal, January 10, 2007

Wittig, Lake prosecutors want extra month to decide if they'll ask judges for rehearing

DENVER — Federal prosecutors aren't tipping their hand, but Tuesday they said they may ask an appeals court to reconsider its decision that overturned all convictions of David Wittig and Douglas Lake in the Westar Energy looting case.

Prosecutor Richard Hathaway told the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in a new filing that more time is needed to decide whether to ask the court's full contingent of judges to rehear the case that was decided Friday by a three-judge panel.

Hathaway, of Topeka, asked the Denver-based court to give prosecutors until Feb. 19 to decide whether to ask for a rehearing. Without an extension, the deadline for prosecutors to decide is Jan. 19.

Wittig, Westar's former chairman, president and chief executive officer, and Lake, Westar's former executive vice president, were convicted in 2005 of wire fraud, money laundering, circumvention of internal controls and conspiracy.

The panel ruled there was insufficient evidence to convict Wittig and Lake of wire fraud. Because of that, and because the alleged crimes were so intertwined, their convictions for money laundering also were overturned.

The panel overturned the convictions for circumvention of internal controls, ruling that the trial judge, Julie Robinson, of the U.S. District Court in Topeka, seriously erred by failing to properly instruct jurors on what evidence was needed to convict on those charges.

The convictions for the fourth and final crime of which Lake and Wittig were charged, conspiracy, was overturned because the appellate judges concluded the conspiracy convictions were dependent on the evidence and the judge's instructions to jurors regarding the other crimes.

The court's full contingent of judges is about a dozen. The court normally operates in three-judge panels to issue its decisions.

The judges rarely grant rehearings, especially when decisions of a panel were unanimous, as they were Friday.

Washburn University law professor Michael Kaye, who has tracked the case since it started, said Friday it isn't likely that prosecutors will appeal Friday's decision to the U.S. Supreme Court because the ruling about evidence being insufficient was so "straightforward."

Typically, cases can't be appealed from a federal circuit court of appeals to the Supreme Court until an appeals court denies a request for rehearing.

Hathaway, in Tuesday's filing, wrote that attorneys at Justice Department headquarters in Washington, D.C., advised on Saturday "that additional time is required for the Office of Solicitor General to evaluate the case for a possible petition" for rehearing by the court's full contingent of judges. The solicitor general plays a key role in deciding whether prosecutors will appeal cases.

An attorney for Wittig, Gregory Coleman in Austin, Texas, said he doesn't oppose the court giving prosecutors more time to make up its mind. An attorney for Lake, Seth Waxman, in New York City, also said he doesn't oppose the request. It is common for prosecutors to make a request for more time.

Coleman said if they decide to ask for a rehearing, the judges could deny the request outright. But if the judges want to reflect on the request, they could ask attorneys for Wittig and Lake what their position is before deciding whether to rehear the case.

Home Depot Board Faces New Outcry (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114901

Now that the board has ousted Home Depot's chairman and chief executive, Robert L. Nardelli, shareholders are expecting big changes at the home improvement retailing giant.

But the biggest hammer could fall on the board itself, warn some corporate governance advocates.

When Home Depot announced the departure of Mr. Nardelli last week, it also said that three directors — including one who has been on the board for nearly three decades — would remain on the board even though they were due to retire this spring after having reached the mandatory retirement age of 72.

Corporate governance watchdogs say the move illustrates that Home Depot's board, whose members have been criticized for their close ties to one another and to Mr. Nardelli's former employer, General Electric, is doing a poor job of succession planning for itself.

Furthermore, these critics argue that the three directors, Milledge A. Hart III, John L. Clendenin, and Claudio X. Gonzalez, played crucial roles in approving Mr. Nardelli's excessive pay package that ultimately led to his ouster.

"We were told the G.E. crony group that brought in Nardelli and paid him highly were going to start to move off of the board as they hit retirement age," said Richard Ferlauto, director of pension and benefit policy at the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees. "All last fall we were told that this board was going to evolve significantly because of the mandatory retirements. Now that's not happening."

The outcry over Mr. Nardelli's compensation, including his $210 million exit package, could result in another aggressive campaign to withhold votes from Home Depot's directors at the company's annual shareholder meeting this spring.

Or, if a competing slate of directors is put up against the incumbents, as one shareholder activist, Ralph V. Whitworth, has threatened to do, shareholders could throw their support to them if they believe they are qualified for the job, said Mr. Ferlauto.

The threat of a proxy fight could cause Home Depot's board to cut a deal with Mr. Whitworth, and that could result in the company shedding its construction supply business, which shareholders have been unhappy with, or adding Mr. Whitworth's nominees to the board.

Brad Shaw, a spokesman for Home Depot, played down the prospects of a proxy battle, saying, "Home Depot's board has acted in the best interests of shareholders and is confident shareholders recognize this."

In a statement, Home Depot's board said it was necessary for the three directors to remain on the board for one more year in order to provide Mr. Nardelli's successor, Frank Blake, with their expertise and deep knowledge of the company. It added that Kenneth G. Langone, Home Depot's co-founder and the lead director, still intends to retire from the board as scheduled in May 2008, when he will be 72.

The company also said it hired an executive search firm last year to help identify candidates to replace the retiring board members. Home Depot did name one new director to its board in mid-November, Helen Johnson-Leipold, the chairwoman and chief executive of sports products company Johnson Outdoors.

Yet, the board should have already named several other replacements for its retiring directors by now, say some critics, who contend that the directors are still firmly on the hot seat as proxy season approaches.

The person driving the changes could be Mr. Whitworth, who runs Relational Investors, a fund that owns about $1 billion worth of Home Depot stock. In December Mr. Whitworth announced plans to form a shareholders' committee to examine the company's strategy and to nominate two individuals, including himself, to the board.

Last week, despite Mr. Nardelli's departure, Mr. Whitworth signaled that his stance and intentions had not changed. He declined yesterday to comment for this article.

If Relational decides to put up a slate of competing directors, Home Depot shareholders might be willing to support those candidates because of Mr. Nardelli's $210 million payout package, much of which was put in place by the board in his original 2000 employment contract, as well as the waiver of the mandatory retirement age for the three directors.

"Relational could take a stance that Home Depot is, in fact, entrenching the status quo by not replacing these directors, and that gives them another opportunity to generate press over the subject and to try to manage an upcoming proxy vote," said Andrew D. Shiftan, a managing director at investment bank Morgan Joseph & Company.

Mr. Shiftan noted that in the 10 or so campaigns that Relational has waged against companies since 1997, it has often agreed to concessions with the company in exchange for board seats and other changes.

A spokesman for Home Depot declined to comment on Relational, pointing to a statement made by the company late last year that said it planned to arrange a meeting with Relational shortly after the first of the year to discuss its concerns.

Shareholders have long been frustrated with Home Depot's stock price, which slumped under Mr. Nardelli. Last Wednesday, the stock surged on news of his resignation, but has since fallen 4 percent.

Last year, shareholders aimed a clear sign of their frustration at Home Depot's board. Of the shareholders who voted, 30 percent or more withheld their votes for 10 of the 11 directors, including Mr. Hart, Mr. Clendenin and Mr. Gonzalez.

DOJ_NMG_0114902

"People who withheld votes from the directors last year remember who was there when the compensation contract was approved," said James P. Melican, chairman of Proxy Governance, a firm that advises large shareholders on corporate governance issues.

For instance, one of the directors whose retirement was waived was Mr. Clendenin, the retired president and chief executive of BellSouth. Mr. Clendenin joined Home Depot's board in 1996 and had a close relationship with a co-founder, Bernard Marcus, and their paths often crossed at social and business functions in Atlanta, according to a person close to the board.

Mr. Clendenin was chairman of the compensation committee that signed Mr. Nardelli's employment contract in December 2000. One of the lawyers sitting on the other side of the table helping Mr. Nardelli negotiate the contract was Frank L. Fernandez. Mr. Fernandez was later named Home Depot's general counsel. Mr. Fernandez declined to comment for this article.

It was at Electronic Data Systems, where Mr. Hart was president, that he and Mr. Langone became familiar with one another. As an investment banker, Mr. Langone helped take the company public in 1968 and was a large E.D.S. shareholder for years.

When Mr. Langone was approaching individuals to provide seed money for Home Depot in its early days, Mr. Hart became an early investor in the company and got a board seat. (Another former E.D.S. executive, Richard H. Brown, later became a Home Depot director as well. Mr. Brown left the board before last year's annual meeting.)

Under stock exchange guidelines, Mr. Hart is not considered an independent director as Home Depot conducts business with an insulation company owned by Mr. Hart.

The third director who was set to retire this spring was Mr. Gonzalez, the longtime chairman and chief executive of Kimberly-Clark de México, a unit of Kimberly-Clark. Mr. Gonzalez joined Home Depot's board in 2001 and, as a director on G.E.'s board, he was very familiar with both Mr. Nardelli and Mr. Langone, who was also a G.E. director.

Mr. Gonzalez, who received the highest number of withheld votes last year at 36 percent of those cast, was a member of the compensation committee last year when it changed its long-term incentive plan for executives to include the effects of share buybacks when measuring earnings per share for compensation package. As Home Depot has been buying back its shares in recent years, such a change would have the effect of boosting the chief's pay.

Moves like that have some shareholder activists declaring that the departure of Mr. Nardelli simply is not enough to right all that is wrong with Home Depot.

"Home Depot's nomination committee and compensation committee needs to be reformed," said Mr. Ferlauto. "The next task is to rebuild the board in a way that creates trust with shareholders and much greater transparency to the decision-making process of the board."

In Cash Crunch, Mills May Seek Bankruptcy Filing (WP)

By Dana Hedgpeth And David S. Hilzenrath

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

Mills Corp., the struggling shopping mall developer, said yesterday that possible misconduct by management contributed to widespread accounting errors, and the company warned that it may be forced to seek bankruptcy protection if it cannot reach agreement with its lenders.

Mills, of Chevy Chase, said in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission that the errors total $347 million to $352 million. The document said it remains unknown what effect the accounting corrections would have on the company's financial statements for 2005 and earlier. A company spokesman declined to elaborate yesterday.

Mills has not released an earnings report since the third quarter of 2005, and last year, its chief executive Laurence C. Siegel retired. It plans to restate its financial results from 2001 to 2004 and for the first three quarters of 2005. The company is under investigation by the SEC, which declined to comment on the case.

Mills issued a statement late yesterday, saying it has "taken several important remedial steps" in the past year that include "a near-complete change of executive management personnel."

Mills stock closed yesterday at $14.82 per share, down $4.12, or 21.8 percent.

Mills owns about 40 large-scale shopping malls, including the discount retail complexes of Potomac Mills in Virginia and Arundel Mills in Maryland. Siegel was credited with pushing the concept of regional mega-malls in the 1990s as places that would be shopping destinations. He eventually embarked on what was to be Mills' most ambitious undertaking, a giant shopping project called Xanadu in northern New Jersey, which was to have an indoor ski slope and a Ferris wheel.

The company, however, has since given up its lead role in the Xanadu project and in its filing yesterday said the company's rapid growth contributed to its accounting errors.

DOJ_NMG_0114903

Mills's "overall culture and 'tone at the top' were heavily focused on meeting external and internal financial expectations," Mills said in a report summarizing the results of a long-running investigation by the audit committee of its board of directors. The report found that "possible misconduct" played a role in its accounting troubles, including at least one instance in which management overrode a decision by the company's accounting department.

The report did not name the people involved in the suspected misconduct. The company said, however, that the audit committee found no reason to question the integrity and conduct of current executives.

Some of the larger accounting mistakes appear to have been unintentional, resulting from incompetence or poor internal controls, the report said. But the evidence showed that a "relatively small" number of errors were not reached "in good faith," the report said.

In one episode, Mills booked a sale as having occurred in April 2002, though the terms of the sale were not negotiated until late 2002 and the deal was not completed until the spring of 2003, the report said. Correcting that problem would add $10.8 million of expenses for 2002.

In another episode, early in 2004, management overrode a decision by the corporate accounting department to put more than $500,000 in reserve. Putting money in reserve can decrease profit.

The report said Mills treated termination payments for two former employees as consulting fees, even though the employees did not perform any consulting services for Mills and were not expected to do so. The payments were improperly capitalized on the financial statements, the report said.

With regard to those problems, the company's audit committee "concluded that the weight of the evidence was contrary to the witnesses' assertions that the accounting judgments at issue were reasonable and reached in good faith," the report said.

Among the items Mills appears to have misstated unintentionally was the compensation of its former chief executive, the report said. The company understated Siegel's long-term incentive pay expense by $1.5 million in 2004 and overstated it by $1.9 million in the first three quarters of 2005. The company underreported other aspects of Siegel's compensation by $132,228 in 2002 and by $28,031 in 2004, the report said.

When Siegel retired as chief executive in October, the company reported that he was being called on to repay "any non-business related perquisites" he may have received, including $362,156 for "personal use of the Company-chartered aircraft and personal flights erroneously paid by the Company."

The audit committee hired the law firm of Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher to assist with the investigation, and the law firm enlisted forensic accountants. The investigation involved a review of more than 4 million pages of documents and 240 interviews with 100 people.

In its SEC filing, Mills said it had adequate cash to operate through March 31 but then must reach a new agreement with its lenders. If those talks fail, Mills "could be forced to seek protection" under the U.S. bankruptcy code, and security holders could "lose their entire investment," the filing said.

The company has spent the past few months selling overseas operations and taking other steps to reduce its debt. At its annual meeting in December, Mills' new chief executive, Mark S. Ordan, assured shareholders that no unexpected "financial disasters" were afoot, telling them "you should not read any of my remarks to say that there is some smoking gun out there that we are hiding."

Should Steve Jobs Go To Jail? (WSJ)

By RICHARD MARMARO And RYAN WEINSTEIN

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

Steve Jobs recently became the latest chief executive thrown into the options-timing imbroglio. Apple disclosed that its CEO was "aware or recommended" favorable grant dates on option grants to employees, but that he did not "receive or benefit" from any of the grants or "appreciate the accounting implications." Apple's board concluded that Mr. Jobs had done nothing wrong, and emphasized its "complete confidence" in its CEO. The markets followed suit. Rather than fret, investors actually bid up Apple's stock by more than $5 per share.

Given the stock bump, the board's exoneration and Mr. Jobs's lack of accounting experience, could this possibly be a case of criminal securities fraud? Believe it or not, in the minds of some prosecutors applying a far-reaching and unproven theory of fraud, it is. Just last summer, the government indicted Gregory Reyes, the former CEO of Brocade Communications, despite the fact that Mr. Reyes, like Mr. Jobs, was a non-accountant who didn't personally benefit one cent from the option grants at issue.

The problem with the government's theory is that it conflates books-and-records violations with criminal securities fraud. In the process, the government untethers securities fraud from the legal elements that help safeguard executives from conviction for inadvertent accounting violations resulting in little or no harm to companies or to investors.

DOJ_NMG_0114904

Fundamental to American law is the notion that a defendant cannot be punished absent intent to commit a crime. Yet prosecutors are alleging that non-accountants violated an accounting rule -- known as APB 25 -- so opaque even auditors didn't understand it. Many in Silicon Valley are still scratching their heads: How can someone intentionally violate a rule that they and most others don't even comprehend?

Prosecutors and regulators have alleged just that. Not surprisingly, the first and only federal court confronting the issue so far found that APB 25 was so obscure that its violation could not demonstrate evidence of fraudulent intent as a matter of law.

Indeed, much of what is pejoratively called "backdating" was actually undertaken in good faith. In many instances during the Internet boom, Silicon Valley high-tech companies were hiring so many new employees and awarding so many options grants that paperwork errors led to changed grant dates. Yet these occasions have been lumped into the so-called "backdating" pool, and portrayed as a harbinger of the next Enron.

Unlike in the typical securities fraud cases -- where revenues are overstated or cash expenses hidden, and when discovered, the company's stock craters -- prosecutors of backdating cases face an enormous challenge in proving that stock-based compensation expense actually cost investors anything. Stock-based compensation is a non-cash expenditure, meaning the expense does not reflect cash flowing into or out of the company's treasury. This fact is often overlooked by those who assume that backdated option grants are the same as cash hand-outs.

In the current regulatory environment, these economic realities too often get lost when addressing past errors in options accounting. Accurate financial reporting is critical to a company's health. But at some point the quest to restate an ideal financial statement risks exalting form over substance, with the company's true financial health becoming virtually irrelevant while an approved income statement is made paramount.

The most basic element of fraud is deception or deceit, and a typical example is when a company misstates revenues or cash expenses. Yet there is no proof of deceit or concealment in alleged backdating cases. In fact, it is remarkable how much companies have disclosed about their option grants. Company 10-Ks, Form 4s, proxy statement and other filings were replete with information about options. Indeed, despite media accounts that suggest that executives were secretly lining their pockets, the economic value of options granted, whether to executives or to the rank-and-file, was no secret at all.

If the alleged backdating did not involve self-dealing or kickbacks, and options expenses were immaterial to investors, how were investors harmed? If the harm was only "mak[ing] a hash of the financial statements," as SEC Chairman Christopher Cox has suggested, shouldn't backdating cases be charged as books-and-records violations rather than securities fraud? Despite the media clamor and various colorful analogies to lightning, lotteries and pick-pocketing, most options backdating cases are not fraud, but books-and-records errors.

It is understandable, in an era when public concern is growing over rising executive compensation, that attention should be turned to stock options. Individual companies may want to reconsider how and at what volume they grant options. Yet a thoughtful look at the elements of securities fraud may help observers distinguish between accounting issues and criminal acts.

Apple's Gore (WSJ)

By HOLMAN W. JENKINS, JR.

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

We can only wonder what Al Gore is making of his experience as the No. 1 defender of today's No. 1 backdating miscreant.

Mr. Gore, an Apple director, was a member of the special two-man committee that investigated and exonerated Steve Jobs in the backdating matter. By now, we presume he is well-versed in what backdating is and isn't. But how easily Mr. Gore -- the scourge of Big Pharma, etc. -- could have been the one braying about greed, CEO theft, the defrauding of shareholders.

Mr. Jobs's famed marketing magic was on display yesterday at the Macworld Expo in San Francisco. In another way, his case has performed a magical feat in prompting a few more voices to question whether backdating is really the crime of the century, or merely a business curiosity blown way out of proportion by poorly reasoned coverage.

Here and there, in the New Yorker, at the Fortune magazine Web site, in the bloggings of law Prof. Larry Ribstein and journalist John Carney, the intellectual fallacies that have permeated the coverage are gradually poked away. Asks Business Week: "Is the world ready to see one of its greatest innovators sacrificed at the altar of the good-governance gods -- especially when it's not clear how [Mr. Jobs] was enriched or his shareholders damaged?"

No such understanding was emoted for Brocade's Greg Reyes or Comverse's Kobi Alexander, CEOs indicted in backdating scandals much like Apple's. But this is still progress.

Much reporting has made it sound like backdating was the equivalent of executives taking erasers and white-out to their paychecks to add a couple of zeroes -- and public understanding still suffers from this bum steer. But all that backdating comes down to is a nonmaterial accounting irregularity (yes, readers, accounting rules should be obeyed!) involving a defective judgment about whether "in the money" options needed to undergo expensing.

We're still at the beginning of the so-called scandal, and many executives will likely end up paying a price for this poor decision. But in no way does it implicate theft of shareholder money or even substantive accounting fraud. Here, we propose to violate a cardinal newspaper ordinance that logic should never be discussed in a newspaper. The beginning of all error was the media's unwarranted assumption, to put a fine point on it, that backdating was somebody's way of paying an employee more than, um, er, that same somebody intended (er, sputter, gurgle).

You see the problem: Whether options are backdated or not, they must reflect the intentions of whoever designed them. If I'm designing the package, how can I intentionally design it to pay more than I intend?

So the claim that backdating was used to "inflate" pay (compared to what?) can only be nonsense. In any case, if companies wanted to increase executive wages, backdating was a needlessly baroque way of doing it. They could just have handed out more options. Backdating's appeal had to lie elsewhere. The likeliest (even self-evident) explanation is that managements discovered that employees' eyes light up when "in the money" options are put before them. Indeed, if employees are as prone to fallacious thinking as the media in valuing options packages, their delight in "in the money" options allowed them to be taken to the cleaners compared to what they would have received in "at the money" options.

But, you ask, wasn't the purpose to conceal from shareholders how much employees were being paid? Your error is forgivable if you've been getting your information from the press: The entire substance of backdating was to allow the details of these "in the money" options to be accurately reported, albeit without taking an accounting charge for them (remember, companies at the time could pay an employee the GNP of France in "at the money" options without taking a charge).

Blessed is the editor who can say to a writer, "Make sense of Subject X for me," and hope to receive back something more than a distillation of tropes already in the media. Most editors are not so blessed, a factor just now reaching critical mass. On Sunday, a lagging commentator in the New York Times likened backdating to "getting to pick lottery numbers after the winning numbers are drawn." A confused Washington Post editorial called on Mr. Jobs to reimburse Apple for the compensation he stole.

Against this (who would have thunk it) stands Mr. Gore, yelling stop to the lynch mob. In Apple's own backyard, the San Jose Mercury News delivered a critic's delectable complaint that the Gore investigation had "tried to preserve the company's No. 1 asset" in Mr. Jobs. Isn't that exactly what a shareholder wants from the Apple board right now? The Apple case is a marvelous example of why corporate governance reformers do shareholders no favor even as they expand their own bailiwicks by making governance reform a never-ending end in itself. Indeed, Mr. Gore deserves credit for putting himself in the line of fire at all. And worse is surely coming: Mr. Jobs is starting to face insinuations of insider trading for stock sales after the first backdating cases broke but before Apple was implicated.

Mr. Gore might have waved off the special committee assignment and sought to cover his own hindquarters from the lawsuits and criticism aimed at Apple. That's been the tendency of directors since Sarbanes-Oxley enacted greater individual liability for accounting scandals: head for the high grass and hire a lawyer to point fingers at somebody else.

It's no accident that in the last 25 years, the value of America's corporations rose 12-fold, and the corporate reform industry grew right in step to tell us how badly and corruptly our companies are governed. The more successful the stock market is at cultivating strong businesses, the more we're told the whole system is rotten, in need of reform.

We just wonder what Mr. Gore thinks about all this now.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Document-Theft Probe Is Criticized (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

The Justice Department and the National Archives improperly assured the Sept. 11 commission that its members had access to all relevant materials about the Clinton administration's terrorism policies, without knowing if original, uncopied documents had been removed from the archives by former national security adviser Samuel R. "Sandy" Berger, a Republican congressional report said yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0114906

The report, issued by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), accused both agencies of inadequately investigating the theft Berger admitted had occurred on two occasions in 2003. It quoted two Archives officials as saying that they had no way of knowing whether Berger took other documents from the files during two earlier visits.

Davis is the former chairman of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform. He issued the report after Republican staff members conducted interviews with Archives and Justice Department officials and gained access to unredacted material from a probe by the National Archives inspector general.

His report includes new details of what Berger did, and how the Archives staff, the Justice Department and the FBI reacted to the discovery of missing documents. It depicts Berger as aggressively insisting during his visits to the Archives that he be left alone with the documents, giving him what he later admitted was a calculated opportunity to hide the papers in his clothing.

The report also depicts Berger as lying to Archives staff about thefts that an unnamed senior Archives official said had made her and her staff feel "almost physically ill." It said Berger knowingly made false statements to the media after word of the FBI probe surfaced and improperly allowed a spokesman, Joe Lockhart, to depict him as a victim in the affair.

Berger's attorney, Lanny Breuer, responded yesterday with a statement that Republicans had politicized and distorted "a matter that has been thoroughly investigated by the Justice Department for more than two years and effectively closed for more than a year. It is particularly troubling that they have chosen to attack not only Mr. Berger but also the dedicated professionals at the Department of Justice who handled this case."

Breuer added: "The principal allegations in this report are based on pure conjecture; not a single fact is offered to support them." He said Berger had cooperated with the Justice Department and had moved on.

The Justice Department said yesterday that it had no evidence Berger's actions had deprived the commission of any documents.

The report called the FBI and Justice Department's lack of interest in Berger's first two visits to the Archives, in May and June 2003, "disturbing" and "inexplicable," particularly in light of his eventual admission to having improperly removed classified notes he took during one of those visits. It said Berger was never given a polygraph test despite having agreed to it as part of his plea bargain with the Justice Department in 2005.

The report also provided a more vivid account of what an unnamed Archives staff member described as Berger's apparent attempt to take some material out in his pants, an allegation Berger has repeatedly denied. The staff member, one of only four Archives employees cleared to see all the documents that Berger came to review, wrote that "there was clearly something there more than his pants and socks."

The report said Berger took a special interest during his early visits in files from the office of former White House counterterrorism official Richard A. Clarke, which included uninventoried draft documents, memos, e-mail messages and handwritten notes. "Had Berger removed papers . . . it would be almost impossible for Archives staff to know," the report stated.

The report quoted a lawyer at the Archives, Jason R. Baron, as acknowledging that as a result "it is conceivable that the 9/11 commission may not have received" all the requested documents.

A spokeswoman for the Archives, Susan Cooper, said "at the time, the National Archives was confident that the 9/11 commission received all the materials. . . . You can't ever guarantee anything."

GOP Contradicts Justice Department (WP/AP)

By Larry Margasak, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Some classified documents that were unlawfully removed from the National Archives three years ago may never have reached their intended destination _ the Sept. 11 commission, a House Republican report concluded Tuesday.

The report contradicted Justice Department conclusions that the commission received all the necessary documents. The records were reviewed at the archives by the Clinton administration's national security adviser, Sandy Berger, who pleaded guilty in April 2005 to unlawfully removing several documents.

Released by Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., the report said Berger could have taken White House staff working papers that never were inventoried by the archives. In that case, nobody would know they were gone, the report said.

The Justice Department on Tuesday repeated its original position that no documents were withheld. Spokesman Bryan Sierra said the department "has no evidence that Sandy Berger's actions deprived the 9/11 Commission of documents, and we stand by our investigation of this matter."

Berger pleaded guilty to removing documents on two occasions in 2003. A report by the archives inspector general last month said that Berger acknowledged hiding some of them at a construction site near the archives building in Washington.

The report said, however, that the plea did not account for two earlier visits during which Berger reviewed documents. He conducted the review to prepare himself and other Clinton aides for testimony before the commission investigating the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

"The 9/11 Commission relied on incomplete and misleading information" when it was told it had all the records, said Davis. The ranking Republican on the House Government Reform Committee, Davis started working on the report when he was chairman prior to the Democratic takeover of Congress.

Davis' report quoted Noel Hillman, then-chief of the department's Public Integrity Section, as stating at the time of the 2005 plea that Berger did not have an intent to hide any of the documents or conceal facts from the commission.

Matt Bennett, a spokesman for Berger attorney Lanny Breuer, said, "I can state unequivocally that no documents were withheld, and that all documents that Mr. Berger took were disclosed to the Justice Department and the inspector general of the archives."

The report said that since working papers reviewed by Berger were not inventoried, "the Department of Justice could not assure the 9/11 Commission that it received all responsive documents to which Berger had access. Additionally, the 9/11 Commission was not informed that Berger had access to original documents that he could have removed without anyone's knowledge," the report said.

In September 2005, Berger was sentenced to two years of probation, 100 hours of community service, pay a $50,000 fine and to lose his security clearance for three years.

The report said the Justice Department "was unacceptably incurious" about two of Berger's four visits to the National Archives _ one in May 2002 and the other in July 2003.

The department "never notified the 9/11 Commission that Berger viewed a large number of original documents on these first two visits," the report said.

Damage From Berger's Theft Understated, Davis Says (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

Samuel R. Berger's theft of documents from the National Archives compromised national security "much more than originally disclosed" and resulted in "incomplete and misleading" information being given to the September 11 commission, says the former chairman of the House Government Reform Committee.

"It is now also clear that Mr. Berger was willing to go to extraordinary lengths to compromise national security, apparently for his own convenience," Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, said yesterday.

"No one ever told the commission Mr. Berger had access to original documents he could have taken without detection."

In October, Mr. Davis led an effort by House Republicans to investigate and hold hearings on which documents might have been "destroyed, removed or were missing" after visits to the National Archives by Mr. Berger, President Clinton's national security adviser from 1997 to 2001.

Mr. Davis said the investigation found that the full extent of Mr. Berger's document removal can never be known and, consequently, the Justice Department could not assure the September 11 commission -- which was investigating intelligence and security failures -- it received all the documents to which Mr. Berger had access.

"We now know Mr. Berger left stolen highly classified documents at a construction site to avoid detection," he said. "We know Mr. Berger insisted on privacy at times to allow him to conceal documents that he stole."

Mr. Davis noted that during three visits to the Archives, Mr. Berger was given access to working papers of National Security Council staff members, including Mr. Berger, and their content was not inventoried by the Archives at the document level. He said Mr. Berger focused solely on original documents during his first two visits and there was "no way to determine" whether he "swiped any of these original documents."

The National Archives Office of Inspector General reported last month that Mr. Berger hid documents under a construction trailer where they could be retrieved later.

Lanny Breuer, Mr. Berger's attorney, said the matter was thoroughly investigated by the Justice Department for more than two years and effectively closed for more than a year. He said the report's conclusions were based on "pure conjecture."

"Not a single fact is offered to support them," Mr. Breuer said.

"Sandy Berger made a mistake. But he has admitted that mistake, fully cooperated with the government's investigation, paid his debt to society, and moved on. It's time for the new congressional minority to do the same."

Mr. Davis described the Justice Department's assertion that Mr. Berger's statements were credible after being caught as "misplaced." He said, "One wouldn't rely on the fox to be truthful after being nabbed in the henhouse. But the Justice Department apparently did."

Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said the department "has no evidence that Sandy Berger's actions deprived the 9/11 commission of documents, and we stand by our investigation of this matter."

Mr. Berger pleaded guilty in April 2005 to a misdemeanor charge of unauthorized removal and retention of classified material, including documents outlining the government's knowledge of terrorist threats to the United States.

He was fined $50,000 and barred from access to classified material for three years. He had faced a year in prison and a $100,000 fine, but a plea agreement with the Justice Department reduced the fine and kept him out of prison.

House Panels Delay Response To Subpoenas (AP)

By Erica Werner, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 10, 2007

Three House committees are delaying responding to grand jury subpoenas issued in connection with the bribery case against jailed former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

The subpoenas were issued to the Appropriations, Armed Services and Intelligence committees by the federal grand jury in San Diego that has been considering evidence in a defense contracting investigation stemming from the Cunningham case.

The subpoenas set a Jan. 11 deadline for compliance but prosecutors and House lawyers have agreed to extend that until Jan. 31, congressional staffers said Tuesday.

The initial deadline was "obviously impossible to meet," said Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey, D-Wis. "I just got the job."

"We essentially have to dig into Republican files. We have no idea what's in there," Obey said.

The subpoenas for documents were disclosed in the Dec. 27 edition of the Congressional Record by the committee chairmen, as required by House rules. Those Republican chairmen have since handed over power to Democrats who now control the House.

Prosecutors in San Diego declined to comment.

Rep. Peter Hoekstra of Michigan, top Republican on the House Intelligence Committee, wouldn't say what the subpoenas ask for, but said he was concerned the scope was overly broad.

"It's pretty extensive ... I've got some concerns," Hoekstra said. He said House attorneys would negotiate their response with federal prosecutors.

The Justice Department has clashed with Congress in the past over the scope of its investigations of lawmakers.

The San Diego grand jury has been considering evidence against Brent Wilkes, a defense contractor identified as one of Cunningham's coconspirators.

Cunningham, a San Diego-area Republican, was sentenced in March to more than eight years in prison for accepting $2.4 million in bribes in exchange for steering government business to Wilkes and others.

Investigators are also investigating Wilkes' childhood friend Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, a former high-ranking CIA official, for his role in the awarding of a government contract that went to Wilkes.

Also Tuesday, longtime Appropriations staffer Betsy Phillips confirmed she is cooperating with a grand jury subpoena for testimony in the case, but refused further comment.

Nagin Stops Short Of Curfew But Plans Checkpoints On N.O. Streets (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

NEW ORLEANS — Mayor Ray Nagin, his hurricane-stricken city under siege by a crime wave that has claimed nine lives since the start of 2007, stopped short of imposing a curfew but said police will set up checkpoints in early-morning hours when about one-third of the city's violent crime occurs.

The checkpoints, scheduled to start Wednesday, would operate between 2 a.m. and 6 a.m. and target drug and alcohol violations as well as motorist insurance. The first one was to be held in a crime-ridden area of the city.

Increased foot patrols, using 20-25 sheriff's deputies to supplement police, increasing the number of surveillance cameras in high-crime areas and speeding homicide cases through the court system were other elements of Nagin's plan to attack crime.

"This city will focus on murders," Nagin said, flanked by Police Superintendent Warren Riley, District Attorney Eddie Jordan and others during a news conference held Tuesday afternoon at the site of the city's first murder of 2007. "We're drawing a line in the sand, and we're saying, 'We've had it.'"

DOJ_NMG_0114909

A curfew had been opposed by the city's tourism leaders, who said businesses struggling since Hurricane Katrina could be further hurt. While Nagin did not declare a curfew, he said the message to citizens was to stay off the streets in high-crime areas and in early morning hours.

Riley, whose department has struggled since the hurricane to maintain community confidence, also said officers on desk and training duties will be reassigned to on-foot community policing.

Nagin, acknowledging the criminal justice breakdown extended beyond the police force, said a corps of volunteers will be recruited to monitor homicide cases moving through the courts. "We're sending a signal that the system that used to allow you to commit a murder and there were no consequences is over. It has been easier to commit a murder than another crime in New Orleans," Nagin said.

Police officers have been critical of the district attorney's office and judges, who they say have turned loose too many criminals or given light sentences. But Riley said his department will work with the district attorney to ensure that all information needed to prosecute a murder case will be turned over within 28 days.

The news conference took place in a neighborhood of houses with peeling paint, across from a large FEMA trailer park and an abandoned public housing development.

At a mom-and-pop grocery on the corner, children oblivious to the weight of the events around them bought candy and chatted happily.

Beside the podium set up for the news conference, blood spots from the Jan. 1 killing of 28-year-old Corey Hayes were in plain view on the street.

Absent from today's news conference were state officials.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco said today that her office has been talking with New Orleans police for almost two months about a plan to curb the violence and made a formal request for one a couple of weeks ago as a prelude to additional state funding.

The state budget for the next fiscal year, which begins July 1, is being formulated now and an action plan on crime is needed to secure state funding, Blanco said.

"We obviously can't abandon the city," Blanco said.

Since June 2006, Blanco said the state has spent about $15 million to keep 300 National Guard troops and 60 state police in New Orleans, and another $15 million housing Orleans Parish prisoners in state facilities.

There is funding to keep the guard and state police in town until June 30, she said.

"We know it's going to cost us more next year if they stay," she said. "For one thing, the hotels that were providing free rooms are withdrawing that, so we'll have to pay for them."

New Orleans neighborhoods have become "a haven for criminal activity" and the state needs federal help to stop the recent crime wave there, Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., said today.

Landrieu presented 10 ways the federal government could help relieve the wave of homicides.

"These proposals will not end crime in New Orleans, but they are specific, they are doable," Landrieu said in a Capitol Hill news conference.

She asked for more agents from the FBI and the Drug Enforcement and Administration, an emergency grant from the Justice Department similar to the one awarded to New York City in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks, and money to build a new police academy and put a camera surveillance system in police patrol cars and around the city.

Guns are on the streets of New Orleans in record numbers since Hurricane Katrina, said senior special agent Austin Banks of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

"Since Katrina, we have traced every firearm recovered by the New Orleans Police Department," Banks said. "And our investigation shows we are tracing just as many post-Katrina as pre-Katrina even though we have a much smaller population."

New Orleans population is down from its pre-Katrina total of 455,000 to about 200,000 according to the U.S. Census Bureau.

The ATF has found the length of time it takes a legally purchased gun to become involved in a crime is five years nationally, Banks said.

"In New Orleans it's only six months," he said. "That tells me that people here are buying guns for the bad guys."

Santorum's landing

Former Sen. Rick Santorum, Pennsylvania Republican, yesterday became a senior fellow at the Ethics and Public Policy Center, a Washington-based think tank, John J. Miller reports at National Review Online (www.nationalreview.com).

DOJ_NMG_0114910

"I want to contribute to the world of ideas," Mr. Santorum said.

After 16 years in Congress -- four in the House, 12 in the Senate -- Mr. Santorum lost his bid for re-election in November. However, he hopes to remain in the public spotlight as director of the EPPC's brand-new America's Enemies program, Mr. Miller writes.

"It's a stark name," Mr. Santorum said. "But we wanted to be candid about the fact that America really does have enemies and to point out that the nature of these enemies is much more complex than what people realize. It's not just Islamic fascism, but also Venezuela, North Korea, and, increasingly in my opinion, Russia."

Landrieu's plan

Sen. Mary L. Landrieu, Louisiana Democrat, said yesterday that Congress can -- and should -- do more to help stop the recent wave of violent crime plaguing New Orleans.

The Democrat urged adoption of her 10-point plan, which grants federal funds and beefs up drug and violence task forces disrupted by Hurricane Katrina in 2005. She sent a letter to President Bush asking that his budget include funds to double the size of a Drug Enforcement Administration task force and an FBI gang task force.

"Regrettably, these abandoned neighborhoods are a perfect breeding ground for crime and drug traffickers that can take advantage of the total absence of witnesses to undertake their operations unobserved," she said.

Mrs. Landrieu said "action must be taken," especially in light of the 12 killings in recent weeks, nine of them since Jan. 1.

Among her proposals was a plan to put up surveillance cameras to monitor crime and for potentially abusive police. She also wants to increase funding to build a new police academy to replace what was damaged during the hurricane.

The city must give a perception of safety in the weeks before next month's Mardi Gras celebration, a major economic boost, she said.

Sharpton again

Black activist the Rev. Al Sharpton said Monday he is seriously considering a run for president.

"I don't hear any reason not to," Mr. Sharpton, 52, said in an interview during an urban-affairs conference in New York sponsored by the Rev. Jesse Jackson.

"If we're talking about the urban agenda, can you tell me anybody else in the field who's representing that right now?" Mr. Sharpton asked. "We clearly have a reason to run, and whether we do it or not we'll see over the next couple of months."

Mr. Sharpton mounted a long-shot bid for the White House in 2004, in which his wit and fiery denunciation of President Bush often enlivened Democratic primary debates. He dropped out of the race after losing several state primaries and endorsed the eventual nominee, Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry.

Despite widespread interest in the likely candidacy of another influential black Democrat, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, Mr. Sharpton said he's heard little substantive discussion of issues that might influence his decision about running, the Associated Press reports.

"Right now, we're hearing a lot of media razzle-dazzle," Mr. Sharpton said. "I'm not hearing a lot of meat, or a lot of content. I think when the meat hits the fire, we'll find out if it's just fat, or if there's some real meat there."

Mr. Sharpton said the candidate who impressed him most so far was former Sen. John Edwards, North Carolina Democrat, who has made poverty the central issue of his campaign.

Johnson's recovery

Sen. Tim Johnson's condition has been upgraded from critical to fair, four weeks after he was hospitalized for a brain hemorrhage, his office said yesterday.

The South Dakota Democrat, who was rushed to the hospital on Dec. 13 and underwent emergency surgery, remains in intensive care, said his spokeswoman, Julianne Fisher.

"The senator continues to make progress," she said. "The next step would be rehabilitation, and we hope that would happen within the week."

Mr. Johnson's office has said that his recovery is expected to take several months. He underwent surgery to correct a condition called arteriovenous malformation, involving tangled arteries in his brain.

The senator's doctors said last week that Mr. Johnson was improving, but still needed a ventilator at night to help him breathe. The ventilator has required a tube to be placed down Mr. Johnson's throat, making it impossible for him to talk.

Court ruling

The Supreme Court yesterday upheld the conviction of a man caught trying to enter the country illegally in a case that initially was seen as a test of whether a flawed indictment could violate a defendant's rights.

But in an 8-1 opinion, the court said that the indictment of Juan Resendiz-Ponce itself was sound. The indictment "did not deprive him of any significant protection that the constitutional guarantee of a grand jury was intended to confer," Justice John Paul Stevens said.

DOJ_NMG_0114911

Resendiz-Ponce, a Mexican national, sought to persuade the justices that there was a problem so serious in his indictment that it warranted reversing his conviction, the Associated Press reports. Justice Antonin Scalia, the lone dissenter, agreed.

Resendiz-Ponce was charged with attempting to enter the country illegally after he was arrested at the border crossing at San Luis, Ariz., on June 1, 2003. He presented his cousin's green card and driver's license to U.S. authorities.

But the grand jury indictment that followed fail to set out any specific acts showing how he tried to enter the United States. The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said the omission was so serious that it violated Resendiz-Ponce's constitutional rights and required automatic reversal of the conviction.

Deputy Solicitor General Michael Dreeben, however, told justices at oral argument that this error was harmless because Resendiz-Ponce received a fair trial at which a jury determined that the government proved beyond a reasonable doubt that he had displayed two false pieces of identification in an effort to enter the country.

Familiar name

Vince Morris, a former political reporter for The Washington Times, has signed on as communications director for the Senate office of John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat.

The hiring of Mr. Morris comes as Mr. Kerry gears up for another run for the presidency, according to washingtonpost.com.

Mr. Morris, who also covered politics for the New York Post, more recently served as communications director for former D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams, who left office last week after two terms.

N.O. Unveils Plan To Fight Violence (BRADV)

By Joe Gyan

Baton Rouge Advocate, January 10, 2007

In an unprecedented show of force and unity, the mayor, police chief and district attorney joined other city, business and community leaders Tuesday at the site of the city's first homicide of 2007 to unveil a crime-fighting package that they hope will make a recent spike in violent crime the last.

In response to nine killings so far this year and four in the final three days of 2006, Mayor Ray Nagin and Police Superintendent Warren Riley stopped short of ordering a mandatory curfew but said drug and alcohol checkpoints between the hours of 2 a.m. and 6 a.m. will be stepped up — or tripled.

Other measures outlined by Nagin, Riley and District Attorney Eddie Jordan include expediting the prosecution of murder cases; having deputies from the Orleans Parish Criminal Sheriff's Office assume some routine New Orleans Police Department duties to free up officers to patrol neighborhoods; putting more crime cameras in "hot spots'' around the city and in patrol cars; and implementing a "Court Watchers'' program to offer community support to victims and witnesses in the courtroom and to hold the criminal justice system accountable with respect to violent crime cases.

"We're here to say collectively that one murder is way too many,'' said Nagin, who was flanked by Riley, Jordan, six of seven City Council members, and a host of other community, religious and business leaders, on a Central City street corner where the first of the city's nine homicides this year occurred.

On the federal front, U.S. Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., fired off a letter to President Bush on Tuesday and unveiled her own 10-point anti-crime plan in Washington, saying it is time to "send the message that we will not surrender to lawlessness.'' Nagin, who applauded Landrieu's actions, said the city is aiming an intense, "laser-beam'' focus on the murder issue in the city. Jordan pledged that his office will "aggressively'' and "vigorously'' prosecute murder cases, and Riley said his department will get evidence to Jordan's office in an expedited fashion.

"Enough is enough, but we've said that before. (Now) we're drawing a line in the sand and saying, 'We've had it,'" the mayor said.

City Council president Oliver Thomas was even more direct and passionate.

"Let me say to the thugs out there: This is not your city. And because it's our city, you can't stay here,'' he said. "Check your thug card at the parish line, because we don't want you.''

In both her letter to the president and in her crime-fighting plan, Landrieu asked that more FBI and Drug Enforcement Administration agents be sent to New Orleans. She called for doubling the size of the DEA's High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area Task Force Group and the FBI's Violent Gang Safe Streets Task Force.

"I believe that it is vital that New Orleans receive additional federal law enforcement personnel to combat the international narcotics cartels establishing roots in the City,'' Landrieu wrote to the president. "As you are aware, we lost over 200,000 homes during the storm. But unlike the circumstance in Mississippi, these homes were not physically obliterated. Rather, they rotted from the inside, but remain standing. There are vast swaths of the City that remain essentially ghost towns of structures that need to be gutted and restored.

“Regrettably, these abandoned neighborhoods are a perfect breeding ground for crime and drug traffickers that can take advantage of the total absence of witnesses to undertake their operations unobserved,’’ she added. “Furthermore, crime and gang turf wars have led to shocking incidences of violent crime. Tragically, this spiraling violence has taken 12 lives in less than two weeks.’’

Landrieu’s 10-point plan also calls for speeding up remaining reconstruction projects for the police department and other criminal justice facilities in the area; reactivating a drug trafficking intelligence-sharing program between the Department of Defense, the Louisiana National Guard and Louisiana State Police; building a state-of-the-art crime surveillance system in the city, including cameras in patrol cars; and requiring FEMA to “fully cooperate with investigative inquiries from the NOPD and regional law enforcement agencies.’’

The latter item would make the Federal Emergency Management Agency turn over records of residents of its trailers and trailer parks to New Orleans police and other agencies investigating crime in the area, a Landrieu spokesman said.

“It’s time to get tough on crime. Not get tough with words, but get tough with action,’’ Landrieu said. “We need to work together at all levels of government to send the message that we will not surrender to lawlessness.

“In the wake of hurricanes Katrina and Rita and the catastrophic collapse of the federal levee system, our law enforcement community has had to contend with crime with one hand tied behind its back. This situation cannot continue, and I will do everything in my power to halt the unimaginable crime in New Orleans.’’

The latest violent crime spike has come despite the presence of about 300 National Guard troops and 60 state troopers who were brought in last June to help patrol the streets because of a surge in killings.

The city had a 60-year low 161 murders last year, but the population was less than half of its pre-Katrina level of about 460,000. The police force also is down from its pre-storm total of 1,700 officers to about 1,400 — but that number includes about 100 officers on leave for injuries or illness.

Riley said more officers on administrative duty will be brought from behind their desks and put on the streets to help officers already on the streets. The chief also said he wants to beef up neighborhood watch groups, which stood at 300 before Katrina but now come in at 100.

Landrieu Wants Federal Crime Fighting Help (WGNO)

Feds Say Crime Wave Requires More Than Law Enforcement

NEW ORLEANS, LA — Nine murders in the first eight days of 2007 are keeping law enforcers busy in New Orleans.

The killings come on the heels of four murders in the last three days of 2006.

The murder rate in the Big Easy is now four and a half times the national average.

"There is no doubt that this crime wave is putting a damper on our aggressive efforts to rebuild and re-image the city and to encourage not only residents to return, but tourists to continue to come," said Senator Mary Landrieu/D-Louisiana.

Senator Landrieu announced a 10-point plan to fight crime in the New Orleans region.

She is asking for additional federal dollars to help rebuild criminal justice facilities like NOPD headquarters and the local police academy.

The senator is also requesting 60-million dollars to help rebuild the police department.

"I urge the President and the Department of Justice to make an emergency grant to the city under the emergency cops program," said Landrieu.

Senator Landrieu is also asking the Justice Department to send additional drug enforcement and FBI agents to New Orleans.

FBI Special Agent in Charge Jim Bernazzani says those plans are already in the works.

"Washington has committed to do a national canvass relative to agents who have homicide investigative experience," said Bernazzani. "To come to New Orleans on temporary status for about 90 to 120 days to work as a stop gap measure until we get another squad down here."

The United States Attorney in New Orleans Jim Letten says the city must also address issues outside of law enforcement.

"Fixing our school system and building the best system possible and rebuilding this economy," said Letten. "We have to create education and opportunities for our youth if we're going to get a handle on this thing for the mid and long term."

"These individuals are a product of institutional dysfunction, and educational system that didn't educate, aspects of a state judicial system that failed to meet out consequences for criminal activity, levels of corruption that drove legitimate business out of the city, thus denying these people their jobs and opportunity," said Bernazzani. "When you add crack cocaine and the AK-47 you have New Orleans today."

DOJ_NMG_0114913

Senator Landrieu also wants the government to force FEMA to turn over records of people in it's trailers and trailer parks.

She claims investigators need that information to help hunt down criminals and potential witnesses.

The ACLU strongly objects.

"They shouldn't have to give up their privacy rights to receive a benefit from the government," said ACLU state director Joe Cook. "It's subject to abuse as we have seen."

Here is a complete list of the Landrieu plan:

1. Expedite remaining reconstruction projects for the NOPD and other regional criminal justice facilities.
2. Increase the number of DEA and FBI agents in New Orleans.
3. Reactivate the Gulf State Initiative, a drug trafficking intelligence-sharing program between the Dept. of Defense, and the Louisiana National Guard and State Police.
4. Build a state-of-the-art crime surveillance system for the City of New Orleans, including cameras in patrol cars.
5. Issue an emergency COPS grant to parishes affected by hurricanes Katrina and Rita.
6. Release $13 million in Social Services Block Grant funds to provide drug rehabilitation services in New Orleans.
7. Build a state-of-the-art police academy.
8. Provide an additional $25 million to the Gulf Coast Regional Community Policing Institute for NOPD and regional police training and professional development.
9. Request a comprehensive study of the post-hurricane criminal justice system in Louisiana.
10. Require FEMA to fully cooperate with investigative inquires from the NOPD and regional law enforcement agencies.

RECOVERY TOUR Laura Bush Visits School, Cafe, Museum (NOTP)

By Leslie Williams

New Orleans Times-Picayune, January 10, 2007

Laura Bush entered the brightly lighted theater of the Louisiana Children's Museum in the Warehouse District on Tuesday afternoon and without hesitation picked up a drumstick and a Senegalese songba drum, joining dozens of New Orleans-area elementary school students in a rousing performance of a funga, an African welcome song.

The president's wife smiled broadly as she pounded the drum and studied the faces of the children, who were among the many she met on a three-stop tour, her 11th post-Katrina visit to the city.

The visit to the museum, intended to highlight its Play Helps program, was the last of the stopovers that began in the morning with a pep talk to more than 200 students assembled in the cafeteria at St. Rosalie Elementary School in Harvey.

Her tour also included a lunch of catfish and greens and conversation at Cafe Reconcile, a job-training restaurant in the heart of Central City.

Job program lauded

Bush's visit was not without reference to the city's recent crime wave.

She mentioned an antiviolence program used in Chicago that is based on the notion that violence is taught.

"If you grow up in a neighborhood where violence is common, you think it's normal," Bush said. "Because violence is taught, it can be unlearned.

"But I think people in the community really need to speak out and do whatever they can to get the message across that it's not acceptable," she said.

Bush said the three stops during her tour of the New Orleans area "really had to do with what we can do to help young people . . . what we can do to help rebuild the community."

Judge Sends Public Defender To Jail (NYT)

By Christopher Drew

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 9 — The chief judge in the city's juvenile courts had a top public defender arrested Tuesday in a bizarre escalation of a fight over changes in the city's troubled program for representing indigent defendants.

The judge, David Bell, was upset that no public defender was in his courtroom when he was ready to start this morning, and he drove to the defender's office and waited outside for Stephen Singer, the chief of trials, to arrive.

The judge took Mr. Singer to his courtroom, where he found him in contempt for not being prepared to provide representation and ordered him jailed for 36 days, three days for each of the 12 items on Tuesday's docket. Mr. Singer then spent about five hours in jail before a state appeals court stayed the order.

The events were the latest in a series of confrontations between judges and the public defender's office, which has long been overwhelmed and went broke after Hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0114914

A new board has shifted how the office uses its 30 lawyers to try to provide more thorough representation on the most serious cases. But the changes have made the day-to-day coverage more spotty, and the criminal court judges also have threatened to hold the office in contempt over the problems.

After his release, Mr. Singer said the dispute with Judge Bell arose because the defender assigned to his court was on her honeymoon, and her replacement was trying to handle four courtrooms at once.

Judge Bell did not respond to a request for comment. But Mr. Singer said he and the judge had a more congenial meeting about the problems late in the day.

Ex-Interior Deputy A Target In Abramoff Probe (WP)

By Susan Schmidt

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

Federal prosecutors have notified a former deputy secretary of the interior, J. Steven Griles, that he is a target in the public corruption investigation of Jack Abramoff's lobbying activities, sources knowledgeable about the probe said.

The sources, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said that among the possible criminal charges being investigated is whether Griles made false statements to the Senate Indian Affairs Committee in 2005 about job discussions Abramoff initiated while Griles was deputy secretary. Griles's attorneys did not return calls seeking comment yesterday.

Justice Department prosecutors met with Griles on Friday to outline possible charges. The investigation has examined donations made by Abramoff's Indian tribal clients to an environmental advocacy group run by Italia Federici, who was involved with Griles socially, the sources said. Also under scrutiny are donations made to Federici's group by energy and mining companies, the sources said.

E-mails released last year by the Senate Indian Affairs Committee showed that Griles had more than half a dozen contacts with Abramoff or with Federici, head of the Council of Republicans for Environmental Advocacy, who was working as the lobbyist's go-between to Griles. Griles has said that he never tried to intercede on behalf of Abramoff's clients.

The Indian Affairs Committee, in a report issued after a series of investigative hearings, said that further inquiry "appears warranted" into the "veracity" of Federici's public testimony. Federici's testimony before the committee included discussions of her relationship with Abramoff, his tribal clients and Griles.

Federici declined to comment for this article yesterday. Current and former Interior Department officials have appeared in recent weeks at the federal courthouse in Washington where a federal grand jury has been investigating Abramoff's dealings.

With the prospect of Griles's indictment, a senior Justice Department official -- who Interior employees said has been dating Griles -- tendered her resignation this week.

Sue Ellen Wooldridge, assistant attorney general for environment and natural resources for the past year, submitted a letter of resignation Monday saying that she intends to return to the private sector, a Justice Department official said yesterday.

Wooldridge served as Interior Department solicitor and as deputy chief of staff to then-Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton before moving to Justice in November 2005. Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said that Wooldridge would not be available for comment about her departure. "Sue Ellen sent the resignation letter in of her own volition. This is a decision that she made," Magnuson said.

Griles was a controversial figure at Interior, strongly criticized by the department's inspector general for maintaining ties to energy and mining companies that were once his lobbying clients.

Yesterday, another former Interior Department employee was sentenced to two years' probation and fined $1,000 for failing to report gifts that he received from Abramoff. Roger G. Stillwell accepted hundreds of dollars worth of football and concert tickets from Abramoff, who at the time was lobbying for the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands. Stillwell worked in the Interior Department's Insular Affairs Office, which handles issues involving the island government.

Prosecutors say lobbyist-government investigation is still ongoing

WASHINGTON - A former Interior Department official linked to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff was sentenced Tuesday in federal court to two years probation and a fine of $1000. The official, Roger Stillwell, pleaded guilty to a single misdemeanor count of filing a false financial statement with the department.

Magistrate Judge Alan Kay disregarded a recommendation by both the Department of Justice and Stillwell's attorney for a lesser sentence of six months probation.

DOJ_NMG_0114915

Judge Kay said that Stillwell's actions amounted to a "serious violation considering his position" and his years of government service. Kay admonished Stillwell saying there is "no such thing as a free lunch, particularly as provided by lobbyists."

The charges against Stillwell are the first connected to the Abramoff scandal to touch the Interior Department. The charges also mark an expansion of the government's investigation into the influence peddling scandal involving the convicted lobbyist. Prosecutors acknowledged in court that there is still an ongoing investigation involving Abramoff and his contacts with the Department of Interior.

Stillwell, a former desk officer for the Commonwealth of the Northern Marianas - a lucrative Abramoff client - acknowledged receiving four tickets to a Redskins football game and two tickets to a Simon and Garfunkle concert in Washington - all paid for by Abramoff - which Stillwell did not report.

He addressed the court saying that he took full responsibility for his failure to report the gifts Abramoff provided. Stillwell said that it was "never my intention to violate the law." And, he said the, "consequences of my actions have devastated my professional career."

Court papers indicate, "Stillwell well knew, the document falsely certified that he did not receive reportable gifts from a prohibited source."

Stillwell is 67 years old and is now a retired Interior Department employee.

Northern Marianas connection

Abramoff's team allegedly cultivated Stillwell at the Interior Department. Prosecutors said Stillwell provided Abramoff with some non-public information but the materials were "not classified" and the documents were not a quid pro quo for the gifts Abramoff provided.

But, in a report released in July, the Department of Justice's Inspector General Glenn Fine referred one matter to the FBI and his counterpart at the Interior Department for further investigation: the possibility that an Interior Department official leaked to Abramoff a post-9/11 security review of the Northern Marianas that recommended extending federal immigration laws to the islands. There is no indication in the DOJ report that Stillwell is connected to the continuing investigation at the Department of Interior.

The Interior Department's Inspector General also announced last year that it was investigating any contacts Abramoff may have had with officials there, but has yet to issue a report on its probe.

Abramoff made extensive efforts to build relationships with Interior officials, particularly J. Stephen Griles, former deputy secretary at the department. Griles denied any wrongdoing in his dealings with Abramoff during an appearance before the Senate Indian Affairs Committee last year. Griles is now a partner in the lobbying firm Lundquist, Nethercutt & Griles.

Abramoff also tried to place his allies in key positions at Interior, according to e-mails released by the Indian Affairs Committee, focusing on the Bureau of Insular Affairs.

'In awe' of Abramoff

The Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands was important to Abramoff who was hired to lobby Congress to keep open an important trade exemption. That exemption allowed garment makers there to put "Made in the U.S.A." labels in their clothing. Human rights groups argue this has fostered an exploitive working environment in the commonwealth's booming garment industry.

A former aide to Tom DeLay pleaded guilty to conspiracy and corruption charges involving the Marianas. While working in the Delay's leadership office, Tony Rudy helped Abramoff with one of his Marianas clients. According to an internal audit by Commonwealth authorities, the Marianas paid Abramoff more than $7 million in lobbying fees from 1996 to 2001. Rudy's plea agreement did not implicate DeLay in any illegal activities. Rudy has yet to be sentenced.

Stillwell told Mother Jones magazine last year that he was "in awe" of Abramoff's ability to kill a House bill back in 2000 that would have imposed federal immigration policy on the CNMI, one of his most lucrative of his lobbying clients. Abramoff "stopped it dead," said Stillwell. "It could not have been an easy job."

Investigation continues

To date, the investigation has yielded guilty pleas from six defendants, including Abramoff and public officials such as former congressman Bob Ney, and his former chief of staff Neil Volz, former DeLay aide Tony Rudy, and Stillwell.

The investigation has also resulted in the conviction by jury trial of the former chief of staff for the General Services Administration David Safavian who is awaiting sentencing pending appeal of his conviction.

In November, Abramoff began serving a 70-month prison sentence for pleaded guilty to defrauding banks of $23 million in his purchase of the SunCruz casino cruise line six years ago in Florida. Abramoff pleaded guilty in Washington to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials. He is awaiting sentencing in the influence peddling case and is continuing his cooperation with government investigators.

DOJ_NMG_0114916

Just before his surrender to a federal prison in Cumberland, MD in November, Abramoff sent friends an e-mail calling the political scandal, "this nightmare," and predicting things were about to get worse.

"This nightmare has gone on for almost three years so far and I expect we are not even half way through," Abramoff wrote.

Former congressman Bob Ney is scheduled to be sentenced later this month. The Justice Department has recommended 27 months of imprisonment.

Judge Rejects Media Request (NSDY/AP)

By Associated Press, January 9, 2007, 4:28 Pm Est

Long Island Newsday, January 10, 2007

News organizations had asked that recordings of testimony and arguments be released for broadcast. U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton denied the request, saying the only recording of court proceedings is done by the court stenographer to help ensure an accurate transcript.

"This recording, however, is produced by the court reporter's personal equipment and is not the official record of the proceedings," Walton said. "It is therefore not available to the public."

The Supreme Court releases audio recordings of arguments in major cases, and lower federal courts have started to follow the Supreme Court's lead, lawyers for the news organizations said in court documents.

Broadcasting court proceedings -- along with commentary and analysis -- could prejudice jurors and lead to an unfair trial, Walton said.

The trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby is to begin Jan. 16. He is accused of perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI about his conversations with journalists regarding CIA officer Valerie Plame.

Cheney is expected to testify for his former aide, and other witnesses are expected to include NBC Washington bureau chief Tim Russert.

The organizations that filed the request are ABC, The Associated Press, Bloomberg News, CNN, CBS, Dow Jones, E.W. Scripps, the Hearst Corp., the Los Angeles Times, the McClatchey Co., NBC, National Public Radio, USA Today, The Washington Post, the American Society of Newspaper Editors, the Newspaper Association of America, the Radio-Television News Directors Association, the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press and the Society of Professional Journalists.

Leak Probes Stymied, FBI Memos Show (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, January 10, 2007

A lack of cooperation from one or more intelligence agencies led the FBI to abandon several recent criminal investigations into leaks of classified information to the press, records obtained by The New York Sun indicate.

In January 2005, a top FBI official asked the Justice Department to close three pending leak inquiries because the "victim agency" repeatedly refused to assist the probes. The FBI's contact at the agency "has been uncooperative with the investigating field office and on numerous occasions failed to return phone calls or provide the case agent with requested documents pertinent to the investigation," the memo said, adding that the agency "cancelled personnel interviews, security briefings and meetings at the last minute and failed to reschedule for another time."

"None of the cases can proceed without the cooperation of the substantive unit at the victim agency, therefore the FBI considers all logical leads covered," the FBI official wrote. Within days or weeks, the cases were closed.

The memo, which was among more than 300 pages of leak investigation files released to the Sun this week under the Freedom of Information Act, was heavily redacted by the FBI, which removed the name of the writer, the identity of the intelligence agency involved, and nearly all details about the alleged leaks.

The documents provide a rare window into the Bush administration's effort to combat leaks of classified information that the administration has said are damaging national security in wartime. "At some point in time, it would be helpful if we can find somebody inside our government who is leaking materials, clearly against the law, that they be held to account," the president said at a press conference last month. "Perhaps the best way to make sure people don't leak classified documents is that there be a consequence for doing so."

However the records suggest that reticence on the part of intelligence agencies sometimes contributes to the futility of leak probes, and that, at least when it comes to leak investigations, the much-vaunted full cooperation between the FBI and other intelligence agencies after September 11 has yet to come to fruition. "It turns out you never can find the leaker," Mr. Bush lamented.

In an exchange of e-mails in September 2005, FBI agents handling a leak investigation codenamed "May Apple," complained about difficulties in getting basic information about who saw classified documents key to the case. A meeting was planned with agency lawyers to discuss requests that were pending for a year. "So close it if they stonewall him tomorrow and/or we learn the distribution list is too great, right? I bet the latter will at least point us to closing even if they are totally cooperative," one agent wrote.

A few weeks later, the head of the FBI's leak-sleuthing section, Michael Donner, wrote to the Justice Department's counterespionage chief, John Dion, asking to close the probe. The FBI's Washington field office "concluded that the investigation had languished due to repeated requests for information…that have not been fulfilled in a timely manner," Mr. Donner wrote. "Due to noncompliance from the victim agency and wide dissemination of the classified information, the FBI was unable to determine the source of the leak." In all of the released records, the FBI deleted the name of the agency or agencies about which the investigators complained. However, a former Justice Department official said the vast majority of leak probes originate at the CIA. In the "May Apple" case, references in the files to top-secret cables and to an Office of General Counsel also point to Langley, as the government's other main user of cables, the State Department, does not have a general counsel's post.

A CIA spokeswoman, Michele Neff, flatly denied that her agency has resisted the FBI's efforts to hunt down leakers. "That's simply not the case," she said yesterday. "Why would we not want to get to the bottom of the leaks? The Office of General Counsel works closely with the Department of Justice on investigations regarding unauthorized disclosures."

Ms. Neff pointed to a November interview in which the current CIA director, General Michael Hayden, said recent leaking has caused serious harm to his agency's effectiveness and to individuals. "When that takes place our ability to protect both the security and the freedom of the nation is reduced," General Hayden told WTOP radio. "I can say as a matter of first principle that the unauthorized disclosure of classified information has actually led to the deaths of individuals."

A Justice Department spokesman, Dean Boyd, said it is uncommon for leak investigators to encounter resistance from their counterparts in the intelligence community. "Generally, we feel we receive excellent cooperation from the intelligence agencies and other victimized agencies in leak investigations," he said.

Ms. Neff and Mr. Boyd said they could not comment on specific cases, such as the ones where the agents reported a lack of cooperation. Mr. Dion, the Justice Department official who received the memos detailing the difficulties, and the current head of the CIA's Office of General Counsel, John Rizzo, declined requests to be interviewed for this article.

Mr. Donner, the FBI official who oversaw some of the probes described in the memos, retired last year. In an interview yesterday, he also declined to discuss specific cases, but acknowledged some instances where agencies were not enthusiastic about helping the FBI. "They know if they do not give us more information or refuse to, the case will not push forward. They'd rather have it go away or have it dropped," the former agent said. Many of the leak cases are initiated by the CIA, which sends the Justice Department a standard, 11-item questionnaire. Asked why an agency would refer a leak for investigation and then decline to provide necessary information, Mr. Donner said, "They have a disclosure potentially of a violation of federal law. They're obliged to provide it or refer it to the FBI." He said resistance may sometimes be because of legitimate concerns about further dissemination of sensitive data.

According to the records, the main reason for dropping leak investigations is that the classified information in question was so widely distributed that it is difficult to focus in on suspects. Mr. Donner said the current drive to share intelligence information made his job even harder. "I'm an old-school guy. A lot of people don't 'need-to-know,'" he said.

Mr. Donner, who helped crack some high-profile spy cases, such as that of Aldrich Ames, said the leak chasing was frustrating. "I wish we had better success in this area," he said. "This stuff is a wilderness of mirrors."

The friction apparent in the records obtained by the Sun calls into question assurances by senior government officials that law enforcement and the intelligence community are working hand-inglove to ferret out leaks. In an unusual op-ed piece published in the New York Times in February 2006, the-then director of the CIA, Porter Goss, decried illegal leaks and promised that close coordination to eradicate them was underway. The Justice Department "is committed to working with us to investigate these cases aggressively," Mr. Goss wrote. "In addition, I have instituted measures within the agency to further safeguard the integrity of classified data."

Mr. Goss took over in September 2004, months before the FBI's moves to abandon the probes. However, it is unclear how much control he was able to establish over the agency. The former congressman and his staff clashed repeatedly with veteran CIA officials, some of whom quit. A top aide to Mr. Goss, Patrick Murray, who once oversaw an anti-leak task force for the Justice Department, reportedly crusaded against leaks at Langley. In May 2006, Mr. Goss abruptly resigned, offering no public reason for his departure. A former prosecutor who has accused career CIA officials of waging a leak campaign to undermine President Bush, Joseph diGenova, said yesterday that he suspected the resistance to the investigations was part of that effort. He also questioned why the leak cases were dropped.

"Stopping a leak investigation, assuming it's a serious leak, just because the victim agency won't cooperate is the most absurd thing I've ever heard in my life," Mr. diGenova said. "A grand jury subpoena should issue….It seems to me there should be some sort of Congressional investigation of those instances."

The disclosed records also suggest that many investigations into leaks of top-secret data are abandoned without pursuing some obvious, if intrusive, investigative techniques, such as seeking testimony or phone records from members of the press. Other components of the Justice Department have recently used those tactics in less sensitive cases, such as leaks about planned federal raids of Islamic charities and about a grand jury investigating steroid use in baseball.

"There is a stunning lack of balance in the way all these cases are approached," Mr. diGenova said. The FBI files were released in response to a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit brought in July by this reporter. In November, a federal judge in San Francisco, citing the intense public interest in leak investigations, ordered the government to answer the requests within 30 days. The judge, Maxine Chesney, recently extended the deadline to April for some of the agencies involved.

Last month, the FBI told Judge Chesney that 22 of 94 files believed to relate to recent press leaks were missing with no indication of who had removed them.

Federal Prosecutor To Help Israeli Investigation (MR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), January 10, 2007

A federal judge in Mobile last week appointed Assistant U.S. Attorney George May to assist the Israeli government with a criminal investigation that touches southern Alabama.

As a commissioner of the court, May will gather information under a treaty between the United States and Israel that commits law enforcement officials to helping their counterparts when investigations cross international borders.

Chief U.S. District Judge Ginny Granade's order empowers May to collect documents and subpoena witnesses. He will certify and submit the evidence he gathers to the U.S. Department of Justice's Office of International Affairs.

The judge's order states only that it was prompted by a request by Israel. May, the anti-terrorism coordinator at the U.S. attorney's office in Mobile, said the probe relates to allegations involving bogus diplomas.

He said the Alabama connection is a small piece of a much larger investigation that also involves other parts of the country. Citing the beginning stages of the investigation, he declined to discuss the case in detail. He said the Israeli government has sought help from federal prosecutors in other districts.

May said he does not believe the targets of the probe live in Alabama.

The United States has signed 57 mutual legal assistance treaties, although not all have been ratified by the Senate, according to a the Justice Department.

Bryan Sierra, a spokesman for the department, said most of the pacts are bilateral agreements with other countries, but others involve international organizations. For instance, the United States has a treaty with the Organization of American States, a collection of 35 countries in the Western Hemisphere, he said.

Sierra said the Justice Department does not keep statistics on the number of requests made by foreign governments, and he added that he could not even estimate how frequently a treaty is invoked.

May said it is quite unusual for smaller districts, such as southern Alabama, to be involved. He said in larger districts with a more cosmopolitan flavor, such as New York, it's probably far more common.

May said the mechanics of the investigation -- at least his part of it -- will work much like an attorney taking depositions in a civil case. He will have the power to subpoena witnesses, and a court reporter will be present during questioning to make transcripts.

May said he does not expect his duties to take long -- a couple of months at most. He said he is unsure exactly what rules apply if witnesses refuse to cooperate. He said he imagines they could be held in contempt of court.

Of course, if a witness were to invoke his rights on the Fifth Amendment to remain silent, he presumably would enjoy the same rights as any other witness in a U.S. court proceeding.

"That could be a mixed issue," he said.

May said this is the first time he has been asked to assist a foreign government but added that he is looking forward to the challenge.

"It'll be interesting. It will be something a little bit different," he said. "We have a treaty with Israel, and I'm glad to help out. And I'm sure they'd do the same for us."

Former Brick Twp. Mayor Admits Taking Bribes (NSL)

By Guy Sterling And Maryann Spoto, Star-Ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger, January 10, 2007

Faces prison, fine for accepting cash from developer in exchange for project approval

A mayor who presided over a period of substantial growth in Brick Township yesterday ad mitted taking more than $5,000 in bribes in exchange for helping a developer gain approval for a number of unspecified projects.

Joseph C. Scarpelli, 67, told a federal judge he accepted the bribes over five years, ending in late 2003, and that one was $500 in cash slipped to him in Ocean County in April of that year. The developer was not named, and no other de tails were supplied.

"Did you accept these cash payments from the developer knowing that you were not due the money in your capacity as mayor?" U.S. District Judge Susan Wigenton asked Scarpelli.

"Yes," he replied without elaboration at the hearing in Newark.

Scarpelli also acknowledged that, as mayor, he interacted with other local officials, including members of the township council, planning board and board of adjustment, and enjoyed authority over budget appropriations and contract awards.

His plea to a single count of "extortion under the color of official right" came a month after he left his mayor's post in the Ocean County township after 12 years, and amid rumors he'd been caught up in a lengthy federal investiga tion of public officials at the Shore.

Scarpelli faces a maximum sen tence of 20 years in prison, but Marc Larkins, the assistant U.S. at torney assigned to the case, said the actual term will fall somewhere between 24 and 30 months under federal sentencing guidelines.

The Brick resident also could be fined $250,000 at his scheduled sen tencing May 29. Until then, he will remain free on a $50,000 unsecured appearance bond. The count against Scarpelli was contained in a pre-indictment accusation known as an information.

Court papers provided few de tails about the bribes, and law enforcement agents were equally quiet after court yesterday.

PROBE CONTINUES In addition to declining to say anything about the developer, projects or approvals involved in the corruption scheme, they also would not say how much Scarpelli had received in total or how many illegal payments there had been.

Judge Orders O'Grady To Begin Sentence Jan. 22 (HOLMIND)

Holmdel (NJ) Independent, January 10, 2007

NEWARK - Former Middletown Committeeman Raymond O'Grady lost his appeal on Friday and is now scheduled to begin his 43-month jail sentence Jan. 22.

O'Grady was convicted in June on five corruption-related charges as part of the FBI's Operation Bid Rig investigation. The one-time director of the Monmouth County Central Motor Pool was found guilty of accepting at least $8,000 in cash bribes in exchange for official favors through his position in county government.

"The judge set a surrender date because of the Third Circuit Court decision," said Michael Drewniak, spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Newark.

O'Grady's attorney, Kevin Roe, promised an appeal after his client's October conviction. Roe argued that O'Grady's trial was unfair because of the suicide attempt of the FBI's star witness after only one day on the stand. Anthony Palughi, a former friend of O'Grady's, wore a wire for the FBI in order to try to avoid jail time of his own, Palughi said during the trial.

"Without much being heard, a single judge granted it," Drewniak said on Monday, noting appeals are often heard in this way. "Now the Third Circuit Court has denied his motion pending his appeal."

Tape Shows Williams Taking Cash (MCA)

By Lawrence Buser

Memphis Commercial Appeal, January 10, 2007

Was $1,500 payment a bribe or only a business dividend?

A federal court jury Tuesday watched a secretly recorded videotape showing a former Shelby County official accepting $1,500 in cash from an informant that authorities say was a bribe.

The money -- 15 $100 bills -- was supplied by the FBI, as was the tiny camera hidden in a briefcase.

Defendant Calvin Williams, the county commission's former top aide, says he believed the payment was a legitimate business dividend due him from his associate, Tim Willis.

The tape was made on April 24, 2003, at the Mud Island residence of the FBI informant, Willis, who was helping authorities document an alleged payoff he said Williams wanted for helping obtain a county grant for a community development project.

Throughout that tape and two others made that month, Williams repeatedly tells Willis in expletive-filled conversations that half of the money will be given to then-County Commissioner Dr. Cleo Kirk, who was head of the commission's budget commission.

"I'm going to go ahead and drop his cheese off," said Williams, who discourages Willis from accompanying him. "You'll spook him (Kirk) quick."

On another recorded conversation, Williams tells Willis: "You know what I'm going to do with that $1,500? I'm going to take everybody out for drinks."

Kirk, who has been subpoenaed as a witness by both the prosecution and the defense, was seated outside the courtroom throughout most of the day. He declined to talk to reporters.

Williams is accused of using -- or claiming to use -- his influence with the County Commission to secure a $100,000 county grant for the Glenview Neighborhood Development Partners Inc. to provide low-interest loans for home improvements.

Federal prosecutor Tim DiScenza told jurors it is irrelevant whether Kirk knew about or accepted a bribe.

"Calvin Williams saw (the Glenview grant request) as an opportunity to get some money for himself because of his official position," DiScenza said in his opening statement. "This trial will be about his demand and his attempt to utilize that position to gain some money for himself."

His attorney, federal public defender Doris Randle-Holt, said Willis was a partner with Williams in several businesses and that the $1,500 represented Williams' 30 percent share of a $5,000 media services contract Willis had with Glenview to help win the grant.

Willis testified, however, that they shared office space in the 100 North Main Building, but that their business enterprises were completely separate.

Randle-Holt noted that Willis was paid $6,000 a month by the FBI for more than two years for his cooperation and that he had never been charged for admittedly submitting false invoices in 2001 when he had a consulting contact at Juvenile Court.

"You will come in here and say anything today to stay out of jail, won't you?" said Randle-Holt.

"No," replied Willis, who was less animated and chipper than he was on the stand in last summer's bribery trial of former state senator Roscoe Dixon.

The case, which is part of the FBI's broader Tennessee Waltz undercover public corruption investigation, is being tried before U.S. Dist. Court Judge Samuel H. Mays Jr. Testimony resumes this morning.

Roscoe Dixon's Handwritten Plea For Release Denied (WMC)

WMC-TV, January 10, 2007

A handwritten plea from Roscoe Dixon, sent in December from his cell at the Oakdale Correctional Center in Louisiana, proved fruitless. Federal Magistrate Jon McCalla denied Dixon's request to be released pending his appeal of his federal bribery trial.

In his letter, Dixon - who was sentenced to five years behind bars - describes overcrowding conditions which have, according to his letter, left him in solitary confinement until space becomes available. He has "to eat the same food as those who are in 'the hole,'" he wrote.

UC Riverside Official Is Accused Of Bribery (LAT)

By Sara Lin, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

FBI says Theodore Chiu solicited payments from an Irvine contractor constructing a building on campus.

Federal agents arrested a UC Riverside administrator Tuesday on suspicion of bribing a general contractor in charge of building the school's new psychology building, authorities said.

Theodore Chiu, 53, of Riverside is accused of soliciting a $50,000 bribe from Irvine contractor FTR International Inc. last Halloween.

Chiu allegedly asked for the payment when the company's president, Nizar Katbi, raised concerns about the $35-million project, including Chiu's choice of a subcontractor, according to an FBI affidavit filed in federal court.

In exchange for the alleged bribe, Chiu agreed to sign a change order that would modify the university's original agreement with the company, the affidavit said.

As an associate director in UC Riverside's Office of Design and Construction, Chiu managed several construction projects.

Katbi agreed to the proposal but told federal agents before giving Chiu his first payment. Katbi cooperated with investigators by recording his meetings and conversations with Chiu, said Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles.

DOJ_NMG_0114921

During a series of meetings, Chiu allegedly received $18,000 in bribes from Katbi, the affidavit said.

University officials said they weren't aware of the investigation until Chiu's arrest Tuesday morning.

Kris Lovekin, the university's director of media relations, said she didn't know of any problems university officials had with Chiu during his 19 years in the school's design office. His salary is $108,000 a year.

Construction of the school's psychology building began in April and is scheduled for completion in June 2008.

At a November meeting between Katbi and Chiu, which federal investigators recorded, the contractor offered to write Chiu a check. But Chiu demanded cash because a check would be traceable. If Katbi didn't pay, Chiu said, he would make life difficult for the contractor and his company, according to the affidavit.

Chiu also told Katbi that he didn't like to handle more than one deal at a time, which Katbi took to mean Chiu might be soliciting bribes from other general contractors on UC Riverside projects, documents show.

Chiu initially demanded the bribe in two installments — $20,000 before Thanksgiving and $30,000 before Christmas. But when Katbi said he was having trouble getting the money, Chiu agreed to accept smaller increments of $7,000. When Katbi was slow paying in December, Chiu withheld his authorization of funds that Katbi needed to pay subcontractors. After Katbi delivered a bribe, the funds were released, the affidavit said.

Chiu is expected to appear at 11 a.m. today for a bail hearing in U.S. District Court in Santa Ana. If convicted, Chiu faces a possible sentence of 10 years in federal prison.

Bklyn Judge Nixes Fed Trial Bid By FBI Agent Accused Of Mob Ties (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, January 10, 2007

NEW YORK (AP) _ A former FBI agent accused of helping a ruthless mobster plot gangland slayings in Brooklyn more than a decade ago won't go to trial in federal court, a judge ruled Tuesday.

Attorneys for R. Lindley DeVecchio had argued his case belonged in federal court because there _ unlike in state court _ they would be allowed to argue that he was immune from criminal charges arising from his duties as a federal agent.

The court "concludes that removal is not warranted because it lacks subject-matter jurisdiction," U.S. District Judge Frederic Block wrote in a decision issued in federal court in Brooklyn.

The Brooklyn district attorney's office had fought to keep the case in state court after charging DeVecchio last year with four counts of murder in what it billed as one of the worst law enforcement corruption cases in U.S. history.

DeVecchio, 65, pleaded not guilty to charges he collected weekly bribes in exchange for feeding classified information to an informant _ Colombo crime family captain Gregory Scarpa Sr. _ during a bloody civil war within the family during the 1980s and '90s. Prosecutors say the tips helped Scarpa knock off rivals and suspected cooperators, including a girlfriend of the Colombo consigliere.

DeVecchio remains free on $1 million bond. If convicted, he could face up to 25 years to life in prison.

Scarpa was convicted of murder and racketeering and died in prison.

Brooklyn: Case Against Ex-F.B.I. Agent Can Proceed (NYT)

By Michael Brick

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

A retired F.B.I. supervisor accused of aiding in Mafia murders is not immune from prosecution in state court, a Federal District Court judge ruled yesterday. The retired agent, R. Lindley DeVecchio, 66, was charged with four counts of murder last March in State Supreme Court. Prosecutors say Mr. DeVecchio, who was responsible for managing confidential informants, played a role in four killings between 1984 and 1992 by giving information to the Colombo crime family. In April, Mr. DeVecchio's lawyers sought to remove the case to federal court, arguing that the evidence was subject to federal grants of immunity and that his defense was based on federal law. But Judge Frederic Block ruled that Mr. DeVecchio had not presented a valid argument.

SAN FRANCISCO Gang Case Defense Can't Get Witness List (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, January 10, 2007

Federal prosecutors in the death penalty trial of alleged members of a violent San Francisco gang don't have to give defense lawyers police reports that identify witnesses before the trial, a federal appeals court ruled Monday.

The 2-1 decision by the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco overturned a ruling last year by the trial judge, who ordered prosecutors to release police reports on the witnesses, including their identities. U.S. District Judge William Alsup had also said prosecutors would be prohibited from calling witnesses whose names they refused to provide to the defense.

Prosecutors say they fear for the witnesses' safety if they are identified, citing the killing in May of a witness who had testified in another San Francisco murder case. Defense lawyers and Alsup said prospective witnesses would be protected by orders prohibiting the defense from revealing the information to outsiders.

A federal grand jury issued racketeering indictments in October 2005 against 12 alleged members of the Down Below Gang, which authorities say has terrorized the Sunnydale public housing complex in Visitacion Valley since the late 1990s. Prosecutors say the defendants dealt drugs, toted guns and murdered seven people, including a 7-week-old baby.

Eight defendants pleaded guilty last month to racketeering and conspiracy charges that carry prison sentences of up to 23 years. Of the remaining defendants, one is a fugitive and has not been publicly identified. The others are Emile Fort and Edgar Diaz, who could both be sentenced to death if convicted, and Terrell Jackson, whose case is still being evaluated by the U.S. Justice Department for possible death penalty charges. Their trial is scheduled to start in September.

Prosecutors have deleted witnesses' names from San Francisco police reports supplied to the defense, and said they would not identify any witnesses until the Friday before they testified. Alsup had ruled that prosecutors were seeking an unfair advantage.

But the appeals court majority, led by Judge Susan Graber, said the police reports were exempt from disclosure under a federal rule that allows prosecutors to withhold evidence gathered by government agents.

Defense lawyer Michael Satris said the ruling "leaves us severely hampered in our ability to prepare for the case."

Prosecutors Expect Grand Jury To Reach Duncan Decision Soon (AP)

By Shannon Dininny, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 10, 2007

BOISE, Idaho -- A decision on whether to indict convicted murderer Joseph Duncan III on federal charges for kidnapping two north Idaho children and slaying one of them could come in the next few weeks, the U.S. attorney's office said Tuesday.

In the meantime, the federal agency that secures prisoners said it would recommend that the trial be held in Boise, rather than Coeur d'Alene, if a grand jury indicts Duncan.

Duncan, 43, drew national attention in 2005 with the kidnapping of then 8-year-old Shasta Groene and her 9-year-old brother, Dylan.

A Tacoma, Wash., native, Duncan had been living in Fargo, N.D., and was on the run from a child molestation charge in Minnesota when he drove past the Groene home on Interstate 90 east of Coeur d'Alene and spotted the children playing outside. Duncan stalked the family for several days and, on May 16, entered the home, bludgeoning the children's mother, Brenda Groene; her fiance, Mark McKenzie and Groene's 13-year-old son, Slade.

According to court documents, Duncan kidnapped Shasta and Dylan, traveling into the mountains near St. Regis, Mont., where he sexually abused them for seven weeks before killing Dylan.

Shasta was rescued when she and Duncan walked into a restaurant in Coeur d'Alene early on the morning of July 2, 2005.

Duncan pleaded guilty in state court last year to three counts of first-degree murder and three counts of first-degree kidnapping for the murders at the Groene home. A judge sentenced him to life in prison without parole on the kidnapping charges.

However, the sentence on the murder counts will be deferred while the federal government pursues its case against Duncan for the kidnappings and murder across state lines.

Charges have not been filed in that case yet. Federal prosecutors expect a grand jury to hear the case in the next few weeks, said Jean McNeil, spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Boise.

Duncan is being housed at the Idaho Maximum Security Institution south of Boise.

Kevin Platts, chief deputy for the U.S. Marshals Service, said his agency would recommend that a trial be held in Boise if the grand jury indicts Duncan.

A number of issues play a role in that decision: Coeur d'Alene lacks a federal judge, and the courthouse in northern Idaho is more than 80 years old and lacks space and security needed for such a case, Platts said.

In addition, the costs to fly Duncan between the prison near Boise to Coeur d'Alene could reach $30,000 per day during a trial there, since he and his guards would have to return to the maximum security prison each night.

"We don't want to do that. We're all taxpayers," Platts said from his office in Boise. "The state has Duncan here. Duncan belongs to them, and we don't like taking them too far from the state."

The federal government has said it intends to seek the death penalty.

Duncan is also considered the prime suspect in the slayings of two children near Seattle and one in Southern California in the 1990s.

L.A. Shifts Tactics Against Gangs (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy And Richard Winton

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

Los Angeles' top law enforcement officials have agreed on a new attack on gang violence, one that focuses more enforcement on smaller neighborhood gangs and uses a new legal tool tried last year on skid row.

The effort comes as L.A. officials are trying to quell a 14% increase in gang-related crime during the last year, marked by several high-profile incidents of race-motivated violence.

LAPD Chief William J. Bratton met this week with Dist. Atty. Steve Cooley and representatives of City Atty. Rocky Delgadillo to begin formulating the plan.

Bratton announced Tuesday that his department is developing a "Top 10" list of gangs to target based on a complex formula — and then the three agencies will devote additional officers and attorneys specifically to those gangs.

The campaign will include targeting the leaders and headquarters of the worst gangs.

Police have identified 720 street gangs in Los Angeles, with 39,315 members. But officials said a small number of them are causing a disproportionate amount of crime in the hardest-hit neighborhoods.

The new strategy is something of a shift for law enforcement officials, who have until now focused much attention on larger gangs that run drug rings and other criminal enterprises.

Bratton told the Police Commission that his office will identify "the most prolific gangs in the city, the top 10, if you will.

"We will be using a matrix that encompasses violent crime committed by the gangs, interracial crime, assaults on police officers," Bratton said. "That's how we will winnow the hundreds of gangs in the city down to those that we will focus most of our attention on."

Deputy Police Chief Charlie Beck, the commanding officer of the South Bureau, said the matrix will give extra weight to certain kinds of activity, such as race-based attacks.

As a result, the 204th Street gang in the Harbor Gateway will probably make the top 10 list even though it has committed fewer crimes than much larger gangs, Beck said.

Police have accused members of that Latino gang of the racially motivated killing of a 14-year-old African American girl.

The LAPD has already deployed an extra 18 officers to the neighborhood, and Beck said the number could double once 204th Street is included in the top 10 list.

Another gang likely to be considered for the list is Canoga Park Alabama, a relatively small gang that police say is responsible for a disproportionate amount of violence in the Valley, where gang crime was up nearly 40%.

Jeff Isaacs, chief of criminal prosecutions for the city attorney's office, agreed that the new strategies on gangs are going to particularly target areas that haven't been traditional gang strongholds: Harbor Gateway and parts of the San Fernando Valley where gang crime climbed at a higher rate than in the more infamous gang territories.

"The San Fernando Valley has seen a real spike in gang crime," Cooley said.

Prosecutors also plan to use "stay-away orders" against gang leaders. Such orders are included in the terms of a suspect's probation and forbid them from being in a certain neighborhood. Officials hope these orders will be more effective than traditional gang injunctions, which prohibit gang members from congregating.

The stay-away orders can be easier to enforce, because they are a condition of probation and a violation can immediately put the offender back in jail. And, under a new early-release policy set to be implemented soon, the Los Angeles County sheriff will no longer hold inmates sentenced to County Jail under gang injunctions for their entire sentences.

In addition to prosecutors targeting leaders of the selected gangs with court orders, Delgadillo said his office plans to file nuisance abatement lawsuits to target gang headquarters.

"We are going to go after the top 10 hangouts in the city of Los Angeles," he said. "Gangs — like other enterprises — need a place to plan."

He said his office successfully used this tactic on an apartment complex at 69th and Main streets, which he said was a home to the East Coast Crips gang.

The situation in Harbor Gateway may end up being a model for the new effort.

Bratton said he has put Beck in charge of a working group to address the problems in the Harbor Gateway area, where some African American residents said Latino gangs do not allow them onto certain streets.

DOJ_NMG_0114924

He said the new strategy will include the use of gang injunctions ordering gang members not to loiter or congregate in the area, as well as stay-away orders aimed at gang leaders who have been convicted of crimes.

"There are no injunctions in that area," Beck said.

Cooley said he's ready to seek the stay-away orders.

African American community activist Morris Griffin attended the Police Commission meeting Tuesday to call for action to stop the racial violence, including the installation of surveillance cameras on street corners where crime is occurring.

"I'm a strong advocate for cameras on the streets, to take back our streets, because of this terrorist act with people chasing our people out of the neighborhood, when you talk about the black and the brown," Griffin told the panel.

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Upholds Religion In Veterans' Care (LAT/AP)

By Ryan J. Foley, Associated Press Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

The Department of Veterans Affairs' increasing use of religion in treating ailing veterans does not violate the separation of church and state, a federal judge has ruled.

U.S. District Judge John Shabaz dismissed a lawsuit by the Madison-based Freedom From Religion Foundation and defended the agency's practices in his decision Monday, saying religion can help patients heal and is legal when done on a voluntary basis.

The foundation, a group of atheists and agnostics which has challenged the Bush administration's mix of government and religion, said it was the first time a judge upheld the constitutionality of the VA's use of religion in treating millions of veterans. The ruling averts a trial that was scheduled to begin later this month.

The group's president, Annie Laurie Gaylor, said Tuesday it would appeal the ruling.

"I think the public will be startled to learn that if you're a VA patient and you want a referral to the eye doctor, you have to have a spiritual assessment in order to do that," Gaylor said.

The lawsuit challenged the agency's practice of giving most patients spiritual assessments that ask questions about faith, such as how often they attend church and how important religion is in their lives. Agency officials say the assessments help them determine patients' needs.

The suit also targeted VA drug and alcohol treatment programs that incorporate religion, the integration of its chaplain program into patient care and the expansion of chaplain services for outpatient veterans instead of just those at VA hospitals.

The veterans' agency, which treated 5.3 million people at its facilities in 2005, acknowledged it believes spirituality should be integrated into care but said it allows patients to decide whether that involves religion.

Shabaz said the VA's programs do integrate religion and spirituality but they are legal because they are voluntary and serve valid secular purposes such as giving patients spirituality services.

"The choice to receive spiritual or pastoral care, the choice to complete a spiritual assessment, and the choice to participate in a religious or spiritually based treatment program always remain the private choice of the veteran," he wrote. "Accordingly, there is no evidence of governmental indoctrination of religion."

Jean Lin, a U.S. Department of Justice lawyer who represented the veterans' officials, declined comment. DOJ spokesman Charles Miller said the opinion speaks for itself.

Jury Reaches No Decision In Truck-deaths Trial (AP)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press

AP, January 10, 2007

Jurors deliberated today without deciding whether to impose a death sentence for the truck driver in the nation's deadliest human smuggling attempt, in which 19 illegal immigrants who were locked in a sweltering trailer for hours eventually died from dehydration, overheating and suffocation.

The six men and six women on the jury deliberated for about six hours today. They were to resume Wednesday.

Jurors must decide whether to sentence Tyrone Williams to death or life in prison without parole, or to let the judge issue a sentence ranging from no incarceration time to life in prison without parole.

DOJ_NMG_0114925

Williams was convicted last month on 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting immigrants, including 20 counts that were death-penalty eligible.

During the 2003 smuggling attempt, more than 70 immigrants were packed inside Williams' trailer, with no air conditioning.

They were heading from South Texas to Houston when the heat became unbearable and the immigrants began to panic, tearing holes in the trailer doors with their hands in order to breathe. Williams eventually opened the trailer doors and abandoned the container near Victoria, about 100 miles southwest of Houston.

Defense attorney Craig Washington told jurors Williams never intended for the immigrants to die. Washington said it was unfair that Williams was the only defendant in the case who is facing the death penalty when others were equally responsible.

Other major defendants have been sentenced to terms ranging from more than 12 years to more than 23 years in prison. The alleged leader of the smuggling ring was sentenced to more than 17 years.

"The punishment should fit the crime the person committed," Washington said.

Williams' sister, Coretta Williams, told reporters today after jurors finished deliberating for the day that her brother is being made the scapegoat for the immigrants' deaths.

"He's really the person who is taking the fall for everything," she said.

But Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Rodriguez told jurors Williams had no compassion and he deserves to die because he alone could have freed them but chose not to open the trailer's doors.

"Every minute he kept those doors closed knowing those people wanted out was an act of violence against those people," he said.

During the retrial's punishment phase, Williams' relatives testified, telling jurors he was a kind person and asking them to spare his life. Relatives of the 19 victims also testified, asking for justice but not specifying whether that meant a death sentence.

Williams, 35, a Jamaican citizen who lived in Schenectady, N.Y., is the only one of 14 people charged facing the death penalty. In 2005, a jury convicted Williams on 38 transporting counts, but he avoided a death sentence because the jury couldn't agree on his role in the smuggling attempt. The jury deadlocked on the 20 other counts.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejected the verdict, saying the jury failed to specify his role in the crime.

Ruling Goes Against Chastang (MR)

By Dan Murtaugh, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), January 9, 2007

Justice Department says Riley appointment 'appears to diminish' minority voters' choice

The U.S. Department of Justice on Monday objected to Gov. Bob Riley's appointment of Juan Chastang to the Mobile County Commission, saying it "appears to diminish the opportunity of minority voters to elect a representative of their choice."

The decision is the latest step in a long legal battle designed to oust Chastang, a black Republican, from representing District 1, a majority-black district that has historically elected Democrats.

Riley appointed Chastang to replace Sam Jones on the commission after Jones was elected mayor of Mobile in October 2005.

Cecil Gardner, the attorney who filed the lawsuit against Chastang's appointment, said he will file a motion today asking that a panel of federal judges in Montgomery declare Chastang's seat vacant and order a special election to fill it.

The state can still appeal the Justice Department decision to the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia or ask the U.S. attorney general to reconsider the objection, according to the ruling.

Alabama Attorney General Troy King, whose office has represented the state in the suit, said late Monday that he could not comment because he had not received the Justice Department's letter.

Gardner said that appealing such a ruling would be a fruitless endeavor. "Almost all appeals are rejected," he said. "I do not think this will be delayed much longer."

But Chastang said the ruling is not the end of the line for him. "There's nothing in there that says I have to vacate this seat," he said. "If the other side seeks further opinions on this matter, then we'll act appropriately at that time."

Chastang also criticized the Justice Department's decision.

"The ruling is unfair," he said. "It doesn't take into account that my racial makeup is the same as the racial makeup in the district."

Shortly after Chastang's appointment, three Mobile County Democrats -- Reps. Yvonne Kennedy, James Buskey and Bill Clark -- filed a federal lawsuit claiming that Riley failed to follow a provision of the Voting Rights Act that requires the Justice Department to review in advance any changes to Alabama election practices.

In 1985, the Alabama Legislature passed a law requiring a special election to fill any Mobile County Commission vacancy with more than a year remaining in the term. The Justice Department approved that change to Alabama's electoral process.

DOJ_NMG_0114926

The Alabama Supreme Court ruled the 1985 law unconstitutional in 1988 because it conflicted with a state law that gave the governor the power to make such appointments.

But the state never received Justice Department approval to go back to gubernatorial appointments, and therefore the appointment violated the Voting Rights Act, a panel of three federal judges ruled in August. The judges forced the state to ask for clearance from the Justice Department.

The Justice Department's objection , written by Assistant U.S. Attorney General Wan J. Kim, states that District 1, which includes downtown Mobile, Prichard and north Mobile County, is 63 percent black.

Riley was elected by a statewide constituency whose racial makeup differs from District 1. Therefore Riley's appointment diminishes minority voting rights, according to the ruling.

"The method of selection for vacancies on the Mobile County Commission by gubernatorial appointment will continue to be legally unenforceable as a matter of federal law," the ruling states.

Chastang said that if his seat is vacated, he will run in the special election to regain it.

County Commissioner Finds Self Embroiled In Controversy (WPMI)

WPMI-TV, NBC 15, Mobile, AL, January 10, 2007

January 9 -- Juan Chastang is currently a Mobile County Commissioner, however, he soon could be unemployed. "We're gonna fight this thing to the end," Chastang tells NBC 15's Leeah Brennan.

The fight Chastang is speaking about is over a decision handed down Monday by the US Department of Justice. When Sam Jones became mayor of Mobile, that left his county commission seat open. Instead of a special election being heldto fill the seat, Governor Bob Riley appointed Chastang.

According to the Justice Department, that appointment may have violated the federal Voting Rights Act.

"We predicted quite accurately that the governor would appoint a Republican. That commission district has never voted Republican in the entire history of the county commission," says Cecil Gardner who initially brought the lawsuit over Chastang's appointment a year and a half ago. Tuesday, he filed a motion asking a federal court to order the seat vacated and that a special election be conducted "Representatives of the people ought to be elected by the people and not chosen by executive fiat," Gardner maintains.

But Chastang says the legal fight to get him out of office isn't' about the people. "Partisan politics is what this whole thing is all about right now."

As of right now, all parties in the upcoming legal battle are moving forward. For someone, this fight will have a bitter end.

NBC 15 News attempted to contact Governor Bob Riley's office for his reaction to the decision, however, we have not yet heard from him. It's possible the governor could appeal the Justice Department's ruling.

Meanwhile, Juan Chastang is one of 3 county commissioners in Mobile County. He tells NBC 15 News if a special election is required, he will run for election to the position he currently holds.

Islamic Group Calls For Federal Probe Into Vandalism Of Buildings (AP)

By Jeff Karoub, The Associated Press

AP, January 10, 2007

DETROIT (AP) — An Islamic coalition representing southeast Michigan Sunni groups and centers said Tuesday that the vandalism of Shiite mosques and businesses over the weekend could be hate crimes and called on the federal government to investigate.

Late Saturday night or early Sunday, vandals broke windows of two mosques and five businesses along Warren Avenue owned by Iraqi Shiites, the second largest Islamic sect after the Sunnis.

The owner of a restaurant whose windows were broken said he had received threatening phone calls before the vandalism that referred to his Shiite creed, according to the Islamic Shura Council of Michigan, based in the Detroit suburb of Bloomfield Hills.

Detroit Police Sgt. Eren Stephens Bell said the department is investigating the vandalism and could not confirm if the incidents were hate crimes. She said police will review security tapes to try to identify the vandals.

The FBI said in a statement Tuesday that it has talked to the Council on American-Islamic Relations and leaders of other community groups. If the Detroit police find information that links the vandalism to federal civil-rights violations, the FBI would "pursue it accordingly."

Mouhib Ayas, president of the Islamic Shura Council, said the incidents appear to be a reaction to events in the Middle East, particularly in Iraq and the execution of Saddam Hussein. Iraq's Shiite-controlled government ordered Saddam hanged before sunrise on Eid al-Hadha, or the Islamic Feast of the Sacrifice.

Ayas said a lot of people felt provoked by the timing of the execution late last month and viewed it more an act of revenge than carrying out justice, but he condemned the vandalism as an unfortunate act of a few individuals.

"They definitely do not reflect the feeling, position of the majority of Sunnis in Michigan," he said.

Ayas said he and others plan a meeting this week between area Sunni and Shiite leaders to ease tensions.

Osama Siblani, a spokesman for the Arab American and Chaldean Council of Metropolitan Detroit and publisher of the Arab American News in the neighboring suburb of Dearborn, said he does not know the motivation for the vandalism. But he said it could be a reaction to celebrations on Dearborn's streets Dec. 29 by Iraqi Shiites following Saddam's execution. The celebrations were close to the buildings that were vandalized.

"If it was in one store, I would have assumed it was a personal feud. But because it happened to multiple stores and Iraqi centers, it leads me to probably conclude that it's a dispute between those who believed (the celebration) was not the right thing."

The schism between Sunni and Shiite stems from early days of Islam and arguments over the Prophet Muhammad's successors as caliph, the spiritual and temporal leader of Muslims. The Shiites wanted the caliphate to descend through Ali, Muhammad's son-in-law. The Sunnis no longer have a caliph.

Fight Anti-Arab Bigotry, Gonzalez Told (UPI)

United Press International, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 (UPI) -- Arab American leaders have urged U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez to fight anti-Arab bigotry.

"In response to concerns about the increasing level of negativity openly directed towards Arab and Muslim Americans, leaders from the Arab American Institute and other key Arab American and Muslim American organizations met with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to request that the federal government help quell the recent tide of bigotry," the Washington-based AAI said in a statement Monday.

"AAI and leaders from the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, Muslim Public Affairs Council, Islamic Society of North America and Muslim advocates also sought clarification and action on policies concerning racial profiling, suspension of habeas corpus, oversight of watch lists, and donations to charities in the Middle East," the statement said.

AAI said the delegation "also urged the attorney general to support the termination of the National Security Entry-Exit Registration System or 'special registration,' a program that began as an initiative of the Justice Department."

AAI Chairman George Salem and AAI President James Zogby also requested Gonzalez's office to "provide leadership for the country in helping to reverse this disturbing and increasingly accepted trend of anti-Arab and Muslim bias," the statement said.

"Sadly, the past year has demonstrated how tolerant our national discourse has become of bigotry toward Arab and Muslim Americans," Zogby said. "We call upon the attorney general and the Department of Justice to provide the leadership and unity--building they did in the days following the Sept. 11 attacks on a more consistent basis."

LAPD Board Decides Not To Punish Devin Brown (LAT)

By Matt Lait And Scott Glover

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

A Los Angeles Police Department disciplinary board has secretly decided not to punish the officer who fatally shot 13-year-old Devin Brown two years ago, rejecting an earlier ruling by the civilian Police Commission that the act violated department policy, sources confirmed Tuesday.

Members of an LAPD Board of Rights, meeting behind closed doors on Monday, determined that Officer Steven Garcia was justified in shooting Brown as the youth allegedly tried to back a stolen car into the officer following a brief pursuit.

The shooting sparked outrage in the surrounding South Los Angeles community, with citizens and activists alleging that Garcia overreacted and used excessive force. Last year the city paid $1.5 million to settle a wrongful death lawsuit filed by Brown's family.

Monday's decision, reached by two high-ranking LAPD officials and a civilian representative, effectively negates the earlier finding by the Police Commission that the shooting was "out of policy" and that Garcia should be punished.

It also reflects a dramatic change in the way the LAPD metes out discipline. For decades, the LAPD has heard evidence publicly when serious misconduct is alleged. Last summer, however, the California Supreme Court ruled that police officer personnel documents were not public records. Responding to that ruling — and over the objections of news organizations and civil libertarians — the LAPD moved to close its disciplinary hearings.

As a result, the charges against Garcia were heard in secret, and the rationale for the board's decision is similarly being withheld.

DOJ_NMG_0114928

The Police Commission acts as the civilian oversight body for the LAPD and has the authority to shape policy, but it cannot discipline officers. Its finding in the Brown case — which ran contrary to the recommendation of Police Chief William J. Bratton — was initially hailed by both African American leaders and Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa as a sign that the LAPD, with its long history of officer misconduct cases, now had firm civilian oversight.

John Mack, president of the Police Commission, said Tuesday that he felt as if he and his colleagues on the commission had been undermined.

"I'm very, very disappointed in that finding," said Mack, who was unaware of the ruling before being informed by a reporter. "Our commission felt the facts were clear. It was my expectation that the Board of Rights would see the facts as we saw them and take disciplinary action."

Bratton said he supported the disciplinary panel's conclusion.

"I think that's an appropriate finding," he said. "I'm very comfortable with that."

Asked if the decision undermined his civilian bosses, Bratton replied: "Not at all."

Members of the internal LAPD panel would not explain their rationale for finding in Garcia's favor, citing the Supreme Court ruling that city lawyers have interpreted as giving broad privacy rights to officers involved in disciplinary proceedings.

"I can tell you the board's decision was unanimous and the evidence and testimony to support our finding was compelling," said Capt. Nancy Lauer, a member of the panel. "That is all I feel is prudent to share based on the legal constraints in which we find ourselves."

Capt. Bruce Crosley, who retired from the department in July, but continued to serve as chairman of the disciplinary board, also declined to discuss the case. Ann Reiss Lane, a former police commissioner who served as the civilian member of the LAPD panel, could not be reached for comment.

Bob Baker, president of the Los Angeles Police Protective League, said he had expected Garcia to be exonerated.

"We agree with the Board, who relied on law enforcement expertise and the applicable department standards in deciding that Officer Garcia's actions were in policy on that tragic night," Baker said.

For years, LAPD disciplinary hearings had been open to the public. But late last year, the department changed policy, and prohibited anyone not involved in the case from attending. The department also stopped releasing information about officer discipline that historically had been public.

In November, LAPD officials barred two Times reporters from attending Garcia's disciplinary hearing because of the Supreme Court ruling, which restricted access to law enforcement discipline records in a San Diego case. However, that ruling — in Copley Press Inc. vs. Superior Court of San Diego — did not address whether hearings should be closed.

The Police Commission has also moved to deny public access to police records. Last year, the panel voted to withhold the names of officers involved in shootings and other uses of force, such as baton-strikes, kicks, punches and the use of stun guns. The first case in which the Commission invoked that policy related to Garcia's shooting.

Even though Garcia's case has been cloaked in secrecy, both Bratton and Mack said they wished they could be more open with the public about police conduct and discipline. Both said they feel bound by legal advise given by City Atty. Rocky Delgadillo.

"I like transparency," Bratton said. "In my previous department [in New York City] all reprimands were written and published throughout the department. I'm not in favor of all the limitations that we operate under here, but it is what it is."

The events leading to the shooting of Devin Brown began about 4 a.m. on Feb. 6, 2005. According to police, Garcia and his partner were on patrol when they noticed a red Toyota Camry being driven erratically. When the driver of the Toyota ran a red light and entered the Harbor Freeway, the officers followed.

Suspecting the driver was under the influence of drugs or alcohol, the officers turned on their emergency lights and siren and attempted to pull the car over. But the driver, later identified as Brown, did not stop.

Brown turned off the freeway and led police on 7-minute chase through city streets. He lost control of the car at 83rd Street and Western Avenue, where the vehicle jumped a curb and slammed into a wrought iron fence.

Garcia and his partner pulled up, drew their weapons and took cover behind their open patrol car doors. As they did this, Brown's 14-year-old passenger fled.

Brown, meanwhile, put the car in reverse and began backing up toward police. The Toyota struck the right front fender of the patrol car and continued backing alongside in the direction of Garcia.

The officer fired 10 shots into the Camry. Seven struck Brown, who died at the scene. Officers later learned that the Camry had been reported stolen.

During the department's internal investigation, a re-enactment suggested that Garcia was not in the path of the vehicle when he opened fire. Shooting investigators speculated that he was in the car's path when he drew his weapon, but had stepped to the side before he began pulling the trigger.

DOJ_NMG_0114929

After reviewing that investigation, the Los Angeles County District Attorney declined to file charges against Garcia, citing insufficient evidence.

Bratton, finding that Garcia was legitimately in fear for his life, recommended that his actions be deemed appropriate under the circumstances.

The Police Commission, in a 4-1 vote, disagreed. The majority found evidence that the Camry was moving no faster than 2 miles per hour when the shooting occurred and that Garcia was not in the path of the vehicle.

The officer's belief that his life was in danger "was not objectively reasonable," the board concluded.

A Good Call In New York (NYT)

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

Gov. Eliot Spitzer of New York set an important national example this week when he announced that the state corrections department would back away from a longstanding policy of charging prison inmates and their families more than six times the going rate for collect calls made from prison.

Prisons all over the country began gouging inmates and their families when telephone companies started paying legalized kickbacks — called “commissions” — to the state prison systems in return for a monopoly on the service. These schemes place a huge financial burden on inmate families, who tend to be among the poorest in the nation, and who must often choose between paying phone bills and putting food on the table.

The Spitzer administration, which plans to waive its commission and renegotiate the current contract with its prison telephone carrier, estimates that the cost of a collect call from prison will drop by about half once the program goes into effect. That’s good as far as it goes. But the better solution would be to introduce a cheaper, debit calling system like the one used in federal prisons, where inmates use computer-controlled accounts to pay for calls.

The governor’s announcement didn’t come out of nowhere. Arguments against New York’s collect-call-only system were heard yesterday in the state’s highest court. At the same time, laws that would make the system fairer for inmates and their families are pending in the State Legislature.

Whatever the source, fair pricing for prison telephone service is important. In addition to unburdening poor families, it would encourage sustained contact between inmates and their relations. And that would make it more likely that the inmates would forge crime-free lives once they got out.

ANTITRUST:

Newspapers Set To Jointly Sell Ads On Web Sites (WSJ)

By Julia Angwin

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

Gannett, McClatchy And Tribune to Form Nationwide Network Yahoo's Competing Effort

The nation's three largest newspaper publishers are gearing up to sell advertising jointly on their newspapers' Web sites, believing their survival depends on seizing new online revenue.

Gannett Co., McClatchy Co. and Tribune Co. are planning to offer advertisers one-stop shopping for display ads on Internet sites. The goal is to attract big advertisers such as car makers and phone companies that want to reach a nationwide online audience but don't want the hassle of negotiating ad deals with each company or newspaper.

The joint effort, code-named "Open Network," marks a big new bid to win back advertisers that are defecting in droves to the Web. Currently, national advertisers buy the bulk of their online display ads -- banners and boxes -- from big portals such as Yahoo Inc., Time Warner Inc.'s AOL or Microsoft Corp.'s MSN. Yahoo has announced plans to work with seven other newspaper publishers to build a similar one-stop-shopping spot for advertisers. Google Inc. has also reaped a bonanza with advertising links that appear next to search results.

The three newspaper companies, known in the industry as GMT, are likely to each contribute 10% of their online-advertising space to the network, according to people familiar with the situation. They hope to announce something early this year, although the deal isn't finalized and could still fall apart.

The venture is designed to help the chains tackle a vexing problem: They have long had trouble attracting national advertisers. In their print editions, this is largely because of price. Newspapers can jack up ad prices for local retailers that have few other ways to reach a hometown audience. But national advertisers often find it cheaper to buy a TV spot or magazine ad than to buy space in dozens of newspapers. National advertisers also account for about 75% of advertising on the Internet, according to PricewaterhouseCoopers.

Efforts by the chains to coordinate their print-advertising sales have shown little success, partly because individual papers weren't enthusiastic about standardizing ad sizes or giving up control of their relationships with advertisers. But with the industry under severe stress, that reluctance to band together may change.

"Traditionally print newspaper companies have not worked well together to sell national ads in print," says Jack Williams, president of Gannett Digital. "We intend to sell Internet advertising differently." Tribune and McClatchy declined to comment.

The nascent effort faces a challenge from a rival group of newspapers led by Hearst Corp. and MediaNews Group Inc. that own more than 100 newspapers. Known in the industry as the "Seven Amigos," this group has teamed up with Yahoo to sell online recruiting classifieds, and is finalizing a deal to develop its own national ad-sales network. Both sides concede that it would be better for the newspaper industry to have a single effort, but they have competing efforts in online classified ads, making cooperation in display advertising difficult.

Circulation is declining at major papers across the country as readers increasingly find news online and elsewhere. While newspapers are selling more online ads, the growth isn't fast enough to make up for setbacks in print. During the first nine months of 2006, Internet ad revenues including search ads rose 35% to $12.1 billion, according to PricewaterhouseCoopers data compiled for the Interactive Advertising Bureau. During that same period, the local newspaper industry's ad revenues slipped 4% to $17.5 billion, according to TNS Media Intelligence.

Last year, investors frustrated with the poor performance of newspaper stocks forced Knight Ridder Inc. to sell itself to McClatchy. This year, Tribune is expected to sell off portions of its business to satisfy restless shareholders.

Newspaper chains such as Gannett built themselves in the 1970s through 1990s, often buying family-owned papers and investing in labor-saving technologies that boosted profits. As two-paper cities disappeared, many of the chain papers gained an effective monopoly as the only vehicle for reaching big and affluent local audiences. That served them well with local advertisers such as retailers and car dealerships, and allowed them to support the costs of journalists and printing plants.

The newspaper industry has tried to sell national ads before. In 1994, the industry set up a national sales arm, the Newspaper National Network, to sell ads in certain categories that newspapers weren't successfully selling. Most chains also attempt to sell national ads across their properties. Gannett has a team in Chicago that helps big advertisers buy in multiple Gannett papers. However, even with the national newspaper USA Today in its portfolio, national advertising represented only about 16% of Gannett's newspaper advertising revenues during the first 11 months of 2006.

Late last year, more than 50 newspapers began testing a program allowing advertisers to buy print ads automatically through Google's Web site. That effort is targeted at small advertisers that wouldn't be likely to get attention from a newspaper salesperson.

Now, as circulation declines and readers move to the Internet, the chains realize they need to do more.

An early Internet joint venture was CareerBuilder.com, a Web site for classified jobs advertising. Tribune and Knight Ridder bought CareerBuilder in 2000, when it was an also-ran behind Monster.com and Yahoo HotJobs. Gannett joined the venture two years later and the trio built CareerBuilder into the No. 1 online recruiting Web site, with 16.7 million unique visitors in November, according to comScore Media Metrix.

CareerBuilder's success has also driven a wedge in the newspaper industry. CareerBuilder has raised the cut of revenue it takes when its newspaper partners deliver ads to the site or when it delivers an ad to a newspaper, according to people familiar with the arrangements. In the past year, several newspapers defected from CareerBuilder to Monster.com, including the Philadelphia Inquirer, St. Petersburg (Fla.) Times and Akron (Ohio) Beacon Journal.

In a September meeting, MediaNews Chief Executive Dean Singleton complained about CareerBuilder's renegotiated terms and reluctance to take on big new equity partners to Gannett Chief Executive Craig Dubow, according to a person close to the situation. Mr. Dubow refused to loosen the terms, this person says.

So Mr. Singleton threw his weight behind negotiations with Yahoo HotJobs, a competitor to CareerBuilder. In November, Mr. Singleton announced a deal with Yahoo HotJobs, along with Belo Corp., Cox Newspapers Inc., Hearst Newspapers, Journal Register Co., Lee Enterprises Inc., and E.W. Scripps Co.

The "Seven Amigos" also signed a letter of intent to expand the relationship with Yahoo to include a national ad-sales network similar to the one being formed by Gannett, McClatchy and Tribune. Since then, two other newspaper groups have joined the Yahoo consortium: Media General Inc. and Morris Communications Co.

The expanded Yahoo deal is likely to require the newspapers in the consortium to use Yahoo search on their newspaper Web sites, according to people close to the discussions. In addition, Yahoo and the newspapers could sell ads on each others' sites, with revenue being shared among the partners. The deal is being finalized, these people say.

Lincoln Millstein, senior vice president at Hearst Newspapers, said he hopes Gannett, McClatchy and Tribune will join the Yahoo consortium instead of striking out on their own. "We're all struggling to get our fair share of national advertising revenues, and this partnership with Yahoo would go a long way toward achieving that goal," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0114931

So far, Gannett has signaled its intent to go a separate route. In a December presentation to investors, Mr. Dubow, the Gannett CEO, first mentioned the troika's efforts to build "the largest network of newspaper-developed local sites for any advertiser to reach local consumers." He said that "unlike past efforts in the industry," the group will "focus on customer needs."

In an interview, Gannett's Mr. Williams confirmed the project is in the works. He said the group would welcome other members so long as they agree to conditions about ad pricing and placement. "If other people are interested in participating, they can join, but only if they are willing to live with the rules," he said. The project would rely in part on McClatchy's existing national online sales network, called Real Cities.

GMT is leery of the Seven Amigos' agreement to use Yahoo's technology to deliver advertising on the newspapers' Web sites, according to a person close to the situation. Yahoo will then gain sensitive information such as which newspaper sites are doing well and which pages are most popular.

By contrast, the GMT group is considering other technology options that wouldn't involve handing control to a potential competitor. It has held discussions with Centro LLC, a Chicago-based company that places ads on newspaper sites across the country, according to a person close to the situation.

Shawn Riegsecker, the president of Centro, says the two camps need to get together to compete with big portals. "If you break this industry apart, you completely devalue the value proposition to the spot advertiser in the national market," Mr. Riegsecker says.

U.S. Senate Plans Hearing On Airline Merger Impact (AJC)

By Russell Grantham, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 10, 2007

Prompted by US Airways' bid to acquire Delta Air Lines and merger talk at other carriers, the U.S. Senate Commerce Committee has scheduled a hearing later this month on the likely effects of a potential wave of airline mergers.

The Jan. 24 hearing will be on the state of the airline industry and the "potential impact of airline mergers and industry consolidation," the committee said Tuesday in a press release.

Then-Delta Chief Executive Leo Mullin testified to the same committee in hearings shortly after the 9/11 terrorist attacks. Congress later approved a multibillion-dollar aid bill after airlines were temporarily grounded in response to the 2001 attack.

Congress had been expected to weigh in on the airline merger issue, although the U.S. Justice Department would have to independently review any combinations. After US Airways' hostile $8 billion-plus bid for Delta in November, local and national politicians from Atlanta and communities that would be affected expressed concern about the deal.

Delta management opposes the proposal but its bankruptcy court creditors will have the final say.

With the change in control in Congress, the Senate committee is now headed by Daniel Inouye (D-Hawaii).

Micron Settles Chip Suit, Predicts $80 Million Cost (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo

Bloomberg, January 10, 2007

Jan. 9 (Bloomberg) -- Micron Technology Inc., the biggest U.S. memory chip maker, said it cut previously reported first-quarter earnings by as much as $80 million to reflect a settlement resolving claims it conspired to fix chip prices.

The accord resolves private antitrust lawsuits filed over U.S. sales of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, from 1999 to 2002. The claims were brought by manufacturers and individuals alleging that a price-fixing conspiracy drove up costs for the chips, a memory component used in personal computers, laptops and video game consoles.

``It is expected that the settlement will result'' in a reduction ``in an amount not to exceed $80 million,'' Micron said today in a statement.

Micron has been in settlement talks to end similar claims by state attorneys general who sued the company and other DRAM makers in July, said company spokesman Dan Francisco. The private antitrust suits against chip makers stemmed from a 2002 Justice Department probe of the DRAM market. Micron cooperated with U.S. officials in exchange for not being charged with a crime.

The settlement dismisses Micron from the class action, or group lawsuit, originally filed in San Francisco federal court. The accord is subject to court approval.

Micron's Francisco declined to comment on the terms of the settlement. Boise, Idaho-based Micron said it plans to file its quarterly report for the period ended Dec. 21 on Jan. 16.

Other Accords

DOJ_NMG_0114932

NEC Electronics America Inc. agreed to pay $36 million and Elpida Memory Inc. agreed to pay $14.7 million in December to resolve claims in the suits. Samsung Electronics Co., Hynix Semiconductor and Infineon Technologies AG agreed to pay $160 million in May.

New York, California and 33 other states sued seven memory- chip makers in July, saying a price-fixing conspiracy added $1 billion to chip costs while driving up retail prices for personal computers and other electronics.

Guido Saveri, an attorney for DRAM purchasers, confirmed the accord while declining further comment on its terms.

Micron shares fell 7 cents to $13.67 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

Congress To Take Up Net's Future (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 — Senior lawmakers, emboldened by the recent restrictions on AT&T and the change in control of Congress, have begun drafting legislation that would prevent high-speed Internet companies from charging content providers for priority access.

The first significant so-called net neutrality legislation of the new Congressional session was introduced Tuesday by Senator Byron L. Dorgan, Democrat of South Dakota, and Senator Olympia J. Snowe of Maine, one of the few Republicans in Congress to support such a measure.

"The success of the Internet has been its openness and the ability of anyone anywhere in this country to go on the Internet and reach the world," Mr. Dorgan said. "If the big interests who control the pipes become gatekeepers who erect tolls, it will have a significant impact on the Internet as we know it."

In the House, Representative Edward J. Markey, the Massachusetts Democrat who heads the Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Telecommunications and the Internet, said recently that he would introduce legislation soon and planned to hold hearings.

Despite the flurry of activity, the proposals face significant political impediments and no one expects that they will be adopted quickly. But the fight promises to be a bonanza for lobbyists and a fund-raising tool for lawmakers. It pits Internet giants like Google, Yahoo, eBay and Amazon, which support the legislation, against telecommunication titans like Verizon, AT&T and large cable companies like Comcast.

The debate may also affect the plans of the companies to develop new services and to consider certain mergers or acquisitions.

Consumer groups have allied themselves with content providers. The groups maintain that without the legislation, some content providers would be discouraged from offering services while others would impose costs on providers that would either discourage them from offering new services or pass them on to consumers. They also feel that small companies would be unable to compete.

But the telephone and cable companies say that efforts to limit their ability to charge for faster service would discourage the pipeline companies from making billions of dollars in investments to upgrade their networks, and would, as a practical matter, be even more harmful to consumers.

Beyond the debate, the fight over net neutrality is, like most regulatory political battles, a fight over money and competing business models. Companies like Google, Yahoo and many content providers do not want to pay for the kinds of faster Internet service that will enable consumers to more quickly download videos and play games.

In their thirst to continue to grow rapidly, content providers are looking to expand, but they consider any attempt by the telephone and cable companies to charge them for priority services as restricting their ability to move into new areas.

On the other hand, the telephone and cable companies — the so-called Internet pipes — want to be able to charge for access, particularly as they begin competing with content providers by offering their video services and programming.

The phone companies have also been studying a business model not unlike that of the cable TV industry: charging premiums to certain content providers for greater access to their pipes.

They say that existing rules, as well as sound business judgment, would preclude them from trying to degrade or slow their broadband service and that what they oppose is regulation that would prevent them from charging for offering a faster service. They also point out that many content providers are already charging customers for priority services, so that what they are proposing is not unduly restrictive.

DOJ_NMG_0114933

While the debate has broken largely along partisan lines — with Democrats among the staunchest supporters and Republicans the biggest foes — there remains considerable Democratic opposition. Last June, a vote on an amendment by Mr. Markey similar to what he plans to introduce failed by 269 to 152, with 58 Democrats voting against the measure.

Many of those Democrats have been allied with unions, which have sided with the phone companies because they believe that the lack of restrictions will encourage the companies to invest and expand their networks.

In the Senate, where the party in the minority has considerably more power than in the House, the measure suffers from similar political problems. Last year the Republicans blocked the measure from reaching the Senate floor.

But several developments have given some momentum to the supporters of the measures. The House is now under the control of the Democrats, and the new speaker, Nancy Pelosi of California, has been a vigorous supporter of the legislation. Ms. Pelosi's district in San Francisco is near Silicon Valley, the home of many companies that have sought the legislation.

Moreover, the conditions that the Federal Communications Commission imposed on AT&T as a condition of its acquisition of SBC Communications represented an important political victory for proponents of the legislation. After one of the five members of the commission removed himself from the proceeding, the commission's two Democrats forced the companies to agree to a two-year moratorium on offering any service that "privileges, degrades or prioritizes any packet" transmitted over its broadband service.

The conditions imposed no significant immediate costs on AT&T. The company does not yet have the equipment in place on its network to offer a priority service on a large scale. But the conditions imposed by the F.C.C. showed that, contrary to assertions of the phone companies, it was possible to draft language that would preclude the companies from discriminating against providers.

The conditions also set a political benchmark of sorts, and gave the supporters of the legislation two years to try to gain more momentum just as all of the companies are trying to figure out their next major sources of revenue.

Aloha Taking Mesa To Federal Court (AP)

AP, January 10, 2007

Aloha Airlines Moving Dispute With Mesa Air to Federal Court

HONOLULU (AP) -- Aloha Airlines announced that it will pursue further legal action against Mesa Air Group Inc. in federal court.

Aloha sued Mesa in state court in October, alleging the Phoenix-based company improperly used data it obtained as a potential investor to try to drive Aloha out of business.

"Upon further legal review of the federal antitrust laws, and given findings of federal Bankruptcy Judge Robert Faris in the Hawaiian Airlines matter, we believe our claims would be best pursued in the federal court system," David A. Banmiller, Aloha's president and chief executive, said Monday. "Aloha will continue to proceed vigorously against Mesa to stop the illegal and improper conduct."

Mesa, which had been considering investing in Aloha when the island carrier was undergoing bankruptcy reorganization, launched go! airlines in June as a competing carrier in Hawaii, entering the market dominated for decades by Hawaiian and Aloha airlines.

Hawaiian, now a unit of Hawaiian Holdings Inc., sued Mesa in February for the alleged illegal use of confidential information and trade secrets obtained during Hawaiian's Chapter 11 bankruptcy proceedings,

Speaking in connection with the Hawaiian case, Faris said in October that there was evidence that "raises real doubts about the propriety of Mesa's conduct."

Mesa has denied Hawaiian's allegations.

A Mesa spokesman said Aloha's lawsuit was a "desperate act by a desperate carrier."

Aloha said it is seeking damages and injunctive relief to stop Mesa from competing unfairly and from threatening the jobs of 3,500 Aloha employees in Hawaii.

Hain Gets Antitrust OK For Avalon (AP)

AP, January 10, 2007

NEW YORK --Hain Celestial Group Inc., an organic food company, received antitrust approval for its planned $120 million acquisition of Avalon Natural Products Inc.

The Federal Trade Commission approved early termination of a waiting period required under antitrust law on Friday.

Melville, N.Y.-based Hain, whose brands include Garden of Eatin', Earth's Best and Celestial Seasonings, is buying Avalon from private equity firm North Castle Partners LLC.

Avalon, located in Petaluma, Calif., sells personal care products under the Avalon Organics, Alba Botanica and Unpetroleum brands.

Hain said in December it expects the deal to close in early 2007.

Shares of Hain fell 21 cents to close at $29.58 on the Nasdaq.

Ruling Seen As Giving An Edge To Challengers Of Patents (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 — The Supreme Court opened the door Tuesday to a category of patent lawsuits that a lower court had barred, issuing a decision that will probably shift power in the courtroom from bigger patent-owning companies to smaller start-up companies that rely on obtaining licenses for patented technology.

The court's 8-to-1 decision held that the holder of a patent license can sue to challenge the patent's validity without first refusing to pay royalties and putting itself in breach of the license agreement.

This seemingly technical question, in a dispute by two biotechnology companies, MedImmune and Genentech, has considerable practical importance. A license holder is much less likely to sue if it must first stop paying royalties and thereby risk becoming the target of a patent infringement suit, with the potential for triple damages and the loss of the right to continue selling its product.

In making its decision, the Supreme Court overturned a ruling by the specialized appeals court that hears all patent appeals. That court, the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, had adopted a rule in a previous case that required a party to breach its license agreement before suing to declare a patent invalid.

As long as royalties were being paid, the Federal Circuit had reasoned, there was no actual controversy between the parties and such a lawsuit would therefore not meet the requirement of Article III of the Constitution, which limits the jurisdiction of the federal courts to resolving actual "cases" or "controversies."

The Declaratory Judgment Act, the federal law that MedImmune invoked when it went to the federal District Court in Los Angeles for a determination of the validity of Genentech's patent, likewise requires the existence of an "actual controversy" before a court can act.

But the dispute between MedImmune and Genentech was indeed a controversy that met the jurisdictional requirements of the statute and the Constitution, Justice Antonin Scalia wrote for the majority in overturning the Federal Circuit's dismissal of the case, MedImmune Inc. v. Genentech Inc., No. 05-608.

Justice Scalia said the rule that a plaintiff must "bet the farm, or (as here) risk treble damages and the loss of 80 percent of its business before seeking a declaration of its actively contested legal rights finds no support in Article III."

The decision did not resolve the underlying dispute, instead reinstating MedImmune's lawsuit and sending the case back to the lower courts.

The case grew out of a license agreement the two companies reached in 1997 as MedImmune, then a new company, was working on a genetically engineered drug, Synagis, used to prevent a respiratory disease in infants. While MedImmune later came to public attention as the maker of the FluMist influenza vaccine, Synagis has been the company's main product, accounting for 80 percent of its sales since 1999.

The license authorized MedImmune to use the technology developed by Genentech and its research partner, the City of Hope National Medical Center in Duarte, Calif. City of Hope is also a party in the case.

The agreement obliged MedImmune to pay royalties for the use of patents "which have neither expired nor been held invalid."

The specific patent at issue in the case was not granted to Genentech until 2001, at which point Genentech wrote to MedImmune demanding royalties. MedImmune paid under protest, while filing its lawsuit to have the patent declared invalid.

Justice Clarence Thomas was the lone dissenter from the ruling. He said there was "no Article III jurisdiction over MedImmune's claim," which he called "hypothetical or conjectural."

High Court Eases Way For Patent Challenges (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin And Marilyn Chase

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Supreme Court continued to reassert its oversight of patent law yesterday with a ruling that weakens intellectual-property protections by making it easier for legal challenges to patents.

The 8-1 decision put the justices on the side of those who have complained that existing rules stifle innovation, and it is their latest rebuke to the specialized panel that hears patent appeals, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, for rulings skewing property rights in favor of patent holders. The high court this term has also heard a separate case appealing obstacles imposed by the Federal Circuit against challenges to a patent on grounds that the invention is "obvious." A decision on that is pending.

REINVENTION

· The News: The Supreme Court ruled that companies can challenge patents even if they are paying royalties to license them.

· The Background: A lower court had forced challengers to infringe and risk damages if they failed.

· What It Means: It'll be easier to weed out bad patents, but may be harder to enforce valid ones.

Yesterday's opinion, by Justice Antonin Scalia, reversed the Federal Circuit's rule that if a company pays royalties for a patent, it forfeits the right to challenge the patent's validity. That has deterred companies from filing challenges because they would be at risk for treble damages for infringement if the patent were found to be valid.

The decision is a victory for MedImmune Inc., a Gaithersburg, Md., pharmaceuticals company that derives about 80% of its revenue from the respiratory-tract drug at issue, Synagis. Under protest, MedImmune paid a royalty to Genentech Inc., of South San Francisco, Calif., to avoid a patent-infringement suit over a component antibody.

Under a 2004 Federal Circuit ruling, the act of paying a royalty precluded challenging the patent's validity. The Federal Circuit reasoned that since the license payment obviated an infringement suit, there was no controversy between the companies. In general, federal courts may only decide cases and controversies, not rule on theoretical disputes or issue advisory opinions.

Justice Scalia wrote that a party shouldn't have to "bet the farm" to challenge a patent. He cited several prior cases where the court allowed parties to challenge laws as unconstitutional without breaking them -- and thus exposing themselves to criminal punishment. Moreover, he wrote, the Supreme Court in 1943 had decided a similar patent case by ruling that "the fact that royalties were being paid did not" make the dispute "hypothetical or abstract."

The Bush administration supported MedImmune, contending that allowing challenges would help weed out invalid patents that stifle innovation. "Public policy strongly favors ridding the economy of invalid patents, which impede efficient licensing, hinder competition, and undermine incentives for innovation," the government said in a friend-of-the-court brief.

The implications could be greatest for the biotechnology industry, where huge profits can turn on a relatively small number of patents, according to Pamela Samuelson, co-director of the Center for Law and Technology at the University of California, Berkeley. Prof. Samuelson said the Supreme Court is telling the Federal Circuit to be "more balanced and less patent-owner friendly."

"Everybody knows there are a lot of weak patents out there," she said. "A lot of inventors take very substantial risks going out into a field of technology, and sometimes they get their foot blown off when some patent is out there like a land mine."

However, some predicted a chilling effect. "This decision allows companies that have taken out licenses to challenge the validity of a patent while also enjoying the benefits of that very same patent," said Charles Barquist, a patent litigator in Morrison & Foerster LLP's Los Angeles office. "MedImmune turns all fundamental assumptions about the stability and finality of a patent license completely on their head," he added in a statement late yesterday. "The Court has upset the risk/benefit calculation that underlies virtually every patent license."

Genentech issued as statement downplaying the significance of the ruling, saying the Supreme Court "only addressed the threshold jurisdictional issue of whether there need to be further proceedings to finally decide this case. It does not express an opinion concerning the merits of MedImmune's claims against Genentech..."

Indeed, MedImmune General Counsel William Bertrand said the victory won't have an immediate impact on his company's bottom line, as it has been paying royalties all along and the ruling doesn't nullify the patent at issue, but it does enable resumption of the challenge.

Eric Schmidt, a biotech analyst at Cowen and Co., sees modest potential impact on Genentech's future earnings from the decision. An adverse decision, should MedImmune prevail at trial, could have an impact of four cents a share on earnings, he said. (See related article on page A12.) Genentech receives royalties from licensees as well as paying some royalties to the City of Hope Hospital, in Duarte, Calif., under the patent, Mr. Schmidt said. The company's annual income from all royalties is approaching $1 billion a year.

MedImmune's Synagis, which racked up $1.24 billion in 2005 sales, is an injectable product containing protective antibodies that help guard infants and young children against respiratory syncytial virus, or RSV, a common childhood infection responsible for about 125,000 hospitalizations a year in the U.S. alone, a spokeswoman said.

U.S. Supreme Court Ruling May Alter Biotech Patent Deals (AP)

By Paul Elias, Associated Press

AP, January 10, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114936

SAN FRANCISCO – Biotechnology analysts and lawyers said a key U.S. Supreme Court ruling Tuesday could help companies who license patents get out of bad deals easier.

The Supreme Court ruled that Gaithersburg, Md.-based MedImmune Inc. could sue Genentech Inc. for patent infringement even though MedImmune continues to pay fees to Genentech to use the disputed technology to develop the drug Synagis that treats childhood respiratory problems. The high court didn't rule on the merits of MedImmune's claims Tuesday, the outcome of which analysts said is more important to the patent landscape of the biotechnology industry.

Licensing the rights to use another company's patent technology is the lifeblood of the biotechnology industry. Many smaller companies have long complained that larger companies with extensive patent portfolios often hold monopolistic grips on certain manufacturing processes. For instance, several biotechnology companies pay Genentech royalties to access the technology at the heart of the MedImmune dispute.

“This is definitely a major ongoing controversy,” said Jason Kantor, an analyst with RBC Market Capitals. “The decision today does not have far-reaching implications.”

The ruling did little to the sector's stock prices and both companies involved in the litigation experienced small rises in their share prices.

South San Francisco-based Genentech's stock rose 89 cents a share to $84.69 at the close of trading on the New York Stock Exchange. MedImmune's share price rose 58 cents to $34.83 at the close of trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Still, lawyers said the ruling will give biotechnology companies locked in bad licensing deals with larger partners an attractive option to change the terms of the agreement without terminating the agreement.

“If their patent challenge fails, that's a big business risk ,” said Bart Showalter, head of intellectual property at the Baker Botts law firm in Dallas. “This is a big win for licensees, who can have their cake and eat it too.”

Showalter predicted the ruling will alter how future contracts are hammered out.

MedImmune Inc. sued Genentech in 2003, claiming a deal between Genentech and British biotechnology company Celltech R&D Ltd. violated antitrust laws. But it was thrown out by the federal courts, which ruled MedImmune didn't have the right to sue because it continued to pay royalties on the patent even as it claimed in court the patent was unfair.

The Supreme Court said MedImmune's “pay and sue” strategy doesn't preclude it from suing. MedImmune said it continued to pay Genentech royalties because if it lost its case, it would be liable for triple damages and unable to use the technology needed to manufacturer Synagis, which accounted for than $1 billion in sales last year.

MedImmune said it would vigorously pursue its case in the lower court. Genentech said it remains confident in the validity of the patent.

High Court Ruling Could Spark Surge In Patent Challenges (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 10, 2007

Patent litigation could explode in the wake of the Supreme Court's ruling Tuesday in a closely watched dispute over patent validity between two biotechnology firms.

The Court, by an 8-1 vote, reinstated a lawsuit by MedImmune challenging a Genentech patent related to Synagis, a popular drug for treatment of respiratory disease in children. The opinion in MedImmune v. Genentech, written by Justice Antonin Scalia, says patent licensees no longer have to breach the license in order to have standing to challenge the patent that they dispute. Patent lawyers say the ruling could lead to a flurry of challenges to existing patents.

"It's a rare patent where you can't find something to challenge. There will be an explosion in litigation by these licensees," says Jim Badke, a partner at Ropes & Gray. "Companies can have their cake and eat it too."

The Jan. 9 ruling overturns a decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, which since 2004 had held that a breach -- such as ceasing royalty payments -- was necessary in order to establish the "case or controversy" required to challenge the patent. Critics of the Federal Circuit's doctrine said it discouraged challenges against invalid patents, because breaking a license agreement can be risky. Such a breach can prompt the patent holder to retaliate by suing for infringement and seeking an injunction against further sales of the product, along with treble damages.

Now a licensee can challenge a patent while still honoring it and paying royalties -- as MedImmune did in the case before the Supreme Court -- and patent challenges will be safer and easier to file without fear of retaliation.

In overturning the Federal Circuit's ruling, Scalia wrote that the dispute leading up to the patent challenge was a real and "lively" controversy that was sufficient to trigger a challenge to the patent's validity, even if the royalties were still being paid.

Badke, who worked on the case for MedImmune at an earlier stage, says that in the long run, the ruling will help clear out invalid patents that impede innovations in areas like biotech and software.

DOJ_NMG_0114937

But the decision also introduces more uncertainty into the status of patents, says George Best, senior counsel at Foley & Lardner. Under the old rules, a licensing agreement amounted to an insurance policy against litigation over patent validity or infringement. But now, he says, "unhappy licensees" can challenge patents that both parties previously thought were settled and protected by the license agreement.

"By allowing licensees that are taking full advantage of the benefits of the license, including immunity from a patent infringement lawsuit, to challenge the patents in the agreement, patentees lose the quid pro quo in the arrangement," says Raymond Van Dyke of Nixon Peabody. "Countless licensed patents are now potentially open to a new attack from even good licensees. To the IP community, this is yet another curtailment of the strength of patent rights."

The decision also represents another bad day for the Federal Circuit, which handles patent appeals and is on a long-term losing streak at the Supreme Court. Several analysts on Tuesday said the ruling does not bode well for KSR International v. Teleflex, the other Federal Circuit patent ruling that is under challenge before the Court this term, involving the test for determining whether an innovation is so obvious that it does not deserve patent protection.

Minerals Agency Targeted In Probe (DENP)

By Steve Raabe, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, January 10, 2007

The Justice Department is conducting criminal inquiries into allegations of ethics violations by individual personnel.

The U.S. Justice Department has begun two criminal investigations into the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service over possible ethics violations.

One of the investigations focuses on individuals at the agency's office in the Denver Federal Center, officials said.

The investigations mark the first time that federal officials are targeting possible criminal activity at the Minerals Management Service.

The agency already has been the subject of noncriminal federal inquiries and audits alleging problems in its mission to collect royalty payments on oil and gas production from federal property.

Allegations of criminal ethics violations are unrelated to the previous inquiries and audits, the agency said in a statement.

"The Minerals Management Service requested an investigation by the Inspector General into two possible ethics violations. These cases have been referred to the Justice Department," the statement said.

"Both cases involve individual personnel, and therefore cannot be discussed outside the investigation itself."

Earlier this month, a report from the Interior Department's inspector general concluded that the Minerals Management Service may be allowing royalty underpayments because of weaknesses and inconsistencies in the agency's audits of energy-company payments.

"Our national budget is stretched to the breaking point. And yet the administration seems to be passing on billions in revenue," said U.S. Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., in a statement. "We allow oil and gas companies onto our federal lands with the understanding that the American people will gain not only energy resources, but revenues. We cannot allow a few individuals to bilk the American people out of revenues they rightly deserve."

In a separate federal inquiry, the Minerals Management Service is under investigation for issuing drilling leases in 1998 and 1999 that failed to require royalty payments, a mistake that could cost the government as much as $10 billion unless the leases are fixed.

The agency announced last week that Royal Dutch Shell, BP, ConocoPhillips and Marathon Oil have agreed to pay royalties under the botched leases. Dozens of other oil and gas producers have not reached similar agreements with the government.

Congress earlier this month narrowly defeated a measure that would have forced the companies to renegotiate the contracts.

Venice May Target Ex-utility Heads (HTRIB)

By Paul Quinlan

The Herald Tribune (Southwest Florida), January 10, 2007

City weighs legal options against bosses involved in 2005 illegal dumping.

DOJ_NMG_0114938

VENICE -- The city will consider filing lawsuits or taking other legal action against the former utility department employees believed to be responsible for the illegal dumping to which the city pleaded guilty in federal court in 2005.

The City Council's decision Tuesday to weigh legal options comes days after city leaders learned that federal prosecutors have given up trying to bring criminal charges against any former utility department employees.

The Justice Department's decision to drop the case has angered council members, who say that the actions of a few former employees ultimately cost taxpayers more than $2 million in fines and engineering and legal fees.

"The city felt that it had no choice but to enter into a guilty plea based on the evidence," said council member John Moore, a former judge. "I felt that they should have been prosecuted."

The Department of Justice would not comment on why it closed the case. The City Council instructed the city attorney Tuesday to seek an explanation.

The investigation began after several former utility department employees accused colleagues of illegally dumping excess treated waste water into Curry Creek and spraying it onto a field at Knights Trail in 2001, even though the systems designed to measure and limit flow were not working.

In 2004, the city purged the department, hiring a private firm, Operations Management International, to run the city waste-water operations.

The city pleaded guilty to three felony violations of the Clean Water Act, receiving the minimum fine allowable, $110,000. As part of the plea deal, city officials agreed to cooperate in any further investigation of the supervisors or managers responsible, whom court papers refer to only as the "Executive Group."

But some former employees who claim to be members of the "Executive Group" say that federal prosecutors' decision to walk away from the case proves their innocence. They say current city administrators capitulated to federal prosecutors and used the case and allegations to stage a coup.

"It was politically motivated," said former utility department director John Lane. "I had almost 25 years of an unblemished record with the city. I don't appreciate what they have done to me."

Shane Saputo, the pollution control supervisor at the time, said that the city's decision to enter a plea deal with federal prosecutors represented a betrayal and a waste of money.

"They didn't need to accept it, nor should they have accepted it," Saputo said. "Why did it come to this? Why was there so much money spent on this case?"

Agency Affirms Human Influence On Climate (NYT)

By Andrew C. Revkin

New York Times, January 10, 2007

President Bush has said it.

A lot of government scientists have said it.

But until yesterday, it appeared that no news release on annual climate trends out of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration under the Bush White House had said unequivocally that a buildup of greenhouse gases was helping warm the climate.

The statement came in a release that said 2006 was the warmest year for the 48 contiguous states since regular temperature records began in 1895. It surpassed the previous champion, 1998, a year heated up by a powerful episode of the periodic warming of the tropical Pacific Ocean by El Niño. Last year, another El Niño developed, but this time a long-term warming trend from human activities was said to be involved as well.

“A contributing factor to the unusually warm temperatures throughout 2006 also is the long-term warming trend, which has been linked to increases in greenhouse gases,” the release said, emphasizing that the relative contributions of El Niño and the human influence were not known.

A link between greenhouse gases and climate change was also made in a December news conference by Dirk Kempthorne, the secretary of the interior, as that agency proposed listing polar bears as threatened under the Endangered Species Act.

Still, the climate agency’s shift in language came as a surprise to several public affairs officials there. They said they had become accustomed in recent years to having any mention of a link between climate trends and human activities played down or trimmed when drafts of documents went to the Commerce Department and the White House for approval.

James L. Connaughton, chairman of the White House Council on Environmental Quality, said the release reflected longstanding views within the administration.

"It's helpful for them to describe what is a question in many people's minds — what is the human factor, what is the El Niño factor," Mr. Connaughton said of the NOAA release. "From our perspective, what was in the press release was a direct reflection of what the president and folks in his administration have been saying for some time."

Mr. Bush has made two speeches on climate. He first expressly accepted that humans were contributing to global warming in a news conference in Denmark in July 2005 on the way to an economic summit in Scotland, saying, "Listen, I recognize that the surface of the Earth is warmer and that an increase in greenhouse gases caused by humans is contributing to the problem."

But the government's scientific bureaucracy, where public affairs officials and scientists as recently as last year complained that findings pointing to climate dangers were being suppressed, has taken time to catch up.

"There's been some sensitivity to the fact that some people have complained that NOAA and other parts of the government haven't been as open as they would like them to have been on this," said Jay Lawrimore, a climatologist at the National Climatic Data Center in Asheville, N.C., where the temperature trends are compiled. "Now NOAA is making an effort to be clearer on some of the influences."

Mr. Lawrimore said there was no way to account for the trends, be they the melting of Arctic sea ice or the warming of winters, without including an influence from heat-trapping gases.

"Year after year as we continue to see warmer temperatures," he said, "there are more and more converts convinced that it's not just natural variability and not just something that's going to return back to temperatures we saw 40 or 50 years ago — that in fact we are doing something to the climate."

Climate Experts Worry As 2006 Is Hottest Year On Record In U.S. (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

Washington Post, January 10, 2007

Last year was the warmest in the continental United States in the past 112 years -- capping a nine-year warming streak "unprecedented in the historical record" that was driven in part by the burning of fossil fuels, the government reported yesterday.

According to the government's National Climatic Data Center, the record-breaking warmth -- which caused daffodils and cherry trees to bloom throughout the East on New Year's Day -- was the result of both unusual regional weather patterns and the long-term effects of the buildup of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere.

"People should be concerned about what we are doing to the climate," said Jay Lawrimore, chief of the climate monitoring branch of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration. "Burning of fossil fuels is causing an increase in greenhouse gases, and there's a broad scientific consensus that is producing climate change."

The center said there are indications that the rate at which global temperatures are rising is speeding up.

Average temperatures nationwide in 2006 were 2.2 degrees Fahrenheit higher than the mean temperatures nationwide for the 20th century, the agency said. It reported that seven months in 2006 were much warmer than average, and that last month was the fourth-warmest December on record. Average temperatures for all 48 contiguous states were above or well above average, and New Jersey logged its hottest temperatures ever.

Many researchers are concerned that rising temperatures could lead to widespread melting of the polar ice caps, resulting in higher sea levels and more extreme droughts and storms. But NOAA also pointed to one silver lining: The unusually warm temperatures from October to December helped keep residential energy use for heating 13.5 percent below the average for that period.

NOAA said an El NiÃ±o weather pattern in the equatorial Pacific also contributed to the warm temperatures by blocking cold Arctic air from moving south and east across the nation.

Climate experts generally do not make much of temperature fluctuations over one or two years, but Lawrimore said the record 2006 temperatures were part of a long and worrisome trend. For instance, NOAA said, the past nine years have all been among the 25 warmest years on record for the continental United States.

Advocates for more action to control carbon dioxide emissions also voiced concern.

"No one should be surprised that 2006 is the hottest year on record for the U.S.," said Brenda Ekwurzel, a climate scientist with the Union of Concerned Scientists, a public interest group. "When you look at temperatures across the globe, every single year since 1993 has been in the top 20 warmest years on record."

"Realistically, we have to start fighting global warming in the next 10 years if we want to secure a safe environment for our children and grandchildren," she said.

Lawrimore said other NOAA research has found that the rate of temperature increase has been significantly greater in the past 30 years than at any time since the government started collecting national temperature data in 1895. Globally, 2005 was the hottest year on record, Lawrimore said, and 2006 was slightly cooler.

DOJ_NMG_0114940

He said that although there is a scientific consensus that carbon dioxide from cars, power plants and factories is leading to global warming, there is no consensus yet on whether the warming will increase more quickly or more slowly in the future. Some researcher have predicted that temperatures worldwide will increase by a catastrophic 7 to 8 degrees on average by the end of the century, while others project an increase of a more modest 2 degrees by century's end.

The burning of oil and other fossil fuels releases carbon dioxide, which rises, blankets the Earth and traps heat. Climate scientists report that there has not been this much carbon dioxide in the atmosphere in the past 650,000 years.

The Bush administration has rejected proposals to cap carbon dioxide emissions or impose carbon taxes as a way to limit global warming. Lawrimore said he believes the problem could and should be addressed by developing new technologies for powering vehicles and industry.

Late December's springlike temperatures in the eastern two-thirds of the country made it the fourth-warmest December on record in the United States and contributed greatly to the record high for the year. Several Northern cities were unusually warm -- with Boston 8 degrees above average and Minneapolis-St. Paul 17 degrees above average for the last three weeks of the month.

El Niño Gives USA Its Hottest Year In '06 (USAT)

By Patrick O'Driscoll

USA Today, January 10, 2007

DENVER — Last summer's deadly heat wave and a balmy December helped make 2006 the warmest year ever recorded in the USA, federal climate officials announced Tuesday.

The National Climatic Data Center says factors include the El Niño climate pattern and "the long-term warming trend" of climate change, due in part to greenhouse gases. The center says drought in the Plains and parts of the West also played a role. Wildfire agencies say warmth helped make it the worst wildfire season ever, with 9.8 million acres burned.

"There's no denying that climate change is occurring, and warmer winters and warmer years are more common for that reason," says Jay Lawrimore, monitoring chief for the center, which keeps the nation's weather records. "What we're seeing (in 2006) is just becoming so much more common."

New York City, still without snow this winter, last week broke a 129-year record for latest date for the first snowfall. In the Northeast, ski resorts report little snow and temperatures too warm to make artificial snow.

Temperatures were above normal even in Colorado, where major snowstorms before Christmas and New Year's paralyzed Denver and socked the Great Plains. The city's average reading for December was still 1.4 degrees warmer than usual.

A side benefit: Residential energy demand for heating was 13.5% lower than normal for October through December, the center said.

An average national temperature of 55.01 degrees pushed 2006 past 1998 as the warmest on record. Fifteen of the years since 1981 rank among the 25 warmest since national record-keeping began in 1895.

The climate center says the current El Niño, the periodic warming of Pacific waters, is the biggest factor for 2006, and global warming is "a contributing factor." This is believed to be the first time the annual temperature report mentions climate change as a cause.

It was the warmest year ever in New Jersey, and five states had their warmest December — Connecticut, Minnesota, New Hampshire, New York and Vermont.

During last summer's heat wave, record highs from South Dakota across the Plains taxed water supplies for crops and livestock. Heat was blamed for at least 140 deaths in California.

The year's warmth wasn't just about extreme highs. Lawrimore says more than 40% of the USA had higher-than-average overnight lows last summer, compared with 10% in a typical year. Daily records for the highest overnight low were tied or broken more than 3,000 times last summer in hundreds of cities and towns, especially in the West. About 100 locations recorded their all-time highest lows for any date, from 88 in Cedar Butte, S.D., to 102 in Death Valley, Calif.

The Heat Just Keeps On Coming In The U.S. (LAT)

By Robert Lee Hotz

Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

On the fever chart of rising temperatures, 2006 was the warmest year on record for the 48 contiguous states, pairing a lethal summer heat wave with a winter so mild that in some places daffodils bloomed out of season and bears forgot to hibernate, government climate experts reported Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0114941

Based on an analysis of readings from 1,200 weather stations around the country, the average annual temperature in the Lower 48 states last year was 2.2 degrees higher than the mean temperature for the 20th century and fractionally warmer than in 1998, which previously held the temperature record, the researchers reported.

Seven months last year were much warmer than average, concluded the scientists at the National Climatic Data Center in Asheville, N.C., a branch of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

Indeed, January 2006 was the warmest on record in the U.S. and December was the fourth warmest since record-keeping began in 1895. In five states, December temperatures set record highs: Minnesota, New York, Connecticut, Vermont and New Hampshire.

"We are breaking warm records all over the place," said climate scientist Gavin Schmidt at NASA's Goddard Institute for Space Studies in New York, who was not involved in the NOAA analysis.

Even cities now in winter's stranglehold were relatively balmy. Denver, paralyzed by blizzards during its third snowiest December on record, still basked in a monthly temperature 1.7 degrees higher than the average from 1971 to 2000, the researchers said. In Minneapolis-St. Paul, the temperature was 17 degrees above normal for the last three weeks of December.

Temperatures in California, which experienced a searing heat wave in the summer, ran above normal for the year, but not as high as most of the country.

Each of the last nine years all has been among the 25 warmest years on record in the U.S. — an unprecedented hot streak historically, the scientists said.

Overall, annual temperatures in the U.S. and around the world are one degree higher than a century ago and the rate of warming has accelerated threefold in recent decades. Eight of the last 10 years are the warmest on record worldwide. Climate experts at the British Meteorological Office last week predicted that this year could easily become the warmest year globally on record.

If global temperatures continue to rise as projected, melting icecaps could raise sea level worldwide by up to 3 feet by 2100, swamping coastal communities that are home to millions of people, according to estimates from the United Nations. At the same time, rising temperatures could fuel more powerful storms, while disrupting subtle seasonal patterns of plant growth and animal habitats around the world.

"Global warming is pushing these temperatures ever upward," said meteorologist Michael Mann, director of the Earth System Science Center at Penn State University. "We are loading the dice."

The rising temperature trends of recent years appear to closely track the general predictions of computerized climate models analyzing the effects of greenhouse gases on global climate patterns, several scientists said.

"It looks pretty much like what the climate models of global warming expected," said Penn State University climate analyst Richard Alley, who was not part of the research effort. "We have turned up Earth's thermostat."

Rising levels of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases, which can trap heat in the atmosphere, were a key factor in the warming trend, the climate center researchers said. The rate at which carbon dioxide is being released into the atmosphere has doubled since than 1990s, Australian researchers recently reported, with 7.85 billion tons of CO2 released into the atmosphere in 2005 alone.

But other influences, such as a mild El Niño current stirring in the Pacific Ocean, also played a role in blocking Arctic air that might normally chill the country, they said.

In 1998, record high temperatures were driven by an unusually powerful El Niño current that disrupted weather patterns worldwide. The current El Niño, a periodic warming current that took shape last summer, is far weaker and has had only a moderate effective on global climate, several experts said.

"What we are seeing is much more than El Niño," said climate analyst Kevin Trenberth at the National Center for Atmospheric Research in Boulder, Colo. "The overall pattern is consistent with our concepts of global warming."

To those who analyzed last year's temperature records, the effort to attribute the higher temperatures to relatively transitory minor perturbations in the planet's weather systems missed a more crucial trend.

"The important thing is that, in the long term, warmer temperatures are becoming the norm," said Jay Lawrimore, chief of the climate monitoring branch at the National Climatic Data Center, the federal center that prepared the study. "The expectation is that temperatures will continue to warm in the U.S. and globally."

As a consequence, Lawrimore said, "we expect droughts to become more severe and more widespread; we expect heavier precipitation events to be come frequent; heat waves will become more frequent; storm surges will be higher. Being able to adapt to changing climate will become an important part of daily life."

In last year's temperature extremes, the country got a preview of the future of climate change, several experts said.

DOJ_NMG_0114942

Last summer, at least half of the country was parched by prolonged drought as the lack of rain helped fuel a record wildfire season in which 9.8 million acres burned in more than 96,000 wildfires. At the same time, a severe heat wave in some areas, as high as 117 degrees, killed at least 225 people nationwide.

Now in the cold season, farmers in the Northeast are worried that temperatures are too high for fruit trees to winter properly, and wineries complain they can't prepare ice wine because their grapes won't freeze on the vine.

Nationwide, the demand for winter heating oil and other home energy needs is as much as 13.5% lower than the demand expected during average climate conditions, the NOAA scientists calculated.

"People say these things must be due to natural variability in the weather, but any reasonable person who looks at the data can see that we are changing the planet," said climate expert Tim Barnett at the Scripps Institution of Oceanography in La Jolla.

"When you look at global warming patterns," Barnett said, "there is a great big coherent pattern of temperature change."

U.S. To Raise Royalty Rates For Oil And Gas Leases In The Gulf (NYT)

New York Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 — The Bush administration, accused of failing to collect billions of dollars from companies that drill for oil and gas in federal waters, announced on Tuesday that it would demand higher royalties on all new deepwater leases in the Gulf of Mexico.

The Interior Department said it would raise the royalty rate to 16.7 percent from 12.5 percent of oil and gas sales, a change that it estimated would increase government revenue by $4.5 billion over 20 years.

“Increased royalty rates will ensure that during this time of high energy prices the American public receives its fair share of the value of oil and gas,” said Gary Strasburg, a spokesman for the department.

But the change will not alter any of the thousands of existing offshore leases, nor will it affect a mistake in hundreds of leases that could allow companies to escape as much as $10 billion in royalties over the next five years.

The Interior Department has been trying to renegotiate those leases for the last six months, but has managed to reach voluntary agreements with only 5 of the 56 companies that hold them. Two of the biggest players in the Gulf of Mexico, Chevron and Exxon Mobil, have refused to sign new deals.

Next week, House Democrats hope to pass legislation that would punish companies that refuse to renegotiate, either by imposing a stiff new tax on their production or by prohibiting them from acquiring new leases.

“Raising the royalty rates will do nothing to help the situation unless this administration expresses a true commitment to actually collecting these payments,” said Representative Nick J. Rahall II, Democrat of West Virginia and chairman of the House Committee on Natural Resources. “The oil and gas royalties system is broken and needs to be fixed.”

In a separate decision, the Bush administration announced that it might lift a longstanding prohibition on drilling in Bristol Bay, an area off the coast of Alaska that is part of the North Aleutian Basin. The area has been closed to oil and gas leasing since 1990, partly in response to the enormous tanker spill in 1989 by the Exxon Valdez.

The Interior Department also announced plans to open a big new area in the central part of the Gulf of Mexico, a move that Congress authorized in December.

U.S. Is Raising Gulf Royalties For Oil And Gas (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka And Russell Gold

Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration said it is raising royalty payments it charges producers of oil and natural gas in the deeper waters of the Gulf of Mexico, apparently to appease critics in Congress who say the government has failed to collect all of the royalty payments owed it from past Gulf production.

The increase, announced by Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne, would raise the required federal payment on new leases from the current equivalent of one barrel out of every eight produced to one barrel out of six. The higher rate will boost federal royalty revenues by $4.5 billion over 20 years, according to the Interior Department. About 25% of U.S. oil production comes from the Gulf.

Mr. Kempthorne also said President Bush is removing federal drilling bans from two five-million-acre tracts, one in the Gulf of Mexico and another in Bristol Bay, in the North Aleutian Basin of Alaska.

Both moves, he said, are designed to increase opportunities for domestic energy production and to increase federal revenues.

The increase in Gulf royalties comes as oil-rich nations around the globe are responding to soaring oil-company profit by raising royalties and taxes on oil production.

DOJ_NMG_0114943

A spokesman for BP PLC, one of the largest producers in the Gulf, Neal Chapman, said, "It's another cost increase and costs are increasing across the board. Any additional burden in the cost equation makes an area less attractive because we look at investment decisions globally."

"At a time we are talking about securing domestic energy, this seems to fly in the face of that," said Erik Milito, a spokesman for the American Petroleum Institute, an industry trade group based in Washington. "It is hard to make an argument that raising the cost to industry is good for consumers." Mr. Milito acknowledged, however, that companies might simply offer lower upfront bids for the right to explore offshore blocks because they know they will have to pay higher royalties. This could end up balancing and not increasing the cost of looking for oil in the Gulf.

Kjersti H. Torgersen, a spokesman for Norway's Statoil ASA, warned that drillers may respond to the higher royalty rate by lowering their bids in future lease sales, which could reduce the federal government's estimated take from the royalty increase. In two lease sales in 2006, the Interior Department received winning bids valued at $912 million.

Democrats Push Green Energy Plans (CHIT)

By William Neikirk

Chicago Tribune, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Democrats are pushing a cleaner, greener energy policy that they will try to drive through the House later this month. But its ultimate outlook is uncertain—and so is its impact.

As part of their 100-hour strategy to pass high-profile legislation, House Democratic leaders want to do away with billions of dollars in oil industry tax incentives and force oil companies to pay higher royalties on Gulf of Mexico leases. The extra money would be used to give a dramatic boost to renewable energy sources.

This shift in energy policy has been widely hailed by organizations that stress renewable and alternative sources of energy such as bio-fuels, solar and wind power. Energy efficiency and conservation groups also hope for more money. Although President Bush increasingly has talked about development of such energy sources, funding has been spotty.

"This was never particularly important to Tom DeLay [the former House Republican majority leader]," said Randall Swisher, executive director of the American Wind Energy Association.

He said he is hopeful Congress will use the extra money partly to extend production tax credits for wind energy for at least five years rather than at the current rate of one to two years at a time, a move that would dramatically increase the size of the industry.

But the new legislation faces two big hurdles—a Senate where Democrats have a razor-thin margin and a White House that backed the tax breaks in the first place.

In addition, some energy analysts said they doubt that the bill would contribute greatly to easing the nation's energy problem any time soon, even if the House bill should become law. For now, emphasizing green power at the expense of other steps may be inadequate to the task, they say.

Philip Verleger, an Aspen, Colo. economist who specializes in the energy industry, said the nation needs a more comprehensive energy policy. He would advocate forcing more conservation by raising energy taxes sharply and imposing tougher mileage standards on vehicles. He also favors a minimum price for oil to keep the price from fluctuating so wildly, and encourage more production.

If the Democratic bill passes, he said, "I don't think much would happen" in terms of its broader impact on energy supply. "The real issues are whether it is going to get signed into law, and how they are going to get it through the Senate. I think the likelihood is that we are going to see a stalemate on energy legislation for the next two years."

Andrew Weissman, an energy consultant in Washington, said he also feels the Democratic approach is inadequate to address the longer-range energy problem that he foresees. "When I look at the situation developing beyond the next three or four years, we are facing massive supply deficits," he said. "I don't see Democrats or Republicans addressing them."

Ironically, oil and natural gas prices have declined markedly since last year, and warmer weather in some parts of the country has continued a downward price push.

But looking beyond the immediate period, the energy-supply situation is less certain. Prices have been extremely volatile in the past few years, and that pattern could continueAnother major energy bill is co-sponsored by Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.). It would require a dramatic expansion in the ethanol and biodiesel fuel supply. Now, ethanol comprises about 5 billion gallons of U.S. supply per year. The bill would raise that to 30 billion gallons by 2020 and 60 billion gallons by 2030. It would also require major oil companies to ensure that within 10 years, half of their gasoline stations would be able to pump gasoline containing 85 percent ethanol. Its chances are uncertain.

DOJ_NMG_0114944

Sen. Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.), chairman of the Senate Energy Committee, said in an interview, "I think there is great sentiment in this Congress to move ahead with locking in provisions that will get us to a green energy future. A lot of people campaigned on that last fall, and I think the public is interested" in that energy-policy focus.

At the moment, the oil and gas industry is gearing up to fight the House measure by questioning whether Democrats are removing important incentives for production that could wind up discouraging domestic drilling for extra supply. But some Democrats believe the president might sign the bill.

"It sends the wrong signal to investors," said Charles Drevna, executive vice president of the National Petrochemical and Refiners Association. "It says you are not for increasing energy supply. You are not for increasing domestic resources. What you are for is some punitive measure because the oil and gas and refining industries enjoyed some increased profits. It's Alice-in-Wonderland energy policy."

Mark Kibbe, senior tax policy analyst for the American Petroleum Institute, said the Democrats are focusing on a 2004 job-creation bill providing tax deductions for companies, including oil and gas firms and refineries.

Kibbe said much of the new production occurs in the deep waters of the gulf, where drilling is expensive. "What you do at some point is you make U.S. projects non-economic" against foreign producers, he said.

Details of the legislation are still skimpy, but House leaders said it would call for repeal of about $5 billion in 2004 tax cuts for the oil and gas industry. In addition, it would seek to force oil companies to pay higher royalties on oil drilled in the Gulf of Mexico. House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said last week that extra royalty income could total $9 billion to $11 billion.

Precisely how the money would be used to subsidize renewable fuels is also a question mark, and that decision could come after the House passes the revenue-raising legislation. It is also possible that Democrats would seek to reduce some oil and gas incentives in a 2005 energy bill to raise more money.

"We're going to make sure that we're not subsidizing oil companies, but that we're investing in renewable energy sources and alternative energy sources so that in the long term we will be energy independent," Hoyer said.

Scott Skald, president of the Stella Group LTD., a firm that specializes in renewable energy, said it's crucial that any new money not sit idly in a fund but is used for projects and tax credits. In the past, "green" industries have complained that promised funds either have not materialized or have been trimmed.

Kara Saul Rinadli, senior director of policy for the Alliance to Save Energy, said that after Bush signed a bill calling for a sharp increase in funding for energy efficiency measures, his budget last year sharply cut back on these programs. "It is important that Congress go back and take a look at these programs," she said.

Bush Lifts Oil-Drill Ban In Alaska's Bristol Bay (WP)

By Steven Mufson And Juliet Eilperin

Washington Post, January 10, 2007

Royalties to Rise for Some Offshore Wells in Advance of Democrats' Plans to Roll Back Tax Breaks

The Bush administration yesterday moved to boost U.S. oil and gas supplies by lifting a long-standing moratorium on drilling in Alaska's Bristol Bay, as OPEC accelerated plans to reduce supplies in order to prop up sagging crude prices.

Days before the House is expected to roll back oil industry tax breaks, the Bush administration also decided to boost royalty rates by a third for ultra-deep-water oil and gas drilling. The action eliminates extra incentives that had been given to offset some of the high costs of operating in those offshore areas. The Interior Department said the change would generate an additional $4.5 billion over 20 years.

Meanwhile, as the line between environmental and energy policy continue to blur, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) announced a plan yesterday that would boost alternative fuels by requiring a 10 percent cut in the carbon content of vehicle emissions by 2020. He said it would be good for the nation's energy security while slowing climate change.

In Washington, Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne announced that the administration would open 5.6 million acres in Alaska's North Aleutian Basin for oil and gas development.

Congress first barred drilling in Bristol Bay in 1989 after the huge Exxon Valdez oil tanker spill damaged Alaska's coast. Congress lifted the ban in 2003 at the urging of Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska). But a moratorium President Bill Clinton declared on drilling in the area in 1998 remained in effect, so it took Bush's action yesterday to open it to development. Bush also lifted a presidential moratorium on part of the Gulf of Mexico that Congress opened for drilling in December.

Kempthorne said the offshore drilling in both areas and the increase in royalty fees would "enhance America's energy security by improving opportunities for domestic energy production, and will also increase the revenues that the federal government collects from oil and gas companies on behalf of American taxpayers."

Bob Greco, group director of upstream and industry operations at the American Petroleum Institute, said that "increasing access to those resources is an important step toward meeting our growing energy demand." But he said that goal would be offset in part by the increase in royalty payments, which he said would undercut industry's enthusiasm for drilling in deep waters off U.S. coasts, where a single well can cost $100 million. Higher royalties could also result in lower bids for leases in deep water, Greco said.

"President Bush's decision to lift this moratorium is welcome news for people who live and work in the Bristol Bay region," Stevens said in a written statement. "Imported farmed salmon, high energy costs, and the area's remoteness have limited economic development and contributed to high poverty in the region."

Other Alaskans decried the decision, saying development would bring in less than $8 billion once all the energy was tapped while undermining a fishing industry that brings in $2 billion a year.

"This decision borders on irresponsible, from our perspective," said Eric J. Siy, executive director of the Alaska Marine Conservation Council. The bay has the world's biggest wild sockeye salmon run as well as abundant red king crab, Pacific halibut and Bering Sea pollock and cod fisheries, he said. "The wise thing to do is to invest in the health of that sustainable economy."

Kempthorne said that any proposed project in Bristol Bay or the Gulf of Mexico "would receive thorough environmental reviews."

But Siy noted that a 1985 federal environmental impact statement suggested that the region posed a danger of a major oil spill. "This is a place with hurricane-force winds, with floating sea ice," he said. An oil spill could be "a nightmare" in an area home to 1 million migrating waterfowl and such marine mammals as endangered right whales, he added.

Meanwhile, the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries was trying to control the winds that have been buffeting oil prices over the past week. Prices on the New York Mercantile Exchange for February delivery slipped to $53.88 a barrel yesterday, below a threshold that many technical analysts said supported high prices. Prices rebounded after reports that OPEC would trim half a million barrels a day from its output immediately instead of waiting until Feb. 1 as planned. The price still closed down 45 cents at $55.64 a barrel, the lowest close since June 15, 2005.

The decline in the value of the dollar has prodded OPEC to try to boost crude oil prices. OPEC oil exports are priced in dollars, but its consumer and industrial imports are largely priced in euros.

In California, Schwarzenegger's administration said that the state would require oil companies to reduce the carbon emitted by their fuels by 10 percent by 2020. Linda S. Adams, secretary of the California Environmental Protection Agency, said that transportation fuels accounted for more than 40 percent of greenhouse gases emitted in the state.

Companies that do not meet that standard could buy credits from other companies that had exceeded the state's goals. This system would resemble what are known as cap-and-trade systems in place for sulfur dioxide emissions in the United States and for greenhouse gases in Europe.

State officials said at a briefing that they hoped that the new regulations would spur development of ethanol, biomass, electric vehicles and hydrogen technology. Schwarzenegger said in a written statement that those alternatives reduce a "petroleum dependency" that "contributes to climate change and leaves workers, businesses and consumers vulnerable to price shocks from an unstable global energy market."

But Charles T. Drevna, executive vice president of the National Petrochemical and Refiners Association, said that "even with global climate change, the energy world is going to revolve around the hydrocarbon molecule for a long time." He said he opposed California's plan. "Last time I checked," he said, "the term was global climate change, not Lower 48 climate change."

SAN FRANCISCO Justice Dept. Undercut Its Own Case, Chronicle Argues (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, January 10, 2007

The Chronicle told a federal appeals court Monday that a secret government filing in support of fines against the newspaper and prison sentences for two of its reporters actually undermines prosecutors' case against the journalists for refusing to disclose the sources of grand jury leaks about athletes and steroids.

Federal prosecutors submitted the documents under seal last month to the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco, saying they contained new information about their efforts to identify the sources of the information supplied to the reporters, Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams. The court has scheduled a hearing Feb. 12 on a judge's contempt-of-court orders against the reporters and The Chronicle.

Their sealed filing came a day after reports by the Associated Press and Yahoo.com that the FBI was investigating a former defense lawyer in the steroid case as a possible source of the leak.

DOJ_NMG_0114946

In Monday's filing, lawyers for the reporters and the newspaper argued that prosecutors were effectively conceding they had failed to pursue alternative sources of information about the leaks before going after the reporters.

The Justice Department says it issues subpoenas to journalists only as a last resort. The Chronicle contends the same standard is part of the constitutional guarantee of freedom of the press and was not met in this case.

Lawyers for the Hearst Corp., which owns The Chronicle, said Monday the government has now admitted that it was still looking into alternative sources long after a grand jury issued the subpoenas last May, and after the judge found the reporters and the newspaper in contempt last September.

"The information reflected in the ex parte (sealed) filing reveals that the government is not capable of sustaining its burden of demonstrating that it properly exhausted alternative sources before taking the investigative shortcut of subpoenaing the press," Hearst lawyers said.

They asked the appeals court to dismiss the contempt orders, or at least to allow them to see the sealed government filing and answer it before next month's hearing.

Prosecutors have asked the court to uphold the contempt orders and penalties, saying the Supreme Court has made it clear since 1972 that journalists have no special privilege to withhold evidence from a grand jury.

Fainaru-Wada and Williams wrote articles in 2004 quoting closed-door grand jury testimony by Barry Bonds of the Giants, Jason Giambi of the New York Yankees, sprinter Tim Montgomery and other athletes about performance-enhancing drugs supplied by the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, or BALCO.

The athletes were testifying in an investigation that resulted in guilty pleas by the lab's founder, Victor Conte, and four other men to drug-distribution charges. A separate grand jury is looking into whether Bonds committed perjury by denying that he ever knowingly used steroids.

After another grand jury was convened to investigate the leak, U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White upheld the subpoenas to Fainaru-Wada and Williams and ordered them imprisoned for up to 18 months unless they revealed their sources for the grand jury transcripts. White also said he would fine The Chronicle $1,000 a day until it turned over documents sought by prosecutors. The imprisonment and fines have been delayed until the appeals court reviews White's decision.

In Cocaine Case: Four Men Get Terms In Prison (MARTBULL)

By Debbie Hall, Bulletin Staff Writer

Martinsville (VA) Bulletin, January 10, 2007

Four men have been sentenced by a federal judge in a cocaine distribution conspiracy case.

Heidi Coy, public affairs specialist for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Roanoke, said those sentenced Friday were:

· Felipe Nolasco Alvarez, who received a 10-year prison term for his role in bringing drugs into Henry County;

· Rigoberto Avila-Oropeza, who was sentenced to seven years, three months in prison;

· Noel Rios-Munoz, who received a four-year and nine-month sentence;

· and Antonio Degrado-Vasquez, who was sentenced and will serve four years and three months.

All were sentenced by U.S. District Court Judge Jackson Kiser of Martinsville and were among seven people initially indicted in the case last year in a five-count indictment.

All four had pleaded guilty to one count each of conspiracy to distribute more than 5,000 grams of cocaine, Coy said.

A fifth defendant, Tomas Damian Garcia, was scheduled to appear for his Sept. 26 change of plea hearing but he remains at large.

Another defendant, Calvin Rayfield Moore, also pleaded guilty to count one of the indictment, but died in November in a car crash in Franklin County. As a result, federal officials dismissed charges against him in December, Coy said.

A final defendant, Alvin Donnell Hunt, also pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to distribute more than 5,000 grams of cocaine. His sentencing is slated for April, Coy said.

The federal indictment included charges of conspiracy to distribute 5,000 grams or more of cocaine powder (count 1), possession with intent to distribute cocaine (count 2), possession with intent to distribute cocaine powder (count 3), possession with intent to distribute cocaine powder (count 4) and forfeiture (count 5).

Hunt was charged with counts 1 and 5; Moore was charged with counts 1, 2 and 5; Garcia was charged with counts 1 and 5; Avila-Oropeza on counts 1, 2 and 5; Alvarez on counts 1, 3 and 5; Rios-Munoz on counts 1, 4 and 5 and Antonio Delgado-Vasquez on counts 1 and 5, according to Coy.

The drug distribution ring allegedly was responsible for bringing in more than 3.3 kilograms of cocaine worth nearly $3.3 million into Henry County, U.S. Attorney John Brownlee said when the indictments were issued in April.

DOJ_NMG_0114947

The Drug Enforcement Administration and the Virginia State Police investigation into the alleged drug ring began in February when a man was arrested in the Eastern District of Virginia while allegedly in possession of more than 50 grams of cocaine, according to a release from Brownlee's office.

The man told investigators that a Henry County man was his source for the drugs, the release stated. Under the supervision of law enforcement, the man allegedly arranged to meet two men in Henry County to buy cocaine, the release added.

On March 14, the release stated that agents executed a search warrant at Moore's Bassett home. They seized 25 kilograms of cocaine, the release stated.

Before his death, Moore also was cooperating with authorities investigating corruption in the Henry County Sheriff's Office, according to Moore's attorney.

On Nov. 2, former Henry County sheriff H. Frank Cassell, along with 12 former members of his department and seven residents, were charged in a 50-page, 48-count federal indictment which includes allegations of racketeering conspiracy, obstruction of justice, misprision, money laundering, firearms offenses, drug charges, perjury and other charges.

Man Sentenced In '05 Gunbattle (AZREP)

By Elias C. Arnold, The Arizona Republic

Arizona Republic, January 10, 2007

A 25-year-old man has been sentenced to 40 years in prison in connection with a 2005 gunbattle in Gilbert.

Joshua Wayne Trotter was sentenced Monday afternoon after he pleaded guilty in September to seven counts of assaulting a federal officer, unlawful possession of a firearm and use of a firearm during and in retaliation to a crime of violence.

Trotter was accused of shooting at U.S. Marshals, injuring one, June 3, 2005, as they attempted to arrest him on a probation violation federal warrant, according to the U.S. Attorney for Arizona.

Trotter has five previous felony convictions, including assaulting police officers, and a case pending in Coconino County Court on a charge of assault on a family member, the U.S. Attorney's Office said.

The Marshals tracked Trotter, a suspected methamphetamine user, to Gilbert after he is believed to have terrorized his family three weeks earlier near the Grand Canyon, a U.S. Marshals Service representative told The Arizona Republic in 2005.

According to the U.S. Attorney's Office, marshals attempted to block Trotter's path with their vehicles as he drove away from a house east of Lindsay and Pecos roads.

Trotter backed the vehicle into one of the cars, pushing it, and marshals fired at the vehicle before it broke loose and backed into a light pole, the office said. He then fired back at the officers, striking Deputy Dennis Harkins in the hand. Marshals returned fire and struck Trotter in the hand and head.

Gilbert Man Sentenced To 40 Years For Shootout With U.S. Marshals (AP)

AP, January 10, 2007

PHOENIX - A Gilbert man has been sentenced to 40 years in a federal prison for crimes connected to a shootout with deputy U.S. Marshals who were trying to arrest him in 2005, the U.S. Attorney's Office announced Tuesday.

Joshua Wayne Trotter, 25, pleaded guilty in September to seven counts of assaulting a federal officer and two weapons charges. He was sentenced Monday by U.S. District Judge Paul K. Rosenblatt.

Trotter was leaving his Gilbert home on June 3, 2005 when federal agents in two vehicles blocked his car and turned on their emergency lights, according to the U.S. Attorney. Trotter backed up and slammed into a third Marshals' vehicle.

A Marshal opened fire as Trotter pushed the other Marshal's car backwards, and Trotter returned fire with a pistol, striking one deputy in the hand. Trotter eventually was shot twice and surrendered. He had five previous felony convictions and has an assault case pending in Coconino County Court.

Rosenblatt described Trotter as a "poster-boy for the effects of methamphetamine," at the sentencing, the U.S. Attorney's office said.

Mexican Man Extradited To U.S. To Face Charges In Slaying Of California Deputy Sheriff (AP)

Associated Press

AP, January 10, 2007

MEXICO CITY – A Mexican man was extradited to the United States on Tuesday in connection with the slaying of a deputy sheriff in California.

DOJ_NMG_0114948

Jorge Arroyo Garcia, alias Jorge Rubo or Armando Garcia, was flown to the northern city of Tijuana, across the border from San Diego, California, and formally handed over to agents from the United States Marshals Service, the Mexican Attorney General's Office said in a news release.

According to U.S. authorities, Arroyo is believed to have shot Los Angeles County Deputy Sheriff David March during a traffic stop in April 2002. In addition to murder, Arroyo is accused of illegal weapons possession.

Arroyo was first captured by Mexican authorities in 2004 and he has been held in a Mexican prison since. He filed various appeals fighting his extradition that eventually were dismissed.

The Attorney General's Office described Arroyo as one of the United States Marshal Service's most-wanted fugitives.

Arroyo's name did not appear Tuesday on the 15 Most Wanted Fugitives list or the Captured 15 Most Wanted list that appear on the service's Web site.

U.S. Ambassador to Mexico Tony Garza lauded the Mexican government's action, saying, "With this very important extradition, it is clear that under the (President Felipe) Calderon administration, the governments of Mexico and the U.S. will continue our unprecedented law enforcement cooperation and that we will bring to justice anyone who does harm to the law enforcement officials who protect our way of life."

Garza noted that last year alone, the administration of then-President Vicente Fox extradited 63 alleged criminals from Mexico to the United States.

Man Charged In L.A. Deputy's Killing Extradited (LAT)

By Sam Enriquez And Andrew Blankstein

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

MEXICO CITY — The Mexican government today turned over to U.S. authorities a man charged with the 2002 killing of Los Angeles County Sheriff's Deputy David March.

Jorge Armando Arroyo Garcia was taken by airplane from Mexico City, where he was in jail, to Tijuana. A SWAT unit from the Mexican federal police escorted him.

A convoy of local and federal authorities then took him into U.S. custody at 5 a.m.

"I felt it would be a day of celebration, instead it's a day of extreme sorrow," Teri March, the deputy's widow, said at an afternoon news conference.

Also attending were L.A. County Sheriff Lee Baca, L.A. County Dist. Atty. Steve Cooley and Mexican officials.

The extradition marks a victory for L.A. prosecutors and local police, who have been trying for several years to get Garcia to stand trial. Detectives allege that after shooting March during a traffic stop in Irwindale, Garcia fled to Jalisco, Mexico. He was arrested last year.

March, 33, was a seven-year veteran who stopped a black Nissan, allegedly driven by Garcia, during a routine morning patrol on April 29, 2002. March, who lived with his wife and stepdaughter in Santa Clarita, was shot several times and later died at a hospital.

Garcia, said to be an illegal immigrant and drug dealer, was identified as a suspect by investigators, but had fled to Mexico.

Mexican police were said to be helping in the search, but at that time the extradition of fugitives to the U.S. from Mexico was in dispute. Mexican judges balked at allowing Mexican nationals to be returned to a country where they could face the death penalty or life in prison.

In 2004, Mexico's Supreme Court ended a four-year argument with the U.S. over extradition by ruling that thousands of slaying suspects could be returned.

Opinion in Mexico on the issue had changed, as Mexican states began imposing harsher penalties on criminals in an effort to curb violent crime.

IMMIGRATION:

86-year-old Man With Reputed Nazi Past Again Appeals Deportation (AP)

AP, January 10, 2007

CINCINNATI (AP) — A retired Ohio auto worker ordered deported over accusations that he was a Nazi death camp guard during World War II has started another appeal in a federal court, his lawyer said Tuesday.

John Demjanjuk, 86, of suburban Cleveland, on Dec. 21 lost his previous attempt to avoid deportation when the Board of Immigration Appeals in Falls Church, Va., rejected his appeal of an immigration judge's 2005 deportation order.

DOJ_NMG_0114949

But Demjanjuk still has the right to appeal that ruling in federal courts, so the filing of a petition for review in the 6th Circuit in Cincinnati was expected. The filing Monday starts the next appeal process, defense lawyer John Broadley said.

The immigration appeals board said Demjanjuk's Nazi guard past is conclusively established.

Demjanjuk's case dates back nearly 30 years. He was cleared in 1993 in Israel of being the notorious "Ivan the Terrible," a sadistic guard at the Treblinka concentration camp in Poland. But the Justice Department said World War II documents prove he was a Nazi guard at various death or forced labor camps.

Demjanjuk, a native Ukrainian, has denied he aided the Nazis and came to the United States after the war as a displaced person.

Lawmakers Support 2 Convicted Agents (ELPT)

By Louie Gilot

El Paso Times, January 10, 2007

Five congressmen said they will have a news conference today in Washington, D.C., to support the efforts of two former El Paso Border Patrol agents to remain free on bond while they appeal their convictions in the case of a drug smuggler who was shot in the buttocks in 2005 near Fabens.

The elected officials said they wrote to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales requesting the Justice Department to direct federal prosecutors to not oppose a motion for bond continuance by Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean. If a federal judge denies the motion, Ramos and Compean have to surrender on Jan. 17 to start their prison sentences.

The lawmakers are U.S. Reps. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., Ted Poe, R-Texas, Walter Jones, R-N.C., Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., and Duncan Hunter, R-Calif.

Plans For Border Fence Draw Renewed Scrutiny (MCT)

By Dave Montgomery

McClatchy Newspapers, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON - With Democrats now in charge on Capitol Hill, a 700-mile fence that swept through the previous Republican-controlled Congress is apt to come under a scathing re-evaluation amid reports of skyrocketing costs and widening opposition along the U.S.-Mexican border.

Mayors from Texas border cities will meet with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff next week with what they say is a unified message: Don't build the fence. The meeting is scheduled for Jan. 17 in the office of Texas Republican Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison.

"We all oppose the fence," said Efrain Valdez, mayor of Del Rio, Texas.

The growing outcry from local officials parallels renewed concerns over costs following a report that the price tag for building and maintaining the fencing could reach nearly $50 billion over a 25-year period. The cost projections were prepared by the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service and reported this week by the San Francisco Chronicle.

The doubled-layered fence, which will be built in at least five sections in all four states that border Mexico, was passed overwhelmingly by the Republican-led 109th Congress and signed into law by President Bush. It was the only major immigration and border security initiative to emerge from the last session of Congress and was denounced by Democrats as a blatant political maneuver to court conservative voters.

But with Democrats leading both the House of Representatives and the Senate, many experts in the immigration debate now wonder if the fence will ever be built. For one thing, Congress only partially funded the project, and members of the Democratic leadership may be stingy when it comes to financing an undertaking they opposed in the first place.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and two key House members who'll oversee the debate on immigration this year - Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers, D-Mich., and Rep. Zoe Lofgren, D-Calif., who'll chair the House immigration subcommittee - all voted against the fence when it passed the House 283-138 on Sept. 14.

They were among 132 Democrats who opposed the Secure Fence Act. Only six Republicans voted against it.

In a pre-emptive effort to move the project forward, Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., a leading sponsor of the act, and 37 fellow GOP House members wrote Bush last week, urging the president to continue funding for the fence when he unveils his federal spending priorities next month for fiscal 2008.

"Americans overwhelmingly support the construction of targeted fencing along our southern border," the lawmakers wrote. "The fact remains that fences act as a deterrent and keep people from risking their lives to cross the border."

Other signers of the letter included Reps. Joe Barton, R-Texas; John Doolittle, R-Calif.; and four Republicans from North Carolina - Sue Myrick, Walter Jones, Robin Hayes and Howard Coble. Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., a leader of anti-immigration forces in the House, also signed the letter.

DOJ_NMG_0114950

The Congressional Research Service, which briefs lawmakers on issues, said the 2006 legislation could mandate up to 850 miles of fencing. In sharp contrast with initial projections of $2.2 billion for 700 miles of fencing, the researchers said that the cost of building and maintaining a fence over a 25-year lifecycle could range from $16.4 million to $70 million per mile.

The report didn't calculate a total, but, under the highest projections, the cost would be $49 billion for a 700-mile fence.

"At issue for Congress is how best to allocate scarce border resources while safeguarding homeland security," the report stated. "Does border fencing represent the best investment of border security funding, and what is the appropriate mix of border security resources?"

The Department of Homeland Security is charged with overseeing fence construction and has commissioned the Boeing Co. to construct a high-tech border security shield, including cameras and radar, that will be coupled with traditional fencing.

I.R.S. Use Of Private Debt Collectors Is Criticized (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

The national taxpayer advocate called on Congress yesterday to repeal the authority of the Internal Revenue Service to use private debt collectors.

In her annual report, the taxpayer advocate, Nina E. Olson, said the private debt collection program was economically inefficient and prone to abuse. In particular, she faulted the I.R.S. for not disclosing certain "psychological techniques" used by the private contractors to try to collect unpaid taxes.

The office of the taxpayer advocate was created by Congress to identify problems within the I.R.S. that affect taxpayers and to promote their interests before the agency and Congress, which writes the tax code.

Ms. Olson's office provided its most extensive review yet of the private debt-collection program, which it has been monitoring for two years since plans for it were announced. The program, which formally started in September, is meant to farm out easily collectible tax bills, typically owed by low-income taxpayers, to private collection agencies. When the I.R.S. announced the program, it said that the private entities would abide by the same publicly disclosed rules as I.R.S. employees.

Private debt collection has drawn criticism that it is not cost-efficient and that some of the private firms hired by the I.R.S. have questionable business practices. One firm hired by the agency was the law firm of Linebarger Goggan Blair & Sampson of Austin, Tex., whose former partner, Juan Peña, pleaded guilty to federal bribery charges for his role in winning a collection contract from the city of San Antonio.

The taxpayer advocate also criticized some of the techniques used by private collectors. "In an initial draft of this report, we cited sections of a collection script used by one of the contractors which used psychological tricks during the conversation to get the taxpayers to commit to a payment, which is then followed by a belated Fair Debt Collection Practices Act warning at the end of the conversation," the report says.

"The I.R.S. informed us that private collection agencies had designated the 'collection scripts' and operational plans as proprietary and that we could not cite specific portions of the scripts."

She then wrote that the I.R.S. had later asked the three private debt collection firms to release information on their practices. One firm complied, Ms. Olson wrote, the second released partial information, and the third refused to release any information.

In a brief telephone interview yesterday, Ms. Olson said, "Taxes are the lifeblood of government; to have private agents collecting them changes the relationship between the taxpayer and government."

In its written response to Ms. Olson's criticism of the private debt-collection program, the I.R.S. said that it "strives to make certain that P.C.A. employees adhere to the same guidelines and restrictions as I.R.S. employees." P.C.A. refers to private debt collectors.

The I.R.S. also said that it had taken steps to have all three private debt collection firms approve the release of the documents sought by Ms. Olson, and that it was releasing "other appropriate information."

The I.R.S. began using three private debt collectors last September for 12,500 cases considered easy to collect, and expects to process 446,000 cases over two and a half years, Ms. Olson wrote. The collectors keep 25 cents of every dollar they collect. So far they have collected just 8 percent of the dollars assigned to them, she wrote — less than certain I.R.S. units with more difficult collection cases.

"Our conclusion is that this initiative is fatally flawed, risking much for a small return on investment," she wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0114951

The commissioner of internal revenue, Mark W. Everson, has said that if the I.R.S. had more money it would not have to outsource tax collection to private firms.

Ms. Olson also noted a 36 percent rise last year in demands, called notices of levy, that the I.R.S. sends to delinquent taxpayers asking them to settle their bills with the agency. A significant portion of such demands were served on elderly or disabled taxpayers, she wrote.

In her report, Ms. Olson also recommended that Congress improve funding for the I.R.S., which received $10.6 billion to collect $2.2 trillion, or 98 percent of all federal revenue. She also recommended, for a second consecutive year, that Congress protect not-guilty spouses from the burdens of tax crimes, by repealing joint and several liability rules. She also called upon Congress to create a federal oversight agency to supervise quasigovernment retirement plans, "to ensure that they are carrying out their fiduciary duties."

Ms. Olson also said that the I.R.S. failed to turn over documents concerning its internal deliberations on tax matters. This was the first time that the I.R.S. failed to turn over documents requested by the office of the taxpayer advocate, she said.

"The effect of this refusal is to thwart Congressional intent in seeking a taxpayer perspective on potential problems within the I.R.S.," Ms. Olson wrote. "As a consequence, Congress is being left in the dark, and taxpayers are being harmed." Ms. Olson did not specify in her report what types of documents she was looking for or what issues they addressed.

In its response, the I.R.S. said that it was "committed to improving the way it manages instructions to staff."

IRS Urged To Abandon Private Debt Collection (WP)

By Kathleen Day

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

The Internal Revenue Service should abandon its four-month-old program of sending unpaid, uncomplicated tax debts of $25,000 or less to private bill collectors, national taxpayer advocate Nina E. Olson told Congress yesterday.

Olson, the federal official appointed by the Treasury secretary to champion taxpayer rights, said the plan already has proved unfair to consumers because private debt collectors will not make public the policies and procedures they use to extract repayments, as government tax collectors are required to do.

Olson, who heads the Taxpayer Advocate Service, an independent organization within the IRS, a unit of the Treasury Department, said she thinks the IRS could do a better job and for less money. She included the recommendation in a report to Congress that the national taxpayer advocate is required to make each year about issues the officeholder considers the gravest facing the IRS.

In addition to advocating that lawmakers revoke the IRS's authority to use private collection agencies, the report says the alternative minimum tax and the multibillion-dollar tax gap are both fundamentally unfair and are among the top issues facing the nation's tax collector.

Olson's recommendations were greeted warmly by the Democrats who will chair the two congressional committees that oversee the IRS, Max Baucus of Montana of the Senate Finance Committee and Charles B. Rangel of New York of the House Ways and Means Committee. Baucus and Rangel have strongly criticized the use of private debt collectors and have said the job should stay within the government, a position both reiterated yesterday.

Both also repeated their vow to tackle the alternative minimum tax, or AMT, and the tax gap -- the $290 billion to $350 billion in uncollected taxes -- in legislation this year.

The AMT is a parallel tax system Congress created in 1969 to ensure that even the richest people pay some federal tax. But because it hasn't been adjusted for inflation, and the regular tax system has, more and more people could find themselves having to pay higher taxes under the AMT.

The Tax Policy Center, a nonprofit joint research project of the Brookings Institution and the Urban Institute, estimates that if Congress had not frozen the AMT in 2005 at a level where it now affects nearly 4 million filers, it would have applied to more than 12.7 million out of more than 130 million individual tax filings, up from 1 million in 1999. By 2010, if Congress doesn't abolish it or freeze it at current levels, about 30 million taxpayers will be subject to the AMT, or about 92 percent of households with incomes between $100,000 and $500,000.

Financial planners say the tax cuts President Bush has touted pushed more Americans than ever into the AMT. Rangel said jettisoning the AMT will require "a look at the whole tax code" to make it fairer -- and to make up what the AMT brings in each year, estimated to be $70 billion for 2007.

The IRS has said the use of private debt collectors is necessary unless Congress provides the agency with more resources, and Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), outgoing chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said it's too soon to judge the program.

DOJ_NMG_0114952

Olson said the IRS is doing a better job of telling taxpayers when the they're suspected of filing bogus requests for refunds. Last year, Olson criticized the IRS's criminal investigation arm for stalling thousands of refunds, sometimes for months and even years, without telling the taxpayers why or allowing them to respond.

The Tax Hit You May Not See Phaseouts, Which Limit Tax Breaks Based On Income, Come Under Renewed Fire; What To Watch Out For (WSJ)

By Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

Millions of people are paying taxes at higher rates than they probably realize because of tricky provisions that can reduce -- or even eliminate -- major tax breaks based on their income.

These so-called phaseouts (because some benefits begin to phase out when your income exceeds certain levels) and similar provisions should be repealed, or at least simplified, said Nina Olson, the Internal Revenue Service's National Taxpayer Advocate, in a report to Congress released yesterday. Ms. Olson, who isn't a political appointee, heads an IRS unit designed to help taxpayers cut through red tape and deal with problems that typically couldn't be resolved through normal channels.

STEALTH TAXES

· Many people stand to lose part or all of key tax benefits because their income is too high.

· Numerous tax benefits include income-based "phaseout" provisions.

· Among the breaks affected: the phaseout of personal exemptions and limits on many itemized deductions.

· A new report by IRS National Taxpayer Advocate Nina Olson urges Congress to repeal, or at least simplify, phaseouts.

Source: IRS National Taxpayer Report

The report says more than 60 million individual income-tax returns, about 44% of the total filed last year, are affected each year by one or more of these provisions, which can drive up a taxpayer's marginal tax rate well above his or her official tax rate.

It's doubtful that Congress will eliminate phaseouts. Repealing them would cost the U.S. Treasury Department billions of dollars each year at a time when lawmakers are focusing more on cutting budget deficits than on simplifying the nation's notoriously complex tax system. Yet the report throws a new spotlight on a dimly lit corner of the tax world that many taxpayers need to understand more thoroughly in order to make intelligent tax and investment-planning decisions.

Phaseouts are also referred to as "stealth" taxes because they're difficult for the average taxpayer to detect. Among the most significant: limits on personal exemption amounts and on many itemized deductions, such as charitable contributions and state and local taxes, for taxpayers whose income exceeds certain levels. (More than 5.7 million individual returns for 2004 were hit by the income limit on itemized deductions. As a result, taxpayers were unable to deduct a total of more than $36.7 billion of itemized deductions for that year.)

DISAPPEARING TAX BENEFIT

See a sampling of major tax benefits.

Other benefits that may be affected include a credit for adopting a child, the child tax credit and education-related incentives. A new deduction for mortgage insurance also has phaseout provisions.

Even sophisticated taxpayers may be unaware of this issue since growing numbers of Americans are paying someone else to do their taxes for them. Last year, more than 60% of all taxpayers used paid preparers, up from 40% in the mid-1980s. And growing numbers of people rely on tax-preparation software to do the number-crunching for them.

"Most of my clients are unaware" of the phaseouts, says Stephen W. DeFilippis, owner of West Suburban Income Tax Service in Wheaton, Ill., and an enrolled agent, which means he is licensed to represent taxpayers before the IRS. He says clients often are amazed their tax bill was significantly higher than expected.

Phaseouts need to be repealed, said Ms. Olson, because they inject "needless complexity" into the tax laws, reduce the effectiveness of tax incentives, and make it tougher for many taxpayers to estimate their tax bills and pay the right amount of withholding or estimated taxes. Also, she argued, they probably reduce overall tax compliance.

"They add quite a bit of complexity to the tax code," agrees Lindy Paull of PricewaterhouseCoopers in Washington. Ms. Paull is a former chief of staff of Congress's Joint Committee on Taxation, which issued a lengthy report in 2001 urging Congress repeal numerous phaseout provisions.

Many phaseouts and other similar provisions affect only upper-income taxpayers, such as the one that applies to personal exemptions. For this year, each personal exemption is a maximum of $3,400, up $100 from 2006. But if your income exceeds a certain level, the most you can claim on your return for 2007 will be $1,133, the IRS says. For a married couple filing jointly, the personal exemption begins to phase out when their income exceeds $234,600 for 2007 and reaches the maximum phaseout amount after $357,100. For most singles, the range is $156,400 to $278,900.

DOJ_NMG_0114953

Congress voted to ease this provision starting in 2006, and repeal it entirely in 2010. But nobody knows whether that will happen now that the Democrats have recaptured control of both houses of Congress. Some Democrats say they want to roll back President Bush's tax breaks for higher-income taxpayers.

Other provisions affect people with much less income. For example, there are complex rules for how much of your Social Security benefits may be subject to tax.

Suppose your income -- which, for this purpose, includes such items as tax-exempt interest income and half of your Social Security benefits -- exceeds $32,000 but not more than $44,000. In that case, a maximum of half your Social Security benefits would be reported as part of your adjusted gross income. If your income exceeds $44,000, up to 85% of your Social Security benefits would be included as income and taxed accordingly.

As a result, some lower-income Americans may be paying significantly higher tax rates than they think.

Phaseouts are popular among lawmakers as a revenue-raising device since raising tax rates typically creates much bigger headlines -- and more of a political firestorm -- than tweaking complex phaseouts and other provisions. Thus, it would appear that many stealth taxes are here to stay. * * *

The IRS sets Feb. 3 as the starting date to process returns claiming tax benefits enacted last month.

Congress waited until last month to extend the life of several tax breaks that had expired at the end of 2005. Among the now-resurrected provisions, known as "extenders," is the option for taxpayers who itemize to deduct state and local sales taxes instead of state and local income taxes. Other revived provisions include special deductions for higher-education tuition and fees and for educator expenses.

Any other returns for individuals not claiming the extender provisions can be filed as normal this month, the IRS said. * * *

BRIEFS: The most serious problem confronting taxpayers is the alternative minimum tax, says the IRS's Ms. Olson....The Senate Finance Committee plans a hearing today on "tax incentives for businesses in response to a minimum-wage increase."

AMT, Tax Gap Called Gravest Tax Problems (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, January 10, 2007

A tax law meant to crack down on wealthy tax dodgers has instead become the most serious problem facing millions of other taxpayers.

For the government, the biggest problem is billions of dollars in unpaid taxes, National Taxpayer Advocate Nina E. Olson said Tuesday in a report to Congress on the hurdles Americans face in meeting their tax obligations.

Olson, who works independently within the Internal Revenue Service, also urged Congress to repeal IRS authority to contract out to private collection agencies, saying the IRS is better trained and more efficient in collecting delinquent taxes.

The advocate is required to submit an annual report to Congress listing at least 20 of the most serious problems encountered by taxpayers.

This year the list was topped by the alternative minimum tax, which was enacted in 1969 to close loopholes that enable the wealthy to avoid paying taxes. But because the law was not indexed for inflation, a provision that originally affected about 20,000 taxpayers now hits tens of millions.

"Today the AMT is left to punish taxpayers for engaging in such 'classic tax-avoidance behavior' as having children or living in a high-tax state," the report said in its summary.

Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., the incoming chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, and Senate Finance Committee leaders Max Baucus, D-Mont., and Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, have promised to address the AMT issue this year. But repealing the law, under which taxpayers reaching a certain income level lose dependent or state and local tax exemptions, could cost up to $1 trillion over the next decade. There's no consensus on how to make up for the lost revenues.

The second most serious problem was the gap between what taxpayers should be paying and what the IRS is collecting, estimated at $290 billion a year. The advocate said that noncompliance by some taxpayers requires good-faith taxpayers to pay an additional $2,200 a year.

It said the gap could be narrowed by tax simplification, tax withholding on non-wage income in certain situations and improved IRS compliance initiatives.

The report said the government loses billions of dollars because it does not intervene at an early stage on delinquent tax accounts, and does not fully utilize collection payment alternatives such as installment agreements.

It said the IRS also fails to provide the meaningful services that low income taxpayers need to meet their obligations regarding delinquencies, doesn't do enough to help small businesses with professional advice, and lacks adequate oversight over unenrolled return preparers.

DOJ_NMG_0114954

"Simplifying the tax code, particularly by repealing the AMT and reducing the inequities caused by the tax gap, will go a long way to helping America's taxpayers," said Olson.

The IRS, in its comments on the report, said it often allows taxpayers in arrears to pay over time, noting there were 2.77 million installment agreements in fiscal 2006, up 5 percent over the previous year.

It also defended the private collection program that was inaugurated last September, saying the program strives to make certain that private collection employees adhere to the same guidelines and restrictions as IRS employees. It said that in fiscal 2007 it expects gross revenues from the program to range from $33.8 million to $62.3 million, with costs between $23 million and $29.3 million.

National Treasury Employees Union President Colleen M. Kelley welcomed the recommendation to end the private collection program, saying paying debt collectors "a bounty of up to 25 percent of the money they collect is a waste of taxpayers' dollars and exposes taxpayers to the risk of identity theft and overly aggressive collection tactics."

The advocate recommended that Congress change its budget-writing procedures under which the IRS must compete with other agencies for federal dollars. "The IRS' lack of resources is a significant impediment to its ability to close the tax gap and thereby to reduce the federal budget deficit," the report said.

It also recommended elimination or simplification of phase-outs, under which various tax benefits are reduced as a taxpayer's income rises. It said such complexity is burdensome to taxpayers and may contribute to increased noncompliance.

The advocate did praise the IRS for making improvements in the Questionable Refund Program, which topped the list in 2005 as the most serious problem. The program came under fire for freezing the refunds of tens of thousands of taxpayers the IRS deemed questionable without telling people they were suspected of fraud. It noted that under new procedures all taxpayers receive notice of an IRS inquiry into a refund.

FEDERAL DIARY: Tax Collection Debate Is A Product Of Budget Battles (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, January 10, 2007

There always seems to be a disagreement over the numbers in government reports these days. Take the latest dispute over how many Internal Revenue Service employees it takes to monitor private tax collection efforts:

According to the national taxpayer advocate's annual report sent to Congress yesterday, the IRS has 65 employees overseeing 75 contract workers hired to collect unpaid tax bills.

Not exactly, the IRS said in comments elsewhere in the report. There are 65 IRS employees who work "as needed," but the time they are putting in is only equivalent to 31 full-time workers, the IRS said.

That jousting is a small part of a big debate over whether tax collection can be outsourced efficiently and in a way that protects the confidentiality of taxpayer records.

Nina E. Olson, the taxpayer advocate, clearly thinks the risks are too great. "It is difficult to fathom how 75 employees can achieve what the IRS cannot with its thousands of collection employees," she wrote.

She warned against "the hidden costs of using private collectors, notably potential erosion of customer service, lack of transparency of private collection operations, potential failure to provide consistent treatment for all taxpayers, and potential erosion of tax compliance."

Olson runs an independent office inside the IRS that hears from taxpayers who think they have been treated unfairly or who think the tax system is broken. The advocate's office sends Congress a report each year listing the most serious problems confronting taxpayers. [See story, Page D3.]

The idea of using private-sector debt collection companies to get small-time tax delinquents to pay up has been controversial since Congress gave the green light to the program in 2004. Some members of Congress have questioned whether the program will prove effective, and the National Treasury Employees Union, which represents IRS workers, is lobbying on Capitol Hill to ban such outsourcing.

Under the program, the debt-collection companies get a commission of up to 25 cents for every dollar they collect. The IRS has estimated that the outsourcing program will bring in about $1.4 billion, less costs, over 10 years and should free up revenue agents to focus on more complex cases and big-time tax cheats.

The outsourcing program, to a large degree, grew out of the pull-and-push over annual IRS budgets. The congressional appropriations process each year has kept the agency from getting a little extra money that could bring in a lot more tax revenue, Olson contended in her report.

If the government were a business, the IRS could be considered the "accounts receivable department" that generates revenue, Olson said. But Congress treats the IRS budget the way it treats other agency budgets, and that means the IRS in recent years has been pitted against housing, transportation and other programs for money and resources.

DOJ_NMG_0114955

The budget process "makes little sense," Olson said, because the IRS has said that its employees collect unpaid taxes more cheaply than contractors do. She noted that an IRS study in 2002 calculated the agency received enough money to work only 40 percent of its overdue tax accounts.

In her report, Olson recommended that Congress consider revising its budget rules in a way that lets the IRS receive funding aimed at maximizing tax compliance each year. Olson also recommended that Congress increase IRS personnel funding by 2 to 3 percent each year to allow the agency to increase staffing.

Colleen M. Kelley, president of the Treasury union, recently called for IRS staffing to be restored to 1998 levels to improve tax collection. Since 1998, she said, the number of revenue officers, who collect delinquent taxes, has declined by about 40 percent while the ranks of revenue agents, who audit tax returns, have dropped by about 30 percent.

"If the administration is serious about closing the tax gap," Kelley said, "it needs to ask Congress for more people."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Judicial Nominees Ask To Withdraw (AP)

By David Espo

AP, January 10, 2007

In a concession to the Senate's new Democratic majority, President Bush won't rename four controversial federal appeals court nominees whose confirmations were blocked last year, Republican officials said Tuesday.

William Haynes, William G. Myers III and Michael Wallace all asked to have their appointments withdrawn, these officials said. Judge Terrence Boyle was informed of the White House's decision, according to an ally.

Haynes is the Pentagon's top lawyer, and was an architect of the Bush's now-abandoned policy toward treatment of detainees in the war on terror. He had been tapped for the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Boyle is a federal judge in North Carolina, and his appointment to the 4th Circuit provoked opposition from Democrats who cited his rulings in civil rights and disability cases, as well as his higher-than-average reversal rate by higher courts.

Myers, nominated to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, sparked opposition from environmentalist organizations and their allies among Senate Democrats.

Wallace's appointment to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals drew opposition from Democrats, civil rights groups and the American Bar Association.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, has said only "consensus nominees" are likely to win confirmation under the new Democratic majority — a declaration that effectively doomed the chances for the four men whose appointments were left in limbo when the Senate adjourned last year for the elections.

Deputy White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said the president was disappointed about the withdrawals.

"Each of these nominees was well-qualified to serve as judges and would have been confirmed if they had been given a fair, up-or-down vote in the Senate," Perino said. "Unfortunately, a few selected senators prevented these nominees from receiving fair consideration. The president is disappointed in this inaction, and hopes that the days of judicial obstructionism are beyond us."

One Senate Democrat, Sen. Charles Schumer, issued a statement saying, "This reversal is one of the first tangible signs that the president heard and is heeding the message from Novembers election."

But Ed Whelan, president of the Ethics and Public Policy Center and a former clerk for Justice Antonin Scalia, countered for conservatives. "In support of their own agenda of liberal judicial activism, Senate Democrats have engaged in unprecedented measures of obstruction against the president's highly qualified nominees," he said.

Lars H. Liebeler, a Washington lawyer, said in a telephone interview that Boyle, unlike Wallace, Haynes and Myers, did not submitted a letter asking to be withdrawn but was told of the president's intentions.

Several Republican officials said the White House was likely to make the announcement later in the day.

They said Bush also intends to appoint 33 other judicial nominees, including three whose appointments were not acted on by the Senate in 2006.

The officials who described the developments did so on condition of anonymity, saying they did not want to pre-empt a formal announcement.

Bush Drops 4 Embattled Judicial Nominees (MCT)

DOJ_NMG_0114956

WASHINGTON - After years of struggling to push controversial judicial nominees through a Republican-controlled Senate, President Bush acknowledged Tuesday that if he can't get his nominees through his own party, he has no chance among the Democrats.

Bush declined Tuesday to rename four controversial nominees to serve on the U.S. Court of Appeals. Three nominees withdrew, but U.S. District Judge Terrence Boyle of North Carolina refused, saying in an interview Tuesday that it wasn't his place.

"I didn't quit," said Boyle, whose case may be the longest nomination-in-waiting in U.S. history. He was first nominated for the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals in 1991 by President George H.W. Bush and was nominated six more times by the current President Bush.

"In terms of me throwing in the towel or quitting, that's not what I'm going to do," Boyle said. "I'm not going to let them beat me down."

Bush received withdrawal letters from William Haynes, the Pentagon's top legal counsel, and William G. Myers III, of Boise, Idaho. Another nominee, Michael Wallace of Jackson, Miss., announced his withdrawal last month.

Bush's decision shocked neither the nominees nor observers.

"Of course not," Boyle said. "I watched the election returns. How could you not be confirmed with a 10-vote majority and expect to be confirmed when you're in the minority?"

Still, Bush renominated the men in mid-November, just after Democrats narrowly won control of the U.S. Senate in midterm elections. The renominations came after months of threats from Democrats to filibuster Boyle and Haynes if then-Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist brought their names to the floor for a vote.

"If you can't confirm nominees when you have a 55-45 majority, it's unlikely you'll confirm them when the other party's in the majority," said Carl Tobias, a University of Richmond law professor.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the new chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said Tuesday that Bush made "the right decision."

The controversies took up valuable time last year, Leahy said, and impeded progress on other judicial nominees.

Now, Leahy said in a statement, Congress can start over and move beyond "political game-playing."

"The White House saw the writing on the wall," said Leslie Proll, director of the Washington office for the NAACP's Legal Defense and Education Fund, which fought the nominations. "With the Democrats in charge, the chances were not good."

Bush's decision also was a victory for Republican South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, a military lawyer. Graham opposed Haynes' appointment because of Haynes' role in formulating tough interrogation techniques for accused terrorist detainees as Defense Department general counsel.

"I appreciate Mr. Haynes' service to our country and know this is a difficult decision," Graham said. "Now is the time for us to push ahead and fill vacancies on the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals ... with solid conservative and confirmable nominees."

In a Dec. 19 letter to Bush, obtained Tuesday by McClatchy Newspapers, Haynes asked the president to withdraw his name from consideration.

"It is not at all clear that any vote would be forthcoming in the 110th Congress and, absent such a vote, you would lose the opportunity to fill the judicial vacancy for which you nominated me," Haynes wrote.

Myers' nomination had received a tepid endorsement from the American Bar Association's review panel and was opposed by environmental groups. Myers, a former Interior Department lawyer and a lobbyist for cattle and mining interests, had compared federal public lands policy to King George III's reign over colonial America.

Wallace, a native of Biloxi, Miss., was found unanimously by the American Bar Association review board to be "not qualified." The ABA committee praised Wallace's intellect and integrity but failed him on "judicial temperament." The ABA, which routinely grades judicial nominees, hadn't unanimously found an appeals court nominee unqualified in 24 years.

Wallace's Senate Judiciary Committee confirmation hearing in September was dominated by the ABA rating, with Republicans questioning the bar association's motives and Democrats questioning Wallace's suitability for a lifetime appointment.

Bush Drops Plans To Renominate 3 Judges (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 — In an apparent effort to lower the temperature in the fierce battle over federal judges — and in a concession to political reality — President Bush said Tuesday that he was dropping plans to nominate three of his choices for the federal appeals courts who have been vigorously opposed by Senate Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0114957

The White House announced that the three candidates, all conservatives, had themselves asked for their names to be withdrawn. But the announcement was widely taken to mean that the president had decided that renominating them would be a needlessly provocative act, one that would anger Democrats without sufficient political payoff from conservatives for sticking by the nominees.

Days after the November election that gave the Democrats control of Congress, Mr. Bush pledged to renominate the three. His words prompted denunciations from Democrats that he had not taken any lessons from the election and that he was not, as he had claimed, prepared to engage them in a bipartisan way.

Democrats were able to block the confirmations of the three — William J. Haynes II, William Myers III and Terrence Boyle — in the last Congress. With the Democrats now in control of the Senate, the three's chances to be confirmed were reduced further.

After Tuesday's announcement, some Democrats expressed appreciation for the decision.

"It's the first whiff of conciliation we've had on the issue of judges," said Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York and a Judiciary Committee member who has been vocal in his complaints that Mr. Bush has sought confrontation on the issue of judges.

"The election demanded much more bipartisanship than they've been giving," Mr. Schumer said. "But this might be the beginning of a path we can walk down together."

Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the Democrat who formally assumes the chairmanship of the Judiciary Committee this week, praised Mr. Bush for not resubmitting the three nominees. "This new Congress presents an opportunity for a fresh start on judicial nominations, one that emphasizes qualifications and bipartisan consensus over game-playing," Mr. Leahy said.

In addition to the three, a fourth federal appeals court nominee who had been opposed by the Democrats, Michael J. Wallace of Mississippi, withdrew last month.

Democrats had vowed to block the confirmations of all four.

Mr. Haynes, who was nominated to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, in Richmond, has been the Pentagon's general counsel and was deeply involved in setting the administration's interrogation and detention policies. Mr. Haynes wrote or supervised memorandums that secretly authorized harsh treatment for detainees at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, and Iraq.

Mr. Myers had been nominated for a seat on the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit. The circuit, based in San Francisco, covers nine states and is frequently at the center of disputes over environmental laws and regulations. He was strongly opposed by many environmental groups for his history as a lobbyist for mining and ranching interests and speeches criticizing restrictions on those groups.

Judge Boyle, a district court judge in North Carolina, drew opposition to his nomination to the Fourth Circuit from Democrats and liberal groups for his rulings in civil rights cases. Mr. Wallace, nominated to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, in New Orleans, was rated unqualified for the court by the American Bar Association.

At least one nominee had told friends he was interested in withdrawing long ago but agreed to keep his name in to satisfy the White House if the president wanted to continue pressing the nominations. When Mr. Bush announced his intention in November to renominate the four, political supporters said it was to keep in place the groundwork for an argument that the Democrats were obstructionist over judges.

Mr. Bush's decision will probably disappoint conservatives who were eager to continue that argument, but on Tuesday, some said they understood the political realities.

Kenneth Y. Tomlinson, the chairman of the agency that supervises most government broadcasts abroad, also asked the White House to withdraw his nomination for another term as chairman of the Broadcasting Board of Governors.

Mr. Tomlinson had also headed the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, but was forced to step down from that organization after an inspector general's report in 2005 found evidence that he had violated rules meant to insulate public television and radio from political influence.

Four Appeals Court Choices Dropped From Consideration (Update2) (BLOOM)

By James Rowley

Bloomberg, January 10, 2007

Jan. 9 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush, bowing to the Senate's new Democratic majority, dropped efforts to win confirmation of four appeals court nominees who generated partisan opposition.

Bush won't resubmit the nominations of Terrence W. Boyle, Defense Department counsel William J. Haynes II and William G. Myers III to seats on federal appeals courts, said White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore. A fourth nominee who also sparked controversy, Michael Wallace, withdrew last month from consideration for a seat on the New Orleans-based 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

``We are obviously disappointed that these nominees did not receive the fair consideration that they deserve," Lawrimore said. ``We hope the days of judicial obstruction are behind us."

Senator Charles E. Schumer, a New York Democrat, welcomed the administration's retreat as a sign Bush ``is heeding the message from the November election." He said Democrats would work with the administration ``to confirm judges who are not extremists, either left or right."

Wallace, 55, a Jackson, Mississippi, lawyer, received an ``unqualified" rating by the American Bar Association's judicial screening panel following his nomination last February. In Senate testimony, the panel cited statements from lawyers that Wallace lacked judicial temperament.

Boyle, a 61-year-old federal trial judge in North Carolina who was first nominated in 2001 to the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals based in Richmond, Virginia, was accused by Democrats of showing hostility to employment discrimination lawsuits.

Ranching Lobbyist

Myers, 51, a mining and ranching lobbyist nominated in 2003 to the San Francisco-based 9th Circuit, was accused by environmentalists of promoting corporate interests over enforcement of federal conservation laws when he was the Interior Department's solicitor.

Haynes, 48, nominated in 2003 to the 4th Circuit, was opposed by Republicans and Democrats for helping develop the military's interrogation policies for suspected terrorists. Critics said the policy led to abuse of suspected terrorists in military prisons in Iraq, Afghanistan and at the U.S. Navy base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Boyle declined an invitation last month by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to withdraw his nomination, said Lars H. Liebeler, a Washington lawyer and former Boyle law clerk who spoke on behalf of the judge.

`Not Going to Quit'

``The attorney general called Judge Boyle and told him that Haynes, Myers and Wallace had submitted letters saying their nominations should be withdrawn and asked Judge Boyle what he wanted to do," said Liebeler, who has been championing Boyle's nomination. ``Judge Boyle said, if the president didn't want to renominate him, he would understand that decision but he was not going to quit."

On Jan. 5, Gonzales telephoned Boyle to say that Bush's advisers had concluded that the judge couldn't win Senate confirmation and recommended Bush not resubmit his name to the Senate, Liebeler said. He said Boyle told Gonzales that he understood the political reality. ``It was a cordial conversation," Liebeler said.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse declined to comment about whether Gonzales solicited the withdrawal letters.

Wallace said in a telephone interview that his withdrawal was ``100 percent my own decision" and wasn't solicited by the Bush administration.

He understood from statements by the new Democratic Judiciary Committee chairman, Vermont Senator Patrick Leahy, that ``he had no intention of permitting me to be confirmed," Wallace said.

`Fresh Start'

Leahy said in a statement that the new Congress offers Bush a ``fresh start" on judicial selections, and he called the administration's retreat on the four nominations ``a welcome beginning."

Still, Bush ignored Leahy's recommendation that he resolve a dispute with California Senator Dianne Feinstein over his nomination of Norman Randy Smith, an Idaho lawyer, to a 9th Circuit seat that Feinstein contends should be filled by a Californian.

The vacancy was created by the retirement of Circuit Judge Stephen Trott, who moved to Idaho from California following his confirmation.

Smith appeared on a list of judicial nominations Bush submitted to the Senate today. Last year, Feinstein blocked Smith's confirmation on the basis he should be nominated for a different seat on the 9th Circuit.

Advocacy Groups

Bush could have ended the dispute by asking the Senate to confirm Smith for the seat that Myers had been nominated to fill. There was no immediate comment from the White House about Smith's nomination.

In a statement, Feinstein said Bush ``missed an opportunity to resolve an outstanding nominations issue."

Two advocacy groups opposing the nominations issued statements hailing the withdrawals.

The decision ``underscores the reality that the Senate will no longer rubber stamp far-right judges to lifetime appointments," Nan Aron, president of Alliance For Justice, a Washington-based advocacy group, said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0114959

The environmental group Earthjustice said Myers was the first judicial nominee opposed primarily because of his record on the environment.

4 Nominees To Appeals Courts Are Dropped (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

The Bush administration officially withdrew four of its most controversial nominations to the federal appellate bench yesterday, bowing to the political reality of a Senate Judiciary Committee under the control of Democrats who show no inclination to confirm them.

Signaling at the same time that President Bush is committed to placing more conservatives on the bench, the White House renominated 32 other federal judicial candidates that the previous Senate did not confirm. Bush also nominated a previous candidate for a federal district court to fill one of the four appellate positions.

Those withdrawn yesterday included Defense Department general counsel William J. Haynes II, nominated for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit, which covers Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia and the Carolinas; U.S. District Judge Terrence W. Boyle, also nominated for the 4th Circuit; and former Interior Department solicitor William G. Myers III, nominated for the 9th Circuit, which covers seven Western states, plus Alaska and Hawaii.

The fourth nominee withdrawn, Mississippi lawyer Michael B. Wallace, had announced in December that he was no longer seeking to become a 5th Circuit appellate judge, with jurisdiction over Mississippi, Louisiana and Texas. White House officials said Leslie H. Southwick, a former Mississippi state appeals judge and chairman of the state's Bush-Quayle steering committee in 1988, will be nominated to fill the slot Wallace had sought.

The withdrawals provoked rare praise from liberal groups People for the American Way and Alliance for Justice, which had lobbied against many of the administration's judicial nominees. They said that they hope the moves herald a shift in Bush's approach to such appointments.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), likewise, praised Bush for making "the right decision in not resubmitting these controversial and problematic nominees who failed to win confirmation from a Republican-controlled Senate." He said the withdrawals are "a welcome beginning" in emphasizing "qualifications and bipartisan consensus."

White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore said in a statement that "the President remains focused on appointing highly qualified nominees who clearly understand that the role of a judge is to interpret the law, not to legislate from the bench. All of today's nominees are highly accomplished . . . and the President is encouraging the Senate to provide them with fair consideration as soon as possible."

The decision was, nonetheless, an abrupt reversal for the White House, which last tried to gain Senate confirmation for the four on Nov. 16, nine days after the election of a Democratic majority with a one-member margin.

Opposition to Haynes had centered on his role in supporting the aggressive interrogations of U.S. military detainees after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Myers, a former mining and grazing industry official nominated to a court with jurisdiction over half of the nation's public lands, had aroused the opposition of environmentalists by denouncing many laws as "regulatory excesses" and demanding industry access to more protected land.

Civil rights groups had accused Boyle, a protege of former senator Jesse Helms (R-N.C.), and Wallace, a former counsel to Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), of hostility to minority rights. The 4th Circuit's jurisdiction has the nation's highest percentage of black citizens. Political disputes over its appellate membership have kept a vacancy there open for 12 years.

The Haynes Disgrace (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

Republican officials said yesterday that four controversial appeals-court nominees have asked the White House to withdraw their names from Senate consideration. Among them is William "Jim" Haynes II, whom President Bush first nominated to the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Virginia, on September 29, 2003. Call him the latest casualty in the war on terror.

Mr. Haynes is a victim of elite Washington's fickle support for anti-terror measures and South Carolina Republican Lindsey Graham's desire for the media spotlight. Arlen Specter, the former chairman of the Judiciary Committee, was prepared to move Mr. Haynes's nomination to the floor in the last Congress, but Mr. Graham joined Democrats in blocking him to settle a political score. Mr. Haynes obviously has no chance in the new, Democrat-controlled Senate; why stick around for more abuse?

Mr. Haynes is general counsel of the Pentagon, where his transgression in the days following the 9/11 attacks was to do his job with too much determination to protect the country. That meant offering legal analysis to Secretary Donald Rumsfeld on the treatment of detainees -- advice that critics later distorted as condoning "torture."

Mr. Haynes sometimes disagreed with career military lawyers, but there is no evidence he behaved other than honorably. As memories of 9/11 have faded along with the one-time calls for bold executive action, he nonetheless became one of the fall guys for the Administration's policy choices on Guantanamo and military tribunals.

Mr. Graham has basked in media attention for opposing President Bush on detainees, and he has every right to disagree on policy. But for reasons of ego or retribution or something, he has also insisted on embarrassing the White House by blocking Mr. Haynes's nomination. The lesson that other political appointees will learn is that the better part of career ambition is to play it safe and never buck the professional bureaucracy.

Mr. Haynes has many supporters in the Palmetto State, where he has ancestral ties that go back before the Revolution. Mr. Graham's treatment of a favorite son is a disgraceful episode, and one that South Carolina Republicans will want to consider if the Senator faces a primary challenge in 2008.

Benched Nominees (WP)

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

PRESIDENT BUSH'S decision not to resubmit the nominations of four of his most controversial judicial picks is a welcome sign from an administration that, in the realm of judicial selection, has too often chosen confrontation over compromise. When the president, during the post-election lame-duck session, chose to renominate these appeals court nominees with no prospect they would be confirmed, the move struck us as gratuitously partisan. Now Mr. Bush deserves credit for putting some action behind his rhetoric of bipartisanship. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) correctly called the move "a welcome beginning" and "an opportunity for a fresh start on judicial nominations." As Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) put it, "This reversal is one of the first tangible signs that the president heard and is heeding the message from November's election."

Mr. Bush's move was a wise acknowledgment of political reality, but it was also right on the merits. Democrats had valid objections to the nominations of William J. Haynes II, William G. Myers III, Terrence W. Boyle Jr. and Michael B. Wallace. Mr. Haynes, the Pentagon's general counsel, has been a key player in the military's policies on detentions and interrogations in the war on terrorism. Mr. Myers has a dreadful record of anti-environmental activism. Judge Boyle, who serves on the U.S. District Court in North Carolina, has a troubling history in civil rights cases. And the American Bar Association unanimously rated Mr. Wallace "unqualified" for service on the bench.

Now the onus is not only on the president to avoid more thumb-in-their-eye nominees, but also on Democrats, newly in control of the Senate, to make good on their end of the bargain: to give the president's nominees the timely and reasonable consideration that nominees have not always received in the past.

Myers Among 100 Bush Nominations (WT)

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

From combined dispatches

President Bush yesterday renominated Julie L. Myers to head U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement a year after he was forced to make her a recess appointment during questions about her qualifications for the job.

She was among the more than 100 executive branch and judicial nominations the president sent to the Senate yesterday, even as Republican officials said four high-profile judicial nominees who had been blocked during Republican control of Congress asked that their names be withdrawn.

The officials said that William Haynes, William G. Myers III and Judge Terrence Boyle had all decided to abandon their quest for confirmation. Another nominee, Michael Wallace, let it be known last month that he too had asked Mr. Bush to withdraw his nomination.

Mrs. Myers' recess appointment expired at the end of the last Congress. During her year in office, ICE expanded enforcement, but many members of Congress said they wanted to see still more operations. Her nomination will give both Democrats and Republicans in Congress a platform to criticize the president's immigration policy.

She was one of several recess appointees Mr. Bush renominated yesterday. Another was Ellen R. Sauerbrey, the former Republican candidate for Maryland governor, who Mr. Bush has tapped to be assistant secretary of state for population, refugees and migration. Her nomination proved to be contentious because of her pro-life views.

Among the four judicial nominees to withdraw, Mr. Haynes is the Pentagon's top lawyer, and was an architect of Mr. Bush's now-abandoned policy toward treatment of detainees in the war on terrorism. He had been tapped for the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

DOJ_NMG_0114961

Judge Boyle is a federal judge in North Carolina, and his appointment to the 4th Circuit provoked opposition from Democrats who cited his rulings in civil rights and disability cases, as well as his higher-than-average reversal rate by higher courts.

Mr. Myers, nominated to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, sparked opposition from environmentalist organizations and their allies among Senate Democrats.

Mr. Wallace's appointment to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals drew opposition from Democrats, civil rights groups and the American Bar Association.

Bush's Military Nominations Likely To Get Dems' OK Despite Iraq Concerns (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, January 10, 2007

Despite stepping up opposition to President Bush's yet-to-be-announced troop-surge plan, the Democratic-led Senate is likely to swiftly confirm military officers selected by the administration to carry out its new plan for Iraq.

But several congressional leaders, both Democrat and Republican, are indicating that nominees will face tough questions on strategy and policy.

Secretary of Defense Robert Gates last week made his officer recommendations to the president, who still has to send the nominations to the Senate. Bush likely will make an announcement on them today.

Lt. Gen. David Petraeus has been chosen to replace Gen. George Casey as the top commander in Iraq with a promotion to four-star general, while Casey will be nominated to become the new Army chief of staff. Meanwhile, Adm. William Fallon will take over U.S. Central Command from Gen. John Abizaid, who is retiring. All three nominations require Senate confirmation.

Because of the nominees' high profile, the Senate Armed Services Committee likely will hold confirmation hearings, according to several Senate aides.

But Democrats and some Republicans who have been more cautious about supporting the White House's troop-surge denied they would use the nomination process to force the president's hand.

"We will ask the [nominees'] position" on the troop surge, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) said. "We will set swift hearings. I do not know what the hearings will produce, but it is not our intent to hold up votes in any way."

Levin is among the strongest proponents of troop withdrawal from Iraq.

As a supporter of increased forces in Iraq, Petraeus is expected to back a rapid troop expansion, in contrast to Casey, who has been skeptical that additional troops would help stabilize the country.

Casey may face tough questions from Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), ranking member of the Armed Services panel, and Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), both of whom have been pushing for more troops in Iraq.

The three Pentagon nominees will undergo rigorous hearings, "perhaps even more so because of the enormity of the responsibilities that they seem to be … taking on," said Sen. John Warner (R-Va.), former chairman of the Armed Services Committee and one of the first top Republicans to speak out about the situation in Iraq before the November elections.

"We can have an intense, thorough confirmation and do it in a short period of time," he added.

Meanwhile, Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.), a member of the Armed Services panel, said members would grill the nominees.

"There are going to be all these guys who are moving into these positions and they are going to get a lot of scrutiny and a lot of hard questions about what they are recommending," he said.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who is not a member of the Armed Services Committee, said that holds are always a possibility, but that she is currently not planning to place any.

As the president prepares to announce his strategy for Iraq tonight, Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) has introduced a resolution prohibiting any federal funds to be expended for troops in Iraq above the current number without congressional authorization.

Sen. Dick Durbin (Ill.), the Democratic whip, said that a resolution capping the number of troops and another requiring the president to get congressional approval for troop strength above a certain level could be possible add-ons to the incoming supplemental request.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said he wants to see a bipartisan resolution in response to the White House's announcement introduced next week.

Avoiding Sun-Kissed Tuscany, And Other Tips For The Prudent Junketer (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114962

It has come to our attention that certain politicians who recently traveled overseas on the taxpayers' dime were unhappy with press coverage of their journey.

This is hardly the first time government officials and staff members have been upset about criticism of their global travels. And, in truth, the line between junket -- a vacation with spouses to exotic places on a military jet -- and actual work-related travel can be hazy.

So for all travelers on congressional delegations (codels) who want to avoid snarky press coverage, we offer the 2007 In the Loop Guide to Codels.

Rule No. 1: Try to travel to places that have a direct relationship to important foreign policy issues. In addition to such places as China and Russia, this would be Darfur anytime, Gaza in August, Chechnya in February, Waziristan, a week in Anbar province.

Exception: Scores of lawmakers have wandered to Iraq in the past four years, many of them multiple times. All had campaign pictures taken with troops from their districts -- rounded up specially for the occasion -- and were given tours of the Green Zone and Camp Victory. Many came back thumping their chests, saying, "I've been to Iraq." They then touted great progress toward "victory" and blasted the media for willfully ignoring all the good news in Fallujah.

Maybe lawmakers could at least follow the example of Rep. Jim Marshall (D-Ga.), a much-decorated Vietnam vet who strapped on body armor and went on patrol two years ago with the 82nd Airborne in Ramadi.

Rule No. 2: Ditch the spouse. Spouses raise red flags for reporters. Reporters are no longer buying the dodge about spouses traveling "at no extra cost." Understaffed embassy personnel have to schedule separate events, provide vans, maybe security, guides and so forth for day trips, sightseeing and shopping. Given the recent cutbacks at U.S. embassies, this is hardly what those folks need to be doing.

Corollary: On a generic "meetings with foreign leaders" trip, avoid lingering. Spouses tend to lengthen trips, with evenings devoted to receptions and dinners -- as opposed to meeting with dissidents in hiding, with human rights advocates, with harassed religious leaders, with refugees or even just traveling to the next stop.

Rule No. 3: Avoid going north in the summer, south in the winter. Never go anywhere in Italy, at any time, on the taxpayers' dime. Be very careful about the Paris Air Show. European travel in general, especially in the early fall or in the spring, will raise eyebrows. Winter trips to the Caribbean are inherently suspect.

Rule No. 4: Do not go to various wonders of the world -- Petra, the Pyramids, Machu Picchu, the Galapagos, Iguazu Falls, the Great Wall, the Taj Mahal, Angkor Wat or African game parks. Ditto handicraft fairs.

Exception: There will be times when obligatory travel to bad places, or to funerals and inaugurations and such, will bring you near a primo tourist destination. The rule of reason governs. An "unavoidable" stop at St. Peter's Square on Easter Sunday, for example, doesn't pass any laugh test.

Rule No. 5: Do not blow off intelligence briefings at the embassies. You are there, after all, to gather facts. Embassy folks may, or may not, have some.

Rule No. 6: Do not overload your military aircraft with the bargain booty -- rugs, golf clubs, artifacts and such -- you hope to sneak in without regular customs inspection.Once Our Enemy, Now Your Excellency

Speaking of travel, here are some words you never thought you'd see coming out of the White House: " President Bush today announced the designation of a Presidential Delegation to attend the inauguration of His Excellency Jos? Daniel Ortega Saavedra, President of the Republic of Nicaragua on January 10, 2007."

"His Excellency"? Wasn't this guy some random commie thug, pal of Fidel Castro, just a few years back? The late Jeane Kirkpatrick must be spinning. And who drew the short straw to lead this august delegation? That would be Michael Leavitt, secretary of health and human services.

Unclear how they traveled to the ceremony. Maybe they flew to Harlingen, Tex., and then drove? As they used to say in the '80s, Managua's communists were only a two-day drive from there.Changing Times

Good jobs opening up at the State Department. Buzz is Robert Joseph, undersecretary for arms control and international security, is going to be moving on, possibly at the end of this month.

The date is uncertain, we're told, because it has changed a few times. Apparently Secretary Condoleezza Rice wanted Joseph, who we're told has been frozen out of some important issues, to stay on for a bit given all the openings.

There have been a lot of them. Rice finally tapped national intelligence chief John Negroponte for the long-vacant deputy secretaryship and announced Iraq ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad for the U.N. posting. There are still excellent openings for an undersecretary for economic, business and agricultural affairs; for counselor; for coordinator for counterterrorism; and, with last week's departure of John Hillen, for assistant secretary for political-military affairs.Looking Out for the Bad Guys

Former senator Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) is now a senior fellow at the Ethics and Public Policy Center, where he established and directs a program called "America's Enemies," which the center says will "focus on identifying, studying, and heightening awareness of the threats posed to America and the West."

No, the program doesn't appear to focus exclusively on Pennsylvania's Democrats. Seems to be looking more to "a growing array of anti-Western forces" overseas.

Chief Quits Broadcasting Board, Plans Book (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

Broadcasting Board of Governors Chairman Kenneth Y. Tomlinson announced that he is stepping down after four years on the job, citing plans to write a book about his experiences in the public broadcasting sector, which many see as skewed by a liberal bias.

"I think it's a good story that will help the public understand how Washington operates," Mr. Tomlinson said yesterday. "There's been a criminalization of political differences."

President Bush nominated Mr. Tomlinson to serve another term on the board, but the Senate Foreign Relations Committee failed to act on the nomination.

A State Department inspector general investigation ordered by Democratic lawmakers accused Mr. Tomlinson of running a "horse-racing operation" from his government office and said he "improperly put a friend on the payroll." Mr. Tomlinson runs a stable of Thoroughbred racehorses on his private farm in Virginia.

The results of the investigation were turned over to the Justice Department, which has not brought charges against Mr. Tomlinson. The inspector general reported that Mr. Tomlinson spent fewer than three minutes and sent one e-mail per day on his horse-racing ventures.

Mr. Tomlinson described the accusations as "patently untrue."

"My critics will say this is an indicator that Ken Tomlinson is quitting public life," he said. "But I'm just beginning to fight. This book will be a much more effective way to bring to light the injustices done to me."

During Mr. Tomlinson's tenure, the Broadcasting Board of Governors worked to open news operations in parts of the world where authoritarian regimes blocked access to information. As a result of these initiatives, an Arabic language satellite TV network now broadcasts in Iraq and other Muslim nations, Persian language satellite news is fed daily into Iran, and radio and television broadcast signals are sent into Afghanistan and Cuba.

The transmissions into Cuba are jammed by what analysts think is a high-cost effort of Fidel Castro's communist government.

"If what we were doing wasn't important, Castro would not be spending the money to block the signal," Mr. Tomlinson said.

Larry Hart, spokesman for the Broadcasting Board of Governors, said Mr. Bush will select a replacement for Mr. Tomlinson and any other board members whose terms have expired. Board members may serve until the Senate confirms their replacements.

"There may be a number of nominations going forward," Mr. Hart said.

The board includes four Democrats and four Republicans. The secretary of state serves as the ninth member, giving a one-seat edge to whichever party controls the White House.

"I am proud of my record of service during these troubled times," Mr. Tomlinson wrote to Mr. Bush yesterday, "and I have appreciated deeply your repeatedly submitting my name to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee for reconfirmation to this position. Those who oppose my nomination cite charges against me that simply do not stand up to scrutiny."

Before joining the board, Mr. Tomlinson served as editor in chief of Reader's Digest and was director of Voice of America.

S.M.U. Faculty Complains About Bush Library Plan (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

DALLAS, Jan. 9 — Intimates of President Bush have singled out Southern Methodist University as the likely site of his presidential library, but faculty members, complaining of being bypassed, are raising sharp questions about the school's identification with his presidency.

In a meeting Tuesday, faculty members complained of a lack of consultation over the emerging agreement and all but demanded answers from the university's president, R. Gerald Turner, on the relationship that would develop between the university and the library.

"There's been a lack of transparency from the beginning," said Tony Pederson of the journalism faculty, urging the university's administration "to be more forthcoming with detailed information."

Cal Jillson, a political science professor, called for "more rounded information" because, he said, "this train is leaving." He said there could be a final decision on the library before the end of the month.

Rhonda Blair, the president of the faculty senate who convened the meeting even though many professors were still away on winter break, said she would pass on the questions to Dr. Turner on Wednesday.

The session grew out of the uproar after an op-ed article in the student newspaper, The Daily Campus, by two professors at the university's Perkins School of Theology complaining about the library selection process.

The president and Laura Bush created the George W. Bush Presidential Library Site Selection Committee, which is headed by former Commerce Secretary Donald P. Evans and also includes Marvin Bush, the president's brother; Andrew H. Card, the former White House chief of staff; and Craig R. Stapleton, the United States ambassador to France.

Mr. Evans revealed on Dec. 21 that the panel was setting aside two other contenders, Baylor University in Waco and the University of Dallas in Irving, to pursue exclusive discussions with Southern Methodist, the alma mater of Mrs. Bush and an institution long close to the Bushes. Mr. Bush graduated from Yale and Harvard.

Taylor Griffin, a spokesman for Mr. Evans, said Tuesday that he was not granting interviews at this stage of the selection process.

"The selection committee is now focusing their discussions on S.M.U.; however, no final decision has been made," Mr. Griffin said. He said the final decision was expected to be reached within "a few months," although others have estimated the process could be completed within weeks.

Mr. Griffin said he could not discuss the criteria for the selection process, and he said issues concerning financing of the library and control of content, including interaction between the policy institute and the library, had not been decided.

"The committee has been focused on the selection of the site rather than fund-raising decisions," Mr. Griffin said. "It could vary depending on what the site would be. We are in an early phase in the process, and those decisions about how much money will need to be raised will come later."

The complex under discussion would include a public policy institute independent of the university and answerable to a Bush foundation, while the library and a museum would be under the auspices of the National Archives and Records Administration. But control of presidential documents remains a subject of dispute.

About 150 of the university's 600 faculty members attended the meeting, voicing a range of concerns, particularly on whether the school's academic freedom and political independence might appear compromised by an association with not only the Bush library but also a museum that would accompany it.

Thomas J. Knock, a professor of history, said the public might have trouble differentiating between the library, museum and the university.

James K. Hopkins, chairman of the history department who was co-chairman of the meeting with Ms. Blair, a professor of theater, said he had asked Dr. Turner under what circumstances the university would "walk away" from a deal with the library.

"There was this very indirect response to that," Dr. Hopkins said.

Ms. Blair said that it was not clear how much negotiating S.M.U. could do with the presidential library committee but that she would bring it up with Dr. Turner, who she said would soon meet with the faculty himself.

But Rita Kirk, chairwoman of the department of communications and public affairs, said the "wall" that would exist between Southern Methodist and the Bush library would allow for "robust debate" academically and afford scholars important access to papers of Colin L. Powell and Condoleezza Rice, among other administration figures.

Some of the faculty questions dealt with the cost of the library — published accounts have it as high as $500 million — including how much the school would be responsible for and whether raising the money might hurt the school's own financial campaigns.

"We view the discussions that are taking place on campus as a very positive part of the process and one we're very accustomed to here at S.M.U.," said Brad Cheves, the university's vice president for development and external affairs, shortly after leaving the faculty meeting.

"We glad that our colleagues feel comfortable to share their views with each other and with all of us," Dr. Cheves said. But he said that S.M.U. had not detected widespread opposition among the faculty or others about the Bush library.

"At this point we have nothing that indicates that the support is anything but strong," he said. "The feedback we're getting clearly represents the diversity of thought that you would expect in a constituency as large as S.M.U.'s."

Tax Cut Measure Could Be A Stumbling Block For Increase In Minimum Wage (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

DOJ_NMG_0114965

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

As part of their 100-hour legislative blitz, House Democrats are expected to vote today to increase the minimum wage for the first time in a decade, to $7.25 an hour, in a move that economists say will raise pay for 13 million workers.

The bill's chances are less certain in the Senate, largely because of friction over a Republican push to include tax breaks for small business in the bill. Senate Republicans have hinted that, without such tax cuts, they will filibuster the measure, a move that the bill's supporters would need 60 votes to overcome.

The legislation would lift the federal wage floor, currently $5.15 an hour, to $7.25 in three steps between now and 2009.

"Minimum-wage workers desperately need a raise," said Representative George Miller, Democrat of California and chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee. "It is a moral outrage that millions of Americans who work full time still live in poverty."

After opposing a minimum-wage increase for years, many Republicans now say they favor one, but only if it is coupled with a tax cut for restaurants and other small businesses — the groups they say would be hurt most by the wage increase.

"The Democrat leadership's unbalanced proposal may increase the minimum wage, but it leaves small businesses and their workers to fend for themselves," said Representative Howard P. McKeon of California, the ranking Republican on the Education and Labor Committee.

On Tuesday, Mr. McKeon and Jim McCrery of Louisiana, the senior Republican on the House Ways and Means Committee, introduced a competing minimum-wage bill that includes billions of dollars in tax breaks. One such break would allow faster depreciation for newly built restaurants, allowing them to record the building cost on financial statements over 15 years instead of the current rule of 39 years, and thus lower taxes.

President Bush has said he might accept a higher minimum wage, but only if it is tied to tax cuts to soften the blow for business.

Some Democrats and many of their liberal and labor allies assert that the minimum wage should not be used as an excuse to give more tax breaks to business.

"For the past 10 years, Republican leaders have held the minimum wage hostage," said the A.F.L.-C.I.O.'s president, John J. Sweeney. "Corporations and wealthy Americans have gotten their rewards. Now it's time to do the right thing for low-wage workers, with no payoffs to business."

Frustrated by Congress's inaction, 28 states have adopted minimum wages above the federal floor, affecting 70 percent of the work force.

In an unusual move for a minimum-wage bill — typically it is handled by the House and Senate labor committees — the Senate Finance Committee is scheduled to hold a hearing today on the bill.

"To call a minimum-wage increase 'overdue' is the understatement of the year," said Senator Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana and the committee's chairman. "This Congress promised to raise the minimum wage, and we will. We also need to pass meaningful small-business incentives along with a wage increase. We can do both, and we will."

Many economists, especially conservative ones, insist that raising the minimum wage would not reduce poverty, saying it would ultimately reduce the number of jobs for low-skilled workers. But other economists, especially liberal ones, say a higher minimum would have virtually no effect on job levels while it lifted the pay for millions of low-wage workers.

"The increase will make a big difference for someone who makes the minimum wage — you're talking about thousands of dollars a year in extra earnings," said Jared Bernstein of the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal research group, and one of the economists scheduled to testify before the Finance Committee. "It's important to remember that if you don't have a binding wage floor, a lot of workers are going to end up disconnected from the improving economy and that's exactly what's happened."

Mr. Bernstein's institute estimates that six million workers earn less than $7.25 an hour, but workers earning a dollar or two more than that can also expect to see their wages increase if a new minimum is enacted.

Joseph Sabia, a professor of consumer economics at the University of Georgia, said an increase would do little to lift workers out of poverty.

"Most people who earn the minimum wage are not poor or near poor," Professor Sabia said. "If the goal is to help the working poor, it would be better to raise the earned-income tax credit," which refunds cash to poor workers.

The traditional economists' view has been that a higher minimum wage would mean some job losses for low-wage workers. But a landmark 1994 study by David Card and Alan Krueger upset the common wisdom by finding that there were no overall job losses when New Jersey raised its minimum wage.

David Neumark, a longtime critic of that study and an economics professor at the University of California, Irvine, said most credible studies had concluded that an increase in the minimum wage did hurt employment for unskilled workers, although most studies did not find major job reductions. He said an increase to $7.25 might reduce job levels for the least skilled workers by 4 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0114966

“The most affected workers are the ones you’d most like to help,” Professor Neumark said. “If the workers who get raises are middle-class teenagers and the ones who lose jobs are unskilled workers in poor jobs, you can increase poverty.”

Harry Holzer, a professor of public policy at Georgetown University, acknowledged that there might be some job losses, but he said that they would be minor and would be far outweighed by the wage gains.

“Minimum-wage earners are concentrated in the bottom half of families by income,” Professor Holzer said. “They might not be in the bottom 10 percent, but they might be in the bottom 10 to 40 percentile. Will a minimum-wage increase dramatically reduce poverty? Probably not. But it will redistribute income toward the bottom half of American workers.”

Life At $7.25 An Hour (WP)

By David Finkel

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

ATCHISON, Kan. -- It was payday. Money, at last. Twenty-two-year-old Robert Iles wanted to celebrate. "Tonight, chimichangas!" he announced.

He was on his way out of the store where his full-time job pays him $7.25 an hour -- the rate that is likely to become the nation's new minimum wage. Life at $7.25: This is the life of Robert Iles, and with $70 in a wallet that had been empty that morning, he headed to a grocery store where for $4.98 he bought not only 10 chimichangas but two burritos as well.

From there he stopped at a convenience store, where for $16.70 he filled the gas tank of the car he purchased when he got his raise to $7.25; then he went to another grocery store, where he got a $21.78 money order to pay down some bills, including $8,000 in medical bills from the day he accidentally sliced open several fingers with a knife while trying to cut a tomato; and then he headed toward the family trailer 19 miles away, where his parents were waiting for dinner.

Today in Washington, the House is scheduled to vote on whether to increase the federal minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25. Passage is expected, with Senate approval soon to follow, and if President Bush signs the resulting bill into law, as he indicated he would, the U.S. minimum wage would rise for the first time since 1997, ending a debate about whether such a raise would be good or bad for the economy.

But even if the matter is settled in Congress, it isn't settled at all in Atchison, and Robert Iles's drive home is proof. Every stop he made on his ride home revealed a different facet of how complicated the minimum wage can be in the parts of America where, instead of a debatable issue, it is a way of life.

At the store where Iles works, for instance, the owner thinks the minimum wage should be increased as a moral issue but worries about which employees' hours he will have to cut to compensate.

At the store where he bought the chimichangas, the cashier who makes $6.25 worries that a raise will force her out of her subsidized apartment and onto the street.

At the convenience store where he bought gas, the owner worries that he will have to either raise prices, angering his customers, or make less money, "and why would I want to make less money?"

At the store where he got the money order, the worries are about Wal-Mart, which not only supports an increase but also built a Supercenter on the edge of town that has been sucking up customers since it opened three years ago.

As for Iles -- who keeps $70 out of every paycheck to cover two weeks' worth of food and gas and in a matter of minutes was already down to $26.54 -- his worry was as basic as how fast to drive home.

Drive too fast and he'd be wasting gas. But his family was waiting. And his chimichangas, best cooked frozen, were starting to thaw.The Meaning of a Dollar

The debate about the minimum wage usually comes down to jobs. If Congress approves the increase, it will result in raises for an estimated 13 million Americans, or about 9 percent of the total workforce. That's a percentage that most economists agree would cause a modest increase in national unemployment. In Kansas, however, "it would have a fairly significant impact," said Beth Martino, a spokeswoman for the state Department of Labor. According to one independent analysis, 16 percent of the workforce, or 237,000 workers, would be affected -- and that doesn't include the 20,000 whose wages aren't governed by the federal Fair Labor Standards Act and earn the state minimum wage of $2.65. That rate, the lowest in the nation and unchanged since 1988, hints at the prevailing wisdom in Kansas about the minimum wage, which is that the only way low-wage earners will make more is through congressional action.

This holds true from Topeka, where the powerful Kansas Chamber of Commerce has long opposed any raise, to rural Mulvane, home of Republican state legislator Ted Powers, who says his futile effort three years ago to raise the state minimum wage resulted in his being branded a "dirty dog," to Atchison, a working-class city of 11,000 where the stores that depend on low-wage workers include one called "Wow Only $1.00!" This is the store where Robert Iles has worked for five years.

"Robert, would you help me a second?" Jack Bower, the owner, called to Iles soon after opening, as the line at the cash register grew. A onetime Wal-Mart vice president, Bower moved back to Atchison several years ago to teach and ended up buying the old J.C. Penney store, and now runs a business where the meaning of a dollar is displayed on shelf after shelf. The jar of Peter Piper's Hot Dog Relish? That's what a dollar is worth. The Wolfgang Puck Odor Eliminator that a customer was looking at as she said to a friend, "I just don't know how I'm ever going to make it. My ex-husband's not paying his child support"? That's a dollar, too, as is the home pregnancy test, the most shoplifted item in the store.

"This is not a wealthy community," Bower explained. "The thing is, a lot of people depend on this store."

Robert Iles has his own version of a dollar's meaning, learned last February when Bower took him aside and said he would be getting a pay raise to $7.25. "Okay," Iles remembers replying, wanting to seem businesslike. "But inside I was doing the cha-cha-cha," he said. "It was like going from lower class to lower middle class."

Soon after, he bought his car, a used 2005 Dodge Neon, and just about every workday since then he has spent his lunch break in the driver's seat, eating a bologna sandwich with the engine off to save gas, even in winter. An hour later, he was back behind the cash register, telling customers "Thank you and have a nice day" again and again.

And meanwhile, Jack Bower wondered whose hours he will cut if he has to give his employees a raise.

It's not that he's against raising the minimum wage -- "I don't think $5.15 is adequate," he said, adding that $7.25 seems fair -- but his profit margin is thin, and wages are his biggest controllable expense. So if wages go up, he said, hours will have to come down, and the question will become: Whose?

Will it be Neil Simpson, 66, who works six hours a day as a stockman, and then five more hours somewhere else cleaning floors, and takes care of a wife who is blind and arthritic?

Will it be Susan Irons, 57, who was infected with hepatitis C from a blood transfusion, is on a waiting list for a liver transplant and needs more hours rather than fewer?

Will it be Christina Lux, who is 22 years old and 13 weeks pregnant?

Will it be Iles?

"Attention, all shoppers," he said into the microphone. "We will be closing in 10 minutes. Please begin making your final selections." Ten minutes later, he was clocked out and back in his Neon. "My brand-new car," he called it proudly, and he explained how he was able to afford it on $7.25 an hour: a no-money-down loan for which he will pay $313.13 a month until 2012.Small Business 'at Bottom'

Seven dollars and twenty-five cents an hour equals $15,080 per year, and out of that comes $313 for the car loan and $100 for car insurance, Iles said, going over his monthly bills. An additional $90 for the 1995 car with 135,000 miles on it that he is buying from a friend for his mother, $150 for the family phone bills, $35 on his credit card, $100 for gas, $100 toward the mortgage on the trailer. "That's about it. Oh yeah, $20 in doctors' bills," he said, and totaled it up on fingers scarred by surgical stitches. Nine hundred and eight dollars. "I bring home 900 a month," he said. "So I very rarely have any money for myself."

He parked in front of a store called Always Low Prices, which has the cheapest chimichangas in town.

Once it was a full-service grocery store with 28 employees. Then came word that Wal-Mart was looking for land for a Supercenter, and now it has become a bare-bones operation where the starting pay for its few employees is $5.50, and the manager wonders how the store will survive if wages increase.

"We're at the bottom. If the minimum wage went up, I don't know how we would make the cuts to cover it," Michelle Henry said. The lone salaried employee, she works 80 hours a week to make up for the lack of workers. "I have mixed feelings," she continued. "I know that people can't afford to live on $5.15 an hour. But on the business side, small businesses can't afford to pay it."

At the register, meanwhile, Shannon Wilk, 33, who makes $6.25 an hour, said that of course she would like to earn more money. It would help her. It would help her 18-month-old daughter. "It would be good," she said, "but also, for me, I live in income-based housing, and if I get a raise, my rent would go up, and I would lose my assistance." Even the tiniest raise would affect her, she said, and with nowhere to go, the last thing she can afford is a raise to $7.25.

In such an equation, the fact that she was working in Kansas was to her benefit. Atchison sits on the Kansas-Missouri border, and if Wilk worked a few hundred yards to the east, she would already be in jeopardy: In November, Missouri voters supported a ballot initiative increasing the state's minimum wage to $6.50, with an annual adjustment for inflation. Five other states had similar votes, with similar results, bringing to 29 the number that now require an hourly wage above the federal minimum. In the District the minimum is $7, in Maryland it's $6.15, and in Virginia it's $5.15.

Such is the arbitrariness of state-by-state minimum wage laws that Wilk feels lucky to be in Kansas making $6.25 an hour while inside at the first grocery store across the Missouri state line, the cashier was ecstatic that she was in a place where her pay was going from $6.20 to $6.50, explaining, "That's 30 cents more I ain't got."

Iles handed over a $10 bill for his 10 chimichangas and two burritos. He stuffed the change deep in his pocket, and headed next to a convenience store owned by a man named Bill Murphy, who said that if he had the chance to talk to new House

Speaker Nancy Pelosi, he would ask one question. "Where does she think the money will come from? And that is the question," he said. "My wages are going to go up 10 percent."

Unlike Jack Bower, who would compensate by cutting hours, Murphy said that in his two convenience stores there are no hours to cut. "I'm going to have to raise my prices," he said -- not only because his workers who make less than the new minimum wage would get raises but also because those who earn more would insist on raises as well. Employees at $7.25 will want $8.25. Those at $8.25 will want $9.25.

Economists classify such workers as the ones who would be indirectly affected by a minimum-wage increase. Of the estimated 13 million workers expected to get raises, 7.4 million are in that category. "You've created this entitlement," Murphy said he would tell Pelosi.

And yet he will pay it, he said, and compensate with price increases, which he worries will be inflationary, even though most economists say that won't happen. He will raise prices, he continued, because the only other option would be to earn less money, which he doesn't want to do because he owes $1.5 million on his businesses and wouldn't want to default.

"Now that might be a stretch in some people's minds, from giving a guy a raise to not being able to pay the bank, but that's the path I'm talking about," he said. Against such a dire backdrop, Iles put $17 worth of gas in his car.

"That'll be $16.70," the clerk said to him, and instead of correcting this, Iles gladly took the change.

Thirty cents, suddenly got.The Wal-Mart Factor

Iles drove past the Atchison Inn, where starting pay is $5.15, past Movie Gallery, where it's also $5.15, and stopped in front of Country Mart, the fanciest grocery store in town, where high school students start at $5.15 and, according to owner Dennis Garrett, "some of them aren't worth that."

A few days earlier, Garrett had gotten a letter from a lobbying consortium called the Coalition for Job Opportunities, urging him to write Congress to protest the minimum-wage increase. It came in the form of a letter already written, to which he merely had to add his congressman's name and send it off to Washington. "We are very concerned," the letter began, and it was signed by 25 organizations.

The most conspicuous signature, though, was the one that wasn't there, that of Wal-Mart, the nation's largest private employer, with 1.3 million workers. Wal-Mart won't say how many of those workers earn less than what the new minimum wage would be, but if the Atchison store is an example, starting pay is $6 an hour.

Nonetheless, in October 2005, Wal-Mart chief executive H. Lee Scott Jr. said in a speech that the "U.S. minimum wage of $5.15 an hour has not been raised in nearly a decade, and we believe it is out of date with the times." He went on to say, "Our customers simply don't have the money to buy basic necessities between paychecks."

When it comes to Wal-Mart, however, just about any announcement that affects public policy is greeted with suspicion, and that has been the case with the minimum wage. Some have said that Wal-Mart, in need of good publicity, is supporting an increase for public relations reasons; others have declared it an attempt to drive small, independently owned stores out of business.

These suspicions exist in Atchison as well. As in many small communities, Wal-Mart defines local retail, and just as Always Low Prices had to retool itself, Country Mart was significantly affected by Wal-Mart's new food-stocked Supercenter several miles away.

What is Wal-Mart up to? What are its true motives? Like many others, Dennis Garrett wonders. He imagines public relations is part of it, but he didn't want to speculate on whether this was an attempt to put him out of business, except to say that raising some wages wouldn't do that. He'd reduce some hours, he said. He'd manage.

Yes, Atchison businesses would be hurt initially, but in the long run, if unemployment increases, those hurt the most would be the very ones Wal-Mart insists would be helped -- the customers, especially the younger ones, "the people who don't advance their education and need a job between the ages of 16 and 21, 22, 23."

In other words, many of the workers in Atchison, one of whom was now at Garrett's service counter buying a money order so he could pay bills. Even though Iles has a checking account, this is the method he prefers because if he were to pay by check, and the check were to bounce because of insufficient funds, the penalty would be devastating. A $25 fee would require more than three hours of work.

And where would those hours come from?'It's Tough for Me'

So go the calculations of a $7.25 worker, now headed home.

"It's an old trailer," he explained earlier in the day.

The heat doesn't work, he said, and the water heater works sporadically.

One of the bedroom ceilings is caving in. He sleeps in the other bedroom, and his parents sleep in the living room because his father, who has diabetes and had to have several inches of one of his feet amputated, can't really get around.

DOJ_NMG_0114969

Also, his father has leukemia. And is legally blind. And his mother, who once made $6.50 an hour as an aide at a nursing home, quit to take care of her husband.

"We're pretty much living off my money," Iles said, and in he went to cook them dinner, bring payday to an end and, the next morning, start the cycle again.

Life at $7.25. Should that be the minimum wage?

"Yes," Iles said.

Even if it hurts job opportunities for people like him, as Dennis Garrett had suggested?

"Yes."

Or causes price increases, as Bill Murphy had suggested?

"Yes."

Or damages businesses such as Always Low Prices?

"I mean, it's tough for me, and I'm already making $7.25 an hour."

Or causes Jack Bower to reduce hours for one of his employees? Perhaps for Iles himself?

"It's just so hard for people. I mean, it's hard," Iles said, and then he went to work.

"I think it'll be bad today," one of the workers suggested as the line at the Wow Only $1.00! cash register began to form.

"Well, it depends on your perspective," Iles said.

Success Of 100 Hours Hinges On Few Uncertain Senate Votes (HILL)

By Elana Schor And Jeffrey Young

The Hill, January 10, 2007

Two planks of the House Democrats' "100 Hours" agenda are headed for swift passage this week but risk delay in the Senate, where Republicans and Democrats must navigate intra-party disputes over how to raise the minimum wage and amend the Medicare drug benefit.

Unlike their party colleagues in the House, Senate Democratic leaders are sending high-priority bills through regular order, a move that underscores their promise of bipartisanship. But this could deny them the political benefit of demonstrable progress when there are fractious conference negotiations with the House over different approaches to the minimum wage and Medicare.

"I'm becoming aware of the difficulties of the U.S. Senate in trying to pass a bill dealing with one issue," freshman Sen. Ben Cardin (D-Md.) said yesterday, urging the Senate to follow the lead of his former House colleagues and approve a clean minimum wage increase.

Republicans, however, are seeking tax and regulatory sweeteners for businesses to ease the impact of a phased wage hike to $7.25 per hour. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has indicated that he will back the business breaks, remarking last week that a filibuster-proof margin for a stand-alone minimum wage increase may be achievable, but, "I'm not sure I want to do that."

The Senate Finance Committee today will examine options for tax breaks that the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions (HELP) Committee can successfully pair with the wage hike. But HELP Chairman Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) and ranking Republican Mike Enzi (Wyo.) are already dissenting from party leaders' positions on the minimum wage.

Kennedy will push for a Senate wage hike without business tax breaks at an event today with House Majority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), House Education and Labor Committee Chairman George Miller (D-Calif.), AFL-CIO President John Sweeney, and freshman Reps. Betty Sutton (D-Ohio) and Carol Shea-Porter (D-N.H.).

At least two members of Kennedy's panel, freshman Sens. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio) and Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), backed his approach.

"We need to do serious business tax breaks … [but] don't link them to the minimum wage," Brown said. Sanders also called for a clean bill, saying via e-mail: "After 10 years of inexcusable inaction, I believe that the time is long overdue for Congress to pass a clean minimum wage bill."

Enzi, meanwhile, spent yesterday's GOP policy lunch tamping down enthusiasm among Republicans for adding small-business health plan provisions to the minimum-wage hike. Enzi's small-business health plan bill fell short on the floor last year, and he continues to work carefully on a compromise with Democrats that he hopes to pursue as a stand-alone issue, spokesman Craig Orfield said.

Senate Republicans also endorse other business benefits as add-ons to the wage bill, but support for including small-business health plans is being stoked in the House. There, senior Republicans gathered yesterday to tout Reid's support for a business-friendly wage bill and promote their alternative – which includes small-business health plans.

DOJ_NMG_0114970

"Small business health plans would be my choice," Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Texas) said in an interview late last week, adding that a wage increase coupled with health insurance incentives would ensure businesses are "able to give their employees a better life."

The Medicare prescription drug bill slated for House approval on Friday, which would require the Bush administration to negotiate with drug companies on behalf of Medicare beneficiaries, poses considerable challenges of its own for Senate Democrats.

Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) has been granted first dibs on drafting a bill to fulfill the Democratic campaign promise for federal negotiation of Medicare drug prices. He will hold a hearing on the issue one day before the House considers its Medicare bill, strongly opposed by the White House.

But Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.), a Finance Committee member, got 54 votes last year for a bill he and Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) authored that would allow federal negotiation of Medicare drug prices. Wyden and Snowe will release an updated version of their measure today, mandating negotiation in the case of single-source drugs, drugs created with substantial taxpayer funding, or in cases where private insurers request help.

Wyden said yesterday that he and Snowe count 58 votes in the new Congress for their plan, if freshman Democrats were added and Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.), who is ailing, subtracted. Still, even if the pair can reach the crucial 60-vote threshold, Baucus could credibly claim to provide the Democratic leadership with a bigger margin, starting with his own vote.

"I'm going to work very closely with chairman Baucus," Wyden said when asked whether he would consider using his head count for leverage in discussions with Baucus, who voted against two Medicare negotiation bills last year. "I'm pleased with the discussions we've had."

Baucus is under pressure from Democratic leaders, who have vowed to approve negotiation by spring, to get a bill through the Finance Committee. Though Baucus has criticized the Bush administration's handling of the drug benefit, he was one of only two Democrats who participated in the drafting of the law creating the program.

"I suspect there [are] going to be serious questions about it in the Senate," Republican Whip Trent Lott (Miss.) said yesterday of the Medicare negotiation concept. "I'm not sure how or when Reid plans to call it up. I think Democrats have serious questions about it too."

Complicating matters for Baucus is that a majority of his committee voted for the Wyden-Snowe amendment on the floor. Baucus was the only Democrat on the panel who voted against it, while Snowe captured the support of fellow Finance member Gordon Smith (R-Ore.).

Snowe said yesterday that she and Wyden would discuss their new bill at tomorrow's Finance hearing and she hoped "some of the changes will broaden the support [for negotiation]."

Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) was one of two members missing the vote on Wyden-Snowe. Despite Democrats' emphasis on negotiation during their electoral triumph last year, Coleman said yesterday he would continue to oppose government involvement in Medicare drug prices.

"We've got a system now that's working," Coleman said, acknowledging that he would risk political attacks during his reelection run in 2008 but charging that negotiation would "add another layer of bureaucracy."

The pressure coming from outside interest groups is considerable. Two of Washington's biggest powerhouses, the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, and the AARP, are facing off and are ready to bring the full weight of their influence to bear.

Island Rights And Wage Bill Intertwined (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, January 10, 2007

House Democrats plan to bring the Northern Mariana Islands in line with U.S. minimum wage laws under legislation that comes to the floor today, thus ending a decade of policy favoring island businesses secured by lobbyist Jack Abramoff and former Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas).

Democrats, however, are finding it difficult to clean up the mess Abramoff and Co. left behind, especially when dealing with the only U.S. territory that lacks a delegate in Washington. The Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands' (CNMI) government has a resident representative in Washington, a position that carries no congressional office or powers, even the right to make statements on the House floor.

For years, DeLay and Abramoff worked to block a delegate bill from coming to the floor. Legislation giving the islands a delegate has passed the House Resources Committee several times in the last few years, but former Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) never placed the bill on the legislative calendar. The presence of a Mariana delegate in Congress would diminish significantly the islands' need for a lobbyist to speak for them in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0114971

Incoming Democratic leadership said it has other reasons for opposing a CNMI delegate. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) was asked in December whether she planned to move the bill with majorities in both houses. She didn't answer directly, and later, staffers amended the press conference transcript to indicate Pelosi's opposition to the creation of a delegate.

"NOTE: Pelosi does not support a new delegate for the Mariana Islands until there are significant human rights and labor reforms there," the released transcript reads.

Education and Labor Chairman George Miller (D-Calif.) also opposes the establishment of a congressional delegate. Following a trip to the islands in the late 1990s, Miller has been a champion for reforms there, arguing that forced abortions and prostitution, as well as other human rights abuses, are rampant in Mariana sweatshops. Garment factories, many of which employ immigrant laborers from China and the Philippines, have been a pillar of the local economy. In recent years, however, international labor laws have eliminated tariffs on Chinese textiles, so Chinese companies no longer have incentive to operate factories in the Marianas.

Miller's support for a delegate has waxed and waned over the years. In 2005, he said he changed his mind on the delegate issue after the islands' governor at the time worked to improve labor conditions.

That year, Miller assailed Abramoff and DeLay during a House Resources committee markup of the bill for continuing to block it from coming to the floor.

"As a result of recent revelations in the press, we now understand far better why those bipartisan reforms and — even this legislation to create a voting delegate — have been obstructed," Miller said.

An aide for Miller says his boss no longer supports the delegate because Ben Fitial, a former garment industry executive who Abramoff and DeLay helped get elected Speaker of the CNMI House, is now governor and has vocally advocated against bringing the islands under U.S. labor and immigration standards.

A spokeswoman for CNMI Resident Representative Pete Tenorio argues that the government has spent millions of dollars to eliminate human rights abuses and ensure that labor standards and laws are enforced.

"This doesn't seem right or very democratic to have the authority and the willingness to make widespread changes to a place and not even have its concerns listened to," said CNMI spokeswoman Melinda Matson.

The islands' failing economy also is creating headaches for Democrats intent on updating labor and immigration laws there. In the late 1990s, when DeLay and Abramoff first worked to block a minimum-wage increase, the islands' garment factory industry was riding high. Now the increase would come as the region struggles to cope with a rapid decline in the industry as the result of international trade rules, and a decrease in tourism. As the garment business has suffered — 12 factories were shuttered in the last few years — the CNMI government has taken in fewer tax dollars and laid off thousands of workers.

The bill would increase the islands' minimum wage to $7.25 over the next four years, compared to the two years and two months it gives other U.S. employers to phase in the increase. Matson said Tenorio is not opposed to an increase in the minimum wage, but objects to the amount.

"What business could handle the doubling of their minimum wage in just a few years' time?" she asked.

Tenorio would like to modify that language to allow for just two 55-cent increases in the next year and a half. The CNMI government also wants to add a wage-review committee similar to the one that exists in American Samoa. The local government of that U.S. territory is concerned about the impact implementing the full minimum wage would have on its tuna-canning industry. Samoa's wage-review committee consults with the U.S. Department of Interior on proposed wage increases' impact, and has managed to keep minimum wages dollars below federal levels.

"We're really concerned that we're going to have businesses fail and the only safety net that we have is food stamps," Matson said.

In terms of the House bill, however, the CNMI government's pleas have fallen on deaf ears. Matson said staffers for Miller told her that modifications came too late and they plan to go forward with the straight minimum-wage increase. On the Senate side, however, informal talks are taking place at the staff level to evaluate whether any modifications could be made that would mitigate the hike's impact on the islands' already weak economy. Senators plan to attach the CNMI minimum wage hike to the broader Senate wage bill scheduled for floor action next week.

Miller did not respond to specific questions about the minimum wage bill's impact on the island.

"Workers in the Northern Marianas have suffered for years without decent workplace standards, and that is finally about to change," Miller spokesman Tom Kiley said in a written statement.

Minimum Wage, Maximum Myth (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114972

With Wall Street hot shots and corporate chiefs raking in obscene amounts of money, and with pay in the bottom half of the workforce barely keeping up with inflation, you'd think raising the minimum wage for the first time in a decade would be a political and economic no-brainer for the new Democratic Congress.

But you'd be forgetting about Max Baucus.

Baucus is a Democratic senator from the Republican-leaning state of Montana, which means he is on the political equivalent of the endangered-species list. So you can understand Baucus's need to vote with his constituents on things like sugar subsidies and gun control and grazing fees on public lands.

But while Baucus is surely entitled to his opinions, and entitled to do what is necessary to assure his own political survival, he is not entitled to be chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, which handles such key Democratic issues as health care, trade and tax policy. That position ought to be reserved for a statesman with enough political confidence and backbone that he isn't constantly sacrificing the interests of his party and his country to the narrow interests of his subsidy-addicted constituents.

You'd think Baucus would have learned his lesson in 2001, when he won the enmity of Democrats everywhere by striking the deal that led to passage of the Bush tax cuts, including the phase-out of the estate tax. Apparently not. For on the very day the new Democratic House is set to push through a long-overdue minimum-wage increase, over in the Senate, Baucus has called a hearing on how to offset the "economic hardship" caused by the higher minimum wage with yet another round of business tax breaks.

Consider, for a moment, the economic logic that lies behind Baucus's hearing this morning, when senators will hear from a panel of witnesses that includes Dave Ratner, owner of Dave's Soda & Pet City in Agawam, Mass.

No doubt Ratner and the others will point out that workers making at or near the federal minimum wage are nearly all employed by small businesses. We will hear all the sob stories about how struggling small businesses with thin margins will be forced to cut back on hiring, pull back on expansion plans and, in some instances, close their doors. Moreover, this won't be a tragedy just for small-business owners and employees but for the economy as a whole, since everybody knows that small business creates virtually all new jobs. Only another round of tax breaks can keep the great American jobs machine humming.

And here's the thing: Most of it is nonsense.

To begin, both economic theory and history suggest that small business will, in time, pass on its increased costs to its consumers. Small businesses that pay low wages tend to compete with other small businesses that pay low wages, so they will all face the same cost pressures and respond in similar fashion. The worst that can be said is that a higher minimum wage will add, very modestly, to overall inflation.

There is also general agreement among economists that a higher minimum wage, at the levels we are talking about, will have a minimal impact on adult employment. Slightly higher prices might reduce, slightly, the demand for Wendy's hamburgers, cheap hotel rooms and dog-walking services. But largely offsetting those effects will be the increased demand for goods and services by tens of millions of Americans who will finally be getting a raise. A higher minimum wage doesn't lower economic activity so much as rearrange it slightly.

The biggest lie of all is that small businesses have created most of the new jobs in America. This canard, perpetrated by the small-business lobby and embraced by politicians of both parties, has been used for decades to justify all manner of special subsidies for small business. But as economist Veronique de Rugy of the American Enterprise Institute reported in a paper last year, new jobs have been created by both large and small businesses in roughly the same proportion.

In truth, the bulk of new jobs have always been created by a relatively small number of new firms that grow fast and get quite big -- think of companies like Southwest Airlines, Google, CarMax. Most have little in common with the small-business lobby in Washington or fast-food restaurant chains or the members of the Kiwanis Club in Helena, Mont. As a rule, companies like these couldn't care less about the minimum wage or special tax breaks to offset it.

Linking the minimum wage to small-business tax breaks is specious for other reasons, as well.

During the last decade, when inflation-adjusted pay of minimum-wage workers was declining, tax rates for small businesses were also declining, thanks largely to the Bush cuts. If it is now imperative to reduce business taxes when the pay of minimum-wage workers is rising, you have to wonder if there will ever be a time when the small-business lobby thinks it doesn't deserve a tax cut.

It's also worth noting that, according to the Internal Revenue Service, small-business owners, sole proprietors and the self-employed are, as a group, the biggest tax cheats in America, responsible for $153 billion of the estimated $345 billion tax gap in 2001. What these folks deserve are more frequent visits from IRS auditors, not more tax breaks.

Real Democrats know that raising the minimum wage is the right thing to do -- economically, politically, morally. The question is why they have chosen a Senate Finance chairman who can't articulate that position without equivocation or apology even before the first vote is cast.

Minimum-Wage Wrangling Has Parties Switching Roles (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

Playing against type in the new Congress, Republicans are talking up health care while Democrats talk up tax breaks for small business.

The juxtaposition is striking as the two parties haggle over what it will take to raise the federal minimum wage, a Democratic priority now seen as inevitable after the midterm elections.

Democrats are embracing billions of dollars in tax breaks to ease the effect on small employers. But as Republican governors in California and Massachusetts bring forward state plans to help uninsured families, Republicans in Congress recognize the health-care issue's populist appeal and propose to help small employers deal with covering their workers.

The result is a three-issue Washington triangle that could have unintended consequences. Paying for small-business tax breaks, for example, may mean tightening tax shelters for the wealthy and big corporations.

The action begins today, when the House is poised to adopt its minimum-wage bill raising the hourly rate to $7.25 from $5.15; the change would be phased in over two years, with three 70-cent increments. In the Senate, Finance Committee, Chairman Max Baucus (D., Mont.) will hold a hearing today to weigh tax breaks to help small employers, especially the restaurant industry, which wants a substantial acceleration in depreciation for new construction.

"We're a small-business country, and my state is a small-business state," Mr. Baucus said. He expects to add $8 billion to $10 billion in tax breaks to the Senate wage bill next week.

Hoping to trump the Democrats, House Republicans are pushing legislation to let employers with fewer than 100 workers seek coverage through trade-association health plans that could operate on a national scale exempt from state regulation.

"I think that this leadership has decided to go with health care because that is the most personal decision that families make each and every day, and it affects so many people," said Rep. Eric Cantor (R., Va.), the deputy whip.

"In the last 10 years, it does seem to me that the Republicans have gotten smarter in not opposing everything," said Robert Berenson, a senior fellow at the Urban Institute and a former Clinton-administration Medicare official. "Regarding the uninsured, they have wised up and are pursuing their own solutions."

Powerful Realtor and small-business lobbies have a stake, both for their members and as potential health-plan sponsors. Chief among these is the National Federation of Independent Business, a longtime Republican ally and an opponent of the Clinton administration's 1994 health overhaul plan.

Patient groups argue that the promised cost savings from AHPs will come at the expense of weakening protections for the sickest. State regulators oppose the intrusion on their jurisdiction. And bigger insurers whose small-business health plans are regulated by the states are worried that nonregulated AHPs will have a competitive advantage.

Senate Republicans made some progress toward a compromise last summer but fell short of the 60 votes needed to forestall an election-year filibuster by opponents. The question now is whether movement on the minimum wage can trigger a willingness to take a fresh look at AHP legislation and make the changes needed to reach agreement.

Facing re-election in 2008, Mr. Baucus is hopeful. "Let's see if we can reach an agreement," he said, proposing to move the minimum-wage bill first and then come back to talks on the small-business health plans. Senate Majority Whip Richard Durbin (D., Ill.), also facing the voters in two years, has an interest as well.

"We're definitely optimistic," an NFIB spokesman said later.

So far, the tax side of the political equation has been overshadowed by the health-care skirmishing. But Mr. Baucus is working with his ranking Republican, Iowa Sen. Charles Grassley, and also wants to come up with tax offsets to minimize the impact on the deficit.

The tax breaks under consideration include leasehold and expensing provisions for small employers, work opportunity tax credits as well as a plan to reduce the depreciation period for new restaurant construction from 39 years to 15 years. The 10-year cost of the package is expected to run in the range of $8 billion to $10 billion -- about half of what Congress did in 1996.

House Dems Ready To Push Medicare Negotiations (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON — Twelve years after Congress rejected President Clinton's effort to redesign the nation's health care system, the debate about the government's role in the marketplace is being joined again this week.

DOJ_NMG_0114974

House Democrats on Friday plan to pass legislation requiring the government to negotiate for lower Medicare prescription-drug prices. They see it as one way to reduce the impact of the program's coverage gap, which forces seniors and disabled Americans with high drug costs to pay their full cost for a period of months.

The Medicare prescription-drug law signed by President Bush in 2003 prohibited the government from interfering in negotiations over drug prices. Those negotiations are handled by scores of private insurance plans in each state.

An advertising and lobbying blitz by consumers, insurers and drug manufacturers isn't as extensive as it was in the early 1990s — at least not yet. But the debate over this issue could signify a series of political conflicts over health care policy reminiscent of the Clinton administration's first two years.

"This is about both money and politics," says Tricia Neuman, director of the Medicare Policy Project at the Kaiser Family Foundation, a health care research group. "This is an issue that both seniors and the public feel fairly strongly about."

The debate comes as the Medicare prescription-drug program is rebounding from a troubled start last January, when millions of low-income beneficiaries were mistakenly dropped or overcharged. More than 90% of seniors have some type of drug coverage. Individual premiums and overall taxpayer costs have come in substantially lower than projected. And for the first time in Kaiser's surveys, a majority of seniors approve of the program.

The biggest objection is the coverage gap encountered by seniors whose total drug costs exceed $2,400. Until they have paid $3,850 on their own, they receive no coverage. Proponents of price negotiations by Medicare say that would help narrow the gap.

House Democrats, who have made government price negotiations part of their first "100 hours" agenda, have public anger over drug prices on their side. A Kaiser survey shows that four in five seniors want the government to negotiate for lower prices.

"I think this is one of the reasons the Democrats took the House and the Senate," says Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., who chairs the Energy and Commerce Committee and is sponsoring the bill. If Bush vetoes it or the administration refuses to negotiate over prices, he says, "then we'll see what the political consequences of it are."

Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., has estimated it could save between $61 billion and $96 billion over 10 years. That's disputed by the Congressional Budget Office, which projects no savings, largely because the government would not be able to restrict which drugs are covered.

Private insurers and the Department of Veterans Affairs drive prices down by negotiating with drugmakers over which medicines will be offered to beneficiaries. Companies that don't cut prices risk having their drugs excluded.

A report released Tuesday by the consumer group Families USA says Medicare's prices for seniors' most frequently used drugs are about 58% higher than those provided by the Department of Veterans Affairs. Under the House bill, Medicare could not decide which drugs insurance plans cover.

"Prescription-drug plans were both envisioned and have turned out to have sufficient incentives, market share and tools to negotiate effectively," says Douglas Holtz-Eakin, former CBO director. "It doesn't look like the (government) would bring much more to the table."

AARP, the nation's largest seniors organization, backed the 2003 law but is running ads that blast Medicare for having 43 million beneficiaries "and zero bargaining power" over drug prices.

On the other side are the White House, Senate Republicans, health insurers and drug manufacturers. Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt has called the House bill a "surrogate for government-run health care." He met Tuesday with House Republicans to drive home the administration's opposition to the House bill.

Insurers are touting the current program's success in saving seniors an average of $1,200 on their drug bills while preserving their choices in drugs and pharmacies. "We've exceeded expectations," says Karen Ignagni, president of America's Health Insurance Plans.

And drugmakers are running ads against the House bill. "We're trying to remind people that it took nearly 40 years" to get a Medicare prescription-drug benefit, says Ken Johnson of the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America. "Do we want to risk blowing it up in 100 hours?" The bill, he says, "could ultimately lead to price controls and restrictions on new medicines."

While Democrats have the votes to pass the bill in the House, it faces a closer battle in the Senate. The Senate Finance Committee opens hearings on the issue Thursday. A weaker version that allowed but did not mandate government negotiations got 54 votes in the Senate last year, six short of the 60 required to overcome Republicans' objections. Sens. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, and Ron Wyden, D-Ore., its sponsors, count 58 or 59 votes this year — still short of what's needed.

White House spokesman Tony Fratto said Tuesday that Bush's advisers would recommend he veto the House bill. "The so-called reform sounds nice on a bumper sticker, but it's a solution in search of a problem," he said. "It would limit drug choices for seniors and impede competition."

Skeptical Senate Eyes 5-Day Week (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, January 10, 2007

Senators are adjusting their travel plans to comply with the newly implemented five-day work schedule, but few believe Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) will actually keep the chamber operating at that clip for long.

Opinions vary over how long Reid will insist on the Monday-through-Friday calendar, but Senators and aides on both sides of the aisle have little faith it will last beyond August and the unofficial start of the 2008 election season. About a third of the Senate is up for re-election in two years, and the contest for the White House — likely featuring several sitting Senators — already is in play.

"Five-day workweeks will likely last until roughly the Presidents Day recess," offered one Senate Democratic aide.

Reid is vowing to run a tight ship and has promised that the Democratic majority will not repeat the three-days-of-voting weeks that often marked the years of Republican rule. Don't expect a change in course anytime soon, Reid's office says.

"From here on out, to the extent possible, Members and staff should be prepared to have votes on most Mondays and Fridays," said spokesman Jim Manley.

Manley said Senators simply will have to "juggle" their schedules to make it work, and if some are expecting Reid to pare back the workweek, "they are going to end up being surprised."

At least in the first official week of the 110th Congress, Democrats were basking in their new majority status and were publicly unfazed by the Senate clock. Senators said after practically 12 years in the minority, they have to make up for lost time to get things done.

Sen. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.), chairman of the Budget Committee, said he "absolutely" will have to cut back his trips home but called it "very important" to cover the "backlog of work" around here. "It's absolutely essential," he said. "We've got to clear the work from last year. We've got to clear the decks."

Freshman Democratic Sen. Jon Tester (Mont.), whose commute home is lengthier than most, said the Senate schedule will "impede my ability to get home, but we've got a lot of work to do." Tester guessed that if successful in working through some its business, the Senate ultimately could "back off" of the five-day directive.

But, Tester added, "I will tell you that the three-day workweeks are over."

Public posture aside, a different tone may soon take hold among Senators. In the House, some Members already have balked at the calendar, and in fact, Democrats' pledge to hold a five-day workweek fell to four days in this, the first week of business.

"Eventually, Senators are going to say, 'I gotta go, I can't shift my whole schedule by a day to vote on a Sense of the Senate resolution,'" said a senior GOP Senate aide. "It will become a de facto three-day workweek."

One Democratic Senate staffer agreed, noting that Senators already are grumbling over a schedule that prevents them from performing constituent work and fundraising.

"While it makes for a great sound bite, the reality is that a five-day workweek is doing more harm than good," the aide said. "I would not be surprised to see things slowly revert to the old schedule."

As part of that, Senators and aides alike predicted that the Democratic leadership would soon schedule votes late on Mondays and early on Fridays. That would allow Senators to use the beginning and end of the week as travel days, they said.

Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.), who got up at 3:30 a.m. Monday to catch his flight, said while he's more than happy to make concessions to do his work in the Senate, he expects Reid may get some blow-back on the new calendar from within his own ranks. He added that if Senators are required to give up important constituent time to return to Washington, D.C., a day early, they will expect to be voting on legislation of consequence.

"We'll wait to see how long this lasts," Thune said.

Sen. John Ensign (Nev.), who is charged with electing Republicans to the chamber in 2008 as chairman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, said regardless of how many days are on the schedule, it will do little to speed up legislative business. It's less about time spent under the Dome and more about the urgency with which Senators work, he said.

"You aren't going to get any more done" by being in D.C. five days a week, Ensign said. "You can work eight days a week, but unless people decide to get things done it doesn't matter."

Among His Official Duties, Keeping On Top Of The 100-Hour Clock (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 — Rob Cogorno is busy watching the clock. And not just any clock.

DOJ_NMG_0114976

It is The Clock, at least as far as Capitol Hill is concerned this week — and early next week, and maybe into late next week, depending on how long House Democrats decide it will run.

Mr. Cogorno's formal title is floor director for Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the House majority leader, but for all practical purposes, he is the Keeper of The Clock. That is the digital timepiece on Mr. Hoyer's Web site marking the passage of legislative time as House Democrats push their "Hundred Hours for a New Direction" agenda through Congress.

Mr. Cogorno, 50, is a neatly dressed, precise and exacting man whose shiny desktop in the majority leader's office holds a neat stack of newspapers and a canister of Purell hand sanitizer. He wakes promptly at 6:20 a.m. (by digital clock radio set to NPR) and has prided himself on being punctual since his parents gave him a Mickey Mouse watch when he was 6.

Mr. Cogorno tells time by his BlackBerry, but charts the official passage of "legislative time" by the stately face clock that looms above the House floor.

"We're only counting legislative hours," Mr. Cogorno says in response to the question he has volleyed repeatedly this week. "Legislative time" he explains, occurs when the House is in session and toiling at some official function — debating, voting or doing anything related to making laws. It does not count designated periods in which members can bloviate on all manner of things (say, the plumage of a state bird or the efforts of a national championship football team).

In the event of a dispute? "We decide what constitutes the 100 hours," said Stacey Bernards, a Hoyer spokeswoman. Chiefly, Mr. Cogorno decides. It is a monumental charge.

The Clock, which is also on Speaker Nancy Pelosi's Web site, was set to start running at noon. (You could imagine parents waking their newborns to catch the epic moment on C-Span.) Alas, noon arrived with a failure to launch or tick. Mr. Hoyer's office issued a news release at 12:02 p.m. titled "Update on House Democrats' 100 Hours Clock." The Clock, it said, "will begin ticking" at approximately 1:30 p.m.

At 1 p.m. many members were contemplating lunch and wondering whether The Clock had started.

"I think it has, yes," said Representative Ellen O. Tauscher, Democrat of California.

"Jeez, I don't know," said Representative Don Young, Republican of Alaska. "I don't have one of those hourglasses."

Mr. Young said he expected that Republicans would be given stopwatches "with those little Mickey Mouse thingies on them" to keep track. Either way, he says, he doesn't give a squeak.

"Hmm, let's find out," said Representative Dennis J. Kucinich, Democrat of Ohio, when asked at 2:20 p.m. if the 100 hours had started. He picked up a phone at a security station, called the Democratic cloakroom and asked for someone named Bob.

Yes, Mr. Kucinich reported, the heady hours commenced at exactly 12:57 p.m. when the House began debate on carrying out the recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission.

Or did they?

"The Clock started at 1 p.m.," Mr. Cogorno corrected, with the certitude of someone who has the final say.

Like many other Congressional staff members, Mr. Cogorno, who joined Mr. Hoyer's office in 2003 after working for Richard A. Gephardt, the former Democratic House leader, finds that these are busy hours. Clockwatching duties fell to him as a top aide to Mr. Hoyer, who is in charge of scheduling bills.

For a keepsake, Mr. Cogorno said he would make a printout of the official clock on Mr. Hoyer's Web site when it hit its 100th hour, which might not occur until the end of next week because of gratuitous speeches (the kinds that do not count as legislative time), motions or scheduling obstacles.

He also said he intended to make a printout of The Clock at 1 p.m., when the 100 hours began — except 1 p.m. had already come and gone almost two hours before this interview took place. So the souvenir would require him to turn back The Clock, which Democrats say they are loath to do these days.

Taking Day Off For Football Costs Dems Credibility (HILL)

The Hill, January 10, 2007

House Democrats lost considerable credibility yesterday when their opening session was cancelled so that members could attend the Ohio State-Florida State football game.

This is not a joke.

It is, however, a blunt metaphor for how genuinely out of touch the members of Congress really are. How many other Americans do you suppose were given the same perk? A day off because of an evening football game? And how many school kids would like to have time off to watch their own favorite teams? What kind of message is the House leadership sending?

Is it that they don't get how bad it looks, or that they don't care?

Their record has been dismal. Last year, the House and Senate worked an average of about two days a week for their salary of $162,500. Nice work if you can find it. Responding to well-deserved criticisms, the new House majority leader, Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), with great fanfare, promised a five-day work week. But that was just talk. When it was the Republicans who were scheduling the eight-day month, Hoyer was outraged. But now that the Democrats control the calendar, he considers a football game to be a legitimate excuse for a vacation day. As he said in reference to the new House minority leader, John Boehner (R-Ohio), "There is a very important event happening Monday night, particularly for those who live in Ohio and Florida. In the spirit of comity, and I know if Maryland were playing, I would want to be accommodated, and I want to accommodate my friend, Mr. Boehner."

Apparently Mr. Hoyer is not familiar with the disdain that American voters feel for members of Congress. A mid-December Gallup poll showed that 74 percent of Americans disapproved of the job that Congress was doing. Hoyer is certainly doing his best to keep those negative poll numbers.

And there won't be a five-day work week at all in January. The Martin Luther King holiday falls next week and the Democrats and Republicans are holding respective retreats during the following two weeks. The Democrats are planning a day of speeches in two weeks, including one by Bill Clinton. Hey folks, ever think about doing this on a weekend?

So the promised "five-day" work week starts on Tuesday at 6:30 and ends at about 2 on Friday — more like a two-and-a-half-day work week.

And that might not even happen if there's another important football game.

Meanwhile in the Senate, while Sens. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.), Susan Collins (R-Maine) and John McCain (R-Ariz.) fight for an independent watchdog to enforce lobbying laws, Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) insists that hearings must first be held on the issue. This is hardly a new idea. It's been proposed for years and makes sense. We've seen how little policing of lobbyists has been done — witness Jack Abramoff and his cohorts. Requiring hearings is just another stalling tactic. And, in any event, Reid is the last person who should be in charge of designing the self-policing of lobbyists. For years, his three sons and son-in-law made millions by lobbying for Nevada interests — often working out of his Senate office. Only when the press called attention to the practice did Reid bar the boys. Talk about the goats guarding the garbage! Sen. Obama spoke of "institutional resistance" to the watchdog provisions. That institutional resistance has led to serious lobbying transgressions that must be stopped.

If the Democrats want to stay in power, and if Congress wants to win the support and trust of the American people, they'd better start thinking about how their actions resonate with the average voter. Looks like it's already time for new Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) to use her "mother-of-five voice" and turn things around in the House. As for the Senate, let's hope the new members speak out and force real and necessary reforms. This time the country is watching.

Grandma With A Gavel (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

I have to admit: The grandkids got to me. I'm sentimental by temperament, cynical by training and experience, and the longer I work in Washington, the more the latter trait prevails.

So when the newly minted speaker of the House invited her own grandchildren and the other children in the chamber to join her on the podium and touch the speaker's gavel, my first thought was: This is so choreographed. My second thought was: Awwwww.

The images as California Democrat Nancy Pelosi took office last week were striking -- and stirring -- in their unfamiliarity. Pelosi, holding her infant grandson swaddled in a white receiving blanket, as she sat in the well of the House, awaiting her election. Pelosi, with the assurance of a mother experienced at dispensing cookies to impatient toddlers, giving each child his -- and her -- turn with the gavel. Pelosi raising her hand to take the oath as her grandson, at her side, fiddled with grandma's papers.

As a journalist, I understand the calculations at work here: This plays to Pelosi's advantages, humanizes her image as shrill San Francisco Democrat. As a woman and a mother, especially as a mother of daughters, I was quietly thrilled. About the marble ceiling cracking, yes, but also about the way Pelosi cracked it -- reveling in, not minimizing, her mother- and grandmother-hood.

"Powerful" and "mommy" are not concepts we're used to holding simultaneously. We've become accustomed to women who appear comfortable wielding influence without denying their femininity; think Condoleezza Rice in those high-heeled boots or posing for Vogue in a strapless black gown.

But powerful women who also happen to be mommies have tended to play down the mommy thing, almost as if they think it would diminish their ability to be taken seriously. In a world where women are suspected of failing to comprehend throw-weights, having a baby on board isn't a traditional road map for success.

Pelosi is playing it differently: motherhood as preparation for public office. "Having five children in six years is the best training in the world for speaker of the House," she told the AARP Bulletin. "It made me the ultimate multitasker and the master of focus, routine and scheduling."

Asked about national security during the campaign, she would preemptively bring up her mother-of-five-ness: "Think lioness when you think of women in politics. You threaten our cubs, you're dead." As the election drew close, Pelosi made clear that she'd skip town -- even on election night -- if her daughter went into labor with her sixth grandchild.

How different is this? Imagine Margaret Thatcher threatening to deploy her "mother-of-five voice." When her first grandchild was born in 1989, the prime minister declared with regal glee, "We have become a grandmother," and that was it for the cuddliness.

Pelosi's mommy shtick can get a little clunky (the lioness bit never worked for me) and a little treacly ("Let's hear it for the children, we're here for the children.") But it serves as an important confirmation of women's increasing comfort with their dual roles, and the need for society and the workplace to adjust accordingly.

I started my career in the "dress for success" era, in which women were solemnly instructed to dress as much as possible like male wannabes, in somber suits complete with floppy faux-ties. (Compare Pelosi's swearing-in outfit: scoop-necked aubergine suit and pearls-on-steroids.) Even more important than looking like men was acting like them -- to suppress any suggestion that motherhood might compete with career. If you had to cut out of the office for the third-grade play, better to plead an emergency root canal than look like a mom. That is changing -- now men, even men in politics, wave around their family obligations as badges of decency.

But the Pelosi paradigm could use an update: Pelosi 2.0. The new speaker did stay home and bake cookies; she wasn't elected to Congress until she was 47 and her kids were grown. For better or worse, and with or without a wealthy husband, this isn't especially feasible for most women now. For one thing, we tend to have children later; for another, employers aren't eager to hire women with stale degrees and atrophied skills. The key to ensuring future Pelosis is a workplace that accommodates women -- and men -- looking for ways to shuttle in and out of work or to craft flexible schedules that let them be good employees and good parents.

Who better to help accomplish this than a female speaker? As 8-year-old Madeleine said of her grandmother at the women's tea honoring Pelosi last week, "Because my Mimi got this job I think more women will get jobs like hers."

When Madeleine finished, Pelosi gave her a hug, and then, like grandmothers everywhere, brushed the child's hair out of her eyes.

Senate Moving On Ethics Bill (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, January 10, 2007

Senators moved Tuesday to put more muscle into legislation to sanitize their tarnished image with proposals requiring lawmakers to pay charter rates for corporate jet rides and shell out the full cost for Skybox tickets to sporting events.

Members of Congress need to "demonstrate once and for all that we care more about representing the American people than the perks of power," Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., said.

Picking up on the anti-corruption theme that helped bring them to power, Democrats in both the House and Senate have started off with legislation to ban gifts and meals from lobbyists, limit privately paid travel and shine more light on the special projects, or earmarks, that have proliferated in legislation.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and Republican leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., on Tuesday offered several alternatives aimed at strengthening the Senate bill, which has been criticized as being inadequate in several key areas.

Among the proposals were to require lawmakers to pay the full price of tickets to sporting and entertainment events and to expand the definition of earmarks to include targeted tax and tariff benefits and projects routed through a federal agency that benefit only one nonfederal entity.

Feinstein, the incoming Rules Committee chairman, said this would help stop the kind of backroom deals that sent former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., to jail last year for taking bribes from defense for his aid in steering Pentagon spending.

Reid separately offered an amendment to require lawmakers, already barred under the bill from participating in trips involving lobbyists, to pay full charter rates when they catch rides on corporate jets. New House rules adopted last week effectively banned all travel on corporate planes.

Currently lawmakers usually pay the equivalent of a first-class ticket, much less expensive than a charter rate, when they travel by private jet. Members from larger states such as Alaska or Texas argue that they would be unable to visit remote areas of their states without using non-commercial jets.

The amended bill, in addition to requiring a two-year waiting period before former members can lobby Congress, would bar lawmakers from negotiating for jobs with lobbying firms while still in office.

"We should not tolerate a committee chairman shepherding the Medicare prescription drug bill through Congress at the same time that he is negotiating a job with the pharmaceutical industry to become their top lobbyist," said Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill.

He was referring to former Rep. Billy Tauzin, R-La., who left Congress in 2005 to head the trade group representing pharmaceutical companies. Tauzin had chaired the committee that regulated drug makers and was a key player in passing the prescription drug bill that critics said was favorable to the pharmaceutical industry.

The Senate is expected to be on the ethics bill through next week, and it is unclear when they will vote on the proposed amendments.

The legislation, in the wake of the scandals involving former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and Cunningham last year, has strong support, but Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., warned his colleagues to be careful of overreacting and "feckless positioning to make it look good." He said he was "offended that somebody says that for the price of a meal I can be had by a lobbyist or anyone else."

Lott also urged caution in considering another idea that is certain to come up during the debate, the creation of an independent office of public integrity to investigate ethics charges against lawmakers.

But Democratic Whip Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., said the lobbying bill falls short of addressing the bigger question of the financing of political campaigns. The bill would ban a lobbyist from buying him lunch, he said, but "tomorrow that same lobbyist can have me over for lunch at his lobbying firm to provide campaign funds for my reelection campaign and its perfectly legal."

Ethics Debate Begins (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, January 10, 2007

Senate leaders from both parties on Tuesday pushed into a likely two-week lobbying and ethics reform debate by unveiling a package of changes meant to beef up the overhaul bill the chamber passed handily last spring.

But the drive to strengthen ethics rules is off to a slow start in the Senate, where leaders had hoped to pick up momentum from House approval last week of sweeping rules changes. Senators have yet to vote on any amendments, and aside from two proposals offered by Senate leaders, only Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) had offered an amendment by Tuesday evening.

A substitute measure offered Tuesday by Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) broadens the definition of earmarks covered by new disclosure requirements, mandates tickets to sports and entertainment events be priced at market value, strengthens criminal penalties for lobbyist scofflaws, and imposes a number of changes meant to make Senate procedures more open and fair.

But it left out several reforms — touted as critical by public-interest groups — addressing gifts and travel. Reid picked up those proposals and offered them himself in a separate amendment. His plan tightens bans on gifts and privately funded travel and, most controversially, would force Senators to pay charter rates for rides they catch on corporate jets.

The corporate jet proposal already has met with opposition from Senators who will play a key role in the reform debate. Both Rules and Administration Chairwoman Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and ranking member Bob Bennett (R-Utah) — who are helping manage debate on the bill — spoke out against the change, arguing it would make it impossible for Members representing large, rural states to travel and reach constituents.

“An absolute firm ban on any kind of flight unless you’re paying hourly commercial rates is saying to the Senator from Alaska, ‘You cannot travel around your state,’” said Bennett, referring to Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), another foe of the jet proposal.

Reid is one of the Senate’s most frequent users of corporate jets, taking six trips alone through November of last year, according to PoliticalMoneyLine.com. The Majority Leader acknowledged Tuesday that he hasn’t been a stranger to corporate planes, saying, “I’ve been on private airplanes a lot over the years.” Still, he said it was important for Senators to start paying charter rates for the flights “to remove even the appearance of impropriety from this body.”

Congressional watchdogs said taken together, Reid’s proposals marked an encouraging start to the reform process.

“It’s a very important beginning in that the fight for three key ethics reform issues are being led on the floor by Senate Majority Leader Reid,” said Democracy 21 President Fred Wertheimer. But, he added, “we have votes and fights ahead.”

Reform advocates said in addition to the corporate jet provision, they are preparing for struggles over two other priorities: an independent Office of Public Integrity to investigate ethics complaints that Senate reformers are expected to try to add to the bill, and new disclosure requirements for grass-roots lobbying efforts already in the base text.

The grass-roots lobbying measure is being opposed by an array of conservative groups that argue the requirement would pointlessly force small organizations with modest budgets to file disclosure reports. “We just feel it’s a gross abuse of our Constitutional rights," said Dick Dingman, senior counsel for the Free Speech Coalition Inc., which represents more than 50 groups opposing the plan.

Bennett last spring tried to strike the grass-roots language from the bill while it was still in committee, but his effort fell short and he did not try again on the floor. A spokeswoman for the Senator said he has no plans to offer any specific amendments to the bill this year.

Vitter proposed banning lawmakers' family members from serving on the payroll of their campaign committees or leadership political action committees. He also offered a campaign finance reform measure aimed at Indian tribes and a plan to impose criminal penalties on lawmakers and executive branch officials who knowingly file inaccurate financial disclosure reports.

Reid said he would keep the chamber in session past noon next Friday if it takes that long to wrap up work on the bill. House Democrats, meanwhile, are waiting to see what the Senate produces before finalizing work on their own reform legislation, aides said.

Well-Grounded Ethics Reform (NYT)

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

The Senate's new majority leader, Harry Reid, like most of his colleagues on both sides of the aisle, is an admitted frequent flier on posh lobbyist-provided corporate jets. So we were very pleased yesterday when he proposed legislation that would require senators to pay the full charter-flight fare if they wanted to ride in the style of a C.E.O.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi took the issue further with a full House ban on private jet perks, enacted through a rules change, not legislation. But Senator Reid's initiative could be just as effective, provided no loopholes creep in as the Senate takes up wide-ranging proposals for ethics reform.

No less vital to the new Democratic majority's corruption-fighter claims is the need to create a public integrity office of nonpartisan professionals to help Congress police its own misbehavior. The Republican-controlled Senate rejected the idea last year, but voters soon put a new hand on the gavel. Senator Reid and Ms. Pelosi should both move quickly to create such an office.

Senator Reid also wants his chamber to repair its flimsy regulations by banning gifts, travel and entertainment boons — not just from lobbyists, but from their corporate employers. This should be enacted with bipartisan support, along with more measures to strike at the heart of the corruption issue: the mutual back-scratching of lobbyists and lawmakers who routinely barter lucrative campaign donations for lucrative legislative favors.

Strong proposals are to be debated in coming days, including legislation that would require lobbyists and lawmakers to provide fuller public disclosures of who raises how much for whom. Another proposal would shine a bright light on "earmark" trafficking — the process by which lawmakers slip last-minute, debate-free and unsigned amendments into bills on behalf of favored pleaders. A third proposal would curb so-called "Astroturfing," requiring the disclosure of the finances of lobbyists' phony grass-roots pressure groups.

It is far past time for Congress to end all these practices. And far past time for Congress to clean up the lobbying industry and itself.

Down-to-earth Ethics (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

THE SENATE prides itself on being different than the "other body" — the more plebian and poll-driven House of Representatives. But do members of the World's Greatest Deliberative Body really want to define themselves by their greater willingness to hop aboard a corporate jet?

You might think so, judging from the rumblings from senators unhappy about the pressure to follow the ethically energized House in banning travel by members on corporate planes

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who chairs the Rules Committee, worried in an interview with The Times that prohibiting such hitchhiking, or making it too costly — such as requiring senators to pay a charter rate — "would make it very difficult for many members to get to, and around, their states on a timely basis."

Feinstein does support publicizing senators' trips on corporate jets. But in this case, disclosure isn't an adequate remedy for the reality and the appearance of cuddling up to special interests. And although Feinstein's objections may be rooted in a concern about responsiveness to constituents, that's not the only reason senators like to fly corporate.

"Why do you think there's resistance?" Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) asked, and then provided the answer: "Because corporate jets are nice…. They're convenient. They're waiting for you. You don't have to take your shoes off."

We don't know whether he took his shoes off, but according to a watchdog group, Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott (R-Miss.) was a frequent flier on corporate jets from 2001 to 2005, spending $165,724 to "reimburse" the planes' owners at the commercial rate. Under a proposal backed by Obama and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), senators flying on corporate planes would have to pay the much steeper charter rate — a requirement that reformers think would discourage the practice.

The charter option, which we have endorsed in the past, would be a major improvement. Even better would be an outright ban on senators accepting lifts on corporate planes.

The Senate apparently isn't afraid of being accused of "me-tooism" when it comes to matching the House on other ethics reforms, such as refusing to accept gifts from lobbyists. It should be equally open to emulating the "other body" on this issue. Straighten up and fly right, senators.

Sen. Johnson Upgraded To Fair Condition (AP)

By Mary Clare Jalonick

AP, January 10, 2007

Sen. Tim Johnson's condition has been upgraded from critical to fair, four weeks after he was hospitalized for a brain hemorrhage, and he no longer needs a ventilator to help him breathe.

Johnson is breathing independently after using a ventilator for several weeks, most recently only at night, his doctor, Vivek Deshmukh, said Tuesday.

The South Dakota Democrat, who underwent emergency surgery on Dec. 13, remains in intensive care at George Washington University Hospital, said his spokeswoman, Julianne Fisher.

"The senator continues to make progress," Fisher said. "The next step would be rehabilitation, and we hope that would happen within the week."

A tracheotomy tube remains in his neck to guard his airway, and the senator still has not spoken, Fisher said.

The senator is expected to leave intensive care but remain in the hospital when he begins the rehabilitation process. His office has said that his recovery is expected to take several months.

Johnson was diagnosed with the arteriovenous malformation, a condition, often present from birth, that causes arteries and veins to grow abnormally large, become tangled and sometimes burst. He was rushed to the hospital after becoming disoriented on a phone call with reporters, and he underwent surgery hours later.

His long-term prognosis is unclear. Doctors have said he is steadily improving and has been responsive to his family and physicians, following commands, squeezing his wife's hand and understanding speech. He needed the ventilator to assist with his breathing after fluid developed in his lungs as a consequence of his initial hemorrhage, his doctors said.

In cases like Johnson's, doctors often depend on the patient's ability to answer questions to assess any cognitive damage caused by the hemorrhage.

The senator's sudden illness raised questions about the Democrats' one-vote majority in the upcoming Senate session. South Dakota's Republican governor, Mike Rounds, would appoint a replacement if Johnson's seat were vacated by his death or resignation.

A Republican appointee would create a 50-50 tie and could effectively allow the GOP to retain Senate control because of Vice President Dick Cheney's tie-breaking vote.

Johnson's wife, Barbara, called his change in condition "wonderful news."

"Tim has come a long way and we have a long way yet to go, but we celebrate each victory," Barbara Johnson said. "For me, it is like watching a miracle unfold each day."

S.D. Sen. Johnson's Condition Improves (WP)

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

Sen. Tim Johnson's condition has been upgraded from critical to fair, four weeks after he was hospitalized for a brain hemorrhage, his office said yesterday.

The South Dakota Democrat, who was taken to the hospital Dec. 13 and underwent emergency surgery, remains in intensive care.

"The senator continues to make progress," spokeswoman Julianne Fisher said. "The next step would be rehabilitation, and we hope that would happen within the week."

Johnson's office has said that his recovery is expected to take several months. The surgery was done to correct a condition called arteriovenous malformation, which involves tangled arteries.

His long-term prognosis is unclear. He has responded to his family and physicians, following commands, squeezing his wife's hand and understanding speech.

The senator's illness raised questions about the Democrats' one-vote majority in the Senate. South Dakota's Republican governor, Mike Rounds, would appoint a replacement if Johnson resigned or died.

A Republican appointee would create a 50-50 split and could allow the GOP to retain Senate control because of Vice President Cheney's tiebreaking vote.

Moving Ahead On Stem Cells (NYT)

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

House Democrats are poised to push through a bill this week that would loosen President Bush's restrictions on federal support of embryonic stem cell research. The bill will be opposed by legislators beholden to religious conservatives. Many are likely to cite a new study suggesting that broadly useful stem cells can be derived from amniotic fluid without destroying embryos to get them.

The new study, while certainly intriguing, in no way lessens the need to widen the array of embryonic stem cells available for research and ultimately therapy. The Democrats' proposal is extremely modest — about the least that could be done to accelerate progress in this promising field. It deserves support from veto-proof majorities in both houses.

Under the policy enunciated by Mr. Bush in 2001, federal money can be used to support research on only 20 or so stem cell lines that existed before the policy was set. Many of these cell lines are deteriorating or contaminated. And their number is far too small to allow the full range of research needed to explore the value of stem cells for treating Parkinson's, diabetes, spinal cord injuries and other serious ailments.

The Democrats' bill would expand the number of lines by directing the secretary of health and human services to finance research using human embryonic stem cells regardless of when they were derived. The source of these cells would remain highly restricted. No embryonic stem cells could be tailor-made to study specific diseases or therapies. The stem cells would have to be derived only from surplus embryos that were originally created for fertility treatments and would otherwise be discarded.

An alternative approach that attracted wide attention this week was described by scientists at the Wake Forest University School of Medicine. They extracted stem cells from the amniotic fluid of pregnant women and used them to create muscle, bone, fat, blood vessel, nerve and liver cells. These stem cells, spun off by the developing fetus, seem to have some — though quite probably not all — of the versatility that allows embryonic stem cells to grow into a wide range of body tissues. The fetal cells are easily obtainable from the amniotic fluid during amniocentesis, a diagnostic procedure often performed in the second trimester of a pregnancy.

Even so, it would be a mistake to use this promising research, which has yet to be replicated or fully accepted by other scientists, as another excuse for hobbling embryonic stem cell research. The days-old embryonic cells are likely more versatile than fetal cells extracted months later from amniotic fluid, and they allow a range of research on the very earliest stages of human development.

Stem cell research holds enormous promise, though top researchers say it could take a decade or more to develop useful therapies from it. At this point, it is important to explore all approaches: using "adult" stem cells, which can grow into a very limited range of body tissues; the cells found in amniotic fluid, which may yield a broader range of tissues; and the most versatile cells of all, those derived from early human embryos.

Labor's Money Grab (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

Compulsory dues are the financial foundation of Big Labor's political power. So you can bet union officials will be paying special attention today as the Supreme Court hears oral arguments in a case that could affect how that money may be spent.

The appeal consolidates two cases from Washington state, where even nonmembers of unions can be forced to pay collective-bargaining dues as a condition of employment. In 1992, Washington voters rebelled against that obligation; they overwhelmingly approved a paycheck protection law that requires unions to get "affirmative authorization" from workers who don't belong to the union before spending their dues money on politics.

The state teachers union, the Washington Education Association, challenged the voter-passed law, and a state Supreme Court ruling last year struck it down on the grounds that it violated the First Amendment free-speech rights of union officials. It's a novel rationale, to say the least.

After all, every other special interest group trying to raise money for a political cause has to contact people and persuade them to contribute. That includes the National Rifle Association, Emily's List, the trial lawyers and Chamber of Commerce. But the Washington Supreme Court held that such opt-in provisions were "too heavy an administrative burden" for unions and thus unconstitutional. The state appealed the ruling, and the U.S. Supreme Court now has a chance to decide in Washington v. Washington Education Association and Davenport v. WEA.

Washington is one of a half-dozen states to pass a paycheck protection law. And if the lower court ruling is upheld on the principle that unions have a constitutional right to extract money for political activities from even nonmembers, these laws could be jeopardized everywhere. Such a ruling could also undermine so-called "right to work" laws in 22 states, where workers currently can decide for themselves whether to join or support the union. If the High Court says unions have a First Amendment right to spend nonmember dues on politics, a right-to-work law that prohibits collecting dues from nonmembers becomes problematic.

The good news is that the U.S. Supreme Court has plenty of case law to work with. In its Beck and Abood rulings, the court said workers couldn't be compelled to support a union's political expenditures. And its Hudson decision spelled out procedures for how the competing interests of the union and nonmember workers could be balanced. Namely, the court said workers must be given an opportunity to opt out of political spending and receive a refund for dues money that isn't used for collective-bargaining purposes.

Washington state's law takes this a step further, requiring workers to actually opt into political activities, not merely opt out of them. And that's the way it should be if workers' rights are to be protected. Why should unions be able to take money from someone who objects, put it to use for lobbying and organizing, and then refund it after the fact?

The High Court has an opportunity to clarify these matters -- and in the process stop Big Labor from continuing to trample the rights of employees averse to funding a union's political agenda.

OTHER NEWS:

Some Kentucky Voters May Have 'buyer's Remorse' Over Yarmuth (HILL)

By Sam Youngman

The Hill, January 10, 2007

Though Kentucky Republicans will focus 2007 on maintaining the governor's mansion, those in the 3rd congressional district already are gunning to retake a congressional seat lost in last year's Democratic wave.

Freshman Rep. John Yarmuth (D-Ky.), who narrowly defeated five-term congresswoman Anne Northup with 51 percent of the vote, is facing a local and state GOP bitter over Northup's defeat.

While reports are circulating that Northup, a hero to state Republicans, will throw her hat in the primary ring against embattled Republican Gov. Ernie Fletcher, a number of Louisville Republicans are chomping at the bit to win back the congressional seat that is comprised almost wholly of Louisville, the commonwealth's largest metropolitan area.

In a state that has been trending red since voting for President Bill Clinton twice in the 1990s, Louisville has proven to an exception, culminating most recently with Yarmuth's election.

The chairman of the Jefferson County GOP, Jack Richardson IV, said Louisville continues to be a conservative city, and that Yarmuth's election was less about the two candidates than a poisoned national environment.

Richardson said voters in the district are reeling from "a case of buyer's remorse" despite the brevity of Yarmuth's six-day-old tenure.

"Voters wanted to throw a tantrum to send a message," Richardson said. "[But] it's kind of like when you sober up the next day and you get a hangover and you say, 'What in the world did I do?'"

Richardson said Yarmuth, a wealthy alternative-newspaper publisher, will be "just another rich kid on the block" in Washington who will come to find the congressional workload interferes with his golf game.

"Jack Richardson has about as much credibility as President Bush," Yarmuth said. "I'll have at least a year and a half to demonstrate my commitment to the job and the district and the country, and I have no doubt that I'll do that."

The Republican strategy against Yarmuth from the outset of the midterm race was to mine his hundreds of columns from his alternative newspaper in an effort to paint him as too liberal for the district.

"Louisville is not an overly conservative district, particularly when you're talking about economic issues," Yarmuth said.

State GOP Chairman Darrell Brock admits Louisville is "different than the rest of the state." Kentucky has been a solid red state in both of President Bush's campaigns, but Louisville voted for both former Vice President Al Gore and Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.), though by slim margins.

A longtime political reporter for The (Louisville) Courier-Journal, Al Cross, said the 3rd District is trending Democratic, with a large number of "traditional blue-collar, grey-collar heritage Democrats," who want to vote the party line if presented with a viable option.

"It's not a friendly district, if you will," Brock said. "[But] at the end of the day, the state is trending Republican."

DOJ_NMG_0114984

That said, both Brock and Richardson acknowledged that Fletcher's rocky tenure, compounded by at least one primary challenger thus far, creates potentially dangerous ground for the party. Fletcher was the first Republican elected governor in the state in 32 years, but his administration has been haunted by a series of high-profile indictments and subsequent pardons.

Fletcher's approval ratings hovered around, and even below, 30 percent most of last year after he pardoned a number of indicted and unindicted administration officials following an aggressive grand jury investigation into the governor's hiring practices. State Republicans acknowledge that there is some concern that there could be an Ohio-effect, where a troubled state official causes headaches for the entire party.

Richardson pointed to the example of former Ohio Gov. Bob Taft's tainted administration that created an environment in which Democrats were able to make significant gains on every level. Richardson said Taft "practically destroyed the Republican Party there."

The 2007 governor's race will be the first test of party strength in Kentucky, setting the stage for the congressional campaign, Brock said.

"Frankly, if we win the governor's office, it makes it easier to retake the congressional seat," Brock said. "I think the trend is still clearly there. I won't say [the Northup loss and Fletcher troubles] stopped it, but it clearly slowed the momentum."

Possible challengers to Yarmuth include Erwin Roberts, a former Fletcher administration official and member of the University of Kentucky Board of Trustees, and Chris Thieneman, a builder and contractor popular in the growing southern area of the district, according to a source familiar with Louisville Republican politics.

Roberts, who is black and described as "conservative, well-spoken and better looking than Barack Obama," was named one of the unindicted co-conspirators in the hiring scandal, according to reports.

Cross cautioned that Roberts's baggage from his time with the governor could prove to be a substantial liability.

Though Richardson wouldn't comment on the names of potential candidates, he did say he thought a front-runner would emerge quickly despite the attention being paid to what is sure to be a hotly contested governor's race. He added that he thinks it is "a foregone conclusion" that Northup will enter the governor's race, giving her more than a 50 percent chance to win.

The filing deadline for the governor's race is Jan. 30, after which, Richardson said, potential House candidates will begin to come forward, making their intentions known and beginning the process of raising money.

Yarmuth said he expects the fundraising process to run more smoothly this time around, as many of the district's Democratic donors had long thought the seat to be out of reach.

The congressman was not thought to be a favorite of former Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.). Newsweek's Howard Fineman described Yarmuth as "Emanuel's fourth choice."

Yarmuth conceded the notoriously abrasive Emanuel "was skeptical of my chances," but he insists that no bad blood remains and Emanuel has been helpful in securing committee assignments.

As for Roberts, Thieneman or any other Louisville Republican looking to 2008, Yarmuth says he will be ready.

"I'm not taking anything for granted, but I'm not afraid of any candidate," he said.

DeMint Endorses Romney For President (AP)

By Jim Davenport, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 10, 2007

Sen. Jim DeMint has endorsed former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney in the 2008 presidential race, according to a letter the South Carolina senator is sending to state Republicans.

The endorsement letter, obtained by The Associated Press on Tuesday, marks a split between the two Republican senators representing South Carolina, which holds the first southern presidential primary.

Sen. John McCain of Arizona is favored by Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina's senior senator.

DeMint's split is seen by some as a move to find a conservative alternative to McCain, but it's not that much of a surprise.

DeMint was elected in 2004.

McCain and Romney have both set up exploratory committees and started raising money for presidential bids but haven't formally declared they're running.

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) — Democratic presidential hopeful Tom Vilsack on Tuesday called on Congress to block funds for additional troops in Iraq but expressed misgivings about using the power of the purse to reduce U.S. forces.

"I think it's one way of absolutely putting that on the table," Vilsack told The Associated Press. "Mr. President, you don't have a blank check. Congress basically made a mistake by giving him a blank check at the beginning of this process. Now they are basically saying you don't get a second blank check."

DOJ_NMG_0114985

Vilsack's comments came as President Bush was expected to announce on Wednesday his decision to send 20,000 more troops to Iraq.

"I'm not willing to suggest we have a cutting off of funds that would really put people in greater danger than they are today," Vilsack said.

In one of his last acts as Iowa governor, Vilsack asked state lawmakers to take a stand against the war in Iraq.

"This war has cost us a lot," Vilsack told a joint session of the Iowa Legislature as he gave his eighth and final Condition of the State address. "It has hollowed out our military, it has in my view weakened our National Guard and put our nation at risk."

"Now the president and the Congress are poised to make a big mistake even bigger by escalating America's involvement by adding more troops and investing more resources," said Vilsack, who announced his candidacy last November.

Romney, McCain Vie For House Supporters (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, January 10, 2007

Some House conservatives are struggling to become acclimated to their marginalized role as minority members, but in recent days at least, they've been enjoying the attention of two powerful politicians: Mitt Romney and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.).

Both potential presidential candidates are racing to recast their reputations as moderates. The senator and the former Massachusetts governor recognize that by courting House Republicans, they can silence critics early and tap into a large swath of grassroots support that will be key in determining the outcome of the GOP primary contest early next year.

"A lot of people wonder how a conservative got elected governor in Massachusetts," remarked GOP Conference Chairman Adam Putnam (R-Fla.), who noted that Romney called to congratulate him the day he was elected conference chairman in November. "I'm still learning about Romney and his policies."

Yesterday Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) formally endorsed Romney, splitting the key primary state's senators between the two GOP presidential frontrunners. Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) is a good friend of McCain's and for months has been making calls on his behalf to help him round up South Carolina GOP supporters. But the endorsement came as no surprise to those watching the race closely; DeMint had held a fundraiser for Romney last year.

While Romney and McCain's efforts in South Carolina have been making headlines recently, the two also are keeping a close watch on conservative support in the House. Romney was the first to reach out to House Republicans last year, taking advantage of some conservatives' "anybody but McCain" mentality and disdain for the Arizona lawmaker's campaign-finance reform and immigration agendas. Romney has to contend with his own record on gay marriage and opposition to the Contract with America. In recent months, he also has made a concerted effort to reach out to Southern religious leaders to mollify any concerns they may have regarding his Mormon faith.

After hearing about Romney's early efforts, McCain began working on cementing the support of a network of House members who backed him in 2000.

Nearly all of the dozen GOP members interviewed for this article had been contacted by one of the two candidates — many of them during the first week of 2007. Although he traveled around the country for numerous GOP candidates during the campaign, former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani appears less focused on developing a dialogue with House conservatives than Romney or McCain.

Romney's decision Friday to tap Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.) as a senior adviser, the first House member to take on such a formal role in a campaign, has fueled speculation about Romney's and McCain's efforts to coax conservatives to join their respective camps. Romney also plans to visit House GOP members on the Hill at the end of this week, according to one knowledgeable GOP aide.

"It's no secret that a governor from Massachusetts needs to reach out to conservatives, especially in the South, if he's going to have any chance of getting the nomination," Blackburn spokesman Matt Lambert said. "He's doing that and making a very big push, especially in Tennessee."

Romney spokesman Kevin Madden said Reps. John Campbell (R-Calif.), Buck McKeon (R-Calif.) and Joe Knollenberg (R-Mich.) have come out in support of the former Massachusetts governor.

"We've reached out to a broad spectrum of the House Republican conference," Madden said. "We expect a number of people to come on board publicly soon — both in the field and the fundraising side of things."

Since Romney is currently out of office, he can spend more time on outreach than McCain, who has spent the last few months at the forefront of national security issues, such as the military commissions bill last fall and the debate over whether to back a surge of U.S. troops in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0114986

"Certainly, [Romney] has reached out more aggressively than others," Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), who chaired the Republican Study Committee (RSC) last cycle, said. But Pence said he would not discount McCain's efforts, which "unquestionably" resulted in a boost among conservative House Republicans when he endorsed Rep. John Shadegg's (R-Ariz.) campaign for minority whip (even though Shadegg lost that race to Rep. Roy Blunt (R-Mo.).)

Shadegg doesn't have a formal role in the McCain campaign yet, but he has been buttonholing fellow House Republicans on the Arizona senator's behalf, an effort he has stepped up in recent days. McCain, he said, was not 100 percent certain he would run for president until he discussed the possibility in detail over the holidays with his wife, Cindy, and family at their Sedona retreat. Shadegg, a former chairman of the RSC, said last week McCain called to give him the go-ahead to be more aggressive in his recruiting efforts in the House.

"The race is on among House conservatives," Shadegg said, underscoring House Republicans' respect for McCain on national security issues. Shadegg said so far those supporting McCain publicly include Arizona Republican Reps. Rick Renzi and Jeff Flake and that several lawmakers from various areas across the country privately support McCain. Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.) has been an outspoken booster, and Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) is expected to support the fellow champion of campaign-finance reform.

"We have commitments [from House Republicans] but we haven't released them yet," a spokesman for McCain's exploratory committee, Craig Goldman, said. "The big problem right now is that we're still in the exploratory campaign."

Both candidates have been invited to speak at an upcoming Heritage Foundation retreat Feb. 1 and 2 that many conservative House members are scheduled to attend. Romney plans to discuss his efforts as governor of Massachusetts to implement a universal healthcare plan. McCain has been asked to address national defense issues. Goldman did not know whether McCain had accepted the invitation, and a call to McCain's Senate office was not returned

Perhaps the best way for the candidates to demonstrate their concern for House Republicans would be by helping to retire the National Republican Congressional Committee's debt, which escalated to more than $15 million last year. House Republicans, nervous about their own reelection prospects in 2008 and deeply concerned about the debt, may not want to hear about another politician's ambitions right now, but providing some fundraising help could change that dynamic.

House Republicans plan to tap the entire Republican Party leadership structure, including prospective presidential candidates, to help them solicit funds for the debt-retirement effort, one GOP aide said. McCain, Romney and Giuliani already earned plenty of credit for fundraising during the past election cycle. In the final months of the campaign, McCain, as well as Giuliani, crisscrossed the country to appear with candidates at fundraisers and public events.

"As far as trying to help keep the majority, no one worked harder than John McCain in 2006," said Goldman.

McCain's Straight Talk America PAC doled out roughly $280,000 to 75 candidates, $30,000 to the National Republican Senatorial Committee and $15,000 to the NRCC during the 2006 cycle. Romney, for his part, gave $171,000 to 64 candidates, $26,000 to the NRSC and $2,000 to the House Conservatives Fund, the RSC's PAC. Not to be outdone, Giuliani contributed an impressive $366,000 to 71 candidates.

Romney began his conservative outreach early. His $2,000 donation to the RSC's PAC came in September 2005 and he attended a fundraiser for the PAC months before, in June.

"I've spent some time with Gov. Romney and I like what I have seen," said Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.), a prominent RSC member who heads up the PAC. "He seems to be a Ronald Reagan, supply-side Republican."

Feeney's positive reaction is proof that Romney's talks are producing results. Madden said most of the discussions with House Republicans revolve around Romney's commitment to fiscal discipline. Shadegg, meanwhile, said McCain and House conservatives have had their differences in the past, but they largely agree on national security issues.

However, the current Iraq "surge" strategy already is dividing conservative House members. Rep. Pete Hoekstra, the ranking member on the Intelligence Committee and a Republican from Michigan, a key primary win for McCain in 2000, last week said he opposes a dramatic increase in troops, arguing that the Iraqi military is on the verge of being ready to take over.

Hoekstra has not committed to either possible contender and said he remains open to both of their arguments. McCain called him last week and Romney had visited his district a month ago. Meanwhile, Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.) said Romney had planned to visit his district "to meet with some Bush-Cheney" folks last weekend.

Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas), who chairs the RSC, said he has known McCain personally for a number of years but didn't know Romney until he spoke at the fundraiser for the RSC's PAC. He too has not committed to either candidate.

"House Republicans will certainly be a part of any presidential strategy, and my guess is we'll end up having a pretty healthy dialogue about who to support," he said. "House conservatives will be looking for the candidate that most closely resembles conservative values to take up our banner into November and capture the hearts and minds of the American public. That's what we're going to be looking for."

Iowa GOP Chairs Cool To McCain (RC)

By David M. Drucker

Roll Call, January 10, 2007

Despite his status as the national frontrunner for the Republican presidential nomination, Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) appears to have an uphill climb in the make-or-break caucus state of Iowa, where a majority of county Republican chairmen say he is far from the first choice of likely caucus voters.

The prevailing sentiment in recent interviews with 63 of Iowa's 99 GOP county chairmen was one of respect for McCain as a war hero and public servant but disdain for his politics — particularly his handling of President Bush's judicial nominees and his association with the issue of campaign finance reform. Disenchantment with his candidacy reaches all corners of the state, including the pivotal Republican stronghold of northwest Iowa and vote-rich counties such as Polk, Linn and Scott.

There were some county chairmen who either voiced or predicted strong support for McCain in the January 2008 caucus, with a few more saying it is too early to anoint a frontrunner or rule anyone out. But most, even those who complimented the campaign organization the Arizona Senator and 2000 presidential candidate is assembling, said he is not conservative enough — he is too much of a "maverick," several county chairman said — to win.

"Personally, I have no use for him," said Andrea Roys, chairwoman of the Fayette County GOP in northeastern Iowa. "He tries to appeal to the media and make himself liked — and is a RINO Republican as far as I am concerned."

David Roederer, McCain's Iowa chairman, said he takes the opinions of state GOP leaders seriously, but he expressed confidence that McCain will do well in the caucus. Public and private polls have showed McCain running first or second in Iowa, he said, arguing that the Senator has by far the best experience of any Republican running for president, particularly on the key issue of national security that generally finds him in agreement with grass-roots Republicans.

But many Iowa Republicans remain skeptical.

Romney Turning Heads

Of Iowa's 99 county GOP chairmen, 63 responded to interview requests, with 42 of those saying likely caucus-goers in their area are not inclined to support McCain. Fifteen chairmen said opinions on the Senator are mixed, with about half of them suggesting the Arizonan has significant hurdles to clear. A few of those who said their counties remain open to McCain stressed that it simply was too early to accurately gauge the feelings of likely caucus voters.

Only six county chairmen said enthusiasm for the Vietnam War veteran and four-term Senator was high.

When asked blindly which Republican presidential candidate is exciting the base, a majority of those who responded to that question with a name cited former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

Because Iowa's first-in-the-nation caucus is so important in the presidential nominating process, McCain's showing in the Hawkeye State could prove crucial to his 2008 chances. In 2000, the Senator skipped Iowa and proceeded to lose the nomination to then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush.

Several county GOP chairmen said they had either met Romney personally, that their county party had received a donation from his political action committee, or both. Kevin Madden, spokesman for the Massachusetts Republican's presidential exploratory committee, said winning Iowa is a key part of Romney's strategy to win the GOP nomination.

"Iowa is important, and I think that is demonstrated by our efforts there," Madden said.

Despite the overwhelming disaffection for McCain among grass-roots activists in Iowa, such feelings are not unanimous.

Even some McCain detractors highly skeptical of his ability to win the caucus say views on him could change, adding that they will support him in the general election if he secures the Republican nomination.

Dickinson County GOP Chairman Bill Sackett said McCain is "fairly well thought of" in his northwestern portion of the state. Sackett referred to the Arizona Senator as the man to beat in Dickinson County, even though it is a staunchly conservative area.

"I'd say that McCain probably stands the best chance and has not antagonized either one extreme or the other of our Republican voters," Sackett said. "If I were to choose who could win our county right now, I would say McCain."

Support for Bush May Be Crucial

The county chairmen who said McCain is in good shape often cited his strong support for Bush on the Iraq War and the war on terrorism, his foreign policy views generally, and the fact that he is seen as electable nationally. A few others also referred to McCain's efforts to court the Republican base beginning in 2004 as a plus.

And even among Republican county chairmen who were critical of McCain and doubtful of his prospects, there were some who were complimentary of his Iowa staff and the campaign he has waged there so far.

Roederer, the state campaign chairman, had the same role for Bush in 2004. He rounds out an all-star Hawkeye State staff for McCain that includes Marlys Popma, a former executive director of the state GOP and anti-abortion-rights activist who is tight with social conservatives; former state Senator and state GOP Chairman Chuck Larson, considered a very talented Iowa campaign operative; and retired Army officer Evan Hultman, who is chairing McCain's Veterans Advisory Committee.

Additionally, Iowa native Terry Nelson is working for McCain as a senior adviser. Nelson worked as a Republican staffer in the Iowa Senate in 1997 and served as former Rep. Jim Nussle's (R-Iowa) campaign manager from 1992 to 1995. Nelson has been a respected fixture on the Washington, D.C., political scene since the late 1990s.

"In all honesty, the infrastructure of the campaign is just being put together," Roederer said. "Most people will take a little while to assess all candidates. We have been extremely pleased with the response from people we've contacted and visited."

Roederer argued that McCain's positions on foreign policy and national security — issues on which the Senator and grass-roots Republicans tend to agree — will carry far more weight with likely caucus-goers than will the various domestic matters that have found the two at odds.

"What we're finding is that the overwhelming issue is national security," he said. "And by all accounts nobody comes close to Sen. McCain's experience or credentials on international issues."

Over the years, Iowa's presidential caucus has born witness to unlikely victories and shocking defeats, so McCain may yet change minds among the Republican base in the Hawkeye State. But for now, he has barriers to overcome.

A majority of GOP county chairmen were both highly critical of McCain's politics and considerably skeptical of his chances of winning the caucus.

The two issues that rankle activists the most are the Senator's cooperation on campaign finance reform with Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) and his participation in the "Gang of 14," a bipartisan group of Senators in the 109th Congress that worked together to diffuse the partisan divide over Bush's judicial nominees.

A number of county chairmen said the legislation known as McCain-Feingold has made it more costly for their county parties to advertise in local media.

Other points of contention raised by the chairmen include McCain's position on illegal immigration. He is for a guest-worker program and against building a fence along the Mexican border. Republicans disagree with him on this and specifically mentioned their displeasure over his teaming with Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) to propose legislation.

His past positions opposing farm subsidies and government tax breaks for ethanol production also were raised. McCain has softened his stance on the issue, but distrust remains. McCain campaign spokesman Danny Diaz said the Senator remains opposed to subsidies but now favors boosting ethanol production.

"Unlike 2000, ethanol is now a competitive fuel for consumers suffering from huge increases in the price of oil," Diaz said. "Alternative forms of energy like ethanol are obviously better for the environment and have reduced our dependence on foreign sources of energy, which is critical to our national security."

Elephants' Memory

The Senator's decision to skip the Iowa caucus in 2000 and focus on the New Hampshire primary also remains as a blot on his Hawkeye State résumé, with many county chairmen saying GOP activists haven't quite forgiven McCain for bypassing them six years ago.

"I never cared for John McCain and I don't trust him," said Bonnie Hall, chairwoman of the Boone County GOP just northwest of Des Moines. "I think he's perceived as being too middle of the road — too moderate — and you never know where he's going to come down. He's very unpredictable."

Dan Schnur, a top adviser to McCain in his 2000 presidential bid, said the Senator's status as the GOP frontrunner means he could distance himself from the pack with a strong showing in Iowa.

Schnur counseled McCain to skip Iowa in 2000 and believes in hindsight that that was the correct decision, as it allowed McCain to concentrate on New Hampshire. McCain upset Bush in the New Hampshire primary, and in doing so burst onto the national scene and became a candidate to be reckoned with.

But in 2000, McCain was the upstart candidate and Bush was the favorite. As the frontrunner in the 2008 race, McCain does not have the luxury of skipping the Iowa caucus — although he doesn't necessarily have to win it to secure the GOP nod overall, Schnur said.

"A frontrunner can cement his status in Iowa, but it's very rare that a loss there deals a death blow to a frontrunner campaign," Schnur said.

For any Republican running in the 2008 presidential caucus, the contest kicks off in earnest on Aug. 11, when up to 50,000 activists will converge on the campus of Iowa State University in Ames, Iowa, for the Iowa Republican straw poll.

The event is similar to a county fair and does more than simply assess the mindset of likely caucus-goers. Those candidates who finish strong in the voting are considered well-positioned for the January caucus, and those who do not sometimes drop out of the race altogether.

DOJ_NMG_0114989

Most Iowa GOP county chairmen believe it will be a tall order for McCain to change minds in their state. Unlike most of the Republicans running, McCain is extremely well-known and opinions on him are strong.

"As we say around here, he has a tough row to hoe," said Benton County GOP co-Chairman Loras Schulte.

Ex-Gov. Gilmore Eyes GOP White House Bid (AP)

By Bob Lewis

AP, January 10, 2007

Jim Gilmore, Virginia's former tax-slashing Republican governor, on Tuesday took the first step in a long-shot bid for the presidency.

Gilmore filed papers with the Federal Election Commission in Washington to form the Jim Gilmore for President Exploratory Committee, said his aide, Matt Williams. He is the sixth Republican to form an exploratory committee — a year before the first primary votes are cast.

Like several other Republican hopefuls, Gilmore said he entered the race because the GOP field lacks a true conservative and argues his candidacy will resonate with conservatives disillusioned with the party.

"I'm here to offer the right program for the people of the United States. I'm the type of mainstream Reagan conservative that has always kept his promises," Gilmore said in a telephone interview.

The one-term governor, little known outside his state, faces an increasingly crowded field. Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, Arizona Sen. John McCain, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy Thompson and Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas also have taken the initial steps in a White House run.

Gilmore, 57, was elected governor in 1997 promising to cut the property tax that local governments in Virginia levy on personal cars and pickup trucks.

Within weeks after he was sworn in, he pushed his popular car tax cut through a legislature then controlled by Democrats. The incremental phaseout obligated Virginia to reimburse city and county treasuries dollar-for-dollar for car tax revenues they lost.

Critics warned that the reimbursements created an enormous state spending program that would eventually wreck the state's finances.

In 2001, after a recession cut deeply into Virginia tax collections and with reimbursements to localities around $700 million annually and soaring, Gilmore rebuffed efforts by fellow Republicans in the state Senate to stop the car tax phaseout.

The resulting legislative stalemate and GOP infighting left Virginia unable to reconcile its budget for the first time ever, and helped Democrat Mark R. Warner upset Republican Mark L. Earley, whom Gilmore had supported.

Warner also blamed Gilmore and the car tax for budget deficits that topped $6 billion in subsequent years.

Gilmore was among the earliest supporters of Texas Gov. George W. Bush's 2000 presidential quest, and Bush rewarded Gilmore by appointing him chairman of the Republican National Committee. Within a year, however, Gilmore left the job after disagreements with senior White House staff.

Gilmore also headed a commission Congress appointed in 1999 to investigate the threat terrorism posed to the nation.

In its report, finished one week before the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the commission recommended creating a Cabinet-level office to battle terrorism at home, better intelligence sharing among federal agencies, better federal cooperation with local and state authorities and increased border security.

Gilmore Moves On White House Bid (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

Former Virginia Governor James S. Gilmore III yesterday became the latest Republican to form an exploratory committee in advance of a potential 2008 White House campaign.

"Today, I filed the papers necessary to explore a candidacy for president because I believe that this nation needs conservative leadership," Mr. Gilmore said. "Alone among those considering a candidacy for the Republican nomination, I have a record of real leadership as a tax cutter and job creator, as a leader on national security issues and as a national leader in our party."

Mr. Gilmore served as head of the Republican National Committee and Republican Governors Association.

Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Sam Brownback of Kansas; former New York City Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani; and former Govs. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts and Tommy G. Thompson of Wisconsin are other Republicans who have formed exploratory committees.

DOJ_NMG_0114990

"Jim Gilmore is a former governor of a very important state with a strong conservative record," said Ed Gillespie, chairman of the Republican Party of Virginia. Mr. Gillespie said he is neutral on the field of Republican presidential primary candidates.

Mr. Gilmore last year traveled to key primary states such as Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina. In August, a group of supporters started a Web site to encourage the former governor to run for the White House.

A former Army counterintelligence agent, Mr. Gilmore served as governor from 1998 to 2002. From 1999 through 2003, he chaired the Gilmore Commission, which Congress created to assess the nation's ability to respond to a terrorist attack.

The commission released a report one week before the September 11 attacks recommending a Cabinet-level office in the White House to combat domestic terrorism and improve cooperation between federal agencies and local law-enforcement authorities.

Mr. Gilmore is serving as chairman of the National Council on Readiness and Preparedness, a nonprofit organization working to strengthen homeland security efforts.

Skeptics of Mr. Gilmore's presidential move say he is only increasing his profile in advance of a 2008 Senate campaign or a second run at Virginia's governorship.

Mr. Gilmore was elected governor of Virginia in 1997 after promising to reduce state property taxes and taxes on motor vehicles. However, a 2001 recession led to a confrontation between Mr. Gilmore and Republicans in the state legislature who wanted to reverse his car-tax cuts.

That showdown helped the campaign of Mark Warner, a Democrat who went on to defeat Mr. Gilmore's would-be successor Mark L. Earley.

A Hopeful Ponders Where To Plant Her Flag (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 — Choices, choices. The Four Seasons in Georgetown or the Four Seasons in Midtown? A town full of political leaks or a town full of mysterious odors? Easy access to hundreds of gabby Democratic strategists or easy access to the one gabby Democrat who matters most (one's husband, perhaps)?

Among the signs that the Clinton presidential kabuki is ending — that Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton will, in fact, announce her campaign for the White House soon — is a decision, Democrats close to her say, that she plans to base her campaign headquarters in or around Washington instead of in White Plains or New York, which had been under consideration.

Running from a base in Washington would make the most practical and financial sense, Clinton advisers say, and they note that she would have satellite offices in New York and elsewhere. Still, a few advisers and supporters are concerned about the decision, saying it could reinforce her image as a Washington insider (if it is possible for that to be any more of an issue) and increase the possibility of leaks to the press corps (as if, ditto).

"One group thinks headquarters should be wherever is easiest for her, and another group is worried about public perception, since Washington is an unpopular place," said an adviser who has been involved in the discussions and who insisted on anonymity. "The thing is voters in the end won't really care where she runs from."

The concerns among the pro-New York crowd are twofold. First, the Democrats' success on Nov. 7 was seen, in part, as a repudiation of insider politics. Even more, Mrs. Clinton's likely main rivals for the nomination at this point, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois and former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina, plan to run their campaigns from their home states and portray themselves as Americans who understand the hardships of average citizens.

"Washington is the center of government, but it is a very insular, myopic place," said David Axelrod, a senior adviser to Mr. Obama. "It's hard to see America clearly from Washington, D.C., and that's the danger in rooting a national campaign there."

Logistically, Washington makes sense. Mrs. Clinton, as a member of the razor-thin Democratic majority, will be needed here to cast Senate votes. Most of her advisers live and have families here, including her campaign manger, Patti Solis Doyle, and her pollster, Mark Penn. And unlike Chez Clinton in Chappaqua, N.Y., her spacious home here is convenient for meetings and fund-raisers, situated a few miles from the Capitol and the airport.

Her chief adviser based in New York, Howard Wolfson, is selling his apartment on Central Park West and plans to move here soon. Mr. Wolfson had been planning to do so, Clinton advisers said, because his wife, Terri, is a top aide to Speaker Nancy Pelosi, and they have a young child.

The site of Mrs. Clinton's headquarters is less of a concern in a general election, Democrats say. A top Republican rival, Senator John McCain of Arizona, is expected to base his campaign across the Potomac in Crystal City, Va., for the same logistical reasons as Mrs. Clinton's.

The last winning presidential candidate who ran from Washington and who was not an incumbent or vice president was Ronald Reagan in 1980. His operation was based at home in California until he won the nomination. Ed Rollins, the Republican strategist who was an aide in the 1980 campaign and managed the 1984 re-election effort, said news media leaks could be tougher to manage in Washington, as well as the flow of politicians who want to offer their two cents (welcome or not).

Former Vice President Walter Mondale ran from Washington in 1984, Gov. Michael S. Dukakis from Boston in 1988, Bill Clinton from Little Rock, Ark, in 1992, and Bob Dole from Washington in 1996. Senator John Kerry considered running from Boston in 2004. There were tensions between his Boston advisers and his Washington advisers, and Washington won out.

People involved in those campaigns said logistics were always the concern.

"I won the '88 nomination on long weekends," Mr. Dukakis said, "because Monday through Thursday I wanted to be in the statehouse."

In 2000, Vice President Al Gore started running from Washington and then decamped to his home state, Tennessee, in part to try to shed his insideritis. He went on to lose Tennessee, anyway.

Mr. Edwards ran for the nomination in 2004 from Raleigh, N.C. As Mr. Kerry's running mate that year, he did not carry his home state, either.

At times, Mrs. Clinton has considered home to be in Illinois, Arkansas, Washington and New York, and, advisers say, she thinks she can win all four states next year.

George W. Bush ran from Austin in 2000, when he was governor of Texas. Ken Mehlman, the chairman of the Republican National Committee who worked on Mr. Bush's campaign that year and managed it in 2004, said he viewed the headquarters location as a business decision. Austin was easier and more comfortable for the team in 2000, and an office complex in Virginia helped focus the campaign in 2004.

"I wanted a place with a lot of open spaces and few offices, where it could be collegial and not hierarchical, and a place with a restaurant, parking spaces and a gym," Mr. Mehlman said, "so people would never want to leave."

The Green Gripe With Obama: Liquefied Coal Is Still . . . Coal. (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

Washington Post, January 10, 2007

Who, but who, would soil the environmental reputation of Barack Obama?

The Democratic senator from Illinois gets stellar marks from greens. Just a few months ago he was calling global warming "real," saying: "It is here. . . . We couldn't just keep burning fossil fuels and contribute to the changing atmosphere without consequence."

So why then, environmentalists ask, is Obama backing a law supporting the expanded use of coal, whose emissions are cooking the globe? It seems the answer is twofold: his interest in energy independence -- and his interest in downstate Illinois, where the senator's green tinge makes the coal industry queasy.

The coal industry praises Obama's reintroduction, with Sen. Jim Bunning (R-Ky.), of the Coal-to-Liquid Fuel Promotion Act of 2007 last week, which would provide incentives for research and plant construction. The industry says the technology, which converts coal into diesel engine fuel, would reduce America's dependence on foreign oil through a new, home-mined fuel that burns as cleanly as gasoline.

Environmentalists say focusing on coal does nothing to arrest climate change. Instead, they say, lawmakers should back cleaner alternative fuels and stricter automobile and industrial emissions standards.

"The rationale is, 'We have a lot of coal in the ground, let's put it to some use,' " said Frank O'Donnell, president of the D.C.-based nonprofit group Clean Air Watch. "It's not the best use of the coal and it's one that's almost certain to exacerbate the global warming problem." Obama's advocacy of coal liquefaction, he said, might have to do with his getting "hammered" by Illinois coal interests.

National Mining Association spokesman Luke Popovich counters that "our friends in the green community . . . don't want us to use our most abundant fuel," and adds: "They're sort of indifferent to the trend line toward greater importation of transportation fuels."

Coal liquefaction, Popovich said, is "used quite extensively in countries like South Africa."

David G. Hawkins, of the Natural Resources Defense Council, said in Senate testimony in April that "while it appears that technologies exist to achieve high levels of control for all or most of these pollutants, the operating experience of coal-to-liquids plants in South Africa demonstrates that coal-to-liquids plants are not inherently 'clean.' "

Popovich concedes the point: "Liquefied coal produces a diesel fuel cleaner than other diesel fuels, not necessarily cleaner than conventional gas," he said.

What about Obama? "Senator Obama has introduced legislation to drastically increase the production of biofuels like ethanol, and has authored legislation to increase fuel economy standards that would eventually save us 4.3 million barrels of oil a day and would reduce global warming," Obama spokesman Tommy Vietor said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0114992

And, oh, yes: "Illinois basin coal has more untapped energy potential than the oil reserves of Saudi Arabia and Kuwait combined. Senator Obama believes it is crucial that we invest in technologies to use these resources to reduce our dependence on foreign oil."

Poaching Red State Donors (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, January 10, 2007

Democratic White House hopefuls such as Sens. Barack Obama (Ill.), Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and former Sen. John Edwards (N.C.) are rushing to capitalize on an impressive national fundraising network Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) built in the mold of President Bush's pioneers program. The strength of Bayh's connections could boost his profile when the Democratic nominee selects a running mate next year.

In December, a few days after Bayh announced his decision not to run for president in 2008, about 160 of his biggest donors were scheduled to fly to Washington to craft a fundraising campaign. Several of Bayh's advisers said that "well over" 150 donors in his network had pledged to raise $150,000 each for the campaign, and a smaller group of fundraisers had promised to raise $500,000 apiece.

A unique quality of the network, say the advisers, is that it includes many donors — a group cultivated by the lawmaker, who has strong ties to the business community and espouses centrist policies — that are not in other national candidates' databases. Combined, the donors helped stockpile more than $10 million in cash on hand to Bayh's reelection fund, which can be transferred immediately to a presidential campaign and would enhance the senator's viability as a vice presidential nominee.

"He was always a top-tier candidate and he should be for reasons of message and his moderate stance, but in addition to that he not only will have in excess of $11 million or $12 million on hand, he has a tremendous network of people willing to raise millions of dollars for him," said Joe Andrew, a former chairman of the Democratic National Committee (DNC) and member of Bayh's network who himself pledged to raise half a million dollars for the senator.

Bayh's chief fundraising aide, Nancy Jacobson, who helped to build the network, already has signed on to Clinton's presidential campaign. But Edwards and Obama are also trying to snag a piece of Bayh's pie.

"I have a feeling she will guard our list pretty strong, but I heard that Sen. Edwards has made inroads with some of our people," said Richard Gordon, a member of Bayh's kitchen cabinet who first met Bayh during his father's presidential campaign.

Bayh's network is especially valuable because many of its members are not "regular David donors," in the words of one Democrat.

Outside observers agree with Bayh's advisers that his fundraising prowess would be valuable next year after a candidate wins the Democratic nomination. That is because the nominee is widely expected to forego public financing for the primary and general elections, which would free him or her from spending limits that have constrained candidates in past years.

"Bayh could be exactly the kind of vice presidential candidate who could be most valuable in 2008 because of his established fundraising abilities," said Michael Toner, who served as Federal Election Commission (FEC) chairman last year. "In the past, the candidates at the top of the ticket didn't look to vice-presidential candidates to be major fundraising magnets.

"That's mainly because past presidential candidates have taken public money for the general election," he added. "If we're headed in 2008 to candidates turning down money for the general election, the ability of a vice-presidential candidate to be instrumental on the fundraising side has never been more important."

In total, Bayh's fundraising network consists of about 500 major donors, ranging from supporters who promised to raise $25,000 to those who pledged to collect $500,000.

One of the factors that hastened Bayh's decision to drop out of the race is that he had scheduled donors from around the country to fly into Washington to convene in the ballroom of the Mandarin Oriental hotel on Dec. 18 and 19 to assemble a fundraising roadmap.

But Bayh was facing dispiriting poll numbers in Iowa, a state where he had to do well to have a chance in the Democratic primary. If Bayh, a Midwestern politician from a farming state, could not post impressive numbers in Iowa, then his chances would have been bleak in New Hampshire.

A public poll of likely Democratic caucus voters conducted by Harstad Strategic Research in October showed that Bayh failed to draw even 1 percent of their support. A poll commissioned at the end of May by the Des Moines Register showed 2 percent of likely Democratic voters in Iowa favoring Bayh. Support for Bayh failed to materialize in Iowa even though he spent more time stumping there than any of his rivals, his advisers said.

The Register's chief political writer, David Yepsen, said Bayh made about a dozen recent visits to Iowa, and that only Edwards appeared as often in the state.

DOJ_NMG_0114993

Yepsen said Obama, Bayh, and Edwards attracted the allegiances of many Iowa Democrats, and that Gov. Tom Vilsack, who is also running for president, directly competed with Bayh for centrist voters.

Gordon, Bayh's longtime friend, said that with Clinton, Obama, Edwards and Vilsack virtually guaranteed to win over a portion of the Democratic electorate, there was only a limited share of the vote Bayh could hope to pick up next January.

"If you add up all those segments, the pie shrinks dramatically," he said.

Gordon said that "a couple" of the presidential hopefuls have contacted him about joining their camps, but he told them that he would wait a few weeks before making a decision.

Bill Moreau, who served as Bayh's chief of staff during the lawmaker's first term as Indiana governor, said that though the numbers did not look promising last month, his aspirations for higher office are not finished.

"I think ultimately he came to the conclusion very rationally that this was an exercise in futility," said Moreau of the decision to drop out. "It wasn't shaping up to be something within the realm of the possible — this time around."

Schwarzenegger's Health Care Plan Draws A Large Dose Of Skepticism (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 9 — When Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger took the oath of office last Friday, he called on legislators in Sacramento to set aside party loyalty in favor of "the Party of California."

And sure enough, just 96 hours later, Democrats and Mr. Schwarzenegger's fellow Republicans are already in agreement: his first big idea of his second term — a sweeping plan unveiled Monday to assure health care to all Californians — is promising and ambitious, but faces a long, hard fight before enactment.

Chief among the challenges, politicians and policy analysts said Tuesday, is the enormous number of political players — from big labor and big insurance to small-county government — that would be affected by any universal health care bill.

"I cannot think of another topic that requires so many people to be heard to build consensus," said Don Perata, president pro tem of the State Senate. "You'd have to rent out Madison Square Garden to get them all in there."

Mr. Perata, a Democrat from Oakland, should know, because he wrote his own health care proposal last month, one of a series of efforts that have been undertaken in recent years to fix the state's troubled health system.

Mr. Schwarzenegger's plan would provide care to the 6.5 million Californians who currently have no insurance, including an estimated one million illegal immigrants. That is just one of the elements to which Republicans are objecting.

"Health coverage for illegal aliens is a nonstarter for us," said Robert Huff, chairman of the Assembly's Republican caucus. "It creates a magnet for them coming here rather than staying there."

Like some Democrats, Mr. Huff was also skeptical about the plan's estimated cost, which the governor's office put at $12 billion a year. "I think it's just throwing a dart at the wall," he said. "It's anybody's guess what it would cost."

Then there is the financing, which would require doctors and hospitals to pay 2 percent and 4 percent of their revenue, respectively, into a fund to cover the poor and uninsured. Mr. Schwarzenegger calls those payments a "fee," but other Republicans said that was just another word for "tax."

The California Medical Association, which represents more than 34,000 doctors in the state, gave the proposed overhaul mixed reviews. Though the association praised the idea of universal coverage, the fee on doctors could be a deal breaker.

"We feel it's a regressive tax," said Dr. Anmol Singh Mahal, the group's president.

The distinction between fee and tax is more than semantic: under California law, fees can be adopted by a simple majority vote of each house of the Legislature, while new taxes require a two-thirds majority. Democrats control both houses but do not have enough votes to muster two-thirds without Republican help.

Kim Belshé, the state's health and human services secretary, said the governor had expected people to disagree with elements of his plan.

"Health care reform is hard," Ms. Belshé said. "If these were issues that were easy to address and solve, they would have been addressed and resolved long ago."

Building consensus will be especially important for Mr. Schwarzenegger because of the referendum-addicted nature of California, where laws passed by the Legislature are sometimes overturned by ballot initiatives. In 2004 voters voided one ambitious health care law, the Health Insurance Act, which would have required medium- and large-size employers to offer care to their workers or pay a fee to the state.

Mr. Schwarzenegger's plan would employ similar "play or pay" mechanisms: employers with more than 10 workers would have to offer insurance or pay 4 percent of wages that are subject to Social Security tax into a fund subsidizing the purchase of health care for the uninsured.

DOJ_NMG_0114994

Ms. Belshé said the state also expected to pay for the program in part through billions of federal dollars that California would get by increasing its Medi-Cal reimbursements to doctors and hospitals. The increase would automatically bring federal matching funds.

Such increased payments would be critical to health care providers, said Duane Dauner, the president of the California Hospital Association, because it would offset the new “fees” — or are they taxes? — the governor has proposed for doctors and hospitals.

Mr. Dauner said he thought the plan was “very innovative” but stood little chance of passing as is.

“I don’t care what the plan is or who introduces it, whether it be the governor of California or the president of the United States,” he said. “It goes through a process.”

In California, Big Plans To Expand Health Coverage (CSM)

By Daniel B. Wood

The Christian Science Monitor, January 10, 2007

LOS ANGELES

A sweeping plan by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) to guarantee health insurance for all Californians - including children of illegal immigrants - is being characterized both as a bold model for improving healthcare access and as a costly government intrusion that will hurt the state's economy.

Arguments for and against near-universal healthcare have already been fought out in the few other states that have moved ahead with health-insurance reforms, namely Massachusetts and Vermont. But the sheer numbers involved in Governor Schwarzenegger's proposal - a $12 billion price tag and coverage for 6.5 million people who currently don't have health insurance - are guaranteed to raise the stakes as the California legislature considers whether to approve it.

Among the ranks of the uninsured are about 763,000 children. Of the plan's overall cost, about $400 million would be spent on those minors, no matter what their immigration status is. That aspect, in particular, is winning kudos from family groups nationally, even as it raises the ire of immigration-control advocates who worry the healthcare provision will make California that much more of a magnet for illegal immigration.

The governor, who unveiled the overhaul plan Monday, said he wanted to provide "accessible, efficient, and affordable healthcare to every Californian."

The proposal "will not only be enormously helpful for California children but will also play a very significant role at the national level," says Ron Pollack, executive director of Families USA, a nonpartisan organization that urges affordable healthcare for all Americans. "This will no doubt lend enormous support for the federal government's providing states with significant funding to expand coverage to uninsured children" through the State Children's Health Insurance Program, says Mr. Pollack, noting that the joint federal-state program is up for reauthorization.

Of all the parts of Schwarzenegger's plan, health insurance for all children may prove to be among the least controversial, say those who back the idea. In a poll released Nov. 30 by The United Ways of California (an advocate of universal child health insurance), 81 percent of likely voters in California said they support ensuring that all children have health insurance.

"Elected officials are catching up to where voters are. They know children are the most vulnerable in the population and the least expensive to cover but [that coverage will] buy a lifetime of benefit," says Wendy Lazarus of the Children's Partnership, a nonpartisan child-advocacy group based in Santa Monica, Calif., and Washington. "Governor Schwarzenegger and his advisers are saying, 'We understand.' "

Several states have been floating ideas to expand access to health coverage generally, or for children specifically. Besides Massachusetts and Vermont, New Jersey, Connecticut, Maryland, New Hampshire, Florida, Illinois, Maine, and New York are looking at health-insurance reforms. So far, the California proposal is more comprehensive for children than most - guaranteeing medical coverage for children of families earning up to 300 percent of the poverty level, or $60,000 a year.

To pay for children's coverage, Schwarzenegger calls for expanding the state's Healthy Families program, possibly by using as much as $500 million saved annually by ending state welfare payments to poor families after five years.

"I see discussion over this payment issue as something that will immediately get the backs up of Democrats, [who will be] saying, 'Hey, you can't take it from those who needs it the most,' " says Larry Gerston, a political scientist at San Jose State University.

More broadly, the call to ensure that 6.5 million Californians - 1 in 5 - get health coverage is raising cost concerns among lawmakers in Schwarzenegger's own party, among other players.

Under his plan, employers who do not provide health insurance to workers would be required to pay into a fund that would be used to help cover the working uninsured. Doctors and hospitals in the state would also be tapped - 2 percent of revenues for doctors, 4 percent for hospitals - so that those who treat low-income Medi-Cal patients could be reimbursed for their care at a more generous rate than is now the case. State Republican leaders have already complained that these elements could devastate the state economy.

"Imposing a new jobs tax on employers of any size, and expanding costly government mandates, is the wrong approach," says Assembly Republican leader Michael Villines. "It is vital that lawmakers fully consider the impact our actions will have on jobs, the economy, hard-working families, and the state budget."

Some observers say the plan may falter as legislators try to iron out its details. "I worry that this plan is so comprehensive that it will fall apart," says Arnold Torres of the California Hispanic Health Care Association. "I don't think anyone has yet provided the kind of presentation to explain how all of this is going to come together."

Massachusetts Could Serve As A Guide In California's Health Insurance Bid (NYT)

By Pam Belluck

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

BOSTON, Jan. 9 — In its drive to provide health insurance to nearly all its residents, Massachusetts has already signed up more than half of the poorest people who are eligible.

But experts and politicians agree that the bigger challenge will be the next 150,000 people: the working poor who will get a state-subsidized rate but will still have to pay for insurance, typically $18 to $170 a month depending on their income.

"This group is going to be much more challenging," said Paul Ginsburg, an economist who leads the Center for Studying Health System Change. "They're dealing with people who don't even think about having health insurance."

As California maps out its path to near-universal health insurance, Massachusetts could offer some guideposts.

"We're really changing the culture of providing heath care," said Michael J. Widmer, president of the Massachusetts Taxpayers Foundation, a nonpartisan group that studies state spending. "For some people, it's changing the mind-set from one of showing up at the emergency room or at the local health center with a problem to understanding that they can be insured. Nobody's expecting that would happen overnight."

Devising a plan that all of the state's political stakeholders could accept took hard work and time. It dates back to at least 2004, when Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican and former venture capitalist, proposed requiring an "individual mandate" that everyone get insurance, a feature of the plan now being proposed in California. The president of the State Senate, Robert E. Travaglini, a Democrat, also called for expanded coverage, presenting a more incremental plan than Mr. Romney's.

Then the speaker of the House, Salvatore F. DiMasi, a more liberal Democrat, demanded an expansion of Medicaid and a payroll tax for employers who did not provide insurance. Those provisions were opposed to different degrees by Mr. Romney and Mr. Travaglini, and the legislation almost fell apart.

But several factors helped propel the parties to an agreement: a federal threat to cut $385 million in financing if the number of uninsured was not reduced and the support of Senator Edward M. Kennedy, a Democrat and rival of Mr. Romney.

The plan requires about 515,000 people, most of the state's uninsured, to get health insurance by July 1 or face penalties that could include the loss of a personal income tax deduction. Medicaid was expanded somewhat to pay for those below the poverty line. The state's $1 billion pool to pay for free care was reconfigured to be used for subsidized premiums for people earning up to three times the federal poverty limit.

The state will set rules to help insurance companies create health plans intended to be affordable enough for people with lower-middle incomes.

So far, about 29,000 people at or below the poverty line have enrolled, or slightly more than half of those eligible for this type of enrollment.

The second phase, focusing on the working poor, began this month and is considered much more difficult.

The insurers selling the subsidized health plans have been trying to get the word out.

Christina Severin, executive director of Network Health, the insurer with most of the lowest-priced plans, said her company was advertising in several languages and enlisting hospitals, clinics and churches to recruit the uninsured.

The other major challenge will involve people not eligible for subsidized plans. First, the agency set up to put the law into effect, Commonwealth Connector, will have to set standards for affordable health care plans, deciding, for example, whether to require plans to include prescription coverage.

"On the one hand, there's pressure not to set the bar too low so it's not some sort of inadequate plan," Mr. Widmer said. "On the other hand, you need to have options because you're trying to draw in a lot of different groups.

Massachusetts is clearly breaking new ground, going further than other states.

Vermont's program, passed last May, will require private insurance companies to offer coverage for the uninsured starting in October 2007. To pay for the program, employers who do not offer health insurance will pay $365 per employee, and taxes on cigarettes will increase. Unlike Massachusetts, Vermont will not make participation mandatory.

DOJ_NMG_0114996

Maine's program, Dirigo, which started two years ago, has run into several obstacles. Fewer than 20,000 people have been enrolled in the program; the goal was to cover all 130,000 of Maine's uninsured by 2009.

Business and insurance groups have sued over a provision that requires private insurers to pay. And a study group recently recommended considering individual mandates, requiring employers to provide coverage and imposing new taxes.

"Maine has had a fair amount of problems because it was based on a very questionable idea," Stuart H. Altman, a professor of health economics at Brandeis University, said, adding, "It's not going well."

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

MONTEREY, Calif. -- On Monday, Arnold Schwarzenegger presented his proposal for reducing the number of Californians who lack health insurance. His proposal is almost indistinguishable -- except in details -- from that of the Democrats who dominate the California Assembly and Senate.

The Democrats tend to favor solutions involving regulations, government spending and taxes, and Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata's proposal -- the main contending Democrat plan -- hits the trifecta. It would require employers to provide health insurance; give them the option of paying a tax instead of providing health insurance; and increase spending by expanding both the Medi-Cal and Healthy Families programs, which provide care to low-income children -- including children of illegal immigrants and the disabled.

Mr. Schwarzenegger's solution hits the trifecta also. He would require employers with 10 or more workers to provide health insurance or pay a 4% tax on all wages covered by Social Security: Look for employers with 10 to 12 employees to get creative about outsourcing. And look as well, as Harvard economist Jonathan Gruber has documented, for wages to fall in firms that offer health insurance because of the mandate. Gov. Schwarzenegger would throw in a 2% tax on doctors and a 4% tax on hospitals to help fund Medi-Cal, California's name for Medicaid. And he would expand Medi-Cal to adults earning as much as 100% above the poverty line and to children, even those here illegally, in poor and middle-income families. He hopes, by doing this, to shift $5 billion of Medi-Cal's annual cost to the federal government.

There are two problems with such solutions. First, they infringe on economic freedom, preventing, in Robert Nozick's phrase, "capitalist acts between consenting adults." Second, government solutions rarely work.

Why doesn't increased government power tend to solve the problem of the uninsured? There are two main reasons. First, when government provides health insurance, many people who take advantage of it drop their own privately provided health insurance. In a 1996 article in the Quarterly Journal of Economics, Harvard economists David M. Cutler and Jonathan Gruber found a 50% "crowding-out effect." As the federal Medicaid program expanded, for every two people who gained insurance through Medicaid, one dropped private health insurance. Although this is a net addition of one, the costs to taxpayers are much higher than expected because now half of the newly covered, instead of paying their own way as they previously did, become wards of the state.

Second, of the 46 million or so people without health insurance at any given time, about 45% will have health insurance within four months. This is one of the main findings of a 2003 study by the Congressional Budget Office, "How Many People Lack Health Insurance and for How Long?" That shouldn't be surprising in a country where most private health insurance is employer-provided and most unemployment spells last 11 weeks or less. Solutions that involve government mandates on employers or employees will, therefore, miss connecting with about half of the people who are uninsured at a given point in time.

But what if the governor could solve some of the problem by making health insurance cheaper? He can -- not by regulating more, but by deregulating.

Let me explain. In the last few decades, state governments, the main regulators of health insurance in the individual and small-group markets, have mandated coverages for many kinds of health care. According to the Council for Affordable Health Insurance (CAHI), a pro-market association of insurance carriers, there were 1,843 state mandates in 2006. Among the most common, and most expensive, mandates are chiropractic care, treatment for alcoholism and drug abuse, and mental health benefits. California's government mandates coverage for all of the above, as well as for many other benefits, including, for example, infertility treatment -- a very expensive benefit.

Abolishing these mandates would allow people who don't want to be covered for these things to buy cheaper insurance, while still allowing those who want them to buy and pay for them. Would such an approach work? That's like asking whether, if the government currently required new cars to have CD players, eliminating that requirement would lower the price of a car. Of course it would work.

It is important, though, not to overstate its benefits. The gain to Californians from abolishing these mandates would not be huge. CAHI compiled data from America's Health Insurance plan and eHealthInsurance for the individual market and from the federal government for the small-group market and found that in 2003, although California had more mandated coverages than all but six other states, it had among the lowest insurance rates for individual health insurance policies ($1,885 versus a top rate of $6,048 for New Jersey.)

The reason, explains CAHI, is that in other ways California is much less regulatory than many other states. It does not, for example, require guaranteed issue on individual policies -- which drives up premiums by forcing insurance companies to supply policies to all comers, regardless of health status. Yet the governor's proposal would reverse this somewhat and prevent insurance companies from saying no because of age and health.

California should not, contra Gov. Schwarzenegger, do new regulatory harm; rather it should repeal existing regulations that cause harm -- so as to make health insurance even more affordable.

There is one other way to deregulate: The California government could allow any Californian to buy health insurance from any willing insurer in any state and be subject to the regulations of that state. That way, people could shop for the degree of paternalism they want. If they want insurance from a state that requires many coverages, they could do so and pay the high premiums that result. If they want bare-bones coverage, they could do so also. The result would surely be that some of the current uninsured would buy insurance. Were I in the market for individual insurance and given the choice, I would not bother paying for coverage for alcohol or drug abuse.

If a version of Gov. Schwarzenegger's plan passes, the only thing certain is that there will be more regulation, more government spending and more taxes. A better path would be to deregulate, and thus achieve some increase in the number of insured -- without new spending or taxes or regulation.

Mr. Henderson, a research fellow at Stanford's Hoover Institution, was the senior economist for health policy with President Reagan's Council of Economics Advisers (1982-84). He is co-author of "Making Great Decisions in Business and Life" (Chicago Park Press, 2006).

Gov. Urges Cooperation And An Improved Infrastructure (LAT)

By Jenifer Warren

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

Sacramento — Urging lawmakers to think big and act boldly, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger today outlined a sweeping 2007 agenda that proposes borrowing more than $43 billion to improve California's roads, prisons, schools and water supply.

Delivering his fourth State of the State speech, Schwarzenegger also vowed to make California a leader in the fight against global warming, pledged to provide health insurance for those who lack it and restated his desire to re-map legislative districts to increase political competition.

Schwarzenegger, still on the mend from surgery to repair his broken leg, acknowledged during his speech to the Legislature that his goals at the dawn of his final term were ambitious. But he said leaders "must be ambitious to get California to the future," and he urged lawmakers to set aside their partisan predilections and find solutions that best serve the state.

"Rebuilding California is not a burden," Schwarzenegger said. "It is not a chore. It is a privilege. It is a privilege to be able to help this state reach its full potential."

Although Schwarzenegger has made a handful of recent appearances by satellite, tonight's address marks only his second in-the-flesh event since he fractured the femur in his right leg while skiing in Sun Valley just before Christmas. His wife, Maria Shriver, appeared anxious at times as she watched her husband from the Assembly chamber's balcony.

On Friday, the Republican governor delivered an inaugural speech to about 3,000 invited guests. Aside from that, the media and the public have seen him mostly in photos -- sometimes in his hospital bed -- and via satellite feed.

Analysts commended his use of technology to convey the image of a governor whose injury had not slowed his step. But they said tonight's live appearance was critical for the 59-year-old Schwarzenegger as he paints a pathway through his next gubernatorial years.

"This is a very important speech, a chance for him to stake out his priorities in four or five areas," said Barbara O'Connor, director of Sacramento State University's Institute for the Study of Politics and Media.

Unlike the inaugural address, which was heavy on vision, the State of the State is the "nuts and bolts speech," O'Connor said, "where the rubber hits the road." Like the inaugural speech, tonight's emphasized cooperation across party lines as the key to successful policymaking - what the governor dubbed a "post-partisan" approach.

He opened by thanking lawmakers, whom he once derided as "girlie men," for "putting the people above politics last year - an election year." While the federal government was "paralyzed by gridlock and games," Schwarzenegger said, California's political leaders took action and raised the minimum wage, tackled prescription drug costs and committed to reducing greenhouse gases in the atmosphere.

He also noted that his speech was not about his vision, but about "our vision, because I think we all want the same thing for California."

They in turn, treated the governor with warm collegiality -- applauding loudly as he walked, steadily but deliberately on his crutches, in a blue suit, blinding white shirt and green tie, down the Assembly's center aisle. Greeting him with a handshake, Democrat Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez of Los Angeles jokingly told the governor to "break a leg." Lt. Gov. John Garamendi, another Democrat, called him "honorable and courageous."

The legislators treated the governor with warm collegiality -- applauding loudly as he walked, steadily but deliberately on his crutches, in a blue suit, blinding white shirt and green tie, down the Assembly's center aisle. Greeting him with a handshake, Democrat Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez of Los Angeles jokingly told the governor to "break a leg." Lt. Gov. John Garamendi, another Democrat, called him "honorable and courageous."

After that chummy beginning, Schwarzenegger was off and running, speaking for about 25 minutes -- short by historical standards -- and interrupted 21 times by applause.

The centerpiece was a "strategic growth plan" aimed at shoring up the state's infrastructure, including schools, water storage, prisons and roads. Today's proposals build upon $37.3 billion in bond spending authorized in November by voters, as well as a separate $5.4 billion ballot measure for water protection and parks.

Noting that California's population is expected to increase by as much as 30% over the next two decades, Schwarzenegger said, "We still have more roads to build, more schools to construct, more universities to equip to keep up with the future … the job is not finished."

To complete it, he wants to borrow $43.3 billion in bond money over three years. Of that, $29.4 billion in bonds would be put before voters in the 2008 and 2010 elections. The remaining $13.9 billion would be lease-revenue bonds that do not require voter approval.

Schwarzenegger's finance director, Mike Genest, said the state can afford the new borrowing. But some economists called it shortsighted, predicting it would add to the financial burden faced by future generations.

The scale of the borrowing worried even some Democrats. Sen. Mike Machado (D-Linden) said he is concerned about California's bond capacity.

"I applaud the grand vision, but I am very much concerned that the state is giving away its future by bonding us forever," Machado said. "We're out there spending a lot of money and it's almost like what a lot of people do after Christmas time -- they look at their credit cards and they start looking for a new credit card to finance the old."

One of the largest chunks of money would go to the state's distressed prisons, which are floundering due to overcrowding and a medical care system deemed so bad that it was turned over to a federal receiver last year.

This year, the prison population is expected to pass 175,000, nearly twice the number the system was designed to house. More than 16,000 inmates are in triple-decker bunks and areas not designed as sleeping quarters, such as TV lounges and hallways.

"Our prison system is a powder keg," the governor said. "It poses a danger to prisoners, a danger to officers and a danger to the well-being of the public if -- as the federal courts have threatened -- we are forced to release prisoners because of overcrowding."

The governor wants to add 78,000 jail and prison beds, built at a cost of $10.9 billion, while forming a commission to examine sentencing reform. Among other things, the governor proposed:

.Building new dams to increase the state's water supply, at a cost of $4.5 billion. Part of a wide-ranging, $6-billion flood control and water policy package, the dams are portrayed by the administration as vital in a state facing continual population increases and a future water supply threatened by global warming.

While favored by Republicans and farmers, new dams have a long list of foes, including the Legislature's two Democratic leaders, Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez of Los Angeles and Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata of Oakland.

.A $12-billion healthcare reform package, outlined in detail a day earlier, that would require all Californians to obtain medical insurance while helping the poorest residents to afford it.

.Obtaining bond financing to build 15,000 new classrooms and renovate another 40,000.

.Adding to California's landmark global warming law by ordering oil refiners and gasoline sellers to reduce the amount of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases emitted when cars burn fuel. The order, which should be in effect in 18 months, could lead to a 10% reduction in greenhouse gas pollution from motor vehicles by 2020.

"Our cars have been running on dirty fuel for too long," Schwarzenegger said. "Our country has been dependent on foreign oil for too long."

Creating an independent commission to redraw legislative district boundaries. Describing the state's political system as one "petrified by self-interest," Schwarzenegger noted that no state legislature has put redistricting reform on the ballot.

"California can be the leader," he told the joint session of lawmakers gathered in the Capitol's Assembly chambers. "You will not benefit politically from this. I will not benefit politically from this. But the people will benefit from this."

As he begins his final term, analysts say Schwarzenegger is no doubt thinking hard about legacy, the lasting achievements by which he will be measured over time.

In recent weeks, aides say, he has been reading speeches from the 1960s by former Gov. Pat Brown, who launched an unprecedented burst of freeway building, college expansion and water supply improvements and is remembered as a can-do politician Schwarzenegger admires.

The State of the State speech represents the governor's last open-mike moment before the nitty gritty work of carrying out his agenda begins, analysts say.

Tonight, he had the floor. Tomorrow, he must begin to woo wary lawmakers - especially those in his own party - to make his ambitious proposals a reality.

Schwarzenegger Agenda Could Flex California's Muscle (WP)

By Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 9 -- A lesson from California: Never underestimate the ambition of a former Mr. Universe. Over the past week, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) has unleashed a torrent of proposals to shake up everything in his state from health care to road-building to politics itself, all in an effort to reshape his party and set a national agenda.

The most recent offering, in Schwarzenegger's State of the State address Tuesday, is a plan to cut vehicle emissions of greenhouse gases by 10 percent. He will require petroleum refineries to reduce the carbon content of their fuel over the next 13 years -- a signal to any doubters that his recent aggressive positioning as an environmentalist is not mere political theater.

"Let us blaze the way, for the U.S. and for China and for the rest of the world. Our cars have been running on dirty fuel for too long," Schwarzenegger said. "California has the muscle to bring about such change. I say use it."

The proposal requires the California Air Resources Board to set new standards for oil refineries that sell fuel in the state. They can meet those standards by combining gasoline production with that of alternative fuels, such as ethanol, compressed natural gas or hydrogen. Or they could purchase pollution credits from clean-fuel producers.

With Schwarzenegger's plans for big spending, support for issues such as raising the minimum wage and embryonic stem cell research, plus a recent wave of inclusive rhetoric, the governor has styled himself as a newer, bluer Republican, or "post-partisan," as he likes to say. He unabashedly declares that the national GOP ought to take notice.

"Not only can we lead California into the future, we can show the nation and the world how to get there," Schwarzenegger said in his address. "We can do this because we have the economic strength, we have the population and the technological force of a nation-state. We are the modern equivalent of the ancient city-states of Athens and Sparta."

The action-hero governor hopes to flex the state's muscles in the national arena starting next year. Schwarzenegger told Newsweek this week that he wants to move California's primary elections to February, giving the state more clout in presidential elections.

On Monday, he unveiled a proposal to provide health insurance for all California residents, including illegal immigrants. Last year, he used his political strength to push through $42.7 billion in bonds for roads, levees and schools. In the budget proposal he will unveil Wednesday, the governor will ask for $43.3 billion in infrastructure bonds for water supply, disaster preparedness, public safety and education.

The governor has also signaled his willingness to spend money on reforming the state's collapsing prison system -- he is under a federal mandate to reduce overcrowding -- as well as environmental research, career technical-education programs and stem cell research.

Outside California -- a state where 43 percent of registered voters are Democrats, 34 percent are Republican and 19 percent are independent -- Schwarzenegger's example may carry little weight, some observers said.

"We don't know where the Republican Party is going and if Arnold's message is going to be widely received by red-state Republicans," said Bruce Cain, director of the Institute of Governmental Studies at the University of California at Berkeley. "It works for blue-state Republicans, but does it work for red-state Republicans?"

Schwarzenegger could also face opposition from state Democrats, who are already upset by a plan to cut welfare benefits to families whose parents have not moved into the workforce fast enough. The governor would also deny a scheduled 4 percent raise in welfare payments. The plan could save hundreds of millions of dollars in Schwarzenegger's budget proposal, but Democrats in the legislature called it a "non-starter."

Schwarzenegger's ability to refashion the Republican Party is hampered by the fact that, as a naturalized citizen, he cannot lead it as a presidential candidate. In addition, he is not dealing with what many political observers say is the signature issue of the day.

"The problem is, Arnold's message is largely about domestic issues, and the national agenda right now for the foreseeable future is going to be dominated by Iraq," Cain said.

Even within California, Schwarzenegger will no doubt face opposition from his own party. The legislature is controlled by Democrats, but appropriations require a two-thirds majority to pass.

On his health-care plan, Schwarzenegger tried to sidestep Republican orthodoxy against higher taxes by calling for an increase in "fees" to pay for expanded state coverage.

"Whether or not a fee is a tax, whatever you call it, in his proposal we would not support it," said state Senate Republican leader Dick Ackerman. "There's some areas in here which we support and some areas we don't support. He's proposing covering illegal immigrants, and that we do not support."

Schwarzenegger just has to try, though, said Sherry Bebitch Jeffe, a political analyst at the University of Southern California.

"He's Arnold. I mean, really, that's part of the equation," Jeffe said. "He wants to leave something behind. He took a chance, he ran for governor, he won, he won reelection and he's a competitor. He wanted to be Mr. Universe. He wants to be remembered as a serious, effective, successful governor."

Schwarzenegger Orders Cuts In Emissions (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer And Felicity Barringer

New York Times, January 10, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Jan. 9 — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger said Tuesday that he would ask regulators to require the state's petroleum refiners and gasoline sellers to cut by 10 percent the emissions of heat-trapping gases associated with the production and use of their products.

The order for cuts, which the governor wants completed by 2020, follows California's trademark pattern of hitching its environmental aspirations to its market muscle. It also represents one of the first examples of a state or a national government regulating the fuel in its passenger vehicles as part of a strategy to reduce both emissions that contribute to climate change and dependence on foreign oil.

The plan, which Mr. Schwarzenegger delivered to legislators Tuesday night in his State of the State address, was the second part of a one-two policy punch the governor announced this week. On Monday, he proposed providing health care to all the state's residents, which unlike the emissions plan is subject to approval by the Legislature.

"Our country has been dependent on foreign oil for too long," Mr. Schwarzenegger said in his address. "I ask you to set to motion the means to free ourselves from oil and from OPEC. I ask you to encourage the free market to overthrow the old order. California has the muscle to bring about such change. I say use it."

The executive order asks state air regulators to take up the governor's challenge. The California Air Resources Board will be responsible for drawing the blueprints to carry out the order, with the help of advisers from the University of California, Berkeley.

It is the first example of the practical impact of a deal made last summer between the Legislature and the governor to reduce carbon dioxide emissions by about 25 percent by 2020. The transportation sector is responsible for about 40 percent of the state's carbon dioxide emissions, state officials said, and cars make up about half that amount.

The 10 percent cut in emissions would be accomplished, experts said, largely through the use of alternative fuels, like ethanol and other gasoline blends, which would be provided by the refineries and other producers.

Hal Harvey, the environmental program director for the William and Flora Hewlett Foundation, called Mr. Schwarzenegger's plan "a really big deal."

"In my opinion there are no successful rules anywhere in the world, except Brazil, to get carbon out of fuels," Mr. Harvey said. "It is the big, hairy unmentioned problem with cleaning up carbon." The European Union, he added, is considering a similar rule.

Environmentalists expected the order to turbocharge the market demand for corn-based ethanol and biodiesel fuels, and for natural gas, and to jump-start the introduction of experimental fuels like cellulosic ethanol, which is made from plant waste or nonfood crops like switch grass or wood chips.

The contemporary environmental movement links clear air goals to potential profits, and Mr. Schwarzenegger's order, with input and support from lobbyists from Environmental Defense, the Natural Resources Defense Council and the Hewlett

Foundation, mirrors that approach. The companies or industries that stand to benefit financially from his plan include producers of corn-based ethanol, biodiesel and other, more experimental forms of renewable fuels.

Mr. Harvey and Fred Krupp, the president of Environmental Defense, said they hoped that the California approach would be a template for other governments, whether in state capitals, in Washington or abroad.

The plan, Mr. Harvey said, is unusual in its focus on the so-called cradle-to-grave emissions associated with each fuel. In the case of ethanol, this can mean carbon emissions generated in the production of fertilizer, in the planting and harvesting of corn, in distilling the fuel and, finally, in transporting it to the distributor and burning it in a car.

Thus, two otherwise identical gallons of ethanol could have different greenhouse-gas ratings, if one were refined using carbon-intensive coal-fired electricity, while the other was refined using relatively carbon-light electricity from natural gas.

At a technical briefing on Tuesday, Bill Jones, the chairman of the board of Pacific Ethanol, a fuel producer, and the former Republican leader of the California Assembly, praised the effort as "the most comprehensive, well-thought-out plan I have ever seen."

The governor's staff said his mandate had the support of the oil industry. But that support was clearly not unanimous. Jay McKeeman, a spokesman for the California Independent Oil Marketers Association, which represents about 85 percent of the state's fuel distributors, said the order required too much of his industry and not enough of the automakers.

"This initiative seems to focus strictly on fuels," Mr. McKeeman said. "And of course a whole part of this equation has to be the technology that uses the fuels. That is at least as important as the carbon content of the fuel."

The auto industry, in turn, believes California has asked plenty, and has sued the state over environmental rules. Charles Territo, a spokesman for the Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers, said the trade group had not taken a position on the proposal, but added: "Currently there are more than nine million alternative fuel automobiles on the road. In 2007, manufacturers are offering 60 different models for consumers to purchase."

"Manufacturers," Mr. Territo said, "must recognize that we need to reduce our reliance on foreign sources of oil."

Mr. Schwarzenegger, who is recovering from a broken leg and appeared somewhat in pain on Tuesday, used his address to hit on other policy goals for the year, including changes to the state's health care system, the creation of thousands of new classrooms and continued investment in infrastructure.

Calling California's severely overcrowded prison system a "powder keg," he said he wanted the state to consider prison construction and hinted at the establishment of a sentencing commission to address the problems that have led to overcrowding.

He also suggested that the Legislature consider an overhaul of the state's redistricting system, which heavily favors incumbents.

"You will not benefit politically from this," Mr. Schwarzenegger said. "I will not benefit politically from this. But the people will benefit from this."

The State Of Ambition (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

IT'S ONE THING for the governor to be ambitious. Arnold Schwarzenegger came from Hollywood, where success is impossible without ambition. It's quite another thing for the Legislature, which has historically rewarded timidity and resistance, to match his audacity. Yet that's exactly what will have to happen for California to reach the heights Schwarzenegger set for it in his State of the State speech Tuesday.

It is certainly audacious, for instance, for a governor to claim that his state can show the United States, China and the rest of the world how to free themselves from dependence on OPEC and fossil fuels. But Schwarzenegger called for nothing less. He proposed new standards that require lower carbon emissions and encourage alternative fuels while letting the market allow producers to make their own decisions about how to comply. If successful, the state would see a 10% reduction in greenhouse gases from motor vehicles by 2020. It's a bold and creative move.

So, too, is his proposal to remake the state's healthcare system to assure that the cost of caring for those who do not have insurance does not continue to fall squarely on those who do have it. His proposal has problems, but he deserves credit for putting the issue on the agenda and remaining flexible on details and open to discussion.

Schwarzenegger also has vowed to fix problems with the state's prisons. To his credit, he has acknowledged that simply building more cells will not, by itself, solve the problem. But cells are needed, and the governor proposes to spend more than $10 billion to build them.

Global warming is expected to greatly reduce the state's snowpack, which means less water in the future for a growing population. Schwarzenegger proposes $6 billion to store and manage water, including new dams and Delta improvements. The governor also proposes more funding for education and transportation. He insists that California look squarely at its booming population, a changing climate and an increasingly competitive world economy — and that it then face reality and plan accordingly.

Unfortunately, in all the planning the governor's team seems to have overlooked the effect on the state's debt. Voters last year approved nearly $43 billion in bonds, a record, to begin rebuilding the state for the future. Now the governor is seeking an even larger amount. Schwarzenegger's vision fits the state perfectly when the economy is booming. But the economy doesn't always boom.

The governor's greatest strength is his infectious, can-do attitude. Many Democrats, almost giddy over the governor's plans, appear ready to spend. His fellow Republicans are more skeptical. The governor's task will be to convince members of both parties of the worth of his ambitions — and California's.

Ethanol Bandwagon Picks Up Speed (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

In separate actions aimed at reducing "greenhouse gases," California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger ordered a cut of "at least 10%" in the carbon content of motor-vehicle fuels used in his state by 2020, while governors of 37 states prepared to push for a new federal rule to require greater use of ethanol fuel.

Both efforts are designed to reduce global warming and the U.S.'s reliance on imported oil, but they also could raise consumer prices for food and fuel. The initiatives also signal the increasing urgency of climate change as an issue both in state capitals and in Washington.

President Bush is expected to express more support for domestically produced ethanol when he gives his State of the Union address later this month. Meanwhile, Democratic leaders in Congress are talking up the need for alternative fuels and national emissions controls.

Announcing his carbon-reduction order in remarks prepared for delivery in his State of the State address last night, Gov. Schwarzenegger said, "California has the muscle to bring about such change."

While the details of the proposal have yet to be worked out, California officials explained that the program would leave it up to oil suppliers in the state to figure out how to reduce carbon content, but that using more ethanol, which contains less carbon, would be the most likely way. The move, they estimated, would triple the size of the state's market for ethanol and other renewable fuels.

Gov. Schwarzenegger said his order would be the first standard in the world that would diminish the use of fossil fuels, which come from deposits that have been buried in the ground for millions of years, and which release carbon into the air when burned. The regulation, which the governor ordered completed by 2008, would also include incentives for more electric and hydrogen-powered vehicles. The governor acted under his state's recently passed law to regulate carbon-dioxide emissions.

Meanwhile, the 37 governors today will propose a new federal standard that would mandate substantially higher use of ethanol fuel and offer new tax incentives for the production of cellulosic ethanol, which can be made from farm wastes and wood chips, and doesn't rely on corn, the feedstock typically used by current ethanol producers.

The proposal would require fuel sellers to increase the use of ethanol to 12 billion gallons a year by 2010, eclipsing an earlier federal mandate, contained in the 2005 Energy Policy Act, of 7.5 billion gallons by 2012. The new standard calls for the use of 15 billion gallons by 2015 and around 37 billion gallons by 2025, which means ethanol could displace about 25% of the nation's expected gasoline use.

A January 2005 proposal by the governors' coalition to mandate greater use of ethanol as fuel was quickly endorsed by President Bush and became the centerpiece of the energy bill passed by Congress.

The governors unveiled their new proposal to the president in a letter, saying, "Oil is the unquestionable epicenter of national-security crises that distort the foreign policies of many nations and that suggest potential scenarios for economic disaster."

While the new moves enjoy considerable political support and the endorsement of environmental groups, experts who watch the nation's food consumption worry that more ethanol use will drive up food prices. Michael Swanson, an economist with Wells Fargo & Co., said the demand for corn has already raised corn prices. Meanwhile, producers are already lowering the number of young chicks they raise and are fattening cattle less because of soaring corn costs, trends that Mr. Swanson predicted will soon raise retail meat prices.

"We're looking at corn futures trading in the range of $4 a bushel. That's as high a price as we've seen in this decade," Mr. Swanson said. Earlier spikes in the price of corn were caused by small crops, but this year's crop "was one of the largest we've ever had," he added.

DOJ_NMG_0115003

Currently, ethanol is turned into motor fuel by mixing it with gasoline in blends of 10% or less ethanol. Both the pending California rule and the governors' proposal would require major owners of gas stations to provide pumps that distribute 85% blends of ethanol and give auto makers incentives to make more "flexible fuel" vehicles that can use this blend.

Craddick Retains Speaker's Post (DMN)

By Karen Brooks

The Dallas Morning News, January 10, 2007

AUSTIN – House Speaker Tom Craddick was overwhelmingly re-elected to his leadership post Tuesday night after Rep. Jim Pitts of Waxahachie withdrew from the race.

Mr. Craddick, R-Midland, was re-elected 121-27, the first major piece of business that lawmakers conducted at the start of their 140-day regular session.

ERICH SCHLEGEL / DMN Rep. Jim Pitts, R-Waxahachie, greeted Nadine Craddick, wife of House speaker Tom Craddick, Tuesday morning.

Mr. Craddick acknowledged the other candidates for speaker and praised them for encouraging debate by running. And he said he had heard from many House members about their concerns.

"I can assure you, I listened carefully," he said.

His swift victory followed a long, at times heated debate in the House over whether members should be able to cast their ballots in secret. When members decided to vote publicly, Mr. Craddick's win was clear.

Mr. Pitts, announcing his withdrawal after a week of asserting he had the support to unseat Mr. Craddick, said he wanted to end the divisive contest.

"I do not want the members who are for me to have to put in a public record how they voted," said Mr. Pitts, R-Waxahachie. He added: "It's time to heal. It's time to go on with Texas' business. That's what Texans expected."

Mr. Craddick, R-Midland, faced a stiff challenge from members angry over his management style, saying that he often forced them to vote against the wishes of their constituents. But other members stood with Mr. Craddick, saying he had been a strong leader that had accomplished much as the first Republican to lead the House in modern times.

Mr. Pitts, upon withdrawing, warned that change was necessary for the House to heal. "Members, we cannot continue what we have had," he said.

The House speaker wields extraordinary power, both over individual lawmakers and statewide. He decides which committees lawmakers sit on, and he can boost or sabotage legislation that they offer. Plus, he sets the tone for legislation in the House and, with the governor and lieutenant governor, helps make major decisions on the state budget and other policies.

Mr. Pitts and Mr. Craddick had both lobbied members intensely in recent days, hoping to gain the powerful post. Mr. Pitts' candidacy benefited from the support of many Democrats, who felt particularly marginalized under Mr. Craddick.

Mr. Pitts became the lone challenger to Mr. Craddick last week, when Plano Rep. Brian McCall, the initial lawmaker to take on the incumbent, dropped out of the race and threw his support to Mr. Pitts. But it wasn't enough.

ERICH SCHLEGEL / DMN Mr. Craddick, R-Midland (center), faced a stiff challenge from members angry over his management style.

For Mr. Pitts, the defeat is a potentially crippling blow to his career. He has been chairman of the powerful, budget-writing House Appropriations Committee, but he has said he thinks Mr. Craddick will boot him from that post – even before he decided to take the speaker on.

House members said that the anger vented during the campaign showed that Mr. Craddick's method of running the House needs to change.

"I hope that people don't think this means that bullies win every time," said Rep. Garnet Coleman, D-Houston. "They don't."

Mr. Craddick seemed to address the criticism at the end, but made no apologies. Indeed, he ticked off a list of accomplishments on issues from lawsuit limits to school finance.

"I assure each and every one of you today that I believe my primary responsibility as speaker is to fulfill your elected purpose – your elected purpose, not mine," he said. "If in some way I fall short of your expectations or needs, please tell me, not just think about it, and I will do my best to correct those shortcomings."

Texas Speaker Wins Challenge And Keeps Post (NYT)

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

AUSTIN, Tex., Jan. 9 — Speaker Tom Craddick of the Texas House, an ally of the former United States House majority leader, Tom DeLay, survived a strong challenge on Tuesday from a fellow Republican to win his third term in the leadership position on the first day of the 80th session of the Legislature.

After more than five hours of haggling about procedures, Representative Jim Pitts withdrew.

Slightly more than 30 minutes later, Mr. Craddick was elected, 121 to 27, to close the first floor effort to defeat an incumbent speaker since 1959.

Mr. Pitts, of Waxahachie, whom Mr. Craddick appointed chairman of the Appropriations Committee, has been in the House since 1992. He has at times disagreed with Mr. Craddick's leadership, which is often compared to Mr. DeLay's.

"It's time to heal," Mr. Pitts said in a speech before the House after his withdrawal and before he voted for Mr. Craddick. "It's time to go on with Texas's business."

The victory of Mr. Craddick, of Midland, who has been in the statehouse since 1968, ended a fight that has dominated the political landscape here for three weeks. The House elects a speaker on the first day of each regular session every two years.

The speaker's duties include overseeing floor debates, appointing members to standing committees and referring measures to committees.

Bills on immigration and campaign finance overhaul have been filed for the session, which lasts until May 28.

Mr. Craddick, who has been House speaker since January 2003, when he became the first Republican to hold the post in 130 years, was investigated along with Mr. DeLay over fund-raising in the 2002 legislative races but was not indicted by a grand jury in Travis County.

Mr. DeLay was indicted in September 2005 on charges of violating the campaign finance law. He worked closely with Mr. Craddick in redrawing district maps in 2004 that benefited Republicans.

In his acceptance speech, Mr. Craddick promised to work with Republicans and Democrats.

"I want to assure each and every one of you today," Mr. Craddick said, "that I believe my primary responsibility as your elected speaker is to fulfill your elected purpose, not mine."

Gov. Rick Perry, also a Republican, expressed optimism for the session, mentioning a desire to improve health care, education and border security.

"The success of this session will not be judged by what has happened over the last few hours," Mr. Perry said, "but by what we do in the end."

U.S. Prohibits All Transactions With A Major Iranian Bank (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 — The United States, moving to raise pressure on Iran, on Tuesday barred American financial institutions from doing business with a major Iranian bank after concluding that it had been involved in illicit weapons programs.

The move against Bank Sepah, announced by the Treasury Department, also affected North Korea, which American officials said had used the bank to facilitate payments to a North Korean group that exports missile technologies.

The announcement applies to domestic and foreign branches of American banks, as well as to American citizens working at overseas banks that deal with Bank Sepah anywhere in the world. The department also said that no American bank can transfer dollars to Bank Sepah or its branches and subsidiaries in Rome, London, Frankfurt and Paris.

The Treasury announcement was the second time in the last year that a major Iranian bank had been barred from any dealings with the American financial system. It is the first specific move against an Iranian bank since the imposition of sanctions on Iran by the United Nations Security Council on Dec. 23.

Last year, the United States took similar action against Bank Saderat, another of Iran's major institutions, citing what it said was the bank's involvement in financing terrorism. Both Bank Saderat and Bank Sepah, cited for financial transactions linked to weapons proliferation, are state owned or controlled.

Though the two banks have virtually no direct links to American banks, the designation means that no American bank can help facilitate — by transferring dollars, for example — any transaction between a European bank and Bank Sepah. Thus if an Italian or German bank wanted to supply dollars for a transaction involving Bank Sepah, it would be unable to do so because American banks would be barred from transferring them.

American experts say these steps effectively extend the reach of American law to other countries, though to only a limited degree.

"By taking this action, the United States is putting immense pressure on our allies and trading partners to treat Bank Sepah the same way we do," said Judith Lee, a partner at Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher specializing in sanctions law. "It is an effort to make U.S. actions against Iran extraterritorial."

European countries have opposed moves by the United States to apply the principle of extraterritoriality, a term referring to cases when American law can affect dealings entirely within another country. But the Bush administration recently has stepped up its use of various laws and directives to press forward with the concept.

For example, since oil is traded in dollars, the reach of American directives could be significant, many banking experts say. In theory, Tuesday's action would prevent Bank Sepah from facilitating an oil sale in which dollars are used. Iran has already announced that, because of American directives, it has begun selling oil for euros rather than dollars.

"Bank Sepah is the financial linchpin of Iran's missile procurement network, and has actively assisted Iran's pursuit of missiles capable of carrying weapons of mass destruction," said Stuart Levey, the Treasury under secretary for terrorism and financial intelligence.

Mr. Levey said Bank Sepah had been involved in transactions for Iran's Aerospace Industries Organization and two Iranian missile companies. These three entities were mentioned in the Security Council resolution approved in late December calling on all countries to avoid doing business with various groups in Iran.

Mr. Levey also said the United States had been in touch with authorities in Britain, France, Italy and Germany to discuss the need to persuade local financial institutions to stop doing business with Bank Sepah.

Unlike the United States, Mr. Levey said that European countries, which have not enacted laws like those passed here, "don't have specific authority to act as the United States does" against European banks or businesses engaging in transactions with other banks and businesses linked to terrorism or weapons programs.

Nevertheless, Treasury officials say Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. and Mr. Levey have pressed European authorities and banks to try to isolate both Bank Sepah and Bank Saderat.

Mr. Levey said that the branch of Bank Sepah in Rome had had significant involvement in financial transactions related to Iran's missile program, and that Italian authorities had been alerted to the problem.

There was no immediate comment from the press office of the Italian Embassy in Washington on whether Italy was taking any separate actions in consonance with the United States actions.

When the United States moved against Bank Saderat last year, many banking experts predicted that it was only a matter of time before Washington took action against other financial institutions in Iran.

American officials say already intensive diplomacy has been stepped up after the Security Council resolution adopted in late December as part of a campaign to get Iran to stop enriching uranium in what the West has charged is a clandestine nuclear weapons program.

That resolution ended up being weakened at the request of Russia and China, and some American officials say they need to shift tactics and use other means to exert financial pressure on Iran.

US Imposes Sanctions On Iran Bank (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, January 10, 2007

The US Treasury on Tuesday imposed sanctions against Iran's commercial Bank Sepah, accusing it of assisting Tehran's missile programme and having links with an alleged North Korean missile exporter.

Bank Sepah International, a wholly owned subsidiary in the UK, and Ahmad Derakhshandeh, the parent bank's chairman and director, were also targeted by a notice barring any US citizen from dealing with them and freezing any assets they have under US jurisdiction.

The unilateral moves were the first taken by the US since the United Nations Security Council imposed missile and nuclear-related sanctions on Iran in re-sponse to its refusal to suspend its nuclear fuel development programme.

The US last September banned dollar transactions with Bank Saderat, Iran's largest commercial bank, accusing it of facilitating the transfer of $1m (€770,000) to Lebanon's Hizbollah and other "terrorist organisations".

Stuart Levey, the Treasury under-secretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, said: "Bank Sepah is the financial linchpin of Iran's missile procurement network and has actively assisted Iran's pursuit of missiles capable of carrying weapons of mass destruction. Our action today gives effect to the United Nations' call on all nations to deny financial assistance to Iran's nuclear and missile programmes, and we urge other countries likewise to fulfil this serious obligation."

The action will have limited impact as US trade with Iran is severely limited by sanctions imposed in the 1990s. However, the US is putting pressure on its allies to isolate Iran from the international financial system, using the cover of last month's UN resolution.

Iran is open about its indigenous development of missiles as allowed under international law but denies it has a covert nuclear weapons programme.

[A news agency] cited Ali Larijani, Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, as telling a domestic news agency that US "harassment" of Iran's banking system "are not issues that can affect Iran's will".

U.S. Bars Iranian Bank To Curb Access To Dollars (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

The Bush administration yesterday barred Iran's oldest bank from doing any future business in the United States, accusing the financial institution of transferring Iranian missile payments to North Korea.

The move will prevent Bank Sepah, Iran's fifth-largest bank, from conducting business in U.S. dollars and is part of a larger White House plan, put in place last year, to cut off Iran's access to U.S. and European currencies. Though U.S. officials say the effort is aimed at the Tehran government, it is also likely to affect millions of Iranian citizens who conduct personal business in U.S. dollars and who travel overseas.

Bank Sepah has nearly 300 branches in Tehran plus offices in Paris, Frankfurt and Rome as well as a British subsidiary, Bank Sepah International. U.S. law has long prohibited Iranian government institutions from doing business in the United States, but yesterday's move now bars Sepah from converting international transactions into dollars by routing them through New York banks.

"The only business Sepah could do before today in the United States was U-turn transactions," said Stuart Levey, the Treasury Department's undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence. "They would send it from a European office through a New York bank and then back to Iran. That's the way they would dollarize transactions, but they won't be able to do that anymore," Levey said in an interview.

Yesterday's move, however, will not affect the bank's huge interests in Europe. The Bush administration had tried for months to persuade European allies to take similar, unilateral steps against Iranian government institutions and had hoped that a recent United Nations resolution would encourage France, Britain and other countries to join in the effort. But no European nation has done so, nor has Japan or any Persian Gulf ally.

Last month, the U.N. Security Council ordered all countries to stop supplying Iran with materials and technology that could contribute to its nuclear and missile programs. It also froze the assets of 10 Iranian companies and 12 individuals related to those programs. Among those on the list is the head of Iran's Aerospace Industries Organization, which oversees the country's vast missile program.

The council warned that if Iran refuses to comply, it will adopt further nonmilitary sanctions, but the resolution emphasized the importance of diplomacy in seeking guarantees "that Iran's nuclear program is exclusively for peaceful purposes." The Bush administration is broadly interpreting the resolution to deter as many financial sectors as possible from doing business with Iran. So far, the Europeans seem to be taking a more narrow view of the resolution.

Levey said yesterday that Bank Sepah, mostly through its offices in Rome, has handled millions of dollars of transactions for Aerospace Industries, passing money from Tehran to North Korea, from which Iran buys missile components.

"Sepah provides direct and extensive financial services to Iranian entities responsible for developing missiles capable of carrying weapons of mass destruction," Levey said.

The Bush administration has never offered proof of an Iranian nuclear weapons program, and Iran maintains that its program is for the production of nuclear energy, not bombs.

But since 2004, U.S. intelligence has been in possession of thousands of Iranian drawings that analysts believe detail efforts by Iran's military to reconfigure existing missiles to one day carry nuclear warheads.

In an interview with reporters last month, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice acknowledged that financial sanctions against Iran "will have consequences" for the Iranian people by negatively affecting their economy. "This isn't going to be surgical and you can't perfectly target in that way. But I think we've tried to be sensitive to not doing things that would have an ill effect on the Iranian people, per se," she said.

U.S. Effort To Isolate Iran Gains Ground As European Bank Restrictions Take Hold (WSJ)

By Glenn R. Simpson In Brussels And David Crawford In Berlin

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

The U.S. government's attempt to isolate Iran's economy will get a significant boost this month when the last European bank known to be clearing large volumes of that country's dollar transactions in the U.S. halts the practice.

DOJ_NMG_0115007

Commerzbank AG, Germany's second-largest bank, said it will stop handling dollar transactions for Iran at its New York branch by Jan. 31.

CRACKING DOWN

· The Issue: As the U.S. aims to isolate Iran, Commerzbank will join other European banks in halting its dollar transactions.

· What's at Stake: The U.S. says banks provide unwitting support for Iran's efforts to back terrorism and build nuclear weapons.

· The Bottom Line: Few big banks continue cooperating with Iran, forcing it to do business in euros, not dollars, and increasing the cost of international transactions.

Over the past year, most European banks with longstanding relationships with Iran have bowed to U.S. pressure and sharply curtailed transactions with Iran's state-controlled banks, which the U.S. says support terrorism. The U.S. also is seeking to financially quarantine Iran because of Tehran's vows to press ahead with its nuclear program in defiance of international will.

In a related move, the Treasury Department yesterday named Iran's fifth-largest state-owned bank, Bank Sepah, and its subsidiaries as weapons proliferators and barred banks operating in the U.S. from handling any transactions on their behalf. Last year, Commerzbank became Bank Sepah's principal clearer of dollar transactions in the U.S. Stuart Levey, Treasury's undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, said Bank Sepah served as the key financial conduit for Iran's main missile firms, which were singled out in a United Nations sanctions resolution against Iran's nuclear program last month.

U.S. analysts say there is evidence that Iranian firms are feeling the pinch of the U.S.-led drive. Iranian banks and companies, for instance, are now having to put up large deposits -- as high as 100% -- in foreign banks to get them to issue letters of credit for foreign transactions, they claim.

Iranian officials deny the nation's banks handle money for terrorist organizations or purposes. Mohammad Jafar Mojarrad, vice governor of the country's central bank, said that while the U.S. has "put a lot of pressure on Iran" and some foreign banks have scaled back dealings with the country, operations of the country's banks haven't been affected.

Choking off Iran's financial ties to Europe is key to Washington's effort to isolate the country. The European Union is Iran's largest trading partner by far. Trade between the two topped $25 billion last year, but trade growth is stagnating, largely because of U.S. pressure.

Because many big European banks have stopped dealing with Tehran in recent months, the fundamentalist Islamic regime of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has relied on Commerzbank and a handful of smaller banks to handle its dollar-based transactions.

The result: Iran's beleaguered economy is having a harder time moving hard currency around the globe in an easy and cost-effective way. That implies a higher cost of doing business for Iranian companies and the government, which are being forced into more expensive, alternative financial markets.

U.S. pressure isn't likely to bring Iran's economy to its knees, but it could cause serious pain. Iran receives tens of billions of dollars annually in oil revenue. But it spends much of those funds to import refined fuels and other goods. As Iran's access to hard currency becomes more restricted and costly, the country could see a reduction in its ability to pay for heavy machinery and other items essential to keeping its oil industry and other key parts of its economy going.

In response to U.S. pressure on European and other bankers who serve Iranian firms, Iran has said it wants to switch most of its business to euros, the currency of the EU. But oil is Iran's biggest export, and many of the country's trade partners in the Middle East will do business only in dollars -- the currency of the international petroleum industry.

At present, Commerzbank handles both dollar and euro transactions for Iran's state-owned banks. Like several other European banks, it will cease handling only dollar transactions. That is likely to limit the economic damage to Iran, enabling the country's banks to continue paying suppliers who will accept euros or other currencies.

But it is likely to subject Commerzbank and its peers to further U.S. pressure. "The risks of doing business with Iran are the same in all currencies," said Mr. Levey. Intelligence officials say Bank Saderat, a large, state-controlled Iranian bank placed on a U.S. Treasury blacklist in October for allegedly funding terrorism, has been able to process dollar transactions through Commerzbank's New York branch in recent months by using the accounts of two other Iranian banks.

Commerzbank says it ceased dealing with Saderat after it was put on the U.S. blacklist and has no knowledge of any subsequent transactions. "Commerzbank has no knowledge of Bank Saderat directly or indirectly using the accounts of other Iranian banks to process dollar transactions," the bank said in a statement. Commerzbank, in a response to an inquiry from The Wall Street Journal about its dealings with Iran, also said "all such [dollar clearing] transactions are currently being phased out" as of Jan. 31. It added that "any clearing conducted by our U.S. operations is in strict compliance" with U.S. government regulations.

The efforts to isolate Iran also appear to be yielding results in Italy, one of Tehran's largest trading partners. In 2005, trade between the two countries topped $6 billion. In a sign of how some European banks are rethinking their dealings with Iran, Italy's largest bank, Intesa Sanpaolo SpA, says its trade-finance business with the country has dropped significantly in recent months.

U.S. efforts to stop European banks from dealing with Iran are controversial. European banks view the campaign as an attempt to extend the reach of U.S. sanctions on Iran without the backing of the United Nations or the EU.

Indeed, there is no general international ban on providing financial and trade services to Iranian banks. But banks that assist Iran's banks are increasingly exposed to U.S. regulatory scrutiny and political pressure from the U.S. Treasury Department. The U.S., a key market for most international banks, has long unilaterally imposed strict limits on what business banks and companies with operations in the U.S. can conduct with Iran.

In response to U.S. pressure, ABN Amro Holding NV, Credit Suisse Group and UBS AG of Switzerland, Credit Lyonnais and Société Générale SA of France, and Barclays PLC and HSBC Holdings PLC of the United Kingdom all limited or ended their dealings with Iranian banks over the past year.

Iran Says It Has Arrested A Nuclear Spy (AP)

AP, January 10, 2007

Iran said Tuesday it has arrested a man on suspicion of selling nuclear secrets to an exiled Iranian opposition group, state radio reported.

The report didn't identify the suspected spy, but said he had been working at the Iranian Parliament's Research Center, an organization that advises lawmakers on foreign and strategic issues.

"The man transferred classified information, including a bulletin on nuclear activities, to the hypocrites," state radio said, referring to the People's Mujahedeen of Iran.

The Paris-based group, regarded as a terrorist organization by the United States, has frequently made accusations about Iran's nuclear activities, reporting on what it says is secret information received from insiders in Iran.

In 2002, the group disclosed the existence of two previously secret nuclear facilities, a pilot uranium enrichment plant at Natanz and a research reactor being built in the city of Arak, which turned out to house Iran's uranium enrichment program and a hard-water reactor project. Other claims by the group have not been substantiated.

Iran said in 2004 that it had arrested 10 military officers, nuclear workers and others on charges of revealing its nuclear secrets to Israeli and U.S. intelligence agencies.

But the government said the information passed to the United States and Israel was "without value."

Ahmed Tavakoli, a leading lawmaker, confirmed state radio's report of the arrest of the alleged spy.

"This person has been working in Parliament's Research Center since 2001," Tavakoli told the semiofficial Fars news agency Tuesday. "He was arrested by the Intelligence Ministry."

Tavakoli told Fars that the arrested man will stand trial but gave no date.

The People's Mujahedeen participated in the 1979 ouster of the former shah of Iran, Mohammed Reza Pahlavi. But it fell out with the clerical government and launched a campaign of assassinations and bombings.

For years it fought Iran's Islamic rulers from Iraq with the backing of Saddam Hussein's regime.

During the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, the U.S. military briefly bombed People's Mujahedeen camps until the group capitulated and agreed to disarm.

Israel Says It's Arrested Muslim Cleric (AP)

By Matti Friedman

AP, January 10, 2007

Israel arrested the former imam of Ohio's largest mosque after he was deported from the United States last week, the Shin Bet internal security service confirmed Tuesday.

Fawaz Damra, 46, was arrested because of his ties to Islamic Jihad, a militant Palestinian group classified by Israel and the U.S. as a terrorist organization, Shin Bet told The Associated Press. It gave no other details.

Smadar Ben-Natan, an Israeli lawyer retained by Damra's family to represent him, said he was being held at the Kishon prison and she planned to meet with her client Wednesday.

Damra, imam at the Islamic Center of Cleveland, was deported by American authorities last week because he concealed his ties to Islamic Jihad when he applied for American citizenship in 1994.

Relatives expecting him to enter the West Bank on Friday reported he never showed up and said they had been told by the Red Cross he was detained, but there wasn't any official Israeli confirmation until Tuesday.

"We waited for him all day and he didn't come," said Nabil Damra, the imam's brother. "He is not an extremist and we don't understand why he was arrested."

"My mother is crying. Our house is sad. My father, who is 83, is waiting for his son. We pray that my brother will come home and see his father before he dies," the brother added.

A spokesman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Greg Palmore, said U.S. agents accompanied Damra to the Allenby Bridge, an Israel-controlled crossing into the West Bank. "Mr. Damra was presented to Israeli immigration officials for admission to the West Bank," Palmore said.

During Damra's trial, jurors were shown evidence that he raised money for Islamic Jihad, a small group with links to Iran and Syria that has carried out dozens of suicide bombings and rockets attacks against Israel.

The jury also saw footage of a 1991 speech in which Damra called Jews "the sons of monkeys and pigs." Damra, whose wife and three daughters remain in the United States, later apologized for making anti-Semitic statements.

Damra's brother, a U.N. worker in the West Bank, said the imam's work in the U.S. revolved around marrying and divorcing Muslims and lecturing to prisoners.

"He always got along with all people. He is a moderate. If he upheld extremist views, people wouldn't have loved him. He wouldn't be helping everyone," Nabil Damra said.

Hezbollah Widens Anti-Government Campaign (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

BEIRUT, Jan. 9 -- Hezbollah and its allies widened their campaign Tuesday to force the Lebanese government's resignation, backing what they vowed would be a series of daily protests scattered across the capital.

Tuesday's gathering of hundreds of flag-waving protesters outside a Finance Ministry office was a sedate affair compared with the convergence of hundreds of thousands twice last month in Beirut's downtown, where demonstrators continue a round-the-clock vigil in hundreds of tents near the barricaded government headquarters.

The demonstration was more symbolic than dramatic, marking the beginning of what officials of the Shiite Muslim group and its leftist and Christian allies have long warned is a second stage of their efforts to form a new government and convene early parliamentary elections.

"The message is sent, and this is what matters to us," said Amin Sherri, a Hezbollah lawmaker.

The struggle between Hezbollah and its allies and the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora has plunged Lebanon into one of its worst political crises since the end of the 15-year civil war in 1990. It may determine which group is ascendant in Lebanese politics: the alliance around Hezbollah, supported by Iran and Syria, or a government coalition, supported by the United States.

Beyond Lebanon, the crisis intersects with tension across the region, as the United States and Iran vie for influence and concerns grow over a Shiite-Sunni conflict becoming ever more pronounced in Iraq.

But unlike in December, when the crisis often had an hour-to-hour urgency, the confrontation has assumed a veneer of normalcy in its second month. Each side has escalated -- Hezbollah with its support for Tuesday's protest led by Lebanese unions, the government by pressing ahead with policy changes over the opposition's objections -- but both appear prepared for a long wait. For their part, Hezbollah officials have stressed that any escalation will remain nonviolent and not break any laws.

So far, both sides can claim victories. The government has refused to resign. But by paralyzing the government, Hezbollah has stanched what it saw as growing U.S. influence here and delayed the convening of an international court to try suspects in the 2005 slaying of former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri, an assassination that government supporters blame on Syria.

"It is a mixed bag," said Paul Salem, director of the Carnegie Middle East Center in Beirut. "But what's interesting is that it's a mixed bag that might have reached an unexpected status quo."

"My suspicion or sense is that we're in kind of a holding pattern," he added.

The protest convened along a usually busy intersection, drawing almost as many police officers and soldiers as demonstrators. Organized by the General Labor Confederation, a coalition of unions, the protesters railed against tax increases, privatization and other policies the government has announced ahead of a conference in Paris this month to solicit international aid for Lebanon. "No to the imposition of new taxes and fees," one placard read. "Siniora is responsible for impoverishing Lebanon," another said.

"We're here because there's no work, there are no jobs in the country," said Ali Tfaili, a 29-year-old protester.

He carried a Lebanese flag and a sign that read: "Real reform." He promised to keep taking part in the protests, including another scheduled for Wednesday, but reflecting the mood there, he suggested nothing dramatic was ahead.

"Anything more than this, and it would be a civil war," he said. "We don't want that."

DOJ_NMG_0115010

The relatively small size of the protest gave rise to speculation among foes and supporters of Hezbollah over its intentions. Some government allies said the numbers revealed divisions between Hezbollah and its partners, particularly Michel Aoun, a populist Christian politician who has forcefully called for an escalation in the protests. Others said it suggested the opposition's campaign was flagging after two mass demonstrations and the vigil that has lasted more than five weeks.

"This is a sign that if they -- the opposition and especially Hezbollah -- don't bring people from their houses, no one will come," said Youth and Sports Minister Ahmed Fatfat, who is loyal to the government coalition. "It is also a sign that people are losing patience and that they are starting to question what's the worth of all this."

Officials of Hezbollah, perhaps the most effective group in the Middle East in mobilizing its constituency, were dismissive of suggestions that the numbers Tuesday revealed weakness. They have said the next stage will play out gradually, with protests smaller but more numerous than the more dramatic shows of force in downtown Beirut.

"Why would we bring a million people to participate in a demonstration like that?" said Sherri, the Hezbollah lawmaker. "Numbers are not important. We've proved we have the numbers, and now a few thousand people will be just as efficient in sending the message."

Rice To Visit Mideast For Talks On Iraq, Israeli-Palestinian Ties (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, January 10, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice heads back to the Middle East in a bid to sell a new US strategy for Iraq to wary allies and to take another shot at reviving Israeli-Palestinian peace efforts.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Rice would visit Israel, the Palestinian territories, Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait before stop-offs in Germany and Britain during the January 12-19 trip.

While in Kuwait, Rice will meet with her counterparts from the six Gulf monarchies plus Egypt and Jordan -- a grouping of moderate Arab allies Washington sees as key to countering the influence of Iran, Syria and the radical Shiite groups they support in the region.

A major part of Rice's discussions will focus on "the perception of a common threat posed by Iran and other forces of extremism and violence in the region" McCormack said.

The tour will come just two days after President George W. Bush unveils his long-awaited new plan for resolving the violent crisis in Iraq.

The strategy is expected to involve the deployment of some 20,000 additional US soldiers in a temporary "surge" to quell rampant insurgent and sectarian violence, mainly in Baghdad, along with steps to boost Iraqi security forces, foster political reconciliation and revive the economy.

Rice will defend the plan in testimony Thursday to both chambers of Congress, controlled since November elections by the opposition Democrats who have voiced strong skepticism Bush's new approach can end the spiralling violence in Iraq so that the 130,000 US troops now there can come home.

In the Middle East, she will urge Arab allies worried about Iran's rising influence to back the plan by helping the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki with diplomatic support and debt relief, McCormack said.

"It's no secret that we have encouraged states in the region, whether it's Egypt or Saudi Arabia or the other Gulf states, to offer their support to the government of Iraq," he said.

Rice will also seek regional support for Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Siniora, who is battling a campaign to oust his government by the Syrian-backed Shiite movement Hezbollah, McCormack said.

Rice begins her latest Middle East mission with her eighth trip in two years to Israel and the Palestinian territories aimed at unblocking negotiations to create an independent Palestinian state.

Rice most recently met in late November with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas, but achieved no breakthrough.

Abbas and Olmert also held a rare direct meeting on December 23 at which the Israelis promised to release some withheld funds to the Palestinians and ease travel restrictions in the West Bank -- steps McCormack said had created an "opening" for progress.

But other key steps, including a long-awaited prisoner swap involving hundreds of Palestinians for an Israeli soldier kidnapped by radicals near Gaza in June, have not materialized.

McCormack said Rice would pursue a months-long effort to bolster Abbas in a power struggle between his secular Fatah party and the Islamist movement Hamas, which controls the Palestinian government after winning elections a year ago.

The Hamas victory prompted a crippling political and financial boycott of the Palestinians by the West and Israel.

DOJ_NMG_0115011

Negotiations to create a power-sharing government involving Fatah and Hamas collapsed late last year, leading Abbas to call for early elections -- a move that sparked violent clashes between the rivals and raised the specter of a Palestinian civil war.

Israel recently allowed Egypt to provide weapons to Abbas loyalists and the Bush administration is seeking Congressional approval for up to 90 million dollars in "non-lethal" military aid to his security forces, US officials said this week.

McCormack held out little hope that Rice's latest peacemaking venture would produce a breakthrough.

"I would expect that this is a trip that is more about laying the foundations for potential future actions than actually coming to closure on any particular agreements," he said.

Rice To Visit Middle East (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will begin a weeklong trip to the Middle East and Europe on Friday to seek support for President Bush's new Iraq strategy and to push for a new Israeli-Palestinian peace effort, the State Department said yesterday.

Miss Rice will visit Israel, the Palestinian territories, Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Germany and Britain. She will return to Europe on Jan. 24 for an international donors conference in Paris to raise funds for Lebanon, whose economy is still recovering from the war with Israel in the summer.

"I would expect that this is a trip that is more about laying the foundations for potential future actions than actually coming to closure on any particular agreements," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters.

U.S. officials and diplomats from some of the countries Miss Rice will visit said that, despite the low expectations, it is important for the secretary to return to the Middle East, given the dire situation in Iraq, the tensions between the Palestinian Fatah faction and Hamas, and the new domestic political realities in the United States, where Democrats just took control of Congress.

In addition, the Bush administration has been under pressure from its European allies to become more active in working toward a resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, which many in the region consider to be the most divisive issue with the West.

That pressure increased when Germany stated its intention to highlight the matter in its agenda as president of both the European Union and the Group of Eight organization of leading industrialized countries. Even though German Chancellor Angela Merkel met with Mr. Bush in Washington last week, Miss Rice plans to stop in Berlin on her way back from the Middle East and brief Mrs. Merkel on her meetings.

The secretary's trip, beginning two days after Mr. Bush's address to the nation tonight to announce his new Iraq strategy, also will aim to ensure that other states in the region support the new course and the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, Mr. McCormack said.

"It's no secret that we have encouraged states in the region, whether it's Egypt or Saudi Arabia or the other Gulf states, to offer their support to the government of Iraq," he said.

The president is expected to send more troops to Iraq and to propose benchmarks for the withdrawal of U.S. forces.

General: N.Korea May Conduct Nuclear Test (AP)

By Kwang-tae Kim

AP, January 10, 2007

The top U.S. general on the Korean Peninsula said Tuesday he believes North Korea might conduct another nuclear test.

U.S. Army Gen. B.B. Bell, commander of U.S. Forces Korea, said the communist regime — which conducted its first nuclear test on Oct. 9 — is capable of testing another such device, but he didn't elaborate on recent media reports that the North was preparing to do so.

"There is no reason to believe that at some time in the future, when it serves their purposes, that they won't test another one. So I suspect someday they will," Bell said at a news conference in Seoul.

Concerns about North Korea heightened abruptly last week in Asia after ABC News reported Pyongyang might be preparing for another test. Citing unnamed U.S. defense officials, the network said the moves were similar to steps taken before the October blast.

Top U.S. and South Korean officials dismissed the speculation, saying there was no indication such a development was imminent.

During talks on its nuclear program in 2005, North Korea agreed to dismantle its nuclear program in exchange for security guarantees and aid, but no progress has since been made in implementing the accord.

The U.S. — along with China, Japan, South Korea and Russia — held talks with North Korea in December to try to work out initial steps toward implementation of the breakthrough deal but they failed to produce any progress.

The talks — which also involve South Korea, China, Russia and Japan — ended in a deadlock over the U.S. financial restrictions imposed on the North over its alleged counterfeiting of $100 bills and money laundering.

The U.S. and the North have provisionally agreed to hold the next talks on the financial dispute in the week starting Jan. 22, according to South Korea's foreign minister, Song Min-soon. The previous talks — held on the sidelines of the main nuclear talks in Beijing — ended without any breakthrough.

North Korea says the sanctions are evidence of Washington's "hostile policy" and indicate its intention to overthrow the regime, and the North therefore needs nuclear weapons for protection.

About 29,500 U.S. troops are stationed in South Korea as a deterrent against a North Korean invasion, a legacy of the Korean War. That conflict ended in a cease-fire, not a peace treaty, leaving the two Koreas technically still at war.

General Sees Another N. Korea Nuclear Test (WT)

By Andrew Salmon

The Washington Times, January 10, 2007

SEOUL -- The senior U.S. commander in South Korea said yesterday that North Korea will likely conduct another nuclear test, and he also vented his frustration at a range of issues bedeviling Washington's military alliance with Seoul.

"They have self-proclaimed their possession of nuclear weapons, and there is no reason to believe that at some time in the future, when it serves their purposes, that they won't test another one," Gen. Burwell B. Bell said of North Korea, which detonated a nuclear device on Oct 9. "So I suspect some day they will."

The general, speaking to reporters, declined to discuss whether a test was imminent, citing confidentiality of intelligence.

ABC News last week reported Pyongyang might be preparing for another test. Citing unnamed U.S. defense officials, the network said the moves were similar to steps taken before the October blast.

Top U.S. and South Korean officials have dismissed the speculation, saying there is no indication such a development was imminent.

Gen. Bell also expressed concerns about the relocation of the headquarters of the U.S. forces in South Korea, the transfer of wartime command of South Korean forces to South Korean leadership, and budgetary shortfalls.

"I must admit that I was surprised when I read local press reports that [a South Korean] government official stated the relocation of U.S. forces would not occur until after 2013," he said. "This was news to me, and not at all reflective of the agreement we have with [South Korea] to achieve the move by 2008."

Yongsan garrison, home to 6,500 troops and 8,000 civilians -- family members and defense contractors -- has been a bone of contention in the alliance for years. Talks to relocate the central Seoul base have been ongoing since 1990, but only in 2004 did the two countries sign an agreement to relocate it to the city of Pyeongtaek, 55 miles south of the capital, by 2008.

Construction of the new base is under way, but last month, local press reports, quoting an unnamed South Korean government official, stated the move would be delayed until 2013. Seoul officials have not refuted the reports.

Noting that many U.S. personnel and their families were living in dilapidated facilities at Yongsan, Gen. Bell said that with the move planned, he could not construct new facilities on the current base.

The proposal to transfer wartime command of South Korean forces is caught in a similar timeline dispute. U.S. military officials say the transfer of command can be achieved by 2009, but the South Korean side wants to delay it until 2012.

Gen. Bell said future U.S. force commanders would play a "supporting role" to South Korean commanders, and hinted that the transfer of wartime control of troops needs more serious attention than it has so far received.

"The worst things we can do, within minutes, is to transfer command back and forth," he said. "That would be unacceptable."

Gen. Bell also addressed shortfalls in South Korean financial support to fund the ongoing consolidation of U.S. troops across the Korean Peninsula. The U.S. force in Korea has been shrinking -- from 37,500 troops in 2003, to 29,500 today, and there will be 25,000 in 2008. Most of the troops are moving to new, less intrusive base areas.

In negotiations, Seoul had agreed to pay 44 percent of U.S. troops' consolidation costs -- $886 million. However, what Seoul finally offered was $772 million, leaving a shortfall of more than $100 million.

"I'm being put into a bad position, from a policy perspective, of not having the money to do what our two governments told me to do," the general said, adding that he would need to make "significant" cuts in U.S. forces' programs.

Gen. Bell's outspoken tone surprised some analysts.

DOJ_NMG_0115013

"Clearly, Washington is expecting Koreans to take greater responsibility for their defense, and behave honorably in the negotiation process as that happens," said Michael Breen, a Seoul-based author of several books about the peninsula and a longtime Korea watcher.

Meanwhile, the overall deterioration in the alliance dismays local conservatives.

"The sharp rise in anti-Americanism here has partly been instigated by North Korean propaganda, but the behavior of our government in the recent two to three years has been rather out of the ordinary in its ability to be diplomatic," said Lee In-ho, a professor at Myongji University.

"Conservatives are concerned here: Even if we are critical of some policy lines pursued by the Bush administration, we do not want to jettison the alliance completely," he said.

US Stealth Fighters To Be Deployed In South Korea (AFP)

AFP, January 10, 2007

The United States is sending between 15 and 24 radar-evading Stealth fighters to South Korea this month, the US military has said, amid increasing speculation over a second North Korean nuclear test.

"One squadron of F-117 Nighthawk Stealth fighters will be deployed this month," said Kim Yong-Kyu, a spokesman for US Forces Korea. One squadron of fighters has between 15 and 24 aircraft.

"This is a routine deployment," he said, adding that the move had nothing to do with any particular threat. He declined to give further details, including where and for how long the fighters will be deployed.

Holloman Air Force Base in New Mexico, where the fighters are based, said in a Web posting that the fighters left earlier this week for South Korea.

General B.B. Bell, the commander of US forces in South Korea, said Tuesday he believes North Korea will test a second nuclear bomb at some time in the future, following its first test on October 9.

"Should North Korea attack the South in any way, the combined forces command will respond and we will win quickly and we will win decisively," he said.

Bell heads 29,000 US troops in the peninsula, supporting South Korea's 680,000-strong armed forces against any attack from the North's 1.1 million military.

A South Korean foreign ministry official said last week that activity had been detected at Punggye in northeast North Korea, near the site of the first test, but there was no sign of preparations for a second detonation.

The latest round of six-nation talks on the North's nuclear programme ended in Beijing in December without a breakthrough. The US State Department has said the talks could resume as early as this month.

Analysts say North Korea could set off a second nuclear device to strengthen its hand in the prolonged stand-off.

SKorea Urges North To Mull U.S. Proposal (AP)

By Kwang-tae Kim

AP, January 10, 2007

South Korea on Wednesday renewed a call for North Korea to seriously consider U.S. proposals before the communist nation returns to international talks on its nuclear weapons program.

The United States has offered security guarantees, a peace treaty and normalization of relations as well as removal of North Korea from Washington's list of states sponsoring terrorism if it dismantles its atomic weapons program, according to South Korean officials.

"I expect North Korea to come to the talks with realistic and positive proposals after seriously reviewing" the U.S. offers, Foreign Minister Song Min-soon said at a regular press conference following meetings last week with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

South Korea and the U.S. will consider taking active and positive steps if the North shows a positive attitude, Song said.

The North has yet to make any response to the U.S. proposals.

Song said it was difficult to predict when the next nuclear talks will occur, but said all the parties shared the need to hold meetings soon.

The nuclear issue will also be on the agenda for summit talks between South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun and his Chinese and Japanese counterparts on Sunday on the sidelines of a regional Asian meeting in the Philippines, said Song.

North Korea returned to international talks on its nuclear arms program in Beijing last month — the first since its Oct. 9 nuclear test — but no progress was made on disarmament because of a dispute over U.S. financial restrictions imposed on the North over its alleged counterfeiting of $100 bills and money laundering.

DOJ_NMG_0115014

The North has repeatedly urged the U.S. to lift the financial restrictions and unfreeze its assets worth some $24 million deposited at a Macau bank blacklisted by Washington.

The U.S. held separate financial talks on the sidelines of the nuclear talks but also made no progress. The two sides have provisionally agreed to hold the next financial talks the week of Jan. 22, according to Song.

For A Few Dollars More (WSJ)

By Jay P. Lefkowitz

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

There is a growing consensus in the international community that North Korea's conduct is unacceptable. Nevertheless, several countries engage in practices that funnel cash to the regime in a manner that violates the spirit of a recent United Nations resolution and raises serious human rights concerns. These countries contract labor through historical -- and even new -- agreements with the regime of Kim Jong Il. Because the North Korean government takes a major portion of workers' salaries, these arrangements provide material support for a rogue government, its nuclear ambitions, and its human-rights atrocities.

Three times last year, the U.N. condemned North Korea's dangerous and abusive conduct. In November, the General Assembly's human-rights committee voted 91-21 to express serious concern about the regime's atrocities against its own population. The Security Council also voted unanimously to condemn North Korea's ballistic missile program in July and its nuclear weapons testing in October. The October resolution calls on member states to freeze the financial assets of those aiding North Korea's nuclear weapons program.

Surely such U.N. proclamations should make anyone think twice about engaging in activities that could aid Pyongyang. Yet several countries utilize trafficked North Korean labor in a manner that provides significant resources for the regime. There are approximately 10,000 to 15,000 North Koreans working abroad for their government. Labor arrangements reportedly exist between North Korea and entities in Russia, Czech Republic, Mongolia, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Libya and Angola. It is unclear how much hard currency is generated for Pyongyang by these arrangements, but it can be presumed significant, given the number of workers involved.

Even though Russia voted for both Security Council resolutions, it provides the largest market for North Korean labor. In camps near Khabarovsk in Siberia, North Korean labor gangs harvest Russian timber. This work force used to be populated by North Korean prisoners and others viewed by the North Korean government as disloyal. It filled a labor gap in Siberia that coincided with the decline of the gulag. Today, conditions are so harsh in North Korea that workers actually volunteer for such labor assignments. However, because these workers are not paid directly, much of the capital generated ends up in the coffers of Mr. Kim's regime. Despite promises of cash, some workers reportedly are paid in coupons that turn out to be of little value. This activity runs afoul of a U.N. protocol on trafficking in persons, to which Russia is a party.

The fact that North Koreans eagerly volunteer for these jobs is a testament to how bad things are in Kim Jong Il's socialist paradise. Although it is hard to gain access to these labor facilities, several recent reports reveal that workers in these camps are treated like prisoners and are provided with food and shelter that are barely adequate. Days off are rare -- cumulatively less than a week per year -- and the workers cannot leave the work areas or interact with locals. They are under the control of North Korean security officials and have no recourse to local authorities. There are some accounts of torture and executions. The work day can reach 17 hours, even in temperatures plunging to 40 degrees below zero. Accidents are common, and the workers are prohibited from using healthcare outside the camp. They work under portraits of the "Dear Leader," Kim Jong Il, and are subject to political indoctrination meetings twice a week.

The Czech Republic also hosts several hundred North Korean workers, although it stopped issuing new work visas six months ago. The North Korean government skims their paychecks and funnels the revenue to Pyongyang. Workers' monthly salaries are deposited directly in an account controlled by the North Korean government. After numerous deductions for items including propaganda films, the workers are left with only about 20% of their wages, from which they still must purchase their own food.

Pyongyang's take varies by location, but we know of no instance where North Korean laborers like these receive their wages directly. This is one of the concerns we have with the Kaesong Industrial Complex in North Korea, where workers are supposed to earn a minimum of $57 per month. While there are some welcome indications that South Korea may be reassessing its commitment to this project, several South Korean companies have spent hundreds of millions of dollars to set up shop in Kaesong to use inexpensive local labor. Even advocates of the endeavor, who believe Kaesong will open and liberalize the North, concede that authorities take a portion of the wages paid by the South Korean companies. Indeed, a recent report indicates this take is 45% of a worker's salary. Verified details are elusive, and neither the North or South Korean governments, nor any company, has been able to state definitively how much of his or her wage a Kaesong worker is allowed to keep.

Some argue that labor arrangements like those in Russia and Kaesong are positive developments. They see these activities as a way to open North Korean eyes to the outside world. To date, however, those benefits seem more theoretical than real. Rather, it is more likely that the hard currency these countries are sending to North Korea will end up funding the regime's nuclear aspirations instead of improving living conditions for the people of North Korea.

Mr. Lefkowitz is President Bush's special envoy for human rights in North Korea.

U.S. Overseas Image Gets New Focus (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will announce today the creation of a new annual award to honor a company, academic institution or other nongovernmental entity that does the most to promote the U.S. image abroad through intercultural understanding, State Department officials said.

The Benjamin Franklin Award for Public Diplomacy is designed to prod corporations and other nongovernmental groups to play a bigger role in public diplomacy at a time when the image of the U.S. government has been battered by a backlash, especially in the Arab world, from the invasion of Iraq.

Rice will highlight the award during a speech at a conference of public relations organizations at the State Department. During the meeting, the group will select the 10 best ways that the private sector can promote understanding between the United States and people around the world.

"The award and the summit are part of our greater effort to partner with the private sector," said Assistant Secretary Dina H. Powell. "Public diplomacy is not the government's job alone, and we will be much more successful as American citizens if we work together with corporations, NGOs [nongovernmental organizations], academic institutions and everyday Americans to amplify our efforts."

Powell, along with Undersecretary of State Karen Hughes, has worked with private entities on a number of initiatives in the past year, including bringing journalists from 100 countries to learn U.S. journalistic practices, creating an international women's mentoring program in partnership with Fortune magazine and sending 12 university presidents to Asia to promote educational opportunities in the United States.

The new award would complement another State Department honor, the Award for Corporate Excellence (ACE), which the agency gives annually to U.S. businesses that act as good corporate citizens overseas. Goldman Sachs, for instance, was selected last year for endowing a gift of 680,000 acres of wilderness in Chile for a national reserve. Competition for that award -- presented by the secretary of state -- is intense, and State Department officials hope the Franklin award will prove equally alluring.

Unlike the ACE award, the new honor will be available not just to companies but also foundations, nonprofit organizations, think tanks, universities and other academic institutions, labor organizations and even individuals. The award was named in honor of Franklin because, as the nation's first envoy, he was known for his creative ways of using culture, business and science to attract the attention of foreign audiences, State Department officials said.

James E. Murphy, chief of marketing and communications for Accenture, chairs the PR Coalition, an organization of 20 major public relations groups that is meeting at the State Department today. He said the group previously identified 10 models to help companies promote corporate governance and diversity. The group, concerned about the image of the United States around the world, approached Hughes last year about holding a meeting at State to produce a similar list for public diplomacy.

Murphy said U.S. companies and individuals donate significantly more money overseas than the overall U.S. aid budget. "The most powerful thing we have going for us is the private sector overseas," Murphy said.

The 150 participants will vote on the 10 best models from a list that includes programs for employees and customers that promote understanding of American society and programs that build trust and respect with counterparts abroad.

Congress On Collision Course With Moscow (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, January 10, 2007

The Bush administration's relationship with the Kremlin has chilled considerably since the moment in 2001 when the US president famously looked into the soul of his Russian counterpart and declared that Vladimir Putin was "very straightforward and trustworthy".

And Washington's stance towards Moscow could become even more frosty in coming months, potentially colliding with expected attempts by Russia to use its new found oil and natural gas wealth to step up its investment in the US, including the expansion of Gazprom, its national energy group, into the US market.

DOJ_NMG_0115016

For years most lawmakers in the Republican-controlled Congress have taken the White House's lead in their stance toward Russia. Now experts predict that mounting concerns on Capitol Hill, on issues ranging from Mr Putin's commitment to democracy to questions about the security of western investments in the Russian energy sector, could see lawmakers taking a more robust, sceptical approach.

Barney Frank, the Democratic lawmaker who, as chair the House financial services committee has an influential voice on foreign investment issues, exemplified the expected change in tone last week in a speech to the National Press Club.

In remarks that extolled the "absolute security" of the US market, Mr Frank took a shot at the Kremlin when he remarked: "Where do you want to invest? Russia? So Putin can steal your company?"

The 2008 presidential race could also colour relations with Russia. Two of the Kremlin's most vociferous critics are contenders for the White House: Democrat Joseph Biden who heads the Senate foreign relations committee and John McCain, a favourite to win the Republican nomination.

The defeat in the recent midterm elections of Republican congressman Curt Weldon, a staunch defender of the Kremlin, and the ascension of Democrat Tom Lantos to the top ranks of the House international relations committee, are also likely to renew the focus on allegations of human rights abuses in Russia, including the controversy over the forced sale of Yukos, the energy group, and the imprisonment of Mikhail Khodorkovsky, its former chief executive.

One Democratic Senate source said Russia had been "flying under the radar screen" because Washington had largely focused its attention on Iraq, Iran and North Korea, but that concerns had become increasingly hard to ignore.

"To some extent, it's not our business to regulate the Russian economy, but to the extent they use their control over the Russian economy to affect countries that are close friends and partners, that's something we care about," the person said. "I would hope that we don't respond to bad behaviour with protectionism of our own but one can't discount that option entirely."

One Washington business lobbyist, noting the recent storm over Shell ceding control of its Sakhalin-2 oil and gas project in Russia to Gazprom, agreed: "I wouldn't be surprised if Russian investment in the US was subject to higher political attention in Congress given that Russia has basically expropriated western investments."

Marshall Goldman, associate director of the Davis Center for Russian Studies at Harvard, says Russia has $300bn in cash "rolling around" and that the recently proposed $2.3bn takeover of Oregon Steel by Evraz, a Russian steel group, is "just the beginning".

"I think we have to learn there really isn't much to restrain them. But if they engage in these kinds of games, people can play them too," Mr Goldman says.

Ultimately, Congress's ability to affect the US government's overall relationship with Russia will be limited. Critics will not have a formal vote, for example, over an agreement hatched by the White House that paves the way for Russia to join the World Trade Organisation. However, lawmakers could seize an expected request by the White House for Congress to repeal the 1974 Jackson-Vanik amendment as an opportunity to air broad grievances. The amendment subjects Russia's trading status to annual review and must be repealed in order to give Russia permanent normal trade relations.

Don Evans, who served as commerce secretary during Mr Bush's first term and who last year turned down a top position at Rosneft, the Russian energy group, offered to him by Mr Putin, said in an interview with the Financial Times that Russia's inclusion in the WTO would ultimately foster greater understanding between it and the US and would help integrate Russia into the global economy.

"The issues people want to point to all the time will be a few cases within the [Russian] energy sector that get all the attention," said Mr Evans, who heads the Financial Services Forum, banking lobby group. "But all the American companies that are providing other services and goods...are doing very, very well."

Anger As Russia Digs In Over Oil To Belarus (FT)

By George Parker, Arkady Ostrovsky, Ed Crooks And Chris Flood

Financial Times, January 10, 2007

Vladimir Putin on Tuesday faced an angry European backlash about his decision to halt oil supplies through the pipelines crossing Belarus.

As the Russian president made clear his determination not to back down in his dispute with Belarus, Angela Merkel, the German chancellor, denounced his actions as "not acceptable", noting that even during the height of the cold war, Russia had been a reliable energy supplier to Europe.

Ms Merkel, speaking as the new president of the EU, said Russia's latest display of energy muscle "hurts trust and it makes it difficult to build a co-operative relationship."

DOJ_NMG_0115017

Mr Putin, speaking in a televised meeting with ministers in Moscow, stressed he wanted to do all he could to ensure that oil supplies to western Europe were not affected. But he escalated the dispute by telling his government to tell Russian companies to cut output because of the transit dispute.

Belarus wants Russia to pay an export duty of $45 per tonne of oil transported through Belarus. This is in retaliation for Russia slapping $180 export duty on crude oil it sells to Belarus.

In a sign of how seriously Germany now questions its reliance on Russia, Ms Merkel said the new dispute cast doubt on the wisdom of her country's plan to phase out nuclear power by 2020.

Yet for all the political furore, oil markets on Tuesday shrugged off the latest geopolitical threat to supply, focusing instead on the warm US winter and strong inventories. At one point the price of oil hit an 18-month low point, dipping below $54 in New York, although it later recovered most of its losses.

The political row in Belarus – and Venezuela's announcement of plans to take state control of its heavy oil projects – did little to deflect the downward trend in the price. The price of oil has fallen by more than 10 per cent since the start of the year and yesterday Mustafa Mohatarem, chief economist of General Motors, forecast it would fall below $50 this year. West Texas Intermediate crude for delivery in February fell to an intra-day low of $53.88 a barrel before recovering. Brent crude fell to an intra-day low of $53.64 a barrel before climbing back.

David Kirsch, manager of the markets intelligence service for PFC Energy, said the weak trend was likely to continue, with oil prices likely to test $50 a barrel. "I don't see any positive news in the next week or so that is likely to lift prices," he said.

The steep fall has caused concern among members of the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, which last month agreed a supply cut of 500,000 barrels a day, with effect from February 1, to try to stabilise the market.

Some Opec members have a target of $60 a barrel for the basket of their output, which is typically about $5 a barrel below the benchmark prices in London and New York.

The US Energy Information Administration, a government agency, trimmed its forecast of world oil demand to 86.2m barrels a day for the first quarter of the year, down 300,000 b/d from its December forecast. The EIA forecasted US oil prices would average $64.42 a barrel in 2007 and $64.58 in 2008

The oil price fall has taken place against a sell-off in the commodities market: copper has fallen 11.3 per cent; zinc 16.2 per cent; and tin 13.1 per cent.

Germany's Merkel Assails Russia Over Cutoff Of Oil (WP)

By Peter Finn

Washington Post, January 10, 2007

MOSCOW, Jan. 9 -- German Chancellor Angela Merkel forcefully condemned Russia on Tuesday for failing to consult the European Union before it cut off part of its oil exports to Europe because of a deepening dispute between Russia and Belarus over subsidized energy.

"Even during the Cold War, Russia was a stable energy supplier," said Merkel, whose country holds the rotating presidency of the European Union. Speaking at a news conference in Berlin, she said Russia's failure to warn the bloc that it planned to shut down a pipeline that crosses Belarus and supplies Germany, Poland and other E.U. countries was "not acceptable."

Russian officials say they feel deeply aggrieved by the tactics of Belarus, which they accuse of stealing crude oil destined for Western Europe, but the Kremlin is nonetheless getting another black eye over its reliability as an energy supplier.

Just over a year ago, the E.U. was in an uproar after Russia cut natural gas supplies to Ukraine, a decision that affected supplies across the Continent. And while there is no great sympathy in Western Europe for Belarus, often called the Continent's last dictatorship, there is increasing concern about Russia's willingness to shut off energy supplies as a first resort in disputes with its neighbors.

The message "to our Russian partners, and to Belarus as well, is that consultations are the least thing to do," said Merkel, whose comments were echoed by other European leaders. "It is not acceptable if there is no consultation on such issues. That destroys confidence, and this is no basis for smoothly building up a constructive relationship."

The E.U., which is heavily dependent on Russian natural gas and oil, has almost no short-term alternatives for energy. Russia supplies about 25 percent of the union's oil and 40 percent of its natural gas.

Besides Germany and Poland, Russian oil supplies were also cut to the Czech Republic, Hungary and Slovakia. All the affected countries have enough strategic reserves to ride out any shutdown for several months.

The dispute began when Belarus imposed a transit fee on Russian oil in retaliation for new Russian duties on exports of Russian oil to Belarus. Russia's western neighbor has long benefited from subsidized Russian energy, but the Kremlin appears to have tired of underwriting its putative ally, which is led by the authoritarian President Alexander Lukashenko.

DOJ_NMG_0115018

Belarus, isolated and poor, earned billions of dollars from processing Russian crude and selling it to Western Europe. The new duties will cut into its profits, much of which ended up in government coffers.

On Jan. 1, Russia doubled the price of the natural gas it sells to Belarus, but at $100 per 1,309 cubic yards, it is still cheaper than the price paid by any other country. As part of that deal, the state-controlled Russian energy company Gazprom also took a 50 percent stake in the Belarusan gas pipeline network. "Belarus won't be blackmailed by Russia," Lukashenko said on state television.

At a government meeting Tuesday, Putin expressed frustration with Belarus, noting that Gazprom paid the highest of multiple independent valuations for its stake in the pipeline network and that Belarus continues to be subsidized despite the price increases.

"The Russian Federation has agreed to sell gas not at a market price," Putin said in televised remarks. "Moreover, Russia is not levying an export duty on its gas exports to Belarus, costing it $3.33 billion annually."

A Belarusan delegation flew to Moscow to try to resolve the dispute.

"Everything should be placed on the negotiation table without any preliminary conditions or preliminary demands," Belarusan Deputy Prime Minister Andrei Kobyakov said at a news conference at the Belarusan Embassy. "We are ready for dialogue."

The Russian economic development and trade minister, German Gref, met with Kobyakov on Tuesday evening but said Russia would enter into full negotiations with Belarus only when the oil transit fee is dropped. "These are our unconditional demands, and we will not enter into talks until these conditions are satisfied," Gref told reporters after meeting with Kobyakov.

One sign that Russia may be preparing for a drawn-out affair was an instruction from Putin to ministers that they "discuss with Russian companies the possibility of reducing oil output in connection to problems linked to the transit of oil through Belarus." That would prevent Russia from extracting more oil than it can pump to customers.

Putin also said that "everything must be done to guarantee the interests of Western consumers." Russian officials said they were exploring ways of rerouting oil to Europe.

Russia Considers Alternatives To Oil Pipeline Through Belarus (NYT)

By Michael Schwirtz

New York Times, January 10, 2007

MOSCOW, Jan. 9 — An unyielding President Vladimir V. Putin on Tuesday raised the possibility of diverting oil transit routes away from Belarus, a day after Moscow cut off pipeline deliveries of crude oil headed to customers in Eastern and Central Europe through the country.

Such a change, which would be years in the making, would cut Belarus out of any role in the transshipment of oil to Europe without offering the customers any immediate assurance that their supplies were reliable.

The two-day cutoff has affected supplies to Ukraine, Germany, Poland, Hungary, the Czech Republic and Slovakia. It is the second stoppage of Russian energy supplies to European countries since last winter, when natural gas shipments were shut down briefly during a gas pricing dispute between Russia and Ukraine.

In a meeting with his cabinet ministers, Mr. Putin also urged the government to discuss with Russian companies “the possibility of scaling down the extraction of oil, given problems in transiting crude across Belarus.” That indicated that Russia might not have sufficient storage for oil that was being produced but not exported.

With the new year, Russia began charging Belarus $100 per thousand cubic meters of gas, more than double the old rate of $46. It also imposed a duty of $180 a ton on oil that officials said Belarus was obtaining at subsidized rates and reselling on world markets. In response, Belarus imposed a transshipment fee of $45 a ton on oil going through Belarus in the Druzhba pipeline to Europe.

On Monday, officials in Moscow accused Belarus of siphoning off about 79,000 tons — roughly half a million barrels — of Russian oil bound for Europe, then shut down the pipeline entirely.

Normally the 2,500-mile pipeline pumps 1.2 million barrels a day to Eastern and Central Europe, with one arm running to Poland and Germany and the other to Ukraine, Hungary, Slovakia and the Czech Republic.

In general terms, Mr. Putin told his cabinet members to do whatever was necessary to guarantee the interests of Russian companies as well as the interests of the countries dependent on Russian energy supplies.

He also said the government must continue negotiations with Russia’s “Belarussian partners,” now estranged but once so close that the countries spoke seriously of merging into a unitary state.

Officials from Belarus flew to Moscow to negotiate, and one delegation submitted a draft agreement to the Russian Trade Ministry, the Russian news agency Interfax reported. According to Belarus’s deputy economic minister, Vladimir A. Naidunov, the agreement could “make it possible to mutually settle issues concerned with levying customs duties on oil, and with duties for oil transportation through Belarus.”

It is unclear when negotiations will begin. Russian officials have begun formulating their starting positions, but German O. Gref, Russia’s trade minister, told reporters Tuesday evening that Moscow would start talks only after Belarus had lifted transit duties and resumed oil transit.

Russia’s intransigence irritated European leaders, including Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany, who said it was “not acceptable” for energy suppliers to cut off shipments without consultation, and who renewed her call for diversification of supplies.

But few analysts expected the standoff to last more than a few days. “Belarus’s reserves of cheap oil will last a few days, a week at most,” Yaroslav Romanchuk, an economist in Belarus, told The Associated Press. “After that, it will have to buy oil taking into account Russian export duties.”

In a news conference, the Russian industry and energy minister, Viktor B. Khristenko, said that in time Russia would be able to reroute oil around Belarus, possibly by increasing the capacity of the Baltic pipeline system or hurrying the completion of the East Siberia-Pacific Ocean pipeline.

In the short term, he said, Russia might have to ship more oil by rail and river. “If these measures aren’t enough, it could be necessary to reduce oil output,” he said.

Russian equity markets slid sharply on the news, with the RTS index dropping 6.4 percent. Shares in Lukoil, a major oil producer, led the way, dropping 9 percent.

Russia May Cut Oil Production Amid Dispute With Belarus (LAT)

By David Holley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 10, 2007

Putin's comments seem to hold out the threat that negotiations could drag on for days or months.

MOSCOW — A Russian-Belarusian oil dispute that has shut down a key pipeline carrying crude oil to European customers may drag on long enough to force Moscow to cut production, Russian President Vladimir V. Putin said Tuesday.

The bitter spat between the longtime allies led to a cutoff Monday in the flow of oil across Belarus, prompting complaints from European officials.

A warm winter has left Europe with abundant oil supplies, triggering falling prices and keeping a lid on the severity of the continent's short-term worries about the cutoff. But the dispute, which concerns oil taxes and transit fees, has revived fears in the European Union about overreliance on Russian energy and has focused attention on efforts to come up with a comprehensive European energy policy.

The tough Russian stance also threatens to undermine Belarusian President Alexander G. Lukashenko. His authoritarian government, often called "the last dictatorship in Europe," has been propped up by energy subsidies from Moscow that are now being eliminated.

"The Kremlin has dumped Lukashenko," Belarusian opposition leader Alexander Milinkevich said in a telephone interview from Minsk, the capital.

The oil dispute was triggered by a new Russian customs duty of $180 per metric ton on crude oil exports to Belarus, a tax that took effect Jan. 1. Belarus retaliated by imposing a transit fee of $45 per ton for oil shipped through the pipeline to the European Union.

Moscow had previously shipped oil to Belarus duty-free under agreements reached in a bid to eventually unite Belarus and Russia into a single state.

That effort has lost steam in recent years, however. It appears that the Kremlin has decided to maximize its oil and natural gas export profits despite the political impact on Lukashenko.

"Since this united economic space is not working out, it was decided in Moscow to make a transition to market relations," said Vyacheslav A. Nikonov, president of the Politika Foundation, a Moscow think tank. "Lukashenko naturally doesn't like it. Of all the foreign partners Putin ever had, Lukashenko has always been the most difficult."

Last month, Belarus was forced to agree to pay slightly more than twice as much for Russian natural gas this year compared with last year, although the cost remains less than half the amount charged to European Union customers. That deal calls for further price hikes in the next few years.

Milinkevich, the opposition leader, said Lukashenko had overreacted to Moscow's decision to raise energy prices toward market levels.

"Despite all these years of preferential terms for oil and gas, Belarus failed to prepare itself for real market relations," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0115020

"Belarus has lost its last partner in Europe and found itself in total isolation," he added. "I think eventually Moscow and Belarus will arrive at some temporary compromise, but their good relations are a thing of the past."

In televised remarks made at a meeting of Cabinet ministers, Putin ordered officials "to discuss with Russian oil-producing companies the possibility of reducing oil production in connection with the problems that arose when transporting our oil through Belarus' territory."

That comment appeared to hold out the threat that negotiations could drag on for days or even months. But Putin also called for talks to move forward, and for officials "to do everything to protect the interests of our Western customers."

A similar dispute a year ago between Russia and Ukraine over natural gas prices briefly disrupted supplies to the European Union.

Speaking at a joint news conference in Berlin, German Chancellor Angela Merkel and European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso criticized both Russia and Belarus for the disruption in supplies.

"It is not acceptable when there are no consultations about such moves," Merkel said. "That repeatedly destroys confidence, and you cannot build cooperation based on true mutual trust in this way…. Even during the Cold War, Russia was a stable energy supplier."

The pipeline delivers about 20% of Germany's yearly oil supply. The European Union relies on Russia for about 40% of its natural gas imports and about 30% of its oil imports.

Steven Dashevsky, director of research at Aton Capital Group in Moscow, placed most of the blame for the dispute on Belarus.

"Russia, as a main oil and gas producer, is in the same shoes with Western Europe, as a main oil and gas consumer," he said. "For the second year in a row they become hostages of unstable transit states that can't pay market prices for their energy and resort to creating problems for all of Europe."

Belarusian Deputy Prime Minister Andrei Kobyakov met in Moscow on Tuesday with Russian Economic Development and Trade Minister German O. Gref, but it was unclear whether the talks made any progress.

Oil Spat Deepens Worry Over Russia's Reliability (WSJ)

By Gregory L. White And Guy Chazan

Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

Putin Threat to Cut Output As Belarus Dispute Persists Has EU Weighing Options

MOSCOW -- Russia's threat to reduce oil production in a worsening trade war with neighboring Belarus is fueling fears of a drawn-out conflict that could slice Europe's main supply of crude.

As the main pipeline carrying Russian oil to Europe remained shut off for a second straight day, European officials said refineries were able to maintain production by dipping into stocks. But officials warned that the European Union might have to take the costly step of releasing oil from its strategic reserve if the cutoff is prolonged.

European officials blasted both sides' actions. German Chancellor Angela Merkel said Moscow's failure to warn its customers of the impending cutoff "hurts trust and ... makes it difficult to build a cooperative relationship." Ms. Merkel and EU officials denounced the lack of warning from both sides as "unacceptable," while the European Commission said it would convene a special meeting tomorrow to discuss how to make up for the lost Russian supplies.

In his first public comments on the Belarus dispute, Russian President Vladimir Putin ordered his government to continue negotiations with Minsk, but also said Moscow should discuss with oil companies the possibility of reducing oil production to offset lost exports.

Russia's main pipeline to Europe carries about a third of Russia's five million barrels a day of crude exports. Belarussian officials in Moscow for talks today said no discussions had yet taken place.

Russian oil companies warned that any effort to reduce production would be costly. "That's an extreme option," said Dmitry Dolgov, a spokesman for OAO Lukoil, Russia's largest oil company. But analysts said with Kremlin influence in the energy sector growing, Russia's oil giants would likely toe the line if the authorities demanded cutbacks.

Oil prices fell as markets shrugged off fears about Russia and focused on unseasonably warm weather in the U.S. Crude oil for February delivery settled at $55.64 a barrel, down 45 cents, or 0.8%, on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

The Kremlin blames Minsk for causing the disruption by imposing a fee of $45 a metric ton (about $6.15 a barrel) for Russian oil shipped through the Druzhba pipeline. Minsk imposed the transit duty in retaliation for Moscow's decision late last year to end duty-free crude shipments to Belarus. The Druzhba, or Friendship, brings over one million barrels a day of Russian crude to Germany, Poland and other European countries, and carries about 12.5% of EU oil consumption.

Russia's reputation as a reliable supplier to Europe, which depends heavily on its eastern neighbor for oil and natural gas, has come under increasing question since a price conflict with Ukraine led to a brief cutoff of Russian natural-gas exports to much of Europe a year ago. But that so far hasn't deterred Moscow from continuing to use its vast oil and gas resources as a political tool in its increasingly assertive foreign policy.

Political analysts said the Kremlin appears determined to put the screws to Belarus President Alexander Lukashenko. For Mr. Putin, who has called the 1991 collapse of the Soviet Union "the greatest geopolitical catastrophe of the century," a planned union with its former Soviet neighbor on Moscow's terms is a priority. Russian officials blame Mr. Lukashenko for foot-dragging on the plan despite receiving billions of dollars a year in energy subsidies from Moscow.

Mr. Putin yesterday ordered his government to prepare a full spectrum of economic measures to use against Belarus, whose state-controlled economy is heavily dependent on Russian markets.

With the country's biggest companies deprived of their main export market as well as cheap Russian energy, Mr. Lukashenko may for the first time face mass popular discontent. "The Belarussian population is used to getting everything for free, and they will turn away from Lukashenko if he can no longer come up with the goods," said Jaroslav Romanchuk, head of the Mises think tank in Minsk.

But Mr. Lukashenko, a pariah in the West because of his authoritarian policies, could prove more resistant to pressure in the short term than Moscow, which has cultivated ties in Europe.

U.S. Criticizes Venezuela's Nationalization Plan As A Sure Failure (MCT)

By Pablo Bachelet

McClatchy Newspapers, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON - The Bush administration on Tuesday slammed Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's plans to nationalize his country's power and telecommunications companies and demanded that U.S. firms be properly compensated.

"Nationalization has a long and inglorious history of failure around the world," White House spokesman Tony Snow said. "We support the Venezuelan people and think this is an unhappy day for them."

Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for the White House National Security Council, said the United States expects that American companies affected by Chavez's moves will be "promptly and fairly compensated."

Chavez said Monday that it was time to nationalize CANTV, the country's biggest telecommunications company, as well as electricity and perhaps oil interests. The move was widely viewed as a dramatic leftward tilt for the populist leader, who gave no further details.

If the move is carried out, observers say, the Venezuelan state may have to disburse more than $20 billion to foreign investors.

Reaction among investors was immediate, with the Caracas stock exchange, the IBC, plummeting 19 percent Tuesday, the largest drop since record-keeping began in 1993.

CANTV, which traded at nearly $20 a share before Chavez's speech, saw its price tumble 28 percent on Tuesday to just over $12 a share. Shares of The AES Corp., an Arlington, Va., firm that operates a Caracas electric utility, fell 4 percent.

Though Snow and Johndroe condemned the nationalization announcement, the Bush administration avoided broader criticism of the Venezuelan president. U.S. officials, as well as Venezuelan critics, have accused Chavez of undermining democracy at home and other parts of Latin America. Lately, however, the Bush administration has tried to enter into a dialogue with Caracas.

In 1991 the Venezuelan government sold CANTV to Verizon for $1.8 billion amid a wave of privatizations that swept Latin America. As part of its strategy to divest its Latin American holdings, Verizon announced last April that it would sell its 28-percent stake in CANTV to Mexican phone giant Telmex in a $3.7 billion deal that includes assets in Puerto Rico and the Dominican Republic.

It was unclear how Monday's announcement would affect the transaction, which awaits Venezuelan regulatory authorities' approval.

The Venezuelan government has compensated firms for seized assets in the past, but taking over big utility companies could strain even Venezuela's oil-rich pockets.

Gerver Torres, a former Venezuelan Cabinet minister who played a role in the privatization of CANTV, estimates Verizon's stake in the company now at $3.5 billion and the value of AES's Caracas electrical utility at $1.9 billion.

Chavez also hinted at taking over four oil fields, which Torres estimates could be worth as much as $5 billion each.

DOJ_NMG_0115022

He said the takeovers have little economic justification for a poor country and would be "a huge (state) investment for purely ideological reasons."

Chavez's announcement drew the immediate rebuke of Florida Republican Rep. Connie Mack, an outspoken critic of the Venezuelan leader.

"By moving to nationalize key economic sectors, coupled with his continued crackdown on freedom, Chavez is working every day to emulate his mentor, Fidel Castro," Mack said.

Chavez's Economic Plans Set Latin Markets Reeling (WP)

By Juan Forero

Washington Post, January 10, 2007

BOGOTA, Colombia, Jan. 9 -- Financial markets from Buenos Aires to Caracas reeled on Tuesday following Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's announcement that he plans to nationalize some private companies, and the White House warned that it expects U.S.-based corporations to be compensated for any losses.

The U.S. Energy Department also expressed concern after Chavez, who has pledged to accelerate his socialist "revolution," said Monday that he would nationalize telephone and electric utility companies and increase state control over four major oil projects in which American and other foreign companies have invested $17 billion.

At the White House, Gordon Johndroe, a spokesman for the National Security Council, said that "if any U.S. companies are affected, we would expect them to be promptly and fairly compensated." He also said that a nationalization plan, if it proved far-reaching, could be harmful to Venezuela.

Meanwhile, White House press secretary Tony Snow lambasted Chavez's plan, saying: "Nationalization has a long and inglorious history of failure around the world. We support the Venezuelan people and think this is an unhappy day for them."

The Venezuelan leader did not say whether his nationalization plan would mean outright expropriation, higher taxes or majority state control. And as is often the case after Chavez's announcements, Venezuelans scrambled Tuesday to play down the news, with energy officials saying the president was only reiterating existing policy.

But the announcement, made in a bombastic speech in which Chavez also attacked the Catholic Church and insulted the secretary general of the Organization of American States, sent stocks into a tailspin in Venezuela and generated market jitters across Latin America.

In Venezuela, the stock market suffered its biggest loss on record, plunging 19 percent, according to the Bloomberg news agency. The currency was also hit hard. The bolivar, which is officially pegged at 2,150 to the dollar, dropped to more than 4,000 to the dollar on the black market.

Trading on shares of CANTV, Venezuela's largest telephone company, was suspended for 48 hours after shares fell 30 percent. And trading on shares for the electric utility, Electricidad de Caracas, was halted after a drop of more than 20 percent. On the New York Stock Exchange, shares of AES Corp., the Arlington-based company that owns 86 percent of Electricidad de Caracas, fell 86 cents, or 4 percent, on news of the Chavez speech.

In Mexico, the stock prices of Telefonos de Mexico and America Movil SA also dropped. The two companies, both owned by the richest man in Latin America, Carlos Slim, had launched a joint effort to take control of CANTV, whose largest shareholder is now Verizon Communications Inc. Stocks in Argentina and Colombia, the latter a close trading partner of Venezuela's, dipped, as well.

"Obviously, the markets responded," said Maya Hernandez, an analyst with HSBC in New York. She said that although Chavez had said he would move to consolidate his socialist agenda, "what surprised us was the urgency with which he moved, not the direction."

Still, she said, the government has generated numerous questions that officials in Venezuela say should be answered Wednesday, when Chavez is to be sworn in to a third term.

"It's very unclear how he will go about this, especially the nationalization," Hernandez said. "What will he do? Is he going to compensate the companies? Is he going to expropriate the companies?"

Since first being elected in 1998, Chavez has moved quickly to overturn the old social and economic order, sidelining his opponents and spending billions of dollars in oil revenue to found state-run cooperatives and government companies. He has steadily taken a larger share of the pie from companies such as Exxon Mobil, Chevron, Total of France and BP, multinationals drawn to Venezuela in the 1990s. New state lending agencies have been created, and new regulations have been imposed on banks, which are now required to dedicate a percentage of loans to micro-businesses and other sectors identified by the government as important to the economy.

DOJ_NMG_0115023

But Chavez has promised more. Emboldened by a landslide electoral win in December that gave him another six-year term, the former paratrooper has announced he will seek special constitutional "enabling" powers to pass laws affecting the economy, as he did in 2001 when the government first pushed through legislation to increase the state's hold.

Chavez also said the Central Bank, one of the few semi-independent entities in the country, would come under state control as its directors are replaced. The Central Bank controls cash flow and releases economic data, operations the administration wants to wrest away.

One of the bank's outgoing directors, Domingo Maza Zavala, decried the government's moves.

"The Central Bank must be autonomous," Maza said in an interview Tuesday on Globovision, a Caracas news station. "Otherwise, the people will lose confidence in the currency."

In Venezuela, businessmen were bracing for more details about the government's plan while hoping for the best. Many have long complained that private investment has plummeted under Chavez, hurting industry.

Flavio Fridegotto, a businessman speaking by phone from Venezuela, said the government has to understand that it needs foreign companies to operate freely in the country.

"We don't think that they're going to be that radical," he said. "He needs businessmen. They need to take care of the transnationals."

Investors spooked by President Hugo Chavez's nationalization plans rushed to sell off Venezuelan stocks Tuesday, while U.S. officials and financial analysts warned that increasing government control in the power, telecom and oil sectors is a mistake.

Chavez, who begins another six-year term Wednesday after a sweeping election victory, announced plans Monday to nationalize Venezuela's largest telecommunications company, electrical companies and four lucrative oil projects now run by foreign companies in the Orinoco River basin. He also called for a constitutional amendment to strip the autonomy of the Central Bank.

"Chavez has singled out `strategic sectors' for now, but what could come next?" asked Pedro Palma, an economist at Venezuela's IESA business school. He said Chavez has created "a climate of great uncertainty."

Chavez's plans to impose state control over oil upgrading projects in the Orinoco, now controlled by companies like Exxon Mobil Corp., Chevron Corp. and ConocoPhillips Co., also prompted worries in the U.S., Venezuela's largest oil customer.

"I think the goal here is to enforce the sanctity of contracts," U.S. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman said Tuesday, expressing concerns that Chavez could "violate that principle."

White House press secretary Tony Snow also weighed in, saying: "Nationalization has a long and inglorious history of failure around the world. We support the Venezuelan people and think this is an unhappy day for them."

Investors dumped shares in C.A. Nacional Telefonos de Venezuela, or CANTV, whose American Depository Receipts lost nearly 42 percent of their value since Chavez's announcement. On Tuesday alone, CANTV lost $285.7 million in market capitalization.

Shares in Electricidad de Caracas, owned by Arlington, Virginia-based AES Corp., fell by 20 percent Tuesday morning before the Caracas stock exchange suspended trading. And the U.S. dollar hit a new high of 4,000 Venezuelan bolivars on the black market Tuesday, making a joke of the official exchange rate of 2,150 bolivars.

Government seizures of companies don't appear to be likely: With Venezuelan oil selling above $50 a barrel, Chavez's government has plenty of cash to buy out private-sector stakes in key companies.

Chavez also said he would ask Congress — now completely controlled by his supporters — to grant him special powers to enact "revolutionary laws" to carry out the nationalizations and other changes.

Oil companies are accustomed to operating in politically unstable regions and have so far taken a long-term perspective on abrupt changes by Chavez's government. He's already raised taxes and royalties and brought most oil operations under state-controlled joint ventures.

Brazil's state-owned oil company said Tuesday that Chavez's announcement will not affect its plans to invest in Venezuela.

"(This announcement) should not surprise anyone. ... He has been saying he would do this for a long time," Petrobras Chief Executive Sergio Gabrielli told Brazil's state news agency. Petrobras is not involved in the Orinoco upgrading projects but has other oil and gas interests in the country.

But other sectors are likely to be spooked, and that won't help diversify an economy precariously dependent on oil, Palma said.

DOJ_NMG_0115024

CANTV's nationalization also raises doubts about an April agreement by Verizon Communications Inc. to sell its 28.5 percent stake in CANTV to a joint venture of America Movil and Telefonos de Mexico SA controlled by Mexican billionaire Carlos Slim. The sale had been awaiting Venezuelan government regulatory approval.

Shares of both Mexican phone companies fell Tuesday: America Movil lost 2.6 percent and Telmex dropped 2.9 percent on Mexico's benchmark IPC stock index, which closed down 1.9 percent overall.

Chavez has increased state control over many areas of the economy since coming to power in 1999. The foreign exchange controls he imposed in 2003 make it difficult to repatriate earnings and acquire dollars for international payments, and his government seized ranchlands and company assets deemed idle, moves that scared off many long-term investors.

State-run companies have a poor record in Venezuela: areas now serviced by government-run electricity companies suffer frequent blackouts, and before CANTV was privatized, companies had to employ dozens of operators to work the phones because getting a connection was so difficult.

"The state companies have shown that they're hopeless, they don't know how to manage, they're totally incapable of directing any type of company," said Luis Salazar, 56, an economist walking in downtown Caracas.

The privatized CANTV has also provided another key benefit for Venezuelans — one of the few ways to get around currency exchange controls. Investors could buy its stocks in Venezuelan bolivars and sell them on the New York Stock Exchange to acquire dollars. A government takeover of CANTV would close down this option for preserving wealth in an economy where inflation has been running at 17 percent.

Venezuela's electricity sector is largely state-run already and it wasn't clear if Chavez's call to re-nationalize companies privatized before he took power would affect Electricidad de Caracas, which has never been state-run and is owned by Virginia-based AES Corp. Stockholders, however, were not taking any chances and sold off shares.

Chavez has heightened the risk for anyone doing business in Venezuela, said Emilio Medina-Smith, an economist at Venezuela's University of Carabobo.

"The model that the government is going to follow is feasible with oil at $50 a barrel. But is it possible in the medium-term, long-term? Experience tells us no," he said.

Venezuelan Plan Shakes Investors (NYT)

By Simon Romero And Clifford Krauss

New York Times, January 10, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela, Jan. 9 — Verizon Communications had been looking to lighten its exposure to Latin America for some time when it struck a deal in April to sell investments in three properties in Puerto Rico, the Dominican Republic and Venezuela.

Now, it probably wishes it had disconnected its Latin lines even sooner.

The company could possibly lose up to several hundred million dollars, thanks to President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela, who threatened to nationalize the country's main telephone and electricity companies.

Investors reacted with alarm here and in markets in the United States and throughout Latin America on Tuesday as they measured the impact of the plan by Mr. Chávez to nationalize crucial areas of the economy. Memories of past nationalizations during another turbulent era, in places like Cuba and Chile, helped drive down the Caracas stock exchange's main index by almost 19 percent.

Markets across Latin America declined Tuesday, but the drop was modest in most other countries, with the Bovespa index in Brazil and the Bolsa index of Mexico each falling 1.9 percent. The measured reaction appears to reflect the belief of investors that Mr. Chávez, in spite of his words, has limited influence on the economic policies of other governments in the region.

"It has not turned into a widespread contagion," said David Riedel, president of the Riedel Research Group, who follows emerging market stocks. Compared with the 1990s, "you have a more sophisticated base of investors that understand that Mexico is different from Venezuela."

Still, investors sold shares in American, Argentine and Mexican companies vulnerable to the move by Mr. Chávez to take control over entities that had been privatized by previous administrations.

Owners of Venezuelan steel, banking, cement and hotel companies — even the cable car operator that takes tourists to the top of the Ávila mountain here — could be affected by the push toward nationalization, analysts said.

"Chávez is deepening his revolution, but in doing so will he follow the law and compensate the companies whose assets will be nationalized?" said Miguel Octavio, executive director of BBO Servicios Financieros, a brokerage firm, who calculated the costs of taking over companies in the telecommunications, electricity and oil industries, as well assuming their debts, at more than $15 billion.

"It doesn't seem like the government has thought this project out yet," Mr. Octavio said.

DOJ_NMG_0115025

Tony Snow, a White House spokesman, said on Tuesday, "Nationalization has a long and inglorious history of failure around the world. We support the Venezuelan people and think this is an unhappy day for them."

Mr. Chávez further intensified worries with his request for vastly enhanced presidential authority from his Congress. If successful, those new powers would allow him to decree measures into law for one year, bypassing any debate in the legislature, where in any case all 167 deputies are his supporters. On top of that, he made a request to abolish the autonomy of Venezuela's central bank. The Venezuelan government did not immediately contact the American companies, which declined to discuss details.

"There are many ways in which the Venezuelan government could proceed," said Peter Thonis, a spokesman for Verizon. "Since they have not discussed specific plans, it would be premature for us to comment now."

In April, Verizon agreed to sell its 28.5 percent stake in Compañia Anónima Nacional Teléfonos de Venezuela, or CANTV, to América Móvil and Teléfonos de Mexico, for $676 million; the deal has not closed, so Verizon still owns the stake, and it was unclear how much the Chávez government would be willing to pay to take control. Neither América Móvil or Teléfonos de Mexico would comment.

Since taking power eight years ago, President Chávez has imposed stronger political control over the state oil company and has ordered the government to exert greater authority over several ventures with foreign oil firms.

Stopping short of Mexico's nationalization of foreign oil companies in the 1930s, the Venezuelan government has aimed to reach partnership agreements with foreign oil companies while raising its tax rates and royalties on foreign oil companies.

At the very least President Chávez's pledges Monday to nationalize companies in the telecommunications and electricity industries represented another retreat of the trend toward more private control of national economies and free market policies that swept Latin America in the 1990s.

Mr. Chávez has led that reversal, which has taken hold to one extent or another in Argentina and Ecuador, as well as Bolivia.

"We have said for a while that if you are operating a domestic business in Venezuela, you are chronically at risk for something like this happening," said Thierry A. Wizman, a managing director and global emerging market strategist at Bear Stearns in New York. "This is not the first time he has changed the rules for domestic businesses."

Still, Mr. Wizman notes Mr. Chávez cannot afford to seize assets brazenly without compensating corporate owners, because Venezuela owns assets in the United States like Citgo, the energy company, that could be frozen by United States courts.

"He is unlikely to give a fair price, but it won't be outright seizure without compensation," Mr. Wizman said. "He doesn't want to offend everybody simultaneously."

Not all investors are as sanguine, and two American companies, Verizon and the AES Corporation of Arlington, Va., suddenly face the potential of hundreds of millions of dollars of losses. AES declined to comment Tuesday.

The abrupt policy and market jolt in Caracas came amid surging interest in Latin America, Asia and Eastern Europe by investors around the world. Last year, investors in the United States poured $20.3 billion into emerging market funds, up 47 percent from 2005 and accounting for 15 percent of all the money invested in stock-based funds, according to AMG Data Services.

Investors note that even with the recent troubles in Russia, Venezuela and Thailand, conditions remain favorable in Brazil, Chile, China and India. That may explain why stock markets did not buckle across Asia and the declines in Latin America were fairly modest outside Venezuela.

Some investors and business experts expressed optimism that while risks and trepidations were on the rise for business in the region, Mr. Chávez had sometimes stopped short of his pledges in the past.

Others even hoped he would reverse his intentions, or at least fairly pay for the announced nationalization of CANTV.

A sharp fall in the shares of Electricidad de Caracas, a utility controlled by AES, however, seemed to reflect fears that it would be nationalized.

Mr. Chávez's pronouncements prompted expressions of awe and surprise among many of his new cabinet members at their swearing-in ceremony on Monday, suggesting that even they were taken aback. Mr. Chávez also lectured Venezuela's clergy, which has been critical of his plan to refuse a broadcast license to an outspoken television network. He recommended that they read the works of Marx and Lenin, as well as the Bible, "to learn what socialism means."

Mr. Chávez has suddenly moved forward with a revolution that seemed to unfold in slow motion in previous years. He pushed for socialist-inspired economic policies like price controls to slow inflation and the assembly of alliances with Latin American nations with leftist leaders that now include Bolivia, Cuba, Ecuador and Nicaragua.

Since his re-election to the presidency in December with a 23-point margin, Mr. Chávez has quickly accelerated his efforts to remake Venezuelan society. He has dismissed moderate cabinet ministers and his vice president. He also has begun speaking of the need to reform the nation's public schools to focus more on socialist ideals, and of guiding the Venezuelan consumer away from "luxurious consumption" of imported goods.

Few obstacles stand in the way of Mr. Chávez, making his request for enhanced presidential power, as well as a request to abolish the autonomy of Venezuela's central bank, somewhat perplexing. Mr. Chávez and his economic deputies already effectively control monetary policy, for instance by capping interest rates on loans, though they have to go through the bureaucratic procedure of asking the central bank for its reserves of hard currency if they want them.

With 80 billion barrels of conventional crude oil, or about 7 percent of the world's reserves, Venezuela remains the fourth-largest oil supplier of the United States. Much of Mr. Chávez's ambitious project to move Venezuela toward socialism will depend on petroleum revenue, with oil by far the country's leading export.

It was no small surprise that even as Mr. Chávez announced his startling assortment of economic policies this week, his oil minister, Rafael Ramírez, was calling on OPEC to hold a special meeting to discuss falling oil prices. On Tuesday, oil traded near an 18-month low at $55.64 a barrel in New York, down nearly 9 percent since the start of the year.

Venezuela's Ch?vez Tightens Grip (AP)

By Thomas Catan

AP, January 10, 2007

CARACAS, VENEZUELA

As he begins his third presidential term Wednesday, Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez has laid the groundwork for a sharp leftward shift and launched a clampdown on dissent, in what analysts see as a broad-based effort to strengthen his grip on power.

Emboldened by his resounding reelection victory on Dec. 3, Mr. Chávez announced plans this week to nationalize power and telecom companies as part of an accelerated move toward socialism. This comes after he had begun to act on longstanding threats to close media outlets aligned with the opposition, refusing to renew the broadcast license of Venezuela's oldest commercial television station, RCTV.

In the past week, he has purged his cabinet of ministers deemed insufficiently radical, bringing in a new group of loyalists that includes his brother, Adan. He has begun to merge the more than 20 parties in his governing coalition into a single force under his control. And, under a controversial new law, he is set to take control of nongovernmental organizations that could oppose his government.

"I don't think there is a lot of ambiguity about what Chávez is doing," says Michael Shifter, an analyst at Interamerican Dialogue in Washington, DC. "He wants to hold on to power for as long as possible, and even though he just won a resounding reelection, he doesn't want to take any chances of dissent building." Crackdown on dissent

The Venezuelan president's decision to close RCTV, which has been broadcasting since 1953, has been met with strong criticism from the Organization of American States (OAS), the Catholic Church, and from press freedom campaigners like Reporters Without Borders. José Miguel Insulza, OAS secretary general, said the move smacked of "censorship against freedom of speech and a warning to other media, encouraging them to limit their operations so as not to face the same fate."

But Chávez, who referred to Mr. Insulza as an "idiot," says he will defy any international criticism.

Chávez is also moving to take control of civic groups, some of which have been critical of his government. Under a proposed law now in Congress, NGOs will have to reregister with the government, even if they have been operating legally for years. Foreign funding will have to pass through the government, and NGOs would have to open their files to anyone that requests it. Human rights campaigners say it would effectively end their work.

"If approved, it will [effectively] outlaw all nongovernmental organizations" working in Venezuela, says Liliana Ortega of the Venezuelan human rights group, Cofavic. "There will only be groups approved by the government."

Amnesty International has called on Chávez to revoke the bill, with a spokesperson saying it would "restrict the legitimate work of human rights defenders in Venezuela." But Chávez shows no signs of retreating.

Chávez is also gearing up to change the constitution to allow his indefinite re-election - and has vowed to remain in power until 2021.

Mr. Shifter believes Chávez's effort to change the constitution could meet with substantial opposition within his own coalition. That could be a reason why Chávez is moving to take control of both supporters and critical NGOs.

"He would be in better shape to assure his power if there are no independent, critical civic organizations that could offer a channel for dissent and challenge to the regime," says Shifter.

Chávez's defenders deny his latest moves constitute an autocratic power-play. They say the measures are needed to defend the achievements of the "Bolivarian Revolution" from its enemies, such as those who launched a failed coup against Chávez in 2002.

The bill to regulate NGOs, for example, was introduced after Súmate, a voter education group involved in the 2004 recall drive against Chávez, was found to have received more than $30,000 from the US-funded National Endowment for Democracy. They similarly accuse RCTV and other private broadcasters of having supported the failed 2002 coup and subsequent oil strike against the government.

"They became spokesmen for the opposition and allied themselves with the coup-plotters of 2002," says Martín Pacheco, media coordinator for the Chávez reelection campaign. Growing blacklist

With political passions on the rise, Chávez's opponents say they are bracing themselves for a renewed crackdown. Some of the 3.5 million Venezuelans on a political blacklist compiled by his government two years ago say they have noticed a recent upswing in harassment by government officials.

Rocío San Miguel, a lawyer in Caracas, appeared on the blacklist in early 2004 after signing a petition to recall the president. She was fired from her job at Venezuela's border agency a few weeks after the blacklist was posted on the Internet. Last month, her husband, a colonel in the Air Force, was barred from entering his air base.

"Not only have they ended my career, now they are ending his," says Ms. San Miguel, adding that she is now more fearful than ever. "The day after the election, my daughter asked me, 'Is something going to happen to you now that Chávez has won?' "

Opponents say the list is used to screen applicants for jobs, social benefits, identity cards, scholarships, and credit from state banks. Government aides deny this. "It's absurd to think there is political discrimination here," says Mr. Pacheco.

One woman, who requested anonymity for fear of reprisals, says she was fired from her government job just before the Dec. 3 election, along with several others.

"That list is used all the time," she says. "People are very scared." Toward socialism

CARACAS, VENEZUELA - As Venezuela embarked on another six years under Hugo Chávez, the president announced plans to nationalize power and telecommunications companies. He also said he wanted a constitutional amendment to strip the Central Bank of its autonomy and would soon ask the National Assembly, solidly controlled by his allies, to approve "a set of revolutionary laws" by presidential decree.

"We're heading toward socialism, and nothing and no one can prevent it," he said in a televised address after swearing in his new cabinet on Monday.

Chávez also said lucrative oil projects in the Orinoco River basin involving foreign oil companies should be under national ownership. Critics say he is following in the footsteps of Cuban leader Fidel Castro.

Venezuela Inc.'s Hostile Takeover (NYT)

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela — the very portrait of a modern Latin American strongman — is not content to exercise near-total political and military control of his country. Now he is tightening his grip on the Venezuelan economy. That's bad news for foreign investors, but even more so for the Venezuelan people who will have to pay the price for an economy plagued by increasing inefficiency and corruption.

Mr. Chávez announced this week that he would nationalize electricity and telecommunications companies. Venezuela's biggest telecommunications company is partly owned by Verizon Communications. Its largest publicly traded electricity company is controlled by another American company, the AES Corporation. Mr. Chávez also declared his intention to take control of four multibillion- dollar oil projects with significant investments from foreign companies.

State control is rarely an efficient way to run companies. And nationalizations are not a good way to encourage further foreign investment. Mr. Chávez is already using the state-controlled oil company to reward his cronies at the expense of getting the best return on Venezuela's most lucrative resource.

Exactly what form these nationalizations will take remains unclear. Whatever Mr. Chávez is planning, he needs to fairly compensate shareholders. And while the Bush administration needs to condemn any seizure of American assets, it should choose its words carefully so as not to play into Mr. Chávez's Yanqui-baiting game.

The administration can best advance American interests, and those of the people of Latin America, through more active engagement of the region's many democracies. It also needs to press ahead with trade agreements and other forms of economic assistance and cooperation. That is the smartest way to counter Mr. Chávez's demagoguery.

Mr. Chávez's latest moves serve as yet another reminder of why America needs to curb its insatiable appetite for oil. The United States is the biggest buyer of Venezuelan petroleum products. If a powerful Hugo Chávez is against U.S. interests, we should stop paying for his Russian fighter jets and helicopters — and his nationalizations — with our gas-guzzling cars and trucks.

Venezuela's Leap Backward (WP)

The Washington Post, January 10, 2007

BEFORE HIS reelection as Venezuelan president last month, Hugo Chavez declared that his goal was to receive 10 million votes and thereby a mandate to greatly accelerate what he calls a 21st-century socialist revolution. In the end, despite a one-sided campaign that left a majority of Venezuelans believing they might be punished if they did not cast their ballots for him, Mr. Chavez received only 7 million votes; an opposition candidate won 4 million. The president's push to transform his country nevertheless is well underway -- and the model looks a lot like Cuba in the 20th century.

In the past couple of weeks Mr. Chavez has shaken up his cabinet to eliminate quasi-independent voices, said he will form a single ruling party and announced plans to govern by decree in the coming year. He has said he will close down the country's most popular television network, which has been critical of his government, eliminate the independence of the Central Bank, and nationalize telephone and electricity companies -- including one partly owned by Verizon and another by Alexandria-based AES. The commercial code will be changed; one minister said the intent is to place new limits on the profits of the remaining private companies. Though some private media will remain, Andres Izarra, the head of a state network and a close collaborator of Mr. Chavez's, declared that the regime's plan is "a communications and information hegemony for the state."

The flurry of activity has provoked understandable qualms among Latin America's democratic leaders, some of whom have bent over backward until now to give Mr. Chavez the benefit of the doubt. Jose Miguel Insulza, the Chilean who was elected secretary general of the Organization of American States with Venezuelan support, issued a statement last week saying Mr. Chavez's promise to revoke the license of RCTV "gives the appearance of a form of censorship against free expression" and "has no precedent in the recent decades of [Latin] democracy." The unfailingly vulgar president responded by publicly calling the OAS leader " pendejo," a Spanish word that could be translated as "idiot" but is not nearly so polite.

Some will see in Mr. Chavez's actions a threat to U.S. interests. Certainly, those who caution that it is unwise to count on Venezuela to continue supplying up to 15 percent of U.S. oil imports have a point. If assets of U.S. companies are seized without fair compensation, Venezuela should be subject to penalties. But the main threat posed by Mr. Chavez is to Venezuela's 26 million people. If he follows through on his threats, they can look forward to steadily diminishing freedom and -- if the history of socialism is any guide -- national impoverishment.

Cuban Economists Envision Role For Markets In Post-Castro Era (WSJ)

By Bob Davis

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

With Fidel Castro ailing and absent from the public stage, some influential Cuban intellectuals are laying plans for a more market-oriented approach to fortify the island's ailing communist economy.

The debate over economic experimentation, squelched a decade ago by the Castro regime, offers a glimpse of what a post-Castro Cuba could look like. Now, it is intensifying at a time when Castro disciple Hugo Chávez is steering Venezuela toward the kind of hardline socialism that has failed to produce prosperity in Cuba.

Together, the Cuban economists' proposals would cut down on state interference in businesses and aim to wring more productivity out of the island nation's economy. Among the steps under discussion: decentralizing control, expanding the power of managers at privately owned agricultural cooperatives, extending private ownership to other sectors, boosting investment in infrastructure and increasing incentives to workers.

None of the plans would shuck communism for capitalism or open the island further to foreign investment -- which economists outside Cuba say are critical for the island to prosper. But the fact that the government is permitting -- and perhaps even encouraging -- the debate suggests regime officials might find these kinds of changes acceptable, though it may take Mr. Castro's death to put them into action.

"We are in the midst of a process of debate, which is cautious and controlled, but is happening for the first time in many years," said Pedro Monreal, a senior professor at the Center for Research on the International Economy in Havana. "It's an historic moment," says Julia Sweig, a Cuba specialist at the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington. "The Cuban regime feels confident enough to have voices it once purged be at the center of the economic debate on reform."

The proposals are prompted by the continuing economic privation in Cuba, where state salaries don't come close to covering living costs. But the planning is made more immediate by the 80-year-old Mr. Castro's continuing health problems. The Cuban government hasn't disclosed the nature of Mr. Castro's illness -- a Spanish surgeon recently said it isn't cancer -- but he hasn't been seen in public since temporarily relinquishing power at the end of July, and he is unlikely to return to his presidential duties.

Phony Numbers

DOJ_NMG_0115029

Cuba claims its economy grew at 12.5% last year, after an 11.8% gain in 2005, which would make it one of the world's fastest-growing nations, but critics say the numbers are as phony as those once produced by the Soviet Union. Carmelo Mesa-Lago, a professor emeritus at the University of Pittsburgh, who has long tracked the Cuban economy, says Cuba engages in statistical sleights of hand, such as double-counting entries, changing base years to yield better results and failing to show how it estimates revenue produced by Cuban doctors and other professionals working overseas.

"I don't see anything [in Cuban economic statistics] that would warrant this magic rate of growth," says Mr. Mesa-Lago, who figures the government is probably inflating its growth statistics by at least two-thirds.

Whatever growth Cuba manages owes a lot to Venezuela, which provides it with subsidized oil -- some of which Cuba re-exports -- and employs tens of thousands of Cuban professionals. President Chávez sees himself as an heir to Mr. Castro in leading a bloc opposed to U.S. policies, and earlier this week said he would nationalize his country's largest telecommunications and electric-utility companies, aping Mr. Castro's early moves in his turn to communism.

Even with the aid, most Cubans are able to scrape by only by working in black-market enterprises or because of cash sent by relatives in the U.S. and Europe. The disconnect between the Cuban government's claims and the Cuban's people's bleak living standards may increase popular pressure for change. "The Cuban people can believe that the economy is growing statistically, but it's not growing in their homes," says Rafael Hernández, editor of the magazine "Temas" -- "Issues" in English -- a scholarly quarterly in Havana that writes about the Cuban political-economy and society.

Mr. Hernández says the government should pick up the renovation agenda that Mr. Castro and his brother Raúl, now Cuba's acting president, shut down in 1996 for straying too far from socialist ideology and for potentially undermining political control. At the time, the regime approved agricultural co-ops -- which survive today -- where the state continues to own the land but members own the business and equipment. These entities can sell a portion of their output in farmer's markets at prices higher than those set by the state. Now, Mr. Hernández says the co-ops should be used as a model for other sectors.

Small textile or shoe makers should be able to start co-ops that sell in private markets, he said. Currently, the government permits only families to own such private businesses; a co-op would be able to expand and hire employees outside the family. But under Mr. Hernández's concept, co-op members wouldn't be permitted to sell shares in their venture, which might accelerate capital accumulation. "Co-ops are socialist," he says. "You could do it without violating socialist principles."

Omar Everleny Pérez, a senior researcher at the Center for the Study of the Cuban Economy in Havana, agreed "there should be an increase in the space for the private sector and cooperatives, not only in agriculture, but in other sectors," although he isn't as specific as Mr. Hernández or as confident that change is coming.

Mario González-Corzo, an economist at the City University of New York's Lehman College, says the cooperatives would have to be decentralized and revamped to have much of an economic impact. Currently, the government subsidizes co-ops' purchases of fertilizer, machinery and other goods, and sharply limits how much they can sell privately. Managers have to bargain extensively with government officials to get permission to change prices.

Mr. Monreal, the Cuban international economist, says the island's economy needs a more thorough makeover, along the lines of what China and Vietnam managed. Cuba is deficient in "calculation, motivation and innovation," he says. By that he means Cuba doesn't let markets determine prices, provide enough incentives for firms and enterprises to earn money, or encourage Cubans to take economic risks. Following a China model would require far more decentralization and acceptance of private markets than Cuba has ever permitted.

Even to well-connected Cubans, the direction of the debate is difficult to follow.

'Black-Box Process'

"It's a kind of black-box process," says Mr. Monreal. He views Raúl Castro's decision last month to examine agricultural problems, but to defer any decisions for six months until an economic survey is completed, as a template of how the regime will incorporate changes. The president's brother, who has served for decades as defense minister, has frequently backed economic overhauls and the companies owned by Cuba's armed forces -- including tourism firms, cigar marketers and consumer-goods retailers -- are among the best-managed on the island.

But 76-year-old Raúl lacks his brother's commanding presence, and needs to move cautiously to broaden support. He appears to be trying to do so by allowing the economic debate to proceed. In December, he told university students in Havana that they should debate issues "fearlessly."

Cuban economic history under Fidel Castro is a tale of timid liberalization and retrenchment, with purges of reformers caught taking the wrong positions. During one crackdown in 1996, Mr. Monreal, Mr. Hernández and others were forced out of their jobs. Mr. Hernández said he believes that even if the political winds once again shift against him, "that wouldn't shut down the expressions of opposing views."

It may take Mr. Castro's death -- or at the very least, a public declaration that he is permanently incapacitated -- to give government officials the confidence to institute even modest economic retoolings. Mr. Castro has relentlessly opposed any changes that smack of capitalism, and believes Venezuelan oil subsidies have reduced the island's economic problems and need for market-based incentives.

In the past few years, Mr. Castro has led drives to recentralize the economy and stamp out corruption, which has often meant more repression of Cuba's tiny private sector. For instance, he fired thousands of gas-station attendants he suspected of siphoning off gasoline to sell on the black market, and replaced them with "social workers" -- Cuban youths doing government service. The government has even banned private citizens from starting businesses as masseuses and clowns.

Ortega Returns To Power In Nicaragua (AP)

By Traci Carl, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 10, 2007

Daniel Ortega, who led a Marxist government that spent the 1980s fighting U.S.-backed insurgents, returns to power Wednesday promising to respect free trade and private business and maintain relations with Washington.

Yet he will be sworn in as president in a ceremony attended by some of the United States' biggest enemies, including Venezuela's Hugo Chavez and a representative of Iran.

The inauguration is a reflection of Ortega's delicate balancing act. He has pledged to remain close to his leftist allies while assuring opponents he is no longer the radical who imposed a state-run economy, sparked runaway inflation and fought off a bloody, decade-long rebel movement.

The U.S., which openly opposed Ortega during his presidential campaign, has grudgingly welcomed the president-elect's more moderate stance. On Monday, President Bush called Ortega and said he wanted to put the past aside and strengthen the Central American nation's democracy.

Gordon Johndroe, a White House spokesman, said Bush "expressed his strong commitment to the well-being of the Nicaraguan people and our continued interest in a relationship with Nicaragua."

The U.S. government so despised Ortega during the 1980s that aides to President Reagan secretly sold arms to Iran's radical Islamic government to finance clandestine aid for the Contra rebels who were trying to overthrow Ortega.

Bush's father, who followed Reagan as president, sneeringly described Ortega as "this little man" and as an "unwanted animal at a garden party" when both attended a Central American summit in 1989 — a year before Nicaraguans voted Ortega out of office.

U.S. Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt will head the U.S. delegation at Wednesday's inauguration.

Ortega met privately Tuesday with Leavitt. Chatting amicably together in front of reporters beforehand, Leavitt told Ortega he wanted to "make clear that our desire is to work with you."

Ortega replied that he "hopes that this will be the first of several visits."

But one of the most high-profile guests will be Chavez, Venezuela's socialist president who plans a whirlwind visit with offers of economic and political support for Nicaragua, the second-poorest in the Western Hemisphere after Haiti.

Chavez, who calls Bush "the devil," has promised Nicaragua 32 desperately needed electricity plants, low-interest loans to the poor from a branch of his state development bank and help in improving health and education.

Chavez also will receive an honorary doctorate from Nicaragua's National Engineering University.

Other inauguration guests include Bolivian President Evo Morales, an ally of Chavez and Cuban leader Fidel Castro. Morales has expressed doubts about the U.S. drug war in the Andean region and recently announced that U.S. citizens would have to obtain visas to visit Bolivia. The U.S. is wary of Morales' ties to Chavez and Castro.

Nicaraguan officials earlier said that hardline Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has defied international criticism of his country's nuclear program, also planned to attend.

They later said Ahmadinejad would not be coming, and that a lower-level representative would take his place.

The president-elect has been guarded about the direction his new government will take.

While repeatedly assuring investors he doesn't plan radical changes, he also refused to name most of his Cabinet until inauguration day.

He has made few public comments since the week of his Nov. 5 election, speaking mostly through his wife and spokeswoman, Rosario Murillo.

On Tuesday, he met privately with representatives of South Korea, Saudi Arabia and Japan and planned a dinner for arriving dignitaries.

Ortega will be sworn in at the Omar Torrijos Nonaligned Plaza, which he constructed as president in the 1980s after his Sandinista movement drove out dictator Anastasio Somoza.

It is the same plaza where Ortega conceded defeat to Violeta Chamorro after losing the presidential election on Feb. 25, 1990.

DOJ_NMG_0115031

Ortega's Sandinista party has the largest number of lawmakers in Congress, but it is short of the majority needed to pass legislation on its own.

Analysts speculate he might try to renew his past coalition with the party of former President Arnoldo Aleman, who was convicted in 2003 of money laundering and embezzlement.

During the new Congress' first session Tuesday, lawmakers from all opposition parties repeatedly warned Ortega not to try to return Nicaragua to the dark days of his previous leadership.

"The Sandinistas better not fall victim to the totalitarian temptations of before," warned Wilfredo Navarro of Aleman's party.

In an exclusive interview with The Associated Press, outgoing President Enrique Bolanos predicted Ortega's government would be "as strong as it was in the 1980s."

"It won't be a democracy, because democracy requires divided power," said Bolanos, who was jailed twice under Ortega's previous rule and had much of his property seized. "We will see what happens."

Many of Ortega's opponents had threatened to leave the country if he returned to power, but that hasn't happened. Many seem to be waiting to see what his new government will do.

Private security guard Leonel Zuniga, 32, said he is optimistic Ortega will make good on his promises to help the poor without radical policies.

"If he cuts off ties with the United States, he won't be able to do anything," Zuniga said. "Without their support, the country is paralyzed."

Latest Push To End Doha Talks Welcomed (FT)

By Alan Beattie

Financial Times, January 10, 2007

The transatlantic push to conclude the troubled Doha round of global trade talks got a wary welcome from the head and some members of the World Trade Organisation on Tuesday.

Details of any deal to reconcile the US and European Union positions remain elusive, but Pascal Lamy, director-general of the WTO, said the determination expressed this week by US president George W. Bush and José Manuel Barroso, president of the European Commission, was a marked advance.

Similar expressions of enthusiasm from Mr Bush and other heads of government during the Group of Eight summit in St Petersburg last summer were not followed by concessions at the negotiating table, and the Doha talks were suspended in July amid bitter transatlantic recriminations.

But Mr Lamy said prospects were better. “The signs we are seeing now are qualitatively different from what we heard last year,” he told the Financial Times. “The political chemistry is beginning to work.”

Since last July, Mr Lamy said, “the consequences of failure and the risk of a surge of protectionism have become more evident to governments”. Finance ministers had weighed in after becoming more alarmed at the threat to global growth.

But other participants in the round underlined that details of how US and EU positions would be reconciled were still absent.

Dave Salmonsen, trade lobbyist for the American Farm Bureau, said the mood music sounded better, but the US farm community had not been consulted on any further offers of reductions in tariffs by the EU or subsidies by the US. “There is no difference from where we were in July,” he said. “We need to see a lot more market access from the Europeans in return for reductions in domestic support.”

India, the most sceptical of the countries that could influence the talks, is yet to give its views on the prospect of a revived EU-US deal. The first substantial resistance to a deal will most likely come from Delhi, which is a member of the Doha round’s core group of four negotiating partners along with Brazil, the US and EU.

The Indian commerce ministry, which has repeatedly said it will not expose millions of its small, poor farmers to international competition, declined to comment on Tuesday.

France, which has organised a group of 14 EU member states opposing more cuts in European farm protection, reiterated its position that the US would be unlikely to make the cuts in subsidies required.

One official from a sceptical EU nation questioned Washington’s willingness to cut farm subsidies further. “We find it very hard to understand on what basis [EU trade commissioner Peter] Mandelson is so optimistic,” the official said. “There is great doubt the US administration can put its money where its mouth is.”

But other officials noted that if Germany swung its weight behind a deal, it might overcome opposition from agricultural protectionists in the EU.

Trade Official To Meet With Head Of WTO (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2007

WASHINGTON -- In a fresh sign of the intensifying efforts to revive moribund global trade talks, U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab will travel to Geneva late this week for consultations with Pascal Lamy, head of the World Trade Organization.

The one-day visit Friday follows a series of round-robin discussions Ms. Schwab has held with major players in the so-called Doha Round of talks. In the last two weeks, Ms. Schwab has conferred directly with top trade officials from Brazil, Europe and Japan, and has reached out by telephone to India's lead negotiator. A senior U.S. trade official said the meeting with Mr. Lamy will help lay the groundwork for additional discussions to be held later this month at an international conference in Davos, Switzerland. The official said there have been no breakthroughs, but suggested major players have shown "more willingness" to begin hammering out details.

The WTO is overseeing the Doha Round of talks, which were suspended last summer amid sharp differences over how best to lower barriers to trade in farm products, manufactured goods and services.

The U.S., EU and other major players in the WTO are hoping to resume formal negotiations soon and conclude a deal before President Bush's trade-negotiating authority expires at the end of June. Renewal of that authority, which allows the president to submit trade deals to Congress for approval without amendment, is not considered certain with Democrats now in charge on Capitol Hill.

"People are realizing we're down to brass tacks," the U.S. trade official said.

Separatists Admit To Madrid Airport Attack But Stand By Cease-Fire (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

MADRID, Jan. 9 — The armed Basque separatist organization ETA said Tuesday that the “permanent cease-fire” it announced last March was still in effect, even as it formally claimed responsibility for the deadly bomb attack on Madrid’s main airport terminal 10 days ago.

ETA made its two-pronged declaration in a statement sent to Gara, the pro-independence Basque-language newspaper that is often used as a vehicle for ETA communiqués.

“ETA affirms that the permanent cease-fire started on March 24, 2006, still stands,” ETA said in a long statement that was summarized by Gara. “It claims responsibility for the attack at Barajas,” the Madrid airport. In the wake of the bombing, Spain’s Socialist government said it had canceled the peace effort that began with ETA after the cease-fire took effect, arguing that ETA had miscalculated and that violence was incompatible with negotiation.

The view that there could be no truce with violence was reiterated Tuesday by Judge Baltasar Garzón, Spain’s most prominent investigative magistrate, who has spent nearly two decades looking into and building criminal cases against terrorist networks in Spain.

“ETA gambled that if there were a terrorist attack, it would strike fear in the government and win concessions,” Judge Garzón said in an interview. “We would never give in to that kind of blackmail. ETA terrorists don’t seem to understand that. They do not yet accept that they are criminals.”

ETA, which the State Department and the European Union have called a terrorist organization, said in its declaration that it had not intended to cause casualties in the attack, which killed two Ecuadoreans and injured about two dozen people. It blamed the Spanish authorities for not properly evacuating the five-story parking garage where it had parked a van full of explosives.

“The aim of that armed action was not to cause victims,” the ETA statement said. It added that ETA had made three telephone calls more than an hour before the attack, warning that it was impending, describing the explosives-filled van and giving its location.

ETA also blamed Spain’s Socialist government for “placing obstacles” in the democratic process, and asked it to end what ETA called police and political pressure, the statement said.

Prime Minister José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero had made reaching a peace accord with ETA after decades of violence one of his policy priorities. The attack on the parking lot of the state-of-the-art airport not only struck one of the country’s most visible signs of progress and modernity but also unleashed a torrent of criticism of Mr. Zapatero by his political enemies, who accused him of weakness and naïveté.

When Mr. Zapatero inaugurated the new terminal — the largest in Europe — with much fanfare early last year, he described it as a “marvel” that reflected Spain’s “image of modernity.”

Mr. Garzón denied that the attack reflected a failure of intelligence or security by the authorities in Spain or France, where ETA also operates and where the van was stolen. “It’s very difficult to put an end to an organization like this that has had infrastructural and logistical support for 40 years,” he said.

DOJ_NMG_0115033

Before the ETA statement was made public on Tuesday, the police arrested two people suspected of being ETA members in southern France linked to the discovery of arms and explosives before and after the attack. They were the first arrests since the attack, although it was not known whether they had been involved.

Violence Precedes Bangladesh Vote (CSM)

By Mahtab Haider

The Christian Science Monitor, January 10, 2007

DHAKA, BANGLADESH

The democracy that this small South Asian state has struggled to preserve for two decades appears to be facing one of its most severe tests this week.

The streets of the capital resemble a war zone, with police and protesters exchanging volleys of tear-gas shells and Molotov cocktails. Hundreds have been injured just weeks before parliamentary elections scheduled for Jan. 22. On the roads outside Dhaka, transport blockades have nearly shut down the country.

Police action peaked on Tuesday, when officers charged with batons and fired over 50 rounds of tear-gas shells and rubber bullets at protesters, who responded with improvised explosives. Wednesday, 60,000 Army troops plan to fan across the country on routine pre-election duty, but armed with the authority to arrest anyone without a warrant.

At the heart of the violent street clashes is a struggle for power between the country's two major political parties, the Awami League and the Bangladesh National Party (BNP), over the upcoming elections.

Attempts to reconcile the two groups have so far failed, leading analysts to suggest that the violent political crisis may deepen in coming months. Although Bangladesh has seen four elections since democracy was restored here in 1991, experts say the Awami League and the BNP seem are undermining its fragile democracy by politicizing the judiciary, the bureaucracy, and the civil society institutions that can ensure fair elections.

The Awami League is leading a grand alliance to boycott the polls, accusing their BNP archrivals of rigging the voter list with phantom names during their five-year tenure, which ended in Oct. 2006.

Last month, a study by the Washington-based National Democratic Institute for International Affairs (NDI) reported that the voter rolls have approximately 12.2 million names that are either "errors or duplicates."

"A voters list containing [only] two-thirds of the population strains credibility," says Owen Lippert, the NDI's representative in Bangladesh.

The League and its allies also claim that the BNP and its coalition partners, the religious, right-wing Jamaat-e-Islami, have planted party bureaucrats in the country's Election Commission and in the pre-election interim government that Bangladesh's constitution has empowered to run the nation.

The League demands that the elections be deferred until there is a fresh voter list and the interim government's chief resigns - a request that the BNP has threatened to resist at all costs. The League has already announced that it is forming nationwide election-resistance committees to scupper the vote.

"The problem is that the Constitution states that elections must be held within 90 days of the caretaker government assuming power, but it also states that a finalized voter list must be published as a pre-condition to elections," says Shahdeen Malik, a Supreme Court attorney who heads the School of Law at Dhaka's BRAC University.

The Awami League and its allies insist that polls must be delayed to correct and update the voter list, while the BNP has threatened agitation if the caretaker government does not hold the elections within the stipulated 90 days.

Because the caretaker government assumed power from the BNP on Oct. 28, 2006, the 90-day limit will expire on Jan. 25.

"Even if the current crisis is resolved through mediation, we will continue to witness a slow degradation of democracy in the years to come, as none of these parties have any respect for democratic culture," says Dr. Ataur Rahman, a political analyst and professor of political science at Dhaka University.

"It is the invasion of politics by big business that is at the heart of our political crisis," says Mr. Malik. "Both parties now have scores of powerful businessmen in their ranks who look forward to lucrative deals during a tenure in power."

Analysts point to the two parties' efforts to win the loyalty of the popular former dictator H.M. Ershad, whose influence is still far-reaching. Mr. Ershad is accused of having stolen tens of millions of dollars in state funds through crony contracts and downright theft. After he was ousted in 1991, the government filed a slew of charges against him.

While the BNP was in power, it dropped a number of corruption charges against Ershad to win his political support. When Ershad switched his loyalty to the Awami League, however, the BNP-run judiciary resumed proceedings against Ershad, which disqualified him from participating in the upcoming polls.

Although the Awami League had accepted the initial voter list and submitted its nominations to the election commission in December, it changed its position a week later. The League accused the BNP of leaning on the judiciary to resume proceedings.

THIRTEEN ALLEGED MEMBERS OF MS-13 GANG INDICTED ON RACKETEERING CONSPIRACY CHARGES

WASHINGTON – Thirteen alleged members of the street gang called La Mara Salvatrucha, or MS-13, have been indicted by a federal grand jury in the Middle District of Tennessee on charges that they conspired to participate in a violent RICO enterprise responsible for killings and other violent crimes in Nashville, Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher of the Criminal Division and U.S. Attorney Craig S. Morford for the Middle District of Tennessee announced today.

The one-count racketeering indictment names the following 13 individuals, all of whom are currently in federal or state custody:

- OSCAR SERRANO, a/k/a "Diablin"
- ESCOLASTICO SERRANO, a/k/a "Chito"
- OMAR HIRBIN GOMEZ, a/k/a "Lil Homie"
- DAVID ALEXANDER GONZALEZ, a/k/a "Psycho"
- ERNESTO ISAI MENDEZ-TOVAR, a/k/a "Joker," a/k/a "Choey"
- FRANCISCO DAGO MENDEZ, a/k/a "Silent"
- WALTER HERNANDEZ, a/k/a "Spanky"
- HENRY GARBALLO-VASQUEZ, a/k/a "Cuervo"
- ELISEO IGLESIAS, a/k/a "Smokey"
- RONALD FUENTES, a/k/a "Spia"
- ERICKA CORTEZ, a/k/a "Shorty"
- GEOVANNI PENA, a/k/a "Rata," and
- JOSE ALFARO, a/k/a "Liche."

"This indictment strikes at the heart of the MS-13 organization in Nashville, and continues our efforts to put members of gangs all across the nation on notice that they will be held responsible for the violence and mayhem they cause," said Assistant Attorney General Fisher. "We will utilize the same tools we used to put Mafia leaders behind prison bars to confront the threat posed by violent criminal enterprises like the MS-13."

DOJ_NMG_0115036

"The facts alleged in this indictment reveal that MS-13 is a well-organized and extremely violent criminal enterprise that required an aggressive, cooperative response from local and federal authorities," said U.S. Attorney Morford. "The indictment reflects the commitment of the Department of Justice and my office to continue to work with all law enforcement partners to ensure that those who engage in violent street gang activities in Middle Tennessee go to jail and do so on the most serious charges possible."

U.S. Attorney Morford praised the cooperative partnership and outstanding efforts of the Nashville Metropolitan Police Department's Gang Suppression Unit, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF), U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) at the Department of Homeland Security, the Davidson County District Attorney General's Office, the U.S. Attorney's Office in the Middle District of Tennessee, and the Department of Justice's newly formed National Gang Squad.

The indictment alleges that the defendants were members or associates of the MS-13 street gang, a violent international criminal organization composed primarily of immigrants or descendants of immigrants from El Salvador. The purpose of this enterprise was to preserve and protect the power, territory and profits of the MS-13 enterprise through violent assault, murder, threats of violence, and intimidation.

The indictment further alleges that MS-13 originated in Los Angeles and quickly spread across the country, including to Middle Tennessee. It currently includes approximately 10,000 members in at least 10 states, Mexico, Honduras and El Salvador, making it one of the largest street gangs in the United States.

MS-13 gang members regularly engage in violent criminal activity, including murders, assaults, and witness intimidation in order to maintain membership and discipline within MS-13 and rivalries against other gangs, according to the indictment. The violent nature of the enterprise and its members is reflected by one of their mottos: "Mata, Viola, Controla" ("Kill, Rape, Control").

The indictment further alleges that MS-13 was organized in "cliques," including the Thompson Place Locos Salvatruchos clique (TPLS), which operated in Nashville. The TPLS and other cliques allegedly worked together cooperatively to commit acts of violence and their members operated under the umbrella rules of MS-13.

According to the indictment, MS-13 members met on a regular basis to report on acts of violence committed by their members with the goal of inciting and encouraging even more violence. Leaders of MS-13 cliques from across the United States allegedly met to discuss gang rules, gang business, problem resolution, and issues involving members of different cliques, and to promote overall unity between MS-13 gang members. Members had to pay dues which were used to support MS-13 gang members imprisoned in various places within the United States, including Middle Tennessee, as well as those in El Salvador.

The indictment further alleges that Nashville-based MS-13 members and associates killed three people, attempted to kill at least seven others, and plotted to shoot or kill several more during 2006 in Nashville.

If convicted, the defendants face a maximum penalty of life in prison on the RICO conspiracy charge.

An indictment is merely an accusation and the defendants are presumed innocent until proven guilty at trial beyond a reasonable doubt.

The case is being prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorney Jimmie Lynn Ramsaur of the Middle District of Tennessee and Department of Justice Trial Attorneys David Jaffe and John Han from the Criminal Division's Gang Squad. Assistance was provided by agents and prosecutors from the National Gang Targeting, Enforcement and Coordination Center (GangTECC). GangTECC is led by the Criminal Division, and is comprised of representatives from the ATF, Bureau of Prisons, the Drug Enforcement Administration, the FBI, the U.S. Marshals Service and ICE, among others. The center coordinates overlapping investigations, ensures that tactical and strategic intelligence is shared between law enforcement agencies, and serves as a central coordinating center for multi-jurisdictional gang investigations involving federal law enforcement agencies.

THE GRAND JURY CHARGES:

Introduction

1. La Mara Salvatrucha, also known as the MS-13 gang (hereafter "MS-13"), is a gang composed primarily of immigrants or descendants of immigrants from El Salvador, with members operating throughout the Nashville, Tennessee metropolitan area, and elsewhere.

2. The name "Mara Salvatrucha" is a combination of several slang terms. The word "Mara" is the term used in El Salvador for "gang." The phrase "Salvatrucha" is a combination of the words "Salva," which is an abbreviation for "Salvadoran," and "trucha," which is a slang term for "fear us," "look out" or "heads up."

3. In the United States, the MS-13 gang originated in Los Angeles, California, where MS-13 members engaged in turf wars for the control of drug distribution locations. MS-13 quickly spread to states across the country, including Tennessee.

4. MS-13 is a national and international criminal organization with approximately 10,000 members regularly conducting gang activities in at least ten states and the District of Columbia, Mexico, Honduras and El Salvador. MS-13 is one of the largest street gangs in the United States. Gang members actively recruit members, including juveniles, from communities with a large number of immigrants from El Salvador. In the United States, MS-13 has been functioning since at least the 1980s.

5. At all times relevant to this Indictment, the following individuals were some of the members and/or associates of MS-13: OSCAR SERRANO, a/k/a "Diablin,"

ESCOLASTICO SERRANO, a/k/a "Chito," OMAR HIRBIN GOMEZ, a/k/a "Lil Homie," DAVID ALEXANDER GONZALEZ, a/k/a "Psycho," ERNESTO ISAI MENDEZ-TOVAR, a/k/a "Joker," a/k/a "Choey," FRANCISCO DAGO MENDEZ, a/k/a "Silent, "WALTER HERNANDEZ, a/k/a "Spanky," HENRY GARBALLO-VASQUEZ, a/k/a "Cuervo," ELISEO IGLESIAS, a/k/a "Smokey," RONALD FUENTES, a/k/a "Spia," ERICKA CORTEZ, a/k/a "Shorty," GEOVANNI PENA, a/k/a "Rata," and JOSE ALFARO, a/k/a "Liche."

6. At all times relevant to this Indictment, in order to join MS-13, members were required to complete an initiation process, often referred to as being "jumped in" or "beat in" to the gang. During that initiation, other members of MS-13, some who were juveniles, would beat the new member until a gang member finished counting aloud to 13.

7. At all times relevant to this Indictment, members of MS-13 from time to time signified their membership by wearing tattoos reading "MARA SALVATRUCHA," "MS," "MS-13," or similar tattoos, often written in gothic lettering. The gang colors of MS-13 were blue and white, and members often wore clothing, particularly sports jerseys, with the number "13" or with numbers that, when added together, totaled 13, such as "76." MS-13 members referred to one another by their gang names and often did not know fellow gang members except by their gang names.

8. At all times relevant to this Indictment, members of MS-13 frequently engaged in criminal activity, including, but not limited to, murders, assaults and threatening and intimidating of witnesses. MS-13 members were required to commit acts of violence to maintain membership and discipline within the gang and against rival gangs. Participation in criminal activity by a member, particularly violent acts directed at rival gangs or as directed by the gang leadership, increased the respect accorded to that member, resulted in that member maintaining or increasing his position in the gang, and could have resulted in a promotion to a leadership position. "Mata, Viola, Controla," (or kill, rape, control) is one motto or saying commonly used by the "MS-13" gang.

9. At all times relevant to this Indictment, MS-13 was organized in "cliques," including, but not limited to, the Thompson Place Locos Salvatruchos ("TPLS"). The MS-13 cliques worked together cooperatively to commit these acts of violence. Members of some MS-13 cliques occasionally attended meetings of other MS-13 cliques. The cliques operated under the umbrella rules of MS-13.

10. At all times relevant to this Indictment, MS-13 members met on a regular basis to, among other things, report on acts of violence committed by their members with the goal of inciting and encouraging further violence. Leaders of cliques of MS-13 from across the United States and within regions of the United States would meet to discuss gang rules and gang business, to resolve problems or issues among gang members of different cliques, and to unite gang members from across the country.

11. At all times relevant to this Indictment, MS-13 members paid dues which were collected at gang meetings. MS-13 members collected dues for the benefit of, and to be provided to, MS-13 gang members who were imprisoned in the United States, both inside and outside of the Middle District of Tennessee, and in El Salvador.

12. At all times relevant to this Indictment, MS-13 gang members routinely communicated about gang activities with gang members in other states using cellular telephones and the United States mails. MS-13 members also used transnational and international money wire transfers to conduct and promote gang activities.

The Racketeering Enterprise

13. MS-13, including its leadership, members and associates, constituted an "enterprise" as defined in Section 1961(4) of Title 18, United States Code, that is, a group of individuals associated in fact that engaged in, and the activities of which affected, interstate and foreign commerce. The enterprise constituted an ongoing organization whose members functioned as a continuing unit for the common purpose of achieving the objectives of the enterprise.

Purposes of the Enterprise

14. The purposes of the enterprise included the following:

a. Preserving and protecting the power, territory and profits of the enterprise through the use of intimidation, violence, including assaults and murder, and threats of violence;

b. Promoting and enhancing the enterprise and its members' and associates' activities;

c. Keeping victims and potential victims in fear of the enterprise and in fear of its members and associates, through violence and threats of violence;

d. Providing financial support and information to the gang and gang members, including those who were incarcerated for committing acts of violence or other offenses; and

e. Providing assistance to other gang members who committed crimes for and on behalf of the gang in order to hinder, obstruct and prevent law enforcement officers from identifying the offender, apprehending the offender and trying and punishing the offender.

DOJ_NMG_0115043

The Racketeering Conspiracy

15. Beginning on a date unknown to the Grand Jury, but at least as of in or about 1997, and continuing through in or about December 2006, in the Middle District of Tennessee and and elsewhere, OSCAR SERRANO, a/k/a "Diablin," ESCOLASTICO SERRANO, a/k/a "Chito," OMAR HIRBIN GOMEZ, a/k/a "Lil Homie," DAVID ALEXANDER GONZALEZ, a/k/a "Psycho," ERNESTO ISAI MENDEZ-TOVAR, a/k/a "Joker," a/k/a "Choey," FRANCISCO DAGO MENDEZ, a/k/a "Silent, "WALTER HERNANDEZ, a/k/a "Spanky," HENRY GARBALLO-VASQUEZ, a/k/a "Cuervo," ELISEO IGLESIAS, a/k/a "Smokey," RONALD FUENTES, a/k/a "Spia," ERICKA CORTEZ, a/k/a "Shorty," GEOVANNI PENA, a/k/a "Rata," and JOSE ALFARO, a/k/a "Liche," together with persons known and unknown to the grand jury, each being a person employed by and associated with MS-13, an enterprise engaged in, and the activities of which affected, interstate and foreign commerce, together with others known and unknown to the Grand Jury, did knowingly and intentionally conspire to conduct and participate, directly and indirectly, in the conduct of the affairs of the enterprise through a pattern of racketeering activity, as defined in Sections 1961(1) and (5) of Title 18, United States Code, which pattern of racketeering activity consisted of multiple acts involving murder in violation of Tennessee Code Sections 39-12-101, 39-12-103, 39-13-201, 39-13-202, and 39-13-210; acts involving murder in violation of Indiana Code Sections 35-41-5-2, 35-42-1-1, 35-42-1-2, 35-42-1-3, 35-42-1-4; and multiple acts indictable under 18 U.S.C. §§ 1505 (obstruction of justice) and 1512 (witness tampering).

Manner and Means of the Conspiracy

16. It was part of the conspiracy that each defendant agreed that a conspirator would commit at least two acts of racketeering activity in the conduct of the affairs of the enterprise.

17. It was further part of the conspiracy that the defendants, as gang members of MS-13, would regularly meet as required with other MS-13 gang members to pay their dues and discuss, among other thing, past acts of violence and other crimes committed by gang members against rival gang members and others; to notify one another about gang members who were arrested or incarcerated; to discuss the disciplining of MS-13 gang members; to discuss police interactions with gang members; to share with one another the identities of individuals who may be cooperating with law enforcement and propose actions to be taken against those individuals; to plan and agree upon the commission of future crimes, including murders, robberies, and assaults, and means to cover up these crimes; and to reinforce gang rules.

18. It was further part of the conspiracy that the defendants and other members and associates of MS-13 agreed to purchase, maintain and circulate a collection of firearms for use in criminal activity by MS-13 members.

19. It was further part of the conspiracy that the defendants and other members and associates of MS-13 agreed that acts of violence, including murder and attempted murder, would be committed by members and associates of MS-13 against rival gang members and to impose discipline within MS-13 itself, and on other occasions as deemed necessary.

20. It was further part of the conspiracy that the defendants and other members and associates of MS-13 agreed that members and associates of MS-13 would conceal their criminal activities and obstruct justice, including by threatening witnesses.

Overt Acts

21. In furtherance of the conspiracy and to achieve the objectives thereof, the conspirators performed and caused to be performed the following overt acts, among others, in the Middle District of Tennessee and elsewhere:

a. In or about October 2005, OSCAR SERRANO, ESCOLASTICO SERRANO, OMAR HIRBIN GOMEZ, DAVID ALEXANDER GONZALEZ, ISAI MENDEZ-TOVAR, FRANCISCO DAGO MENDEZ, WALTER HERNANDEZ, HENRY GARBALLO-VASQUEZ, ELISEO IGLESIAS, RONALD FUENTES, GEOVANNI PENA, and JOSE ALFARO conspired and agreed to kill rival gang members.

b. On or about January 20, 2006, ERNESTO ISAI MENDEZ-TOVAR and WALTER HERNANDEZ shot and killed Mario A. Villa-Senor.

c. On or about April 12, 2006, DAVID ALEXANDER GONZALEZ, JOSE ALFARO, ELISEO IGLESIAS and an individual known to the grand jury with initials M.M. shot and wounded an individual believed to be a rival gang member, and his girlfriend.

d. On or about May 21, 2006, OSCAR SERRANO, ESCOLASTICO SERRANO, JOSE ALFARO, HENRY GARBALLO-VASQUEZ, OMAR HIRBIN GOMEZ, DAVID ALEXANDER GONZALEZ, FRANCISCO DAGO MENDEZ, and other MS-13 gang members attempted to kill an individual they believed to be a rival gang member.

e. On or about May 22, 2006, OSCAR SERRANO, ESCOLASTICO SERRANO, JOSE ALFARO, HENRY GARBALLO-VASQUEZ, and other MS-13 gang members participated in the threatening and shooting of a confidential informant who had previously provided information about MS-13 activities in Maryland to federal law enforcement agents, as well as a federal grand jury and petit jury sitting in the District of Maryland.

f. On or about June 5, 2006, ELISEO IGLESIAS possessed a loaded firearm.

g. On or about June 5, 2006, OSCAR SERRANO and RONALD FUENTES fled after a routine traffic stop and led Nashville, Metropolitan Police on a high-speed vehicular chase through crowded streets.

h. On or about June 10, 2006, HENRY GARBALLO-VASQUEZ shot at a group of individuals believed to be rival gang members.

i. On or about June 17, 2006, ESCOLASTICO SERRANO, OMAR HIRBIN GOMEZ, an individual known to the grand jury with initials M.M., and other MS-13 gang members shot and killed Angel Flores, a/k/a "Penguino," and Christian Rios, who were believed to be rival gang members.

j. On or about August 7, 2006, an individual known to the grand jury with initials M.M. had ERICKA CORTEZ obtain a .22 caliber rifle.

k. On or about August 7, 2006, ERICKA CORTEZ possessed a .22 caliber rifle when she was stopped by Nashville Metropolitan police.

l. On or about August 14, 2006, ESCOLASTICO SERRANO gave a firearm to a confidential informant to sell.

m. On or about August 19, 2006, ESCOLASTICO SERRANO, OMAR HIRBIN GOMEZ, DAVID ALEXANDER GONZALEZ, FRANCISCO DAGO MENDEZ, GEOVANNI PENA, an individual known to the grand jury with initials M.M., and other MS-13 gang members met with one another and paid gang membership dues.

DOJ_NMG_0115047

n. On or about August 19, 20 and 28, 2006, ESCOLASTICO SERRANO, DAVID ALEXANDER GONZALEZ, FRANCISCO DAGO MENDEZ, an individual known to the grand jury with initials M.M., and other MS-13 gang members discussed and planned the murder of a Brown Pride member who worked at a Tyson's Food Plant outside Nashville, Tennessee.

o. On or about August 20, 2006, FRANCISCO DAGO MENDEZ, DAVID ALEXANDER GONZALEZ and an individual known to the grand jury with initials M.M., met to identify a new gang meeting location and shot some pillars under a bridge.

p. On or about August 25, 2006, in Huntingburg, Indiana, ESCOLASTICO SERRANO, OMAR HIRBIN GOMEZ, FRANCISCO DAGO MENDEZ and other MS-13 gang members attempted to kill individuals believed to be rival gang members.

q. On or about August 28, 2006, DAVID ALEXANDER GONZALEZ and an individual known to the grand jury with initials M.M. planned the murder of rival gang members to be committed at the Tropicana Night Club in Nashville, Tennessee.

r. On or about August 29, 2006, DAVID ALEXANDER GONZALEZ possessed a firearm.

s. On or about September 3, 2006, GEOVANNI PENA and an individual known to the grand jury with initials M.M. attempted to kill individuals believed to be rival gang members.

t. On or about September 4, 2006, GEOVANNI PENA and an individual known to the grand jury with initials M.M. attempted to kill an individual believed to be a rival gang member.

DOJ_NMG_0115048

u. On or about September 6, 2006, ERICKA CORTEZ provided false information to a detective with the Nashville Metropolitan Police Department who was investigating the shooting of September 4, 2006, in order to protect gang members who were involved in that shooting.

v. On or about September 9, 2006, ESCOLASTICO SERRANO, OMAR HIRBIN GOMEZ, and other MS-13 gang members met with one another and paid gang membership dues.

w. On or about October 20, 2006, ESCOLASTICO SERRANO, OMAR HIRBIN GOMEZ, and other MS-13 gang members met with one another and paid gang membership dues.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Defense Makes Closing Argument At Hamas-Funding Trial. The Chicago Tribune (1/11, Bush, Ahmed, 617K) reports, "Muhammad Salah was trying to provide humanitarian aid to the Palestinian people when he became a pawn of Israeli officials seeking to influence U.S. policy, his lawyer argued Wednesday. … An attorney for Salah's co-defendant, Abdelhaleem Ashqar, also gave his final argument, telling jurors that Ashqar resisted Israel's occupation of Palestinian territories but insisted on following the law." Salah's "arrest, torture and confession was an intrigue developed at the highest levels of the Israeli government to convince the FBI that Hamas was developing cells in the U.S., Deutsch said."

The AP (1/11, Robinson) notes Ashqar lawyer William Moffit said, "He's a Palestinian patriot but that doesn't mean he's a killer," and Salah attorney Michael Deutsch "urged jurors not to believe admissions Salah made while being questioned by Israel's Shin Bet security agents at a prison in Ramallah. He said Salah was tortured and said anything the agents wanted to hear. … He said Israel used Salah to get publicity and pressure the U.S. government to crack down on the Hamas fundraising network in this country."

US Defends CIA Document Secrecy At Trial. The AP (1/11, Neumeister) reports, "The CIA cannot reveal 'alternative interrogation methods' used on terrorists because doing so would cause exceptionally grave damage to national security by telling enemies how the agency gathers intelligence, the government has told a judge." The AP continues, "In a document dated Friday and filed in U.S. District Court in New York, the CIA said it cannot reveal more than what President Bush said last summer about the detention and questioning of terrorism suspects." The AP adds, "The American Civil Liberties Union had asked the court to require the CIA to turn over two Justice Department memos discussing interrogation methods and a presidential order concerning the CIA's authorization to set up detention facilities outside the United States. … On Wednesday, ACLU attorney Amrit Singh said in a statement that the CIA court document 'uses national security as a pretext for withholding evidence that high-level government officials in all likelihood authorized abusive techniques that amount to torture.' … He added: 'This declaration is especially disturbing because it suggests that unlawful interrogation techniques cleared by the Justice Department for use by the CIA still remain in effect. The American public has a right to know how the government is treating its prisoners.'"

Siraj Family Arrested On Immigration Charges. As reported in yesterday's New York Times, the Washington Post (1/11, A3, Shulman, 690K) reports, "A day after a man was sentenced to 30 years in prison for conspiring to bomb Manhattan's Herald Square, his parents and sister were detained by federal immigration officials seeking to deport them" to their native Pakistan. Shahwar Matin Siraj's "family has lived in the United States since 1999 and has been seeking asylum since 2003, said their attorney, Mona Shah." ICE spokesman Mark Thorn "could not say why the family was detained the day after the sentencing. … But Shah charged that the arrests effectively muted the family's protest after the sentencing of the son."

Advocates Say Guantanamo Detainees "Driven Insane" By Conditions. The Financial Times (1/11, Dinmore) reports lawyers and rights activists say prisoners at Guantanamo Bay "are being driven insane by a tightening of conditions and the situation of their indefinite detention without trial." The advocates "also doubt whether the Bush administration intends to carry out its stated desire to close the facility." Today is the fifth anniversary of the first delivery of detainees to Guantanamo. The AP (1/10, Fox) writes that five years on, Guantanamo remains a "source of outrage," quoting Center for Constitutional Rights President Michael Ratner saying, "It has become iconic in the Muslim world and the wider world…for everything that the United States has done wrong in the war on terror."

Detainee Says "I Have Been Destroyed" By Guantanamo. The Los Angeles Times (1/11, 850K) runs an op-ed comprised of excerpts from letters Guantanamo detainee Jumah al-Dossari "wrote to his attorneys. Its contents have been deemed unclassified by the Department of Defense." Dossari writes, "At Guantanamo, soldiers have assaulted me, placed me in solitary confinement, threatened to kill me, threatened to kill my daughter and told me I will stay in Cuba for the rest of my life. They have deprived me of sleep, forced me to listen to extremely loud music and shined intense lights in my face. They have placed me in cold rooms for hours without food, drink or the ability to go to the bathroom or wash for prayers. They have wrapped me in the Israeli flag and told me there is a holy war between the Cross and the Star of David on one hand and the Crescent on the other. They have beaten me unconscious. … Why, after five years, is there no conclusion to the situation at Guantanamo? For how long will fathers, mothers, wives, siblings and children cry for their imprisoned loved ones? For how long will my daughter have to ask about my return? The answers can only be found with the fair-minded people of America. I would rather die than stay here forever, and I have tried to commit suicide many times. The purpose of Guantanamo is to destroy people, and I have been destroyed."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Senators Push For Greater Data-Mining Oversight. The Washington Post (1/11, D3, Nakashima, Klein, 690K) reports a bill introduced yesterday by Sens. Russell Feingold and John E. Sununu "requires federal agencies to report the development and use of data-analysis technologies to 'discover predictive or anomalous patterns indicating criminal or terrorist activity.' Lawmakers introduced similar bills twice in recent years, but they languished in a Republican-controlled Congress." Meanwhile, "The new chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Patrick J. Leahy, vowed that Congress would take a much more active role in the oversight of government surveillance and data-collection programs." His comments came during a hearing that "underscored the sensitivity of the debate about privacy and security." During testimony, Jim Harper, director of information policy studies at the Cato Institute, singled out predictive data mining, saying that it "'cannot catch terrorists' because there are too few 'terrorist patterns' to base a model on. … Leslie Harris, executive director of the Center for Democracy and Technology, a privacy advocacy group, said the administration was 'bewitched with this technology' although there was 'very little evidence' that predictive data mining works."

The AP (1/10) reported Harris "was among a handful of think-tank scholars and privacy advocates who testified Wednesday about government data-mining — the computerized searching of large banks of information for clues to the identity of terrorists or criminals. Their broadest area of agreement was that Congress needs to know much more about what the government is doing in data-mining. … Noting that congressional auditors in 2004 found 199 data-mining programs operating or planned in federal agencies, Leahy said, 'Congress is overdue in taking stock of the proliferation of these databases.'"

The Washington Times (1/11, Hudson, 88K) reports DHS officials hope to use data mining "to screen airline passengers and at border crossings. Mr. Sununu said data mining can be an essential tool to detect patterns that point to terrorist activity. 'However, it is imperative that we understand the impact of such technology on Americans' personal privacy,'" Sununu said.

ICE Detains Family Of Convicted NYC Subway Bomb Plotter. The Washington Post (1/11, A3, Shulman, 690K) reports, "A day after a man was sentenced to 30 years in prison for conspiring to bomb Manhattan's Herald Square, his parents and sister were detained by federal immigration officials seeking to deport them" to their native Pakistan. Shahwar Matin Siraj's "family has lived in the United States since 1999 and has been seeking asylum since 2003, said their attorney, Mona Shah." ICE spokesman Mark Thorn "could not say why the family was detained the day after the sentencing. … But Shah charged that the arrests effectively muted the family's protest after the sentencing of the son."

Hospital Conference To Examine Emergency Communications. The Washington Times (1/11, Borgess, 88K) reports Washington area hospital representatives "will meet today and tomorrow to discuss how they can improve communication during mass-casualty events. Organizers say hospitals rarely have privileged access to information during a large-scale emergency and often must rely on the press for updates. Therefore, hospital workers often have difficulty gauging the extent of a crisis and preparing themselves for a surge of patients." The conference will feature a keynote address from Dr. B. Tilman Jolly, the Department of Homeland Security's associate medical officer.

Administration Lines Up Against TSA Screeners' Union. The Washington Post's (1/11, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "A House plan to give collective bargaining rights to about 43,000 airport screeners at the Transportation Security Administration will be opposed by the White House. The proposal to roll back a Bush administration ban on unions at the TSA was included in a bill to implement many of the remaining recommendations of the 9/11 Commission. The bill was approved 299 to 128 late Tuesday and was sent to the Senate.

Judge Orders Additional Mediation In Hurricane Katrina Insurance Suits. The AP (1/11, Mitchell) reports from Gulfport, MS, "A federal judge on Wednesday ordered into mediation dozens of lawsuits policyholders filed against insurance companies after Hurricane Katrina." The AP continues, "Several of the cases sent to mediation, which accuse the insurance companies of denying their claims, are involved in recent settlement talks between State Farm Fire & Casualty Co., Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood and policyholders' lawyers. … People with direct knowledge of the settlement talks told The Associated Press this week that State Farm, Mississippi's largest home insurer, is considering paying hundreds of millions of dollars to settle more than 600 lawsuits and resolve thousands of other disputed claims." The AP notes, "A mass settlement would be the first of its kind to follow the wave of litigation spawned by Katrina. … Hundreds of Mississippi homeowners have sued State Farm and other insurers for refusing to cover billions of dollars in damage from Katrina's storm surge. … The 83 lawsuits ordered into mediation Wednesday include ones filed on behalf of U.S. Senator Trent Lott and Representative Gene Taylor, whose Gulf region homes were destroyed by the 2005 hurricane. Each sued State Farm for denying their claims."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Unveils New Strategy For Iraq. In a nationally televised address Wednesday night, President Bush announced plans to send more than 20,000 more American troops to Iraq. The New York Times (1/11, A1, Sanger, 1.16M) reports the President "conceded for the first time that there were not enough American or Iraqi troops in Baghdad to halt the capital's descent over the past year into chaos." Bush also "dropped his insistence that the United States was making progress toward building a workable Iraqi democracy." But "he rekindled his argument that 'failure in Iraq would be a disaster for the United States.'" The Los Angeles Times (1/11, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports Bush acknowledged "that his current strategy had failed," and the Washington Post (1/11, A1, Abramowitz, Wright, 690K) says he used "some of his sharpest language to date." In addition to more troops, adds the Post, Bush's plan "includes an allocation of "more than $1 billion for three programs to create jobs and help reconstruction in neighborhoods secured by Iraqi and US forces." Nine new provincial reconstruction teams will be run jointly by the Pentagon and State Department "to help rebuild the country from the bottom up, including schools, local government and political interest groups." Reflecting the revised strategy's "heavy focus on only two areas of the country, six of the reconstruction teams will be in Baghdad and three will be in volatile Anbar province, home to the Sunni insurgency and al-Qaeda extremists," the State Department said. To aid in the effort, about 150 new personnel will be added to the 250 already staffing the reconstruction teams.

The Financial Times (1/11, Luce, Sevastopulo) reports, "A senior US administration official said there would be new rules of engagement for Iraqi and US commanders that would enable them to succeed where previous efforts to pacify Iraq's capital had failed - most recently last summer. Iraq's government would send three new brigades into Baghdad within the next month in addition to the six already there. The US would add five brigades to its Baghdad presence. The US would also send an additional 4,000 troops to Anbar province, which is the seat of al-Qaeda in Iraq."

ABC (1/10, Gibson) called is "a rather sober address," containing "a message to the American people asking for patience, sacrifice and resolve -- and also asking for a bit of faith that this plan of sending even more troops, about 21,500 more troops, to Iraq, and counting on the Iraqis to take the lead in providing security in Baghdad and ending sectarian violence, faith that that plan can work." The speech also carried "a message to the Iraqi government that our patience and his patience, the President's patience, is not infinite, not open-ended, and that he is counting on the Iraqis to show the strength and to show the will to make this plan work."

Most media analysts greeted Bush's new strategy with marked skepticism. The Baltimore Sun (1/11, Davis, 257K) sums up its coverage saying Bush "has repeatedly laid out revised goals and strategies for Iraq only to see them crumble amid sectarian violence and a mounting death toll," while the Chicago Tribune (1/11, Tackett, 617K) reports Bush "finds himself asking for more -- of the military, of Congress, of the Iraqi government and of the American people -- but possessing so much less." He "lacks the safety net of a Republican-run Congress, the political capital of which he famously boasted, and most decidedly, the support of the public weary of the war's grim narrative." The New York Times (1/11, Stolberg, 1.16M) says that with his plan, Bush "is not only inviting an epic clash with the Democrats who run Capitol Hill," he is also "ignoring the results of the November elections, rejecting the central thrust of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group and flouting the advice of some of his own generals, as well as Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq."

The Washington Post (1/11, Baker, 690K) says this morning, "As his reelection campaign geared up in 2004…Bush was asked to name his biggest mistake. He couldn't think of one. By the time he was asked again last year, he had thought of one, his inappropriate 'tough talk.' Last night, Bush acknowledged that some of the most fundamental assumptions underlying the US venture in Iraq were wrong." That "evolution tracks the sharp deterioration not only of the US position in Iraq, but also of Bush's position at home."

Moreover, says McClatchy (1/11, Douglas, Hutcheson), "many of Bush's new proposals…have been tried before and failed." A second McClatchy (1/11, Strobel, Youssef) analysis adds "many analysts" said "they feared Bush's modified tactics are too little and too late to make up for past blunders in Iraq." USA Today (1/11, Page, 2.27M) calls the plan "not so much a change of direction as an acceleration," adding that "except for the troop increase, none of the ideas is new." The Washington Times (1/11, Scarborough, 88K) makes runs a similar story under the headline "Past Troop Surges In Iraq Produced Mixed Results."

The Los Angeles Times (1/11, Levey, Gaouette, 850K) says the President's plan "has further united Democrats," while Republicans "have splintered in the face of widespread popular discontent over the war and Bush's plans to escalate it." The AP (1/11, Raum) reports "for Bush, the decision to send more troops to Iraq -- rather than begin a withdrawal of combat forces as recommended last month by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group -- is a huge gamble. If it fails, he will have few if any options left." Bush, said Tim Russert on NBC (1/10), "made it double or nothing. He'll get the escalation in troops but it really is his last chance. … A skeptical public" has "turned against this war. He has to ask for one last chance for this plan to work. It's going to be very uphill." Similarly, CBS (1/10, Axelrod) asked last night, "The question you have to ask is, if this doesn't work, where does the President go from here?"

Bush's plan, says the Washington Post (1/11, A1, Ricks, Tyson, 690K), "is likely to touch off a more dangerous phase of the war, featuring months of fighting in the streets of the Iraqi capital, current and former military officials warned. … The prospect of a more intense battle in the Iraqi capital could put US military commanders in exactly the sort of tough urban fight that war planners strove to avoid during the spring 2003 invasion of the country." The Post adds, "An Army officer who recently commanded a battalion in Baghdad predicted last night that the plan would fail because…Maliki and his government 'will do things to maintain protection' of Sadr's forces. He also dismissed as 'happy talk' the president's notion that the predominantly Shiite Iraqi army and police could reassure pro-insurgent Sunni neighborhoods by conducting foot patrols through them." Along similar lines, an AP analysis (1/11, Woodward) says Bush's rhetoric is "hard to square with facts in the region." For example, "Bush portrayed the ordinary people of the Middle East as being behind US goals in Iraq, in his speech to the nation Wednesday night." And "he declared the need to address Iran's and Syria's support for insurgents, without acknowledging his refusal to engage either country diplomatically, as many US allies and the Iraq Study Group proposed." Bush, adds the AP, "declared 'al-Qaida is still active in Iraq' and a failed US mission would give such terrorists a safe haven from which to plot attacks against Americans. Although few quarrel with that appraisal now, it is also the case that Iraq -- contrary to assertions at the time -- was not a magnet for al-Qaida before the US invasion."

Under the headline "Promising Troops Where They Aren't Really Wanted," the New York Times (1/11, Tavernise, Burns, 1.16M) reports Bush is challenging "public opinion at home by committing more American troops," and "is confronted by a paradox: an Iraqi government that does not really want them." Iraqis "fear that an increased American troop presence, particularly in Baghdad, will be accompanied by a more assertive American role that will conflict with the Shiite government's haste to cut back on American authority and run the war the way it wants." Another New York Times story (1/11, Gordon) says Bush "is in effect betting that Iraqi leaders are committed to building a multisectarian state, and his strategy will stand or fall on that assumption." The plan "depends on the good intentions and competence of a Shiite-dominated Iraqi government that has not demonstrated an abundant supply of either." In a similar assessment, the Wall Street Journal (1/11, A1, Dreazen, Jaffe, King, 2.04M) says the success of Bush's "controversial" strategy "depends on the cooperation of an Iraqi government paralyzed by sectarian tensions and a Democratic Congress that appears increasingly eager to challenge the administration's handling of the war."

Plans' "Core Elements" Were Part Of A Hadley Memo From Last November. According to the Washington Post (1/11, A13, Kessler, 690K), "core elements of the plan were contained in a classified memo" that NSA Stephen Hadley "sent to members of Bush's Cabinet on Nov. 8 -- a month before the bipartisan Iraq Study Group issued its report." The Hadley memo called for an "intensive press on Saudi Arabia to play a leadership role on Iraq, connecting this role with other areas in which Saudi Arabia wants to see US action." As part of the new plan, the Post notes that Secretary Rice "will travel to the Middle East tomorrow, stopping in Riyadh, to enlist greater Arab support for the Iraqi government -- and to try to jump-start Israeli-Palestinian talks, a key concern of Saudi leaders."

GOP Lawmakers Not Of One Mind. GOP Sens. John McCain and Lindsey Graham came out strongly in favor of Bush's plan. McCain said on CNN's Larry King Live (1/10), "I thought it was an excellent speech. The President acknowledged that the strategy has failed. It's a new strategy. … I believe those who are calling for withdrawal have the obligation to tell us what we do in the region when it descends into chaos." Asked if his support for the surge could hurt his presidential campaign, McCain said, "I would much rather lose a campaign than lose a war." On Fox News (1/10, Wallace), McCain said, "It's three years that I've been calling for these increases. I believe that this can succeed. I really do." Graham said on CNN's Larry King Live (1/10), "I agreed with the President before he made the speech. … I look at it this way: What's the result of a failed state in Iraq to our future as a nation, to the region as a whole? If Iraq fails and if we lose this war, I think the biggest winner is Iran. … My biggest motivation is not about my re-election in 2008. I support the President."

GOP Sen. John Warner, whose opinion could carry significant sway on undecided Republicans, said on CNN's Larry King Live (1/10), "I found the speech to be credible and sincere. And it does lay down a plan that reflects a lot of study by the executive branch, a lot of advice and opinion that the President took into consideration. … And I think it's now the responsibility of the Congress, particularly the Senate, to give equal study and objectivity to this speech and come up with our own opinions."

Sen. Gordon Smith, also a Republican, had already broken with Bush's Iraq policies. Last night, he said on MSNBC (1/10, O'Donnell), "The President and I just have a difference of opinion. He believes that security has to precede politics. I believe politics by Iraqis to decide federalism, resource-sharing and human rights -- these things will produce security. And I think we've become somewhat of a crutch, a shield, to delay the day of decision on the part of Iraqis. … I earnestly hope and pray I'm wrong and the President's right. I want him to succeed."

The Chicago Tribune (1/11, Zuckman, 617K) notes that in addition to Smith and Warner, GOP senators such as Norm Coleman, Olympia Snowe and George Voinovich have also expressed concerns about increasing troops levels. And USA Today (1/11, Jackson, 2.27M) reports "Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kansas, a potential 2008 presidential candidate, said committing more troops is the wrong answer. 'Iraq requires a political rather than a military solution,' he said." The Washington Times (1/11, Curl, Dinan, 88K) also surveys Congressional reaction to the speech.

Democrats Blast Bush's Proposals. On TV last night, Democrats took issue with Bush's proposal to boost US troop levels. House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer said on CNN (1/10), "I didn't hear a new policy. I heard more of the same."

Sen. Barack Obama said on CNN's Larry King Live (1/10), "There was one area where I completely agree with the President. And that is that American troops have done everything that's been asked of them. They have done an outstanding job. And I don't doubt the President's sincerity in thinking that this third or fourth approach to the problem is the right one. But I did not see anything in the speech or anything in the run-up to the speech that provides evidence that an additional 15,000 to 20,000 more US troops is going to make a significant dent in the sectarian violence that's taking place there." Obama made very similar comments on MSNBC (1/10, Olbermann).

Sen. Dianne Feinstein said on CNN's Larry King Live (1/10), "My heart fell as I heard it, because I see no evidence from the past that this kind of surge is going to work. From the change of rules of engagement, what I see is an escalation. And I think it's very unrealistic to think that military and police and our people can go into a place like Sadr City and not have some form of conflagration. I've got to say, I'm really disappointed."

Sen. Jack Reed said on CNN (1/10), "This is not a really a new strategy, it's just more of the old strategy: trying to take a military approach -- primarily -- to what is a fundamentally political problem which the Iraqis must solve."

Former Sen. John Edwards said on CNN's Larry King Live (1/10), "I think what America needs from their president under the circumstances is, first, trust. They need to feel like they can trust their president. … What I saw was a very academic, analytical speech, making the case for putting more troops in Iraq. And I think that's not what America needed from its president right now. I think the President is profoundly wrong. I think escalating the war is a huge mistake. But beyond that, what's happened is that the trust in the President has eroded. And America has to feel in their gut that whether he's right or wrong, the President's telling the truth."

More Criticism Of Bush Speech. The New York Times (1/11, A30, 1.16M) editorializes, "Bush told Americans last night that failure in Iraq would be a disaster. The disaster is Mr. Bush's war, and he has already failed. Last night was his chance to stop offering more fog and be honest with the nation, and he did not take it. Americans needed to hear a clear plan to extricate United States troops from the disaster that Mr. Bush created. What they got was more gauzy talk of victory in the war on terrorism and of creating a 'young democracy' in Iraq. In other words, a way for this president to run out the clock and leave his mess for the next one."

The Washington Post (1/11, A24, 690K) editorializes, "Bush is right to recognize that U.S strategy in Iraq is not working and to seek a different policy. He is right to insist that the United States cannot afford to abandon the mission and to reject calls for an early withdrawal. But the new plan for the war Mr. Bush outlined last night is very risky. It envisions new missions and dangers for U.S. troops and counts on unprecedented military and political steps by the Iraqi government. The plan is likely to cause a spike in U.S. casualties, while the chances that it will stabilize Iraq are far lower." Bush "could have adopted a course that would have attracted broad support domestically and from Iraqis. That was the strategy -- outlined with small variations by U.S. military commanders, the Iraqi government and the Iraq Study Group -- that called for an acceleration of training of the Iraqi army and a gradual handing over of responsibility for fighting insurgents. … Instead, Mr. Bush has chosen to increase the number of Army troops and Marines and to broaden their mission."

The Los Angeles Times (1/11, 850K) editorializes, "President Bush's latest plan for Iraq has the feel of an overdue high school book report. It looks nice, reads well and is persuasive in parts. If only he had handed it in on time. The 'new way forward' outlined by the president in a prime-time address Wednesday makes too many obvious points (Iraqis must have more of a stake in their nation's success) and includes too many tired tropes (the war in Iraq is a central front in the war against terrorism). But the core of Bush's speech -- the reason to maintain at least some flicker of hope -- was an absolute-final-we're-really-serious-this-time ultimatum to the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki."

In his New York Times (1/11, A31, 1.16M) column, David Brooks writes, "If the Democrats don't like the US policy on Iraq over the next six months, they have themselves partly to blame. There were millions of disaffected Republicans and independents ready to coalesce around some alternative way forward, but the Democrats never came up with anything remotely serious. … So we are stuck with the Bush proposal as the only serious plan on offer."

In a New York Times (1/11, A31, 1.16M) op-ed, author Danielle Trussoni writes, "My father once told me that he and his mother read the body count in the newspaper together. … It was only a month or so before my father left for the war, the winter of 1967. … Reading the body count in the paper was my father's way of preparing for the war. … As President Bush speaks about a new strategy for the war, more than 3,000 Americans have been killed in four years of fighting. And as I think of those lives cut short, I think of my father and my grandmother."

WSJournal Likes Bush Plan. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, A14, 2.04M) editorializes, "Bush's challenge last night was to convince Americans that his new plan to secure Iraq won't mean risking more lives on a conflict that critics say has become 'unwinnable.' We think he offered compelling reasons for skeptical Americans of good faith to back him, but the key will be deploying enough forces to accomplish the task." The President's words "offered the hope that the new plan won't simply mean employing more troops to carry out a strategy that hasn't been working. Though widely described in the press as a troop 'surge' or even 'escalation,' the number of additional soldiers being sent to Iraq is significant but not overwhelming. The real difference will be how America uses its troops in Iraq."

Bremer Says Bush "Is To Be Commended." In a Wall Street Journal (1/11, A15, 2.04M) op-ed, former Coalition Provisional Authority head Paul Bremer writes that President Bush "has frankly acknowledged the need for a new approach. He has assessed the various options and has courageously, and in my view wisely, rejected the politically popular course of withdrawing. Over the past four years, progress in Iraq has always depended on the interplay among the political, economic and security sectors. Clearly only Iraqis can design the necessary means to bridge their sectarian and ethnic divisions. … The president has acknowledged the need for new leadership and a new strategy. He is to be commended for rejecting the easy popular course."

War Of Words Continues Over "Surge" Versus "Escalation." US News and World Report (1/11, Wilson, Walsh) writes on its Web site, "What do you call a decision to send 20,000 or more additional troops to Iraq? It depends on whom you ask. President Bush and his team call it a 'surge.' Increasingly, Democrats and those who oppose the increase are calling it an 'escalation,' invoking an old specter from the Vietnam era." Escalation "is a highly loaded term. The U.S. News library team tracked the earliest uses of the word in a military context during the Vietnam era and found that it first surfaced in a series of increasingly critical New York Times editorials in the spring and summer of 1965. The word gained traction from there." But surge "owes its recent popularity to use by Secretary of Defense Robert Gates and other military officials." Democratic pollster Geoff Garin said, "Surge suggests it's a short, time-limited event, but at the moment the president is not willing to put any time limit on the whole enterprise."

Democrats Will Try To Block Funding For Troop Increase. The Washington Post (1/11, Weisman, Balz, 690K) puts its report on its front page, saying senior House Democrats plan to "attempt to derail funding" for President Bush's proposal to send additional troops to Iraq, "setting up what could become the most significant confrontation between the White House and Congress over military policy since the Vietnam War." USA Today (1/11, Kiely, Nichols, 2.27M) says House Defense Appropriations Subcommittee Chairman John Murtha said he "plans to use his subcommittee's control over the Pentagon budget to force a new direction in Iraq." Murtha "said he'll focus on the administration's supplemental spending request for Iraq, which is expected to be as high as $160 billion."

And at the same time, the Washington Times (1/11, Ward, 88K) says Democrats plan "to grill Bush administration officials during Capitol Hill hearings on the Iraq war -- beginning this morning when Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates testify before congressional committees."

The New York Times (1/11, A21, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports Democratic congressional leaders "accused President Bush of ignoring strong American sentiment against the war in Iraq and said they would build a bipartisan campaign against his proposed military expansion." Speaker Nancy Pelosi said Democrats "intended to turn the precise words from Mr. Bush's speech into a symbolic resolution, compelling Republicans to support or reject the idea of sending more troops to Iraq. The Senate was developing a similar nonbinding resolution to be considered as early as next week." The Christian Science Monitor (1/11, Chaddock, 59K) says the Democratic Congress "has all the clout it needs -- at least on parchment -- to trim war funding through its power of the purse." Congress "can also opt to push back with hearings, investigations, and resolutions that condemn an escalation of the war or require President Bush to return to Congress for approval before committing troops." But choosing which course to take "is causing heated debate" within the new majority.

The CBS Evening News (1/10, story 4, 1:20, Couric, 7.66M) said Bush's plan "puts him on a collision course with the new Congress." CBS (Attkisson): "White House officials, including in some cases the President himself, have briefed 150 members of Congress in advance of tonight's speech. Today, after the latest meeting with President Bush, Democratic leaders made it clear that no minds have been changed." Sen. Harry Reid: "I'm at a loss as to what's going to happen with these additional troops." McClatchy (1/11, Schoof, Talev) reports that if Bush "is determined to win over Congress to the idea of keeping more American troops in Iraq, his chances looked dim Wednesday night." However, "even as the new Democratic majority and some of the president's fellow Republicans expressed doubts or rejected the notion outright, they had yet to coalesce behind binding legislation to stop him."

NBC Nightly News (1/10, story 2, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Many members of Congress have been thoroughly briefed on the message behind the President's words in tonight's speech." NBC (Reid) added, "Democratic and Republican leaders were in the room with the President at the same time. They heard the same arguments, but they emerged from that room with dramatically different opinions about what they heard. After meeting with the President for less than an hour, top congressional Democrats said his plan for more troops appears to be nothing new. … Even some Republicans say Mr. Bush's plan has little chance of success." Sen. Gordon Smith: "The President is preparing to throw a Hail Mary pass. I just hope there is an Iraqi army to catch it." Reid: "Although most Republicans including congressional leaders are expected to fall in line behind the President."

Democratic "Prebuttals" Came In Force. The Washington Post (1/11, A2, Milbank, 690K) examines the Democratic "prebuttals" to the President's speech -- criticisms delivered before the address was made. Prebuttals "have become so intense that they have forced the victim of the prebuttal to preempt his own speech -- giving the speech itself an anticlimactic feel."

Presidential Hopefuls From Both Parties Stake Out Positions. The Los Angeles Times (1/11, Hook, 850K) reports the President's speech "provoked several potential presidential candidates to stake out a position, including some Republicans who had avoided addressing a controversial proposal that is likely to be a touchstone issue in the 2008 campaign." Ex-Gov. Mitt Romney, "ending weeks of dodging questions on the issue, announced Wednesday he would support a troop increase." But Sen. Sam Brownback "announced he opposed it, a sign that Republicans may not be as reluctant to distance themselves from Bush as they once were." Democrats John Edwards and Sen. John Kerry "announced their support for Congress to cut off funds needed for a troop increase. That step goes farther than many Democrats want because they fear it will be seen as undermining U.S. troops already in Iraq."

Democrats' Response Comes Under Fire. Under the headline "A Cynical Opposition," the Wall Street Journal (1/11, A14, 2.04M) editorializes, "You might have thought President Bush's announcement yesterday that he intends to deploy several thousand more combat soldiers to Iraq would have been sweet policy vindication for the Democrats. They're the ones who spent the better part of the past four years using Eric Shinseki -- the former Army Chief of Staff who, prior to the war, estimated it would take up to half a million troops to occupy the country -- as a cudgel with which to beat this President over the head." But "lately the Democrats have been singing from a different hymnal. … No one serious -- not even the Iraq Study Group -- believes that the war will end if we leave. Instead, it will change into a civil war in Iraq, and perhaps a wider regional war, that is likely to draw our forces back in again somewhere in the Middle East. … If Congressional Democrats want to be constructive, they can insist that Mr. Bush and his generals truly implement the strategy he is now endorsing. The path Democrats have followed in the minority and are now continuing will only make U.S. success harder -- a truth the American people will come to understand, and resent."

The Washington Times (1/11, 88K) editorializes, "The Democrats had tried several pre-emptive strikes against President Bush's speech last night about how to win the war in Iraq. The president, in our view, is right to send additional troops to Baghdad and other violent areas of Iraq to stanch the blood-letting and enable the Iraqi government to impose its authority over the nation. But in addition to opposing measures to end the war, the House would now undermine national security."

In his Los Angeles Times (1/11, 850K) column, Jonah Goldberg writes under the headline "At Least Bush Wants To Win" that with his speech, "President Bush made it clear that he will settle for nothing less than winning" in Iraq. Bush "may be deluding himself, and his plan may not work, but he at least has done the nation the courtesy of saying what his position is, despite an antagonistic political establishment and a hostile public. What is maddening is that the Democratic leadership cannot, or will not, clearly tell the American people whether they are the party of 'end it' or 'win it.' … Bush came up with the 'surge' plan. Will it work? Nobody knows. But the one thing the American people know about George W. Bush is that he wants to win the war. What the Democrats believe is anybody's guess."

In his Roll Call (1/11) column, Morton Kondracke writes, "Politically and militarily, this is President Bush's last chance to avoid catastrophe in Iraq and the Democratic Congress ought to let him play out his hand. Hard as it might be, Democrats should resist extreme pressure from anti-war forces in their base to undermine what little is left of Bush's popular support and force a withdrawal from Iraq. The reason is that if the United States loses the Iraq War, the consequences will be dire -- and a Democratic president elected in 2008 may well have to deal with them."

In a Washington Times (1/11, 88K) op-ed, Washington Center for Politics & Journalism director Terry Michael, the Democratic National Committee press secretary from 1985-1987, writes, "It's hard to get out of a deal with the devil. That's the congressional Democrats' dilemma, as they continue to treat the Iraq war as a speed bump on their pathway to the perks of restored power, rather than as a moral question to which voters loudly demanded a moral answer two months ago. … Where are the Gordon Smiths in the Democratic Party? Where are the conviction politicians willing to spend political capital to lead a citizenry which has decided overwhelmingly that this war is crazy? Where are the institutions of media power with the courage to say the emperor has no cowboy boots, no jeans, no garments at all -- just a hideous, stubborn smirk that is literally making this country ill and squandering our reputation around the globe?"

Eyewitnesses Say US Forces Raided Iranian Consulate In Iraq. NPR (1/11) reported in this morning, "Eyewitnesses in the city of Erbil in Kurdish-controlled northern Iraq says American forces raided the Iranian Consulate there in a pre-dawn operation. … Kurdish security forces blocked off the quiet residential street leading to Iran's small consulate" in Erbil, "preventing journalists from taking a close look at the building. Broken glass could be seen outside the entrance, however, and the Iranian flag was not flying from the pole outside the two-story villa. Residents in the neighborhood say around 4 am local time they heard helicopters and planes flying over the consulate. They say they also heard periodic gunfire in the area. 'Do not go to the Iranian consulate,' one shopkeeper said. 'The Americans have arrested everybody there.' The raid took place within hours of President Bush's televised speech, which promised a new strategy for the Iraq war. Kurdish security forces on the scene insisted no raid took place. They added that no Iranian diplomats were currently in the consulate building."

Bush Seen As Stepping Up "Strategy Of Confrontation" Against Iran. The New York Times (1/11, A21, Cooper, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports that in "promising to stop Iran from meddling in Iraq, President Bush returned Wednesday night to a strategy of confrontation" with Iran, "casting aside what had been a limited flirtation with a more diplomatic approach toward it." Bush "accused Iran of providing material support for attacks on American troops and vowed to respond," saying the US would send another aircraft carrier and its supporting ships to the Persian Gulf, as well as deploy more Patriot missiles in the region. The Times says the "more combative talk reflects increased frustration in the administration with Iran, which American officials blame for part of the rising death toll in Iraq."

Under Pressure From US, Maliki Agrees To Crack Down On Sadr Forces. NBC Nightly News (1/10, story 4, 1:55, Engel, 9.87M) reported, "For the first time, Iraq's Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has told the main Shiite militia group, the Mahdi Army, that it must surrender its weapons or face a full US and Iraqi military assault. This gives American troops here a freer hand to hunt down the militias." The AP (1/11, Hurst, Abdul-Zahra) says Maliki, "under pressure from the U.S., has agreed to crack down on the fighters even though they are loyal to his most powerful political ally," Muqtada al-Sadr.

Military Plans "Gated Communities" Strategy In Baghdad. The Los Angeles Times (1/11, A1, Barnes, 850K) reports the military's "new strategy for Iraq envisions creating so-called 'gated communities' in Baghdad -- sealing off discrete areas and forcibly removing insurgents, then working to create jobs for residents and stationing American units in the neighborhood to keep the peace." The US "previously has found it nearly impossible to secure the sprawling city. But by focusing an increased number of troops in selected neighborhoods, the military hopes it can create islands of security segregated from the chaos. The gated-communities plan has been tried -- with mixed success -- in other wars. In Vietnam, they were called 'strategic hamlets' and were a spectacular failure. But counterinsurgency experts say that such security zones can work if, once the barriers are established, the military follows up with neighborhood sweeps designed to flush out insurgents and militia fighters."

Ambassador-Designate Crocker Thrives In Tough Jobs. The Washington Post (1/11, C1, Wright, 690K) profiles Ryan Crocker, President Bush's nominee for US Ambassador to Iraq, calling him "A Diplomat Who Loves The Really Tough Jobs." The story's sub-headline reads, "In Harm's Way Is Where Ryan Crocker Thrives." The Post's very positive story says that "if there's an awful assignment in the Middle East or South Asia, Crocker, 57, has had it. He actually prefers the hot spots, colleagues say. The toughest hardship assignment for Crocker -- and the only one he tries to avoid -- is Washington, says former ambassador Edward Abington. 'He prefers the most difficult posts. There's a real sense of adventure in him,' Abington says."

Crocker Part Of New "Team Iraq." The Christian Science Monitor (1/11, LaFranchi, 59K) also writes about Crocker as part of a feature on President Bush's "reshuffled diplomatic and military 'Team Iraq.' It's an assignment for which a deep knowledge of the political and cultural complexities at play, both in Iraq and regionally, will be a huge plus." Crocker "would join a new team whose goal will be to stave off full-blown civil war in Iraq, as well as the disastrous regional and security consequences that would be very likely to accompany it." The new team "has nothing of the sharp ideological bent that both got the Bush administration's Iraq policy in trouble in the first place and kept it from seeing the policy mistakes that were made, experts say."

At Least 99 Iraqis, Three US Soldiers Killed In Ongoing Iraq Violence. The Los Angeles Times (1/11, Roug, 850K) reports "suicide bombers, roadside explosions and mortar rounds killed at least 99 Iraqis and wounded 26" across Iraq Wednesday, as the US military said three American troops had been killed in Anbar on Tuesday. And "despite the central Baghdad crackdown, 50 bodies were found in a neighborhood near Haifa Street. Ten more corpses were discovered across the Tigris River in the Rusafa neighborhood. All appeared to have been shot execution-style." The Washington Post (1/11, A12, Partlow, 690K) says "two busloads of Shiite Muslims returning from their holy pilgrimage to Mecca were gunned down Wednesday while passing through a predominantly Sunni Muslim swath of western Iraq." The AP (1/11) says US military deaths in Iraq hit "at least 3,017" on Wednesday. The AP count "is nine higher than the Defense Department's tally." The CBS Evening News (1/10, story 7, 2:30, Couric, 7.66M) said the war "has now lasted far longer than just about anyone predicted: 1,394 days, almost four years."

Iraq's Children Make Sectarian War Games Part Of Play. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, Shishkin, Juhi, 2.04M) runs a front-page feature on how Iraq's violence is impacting children, who now play sectarian war games. The Journal writes of a four-year-old who pulled a toy gun during play, "introduced himself as a commander, shouted the incantation 'God is greater' and warned Sunni Muslims not to fight back." As Iraq "careers toward full-scale civil war between its Shiite majority and Sunni minority, the culture of celebrating sectarian strife has taken root even among the very young in Sadr City."

National Guard Leaders Seek Changes As "Surge" Looms. The Hill (1/11, Tiron) reports the Bush Administration's plan to increase US troop strength in Iraq "is prompting National Guard officials to step up pressure for changes to mobilization, training and equipment that would have long-term implications for retention and efficiency." National Guard chief Lt. Gen. Steven Blum said, "There is no question in my mind that if the nation needs us, we will do it. It would be a huge mistake to not send the National Guard to shoulder some of that burden." But, he said, "'now is the time' to implement changes. 'If we do not do that, we risk the ability to sustain an all-volunteer force, in my judgment,' Blum warned."

Advocates Say Guantanamo Detainees "Driven Insane" By Conditions. The Financial Times (1/11, Dinmore) reports lawyers and rights activists say prisoners at Guantanamo Bay "are being driven insane by a tightening of conditions and the situation of their indefinite detention without trial." The advocates "also doubt whether the Bush administration intends to carry out its stated desire to close the facility." Today is the fifth anniversary of the first delivery of detainees to Guantanamo. The AP (1/10, Fox) writes that five years on, Guantanamo remains a "source of outrage," quoting Center for Constitutional Rights President Michael Ratner saying, "It has become iconic in the Muslim world and the wider world…for everything that the United States has done wrong in the war on terror."

Detainee Says "I Have Been Destroyed" By Guantanamo. The Los Angeles Times (1/11, 850K) runs an op-ed comprised of excerpts from letters Guantanamo detainee Jumah al-Dossari "wrote to his attorneys. Its contents have been deemed unclassified by the Department of Defense." Dossari writes, "At Guantanamo, soldiers have assaulted me, placed me in solitary confinement, threatened to kill me, threatened to kill my daughter and told me I will stay in Cuba for the rest of my life. They have deprived me of sleep, forced me to listen to extremely loud music and shined intense lights in my face. They have placed me in cold rooms for hours without food, drink or the ability to go to the bathroom or wash for prayers. They have wrapped me in the Israeli flag and told me there is a holy war between the Cross and the Star of David on one hand and the Crescent on the other. They have beaten me unconscious. … Why, after five years, is there no conclusion to the situation at Guantanamo? For how long will fathers, mothers, wives, siblings and children cry for their imprisoned loved ones? For how long will my daughter have to ask about my return? The answers can only be found with the fair-minded people of America. I would rather die than stay here forever, and I have tried to commit suicide many times. The purpose of Guantanamo is to destroy people, and I have been destroyed."

DOJ:

Mollohan Recuses Himself From DOJ Budget Work. The AP (1/11) reports, "Rep. Alan Mollohan, under Justice Department investigation about whether he has benefited from directing federal funds to nonprofit groups he helped start, stepped aside Wednesday from working on key elements of the department's budget." The AP continues, "The move came on the day Mollohan, D-W.Va., was named chairman of an Appropriations subcommittee responsible for the department's budget. … Mollohan will not have anything to do with setting the budgets for the attorney general's office, the FBI or the Justice Department's criminal division and prosecuting attorneys, he said in a letter to Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey, D-Wis. That way, he can't be accused of using his power as payback for the ongoing investigation or to influence it. … However, Mollohan will still have a big say in other elements of the agency's budget, including allocation of lawmakers' pet projects such as grants to state and local law enforcement agencies." The AP adds, "At issue is at least $202 million of federal funding that Mollohan has steered to five nonprofit groups in his district - with much of the money going to organizations run by people who contribute to the lawmaker's campaigns. … Last year, Mollohan stepped down from the House ethics committee after media reports into his activities, and the FBI soon launched an investigation. A conservative group, the National Legal and Policy Center, has alleged that the 12-term congressman has undervalued his assets in annual financial disclosure reports."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Comverse Attorney Settles Options Charges For $3.1 Million. USA Today (1/11, Iwata) reports, "William Sorin, former general counsel at Comverse Technology, will pay $3.1 million to settle charges that he conspired with the company's former CEO and chief financial officer to improperly backdate stock options, the Securities and Exchange Commission said Wednesday." USA continues, "Without admitting or denying the charges, Sorin agreed to disgorge $1.7 million and pay $818,000 in interest and a $600,000 civil penalty, according to the SEC. About $1 million of the disgorgement will come from backdated options he exercised. … Sorin is the first corporate counsel fined by the SEC in the federal crackdown on the backdating of stock options by 200 companies." USA adds, "Haywood Gilliam, a partner at Bingham McCutchen and former Justice Department securities fraud chief in San Francisco, says regulators are 'focusing more on gatekeeper defendants such as attorneys, and I would not be surprised to see more of it.' … Last year, the SEC and Justice Department charged Sorin, former Comverse CEO Jacob "Kobi" Alexander and former chief financial officer David Kreinberg with a stock-manipulation scheme that allegedly reaped them $8 million."

The Wall Street Journal (1/11, A11, Burns) reports, "The Harvard Law School graduate settled without admitting or denying the SEC's allegations about his role in backdating stock-option grants. Mr. Sorin, former Comverse Technology Chief Financial Officer David Kreinberg and fugitive former Chief Executive Jacob 'Kobi' Alexander were named in the SEC's civil suit in August and were criminally charged as well. Mr. Alexander fled to the African nation of Namibia, where he is awaiting a hearing on extradition to the U.S." The Journal continues, "Prosecutors charged the option-manipulation effort produced substantial personal profits for the executives while costing shareholders. … Mr. Sorin pleaded guilty in November to a single criminal charge of conspiracy to commit securities fraud, mail fraud and wire fraud. Mr. Kreinberg pleaded guilty in October to conspiracy and securities fraud and resolved the SEC charges by agreeing to pay nearly $2.4 million. The SEC said its investigation is continuing."

Records Show Jobs Benefited From Apple Options Dating. The Washington Post (1/11, A1, Sipress) reports, "Apple Inc. chief executive Steve Jobs confirmed his place this week as the premier impresario of the Internet age, taking the stage in San Francisco to unveil a smart phone that won a raucous endorsement from thousands of fans in the audience and sent Apple stock rocketing to a record high. … But his signature performance at the annual Macworld Conference and Expo did not dispel the scandal swirling around Apple over its backdating of stock options. Despite the company's defense that Jobs never personally benefited from a pair of stock option grants he received -- he gave them up in 2003, long before allegations of wrongdoing surfaced -- filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission show that his options were exchanged for 5 million shares of restricted Apple stock." The Post continues, "That stock was worth $75 million at the time, nearly the same as the value of the options he relinquished, using a technique for calculating the value of investments popular with financial analysts and used by Apple. … Steve Dowling, Apple's director of corporate communications, said the 2003 transaction did not directly benefit Jobs because he could not sell the restricted shares until he had remained at Apple for another three years." The Post adds, "Some investor advocates call that explanation disingenuous. 'You are torturing the English language to say he did not benefit from the options,' said Patrick McGurn, executive vice president of Institutional Shareholder Services. 'He certainly benefited from the grant because the grant was converted on a value-to-value basis.' … McGurn and other analysts also said the amount of stock Jobs received appeared to be inflated because the value of his options was exaggerated, at least in the case of one grant, by the improper backdating."

Former NYSE Head Grasso Seeks Jury Trial. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, C6, Bray) reports, "Dick Grasso, the former chairman of the New York Stock Exchange, asked a state appeals court to throw out a lower court's ruling that he must return a portion of his $187.5 million compensation package." The Journal continues, "At a hearing before the appellate division of the New York State Supreme Court, Gerson Zweifach, Mr. Grasso's lawyer, said New York State Supreme Court Justice Charles E. Ramos erred in October when he granted a summary judgment request by the state attorney general's office." The Journal adds, "Mr. Zweifach said there are too many issues that remain in dispute about whether Mr. Grasso fulfilled his fiduciary duties to the Big Board and what the NYSE's directors knew about his compensation package for the case to be decided without a trial. He said the case should be decided by a jury. … 'It was error for the trial court to even attempt on summary judgment to decide what people knew and what Mr. Grasso should have known,' he said." The Journal notes, "The attorney general's office, which sued Mr. Grasso in 2004 alleging his pay was excessive for a not-for-profit corporation, has said Mr. Grasso should be forced to return more than $112 million. .. In November, the appeals court stayed all proceedings until it could consider a number of issues raised by Mr. Grasso, including whether to reassign the case to a different judge."

US Charges Hewlett-Packard Investigator With Identity Theft. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, Waldman) reports from San Francisco, "In another criminal charge stemming from last fall's Hewlett-Packard Co. spying affair, U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan charged independent investigator Bryan Wagner with felony identity theft and conspiracy." The Journal continues, "Mr. Ryan's spokesman, Luke Macaulay, said no other federal charges were filed in the H-P matter Wednesday, but that the Justice Department is still investigating the case." The Journal adds, "Mr. Wagner, of Littleton, Colo., was one of five people charged with several felony counts last fall by the California attorney general's office in connection to the H-P scandal. Those charged by California include H-P's former nonexecutive chairman, Patricia Dunn, and its former chief ethics lawyer, Kevin Hunsaker. All five have pleaded not guilty to the California charges, including Mr. Wagner, who state and federal prosecutors allege used false identities to obtain the private phone records of numerous H-P directors, employees and journalists."

DOJ Tells Philadelphia Lawmaker He Is Target Of Corruption Probe. The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/11, Shiffman, Cattabiani, McCoy) reports, "Federal prosecutors last year sent a formal warning to State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo that he may be indicted, according to sources familiar with the investigation." The Inquirer continues, "The issuance of a so-called target letter from prosecutors to Fumo, one of Pennsylvania's most powerful politicians, is a significant milestone in the four-year investigation, which appears to be in its final stages. … The target letter was sent to Fumo last summer, around the time two of his computer aides were charged with destroying evidence to thwart the investigation, sources said. The Inquirer learned of the letter this month. A lawyer for Fumo yesterday declined to comment." The Inquirer adds, "Typically, prosecutors send target letters to people who are likely to be charged, as a warning and as an invitation to testify before the grand jury. It's an offer that the targets usually refuse. … 'It is the rare case, in my experience, that you can talk a prosecutor out of charges once a target letter is issued,' said Lawrence S. Lustberg, a Newark lawyer who defended one of the Commerce Bank executives convicted in the 2005 City Hall corruption trial. … However, the delivery of a target letter, part of a secret grand jury process, is no guarantee that charges will be filed." The Inquirer notes, "Before prosecutors present a potential indictment in such a high-profile case, they often consult with senior Justice Department officials in Washington. Also in such cases, defense attorneys are likely to be afforded the opportunity to meet with top officials, including U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan. … The Fumo investigation is focused on whether Fumo used funds from a multimillion-dollar South Philadelphia charity for personal or political benefit - and whether Fumo and staffers destroyed evidence to try to thwart the FBI. … With the grand jury's term due to expire next month, prosecutors have subpoenaed witnesses to appear in the coming weeks, sources said."

Two Florida Prison Guards Sentenced In Sex-For-Contraband Scheme. The AP (1/11, Kaczor) reports from Tallahassee, FL, "Two guards received one-year prison sentences Wednesday for their roles in a sex-for-contraband scheme that ended in a fatal shootout at a federal prison for women." The AP continues, "Gregory Dixon, who admitted having sex with inmates but denied giving them anything for it, has taken responsibility for his actions and was sorry, his lawyer said. … The other guard, Alan Moore, told U.S. District Judge Robert Hinkle he was wrongly convicted." The AP adds, "A jury convicted both in November of conspiring to accept illegal gratuities and other crimes. … Dixon and Moore were among six guards who had been charged with being part of a conspiracy to trade cigars, cigarettes, chewing gum, jewelry and cosmetics to inmates for sex and money at the Tallahassee Federal Correctional Institution. … 'They took an honorable position and public trust and used it for self-gratification,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Alan Sprowls told the judge. 'Their conduct was a complete abandonment of what they knew was right.' … One guard, Ralph Hill, pulled a gun and began firing at federal agents who had gone to the prison to arrest the suspects June 21. Hill and Justice Department Special Agent William 'Buddy' Sentner were killed, and a prison officer aiding in the arrests was wounded. … Three other guards pleaded guilty."

US Charges Ex-Swift Employees With Identity Theft. Bloomberg (1/11, Bjerga) reports, "A federal grand jury charged 53 former employees of Swift & Co.'s meat processing plant in Cactus, Texas, with felony identity theft, the U.S. Attorney's office in Dallas said." Bloomberg continues, "Those charged were among 295 at the Cactus plant arrested in mid-December during nationwide raids targeting illegal immigrants at six Swift facilities. About 1,300 Swift employees, or 9 percent of its workforce, were arrested by federal agents. So far, 246 of those arrested nationwide are facing criminal charges, most for identity theft, according to Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd in Washington. … 'It is a serious crime to hijack and steal a citizen's good name and credit to illegally stay in the United States,' U.S. Attorney Richard B. Roper said in a statement. He said most of those charged had used stolen or forged documents to find employment." Bloomberg adds, "Each of the 53 former Swift workers charged today is facing one count of false representation of a Social Security number. The felony carries a maximum sentence of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. Most face additional charges as well, according to the statement."

Judge Tosses Testimony In Trial Of Russian Charged With Kidnapping Plot. The AP (1/11) reports from Los Angeles, "A federal judge ordered jurors in the case of a man charged with masterminding a kidnapping-for-ransom plot that ended with five bodies tossed into a California reservoir to disregard the defendant's testimony after he refused to answer questions under cross-examination." The AP continues, "Iouri Mikhel, 42, testified last week that he helped lure some of the victims to meetings but never killed them. He also acknowledged being a 'professional criminal' who laundered money and was a black market trader in his native Russia. … When Mikhel declined Tuesday to answer questions from prosecutors and an attorney representing a co-defendant, U.S. District Judge Dickran Tevrizian ordered the testimony removed from the court record. … Closing arguments were scheduled to begin Wednesday." The AP notes, "Mikhel, 42, has pleaded not guilty to charges that include conspiracy and hostage-taking resulting in death. He could face the death penalty if convicted. … Prosecutors allege Mikhel and several accomplices abducted Los Angeles-area businesspeople over a four-month period in 2001 and 2002 and collected $1.2 million in ransoms before killing them. … Bodies of the five people kidnapped were later found in the New Melones Reservoir near Yosemite National Park."

Pellicano Probe Finds Attorney Gave Information To Kerkorian. The New York Times (1/11, Halbfinger, Weiner) reports, "When Kirk Kerkorian's longtime lawyer was indicted on wiretapping and conspiracy charges last February in the federal investigation of the Hollywood private detective Anthony Pellicano, the billionaire investor was mentioned almost as an afterthought. … There were no accusations that Mr. Kerkorian knew or approved of any wiretapping, and no indications that he had even been interviewed by the F.B.I. about Mr. Pellicano's work on his behalf. … But in recordings that Mr. Pellicano secretly made of his own telephone conversations, Mr. Kerkorian's lawyer, Terry N. Christensen, repeatedly said he told the billionaire — then 84, and locked in a legal dispute with his ex-wife, Lisa Bonder Kerkorian — what the private detective was learning from what prosecutors say were his wiretaps." The Times continues, "Mr. Christensen stops short of saying he has told Mr. Kerkorian that Mr. Pellicano was using wiretaps, but says he is providing Mr. Kerkorian with details of Ms. Kerkorian's private conversations. … Mr. Kerkorian has not been accused of any wrongdoing, and it is unlikely that someone could be held criminally liable for the actions of an investigator hired by his lawyer without showing that the client knew of the investigator's illegal acts. … Yet the recordings show how Mr. Pellicano's information could affect a high-stakes lawsuit, and make clear that Mr. Kerkorian, according to Mr. Christensen's assurances, was grateful for intimate information that helped his case." The Times notes, "Mr. Christensen and Mr. Pellicano, both of whom have pleaded not guilty to felony wiretapping and conspiracy charges, were among seven people indicted last February as part of an F.B.I. inquiry. Two have pleaded guilty, and the trial of the other five, after several delays, is set for August."

Land In Chicago Bribery Case Outside Alderman's Ward. The AP (1/11) reports, "When FBI officials arrested Alderman Arenda Troutman this week, they alleged that she took $5,000 from a fictitious developer in exchange for helping him move forward on a project in her South Side ward. Or, rather, what they assumed was her ward. A closer look has revealed that the parcel in question isn't in Troutman's 20th Ward, after all," and "while Troutman's lawyer is crying foul, FBI spokesman Ross Rice said the mix-up is a non-issue. 'From a legal standpoint, it doesn't matter,' he said. 'It's not an element of the crime.' But defense attorney Sam Adam Jr. said his client knows the boundaries of her ward and that the location revelation 'should prove to everyone that there was nothing fraudulent going on.' 'The government's case is smelling like Limburger cheese,' Adam said."

The Chicago Tribune (1/10, Gibson, Washburn, 617K) reported the story, under the headline "Details Don't Get In Way Of FBI Sting," noting, "if the federal sting…were a Hollywood movie, Chicagoans in the know might be complaining about a flawed plot. … If the…property 'was on the other side of the street, it would have been in the 20th,' said Thomas Leach, a spokesman for the Chicago Board of Election Commissioners." The Tribune added, "Rice said investigators did not double check, and from the FBI's perspective, it's a moot point. Either Troutman herself believed the parcel was in her ward and she could influence the process, or she knew the parcel wasn't in her ward and thought she could take money anyway, he said."

Prosecution Rests In Tennessee Waltz Trial. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (1/11, Buser, 163K) reports, "Federal prosecutors rested their bribery case Wednesday against the Shelby County Commission's former top administrative aide, Calvin Williams, who may take the stand today in his own defense. … Among the six witnesses called by Williams on Wednesday was attorney Buck Wellford, a county commissioner from 1994 to 2002 who said on cross-examination by prosecutor Lorraine Craig that he thought Williams should have focused more on his administrative duties with the commission and less on the commissioners' political issues. Wellford said Williams appeared to have 'a special relationship' with Commissioner Cleo Kirk, who sponsored the urban development grant of $100,000 for the Glenview Neighborhood Development Partners Inc.

Katrina Said To Have Contributed To New Orleans Crime Wave. The New York Times (1/11, Nossiter, 1.16M) reports New Orleans' recent "storm of violence…can be traced in part to dysfunctional law enforcement institutions, aggravated by a natural disaster that turned the physical and social landscape of New Orleans into an ideal terrain for criminals." The city was "the United States' murder capital by many measures in 2006," and "is well on its way to keeping that distinction in 2007." The Times cites New Orleans' "automobile-bound police department," which "is reluctant to walk the streets and interact with the city's residents. It is at war with the district attorney's office, which is prosecuting seven officers for a deadly shooting soon after Hurricane Katrina struck in 2005. Judges in the city's courts regularly rule in favor of criminals. Completing the grim picture is an already fragile social structure in the city's poorest wards that has been all but destroyed by Hurricane Katrina."

Bob Herbert, in his column for the New York Times (1/11, 1.16M) writes that as residents of New Orleans become "increasingly unnerved," the city "is a place that could use a hopeful sign of any kind, some positive development to signal that perhaps better times are coming." Herbert goes on to describe the efforts of Ghebre Selassie Mehreteab, "a middle-aged bundle of energy who heads the NHP Foundation, a national nonprofit organization that has taken on the difficult mission of providing quality housing at rents that poor and middle-class families can afford." Ghebre, or Gabe, "hopes to build 3,000 affordable rental apartments in and around New Orleans at a total cost of $300 million. How does he do it, when others find the task so daunting? The key, he said, is to combine the expertise of a successful real estate operation with the talent and vision of an experienced foundation committed to what is essentially a charitable mission."

Report Finds Ex-Prisoner Death Rate Higher Than For Current Inmates. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, Winstein) reports, "In what may be the first large-scale study of mortality among released prison inmates in the U.S., researchers found that getting out of jail can be hazardous to your health." The Journal continues, "The death rate for ex-prisoners was four times that of current inmates, and more than triple the rate for the general population, even after the effects of age, sex and race were factored out. More than 30% of the excess deaths were due to drug overdoses." The Journal adds, "Within the first two weeks after a prisoner is released, the figures were worse: former inmates were 13 times as likely to die as the population at large - and almost 80% of those extra deaths were from drug overdose. .. After drug overdoses, the leading causes of the higher death rate were murders, heart disease and suicides." The Journal notes, "The doctor who led the study, Ingrid A. Binswanger of the University of Colorado, said she was surprised that the difference in death rates was so large. The findings could indicate a substantial public health problem, since about 700,000 people are released from prison in the U.S. each year, according to the Bureau of Justice Statistics. … The study, to be published in the New England Journal of Medicine Thursday, tracked 30,237 inmates released from the Washington state prison system between 1999 and 2003. Researchers cautioned that the figures, which are broadly consistent with previous studies in Finland and Australia, do not necessarily apply to the rest of the U.S."

Bloggers Win Seats In Media Section At Libby Trial. The Washington Post (1/11, D1, Sipress) reports that when the trial if I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, "opens next week, scores of journalists are expected to throng the federal courtroom in Washington, far too many for the 100 seats set aside for the media." But for the "first time in a federal court, two of these seats will be reserved for bloggers. After two years of negotiations with judicial officials across the country, the Media Bloggers Association, a nonpartisan group with about 1,000 members working to extend the powers of the press to bloggers, has won credentials to rotate among his members." The Libby trial "could 'catalyze' the association's efforts to win respect and access for bloggers in federal and state courthouses, said Robert Cox, the association's president."

Delphi Seeks Bankruptcy Judge's Approval Of Investment Plan. The AP (1/11, Tong) reports, "Board members of Delphi Corp. decided on Wednesday to move forward in seeking the approval of a federal bankruptcy judge to allow five private equity and institutional investors to buy shares worth as much as $3.4 billion in the company upon its reorganization." The AP continues, "Directors of the Troy, Michigan-based auto parts maker essentially rejected an unsolicited $4.7 billion bid made by a rival investor. Judge Robert Drain was scheduled to consider the plan and objections in a Thursday hearing." The AP adds, "The plan is a crucial part of an overall transformation sought by the company, as it attempts to exit bankruptcy in the first half of this year. Objectors say it transfers a disproportionate amount of the company's value to the investors at the expense of other stakeholders in the case. … The plan allows affiliates of three private equity investors, Appaloosa Management LP, Cerberus Capital Management LP and Harbinger Capital Partners Master Fund I, as well as Merrill Lynch & Co. and UBS Securities LLC, to buy shares in a restructured Delphi for $1.4 billion to $3.4 billion. It would give the investors a minimum of 30 percent and up to 72 percent of the restructured company but also depends on consensual resolution of Delphi's labor agreements by Jan. 31. … Highland Capital Management LP made a competing proposal Dec. 21, three days after the original bid, to buy shares at a cost of $4.7 billion. Highland has joined the acting U.S. Trustee, the official committee of equity security holders, the International Union of Electronic Workers-Communications Workers of America and two other unions in objecting to the Appaloosa-Cerberus plan. … The U.S. Trustee and the IUE-CWA, which represents the second-largest group of Delphi employees, objected in part based on their belief that the investment plan takes the place of the usual process of creating a bankruptcy reorganization plan since it outlines how some creditors would be paid."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI "Highly Likely" To Investigate Houston Police Shooting. The Houston Chronicle (1/11, Rogers, 530K) reports, "The FBI said Wednesday that it likely will open a civil rights investigation to monitor ongoing inquiries into the shooting death of Robert McIntosh by a Houston police officer. The move only will monitor investigations by local authorities and is not a formal investigation to determine whether McIntosh's civil rights were violated, said Shauna Dunlap, a spokeswoman for the FBI. 'Agents have been looking into the matter, and it looks likely that we will open a civil rights investigation to monitor the progress of the district attorney's investigation and the Houston Police Department internal affairs investigation,' Dunlap said." The Chronicle notes, "McIntosh, 23, was shot to death Monday after a traffic stop in the Sunnyside area, prompting an outcry from community leaders when witnesses alleged the man was handcuffed before the shooting. … Dunlap said the FBI decided to wait until it reviews the case and meets with other agencies involved in the investigation before deciding to launch a probe. If the FBI opens an investigation, she said, it may come in the next few days."

The AP (1/11, Stinebaker) reports, "McIntosh's shooting prompted Quanell X, a local activist and frequent critic of the Houston Police Department, to demand a federal investigation, saying McIntosh was the victim of 'a cold-blooded murder.' … FBI spokeswoman Shauna Dunlap said Wednesday such an investigation likely will be announced soon. … 'There is a strong possibility that in the next couple of days, we will open a civil rights investigation,' Dunlap told The Associated Press." The AP notes, "In the past, federal authorities in Houston have prosecuted Houston police for civil rights violations when a local grand jury declined to indict them in shootings of civilians."

Jury Deliberations In Texas Smuggling Case Postponed. The AP (1/11, Lozano) reports from Houston, "A truck driver facing a possible death sentence for a smuggling attempt in which 19 illegal immigrants died locked in his sweltering tractor-trailer will have to wait until at least next week to learn his fate." The AP continues, "The jury deliberating whether to sentence Tyrone Williams to death for what became the nation's deadliest human smuggling attempt is taking a five-day break, U.S. District Judge Lee Rosenthal told attorneys Wednesday." The AP adds, "Jurors decided to wait until Tuesday to resume their deliberations because the judge was scheduled to be out of town Thursday and Friday and the Martin Luther King Jr. holiday is Monday. … Jurors deliberated for about eight hours Wednesday without reaching a verdict. They have deliberated a total of about 14 hours since Tuesday." The AP notes, "The jury is deciding whether to sentence Williams to death or life in prison without parole, or to let Rosenthal issue a sentence that could range from no incarceration to life in prison without parole. … Williams was convicted last month on 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting immigrants, including 20 counts that were death-penalty eligible."

Judge Strikes Down Effort To Seize Immigrant Smuggling Money. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, Carrns) reports, "The state of Arizona has no authority to seize thousands of Western Union Co. money transfers to Mexico that originated outside of Arizona, a state court has ruled."

The Journal continues, "The finding, which was filed Tuesday, is a victory for Western Union, Englewood, Colo., which relies on electronic money transfers to Mexico as a mainstay of its business. Such transfers make up about 10% of its money transfers." The Journal adds, "Arizona Attorney General Terry Goddard said he will contest the Superior Court's order halting the state's seizure warrant in the Arizona Court of Appeals. He said he is confident his office can provide evidence that the money transfers, while occurring outside of Arizona, are linked to Arizona crimes, and that Arizona authorities should be allowed to intercept them as part of its battle against illegal human trafficking."

The AP (1/11, Billeaud) reports, "Mexico depends heavily on money wired from Mexicans who are working in the United States. Some lawmakers in Mexico denounced the seizure effort. … The efforts were so successful that smugglers began to route their payments from other American states to Mexico, even as traffickers continued to sneak people in through Arizona, prosecutors said. Authorities responded by trying to seize money transfers going into the northern Mexican state of Sonora. … The new ruling concluded prosecutors had not shown they have jurisdiction for the broader approach and had not demonstrated that the Western Union customers in question were involved in crimes. It said the approach violated protections for interstate and international commerce under the U.S. Constitution."

Seattle Blamed For Arrests Of WTO Protestors In 1999. The AP (1/11, Johnson) reports from Seattle, WA, "A lawyer for as many as 200 people arrested in an emergency 'no protest zone' established during the 1999 World Trade Organization demonstrations asked a federal jury to hold the city accountable for violating the protesters' constitutional rights." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Marsha Pechman has already ruled that police made the arrests without probable cause. The protesters are hoping to prove the police had a policy of targeting protesters for their anti-WTO opinions, or at least that the actions of officers were approved by higher-ups; if so, the city could face millions of dollars in damages in a subsequent liability phase of the trial. … 'My clients were not throwing bricks. They were not interfering with police,' attorney Mike Withey said in his opening statement Tuesday. 'The policy was to arrest people based on their viewpoint.'" The AP notes, "City attorney Ted Buck said the overwhelmed officers didn't care what opinions the protesters held; they simply wanted to keep the downtown core clear so that police, emergency workers, WTO delegates and others would be able to do their jobs. … The week of the arrests, about 50,000 protesters had swarmed Seattle, overwhelming police and closing down the WTO meeting. The mayor imposed a curfew and limited the downtown core to WTO delegates, police and emergency workers, store employees, residents and shoppers."

GOP Lawmakers Ask DOJ To Help Keep Border Agents Free Pending Appeal. The Washington Times (1/11, Seper) reports, "Republican House members yesterday asked President Bush to keep two U.S. Border Patrol agents out of prison pending their appeal of convictions for shooting a suspected drug smuggler in the buttocks as he fled into Mexico. … 'Several discrepancies in the government's case strongly question whether justice has been served, and permitting these men to be incarcerated in the interim puts their lives at risk,' Rep. Dana Rohrabacher of California said at a Capitol Hill press conference. … 'We're going to find out whose side you're on ... the American people or the side of our enemies,' Mr. Rohrabacher said in a reference to Mr. Bush. 'If you let these two men go to jail for defending us, then we'll know you're on the side of our enemies.' … He was joined by Reps. Duncan Hunter of California, Ted Poe of Texas, Walter B. Jones of North Carolina, Joe Wilson of South Carolina and Tom Tancredo of Colorado." The Times adds, "In lieu of a pardon, a letter petitioning Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales was presented during the press conference asking the Justice Department to direct federal prosecutors not to oppose a motion filed in a Texas court to keep the agents free on bond during the appeals process. … Agents Ignacio Ramos, 37, and Jose Alonso Compean, 28, were sentenced in October in federal court in El Paso, Texas, to 11 and 12 years, respectively, for causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence and a civil rights violation. … A jury convicted the two agents in March after a two-week trial. They are scheduled to report to prison Wednesday. Compean and his wife, Patty, attended yesterday's press conference. … 'I urge Attorney General Gonzales to allow these men to go free on bail while the appeals process is under way,' Mr. Wilson said. 'We must stand with our nation's heroes -- not the criminals who disregard our laws.'"

KFMB-TV, San Diego, CA (1/10, 12:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "Among those asking Attorney General Alberto

Gonzalez to intervene is San Diego Congressman Duncan Hunter. Hunter says the two border patrol agents from Texas should at the very least remain free on bail while their appeal is pending. Agents Jose Campean and Ignacio Ramos were chasing a drug smuggler back in February of 2005."

KDBC-TV, El Paso, TX (1/10, 6:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "Ramos and Compean were sentenced to Federal prison for shooting a Mexican drug dealer and trying to hide it. Today several Congressmen announced their plan to send a letter to the President and to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. Asking to keep the two men out on bail until the continuance of their trail is done. Without a pardon."

Civilian Oversight Of LAPD Urged After Officer's Exoneration In Teen's Death. The Los Angeles Times (1/11, Lait, Hymon) reports, "Angered by an administrative panel's secret decision not to punish the Los Angeles Police Department officer who fatally shot a 13-year-old boy, City Council members and community leaders called Wednesday for increasing civilian oversight of misconduct cases and reopening them to public scrutiny. … 'People are always going to have different views on how cops should be punished for shootings, but all the facts should be out in the open and there ought to be accountability for the ultimate decision-makers,' said Councilman Jack Weiss, head of the city's Public Safety Committee." The Times continues, "Weiss said he would hold a joint hearing with the Police Commission in upcoming weeks to discuss ways to make LAPD discipline 'more transparent.' … Other city officials, including Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, also said they were disappointed to learn that an internal LAPD disciplinary panel meeting held behind closed doors this week rejected the civilian Police Commission's findings that Officer Steven Garcia should be punished for the Feb. 6, 2005, shooting of Devin Brown." The Times adds, "Councilman Bernard C. Parks, who led the LAPD from 1997 to 2002, said holding disciplinary hearings in private undermines confidence in the Police Department. … Although disciplinary hearings have historically been open to the public, police officials changed department policy late last year in response to a state Supreme Court ruling that restricted access to law enforcement personnel records in a San Diego case."

U Of Michigan To Comply With State's Ban On Use Of Race Or Sex In Admissions. The Washington Post/AP (1/11, A14, Goodman) reports, "The University of Michigan announced Wednesday that it will comply with a new voter-approved ban on affirmative action and immediately stop considering race and gender in admissions." Meanwhile, the university will "continue its legal challenge of the measure" and will continue to "use other criteria that are not explicitly race- or gender-based" including "geographic diversity, the level of education completed by students' parents, and whether students attended a disadvantaged school."

The New York Times (1/11, Lewin) reports, "The University of Michigan acceded to a federal appeals court decision" requiring "immediate compliance" with "the state's new ban on affirmative action in public education, employment or contracting."

Florida To Move Mentally Ill Inmates To Hospitals, Residential Centers. The New York Times (1/11, Sexton) reports, "About 300 mentally ill inmates in county jails throughout Florida will eventually be moved to psychiatric hospitals and residential centers for treatment after state lawmakers agreed on Wednesday to an emergency spending measure." The Times continues, "The Legislative Budget Commission, a panel of the Florida Legislature meeting in an emergency session, voted unanimously to spend nearly $19 million before July 1 to provide 373 more psychiatric beds for mentally ill inmates and more community services for mentally ill people at risk of being jailed." The Times adds, "The decision comes after a state circuit judge charged Lucy Hadi, the former secretary of the Department of Children and Families, with indirect criminal contempt for keeping mentally ill inmates in jail longer than state law allows. Ms. Hadi, who resigned last month, was fined $80,000. … State law requires the department to move inmates found incompetent to stand trial from county jails to psychiatric hospitals within 15 days of receiving a commitment order. The number of inmates found incompetent has increased by 16 percent over the last two fiscal years. As of Tuesday, nearly 250 mentally ill inmates had waited more than 15 days for treatment. In all, nearly 300 inmates are waiting for treatment."

Columnist Blasts DA In Duke Lacrosse Probe. In a column for the Wall Street Journal (1/11, A15), Dorothy Rabinowitz writes, "No one could have imagined, when the story began last March, how soon and completely that bit of shorthand – 'the Duke University scandal' -- would be transformed. … Scarcely 10 months after, the term is now almost universally understood as a reference to the operations of Michael Nifong, the Durham County district attorney, whose abandonment of all semblance of concern about the merits of the rape and assault accusations against three Duke University students was obvious from the first. So was his abundant confidence while broadcasting comments on the guilt of the accused. He seemed a man immune to concerns for appearances as he raced about expounding on the case against the accused lacrosse players and calling them hooligans. He would hear nothing by way of concern from Duke administrators (seven months into this affair, the university president did find an opportunity to mention the accused students' right to a presumption of innocence) -- and certainly none from the politically progressive quarters of the Duke faculty who lent their names to an impassioned ad thanking everyone who had come out to march in protest against the rape and assault of the exotic dancer; 88 faculty members signed it, among them such Duke luminaries as Alice Kaplan, author and student of fascism, and Frank Lentricchia, literary critic." Rabinowitz continues, "Mr. Nifong's confidence that he had nothing to fear from establishment opinion or from the leaders of the great university as he bounded about making hash of the rules of justice -- prime among them the accused's right to a presumption of innocence -- proved justified. And might have remained so longer but for the catastrophic effects of the accuser's unraveling stories." Rabinowitz concludes, "The accused Duke students can be grateful that the case against them has collapsed, and that Mr. Nifong now confronts a serious ethics complaint filed by the North Carolina State Bar. They will never have to face anything like the malignant force which descended on the happy and ambitious Amiraults in 1984, and turned their lives to dust. But Reade Seligmann, David Evans and Collin Finnerty have this year had a look into an abyss that has claimed many others, and that is never less than terrorizing. It is a piece of their Duke education they are unlikely to forget."

US Airways Hikes Delta Bid To $10.2 Billion.

The Washington Post (1/11, D1, Wilber) reports, "US Airways turned up the pressure yesterday in its hostile takeover bid for bankrupt Delta Air Lines by boosting its offer, setting a February deadline for action and sending its top executive to Capitol Hill to reassure legislators that a merger would not harm consumers." The Post continues, "The push comes as US Airways appeared to have lost some momentum in its effort to entice Delta's creditors to accept its bid. Yesterday, it increased its original offer, about $8.6 billion, to $10.2 billion, including $5 billion in cash and nearly 90 million shares of US Airways stock."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/11, Grantham) reports, "The merger plot just thickened at Delta Air Lines. … US Airways bumped up its takeover bid for the Atlanta-based airline by 20 percent Wednesday, to $10.3 billion, adding a Feb. 1 deadline in a move to pressure Delta's bankruptcy court creditors — who have a big say in whether the deal goes through." The AJC adds, "Industry analysts said that should give Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways a better shot at persuading the creditors to choose its hostile takeover bid over Delta management's plan to emerge from Chapter 11 as an independent carrier. … But a report also surfaced that Delta and Northwest Airlines, also in Chapter 11 proceedings, have had talks about a possible merger after they both exit bankruptcy. … Citing unidentified sources, the Wall Street Journal reported that the two airlines were talking at various levels of management. … It said Delta and its creditors may see a post-bankruptcy link-up with Northwest as a better alternative to the US Airways bid. The Journal also said Delta and United Airlines have had contacts." The AJC notes, "A merger involving Delta and any of those possible partners would create the world's biggest airline. It would require approval of the U.S. Justice Department, which historically has taken a dim view of such large-scale deals."

The AP (1/11, Weber) reports, "The ball is now in the creditors' court. … The question is whether they want to take the money US Airways is offering and run the risk of a long regulatory fight, or stick with Delta's plan to emerge from bankruptcy by the middle of this year as a standalone company worth $9.4 billion to $12 billion." The AP adds, "An unofficial group of unsecured creditors issued a statement calling on Delta 'to provide thoughtful and unbiased consideration' to the enhanced offer. It urged the airline's management to cooperate fully with US Airways' efforts to get information and not to deter alternatives from other companies that could provide stakeholders greater recoveries than under a standalone reorganization. The group represents creditors holding about $2.3 billion in claims against Delta. .. Delta management has argued that the combination of US Airways and Delta would not receive regulatory approval because of the overlap of the two carriers' routes. US Airways says there wouldn't be any regulatory holdup."

Delta In Talks With Northwest To Avert US Airways Bid. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, B1, Dade, Carey) reports, "In the two months since US Airways Group Inc. announced its hostile bid for Delta Air Lines Inc., the embattled carrier has mounted a high-octane campaign of grass-roots organizing and fierce political lobbying to try to stay independent -- but all that has succeeded in doing is attracting a higher offer and a potential new suitor. … Yesterday, US Airways increased its bid to $10.3 billion, up 20% from its original proposal, while people familiar with the situation said there have been recurring talks between Delta and Northwest Airlines Corp. about the two combining when each emerges from bankruptcy later this year. While Delta maintains its insistence that its future is brightest as a stand-alone carrier, the talks with Northwest suggest that Delta executives are grappling privately with how much more the airline can afford to pay to creditors to remain independent. Northwest has emerged as a 'promising third option,' according to one person familiar with the matter."

The New York Times (1/11, Bailey) reports, "A Northwest bid would probably be preferable to Delta managers because the two airlines' route networks overlap less than with Delta and US Airways. A combination with Northwest is therefore likely to lead to fewer grounded planes, if any." The Times adds, "The growing interest in Delta reflects the improving fortunes of the airline industry, which is starting to post rare profits, and also perhaps the start of a new wave of consolidation. … While the progress of any particular deal is a matter of conjecture, yesterday's events suggested that one or more airline mergers had become likelier than even a week ago."

The AP (1/11, Freed) reports, "No one knows if Northwest and Delta airlines will end up together, but the idea strikes some observers as sensible. … Recurring talks between the two carriers have taken place, the Wall Street Journal reported on Wednesday, citing anonymous sources. Both airlines declined to comment. Even if managers at the two bankrupt airlines make a deal, creditors would have to approve, too. … But observers pointed out that Delta Air Lines Inc.'s routes have less overlap with Northwest than with US Airways, which has proposed buying Delta. Northwest's domestic routes are concentrated in the Midwest and Asia, while Delta is strong in the South and East and over the Atlantic." The AP adds, "Less overlap could mean less resistance from antitrust regulators, said former Northwest board member and Northwest Capt. Mike Ristow. … 'In terms of a global network, they come up with something more attractive' than a Delta-US Airways merger would, said Daniel Kasper, managing director of aviation consulting firm LECG in Cambridge, Mass. LECG has done bankruptcy work for both Delta and Northwest."

Monsanto Expects DOJ Antitrust Review To Delay Delta And Pine Merger. The St. Louis Business Journal (1/11) reports, "Monsanto Co. said in a regulatory filing Tuesday that its proposed $1.5 billion acquisition of cotton seed breeder Delta and Pine Land Co. might be delayed past its mid-February targeted closing due to U.S. Department of Justice approvals." The Journal continues, "In its quarterly regulatory filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, Monsanto said that the deadline for the merger, initially announced in August, is Feb. 14, subject to an automatic extension of up to six months to complete regulatory reviews. The company said in the filing that it anticipates the regulatory process might extend beyond that date, invoking the automatic extension." The Journal adds, "The merger has been approved by the boards of both company's and Delta's shareholders approved the deal Dec. 21. The transaction is being reviewed by federal and state authorities, including the Department of Justice. … To make the deal more acceptable to regulators, Monsanto pledged in August to divest its Stoneville cottonseed business and is looking for potential buyers for that business."

Louisiana Pension Fund Sues Caremark Directors Over CVS Merger. The New York Times (1/11, Morgenson) reports, "A public pension fund in Louisiana has sued the directors of Caremark Rx, contending that their unanimous backing of the company's $21 billion merger with CVS over a rival $26 billion bid from Express Scripts improperly benefits Caremark executives at the expense of shareholders." The Times continues, "Among the benefits Caremark executives and directors will receive if the CVS deal goes through, the fund's lawsuit contends, are positions at the combined company and indemnification from penalties and fines that may result when criminal and regulatory investigations into possible stock option backdating by Caremark officials are concluded." The Times adds, "Yesterday, Express Scripts filed suit to block the CVS deal, arguing that the terms deal supported by the Caremark board prevents its directors from executing their fiduciary duties to shareholders. … The lawsuits, filed in Delaware Chancery Court, will once again bring the fiduciary duties of directors in the post-Enron world to the forefront. Delaware is where most major United States companies are incorporated." The Times notes, "Caremark accepted the CVS bid on Nov. 1, even though the stock-for-stock deal offered no premium to Caremark's market price at the time. … Caremark's directors have recommended that company shareholders approve the deal at a meeting that is expected to occur before March 16."

Express Scripts Urges Caremark Shareholders To Reject CVS Buyout. Bloomberg (1/11, Simison, Larkin) reports, "Express Scripts Inc. urged Caremark Rx Inc. shareholders to vote against a proposed $22.3 billion buyout by CVS Corp. while Caremark's chief blasted Express Scripts' $24.3 billion offer." Bloomberg continues, "Rejecting the CVS deal would clear the way for Caremark's board to 'give proper consideration to any other offer which it receives, including our proposal' in stock and cash, Express Scripts said today in a proxy statement." Bloomberg adds, "At the center of the dispute are competing proposals for restructuring the way Caremark handles a portion of the $251.8 billion in prescriptions distributed each year in the U.S. on behalf of employers and insurance companies. Buying Caremark would make Express Scripts the nation's largest manager of drug benefits. CVS, the second-largest U.S. drugstore chain, wants Caremark to gain power to negotiate medicine prices."

Cerberus May Bid For Equity Office. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, A3, Berman, Forsyth) reports, "Expectations were building last night that rival bidders might soon materialize to challenge the $20 billion buyout of Equity Office Properties Trust by Blackstone Group." The Journal continues, "Top real-estate and private-equity investors were buzzing that a competing offer could come within a matter of days, possibly from an investment team led by real-estate maven Barry Sternlicht of Starwood Capital Group Global LLC and Neil Bluhm of Walton Street Capital. The two were seriously considering an offer last night, said one person briefed on their plans. The two still haven't completed financing for an offer. One possible funding source could be Cerberus Capital Management, a New York-based financial conglomerate, people familiar with the matter said." The Journal adds, "A competing bid would set off what would be the most high-stakes and high-profile bidding war since the contest for RJR Nabisco nearly two decades ago. And it would be a potent indicator of the intensity of the competitive rivalry to buy companies. So far, buyout firms have observed an unstated gentleman's agreement not to top, or "jump" in Wall Street parlance, signed merger deals. But real-estate firms aren't party to that understanding."

The New York Times (1/11, Sorkin) reports, "A Cerberus offer could result in a bidding war for Equity Office, pitting two of the most powerful financial firms in the nation against each other for a deal that would be the largest leveraged buyout in history, surpassing the $33 billion that a consortium of private equity groups paid for the health care company HCA Inc. in August. … A bid by Cerberus would also be one of the first instances of a private equity firm's trying to top another firm's deal after an agreement had been struck."

EU Eyes Antitrust Action To Break Up Power Groups. The Financial Times (1/11, Buck) reports, "Neelie Kroes warned yesterday that she could use her powers as European Union competition commissioner to break up the region's large, integrated energy groups, opening up a potential new front in the broader regulatory crackdown on groups such as Eon, RWE and GdF." The Times continues, "Ms Kroes is a long-standing critic of gas and electricity suppliers that also control crucial transmission infrastructure, such as pipelines. She argues that integrated groups have used their grip on the networks to freeze out new entrants and stifle competition. … 'Ownership unbundling' - the break-up of integrated energy groups - through new legislation would take years, and is certain to face stiff opposition from some member states. … But Ms Kroes stressed that a break-up could be imposed on individual companies as part of an antitrust decision, for example as a punishment for violating EU competition rules. Asked whether forced unbundling was an option as part of an antitrust investigation, the commissioner replied: 'Absolutely.'" The Times notes, "The news is of special concern for Eon and RWE of Germany, GdF of France, Eni of Italy and OMV of Austria, since they are the subject of a Commission antitrust probe. The groups' offices were raided in May, following suspicions they had excluded rivals from wholesale markets and infrastructure and of 'possible collusion between incumbents in the form of market sharing', Ms Kroes said."

The New York Times (1/11, Kanter) reports, "European Union officials on Wednesday challenged governments to loosen their grip on national energy sectors, calling for a fresh wave of competition and investment in infrastructure and technology to ease dependence on powerful exporters like Russia and to combat global warming. … The region needs a new 'postindustrial revolution,' said the European Commission's president, José Manuel Barroso, announcing a number of energy proposals. 'We have already left behind our coal-based industrial past. It is time to embrace our low-carbon future.'" The Times adds, "The package of proposals is one of the largest ever presented by the commission, although it reflected changes by France and Germany, which oppose the breakup of their national electricity companies. … European Union officials also backed away from earlier, more ambitious targets for cutting emissions after energy-intensive industries and labor groups warned of threats to profits and jobs — especially if competitors in the United States and elsewhere did not follow suit. … Many of the proposals, which also aim to encourage the use of renewable fuels for cars and to improve the energy efficiency of buildings and home appliances, are to be debated by European Union leaders at a summit meeting in March. If they approve the package, many of the measures would still require the commission to draft formal legal proposals."

Bloomberg (1/11, Newman, Stearns) reports, "The European Commission, the EU's regulatory arm, wants to open competition to new entrants. Most incumbent energy companies own both production businesses and the units managing the pipes and power lines. The EU regulator wants separate owners for those businesses, a practice known as unbundling. The recommendations, to be discussed by EU leaders in March, are already meeting resistance from France and Germany." Bloomberg continues, "As part of the investigation into the region's 250 billion- euro ($325 billion) power and gas industry, the EU also probed utilities including E.ON AG, Gaz de France SA and Eni SpA for possible antitrust violations. The commission said energy companies may be illegally colluding to keep out rivals, calling the practice ``one of the most serious threats to competition." … Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes has threatened to fine energy companies as much as 10 percent of annual sales for failing to open their networks to competitors. Kroes also said she may break up companies if she finds they have illegally restricted competition."

Cisco Sues Apple Over IPhone Trademark. The AP (1/11, Robertson) reports, "Cisco Systems sued Apple Inc. in federal court Wednesday, saying the computer maker's new iPhone violates its trademark." The AP continues, "The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California, came just a day after Apple CEO Steve Jobs unveiled the Apple iPhone in dramatic fashion at a trade show in San Francisco. … But even while Jobs was trumpeting the product, the matter of the product's naming had not been resolved behind the scenes between two of Silicon Valley's biggest names." The AP adds, "San Jose-based Cisco, the world's largest network-equipment maker, has owned the trademark on the name 'iPhone' since 2000, when it acquired InfoGear Technology Corp., which originally registered the name. … Three weeks ago, Cisco's Linksys division put the trademark to use, releasing an Internet phone called 'iPhone' that uses the increasingly popular Voice over Internet Protocol, or VoIP. … But on Tuesday, Jobs unveiled Apple's own iPhone, a 'game-changing' touch-screen-controlled cell phone device that plays music, surfs the Web and delivers voicemail and e-mail."

USA Today (1/11, Kessler) reports, "Apple spokesman Steve Dowling calls the lawsuit 'silly.' He says several companies use the iPhone name for products, though he could not provide examples. Cisco's claims 'are tenuous,' he says." USA adds, "Apple has made inquiries about the iPhone name for several years, says Cisco general counsel Mark Chandler. Talks picked up in recent weeks and seemed to be going well, Chandler said Wednesday. But Apple stopped communicating with Cisco at about 9 p.m. PT Monday, he said. … Financial terms were not an issue, Chandler said. Cisco primarily wanted two things: clarity over who would use the iPhone name and interoperability between Apple's iPhone and other companies' products, he says. He would not provide specifics."

Griles Notified Of Pending Indictment. The New York Times (1/11, Shenon) reports J. Steven Griles, the "former No. 2 official in the Interior Department has been notified by federal prosecutors that he will most likely be indicted for lying about his relationship with the corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff, people with knowledge of the investigation said Wednesday." Barry Hartman, an attorney for Griles, said his client "was recently told by the Justice Department that he was a target of the investigation as a result of his testimony about Mr. Abramoff to a Senate committee in 2005." Two Bush Administration officials "who have been briefed on the case said the investigation of Mr. Griles and Mr. Abramoff had also brought scrutiny to a senior Justice Department official, Sue Ellen Wooldridge, an assistant attorney general. She submitted a letter of resignation on Monday and is expected to depart this month."

The AP (1/11, Heilprin) reports, "Also being investigated in relation to the grand jury probe is Sue Ellen Wooldridge, the assistant attorney general who oversees the Justice Department's environment and natural resources division, one person familiar with the investigation said. … Wooldridge sent in a resignation letter on Monday, saying she wanted to return to the private sector, Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said Wednesday. … Before joining the Justice Department in November 2005, she was the Interior Department solicitor and was deputy chief of staff to Interior Secretary Gale Norton while Griles was at Interior."

US Chamber Of Commerce Cites Foreign Sources Of Pollution. The Hill (1/11, Holzer) reports the US Chamber of Commerce is "petitioning the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) to make it easier for states, counties and cities to discount dust and smog that drifts across their borders from places as far-flung as China and Africa from their pollution levels in order to remain compliant with federal air-quality standards." While it is "well-documented that large plumes of particles and pollutants blow across the ocean," the Chamber "asserts that EPA guidance on the issue is so 'limited, deficient and complex' that states are at a loss as to how to get the relief, and so are failing to attract cement, steel and power companies that could create jobs."

Writer Decries Takings In "Post-Kelo World." In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (1/11, A14), William R. Maurer, executive director of the Institute for Justice, Washington chapter, writes, "The city of Burien, Wash., recently decided that a piece of property owned by the seven Strobel sisters that had long housed a popular diner-style restaurant was not upscale enough for the city's ambitious 'Town Square' development, which will feature condos, shops, restaurants and offices. Rather than condemn the property for a private developer and risk a lawsuit, Burien came up with a plan -- it would put a road through the property, and the city manager told his staff to 'make damn sure' it did. When a subsequent survey revealed that the road would not affect the building itself, but only sideswipe a small corner of the property, the staff developed yet another site plan that put the road directly through the building. A trial court concluded that the city's actions might be 'oppressive' and 'an abuse of power' -- but allowed the condemnation anyway. The Washington Court of Appeals affirmed, and the Washington Supreme Court refused to hear the case." Maurer continues, "Welcome to the post-Kelo world. The U.S. Supreme Court's 2005 decision made clear that the federal courts would not stop local governments across the country from condemning private property for economic development. While the court noted that states were free to provide greater protections for homes and small businesses if they chose, Washington state stands as evidence that a strong state constitution means little if the courts do not enforce it and local governments disregard it." Maurer concludes, "Regardless of strong constitutional protections for private property, governments and courts now view eminent domain as an area where few if any restrictions exist. … Meanwhile, state and federal courts are turning redevelopment areas into Constitution-free zones, where the government can do what it wants with few or no restrictions. It doesn't have to be this way. Courts could force the government to comply with the state and federal constitutions. Local governments could limit their takings only to legitimate public uses. But until all three branches of government begin taking their constitutional obligations seriously, property owners across the country face the continued threat of eminent-domain abuse, regardless of what the state or federal constitution says."

Exxon Appears To Backtrack On Global Warming. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, A2, Ball, 2.04M) reports, "In one of the strongest signs yet that U.S. industry anticipates government curbs on global-warming emissions, Exxon Mobil Corp., long a leading opponent of such rules, is starting to talk about how it would like them to be structured." Exxon's "top executives have openly questioned the scientific validity of claims that fossil-fuel emissions are warming the planet, and it has funded outside groups that have challenged such claims in language sometimes stronger than the company itself has used." Now, however, "Exxon has cut off funding to a handful of those outside groups. It says climate-science models that link greenhouse-gas concentrations to global warming are getting more reliable. And it is meeting in Washington with officials of other large corporations to discuss what form the companies would prefer a possible U.S. carbon regulation to take."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Urges Patience In Mexico Drug War. The San Antonio (TX) Express-News (1/11, Castillo) reports from Laredo, "Despite the Mexican government's inability to crack down on drug cartels responsible for thousands of deaths and kidnappings -- some Americans included among the victims -- the U.S. government is reserving judgment, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Wednesday during a border tour here." The Express-News continues, "Mexico's new president, Felipe Calderón, who already has sent troops to aid in the drug war, needs time to show his country's commitment, Gonzales said in brief remarks to reporters at the World Trade Bridge. … Gonzales met with local, state and federal law enforcement officials, some who brought up the issue of trustworthiness of their Mexican counterparts, said Rep. Henry Cuellar, D-Laredo, who participated in the briefing via phone." The Express-News adds, "More than 170 homicides were reported in Nuevo Laredo in 2006, but only a handful of arrests were made, much to the frustration of local U.S. agencies whose own investigations into crimes on this side of the border often lead them to the cartels operating in Mexico. … 'Let's give them the benefit of the doubt,' Gonzales said of his confidence in Mexico's cooperation. 'Let's just wait and see how it goes.' … Gonzales also announced $300,000 in additional funds to federal crime-fighting units in Laredo and McAllen. The so-called Strike Force brings federal and state officers together to share information. … The goal is to target 'not just the cartels themselves, but the transporters, money launders and smugglers,' Gonzales said."

On its Web site, KRGV-TV, Weslaco, Texas (1/10) reports a federal grant "is headed to the valley to help fight border crime. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez spent Wednesday in Laredo to tour the border, and announce a $300,000 grant to create a strike force." The strike force "will be made of members from the DEA, FBI, ICE, ATF, IRS and Texas Department of Public Safety. The agencies will work together to fight border crime more efficiently, as well as working to secure our border against the threat of terrorists sneaking into the country."

Gonzales Announces Drug Task Force Grant. WOAI-TV, San Antonio, TX (1/10, 6:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "The Attorney General toured Laredo. Alberto Gonzales announced a $300,000 grant for a task force to target drug cartels. The Attorney General also visited with customs agents at the World Trade Bridge and met with local leaders about their needs for more money for the war on drugs. Alberto Gonzales says he plans on working with Mexican officials on the missing person cases, but also needs help from the victim's families. What we're discovering is for various reasons, kidnappings are not reported. Obviously, we can't be helpful unless these kinds of crimes are reported." KXAN-TV, Austin, TX (1/10, 10:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "Kidnappings, drug violence and illegal immigration those problems brought Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to Texas-Mexico border today. He was invited by Laredo Congressman Henry Cuellar. Gonzales is looking for first-hand evidence of why Nuevo Laredo has been such a hotbed for killings and kidnappings." KCEN-TV, Waco, Temple, Bryan, TX (1/10, 6:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "Kidnappings along the Texas- Mexico border prompted a visit by US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales today. He was invited by Congressman Henry Cuellar of Laredo. Gonzales is seeing first hand how Nuevo Laredo has been such a hotbed for kidnappings and killings. KDF-TV, Corpus Christi, TX (1/10, 9:00 p.m.) also broadcasted this story.

SF Chronicle Criticizes DOJ Case Against BALCO Reporters. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/11, Egelko) reports, "The Chronicle told a federal appeals court (on Wednesday) that contempt-of-court orders against two reporters for refusing to disclose sources of leaked testimony about athletes and steroids were based on a false premise -- that the leak was a serious crime requiring a grand jury investigation." The Chronicle continues, "In a final round of written arguments to the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals challenging prison sentences for the reporters and fines for the newspaper, lawyers for the parent Hearst Corp. disputed prosecutors' position that journalists never have the right to withhold evidence from a grand jury investigating a crime." The Chronicle adds, "A 1972 Supreme Court ruling upholding contempt orders against reporters for refusing to disclose their sources to grand juries involved serious crimes, such as drug trafficking and plots of violence, that can be prosecuted only by grand jury indictments under the Constitution, said Jonathan Donnellan, a Hearst attorney. … By contrast, he said, the current case involves a violation of a secrecy order by U.S. District Judge Susan Illston that she could have investigated herself or referred to a special prosecutor." The Chronicle notes, "Either of those options would have allowed the reporters to claim the right to protect their sources, Donnellan said, and that right shouldn't be diminished by Illston's decision to refer the leak to the Justice Department, which chose to convene a grand jury."

US Charges 43 Alleged Cleveland Gang Members. The AP (1/11) reports, "Forty-three people accused of being gang members who sold cocaine and terrorized a Cleveland neighborhood have been indicted in an 18-month investigation, the top federal prosecutor in northern Ohio said Wednesday." The AP continues, "The indictment of those who investigators say are involved with the '7-Alls' gang was announced by U.S. Attorney Gregory A. White and officials from the FBI, the Drug Enforcement Administration and the city of Cleveland. … Officers seized drugs, weapons and $151,000 in the investigation, White said." The AP adds, "The charges include selling cocaine, conspiracy to sell cocaine and weapons counts. The indictments named as coconspirators two men apparently shot and killed by rival gangs during the investigation, White said. … The '7-Alls' name derived from the gang's involvement in violent crimes in 70's-numbered streets east of downtown Cleveland, officials said. … Last year U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced $15 million in federal grants to six areas, including Cleveland, to fight street gang violence. Grants also went to Los Angeles; Tampa, Fla.; Milwaukee; Dallas-Fort Worth and the Easton-Lancaster, Pa., corridor."

Local TV Coverage. WOIO-TV, Cleveland-Akron-Canton, Ohio (1/10) aired, "They have nicknames like Fat Boy, into, Boom or Bean. All locked up along with Chill Will and Little E, Puff and Pooh is off the streets, too. They're all members of a gang called the 7-Alls. They claim the 7s as their turf. In June we profiled the problems here. … The 7-Alls operated in the large yellow outlined area in the map. It's one of the heaviest in the city in arsons, assaults, stolen cars, burglaries, murders, rapes, robberies, thefts, drugs and weapons violations. One by one 35 of 43 indicted gang members were rounded up."

WJW-TV, Cleveland-Akron-Canton, Ohio (1/10) aired, "Thirty-five people arrested and indicted. Eight more still on the loose, and two unindicted coconspirators who were murdered while this investigation was going on. Three of these guys, some of the main suppliers of cocaine and other drugs [in] this city, according to U.S. Attorney Greg White. Their indictments are part of a six-city gang initiative begun by Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez. He came to Cleveland in June.

MS-13 Gang Members Charged With Racketeering In Nashville. The Nashville Tennessean (1/11, Howard) reports, "Thirteen members of the MS-13 street gang have been indicted by a federal grand jury on corruption and racketeering charges, local and federal officials announced today." The Tennessean continues, "Members of the international gang were charged for corruption and homicide under the RICO act created to fight organized crime, the most severe possible indictment, U.S. Attorney Craig Morford said at a press conference held at the federal courthouse this afternoon." The Tennessean adds, "The suspects are responsible for three homicides and several shootings or assaults in the Nashville area just in the last year and have been collecting dues to send to members in jail, according to the indictment. … All but one of the 13 suspects were already in federal or state custody when the indictments were handed down, Morford said, and the last suspect has since been arrested. … The investigation by Metro police and several federal agencies showed that MS-13 is highly organized and violent for the sake of harming rival gang members, Morford said."

18 Arrested In Alabama On Drug, Immigration Charges. The AP (1/10) reported authorities "took 18 people suspected of either drug trafficking or entering the country illegally into custody…in Hoover. Harold Willis, resident agent in charge of the DEA office in Birmingham, said 40 or 50 federal, state and local law enforcement officers wearing bulletproof vests were involved in the operation. … Willis said the DEA led the investigation because some of the men were suspected of drug trafficking."

Report: Barry Bonds Tested Positive For Amphetamines Last Season. The AP (1/11) reports baseball's Barry Bonds "failed a test for amphetamines last season, and originally blamed it on a teammate," the New York Daily News reported Thursday. "When first informed of the positive test, Bonds attributed it to a substance he had taken from teammate Mark Sweeney's locker, the…newspaper said, citing several unnamed sources. 'I have no comment on that,' Bonds' agent Jeff Borris told the Daily News on Wednesday night."

The New York Daily News (1/11) reports Bonds "was not punished for his transgression but instead was referred to treatment and counseling. While amphetamines are considered performance-enhancing drugs, they are treated differently than steroids under baseball's drug policy. Had Bonds failed a steroid test, he would have been suspended for 50 games, but under baseball's amphetamine policy no one is publicly identified or suspended until a second positive, which would result in a 25-game suspension." More than 100 news outlets are citing the Daily News report, including CNN, Forbes, the San Francisco Chronicle, Miami Herald, Contra Costa Times, and San Jose Mercury News.

US Disputes Haitian President's Assessment Of Anti-Drug Efforts. The AP (1/11) reports that on Wednesday the U.S. "defended…its anti-drug efforts in Haiti, two days after the Caribbean nation's president accused America and other major drug-consuming countries of failing to adequately fight the narcotics trade. In a strongly worded speech to Parliament on Monday, President Rene Preval called drug trafficking the main cause of instability in his impoverished nation and said failed efforts by the United States and other countries to stop the trade had made Haiti a 'victim.'" U.S. Embassy spokeswoman Shaila B. Manyam "said...the United States has undertaken a range of measures to defend Haiti against drug trafficking, including strengthening its weak justice system and training its coast guard. The U.S. has also contributed more than $40 million to Haiti's national police since 2004, Manyam said."

IMMIGRATION:

Dobbs Says Gonzales Should Clarify Immigration Law Enforcement. CNN Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/10, 6:23 p.m.) broadcasted, "There's currently no prohibition by congress on state and local authorities from enforcing immigration law. In fact congress has established a program to facilitate such cooperation. And outlaw cites from declaring themselves exempt from immigration law. … And I wonder what values are by which they will make that determination. The idea that the 1996 Federal law prohibits states, any entity, in this country from being a sanctuary, the Justice Department is not enforcing that law either. And that is a question that Alberto Gonzales should be answering to the American people right now."

9th Circuit Rules Chinese Fugitive Eligible For Asylum In US. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/10, Page A - 5, Egelko) reports, "A Chinese man who was beaten by officials in his homeland for protesting the forced sterilization of his brother, then fled to the United States, is eligible for political asylum under a law protecting opponents of China's reproductive policy, a federal appeals court ruled Tuesday." The Chronicle continues, "The Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco overturned an immigration court's ruling ordering the deportation of Li Bin Lin and told the immigration judges to determine whether Lin would face persecution in China. The ruling makes it likely that Lin will qualify for asylum, said his lawyer, Jisheng Li of Honolulu." The Chronicle adds, "Lin lived with his brother, their parents and other relatives in a house in Fujian province on China's southeast coast. When Lin's brother's wife became pregnant with their third child, officials told Lin's brother that he would have to undergo a vasectomy. … The brother left home to avoid the operation, and birth control officials came to the home in March 1998 to seize and destroy household furnishings, the court said. When Lin tried to stop them, they beat him and called security police to have him arrested, according to his court declaration. … He went into hiding and left two months later for the U.S. territory of Guam, where he still lives. His brother was eventually sterilized." The Chronicle notes, "When U.S. officials moved to deport Lin in 2001, he filed for asylum, relying on a 1996 law that makes immigrants eligible if they have been forced to undergo an abortion or sterilization, or if they have been persecuted for 'other resistance to a coercive population control program.' The law was intended to protect those who fled China because of its population-control policies. … The Board of Immigration Appeals, whose judges are Justice Department appointees, ruled against Lin, saying he had not shown resistance to the birth control program and had simply been trying to protect household property."

Hopes Higher For Agricultural Guest-Worker Bill. McClatchy (1/11, Doyle) reports the "introduction Wednesday of an ambitious agricultural guest-worker plan showcases the changed Capitol Hill circumstances that may make 2007 the year for an immigration overhaul." Joined by "lawmakers from Florida and California, and backed by hundreds of farm, labor and church groups," Sen. Larry Craig is "reintroducing a guest-worker plan that's been debated for years. As many as 1.5 million farm workers and their relatives now in this country illegally could gain legal status under the bill." The legislation, "dubbed AgJobs, would also revise an existing guest-worker program that farmers consider inefficient. It's the first big immigration overhaul bill introduced this year, mirroring legislation passed last year by the Senate but not the House of Representatives."

TAX:

Fourth Guilty Plea In KPMG Tax-Shelter Probe. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, C7, Davies, Reilly) reports, "A California accountant pleaded guilty yesterday to four criminal charges related to the sale of allegedly improper tax shelters and his role in helping a former KPMG LLP executive try to obstruct a government investigation into the products. The admission marks the fourth guilty plea the government has secured in its investigation into shelters designed by KPMG." The Journal continues, "As part of a deal with prosecutors, Steven Acosta, of Pasadena, Calif., admitted to conspiracy, tax evasion and two counts of obstruction of an Internal Revenue Service investigation. The 49-year-old faces as many as 16 years in prison but has agreed to testify against former KPMG executives facing criminal charges related to the shelters in a trial scheduled for September." The Journal adds, "Mr. Acosta worked briefly for KPMG, but he wasn't among the 19 individuals -- including 17 former KPMG executives -- indicted in November 2005 on criminal charges related to the tax shelters. Mr. Acosta, posing as an independent investment adviser and hedge-fund operator, said he helped David Greenberg, one of the indicted former KPMG executives, to sell shelters. … Mr. Acosta said he didn't have any knowledge or understanding of the transactions he was purportedly providing advice on. In return, Mr. Acosta said, Mr. Greenberg paid him $600,000 for his role. Prosecutors said Mr. Acosta also lied to IRS agents investigating the tax shelters and that his role in the fraud generated $100 million in losses to the government."

NYTimes Says Bush Tax Cuts Made Inequality Worse. The New York Times (1/11) says in an editorial, "The tax system in the United States is supposed to mitigate inequality. But a recent report by Congress's budget agency provides fresh evidence that Bush-era tax cuts have done more to reinforce inequality than to redress it." The agency "found that in 2004, the latest year for which comprehensive data were available, the top 1 percent of households pocketed 14 percent of total after-tax income in the United States, up from 12.2 percent in 2003. That increase, the third largest in one year since the agency started keeping track in 1979, works out to an extra $128 billion. And yet despite that hefty gain, the effective federal tax rate of the top 1 percent decreased slightly."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senate Democrats Angered By New Judicial Nominees. The Hill (1/11, Schor) reports, "As President Bush withdrew four contentious judicial nominees, apparently offering an olive branch to the new Senate majority, he resubmitted a handful of executive-branch nominations that have angered and dismayed senior Democrats." The Hill continues, "The White House's acknowledgment that its withdrawn judicial picks would face near-certain rejection in the new Congress won praise from Democrats and their allied interest groups. But the renewal late Tuesday of several agency nominations signals that Bush is not backing away from confrontation with Democrats who have held up many of the appointments and could renew their previous holds." The Hill adds, "Several of the re-nominated officials, such as Assistant Secretary of Homeland Security for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement Julie Myers and Assistant Secretary of State for Population, Refugees and Migration Ellen Sauerbrey, already are serving in the administration under recess appointments that allowed them to sidestep Senate confirmation votes but expired at the end of the 109th Congress. John Bolton, who became America's ambassador to the United Nations following a recess appointment, opted to step down from the post last month rather than face a bruising Senate battle to win formal confirmation. … Steven Bradbury's nomination to lead the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel was blocked in August by Sens. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) and Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin (Ill.) in protest of the administration's denial of security clearances necessary to investigate warrantless surveillance conducted by the National Security Agency (NSA). Though Justice since has initiated an internal inquiry of the NSA program, Kennedy said yesterday he wants more time for oversight before Bradbury is considered."

House Votes To Increase Minimum Wage. NBC Nightly News (1/10, story 6, :20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The new Democratic majority in Congress kept a campaign promise today, as the House voted to increase the Federal minimum wage from the current $5.15 an hour to $7.25 an hour. That $2.10 raise is the first raise in the minimum wage in 10 years. The bill now goes onto the Senate." The CBS Evening News (1/10, story 10, :25, Couric, 7.66M) said the bill faces opposition in the Senate, where Republicans want any wage hike tied to tax cuts for small businesses." ABC World News (1/10, story 4, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) also reported "the White House said...while President Bush supports the increase, he wants it coupled with tax relief to ease the pain of some of the small business owners we saw in Dean's report."

The AP (1/11, Espo) reports Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "has already signaled that Democrats will accept pro-business changes. Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, told reporters that he and other lawmakers are working on between $8 billion and $10 billion in relief over 10 years."

The Wall Street Journal (1/11, A2, Rogers, 2.04M) reports, "When Congress last approved a minimum-wage increase in 1996, the attached business-tax benefits approached $20 billion -- or twice what is now envisioned." But Baucus "is reluctant to go further and use up more of his tax offsets, options he will need in the future to pay for Democratic energy initiatives as well as some form of middle-class protection from the Alternative Minimum Tax." Instead, "he and the ranking Republican, Iowa Sen. Charles Grassley, are expected to rely on a small reservoir of tax-shelter changes that the Senate has passed before but were resisted by the House when under Republican control. Among these targets are leasing tax shelters known as sale in and lease out transactions, which have been criticized by the Internal Revenue Service and which Congress has largely outlawed for leases entered into after March 12, 2004." The New York Times (1/11, Hulse, 1.16M), Washington Post (1/11, A6, Weisman, 690K) and Washington Times (1/11, Hurt, 88K), among other newspapers, run similar reports this morning.

USA Today (1/11, Wolf, 2.27M) reports that in the House, "Republicans offered to raise the wage if the increase was accompanied by tax and health care breaks for the nation's 23 million small businesses. … The GOP plan, which would let companies band together to buy health plans, was rejected by a 2-1 ratio. Then, 40% of Republicans voted for the wage hike alone." McClatchy (1/11, Talev) notes the final tally was 315 to 116.

Washington State Businesses Not Hurt By Higher Minimum Wage. The New York Times (1/11, Egan) reports on how the difference in state minimum wage between Washington state, $7.93 per hour, and Idaho, $5.15 per hour, has affected the local economies across the state line. The Times says that "nearly a decade ago, when voters in Washington approved a measure that would give the state's lowest-paid workers a raise nearly every year, many business leaders predicted that small towns on this side of the state line would suffer. But instead of shriveling up, small-business owners in Washington say they have prospered far beyond their expectations." Businesses "here at the dividing line between two economies — a real-life laboratory for the debate — have found that raising prices to compensate for higher wages does not necessarily lead to losses in jobs and profits."

White House Weighs In Against House Stem Cell Bill. The New York Times (1/11, Swarns, 1.16M) reports, "The Bush administration jumped back into the bitter debate surrounding embryonic stem cell research on Wednesday, urging lawmakers to vote against House legislation to expand such research and calling for a new focus on scientific studies that would not harm embryos." In a White House position paper, "officials pressed for consideration of alternative research strategies that would be "free of the ethical violations of embryo destruction." Administration officials said President Bush was also considering an executive order that would call for increased financing for studies that did not involve embryos. The move came as the House prepared to pass a bill on Thursday that would expand federally supported stem cell research." The legislation, sponsored by Reps Diana DeGette, a Democrat, and Michael N. Castle, a Republican, "would permit federal financing of studies on stem cells derived from embryos at fertility clinics that are scheduled for destruction." The Times adds, "Supporters of the House bill acknowledged, however, that they did not expect to have enough votes to override a presidential veto."

The Washington Post (1/11, A4, Weiss, 690K) reports, "Congressional leaders driving the legislation say they hope to avoid all-out war. Compromise language 'is welcome,'" said DeGette Tuesday. But "if it comes to war, members of Congress and aides from both parties said, supporters have many options not available to them last year. They range from subtle moves that could enhance the odds of overriding a veto to heavy-handed tactics such as attaching the bill to must-pass budget legislation. 'I'm confident we'll have a veto-proof bill this time,' said Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.)." USA Today (1/11, Vergano, 2.27M) notes that last year, the bill passed the House 235-193. According to Democratic Sen. Tom Harkin, "a veto-proof majority is more likely in the Senate" this time around.

Bush, Congressional Democrats Expected To Clash On Host Of Issues. Roll Call (1/11, Pierce, Stanton) reports that aside from a minimum wage measure and a lobby and ethics reform bill, President Bush and "the new Democratic-controlled Congress" are "on a collision course on most other issues of national importance this year" such as "a $100 billion-plus supplemental Iraq War spending bill, judicial nominations, a stem-cell research measure, and legislation to give Medicare officials the ability to negotiate lower drug prices." No one "disputes that the highest profile fight will be over the supplemental war spending bill, where Democrats are no doubt poised to use their newfound power to try to make good on their election promises to change the way the war has been run."

Medicare Drug Negotiation Bill Unlikely To Lower Prices. The Washington Post (1/11, A14, Lee) reports Democrats are "fond of citing the Department of Veterans Affairs as evidence that Medicare officials could squeeze lower prices out of drugmakers if the government merely used its negotiating clout. But that comparison ignores important differences between the two systems, experts say." Unlike Medicare, VA "by law receives an automatic 24 percent discount from the average price that wholesalers pay. Its prices are also low because VA, which prescribes medications for 4.4 million veterans annually, has a relatively narrow formulary, or list of approved drugs." VA also "secures big discounts from the manufacturers of a few drugs in each class by promising not to offer competing drugs." But the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) "is prohibited by law from adopting such a list for the year-old Medicare drug benefit, in part because seniors enrolled in what is known as Part D want to have a wide range of drug choices." The House Democratic bill that would "require the Bush administration to negotiate drug prices for Medicare would neither permit a formulary nor require an automatic discount. It would simply require the secretary of health and human services to pursue negotiations and report back to Congress in six months." That is "part of the reason that many experts do not expect the measure to deliver significant savings even if it overcomes opposition in Congress and escapes a possible presidential veto."

The Hill (1/11, Young) reports congressional Democrats are "moving ahead without asking the Bush administration to weigh in, but that hasn't stopped the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) from taking a lead role in pleading the Republican case against Democrats' claims that federal negotiation of drug prices will save money for taxpayers and senior citizens over the deals the private Part D plans are striking with pharmaceutical companies." The Administration's "mounting campaign against the Democratic proposal also is accompanied by a more aggressive defense of Medicare Part D by congressional Republicans, most of whom previously had appeared reluctant to claim credit for the creation of the entitlement program expansion despite high approval ratings from beneficiaries."

Leavitt Criticizes Democratic Push To Negotiate Prices. In a Washington Post op-ed (1/11, A25), Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt says, "Legislation under consideration would require the secretary of health and human services to negotiate and set the prices of drugs. In effect, one government official would set more than 4,400 prices for different drugs, making decisions that would be better made by millions of individual consumers. There is also the danger that government price setting would limit drug choices. Medicare provides access to the broadest array of prescription drugs, including the newest drugs. But price negotiation inevitably results in the withholding of access to some drugs to get manufacturers to lower prices."

Kennedy Looks To States To Promote Universal Healthcare. The Financial Times (1/11, Callan) reports Sen. Edward Kennedy "called on the White House to follow the lead of state governors and move to extend healthcare coverage to the uninsured." The move "follows a plan set out by Arnold Schwarzenegger, the Republican governor of California, this week that would extend healthcare to 6.5m uninsured Californians. Mr Kennedy also cited bipartisan co-operation in his home state of Massachusetts, which is the first state to require all residents to have a health plan."

DOJ_NMG_0115084

The AP (1/11, Freking) reports Kennedy "has his own version of what universal health coverage would look like. He wants to extend Medicare to all. In his first hearing Wednesday as chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, the Massachusetts Democrat called on 10 witnesses from all over the country to talk about how to make health care more affordable." However, the hearing "also showed that finding agreement won't be easy. While all the witnesses agreed that health care is becoming less affordable every year, they often had very different solutions."

Durbin To Play Key Role In Passage Of Democratic Agenda. In his Washington Post column (1/11, A25) David Broder notes Senate Majority Whip Richard Durbin's role in the passage of the Democrats' 100 hour agenda: "In the next two years, however, a great deal of the Democrats' fate depends on Durbin. As assistant majority leader, or whip, it is up to him to figure out how to corral enough votes in the narrowly divided Senate to pass at least some of the flood of bills that the energized House Democratic majority will send over." Durbin said, "'I just spent two years as minority whip where I had 45 Democratic votes. And, as you well know, if you can find 41 votes to block cloture' -- the move to cut off debate -- you can prevent the majority from bringing its bills to an up-or-down vote." GOP Minority Whip Trent Lott "has the same job, but he has 49 Republican senators, so he has a larger pool from which to find his 41." Broder adds, "While Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada leads the policy debates and handles the public relations, the onus is on Durbin to produce the votes at critical moments."

Reid's Efficiency Plan Costs Byrd Chance To Cast Vote. The Washington Post (1/11, A23, Cillizza) reports, "Just days into his tenure as majority leader," Sen. Harry Reid "received a tongue-lashing from" West Virginia Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D) "for a decision to end a vote before the senior statesman had cast his 'yea' or 'nay.'" Byrd, who has "served in the Senate since 1958 and is a noted stickler for the rules and etiquette that guide the chamber, was unable to make it to the floor in the 15 minutes allotted for a vote yesterday -- his first missed vote since March." Byrd said, "The leadership arbitrarily closed the vote before I could get to the floor. That is not the way legislation is done in a body such as ours." The Post adds Reid has "emphasized his intention to run the body more efficiently, a plan that includes limiting votes, which often have lasted a half-hour or more, to just 15 minutes."

New House GOP Leadership Includes Aggressive Party Advocates. The Washington Times (1/11, Bellantoni) reports House Republicans have "chosen leaders who aren't afraid to attack Democrats to serve in key positions for the 110th Congress, suggesting that the civility on Capitol Hill may not last long." In one example, Rep. Patrick T. McHenry of North Carolina, "beginning his second term, was recently named to serve as a member of the deputy Republican whip team, typically made up of more senior lawmakers. Considered one of the party's up-and-comers, the 31-year-old is known for his frequent tongue-lashings aimed at Democrats." The Times adds the Republicans are "also quick to note Democrats' use of unfair tactics -- such as not subjecting their opening legislative package to committee hearings -- but did not acknowledge that they used the same strategy for years."

Bush Appoints Dudley To Regulatory Policy Post. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, B7, McKinnon, Solomon) reports President Bush "appointed conservative academic Susan Dudley to an influential new job advising on regulatory policy, at a time the regulatory process could serve as a conduit for the White House to push through any policies opposed by a hostile Congress." Dudley's appointment "came after Congress blocked her nomination to be the White House's regulatory czar last year. Her position as a senior adviser to the White House's regulatory office will enable her to influence policy decisions, although she won't be able to implement them on her own." The "apparent end run around Capitol Hill angered liberals who object to her criticism of the federal rule-making process, among other things."

Four Banks Object To US "Basel II" Capital Standards. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, C5, Paletta, Pulizzi) reports, "Citigroup Inc., J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., and two other large U.S. banks brought concerns about pending international capital standards known as Basel II to White House officials as crucial deadlines for the standards approach." The Jan. 4 meeting "represents the most recent -- and perhaps highest level -- attempt by the group of banks, which include Wachovia Corp. and Washington Mutual Inc., to bring substantive changes to the Basel II capital proposal before next year. The Federal Reserve and other bank regulators are still discussing how to implement the standards by next January."

"Whistleblower" Secretly Records VA Official Avowing Defiance Of Congress. Under the headline, "Tape Reveals Defiance," The Hill (1/11, Bolton) reports that a "secretly recorded meeting of researchers working for the Department of Veterans Affairs indicates that the department did not take seriously congressional requests intended to safeguard the personal and medical information of veterans. The recording, obtained by The Hill from a researcher who attended the meeting, sheds light on a behind-the-scenes struggle between lawmakers and Veterans Affairs officials over the handling of veterans' personal information." Since the May laptop theft, the House Veterans' Affairs Committee "has asked the department repeatedly to report on the security of its information systems, a task that entails providing information about who had access to sensitive information and how it was stored," and reports have also been requested by the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee. However, Dr. Joseph Francis, "the deputy chief of research and development at the department," told fellow researchers at a September meeting in Baltimore "that Congress would not get what it was looking for." Noting the 1996 federal legislation "directing executive-branch departments to adopt higher cyber-security standards," Francis said, "Congress is actually rather angry at the VA because we've been technically breaking the law for a decade." The meeting attendee "whistleblower" who "secretly recorded the talk" told the Hill that the incident "really illustrates that, to the researchers at the VA, the veterans are guinea pigs and are there to promote the research, which is used in turn to promote researchers' careers."

Pelosi Bans Smoking In Speaker's Lobby. The Hill (1/11, McCormack) reports, "House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) announced Wednesday that smoking in the Speaker's Lobby will no longer be permitted. 'The days for smoke-filled rooms in the United States Capitol are over,' Pelosi said in a press release issued this morning."

Roll Call (1/11, Mcardle) reports, "When asked about Pelosi's new ban, Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), who is known for having an ever-present cigarette in hand when doing interviews in the ornate room just off the House floor, said, 'That's fine. ... No it won't affect me at all.'" Democratic Rep. Barney Frank, "a well-known cigar smoker, said, 'It's not a big deal. If it had come to a vote on it I would have voted against it.'" USA Today (1/11, Dorell, 2.27M) reports Frank also "told reporters asking about the ban to call back 'when you have some serious issues you want to talk about.'"

The Wall Street Journal (1/11, A4, Mullins, 2.04M) reports "smokers say they will either step outside to smoke or light up in their offices, where smoking is permitted." In the Senate, "smoking is allowed only in senators' offices. The smell of cigar smoke often hangs in the air outside the Capitol office of Sen. Robert Byrd (D., W. Va.), while visitors can catch Sen. Barack Obama (D., Ill.) sneaking a few puffs outside the building."

The New York Times (1/11, Kornblut, 1.16M) reports, "Whether Democrats are any less inclined to make backroom deals than Republicans, the new majority will be remembered for bringing the rules of the House into line with those in the rest of the District of Columbia, numerous states and corporations, several European countries and all major airlines."

The Washington Post (1/11, A7, Layton, 690K) notes "Pelosi, of smoke-free California, is known to detest the tobacco habit. Ever since her ascension as top Democrat with authority over the lobby and most other space in the House, smokers have been bracing for the moment when they'd be ordered to extinguish their butts." The Los Angeles Times (1/11, Simon, 850K) runs a similar report.

Stevens To Push Paid Parental Leave Measures. The Washington Post's (1/11, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "Many companies offer paid parental leave to their employees after the birth of a child, but not Uncle Sam. Naturally, young federal employees would like the government to offer such family leave, but personnel officials have balked, saying that the government already provides a generous package of vacation and sick leave and that more paid time off would not improve recruitment and retention of employees." The Post adds that Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens (R) wants to revisit that issue "this year," and has "introduced a bill that would provide eight weeks of paid leave to federally employed women after childbirth and five days of paid leave for new fathers. The bill also would provide five days of paid leave to federal employees who adopt children." The Post adds, "Stevens is working on another bill to require companies with more than 50 employees to provide paid maternity leave."

Bernanke To Testify Before Senate Budget Committee Next Week. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, Ip, Rogers) reports Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke's "efforts to stay out of politically charged fiscal questions will be tested next week as he makes his inaugural appearance before a congressional budget committee." Bernanke is to "testify on the fiscal and economic outlook before the Senate Budget Committee Thursday, Jan. 18. Committee officials confirmed the appearance Wednesday." Bernanke "has said he does not want to comment on specific tax and spending proposals, saying those are the purview of Congress and the administration."

Bills Would Cut Off Pensions For Convicted Lawmakers In Future. The Washington Times (1/11, Miller) reports former Democratic Rep. James A. Traficant Jr., "convicted of racketeering and taking bribes, is wiling away prison time painting colorful pictures but also able to collect a congressional pension of nearly $40,000 a year." Traficant is "one of about 20 former senators and congressmen with felony rap sheets who can receive the taxpayer-financed benefit." Rep. Mark Steven Kirk "introduced a bill that would stop future congressional felons from pocketing retirement pay," and a "similar measure is being offered by Democratic Sens. Ken Salazar of Colorado and John Kerry of Massachusetts in an amendment to that chamber's ethics reform bill, which is expected to go to a vote tomorrow." Other "recent convicts include former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a California Republican convicted of graft and imprisoned last year, and former Rep. Bob Ney, an Ohio Republican convicted last year of corruption charges tied to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Cunningham is eligible for about $36,000 a year, while Ney is in line for a $29,000 annual pension, according to estimates from the National Taxpayers Union (NTU)."

Cheney Addresses Virginia VIPs At Jamestown Anniversary Event. The Washington Post (1/11, B1, Kunkle) reports Wednesday was "the highest-profile event so far in a series that began last year to commemorate the settlement of Jamestown. To mark the 400th anniversary, Vice President Cheney addressed members of the General Assembly inside the cramped Memorial Church that was built in 1907, and legislators toured the grounds of the settlement where representative democracy would take hold. The festivities will culminate in a three-day celebration this May and a visit by Queen Elizabeth II." A "major theme of yesterday's event was that Virginia's key role in the creation of American democracy has sometimes been overshadowed by New England's. A whoop went up when Cheney noted that the Jamestown colonists had already convened a representative assembly by the time the Pilgrims arrived on the Mayflower." Another theme, "also touched on by Cheney, was that the Europeans' many glowing achievements had been accompanied by more unpleasant realities, such as the enslavement of African Americans and the destruction of Native Americans."

The Washington Times/AP (1/11, Potter, Lewis) reports Cheney said it was "fitting for Virginia to begin its 2007 legislative session at the place where representative democracy in America was born, Vice President Dick Cheney told legislators yesterday." In a speech "that stressed themes of religious faith, sacrifice and personal courage, Mr. Cheney helped open the Virginia General Assembly's winter session at the site where the first English settlement in North America was established 400 years ago." Cheney said, "It's striking to realize how much of America's story begins with a little three-sided fort raised on the banks of the James River four centuries ago."

Congressional Press Secretaries' Dinner Questioned. The Washington Post (1/11, Romano) reports in its "In The Loop: On The Hill" column, "While the Senate began debating stricter ethics rules for its members this week, a fancy dinner planned for some Senate press secretaries tomorrow night in New York, paid for with corporate money, has raised a few eyebrows." The "two dozen flacks will arrive in Manhattan today for an annual excursion to meet with media outlets, a trip sanctioned by the Senate ethics committee as 'official' business." Aides "pay for costs out of pocket -- Amtrak, W Hotel, chartered bus -- and later request reimbursement from official funds." The "'gasp' factor, as one corporate executive put it, centers on the $200-a-head closing dinner at the elite Rainbow Room, one of the country's best-known upscale restaurants, sponsored by seven high-profile corporations with business interests before Congress." As far as "the ethics watchdogs are concerned, the dinner doesn't pass the smell test."

OTHER NEWS:

Trade Deficit Down Again. The New York Times (1/11, Peters, 1.16M) reports, "American companies sold more goods like airplanes, cars and precious metals overseas in November, helping to narrow the trade deficit for a third consecutive month. Despite the improvement, the United States is still on track to end 2006 with a record trade imbalance, eclipsing the $716.7 billion deficit in 2005." The Census Bureau "reported yesterday that the trade deficit -- the amount by which the value of America's imports of goods and services exceeded the value of its exports -- fell to $58.2 billion in November, the smallest it has been since July 2005. In October, the deficit was $58.8 billion." The Times adds, "Yesterday's figures surprised many economists, most of whom expected the deficit to widen." The Wall Street Journal (1/11, A2, Bater, 2.04M) says "the data suggest trade has emerged as an important cushion for the economy, as it adjusts to a sizable contraction in housing activity." Trade "has for years been a drag on US growth, as weak economic growth abroad, strong consumption at home and a strong dollar held back the nation's exports and boosted imports."

Oil Prices Fall To 19-Month Low. NBC Nightly News (1/10, story 8, :30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "[A]s this new year has got under way, a funny thing has happened to the price of oil – it has plummeted. Oil prices dropped another $1.62 just today, leaving them at $54.02 a barrel. That's the lowest level in 19 months. As heating oil supply is now way ahead of demand because of the warm weather many of us have been experiencing. Overall, oil prices are down nearly 12% since just the start of the year."

Stocks Rally. The CBS Evening News (1/10, story 12, :10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The was a rally in the stock market on Wall Street today. The Dow was up more than 25 and half points [to close at 12,442.16] The NASDAQ gained 15 and a half [to close at 2,459.33]." NBC Nightly News (1/10, story 7, :10, Williams, 9.87M) also notes the numbers on Wall Street.

Realtors Predict Decline In Home Sales Decline Will Moderate. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, D2, Walsh) reports the National Association of Realtors forecasts that "US home sales will decline less sharply this year than they did last year, while home-price appreciation is expected to gain steam." NAR said "sales of existing homes are likely to decline about 1.2% this year to 6.42 million, following a sharp drop last year, while sales of new homes are seen falling about 9.7% to 957,000." Because the market is "starting this year at a relatively low point, even a gradual recovery of sales during the year would mean that annual totals for 2007 are likely to show no substantial improvement, according to NAR Chief Economist David Lereah." The group "forecasts the median sales price for existing homes to grow 1.5% nationally to $225,300, following last year's estimated 1.1% rise. The national median price for new homes will increase 3% this year to $248,900, according to the NAR, after estimated growth of 0.3% last year."

Economists Remain At Odds Over Persistence Of Poverty. In his Wall Street Journal column (1/11, A7), David Wessel says, "With a few remarkable exceptions -- South Korea, for one -- the gap between rich and poor nations persists. The notion that there was something special about 'development economics' dates to post-World War II years when mostly poor, mostly rural colonies gained their independence." Anne Krueger, former International Monetary Fund official, believes "Third World governments and their First World advisers applied sound economic principles incorrectly or without sufficient attention to the reality. Policies to encourage exports and shield embryonic industries from imports until they got rolling sounded good, for instance, but bred corruption, infantilized industries and created politically powerful vested interests that blocked needed change." Another view is "that poor countries got bad advice and paid the price, but that today's experts know much more than their predecessors." A third view "is that earlier economists focused on the wrong thing." Some economists argue "that what really matters is having solid political, legal and economic institutions -- courts, central banks, honest bureaucrats, private-property rights -- that allow entrepreneurs to flourish."

High Court Seen As Likely To Limit Political Use Of Union Dues. USA Today (1/11, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports, "The Supreme Court appeared ready Wednesday to uphold a Washington state law that restricts when unions can use fees collected from non-members for political purposes. The dispute is being watched closely by the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation and other anti-union groups, as well as the AFL-CIO." The case "revolves around the Washington Education Association, which bargains for the state's 70,000 teachers."

McClatchy (1/11, Henderson) reports the Supreme Court "already has said non-members must be able to 'opt out' of paying for political activity; the Washington law went further, saying unions must get them to 'opt in' before pursuing political causes with their money." Chief Justice John G. Roberts, and Justices Antonin Scalia, Anthony Kennedy and Samuel Alito seemed to agree with the law. Justices John Paul Stevens, David Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg also "hammered the union's lawyer with questions that reflected serious doubt about his arguments." Justice Stephen Breyer seemed "similarly inclined, but less certain. Justice Clarence Thomas, as is his custom, said nothing during arguments." The Washington Post (1/11, A7, Barnes, 690K) and New York Times (1/11, Greenhouse, 1.16M) run similar stories.

Vote Machine Firm Critical Of Letter Supporting FL13 Challenge. Roll Call (1/11, Murray) reports the Nebraska-based "electronic voting machine manufacturer at the center of the still-contested Congressional race in Florida's 13th district demanded Tuesday that a court throw out what the company characterized as a threatening letter from House Democrats." Lawyers for Election Systems & Software "filed the motion with Florida appellate Judge Jon Wheeler in response to a letter that House Administration Chairwoman Juanita Millender-McDonald (D-Calif.) sent the court last week." Millender-McDonald "wrote that Christine Jennings, the Democratic candidate in the Nov. 7 race to replace former Rep. Katherine Harris (R), has preserved her right to contest the election before Millender-McDonald's committee. So the court, she said, has an obligation to consider all the facts of the case, an apparent reference to a Dec. 29 lower court ruling not to require Election Systems & Software to disclose how its electronic voting machines work."

YouTube Video Prompts Romney To Reassert Conservative Credentials. The AP (1/11, Johnson) reports a 1994 videotape "mysteriously posted on YouTube.com prompted Republican Mitt Romney to declare Wednesday, 'I was wrong on some issues back then,' while also insisting to social conservatives key to his presidential campaign that he is one of them." The tape "of a Senate debate between Romney and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy showed Romney defending a woman's right to abortion, saying he supported allowing gays in the Boy Scouts and distancing himself from former President Reagan by noting he was a registered independent during the period the conservative icon was leading the nation." While the material "has been previously published," its "presentation in video form — and on the easily shared YouTube medium — prompted an immediate response from Romney, who formed a presidential exploratory committee last week." Romney said, "If you want to know where I stand by the way, you don't just have to listen to my words, you can go to look at my record as governor."

Gilmore's Chances To Win GOP '08 Nomination Seen As Slim. In his Roll Call column (1/11), political analyst Stuart Rothenberg critically assesses former Virginia Gov. Jim Gilmore's chances to win the Republican presidential nomination in 2008. Rothenberg says, "But caucuses and primaries aren't only about ideology. They also are about candidates, organization and money. Maybe time has distorted my memory, but I don't remember him as being a dynamic, inspiring conservative speaker. Others I have spoken with remember him much as I do." Gilmore "begins with no name identification, no money and no organization."

Democratic Candidates Face "Electability" Litmus Test. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, A6, Calmes) reports that for the party "long known for subjecting presidential wannabes to a battery of litmus tests, on issues from abortion to trade, Democrats are uniting in raising one big issue for 2008: electability." It "poses a big hurdle for both Democratic front-runners, Sens. Hillary Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois." The "widespread concerns about whether either could get elected -- Mrs. Clinton because she is a woman, and a polarizing figure; Mr. Obama for being African-American, and relatively inexperienced -- potentially prevent either from running away with the Democratic nomination. That, in turn, is what keeps hope alive for about a half-dozen rivals maneuvering for advantage should the leaders stumble." Of the pack, "polls and early organization suggest the best-positioned is former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, the 2004 vice-presidential nominee. Today Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut officially joins the race with his announcement on the syndicated radio show 'Imus in the Morning.'" On the GOP side, the three frontrunners, Sen. John McCain, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani,

"have the opposite problem of their Democratic counterparts. Each of them is considered electable. The question is whether they can get nominated in a party in which the conservative base demands that the nominee oppose abortion, same-sex marriage and taxes, but believes that each of these men is suspect."

Dodd To Run For President. The AP (1/11, Fouhy, Ramer) reports Connecticut Sen. Christopher Dodd (D), "a veteran lawmaker who entered Congress in the post-Watergate class of 1974, will announce his bid for the presidency, Democratic officials said Wednesday." Dodd "will make the formal announcement in an interview Thursday morning on the 'Imus in the Morning' radio show -- a curious bit of timing since he'll be forced to compete with heavy coverage of President Bush's speech on the Iraq war." The New York Times (1/11, Medina, 1.16M) also notes "coverage of Mr. Dodd's announcement would be competing with" that of Bush's speech. The Times adds that Dodd, "although well-known in Washington and his home state, does not have the kind of national name recognition of some other Democrats who are strongly considering entering the race, most prominently Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois."

Clinton Losing Ground In Early Caucus, Primary States. The Washington Times (1/11, Lambro) reports Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's "popularity in Democratic presidential-preference polls has fallen in the nation's first caucus and primary states in the face of increasing support for her chief rivals for the 2008 nomination." Pollsters said her "weaknesses in Iowa and New Hampshire were the result of the growing popularity of two major opponents -- former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama -- and their populist economic messages, as well as a deepening antipathy toward her among Democratic-leaning independents who dislike her support for the war in Iraq and who question her electability." Pollster Del Ali of Research 2000 said, "I think Hillary strikes these voters the same way Senator John Kerry did in 2004. They would really like to vote for someone they really like this time. Hillary doesn't fit that characterization right now." The Times add Ali's "findings mirror more recent polling showing a similar national decline in support." Pollster John Zogby said, "There's been erosion. She's polling in the low- to mid-40s nationally."

Kerry Adds Campaign Strategists To Staff. The Washington Post (1/11, Romano) reports in its "On The Hill" column, "As Ted Kennedy (D-Mass.) waits patiently for his Senate colleague John Kerry to get off the fence and reveal his presidential intentions, the 2004 Democratic standard-bearer is adding high-profile operatives who could easily slide into campaign mode." Kerry has "brought on as a consultant Erik Smith, onetime communications strategist for former congressman Dick Gephardt (D-Mo.), and Vince Morris, most recently the spokesman for former D.C. mayor Anthony Williams, as his Senate press secretary."

Denver Labor Woes Lead Democrats To Postpone Convention Decision. The Washington Times (1/11, Richardson) reports Denver has not "hosted the Democratic National Convention in almost 100 years" because it is "just not a union-friendly town." The Democratic National Committee has "again postponed its decision on whether Denver or New York will be the venue for its 2008 convention, thanks to a recent labor uprising in the Mile High City." With all the "labor trouble in Denver, Democrats might be tempted to scrap the whole idea and head for New York, but there's trouble in the Big Apple, too. Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg hinted that he doesn't want to host the event, saying that the city was tapped out after hosting the Republican National Convention in 2004." The delay "puts Democrats months behind Republicans, who announced in September that their convention would be held in Minneapolis-St. Paul and have even sent out press kits."

Sanchez May Run For California Governor In 2010. Roll Call (1/11, Drucker) reports Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D) "continues to give serious consideration to running for governor in 2010, as well as for the Senate, should Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) choose not to seek a fourth term. In preparation for a statewide run, Sanchez -- who has had a gubernatorial campaign account open for several months -- plans to spend the next few years traveling up and down California to meet with constituent groups." Roll Call adds, "In a recent interview, Sanchez said she is 'absolutely serious' about running for governor in 2010, when Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) will be termed out of office and the seat will open."

Johnson Illness May Give GOP Opening In South Dakota. The Hill (1/11, Blake) reports the illness of Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) "could open things up again in 2008 for Dakota Republicans, who have long struggled for a breakthrough in their congressional representation. If recent history is any indication, however, it will be hard-fought and expensive to make a dent in Democrats' stranglehold on the Washington delegations." Democrats have "held at least five of the states' six congressional seats for the last 20 years." Former Republican state Sen. Larry Diedrich "lost twice in 2004 to Rep. Stephanie Herseth (D-S.D.), first by 3,000 votes in a special election and then in the general." Diedrich said, "I've always thought that perhaps people see the money that they have in the state as more their own money. Whereas, when you look at the federal level — maybe part of it's the fact that we're typically a recipient state — I think people perceive that that issue is more of other people's money. It's always a little more difficult for Republicans with a conservative message to win that argument." The Hill adds Steve Hildebrand, who managed former Sen. Tom Daschle's campaign and Johnson's narrow win over Sen. John Thune two years earlier, said, "They believe Democrats are most successful at getting pork back to the states. So they want Democrats in Washington fighting for their pet projects, whether it's disaster relief, farm aid, Medicaid."

Christian Groups Question Each Other's Finances. The Washington Times (1/11, Pfeiffer) reports the National Council of Churches is "becoming financially beholden to secular groups with liberal political leanings, according to a report by a religious watchdog organization." The Institute on Religion and Democracy, "a group formed by members of the NCC, says the group accepted the majority of its charitable donations last year from nonreligious organizations and has been pursuing an agenda that does not mesh with the majority of its church members, including support for abortion and homosexual 'marriage.'" Politically affiliated groups "who donated to the NCC between 2004 and 2005 include the Sierra Club; the Ford Foundation, which advocated for 'reproductive rights'; the United Nations Foundation, which is funded by billionaire media mogul and philanthropist Ted Turner; and the Connect US Network, which has ties to George Soros' Open Society Institute."

The Washington Post (1/11, A3, Cooperman) reports two "influential Christian nonprofit organizations questioned each other's finances yesterday, each suggesting that the other is beholden to big donors with partisan political motives." The clash "between the National Council of Churches and the Institute on Religion and Democracy was a rarity in Washington, where liberal and conservative advocacy groups fight fiercely over issues but seldom dig deeply into each other's funding." Both groups "call themselves nonpartisan and are incorporated as tax-exempt charitable organizations. But the council, a New York-based alliance of 35 Christian denominations, is deeply involved in liberal social causes, such as reducing poverty and making peace." The institute, "a Washington-based think tank, is allied with conservative groups on issues such as same-sex marriage."

Schwarzenegger Unveils "Restrained" Spending Plan. The Los Angeles Times (1/11, Rau, Halper, 850K) reports, "Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger today unveiled a restrained $143-billion state spending plan that eases some of California's chronic fiscal problems in part by restricting welfare payments and denying public transit systems $1.1 billion they were anticipating. The plan's spending from the state's general fund - where most California taxes go - would be $103 billion, an increase of less than 1% from the current fiscal year, which ends June 1." Schwarzenegger "hailed his plan that would eliminate a multibillion-dollar deficit anticipated for this year and pay off early some of the state's debt incurred during its economic crisis at the turn of the century."

The Wall Street Journal (1/11, C9, Carlton, 2.04M) reports, "At this rate…Schwarzenegger may become known as the Bond-inator. Last year, the former 'Terminator' star persuaded California voters to pass a record bond package totaling $42.7 billion to help rebuild the state's aging infrastructure. This year, he is proposing that California go back to the well for an additional $43.3 billion in bonds, to help expand the rebuilding work -- and that is making even Democratic allies of the Republican governor a tad nervous." The New York Times (1/11, Steinhauer, 1.16M) also reports the story.

California To Require Lower Carbon Content In Fuel. The Christian Science Monitor (1/11, Wood, 59K) reports, "Now that California is on record as mandating a 25 percent cut in the state's greenhouse-gas emissions by 2020...leaders here are starting to lay out how they intend to hit that ambitious mark. First up: requiring transportation fuels sold in California to contain less carbon." Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) "announced Tuesday that he will issue, within weeks, an executive order that sets a new 'low carbon fuel standard' in the state. Aimed at petroleum refiners and filling stations, the new standard will give them 13 years...to cut the carbon content of the fuels they sell for passenger vehicles by 10 percent." As the state "moves to implement the new standard, its effect on consumers and the state economy will be closely watched. Several Republican lawmakers and business leaders have expressed early concern that the state crackdown on emissions will encourage businesses to locate outside California, or will increase their overall costs. Consumers worry that new fuels or fuel additives will raise prices at the corner gas station."

Burns Hired By DC Lobby Firm. The AP (1/11, Jalonick) reports former Montana Sen. Conrad Burns (R), "whose ties to lobbyists helped sink his re-election bid, has landed at a new workplace: a Washington lobbying firm." Burns will "work for his former chief of staff, Leo Giacometto, at the firm Gage, which has lobbied for Montana interests and several national technology companies, often making headlines for its connections to Burns and his staff."

Virginia Seeks Deferral In Meeting Some Federal Testing Standards. The Washington Post (1/11, A1, Glod) reports, "Controversy has emerged over how to measure the progress of children learning English." The U.S. Education Department "objected last year to the way Virginia and 17 other states test limited-English students" finding the tests "not demanding enough." But "many Virginia educators" said that "the federal standard is too lofty for students just beginning to understand the nuances of English." The Virginia Board of Education and the state's congressional delegation are "lobbying Education Secretary Margaret Spellings" for a "one-year deferral" in meeting federal testing standards.

Ethiopia Says Eight Militants Killed In Airstrike, Others Being Held. The Financial Times (1/11, England) reports Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said Wednesday that a US air strike in southern Somalia Monday "had killed eight suspected militants and wounded five others, who had been captured by Ethiopian forces." Meles "disputed reports that civilians were killed in the US strikes and said he was waiting for DNA tests to confirm the identities of the suspects." Meanwhile, reports of additional airstrikes "were denied by US and Ethiopian officials, who said their aircraft had not launched new attacks." The AP (1/11, Hassan) reports Meles "said Ethiopia and the US have been cooperating on intelligence, and that most of the information has come from the Americans."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (1/11, A21, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports Mogadishu "exploded in violence on Wednesday morning after unknown insurgents attacked a transitional government barracks during the night and soldiers responded by sealing off large swaths of the city, searching house to house for guns." The weapons raids "immediately provoked stiff resistance, and squads of Ethiopian soldiers and troops loyal to the transitional government poured into the streets, where they battled outraged residents and a handful of masked insurgents."

The Washington Post (1/11, A21, McCrummen, 690K) says the situation "is so confused and the city so fractured and armed that the attacks, recounted by witnesses, could have come from any number of groups frustrated with the presence of Ethiopian troops." Many Somalis are also "enraged" over the US airstrike early Monday. Meanwhile at the UN, the Security Council "began debating the conflict" with Ibrahim Gambari, the UN undersecretary for political affairs, urging the interim Somali government "to begin talks" with Islamic militants, saying the deployment of a peacekeeping force would be "problematic" without a political settlement in place.

US Officials Refuse To Confirm Reports Of Terrorist's Death. The CBS Evening News (1/10, story 9, 0:35, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "In tonight's news briefing, an eight-year-long hunt for one of the world's most wanted terrorists is over. Somalia's government claims Fazul Abdullah Mohammad was killed during this week's US air attack in that country. He's a suspected Al Qaeda terrorist wanted in the 1998 bombings of two US Embassies in Africa that killed 224 people. However, American intelligence cannot confirm that Mohammad was killed. The Pentagon says there have been no US attacks in Somalia since Sunday."

Congressional Republicans Say State Department "A Mess" Under Rice. Nationally syndicated columnist Robert Novak writes in the Washington Post (1/11, A15, 690K), "Just how career diplomat Negroponte came to be the new intelligence czar in the first place is puzzling. But to pull him out just as his on-the-job training was completed reflects a panicky desire to fill the deputy secretary post, which had been unfilled for an unprecedented six months. Five other key State Department positions are either vacant or are soon to be vacant." Novak says that unnamed Republicans in Congress tell him "that the State Department under Condoleezza Rice is a mess." At a time when "American diplomacy is being tested worldwide -- in Afghanistan, Iran, Israel, Korea and Sudan," Novak says "the judgment by thoughtful Republicans is that Rice has failed to manage that endeavor." Rice's "previous government duties," he notes, "had been as an analyst and staffer rather than as a manager." Lastly, Novak observes that "with the State Department permanent bureaucracy traditionally hostile to Republican administrations, it is remarkable to see two Foreign Service officers, Negroponte and Burns, in the department's No. 2 and No. 3 slots. Insiders relish their confrontation. … That may turn out to be a good show, but it is not reassuring for a country facing myriad challenges worldwide."

China, Russia Denounce US Sanctions Over Arms Sales. The Washington Times (1/11, Gertz, 88K) reports China and Russia "have denounced sanctions imposed on their state-run companies by the Bush administration over missile and weapons of mass destruction sales to Iran and Syria." In Beijing this week, Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao reacted to the sanctions imposed last week by the State Department saying, "It is unreasonable for the American government to invoke its domestic law to sanction on Chinese companies without providing any evidence." He also called on the US to "correct its wrong practice." For its part, the Russian Foreign Ministry called the sanctions "illegal," saying the US "has tried to extrapolate its domestic laws to foreign companies, to make them work under US rules." The State Department "declined to provide details on what triggered the sanctions last week," but Bush administration officials "said they resulted from Russian anti-tank missile sales to Syria that ended up in the hands of Hezbollah terrorists and were used against Israel, as well as goods sent from China sold to Iran that were linked to Tehran's nuclear, chemical and biological weapons and missile systems."

Russia Backs Syria In Hariri Probe Request. The Washington Times (1/11, Kralev, 88K) reports a "rift" has developed between Russia and the Western members of the UN Security Council over the probe into the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. In "an attempt to help its ally Syria," Russia has asked that "all countries not fully cooperating be publicly named." Russia's UN ambassador, Vitaly Churkin, told the Security Council Tuesday, "If we focus so hard on one country, why should we disregard completely or even not want to know what those countries are?" The US and France "rejected the idea, saying it would distract from more important issues." State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters Tuesday, "Syria quite clearly falls into a category of its own, so I wouldn't try to lump them all together" with other countries, noting that "the fact that Syria has been cited as not being fully cooperative in the past with the investigation was important because, let's be frank, the signs pointed to some Syrian involvement [in the Hariri assassination] in some fashion."

Blasts Rock Philippines Ahead Of ASEAN Summit. The New York Times/AP (1/11, A23, Cerojano) reports, "Three bombs within hours of each other rocked the southern Philippines on Wednesday, killing at least six people and wounding 27 others, officials said, amid warnings that Muslim militants may try to disrupt this weekend's Asian regional summits." Officials "insisted security was tight, with police and troops on the highest alert." Philippine National Police Chief Oscar Calderon "had warned that militants may try to embarrass the government, a staunch US ally in the war on terror, by staging attacks" during the ASEAN summit. AFP (1/11, Peugeot, Yu) reports Foreign Minister Alberto Romulo "insisted" the summit "would go ahead later this week," despite the bombings.

Richardson Brokers Ceasefire In Darfur. The New York Times (1/11, A6, Polgreen, 1.16M) reports Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir and leaders of several rebel factions in Darfur "agreed Wednesday to a 60-day cease-fire in separate meetings with Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico." According to a statement issued after Wednesday's meeting, President Bashir "said he had agreed to halt military operations to allow time for a political settlement to the crisis to emerge." Speaking by telephone from Khartoum, Richardson said, "What is lacking is a political process that leads to a UN force," but said the ceasefire is "at least a step." The Washington Post (1/11, A22, Timberg, 690K) notes that despite agreeing to the ceasefire, Bashir "showed little evidence of relenting on his refusal to allow thousands of UN peacekeeping troops into Darfur."

Former State Official Says ICC Complicating Efforts In Darfur. Former assistant secretary of state, Stephen Rademaker, writes in the Washington Post (1/11, A25, 690K) that although the Sudanese government "bears principal responsibility for the continued killing" in Darfur, "recently an unexpected obstacle to ending the bloodshed has emerged: the International Criminal Court (ICC)." Rademaker notes that "much of the world agrees that to end the genocide a highly capable UN peacekeeping force must immediately be deployed to Darfur." The "only footnote to this consensus is China, which, eager for access to Sudan's oil and armed with a veto at the U.N. Security Council, forced the United Nations to accept a precondition to action in August: that the government in Khartoum must consent to the deployment of any UN force." However, he warns that "given China's opposition, such action almost certainly would have to be carried out without Security Council authorization and would be vastly inferior to the deployment of an effective UN peacekeeping force." Coalition military action, he notes, would be "in large measure US military action, and the same would be true in Darfur. No matter how noble our objectives, US military action without UN authorization against another Arab government would prove deeply unpopular in many parts of the world, and America would pay a steep political price. If this is where we end up in Darfur -- or if the genocide continues unabated because peacekeepers cannot be deployed -- there will be three culprits to blame: the bloodthirsty regime in Khartoum, the oil-thirsty government in Beijing and the UN Security Council's shortsighted decision to bring in the ICC."

EU Energy Strategy Aims To Curb Carbon Emissions, Boost Competition. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, Jacoby, Echikson, 2.04M) reports the EU "unveiled an ambitious blueprint for combating global warming and boosting energy efficiency, but key elements of the plan face strong opposition from business interests and could require major battles to get them implemented. The European Commission yesterday published a long-awaited proposal for the bloc's first common energy strategy." The Journal adds, "Business groups expressed alarm at the commission's proposals to cut emissions of carbon dioxide...20% from 1990 levels by 2020." And "France and Germany are likely to block a proposal to boost competition by breaking up European energy companies that control both the supply and distribution networks for oil, gas or electricity." But EC "officials insisted any opposition won't derail efforts to shake up European energy markets. Energy security, and the need to reduce demand for fossil fuels, has risen to the top of the EU agenda in response to continuing concerns about its predominant supplier of gas and oil, Russia."

The New York Times (1/11, Kanter, 1.16M) says EU officials "challenged governments to loosen their grip on national energy sectors, calling for a fresh wave of competition and investment in infrastructure and technology to ease dependence on powerful exporters like Russia and to combat global warming." The "package of proposals is one of the largest ever presented by the commission, although it reflected changes by France and Germany, which oppose the breakup of their national electricity companies." EU "officials also backed away from earlier, more ambitious targets for cutting emissions after energy-intensive industries and labor groups warned of threats to profits and jobs — especially if competitors in the United States and elsewhere did not follow suit." Many of the proposals "are to be debated by European Union leaders at a summit meeting in March. If they approve the package, many of the measures would still require the commission to draft formal legal proposals."

Belarus Backs Down In Oil Dispute With Russia. The Financial Times (1/11, Ostrovsky) reports, "Belarus backed down in its trade conflict with Russia on Wednesday by abolishing an export duty on oil pipeline transits. The move allows Moscow to resume supplies to Europe via its neighbour." Belarussian President Alexander Lukashenko "appears to have climbed down after a telephone conversation with President Vladimir Putin of Russia." Although "Wednesday's move bolstered Mr Putin's prestige at home and strengthened Moscow's hand in its stand-off with its neighbour, the dispute has dented Russia's reputation and its claim to be a reliable energy supplier."

The AP (1/11, Karmanau) reports, "Russian oil began flowing again through a Belarusian pipeline late Wednesday, a top Belarusian oil official said, resolving a dispute between the countries that had disrupted supplies to Eastern Europe as well to the former Soviet Republic." The dispute "showcased the Belarus regime's reliance on cheap Russian energy imports, and stoked doubts in European capitals about Russia and its dependability as an energy supplier."

The New York Times (1/11, Myers, 1.16M) reports, "The Belarussian prime minister, Sergei S. Sidorsky, said...in televised remarks that his country would revoke a transit fee of $45 a ton on Russian oil that it imposed last week, provoking a dispute with swift repercussions in Europe." Sidorsky "said he would fly to Moscow for more talks on Wednesday, an indication that a final resolution had not been found." Moscow "had said that it would hold no talks until the transit fee was lifted."

The Washington Post (1/11, A22, Finn, 690K) adds, "The Belarusan presidential press service said that the countries' prime ministers had been told 'to propose ways of settling all problems and to submit them to the presidents by Friday.'"

Chávez Begins New Term Vowing Socialist Reforms. The New York Times (1/11, A16, Romero, 1.16M) reports Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez was sworn in to a new six-year term at a ceremony Wednesday vowing "to speed Venezuela's metamorphosis into a Socialist country." In his speech, the president "defended his decision this week to nationalize companies in the telecommunications and electricity industries and promised to seek greater control over natural gas projects." He also "renewed his request to Congress for decree powers, saying a 'revolutionary law of laws' would allow him to hasten the construction of Socialism."

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (1/11, 850K) warns that "if his drive to consolidate power over the media, the telecommunications industry and other sectors succeeds, by the time his term expires six years from now it may no longer be possible to hold a free election in Venezuela." A country "without an independent media, judiciary or legislature," it continues, "is by nobody's definition a democracy. Venezuela's people may just have succeeded in voting themselves out of power."

UN Agency Denies Receiving Staff Complaints. The Washington Times (1/11, Pisik, 88K) reports Jose Antonio Ocampo, the head of the UN Department of Economic and Social Affairs (DESA), Wednesday "defended his management of the scandal-laden 'good governance' division, saying that he personally had initiated internal investigations and shut down a foundering office within his department." In his first public remarks since the opening of a UN investigation prompted by a Washington Times article last month, Ocampo "also denied having received complaints from staff about concerns that range from mismanagement of government funds to favoritism and intimidation in the hiring and disciplining of employees." His claim "flies in the face of documents and accounts given to The Times showing that several staff members complained to Mr. Ocampo, both in person and in writing, about purported mismanagement, intimidation and favoritism in DPADM between 2003 and 2006," the newspaper writes.

Japanese Lawmakers Fear Healthcare Reforms May Become Too Expensive. In an 2,000-word front page article, the Wall Street Journal (1/11, A1, Landers, 2.04M) reports last year Japan's parliament passed a measure that calling "for more cancer specialists and a permanent role for patients in policy making" in a "victory for a spreading movement in Japan among patients who want American-style care and drugs for cancer. But the idea of becoming more like the US raises alarms among policy makers. In Japan, the government guarantees that everyone has health-insurance coverage and it pays most of the bills." Masaharu Nakajima, until recently director general of the Health Bureau at the Ministry of Health, Labor and Welfare, says Japan "already offers excellent cancer care," and "with a huge national debt and corporations worried about higher taxes, Japan can't afford to throw money into treatments and training that offer little hope of significantly extending lifespans."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Defense Makes Closing Argument At Hamas-Funding Trial. The Chicago Tribune (1/11, Bush, Ahmed, 617K) reports, "Muhammad Salah was trying to provide humanitarian aid to the Palestinian people when he became a pawn of Israeli officials seeking to influence U.S. policy, his lawyer argued Wednesday. … An attorney for Salah's co-defendant, Abdelhaleem Ashqar, also gave his final argument, telling jurors that Ashqar resisted Israel's occupation of Palestinian territories but insisted on following the law." Salah's "arrest, torture and confession was an intrigue developed at the highest levels of the Israeli government to convince the FBI that Hamas was developing cells in the U.S., Deutsch said."

The AP (1/11, Robinson) notes Ashqar lawyer William Moffit said, "He's a Palestinian patriot but that doesn't mean he's a killer," and Salah attorney Michael Deutsch "urged jurors not to believe admissions Salah made while being questioned by Israel's Shin Bet security agents at a prison in Ramallah. He said Salah was tortured and said anything the agents wanted to hear. … He said Israel used Salah to get publicity and pressure the U.S. government to crack down on the Hamas fundraising network in this country."

US Defends CIA Document Secrecy At Trial. The AP (1/11, Neumeister) reports, "The CIA cannot reveal 'alternative interrogation methods' used on terrorists because doing so would cause exceptionally grave damage to national security by telling enemies how the agency gathers intelligence, the government has told a judge." The AP continues, "In a document dated Friday and filed in U.S. District Court in New York, the CIA said it cannot reveal more than what President Bush said last summer about the detention and questioning of terrorism suspects." The AP adds, "The American Civil Liberties Union had asked the court to require the CIA to turn over two Justice Department memos discussing interrogation methods and a presidential order concerning the CIA's authorization to set up detention facilities outside the United States. … On Wednesday, ACLU attorney Amrit Singh said in a statement that the CIA court document 'uses national security as a pretext for withholding evidence that high-level government officials in all likelihood authorized abusive techniques that amount to torture.' … He added: 'This declaration is especially disturbing because it suggests that unlawful interrogation techniques cleared by the Justice Department for use by the CIA still remain in effect. The American public has a right to know how the government is treating its prisoners.'"

Siraj Family Arrested On Immigration Charges. As reported in yesterday's New York Times, the Washington Post (1/11, A3, Shulman, 690K) reports, "A day after a man was sentenced to 30 years in prison for conspiring to bomb Manhattan's Herald Square, his parents and sister were detained by federal immigration officials seeking to deport them" to their native Pakistan. Shahwar Matin Siraj's "family has lived in the United States since 1999 and has been seeking asylum since 2003, said their attorney, Mona Shah." ICE spokesman Mark Thorn "could not say why the family was detained the day after the sentencing. … But Shah charged that the arrests effectively muted the family's protest after the sentencing of the son."

Advocates Say Guantanamo Detainees "Driven Insane" By Conditions. The Financial Times (1/11, Dinmore) reports lawyers and rights activists say prisoners at Guantanamo Bay "are being driven insane by a tightening of conditions and the situation of their indefinite detention without trial." The advocates "also doubt whether the Bush administration intends to carry out its stated desire to close the facility." Today is the fifth anniversary of the first delivery of detainees to Guantanamo. The AP (1/10, Fox) writes that five years on, Guantanamo remains a "source of outrage," quoting Center for Constitutional Rights President Michael Ratner saying, "It has become iconic in the Muslim world and the wider world…for everything that the United States has done wrong in the war on terror."

Detainee Says "I Have Been Destroyed" By Guantanamo. The Los Angeles Times (1/11, 850K) runs an op-ed comprised of excerpts from letters Guantanamo detainee Jumah al-Dossari "wrote to his attorneys. Its contents have been deemed unclassified by the Department of Defense." Dossari writes, "At Guantanamo, soldiers have assaulted me, placed me in solitary confinement, threatened to kill me, threatened to kill my daughter and told me I will stay in Cuba for the rest of my life. They have deprived me of sleep, forced me to listen to extremely loud music and shined intense lights in my face. They have placed me in cold rooms for hours without food, drink or the ability to go to the bathroom or wash for prayers. They have wrapped me in the Israeli flag and told me there is a holy war between the Cross and the Star of David on one hand and the Crescent on the other. They have beaten me unconscious. … Why, after five years, is there no conclusion to the situation at Guantanamo? For how long will fathers, mothers, wives, siblings and children cry for their imprisoned loved ones? For how long will my daughter have to ask about my return? The answers can only be found with the fair-minded people of America. I would rather die than stay here forever, and I have tried to commit suicide many times. The purpose of Guantanamo is to destroy people, and I have been destroyed."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Senators Push For Greater Data-Mining Oversight. The Washington Post (1/11, D3, Nakashima, Klein, 690K) reports a bill introduced yesterday by Sens. Russell Feingold and John E. Sununu "requires federal agencies to report the development and use of data-analysis technologies to 'discover predictive or anomalous patterns indicating criminal or terrorist activity.' Lawmakers introduced similar bills twice in recent years, but they languished in a Republican-controlled Congress." Meanwhile, "The new chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Patrick J. Leahy, vowed that Congress would take a much more active role in the oversight of government surveillance and data-collection programs." His comments came during a hearing that "underscored the sensitivity of the debate about privacy and security." During testimony, Jim Harper, director of information policy studies at the Cato Institute, singled out predictive data mining, saying that it "'cannot catch terrorists' because there are too few 'terrorist patterns' to base a model on. … Leslie Harris, executive director of the Center for Democracy and Technology, a privacy advocacy group, said the administration was 'bewitched with this technology' although there was 'very little evidence' that predictive data mining works."

The AP (1/10) reported Harris "was among a handful of think-tank scholars and privacy advocates who testified Wednesday about government data-mining — the computerized searching of large banks of information for clues to the identity of terrorists or criminals. Their broadest area of agreement was that Congress needs to know much more about what the government is doing in data-mining. … Noting that congressional auditors in 2004 found 199 data-mining programs operating or planned in federal agencies, Leahy said, 'Congress is overdue in taking stock of the proliferation of these databases.'"

The Washington Times (1/11, Hudson, 88K) reports DHS officials hope to use data mining "to screen airline passengers and at border crossings. Mr. Sununu said data mining can be an essential tool to detect patterns that point to terrorist activity. 'However, it is imperative that we understand the impact of such technology on Americans' personal privacy,'" Sununu said.

ICE Detains Family Of Convicted NYC Subway Bomb Plotter. The Washington Post (1/11, A3, Shulman, 690K) reports, "A day after a man was sentenced to 30 years in prison for conspiring to bomb Manhattan's Herald Square, his parents and sister were detained by federal immigration officials seeking to deport them" to their native Pakistan. Shahwar Matin Siraj's "family has lived in the United States since 1999 and has been seeking asylum since 2003, said their attorney, Mona Shah." ICE spokesman Mark Thorn "could not say why the family was detained the day after the sentencing. … But Shah charged that the arrests effectively muted the family's protest after the sentencing of the son."

Hospital Conference To Examine Emergency Communications. The Washington Times (1/11, Borgess, 88K) reports Washington area hospital representatives "will meet today and tomorrow to discuss how they can improve communication during mass-casualty events. Organizers say hospitals rarely have privileged access to information during a large-scale emergency and often must rely on the press for updates. Therefore, hospital workers often have difficulty gauging the extent of a crisis and preparing themselves for a surge of patients." The conference will feature a keynote address from Dr. B. Tilman Jolly, the Department of Homeland Security's associate medical officer.

Administration Lines Up Against TSA Screeners' Union. The Washington Post's (1/11, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "A House plan to give collective bargaining rights to about 43,000 airport screeners at the Transportation Security Administration will be opposed by the White House. The proposal to roll back a Bush administration ban on unions at the TSA was included in a bill to implement many of the remaining recommendations of the 9/11 Commission. The bill was approved 299 to 128 late Tuesday and was sent to the Senate.

Judge Orders Additional Mediation In Hurricane Katrina Insurance Suits. The AP (1/11, Mitchell) reports from Gulfport, MS, "A federal judge on Wednesday ordered into mediation dozens of lawsuits policyholders filed against insurance companies after Hurricane Katrina." The AP continues, "Several of the cases sent to mediation, which accuse the insurance companies of denying their claims, are involved in recent settlement talks between State Farm Fire & Casualty Co., Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood and policyholders' lawyers. … People with direct knowledge of the settlement talks told The Associated Press this week that State Farm, Mississippi's largest home insurer, is considering paying hundreds of millions of dollars to settle more than 600 lawsuits and resolve thousands of other disputed claims." The AP notes, "A mass settlement would be the first of its kind to follow the wave of litigation spawned by Katrina. … Hundreds of Mississippi homeowners have sued State Farm and other insurers for refusing to cover billions of dollars in damage from Katrina's storm surge. …

The 83 lawsuits ordered into mediation Wednesday include ones filed on behalf of U.S. Senator Trent Lott and Representative Gene Taylor, whose Gulf region homes were destroyed by the 2005 hurricane. Each sued State Farm for denying their claims."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Unveils New Strategy For Iraq. In a nationally televised address Wednesday night, President Bush announced plans to send more than 20,000 more American troops to Iraq. The New York Times (1/11, A1, Sanger, 1.16M) reports the President "conceded for the first time that there were not enough American or Iraqi troops in Baghdad to halt the capital's descent over the past year into chaos." Bush also "dropped his insistence that the United States was making progress toward building a workable Iraqi democracy." But "he rekindled his argument that 'failure in Iraq would be a disaster for the United States.'" The Los Angeles Times (1/11, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports Bush acknowledged "that his current strategy had failed," and the Washington Post (1/11, A1, Abramowitz, Wright, 690K) says he used "some of his sharpest language to date." In addition to more troops, adds the Post, Bush's plan "includes an allocation of "more than $1 billion for three programs to create jobs and help reconstruction in neighborhoods secured by Iraqi and US forces." Nine new provincial reconstruction teams will be run jointly by the Pentagon and State Department "to help rebuild the country from the bottom up, including schools, local government and political interest groups." Reflecting the revised strategy's "heavy focus on only two areas of the country, six of the reconstruction teams will be in Baghdad and three will be in volatile Anbar province, home to the Sunni insurgency and al-Qaeda extremists," the State Department said. To aid in the effort, about 150 new personnel will be added to the 250 already staffing the reconstruction teams.

The Financial Times (1/11, Luce, Sevastopulo) reports, "A senior US administration official said there would be new rules of engagement for Iraqi and US commanders that would enable them to succeed where previous efforts to pacify Iraq's capital had failed - most recently last summer. Iraq's government would send three new brigades into Baghdad within the next month in addition to the six already there. The US would add five brigades to its Baghdad presence. The US would also send an additional 4,000 troops to Anbar province, which is the seat of al-Qaeda in Iraq."

ABC (1/10, Gibson) called is "a rather sober address," containing "a message to the American people asking for patience, sacrifice and resolve -- and also asking for a bit of faith that this plan of sending even more troops, about 21,500 more troops, to Iraq, and counting on the Iraqis to take the lead in providing security in Baghdad and ending sectarian violence, faith that that plan can work." The speech also carried "a message to the Iraqi government that our patience and his patience, the President's patience, is not infinite, not open-ended, and that he is counting on the Iraqis to show the strength and to show the will to make this plan work."

Most media analysts greeted Bush's new strategy with marked skepticism. The Baltimore Sun (1/11, Davis, 257K) sums up its coverage saying Bush "has repeatedly laid out revised goals and strategies for Iraq only to see them crumble amid sectarian violence and a mounting death toll," while the Chicago Tribune (1/11, Tackett, 617K) reports Bush "finds himself asking for more -- of the military, of Congress, of the Iraqi government and of the American people -- but possessing so much less." He "lacks the safety net of a Republican-run Congress, the political capital of which he famously boasted, and most decidedly, the support of the public weary of the war's grim narrative." The New York Times (1/11, Stolberg, 1.16M) says that with his plan, Bush "is not only inviting an epic clash with the Democrats who run Capitol Hill," he is also "ignoring the results of the November elections, rejecting the central thrust of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group and flouting the advice of some of his own generals, as well as Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq."

The Washington Post (1/11, Baker, 690K) says this morning, "As his reelection campaign geared up in 2004…Bush was asked to name his biggest mistake. He couldn't think of one. By the time he was asked again last year, he had thought of one, his inappropriate 'tough talk.' Last night, Bush acknowledged that some of the most fundamental assumptions underlying the US venture in Iraq were wrong." That "evolution tracks the sharp deterioration not only of the US position in Iraq, but also of Bush's position at home."

Moreover, says McClatchy (1/11, Douglas, Hutcheson), "many of Bush's new proposals…have been tried before and failed." A second McClatchy (1/11, Strobel, Youssef) analysis adds "many analysts" said "they feared Bush's modified tactics are too little and too late to make up for past blunders in Iraq." USA Today (1/11, Page, 2.27M) calls the plan "not so much a change of direction as an acceleration," adding that "except for the troop increase, none of the ideas is new." The Washington Times (1/11, Scarborough, 88K) makes runs a similar story under the headline "Past Troop Surges In Iraq Produced Mixed Results."

The Los Angeles Times (1/11, Levey, Gaouette, 850K) says the President's plan "has further united Democrats," while Republicans "have splintered in the face of widespread popular discontent over the war and Bush's plans to escalate it." The AP (1/11, Raum) reports "for Bush, the decision to send more troops to Iraq -- rather than begin a withdrawal of combat forces as recommended last month by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group -- is a huge gamble. If it fails, he will have few if any options left." Bush, said Tim Russert on NBC (1/10), "made it double or nothing. He'll get the escalation in troops but it really is his last chance. … A skeptical public" has "turned against this war. He has to ask for one last chance for this plan to work. It's going to be very uphill." Similarly, CBS (1/10, Axelrod) asked last night, "The question you have to ask is, if this doesn't work, where does the President go from here?"

Bush's plan, says the Washington Post (1/11, A1, Ricks, Tyson, 690K), "is likely to touch off a more dangerous phase of the war, featuring months of fighting in the streets of the Iraqi capital, current and former military officials warned. … The prospect of a more intense battle in the Iraqi capital could put US military commanders in exactly the sort of tough urban fight that war planners strove to avoid during the spring 2003 invasion of the country." The Post adds, "An Army officer who recently commanded a battalion in Baghdad predicted last night that the plan would fail because…Maliki and his government 'will do things to maintain protection' of Sadr's forces. He also dismissed as 'happy talk' the president's notion that the predominantly Shiite Iraqi army and police could reassure pro-insurgent Sunni neighborhoods by conducting foot patrols through them." Along similar lines, an AP analysis (1/11, Woodward) says Bush's rhetoric is "hard to square with facts in the region." For example, "Bush portrayed the ordinary people of the Middle East as being behind US goals in Iraq, in his speech to the nation Wednesday night." And "he declared the need to address Iran's and Syria's support for insurgents, without acknowledging his refusal to engage either country diplomatically, as many US allies and the Iraq Study Group proposed." Bush, adds the AP, "declared 'al-Qaida is still active in Iraq' and a failed US mission would give such terrorists a safe haven from which to plot attacks against Americans. Although few quarrel with that appraisal now, it is also the case that Iraq -- contrary to assertions at the time -- was not a magnet for al-Qaida before the US invasion."

Under the headline "Promising Troops Where They Aren't Really Wanted," the New York Times (1/11, Tavernise, Burns, 1.16M) reports Bush is challenging "public opinion at home by committing more American troops," and "is confronted by a paradox: an Iraqi government that does not really want them." Iraqis "fear that an increased American troop presence, particularly in Baghdad, will be accompanied by a more assertive American role that will conflict with the Shiite government's haste to cut back on American authority and run the war the way it wants." Another New York Times story (1/11, Gordon) says Bush "is in effect betting that Iraqi leaders are committed to building a multisectarian state, and his strategy will stand or fall on that assumption." The plan "depends on the good intentions and competence of a Shiite-dominated Iraqi government that has not demonstrated an abundant supply of either." In a similar assessment, the Wall Street Journal (1/11, A1, Dreazen, Jaffe, King, 2.04M) says the success of Bush's "controversial" strategy "depends on the cooperation of an Iraqi government paralyzed by sectarian tensions and a Democratic Congress that appears increasingly eager to challenge the administration's handling of the war."

Plans' "Core Elements" Were Part Of A Hadley Memo From Last November. According to the Washington Post (1/11, A13, Kessler, 690K), "core elements of the plan were contained in a classified memo" that NSA Stephen Hadley "sent to members of Bush's Cabinet on Nov. 8 -- a month before the bipartisan Iraq Study Group issued its report." The Hadley memo called for an "intensive press on Saudi Arabia to play a leadership role on Iraq, connecting this role with other areas in which Saudi Arabia wants to see US action." As part of the new plan, the Post notes that Secretary Rice "will travel to the Middle East tomorrow, stopping in Riyadh, to enlist greater Arab support for the Iraqi government -- and to try to jump-start Israeli-Palestinian talks, a key concern of Saudi leaders."

GOP Lawmakers Not Of One Mind. GOP Sens. John McCain and Lindsey Graham came out strongly in favor of Bush's plan. McCain said on CNN's Larry King Live (1/10), "I thought it was an excellent speech. The President acknowledged that the strategy has failed. It's a new strategy. … I believe those who are calling for withdrawal have the obligation to tell us what we do in the region when it descends into chaos." Asked if his support for the surge could hurt his presidential campaign, McCain said, "I would much rather lose a campaign than lose a war." On Fox News (1/10, Wallace), McCain said, "It's three years that I've been calling for these increases. I believe that this can succeed. I really do." Graham said on CNN's Larry King Live (1/10), "I agreed with the President before he made the speech. … I look at it this way: What's the result of a failed state in Iraq to our future as a nation, to the region as a whole? If Iraq fails and if we lose this war, I think the biggest winner is Iran. … My biggest motivation is not about my re-election in 2008. I support the President."

GOP Sen. John Warner, whose opinion could carry significant sway on undecided Republicans, said on CNN's Larry King Live (1/10), "I found the speech to be credible and sincere. And it does lay down a plan that reflects a lot of study by the executive branch, a lot of advice and opinion that the President took into consideration. … And I think it's now the responsibility of the Congress, particularly the Senate, to give equal study and objectivity to this speech and come up with our own opinions."

Sen. Gordon Smith, also a Republican, had already broken with Bush's Iraq policies. Last night, he said on MSNBC (1/10, O'Donnell), "The President and I just have a difference of opinion. He believes that security has to precede politics. I believe politics by Iraqis to decide federalism, resource-sharing and human rights -- these things will produce security. And I think we've become somewhat of a crutch, a shield, to delay the day of decision on the part of Iraqis. … I earnestly hope and pray I'm wrong and the President's right. I want him to succeed."

The Chicago Tribune (1/11, Zuckman, 617K) notes that in addition to Smith and Warner, GOP senators such as Norm Coleman, Olympia Snowe and George Voinovich have also expressed concerns about increasing troops levels. And USA Today (1/11, Jackson, 2.27M) reports "Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kansas, a potential 2008 presidential candidate, said committing more troops is the wrong answer. 'Iraq requires a political rather than a military solution,' he said." The Washington Times (1/11, Curl, Dinan, 88K) also surveys Congressional reaction to the speech.

Democrats Blast Bush's Proposals. On TV last night, Democrats took issue with Bush's proposal to boost US troop levels. House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer said on CNN (1/10), "I didn't hear a new policy. I heard more of the same."

Sen. Barack Obama said on CNN's Larry King Live (1/10), "There was one area where I completely agree with the President. And that is that American troops have done everything that's been asked of them. They have done an outstanding job. And I don't doubt the President's sincerity in thinking that this third or fourth approach to the problem is the right one. But I did not see anything in the speech or anything in the run-up to the speech that provides evidence that an additional 15,000 to 20,000 more US troops is going to make a significant dent in the sectarian violence that's taking place there." Obama made very similar comments on MSNBC (1/10, Olbermann).

Sen. Dianne Feinstein said on CNN's Larry King Live (1/10), "My heart fell as I heard it, because I see no evidence from the past that this kind of surge is going to work. From the change of rules of engagement, what I see is an escalation. And I think it's very unrealistic to think that military and police and our people can go into a place like Sadr City and not have some form of conflagration. I've got to say, I'm really disappointed."

Sen. Jack Reed said on CNN (1/10), "This is not a really a new strategy, it's just more of the old strategy: trying to take a military approach -- primarily -- to what is a fundamentally political problem which the Iraqis must solve."

Former Sen. John Edwards said on CNN's Larry King Live (1/10), "I think what America needs from their president under the circumstances is, first, trust. They need to feel like they can trust their president. … What I saw was a very academic, analytical speech, making the case for putting more troops in Iraq. And I think that's not what America needed from its president right now. I think the President is profoundly wrong. I think escalating the war is a huge mistake. But beyond that, what's happened is that the trust in the President has eroded. And America has to feel in their gut that whether he's right or wrong, the President's telling the truth."

More Criticism Of Bush Speech. The New York Times (1/11, A30, 1.16M) editorializes, "Bush told Americans last night that failure in Iraq would be a disaster. The disaster is Mr. Bush's war, and he has already failed. Last night was his chance to stop offering more fog and be honest with the nation, and he did not take it. Americans needed to hear a clear plan to extricate United States troops from the disaster that Mr. Bush created. What they got was more gauzy talk of victory in the war on terrorism and of creating a 'young democracy' in Iraq. In other words, a way for this president to run out the clock and leave his mess for the next one."

The Washington Post (1/11, A24, 690K) editorializes, "Bush is right to recognize that U.S strategy in Iraq is not working and to seek a different policy. He is right to insist that the United States cannot afford to abandon the mission and to reject calls for an early withdrawal. But the new plan for the war Mr. Bush outlined last night is very risky. It envisions new missions and dangers for U.S. troops and counts on unprecedented military and political steps by the Iraqi government. The plan is likely to cause a spike in U.S. casualties, while the chances that it will stabilize Iraq are far lower." Bush "could have adopted a course that would have attracted broad support domestically and from Iraqis. That was the strategy -- outlined with small variations by U.S. military commanders, the Iraqi government and the Iraq Study Group -- that called for an acceleration of training of the Iraqi army and a gradual handing over of responsibility for fighting insurgents. … Instead, Mr. Bush has chosen to increase the number of Army troops and Marines and to broaden their mission."

The Los Angeles Times (1/11, 850K) editorializes, "President Bush's latest plan for Iraq has the feel of an overdue high school book report. It looks nice, reads well and is persuasive in parts. If only he had handed it in on time. The 'new way forward' outlined by the president in a prime-time address Wednesday makes too many obvious points (Iraqis must have more of a stake in their nation's success) and includes too many tired tropes (the war in Iraq is a central front in the war against terrorism). But the core of Bush's speech -- the reason to maintain at least some flicker of hope -- was an absolute-final-we're-really-serious-this-time ultimatum to the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki."

In his New York Times (1/11, A31, 1.16M) column, David Brooks writes, "If the Democrats don't like the US policy on Iraq over the next six months, they have themselves partly to blame. There were millions of disaffected Republicans and independents ready to coalesce around some alternative way forward, but the Democrats never came up with anything remotely serious. … So we are stuck with the Bush proposal as the only serious plan on offer."

In a New York Times (1/11, A31, 1.16M) op-ed, author Danielle Trussoni writes, "My father once told me that he and his mother read the body count in the newspaper together. … It was only a month or so before my father left for the war, the winter of 1967. … Reading the body count in the paper was my father's way of preparing for the war. … As President Bush speaks about a new strategy for the war, more than 3,000 Americans have been killed in four years of fighting. And as I think of those lives cut short, I think of my father and my grandmother."

WSJournal Likes Bush Plan. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, A14, 2.04M) editorializes, "Bush's challenge last night was to convince Americans that his new plan to secure Iraq won't mean risking more lives on a conflict that critics say has become 'unwinnable.' We think he offered compelling reasons for skeptical Americans of good faith to back him, but the key will be deploying enough forces to accomplish the task." The President's words "offered the hope that the new plan won't simply mean employing more troops to carry out a strategy that hasn't been working. Though widely described in the press as a troop 'surge' or even 'escalation,' the number of additional soldiers being sent to Iraq is significant but not overwhelming. The real difference will be how America uses its troops in Iraq."

Bremer Says Bush "Is To Be Commended." In a Wall Street Journal (1/11, A15, 2.04M) op-ed, former Coalition Provisional Authority head Paul Bremer writes that President Bush "has frankly acknowledged the need for a new approach. He has assessed the various options and has courageously, and in my view wisely, rejected the politically popular course of withdrawing. Over the past four years, progress in Iraq has always depended on the interplay among the political, economic and security sectors. Clearly only Iraqis can design the necessary means to bridge their sectarian and ethnic divisions. … The president has acknowledged the need for new leadership and a new strategy. He is to be commended for rejecting the easy popular course."

War Of Words Continues Over "Surge" Versus "Escalation." US News and World Report (1/11, Wilson, Walsh) writes on its Web site, "What do you call a decision to send 20,000 or more additional troops to Iraq? It depends on whom you ask. President Bush and his team call it a 'surge.' Increasingly, Democrats and those who oppose the increase are calling it an 'escalation,' invoking an old specter from the Vietnam era." Escalation "is a highly loaded term. The U.S. News library team tracked the earliest uses of the word in a military context during the Vietnam era and found that it first surfaced in a series of increasingly critical New York Times editorials in the spring and summer of 1965. The word gained traction from there." But surge "owes its recent popularity to use by Secretary of Defense Robert Gates and other military officials." Democratic pollster Geoff Garin said, "Surge suggests it's a short, time-limited event, but at the moment the president is not willing to put any time limit on the whole enterprise."

Democrats Will Try To Block Funding For Troop Increase. The Washington Post (1/11, Weisman, Balz, 690K) puts its report on its front page, saying senior House Democrats plan to "attempt to derail funding" for President Bush's proposal to send additional troops to Iraq, "setting up what could become the most significant confrontation between the White House and Congress over military policy since the Vietnam War." USA Today (1/11, Kiely, Nichols, 2.27M) says House Defense Appropriations Subcommittee Chairman John Murtha said he "plans to use his subcommittee's control over the Pentagon budget to force a new direction in Iraq." Murtha "said he'll focus on the administration's supplemental spending request for Iraq, which is expected to be as high as $160 billion."

And at the same time, the Washington Times (1/11, Ward, 88K) says Democrats plan "to grill Bush administration officials during Capitol Hill hearings on the Iraq war -- beginning this morning when Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates testify before congressional committees."

The New York Times (1/11, A21, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports Democratic congressional leaders "accused President Bush of ignoring strong American sentiment against the war in Iraq and said they would build a bipartisan campaign against his proposed military expansion." Speaker Nancy Pelosi said Democrats "intended to turn the precise words from Mr. Bush's speech into a symbolic resolution, compelling Republicans to support or reject the idea of sending more troops to Iraq. The Senate was developing a similar nonbinding resolution to be considered as early as next week." The Christian Science Monitor (1/11, Chaddock, 59K) says the Democratic Congress "has all the clout it needs -- at least on parchment -- to trim war funding through its power of the purse." Congress "can also opt to push back with hearings, investigations, and resolutions that condemn an escalation of the war or require President Bush to return to Congress for approval before committing troops." But choosing which course to take "is causing heated debate" within the new majority.

The CBS Evening News (1/10, story 4, 1:20, Couric, 7.66M) said Bush's plan "puts him on a collision course with the new Congress." CBS (Attkisson): "White House officials, including in some cases the President himself, have briefed 150 members of Congress in advance of tonight's speech. Today, after the latest meeting with President Bush, Democratic leaders made it clear that no minds have been changed." Sen. Harry Reid: "I'm at a loss as to what's going to happen with these additional troops." McClatchy (1/11, Schoof, Talev) reports that if Bush "is determined to win over Congress to the idea of keeping more American troops in Iraq, his chances looked dim Wednesday night." However, "even as the new Democratic majority and some of the president's fellow Republicans expressed doubts or rejected the notion outright, they had yet to coalesce behind binding legislation to stop him."

NBC Nightly News (1/10, story 2, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Many members of Congress have been thoroughly briefed on the message behind the President's words in tonight's speech." NBC (Reid) added, "Democratic and Republican leaders were in the room with the President at the same time. They heard the same arguments, but they emerged from that room with dramatically different opinions about what they heard. After meeting with the President for less than an hour, top congressional Democrats said his plan for more troops appears to be nothing new. … Even some Republicans say Mr. Bush's plan has little chance of success." Sen. Gordon Smith: "The President is preparing to throw a Hail Mary pass. I just hope there is an Iraqi army to catch it." Reid: "Although most Republicans including congressional leaders are expected to fall in line behind the President."

Democratic "Prebuttals" Came In Force. The Washington Post (1/11, A2, Milbank, 690K) examines the Democratic "prebuttals" to the President's speech -- criticisms delivered before the address was made. Prebuttals "have become so intense that they have forced the victim of the prebuttal to preempt his own speech -- giving the speech itself an anticlimactic feel."

Presidential Hopefuls From Both Parties Stake Out Positions. The Los Angeles Times (1/11, Hook, 850K) reports the President's speech "provoked several potential presidential candidates to stake out a position, including some Republicans who had avoided addressing a controversial proposal that is likely to be a touchstone issue in the 2008 campaign." Ex-Gov. Mitt Romney, "ending weeks of dodging questions on the issue, announced Wednesday he would support a troop increase." But Sen. Sam Brownback "announced he opposed it, a sign that Republicans may not be as reluctant to distance themselves from Bush as they once were." Democrats John Edwards and Sen. John Kerry "announced their support for Congress to cut off funds needed for a troop increase. That step goes farther than many Democrats want because they fear it will be seen as undermining U.S. troops already in Iraq."

Democrats' Response Comes Under Fire. Under the headline "A Cynical Opposition," the Wall Street Journal (1/11, A14, 2.04M) editorializes, "You might have thought President Bush's announcement yesterday that he intends to deploy several thousand more combat soldiers to Iraq would have been sweet policy vindication for the Democrats. They're the ones who spent the better part of the past four years using Eric Shinseki -- the former Army Chief of Staff who, prior to the war, estimated it would take up to half a million troops to occupy the country -- as a cudgel with which to beat this President over the head." But "lately the Democrats have been singing from a different hymnal. … No one serious -- not even the Iraq Study Group -- believes that the war will end if we leave. Instead, it will change into a civil war in Iraq, and perhaps a wider regional war, that is likely to draw our forces back in again somewhere in the Middle East. … If Congressional Democrats want to be constructive, they can insist that Mr. Bush and his generals truly implement the strategy he is now endorsing. The path Democrats have followed in the minority and are now continuing will only make U.S. success harder -- a truth the American people will come to understand, and resent."

The Washington Times (1/11, 88K) editorializes, "The Democrats had tried several pre-emptive strikes against President Bush's speech last night about how to win the war in Iraq. The president, in our view, is right to send additional troops to Baghdad and other violent areas of Iraq to stanch the blood-letting and enable the Iraqi government to impose its authority over the nation. But in addition to opposing measures to end the war, the House would now undermine national security."

In his Los Angeles Times (1/11, 850K) column, Jonah Goldberg writes under the headline "At Least Bush Wants To Win" that with his speech, "President Bush made it clear that he will settle for nothing less than winning" in Iraq. Bush "may be deluding himself, and his plan may not work, but he at least has done the nation the courtesy of saying what his position is, despite an antagonistic political establishment and a hostile public. What is maddening is that the Democratic leadership cannot, or will not, clearly tell the American people whether they are the party of 'end it' or 'win it.' … Bush came up with the 'surge' plan. Will it work? Nobody knows. But the one thing the American people know about George W. Bush is that he wants to win the war. What the Democrats believe is anybody's guess."

In his Roll Call (1/11) column, Morton Kondracke writes, "Politically and militarily, this is President Bush's last chance to avoid catastrophe in Iraq and the Democratic Congress ought to let him play out his hand. Hard as it might be, Democrats should resist extreme pressure from anti-war forces in their base to undermine what little is left of Bush's popular support and force a withdrawal from Iraq. The reason is that if the United States loses the Iraq War, the consequences will be dire -- and a Democratic president elected in 2008 may well have to deal with them."

In a Washington Times (1/11, 88K) op-ed, Washington Center for Politics & Journalism director Terry Michael, the Democratic National Committee press secretary from 1985-

DOJ_NMG_0115107

1987, writes, "It's hard to get out of a deal with the devil. That's the congressional Democrats' dilemma, as they continue to treat the Iraq war as a speed bump on their pathway to the perks of restored power, rather than as a moral question to which voters loudly demanded a moral answer two months ago. … Where are the Gordon Smiths in the Democratic Party? Where are the conviction politicians willing to spend political capital to lead a citizenry which has decided overwhelmingly that this war is crazy? Where are the institutions of media power with the courage to say the emperor has no cowboy boots, no jeans, no garments at all -- just a hideous, stubborn smirk that is literally making this country ill and squandering our reputation around the globe?"

Eyewitnesses Say US Forces Raided Iranian Consulate In Iraq. NPR (1/11) reported in this morning, "Eyewitnesses in the city of Erbil in Kurdish-controlled northern Iraq says American forces raided the Iranian Consulate there in a pre-dawn operation. … Kurdish security forces blocked off the quiet residential street leading to Iran's small consulate" in Erbil, "preventing journalists from taking a close look at the building. Broken glass could be seen outside the entrance, however, and the Iranian flag was not flying from the pole outside the two-story villa. Residents in the neighborhood say around 4 am local time they heard helicopters and planes flying over the consulate. They say they also heard periodic gunfire in the area. 'Do not go to the Iranian consulate,' one shopkeeper said. 'The Americans have arrested everybody there.' The raid took place within hours of President Bush's televised speech, which promised a new strategy for the Iraq war. Kurdish security forces on the scene insisted no raid took place. They added that no Iranian diplomats were currently in the consulate building."

Bush Seen As Stepping Up "Strategy Of Confrontation" Against Iran. The New York Times (1/11, A21, Cooper, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports that in "promising to stop Iran from meddling in Iraq, President Bush returned Wednesday night to a strategy of confrontation" with Iran, "casting aside what had been a limited flirtation with a more diplomatic approach toward it." Bush "accused Iran of providing material support for attacks on American troops and vowed to respond," saying the US would send another aircraft carrier and its supporting ships to the Persian Gulf, as well as deploy more Patriot missiles in the region. The Times says the "more combative talk reflects increased frustration in the administration with Iran, which American officials blame for part of the rising death toll in Iraq."

Under Pressure From US, Maliki Agrees To Crack Down On Sadr Forces. NBC Nightly News (1/10, story 4, 1:55, Engel, 9.87M) reported, "For the first time, Iraq's Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has told the main Shiite militia group, the Mahdi Army, that it must surrender its weapons or face a full US and Iraqi military assault. This gives American troops here a freer hand to hunt down the militias." The AP (1/11, Hurst, Abdul-Zahra) says Maliki, "under pressure from the U.S., has agreed to crack down on the fighters even though they are loyal to his most powerful political ally," Muqtada al-Sadr.

Military Plans "Gated Communities" Strategy In Baghdad. The Los Angeles Times (1/11, A1, Barnes, 850K) reports the military's "new strategy for Iraq envisions creating so-called 'gated communities' in Baghdad -- sealing off discrete areas and forcibly removing insurgents, then working to create jobs for residents and stationing American units in the neighborhood to keep the peace." The US "previously has found it nearly impossible to secure the sprawling city. But by focusing an increased number of troops in selected neighborhoods, the military hopes it can create islands of security segregated from the chaos. The gated-communities plan has been tried -- with mixed success -- in other wars. In Vietnam, they were called 'strategic hamlets' and were a spectacular failure. But counterinsurgency experts say that such security zones can work if, once the barriers are established, the military follows up with neighborhood sweeps designed to flush out insurgents and militia fighters."

Ambassador-Designate Crocker Thrives In Tough Jobs. The Washington Post (1/11, C1, Wright, 690K) profiles Ryan Crocker, President Bush's nominee for US Ambassador to Iraq, calling him "A Diplomat Who Loves The Really Tough Jobs." The story's sub-headline reads, "In Harm's Way Is Where Ryan Crocker Thrives." The Post's very positive story says that "if there's an awful assignment in the Middle East or South Asia, Crocker, 57, has had it. He actually prefers the hot spots, colleagues say. The toughest hardship assignment for Crocker -- and the only one he tries to avoid -- is Washington, says former ambassador Edward Abington. 'He prefers the most difficult posts. There's a real sense of adventure in him,' Abington says."

Crocker Part Of New "Team Iraq." The Christian Science Monitor (1/11, LaFranchi, 59K) also writes about Crocker as part of a feature on President Bush's "reshuffled diplomatic and military 'Team Iraq.' It's an assignment for which a deep knowledge of the political and cultural complexities at play, both in Iraq and regionally, will be a huge plus." Crocker "would join a new team whose goal will be to stave off full-blown civil war in Iraq, as well as the disastrous regional and security consequences that would be very likely to accompany it." The new team "has nothing of the sharp ideological bent that both got the Bush administration's Iraq policy in trouble in the first place and kept it from seeing the policy mistakes that were made, experts say."

At Least 99 Iraqis, Three US Soldiers Killed In Ongoing Iraq Violence. The Los Angeles Times (1/11, Roug, 850K) reports "suicide bombers, roadside explosions and mortar rounds killed at least 99 Iraqis and wounded 26" across Iraq Wednesday, as the US military said three American troops had been killed in Anbar on Tuesday. And "despite the central Baghdad crackdown, 50 bodies were found in a neighborhood near Haifa Street. Ten more corpses were discovered across the Tigris River in the Rusafa neighborhood. All appeared to have been shot execution-style." The Washington Post (1/11, A12, Partlow, 690K) says "two busloads of Shiite Muslims returning from their holy pilgrimage to Mecca were gunned down Wednesday while passing through a predominantly Sunni Muslim swath of western Iraq." The AP (1/11) says US military deaths in Iraq hit "at least 3,017" on Wednesday. The AP count "is nine higher than the Defense Department's tally." The CBS Evening News (1/10, story 7, 2:30, Couric, 7.66M) said the war "has now lasted far longer than just about anyone predicted: 1,394 days, almost four years."

Iraq's Children Make Sectarian War Games Part Of Play. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, Shishkin, Juhi, 2.04M) runs a front-page feature on how Iraq's violence is impacting children, who now play sectarian war games. The Journal writes of a four-year-old who pulled a toy gun during play, "introduced himself as a commander, shouted the incantation 'God is greater' and warned Sunni Muslims not to fight back." As Iraq "careers toward full-scale civil war between its Shiite majority and Sunni minority, the culture of celebrating sectarian strife has taken root even among the very young in Sadr City."

National Guard Leaders Seek Changes As "Surge" Looms. The Hill (1/11, Tiron) reports the Bush Administration's plan to increase US troop strength in Iraq "is prompting National Guard officials to step up pressure for changes to mobilization, training and equipment that would have long-term implications for retention and efficiency." National Guard chief Lt. Gen. Steven Blum said, "There is no question in my mind that if the nation needs us, we will do it. It would be a huge mistake to not send the National Guard to shoulder some of that burden." But, he said, "'now is the time' to implement changes. 'If we do not do that, we risk the ability to sustain an all-volunteer force, in my judgment,' Blum warned."

Advocates Say Guantanamo Detainees "Driven Insane" By Conditions. The Financial Times (1/11, Dinmore) reports lawyers and rights activists say prisoners at Guantanamo Bay "are being driven insane by a tightening of conditions and the situation of their indefinite detention without trial." The advocates "also doubt whether the Bush administration intends to carry out its stated desire to close the facility." Today is the fifth anniversary of the first delivery of detainees to Guantanamo. The AP (1/10, Fox) writes that five years on, Guantanamo remains a "source of outrage," quoting Center for Constitutional Rights President Michael Ratner saying, "It has become iconic in the Muslim world and the wider world…for everything that the United States has done wrong in the war on terror."

Detainee Says "I Have Been Destroyed" By Guantanamo. The Los Angeles Times (1/11, 850K) runs an op-ed comprised of excerpts from letters Guantanamo detainee Jumah al-Dossari "wrote to his attorneys. Its contents have been deemed unclassified by the Department of Defense." Dossari writes, "At Guantanamo, soldiers have assaulted me, placed me in solitary confinement, threatened to kill me, threatened to kill my daughter and told me I will stay in Cuba for the rest of my life. They have deprived me of sleep, forced me to listen to extremely loud music and shined intense lights in my face. They have placed me in cold rooms for hours without food, drink or the ability to go to the bathroom or wash for prayers. They have wrapped me in the Israeli flag and told me there is a holy war between the Cross and the Star of David on one hand and the Crescent on the other. They have beaten me unconscious. … Why, after five years, is there no conclusion to the situation at Guantanamo? For how long will fathers, mothers, wives, siblings and children cry for their imprisoned loved ones? For how long will my daughter have to ask about my return? The answers can only be found with the fair-minded people of America. I would rather die than stay here forever, and I have tried to commit suicide many times. The purpose of Guantanamo is to destroy people, and I have been destroyed."

DOJ:

Mollohan Recuses Himself From DOJ Budget Work. The AP (1/11) reports, "Rep. Alan Mollohan, under Justice Department investigation about whether he has benefited from directing federal funds to nonprofit groups he helped start, stepped aside Wednesday from working on key elements of the department's budget." The AP continues, "The move came on the day Mollohan, D-W.Va., was named chairman of an Appropriations subcommittee responsible for the department's budget. … Mollohan will not have anything to do with setting the budgets for the attorney general's office, the FBI or the Justice Department's criminal division and prosecuting attorneys, he said in a letter to Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey, D-Wis. That way, he can't be accused of using his power as payback for the ongoing investigation or to influence it. … However, Mollohan will still have a big say in other elements of the agency's budget, including allocation of lawmakers' pet projects such as grants to state and local law enforcement agencies." The AP adds, "At issue is at least $202 million of federal funding that Mollohan has steered to five nonprofit groups in his district - with much of the money going to organizations run by people who contribute to the lawmaker's campaigns. … Last year, Mollohan stepped down from the House ethics committee after media reports into his activities, and the FBI soon launched an investigation. A conservative group, the National Legal and Policy Center, has alleged that the 12-term congressman has undervalued his assets in annual financial disclosure reports."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Comverse Attorney Settles Options Charges For $3.1 Million. USA Today (1/11, Iwata) reports, "William Sorin, former general counsel at Comverse Technology, will pay $3.1 million to settle charges that he conspired with the company's former CEO and chief financial officer to improperly backdate stock options, the Securities and Exchange Commission said Wednesday." USA continues, "Without admitting or denying the charges, Sorin agreed to disgorge $1.7 million and pay $818,000 in interest and a $600,000 civil penalty, according to the SEC. About $1 million of the disgorgement will come from backdated options he exercised. … Sorin is the first corporate counsel fined by the SEC in the federal crackdown on the backdating of stock options by 200 companies." USA adds, "Haywood Gilliam, a partner at Bingham McCutchen and former Justice Department securities fraud chief in San Francisco, says regulators are 'focusing more on gatekeeper defendants such as attorneys, and I would not be surprised to see more of it.' … Last year, the SEC and Justice Department charged Sorin, former Comverse CEO Jacob "Kobi" Alexander and former chief financial officer David Kreinberg with a stock-manipulation scheme that allegedly reaped them $8 million."

The Wall Street Journal (1/11, A11, Burns) reports, "The Harvard Law School graduate settled without admitting or denying the SEC's allegations about his role in backdating stock-option grants. Mr. Sorin, former Comverse Technology Chief Financial Officer David Kreinberg and fugitive former Chief Executive Jacob 'Kobi' Alexander were named in the SEC's civil suit in August and were criminally charged as well. Mr. Alexander fled to the African nation of Namibia, where he is awaiting a hearing on extradition to the U.S." The Journal continues, "Prosecutors charged the option-manipulation effort produced substantial personal profits for the executives while costing shareholders. … Mr. Sorin pleaded guilty in November to a single criminal charge of conspiracy to commit securities fraud, mail fraud and wire fraud. Mr. Kreinberg pleaded guilty in October to conspiracy and securities fraud and resolved the SEC charges by agreeing to pay nearly $2.4 million. The SEC said its investigation is continuing."

Records Show Jobs Benefited From Apple Options Dating. The Washington Post (1/11, A1, Sipress) reports, "Apple Inc. chief executive Steve Jobs confirmed his place this week as the premier impresario of the Internet age, taking the stage in San Francisco to unveil a smart phone that won a raucous endorsement from thousands of fans in the audience and sent Apple stock rocketing to a record high. … But his signature performance at the annual Macworld Conference and Expo did not dispel the scandal swirling around Apple over its backdating of stock options. Despite the company's defense that Jobs never personally benefited from a pair of stock option grants he received -- he gave them up in 2003, long before allegations of wrongdoing surfaced -- filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission show that his options were exchanged for 5 million shares of restricted Apple stock." The Post continues, "That stock was worth $75 million at the time, nearly the same as the value of the options he relinquished, using a technique for calculating the value of investments popular with financial analysts and used by Apple. … Steve Dowling, Apple's director of corporate communications, said the 2003 transaction did not directly benefit Jobs because he could not sell the restricted shares until he had remained at Apple for another three years." The Post adds, "Some investor advocates call that explanation disingenuous. 'You are torturing the English language to say he did not benefit from the options,' said Patrick McGurn, executive vice president of Institutional Shareholder Services. 'He certainly benefited from the grant because the grant was converted on a value-to-value basis.' … McGurn and other analysts also said the amount of stock Jobs received appeared to be inflated because the value of his options was exaggerated, at least in the case of one grant, by the improper backdating."

Former NYSE Head Grasso Seeks Jury Trial. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, C6, Bray) reports, "Dick Grasso, the former chairman of the New York Stock Exchange, asked a state appeals court to throw out a lower court's ruling that he must return a portion of his $187.5 million compensation package." The Journal continues, "At a hearing before the appellate division of the New York State Supreme Court, Gerson Zweifach, Mr. Grasso's lawyer, said New York State Supreme Court Justice Charles E. Ramos erred in October when he granted a summary judgment request by the state attorney general's office." The Journal adds, "Mr. Zweifach said there are too many issues that remain in dispute about whether Mr. Grasso fulfilled his fiduciary duties to the Big Board and what the NYSE's directors knew about his compensation package for the case to be decided without a trial. He said the case should be decided by a jury. … 'It was error for the trial court to even attempt on summary judgment to decide what people knew and what Mr. Grasso should have known,' he said." The Journal notes, "The attorney general's office, which sued Mr. Grasso in 2004 alleging his pay was excessive for a not-for-profit corporation, has said Mr. Grasso should be forced to return more than $112 million. .. In November, the appeals court stayed all proceedings until it could consider a number of issues raised by Mr. Grasso, including whether to reassign the case to a different judge."

US Charges Hewlett-Packard Investigator With Identity Theft. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, Waldman) reports from San Francisco, "In another criminal charge stemming from last fall's Hewlett-Packard Co. spying affair, U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan charged independent investigator Bryan Wagner with felony identity theft and conspiracy." The Journal continues, "Mr. Ryan's spokesman, Luke Macaulay, said no other federal charges were filed in the H-P matter Wednesday, but that the Justice Department is still investigating the case." The Journal adds, "Mr. Wagner, of Littleton, Colo., was one of five people charged with several felony counts last fall by the California attorney general's office in connection to the H-P scandal. Those charged by California include H-P's former nonexecutive chairman, Patricia Dunn, and its former chief ethics lawyer, Kevin Hunsaker. All five have pleaded not guilty to the California charges, including Mr. Wagner, who state and federal prosecutors allege used false identities to obtain the private phone records of numerous H-P directors, employees and journalists."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Tells Philadelphia Lawmaker He Is Target Of Corruption Probe. The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/11, Shiffman, Cattabiani, McCoy) reports, "Federal prosecutors last year sent a formal warning to State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo that he may be indicted, according to sources familiar with the investigation." The Inquirer continues, "The issuance of a so-called target letter from prosecutors to Fumo, one of Pennsylvania's most powerful politicians, is a significant milestone in the four-year investigation, which appears to be in its final stages. … The target letter was sent to Fumo last summer, around the time two of his computer aides were charged with destroying evidence to thwart the investigation, sources said. The Inquirer learned of the letter this month. A lawyer for Fumo yesterday declined to comment." The Inquirer adds, "Typically, prosecutors send target letters to people who are likely to be charged, as a warning and as an invitation to testify before the grand jury. It's an offer that the targets usually refuse. … 'It is the rare case, in my experience, that you can talk a prosecutor out of charges once a target letter is issued,' said Lawrence S. Lustberg, a Newark lawyer who defended one of the Commerce Bank executives convicted in the 2005 City Hall corruption trial. … However, the delivery of a target letter, part of a secret grand jury process, is no guarantee that charges will be filed." The Inquirer notes, "Before prosecutors present a potential indictment in such a high-profile case, they often consult with senior Justice Department officials in Washington. Also in such cases, defense attorneys are likely to be afforded the opportunity to meet with top officials, including U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan. … The Fumo investigation is focused on whether Fumo used funds from a multimillion-dollar South Philadelphia charity for personal or political benefit - and whether Fumo and staffers destroyed evidence to try to thwart the FBI. … With the grand jury's term due to expire next month, prosecutors have subpoenaed witnesses to appear in the coming weeks, sources said."

Two Florida Prison Guards Sentenced In Sex-For-Contraband Scheme. The AP (1/11, Kaczor) reports from Tallahassee, FL, "Two guards received one-year prison sentences Wednesday for their roles in a sex-for-contraband scheme that ended in a fatal shootout at a federal prison for women." The AP continues, "Gregory Dixon, who admitted having sex with inmates but denied giving them anything for it, has taken responsibility for his actions and was sorry, his lawyer said. … The other guard, Alan Moore, told U.S. District Judge Robert Hinkle he was wrongly convicted." The AP adds, "A jury convicted both in November of conspiring to accept illegal gratuities and other crimes. … Dixon and Moore were among six guards who had been charged with being part of a conspiracy to trade cigars, cigarettes, chewing gum, jewelry and cosmetics to inmates for sex and money at the Tallahassee Federal Correctional Institution. … 'They took an honorable position and public trust and used it for self-gratification,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Alan Sprowls told the judge. 'Their conduct was a complete abandonment of what they knew was right.' … One guard, Ralph Hill, pulled a gun and began firing at federal agents who had gone to the prison to arrest the suspects June 21. Hill and Justice Department Special Agent William 'Buddy' Sentner were killed, and a prison officer aiding in the arrests was wounded. … Three other guards pleaded guilty."

US Charges Ex-Swift Employees With Identity Theft. Bloomberg (1/11, Bjerga) reports, "A federal grand jury charged 53 former employees of Swift & Co.'s meat processing plant in Cactus, Texas, with felony identity theft, the U.S. Attorney's office in Dallas said." Bloomberg continues, "Those charged were among 295 at the Cactus plant arrested in mid-December during nationwide raids targeting illegal immigrants at six Swift facilities. About 1,300 Swift employees, or 9 percent of its workforce, were arrested by federal agents. So far, 246 of those arrested nationwide are facing criminal charges, most for identity theft, according to Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd in Washington. … 'It is a serious crime to hijack and steal a citizen's good name and credit to illegally stay in the United States,' U.S. Attorney Richard B. Roper said in a statement. He said most of those charged had used stolen or forged documents to find employment." Bloomberg adds, "Each of the 53 former Swift workers charged today is facing one count of false representation of a Social Security number. The felony carries a maximum sentence of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. Most face additional charges as well, according to the statement."

Judge Tosses Testimony In Trial Of Russian Charged With Kidnapping Plot. The AP (1/11) reports from Los Angeles, "A federal judge ordered jurors in the case of a man charged with masterminding a kidnapping-for-ransom plot that ended with five bodies tossed into a California reservoir to disregard the defendant's testimony after he refused to answer questions under cross-examination." The AP continues, "Iouri Mikhel, 42, testified last week that he helped lure some of the victims to meetings but never killed them. He also acknowledged being a 'professional criminal' who laundered money and was a black market trader in his native Russia. … When Mikhel declined Tuesday to answer questions from prosecutors and an attorney representing a co-defendant, U.S. District Judge Dickran Tevrizian ordered the testimony removed from the court record. … Closing arguments were scheduled to begin Wednesday." The AP notes, "Mikhel, 42, has pleaded not guilty to charges that include conspiracy and hostage-taking resulting in death. He could face the death penalty if convicted. … Prosecutors allege Mikhel and several accomplices abducted Los Angeles-area businesspeople over a four-month period in 2001 and 2002 and collected $1.2 million in ransoms before killing them. … Bodies of the five people kidnapped were later found in the New Melones Reservoir near Yosemite National Park."

Pellicano Probe Finds Attorney Gave Information To Kerkorian. The New York Times (1/11, Halbfinger, Weiner) reports, "When Kirk Kerkorian's longtime lawyer was indicted on wiretapping and conspiracy charges last February in the federal investigation of the Hollywood private detective Anthony Pellicano, the billionaire investor was mentioned almost as an afterthought. … There were no accusations that Mr. Kerkorian knew or approved of any wiretapping, and no indications that he had even been interviewed by the F.B.I. about Mr. Pellicano's work on his behalf. … But in recordings that Mr. Pellicano secretly made of his own telephone conversations, Mr. Kerkorian's lawyer, Terry N. Christensen, repeatedly said he told the billionaire — then 84, and locked in a legal dispute with his ex-wife, Lisa Bonder Kerkorian — what the private detective was learning from what prosecutors say were his wiretaps." The Times continues, "Mr. Christensen stops short of saying he has told Mr. Kerkorian that Mr. Pellicano was using wiretaps, but says he is providing Mr. Kerkorian with details of Ms. Kerkorian's private conversations. … Mr. Kerkorian has not been accused of any wrongdoing, and it is unlikely that someone could be held criminally liable for the actions of an investigator hired by his lawyer without showing that the client knew of the investigator's illegal acts. … Yet the recordings show how Mr. Pellicano's information could affect a high-stakes lawsuit, and make clear that Mr. Kerkorian, according to Mr. Christensen's assurances, was grateful for intimate information that helped his case." The Times notes, "Mr. Christensen and Mr. Pellicano, both of whom have pleaded not guilty to felony wiretapping and conspiracy charges, were among seven people indicted last February as part of an F.B.I. inquiry. Two have pleaded guilty, and the trial of the other five, after several delays, is set for August."

Land In Chicago Bribery Case Outside Alderman's Ward. The AP (1/11) reports, "When FBI officials arrested Alderman Arenda Troutman this week, they alleged that she took $5,000 from a fictitious developer in exchange for helping him move forward on a project in her South Side ward. Or, rather, what they assumed was her ward. A closer look has revealed that the parcel in question isn't in Troutman's 20th Ward, after all," and "while Troutman's lawyer is crying foul, FBI spokesman Ross Rice said the mix-up is a non-issue. 'From a legal standpoint, it doesn't matter,' he said. 'It's not an element of the crime.' But defense attorney Sam Adam Jr. said his client knows the boundaries of her ward and that the location revelation 'should prove to everyone that there was nothing fraudulent going on.' 'The government's case is smelling like Limburger cheese,' Adam said."

The Chicago Tribune (1/10, Gibson, Washburn, 617K) reported the story, under the headline "Details Don't Get In Way Of FBI Sting," noting, "if the federal sting…were a Hollywood movie, Chicagoans in the know might be complaining about a flawed plot. … If the…property 'was on the other side of the street, it would have been in the 20th,' said Thomas Leach, a spokesman for the Chicago Board of Election Commissioners." The Tribune added, "Rice said investigators did not double check, and from the FBI's perspective, it's a moot point. Either Troutman herself believed the parcel was in her ward and she could influence the process, or she knew the parcel wasn't in her ward and thought she could take money anyway, he said."

Prosecution Rests In Tennessee Waltz Trial. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (1/11, Buser, 163K) reports, "Federal prosecutors rested their bribery case Wednesday against the Shelby County Commission's former top administrative aide, Calvin Williams, who may take the stand today in his own defense. … Among the six witnesses called by Williams on Wednesday was attorney Buck Wellford, a county commissioner from 1994 to 2002 who said on cross-examination by prosecutor Lorraine Craig that he thought Williams should have focused more on his administrative duties with the commission and less on the commissioners' political issues. Wellford said Williams appeared to have 'a special relationship' with Commissioner Cleo Kirk, who sponsored the urban development grant of $100,000 for the Glenview Neighborhood Development Partners Inc.

Katrina Said To Have Contributed To New Orleans Crime Wave. The New York Times (1/11, Nossiter, 1.16M) reports New Orleans' recent "storm of violence…can be traced in part to dysfunctional law enforcement institutions, aggravated by a natural disaster that turned the physical and social landscape of New Orleans into an ideal terrain for criminals." The city was "the United States' murder capital by many measures in 2006," and "is well on its way to keeping that distinction in 2007." The Times cites New Orleans' "automobile-bound police department," which "is reluctant to walk the streets and interact with the city's residents. It is at war with the district attorney's office, which is prosecuting seven officers for a deadly shooting soon after Hurricane Katrina struck in 2005. Judges in the city's courts regularly rule in favor of criminals. Completing the grim picture is an already fragile social structure in the city's poorest wards that has been all but destroyed by Hurricane Katrina."

Bob Herbert, in his column for the New York Times (1/11, 1.16M) writes that as residents of New Orleans become "increasingly unnerved," the city "is a place that could use a hopeful sign of any kind, some positive development to signal that perhaps better times are coming." Herbert goes on to describe the efforts of Ghebre Selassie Mehreteab, "a middle-aged bundle of energy who heads the NHP Foundation, a national nonprofit organization that has taken on the difficult mission of providing quality housing at rents that poor and middle-class families can afford." Ghebre, or Gabe, "hopes to build 3,000 affordable rental apartments in and around New Orleans at a total cost of $300 million. How does he do it, when others find the task so daunting? The key, he said, is to combine the expertise of a successful real estate operation with the talent and vision of an experienced foundation committed to what is essentially a charitable mission."

Report Finds Ex-Prisoner Death Rate Higher Than For Current Inmates. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, Winstein) reports, "In what may be the first large-scale study of mortality among released prison inmates in the U.S., researchers found that getting out of jail can be hazardous to your health." The Journal continues, "The death rate for ex-prisoners was four times that of current inmates, and more than triple the rate for the general population, even after the effects of age, sex and race were factored out. More than 30% of the excess deaths were due to drug overdoses." The Journal adds, "Within the first two weeks after a prisoner is released, the figures were worse: former inmates were 13 times as likely to die as the population at large - and almost 80% of those extra deaths were from drug overdose. .. After drug overdoses, the leading causes of the higher death rate were murders, heart disease and suicides." The Journal notes, "The doctor who led the study, Ingrid A. Binswanger of the University of Colorado, said she was surprised that the difference in death rates was so large. The findings could indicate a substantial public health problem, since about 700,000 people are released from prison in the U.S. each year, according to the Bureau of Justice Statistics. … The study, to be published in the New England Journal of Medicine Thursday, tracked 30,237 inmates released from the Washington state prison system between 1999 and 2003. Researchers cautioned that the figures, which are broadly consistent with previous studies in Finland and Australia, do not necessarily apply to the rest of the U.S."

Bloggers Win Seats In Media Section At Libby Trial. The Washington Post (1/11, D1, Sipress) reports that when the trial if I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, "opens next week, scores of journalists are expected to throng the federal courtroom in Washington, far too many for the 100 seats set aside for the media." But for the "first time in a federal court, two of these seats will be reserved for bloggers. After two years of negotiations with judicial officials across the country, the Media Bloggers Association, a nonpartisan group with about 1,000 members working to extend the powers of the press to bloggers, has won credentials to rotate among his members." The Libby trial "could 'catalyze' the association's efforts to win respect and access for bloggers in federal and state courthouses, said Robert Cox, the association's president."

Delphi Seeks Bankruptcy Judge's Approval Of Investment Plan. The AP (1/11, Tong) reports, "Board members of Delphi Corp. decided on Wednesday to move forward in seeking the approval of a federal bankruptcy judge to allow five private equity and institutional investors to buy shares worth as much as $3.4 billion in the company upon its reorganization." The AP continues, "Directors of the Troy, Michigan-based auto parts maker essentially rejected an unsolicited $4.7 billion bid made by a rival investor. Judge Robert Drain was scheduled to consider the plan and objections in a Thursday hearing." The AP adds, "The plan is a crucial part of an overall transformation sought by the company, as it attempts to exit bankruptcy in the first half of this year. Objectors say it transfers a disproportionate amount of the company's value to the investors at the expense of other stakeholders in the case. … The plan allows affiliates of three private equity investors, Appaloosa Management LP, Cerberus Capital Management LP and Harbinger Capital Partners Master Fund I, as well as Merrill Lynch & Co. and UBS Securities LLC, to buy shares in a restructured Delphi for $1.4 billion to $3.4 billion. It would give the investors a minimum of 30 percent and up to 72 percent of the restructured company but also depends on consensual resolution of Delphi's labor agreements by Jan. 31. … Highland Capital Management LP made a competing proposal Dec. 21, three days after the original bid, to buy shares at a cost of $4.7 billion. Highland has joined the acting U.S. Trustee, the official committee of equity security holders, the International Union of Electronic Workers-Communications Workers of America and two other unions in objecting to the Appaloosa-Cerberus plan. … The U.S. Trustee and the IUE-CWA, which represents the second-largest group of Delphi employees, objected in part based on their belief that the investment plan takes the place of the usual process of creating a bankruptcy reorganization plan since it outlines how some creditors would be paid."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI "Highly Likely" To Investigate Houston Police Shooting. The Houston Chronicle (1/11, Rogers, 530K) reports, "The FBI said Wednesday that it likely will open a civil rights investigation to monitor ongoing inquiries into the shooting death of Robert McIntosh by a Houston police officer. The move only will monitor investigations by local authorities and is not a formal investigation to determine whether McIntosh's civil rights were violated, said Shauna Dunlap, a spokeswoman for the FBI. 'Agents have been looking into the matter, and it looks likely that we will open a civil rights investigation to monitor the progress of the district attorney's investigation and the Houston Police Department internal affairs investigation,' Dunlap said." The Chronicle notes, "McIntosh, 23, was shot to death Monday after a traffic stop in the Sunnyside area, prompting an outcry from community leaders when witnesses alleged the man was handcuffed before the shooting. … Dunlap said the FBI decided to wait until it reviews the case and meets with other agencies involved in the investigation before deciding to launch a probe. If the FBI opens an investigation, she said, it may come in the next few days."

The AP (1/11, Stinebaker) reports, "McIntosh's shooting prompted Quanell X, a local activist and frequent critic of the Houston Police Department, to demand a federal investigation, saying McIntosh was the victim of 'a cold-blooded murder.' … FBI spokeswoman Shauna Dunlap said Wednesday such an investigation likely will be announced soon. … 'There is a strong possibility that in the next couple of days, we will open a civil rights investigation,' Dunlap told The Associated Press." The AP notes, "In the past, federal authorities in Houston have prosecuted Houston police for civil rights violations when a local grand jury declined to indict them in shootings of civilians."

Jury Deliberations In Texas Smuggling Case Postponed. The AP (1/11, Lozano) reports from Houston, "A truck driver facing a possible death sentence for a smuggling attempt in which 19 illegal immigrants died locked in his sweltering tractor-trailer will have to wait until at least next week to learn his fate." The AP continues, "The jury deliberating whether to sentence Tyrone Williams to death for what became the nation's deadliest human smuggling attempt is taking a five-day break, U.S. District Judge Lee Rosenthal told attorneys Wednesday." The AP adds, "Jurors decided to wait until Tuesday to resume their deliberations because the judge was scheduled to be out of town Thursday and Friday and the Martin Luther King Jr. holiday is Monday. … Jurors deliberated for about eight hours Wednesday without reaching a verdict. They have deliberated a total of about 14 hours since Tuesday." The AP notes, "The jury is deciding whether to sentence Williams to death or life in prison without parole, or to let Rosenthal issue a sentence that could range from no incarceration to life in prison without parole. … Williams was convicted last month on 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting immigrants, including 20 counts that were death-penalty eligible."

Judge Strikes Down Effort To Seize Immigrant Smuggling Money. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, Carrns) reports, "The state of Arizona has no authority to seize thousands of Western Union Co. money transfers to Mexico that originated outside of Arizona, a state court has ruled."

The Journal continues, "The finding, which was filed Tuesday, is a victory for Western Union, Englewood, Colo., which relies on electronic money transfers to Mexico as a mainstay of its business. Such transfers make up about 10% of its money transfers." The Journal adds, "Arizona Attorney General Terry Goddard said he will contest the Superior Court's order halting the state's seizure warrant in the Arizona Court of Appeals. He said he is confident his office can provide evidence that the money transfers, while occurring outside of Arizona, are linked to Arizona crimes, and that Arizona authorities should be allowed to intercept them as part of its battle against illegal human trafficking."

The AP (1/11, Billeaud) reports, "Mexico depends heavily on money wired from Mexicans who are working in the United States. Some lawmakers in Mexico denounced the seizure effort. … The efforts were so successful that smugglers began to route their payments from other American states to Mexico, even as traffickers continued to sneak people in through Arizona, prosecutors said. Authorities responded by trying to seize money transfers going into the northern Mexican state of Sonora. … The new ruling concluded prosecutors had not shown they have jurisdiction for the broader approach and had not demonstrated that the Western Union customers in question were involved in crimes. It said the approach violated protections for interstate and international commerce under the U.S. Constitution."

Seattle Blamed For Arrests Of WTO Protestors In 1999. The AP (1/11, Johnson) reports from Seattle, WA, "A lawyer for as many as 200 people arrested in an emergency 'no protest zone' established during the 1999 World Trade Organization demonstrations asked a federal jury to hold the city accountable for violating the protesters' constitutional rights." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Marsha Pechman has already ruled that police made the arrests without probable cause. The protesters are hoping to prove the police had a policy of targeting protesters for their anti-WTO opinions, or at least that the actions of officers were approved by higher-ups; if so, the city could face millions of dollars in damages in a subsequent liability phase of the trial. … 'My clients were not throwing bricks. They were not interfering with police,' attorney Mike Withey said in his opening statement Tuesday. 'The policy was to arrest people based on their viewpoint.'" The AP notes, "City attorney Ted Buck said the overwhelmed officers didn't care what opinions the protesters held; they simply wanted to keep the downtown core clear so that police, emergency workers, WTO delegates and others would be able to do their jobs. … The week of the arrests, about 50,000 protesters had swarmed Seattle, overwhelming police and closing down the WTO meeting. The mayor imposed a curfew and limited the downtown core to WTO delegates, police and emergency workers, store employees, residents and shoppers."

GOP Lawmakers Ask DOJ To Help Keep Border Agents Free Pending Appeal. The Washington Times (1/11, Seper) reports, "Republican House members yesterday asked President Bush to keep two U.S. Border Patrol agents out of prison pending their appeal of convictions for shooting a suspected drug smuggler in the buttocks as he fled into Mexico. … 'Several discrepancies in the government's case strongly question whether justice has been served, and permitting these men to be incarcerated in the interim puts their lives at risk,' Rep. Dana Rohrabacher of California said at a Capitol Hill press conference. … 'We're going to find out whose side you're on ... the American people or the side of our enemies,' Mr. Rohrabacher said in a reference to Mr. Bush. 'If you let these two men go to jail for defending us, then we'll know you're on the side of our enemies.' … He was joined by Reps. Duncan Hunter of California, Ted Poe of Texas, Walter B. Jones of North Carolina, Joe Wilson of South Carolina and Tom Tancredo of Colorado." The Times adds, "In lieu of a pardon, a letter petitioning Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales was presented during the press conference asking the Justice Department to direct federal prosecutors not to oppose a motion filed in a Texas court to keep the agents free on bond during the appeals process. … Agents Ignacio Ramos, 37, and Jose Alonso Compean, 28, were sentenced in October in federal court in El Paso, Texas, to 11 and 12 years, respectively, for causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence and a civil rights violation. … A jury convicted the two agents in March after a two-week trial. They are scheduled to report to prison Wednesday. Compean and his wife, Patty, attended yesterday's press conference. … 'I urge Attorney General Gonzales to allow these men to go free on bail while the appeals process is under way,' Mr. Wilson said. 'We must stand with our nation's heroes -- not the criminals who disregard our laws.'"

KFMB-TV, San Diego, CA (1/10, 12:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "Among those asking Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez to intervene is San Diego Congressman Duncan Hunter. Hunter says the two border patrol agents from Texas should at the very least remain free on bail while their appeal is pending. Agents Jose Campean and Ignacio Ramos were chasing a drug smuggler back in February of 2005."

KDBC-TV, El Paso, TX (1/10, 6:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "Ramos and Compean were sentenced to Federal prison for shooting a Mexican drug dealer and trying to hide it. Today several Congressmen announced their plan to send a letter to the President and to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Asking to keep the two men out on bail until the continuance of their trail is done. Without a pardon."

Civilian Oversight Of LAPD Urged After Officer's Exoneration In Teen's Death. The Los Angeles Times (1/11, Lait, Hymon) reports, "Angered by an administrative panel's secret decision not to punish the Los Angeles Police Department officer who fatally shot a 13-year-old boy, City Council members and community leaders called Wednesday for increasing civilian oversight of misconduct cases and reopening them to public scrutiny. … 'People are always going to have different views on how cops should be punished for shootings, but all the facts should be out in the open and there ought to be accountability for the ultimate decision-makers,' said Councilman Jack Weiss, head of the city's Public Safety Committee." The Times continues, "Weiss said he would hold a joint hearing with the Police Commission in upcoming weeks to discuss ways to make LAPD discipline 'more transparent.' … Other city officials, including Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, also said they were disappointed to learn that an internal LAPD disciplinary panel meeting held behind closed doors this week rejected the civilian Police Commission's findings that Officer Steven Garcia should be punished for the Feb. 6, 2005, shooting of Devin Brown." The Times adds, "Councilman Bernard C. Parks, who led the LAPD from 1997 to 2002, said holding disciplinary hearings in private undermines confidence in the Police Department. … Although disciplinary hearings have historically been open to the public, police officials changed department policy late last year in response to a state Supreme Court ruling that restricted access to law enforcement personnel records in a San Diego case."

U Of Michigan To Comply With State's Ban On Use Of Race Or Sex In Admissions. The Washington Post/AP (1/11, A14, Goodman) reports, "The University of Michigan announced Wednesday that it will comply with a new voter-approved ban on affirmative action and immediately stop considering race and gender in admissions." Meanwhile, the university will "continue its legal challenge of the measure" and will continue to "use other criteria that are not explicitly race- or gender-based" including "geographic diversity, the level of education completed by students' parents, and whether students attended a disadvantaged school."

The New York Times (1/11, Lewin) reports, "The University of Michigan acceded to a federal appeals court decision" requiring "immediate compliance" with "the state's new ban on affirmative action in public education, employment or contracting."

Florida To Move Mentally Ill Inmates To Hospitals, Residential Centers. The New York Times (1/11, Sexton) reports, "About 300 mentally ill inmates in county jails throughout Florida will eventually be moved to psychiatric hospitals and residential centers for treatment after state lawmakers agreed on Wednesday to an emergency spending measure." The Times continues, "The Legislative Budget Commission, a panel of the Florida Legislature meeting in an emergency session, voted unanimously to spend nearly $19 million before July 1 to provide 373 more psychiatric beds for mentally ill inmates and more community services for mentally ill people at risk of being jailed." The Times adds, "The decision comes after a state circuit judge charged Lucy Hadi, the former secretary of the Department of Children and Families, with indirect criminal contempt for keeping mentally ill inmates in jail longer than state law allows. Ms. Hadi, who resigned last month, was fined $80,000. … State law requires the department to move inmates found incompetent to stand trial from county jails to psychiatric hospitals within 15 days of receiving a commitment order. The number of inmates found incompetent has increased by 16 percent over the last two fiscal years. As of Tuesday, nearly 250 mentally ill inmates had waited more than 15 days for treatment. In all, nearly 300 inmates are waiting for treatment."

Columnist Blasts DA In Duke Lacrosse Probe. In a column for the Wall Street Journal (1/11, A15), Dorothy Rabinowitz writes, "No one could have imagined, when the story began last March, how soon and completely that bit of shorthand – 'the Duke University scandal' -- would be transformed. … Scarcely 10 months after, the term is now almost universally understood as a reference to the operations of Michael Nifong, the Durham County district attorney, whose abandonment of all semblance of concern about the merits of the rape and assault accusations against three Duke University students was obvious from the first. So was his abundant confidence while broadcasting comments on the guilt of the accused. He seemed a man immune to concerns for appearances as he raced about expounding on the case against the accused lacrosse players and calling them hooligans. He would hear nothing by way of concern from Duke administrators (seven months into this affair, the university president did find an opportunity to mention the accused students' right to a presumption of innocence) -- and certainly none from the politically progressive quarters of the Duke faculty who lent their names to an impassioned ad thanking everyone who had come out to march in protest against the rape and assault of the exotic dancer; 88 faculty members signed it, among them such Duke luminaries as Alice Kaplan, author and student of fascism, and Frank Lentricchia, literary critic." Rabinowitz continues, "Mr. Nifong's confidence that he had nothing to fear from establishment opinion or from the leaders of the great university as he bounded about making hash of the rules of justice -- prime among them the accused's right to a presumption of innocence -- proved justified. And might have remained so longer but for the catastrophic effects of the accuser's unraveling stories." Rabinowitz concludes, "The accused Duke students can be grateful that the case against them has collapsed, and that Mr. Nifong now confronts a serious ethics complaint filed by the North Carolina State Bar. They will never have to face anything like the malignant force which descended on the happy and ambitious Amiraults in 1984, and turned their lives to dust. But Reade Seligmann, David Evans and Collin Finnerty have this year had a look into an abyss that has claimed many others, and that is never less than terrorizing. It is a piece of their Duke education they are unlikely to forget."

US Airways Hikes Delta Bid To $10.2 Billion.

The Washington Post (1/11, D1, Wilber) reports, "US Airways turned up the pressure yesterday in its hostile takeover bid for bankrupt Delta Air Lines by boosting its offer, setting a February deadline for action and sending its top executive to Capitol Hill to reassure legislators that a merger would not harm consumers." The Post continues, "The push comes as US Airways appeared to have lost some momentum in its effort to entice Delta's creditors to accept its bid. Yesterday, it increased its original offer, about $8.6 billion, to $10.2 billion, including $5 billion in cash and nearly 90 million shares of US Airways stock."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/11, Grantham) reports, "The merger plot just thickened at Delta Air Lines. … US Airways bumped up its takeover bid for the Atlanta-based airline by 20 percent Wednesday, to $10.3 billion, adding a Feb. 1 deadline in a move to pressure Delta's bankruptcy court creditors — who have a big say in whether the deal goes through." The AJC adds, "Industry analysts said that should give Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways a better shot at persuading the creditors to choose its hostile takeover bid over Delta management's plan to emerge from Chapter 11 as an independent carrier. … But a report also surfaced that Delta and Northwest Airlines, also in Chapter 11 proceedings, have had talks about a possible merger after they both exit bankruptcy. … Citing unidentified sources, the Wall Street Journal reported that the two airlines were talking at various levels of management. … It said Delta and its creditors may see a post-bankruptcy link-up with Northwest as a better alternative to the US Airways bid. The Journal also said Delta and United Airlines have had contacts." The AJC notes, "A merger involving Delta and any of those possible partners would create the world's biggest airline. It would require approval of the U.S. Justice Department, which historically has taken a dim view of such large-scale deals."

The AP (1/11, Weber) reports, "The ball is now in the creditors' court. … The question is whether they want to take the money US Airways is offering and run the risk of a long regulatory fight, or stick with Delta's plan to emerge from bankruptcy by the middle of this year as a standalone company worth $9.4 billion to $12 billion." The AP adds, "An unofficial group of unsecured creditors issued a statement calling on Delta 'to provide thoughtful and unbiased consideration' to the enhanced offer. It urged the airline's management to cooperate fully with US Airways' efforts to get information and not to deter alternatives from other companies that could provide stakeholders greater recoveries than under a standalone reorganization. The group represents creditors holding about $2.3 billion in claims against Delta. .. Delta management has argued that the combination of US Airways and Delta would not receive regulatory approval because of the overlap of the two carriers' routes. US Airways says there wouldn't be any regulatory holdup."

Delta In Talks With Northwest To Avert US Airways Bid. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, B1, Dade, Carey) reports, "In the two months since US Airways Group Inc. announced its hostile bid for Delta Air Lines Inc., the embattled carrier has mounted a high-octane campaign of grass-roots organizing and fierce political lobbying to try to stay independent -- but all that has succeeded in doing is attracting a higher offer and a potential new suitor. … Yesterday, US Airways increased its bid to $10.3 billion, up 20% from its original proposal, while people familiar with the situation said there have been recurring talks between Delta and Northwest Airlines Corp. about the two combining when each emerges from bankruptcy later this year. While Delta maintains its insistence that its future is brightest as a stand-alone carrier, the talks with Northwest suggest that Delta executives are grappling privately with how much more the airline can afford to pay to creditors to remain independent. Northwest has emerged as a 'promising third option,' according to one person familiar with the matter."

The New York Times (1/11, Bailey) reports, "A Northwest bid would probably be preferable to Delta managers because the two airlines' route networks overlap less than with Delta and US Airways. A combination with Northwest is therefore likely to lead to fewer grounded planes, if any." The Times adds, "The growing interest in Delta reflects the improving fortunes of the airline industry, which is starting to post rare profits, and also perhaps the start of a new wave of consolidation. … While the progress of any particular deal is a matter of conjecture, yesterday's events suggested that one or more airline mergers had become likelier than even a week ago."

The AP (1/11, Freed) reports, "No one knows if Northwest and Delta airlines will end up together, but the idea strikes some observers as sensible. … Recurring talks between the two carriers have taken place, the Wall Street Journal reported on Wednesday, citing anonymous sources. Both airlines declined to comment. Even if managers at the two bankrupt airlines make a deal, creditors would have to approve, too. … But observers pointed out that Delta Air Lines Inc.'s routes have less overlap with Northwest than with US Airways, which has proposed buying Delta. Northwest's domestic routes are concentrated in the Midwest and Asia, while Delta is strong in the South and East and over the Atlantic." The AP adds, "Less overlap could mean less resistance from antitrust regulators, said former Northwest board member and Northwest Capt. Mike Ristow. … 'In terms of a global network, they come up with something more attractive' than a Delta-US Airways merger would, said Daniel Kasper, managing director of aviation consulting firm LECG in Cambridge, Mass. LECG has done bankruptcy work for both Delta and Northwest."

Monsanto Expects DOJ Antitrust Review To Delay Delta And Pine Merger. The St. Louis Business Journal (1/11) reports, "Monsanto Co. said in a regulatory filing Tuesday that its proposed $1.5 billion acquisition of cotton seed breeder Delta and Pine Land Co. might be delayed past its mid-February targeted closing due to U.S. Department of Justice approvals." The Journal continues, "In its quarterly regulatory filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, Monsanto said that the deadline for the merger, initially announced in August, is Feb. 14, subject to an automatic extension of up to six months to complete regulatory reviews. The company said in the filing that it anticipates the regulatory process might extend beyond that date, invoking the automatic extension." The Journal adds, "The merger has been approved by the boards of both company's and Delta's shareholders approved the deal Dec. 21. The transaction is being reviewed by federal and state authorities, including the Department of Justice. … To make the deal more acceptable to regulators, Monsanto pledged in August to divest its Stoneville cottonseed business and is looking for potential buyers for that business."

Louisiana Pension Fund Sues Caremark Directors Over CVS Merger. The New York Times (1/11, Morgenson) reports, "A public pension fund in Louisiana has sued the directors of Caremark Rx, contending that their unanimous backing of the company's $21 billion merger with CVS over a rival $26 billion bid from Express Scripts improperly benefits Caremark executives at the expense of shareholders." The Times continues, "Among the benefits Caremark executives and directors will receive if the CVS deal goes through, the fund's lawsuit contends, are positions at the combined company and indemnification from penalties and fines that may result when criminal and regulatory investigations into possible stock option backdating by Caremark officials are concluded." The Times adds, "Yesterday, Express Scripts filed suit to block the CVS deal, arguing that the terms deal supported by the Caremark board prevents its directors from executing their fiduciary duties to shareholders. … The lawsuits, filed in Delaware Chancery Court, will once again bring the fiduciary duties of directors in the post-Enron world to the forefront. Delaware is where most major United States companies are incorporated." The Times notes, "Caremark accepted the CVS bid on Nov. 1, even though the stock-for-stock deal offered no premium to Caremark's market price at the time. … Caremark's directors have recommended that company shareholders approve the deal at a meeting that is expected to occur before March 16."

Express Scripts Urges Caremark Shareholders To Reject CVS Buyout. Bloomberg (1/11, Simison, Larkin) reports, "Express Scripts Inc. urged Caremark Rx Inc. shareholders to vote against a proposed $22.3 billion buyout by CVS Corp. while Caremark's chief blasted Express Scripts' $24.3 billion offer." Bloomberg continues, "Rejecting the CVS deal would clear the way for Caremark's board to 'give proper consideration to any other offer which it receives, including our proposal' in stock and cash, Express Scripts said today in a proxy statement." Bloomberg adds, "At the center of the dispute are competing proposals for restructuring the way Caremark handles a portion of the $251.8 billion in prescriptions distributed each year in the U.S. on behalf of employers and insurance companies. Buying Caremark would make Express Scripts the nation's largest manager of drug benefits. CVS, the second-largest U.S. drugstore chain, wants Caremark to gain power to negotiate medicine prices."

Cerberus May Bid For Equity Office. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, A3, Berman, Forsyth) reports, "Expectations were building last night that rival bidders might soon materialize to challenge the $20 billion buyout of Equity Office Properties Trust by Blackstone Group." The Journal continues, "Top real-estate and private-equity investors were buzzing that a competing offer could come within a matter of days, possibly from an investment team led by real-estate maven Barry Sternlicht of Starwood Capital Group Global LLC and Neil Bluhm of Walton Street Capital. The two were seriously considering an offer last night, said one person briefed on their plans. The two still haven't completed financing for an offer. One possible funding source could be Cerberus Capital Management, a New York-based financial conglomerate, people familiar with the matter said." The Journal adds, "A competing bid would set off what would be the most high-stakes and high-profile bidding war since the contest for RJR Nabisco nearly two decades ago. And it would be a potent indicator of the intensity of the competitive rivalry to buy companies. So far, buyout firms have observed an unstated gentleman's agreement not to top, or "jump" in Wall Street parlance, signed merger deals. But real-estate firms aren't party to that understanding."

The New York Times (1/11, Sorkin) reports, "A Cerberus offer could result in a bidding war for Equity Office, pitting two of the most powerful financial firms in the nation against each other for a deal that would be the largest leveraged buyout in history, surpassing the $33 billion that a consortium of private equity groups paid for the health care company HCA Inc. in August. … A bid by Cerberus would also be one of the first instances of a private equity firm's trying to top another firm's deal after an agreement had been struck."

EU Eyes Antitrust Action To Break Up Power Groups. The Financial Times (1/11, Buck) reports, "Neelie Kroes warned yesterday that she could use her powers as European Union competition commissioner to break up the region's large, integrated energy groups, opening up a potential new front in the broader regulatory crackdown on groups such as Eon, RWE and GdF." The Times continues, "Ms Kroes is a long-standing critic of gas and electricity suppliers that also control crucial transmission infrastructure, such as pipelines. She argues that integrated groups have used their grip on the networks to freeze out new entrants and stifle competition. … 'Ownership unbundling' - the break-up of integrated energy groups - through new legislation would take years, and is certain to face stiff opposition from some member states. … But Ms Kroes stressed that a break-up could be imposed on individual companies as part of an antitrust decision, for example as a punishment for violating EU competition rules. Asked whether forced unbundling was an option as part of an antitrust investigation, the commissioner replied: 'Absolutely.'" The Times notes, "The news is of special concern for Eon and RWE of Germany, GdF of France, Eni of Italy and OMV of Austria, since they are the subject of a Commission antitrust probe. The groups' offices were raided in May, following suspicions they had excluded rivals from wholesale markets and infrastructure and of 'possible collusion between incumbents in the form of market sharing', Ms Kroes said."

The New York Times (1/11, Kanter) reports, "European Union officials on Wednesday challenged governments to loosen their grip on national energy sectors, calling for a fresh wave of competition and investment in infrastructure and technology to ease dependence on powerful exporters like Russia and to combat global warming. … The region needs a new 'postindustrial revolution,' said the European Commission's president, José Manuel Barroso, announcing a number of energy proposals. 'We have already left behind our coal-based industrial past. It is time to embrace our low-carbon future.'" The Times adds, "The package of proposals is one of the largest ever presented by the commission, although it reflected changes by France and Germany, which oppose the breakup of their national electricity companies. … European Union officials also backed away from earlier, more ambitious targets for cutting emissions after energy-intensive industries and labor groups warned of threats to profits and jobs — especially if competitors in the United States and elsewhere did not follow suit. … Many of the proposals, which also aim to encourage the use of renewable fuels for cars and to improve the energy efficiency of buildings and home appliances, are to be debated by European Union leaders at a summit meeting in March. If they approve the package, many of the measures would still require the commission to draft formal legal proposals."

Bloomberg (1/11, Newman, Stearns) reports, "The European Commission, the EU's regulatory arm, wants to open competition to new entrants. Most incumbent energy companies own both production businesses and the units managing the pipes and power lines. The EU regulator wants separate owners for those businesses, a practice known as unbundling. The recommendations, to be discussed by EU leaders in March, are already meeting resistance from France and Germany." Bloomberg continues, "As part of the investigation into the region's 250 billion- euro ($325 billion) power and gas industry, the EU also probed utilities including E.ON AG, Gaz de France SA and Eni SpA for possible antitrust violations. The commission said energy companies may be illegally colluding to keep out rivals, calling the practice ``one of the most serious threats to competition." … Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes has threatened to fine energy companies as much as 10 percent of annual sales for failing to open their networks to competitors. Kroes also said she may break up companies if she finds they have illegally restricted competition."

Cisco Sues Apple Over IPhone Trademark. The AP (1/11, Robertson) reports, "Cisco Systems sued Apple Inc. in federal court Wednesday, saying the computer maker's new iPhone violates its trademark." The AP continues, "The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California, came just a day after Apple CEO Steve Jobs unveiled the Apple iPhone in dramatic fashion at a trade show in San Francisco. … But even while Jobs was trumpeting the product, the matter of the product's naming had not been resolved behind the scenes between two of Silicon Valley's biggest names." The AP adds, "San Jose-based Cisco, the world's largest network-equipment maker, has owned the trademark on the name 'iPhone' since 2000, when it acquired InfoGear Technology Corp., which originally registered the name. … Three weeks ago, Cisco's Linksys division put the trademark to use, releasing an Internet phone called 'iPhone' that uses the increasingly popular Voice over Internet Protocol, or VoIP. … But on Tuesday, Jobs unveiled Apple's own iPhone, a 'game-changing' touch-screen-controlled cell phone device that plays music, surfs the Web and delivers voicemail and e-mail."

USA Today (1/11, Kessler) reports, "Apple spokesman Steve Dowling calls the lawsuit 'silly.' He says several companies use the iPhone name for products, though he could not provide examples. Cisco's claims 'are tenuous,' he says." USA adds, "Apple has made inquiries about the iPhone name for several years, says Cisco general counsel Mark Chandler. Talks picked up in recent weeks and seemed to be going well, Chandler said Wednesday. But Apple stopped communicating with Cisco at about 9 p.m. PT Monday, he said. … Financial terms were not an issue, Chandler said. Cisco primarily wanted two things: clarity over who would use the iPhone name and interoperability between Apple's iPhone and other companies' products, he says. He would not provide specifics."

Griles Notified Of Pending Indictment. The New York Times (1/11, Shenon) reports J. Steven Griles, the "former No. 2 official in the Interior Department has been notified by federal prosecutors that he will most likely be indicted for lying about his relationship with the corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff, people with knowledge of the investigation said Wednesday." Barry Hartman, an attorney for Griles, said his client "was recently told by the Justice Department that he was a target of the investigation as a result of his testimony about Mr. Abramoff to a Senate committee in 2005." Two Bush Administration officials "who have been briefed on the case said the investigation of Mr. Griles and Mr. Abramoff had also brought scrutiny to a senior Justice Department official, Sue Ellen Wooldridge, an assistant attorney general. She submitted a letter of resignation on Monday and is expected to depart this month."

The AP (1/11, Heilprin) reports, "Also being investigated in relation to the grand jury probe is Sue Ellen Wooldridge, the assistant attorney general who oversees the Justice Department's environment and natural resources division, one person familiar with the investigation said. … Wooldridge sent in a resignation letter on Monday, saying she wanted to return to the private sector, Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said Wednesday. … Before joining the Justice Department in November 2005, she was the Interior Department solicitor and was deputy chief of staff to Interior Secretary Gale Norton while Griles was at Interior."

US Chamber Of Commerce Cites Foreign Sources Of Pollution. The Hill (1/11, Holzer) reports the US Chamber of Commerce is "petitioning the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) to make it easier for states, counties and cities to discount dust and smog that drifts across their borders from places as far-flung as China and Africa from their pollution levels in order to remain compliant with federal air-quality standards." While it is "well-documented that large plumes of particles and pollutants blow across the ocean," the Chamber "asserts that EPA guidance on the issue is so 'limited, deficient and complex' that states are at a loss as to how to get the relief, and so are failing to attract cement, steel and power companies that could create jobs."

Writer Decries Takings In "Post-Kelo World." In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (1/11, A14), William R. Maurer, executive director of the Institute for Justice, Washington chapter, writes, "The city of Burien, Wash., recently decided that a piece of property owned by the seven Strobel sisters that had long housed a popular diner-style restaurant was not upscale enough for the city's ambitious 'Town Square' development, which will feature condos, shops, restaurants and offices. Rather than condemn the property for a private developer and risk a lawsuit, Burien came up with a plan -- it would put a road through the property, and the city manager told his staff to 'make damn sure' it did. When a subsequent survey revealed that the road would not affect the building itself, but only sideswipe a small corner of the property, the staff developed yet another site plan that put the road directly through the building. A trial court concluded that the city's actions might be 'oppressive' and 'an abuse of power' -- but allowed the condemnation anyway. The Washington Court of Appeals affirmed, and the Washington Supreme Court refused to hear the case." Maurer continues, "Welcome to the post-Kelo world. The U.S. Supreme Court's 2005 decision made clear that the federal courts would not stop local governments across the country from condemning private property for economic development. While the court noted that states were free to provide greater protections for homes and small businesses if they chose, Washington state stands as evidence that a strong state constitution means little if the courts do not enforce it and local governments disregard it." Maurer concludes, "Regardless of strong constitutional protections for private property, governments and courts now view eminent domain as an area where few if any restrictions exist. … Meanwhile, state and federal courts are turning redevelopment areas into Constitution-free zones, where the government can do what it wants with few or no restrictions. It doesn't have to be this way. Courts could force the government to comply with the state and federal constitutions. Local governments could limit their takings only to legitimate public uses. But until all three branches of government begin taking their constitutional obligations seriously, property owners across the country face the continued threat of eminent-domain abuse, regardless of what the state or federal constitution says."

Exxon Appears To Backtrack On Global Warming. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, A2, Ball, 2.04M) reports, "In one of the strongest signs yet that U.S. industry anticipates government curbs on global-warming emissions, Exxon Mobil Corp., long a leading opponent of such rules, is starting to talk about how it would like them to be structured." Exxon's "top executives have openly questioned the scientific validity of claims that fossil-fuel emissions are warming the planet, and it has funded outside groups that have challenged such claims in language sometimes stronger than the company itself has used." Now, however, "Exxon has cut off funding to a handful of those outside groups. It says climate-science models that link greenhouse-gas concentrations to global warming are getting more reliable. And it is meeting in Washington with officials of other large corporations to discuss what form the companies would prefer a possible U.S. carbon regulation to take."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Urges Patience In Mexico Drug War. The San Antonio (TX) Express-News (1/11, Castillo) reports from Laredo, "Despite the Mexican government's inability to crack down on drug cartels responsible for thousands of deaths and kidnappings -- some Americans included among the victims -- the U.S. government is reserving judgment, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Wednesday during a border tour here." The Express-News continues, "Mexico's new president, Felipe Calderón, who already has sent troops to aid in the drug war, needs time to show his country's commitment, Gonzales said in brief remarks to reporters at the World Trade Bridge. … Gonzales met with local, state and federal law enforcement officials, some who brought up the issue of trustworthiness of their Mexican counterparts, said Rep. Henry Cuellar, D-Laredo, who participated in the briefing via phone." The Express-News adds, "More than 170 homicides were reported in Nuevo Laredo in 2006, but only a handful of arrests were made, much to the frustration of local U.S. agencies whose own investigations into crimes on this side of the border often lead them to the cartels operating in Mexico. … 'Let's give them the benefit of the doubt,' Gonzales said of his confidence in Mexico's cooperation. 'Let's just wait and see how it goes.' … Gonzales also announced $300,000 in additional funds to federal crime-fighting units in Laredo and McAllen. The so-called Strike Force brings federal and state officers together to share information. … The goal is to target 'not just the cartels themselves, but the transporters, money launders and smugglers,' Gonzales said."

On its Web site, KRGV-TV, Weslaco, Texas (1/10) reports a federal grant "is headed to the valley to help fight border crime. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez spent Wednesday in Laredo to tour the border, and announce a $300,000 grant to create a strike force." The strike force "will be made of members from the DEA, FBI, ICE, ATF, IRS and Texas Department of Public Safety. The agencies will work together to fight border crime more efficiently, as well as working to secure our border against the threat of terrorists sneaking into the country."

Gonzales Announces Drug Task Force Grant. WOAI-TV, San Antonio, TX (1/10, 6:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "The Attorney General toured Laredo. Alberto Gonzales announced a $300,000 grant for a task force to target drug cartels. The Attorney General also visited with customs agents at the World Trade Bridge and met with local leaders about their needs for more money for the war on drugs. Alberto Gonzales says he plans on working with Mexican officials on the missing person cases, but also needs help from the victim's families. What we're discovering is for various reasons, kidnappings are not reported. Obviously, we can't be helpful unless these kinds of crimes are reported." KXAN-TV, Austin, TX (1/10, 10:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "Kidnappings, drug violence and illegal immigration those problems brought Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to Texas-Mexico border today. He was invited by Laredo Congressman Henry Cuellar. Gonzales is looking for first-hand evidence of why Nuevo Laredo has been such a hotbed for killings and kidnappings." KCEN-TV, Waco, Temple, Bryan, TX (1/10, 6:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "Kidnappings along the Texas- Mexico border prompted a visit by US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales today. He was invited by Congressman Henry Cuellar of Laredo. Gonzales is seeing first hand how Nuevo Laredo has been such a hotbed for kidnappings and killings. KDF-TV, Corpus Christi, TX (1/10, 9:00 p.m.) also broadcasted this story.

SF Chronicle Criticizes DOJ Case Against BALCO Reporters. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/11, Egelko) reports, "The Chronicle told a federal appeals court (on Wednesday) that contempt-of-court orders against two reporters for refusing to disclose sources of leaked testimony about athletes and steroids were based on a false premise -- that the leak was a serious crime requiring a grand jury investigation." The Chronicle continues, "In a final round of written arguments to the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals challenging prison sentences for the reporters and fines for the newspaper, lawyers for the parent Hearst Corp. disputed prosecutors' position that journalists never have the right to withhold evidence from a grand jury investigating a crime." The Chronicle adds, "A 1972 Supreme Court ruling upholding contempt orders against reporters for refusing to disclose their sources to grand juries involved serious crimes, such as drug trafficking and plots of violence, that can be prosecuted only by grand jury indictments under the Constitution, said Jonathan Donnellan, a Hearst attorney. … By contrast, he said, the current case involves a violation of a secrecy order by U.S. District Judge Susan Illston that she could have investigated herself or referred to a special prosecutor." The Chronicle notes, "Either of those options would have allowed the reporters to claim the right to protect their sources, Donnellan said, and that right shouldn't be diminished by Illston's decision to refer the leak to the Justice Department, which chose to convene a grand jury."

US Charges 43 Alleged Cleveland Gang Members. The AP (1/11) reports, "Forty-three people accused of being gang members who sold cocaine and terrorized a Cleveland neighborhood have been indicted in an 18-month investigation, the top federal prosecutor in northern Ohio said Wednesday." The AP continues, "The indictment of those who investigators say are involved with the '7-Alls' gang was announced by U.S. Attorney Gregory A. White and officials from the FBI, the Drug Enforcement Administration and the city of Cleveland. … Officers seized drugs, weapons and $151,000 in the investigation, White said." The AP adds, "The charges include selling cocaine, conspiracy to sell cocaine and weapons counts. The indictments named as coconspirators two men apparently shot and killed by rival gangs during the investigation, White said. … The '7-Alls' name derived from the gang's involvement in violent crimes in 70's-numbered streets east of downtown Cleveland, officials said. … Last year U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced $15 million in federal grants to six areas, including Cleveland, to fight street gang violence. Grants also went to Los Angeles; Tampa, Fla.; Milwaukee; Dallas-Fort Worth and the Easton-Lancaster, Pa., corridor."

Local TV Coverage. WOIO-TV, Cleveland-Akron-Canton, Ohio (1/10) aired, "They have nicknames like Fat Boy, into, Boom or Bean. All locked up along with Chill Will and Little E, Puff and Pooh is off the streets, too. They're all members of a gang called the 7-Alls. They claim the 7s as their turf. In June we profiled the problems here. … The 7-Alls operated in the large yellow outlined area in the map. It's one of the heaviest in the city in arsons, assaults, stolen cars, burglaries, murders, rapes, robberies, thefts, drugs and weapons violations. One by one 35 of 43 indicted gang members were rounded up."

WJW-TV, Cleveland-Akron-Canton, Ohio (1/10) aired, "Thirty-five people arrested and indicted. Eight more still on the loose, and two unindicted coconspirators who were murdered while this investigation was going on. Three of these guys, some of the main suppliers of cocaine and other drugs [in] this city, according to U.S. Attorney Greg White. Their indictments are part of a six-city gang initiative begun by Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez. He came to Cleveland in June.

MS-13 Gang Members Charged With Racketeering In Nashville. The Nashville Tennessean (1/11, Howard) reports, "Thirteen members of the MS-13 street gang have been indicted by a federal grand jury on corruption and racketeering charges, local and federal officials announced today." The Tennessean continues, "Members of the international gang were charged for corruption and homicide under the RICO act created to fight organized crime, the most severe possible indictment, U.S. Attorney Craig Morford said at a press conference held at the federal courthouse this afternoon." The Tennessean adds, "The suspects are responsible for three homicides and several shootings or assaults in the Nashville area just in the last year and have been collecting dues to send to members in jail, according to the indictment. … All but one of the 13 suspects were already in federal or state custody when the indictments were handed down, Morford said, and the last suspect has since been arrested. … The investigation by Metro police and several federal agencies showed that MS-13 is highly organized and violent for the sake of harming rival gang members, Morford said."

18 Arrested In Alabama On Drug, Immigration Charges. The AP (1/10) reported authorities "took 18 people suspected of either drug trafficking or entering the country illegally into custody…in Hoover. Harold Willis, resident agent in charge of the DEA office in Birmingham, said 40 or 50 federal, state and local law enforcement officers wearing bulletproof vests were involved in the operation. … Willis said the DEA led the investigation because some of the men were suspected of drug trafficking."

Report: Barry Bonds Tested Positive For Amphetamines Last Season. The AP (1/11) reports baseball's Barry Bonds "failed a test for amphetamines last season, and originally blamed it on a teammate," the New York Daily News reported Thursday. "When first informed of the positive test, Bonds attributed it to a substance he had taken from teammate Mark Sweeney's locker, the…newspaper said, citing several unnamed sources. 'I have no comment on that,' Bonds' agent Jeff Borris told the Daily News on Wednesday night."

The New York Daily News (1/11) reports Bonds "was not punished for his transgression but instead was referred to treatment and counseling. While amphetamines are considered performance-enhancing drugs, they are treated differently than steroids under baseball's drug policy. Had Bonds failed a steroid test, he would have been suspended for 50 games, but under baseball's amphetamine policy no one is publicly identified or suspended until a second positive, which would result in a 25-game suspension." More than 100 news outlets are citing the Daily News report, including CNN, Forbes, the San Francisco Chronicle, Miami Herald, Contra Costa Times, and San Jose Mercury News.

US Disputes Haitian President's Assessment Of Anti-Drug Efforts. The AP (1/11) reports that on Wednesday the U.S. "defended…its anti-drug efforts in Haiti, two days after the Caribbean nation's president accused America and other major drug-consuming countries of failing to adequately fight the narcotics trade. In a strongly worded speech to Parliament on Monday, President Rene Preval called drug trafficking the main cause of instability in his impoverished nation and said failed efforts by the United States and other countries to stop the trade had made Haiti a 'victim.'" U.S. Embassy spokeswoman Shaila B. Manyam "said...the United States has undertaken a range of measures to defend Haiti against drug trafficking, including strengthening its weak justice system and training its coast guard. The U.S. has also contributed more than $40 million to Haiti's national police since 2004, Manyam said."

IMMIGRATION:

Dobbs Says Gonzales Should Clarify Immigration Law Enforcement. CNN Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/10, 6:23 p.m.) broadcasted, "There's currently no prohibition by congress on state and local authorities from enforcing immigration law. In fact congress has established a program to facilitate such cooperation. And outlaw cites from declaring themselves exempt from immigration law. … And I wonder what values are by which they will make that determination. The idea that the 1996 Federal law prohibits states, any entity, in this country from being a sanctuary, the Justice Department is not enforcing that law either. And that is a question that Alberto Gonzales should be answering to the American people right now."
