The deputy's post went to Robert Zoellick, one of the most talented national security administrators of the past generation who during Bush's first term was U.S. trade representative. He wanted to become president of the World Bank, but that job was filled by the embattled Paul Wolfowitz, who left the Defense Department as deputy secretary. Zoellick took a bullet for the team, dropping down a step to No. 2 at State.

Foreign Service officers saw in Zoellick a dominant deputy in the mold of Richard Armitage, who effectively managed the department during the first term. But Rice and Zoellick were not a marriage made in heaven. Nicholas Burns, No. 3 at State as undersecretary for political affairs, dominated the building. Burns surely would have been in the same post if John Kerry had been elected in 2004 and seemingly would be more at home in a Democratic administration.

Estranged from Zoellick, Rice relied on Burns and State Department Counselor Philip Zelikow for advice. A former Foreign Service officer and brilliant University of Virginia professor, Zelikow was near the top of the arrogance scale in a building where arrogance is the norm, uniting such disparate figures as Bolton and Burns. Zoellick busied himself by specializing in China and Sudan, unusual for a deputy secretary, but he finally had enough after 18 months and left in July.

That began a furtive, sporadic search for a deputy. Several prospects (including Marine Gen. James Jones, who just retired as NATO's supreme allied commander) said no, perhaps warned off by Zoellick's experience. Negroponte, named national intelligence director despite his lack of intelligence experience, was implored by fellow Foreign Service officers to bring order out of chaos. Retired Adm. Mike McConnell, though he had been out of the intelligence game for 10 years, was tapped to replace Negroponte.

Negroponte will find other empty offices at State. Zelikow, Counterterrorism Coordinator Hank Crumpton and John Hillen, assistant secretary for political-military affairs, have all resigned and have not been replaced. Robert Joseph, undersecretary for arms control, is reported to be going, and Josette Sheeran Shiner, undersecretary for economic affairs, is leaving to head the World Food Program.

With the State Department permanent bureaucracy traditionally hostile to Republican administrations, it is remarkable to see two Foreign Service officers, Negroponte and Burns, in the department's No. 2 and No. 3 slots. Insiders relish their confrontation. When Negroponte was flying high as Ronald Reagan's Communist-fighting ambassador to Honduras, Burns was a rookie staff assistant to the U.S. envoy in Cairo. That may turn out to be a good show, but it is not reassuring for a country facing myriad challenges worldwide.

(C) 2007 Creators Syndicate Inc.

China, Russia Hit Sanctions As 'Wrong' (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

The governments of China and Russia have denounced sanctions imposed on their state-run companies by the Bush administration over missile and weapons of mass destruction sales to Iran and Syria.

"It is unreasonable for the American government to invoke its domestic law to sanction on Chinese companies without providing any evidence," Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said this week in Beijing.

"We express resolute opposition and strongly urge the U.S. to correct its wrong practice," he said.

The State Department last week imposed sanctions on 23 foreign companies and one Russian national under a U.S. law aimed at preventing the arming of Iran and Syria.

The companies included three Chinese state-run firms that have been the target of U.S. sanctions in the past over arms and missile sales, and three Russian firms, including the state-run arms exporter Rosoboronexport, whose subsidiaries will be barred under the sanctions from supplying material to U.S. aircraft manufacturers.

Sanctions against Rosoboronexport, along with the Kolomna Design Bureau of Machine-Building, and Tula Design Bureau of Instrument Building are "illegal," according to Russia's foreign ministry.

DOJ_NMG_0115556

"Russian companies have regularly been accused of alleged assistance to missile and WMD programs or alleged deliveries banned by the international export control regime to Syria and Iran on the basis of the U.S. Iran and Syria Non-proliferation Act," the statement said.

"The U.S. has tried to extrapolate its domestic laws to foreign companies, to make them work under U.S. rules," it said.

The ministry said sanctions imposed in August on Rosoboronexport and the Sukhoi aircraft company were altered based on Russian responses. Sanctions on Sukhoi were lifted, but those on Rosoboronexport remain in place.

"As a result of politicized actions, the U.S. deprives itself and U.S. companies of cooperation with Russia's most advanced companies," the statement said. "This is called the loss of opportunities in business."

The State Department declined to provide details on what triggered the sanctions last week. But Bush administration officials said they resulted from Russian anti-tank missile sales to Syria that ended up in the hands of Hezbollah terrorists and were used against Israel, as well as goods sent from China sold to Iran that were linked to Tehran's nuclear, chemical and biological weapons and missile systems.

In addition to the three Chinese firms and three Russian companies and one Russian national, the sanctions bar other international companies from doing business with the U.S. government or purchasing export-controlled goods from the United States.

The companies sanctioned include four Iranian state-run companies: Defense Industries Organization, Iran Electronics Industries, NAB Export Co. and Sanam Industrial Group, which has been linked in the past to illegal purchases of nuclear-related goods.

An Iraqi company, Abu Hamadi and Iraqi national Kal Al-Zuhiry also were sanctioned.

Russia Backs Syria In Probe Request (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

A rift has developed between Russia and the Western members of the U.N. Security Council over the probe into the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri nearly two years after he died in a car blast.

In an attempt to help its ally Syria, which so far has been singled out as refusing to cooperate with the U.N. investigation, Russia has asked that all countries not fully cooperating be publicly named.

"Let us face it," Moscow's U.N. ambassador, Vitaly Churkin, told the Security Council on Tuesday. "If we focus so hard on one country, why should we disregard completely or even not want to know what those countries are?"

Serge Brammertz, head of the U.N. probe into Mr. Hariri's 2005 assassination and 15 other apparently politically motivated attacks, said last month he had sent more than 60 requests to a "significant number of countries" and more than 20 of them had not been answered, which impedes the work of his commission.

Mr. Brammertz did not name the countries, but Mr. Churkin said the council should ask him "to be more specific next time he reports to the council in March."

The United States and France rejected the idea, saying it would distract from more important issues.

"Syria quite clearly falls into a category of its own, so I wouldn't try to lump them all together" with other countries, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters yesterday. "The fact that Syria has been cited as not being fully cooperative in the past with the investigation was important because, let's be frank, the signs pointed to some Syrian involvement [in the Hariri assassination] in some fashion."

Alejandro Wolff, the acting U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said of the Russian initiative: "We don't think that this is the right way to go."

Still, Mr. McCormack said it should be Mr. Brammertz's decision whether to disclose the names of the countries in question.

"If he thinks it's useful, then we would support his decision to do so," Mr. McCormack said. "If he decides that it is not in the interest of the investigation to make this information public, then we support his decision not to release those names."

Damascus has denied involvement in the assassination, which took place soon after Mr. Hariri accused Syria of meddling in Lebanon's affairs. Syrian troops left Lebanon later in 2005 after nearly three decades of de facto occupation. Syria still refuses to open an embassy in Beirut.

According to wire service reports, Security Council diplomats said in New York that supporters of the Russian proposal, such as Qatar, South Africa and Indonesia, pointed out that the council would not be seen as fair if it just cited Syria as failing to cooperate with the investigation.

Syrian Ambassador Bashar Ja'afari named France, which joined the United States in getting the council to approve the Hariri probe, as blocking a letter to Mr. Brammertz asking him to disclose all countries that are not cooperating.

DOJ_NMG_0115557

"The Russian initiative is against singling out a country for political purposes," Mr. Ja'afari said. "It goes toward knowing precisely those countries that have cooperated and those that have not."

Bombs Kill 6 In Philippines As Summit Talks Near (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

MANILA, Jan. 10 — Three bombs within hours of each other rocked the southern Philippines on Wednesday, killing at least six people and wounding 27 others, officials said, amid warnings that Muslim militants may try to disrupt this weekend's Asian regional summit meetings.

Officials insisted that security was tight, with the police and troops on the highest alert.

The chief of the national police, Oscar C. Calderon, had warned that militants might try to embarrass the government, a staunch American ally in the effort to curb international terrorism, by staging attacks during the meetings.

Chief Calderon spoke to reporters in central Cebu City, where he was overseeing security for summit meetings of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations and East Asian leaders.

The first explosion ripped apart a stand selling lottery tickets across the street from a market in General Santos City, 620 miles southeast of Manila and about 310 miles south of the meeting site, said Senior Superintendent Alfredo Toroctocon, the city police chief.

Three people died instantly and two others later died from their injuries. Staff members at St. Elizabeth Hospital reported that another person had died on arrival, bringing the death toll to six. Among the dead were two boys, ages 8 and 12, the hospital staff said.

Chief Superintendent German Doria, the regional police chief, said the police had no suspects immediately, but he said the regional militant network of Jemaah Islamiyah and its ally, the local Abu Sayyaf group, "usually are the ones doing all these explosions in the region."

But he said the police were also looking into the possibility that the blast stemmed from the failure of the kiosk operator to pay winners of a lottery draw.

An army spokesman, Maj. Ernesto Torres, said the authorities were also looking at the possible involvement of people trying to sabotage peace negotiations between the Philippine government and the main Muslim separatist group, the Moro Islamic Liberation Front, which has waged a decades-old struggle for a homeland in the south.

He said the bombing occurred at the culmination of a two-day meeting between rebel and government representatives in General Santos City.

The second explosion occurred about two and a half hours later in Kidapawan, a city about 65 miles north of General Santos City. An improvised bomb placed near the fence of a police outpost along the national highway exploded just after officers on duty left to go on patrol, said a senior police official, Pascual Peroy. Two male passers-by were wounded.

The third blast, at a dump site along a major street in the city of Cotabato, appeared to be from an improvised bomb, although it could also have been from a grenade, said a city police spokesman, Senior Inspector Samson Obatay.

At least three garbage collectors were wounded.

Philippine Summit To Go Ahead Despite Fatal Bombs Blasts (AFP)

By Frederic Peugeot And Verna Yu

AFP, January 11, 2007

The Philippines insisted a closely-watched regional summit would go ahead later this week, despite three bomb explosions that left seven people dead.

"I have been told by my security people that everything is safe and secure here ... Therefore the show will go on," Foreign Minister Alberto Romulo said, referring to the resort isle of Cebu, where leaders from ASEAN and regional allies including Australia and China are due to meet.

Officials were quick to try and calm nerves, frayed after the abrupt cancellation of the summits in December in the wake of terror alerts for Cebu from Australia, Britain, the United States and other nations.

"I want to say categorically the incident must be treated as an isolated case," Cebu governor Gwendolyn Garcia said after the first blast, which happened in the city of General Santos almost 500 kilometers (200 miles) away.

"I am calling on all the people who are visiting to stay calm," she told AFP. "We are hundreds of miles away."

Military officials had previously warned that terror groups might stage attacks in other parts of the country to embarrass the government.

All three blasts occurred on Mindanao island, which has been menaced by Muslim extremists in the past.

DOJ_NMG_0115558

The third blast, which killed one and wounded six, exploded just hours after a bomb went off near a police station in Kidapawan city, injuring two.

An earlier explosion in General Santos city left six dead and 10 wounded.

Romulo said the attacks were payback for the Philippines success in clamping down on militants.

"This, they tell me, is part of the retaliation for the reversals they have experience," he added.

General Santos Mayor Pedro Acheron said after the first blast the likely suspects were Muslim groups that might have been seeking to disrupt the peace talks between the government and a leading Islamic militant group that ended Wednesday.

The head of the Philippine national police said earlier that Cebu was safe and that there were no specific threats against the summits, which will gather presidents, prime ministers and other top officials from 16 nations.

But he said they were on red alert across the country.

Marciano Paynor, of the summit organising committee, said: "It is not directed at ASEAN. Our assessment is that this is a reaction to the pressure brought upon them (the militants)."

Well before the bombing, Philippine President Gloria Arroyo began the day with a call for regional countries to join forces to fight terrorism as well as poverty. ASEAN is set to adopt an anti-terror convention during the summit.

"Great stakes are involved in the continuing integration of the entire East Asia," Arroyo said in a statement, urging the region to "close ranks for a safer and more secure community."

The anti-terrorism convention would improve intelligence sharing, provide for a regional extradition treaty and set out plans for the rehabilitation of convicted terrorists.

Leaders will also spell out proposals to prepare the bloc's first charter -- a mini-constitution to make ASEAN a legal entity along the lines of the European Union -- and pave the way for a single market by 2015.

Security during the first attempt at the summit in December was widely criticised in the press. Rain poured through the roof of the purpose-built convention centre, and soaked the only X-ray machine to check bags and parcels.

This time, a 6,000-strong summit security task force is in place and officials have been closing down Cebu to conduct regular test runs of transport and travel procedures across the city.

"The incident is not -- and I repeat -- not related to ASEAN," said Chief Superintendent Silverio Alarsio, head of police operations in Cebu, after the first blast.

Earlier, a military spokesman said soldiers had killed a bomb expert from a group linked to Al-Qaeda in a jungle clash elsewhere in the south of the country on Tuesday evening.

Postponing last December's meeting, the Philippines blamed an approaching typhoon rather than terror threats, even though weather officials said the storm should not be a disruption.

U.S. Governor Brokers Truce For Darfur (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

DAKAR, Senegal, Jan. 10 — President Omar Hassan al-Bashir of Sudan and leaders of several rebel factions in Darfur, the western Sudanese region, agreed Wednesday to a 60-day cease-fire in separate meetings with Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico, a former American ambassador to the United Nations, according to a statement by Mr. Richardson and Mr. Bashir.

Mr. Richardson went to Sudan on behalf of the Save Darfur Coalition of groups trying to stem the violence in Darfur, to try to break the deadlock over who will police the region.

A peace agreement signed last May between the government and one rebel faction has foundered, and the government has repeatedly rejected a United Nations peacekeeping force.

Mr. Bashir reiterated his opposition to such a force on Wednesday, telling The Associated Press that non-African peacekeepers would be seen as “colonialists.” But the Bashir-Richardson statement said he had agreed to halt military operations to allow time for a political settlement to the crisis to emerge.

“What is lacking is a political process that leads to a U.N. force,” Mr. Richardson said by telephone from Khartoum, the capital. “I think this 60-day cease-fire is at least a step.”

He said the leaders of two rebel factions that did not sign the May agreement, the Justice and Equality Movement and a splinter group of the Sudan Liberation Army, had also agreed to the new cease-fire. But it is not clear if they represent all dissident factions, because the rebel groups have fractured and realigned several times in the past year.

The Darfur crisis, a conflict over land, identity and self-determination that has killed at least 200,000 people and driven 2.5 million from their homes, has deepened in the past year despite the peace agreement. Recently, escalating violence in Sudan has forced aid agencies to curtail operations and has destabilized Chad and the Central African Republic.

DOJ_NMG_0115559

Mr. Richardson, who last year helped negotiate the release of an American journalist charged with espionage in Sudan, has known Mr. Bashir for a decade and has international contacts made as ambassador in the Clinton administration. He is expected to seek the Democratic nomination for president next year.

Sudan's Leader Agrees To 60-Day Cease-Fire In Darfur (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

JOHANNESBURG, Jan. 10 -- Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir agreed on Wednesday to a 60-day cease-fire in his nation's troubled Darfur region but again rejected calls for a U.N. force to help end one of Africa's bloodiest conflicts.

Bashir issued a joint statement with New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D) agreeing to the temporary halt of military action while also expanding access for journalists and aid workers. Richardson, who had traveled to Sudan on behalf of the Save Darfur Coalition, a Washington-based advocacy group, said several rebel leaders had orally agreed to the cease-fire.

Successive cease-fires, including a May 2006 peace deal negotiated in Nigeria, have been broken both by Bashir and by the various rebel groups fighting for control of Darfur. But Richardson, who has negotiated with the Sudanese president on other occasions, said Bashir appeared sincere in seeking a diplomatic solution.

"He realizes he's isolated and has got to change," Richardson said by telephone from Khartoum, Sudan's capital. "He's boxed in."

Bashir, however, showed little evidence of relenting on his refusal to allow thousands of U.N. peacekeeping troops into Darfur, as the United States and international leaders have demanded. An underfunded and ineffective force fielded by the 53-country African Union has long operated in Darfur, but it has had little success in controlling a conflict that has killed hundreds of thousands of people, mostly civilians, and displaced millions of others.

"Our experience with U.N. operations in the world is not encouraging," Bashir told an Associated Press reporter Wednesday. "There are sufficient forces in the Sudan from African countries to maintain order, and they can provide order. All we need is funding for the African troops."

Bashir has agreed to allow a small number of U.N. advisers to assist with the African Union mission.

In the joint statement with Richardson, Bashir agreed to paint his white warplanes another color so they no longer resemble the aircraft of international aid groups. He also agreed on the importance of disarming the Janjaweed militias, echoing declarations made but not fulfilled in the past. These groups have carried out repeated armed attacks on civilians.

Analyst John Prendergast of the International Crisis Group held out little hope of the 60-day cease-fire being respected, but he said Richardson's diplomatic activity highlighted how little the Bush administration has achieved despite labeling the Darfur conflict genocide and repeatedly threatening tough action.

"Where is the administration on this stuff?" said Prendergast, speaking from Washington.

Amjad Atallah, an adviser to the Save Darfur Coalition who was traveling with Richardson's delegation, expressed skepticism that Bashir would end the violence in Darfur. "At the end of the day, President Bashir may not honor these terms," said Atallah, speaking from Khartoum. "We are not naive about it."

Unwitting Party To Genocide (WP)

By Stephen Rademaker

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

Over the past three years, more than 400,000 people have perished in the Darfur genocide. Fighting has intensified in recent months as diplomatic efforts to end the conflict have faltered. The government in Khartoum bears principal responsibility for the continued killing, but recently an unexpected obstacle to ending the bloodshed has emerged: the International Criminal Court (ICC).

Critics of the ICC predicted early on that it would be more a hindrance than a help to ending most conflicts. The threat of prosecution would rarely motivate both parties to stop fighting, they argued, but in many cases it would be powerful enough to convince at least one side that it was better off continuing to fight. Yet even the ICC's critics have been surprised by the degree to which this is being borne out in Darfur.

Much of the world agrees that to end the genocide a highly capable U.N. peacekeeping force must immediately be deployed to Darfur. The only footnote to this consensus is China, which, eager for access to Sudan's oil and armed with a veto at the U.N. Security Council, forced the United Nations to accept a precondition to action in August: that the government in Khartoum must consent to the deployment of any U.N. force.

The Sudanese government has no history of objecting to U.N. peacekeeping forces on its territory. It agreed as recently as January 2005 to the deployment of a 10,000-member U.N. peacekeeping force in southern Sudan to monitor implementation of a peace agreement with rebels there, and that force remains in Sudan. So what has led Khartoum to reject today what it was willing to accept just two years ago? According to Sudanese government spokesmen, it's the involvement of the ICC.

DOJ_NMG_0115560

Sudan is not a party to the treaty establishing the ICC, so the only way the court could obtain jurisdiction over crimes in Darfur was to be granted such jurisdiction by the Security Council. The council took that step in March 2005.

The Bush administration supported bringing in the ICC, not least because the perpetrators of the Darfur genocide are so richly deserving of prosecution. More fundamentally, the administration went along because this was the strongest action that other members of the Security Council were prepared to take at the time. The political situation mirrored that surrounding the Security Council's decision to create a war crimes tribunal for the former Yugoslavia in 1993. In both cases, the United States was pressing for resolute steps to end genocide, but other countries, particularly in Europe, were unwilling to agree to steps that might entail significant military, economic or political costs. The idea of deploying eager prosecutors rather than effective peacekeepers emerged as a low-risk compromise.

But war crimes prosecutors didn't stop genocide in Yugoslavia, and they haven't stopped it in Darfur either. To the contrary, the example of the Balkans, where U.N. peacekeepers in Bosnia and Kosovo have tracked down and arrested war crimes indictees, appears to have hardened the opposition of Sudanese officials to a U.N. force. Quite predictably, those officials are saying they're not interested in a U.N. peacekeeping force in Darfur if, as in the Balkans, it would offer them a one-way trip in handcuffs to The Hague.

Those seeking to end the genocide have naturally been seeking new ways to pressure Khartoum. Realistic options for tightening economic sanctions are few. So, having failed to recognize that it was a mistake to call in the ICC, many critics of the regime have compounded the error by trying to ratchet up the threat of ICC prosecution. This, of course, reinforces the regime's impulse to say no. Indeed, it would be hard to devise a policy better calculated to perpetuate Sudan's refusal to accept a U.N. peacekeeping force in Darfur.

If the Sudanese government ever begins to seriously consider agreeing to a U.N. force in Darfur, the first thing it is likely to seek is guarantees against the arrest and prosecution of Sudanese officials by the ICC. But it is not clear that the Security Council would be able to grant the government those guarantees should the international community be prepared to consider such a bargain. In an effort to insulate the ICC from political pressure, the treaty establishing the court seeks to make it impossible for the Security Council to permanently end ICC proceedings once they have commenced.

Should efforts to deploy a U.N. force fail and the genocide continue, options for ending the bloodshed may narrow to some sort of coalition military action. Given China's opposition, such action almost certainly would have to be carried out without Security Council authorization and would be vastly inferior to the deployment of an effective U.N. peacekeeping force.

In the analogous cases of Bosnia and Kosovo, coalition military action was in large measure U.S. military action, and the same would be true in Darfur. No matter how noble our objectives, U.S. military action without U.N. authorization against another Arab government would prove deeply unpopular in many parts of the world, and America would pay a steep political price. If this is where we end up in Darfur -- or if the genocide continues unabated because peacekeepers cannot be deployed -- there will be three culprits to blame: the bloodthirsty regime in Khartoum, the oil-thirsty government in Beijing and the U.N. Security Council's shortsighted decision to bring in the ICC.

The writer, vice president of a Washington-based government affairs and consulting firm, was an assistant secretary of state from 2002 to 2006, with responsibility for arms control, nonproliferation and international security.

EU Energy Strategy Aims To Curb Carbon Emissions (WSJ)

By Mary Jacoby and William Echikson

Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

BRUSSELS -- The European Union unveiled an ambitious blueprint for combating global warming and boosting energy efficiency, but key elements of the plan face strong opposition from business interests and could require major battles to get them implemented.

The European Commission yesterday published a long-awaited proposal for the bloc's first common energy strategy, a version of which will be discussed at a summit of the EU's 27 national leaders in March. "Europe must lead the world into a new -- or maybe one should say post-industrial -- revolution: the development of a low-carbon economy," said commission President José Manuel Barroso.

Parts of the draft face high hurdles, however. Business groups expressed alarm at the commission's proposals to cut emissions of carbon dioxide, which is believed to contribute to global warming, 20% from 1990 levels by 2020. The Continent's top business lobby, Unice, warned against any binding targets that would force European industries to pay more for energy than their U.S. and Asian rivals. At the same time, environmentalists said the 20% target is too low.

DOJ_NMG_0115561

Meanwhile, France and Germany are likely to block a proposal to boost competition by breaking up European energy companies that control both the supply and distribution networks for oil, gas or electricity -- such as Electricité de France and Germany's E.ON AG. Acknowledging that threat, the commission's proposals also suggest a less drastic option that would submit such vertically integrated companies to greater regulation.

Still, commission officials insisted any opposition won't derail efforts to shake up European energy markets. Energy security, and the need to reduce demand for fossil fuels, has risen to the top of the EU agenda in response to continuing concerns about its predominant supplier of gas and oil, Russia.

If governments don't accept the proposals for separating companies' energy supply and distribution arms, the commission has another weapon available to break up some incumbents: antitrust law. Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes yesterday published the results of a long-running investigation into the energy sector. She accused the Continent's energy giants of raising consumer prices and undermining competition by restricting third-party energy companies' access to their pipelines, storage facilities and networks.

"New players need access to energy suppliers, the energy networks and customers," she said, adding that investigations she has already opened into energy companies in several European countries could lead to "far-reaching structural remedies."

Also under the commission's proposals, 10% of EU vehicles would be powered by biofuels by 2020, up from an existing 5.8% target for 2010. It envisions all new coal-fired power stations having facilities to capture and store the carbon dioxide they emit. In addition, renewable energy sources such as water, wind and solar power are expected by 2020 to provide 20% of the energy.

If the proposals are accepted by national leaders in March, Mr. Barroso said the commission would act quickly to make the targets legally binding.

The EU accounts for 14% of the world's emissions of carbon dioxide, the commission said. Mr. Barroso called on other developed nations to set their own carbon-cutting goals.

"We are not speaking about European warming, we are speaking about global warming," said Mr. Barroso, who this week discussed his plans with President Bush and leaders of Congress. "We need the United States with us; they are, after all, the biggest polluter in the world."

Belarus Yields To Moscow Over Oil Transit (FT)

By Arkady Ostrovsky

Financial Times, January 11, 2007

Belarus backed down in its trade conflict with Russia on Wednesday by abolishing an export duty on oil pipeline transits. The move allows Moscow to resume supplies to Europe via its neighbour.

Alexander Lukashenko, Belarus's leader, appears to have climbed down after a telephone conversation with President Vladimir Putin of Russia. Within hours the Belarus government said that a duty imposed on Russian oil shipments at the start of January had "lost its validity". Belarus gave in to Russia's key demand to drop the $45 (€35, £23) per tonne export duty before the countries could start negotiations on their trade relationship.

Transneft, the Russian oil pipeline monopoly, said on Wednesay night that it was about to resume supplies to Europe.

On Monday Russia halted oil supplies through the Druzhba (Friendship) pipeline, which crosses Belarus, claiming that Minsk was siphoning off oil destined for countries such as Germany and Poland as payment in kind for export duty. Moscow said the duty was illegal and refused to pay it.

While Wednesday's move bolstered Mr Putin's prestige at home and strengthened Moscow's hand in its stand-off with its neighbour, the dispute has dented Russia's reputation and its claim to be a reliable energy supplier.

Angela Merkel, Germany's chancellor, led European Union leaders in condemning the cut in supplies, calling it "unacceptable". Wednesday's deal is the latest step in a protracted stand-off. Russia has doubled gas prices for Belarus and made it agree to sell half its pipeline network to Gazprom, the Russian gas group.

Mr Putin told Russian oil companies this week to be prepared to cut their oil production and threatened to impose barriers to Belarus's exports of other goods to Russia. Russia accounts for half of all Belarus's exports, which are duty free. Any trade blockade or imposition of export duties would have hit Belarus hard.

Andrei Sharonov, the deputy head of Russia's ministry for trade and economic development, said entire sectors of the Belarusan economy, such as meat and milk production as well as electronics and furniture, are more than 90 per cent dependent on the Russian market. Belarus's oil reserves would not have lasted more than six weeks.

Mr Sharonov said Minsk's decision opened the way for negotiations between the two countries on a wide range of trade issues, including Russia's duty on oil exports to Belarus. In addition to doubling gas prices from January 1, Russia hit Belarus with a $180 per tonne export duty on the crude oil it sells to the country.

DOJ_NMG_0115562

Until then Belarus had obtained Russian crude oil duty free, refined it and sold petroleum products to western Europe, keeping the profit. Under a mid-1990s agreement, Belarus was supposed to give 85 per cent of that profit to Russia but stopped doing so several years ago.

Russia's export duty and the doubling of gas prices cuts down the subsidy that the Kremlin was, in effect, giving Mr Lukashenko.

A compromise solution could see Russia reducing or removing its export duty on crude oil if Belarus resumed payment to Russia of part of the profit gained on petroleum products.

Belarus, Russia Settle Oil Dispute (AP)

By Yuras Karmanau

AP, January 11, 2007

MINSK, Belarus -- Russian oil began flowing again through a Belarusian pipeline late Wednesday, a top Belarusian oil official said, resolving a dispute between the countries that had disrupted supplies to Eastern Europe as well to the former Soviet Republic.

Alexei Kostuchenko, general director of pipeline concern Gomeltransneft-Druzhba, said Russian oil entered the Belarusian system around 10:30 p.m. local time (2030GMT) Wednesday, and was being pumped to Poland, Germany, Ukraine, Slovakia, the Czech Republic and Hungary. He did not give any details about the volume being moved.

The spat between the two formerly close, ex-Soviet republics showcased the Belarus regime's reliance on cheap Russian energy imports, and stoked doubts in European capitals about Russia and its dependability as an energy supplier.

"The disruptions in oil supplies have yet again undermined Russia's efforts to establish itself as a reliable source of fuel supplies to Europe," Deutsche UFG analysts wrote in a note to investors.

The dispute, which had entered its third day, centered on Russia's decision last month to impose a hefty duty on oil exports to Belarus, with Moscow complaining that the previous duty-free regime cost the Russian budget up to $4 billion a year in lost revenues. Belarus reaped billions in revenues by refining cheap Russia oil products and selling them at hefty profit to European markets.

Minsk _ whose centrally controlled economy is heavily reliant on cheap Russian energy and duty-free trade with Russia _ responded last week by slapping a $45 per ton tax on Russian oil pumped across Belarus to Europe.

On Monday, Russia stopped pumping oil to Europe via the Druzhba pipeline _ whose name translates as "friendship" _ and accused its neighbor of siphoning off oil. By Tuesday, the stoppage had affected supplies to Ukraine, Germany, Poland, Hungary, the Czech Republic and Slovakia.

With the European Union voicing alarm and criticism and Russia threatening an all-out trade war against its former ally, the two countries' presidents _ Vladimir Putin and Alexander Lukashenko _ held talks by telephone Wednesday.

Soon after, Belarus' government announced the cancellation of the $45-per-ton duty, and Prime Minister Sergei Sidorsky announced he would fly to Moscow on Thursday for meetings with his Russian counterpart.

"I hope that within two days we will be able to overcome all disagreements _ on oil, oil products and other sensitive groups of commodities on the Russian and Belarusian markets," he said.

Putin's top economic adviser, meanwhile, reasserted that Russia was a dependable energy supplier. "We act as a reliable partner, and we would like to do so in the future," Igor Shuvalov said.

"We need to understand that that kind of behavior very close to blackmailing can't be accepted by the Russians. If we do accept it this time, than the future can't be secured," he said. "Now we need to act together, the Europeans and the Russians, to avoid this kind of situation in the future."

European Union leaders have strongly criticized the disruptions, which came one year after a price dispute between Russia and Ukraine led to a brief interruption of EU natural gas imports from Russia.

Putin took a harsh stance at a Cabinet meeting Tuesday, and told ministers to consider a possible reduction in oil output. Russia has a limited capacity for refining oil and would have to cut crude output if its exports decrease suddenly.

Analysts say that Putin has grown tired of supporting the Belarusian leader, who has been dubbed "Europe's last dictator" in the West for his authoritarian rule and crackdown on dissent. But the disruption of Russian oil to Europe one year after the Ukraine gas cutoff alarmed European officials and led to renewed calls for energy diversification.

Russia currently supplies a quarter of the EU's oil and over two-fifths of its natural gas.

Belarus Signals Resolution In Oil Dispute (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

New York Times, January 11, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115563

MOSCOW, Jan. 10 — Belarus announced Wednesday that it had reached a compromise with Russia to end a dispute that had shut a Russian oil pipeline to Europe since Monday, but the Kremlin did not confirm any agreement.

The announcement, by President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko's office, was the first sign that the dispute might be ending after two days of increasingly hostile remarks and threats.

The Belarussian prime minister, Sergei S. Sidorsky, said later in televised remarks that his country would revoke a transit fee of $45 a ton on Russian oil that it imposed last week, provoking a dispute with swift repercussions in Europe.

Russia had declared the transit fee illegal and refused to pay it. When Belarus began siphoning oil headed to Europe as payment, Russia's pipeline monopoly, Transneft, shut the pipeline. As a result, Poland, Germany, the Czech Republic, Slovakia and Hungary had to tap into oil reserves this week.

The conflict with Belarus unfolded only days after Russia's giant energy company, Gazprom, negotiated a significantly higher price for supplies of natural gas to Belarus, Russia's smaller neighbor and one of its closest allies. The new price, $100 per thousand cubic meters, compared with $46 last year, infuriated Mr. Lukashenko, but a separate decision by Russia to impose a customs duty of $180 per metric ton on Russian oil prompted the Belarussian transit fee.

Mr. Sidorsky said he would fly to Moscow for more talks on Wednesday, an indication that a final resolution had not been found. "We hope to solve all other questions in the coming days," he said.

Russia had said that it would hold no talks until the transit fee was lifted. The statement by Mr. Lukashenko's office said the two governments would settle the dispute by Friday.

By Wednesday night, Semyon M. Vainshtok, the president of Transneft, said the company had reached an agreement to ship 79,000 tons of oil that Belarus had siphoned into its own storage facilities. He said the company could resume full operations by Thursday, though he suggested that outstanding issues remained.

The Kremlin announced only that President Vladimir V. Putin had discussed the issue by telephone with Mr. Lukashenko. Mr. Putin was steadfast on Tuesday, warning that Russia would divert oil intended for European markets around Belarus, though that could take time.

In the meantime, the pipeline, called Druzhba, or Friendship, remained closed for a third day, despite statements in Slovakia that some oil was set to resume flowing.

Druzhba stretches 2,500 miles and pumps 1.8 million barrels of oil a day in two trunks. It accounts for considerable amounts of the oil consumed in Germany, the Czech Republic and Poland, and almost all oil used by Hungary and Slovakia.

A swift resolution would ease jitters over the reliability of oil supplies in Europe. Russia has forced Belarus, for years a close ally, to back off. But the episode has done further damage to Russia's international image, already battered by a shut-off of natural gas to Ukraine last January and a threat to do so to Belarus this year.

"We consider it unacceptable, this kind of event," the European Commission president, José Manuel Barroso, said in Brussels, where the European Union announced a sweeping energy policy meant to address concerns like those Russia had raised.

Echoing remarks by Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany on Tuesday, he criticized Russia for stopping the flow of oil without first notifying the customers paying for it farther along the pipeline.

The dispute grew from Russia's new strategy to increase energy prices for the other former republics of the Soviet Union. Now independent, but still tied into the Soviet-era network of gas and oil pipelines, those countries had long enjoyed subsidized prices.

Russia has recently negotiated higher prices for natural gas with Ukraine, Georgia, Azerbaijan and Moldova. Those deals have sometimes followed threats and cutoffs as deadlines, typically on New Year's Day, approached.

"For Russia, a small, victorious energy war is becoming a New Year's tradition," the newspaper Trud, or Labor, wrote Wednesday.

Stefan Czucz, the general director of Transpetrol, Slovakia's pipeline operator, said in a telephone interview that a resumption of oil shipments was scheduled for Wednesday, but officials in Russia said late Wednesday that the pipeline had not resumed operation.

William C. Ramsay, deputy executive director of the International Energy Agency in Paris, which maintains and improves systems for coping with oil supply disruptions, said that refineries and other companies dependent on Russian oil generally had 10 to 15 days worth of commercial stocks.

Once those reserves run out, the refineries would have to turn to strategic stocks built by governments. Those could last at least 90 days. "They have learned the need to take care, especially since they are dependent on Russia and have had some problems in the past," he said in a telephone interview.

DOJ_NMG_0115564

The duty Russia imposed on the oil exports to Belarus, the same Russia charges for exports to other countries, could cost the Belarussian government $3.5 billion, more than 10 percent of the country's gross domestic product. Belarus had long profited by refining the oil and exporting the products.

"It simply puts Belarus on the same footing as all the other countries of the world," Andrei V. Sharonov, a deputy economic development minister, said of the new charge in an interview published in the official state newspaper, Rossiskaya Gazeta.

Russia-Belarus Standoff Over Oil Ends, Clearing Way For Accord (WP)

By Peter Finn

Washington Post, January 11, 2007

MOSCOW, Jan. 10 -- A standoff between Russia and Belarus that led to the shutdown of a pipeline that delivers crude oil to European Union countries ended Wednesday, after Belarus backed down and lifted a duty it had imposed on Russian fuel transiting the country.

The breakthrough came after Russian President Vladimir Putin spoke by phone Wednesday afternoon to his Belarusan counterpart, Alexander Lukashenko. The Belarusan presidential press service said that the countries' prime ministers had been told "to propose ways of settling all problems and to submit them to the presidents by Friday."

Belarus's imposition of the duty led Russia to switch off the flow of oil, a move greeted with dismay in Western Europe. Leaders there wondered aloud about Russia's reliability as an energy supplier.

Oil began flowing again late Wednesday, the Associated Press reported from Minsk, the Belarusan capital, citing a senior pipeline official.

In Brussels, European Union officials on Wednesday unveiled a long-term energy plan to reduce the continent's dependence on oil and gas and limit the greenhouse gas emissions blamed for global warming.

"Europe must lead the world into a new . . . post-industrial revolution, the development of a low-carbon economy," said Jos? Manuel Barroso, president of the European Commission, the E.U.'s executive arm. "We need new policies to face a new reality."

The E.U. plan, which will be discussed by the 27 member states in February, calls for greenhouse gas emissions to be cut by at least 20 percent below 1990 levels by 2020. That goes beyond the Kyoto Protocol of 1997, which called for the E.U. overall to cut to 8 percent below 1990 levels by 2012.

The United States has refused to sign the accord, arguing that it would damage the American economy and, to be fair, should require countries such as China and India to meet similar goals.

"We are not speaking about European warming, we are speaking about global warming," Barroso said. "We need the United States with us -- they are, after all, the biggest polluter in the world."

It is uncertain if the E.U. plan will be accepted by the member governments and, if so, whether the targets can be met. A number of European countries, including Italy and Spain, are already having trouble meeting the Kyoto requirements. Environmentalists would like to see even more ambitious goals to reduce emissions.

The plan emphasizes the development of renewable energy, such as biofuels, and new low-pollution technologies, as well as the reduction of emissions from existing energy sources. It does not call for increased reliance on nuclear energy, which emits no carbon dioxide, the most significant of the gases that trap heat in Earth's atmosphere.

Barroso said nuclear energy would be a matter for individual states to decide.

He also said Europe should "actively develop a common external energy policy and speak with one voice to third countries" -- a clear reference to Russia.

The union has been divided in its approach to Russia, with Poland, for instance, objecting to a pipeline under the Baltic Sea that will directly connect Russia to Germany.

Belarus, which is heavily dependent on Russian energy subsidies, has been smarting from increases in the prices it pays for Russian natural gas and the crude oil that it profitably reprocessed before selling it to Western Europe. It imposed the duties on Russian oil transshipments in response; Russia asserts Belarus was also siphoning off oil for its own use.

Belarusan Prime Minister Sergei Sidorsky said he planned to fly to Moscow on Thursday for talks. "I hope that we will settle all mutual differences and claims relating to Russian oil deliveries in two days," Sidorsky told reporters in Minsk.

Russia had earlier insisted that lifting the oil duty, which it said was illegal, was a nonnegotiable precondition for any talks. It was unclear if Putin promised Belarus anything in return. The Kremlin issued a terse statement saying that Putin and Lukashenko had discussed "energy relations," among other issues.

Chávez Begins New Term Vowing Socialism (NYT)

By Simon Romero

DOJ_NMG_0115565

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela, Jan. 10 — President Hugo Chávez was sworn in to a new six-year term at a ceremony here on Wednesday in which he described Jesus as "the greatest socialist in history" and pledged to speed Venezuela's metamorphosis into a Socialist country.

"Fatherland! Socialism or death, I swear it!" Mr. Chávez yelled as he was sworn in and given the presidential sash and a golden key to the tomb where the remains of Simón Bolívar, the South American liberator, are interred.

In his speech, the president defended his decision this week to nationalize companies in the telecommunications and electricity industries and promised to seek greater control over natural gas projects. He also renewed his request to Congress for decree powers, saying a "revolutionary law of laws" would allow him to hasten the construction of Socialism.

Since his re-election last month, Mr. Chávez has moved swiftly to group his varied supporters into a single Socialist party. In addition to his nationalization campaign, he has called for the end of the central bank's independence from politics and the rewriting of the commercial code.

Headlines in the afternoon newspapers here reflected continuing polarization over his ideas. "Socialism Has Arrived," proclaimed El Mundo, which, like most Venezuelan newspapers is friendly to Mr. Chávez's government. Tal Cual, a small opposition paper, titled its main editorial "The Monarch."

Teodoro Petkoff, editor of Tal Cual, said Mr. Chávez's "21st-century Socialism" had exhibited the same autocratic characteristics of Socialist movements of the 20th century.

Others pointed to the president's political instincts as an explanation for his sharp ideological turn.

Fernando Coronil, an authority on Venezuelan history at the University of Michigan, said Mr. Chávez was acutely aware of his supporters' high expectations of change. His effort to redefine the ideological and organization basis of his government, from the creation of a single party to the concentration of power in the presidency, are a response to that reading of popular sentiment, Mr. Coronil said.

"People voted for Chávez but didn't give him a blank check," he said. "Now he has to pay back."

In his speech on Wednesday, Mr. Chávez, who hinted at the possibility of seeking another term once this one ends in 2012, seemed to evoke Fidel Castro's leftward ideological evolution in the years after taking power in Cuba in 1959. Mr. Chávez, who has forged a tight economic alliance with Cuba, peppered his speech with references to the works of two Italian Marxist theorists, Antonio Gramsci and Antonio Negri.

He weaved in quotations from Napoleon and Trotsky, saying Trotsky had the right idea when he said, "The revolution never ends." He also quoted liberally from the writings of Bolívar and the Bible.

He railed against his domestic political opponents and dissidents in the Roman Catholic Church, singling out Archbishop Roberto Luckert of Coro, who recently criticized the president's decision not to renew the broadcast license of RCTV, one of Venezuela's oldest television stations.

"Monsignor Luckert is going to wait for me in hell," he said.

After his speech, Mr. Chávez traveled to Managua to attend a similar ceremony for Daniel Ortega, the former Sandinista guerrilla leader elected president of Nicaragua. Venezuela is preparing to sign a farreaching economic assistance agreement with Nicaragua.

Fidel Chavez? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 11, 2007

VENEZUELA'S presidential election last month might have been free and fair, but it's increasingly unlikely that its next one will be. President Hugo Chavez has apparently taken his landslide victory as a mandate to impose an authoritarian socialism on his nation that looks frighteningly like the model created by his idol, Cuba's Fidel Castro. If his drive to consolidate power over the media, the telecommunications industry and other sectors succeeds, by the time his term expires six years from now it may no longer be possible to hold a free election in Venezuela.

Chavez's plan to nationalize the country's biggest telecommunications and electricity companies, announced Monday and reiterated during his inauguration Wednesday, will exact a heavy toll in the coming years. Aside from the immediate damage from foreign investors fleeing the country, these enterprises almost certainly will be diminished and bled dry by government bureaucrats eager to dole out money and patronage. This is already happening in Venezuela's oil industry.

Chavez also seems intent on destroying Venezuela's civil society. He already controls all three branches of government, with all 167 seats of Congress held by lawmakers allied to Chavez and with the Supreme Court stacked with loyalists. After his reelection, he announced plans to merge his coalition of allied parties — effectively creating a one-party state — and to pursue a constitutional amendment ending presidential term limits, meaning he could run indefinitely.

DOJ_NMG_0115566

Now he's setting his sights on a critical barrier to totalitarianism: the independent media. Last month, Chavez announced that he wouldn't renew the license of Radio Caracas Television (RCTV), which has been highly critical of his regime. His justification was a law passed in 2004 that allows for non-renewal of a broadcast license if its holder is guilty of such things as promoting disruption of public order or endangering national security. RCTV's crime, apparently, was to celebrate the botched coup attempt against Chavez in 2002.

Any criticism of Chavez or his henchmen can now be interpreted as disrupting public order, and Venezuela also has passed harsh libel laws aimed at curbing "disrespect" of government officials. Though RCTV is just one of many opposition media outlets, Chavez has sent a chilling message to the rest that he can shut them down at any time.

A country without an independent media, judiciary or legislature is by nobody's definition a democracy. Venezuela's people may just have succeeded in voting themselves out of power.

U.N. Agency Chief Denies Getting Staff Complaints (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

NEW YORK -- Jose Antonio Ocampo, the head of the U.N. Department of Economic and Social Affairs (DESA), yesterday defended his management of the scandal-laden "good governance" division, saying that he personally had initiated internal investigations and shut down a foundering office within his department.

In his first public remarks on DESA's scandal-plagued Division of Public Administration and Development Management unit, or DPADM, since the opening of a U.N. investigation prompted by a Washington Times article last month, Mr. Ocampo also denied having received complaints from staff about concerns that range from mismanagement of government funds to favoritism and intimidation in the hiring and disciplining of employees.

"We have a clear policy, anyone can come to me, or go to the ombudswoman and share their observations, and their privacy will be respected," Mr. Ocampo said in response to questions. "But nobody has so far."

That claim flies in the face of documents and accounts given to The Times showing that several staff members complained to Mr. Ocampo, both in person and in writing, about purported mismanagement, intimidation and favoritism in DPADM between 2003 and 2006. There are at least three cases pending before the U.N. Joint Appeals Board, which adjudicates personnel matters.

Several former DESA staffers said they had reported through official channels what they saw as the fraudulent use of contractors, favoritism toward Italians and management decisions that were redundant and senseless. Between 2003 and 2006, these staffers and their lawyer said, they clashed directly with their supervisor, DPADM Director Guido Bertucci, while others went to Mr. Ocampo with evidence.

In mid-December, the U.S. Mission to the United Nations wrote to the U.N. Office of Internal Oversight Services advising it of "reports alleging that the DPADM has threatened to retaliate against staff members who have brought this matter to light" and warning that evidence might be destroyed.

Additionally, correspondence obtained by The Times over the course of a two-month investigation shows that the Greek government requested an investigation into potential misuse of about $5 million.

Athens had contributed the money in 1999 to build a center in Thessaloniki that promoted "public service professionalism" among Mediterranean nations. But just three years later DPADM opened a duplicative center in Naples.

The findings of that investigation were to have been released in December, but the report was delayed while DPADM compiled a lengthy response to its contents. U.N. officials said yesterday it could be released within two weeks.

The second investigation was opened on Dec. 17 after a report in The Times uncovered evidence of favoritism and intimidation within DPADM, which is responsible for promoting transparency and accountability among member governments.

The article noted that tens of millions of dollars have been contributed by the government of Italy and spent on consultants and projects that directly benefited Italian nationals and the government itself.

The Department of Economic and Social Affairs is a sprawling U.N. office with more than 570 employees and an annual budget of $267 million, nearly half of that voluntarily contributed by governments. Its divisions gather statistics or promote policy on sustainable development, women's empowerment, good governance, accessibility and related issues.

"In the United Nations we have an internal control system," Mr. Ocampo said of the U.N. investigation. "What we're doing is to let the internal control system work."

He defended his decision not to remove Mr. Bertucci from his post as DPADM director, as is customary in other U.N. departments when there is a comprehensive investigation under way.

"If [the investigation] indicates that there were improprieties, we will take a measure," Mr. Ocampo said. "But any justice system, including the U.N. justice system, is based on the principle of presumption of innocence."

DOJ_NMG_0115567

Asked several times whether he trusted Mr. Bertucci, the undersecretary-general said only, "He is under investigation, and I will take into account whatever the investigation says."

Limited Menu Japan's 'Cancer Refugees' Demand More Options (WSJ)

By Peter Landers

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

TOKYO -- With the prime minister looking on, a legislator named Takashi Yamamoto stood before Japan's parliament last May and told his colleagues that he had cancer. Then he denounced the nation's standard of cancer care. "Even when there are treatments, people are being told they will never get better," he said. "These abandoned cancer refugees are roaming the Japanese archipelago."

The speech galvanized the parliament, which had been dawdling over a bill that called for more cancer specialists and a permanent role for patients in policy making. Within four weeks, the bill became law. (Read translated excerpts of Mr. Yamamoto's speech.1)

"Even when there are treatments, people are being told they will never get better. These abandoned cancer refugees are roaming the Japanese archipelago."

-- Read excerpts3 of the May 22, 2006, speech by Takashi Yamamoto

It was a signal victory for a spreading movement in Japan among patients who want American-style care and drugs for cancer. But the idea of becoming more like the U.S. raises alarms among policy makers. In Japan, the government guarantees that everyone has health-insurance coverage and it pays most of the bills.

Masaharu Nakajima, until recently director general of the Health Bureau at the Ministry of Health, Labor and Welfare, says Japan already offers excellent cancer care. With a huge national debt and corporations worried about higher taxes, Japan can't afford to throw money into treatments and training that offer little hope of significantly extending lifespans, he says.

"If we keep going like this, Japan is going to be crushed under medical expenses," says Dr. Nakajima, a surgeon who used to treat cancer patients before joining the ministry. Referring to the demand for more specialists, he says: "America did too much of this and that's why their medical costs have grown."

The debate in Japan raises the question of where nations should draw the line when modern medicine offers almost unlimited ways to spend money. In the U.S., both private insurers and public programs such as Medicare take a relatively generous view, usually paying for treatments that offer some hope of helping the patient. Japan is far more tightfisted. Spending on health in Japan each year is roughly half the level of U.S. spending, adjusting for the size of each country's economy.

Health spending in Japan is even lower than in most Western European countries and Canada. Yet if that's hurting people, it's hard to find evidence in the statistics. Japan has the world's highest life expectancy for women (men are No. 4) and one of the world's lowest infant-mortality rates.

Many countries are grappling with how to improve care while containing costs. In Japan, debate about the system has focused on cancer, by far the nation's leading killer. The Internet has helped break down patients' isolation from information about their disease and supplied data on foreign treatments. Cancer activists believe inadequate treatment on occasion cuts short the lives of Japanese. Some focus their ire on the very notion that mortality numbers can measure the value a health-care system delivers.

Hidesuke Hashimoto, who has been treated for lung cancer and leads a patients' group, says Japanese bureaucrats, unlike Americans, fail to recognize the value of pursuing all possible avenues of treatment when a person is seriously ill. "Our rights as individuals aren't being recognized," says Mr. Hashimoto, a 68-year-old retired math teacher. "We have the right to live." More government spending on health care, he suggests, would be a small price to pay for promoting democracy and the rights enshrined in Japan's U.S.-written constitution. Article 25 says all people are entitled to a minimum standard of "wholesome and cultured living."

Cancer accounted for 326,000 deaths among Japanese in 2005, or 30% of the total -- more than heart attacks and strokes combined. The rate of cancer deaths per 100,000 population continues to rise slightly, in contrast to a slight decline in the U.S. Whether poor care has something to do with that is a matter of debate. Demographics and lifestyles also may play a role: Japan is a rapidly aging nation where nearly half of men smoke, while obesity and heart disease are relatively uncommon. Those factors tend to increase the proportion of deaths caused by cancer.

Since Japan introduced universal health-insurance coverage in the late 1950s and early 1960s, its policy has focused on ensuring a minimum standard of care for all. People are required to pay a monthly health-insurance fee. Large companies must also pay health-insurance fees, but the rules of the game -- what is covered, how much doctors get paid -- are mainly set by the central government in Tokyo.

DOJ_NMG_0115568

After World War II, Japan achieved an improvement in life expectancy just as spectacular as its rise to become the world's second-largest economy. Japanese women have been the longest-lived in the world since 1985, according to the health ministry.

Meanwhile, the government's frugality has helped keep medical costs at a minimum. The restrictions aren't like those in England, where the government employs most of the doctors. Japan is the largest example of a "third way" medical system, also common in continental Europe, that combines universal health insurance with private doctors.

Japan saves by requiring less training of doctors and paying them less. Aspiring doctors typically go to medical school straight out of high school and become M.D.'s in just six years, compared with eight years of post-high-school education in the U.S. Until 2004, Japanese doctors could go straight into practice without any internship. (Now they must serve as interns for at least two years.) The average doctor's annual income is just over $100,000, compared with about $200,000 in the U.S.

Doctors say they have little time for patients. Because people in Japan are generally free to visit any doctor they like, the experience of going to a doctor who's popular is often summed up as "a three-hour wait for a three-minute visit." Health spending in Japan is about 9% of gross domestic product, versus 16% in the U.S.

The frugality has extended to cancer care. More than in the U.S., surgeons take a major role, including deciding on drug treatment -- typically the province of a specialized cancer doctor in the U.S. Through the late 1990s, the concept of a second opinion was virtually unknown. Today, Japanese people borrow the English words and talk about getting a "sekando opinion."

Until recently, cancer patients often did little to buck the system for a simple reason: Many weren't told they had the disease. It was common for patients to place complete trust in their doctor and refrain from asking why they were receiving an operation or medicine. Family members usually heard the true diagnosis, but they often felt it was cruel to burden the patient with that information.

Shintaro Abe, a politician and father of Japan's prime minister, Shinzo Abe, was widely known to have cancer for two years before his death in 1991. But the elder Mr. Abe was kept in the dark about his pancreatic tumor until his final two months, when he suspected the truth, according to his widow's memoirs.

Mr. Hashimoto, the former math teacher, says he was first diagnosed with liver cancer in 1990 and underwent surgery to remove a tumor, but his family kept the diagnosis from him. He says he was shocked when his son told him in 1999 that he had cancer and it had spread to his lungs. The son wanted Mr. Hashimoto, who lives near Kobe, to travel to Tokyo to get chemotherapy at the National Cancer Center and realized it was no longer possible to hide the diagnosis.

Unlike most Japanese patients, Mr. Hashimoto dived into studying his disease, scouring books and the Internet. "I was told twice that there were no more treatments for me," he says, but each time, he moved to a new hospital for experimental treatment, sometimes paying out of pocket for procedures not covered by the state. He joined and eventually led a patients' group.

With his activism, Mr. Hashimoto was joining a growing movement. Around the turn of the century, new chemotherapy drugs and the spread of the Internet spawned a class of activist cancer patients. The government was quick to approve a handful of drugs that clearly could extend lives -- in particular Novartis AG's Gleevec, which was approved in Japan the same year as the U.S. But other drugs with more marginal benefits languished for years. Sometimes foreign drug makers were slow to seek approval in Japan, fearing the government-set price would be too low to make it worth their while.

HOW MUCH FOR HEALTH?

The Issue: At a time when medicine offers countless ways to spend money, where should a nation draw the line?

The News: In Japan, which spends far less than the U.S. does on health care, some cancer patients demand access to more drugs and survival options.

What's at Stake: Patient choices and spending levels in Japan, as well as drug companies' market penetration.

To desperate patients, it was infuriating that the government didn't rush every potential life-saver to market, however slim its benefits might be. One example is Eloxatin, a drug that has been shown to extend lives by a few months, on average, in patients with recurring colorectal tumors. After patients held street rallies passing out fliers and repeatedly visited parliament, Japan approved the drug in 2005, nearly three years after the U.S.

Other drugs have yet to make it to Japan. The government is reviewing Avastin, approved in the U.S. in February 2004. The Genentech Inc. drug also can extend lives by several months on average but costs tens of thousands of dollars a year.

A movement for more drugs and better care culminated in May 2005 when 2,000 patients and family members packed a hall in Osaka for the first national convention of cancer patients. One of the organizers, Shoichi Miura, was a doctor and himself a cancer patient. In his speech, he summoned up a common image here: the "gan nanmin," or cancer refugee. "While Japan has become economically prosperous, cancer patients are in the same position as refugees who wander in search of food, water and someone who can help," said Dr. Miura, who died seven months later.

THE HEALTH OF NATIONS

DOJ_NMG_0115569

See data from the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development comparing health spending and outcomes4 in the U.S., Western Europe, Japan and selected other countries. (Or read a Kaiser Family Foundation summary5.)

Also, the World Health Organization's World Health Report6 holds health data on the 192 U.N. member nations.

Japan's public-television network, NHK, added to the chorus with a two-night prime-time documentary that portrayed Japan as far behind the U.S. in cancer care. NHK introduced the nationwide audience to a hospital in Texarkana, Texas, and showed a meeting in which 25 doctors, nurses and other specialists discussed cancer patients' care. It contrasted that with Japan, where a single doctor, with minimal consultation, might make a diagnosis, decide treatment and carry it out.

The public pressure has had an impact. Last April, for the first time a medical society designated 47 doctors who had passed rigorous tests as certified oncologists, cancer specialists qualified to administer chemotherapy drugs. The U.S. has had a similar process since 1973, overseen by the American Board of Internal Medicine, and today thousands of oncologists are certified by the board.

The law passed by parliament last June doesn't call for immediate new spending, but it creates targets and committees that will force the health ministry to do more, says Mr. Yamamoto, the legislator whose speech spurred the law's passage. "Cancer patients are becoming informed and beginning to act. It is late compared to America," he says.

Mr. Yamamoto says Japan should be ready to raise taxes to finance more generous care for cancer patients and others. He himself has gone to a maverick doctor who charges patients $420 out of pocket for a consultation and believes in aggressive treatment.

But government leaders show little willingness to fund a big expansion in health care. The government is grappling with a huge budget deficit left over from the 1990s.

The health ministry has slashed doctor reimbursements and raised co-payments for patients. Many people must pay 30% of their doctor bills, in addition to their regular health-insurance fees, and the maximum monthly out-of-pocket cost went up on Oct. 1 to 80,100 yen ($670) from 72,300 yen. Meanwhile, the government cut doctors' average reimbursement by 1.36% last year following a similar cut in 2002.

That infuriates doctors. "It's been one cutback after another," says Toshio Nakagawa, a neurosurgeon who serves on the board of the Japan Medical Association. "This time I think they've gone too far."

Dr. Nakajima, the recently retired health ministry official, says policy makers must also worry about the competitiveness of Japanese companies. "Executives want to keep costs down," he says.

Dr. Nakajima says a diligent surgeon who bones up on the latest literature can do just as good a job as a licensed oncologist. He says cancer patients may feel reassured if they see a certificate on their doctor's wall, but that feeling alone isn't worth blowing the government's budget. Says Dr. Nakajima, "It's simply not the case that the survival rate goes up just because somebody got a certification."

DOJ_NMG_0115570

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Friday, January 12, 2007 8:15 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Friday, January 12, 2007
Attachments:	agnb070112.pdf; agnb070112.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, JANUARY 12, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Holiday Publishing Notice 4
Gonzales Urges US Attorneys Help Guard Against Terrorist Threats 4
US Gearing Up For Prosecutions Of Top Al Qaeda Detainees 4
More Than 80 Arrested At Anti-Guantanamo Protest In Washington 5
Alleged Tamil Tiger Leader Extradited To Face US Charges 5
Attack On US Embassy In Athens Called "Act Of Terrorism." 5
ASEAN Member States Considering Regional Antiterror Pact 6

Homeland Response:

Administration Moves To Ease Anti-Terrorism Restrictions For Refugees 6
Registered Traveler Customers At Orlando International Can Start Leaving Shoes On 6
Former Ohio Imam Transferred To Israeli Custody 6
Suspicious Powders Cause Terror Scares At Two Florida Courthouses 6
EU Says DHS Has Eased Privacy Concerns Over Security Program 7
NYTimes Urges Lieberman To Change Views On State Minimums For Security Funding 7
Jury Awards $2.5 Million In Punitive Damages In Katrina Insurance Suit 7

War News:

Bush Defends Iraq Plan In Visit To Military Base 8
Bush Awards Fallen Corporal Posthumous Medal Of Honor 11
Bush Said To Have Led Commanders To Conclude More Troops Needed 11
Congress Blasts New Bush Iraq Plan 11
Rice To Seek Support For Bush Plan In Mideast Trip 15
Gates Proposes Adding 92,000 To Army, Marine Active Forces 15
Pentagon To Recall Army National Guard Units 16
Britain Plans To Proceed With Iraq Troop Cuts 16
Intelligence Officials Offer "Bleak Assessment" Of World Conflict Zones 16
Rice Names Carney As New Iraq Reconstruction Chief 16
US-Led Forces Detain Six Iranians At Office In Northern Iraq 17
US, Iraqi Forces Find "Little Evidence" Of Massing Insurgents In Diyala 18
"Chemical Ali" Tells Court He Ordered Kurdish Executions In 1988 18
Afghan Insurgent Says His Fighters Helped Bin Laden, Zawahiri Escape Tora Bora 18
Afghan, NATO Troops Kill Up To 150 Insurgents Entering From Pakistan 18

DOJ:

Congressional Budget Delays Hit DOJ Agencies With Hiring Freeze 18
San Diego US Attorney Asked To Resign 19

Corporate Scandals:

US Probing Apple Stock Option Grant To Jobs 19
Broadcom To Restate Financial Data To Include Misdated Stock Option Costs 19
Former Siemens CFO Named As Suspect In Bribery Probe 20
NYSE Probing Former Merrill Brokers In Timing Case 20

Criminal Law:

Fitzgerald Case Against Libby "Seemingly Weakened." 20
Puerto Rico DOJ Asks Court To Order Release Of FBI Raid Documents 21
Tennessee Waltz Trial Goes To Jury 21
FBI Recovers Picasso Drawings Stolen From NYC Apartment 21
Three Detained In Killing Of Tennessee Couple 22
US Raids Porn Studios To Enforce Age Rules 22

Pennsylvania Man Sentenced To 30 Months In Prison For Appraisal Fraud 22
Jury Hears Confession Of Man Charged With Killing New York Doctor 23
Rhode Island Mob Capo Sentenced To Five Years In Prison 23
Florida Woman Pleads Guilty To Medicare Fraud Scam 23
Marchers Demand Action On Surge In New Orleans Violence 23
FBI Investigating Craigslist NYC Apartment Fraud Case 24
Retired Arkansas State Trooper Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charges 24
Pennsylvania Man Pleads Guilty To Sex With Minor He Met On MySpace 24
Former Federal Prosecutor Charged With Running New York Escort Service 24

Civil Law:

Mississippi Psychiatrist Settles Medicare, Medicaid Fraud Allegations 25

Civil Rights:

Alabama To Appeal DOJ Ruling On County Commissioner . 25
Probe Of Gunfire At Home Of Louisiana Mayor Urged 25
DC To Probe Death Of St Elizabeth's Patient 26
LAPD Chief Wants Disciplinary Board Meetings Open To Public 26
Accuser In Duke Lacrosse Case Contradicts Herself 27
California Man Sues To Take Wife's Last Name 27
Rights Groups Seek New Members From Younger Generation 27

Antitrust:

Bristol-Myers Still In Search Of Suitor 28
Judge Rules Antitrust Suit Against Bar Exam Preparer May Proceed 28
EU Delays Ruling On Universal-BMG Deal 28
Open Standards Seen As Crux Of Cisco's IPhone Suit 29
Solis Criticizes FCC's New Video Rules 29

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Praises Calderon's Anti-Drug Efforts 30
US Charges Deputy Marshal With Leaking Information In Mob Case 31
Atlanta Narcotics Team Member Tells FBI Officers Lied To Get Warrant 32
DOJ: Illinois Doctor Illegally Prescribed 62 Million Doses Of Drugs Over Internet 32
Michigan Man Gets 7-Year Sentence For Role In Importing Thousands Of Ecstasy Pills 32
"Cocaine Cowboys" Indicted In New York 32
Federal Fugitive Facing Meth Charges Found In Alabama Jail 33
Budget Cuts Said To Be Hindering Drug Enforcement 33
In Detroit, Walters Praises Officials' Response To Fentanyl-Related Overdoses 33
Bonds Issues Statement Following Report Of Positive Amphetamines Test 33
Ecuador, Colombia Make Deal On Coca Crop Fumigation .. 34

Immigration:

US Indicts Exiled Cuban Militant For Immigration Fraud 34
Chicago Man Arrested For Impersonating FBI Agent To Scam Immigrants 35

Tax:

Another Plea In KPMG Case 35
IRS Agents Criticize Prematurely Closed Audits 35
New York Judge Blocks IRS From Role In Tax Case 36
IRS Adjusts Monthly Transit Subsidy, Mileage Deduction For Workers 36

Congress-Administration:

House Passes Stem Cell Bill, But Falls Short Of Veto-Threat Margin 36
Bush Threatens To Veto Bill Requiring Medicare Drug Negotiation 37
Senate Democratic Leadership Dealt Setback On Ethics Bill 38
Democrats Say Bush "Still Playing Hardball" On Judges 39
Democrats To Seek "Narrow" Tax Hikes 39
GOP Criticizes Minimum Wage Bill For Exempting Pelosi Constituent 39
Some Republicans Worry Bush Will Cut Education Deal With Democrats 40
Democrats Plan Vote On Bill To Reduce College Loan Costs 40
Administration Scraps Risk Assessment Plan 40
Johnson Transferred Out Of Intensive Care, Has Begun Speaking 40
Burns Defends Hughes In Foreign Service Journal 40
National Defense University Computers Hacked 41
Radio Chips Found In Canadian Coins Passed To Pentagon Contractors 41
Government's Official Web Portal Changes Name From FirstGov.gov To USA.gov 41
First Lady Tours Renovated Treasury Building 41

DOJ_NMG_0115573

Other News:

Fed Official Issues Warning About Threats To Economy..... 41
Federal Judge Allows Sex Abuse Suit Against Vatican To Proceed..... 42
Dodd Announces He Will Make '08 Bid For White House 43
Denver To Host '08 Democratic Presidential Convention 44
Schwarzenegger Defies Conventional Political Categories ... 44
Bush Sr. Plans To Jump Out Of Airplane For 85th Birthday... 45
Professor Says Anna Nicole Smith Is Ultimate Forum-Shopper..... 45
US Airstrikes Missed Targets In Somalia 45
Apparent Slowdown In Iran Nuclear Work Sparks Concern ... 46
US Aid Package Seen As Expansion Of Role In Palestinian Crisis..... 46
Issue Of Succession Raises Stir In Egypt..... 46
Carter Center Board Members Resign Over Book Controversy..... 47
Bangladesh Elections Delayed As President Resigns..... 47
Venezuela May Nationalize Orinoco Oil Projects 47
Human Rights Group Criticizes China's Abuses 47
Nigeria Considers Bill Banning Gay Marriage 47
UN Chief Seeks To Clarify Death Penalty Stance 47
WPost Urges International Campaign Against Rights Abuses In Burma..... 47

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages..... 48

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 49

DOJ_NMG_0115574

TERRORISM NEWS:

Holiday Publishing Notice. In observance of the federal Martin Luther King holiday, the Attorney General's News Briefing will not be published on Monday, January 15. News from the holiday will be included in your Tuesday, January 16, briefing.

Gonzales Urges US Attorneys Help Guard Against Terrorist Threats. The State (SC) (1/12, Brundrett) reports from Columbia, SC, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales gave a pep talk in Columbia on Thursday afternoon to U.S. attorneys from around the country attending a conference on combating terrorism. … 'For us in the law enforcement community, every day must be September 12th,' the nation's top prosecutor said, referring to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks." The State continues, "Gonzales spoke to about 100 mainly U.S. attorneys at the National Advocacy Center — a training facility for state and federal prosecutors — on USC's campus. Reggie Lloyd, the U.S. attorney for South Carolina, attended. … Gonzales noted he spent earlier Thursday in Mexico City and met with senior Mexican officials to discuss organized crime and other issues." The State adds, "Gonzales told the U.S. attorneys that the 'single most important part' of their jobs is preventing terrorist attacks in the U.S. … 'Our success or failure in this one endeavor will define in the eyes of some President Bush and his legacy,' he said. 'It will be the legacy of every one of us who is serving in the administration.'" The State notes, "Although the country responded to the 9/11 attacks by invading Afghanistan, reorganizing government and passing new laws to combat terrorism, more needs to be done because terrorists 'change tactics in response to what we do,' he said. … He praised U.S. attorneys for combating 'crimes that can fuel terrorism,' such as identification and immigration fraud. He noted that seven of the 9/11 hijackers had fraudulent Virginia identification cards."

WLTX-TV, CBS 19, Columbia, SC (1/12) reports, "After a lengthy standing ovation from a crowd of US attorneys, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales quieted the crowd, 'Okay, I think you guys just want to play on my softball team. That's what all that's about.' … He began on a lighter note, 'Everything you do for the American people, I am really, really proud of you.' … But Gonzales' pep talk quickly got serious, 'I must speak bluntly and urgently about the single most important part of our jobs, which is preventing terrorist attacks on American soil.'" WLTX-TV continues, "He asked the men and women who filled a room at USC's National Advocacy Center to help stop terrorists from living, traveling and working freely in our communities. … 'And very often, the cells that are broken up are not in New York, they're not in LA,' said South Carolina U.S. Attorney Reggie Lloyd. 'You look at the case in Portland or the case in Buffalo. You have these individuals that are sleeping in communities all across the country.' … He said that's what puts our state on the map when it comes to protection and prevention. 'It's very important to us that we make sure we recognize any potential threat even if it's not a direct threat here in South Carolina,' said Lloyd."

WIS-TV, Columbia, SC (1/11, 7:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "US Attorney Alberto Gonzales is in Columbia. He arrived at Columbia metro airport this afternoon for the US Attorneys National Security Conference. Short time ago Gonzalez spoke to officials about efforts to combat terrorism and keep America safe. He also came to discuss how the Department of Justice is trying to combat terrorism and his remarks are part of the National Security Conference being held At National Advocacy Center." Other broadcasts in Columbia, SC were from the stations WLTX-TV (1/11, 11:00 p.m.) and WOLO-TV (1/11, 11:00 p.m.).

US Gearing Up For Prosecutions Of Top Al Qaeda Detainees. The New York Times (1/12, Johnston, Lewis) reports, "The Bush administration has set up a secret war room in a Virginia suburb where it is assembling evidence to prosecute high-ranking detainees from Al Qaeda including the man accused of being the mastermind of the September 2001 attacks, Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, government officials said this week." The Times continues, "The effort to sift the classified files of the Pentagon, F.B.I., C.I.A. and other intelligence agencies amounts to the first concrete steps that the government has taken to press ahead with war crimes trials of high-level terror suspects under a plan announced by President Bush in a speech last September. … At the time, Mr. Bush said that Mr. Mohammed and 13 other high-level terror suspects had been transferred from secret prisons around the world to the military detention center at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, where they would be held pending trial." The Times adds, "The preparation of cases against the high-value operatives appears to rebut many who doubted that Qaeda suspects like Mr. Mohammed would ever be brought to trial. Critics in Congress and human rights groups had asserted that such trials would not be feasible because they would expose harsh interrogation techniques used by the Central Intelligence Agency. … The officials who discussed the preparations have been briefed on the effort in detail and represented several agencies. They declined to speak on the record about deliberations in advance of criminal prosecutions involving national security. … The prosecution team for the Qaeda defendants will be a mix of military and civilian prosecutors. Some officials said no decision had been made about who would lead each prosecution, but others said the trial of Mr. Mohammed would probably be undertaken principally by Justice Department lawyers, who would run the prosecution in a military courtroom in Guantánamo."

DOJ_NMG_0115575

More Than 80 Arrested At Anti-Guantanamo Protest In Washington. The Washington Post (1/12, A3, Leonnig, 690K) reports, "More than 80 protesters were arrested inside the federal courthouse in Washington yesterday after a demonstration that called for closing the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay." They were "commemorating the fifth anniversary of the opening of the Guantanamo detention facility. They targeted the courthouse where lawyers have challenged the legality of indefinitely imprisoning hundreds of suspected enemy fighters and terrorists at Guantanamo."

WPost Calls DOD Official's Comments On Detainee Lawyers "Repellent." The Washington Post (1/12, A18, 690K) editorializes, "Most understand that legal representation for the accused is one of the core principles of the American way. Not, it seems, Cully Stimson, deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs. In a repellent interview yesterday with Federal News Radio, Mr. Stimson brought up, unprompted, the number of major U.S. law firms that have helped represent detainees at Guantanamo Bay. ... It's offensive" that Stimson, "a lawyer, would argue that law firms are doing anything other than upholding the highest ethical traditions of the bar by taking on the most unpopular of defendants. It's shocking that he would seemingly encourage the firms' corporate clients to pressure them to drop this work. And it's shocking -- though perhaps not surprising -- that this is the person the administration has chosen to oversee detainee policy at Guantanamo."

Human Rights Watch Says US No Longer World's Top Defender Of Rights. The Washington Post (1/12, A10, Boustany, 690K) reports Human Rights Watch said the "once-powerful role" of the US "as a prime defender of human rights had effectively ended because of arbitrary detentions and reports of torture since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and the group urged the European Union to step up as a leader of the cause." Executive Director Kenneth Roth released the group's World Report 2007 "by saying that the counterterrorism record of the United States over the past five years has tarnished its credibility as an influential moral voice. He listed several practices he said were being used by the Bush administration in its fight against terrorism, including torture, arbitrary detentions, allowing CIA interrogators to use coercive techniques and the unsupervised handling of so-called enemy combatants held in other countries."

Alleged Tamil Tiger Leader Extradited To Face US Charges. WNBC-TV New York (1/11, Valiquette) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "A key associate of a foreign terrorist organization has been captured in Indonesia and returned to New York to face federal charges including conspiracy to provide material support and resources to the Tamil Tigers. Thavarajah Pratheepan was arrested by Interpol and placed in FBI custody. At his arraignment Thursday afternoon in federal court in Brooklyn, he pleaded not guilty and was ordered held without bail." WNBC noted, "The Joint Terrorism Task Force based in Newark, N.J., arrested four of the men on Long Island last August in a sting operation after three of them traveled from Canada to purchase Russian-made SA-18 surface-to-air missiles, missile launchers and AK-47s from an undercover agent. Pratheepan is identified in the court papers as being the main liaison between the leadership of the Tamil Tigers and its supporters in North America, Europe and Asia, as well as being involved in procuring equipment for the group." The AP (1/11) also reported on Pratheepan's extradition.

Attack On US Embassy In Athens Called "Act Of Terrorism." In breaking news early Friday morning, the AP (1/12) reports "police cordoned off streets around the US Embassy in Athens early Friday after an explosion inside the embassy compound that a senior police official said was an 'act of terrorism.'" Greek police did not report any injuries, but embassy officials "could not immediately be reached for comment." Attica Police Chief Asimakis Golfis called the attack "an act of terrorism," but said authorities "don't know where from."

DOJ_NMG_0115576

ASEAN Member States Considering Regional Antiterror Pact. The New York Times (1/12, Conde, 1.16M) reports 10 Southeast Asian nations "are hammering out a regional antiterrorism agreement, officials said Thursday, the day after a series of terrorist bombings in the southern Philippines underscored the need for such a measure." The 10 ASEAN states "will consider the measure, the Asean Convention on Counterterrorism, at their annual summit meeting here on Saturday. The agreement aims to improve information and intelligence sharing among the group's members and encourage them to adopt domestic antiterrorism laws, officials said."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Administration Moves To Ease Anti-Terrorism Restrictions For Refugees. The New York Times (1/12, Swarns, 1.16M) reports, "After months of pressure from lawmakers, conservative groups and advocates for immigrants, the Bush administration announced plans on Thursday to seek legislation that would provide relief to thousands of refugees and asylum seekers who have been inadvertently denied refuge because of antiterrorism laws." The proposal would affect those who have "provided material support to armed rebel groups, even if that support was coerced and even if the armed groups fought alongside American troops or opposed authoritarian governments criticized by the Bush administration." Paul Rosenzweig, acting assistant secretary for international affairs at the Department of Homeland Security, "told reporters that the administration expected to present legislation to Congress by the end of the month and to exercise most of its waivers within a day or so. … 'There isn't anybody in this room who doesn't wish we could have moved more quickly than we have,' Mr. Rosenzweig said. Advocacy groups hailed the decision as an important step forward, but warned that it would still leave many people vulnerable."

Registered Traveler Customers At Orlando International Can Start Leaving Shoes On. USA Today (1/12, 1A, Frank, 2.27M) reports on its front page on the introduction of the ShoeScanner this morning for members of the Registered Traveler program at Orlando International. "Those fee-paying travelers will soon find the machines at Indianapolis, San Jose and Cincinnati airports and in Terminal 7 at New York's Kennedy International. The ShoeScanner detects explosives in shoes when people stand on its platform for 20 to 25 seconds, allowing the machine to shoot radio waves at footwear to provide a molecular peek inside." USA Today adds, "The Transportation Security Administration approved ShoeScanners only for Registered Traveler and has no plans to expand it to regular checkpoints because of cost and time concerns."

Former Ohio Imam Transferred To Israeli Custody. Haaretz (1/12, Melman) reports, "Israeli authorities who arrested the former imam of Ohio's largest mosque who was deported from the United States have questioned him about his connections to Islamic Jihad, his attorney said Wednesday. Palestinian Fawaz Damra's American citizenship was revoked due to suspicions that he raised funds for Islamic Jihad 15 years ago," and he "was transferred to Israeli custody on a 'secret flight' coordinated by the FBI and Israeli security services." Haaretz notes, "Several days ago, he boarded a special plane destined for Jordan at New Jersey's Newark Airport, along with six drug dealers. Following a short interrogation, Jordanian authorities transferred him to the Shin Bet and Israel Police via Allenby Bridge."

The AP (1/12, Heller) notes, "Despite a campaign by his family and supporters to keep him in the U.S., Damra was deported after spending a year in a Michigan jail. His relatives in the U.S. said they hadn't been notified he had been deported, and found out only when his lawyer arrived at the jail and found him gone.

Suspicious Powders Cause Terror Scares At Two Florida Courthouses. The Miami Herald (1/12, Daniel, Lebovich, 286K) reports, "Authorities found mysterious powders in two South Florida courthouses -- one in Broward, the other in Palm Beach -- Thursday but neither substance proved a threat. .. It was not immediately known if the two scares were related, but investigators planned to look into the matter." The Herald notes, "In Palm Beach County a mail worker discovered the substance around 11:30 a.m. as she was delivering mail to the chambers of two judges…said

DOJ_NMG_0115577

Teri Barbera, a spokeswoman for the Palm Beach Sheriff's Office. … On the envelope, investigators found tellurium, a rare chemical element" which "is listed as a chemical hazard on the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's website. … Since FBI agents found no serious threat in the envelope -- a letter from an attorney to a judge requesting a motion hearing -- local agencies will take over the investigation to see who's responsible for planting the substance, said Barbera."

The Palm Beach Post (1/12, Spencer-Wendel, Green) reports, "Investigators donned hazardous material suits Thursday evening to pore through 200 pieces of mail, looking for the source. Two judicial assistants left the letter with powder stuck to it down in the mailroom, but carried other mail which had the substance on it up to nine floors above to the judges' chambers, widely spreading exposure, officials said." The Post notes, "The FBI and Homeland Security joined the investigation." The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (1/12, Santana, Diaz, 237K) adds, "Preliminary indications are that the substance in Broward appears to be some sort of food additive, possibly a sugar substitute, a fire official said. In West Palm Beach, firefighters decontaminated five people who touched two envelopes tainted with traces of tellurium," and "none had an adverse reaction, Fire Rescue spokesman Phil Kaplan said. … FBI agents were called to both courthouses, but declined to launch an investigation in Palm Beach County. FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said agents were looking into the Broward case." In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/12) also reported on the incidents.

EU Says DHS Has Eased Privacy Concerns Over Security Program. The Washington Post (1/12, D2, Nakashima, 690K) reports, "European Union officials said yesterday that the US government had allayed their concerns about a homeland security program that creates and retains risk assessments on millions of air travelers to the United States." However, "in a letter to the chief privacy officials of 27 countries, the American Civil Liberties Union and London-based Privacy International said the Automated Targeting System violated" a European-US agreement on air-passenger data sharing, as well as US law and European data-protection laws. DHS spokesman Jarrod Agen "said the program did not violate the requirement that European passenger data be stored for 3 1/2 years at the most. He said the US-EU agreement stipulates that some information may be kept for less than 40 years."

NYTimes Urges Lieberman To Change Views On State Minimums For Security Funding. The New York Times (1/12, 1.16M) editorializes, "Making his umpteenth pitch to Congress to provide more security money for New York City, Mayor Michael Bloomberg stated the obvious when he said that money to defend against terrorism should be divvied up based on an assessment of risks, not 'spread across the country like peanut butter.' … Unfortunately, the committee's incoming chairman, Senator Joseph Lieberman, is partial to peanut butter." He "continues to believe that every state, regardless of the risks or threats it faces, should be getting antiterrorism money," and "is seeking a 'compromise' formula that preserves guaranteed minimums for relatively low-risk places like his home state of Connecticut." The Times states that Lieberman "fought the odds" to hold his seat and get his chairmanship, and "it's up to him to use the power responsibly."

Jury Awards $2.5 Million In Punitive Damages In Katrina Insurance Suit. The AP (1/12, Mitchell) reports, "A Mississippi jury on Thursday awarded $2.5 million in punitive damages to a couple who sued State Farm Fire & Casualty Co. for denying their claim after Hurricane Katrina, a decision that could benefit hundreds of other homeowners challenging insurers for refusing to cover billion of dollars in storm damage." The AP continues, "A federal judge only hours earlier had taken part of the case out of jurors' hands before they awarded punitive damages to State Farm policyholders Norman and Genevieve Broussard. … U.S. District Judge L.T. Senter Jr. ruled Thursday morning that State Farm is liable for $223,292 in damage Hurricane Katrina caused to the Broussards' home. Senter left it to a jury to decide whether to award punitive damages." The AP adds, "Senter's decision to make a directed verdict rather than let the jury decide the entire case appeared to surprise everyone in the courtroom. After he explained his ruling, Senter ordered a recess to give attorneys time "to get over the shock." … Some of Senter's earlier rulings in other Katrina cases have favored the insurance industry, but his decision Thursday calls into question the companies' refusal to cover billions of dollars in damage from Katrina's storm surge. … The Broussards sued State Farm for refusing to pay for any damage to their home, which Katrina reduced to a slab. The couple, who wanted State Farm to pay for the full insured value of their home plus $5 million in punitive damages, claimed that a tornado during the hurricane destroyed their home. State Farm blamed all the damage on Katrina's storm surge."

DOJ_NMG_0115578

WAR NEWS:

Bush Defends Iraq Plan In Visit To Military Base. ABC World News (1/11, story 2, 2:25, Vargus, 8.78M) reported, "Last night the President presented his plan to the American people, today he took it to the people who will actually be carrying it out, the members of the military who would see their role in Iraq expand." ABC (Raddatz) added "the President was pushing his plan hard today to the people who will have to carry it out. In Ft. Benning, Georgia, today, before soldiers who will soon be part of the planned troop surge, the President assured the audience that this plan was different from the one he now admits was a failure." The CBS Evening News (1/11, lead story, :40, Couric, 7.66M) said the reaction "was not at all what the President has come to expect from a military audience." The CBS Evening News (1/11, story 4, 1:45, Couric, 7.66M) later reported on the "out of the ordinary is the response the President got today from a usually receptive audience, those soldiers we mentioned earlier." CBS (Axelrod) added, "Even rallying the troops is now a challenge. The mood here was polite but muted, more somber than usual for a President talking to soldiers."

NBC Nightly News (1/11, lead story, 3:05, Gregory, 9.87M) noted Bush "lunched with troops" and defended his plan, but offered no assessment of the audience's response. Neither did the AP (1/12, Riechmann), says "Fort Benning…offered Bush a patriotic backdrop and a friendly audience in which to sell his retooled plan for Iraq, which drew heavy fire on Capitol Hill from Democrats and some Republicans. Some 4,000 members of Fort Benning's 3rd Brigade Combat Team are being sent to Iraq earlier than planned because of the president's decision. … Bush had lunch with about 300 military personnel and their relatives, saw a paratrooper training exercise and met with relatives of 25 soldiers who died in Iraq and Afghanistan."

But the Washington Times (1/12, Curl, 88K) headlines its story "Bush Gets Cool Response From Troops Set For Iraq," and says the President "received only tepid applause at this Army base, where the commanding general forbade soldiers from talking to reporters." The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/12, Martz, Markiewicz, 379K) reports Bush's speech "was a virtual carbon copy of his national TV address Wednesday night, in which he laid out his plans for Iraq." His comments "were met with relatively polite but restrained applause on several occasions, but the soldiers broke into a spontaneous ovation when he said he was in favor of increasing the overall size of the military." Similarly, the Los Angeles Times (1/12, Gerstenzang, 850K) says Bush's audience "was friendly, but his sober address received a less enthusiastic reception than has been the case on his past visits to military bases to promote his Iraq policy. White House and Army officials prohibited reporters from interviewing soldiers before Bush spoke or immediately after his remarks." The Washington Post (1/12, A12, Baker, 690K) titles its report "At Fort Benning, A Quiet Response To A Presidential Visit," and says that "White House officials had promised reporters they could talk with soldiers." And the New York Times (1/12, Stolberg, 1.16M) says Bush's "lunchtime talk received a restrained response."

USA Today (1/12, 5A, Copeland, 2.27M) reports on Bush's Georgia visit, and added that reaction to the new Iraq plan "from some military families around the USA was mixed," quoting misgivings from three military spouses. In a front-page story titled "US Unit Patrolling Baghdad Sees Flaws In Bush Strategy," the Washington Post (1/12, A1, Raghavan, 690K), quotes US soldiers who challenged Bush's "decision to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq" because it "rests on a key assumption" that they believe flawed: that "the Iraqi government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki can produce a well-disciplined, impartial army capable of taking the lead in securing Baghdad."

Along those lines, USA Today (1/12, 6A, Brook, 2.27M) says the Bush plan "rests on a shaky foundation: the Iraqi military. Recent reports by the Pentagon and the Government Accountability Office (GAO) say Iraqi security forces, primarily the military and police, suffer from a lack of training, supplies and availability." While "322,600 Iraqi security personnel had been trained and equipped by last month, 'the number of present-for-duty soldiers and police is much lower,' according to a Pentagon progress report released in December. That's because so many Iraqi troops are on scheduled leave, are absent without leave or have left the service entirely, the report says."

White House Campaign To "Sell" Strategy To Continue Over The Weekend. USA Today (1/12, 1A, Jackson, Nichols, 2.27M) reports, "The White House is embarking on a weekend campaign to sell President Bush's new Iraq strategy to the nation amid fierce criticism from Democrats and some Republicans on Capitol Hill." Bush

DOJ_NMG_0115579

"will appear Sunday on CBS' 60 Minutes, which airs after an NFL playoff game. Vice President Cheney will appear on Fox News Sunday to defend the plan to boost U.S. troop levels by 21,500." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "leaves today on a week-long trip to the Middle East and Europe to brief U.S. allies on the plan." White House spokesman Tony Snow, "who held interviews with radio and television hosts Thursday, said the communications plan will continue in coming weeks."

Yesterday, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said on CNN's The Situation Room (1/11, Blitzer), "We're at the beginning of a process now where people are going to take a look at a comprehensive plan. What a lot of people have done is said, 'Okay, we don't want troops growing in.' And so they look at that one piece. What we're saying to the American public is, look at all of the pieces. See how it all works together."

White House Deputy Press Secretary Dana Perino said on CNN's Your World Today (1/11, Gorani), "The President was very plain-spoken yesterday, as he should be, when he was talking to the American people about his new way forward in Iraq. And one of the most important things that people need to understand is what we are finding there with Iran's meddlesomeness in the region. And of course we are supportive of the neighbors getting along there in the region. And Secretary Rice is headed to the region tomorrow to help further that. But no, the President is not going to do one-on-one talks with Iran and Syria at this time."

Polls Show Little Support For New Strategy. ABC World News (1/11, story 3, 2:05, Vargus, 8.78M) reported "an ABC News poll conducted after the speech found 61% of Americans reject the idea of sending more forces into Iraq. 36% support the proposal and our chief Washington correspondent George Stephanopoulos joins me now." This poll "shows the President has a long way to go to sell this." ABC (Stephanopoulos) added, "Those numbers you said are just the beginning of the tough news for the President. It also shows that two-thirds of Americans reject the idea that sending more troops now is going to bring a quicker end to the war. And 71% of Americans believe that the assistance of the United States to Iraq should be conditioned on Iraqis meeting benchmarks for bringing their country together and building up their military. This is an idea the President rejected even though it was endorsed by the bipartisan Baker-Hamilton commission. 53% want Congress to act to stop the plan to send more troops."

On the CBS Evening News (1/11, story 3, 1:55, 7.66M), Bob Schieffer said "it is a rare evening when an American President goes on prime time television and doesn't change some minds, so you have to say last night was a rare evening. Mr. Bush did no better winning support for his new Iraq policy from the public than he did trying to change the minds of people in Congress. A CBS News poll conducted after the speech showed 68% of the people polled are still uneasy about the President's ability to make the right decisions about Iraq. That is the same percentage as when we asked the same question during the first week in January. The poll did show some increase in public support for increasing troop levels since last week, but even so, only 30%, a third of those polled, believe a troop increase is a good idea. The fact that this speech seemed to change so few minds…is really unusual. I think it underlines just how unpopular this war is with the American people."

The AP (1/12, Benac) reports that an "Associated Press-Ipsos poll found widespread disagreement with the Bush administration over its proposed solution, and growing skepticism that the United States made the right decision in going to war in the first place. Just as 70 percent of Americans oppose sending more troops to Iraq, a like number don't think such an increase would help stabilize the situation there, the poll suggested. When asked to name the most important problem facing the U.S., 38 percent of those polled volunteered war, up significantly from 24 percent three months ago."

The New York Times (1/12, Urbina, 1.16M) runs a feature surveying the opinion of citizens of Clifton Heights, PA, where people "at the American Legion" were "sure of one thing: President Bush's plan to send some 20,000 more troops to Iraq would only make matters worse. … Frustrated by mounting deaths of United States soldiers in Iraq, voters in this former mill town wedged between more liberal Philadelphia and more conservative rural areas, responded to the president's plan with feelings ranging from outrage and resignation to guarded skepticism and qualified support."

White House Blames Networks For Audio Problems During Speech. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" section, "Bush aides blame television networks for audio problems during president's Iraq speech. 'The feed went out of here clean,' a spokesman says. Bush will keep relatively low-profile on Iraq next week as he wraps up budget decisions and Jan. 23 State of the Union speech."

DOJ_NMG_0115580

Luntz Says Bush Word's "Too Little And Too Late" For Most Americans. In a Los Angeles Times (1/12, 850K) op-ed, Republican pollster Frank Luntz writes, "Americans tuned in Wednesday night to hear the president's plan for a 'new way forward' in Iraq. We also tuned in to be convinced and reassured that President Bush was the right man to execute that plan. The speech was a clear attempt to draw a distinct line between the past and the future. The president addressed head-on the most common attacks on him and his administration, countering 'inflexible,' 'unrealistic' and 'incompetent' -- three words pollsters like myself have heard from an angry electorate for more than a year -- with 'adjust' and 'change,' 'scrutiny,' 'responsibility' and, again and again, 'our new strategy.' Speaking from the White House library, a different setting befitting a different strategy, the president attempted to make the case that things in Iraq were going to be different from now on. The problem is, for most Americans it is too little and too late."

More Commentary. The Financial Times (1/12) editorializes the Bush plans "is certainly not a strategy for victory, whatever that word, which is used ever more desperately by the US president, now means. It may be one last heave. It may be a cover for US withdrawal. But two things are quite clear." First, the Times notes that "right now, Mr. Bush has the support of no more than one in four Americans for this so-called surge of an extra 20,000 or so troops." And second, "this policy will not succeed in fixing an Iraq traumatized by tyranny and war and then broken by invasion and occupation. But it may end with the US 'surging' into Iran -- and taking the Middle East to a new level of mayhem that will spill into nearby regions and western capitals."

Mackubin Thomas Owens, a professor of national security affairs at the Naval War College, writes in the Christian Science Monitor (1/12, 59K) that the success of Bush's plan "depends on at least three factors. The first is the adequacy of the force." The second factor, he says, is "the Iraqi government," which he says much include "the Shiite militias." The third factor is "Congress," where he says he hopes Democrats will "take the wise counsel of one of their own, Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, who reminded us the other day that the stark choice in Iraq is between victory and defeat."

In his Wall Street Journal (1/12, 2.04M) column, Daniel Henninger writes, "When Gen. David Petraeus takes command of U.S. forces in Iraq, it will mark the start of an historic turn in military strategy in Iraq and perhaps in U.S. war-fighting doctrine. The U.S.'s primary problem in Iraq, manifest across 2006, has been an urban insurgency in a 30-mile radius around Baghdad and in Anbar province. The Petraeus command is the overdue beginning of the counterinsurgency. This isn't a one-off effort as at Fallujah, but counterinsurgency as daily U.S. military policy. It is the product of an enormous amount of self-criticism and analysis done by military and civilian analysts in and out of government."

Anthony Cordesman, a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, writes in the New York Times (1/12, 1.16M) that "taken as a whole," the President's speech "raised more questions than it answered."

Former national security adviser Zbignew Brzezinski writes in the Washington Post (1/12, A19, 690K) that the President's plan "provided a more realistic analysis of the situation in Iraq than any previous presidential statement." Though it "acknowledged failure," it "dodged accountability for that failure by the standard device of assuming personal responsibility." Brzezinski calls the troop "surge" a "political gimmick of limited tactical significance and of no strategic benefit," noting that it is "insufficient to win the war militarily." He also criticized the plan for failing to "explore even the possibility of developing a framework for an eventual political solution." In conclusion, Brzezinski says the speech "reflects a profound misunderstanding of our era" that "waging a colonial war in the post-colonial age is self-defeating."

Former federal prosecutor Andrew C. McCarthy writes in USA Today (1/12, 10A, 2.27M) that for "those in Congress" there are "two logical responses" to the President's plan: "Propose a better way forward, or candidly call for the United States to accept defeat -- without trying to spin that as -redeployment' or some other transparent euphemism." Noting that "a defeat for the United States in Iraq would be a victory for our mortal enemies," McCarthy urges members of Congress to "give us a plan to win," saying the US "can accept nothing less."

New York Times (1/12, 1.16M) columnist Thomas Friedman asks President Bush to "stop insulting our intelligence by telling us that this is the 'decisive ideological struggle of our time,' but we're going to put the whole burden of victory on 150,000 US soldiers." Friedman says "the way" Bush has "fought this war -- with our pinky -- is contemptible." He says the "only way more US troops might bring stability is if you add two missing elements: a deadline and a floor." He urges the President to "tell Iraqis that by calling for a surge in troops you're giving them one last chance to reconcile, otherwise we're gone by Dec. 1." By not setting a hard date to leave Iraq, Friedman says "we are only putting a floor under bad behavior and allowing Iraqi leaders to pay wholesale, not retail, for their tribal politics."

DOJ_NMG_0115581

Washington Post (1/12, A19, 690K) columnist E.J. Dionne Jr. writes, "If Iraq does not end well, our men and women in uniform will not get the blame. The fault will lie with leaders in Washington who failed to face the politics of the situation as squarely as this soldier has."

Washington Post (1/12, A19, 690K) columnist Eugene Robinson calls Bush's plan "fantasy-based," saying it "could only make sense in some parallel universe where pigs fly and fish commute on bicycles."

Bush Awards Fallen Corporal Posthumous Medal Of Honor. The CBS Evening News (1/11, story 10, :25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Early on in the Iraq war, we told you the story of a young man named Jason Dunham, a former high school star athlete from upstate New York who joined the Marines and saved the lives of two comrades by throwing himself on a hand grenade. Today, President Bush awarded this fallen hero America's highest military decoration, the Medal of Honor." ABC World News (1/11, story 6, :55, Vargus, 8.78M) reported Dunham "died after jumping on a grenade to protect members of his squad." President Bush: "This morning it's my privilege to recognize Corporal Dunham's devotion to the corps and country. And to present his family with the Medal of Honor."

NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 5, 1:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "President Bush has said more than once, the toughest part of his job is sending Americans into combat. Today there was a vivid reminder of the consequences. This morning before leaving for Fort Benning, the President awarded the nation's highest military honor to a young Marine who gave his life to save his squad."

The New York Times (1/12, Hernandez, 1.16M) reports, "In an interview on Tuesday, as she was preparing to make the six-hour trip to Washington for the ceremony, Corporal Dunham's mother, Debra, said she wished her son could 'receive it himself.' 'But we will receive it for him, and he will be watching us do that,' she said." President Bush "shed tears during the ceremony."

Bush Said To Have Led Commanders To Conclude More Troops Needed. The New York Times (1/12, Rutenberg, Sanger, Gordon, 1.16M) reports that "over the past two months" two "diametrically opposed options -- adding American troops, or pulling back to let the Iraqi factions fight it out -- marked the boundaries of a vigorous debate inside the Bush administration." At one point, President Bush "asked his deputies, in effect: 'Why can't we just pull out of Baghdad and let the factions fight it out themselves?' Ultimately, the president and his advisers came back to the idea of adding American troops -- the new approach they concluded was the best of a series of difficult choices, according to a senior administration official involved in the process. A narrative pieced together from interviews with participants and from public testimony suggests that through much of the process, generals who had been on the ground in Iraq during the past year had favored that the new strategy begin with a substantially smaller force than the one that President Bush announced to the nation on Wednesday night. In the end, it was Mr. Bush who appeared to drive his commanders along to the conclusion that more troops were needed."

New Strategy "Vindication" For Shinseki. The New York Times (1/12, Shanker, 1.16M) reports that Bush's "new strategy, with its explicit acknowledgment that not enough troops had been sent to Iraq to establish control, was a vindication" for Gen. Eric Shinseki, "who as Army chief of staff publicly told Congress as much just before the war began in 2003. First vilified, then marginalized by the Bush administration after those comments, General Shinseki retired and faded away, even as lawmakers, pundits and politicians increasingly cited his prescience."

Many Targeted Baghdad Areas Already Overrun By Militias. The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Moore, 850K) reports, "One of the chief rationales for sending five additional U.S. brigades to Baghdad is to secure the city's mixed neighborhoods, U.S. military planners say. If residents feel they are safe in their homes, they will no longer turn to sectarian militias to protect them, the strategists argue. But many of the districts that U.S. planners might have wanted to protect already have been taken over by sectarian gunmen and their allies."

Congress Blasts New Bush Iraq Plan. On Capitol Hill, President Bush's new Iraq strategy was the object of strong attacks yesterday from both sides of the aisle. Some reports suggest the President's support among Republicans may be quickly collapsing. The Financial Times (1/12, Luce) reports Bush yesterday "cut an increasingly lonely and embattled figure as opposition Democrats and fellow Republicans greeted his 'new way forward' in Iraq with a barrage of denunciation. … This show of Republican opposition prompted comparisons with Richard Nixon during the Vietnam era. 'Republican support for the president is draining rapidly,' said a party strategist. 'It is almost unheard of for Republicans to criticise a Republican president at war so soon after he has made an appeal for support.'"

DOJ_NMG_0115582

The Washington Times (1/12, Hurt, Ward, 88K) reports "Republican leaders on Capitol Hill staunchly back…Bush's proposal…but support among the party's rank and file may be crumbling. 'At this late stage, interjecting more young American troops into the crossfire of an Iraqi civil war is simply not the right approach,' Rep. Ric Keller, a Florida Republican who has been steadfastly supportive of the war, said on the House floor yesterday. 'We are not going to solve an Iraqi political problem with an American military solution.'" And the Los Angeles Times (1/12, Neuman, 850K) notes GOP Sen. George Voinovich, "who until now has supported the war, said he no longer believes the civil war in Iraq can be tamed by sending more US troops to aid in the fight."

Nonetheless, says the Wall Street Journal (1/12, A4, Dreazen, King, 2.04M), "White House officials calculate that Democrats will be stymied by practical problems, legislative maneuvering and internal divisions in their attempt to prevent the administration from sending 21,500 more soldiers -- and more money -- to Iraq. 'There are a lot of divisions among the Democrats, and you see them tiptoeing around it because they understand the consequences of such a vote,' White House Counselor Dan Bartlett said during a trip with Mr. Bush, who was pushing his case for sending new forces to Iraq in a speech to hundreds of soldiers on this military base." In an analysis piece, the AP (1/12, Espo) says Democrats face "a delicate mission," but "for the first time since the war began" they "have public opinion on their side -- and know it for sure."

On ABC World News (1/11, story 3, 2:05, 8.78M), George Stephanopoulos said "it does look like Congress has the votes to pass" a symbolic resolution condemning Bush's new plan, and "they are likely to do that the week of the State of the Union. I asked a White House official about this, and he said they won't fight it, he seemed resigned. He said if they have the votes, they have the votes. But is also puts burden on the opponents, he said, to come up with a plan that will work. And the White House also sees a silver lining in what was a very tough day on Capitol Hill. They believe that the more pressure that comes from Capitol Hill, the more pressure that will put on the Iraqis to actually get their act together." Nonetheless, the Washington Times (1/12, Hurt, Ward, 88K) reports Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell yesterday "hinted that Senate Republicans would filibuster any resolution by Democrats expressing disapproval of the war in Iraq or Mr. Bush's plan to add more than 21,000 troops to the battlefield."

The Washington Post (1/12, A1, Abramowitz, Weisman, 690K) reports Democrats and Republicans "alike said they are concerned that Bush's plan…is too little and too late and does not appear very different from previous efforts to secure the capital." The "ferocity of the congressional condemnation dismayed the White House," in what the Post calls "further indication that the new Democratic Congress is headed toward a series of potentially epic clashes and floor votes over the conduct and funding of the nearly four-year-old war." Rice "appeared to be on the receiving end of the toughest grilling yesterday, before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee" where "not a single senator from either party expressed support for the president's plan, many posed hostile questions, and others expressed deep doubt about the Bush administration's premise of creating a viable democracy in the heart of the Middle East." However, Rice "maintained her composure throughout the hearing."

On NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 3, 2:00, 9.87M), Tim Russert said the hearing "took on the form of a revival meeting where Democrats who had voted for the war were seeking redemption with their Democratic base. About 90% of Democrats believed going into Iraq was the wrong thing to do. You couple that with Republicans. There are 21 Republican senators up for reelection in 2008. Four of them have already come out against the President's plan. They understand the perils of this war in terms of taking it to the voters."

ABC World News (1/11, lead story, Vargus, 8.78M) showed several US Senators' reactions to the President's plan. Sen. Joseph Biden called the plan "a tragic mistake." Sen. Christopher Dodd said: "A fool's paradise describes nothing as aptly as our Iraq policy today." However, ABC (Tapper) said, "Most notable, the disapproval of Republican Senators, including Vietnam veteran Chuck Hagel," who called the plan "the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam." But Secretary Rice "said the problem is not just the resolve of the Iraqi government to provide security, but its ability to do so, which is why more troops are needed." But Rice "found few supporters today. … She was challenged as to why she believes so many Americans are being killed in Iraq." Similarly, the CBS Evening News (1/11, story 2, Borger, 7.66M) said the President "may have been trying to reignite support for his Iraq strategy, but instead, he sparked a bipartisan rebellion on Capitol Hill." While Bush "no doubt expected a fight with Democrats over Iraq, but after his speech, some of the harshest criticism came from his own party" with "as many as a dozen Republican senators" that "could jump ship."

DOJ_NMG_0115583

NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 2, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Make no mistake…members of Congress…are clearly frustrated by the President's war policies and some who want his job for that matter, took direct aim at some of the President's top people." NBC (Reid) added, "Anger, there's plenty of that around here, especially among Democrats and as for ambition, one hearing here in the Senate felt like a run-up to the 2008 Presidential campaign. At times the Senate foreign relations hearing room was like a firing range for aspiring Presidential candidates."

The AP (1/12, Raum) says the President's plan "ran into a wall of criticism on Capitol Hill on Thursday as administration officials drew confrontational, sometimes mocking challenges from both Democrats and Republicans." During appearances on the Hill, Defense Secretary Robert Gates and Secretary Rice "found themselves embroiled in the first pitched exchanges in a battle that is likely to dominate Congress for months or longer and is already shaping the 2008 presidential election." In testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and in the afternoon before the House counterpart, Rice was "grilled sharply by members of both parties," with "not a single member of the Senate panel" expressing "outright support for the president's plan." For her part, Rice "acknowledged widespread skepticism among Americans" and engaged in "several tense exchanges with members, including with Hagel."

The Washington Times (1/12, Kralev, 88K) reports Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "promised to give the new plan careful consideration, but he said on the Senate floor, 'In choosing to escalate the war, the president virtually stands alone.' Many of the Senate panel's Republicans also were critical, including Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, John E. Sununu of New Hampshire and Lisa Murkowski of Alaska." USA Today (1/12, Slavin, 2.27M) runs a similar report.

In a separate report, the AP (1/12, Woodward) reports Secretary Rice "found herself at the intersection of anger and ambition" as "five presidential aspirants on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, as well as other up-and-comers in the new Democratic majority…made sure their voices were heard." The AP notes that "even Rice's status as a single woman was fair game" as Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., "noted Rice has no children of her own to lose overseas." Sen. Boxer continued her criticism of Rice during an appearance on PBS' NewsHour (1/11, Warner), saying, "I can speak for the entire committee -- except for just a few -- she did not make the case."

Under the headline "Rice, A Uniter Of The Divided," the Washington Post (1/12, A1, 690K), Dana Milbank writes in a front-page "Washington Sketch" column that "within minutes" of Secretary Rice's arrival on Capitol Hill yesterday, "it became apparent that the Bush administration had, after four divisive years, finally succeeded in uniting Congress on the war in Iraq. Unfortunately for Rice, the lawmakers were unified in opposition to President Bush's new policy." The Post calls Rice's appearance "a bipartisan scolding of the sort rarely seen in the Bush presidency," but said Rice "endured it, for the most part, with quiet indignation," staring "expressionlessly at her tormentors or looked down at the table."

The New York Times (1/12, A1, Shanker, Cloud, 1.16M) says the reception Rice received on the Hill suggested that Bush's plan "had done little to build political support for sending additional troops to Baghdad." During their testimony, Gates and Rice "declined to specify a time limit on the troop increase and were cautious about predicting rapid improvements in security in Baghdad…saying progress is likely to come gradually."

The New York Times (1/12, Kornblut, 1.16M), under the headline "Devastating Criticism On Iraq By Both Parties," describes the tone on Capitol Hill yesterday as "courteous, serious -- and devastating." And "perhaps surprisingly, the language changed little when it was" Republicans who addressed the war issue. The Times adds, "On a committee renowned for its bipartisanship and restraint, the questioning on Thursday, the day after a major presidential address on Iraq, amounted to a powerful blast."

Sen. Barbara Boxer said on PBS' NewsHour (1/11, Warner), "I can speak for the entire committee -- except for just a few -- she did not make the case. And the committee view was skeptical, at best, and outright in opposition, I would say, if you really look at what everybody said. And when you have the second-most-senior Republican on the committee saying, and I quote, that the surge is 'the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam,' if it's carried out -- that's Senator Hagel -- that, to me, is the strongest of signals to this Administration to change course and not go forward with this."

DOJ_NMG_0115584

Sen. Lindsay Graham said on PBS' NewsHour (1/11, Warner), "I think the Bush Administration has earned skepticism, to be honest with you. If anybody believes the war has gone well in the last couple years -- well, just no one believes that. ... Before we act in Congress condemning a new strategy designed to secure victory -- not in what I think is a Vietnam, but a battlefront in World War III of extremism versus moderation -- I'd just ask the Congress to listen to" Gen. Petraeus, "who's been assigned the mission, who believes in the mission, who's the architect of the new strategy, and give him a chance to articulate why he thinks he could be successful, what he needs, and ask him the hard questions before we act."

Sen. Gordon Smith said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/11, Matthews), "I didn't realize it at the time, but the speech that I gave really broke the dam of Republican frustration that many of my colleagues have been feeling. And I do think it is time for the Congress to reassert itself and try and more narrowly focus our efforts, the American efforts, in the war on terror. ... What we have to do as we fight the war on terror more intelligently is to keep the mechanisms of the state of Iraq from falling into the hands of al Qaeda or Iran -- and I'm not proposing an attack on Iran. But all of the nation-building that we have been doing, frankly, I have concluded that it is Iraq's nation to build. ... We need to focus on who the real enemy is and it's not the work of the street cop. It is our taking out jihadists who would bring chaos into Iraq or export it to neighbors or our country. What we did in Somalia the other day is the way we ought to be taking on terrorism, on our terms, with our technology, with our firepower. These are the real enemies but, frankly, we cannot want democracy for Iraq more than Iraqis want it for themselves."

Sen. John Kerry said on CNN's Your World Today (1/11, Clancy), "Last night, the President said mistakes had been made. He didn't say they were his. And he accepted responsibility for those mistakes. He didn't say, 'I made mistakes.' So there is a distinction. ... What was absent from the President's speech last night, regrettably, was the political solution, the diplomatic political solution that is critical to ending the violence. The President, the Secretary of State, the former Secretary of Defense, our generals, have all said that this can not be resolve military. And yet all you heard last night was really the military piece of this."

Dodd said on CNN's The Situation Room (1/11, Blitzer), "I'd certainly be willing to use the power of the purse to help us change direction and a different mission for our troops there. I would not be prepared to the cut off funding to our troops on the ground in Iraq, even though I disagree on the surge. I think we ought to be voting on that before they go rather then have them on the ground there and then cutting off the resources for them."

Sen. Jeff Sessions said on Fox News' Your World (1/11, Cavuto), "We are worried about the success in Iraq. Even this improvement -- I think it will be an improvement. I think it does enhance our ability to be successful. But there is no guarantee. This is a tough battle. ... And the Iraqis are going to have to step up."

House Homeland Security Chairman Bennie Thompson said on Fox News' Your World (1/11, Cavuto), "I'm not interested in stopping it. I want the President to do more than a 20-minute speech as to why we need to escalate this surge effort in Iraq."

Rep. Marsha Blackburn said on Fox News' Your World (1/11, Cavuto), "I was so pleased to hear the President say last night, and I was relieved to hear him say, we need to be listening to the commanders in the field and the troops on the ground. ... They know what we need to do in order to win."

Giuliani, Gingrich Say Iraqi Civil Society Must Be Established. In a Wall Street Journal (1/12, A13, 2.04M) op-ed, Rudy Giuliani and Newt Gingrich write, "The American mission in Iraq must succeed. Our goal -- promoting a stable, accountable democracy in the heart of the Middle East -- cannot be achieved by purely military means. Iraqis need to establish a civil society. Without the support of mediating civic and social associations -- the informal ties that bind us together -- no government can long remain stable and no cohesive nation can be maintained. To establish a civil society, Iraqis must rebuild their basic infrastructure. Iraqis must take control of their destiny by rebuilding houses, stores, schools, roads, highways, mosques and churches. ... A massive effort must be made to engage in a well organized plan to rebuild Iraq. The goal: an infrastructure to support and encourage a strong, stable civil society."

DOJ_NMG_0115585

Rice To Seek Support For Bush Plan In Mideast Trip. The Washington Post (1/12, A14, Kessler, 690K) reports with Bush's plan "facing blistering criticism at home," Secretary Rice departs today on "another difficult sales mission: winning the support of Arabs for the Iraq plan and seeking momentum for a renewed push on Middle East peace." Noting the "stakes could not be higher" for the trip, the Post notes that Rice "sees the turmoil as offering opportunity." Meanwhile, former Rice advisor Philip Zelikow "said the new effort has 'three big pillars,' including a comprehensive effort in the Middle East to win support for the Iraqi government and rallying the region to stand up to the extremism of Iran and al-Qaeda." But Rice's aides "have tried to lower expectations for this round of diplomacy, saying she was mainly hoping to listen to ideas." An administration official yesterday "denied a report in the upcoming issue of Time magazine that Rice had joined with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni in a bid to put aside a previous peace plan known as the 'road map' and leap right to final-status talks to bolster Abbas."

In its "Washington Wire" online column, the Wall Street Journal (1/12, Harwood, 2.04M) reports Rice "may speak on Afghanistan on coming overseas trip, while State and Pentagon team up to seek $6 billion for added Afghan troop training, border protection, road building and other projects. But they face pushback from Bush budgeteers, who aim to cut those figures in half."

In an editorial, the Washington Post (1/12, A18, 690K) says Rice's tour of the region "is beginning today looks like a sideshow." Since her trip will not include "two of Iraq's neighbors, Iran and Syria, as well as the two countries that now stand in the way of progress in the Palestinian territories and in Lebanon -- again, Iran and Syria -- it's hard to see how her diplomacy can accomplish much." The Post notes that "there are ways in which the administration could step up its diplomatic efforts on Iraq." For example, the US "should support" and "join in" a "proposed a regional conference in Baghdad" put forth by the Iraqi government. The Post notes that "regional diplomacy will not solve Iraq's problems. An Israeli-Palestinian settlement will not cause sectarian warriors in Baghdad to disarm. But given the seriousness of the situation, the administration is foolish not to use every resource at its disposal. Mr. Bush is already pursuing strategies on the ground in Iraq that look like long shots; he should be willing to take more diplomatic chances, as well."

Plan Gets Tepid Welcome In Baghdad, Criticism Elsewhere In Mideast. The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Stack, Ellingwood, 850K) reports, "In ordering more American soldiers into Iraq," President Bush "said he was sending a message of hope to millions of Arabs and Afghans trapped in violence. But to many on the ground in the Mideast, the speech spoke volumes of a disconnect between US promises and a turbulent reality." The Bush Administration "has portrayed the invasion of Iraq as a boost, albeit painful, for Arab democracy and human rights. Victory in Baghdad would bring a brighter era to the entire region, U.S. officials have promised." But "after waves of outrage over torture in Abu Ghraib; the spectacle of Saddam Hussein's trial and execution; and religious slaughter in the streets of Baghdad, few people in the region can articulate what, exactly, the United States is trying to accomplish."

The AP (1/12, Karimi) notes Iran and Syria denounced the US plan. Another AP story (1/12, Mroue) says "the Iraqi government spokesman chided the United States, Iran and Syria on Thursday for using his country as a political battleground, saying "we pay the price for the tension" between the three rivals and urging them to improve their relations." The spokesman's comments "came as Iraq's government welcomed President Bush's new strategy and promised it was committed to making sure it succeeds. Ordinary Iraqis, however, gave it mixed reviews, with many expressing skepticism that an increase in US troops would quell the violence ransacking their country." The New York Times (1/12, Burns, Tavernise, 1.16M) runs a similar report titled "In Baghdad, Bush Policy Is Met With Resentment," in which it refers to a "grudging endorsement" of the plan from the Iraqi government. The Washington Times/AP (1/12, Abdul-Zahra) reports on Iraqi reaction in a story headlined "Bush Plan Receives Tepid Baghdad OK."

Blair Says Bush Plan "Makes Sense." AFP (1/12, Haddon) reports, "Prime Minister Tony Blair said that…Bush's policy switch in Iraq 'makes sense', while his foreign minister stressed it did not necessarily herald 'a change of direction' from London.

Gates Proposes Adding 92,000 To Army, Marine Active Forces. The Washington Post (1/12, A14, Tyson, White, 690K) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates "proposed adding 92,000 troops to the Army and Marine Corps, initiating the biggest increase in U.S. ground forces since the 1960s to shore up a military that top officers warn is on the verge of breaking from prolonged fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan." The "permanent increase of 65,000 soldiers and 27,000 Marines would cost more than $10 billion annually and take five years to achieve, underscoring the Pentagon's conviction that today's wars and anti-terrorism operations will endure for many years. 'We call those 'long war' forces,' a senior military official said." The CBS Evening News (1/11, story 5, :20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Under his plan, the number of active-duty Army troops would jump from about 512,000 to 547,000. The Army is already adding recruiters to meet their goal. Active-duty Marines could increase from 180,000 to 202,000."

DOJ_NMG_0115586

The Washington Times (1/12, Scarborough, 88K) says that while "an increase in 'end strength,' as the military's active force is called, is not directly related to President Bush's announced new Iraq strategy, it is an outgrowth of the nearly four-year-old war. The stress of deploying Marine and Army ground forces with little rest back home has begun to tear at the fabric of the 1.4 million active force, senior retired officers said."

Pentagon To Recall Army National Guard Units. The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Spiegel, 850K) reports the Defense Department announced plans "to recall Army National Guard units that have already fought in Iraq to serve second tours in the war, reversing a long-standing policy that allowed guardsmen to return home for five years before being redeployed. No new Guard units have been included in the first wave of forces going to Iraq" as part of President Bush's troop increase, and Defense Secretary Robert Gates "insisted the change in policy was made independently of the Iraq buildup. But other Pentagon officials have acknowledged that additional Guard and Army Reserve units are essential to sustaining Bush's increase in combat forces in Iraq over the course of the year." The New York Times (1/12, Cloud, 1.16M) says "the new rules mean that individual Guard members and entire units that have already been deployed in the last five years may be called up again for as long as 24 consecutive months, officials said." However, Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace said the Pentagon "intends to try to limit future mobilizations to no more than a year."

Britain Plans To Proceed With Iraq Troop Cuts. The New York Times (1/12, Cowell, 1.16M) reports the UK, "which had been America's closest and most pliant ally in Iraq, said Thursday that it would not follow the United States in raising troop levels there and signaled that it would proceed with plans to hand over security responsibilities to Iraqi forces in the south." Britain "has about 7,000 troops in Iraq. ... Officials here dismissed as speculation, though, a report in The Daily Telegraph on Thursday that those numbers would be cut by 3,000 before the end of May."

Intelligence Officials Offer "Bleak Assessment" Of World Conflict Zones. The Washington Post (1/12, A12, Linzer, Pincus, 690K) reports Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte told Congress Thursday that Iraq "is at a violent and 'precarious juncture,' while al-Qaeda is significantly expanding its global reach, effectively immune to the loss of leaders in battle." Negroponte "also warned that the Taliban is mounting a vigorous insurgency in Afghanistan, that Pakistan has become a safe haven for top terrorists and that Iran's growing regional power is threatening Middle East stability. In their annual worldwide threat assessment before the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Negroponte and other top intelligence chiefs provided a bleak assessment of regions and conflicts at the center of President Bush's foreign policy agenda."

The New York Times (1/12, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports Negroponte "spoke of the 'shadow' that Iran was casting across the Middle East and warned members of Congress that Iran could be emboldened to dispatch Hezbollah operatives to attack American targets. Intelligence officials have long assumed that Iran's primary goal in Iraq was establishing a weak, but viable, state dominated by Shiites." But Negroponte suggested Iran's "steady arms shipments into Iraq, which American military officials say they have documented, and the political manipulation of Iraqi Shiite politicians could signal that Iran is trying to worsen the sectarian war and anarchy there, rather than seeking relative stability." The Washington Times (1/12, Gertz, 88K) says Negroponte said in Iraq, "'sectarian divisions are widening,' despite efforts by the new government."

Rice Names Carney As New Iraq Reconstruction Chief. The New York Times (1/12, A1, Shanker, Cloud, 1.16M) notes briefly that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced Thursday that Timothy Carney, "a retired Foreign Service officer who served as a senior civilian American authority in Iraq for three months in 2003, is the new coordinator for Iraq reconstruction." In announcement Carney's appointment, AFP (1/12) reports Rice said, "Our military operations must be fully supported and integrated with our civilian and diplomatic efforts across the entire US Government to help Iraqis clear, hold and build throughout all of Iraq." Carney will oversee the "enhanced" so-called Provincial Reconstruction Teams (PRT) from Baghdad, she said, noting that the former diplomat has "experience in post-conflict stabilization and reconstruction and development" from his time in Haiti.

DOJ_NMG_0115587

US-Led Forces Detain Six Iranians At Office In Northern Iraq. The AP (1/11, Abdul-Zahra) reports, "U.S.-led multinational forces detained six Iranians Thursday at an Iranian government office in the northern city of Irbil, Iraqi officials said, as President Bush accused Iran and Syria of aiding militants and promised to 'interrupt' the flow of support as part of his new war strategy." The New York Times (1/12, Glanz, 1.16M) says the raid "was the second surprise seizure of Iranians by the American military in Iraq in recent weeks and came a day after President Bush bluntly warned Iran to quit meddling in Iraqi affairs. There was a tense standoff later in the day between the American soldiers and about 100 Kurdish troops, who surrounded the American armored vehicles for about two hours in this northern Iraqi city."

ABC World News (1/11, story 5, :25, Vargus, 8.78M) reported, "The President vowed to interrupt what he called Iran's support of militants in Iraq. As he spoke US troops staged secret raids in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil, seizing at least five Iranians with computers and documents from an Iranian government outpost." McClatchy (1/12, Landay, Youssef) reports, "In Washington, several senior Democratic and Republic lawmakers expressed alarm that Bush's plan to interdict alleged support for Iraqi insurgents could lead to secret military strikes inside Iran and Syria." Sen. Joseph Biden "warned that such action would require congressional approval," while Sen. Chuck Hagel "called the policy 'very, very dangerous.'"

Pentagon "Intensifying Operations" Against Iranian Actions In Iraq. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, A4, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "Even as President Bush seeks larger numbers of troops to stabilize Iraq, the Pentagon is intensifying operations there on another front: challenging Iran over its alleged role in destabilizing its Arab neighbor." The Pentagon "has significantly increased its intelligence activities targeting suspected Iranian agents and Shiite Muslim militants, U.S. intelligence officials said. Besides working with Iraqi security forces, the U.S. has intensified information-sharing with dissident Iranian groups such as Mujahedin-e Khalq." The Washington Post (1/12, A16, Wright, Trejos, 690K) also reports on the "new U.S. intelligence and military operation launched last month against Iran." The US "is trying to identify and detain top officials of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards' al-Quds Brigade operating in Iraq," which "is active in arming, training and funding militant movements, such as Lebanon's Hezbollah."

NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 4, 1:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "In last night's speech the President also put Iran and Syria on notice. Promising US military action to destroy their ability to arm and train the insurgents and the militias operating in Iraq." NBC (Miklaszewski) added, "One senior Administration official told us, when it comes to Iran, the US is taking off the gloves. In fact only two hours before the President's speech last night, American soldiers rounded up six Iranians in northern Iraq. Iran claims they're diplomats. The US says they're members of Iran's Revolutionary Guard, responsible for killing American soldiers. The new aggressive military strategy is aimed at stopping the flow of sophisticated IED's from Iran into Iraq. Now, those roadside bombs are the number-one killers of Americans in the war. And despite all that, US military officials insist there are still no active plans to launch military strikes inside Iran."

Snow Says "Nobody Here Is Talking About Attacks On Iran." White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/11, Matthews), "Nobody here is talking about attacks on Iran. ... Most Americans understand Iran is the foremost financier here of global terror. It's a problem. But you don't deal with everything militarily, as you know. The United States exhausted all diplomatic options before going into Iraq."

Kerry Would Oppose Strike Against Iran's Nuclear Facilities. Asked on CNN's Your World Today (1/11, Clancy) if he would "support a strike on Iran's nuclear facilities, knowing it could open up a new front with Iran," Sen. John Kerry said, "No, I think that that would be a very bad idea right now. That is not the first option of what we should engage in with respect to Iran. I certainly wouldn't be against a hot pursuit. If we catch people coming across the border, or they're firing on our troops, or they're engaging directly and unsettling Iraq, and we catch that, I think we have a right to respond to it. But I think a proactive effort that at this time, starts to think militarily, with respect to Iran, is wrong-headed and dangerous."

DOJ_NMG_0115588

WSJournal Says "It's About Time" US Acted. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, 2.04M) editorializes that the US "has known for years that Syria and Iran are supporting Sunni insurgents and Shiite radicals in Iraq -- support that has taken a heavy toll in American lives. On Wednesday, President Bush finally suggested he'll do something about it. ... It's about time, and we hope the Administration keeps showing Tehran that it will pay a price for continued subversion in Iraq."

US, Iraqi Forces Find "Little Evidence" Of Massing Insurgents In Diyala. The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Zavis, 850K) reports US and Iraqi forces found "little evidence of the fighters they believed might be massing" in Diyala province "for a final stand as a joint offensive against a reputed safe haven and training ground for Sunni Arab insurgents entered its eighth day. U.S. forces said that in the last week, they had already killed at least 90 gunmen spotted maneuvering in the area or planting explosives in the road as nearly 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi government troops closed in and blocked escape routes. Seven more were reported killed Thursday as they advanced on U.S. and Iraqi forces on the outskirts of Turki, the main village in the area." US Capt. Stephen Dobbins said, "I think we killed the people that were going to fight."

"Chemical Ali" Tells Court He Ordered Kurdish Executions In 1988. The New York Times (1/12, Times, 1.16M) reports Ali Hassan al-Majid, the cousin of Saddam Hussein known as "Chemical Ali," testified in a Baghdad court that he "had ordered troops to execute all 'saboteurs' who defied government orders to abandon Kurdish villages in northern Iraq during a military operation in 1988. ... After listening to audio recordings that showed him issuing instructions in his role as overseer of the campaign against the Kurds, Mr. Majid rose to tell the judges that he was responsible for ordering executions in the villages. 'I gave orders to the troops to catch anyone they find there and execute them after investigating them,' he said."

Afghan Insurgent Says His Fighters Helped Bin Laden, Zawahiri Escape Tora Bora. The AP (1/11, Jan) reports former Afghan Prime Minister Gulbuddin Hekmatyar said in a television interview that his insurgent fighters helped Osama bin Laden "escape intense U.S. bombing in the Tora Bora mountains in 2001." Hekmatyar said "some of his fighters moved bin Laden, his deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri and other associates to 'a safe place' where he met them later. He did not say where they found the shelter. Bin Laden and al-Zawahiri are believed to be still hiding along the Afghan-Pakistan border after the heavy U.S. pounding failed to kill them or lead to their capture."

Afghan, NATO Troops Kill Up To 150 Insurgents Entering From Pakistan. The New York Times (1/12, Wafa, 1.16M) reports, "Afghan and NATO troops clashed with a large group of insurgents crossing from Pakistan into eastern Afghanistan in the early morning hours on Thursday. NATO said up to 150 insurgents might have been killed in the fighting. Two large groups of insurgents were spotted gathering on the Pakistan side of the border and were tracked as they crossed into Afghanistan," and Afghan and NATO troops "laid an ambush for the groups about half a mile inside Afghanistan, using air and ground forces, said Gen. Zahir Azimi, a spokesman for the Afghan Ministry of Defense."

The Washington Post (1/12, A10, Constable, 690K) says the "confrontation in Paktika province, described as the largest battle in Afghanistan since September, came as American and U.N. officials step up pressure on both Pakistani and Afghan leaders to stop their public bickering and do more to gain control of their respective border areas, where Islamic insurgents have been operating for months." The Christian Science Monitor (1/12, Montero, 59K) says the attack "is likely to bolster mounting international claims that Pakistan's tribal zone is a staging ground for attacks inside Afghanistan."

DOJ:

Congressional Budget Delays Hit DOJ Agencies With Hiring Freeze. The AP (1/12, Jordan) reports, "A hiring freeze has hit two federal crime fighting agencies and a third has slowed its recruitment efforts because of congressional budget delays that some officials say threaten efforts to combat terrorism and violent crime." The AP continues, "The hiring crunch is largely the result of Congress' failure to approve the Justice Department's 2007 spending request. Lawmakers who oversee spending bills are now negotiating how much -- if at all -- to increase government spending. In the meantime, the agencies are being funded according to last year's budget levels." The AP adds, "Justice Department agencies feeling the squeeze are: … The Drug Enforcement Agency. A hiring freeze is expected to last through 2007, said chief financial officer Frank Kalder. Although more than 400 agents and support staff are expected to quit or retire this year, Kalder said the DEA might have to furlough additional employees if Congress does not give it about $95 million more than it did in 2006. Layoffs are not being considered. … The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. The agency is "not hiring and are not back-filling open positions," said spokeswoman Sheree Mixell. The ATF says it needs $71 million more than last year just to sustain its workforce of 4,900 employees. … The FBI. Recruiting and hiring has slowed since the budget year began on Oct. 1. The agency has stopped advertising for job openings on its Web site. Assistant Director John Miller said the bureau still is hiring agents, linguists, analysts and other high-priority employees."

DOJ_NMG_0115589

San Diego US Attorney Asked To Resign. The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/12, Thornton, Soto) reports, "The Bush administration has quietly asked San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam, best known for her high-profile prosecutions of politicians and corporate executives, to resign her post, a law enforcement official said." The Union-Tribune continues, "Lam, a Bush appointee who took the helm in 2002, was targeted because of job performance issues – in particular that she failed to make smuggling and gun cases a top priority, said the official, who declined to be identified because Lam has yet to step down." The Union-Tribune adds, "Lam has had high-profile successes during her tenure, such as the Randy 'Duke' Cunningham bribery case – but she alienated herself from bosses at the Justice Department because she is outspoken and independent, said local lawyers familiar with her policies. … When she took over, Lam made it clear that she planned to focus less on low-level smuggling cases in favor of public corruption and white collar crime, which would mean fewer but more significant prosecutions. … Lam declined to comment yesterday." The Union-Tribune notes, "Lam, 47, has been criticized by members of the Border Patrol agents union and by members of Congress, including Vista Republican Darrell Issa, who accused her office of 'an appalling record of refusal to prosecute even the worst criminal alien offenders.'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

US Probing Apple Stock Option Grant To Jobs. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, A3, Stecklow, Wingfield) reports, "Federal authorities are actively investigating a backdated stock-option grant awarded to Steve Jobs, Apple Inc.'s chief executive, that carried a false October 2001 date, people familiar with the matter say." The Journal continues, "Apple recently disclosed that records were 'improperly' created to claim that the grant was approved at a special board meeting that month. But no board meeting took place then. … Investigators are now focusing on the grant to Mr. Jobs for 7.5 million options that were finalized in December 2001, when Apple's share price was higher. The false dating increased the value of the grant to Mr. Jobs, and resulted in a retroactive $20 million charge to Apple's earnings when it was discovered by a special internal investigation." The Journal adds, "People familiar with the matter say the false documentation was created by an Apple attorney named Wendy Howell, whom the company quietly dismissed last month. Ms. Howell contends that Apple's general counsel at the time, Nancy Heinen, instructed her to create the false documentation, these people say. Thomas Carlucci, Ms. Howell's attorney, said that while at Apple 'Ms. Howell acted as instructed by Apple management and with the company's best interest being paramount.' … Ms. Heinen left Apple in May for reasons that were unrelated to backdated options, a person familiar with the matter says. Her attorney, Cristina C. Arguedas, says Ms. Heinen didn't knowingly engage in any wrongdoing and denies she instructed Ms. Howell to falsify documentation. Ms. Arguedas said in a statement that 'each of the option grants involving Ms. Heinen was authorized and approved by her superiors.'" The Journal notes, "Investigators with the Securities and Exchange Commission, working with federal prosecutors, are seeking to question Ms. Howell and Ms. Heinen, but neither has agreed to questioning so far, say people familiar with the matter. … Authorities want to speak to Fred Anderson, Apple's former chief financial officer. It also remains unclear whether Mr. Anderson, who resigned from Apple's board in October, will agree to talk."

Broadcom To Restate Financial Data To Include Misdated Stock Option Costs. Bloomberg (1/12, Brennan, Fishkin) reports, "Broadcom

DOJ_NMG_0115590

Corp., a maker of chips for consumer devices, will shortly issue financial restatements to include over $1.5 billion of costs for the misdating of stock options, Chief Executive Officer Scott McGregor said. … 'Hopefully that will put most of this behind us,' McGregor said during an interview yesterday at the Consumer Electronics Show in Las Vegas. He wasn't more specific on when the company would restate its results." Bloomberg continues, "The company is examining 6 million pages of documents to assess the impact of stock-option backdating, a practice that can enrich recipients by setting option dates to a time when the underlying stock traded lower. Broadcom Chief Financial Officer William Ruehl resigned in September, and the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission opened a formal investigation last month." Bloomberg adds, "McGregor originally said the restatements would be ready by the end of 2006. On Dec. 18, the company said it would report amended results for 2005 and the first quarter of 2006 by this month. Broadcom also hasn't issued full results for the second and third quarters. The delays have put the company in danger of delisting by the Nasdaq Stock Market. … Broadcom last month said the SEC had opened a formal investigation into its stock options. That means the agency may subpoena current and former executives. McGregor said he and his executives haven't yet been summoned. … The U.S. Justice Department and the company are conducting their own probes into Broadcom's option grants."

Former Siemens CFO Named As Suspect In Bribery Probe. The Financial Times (1/12, Milne) reports, "The investigation into the €420m bribery scandal at Siemens reached the highest level yet on Thursday as the company's former chief financial officer was named as a suspect." The Times continues, "The investigation of Heinz-Joachim Neubürger, who stepped down in April after being passed over as chief executive of Europe's largest engineering group, came as the current head of Siemens, Klaus Kleinfeld, warned that the probe threatened the company's survival." The Times adds, "The scandal has shaken the German group to the core and raised questions about the competence of its management. It has led to calls for the resignation of its chairman, Heinrich von Pierer, and has disrupted one of its most important joint ventures, a €20bn (£13.3bn) telecommunications tie-up with Nokia. … Mr Neubürger is under suspicion of knowing about some of the bribery and doing nothing about it. He is also alleged to have tried to influence KPMG, Siemens' accountants, from investigating a payment irregularity that could have been a bribe."

NYSE Probing Former Merrill Brokers In Timing Case. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, C2, Juan) reports, "Regulators at the New York Stock Exchange are investigating three former Merrill Lynch & Co. brokers who were ousted by the company in 2003 for allegedly helping a hedge fund trade improperly in mutual funds." The Journal continues, "In its monthly listing of disciplinary actions, the exchange said it fined former UBS AG branch manager John Borgese $50,000 for failing to supervise three unnamed financial advisers involved in mutual-fund market timing in 2001. The document also said a disciplinary action had begun against the advisers." The Journal adds, "The three are Christopher Chung, Kevin Brunnock and William Savino, people close to the investigation said. The brokers worked at UBS's Paramus, N.J., office before joining Merrill Lynch in January 2002. … The New Jersey Bureau of Securities revoked the licenses of the trio, known as the CBS Group, in March 2005 for engaging in deceptive practices related to rapid buying and selling of mutual funds, known as market timing. … The practice, aimed at reaping fleeting gains, isn't necessarily illegal, but regulators claim the conduct is inconsistent with just and equitable principles of trading. Critics also have said the practice can hurt returns for long-term fund investors."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Fitzgerald Case Against Libby "Seemingly Weakened." The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Perez, 2.04M) reports Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald's "case against Lewis 'Scooter' Libby goes to trial next week seemingly weakened by revelations that Mr. Fitzgerald knew early in his CIA-leak probe that the ex-White House official wasn't the original source of news-media disclosures." Fitzgerald's "success will depend largely on how well he can keep the jury focused on his charge that Mr. Libby 'knowingly lied' to federal agents during his probe into the leak of former Central Intelligence Agency operative Valerie Plame's identity." Other "recent perjury cases, including the successful prosecution of Martha Stewart on charges of lying to investigators about a stock sale, offer a road map narrowly directing a case amid heavy media attention and myriad distractions."

DOJ_NMG_0115591

Puerto Rico DOJ Asks Court To Order Release Of FBI Raid Documents. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/12, Vargas) reports, "Puerto Rico's Justice Department asked a U.S. appeals court on Thursday to force the FBI to release information about its two raids against militant independence advocates in the U.S. Caribbean territory. … Puerto Rico's Justice Secretary Roberto Sanchez Ramos alleged that bureau officials have stonewalled his investigations into the raids and he has asked Congress to pressure the agency to cooperate. He said the FBI has refused to disclose the identities of the agents who participated. In September, U.S. District Court Judge Jose Fuste ruled against the territory's Justice Department, saying the FBI did not have to share information it deemed sensitive." The AP notes, "The information on the raids could be shared under a confidentiality order if the agency was concerned about public disclosure, Antonetti said. If that was not possible, the panel must send the case back to Puerto Rico's district court, which should force the FBI to say why the information could not be released, he said."

Tennessee Waltz Trial Goes To Jury. WMC-TV Memphis (1/11) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "Both the government and the defense presented very strong closing arguments. Prosecutor Tim DiScenza told the jury that even if they believed what Calvin Williams said on the stand, he was still guilty of taking a bribe and extortion. Meanwhile, his defense attorney, Doris Randall-Holt, challenged the government's start witness, reminding jurors that Tim Willis was caught padding invoices at Shelby County Juvenile Court and that he cut a deal to stay out of jail. Now the jury must decide."

The Memphis Commercial Appeal (1/12, Buser, 163K) reports that before closing arguments yesterday, Williams "testified Thursday he had no influence over any commissioner, but in secretly recorded conversations played by prosecutors he boasted of working behind the scenes to help commissioners line up votes and arrange rewards. … The influence issue is expected to be a factor when a federal court jury begins deliberations at 9 this morning to determine whether a $1,500 payment Williams received in 2003 was a bribe for influencing passage of an urban renewal grant. Williams was recorded boasting that he would pay former commissioner Cleo Kirk to support the grant. Williams, who denied trying to influence Kirk or any other commissioner, contends the $1,500 he received in April 2003 was a legitimate business payment from former friend and political consultant Tim Willis, who was acting as an informant in the FBI's undercover public corruption investigation called the Tennessee Waltz."

Judge Delays Ford, Bowers Trials. The AP (1/12, Baird) reports, "A federal judge agreed Thursday to delay the public corruption trials of two former state senators charged with taking bribes during the FBI investigation called Tennessee Waltz. The trial of John Ford was rescheduled from Feb. 5 to April 9, and the trial of Kathryn Bowers was moved from April 16 to Sept. 10. Both are Democrats from Memphis. Judge J. Daniel Breen agreed that Ford's trial should be delayed to give defense lawyer Michael Scholl more time to review hundreds of hours of audio and video tapes secretly recorded by the FBI." The AP notes, "Ford is accused of taking $55,000 in bribes, while Bowers is charged with splitting $11,500 with an accomplice who has pleaded guilty to serving as a payoff bagman."

FBI Recovers Picasso Drawings Stolen From NYC Apartment. The AP (1/12, Long) reports New York City mover Nahum "Nino" Kohen "and his mother-in-law were arrested Thursday in the thefts of two Pablo Picasso drawings from an apartment after the owner died. The drawings, of a guitar and a mandolin, were worth more than $60,000 and were part of an extensive art collection owned by William Kingsland, who died in March, the city's Department of Investigation said." Manhattan public administrator's office investigators"traced the stolen drawings to Kohen after learning that his mother-in-law, Ori Lellouch, later tried to sell them, the DOI said. … The FBI had been investigating works of art from the collection that had been stolen years earlier and learned that an art broker had obtained one of the missing drawings from Lellouch, the DOI said." The AP adds, "Kohen's attorney said his client didn't steal the Picasso drawings, which were about 12 inches by 12 inches framed and have been recovered." Newsday (1/12, Dowdy) notes, "DOI investigators found out from the Federal Bureau of Investigation that FBI agents learned in November that Lellouch had tried to sell the drawings through a broker. FBI agents recovered the drawings from Lellouch."

The New York Sun (1/12, Shapiro) reports, "The Picassos add another layer of intrigue to an estate already under investigation. The FBI has been seeking leads on stolen works found in the estate, including a bust by Giacometti, two Fairfield Porter paintings, and at least two works belonging to Harvard, including a John Singleton Copley." The New York Times (1/12, Lueck, 1.16M) adds, "The apartment was 'chockablock with interesting treasures,' said Colin Stair of the Stair Galleries in Hudson, N.Y., who was hired by the public administrator to sell some of the lesser works in the apartment, including many watercolor-on-ivory miniature portraits. As it turned out, according to the F.B.I., many of the most important works had been stolen, although how Mr. Kohn obtained them remains unclear."

DOJ_NMG_0115592

Three Detained In Killing Of Tennessee Couple. The AP (1/12) reports from Knoxville, TN, "Three men were detained by police Thursday in the killing of a young man whose burned corpse was found dumped along railroad tracks and the slaying of his date, who was kept alive for days and raped, authorities said." The AP continues, "Channon Christian, a 21-year-old University of Tennessee student, and Christopher Newsom, 23, may have been carjacked Saturday night, Chief Deputy U.S. Marshal Rich Knighten said. … Newsom had been shot to death, and his burned body was found Sunday, Knighten said. … Christian's kidnappers raped and assaulted her for days before killing her and dumping the body, Knighten said." The AP adds, "Authorities detained Letalvis Cobbins, 24, and his friend, George Thomas, after federal agents and Knox County officers raided a house 180 miles north in Lebanon, Ky. … Thomas was being questioned Thursday, while Cobbins faced federal charges of being a felon in possession of a weapon, Knighten said."

US Raids Porn Studios To Enforce Age Rules. The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Hoffman) reports, "The Federal Bureau of Investigation has recently stepped up raids of porn studios in the San Fernando Valley, saying it wants to ensure that children are not being sexually exploited." The Times continues, "About a dozen porn production facilities in pornography hot spots such as Van Nuys and Chatsworth have been taken by surprise in the last three months by a barrage of federal agents at their doors. … The probes come on the heels of a May 2005 change in the regulations that require producers to take two forms of government-issued identification from performers and keep them on file indefinitely. Those records must be referred to on the labels of all videos and DVDs sold. Violations are federal felonies and can carry a prison sentence." The Times adds, "The Justice Department has prosecuted only one company to date under the new law, said Bryan Sierra, a spokesman for the department. In September, the founder of the 'Girls Gone Wild' video empire, Joe Francis, pleaded guilty to two felonies, and his production company pleaded guilty to 10 additional felony counts. … Industry leaders doubt that the FBI will find many other violators. Jeffrey J. Douglas, a criminal defense attorney and the chairman of the Free Speech Coalition, an industry trade organization, estimates that there have been only about a dozen occurrences of minors working in the industry in the last 25 years. … Public policy experts wonder whether the raids are the best use of taxpayer money. 'The FBI has limited what they investigate since 9/11, so moving into this area does raise the question of resources,' said Athan G. Theoharis, a professor emeritus of history at Marquette University who has written extensively on the FBI. 'Is this at the expense of investigating the Enrons or the WorldComs that have far more effect on the lives of American citizens?' … Theoharis said the crackdown on pornography hearkened back to the bureau's early days, when J. Edgar Hoover boosted the FBI's reputation with a high-profile campaign of prosecution against pornographers and prostitutes."

Pennsylvania Man Sentenced To 30 Months In Prison For Appraisal Fraud. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (1/12, Ward, 230K) reports, "A man who used his dead father's state license to do real estate appraisals that were sometimes inflated by more than 80 percent was sentenced yesterday to 30 months in prison. The prosecutor in the case had asked Senior U.S. District Judge Alan N. Bloch to give Chester Underhill…a stiffer penalty, claiming that the potential for loss in the case ranged into the tens of millions of dollars. … But because the government only did thorough reviews of about 15 of the approximately 1,500 appraisals Mr. Underhill performed, the judge refused to grant the enhancement." Assistant US Attorney Brendan Conway "estimated that it would have taken the FBI agent on the case two full years to review all the files. 'I didn't say it would be easy, but that's your burden,' the judge responded."

The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (1/12, Cato) adds, "'Every single reappraisal he'd done turned out to be significantly inflated,' FBI Special Agent Joseph Bieshelt testified." Conway "estimated that financial institutions could lose as much as $85 million because of Underhill's fraudulent appraisals." However, "Bloch did not agree with the government's figure. 'That might be so if the government had proof of the loss,' Bloch said, before determining the loss was about $560,000." The AP (1/12) also reports on Underhill's sentencing.

DOJ_NMG_0115593

Jury Hears Confession Of Man Charged With Killing New York Doctor. The Buffalo News (1/11, Beebe) reports, "A day after they heard James C. Kopp apologize to the widow of the man he is accused of killing, federal court jurors heard Kopp's own words Wednesday that he shot Dr. Barnett A. Slepian." The News continues, "Philip Sterlace, a stenographer in U.S. District Court, read back selected portions of a statement that Kopp made after his March 19, 2003, conviction in Erie County Court for the murder of Slepian. … '"On Oct. 23, judge, in 1998 late at night, I shot Dr. Slepian,"' Sterlace read aloud from the transcript of Kopp's statement. … The jury was not told why Kopp was addressing a judge in that statement, just as they were not told that Kopp was earlier convicted of murder." The News adds, "Sterlace's testimony, combined with today's subpoenaed testimony of Buffalo News reporter Dan Herbeck, who will be asked about Kopp's more detailed November 2002 confession to The News, should remove any mystery in jurors' minds about whether Kopp shot Slepian. … 'The only issue left is why he did what he did,' Kopp's standby counsel, John F. Humann, said outside the courtroom Wednesday." The News notes, "Once Sterlace finished his direct testimony, Kopp, representing himself, tried to show why he shot Slepian. … But as Kopp asked Sterlace during cross-examination to read parts of his County Court statement in which Kopp said he was trying to protect the unborn from abortion, Assistant U.S. Attorney Kathleen M. Mehltretter objected. … Judge Richard J. Arcara, who earlier had ruled that part of Kopp's statement inadmissible, told Kopp to move on to another subject. … Finally, after Kopp's third attempt to have Sterlace read the prohibited testimony, and the third sustained objection from the prosecution, Arcara excused the jury from the courtroom."

Rhode Island Mob Capo Sentenced To Five Years In Prison. The Providence Journal (1/12, Malinowski, 167K) reports, "Anthony M. 'The Saint' St. Laurent Sr., an ailing capo regime in the Patriarca crime family, was sentenced to nearly five years in federal prison yesterday for conspiring to extort $100,000 from two Massachusetts men. U.S. District Judge William E. Smith said that he was sympathetic to the mobster's medical woes, but he was clearly disturbed that he has 17 convictions and a criminal history dating to 1961." St. Laurent "pleaded guilty in July to the extortion conspiracy charge. Federal prosecutors said that had the case gone to trial, the government could prove that in April 2006, St. Laurent directed Ricky Silva, of North Providence, and James Manning, of Cranston, to collect $100,000 from a pizza parlor owner and a bookmaker/drug dealer. And, if they did not pay, they were instructed to 'bash' the victims. On April 6, Silva, Manning and an unnamed FBI informant traveled to Massachusetts to search for the intended victims. … The FBI, Rhode Island State Police and Providence police arrested St. Laurent the next day."

Florida Woman Pleads Guilty To Medicare Fraud Scam. The Naples Daily News (1/12, Freeman) reports, "One of two people charged with stealing the personal and medical information of 1,130 patients at Cleveland Clinic Naples pleaded guilty Thursday and will be sentenced April 27, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Miami." Isis Machado "entered the guilty plea before U.S. District Court Judge James Cohn in Fort Lauderdale on one count of conspiracy to commit computer fraud, identify theft and wrongful disclosure of individual health information." Codefendant Fernando Ferrer Jr., "a registered owner of Advanced Medical Claims in Naples, is scheduled to stand trial Jan. 22 before Cohn in Fort Lauderdale." The Daily News notes, "Ferrer and Machado became the first individuals in South Florida to be prosecuted for violating the federal law protecting patients' privacy rights. Federal prosecutors filed a motion in October to protect evidence, four computer disks that contain personal and patient information, as confidential in the event the case goes to trial." The Miami Herald (1/11, Dorschner, 286K) also reported on Machado's plea on its Web site.

Marchers Demand Action On Surge In New Orleans Violence. The CBS Evening News (1/11, story 7, , Couric, 7.66M) reported, "More and more people are worried that New Orleans is becoming a war zone. In the past year, the homicide rate has been ten times higher than other cities its size. Today, thousands matched on city hall saying enough is enough." CBS (Pitts) added, "It took the recent murder of a local school teacher and documentary filmmaker for" resident Nora Natale "and her neighbors to say enough is enough … Add to the murder rate, unemployment for returning evacuees is 7%, and only half of the schools have reopened." FBI New Orleans SAC Jim Benazzani: "And when you add crack cocaine and the AK-47, you have New Orleans today." Pitts: "Most of the murders are drug related. While the criminals have come back after Katrina, many of the city's working class simply can't afford to," and "for many here, the fear remains -- when it comes to reducing the city's murder rate, is that mission impossible?"

DOJ_NMG_0115594

ABC World News (1/11, story 8, 2:05, Vargus, 8.78M) reported, "More than 3,000 people marched in New Orleans today, demanding action against a surge in violence." ABC (Osunsami) added, "Last week, Helen Hill, a local filmmaker, was at home with her husband and young child when a street thug broke into their home, looking for cash. She was shot and killed. Her husband, Paul, who was holding the baby, was shot three times and is now hospitalized. The child survived, and is now in the care of the couple's family. … It took this highly-publicized murder to get the city to finally respond." Mayor Ray Nagin: "This city will focus on murders and we're drawing a line in the sand and saying 'we've had it.'" Osunsami: "There's a sense here in the neighborhoods that the solutions authorities have laid out are merely a band-aid and will do nothing to curb violent crime."

NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 9, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported that "thousands of people there took to the streets to protest that violence and try to get control of their city once again." NBC (Mott) added, "Nine people have been killed so far in the new year. … The march ends at city hall where many believe the solution to this surge in violence begins. The city says it has a plan to fight the crime. Still, some say that may not be enough." Rev. John Raphael of New Hope Missionary Baptist Church "said years of apathy have finally caught up with the city. … Today, 5,000 seemed to agree, vowing to end their silence about violence."

FBI Investigating Craigslist NYC Apartment Fraud Case. The New York Daily News (1/12, Lite, 729K) reports NYC resident Beth Ann Bovino "discovered that someone pretending to be her had placed a real-estate ad on Craigslist using her name, address and even an accurate picture of her brownstone. The too-good-to-be true ad asked for $1,500 for the one bedroom with a fireplace - utilities included." After responding to the fake ad, "she alerted Craigslist to the fraudulent ad, and it was taken down. But each time the posting was removed, a new one, slightly reworded, would go back up." The Daily News adds, "She ultimately reported the scam to the FBI's Internet Crime Complaint Center, a clearinghouse for the rising number of Internet fraud complaints. In 2005, the center received 231,493 complaints, up 11.6% from the year before. The center hasn't cracked Bovino's case yet, said FBI spokesman Paul Bresson, but he added that Bovino wasn't a bad amateur detective."

Retired Arkansas State Trooper Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charges. The AP (1/12) reports, "A retired Arkansas State Police trooper has pleaded guilty in Bentonville to child porn charges and was sentenced to five years in prison. Joe Hutchens, 60, of Bella Vista, who is also a former bailiff, must additionally register as a sex offender." The AP notes, "Hutchens retired in May 2004 after working 28 years as a state trooper. … Hutchens was caught by an FBI unit that targeted crimes against children."

Pennsylvania Man Pleads Guilty To Sex With Minor He Met On MySpace. The AP (1/12) reports, "A Pennsylvania man pleaded guilty Thursday to traveling across state lines to have sexual contact with a 14-year-old Connecticut girl he met through the social networking site MySpace.com. Stephen M. Letavec, 40, of Elrama, Pa., was charged last year in one of the first federal sex cases involving the popular site. Letavec, a volunteer firefighter, was accused of molesting an Oxford girl in his car. The FBI said Letavec made several visits to see the girl from the summer of 2005 and early last year." The AP notes, "The girl signed onto MySpace as an 18-year-old, but told Letavec she was 14 before he visited, the FBI said."

Former Federal Prosecutor Charged With Running New York Escort Service. The New York Law Journal (1/12, Wise) reports, "A criminal defense lawyer who worked as a federal and state prosecutor in New Jersey has been indicted for running a Manhattan-based escort service, Manhattan District Attorney Robert M. Morgenthau announced Wednesday." The Journal continues, "The lawyer, Paul Bergrin, who has defended soldiers charged with committing abuses while in Iraq, was arraigned Wednesday on a fugitive warrant in Newark, N.J., and bail was set at $500,000." The Journal adds, "No plea to the charges was entered, but Bergrin, 51, declined to waive extradition at the proceeding. John Tiffany, who represented Bergrin, said he expected his client to voluntarily surrender and contest the charges in New York. … Also named in a pair of indictments involving the NY Confidential escort agency were James Cortopassi, who had worked as a law clerk at Bergrin's four-lawyer criminal defense firm in Newark, and Hiram Ortiz, a former New Jersey state trooper. Bail for Ortiz was also set at $500,000. … Cortopassi, who is a second-year student at Michigan State Law School, is expected to surrender voluntarily, Morgenthau said at a press conference Wednesday. … If convicted of the top count in the two indictments, first-degree money laundering, Bergrin and Cortopassi would face a maximum sentence of 8 1/3 to 25 years in prison. … According to his Web site, Bergrin was born in Brooklyn and graduated from Brooklyn College. He received his law degree from the Nova University Law School in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., and served two tours in the Army. … He worked in the office of the Essex County Prosecutor and the Office of the U.S. Attorney for the District of New Jersey. He was a partner at Pope, Bergrin & Verdesco from 1990 to 2005, when he established the Law Office of Paul W. Bergrin in Newark."

DOJ_NMG_0115595

CIVIL LAW:

Mississippi Psychiatrist Settles Medicare, Medicaid Fraud Allegations. The AP (1/11) reports from Jackson, MS, "A Jackson psychiatrist has agreed to pay $216,000 to settle allegations of Medicare and Medicaid fraud." The AP continues, "The U.S. Attorney's Office said Dr. Viacin Faeza Jones misused billing codes and billed Medicare and Medicaid for excessive numbers of patients. The Justice Department said Jones billed for treating up to 116 patients in a single day and was paid $30 to $125 for each claim. … 'If a health care provider raids public funds through fraudulent or reckless Medicare billing practices, then he or she needs to be prepared to face the consequences,' said U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton. … The $216,000 is repayment for the wrongfully obtained funds, plus penalties of more than $100,000."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Alabama To Appeal DOJ Ruling On County Commissioner. The Mobile Press-Register (AL) (1/11, Murtaugh) reports, "State officials said Wednesday they will appeal to the U.S. attorney general to keep Republican Juan Chastang on the Mobile County Commission." The Press-Register continues, "Meanwhile, Democrats filed a motion Wednesday in federal court in Montgomery requesting Chastang's seat be declared vacant and a special election set to fill it. … The developments mean that Chastang will retain his seat for the time being after the U.S. Department of Justice on Monday decided that his appointment to the County Commission was legally unenforceable." The Press-Register adds, "In November 2005, Republican Gov. Bob Riley appointed Chastang, who is black, to represent District 1, a majority-black district that has historically elected Democrats. … Chastang filled the vacancy that was created when Sam Jones was elected mayor of Mobile. .. Shortly afterward, local Democrats sued to try to oust Chastang and fill the seat by a special election. A panel of federal judges in Montgomery ruled in August that the question was up to the Justice Department, which sided with the plaintiffs Monday." The Press-Register notes, "On Wednesday, attorneys for the three local Democrats who sued -- state Reps. Yvonne Kennedy, James Buskey and Bill Clark -- filed a motion asking the judges to order Mobile County Probate Judge Don Davis to call a special election for Chastang's seat. .. The motion states that Chastang would continue to serve until a replacement is elected. … A ruling on that motion might have to wait until the state appeals the Justice Department's ruling. Alabama Attorney General Troy King said Wednesday that he will appeal directly to the Justice Department's top official, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez. … 'We think the attorney general is a reasonable man,' King said 'There's a reasonable likelihood he'll see the issue like we do.' … Cecil Gardner, the attorney who filed the lawsuit on behalf of the Democrats, said he thinks the chances of the Justice Department's decision being overturned are 'very slim.'"

Probe Of Gunfire At Home Of Louisiana Mayor Urged. The Baton Rouge Advocate (1/12) reports from Greenwood, LA, "State Rep. Roy Burrell, worried that other public officials may be the targets of violence, has asked State Police to help investigate the recent gunfire at the home of the town's first black mayor." The Advocate continues, "Burrell's request came one day after the president of the Louisiana State Conference of the NAACP asked the U.S. Justice Department to investigate the Greenwood shooting and an incident in Westlake." The Advocate adds, "Burrell, D-Shreveport, made the request of Col. Henry Whitehorn, the head of the State Police, in a letter this week. Two shots were fired at Mayor Ernest Lampkins' home Monday while he, his wife and daughter were sleeping. No one was hurt. … 'I am deeply and gravely concerned about the incidents of violence which have recently occurred in our great state,' Burrell wrote. He mentioned, as examples, the shooting of Lampkins' house and the 'unusual circumstances' surrounding the death of the incoming mayor of Westlake, Gerald Washington. … Washington, who was to become the first black mayor of the predominantly white Westlake community, was found dead Dec. 30, with a gunshot wound to the chest. … His death was ruled a suicide, but family members have asked State Police to investigate further."

DOJ_NMG_0115596

DC To Probe Death Of St Elizabeth's Patient. The Washington Post (1/11, B5, Cauvin) reports, "A senior adviser to the mayor said yesterday that the District is examining how a 39-year-old mental patient died after an altercation at the city-run St. Elizabeths Hospital." The Post continues, "Peter J. Nickles, the mayor's general counsel, said the psychiatric hospital's new chief, Patrick Canavan, is leading an investigation by hospital administrators into the events Tuesday afternoon. … The man became unresponsive after staff members tried to restrain him following a 'dangerous altercation,' according to a statement by the D.C. Department of Mental Health, which runs the Southeast Washington hospital. The statement said the man was pronounced dead at Greater Southeast Community Hospital after being brought by ambulance. … Mental health officials did not identify the man, citing privacy concerns." The Post adds, "The city will be open about the findings of its probe, Nickles said. … 'There's going to be complete transparency about this,' said Nickles, who before joining the administration of new Mayor Adrian M. Fenty (D) spent much of his career suing the D.C. government for the failings of many of its human services agencies, including the city's metal health agency." The Post notes, "A civil rights investigation by the Justice Department found the quality of care and supervision at the hospital lacking, and in a report released last year, the department demanded that the city take significant steps to improve operations at St. Elizabeths. The investigation was prompted, in part, by the deaths of two patients attacked by other patients in 2004 and three patients whose care was compromised in 2005."

LAPD Chief Wants Disciplinary Board Meetings Open To Public. The Los Angeles Times (1/12, McGreevy) reports, "Los Angeles Police Chief William J. Bratton said today he would support changing the City Charter and state law to ensure that police disciplinary board meetings and some records are reopened to the public, complaining that he feels 'muzzled' by current privacy law." The Times continues, "A day after his department came under criticism for holding a Board of Rights hearing in secret to clear the officer who fatally shot 13-year-old Devin Brown, the chief likened the process to a 'star chamber' in which the public is deprived of information important to holding the police accountable. … On Tuesday, The Times revealed that an LAPD board had secretly cleared Officer Steven Garcia in the Brown case after the Police Commission had held the shooting to be out of policy. … 'I am in support of change,' Bratton said. 'I am very frustrated by [the current process]. The public has no access to it. The media has no access to it. That's crazy, absolutely crazy. We have nothing to hide in the Los Angeles Police Department.'" The Times notes, "Although disciplinary hearings have historically been open in Los Angeles, police officials changed LAPD policy late last year in response to a state Supreme Court ruling that restricted access to law enforcement personnel records in a San Diego case. … Last year, the Police Commission also changed a decades-old policy and began issuing public reports without the names of officers involved in shootings. At that time, state Sen. Gloria Romero (D-Los Angeles) offered to sponsor legislation to ensure that names would not be struck from public police records if commission members had concerns about potential court restrictions."

More Commentary. The Los Angeles Times (1/12) editorializes, "An open, accountable and trustworthy Los Angeles Police Department seems perpetually just around the corner. Reforms are instituted, promises and progress made, but with every positive step forward, the pull of secrecy keeps yanking the LAPD ceaselessly backward. … And so, after Rodney King, Rampart and now Devin Brown, we are here: Hearings on officer-involved shootings that once were open are now conducted in secret. Reports that used to name the cop who pulled the trigger now do not. And a community that was finally learning to trust the LAPD is now clouded with suspicion." The Times adds, "On Wednesday, another LAPD officer shot and killed an unarmed man. Was the action warranted, was it a tragic mistake, or did the officer act unreasonably? Does the officer have a history of bad decisions? What exactly happened, and who was involved? Under rules in place until just over a year ago, we would probably find out, eventually. Under rules in place today, we may never get the answers. That in turn means we may never be able to determine whether we're getting the reformed LAPD we want." The Times notes, "Now Bratton has expressed frustration at the deleted names and closed proceedings, calling the board of rights hearings a 'star chamber.' He knows that no matter how perfectly his officers, his department and the various layers of review operate, the veil of secrecy opens them to suspicion and attack. … Bratton suggested that the Police Commission, already nominally in charge of the LAPD, could be further empowered to assure more openness in disciplinary proceedings. It's a good idea. Changing the City Charter is time-consuming and cumbersome. But if that's what it takes to reverse the LAPD's slide back into secrecy, it's worth it."

DOJ_NMG_0115597

Accuser In Duke Lacrosse Case Contradicts Herself. The New York Times (1/12, Wilson) reports, "In an interview last month with a district attorney's investigator, the woman who has accused three Duke lacrosse players of sexual assault contradicted critical evidence and parts of her earlier accounts, dealing a new blow to a faltering case." The Times continues, "In her account, made public on Thursday in a motion by defense lawyers, the woman said two players attacked her in the bathroom at a team party in March. She also gave a new version of the timing and revised some of the men's descriptions. … The lawyers' motion said the latest account, from an interview on Dec. 21 with an investigator for District Attorney Michael B. Nifong, raised further questions about the credibility of the central witness in the case. … 'The accuser's most recent recollection of events demonstrates clearly that she cannot accurately recall and describe her attackers and that any identification made by her is necessarily unreliable,' the motion said." The Times adds, "Mr. Nifong is increasingly embattled. Last month, he dropped rape charges against the men after the accuser said she was no longer certain of some details of the incident. … The state bar has filed an ethics complaint against Mr. Nifong for what it said were prejudicial public statements. The executive committee of the North Carolina Conference of District Attorneys has called on him to drop out of the case. He has also been widely criticized for withholding exculpatory DNA evidence."

California Man Sues To Take Wife's Last Name. USA Today (1/12, 3A, Kasindorf) reports from Los Angeles, "Michael Buday is petitioning a federal judge for the right to take Diana Bijon's last name in marriage as easily as she could take his last name." USA continues, "Bijon, 28, an emergency room nurse, asked her fiancé to change his last name to preserve her father's family name because there are no sons. Buday, 29, a technical manager at an advertising firm, promised he would. … 'I had a rough childhood with my father,' he says. 'We never really got along. Diana's father stepped up, gave me career advice. He's family.'" USA adds, "Keeping his promise has been more onerous than Buday expected. A woman can choose her husband's name or her maiden name on a California marriage-license form after the couple pays a county application fee that ranges from $50 to $97. California and 43 other states provide no place on a marriage-license application for the groom to choose the bride's surname. … To officially change his name to hers — and for future Social Security benefits, Buday says — a man must pay a $320 court fee, advertise his intention in a newspaper for four weeks and get a judge's approval." USA notes, "The ACLU sued California and Los Angeles County on Dec. 15 to have the separate treatment of Buday and Bijon outlawed as gender discrimination and a denial of equal protection. The couple were married in August 2005 under their separate names after state and county agencies rebuffed them. … Six states — Georgia, Hawaii, Iowa, Massachusetts, New York and North Dakota — give either spouse the right to choose the other's last name."

Rights Groups Seek New Members From Younger Generation. USA Today (1/12, 3A, Koch) reports, "College freshman Simone Hall hasn't joined a civil rights group, although her mother belongs to three of them. She says she'd like to sign up and wishes they were more active on campus. … Kendra Clark, a sophomore, says she joined a campus chapter of the NAACP, the nation's oldest civil rights group, because racism still exists. Agbanyim Ugwuomo, a senior, teamed up with the Hip Hop Caucus, an activist group formed in 2004. He says he supports a fresh approach to racial problems." USA continues, "The three black students at Howard University are exactly the kind of new members sought by civil rights groups. The students say activism is as necessary today as it was 40 years ago when Martin Luther King Jr., whose birthday is Monday, led hundreds of thousands of people in marches for desegregation and blacks' right to vote. They say, however, that the focus now should be on issues such as inner-city school funding." USA adds, "Civil rights groups, beset by aging or stagnant membership, are recasting their messages to appeal to young people. They're putting up discussion boards on youth-oriented websites and talking about jobs, education, housing, entrepreneurship and financial literacy. … NAACP President Bruce Gordon says the group's membership, which had been aging, jumped considerably last year. He says it increased most among young people."

DOJ_NMG_0115598

ANTITRUST:

Bristol-Myers Still In Search Of Suitor. The New York Times (1/12, Saul) reports, "The drug maker Bristol-Myers Squibb brings to mind that vacant colonial for sale down the street. In real estate parlance, both are expensive and might seem to need too much tender loving care." The Times continues, "The company's leaders all but announced it was for sale last September. Four months later, though, no potential suitor has emerged — at least not publicly. … Instead, Bristol-Myers has entered several comparatively small deals, including one yesterday in which it announced a partnership with the British company AstraZeneca to develop two diabetes compounds." The Times adds, "One industry executive said recently that every large pharmaceutical company had looked at Bristol-Myers as a potential acquisition. But there are major deterrents to a quick sale: its price; two pending Justice Department investigations; and a looming patent trial involving the company's blockbuster drug Plavix. That trial is set to begin Jan. 22 in Manhattan federal court. … Bristol-Myers declined to comment yesterday on speculation involving the company's possible takeover. A Bernstein analysis last fall discussed why other pharmaceutical companies were not rushing to buy Bristol-Myers, despite a research and development pipeline that is viewed as one of the most attractive in the industry." The Times notes, "Cost is a reason. The analysis by Bernstein in October estimated the intrinsic value of Bristol-Myers at $21.50 a share. But the company's shares closed up 34 cents yesterday, at $26.54. Judging by similar takeover deals in the past, shareholders would want a 20 to 30 percent premium — or about $30 a share — before they would be happy with a takeover. … And many companies that might be interested in Bristol have lower price-earnings multiples. Acquiring Bristol-Myers would be bucking the norm in which high multiple companies usually acquire lower multiple companies."

Judge Rules Antitrust Suit Against Bar Exam Preparer May Proceed. Bloomberg (1/12, Glovin) reports, "Thomson Corp., owner of Westlaw legal research, must defend an antitrust lawsuit claiming the company illegally required aspiring lawyers to enroll in a second program as a condition of taking the state bar-exam preparation course." Bloomberg continues, "A test-taker claimed in a lawsuit filed last year in Manhattan federal court that Thomson violated antitrust laws by illegally linking state-bar and multistate review courses. U.S. District Judge William Pauley ruled today that the antitrust suit against Toronto-based Thomson may go forward." Bloomberg adds, "Thomson sells about 40,000 BarBri courses in the U.S. with both state and multistate review elements, generating about $125 million in revenue and $60 million in profits, Pauley said. As much as 90 percent of students taking prep-courses for the state section of the test enroll in the BarBri program, he said. … 'The evidence suggests that BarBri used its substantial market share to control competition, boost prices and potentially force unwilling consumption of its' multistate product, Pauley wrote in a 20-page decision. … Bar exams in 48 states include a 'multistate' section, which consists of questions on contracts, criminal law and four other subjects, and a second section with questions about a state's particular laws." Bloomberg notes, "The proposed class-action, or group lawsuit, was filed on behalf of all people who purchased a BarBri course in 47 states since 2001. The suit, brought by test-taker Anthony Park, seeks unspecified money damages."

EU Delays Ruling On Universal-BMG Deal. The AP (1/11, White) reports, "European Union antitrust regulators on Thursday delayed until June 1 a deadline to rule on Universal Music Group's plans to buy BMG Music Publishing for about $2.09 billion. … They did not say why they needed more time to look at the takeover." The AP continues, "If approved, the deal would combine the No. 3 and No. 4 music publishing catalogs, giving them a 22 percent market share and scraping ahead of current market leader EMI. … EU approval is the last hurdle for the deal, which was cleared in November by the Federal Trade Commission and the Justice Department in the United States." The AP adds, "Officials had said they would issue a final decision on whether to block or allow the deal by April 27 when they opened an in-depth investigation last month. … The European Commission is under pressure to look closely at the record industry after the EU's second-highest court overturned regulatory approval last July of a 2004 combination between the music units of Sony Corp. and Bertelsmann AG. … The court sharply criticized regulators, saying they had not done enough to show there was no monopoly in the recording industry before the deal or that there would not be one afterward. … The Sony-BMG deal must now be re-examined."

DOJ_NMG_0115599

The Hollywood Reporter (1/12, Cendrowicz) reports, "The delay, which pushes the decision to June 1, came after Universal Music parent Vivendi, called for more time as it prepared to defend a merger that would create the world's biggest music publishing company. … In a statement, Universal said it requested the extension, 'to give the commission sufficient time to consider properly the merits of the merger in what would otherwise be an overly aggressive timetable.' … 'We remain confident that the merger will be approved,' the company added." The Reporter notes, "Industry sources said Universal was concerned about how soon it would be able to provide the vast quantity of data sought by the commission, the European Union's antitrust regulator. 'It's not a problem, but it is a huge amount to gather,' one source said. … The timeframe is unusually short. Universal won the auction to buy BMG Music Publishing in September and filed its bid with the EC in November, but it was only on Dec. 8 that the commission announced it would open an in-depth merger investigation, just as its officials were due to leave Brussels for their traditional two-week Christmas vacation. The probe itself also has seen a change, as the head of the EC unit investigating the merger has just been replaced."

Open Standards Seen As Crux Of Cisco's IPhone Suit. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, A9, Clark) reports, "Cisco Systems Inc.'s suit against Apple Inc. turns on a trademark. But the fight also reflects two fundamentally different approaches to technology, one based on open standards and the other on proprietary design." The Journal continues, "Cisco contends that it holds rights to the name iPhone. The Silicon Valley networking giant filed trademark-infringement charges Wednesday to stop Apple's use of the name on its new cellphone, after the companies failed to reach a licensing agreement before the product was announced Tuesday. … Cisco also disclosed that it had been asking Apple, in exchange for using the name, to help Cisco's product work together with Apple's. … The request fits Cisco's style. The San Jose, Calif., company makes networking devices that rely on published specifications to exchange data. … Apple, by contrast, has kept tight control over internally developed technology to be able to offer exclusive features. Many competitors, for instance, have asked Apple to make it possible for songs purchased from the company's iTunes music store to be loaded on their portable music players. But only Apple's hit iPod can do that." The Journal adds, "The new iPhone offers sophisticated cellphone features and many functions of the iPod. Opening up that product or other Apple devices in new ways could help Cisco's hardware sales, given the publicity Apple tends to generate. One person familiar with the situation said the negotiations focused on broad technical cooperation, rather than specific devices. … Other lawyers observing the battle predict Apple will try to show Cisco didn't adequately use or protect the iPhone trademark."

Solis Criticizes FCC's New Video Rules. In a Wall Street Journal letter to the editor (1/12), Rep. Hilda Solis says, "In response to your Jan. 2 editorial 'Franchise Freedom' about the FCC's recent order rewriting the nation's video franchising rules to permit broadband discrimination against low-income and rural communities: I want to stand up for competition, lower prices and innovation that is both speedy and equitable." Some of "our largest corporations have convinced the FCC that cities and towns are to blame for any perceived lack of competition in the market for video and broadband services. This is misguided and irresponsible. For Hispanic Americans, who continue to face obstacles to accessing broadband services, equitable deployment is critical to ensuring that corporate titans cannot erect a walled garden behind which the fastest broadband services are squirreled for only the rich. Having failed to get Congress to bless their business plan that leaves behind most communities from their fiber upgrades, corporate executives have turned instead to the FCC for the dictum they demand.

DOJ_NMG_0115600

The FCC's new video rules give a license to discriminate to companies who openly admit to Wall Street that local franchises have not posed a barrier."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Praises Calderon's Anti-Drug Efforts. The AP (1/12, Pacheco) reports from Mexico City, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said today that the two nations must broaden their cooperation in order to curb the brutal wave of drug violence rocking Mexico." The AP continues, "Gonzales, who met with Mexican Attorney General Eduardo Medina, applauded President Felipe Calderon's efforts to reduce drug violence, which killed more than 2,000 people in Mexico last year." The AP adds, "Since taking office in December, Calderon has sent 3,300 soldiers and federal agents to Tijuana and more than 7,000 troops to his native state of Michoacan. .. .More than 1,000 troops also have been sent to the Pacific resort of Acapulco and two other cities in the western state of Guerrero in a crackdown on drugs and crime there, state officials said." The AP notes, "Gonzales praised Medina for a record 63 criminals Mexico extradited to the U.S. in 2006. … The extradition of criminals shows progress, Gonzales said, 'but much work needs to be done.' … Gonzales said Medina 'and I both wholeheartedly agree that our law enforcement officials must be able to cooperate with one another on a broader scale and in an atmosphere of mutual trust if we are going to turn back the tide of recent violence and crime that so adversely affects us all.'"

The Houston Chronicle (1/12, Lloyd) reports, "The United States and Mexico must improve cooperation in the drug war or their efforts are doomed to fail, attorney generals from both countries said Thursday. … 'Clearly, Mexico and the United States have a shared responsibility to make our communities safer from the drug traffickers and criminals who are threatening our way of life,' U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told a joint news conference in Mexico." The Chronicle continues, "It was his first official meeting with his Mexican counter-part, Eduardo Medina Mora, who was appointed attorney general Dec. 1 at the end of a year of record drug violence. More than 2,000 Mexicans died in gangland-style killings in 2006, prompting the U.S. government to issue travel warnings for parts of Mexico. … 'Crime is not Mexico's problem alone or the United States' problem alone,' Gonzales read from a statement. 'It is our mutual challenge, and if we do not work together to meet that challenge, we will both fail. And the stakes are too high for failure.' … Medina Mora agreed. But he added that such a partnership must take place in 'an atmosphere of mutual confidence and profound respect for our sovereignty.'" The Chronicle notes, "Neither official said whether Mexico had accepted a petition by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration to open new offices in Nuevo Laredo, Matamoros and Nogales on the U.S. border. The requested expansion would bring the total number of Mexico offices to 11 and increase the number of DEA agents from 81 to nearly 100, officials from both countries have said."

The Laredo (TX) Morning Times (1/11, Reddick) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales toured the World Trade Bridge on Wednesday, announcing a new effort to fight drug traffickers on the border. 'We're concerned about violence in Mexico spilling into the U.S.,' Gonzales said." The Times continues, "Gonzales announced $300,000 would be spent on a new federal drug taskforce that would fight drug cartels. Cuellar said the money is a good start, but we need to do more, like adding federal prosecutors to handle the border's busy drug and immigration dockets. … U.S. Rep. Henry Cuellar, D-Laredo, said he asked Gonzales in September to visit because of recent increases in border violence, and he called the visit significant. 'It sends a strong message that he knows what's happening on the ground,' Cuellar said from Washington, D.C. … However, William Slemaker, who has become a spokesman for families of people missing in Mexico, said he didn't find any answers in Gonzales' visit. … 'I felt that he came to spit in our face,' Slemaker said. … Slemaker and other kidnapping victims' families held signs near the World Trade Bridge as Gonzales' motorcade arrived and left. … Slemaker said the proposal sounds like more of the same old thing, and he believes everyone keeps talking about border violence without thinking of the actual victims."

KVEA-TV, Los Angeles, CA, (1/11, 11:00 p.m., translated) broadcasted on Telemundo that officials Eduardo Medina, of Mexico, and Alberto Gonzales, of the United States agreed to "unite forces to fight against trafficking narcotics." Additionally, the (US) "asked the Mexican government to open three new offices in New Laredo, Matamores and Nogales."

KBNT-TV, San Diego, CA (1/11, 11:00 p.m., translated) broadcasted on Univision that during Gonzales' visit to Mexico, he said, "Organized crime is not a problem exclusively in Mexico or the United States, so it's required for both nations to fight it." Gonzales met with General Eduardo Medina and "compromised to improve the collaboration in the matter of information exchange, intelligence and experience that exists for the citizens of both countries." Gonzales "congratulated Mexico for it's operations against organized crime." The Univision broadcast also played in KTLE-TV, Odessa, Midland, TX (1/11, 5:00 p.m.). Other stations that ran this story are KTSM-TV, El Paso, TX (1/11, 10:00 p.m.), KRIS-TV, Corpus Christi, TX (1/11, 10:00 p.m.) and KMIR-TV, Palm Springs, CA (1/11, 11:00 p.m.).

DOJ_NMG_0115601

US Charges Deputy Marshal With Leaking Information In Mob Case. The AP (1/11, Robinson) reports, "A federal deputy marshal was charged today with leaking information about a reputed mobster's cooperation with prosecutors as they investigated the top echelon of Chicago's organized crime family." The AP continues, "John Thomas Ambrose, 38, a former supervisory inspector of the U.S. Marshals Service's Great Lakes Regional Fugitive Task Force, surrendered voluntarily Thursday at the FBI's Chicago office, officials said. … He is accused of revealing information concerning the cooperation and travel plans of Nicholas Calabrese, who is expected to be a key witness in the government's Operation Family Secrets murder conspiracy case." The AP adds, "Prosecutors said Ambrose told them in a Sept. 6 interview that he passed the information to an associate of reputed mob boss John 'No Nose' DiFronzo in hopes of getting information on the whereabouts of then-fugitive organized crime figure Joseph 'Joey the Clown' Lombardo. … But prosecutors said that in later interviews Ambrose said he never believed the information would be passed to organized crime figures. … Lombardo, among those charged in the Operation Family Secrets indictment, was subsequently captured and is due to stand trial starting in May along with the others accused in the case."

The Chicago Sun-Times (1/11, Main, Korecki) reports, "Nick Calabrese is a key witness in the upcoming Family Secrets mob trial, scheduled to begin in May. Calabrese is the brother of Frank Calabrese Sr., a man charged in 13 mob hits and one of the top mobsters on trial in the case. … The Chicago Sun-Times reported in September that Ambrose was placed on administrative leave while federal authorities investigated the allegations." The Sun-Times adds, "The deputy, a member of the Great Lakes Regional Fugitive Task Force, was required to surrender his badge and gun, sources said. … In 2005, federal authorities charged 14 people in the sweeping mob indictment. The investigation, which is continuing, pinned 18 previously unsolved murders on the Chicago Outfit. … Ambrose has spearheaded several high-profile fugitive arrests, including the capture of an Italian mobster living in the west suburbs and a Chicago street gang member named as one of the country's 15 most-wanted fugitives."

WMAQ-TV, NBC 5, Chicago (1/11) reports, "According to the FBI's affidavit, witness Calabrese admitted to the government that he was a 'made' member of the Chicago mob (a.k.a. the 'Chicago Outfit') and provided federal agents with the most expansive overview ever of murders allegedly committed by its members. In 2002, Calabrese agreed to cooperate in the investigation of alleged Outfit members, including his brother, Frank Calabrese Sr. and two other men -- brothers James and Michael Marcello." WMAQ-TV continues, "Nicolas Calabrese was moved to a secure prison facility in August of 2002, based on his ability to testify in 38 murders -- 16 of which he admits he participated. An investigation ensued, resulting in the April 2005 indictment of 14 defendants in U.S. vs. Nicolas Calabrese et al., which alleges a 40-year racketeering conspiracy involving 18 previously unsolved Outfit murders of suspected government witnesses between 1970 and 1986. That's according to a release by the Chicago FBI. … The case against the remaining 12 defendants is scheduled for trial in May."

CBS 2 Chicago (1/12) reports, "Ambrose, 38, a deputy marshal since January 1998 and a supervisory inspector for the U.S. Marshals Service's Great Lakes Regional Fugitive Task Force, was placed on administrative leave last September. He is scheduled for an initial hearing this afternoon before a U.S. magistrate judge at the Dirksen Federal Building." CBS 2 continues, "Calabrese is still in protective custody, set to testify in Operation Family Secrets, the massive case involving several alleged mobsters including Calabrese's brother Frank, Sr. … The feds say despite the leak, Calabrese was never in any danger, but he and others could have been."

The Chicago Tribune (1/12, O'Connor) reports, "John T. Ambrose was barely a teenager when his dad, Thomas, was convicted in the 'Marquette 10' police corruption trial in the 1980s. … The father died after just a year in prison and never saw that Ambrose grew up to be a law-enforcement officer—a decorated supervisor in the U.S. marshal's office." The Tribune continues, "Federal prosecutors said he followed too closely in his father's footsteps. In a case that shows the long shadow of one of Chicago's most notorious police corruption scandals, Ambrose was accused Thursday of passing secrets to the mob. … With his own dad gone, Ambrose had come to look upon another one of the convicted Marquette 10 as a father figure, according to court papers." The Tribune adds, "Chicago attorney Thomas Royce, who defended Ambrose's dad at the Marquette 10 trial, recalled Thursday that Ambrose occasionally sat in the courtroom watching his father's trial. He turned 14 during the trial. … 'I am truly surprised John would ever have an evil motive,' said Royce, who has kept in contact with Ambrose. 'He was very aggressive, in my belief, in trying to overcome his father's image.'"

DOJ_NMG_0115602

Atlanta Narcotics Team Member Tells FBI Officers Lied To Get Warrant. The New York Times (1/12, Dewan, 1.16M) reports, "A narcotics team that shot and killed an elderly woman while raiding her home lied to obtain the search warrant, one team member has told federal investigators, according to news reports confirmed by a person familiar with the investigation who requested anonymity. The officers falsely claimed that a confidential informant had bought $50 worth of crack at the house, the team member, Gregg Junnier, told the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Mr. Junnier retired from the Atlanta Police Department last week. The story backs up statements by Alex White, a police informant, who said that after the shooting the police had asked him to claim, falsely, that he had bought crack at the modest home of the woman, Kathryn Johnston." The Times adds, "Spokesmen with the F.B.I.'s Atlanta office and the United States attorney here declined to comment."

DOJ: Illinois Doctor Illegally Prescribed 62 Million Doses Of Drugs Over Internet. The IDG News Service (1/11) reported an Illinois doctor "was sentenced…to more than three years in prison for illegally prescribing drugs over the Internet. Michael Millette, 46, of Crystal Lake, Ill., is the ninth doctor to be sentenced in an Internet pharmacy investigation conducted by the U.S. Attorney's office for the Northern District of Iowa. U.S. District Judge Linda Reade sentenced Millette to 41 months in prison and a $1.6 million fine." During his plea hearing, Millette "said he prescribed more than 62 million doses of drugs illegally over the Internet, the DOJ said in a statement. Millette also said he laundered the money he received from the Internet companies that employed him." Computerworld published the IDG story.

Michigan Man Gets 7-Year Sentence For Role In Importing Thousands Of Ecstasy Pills. The Flint (MI) Journal (1/11) reported a Flushing business owner "will spend more than seven years in federal prison for his role in importing tens of thousands of Ecstasy pills between 2001 and 2004. Jared Petiprin…pleaded guilty in September to conspiracy to distribute a controlled substance. On Wednesday, he was sentenced to 87 months in prison by U.S. District Judge Paul V. Gadola." Petiprin "is the latest - but not necessarily the last - in a string of defendants involved in the large-scale distribution and sale of Ecstasy or cocaine who were charged in an investigation by the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Department of Homeland Security-Immigration Customs Enforcement over the past two years."

"Cocaine Cowboys" Indicted In New York. Albany, New York's Capital News 9 (1/11) reports on its Web site that the Cocaine Cowboys "are outlaws no more. Ten Members of the New York City-based gang have been indicted on felony charges of conspiracy to distribute a controlled substance." Authorities "said the drug gang was peddling between one and two kilos of crack and coke from the city into the Capital Region every two weeks, moving about $40,000 worth of the drugs each week." They "weren't selling on the streets. They sold to other drug dealers and made their headquarters in a house…in Colonie."

The Albany (NY) Times Union (1/11) reported, "The probe that began with street-level buys last summer uncovered a crew with a reverence for corporate culture and adherence to a strict code of conduct, prosecutors said. Workers who routinely ferried drugs were given cash bonuses for avoiding speeding tickets and contact with police. Others, overheard on wiretaps, lobbied for promotions to management positions, prosecutors said."

On its Web site, WTEN-TV, Albany (1/11) reports police "say what operated as a 'delivery service' for dealers around the area, is now out of business. That pipeline began down in New York City, and shipped drugs up the Thruway to Latham. Police say in order to distribute the goods, the dealers set up what they call a 'satellite base'…in Latham."

DOJ_NMG_0115603

Federal Fugitive Facing Meth Charges Found In Alabama Jail. The AP (1/11) reported a Morgan County sheriff's investigator "helped find a federal fugitive who was already jailed in the county under a false name. A federal grand jury indicted Ulises Torres Cruz, 31, in July on charges of conspiracy to traffic methamphetamine as part of a major drug-trafficking organization in North Alabama. But authorities could not find Cruz, and he was placed on the Drug Enforcement Administration's most wanted list. … The man had told police his name was Martin Contera Vera, but Huntsville DEA agents confirmed that Vera and Cruz were the same person." The Montgomery Advertiser used the AP story.

The Decatur (AL) Daily (1/11) wrote that the effort "brought down a drug trafficking ring allegedly run by Oscar Xicotencah Salomon, 34, of Decatur. Salomon's alleged organization brought drugs into the U.S. from Mexico through the Texas border."

Budget Cuts Said To Be Hindering Drug Enforcement. For Time, (1/11) Brian Bennett wrote, "Though the global drug trade is heating up, expect a lighter U.S. enforcement presence on the streets. The White House's Office of National Drug Control Policy estimates that opium production in Afghanistan, which not only provides 90% of the heroin consumed globally but also funds Taliban activities, rose 61% last year over 2005. … Yet the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA), which annually loses some 3% of its 5,000 agents to attrition, has a two-year hiring freeze because of budget cuts to U.S. programs. DEA bean counters say they would need an additional $12 million to maintain current agent levels." DEA chief financial officer Frank Kalder "admits, 'there will be less drug enforcement going on. There's no getting around that.'"

In Detroit, Walters Praises Officials' Response To Fentanyl-Related Overdoses. The Detroit News (1/11) reported John Walters "commended Wayne County officials Thursday for their teamwork with others last year during a rash of drug overdoses from the powerful painkiller fentanyl. 'Your collaboration as a group was outstanding,'" said Walters. "'You saved lives, and you helped save lives in other places.' Fentanyl overdoses killed at least 179 people in Wayne County in the first 11 months last year, officials said." Walters "said it is unclear whether the continuing fentanyl deaths are attributable to a sizable production of the drug that is still in circulation or if others are manufacturing it."

The Detroit Free Press (1/11) reported 12 people died in May from fentanyl-related overdoses, and those deaths "punctuated a trend that began nine months earlier, when clandestinely produced fentanyl began showing up in combination with heroin and cocaine in some U.S. cites, including Detroit. Walters blamed the initial delay in recognizing the outbreak [in Detroit] and nationwide to the lack of a national reporting system for such drug epidemics." Walters "asked [a] work group for its advice on how to create standards for reporting and gathering of information that could spot emerging drug epidemics sooner."

Bonds Issues Statement Following Report Of Positive Amphetamines Test. The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Shaikin) reports the first player "to reportedly test positive under baseball's new amphetamine ban is Barry Bonds, the one most prominently associated with a federal investigation into steroid abuse. Bonds' test result from last season was first reported Thursday by the New York Daily News." Bonds "issued a statement Thursday in which he did not confirm, deny or address the positive test but did apologize to the Giants and their fans in general."

The AP (1/12) reports Bonds "said he did not get amphetamines from teammate Mark Sweeney, but did not deny a report Thursday saying he tested positive for the drugs last season. According to a story in the New York Daily News, the San Francisco slugger failed an amphetamines test in 2006. The newspaper reported that when first informed of the positive result, Bonds attributed it to a substance he had taken from Sweeney's locker."

USA Today (1/12, Nightengale) reports Sweeney "told USA Today earlier Thursday that he did not have amphetamines and confronted Bonds about it last summer. 'I asked him why my name would be out there,' Sweeney said. 'I told him that I didn't understand why my name was even being talked about. He told me it was a misunderstanding.' Sweeney said he has never tested positive for amphetamines."

Amphetamines Seen As Part Of Baseball's Culture. The New York Times (1/12, Schmidt) reports that if Bonds "did test positive for amphetamines, it was as one of approximately 3,000 tests that baseball conducted last season for the stimulant, which has long been part of baseball's culture. Last season was the first time that baseball tested for amphetamines, with each player on the 40-man rosters of the 30 major league teams tested at least twice, and others tested more than that because of the 580 additional random tests provided for in the agreement between baseball and the players association."

DOJ_NMG_0115604

The AP (1/11) reported, "There's a long history of amphetamines -- or speed and more commonly called greenies in the baseball world -- fueling generations of baseball players. Many turned to the stimulants for a way to get pepped up when their bodies couldn't do so on their own during a long season. The pills, widely used even until recently, helped with energy for day games following night games and other times when players were short on sleep, such as after a long cross-country flight."

Ecuador, Colombia Make Deal On Coca Crop Fumigation. The AP (1/12) reports Ecuador's president-elect "said Thursday a diplomatic spat over Colombia's fumigation of coca has been resolved, a disagreement that had spurred debate over the U.S. drug policy and prompted Ecuador to withdraw its ambassador. Rafael Correa, a leftist economist who takes office Monday, told reporters in Quito that the agreement with Colombian President Alvaro Uribe marked 'a huge step forward' in cross-border ties." Uribe and Correa "met Wednesday in Nicaragua during the inauguration of President Daniel Ortega and reached an agreement under which Ecuador would be notified of any spraying along the border, Correa said. They also agreed to create a three-party commission, with representatives from both countries and a third from the Organization of American States, that would ensure that the spray does not enter Ecuadorean territory."

IMMIGRATION:

US Indicts Exiled Cuban Militant For Immigration Fraud. The Miami Herald (1/12, Chardy, Weaver) reports, "A federal grand jury in El Paso, Texas handed down a seven-count indictment today against Cuban exile militant Luis Posada Carriles, charging him with lying about how he sneaked into the United States in March 2005. It is the first time the CIA-trained Posada has been charged with a crime in the United States." The Herald continues, "His chief benefactor, Santiago Alvarez, and another supporter -- Osvaldo Mitat -- were also indicted after they refused to testify before the same grand jury today. They were charged with contempt of court when they invoked their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination." The Herald adds, "The indictment accused Posada, 78, of making false statements to immigration officials about how he arrived in the United States. Posada has insisted he came through the Mexican border, but the indictment asserted Posada entered the United States by sea aboard the shrimping vessel Santrina crewed by Alvarez, Mitat and others. … This is the first time Posada has been criminally charged in the United States, the country he viewed as an ally and safe haven because of his past connections to the CIA and the U.S. military. By indicting Posada, the federal government ensures his continued detention."

The San Antonio Express-News (1/12, Contreras) reports, "Posada claims he entered through the Texas-Mexican border, but U.S. authorities allege he sneaked into Florida in March 2005 aboard a shrimp boat co-owned by Santiago Alvarez, a prominent South Florida supporter and benefactor of Posada, according to court records and newspaper reports. … Alvarez and Osvaldo Mitat, who reportedly worked for Alvarez, also were indicted by the El Paso grand jury Thursday on charges of refusing to testify at the grand jury proceedings, their indictments show." The Express-News adds, "Posada remained Thursday in a federal immigration jail in El Paso, one of the more infamous inmates there because of his background, which includes involvement in the 1961 Bay of Pigs operation — a U.S.-backed attempt by Cuban exiles to overthrow Castro. … Alvarez and Mitat were sentenced to federal prison in November after pleading guilty to federal weapons charges in Florida over machine guns, a grenade launcher and other items stored in an apartment complex that Alvarez, a real estate developer in Miami, owns."

The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Williams) reports, "Posada's attorney, Eduardo Soto, filed a writ of habeas corpus in August challenging his client's continued detention. After U.S. Magistrate Norbert Garney recommended a month later that Posada be released, Department of Justice authorities urged U.S. District Judge Philip Martinez in El Paso to keep Posada jailed, claiming he is 'an admitted mastermind of terrorist plots and attacks.' … Thursday's grand jury indictment 'shows that the Justice Department is serious about pursuing Posada but still leaves his case in the immigration courts instead of addressing his terrorist background,' said Peter Kornbluh of the independent National Security Archive at George Washington University.

DOJ_NMG_0115605

… Kornbluh suspects the Bush administration is reluctant to put Posada on trial for sabotage or acts of terrorism because of his close ties to U.S. security and intelligence operations over the years. … Soto has also alluded to his client's knowledge of clandestine activities and their potential to embarrass past Republican administrations. … President George H.W. Bush, the current president's father, was CIA director during the Iran-Contra affair in which Posada played a key role."

The AP (1/12, Caldwell) reports, "Several countries have rejected U.S. requests for Posada to be sent there." The AP adds, "Posada, who was born in Cuba and is a naturalized citizen of Venezuela, is charged with one count of naturalization fraud and six counts of making false statements in a naturalization proceeding, according to the Justice Department. … The indictment alleges that Posada knowingly lied on his application and under oath when applying for naturalization to the United States in September 2005 and April 2006. .. He said he traveled from Honduras through Belize, ultimately reaching the United States near Brownsville, Texas, with the help of a human smuggler. But Posada actually entered the country by sea on a boat with four others, according to the indictment." The AP notes, "It is unclear what impact the indictment could have on the pending deportation order. If the indictment proceeds, Posada could ask to be set free on bond, Millan said, a move that would probably draw Justice Department opposition."

Bloomberg (1/12, Schmidt) reports, "If convicted, Posada Carriles would face a maximum of 10 years in prison on one charge of naturalization fraud and up to five years on each of six counts of lying in interviews with immigration officials."

AFP (1/12) reports, "Venezuela has demanded the United States extradite Posada Carriles to face terrorism charges. … US officials refuse to release him to Venezuela, where he holds citizenship, or Cuba, where he was born, saying he might be tortured. But they also have refused to free him, calling the former CIA operative a threat to national security." AFP adds, "Recently declassified US documents show that Posada Carriles had worked for the CIA at least from 1965 until June 1976, and he reportedly helped the US government ferry supplies to so-called Contra rebels, who waged a bloody campaign to topple the Marxist Sandinistas in Nicaragua in the 1980s."

Chicago Man Arrested For Impersonating FBI Agent To Scam Immigrants. Sun-Times News Group (1/11) reported, "A 40-year-old man was indicted Wednesday with allegedly impersonating an FBI agent so he could dupe immigrants out of money. Omar Abbas, who is currently in custody on a $100,000 bond, was indicted on two counts each of extortion and making false statements within the jurisdiction of the FBI, and one count each of impersonating a United States officer and bribery." STNG noted, "He usually preyed on immigrants caught in tough circumstances, authorities said. Law enforcement officials believe more immigrants have been scammed but haven't alerted authorities because they fear their legal status will be questioned, FBI spokesman Tom Simon sai"

TAX:

Another Plea In KPMG Case. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, C2) reports, "A Saipan man pleaded guilty to making false statements in connection with the government's probe into allegedly fraudulent tax shelters marketed by former executives of KPMG LLP. … The plea was the second in the government's tax-shelter investigation secured by prosecutors in as many days." The Journal continues, "Michael Grandinetti, a senior executive with the United Micronesia Development Association, entered his plea at a hearing before U.S. District Judge Thomas P. Griesa in Manhattan. … Mr. Grandinetti, 54 years old, said he lied to a prosecutor and an Internal Revenue Service agent when he told them in a March 2006 telephone call that he had disclosed to the UMDA's board that he received secret side payments from a group of tax-shelter promoters for UMDA engaging in certain tax-shelter transactions. … Mr. Grandinetti faces up to five years in prison on the charge. Bail was set at $10,000."

IRS Agents Criticize Prematurely Closed Audits. The New York Times (1/12, Johnston) reports, "Top officials at the Internal Revenue Service are pushing agents to prematurely close audits of big companies with agreements to have them pay only a fraction of the additional taxes that could be collected, according to dozens of I.R.S. employees who say that the policy is costing the government billions of dollars a year. … 'It's catch and release,' said Douglas R. Johnson, an I.R.S. auditor in Colorado for three decades who said he grew so frustrated at how large corporations were allowed to pay far less than what he thought they owed that he transferred to the agency's small-business division." The Times continues, "With one exception, other working agents would talk about the issue only on condition they not be identified because they feared being fired. They said a policy intended to avoid delays in auditing corporations was being pushed so rigidly that it prevented them from pursuing numerous examples of questionable corporate tax deductions." The Times adds, "I.R.S. officials said the complaints were misguided. In an interview yesterday, Debbie Nolan, the I.R.S. executive in charge of auditing large and medium-size businesses, denied that audits were being closed over the objections of agents who had evidence that significant additional taxes were owed. Ms. Nolan said she had not heard any such complaints from auditors. … She noted that the amount of additional tax recommended for each hour auditors spend on large and medium-size companies more than doubled, to $5,195 in 2006 from $2,394 in 2002. And she said that internal reviews of corporate tax audits showed that their quality had improved. … But auditors said they were told to limit questioning only to those specific issues that the I.R.S. and the companies had agreed in advance to examine. When other questionable deductions emerged in the course of the audit, they said, additional taxes were ignored."

DOJ_NMG_0115606

New York Judge Blocks IRS From Role In Tax Case. The Buffalo News (1/11, Gryta) reports, "State Supreme Court Justice John A. Michalek on Wednesday refused to allow the Internal Revenue Service to intervene in state court proceedings aimed at closing the financial books and paying workers of the former St. Augustine human resource center." The News continues, "U.S. District Judge John V. Elfvin two weeks ago quashed an IRS effort to have the matter handled in federal court, when the case was returned to Michalek. … Lisa L. Bellamy, a U.S. Justice Department attorney who made the intervention request Friday, could not be reached to comment Wednesday." The News adds, "As the result of a state Labor Department suit, Michalek ordered the closing of the debt-plagued center 11 months ago. The nonprofit human services agency for decades served Buffalo's black community. … In court papers, Bellamy contended that the IRS has a $592,325.54 lien on the St. Augustine operations for unpaid federal taxes and penalties. … After Wednesday's court session, Adam W. Perry, the center's state court-appointed receiver, said he is preparing a report for Michalek on paying off center creditors and obtaining back pay for 85 employees who worked months without pay last year while transferring clients to other agencies."

IRS Adjusts Monthly Transit Subsidy, Mileage Deduction For Workers. The Washington Post's (1/12, D3, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The Internal Revenue Service has increased the maximum monthly transit subsidy to $110 for 2007 as part of its inflation-adjustment procedures. That's a $5 increase in the tax-free benefit, which was last adjusted in 2005." The Post adds, "Government agencies use the benefit to encourage their employees to take the subway and use van pools rather than drive to work in the city and increase congestion. In the Washington area, about 163,000 federal employees receive Metrocheks, a fare card voucher, a Metro spokesman said." The Post also notes that the "IRS also has increased the standard mileage rates used to calculate deductions for taxpayers who use cars for business, charitable, medical and moving purposes to 48.5 cents per mile, up by 4 cents from last year."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Passes Stem Cell Bill, But Falls Short Of Veto-Threat Margin. The CBS Evening News (1/11, story 8, :20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "On Capitol Hill, the Democratic controlled House of Representatives is running its first 100 hours legislative clock right on time. On today's agenda, embryonic stem cell research. The House passed a bill to expand Federal funding for it. The President has promised to veto it." The AP (1/12, Taylor) notes "the 253-174 vote fell short of the two-thirds margin required to overturn President Bush's promised veto, despite gains made by supporters in the November elections."

As the New York Times (1/12, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports, "it would take 290 House votes to override a veto." But USA Today (1/12, 2.27M) reports that "supporters of research on embryonic stem cells say an end to restrictions on federal funding is inevitable after an overwhelming House vote Thursday." In the Senate, Sen. Tom Harkin "said he has 66 votes lined up in favor of the bill; he needs 67 to override Bush. 'We're working on everybody,' Harkin said." The Washington Post (1/12, A4, Weiss, 690K) reports "Senate leaders have said they plan to take up the bill next month."

DOJ_NMG_0115607

AFP (1/12, Griffith) reports House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "hailed Thursday's vote as a victory for the effort to find cures for a number of diseases, including diabetes and cancer." The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Gaouette, 850K) says "lawmakers spoke of parents, children and friends who they said could be helped by embryonic stem cells, while others warned that the legislation would involve the government in the destruction of life in the form of human embryos." ABC World News (1/11, story 9, :15, Vargus, 8.78M) also noted "the stem cell vote was part of the Democrats' agenda for the first 100 hours of this Congress."

The Washington Times (1/12, Bellantoni, 88K) reports "pro-life members from both parties oppose embryonic stem-cell research, arguing that it destroys life in the process of harvesting the cells. They also said the measure should have been put on hold because of recent research showing that amniotic fluid can be used to produce stem cells without destroying life." Minority Leader John A. Boehner "urged his colleagues to instead study those new methods, saying, 'We are going to find out that we are not going to need to destroy human embryos to get the kind of promise that we want. I've got 11 brothers and sisters. I'm sure it wasn't convenient for my mother to have twelve of us, but I'm sure glad that she did,' he said. ;Taxpayer funds shouldn't be used to destroy the human life, pure and simple.'"

The New York Times (1/12, Wade, 1.16M) reports, "It was a day of promised miracles in the House of Representatives. Almost every other lawmaker who spoke during the debate on the stem cell bill told of a close relative with a deadly affliction whose cure depended on generating new human embryonic stem cell lines." But the bill "would merely allow scientists supported by the federal government to derive new cultures of stem cells from the early embryos discarded by clinics using in-vitro fertilization. … The striking hopes that stem cell advocates have raised in order to overturn Mr. Bush's decision may generate public disenchantment with such research if its promise is not quickly fulfilled."

Charles Krauthammer writes in the Washington Post (1/12, A19, 690K), "I have long supported legal abortion. And I don't believe that life -- meaning the attributes and protections of personhood -- begins at conception. Yet many secularly inclined people such as myself have great trepidation about the inherent dangers of wanton and unrestricted manipulation -- to the point of dismemberment -- of human embryos." He adds, "You don't need religion to tremble at the thought of unrestricted embryo research. You simply have to have a healthy respect for the human capacity for doing evil in pursuit of the good."

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (1/12, 850K) says, "Research published this week shows that stem cells harvested from amniotic fluid -- easily accomplished through the common practice of amniocentesis -- can be used to create human tissues. … This could be an impressive new medical tool. But it also could be a convenient pretext for pushing embryonic stem cell research aside — and that shouldn't be allowed to happen. For all the potential uses of amniotic cells, they are likely to prove less adaptable than embryonic cells. Exclusive focus on amniotic stem cells would divert attention and time away from potentially more promising lines of research."

Bush Threatens To Veto Bill Requiring Medicare Drug Negotiation. The New York Times (1/12, Pear, 1.16M) reports President Bush "threatened on Thursday to veto legislation that would require the government to negotiate with pharmaceutical companies to obtain lower drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries." In Congress, the "chances for passage of some version of the legislation increased when a pivotal figure," Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus, "said Congress should repeal a provision of the 2003 Medicare law that prohibits such negotiations." Sen. Baucus said he "did not favor price controls, but did believe that Medicare should be able to negotiate prices in 'discrete areas where seniors need our help the most.'" The House plans to vote Friday on its version of the drug price negotiation bill; while the "Democratic bill is expected to pass, the White House announced the veto threat on Thursday in an effort to hold down the number of votes and to prevent the measure from gaining any more momentum."

The AP (1/12, Espo) reports that in a written statement of Administration policy, the White House said, "Government interference impedes competition, limits access to lifesaving drugs, reduces convenience for beneficiaries and ultimately increases costs to taxpayers, beneficiaries and all American citizens alike." The AP adds Bush "had already threatened to veto another of the top six bills Democrats are pushing across the House floor in the first two weeks of the new Congress. That's the measure, approved Thursday, to expand the extent to which federal funds could be used for embryonic stem cell research."

DOJ_NMG_0115608

House Democrats Scrapped Plan To Rewrite Prescription Drug Program. The Washington Post (1/12, A1, Smith, Birnbaum, 690K) reports on its front page that prior to "taking control of the House last week, Democratic leaders briefly considered proposing a new government-run prescription drug program as a way to reduce seniors' drug costs, according to Democratic aides and lawmakers involved in the deliberations." But House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) "and her allies chose a far less ambitious plan -- to require the government to negotiate for lower Medicare drug prices -- that will come to a vote today. They stepped back largely out of concern that the pharmaceutical industry would stall a complex change, denying them a quick victory on a top consumer-oriented priority, aides say." The Post adds the Democrats "had reason to be wary: Despite years of lopsidedly favoring GOP lawmakers with campaign cash and other benefits, the drug lobby continues to wield tremendous power in the Democratic-controlled Congress" and "still has the backing of the White House."

McCrery Says Democratic Bill Would Have Undesirable Results. In a Washington Times op-ed (1/12), Rep. Jim McCrery, the ranking Republican on the House Ways and Means Committee, says, "The proposal to have the government negotiate Medicare drug costs that the Democratic leadership hopes to ram through the House of Representatives this week will either be largely ineffective, or it will cause undesirable results: it will restrict seniors' choices, devastate local pharmacies, raise prescription drug costs for veterans and stifle innovation." The Democratic plan "before the House offers nothing but the prospect of a diminished benefit due to heavy-handed government control of this important program."

NYTimes Praises House Bill. The New York Times (1/12, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "From all the ruckus raised by the administration and its patrons in the pharmaceutical industry, you would think that Congressional Democrats were out to destroy the free market system when they call for the government to negotiate the prices of prescription drugs for Medicare beneficiaries. Yet a bill scheduled for a vote in the House of Representatives today is sufficiently flexible to allow older Americans to benefit from the best efforts of both the government and the private drug plans." The secretary of Health and Human Services "should be able to exert his bargaining power with drug companies in those cases in which the private plans have failed to rein in unduly high prices — leaving the rest to the drug plans. The result could be lower costs for consumers and savings for the taxpayers who support Medicare."

Senate Democratic Leadership Dealt Setback On Ethics Bill. The New York Times (1/12, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports, "After campaigning for months on a promise to tighten ethics rules, Senate Democratic leaders tried unsuccessfully Thursday to block a measure that would shine a light on the shadowy practice of earmarking federal money for lawmakers' pet projects." After House Democrats "passed an unexpectedly broad change to their chamber's rules that would disclose the size, purpose and sponsor of any earmark," on Thursday, when Sen. Jim DeMint "introduced the same thing in the Senate, Democratic leaders moved quickly to squash it, calling the House bill ill thought out." The Democratic leaders' "effort to block the DeMint proposal was defeated by a vote of 51 to 46, surprising almost everyone in the Senate. The outcome reflected the keen desire of many lawmakers to appear to be on the side of openness and reform after an election that turned in part on Congressional corruption scandals."

The Washington Times (1/12, Miller, 88K) reports Senate Democrats "backed off promises to reform pork spending yesterday, using procedural tactics similar to ones they attacked Republicans for employing in past Congresses." Thomas A. Schatz, president of Citizens Against Government Waste, said, "Democratic leaders are stalling in an attempt to strong-arm more Democrats into voting to table the amendment. This is not a promising beginning to the new Congress when the first effort to improve accountability and transparency is being shot down by the Democratic leadership." Republicans said "the episode smacked of hypocrisy by Democrats, who campaigned heavily on ethics reform and what they characterized as the Republicans' heavy-handed control of Congress."

The AP (1/12, Abrams) reports the Senate's "new Democratic leaders, the fragility of their thin majority on display for the first time, were set back Thursday when nine Democrats joined with Republicans in support of stricter House-passed rules on lawmakers' pet projects." Majority Leader Harry Reid "was forced to delay a final vote on a measure he opposes." The measure, "an amendment to an ethics and lobbying bill, would have adopted a wider definition of 'earmarks,' specific projects inserted in bills, to include Corps of Engineer water projects, Pentagon weapon systems and items from other federal entities." The language

DOJ_NMG_0115609

"favored by Reid and Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., would require disclosure of only targeted funds directed to nonfederal entities such as a city park, state universities or private contractors." Among the Democrats siding with GOP Sen. Jim DeMint "were possible presidential candidates Barack Obama, D-Ill., and John Kerry, D-Mass., freshmen Jim Webb of Virginia and Jon Tester of Montana, and Mary Landrieu of Louisiana, who faces a tough reelection bid in 2008."

WSJournal Says Senate Democrats Repudiated Pelosi's Bill. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "Yesterday on the Senate floor, Majority Leader Harry Reid was caught pulling out every stop to kill his own party's plan for earmark reform." The Journal says that "to Speaker Nancy Pelosi's credit," House Democrats "recently passed ethics legislation that included provisions making earmarks more transparent." But the "ethics reform offered by Senate Democrats contained none of these tougher earmark provisions. So Senate Republicans, led by South Carolina's Jim DeMint, cheekily took the identical language of the House earmark bill and offered it as an amendment to the Senate version. Numerous Democrats instantly denounced it, apparently unaware (or unconcerned) that the language had been sponsored by Ms. Pelosi." Of the "46 Senators who voted to banish Ms. Pelosi's reform, 38 of them were her fellow Democrats."

WSJournal Criticizes Boehner For Exacting Retribution Against Flake. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (1/12, 2.04M) criticizes Minority Leader John Boehner's decision to "to punish Arizona's Jeff Flake by tossing him off the Judiciary Committee. The offense? Porkbusting." Flake should be "getting a promotion to the leadership, given how prescient he was in warning his colleagues about the perils of their run-amok 'earmarking.' He and a few comrades sponsored more than 40 House floor amendments last year to strip pork projects from spending bills. The National Taxpayers Union ranked him the most fiscally conservative member of the House. None of that sits very well with his House colleagues, who blame Mr. Flake for shining public attention on their spendthrift ways." If Republicans "think that punishing their most principled Members is smart politics, their time in exile could be very long indeed."

Democrats Say Bush "Still Playing Hardball" On Judges. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" section, "Despite withdrawal of four conservative nominees," Democrats say President Bush "is still playing hardball. California Sen. Feinstein fumes after Bush ignores her and Sen. Boxer in renominating Randy Smith of Idaho for a Ninth Circuit appeals-court seat traditionally held by a Californian. Conservative dominance on Virginia-based Fourth Circuit, which has three vacancies, is at risk. Freshman Democratic Sen. Webb objects to some candidates proposed by Republican Sen. Warner; the Virginia colleagues meet to discuss working together on judges." Democrats "seek records from Fifth District appointee Leslie Southwick's service in Reagan White House at time of Bork's Supreme Court nomination."

Democrats To Seek "Narrow" Tax Hikes. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" section, "Democrats seek to isolate Republicans with narrow tax-increase targets. House Speaker Pelosi identifies $500,000 earners -- a more exclusive group than party leaders have previously targeted -- as source of revenue for cutting middle-class taxes. Imposing pre-Bush 39.6% rate on those with incomes over $500,000 would raise more than $85 billion over four years, Tax Policy Center estimates." But the White House "sees any tax increases heightening Democrats' vulnerability."

GOP Criticizes Minimum Wage Bill For Exempting Pelosi Constituent. The Washington Times (1/12, Hurt, 88K) reports House Republicans "declared 'something fishy' about the major tuna company in House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's San Francisco district being exempted from the minimum-wage increase that Democrats approved this week." GOP Rep. Eric Cantor said, "I am shocked." While Speaker Pelosi "campaigned heavily on promises of honest government," Cantor said, "Now we find out that she is exempting hometown companies from minimum wage. This is exactly the hypocrisy and double talk that we have come to expect from the Democrats." The Times adds the bill "extends for the first time the federal minimum wage to the U.S. territory of the Northern Mariana Islands. However, it exempts American Samoa, another Pacific island territory that would become the only U.S. territory not subject to federal minimum-wage laws." One of the "biggest opponents of the federal minimum wage in Samoa is StarKist Tuna, which owns one of the two packing plants that together employ more than 5,000 Samoans, or nearly 75 percent of the island's work force."

DOJ_NMG_0115610

Some Republicans Worry Bush Will Cut Education Deal With Democrats. The Washington Times (1/12, Fagan, 88K) reports some congressional conservatives "are worried that President Bush will cut a deal with Democrats that would not only renew his education law, but also dramatically expand it, including perhaps more requirements for the high school level." Rep. Jeff Flake said, "I am concerned, and I think a lot of conservatives are." The Times adds Bush is "urging Congress this year to renew one of his biggest domestic accomplishments, the No Child Left Behind (NCLB) law of 2002, which aims to increase student achievement through more testing and by tracking results of schools and holding them accountable." Democrats "are demanding some changes to the law, most notably a significant boost in funding levels." Flake said he "sees a scenario in which Mr. Bush gives Democrats the increased funding they want in exchange for including more requirements for high school."

Democrats Plan Vote On Bill To Reduce College Loan Costs. USA Today (1/12, 1B, Block, 2.27M) reports the House "is scheduled to vote Wednesday on a Democratic plan to reduce the cost of borrowing for college. But easing student-loan interest rates won't provide much relief, critics say, unless lawmakers can somehow also slow the inexorable rise in the cost of college." In the "past five years, the average cost of in-state tuition and fees at public colleges has jumped 35% — after adjustment for inflation — according to the College Board. In the past 25 years, the average cost of tuition and fees has risen faster than personal income, consumer prices and even health insurance." Many conservatives "argue that increasing federal aid will just encourage colleges to raise tuition even more," but others "note, though, that in the past five years, college costs continued to rise faster than inflation, even though financial aid declined." USA also examines reasons for the increases in colleges costs.

Administration Scraps Risk Assessment Plan. The AP (1/12, Schmid) reports, "Federal agencies seeking to protect the public, the environment or setting rules in general often have to prepare risk assessments. A Bush administration attempt to standardize that process didn't work out, though, and will go back to the drawing board." The Office of Management and Budget "said it will not finalize its original proposal after the independent National Research Council called the plan 'fundamentally flawed.'"

The Wall Street Journal (1/12, A11, Fialka, 2.04M) says the move "could be a first for the Bush administration," and notes "OMB regulatory chief Steven Aitken said that the White House will modify its plan before making it final. He didn't say how it would be modified, however." Rep. John Dingell, chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, "applauded the move and urged the OMB to abandon the effort altogether, saying it 'ignores the specific statutory directives' Congress gives federal agencies." The New York Times (1/12, Dean, 1.16M) runs a similar report.

Johnson Transferred Out Of Intensive Care, Has Begun Speaking. NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 7, :20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Good news tonight on the condition of South Dakota Democratic Senator Tim Johnson. He suffered a severe stroke about a month ago and today he was transferred out of intensive care and into a rehab facility. You may recall that in addition to concerns over his health, his stroke had many fellow Democrats fearing they would lose their slim majority in the US Senate."

The New York Times/AP (1/12) reports that Johnson's "neurosurgeon, Dr. Vivek Deshmukh, said a magnetic resonance imaging exam on Tuesday showed that the speech centers in his brain were spared injury in the hemorrhage on Dec. 13. 'This is confirmed by the fact that he is following commands and has started to say words,' Dr. Deshmukh said in a statement." Johnson "is to have 'aggressive therapy' in inpatient rehabilitation at George Washington University Hospital, the statement said. On Monday, Mr. Johnson's condition was upgraded to fair from critical, and his doctors said he no longer needed a ventilator. He was being weaned off the tracheotomy tube in his neck, his office said Wednesday."

Burns Defends Hughes In Foreign Service Journal. The Washington Post's (1/12, A17) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns "has come to the defense of his colleague, undersecretary for public diplomacy -- and very close Bush friend -- Karen Hughes, in the latest issue of the Foreign Service Journal." Burns, in a "quite lengthy and impassioned rebuttal" to an October article in the journal, wrote "to express my strong disagreement with several assertions" in the piece, especially that she was "wary of the foreign service" and prefers "political appointees."

DOJ_NMG_0115611

National Defense University Computers Hacked. The Washington Times (1/12, Gertz, Scarborough, 88K) reports, "Computers and information networks at the National Defense University (NDU), the Joint Chiefs military education school at Fort McNair in Washington, were hacked and damaged by unknown attackers, defense officials said. The attacks, described by officials only as 'malicious activity,' caused the university to shut down all its network servers and replace laptop computers after the activity was detected last month. The costs were high, officials said."

Radio Chips Found In Canadian Coins Passed To Pentagon Contractors. The Washington Times (1/12, Hudson, 88K) reports, "Foreign spies are literally following the money to keep a close eye on Pentagon contractors, who are reporting that Canadian coins with Radio Frequency Identification chips have been planted in their clothing." A US Defense Security Service report says, "On at least three separate occasions between October 2005 and January 2006, cleared defense contractors' employees traveling through Canada have discovered radio frequency transmitters embedded in Canadian coins placed on their persons." Spokeswoman Martha Deutscher "confirmed the report and said it was intended to notify security officials, defense contractors and Pentagon policy-makers of spy technology being used."

Government's Official Web Portal Changes Name From FirstGov.gov To USA.gov. The Washington Post's (1/12, D3, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The government's official Web portal has changed its name from FirstGov.gov to USA.gov in response to feedback from the public that suggests the old name never caught on." The Post adds "USA.gov officially launches Thursday, GSA officials said, though the new name was on display yesterday for Web surfers."

First Lady Tours Renovated Treasury Building. The AP (1/12, Crutsinger) reports First Lady Laura Bush "went next door to the Treasury Department Thursday and pronounced herself impressed with the remodeling at 1500 Pennsylvania Avenue." Mrs. Bush "joined Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson in a ribbon cutting ceremony to mark the completion of a 10-year renovation of the Treasury Building, which is the third oldest government structure in Washington behind the Capitol and the White House." The "current structure, begun in 1836, had not undergone a major renovation since the beginning of the last century. The 10-year project, finished at a cost of $247 million, restored the buildings' lost grandeur by uncovering painted ceilings and skylights that had not been seen for decades and by refurbishing the ornate Cash Room, site of Ulysses Grant's first inaugural ball in 1869."

The Washington Post (1/12, C1, Stepp, 690K) reports, "Like the wallflower who glams up before going to a party, hoping someone will pay attention, Treasury has just completed a $247 million renovation, and a hundred or so people were on hand to witness Laura Bush celebrate the moment. So, okay, maybe most of those people came to see the first lady, including the half-dozen reporters and photographers who accompanied her on a private tour of the building's most-prized rooms."

OTHER NEWS:

Fed Official Issues Warning About Threats To Economy. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Ip, 2.04M) reports, "New York Fed President Timothy Geithner delivered one of his strongest warnings yet on threats facing the US economy, citing the budget deficit, fixed exchange rates and growing inequality. In his three years on the job, Mr. Geithner has taken on the New York Fed's traditional role as chief worry wart. But some of his past warnings have been muffled by opaque and wonky language." The official "was far clearer in a speech today to the Council on Foreign Relations in New York. He said some countries, to keep their currencies fixed to the dollar, are accumulating big reserves of dollar-denominated securities, thereby holding down long-term interest rates, which might be distorting US growth and investment. He didn't name the offenders, but China and some Persian Gulf oil exporters are probable candidates." He "also ventured into politically charged terrain that Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke has tried to avoid. (He will be tested on that when he appears before the Senate Budget Committee next Thursday.) Mr. Geithner warned that current year deficits are too high while Mr. Bernanke has generally limited his concerns to the threat of higher entitlement spending in later years."

DOJ_NMG_0115612

Jobless Claims Down. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, A2, Blackstone, 2.04M) reports, "The number of US workers filing new claims for unemployment benefits tumbled in the latest week, pushing below a key threshold and providing further evidence that labor market conditions remain quite strong. New claims for unemployment insurance decreased by 26,000 to 299,000 in the week ended Jan. 6, the Labor Department said Thursday, the lowest level since July 22, when claims were also 299,000."

Plunging Oil Prices Could Benefit Economy. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, A1, Whitehouse, Davis, Bahree, 2.04M) reports, "Oil prices fell sharply yesterday and are now hovering at their lowest levels since mid-2005, raising the prospect of significant changes in the outlook for corporate profits, consumer spending and the global economy. Crude oil fell another $2.14, or 4%, to $51.88 a barrel yesterday on the New York Mercantile Exchange. The price has plunged 15% since the year began." The "slide, which market participants said was fueled in part by speculative hedge-fund trading and a retreat by other investors, helped send stocks higher as investors bet lower energy prices would fatten corporate profits and strengthen economic growth, particularly in the U.S." If "sustained, the decline in prices would have a big impact on everything from the American consumer to the profits of giant energy companies. It also could dent the revenues -- and the political clout -- of major oil-producing nations like Russia, Iran and Venezuela."

The New York Times (1/12, Krauss, 1.16M) reports the fall in oil prices provides "potential relief to consumers. But investors in energy stocks may wish for a cold spell after they see the fourth-quarter earnings of their stocks in the next few weeks." The Times adds, "Declining oil prices helped drive up the broader stock market, raising hopes that with inflation fears abating somewhat, the Federal Reserve may even consider lowering interest rates in the coming months." OPEC President "Muhammad bin Dhaen al-Hamli of the United Arab Emirates, was said to have told the Emirates news agency that the group would move to prop up prices if necessary." But "few American analysts seemed to take his implied warning of possible future production cuts very seriously."

Stocks Rally, With Dow At Record High. NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 11, :10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Back here in New York today some gains on Wall Street. The Dow was more than 72 points today [to close at 12,524.98]. NASDAQ also up 25 and half points [to close at 2,484.85] on today's trading." The Washington Post/AP (1/12, D4) notes the Dow topped "the previous record close reached on Dec. 27 by 4.41 points. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 8.97, or 0.63 percent, to 1423.82." The Wall Street Journal (1/12, C1, Browning, 2.04M) and USA Today (1/12, 6B, Krantz, 2.27M) run similar stories.

Federal Judge Allows Sex Abuse Suit Against Vatican To Proceed. The Louisville (KY) Courier-Journal (1/12, Riley) reports, "A federal judge in Louisville issued a 'historic' decision yesterday by refusing to dismiss a lawsuit against the Vatican that alleges a cover-up to protect priests who molested American children. … 'This is the first and only case which has as its sole objective holding the Vatican financially accountable for all of the childhood sexual abuses committed in the U.S.,' said Louisville attorney William McMurry, who filed the suit in 2004 on behalf of three men who allege abuse dating as far back as 1928." The Courier-Journal continues, "If U.S. District Judge John Heyburn II's decision stands, it could open the door for attorneys to take depositions of Vatican officials -- including Pope Benedict XVI -- obtain copies of church records and documents and ultimately determine 'what prompted all of the bishops to keep quiet, hide these pedophiles and refuse to report child abusers,' McMurry said. He called the decision 'historic.' … But Jeffrey Lena of Berkeley, Calif., counsel for the Vatican, known legally as the Holy See, said Heyburn's decision rejected portions of McMurry's lawsuit and left the case hanging on a 'fairly weak linchpin' -- that U.S. Catholic clergy are employees of the Vatican. … 'The Holy See is just not responsible for this, and that's the bottom line,' Lena said." The Courier-Journal notes, "Regardless, the case could be entangled in appeals for years before eventually ending up at the U.S. Supreme Court, McMurry and Lena said. … One of the three plaintiffs is Michael Turner of Louisville, who also filed the first in a wave of roughly 250 sexual-abuse lawsuits against the Archdiocese of Louisville between 2002 and 2003. The litigation culminated in a $25.7 million settlement with most of the plaintiffs. McMurry and his legal team received 40 percent of most plaintiffs' payments. … The two other plaintiffs in the Vatican suit are James H. O'Bryan and Donald E. Poppe, both of whom live in California and say they were abused by priests while growing up in Louisville. All three are asking for unspecified monetary damages from the Vatican."

DOJ_NMG_0115613

Dodd Announces He Will Make '08 Bid For White House. The AP (1/12, Fouhy) reports that Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd (D) "announced Thursday he will run for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008, saying problems at home and abroad meant it was time for him to 'get out of the bleachers and onto the arena floor.'" Dodd, who announced his bid on MSNBC's "Imus in the Morning" show, said, "There's a heightened sense of urgency about the condition of the country. But it isn't just Iraq -- there are problems here at home that are huge." Dodd "said he planned to focus on issues like education, energy policy and health care in his campaign."

The Connecticut Post (1/12, Urban) reports that Dodd "filed a statement of candidacy with the Federal Election Commission on Thursday that will allow him to begin raising funds directly as a presidential candidate. He plans to transfer nearly $5 million sitting in his Senate campaign into the new effort. Imus praised Dodd's experience and intellect and said he would raise the level of debate but admitted he was backing Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., for president in 2008. 'Wait a minute. Wait a minute. I come on the program. I blow everybody else off. I announce here. I mean, at least leave the door open for me a little here,' Dodd cajoled. 'A little quid pro quo, I mean I'm your pal.'"

USA Today (1/12, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports that Dodd "acknowledges his odds are long, calling himself 'not as well known' as other prospects. He said the first contests are a year away and lightning could strike. 'I wanted to get out of the bleachers and onto the arena floor and make my case,' he said. Dodd, 62, said he has been involved with 'every major foreign policy and domestic issue of the last quarter century.' He also said he's a 'fresh face.' Political analysts agree that he is not a household name, which is a problem after 30 years in politics. 'He has not staked out a national reputation or a national identity of any kind,' said Dan Carter, a political historian teaching at the University of Richmond."

In Seeking Presidency, Dodd Touts His Experience. Sen. Dodd said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/11, Matthews), "I think all of us understand things at home and abroad are very difficult and the country is desperate for leadership that will be honest with them that will ask them to get involved in solving some of the huge problems we face, in energy, health care, the environment, the like, foreign policy. I think people want to see a positive attitude about what needs to be done to get us back on track. I think experience matters. In almost every other cycle I could think about, if you said I've been in the Senate for 25 years you'd be disqualified from running. But I think this time around, in light of what we've been through for the past six years, I think experience matters, experience where you can demonstrate a capability to bring people together, to come up with big ideas, to solve problems in the country. I've had that experience, on the foreign relations committee, on domestic policy. And so I decided this time around I'm not going to sit in the bleachers."

Dodd Says He's Hopeful Lieberman Will Back His White House Bid. On CNN's The Situation Room (1/11, Blitzer), Sen. Christopher Dodd was asked if his Connecticut colleague Sen. Joseph Lieberman is supporting his presidential campaign. Dodd said, "He's not taking a position yet and look, we're great friends. We had a bit of a difficulty last summer and fall with his race as an independent, but I was the chairman of Joe's campaign nationally for president. I nominated him when he ran for vice president. ... I'm hopeful Joe will be supportive, but he's going to take his time. I didn't ask him for his support. I'm sure it will work out."

Senator Slams Bush's New Plan For Iraq As "Unsound Strategy." The New York Times (1/12, Medina, 1.16M) reports, "A senior Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and a former Peace Corps volunteer, Mr. Dodd said he would spend much of his time concentrating on international affairs. 'People are asking a critical question -- what kind of experience do you need? -- especially after watching an administration that seems to have needed more on-the-job training instead of understanding as you go in. I have worked at this stuff for a long time." Mr. Dodd voted in favor of the 2002 Senate resolution supporting the administration plan to invade Iraq, but he has since said he regrets that vote. In a Senate hearing with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Thursday, the day after President Bush's televised address calling for more troops in Iraq, Mr. Dodd said it would be 'unsound strategy' to add more troops and urged a greater effort at diplomatic contacts instead." In an interview, Dodd "also said he would vote in favor of withholding money for more troops. 'Everyone knows this is a failed policy,' Mr. Dodd said of the president's war leadership. 'This is hardly a change of policy; it is more of the same, which hasn't been working.'"

"New England Liberal" Label Seen As Potentially Problematic For Dodd. The AP (1/12, Miga) reports that "Dodd's image as a Northeast liberal could pose a hurdle in his longshot bid for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination." Dodd "will be running in the turbulent wake of another prominent New England liberal, Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass. Kerry's losing 2004 campaign embittered some Democrats who contend he squandered a prime chance for his party to capture the White House. Those bad feelings have lingered as the 2008 contest begins to unfold. 'The party just nominated a New England liberal whose campaign was a failure,' said Dante Scala, an associate professor of politics at Saint Anselm College in New Hampshire. … 'That's going to be one strike against' Dodd." Dodd, meanwhile, dismissed "any suggestion that his Northeast liberal roots could hurt his candidacy. 'It's a false assumption,'" Dodd said in a telephone interview," adding, "People don't think in those terms. … Most Americans don't care about these labels we put on."

DOJ_NMG_0115614

Denver To Host '08 Democratic Presidential Convention. NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 10, :25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "After months of negotiation, the Democratic Party announced today it will hold its 2008 convention one mile above sea level, in Denver, Colorado. Like most things these days, there's politics behind it. Democrats have recently gained some ground in the West. Something the party is hoping to highlight and take advantage of. The Republicans have already announced they will gather in the Twin Cities."

The AP (1/12) reports that in a statement Thursday, DNC Chairman Howard Dean said, "There is no question that the West is important to the future of the Democratic Party. … The recent Democratic gains in the West exemplify the principle that when we show up and ask for people's votes and talk about what we stand for, we can win in any part of the country." The AP notes, "Denver mounted a spirited effort to win the convention, organizing a sophisticated public relations campaign and enlisting help from Democratic lawmakers throughout the West. But the bid was fraught with logistical problems, among them a lack of close-in hotel rooms, its ability to raise the necessary $55 million to run the convention and serious labor concerns." Denver's "bid was nearly scuttled last month when the influential stagehands union refused to agree not to strike if the convention was held at the nonunion Pepsi Center. In the end, Mr. Dean enlisted the help of labor leaders in Washington, including AFL-CIO President John Sweeney and Andy Stern, president of the Service Employees International Union. A compromise was reached to staff the Pepsi Center entirely with union labor for the duration of the convention, effectively taking the last major obstacle off the table."

Schwarzenegger Defies Conventional Political Categories. The New York Times (1/12, Steinhauer, 1.16M) notes California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's diverse policy proposals, such as "proposing California be the first state to limit carbon dioxide emissions from cars" but also calling for "above-ground water storage, announced hours after his move to limit emissions." Schwarzenegger is "in many ways…sui generis, a celebrity-turned-politician hurled toward the center by California's Democratic majority. And since he can never run for president, his governorship is most likely the outlet for his more audacious ideas." But his "recent leadership is also the largest example of a growing movement in which state leaders are crossing party lines to get things done. While partisan polarization limits activity in Washington, D.C., state governments are addressing issues the federal government has not tackled."

Emissions Plan Leaves Means For Meeting Target Up To Industry. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, A2, Ball, 2.04M) reports, "California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's plan to require a 10% cut in the carbon content of its transportation fuels embodies a strategy to combat global warming that is likely to become more common around the world. Instead of mandating the rollout of specific technologies, such as electric cars or ethanol pumps, California has set an emissions-related target and says it will leave it up to industry to figure out how to meet it." The state is gambling "that the hands-off approach will unleash fights of economic self-interest among various industries -- fights that will, in the end, force industry to support a broad, economywide cap on carbon emissions. The broader the effort, the cheaper it is likely to be for any given company to cut its carbon emissions."

Krugman Says Schwarzenegger Health Plan Flawed. In his New York Times column (1/12), Paul Krugman says he is "of two minds" about Gov. Schwarzenegger's "ambitious plan to bring universal health insurance to California." It is "very encouraging to see another Republican governor endorse the principle that all Americans are entitled to essential health care," and if "California — America's biggest state, with a higher-than-average percentage of uninsured residents — can achieve universal coverage, so can the nation as a whole." But

DOJ_NMG_0115615

Schwarzenegger's "plan has serious flaws. Maybe those flaws could be fixed once the principle of universal coverage was established — but there's also the chance that we would end up stuck with those flaws, the way we ended up stuck with a dysfunctional system of insurance tied to employment." Schwarzenegger "appears to sincerely want universal coverage, but he also wants to keep insurance companies in the loop. As a result, he came up with a plan that, like the failed Clinton health care plan of the early 1990s, is best described as a Rube Goldberg device — a complicated, indirect way of achieving what a single-payer system would accomplish simply and directly."

Bush Sr. Plans To Jump Out Of Airplane For 85th Birthday. The Houston Chronicle (1/12, Freemantle, 530K) reports, "A week after getting a new right hip, former President George H.W. Bush is recuperating at his Houston home, receiving visitors, worrying about his children, dutifully doing physical therapy and already thinking about jumping out of an airplane again. He's going to do it in June 2009 for his 85th birthday, he said. For sure. Even though his wife, Barbara, thinks it's crazy." In a "brief interview," Bush said "his hip is fine." The Washington Post (1/12, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K), in its "Reliable Source" column, quotes Bush chief of staff Jean Becker saying, "I almost fell off my chair when I heard him say this, but he is serious."

Professor Says Anna Nicole Smith Is Ultimate Forum-Shopper. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (1/12, A13), Ronald A. Cass, chairman of the Center for the Rule of Law and dean emeritus of Boston University School of Law, writes, "Anna Nicole Smith makes for good copy. America's most gaudy litigant has spent the last few months dodging eviction notices in the Bahamas and paternity-test subpoenas in the U.S. … In the midst of all of this, she has kept up her long-running litigation over the estate of her late husband, J. Howard Marshall II. The litigation, which initially was filed more than a dozen years ago against heirs to the estate of her husband, has changed into a suit against the heirs of E. Pierce Marshall, her husband's son, who died unexpectedly last summer. … Ms. Smith, a Texan who married a Texan, still comes to court in California seeking a sizeable share of J. Howard Marshall's Texas-based estate. At the same time, she asserts that she is now a resident of the Bahamas, so California courts lack jurisdiction over her in the paternity litigation. Outlandish as this soap opera appears, her manipulation of our legal system could have significance to the law and to the rule of law. That is why devotees of serious news, as well as tabloid aficionados, should give heed." Cass continues, "Ms. Smith's story demonstrates that a determined litigant with resources can move litigation among legal forums, tailor legal claims to prolong litigation, tie up assets, and make life difficult enough that most opponents would pay substantial amounts merely to bring the matter to a close. A victory for her would encourage forum-shopping, multiply costs and undermine the predictability of legal rules, doing damage that would last well beyond her 15 minutes of fame. A defeat for her would show that the system can at long last bring such manipulation to an end. And if that is what comes from her extended venture into the American court system, it would be a better legacy than any other she is apt to leave behind."

US Airstrikes Missed Targets In Somalia. The Washington Post (1/12, A1, McCrummen, 690K) reports a "small team of American military personnel entered southern Somalia to try to determine exactly who was killed in a US airstrike Monday," US sources said Thursday. So far, "no one can confirm a high-value target" among the dead, said one US source.

The New York Times/AP (1/12) reports American and Somali officials "have acknowledged that a small team of American Special Operations forces are in Somalia hunting suspected Qaeda fighters and providing military advice to Ethiopian and Somali forces on the ground."

Separately, the AP (1/12, Tomlinson) reports Ethiopian and US forces "were in pursuit of three top al-Qaeda suspects Thursday, with a senior US official confirming that none of them were killed in a US airstrike and were believed to still be in Somalia." The official in Kenya "said US special operations forces were focused solely on tracking down the suspected terrorists and not members of the Somali Islamic movement." Abdirizak Hassan, the Somali president's chief of staff, had previously said US airstrikes had killed Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, but the US official "said he was confident none of the three top al-Qaeda suspects believed to be in Somalia was killed in the airstrike Monday." The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Sanders, 850K) identifies the source of the report as US Ambassador to Kenya Michael E. Ranneberger.

The Financial Times (1/12, England) notes Monday's strike was "criticised by the European Commission, as well as the Arab League which claimed it had killed 'many innocent victims' and demanded that Washington refrain from further attacks."

DOJ_NMG_0115616

The Washington Times (1/12, Sands, 88K) reports Somalia and its neighbors "risk falling under the sway of al Qaeda and violent Islamist movements if the United States and its allies fail to back the transitional government in Mogadishu," a top Somali foreign ministry official said yesterday. In an interview with the Times, Daahir Mireh Jibreel, permanent secretary for international cooperation in Somalia's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, said, "If we fail in Somalia, you will have [al Qaeda second-in-command Ayman] al-Zawahri's men taking over Somalia, Ethiopia and Kenya, because he has the resources and determination if he is not stopped."

Echoing Jibreel's concerns, the Christian Science Monitor (1/12, Baldauf, Okeowo, 59K) says that "keeping the peace" in Somalia "in the midst of what some say is becoming an Iraq-style insurgency, could be a much more difficult job." While "Western money will help to foot the bill," a UN-backed African peacekeeping force "may please Western powers, but it doesn't go down well at home, where poor African countries like Uganda and Nigeria have myriad problems of their own, from unemployment and illiteracy to ongoing domestic conflicts. And, while many see the moment as an opportunity to provide African solutions to African problems, the failure of the African Union peacekeeping force to provide security in Darfur, Sudan, is not an promising sign."

Apparent Slowdown In Iran Nuclear Work Sparks Concern. The AP (1/12, Jahn) reports Iran's uranium enrichment program "appears stalled despite tough talk from the Tehran leadership, leaving intelligence services guessing about why it has not made good on plans to press ahead with activities that the West fears could be used to make nuclear arms," diplomats said Thursday. Tehran's "reluctance to crank up activities at its declared enrichment site at Natanz when it seems to have the technical know-how is puzzling the diplomatic and intelligence communities -- with some saying it was potentially worrisome." Diplomats linked to the International Atomic Energy Agency "said some intelligence services believed that the Natanz site was a front." While the world's attention is focused on Natanz, Iranian scientists and military personnel "could be working on a secret enrichment program at one or more unknown sites that are much more advanced than what is going on at the declared site," they said.

US Aid Package Seen As Expansion Of Role In Palestinian Crisis. In a 2,000-word front page article, the Wall Street Journal (1/12, A1, Simpson, King, 2.04M) reports, "In a move fraught with risk and historical ironies, the Bush administration is preparing to pour $86 million into strengthening security forces loyal to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas." The plan, "which has sparked a behind-the-scenes debate in Congress," is "just one example of how a new Bush administration focus on countering Iranian influence in the Middle East is quickly reshaping and regionalizing conflicts." The security program, which "was detailed recently in classified briefings for Congress by a US general who now serves as an adviser to Abbas," precedes Secretary Rice's weeklong to the region, where the administration is "promising Arab regimes political progress for the Palestinians in their attempts to establish a state next to Israel." The program drew some concern last week as the ranking Republican on the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida, "asked the Democratic chairman, Rep. Tom Lantos, to put an 'informational hold' on the cash, according to senior Democratic and Republican House aides." Lantos has not placed a hold on the money, "but his staff says he is seeking more details from the administration."

Issue Of Succession Raises Stir In Egypt. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, A6, Fam, 2.04M) reports Egyptian journalist Ibrahim Essa "says the Mubarak regime wants to intimidate him for, among other things, harshly criticizing the current president and raising a stink about who Egypt's next president might be." President Hosni Mubarak "has recently asked parliament to amend some constitutional articles, in part to encourage more political participation by opposition parties, but the opposition is skeptical there will be real liberalization." With the Mubarak's son Gamal seen as his likely successor critics of the regime says the government "has been cracking down on opposition figures in part to eliminate possible challengers to the younger Mubarak." The Journal notes that while Mubarak "sees his regime as a stabilizing force in the Middle East, and Egypt remains a main US ally in the region, many feel Cairo's clout as a peacemaker and power broker has waned amid the rising influence of hard-liners such as Iran."

DOJ_NMG_0115617

Carter Center Board Members Resign Over Book Controversy. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Brooks, McKay, 2.04M) reports fourteen members of an advisory board at the Carter Center resigned Thursday, saying they could "no longer in good conscience continue to serve" following publication of former President Jimmy Carter's controversial book, "Palestine Peace Not Apartheid." In a letter, the board members said, "It seems that you have turned to a world of advocacy, including even malicious advocacy. We can no longer endorse your strident and uncompromising position." The New York Times (1/12, Goodman, 1.16M) also reports on the resignations.

Bangladesh Elections Delayed As President Resigns. The AP (1/12, Hossain) reports Bangladesh's president, Iajuddin Ahmed, Thursday "declared a state of emergency, stepped down as interim leader of Bangladesh's caretaker government and postponed this month's elections following violent protests by a key political alliance that has said it would boycott the vote." President Ahmed said in a televised speech that the balloting would be delayed, and he did not give a new date. The Financial Times (1/12, Joehnk) notes the decision "follows weeks of violent protests and rioting between the opposition parties and police ahead of the planned parliamentary elections." The New York Times (1/12, A3, Sengupta, 1.16M) says the move "came a day after the United Nations suspended technical support for the coming elections," saying that they would not be "considered credible or legitimate." Two teams of American election observers, as well as one that was to be dispatched by the European Union, also pulled out.

Venezuela May Nationalize Orinoco Oil Projects. The AP (1/12) reports, "Venezuela could nationalize four projects in the oil-rich Orinoco River basin if the state is unable to negotiate a majority stake with the foreign oil companies that run them, the finance minister said yesterday. The state could nationalize the four projects in the Orinoco oil belt 'if the negotiations with the foreign oil companies that control them fail,' Finance Minister Rodrigo Cabezas said." His "remarks clarified that the government is still seeking to obtain majority control through talks with the companies after President Hugo Chavez announced plans this week to take control of 'strategic sectors' in telecommunications, power, oil and natural gas."

Human Rights Group Criticizes China's Abuses. The Washington Post (1/12, A10, Fan, 690K) reports human rights conditions in China "deteriorated significantly in 2006, with about 100 activists, lawyers, writers and academics subjected to police custody, house arrest, incommunicado confinement, pressure in their jobs and surveillance by plainclothes security forces," a new report by Human Rights Watch said. Several widely publicized cases involving journalists and rights lawyers were cited in the report "as evidence of a severe crackdown, prompted in large part by fears that individual cases of unrest might lead to regional instability."

Nigeria Considers Bill Banning Gay Marriage. In a front page article, the Wall Street Journal (1/12, A1, Schoofs, 2.04M) reports a proposed law in Nigeria that "would punish by up to five years in prison anyone who enters into a gay marriage." The Journal notes that "gay men and lesbians are becoming more visible" in Nigeria, "even as their society, which is hostile to homosexuality, threatens to become still less tolerant of them." The State Department has "denounced the bill, proposed in January last year, as a violation of basic freedoms."

UN Chief Seeks To Clarify Death Penalty Stance. The New York Times (1/12, A6, Hoge, 1.16M) reports UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon "sought Thursday to change the impression he left in his first public utterance as United Nations head last week about his position on the death penalty." In a statement, Ban said, "I recognize the growing trend in international law and in national practice towards a phasing out of the death penalty. I encourage that trend."

WPost Urges International Campaign Against Rights Abuses In Burma. In an editorial, the Washington Post (1/12, A18, 690K) says the Bush administration is "pressing the UN Security Council to vote, possibly as early as today, to condemn one of the world's worst human rights violators: the military regime of Burma," but notes that the resolution "doesn't call for sanctions or other punitive measures; it would simply make clear that the most august assembly of nations finds Burma's behavior unacceptable and will press for change." The Post says a UN resolution "by itself won't bring change. But a resolution as part of a concerted international campaign might," noting that "just this week, hoping to head off a vote, Burma released five political dissidents from prison (leaving about 1,100)."

DOJ_NMG_0115618

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"In Both Parties, Doubts Cloud Bush's Iraq Plan."
"A Pair Of Stars, an I.A. Sky, A Happy Galaxy."
"Beauty, But Only On Canvas."
"It May Be Too Late To Secure Baghdad's Mix."
"Mideast Shaking Its Head."
"Military Families Must Reset Clock."

USA Today:
"For A Fee, Fliers Won't Shed Shoes."
"Hanging Out With Junior."
"Sales Job Kicks Off For Bush Iraq Plan."

New York Times:
"Bush's Plan For Iraq Runs Into Opposition In Congress."
"A 2-Month White House Debate On Iraq, Capped By 'the Big Push'."
"G.I.'s In Iraq Raid Iranians' Offices."
"A Soccer Star Heads To U.S., Heeding Lure Of Hollywood."
"Duke Accuser Contradicts Herself."
"As States Innovate, Schwarzenegger Blurs Lines."
"In Traffic's Jam, Who's Driving May Be Surprising."

Washington Post:
"Bush to Add 20,000 Troops In An Effort To Stabilize Iraq."
"Bush to Add 20,000 Troops To Stabilize Iraq."
"For His First 100 Days, Fenty Outlines 200 Goals."
"Democrats Aim To Block Funds For Plan."
"Intensified Combat On Streets Likely."
"Kaine Presses GOP For Deal On Transportation Funding."
"In Ehrlich's 2-Party Test Run, A Rough Ride But Few Regrets."
"Fairfax VS. 'No Child' Standoff Heats Up."
"Apple Chief Benefited From Options Dating, Records Indicate."

Washington Times:
"Rice, Gates Face Hill heat Over Iraq Plan."
"Cow Season In Cambodia."
"House Expands Stem-Cell Research."
"Beckham To Spice Up L.A."
"Senate Democrats Stall Pork-Reform Vote."

Detroit Free Press:
"School Anger Boils Over."
"City-Owned Slum Awaits Wreckers."
"Cobo Plan A Reality In 6 Months?"
"War Plan: An 'Augmentation'."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Needy get Cost Break At Emory."
"Aquarium Whale Shark Dies."
"Selling The Plan."
"14 Carter Center Advisers Resign Because Of Book."

Houston Chronicle:
"Iraq Plans Ignites A Scatching Debate."
"State Judge Halts Illegal Immigrant Rental Ban."
"Spend It Like Beckham."
"A Bitter And Deepening Divide."
"Houston's Plan To Expand Parks Slow To Take Root."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: New Iraq Strategy-Hearings; Bush Speaks To Troops; ABC New Poll-Iraq War; Troops Securing Baghdad; Interrupting Iran's Support; Fallen Soldier Honored; US Troop Surge-Military Reaction; New Orleans March; Stem Cell Research Vote; Beckham Comes Too US; Pictures From The Womb.
CBS: Bush Speaks To Troops; New Iraq Strategy-Hearings; Bush Speech Poll Results; Bush Speaks To Troops; Military Personnel Increase; New Orleans March; Stem Cell Research Vote; Veterans' Disability Benefits; Fallen Soldier Honored; Beckham Now In The US.
NBC: New Iraq Strategy-Reaction; New Iraq Strategy-Hearings; New Iraq Strategy-Analysis; Anti Iran Strategy; Fallen Soldier Honored; New US Surge-Reaction; Sen. Johnson Recovery; Katrina Legal Victory; New Orleans March; Democratic Convention-Denver; Stock Market; Beckham Plays US Soccer.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Attack On U.S. Embassy In Athens, Greece; National Guard And Reserve Told They Could Be Called Back To Iraq; Iraq War Protests Across U.S.; Congress-Stem Cell Research Bill; CA-Cold Weather; Super Bowl Turf Preparations.
CBS: Attack On U.S. Embassy In Athens, Greece; Secretary Gates-Congress; Congress-Stem Cell Research Bill; Congress-Medicare Drug Price Negotiation Bill; New Orleans-Increased Violence; James Brown's Will; Dallas, TX-Peeping Tom Teacher.

DOJ_NMG_0115619

NPR: Attack On U.S. Embassy In Athens, Greece; Trial For London Subway Bombers Underway; Guantanamo Bay Protests; Palm Beach County Courthouse-Letters Containing White Substance Found; Tokyo Stock Exchange; New Orleans-Demonstrations Against Increased Violence; Bush Administration-Safety Of Children's Toys.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Departs White House for Camp David.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on Iraq. Defense Secretary Gates, Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace. Location: Room 216, Hart.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 9 a.m. FLOOR SCHEDULE _ Meets for legislative business. Highlights: Fifteen ``One Minutes Per Side. H.R. 4 - Requiring the Department of Health and Human Services to negotiate for lower prescription drug cost.

10 a.m. FLOOR SCHEDULE _ Meets for legislative business. Highlights: H.R. 4 - Democrat Drug Price Control.

Other: KING DAY-RELATED EVENTS _ Highlights: 11 a.m. Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne will speak at a Special Observance of the 78th Birthday of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. US Department of the Interior Auditorium, 1849 C St. NW. 11 a.m. The National Park Service holds its Martin Luther King, Jr. Day ceremony. Yates Auditorium, main Interior. 11 a.m. Marriott International holds a ceremony honoring Dr. King. Headquarters, 10400 Fernwood Rd., Bethesda. 1 p.m. The Institute of the Black World 21st Century holds a roundtable discussion with inter-generational black leaders, including Julianne Malveaux, Ron Walters, Malia Lazu, others. Busboys and Poets, 14th and V Sts. NW. 1 p.m. The National Park Service lays a wreath at the Lincoln Memorial.

PENTAGON-IRAQ SECURITY _ 9 a.m. Marine Col. William B. Crowe, commander of 7th Regional Combat Team, will brief live from Iraq to provide an update on ongoing security operations in Iraq. Location: DOD Briefing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

IRAQ _ 9:30 a.m. The Congressional Progressive Caucus holds a forum on Iraq and disengagement, with former Sen. George McGovern and William Polk. Location: Cannon Caucus Room.

RUSSIA-DEMOCRACY _ 10 a.m. The National Endowment for Democracy holds a discussion on prospects for Russian democracy with Garry Kasparov, Leon Aron of AEI, and Stephan Sestanovich of the Council on Foreign Relations. Location: 8th floor, 1025 F St. NW.

SCHARIOTH-GERMANY _ 10 a.m. German Ambassador Dr. Klaus Scharioth addresses a National Press Club morning newsmaker. Topic: ``Priorities of Germany's EU and G8 Programs." Location: National Press Club, Conference Rooms.

SOCIAL SECURITY _ 10 a.m. The Cornell University Employment and Disability Institute holds a forum on the Social Security disability system for the 21st century, with Dorcas Hardy of the Social Security Advisory Board, others. Location: Room 333, Hall of States, 444 N. Capitol St.

ISLAMIC RADICALISM _ 10 a.m. - 12 p.m. The Jamestown Foundation hosts an address by Igor Rotar Forum 18 News Service, a war correspondent who has covered stories ranging from the Tajik Civil War to the activities of the Islamic Movement of Uzbekistan. Rotar will speak on ``The Future of Islamic Radicalism and Religious Freedom in Central Asia." Location: The Jamestown Foundation, 7th Floor Board Room, 1111 16th St. NW.

PELOSI-MAYORS _ 10:30 a.m. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and the leadership of the United States Conference of Mayors, led by Conference President and Mayor of Trenton, New Jersey, Douglas H. Palmer, will hold a photo opportunity immediately following their meeting to discuss critical issues facing America's cities. Location: Room H-230, Capitol.

SCIENCE-POLICY _ 12 p.m. The American Association for the Advancement of Science, American Geophysical Union, others, hold a workshop for congressional staff members on the role of science in public policy, with Science magazine Editor-in-Chief Donald Kennedy, Andrew Dessler of Texas A&M University, others. Location: Room 2325, Rayburn.

MCGOVERN-IRAQ _ 12:30 p.m. George McGovern, former Senator and 1972 Democratic presidential nominee, will discuss his plans for withdrawing US troops from Iraq at a

DOJ_NMG_0115620

National Press Club luncheon. Location: National Press Club.

ARMY-NASCAR _ 2:30 p.m. The Army National Guard kicks off the 2007 NASCVAR NEXTELK Cup season with a ceremony marking its sponsorship of Hendrick Motorsports' No. 25 cars, with driver Casey Mears and Crew Chief Lance McGrew. Location: Army National Guard Readiness Center, 111 S. George Mason Dr., Arlington.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, JANUARY 12, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Holiday Publishing Notice 3
Gonzales Urges US Attorneys Help Guard Against Terrorist Threats 3
US Gearing Up For Prosecutions Of Top Al Qaeda Detainees..... 3
More Than 80 Arrested At Anti-Guantanamo Protest In Washington 4
Alleged Tamil Tiger Leader Extradited To Face US Charges 4
Attack On US Embassy In Athens Called "Act Of Terrorism." 4
ASEAN Member States Considering Regional Antiterror Pact 4

Homeland Response:

Administration Moves To Ease Anti-Terrorism Restrictions For Refugees 4
Registered Traveler Customers At Orlando International Can Start Leaving Shoes On 5
Former Ohio Imam Transferred To Israeli Custody 5
Suspicious Powders Cause Terror Scares At Two Florida Courthouses 5
EU Says DHS Has Eased Privacy Concerns Over Security Program 5
NYTimes Urges Lieberman To Change Views On State Minimums For Security Funding 6
Jury Awards $2.5 Million In Punitive Damages In Katrina Insurance Suit 6

War News:

Bush Defends Iraq Plan In Visit To Military Base 6
Bush Awards Fallen Corporal Posthumous Medal Of Honor 9
Bush Said To Have Led Commanders To Conclude More Troops Needed 9
Congress Blasts New Bush Iraq Plan 10
Rice To Seek Support For Bush Plan In Mideast Trip 12
Gates Proposes Adding 92,000 To Army, Marine Active Forces 13
Pentagon To Recall Army National Guard Units 13
Britain Plans To Proceed With Iraq Troop Cuts 13
Intelligence Officials Offer "Bleak Assessment" Of World Conflict Zones 14
Rice Names Carney As New Iraq Reconstruction Chief 14
US-Led Forces Detain Six Iranians At Office In Northern Iraq 14
US, Iraqi Forces Find "Little Evidence" Of Massing Insurgents In Diyala 15
"Chemical Ali" Tells Court He Ordered Kurdish Executions In 1988 15
Afghan Insurgent Says His Fighters Helped Bin Laden, Zawahiri Escape Tora Bora 15
Afghan, NATO Troops Kill Up To 150 Insurgents Entering From Pakistan 15

DOJ:

Congressional Budget Delays Hit DOJ Agencies With Hiring Freeze 16
San Diego US Attorney Asked To Resign 16

Corporate Scandals:

US Probing Apple Stock Option Grant To Jobs 16
Broadcom To Restate Financial Data To Include Misdated Stock Option Costs 17
Former Siemens CFO Named As Suspect In Bribery Probe 17
NYSE Probing Former Merrill Brokers In Timing Case 17

Criminal Law:

Fitzgerald Case Against Libby "Seemingly Weakened." 17
Puerto Rico DOJ Asks Court To Order Release Of FBI Raid Documents 17
Tennessee Waltz Trial Goes To Jury 18
FBI Recovers Picasso Drawings Stolen From NYC Apartment 18
Three Detained In Killing Of Tennessee Couple 18
US Raids Porn Studios To Enforce Age Rules 19
Pennsylvania Man Sentenced To 30 Months In Prison For Appraisal Fraud 19
Jury Hears Confession Of Man Charged With Killing New York Doctor 19
Rhode Island Mob Capo Sentenced To Five Years In Prison 20
Florida Woman Pleads Guilty To Medicare Fraud Scam 20
Marchers Demand Action On Surge In New Orleans Violence 20
FBI Investigating Craigslist NYC Apartment Fraud Case 20
Retired Arkansas State Trooper Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charges 21
Pennsylvania Man Pleads Guilty To Sex With Minor He Met On MySpace 21
Former Federal Prosecutor Charged With Running New York Escort Service 21

Civil Law:
Mississippi Psychiatrist Settles Medicare, Medicaid Fraud Allegations ... 21

Civil Rights:
Alabama To Appeal DOJ Ruling On County Commissioner ... 21
Probe Of Gunfire At Home Of Louisiana Mayor Urged ... 22
DC To Probe Death Of St Elizabeth's Patient ... 22
LAPD Chief Wants Disciplinary Board Meetings Open To Public 22
Accuser In Duke Lacrosse Case Contradicts Herself ... 23
California Man Sues To Take Wife's Last Name ... 23
Rights Groups Seek New Members From Younger Generation ... 23

Antitrust:
Bristol-Myers Still In Search Of Suitor ... 24
Judge Rules Antitrust Suit Against Bar Exam Preparer May Proceed ... 24
EU Delays Ruling On Universal-BMG Deal ... 24
Open Standards Seen As Crux Of Cisco's IPhone Suit ... 25
Solis Criticizes FCC's New Video Rules ... 25

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Gonzales Praises Calderon's Anti-Drug Efforts ... 25
US Charges Deputy Marshal With Leaking Information In Mob Case ... 26
Atlanta Narcotics Team Member Tells FBI Officers Lied To Get Warrant ... 27
DOJ: Illinois Doctor Illegally Prescribed 62 Million Doses Of Drugs Over Internet ... 27
Michigan Man Gets 7-Year Sentence For Role In Importing Thousands Of Ecstasy Pills ... 28
"Cocaine Cowboys" Indicted In New York ... 28
Federal Fugitive Facing Meth Charges Found In Alabama Jail ... 28
Budget Cuts Said To Be Hindering Drug Enforcement ... 28
In Detroit, Walters Praises Officials' Response To Fentanyl-Related Overdoses ... 28
Bonds Issues Statement Following Report Of Positive Amphetamines Test ... 28
Ecuador, Colombia Make Deal On Coca Crop Fumigation ... 29

Immigration:
US Indicts Exiled Cuban Militant For Immigration Fraud ... 29
Chicago Man Arrested For Impersonating FBI Agent To Scam Immigrants ... 30

Tax:
Another Plea In KPMG Case ... 30
IRS Agents Criticize Prematurely Closed Audits ... 30
New York Judge Blocks IRS From Role In Tax Case ... 31
IRS Adjusts Monthly Transit Subsidy, Mileage Deduction For Workers ... 31

Congress-Administration:
House Passes Stem Cell Bill, But Falls Short Of Veto-Threat Margin ... 31
Bush Threatens To Veto Bill Requiring Medicare Drug Negotiation ... 32
Senate Democratic Leadership Dealt Setback On Ethics Bill ... 33
Democrats Say Bush "Still Playing Hardball" On Judges ... 34
Democrats To Seek "Narrow" Tax Hikes ... 34
GOP Criticizes Minimum Wage Bill For Exempting Pelosi Constituent ... 34
Some Republicans Worry Bush Will Cut Education Deal With Democrats ... 34
Democrats Plan Vote On Bill To Reduce College Loan Costs ... 34
Administration Scraps Risk Assessment Plan ... 34
Johnson Transferred Out Of Intensive Care, Has Begun Speaking ... 35
Burns Defends Hughes In Foreign Service Journal ... 35
National Defense University Computers Hacked ... 35
Radio Chips Found In Canadian Coins Passed To Pentagon Contractors ... 35
Government's Official Web Portal Changes Name From FirstGov.gov To USA.gov ... 35
First Lady Tours Renovated Treasury Building ... 35

Other News:
Fed Official Issues Warning About Threats To Economy ... 36
Federal Judge Allows Sex Abuse Suit Against Vatican To Proceed ... 36
Dodd Announces He Will Make '08 Bid For White House ... 37
Denver To Host '08 Democratic Presidential Convention ... 38
Schwarzenegger Defies Conventional Political Categories ... 38
Bush Sr. Plans To Jump Out Of Airplane For 85th Birthday ... 39
Professor Says Anna Nicole Smith Is Ultimate Forum-Shopper ... 39
US Airstrikes Missed Targets In Somalia ... 39
Apparent Slowdown In Iran Nuclear Work Sparks Concern ... 40
US Aid Package Seen As Expansion Of Role In Palestinian Crisis ... 40
Issue Of Succession Raises Stir In Egypt ... 40
Carter Center Board Members Resign Over Book Controversy ... 40
Bangladesh Elections Delayed As President Resigns ... 40
Venezuela May Nationalize Orinoco Oil Projects ... 41
Human Rights Group Criticizes China's Abuses ... 41
Nigeria Considers Bill Banning Gay Marriage ... 41
UN Chief Seeks To Clarify Death Penalty Stance ... 41
WPost Urges International Campaign Against Rights Abuses In Burma ... 41

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 41

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington ... 42

DOJ_NMG_0115623

TERRORISM NEWS:

Holiday Publishing Notice. In observance of the federal Martin Luther King holiday, the Attorney General's News Briefing will not be published on Monday, January 15. News from the holiday will be included in your Tuesday, January 16, briefing.

Gonzales Urges US Attorneys Help Guard Against Terrorist Threats. The State (SC) (1/12, Brundrett) reports from Columbia, SC, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales gave a pep talk in Columbia on Thursday afternoon to U.S. attorneys from around the country attending a conference on combating terrorism. … 'For us in the law enforcement community, every day must be September 12th,' the nation's top prosecutor said, referring to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks." The State continues, "Gonzales spoke to about 100 mainly U.S. attorneys at the National Advocacy Center — a training facility for state and federal prosecutors — on USC's campus. Reggie Lloyd, the U.S. attorney for South Carolina, attended. … Gonzales noted he spent earlier Thursday in Mexico City and met with senior Mexican officials to discuss organized crime and other issues." The State adds, "Gonzales told the U.S. attorneys that the 'single most important part' of their jobs is preventing terrorist attacks in the U.S. … 'Our success or failure in this one endeavor will define in the eyes of some President Bush and his legacy,' he said. 'It will be the legacy of every one of us who is serving in the administration.'" The State notes, "Although the country responded to the 9/11 attacks by invading Afghanistan, reorganizing government and passing new laws to combat terrorism, more needs to be done because terrorists 'change tactics in response to what we do,' he said. … He praised U.S. attorneys for combating 'crimes that can fuel terrorism,' such as identification and immigration fraud. He noted that seven of the 9/11 hijackers had fraudulent Virginia identification cards."

WLTX-TV, CBS 19, Columbia, SC (1/12) reports, "After a lengthy standing ovation from a crowd of US attorneys, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales quieted the crowd, 'Okay, I think you guys just want to play on my softball team. That's what all that's about.' … He began on a lighter note, 'Everything you do for the American people, I am really, really proud of you.' … But Gonzales' pep talk quickly got serious, 'I must speak bluntly and urgently about the single most important part of our jobs, which is preventing terrorist attacks on American soil.'" WLTX-TV continues, "He asked the men and women who filled a room at USC's National Advocacy Center to help stop terrorists from living, traveling and working freely in our communities. … 'And very often, the cells that are broken up are not in New York, they're not in LA,' said South Carolina U.S. Attorney Reggie Lloyd. 'You look at the case in Portland or the case in Buffalo. You have these individuals that are sleeping in communities all across the country.' … He said that's what puts our state on the map when it comes to protection and prevention. 'It's very important to us that we make sure we recognize any potential threat even if it's not a direct threat here in South Carolina,' said Lloyd."

WIS-TV, Columbia, SC (1/11, 7:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "US Attorney Alberto Gonzales is in Columbia. He arrived at Columbia metro airport this afternoon for the US Attorneys National Security Conference. Short time ago Gonzalez spoke to officials about efforts to combat terrorism and keep America safe. He also came to discuss how the Department of Justice is trying to combat terrorism and his remarks are part of the National Security Conference being held At National Advocacy Center." Other broadcasts in Columbia, SC were from the stations WLTX-TV (1/11, 11:00 p.m.) and WOLO-TV (1/11, 11:00 p.m.).

US Gearing Up For Prosecutions Of Top Al Qaeda Detainees. The New York Times (1/12, Johnston, Lewis) reports, "The Bush administration has set up a secret war room in a Virginia suburb where it is assembling evidence to prosecute high-ranking detainees from Al Qaeda including the man accused of being the mastermind of the September 2001 attacks, Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, government officials said this week." The Times continues, "The effort to sift the classified files of the Pentagon, F.B.I., C.I.A. and other intelligence agencies amounts to the first concrete steps that the government has taken to press ahead with war crimes trials of high-level terror suspects under a plan announced by President Bush in a speech last September. … At the time, Mr. Bush said that Mr. Mohammed and 13 other high-level terror suspects had been transferred from secret prisons around the world to the military detention center at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, where they would be held pending trial." The Times adds, "The preparation of cases against the high-value operatives appears to rebut many who doubted that Qaeda suspects like Mr. Mohammed would ever be brought to trial. Critics in Congress and human rights groups had asserted that such trials would not be feasible because they would expose harsh interrogation techniques used by the Central Intelligence Agency. … The officials who discussed the preparations have been briefed on the effort in detail and represented several agencies. They declined to speak on the record about deliberations in advance of criminal prosecutions involving national security. … The prosecution team for the Qaeda defendants will be a mix of military and civilian prosecutors. Some officials said no decision had been made about who would lead each prosecution, but others said the trial of Mr. Mohammed would probably be undertaken principally by Justice Department lawyers, who would run the prosecution in a military courtroom in Guantánamo."

DOJ_NMG_0115624

More Than 80 Arrested At Anti-Guantanamo Protest In Washington. The Washington Post (1/12, A3, Leonnig, 690K) reports, "More than 80 protesters were arrested inside the federal courthouse in Washington yesterday after a demonstration that called for closing the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay." They were "commemorating the fifth anniversary of the opening of the Guantanamo detention facility. They targeted the courthouse where lawyers have challenged the legality of indefinitely imprisoning hundreds of suspected enemy fighters and terrorists at Guantanamo."

WPost Calls DOD Official's Comments On Detainee Lawyers "Repellent." The Washington Post (1/12, A18, 690K) editorializes, "Most understand that legal representation for the accused is one of the core principles of the American way. Not, it seems, Cully Stimson, deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs. In a repellent interview yesterday with Federal News Radio, Mr. Stimson brought up, unprompted, the number of major U.S. law firms that have helped represent detainees at Guantanamo Bay. ... It's offensive" that Stimson, "a lawyer, would argue that law firms are doing anything other than upholding the highest ethical traditions of the bar by taking on the most unpopular of defendants. It's shocking that he would seemingly encourage the firms' corporate clients to pressure them to drop this work. And it's shocking -- though perhaps not surprising -- that this is the person the administration has chosen to oversee detainee policy at Guantanamo."

Human Rights Watch Says US No Longer World's Top Defender Of Rights. The Washington Post (1/12, A10, Boustany, 690K) reports Human Rights Watch said the "once-powerful role" of the US "as a prime defender of human rights had effectively ended because of arbitrary detentions and reports of torture since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and the group urged the European Union to step up as a leader of the cause." Executive Director Kenneth Roth released the group's World Report 2007 "by saying that the counterterrorism record of the United States over the past five years has tarnished its credibility as an influential moral voice. He listed several practices he said were being used by the Bush administration in its fight against terrorism, including torture, arbitrary detentions, allowing CIA interrogators to use coercive techniques and the unsupervised handling of so-called enemy combatants held in other countries."

Alleged Tamil Tiger Leader Extradited To Face US Charges. WNBC-TV New York (1/11, Valiquette) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "A key associate of a foreign terrorist organization has been captured in Indonesia and returned to New York to face federal charges including conspiracy to provide material support and resources to the Tamil Tigers. Thavarajah Pratheepan was arrested by Interpol and placed in FBI custody. At his arraignment Thursday afternoon in federal court in Brooklyn, he pleaded not guilty and was ordered held without bail." WNBC noted, "The Joint Terrorism Task Force based in Newark, N.J., arrested four of the men on Long Island last August in a sting operation after three of them traveled from Canada to purchase Russian-made SA-18 surface-to-air missiles, missile launchers and AK-47s from an undercover agent. Pratheepan is identified in the court papers as being the main liaison between the leadership of the Tamil Tigers and its supporters in North America, Europe and Asia, as well as being involved in procuring equipment for the group." The AP (1/11) also reported on Pratheepan's extradition.

Attack On US Embassy In Athens Called "Act Of Terrorism." In breaking news early Friday morning, the AP (1/12) reports "police cordoned off streets around the US Embassy in Athens early Friday after an explosion inside the embassy compound that a senior police official said was an 'act of terrorism.'" Greek police did not report any injuries, but embassy officials "could not immediately be reached for comment." Attica Police Chief Asimakis Golfis called the attack "an act of terrorism," but said authorities "don't know where from."

ASEAN Member States Considering Regional Antiterror Pact. The New York Times (1/12, Conde, 1.16M) reports 10 Southeast Asian nations "are hammering out a regional antiterrorism agreement, officials said Thursday, the day after a series of terrorist bombings in the southern Philippines underscored the need for such a measure." The 10 ASEAN states "will consider the measure, the Asean Convention on Counterterrorism, at their annual summit meeting here on Saturday. The agreement aims to improve information and intelligence sharing among the group's members and encourage them to adopt domestic antiterrorism laws, officials said."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Administration Moves To Ease Anti-Terrorism Restrictions For Refugees. The New York Times (1/12, Swarns, 1.16M) reports, "After months of pressure from

DOJ_NMG_0115625

lawmakers, conservative groups and advocates for immigrants, the Bush administration announced plans on Thursday to seek legislation that would provide relief to thousands of refugees and asylum seekers who have been inadvertently denied refuge because of antiterrorism laws." The proposal would affect those who have "provided material support to armed rebel groups, even if that support was coerced and even if the armed groups fought alongside American troops or opposed authoritarian governments criticized by the Bush administration." Paul Rosenzweig, acting assistant secretary for international affairs at the Department of Homeland Security, "told reporters that the administration expected to present legislation to Congress by the end of the month and to exercise most of its waivers within a day or so. … 'There isn't anybody in this room who doesn't wish we could have moved more quickly than we have,' Mr. Rosenzweig said. Advocacy groups hailed the decision as an important step forward, but warned that it would still leave many people vulnerable."

Registered Traveler Customers At Orlando International Can Start Leaving Shoes On. USA Today (1/12, 1A, Frank, 2.27M) reports on its front page on the introduction of the ShoeScanner this morning for members of the Registered Traveler program at Orlando International. "Those fee-paying travelers will soon find the machines at Indianapolis, San Jose and Cincinnati airports and in Terminal 7 at New York's Kennedy International. The ShoeScanner detects explosives in shoes when people stand on its platform for 20 to 25 seconds, allowing the machine to shoot radio waves at footwear to provide a molecular peek inside." USA Today adds, "The Transportation Security Administration approved ShoeScanners only for Registered Traveler and has no plans to expand it to regular checkpoints because of cost and time concerns."

Former Ohio Imam Transferred To Israeli Custody. Haaretz (1/12, Melman) reports, "Israeli authorities who arrested the former imam of Ohio's largest mosque who was deported from the United States have questioned him about his connections to Islamic Jihad, his attorney said Wednesday. Palestinian Fawaz Damra's American citizenship was revoked due to suspicions that he raised funds for Islamic Jihad 15 years ago," and he "was transferred to Israeli custody on a 'secret flight' coordinated by the FBI and Israeli security services." Haaretz notes, "Several days ago, he boarded a special plane destined for Jordan at New Jersey's Newark Airport, along with six drug dealers. Following a short interrogation, Jordanian authorities transferred him to the Shin Bet and Israel Police via Allenby Bridge."

The AP (1/12, Heller) notes, "Despite a campaign by his family and supporters to keep him in the U.S., Damra was deported after spending a year in a Michigan jail. His relatives in the U.S. said they hadn't been notified he had been deported, and found out only when his lawyer arrived at the jail and found him gone.

Suspicious Powders Cause Terror Scares At Two Florida Courthouses. The Miami Herald (1/12, Daniel, Lebovich, 286K) reports, "Authorities found mysterious powders in two South Florida courthouses -- one in Broward, the other in Palm Beach -- Thursday but neither substance proved a threat. .. It was not immediately known if the two scares were related, but investigators planned to look into the matter." The Herald notes, "In Palm Beach County a mail worker discovered the substance around 11:30 a.m. as she was delivering mail to the chambers of two judges…said Teri Barbera, a spokeswoman for the Palm Beach Sheriff's Office. … On the envelope, investigators found tellurium, a rare chemical element" which "is listed as a chemical hazard on the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's website. … Since FBI agents found no serious threat in the envelope -- a letter from an attorney to a judge requesting a motion hearing -- local agencies will take over the investigation to see who's responsible for planting the substance, said Barbera."

The Palm Beach Post (1/12, Spencer-Wendel, Green) reports, "Investigators donned hazardous material suits Thursday evening to pore through 200 pieces of mail, looking for the source. Two judicial assistants left the letter with powder stuck to it down in the mailroom, but carried other mail which had the substance on it up to nine floors above to the judges' chambers, widely spreading exposure, officials said." The Post notes, "The FBI and Homeland Security joined the investigation." The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (1/12, Santana, Diaz, 237K) adds, "Preliminary indications are that the substance in Broward appears to be some sort of food additive, possibly a sugar substitute, a fire official said. In West Palm Beach, firefighters decontaminated five people who touched two envelopes tainted with traces of tellurium," and "none had an adverse reaction, Fire Rescue spokesman Phil Kaplan said. … FBI agents were called to both courthouses, but declined to launch an investigation in Palm Beach County. FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said agents were looking into the Broward case." In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/12) also reported on the incidents.

EU Says DHS Has Eased Privacy Concerns Over Security Program. The Washington Post (1/12, D2, Nakashima, 690K) reports, "European Union officials said yesterday that the US government had allayed their concerns about a homeland security program that creates and retains risk assessments on millions of air travelers to the United States." However, "in a letter to the chief privacy officials of 27 countries, the American Civil Liberties Union and London-based Privacy International said the Automated Targeting System violated" a European-US agreement on air-passenger data sharing, as well as US law and European data-protection laws. DHS spokesman Jarrod Agen "said the program did not violate the requirement that European passenger data be stored for 3 1/2 years at the most. He said the US-EU agreement stipulates that some information may be kept for less than 40 years."

DOJ_NMG_0115626

NYTimes Urges Lieberman To Change Views On State Minimums For Security Funding. The New York Times (1/12, 1.16M) editorializes, "Making his umpteenth pitch to Congress to provide more security money for New York City, Mayor Michael Bloomberg stated the obvious when he said that money to defend against terrorism should be divvied up based on an assessment of risks, not 'spread across the country like peanut butter.' … Unfortunately, the committee's incoming chairman, Senator Joseph Lieberman, is partial to peanut butter." He "continues to believe that every state, regardless of the risks or threats it faces, should be getting antiterrorism money," and "is seeking a 'compromise' formula that preserves guaranteed minimums for relatively low-risk places like his home state of Connecticut." The Times states that Lieberman "fought the odds" to hold his seat and get his chairmanship, and "it's up to him to use the power responsibly."

Jury Awards $2.5 Million In Punitive Damages In Katrina Insurance Suit. The AP (1/12, Mitchell) reports, "A Mississippi jury on Thursday awarded $2.5 million in punitive damages to a couple who sued State Farm Fire & Casualty Co. for denying their claim after Hurricane Katrina, a decision that could benefit hundreds of other homeowners challenging insurers for refusing to cover billion of dollars in storm damage." The AP continues, "A federal judge only hours earlier had taken part of the case out of jurors' hands before they awarded punitive damages to State Farm policyholders Norman and Genevieve Broussard. … U.S. District Judge L.T. Senter Jr. ruled Thursday morning that State Farm is liable for $223,292 in damage Hurricane Katrina caused to the Broussards' home. Senter left it to a jury to decide whether to award punitive damages." The AP adds, "Senter's decision to make a directed verdict rather than let the jury decide the entire case appeared to surprise everyone in the courtroom. After he explained his ruling, Senter ordered a recess to give attorneys time "to get over the shock." … Some of Senter's earlier rulings in other Katrina cases have favored the insurance industry, but his decision Thursday calls into question the companies' refusal to cover billions of dollars in damage from Katrina's storm surge. … The Broussards sued State Farm for refusing to pay for any damage to their home, which Katrina reduced to a slab. The couple, who wanted State Farm to pay for the full insured value of their home plus $5 million in punitive damages, claimed that a tornado during the hurricane destroyed their home. State Farm blamed all the damage on Katrina's storm surge."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Defends Iraq Plan In Visit To Military Base. ABC World News (1/11, story 2, 2:25, Vargus, 8.78M) reported, "Last night the President presented his plan to the American people, today he took it to the people who will actually be carrying it out, the members of the military who would see their role in Iraq expand." ABC (Raddatz) added "the President was pushing his plan hard today to the people who will have to carry it out. In Ft. Benning, Georgia, today, before soldiers who will soon be part of the planned troop surge, the President assured the audience that this plan was different from the one he now admits was a failure." The CBS Evening News (1/11, lead story, :40, Couric, 7.66M) said the reaction "was not at all what the President has come to expect from a military audience." The CBS Evening News (1/11, story 4, 1:45, Couric, 7.66M) later reported on the "out of the ordinary is the response the President got today from a usually receptive audience, those soldiers we mentioned earlier." CBS (Axelrod) added, "Even rallying the troops is now a challenge. The mood here was polite but muted, more somber than usual for a President talking to soldiers."

NBC Nightly News (1/11, lead story, 3:05, Gregory, 9.87M) noted Bush "lunched with troops" and defended his plan, but offered no assessment of the audience's response. Neither did the AP (1/12, Riechmann), says "Fort Benning…offered Bush a patriotic backdrop and a friendly audience in which to sell his retooled plan for Iraq, which drew heavy fire on Capitol Hill from Democrats and some Republicans. Some 4,000 members of Fort Benning's 3rd Brigade Combat Team are being sent to Iraq earlier than planned because of the president's decision. … Bush had lunch with about 300 military personnel and their relatives, saw a paratrooper training exercise and met with relatives of 25 soldiers who died in Iraq and Afghanistan."

But the Washington Times (1/12, Curl, 88K) headlines its story "Bush Gets Cool Response From Troops Set For Iraq," and says the President "received only tepid applause at this Army base, where the commanding general forbade soldiers from talking to reporters." The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/12, Martz, Markiewicz, 379K) reports Bush's speech "was a virtual carbon copy of his national TV address Wednesday night, in which he laid out his plans for Iraq." His comments "were met with relatively polite but restrained applause on several occasions, but the soldiers broke into a spontaneous ovation when he said he was in favor of increasing the overall size of the military." Similarly, the Los Angeles Times (1/12, Gerstenzang, 850K) says Bush's audience "was friendly, but his sober address received a less enthusiastic reception than has been the case on his past visits to military bases to promote his Iraq policy. White House and Army officials prohibited reporters from interviewing soldiers before Bush spoke or immediately after his remarks." The Washington Post (1/12, A12, Baker, 690K) titles its report "At Fort Benning, A Quiet Response To A Presidential Visit," and says that "White House officials had promised reporters they could talk with soldiers." And the New York Times (1/12, Stolberg, 1.16M) says Bush's "lunchtime talk received a restrained response."

DOJ_NMG_0115627

USA Today (1/12, 5A, Copeland, 2.27M) reports on Bush's Georgia visit, and added that reaction to the new Iraq plan "from some military families around the USA was mixed," quoting misgivings from three military spouses. In a front-page story titled "US Unit Patrolling Baghdad Sees Flaws In Bush Strategy," the Washington Post (1/12, A1, Raghavan, 690K), quotes US soldiers who challenged Bush's "decision to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq" because it "rests on a key assumption" that they believe flawed: that "the Iraqi government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki can produce a well-disciplined, impartial army capable of taking the lead in securing Baghdad."

Along those lines, USA Today (1/12, 6A, Brook, 2.27M) says the Bush plan "rests on a shaky foundation: the Iraqi military. Recent reports by the Pentagon and the Government Accountability Office (GAO) say Iraqi security forces, primarily the military and police, suffer from a lack of training, supplies and availability." While "322,600 Iraqi security personnel had been trained and equipped by last month, 'the number of present-for-duty soldiers and police is much lower,' according to a Pentagon progress report released in December. That's because so many Iraqi troops are on scheduled leave, are absent without leave or have left the service entirely, the report says."

White House Campaign To "Sell" Strategy To Continue Over The Weekend. USA Today (1/12, 1A, Jackson, Nichols, 2.27M) reports, "The White House is embarking on a weekend campaign to sell President Bush's new Iraq strategy to the nation amid fierce criticism from Democrats and some Republicans on Capitol Hill." Bush "will appear Sunday on CBS' 60 Minutes, which airs after an NFL playoff game. Vice President Cheney will appear on Fox News Sunday to defend the plan to boost U.S. troop levels by 21,500." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "leaves today on a week-long trip to the Middle East and Europe to brief U.S. allies on the plan." White House spokesman Tony Snow, "who held interviews with radio and television hosts Thursday, said the communications plan will continue in coming weeks."

Yesterday, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said on CNN's The Situation Room (1/11, Blitzer), "We're at the beginning of a process now where people are going to take a look at a comprehensive plan. What a lot of people have done is said, 'Okay, we don't want troops growing in.' And so they look at that one piece. What we're saying to the American public is, look at all of the pieces. See how it all works together."

White House Deputy Press Secretary Dana Perino said on CNN's Your World Today (1/11, Gorani), "The President was very plain-spoken yesterday, as he should be, when he was talking to the American people about his new way forward in Iraq. And one of the most important things that people need to understand is what we are finding there with Iran's meddlesomeness in the region. And of course we are supportive of the neighbors getting along there in the region. And Secretary Rice is headed to the region tomorrow to help further that. But no, the President is not going to do one-on-one talks with Iran and Syria at this time."

Polls Show Little Support For New Strategy. ABC World News (1/11, story 3, 2:05, Vargus, 8.78M) reported "an ABC News poll conducted after the speech found 61% of Americans reject the idea of sending more forces into Iraq. 36% support the proposal and our chief Washington correspondent George Stephanopoulos joins me now." This poll "shows the President has a long way to go to sell this." ABC (Stephanopoulos) added, "Those numbers you said are just the beginning of the tough news for the President. It also shows that two-thirds of Americans reject the idea that sending more troops now is going to bring a quicker end to the war. And 71% of Americans believe that the assistance of the United States to Iraq should be conditioned on Iraqis meeting benchmarks for bringing their country together and building up their military. This is an idea the President rejected even though it was endorsed by the bipartisan Baker-Hamilton commission. 53% want Congress to act to stop the plan to send more troops."

On the CBS Evening News (1/11, story 3, 1:55, 7.66M), Bob Schieffer said "it is a rare evening when an American President goes on prime time television and doesn't change some minds, so you have to say last night was a rare evening. Mr. Bush did no better winning support for his new Iraq policy from the public than he did trying to change the minds of people in Congress. A CBS News poll conducted after the speech showed 68% of the people polled are still uneasy about the President's ability to make the right decisions about Iraq. That is the same percentage as when we asked the same question during the first week in January. The poll did show some increase in public support for increasing troop levels since last week, but even so, only 30%, a third of those polled, believe a troop increase is a good idea. The fact that this speech seemed to change so few minds…is really unusual. I think it underlines just how unpopular this war is with the American people."

DOJ_NMG_0115628

The AP (1/12, Benac) reports that an "Associated Press-Ipsos poll found widespread disagreement with the Bush administration over its proposed solution, and growing skepticism that the United States made the right decision in going to war in the first place. Just as 70 percent of Americans oppose sending more troops to Iraq, a like number don't think such an increase would help stabilize the situation there, the poll suggested. When asked to name the most important problem facing the U.S., 38 percent of those polled volunteered war, up significantly from 24 percent three months ago."

The New York Times (1/12, Urbina, 1.16M) runs a feature surveying the opinion of citizens of Clifton Heights, PA, where people "at the American Legion" were "sure of one thing: President Bush's plan to send some 20,000 more troops to Iraq would only make matters worse. … Frustrated by mounting deaths of United States soldiers in Iraq, voters in this former mill town wedged between more liberal Philadelphia and more conservative rural areas, responded to the president's plan with feelings ranging from outrage and resignation to guarded skepticism and qualified support."

White House Blames Networks For Audio Problems During Speech. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" section, "Bush aides blame television networks for audio problems during president's Iraq speech. 'The feed went out of here clean,' a spokesman says. Bush will keep relatively low-profile on Iraq next week as he wraps up budget decisions and Jan. 23 State of the Union speech."

Luntz Says Bush Word's "Too Little And Too Late" For Most Americans. In a Los Angeles Times (1/12, 850K) op-ed, Republican pollster Frank Luntz writes, "Americans tuned in Wednesday night to hear the president's plan for a 'new way forward' in Iraq. We also tuned in to be convinced and reassured that President Bush was the right man to execute that plan. The speech was a clear attempt to draw a distinct line between the past and the future. The president addressed head-on the most common attacks on him and his administration, countering 'inflexible,' 'unrealistic' and 'incompetent' -- three words pollsters like myself have heard from an angry electorate for more than a year -- with 'adjust' and 'change,' 'scrutiny,' 'responsibility' and, again and again, 'our new strategy.' Speaking from the White House library, a different setting befitting a different strategy, the president attempted to make the case that things in Iraq were going to be different from now on. The problem is, for most Americans it is too little and too late."

More Commentary. The Financial Times (1/12) editorializes the Bush plans "is certainly not a strategy for victory, whatever that word, which is used ever more desperately by the US president, now means. It may be one last heave. It may be a cover for US withdrawal. But two things are quite clear." First, the Times notes that "right now, Mr. Bush has the support of no more than one in four Americans for this so-called surge of an extra 20,000 or so troops." And second, "this policy will not succeed in fixing an Iraq traumatized by tyranny and war and then broken by invasion and occupation. But it may end with the US 'surging' into Iran -- and taking the Middle East to a new level of mayhem that will spill into nearby regions and western capitals."

Mackubin Thomas Owens, a professor of national security affairs at the Naval War College, writes in the Christian Science Monitor (1/12, 59K) that the success of Bush's plan "depends on at least three factors. The first is the adequacy of the force." The second factor, he says, is "the Iraqi government," which he says much include "the Shiite militias." The third factor is "Congress," where he says he hopes Democrats will "take the wise counsel of one of their own, Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, who reminded us the other day that the stark choice in Iraq is between victory and defeat."

In his Wall Street Journal (1/12, 2.04M) column, Daniel Henninger writes, "When Gen. David Petraeus takes command of U.S. forces in Iraq, it will mark the start of an historic turn in military strategy in Iraq and perhaps in U.S. war-fighting doctrine. The U.S.'s primary problem in Iraq, manifest across 2006, has been an urban insurgency in a 30-mile radius around Baghdad and in Anbar province. The Petraeus command is the overdue beginning of the counterinsurgency. This isn't a one-off effort as at Fallujah, but counterinsurgency as daily U.S. military policy. It is the product of an enormous amount of self-criticism and analysis done by military and civilian analysts in and out of government."

Anthony Cordesman, a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, writes in the New York Times (1/12, 1.16M) that "taken as a whole," the President's speech "raised more questions than it answered."

Former national security adviser Zbignew Brzezinski writes in the Washington Post (1/12, A19, 690K) that the President's plan "provided a more realistic analysis of the situation in Iraq than any previous presidential statement." Though it "acknowledged failure," it "dodged accountability for that failure by the standard device of assuming personal responsibility." Brzezinski calls the troop "surge" a "political gimmick of limited tactical significance and of no strategic benefit," noting that it is "insufficient to win the war militarily." He also criticized the plan for failing to "explore even the possibility of developing a framework for an eventual political solution." In conclusion, Brzezinski says the speech "reflects a profound misunderstanding of our era" that "waging a colonial war in the post-colonial age is self-defeating."

DOJ_NMG_0115629

Former federal prosecutor Andrew C. McCarthy writes in USA Today (1/12, 10A, 2.27M) that for "those in Congress" there are "two logical responses" to the President's plan: "Propose a better way forward, or candidly call for the United States to accept defeat -- without trying to spin that as -redeployment' or some other transparent euphemism." Noting that "a defeat for the United States in Iraq would be a victory for our mortal enemies," McCarthy urges members of Congress to "give us a plan to win," saying the US "can accept nothing less."

New York Times (1/12, 1.16M) columnist Thomas Friedman asks President Bush to "stop insulting our intelligence by telling us that this is the 'decisive ideological struggle of our time,' but we're going to put the whole burden of victory on 150,000 US soldiers." Friedman says "the way" Bush has "fought this war -- with our pinky -- is contemptible." He says the "only way more US troops might bring stability is if you add two missing elements: a deadline and a floor." He urges the President to "tell Iraqis that by calling for a surge in troops you're giving them one last chance to reconcile, otherwise we're gone by Dec. 1." By not setting a hard date to leave Iraq, Friedman says "we are only putting a floor under bad behavior and allowing Iraqi leaders to pay wholesale, not retail, for their tribal politics."

Washington Post (1/12, A19, 690K) columnist E.J. Dionne Jr. writes, "If Iraq does not end well, our men and women in uniform will not get the blame. The fault will lie with leaders in Washington who failed to face the politics of the situation as squarely as this soldier has."

Washington Post (1/12, A19, 690K) columnist Eugene Robinson calls Bush's plan "fantasy-based," saying it "could only make sense in some parallel universe where pigs fly and fish commute on bicycles."

Bush Awards Fallen Corporal Posthumous Medal Of Honor. The CBS Evening News (1/11, story 10, :25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Early on in the Iraq war, we told you the story of a young man named Jason Dunham, a former high school star athlete from upstate New York who joined the Marines and saved the lives of two comrades by throwing himself on a hand grenade. Today, President Bush awarded this fallen hero America's highest military decoration, the Medal of Honor." ABC World News (1/11, story 6, :55, Vargus, 8.78M) reported Dunham "died after jumping on a grenade to protect members of his squad." President Bush: "This morning it's my privilege to recognize Corporal Dunham's devotion to the corps and country. And to present his family with the Medal of Honor."

NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 5, 1:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "President Bush has said more than once, the toughest part of his job is sending Americans into combat. Today there was a vivid reminder of the consequences. This morning before leaving for Fort Benning, the President awarded the nation's highest military honor to a young Marine who gave his life to save his squad."

The New York Times (1/12, Hernandez, 1.16M) reports, "In an interview on Tuesday, as she was preparing to make the six-hour trip to Washington for the ceremony, Corporal Dunham's mother, Debra, said she wished her son could 'receive it himself.' 'But we will receive it for him, and he will be watching us do that,' she said." President Bush "shed tears during the ceremony."

Bush Said To Have Led Commanders To Conclude More Troops Needed. The New York Times (1/12, Rutenberg, Sanger, Gordon, 1.16M) reports that "over the past two months" two "diametrically opposed options -- adding American troops, or pulling back to let the Iraqi factions fight it out -- marked the boundaries of a vigorous debate inside the Bush administration." At one point, President Bush "asked his deputies, in effect: 'Why can't we just pull out of Baghdad and let the factions fight it out themselves?' Ultimately, the president and his advisers came back to the idea of adding American troops -- the new approach they concluded was the best of a series of difficult choices, according to a senior administration official involved in the process. A narrative pieced together from interviews with participants and from public testimony suggests that through much of the process, generals who had been on the ground in Iraq during the past year had favored that the new strategy begin with a substantially smaller force than the one that President Bush announced to the nation on Wednesday night. In the end, it was Mr. Bush who appeared to drive his commanders along to the conclusion that more troops were needed."

New Strategy "Vindication" For Shinseki. The New York Times (1/12, Shanker, 1.16M) reports that Bush's "new strategy, with its explicit acknowledgment that not enough troops had been sent to Iraq to establish control, was a vindication" for Gen. Eric Shinseki, "who as Army chief of staff publicly told Congress as much just before the war began in 2003. First vilified, then marginalized by the Bush administration after those comments, General Shinseki retired and faded away, even as lawmakers, pundits and politicians increasingly cited his prescience."

Many Targeted Baghdad Areas Already Overrun By Militias. The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Moore, 850K) reports, "One of the chief rationales for sending five additional U.S. brigades to Baghdad is to secure the city's mixed neighborhoods, U.S. military planners say. If residents feel they are safe in their homes, they will no longer turn to sectarian militias to protect them, the strategists argue. But many of the districts that U.S. planners might have wanted to protect already have been taken over by sectarian gunmen and their allies."

DOJ_NMG_0115630

Congress Blasts New Bush Iraq Plan. On Capitol Hill, President Bush's new Iraq strategy was the object of strong attacks yesterday from both sides of the aisle. Some reports suggest the President's support among Republicans may be quickly collapsing. The Financial Times (1/12, Luce) reports Bush yesterday "cut an increasingly lonely and embattled figure as opposition Democrats and fellow Republicans greeted his 'new way forward' in Iraq with a barrage of denunciation. … This show of Republican opposition prompted comparisons with Richard Nixon during the Vietnam era. 'Republican support for the president is draining rapidly,' said a party strategist. 'It is almost unheard of for Republicans to criticise a Republican president at war so soon after he has made an appeal for support.'"

The Washington Times (1/12, Hurt, Ward, 88K) reports "Republican leaders on Capitol Hill staunchly back…Bush's proposal…but support among the party's rank and file may be crumbling. 'At this late stage, interjecting more young American troops into the crossfire of an Iraqi civil war is simply not the right approach,' Rep. Ric Keller, a Florida Republican who has been steadfastly supportive of the war, said on the House floor yesterday. 'We are not going to solve an Iraqi political problem with an American military solution.'" And the Los Angeles Times (1/12, Neuman, 850K) notes GOP Sen. George Voinovich, "who until now has supported the war, said he no longer believes the civil war in Iraq can be tamed by sending more US troops to aid in the fight."

Nonetheless, says the Wall Street Journal (1/12, A4, Dreazen, King, 2.04M), "White House officials calculate that Democrats will be stymied by practical problems, legislative maneuvering and internal divisions in their attempt to prevent the administration from sending 21,500 more soldiers -- and more money -- to Iraq. 'There are a lot of divisions among the Democrats, and you see them tiptoeing around it because they understand the consequences of such a vote,' White House Counselor Dan Bartlett said during a trip with Mr. Bush, who was pushing his case for sending new forces to Iraq in a speech to hundreds of soldiers on this military base." In an analysis piece, the AP (1/12, Espo) says Democrats face "a delicate mission," but "for the first time since the war began" they "have public opinion on their side -- and know it for sure."

On ABC World News (1/11, story 3, 2:05, 8.78M), George Stephanopoulos said "it does look like Congress has the votes to pass" a symbolic resolution condemning Bush's new plan, and "they are likely to do that the week of the State of the Union. I asked a White House official about this, and he said they won't fight it, he seemed resigned. He said if they have the votes, they have the votes. But is also puts burden on the opponents, he said, to come up with a plan that will work. And the White House also sees a silver lining in what was a very tough day on Capitol Hill. They believe that the more pressure that comes from Capitol Hill, the more pressure that will put on the Iraqis to actually get their act together." Nonetheless, the Washington Times (1/12, Hurt, Ward, 88K) reports Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell yesterday "hinted that Senate Republicans would filibuster any resolution by Democrats expressing disapproval of the war in Iraq or Mr. Bush's plan to add more than 21,000 troops to the battlefield."

The Washington Post (1/12, A1, Abramowitz, Weisman, 690K) reports Democrats and Republicans "alike said they are concerned that Bush's plan…is too little and too late and does not appear very different from previous efforts to secure the capital." The "ferocity of the congressional condemnation dismayed the White House," in what the Post calls "further indication that the new Democratic Congress is headed toward a series of potentially epic clashes and floor votes over the conduct and funding of the nearly four-year-old war." Rice "appeared to be on the receiving end of the toughest grilling yesterday, before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee" where "not a single senator from either party expressed support for the president's plan, many posed hostile questions, and others expressed deep doubt about the Bush administration's premise of creating a viable democracy in the heart of the Middle East." However, Rice "maintained her composure throughout the hearing."

On NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 3, 2:00, 9.87M), Tim Russert said the hearing "took on the form of a revival meeting where Democrats who had voted for the war were seeking redemption with their Democratic base. About 90% of Democrats believed going into Iraq was the wrong thing to do. You couple that with Republicans. There are 21 Republican senators up for reelection in 2008. Four of them have already come out against the President's plan. They understand the perils of this war in terms of taking it to the voters."

ABC World News (1/11, lead story, Vargus, 8.78M) showed several US Senators' reactions to the President's plan. Sen. Joseph Biden called the plan "a tragic mistake." Sen. Christopher Dodd said: "A fool's paradise describes nothing as aptly as our Iraq policy today." However, ABC (Tapper) said, "Most notable, the disapproval of Republican Senators, including Vietnam veteran Chuck Hagel," who called the plan "the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam." But Secretary Rice "said the problem is not just the resolve of the Iraqi government to provide security, but its ability to do so, which is why more troops are needed." But Rice "found few supporters today. … She was challenged as to why she believes so many Americans are being killed in Iraq." Similarly, the CBS Evening News (1/11, story 2, Borger, 7.66M) said the President "may have been trying to reignite support for his Iraq strategy, but instead, he sparked a bipartisan rebellion on Capitol Hill." While Bush "no doubt expected a fight with Democrats over Iraq, but after his speech, some of the harshest criticism came from his own party" with "as many as a dozen Republican senators" that "could jump ship."

DOJ_NMG_0115631

NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 2, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Make no mistake…members of Congress…are clearly frustrated by the President's war policies and some who want his job for that matter, took direct aim at some of the President's top people." NBC (Reid) added, "Anger, there's plenty of that around here, especially among Democrats and as for ambition, one hearing here in the Senate felt like a run-up to the 2008 Presidential campaign. At times the Senate foreign relations hearing room was like a firing range for aspiring Presidential candidates."

The AP (1/12, Raum) says the President's plan "ran into a wall of criticism on Capitol Hill on Thursday as administration officials drew confrontational, sometimes mocking challenges from both Democrats and Republicans." During appearances on the Hill, Defense Secretary Robert Gates and Secretary Rice "found themselves embroiled in the first pitched exchanges in a battle that is likely to dominate Congress for months or longer and is already shaping the 2008 presidential election." In testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and in the afternoon before the House counterpart, Rice was "grilled sharply by members of both parties," with "not a single member of the Senate panel" expressing "outright support for the president's plan." For her part, Rice "acknowledged widespread skepticism among Americans" and engaged in "several tense exchanges with members, including with Hagel."

The Washington Times (1/12, Kralev, 88K) reports Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "promised to give the new plan careful consideration, but he said on the Senate floor, 'In choosing to escalate the war, the president virtually stands alone.' Many of the Senate panel's Republicans also were critical, including Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, John E. Sununu of New Hampshire and Lisa Murkowski of Alaska." USA Today (1/12, Slavin, 2.27M) runs a similar report.

In a separate report, the AP (1/12, Woodward) reports Secretary Rice "found herself at the intersection of anger and ambition" as "five presidential aspirants on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, as well as other up-and-comers in the new Democratic majority…made sure their voices were heard." The AP notes that "even Rice's status as a single woman was fair game" as Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., "noted Rice has no children of her own to lose overseas." Sen. Boxer continued her criticism of Rice during an appearance on PBS' NewsHour (1/11, Warner), saying, "I can speak for the entire committee -- except for just a few -- she did not make the case."

Under the headline "Rice, A Uniter Of The Divided," the Washington Post (1/12, A1, 690K), Dana Milbank writes in a front-page "Washington Sketch" column that "within minutes" of Secretary Rice's arrival on Capitol Hill yesterday, "it became apparent that the Bush administration had, after four divisive years, finally succeeded in uniting Congress on the war in Iraq. Unfortunately for Rice, the lawmakers were unified in opposition to President Bush's new policy." The Post calls Rice's appearance "a bipartisan scolding of the sort rarely seen in the Bush presidency," but said Rice "endured it, for the most part, with quiet indignation," staring "expressionlessly at her tormentors or looked down at the table."

The New York Times (1/12, A1, Shanker, Cloud, 1.16M) says the reception Rice received on the Hill suggested that Bush's plan "had done little to build political support for sending additional troops to Baghdad." During their testimony, Gates and Rice "declined to specify a time limit on the troop increase and were cautious about predicting rapid improvements in security in Baghdad…saying progress is likely to come gradually."

The New York Times (1/12, Kornblut, 1.16M), under the headline "Devastating Criticism On Iraq By Both Parties," describes the tone on Capitol Hill yesterday as "courteous, serious -- and devastating." And "perhaps surprisingly, the language changed little when it was" Republicans who addressed the war issue. The Times adds, "On a committee renowned for its bipartisanship and restraint, the questioning on Thursday, the day after a major presidential address on Iraq, amounted to a powerful blast."

Sen. Barbara Boxer said on PBS' NewsHour (1/11, Warner), "I can speak for the entire committee -- except for just a few -- she did not make the case. And the committee view was skeptical, at best, and outright in opposition, I would say, if you really look at what everybody said. And when you have the second-most-senior Republican on the committee saying, and I quote, that the surge is 'the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam,' if it's carried out -- that's Senator Hagel -- that, to me, is the strongest of signals to this Administration to change course and not go forward with this."

Sen. Lindsay Graham said on PBS' NewsHour (1/11, Warner), "I think the Bush Administration has earned skepticism, to be honest with you. If anybody believes the war has gone well in the last couple years -- well, just no one believes that. ... Before we act in Congress condemning a new strategy designed to secure victory -- not in what I think is a Vietnam, but a battlefront in World War III of extremism versus moderation -- I'd just ask the Congress to listen to" Gen. Petraeus, "who's been assigned the mission, who believes in the mission, who's the architect of the new strategy, and give him a chance to articulate why he thinks he could be successful, what he needs, and ask him the hard questions before we act."

DOJ_NMG_0115632

Sen. Gordon Smith said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/11, Matthews), "I didn't realize it at the time, but the speech that I gave really broke the dam of Republican frustration that many of my colleagues have been feeling. And I do think it is time for the Congress to reassert itself and try and more narrowly focus our efforts, the American efforts, in the war on terror. ... What we have to do as we fight the war on terror more intelligently is to keep the mechanisms of the state of Iraq from falling into the hands of al Qaeda or Iran -- and I'm not proposing an attack on Iran. But all of the nation-building that we have been doing, frankly, I have concluded that it is Iraq's nation to build. ... We need to focus on who the real enemy is and it's not the work of the street cop. It is our taking out jihadists who would bring chaos into Iraq or export it to neighbors or our country. What we did in Somalia the other day is the way we ought to be taking on terrorism, on our terms, with our technology, with our firepower. These are the real enemies but, frankly, we cannot want democracy for Iraq more than Iraqis want it for themselves."

Sen. John Kerry said on CNN's Your World Today (1/11, Clancy), "Last night, the President said mistakes had been made. He didn't say they were his. And he accepted responsibility for those mistakes. He didn't say, 'I made mistakes.' So there is a distinction. ... What was absent from the President's speech last night, regrettably, was the political solution, the diplomatic political solution that is critical to ending the violence. The President, the Secretary of State, the former Secretary of Defense, our generals, have all said that this can not be resolve military. And yet all you heard last night was really the military piece of this."

Dodd said on CNN's The Situation Room (1/11, Blitzer), "I'd certainly be willing to use the power of the purse to help us change direction and a different mission for our troops there. I would not be prepared to the cut off funding to our troops on the ground in Iraq, even though I disagree on the surge. I think we ought to be voting on that before they go rather then have them on the ground there and then cutting off the resources for them."

Sen. Jeff Sessions said on Fox News' Your World (1/11, Cavuto), "We are worried about the success in Iraq. Even this improvement -- I think it will be an improvement. I think it does enhance our ability to be successful. But there is no guarantee. This is a tough battle. ... And the Iraqis are going to have to step up."

House Homeland Security Chairman Bennie Thompson said on Fox News' Your World (1/11, Cavuto), "I'm not interested in stopping it. I want the President to do more than a 20-minute speech as to why we need to escalate this surge effort in Iraq."

Rep. Marsha Blackburn said on Fox News' Your World (1/11, Cavuto), "I was so pleased to hear the President say last night, and I was relieved to hear him say, we need to be listening to the commanders in the field and the troops on the ground. ... They know what we need to do in order to win."

Giuliani, Gingrich Say Iraqi Civil Society Must Be Established. In a Wall Street Journal (1/12, A13, 2.04M) op-ed, Rudy Giuliani and Newt Gingrich write, "The American mission in Iraq must succeed. Our goal -- promoting a stable, accountable democracy in the heart of the Middle East -- cannot be achieved by purely military means. Iraqis need to establish a civil society. Without the support of mediating civic and social associations -- the informal ties that bind us together -- no government can long remain stable and no cohesive nation can be maintained. To establish a civil society, Iraqis must rebuild their basic infrastructure. Iraqis must take control of their destiny by rebuilding houses, stores, schools, roads, highways, mosques and churches. ... A massive effort must be made to engage in a well organized plan to rebuild Iraq. The goal: an infrastructure to support and encourage a strong, stable civil society."

Rice To Seek Support For Bush Plan In Mideast Trip. The Washington Post (1/12, A14, Kessler, 690K) reports with Bush's plan "facing blistering criticism at home," Secretary Rice departs today on "another difficult sales mission: winning the support of Arabs for the Iraq plan and seeking momentum for a renewed push on Middle East peace." Noting the "stakes could not be higher" for the trip, the Post notes that Rice "sees the turmoil as offering opportunity." Meanwhile, former Rice advisor Philip Zelikow "said the new effort has 'three big pillars,' including a comprehensive effort in the Middle East to win support for the Iraqi government and rallying the region to stand up to the extremism of Iran and al-Qaeda." But Rice's aides "have tried to lower expectations for this round of diplomacy, saying she was mainly hoping to listen to ideas." An administration official yesterday "denied a report in the upcoming issue of Time magazine that Rice had joined with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni in a bid to put aside a previous peace plan known as the 'road map' and leap right to final-status talks to bolster Abbas."

In its "Washington Wire" online column, the Wall Street Journal (1/12, Harwood, 2.04M) reports Rice "may speak on Afghanistan on coming overseas trip, while State and Pentagon team up to seek $6 billion for added Afghan troop training, border protection, road building and other projects. But they face pushback from Bush budgeteers, who aim to cut those figures in half."

In an editorial, the Washington Post (1/12, A18, 690K) says Rice's tour of the region "is beginning today looks like a sideshow." Since her trip will not include "two of Iraq's neighbors, Iran and Syria, as well as the two countries that now stand in the way of progress in the Palestinian territories and in Lebanon -- again, Iran and Syria -- it's hard to see how her diplomacy can accomplish much." The Post notes that "there are ways in which the administration could step up its diplomatic efforts on Iraq." For example, the US "should support" and "join in" a "proposed a regional conference in Baghdad" put forth by the Iraqi government. The Post notes that "regional diplomacy will not solve Iraq's problems. An Israeli-Palestinian settlement will not cause sectarian warriors in Baghdad to disarm. But given the seriousness of the situation, the administration is foolish not to use every resource at its disposal. Mr. Bush is already pursuing strategies on the ground in Iraq that look like long shots; he should be willing to take more diplomatic chances, as well."

DOJ_NMG_0115633

Plan Gets Tepid Welcome In Baghdad, Criticism Elsewhere In Mideast. The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Stack, Ellingwood, 850K) reports, "In ordering more American soldiers into Iraq," President Bush "said he was sending a message of hope to millions of Arabs and Afghans trapped in violence. But to many on the ground in the Mideast, the speech spoke volumes of a disconnect between US promises and a turbulent reality." The Bush Administration "has portrayed the invasion of Iraq as a boost, albeit painful, for Arab democracy and human rights. Victory in Baghdad would bring a brighter era to the entire region, U.S. officials have promised." But "after waves of outrage over torture in Abu Ghraib; the spectacle of Saddam Hussein's trial and execution; and religious slaughter in the streets of Baghdad, few people in the region can articulate what, exactly, the United States is trying to accomplish."

The AP (1/12, Karimi) notes Iran and Syria denounced the US plan. Another AP story (1/12, Mroue) says "the Iraqi government spokesman chided the United States, Iran and Syria on Thursday for using his country as a political battleground, saying "we pay the price for the tension" between the three rivals and urging them to improve their relations." The spokesman's comments "came as Iraq's government welcomed President Bush's new strategy and promised it was committed to making sure it succeeds. Ordinary Iraqis, however, gave it mixed reviews, with many expressing skepticism that an increase in US troops would quell the violence ransacking their country." The New York Times (1/12, Burns, Tavernise, 1.16M) runs a similar report titled "In Baghdad, Bush Policy Is Met With Resentment," in which it refers to a "grudging endorsement" of the plan from the Iraqi government. The Washington Times/AP (1/12, Abdul-Zahra) reports on Iraqi reaction in a story headlined "Bush Plan Receives Tepid Baghdad OK."

Blair Says Bush Plan "Makes Sense." AFP (1/12, Haddon) reports, "Prime Minister Tony Blair said that…Bush's policy switch in Iraq 'makes sense', while his foreign minister stressed it did not necessarily herald 'a change of direction' from London.

Gates Proposes Adding 92,000 To Army, Marine Active Forces. The Washington Post (1/12, A14, Tyson, White, 690K) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates "proposed adding 92,000 troops to the Army and Marine Corps, initiating the biggest increase in U.S. ground forces since the 1960s to shore up a military that top officers warn is on the verge of breaking from prolonged fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan." The "permanent increase of 65,000 soldiers and 27,000 Marines would cost more than $10 billion annually and take five years to achieve, underscoring the Pentagon's conviction that today's wars and anti-terrorism operations will endure for many years. 'We call those 'long war' forces,' a senior military official said." The CBS Evening News (1/11, story 5, :20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Under his plan, the number of active-duty Army troops would jump from about 512,000 to 547,000. The Army is already adding recruiters to meet their goal. Active-duty Marines could increase from 180,000 to 202,000."

The Washington Times (1/12, Scarborough, 88K) says that while "an increase in 'end strength,' as the military's active force is called, is not directly related to President Bush's announced new Iraq strategy, it is an outgrowth of the nearly four-year-old war. The stress of deploying Marine and Army ground forces with little rest back home has begun to tear at the fabric of the 1.4 million active force, senior retired officers said."

Pentagon To Recall Army National Guard Units. The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Spiegel, 850K) reports the Defense Department announced plans "to recall Army National Guard units that have already fought in Iraq to serve second tours in the war, reversing a long-standing policy that allowed guardsmen to return home for five years before being redeployed. No new Guard units have been included in the first wave of forces going to Iraq" as part of President Bush's troop increase, and Defense Secretary Robert Gates "insisted the change in policy was made independently of the Iraq buildup. But other Pentagon officials have acknowledged that additional Guard and Army Reserve units are essential to sustaining Bush's increase in combat forces in Iraq over the course of the year." The New York Times (1/12, Cloud, 1.16M) says "the new rules mean that individual Guard members and entire units that have already been deployed in the last five years may be called up again for as long as 24 consecutive months, officials said." However, Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace said the Pentagon "intends to try to limit future mobilizations to no more than a year."

Britain Plans To Proceed With Iraq Troop Cuts. The New York Times (1/12, Cowell, 1.16M) reports the UK, "which had been America's closest and most pliant ally in Iraq, said Thursday that it would not follow the United States in raising troop levels there and signaled that it would proceed with plans to hand over security responsibilities to Iraqi forces in the south." Britain "has about 7,000 troops in Iraq. ... Officials here dismissed as speculation, though, a report in The Daily Telegraph on Thursday that those numbers would be cut by 3,000 before the end of May."

DOJ_NMG_0115634

Intelligence Officials Offer "Bleak Assessment" Of World Conflict Zones. The Washington Post (1/12, A12, Linzer, Pincus, 690K) reports Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte told Congress Thursday that Iraq "is at a violent and 'precarious juncture,' while al-Qaeda is significantly expanding its global reach, effectively immune to the loss of leaders in battle." Negroponte "also warned that the Taliban is mounting a vigorous insurgency in Afghanistan, that Pakistan has become a safe haven for top terrorists and that Iran's growing regional power is threatening Middle East stability. In their annual worldwide threat assessment before the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Negroponte and other top intelligence chiefs provided a bleak assessment of regions and conflicts at the center of President Bush's foreign policy agenda."

The New York Times (1/12, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports Negroponte "spoke of the 'shadow' that Iran was casting across the Middle East and warned members of Congress that Iran could be emboldened to dispatch Hezbollah operatives to attack American targets. Intelligence officials have long assumed that Iran's primary goal in Iraq was establishing a weak, but viable, state dominated by Shiites." But Negroponte suggested Iran's "steady arms shipments into Iraq, which American military officials say they have documented, and the political manipulation of Iraqi Shiite politicians could signal that Iran is trying to worsen the sectarian war and anarchy there, rather than seeking relative stability." The Washington Times (1/12, Gertz, 88K) says Negroponte said in Iraq, "'sectarian divisions are widening,' despite efforts by the new government."

Rice Names Carney As New Iraq Reconstruction Chief. The New York Times (1/12, A1, Shanker, Cloud, 1.16M) notes briefly that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced Thursday that Timothy Carney, "a retired Foreign Service officer who served as a senior civilian American authority in Iraq for three months in 2003, is the new coordinator for Iraq reconstruction." In announcement Carney's appointment, AFP (1/12) reports Rice said, "Our military operations must be fully supported and integrated with our civilian and diplomatic efforts across the entire US Government to help Iraqis clear, hold and build throughout all of Iraq." Carney will oversee the "enhanced" so-called Provincial Reconstruction Teams (PRT) from Baghdad, she said, noting that the former diplomat has "experience in post-conflict stabilization and reconstruction and development" from his time in Haiti.

US-Led Forces Detain Six Iranians At Office In Northern Iraq. The AP (1/11, Abdul-Zahra) reports, "U.S.-led multinational forces detained six Iranians Thursday at an Iranian government office in the northern city of Irbil, Iraqi officials said, as President Bush accused Iran and Syria of aiding militants and promised to 'interrupt' the flow of support as part of his new war strategy." The New York Times (1/12, Glanz, 1.16M) says the raid "was the second surprise seizure of Iranians by the American military in Iraq in recent weeks and came a day after President Bush bluntly warned Iran to quit meddling in Iraqi affairs. There was a tense standoff later in the day between the American soldiers and about 100 Kurdish troops, who surrounded the American armored vehicles for about two hours in this northern Iraqi city."

ABC World News (1/11, story 5, :25, Vargus, 8.78M) reported, "The President vowed to interrupt what he called Iran's support of militants in Iraq. As he spoke US troops staged secret raids in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil, seizing at least five Iranians with computers and documents from an Iranian government outpost." McClatchy (1/12, Landay, Youssef) reports, "In Washington, several senior Democratic and Republic lawmakers expressed alarm that Bush's plan to interdict alleged support for Iraqi insurgents could lead to secret military strikes inside Iran and Syria." Sen. Joseph Biden "warned that such action would require congressional approval," while Sen. Chuck Hagel "called the policy 'very, very dangerous.'"

Pentagon "Intensifying Operations" Against Iranian Actions In Iraq. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, A4, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "Even as President Bush seeks larger numbers of troops to stabilize Iraq, the Pentagon is intensifying operations there on another front: challenging Iran over its alleged role in destabilizing its Arab neighbor." The Pentagon "has significantly increased its intelligence activities targeting suspected Iranian agents and Shiite Muslim militants, U.S. intelligence officials said. Besides working with Iraqi security forces, the U.S. has intensified information-sharing with dissident Iranian groups such as Mujahedin-e Khalq." The Washington Post (1/12, A16, Wright, Trejos, 690K) also reports on the "new U.S. intelligence and military operation launched last month against Iran." The US "is trying to identify and detain top officials of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards' al-Quds Brigade operating in Iraq," which "is active in arming, training and funding militant movements, such as Lebanon's Hezbollah."

NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 4, 1:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "In last night's speech the President also put Iran and Syria on notice. Promising US military action to destroy their ability to arm and train the insurgents and the militias operating in Iraq." NBC (Miklaszewski) added, "One senior Administration official told us, when it comes to Iran, the US is taking off the gloves. In fact only two hours before the President's speech last night, American soldiers rounded up six Iranians in northern Iraq. Iran claims they're diplomats. The US says they're members of Iran's Revolutionary Guard, responsible for killing American soldiers. The new aggressive military strategy is aimed at stopping the flow of sophisticated IED's from Iran into Iraq. Now, those roadside bombs are the number-one killers of Americans in the war. And despite all that, US military officials insist there are still no active plans to launch military strikes inside Iran."

DOJ_NMG_0115635

Snow Says "Nobody Here Is Talking About Attacks On Iran." White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/11, Matthews), "Nobody here is talking about attacks on Iran. ... Most Americans understand Iran is the foremost financier here of global terror. It's a problem. But you don't deal with everything militarily, as you know. The United States exhausted all diplomatic options before going into Iraq."

Kerry Would Oppose Strike Against Iran's Nuclear Facilities. Asked on CNN's Your World Today (1/11, Clancy) if he would "support a strike on Iran's nuclear facilities, knowing it could open up a new front with Iran," Sen. John Kerry said, "No, I think that that would be a very bad idea right now. That is not the first option of what we should engage in with respect to Iran. I certainly wouldn't be against a hot pursuit. If we catch people coming across the border, or they're firing on our troops, or they're engaging directly and unsettling Iraq, and we catch that, I think we have a right to respond to it. But I think a proactive effort that at this time, starts to think militarily, with respect to Iran, is wrong-headed and dangerous."

WSJournal Says "It's About Time" US Acted. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, 2.04M) editorializes that the US "has known for years that Syria and Iran are supporting Sunni insurgents and Shiite radicals in Iraq -- support that has taken a heavy toll in American lives. On Wednesday, President Bush finally suggested he'll do something about it. ... It's about time, and we hope the Administration keeps showing Tehran that it will pay a price for continued subversion in Iraq."

US, Iraqi Forces Find "Little Evidence" Of Massing Insurgents In Diyala. The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Zavis, 850K) reports US and Iraqi forces found "little evidence of the fighters they believed might be massing" in Diyala province "for a final stand as a joint offensive against a reputed safe haven and training ground for Sunni Arab insurgents entered its eighth day. U.S. forces said that in the last week, they had already killed at least 90 gunmen spotted maneuvering in the area or planting explosives in the road as nearly 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi government troops closed in and blocked escape routes. Seven more were reported killed Thursday as they advanced on U.S. and Iraqi forces on the outskirts of Turki, the main village in the area." US Capt. Stephen Dobbins said, "I think we killed the people that were going to fight."

"Chemical Ali" Tells Court He Ordered Kurdish Executions In 1988. The New York Times (1/12, Times, 1.16M) reports Ali Hassan al-Majid, the cousin of Saddam Hussein known as "Chemical Ali," testified in a Baghdad court that he "had ordered troops to execute all 'saboteurs' who defied government orders to abandon Kurdish villages in northern Iraq during a military operation in 1988. ... After listening to audio recordings that showed him issuing instructions in his role as overseer of the campaign against the Kurds, Mr. Majid rose to tell the judges that he was responsible for ordering executions in the villages. 'I gave orders to the troops to catch anyone they find there and execute them after investigating them,' he said."

Afghan Insurgent Says His Fighters Helped Bin Laden, Zawahiri Escape Tora Bora. The AP (1/11, Jan) reports former Afghan Prime Minister Gulbuddin Hekmatyar said in a television interview that his insurgent fighters helped Osama bin Laden "escape intense U.S. bombing in the Tora Bora mountains in 2001." Hekmatyar said "some of his fighters moved bin Laden, his deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri and other associates to 'a safe place' where he met them later. He did not say where they found the shelter. Bin Laden and al-Zawahiri are believed to be still hiding along the Afghan-Pakistan border after the heavy U.S. pounding failed to kill them or lead to their capture."

Afghan, NATO Troops Kill Up To 150 Insurgents Entering From Pakistan. The New York Times (1/12, Wafa, 1.16M) reports, "Afghan and NATO troops clashed with a large group of insurgents crossing from Pakistan into eastern Afghanistan in the early morning hours on Thursday. NATO said up to 150 insurgents might have been killed in the fighting. Two large groups of insurgents were spotted gathering on the Pakistan side of the border and were tracked as they crossed into Afghanistan," and Afghan and NATO troops "laid an ambush for the groups about half a mile inside Afghanistan, using air and ground forces, said Gen. Zahir Azimi, a spokesman for the Afghan Ministry of Defense."

The Washington Post (1/12, A10, Constable, 690K) says the "confrontation in Paktika province, described as the largest battle in Afghanistan since September, came as American and U.N. officials step up pressure on both Pakistani and Afghan leaders to stop their public bickering and do more to gain control of their respective border areas, where Islamic insurgents have been operating for months." The Christian Science Monitor (1/12, Montero, 59K) says the attack "is likely to bolster mounting international claims that Pakistan's tribal zone is a staging ground for attacks inside Afghanistan."

DOJ_NMG_0115636

DOJ:

Congressional Budget Delays Hit DOJ Agencies With Hiring Freeze. The AP (1/12, Jordan) reports, "A hiring freeze has hit two federal crime fighting agencies and a third has slowed its recruitment efforts because of congressional budget delays that some officials say threaten efforts to combat terrorism and violent crime." The AP continues, "The hiring crunch is largely the result of Congress' failure to approve the Justice Department's 2007 spending request. Lawmakers who oversee spending bills are now negotiating how much -- if at all -- to increase government spending. In the meantime, the agencies are being funded according to last year's budget levels." The AP adds, "Justice Department agencies feeling the squeeze are: … The Drug Enforcement Agency. A hiring freeze is expected to last through 2007, said chief financial officer Frank Kalder. Although more than 400 agents and support staff are expected to quit or retire this year, Kalder said the DEA might have to furlough additional employees if Congress does not give it about $95 million more than it did in 2006. Layoffs are not being considered. … The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. The agency is "not hiring and are not back-filling open positions," said spokeswoman Sheree Mixell. The ATF says it needs $71 million more than last year just to sustain its workforce of 4,900 employees. … The FBI. Recruiting and hiring has slowed since the budget year began on Oct. 1. The agency has stopped advertising for job openings on its Web site. Assistant Director John Miller said the bureau still is hiring agents, linguists, analysts and other high-priority employees."

San Diego US Attorney Asked To Resign. The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/12, Thornton, Soto) reports, "The Bush administration has quietly asked San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam, best known for her high-profile prosecutions of politicians and corporate executives, to resign her post, a law enforcement official said." The Union-Tribune continues, "Lam, a Bush appointee who took the helm in 2002, was targeted because of job performance issues – in particular that she failed to make smuggling and gun cases a top priority, said the official, who declined to be identified because Lam has yet to step down." The Union-Tribune adds, "Lam has had high-profile successes during her tenure, such as the Randy 'Duke' Cunningham bribery case – but she alienated herself from bosses at the Justice Department because she is outspoken and independent, said local lawyers familiar with her policies. … When she took over, Lam made it clear that she planned to focus less on low-level smuggling cases in favor of public corruption and white collar crime, which would mean fewer but more significant prosecutions. … Lam declined to comment yesterday." The Union-Tribune notes, "Lam, 47, has been criticized by members of the Border Patrol agents union and by members of Congress, including Vista Republican Darrell Issa, who accused her office of 'an appalling record of refusal to prosecute even the worst criminal alien offenders.'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

US Probing Apple Stock Option Grant To Jobs. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, A3, Stecklow, Wingfield) reports, "Federal authorities are actively investigating a backdated stock-option grant awarded to Steve Jobs, Apple Inc.'s chief executive, that carried a false October 2001 date, people familiar with the matter say." The Journal continues, "Apple recently disclosed that records were 'improperly' created to claim that the grant was approved at a special board meeting that month. But no board meeting took place then. … Investigators are now focusing on the grant to Mr. Jobs for 7.5 million options that were finalized in December 2001, when Apple's share price was higher. The false dating increased the value of the grant to Mr. Jobs, and resulted in a retroactive $20 million charge to Apple's earnings when it was discovered by a special internal investigation." The Journal adds, "People familiar with the matter say the false documentation was created by an Apple attorney named Wendy Howell, whom the company quietly dismissed last month. Ms. Howell contends that Apple's general counsel at the time, Nancy Heinen, instructed her to create the false documentation, these people say. Thomas Carlucci, Ms. Howell's attorney, said that while at Apple 'Ms. Howell acted as instructed by Apple management and with the company's best interest being paramount.' … Ms. Heinen left Apple in May for reasons that were unrelated to backdated options, a person familiar with the matter says. Her attorney, Cristina C. Arguedas, says Ms. Heinen didn't knowingly engage in any wrongdoing and denies she instructed Ms. Howell to falsify documentation. Ms. Arguedas said in a statement that 'each of the option grants involving Ms. Heinen was authorized and approved by her superiors.'" The Journal notes, "Investigators with the Securities and Exchange Commission, working with federal prosecutors, are seeking to question Ms. Howell and Ms. Heinen, but neither has agreed to questioning so far, say people familiar with the matter. … Authorities want to speak to Fred Anderson, Apple's former chief financial officer. It also remains unclear whether Mr. Anderson, who resigned from Apple's board in October, will agree to talk."

DOJ_NMG_0115637

Broadcom To Restate Financial Data To Include Misdated Stock Option Costs. Bloomberg (1/12, Brennan, Fishkin) reports, "Broadcom Corp., a maker of chips for consumer devices, will shortly issue financial restatements to include over $1.5 billion of costs for the misdating of stock options, Chief Executive Officer Scott McGregor said. … 'Hopefully that will put most of this behind us,' McGregor said during an interview yesterday at the Consumer Electronics Show in Las Vegas. He wasn't more specific on when the company would restate its results." Bloomberg continues, "The company is examining 6 million pages of documents to assess the impact of stock-option backdating, a practice that can enrich recipients by setting option dates to a time when the underlying stock traded lower. Broadcom Chief Financial Officer William Ruehl resigned in September, and the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission opened a formal investigation last month." Bloomberg adds, "McGregor originally said the restatements would be ready by the end of 2006. On Dec. 18, the company said it would report amended results for 2005 and the first quarter of 2006 by this month. Broadcom also hasn't issued full results for the second and third quarters. The delays have put the company in danger of delisting by the Nasdaq Stock Market. … Broadcom last month said the SEC had opened a formal investigation into its stock options. That means the agency may subpoena current and former executives. McGregor said he and his executives haven't yet been summoned. … The U.S. Justice Department and the company are conducting their own probes into Broadcom's option grants."

Former Siemens CFO Named As Suspect In Bribery Probe. The Financial Times (1/12, Milne) reports, "The investigation into the €420m bribery scandal at Siemens reached the highest level yet on Thursday as the company's former chief financial officer was named as a suspect." The Times continues, "The investigation of Heinz-Joachim Neubürger, who stepped down in April after being passed over as chief executive of Europe's largest engineering group, came as the current head of Siemens, Klaus Kleinfeld, warned that the probe threatened the company's survival." The Times adds, "The scandal has shaken the German group to the core and raised questions about the competence of its management. It has led to calls for the resignation of its chairman, Heinrich von Pierer, and has disrupted one of its most important joint ventures, a €20bn (£13.3bn) telecommunications tie-up with Nokia. … Mr Neubürger is under suspicion of knowing about some of the bribery and doing nothing about it. He is also alleged to have tried to influence KPMG, Siemens' accountants, from investigating a payment irregularity that could have been a bribe."

NYSE Probing Former Merrill Brokers In Timing Case. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, C2, Juan) reports, "Regulators at the New York Stock Exchange are investigating three former Merrill Lynch & Co. brokers who were ousted by the company in 2003 for allegedly helping a hedge fund trade improperly in mutual funds." The Journal continues, "In its monthly listing of disciplinary actions, the exchange said it fined former UBS AG branch manager John Borgese $50,000 for failing to supervise three unnamed financial advisers involved in mutual-fund market timing in 2001. The document also said a disciplinary action had begun against the advisers." The Journal adds, "The three are Christopher Chung, Kevin Brunnock and William Savino, people close to the investigation said. The brokers worked at UBS's Paramus, N.J., office before joining Merrill Lynch in January 2002. … The New Jersey Bureau of Securities revoked the licenses of the trio, known as the CBS Group, in March 2005 for engaging in deceptive practices related to rapid buying and selling of mutual funds, known as market timing. … The practice, aimed at reaping fleeting gains, isn't necessarily illegal, but regulators claim the conduct is inconsistent with just and equitable principles of trading. Critics also have said the practice can hurt returns for long-term fund investors."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Fitzgerald Case Against Libby "Seemingly Weakened." The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Perez, 2.04M) reports Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald's "case against Lewis 'Scooter' Libby goes to trial next week seemingly weakened by revelations that Mr. Fitzgerald knew early in his CIA-leak probe that the ex-White House official wasn't the original source of news-media disclosures." Fitzgerald's "success will depend largely on how well he can keep the jury focused on his charge that Mr. Libby 'knowingly lied' to federal agents during his probe into the leak of former Central Intelligence Agency operative Valerie Plame's identity." Other "recent perjury cases, including the successful prosecution of Martha Stewart on charges of lying to investigators about a stock sale, offer a road map narrowly directing a case amid heavy media attention and myriad distractions."

Puerto Rico DOJ Asks Court To Order Release Of FBI Raid Documents. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/12, Vargas) reports, "Puerto Rico's Justice Department asked a U.S. appeals court on Thursday to force the FBI to release information about its two raids against militant independence advocates in the U.S. Caribbean territory. … Puerto Rico's Justice Secretary Roberto Sanchez Ramos alleged that bureau officials have stonewalled his investigations into the raids and he has asked Congress to pressure the agency to cooperate. He said the FBI has refused to disclose the identities of the agents who participated. In September, U.S. District Court Judge Jose Fuste ruled against the territory's Justice Department, saying the FBI did not have to share information it deemed sensitive." The AP notes, "The information on the raids could be shared under a confidentiality order if the agency was concerned about public disclosure, Antonetti said. If that was not possible, the panel must send the case back to Puerto Rico's district court, which should force the FBI to say why the information could not be released, he said."

DOJ_NMG_0115638

Tennessee Waltz Trial Goes To Jury. WMC-TV Memphis (1/11) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "Both the government and the defense presented very strong closing arguments. Prosecutor Tim DiScenza told the jury that even if they believed what Calvin Williams said on the stand, he was still guilty of taking a bribe and extortion. Meanwhile, his defense attorney, Doris Randall-Holt, challenged the government's start witness, reminding jurors that Tim Willis was caught padding invoices at Shelby County Juvenile Court and that he cut a deal to stay out of jail. Now the jury must decide."

The Memphis Commercial Appeal (1/12, Buser, 163K) reports that before closing arguments yesterday, Williams "testified Thursday he had no influence over any commissioner, but in secretly recorded conversations played by prosecutors he boasted of working behind the scenes to help commissioners line up votes and arrange rewards. … The influence issue is expected to be a factor when a federal court jury begins deliberations at 9 this morning to determine whether a $1,500 payment Williams received in 2003 was a bribe for influencing passage of an urban renewal grant. Williams was recorded boasting that he would pay former commissioner Cleo Kirk to support the grant. Williams, who denied trying to influence Kirk or any other commissioner, contends the $1,500 he received in April 2003 was a legitimate business payment from former friend and political consultant Tim Willis, who was acting as an informant in the FBI's undercover public corruption investigation called the Tennessee Waltz."

Judge Delays Ford, Bowers Trials. The AP (1/12, Baird) reports, "A federal judge agreed Thursday to delay the public corruption trials of two former state senators charged with taking bribes during the FBI investigation called Tennessee Waltz. The trial of John Ford was rescheduled from Feb. 5 to April 9, and the trial of Kathryn Bowers was moved from April 16 to Sept. 10. Both are Democrats from Memphis. Judge J. Daniel Breen agreed that Ford's trial should be delayed to give defense lawyer Michael Scholl more time to review hundreds of hours of audio and video tapes secretly recorded by the FBI." The AP notes, "Ford is accused of taking $55,000 in bribes, while Bowers is charged with splitting $11,500 with an accomplice who has pleaded guilty to serving as a payoff bagman."

FBI Recovers Picasso Drawings Stolen From NYC Apartment. The AP (1/12, Long) reports New York City mover Nahum "Nino" Kohen "and his mother-in-law were arrested Thursday in the thefts of two Pablo Picasso drawings from an apartment after the owner died. The drawings, of a guitar and a mandolin, were worth more than $60,000 and were part of an extensive art collection owned by William Kingsland, who died in March, the city's Department of Investigation said." Manhattan public administrator's office investigators"traced the stolen drawings to Kohen after learning that his mother-in-law, Ori Lellouch, later tried to sell them, the DOI said. … The FBI had been investigating works of art from the collection that had been stolen years earlier and learned that an art broker had obtained one of the missing drawings from Lellouch, the DOI said." The AP adds, "Kohen's attorney said his client didn't steal the Picasso drawings, which were about 12 inches by 12 inches framed and have been recovered." Newsday (1/12, Dowdy) notes, "DOI investigators found out from the Federal Bureau of Investigation that FBI agents learned in November that Lellouch had tried to sell the drawings through a broker. FBI agents recovered the drawings from Lellouch."

The New York Sun (1/12, Shapiro) reports, "The Picassos add another layer of intrigue to an estate already under investigation. The FBI has been seeking leads on stolen works found in the estate, including a bust by Giacometti, two Fairfield Porter paintings, and at least two works belonging to Harvard, including a John Singleton Copley." The New York Times (1/12, Lueck, 1.16M) adds, "The apartment was 'chockablock with interesting treasures,' said Colin Stair of the Stair Galleries in Hudson, N.Y., who was hired by the public administrator to sell some of the lesser works in the apartment, including many watercolor-on-ivory miniature portraits. As it turned out, according to the F.B.I., many of the most important works had been stolen, although how Mr. Kohn obtained them remains unclear."

Three Detained In Killing Of Tennessee Couple. The AP (1/12) reports from Knoxville, TN, "Three men were detained by police Thursday in the killing of a young man whose burned corpse was found dumped along railroad tracks and the slaying of his date, who was kept alive for days and raped, authorities said." The AP continues, "Channon Christian, a 21-year-old University of Tennessee student, and Christopher Newsom, 23, may have been carjacked Saturday night, Chief Deputy U.S. Marshal Rich Knighten said. …

DOJ_NMG_0115639

Newsom had been shot to death, and his burned body was found Sunday, Knighten said. … Christian's kidnappers raped and assaulted her for days before killing her and dumping the body, Knighten said." The AP adds, "Authorities detained Letalvis Cobbins, 24, and his friend, George Thomas, after federal agents and Knox County officers raided a house 180 miles north in Lebanon, Ky. … Thomas was being questioned Thursday, while Cobbins faced federal charges of being a felon in possession of a weapon, Knighten said."

US Raids Porn Studios To Enforce Age Rules. The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Hoffman) reports, "The Federal Bureau of Investigation has recently stepped up raids of porn studios in the San Fernando Valley, saying it wants to ensure that children are not being sexually exploited." The Times continues, "About a dozen porn production facilities in pornography hot spots such as Van Nuys and Chatsworth have been taken by surprise in the last three months by a barrage of federal agents at their doors. … The probes come on the heels of a May 2005 change in the regulations that require producers to take two forms of government-issued identification from performers and keep them on file indefinitely. Those records must be referred to on the labels of all videos and DVDs sold. Violations are federal felonies and can carry a prison sentence." The Times adds, "The Justice Department has prosecuted only one company to date under the new law, said Bryan Sierra, a spokesman for the department. In September, the founder of the 'Girls Gone Wild' video empire, Joe Francis, pleaded guilty to two felonies, and his production company pleaded guilty to 10 additional felony counts. … Industry leaders doubt that the FBI will find many other violators. Jeffrey J. Douglas, a criminal defense attorney and the chairman of the Free Speech Coalition, an industry trade organization, estimates that there have been only about a dozen occurrences of minors working in the industry in the last 25 years. … Public policy experts wonder whether the raids are the best use of taxpayer money. 'The FBI has limited what they investigate since 9/11, so moving into this area does raise the question of resources,' said Athan G. Theoharis, a professor emeritus of history at Marquette University who has written extensively on the FBI. 'Is this at the expense of investigating the Enrons or the WorldComs that have far more effect on the lives of American citizens?' … Theoharis said the crackdown on pornography hearkened back to the bureau's early days, when J. Edgar Hoover boosted the FBI's reputation with a high-profile campaign of prosecution against pornographers and prostitutes."

Pennsylvania Man Sentenced To 30 Months In Prison For Appraisal Fraud. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (1/12, Ward, 230K) reports, "A man who used his dead father's state license to do real estate appraisals that were sometimes inflated by more than 80 percent was sentenced yesterday to 30 months in prison. The prosecutor in the case had asked Senior U.S. District Judge Alan N. Bloch to give Chester Underhill…a stiffer penalty, claiming that the potential for loss in the case ranged into the tens of millions of dollars. … But because the government only did thorough reviews of about 15 of the approximately 1,500 appraisals Mr. Underhill performed, the judge refused to grant the enhancement." Assistant US Attorney Brendan Conway "estimated that it would have taken the FBI agent on the case two full years to review all the files. 'I didn't say it would be easy, but that's your burden,' the judge responded."

The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (1/12, Cato) adds, "'Every single reappraisal he'd done turned out to be significantly inflated,' FBI Special Agent Joseph Bieshelt testified." Conway "estimated that financial institutions could lose as much as $85 million because of Underhill's fraudulent appraisals." However, "Bloch did not agree with the government's figure. 'That might be so if the government had proof of the loss,' Bloch said, before determining the loss was about $560,000." The AP (1/12) also reports on Underhill's sentencing.

Jury Hears Confession Of Man Charged With Killing New York Doctor. The Buffalo News (1/11, Beebe) reports, "A day after they heard James C. Kopp apologize to the widow of the man he is accused of killing, federal court jurors heard Kopp's own words Wednesday that he shot Dr. Barnett A. Slepian." The News continues, "Philip Sterlace, a stenographer in U.S. District Court, read back selected portions of a statement that Kopp made after his March 19, 2003, conviction in Erie County Court for the murder of Slepian. … '"On Oct. 23, judge, in 1998 late at night, I shot Dr. Slepian,"' Sterlace read aloud from the transcript of Kopp's statement. … The jury was not told why Kopp was addressing a judge in that statement, just as they were not told that Kopp was earlier convicted of murder." The News adds, "Sterlace's testimony, combined with today's subpoenaed testimony of Buffalo News reporter Dan Herbeck, who will be asked about Kopp's more detailed November 2002 confession to The News, should remove any mystery in jurors' minds about whether Kopp shot Slepian. … 'The only issue left is why he did what he did,' Kopp's standby counsel, John F. Humann, said outside the courtroom Wednesday." The News notes, "Once Sterlace finished his direct testimony, Kopp, representing himself, tried to show why he shot Slepian. … But as Kopp asked Sterlace during cross-examination to read parts of his County Court statement in which Kopp said he was trying to protect the unborn from abortion, Assistant U.S. Attorney Kathleen M. Mehltretter objected. … Judge Richard J. Arcara, who earlier had ruled that part of Kopp's statement inadmissible, told Kopp to move on to another subject. … Finally, after Kopp's third attempt to have Sterlace read the prohibited testimony, and the third sustained objection from the prosecution, Arcara excused the jury from the courtroom."

DOJ_NMG_0115640

Rhode Island Mob Capo Sentenced To Five Years In Prison. The Providence Journal (1/12, Malinowski, 167K) reports, "Anthony M. 'The Saint' St. Laurent Sr., an ailing capo regime in the Patriarca crime family, was sentenced to nearly five years in federal prison yesterday for conspiring to extort $100,000 from two Massachusetts men. U.S. District Judge William E. Smith said that he was sympathetic to the mobster's medical woes, but he was clearly disturbed that he has 17 convictions and a criminal history dating to 1961." St. Laurent "pleaded guilty in July to the extortion conspiracy charge. Federal prosecutors said that had the case gone to trial, the government could prove that in April 2006, St. Laurent directed Ricky Silva, of North Providence, and James Manning, of Cranston, to collect $100,000 from a pizza parlor owner and a bookmaker/drug dealer. And, if they did not pay, they were instructed to 'bash' the victims. On April 6, Silva, Manning and an unnamed FBI informant traveled to Massachusetts to search for the intended victims. … The FBI, Rhode Island State Police and Providence police arrested St. Laurent the next day."

Florida Woman Pleads Guilty To Medicare Fraud Scam. The Naples Daily News (1/12, Freeman) reports, "One of two people charged with stealing the personal and medical information of 1,130 patients at Cleveland Clinic Naples pleaded guilty Thursday and will be sentenced April 27, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Miami." Isis Machado "entered the guilty plea before U.S. District Court Judge James Cohn in Fort Lauderdale on one count of conspiracy to commit computer fraud, identify theft and wrongful disclosure of individual health information." Codefendant Fernando Ferrer Jr., "a registered owner of Advanced Medical Claims in Naples, is scheduled to stand trial Jan. 22 before Cohn in Fort Lauderdale." The Daily News notes, "Ferrer and Machado became the first individuals in South Florida to be prosecuted for violating the federal law protecting patients' privacy rights. Federal prosecutors filed a motion in October to protect evidence, four computer disks that contain personal and patient information, as confidential in the event the case goes to trial." The Miami Herald (1/11, Dorschner, 286K) also reported on Machado's plea on its Web site.

Marchers Demand Action On Surge In New Orleans Violence. The CBS Evening News (1/11, story 7, , Couric, 7.66M) reported, "More and more people are worried that New Orleans is becoming a war zone. In the past year, the homicide rate has been ten times higher than other cities its size. Today, thousands matched on city hall saying enough is enough." CBS (Pitts) added, "It took the recent murder of a local school teacher and documentary filmmaker for" resident Nora Natale "and her neighbors to say enough is enough … Add to the murder rate, unemployment for returning evacuees is 7%, and only half of the schools have reopened." FBI New Orleans SAC Jim Benazzani: "And when you add crack cocaine and the AK-47, you have New Orleans today." Pitts: "Most of the murders are drug related. While the criminals have come back after Katrina, many of the city's working class simply can't afford to," and "for many here, the fear remains -- when it comes to reducing the city's murder rate, is that mission impossible?"

ABC World News (1/11, story 8, 2:05, Vargus, 8.78M) reported, "More than 3,000 people marched in New Orleans today, demanding action against a surge in violence." ABC (Osunsami) added, "Last week, Helen Hill, a local filmmaker, was at home with her husband and young child when a street thug broke into their home, looking for cash. She was shot and killed. Her husband, Paul, who was holding the baby, was shot three times and is now hospitalized. The child survived, and is now in the care of the couple's family. … It took this highly-publicized murder to get the city to finally respond." Mayor Ray Nagin: "This city will focus on murders and we're drawing a line in the sand and saying 'we've had it.'" Osunsami: "There's a sense here in the neighborhoods that the solutions authorities have laid out are merely a band-aid and will do nothing to curb violent crime."

NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 9, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported that "thousands of people there took to the streets to protest that violence and try to get control of their city once again." NBC (Mott) added, "Nine people have been killed so far in the new year. … The march ends at city hall where many believe the solution to this surge in violence begins. The city says it has a plan to fight the crime. Still, some say that may not be enough." Rev. John Raphael of New Hope Missionary Baptist Church "said years of apathy have finally caught up with the city. … Today, 5,000 seemed to agree, vowing to end their silence about violence."

FBI Investigating Craigslist NYC Apartment Fraud Case. The New York Daily News (1/12, Lite, 729K) reports NYC resident Beth Ann Bovino "discovered that someone pretending to be her had placed a real-estate ad on Craigslist using her name, address and even an accurate picture of her brownstone. The too-good-to-be true ad asked for $1,500 for the one bedroom with a fireplace - utilities included." After responding to the fake ad, "she alerted Craigslist to the fraudulent ad, and it was taken down. But each time the posting was removed, a new one, slightly reworded, would go back up." The Daily News adds, "She ultimately reported the scam to the FBI's Internet Crime Complaint Center, a clearinghouse for the rising number of Internet fraud complaints. In 2005, the center received 231,493 complaints, up 11.6% from the year before. The center hasn't cracked Bovino's case yet, said FBI spokesman Paul Bresson, but he added that Bovino wasn't a bad amateur detective."

DOJ_NMG_0115641

Retired Arkansas State Trooper Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charges. The AP (1/12) reports, "A retired Arkansas State Police trooper has pleaded guilty in Bentonville to child porn charges and was sentenced to five years in prison. Joe Hutchens, 60, of Bella Vista, who is also a former bailiff, must additionally register as a sex offender." The AP notes, "Hutchens retired in May 2004 after working 28 years as a state trooper. … Hutchens was caught by an FBI unit that targeted crimes against children."

Pennsylvania Man Pleads Guilty To Sex With Minor He Met On MySpace. The AP (1/12) reports, "A Pennsylvania man pleaded guilty Thursday to traveling across state lines to have sexual contact with a 14-year-old Connecticut girl he met through the social networking site MySpace.com. Stephen M. Letavec, 40, of Elrama, Pa., was charged last year in one of the first federal sex cases involving the popular site. Letavec, a volunteer firefighter, was accused of molesting an Oxford girl in his car. The FBI said Letavec made several visits to see the girl from the summer of 2005 and early last year." The AP notes, "The girl signed onto MySpace as an 18-year-old, but told Letavec she was 14 before he visited, the FBI said."

Former Federal Prosecutor Charged With Running New York Escort Service. The New York Law Journal (1/12, Wise) reports, "A criminal defense lawyer who worked as a federal and state prosecutor in New Jersey has been indicted for running a Manhattan-based escort service, Manhattan District Attorney Robert M. Morgenthau announced Wednesday." The Journal continues, "The lawyer, Paul Bergrin, who has defended soldiers charged with committing abuses while in Iraq, was arraigned Wednesday on a fugitive warrant in Newark, N.J., and bail was set at $500,000." The Journal adds, "No plea to the charges was entered, but Bergrin, 51, declined to waive extradition at the proceeding. John Tiffany, who represented Bergrin, said he expected his client to voluntarily surrender and contest the charges in New York. … Also named in a pair of indictments involving the NY Confidential escort agency were James Cortopassi, who had worked as a law clerk at Bergrin's four-lawyer criminal defense firm in Newark, and Hiram Ortiz, a former New Jersey state trooper. Bail for Ortiz was also set at $500,000. … Cortopassi, who is a second-year student at Michigan State Law School, is expected to surrender voluntarily, Morgenthau said at a press conference Wednesday. … If convicted of the top count in the two indictments, first-degree money laundering, Bergrin and Cortopassi would face a maximum sentence of 8 1/3 to 25 years in prison. … According to his Web site, Bergrin was born in Brooklyn and graduated from Brooklyn College. He received his law degree from the Nova University Law School in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., and served two tours in the Army. … He worked in the office of the Essex County Prosecutor and the Office of the U.S. Attorney for the District of New Jersey. He was a partner at Pope, Bergrin & Verdesco from 1990 to 2005, when he established the Law Office of Paul W. Bergrin in Newark."

CIVIL LAW:

Mississippi Psychiatrist Settles Medicare, Medicaid Fraud Allegations. The AP (1/11) reports from Jackson, MS, "A Jackson psychiatrist has agreed to pay $216,000 to settle allegations of Medicare and Medicaid fraud." The AP continues, "The U.S. Attorney's Office said Dr. Viacin Faeza Jones misused billing codes and billed Medicare and Medicaid for excessive numbers of patients. The Justice Department said Jones billed for treating up to 116 patients in a single day and was paid $30 to $125 for each claim. … 'If a health care provider raids public funds through fraudulent or reckless Medicare billing practices, then he or she needs to be prepared to face the consequences,' said U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton. … The $216,000 is repayment for the wrongfully obtained funds, plus penalties of more than $100,000."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Alabama To Appeal DOJ Ruling On County Commissioner. The Mobile Press-Register (AL) (1/11, Murtaugh) reports, "State officials said Wednesday they will appeal to the U.S. attorney general to keep Republican Juan Chastang on the Mobile County Commission." The Press-Register continues, "Meanwhile, Democrats filed a motion Wednesday in federal court in Montgomery requesting Chastang's seat be declared vacant and a special election set to fill it. … The developments mean that Chastang will retain his seat for the time being after the U.S. Department of Justice on Monday decided that his appointment to the County Commission was legally unenforceable." The Press-Register adds, "In November 2005, Republican Gov. Bob Riley appointed Chastang, who is black, to represent District 1, a majority-black district that has historically elected Democrats. … Chastang filled the vacancy that was created when Sam Jones was elected mayor of Mobile. .. Shortly afterward, local Democrats sued to try to oust Chastang and fill the seat by a special election. A panel of federal judges in Montgomery ruled in August that the question was up to the Justice Department, which sided with the plaintiffs Monday." The Press-Register notes, "On Wednesday, attorneys for the three local Democrats who sued -- state Reps. Yvonne Kennedy, James Buskey and Bill Clark -- filed a motion asking the judges to order Mobile County Probate Judge Don Davis to call a special election for Chastang's seat. .. The motion states that Chastang would continue to serve until a replacement is elected. … A ruling on that motion might have to wait until the state appeals the Justice Department's ruling. Alabama Attorney General Troy King said Wednesday that he will appeal directly to the Justice Department's top official, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez. … 'We think the attorney general is a reasonable man,' King said 'There's a reasonable likelihood he'll see the issue like we do.' … Cecil Gardner, the attorney who filed the lawsuit on behalf of the Democrats, said he thinks the chances of the Justice Department's decision being overturned are 'very slim.'"

DOJ_NMG_0115642

Probe Of Gunfire At Home Of Louisiana Mayor Urged. The Baton Rouge Advocate (1/12) reports from Greenwood, LA, "State Rep. Roy Burrell, worried that other public officials may be the targets of violence, has asked State Police to help investigate the recent gunfire at the home of the town's first black mayor." The Advocate continues, "Burrell's request came one day after the president of the Louisiana State Conference of the NAACP asked the U.S. Justice Department to investigate the Greenwood shooting and an incident in Westlake." The Advocate adds, "Burrell, D-Shreveport, made the request of Col. Henry Whitehorn, the head of the State Police, in a letter this week. Two shots were fired at Mayor Ernest Lampkins' home Monday while he, his wife and daughter were sleeping. No one was hurt. … 'I am deeply and gravely concerned about the incidents of violence which have recently occurred in our great state,' Burrell wrote. He mentioned, as examples, the shooting of Lampkins' house and the 'unusual circumstances' surrounding the death of the incoming mayor of Westlake, Gerald Washington. … Washington, who was to become the first black mayor of the predominantly white Westlake community, was found dead Dec. 30, with a gunshot wound to the chest. … His death was ruled a suicide, but family members have asked State Police to investigate further."

DC To Probe Death Of St Elizabeth's Patient. The Washington Post (1/11, B5, Cauvin) reports, "A senior adviser to the mayor said yesterday that the District is examining how a 39-year-old mental patient died after an altercation at the city-run St. Elizabeths Hospital." The Post continues, "Peter J. Nickles, the mayor's general counsel, said the psychiatric hospital's new chief, Patrick Canavan, is leading an investigation by hospital administrators into the events Tuesday afternoon. … The man became unresponsive after staff members tried to restrain him following a 'dangerous altercation,' according to a statement by the D.C. Department of Mental Health, which runs the Southeast Washington hospital. The statement said the man was pronounced dead at Greater Southeast Community Hospital after being brought by ambulance. … Mental health officials did not identify the man, citing privacy concerns." The Post adds, "The city will be open about the findings of its probe, Nickles said. … 'There's going to be complete transparency about this,' said Nickles, who before joining the administration of new Mayor Adrian M. Fenty (D) spent much of his career suing the D.C. government for the failings of many of its human services agencies, including the city's metal health agency." The Post notes, "A civil rights investigation by the Justice Department found the quality of care and supervision at the hospital lacking, and in a report released last year, the department demanded that the city take significant steps to improve operations at St. Elizabeths. The investigation was prompted, in part, by the deaths of two patients attacked by other patients in 2004 and three patients whose care was compromised in 2005."

LAPD Chief Wants Disciplinary Board Meetings Open To Public. The Los Angeles Times (1/12, McGreevy) reports, "Los Angeles Police Chief William J. Bratton said today he would support changing the City Charter and state law to ensure that police disciplinary board meetings and some records are reopened to the public, complaining that he feels 'muzzled' by current privacy law." The Times continues, "A day after his department came under criticism for holding a Board of Rights hearing in secret to clear the officer who fatally shot 13-year-old Devin Brown, the chief likened the process to a 'star chamber' in which the public is deprived of information important to holding the police accountable. … On Tuesday, The Times revealed that an LAPD board had secretly cleared Officer Steven Garcia in the Brown case after the Police Commission had held the shooting to be out of policy. … 'I am in support of change,' Bratton said. 'I am very frustrated by [the current process]. The public has no access to it. The media has no access to it. That's crazy, absolutely crazy. We have nothing to hide in the Los Angeles Police Department.'" The Times notes, "Although disciplinary hearings have historically been open in Los Angeles, police officials changed LAPD policy late last year in response to a state Supreme Court ruling that restricted access to law enforcement personnel records in a San Diego case. … Last year, the Police Commission also changed a decades-old policy and began issuing public reports without the names of officers involved in shootings. At that time, state Sen. Gloria Romero (D-Los Angeles) offered to sponsor legislation to ensure that names would not be struck from public police records if commission members had concerns about potential court restrictions."

DOJ_NMG_0115643

More Commentary. The Los Angeles Times (1/12) editorializes, "An open, accountable and trustworthy Los Angeles Police Department seems perpetually just around the corner. Reforms are instituted, promises and progress made, but with every positive step forward, the pull of secrecy keeps yanking the LAPD ceaselessly backward. … And so, after Rodney King, Rampart and now Devin Brown, we are here: Hearings on officer-involved shootings that once were open are now conducted in secret. Reports that used to name the cop who pulled the trigger now do not. And a community that was finally learning to trust the LAPD is now clouded with suspicion." The Times adds, "On Wednesday, another LAPD officer shot and killed an unarmed man. Was the action warranted, was it a tragic mistake, or did the officer act unreasonably? Does the officer have a history of bad decisions? What exactly happened, and who was involved? Under rules in place until just over a year ago, we would probably find out, eventually. Under rules in place today, we may never get the answers. That in turn means we may never be able to determine whether we're getting the reformed LAPD we want." The Times notes, "Now Bratton has expressed frustration at the deleted names and closed proceedings, calling the board of rights hearings a 'star chamber.' He knows that no matter how perfectly his officers, his department and the various layers of review operate, the veil of secrecy opens them to suspicion and attack. … Bratton suggested that the Police Commission, already nominally in charge of the LAPD, could be further empowered to assure more openness in disciplinary proceedings. It's a good idea. Changing the City Charter is time-consuming and cumbersome. But if that's what it takes to reverse the LAPD's slide back into secrecy, it's worth it."

Accuser In Duke Lacrosse Case Contradicts Herself. The New York Times (1/12, Wilson) reports, "In an interview last month with a district attorney's investigator, the woman who has accused three Duke lacrosse players of sexual assault contradicted critical evidence and parts of her earlier accounts, dealing a new blow to a faltering case." The Times continues, "In her account, made public on Thursday in a motion by defense lawyers, the woman said two players attacked her in the bathroom at a team party in March. She also gave a new version of the timing and revised some of the men's descriptions. … The lawyers' motion said the latest account, from an interview on Dec. 21 with an investigator for District Attorney Michael B. Nifong, raised further questions about the credibility of the central witness in the case. … 'The accuser's most recent recollection of events demonstrates clearly that she cannot accurately recall and describe her attackers and that any identification made by her is necessarily unreliable,' the motion said." The Times adds, "Mr. Nifong is increasingly embattled. Last month, he dropped rape charges against the men after the accuser said she was no longer certain of some details of the incident. … The state bar has filed an ethics complaint against Mr. Nifong for what it said were prejudicial public statements. The executive committee of the North Carolina Conference of District Attorneys has called on him to drop out of the case. He has also been widely criticized for withholding exculpatory DNA evidence."

California Man Sues To Take Wife's Last Name. USA Today (1/12, 3A, Kasindorf) reports from Los Angeles, "Michael Buday is petitioning a federal judge for the right to take Diana Bijon's last name in marriage as easily as she could take his last name." USA continues, "Bijon, 28, an emergency room nurse, asked her fiancé to change his last name to preserve her father's family name because there are no sons. Buday, 29, a technical manager at an advertising firm, promised he would. … 'I had a rough childhood with my father,' he says. 'We never really got along. Diana's father stepped up, gave me career advice. He's family.'" USA adds, "Keeping his promise has been more onerous than Buday expected. A woman can choose her husband's name or her maiden name on a California marriage-license form after the couple pays a county application fee that ranges from $50 to $97. California and 43 other states provide no place on a marriage-license application for the groom to choose the bride's surname. … To officially change his name to hers — and for future Social Security benefits, Buday says — a man must pay a $320 court fee, advertise his intention in a newspaper for four weeks and get a judge's approval." USA notes, "The ACLU sued California and Los Angeles County on Dec. 15 to have the separate treatment of Buday and Bijon outlawed as gender discrimination and a denial of equal protection. The couple were married in August 2005 under their separate names after state and county agencies rebuffed them. … Six states — Georgia, Hawaii, Iowa, Massachusetts, New York and North Dakota — give either spouse the right to choose the other's last name."

Rights Groups Seek New Members From Younger Generation. USA Today (1/12, 3A, Koch) reports, "College freshman Simone Hall hasn't joined a civil rights group, although her mother belongs to three of them. She says she'd like to sign up and wishes they were more active on campus. … Kendra Clark, a sophomore, says she joined a campus chapter of the NAACP, the nation's oldest civil rights group, because racism still exists. Agbanyim Ugwuomo, a senior, teamed up with the Hip Hop Caucus, an activist group formed in 2004. He says he supports a fresh approach to racial problems." USA continues, "The three black students at Howard University are exactly the kind of new members sought by civil rights groups. The students say activism is as necessary today as it was 40 years ago when Martin Luther King Jr., whose birthday is Monday, led hundreds of thousands of people in marches for desegregation and blacks' right to vote. They say, however, that the focus now should be on issues such as inner-city school funding." USA adds, "Civil rights groups, beset by aging or stagnant membership, are recasting their messages to appeal to young people. They're putting up discussion boards on youth-oriented websites and talking about jobs, education, housing, entrepreneurship and financial literacy. … NAACP President Bruce Gordon says the group's membership, which had been aging, jumped considerably last year. He says it increased most among young people."

DOJ_NMG_0115644

ANTITRUST:

Bristol-Myers Still In Search Of Suitor. The New York Times (1/12, Saul) reports, "The drug maker Bristol-Myers Squibb brings to mind that vacant colonial for sale down the street. In real estate parlance, both are expensive and might seem to need too much tender loving care." The Times continues, "The company's leaders all but announced it was for sale last September. Four months later, though, no potential suitor has emerged — at least not publicly. … Instead, Bristol-Myers has entered several comparatively small deals, including one yesterday in which it announced a partnership with the British company AstraZeneca to develop two diabetes compounds." The Times adds, "One industry executive said recently that every large pharmaceutical company had looked at Bristol-Myers as a potential acquisition. But there are major deterrents to a quick sale: its price; two pending Justice Department investigations; and a looming patent trial involving the company's blockbuster drug Plavix. That trial is set to begin Jan. 22 in Manhattan federal court. … Bristol-Myers declined to comment yesterday on speculation involving the company's possible takeover. A Bernstein analysis last fall discussed why other pharmaceutical companies were not rushing to buy Bristol-Myers, despite a research and development pipeline that is viewed as one of the most attractive in the industry." The Times notes, "Cost is a reason. The analysis by Bernstein in October estimated the intrinsic value of Bristol-Myers at $21.50 a share. But the company's shares closed up 34 cents yesterday, at $26.54. Judging by similar takeover deals in the past, shareholders would want a 20 to 30 percent premium — or about $30 a share — before they would be happy with a takeover. … And many companies that might be interested in Bristol have lower price-earnings multiples. Acquiring Bristol-Myers would be bucking the norm in which high multiple companies usually acquire lower multiple companies."

Judge Rules Antitrust Suit Against Bar Exam Preparer May Proceed. Bloomberg (1/12, Glovin) reports, "Thomson Corp., owner of Westlaw legal research, must defend an antitrust lawsuit claiming the company illegally required aspiring lawyers to enroll in a second program as a condition of taking the state bar-exam preparation course." Bloomberg continues, "A test-taker claimed in a lawsuit filed last year in Manhattan federal court that Thomson violated antitrust laws by illegally linking state-bar and multistate review courses. U.S. District Judge William Pauley ruled today that the antitrust suit against Toronto-based Thomson may go forward." Bloomberg adds, "Thomson sells about 40,000 BarBri courses in the U.S. with both state and multistate review elements, generating about $125 million in revenue and $60 million in profits, Pauley said. As much as 90 percent of students taking prep-courses for the state section of the test enroll in the BarBri program, he said. … 'The evidence suggests that BarBri used its substantial market share to control competition, boost prices and potentially force unwilling consumption of its' multistate product, Pauley wrote in a 20-page decision. … Bar exams in 48 states include a 'multistate' section, which consists of questions on contracts, criminal law and four other subjects, and a second section with questions about a state's particular laws." Bloomberg notes, "The proposed class-action, or group lawsuit, was filed on behalf of all people who purchased a BarBri course in 47 states since 2001. The suit, brought by test-taker Anthony Park, seeks unspecified money damages."

EU Delays Ruling On Universal-BMG Deal. The AP (1/11, White) reports, "European Union antitrust regulators on Thursday delayed until June 1 a deadline to rule on Universal Music Group's plans to buy BMG Music Publishing for about $2.09 billion. … They did not say why they needed more time to look at the takeover." The AP continues, "If approved, the deal would combine the No. 3 and No. 4 music publishing catalogs, giving them a 22 percent market share and scraping ahead of current market leader EMI. … EU approval is the last hurdle for the deal, which was cleared in November by the Federal Trade Commission and the Justice Department in the United States." The AP adds, "Officials had said they would issue a final decision on whether to block or allow the deal by April 27 when they opened an in-depth investigation last month. … The European Commission is under pressure to look closely at the record industry after the EU's second-highest court overturned regulatory approval last July of a 2004 combination between the music units of Sony Corp. and Bertelsmann AG. … The court sharply criticized regulators, saying they had not done enough to show there was no monopoly in the recording industry before the deal or that there would not be one afterward. … The Sony-BMG deal must now be re-examined."

DOJ_NMG_0115645

The Hollywood Reporter (1/12, Cendrowicz) reports, "The delay, which pushes the decision to June 1, came after Universal Music parent Vivendi, called for more time as it prepared to defend a merger that would create the world's biggest music publishing company. … In a statement, Universal said it requested the extension, 'to give the commission sufficient time to consider properly the merits of the merger in what would otherwise be an overly aggressive timetable.' … 'We remain confident that the merger will be approved,' the company added." The Reporter notes, "Industry sources said Universal was concerned about how soon it would be able to provide the vast quantity of data sought by the commission, the European Union's antitrust regulator. 'It's not a problem, but it is a huge amount to gather,' one source said. … The timeframe is unusually short. Universal won the auction to buy BMG Music Publishing in September and filed its bid with the EC in November, but it was only on Dec. 8 that the commission announced it would open an in-depth merger investigation, just as its officials were due to leave Brussels for their traditional two-week Christmas vacation. The probe itself also has seen a change, as the head of the EC unit investigating the merger has just been replaced."

Open Standards Seen As Crux Of Cisco's IPhone Suit. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, A9, Clark) reports, "Cisco Systems Inc.'s suit against Apple Inc. turns on a trademark. But the fight also reflects two fundamentally different approaches to technology, one based on open standards and the other on proprietary design." The Journal continues, "Cisco contends that it holds rights to the name iPhone. The Silicon Valley networking giant filed trademark-infringement charges Wednesday to stop Apple's use of the name on its new cellphone, after the companies failed to reach a licensing agreement before the product was announced Tuesday. … Cisco also disclosed that it had been asking Apple, in exchange for using the name, to help Cisco's product work together with Apple's. … The request fits Cisco's style. The San Jose, Calif., company makes networking devices that rely on published specifications to exchange data. … Apple, by contrast, has kept tight control over internally developed technology to be able to offer exclusive features. Many competitors, for instance, have asked Apple to make it possible for songs purchased from the company's iTunes music store to be loaded on their portable music players. But only Apple's hit iPod can do that." The Journal adds, "The new iPhone offers sophisticated cellphone features and many functions of the iPod. Opening up that product or other Apple devices in new ways could help Cisco's hardware sales, given the publicity Apple tends to generate. One person familiar with the situation said the negotiations focused on broad technical cooperation, rather than specific devices. … Other lawyers observing the battle predict Apple will try to show Cisco didn't adequately use or protect the iPhone trademark."

Solis Criticizes FCC's New Video Rules. In a Wall Street Journal letter to the editor (1/12), Rep. Hilda Solis says, "In response to your Jan. 2 editorial 'Franchise Freedom' about the FCC's recent order rewriting the nation's video franchising rules to permit broadband discrimination against low-income and rural communities: I want to stand up for competition, lower prices and innovation that is both speedy and equitable." Some of "our largest corporations have convinced the FCC that cities and towns are to blame for any perceived lack of competition in the market for video and broadband services. This is misguided and irresponsible. For Hispanic Americans, who continue to face obstacles to accessing broadband services, equitable deployment is critical to ensuring that corporate titans cannot erect a walled garden behind which the fastest broadband services are squirreled for only the rich. Having failed to get Congress to bless their business plan that leaves behind most communities from their fiber upgrades, corporate executives have turned instead to the FCC for the dictum they demand. The FCC's new video rules give a license to discriminate to companies who openly admit to Wall Street that local franchises have not posed a barrier."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Praises Calderon's Anti-Drug Efforts. The AP (1/12, Pacheco) reports from Mexico City, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said today that the two nations must broaden their cooperation in order to curb the brutal wave of drug violence rocking Mexico." The AP continues, "Gonzales, who met with Mexican Attorney General Eduardo Medina, applauded President Felipe Calderon's efforts to reduce drug violence, which killed more than 2,000 people in Mexico last year." The AP adds, "Since taking office in December, Calderon has sent 3,300 soldiers and federal agents to Tijuana and more than 7,000 troops to his native state of Michoacan. .. .More than 1,000 troops also have been sent to the Pacific resort of Acapulco and two other cities in the western state of Guerrero in a crackdown on drugs and crime there, state officials said." The AP notes, "Gonzales praised Medina for a record 63 criminals Mexico extradited to the U.S. in 2006. … The extradition of criminals shows progress, Gonzales said, 'but much work needs to be done.' … Gonzales said Medina 'and I both wholeheartedly agree that our law enforcement officials must be able to cooperate with one another on a broader scale and in an atmosphere of mutual trust if we are going to turn back the tide of recent violence and crime that so adversely affects us all.'"

DOJ_NMG_0115646

The Houston Chronicle (1/12, Lloyd) reports, "The United States and Mexico must improve cooperation in the drug war or their efforts are doomed to fail, attorney generals from both countries said Thursday. … 'Clearly, Mexico and the United States have a shared responsibility to make our communities safer from the drug traffickers and criminals who are threatening our way of life,' U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told a joint news conference in Mexico." The Chronicle continues, "It was his first official meeting with his Mexican counter-part, Eduardo Medina Mora, who was appointed attorney general Dec. 1 at the end of a year of record drug violence. More than 2,000 Mexicans died in gangland-style killings in 2006, prompting the U.S. government to issue travel warnings for parts of Mexico. … 'Crime is not Mexico's problem alone or the United States' problem alone,' Gonzales read from a statement. 'It is our mutual challenge, and if we do not work together to meet that challenge, we will both fail. And the stakes are too high for failure.' … Medina Mora agreed. But he added that such a partnership must take place in 'an atmosphere of mutual confidence and profound respect for our sovereignty.'" The Chronicle notes, "Neither official said whether Mexico had accepted a petition by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration to open new offices in Nuevo Laredo, Matamoros and Nogales on the U.S. border. The requested expansion would bring the total number of Mexico offices to 11 and increase the number of DEA agents from 81 to nearly 100, officials from both countries have said."

The Laredo (TX) Morning Times (1/11, Reddick) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales toured the World Trade Bridge on Wednesday, announcing a new effort to fight drug traffickers on the border. 'We're concerned about violence in Mexico spilling into the U.S.,' Gonzales said." The Times continues, "Gonzales announced $300,000 would be spent on a new federal drug taskforce that would fight drug cartels. Cuellar said the money is a good start, but we need to do more, like adding federal prosecutors to handle the border's busy drug and immigration dockets. … U.S. Rep. Henry Cuellar, D-Laredo, said he asked Gonzales in September to visit because of recent increases in border violence, and he called the visit significant. 'It sends a strong message that he knows what's happening on the ground,' Cuellar said from Washington, D.C. … However, William Slemaker, who has become a spokesman for families of people missing in Mexico, said he didn't find any answers in Gonzales' visit. … 'I felt that he came to spit in our face,' Slemaker said. … Slemaker and other kidnapping victims' families held signs near the World Trade Bridge as Gonzales' motorcade arrived and left. … Slemaker said the proposal sounds like more of the same old thing, and he believes everyone keeps talking about border violence without thinking of the actual victims."

KVEA-TV, Los Angeles, CA, (1/11, 11:00 p.m., translated) broadcasted on Telemundo that officials Eduardo Medina, of Mexico, and Alberto Gonzales, of the United States agreed to "unite forces to fight against trafficking narcotics." Additionally, the (US) "asked the Mexican government to open three new offices in New Laredo, Matamores and Nogales."

KBNT-TV, San Diego, CA (1/11, 11:00 p.m., translated) broadcasted on Univision that during Gonzales' visit to Mexico, he said, "Organized crime is not a problem exclusively in Mexico or the United States, so it's required for both nations to fight it." Gonzales met with General Eduardo Medina and "compromised to improve the collaboration in the matter of information exchange, intelligence and experience that exists for the citizens of both countries." Gonzales "congratulated Mexico for it's operations against organized crime." The Univision broadcast also played in KTLE-TV, Odessa, Midland, TX (1/11, 5:00 p.m.). Other stations that ran this story are KTSM-TV, El Paso, TX (1/11, 10:00 p.m.), KRIS-TV, Corpus Christi, TX (1/11, 10:00 p.m.) and KMIR-TV, Palm Springs, CA (1/11, 11:00 p.m.).

US Charges Deputy Marshal With Leaking Information In Mob Case. The AP (1/11, Robinson) reports, "A federal deputy marshal was charged today with leaking information about a reputed mobster's cooperation with prosecutors as they investigated the top echelon of Chicago's organized crime family." The AP continues, "John Thomas Ambrose, 38, a former supervisory inspector of the U.S. Marshals Service's Great Lakes Regional Fugitive Task Force, surrendered voluntarily Thursday at the FBI's Chicago office, officials said. … He is accused of revealing information concerning the cooperation and travel plans of Nicholas Calabrese, who is expected to be a key witness in the government's Operation Family Secrets murder conspiracy case." The AP adds, "Prosecutors said Ambrose told them in a Sept. 6 interview that he passed the information to an associate of reputed mob boss John 'No Nose' DiFronzo in hopes of getting information on the whereabouts of then-fugitive organized crime figure Joseph 'Joey the Clown' Lombardo. … But prosecutors said that in later interviews Ambrose said he never believed the information would be passed to organized crime figures. … Lombardo, among those charged in the Operation Family Secrets indictment, was subsequently captured and is due to stand trial starting in May along with the others accused in the case."

DOJ_NMG_0115647

The Chicago Sun-Times (1/11, Main, Korecki) reports, "Nick Calabrese is a key witness in the upcoming Family Secrets mob trial, scheduled to begin in May. Calabrese is the brother of Frank Calabrese Sr., a man charged in 13 mob hits and one of the top mobsters on trial in the case. … The Chicago Sun-Times reported in September that Ambrose was placed on administrative leave while federal authorities investigated the allegations." The Sun-Times adds, "The deputy, a member of the Great Lakes Regional Fugitive Task Force, was required to surrender his badge and gun, sources said. … In 2005, federal authorities charged 14 people in the sweeping mob indictment. The investigation, which is continuing, pinned 18 previously unsolved murders on the Chicago Outfit. … Ambrose has spearheaded several high-profile fugitive arrests, including the capture of an Italian mobster living in the west suburbs and a Chicago street gang member named as one of the country's 15 most-wanted fugitives."

WMAQ-TV, NBC 5, Chicago (1/11) reports, "According to the FBI's affidavit, witness Calabrese admitted to the government that he was a 'made' member of the Chicago mob (a.k.a. the 'Chicago Outfit') and provided federal agents with the most expansive overview ever of murders allegedly committed by its members. In 2002, Calabrese agreed to cooperate in the investigation of alleged Outfit members, including his brother, Frank Calabrese Sr. and two other men -- brothers James and Michael Marcello." WMAQ-TV continues, "Nicolas Calabrese was moved to a secure prison facility in August of 2002, based on his ability to testify in 38 murders -- 16 of which he admits he participated. An investigation ensued, resulting in the April 2005 indictment of 14 defendants in U.S. vs. Nicolas Calabrese et al., which alleges a 40-year racketeering conspiracy involving 18 previously unsolved Outfit murders of suspected government witnesses between 1970 and 1986. That's according to a release by the Chicago FBI. … The case against the remaining 12 defendants is scheduled for trial in May."

CBS 2 Chicago (1/12) reports, "Ambrose, 38, a deputy marshal since January 1998 and a supervisory inspector for the U.S. Marshals Service's Great Lakes Regional Fugitive Task Force, was placed on administrative leave last September. He is scheduled for an initial hearing this afternoon before a U.S. magistrate judge at the Dirksen Federal Building." CBS 2 continues, "Calabrese is still in protective custody, set to testify in Operation Family Secrets, the massive case involving several alleged mobsters including Calabrese's brother Frank, Sr. … The feds say despite the leak, Calabrese was never in any danger, but he and others could have been."

The Chicago Tribune (1/12, O'Connor) reports, "John T. Ambrose was barely a teenager when his dad, Thomas, was convicted in the 'Marquette 10' police corruption trial in the 1980s. … The father died after just a year in prison and never saw that Ambrose grew up to be a law-enforcement officer—a decorated supervisor in the U.S. marshal's office." The Tribune continues, "Federal prosecutors said he followed too closely in his father's footsteps. In a case that shows the long shadow of one of Chicago's most notorious police corruption scandals, Ambrose was accused Thursday of passing secrets to the mob. … With his own dad gone, Ambrose had come to look upon another one of the convicted Marquette 10 as a father figure, according to court papers." The Tribune adds, "Chicago attorney Thomas Royce, who defended Ambrose's dad at the Marquette 10 trial, recalled Thursday that Ambrose occasionally sat in the courtroom watching his father's trial. He turned 14 during the trial. … 'I am truly surprised John would ever have an evil motive,' said Royce, who has kept in contact with Ambrose. 'He was very aggressive, in my belief, in trying to overcome his father's image.'"

Atlanta Narcotics Team Member Tells FBI Officers Lied To Get Warrant. The New York Times (1/12, Dewan, 1.16M) reports, "A narcotics team that shot and killed an elderly woman while raiding her home lied to obtain the search warrant, one team member has told federal investigators, according to news reports confirmed by a person familiar with the investigation who requested anonymity. The officers falsely claimed that a confidential informant had bought $50 worth of crack at the house, the team member, Gregg Junnier, told the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Mr. Junnier retired from the Atlanta Police Department last week. The story backs up statements by Alex White, a police informant, who said that after the shooting the police had asked him to claim, falsely, that he had bought crack at the modest home of the woman, Kathryn Johnston." The Times adds, "Spokesmen with the F.B.I.'s Atlanta office and the United States attorney here declined to comment."

DOJ: Illinois Doctor Illegally Prescribed 62 Million Doses Of Drugs Over Internet. The IDG News Service (1/11) reported an Illinois doctor "was sentenced…to more than three years in prison for illegally prescribing drugs over the Internet. Michael Millette, 46, of Crystal Lake, Ill., is the ninth doctor to be sentenced in an Internet pharmacy investigation conducted by the U.S. Attorney's office for the Northern District of Iowa. U.S. District Judge Linda Reade sentenced Millette to 41 months in prison and a $1.6 million fine." During his plea hearing, Millette "said he prescribed more than 62 million doses of drugs illegally over the Internet, the DOJ said in a statement. Millette also said he laundered the money he received from the Internet companies that employed him." Computerworld published the IDG story.

DOJ_NMG_0115648

Michigan Man Gets 7-Year Sentence For Role In Importing Thousands Of Ecstasy Pills. The Flint (MI) Journal (1/11) reported a Flushing business owner "will spend more than seven years in federal prison for his role in importing tens of thousands of Ecstasy pills between 2001 and 2004. Jared Petiprin…pleaded guilty in September to conspiracy to distribute a controlled substance. On Wednesday, he was sentenced to 87 months in prison by U.S. District Judge Paul V. Gadola." Petiprin "is the latest - but not necessarily the last - in a string of defendants involved in the large-scale distribution and sale of Ecstasy or cocaine who were charged in an investigation by the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Department of Homeland Security-Immigration Customs Enforcement over the past two years."

"Cocaine Cowboys" Indicted In New York. Albany, New York's Capital News 9 (1/11) reports on its Web site that the Cocaine Cowboys "are outlaws no more. Ten Members of the New York City-based gang have been indicted on felony charges of conspiracy to distribute a controlled substance." Authorities "said the drug gang was peddling between one and two kilos of crack and coke from the city into the Capital Region every two weeks, moving about $40,000 worth of the drugs each week." They "weren't selling on the streets. They sold to other drug dealers and made their headquarters in a house…in Colonie."

The Albany (NY) Times Union (1/11) reported, "The probe that began with street-level buys last summer uncovered a crew with a reverence for corporate culture and adherence to a strict code of conduct, prosecutors said. Workers who routinely ferried drugs were given cash bonuses for avoiding speeding tickets and contact with police. Others, overheard on wiretaps, lobbied for promotions to management positions, prosecutors said."

On its Web site, WTEN-TV, Albany (1/11) reports police "say what operated as a 'delivery service' for dealers around the area, is now out of business. That pipeline began down in New York City, and shipped drugs up the Thruway to Latham. Police say in order to distribute the goods, the dealers set up what they call a 'satellite base'…in Latham."

Federal Fugitive Facing Meth Charges Found In Alabama Jail. The AP (1/11) reported a Morgan County sheriff's investigator "helped find a federal fugitive who was already jailed in the county under a false name. A federal grand jury indicted Ulises Torres Cruz, 31, in July on charges of conspiracy to traffic methamphetamine as part of a major drug-trafficking organization in North Alabama. But authorities could not find Cruz, and he was placed on the Drug Enforcement Administration's most wanted list. … The man had told police his name was Martin Contera Vera, but Huntsville DEA agents confirmed that Vera and Cruz were the same person." The Montgomery Advertiser used the AP story.

The Decatur (AL) Daily (1/11) wrote that the effort "brought down a drug trafficking ring allegedly run by Oscar Xicotencah Salomon, 34, of Decatur. Salomon's alleged organization brought drugs into the U.S. from Mexico through the Texas border."

Budget Cuts Said To Be Hindering Drug Enforcement. For Time, (1/11) Brian Bennett wrote, "Though the global drug trade is heating up, expect a lighter U.S. enforcement presence on the streets. The White House's Office of National Drug Control Policy estimates that opium production in Afghanistan, which not only provides 90% of the heroin consumed globally but also funds Taliban activities, rose 61% last year over 2005. … Yet the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA), which annually loses some 3% of its 5,000 agents to attrition, has a two-year hiring freeze because of budget cuts to U.S. programs. DEA bean counters say they would need an additional $12 million to maintain current agent levels." DEA chief financial officer Frank Kalder "admits, 'there will be less drug enforcement going on. There's no getting around that.'"

In Detroit, Walters Praises Officials' Response To Fentanyl-Related Overdoses. The Detroit News (1/11) reported John Walters "commended Wayne County officials Thursday for their teamwork with others last year during a rash of drug overdoses from the powerful painkiller fentanyl. 'Your collaboration as a group was outstanding,'" said Walters. "'You saved lives, and you helped save lives in other places.' Fentanyl overdoses killed at least 179 people in Wayne County in the first 11 months last year, officials said." Walters "said it is unclear whether the continuing fentanyl deaths are attributable to a sizable production of the drug that is still in circulation or if others are manufacturing it."

The Detroit Free Press (1/11) reported 12 people died in May from fentanyl-related overdoses, and those deaths "punctuated a trend that began nine months earlier, when clandestinely produced fentanyl began showing up in combination with heroin and cocaine in some U.S. cites, including Detroit. Walters blamed the initial delay in recognizing the outbreak [in Detroit] and nationwide to the lack of a national reporting system for such drug epidemics." Walters "asked [a] work group for its advice on how to create standards for reporting and gathering of information that could spot emerging drug epidemics sooner."

Bonds Issues Statement Following Report Of Positive Amphetamines Test. The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Shaikin) reports the first player "to reportedly test positive under baseball's new amphetamine ban is Barry Bonds, the one most prominently associated with a federal investigation into steroid abuse. Bonds' test result from last season was first reported Thursday by the New York Daily News." Bonds "issued a statement Thursday in which he did not confirm, deny or address the positive test but did apologize to the Giants and their fans in general."

DOJ_NMG_0115649

The AP (1/12) reports Bonds "said he did not get amphetamines from teammate Mark Sweeney, but did not deny a report Thursday saying he tested positive for the drugs last season. According to a story in the New York Daily News, the San Francisco slugger failed an amphetamines test in 2006. The newspaper reported that when first informed of the positive result, Bonds attributed it to a substance he had taken from Sweeney's locker."

USA Today (1/12, Nightengale) reports Sweeney "told USA Today earlier Thursday that he did not have amphetamines and confronted Bonds about it last summer. 'I asked him why my name would be out there,' Sweeney said. 'I told him that I didn't understand why my name was even being talked about. He told me it was a misunderstanding.' Sweeney said he has never tested positive for amphetamines."

Amphetamines Seen As Part Of Baseball's Culture. The New York Times (1/12, Schmidt) reports that if Bonds "did test positive for amphetamines, it was as one of approximately 3,000 tests that baseball conducted last season for the stimulant, which has long been part of baseball's culture. Last season was the first time that baseball tested for amphetamines, with each player on the 40-man rosters of the 30 major league teams tested at least twice, and others tested more than that because of the 580 additional random tests provided for in the agreement between baseball and the players association."

The AP (1/11) reported, "There's a long history of amphetamines -- or speed and more commonly called greenies in the baseball world -- fueling generations of baseball players. Many turned to the stimulants for a way to get pepped up when their bodies couldn't do so on their own during a long season. The pills, widely used even until recently, helped with energy for day games following night games and other times when players were short on sleep, such as after a long cross-country flight."

Ecuador, Colombia Make Deal On Coca Crop Fumigation. The AP (1/12) reports Ecuador's president-elect "said Thursday a diplomatic spat over Colombia's fumigation of coca has been resolved, a disagreement that had spurred debate over the U.S. drug policy and prompted Ecuador to withdraw its ambassador. Rafael Correa, a leftist economist who takes office Monday, told reporters in Quito that the agreement with Colombian President Alvaro Uribe marked 'a huge step forward' in cross-border ties." Uribe and Correa "met Wednesday in Nicaragua during the inauguration of President Daniel Ortega and reached an agreement under which Ecuador would be notified of any spraying along the border, Correa said. They also agreed to create a three-party commission, with representatives from both countries and a third from the Organization of American States, that would ensure that the spray does not enter Ecuadorean territory."

IMMIGRATION:

US Indicts Exiled Cuban Militant For Immigration Fraud. The Miami Herald (1/12, Chardy, Weaver) reports, "A federal grand jury in El Paso, Texas handed down a seven-count indictment today against Cuban exile militant Luis Posada Carriles, charging him with lying about how he sneaked into the United States in March 2005. It is the first time the CIA-trained Posada has been charged with a crime in the United States." The Herald continues, "His chief benefactor, Santiago Alvarez, and another supporter -- Osvaldo Mitat -- were also indicted after they refused to testify before the same grand jury today. They were charged with contempt of court when they invoked their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination." The Herald adds, "The indictment accused Posada, 78, of making false statements to immigration officials about how he arrived in the United States. Posada has insisted he came through the Mexican border, but the indictment asserted Posada entered the United States by sea aboard the shrimping vessel Santrina crewed by Alvarez, Mitat and others. … This is the first time Posada has been criminally charged in the United States, the country he viewed as an ally and safe haven because of his past connections to the CIA and the U.S. military. By indicting Posada, the federal government ensures his continued detention."

The San Antonio Express-News (1/12, Contreras) reports, "Posada claims he entered through the Texas-Mexican border, but U.S. authorities allege he sneaked into Florida in March 2005 aboard a shrimp boat co-owned by Santiago Alvarez, a prominent South Florida supporter and benefactor of Posada, according to court records and newspaper reports. … Alvarez and Osvaldo Mitat, who reportedly worked for Alvarez, also were indicted by the El Paso grand jury Thursday on charges of refusing to testify at the grand jury proceedings, their indictments show." The Express-News adds, "Posada remained Thursday in a federal immigration jail in El Paso, one of the more infamous inmates there because of his background, which includes involvement in the 1961 Bay of Pigs operation — a U.S.-backed attempt by Cuban exiles to overthrow Castro. … Alvarez and Mitat were sentenced to federal prison in November after pleading guilty to federal weapons charges in Florida over machine guns, a grenade launcher and other items stored in an apartment complex that Alvarez, a real estate developer in Miami, owns."

DOJ_NMG_0115650

The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Williams) reports, "Posada's attorney, Eduardo Soto, filed a writ of habeas corpus in August challenging his client's continued detention. After U.S. Magistrate Norbert Garney recommended a month later that Posada be released, Department of Justice authorities urged U.S. District Judge Philip Martinez in El Paso to keep Posada jailed, claiming he is 'an admitted mastermind of terrorist plots and attacks.' … Thursday's grand jury indictment 'shows that the Justice Department is serious about pursuing Posada but still leaves his case in the immigration courts instead of addressing his terrorist background,' said Peter Kornbluh of the independent National Security Archive at George Washington University. … Kornbluh suspects the Bush administration is reluctant to put Posada on trial for sabotage or acts of terrorism because of his close ties to U.S. security and intelligence operations over the years. … Soto has also alluded to his client's knowledge of clandestine activities and their potential to embarrass past Republican administrations. … President George H.W. Bush, the current president's father, was CIA director during the Iran-Contra affair in which Posada played a key role."

The AP (1/12, Caldwell) reports, "Several countries have rejected U.S. requests for Posada to be sent there." The AP adds, "Posada, who was born in Cuba and is a naturalized citizen of Venezuela, is charged with one count of naturalization fraud and six counts of making false statements in a naturalization proceeding, according to the Justice Department. … The indictment alleges that Posada knowingly lied on his application and under oath when applying for naturalization to the United States in September 2005 and April 2006. .. He said he traveled from Honduras through Belize, ultimately reaching the United States near Brownsville, Texas, with the help of a human smuggler. But Posada actually entered the country by sea on a boat with four others, according to the indictment." The AP notes, "It is unclear what impact the indictment could have on the pending deportation order. If the indictment proceeds, Posada could ask to be set free on bond, Millan said, a move that would probably draw Justice Department opposition."

Bloomberg (1/12, Schmidt) reports, "If convicted, Posada Carriles would face a maximum of 10 years in prison on one charge of naturalization fraud and up to five years on each of six counts of lying in interviews with immigration officials."

AFP (1/12) reports, "Venezuela has demanded the United States extradite Posada Carriles to face terrorism charges. … US officials refuse to release him to Venezuela, where he holds citizenship, or Cuba, where he was born, saying he might be tortured. But they also have refused to free him, calling the former CIA operative a threat to national security." AFP adds, "Recently declassified US documents show that Posada Carriles had worked for the CIA at least from 1965 until June 1976, and he reportedly helped the US government ferry supplies to so-called Contra rebels, who waged a bloody campaign to topple the Marxist Sandinistas in Nicaragua in the 1980s."

Chicago Man Arrested For Impersonating FBI Agent To Scam Immigrants. Sun-Times News Group (1/11) reported, "A 40-year-old man was indicted Wednesday with allegedly impersonating an FBI agent so he could dupe immigrants out of money. Omar Abbas, who is currently in custody on a $100,000 bond, was indicted on two counts each of extortion and making false statements within the jurisdiction of the FBI, and one count each of impersonating a United States officer and bribery." STNG noted, "He usually preyed on immigrants caught in tough circumstances, authorities said. Law enforcement officials believe more immigrants have been scammed but haven't alerted authorities because they fear their legal status will be questioned, FBI spokesman Tom Simon sai"

TAX:

Another Plea In KPMG Case. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, C2) reports, "A Saipan man pleaded guilty to making false statements in connection with the government's probe into allegedly fraudulent tax shelters marketed by former executives of KPMG LLP. … The plea was the second in the government's tax-shelter investigation secured by prosecutors in as many days." The Journal continues, "Michael Grandinetti, a senior executive with the United Micronesia Development Association, entered his plea at a hearing before U.S. District Judge Thomas P. Griesa in Manhattan. … Mr. Grandinetti, 54 years old, said he lied to a prosecutor and an Internal Revenue Service agent when he told them in a March 2006 telephone call that he had disclosed to the UMDA's board that he received secret side payments from a group of tax-shelter promoters for UMDA engaging in certain tax-shelter transactions. … Mr. Grandinetti faces up to five years in prison on the charge. Bail was set at $10,000."

IRS Agents Criticize Prematurely Closed Audits. The New York Times (1/12, Johnston) reports, "Top officials at the Internal Revenue Service are pushing agents to prematurely close audits of big companies with agreements to have them pay only a fraction of the additional taxes that could be collected, according to dozens of I.R.S. employees who say that the policy is costing the government billions of dollars a year. … 'It's catch and release,' said Douglas R. Johnson, an I.R.S. auditor in Colorado for three decades who said he grew so frustrated at how large corporations were allowed to pay far less than what he thought they owed that he transferred to the agency's small-business division." The Times continues, "With one exception, other working agents would talk about the issue only on condition they not be identified because they feared being fired. They said a policy intended to avoid delays in auditing corporations was being pushed so rigidly that it prevented them from pursuing numerous examples of questionable corporate tax deductions." The Times adds, "I.R.S. officials said the complaints were misguided. In an interview yesterday, Debbie Nolan, the I.R.S. executive in charge of auditing large and medium-size businesses, denied that audits were being closed over the objections of agents who had evidence that significant additional taxes were owed. Ms. Nolan said she had not heard any such complaints from auditors. … She noted that the amount of additional tax recommended for each hour auditors spend on large and medium-size companies more than doubled, to $5,195 in 2006 from $2,394 in 2002. And she said that internal reviews of corporate tax audits showed that their quality had improved. … But auditors said they were told to limit questioning only to those specific issues that the I.R.S. and the companies had agreed in advance to examine. When other questionable deductions emerged in the course of the audit, they said, additional taxes were ignored."

DOJ_NMG_0115651

New York Judge Blocks IRS From Role In Tax Case. The Buffalo News (1/11, Gryta) reports, "State Supreme Court Justice John A. Michalek on Wednesday refused to allow the Internal Revenue Service to intervene in state court proceedings aimed at closing the financial books and paying workers of the former St. Augustine human resource center." The News continues, "U.S. District Judge John V. Elfvin two weeks ago quashed an IRS effort to have the matter handled in federal court, when the case was returned to Michalek. … Lisa L. Bellamy, a U.S. Justice Department attorney who made the intervention request Friday, could not be reached to comment Wednesday." The News adds, "As the result of a state Labor Department suit, Michalek ordered the closing of the debt-plagued center 11 months ago. The nonprofit human services agency for decades served Buffalo's black community. … In court papers, Bellamy contended that the IRS has a $592,325.54 lien on the St. Augustine operations for unpaid federal taxes and penalties. … After Wednesday's court session, Adam W. Perry, the center's state court-appointed receiver, said he is preparing a report for Michalek on paying off center creditors and obtaining back pay for 85 employees who worked months without pay last year while transferring clients to other agencies."

IRS Adjusts Monthly Transit Subsidy, Mileage Deduction For Workers. The Washington Post's (1/12, D3, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The Internal Revenue Service has increased the maximum monthly transit subsidy to $110 for 2007 as part of its inflation-adjustment procedures. That's a $5 increase in the tax-free benefit, which was last adjusted in 2005." The Post adds, "Government agencies use the benefit to encourage their employees to take the subway and use van pools rather than drive to work in the city and increase congestion. In the Washington area, about 163,000 federal employees receive Metrocheks, a fare card voucher, a Metro spokesman said." The Post also notes that the "IRS also has increased the standard mileage rates used to calculate deductions for taxpayers who use cars for business, charitable, medical and moving purposes to 48.5 cents per mile, up by 4 cents from last year."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Passes Stem Cell Bill, But Falls Short Of Veto-Threat Margin. The CBS Evening News (1/11, story 8, :20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "On Capitol Hill, the Democratic controlled House of Representatives is running its first 100 hours legislative clock right on time. On today's agenda, embryonic stem cell research. The House passed a bill to expand Federal funding for it. The President has promised to veto it." The AP (1/12, Taylor) notes "the 253-174 vote fell short of the two-thirds margin required to overturn President Bush's promised veto, despite gains made by supporters in the November elections."

As the New York Times (1/12, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports, "it would take 290 House votes to override a veto." But USA Today (1/12, 2.27M) reports that "supporters of research on embryonic stem cells say an end to restrictions on federal funding is inevitable after an overwhelming House vote Thursday." In the Senate, Sen. Tom Harkin "said he has 66 votes lined up in favor of the bill; he needs 67 to override Bush. 'We're working on everybody,' Harkin said." The Washington Post (1/12, A4, Weiss, 690K) reports "Senate leaders have said they plan to take up the bill next month."

AFP (1/12, Griffith) reports House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "hailed Thursday's vote as a victory for the effort to find cures for a number of diseases, including diabetes and cancer." The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Gaouette, 850K) says "lawmakers spoke of parents, children and friends who they said could be helped by embryonic stem cells, while others warned that the legislation would involve the government in the destruction of life in the form of human embryos." ABC World News (1/11, story 9, :15, Vargus,

DOJ_NMG_0115652

8.78M) also noted "the stem cell vote was part of the Democrats' agenda for the first 100 hours of this Congress."

The Washington Times (1/12, Bellantoni, 88K) reports "pro-life members from both parties oppose embryonic stem-cell research, arguing that it destroys life in the process of harvesting the cells. They also said the measure should have been put on hold because of recent research showing that amniotic fluid can be used to produce stem cells without destroying life." Minority Leader John A. Boehner "urged his colleagues to instead study those new methods, saying, 'We are going to find out that we are not going to need to destroy human embryos to get the kind of promise that we want. I've got 11 brothers and sisters. I'm sure it wasn't convenient for my mother to have twelve of us, but I'm sure glad that she did,' he said. ;Taxpayer funds shouldn't be used to destroy the human life, pure and simple.'"

The New York Times (1/12, Wade, 1.16M) reports, "It was a day of promised miracles in the House of Representatives. Almost every other lawmaker who spoke during the debate on the stem cell bill told of a close relative with a deadly affliction whose cure depended on generating new human embryonic stem cell lines." But the bill "would merely allow scientists supported by the federal government to derive new cultures of stem cells from the early embryos discarded by clinics using in-vitro fertilization. … The striking hopes that stem cell advocates have raised in order to overturn Mr. Bush's decision may generate public disenchantment with such research if its promise is not quickly fulfilled."

Charles Krauthammer writes in the Washington Post (1/12, A19, 690K), "I have long supported legal abortion. And I don't believe that life -- meaning the attributes and protections of personhood -- begins at conception. Yet many secularly inclined people such as myself have great trepidation about the inherent dangers of wanton and unrestricted manipulation -- to the point of dismemberment -- of human embryos." He adds, "You don't need religion to tremble at the thought of unrestricted embryo research. You simply have to have a healthy respect for the human capacity for doing evil in pursuit of the good."

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (1/12, 850K) says, "Research published this week shows that stem cells harvested from amniotic fluid -- easily accomplished through the common practice of amniocentesis -- can be used to create human tissues. … This could be an impressive new medical tool. But it also could be a convenient pretext for pushing embryonic stem cell research aside — and that shouldn't be allowed to happen. For all the potential uses of amniotic cells, they are likely to prove less adaptable than embryonic cells. Exclusive focus on amniotic stem cells would divert attention and time away from potentially more promising lines of research."

Bush Threatens To Veto Bill Requiring Medicare Drug Negotiation. The New York Times (1/12, Pear, 1.16M) reports President Bush "threatened on Thursday to veto legislation that would require the government to negotiate with pharmaceutical companies to obtain lower drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries." In Congress, the "chances for passage of some version of the legislation increased when a pivotal figure," Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus, "said Congress should repeal a provision of the 2003 Medicare law that prohibits such negotiations." Sen. Baucus said he "did not favor price controls, but did believe that Medicare should be able to negotiate prices in 'discrete areas where seniors need our help the most.'" The House plans to vote Friday on its version of the drug price negotiation bill; while the "Democratic bill is expected to pass, the White House announced the veto threat on Thursday in an effort to hold down the number of votes and to prevent the measure from gaining any more momentum."

The AP (1/12, Espo) reports that in a written statement of Administration policy, the White House said, "Government interference impedes competition, limits access to lifesaving drugs, reduces convenience for beneficiaries and ultimately increases costs to taxpayers, beneficiaries and all American citizens alike." The AP adds Bush "had already threatened to veto another of the top six bills Democrats are pushing across the House floor in the first two weeks of the new Congress. That's the measure, approved Thursday, to expand the extent to which federal funds could be used for embryonic stem cell research."

House Democrats Scrapped Plan To Rewrite Prescription Drug Program. The Washington Post (1/12, A1, Smith, Birnbaum, 690K) reports on its front page that prior to "taking control of the House last week, Democratic leaders briefly considered proposing a new government-run prescription drug program as a way to reduce seniors' drug costs, according to Democratic aides and lawmakers involved in the deliberations." But House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) "and her allies chose a far less ambitious plan -- to require the government to negotiate for lower Medicare drug prices -- that will come to a vote today. They stepped back largely out of concern that the pharmaceutical industry would stall a complex change, denying them a quick victory on a top consumer-oriented priority, aides say." The Post adds the Democrats "had reason to be wary: Despite years of lopsidedly favoring GOP lawmakers with campaign cash and other benefits, the drug lobby continues to wield tremendous power in the Democratic-controlled Congress" and "still has the backing of the White House."

McCrery Says Democratic Bill Would Have Undesirable Results. In a Washington Times op-ed (1/12), Rep. Jim McCrery, the ranking Republican on the House

DOJ_NMG_0115653

Ways and Means Committee, says, "The proposal to have the government negotiate Medicare drug costs that the Democratic leadership hopes to ram through the House of Representatives this week will either be largely ineffective, or it will cause undesirable results: it will restrict seniors' choices, devastate local pharmacies, raise prescription drug costs for veterans and stifle innovation." The Democratic plan "before the House offers nothing but the prospect of a diminished benefit due to heavy-handed government control of this important program."

NYTimes Praises House Bill. The New York Times (1/12, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "From all the ruckus raised by the administration and its patrons in the pharmaceutical industry, you would think that Congressional Democrats were out to destroy the free market system when they call for the government to negotiate the prices of prescription drugs for Medicare beneficiaries. Yet a bill scheduled for a vote in the House of Representatives today is sufficiently flexible to allow older Americans to benefit from the best efforts of both the government and the private drug plans." The secretary of Health and Human Services "should be able to exert his bargaining power with drug companies in those cases in which the private plans have failed to rein in unduly high prices — leaving the rest to the drug plans. The result could be lower costs for consumers and savings for the taxpayers who support Medicare."

Senate Democratic Leadership Dealt Setback On Ethics Bill. The New York Times (1/12, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports, "After campaigning for months on a promise to tighten ethics rules, Senate Democratic leaders tried unsuccessfully Thursday to block a measure that would shine a light on the shadowy practice of earmarking federal money for lawmakers' pet projects." After House Democrats "passed an unexpectedly broad change to their chamber's rules that would disclose the size, purpose and sponsor of any earmark," on Thursday, when Sen. Jim DeMint "introduced the same thing in the Senate, Democratic leaders moved quickly to squash it, calling the House bill ill thought out." The Democratic leaders' "effort to block the DeMint proposal was defeated by a vote of 51 to 46, surprising almost everyone in the Senate. The outcome reflected the keen desire of many lawmakers to appear to be on the side of openness and reform after an election that turned in part on Congressional corruption scandals."

The Washington Times (1/12, Miller, 88K) reports Senate Democrats "backed off promises to reform pork spending yesterday, using procedural tactics similar to ones they attacked Republicans for employing in past Congresses." Thomas A. Schatz, president of Citizens Against Government Waste, said, "Democratic leaders are stalling in an attempt to strong-arm more Democrats into voting to table the amendment. This is not a promising beginning to the new Congress when the first effort to improve accountability and transparency is being shot down by the Democratic leadership." Republicans said "the episode smacked of hypocrisy by Democrats, who campaigned heavily on ethics reform and what they characterized as the Republicans' heavy-handed control of Congress."

The AP (1/12, Abrams) reports the Senate's "new Democratic leaders, the fragility of their thin majority on display for the first time, were set back Thursday when nine Democrats joined with Republicans in support of stricter House-passed rules on lawmakers' pet projects." Majority Leader Harry Reid "was forced to delay a final vote on a measure he opposes." The measure, "an amendment to an ethics and lobbying bill, would have adopted a wider definition of 'earmarks,' specific projects inserted in bills, to include Corps of Engineer water projects, Pentagon weapon systems and items from other federal entities." The language "favored by Reid and Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., would require disclosure of only targeted funds directed to nonfederal entities such as a city park, state universities or private contractors." Among the Democrats siding with GOP Sen. Jim DeMint "were possible presidential candidates Barack Obama, D-Ill., and John Kerry, D-Mass., freshmen Jim Webb of Virginia and Jon Tester of Montana, and Mary Landrieu of Louisiana, who faces a tough reelection bid in 2008."

WSJournal Says Senate Democrats Repudiated Pelosi's Bill. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "Yesterday on the Senate floor, Majority Leader Harry Reid was caught pulling out every stop to kill his own party's plan for earmark reform." The Journal says that "to Speaker Nancy Pelosi's credit," House Democrats "recently passed ethics legislation that included provisions making earmarks more transparent." But the "ethics reform offered by Senate Democrats contained none of these tougher earmark provisions. So Senate Republicans, led by South Carolina's Jim DeMint, cheekily took the identical language of the House earmark bill and offered it as an amendment to the Senate version. Numerous Democrats instantly denounced it, apparently unaware (or unconcerned) that the language had been sponsored by Ms. Pelosi." Of the "46 Senators who voted to banish Ms. Pelosi's reform, 38 of them were her fellow Democrats."

WSJournal Criticizes Boehner For Exacting Retribution Against Flake. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (1/12, 2.04M) criticizes Minority Leader John Boehner's decision to "to punish Arizona's Jeff Flake by tossing him off the Judiciary Committee. The offense? Porkbusting." Flake should be "getting a promotion to the leadership, given how prescient he was in warning his colleagues about the perils of their run-amok 'earmarking.'

DOJ_NMG_0115654

He and a few comrades sponsored more than 40 House floor amendments last year to strip pork projects from spending bills. The National Taxpayers Union ranked him the most fiscally conservative member of the House. None of that sits very well with his House colleagues, who blame Mr. Flake for shining public attention on their spendthrift ways." If Republicans "think that punishing their most principled Members is smart politics, their time in exile could be very long indeed."

Democrats Say Bush "Still Playing Hardball" On Judges. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" section, "Despite withdrawal of four conservative nominees," Democrats say President Bush "is still playing hardball. California Sen. Feinstein fumes after Bush ignores her and Sen. Boxer in renominating Randy Smith of Idaho for a Ninth Circuit appeals-court seat traditionally held by a Californian. Conservative dominance on Virginia-based Fourth Circuit, which has three vacancies, is at risk. Freshman Democratic Sen. Webb objects to some candidates proposed by Republican Sen. Warner; the Virginia colleagues meet to discuss working together on judges." Democrats "seek records from Fifth District appointee Leslie Southwick's service in Reagan White House at time of Bork's Supreme Court nomination."

Democrats To Seek "Narrow" Tax Hikes. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" section, "Democrats seek to isolate Republicans with narrow tax-increase targets. House Speaker Pelosi identifies $500,000 earners -- a more exclusive group than party leaders have previously targeted -- as source of revenue for cutting middle-class taxes. Imposing pre-Bush 39.6% rate on those with incomes over $500,000 would raise more than $85 billion over four years, Tax Policy Center estimates." But the White House "sees any tax increases heightening Democrats' vulnerability."

GOP Criticizes Minimum Wage Bill For Exempting Pelosi Constituent. The Washington Times (1/12, Hurt, 88K) reports House Republicans "declared 'something fishy' about the major tuna company in House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's San Francisco district being exempted from the minimum-wage increase that Democrats approved this week." GOP Rep. Eric Cantor said, "I am shocked." While Speaker Pelosi "campaigned heavily on promises of honest government," Cantor said, "Now we find out that she is exempting hometown companies from minimum wage. This is exactly the hypocrisy and double talk that we have come to expect from the Democrats." The Times adds the bill "extends for the first time the federal minimum wage to the U.S. territory of the Northern Mariana Islands. However, it exempts American Samoa, another Pacific island territory that would become the only U.S. territory not subject to federal minimum-wage laws." One of the "biggest opponents of the federal minimum wage in Samoa is StarKist Tuna, which owns one of the two packing plants that together employ more than 5,000 Samoans, or nearly 75 percent of the island's work force."

Some Republicans Worry Bush Will Cut Education Deal With Democrats. The Washington Times (1/12, Fagan, 88K) reports some congressional conservatives "are worried that President Bush will cut a deal with Democrats that would not only renew his education law, but also dramatically expand it, including perhaps more requirements for the high school level." Rep. Jeff Flake said, "I am concerned, and I think a lot of conservatives are." The Times adds Bush is "urging Congress this year to renew one of his biggest domestic accomplishments, the No Child Left Behind (NCLB) law of 2002, which aims to increase student achievement through more testing and by tracking results of schools and holding them accountable." Democrats "are demanding some changes to the law, most notably a significant boost in funding levels." Flake said he "sees a scenario in which Mr. Bush gives Democrats the increased funding they want in exchange for including more requirements for high school."

Democrats Plan Vote On Bill To Reduce College Loan Costs. USA Today (1/12, 1B, Block, 2.27M) reports the House "is scheduled to vote Wednesday on a Democratic plan to reduce the cost of borrowing for college. But easing student-loan interest rates won't provide much relief, critics say, unless lawmakers can somehow also slow the inexorable rise in the cost of college." In the "past five years, the average cost of in-state tuition and fees at public colleges has jumped 35% — after adjustment for inflation — according to the College Board. In the past 25 years, the average cost of tuition and fees has risen faster than personal income, consumer prices and even health insurance." Many conservatives "argue that increasing federal aid will just encourage colleges to raise tuition even more," but others "note, though, that in the past five years, college costs continued to rise faster than inflation, even though financial aid declined." USA also examines reasons for the increases in colleges costs.

Administration Scraps Risk Assessment Plan. The AP (1/12, Schmid) reports, "Federal agencies seeking to protect the public, the environment or setting rules in general often have to prepare risk assessments. A Bush administration attempt to standardize that process didn't work out, though, and will go back to the drawing board." The Office of Management and Budget "said it will not finalize its original proposal after the independent National Research Council called the plan 'fundamentally flawed.'"

DOJ_NMG_0115655

The Wall Street Journal (1/12, A11, Fialka, 2.04M) says the move "could be a first for the Bush administration," and notes "OMB regulatory chief Steven Aitken said that the White House will modify its plan before making it final. He didn't say how it would be modified, however." Rep. John Dingell, chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, "applauded the move and urged the OMB to abandon the effort altogether, saying it 'ignores the specific statutory directives' Congress gives federal agencies." The New York Times (1/12, Dean, 1.16M) runs a similar report.

Johnson Transferred Out Of Intensive Care, Has Begun Speaking. NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 7, :20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Good news tonight on the condition of South Dakota Democratic Senator Tim Johnson. He suffered a severe stroke about a month ago and today he was transferred out of intensive care and into a rehab facility. You may recall that in addition to concerns over his health, his stroke had many fellow Democrats fearing they would lose their slim majority in the US Senate."

The New York Times/AP (1/12) reports that Johnson's "neurosurgeon, Dr. Vivek Deshmukh, said a magnetic resonance imaging exam on Tuesday showed that the speech centers in his brain were spared injury in the hemorrhage on Dec. 13. 'This is confirmed by the fact that he is following commands and has started to say words,' Dr. Deshmukh said in a statement." Johnson "is to have 'aggressive therapy' in inpatient rehabilitation at George Washington University Hospital, the statement said. On Monday, Mr. Johnson's condition was upgraded to fair from critical, and his doctors said he no longer needed a ventilator. He was being weaned off the tracheotomy tube in his neck, his office said Wednesday."

Burns Defends Hughes In Foreign Service Journal. The Washington Post's (1/12, A17) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns "has come to the defense of his colleague, undersecretary for public diplomacy -- and very close Bush friend -- Karen Hughes, in the latest issue of the Foreign Service Journal." Burns, in a "quite lengthy and impassioned rebuttal" to an October article in the journal, wrote "to express my strong disagreement with several assertions" in the piece, especially that she was "wary of the foreign service" and prefers "political appointees."

National Defense University Computers Hacked. The Washington Times (1/12, Gertz, Scarborough, 88K) reports, "Computers and information networks at the National Defense University (NDU), the Joint Chiefs military education school at Fort McNair in Washington, were hacked and damaged by unknown attackers, defense officials said. The attacks, described by officials only as 'malicious activity,' caused the university to shut down all its network servers and replace laptop computers after the activity was detected last month. The costs were high, officials said."

Radio Chips Found In Canadian Coins Passed To Pentagon Contractors. The Washington Times (1/12, Hudson, 88K) reports, "Foreign spies are literally following the money to keep a close eye on Pentagon contractors, who are reporting that Canadian coins with Radio Frequency Identification chips have been planted in their clothing." A US Defense Security Service report says, "On at least three separate occasions between October 2005 and January 2006, cleared defense contractors' employees traveling through Canada have discovered radio frequency transmitters embedded in Canadian coins placed on their persons." Spokeswoman Martha Deutscher "confirmed the report and said it was intended to notify security officials, defense contractors and Pentagon policy-makers of spy technology being used."

Government's Official Web Portal Changes Name From FirstGov.gov To USA.gov. The Washington Post's (1/12, D3, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The government's official Web portal has changed its name from FirstGov.gov to USA.gov in response to feedback from the public that suggests the old name never caught on." The Post adds "USA.gov officially launches Thursday, GSA officials said, though the new name was on display yesterday for Web surfers."

First Lady Tours Renovated Treasury Building. The AP (1/12, Crutsinger) reports First Lady Laura Bush "went next door to the Treasury Department Thursday and pronounced herself impressed with the remodeling at 1500 Pennsylvania Avenue." Mrs. Bush "joined Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson in a ribbon cutting ceremony to mark the completion of a 10-year renovation of the Treasury Building, which is the third oldest government structure in Washington behind the Capitol and the White House." The "current structure, begun in 1836, had not undergone a major renovation since the beginning of the last century. The 10-year project, finished at a cost of $247 million, restored the buildings' lost grandeur by uncovering painted ceilings and skylights that had not been seen for decades and by refurbishing the ornate Cash Room, site of Ulysses Grant's first inaugural ball in 1869."

The Washington Post (1/12, C1, Stepp, 690K) reports, "Like the wallflower who glams up before going to a party, hoping someone will pay attention, Treasury has just completed a $247 million renovation, and a hundred or so people were on hand to witness Laura Bush celebrate the moment. So, okay, maybe most of those people came to see the first lady, including the half-dozen reporters and photographers who accompanied her on a private tour of the building's most-prized rooms."

DOJ_NMG_0115656

OTHER NEWS:

Fed Official Issues Warning About Threats To Economy. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Ip, 2.04M) reports, "New York Fed President Timothy Geithner delivered one of his strongest warnings yet on threats facing the US economy, citing the budget deficit, fixed exchange rates and growing inequality. In his three years on the job, Mr. Geithner has taken on the New York Fed's traditional role as chief worry wart. But some of his past warnings have been muffled by opaque and wonky language." The official "was far clearer in a speech today to the Council on Foreign Relations in New York. He said some countries, to keep their currencies fixed to the dollar, are accumulating big reserves of dollar-denominated securities, thereby holding down long-term interest rates, which might be distorting US growth and investment. He didn't name the offenders, but China and some Persian Gulf oil exporters are probable candidates." He "also ventured into politically charged terrain that Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke has tried to avoid. (He will be tested on that when he appears before the Senate Budget Committee next Thursday.) Mr. Geithner warned that current year deficits are too high while Mr. Bernanke has generally limited his concerns to the threat of higher entitlement spending in later years."

Jobless Claims Down. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, A2, Blackstone, 2.04M) reports, "The number of US workers filing new claims for unemployment benefits tumbled in the latest week, pushing below a key threshold and providing further evidence that labor market conditions remain quite strong. New claims for unemployment insurance decreased by 26,000 to 299,000 in the week ended Jan. 6, the Labor Department said Thursday, the lowest level since July 22, when claims were also 299,000."

Plunging Oil Prices Could Benefit Economy. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, A1, Whitehouse, Davis, Bahree, 2.04M) reports, "Oil prices fell sharply yesterday and are now hovering at their lowest levels since mid-2005, raising the prospect of significant changes in the outlook for corporate profits, consumer spending and the global economy. Crude oil fell another $2.14, or 4%, to $51.88 a barrel yesterday on the New York Mercantile Exchange. The price has plunged 15% since the year began." The "slide, which market participants said was fueled in part by speculative hedge-fund trading and a retreat by other investors, helped send stocks higher as investors bet lower energy prices would fatten corporate profits and strengthen economic growth, particularly in the U.S." If "sustained, the decline in prices would have a big impact on everything from the American consumer to the profits of giant energy companies. It also could dent the revenues -- and the political clout -- of major oil-producing nations like Russia, Iran and Venezuela."

The New York Times (1/12, Krauss, 1.16M) reports the fall in oil prices provides "potential relief to consumers. But investors in energy stocks may wish for a cold spell after they see the fourth-quarter earnings of their stocks in the next few weeks." The Times adds, "Declining oil prices helped drive up the broader stock market, raising hopes that with inflation fears abating somewhat, the Federal Reserve may even consider lowering interest rates in the coming months." OPEC President "Muhammad bin Dhaen al-Hamli of the United Arab Emirates, was said to have told the Emirates news agency that the group would move to prop up prices if necessary." But "few American analysts seemed to take his implied warning of possible future production cuts very seriously."

Stocks Rally, With Dow At Record High. NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 11, :10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Back here in New York today some gains on Wall Street. The Dow was more than 72 points today [to close at 12,524.98]. NASDAQ also up 25 and half points [to close at 2,484.85] on today's trading." The Washington Post/AP (1/12, D4) notes the Dow topped "the previous record close reached on Dec. 27 by 4.41 points. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 8.97, or 0.63 percent, to 1423.82." The Wall Street Journal (1/12, C1, Browning, 2.04M) and USA Today (1/12, 6B, Krantz, 2.27M) run similar stories.

Federal Judge Allows Sex Abuse Suit Against Vatican To Proceed. The Louisville (KY) Courier-Journal (1/12, Riley) reports, "A federal judge in Louisville issued a 'historic' decision yesterday by refusing to dismiss a lawsuit against the Vatican that alleges a cover-up to protect priests who molested American children. … 'This is the first and only case which has as its sole objective holding the Vatican financially accountable for all of the childhood sexual abuses committed in the U.S.,' said Louisville attorney William McMurry, who filed the suit in 2004 on behalf of three men who allege abuse dating as far back as 1928." The Courier-Journal continues, "If U.S. District Judge John Heyburn II's decision stands, it could open the door for attorneys to take depositions of Vatican officials -- including Pope Benedict XVI -- obtain copies of church records and documents and ultimately determine 'what prompted all of the bishops to keep quiet, hide these pedophiles and refuse to report child abusers,' McMurry said. He called the decision 'historic.' … But Jeffrey Lena of Berkeley, Calif., counsel for the Vatican, known legally as the Holy See, said Heyburn's decision rejected portions of McMurry's lawsuit and left the case hanging on a 'fairly weak linchpin' -- that U.S. Catholic clergy are employees of the Vatican. … 'The Holy See is just not responsible for this, and that's the bottom line,' Lena said." The Courier-Journal notes, "Regardless, the case could be entangled in appeals for years before eventually ending up at the U.S. Supreme Court, McMurry and Lena said. … One of the three plaintiffs is Michael Turner of Louisville, who also filed the first in a wave of roughly 250 sexual-abuse lawsuits against the Archdiocese of Louisville between 2002 and 2003. The litigation culminated in a $25.7 million settlement with most of the plaintiffs. McMurry and his legal team received 40 percent of most plaintiffs' payments. … The two other plaintiffs in the Vatican suit are James H. O'Bryan and Donald E. Poppe, both of whom live in California and say they were abused by priests while growing up in Louisville. All three are asking for unspecified monetary damages from the Vatican."

DOJ_NMG_0115657

Dodd Announces He Will Make '08 Bid For White House. The AP (1/12, Fouhy) reports that Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd (D) "announced Thursday he will run for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008, saying problems at home and abroad meant it was time for him to 'get out of the bleachers and onto the arena floor.'" Dodd, who announced his bid on MSNBC's "Imus in the Morning" show, said, "There's a heightened sense of urgency about the condition of the country. But it isn't just Iraq -- there are problems here at home that are huge." Dodd "said he planned to focus on issues like education, energy policy and health care in his campaign."

The Connecticut Post (1/12, Urban) reports that Dodd "filed a statement of candidacy with the Federal Election Commission on Thursday that will allow him to begin raising funds directly as a presidential candidate. He plans to transfer nearly $5 million sitting in his Senate campaign into the new effort. Imus praised Dodd's experience and intellect and said he would raise the level of debate but admitted he was backing Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., for president in 2008. 'Wait a minute. Wait a minute. I come on the program. I blow everybody else off. I announce here. I mean, at least leave the door open for me a little here,' Dodd cajoled. 'A little quid pro quo, I mean I'm your pal.'"

USA Today (1/12, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports that Dodd "acknowledges his odds are long, calling himself 'not as well known' as other prospects. He said the first contests are a year away and lightning could strike. 'I wanted to get out of the bleachers and onto the arena floor and make my case,' he said. Dodd, 62, said he has been involved with 'every major foreign policy and domestic issue of the last quarter century.' He also said he's a 'fresh face.' Political analysts agree that he is not a household name, which is a problem after 30 years in politics. 'He has not staked out a national reputation or a national identity of any kind,' said Dan Carter, a political historian teaching at the University of Richmond."

In Seeking Presidency, Dodd Touts His Experience. Sen. Dodd said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/11, Matthews), "I think all of us understand things at home and abroad are very difficult and the country is desperate for leadership that will be honest with them that will ask them to get involved in solving some of the huge problems we face, in energy, health care, the environment, the like, foreign policy. I think people want to see a positive attitude about what needs to be done to get us back on track. I think experience matters. In almost every other cycle I could think about, if you said I've been in the Senate for 25 years you'd be disqualified from running. But I think this time around, in light of what we've been through for the past six years, I think experience matters, experience where you can demonstrate a capability to bring people together, to come up with big ideas, to solve problems in the country. I've had that experience, on the foreign relations committee, on domestic policy. And so I decided this time around I'm not going to sit in the bleachers."

Dodd Says He's Hopeful Lieberman Will Back His White House Bid. On CNN's The Situation Room (1/11, Blitzer), Sen. Christopher Dodd was asked if his Connecticut colleague Sen. Joseph Lieberman is supporting his presidential campaign. Dodd said, "He's not taking a position yet and look, we're great friends. We had a bit of a difficulty last summer and fall with his race as an independent, but I was the chairman of Joe's campaign nationally for president. I nominated him when he ran for vice president. ... I'm hopeful Joe will be supportive, but he's going to take his time. I didn't ask him for his support. I'm sure it will work out."

Senator Slams Bush's New Plan For Iraq As "Unsound Strategy." The New York Times (1/12, Medina, 1.16M) reports, "A senior Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and a former Peace Corps volunteer, Mr. Dodd said he would spend much of his time concentrating on international affairs. 'People are asking a critical question -- what kind of experience do you need? -- especially after watching an administration that seems to have needed more on-the-job training instead of understanding as you go in. I have worked at this stuff for a long time." Mr. Dodd voted in favor of the 2002 Senate resolution supporting the administration plan to invade Iraq, but he has since said he regrets that vote. In a Senate hearing with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Thursday, the day after President Bush's televised address calling for more troops in Iraq, Mr. Dodd said it would be 'unsound strategy' to add more troops and urged a greater effort at diplomatic contacts instead." In an interview, Dodd "also said he would vote in favor of withholding money for more troops. 'Everyone knows this is a failed policy,' Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0115658

Dodd said of the president's war leadership. 'This is hardly a change of policy; it is more of the same, which hasn't been working.'"

"New England Liberal" Label Seen As Potentially Problematic For Dodd. The AP (1/12, Miga) reports that "Dodd's image as a Northeast liberal could pose a hurdle in his longshot bid for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination." Dodd "will be running in the turbulent wake of another prominent New England liberal, Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass. Kerry's losing 2004 campaign embittered some Democrats who contend he squandered a prime chance for his party to capture the White House. Those bad feelings have lingered as the 2008 contest begins to unfold. 'The party just nominated a New England liberal whose campaign was a failure,' said Dante Scala, an associate professor of politics at Saint Anselm College in New Hampshire. … 'That's going to be one strike against' Dodd." Dodd, meanwhile, dismissed "any suggestion that his Northeast liberal roots could hurt his candidacy. 'It's a false assumption,'" Dodd said in a telephone interview," adding, "People don't think in those terms. … Most Americans don't care about these labels we put on."

Denver To Host '08 Democratic Presidential Convention. NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 10, :25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "After months of negotiation, the Democratic Party announced today it will hold its 2008 convention one mile above sea level, in Denver, Colorado. Like most things these days, there's politics behind it. Democrats have recently gained some ground in the West. Something the party is hoping to highlight and take advantage of. The Republicans have already announced they will gather in the Twin Cities."

The AP (1/12) reports that in a statement Thursday, DNC Chairman Howard Dean said, "There is no question that the West is important to the future of the Democratic Party. … The recent Democratic gains in the West exemplify the principle that when we show up and ask for people's votes and talk about what we stand for, we can win in any part of the country." The AP notes, "Denver mounted a spirited effort to win the convention, organizing a sophisticated public relations campaign and enlisting help from Democratic lawmakers throughout the West. But the bid was fraught with logistical problems, among them a lack of close-in hotel rooms, its ability to raise the necessary $55 million to run the convention and serious labor concerns." Denver's "bid was nearly scuttled last month when the influential stagehands union refused to agree not to strike if the convention was held at the nonunion Pepsi Center. In the end, Mr. Dean enlisted the help of labor leaders in Washington, including AFL-CIO President John Sweeney and Andy Stern, president of the Service Employees International Union. A compromise was reached to staff the Pepsi Center entirely with union labor for the duration of the convention, effectively taking the last major obstacle off the table."

Schwarzenegger Defies Conventional Political Categories. The New York Times (1/12, Steinhauer, 1.16M) notes California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's diverse policy proposals, such as "proposing California be the first state to limit carbon dioxide emissions from cars" but also calling for "above-ground water storage, announced hours after his move to limit emissions." Schwarzenegger is "in many ways…sui generis, a celebrity-turned-politician hurled toward the center by California's Democratic majority. And since he can never run for president, his governorship is most likely the outlet for his more audacious ideas." But his "recent leadership is also the largest example of a growing movement in which state leaders are crossing party lines to get things done. While partisan polarization limits activity in Washington, D.C., state governments are addressing issues the federal government has not tackled."

Emissions Plan Leaves Means For Meeting Target Up To Industry. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, A2, Ball, 2.04M) reports, "California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's plan to require a 10% cut in the carbon content of its transportation fuels embodies a strategy to combat global warming that is likely to become more common around the world. Instead of mandating the rollout of specific technologies, such as electric cars or ethanol pumps, California has set an emissions-related target and says it will leave it up to industry to figure out how to meet it." The state is gambling "that the hands-off approach will unleash fights of economic self-interest among various industries -- fights that will, in the end, force industry to support a broad, economywide cap on carbon emissions. The broader the effort, the cheaper it is likely to be for any given company to cut its carbon emissions."

Krugman Says Schwarzenegger Health Plan Flawed. In his New York Times column (1/12), Paul Krugman says he is "of two minds" about Gov. Schwarzenegger's "ambitious plan to bring universal health insurance to California." It is "very encouraging to see another Republican governor endorse the principle that all Americans are entitled to essential health care," and if "California — America's biggest state, with a higher-than-average percentage of uninsured residents — can achieve universal coverage, so can the nation as a whole." But Schwarzenegger's "plan has serious flaws. Maybe those flaws could be fixed once the principle of universal coverage was established — but there's also the chance that we would end up stuck with those flaws, the way we ended up stuck with a dysfunctional system of insurance tied to employment." Schwarzenegger "appears to sincerely want universal coverage, but he also wants to keep insurance companies in the loop. As a result, he came up with a plan that, like the failed Clinton health care plan of the early 1990s, is best described as a Rube Goldberg device — a complicated, indirect way of achieving what a single-payer system would accomplish simply and directly."

DOJ_NMG_0115659

Bush Sr. Plans To Jump Out Of Airplane For 85th Birthday. The Houston Chronicle (1/12, Freemantle, 530K) reports, "A week after getting a new right hip, former President George H.W. Bush is recuperating at his Houston home, receiving visitors, worrying about his children, dutifully doing physical therapy and already thinking about jumping out of an airplane again. He's going to do it in June 2009 for his 85th birthday, he said. For sure. Even though his wife, Barbara, thinks it's crazy." In a "brief interview," Bush said "his hip is fine." The Washington Post (1/12, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K), in its "Reliable Source" column, quotes Bush chief of staff Jean Becker saying, "I almost fell off my chair when I heard him say this, but he is serious."

Professor Says Anna Nicole Smith Is Ultimate Forum-Shopper. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (1/12, A13), Ronald A. Cass, chairman of the Center for the Rule of Law and dean emeritus of Boston University School of Law, writes, "Anna Nicole Smith makes for good copy. America's most gaudy litigant has spent the last few months dodging eviction notices in the Bahamas and paternity-test subpoenas in the U.S. … In the midst of all of this, she has kept up her long-running litigation over the estate of her late husband, J. Howard Marshall II. The litigation, which initially was filed more than a dozen years ago against heirs to the estate of her husband, has changed into a suit against the heirs of E. Pierce Marshall, her husband's son, who died unexpectedly last summer. … Ms. Smith, a Texan who married a Texan, still comes to court in California seeking a sizeable share of J. Howard Marshall's Texas-based estate. At the same time, she asserts that she is now a resident of the Bahamas, so California courts lack jurisdiction over her in the paternity litigation. Outlandish as this soap opera appears, her manipulation of our legal system could have significance to the law and to the rule of law. That is why devotees of serious news, as well as tabloid aficionados, should give heed." Cass continues, "Ms. Smith's story demonstrates that a determined litigant with resources can move litigation among legal forums, tailor legal claims to prolong litigation, tie up assets, and make life difficult enough that most opponents would pay substantial amounts merely to bring the matter to a close. A victory for her would encourage forum-shopping, multiply costs and undermine the predictability of legal rules, doing damage that would last well beyond her 15 minutes of fame. A defeat for her would show that the system can at long last bring such manipulation to an end. And if that is what comes from her extended venture into the American court system, it would be a better legacy than any other she is apt to leave behind."

US Airstrikes Missed Targets In Somalia. The Washington Post (1/12, A1, McCrummen, 690K) reports a "small team of American military personnel entered southern Somalia to try to determine exactly who was killed in a US airstrike Monday," US sources said Thursday. So far, "no one can confirm a high-value target" among the dead, said one US source.

The New York Times/AP (1/12) reports American and Somali officials "have acknowledged that a small team of American Special Operations forces are in Somalia hunting suspected Qaeda fighters and providing military advice to Ethiopian and Somali forces on the ground."

Separately, the AP (1/12, Tomlinson) reports Ethiopian and US forces "were in pursuit of three top al-Qaeda suspects Thursday, with a senior US official confirming that none of them were killed in a US airstrike and were believed to still be in Somalia." The official in Kenya "said US special operations forces were focused solely on tracking down the suspected terrorists and not members of the Somali Islamic movement." Abdirizak Hassan, the Somali president's chief of staff, had previously said US airstrikes had killed Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, but the US official "said he was confident none of the three top al-Qaeda suspects believed to be in Somalia was killed in the airstrike Monday." The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Sanders, 850K) identifies the source of the report as US Ambassador to Kenya Michael E. Ranneberger.

The Financial Times (1/12, England) notes Monday's strike was "criticised by the European Commission, as well as the Arab League which claimed it had killed 'many innocent victims' and demanded that Washington refrain from further attacks."

The Washington Times (1/12, Sands, 88K) reports Somalia and its neighbors "risk falling under the sway of al Qaeda and violent Islamist movements if the United States and its allies fail to back the transitional government in Mogadishu," a top Somali foreign ministry official said yesterday. In an interview with the Times, Daahir Mireh Jibreel, permanent secretary for international cooperation in Somalia's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, said, "If we fail in Somalia, you will have [al Qaeda second-in-command Ayman] al-Zawahri's men taking over Somalia, Ethiopia and Kenya, because he has the resources and determination if he is not stopped."

Echoing Jibreel's concerns, the Christian Science Monitor (1/12, Baldauf, Okeowo, 59K) says that "keeping the peace" in Somalia "in the midst of what some say is becoming an Iraq-style insurgency, could be a much more difficult job." While "Western money will help to foot the bill," a UN-backed African peacekeeping force "may please Western powers, but it doesn't go down well at home, where poor African countries like Uganda and Nigeria have myriad problems of their own, from unemployment and illiteracy to ongoing domestic conflicts. And, while many see the moment as an opportunity to provide African solutions to African problems, the failure of the African Union peacekeeping force to provide security in Darfur, Sudan, is not an promising sign."

DOJ_NMG_0115660

Apparent Slowdown In Iran Nuclear Work Sparks Concern. The AP (1/12, Jahn) reports Iran's uranium enrichment program "appears stalled despite tough talk from the Tehran leadership, leaving intelligence services guessing about why it has not made good on plans to press ahead with activities that the West fears could be used to make nuclear arms," diplomats said Thursday. Tehran's "reluctance to crank up activities at its declared enrichment site at Natanz when it seems to have the technical know-how is puzzling the diplomatic and intelligence communities -- with some saying it was potentially worrisome." Diplomats linked to the International Atomic Energy Agency "said some intelligence services believed that the Natanz site was a front." While the world's attention is focused on Natanz, Iranian scientists and military personnel "could be working on a secret enrichment program at one or more unknown sites that are much more advanced than what is going on at the declared site," they said.

US Aid Package Seen As Expansion Of Role In Palestinian Crisis. In a 2,000-word front page article, the Wall Street Journal (1/12, A1, Simpson, King, 2.04M) reports, "In a move fraught with risk and historical ironies, the Bush administration is preparing to pour $86 million into strengthening security forces loyal to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas." The plan, "which has sparked a behind-the-scenes debate in Congress," is "just one example of how a new Bush administration focus on countering Iranian influence in the Middle East is quickly reshaping and regionalizing conflicts." The security program, which "was detailed recently in classified briefings for Congress by a US general who now serves as an adviser to Abbas," precedes Secretary Rice's weeklong to the region, where the administration is "promising Arab regimes political progress for the Palestinians in their attempts to establish a state next to Israel." The program drew some concern last week as the ranking Republican on the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida, "asked the Democratic chairman, Rep. Tom Lantos, to put an 'informational hold' on the cash, according to senior Democratic and Republican House aides." Lantos has not placed a hold on the money, "but his staff says he is seeking more details from the administration."

Issue Of Succession Raises Stir In Egypt. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, A6, Fam, 2.04M) reports Egyptian journalist Ibrahim Essa "says the Mubarak regime wants to intimidate him for, among other things, harshly criticizing the current president and raising a stink about who Egypt's next president might be." President Hosni Mubarak "has recently asked parliament to amend some constitutional articles, in part to encourage more political participation by opposition parties, but the opposition is skeptical there will be real liberalization." With the Mubarak's son Gamal seen as his likely successor critics of the regime says the government "has been cracking down on opposition figures in part to eliminate possible challengers to the younger Mubarak." The Journal notes that while Mubarak "sees his regime as a stabilizing force in the Middle East, and Egypt remains a main US ally in the region, many feel Cairo's clout as a peacemaker and power broker has waned amid the rising influence of hard-liners such as Iran."

Carter Center Board Members Resign Over Book Controversy. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Brooks, McKay, 2.04M) reports fourteen members of an advisory board at the Carter Center resigned Thursday, saying they could "no longer in good conscience continue to serve" following publication of former President Jimmy Carter's controversial book, "Palestine Peace Not Apartheid." In a letter, the board members said, "It seems that you have turned to a world of advocacy, including even malicious advocacy. We can no longer endorse your strident and uncompromising position." The New York Times (1/12, Goodman, 1.16M) also reports on the resignations.

Bangladesh Elections Delayed As President Resigns. The AP (1/12, Hossain) reports Bangladesh's president, Iajuddin Ahmed, Thursday "declared a state of emergency, stepped down as interim leader of Bangladesh's caretaker government and postponed this month's elections following violent protests by a key political alliance that has said it would boycott the vote." President Ahmed said in a televised speech that the balloting would be delayed, and he did not give a new date. The Financial Times (1/12, Joehnk) notes the decision "follows weeks of violent protests and rioting between the opposition parties and police ahead of the planned parliamentary elections." The New York Times (1/12, A3, Sengupta, 1.16M) says the move "came a day after the United Nations suspended technical support for the coming elections," saying that they would not be "considered credible or legitimate." Two teams of American election observers, as well as one that was to be dispatched by the European Union, also pulled out.

DOJ_NMG_0115661

Venezuela May Nationalize Orinoco Oil Projects. The AP (1/12) reports, "Venezuela could nationalize four projects in the oil-rich Orinoco River basin if the state is unable to negotiate a majority stake with the foreign oil companies that run them, the finance minister said yesterday. The state could nationalize the four projects in the Orinoco oil belt 'if the negotiations with the foreign oil companies that control them fail,' Finance Minister Rodrigo Cabezas said." His "remarks clarified that the government is still seeking to obtain majority control through talks with the companies after President Hugo Chavez announced plans this week to take control of 'strategic sectors' in telecommunications, power, oil and natural gas."

Human Rights Group Criticizes China's Abuses. The Washington Post (1/12, A10, Fan, 690K) reports human rights conditions in China "deteriorated significantly in 2006, with about 100 activists, lawyers, writers and academics subjected to police custody, house arrest, incommunicado confinement, pressure in their jobs and surveillance by plainclothes security forces," a new report by Human Rights Watch said. Several widely publicized cases involving journalists and rights lawyers were cited in the report "as evidence of a severe crackdown, prompted in large part by fears that individual cases of unrest might lead to regional instability."

Nigeria Considers Bill Banning Gay Marriage. In a front page article, the Wall Street Journal (1/12, A1, Schoofs, 2.04M) reports a proposed law in Nigeria that "would punish by up to five years in prison anyone who enters into a gay marriage." The Journal notes that "gay men and lesbians are becoming more visible" in Nigeria, "even as their society, which is hostile to homosexuality, threatens to become still less tolerant of them." The State Department has "denounced the bill, proposed in January last year, as a violation of basic freedoms."

UN Chief Seeks To Clarify Death Penalty Stance. The New York Times (1/12, A6, Hoge, 1.16M) reports UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon "sought Thursday to change the impression he left in his first public utterance as United Nations head last week about his position on the death penalty." In a statement, Ban said, "I recognize the growing trend in international law and in national practice towards a phasing out of the death penalty. I encourage that trend."

WPost Urges International Campaign Against Rights Abuses In Burma. In an editorial, the Washington Post (1/12, A18, 690K) says the Bush administration is "pressing the UN Security Council to vote, possibly as early as today, to condemn one of the world's worst human rights violators: the military regime of Burma," but notes that the resolution "doesn't call for sanctions or other punitive measures; it would simply make clear that the most august assembly of nations finds Burma's behavior unacceptable and will press for change." The Post says a UN resolution "by itself won't bring change. But a resolution as part of a concerted international campaign might," noting that "just this week, hoping to head off a vote, Burma released five political dissidents from prison (leaving about 1,100)."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"In Both Parties, Doubts Cloud Bush's Iraq Plan."
"A Pair Of Stars, an I.A. Sky, A Happy Galaxy."
"Beauty, But Only On Canvas."
"It May Be Too Late To Secure Baghdad's Mix."
"Mideast Shaking Its Head."
"Military Families Must Reset Clock."

USA Today:
"For A Fee, Fliers Won't Shed Shoes."
"Hanging Out With Junior."
"Sales Job Kicks Off For Bush Iraq Plan."

New York Times:
"Bush's Plan For Iraq Runs Into Opposition In Congress."
"A 2-Month White House Debate On Iraq, Capped By 'the Big Push'."
"G.I.'s In Iraq Raid Iranians' Offices."
"A Soccer Star Heads To U.S., Heeding Lure Of Hollywood."
"Duke Accuser Contradicts Herself."
"As States Innovate, Schwarzenegger Blurs Lines."
"In Traffic's Jam, Who's Driving May Be Surprising."

Washington Post:
"Bush to Add 20,000 Troops In An Effort To Stabilize Iraq."
"Bush to Add 20,000 Troops To Stabilize Iraq."
"For His First 100 Days, Fenty Outlines 200 Goals."
"Democrats Aim To Block Funds For Plan."
"Intensified Combat On Streets Likely."
"Kaine Presses GOP For Deal On Transportation Funding."
"In Ehrlich's 2-Party Test Run, A Rough Ride But Few Regrets."
"Fairfax VS. 'No Child' Standoff Heats Up."
"Apple Chief Benefited From Options Dating, Records Indicate."

Washington Times:
"Rice, Gates Face Hill heat Over Iraq Plan."

DOJ_NMG_0115662

"Cow Season In Cambodia."
"House Expands Stem-Cell Research."
"Beckham To Spice Up L.A."
"Senate Democrats Stall Pork-Reform Vote."

Detroit Free Press:
"School Anger Boils Over."
"City-Owned Slum Awaits Wreckers."
"Cobo Plan A Reality In 6 Months?"
"War Plan: An 'Augmentation'."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Needy get Cost Break At Emory."
"Aquarium Whale Shark Dies."
"Selling The Plan."
"14 Carter Center Advisers Resign Because Of Book."

Houston Chronicle:
"Iraq Plans Ignites A Scatching Debate."
"State Judge Halts Illegal Immigrant Rental Ban."
"Spend It Like Beckham."
"A Bitter And Deepening Divide."
"Houston's Plan To Expand Parks Slow To Take Root."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: New Iraq Strategy-Hearings; Bush Speaks To Troops; ABC New Poll-Iraq War; Troops Securing Baghdad; Interrupting Iran's Support; Fallen Soldier Honored; US Troop Surge-Military Reaction; New Orleans March; Stem Cell Research Vote; Beckham Comes Too US; Pictures From The Womb.
CBS: Bush Speaks To Troops; New Iraq Strategy-Hearings; Bush Speech Poll Results; Bush Speaks To Troops; Military Personnel Increase; New Orleans March; Stem Cell Research Vote; Veterans' Disability Benefits; Fallen Soldier Honored; Beckham Now In The US.
NBC: New Iraq Strategy-Reaction; New Iraq Strategy-Hearings; New Iraq Strategy-Analysis; Anti Iran Strategy; Fallen Soldier Honored; New US Surge-Reaction; Sen. Johnson Recovery; Katrina Legal Victory; New Orleans March; Democratic Convention-Denver; Stock Market; Beckham Plays US Soccer.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Attack On U.S. Embassy In Athens, Greece; National Guard And Reserve Told They Could Be Called Back To Iraq; Iraq War Protests Across U.S.; Congress-Stem Cell Research Bill; CA-Cold Weather; Super Bowl Turf Preparations.
CBS: Attack On U.S. Embassy In Athens, Greece; Secretary Gates-Congress; Congress-Stem Cell Research Bill; Congress-Medicare Drug Price Negotiation Bill; New Orleans-Increased Violence; James Brown's Will; Dallas, TX-Peeping Tom Teacher.
NPR: Attack On U.S. Embassy In Athens, Greece; Trial For London Subway Bombers Underway; Guantanamo Bay Protests; Palm Beach County Courthouse-Letters Containing White Substance Found; Tokyo Stock Exchange; New Orleans-Demonstrations Against Increased Violence; Bush Administration-Safety Of Children's Toys.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Departs White House for Camp David.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on Iraq. Defense Secretary Gates, Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace. Location: Room 216, Hart.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 9 a.m. FLOOR SCHEDULE _ Meets for legislative business. Highlights: Fifteen ``One Minutes Per Side. H.R. 4 - Requiring the Department of Health and Human Services to negotiate for lower prescription drug cost.

10 a.m. FLOOR SCHEDULE _ Meets for legislative business. Highlights: H.R. 4 - Democrat Drug Price Control.

Other: KING DAY-RELATED EVENTS _ Highlights: 11 a.m. Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne will speak at a Special Observance of the 78th Birthday of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. US Department of the Interior Auditorium, 1849 C St. NW. 11 a.m. The National Park Service holds its Martin Luther King, Jr. Day ceremony. Yates Auditorium, main Interior. 11 a.m. Marriott International holds a ceremony honoring Dr. King. Headquarters, 10400 Fernwood Rd., Bethesda. 1 p.m. The Institute of the Black World 21st Century holds a roundtable discussion with inter-generational black leaders, including Julianne Malveaux, Ron Walters, Malia Lazu, others. Busboys and Poets, 14th and V Sts. NW. 1 p.m. The National Park Service lays a wreath at the Lincoln Memorial.

PENTAGON-IRAQ SECURITY _ 9 a.m. Marine Col. William B. Crowe, commander of 7th Regional Combat Team, will brief live from Iraq to provide an update on ongoing security operations in Iraq. Location: DOD Briefing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

IRAQ _ 9:30 a.m. The Congressional Progressive Caucus holds a forum on Iraq and disengagement, with former Sen. George McGovern and William Polk. Location: Cannon Caucus Room.

RUSSIA-DEMOCRACY _ 10 a.m. The National Endowment for Democracy holds a discussion on prospects for Russian democracy with Garry Kasparov, Leon Aron of

DOJ_NMG_0115663

AEI, and Stephan Sestanovich of the Council on Foreign Relations. Location: 8th floor, 1025 F St. NW.

SCHARIOTH-GERMANY _ 10 a.m. German Ambassador Dr. Klaus Scharioth addresses a National Press Club morning newsmaker. Topic: ``Priorities of Germany's EU and G8 Programs." Location: National Press Club, Conference Rooms.

SOCIAL SECURITY _ 10 a.m. The Cornell University Employment and Disability Institute holds a forum on the Social Security disability system for the 21st century, with Dorcas Hardy of the Social Security Advisory Board, others. Location: Room 333, Hall of States, 444 N. Capitol St.

ISLAMIC RADICALISM _ 10 a.m. - 12 p.m. The Jamestown Foundation hosts an address by Igor Rotar Forum 18 News Service, a war correspondent who has covered stories ranging from the Tajik Civil War to the activities of the Islamic Movement of Uzbekistan. Rotar will speak on ``The Future of Islamic Radicalism and Religious Freedom in Central Asia." Location: The Jamestown Foundation, 7th Floor Board Room, 1111 16th St. NW.

PELOSI-MAYORS _ 10:30 a.m. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and the leadership of the United States Conference of Mayors, led by Conference President and Mayor of Trenton, New Jersey, Douglas H. Palmer, will hold a photo opportunity immediately following their meeting to discuss critical issues facing America's cities. Location: Room H-230, Capitol.

SCIENCE-POLICY _ 12 p.m. The American Association for the Advancement of Science, American Geophysical Union, others, hold a workshop for congressional staff members on the role of science in public policy, with Science magazine Editor-in-Chief Donald Kennedy, Andrew Dessler of Texas A&M University, others. Location: Room 2325, Rayburn.

MCGOVERN-IRAQ _ 12:30 p.m. George McGovern, former Senator and 1972 Democratic presidential nominee, will discuss his plans for withdrawing US troops from Iraq at a National Press Club luncheon. Location: National Press Club.

ARMY-NASCAR _ 2:30 p.m. The Army National Guard kicks off the 2007 NASCVAR NEXTELK Cup season with a ceremony marking its sponsorship of Hendrick Motorsports' No. 25 cars, with driver Casey Mears and Crew Chief Lance McGrew. Location: Army National Guard Readiness Center, 111 S. George Mason Dr., Arlington.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0115664

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Friday, January 12, 2007 8:15 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Friday, January 12, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070112.pdf; dojclips070112.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, JANUARY 12, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Gonzales Talks Tough Against Terrorists (TSSC) 4
"It's Very Important To Us That We Make Sure We Recognize Any Potential Threat" (WLTX) 5
U.S. Preparing For Trials Of Top Qaeda Detainees (NYT) 5
80 Arrested Protesting Guantanamo Detentions (WP) 7
Unveiled Threats (WP) 7
U.S. Has Lost Credibility On Rights, Group Asserts (WP) 8
Man Captured, Returned To U.S. To Face Terror-Related Charges (WNBC) 9
Alleged Sri Lankan Rebel Extradited To America On Terrorism Charges (AP) 9
Blast At U.S. Embassy Called 'Terrorism' (AP) 10
Southeast Asians Consider Pact Against Terrorism (NYT) 10

Homeland Response:

Administration Offers Plan To Ease Rules On Asylum (NYT) 11
For A Fee, Fliers Won't Shed Shoes (USAT) 12
Shin Bet Questions Ex-American Suspected Of Aiding Islamic Jihad (HAARETZ) 12
Lawyer: Cleric Being Questioned; Arrest Will Be Appealed (ABJ) 13
White Powder Found At Two South Florida Courthouses (MH) 13
Poison Found On Envelopes At PBC Courthouse (PALMBEACHP) 14
Powder Scare Hits Courthouses In West Palm Beach, Fort Lauderdale (FLSUNSEN) 15
Powder Found At 2 S. Fla. Courthouses (BRAH) 16
E.U. Satisfied With Data Sharing (WP) 16
Pork, Peanut Butter And Security (NYT) 17
Jury Awards $2.5M In Punitive Damages In Katrina Suit Against State Farm (AP) 17

War News:

Bush Cheered At Fort Benning (AP) 18
Bush Gets Cool Response From Troops Set For Iraq (WT) ..19
Bush Meets With Fort Benning Troops Army Soldiers Scheduled To Join Iraq Buildup (AJC) 20
Bush Pitches Iraq Plan To Ft. Benning Soldiers (LAT) 21
At Fort Benning, A Quiet Response To A Presidential Visit (WP) 22
Bush Speaks And Base Is Subdued (NYT) 23
At A Post In Georgia, A Job To Do (USAT) 24
U.S. Unit Patrolling Baghdad Sees Flaws In Bush Strategy (WP) 25
U.S. Expects New Reliability From Iraqi Forces (USAT) 28
Sales Job Kicks Off For Bush Iraq Plan (USAT) 29
Poll: Americans Oppose Iraq Troop Surge (AP) 29
In Pennsylvania, President's Plan Draws Mixed Responses And Hardens Opinions (NYT) 30
String Of Hopefuls For 2008 Choose Sides In Iraq Plan (WSJ) 31
Wartime Linguistics (LAT) 33
Surge Towards Debacle In Iraq And MidEast (FT) 34
Why Bush's War Plan Can Work (CSM) 35
'Unity Of Effort' (WSJ) 36
Bush's Iraq Plan, Between The Lines (NYT) 37
Five Flaws In The President's Plan (WP) 38
Criticism Comforts Enemy (USAT) 38
Make Them Fight All Of Us (NYT) 39
Wisdom From Down The Chain Of Command (WP) 40
Thinking War-War Again (WP) 41
Tears Are Shed At The White House For A Marine's Bravery In Iraq (NYT) 42
A 2-Month White House Debate On Iraq, Capped By 'the Big Push' (NYT) 43
New Strategy Vindicates Ex-Army Chief Shinseki (NYT) 45
It May Be Too Late To Secure Baghdad's Mix (LAT) 46
Bush Stands Alone With 'new Way Forward' (FT) 48
Several In GOP Hit Bush 'Blunder' (WT) 49

Convincing Still Required For Bush Iraq Plan (LAT) 50
Bush Bets Congress Will Have To Back Plan (WSJ) 53
Analysis: Democrats' Delicate Strategy (AP) 54
Bush's Iraq Plan Meets Skepticism On Capitol Hill (WP) 55
Bush War Plan Draws Fire On Capitol Hill (AP) 57
Rice, Gates Face Hill Heat Over Iraq Plan (WT) 59
Senate Panel Scraps With Rice Over Iraq Strategy (USAT) ... 60
Lawmakers Grill Rice Over The Iraq War (AP) 61
Rice, A Uniter Of The Divided (WP) 62
Bush's Plan For Iraq Runs Into Opposition In Congress (NYT) 63
Devastating Criticism On Iraq By Both Parties (NYT) 66
Getting Iraq To Work (WSJ) 67
Rice Seeks Backing Abroad For Iraq Plan (WP) 69
The Women's Channel (TIME) 70
Fight And Talk (WP) 71
In Arab World, U.S. Approaches Falling Short (LAT) 72
Iran, Syria Denounce Bush's Iraq Plan (AP) 73
Iraqi Government Welcomes Bush Strategy (AP) 74
In Baghdad, Bush Policy Is Met With Resentment (NYT) 76
Bush Plan Receives Tepid Baghdad OK (WT/AP) 78
Bush's New Iraq Strategy 'Makes Sense': Blair (AFP) 79
Gates Urges Increase In Army, Marines (WP) 80
Gates Requests 92,000 Increase In Active Forces (WT) 81
Pentagon To Recall Army National Guard Units (LAT) 82
Military Eases Its Rules For Mobilizing Reserves (NYT) 83
Britain Signals Plans To Reduce, Not Increase, Troop Levels In Iraq (NYT) 84
Intelligence Chiefs Pessimistic In Assessing Worldwide Threats (WP) 85
Shiite Radicalism Could Fuel Wider Violence, Official Warns (NYT) 86
Intelligence Officials See Growing Sectarian Split In Iraq (WT) 87
US Names Retired Diplomat At Iraq Reconstruction Chief (AFP) 88
U.S. Detains 6 Iranians In Irbil Raid (AP) 88
G.I.'s In Iraq Raid Iranians' Offices (NYT) 90
U.S. Raids In Northern Iraq Nab Several Iranians (MERCN) .. 92
Pentagon Intensifies Pressure On Iran (WSJ) 93
U.S. Troops Raid 2 Iranian Targets In Iraq, Detain 5 People (WP) 95
Squeezing Iran (WSJ) 96
Diyala Sweep Finds No Evidence Of Insurgent Force (LAT) . 97
Hussein Cousin Says He Ordered Executions (NYT) 98
Insurgents Play Role In Bin Laden Escape (AP) 98
NATO Says Afghan Clash May Have Killed Scores Of Rebels (NYT) 98
Scores Of Insurgents Killed In Afghan Border Area (WP) 99
Attacks Heat Up Afghan-Pakistani Border (CSM) 100

DOJ:

Justice Dept. Hit With Hiring Freeze (AP) 102
Lam Is Asked To Step Down (SDUT) 103

Corporate Scandals:

U.S. Scrutinizes Grant To Jobs (WSJ) 105
Broadcom Chief Says Restatements Will Be Made Shortly (Update2) (BLOOM) 106
Siemens Ex-CFO Named In Bribery Probe (FT) 107
Ex-Merrill Brokers Probed By NYSE In Timing Case (WSJ) . 108

Criminal Law:

As Libby Goes To Trial, Case Appears Weakened (WSJ) 108
Puerto Rico Seeks FBI Raid Documents (WP/AP) 109
Jury Charged In Calvin Williams Trial (WMC) 110
Federal Jury To Deliberate Williams' Fate Today (MCA) 110
Queens Mover, Mother-in-law Charged In Thefts Of Picasso Drawings (NSDY/AP) 111
Thieves Steal Two Picassos (NSDY) 112
Arrests Made In Case Of Picasso Robbery (NYS) 112
Picassos' Theft Contributes To Mystery Of Eccentric Collector's Art Trove (NYT) 113
3 Detained In Tenn. Couple's Killing (AP) 114
Porn Studios Raided To Ensure Adult-only Casts (LAT) 115
False Property Appraisals Get Man 30 Months In Prison (PPG) 116
Man Gets 30 Months For Bogus Appraisals (PTR) 117
Pa. Man Sentenced To Prison For Fraudulent Property Appraisals (TLPA) 118
Jury Hears Kopp Saying He Killed Slepian (BUFFNEWS) 118
Mob Figure Sentenced To Five Years In Prison For Extortion (PROJO) 119
Ex-Cleveland Clinic Employee Pleads Guity To Stealing Patient Information (NAPLESDN) 120
Hospital Receptionist Pleads Guilty To Fraud Charges (MH) 121
Apartment Is A Real Steal (NYDN) 121
Former Ark. Trooper Sentenced On Child Porn Charges (AP) 122
Man Pleads Guilty To Assaulting Girl He Met On MySpace.com (AP) 122
Ex-Prosecutor Is Accused Of Running Escort Service (LAW) 123

DOJ_NMG_0115667

Civil Law:

Jackson Psychiatrist Pays $216,000 To Settle Fraud Case (BSH) 124

Civil Rights:

State To Appeal Chastang Ruling (MR) 124
Legislator Asks Probe Of Gunfire At House (BRADV) 126
D.C. Will Investigate Patient's Death (WP) 126
LAPD Chief Would Open Meetings To Public (LAT) 127
The Blue Fog (LAT) 128
Duke Accuser Contradicts Herself (NYT) 129
L.A. Man Sues To Take Wife's Last Name (USAT) 130
Civil Rights For A New Generation (USAT) 131

Antitrust:

Bristol Finds Alliances, And Perhaps A Suitor (NYT) 132
Thomson Must Defend Antitrust Suit Over Its Bar-Exam Courses (BLOOM) 134
EU Delays Universal-BMG Ruling (AP) 134
EC Delays Ruling On Publishing Deal (HOLLYREP) 135
At Heart Of Cisco's IPhone Trademark Lawsuit: A Desire For Open Standards (WSJ) 135
Letters (WSJ) 136

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

U.S. Attorney General Lauds Calderon's Anti-drug Moves (AP) 139
Attorneys General Cite Shared Responsibility (HC) 139
Drug Battle: Gonzales Afraid Mexican Violence Will 'spill Into U.S.' (LAREDOMT) 140
Deputy Marshal Accused Of Leaking In Mob Case (AP) 141
U.S. Marshal Charged With Information Leak (CHIST) 142
Feds: Marshal Double-Crossed Protected Mobster (WMAQ) 142
Marshal Accused Of Leaking Info On Mob Witness (CBS2CHI) 143
Feds: Marshal Aided Mob (CHIT) 144
Fatal Raid Linked To Lies For Warrant In Drug Case (NYT) 146
Illinois Doctor Sentenced For Illegal Prescribing Over Net (IDG) 147
'Ecstasy' Dealer Sent To Prison (FLJOURNAL) 148
Cocaine Cowboys Corralled (CAPN9) 148
10 Charged In Narcotics Raids (ALBANYTU) 149
Operation Cocaine Cowboys: Massive Drug Pipeline Busted (WTEN) 151
Federal Fugitive Found In Morgan County Jail (AP) 151
Federal Fugitive Found In Jail Here (DECDAILY) 152
More Drugs, Fewer Narcs (TIME) 152
Nation's Drug Czar Lauds Wayne County's Handling Of Fentanyl Cases (DEN) 153
U.S. Drug Czar Praises Detroit's Fentanyl Battle (FREEP) 153
Bonds Named In Test Reports (LAT) 154
Barry Bonds Comes To Teammate's Defense (AP) 155
Bonds: No Amphetamines From Teammate (USAT) 156
3,000 Tests For Amphetamines, But Only Bonds Is In The Spotlight (NYT) 157
Report Of Bonds' Failed Test Might Hinder Negotiations (AP) 159
Ecuador, Colombia OK Deal On Fumigation (AP) 160

Immigration:

Grand Jury Indicts Cuban Exile Militant Luis Posada Carriles And Two Associates (MH) 161
Cuban Militant Indicted, Accused Of Lying About Entering U.S. (SAEN) 161
Suspected Bomber Of Cuban Airliner Indicted (LAT) 162
Immigration Charges For Cuban Militant (AP) 163
Cuban Terror Suspect Indicted By U.S. On Immigration Charges (BLOOM) 164
Anti-Castro Militant Indicted In US On Immigration Charges (AFP) 165
Alleged FBI Impersonator Indicted (CBS2CHI) 165

Tax:

Plea In Tax-Shelter Probe (WSJ) 166
Agents Say Fast Audits Hurt I.R.S. (NYT) 166
Judge Blocks IRS From Role In Case (BUFFNEWS) 168
FEDERAL DIARY: $5 More To Cure Rider's Block (WP) 168

Congress-Administration:

House Passes Bill For Stem Cell Research (AP) 169
Stem Cell Bill Sails Through The House (NYT) 170
Bill's Backers Predict End To Stem Cell Limits (USAT) 172
House Passes Bill Relaxing Limits On Stem Cell Research (WP) 172
US Democratic-led House Challenges Bush On Stem-cell Research (AFP) 173
House Revisits Stem Cell Research (LAT) 174
House Expands Stem-cell Research (WT) 175
Concerns Of Dashed Hopes From Promised Miracles (NYT) 177
Stem Cell Miracle? (WP) 178
Stem Cell Games (LAT) 179
Bush Threatens Veto Of Medicare Drug Bill, But A Senator Is Seeking A Middle Ground (NYT) 180
GOP: Bush Would Veto Medicare Reforms (AP) 181
Drug Bill Demonstrates Lobby's Pull (WP) 182
Price Negotiating's Hidden Costs (WT) 184

DOJ_NMG_0115668

Negotiating Lower Drug Prices (NYT) 185
Democrats In Senate Fail To Block Bill On Ethics (NYT) 185
Senate Democrats Stall Pork-reform Vote (WT) 186
Democrats Stumble On Special Projects (AP) 187
Earmark Entertainment (WSJ) 188
GOP Flake Out (WSJ) 189
GOP Hits Pelosi's 'Hypocrisy' On Wage Bill (WT) 189
Bush-Democrat Alliance On Education Law Feared (WT) ..190
Rising Costs Make Climb To Higher Education Steeper (USAT) 191
OMB Risk Assessment Plan Called Flawed (AP) 193
White House, In Rare Move, Yields To Scientific Panel On Policy Plan (WSJ) 194
Risk-Assessment Plan Is Withdrawn (NYT) 194
Ailing Senator Is Moved From Intensive Care (NYT/AP) 195
Tomlinson May Be Going, But He's Staying (WP) 195
Inside The Ring (WT) 197
Coins Used To Spy On Pentagon Contractors (WT) 198
Mrs. Bush Praises Treasury Renovation (AP) 199
No Small Change At The Treasury (WP) 200

Other News:

Fed Official Outlines Threats To Economy (WSJ) 201
Jobless Claims Tumble In Latest Week (WSJ) 202
Rapid Plunge In Price Of Oil May Fuel Growth (WSJ) 202
Crude Oil Falls Further, Gratifying Consumers More Than Investors (NYT) 204
Dow Sets Another Record High As Oil Prices, Jobless Claims Decline (WP/AP) 205
Dow Hits High As Oil Drop Loosens Up Investors (WSJ) 206
Falling Oil Prices, Jobs Report Spark Stocks (USAT) 207
Suit Against Vatican Can Proceed (LCJ) 208
Dodd Declares '08 Presidential Candidacy (AP) 209
Dodd Touts Presidential Bid On 'Imus' (CP) 210
Dodd Says He'll Run For White House (USAT) 212
Senator Dodd Of Connecticut Announces Bid For Presidency (NYT) 212
Dodd Carries Northeast Liberal Tag Into 2008 Race (NSDY/AP) 213
Democratic Party Selects Denver For '08 Presidential Convention (WSJ/AP) 214
As States Innovate, Schwarzenegger Blurs Lines (NYT) 215
California Emissions Target Hands Task To Industry (WSJ) 217
Golden State Gamble (NYT) 218
Ex-President Bush May Put Hip To Test In '09 (HC) 219
The Reliable Source (WP) 219
Forum-Shopper Of The Year (WSJ) 220
U.S. Troops Went Into Somalia After Raid (WP) 222
Raid Killed Somali Allies Of Al Qaeda, U.S. Says (NYT/AP) .223
Ethiopian, U.S. Pursue Somalia Al-Qaida (AP) 224
Somalia Targets Survived, U.S. Says (LAT) 225
Somalia Strike 'missed Al-Qaeda Targets' (FT) 226
Al Qaeda Threat Seen Looming If Government Fails (WT) .227
Can African Peacekeepers Tame Somalia? (CSM) 228
Iran Nuke Work Seems Slow, Puzzling West (AP) 229
Dangerous Territory With Aid, U.S. Widens Role In Palestinian Crisis (WSJ) 230
Succession Issue Stirs Dissent In Egypt (WSJ) 233
Carter Center Board Members Resign Over Palestine Book (WSJ) 235
Carter Center Advisers Quit To Protest Book (NYT) 236
Bangladesh President Steps Down (AP) 237
Bangladesh Postpones Elections (FT) 238
In Bangladesh, State Of Emergency And Election Delay (NYT) 239
Venezuela May Nationalize Oil Belt Projects (AP) 240
China's Rights Record Criticized (WP) 240
In Nigeria, A Bill To Punish Gays Divides A Family (WSJ) 241
Revisiting Issue, U.N. Chief Clarifies Death-Penalty Stance (NYT) 243
A Test On Burma (WP) 244

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales Talks Tough Against Terrorists (TSSC)

By Rick Brundrett

The State (SC), January 12, 2007

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales gave a pep talk in Columbia on Thursday afternoon to U.S. attorneys from around the country attending a conference on combating terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0115669

"For us in the law enforcement community, every day must be September 12th," the nation's top prosecutor said, referring to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Gonzales spoke to about 100 mainly U.S. attorneys at the National Advocacy Center — a training facility for state and federal prosecutors — on USC's campus. Reggie Lloyd, the U.S. attorney for South Carolina, attended.

Gonzales noted he spent earlier Thursday in Mexico City and met with senior Mexican officials to discuss organized crime and other issues.

Gonzales told the U.S. attorneys that the "single most important part" of their jobs is preventing terrorist attacks in the U.S.

"Our success or failure in this one endeavor will define in the eyes of some President Bush and his legacy," he said. "It will be the legacy of every one of us who is serving in the administration."

Although the country responded to the 9/11 attacks by invading Afghanistan, reorganizing government and passing new laws to combat terrorism, more needs to be done because terrorists "change tactics in response to what we do," he said.

He praised U.S. attorneys for combating "crimes that can fuel terrorism," such as identification and immigration fraud. He noted that seven of the 9/11 hijackers had fraudulent Virginia identification cards.

Gonzales also said the federal government is "not engaged in a struggle against a faith or religion" and urged U.S. attorneys to improve communication with Muslim leaders in their districts.

"We very much need the partnership of the Muslim community," he said. "Discouraging radicalism is vital, and that cannot be done effectively without Muslim community leadership."

Reach Brundrett at (803) 771-8484.

"It's Very Important To Us That We Make Sure We Recognize Any Potential Threat" (WLTX)

WLTX-TV, CBS 19, Columbia, SC, January 12, 2007

US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was in Columbia Thursday night to talk about preventing terrorist attacks - Ashley Yarchin reports

(Columbia) - After a lengthy standing ovation from a crowd of US attorneys, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales quieted the crowd, "Okay, I think you guys just want to play on my softball team. That's what all that's about."

He began on a lighter note, "Everything you do for the American people, I am really, really proud of you."

But Gonzales' pep talk quickly got serious, "I must speak bluntly and urgently about the single most important part of our jobs, which is preventing terrorist attacks on American soil."

He asked the men and women who filled a room at USC's National Advocacy Center to help stop terrorists from living, traveling and working freely in our communities.

"And very often, the cells that are broken up are not in New York, they're not in LA," said South Carolina U.S. Attorney Reggie Lloyd. "You look at the case in Portland or the case in Buffalo. You have these individuals that are sleeping in communities all across the country."

He said that's what puts our state on the map when it comes to protection and prevention. "It's very important to us that we make sure we recognize any potential threat even if it's not a direct threat here in South Carolina," said Lloyd.

Lloyd said the lecture inspired him to get back to work and back in our neighborhoods to ensure statewide and nationwide safety. "You know, you're always on pins and needles until he leaves," Lloyd said of Gonzales' visit, "but it's good to hear from him."

U.S. Preparing For Trials Of Top Qaeda Detainees (NYT)

By David Johnston And Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 — The Bush administration has set up a secret war room in a Virginia suburb where it is assembling evidence to prosecute high-ranking detainees from Al Qaeda including the man accused of being the mastermind of the September 2001 attacks, Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, government officials said this week.

The effort to sift the classified files of the Pentagon, F.B.I., C.I.A. and other intelligence agencies amounts to the first concrete steps that the government has taken to press ahead with war crimes trials of high-level terror suspects under a plan announced by President Bush in a speech last September.

At the time, Mr. Bush said that Mr. Mohammed and 13 other high-level terror suspects had been transferred from secret prisons around the world to the military detention center at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, where they would be held pending trial.

The preparation of cases against the high-value operatives appears to rebut many who doubted that Qaeda suspects like Mr. Mohammed would ever be brought to trial. Critics in Congress and human rights groups had asserted that such trials would not be feasible because they would expose harsh interrogation techniques used by the Central Intelligence Agency.

The officials who discussed the preparations have been briefed on the effort in detail and represented several agencies. They declined to speak on the record about deliberations in advance of criminal prosecutions involving national security.

The prosecution team for the Qaeda defendants will be a mix of military and civilian prosecutors. Some officials said no decision had been made about who would lead each prosecution, but others said the trial of Mr. Mohammed would probably be undertaken principally by Justice Department lawyers, who would run the prosecution in a military courtroom in Guantánamo.

Mr. Mohammed, whose alleged role in the Sept. 11 attacks would make him the centerpiece of the government's effort to bring terrorists to justice in a court of law, could be held responsible for about 3,000 deaths in the attacks, officials have said.

The prosecution of high-value detainees is separate from the long planned trials of lower-level Qaeda figures, some of whom have been at Guantánamo since 2002 and who are expected to be tried before the more important terrorist suspects.

However, both high- and low-level suspects will be tried under the same rules, which are contained in legislation approved in October.

Officials said that they were hoping to bring the first charges against leaders of Al Qaeda this summer or fall and that trials could get under way in early 2008. The current plans are to use the new trial procedures first against some of the lesser Guantánamo defendants as kind of a test run beginning this summer.

Those trials would involve some of the detainees who had already been charged under the previous system of military commissions that was struck down by the Supreme Court.

The initial trials of detainees held at Guantánamo will not carry the possibility of a death penalty. But officials said that they expected to seek to have some of the senior Qaeda officials executed if convicted.

A team of lawyers from the Justice and Defense Departments, along with civilian and military investigators, has begun poring over intelligence files and interrogation reports, about Mr. Mohammed's role in the Sept. 11 attacks and other potentially prosecutable crimes, like the killing of a reporter for The Wall Street Journal, Daniel Pearl, and other terror plots, including an aborted plan in 2003 to use smuggled explosives to blow up gas stations, railroad tracks and a bridge in New York.

According to the final report of the independent commission that investigated the 2001 attacks, Mr. Mohammed acknowledged under interrogation that he was a major planner of the 9/11 plot. The report said that Mr. Mohammed first proposed the airliner attacks to Osama bin Laden and supervised the core group responsible for the hijackings.

Other prosecutions, like the cases related to the attack in 2000 on the Navy destroyer Cole in Yemen which killed 17 sailors, are likely to be led by military lawyers.

The Qaeda detainees at Guantánamo who the authorities have said were involved in planning the Cole attack include Abd al-Rahim al Nashiri, the accused mastermind, and Walid bin Attash, known as Khallad, who worked with Mr. Nashiri.

In preparation for the trials, the Justice Department has been quietly recruiting lawyers from the ranks of experienced terrorism prosecutors, mainly in New York and Virginia.

The new war crimes trials will operate according to rules modeled after the military justice system which were approved in legislation known at the Military Commission Act, which was signed into law last fall. The law has been criticized by some Democrats in Congress and human rights groups who say the procedures are flawed because they tilt in the government's favor.

Prosecutors could use hearsay evidence or second-hand testimony, but could not use information obtained under torture. Even so, that would mean virtually any information obtained by the C.I.A would appear to be admissible because, under Justice Department legal opinions, none of the harsh techniques amounted to torture.

At their trials, the accused would have the right not to testify and would have the opportunity to present evidence and cross-examine witnesses against them. The trials would be open unless a military judge determined that they should be closed to protect classified information. Defendants would have the right to review the evidence to be used against them.

DOJ_NMG_0115671

The C.I.A. indicated in court filings last November how it hopes to deal with efforts by defendants to bring up the issue of their interrogations. In a case involving one of the 14 high-level Qaeda detainees, the intelligence agency asked a federal judge to rule that the prisoner could not describe details of his confinement because of national security concerns. No ruling has yet been issued.

The case involves Majid Khan, a Pakistani who authorities have said was selected by Mr. Mohammed in 2002 to take part in a possible attack in the United States.

When civil liberties lawyers filed a petition on Mr. Khan's behalf in federal court in Washington, the C.I.A. submitted an affidavit saying that if specific interrogation techniques were disclosed, "It would permit terrorist organizations to adapt their training to counter the tactics that C.I.A. can employ in interrogations."

80 Arrested Protesting Guantanamo Detentions (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

More than 80 protesters were arrested inside the federal courthouse in Washington yesterday after a demonstration that called for closing the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The demonstrators were commemorating the fifth anniversary of the opening of the Guantanamo detention facility. They targeted the courthouse where lawyers have challenged the legality of indefinitely imprisoning hundreds of suspected enemy fighters and terrorists at Guantanamo.

Those arrested were part of a group of nearly 300 demonstrators -- a loose coalition of antiwar, civil liberty and religious organizations. The group had a permit to protest outside the courthouse at Third Street and Constitution Avenue NW.

But dozens of protesters filed through a side entrance and began to gather in the building's central atrium, chanting, "Stop torture" and wearing shirts reading "Shut Down Guantanamo." Others wearing orange jumpsuits -- similar to those worn by detainees at the prison that now houses 400 Muslim men from foreign countries -- were barred from entering the courthouse as a security risk, and marshals locked the court's front doors about noon.

U.S. District Chief Judge Thomas F. Hogan tried to reach an accommodation with the protesters inside, ordering that they be allowed to remain if they removed or covered their shirts and put away their signs so as not to disrupt trials underway. Court security officials said it was the first time in recent history that a protest had been allowed inside the federal court.

But, after a brief discussion with U.S. Marshal George Walsh, the group refused, and a team of deputy marshals arrested the praying, kneeling protesters one by one, putting them in flexible plastic handcuffs and taking them to a booking and holding cell in the court basement.

Many of the people prayed and repeatedly sang, "Peace, Salam, Shalom" as they were waiting to be cuffed and led away. They were charged with disorderly conduct on a federal property, a misdemeanor. All were expected to be released last night.

"If you accuse someone of a crime, you have evidence, you have a trial!" Maria Allwine, of the Baltimore group Iraq Pledge of Resistance, shouted as a marshal led her away. "Where is the evidence?"

Earlier in the day, Amnesty International, the Center for Constitutional Rights and defense attorneys for some detainees held a news conference and rally at the U.S. Supreme Court urging supporters worldwide to pressure the U.S. government to close the detention facility.

It was opened Jan. 11, 2002, to house alleged terrorists and Taliban fighters rounded up in Afghanistan and Pakistan during the U.S. war in Afghanistan. The prison has been plagued by allegations of detainee abuse, and the military has been embarrassed by revelations that FBI agents warned their bosses that they considered detainee treatment there cruel and inhumane.

Last week, FBI documents released as part of a lawsuit by the American Civil Liberties Union included new allegations of questionable treatment of Muslim prisoners at Guantanamo Bay. One interrogator allegedly infuriated a prisoner by squatting over a Koran, and two agents reported witnessing military personnel using vicious dogs to intimidate prisoners, the documents show.

Unveiled Threats (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0115672

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

MOST AMERICANS understand that legal representation for the accused is one of the core principles of the American way. Not, it seems, Cully Stimson, deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs. In a repellent interview yesterday with Federal News Radio, Mr. Stimson brought up, unprompted, the number of major U.S. law firms that have helped represent detainees at Guantanamo Bay.

"Actually you know I think the news story that you're really going to start seeing in the next couple of weeks is this: As a result of a FOIA [Freedom of Information Act] request through a major news organization, somebody asked, 'Who are the lawyers around this country representing detainees down there,' and you know what, it's shocking," he said.

Mr. Stimson proceeded to reel off the names of these firms, adding, "I think, quite honestly, when corporate CEOs see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line back in 2001, those CEOs are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms, and I think that is going to have major play in the next few weeks. And we want to watch that play out."

Asked who was paying the firms, Mr. Stimson hinted of dark doings. "It's not clear, is it?" he said. "Some will maintain that they are doing it out of the goodness of their heart, that they're doing it pro bono, and I suspect they are; others are receiving monies from who knows where, and I'd be curious to have them explain that."

It might be only laughable that Mr. Stimson, during the interview, called Guantanamo "certainly, probably, the most transparent and open location in the world."

But it's offensive -- shocking, to use his word -- that Mr. Stimson, a lawyer, would argue that law firms are doing anything other than upholding the highest ethical traditions of the bar by taking on the most unpopular of defendants. It's shocking that he would seemingly encourage the firms' corporate clients to pressure them to drop this work. And it's shocking -- though perhaps not surprising -- that this is the person the administration has chosen to oversee detainee policy at Guantanamo.

U.S. Has Lost Credibility On Rights, Group Asserts (WP)

By Nora Boustany

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

The advocacy group Human Rights Watch said yesterday that Washington's once-powerful role as a prime defender of human rights had effectively ended because of arbitrary detentions and reports of torture since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and the group urged the European Union to step up as a leader of the cause.

Kenneth Roth, executive director of Human Rights Watch, released the group's World Report 2007, an assessment of last year's global human rights practices, by saying that the counterterrorism record of the United States over the past five years has tarnished its credibility as an influential moral voice.

He listed several practices he said were being used by the Bush administration in its fight against terrorism, including torture, arbitrary detentions, allowing CIA interrogators to use coercive techniques and the unsupervised handling of so-called enemy combatants held in other countries.

"This catastrophic path has left the United States effectively incapable of defending some of the most basic rights," Roth said in the report, released on the fifth anniversary of the arrival of the first detainees at the U.S. prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Roth said Sudan, where the people of the western Darfur region are subject to mass murder, rape and forcible displacement, finds it easier to resist an international protection force because of the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq.

"The trend is bleak, but not irreversible," Roth wrote in an introduction to the report, saying it was up to the new Democratic-led Congress to repudiate past abuses, press for policy change and seek accountability.

The report listed the governments of North Korea, Burma and Turkmenistan as "repressive" and as imposing "enormous cruelty" on their populations. Saudi Arabia, Syria and Vietnam remain closed dictatorships. Russia and Egypt are cracking down on nongovernmental organizations, while Peru and Venezuela are considering the same path. Iran and Ethiopia are silencing dissidents with impunity, the report said.

The report's introduction lamented the poor performance of the new U.N. Human Rights Council and called it hardly an improvement over its predecessor, the Commission on Human Rights. Though the council's central duty is to pressure highly abusive governments to change, it "has so far failed to criticize any government other than Israel," in "a mockery of the high principles of its founding."

DOJ_NMG_0115673

With Washington's voice diminished, the E.U. should be the strongest and most potent defender of human rights, Roth said, but as the group seeks consensus among its enlarged membership, its impact on the world stage is much less than its potential.

"We are looking for a powerful actor. The Europeans say all the right things, but there is no sense of immersion, no sense of duty," Roth said in an interview Wednesday. "When you have 27 members, how do you decide on common policy?" He also criticized Europe's role in the rights council as being "too micro-tactical and one of a micromanager worried with changing words here and there rather than being effective."

Roth also said the E.U.'s current system of a six-month rotating presidency hampers the group's effectiveness.

"Human rights work is about sustained follow-up. You come back and you come back until you get someone or a country to change its behavior," Roth said. "When you have this rotating blur of presidencies . . . it is a recipe for failure. The most reluctant member determines E.U. policy, so the whole is less than the sum of its parts."

Man Captured, Returned To U.S. To Face Terror-Related Charges (WNBC)

By Joseph Valiquette

WNBC-TV, January 12, 2007

NEW YORK -- A key associate of a foreign terrorist organization has been captured in Indonesia and returned to New York to face federal charges including conspiracy to provide material support and resources to the Tamil Tigers.

Thavarajah Pratheepan was arrested by Interpol and placed in FBI custody. At his arraignment Thursday afternoon in federal court in Brooklyn, he pleaded not guilty and was ordered held without bail. His next court appearance will be on Jan. 18.

Pratheepan was named along with nine others in court papers unsealed in August accusing the defendants of being closely connected with the leaders of the Tamil Tigers in Sri Lanka.

Founded in 1976, the Tamil Tigers, also called the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, seek to establish an independent Tamil state in northern Sri Lanka. The group is accused of using terrorism to achieve its goal.

The group's campaign includes 200 suicide bombings and political assassinations, including the May 1991 assassination of former Indian Prime Minister Rajiv Ghandi and the 1993 assassination of the president of Sri Lanka, Ranasinghe Premadasa.

Since April, more than 1,700 people have been killed in the escalating conflict. The U.S. State Department designated the group a Foreign Terrorist Organization in 1997.

The Joint Terrorism Task Force based in Newark, N.J., arrested four of the men on Long Island last August in a sting operation after three of them traveled from Canada to purchase Russian-made SA-18 surface-to-air missiles, missile launchers and AK-47s from an undercover agent.

Pratheepan is identified in the court papers as being the main liaison between the leadership of the Tamil Tigers and its supporters in North America, Europe and Asia, as well as being involved in procuring equipment for the group.

Alleged Sri Lankan Rebel Extradited To America On Terrorism Charges (AP)

AP, January 12, 2007

JAKARTA, Indonesia: Indonesian authorities on Wednesday handed an alleged Sri Lankan Tamil Tiger rebel to the United States where he has been sentenced to 15 years in prison in absentia for trying to smuggle weapons to his homeland, a police spokesman said.

Tharajah Piratheeban, 32, was escorted by FBI agents on a flight to the United States from Jakarta's Sukarno-Hatta Airport, Col. Bambang Kuncoko said.

Kuncoko said Piratheeban was convicted on terrorism charges by a New York district court for purchasing weapons in the United States and trying to export them to Sri Lanka.

Indonesian officials could not confirm reports he was also suspected of plotting an attack in New York.

He was detained Jan. 4 in Indonesia trying to board a flight to Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, Kuncoko said.

Today in Asia - Pacific

Bangladesh president steps down as government leader

DOJ_NMG_0115674

Missing passenger jet's debris found in Indonesian sea

150 insurgents killed in Afghanistan, NATO says

In Colombo, spokesman Keheliya Rambukwella said "the Sri Lankan government is happy that the world is getting united in fighting terrorism" and had approved the transfer with Indonesian officials.

U.S. officials could not be immediately reached for comment Wednesday.

The Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, or LTTE, have fought the Sri Lankan government since 1983 for an independent homeland for the nation's ethnic Tamils. A cease-fire brokered by Norway in 2002 temporarily stopped the fighting, but renewed violence in the north and east has escalated since late 2005.

Blast At U.S. Embassy Called 'Terrorism' (AP)

By Nicholas Paphitis

AP, January 12, 2007

A rocket was fired at the U.S. embassy early Friday, striking the front of the building but causing no injuries. A senior police official said the blast was an act of terrorism.

Police cordoned off streets around the heavily guarded building after the explosion shortly before 6 a.m. The shell struck the third floor and smashed glass in nearby buildings.

Investigators found the device used to fire the rocket shell at a construction site near the embassy.

"This is an act of terrorism. We don't know where from," Attica Police Chief Asimakis Golfis said. "There was a shell that exploded in the toilets of the building ... It was fired from street level."

Embassy officials confirmed that an explosion had taken place and said that no one had been injured. U.S. ambassador Charles Reis said the damage was "not extensive."

"There can be no justification for such a senseless act of violence ... The embassy was occupied at the time (but) nobody was hurt, he said.

Authorities were searching apartment buildings near the U.S. Embassy and a nearby hospital for evidence.

"I heard a loud bang I didn't realize what was going on," said Giorgos Yiannoulis, who runs a kiosk near the embassy.

Traffic came to a standstill across parts of central Athens, as police and emergency services scrambled to the embassy building, which is a frequent destination for protest groups.

It was the first major attack against a U.S. target in more than a decade, following the arrest of members of Greece's far-left November 17 terrorist group. The group was blamed for killing 23 people — including U.S., British and Turkish officials — and dozens of bomb attacks.

In 2003, a special court gave multiple life sentences to November 17's leader, chief assassin and three other members. Lesser sentences were given to 10 others.

Southeast Asians Consider Pact Against Terrorism (NYT)

By Carlos H. Conde

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

CEBU, the Philippines, Jan. 11 — Ten Southeast Asian countries meeting here are hammering out a regional antiterrorism agreement, officials said Thursday, the day after a series of terrorist bombings in the southern Philippines underscored the need for such a measure.

“The terrorists merely accomplished the opposite of what they wanted,” said Victoriano Lecaros, a Philippine government spokesman. “The attacks only emphasized the need to address terrorism in Southeast Asia. There is now a renewed urgency to deal with terrorism.”

Leaders of the 10 members of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations, or Asean, will consider the measure, the Asean Convention on Counterterrorism, at their annual summit meeting here on Saturday. The agreement aims to improve information and intelligence sharing among the group’s members and encourage them to adopt domestic antiterrorism laws, officials said.

“Global terrorism has assumed new forms of virulence, and we will make sure that the community is more secure and resistant to the threat of terror,” said Alberto Romulo, the Philippine foreign minister.

DOJ_NMG_0115675

Bombs ripped through three southern cities here on Wednesday night, killing eight people and wounding dozens, the police said. No group claimed responsibility, but two radical Islamist groups, Abu Sayyaf and Jemaah Islamiyah, are suspected, an official said, because they were behind similar bombings in the past.

Foreign ministers meeting here before the summit meeting discussed the convention on Wednesday night. Opponents of the antiterrorism agreement fear that it could be used to suppress human rights.

One result of the discussions was that Indonesia invited several countries, including the Philippines, Malaysia, Thailand and Australia, to meet in March to discuss terrorism.

The attacks Wednesday in the southern region of Mindanao, where there is an active Islamist separatist movement, followed claims by President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo in recent weeks that her government had made progress fighting terrorists.

"They were trying to send a message," said Oscar Calderon, the chief of the national police, referring to the attackers. "They wanted to embarrass the government because of the meetings in Cebu."

The Philippine police and military have been receiving help from the United States and Australia in fighting Abu Sayyaf, which has been giving refuge to Jemaah Islamiyah members. Jemaah Islamiyah is a Southeast Asian terrorism network that originated in Indonesia and was said to be behind the 2002 Bali bombings that killed more than 200 people.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Administration Offers Plan To Ease Rules On Asylum (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 — After months of pressure from lawmakers, conservative groups and advocates for immigrants, the Bush administration announced plans on Thursday to seek legislation that would provide relief to thousands of refugees and asylum seekers who have been inadvertently denied refuge because of antiterrorism laws.

The laws, including the USA Patriot Act and the Real ID Act, deny entry to anyone who belongs to or has provided material support to armed rebel groups, even if that support was coerced and even if the armed groups fought alongside American troops or opposed authoritarian governments criticized by the Bush administration.

The new legislative proposal would allow the resettlement of combatants and members of those armed groups, including refugees fleeing the authoritarian government of Myanmar, formerly known as Burma; hundreds of refugees from Vietnam and Laos who fought alongside American troops in the Vietnam War; and dozens of Cubans who supported armed groups opposed to Fidel Castro in the 1960s.

The Bush administration would also exercise its authority to provide waivers to allow the resettlement of thousands of refugees from Myanmar, Vietnam, Tibet and Cuba who provided material support to rebel groups. It would also, for the first time, provide relief to the 5,600 people from those countries whose asylum claims have been placed on hold here or who have been admitted as refugees but prevented from becoming permanent residents here because of the antiterrorism laws.

The administration would also allow some individuals who were forced to provide support to groups deemed as terrorist to be resettled or granted asylum here. Many were barred because the statutes broadened the definition of terrorist groups to include any group of two or more people who take up arms against a state, even if the group supports the aims of American foreign policy and do not appear on the government's designated list of terrorist groups.

Refugee advocacy groups, including Human Rights First and Human Rights Watch, and conservative groups like Concerned Women for America and the National Association of Evangelicals, had pressed for such changes for months. And officials acknowledge that many refugees suffered from the "unintended consequences" of the antiterrorism laws, remaining stranded in bleak refugee camps or in American jails while immigration courts debated their fates.

But Paul Rosenzweig, acting assistant secretary for international affairs at the Department of Homeland Security, told reporters that the administration expected to present legislation to Congress by the end of the month and to exercise most of its waivers within a day or so. The waivers allowing for relief for Hmong and Montagnard refugees, who fought with American troops in Vietnam, are also being processed.

DOJ_NMG_0115676

"There isn't anybody in this room who doesn't wish we could have moved more quickly than we have," Mr. Rosenzweig said.

Advocacy groups hailed the decision as an important step forward, but warned that it would still leave many people vulnerable.

Under the new plan, for instance, refugees and asylum seekers forced to cooperate with groups on the government's list of terrorist groups would be ineligible for resettlement or asylum here. That would affect Colombians forced to support their country's largest rebel group, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, among others.

The process would also leave out individuals who do not belong to the ethnic groups named in the waivers.

"I think they have made some real progress, and as a result more people will be protected," said Jennifer Daskal of Human Rights Watch. "But many people will continue to be barred and put at real risk. There's a need to go further."

For A Fee, Fliers Won't Shed Shoes (USAT)

By Thomas Frank, Usa Today

USA Today, January 12, 2007

Footwear scanner now used at Orlando airport

A new machine will allow some air travelers to avoid a post-9/11 hassle starting today — taking off shoes at a checkpoint.

Orlando International starts using the ShoeScanner this morning but only for people who pay an annual fee and pass a background check. Those fee-paying travelers will soon find the machines at Indianapolis, San Jose and Cincinnati airports and in Terminal 7 at New York's Kennedy International.

The ShoeScanner detects explosives in shoes when people stand on its platform for 20 to 25 seconds, allowing the machine to shoot radio waves at footwear to provide a molecular peek inside.

This is "going to make it less of a hassle for passengers," said Indianapolis airport security director Reggie Baumgardner.

Travelers in the USA have been largely required to remove their shoes at checkpoints since December 2001, when al-Qaeda recruit Richard Reid unsuccessfully tried to blow up a trans-Atlantic jetliner with explosives in his sneakers.

ShoeScanners will be available only to people who join the Registered Traveler program, which allows faster security lines for passengers paying about $100 a year. The Transportation Security Administration approved ShoeScanners only for Registered Traveler and has no plans to expand it to regular checkpoints because of cost and time concerns.

The ShoeScanner's $200,000 per unit cost is being paid by Verified Identity Pass, a Manhattan company that several airports have hired to run Registered Traveler.

"This (machine) is what some airports have been waiting for," said Orlando security director Brigitte Goersch. Orlando runs a Registered Traveler program with 30,000 enrollees.

Tim Anderson, deputy operations director at Minneapolis-St. Paul International, said the ShoeScanner "is just a marginal improvement" that won't propel the airport to start Registered Traveler.

The machine is made by GE Security. Airport consultant Rich Roth said it's not infallible. Scanners may miss plastic knives or other non-explosives, he said, adding, "It would be far safer if we made everyone take their shoes off."

Shin Bet Questions Ex-American Suspected Of Aiding Islamic Jihad (HAARETZ)

By Yossi Melman

Haaretz, January 12, 2007

Israeli authorities who arrested the former imam of Ohio's largest mosque who was deported from the United States have questioned him about his connections to Islamic Jihad, his attorney said Wednesday.

Palestinian Fawaz Damra's American citizenship was revoked due to suspicions that he raised funds for Islamic Jihad 15 years ago. Damra has admitted to raising money for the Palestinian cause, said his attorney, Smadar Ben-Natan.

Damra was transferred to Israeli custody on a "secret flight" coordinated by the FBI and Israeli security services.

Ben-Natan met with Damra at the Kishon prison on Wednesday. She is representing him at his family's request.

DOJ_NMG_0115677

Damra told Ben-Natan that he had raised funds for the Palestinian cause in 1991. He also told U.S. judicial authorities that his sermons had included harsh words against Israel and the Jews, whom he described as "pigs and monkeys."

Nonetheless, Damra said he changed his worldviews after 1993, attended university and began working at organizations that promote interreligious dialogue.

Damra said his citizenship was revoked despite his change in opinion. Several days ago, he boarded a special plane destined for Jordan at New Jersey's Newark Airport, along with six drug dealers. Following a short interrogation, Jordanian authorities transferred him to the Shin Bet and Israel Police via Allenby Bridge.

Damra, a 46-year-old Palestinian whose family lives in Nablus, served as the imam of the Cleveland mosque for several years.

He was arrested in the United States about a year ago on suspicion of raising funds for Islamic Jihad in 1991, but not enough evidence was found to prosecute him. To avoid an acquittal, the U.S. ruled to revoke Damra's citizenship in a legal proceeding, arguing that Damra had violated immigration laws by not handing over information on the organizations with which he was involved prior to receiving citizenship.

Damra's situation is unique, as he is a U.S. citizen who was arrested on U.S. territory. Most suspects transferred via secret flights have been arrested in countries such as Afghanistan, Pakistan and Egypt.

Lawyer: Cleric Being Questioned; Arrest Will Be Appealed (ABJ)

By Aron Heller

Akron Beacon Journal, January 12, 2007

JERUSALEM - Israeli authorities who arrested the former imam of Ohio's largest mosque after he was deported from the United States have questioned him about the militant Palestinian group Islamic Jihad, his attorney said Thursday.

Fawaz Damra, 46, was arrested and accused of having ties with Islamic Jihad 15 years ago, said Smadar Ben-Natan, Damra's Israeli lawyer. Islamic Jihad, responsible for numerous suicide bombings and other attacks on Israelis, is classified by Israel and the U.S. as a terrorist organization.

Ben-Natan met her client for the first time on Wednesday at the Kishon prison in northern Israel and said he was being treated well. She said she would appeal his arrest later Thursday.

Damra, 46, a Palestinian from the West Bank city of Nablus, was deported by U.S. authorities last week because he was convicted of concealing his ties to terrorist groups when he applied for American citizenship in 1994.

During his trial in 2004, jurors were shown evidence that Damra raised money for the organization, along with footage of a 1991 speech in which he called Jews "the sons of monkeys and pigs." He later apologized for making anti-Semitic statements.

Relatives expecting him to enter the West Bank on Friday reported he never showed up. Ben-Natan said he was apprehended by Israeli authorities at the Allenby crossing with Jordan and taken into custody.

Israel's internal security service, the Shin Bet, confirmed Tuesday that Damra was arrested because of his ties to Islamic Jihad. It provided no other details.

On Wednesday, an Israeli judge extended Damra's detention by 15 days, Ben-Natan said.

Ben-Natan said the contact Damra is accused of having with Islamic Jihad took place in 1991 and that Damra was unaware the money was going to the militant organization.

Damra, whose wife and three daughters remain in the U.S., served as the imam, or religious leader, of the Islamic Center of Cleveland.

Despite a campaign by his family and supporters to keep him in the U.S., Damra was deported after spending a year in a Michigan jail. His relatives in the U.S. said they hadn't been notified he had been deported, and found out only when his lawyer arrived at the jail and found him gone.

White Powder Found At Two South Florida Courthouses (MH)

By Trenton Daniel And Jennifer Lebovich

The Miami Herald, January 12, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115678

Authorities found mysterious powders in two South Florida courthouses -- one in Broward, the other in Palm Beach -- Thursday but neither substance proved a threat.

Fort Lauderdale officials received a call at 4:29 p.m. of an unknown powder in the first-floor mailroom of the downtown courthouse, said Assistant Fire Chief Stephen McInerny. The letter the powder was found in was addressed to the clerk of the courts.

Hazardous material teams from Fort Lauderdale responded to the call at 201 SE Sixth St. The area near the mailroom was evacuated, said McInerny.

Tests of the substance showed that it didn't appear to be hazardous, McInerny said.

"It appears to be some sort of a sugar substitute," McInerny said. ``We know we're dealing with a non-harmful product."

Three mailroom employees were exposed to the "brown granular powder" but no one was injured, he said.

The false alarm coincided with the discovery of a silvery-white powdery substance found earlier in the day at the Palm Beach County Courthouse. Five people were decontaminated but there were no injuries.

"There's no threat found associated with the powder that was there," said Judy Orihuela, a spokeswoman for the FBI, which responded.

It was not immediately known if the two scares were related, but investigators planned to look into the matter.

"It's coincidental," said McInerny.

In Palm Beach County a mail worker discovered the substance around 11:30 a.m. as she was delivering mail to the chambers of two judges on the building's ninth floor, said Teri Barbera, a spokeswoman for the Palm Beach Sheriff's Office. She had just visited the first-floor law library.

On the envelope, investigators found tellurium, a rare chemical element that can take the form of a silvery-white powdery substance. Tellurium is listed as a chemical hazard on the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's website. Garlic breath and drowsiness are key symptoms of ingestion.

Fire-rescue units responded, and decontaminated five people who may have come in contact with the substance, said Barbera. The FBI also arrived, to assist with the investigation.

The mailroom, law library, and the judges' chambers were evacuated after the scare, but the courthouse resumed normal operations late in the afternoon.

Since FBI agents found no serious threat in the envelope -- a letter from an attorney to a judge requesting a motion hearing -- local agencies will take over the investigation to see who's responsible for planting the substance, said Barbera.

Poison Found On Envelopes At PBC Courthouse (PALMBEACHP)

By Susan Spencer-Wendel, Laura Green, Palm Beach Post Staff Writers

Palm Beach Post (FL), January 12, 2007

WEST PALM BEACH — A letter with a poisonous shiny powder stuck to the outside closed the Palm Beach County courthouse to entrants for hours Thursday afternoon and sent five court employees to an inflatable tent where a hazardous materials team stripped them naked and decontaminated them.

All five were given thorough health checks and reported no ill effects, a fire department spokesperson said.

More than two hours after the powderâ€™s discovery at about 11:30 a.m., fire officials identified the substance as tellurium, a poisonous alloying agent used for things like coloring glass or strengthening lead. If ingested, it can cause abdominal disruptions, and if inhaled, can cause drowsiness, headache, nausea and a garlic odor, according to the Centers for Disease Control.

The substance was stuck to the outside of an envelope addressed to Circuit Judge John Hoy from a local law firm, said court operations manager Rick Hussey. Hussey saw the envelope and said the powder looked like it had been transferred there from somewhere else, possibly postal equipment.

Investigators donned hazardous material suits Thursday evening to pore through 200 pieces of mail, looking for the source. Two judicial assistants left the letter with powder stuck to it down in the mailroom, but carried other mail which had the substance on it up to nine floors above to the judgesâ€™ chambers, widely spreading exposure, officials said.

Capt. Frank DeMario, who oversees courthouse security, called it an "expensive training exercise" and blamed a failure to follow protocol established for suspicious mail since the anthrax attack of 2001.

On Thursday, ambulances and fire-trucks lined the south side of the courthouse for hours, and the road was closed to traffic.

The FBI and Homeland Security joined the investigation. People could not enter the building for most of the afternoon, but court cases continued as usual.

The scene was similar to one in Fort Lauderdale where at about 4:30 p.m. officials received a call of an unknown powder discovery in the first-floor mailroom of the downtown courthouse. Hazardous material teams responded and the area near the mailroom was evacuated, said Fort Lauderdaleâ€™s Assistant Fire Chief Stephen McInerny.

The letter the powder was found in was addressed to the clerk of the courts. But tests of the substance showed that it didnâ€™t appear to be hazardous, but "some sort of sugar substitute," McInerny said.

In West Palm Beach, Hussey, the courthouseâ€™s emergency coordinator, said all mail is opened in the mailroom, to contain any such events there. Employees have received training to stay in the mailroom and contact authorities. "Iâ€™m disappointed. It never should have turned into this," Hussey said.

Hussey was one of the five employees who had to be stripped and showered following his exposure. Rescue workers in space suits and plastic masks placed every piece of clothing and jewelry on him in sealed bags, then showered him off twice. The substance tested negative for radioactivity, he said.

A batch of mail in the same area of the mailroom was taken to a lab to be analyzed hoping to find some answer to where it came from, he said.

Staff researcher Melanie Mena and the Miami Herald contributed to this story.

Powder Scare Hits Courthouses In West Palm Beach, Fort Lauderdale (FLSUNSEN)

By Sofia Santana And Missy Diaz, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, January 12, 2007

Suspicious powder found in the mail at the Broward and Palm Beach county courthouses Thursday caused firefighters to isolate several employees who came into contact with the substances, but no one was injured or appeared sick.

Officials did not know whether the two cases were related and are trying to determine where the letters came from. In Palm Beach County, the substance was tellurium, a rare chemical element, a Fire Rescue spokesman said. Prelimiary indications are that the substance in Broward appears to be some sort of food additive, possibly a sugar substitute, a fire official said.

In West Palm Beach, firefighters decontaminated five people who touched two envelopes tainted with traces of tellurium, a silvery white substance. None had an adverse reaction, Fire Rescue spokesman Phil Kaplan said.

A byproduct of electrolytic copper refining, tellurium can cause garlic-like odor to breath and sweat in small exposure. Heavy exposure may result in headache, drowsiness, metallic taste, loss of appetite, nausea, tremors, convulsions and respiratory arrest.

Three mailroom employees in the Broward courthouse were exposed to a light brown powder, said Stephen McInerny, Fort Lauderdale Fire-Rescue assistant chief. The Sheriff's Office crime lab will try to determine exactly what the powder is.

"We escorted the three in the mailroom to the bathroom, where they washed their hands up real good," McInerny said.

The three workers were examined by firefighters but declined medical treatment, he said.

About 11:45 a.m., assistants for Palm Beach Circuit Court Judges John Hoy and Karen Miller went to the first-floor mailroom to pick up mail and noticed a crystallized, powdery substance on the outside of an envelope addressed to Hoy, said courthouse spokesman Rick Hussey. The assistants left the letter in the mailroom and returned to their ninth-floor office with a bag of mail only to find that the substance was stuck on other mail inside the bag, said Hussey, who reported the suspicious find to authorities.

Hussey, who was among those who were decontaminated, said he had to strip,, bathe in a milky substance and then get hosed down by firefighters. "This could have been a minor thing and it turned out a lot worse because the procedures weren't followed," Hussey said.

Firefighters in Fort Lauderdale received a call about brown powder in a letter addressed to the clerk of courts at the courthouse at 201 SE Sixth St. just after 4:30 p.m. A mailroom employee had opened the letter, exposing two other co-workers. All three were isolated for several hours. Some firefighters donned white chemical suits fitted with breathing masks and oxygen tanks and collected samples of the suspicious substance, carrying small bags out in a green plastic grocery basket.

The courthouse remained open much of the evening, but sheriff's deputies had to block the main entrance at times so firefighters could enter and exit easily.

The incident turned out to be a good exercise for firefighters and courthouse employees, who following proper procedure, McInerny said. "They didn't leave the room, and they followed the exact plan they had in place," he said of the mailroom staff.

FBI agents were called to both courthouses, but declined to launch an investigation in Palm Beach County. FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said agents were looking into the Broward case.

Powder Found At 2 S. Fla. Courthouses (BRAH)

The Bradenton Herald, January 12, 2007

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. - Powdery substances were tested by authorities Thursday after being discovered at two south Florida courthouses.

A white substance found on the outside of two letters at the Palm Beach County Courthouse tested positive for tellurium, which can be hazardous if enough is ingested. But there was not enough present to be considered dangerous, Palm Beach County Sheriff's spokeswoman Teri Barbera said.

Five unidentified courthouse employees had to strip off their clothes and shower in a decontamination tent set up outside, Barbera said. Authorities were going through additional mail to determine if there was more of the substance.

A brown, granular powder found in the mailroom of the Broward County Courthouse in Fort Lauderdale also was being tested, but it did not appear to be hazardous, Assistant Fire Chief Stephen McInerny told The Miami Herald.

Three employees in the mail room there were exposed to the unknown substance, the South Florida Sun-Sentinel reported.

It was not clear whether the incidents were related.

Tellurium can cause liver damage and affect a person's central nervous system, according to U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

In Palm Beach, the letters were carried by a mail clerk into the law library and two judges' chambers on the building's ninth floor. Barbera said those areas were sealed off and evacuated, but business went on elsewhere in the courthouse, including several trials.

E.U. Satisfied With Data Sharing (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

European Union officials said yesterday that the U.S. government had allayed their concerns about a homeland security program that creates and retains risk assessments on millions of air travelers to the United States.

But privacy advocates here and in Europe this week sent a letter to E.U. privacy commissioners charging that the Department of Homeland Security's Automated Targeting System "directly contravenes" a European-U.S. agreement on air-passenger data sharing.

The computerized screening program was designed to help U.S. Customs and Border Protection identify potential terrorists and prevent them from entering the United States. The system is used on about 90 million air passengers, cruise-ship passengers and some automobile drivers and passengers entering the country each year, Customs officials said. Those it flags are further scrutinized.

An E.U. spokesman in Washington, Telmo Baltazar, said Homeland Security officials assured the Europeans that the screening system observed privacy protections called for in the data-sharing agreement.

"A risk assessment is a normal law enforcement tool," Baltazar said yesterday. "The alternative to risk assessments is to consider everyone alike."

DOJ_NMG_0115681

But in a letter to the chief privacy officials of 27 countries, the American Civil Liberties Union and London-based Privacy International said the Automated Targeting System violated the October data-sharing accord, U.S. law and European data-protection laws.

The system's creation of terrorist risk assessments on all passengers, the storing of profiles for as long as 40 years, and the fact that passengers have no right to see, modify or correct the information violates the agreement, the groups said.

"The ATS is a clear threat to privacy and human rights," Simon Davies, the director of Privacy International and Barry Steinhardt, the ACLU's Technology and Liberty Project director, said in the letter.

Jarrod Agen, a Department of Homeland Security spokesman, said the program did not violate the requirement that European passenger data be stored for 3 1/2 years at the most. He said the U.S.-E.U. agreement stipulates that some information may be kept for less than 40 years.

The air-passenger profiling program has been operating for about 10 years, Customs officials said, but its existence was not widely known until November, when it was described in the Federal Register

Under the U.S.-E.U. agreement, up to 34 types of information can be collected, including names, credit card data and flight itineraries. Sharing and use of the information is restricted. The agreement is due to be renegotiated this summer.

Concerns also have been raised in Congress and by privacy advocates that information can be shared with a wide range of federal, state, and local government agencies for purposes other than border security and that the passenger assessments violated a congressional ban on developing such programs.

Pork, Peanut Butter And Security (NYT)

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

Making his umpteenth pitch to Congress to provide more security money for New York City, Mayor Michael Bloomberg stated the obvious when he said that money to defend against terrorism should be divvied up based on an assessment of risks, not “spread across the country like peanut butter.” After all, his testimony to the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee echoed one of the key recommendations of the 9/11 Commission. The mayor estimated that more than $3 billion had been distributed in this lunatic way to date.

Unfortunately, the committee’s incoming chairman, Senator Joseph Lieberman, is partial to peanut butter. Mr. Lieberman, who won re-election last November as an independent with help from Mr. Bloomberg, continues to believe that every state, regardless of the risks or threats it faces, should be getting antiterrorism money. In negotiations with the House, Mr. Lieberman is seeking a “compromise” formula that preserves guaranteed minimums for relatively low-risk places like his home state of Connecticut. The minimums he wants well exceed the financing favored by the House, and cannot be justified on the basis of national security.

Mr. Lieberman also wants to increase the overall amount of money budgeted for state and local antiterrorism efforts. He is right about that. High-risk jurisdictions like New York have been unfairly burdened by the steep decrease in spending recently. But without a formula adjustment that minimizes the pork barreling that now sends antiterrorism money needed in New York City to places like Nebraska, it would also increase the waste.

Mr. Lieberman fought the odds, held his seat and got this chairmanship. Now it’s up to him to use the power responsibly.

Jury Awards $2.5M In Punitive Damages In Katrina Suit Against State Farm (AP)

By Garry Mitchell, The Associated Press

AP, January 12, 2007

A Mississippi jury on Thursday awarded $2.5 million in punitive damages to a couple who sued State Farm Fire & Casualty Co. for denying their claim after Hurricane Katrina, a decision that could benefit hundreds of other homeowners challenging insurers for refusing to cover billion of dollars in storm damage.

A federal judge only hours earlier had taken part of the case out of jurors' hands before they awarded punitive damages to State Farm policyholders Norman and Genevieve Broussard.

U.S. District Judge L.T. Senter Jr. ruled Thursday morning that State Farm is liable for $223,292 in damage Hurricane Katrina caused to the Broussards' home. Senter left it to a jury to decide whether to award punitive damages.

DOJ_NMG_0115682

Senter's decision to make a directed verdict rather than let the jury decide the entire case appeared to surprise everyone in the courtroom. After he explained his ruling, Senter ordered a recess to give attorneys time "to get over the shock."

Some of Senter's earlier rulings in other Katrina cases have favored the insurance industry, but his decision Thursday calls into question the companies' refusal to cover billions of dollars in damage from Katrina's storm surge.

The Broussards sued State Farm for refusing to pay for any damage to their home, which Katrina reduced to a slab. The couple, who wanted State Farm to pay for the full insured value of their home plus $5 million in punitive damages, claimed that a tornado during the hurricane destroyed their home. State Farm blamed all the damage on Katrina's storm surge.

State Farm and other insurers say their homeowner policies cover damage from wind but not from water, and that the policies exclude damage that could have been caused by a combination of both, even if hurricane-force winds preceded a storm's rising water.

Senter, however, ruled that State Farm couldn't prove that Katrina's storm surge was responsible for all of the damage to the Broussards' home. The judge also said the testimony failed to establish how much damage was caused by wind and how much resulted from storm surge.

"We are surprised and disappointed by the court's ruling," said State Farm spokesman Phil Supple. "The expert testimony supported a different result. After the conclusion of this case, we will evaluate our next steps in this lawsuit."

In his closing argument Thursday, one of the Broussards' attorneys, William Walker, said State Farm had breached their contract "in a bad way" by denying their claim. State Farm "acted like a chiseler," he said, adding, "The pocketbook is what they listen to."

State Farm attorney John Banahan urged jurors to "use your head and your heart" in deciding on punitive damages and to reject an attempt by the Broussards' attorney to demonize the company as an "evil empire."

Robert Hartwig, chief economist for the Insurance Information Institute in New York, said before the jury announced its decision that a punitive damage award would be "distressing" for insurers.

"It adds even more cost and more uncertainty to the other problems that already exist in the Mississippi homeowners insurance market," he said.

The Broussards' case isn't directly involved in recent settlement talks between State Farm Fire & Casualty Co., Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood and policyholders' lawyers.

People with direct knowledge of the settlement talks told The Associated Press this week that State Farm, Mississippi's largest home insurer, is considering paying hundreds of millions of dollars to settle more than 600 lawsuits and resolve thousands of other disputed claims.

Richard "Dickie" Scruggs, an attorney who represents 639 State Farm policyholders in the settlement talks, said he doesn't know how the judge's ruling on Thursday will affect the negotiations.

Randy Maniloff, a Philadelphia-based lawyer who represents insurers and has closely followed the Katrina litigation, said Senter's ruling is a "huge verdict" for homeowners even if the jury didn't award punitive damages.

"That settlement is looking awfully good for State Farm now," he added.

Associated Press writer Michael Kunzelman contributed to this report.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Cheered At Fort Benning (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, January 12, 2007

President Bush, surrounded on Thursday by cheering soldiers in camouflage, defended his decision to send 21,500 more U.S. troops to Iraq and cautioned that the buildup will not produce quick results. "It's going to take awhile," he said.

With Americans overwhelmingly opposed to the increase, Bush said the U.S. commitment to the war was not open-ended — although he put no timetable on how long it would last. While more bloodshed can be expected, Bush said, Americans should give the Iraqi government time to prove its resolve to stop violence and unify the nation.

DOJ_NMG_0115683

Fort Benning, south of Columbus, Ga., offered Bush a patriotic backdrop and a friendly audience in which to sell his retooled plan for Iraq, which drew heavy fire on Capitol Hill from Democrats and some Republicans. Some 4,000 members of Fort Benning's 3rd Brigade Combat Team are being sent to Iraq earlier than planned because of the president's decision.

"The new strategy is not going to yield immediate results. It's going to take awhile," Bush said. "The American people have got to understand that suicide bombings won't stop immediately."

The increase in soldiers is a hard sell. An Associated Press-Ipsos poll released Thursday said 70 percent of Americans oppose sending more troops. Bush's overall job approval slumped to 32 percent, a new low in AP-Ipsos polling. Sixty percent think it is unlikely that a stable, democratic Iraqi government will be established.

Outside the gates of the military base, dozens of demonstrators protested the war.

"Insanity is doing the same thing and expecting different results," said Jim Steen, an 81-year-old veteran who held a sign that read, "Surge for Peace."

Some lawmakers have threatened to withhold financial support for an escalating the war. White House counselor Dan Bartlett said that the White House was closely monitoring sentiment in Congress, but he said those who reject the president's plan before it has a chance to work have the burden of proposing an alternative.

Bush said his new plan has a well-defined mission — something that military leaders have insisted upon if more troops were sent.

"The mission is to help Iraqis clear and secure neighborhoods, to help Iraqis protect the local population, and to ensure that the Iraqi forces that are left behind will be capable of providing the security necessary in the capital city of Iraq. That's the mission," he said.

Bush had lunch with about 300 military personnel and their relatives, saw a paratrooper training exercise and met with relatives of 25 soldiers who died in Iraq and Afghanistan.

He met Dave Tainsh, a retired Marine sergeant-major, and his wife, Deb, whose son, 33-year-old Army Sgt. Patrick Tainsh, was killed by a roadside bomb near the Baghdad Airport on Feb. 11, 2004. Deb Tainsh has at least 100 e-mails from parents of fallen soldiers or parents of soldiers who are about to depart for Iraq — all pledging support for Bush.

"Every one of these letters says, 'Mr. President, we support you,'" she said. "The consensus is that they ... want him to do everything he can to win this war and that our prayers are with him."

Before visiting Georgia, Bush awarded the Medal of Honor, posthumously, to Marine Cpl. Jason Dunham of Scio, N.Y. He was only the second recipient of the nation's highest military honor from the Iraq war.

"I've lost my son, but he became a part of history," Dunham's mother, Deb, said after the ceremony. "It still hurts as a parent, but the pride that you have from knowing he did the right thing makes it easier."

Bush Gets Cool Response From Troops Set For Iraq (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 12, 2007

FORT BENNING, Ga. -- President Bush sought a friendly audience and a patriotic backdrop yesterday to continue to make his case for sending 21,000 more troops to Iraq, but he received only tepid applause at this Army base, where the commanding general forbade soldiers from talking to reporters.

The president's speech was similar to the national address he delivered Wednesday night, but he used firm language when speaking about what is coming for insurgents in Iraq. He also hailed efforts by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki against militias responsible for continual waves of sectarian killings in Iraq.

"Yesterday, the resolve was seen when Prime Minister Maliki made it clear that illegal militias, including the Mahdi Army, have a choice to make: either lay down your arms or face justice," Mr. Bush said. "That's the kind of leadership that the Iraqi people expect, and that's the kind of leadership I expect, and the American people expect."

He added, "Our support is not open-ended. If the Iraqis demonstrate a willingness to fight for a better future, we'll help them. It's in our interests that we do so. Not only do we expect to see action militarily, as I mentioned, we expect to see them fulfill the benchmarks that they laid out for their people."

DOJ_NMG_0115684

Mr. Bush visited Fort Benning because the base will send a combat brigade to Iraq earlier than planned, by March instead of late May or early June. The brigade has done two tours in Iraq, and on its last yearlong deployment, in 2005, 34 soldiers from the 4,000-member unit were killed.

In his speech, Mr. Bush also reiterated the warning he gave in his prime-time address: His planned troop surge would not be a quick fix.

"The new strategy is not going to yield immediate results. It's going to take awhile," he said. "The American people have got to understand that suicide bombings won't stop immediately."

Before meeting with families, Mr. Bush watched as five members of a parachute team floated to the ground in a demonstration of base training.

"We're proud of you," he told the men.

Earlier in the day, the president awarded the Medal of Honor to the late Marine Cpl. Jason Dunham of Scio, N.Y., who covered a hand grenade in Iraq two years ago, saving the lives of his comrades. He is the second Iraq war soldier to receive the prestigious award.

"I've lost my son, but he became a part of history," Cpl. Dunham's mother, Deb, said after the ceremony, which drew tears from Mr. Bush. "It still hurts as a parent, but the pride that you have from knowing he did the right thing makes it easier."

The 300 soldiers who, with their families, heard the afternoon speech were banned by Maj. Gen. Walter Wojdakowski, commandant of the 32,000-soldier base, from talking to reporters. Journalists were barred from re-entering Freedom Hall, where Mr. Bush delivered the speech, or from approaching soldiers outside the hall.

While the president met with family members of 25 soldiers from the base who were killed in the Iraq and Afghanistan wars, several reporters waited for word from the base on whether the ban would be lifted. A senior administration official said, "We have no control over that."

Bush Meets With Fort Benning Troops Army Soldiers Scheduled To Join Iraq Buildup (AJC)

By Ron Martz, David A. Markiewicz

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 12, 2007

Columbus — A day after President George Bush outlined his new plan for Iraq, he came to Fort Benning, an Army training base, to sell it to the soldiers who will have to implement it.

"Everywhere soldiers from this base serve, you leave you mark and I hope it will be a legacy of peace and freedom," Bush told an audience of 210 soldiers and 90 civilian family members.

Bush spoke to the group following a lunch in a makeshift cafeteria in the reception area where troops leave for and return from Iraq. A contingent of about 4,000 soldiers from the 3rd Brigade of the 3rd Infantry Division who are based here are scheduled to go to Iraq later this year. Their departure, originally scheduled for late spring or early summer, is now expected to be moved up to late February or early March.

Bush's speech here was a virtual carbon copy of his national TV address Wednesday night, in which he laid out his plans for Iraq.

Bush's comments were met with relatively polite but restrained applause on several occasions, but the soldiers broke into a spontaneous ovation when he said he was in favor of increasing the overall size of the military.

Bush also reiterated his concern of what would happen in Iraq if support to the fledgling Iraqi government was withdrawn.

"I understand the consequences of failure [in Iraq] are unacceptable," Bush said. But he said that he has made it clear to Iraqi officials that they will have to meet certain benchmarks in their progress toward defending their own country.

"I have made it clear that the patience of the American people is not unlimited and now is the time to act," the president said.

Soldiers at the luncheon were prohibited from speaking to members of the media after Bush's speech by Maj. Gen. Walter Wojdakowski, commander of Ft. Benning and the infantry center here.

Following lunch, Bush attended a demonstration that included a jump by paratroopers and later was to meet with family members of soldiers who have died in Iraq. He was scheduled to depart around 4:45.

DOJ_NMG_0115685

Protesters, supporters await Bush

As a town that is a gatepost for the Army Infantry prepared for a visit from President Bush, many residents appeared to back the president's plan to send 21,500 additional U.S. troops into the Iraq war, but dozens of protesters outside the base decried it.

The president is due to have lunch here Thursday at Fort Benning, meet with troops and watch an Infantry demonstration, all the while selling the plan for more troop deployments that he announced Wednesday night on national television announced.

Today, on Victory Drive just outside the Army base, about 50 protesters made their opinion clear. Many waved signs, beat drums and shouted at passing motorists who occasionally honked their support.

One protester, dressed as the devil, adorned with horns, a red cape billowing in the breeze and a rubber Bush mask, held a sign that said: "Bush: Lord of the Lies," a reference to the popular William Golding novel.

Gloria Tatum, 63, of Decatur, said she travelled to Columbus because Bush "lied us into war. He was wrong then and he's wrong now."

"We voted [in November] and the vote was that [the war in Iraq] was a mistake."

Her sign read: "Bush, Lord of the Lies."

Local organizers said there are about 200 similar protests planned across the country, all organized within the last few days.

Other examples of signs included "Pull every American - Cancel escalation" and "Iraq is Arabic for Vietnam."

Jim Allen, 71, of Lanett, Ala., a Navy veteran, said the most unusual thing about the protest was that he was seeing more and more people from Columbus, a military town, speaking out against the war.

But residents of Columbus said the town still backs Bush.

Larry Love, who owns Diamond Exchange, a jewelry and pawn shop on Victory Road, which leads to the fort's gate, summed up the sentiment of many.

"I think we should give him all the assistance he needs to let him clean the mess up over there. If we don't take care of terrorists now, we are going to be fighting in our own backyard," said Love.

The thousand of soldiers who move through this western Georgia town while receiving basic or advance Infantry training tell Love they strongly support the war and the president's efforts.

"I hear from the troops that they are happy to go over there and fight because it is a great cause. And they say we are winning. The people over there are so glad we're there. They are changing their whole way of life. The troops are eager and really committed," Love said.

Protestors are scheduled to demonstrate outside the fort about noon.

Love wrote them off, sounding like the bored resident who sees thousands of protestors every November at the annual demonstration against the School of the Americas, which trains combat troops, mostly from Latin America.

"Most of the time, when the protestors come, someone is paying for their room and their meals. They are almost paid to do what they do," said Love.

Bush Pitches Iraq Plan To Ft. Benning Soldiers (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2007

FT. BENNING, GA. — President Bush argued the case for his new Iraq strategy Thursday at an Army post where a combat brigade will be hurried to Baghdad as part of the revised effort to establish peace in the war-torn capital.

The plan calls for the brigade, which includes soldiers who will be making a third tour in Iraq, to be deployed in March, a couple of months earlier than planned.

Bush reprised the key points from his nationally televised Wednesday night speech, acknowledging that the administration's policies have failed to quell sectarian violence raging in Iraq — especially in Baghdad. The president conceded the situation had "turned out differently than I had anticipated."

But to a greater degree than he did Wednesday, Bush focused on the potentially dire effects of diminishing the U.S. commitment in Iraq and beginning a withdrawal of American troops.

DOJ_NMG_0115686

Such moves would cause Islamic extremists to "grow in strength," he warned. "They would be emboldened. It would make it easier" for them to recruit followers and threaten other governments throughout the Middle East.

With polls showing strong public opposition to his new plan and with sharp criticism of it coming even from some fellow Republicans, Bush also sought to spell out the possible consequences for Americans of a failure to stabilize Iraq.

"Imagine what would happen if [Islamic] extremists who hate America and our way of life gained control of energy reserves," he said. "You can bet they would use those reserves to blackmail economies in order to achieve their objective."

Under his redrawn blueprint for Iraq, 21,500 soldiers and Marines will be added in the coming months to the 132,000 U.S. troops now in the country.

Working in closer concert with Iraqi army and police forces — which the government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki has pledged to bolster — the American troops will launch more intense and sustained efforts to stem the violence in Baghdad and Al Anbar province.

Bush said that "what's new about this plan is that there will be enough troops to clear, build and hold" neighborhoods in those areas, "and that our troops will be able to move alongside the Iraqis without political interference. And that's very important."

The president and his aides have stressed that they expect — and have been promised — greater cooperation and commitment by Maliki's government to reining in Iraq's warring elements. Bush reiterated that point Thursday.

"The prime minister and I have had some plain talking," he said. "I have made it clear that the patience of the American people is not unlimited."

But Bush also asked for patience as the plan is put into effect, cautioning that it "is not going to yield immediate results.… The American people have got to understand that suicide bombings won't stop immediately."

Bush spoke to about 300 soldiers and family members at Ft. Benning. His audience was friendly, but his sober address received a less enthusiastic reception than has been the case on his past visits to military bases to promote his Iraq policy.

White House and Army officials prohibited reporters from interviewing soldiers before Bush spoke or immediately after his remarks.

For most of his five hours at the post, Bush was surrounded by troops in pale green camouflage uniforms — first at a lunch, then watching a demonstration of paratrooper training, then shaking the hands of hundreds of young soldiers before Air Force One departed.

With the exception of recruits undergoing basic training, nearly all the soldiers at Ft. Benning have served in Iraq.

One of the few times Bush's speech was interrupted by applause came when he repeated his goal of seeking overall increases in Army and Marine Corps personnel.

He also told the soldiers he would try to get them "all the resources you need in this war on terror, and that means good equipment and training, good housing."

"I understand full well, if your family is happy, you're happy," he said, sparking laughter by adding, "The same thing in my house, by the way."

At Fort Benning, A Quiet Response To A Presidential Visit (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

FORT BENNING, Ga., Jan. 11 -- The pictures were just what the White House wanted: A teary-eyed President Bush presenting the Medal of Honor posthumously to a slain war hero in the East Room, then flying here to join the chow line with camouflage-clad soldiers as some of them prepare to return to Iraq.

There are few places the president could go for an unreservedly enthusiastic reception the day after unveiling his decision to order 21,500 more troops to Iraq. A military base has usually been a reliable backdrop for the White House, and so Bush aides chose this venerable Army installation in western Georgia to promote his revised strategy to the nation while his Cabinet secretaries tried to sell it on Capitol Hill.

DOJ_NMG_0115687

To ensure that there would be no discordant notes here, Maj. Gen. Walter Wojdakowski, the base commander, prohibited the 300 soldiers who had lunch with the president from talking with reporters. If any of them harbored doubts about heading back to Iraq, many for the third time, they were kept silent.

"It's going to require sacrifice, and I appreciate the sacrifices our troops are willing to make," Bush told the troops. "Some units are going to have to deploy earlier than scheduled as a result of the decision I made. Some will remain deployed longer than originally anticipated."

Among those going early will be members of the 3rd Brigade Combat Team from the 3rd Infantry Division based here. Theirs was the division that spearheaded the invasion into Iraq in March 2003 and captured Baghdad. They returned in 2005 and lost 34 troops. Now, instead of heading back in May or June, they will return to Iraq in March.

Soldiers being soldiers, those who met the commander in chief Thursday saluted smartly and applauded politely. But it was hardly the boisterous, rock-star reception Bush typically gets at military bases. During his lunchtime speech, the soldiers were attentive but quiet. Not counting the introduction of dignitaries, Bush was interrupted by applause just three times in 30 minutes -- once when he talked about a previous Medal of Honor winner from Fort Benning, again when he pledged to win in Iraq and finally when he repeated his intention to expand the Army.

Bush's speech essentially repeated his address to the nation the night before, and he appeared a little listless as he talked. Aides said he was deliberately low-key to reflect the serious situation. Whether the audience was sobered by the new mission or responding to Bush's subdued tone was unclear, because reporters were ushered out as soon as his talk ended.

White House officials had promised reporters they could talk with soldiers. But that was not good enough for Wojdakowski. "The commanding general said he does not want media talking to soldiers today," spokeswoman Tracy Bailey said. "He wants the focus to be on the president's speech." Only hours later, after reporters complained, did the base offer to make selected soldiers available, but the White House plane was nearing departure.

For Bush, it was a day of military events and images. He began at the White House, presenting the Medal of Honor to the parents of a Marine slain in Iraq. Cpl. Jason Dunham, who died after falling on a grenade to save colleagues two years ago, became the second service member in Iraq to receive the nation's highest military decoration.

After flying here, Bush attended a U.S. Army Airborne School training demonstration as troops parachuted out of a helicopter. He also met privately with the families of 25 soldiers killed in Iraq or Afghanistan.

White House counselor Dan Bartlett said Bush was impressed by the "warm reception." "The perception is he's coming here to motivate the troops," Bartlett said, "but it has as much of an impact on him."

Bush Speaks And Base Is Subdued (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

FORT BENNING, Ga., Jan. 11 — President Bush came to this Georgia military base looking for a friendly audience to sell his new Iraq strategy. But his lunchtime talk received a restrained response from soldiers who clapped politely but showed little of the wild enthusiasm that they ordinarily shower on the commander in chief.

Under the new plan, more than 20,000 additional troops will be sent to Iraq, some from Fort Benning who learned Thursday that they would go earlier than expected. But instead of centering his address on the soldiers' situation, Mr. Bush seemed to be aiming his talk at ordinary Americans and members of Congress who are skeptical of his proposal.

Mr. Bush acknowledged, as he did in his televised address to the nation on Wednesday night, that he had miscalculated the number of troops necessary to execute the military's "clear, hold and build" strategy of securing Baghdad neighborhoods and tamping down sectarian violence.

"What's new about this plan is there will be enough troops to clear, build and hold, and that our troops will be able to move alongside the Iraqis without political interference, and that's very important," the president said. He added, "This is something different that enables the military folks to predict that we will succeed in helping quell sectarian violence in Baghdad."

DOJ_NMG_0115688

Mr. Bush pledged that the strategy would produce a return to peaceful society in Baghdad, but said it would take time. "The new strategy is not going to yield immediate results, it's going to take a while," he said, adding, "Yet over time, we can expect to see positive results."

The president was not specific about how long he meant. But a senior official at the National Security Council who helped develop the policy said the administration's target is significant improvement in a year.

"By the end of this year," this official said, "Baghdad's got to look significantly different. Decisive change in Baghdad is the focus."

Senior aides to Mr. Bush acknowledge that he is taking a risk in putting his faith in the government of Iraq's prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki. Mr. Bush said Thursday that he had been heartened this week by Iraqi and American forces fighting together to root out terrorists on Haifa Street in Baghdad, and that he also was encouraged by Mr. Maliki's recent statements that sectarian violence would not be tolerated.

"The prime minister and I have had some plain talking," the president said. "I have made it clear that the patience of the American people is not unlimited."

As Mr. Bush spoke here, two members of his cabinet, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, were testifying about the plan on Capitol Hill, where Democrats are promising a vote on the plan and may go so far as to place limits on financing for the war. Traveling with Mr. Bush to Fort Benning, Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president, warned that if Democrats were going to criticize, they must come up with something better.

"Those who have decided to judge this plan before it has a chance to work have a greater responsibility to propose something that will work," Mr. Bartlett said. "We've yet to see that from the Democrats."

Soldiers from Fort Benning have already contributed heavily to the Iraq war effort. Members of the Third Infantry Division, Third Brigade, have served two tours in Iraq, and some were notified Thursday that they would serve a third starting in mid-March, about two months ahead of schedule, as a result of the president's plan.

In his speech, Mr. Bush took note of that, saying, "I appreciate the sacrifices our troops are willing to make." But he did not dwell on sacrifice; a senior White House official said the president did not want that to be the major theme of his talk.

It was difficult to know how the soldiers felt about returning to the war zone, or the president's new Iraq plan. Though Mr. Bush's lunch was open to the press, the base commander, Maj. Gen. Walter Wojdakowski, would not let the troops in attendance talk to reporters. His spokeswoman said the commander wanted "the focus to be on the president."

At A Post In Georgia, A Job To Do (USAT)

By Larry Copeland

USA Today, January 12, 2007

COLUMBUS, Ga. — U.S. Army Staff Sgt. Bobby Dorsey has been deployed to the Middle East three times since 2003, but he's ready to go again.

Dorsey, 26, serves with the 3rd Brigade Combat Team at the Army's sprawling Fort Benning training complex near here. He's been to Iraq twice and Kuwait once. He figures that the increase of 21,500 troops that President Bush ordered for Baghdad and the rest of Iraq this week will make a difference.

"The more boots you have on the ground, the better you can control an area without having to stretch troops so far," said Dorsey, a six-year veteran who expects to return to Iraq soon. "You'll be able to recycle some troops, get them a little down time."

Soldiers from the Fort Benning-based 3rd Brigade of the 3rd Infantry Division are among the combat troops scheduled to go to Iraq.

In 2005, the 3rd Brigade Combat Team conducted 24,000 combat patrols and 3,500 joint operations with Iraqi army and police forces, said Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for the National Security Council. About 4,000 members of the unit will deploy to Iraq soon.

On Thursday, a day after Bush announced his new strategy in a prime-time address, there was a sense of a quickening at some of the businesses that cater to soldiers here. At Ranger Joe's, a military supply store on Victory Drive, soldiers bustled in and out all afternoon, picking up uniforms and other items.

DOJ_NMG_0115689

Bush visited Fort Benning, ate lunch with soldiers and watched training exercises. "On September the 11th, our nation saw firsthand the destructive vision of a new kind of enemy, and once again the men and women of Fort Benning answered the call to protect our country from that enemy," Bush said. "The fortunate thing for this country is that those who wear the uniform have never forgotten the threat. You understand the stakes."

Outside Ranger Joe's, Army 1st Sgt. Mecko Johnson said he agrees with the president's strategy — up to a point. "The more soldiers you get on the ground, it always helps," said Johnson, 39, a 19-year veteran awaiting orders to ship out. "As far as (the troop increase) changing the whole situation in Iraq, I'll be up for questioning on that. I'm not sure that's what we need right now. We need the Iraqi people to take more control of their own country."

Johnson will be going to Iraq for the third time. He was there for Operation Desert Storm in 1991 and for the Army's initial entry into Baghdad during the 2003 invasion.

"I think it'll be different this time," he said. "Then, we were there to liberate Iraq. Now, we're there as a training force and peacekeeping presence."

Reaction from some military families around the USA was mixed:

•Lynne Stamm of Wickliffe, Ohio, whose son did three tours in Iraq, said in an e-mail that the United States has done enough: "We deposed Saddam Hussein, Iraq drafted their own constitution, they held free elections and established their own government. We have done what was promised and so much more at a steep cost: over 3,000 American dead and billions upon billions of dollars spent. George Bush needs to face the reality in front of him: Iraq is in a civil war and just like any unhappy marriage, if you step in between the warring parties often the rage gets turned on you."

•Stormie Thompson, 21, whose husband, Matthew, is an Army sergeant serving in Iraq, said in an e-mail that "only time will tell if he is required to be extended as a result of the president's new plan." She lives in Germany, where her husband is stationed, but is visiting family in Oklahoma.

"I miss him terribly and can't wait to be reunited … but this is his job," she said. "Of course, we want our troops to be home and for there to be peace in the world, but that is not a reality now. People seem to forget that we have military forces for exactly this purpose — for them to fight when called upon by our nation's leaders. "

The impact of the new deployments was being felt strongly Thursday both inside and outside Fort Benning.

At Rose's Caribbean Restaurant (lunch special, $5.50, 10% military discount) on Fort Benning Road a half-mile from the post, owner Rose Collins said the deployment will have a devastating impact on her business, which is already down sharply.

"Our business, 90% is military," said Collins, who's had a restaurant here for 14 years, including three years at the current location. "People don't understand that when the soldiers are gone, we have no business."

Alek Ansley, co-owner and general manager of JudyBug's Books in nearby Columbus, said the comings and goings from Fort Benning affect businesses in town, but merchants no longer are wholly dependent on the troops.

"My biggest concern is for the families of the soldiers themselves," said Ansley, 39. "I know people who have been over there many times. I feel like it's another Vietnam, because I just think it's a war that can't be won. I think we'll win some battles, but I think even with these soldiers, we're not going to win the war."

Dorsey, who expects to return to Iraq in early spring, said he sees it differently. "We got a lot of good things accomplished," he said. "We got schools up and running. We built water-treatment plants. The guys over there are really helping the people learn how to sustain themselves. I think the additional troops will really help."

U.S. Unit Patrolling Baghdad Sees Flaws In Bush Strategy (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 11 -- A few hours before another mission into the cauldron of Baghdad, Spec. Daniel Caldwell's wife instant-messaged him Thursday morning. President Bush, Kelly wrote, wanted to send more than 20,000 U.S. troops and extend deployments in Iraq. Eight weeks pregnant, she was worried.

DOJ_NMG_0115690

Caldwell, a tall, lean 20-year-old from Montesano, Wash., wondered whether he would miss the birth of his child. He walked outside and joined his comrades of Apache Company, 1st Battalion, 23rd Infantry Regiment, Stryker Brigade. They, too, had heard the news.

Moments before he stepped into his squad's Stryker -- a large, bathtub-shaped vehicle encased in a cage -- Caldwell echoed a sentiment shared by many in his squad: "They're kicking a dead horse here. The Iraqi army can't stand up on their own."

Bush's decision to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq rests on a key assumption: that the Iraqi government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki can produce a well-disciplined, impartial army capable of taking the lead in securing Baghdad. U.S. troops, the president said, would now play more of a background role.

The day after his speech, the soldiers of Apache Company went on a mission to the volatile neighborhood of Hurriyah that underscored the challenges confronting U.S. troops as they attempt to clear neighborhoods of sectarian fighters and keep them that way under Iraqi control.

Across Baghdad, Iraq's mostly Shiite security forces have proved unable to keep neighborhoods secure on their own. Sunni Arabs deeply mistrust the army and police, viewing them as a sectarian weapon of the Shiite-led government. Iraqi army commanders say their soldiers lack training and equipment, while some U.S. officials worry that Iraq's troops are too dependent on their American counterparts and will become even more so with the expected surge.

The Stryker rolled through the mud of Camp Liberty and made its way to Hurriyah, a mostly Shiite area nestled west of the Tigris River. Apache Company's mission: to search a few houses for weapons caches based on intelligence reports. Caldwell and his soldiers worried about the intelligence they had been given. It had come from an Iraqi army -- or "IA," in U.S. soldier lingo -- officer a week ago. They wondered whether they were being set up for an ambush.

"It's a joke," said Pfc. Drew Merrell, 22, of Jefferson City, Mo., shaking his head and flashing a smile as the Stryker rolled through Baghdad.

"They feed us what they want," said Spec. Josh Lake, 26, of Ventura, Calif., referring to the intelligence. "I guarantee that everyone in the city knows where we're going. Because the IA told them. The only thing they don't know is how big a force we're coming with."

On this morning, 22 U.S. soldiers were in the Stryker convoy along with one Iraqi interpreter, whom the soldiers called Joey. He didn't want his real name used for security reasons.

"Pretty soon the Shiites will be tired of our presence, just like the Sunnis," said Lake, noting that the squad now makes almost daily trips to Hurriyah.

"The general feeling among us is we're not really doing anything here," Caldwell said. "We clear one neighborhood, then another one fires up. It's an ongoing battle. It never ends."

"We're constantly being told that it's not our fight. It is their fight," said Sgt. Jose Reynoso, 24, of Yuma, Ariz., speaking of the Iraqi army. "But that's not the case. Whenever we go and ask them for guys, they almost always say no, and we have to do the job ourselves."

"You do have corruption problems among the ranks," said Sgt. Justin Hill, 24, of Abilene Tex., the squad leader. "I don't know what they can do about that. They have militias inside them. They are pretty much everywhere."

"The intel they give us and the intel we get are two different things," Lake said.

Caldwell, as he listened to the conversation, leaned his head back and said:

"I want to go back and play my PlayStation.'"We Need the Americans'

In Hurriyah, the convoy pulled up outside the Muheaman Mosque, a tan Sunni house of worship overlooking a dirt field with junked cars. Last month, militiamen from the Mahdi Army, the force of radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, killed several mosque workers. Now, an Iraqi army unit, with all Shiites, was stationed inside the mosque. The area, they said, was controlled by the Mahdi force.

Lt. Dan Futrell, 23, of Santa Clara, Calif., walked into the mosque, flanked by his comrades. Unarmed, bleary-eyed Iraqi soldiers greeted him and called for their commander, Maj. Saad Khalid Fetlawi, who wore a red beret.

DOJ_NMG_0115691

Futrell asked him for 10 Iraqi soldiers to help search the targeted houses. Fetlawi immediately agreed and ordered his men to report for duty. As he waited, Fetlawi said he had heard that the United States was sending thousands of extra troops.

"This is good news. We have a weak government and a weak army. We need training, we need more equipment," Fetlawi said. "We need the Americans to help us go forward. Iraqi army soldiers are not ready to do all this themselves. At the moment, 20,000 is a good number to help us to bring security."

His soldiers came out with old, rusting AK-47 assault rifles and mismatched uniforms. One soldier wore baby blue running shoes with his beige camouflage gear. Some wore black masks so they wouldn't be recognized in the community. Another soldier tucked silver shears into his chest strap.

"This is one of the more squared-away units," Hill said.

"That's something," quipped Merrell, looking at the soldier with the shears. "The Iraqis are always ready to prune a good hedge."

"Okay," barked Hill, looking at the Iraqis. "You guys will lead out."

They walked around the corner, onto a narrow, unpaved street with two-story houses. Residents watched from their walled yards as the Iraqi soldiers politely knocked on the doors of the targeted houses. They went in, followed by the Apache Company troops.

Inside one house, an Iraqi soldier walked up to Reynoso. He had found two AK-47 magazine clips. By law, the family can own only one. The Iraqi soldier asked Reynoso what he should do.

"I am not going to tell you what to do," Reynoso said, clearly trying to wean the soldier from depending on him. "It is against the law, but it is up to you to decide."

The Iraqi soldier smiled. Then, he handed back the magazine clip to a member of the family.

In another house, an Iraqi soldier asked whom he should take orders from, the Americans or his Iraqi squad leader.

"I'll tell your squad leader what to do, and he will tell his squad what to do," replied Sgt. Justin Mongol, 25, of New Market, Va., as Joey translated.

After nearly a half-hour, the soldiers had not unearthed a single weapon. Futrell asked Joey to see whether they were near Mahanara School, as the informant had told them. They weren't. They were near Imam Ali School.

The houses they were meant to search were in another section of Hurriyah.

Some of the American soldiers were angry. They had wasted their time and put their lives at risk.

"Are we even in Hurriyah?" Mongol demanded.

"We're chasing a ghost," Hill said.

They returned to the mosque and asked Fetlawi for a map of Hurriyah.

"I have no map of the place. I came here two days ago," he said.

Still, Fetlawi made a call and was able to find the correct school. He dispatched a pickup truck with his men to guide the U.S. soldiers.

Inside the Stryker, Lake fumed: "A debacle," he declared.

"Same old bull. . . ," Caldwell said, using an expletive.No Help Without Orders

The Stryker stopped along a main street in Hurriyah.

The soldiers walked into a compound, the base of the Iraqi army unit in charge of a nearby checkpoint. The targeted house was across the street. And Futrell needed the help of Sgt. Ahmed Faisal. He needed some of his men to help raid the house.

Faisal refused.

"Our duty is only at this checkpoint, not inside the sector," Faisal said. "We can't send any men with you. I can't work without orders."

So the Americans crossed the street and searched the two-story house. They examined a red trunk on the roof and dug through a pile of sand. No weapons. "I think it's a dry hole," Mongol said, with disappointment.

Inside the Stryker, as it headed back to the base, the soldiers of Apache Company wondered whether they had been given false information by their Iraqi army contact. "They know things we don't," Lake said, repeating what he had said on the way to Hurriyah.

DOJ_NMG_0115692

"That's why we're still here. That's why we will be here for years."

U.S. Expects New Reliability From Iraqi Forces (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush's plan to secure Iraq by committing 21,500 more U.S. troops rests on a shaky foundation: the Iraqi military.

Recent reports by the Pentagon and the Government Accountability Office (GAO) say Iraqi security forces, primarily the military and police, suffer from a lack of training, supplies and availability.

Though 322,600 Iraqi security personnel had been trained and equipped by last month, "the number of present-for-duty soldiers and police is much lower," according to a Pentagon progress report released in December. That's because so many Iraqi troops are on scheduled leave, are absent without leave or have left the service entirely, the report says.

Things will change under the new plan, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said Thursday. Two Iraqi troops will join each U.S. soldier under the plan to secure Baghdad, he said.

How much the Iraqi military can be relied upon to provide the manpower, however, is uncertain. The Iraqi government promised six battalions last summer to help secure Baghdad; only two showed up.

The United States has had to adjust its plans to reduce troop levels in Iraq at least three times since 2004 because of the Iraqis' inability to provide security, a GAO study released Tuesday says.

Although U.S. forces transferred security responsibilities to the Iraqis, "overall security conditions in Iraq have continued to deteriorate and have grown more complex," says the report by GAO, Congress' investigative arm.

The Iraqis must follow through this time, Defense Secretary Robert Gates said Thursday. "American patience is limited," he said. The United States will revisit its strategy if the Iraqis don't deliver on their new promises, he said.

Among key elements of the Baghdad plan, according to Pace:

•An Iraqi commander will oversee security of all of Baghdad, which will be divided into nine districts. Each district will have an Iraqi brigade supported by a U.S. battalion. U.S. brigades have 3,500 to 5,000 troops; a battalion has about 700 to 1,000 troops.

•All allied forces in Baghdad — the Iraqi army and police, and U.S. and coalition troops — will be based at three or four police stations in each sector. They'll mount daily patrols, perform door-to-door work and provide a presence to help develop security.

•Quick-reaction forces based at the police stations will aid Iraqi forces that encounter trouble.

The recent reports questioned the Iraqi forces' ability to handle their assigned roles.

The Pentagon report said the Iraqi army's inability to plan and deliver supplies to its troops means it will continue to "rely heavily" on U.S. quick-reaction forces.

The Pentagon report also said sectarian militias had infiltrated the Iraqi police units that the plan counts on for security.

The militias often dominate large sections of Baghdad. In the past, the Iraqi government has prevented U.S. troops from operating in those neighborhoods, such as the Shiite area called Sadr City. Gates told the House Armed Services Committee that Iraq's government will now allow coalition forces to operate in all neighborhoods.

There are about 42,000 Iraqi security forces and 24,000 U.S. troops now in Baghdad, Pace said. The president's plan would add 17,500 U.S. troops in the capital. Four thousand Marines will be added in Anbar province west of Baghdad, the heart of a Sunni-based insurgency.

The boost is coming too late, Armed Services Chairman Ike Skelton, D-Mo., told Gates. "The time for a so-called surge in troop numbers was back in 2003," he said.

Earlier Thursday, Gates told a White House briefing that the troop increase is considered "temporary," but "I think no one has a really clear idea of how long that might be."

Gates told the committee he favored adding 65,000 soldiers and 27,000 Marines to the military. Over five years, the Army would grow to 547,000 soldiers and the Marine Corps to 202,000 troops.

DOJ_NMG_0115693

Sales Job Kicks Off For Bush Iraq Plan (USAT)

By David Jackson And Bill Nichols

USA Today, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — The White House is embarking on a weekend campaign to sell President Bush's new Iraq strategy to the nation amid fierce criticism from Democrats and some Republicans on Capitol Hill.

President Bush will appear Sunday on CBS' 60 Minutes, which airs after an NFL playoff game. Vice President Cheney will appear on Fox News Sunday to defend the plan to boost U.S. troop levels by 21,500.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice leaves today on a week-long trip to the Middle East and Europe to brief U.S. allies on the plan.

White House spokesman Tony Snow, who held interviews with radio and television hosts Thursday, said the communications plan will continue in coming weeks.

Snow and others said the strategy is aimed at several distinct audiences, including Congress, servicemembers, Iraqis and other Middle Eastern countries, as well as the American public. "This is something the president will do on an ongoing basis," White House communications director Kevin Sullivan said. "We'll do it in a lot of different ways."

Bush told about 300 soldiers and family members at Fort Benning in Georgia on Thursday that Americans must brace for more violence in the short term as insurgents resist the additional troops.

"The American people have got to understand that suicide bombings won't stop immediately," Bush said. "Yet over time, we can expect to see positive results."

In Congress, Bush's plan, which he unveiled in a prime-time speech Wednesday, found few supporters in a day of combative appearances by Rice and Defense Secretary Robert Gates. As Rice briefed the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Nebraska Republican Chuck Hagel, a Vietnam War veteran, said Bush's strategy was "the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam, if it's carried out."

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., plans to introduce a resolution next week expressing disapproval of Bush's plan and possibly force senators to make a non-binding vote for or against it.

"In choosing to escalate the war, the president stands virtually alone," Reid said.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., and other Republicans defended the plan. McConnell threatened to block the resolution.

Democratic leaders in the House remain undecided on when a vote might be held on the new policy. Hearings in the House are set for next Wednesday.

Poll: Americans Oppose Iraq Troop Surge (AP)

By Nancy Benac

AP, January 12, 2007

Seventy percent of Americans oppose sending more troops to Iraq, according to a new poll that provides a devastatingly blunt response to President Bush's plan to bolster military forces there.

All sides in the Iraq debate are keenly aware of mounting public dissatisfaction with the situation: Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday it's one thing on which all Americans — including administration officials — are united.

Yet the Associated Press-Ipsos poll found widespread disagreement with the Bush administration over its proposed solution, and growing skepticism that the United States made the right decision in going to war in the first place.

Just as 70 percent of Americans oppose sending more troops to Iraq, a like number don't think such an increase would help stabilize the situation there, the poll suggested. When asked to name the most important problem facing the U.S., 38 percent of those polled volunteered war, up significantly from 24 percent three months ago.

The AP-Ipsos telephone survey of 1,002 adults was conducted Monday through Wednesday night, when the president made his speech calling for an increase in troops. News had already surfaced before the polling period that Bush planned to boost U.S. forces in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0115694

The public's concern over Iraq was a prominent topic on Capitol Hill on Thursday as legislators reacted to the president's plan to increase troop levels by 21,500.

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph Biden, D-Del., harked back to the Vietnam War as he warned Rice that any solution to the Iraq problem must have public support. "They've got to sign on," he told her.

Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., told Rice: "You are not listening to the American people. ... And you wonder why there is a dark cloud of skepticism and pessimism over this nation."

But Republican Sen. John McCain of Arizona said it would be an oversimplification to think that people just want the United States out of Iraq.

"They're understandably frustrated, they're understandably saddened," he said. "But if you can show the American people that there is a way forward to success, and also describe to them the consequences of failure, I believe this policy can be supported."

Iraq is a drag on Bush's overall job approval rating, too. That rating is at 32 percent in the latest survey, a new low in AP-Ipsos polling.

Just 35 percent of Americans think it was right for the United States to go to war, another record low in AP polling and a reversal from two years ago when two-thirds of Americans thought it was the correct move. Sixty percent, meanwhile, think it is unlikely that a stable, democratic Iraqi government will be established.

Democrats are far more inclined to oppose an increase of troops, with 87 percent against the idea, compared with 42 percent of Republicans.

Opposition to boosting troop levels is highest in the Northeast, where 79 percent of those surveyed were against the idea. That compares with 68 percent in the South and 67 percent in the Midwest and West.

The survey had a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

In Pennsylvania, President's Plan Draws Mixed Responses And Hardens Opinions (NYT)

By Ian Urbina

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

CLIFTON HEIGHTS, Pa., Jan. 11 — Hunched over a beer with a crowd of other veterans at the American Legion here Thursday, Rocco Polidoro was sure of one thing: President Bush's plan to send some 20,000 more troops to Iraq would only make matters worse.

"What I don't understand is who the president is listening to," said Mr. Polidoro, a lifelong Republican who, like a majority in this Republican district, voted for an antiwar Democrat in the last election. "If vets, military brass, the Baker committee, the international community and now most voters say it's time to get out, then in my view it's time to get out."

Frustrated by mounting deaths of United States soldiers in Iraq, voters in this former mill town wedged between more liberal Philadelphia and more conservative rural areas, responded to the president's plan with feelings ranging from outrage and resignation to guarded skepticism and qualified support.

In warning Americans of the risks of withdrawing too early, Mr. Bush, in his speech on Wednesday night, seemed to harden opinions rather than change minds here just two months after a resounding Democratic election victory was seen as a rejection of his Iraq policy.

"It's one thing to be steadfast and another to be stubborn," said Rick Lacey, another Republican at the Legion hall who voted for a Democrat in the last election. "A guy like McCain, I don't agree with him on this troop increase issue, but he is steadfast because he bases his decisions on experience. Our president, he bases it on ideology and being stubborn."

Carlos Figueroa, a chef and Vietnam veteran from Villanova, said he would prefer to see an even larger increase in troop numbers. "The biggest concern I have is about morale of the troops over there," Mr. Figueroa said, "and I think that by sending even larger numbers we would get the place under control and help boost spirits of our folks and Iraqis."

But other supporters of the president's decision said they were left with an unsettling sense that the troop increase was part of a broader approach lacking in clear goals and a concrete exit plan.

DOJ_NMG_0115695

"I do think increasing troops may make sense because if you go to war, you go to win," said John Carson, 71, a Democrat and Korean War veteran who was getting a trim at the A Cut barbershop in Bensalem, a Bucks County town in another conservative Congressional district that swung to an antiwar Democrat in November. Were he on the front lines, Mr. Carson said, he, too, would hope to get all the help available. "But the terms have to be clear," he added. "What milestones? When will we get out? What is our limit?"

Standing near a statue of Uncle Sam riding a bicycle, Hugh Morrow, 64, a Republican who served in Vietnam and who owns the barbershop, intervened.

"Now, wait a minute," Mr. Morrow said, turning off his clippers. "The guy keeps digging us deeper and deeper into this mess — why not start pulling us out now?"

At Mary Jeffery's house, also in Bensalem, the conversation among 10 Democrats who had gathered to watch Mr. Bush's speech erupted into a heated free-for-all when one asked whether Democrats in Congress actually had the authority and the spine to block the president's plan.

"Of course they do," said Ms. Jeffery, a Democrat whose son is stationed in Cyprus.

"It's not too late for impeachment," someone yelled from the back of the room.

"Congressional hearings will apply pressure, we have to apply pressure," another person said, adding that the long-term solution was to reinstate the draft. Others suggested staging street protests and encouraging soldiers to refuse to serve.

"Look," interrupted John Daily, 46, a Navy veteran. "If the president wants to send troops, he has the constitutional power to do it."

"I don't know that cutting off funding is a fair thing to do to the troops," he added, as the room fell silent.

In Washington, while Senate Democrats condemned Mr. Bush's proposal and promised a nonbinding vote on it, and House Democrats threatened to limit financing for the president's plan, Republican lawmakers faced either breaking with Mr. Bush or embracing an unpopular policy just as the 2008 race for the White House picks up.

Virtually everywhere across these districts, talk of what Mr. Bush's plan means in relation to the last election quickly moved to speculation about the next.

"The pressure is actually on the Democrats now to prove that when given the chance to make a difference they take the opportunity," said Bill Lewis, 66, a Vietnam veteran, at a shopping mall in Springfield. "We had a 70 percent turnout for the first time in years here in Delaware County with a lot of independents and Republicans voting Democratic. But those folks won't do that again if the Democrats fail to act."

In national polling by The New York Times and CBS News, the percentage of Americans who say the United States did the right thing in taking military action in Iraq dropped to 38 percent last week from a high of 64 percent in December 2003.

And many voters here said the war was playing an increasingly important role in how they voted, even beyond party affiliation.

"I'm as devout a Democrat as they come," Mr. Daily said. "But if we are still in the war in two years and a Republican candidate for president like Hagel or Brownback is more antiwar than the Democrat, then I will vote Republican." He was referring to Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas, who has formed a presidential exploratory committee, a step that allows him to raise money as he gauges support, and Senator Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, widely mentioned as a possible candidate in 2008.

Some Democrats said the real reason for their anger at the president's decision was that it implied a larger misunderstanding of the problem in Iraq.

"He keeps trying to solve a political problem with a military solution," said Jim Bodnar, 61, who served in the Vietnam War. He said he thought the toppling of Saddam Hussein had inflamed ethnic, regional and religious rivalries that would not be mended by military force. But when he asked what Democrats should do to better address these political problems, Mr. Bodnar paused.

"I'm frustrated," he said, "but I'm not saying there are any easy answers here."

String Of Hopefuls For 2008 Choose Sides In Iraq Plan (WSJ)

By John Harwood

DOJ_NMG_0115696

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

Iraq Debate Clouds 2008 picture.

McCain braces for fallout from troop surge that's smaller than he favored. His Republican presidential rival Romney, hurt by social-issue flip-flops, takes cautious approach with low-key endorsement of more troops.

Dark-horse Brownback gambles by opposing surge, targeting the one-third of Republicans who disapprove of Bush's policy. As liberal groups prepare ads opposing "escalation," new Democratic candidate Dodd pressures Obama and Clinton by praising Kennedy's call to block Bush. "She's worried about the left," says one Democratic Senate colleague of Clinton.

War critic Hagel, saying he may yet enter the Republican race, predicts mounting public protests.

Drug industry aims to hold down score on today's Medicare vote.

While House approval of requiring government negotiations over Medicare prices isn't in doubt, large-scale Republican defections would damp industry hopes of prevailing in Senate. Pharmaceutical lobbyists hope for just 20 Republican renegades; Democrats predict fewer, but Republican leaders warn the number could top 30.

Democratic leaders credit White House for promoting the message that Medicare's benefit has cost less than forecast, though they blame low enrollment. Opponents of negotiation say slowdown in drug spending argues against change; Medicare actuaries join Congressional Budget Office in saying House bill won't save taxpayer money.

Democrats seek to isolate Republicans with narrow tax-increase targets.

House Speaker Pelosi identifies $500,000 earners -- a more exclusive group than party leaders have previously targeted -- as source of revenue for cutting middle-class taxes. Imposing pre-Bush 39.6% rate on those with incomes over $500,000 would raise more than $85 billion over four years, Tax Policy Center estimates.

White House sees any tax increases heightening Democrats' vulnerability. Crediting Bush cuts with fueling growth, ranking Senate Finance Committee Republican Grassley asks, "Why would they want to kill the goose that laid the golden egg?"

"The upper-class squeeze -- now that's an issue Republicans can run on," taunts former Bill Clinton aide Bruce Reed.

PRESIDENTIAL PRIORITY? Former Clinton aide Dan Tarullo says Bush must "become personally involved" to restart Doha trade talks. Though Bush's negotiating authority expires in June, trade representative Schwab says "content will dictate over chronology" in talks with Europe, Brazil and India.

PENNY-WISE? Rice may speak on Afghanistan on coming overseas trip, while State and Pentagon team up to seek $6 billion for added Afghan troop training, border protection, road building and other projects. But they face pushback from Bush budgeteers, who aim to cut those figures in half.

BUSH AIDES BLAME television networks for audio problems during president's Iraq speech. "The feed went out of here clean," a spokesman says. Bush will keep relatively low-profile on Iraq next week as he wraps up budget decisions and Jan. 23 State of the Union speech.

JUDICIAL POLARIZATION? Memory of late U.S. Supreme Court Chief Justice Rehnquist divides Middlebury College in Vermont after professorship is named for him. "Rehnquist had the opportunity to grant civil rights to African-Americans and gays and lesbians, and he consistently used that power to deny them," Kevin Moss, professor of Russian, tells the student newspaper. Faculty votes 52-43 for resolution affirming commitment to diversity.

WHITE HOUSE BATTLES Democratic resistance on judges.

Despite withdrawal of four conservative nominees, Democrats say Bush is still playing hardball. California Sen. Feinstein fumes after Bush ignores her and Sen. Boxer in renominating Randy Smith of Idaho for a Ninth Circuit appeals-court seat traditionally held by a Californian.

Conservative dominance on Virginia-based Fourth Circuit, which has three vacancies, is at risk. Freshman Democratic Sen. Webb objects to some candidates proposed by Republican Sen. Warner; the Virginia colleagues meet to discuss working together on judges.

Democrats seek records from Fifth District appointee Leslie Southwick's service in Reagan White House at time of Bork's Supreme Court nomination.

MINOR MEMOS: Democratic Congress makes Rep. Oberstar chairman of House transportation panel and burnishes memory of his late boss and predecessor John Blatnik; Mr. Oberstar takes Blatnik's portrait from storage to hang in committee hearing room. ... Cheering union allies, Democrats rename House Education and the Workforce Committee to Education and Labor.

DOJ_NMG_0115697

Wartime Linguistics (LAT)

By Frank Luntz

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2007

NOT SINCE THE frigid days of the Cold War have so many people parsed the lexicon of a world leader. Americans tuned in Wednesday night to hear the president's plan for a "new way forward" in Iraq. We also tuned in to be convinced and reassured that President Bush was the right man to execute that plan.

The speech was a clear attempt to draw a distinct line between the past and the future. The president addressed head-on the most common attacks on him and his administration, countering "inflexible," "unrealistic" and "incompetent" — three words pollsters like myself have heard from an angry electorate for more than a year — with "adjust" and "change," "scrutiny," "responsibility" and, again and again, "our new strategy." Speaking from the White House library, a different setting befitting a different strategy, the president attempted to make the case that things in Iraq were going to be different from now on.

The problem is, for most Americans it is too little and too late.

In the president's own words:

"Our past efforts to secure Baghdad failed…. "

True enough, but Americans had already figured that out. Now they are asking themselves why it took him so long. The rising troop death toll, the increasingly cruel and inhumane violence by Iraqis against Iraqis and the steady stream of graphic videos belie this attempt at linguistic minimization.

"There were not enough Iraqi and American troops…. And there were too many restrictions on the troops we did have."

These two sentences, while seemingly straightforward, may well become the most important of the entire speech. Americans have been told repeatedly that the commanders and troops would be given everything they need to win the war. Apparently, even the president now admits that wasn't the case.

"We will give our commanders and civilians greater flexibility to spend funds for economic assistance."

Given the unemployment in our own Rust Belt, Bush's jobs program for Iraq forces deficit-conscious Americans to choose between U.S. security and Iraqi security, between American economic development and Iraqi economic development. For most Americans, that choice is a no-brainer.

"We will double the number of provincial reconstruction teams … to help local Iraqi communities pursue reconciliation."

Reconciliation? It surely is an admirable long-term goal, but before you can break bread together, you first have to stop killing each other. For two years, we've been treated to horrific videos of mass sectarian violence. The picture conjured by "reconciliation" doesn't match anything that is in our visual databank.

"To empower local leaders, Iraqis plan to hold provincial elections…. "

We all remember with pride the purple fingers defiantly waving in the air last year. But if you asked Americans (and probably Iraqis as well) which is a higher priority, they'd wish for peace and calm ahead of another trip to the ballot box.

Not all of the speech was miscast. There were several examples of credibility-building passages and real-life references that will be well received by the American masses.

"A democratic Iraq will not be perfect. But it will be a country that fights terrorists instead of harboring them."

This is the most tangible reference to a genuine benefit that Americans can appreciate and share, regardless of ideological persuasion. It is a fact that we haven't had a successful terrorist attack on American soil since 9/11. Although many Democrats would deny him any credit, the president does still earn positive marks for the aggressive prosecution of the war on terror.

"If we increase our support at this crucial moment … we can hasten the day our troops begin coming home." Finally, a nod to an end to the conflict. What has been missing from the Bush rhetoric for more than a year is the proverbial light at the end of the tunnel — a chance for Americans to put the war behind them and focus on a more hopeful future.

DOJ_NMG_0115698

If the president had his verbal ups and downs, the Democrats' response wasn't brilliant rhetoric either. They should probably consider themselves fortunate that the networks didn't want to delay or preempt even a minute of fare such as "Deal or No Deal." Their stringent rhetoric and unwillingness to compromise highlights their continued inability to put forward a comprehensive, credible alternative.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's spokesperson told USA Today that her boss would subject Bush's proposal to "harsh scrutiny." Words like "examination" or "accountability" would have been a more objective and less political approach for a party desperate to demonstrate that it isn't too partisan or too negative.

Similarly, "We're not going to baby-sit a civil war" — Sen. Barack Obama's sound bite — ignores widespread American concern that a civil war today could spin into a regional war tomorrow, with worldwide consequences. The image of "baby-sitting" lacks the gravitas that a conflict that has taken thousands of American lives, and tens of thousands of Iraqi lives, deserves.

In times of war, the American people have the right to expect a president who is straight with them linguistically, whether he's delivering good news or bad news, and an opposition party that uses words to unite and explain rather than divide and attack. Too bad we haven't had enough of either.

Surge Towards Debacle In Iraq And MidEast (FT)

Financial Times, January 12, 2007

George W. Bush's new direction in Iraq is certainly not a strategy for victory, whatever that word, which is used ever more desperately by the US president, now means. It may be one last heave. It may be a cover for US withdrawal. But two things are quite clear.

Right now, Mr Bush has the support of no more than one in four Americans for this so-called surge of an extra 20,000 or so troops. Very soon, as the already indecipherable ethnic and sectarian patchwork of Iraq is pulled further and even more bloodily to pieces, he will have none.

Second, this policy will not succeed in fixing an Iraq traumatised by tyranny and war and then broken by invasion and occupation. But it may end with the US "surging" into Iran – and taking the Middle East to a new level of mayhem that will spill into nearby regions and western capitals.

Mr Bush's body language in the speech bespoke a chastened man. Yet, caught in a wilfully spun web of delusion and denial, he seems still unable to comprehend the depths of the debacle he has caused in Iraq.

Iraq has reached advanced societal breakdown, with ethnic cleansing on a regional, neighbourhood and even street-by-street basis. There has been a mass exodus of its professionals and managers, civil servants and entrepreneurs, a haemorrhage of its future. The time for the occupying authorities to have surged was 2003, after the fall of Baghdad; like everything they have tried since, this is far too little, much too late. The US deployed a similar number of troops last summer to "lock down" Baghdad, since when the number of killed in the capital alone has rocketed to more than 100 a day, while on average an attack occurs against Anglo-American forces every 10 minutes, and this in a fight now mainly between the minority Sunni deposed from power and the hitherto dispossessed Shia majority drunk with it.

It is hard, even for ardent democrats, to see this Iraq as a young democracy fighting for its life, as Mr Bush's discourse of good guys against bad guys would have it. The invasion has solidified a system divided into sects and operating on the basis of patronage and intimidation. The composition of parliament is nearly two thirds Islamist. There are no institutions. Ministries are sectarian booty and factional bastions. The one institution that did more or less survive Saddam Hussein, the national army, was disbanded by the occupation and current attempts to reconstitute it have failed to move beyond rebadged militia. The three brigades the Shia-dominated government of Nuri al-Maliki has promised to add to the five extra US brigades are mostly Peshmerga – Kurdish militiamen – adding another account to be settled once the Americans withdraw.

What is still, in spite of Mr Bush's attempts to dress it up, an essentially military strategy is just not credible. The US army is not designed to deal with insurgency and, in any case, does not have the troops to master one on this scale – especially if its own masters are planning to open a new front.

DOJ_NMG_0115699

It has failed to control the insurgency in the Sunni triangle – a rebellion by a minority of the minority. Now it aims to confront Moqtada al-Sadr, the Shia radical, and his 60,000-strong Mahdi army, in a fight that could set fire to east Baghdad and south Iraq, where British troops could easily be enveloped in the flames.

The contradiction at the heart of the US approach, however, is this: after casually overturning the Sunni order in Iraq and empowering the Shia in an Arab heartland country for the first time in nearly a millennium, Washington took fright at the way this had enlarged the power of the Shia Islamist regime in Iran. Now, while dependent on Tehran-aligned forces in Baghdad, and unable to dismantle the Sunni Jihadistan it has created in western Iraq, the US is trying to put together an Arab Sunni alliance against Iran. This is a fiasco with the fuel to combust into a region-wide conflagration.

The only feasible way forward is the approach of the bipartisan Baker-Hamilton commission – which the new US Congress should embrace and insist on.

This would make support for the Iraqi government and army conditional on their real effort to promote national reconciliation, which would in turn, as it progressed, be rewarded with billions of dollars in long-term aid from the US and Iraq's neighbours. This external support – from Turkey to Saudi Arabia and Iran to Syria – would be built up within a wide-ranging diplomatic offensive in the region that would include Tehran and Damascus. Mr Bush is instead threatening to expand the war.

"Iran is providing material support for attacks on American troops" he said on Wednesday. "We will disrupt the attacks on our forces. We will interrupt the flow of support from Iran and Syria." The Iraq surge is beginning to look like the Vietnam escalation, spilling over into Iran and Syria the way that one did into Cambodia and Laos.

Mr Bush is right to argue that defeat in Iraq would be very serious. He is wrong in failing to recognise defeat is what he is staring at – and that this approach will help guarantee it.

Why Bush's War Plan Can Work (CSM)

By Mackubin Thomas Owens

The Christian Science Monitor, January 12, 2007

NEWPORT, R.I.

The strategy that the president outlined Wednesday night does not represent an altogether new approach to Iraq, but a necessary adaptation of the previous strategy to changed circumstances. It is, in effect, an updating of the National Strategy for Victory in Iraq he issued in November 2005.

President Bush's prime-time address acknowledged the shortcomings of past efforts to secure Baghdad. And he implied that this new effort to do so represents a final opportunity to salvage victory in Iraq. Failure in Iraq, he warned, would be a disaster. But Mr. Bush's plan can work.

Strategy is the interplay of ends, ways, and means. Strategic thinking implies limited means. There are never enough resources to achieve all goals, so choices must be made concerning how best to apply limited resources.

In the case of Iraq, America's strategic goal is a "unified democratic federal Iraq that can govern itself, defend itself, sustain itself, and is an ally in the war on terror." The key to achieving this strategic goal is to provide security for the Iraqi people. This, in turn, requires defeating the insurgents.

Until February of last year, the key to victory was the defeat of the Sunni insurgency centered in Anbar Province. This took the form of a campaign to destroy the Sunni insurgency by depriving it of its base in the Sunni Triangle and its "ratlines" - the infiltration routes that run from the Syrian border into the heart of Iraq. The operational concept was "clear and hold."

No force can continue to fight if it is deprived of sanctuary and logistics support. Accordingly, the central goal of the US strategy before February 2006 was to destroy the ratlines following the Euphrates and Tigris rivers.

This campaign began in November 2004 with the takedown of Fallujah. Wresting Fallujah from the jihadis was critically important: Control of the town had given them crucial infrastructure to attack Iraqi and coalition targets.

The loss of Fallujah didn't cause the insurgency to collapse, but it did deprive the rebels of an indispensable sanctuary.

The coalition continued a high tempo of offensive operations. Although successful in many respects, these operations seemed like the "Whac-A-Mole" arcade game: towns were cleared of insurgents, but because of limited manpower, they could not be held. Insurgents returned once coalition forces moved on.

DOJ_NMG_0115700

In February 2006, when Sunni extremists destroyed the Shiite mosque in Samarra, sectarian violence exploded, especially in Baghdad. American and Iraqi troops had to redeploy to confront the new threat, and in doing so, the gains that had been achieved against the Sunni insurgents were lost.

The new plan is a response to these changing conditions. The main reason for the so-called surge is to provide enough troops to provide security for Baghdad while regaining the initiative against the Sunni fighters in Anbar. It also recognizes that the Shiite militias causing most of the deaths in Baghdad must be neutralized.

It includes not only a military component but political and economic elements, as well. The adage - to defeat an insurgency, "win the hearts and minds" of the people - is true. But to do that, the people must have security. And to achieve security, it is often necessary to kill and capture the insurgents. Thus, military success is a necessary, if not sufficient, cause for defeating an insurgency.

This point is illustrated by an objective analysis of the Vietnam War. As Mark Moyar demonstrates in his remarkable new book, "Triumph Forsaken," the government of Ngo Dinh Diem had broken the communist insurgency in South Vietnam by 1960 by killing and capturing communist cadres in unprecedented number, leading many survivors to defect to the government's side. And in his book, "A Better War," Lewis Sorley shows how the US did the same in the late 1960s and 1970s.

Will Bush's approach work? This depends on at least three factors. The first is the adequacy of the force. Many commentators have called for troop increases of 40,000 to 50,000, but 20,000, which Bush called for, is the maximum number that can be culled from the current force. In any case, the key to success is not the number of troops but how they are used.

The second factor is the Iraqi government. Until now, the Shiite militias have been off limits. That has to change, and Bush put Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki on notice that this is the case.

The third factor is Congress. Would the Democrats rather see Bush lose or the US win? Let us hope that the Demo-crats take the wise counsel of one of their own, Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, who reminded us the other day that the stark choice in Iraq is between victory and defeat.

'Unity Of Effort' (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

Immediately after the president's speech, House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer said, "I heard nothing new." Nothing? When Gen. David Petraeus takes command of U.S. forces in Iraq, it will mark the start of an historic turn in military strategy in Iraq and perhaps in U.S. war-fighting doctrine.

The U.S.'s primary problem in Iraq, manifest across 2006, has been an urban insurgency in a 30-mile radius around Baghdad and in Anbar province. The Petraeus command is the overdue beginning of the counterinsurgency.

This isn't a one-off effort as at Fallujah, but counterinsurgency as daily U.S. military policy. It is the product of an enormous amount of self-criticism and analysis done by military and civilian analysts in and out of government. It does not mean, as often suggested the past 24 hours, that 20,000 U.S. troops are now going to run out and look for gun battles with insurgents in back alleys.

In broadest outline, the plan divides Baghdad into nine districts, essentially neighborhoods. The job of providing daily security in each district will be undertaken by an Iraqi army brigade of several thousand soldiers, a U.S. support battalion of up to 1,000 troops, and most importantly, about 20 U.S. military "embeds" or advisers.

Some of us predicted late last year that advisory embeds would be part of the new Bush strategy on reading National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley's November memo of advice to the president in the New York Times. After a late November trip to Iraq, Mr. Hadley said four times in the memo that the U.S. should embed coalition forces with Iraq's army and dysfunctional police.

The source of this idea, in part, was a successful Marine experiment in Anbar province. Rather than attach just a single U.S. military adviser to an Iraqi commander at the division level, the Marines put advisers alongside Iraqi units down to the NCO level. They stayed with and fought with their Iraqi counterparts 24/7. And the Marines reported that the Iraqis fought with more confidence and effect, aka spine-stiffening.

DOJ_NMG_0115701

In 2004, a similar but broader effort at integration between U.S. and Iraqi forces was planned in Anbar province by Marine Maj. Gen. James Mattis. The Mattis plan is summarized in the middle of the Army's new Counterinsurgency Manual, released just last month. The manual's drafting was overseen by Gen. David Petraeus, who will now direct the U.S. military effort in the neighborhoods of Baghdad. It's not a coincidence. The manual describes in detail the purpose, theory, tactics and problems (including spikes in violence and casualties) likely to emerge during the new counterinsurgency strategy.

At the end of the manual there is a bibliography of books, studies and articles on fighting insurgency. It includes classics, such as Alistair Horne's "A Savage War of Peace," but what's interesting is how many of them were published since 2003, amid the Iraq war. Out of this effort has emerged a "best practices" for the U.S. when fighting an insurgency, as now.

Whether the U.S. should have done this back when Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and his foreign suicide bombers emerged is a legitimate question. The point is this: The Iraq violence has not been running like an untended open hydrant. Some of our best and brightest have been thinking hard about how to shut the valve. Last month AEI released a plan reflecting similar counterinsurgency ideas by military specialist Fred Kagan and the Army's former vice chief of staff, Gen. Jack Keane.

In November, the Bush administration joined the rethinking. The participants in that process looked at the whole range of criticisms and formal critiques of what the U.S. had been doing in Iraq to that point. They concluded the one thing that wouldn't change is the goal, mainly establishing a democratic government in Iraq. What would change, heretofore a nonsubject, were the strategic concept and the level of resources.

Some of this came out of Gen. Petraeus's Counterinsurgency Manual, some from U.S. commanders in the field and some from the military think tanks. Suggestions that had gotten a "no" before, now got a "yes."

Is it all a day late and a dollar short? Maybe. Some 20,000 more troops may be insufficient. The inevitable front-page casualty reports and blood-soaked photos may still drain the will of domestic pundits. But what we are seeing in the Petraeus command is the kind of step back that the military sometimes excels at. This the U.S. military at its potential best -- remaking itself, as it did with the transition to training a volunteer army after Vietnam.

It is not the least bit obvious that this counterinsurgency plan will fail, and only the most churlishly neurotic Bush hater would want it to. The stakes for the region and the war on terror have been described many times. There is another reason: How this ends will have an important effect on the morale of our officer corps, the people who must summon the gumption to protect us. They deserve a final chance to succeed. This is the chance.

An idea one finds in the counterinsurgency literature, crucial to the success of any such strategy, is known as "unity of effort." Basically, it means all oars pulling in the same direction. The Iraqi government, for instance, has told the U.S. it will stop interfering in the military's rules of engagement. Tuesday's victorious 10-hour battle on Baghdad's Haifa Street, by a combined U.S.-Iraqi force, looked like a successful test of unified effort. It remains to discover whether anything resembling unity of effort can be achieved along Constitution Avenue.

Nothing would more raise the tenor of this debate than if some member of the Democratic Party would take ownership of the subject of military doctrine in Iraq. On the evidence of their statements the past 24 hours, barely a Democrat exists with has a clue of what Gen. Petraeus is about to do or why.

Sen. Barack Obama, presidential second-runner, said, "We are not going to babysit a civil war." Democrats will get a chance soon at Senate confirmation hearings to question Gen. Petraeus. Babysitter is not the word he brings to mind. His appointment is the result of a ferment in American military thinking on Iraq that goes well past George Bush "alone." They should hear him out before deciding whether to support this effort, or remain in the opposition.

Bush's Iraq Plan, Between The Lines (NYT)

By Anthony H. Cordesman

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

PRESIDENT BUSH has presented a new strategy for the war in Iraq that he feels can reverse the country's drift toward large-scale civil war. The new plan focuses on stabilizing Baghdad by adding thousands of American troops with newly expanded powers to take on Shiite as well as Sunni rebels. It also includes a limited increase in United States forces in Anbar

DOJ_NMG_0115702

Province, and calls for Iraqi forces to take formal control of the security mission in November. The president was refreshingly candid, saying that "where mistakes have been made, the responsibility rests with me."

But taken as a whole, the speech raised more questions than it answered. I've selected a number of important phrases from the address that beg for more detailed discussion, and included my own analysis of the validity and practicality of what the president seems to have in mind.

Anthony H. Cordesman is a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

Five Flaws In The President's Plan (WP)

By Zbigniew Brzezinski

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

The president's speech gives rise to five broad observations:

Â· It provided a more realistic analysis of the situation in Iraq than any previous presidential statement. It acknowledged failure, though it dodged accountability for that failure by the standard device of assuming personal responsibility. Its language was less Islamophobic than has been customary with President Bush's rhetoric since Sept. 11, though the president still could not resist the temptation to engage in a demagogic oversimplification of the challenge the United States faces in Iraq, calling it a struggle to safeguard "a young democracy" against extremists and an effort to protect American society from terrorists. Both propositions are more than dubious.

Â· The commitment of 21,500 more troops is a political gimmick of limited tactical significance and of no strategic benefit. It is insufficient to win the war militarily. It will engage U.S. forces in bloody street fighting that will not resolve with finality the ongoing turmoil and the sectarian and ethnic strife, not to mention the anti-American insurgency.

Â· The decision to escalate the level of the U.S. military involvement while imposing "benchmarks" on the "sovereign" Iraqi regime, and to emphasize the external threat posed by Syria and Iran, leaves the administration with two options once it becomes clear -- as it almost certainly will -- that the benchmarks are not being met. One option is to adopt the policy of "blame and run": i.e., to withdraw because the Iraqi government failed to deliver. That would not provide a remedy for the dubious "falling dominoes" scenario, which the president so often has outlined as the inevitable, horrific consequence of U.S. withdrawal. The other alternative, perhaps already lurking in the back of Bush's mind, is to widen the conflict by taking military action against Syria or Iran. It is a safe bet that some of the neocons around the president and outside the White House will be pushing for that. Others, such as Sen. Joseph Lieberman, may also favor it.

Â· The speech did not explore even the possibility of developing a framework for an eventual political solution. The search for a political solution would require a serious dialogue about a joint American-Iraqi decision regarding the eventual date of a U.S. withdrawal with all genuine Iraqi political leaders who command respect and wield physical power. The majority of the Iraqi people, opinion polls show, favor such a withdrawal within a relatively short period. A jointly set date would facilitate an effort to engage all of Iraq's neighbors in a serious discussion about regional security and stability. The U.S. refusal to explore the possibility of talks with Iran and Syria is a policy of self-ostracism that fits well into the administration's diplomatic style of relying on sloganeering as a substitute for strategizing.

Â· The speech reflects a profound misunderstanding of our era. America is acting like a colonial power in Iraq. But the age of colonialism is over. Waging a colonial war in the post-colonial age is self-defeating. That is the fatal flaw of Bush's policy.

The writer, who was national security adviser to President Jimmy Carter, is the author of the forthcoming book "Second Chance: Three Presidents and the Crisis of American Superpower."

Criticism Comforts Enemy (USAT)

By Andrew C. Mccarthy And Clifford D. May

USA Today, January 12, 2007

Opponents of President Bush's plan for salvaging the dire situation in Iraq have every right to speak out. And those in Congress who believe it pointless to do anything other than accept defeat have the power to cut off funds.

But the President of the United States has rights and powers as well. He is the commander in chief, and his war-fighting abilities cannot be micro-managed. The president's critics also should consider how their words sound to those dispatching suicide bombers, planting roadside bombs and looking forward to the day they can burn down the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad on CNN and al-Jazeera.

DOJ_NMG_0115703

Skepticism about the new approach is widespread — and not just among Democrats. There are those who fear Bush is not committing enough troops to get the job done. Others worry that the administration's actions won't match Bush's rhetoric. Some say the plan relies too much on Iraqi officials and forces that have proven unreliable.

There are two logical responses: Propose a better way forward, or candidly call for the United States to accept defeat — without trying to spin that as "redeployment" or some other transparent euphemism.

In the end, we don't think most Democrats will want to be in the position of saying they support the troops in Iraq even as they hold back the reinforcements needed to complete their mission.

After the swift toppling of Saddam Hussein's regime, things got tougher. Some leading Democrats have tried to draw a distinction between the war in Iraq (a war they overwhelming favored at the start) and the wider war on terrorism. The distinction was never valid, and today it is less so than ever. Osama bin Laden himself regards Iraq as the central front in al-Qaeda's jihad.

There's no sugarcoating it: A defeat for the United States in Iraq would be a victory for our mortal enemies. It would lead to other defeats for U.S. forces on other battlefields. It would guarantee more terrorism and more dead American citizens.

So scrutinize and criticize, if you must. But then give us a plan to win. Our nation can accept nothing less.

Andrew C. McCarthy is a former federal prosecutor and director of the Foundation for Defense of Democracies' Center for Law & Counterterrorism. Clifford D. May is president of the FDD.

Make Them Fight All Of Us (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

I've heard the president's surge speech, and I have a reaction, an observation and some advice.

My reaction to the president's speech was to recall a line from Bill Maher's book about the war against terrorists: "Make them fight all of us."

Mr. President, you want a surge? I'll surge. I'll surge on the condition that you once and for all enlist the entire American people in this war effort, and stop putting it all on the shoulders of 130,000 military families, and now 20,000 more. I'll surge on the condition that you make them fight all of us — and that means a real energy policy, with a real gasoline tax, that ends our addiction to oil, shrinks the flow of petro-dollars to bad actors and makes America the world's leader in conservation.

But please, Mr. President, stop insulting our intelligence by telling us that this is the "decisive ideological struggle of our time," but we're going to put the whole burden of victory on 150,000 U.S. soldiers. Yes, you're right, confronting violent Islamic radicalism by trying to tilt Iraq and the Arab-Muslim world onto a more progressive track is indeed hugely important. But the way you have fought this war — with our pinky — is contemptible. For three years you would not summon the military means to back your lofty ends.

That led to a vacuum. The Sunnis, who refused to accept majority rule by Shiites, went on a murderous rampage, and that rampage has now metastasized into five different wars in Iraq: Sunnis against Shiites; Sunnis and Shiites against the U.S. "occupiers"; Al Qaeda against the U.S.; Shiite theocratic thugs against ordinary Shiites; and Iran, Syria and all the Arab autocrats against any kind of democratic, Shiite-led Iraq that could be a model for their own people.

Hence my observation: The notion that the only war in Iraq now is good guys versus terrorists is ludicrous. There is no center in Iraq. And when there is no center and you put in more troops, you end up supporting a side. (See Lebanon: 1982)

And now for the advice. At this 11th hour, with Iraq's sectarian fires raging, the only way more U.S. troops might bring stability is if you add two missing elements: a deadline and a floor.

You need to tell Iraqis that by calling for a surge in troops you're giving them one last chance to reconcile, otherwise we're gone by Dec. 1. And you need to tell Americans that you're creating a $45-a-barrel floor price for imported oil, so investors can safely finance alternatives without worrying that they'll be undercut by OPEC.

By not setting a hard date to leave Iraq, we are only putting a floor under bad behavior and allowing Iraqi leaders to pay wholesale, not retail, for their tribal politics. If Sunnis or Shiites want it "all" in Iraq, they have to pay for it all.

DOJ_NMG_0115704

Of course, just leaving would be bad for us and terrible for those Iraqis who have worked with us. We need to give them all U.S. passports. We have a moral responsibility to them. But it would also be bad for a lot of bad people. They would be left to fight it out with each other. And yes, Syria and Iran would "win" Iraq — meaning they'd win the responsibility of managing the mess there or have it spill over on them. Have a nice day.

And by not setting a hard floor price for oil to promote alternative energy, we are only helping to subsidize bad governance by Arab leaders toward their people and bad behavior by Americans toward the climate.

Make them fight all of us, Mr. President, or don't do it at all! If we made ourselves energy independent, we would bring down global oil prices, which would not only shrink the resources for mischief by our enemies and limit Saudi Arabia's ability to transform Islam all over the world into its most intolerant Wahhabi form, but also, more important, would force the Arab world to reform. It would force Arab leaders, including Iraqis, to organize their societies in ways that would tap their people, not just their oil wells — whether our troops were there or not. Also, if the rest of the world saw all of us sacrificing to win this war, we might actually be able to enlist them to help a little.

More troops alone will not suffice. The only tiny hope left of transforming Iraq is if its leaders have to pay the full retail price of their passions and we have to pay the full retail price of our oil. And if even that won't work, then setting a date and setting an oil price will extract us from this disaster and make us less vulnerable to the madness we leave behind.

If we fail in Iraq, at least let America be stronger — by being energy independent — the morning after.

Wisdom From Down The Chain Of Command (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

Rep. Chet Edwards, a middle-of-the-road Texas Democrat who numbers President Bush among his constituents, did not judge the commander in chief's words about Iraq on Wednesday night through the lens of his party affiliation or personal predispositions.

His standard was set by an Army officer who sent the congressman a powerfully honest, thoughtful and sophisticated 3,800-word memo based on the soldier's experiences in Iraq.

With eloquence and urgency, the officer -- Edwards said he agreed not to disclose his identity -- showed how the most important battles in Iraq are not military but political. The officer worries that, despite the heroic efforts of our troops, this aspect of the mission is not going well.

After receiving the soldier's permission, Edwards shared the memo with me on the day of the president's speech. The congressman was not trying to score political points, especially since his informant accepts the goals of the war and writes not a critical word about the president.

Rather, Edwards, who chairs the appropriations subcommittee that deals with military construction and veterans affairs and who represented Fort Hood for 13 years, believes that "younger soldiers, both commissioned and non-commissioned," can often provide more candid testimony than higher-ups constrained in their ability to present "bad news."

For this officer, winning entails getting the politics right in Iraq at both the local and national levels. Locally, he says, our military has enjoyed considerable success. But he's worried about the will and capacity of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to take on the Shiite militias.

"Our real goal," he wrote, "was to persuade our Iraqi friends and allies to actively and publicly support us . . . to help us tip the balance of public opinion in our favor." That meant helping them with security and "civil works projects" and giving them "prestige by showing publicly that our commander listened to their advice."

Then these shrewd words: "We discovered that we were not fighting a military campaign, but a political campaign -- not too different from what a small town mayor might do to win reelection back in the U.S. . . . Fighting terrorists was only something we did when needed, because it interfered with our political objectives. If we could ignore the terrorists, we were winning. If we had to stop our economic and political activities in order to fight terrorists, they were winning."

DOJ_NMG_0115705

The core problem, the officer said, lay in the unwillingness of Shiites in the Iraqi security forces to confront their own side. "Most officers did a great job when facing Sunni-based insurgents," he wrote. "In fact, we had to keep a close eye on most units to make sure they were not too heavy-handed against the Sunnis."

On the other hand: "When we dealt with the Shia, especially the Mahdi militia, things got a lot more complicated. Many officers were reluctant to fight the Shia militias because they had a well-justified fear for the security of their family. I have seen senior Iraqi officers flat refuse to follow American soldiers in pursuit of Shia insurgents -- even when those insurgents just killed their own soldiers."

The trouble goes all the way to the top. "We will never reach any kind of acceptable political settlement as long as the Coalition and the Iraqi government allow legitimate political parties to hold seats in the National Assembly while they finance and maintain military auxiliary wings that attack and kill Iraqi and American soldiers. These parties have enough clout in PM Maliki's administration to effectively block any major military operation against the militias. This is an impossible situation.

"I don't have the expertise to comment on whether or not a temporary 'troop surge' is necessary," he said. "I can say, however, that a troop surge is pointless if we cannot set the political conditions beforehand that allow us to act freely against the militia."

In other words, the success of Bush's new plan hangs on whether he is right in putting our troops behind the idea that Maliki heads a "unity government" and not an administration actually dedicated to Shiite dominance.

The officer concluded that he has "no idea how the American expedition in Iraq will end."

"I doubt it will end well," he wrote. "But I do hope that the courage and civility of the American soldiers who fought there will not be forgotten both here and in Iraq." Amen.

If Iraq does not end well, our men and women in uniform will not get the blame. The fault will lie with leaders in Washington who failed to face the politics of the situation as squarely as this soldier has.

postchat@aol.com

Thinking War-War Again (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

Listening to George W. Bush announce his fantasy-based escalation of the war in Iraq, which could only make sense in some parallel universe where pigs fly and fish commute on bicycles, I flashed on something Bush's hero Winston Churchill once said: "A fanatic is one who can't change his mind and won't change the subject." By that standard, President Bush is no fanatic.

True, he scores off the charts on the part about inflexibility of mind. But the Decider changes the subject all the time. First, the way to fight the "war on terror" was to invade Afghanistan, where the Taliban regime was sheltering Osama bin Laden and al-Qaeda. Before finishing that job, Bush decided to invade Iraq, which had nothing to do with al-Qaeda or the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. And now, with Iraq mired in bloody chaos, he seems to be changing the subject yet again -- to Iran.

I won't spend much time on the president's new "strategy" for Iraq, because at best it's a modest change in tactics -- tragically, one that further plunges U.S. forces into the kind of urban warfare in which insurgents and guerrillas always have the advantage. The battle of Baghdad promises to look like the battle of Fallujah writ large, and it promises to solve nothing. In the end, Bush still has to depend on the Iraqi "unity" government to end the sectarian civil war, but it's clear that the Shiite-dominated regime will do no such thing as long as the Shiites are winning.

On the shift to Iran, I hope I'm wrong but fear I'm right. In his speech Wednesday night, Bush went out of his way to lay out the goal of "stabilizing the region in the face of extremist challenges," specifying that this new task "begins with addressing Iran and Syria."

Of course, he doesn't mean addressing them with tough-minded diplomacy, which is what the Iraq Study Group suggested. Bush decided long ago that talking to regimes he doesn't like amounts to rewarding bad people for bad behavior. However dangerous a world this reckless president leaves behind for his successor, at least we can be thankful that he wasn't anywhere near the White House during the Cold War. He probably would have disconnected the hotline to the Kremlin, or at least kept Leonid Brezhnev on permanent hold.

DOJ_NMG_0115706

"Iran is providing material support for attacks on American troops," Bush said. "We will disrupt the attacks on our forces."

Those words had hardly escaped his lips when U.S. forces stormed an Iranian government office in Irbil, a city in the Kurdish region of Iraq, and hauled away five Iranian staff members regardless of their diplomatic status. Local Kurdish officials apparently were not told in advance of the raid, which looked as if it were meant to underscore the president's point -- or even provoke an intemperate reaction from Tehran.

Bush also mentioned that he has sent a second aircraft carrier group to the Persian Gulf region. The USS John C. Stennis, with its attendant mini-fleet, is on its way to join the USS Dwight D. Eisenhower. That's generally known as gunboat diplomacy.

All this comes shortly after someone leaked to the Sunday Times of London that Israeli pilots are busy training for a mission to destroy Iran's key nuclear facilities with "bunker-busting" low-yield nuclear weapons. The Israeli government promptly denied the story, but not without adding that somebody had better bring an end to Iran's nuclear program, and soon. That somebody could only be the United States.

Meanwhile, much about Iran's nuclear program -- and about the country's intentions -- remains unknown. Experts disagree on how much success the Iranians are having in their uranium enrichment program and on how close they are to actually being able to build a nuclear bomb -- estimates range from two to 10 years. We're not even sure where all the key nuclear facilities are or how hardened they are against attack.

As cynical as I am about this administration, it's hard for me to imagine that at this point, with all the push-back he's getting from Congress and the public about escalating American involvement in Iraq, George W. Bush would even think about launching a new military adventure in Iran. But you have to worry about a president who talks so much about the judgment of history and who has such a Manichaean view of the world.

I have the sinking feeling that he's never heard another famous Churchill quote: "To jaw-jaw is always better than to war-war."

Tears Are Shed At The White House For A Marine's Bravery In Iraq (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 — In April 2004, Cpl. Jason L. Dunham, an ordinary recruit from a small town in upstate New York, did something extraordinary: he threw himself on a grenade to shield two men in his unit as they battled insurgents on a road in Iraq.

On Thursday, President Bush gave Corporal Dunham, who was 22 when he died, the Medal of Honor, the nation's highest military award, presenting it to his mother and father in a somber East Room ceremony attended by his relatives and friends.

In an interview on Tuesday, as she was preparing to make the six-hour trip to Washington for the ceremony, Corporal Dunham's mother, Debra, said she wished her son could "receive it himself." "But we will receive it for him, and he will be watching us do that," she said.

Corporal Dunham, who was a rifle squad leader in the Marines, is the second soldier to receive the medal for service in the current war in Iraq. Prior to that, the 1993 conflict in Mogadishu, Somalia, was the last to produce Medal of Honor recipients; two Delta Army Force soldiers died protecting a downed helicopter pilot there in actions later depicted in the movie "Black Hawk Down."

In presenting the award to the Dunhams, President Bush, who on Wednesday night told the nation he would send 20,000 additional troops to Iraq, cited Corporal Dunham's uncommon valor and said that he "gave his own life so that the men under his command might live."

The president shed tears during the ceremony.

"He was the guy who signed on for an extra two months in Iraq so he could stay with his squad," President Bush said. "As he explained it, he wanted to make sure that everyone makes it home alive. Corporal Dunham took that promise seriously and would give his own life to make it good."

Corporal Dunham's story is of a young man from a little-known town called Scio, about 80 miles southeast of Buffalo, who saw the military not just as a way to serve the country but also as an opportunity to pay for college.

DOJ_NMG_0115707

He had just enrolled at a college near his battalion's base in Twentynine Palms, Calif., before being deployed to Iraq, where his actions placed him in a "select group" of the nation's military heroes, as President Bush put it on Thursday.

Mr. Bush approved Corporal Dunham's nomination for the medal in November, ending a two-year process that required his commanding officers to investigate his actions in battle.

Since the medal was created during the Civil War, it has been bestowed on more than 3,400 soldiers, sailors, airmen, marines and coast guardsmen, according to the Congressional Medal of Honor Society in Mount Pleasant, S.C.

While recipients include the likes of Theodore Roosevelt (for his charge up San Juan Hill in the Spanish-American War), it was not entirely an elite medal at first. But the requirements were tightened and only slightly more than 840 medals have been awarded since World War II.

In his hometown of Scio, with a population of about 2,000, Corporal Dunham was considered an accomplished athlete in high school. His batting average in a single season, .414, still stands as a local league record.

His mother, a teacher, said that he was quietly generous and that she learned of one of his acts of kindness only after he had died. In a letter, a childhood friend described how Corporal Dunham went out of his way to console her when other children taunted her on a bus ride home.

"All he did was sit with her on the bus," his mother recalled. "He had a quiet way about doing the right thing."

After joining the Marines, he was chosen at 22 to become a squad leader with Kilo Company, Third Battalion, Seventh Marine Regiment in September 2003. His mother said he had wanted to continue his college education and also to take the New York State Police entrance exam once he returned from Iraq.

But the events of April 14, 2004, changed everything. That day, Corporal Dunham and his men were in the town of Karabilah, near the Syrian border, when they received reports that insurgents had ambushed a marine convoy. Corporal Dunham and his men boarded Humvees and headed toward the area, where they spotted a convoy of cars filled with Iraqis fleeing, according to various accounts.

The patrol led by Corporal Dunham stopped the Iraqi convoy and began inspecting the vehicles for weapons. As Corporal Dunham inspected one vehicle, a man jumped out and grabbed him by the throat. Two other marines ran over to subdue the attacker, who dropped a grenade, according to the accounts. It was then that Corporal Dunham made a fateful decision: he threw his Kevlar helmet and held it down over the grenade. He died a few days later from his wounds .

In addition to his mother and his father, Daniel, Corporal Dunham is survived by two brothers and a sister: Justin, 23, Kyle, 18, and Katelyn, 14. For a family still deeply in grief, the award presented on Thursday seemed to bring some measure of relief.

"He will be recognized and memorialized in history," his mother said. "He is in the company of remarkable men."

A 2-Month White House Debate On Iraq, Capped By 'the Big Push' (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg, David E. Sanger And Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 — Even before the November elections, President Bush and his national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, were informally discussing what Mr. Hadley was calling "the big push" — whether it made sense to make a show of increased American force in Baghdad to take back the city.

But when Mr. Hadley traveled to Iraq in late October, the commander there, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., repeated his frequent warning that to send more troops to Iraq could be counterproductive, because it might make the Iraqi government less likely to defend itself. By the time Mr. Bush met Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki in Jordan on Nov. 30, Mr. Maliki was insisting upon taking control over all Iraqi troops and urging the Americans to withdraw to the outskirts of his capital.

Over the past two months those diametrically opposed options — adding American troops, or pulling back to let the Iraqi factions fight it out — marked the boundaries of a vigorous debate inside the Bush administration. At one point, as Mr. Bush, Mr. Hadley, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the newly appointed secretary of defense, Robert M. Gates, weighed their options, the president asked his deputies, in effect: "Why can't we just pull out of Baghdad and let the factions fight it out themselves?"

DOJ_NMG_0115708

Ultimately, the president and his advisers came back to the idea of adding American troops — the new approach they concluded was the best of a series of difficult choices, according to a senior administration official involved in the process.

A narrative pieced together from interviews with participants and from public testimony suggests that through much of the process, generals who had been on the ground in Iraq during the past year had favored that the new strategy begin with a substantially smaller force than the one that President Bush announced to the nation on Wednesday night. In the end, it was Mr. Bush who appeared to drive his commanders along to the conclusion that more troops were needed.

In an appearance before Congress on Thursday, Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, confirmed that General Casey had requested only two new American brigades, about 9,000 troops, for Baghdad, along with three Iraqi brigades. The White House gave him five brigades. Gen. John P. Abizaid, who heads the Central Command, was opposed to any increase in American troop levels until mid-November, when he became convinced that the economic commitments by both Iraq and the United States made it worth adding troops.

White House officials were clearly sensitive on Thursday about any suggestions that the president countermanded his generals, and said his new plan had their full support. They said the generals sought and received assurances that the Iraqis would undertake political initiatives and end the practice of releasing militia figures who were friends of the government and captured by American or Iraqi forces.

In public comments before the elections, Mr. Bush resisted calls for troop increases from some of his own supporters, saying his generals saw no such need. During an interview session with conservative columnists in September, Mr. Bush said: "If General Casey feels like he needs more troops, we'll send them," according to a transcript posted by The National Review. Asked by an interviewer, "What if he's wrong?" Mr. Bush shot back, "Then I picked the wrong general."

Still far ahead of Election Day, Mr. Bush had decided to oust Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld. Mr. Rumsfeld was seen by people inside and outside the administration as opposed to a major change. "It was clear Rumsfeld was committed to the strategy that he had employed from the beginning," Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, said. Several officials inside and outside the administration said Mr. Rumsfeld's departure on Nov. 8 helped to empower Mr. Hadley, along with his deputy at the National Security Council, Jack D. Crouch, as they ran the review process inside the White House. Both said they considered many options. But Mr. Hadley was clearly focused on troop levels early on, suggesting in a Nov. 8 memorandum that the president should ask the Pentagon and General Casey to recommend whether more forces were needed in Baghdad.

Mr. Hadley believed from the start of the review that the administration's approach through much of 2006 — that political reconciliation would lead to stability — was not working. "You have this Catch-22 element," Mr. Hadley said in a conversation in his office before he took his late-October trip to Baghdad. "You can't have security without political and economic progress, but it's hard to have political and economic progress without security."

One senior official involved in the discussions said that Mr. Bush's instinct toward the start of the review process — and that of others — was to consider a withdrawal from Baghdad, allow Iraqi-vs.-Iraqi fighting to settle itself, and dedicate United States forces to focus on pursuing Qaeda fighters. "As you peel that back and look at it, it just doesn't war-game out for you," said the official. "You're supposed to go flying through Baghdad looking for Al Qaeda, and when you see ethnic cleansing going on look the other way?"

In the end, the official said, Mr. Hadley's teams concluded that an American withdrawal from Baghdad would "crater the government."

Another option discussed was to try to steer the Iraqi government toward a political realignment that would essentially depose Mr. Maliki, and put a stronger figure in place. By elimination, those discussions led Mr. Bush's top advisers back to the idea of a troop increase. According to an account by one senior official, General Pace traveled to Crawford, Tex., to meet with Mr. Bush after Christmas and took with him a recommendation calling for two more American brigades in Baghdad, with three more American brigades on call, along with two additional American battalions for Anbar.

According to a senior administration official, Vice President Dick Cheney was among those who wanted a bigger force. Ultimately, Mr. Bush concluded that General Pace's initial request was too small and should be augmented by three more American brigades for Baghdad. General Pace said that General Abizaid, who is retiring this year, had opposed the idea of a troop increase. But General Abizaid came around, General Pace said, when he saw that the additional American combat forces would be accompanied by a "political and economic surge."

DOJ_NMG_0115709

New Strategy Vindicates Ex-Army Chief Shinseki (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 — After President Bush told the nation on Wednesday night that he was ordering a rapid increase of American forces in Iraq, Gen. Eric K. Shinseki was not among the retired officers to offer instant analysis on television.

But the president's new strategy, with its explicit acknowledgment that not enough troops had been sent to Iraq to establish control, was a vindication for General Shinseki, who as Army chief of staff publicly told Congress as much just before the war began in 2003.

First vilified, then marginalized by the Bush administration after those comments, General Shinseki retired and faded away, even as lawmakers, pundits and politicians increasingly cited his prescience.

"We never had enough troops to begin with," Senator Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, said just before the president's televised address. "A month or two ago we found out the Army is broken, and they agreed that General Shinseki was right."

Gen. John P. Abizaid, the departing commander of American forces in the Middle East, told Congress late last year, "General Shinseki was right that a greater international force contribution, U.S. force contribution and Iraqi force contribution should have been available immediately after major combat operations."

In his prime-time address on Wednesday, even President Bush said the main reason past efforts to stabilize Baghdad had failed was that "there were not enough Iraqi and American troops to secure neighborhoods that had been cleared of terrorists and insurgents."

The acknowledgment was far different from the harsh administration rebuttals after General Shinseki electrified Washington with his blunt warning that victory in Iraq would require more troops than were being deployed for the invasion.

He was the target of immediate rebuke from the Pentagon leadership, in particular from Donald H. Rumsfeld, then secretary of defense, and his deputy, Paul D. Wolfowitz. Mr. Wolfowitz dismissed the testimony as "wildly off the mark."

Some civilians in government and military officers say General Shinseki's treatment intimidated other top officers.

"It sent a very clear signal to the military leadership about how that kind of military judgment was going to be valued," said Kori Schake, the director for defense strategy on the National Security Council staff from 2002 to 2005, now a fellow at the Hoover Institution and a professor at West Point. "So it served to silence critics just at the point in time when, internal to the process, you most wanted critical judgment."

General Shinseki has kept a strict public silence since retiring in June 2003 and would often say to his associates, "I do not want to criticize while my soldiers are still bleeding and dying in Iraq."

He now splits his time between his suburban Washington home and his native Hawaii, consulting with academic organizations, private companies and military support groups. He declined to comment for this article.

"This is a man who is totally loyal to the Army, which was his life," said David R. Gergen, director of the Center for Public Leadership at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government. Mr. Gergen works with General Shinseki on the center's advisory board, and the general regularly meets with students there.

"General Shinseki draws an enormous crowd, especially of former and active-duty military," said Mr. Gergen, who was an adviser to Presidents Nixon, Ford, Reagan and Clinton. "They hold General Shinseki in awe."

"He has been very discreet in his comments about what happened," Mr. Gergen added. "Just as he has been in public, he is reluctant in private to say anything that would disparage the commander in chief."

The general, who throughout his career was known for his selfless, or at least self-effacing, bearing, did not go before Congress on that day in February 2003 planning to stir things up. But he is also not one who backs down easily; he had risen to the top of the Army after surviving grievous injury in Vietnam, and under withering cross-examination by Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan, he spoke matter-of-factly.

DOJ_NMG_0115710

"Something on the order of several hundred thousand soldiers are probably, you know, a figure that would be required" to stabilize Iraq after an invasion, he said.

"We're talking about post-hostilities control over a piece of geography that's fairly significant, with the kinds of ethnic tensions that could lead to other problems," he added. "And so it takes a significant ground force presence to maintain a safe and secure environment, to ensure that people are fed, that water is distributed, all the normal responsibilities that go along with administering a situation like this."

His comments brought to a boil long-simmering tensions with Mr. Rumsfeld, who had been scrubbing the war plans to reduce the number of invading troops. And they were politically explosive, coming less than a month before the start of the war, which proponents were saying confidently would be anything but a quagmire.

Former aides to the general said his estimate summarized back-of-the-envelope calculations but had been based on experiences as a commander in postwar Bosnia, where the United States sent 50,000 troops to quiet five million people, a population one-fifth that of Iraq. American troops in Iraq reached a peak of more than 160,000 in December 2005. There are now about 132,000.

General Shinseki was not fired for his comments, but his influence as a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff certainly was never the same. He retired as scheduled.

During a House Armed Services Committee hearing on Thursday, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs, was asked specifically why General Shinseki's recommendation of more troops had not been adopted, and he replied: "General Shinseki was not advocating for that number as an answer. He gave that as a guesstimate of what it might take. So I just want to put that in historical context."

Some critics say General Shinseki should have spoken out more after his Senate testimony, and others ask why he did not resign to protest the war plan if he thought it would not assure victory. Even in retirement he declined to join the so-called generals' revolt of retired officers calling for Mr. Rumsfeld to resign last year.

These days, Army officers are pointing to another instance of his impolitic remarks coming true years later.

In his retirement speech, General Shinseki warned against trying to carry out a "12-division strategy" with a "10-division army," counsel that the Pentagon's leaders rejected.

In his speech on Wednesday night, Mr. Bush vowed "to increase the size of the active Army and Marine Corps, so that America has the armed forces we need for the 21st century." That, too, could be heard as an affirmation of the general's long-held view.

It May Be Too Late To Secure Baghdad's Mix (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2007

BAGHDAD — Mohammed Rubaie, 28, is the sort of person President Bush's new Baghdad security plan was designed to protect. But for him and his neighbors and many like them across this city, the plan comes months too late.

One of the chief rationales for sending five additional U.S. brigades to Baghdad is to secure the city's mixed neighborhoods, U.S. military planners say. If residents feel they are safe in their homes, they will no longer turn to sectarian militias to protect them, the strategists argue.

But many of the districts that U.S. planners might have wanted to protect already have been taken over by sectarian gunmen and their allies. Formerly mixed areas, including Rubaie's Hurriya neighborhood, have been transformed by fear and violence. Standing in their place are militantly sectarian communities, their borders hardened by concrete barriers and vigilante-run checkpoints.

Hurriya, where Rubaie was born and grew up, was one of those mixed neighborhoods — a place in Baghdad's northwestern corner where Sunni Arabs and Shiite Muslims lived in relative peace.

But this fall, the militias saw to it that Hurriya would no longer be mixed. One harrowing October night, "there were two gunmen dressed in black, with the police backing them up. They were saying, 'Sunnis, you should leave now. It's the last warning to you all. We're going to burn your houses one by one,' " Rubaie said.

DOJ_NMG_0115711

"When our neighbor's house was burned, I felt it was time for us to leave," he added.

Rubaie's family joined a widening flood of Baghdad residents who have abandoned their home districts as the violence between Shiite militiamen and Sunni insurgents has reshaped Baghdad's neighborhoods. In many cases, U.S. officials say, violent sectarian "cleansing" has been abetted by elements of the Iraqi security forces.

The violence has tilted the demographics of some neighborhoods from one sect to the other. In other neighborhoods, it has consolidated sectarian populations and hardened religious boundaries.

Lines are shifting

The United Nations estimates that at least 300,000 Baghdad residents have fled the country since 2003, when the capital's population was approximately 6 million people.

In the last 11 months, since the February bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra triggered Iraq's plunge into civil war, about 60,000 Baghdad residents have left their homes for other neighborhoods within the city, according to the Iraqi Ministry of Migration and Displacement.

In the last year, the lines dividing Sunnis from Shiites in Baghdad have shifted steadily to the west — deep into what was formerly the center of the city's Sunni population.

As recently as last summer, many people here considered the Tigris River, which snakes through the center of the capital, a rough boundary between the predominantly Sunni west bank and the largely Shiite east side. But Shiite militias, who are widely believed to have seized the advantage in Baghdad, have pushed the battle lines across the river into places such as Hurriya. By contrast, Sunni fighters have been unable to sustain advances into east Baghdad.

"They're both taking territory from each other, but the Shiites have the upper hand in Baghdad because of Sadr's movement," said a U.S. advisor, referring to radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr's Al Mahdi army, a powerful militia. "They're very aggressively taking over areas and putting Shiite families into Sunni homes," said the advisor, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the matter publicly.

The militias are often backed up by sectarian elements within Iraq's security forces. U.S. officials said they hoped that the infusion of new troops would halt sectarian sweeps, but acknowledged that in the meantime, the fighting was likely to get worse.

"Both sides are solidifying their ground right now," the advisor said.

The list of neighborhoods that have been subjected to sectarian cleansing is long. In recent months, Sunnis have pushed Shiite families out of some neighborhoods west of the Tigris, including Yarmouk and Mansour.

Shiites have pushed Sunnis out of a longer list of neighborhoods in central Baghdad, including Babil and Riyadh. They also now dominate the Karada district, which was once heavily Christian.

Shiite militiamen have also struck deep into west Baghdad, taking over neighborhoods such as Jihad, which was recently a majority Sunni area.

U.S. advisors say the best they can hope for with Bush's new plan is to stop future sectarian cleansing campaigns and hold Baghdad's skewed demographics as they are, leaving restoration of abandoned, plundered and commandeered homes and neighborhoods for another day.

The balkanization of Baghdad's neighborhoods also raises the specter of future clashes if residents who have been cast out decide to return and retake their domiciles.

A domino effect

The Sunni exodus from Hurriya illustrates the dynamics of sectarian cleansing. When Shiite fighters pushed out the Sunni residents, the residents fled south into the nearby community of Adil, where Sunnis already were in the majority, and drove out that neighborhood's Shiites.

"The displaced from Hurriya tried to create problems and displace Shiites in Adil," said Adnan Dulaimi, a Sunni Arab member of parliament. When Dulaimi played host to peace negotiations with local Shiites at a mosque, five mortar rounds struck the building and derailed the talks.

Sheik Mahmoud abu Abdullah, a spokesman for the Muslim Scholars Assn., a hard-line Sunni clerical group, said the Shiites have been so successful in their assaults because they constitute the majority in Baghdad and have the backing of Iraqi security forces.

DOJ_NMG_0115712

"First the militias raid a Sunni area, conduct assassinations, kidnappings," he said. "Then when the people resist, they distribute threatening pamphlets in the area. If pamphlets don't work, the Iraqi security forces come in."

Baghdad City Councilman Siyyid Yacoub Bukhati said commandos in one predominantly Shiite neighborhood in west Baghdad removed checkpoints recently to allow sectarian fighters into the district.

"A few days ago, six to seven cars full of gunmen came in and started shooting and told six houses of Sunnis to leave the area," Bukhati said. "The main reason this happens is because the security forces are weak and unwilling to apply the law."

U.S. military officials have also complained that Iraqi security forces at times appear to be assisting sectarian militias. In a recent news briefing, Army Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, the day-to-day commander for operations in Iraq, said that an earlier Baghdad security plan called Operation Together Forward failed because sectarian elements within Iraq's security forces allowed abuses to occur.

The perceived complicity of Iraqi police and soldiers poses yet another problem for Bush's plan because the U.S. strategy calls for Iraqi security forces to supply 20,000 troops to assist in protecting Baghdad neighborhoods.

Many here say they have little faith in those forces.

"In our neighborhood, the militias try to kidnap Sunnis from their houses," said Abu Abdullah Maslawi, a resident of the Mansour neighborhood. "If the militias fail, the police come and arrest the people who fired at the militias. Now families are even resisting the police, because they believe they are the same as the militias."

Bush Stands Alone With 'new Way Forward' (FT)

By Ed Luce In Washington

Financial Times, January 12, 2007

President George W. Bush on Thursday cut an increasingly lonely and embattled figure as opposition Democrats and fellow Republicans greeted his "new way forward" in Iraq with a barrage of denunciation.

Although Tony Blair, the UK prime minister, said that Mr Bush's plan to send a further 21,500 troops to Iraq "made sense", the US president appeared more isolated than ever before. Republicans pointed to the fact that Mr Bush's address came as the UK plans to announce by the end of next month the withdrawal of about 2,600 troops from Iraq.

"Why is it just the United States that is shouldering this?" said Lisa Murkowski, a Republican senator. "Why is Great Britain withdrawing? Why are we the only ones that are moving forward with this new plan?"

Republican senators who publicly opposed Mr Bush's plan included Norm Coleman of Minnesota and Sam Brownback – both of whom have traditionally backed the White House – in addition to a growing list of Republicans facing 2008 election campaigns.

This show of Republican opposition prompted comparisons with Richard Nixon during the Vietnam era.

"Republican support for the president is draining rapidly," said a party strategist. "It is almost unheard of for Republicans to criticise a Republican president at war so soon after he has made an appeal for support."

Democrat leaders were scathing in their response, accusing Mr Bush of having betrayed his promise of bipartisanship following the Republican defeat in midterm elections last November.

Chris Dodd, a Democrat presidential hopeful, accused the Bush administration of living in a "fool's paradise". Joe Biden, another Democrat presidential candidate, called Mr Bush's troop "surge" a "big mistake".

There is little Congress can do to prevent the president from conducting the war in the manner he wishes but Democrats are considering symbolic legislation that would rebuke Mr Bush's Iraq strategy.

"The president could find himself so isolated so quickly that he would be forced to fundamentally revise his strategy in Iraq, which he has not done," said Zbigniew Brzezinski, a national security adviser under former president Jimmy Carter. "My real fear is that a president who is backed into a corner and prone to demagoguery will listen to the neoconservatives and expand this war to Iran or Syria."

Polls on Thursday showed an overwhelming majority of Americans opposing Mr Bush's troop "surge".

DOJ_NMG_0115713

"This administration took a gamble [by going to war in Iraq]," said Barack Obama, a potential Democrat presidential candidate. "It staked American prestige on the premise that it could overthrow a dictator and bring democracy to Iraq. It appears that gamble has failed."

Stephen Hess, a former Nixon administration official, said Mr Bush was unlikely to be derailed from his chosen course in Iraq.

Several In GOP Hit Bush 'Blunder' (WT)

By Charles Hurt And Jon Ward

The Washington Times, January 12, 2007

Republican leaders on Capitol Hill staunchly back President Bush's proposal to boost troop levels in Iraq but support among the party's rank and file may be crumbling.

"At this late stage, interjecting more young American troops into the crossfire of an Iraqi civil war is simply not the right approach," Rep. Ric Keller, a Florida Republican who has been steadfastly supportive of the war, said on the House floor yesterday. "We are not going to solve an Iraqi political problem with an American military solution."

Sen. Chuck Hagel, Nebraska Republican, predicted that the plan would be "the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in the country since Vietnam -- if it is carried out."

"I think what [Mr. Bush has] decided to do is both courageous and correct," Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, told reporters yesterday. "It strikes me, in listening to the critics emerging already, that the president can't win either way. Before he changed directions, he was being criticized. And now that he's changing directions, he's being criticized."

Mr. McConnell yesterday hinted that Senate Republicans would filibuster any resolution by Democrats expressing disapproval of the war in Iraq or Mr. Bush's plan to add more than 21,000 troops to the battlefield.

"Congress is completely incapable of dictating the tactics in a war," he said, adding that if Democrats are so unhappy, they should cut off funding.

"What they want to do, apparently, is to leave," Mr. McConnell said. "And there is only one effective device of Congress that can be employed to bring about that result, and that opportunity will be provided when the supplemental appropriation comes up in February. If they want to cut off money for the troops, that's the time to do it."

Opposition to their commander in chief appears to be considerable, especially for a conference that has been overwhelmingly supportive of the Bush administration for the past six years. However, it is unlikely that there is much Republican congressional critics can or will do to alter the president's military plans in Iraq.

An informal survey by The Washington Times yesterday, for instance, found nine Senate Republicans who have "doubts" about Mr. Bush's proposal, and seven who reject it. Eleven other senators expressed conditional support.

Twenty-one Republican senators offered unqualified support. Only Sen. Wayne Allard, Colorado Republican, did not respond to requests for comment.

Mr. Bush went into his Wednesday speech with opinion polls showing strong disapproval of his handling of Iraq, and initial reaction suggests he didn't sway many voters.

"When you've got a 30 percent overall rating, you've got a credibility problem," said pollster John Zogby, who said Mr. Bush needed to "hit a grand slam home run" Wednesday to earn back public confidence, and didn't.

"At best, he presented a solution that was one of several bad alternatives, and the one that polls at least, and I'm just a public opinion guy, that polls show was the worst."

However, an ABC-Washington Post poll taken after the speech and released yesterday found Mr. Bush had gained some ground with Americans on his handling of Iraq overall, to reach 34 percent, or 7 percent higher than last month's survey. But asked about Mr. Bush's new plan, 61 percent said they oppose it.

Even among his strongest supporters in the Senate, Mr. Bush faces new scrutiny. "That's why you're seeing tougher and tougher questions being asked by us," said Sen. Saxby Chambliss, Georgia Republican.

DOJ_NMG_0115714

Sen. Pat Roberts, Kansas Republican, called Mr. Bush's proposal "the only realistic choice given the regional instability and danger we face. But this support is not without limits."

Other Republicans were more critical of the president's proposal. Sen. Gordon H. Smith of Oregon called it Mr. Bush's "Hail Mary pass."

Sen. Norm Coleman, Minnesota Republican, said that "to put the lives of [more] Americans soldiers" into the Iraq conflict, "without first having something that's substantial, something we can point to, other than this sense of trust, other than looking someone in the eye, having a conversation. I'm not prepared, at this time, to support that. The cost is too great."

Many of the Republican senators criticizing the president yesterday are up for re-election in 2008, such as Mr. Hagel, Mr. Smith and Mr. Coleman. Mr. Hagel has hinted he may run for president.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, at a briefing with other Senate Democratic leaders, boasted that he could win over 12 Republicans to sign a nonbinding resolution opposing a troop increase.

Democrats say they hope to bring the resolution to a vote next week and confront Mr. Bush with official opposition from senators in his own party. "That will be the beginning of the end of the war in Iraq," Mr. Reid said.

The seven Republican senators who are openly opposed to sending more troops are Mr. Hagel, Mr. Smith, Mr. Coleman, Sen. Susan Collins of Maine, Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, Sen. Olympia J. Snowe of Maine and Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania.

The nine Republican senators who appear to be undecided, if not opposed, are Sen. Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, Sen. George V. Voinovich of Ohio, Sen. Bob Corker of Tennessee, Sen. Michael D. Crapo of Idaho, Sen. Richard G. Lugar of Indiana, Sen. Lisa Murkowski of Alaska, Sen. John E. Sununu of New Hampshire, Sen. John W. Warner of Virginia and Sen. David Vitter of Louisiana.

Convincing Still Required For Bush Iraq Plan (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — One day after President Bush unveiled his plan to send 21,500 additional U.S. troops to Iraq, administration officials today sought to convince a skeptical public and Congress that the strategy can work.

But Democratic leaders stood firmly opposed to the president's plan, lashing out at what they called "a tragic mistake" and talking about cutting off funds for the war.

"In choosing to escalate the war, the president virtually stands alone," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said in a statement today.

Skepticism to the plan is so widespread — Sen. Barak Obama (D-Ill.) likened the president's strategy to a gambler increasing the size of his bet to cover his previous losses — that even Republicans railed about the war.

Sen. George Voinovich (R-Ohio), who until now has supported the war, said he no longer believes the civil war in Iraq can be tamed by sending more U.S. troops to aid in the fight.

"We don't want any more American soldiers killed … in the name of civil war," he said, noting that the letter he sends to families of fallen soldiers now has to be rewritten, not to praise them for dying in a grand cause but in the name of security. "I've gone along with the president's dream," he said. "I just don't think it's going to happen."

Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.), questioning the Iraqi government's resolve to crack down on sectarian violence, asked, "Why put more Americans on the line now in hopes that this time they will make the right decision? Fooled twice, shame on me."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, testifying before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee today, said the administration is "clear-eyed, too, about the fact that the Iraqi government has to perform, and the fact that they haven't in the past."

She noted that stability in Iraq will take both resolve and capability.

"The president sees this as an effort to help the Iraqis with an urgent task so that sectarian violence does not outrun the political process," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0115715

The president began the day by hailing the heroism of individual soldiers. Bush awarded the Medal of Honor posthumously to Marine Corps Cpl. Jason Dunham for falling on a grenade hurled by an Iraqi during an attack near the Syrian border.

"By his selflessness, Cpl. Dunham saved the lives of two of his men and showed the world what it means to be a Marine," Bush said in a White House ceremony attended by Dunham's family.

Defense Secretary Robert Gates, in an early morning news conference, said the number of American troops will be gradually raised in Iraq. "There will be no D-Day," Gates said. "It won't look like the Gulf War."

With Iraq putting increased stress on the U.S. military, Gates said he will recommend that Bush increase U.S. armed forces by 92,000 over the next five years — with 27,000 more Marines and 65,000 more soldiers.

Rice said that even as the Pentagon sends additional troops to the battlefield, diplomats will step up political and economic reconstruction efforts in Iraq. Naming Tim Carney, a former ambassador to Sudan and Haiti, to oversee the nonmilitary effort in the field, Rice told the Senate committee today that civilian reconstruction efforts in the Al Anbar province, a stronghold of insurgents, were having an effect.

"We in the State Department recognize the need for a diplomatic surge," she said. "We need to get diplomats out of the Green Zone, into Iraq."

Reaction to Rice's testimony in the committee room showed the administration's tough task in selling the plan for additional troops to the public and to Congress.

At one point during her testimony, a protester yelled out, "More lies…all lies…stop the lies!"

Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) told Rice that adding troops is "the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam" and challenged her assessment that the strategy was "an augmentation" rather than "an escalation" and that sectarian violence does not yet constitute a full-scale civil war.

Insisting that "not all of Baghdad has fallen into civil war," Rice said that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki understands he must gain control of extremists from both the Shia and Sunni sects.

Some in Congress defended the policy. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said today that the Bush plan may not guarantee success, but it's worth trying because the consequences of failure are greater.

"If we do fail," McCain said, "there is going to be chaos in the region and we will pay an even heavier price in American blood and treasure."

House Democratic leaders are considering bringing the issue of funding the war to a vote on the House floor.

McCain, a GOP presidential candidate, said Congress had the right to cut off funding but that "if the vote is successful, those who are proponents of it (must) assume responsibility for the consequences of failures."

During committee hearings and morning broadcast news shows, Democrats made clear they remain furious about the war and the president's attempt to expand the U.S. commitment to Iraq.

"We're not going to baby-sit a civil war," said Obama on NBC's "Today Show." On CBS' "Early Show," Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) said that with Democrats now in charge of both houses of Congress, "questions are now being asked of this administration that haven't been asked for almost four years."

At the start of a Senate committee meeting, Chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.) said Bush's strategy is "not a solution," adding that he believed the idea of sending more troops is "a tragic mistake."

One day after President Bush unveiled his plan to send 21,500 additional U.S. troops to Iraq, administration officials today sought to convince a skeptical public and Congress that the strategy can work.

But Democratic leaders stood firmly opposed to the president's plan, lashing out at what they called "a tragic mistake" and talking about cutting off funds for the war.

"In choosing to escalate the war, the president virtually stands alone," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said in a statement today.

Skepticism to the plan is so widespread — Sen. Barak Obama (D-Ill.) likened the president's strategy to a gambler increasing the size of his bet to cover his previous losses — that even Republicans railed about the war.

Sen. George Voinovich (R-Ohio), who until now has supported the war, said he no longer believes the civil war in Iraq can be tamed by sending more U.S. troops to aid in the fight.

DOJ_NMG_0115716

"We don't want any more American soldiers killed … in the name of civil war," he said, noting that the letter he sends to families of fallen soldiers now has to be rewritten, not to praise them for dying in a grand cause but in the name of security. "I've gone along with the president's dream," he said. "I just don't think it's going to happen."

Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.), questioning the Iraqi government's resolve to crack down on sectarian violence, asked, "Why put more Americans on the line now in hopes that this time they will make the right decision? Fooled twice, shame on me."

Bush, speaking to troops today at Ft. Benning, Ga., defended his strategy, saying that the new plan will help Iraqis secure troubled neighborhoods and quell the sectarian violence that has crippled the nation.

What's more, Bush said, is that Prime Minister Nouri Maliki has promised to end "political interference," and that Bush in turn has promised "enough troops to clear, build and hold."

Saying "there is no doubt in my mind we will prevail," Bush added, "The purpose really is to crush these insurrections now, so that the democracy in Iraq can develop, has a chance to make it."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, testifying before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said the administration is "clear-eyed, too, about the fact that the Iraqi government has to perform, and the fact that they haven't in the past."

She noted that stability in Iraq will take both resolve and capability.

"The president sees this as an effort to help the Iraqis with an urgent task so that sectarian violence does not outrun the political process," she said.

The president began the day by hailing the heroism of individual soldiers. Bush awarded the Medal of Honor posthumously to Marine Corps Cpl. Jason Dunham for falling on a grenade hurled by an Iraqi during an attack near the Syrian border.

"By his selflessness, Cpl. Dunham saved the lives of two of his men and showed the world what it means to be a Marine," Bush said in a White House ceremony attended by Dunham's family.

Defense Secretary Robert Gates, in an early morning news conference, said the number of American troops will be gradually raised in Iraq. "There will be no D-Day," Gates said. "It won't look like the Gulf War."

With Iraq putting increased stress on the U.S. military, Gates said he will recommend that Bush increase U.S. armed forces by 92,000 over the next five years — with 27,000 more Marines and 65,000 more soldiers.

Rice said that even as the Pentagon sends additional troops to the battlefield, diplomats will step up political and economic reconstruction efforts in Iraq. Naming Tim Carney, a former ambassador to Sudan and Haiti, to oversee the nonmilitary effort in the field, Rice told the Senate committee today that civilian reconstruction efforts in the Al Anbar province, a stronghold of insurgents, were having an effect.

"We in the State Department recognize the need for a diplomatic surge," she said. "We need to get diplomats out of the Green Zone, into Iraq."

Reaction to Rice's testimony in the committee room showed the administration's tough task in selling the plan for additional troops to the public and to Congress.

At one point during her testimony, a protester yelled out, "More lies…all lies…stop the lies!"

Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) told Rice that adding troops is "the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam" and challenged her assessment that the strategy was "an augmentation" rather than "an escalation" and that sectarian violence does not yet constitute a full-scale civil war.

Insisting that "not all of Baghdad has fallen into civil war," Rice said that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki understands he must gain control of extremists from both the Shia and Sunni sects.

Some in Congress defended the policy. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said today that the Bush plan may not guarantee success, but it's worth trying because the consequences of failure are greater.

"If we do fail," McCain said, "there is going to be chaos in the region and we will pay an even heavier price in American blood and treasure."

House Democratic leaders are considering bringing the issue of funding the war to a vote on the House floor.

McCain, a GOP presidential candidate, said Congress had the right to cut off funding but that "if the vote is successful, those who are proponents of it (must) assume responsibility for the consequences of failures."

DOJ_NMG_0115717

During committee hearings and morning broadcast news shows, Democrats made clear they remain furious about the war and the president's attempt to expand the U.S. commitment to Iraq.

"We're not going to baby-sit a civil war," said Obama on NBC's "Today Show." On CBS' "Early Show," Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) said that with Democrats now in charge of both houses of Congress, "questions are now being asked of this administration that haven't been asked for almost four years."

At the start of a Senate committee meeting, Chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.) said Bush's strategy is "not a solution," adding that he believed the idea of sending more troops is "a tragic mistake."

That theme resonated throughout the morning as senators from both parties criticized the Bush administration for its failures in Iraq.

Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) berated Rice for "not listening to the American people." Reminding Rice that she will bear the personal agony of lost family members in Iraq, Boxer also noted that the British are withdrawing their troops from Iraq.

"We are all alone," Boxer said. "There is no other country standing with us in this escalation."

Obama, saying that Bush "took a gamble" and then kept "doubling down," argued that the administration should fix a date at which it would walk away.

"It seems as if the solution is always six months away," he said. "What leverage do we have to provide assurance that six months from now you will not be saying it didn't work … and we can't afford to fail?"

Rice replied that the administration is "not going to stay married to a plan that's not working in Baghdad if the Iraqis are not living up to" their end of the bargain.

Bush Bets Congress Will Have To Back Plan (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

FORT BENNING, Ga. -- As President Bush presses his latest Iraq strategy, he is gambling that the new Democratic Congress will give him the same broad discretion to prosecute the war that he has had for the past four years.

Yesterday, a wide number of Democrats and Republicans blasted the approach. White House officials calculate that Democrats will be stymied by practical problems, legislative maneuvering and internal divisions in their attempt to prevent the administration from sending 21,500 more soldiers -- and more money -- to Iraq.

"There are a lot of divisions among the Democrats, and you see them tiptoeing around it because they understand the consequences of such a vote," White House Counselor Dan Bartlett said during a trip with Mr. Bush, who was pushing his case for sending new forces to Iraq in a speech to hundreds of soldiers on this military base.

Mr. Bush's call to send more troops to Baghdad and restive Anbar province moved the White House closer to open confrontation with Congress, where lawmakers have been denouncing the proposal while considering whether to impose conditions on the White House's plans.

Speaking to a roomful of troops, Mr. Bush said he planned to work with "the Congress to provide all the resources you need in this war on terror." He gave no indication of willingness to accommodate congressional criticism.

Democratic leaders hope to pass a nonbinding measure opposing the troop escalation in the Senate as early as this week and are openly discussing ways to block funding for it, or otherwise tying the president's hands. White House officials downplayed the possibility of Congress blocking troop escalation, noting that the administration has enough money to send most of the additional "surge" forces to Iraq. That means any Democratic move to limit funding would effectively impact money used for sustaining troops already in the field.

The nonbinding measures criticizing the war may also face a rockier-than-expected path. The Senate's top Republican, Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, has threatened to filibuster the surge resolution, which could force Democrats to soften their language or delay bringing it to a vote.

With polls showing the U.S. public highly skeptical of the new Iraq approach -- and even many congressional Republicans raising criticism -- Democratic leaders in Congress are trying to calibrate their own strategy, figuring out whether to condemn the new approach or try to take firmer steps, such as limiting funding or other restrictions.

DOJ_NMG_0115718

During previous similarly unpopular conflicts, lawmakers regularly passed measures dictating the way administrations should conduct military operations. During the Vietnam era, for instance, lawmakers passed measures requiring President Nixon to set a timetable for withdrawing American forces from the country and barring them from being deployed into Cambodia. Lawmakers later passed measures barring the CIA from operating in Angola and Nicaragua. In the early 1990s, Congress approved legislation setting a firm timetable for the withdrawal of military personnel from Somalia.

Congress gave Mr. Bush broad authority to wage the Iraq war in 2002, and when the Capitol was under Republican leadership, lawmakers did little to challenge the president on his handling of the conflict. The new Congress has said it would push to rein in the White House. Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.) has written an amendment that would require congressional approval for any Iraq troop increase, and the number of Democrats supporting the measure has increased.

For the moment, though, Democrats seem to be focusing on laying down a public marker opposing the troop escalation rather than trying to direct the conduct of military operations in Iraq. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada says he hopes to introduce a nonbinding resolution against the troop increase by the end of next week, and Democrats claim that as many as 12 Republican senators could support it. The House plans to consider an identical measure as early as next week. The administration's talk of escalating confrontation with Iran and Syria within Iraq stirred similarly sharp concerns, leading senior Democrats like Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph Biden of Delaware to say he was prepared to limit Mr. Bush's authority to carry any fight outside Iraq's borders.

"We can do just about anything, given our constitutional powers of the purse," said one Senate Democratic leader's chief of staff. "But right now, politically, we don't want to do anything that could be seen as shortchanging the troops in the field."

Indeed, several newly elected Democrats who had made the war a central part of their campaigns stopped short of restrictions on troop levels. Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.), chairman of the House Appropriations defense subcommittee, said such language could be part of future spending legislation, but some Democrats said they were not yet prepared to back such a measure.

"We're not at that point yet," said Rep. Patrick Murphy, a Pennsylvania Democrat and Iraq veteran.

Analysis: Democrats' Delicate Strategy (AP)

By David Espo

AP, January 12, 2007

Majority Democrats face a delicate mission in their first foreign policy clash with President Bush, determined to force an end to the Iraq war but eager to support the troops who are doing the fighting.

No strangers to political combat, Republicans don't intend to make it easy on them.

"What they really want is to cut off funding for the troops," Senate GOP Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, said Thursday.

It was a claim that Democrats rebutted in advance.

"The Congress and the American people will continue to support them and provide them with every resource they need," the top four Democrats in Congress pledged Wednesday night as they attacked President Bush's plans to deploy an additional 21,500 troops.

"Our military forces deserve a policy commensurate with the sacrifices they have been asked to make. Regrettably, the president has not provided that tonight," added Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, as well as Reps. Steny Hoyer of Maryland and Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois.

For the first time since the war began, Democrats have public opinion on their side — and know it for sure.

The midterm elections that swept Republicans from power in both the House and Senate demonstrated that, and comments by one-time Republican supporters of the president's war policy confirm it daily.

Sen. Gordon Smith, an Oregon Republican who faces the voters in 2008, checked out in December. He called the war effort absurd and said he would never have voted to authorize combat if he had known that prewar intelligence was wrong.

Other Republicans are following.

DOJ_NMG_0115719

Eight members of the House rank-and-file wrote Bush on Jan. 4, urging him "to reject any recommendation for either a short or long term increase in the number of U.S. troops. We are persuaded by all available evidence that an escalation of U.S. troop levels is not the way forward in Iraq."

Bush was persuaded otherwise, and suffered further political erosion within hours.

"At this late stage, interjecting more young American troops into the crossfire of an Iraqi civil war is simply not the right approach," Republican Rep. Ric Keller said on the morning after the president's speech.

Across the Capitol complex, Republican Sen. George Voinovich of Ohio addressed Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice: "I've gone along with the president on this and I've bought into his dream, and at this stage of the game I just don't think it's going to happen."

Both Pelosi and Reid intend to hold votes in Congress within a few weeks on Bush's revised Iraq policy. It would be the equivalent of a congressional referendum, advisory in nature, and give Democrats a way to show their opposition and force Republicans to make a choice.

Many Democrats in both houses prefer a stronger approach. — Sen. Edward M. Kennedy pre-empted Reid this week by unveiling a bill to block the use of funds for Bush's plans to increase the size of the force in the war zone.

In private sessions, House Democrats have prodded Pelosi to be more forceful, and Democratic presidential contenders are likely to compete for the support of anti-war voters, as well. As a result, it seems inevitable that there will be efforts to limit funding for the war later in the year.

For now, though, according to several officials, the leadership in both houses would prefer a more cautious approach when it comes to legislation, building additional pressure on the president through extensive hearings into the war.

Their hope is that will leave the public focus on Bush as steward of a war that has claimed the lives of more than 3,000 U.S. troops and eroded his standing with the electorate.

Reid, in particular, has said he favors a bipartisan repudiation of Bush's new policy. "The president's going to have to take note of that. I think that's the beginning of the end, as far as I'm concerned," he said.

Bush's Iraq Plan Meets Skepticism On Capitol Hill (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

President Bush's proposal to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq encountered strong bipartisan opposition on Capitol Hill yesterday, and his top national security advisers, dispatched to defend the strategy, were greeted with a skepticism not seen from Congress over the past six years.

Lawmakers said they have little confidencethat the Iraqi government has the capacity to deliver on promises to take the lead in cracking down on violent militias and providing security in Baghdad, as the president's plan contemplates. Democrats and Republicans alike said they are concerned that Bush's plan, announced Wednesday night in a nationally televised prime-time address, is too little and too late and does not appear very different from previous efforts to secure the capital.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates sought to assure lawmakers that the plan can work if given time. Gates said he detected a much greater determination from Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to go after "all lawbreakers" with "no exceptions." He suggested that the prime minister will confront the militias fueling sectarian violence, including insurgents controlled by radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr.

Still, the ferocity of the congressional condemnation dismayed the White House, which had hoped to rebuild an element of bipartisan consensus around Bush's plan. It was further indication that the new Democratic Congress is headed toward a series of potentially epic clashes and floor votes over the conduct and funding of the nearly four-year-old war.

Congressional skepticism is being fueled by the public: A majority of Americans oppose Bush's decision to send more troops, and only one in three said the plan will probably make victory in Iraq more likely, according to a new Washington Post-ABC News poll.

Rice appeared to be on the receiving end of the toughest grilling yesterday, before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Not a single senator from either party expressed support for the president's plan, many posed hostile questions, and others expressed deep doubt about the Bush administration's premise of creating a viable democracy in the heart of the Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0115720

"I've gone along with the president on this, and I bought into his dream," Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) told Rice bluntly. "And at this stage of the game, I don't think it's going to happen."

Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) offered a similar assessment. "I have supported you and the administration on the war, and I cannot continue to support the administration's position," he said. "I have not been told the truth over and over again by administration witnesses, and the American people have not been told the truth."

Rice maintained her composure throughout the hearing, which lasted more than three hours, conceding that doubts are warranted but pleading for patience. "I want you to understand that I, personally, too, understand and know the skepticism that is felt about Iraq and indeed the pessimism that some feel," Rice said.

Asked if she has confidence in the Maliki government, Rice said she did, adding: "I think he knows that his government is on borrowed time."

Appearing at Fort Benning, Ga., Bush told soldiers that daily life in Iraq will eventually improve but that his new strategy will not yield immediate results. "The American people have got to understand that suicide bombings won't stop immediately," Bush said. "The IED attacks won't stop immediately."

Administration officials said nothing to suggest that the troops will be coming home any time soon. At a morning news conference, Gates said the increase in troops is being viewed as a "temporary surge" but added: "No one has a really clear idea of how long that might be."

Gates also announced that he is recommending an increase in the size of the Marine Corps and Army by 92,000 troops over the next five years, and he joined other administration officials in offering new warnings about the power of Iran. He said one consequence of a failed U.S. effort in Iraq would be "an emboldened and strengthened Iran."

Former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), co-chairmen of the Iraq Study Group, issued a statement last night in which they raised questions about the "nature of the surge" and urged the president to further consider other recommendations in the group's report, including conditioning support for the Iraqi government on its meeting of benchmarks, creating an international support group for Iraq and beginning a transition that could enable U.S. forces to begin to leave.

In addition to the new security plan, Bush also called Wednesday for additional funds for economic reconstruction, and like the Iraq Study Group, for political benchmarks for the Iraqi government -- such as a new oil law and provincial elections. But unlike the study group, Bush would impose no penalties on the Iraqis for lack of compliance.

The White House is running the risk that the widespread discontent on Capitol Hill will mushroom into an embarrassing resolution disapproving the president's plan or, worse, the imposition of limitations on funding for the war. White House aides said they fully expected criticism from many quarters, but they expressed disappointment that, as they saw it, many lawmakers do not appear to be giving the new strategy more than a cursory review. More than 130 lawmakers trooped to the White House for personal briefings from the president in recent days -- but to little apparent effect.

Still, White House counselor Dan Bartlett expressed optimism that a showdown with Congress over funding can be avoided, despite a vow by some House Democratic leaders to try to derail funding for the additional troops. "It appears the Democrats are divided on that issue themselves," he said. "We obviously hope it doesn't get to that point -- and my personal opinion is I don't think it will."

Bartlett added that critics should do more than take shots at Bush's plan. "We do believe that those who have decided to reject this plan before it has an opportunity to work have a greater responsibility to propose something that will work," he said. "We have yet to see that from Democrats."

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) vowed to filibuster Democratic efforts to bring to a vote a resolution disapproving the policy, but opponents of the plan may be able to muster the 60 votes needed to break his parliamentary obstacle. Half a dozen Senate Republicans have come out against sending more troops to Iraq, with at least four others expressing skepticism. Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) predicted that the resolution would pick up 12 GOP votes, a count McConnell did not dispute.

DOJ_NMG_0115721

Across Capitol Hill yesterday, the administration also found the going rough. At the House Armed Services Committee, Gates and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, were questioned extensively about the timing of the "surge" in troops, with several committee members from both parties questioning the level of commitment from the Iraqi government.

A House Republican letter to Bush opposing any increase in troop strength garnered nine signatures. Meanwhile, Democratic leaders said they will push a resolution on support for the president's proposal, and House Republicans said Bush risks a major defeat. For Republicans who narrowly escaped defeat in November, the coming vote could be a nightmare, they said.

"The White House will have to work 24 hours a day to find people on our side who aren't going to jump ship," said Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.). "This is a real serious dilemma for members in difficult seats. The next election will be about the White House, not the House. We will rise or fall on our nominee and how this war is going."

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) said he "would not say there are a lot of enthusiastic members over here" in support of the president. "I have zero comfort level with escalating this," he said.

Bush War Plan Draws Fire On Capitol Hill (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, January 12, 2007

President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq ran into a wall of criticism on Capitol Hill on Thursday as administration officials drew confrontational, sometimes mocking challenges from both Democrats and Republicans.

Defense Secretary Robert Gates said in response that the administration might abandon the increase if the Iraqi government doesn't do its part, but he provided no timetable. "I think most of us, in our minds, are thinking of it as a matter of months, not 18 months or two years," he told the House Armed Services Committee.

Bush and top members of his national security team sought to rally support for the troop buildup a day after he unveiled his plan for turning around a conflict that has lasted nearly four years and cost more than 3,000 American military lives.

Instead, Gates and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice found themselves embroiled in the first pitched exchanges in a battle that is likely to dominate Congress for months or longer and is already shaping the 2008 presidential election.

"I think this speech given last night by this president represents the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam, if it's carried out," Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, a potential 2008 presidential contender, told Rice. While he is a Republican, administration officials were defending the plan for the first time to the Democratic-controlled Congress.

Bill Nelson, D-Fla., noted his own past support for the administration on the war but said he could not continue. He declared, "I have not been told the truth over and over again by administration witnesses, and the American people have not been told the truth."

A new AP-Ipsos poll found approval for Bush's handling of Iraq hovering near a record low — 29 percent of Americans approve and 68 percent disapprove.

Bush, visiting with troops at Fort Benning, Ga., cautioned that the troop increase "is not going to yield immediate results. It's going to take awhile."

His plan, outlined in a prime-time address to the nation on Wednesday, would raise troop levels in Iraq by 21,500 — from 132,000 to 153,500 — at a cost of $5.6 billion. It also calls for the Iraqi government to increase its own forces and to do more to quell sectarian violence

"American patience is limited, and obviously if the Iraqis fail to maintain their commitments we'll have to revisit our strategy," said Gates.

At one point Gates, just three weeks on the job, told lawmakers, "I would confess I'm no expert on Iraq." Later, asked about reaching the right balance between American and Iraqi forces, he told the panel he was "no expert on military matters."

Committee members pressed Gates, who replaced Donald H. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon, on an exit strategy for the U.S.

"At the outset of the strategy, it's a mistake to talk about an exit strategy," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0115722

Gates, in testimony to the committee and earlier at a news conference, said he was requesting increasing the size of the Army and Marine Corps by 92,000 troops over the next five years.

He also said the Pentagon would recall to duty sooner than planned some National Guard and Reserve troops who have served yearlong tours in Iraq or Afghanistan.

As Rice testified to the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Rep. Howard Berman, D-Calif., likened Bush's plan to a "hail Maliki pass" — jokingly combining Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's name with the football "Hail Mary" desperation pass.

The U.S. led a coalition that invaded Iraq in March 2003, despite failing to win U.N. Security Council support. The government of Saddam Hussein quickly crumbled and Bush declared major combat operations over two months later.

Bush's war effort initially had strong support, both in Congress and among other Americans. Yet that support has eroded as violence has continued.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said he hoped to bring up a nonbinding resolution next week expressing opposition to any troop buildup. A similar move is expected in the House.

Reid, in a Senate speech, said Bush ignored the results of November's midterm elections that ended 12 years of GOP control of Congress, the advice of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group and that of his own top generals. "In choosing to escalate the war, the president virtually stands alone," Reid said.

The Senate's top Republican, Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, threatened a filibuster — a delaying tactic — to block any legislation expressing disapproval of the buildup plan.

McConnell conceded that GOP lawmakers as well as Democrats are troubled by Bush's new policy, but he said, "Congress is completely incapable of dictating the tactics of the war."

Options for critics of the war to try forcing its end are limited, given the slim margin of Democratic control, especially in the Senate. But votes stating symbolic opposition to the troop buildup could embarrass many Republicans leery of supporting Bush's plan.

Rice appeared in the morning before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and in the afternoon before the House counterpart. She was grilled sharply by members of both parties.

Not a single member of the Senate panel expressed outright support for the president's plan. One after another offered skepticism on various points — from the rationale for the war to al-Maliki's sincerity and resolve, from the need for additional troops to the administration's ruling out talking to Iran and Syria.

"You're going to have to do a much better job" explaining the rationale for the war, "and so is the president," said Sen. George Voinovich, R-Ohio. He said Bush could no longer count on his support for the war.

Rice acknowledged widespread skepticism among Americans. "I want you to know that I understand and indeed feel the heartbreak that Americans feel at the continued sacrifice of American lives," she said.

Rice engaged several tense exchanges with members, including with Hagel, a Vietnam veteran and longtime critic of Bush's Iraq policy. She disputed his characterization of Bush's buildup as an "escalation."

"Putting in 22,000 more troops is not an escalation?" Hagel asked. Responded Rice: "I think, senator, escalation is not just a matter of how many numbers you put in."

"Would you call it a decrease?" Hagel asked.

"I would call it, senator, an augmentation that allows the Iraqis to deal with this very serious problem that they have in Baghdad," she said.

When Rice disputed Hagel's contention that Iraq was in the throes of civil war, Hagel shot back: "To sit there and say that, that's just not true."

Said Committee Chairman Joe Biden of Delaware: "I believe the president's strategy is not a solution, Secretary Rice. I believe it's a tragic mistake"

Rice told senators there was a "national imperative not to fail."

The Senate panel was flush with 2008 presidential hopefuls and possible contenders, including Hagel, Biden and Democrats John Kerry of Massachusetts, Christopher Dodd of Connecticut and Barack Obama of Illinois.

DOJ_NMG_0115723

Meanwhile, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., another presidential hopeful, said after a meeting at the White House that he was concerned about al-Maliki's capabilities as well as "whether these are sufficient number of troops.

But, he said, "I do think we can succeed." McCain is among a handful of lawmakers who have called for more — not fewer — U.S. troops in Iraq.

Rice, Gates Face Hill Heat Over Iraq Plan (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, January 12, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates met hostility yesterday on Capitol Hill when they tried to defend President Bush's decision to send about 21,500 more combat troops to Iraq.

"I believe it's a tragic mistake," said Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and one of five presidential aspirants on the panel that questioned Miss Rice.

Sen. Barbara Boxer, California Democrat, noted Miss Rice has no children of her own to lose overseas, as Democrats flexed their new majority to force debate on Mr. Bush's Iraq policy -- something they said has been missing under Republican control.

"Who pays the price?" Mrs. Boxer repeatedly demanded. "You're not going to pay a particular price," she told Miss Rice, because the secretary has no "immediate family" at risk.

The comments came after Miss Rice opened the hearing by acknowledging widespread concerns about the war and called for "a national imperative not to fail in Iraq."

"Americans broadly agree -- and we in the administration count ourselves among them -- that the situation in Iraq is unacceptable," said Miss Rice.

Neither Miss Rice nor Mr. Gates guaranteed that the troop surge announced by Mr. Bush on Wednesday night will succeed in stabilizing Baghdad, but they said there were indications that it would. They said it will be clear within a couple of months whether the Iraqis will fulfill their commitment to crack down on militias and death squads.

"I don't think anybody has a definite idea of how long a surge would last," Mr. Gates told the House Armed Services Committee. "I think for most of us, in our minds, we are thinking of it as a matter of months, not 18 months or two years."

The secretary, who took charge of the Pentagon from Donald H. Rumsfeld last month and was joined by Joint Chiefs Chairman Gen. Peter Pace, said the additional troops would arrive in Iraq in waves and suggested that some may be held back if the Iraqi government does not keep its end of the bargain.

"American patience is limited, and obviously if the Iraqis fail to maintain their commitments we'll have to revisit our strategy," Mr. Gates said.

The administration pleaded for Congress to study the proposal rather than ruling it out immediately, as Mr. Bush and top members of his national security team began their first push for support.

While his secretaries were taking the heat, Mr. Bush traveled to the friendlier environs of Fort Benning, Ga., where he cautioned that the troop increase "is not going to yield immediate results. It's going to take awhile."

Mr. Bush's plan, outlined in a prime-time address to the nation, would raise troop levels in Iraq by 21,500 -- from 132,000 to 153,500 -- at a cost of $5.6 billion. It also calls for the Iraqi government to increase its own forces and to do more to quell sectarian violence.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, promised to give the new plan careful consideration, but he said on the Senate floor, "In choosing to escalate the war, the president virtually stands alone."

Many of the Senate panel's Republicans also were critical, including Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, John E. Sununu of New Hampshire and Lisa Murkowski of Alaska.

"I think this speech given last night by this president represents the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam, if it's carried out," Mr. Hagel said.

Miss Rice engaged in a tense exchange with Mr. Hagel, a Vietnam veteran and longtime critic of Mr. Bush's Iraq policy, disputing his characterization of Mr. Bush's buildup as an "escalation."

DOJ_NMG_0115724

"Putting in 22,000 more troops is not an escalation?" Mr. Hagel asked. "Would you call it a decrease?"

Miss Rice replied: "I would call it, Senator, an augmentation that allows the Iraqis to deal with this very serious problem that they have in Baghdad."

Mr. Hagel told Miss Rice, "Madame Secretary, Iraqis are killing Iraqis. We are in a civil war. This is sectarian violence out of control."

She disputed that Iraq was in the throes of a civil war. To that, Mr. Hagel said, "To sit there and say that, that's just not true."

Meanwhile, after a meeting at the White House, Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, expressed both doubts and optimism about the strategy.

"I do not guarantee victory or success," Mr. McCain told reporters. "If we do fail, there is going to be chaos in the region, and I believe that we would pay an even heavier price in American blood and treasure."

Miss Rice, in comments overheard on an open microphone between TV interviews, said she did not plan to "descend" on Baghdad during a Middle East trip beginning today, because it is not the time to "beat their brains out."

The government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki should be given some "breathing space" after listening to Mr. Bush describe the situation in Iraq as unacceptable, she said.

The secretary yesterday appointed a retired career diplomat, Timothy Carney, to coordinate economic aid and reconstruction efforts in Baghdad. Mr. Carney, a former ambassador to Haiti, served as an adviser to the U.S. occupation authority in Iraq in 2003.

"In order to better deliver on the governance and economic side, the United States is further decentralizing and diversifying our civilian presence," Miss Rice said at the Senate hearing. "We need to get civilians out of our embassy, out of the Green Zone, into the field across Iraq."

Senate Panel Scraps With Rice Over Iraq Strategy (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — Congressional critics of President Bush's new Iraq strategy say it includes bellicose threats that might provoke Iran and lead to a wider regional conflict.

In his speech Wednesday, Bush said he was sending a second aircraft-carrier battle group to the region and Patriot missiles to U.S. Arab allies. He promised to "seek out and destroy" Iranian and Syrian networks providing arms and training to Iraqi insurgents and militias.

The U.S. arrest of six Iranians on Thursday in the northern Iraqi region of Kurdistan added to the level of congressional anxiety about U.S. policy. The Pentagon denied the Iranians were diplomats.

On Thursday, Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph Biden of Delaware asked Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice whether Bush thought he had authority to send U.S. forces into Iran in pursuit of those supporting attacks on U.S. troops.

"We believe we can do what we need to do inside Iraq," Rice said.

Biden warned that Congress had not authorized an expanded war and that the administration would face a "constitutional confrontation in the Senate" if it tried to broaden the conflict without congressional approval.

The incident in the Kurdish city of Irbil followed a similar one last month in Baghdad where U.S. troops detained two Iranians in the compound of a pro-Iranian Iraqi leader, Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim. The two were subsequently released.

"When you set in motion the kind of policy the president is talking about here, it's very, very dangerous," Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., said in reference to Bush's policy on Iran. "To ask our young men and women to sacrifice their lives to be put in the middle of a civil war is wrong," he added.

Hagel and Biden have urged the administration to start talks with Iran and Syria, a proposal that Rice rejected. Efforts to talk to Syria during the first Bush term failed, she said, and Iran must end its efforts to enrich uranium before the United States would begin a dialogue with Iran. The United States says Iran is trying to make a nuclear bomb.

DOJ_NMG_0115725

Before a skeptical bipartisan audience at the Foreign Relations Committee, Rice defended Bush's plan to increase the number of troops in Iraq by more than 21,000. There are currently about 132,000 U.S. troops in Iraq.

Rice and new Defense Secretary Robert Gates said the strategy would change, although they did not say how, if Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki did not live up to his commitments to promote political reconciliation. Rice would not put a time limit on the escalation. Gates said it would last for "months, not 18 months or two years."

Some of the criticism was predictable from a body that includes several presidential aspirants, but some of the critics were new, such as Sens. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., and George Voinovich, R-Ohio.

Coleman said he was not prepared to support the administration's new policy because he had not seen a sufficient "level of commitment and resolve" from the al-Maliki government and "the cost (to American families) is too high."

"You're going to have to do a much better job, and so is the president, in explaining this to us," Voinovich told Rice. "I've gone along with the president and bought into his dream" of an Iraqi democracy, but no longer, he said.

Lawmakers Grill Rice Over The Iraq War (AP)

By Calvin Woodward

AP, January 12, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice found herself at the intersection of anger and ambition when senators called her to account Thursday for a deeply unpopular war.

Five presidential aspirants on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, as well as other up-and-comers in the new Democratic majority, made sure their voices were heard. And these voices — Republican ones included — were full of frustration and mistrust about how President Bush has prosecuted and pitched the Iraq war.

Even Rice's status as a single woman was fair game.

Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., noted Rice has no children of her own to lose overseas. "Who pays the price?" Boxer repeatedly demanded. "You're not going to pay a particular price," she told Rice, because the secretary has no "immediate family" at risk.

On the other side of the Capitol, Defense Secretary Robert Gates, a new face on the years-old Iraq policy, largely got a pass when he testified before the House Armed Service Committee about Bush's Iraq strategy.

Rice is notably unflappable. Her face was tight, her voice even, occasionally and briefly speeding up to meet the jabs coming her way. She did not give much away or lose her temper.

But she might find her trip to the volatile Middle East starting Friday a vacation compared with her time before the committee.

Rice calmly walked the committee through the revamped war plan while acknowledging that what has been done until now has not succeeded. "I ask that you give it a chance to work," she said.

"There have been other critical times for America, when we have united as one nation to meet great challenges. Now must be such a time, for it is a national desire and a national imperative not to fail in Iraq."

Years of pent-up frustration in both parties spilled over.

A "fool's paradise," was how Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd, who had just announced his Democratic presidential candidacy hours earlier, described Iraq policy.

"A tragic mistake," was how Delaware Sen. Joe Biden, the committee chairman and White House hopeful, put it.

And this, from a Republican who also has presidential aspirations: "The most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam." Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska was talking about Bush's speech on Wednesday night, when the president announced his plan to increase U.S. troops in Iraq.

Hagel has opposed the Bush policy for some time. But Sen. Bill Nelson, a moderate Democrat from Florida, has supported it. No more.

"I have not been told the truth," Nelson said. "I have not been told the truth over and over again."

Two more presidential aspirants weighed in. "Unbelievably off the mark," Democratic Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts said of Bush's approach. Democratic Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois picked through the Iraq policy in a restrained fashion.

DOJ_NMG_0115726

Boxer made it personal.

"I'm not going to pay a personal price," she said. "My kids are too old and my grandchild is too young. You're not going to pay a particular price, as I understand it, with an immediate family."

Boxer talked about families losing loved ones and soldiers in hospital burn units. "These are the people who pay the price."

Rice said evenly that she understands the sacrifice of service members and families.

"I visit them. I know what they're going through. I talk to their families. I see it. I could never and I can never do anything to replace any of those lost men and women in uniform, or the diplomats, some of whom. ..."

Boxer cut her off.

"Madam Secretary, please," she said. "I know you feel terrible about it. That's not the point. I was making the case as to who pays the price for your decisions."

In the House, lawmakers appeared mindful of Gates' status as the newcomer on the Bush administration's Iraq team and largely avoided the kind of tough questions and pointed comments that senators heaved at Rice.

"We are blessed to have you, Mr. Secretary," the committee chairman, Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., said at the outset.

Gates, sworn in Dec. 18, noted that his testimony came on "the anniversary of the conclusion of my third week in the job."

Some of the toughest comments were directed toward Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

"This is the craziest, dumbest plan I've ever seen or heard of in my life," Rep. Neil Abercrombie, D-Hawaii, told Pace.

Rice, A Uniter Of The Divided (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

Within minutes of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's arrival on Capitol Hill yesterday, it became apparent that the Bush administration had, after four divisive years, finally succeeded in uniting Congress on the war in Iraq.

Unfortunately for Rice, the lawmakers were unified in opposition to President Bush's new policy.

"I have to say, Madam Secretary," a seething Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) told Rice, "that I think this speech given last night by this president represents the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam."

"Madam Secretary," added Sen. Bill Nelson of Florida, a moderate Democrat, "I have supported you and the administration on the war, and I cannot continue to support the administration's position. . . . I have not been told the truth over and over again."

"You're going to have to do a much better job," lectured Sen. George Voinovich, an Ohio Republican. "I've gone along with the president on this, and I bought into his dream, and at this stage of the game, I don't think it's going to happen."

It was a bipartisan scolding of the sort rarely seen in the Bush presidency, and Rice endured it, for the most part, with quiet indignation. She stared expressionlessly at her tormentors or looked down at the table, occasionally noting their complaints on a memo pad with her No. 2 pencil: "Crisis in the region . . . Iraqis killing Iraqis . . . Withdrawal." The oversized yellow leather chair at the witness table made Rice look small, and for much of the hearing she sat hunched, her hands clasped tightly in her lap. Only once did she betray her agitation by pounding her clasped hands to her thigh, out of the senators' view.

Rice tried not to be baited. A ferocious Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), noting that the childless Rice is not at risk of losing her own offspring in Iraq, displayed a 2005 quote from the secretary saying she had "no doubt" about a troop reduction in Iraq. "You had absolutely no doubt about how great it was going," Boxer said.

"Senator, let's not overstate the case," Rice soothed. "I don't think I said it was going great."

But ultimately, Rice could not avoid quarrels. Hagel, a Vietnam veteran, angrily condemned the "escalation" of the war. "To ask our young men and women to sacrifice their lives to be put in the middle of a civil war is . . . morally wrong. It's tactically, strategically, militarily wrong."

"I don't see it, and the president doesn't see it, as an escalation," Rice replied.

Hagel looked stunned. "Putting 22,000 new troops, more troops in, is not an escalation?"

"Escalation is not just a matter of how many numbers you put in," Rice ventured.

"Would you call it a decrease?" Hagel pressed.

"I would call it, Senator, an augmentation."

DOJ_NMG_0115727

Rice rejected lawmakers' pleas to consider talks with Iran and Syria ("That's not diplomacy; that's extortion") and refused to promise that Bush would seek permission from Congress before attacking either country.

The senators reacted with a palpable fury. "I send letters out to the families and tell them about how brave their sons were and that the work they're doing there and the deaths were as important as what we had in the Second World War," Voinovich told Rice. "But I have to rewrite the letter today."

Rice had little with which to answer him. "I think that we don't have an option to fail in Iraq," she replied.

Voinovich glared from the dais.

The Foreign Relations panel is a murderers' row of political egos, with seven members who have contemplated 2008 presidential runs. But the frustration with Rice's answers had the salutary effect of breaking down party divisions. Democrat Chris Dodd (Conn.), who had just announced his presidential candidacy on "Imus in the Morning," gave a hug to Republican Hagel. Democrat Nelson praised Republican Norm Coleman (Minn.). Republican Lisa Murkowski (Alaska) concurred with Democrat Boxer. And Democrat Russ Feingold (Wis.) had only the warmest words for Hagel.

Some lawmakers wanted withdrawal from Iraq, others favored a bigger U.S. commitment, but most everybody saw Bush's plan as inadequate. "I hope you'll convey to the president," Chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.) urged Rice, "that you heard 21 members, with one or two notable exceptions, expressing outright hostility, disagreement and/or overwhelming concern with the president's proposal."

Indeed, the lone lawmaker showing some sympathy was Republican Johnny Isakson of Georgia, who muddied his defense with an extended metaphor about gambling. He said Bush's speech Wednesday night made clear "this one is for all the marbles," and he advised Iraqis to heed "Kenny Rogers' old song, 'You got to know when to hold 'em and know when to fold 'em.' It's time for them to deliver on the hand that they've dealt."

But Barack Obama, for one, wasn't playing at Isakson's table. "This administration took a gamble," the Illinois Democrat said. "It appears that it has failed, and essentially the administration repeatedly has said we're doubling down."

There were demonstrators in the room: a woman from a left-wing group who applauded when Dodd labeled the Iraq policy "a fool's paradise," and a man who was led off by police shouting, "Lies! It's all lies!" But such heckling was redundant at a hearing in which more than a dozen senators vied for time to berate the witness. "Quite possibly the greatest foreign policy mistake in the history of our nation," Feingold proclaimed.

Less shrill but more powerful were the words of Bush's loyal supporters, who wore queasy looks as they challenged the new Iraq policy. Coleman rested his forehead on his hand, then asked Rice: "Why wouldn't it be wiser to hold the Iraqis to certain benchmarks?" John Sununu (R-N.H.) complained of a "refusal to share information." David Vitter (R-La.) judged: "Too little, maybe too late."

Even Murkowski, a junior senator who rarely breaks with the administration, joined in the denunciations. "You've clearly heard the skepticism that has been expressed this morning -- so many of my colleagues, and for good reason, skepticism about a lot of things," she said. The Alaskan spoke of her "great concern" that the United States is now in "a situation that I had hoped we would not be in."

Murkowski pleaded with Rice for assurances "that this is going to yield us a better result, a different result than what we have seen in the past."

Rice could offer none. "Senator," she said, "there aren't any guarantees."

Bush's Plan For Iraq Runs Into Opposition In Congress (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And David S. Cloud

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 President Bush's call to increase the American military commitment in Iraq ran into intense Congressional opposition Thursday from Democrats and from moderate Republicans who expressed profound skepticism.

A day after the president set out a new strategy for bringing stability to Iraq, the White House found few allies on either side of the aisle when Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice appeared before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The reception she received suggested that Mr. Bush's prime-time address to the nation on Wednesday had done little to build political support for sending additional troops to Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0115728

"I think what occurred here today was fairly profound, in the sense that you heard 21 members, with one or two notable exceptions, expressing outright hostility, disagreement and or overwhelming concern with the president's proposal," the committee's new Democratic chairman, Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, said at the conclusion of Ms. Rice's testimony.

Republicans were more supportive in the House, where the new defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, and Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, testified before the Armed Services Committee. But Democrats were scathing in their criticism, and in both the House and the Senate, Democratic leaders moved ahead with plans to oppose Mr. Bush's plan through nonbinding resolutions.

While saying they do not plan any immediate effort to try to thwart the Bush plan by cutting off funds, some Democrats said they would continue to consider placing limitations on the administration when Congress considers a war spending measure later in the year.

Despite the decision by many members of his party to break with the White House over the troop increase, the Republican leader in the Senate, Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, said he would use parliamentary tactics to try to thwart the Democratic effort to adopt the Senate resolution opposing the plan.

In Baghdad, Iraq's Shiite-led government responded tepidly to Mr. Bush's announcement that he would send more than 20,000 additional troops to Iraq to bolster the effort to curb rampant sectarian violence.

Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki failed to appear as scheduled at a news conference and did not make any public comment.

Meanwhile, President Bush and his top cabinet officials spent Thursday traveling and testifying in support of his new Iraq strategy.

Early in the day, in an emotional ceremony at the White House, Mr. Bush awarded the Medal of Honor to the family of Cpl. Jason Dunham, a marine from Scio, N.Y., who was killed in Iraq in 2004 when he threw himself on a grenade to save the rest of his unit. The president began crying during the ceremony. It was the second Medal of Honor proceeding to come out of the Iraq war.

Afterward, he traveled to Fort Benning, Ga., where he spoke to Army soldiers about the Iraq plan. He said his approach would not produce an immediate reduction in violence but represented "our best chance for success." Some of the troops based at Fort Benning have already served twice in Iraq and are scheduled for a third deployment.

Ms. Rice appeared on morning news programs before joining Mr. Gates at a news conference in the White House. Both then moved to Capitol Hill for a first substantive showdown with the new Democratic majority and an encounter with the shifting politics of the war.

At the House Armed Services Committee hearing, it was standing-room-only, with some spectators sprawled on the floor and others spilling out the door.

In the Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing room, Senator Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, a Republican who has been critical of the administration's handling of the war, drew applause when he described the president's proposals as a "dangerous foreign policy blunder," and vowed to oppose them. Senator Russell D. Feingold, a Wisconsin Democrat and a vigorous opponent of the war, spoke of it as "quite possibly the greatest foreign policy mistake in the history of our nation."

Expressing doubt about whether Iraqis "are done killing each other," Senator Norm Coleman, Republican of Minnesota, said, "Why put more American lives on the line now in the hope that this time they'll make the difficult choice?"

Several Republicans questioned the Bush plan without rejecting it outright, but their call for greater detail made it clear they remained unconvinced. Senator John Sununu of New Hampshire agreed that approving new legislation in Iraq on sharing oil revenue would be central to weaving estranged Sunni Arabs into the political process, but he said no United States government official could describe the law to him.

"It's the most remarkable law that no one has ever seen," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0115729

Away from the Congressional hearings, White House and Pentagon officials held a series of private meetings with lawmakers on Thursday in an attempt to blunt the criticism, especially from Republicans.

Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new American commander in Iraq, waved off reporters as he shuttled between the offices of Republican Senators John W. Warner of Virginia and Jeff Sessions of Alabama. "Please, guys. Can I just make the rounds up here?" he said, declining to answer further questions.

During their testimony, Mr. Gates and Ms. Rice declined to specify a time limit on the troop increase and were cautious about predicting rapid improvements in security in Baghdad, where most of the additional troops will be positioned, saying progress is likely to come gradually.

"I think that we all know that the stakes in Iraq are enormous and that the consequences of failure would also be enormous not just for America and for Iraq, but for the entire region of the Middle East and indeed for the world," Ms. Rice said.

The deployment schedule, in which more than 20,000 fresh soldiers and marines would roll into Iraq over several months, was intended to give the president time to reconsider the increase should the Iraqi government fail to provide its share of security forces as promised, Ms. Rice said.

"I have met Prime Minister Maliki," she said. "I was with him in Amman. I saw his resolve. I think he knows that his government is, in a sense, on borrowed time, not just in terms of the American people, but in terms of the Iraqi people."

Still, she spoke directly about Mr. Maliki's failure to come through on his past promises to bring additional Iraqi troops into Baghdad. "They haven't performed in the past and so the president is absolutely right, and we have all been saying to them, 'You have to perform,'" she said.

Mr. Gates would not say when asked whether the planned American troop increases over the next few months could be withheld if additional Iraqi units promised for Baghdad failed to materialize.

"We are going to have a number of opportunities to go back to the Iraqis and point out where they have failed to meet their commitments," he said, adding, "I think our assumption going forward is that they have every intention of making this work."

Pressed repeatedly by members of both parties about what steps the Bush administration would take if Iraq continued to balk, he added, "We would clearly have to relook at the strategy."

Mr. Gates said the Pentagon was revising rules governing mobilization of Army National Guard and Reserve members so troops who had already done a tour in Iraq in the past five years could now be sent back to Iraq if their units was remobilized. But the new policy would aim to shorten the time Guard members were mobilized to a maximum of a year.

He also announced a large permanent increase in the active duty Army and Marine Corps, a repudiation of the approach of former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who argued for keeping ground force levels low and insisted that authorization for any additional troops be done temporarily.

Under Mr. Bush's plan, the active duty Army total manpower over the next five years would grow to 547,000, an increase of 39,000 over the current level. In addition, the Marine Corps would grow to 202,000, an increase of 23,000. The expansions would have to be approved by Congress.

Democrats in both the House and Senate would not rule out eventually putting limitations on financing for the war if Mr. Bush continued on a course they contended defied the will of Congress and the American public. But they say that possibility, which could open them to Republican attacks, will have to be faced later when an emergency spending request and Pentagon spending are considered in the spring and summer.

Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, the Democratic chairman of the appropriations subcommittee that sets military spending and a leading party critic of the war, is exploring ways to attach conditions to a Pentagon measure.

Representative David R. Obey, Democrat of Wisconsin and chairman of the Appropriations Committee, said "a wide variety of ideas are bubbling forth," for how the party should respond to the president. But beyond voting on a resolution to symbolically oppose the Iraq plan, he said it remained unlikely that Democrats could block the troop increase to Baghdad.

"If you were going to have a so-called surge, part of that is supposedly by keeping people there longer," Mr. Obey said. "It's pretty hard to shut off funds for troops who are already there, so it gets very, very complicated."

DOJ_NMG_0115730

Late Thursday, James A. Baker III and Lee Hamilton, the co-chairmen of the Iraq Study Group, whose report in November the Bush administration largely spurned, said in a statement that some of its recommendations were reflected in Mr. Bush's plan and urged the White House to give "further consideration" to the panel's remaining ideas.

At the Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing, Mr. Biden issued a sharp warning to the administration after Mr. Gates discussed recent raids against Iranians in Iraq, including one in Erbil early Thursday, and described them as part of a new effort "to root out the networks" involved in bringing Iranian-supplied explosive devices into Iraq.

Mr. Biden responded by saying that the vote to authorize the president to order the use of force to topple Saddam Hussein should not be used as a vehicle for mounting attacks inside Iran, even in pursuit of cells or networks assisting insurgents or sectarian militias.

"I just want the record to show and I would like to have a legal response from the State Department if they think they have authority to pursue networks or anything else across the border into Iran and Iraq that will generate a constitutional confrontation here in the Senate, I predict to you," Mr. Biden said.

Also, the State Department announced on Thursday that Timothy Carney, a retired Foreign Service officer who served as a senior civilian American authority in Iraq for three months in 2003, is the new coordinator for Iraq reconstruction.

Devastating Criticism On Iraq By Both Parties (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 — From the very first remarks, the tone was set: courteous, serious — and devastating.

When Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice appeared before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Thursday, the Democrats, newly ascendant in Congress and frustrated by the war in Iraq, controlled the microphone.

Senator Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut accused the administration of letting American soldiers be used as "cannon fodder." Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., the chairman, called the president's new strategy "a tragic mistake" and said the plan "is more likely to make things worse." Senator Bill Nelson, of Florida, and a former supporter of administration policy, said he could no longer back the president.

"I have not been told the truth," Mr. Nelson said. "I have not been told the truth over and over again by administration witnesses, and the American people have not been told the truth."

Perhaps surprisingly, the language changed little when it was the Republicans' turn. "You've clearly heard the skepticism that has been expressed this morning by so many of my colleagues, and for good reason," said Senator Lisa Murkowski of Alaska. Senator George V. Voinovich of Ohio, noting that he previously went along with the president and "bought into his dream," demanded the administration "do a much better job" of explaining its strategy. A smattering of applause erupted when Senator Chuck Hagel of Nebraska warned that Mr. Bush's new plan would be "the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam, if it's carried out."

On a committee renowned for its bipartisanship and restraint, the questioning on Thursday, the day after a major presidential address on Iraq, amounted to a powerful blast. Though the mood was somber and the tone remained polite, members of the committee pressed Ms. Rice with extraordinary sharpness. And on a panel with at least five lawmakers considering running for president, members kept reminding the secretary — and one another — that the stakes were extraordinarily high.

"The fundamental question that the American people — and, I think, every senator on this panel, Republican and Democrat — are having to face now is, at what point do we say, 'Enough'?" said Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, a likely Democratic presidential contender.

Administration officials fanned out across Capitol Hill to answer that question, over and over, on Thursday, facing a hostile Congress and varying degrees of partisanship.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, who inherited the war in Iraq just three weeks ago, appeared before members of the House Armed Services Committee to discuss the increase in troop levels. Members thanked him for his candor, seemingly grateful to have a new witness before them, rather than former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who was often combative.

DOJ_NMG_0115731

The soft-spoken Mr. Gates, making his first appearance as defense secretary before the committee that oversees the military, admitted that "mistakes have certainly been made by the United States in Iraq, just like in virtually every war in human history."

"That is the nature of war," Mr. Gates said. "But however we got to this moment, the stakes now are incalculable."

The party lines were clearer in the House hearing before the Armed Services committee, where Representative Duncan Hunter of California, the most senior Republican and other Republicans offered their support for the administration and Democrats pressed for an exact calendar in Iraq. "At what point do we say, 'Enough is enough'?" said Representative Martin T. Meehan, Democrat of Massachusetts.

But it was left to Ms. Rice, an important fixture — and survivor — in an administration now in its seventh year, to defend against the tough condemnations in the Senate, where a vote on a resolution about the war could take place as early as next week.

Seated alone at a large table in front of the committee in a chilly Senate hearing room, where the front rows were filled with protesters, Ms. Rice appeared frustrated at times, as committee members variously interrupted her, challenged her or all but accused her of representing a dishonest administration.

Lawmakers argued with Ms. Rice over what to call the latest plan — she corrected critics who referred to it as an "escalation," describing it as an "augmentation" — and over whether a civil war is underway.

When Ms. Rice asserted that insurgents, not warring Shiite and Sunni factions, were mainly responsible for American casualties, Mr. Hagel shot back, "Madame Secretary, your intelligence and mine is a lot different."

He added, "To sit there and say that, Madame Secretary, that's just not true."

"Well, Senator, if you'll — ," Ms. Rice began.

"That is not true," Mr. Hagel repeated.

"Senator, if you'll allow me to finish," Ms. Rice said, visibly exasperated, finally conceding that Iraqi attacks on other Iraqis are taking place in the form of death squads.

Even with at least five members of the committee preparing to run against one another for president, their themes were unified. Mr. Biden, who has said he will run, deftly called on his potential rivals, including Mr. Dodd, who had announced his candidacy hours earlier on the Don Imus radio show, and Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, the former Democratic presidential nominee.

Mr. Biden and Mr. Hagel, another possible contender, exchanged whispers at various points; Mr. Obama stopped to chat with Mr. Biden before leaving the hearing early.

Perhaps the most aggressive questioner of Ms. Rice was the Democrat who has announced he will not run: Senator Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin, who has consistently opposed the war and demanded Thursday that Congress "use the power of the purse" to cut off financing and take American troops out of Iraq.

In an especially contentious exchange, Mr. Feingold asked Ms. Rice: "Is the United States more secure now as a result of our military incursion into Iraq than we were before we entered Iraq?" Dissatisfied with her responses, Mr. Feingold repeated the same line three more times.

The only moment of levity came as a protester was dragged from the room; Mr. Hagel joked that the man must have been from Delaware, Mr. Biden's home state.

Getting Iraq To Work (WSJ)

By Rudy Giuliani And Newt Gingrich

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

The American mission in Iraq must succeed. Our goal -- promoting a stable, accountable democracy in the heart of the Middle East -- cannot be achieved by purely military means.

Iraqis need to establish a civil society. Without the support of mediating civic and social associations -- the informal ties that bind us together -- no government can long remain stable and no cohesive nation can be maintained. To establish a civil society,

DOJ_NMG_0115732

Iraqis must rebuild their basic infrastructure. Iraqis must take control of their destiny by rebuilding houses, stores, schools, roads, highways, mosques and churches.

But the constant threat of violence, combined with a high unemployment rate estimated between 30% and 50%, fundamentally undermines that effort. This not only sustains the fertile breeding ground for terrorist recruiters but has the same corrosive effect as it would in any city -- raising the likelihood of further violence, civic decay and a crippling sense of powerlessness.

A massive effort must be made to engage in a well organized plan to rebuild Iraq. The goal: an infrastructure to support and encourage a strong, stable civil society.

The week before Christmas, the Pentagon asked Congress to approve a supplemental $100 billion for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, on top of the estimated $500 billion spent to date. The administration should direct a small percent of that amount to create an Iraqi Citizen Job Corps, along the lines of FDR's civilian conservation corps during the Great Depression. The Job Corps can operate under the supervision of our military and with its protection. The Army Corps of Engineers might be particularly helpful in directing this effort. It will place our military in a constructive relationship with the Iraqis -- both literally and figuratively.

Today, Iraq has almost 200 state-owned factories that have been abandoned by the governing authorities since the outbreak of war in 2003. Deputy Undersecretary of Defense Paul A. Brinkley has led a team to 26 of those facilities, traveling far beyond the Green Zone to idled plants from Fallujah to Ramadi. Mr. Brinkley believes that under Department of Defense leadership, at least 10 of these facilities could be re-opened almost immediately, putting more than 10,000 Iraqis to work within weeks. This should be done without delay -- and it is only the beginning.

The wages that these thousands of gainfully employed workers receive will be used to purchase goods and services that will employ other Iraqis. Those goods and services must be produced by still other Iraqis. These are the first steps in creating the requisite conditions of a stable functioning economy and the best hope of displacing retribution and violence with hope and opportunity.

We must try to achieve constructive and compassionate goals through conservative means -- jump starting civic improvement and the individual work ethic in Iraq, without creating permanent subsidies. The goal is to get more Iraqis working, especially young males, who are most susceptible to the terrorist and warlord recruiters.

There are many lessons from the successful welfare reforms in New York City that can be readily applied in Iraq. In the early 1990s, New York City suffered an average of 2,000 murders a year while more than 1.1 million people -- one out of every seven New Yorkers -- were unemployed and on welfare. Too many neighborhoods were pervaded by a sense of hopelessness that came from a combination of high crime, high unemployment and despair. "Workfare" proved an excellent method to change this destructive decades-long paradigm. It required able-bodied welfare recipients to work 20 hours a week in exchange for their benefits. In the process, we reasserted the value of the social contract, which says that for every right there is a responsibility, for every benefit an obligation.

As many as 37,000 people participated at a single time, working in the neighborhoods that most needed their help, cleaning up streets with the Sanitation Department, removing graffiti from schools and government buildings, or helping to beautify public spaces in the Parks Department.

More than 250,000 individuals went through our Workfare program between 1994 and 2001, and their effort helped to visibly improve the quality of life in New York City. Many of them moved on to permanent employment. This change from welfare to work did as much as the New York Police Department Compstat program to keep reducing crime. A similar model can work in Iraq.

There is an opportunity not only to increase employment by rebuilding roads, houses, schools and government buildings, but also to engage the Iraqi people to participate in laying the foundation for a civil and prosperous society.

The population of Iraq is roughly 30 million with a pre-war median annual income equivalent to $700. Subsidizing unemployed Iraqis with a meaningful wage in exchange for meaningful work rebuilding their society is well within the means of the U.S. and its allies.

DOJ_NMG_0115733

The entire effort will help stabilize and grow the Iraqi economy. It should be open to all willing Iraqis -- Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds -- as a means of helping to create a common culture through shared participation in work projects to rebuild and take ownership of their nation.

One word of caution: The program should be overseen by the U.S. military, not private contractors, to avoid unnecessary delays in deployment or accusations of cronyism in the bidding process. Our military will still be devoted to its primary role of hunting down terrorists and patrolling the streets, but administering a jobs program would be a direct extension of their effort to secure law and order. After the program has been started and becomes successful, it can be transferred to a civilian authority within the Iraqi government.

The creation of an Iraqi Citizen Job Corps will help expedite the establishment of a more stable civil society and improve the growing Iraqi economy through the transforming power of an honest day's work.

Mr. Giuliani is the former mayor of New York City. Mr. Gingrich is a former speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives.

Rice Seeks Backing Abroad For Iraq Plan (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

With President Bush's plan to boost troops in Iraq facing blistering criticism at home, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice departs today on another difficult sales mission: winning the support of Arabs for the Iraq plan and seeking momentum for a renewed push on Middle East peace.

Rice endured hours of tough questions in both the Senate and House foreign policy panels yesterday over the administration's strategy for Iraq and its diplomacy toward Iraq's neighbors, particularly Iran and Syria. She had prepared for the hearings carefully, anticipating some of the toughest questions at several practice sessions known as "murder boards," and so remained unruffled when lawmakers pummeled her with complaints.

The stakes could not be higher on Rice's week-long trip to Israel, Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Germany and Britain. She is trying to knit together her vision of a "new Middle East" from the turmoil and conflict spawned in part by the Iraq war and the rising influence of radical Islamic groups, such as Hezbollah and Hamas. Iran has emerged as a more powerful regional power partly because of U.S. missteps in Iraq. Administration officials say the rise of Iran has to some extent given such historic antagonists as Israel and Saudi Arabia common strategic interests.

Rice has said she sees the turmoil as offering opportunity. "This is a different Middle East," she told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee yesterday. "This Middle East is a Middle East in which there really is a new alignment of forces," pitting "reformers and responsible leaders" in Israel, Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Iraq and the Palestinian territories against "extremists of every sect and ethnicity who use violence to spread chaos, to undermine democratic governments and to impose agendas of hatred and intolerance."

The glue that is supposed to help link the positive forces is a sustained personal effort by Rice to make progress on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, administration officials and diplomats said. Bush has called repeatedly for a "two-state solution" to the conflict, but Arabs and outside analysts have complained that in the past six years the administration has frequently disengaged when the obstacles seemed too great.

Philip D. Zelikow, until earlier this month Rice's counselor at the State Department, said the new effort has "three big pillars," including a comprehensive effort in the Middle East to win support for the Iraqi government and rallying the region to stand up to the extremism of Iran and al-Qaeda.

"Undergirding the rest is an intensified effort on the next phase of the Israeli-Palestinian peace process," Zelikow said, adding that it would include winning greater public backing for Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas from Arab countries such as Saudi Arabia.

U.S. officials quietly encouraged Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert recently to say something positive about a 2002 Saudi peace plan that included recognition of Israel as a way of breaking the ice between the Jewish state and the kingdom with Islam's holiest sites. Olmert's predecessor, Ariel Sharon, had shunned the Saudi plan.

DOJ_NMG_0115734

In recent months, Rice has initiated a new forum known as the "GCC plus two," which brings together the six nations in the Gulf Cooperation Council with Egypt and Jordan. Arab sources say the participants have agreed to the meetings with great reluctance, believing they could not afford to cross Rice. Another meeting is scheduled for Rice's stop in Kuwait.

A senior administration official acknowledged yesterday there is concern that the forum will be seen as an anti-Iranian alliance but said it has proved to be "quite productive for consultations."

Rice's aides have tried to lower expectations for this round of diplomacy, saying she was mainly hoping to listen to ideas. The official yesterday denied a report in the upcoming issue of Time magazine that Rice had joined with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni in a bid to put aside a previous peace plan known as the "road map" and leap right to final-status talks to bolster Abbas. An Israeli official also denied the report.

Still, diplomats who have met with Rice say they have been impressed with her sense of personal commitment to trying to make a breakthrough this year.

Dennis Ross, a former Middle East envoy who has known Rice since they were both young Soviet specialists in Northern California, said: "I think that Condi is seriously contemplating what she can do. I am not saying she will do it. There is a big difference between contemplating something and doing it."

Indeed, analysts and administration officials acknowledged that the moment is not auspicious for any sort of breakthrough. Abbas is battling against Hamas, which won legislative elections a year ago and refuses to renounce its goal of eliminating Israel. Abbas has suggested he will call elections to end the political crisis, but there is no guarantee that he will win. Meanwhile, Olmert has low approval ratings because of public disapproval of his handling of last summer's war with Hezbollah.

"The moon, the sun and stars are not in auspicious alignment," said Aaron David Miller, a fellow at the Woodrow Wilson Center and longtime peace negotiator through successive administrations. "With due respect to anyone who wants to deal with this, it has 'loser' written all over it."

The Women's Channel (TIME)

By Walter Isaacson

Time, January 22, 2007

Condoleezza Rice has a lot in common with her secret new soul mate, Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni. Both are women with razor-sharp intellects, center-right convictions and an odd blend of rigid righteousness and pragmatism. Both work under men whose popularity has plummeted because of the bungled conduct of a war (Iraq for George Bush, Lebanon for Ehud Olmert). And both realize that this vulnerability, combined with the even greater weakness of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, has made the timing ripe for a new strategy for an Israeli-Palestinian peace.

Up until now, Rice has not spearheaded any ambitious new diplomatic initiatives in the manner of the predecessors she admires, such as George Marshall, Dean Acheson and Henry Kissinger. But a Palestinian-Israeli peace could transform her legacy. Rice has told friends in Washington that she sees her latest trip to the region as the beginning of a prolonged, personal effort to achieve a breakthrough.

Rice and Livni discussed their new approach in Washington in early December, and since then they have had frequent phone conversations. Their strategy is to put aside the step-by-step road map, which requires that the Palestinians dismantle their terrorist infrastructure before any new phase of negotiations begins, and instead leap right to final-status talks with moderate Palestinians about what a two-state solution would look like. If a suitable framework for a Palestinian state is reached, Abbas would then go to his people with a referendum: Do you want it or not? He is convinced that more than 70% would vote yes, thus marginalizing the Hamas resisters. Olmert would do the same, and probably get close to the same support.

The outlines of a two-state framework are clear. Everyone knows, within a few hundred yards or so, where the borders would be, and a variety of land swaps could be worked out so that Israel could keep some of its major settlements that are on its side of its new security barrier. Perhaps some Israeli land containing Arab communities could be swapped to the Palestinians, but Bush would go along with that only if the affected Arab-Israelis agree. The issue of Jerusalem and the rights of refugees could be compromised along the lines almost agreed to in 2000, with an international fund providing incentives for Palestinian refugees to return to the new Palestinian state. Livni has quietly been meeting with Palestinian moderates, and they support this approach.

DOJ_NMG_0115735

Both Rice and Livni face hard-liners in their governments who want to stick to the road map and make any movement on the peace process contingent on the Palestinians halting terrorism and cease-fire violations. But that gives Hamas veto power over all progress and could require Israel to occupy the West Bank indefinitely. "The principle of two nation-states is not only an Israeli gift to the Palestinians but a promotion of Israel's interests," Livni says.

Bush has come down on the side of pursuing a two-state framework now. To White House visitors he has provided his own savvy analysis of Olmert's precarious political situation and how both Olmert and Abbas need a breakthrough. Left unspoken is that Bush could use one as well. That is why he is sending Rice to make such an effort.

A Palestinian-Israeli peace will not solve America's woes in Iraq, of course. But Rice and Livni believe it could serve a broader strategic goal. They see the primary divide in the Middle East as being between the forces of moderation and those of extremism. The rise of Iran and its extremist clients has created a potential alliance among moderate Palestinians, Israelis and the leaders of Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Jordan and the gulf states. "There is a growing understanding among the Israelis, Palestinians and the moderate Arab nations that the real threat is Iran and the radicalism it supports, so it's in all of their interest to work now for a comprehensive solution," says Israel's just-departed ambassador to the U.S., Daniel Ayalon, who is now working on ideas for achieving such a peace.

In order to create this concert of moderate forces in the Middle East, Rice wants her new Israeli-Palestinian peace process to be done under the auspices of the Saudi proposals of 2002, which suggested that moderate Arab nations would establish relations with Israel as part of a two-state solution. Those countries could also serve as guarantors, custodians and funders if a peace agreement is reached.

Olmert is slightly uneasy about his Foreign Minister's new joint venture. Livni has made it known that she wants to follow in the footsteps of Israel's only other female Foreign Minister, Golda Meir, by becoming Prime Minister someday. Bush, on the other hand, has no such competitive worries about Rice. If she succeeds in creating a Middle East legacy other than the morass in Iraq, so does he.

Fight And Talk (WP)

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

PRESIDENT BUSH promised in his speech Wednesday night to "use America's full diplomatic resources" in support of his new plan to stabilize Iraq. But the tour of the region that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is beginning today looks like a sideshow. Ms. Rice will talk with Israelis and Palestinians and meet with ministers from Egypt, Jordan and the Gulf states; her idea, she told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee yesterday, is "to work with those governments that share our idea of where the Middle East should be going." Since that excludes two of Iraq's neighbors, Iran and Syria, as well as the two countries that now stand in the way of progress in the Palestinian territories and in Lebanon -- again, Iran and Syria -- it's hard to see how her diplomacy can accomplish much.

Indeed, President Bush's speech gave the impression that military steps have priority in the administration's regional policy. The president said he had ordered another carrier group to the area; that Patriot air defense systems would be deployed "to reassure our friends and allies"; and that the United States "will seek out and destroy the networks" supported by Iran and Syria that provide "advanced weaponry and training to our enemies in Iraq." Hours after he spoke, U.S. forces raided an Iranian government office in Irbil, northern Iraq.

Some of this makes sense. Iran and Syria are engaged in their own offensive across the Middle East: In addition to supporting attacks on Americans in Iraq, they are trying to overthrow the pro-Western Lebanese government and are supporting terrorism carried out by the Palestinian Islamic groups Hamas and Islamic Jihad. The first response to that cannot be offers of "engagement"; some pushing back is also needed. Ms. Rice argued yesterday, as she has before, that a Bush administration offer of bilateral talks with Iran before it freezes uranium enrichment would undermine the multilateral effort to stop its nuclear program, while Syria could be expected to make unacceptable demands about Lebanon.

DOJ_NMG_0115736

It is nevertheless the case, as former secretary of state James A. Baker III has pointed out, that diplomacy consists of talking to enemies as well as friends. It's even possible to talk to enemies while using sanctions or force against them; certainly the Iranians and Syrians do it.

There are ways in which the administration could step up its diplomatic efforts on Iraq without falling into the traps that Ms. Rice described. The Iraqi government has proposed a regional conference in Baghdad, hoping to include all of its neighbors; the United States should support that idea and join in. Both Ms. Rice and Mr. Bush mentioned the Iraq International Compact, an ongoing U.N.-brokered initiative under which the Iraqi government is to commit itself to economic reforms in exchange for international aid. Iran and Syria already have participated in meetings on the compact, along with the United States. It wouldn't be hard to beef up and expand that process to cover more issues, such as guarantees for Iraq's minority groups and steps to prevent violence from spreading outside the country -- or deterring outside intervention.

Regional diplomacy will not solve Iraq's problems. An Israeli-Palestinian settlement will not cause sectarian warriors in Baghdad to disarm. But given the seriousness of the situation, the administration is foolish not to use every resource at its disposal. Mr. Bush is already pursuing strategies on the ground in Iraq that look like long shots; he should be willing to take more diplomatic chances, as well.

In Arab World, U.S. Approaches Falling Short (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack And Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2007

CAIRO, Egypt — In ordering more American soldiers into Iraq, President Bush said he was sending a message of hope to millions of Arabs and Afghans trapped in violence. But to many on the ground in the Mideast, the speech spoke volumes of a disconnect between U.S. promises and a turbulent reality.

After years of war and political disillusionment, Bush would have been hard-pressed to come up with any message to please the Arab world. Many here, long mired in bloodshed and sinking deeper into sectarian tensions, hold America squarely to blame for the bloodletting in Iraq and the Palestinian territories.

They say the U.S. presence in Iraq has poisoned the mood so thoroughly that secular and moderate activists stay silent for fear of being tarred as American agents.

"What the United States did for the region is destruction for the forces who believe in democracy, rule of law and human rights," said Raji Sourani, director of the Palestinian Center for Human Rights in Gaza City. "We are the real victims."

The Bush administration has portrayed the invasion of Iraq as a boost, albeit painful, for Arab democracy and human rights. Victory in Baghdad would bring a brighter era to the entire region, U.S. officials have promised.

But after waves of outrage over torture in Abu Ghraib; the spectacle of Saddam Hussein's trial and execution; and religious slaughter in the streets of Baghdad, few people in the region can articulate what, exactly, the United States is trying to accomplish.

"The U.S. should pull out its troops from Iraq because innocent people are dying every day, including U.S. soldiers," said Karim Salhab, a 25-year-old accountant in Beirut. "I don't think it's fair for the families of these soldiers that their kids die for nothing."

Conventional wisdom here holds that, since the U.S. invasion pitched Iraq into civil war, only a U.S. withdrawal could set the nation back on the road toward stability.

"(Bush) mismanaged and brutalized Iraq too long to even hope for stability while the troops stay," said Mohammed el-Sayed Said, an analyst at Cairo's al-Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies. "The reservoir of violence and bitterness and agonies is so huge that hoping for stability in the immediate future is self-deception at best."

If the United States wanted to boost stability, many Arabs say, the Bush administration would aggressively seek a cure for the regional sore spot of Israeli-Palestinian violence.

Bush's announcement comes at a particularly sensitive moment. The region is still reeling with indignation over the images that emerged of Saddam's execution, in which the toppled Sunni Arab president was forced to endure the sectarian taunts of Shiite guards while in the hangman's noose.

DOJ_NMG_0115737

Besides rubbing raw nerves by degrading a onetime Sunni leader on the dawn of a sacred Islamic holiday, Saddam's hanging also tapped directly into deep popular fears that the war in Iraq left the country in the hands of Shiites -- shifting the power balance in a way that threatens many Sunnis.

Sunni governments such as Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Jordan are longtime allies to the United States, while Shiite-ruled Iran has long been an American nemesis. But the rise of Shiite political power in post-Saddam Iraq, along with the growing regional influence of Iran, have left many Sunnis feeling insecure.

Foremost among the causes of bloodshed in Iraq, according to an editorial in Thursday's pan-Arab Al-Quds Al-Arabi newspaper, "is the U.S. occupation's bias in favor of one sect at the expense of the other, and its humiliation of the members of the latter in a manner that reveals a strong desire for revenge."

Some Sunnis have fretted quietly about the possibility of a U.S. withdrawal. They fear that Iraq's minority Sunni Arab population, already under attack by Shiite militias, would face even harsher retribution from Shiites after the departure of U.S. soldiers.

But Thursday, those voices were all but silent.

Meanwhile, neighboring Iran also warned against boosting the number of American troops in Iraq.

"The increase in the number of American military forces can escalate insecurity and tension in Iraq and work against solving that country's problems," Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini told reporters in Tehran. "America is trying to accuse and blame other countries for interference in Iraq to cover its policy-making mistakes in that country."

Palestinians said Bush's emphasis on Iraq was backward. Only by making peace between Palestinians and Israelis, they said, would stability come to the region as a whole.

"If there is peace here, there will be peace in Iraq," said Badar Salem, a 26-year-old office worker shopping in the West Bank city of Ramallah. "If Bush solves the Palestinian question first, then he will put an end to extremists, mainly the Islamic extremists, because they will not use the Palestinian question as a pretext for their activities everywhere."

Those sentiments echo the report issued in Washington last month by the Iraq Study Group, which linked stability in Iraq to progress in settling the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

In Afghanistan, people were too focused on "survival and getting through the winter" to pay much heed to Bush's plans for Iraq, said George Varughese, the acting country representative in Afghanistan for the Asia Foundation.

"What happens in Iraq is just not something that's front and center for them," he said.

---------- Stack reported from Cairo and Ellingwood from Jerusalem. Times staff writers Kim Murphy in London, Laura King in Dubai and special correspondents Raed el Rafei in Beirut, Lebanon, Maher Abukhater in Ramallah and Rushdi abu Alouf in Gaza City contributed to this report.

Iran, Syria Denounce Bush's Iraq Plan (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, January 12, 2007

Iran and Syria on Thursday denounced President Bush's new Iraq strategy that blames them for fueling violence in the war-torn country, and they said the plan to send more U.S. troops would only increase bloodshed. Bush's speech Wednesday night underlined his staunch rejection of recommendations that Washington reach out to Syria and Iran in an attempt to calm Iraq.

Instead, Bush set out plans to isolate the two countries, calling on help from Arab allies and vowing to cut off Syrian and Iranian aid to militants in Iraq. He announced the deployment of an additional aircraft carrier battle group and Patriot air defense missiles to the region — seen as muscle-flexing toward Iran.

In Tehran, Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini said Bush's plan to send 21,000 more troops to Iraq was a "continuation of occupation" that will only "extend insecurity, danger and tension in the country. This will not help to solve Iraq's problems."

Syrian Vice President Farouk al-Sharaa said Wednesday prior to Bush's speech that the American troop surge was "not a positive step" and would only "pour oil on the fire."

DOJ_NMG_0115738

Iran has close ties to Shiite militias blamed in Iraq's wave of sectarian killings, and Washington accuses it of providing the fighters with weapons and money. The United States also accuses Syria — Iran's ally — of providing refuge for some leaders of the Sunni-led insurgency and allowing militants to cross its border into Iraq.

As Bush spoke in Washington, U.S.-led multinational forces detained five Iranians in an overnight raid on Tehran's diplomatic mission in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil, local officials said. Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini denounced the raid, saying it reflected a "continuation of pressure" on Iran, aiming to "create tension" between Iraq and its neighbors.

The bipartisan Iraqi Study Group said last month the U.S. should put aside misgivings and engage Syria, Iran and the leaders of insurgent forces in negotiations on Iraq's future.

However, Bush has said he would not deal with countries that fund terrorism. He vowed in his speech Wednesday that U.S. troops will "interrupt the flow of support from Iran and Syria."

Iran and Syria both denied supporting fighters in Iraq. Hosseini said the U.S. was trying to "cover up its wrong policies" by accusing other countries of meddling in Iraq.

The new offensive by U.S. forces, along with Iraqi troops, aims to put down both Sunni insurgents and Shiite militiamen in Baghdad. But there was widespread skepticism in the Arab world that the Shiite-led Iraqi government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki will act against the militias, even though it has said it will.

Iran depicted the U.S. plan as an attempt to control Iraq for the benefit of Israel. Hosseini said the deployment of Patriot missiles in the region "is part of the U.S. policy direction to create a support umbrella for the Zionist regime through an Islamic country."

Commentators in Iran and Syria predicted the new Bush strategy would fail. The plan's "failure will register the name of Bush as a vanquished president in the political history of the U.S.," Iranian state television said in a commentary.

In Damascus, there were signs of disappointment that Washington had rejected the idea of opening a dialogue with the country. Syrian analyst Imad Shueibi, who often reflects the government's view, called Bush's accusations of Syrian and Iranian support for militants "a worthless broken record."

"If Bush wants to ignore Syria, he would thereby ignore the possibility of finding a solution to the situation in Iraq and to stability in the region," he said.

The state-run Syrian newspaper Tishrin predicted "Bush's strategy will be another catastrophe and the Iraqi people will be the only loser."

In the streets of Tehran, there was dismay at the prospect of the U.S. increasing its military presence in neighboring Iraq.

"Sending more troops more means more casualties. Any simple military personnel know it," said Hossein Rahimi, a veteran of Iran's war with Iraq in the 1980s.

"The U.S has already spent a lot for military purposes in Iraq. If it had spend it for reconstruction and development, then Iraq could have been a role model for the whole region," said Reza Mahmoudi, a 50-year-old engineer.

Iraqi Government Welcomes Bush Strategy (AP)

By Bassem Mroue

AP, January 12, 2007

The Iraqi government spokesman chided the United States, Iran and Syria on Thursday for using his country as a political battleground, saying "we pay the price for the tension" between the three rivals and urging them to improve their relations.

Ali al-Dabbagh also called on Syria and Iran not to interfere in Baghdad's internal affairs. Both have been accused by the United States and Iraq of supporting insurgents and militias that are ravaging Iraq with sectarian war.

"Sometimes we pay the price for the tension in relations between Iran and the United States and Syria and the United States, therefore it is in our interest as Iraqis that these relations improve," al-Dabbagh said. "For that reason, we hope, encourage and are playing a role in bringing closer together their points of view."

The spokesman's comments came as Iraq's government welcomed President Bush's new strategy and promised it was committed to making sure it succeeds.

DOJ_NMG_0115739

Ordinary Iraqis, however, gave it mixed reviews, with many expressing skepticism that an increase in U.S. troops would quell the violence ransacking their country.

In a speech broadcast live on Iraqi state television, Bush said he was increasing U.S. troops by 21,500 — including 17,500 in Baghdad, where much of the sectarian violence has been blamed on predominantly Shiite militias.

Sunni lawmaker Hussein al-Falluji rejected Bush's plan to send more troops, calling instead for a timetable for them to withdraw and for direct negotiations with insurgents.

"Bush's plan could be the last attempt to fix the chaos created after the invasion of Iraq. Yet, sending more troops will not end the problem. On the contrary, there will be more bloodshed," al-Falluji said.

Sadiq al-Rikabi, an adviser to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, warned "failure in Iraq will not only affect this country but the rest of the region and the world, including the United States."

"The current situation is not acceptable — not only for the American people but also for the Iraqis and their government. As Iraqis and as an elected government, we welcome the American commitment for success," he said. "The Iraqi government also is committed to succeed."

Al-Rikabi stressed the importance of the Iraqis taking the lead in military operations.

"The American plan cannot succeed without us because we work in the same field in order to defeat violence and terrorism and boost the democratic system," al-Rikabi said.

Baghdad residents from both sects, however, said they were not optimistic Bush's new strategy would end the Sunni-Shiite attacks that have spiraled in the capital and elsewhere since the bombing last February of a revered Shiite shrine in Samarra. Others offered a weary acceptance of any effort to curb the violence after several failed attempts.

"More U.S. troops will mean more wasted blood and more people killed," said Osama Ahmed who works in the Ministry of Higher Education and said he got up early to watch the speech, which aired at 5 a.m. in Iraq. "The violence will surge unless the U.S. administration decides to curb militiamen who are part of the Iraqi government."

He accused the Shiite-dominated government of backing the militias in attacking Sunnis, saying, "There is no point of giving more security responsibilities to the Iraqi government because it is a sectarian government and it is responsible for the violence hitting the country."

Abdel-Karim Jassim, a 44-year-old Shiite trader, said he had hoped Bush would come up with something other than a troop increase.

"Sending more troops will not solve the problem," he said, while acknowledging that Iraq cannot handle security on its own because of "sectarian divisions and the strong militias and insurgents."

Rahim al-Waeli, a 40-year-old Shiite Health Ministry employee, expressed hope the Bush plan would succeed because it included efforts to boost economic aid and job creation.

"I am relatively optimistic because this time the plan is not only about using force, it has some economic and service aspects," he said.

Shiite politician Mariam al-Rayes also welcomed the new effort, but noted opposition from Democrats to the troop increase.

"Some consider President Bush an adventurer," she told the state-run Iraqiya station. "But he has found that his role now is to support this government."

In the past, the Iraqi government has tried to prevent American military operations against the Mahdi Army, the militia loyal to radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, while giving U.S. forces a free hand against Sunni militants. The Bush administration has pushed al-Maliki to curb his militia allies or allow U.S. troops to do the job.

University professor Hafidh Issam, 49, said the United States had made many mistakes in Iraq and accused it of contributing to the chaos to serve its own interests in the Middle East.

"They built a constant base in Iraq that would be able to threaten the neighboring countries, especially Iran and the gulf countries," he said.

Awad Mukhtar, a 35-year-old technician, said Bush's new proposals could be Iraq's "last chance" for peace.

DOJ_NMG_0115740

"The security situation in Iraq is very bad, we are facing death at any moment daily," Mukhtar said. "I see the new Bush strategy as the last chance for Iraqis to save their lives ... we have no other choice, only to wait and see the results."

In Baghdad, Bush Policy Is Met With Resentment (NYT)

By John F. Burns And Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 11 — Iraq's Shiite-led government offered only a grudging endorsement on Thursday of President Bush's proposal to deploy more than 20,000 additional troops in an effort to curb sectarian violence and regain control of Baghdad. The tepid response immediately raised questions about whether the government would make a good-faith effort to prosecute the new war plan.

The Iraqi leader, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, failed to appear at a news conference and avoided any public comment. He left the government's response to an official spokesman, Ali al-Dabbagh, who gave what amounted to a backhanded approval of the troop increase and emphasized that Iraqis, not Americans, would set the future course in the war.

Mr. Dabbagh said that the government's objective was to secure the eventual withdrawal of American troops, and that for that to be possible there had to be security for Iraqis. "If this can be achieved by increasing either Iraqi or multinational forces," he added, "the government, for sure, will not stand against it."

Mr. Dabbagh suggested that much about the Bush plan depended on how circumstances in Iraq would evolve over the coming months — an echo, in its way, of senior Bush administration officials. They have implied that they might halt the month-by-month inflow of additional troops if they think Mr. Maliki is failing to meet the political and military benchmarks Mr. Bush identified as the Iraqi government's part in making the new war plan work.

"The plan can be developed according to the needs," Mr. Dabbagh said. Then he added tartly, "What is suitable for our conditions in Iraq is what we decide, not what others decide for us."

The spokesman's remarks, and a similarly dyspeptic tone that was adopted by Shiite politicians with close ties to Mr. Maliki, pointed to the double-bind Mr. Bush finds himself in. Faced with low levels of public support for his new military push and a Democratic leadership in Congress that has said it will fight him over it, he also confronts the uncomfortable prospect of foot-dragging in Baghdad over the troop increases and the benchmarks he has set for the Iraqis.

While senior officials in Washington have presented the new war plan as an American adaptation of proposals that were first put to Mr. Bush by Mr. Maliki when the two men met in the Jordanian capital of Amman in November, the picture that is emerging in Baghdad is quite different. What Mr. Maliki wanted, his officials say, was in at least one crucial respect the opposite of what Mr. Bush decided: a lowering of the American profile in the war, not the increase Mr. Bush has ordered.

These Iraqi officials say Mr. Maliki, in the wake of Mr. Bush's setback in the Democratic sweep in November's midterm elections, demanded that American troops be pulled back to the periphery of Baghdad and that the war in the capital, at least, be handed to Iraqi troops. The demand was part of a broader impatience among the ruling Shiites to be relieved from American oversight so as to be able to fight and govern according to the dictates of Shiite politics, not according to strictures from Washington.

What transpired, in Mr. Bush's speech on Wednesday night, appears to have been a hybrid: a plan that aims at marrying the Maliki government's urgency for a broader license to act with Mr. Bush's determination to make what American officials here see as a last-chance push for success in Iraq on American terms. And that, as Mr. Bush made clear on Wednesday, implies objectives that will be difficult — many Iraqis say impossible — to square with Mr. Maliki's goals.

The differences seemed clear on Thursday as Iraqis responded to Mr. Bush's speech. In the streets of Baghdad, reactions followed, broadly, the familiar pattern in a city that is more and more divided on sectarian lines. Many Shiites said Iraq's own security forces, which are predominantly Shiite, should be left to do the job of stabilizing the city, while many Sunnis, shocked by the violence of Shiite death squads in recent months, said they would welcome the Americans if they could rein the sectarian killing in.

Mr. Dabbagh, the government spokesman, emphasized the parts of the Bush plan that best suited the Maliki government's political ambitions. He said the "good thing in this plan is that it determines that responsibility should be transferred from the Americans to the Iraqis." This was a prime point with Mr. Bush, too, when he said that the role of American troops under the new plan would be to "help the Iraqis" secure neighborhoods in Baghdad, protect the local population and maintain security in areas that American and Iraqi forces have cleared.

DOJ_NMG_0115741

Within hours of Mr. Bush's speech, American commanders were meeting with their Iraqi counterparts in Baghdad to work out the details of a new command arrangement that would give Mr. Maliki a direct role in overseeing the new crackdown. The Iraqis named a commander for the operation, Lt. Gen. Aboud Gambar, a Shiite from southern Iraq who was a top general in Saddam Hussein's army until the American-led invasion in 2003.

General Gambar will report directly to Mr. Maliki, outside the chain of command that runs through the Defense Ministry, which the Maliki government has long viewed as a bastion of American influence, and, because the defense minister is a Sunni, of resistance to Shiite control. General Gambar will have two deputies, one for the heavily Shiite east part of Baghdad, another for the mostly Sunni west part, and they will oversee nine new military districts, each assigned an Iraqi brigade.

As details of the Bush plan became known on Wednesday, Iraqi officials said that the new arrangements would give Iraqis operational control of the new push in Baghdad. But Mr. Dabbagh and others were quick to pull back on Thursday, acknowledging that Baghdad would remain under American operational control at least until later this year. American officials noted that American officers would be assigned to General Gambar's headquarters, that an American battalion would be twinned with each Iraqi brigade and that every Iraqi unit, down to the company level, would have American military advisers.

If this fell a long way short of the plan for full Iraqi control in Baghdad that Mr. Maliki set out in November, his officials were at pains to say that the prime minister would decide the issue of most concern to the Iraqi leader: whether, and when, Iraqi and American forces would be allowed to move in force into Sadr City. That Shiite working-class district in northeast Baghdad is the stronghold of the Mahdi Army, the most powerful of the Shiite militias, and the main power base of Moktada al-Sadr, the Mahdi Army leader, whose parliamentary bloc sustains Mr. Maliki in office.

"It's been agreed that in order to succeed they have to consult," Mr. Dabbagh said — a bland requirement as he stated it — but some distance from the formula put forward at Washington briefings on the new plan. Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates, at a news conference on Wednesday, said that American and Iraqi troops would be free to go into "all parts of Baghdad, including Sadr City" and that one benchmark in the plan was that there would be no "political interference" with military operations or attempts to protect death squad leaders.

That appeared to be an allusion to the past American experience with Mr. Maliki, who has consistently refused to sanction major offensives in Sadr City. On at least one occasion, he intervened to secure the release of a man captured by American troops and identified by American commanders as a death squad leader with links to Mr. Sadr. Mr. Maliki's argument has been that the solution to the problem of militias, including Mr. Sadr's, must be political, not military, but he has simultaneously postponed any action on a new law to disarm and demobilize the militias.

One of Mr. Maliki's political allies, Sheik Khalid al-Attiya, who is deputy speaker of the Iraqi Parliament, said Thursday that he expected the benchmarks set by Mr. Bush to take 6 to 12 months to be met. With American commanders in Baghdad saying they hope to have the main parts of the city stabilized by late summer — allowing American troops to be pulled back to bases outside the city as Mr. Maliki has demanded — the Americans seem likely to run out of patience with Mr. Maliki long before Mr. Attiya's timetable plays out.

A Shiite political leader who has worked closely with the Americans in the past said the Bush benchmarks appeared to have been drawn up in the expectation that Mr. Maliki would not meet them. "He cannot deliver the disarming of the militias," the politician said, asking that he not be named because he did not want to be seen as publicly criticizing the prime minister. "He cannot deliver a good program for the economy and reconstruction. He cannot deliver on services. This is a matter of fact. There is a common understanding on the American side and the Iraqi side."

Views such as these — increasingly common among the political class in Baghdad — are often accompanied by predictions that Mr. Maliki will be forced out as the crisis over the militias builds. The Shiite politician who described him as incapable of disarming militias suggested he might resign; others have pointed to an American effort in recent weeks to line up a "moderate front" of Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish political leaders outside the government, and said that the front might be a vehicle for mounting a parliamentary coup against Mr. Maliki, with behind-the-scenes American support.

DOJ_NMG_0115742

Hussein's Will Sought No Mercy

CAIRO, Egypt, Jan. 11 (AP) — Hours before Saddam Hussein's execution, the ousted Iraqi dictator asked his lawyers not to appeal for his life and accused the United States and Iran of collaborating to hang him, according to a copy of his will.

Mr. Hussein gave his chief lawyer, Khalil al-Dulaimi, the right to "decide whatever is related to me except appealing for the life of Saddam Hussein to any of the presidents, kings, Arabs or foreigners," reads a copy of the will obtained by The Associated Press.

He also asked to be buried in either Ouja, his birthplace, or in Ramadi, the capital of Anbar Province, where many of the country's Sunni Arab insurgents are fighting, depending on his daughter Raghad's decision. He was buried in Ouja.

Bush Plan Receives Tepid Baghdad OK (WT/AP)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra

The Washington Times, January 12, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Iraq's government gave a tepid endorsement yesterday of President Bush's plan to boost U.S. troops, amid condemnation from Sunni and Kurdish lawmakers, ordinary Iraqis and criticism throughout the Muslim world.

"As Iraqis and as an elected government, we welcome the American commitment for success," said Sadiq al-Rikabi, an aide to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

"The Iraqi government also is committed to succeed," he said.

Mr. al-Rikabi said that the Iraqi government must take the lead in the military action. The plan envisions a "surge" of about 10,000 to 12,000 Iraqi troops to secure Baghdad neighborhoods, along with about 16,000 extra U.S. troops in the capital.

Sunni lawmaker Hussein al-Falluji said the additional U.S. presence will only boost the death toll.

"Bush's plan could be the last attempt to fix the chaos created after the invasion of Iraq. Yet, sending more troops will not end the problem; on the contrary, there will be more bloodshed," he said.

Kurdish lawmaker Mahmoud Othman said the "plan will fail. Sending more troops and financial support will not help if there is no sectarian and political solution."

Abdel-Karim Jassim, a 44-year-old Shi'ite trader, said he had hoped Mr. Bush would come up with something other than the troop increase.

"Sending more troops will not solve the problem," he said.

Iran and Syria denounced the U.S. troop surge and also condemned the plan, a predictable response given Mr. Bush's vow during his Wednesday speech to cut off Syrian and Iranian aid to militants and insurgents.

But there was widespread skepticism in the Arab world that the Shi'ite-led Iraqi government of Mr. al-Maliki will act against Shi'ite militias and death squads.

Mr. Bush "is drowning and trying to get out of the Iraqi trap, but he's submerging deeper," said Salem al-Falahat, head of Jordan's hard-line Muslim Brotherhood Movement, warning that the plan "aims to plunge the region into more destruction and bloodshed and leave Iraq with sectarian hatred for many decades to come."

Mustafa al-Ani, a military analyst with the Gulf Research Center in Dubai, said the American military has to take down the Shi'ite militias -- particularly the feared Mahdi Army, loyal to anti-U.S. cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, an ally of Mr. al-Maliki. Otherwise, the United States will lose any support among Iraq's Sunnis.

"They need to use the same force against the Mahdi Army as they do against al Qaeda. They need to establish new credibility and they must be evenhanded," Mr. al-Ani said.

Mr. al-Maliki has resisted U.S. pressure to move against Sheik al-Sadr's militia, but Iraqi officials said Wednesday the prime minister agreed to crack down, warning his ally that "there will be no escape from attack."

But many in the Arab world profoundly distrust Mr. al-Maliki's government, believing it is serving the interests of Iran, which is predominantly Shi'ite,

"Al-Maliki's government is part of the problem, not the solution," Areeb el-Rentawi, head of the Al-Quds Center for Political Studies, in Amman, Jordan, told Al Jazeera satellite TV.

Mr. Bush said he planned to send 21,500 more U.S. troops to Iraq, with about 16,000 deployed in and around Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0115743

"Whatever the size of the troops, as long as this is a war between a regular army, in the face of gang-style militant groups, Americans will fail," said Galal Nassar, a fellow with the Nasser Military Academy in Egypt.

"Twenty-one thousand soldiers are a drop in a sea," said Ayed al-Manna, a political science teacher at the Arab Open University in Kuwait. "More U.S. troops would only mean more soldiers to be hunted by insurgents in the absence of a defined plan by Americans and Iraqis."

Bush's New Iraq Strategy 'Makes Sense': Blair (AFP)

By Katherine Haddon

AFP, January 12, 2007

Prime Minister Tony Blair said that US President George W. Bush's policy switch in Iraq "makes sense", while his foreign minister stressed it did not necessarily herald "a change of direction" from London.

"Given the conditions in Baghdad at the moment, I think it makes sense for them to increase the number of their forces, provided it's to back up an increasing Iraqi capability," Blair said in a television interview.

Bush is sending 21,500 extra US troops to Iraq, while Britain's policy is to pull back troops and hand areas including the second city of Basra over to Iraqi control.

But Blair insisted that troops from the two different countries faced different situations.

Meanwhile, Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett seemed to leave the door open for a possible change in British policy, saying it was not the government's intention "at the present time" to send more troops.

"Obviously it's an issue that people will look at but I would say that it's a change of direction, as the president says, for the United States and doesn't necessarily imply a change of direction for us," she said.

Speaking at a joint session of parliament's defence and foreign affairs select committees, she added that the implications of the US change in policy for Britain would be "somewhat limited".

Blair emphasised that Britain's situation in Basra, southern Iraq, was not comparable to the one faced by the US in the Iraqi capital and said it would be a "misunderstanding" to say that the two countries' policies were diverging.

"The truth is the conditions in Baghdad are different from those in Basra.

"The reason why the Americans are having to surge forces in Baghdad is because the security condition there is completely different," Blair told Westcountry Television during a visit to southwest England.

Britain has to grapple with rival Shiite power blocs while US troops face not only a Sunni Muslim insurgency backed at times by foreign Islamist fighters but also spiraling Shiite-Sunni violence.

Blair said that in Basra, "we don't have the same type of sectarian fighting, we don't have Al-Qaeda operating in the same way" as in Baghdad.

Asked about a report in the Daily Telegraph newspaper that Britain would pull out around 2,700 troops from southern Iraq by the end of May, he would only say it was right that Britain moved to a "support role" once the Iraqi authorities could handle their own security.

The broadsheet said Blair, who is facing growing political and popular opposition to the war in Iraq, will announce the decision within the next two weeks.

It said that after Basra comes under Iraqi control in a few months, the British Army will redeploy to a major base being expanded at Basra air station, while a 200-strong force will remain in central Basra.

Maysan province, currently patrolled by 600 Queen's Royal Lancers, will be handed over by the end of February, according to the report.

Blair's official spokesman said it was premature to talk of withdrawal dates.

With the second-largest troop deployment in Iraq, Britain has been the United States' staunchest ally since the March 2003 invasion of Iraq which toppled the dictator Saddam Hussein.

In a televised address Wednesday, Bush took the blame for strategic blunders in Iraq, ordered 21,500 more US troops into battle, and warned Baghdad's leaders to do more to shore up ebbing US support.

DOJ_NMG_0115744

Bush said he aimed to crush terrorists, insurgents and rogue militias and help Iraq's security forces take control of the country by November.

Gates Urges Increase In Army, Marines (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson And Josh White

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates yesterday proposed adding 92,000 troops to the Army and Marine Corps, initiating the biggest increase in U.S. ground forces since the 1960s to shore up a military that top officers warn is on the verge of breaking from prolonged fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The permanent increase of 65,000 soldiers and 27,000 Marines would cost more than $10 billion annually and take five years to achieve, underscoring the Pentagon's conviction that today's wars and anti-terrorism operations will endure for many years. "We call those 'long war' forces," a senior military official said.

The growth also reflects mounting concern among Army leaders over a deepening readiness crisis, as repeated war-zone rotations have worn out troops and equipment, leaving two-thirds of Army combat units in the United States unprepared to deploy. The active-duty Army would increase to 547,000 troops and the Marine Corps to 202,000.

"It will take some time for these new troops to become available for deployment, but it is important that our men and women in uniform know that additional manpower and resources are on the way," Gates told a packed House Armed Services Committee hearing yesterday. Lawmakers have expressed bipartisan support for permanent growth of the military over the past few years and applauded the proposal.

Gates also announced a politically sensitive policy change to allow the remobilization of National Guard and reserve units, in which thousands of reservists who have already served in Iraq could be involuntarily called up for another tour. The major changes -- both sharp reversals from the direction taken by former defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld -- show that Gates is moving on issues that had festered for years at the Pentagon.

Taken together, the decisions mark an acknowledgment of the degree to which the all-volunteer force has been overextended since 2001, despite dire warnings during the 2000 presidential election by Republican candidates George W. Bush and Richard B. Cheney that the U.S. military was "overused," "under-resourced" and "in decline."

Yesterday, tens of thousands of soldiers and Marines and their families learned that President Bush's call for additional troops in Iraq means their units will be ordered to stay in Iraq longer than planned, or may leave home early for combat.

To help achieve the surge of 21,500 troops, the Pentagon will extend the service of several units already in Iraq. A Minnesota National Guard Brigade with about 4,000 troops in Iraq will stay an extra four months, until August, and two Marine Corps battalions and a Marine Expeditionary Unit with a total of about 4,000 troops in the country will remain there for two or three extra months, the officials said.

In addition, three Army brigades -- two from the Third Infantry Division at forts Stewart and Benning, Ga., and a Stryker Brigade from Fort Lewis, Wash. -- were placed on orders to deploy to Iraq, and Army officials said they could deploy one to two months earlier than scheduled.

Still, Gates and other senior officials strongly suggested that they could withhold these additional forces if Iraqi leaders do not fulfill their pledges for the surge: to provide nine brigades of Iraqi troops to secure Baghdad and lift restrictions on targeting areas such as Sadr City, as well as some individual extremists.

"The timetable for the introduction of additional U.S. forces will provide ample opportunity early on, and before many of the additional U.S. troops actually arrive in Iraq, to evaluate the progress of this endeavor and whether the Iraqis are fulfilling their commitments to us," Gates said earlier yesterday at a news conference in the Old Executive Office Building.

Both Gates and Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said yesterday that the Iraqi government has agreed to lift political restrictions on U.S. operations and that U.S. forces will be allowed to move freely into some areas they have had to avoid. Pace said operations will begin in mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhoods, with Iraqi forces and U.S. troops working together to clear, hold and build areas throughout Baghdad. A combined U.S. and Iraqi command cell would oversee and coordinate the operations, the senior military official said.

DOJ_NMG_0115745

Gates and Pace acknowledged, under sharp questioning from members of Congress, that similar efforts failed because there were not enough troops to hold certain areas, then build them back up.

"The analogy that I've used is that the tide came in and the tide went out, and . . . at the end, you couldn't tell there was a difference," Gates said. "The difference is, this time, to try and get some time under the hold phase for the build to actually take place."

Pace said he is confident the strategy will work, but only if political and economic efforts are pursued in earnest alongside the military approach. He said there initially will be an additional 8,000 Iraqi troops in Baghdad -- bringing the total to 50,000 -- and then 7,000 more U.S. troops in Baghdad, bringing the total to 31,000.

Another 10,500 U.S. troops will be "in the pipeline" to go to Iraq if the strategy looks as if it is working, he said.

Still, other officials expressed uncertainty about whether the Iraqis would come through with the required nine brigades. "We're watching them down to the finite details . . . [such as] how many got on the bus?" the senior military official said.

The permanent troop increase and the recalling of Guard and reserve units will not have an immediate impact on the addition of U.S. ground troops in Iraq, which Gates said yesterday would last only several months. But they would be vital to sustaining an escalation -- or even the regular rotation -- over the long term. By January 2008, National Guard combat brigades are expected to be called up for the rotation to provide relief for active-duty combat brigades, including those involved in the current surge, Gates and other senior officials said.

Under the policy change, National Guard and reserve forces will be called up as units, rather than as individuals, meaning that some reservists who have already served in Iraq or Afghanistan will be remobilized without having the planned five years at home. The duration of the call-ups will be shortened, however, from 18 months to one year.

Both active-duty and reserve personnel will be compensated if required to deploy faster than the usual turnaround time.

The total growth in the Army and Marine Corps would cost more than $10 billion a year for payroll and individual gear alone, according to Army data.

The Army has permanent active-duty personnel -- its congressionally authorized "endstrength" -- of 482,000, but in recent years it was allowed to grow temporarily by 30,000, and this year it expects to reach 512,000. Under Gates's plan, the Army would add 7,000 soldiers a year, to reach a total of 547,000 by 2012.

The Marine Corps has a permanent active-duty "endstrength" of 175,000 and has been allowed to increase temporarily to 180,000. It would grow by 5,000 Marines a year to attain a total of 202,000.

Gates Requests 92,000 Increase In Active Forces (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 12, 2007

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates announced yesterday that he is asking Congress to expand the active armed forces by 92,000 members to meet the demands of what the administration says will be a "long war" against terrorism.

"We should recognize that while it may take some time for these new troops to become available for deployment, it is important that our men and women in uniform know that additional manpower and resources are on the way," Mr. Gates said at a White House press conference to announce a new Iraq war strategy.

Although an increase in "end strength," as the military's active force is called, is not directly related to President Bush's announced new Iraq strategy, it is an outgrowth of the nearly four-year-old war. The stress of deploying Marine and Army ground forces with little rest back home has begun to tear at the fabric of the 1.4 million active force, senior retired officers said.

The 92,000-troop spike is for ground forces, the busiest combatants in the war on terror.

Mr. Gates said he will achieve a 65,000 Army increase over time. First, the 30,000 temporary increase under which the Army has operated will be made permanent. Another 35,000 soldiers will be added at a rate of 7,000 annually for five years. The Army will boost end strength by bolstering recruitment and retention. At the end, the Army will stand at 547,000 soldiers.

The Marine Corps will acquire 27,000 more troops to reach 202,000. It will keep its allotment of 5,000 temporary troops and add 5,000 a year for four years.

DOJ_NMG_0115746

Gen. Peter Schoomaker, Army chief of staff, had pressed in recent months for more soldiers, saying the Army was in danger of breaking. His argument did not seem to sway Donald H. Rumsfeld, who as defense secretary approved the temporary increase.

Mr. Gates was more receptive, as was Mr. Bush, after hearing last month from three retired four-star generals who pushed for more soldiers.

Congressional Democrats who criticized Mr. Bush's plan to increase troops in Iraq nonetheless praised the policy of more soldiers and Marines.

"Every time I had a chance to say we need more Army troops, more Marines, I said it," House Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton, Missouri Democrat, said yesterday at a hearing on Iraq. "And I'm delighted to have the president and you, Mr. Secretary, chiming in this chorus. Our soldiers particularly, I feel, are worn out. This increase is a smart policy. I'm more than pleased to say, 'Better late than never.' "

The reason the Army may be "worn out" is that soldiers typically have spent only one year, instead of the usual two years, back in the States before deploying again to war.

Pentagon To Recall Army National Guard Units (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — Confronted with the increasing demands of the Iraq war, the Pentagon announced plans Thursday to recall Army National Guard units that have already fought in Iraq to serve second tours in the war, reversing a long-standing policy that allowed guardsmen to return home for five years before being redeployed.

No new Guard units have been included in the first wave of forces going to Iraq as part of President Bush's 21,500-troop increase announced Wednesday night and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates insisted the change in policy was made independently of the Iraq buildup.

But other Pentagon officials have acknowledged that additional Guard and Army Reserve units are essential to sustaining Bush's increase in combat forces in Iraq over the course of the year. The military likely will need to tap into the pool of previously deployed Guard units this fall to keep 20 combat brigades in Iraq, the level of the surge. Army Reserve units also are affected by the policy change.

"The reserve component are going to have to help bear the burden on the backside of this (build) up," said a senior military official, discussing internal Pentagon decision making on condition of anonymity. "I would presume by this time next year, we would be calling on our reserve component brigades to contribute in Iraq."

Gates also announced he has asked the president to expand the Army and Marine Corps by 92,000 troops, arguing the military's land forces must be increased to meet ongoing threats even beyond the Iraq campaign.

Under the plans, the Army will grow by 65,000 to 547,000 soldiers, the biggest it has been since the end of the Cold War, and the Marines will grow by 27,000 to 202,000. Like the new Guard policy, the decision to enlarge the size of the U.S. military's ground forces is a reversal for the Bush administration.

Former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld objected to expanding the Army and Marines, arguing it would be too costly. The administration's delay in making the decision means the expansion will not help alleviate the strain on the Army and Marines for several years, the amount of time it will take to reach the new limits.

"It will take some time for these new troops to become available for deployment," Gates said Thursday at a congressional hearing. "But it is important that our men and women in uniform know that additional manpower and resources are on the way."

The changes in policy came as the Army and Marine Corps formally notified five Army combat brigades that they were being rushed to Baghdad as part of Bush's plan to increase American forces in Iraq. One of the units, the 2nd Brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division, was already en route to Kuwait to serve as a backup unit, and now will be redirected to the Iraqi capital.

For each of the next four months, additional Army brigades scheduled to deploy to Iraq this year will head toward Baghdad ahead of schedule.

DOJ_NMG_0115747

In February, the 4th Brigade of the 1st Infantry Division will arrive earlier than planned; in March, the 3rd Brigade of the 3rd Infantry Division will be sent; followed in April by the 4th Brigade of the 2nd Infantry Division and in May by the 2nd Briga de of the 3rd Infantry Division.

In addition, two Marine battalions that were scheduled to go home next month -- the 3rd Battalion of the 4th Marine Regiment, and the 1st Battalion of the 6th Marine Regiment -- will have their return postponed by two to three months to provide the extra 4,000 troops needed for western Anbar province.

And a combat brigade from the Minnesota National Guard is being extended by four months to provide extra soldiers for the expanded effort while other units are arriving.

These units will allow U.S. forces levels in Iraq to grow to about 153,000 by the summer. But military planners will have to make another round of decisions starting in July about how they will sustain those troop levels. Several Army brigades are scheduled to return home from July through September, and officials would have to extend their tours to maintain the 20 brigades Bush has ordered.

More than 200,000 guardsmen and reservists have left civilian life over the past five years to serve in Iraq and Afghanistan, and stand to be summoned back into active duty under the policy change. Of 3,018 U.S. military deaths in Iraq, 383 have been soldiers from the Army National Guard, according to icasulaties.com, a research group that tracks military deaths. Another 214 were Army and Marine reservists.

Pentagon officials have said that Guard units most likely to be called up in the next round of deployments are those which were among the first regiments sent to Iraq in 2003 and early 2004.

In an attempt to head off opposition to remobilizing Guard brigades, the Pentagon said it would reduce the length of time Guard units must serve if they are called up again. In previous deployments to Iraq, guardsmen frequently found themselves activated for as long as 18 months, including several months to organize and train and at least a year in the war zone.

Under the new policy, Guard units would only be mobilized for a year, meaning that they would likely spend nine or 10 months in Iraq once sent overseas. In addition, Pentagon officials said guardsmen would receive extra pay if forced to deploy a second time before they have spent five years at home.

Meanwhile, the Pentagon is reviewing its "hardship waiver program," in which both Guard and active-duty Army soldiers can escape deployment if their families would encounter exceptional difficulties related to a repeat tour in Iraq. The review could lead to more such waivers.

Military Eases Its Rules For Mobilizing Reserves (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 — The Pentagon announced steps Thursday to make more reservists available for duty in Iraq and Afghanistan by changing the policies that govern how often members of the Army National Guard and Reserve can be mobilized.

The new rules mean that individual Guard members and entire units that have already been deployed in the last five years may be called up again for as long as 24 consecutive months, officials said. In practice, the Pentagon intends to try to limit future mobilizations to no more than a year, once every five years, Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told reporters.

The policy change was brought on by the prolonged American troop commitments in Iraq and Afghanistan, and military officials said it would have been necessary even if President Bush had not decided to send more than 20,000 additional troops to Iraq.

The change, announced by Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates at a White House news conference, will enable the Bush administration to call up tens of thousands of Guard members who were off limits under the previous rules, without having to issue another politically delicate mobilization order.

The decision to send five active-duty combat brigades to Iraq in the next few months means the Army will need to call up National Guard combat brigades that have already done one-year tours in Iraq, and to do so sooner, officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0115748

A senior military official said that by "this time next year," the Pentagon "probably will be calling again on Guard units that have previously done combat tours."

General Pace told reporters that some of the Guard units "that will be mobilized in the coming period will not have had five years since their last mobilization." Some, he said, will have been home for four years and some for only three.

Until now, the Defense Department's policy on employing Guard and Reserve units was that soldiers' time on active duty could not exceed a cumulative total of 24 months in any five-year period. Under the new rules, the cumulative limit is removed.

The result, officials said, is that soldiers who have already done a tour in Iraq in the last five years can now be sent back to Iraq if their entire unit is remobilized. The goal of limiting deployments to a year is meant to offset the burden on Guard members, who must leave civilian jobs to serve.

Until now, many members of the Army National Guard, which has an authorized total strength of 350,000 soldiers, have been deployed to Iraq or Afghanistan as individuals, sometimes for 18 months or longer. Mr. Gates said the Pentagon would now mobilize units, not individuals. Any soldiers who have already done tours will again be eligible, regardless of previous deployments, if their units are called into service.

Britain Signals Plans To Reduce, Not Increase, Troop Levels In Iraq (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 11 — Britain, which had been America's closest and most pliant ally in Iraq, said Thursday that it would not follow the United States in raising troop levels there and signaled that it would proceed with plans to hand over security responsibilities to Iraqi forces in the south.

Britain has about 7,000 troops in Iraq, most in the southern city of Basra, and says the situation there is far less dire than in Baghdad.

Officials here dismissed as speculation, though, a report in The Daily Telegraph on Thursday that those numbers would be cut by 3,000 before the end of May.

British officials offered a cautious welcome for President Bush's announcement but made clear that it would not distract them from trying to reduce British forces. In recent months, senior British commanders have voiced increasing concern that, with thousands of troops also fighting on a second front in Afghanistan, the British Army is overstretched.

The announcement by Mr. Bush of an increase in the American troop level in Iraq spread unease among some opposition politicians here who expressed concern that an American crackdown in Baghdad could provoke fighting in Basra.

"Many of us do not accept the apparent belief of the prime minister that U.S. action in Baghdad can have no conceivable effect on the security position in southern Iraq," said David Heath, a spokesman for the small antiwar Liberal Democrat opposition.

Prime Minister Tony Blair's spokesman, who customarily speaks on condition of anonymity, was asked Thursday whether Mr. Blair supported Mr. Bush's announcement. "What the prime minister fully supports is the efforts of the U.S., as announced, the efforts of the Iraqi government, and our own efforts to create the space and time to allow the Iraqi government to establish its authority and make Iraq a more prosperous country," the spokesman said. He said Britain would not decide on troop reductions until its forces had completed a drive to purge the local police in the areas where they are stationed of what it calls rogue elements.

Margaret Beckett, the foreign secretary, acknowledged that Britain had not marched in lock step with the White House on the current troop issue, as it has been accused of doing in the past by its critics in Europe and at home. Mr. Blair has announced that he will step down this year, and some political analysts say that he wants a significant troop withdrawal from Iraq to offset the damage to his legacy caused by the war there.

Speaking to a parliamentary panel on Thursday, Ms. Beckett said the impact of the change in American strategy would be "somewhat limited" for Britain. "Obviously it's an issue that people will look at, but I would say that it's a change of direction, as the president says, for the United States and doesn't necessarily imply a change of direction for us," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0115749

Earlier, she told reporters: “We are dealing with the security situation in Basra. It is not our intention at the present time to send more troops.”

She added: “We are under way with the process of handover as the security situation improves. We will make our judgments and our decisions depending on the progress of those events.”

Some Britons were openly critical of Mr. Bush’s decision. “I do not think that he has put his finger on a solution for the problem,” said Sir Jeremy Greenstock, a former senior British envoy to Baghdad. He said he agreed that Baghdad should be the focus and that more American troops were needed.

But, he said, that alone would not solve the problem. “Other things also have to be brought into this to fill the gap,” he said, “which is represented by the failure of the government in the Green Zone in Baghdad to have any real effect on the sectarian politics.”

Intelligence Chiefs Pessimistic In Assessing Worldwide Threats (WP)

By Dafna Linzer And Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

Iraq is at a violent and "precarious juncture," while al-Qaeda is significantly expanding its global reach, effectively immune to the loss of leaders in battle, Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte told Congress yesterday. He also warned that the Taliban is mounting a vigorous insurgency in Afghanistan, that Pakistan has become a safe haven for top terrorists and that Iran's growing regional power is threatening Middle East stability.

In their annual worldwide threat assessment before the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Negroponte and other top intelligence chiefs provided a bleak assessment of regions and conflicts at the center of President Bush's foreign policy agenda.

One day after Bush unveiled a plan to send more than 21,000 additional troops to work alongside Iraqi troops in an increasingly violent war, the head of the Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency said Iraqi forces could not combat the insurgency there.

Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples said Iraqi security forces have been thoroughly infiltrated by Shiite militias and "are presently unable to stand alone against Sunni insurgents, al-Qaeda in Iraq" or the militias themselves. Negroponte, who was ambassador to Iraq in 2004-05, said sectarian violence had become the greatest problem inside the country.

"The struggle among and within Iraqi communities over national identity and the distribution of power has eclipsed attacks by Iraqis against the coalition forces as the greatest impediment to Iraq's future as a peaceful, democratic and unified state," he said.

The assessments, and Bush's plan for additional troops, drew fierce criticism from the intelligence panel's Democratic chairman, John D. Rockefeller IV (W.Va.). Rockefeller said he is "extremely concerned that well-intentioned but misguided policies of the administration have increased the threats facing our nation, and hampered our ability to isolate and defeat al-Qaeda and other terrorists that seek to strike against the United States."

As they have for several years, the intelligence chiefs said al-Qaeda remains the greatest threat to the U.S. homeland. Negroponte claimed four U.S. successes in 2006 in what Bush has called the global war on terrorism, one being the U.S. military's killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq. Despite Zarqawi's death in June, violence in Iraq has increased substantially.

Maples said that al-Qaeda "has consistently recovered from losses of senior leadership," and that its "increasing cooperation with like-minded groups has improved its ability to facilitate, support and direct its objectives." Negroponte said the group's leaders have found a haven in secure locations in Pakistan.

He said a second major threat stemmed from nuclear weapons in the hands of U.S. enemies, with Iran and North Korea of greatest concern. But, he said, "Iran's influence is rising in ways that go beyond the menace of its nuclear program."

He said Hezbollah in Lebanon, which receives considerable logistical and financial support from Iran, also poses a significant threat in the region. Despite its 34-day war with Israel last summer, "Hezbollah's leadership remains unscathed and probably has already replenished its weapons stockpiles with Iranian and Syrian assistance," Maples said.

DOJ_NMG_0115750

Negroponte said stability in Iraq will depend in part on persuading Iran and Syria "to stop the flow of militants and munitions across their borders." For the first time, he said, "forty to 70 foreign fighters every month come over the Syrian border." Maples said foreign fighters account for less than 10 percent of insurgents and usually are recruited as suicide bombers.

The officials said Iran is providing Shiite militias with sophisticated anti-armor projectiles capable of penetrating U.S. armored vehicles. Negroponte added that Iran, in the past, supported the idea of a Shiite-dominated stable Iraq. But he now believes Tehran may be shifting to a more aggressive posture.

Shiite Radicalism Could Fuel Wider Violence, Official Warns (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 — The nation's top intelligence official said Thursday that the spiraling violence in Iraq, along with Iran's ascendancy in the Middle East, had led to a rebirth of Shiite Islamic radicalism that could fuel sectarian violence and destabilize nations across the region.

In his annual presentation on the global threats facing the United States, the departing director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte, spoke of the "shadow" that Iran was casting across the Middle East and warned members of Congress that Iran could be emboldened to dispatch Hezbollah operatives to attack American targets.

Intelligence officials have long assumed that Iran's primary goal in Iraq was establishing a weak, but viable, state dominated by Shiites. But Mr. Negroponte suggested Thursday that Iran's steady arms shipments into Iraq, which American military officials say they have documented, and the political manipulation of Iraqi Shiite politicians could signal that Iran is trying to worsen the sectarian war and anarchy there, rather than seeking relative stability.

In a Senate Intelligence Committee hearing, Mr. Negroponte also testified that Al Qaeda's "resilient" senior leadership continues to play a central planning role from remote hideouts in Pakistan. This conclusion about Al Qaeda reflects a shift in thinking among intelligence officials, who as recently as last summer had assessed that terrorist leaders like Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahri had become largely isolated from their network of supporters, reducing their role to being more inspirational than operational.

As have previous years' assessments, Mr. Negroponte said Al Qaeda remained the organization most capable of carrying out another devastating attack on American soil. But Thursday's testimony from Mr. Negroponte and other top intelligence officials showed a mounting concern about the threat of militant Shiite groups.

Mr. Negroponte cited Iran's burgeoning nuclear weapons program, its flood of oil revenue and Hezbollah's perceived victories against the Israeli Army last summer as signs that both Iran and its client terrorist organization could be interested in moving more aggressively around the globe.

"As a result of last summer's hostilities, Hezbollah's self-confidence and hostility toward the United States as a supporter of Israel could cause the group to increase its contingency planning against United States' interests," Mr. Negroponte said.

He offered no evidence to lawmakers that Hezbollah was planning any attacks.

But committee Democrats, along with some of the Republican minority, chose to spend most of their time with the intelligence officials asking pointed questions about the new strategy for Iraq laid out by President Bush on Wednesday night.

Echoing their colleagues at other hearings throughout the day, the lawmakers expressed deep skepticism that increasing the American troop presence in Iraq could halt the steadily escalating violence there.

"I don't get the feasibility, I don't get the achievability, I don't get the sustainability," said Senator Barbara A. Mikulski, Democrat of Maryland.

The intelligence officials defended the new Iraq strategy, and Mr. Negroponte said it had a good chance of succeeding despite Iraq's "precarious" state.

The Central Intelligence Agency director, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, said that so far the Iraqi government had fallen short in its efforts to halt sectarian violence. "The track record of this government isn't one that would give you great confidence," General Hayden said.

DOJ_NMG_0115751

The other intelligence officials who testified at the hearing were Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples of the Defense Intelligence Agency, Robert S. Mueller III of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and Randall M. Fort, who leads the Bureau of Intelligence and Research at the State Department.

The officials agreed that the Iraq war had helped fuel Islamic radicalism around the globe and had most likely bolstered the recruiting efforts of Al Qaeda.

The takeover of the American Embassy in Tehran in 1979 and the bombing of the Marine barracks in Beirut in 1983 made Shiite radicalism a primary concern of American officials during the 1980s and much of the 1990s. It was not until the rise of Osama bin Laden's Al Qaeda network in the mid-1990s that parallel concerns about Sunni extremism grew among intelligence officials and terrorism experts.

But intelligence officials point to last February's bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra, a sacred Shiite shrine, as a watershed moment that stoked Shiite anger throughout the Middle East and set off a wave of reprisals against Sunnis inside Iraq.

Mr. Negroponte said Thursday that governments across the region were concerned that the violence in Iraq could spill across the country's borders and embolden ethnic minorities to carry out attacks against majority sects.

He also warned of the successes that a resurgent Taliban is having in Afghanistan in its attempts to destabilize the government of President Hamid Karzai.

The intelligence chief said the Taliban "probably" does not directly threaten the viability of Mr. Karzai's government. At the same time, he said the Taliban is achieving more limited goals of impeding economic development in southern and eastern Afghanistan and undermining popular support for the government in Kabul.

Intelligence Officials See Growing Sectarian Split In Iraq (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, January 12, 2007

Sectarian divisions and related violence in Iraq are growing, as al Qaeda remains the most serious national-security threat facing the United States, senior U.S. intelligence officials told Congress yesterday.

Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte said during the annual threat briefing for the Senate intelligence committee that "sectarian divisions are widening," despite efforts by the new government.

Defense Intelligence Agency Director Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples told the hearing that "violence in Iraq, as measured over the past year, continued to increase in scope, complexity and lethality.'

The intelligence officials painted a dire picture of the insurgency in Iraq and spoke a day after President Bush announced a new plan to stabilize Baghdad with an additional 21,500 troops.

Mr. Negroponte said Iraq is "at a precarious juncture."

"Communal violence accelerated by the attack on the Samarra mosque in February 2006 -- and scant common ground between Shi'as, Sunnis and Kurds have polarized politics," Mr. Negroponte said.

Additionally, political factions are unable to compromise on key issues and public services are inadequate, including a decline in the daily hours of electrical power, while oil output remains below prewar levels, he said.

"With political reconciliation stalled, Iraqis increasingly resort to violence," Mr. Negroponte said.

The government's most senior intelligence official said stabilizing Iraq in the next year will depend on the Iraqi government's ability to create national instead of sectarian-ruled institutions.

Additionally, Mr. Negroponte warned that the terrorist threat from the Iranian-backed terror group Hezbollah is increasing. He noted that recent fighting by Hezbollah against Israel in Lebanon, "could cause the group to increase its contingency planning against U.S. interests."

On China, Mr. Negroponte said Beijing is continuing its rapid military buildup, including placing large numbers of missiles opposite Taiwan, but despite this, "prospects of a cross-strait conflict with Taiwan have diminished."

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III told the hearing that al Qaeda is planning attacks in the United States through "infiltrating operatives" from overseas and that the group is seeking to use some form of chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear material in weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0115752

"Al Qaeda's choice of targets and attack methods will most likely continue to focus on economic targets such as aviation, the energy sector and mass transit; soft targets such as large public gatherings; and symbolic targets such as monuments and government buildings," Mr. Mueller said.

Gen. Maples,, said some developments in Iraq "give hope for progress," although "the Sunni Arab-based insurgency continues to gain strength and capacity."

The three-star general also warned that Iraq is in danger of a breakdown of central authority that would pose a threat to the Iraq, the region and U.S. strategic interests.

"DIA judges that continued coalition presence is the primary counter to a breakdown of central authority," Gen. Maples said.

"The conflict remains a sectarian struggle for power and the right to define Iraq's future identity," Gen. Maples said, noting that attacks averaged 160 per day in December, down slightly from 180 a day in October.

Ten percent of the insurgents in Iraq are foreign terrorists, many of whom are dispatched to the country to conduct suicide car bombings, Gen. Maples said.

US Names Retired Diplomat At Iraq Reconstruction Chief (AFP)

AFP, January 12, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced the appointment of a retired diplomat, Timothy Carney, to head a US push to boost Iraq's moribund economy.

Carney, a former ambassador to Haiti and Sudan, will be the Coordinator for Iraq Transitional Assistance under President George W. Bush's just announced new plan for stabilizing Iraq, she said.

"Our military operations must be fully supported and integrated with our civilian and diplomatic efforts across the entire US Government to help Iraqis clear, hold and build throughout all of Iraq," she said.

Rice said a key element of the new strategy will involve increasing the number of so-called Provincial Reconstruction Teams (PRT) tasked with helping develop economic projects and provide jobs.

"We are ready to strengthen, indeed, to surge our civilian efforts," she said, saying the number of PRT's around Iraq will be increase from 10 to 18, including five new units for Baghdad and a tripling of the teams in Anbar province, a center of anti-US insurgency, from one to three.

In his speech Wednesday night, Bush announced that Washington would spend an additional one billion dollars on Iraq reconstruction and that the Iraqi government of Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki had pledged to devote 10 billion dollars to rebuilding and economic development.

The Bush administration has already sent 21 billion dollars to Iraq for reconstruction and job creation projects, including efforts to rebuild key infrastructure like electricity production and water treatment.

But many of the projects were destroyed by anti-US insurgents and significant sums were lost to corruption.

Carney will oversee the enhanced PRTs operations from Baghdad she said, noting that the former diplomat has "experience in post-conflict stabilization and reconstruction and development" from his time in Haiti.

Carney, a 32-year foreign service veteran, was the US ambassador to Haiti in 1998 and 1999 after holding the top US post in Khartoum from 1995 to 1997.

He served briefly with the US occupation authority in Iraq immediately after the March 2003 invasion which toppled Saddam Hussein.

Earlier in his career, Carney served in Vietnam and Cambodia during the Vietnam War, and Lesotho and South Africa before the end of apartheid and worked with UN peacekeeping operations, including in Somalia, the State Department said.

U.S. Detains 6 Iranians In Irbil Raid (AP)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra

AP, January 12, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115753

U.S.-led multinational forces detained six Iranians Thursday at an Iranian government office in the northern city of Irbil, Iraqi officials said, as President Bush accused Iran and Syria of aiding militants and promised to "interrupt" the flow of support as part of his new war strategy.

The U.S. military said it had taken six people into custody in the Irbil region but made no mention of a raid on the Iranian government office.

The forces entered the building about 3 a.m., detaining the Iranians and confiscating computers and documents, two senior local Kurdish officials said, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the information. Irbil is a city in the Kurdish-controlled northern part of Iraq, 220 miles from Baghdad.

A resident living near the building said the troops used stun bombs and brought down an Iranian flag from the roof. As the operation went on, two helicopters flew overhead, the resident said on condition of anonymity for fear of reprisals.

At the Pentagon, a senior U.S. military official said the building was not a consulate and did not have any diplomatic status. The six Iranians were taken in a "cordon-and-knock" operation, said the official who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to release the information.

Iraqi government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh said Baghdad was seeking clarification from the U.S. and Iran "about these people and what they were doing there and whether they were employees."

The regional Kurdish government condemned the arrests and called for the immediate release of the Iranians. It added that the government "was not aware in advance of the raid."

Iran's Foreign Ministry summoned the Iraqi and Swiss ambassadors in Tehran and "demanded an explanation" about the incident. Switzerland represents American interests in Iran, where there is no U.S. embassy.

Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini told state-run radio the raid was "against a diplomatic mission" since the "presence of Iranian staffers in Irbil was legal." Hosseini claimed the action by coalition forces reflected a "continuation of pressure" on Iran, aiming to "create tension" between Iraq and its neighbors.

Late last month, the White House said U.S. troops elsewhere in Iraq detained two Iranians during a raid on suspected insurgents and released two others who had diplomatic immunity. A Pentagon official said U.S. forces had found "indications and evidence" that two of the Iranians were involved in the transfer from Iran to Iraq of technology to make small bombs.

Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said the U.S. military would continue to target networks of individuals, regardless of their nationality, that are providing weapons designed to kill American troops in Iraq.

"I think it's instructive that in the last couple of weeks two of those raids that we conducted to go after these folks that are providing these kinds of weapons — two of those raids had policed up Iranians. So it is clear that the Iranians are complicit in providing weapons," he said.

The arrests come as tensions are high between Iran and the United States. The Bush administration has accused Iran of seeking to develop nuclear weapons and of helping fuel violence in Iraq. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, meanwhile, is trying to expand Tehran's role in Iraq as a counter to U.S. influence in the Persian Gulf region.

Al-Dabbagh, the Iraqi government spokesman, said any improvement in relations between the United States, Syria and Iran would only help Iraq.

"Sometimes we pay the price for the tension in relations between Iran and the United States and Syria, therefore it is in our interest ... that these relations improve, but not at the expense of Iraq," he said.

Bush's new strategy, however, ignores key recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, which in December called for a new diplomatic offensive and an outreach to Syria and Iran. Instead, the president accused both countries of aiding terrorists and insurgents in Iraq.

"We will disrupt the attacks on our forces," Bush said. "We will interrupt the flow of support from Iran and Syria."

Politicians and ordinary Iraqis, meanwhile, expressed skepticism Thursday that Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq will quell the violence in their country, but some offered weary acceptance of any effort to stop the carnage after several failed past attempts.

The varied reactions underscore the challenges facing the Shiite-dominated Iraqi government, which is under pressure to rein in predominantly Shiite militias as well as Sunni insurgents as both sides have killed thousands in spiraling sectarian attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0115754

An aide to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki welcomed the new strategy but stressed that the government must take the lead in the military action. The plan also envisions 10,000 to 12,000 Iraqi troops to secure Baghdad neighborhoods, and al-Maliki has announced plans for a new Iraqi security operation, although similar past efforts have been unsuccessful.

"The failure in Iraq will not only affect this country only but the rest of the region and the world, including the United States," al-Maliki aide Sadiq al-Rikabi said.

"The current situation is not acceptable — not only for the American people but also for the Iraqis and their government. As Iraqis and as an elected government we welcome the American commitment for success," he added. "The Iraqi government also is committed to succeed."

A Sunni lawmaker rejected the plan to send more U.S. troops and called instead for a timetable for them to withdraw, while other critics from both sects said it wouldn't succeed because of the power of mostly Shiite militias that have been blamed for much of the recent sectarian violence.

"Bush's plan could be the last attempt to fix the chaos created after the invasion of Iraq. Yet, sending more troops will not end the problem, on the contrary, there will be more bloodshed," said Sunni lawmaker Hussein al-Falluji.

Kurdish lawmaker Mahmoud Othman said the "plan will fail. Sending more troops and financial support will not help if there is no sectarian and political solution."

Osama Ahmed, a 50-year-old Sunni who works in the Ministry of Higher Education, said he got up early to watch the speech, which was broadcast live at 5 a.m. Thursday on Iraqi state television.

"More U.S. troops will mean more wasted blood and more people killed," Ahmed said. "The violence will surge unless U.S. administration decides to curb militiamen who are part of the Iraqi government."

Abdel-Karim Jassim, a 44-year-old Shiite trader, said he had hoped Bush would come up with something other than the troop increase.

"Sending more troops will not solve the problem," he said, although he acknowledged that "Iraqis cannot handle security issue on their own because of the sectarian divisions and the strong militias and insurgents."

Awad Mukhtar, a 35-year-old technician, said Bush's new proposals could be Iraq's "last chance" for peace.

"The security situation in Iraq is very bad, we are facing death at any moment daily," Mukhtar said. "I see the new Bush strategy as the last chance for Iraqis to save their lives ... we have no other choice, only to wait and see the results."

G.I.'s In Iraq Raid Iranians' Offices (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

ERBIL, Iraq, Jan. 11 — American troops backed by attack helicopters and armored vehicles raided an Iranian diplomatic office in the dead of night early Thursday and detained as many as six of the Iranians working inside.

The raid was the second surprise seizure of Iranians by the American military in Iraq in recent weeks and came a day after President Bush bluntly warned Iran to quit meddling in Iraqi affairs.

There was a tense standoff later in the day between the American soldiers and about 100 Kurdish troops, who surrounded the American armored vehicles for about two hours in this northern Iraqi city.

The attack was denounced by senior Kurdish officials, who are normally America's closest allies in Iraq but regarded the action as an affront to their sovereignty in this highly tribal swath of the country. Iran's Foreign Ministry reacted in Tehran with a harsh denunciation that threatened to escalate tensions with the Bush administration.

The American military said that it had been "conducting routine security operations in Erbil Jan. 11 and detained six individuals suspected of being closely tied to activities targeting Iraqi and coalition forces. One individual was released and five remain in custody."

American officials have long accused Iran of sending weapons and money into Iraq. In late December the American military detained a number of Iranians in Baghdad, including two diplomats and two who turned out to be senior Iranian military officials. The diplomats were released but the others were forced to leave Iraq under suspicion that they had been working with

DOJ_NMG_0115755

Shiite militias. The incident also comes at a time when tensions are high between the United States and Iran over its nuclear program.

The incident was a major embarrassment for the Iraqi government, which has been trying to foster initiatives with its neighbor for improving regional security and trade, as well as other issues, and it calls into question the extent of Iraqi control over its own affairs.

In Thursday's raid, attack helicopters roared above the normally placid neighborhood here, as American troops backed by armored vehicles broke into the office at around 3:30 a.m., carrying away documents and computer equipment.

American Black Hawk helicopters also swooped over the confrontation with the Kurdish troops, and at least two landed, said an American witness. But there were no reports of shots being fired, and the incident ended peacefully.

Witnesses said the attack was directed at a building that an American official described as a liaison office that was properly accredited with Iraq as an Iranian government facility. It was unclear whether the Iranians who were arrested carried diplomatic passports and whether the office was supposed to share some of the immunities enjoyed by embassies and consulates.

Local residents said the main function of the office was to process papers for people who want to go to Iran for visits or medical treatment.

Muhammad Ahmad, who lives near the neighborhood, known as Old Korea, said that he was awakened by shooting and helicopters. "These kinds of actions are totally unacceptable and the Kurdish leadership is very angry," said Fuad Hussein, the spokesman for the president of the semiautonomous territory, Massoud Barzani. Mr. Hussein called the raid an "abduction."

The Iranian government said the raid violated international law and demanded the detainees' release.

"This is a provocative action by the United States and is against all international laws and regulations," said the Foreign Ministry spokesman, Mohammad Ali Hosseini, the state-run radio reported.

"The Americans are following two aims," he said. "They want to continue their pressure against Iran and, secondly, to create tension among Iraq's neighbors."

He added: "The provocative and mischievous actions cannot damage the friendly relations with Iraq."

A senior State Department official said that the Iranian office in Erbil was not technically a consulate, but rather a liaison office which also provided some consular services.

He said that American officials believed that the Iranians intended to turn the office into a consulate at some point, but that had not yet happened. Therefore, he said, the State Department does not consider the office to be Iranian territory.

Thursday afternoon, the Kurdish interior minister, Karim Sinjari, appeared surprised when an American reporter asked him during a meeting with American businessmen to confirm the raid on the liaison.

"Yes," Mr. Sinjari said tightly. "It was American-led." Asked for further details, he said: "We have no information. They did it by themselves." He then cut off questions.

The standoff began around 11 a.m. in Einkawa, a pleasant and predominantly Christian suburb of Erbil where many Western officials live and keep offices. Possibly angered by the earlier raid, the Kurdish forces refused to let several American Humvees through a checkpoint.

"It was the Americans' fault," said a Kurdish guard from the checkpoint, who refused to give his name. "We asked them to stop but they did not stop. That is why we pointed our guns at each other."

The standoff, while tense, was carefully controlled by the Kurds. The American who witnessed it said that as the lines of traffic lengthened on the blocked road, the Kurds began waving cars through and they drove directly past the stopped Humvees.

The Iranian Foreign Ministry summoned the Iraqi and Swiss ambassadors in Tehran in protest, and demanded the immediate release of what it called diplomats, the state-run television reported.

The Swiss represent American interests in Tehran. The United States has had no embassy in Iran since 1979, when radical students attacked the American Embassy in Tehran and took 44 diplomats hostage.

Mr. Hosseini told state-run television on Thursday that the consulate in Erbil was set up after coordination with Iraqi officials and that "it was involved in consulate work."

DOJ_NMG_0115756

A measured statement late in the day from Mr. Barzani's office expressed "its sadness over these actions," indicating that it believed the building had diplomatic immunity. "It is better to inform the Kurdistan government before taking actions against anybody," the office said.

The American military said in a statement that "the documents and equipment that were removed will be examined to determine the extent of the alleged illegal or terrorist activity. Based on the outcome of that investigation, appropriate action will be taken regarding the detainees."

U.S. Raids In Northern Iraq Nab Several Iranians (MERCN)

By Jonathan S. Landay And Nancy A. Youssef

The San Jose Mercury News, January 12, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq - U.S. troops detained at least five Iranians in two raids in northern Iraq just hours before President Bush vowed in a nationally televised speech to clamp down on support that Iran allegedly is providing to militants in Iraq, Iraqi officials said Thursday.

Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshayr Zebari called the U.S. raids "very, very embarrassing." One resulted in the arrest of legitimate Iranian diplomats and the second nearly triggered a gunfight between American and local Iraqi security forces, he said.

In Washington, several senior Democratic and Republic lawmakers expressed alarm that Bush's plan to interdict alleged support for Iraqi insurgents could lead to secret military strikes inside Iran and Syria. Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., warned that such action would require congressional approval, while Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Nebraska, called the policy "very, very dangerous."

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said operations will take place only inside Iraq and that there were no plans for cross-border strikes. But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said that President Bush "isn't going to rule anything out to protect our troops."

The Pentagon announced Thursday that as part of the new strategy, the USS John C. Stennis, an aircraft carrier, and its strike group - five surface ships, a submarine, a support vessel and about 80 aircraft - and an Army battalion of four Patriot air defense missile batteries were being ordered to the region to boost security.

A senior defense official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue, said that the ships were being sent in part to signal to Iran and Syria and "anyone else who thinks the United States is cutting and running (from Iraq) that it is not."

In unveiling his new Iraq policy, Bush laid out a tougher policy toward Iran, which he accused of supplying arms to Iraqi militants, and toward Syria, which he said allows terrorists to cross into Iraq.

He repeated a long-standing U.S. charge that Iran is secretly developing nuclear weapons and vowed the United States would work to prevent Tehran from "dominating" the Middle East.

Senators grilling Rice warned that an overly aggressive U.S. response would risk escalating frictions throughout the already tension-fraught region.

Both Tehran and Damascus have supporters in Iraq who could retaliate against U.S. forces or the Iraqi government. Both countries could also sponsor attacks by Islamic extremists on American targets in the Middle East or other parts of the world.

Bush has spurned bipartisan calls to negotiate with Iran and Syria.

The U.S. raids in Irbil, the main city of the semi-autonomous Kurdistan region, came just hours before Bush's speech.

At around 2 a.m. local time, U.S. troops stormed a building that functioned as an Iranian consulate, arrested five men and seized computers and files, Iraqi officials said.

A U.S. military statement confirmed the raid and said six persons closely tied to attacks on U.S. and Iraqi forces had been arrested.

It did not disclose the names or nationalities of the detainees.

The regional Kurdish government called the arrests unacceptable, complaining that local authorities had not been forewarned of the operation.

Mithal Alusi, a member of the national Parliament, charged that the detainees were Iranian intelligence officers involved in terrorist activities in northern Iraq. He insisted that they did not have diplomatic status.

DOJ_NMG_0115757

Iraqi Foreign Minister Zebari, however, told McClatchy Newspapers that the Iranian office had operated in Irbil for more than 10 years and the Iranians were in Iraq legally. "This is very, very embarrassing," he said. "The Iraqi government was aware of who was in that office."

Later Thursday, U.S. forces staged a second raid, attempting to enter Irbil airport and abduct a group of unidentified individuals, he said.

Members of a Kurdish paramilitary force known as peshmerga confronted the Americans when they refused to identify themselves, and a gun battle was narrowly averted "at the 11th hour," said Zebari.

He said U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad told him that the first raid was aimed at people who were trying to harm U.S. troops. Khalilzad said he was unaware of the operation at the airport.

Zebari said the raids were part of a pattern of stepped up U.S. operations against Iranian operatives. "That is in line with their approach, yes."

U.S. troops detained several Iranian diplomats and officials last month in Baghdad.

The issue dominated the opening of Rice's Senate hearing yesterday.

Biden, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, pressed Rice on whether operations against alleged Iranian and Syrian support networks would include cross-border strikes against "persons . . . or governments."

"Obviously the president isn't going to rule anything out to protect our troops, but the plan is to take down these networks in Iraq," she replied.

She sidestepped a question about whether Bush could mount cross-border operations without Congress' approval.

"I believe . . . he does need congressional authority to do that," replied Biden.

Biden later wrote to Bush asking him to state whether he believed he had the constitutional authority to order cross-border strikes without congressional authorization.

Rice's answers also failed to satisfy Hagel, an Army veteran of the Vietnam war, who said that former President Nixon "lied" in denying that he had ordered U.S. forces to invade Cambodia in 1970.

"No one in our government can sit here today and tell Americans that we won't engage the Iranians and the Syrians cross-border," said Hagel. "When you set in motion the kind of policy that the president is talking about here, it's very, very dangerous."

Pentagon Intensifies Pressure On Iran (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Even as President Bush seeks larger numbers of troops to stabilize Iraq, the Pentagon is intensifying operations there on another front: challenging Iran over its alleged role in destabilizing its Arab neighbor.

Yesterday, multinational forces including U.S. troops detained six Iranian officials in Iraqi Kurdistan suspected of aiding Shiite Muslim militants in Iraq. It was the second detainment by U.S.-led forces of Iranian officials in Iraq in less than a month. The U.S. and its allies have also sought to seal off Iran's ability to penetrate Iraq and ship arms there, with British forces stepping up patrols along the Iran-Iraq border and U.S. warships and aircraft carriers increasing patrols in the Persian Gulf. Mr. Bush, in his speech to the nation Wednesday, announced the deployment of a second aircraft-carrier battle group to patrol the Gulf.

And the Pentagon has significantly increased its intelligence activities targeting suspected Iranian agents and Shiite Muslim militants, U.S. intelligence officials said. Besides working with Iraqi security forces, the U.S. has intensified information-sharing with dissident Iranian groups such as Mujahedin-e Khalq, according to officials associated with the group.

U.S. officials say the intensifying actions targeting Iran are central to the new White House push to underpin the shaky government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. They come against a backdrop of growing, broader tensions between Washington and Tehran, over Iran's suspected pursuit of nuclear weapons, U.S. efforts to curb Iran's financial transactions and Tehran's moves to increase its influence throughout the Middle East.

Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of state for political affairs, said the administration is seeking to counter Iranian provocations across the region as part of a broader strategy. "Iran needs to learn to respect us," he said. "And Iran certainly needs to respect American power in the Middle East."

DOJ_NMG_0115758

Some U.S. lawmakers and many Arab officials fear the U.S.'s latest tactics could stoke a broader regional conflict.

A number of Democratic and Republican lawmakers yesterday drew analogies to the Vietnam War, when American military activities secretly moved into neighboring Cambodia and Laos from Vietnam. These lawmakers said U.S. efforts to target insurgents and alleged Iranian agents in Iraq could spill over into Iran and Syria, and potentially spark wider, sectarian conflicts between Sunni and Shiite Muslims around the region.

"When you set in motion the kind of policy that the president is talking about here, it's very, very dangerous," said Sen. Chuck Hagel, a Republican from Nebraska and a Vietnam veteran.

Mr. Bush Wednesday hinted at a significant hardening of policy toward Iran and Syria, saying the U.S. "will seek out and destroy the networks providing advanced training and weaponry to our enemies in Iraq." Mr. Bush and other U.S. officials have regularly accused Iran and Syria of arming and funding militants fighting in Iraq, charges both countries deny.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice pushed an even-harder line toward Tehran yesterday. Washington "will continue to work with the Iraqis and use all our power to limit and counter activities of Iranian agents who are attacking our people and innocent civilians in Iraq," she said.

The White House's emerging policy on Iran's role in Iraq directly counters recommendations made last month by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group. The congressionally funded group, headed by former U.S. Secretary of State James Baker and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton, had recommended that the U.S. directly engage Tehran and Damascus to build a regional consensus on how to stabilize Iraq.

Bush administration officials working on Middle East policy said the White House's moves to confront Tehran directly in Iraq predates the ISG study, having been in development for nearly six months. From the earliest days of the U.S. invasion of Iraq in 2003, Pentagon officials have voiced fears that Iran was using the fall of Saddam Hussein to increase its influence among Iraqi Shiites, who constitute a majority in the country but had lived under Sunni Muslim rule for decades prior to Mr. Hussein's fall.

And U.S. intelligence officials said that during the past year, they have noticed a significant increase of munitions and designs for the construction of improvised explosive devices, or IEDs, coming across the Iranian border. IEDs are the largest killers of U.S. soldiers in Iraq, according to the Pentagon.

Of particular concern to Pentagon planners is the alleged role of Qods Force, the international arm of Tehran's Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps, in trafficking IEDs into Iraq, intelligence officials said. The guard corps is believed to have developed close ties to both the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia headed by the Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, and the Badr Brigade, the militant arm of Iraq's largest Shiite political party, the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq.

The Pentagon moves in Iraq to arrest Iranian diplomats in both Irbil and Baghdad over the past month were directly aimed at trying to stanch the flow of IEDs and other armaments into Iraq, U.S. officials involved in the program said. The U.S. has alleged that the Revolutionary Guard corps has used front companies and religious foundations to move some of these armaments over the Iran-Iraq border. And U.S. officials said they have extensive intelligence showing many of the diplomats detained were senior members of the corps.

The Iranian government immediately protested the U.S. moves, while Iraqi and Kurdish officials asked the U.S. to show restraint in confronting Iran. Baghdad views Tehran as an increasingly important economic partner and crucial to its internal stability. "Sometimes we pay the price for the tension in relations between Iran and the U.S. and Syria," said Iraqi government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh, according to the Associated Press.

Aside from escalating strains between the U.S. and Iran, Middle East analysts said Mr. Bush's new Iraq strategy -- such as adding more than 10,000 troops in Baghdad -- will inevitably increase tensions between American forces and the Mahdi Army, which controls much of the Iraqi capital, and that an escalation in fighting could turn Iraq's Shiite majority even further against the U.S.

Of more concern to U.S. lawmakers is the potential that these U.S. actions against Iran could escalate. Under one possible scenario, U.S. forces could cross into Iran or Syria in pursuit of suspected insurgents or their allies, or use alleged Iranian activities inside Iraq as a pretext for a wider assault on Iran. The fear is that any such military activities could ignite a wider conflict.

DOJ_NMG_0115759

"The potential for sparking a wider conflict is great," said Trita Parsi, an Iran analyst and president of the National Iranian American Council in Washington. "I think that if we're going for a confrontation with Iran, the pretext will be Iraq."

U.S. Troops Raid 2 Iranian Targets In Iraq, Detain 5 People (WP)

By Robin Wright And Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

U.S. troops launched two raids on Iranian targets in Iraq yesterday, following through on President Bush's vow to confront and break up Tehran's networks inside Iraq. Five Iranians were detained, and vast amounts of documents and computer data were confiscated, according to U.S., Iraqi and Iranian officials.

The two raids are part of a new U.S. intelligence and military operation launched last month against Iran, U.S. officials said. The United States is trying to identify and detain top officials of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards' al-Quds Brigade operating in Iraq. The al-Quds Brigade is active in arming, training and funding militant movements, such as Lebanon's Hezbollah, throughout the Middle East.

"Throughout Iraq, operations are currently ongoing against individuals suspected of being closely tied to activities targeting Iraqi and Coalition forces," the headquarters of the U.S.-led Multi-National Force-Iraq said in a statement yesterday.

While the public focus is on Iraq, the administration is now spending as much time on plans to contain Iran as on a strategy to end Iraq's violence, U.S. officials said.

Last month, U.S. forces seized two senior Iranians -- Brig. Gen. Mohsen Chirazi and Col. Abu Amad Davari -- in the first round of raids. Chirazi is the No. 3 official in the al-Quds Brigade and the highest ranking Iranian ever held by the United States.

Yesterday's raids were both in Irbil, a Kurdish city in northern Iraq. One was carried out at 3 a.m. on the Iranian Liaison Office, which is used by the Iranian Revolutionary Guards as a local headquarters, U.S. officials said. Kurdish officials said U.S. troops came in helicopters. They disarmed the security guards, broke through the gate, entered the building and detained six men, Iranian officials told the Iranian news agency. One was later released.

The other raid was at the Irbil airport, where U.S. forces tried to detain people until Kurdish troops intervened -- and almost ended up in a confrontation with U.S. troops, said Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari. "A massacre was avoided at the last minute," he said. A U.S. official confirmed that the incident nearly resulted in U.S. and Kurdish allies firing at one another.

The action in Irbil is one of the genuinely new additions to the U.S. strategy in Iraq. Bush said Wednesday that the United States will now "seek out and destroy the networks" arming and training U.S. enemies. He also announced that he is ordering another aircraft carrier and supporting ships to the Persian Gulf area near Iran in a show of force.

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, the Joint Chiefs of Staff chairman, charged yesterday that Iran is "complicit" in providing weapons designed to kill American troops. "We will do all we need to do to defend our troops in Iraq by going after the entire network regardless of where those people come from," he said at a news conference with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates.

Rice outlined a carrot-and-stick strategy, offering to meet with her Iranian counterpart "anytime, anywhere" to discuss "every facet" of U.S.-Iranian relations -- with the condition that Tehran suspend its program for enriching uranium, which can be used for nuclear weapons as well as for generating energy. Until that time, she said, the United States will "use all our power to limit and counter the activities of Iranian agents who are attacking our people and innocent civilians in Iraq."

Rice effectively dismissed a key recommendation of the Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan panel that last month urged the administration to launch a dialogue with Iran and Syria to help stabilize Iraq. She told reporters that Tehran and Damascus should not "be paid" to end their "destabilizing behavior," and that such a move would both demoralize friends and embolden enemies across the Middle East.

But the new U.S. policy to confront Iranians in Iraq has already sparked divisions within the administration. The Pentagon wanted to hold the two top al-Quds officials for questioning, but the State Department backed an Iraqi request to deport them. They were sent home a week after their capture.

The Kurdish government had approved the opening of the Iranian Liaison Office, which provided consular services and which Iran wants to upgrade to a formal consulate, the Iraqi foreign minister said. Before the raids, U.S. forces did not consult with the Iraqi government, which is now trying to establish procedures and agreements for future operations, he said. "This is a very, very dangerous thing," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0115760

Iran's foreign ministry summoned Iraqi and Swiss diplomats to protest and demand an explanation, according to Iran's mission to the United Nations. Switzerland represents U.S. interests in Iran. Tehran contends that the five men detained are all diplomats, an assertion that Iraq's foreign minister and U.S. officials reject.

Squeezing Iran (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

The United States has known for years that Syria and Iran are supporting Sunni insurgents and Shiite radicals in Iraq -- support that has taken a heavy toll in American lives. On Wednesday, President Bush finally suggested he'll do something about it.

"We will disrupt the attacks on our forces," Mr. Bush said. "We will interrupt the flow of support from Iran and Syria. And we will seek out and destroy the networks providing advanced weaponry and training to our enemies in Iraq."

Those sound like fighting words, and even before he spoke U.S. forces raided the Iranian "office of relations" in the Kurdish city of Irbil, arresting five of its employees and seizing documents and other property. That raid follows the arrest of two Iranian diplomatic officers in Baghdad last month; they were expelled to Tehran, but they were found with incriminating documents that probably led to yesterday's raid in Irbil.

It's about time, and we hope the Administration keeps showing Tehran that it will pay a price for continued subversion in Iraq. There's certainly much more coalition forces can do.

Consider the problem of Iranian-manufactured improvised explosive devices, or IEDs, some of which are capable of penetrating M-1 tank armor. According to information provided by an Iranian opposition group with a track record for accuracy, many of those IEDs arrive in Iraq via the southern Shalamche and central Mehran-Badreh border crossings with the connivance of Iraqi officials friendly to the Iranian regime. At a minimum, coalition forces can police and seal those crossings.

The U.S. can also shut down the network of charities and "cultural institutions" that serve as front groups for Iranian terrorist activities. Iran's so-called Qods (Jerusalem) Force, the terrorist arm of its elite Revolutionary Guards, operates in Iraq under the aegis of the Al-Najaf Al-Ashraf Al-Saqafieh Establishment, based in the city of Najaf and run by Iranian mullah Hamid Hosseini.

Arms deliveries are organized by the innocuously named "Headquarters for Reconstruction of Iraq's Holy Sites," which is supposed to work at rebuilding and preserving Shiite shrines but is said to be under the control of a Qods Force general. Money for these groups arrives in Iraq through a number of Iranian-controlled currency exchanges. Iran is also attempting to establish a branch of Hezbollah in Iraq even as it trains Iraqi Shiite militants at bases in Iran.

Less information is publicly available on Syria's current support for the insurgency, but what we do know is damning. After the battle for Fallujah in November 2004, U.S. troops seized GPS systems "with waypoints originating in western Syria," according to the Washington Post, while captured fedayeen reported receiving small arms and explosives training in Syrian camps. Syria is also suspected of harboring former Saddam loyalists such as Izzat Ibrahim Al Douri, King of Clubs on the card deck of Iraq's most-wanted and now the self-declared successor to Saddam as President of Iraq.

We wouldn't rule out incursions into either country, if military circumstances warrant. This does not mean another invasion, but Predator strikes or special forces raids against terror camps in either country are surely justified to protect American lives and help the new Iraqi government succeed. Syria's Assad family has a long history of meddling in the affairs of its neighbors -- not just Iraq but also Israel, Turkey and Lebanon. But the Assads also understand the language of force, as when they swiftly shut down the anti-Turkish terrorist PKK operations after Turkey threatened to invade in 1998.

Iran is also susceptible to U.S. pressure, both military and non-military. The President's decision to deploy another carrier battle group to the Persian Gulf suggests he is prepared to counter any Iranian moves to interfere with maritime traffic in the area, as it did in the late 1980s. We are also heartened by signals from the Administration that it has all but given up on its mostly fruitless attempt to sanction Iran's nuclear transgressions at the United Nations. On Tuesday, the Treasury Department designated state-owned Bank Sepah for its role in Iran's missile procurement network; more can be done to freeze or seize the assets of key Iranian officials whose personal assets are usually parked abroad.

DOJ_NMG_0115761

One failure of Mr. Bush's war leadership has been to clearly define the enemy in Iraq, which for a long time has included Syria and Iran. The more we have shown forbearance, the nastier their actions have become. We hope Mr. Bush's remarks Wednesday, and the actions in recent days, signal a new determination to take the battle to that enemy.

Diyala Sweep Finds No Evidence Of Insurgent Force (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2007

Turki, Iraq — As a heavy fog lifted Thursday in Diyala province, U.S. and Iraqi soldiers pressed into a warren of reed-choked canals and found secret tunnels, weapons caches and a roadside bomb.

But there was little evidence of the fighters they believed might be massing there for a final stand as a joint offensive against a reputed safe haven and training ground for Sunni Arab insurgents entered its eighth day.

U.S. forces said that in the last week, they had already killed at least 90 gunmen spotted maneuvering in the area or planting explosives in the road as nearly 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi government troops closed in and blocked escape routes.

Seven more were reported killed Thursday as they advanced on U.S. and Iraqi forces on the outskirts of Turki, the main village in the area.

"I think we killed the people that were going to fight," said Capt. Stephen Dobbins, a troop commander in the 5th Squadron, 73rd Cavalry. "Anybody else potentially thought that was a bad idea and melted back into the civilian population."

But he said U.S. and Iraqi forces could still meet resistance as they press forward.

Commanders have said success will ultimately depend on building a patrol station and establishing a permanent presence in the isolated region east of Baghdad, where until recently Iraqi security forces had refused to venture without U.S. backup.

The crackle of heavy guns punctuated by grenade blasts echoed through desolate farmland as soldiers in armored trucks fired into the canals before climbing down to search them on foot. Attack helicopters circled overhead.

When U.S. forces last swept through the area in November, they encountered fierce resistance from well-trained bands of insurgents, who used the canal network in a battle of the trenches that left two American soldiers and many more insurgents dead.

The region is a stronghold of the powerful Al Daini tribe, which includes many disaffected former officers in Saddam Hussein's army.

U.S. officers believe tribe members have established links with al-Qaida in Iraq and other militant groups, offering important logistics and training support from this rural region. They are also accused of kidnappings and killings in a bid to purge area villages of Shiite Muslims and other rival tribesmen.

Bad weather forced a two-day pause in the offensive, during which U.S. and Iraqi forces kept the area surrounded. Small groups of men armed with Kalashnikovs, some of them with their faces covered in black scarves, were repeatedly spotted moving through the canals. But in most cases U.S. soldiers called in air or artillery strikes against them before any shots were fired.

As the weather cleared Thursday, Lt. Col. Andrew Poppas, who commands the 5th Squadron, 73rd Cavalry, addressed his troops over a crackling radio.

"The juggernaut is moving," he said. "Go ahead and execute."

The offensive, which has involved tanks, Bradley fighting vehicles, Humvees and attack helicopters, has uncovered numerous weapons caches, including one that has yielded 1,172 Katyusha rockets, 1,039 rocket-propelled grenades and 171 TOW missiles.

Minutes after plunging among the reeds along one stretch of canal, an Iraqi soldier identified a disk protruding from the mud that appeared to be an anti-tank mine. When an ordnance disposal team blew it away, a plastic container was revealed below holding machine guns, rocket propelled grenades and an anti-tank mine.

Numerous spider holes, some containing food and water, were found linked to the canals. U.S. soldiers said they were likely used as hide-outs and fighting positions. Motorcycles were also found buried in straw.

Shrapnel from one controlled detonation injured four American soldiers, one Iraqi and an interpreter. Most of the injuries were minor.

DOJ_NMG_0115762

Groups of seven and nine military-aged men were found at two farm compounds searched Friday, in contrast to previous days when only women and children were left at most homes. But U.S. forces found no evidence against them.

In Turki village, 15 men were detained Thursday for illegal weapons possession, including Kalashnikovs and an Iranian machine gun. Fake identification cards and cash also were found.

Hussein Cousin Says He Ordered Executions (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 11 — In the Baghdad courtroom where Saddam Hussein was sentenced to die in November, new testimony on Thursday featured a startling admission by his cousin Ali Hassan al-Majid, known to Iraqis as Chemical Ali.

He said he had ordered troops to execute all "saboteurs" who defied government orders to abandon Kurdish villages in northern Iraq during a military operation in 1988.

Evidence at the trial has centered on the Hussein government's use of chemical weapons and mass executions against the Kurds. Mr. Majid made an immediate impression by occupying the seat left vacant by Mr. Hussein, who was hanged midway in the so-called Anfal trial for the killing of as many as 180,000 Kurds.

After listening to audio recordings that showed him issuing instructions in his role as overseer of the campaign against the Kurds, Mr. Majid rose to tell the judges that he was responsible for ordering executions in the villages. "I gave orders to the troops to catch anyone they find there and execute them after investigating them," he said.

Insurgents Play Role In Bin Laden Escape (AP)

By Sadaqat Jan

AP, January 12, 2007

Afghan insurgent leader Gulbuddin Hekmatyar said in a television interview broadcast Thursday that his fighters helped al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden escape intense U.S. bombing in the Tora Bora mountains in 2001.

Hekmatyar, a former Afghan prime minister and leader of the Hezb-e-Islami militant group, told Pakistan's private Geo TV network that when the United States began its assault on the rugged Afghan mountains five years ago, some of his fighters moved bin Laden, his deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri and other associates to "a safe place" where he met them later.

He did not say where they found the shelter. Bin Laden and al-Zawahiri are believed to be still hiding along the Afghan-Pakistan border after the heavy U.S. pounding failed to kill them or lead to their capture.

Hekmatyar was a leader of the mujahedeen that fought the Soviet occupation of the 1980s and was briefly Afghan prime minister during the civil war of the early 1990s that cost tens of thousands of lives.

In the interview, Hekmatyar insisted he has not maintained links with al-Qaida.

"We have no organizational link with al-Qaida," he said. "We have no military operations outside of Afghanistan."

Hekmatyar was speaking in Pashto language. Only fragments from Hekmatyar's comments were audible under a voiceover translated into Urdu, Pakistan's main language. Geo did not disclose when or where the interview was made.

Hekmatyar wore a black turban, a brown coat and a white shirt. He was seen sitting in front of a backdrop with a painting of a mountain.

He also said that he had offered the Taliban that the two militant groups should unite in a joint fight against U.S.-led forces in Afghanistan, but he added that the Taliban leaders did not support the idea.

"A series of negotiations (with the Taliban) have broken down," Hekmatyar said. "If they realize the need (for negotiations), we are ready."

Hekmatyar's militia are active in eastern Afghanistan along the Pakistan border. His whereabouts are unknown.

In the TV interview, Hekmatyar said that foreign troops must first leave the country before the conflict can be solved politically.

NATO Says Afghan Clash May Have Killed Scores Of Rebels (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

DOJ_NMG_0115763

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, Jan. 11 — Afghan and NATO troops clashed with a large group of insurgents crossing from Pakistan into eastern Afghanistan in the early morning hours on Thursday. NATO said up to 150 insurgents might have been killed in the fighting.

Two large groups of insurgents were spotted gathering on the Pakistan side of the border and were tracked as they crossed into Afghanistan, NATO said in a statement released in Kabul.

Afghan Army soldiers and NATO troops laid an ambush for the groups about half a mile inside Afghanistan, using air and ground forces, said Gen. Zahir Azimi, a spokesman for the Afghan Ministry of Defense.

The insurgents were in trucks loaded with men and weapons and crossed the border about 2 a.m., General Azimi said. Afghan and NATO forces set up an ambush in a deserted area near the border, he said. He reported no Afghan or NATO casualties, but estimated that about 80 insurgents were killed. The clash occurred in the Barmal district of Paktika Province, which borders the Pakistani tribal area of Waziristan, one of the most lawless areas of the frontier between Afghanistan and Pakistan.

Militants from both countries, along with hundreds of foreign fighters, operate Taliban training camps there and mount frequent attacks across the border into Afghanistan.

The Pakistani military guards the border but has failed to stem cross-border attacks; NATO officials say there has been a marked increase in infiltration at the border since September compared with last year.

"Pakistani military liaison officers were kept fully informed throughout the operation," NATO said in its statement.

Scores Of Insurgents Killed In Afghan Border Area (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

KABUL, Jan. 11 -- NATO and Afghan military forces killed between 80 and 150 insurgents in battles near the Pakistani border Wednesday night after the fighters crossed into Afghanistan from Pakistan, NATO and Afghan officials said Thursday.

The confrontation in Paktika province, described as the largest battle in Afghanistan since September, came as American and U.N. officials step up pressure on both Pakistani and Afghan leaders to stop their public bickering and do more to gain control of their respective border areas, where Islamic insurgents have been operating for months.

NATO officials said their forces had observed two large groups of insurgents infiltrating from Pakistan, tracked them and then attacked them by ground and air. According to NATO's initial count, as many as 150 insurgents were killed, but Afghan defense officials said they believed the toll was about 80. No Afghan or NATO casualties were reported.

There was no immediate explanation for the discrepancy in the figures. Because the battle area was so remote, it was not possible for journalists to gather information directly.

Pakistan's military spokesman, Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan, said soldiers from his country's army fired artillery at trucks being driven by the fighters on the Pakistani side of the border, the Associated Press reported.

The AP also quoted a man claiming to speak for the Taliban, Muhammad Hanif, as saying in a text message that NATO's casualty figure was "a complete lie."

The battle highlighted the continuing military importance of the extremely porous and poorly guarded border, especially the sections that include a string of semiautonomous tribal districts in Pakistan. Afghan officials have repeatedly accused Pakistan of allowing Islamic insurgents to find safe haven there, while Pakistan has said it is doing everything possible to rein them in.

In the past week, controversy has mounted over a proposal by Pakistan to place land mines and barbed-wire fencing along stretches of the border, including the area where NATO said the groups of insurgents slipped across this week. Critics here say the plan could harm civilians and divide tribes that live on both sides.

Richard A. Boucher, the senior State Department official for South and Central Asia, told journalists in Kabul on Thursday that both Afghanistan and Pakistan needed to do more to bring security and effective government to the border areas. He is to hold talks with officials from the two countries during a visit to the region this week.

DOJ_NMG_0115764

"It is clear to me that none of us will be safe unless we do deal with both sides of the border," Boucher said. He said that he believed Pakistan's commitment to fighting terrorism and the Taliban insurgency was "real" but that the Bush administration wanted to help make it "more effective."

Boucher did not directly criticize the border mining plan but said it was generating "serious discussion" in Pakistan. A senior U.N. representative to Afghanistan said this week that the United Nations "regretted" Pakistan's move and viewed land mines as a "very serious threat to human security."

The official, Christopher Alexander, strongly chided Pakistan for inflammatory rhetoric and misleading statements that he said had not helped ease tensions with Afghanistan. He cited recent assertions by Pakistani officials that key Taliban leaders had never been in Pakistan and that the Taliban insurgency was part of a domestic uprising inside Afghanistan by the Pashtun ethnic group.

"The truth is that these networks operate in both countries, and their leaders spend time in both countries," Alexander said. "More law enforcement and military action are needed" in both places, he added, calling on the leaders of the two countries to "focus more on facts and less on rhetorical point-scoring."

In recent months, Afghan President Hamid Karzai and Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, have engaged in an escalating war of words. Karzai accuses Pakistan of allowing Islamic extremists to seek safe haven inside its borders, while Musharraf criticizes the Kabul government as weak and unable to quash a domestic rebellion.

Boucher, asked which of the two governments he believed, said he did not want to choose sides but cited similar "challenges" in both countries. "The issue on both sides is to extend the authority and benefits of government to people right up to the edges of the frontier," he said.

He suggested that the two governments have cooperated far more "than one would think from the rhetoric." Pakistan and Afghanistan share military intelligence, and their senior security officials have met regularly with NATO alliance leaders as part of a three-way commission, which met again Thursday.

A sustained offensive by Taliban insurgents in Afghanistan caused about 4,000 violent deaths in 2006. The revived Islamic militia, which ruled most of Afghanistan from 1996 to 2001, has launched hundreds of attacks and dozens of deadly suicide bombings.

Attacks Heat Up Afghan-Pakistani Border (CSM)

By David Montero

The Christian Science Monitor, January 12, 2007

ISLAMABAD, PAKISTAN

NATO-led forces Thursday killed up to 150 militants who were discovered infiltrating Afghanistan from Pakistan, providing what appears to be fresh proof that Taliban militants are staging their attacks from inside Pakistan's tribal zone.

The militants were seen gathering in Pakistan, and were subsequently tracked and targeted in the Margha Hills in Paktika, an Afghan province bordering Pakistan's restive tribal belt, according to NATO's International Security Assistance Force (ISAF).

Thursday's attack is likely to bolster mounting international claims that Pakistan's tribal zone is a staging ground for attacks inside Afghanistan. Analysts in Pakistan cautioned against jumping to conclusions, saying the reports would have to be verified and the identities of the militants established. But, if true, they added, the attack offers singular proof of cross-border infiltration.

"If [Thursday's attacks are] true, Pakistan will have to take cognizance of it. Pakistan cannot just wash its hands of this," says Talat Masood, a retired Army general who is now a political analyst in Islamabad.

Those critiques have risen to a crescendo since September, when the Pakistan government signed a deal with Taliban militants in North Waziristan to return their weapons, vehicles, and fighters in return for guarantees of peace.

NATO and Afghan officials argue that the deal has failed, and has essentially carved out a sanctuary for militants inside Pakistan to plan and launch their attacks. The number of attacks inside Afghanistan, they point out, has spiked dramatically since the September truce, particularly in areas bordering the tribal zone. Pakistan lends a hand

"As soon as [the militants killed Thursday] infiltrated Afghanistan from Pakistan, we engaged them," says Lt. Col. Angela Billings, a spokesperson for ISAF speaking by telephone from Kabul, Afghanistan. "They were tracked over a long enough period of time where we were certain of their status [as insurgents]," says Colonel Billings, adding that the size of the group coming from Pakistan was unusually large.

DOJ_NMG_0115765

Billings would not divulge what area of Pakistan the militants were seen coming from, but added that Pakistani military liaison officers were continually informed of Thursday's operation. ISAF officials were also quick to point out that the Pakistani Army's cooperation was crucial to Thursday's attack.

"Insurgents are certainly coming across from Pakistan, but the Pakistan Army engaged with its colleagues across the border - ISAF and the Afghan Army - to do something about it," says Maj. Dominic Whyte, an ISAF spokesman speaking from Kabul.

Hours after the NATO strike, Pakistani helicopter gunships attacked supply trucks used by suspected insurgents for cross-border attacks in neighboring Afghanistan, a military spokesman said Thursday. The Pakistani Army attacked in North Waziristan Province, across the border from Thursday's NATO air assault.

The strike marks the Pakistani Army's first reported attack in the North Waziristan tribal region since a controversial September peace deal between the government and pro- Taliban militants that critics say has provided a sanctuary for insurgents.

The Army, acting on intelligence provided by the US-led coalition in Afghanistan, also used mortars and artillery in the attack Wednesday night in Gurvek, in North Waziristan, spokesman Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan told The Associated Press.

He said it was not clear if any militants were killed in the assault.

The Taliban rejected the NATO report as "baseless and false" and said that no fighters had been killed. "Only civilians were targeted," a Taliban spokesman, Mohammad Hanif, said by telephone. Human rights groups have heightened their criticism of NATO forces as civilian casualties have mounted over the past several months.

If confirmed, the death toll would be the highest since September, when NATO troops forced the Taliban out of a district near the southern city of Kandahar, killing at least 500 insurgents.

Thursday's attack comes only weeks after Pakistan announced it would begin fencing and mining its 1,500-mile border with Afghanistan. On Wednesday, Pakistan implemented the first of several checkpoints using computerized fingerprint checking and identification cards at Chaman, the main border crossing into Kandahar.

The plan is highly unpopular with Pashtun tribes, who straddle both sides of the border and who turned out by the thousands in Afghanistan to protest the new check posts. Pakistani officials insist that the fencing is a preplanned mechanism to control border traffic, but critics have dismissed it as an ill-advised attempt to stave off rising criticism that the Taliban are operating from its borders. Cooperation without borders

Chris Alexander, deputy special representative of the secretary-general for the United Nations Assistance Mission in Afghanistan, was the latest voice to criticize Pakistan's deal-making with the Islamist militants inside its own borders. Referring to a UN sanctions list detailing 142 Taliban leaders, Mr. Alexander said in Kabul on Monday that some of those leaders "were in Pakistan for at least a part of 2006."

Pakistan immediately rejected his statement.

Thursday's attack puts in sharp relief that Pakistan's many proposed solutions - from stationing 80,000 troops on the border to cutting peace deals with militants - have so far failed, say analysts. Fencing is unlikely to prove any more effective, bitterly opposed as it is by tribal people and the Afghan government alike.

If there is a short-term solution, observers say, it lies in a smarter use of resources and greater interborder cooperation.

"It will take greater technology, and greater intelligence. Satellite imagery, drones, reconnaissance," says Mr. Masood, adding that cultivating the support of local tribes is the keystone to such an effort.

The urgency of better solutions seems to be growing. The scale of the attack in Paktika surprised some analysts, who say militants have rarely been seen infiltrating Afghanistan in such large numbers. The incident might point to a winter surge in preparation for attacks in spring, when snow in mountain passes will melt and heavy fighting is expected to resume.

"If true, it's significant. It shows that they are putting people in place now for the spring offensive. I didn't expect the Taliban to launch such attacks in the winter," says Ramiyullah Yusufzai, a journalist and political analyst in Peshawar, a provincial capital near the Afghan border.

DOJ_NMG_0115766

In recent weeks, Paktika has emerged as a flashpoint of cross-border violence. On Dec. 31, militants based in Pakistan fired a succession of some 20 rockets into Paktika, although the ordinance caused no casualties, Pahjwok Afghan News reported.

DOJ:

Justice Dept. Hit With Hiring Freeze (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 12, 2007

A hiring freeze has hit two federal crime fighting agencies and a third has slowed its recruitment efforts because of congressional budget delays that some officials say threaten efforts to combat terrorism and violent crime.

The hiring crunch is largely the result of Congress' failure to approve the Justice Department's 2007 spending request. Lawmakers who oversee spending bills are now negotiating how much — if at all — to increase government spending. In the meantime, the agencies are being funded according to last year's budget levels.

Justice Department agencies feeling the squeeze are:

_The Drug Enforcement Agency. A hiring freeze is expected to last through 2007, said chief financial officer Frank Kalder. Although more than 400 agents and support staff are expected to quit or retire this year, Kalder said the DEA might have to furlough additional employees if Congress does not give it about $95 million more than it did in 2006. Layoffs are not being considered.

"I don't think we're the only ones in this situation," Kalder said.

_The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. The agency is "not hiring and are not back-filling open positions," said spokeswoman Sheree Mixell. The ATF says it needs $71 million more than last year just to sustain its workforce of 4,900 employees.

_The FBI. Recruiting and hiring has slowed since the budget year began on Oct. 1. The agency has stopped advertising for job openings on its Web site. Assistant Director John Miller said the bureau still is hiring agents, linguists, analysts and other high-priority employees.

"We're not in a hiring freeze, but for the time being, we are only filling those jobs that are essential to operations," Miller said. The FBI employs about 12,600 agents and 18,000 support staff.

Nationally, violent crime rates are on the rise after a three-year lull that began in 2001, according to FBI officials. In 2005, the latest annual statistics available, the number of murders, robberies, rapes and other violent crimes rose by 2.2 percent.

Following the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the FBI shifted more than 500 agents from its traditional criminal investigations — including drug cases, bank robberies and white-collar crimes — to counterterrorism and counterintelligence programs that became the bureau's top priority. In response, the DEA hired about 500 additional agents between 2001 and 2006 to maintain the government's focus on drug investigations.

Without a budget in place, "the FBI and DOJ will not be able to maintain the operations tempo they've achieved since Sept. 11," said Sen. Barbara Mikulski, D-Md., said who chairs the Senate Appropriations panel that oversees Justice Department spending. She blamed Republicans for the funding delays.

"It means that they will not be able to hire and keep the agents that they have," Mikulski said. "This is an outrageous thing."

A spokeswoman for Sen. Richard Shelby, an Alabama Republican who last year chaired that panel, declined to comment.

Peter Moskos, a professor at John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York, said "it's hard for things to get better if you have fewer agents" pursuing crime.

"From a public safety standpoint, a hiring freeze is the same as a layoff, because it's fewer people not working," he said. "Ultimately, it matters."

___

On the Net:

Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives: http://www.atf.treas.gov/

DOJ_NMG_0115767

Federal Bureau of Investigation: http://www.fbi.gov/
Drug Enforcement Agency: http://www.dea.gov/
Justice Department: http://www.usdoj.gov/

Lam Is Asked To Step Down (SDUT)

By Kelly Thornton And Onell R. Soto, Union-tribune Staff Writers
The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 12, 2007
Job performance said to be behind White House firing

The Bush administration has quietly asked San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam, best known for her high-profile prosecutions of politicians and corporate executives, to resign her post, a law enforcement official said.

Lam, a Bush appointee who took the helm in 2002, was targeted because of job performance issues – in particular that she failed to make smuggling and gun cases a top priority, said the official, who declined to be identified because Lam has yet to step down.

Lam has had high-profile successes during her tenure, such as the Randy "Duke" Cunningham bribery case – but she alienated herself from bosses at the Justice Department because she is outspoken and independent, said local lawyers familiar with her policies.

When she took over, Lam made it clear that she planned to focus less on low-level smuggling cases in favor of public corruption and white collar crime, which would mean fewer but more significant prosecutions.

Lam declined to comment yesterday.

Several prosecutors in Lam's office and many defense lawyers said yesterday that they were unaware of her impending dismissal, and were universally shocked by it.

"It's virtually unprecedented to fire a U.S. Attorney absent some misconduct in office," said criminal defense attorney Michael Attanasio, a former federal prosecutor.

"This office has clearly made a priority of investigating and prosecuting white collar offenses and has had occasional success doing so," he said. "One would think that would be valued by any administration, even if it meant fewer resources were devoted to routine and repetitive border crimes."

Lam, 47, has been criticized by members of the Border Patrol agents union and by members of Congress, including Vista Republican Darrell Issa, who accused her office of "an appalling record of refusal to prosecute even the worst criminal alien offenders."

But even some of Lam's legal opponents said the supposed reasons she is being forced out are perplexing.

"What do they want her to do, lock up Mexico?" said Mario Conte, former chief of Federal Defenders of San Diego Inc. Conte, now a professor at California Western School of Law in downtown San Diego, said every prosecutor walks a tightrope.

"I'm sure that Carol, in her role, is simply not able to accommodate everybody's desires of what they think the U.S. Attorney should be doing in this district."

Her most prominent case involved Cunningham. The former Rancho Santa Fe congressman is in federal prison, and indictments of others connected to the case may be forthcoming. Her office is also prosecuting Francisco Javier Arellano-Félix, a suspected Mexican drug kingpin, who is in federal custody in San Diego facing charges that could lead to the death penalty. Two San Diego city councilmen were convicted of corruption charges by Lam's office, but a judge reversed the jury's verdict for one of the men.

Lam spent almost a year personally prosecuting a national hospital chain that she said used complex agreements to pay off local doctors in return for referrals. That case ended in a mistrial.

But under Lam, the overall number of prosecutions has plummeted.

In 2001, the year before she took over, federal prosecutors in San Diego and Imperial counties filed 5,266 cases, while in 2005, the office prosecuted 3,261 cases, according to statistics compiled by the Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse at Syracuse University from federal reports.

DOJ_NMG_0115768

Of the 2001 cases, 2,419 were related to immigration, while that number stood at 1,641 in 2005. Although the number of cases dropped significantly in 2005, a higher percentage were immigration-related – 50 percent in 2005 compared with 46 percent in 2001.

Most of the other prosecutions were drug cases, with 2,294 filed in 2001 and 1,290 in 2005. There were 14 weapons cases in 2001, and eight in 2005.

Some in the defense community were glad to hear there may be change at the U.S. Attorney's Office.

"She has shown a certain tunnel vision in her prosecutions and has exercised an appalling lack of discretion in terms of the individuals she has targeted for prosecution and the classes of crimes that she has chosen to direct her resources at," said criminal defense attorney Geoffrey C. Morrison, who represented a defendant in the City Hall corruption case prosecuted by Lam's office.

"Having somebody with a more broad-minded approach and a greater sense of fairness and justice will do the legal community a tremendous justice," he said.

Lam, a career prosecutor, former Superior Court judge and political in dependent, sent an e-mail to her staff late in the afternoon in which she neither confirmed nor denied that she was asked to step down. She told attorneys not to let speculation interfere with their work.

She also told them not to speak to reporters about the subject, but to refer calls to her spokeswoman, according to a recipient of the e-mail who asked not to be identified for fear of reprisal.

U.S. attorneys are usually appointed by the president and require Senate approval. They typically serve the same term as the president that appointed them, and are replaced when a new president is elected.

However, a provision in the Patriot Act that was revised last year allows the Attorney General to appoint interim U.S. Attorneys for indefinite terms when vacancies arise, without Senate confirmation. Filling interim vacancies had been the responsibility of the district court.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., criticized the Bush administration yesterday for "pushing out U.S. Attorneys from across the country under the cloak of secrecy."

"We don't know how many U.S. Attorneys have been asked to resign – it could be two, it could be ten, it could be more. No one knows," she said in a statement.

Feinstein said the administration was abusing its executive power by trying to circumvent the Senate confirmation process. She and two colleagues proposed legislation yesterday to restore appointment authority to the district court when a vacancy occurs and an interim leader is needed.

Lam is one of several prosecutors who have either resigned under pressure or been told to leave in recent months.

New Mexico U.S. Attorney David Iglesias is among those who have announced they are stepping down.

"I was asked to resign," he said. "I asked (why) and wasn't given any answers. I ultimately am OK with that. We all take these jobs knowing we serve at the pleasure of the president."

H.E. "Bud" Cummins, who left the post of U.S. Attorney in Little Rock, Ark., wouldn't say whether he was asked. His replacement, J. Timothy Griffin, was an Army prosecutor who worked in the White House and for the Republican National Committee. Arkansas' senators, both Democrats, have criticized the way in which he was selected because it did not require Senate approval.

It's not the intent of the Justice Department to avoid the confirmation process, and the department is committed to working with senators when making a nomination, a department spokesman said.

Of 11 U.S. Attorney vacancies since the Attorney General gained the authority to make the appointments in March 2006, the Bush administration has nominated four people and interviewed seven others, all of whom are expected to complete the confirmation process, said Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse.

"In every case, it is a goal of this administration to have a U.S. Attorney that is confirmed by the Senate," Roehrkasse said. "It is wrong for a member of Congress to believe that this is in any way an attempt to circumvent the confirmation process."

DOJ_NMG_0115769

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

U.S. Scrutinizes Grant To Jobs (WSJ)

By Steve Stecklow And Nick Wingfield

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

Focus in Apple Case Is Cast on the Roles Of 3 Ex-Officials

Federal authorities are actively investigating a backdated stock-option grant awarded to Steve Jobs, Apple Inc.'s chief executive, that carried a false October 2001 date, people familiar with the matter say.

Apple recently disclosed that records were "improperly" created to claim that the grant was approved at a special board meeting that month. But no board meeting took place then.

Investigators are now focusing on the grant to Mr. Jobs for 7.5 million options that were finalized in December 2001, when Apple's share price was higher. The false dating increased the value of the grant to Mr. Jobs, and resulted in a retroactive $20 million charge to Apple's earnings when it was discovered by a special internal investigation.

People familiar with the matter say the false documentation was created by an Apple attorney named Wendy Howell, whom the company quietly dismissed last month. Ms. Howell contends that Apple's general counsel at the time, Nancy Heinen, instructed her to create the false documentation, these people say. Thomas Carlucci, Ms. Howell's attorney, said that while at Apple "Ms. Howell acted as instructed by Apple management and with the company's best interest being paramount."

Ms. Heinen left Apple in May for reasons that were unrelated to backdated options, a person familiar with the matter says. Her attorney, Cristina C. Arguedas, says Ms. Heinen didn't knowingly engage in any wrongdoing and denies she instructed Ms. Howell to falsify documentation. Ms. Arguedas said in a statement that "each of the option grants involving Ms. Heinen was authorized and approved by her superiors."

Investigators with the Securities and Exchange Commission, working with federal prosecutors, are seeking to question Ms. Howell and Ms. Heinen, but neither has agreed to questioning so far, say people familiar with the matter.

Authorities want to speak to Fred Anderson, Apple's former chief financial officer. It also remains unclear whether Mr. Anderson, who resigned from Apple's board in October, will agree to talk. An attorney for Mr. Anderson has said, "As CFO, Fred did not play any day-to-day role in the granting, reporting and accounting of stock options and he was not involved in any knowing manipulation of the process."

Apple's backdated stock options are the subject of criminal and civil probes by the U.S. attorney's office in San Francisco and the SEC. A decision on whether to bring criminal charges in the Apple case isn't expected for months.

Apple spokesman Steve Dowling declined to comment, except to repeat that the company has provided results of an internal options investigation to the SEC and U.S. attorney and that the investigation cleared Mr. Jobs of misconduct.

An option gives its holder the right to buy a stock at a fixed, or exercise price, usually for up to 10 years after the date of the grant. By backdating the grant -- or pretending it was made earlier than it really was -- the employee gets an instant boost to the potential profits from the award. The practice can violate securities laws and accounting rules.

In a March 2002 proxy statement, Apple told its shareholders -- wrongly -- that the 2001 grant to Mr. Jobs was made at fair market value on the date of grant. On Aug. 8, 2002, Mr. Jobs personally signed a routine disclosure statement to the SEC bearing the false price, and false date of Oct. 19, 2001, for the grant. Apple has said the grant wasn't finalized until December of that year, when Apple's share price was higher. An Apple spokesman declined to comment on the matter.

• The News: Federal authorities are actively investigating a backdated stock-option grant awarded to Apple's chief executive, Steve Jobs.

• The Issue: Whether Mr. Jobs or or present or former Apple officials violated federal criminal or civil securities laws.

• What's Next: Investigators are seeking to question Apple's former general counsel and another former company lawyer, as well as its former chief financial officer.

Apple has said it found no evidence that Mr. Jobs or any other current executives were aware of the false records surrounding the October 2001 grant. It also says Mr. Jobs didn't understand the accounting implications of backdated grants, and didn't financially benefit from them because he never exercised his options. He did later exchange all of the options for restricted stock eventually worth hundreds of millions of dollars.

DOJ_NMG_0115770

Apple has disclosed that Mr. Jobs recommended "favorable" dates for some options awards, although people familiar with the matter say he didn't pick any dates for grants that he received. Apple also has said that 6,428 grants of options on 42 dates between 1997 and 2002 were improperly dated. Last month, it restated its financial results between 1998 and 2006, taking $84 million in charges for the improperly dated options, including $20 million connected to the 2001 grant to Mr. Jobs.

Under accounting rules, no grant is actually made until final terms, including price, are settled and final approval is given by a company. Apple has said that its board "originally approved" the grant dated in October 2001 on Aug. 29 of that year when the stock was trading at $17.83. But according to a person familiar with the situation, Mr. Jobs wasn't satisfied with the terms of the grant in August and negotiations continued for months. Apple has said the grant was finally authorized by the board on Dec. 18, 2001.

On that date, the stock was trading for $21.01. The grant, however, was backdated to Oct. 19, when the share price was $18.30. Apple hasn't disclosed any details surrounding the decision to backdate the grant. Two people familiar with the matter say the October date coincided with a meeting of the board's compensation committee. The committee, however, didn't ISSUE the grant at the meeting, they say. According to Apple's practice, the full board was required to approve stock-option grants to the chief executive.

Apple's compensation committee had been formed in August 2001. Since April 2000, the entire Apple board handled compensation-related chores, including stock-option grants. The new committee was composed of Intuit Inc. Chairman William Campbell, former International Business Machines Corp. Chief Financial Officer Jerome York and Genentech Inc. CEO Arthur Levinson.

Ms. Howell, who joined Apple fresh out of law school around 1997, was in charge of stock-options administration. Ms. Heinen, as general counsel, oversaw Apple's legal department and also served as the board's secretary.

Ms. Howell's role in the October 2001 grant was reported by the Recorder, a San Francisco-based legal publication.

--Charles Forelle contributed to this article.

Write to Steve Stecklow at steve.stecklow@wsj.com7 and Nick Wingfield at nick.wingfield@wsj.com8

Broadcom Chief Says Restatements Will Be Made Shortly (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Peter J. Brennan And Fred Fishkin

Bloomberg, January 12, 2007

Jan. 11 (Bloomberg) -- Broadcom Corp., a maker of chips for consumer devices, will shortly issue financial restatements to include over $1.5 billion of costs for the misdating of stock options, Chief Executive Officer Scott McGregor said.

``Hopefully that will put most of this behind us," McGregor said during an interview yesterday at the Consumer Electronics Show in Las Vegas. He wasn't more specific on when the company would restate its results.

The company is examining 6 million pages of documents to assess the impact of stock-option backdating, a practice that can enrich recipients by setting option dates to a time when the underlying stock traded lower. Broadcom Chief Financial Officer William Ruehl resigned in September, and the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission opened a formal investigation last month.

McGregor originally said the restatements would be ready by the end of 2006. On Dec. 18, the company said it would report amended results for 2005 and the first quarter of 2006 by this month. Broadcom also hasn't issued full results for the second and third quarters. The delays have put the company in danger of delisting by the Nasdaq Stock Market.

``It really has been hard to model" Broadcom's future profits, said Cody Acree, a Dallas-based analyst for Stifel Nicolaus & Co. He has a ``hold" rating on the shares and doesn't own them. ``At the same time, Broadcom has been dealing with an industrywide inventory correction that hit Broadcom harder."

Shares of Broadcom fell 34 cents to $32.85 at 4 p.m. in Nasdaq composite trading. The shares rose 2.8 percent last year, while the S&P 500 semiconductor index fell 10 percent.

New Technology

DOJ_NMG_0115771

At the Consumer Electronics Show, Broadcom demonstrated technology for speeding up wireless connections and a digital- television system-on-a-chip, a semiconductor that handles the duties of several chips.

McGregor is counting on such products to boost this year's sales growth, which analysts predict will be the slowest since 2001. Broadcom sales are expected to rise an average of 9 percent this year, according to 25 analysts surveyed by Bloomberg.

Broadcom makes chips for a range of consumer electronics, including television set-top boxes, Apple Inc.'s video iPod and Nintendo Co.'s Wii game console. McGregor declined to say whether his company's chips are inside Apple's new iPhone.

Sales of the Wii have exceeded expectations, Acree said, which may lift Broadcom's revenue. There are three Broadcom chips in each Wii.

``It's a nice catalyst," Acree said.

Nintendo yesterday reaffirmed its forecast for sales of 6 million Wii consoles in the fiscal year ending in March.

Formal Probe

Broadcom last month said the SEC had opened a formal investigation into its stock options. That means the agency may subpoena current and former executives. McGregor said he and his executives haven't yet been summoned.

The U.S. Justice Department and the company are conducting their own probes into Broadcom's option grants.

``It's a bit of a distraction, but we keep focused on the business," McGregor said. ``We spend most of our time on products and with customers, and that's as it should be."

Siemens Ex-CFO Named In Bribery Probe (FT)

By Richard Milne In Frankfurt

Financial Times, January 12, 2007

The investigation into the €420m bribery scandal at Siemens reached the highest level yet on Thursday as the company's former chief financial officer was named as a suspect.

The investigation of Heinz-Joachim Neubürger, who stepped down in April after being passed over as chief executive of Europe's largest engineering group, came as the current head of Siemens, Klaus Kleinfeld, warned that the probe threatened the company's survival.

The scandal has shaken the German group to the core and raised questions about the competence of its management. It has led to calls for the resignation of its chairman, Heinrich von Pierer, and has disrupted one of its most important joint ventures, a €20bn (£13.3bn) telecommunications tie-up with Nokia.

Mr Neubürger is under suspicion of knowing about some of the bribery and doing nothing about it. He is also alleged to have tried to influence KPMG, Siemens' accountants, from investigating a payment irregularity that could have been a bribe.

He was unavailable for comment last night but has previously denied the allegations, saying: "I have nothing to reproach myself for and have also not concealed anything." Over the KPMG incident, he said: "I cannot remember such a case, but if there was one then I would have handed it over to the compliance department immediately."

Associates of Mr Neubürger and Siemens' officials confirmed he was a suspect.

Mr Neubürger was told he was a suspect on Tuesday after voluntarily going to Munich prosecutors for questioning after he was implicated by Michael Kutschenreuter, the former finance director of the telecoms division.

This division is at the heart of the scandal, under which sham consultancy contracts were allegedly set up and money used for bribes in countries such as Nigeria.

Mr Kleinfeld, Siemens' chief executive since January 2005, on Thursday staked his reputation on a thorough clean-up of the scandal, telling a town-hall meeting of Munich workers: "A company can only survive when it stands for integrity, respect for the law and transparency. We should take [the current situation] as an opportunity."

Mr Kleinfeld and other senior Siemens' directors have denied any knowledge of the bribery and allege it was a criminal enterprise by a group of rogue employees.

Prosecutors have already previously detained – but not charged – a former member of Siemens' management board, Thomas Ganswindt.

DOJ_NMG_0115772

Siemens has appointed an external law firm, auditors and anti-corruption experts to help it in its attempt to improve its battered image.

Ex-Merrill Brokers Probed By NYSE In Timing Case (WSJ)

By Evelyn Juan

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

Regulators at the New York Stock Exchange are investigating three former Merrill Lynch & Co. brokers who were ousted by the company in 2003 for allegedly helping a hedge fund trade improperly in mutual funds.

In its monthly listing of disciplinary actions, the exchange said it fined former UBS AG branch manager John Borgese $50,000 for failing to supervise three unnamed financial advisers involved in mutual-fund market timing in 2001. The document also said a disciplinary action had begun against the advisers.

The three are Christopher Chung, Kevin Brunnock and William Savino, people close to the investigation said. The brokers worked at UBS's Paramus, N.J., office before joining Merrill Lynch in January 2002.

The New Jersey Bureau of Securities revoked the licenses of the trio, known as the CBS Group, in March 2005 for engaging in deceptive practices related to rapid buying and selling of mutual funds, known as market timing.

The practice, aimed at reaping fleeting gains, isn't necessarily illegal, but regulators claim the conduct is inconsistent with just and equitable principles of trading. Critics also have said the practice can hurt returns for long-term fund investors.

"We have turned our attention to investigating and bringing charges against individuals who are responsible for the market timing," said Susan Merrill, head of enforcement at NYSE Regulation, a unit of NYSE Group Inc. "There may be further charges or further settlements coming out."

Susan Necheles, a lawyer for the three financial advisers, didn't return calls for comment. A UBS spokeswoman declined to comment on the case of Mr. Borgese, the first manager to be sanctioned by the NYSE in its continuing market-timing investigation.

Merrill Lynch was fined $13.5 million by the NYSE in 2005 for failure to stop the CBS group's improper trading of mutual funds, while UBS was charged $49.5 million by the NYSE and the New Jersey Bureau of Securities.

The NYSE's arbitration panel asked Merrill Lynch in 2005 to pay the three brokers $15 million for defaming them. The decision is under appeal by the securities company at a New York state court. The NYSE regulatory action is separate from that of the arbitration panel.

CRIMINAL LAW:

As Libby Goes To Trial, Case Appears Weakened (WSJ)

By Evan Perez

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald's case against Lewis "Scooter" Libby goes to trial next week seemingly weakened by revelations that Mr. Fitzgerald knew early in his CIA-leak probe that the ex-White House official wasn't the original source of news-media disclosures.

Those disclosures, and the search for their source, were the reason Mr. Fitzgerald was ordered to launch an investigation in the first place.

As a result, Mr. Fitzgerald's success will depend largely on how well he can keep the jury focused on his charge that Mr. Libby "knowingly lied" to federal agents during his probe into the leak of former Central Intelligence Agency operative Valerie Plame's identity.

Other recent perjury cases, including the successful prosecution of Martha Stewart on charges of lying to investigators about a stock sale, offer a road map narrowly directing a case amid heavy media attention and myriad distractions.

Mr. Libby's high-profile attorneys -- Theodore V. Wells Jr. of Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison LLP and William H. Jeffress Jr. of Baker Botts LLP -- will have vigorous and savvy public-relations backing. A private legal trust has raised more than

DOJ_NMG_0115773

$3 million for his defense, thanks to fund raising and donations from prominent conservatives, such as Mary Matalin and Bill Bennett, who regularly appear as media commentators. Meanwhile, the defense plans to call Vice President Dick Cheney as a witness, while prosecutors plan to call several reporters to the stand.

Perjury prosecutions are notably difficult with a high rate of failure. In this case, prosecutors have the added challenge of navigating a minefield of extraneous issues while asking jurors to interpret Mr. Libby's state of mind when he talked to investigators.

"At the end of the day, you try to get your jury to focus on elements of the offense," says Karen Patton Seymour, the lead prosecutor in the Martha Stewart case who now heads the criminal defense and investigations practice at Sullivan & Cromwell LLP, a New York law firm. "You have to send the message that lying under oath matters or our criminal justice system suffers."

A spokesman for Mr. Fitzgerald said he declined to comment. Messrs. Wells and Jeffress cited an order by the judge barring comments to the media.

Prosecutors suggest Mr. Libby, then Mr. Cheney's chief of staff, lied to investigators to conceal a White House campaign to leak Ms. Plame's identity in retaliation for her husband's criticism of the administration's war plans. Prosecutors say Mr. Cheney urged Mr. Libby to "get out 'all' the facts," about a CIA fact-finding trip to Niger made by Ms. Plame's husband, former diplomat Joseph Wilson, to investigate alleged ties to an Iraqi weapon program. This included, according to prosecutors, spreading a story that the trip was a junket arranged by his wife.

But allegations of a cover-up motivation appear to be undercut by recent news that former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage, not Mr. Libby, was the source of the leak of Ms. Plame's name to reporters. Mr. Libby's attorneys haven't said what importance they plan to place on the Armitage disclosures, but they have sought to subpoena a tape made by Washington Post reporter Bob Woodward of an interview with Mr. Armitage.

The challenge for prosecutors will be to train jurors' attention on whether Mr. Libby committed perjury when he made statements to the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

"Certainly the defense would like to point out the Armitage revelations, but that's not the point," says Dan Richman, Fordham University law professor and former federal prosecutor in New York's southern district. "The point here is whether he lied in this setting, and it's a setting that an average jury, especially in D.C., would expect a high government official to be truthful in."

Another problem for Mr. Fitzgerald: At the end of his two-year investigation, during which he fought high-profile battles to get reporters to reveal their secret sources, he didn't bring charges on the leak itself and instead brought the Libby perjury case.

The defense has its own issues. Court filings suggest Mr. Libby's attorneys will argue he was so consumed with national security and political matters that he simply misspoke when he talked to FBI agents and that any misstatements were due to faulty memory or confusion amid weightier matters.

To support their defense, attorneys requested dozens of pages of classified documents dealing with issues as varied as unrest in Liberia, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and threatened attacks by al Qaeda.

Says Mr. Richman: "The 'I'm too busy, I'm too important' defense has the potential to rankle a lot of jurors."

Puerto Rico Seeks FBI Raid Documents (WP/AP)

By Yaisha Vargas, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico -- Puerto Rico's Justice Department asked a U.S. appeals court on Thursday to force the FBI to release information about its two raids against militant independence advocates in the U.S. Caribbean territory.

Puerto Rico's solicitor general, Salvador Antonetti Stutts, said the three-judge panel in Boston should order the release of all documents requested about the September 2005 shooting death of militant independence leader Filiberto Ojeda Rios and a February 2006 raid against independence activists in suburban San Juan.

Puerto Rico's Justice Secretary Roberto Sanchez Ramos alleged that bureau officials have stonewalled his investigations into the raids and he has asked Congress to pressure the agency to cooperate. He said the FBI has refused to disclose the identities of the agents who participated.

DOJ_NMG_0115774

In September, U.S. District Court Judge Jose Fuste ruled against the territory's Justice Department, saying the FBI did not have to share information it deemed sensitive.

A U.S. Justice Department investigation concluded that agents were justified in shooting to death Ojeda Rios after he initially opened fire during an attempt to arrest the activist at his home in the island's west, the department's Office of the Inspector General said in an August 2006 report.

Witnesses and his widow allege that the FBI shot Ojeda Rios and let him bleed to death.

During a February raid targeting independence militants just outside the island's capital, agents used pepper spray on reporters and protesters.

The information on the raids could be shared under a confidentiality order if the agency was concerned about public disclosure, Antonetti said. If that was not possible, the panel must send the case back to Puerto Rico's district court, which should force the FBI to say why the information could not be released, he said.

"The commonwealth strongly believes that these are the only courses of action which can serve to adequately protect the commonwealth's interests," Antonetti wrote in his brief.

The FBI and the U.S. Justice Department's civil division in Washington declined to comment on the case.

Jury Charged In Calvin Williams Trial (WMC)

WMC-TV, January 12, 2007

Both the government and the defense presented very strong closing arguments.

Prosecutor Tim DiScenza told the jury that even if they believed what Calvin Williams said on the stand, he was still guilty of taking a bribe and extortion.

Meanwhile, his defense attorney, Doris Randall-Holt, challenged the government's start witness, reminding jurors that Tim Willis was caught padding invoices at Shelby County Juvenile Court and that he cut a deal to stay out of jail.

Now the jury must decide. But before deliberating, they heard from Calvin Williams.

"This is make or break for me," he said, on his way into federal court. Williams was characteristically up-beat and confident.

"Either I can explain what's on the tape or I can't," he said.

What's on the tape is Calvin Williams getting $1500 from goverment informant Tim Willis. Williams told the jury the money was owed to him as a part owner of a business called Strategic Solutions. Williams even produced bank receipts and payroll stubs to establish that he and Willis were business partners hoping this would prove the money was not part of a bribe.

"I want this town to know that this didn't take place. So I'm not going to duck and hide behind the govenment, [which] has not proven its case," he told reporters.

But testifying was no cake-walk. On cross examination, Federal Prosecutor Tim DiScenza challenged Williams' earlier claims, pointing out that Willaims admitted several times during tape recorded conversations that he had no stake in Strategic Solutions.

And Discenza produced evidence, a transcript from a deposition in November 2002, when Williams admitted to an independent investigator that he was not a part owner of Strategic Solution.

"Four years, four years. I've waited four years. I was indicted in criminal court. I was indicted in federal court. I'm not going to risk them not proving their case," said Williams.

The question now is did he help or hurt himself by taking the stand.

The trial was expected last five days and the jury has now recieved instructions. The group will begin deliberating Friday morning at 9 a.m..

The maximum sentence Williams can get if convicted is 30 years on both counts.

Federal Jury To Deliberate Williams' Fate Today (MCA)

By Lawrence Buser

Memphis Commercial Appeal, January 12, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115775

The Shelby County Commission's former top aide testified Thursday he had no influence over any commissioner, but in secretly recorded conversations played by prosecutors he boasted of working behind the scenes to help commissioners line up votes and arrange rewards.

Calvin Williams said on tape that an unidentified developer told him he had saved him nearly $1 million because of how a commission vote turned out.

Advertisement

Williams also said he once created a job for the secretary of a commissioner for supporting former commissioner Shep Wilbun's 2000 appointment as Juvenile Court Clerk.

The influence issue is expected to be a factor when a federal court jury begins deliberations at 9 this morning to determine whether a $1,500 payment Williams received in 2003 was a bribe for influencing passage of an urban renewal grant.

Williams was recorded boasting that he would pay former commissioner Cleo Kirk to support the grant.

Williams, who denied trying to influence Kirk or any other commissioner, contends the $1,500 he received in April 2003 was a legitimate business payment from former friend and political consultant Tim Willis, who was acting as an informant in the FBI's undercover public corruption investigation called the Tennessee Waltz.

"We were in business together," said Williams, who had a side business called T&T Temporary Services. "Tim had a 10 percent share of T&T and I was going to get 30 percent of anything that came in for Strategic Solutions. I did not tell him I would get anyone to support (the urban renewal grant.)"

He admitted under cross examination that he told an attorney and an investigator in 2002 and 2003 that he had no business interest in Strategic Solutions.

Prosecutors allege Williams encouraged Willis to help the Glenview Community Development Partners with a $100,000 grant proposal and that Williams, for a fee, would encourage commissioners to approve the grant.

"These public officials just don't get it," federal prosecutor Tim DiScenza told jurors in closing arguments. "Even if you believe every word he said on the stand, he's still guilty. He still violated the law."

Public defender Doris Randle-Holt told the jury, "Extortion, bribery or just another conflict of interest? We submit the proof does not show a crime."

Williams resigned under pressure in January 2003 amid conflict-of-interest allegations for using his private temp service to do business with the county.

In an audiotape made a month later during lunch with Willis, Williams boasted of his influence with the county commissioners, saying he had advised Wilbun to agree to a demand by then-commissioner Michael Hooks Sr. to give his son -- Michael Hooks Jr. -- a $75,000 job at Juvenile Court in return for Hooks Sr.'s vote for the clerk's appointment.

Williams also said he helped get then-commissioner Walter Bailey's vote for Wilbun by creating a job for Bailey's secretary.

Reached Thursday evening for comment, Bailey said: "That's nonsense. That's pure unadulterated nonsense in terms of a swap. No tradeoff."

When DiScenza asked if a builder who later became a commissioner had saved Williams some $100,000 by building his Cordova home at cost, Williams replied, "I accepted it and I'm still trying to pay for it."

Queens Mover, Mother-in-law Charged In Thefts Of Picasso Drawings (NSDY/AP)

By Colleen Long, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 12, 2007

NEW YORK -- A mover and his mother-in-law were arrested Thursday in the thefts of two Pablo Picasso drawings from an apartment after the owner died.

The drawings, of a guitar and a mandolin, were worth more than $60,000 and were part of an extensive art collection owned by William Kingsland, who died in March, the city's Department of Investigation said.

The Manhattan public administrator's office, which handles the estates of dead people who have no wills or relatives, hired a consulting firm to sift through Kingsland's collection at his Upper East Side apartment. The consultant photographed the two black and white cubist sketches on April 26 and included them in a catalog of the collection shown to representatives of art galleries and auction houses for possible sale.

DOJ_NMG_0115776

The mover, Nahum "Nino" Kohen, was hired in May to cart Kingsland's household furnishings and other items of lesser value to a warehouse for auction. The public administrator's office noticed the drawings were missing in June.

Investigators traced the stolen drawings to Kohen after learning that his mother-in-law, Ori Lellouch, later tried to sell them, the DOI said. The sale was never completed.

The FBI had been investigating works of art from the collection that had been stolen years earlier and learned that an art broker had obtained one of the missing drawings from Lellouch, the DOI said.

"Not only are these defendants charged with stealing from their own customers but from the dead," DOI Commissioner Rose Gill Hearn said in a statement. "Stealing on the job is not a fringe benefit."

Kohen, 38, of Fresh Meadows, Queens, was charged with second-degree grand larceny and second-degree criminal possession of stolen property. If convicted, he could face up to 15 years in prison. Lellouch, 56, of Kew Gardens Hills, Queens, was charged with criminal possession of stolen property and could face a year in prison if convicted.

Kohen's attorney said his client didn't steal the Picasso drawings, which were about 12 inches by 12 inches framed and have been recovered.

"Nahum Kohen is absolutely innocent of these charges, and we hope that this grave injustice can be undone as soon as possible," attorney Roger Stavis said.

Stavis said he didn't know who was representing his client's mother-in-law, and there was no home telephone listing for her.

Thieves Steal Two Picassos (NSDY)

By Zachary R. Dowdy, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 12, 2007

Officials: Man from Fresh Meadows and mom-in-law stole art worth $60K from collector after he died

The lure of two Pablo Picasso drawings was too great for a Fresh Meadows man and his mother-in-law, according to city officials, who said the pair stole the famous Spanish artist's drawings out of an art collector's home last year after he died.

Drawings of a mandolin and a guitar were removed last spring from William Kingsland's Upper East Side apartment allegedly by Nahum "Nino" Kohen, 38, a moving contractor, said Diane Struzzi, a spokeswoman for the Department of Investigation.

DOI Commissioner Rose Gill Hearn said that Kohen's mother-in-law, Ori Lellouch, 57, of Kew Gardens Hills, tried to sell the pieces, which were part of Kingsland's large collection.

The drawings, which are about 12 inches by 12 inches, are worth an estimated $60,000.

"Not only are these defendants charged with stealing from their own customers, but from the dead," Hearn said in a statement. "Stealing on the job is not a fringe benefit."

Kohen is charged with second-degree grand larceny and second-degree criminal possession of stolen property. He faces up to 15 years in prison.

Lellouch is charged with criminal possession of stolen property and faces up to a year in jail.

Neither Kohen nor Lellouch could be reached for comment.

The New York County Public Administrator hired a consulting firm to collect the valuable items of Kingsland's estate and assist with marketing them to galleries, auction houses and other potential purchasers.

Kohen was hired by the public administrator to transport items to a warehouse in lower Manhattan. But the drawings were discovered missing when officials compared the collection to a set of photographs that a consulting firm had made of each item in the collection, officials said.

DOI investigators found out from the Federal Bureau of Investigation that FBI agents learned in November that Lellouch had tried to sell the drawings through a broker. FBI agents recovered the drawings from Lellouch.

Arrests Made In Case Of Picasso Robbery (NYS)

By Gary Shapiro, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, January 12, 2007

Call it the case of the purloined Picassos. A moving contractor, Nahum Kohen, and his mother-inlaw, Ori Lellouch, have been arrested on charges relating to the alleged theft of two Picasso drawings from the Upper East Side apartment of enigmatic collector William Kingsland.

The New York City Department of Investigation, which announced the arrests yesterday, began an investigation in June after it was told by the New York County public administrator that the drawings were missing from Kingsland's apartment and presumed stolen.

Mr. Kohen, a resident of Fresh Meadows, was charged with two class C felonies, grand larceny in the second degree and criminal possession of stolen property in the second degree. Ms. Lellouch, a resident of Kew Gardens Hills, was charged with a class A misdemeanor, criminal possession of stolen property. Mr. Kohen and Ms. Lellouch could not be reached by press time.

The commissioner of DOI, Rose Gill Hearn, told The New York Sun that the drawings would be held as evidence in the case. They are about 12 inches by 12 inches, and have a combined value of about $60,000.

The Picassos add another layer of intrigue to an estate already under investigation. The FBI has been seeking leads on stolen works found in the estate, including a bust by Giacometti, two Fairfield Porter paintings, and at least two works belonging to Harvard, including a John Singleton Copley.

"It's quite a tale," proprietor of Stair Galleries, Colin Stair, told the Sun. He recalled that by the time he visited Kingsland's "chock a block full" apartment this summer, authorities were already looking into the missing Picassos. Paintings lay six deep against the wall, he said, and this was after the apartment had been neatened and organized.

Kingsland, born Melvyn Kohn, died intestate last March.

The public administrator had hired a consultant to photograph Kingsland's estate to help market the works for sale. Ms. Hearn said that when an auction house subsequently inquired about the Picassos that had been photographed, "Lo and behold, they weren't there."

Ms. Hearn said Mr. Kohen was in Kingsland's apartment several times in May. As a subcontractor for Liberty Movers, Mr. Kohen was hired to move Kingsland's less valuable works to a warehouse where they would later be offered for sale at public auction.

FBI agents learned in November that a Manhattan-based art broker had attempted to sell one of the Picasso drawings to auction houses. The agents found that the broker had gotten the drawing from Ms. Lellouch, and subsequently retrieved both Picassos from her.

DOI investigators ascertained that Ms. Lellouch's adult daughter is married to Mr. Kohen. The office of the New York County district attorney, which is prosecuting the case, did not respond to the Sun by press time.

Mr. Stair said Kingsland definitely had a good eye. "He knew how to pick quality works, however he picked them."

Author Barnaby Conrad, who said Kingsland acted slightly annoyed that the 20th century had ever happened, said he was a bit surprised Kingsland had 20th-century art at all. "I sort of thought he would have stopped at the Luminists," 19th-century landscape painters, he said.

Picassos' Theft Contributes To Mystery Of Eccentric Collector's Art Trove (NYT)

By Thomas J. Lueck

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

When the colorful Manhattan gadfly known as William M. V. Kingsland died in March, leaving an unexpected trove of important art in his Upper East Side apartment, a mystifying art world caper began to unfold.

Much of the artwork, it turned out, was stolen.

In the latest twist, the authorities said yesterday that a moving contractor from Queens whom public officials had hired to help clean out that apartment had been charged with making off with two precious works: drawings by Pablo Picasso. The mover's mother-in-law has also been charged.

DOJ_NMG_0115778

"Not only are these defendants charged with stealing from their own customers, but from the dead," said Rose Gill Hearn, the chief of the city's Department of Investigation, which announced the arrests yesterday of Nahum Kohen, the mover, and Ori Lellouch, his mother-in-law.

Ms. Gill Hearn said the arrests were made after her office was told by the Office of the Public Administrator for Manhattan and the F.B.I. that the Picasso drawings were missing, and that one was being offered for sale to several auction houses. The drawings, worth an estimated $60,000, were not thought to have been in Mr. Kingsland's possession illegally.

Mr. Kohen, 38, of Fresh Meadows, was charged with taking the drawings, each about 12 inches square, of a guitar and of a mandolin. He will face up to 15 years in prison if convicted, the authorities said.

Ms. Lellouch, 56, of Kew Gardens Hills, who investigators said had tried to sell one of the drawings through a broker, is charged with possession of stolen property and could face one year in prison.

A lawyer for Mr. Kohen, Roger L. Stavis, said: "My client is absolutely innocent. There is no evidence against him whatsoever, and we hope that this grave injustice will be rectified immediately."

The authorities said they did not know who was representing Ms. Lellouch.

Although their lives seemed far removed from each other, the stories of the recently deceased and the newly arrested are bound in a web of intrigue.

Mr. Kingsland, who died without a will, had lived a life shrouded in mystery. His real name, unbeknownst to many of his Upper East Side acquaintances, was Melvyn Kohn. His age was unclear; he was perhaps 58 or 62.

Mr. Kohn was an occasional art dealer who seemed to have boundless knowledge of the buildings in his neighborhood and their residents, and he cultivated an aura of someone rooted in Upper East Side aristocracy. But he was a recluse who lived alone and welcomed few people into his unkempt, dusty one-bedroom apartment.

After Mr. Kohn died, the contents of that apartment came as a shock to those who thought they knew him. Among the trove of art, besides the two Picasso drawings, were works by Giacometti, John Singleton Copley, Odilon Redon, Kurt Schwitters and others.

The apartment was "chockablock with interesting treasures," said Colin Stair of the Stair Galleries in Hudson, N.Y., who was hired by the public administrator to sell some of the lesser works in the apartment, including many watercolor-on-ivory miniature portraits.

As it turned out, according to the F.B.I., many of the most important works had been stolen, although how Mr. Kohn obtained them remains unclear.

Ms. Gill Hearn said yesterday that the public administrator had hired a consulting firm to examine the collection and to help sell the most valuable items. The consultants photographed the two Picassos, which later disappeared.

When the public administrator informed Ms. Gill Hearn's investigators that the drawings could not be found, they compiled a list of everyone who had entered the apartment on East 72nd Street after the consultants took their photographs.

Mr. Kohen's name was on the list. Meanwhile, according to Ms. Gill Hearn, the F.B.I., which was investigating reports that other works in Mr. Kohn's apartment had previously been stolen, was tipped off that a Manhattan broker was trying to sell one of the missing Picassos, and that he had obtained the drawing from Ms. Lellouch.

The broker, whose identity was not disclosed, is not being charged and did not know that the drawing presented by Ms. Lellouch was stolen, said an official directly involved in the case who insisted on anonymity because the case remains under investigation.

"Stealing on the job is not a fringe benefit," Ms. Gill Hearn said in announcing the arrests yesterday. "Most realize that it could lead to jail and a criminal record."

3 Detained In Tenn. Couple's Killing (AP)

AP, January 12, 2007

KNOXVILLE, Tenn. - Three men were detained by police Thursday in the killing of a young man whose burned corpse was found dumped along railroad tracks and the slaying of his date, who was kept alive for days and raped, authorities said.

DOJ_NMG_0115779

Channon Christian, a 21-year-old University of Tennessee student, and Christopher Newsom, 23, may have been carjacked Saturday night, Chief Deputy U.S. Marshal Rich Knighten said.

Newsom had been shot to death, and his burned body was found Sunday, Knighten said.

Christian's kidnappers raped and assaulted her for days before killing her and dumping the body, Knighten said.

Authorities detained Letalvis Cobbins, 24, and his friend, George Thomas, after federal agents and Knox County officers raided a house 180 miles north in Lebanon, Ky.

Thomas was being questioned Thursday, while Cobbins faced federal charges of being a felon in possession of a weapon, Knighten said.

Cobbins was a "person of interest" in the deaths and he had a gun authorities believe may have been used in the crime, Knighten said.

Cobbins' brother, Lemaricus Davidson, 25, also was detained Thursday as a person of interest, Knoxville police spokesman Darrell DeBusk said.

Christian's body was found Tuesday in a house rented by Davidson, authorities said.

It wasn't immediately clear whether the three men had lawyers. A message left late Thursday with the Marshals Service office wasn't immediately returned.

Porn Studios Raided To Ensure Adult-only Casts (LAT)

By Claire Hoffman, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2007

The FBI seeks records to make sure minors haven't been hired. The industry and public policy experts question the probes' effectiveness.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation has recently stepped up raids of porn studios in the San Fernando Valley, saying it wants to ensure that children are not being sexually exploited.

About a dozen porn production facilities in pornography hot spots such as Van Nuys and Chatsworth have been taken by surprise in the last three months by a barrage of federal agents at their doors.

The probes come on the heels of a May 2005 change in the regulations that require producers to take two forms of government-issued identification from performers and keep them on file indefinitely. Those records must be referred to on the labels of all videos and DVDs sold. Violations are federal felonies and can carry a prison sentence.

The Justice Department has prosecuted only one company to date under the new law, said Bryan Sierra, a spokesman for the department. In September, the founder of the "Girls Gone Wild" video empire, Joe Francis, pleaded guilty to two felonies, and his production company pleaded guilty to 10 additional felony counts.

Industry leaders doubt that the FBI will find many other violators. Jeffrey J. Douglas, a criminal defense attorney and the chairman of the Free Speech Coalition, an industry trade organization, estimates that there have been only about a dozen occurrences of minors working in the industry in the last 25 years.

Public policy experts wonder whether the raids are the best use of taxpayer money. "The FBI has limited what they investigate since 9/11, so moving into this area does raise the question of resources," said Athan G. Theoharis, a professor emeritus of history at Marquette University who has written extensively on the FBI. "Is this at the expense of investigating the Enrons or the WorldComs that have far more effect on the lives of American citizens?"

Theoharis said the crackdown on pornography hearkened back to the bureau's early days, when J. Edgar Hoover boosted the FBI's reputation with a high-profile campaign of prosecution against pornographers and prostitutes.

"It was sort of a PR move at the time to burnish their image and it reflected American sensitivities," he said.

The current crackdown may not unearth the biggest violators, according to industry executives. The worst offenders of child pornography, they say, are not the well-established producers the FBI has targeted but the underground, fly-by-night operations that by all accounts escape examination.

"Why would I jeopardize $10 million a year to shoot an underage girl?" said Kevin Beechum, owner of K-Beech Inc., a longtime producer and distributor of X-rated movies based in Chatsworth that was raided in December. "We're not stupid."

DOJ_NMG_0115780

Early one morning, computers in hand, the agents knocked on K-Beech's door, demanding to see government-issued identification certifying that the performers in 10 sexually explicit films dating to 1995 were not minors. The company was found to be in compliance.

The FBI would not comment on the scope of its probe or the facilities it has visited. But the agency takes issue with questions about the effectiveness of the raids.

"If their feeling is there's nothing to worry about, then complying with the inspections shouldn't be a problem," Sierra said.

He said to his knowledge the inspections had taken place only in California. He would not elaborate on whether any inspections had led to criminal investigations.

He said those instances had all been the result of fraud — fake identification presented by performers with the intention of deceiving producers.

"If you were so incredibly crazy to film a minor, you surely would not get a copy of their junior high school ID," Douglas said.

Although the public perception of porn producers often tends to be that of a wild and unseemly underworld, many of the Valley's X-rated entities are tightly run multimillion-dollar companies. Douglas said that complying with the rules had buried X-rated producers in paperwork. He said one of his clients employed a staff of eight who worked full time to maintain and organize federally required records.

The surprise visits from federal agents began in earnest after an October meeting between the FBI and the Free Speech Coalition, along with representatives from six of the Valley's largest porn companies — including mega-producers Vivid Entertainment, Larry Flynt Publications and Digital Playground, along with three porn industry lawyers, according to a person who was there who asked not to be named because the meeting was confidential.

The agents gave a slick presentation on what to expect, warning the producers that they would be visiting facilities at random, with a minimum of five agents, the person said. They were told that the inspectors would be equipped with images assembled by a group of agents who were reviewing tapes pulled from adult book and video stores, culling material in search of performers with a suspiciously youthful glow.

Steven Hirsch, founder of Vivid Entertainment, the world's largest adult entertainment company, said that large porn purveyors such as his had been militant about record keeping and age verification for years, dating to the scandal surrounding Traci Lords, a 15-year-old girl who lied about her age during the 1980s, shot dozens of porn films and rose to become a celebrated porn star before she turned 18.

After word of her real age leaked out, federal authorities cracked down on the industry and prosecuted production companies and others involved in her career — all of which denied any knowledge of her deception. Hirsch said the scandal cost the industry millions and put the fear in producers throughout the Valley.

"The FBI is being decent and fair about it," Hirsch said. "But I don't think it's an issue. There's plenty of girls of age who are willing to do this."

*

claire.hoffman@latimes.com

False Property Appraisals Get Man 30 Months In Prison (PPG)

By Paula Reed Ward, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, January 12, 2007

A man who used his dead father's state license to do real estate appraisals that were sometimes inflated by more than 80 percent was sentenced yesterday to 30 months in prison.

The prosecutor in the case had asked Senior U.S. District Judge Alan N. Bloch to give Chester Underhill, 47, of Upper St. Clair, a stiffer penalty, claiming that the potential for loss in the case ranged into the tens of millions of dollars.

"Clearly, the incremental exposure to the financial institutions is enormous," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Brendan Conway. "The sentence ought to reflect the entire iceberg, and not just the tip."

But because the government only did thorough reviews of about 15 of the approximately 1,500 appraisals Mr. Underhill performed, the judge refused to grant the enhancement.

DOJ_NMG_0115781

"It's your burden to prove the loss," Judge Bloch said.

Mr. Conway estimated that it would have taken the FBI agent on the case two full years to review all the files.

"I didn't say it would be easy, but that's your burden," the judge responded.

Though the judge deferred the hearing on restitution until March, he said it appeared to be $562,696.75 -- a number Mr. Conway disputed.

He hoped to set the loss between $1 million and $2.5 million.

Mr. Underhill was initially indicted on six counts of mail fraud. He pleaded guilty to just one charge in July.

Defense attorney James J. Brink asked the judge to sentence Mr. Underhill to home confinement or a halfway house instead of prison.

"He's lost everything," he said. "He now lives with his mother."

Mr. Brink also claimed that Mr. Underhill is under psychological stress because of the criminal case.

Judge Bloch was in no mood for the sad story.

When Mr. Underhill's sister began her statement to the judge with: "Chester's a good man," Judge Bloch immediately cut her off.

"He's not such a good man, or he wouldn't have done what he did," he said.

Later, when Mr. Underhill spoke about the 3-year-old son he is raising, the judge again interrupted.

"You should have thought about your child before you did what you did," he said.

The recommended sentencing range for Mr. Underhill was 24 to 30 months in prison.

Mr. Conway called for a sentence of 37 to 46 months.

"People like Mr. Underhill have made it difficult for legitimate appraisers to do their job," he said.

Mr. Brink argued that his client didn't make any money from the appraisals -- though he was paid $300 each.

"Other people profited from the wrongdoings of Mr. Underhill," he said. "The people that made the money here aren't before the court."

Man Gets 30 Months For Bogus Appraisals (PTR)

By Jason Cato, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, January 12, 2007

An Upper St. Clair man was sentenced to 30 months in federal prison for using his dead father's real estate appraisal license to perform inflated appraisals for three years.

Chester Underhill, 47, pleaded guilty in July to one count of mail fraud, related to sending the fraudulent appraisals through the U.S. Postal Service.

Prosecutors claim Underhill conducted more than 1,000 fraudulent appraisals from 2000 to 2003, many of them inflated by as much as 80 percent.

"Every single reappraisal he'd done turned out to be significantly inflated," FBI Special Agent Joseph Bieshelt testified.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Brendan Conway estimated that financial institutions could lose as much as $85 million because of Underhill's fraudulent appraisals. Banks lend money for home purchases based on appraisals, and lend more money than necessary when properties are over-appraised. Lenders stand to lose money if those properties go into foreclosure.

Conway hoped to convince Senior U.S. District Judge Alan N. Bloch that the potential loss faced by lenders was at least $1 million to $2.5 million, which would have increased the sentence to as much as 48 months in prison.

Bloch did not agree with the government's figure.

"That might be so if the government had proof of the loss," Bloch said, before determining the loss was about $560,000.

Defense attorney James J. Brink lobbied the judge for house arrest or time in a halfway house, so Underhill could help care for his 3-year-old son and his elderly mother.

"Mr. Underhill got none of that money," Brink said of the inflated appraisals he conducted for $300 each.

"He did profit by it," the judge retorted. "He provided a service he was not legally allowed to provide, and he got paid for it."

Bloch will determine the amount of restitution Underhill owes in March.

Jason Cato can be reached at jcato@tribweb.com or 412-320-7840.

Pa. Man Sentenced To Prison For Fraudulent Property Appraisals (TLPA)

Times Leader (NE PA), January 12, 2007

PITTSBURGH - A man was sentenced Thursday to 2 1/2 years in a federal prison for working as an unlicensed real estate appraiser.

Senior U.S. District Judge Alan Bloch also sentenced Chester Underhill, 47, of McDonald, to three years' probation. Underhill pleaded guilty in July to one count of mail fraud.

Prosecutors accused Underhill of using his late father's license number to perform more than 1,000 appraisals for five years at the request of mortgage brokers.

Lenders relied on these appraisals in lending money, prosecutors said.

Investigators confiscated 30 boxes containing about 50 appraisals each from Underhill's home and business, FBI Special Agent Joseph Bieshelt testified Thursday.

He said Underhill "significantly overappraised" properties.

The court had calculated the loss at $562,000, but prosecutor Brendan Conway said the losses were between $1 million and $2.5 million.

Investigators had not contacted every single financial institution involved in the case to see if any properties had foreclosed because that would take too long, Conway said.

"I didn't say it would be easy, but that's your burden," Bloch said. "I'm not going to depart (from the sentencing guidelines) that there might be losses in the future."

Brink and Underhill's mother and sister urged Bloch to sentence Underhill to house arrest and probation.

"Mr. Underhill got none of that money," Brink said. "Other people profited from the wrongdoings of Mr. Underhill."

Underhill was paid $300 per appraisal, Brink said.

Brink also said Underhill was trying to gain custody of his 3-year-old son and living with his mother.

"He's lost everything," Brink said. "At this point, he has no prospects of doing property appraisals. He's done."

"Well, he shouldn't be doing appraisals," Bloch replied.

A hearing to determine restitution was scheduled for March 29.

Jury Hears Kopp Saying He Killed Slepian (BUFFNEWS)

By Michael Beebe, News Staff Reporter

Buffalo News, January 11, 2007

A day after they heard James C. Kopp apologize to the widow of the man he is accused of killing, federal court jurors heard Kopp's own words Wednesday that he shot Dr. Barnett A. Slepian.

Philip Sterlace, a stenographer in U.S. District Court, read back selected portions of a statement that Kopp made after his March 19, 2003, conviction in Erie County Court for the murder of Slepian.

" "On Oct. 23, judge, in 1998 late at night, I shot Dr. Slepian,' " Sterlace read aloud from the transcript of Kopp's statement.

The jury was not told why Kopp was addressing a judge in that statement, just as they were not told that Kopp was earlier convicted of murder.

Sterlace's testimony, combined with today's subpoenaed testimony of Buffalo News reporter Dan Herbeck, who will be asked about Kopp's more detailed November 2002 confession to The News, should remove any mystery in jurors' minds about whether Kopp shot Slepian.

"The only issue left is why he did what he did," Kopp's standby counsel, John F. Humann, said outside the courtroom Wednesday.

Once Sterlace finished his direct testimony, Kopp, representing himself, tried to show why he shot Slepian.

But as Kopp asked Sterlace during cross-examination to read parts of his County Court statement in which Kopp said he was trying to protect the unborn from abortion, Assistant U.S. Attorney Kathleen M. Mehltretter objected.

DOJ_NMG_0115783

Judge Richard J. Arcara, who earlier had ruled that part of Kopp's statement inadmissible, told Kopp to move on to another subject.

Finally, after Kopp's third attempt to have Sterlace read the prohibited testimony, and the third sustained objection from the prosecution, Arcara excused the jury from the courtroom.

Rather than scolding Kopp for repeatedly going where he had been told not to, Arcara told Kopp to put on the record what he what was trying to do.

"I object. There is no context to the statement," Kopp said of the prosecution's reading selected portions. "This case is about intent. Everything I've done is to protect the life of a child."

As Kopp continued to thumb through the statement and pick out other things he wanted to say, Arcara reminded him that what he was saying was irrelevant.

"Irrelevant?" a slight, bearded man dressed in a suit and running shoes shouted out from the courtroom audience, two rows behind the Slepian family.

"Judge, what are they irrelevant to?" the man shouted as marshals escorted him out of the courtroom and the federal courthouse.

Anti-abortion supporters of Kopp, who are attending the trial, said they did not know the man.

Kopp, already sentenced to 25 years to life in prison on the state murder conviction, faces a life sentence if convicted of the federal charges: interfering with reproductive services and using a firearm to commit a crime of violence.

The trial, once expected to last three weeks, is moving much more quickly, mainly because Kopp rarely questions a witness and has not objected to the introduction of any of the physical evidence collected against him.

At times, Kopp tries to make the prosecution's job easier.

He simply stood at the defense table as retired Amherst police Detective Lt. Donald Wright testified Wednesday about the search of the woods behind Slepian's home April 8, 1999, a search that led to the discovery of the murder weapon, a Soviet-made SKS assault rifle.

"I will concede they found a gun in the hole, if that would help anything," Kopp told Arcara.

Mehltretter, just as she did when Kopp agreed earlier to stipulate to the testimony of Lynne Slepian about her husband's death, declined the stipulation and continued questioning Wright.

Amherst detectives, FBI agents and Erie County ballistics experts are being called to testify about three key areas in the rear of what was then the Slepians' home in East Amherst.

They testified about finding what they've termed the "hat hole" - a shallow trench containing a green baseball hat, a pair of binoculars, an empty rifle cartridge box, earplugs, a flashlight, a wristwatch and other items tied to Kopp - and the gun hole, containing the SKS rifle.

They used laser sighting devices to find the tree where Kopp said he stood and fired the single shot that killed Slepian.

Wright, the retired detective, said that after the "hat hole" was found in the aftermath of the Slepian shooting, a team of 15 to 20 officers returned to the woods in spring, after the winter snows had melted.

Using metal detectors, police discovered another trench containing the assault rifle inside a cardboard box, Wright said.

In Kopp's County Court statement, he described at length how he designed a vinyl holster for the weapon, so he could leave it there in between the evenings he was scouting the Slepian home from the woods.

"It was not just to avoid frightening people," he said about not wanting to walk through the Slepian neighborhood with the rifle. "It was to avoid getting caught."

Mob Figure Sentenced To Five Years In Prison For Extortion (PROJO)

By W. Zachary Malinowski, Journal Staff Writer

The Providence Journal, January 12, 2007

PROVIDENCE — Anthony M. “The Saint” St. Laurent Sr., an ailing capo regime in the Patriarca crime family, was sentenced to nearly five years in federal prison yesterday for conspiring to extort $100,000 from two Massachusetts men.

DOJ_NMG_0115784

U.S. District Judge William E. Smith said that he was sympathetic to the mobster's medical woes, but he was clearly disturbed that he has 17 convictions and a criminal history dating to 1961.

Smith said that St. Laurent's life of crime trumped his failing health. "The problem is, nothing seems to get through to you that you have to stop doing this type of thing," he said. "You intend to keep doing what you have been doing for as long as you live."

St. Laurent, 65, who was brought to court handcuffed and in a wheelchair, addressed the court before the sentence was imposed. In a rambling address that lasted about 10 minutes, St. Laurent railed against the poor health care he has received in the federal prison system. He said he spent six days in a hospital intensive care unit after officials at the federal prison in Fort Devens, Mass., failed to take care of a kidney stone. Another time, he said, he had excruciating stomach pain for years, but prison officials refused to do anything. St. Laurent, who at one time took as many as 40 enemas a day, said, that upon his release from prison, a Rhode Island doctor performed bowel surgery and "took cement out of my rectum."

"It's not right," St. Laurent said. "They don't take care of you. I've been there your honor, I know."

At one point, St. Laurent's lawyer, John F. Cicilline, wanted his client to finish up. He leaned over to St. Laurent and said, "I'm the lawyer. You're the gangster."

St. Laurent, of 2 Rotary Drive in Johnston, pleaded guilty in July to the extortion conspiracy charge. Federal prosecutors said that had the case gone to trial, the government could prove that in April 2006, St. Laurent directed Ricky Silva, of North Providence, and James Manning, of Cranston, to collect $100,000 from a pizza parlor owner and a bookmaker/drug dealer. And, if they did not pay, they were instructed to "bash" the victims.

On April 6, Silva, Manning and an unnamed FBI informant traveled to Massachusetts to search for the intended victims. Once there, they teamed up with Lawrence Crites, of Taunton, Mass., who was supposed to help them find the extortion targets.

The informant wore a hidden microphone and recorded conversations involving St. Laurent, Silva, Manning and Crites.

The FBI, Rhode Island State Police and Providence police arrested St. Laurent the next day.

Silva, Manning and Crites were charged with extortion last week.

In seeking a lesser sentence yesterday, Cicilline told the court that St. Laurent's "illness is extraordinary." He also said that in April 2001, St. Laurent may have saved the life of a corrections officer. At the time, St. Laurent was serving another federal prison sentence for extortion when two inmates were engaged in a fight with weapons in a room at the prison. Cicilline said that St. Laurent stopped a female guard from entering the room — possibly saving her from a fatal encounter or serious injury.

"She could have been one dead correctional officer," Cicilline said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney James H. Leavey said that St. Laurent's actions were "laudable … but it is not grounds," for a lesser sentence.

In the spectator section of the courtroom, St. Laurent's daughter sobbed uncontrollably. She sat next to her mother, Dot, and in front of her brother, Anthony M. St. Laurent Jr., also a convicted felon.

Ex-Cleveland Clinic Employee Pleads Guity To Stealing Patient Information (NAPLESDN)

By Liz Freeman

Naples Daily News, January 12, 2007

Naples co-defendant set for trial later this month

One of two people charged with stealing the personal and medical information of 1,130 patients at Cleveland Clinic Naples pleaded guilty Thursday and will be sentenced April 27, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Miami.

Isis Machado, 23, of Miami Lakes, entered the guilty plea before U.S. District Court Judge James Cohn in Fort Lauderdale on one count of conspiracy to commit computer fraud, identify theft and wrongful disclosure of individual health information. She faces a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine and could be ordered to pay restitution, according to federal authorities.

A second defendant, Naples resident Fernando Ferrer Jr., 29, a registered owner of Advanced Medical Claims in Naples, is scheduled to stand trial Jan. 22 before Cohn in Fort Lauderdale.

Machado and Ferrer were indicted in September on a charge of conspiracy to commit health-care fraud and faced five more counts of aggravated identify theft, potentially carrying a maximum of 25 years in prison and $500,000 in fines.

DOJ_NMG_0115785

Ferrer and Machado became the first individuals in South Florida to be prosecuted for violating the federal law protecting patients' privacy rights. Federal prosecutors filed a motion in October to protect evidence, four computer disks that contain personal and patient information, as confidential in the event the case goes to trial.

Machado was a front desk office coordinator at Cleveland Clinic in Weston from May 23, 2005, to June 26, 2006, and had authorized access to the hospital's computerized patient files. She copied Medicare numbers and personal information of 1,130 Naples patients and sold the information to Ferrer, her cousin, for $5 to $10 for each patient's information, according to federal authorities.

Ferrer used the Medicare numbers to bill medical providers in Miami for services that were not rendered, resulting in $7 million fraudulently billed to Medicare, federal investigators say.

According to Cleveland Clinic officials, a co-worker learned of what Machado was doing on June 26, 2006, and told supervisors. Hospital officials reported the events to federal authorities. Machado was fired.

Cleveland Clinic Naples was sold to Naples-based Health Management Associates effective May 1, 2006. The indictment said HMA used the same computer system for a time and so Machado had access to the Naples information after the hospital was renamed Physicians Regional Medical Center. HMA officials said they changed the computer system and that Machado did not have access to patient information after the ownership change.

Following the indictment, Cleveland Clinic officials in Cleveland, Ohio, wrote the 1,130 Naples patients informing them of what happened and established a toll-free number for help with credit monitoring. Within days, more than 500 patients called.

A total of 831 calls from Naples patients were logged, said Eileen Sheil, spokeswoman for Cleveland Clinic in Ohio. The theft of patient information seems to have focused on false billings to Medicare and not on selling Social Security numbers or other personal information, Sheil said.

"So far it's been solely a Medicare billing issue, and some of the patients' secondary insurers were billed," Sheil said.

Hospital Receptionist Pleads Guilty To Fraud Charges (MH)

By John Dorschner

The Miami Herald, January 12, 2007

Isis Machado, a front desk receptionist at the Cleveland Clinic in Weston pleaded guilty today to conspiracy to commit computer fraud, conspiracy to commit identity theft and conspiracy to wrongfully disclose patients' health information.

Machado had been accused of improperly obtaining Medicare information about Cleveland Clinic patients in Naples, and selling that information to her cousin, co-defendant Fernando Ferrer of Naples for $5 to $10 each. Machado improperly obtained the patient information of approximately 1,130 patients, prosecutors charged.

The investigation revealed that many of the Medicare numbers that Machado obtained were later used by providers to fraudulently bill Medicare for $7 million in services not rendered and equipment not supplied.

For more information, go to the Miami Herald healthcare fraud blog.

Apartment Is A Real Steal (NYDN)

By Jordan Lite, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, January 12, 2007

The phone calls kept coming, all from people interested in renting her upper West Side apartment.

The only problem: Beth Ann Bovino wasn't renting it out.

She discovered that someone pretending to be her had placed a real-estate ad on Craigslist using her name, address and even an accurate picture of her brownstone.

The too-good-to-be true ad asked for $1,500 for the one bedroom with a fireplace - utilities included.

So the real Beth Ann Bovino responded to the ad, hoping to put an end to the sham.

"I probably should have gone straight to the cops but I thought I would be Nancy Drew," said Bovino, 41, an economist at Standard & Poor's. "That didn't quite work out."

Communicating via e-mail, Bovino was told she could get the keys as soon as she fronted the first month's rent.

DOJ_NMG_0115786

When she asked to speak to "Beth," she got a written reply: "I would love to speak with you by phone but I can't because I'm a deaf-mute person and I am teaching in CA for a deaf-mute school."

She alerted Craigslist to the fraudulent ad, and it was taken down. But each time the posting was removed, a new one, slightly reworded, would go back up.

"After they started stopping by my apartment, I got more nervous - this isn't a joke anymore," Bovino said.

She ultimately reported the scam to the FBI's Internet Crime Complaint Center, a clearinghouse for the rising number of Internet fraud complaints.

In 2005, the center received 231,493 complaints, up 11.6% from the year before.

The center hasn't cracked Bovino's case yet, said FBI spokesman Paul Bresson, but he added that Bovino wasn't a bad amateur detective.

Before the scammer stole her identity, Bovino had put her apartment up for sale. She correctly suspected that the con artist exploited that real ad to create the fake rental classified. It's an example of Net scammers' growing sophistication, Bresson said.

"They saw it as an opportunity to perpetrate a crime using real information as opposed to fabricated information, and the real information helps legitimize their crime," he said.

In the meantime, Bovino has gotten 30 calls and unexpected visits from eager New Yorkers hoping to land her apartment.

A spokeswoman for Craigslist founder Craig Newmark didn't respond to requests for comment. But at a meeting in New York earlier yesterday, Newmark said he's working with government officials "to help go after the bad guys."

Bovino is still hearing from people interested in the apartment, even though she's since sold it. And like a true New Yorker, she's wondering whether she got the best possible deal: The scammer is "renting" her old place again.

"They're having bargainbasement sales. Last week, I think it was $1,000. That's why I thought, 'Why don't I apply?'" she joked.

With Michael Saul

Former Ark. Trooper Sentenced On Child Porn Charges (AP)

AP, January 12, 2007

BENTONVILLE, Ark. - A retired Arkansas State Police trooper has pleaded guilty in Bentonville to child porn charges and was sentenced to five years in prison.

Joe Hutchens, 60, of Bella Vista, who is also a former bailiff, must additionally register as a sex offender.

Hutchens told Circuit Judge Tom Keith on Wednesday that he felt "humbled, embarrassed and ashamed."

Hutchens retired in May 2004 after working 28 years as a state trooper. Most recently, Hutchens was the bailiff for Circuit Judge David Clinger in Benton County.

Hutchens was caught by an FBI unit that targeted crimes against children.

"I apologize to this court, Division Two court, and the men and women in law enforcement that I served with for over 35 years," said Hutchens, who was a bailiff in Division Two.

His wife and two daughters were present for Wednesday's sentencing.

While working for Circuit Judge David Clinger, Hutchens used an Internet profile, "dadsluv2002," and listed his favorite quote as "Everything I enjoy is illegal, immoral or fattening," authorities said.

Investigators seized a county-owned computer from Hutchens' office as well as his home computer. They found more than 100 sexually explicit photos involving children, most prepubescent. He was arrested Sept. 7, 2005, and was free on a $10,000 bond. He is free on his own recognizance pending space opening for him in the state prison system, by Keith's order.

Hutchens will first be eligible for parole after 10 months.

Keith said he believes Hutchens can change his behavior.

"I know this is an aberration. I am satisfied he will again be the man we always knew him to be," Keith said.

Man Pleads Guilty To Assaulting Girl He Met On MySpace.com (AP)

AP, January 12, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115787

BRIDGEPORT, Conn. -- A Pennsylvania man pleaded guilty Thursday to traveling across state lines to have sexual contact with a 14-year-old Connecticut girl he met through the social networking site MySpace.com.

Stephen M. Letavec, 40, of Elrama, Pa., was charged last year in one of the first federal sex cases involving the popular site.

Letavec, a volunteer firefighter, was accused of molesting an Oxford girl in his car. The FBI said Letavec made several visits to see the girl from the summer of 2005 and early last year.

"I showed you what love is and how it feels," Letavec wrote in an e-mail found in the girl's school locker, according to an FBI report. "I want to show you how making love feels too, not just sex because there is a difference."

The girl signed onto MySpace as an 18-year-old, but told Letavec she was 14 before he visited, the FBI said.

He pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in Bridgeport to one count of using the Internet to persuade a minor to engage in sexual activity and one count of traveling in interstate commerce for the purpose of attempting to have and having illicit sexual conduct with a minor.

U.S. District Judge Stefan R. Underhill scheduled sentencing for April 9. Letavec faces a mandatory minimum term of imprisonment of five years, a maximum term of 60 years and a fine of up to $500,000, U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor said.

MySpace, a division of NewsCorp., offers a free way for users to meet any of more than 60 million members. The site prohibits minors 13 and under from joining, discourages users from posting personal information and provides special protections for those 14 and 15.

While Internet safety advocates have said the site has a good reputation for working to prevent illegal activity, they say children often lie about their age to get around those restrictions. Many profiles include suggestive photographs and lots of personal information.

MySpace.com was planning new restrictions on how adults may contact its younger users in response to growing concerns about the safety of teenagers who frequent the site.

Ex-Prosecutor Is Accused Of Running Escort Service (LAW)

By Daniel Wise, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, January 12, 2007

A criminal defense lawyer who worked as a federal and state prosecutor in New Jersey has been indicted for running a Manhattan-based escort service, Manhattan District Attorney Robert M. Morgenthau announced Wednesday.

The lawyer, Paul Bergrin, who has defended soldiers charged with committing abuses while in Iraq, was arraigned Wednesday on a fugitive warrant in Newark, N.J., and bail was set at $500,000.

No plea to the charges was entered, but Bergrin, 51, declined to waive extradition at the proceeding. John Tiffany, who represented Bergrin, said he expected his client to voluntarily surrender and contest the charges in New York.

Tiffany, a solo practitioner in Newark, N.J., said he had not seen the indictment and could not comment on the substance of the charges. But he described Bergrin, with whom he had handled many cases, as "about as stand-up a guy as you could get."

Also named in a pair of indictments involving the NY Confidential escort agency were James Cortopassi, who had worked as a law clerk at Bergrin's four-lawyer criminal defense firm in Newark, and Hiram Ortiz, a former New Jersey state trooper. Bail for Ortiz was also set at $500,000.

Cortopassi, who is a second-year student at Michigan State Law School, is expected to surrender voluntarily, Morgenthau said at a press conference Wednesday.

If convicted of the top count in the two indictments, first-degree money laundering, Bergrin and Cortopassi would face a maximum sentence of 8 1/3 to 25 years in prison.

Only Bergrin and Cortopassi were accused of the most serious charges, having an ownership interest in NY Confidential.

The indictment accused them of involvement with the agency for six months in the latter part of 2004, a period during which prosecutors said the company took in $1.2 million worth of business.

But in January 2005, Jason Itzler, who had been the service's manager, was arrested. He subsequently pleaded guilty to money laundering and promoting prostitution, and was expected to be sentenced to 1 1/2 to 3 years during an appearance Thursday in Manhattan Supreme Court.

DOJ_NMG_0115788

A second indictment alleges that Bergrin, Cortopassi, Oritz and a former escort continued to operate the business for another three months, from Jan. 12, 2005, to March 2, 2005.

During that time, the agency charged $1,000 an hour for its escorts' time, but apparently did not fare well.

In January 2005, Bergrin filed incorporation papers for the service, listing himself as the person upon whom process could be served, but on March 2, 2005, he filed dissolution papers, prosecutors said.

Bergrin initially represented Itzler after his arrest. The indictment accuses Bergrin of falsely stating during Itzler's arraignment that Itzler had been working in his law office 12 to 14 hours a day for months.

ADDITIONAL CHARGES

Prosecutors also accuse Bergrin of misconduct as a lawyer for lying to the New Jersey Parole Board in an effort to relax restrictions on Itzler so he could manage the escort service at night.

Before Itzler was arrested in connection with the escort service, he had been on parole after pleading guilty to smuggling ecstasy into Newark Liberty International Airport. To get more lenient treatment, prosecutors said, Bergrin told the parole board that Itzler had worked for him as a paralegal in a case involving a soldier who was being prosecuted for his conduct at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq. Bergrin submitted false paychecks to substantiate the claim, according to prosecutors.

In addition to having a partial ownership interest in NY Confidential, Bergrin and his friends used the services of prostitutes working for the agency without paying for them. Instead, the costs were covered by the company, prosecutors said.

Bergrin has a law practice consisting of 300 to 500 clients, said his lawyer, Tiffany. He made four trips to Iraq to defend soldiers, Tiffany added.

Among his military clients were Sergeant Javal Davis, who was accused of committing abuses at Abu Ghraib, the case prosecutors said involved the false claim regarding Itzler to the New Jersey Parole Board. He also represents a soldier accused of criminally negligent homicide and dereliction of duty as a tank commander assigned to Mosul, Iraq.

He is also representing Private First Class Corey Claggett, who is accused with other soldiers of staging an escape of three unarmed detainees in Iraq and killing them as they supposedly fled.

According to his Web site, Bergrin was born in Brooklyn and graduated from Brooklyn College. He received his law degree from the Nova University Law School in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., and served two tours in the Army.

He worked in the office of the Essex County Prosecutor and the Office of the U.S. Attorney for the District of New Jersey. He was a partner at Pope, Bergrin & Verdesco from 1990 to 2005, when he established the Law Office of Paul W. Bergrin in Newark.

CIVIL LAW:

Jackson Psychiatrist Pays $216,000 To Settle Fraud Case (BSH)

Biloxi Sun Herald, January 12, 2007

JACKSON - A Jackson psychiatrist has agreed to pay $216,000 to settle allegations of Medicare and Medicaid fraud.

The U.S. Attorney's Office said Dr. Viacin Faeza Jones misused billing codes and billed Medicare and Medicaid for excessive numbers of patients. The Justice Department said Jones billed for treating up to 116 patients in a single day and was paid $30 to $125 for each claim.

"If a health care provider raids public funds through fraudulent or reckless Medicare billing practices, then he or she needs to be prepared to face the consequences," said U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton.

The $216,000 is repayment for the wrongfully obtained funds, plus penalties of more than $100,000.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

State To Appeal Chastang Ruling (MR)

By Dan Murtaugh, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), January 12, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115789

State officials said Wednesday they will appeal to the U.S. attorney general to keep Republican Juan Chastang on the Mobile County Commission.

Meanwhile, Democrats filed a motion Wednesday in federal court in Montgomery requesting Chastang's seat be declared vacant and a special election set to fill it.

The developments mean that Chastang will retain his seat for the time being after the U.S. Department of Justice on Monday decided that his appointment to the County Commission was legally unenforceable.

In November 2005, Republican Gov. Bob Riley appointed Chastang, who is black, to represent District 1, a majority-black district that has historically elected Democrats.

Chastang filled the vacancy that was created when Sam Jones was elected mayor of Mobile.

Shortly afterward, local Democrats sued to try to oust Chastang and fill the seat by a special election. A panel of federal judges in Montgomery ruled in August that the question was up to the Justice Department, which sided with the plaintiffs Monday.

On Wednesday, attorneys for the three local Democrats who sued -- state Reps. Yvonne Kennedy, James Buskey and Bill Clark -- filed a motion asking the judges to order Mobile County Probate Judge Don Davis to call a special election for Chastang's seat.

The motion states that Chastang would continue to serve until a replacement is elected.

A ruling on that motion might have to wait until the state appeals the Justice Department's ruling. Alabama Attorney General Troy King said Wednesday that he will appeal directly to the Justice Department's top official, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez.

"We think the attorney general is a reasonable man," King said "There's a reasonable likelihood he'll see the issue like we do."

Cecil Gardner, the attorney who filed the lawsuit on behalf of the Democrats, said he thinks the chances of the Justice Department's decision being overturned are "very slim."

The Justice Department objected to Chastang's nomination on the grounds that it violated the Voting Rights Act, under which several states, including Alabama, must get the Justice Department to pre-clear any changes in election procedures to protect minority voters.

In 1985, the Justice Department pre-cleared a state law that called for vacancies on the Mobile County Commission to be filled by special election.

The Alabama Supreme Court ruled that law unconstitutional in 1988, saying it conflicted with a general law calling for vacancies to be filled by gubernatorial appointment.

But the change back to gubernatorial appointments was never pre-cleared by the Justice Department.

King said he wants to meet with Gonzalez to argue that even though the 1985 law was the last one cleared by the Justice Department, the state could not have followed it because it was ruled unconstitutional.

"Justice has to give some deference to the state constitution and state law," King said.

He also pointed out that the ruling did not take into consideration that Chastang is black. "It's hard to understand how the appointment of a minority has a negative impact on minorities," he said.

King said Wednesday that he hopes to meet with Gonzalez alone. Plaintiffs attorneys will be able to respond after that meeting, Gardner said.

If King cannot persuade Gonzalez to change the department's decision, the state can still appeal to the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

Gardner said he will ask the federal judges in Montgomery to rule on his motion calling for a special election as soon as possible, perhaps even before the state's appeal process is finished.

If a special election is called, Chastang has said he will run for the seat.

Brad Warren, the chairman of the Mobile County Democratic Executive Committee, said no Democrats have told him they are interested in the seat but that he is actively searching for candidates. "That's a Democratic seat," he said. "It belongs to the Democrats, and we certainly plan on taking it back."

DOJ_NMG_0115790

Legislator Asks Probe Of Gunfire At House (BRADV)

Baton Rouge Advocate, January 12, 2007

GREENWOOD — State Rep. Roy Burrell, worried that other public officials may be the targets of violence, has asked State Police to help investigate the recent gunfire at the home of the town's first black mayor.

Burrell's request came one day after the president of the Louisiana State Conference of the NAACP asked the U.S. Justice Department to investigate the Greenwood shooting and an incident in Westlake.

Burrell, D-Shreveport, made the request of Col. Henry Whitehorn, the head of the State Police, in a letter this week. Two shots were fired at Mayor Ernest Lampkins' home Monday while he, his wife and daughter were sleeping. No one was hurt.

"I am deeply and gravely concerned about the incidents of violence which have recently occurred in our great state," Burrell wrote. He mentioned, as examples, the shooting of Lampkins' house and the "unusual circumstances" surrounding the death of the incoming mayor of Westlake, Gerald Washington.

Washington, who was to become the first black mayor of the predominantly white Westlake community, was found dead Dec. 30, with a gunshot wound to the chest.

His death was ruled a suicide, but family members have asked State Police to investigate further.

The Greenwood shooting wasn't the first incident targeted at Lampkins' house. In December, he found a "for sale" sign in his front yard.

Earlier this week, the Shreveport chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People asked the FBI to investigate the incident at Lampkins' home.

On Wednesday, NAACP State President Ernest L. Johnson asked the Justice Department to investigate incidents in Greenwood and Westlake.

Johnson said in a news release that he has been conferring with NAACP leaders from various parishes.

In making his request, Johnson said: "It appears that these incidents are on the rise either because of copy cat or some other reason. The more I think about these matters I am inclined to believe that these situations could be viewed as voter intimidation after the elections are over.

"From the telephone calls we have been receiving at the Louisiana State NAACP Office it is apparent that black voters are alarmed over these incidents.

"In other words, there are no incidents of this nature involving white mayors. African-American mayors and their families are voters and obviously are being intimidated. These incidents are very similar to the intimidation created by church burnings."

Johnson's news release also said that Bruce Gordon, president and CEO of the NAACP, is asking U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to expedite the requests.

Johnson also questioned why local governments have not set up reward funds for information leading to the arrests and conviction of the individuals involved.

D.C. Will Investigate Patient's Death (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

Man Restrained After Altercation

A senior adviser to the mayor said yesterday that the District is examining how a 39-year-old mental patient died after an altercation at the city-run St. Elizabeths Hospital.

Peter J. Nickles, the mayor's general counsel, said the psychiatric hospital's new chief, Patrick Canavan, is leading an investigation by hospital administrators into the events Tuesday afternoon.

The man became unresponsive after staff members tried to restrain him following a "dangerous altercation," according to a statement by the D.C. Department of Mental Health, which runs the Southeast Washington hospital. The statement said the man was pronounced dead at Greater Southeast Community Hospital after being brought by ambulance.

Mental health officials did not identify the man, citing privacy concerns.

The city will be open about the findings of its probe, Nickles said.

DOJ_NMG_0115791

"There's going to be complete transparency about this," said Nickles, who before joining the administration of new Mayor Adrian M. Fenty (D) spent much of his career suing the D.C. government for the failings of many of its human services agencies, including the city's metal health agency.

The Department of Mental Health has begun an investigation as well, led by its Office of Accountability, said a spokeswoman, Linda Grant, in the statement released hours after the man died.

Grant said yesterday that the department had little additional information to provide about the circumstances of the altercation. Nickles said the District will provide facts as investigators learn them but will not engage in speculation about the death.

Whatever happened, Nickles said, he is troubled by another death at a hospital with a record of poor care, inadequate staffing and lax management.

"These things happen, but they've happened too often at St. Elizabeths," Nickles said.

A civil rights investigation by the Justice Department found the quality of care and supervision at the hospital lacking, and in a report released last year, the department demanded that the city take significant steps to improve operations at St. Elizabeths. The investigation was prompted, in part, by the deaths of two patients attacked by other patients in 2004 and three patients whose care was compromised in 2005.

Lawyers from the legal services organization responsible for advocating on behalf of patients at St. Elizabeths have sued the District, claiming that many patients do not receive proper treatment and live in abysmal conditions.

Yesterday, after learning of the latest incident, lawyers from the organization went to St. Elizabeths to begin an inquiry.

Mary Nell Clark, managing director of University Legal Services, said she learned that the trouble occurred in what is known as the treatment mall, a common area where patients are bought for classes and other therapeutic activities.

The man who died was restrained facedown, Clark said. She contended that should not have happened. "Prone restraint is very dangerous, for obvious reasons," Clark said.

The D.C. medical examiner's office has been asked to conduct an autopsy, but the chief of staff for the office did not return a call seeking information about the results of the examination.

Clark said she did not know what led the staff to restrain the man. And what preceded that is fuzzy as well, she said. Some patients were arguing in the treatment mall shortly before the incident, she was told. But by the time of the altercation, the room was cleared of patients except for the one who died, Clark said.

LAPD Chief Would Open Meetings To Public (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2007

Los Angeles Police Chief William J. Bratton said today he would support changing the City Charter and state law to ensure that police disciplinary board meetings and some records are reopened to the public, complaining that he feels "muzzled" by current privacy law.

A day after his department came under criticism for holding a Board of Rights hearing in secret to clear the officer who fatally shot 13-year-old Devin Brown, the chief likened the process to a "star chamber" in which the public is deprived of information important to holding the police accountable.

On Tuesday, The Times revealed that an LAPD board had secretly cleared Officer Steven Garcia in the Brown case after the Police Commission had held the shooting to be out of policy.

"I am in support of change," Bratton said. "I am very frustrated by [the current process]. The public has no access to it. The media has no access to it. That's crazy, absolutely crazy. We have nothing to hide in the Los Angeles Police Department."

Although disciplinary hearings have historically been open in Los Angeles, police officials changed LAPD policy late last year in response to a state Supreme Court ruling that restricted access to law enforcement personnel records in a San Diego case.

Last year, the Police Commission also changed a decades-old policy and began issuing public reports without the names of officers involved in shootings. At that time, state Sen. Gloria Romero (D-Los Angeles) offered to sponsor legislation to ensure that names would not be struck from public police records if commission members had concerns about potential court restrictions.

DOJ_NMG_0115792

Bratton said that he plans to meet with Romero on Friday and offer his support for a change in state law. State lawmakers could amend the Police Officers Bill of Rights to loosen restrictions on records. At the same time, an amendment to the City Charter could expand the role of the civilian Police Commission in the process for disciplining officers, the chief said.

"The political leadership in this community needs to focus on meaningful change," Bratton said. "They have been spinning their wheels for 30 years out here. What they need to do is focus on charter change, state law change."

Bratton said the LAPD has a thorough and fair disciplinary process. "However, oftentimes it leads to great frustration, and particularly now with the craziness of us not being able to talk about, with any specificity, what went on, we effectively have a star chamber here in Los Angeles."

Speaking to reporters at the Federal Building in downtown Los Angeles after a news conference on human trafficking, Bratton said he is "frustrated" that the process is interfering with efforts to improve police-community relations.

"We are quite proud of the investigative capabilities of the department, and the more that we show those off, the better the public would have an understanding of what we do," he said. "I come from the East Coast, where by and large I could have a lot more freedom to talk about what we are doing. Out here I feel like I am running around with a muzzle on all the time."

Yet, Bratton expressed serious doubt about whether the laws could be changed. He said opening police disciplinary records would be an "uphill battle" because of the clout wielded by police unions in Sacramento and Los Angeles.

"I am not going to hold my breath waiting for the state Legislature to change the Police Bill of Rights in this state," the chief said. "It's not going to happen."

Indeed, police union officials have said that they would defend the current laws.

The Blue Fog (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2007

If lifting the LAPD's veil of secrecy means changing the City Charter and passing new state laws, then do it.

AN OPEN, accountable and trustworthy Los Angeles Police Department seems perpetually just around the corner. Reforms are instituted, promises and progress made, but with every positive step forward, the pull of secrecy keeps yanking the LAPD ceaselessly backward.

And so, after Rodney King, Rampart and now Devin Brown, we are here: Hearings on officer-involved shootings that once were open are now conducted in secret. Reports that used to name the cop who pulled the trigger now do not. And a community that was finally learning to trust the LAPD is now clouded with suspicion.

The Times reported Wednesday that an LAPD board secretly concluded that no punishment was due an officer who shot and killed the unarmed, 13-year-old Brown in 2005, despite a determination a year ago by the civilian Police Commission that the officer violated LAPD policy and should be disciplined. What was the basis of the reversal? It's a secret. All we know is that Police Chief William J. Bratton and the LAPD's union, the Police Protective League, agree the move was the right one. You just have to trust them.

On Wednesday, another LAPD officer shot and killed an unarmed man. Was the action warranted, was it a tragic mistake, or did the officer act unreasonably? Does the officer have a history of bad decisions? What exactly happened, and who was involved? Under rules in place until just over a year ago, we would probably find out, eventually. Under rules in place today, we may never get the answers. That in turn means we may never be able to determine whether we're getting the reformed LAPD we want.

It's the Police Commission itself that, despite its stated stance in favor of openness and accountability, decided to delete the names of officers from use-of-force reports, based on the city attorney's interpretation of a California Supreme Court privacy ruling. At the time, state Sen. Gloria Romero (D-Los Angeles) stood ready to introduce legislation to clarify privacy law and allow the publishing of those names. But Romero found little support among her colleagues, and the commission didn't ask her to follow through.

DOJ_NMG_0115793

Now Bratton has expressed frustration at the deleted names and closed proceedings, calling the board of rights hearings a "star chamber." He knows that no matter how perfectly his officers, his department and the various layers of review operate, the veil of secrecy opens them to suspicion and attack.

Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa also supports new efforts to restore openness, as do members of the Police Commission. So if everyone wants it, why don't we have it?

Romero should move forward with her legislation, but that's not enough. Bratton suggested that the Police Commission, already nominally in charge of the LAPD, could be further empowered to assure more openness in disciplinary proceedings. It's a good idea. Changing the City Charter is time-consuming and cumbersome. But if that's what it takes to reverse the LAPD's slide back into secrecy, it's worth it.

Duke Accuser Contradicts Herself (NYT)

By Duff Wilson

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

DURHAM, N.C., Jan. 11 — In an interview last month with a district attorney's investigator, the woman who has accused three Duke lacrosse players of sexual assault contradicted critical evidence and parts of her earlier accounts, dealing a new blow to a faltering case.

In her account, made public on Thursday in a motion by defense lawyers, the woman said two players attacked her in the bathroom at a team party in March. She also gave a new version of the timing and revised some of the men's descriptions.

The lawyers' motion said the latest account, from an interview on Dec. 21 with an investigator for District Attorney Michael B. Nifong, raised further questions about the credibility of the central witness in the case.

"The accuser's most recent recollection of events demonstrates clearly that she cannot accurately recall and describe her attackers and that any identification made by her is necessarily unreliable," the motion said.

Mr. Nifong is increasingly embattled. Last month, he dropped rape charges against the men after the accuser said she was no longer certain of some details of the incident.

The state bar has filed an ethics complaint against Mr. Nifong for what it said were prejudicial public statements. The executive committee of the North Carolina Conference of District Attorneys has called on him to drop out of the case. He has also been widely criticized for withholding exculpatory DNA evidence.

In the interview, the woman, 28, a stripper and the mother of three children, said she was attacked after she and another woman had danced at the party. She said the assault occurred between 11:40 p.m. and midnight on March 13.

That contradicts time-stamped photographs of her dancing at the party after midnight, as well as a next-door neighbor's report of seeing the two women entering the house at midnight.

Although the woman had told the authorities that all three men sexually assaulted her, she now said two had. The third, whom she identified as Reade Seligmann, was only present in the room, she said.

She also revised her statement at a photo lineup that another defendant, David Evans, looked just like an attacker "without the mustache." The statement was widely used to discount her identification because Mr. Evans has never had a mustache. The woman said in her new statement that she meant stubble or a 5 o'clock shadow.

The woman also said she could not be certain what had penetrated her. It was that statement of uncertainty that led Mr. Nifong to drop the rape charges on Dec. 22, a day after the investigator, Linwood E. Wilson, interviewed her. The defendants, who have strenuously denied the charges, continue to face charges of sexual offense and kidnapping, carrying equally serious penalties.

The five-page typed interview was released in a motion adding arguments to suppress the woman's identifications of defendants. The motion is scheduled for a hearing on Feb. 5 and could, if granted, end the case.

Mr. Nifong did not respond on Thursday to requests for comment.

The interview is the first time anyone from the prosecutor's office talked with the woman about the case. She has made five comprehensive statements, interviews with a sexual assault nurse and detectives, recorded remarks at the photo lineup with the police, a statement in her handwriting and the interview with Mr. Wilson. Each statement contradicts parts of the others.

DOJ_NMG_0115794

In the newest statement, the woman said she arrived at the house about 11:10 p.m., joining the other stripper and dancing briefly before they stopped when a man threatened them with a broomstick. She said that the two women retreated to a car, received apologies from three men, were enticed back inside and separated and that she was sexually assaulted starting about 11:40 p.m.

Defense lawyers have released time-stamped photos of the women dancing between midnight and 12:04 a.m. The prosecutor has questioned the stamps' authenticity.

The neighbor, Jason Bissey, gave the police a statement that he saw the accuser talking calmly with the second dancer in the yard outside the house shortly before midnight and then going inside, apparently for the first time. That version is consistent with the time-stamped photos.

"I'm absolutely certain," Mr. Bissey said in a telephone interview Thursday. "I had looked at my cellphone, and I was sure they had gone into the house at 12. I had assumed that's when they first got there. But I can't say for sure that was the first time they showed up. It seemed to me that it was."

The defense motion said the woman's cellphone records contradicted her version because she was speaking with someone at the time she now says the attack started. She was on the phone from 11:25 p.m. to 11:32 and 11:36 to 11:39.

The latest account leaves a gap of more than 50 minutes. The second dancer called 911 at 12:53 and reported that racial slurs had been shouted at them. She later told the police that she had made the call as they were driving from the party.

In previous statements, the accuser said three men calling themselves Adam, Matt and Brett had held her in a bathroom, raped and assaulted her. She had given different versions about what each had done, but had said three people attacked her.

The statement on Dec. 21 represented the first time that she said the same man, Mr. Evans, had used multiple names and that she did not remember any name being used for Collin Finnerty, the third defendant. Defense lawyers wrote, "In fact, nowhere was this said — or even hinted at — before Dec. 21, 2006."

The lawyers added, "In short, by claiming that any one of the defendants could be any or all of her attackers, the accuser has now created the equivalent of a 'do over' in an attempt to try to make sense of her prior conflicting statements."

Based on the earlier timeline, Mr. Seligmann had a strong alibi. Cellphone records, a time-stamped photo from an A.T.M. and a cabby's account showed that he was on the telephone or had left the party when the attack was said to have occurred.

The information on Thursday raised new doubts about his role. On April 4, when the woman identified Mr. Seligmann in a photo lineup, she said, "He was the one that was standing in front of me ... um ... that made me perform oral sex on him."

In the new statement, she said Mr. Seligmann stood in front of her while someone else sexually assaulted her from behind, but she did not say he made her perform oral sex. Instead, according to the statement, Mr. Seligmann stood there and refused to go back behind her "because he was getting married."

The report says, "Both Finnerty and Evans were trying to get Seligmann to 'do it' but he kept saying NO."

Irving Joyner, a law professor monitoring the case for the N.A.A.C.P., said someone who acted in concert with others could be charged with sexual offense even without personally assaulting the victim.

The woman also said in the statement for the first time that the men had used a white towel to wipe her face, Mr. Evans's penis and the floor where she said she had spit. Defense lawyers wrote that the new account of the white towel was an effort to explain why none of the defendants' DNA was found on or in the woman.

L.A. Man Sues To Take Wife's Last Name (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, January 12, 2007

LOS ANGELES — Michael Buday is petitioning a federal judge for the right to take Diana Bijon's last name in marriage as easily as she could take his last name.

Bijon, 28, an emergency room nurse, asked her fiancé to change his last name to preserve her father's family name because there are no sons. Buday, 29, a technical manager at an advertising firm, promised he would.

"I had a rough childhood with my father," he says. "We never really got along. Diana's father stepped up, gave me career advice. He's family."

DOJ_NMG_0115795

Keeping his promise has been more onerous than Buday expected. A woman can choose her husband's name or her maiden name on a California marriage-license form after the couple pays a county application fee that ranges from $50 to $97. California and 43 other states provide no place on a marriage-license application for the groom to choose the bride's surname.

To officially change his name to hers — and for future Social Security benefits, Buday says — a man must pay a $320 court fee, advertise his intention in a newspaper for four weeks and get a judge's approval.

"The law makes it burdensome, if not close to impossible, to adopt the wife's name," says Mark Rosenbaum, legal director for the American Civil Liberties Union of Southern California. "It reflects the archaic notion of a woman's subordinate place in the partnership."

The ACLU sued California and Los Angeles County on Dec. 15 to have the separate treatment of Buday and Bijon outlawed as gender discrimination and a denial of equal protection. The couple were married in August 2005 under their separate names after state and county agencies rebuffed them.

Six states — Georgia, Hawaii, Iowa, Massachusetts, New York and North Dakota — give either spouse the right to choose the other's last name.

A marrying couple that wants a combined or hyphenated name in California and most other states must go through the red tape of a court petition. That's the route Antonio Villar of Los Angeles took in 1987 when he and his wife, Corina Raigosa, combined their names as Villaraigosa. He's now mayor of the city.

A groom seldom asks to adopt his bride's name, says Myleta Miller, a clerk at Atlanta's Probate Court. No national statistics are kept, but Miller says she's seen "no more than five" such applications in six years on the job.

Los Angeles County Registrar-Recorder/County Clerk Conny McCormack, named in the lawsuit, says her office uses a state-dictated form and will comply with any change judges or legislators might order.

"I certainly am in favor of the law … being clarified," McCormack says.

Civil Rights For A New Generation (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — College freshman Simone Hall hasn't joined a civil rights group, although her mother belongs to three of them. She says she'd like to sign up and wishes they were more active on campus.

Kendra Clark, a sophomore, says she joined a campus chapter of the NAACP, the nation's oldest civil rights group, because racism still exists. Agbanyim Ugwuomo, a senior, teamed up with the Hip Hop Caucus, an activist group formed in 2004. He says he supports a fresh approach to racial problems.

The three black students at Howard University are exactly the kind of new members sought by civil rights groups. The students say activism is as necessary today as it was 40 years ago when Martin Luther King Jr., whose birthday is Monday, led hundreds of thousands of people in marches for desegregation and blacks' right to vote. They say, however, that the focus now should be on issues such as inner-city school funding.

Civil rights groups, beset by aging or stagnant membership, are recasting their messages to appeal to young people. They're putting up discussion boards on youth-oriented websites and talking about jobs, education, housing, entrepreneurship and financial literacy.

"The role of civil rights organizations has evolved," says Marc Morial, president of the National Urban League. He says their priorities in the 1950s and 1960s reflected a lack of black officeholders. Today, with more such elected leaders and victories that include the right to vote, he says the civil rights movement needs to focus on persistent racial disparities in income and education. "Now we're at the stage of closing the economic divide," he says.

Young people often don't grasp "civil rights" but they understand "equal rights," says Stephanie Brown, 25, national director of the youth and college division at the NAACP. "We try to put it in terms they understand," she says, because students, unlike their parents or grandparents, may not fully comprehend what it means not to have equal access to education and jobs.

Still, "there are a lot of 'a-ha!' moments," Brown says, such as when Michigan voters last fall approved a ban on affirmative action at public universities.

DOJ_NMG_0115796

Brown has started a weekly blog hoping to attract students and help revive the NAACP's membership, which exceeded 600,000 in 1945 but fell to 259,000 by 2000.

NAACP President Bruce Gordon says the group's membership, which had been aging, jumped considerably last year. He says it increased most among young people.

Civil rights groups are trying different approaches to attract younger members:

•Partnerships. Next month, the NAACP will join with the Hip Hop Caucus to promote a legislative agenda that includes job training, school funding and Hurricane Katrina relief, says the Rev. Lennox Yearwood, 37, the caucus' president. He says they'll send e-mail alerts about pending bills to members of both groups. The caucus has 700,000 e-mail members.

•Web networking. The NAACP, which has been starting more high school councils and college chapters, has posted discussion boards on Facebook and MySpace, websites popular with students.

•Financial literacy. The Congress of Racial Equality, founded in 1942, is advertising in college newspapers, has a page on MySpace and is launching a campaign to teach young people how to manage money. "It's not as sexy as police brutality or affirmative action," but it may have more impact on their daily lives, says spokesman Niger Innis.

•Young professionals. The National Urban League, established in 1920, is expanding special chapters for people in their 20s to tutor and mentor the disadvantaged. Morial says membership in the 50 chapters, begun in the late 1990s, has doubled in three years.

•Conflict resolution. The Southern Christian Leadership Conference, which King founded in 1957 and led until his assassination in 1968, is training high school and college students in how to resolve conflicts peacefully.

"We're developing a curriculum where we'll go into schools all over the world," says Charles Steele Jr., the group's president. He aims to open 50 domestic and 10 international centers by 2010 to offer conflict resolution training.

Civil rights groups know they face obstacles.

"Sometimes success can be your biggest enemy, because it can breed complacency," says the NAACP's Gordon. He says many people think the civil rights struggle is over because basic rights have been won.

Some young people question whether the groups are still relevant, says Samuel Roberts, who teaches modern African-American history at Columbia University. He says many young blacks do not relate to the NAACP and turn instead to student groups for political action.

At Howard, one of the nation's premier historically black universities, some students think the NAACP is for older people, says Sable Nelson, president of the college chapter, which has 123 members.

Yearwood says many older groups have become "institutionalized" and lack the flexibility of his Hip Hop Caucus.

Morial says young people, connected by cellphones and the Internet, may feel less need to join a group. "Young people aren't joiners as much as their parents," he says.

Gordon hopes to expand the NAACP's membership to 1 million by 2009, its 100th anniversary.

That goal is lofty but possible, says Ron Walters, director of the University of Maryland's African American Leadership Institute. "The organization still has quite a presence in our community." He says the NAACP and the Urban League, both of which mobilized quickly to help survivors of Hurricane Katrina, have done the most to appeal to youth.

At Howard, students say they believe in King's dream of racial equality and his call to action.

Christina Griffin, a sophomore from San Diego, says she has yet to join any groups on Howard's storied campus. But she knows she wants to give something back to the black community. "Just being on this campus fills you with such an obligation," she says. "We're so much a part of what people in the '60s fought for."

ANTITRUST:

Bristol Finds Alliances, And Perhaps A Suitor (NYT)

By Stephanie Saul

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115797

THE drug maker Bristol-Myers Squibb brings to mind that vacant colonial for sale down the street. In real estate parlance, both are expensive and might seem to need too much tender loving care.

The company's leaders all but announced it was for sale last September. Four months later, though, no potential suitor has emerged — at least not publicly.

Instead, Bristol-Myers has entered several comparatively small deals, including one yesterday in which it announced a partnership with the British company AstraZeneca to develop two diabetes compounds.

One industry executive said recently that every large pharmaceutical company had looked at Bristol-Myers as a potential acquisition. But there are major deterrents to a quick sale: its price; two pending Justice Department investigations; and a looming patent trial involving the company's blockbuster drug Plavix. That trial is set to begin Jan. 22 in Manhattan federal court.

"C.E.O.'s rarely buy big companies with big patent issues," said Dr. Gbola Amusa, European pharmaceutical analyst for Sanford C. Bernstein & Company. "The easiest way to lose your job as a C.E.O. is to buy a drug that isn't there once you pay for it."

Bristol-Myers declined to comment yesterday on speculation involving the company's possible takeover. A Bernstein analysis last fall discussed why other pharmaceutical companies were not rushing to buy Bristol-Myers, despite a research and development pipeline that is viewed as one of the most attractive in the industry.

Cost is a reason. The analysis by Bernstein in October estimated the intrinsic value of Bristol-Myers at $21.50 a share. But the company's shares closed up 34 cents yesterday, at $26.54. Judging by similar takeover deals in the past, shareholders would want a 20 to 30 percent premium — or about $30 a share — before they would be happy with a takeover.

And many companies that might be interested in Bristol have lower price-earnings multiples. Acquiring Bristol-Myers would be bucking the norm in which high multiple companies usually acquire lower multiple companies.

Investors also shy away from uncertainties like the big patent case. In that dispute the Canadian company Apotex is challenging the validity of the Bristol-Myers patent on the anticoagulant Plavix, a drug with an estimated United States market of nearly $4 billion.

Sales of Plavix took a big hit last year after efforts to settle the patent case broke down. Apotex briefly flooded the market with its cheaper generic version of the drug, before a judge ordered a halt.

That debacle led to the ouster of Bristol's chief executive, Peter R. Dolan last September. Since then, the company has been run by an interim chief, the former Guidant chairman James M. Cornelius.

The company's moves in trying to settle the Plavix litigation are also the subject of an investigation by the Justice Department, which wants to know whether Bristol entered an anticompetitive agreement and hid it from the Federal Trade Commission.

While the impact of that investigation might not be as big as a loss of Plavix, the uncertainty of a Justice Department inquiry diminishes Bristol's appeal as a takeover candidate.

"I don't think anybody would put a multibillion-dollar potential liability there," said Richard T. Evans, an industry consultant. "It's more of a qualitative issue. Do you really want to be in the cross-hairs of the Justice Department?"

Mr. Evans also said it was not clear whether the product development partnerships Bristol-Myers had recently entered were conducive to a sale of the company.

In the announcement yesterday, the company said it had reached an agreement with AstraZeneca to develop and commercialize two experimental diabetes drugs that were discovered by Bristol-Myers. The agreement was valued at as much as $1.35 billion for Bristol-Myers, with $100 million in upfront payments, and as much as $1.25 billion in milestone payments as the products are brought to market.

The deal, the largest of three alliances the company has announced recently, appeared to be a favorable one for Bristol-Myers, according to Dr. Amusa, particularly since both products face uncertainties. AstraZeneca rose 83 cents, to $55.08.

Andrew Bonfield, chief financial officer for Bristol-Myers, said in a telephone conference yesterday that the company, which does not have a large sales force for primary-care doctors, hopes to take advantage of AstraZeneca's sales staff if the products come to market. Bristol-Myers also wants to reduce its financial risk in developing the products, Mr. Bonfield said.

DOJ_NMG_0115798

One big individual shareholder in Bristol-Myers, Dundas I. Flaherty of Los Angeles, had an optimistic take on yesterday's deal. He saw it as a possible sign that AstraZeneca might wind up being the suitor Bristol has been waiting for — even though AstraZeneca's chief executive several months ago said the company had little interest in mergers or acquisitions.

"If Cornelius is testing the water on deals," Mr. Flaherty said, "this is one way to get to know each other before we consummate something."

Thomson Must Defend Antitrust Suit Over Its Bar-Exam Courses (BLOOM)

By David Glovin

Bloomberg, January 12, 2007

Jan. 11 (Bloomberg) -- Thomson Corp., owner of Westlaw legal research, must defend an antitrust lawsuit claiming the company illegally required aspiring lawyers to enroll in a second program as a condition of taking the state bar-exam preparation course.

A test-taker claimed in a lawsuit filed last year in Manhattan federal court that Thomson violated antitrust laws by illegally linking state-bar and multistate review courses. U.S. District Judge William Pauley ruled today that the antitrust suit against Toronto-based Thomson may go forward.

Thomson sells about 40,000 BarBri courses in the U.S. with both state and multistate review elements, generating about $125 million in revenue and $60 million in profits, Pauley said. As much as 90 percent of students taking prep-courses for the state section of the test enroll in the BarBri program, he said.

``The evidence suggests that BarBri used its substantial market share to control competition, boost prices and potentially force unwilling consumption of its'' multistate product, Pauley wrote in a 20-page decision.

Bar exams in 48 states include a ``multistate'' section, which consists of questions on contracts, criminal law and four other subjects, and a second section with questions about a state's particular laws.

The proposed class-action, or group lawsuit, was filed on behalf of all people who purchased a BarBri course in 47 states since 2001. The suit, brought by test-taker Anthony Park, seeks unspecified money damages.

Thomson spokesman Jason Stewart declined to comment. Brian Murray, a lawyer for the plaintiffs, didn't immediately return a call. Bloomberg LP, the parent of Bloomberg News, competes with Thomson in selling financial and legal news and information.

The suit is Park v. Thomson, 05-cv-2931, Southern District of New York (Manhattan).

EU Delays Universal-BMG Ruling (AP)

By Aoife White

AP, January 11, 2007

BRUSSELS, Belgium -- European Union antitrust regulators on Thursday delayed until June 1 a deadline to rule on Universal Music Group's plans to buy BMG Music Publishing for about $2.09 billion.

They did not say why they needed more time to look at the takeover.

If approved, the deal would combine the No. 3 and No. 4 music publishing catalogs, giving them a 22 percent market share and scraping ahead of current market leader EMI.

EU approval is the last hurdle for the deal, which was cleared in November by the Federal Trade Commission and the Justice Department in the United States.

Officials had said they would issue a final decision on whether to block or allow the deal by April 27 when they opened an in-depth investigation last month.

The European Commission is under pressure to look closely at the record industry after the EU's second-highest court overturned regulatory approval last July of a 2004 combination between the music units of Sony Corp. and Bertelsmann AG.

The court sharply criticized regulators, saying they had not done enough to show there was no monopoly in the recording industry before the deal or that there would not be one afterward.

The Sony-BMG deal must now be re-examined.

DOJ_NMG_0115799

Regulators have said their probe into Universal-BMG will focus on whether Universal's leading position and a shrinking number of players in the market would have "a negative impact" on fees for publishing rights or conditions for European song writers.

BMG -- owned by German media company Bertelsmann AG -- has the rights to more than a million songs by recording artists such as Nelly, Maroon 5 and Coldplay, as well as classic hits by the Beach Boys, Barry Manilow and other entertainers.

Paris-based Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group is the world's largest music company. Its publishing arm controls the rights to songs by artists such as 50 Cent, Mary J. Blige and Chamillionaire.

The EU rarely blocks deals -- but it can, and often does, demand that companies under investigation sell off units or make binding promises to change the way they do business.

Five companies -- Universal, BMG, EMI Group PLC, Warner Music Group Corp. and Sony Corp. -- control most of recorded music and music publishing in Europe.

EC Delays Ruling On Publishing Deal (HOLLYREP)

By Leo Cendrowicz

Hollywood Reporter, January 12, 2007

BRUSSELS -- The European Commission has pushed back by five weeks the deadline for its ruling on Universal Music's $2.1 billion bid for Bertelsmann's BMG Music Publishing.

The delay, which pushes the decision to June 1, came after Universal Music parent Vivendi, called for more time as it prepared to defend a merger that would create the world's biggest music publishing company.

In a statement, Universal said it requested the extension, "to give the commission sufficient time to consider properly the merits of the merger in what would otherwise be an overly aggressive timetable."

"We remain confident that the merger will be approved," the company added.

Industry sources said Universal was concerned about how soon it would be able to provide the vast quantity of data sought by the commission, the European Union's antitrust regulator. "It's not a problem, but it is a huge amount to gather," one source said.

Advertisement

The timeframe is unusually short. Universal won the auction to buy BMG Music Publishing in September and filed its bid with the EC in November, but it was only on Dec. 8 that the commission announced it would open an in-depth merger investigation, just as its officials were due to leave Brussels for their traditional two-week Christmas vacation. The probe itself also has seen a change, as the head of the EC unit investigating the merger has just been replaced.

BMG and Universal each have about 11% of the market and have the world's third- and fourth-largest music publishing catalogs. If approved, they will have a 22% combined market share, about two points more than market leader EMI.

European Union clearance is the last regulatory hurdle for the takeover, which was cleared in November by the Federal Trade Commission and the Justice Department in the U.S. EC officials say their investigation is concentrating on whether cutting the number of major publishers would push down fees for publishing rights or hurt conditions for European song writers.

Vivendi beat off rivals EMI Music Publishing and Warner/Chappell Music to purchase BMG Music Publishing, whose archive of more than a million songs includes Coldplay, Britney Spears and Robbie Williams. BMG is expected to complement rather than overlap the Universal catalog that includes such artists as U2 and Elton John.

The delay comes just seven months after the Court of First Instance, the EU's second-highest court, annulled the BMG merger with Sony, saying the EC had been wrong to approve it. However, the music publishing purchase should face fewer problems as it does not deal directly with consumers and, therefore, prices.

At Heart Of Cisco's IPhone Trademark Lawsuit: A Desire For Open Standards (WSJ)

By Don Clark

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

Cisco Systems Inc.'s suit against Apple Inc. turns on a trademark. But the fight also reflects two fundamentally different approaches to technology, one based on open standards and the other on proprietary design.

Cisco contends that it holds rights to the name iPhone. The Silicon Valley networking giant filed trademark-infringement charges Wednesday to stop Apple's use of the name on its new cellphone, after the companies failed to reach a licensing agreement before the product was announced Tuesday.

Cisco also disclosed that it had been asking Apple, in exchange for using the name, to help Cisco's product work together with Apple's. Mark Chandler, Cisco's general counsel, summed up its account of what happened in a blog posting1 Wednesday night: "What were the issues at the table that kept us from an agreement? Was it money? No. Was it a royalty on every Apple phone? No. Was it an exchange for Cisco products or services? No.

"Fundamentally we wanted an open approach. We hoped our products could interoperate in the future."

The request fits Cisco's style. The San Jose, Calif., company makes networking devices that rely on published specifications to exchange data.

Apple, by contrast, has kept tight control over internally developed technology to be able to offer exclusive features. Many competitors, for instance, have asked Apple to make it possible for songs purchased from the company's iTunes music store to be loaded on their portable music players. But only Apple's hit iPod can do that.

The new iPhone offers sophisticated cellphone features and many functions of the iPod. Opening up that product or other Apple devices in new ways could help Cisco's hardware sales, given the publicity Apple tends to generate. One person familiar with the situation said the negotiations focused on broad technical cooperation, rather than specific devices.

Douglas Masters, an intellectual-property lawyer at the firm Loeb & Loeb LLP in New York, said Cisco's negotiating strategy was far more sophisticated than seeking royalty payments from Apple. "There is no amount of money that is going to be worth more than to have the interoperability," argued Mr. Masters, who is not involved in the case.

Other lawyers observing the battle predict Apple will try to show Cisco didn't adequately use or protect the iPhone trademark.

Cisco said it has owned the trademark since 2000, when it bought a company called InfoGear Technology Corp. that first sought a trademark on the iPhone name in 1996. InfoGear used it on a telephone that offered Web access, which Mr. Chambers wrote that Cisco has "shipped and/or supported" for years. Cisco's Linksys unit added iPhone-branded products last spring and formally announced them in late 2006, he said.

If Cisco didn't offer iPhone-branded products for a lengthy period -- or didn't try to block other companies from using the name -- Apple could argue that Cisco didn't live up to a legal obligation to defend the trademark, said Robert Andris, an intellectual-property lawyer at the firm Ropers Majeski Kohn & Bentley LLP. Apple could also argue that the letter "i" has evolved into a generic term indicating the Internet, not a brand deserving trademark protection.

An Apple spokesman said several companies besides Cisco also use the name iPhone for Internet-based phones, characterizing Cisco's U.S. trademark protection as "tenuous." He said Apple is the first to use the name on cellphones.

But Nate Garhart, another intellectual-property lawyer at Coblentz Patch Duffy & Bass LLP, questioned whether Apple can show its phones wouldn't be confused with Cisco's, a key issue in trademark law.

Cisco is likely to try to persuade a judge to issue a preliminary injunction blocking Apple's use of the trademark while the merits of the case are decided, which could be difficult, Mr. Andris said. Yet pressure on Apple to resolve the matter could increase by spring, when it needs to build phones in advance of kicking off sales in June, Mr. Masters added.

Letters (WSJ)

The Wall Street Joural, January 12, 2007

Ford Looks at the Future Through Green-Colored Glasses

Daniel Esty's Dec. 29 editorial-page commentary "Greener Pastures," on the challenges presented to the business community by environmental issues, made several excellent points. However, his use of Ford as an example of a company that has missed this important development is inaccurate.

A strong commitment to environmental stewardship is a key element in Ford's strategic plans, and has been for some time. Our goal is to make all our vehicles and facilities around the world sustainable and environmentally friendly.

DOJ_NMG_0115801

We were the first automaker to certify all its plants under ISO 14001, the international environmental management standard. Around the world, we are using solar power, geothermal cooling, hydroelectricity, wind, landfill gases and even recycled paint fumes to power our plants. Our facilities now use substantially less energy and water than they did in 2000, resulting in significant cost savings. Most include wildlife habitats on the grounds.

However, as Prof. Esty correctly points out, our greatest environmental "footprint" is made by our vehicles, which is why we are investing billions to improve the fuel economy and lower emissions of all our products. In the U.S. alone we offer 13 vehicles that get 30 mpg or higher on the highway. We were the first automaker in the world to offer a hybrid-electric powered SUV, Ford Escape, and we now have two hybrid vehicles for sale with more on the way.

We are proud of what we've accomplished, but won't be satisfied until we can offer truly sustainable transportation. We're working on developing clean diesels, gasoline-electric hybrids, biofuels, hydrogen-powered internal combustion engines and fuel cell vehicles. So far, no single technology has emerged as the answer, but we plan to be a leader of the low carbon future.

Environmental

& Safety Engineering

Ford Motor Co.

Detroit

Air Force Truly Needs Everything It Requests

As with all things related to military and foreign affairs, context is everything ("Pentagon Redefines 'Emergency'," Politics & Economics, Jan. 3). Without strategic context, the Air Force's funding requests under the emergency supplemental budget can be portrayed as a borderline-sleazy, bureaucratic maneuver intended to secure resources for "pet rocks" not funded in the regular process. Seen in context, though, the Air Force's request is an entirely appropriate response to the requirements levied on it by the president and the secretary of defense and is fully consistent with the letter and the spirit of Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England's directive.

Given our focus on Iraq, it is easy to forget that the Air Force is also fighting in Afghanistan and in the larger global war on terrorism. By their nature, these operations have imposed particular stresses on the Air Force, especially its airlift assets. Further, the Air Force still must maintain the capability to undertake more conventional major combat operations, should such unfortunate contingencies arise.

The Defense Department wants the Air Force to have 86 ready, modern combat wings. It now has the equivalent of 81. More importantly, many of the aircraft are at risk of becoming obsolescent. Two F-16s were lost in combat, and they need to be replaced. But it makes no sense to buy F-16s, which were designed in the late 1970s and procured in the 1980s. That would be to "reset," not transform, the Air Force, as our leadership seeks. Demands on strategic and theater-lift aircraft have been especially high, and C-130s have been lost in combat and accidents. Therefore, we have requested 17 C-130Js and 10 C-17s. Finally, the article noted requests for ICBM funding, money to upgrade the security of the missile sites and the missiles themselves. In light of this context, it should be obvious that the Air Force act responsibly to assure the safety of the nation's nuclear weapons.

Kenneth Watman

Associate Director

Air Force Strategic Planning

Washington

A Tailored Response

Dan Henninger, in his Jan. 5 Wonder Land, writes, "When Nancy Pelosi saw the Republicans had developed a compulsion to flagrantly throw their weight around, she grabbed them by the lapels of their Hickey Freeman suits, hoisted them into the air and slammed them onto the House floor . . ."

After 107 years of catering to discriminating gentlemen of all political stripes (no pun intended), we are too discreet to name names. However, suffice it to say, we are proud to count among our many loyal customers not only Republican but also Democratic governors, House speakers and senators, including both Democratic majority and minority leaders. Besides, this is the first time we have heard of anyone being so aggressive toward a fine Hickey Freeman suit.

DOJ_NMG_0115802

Homi B. Patel
Chairman and CEO
Hartmarx Corp.
Chicago

Nixon's Successors Left Holding the Bag

Ben Stein's Jan. 2 Letter to the Editor argues that Nixon should not be on the "worst presidents of the century for economic policy" list. He asserts that Nixon was "the last Republican president to have a budget surplus." The only surplus I can find in the Nixon administration is for fiscal year 1969, which ended just five months after Nixon was inaugurated. That budget was driven by decisions made during the Johnson administration, particularly the Vietnam tax surcharge.

Mr. Stein excuses the wage-price controls, but the greater economic scandal of the Nixon administration was the monetary policy pursued by Fed Chairman Arthur Burns and encouraged by Nixon that got the economy pumped up by November 1972, with its inflationary effects temporarily held down by the controls. The inflationary legacy of the pumped-up economy and the failed controls was left for Presidents Ford and Carter to deal with -- and it was Mr. Carter's appointment of Paul Volcker to the Federal Reserve chairmanship that finally got the solution under way.

Cornelia Strawser
Washington

The Sweet Life

I was appalled by "In New Senate, the 'Candy Desk' Gets a Kiss-Off" (page one, Jan. 5). In our office, we collectively provide candy for our jars. Are senators so base as to rely on handouts for everything, even candy? They should reach into their own pockets and not try to bend the rules to shake down companies to do it for them. How can they have empathy for us common folk when they expect everything for free?

Carmen Davis
St. Louis

It's time the senators stop acting like pampered royalty and get busy on becoming true statesmen.

Bill Fox
Blythewood, S.C.

Only the Senate would make the idea of candy in the office complicated.

Scott Simmonds
Saco, Maine

Video Franchise Rules Foster Discrimination

In response to your Jan. 2 editorial "Franchise Freedom" about the FCC's recent order rewriting the nation's video franchising rules to permit broadband discrimination against low-income and rural communities: I want to stand up for competition, lower prices and innovation that is both speedy and equitable.

Some of our largest corporations have convinced the FCC that cities and towns are to blame for any perceived lack of competition in the market for video and broadband services. This is misguided and irresponsible. For Hispanic Americans, who continue to face obstacles to accessing broadband services, equitable deployment is critical to ensuring that corporate titans cannot erect a walled garden behind which the fastest broadband services are squirreled for only the rich. Having failed to get Congress to bless their business plan that leaves behind most communities from their fiber upgrades, corporate executives have turned instead to the FCC for the dictum they demand.

The FCC's new video rules give a license to discriminate to companies who openly admit to Wall Street that local franchises have not posed a barrier. They curry favor with companies that analysts predict won't serve more than 10% of their customers with or without franchise reform. And the rules force Americans to take a step backward in our quest to narrow the digital divide in all corners of the country.

Rep. Hilda L. Solis
(D., Calif.)
Washington

DOJ_NMG_0115803

Basic Rights Savaged

William R. Maurer's horror story ("Let There Be Blight," Cross Country, Jan. 11) is no surprise to those of us who live in the socialist republic of Washington, whose politicians at all levels who put their perception of "the public good" above the constitutional rights of any individual. That the judiciary should be a willing party to such assaults on these rights is an outrage. I have it in writing from my state representative, that there would be no way that Kelo could happen here. But it can and has happened here, because of the way the state constitution has been circumvented by political subterfuge and legalistic semantics.

The Wall Street Journal
200 Liberty Street
New York, N.Y. 10281
Fax: (212) 416-2255

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

U.S. Attorney General Lauds Calderon's Anti-drug Moves (AP)

By Istra Pacheco, Associated Press

AP, January 12, 2007

MEXICO CITY — U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said today that the two nations must broaden their cooperation in order to curb the brutal wave of drug violence rocking Mexico.

Gonzales, who met with Mexican Attorney General Eduardo Medina, applauded President Felipe Calderon's efforts to reduce drug violence, which killed more than 2,000 people in Mexico last year.

Since taking office in December, Calderon has sent 3,300 soldiers and federal agents to Tijuana and more than 7,000 troops to his native state of Michoacan.

More than 1,000 troops also have been sent to the Pacific resort of Acapulco and two other cities in the western state of Guerrero in a crackdown on drugs and crime there, state officials said.

Gonzales praised Medina for a record 63 criminals Mexico extradited to the U.S. in 2006.

The extradition of criminals shows progress, Gonzales said, "but much work needs to be done."

In the past year, Mexican drug gangs have carried out a number of gruesome killings, including several beheadings, in their fight for lucrative drug routes.

Gonzales said Medina "and I both wholeheartedly agree that our law enforcement officials must be able to cooperate with one another on a broader scale and in an atmosphere of mutual trust if we are going to turn back the tide of recent violence and crime that so adversely affects us all."

Gonzales vowed to work closer with Mexico on gathering intelligence, exchanging information and experiences.

"Crime is not Mexico's problem alone or the United States' problem alone," Gonzales said in a statement. "It is our mutual challenge, and if we do not work together to meet that challenge, we will both fail. ... And the stakes are too high for failure."

Attorneys General Cite Shared Responsibility (HC)

By Marion Lloyd, Houston Chronicle Foreign Service

Houston Chronicle, January 12, 2007

They say U.S., Mexico must fight drugs together or both will lose

MEXICO CITY — The United States and Mexico must improve cooperation in the drug war or their efforts are doomed to fail, attorney generals from both countries said Thursday.

"Clearly, Mexico and the United States have a shared responsibility to make our communities safer from the drug traffickers and criminals who are threatening our way of life," U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told a joint news conference in Mexico.

It was his first official meeting with his Mexican counter-part, Eduardo Medina Mora, who was appointed attorney general Dec. 1 at the end of a year of record drug violence. More than 2,000 Mexicans died in gangland-style killings in 2006, prompting the U.S. government to issue travel warnings for parts of Mexico.

"Crime is not Mexico's problem alone or the United States' problem alone," Gonzales read froma statement. "It is our mutual challenge, and if we do not work together to meet that challenge, we will both fail. And the stakes are too high for failure."

Medina Mora agreed. But he added that such a partnership must take place in "an atmosphere of mutual confidence and profound respect for our sovereignty."

Neither official said whether Mexico had accepted a petition by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration to open new offices in Nuevo Laredo, Matamoros and Nogales on the U.S. border. The requested expansion would bring the total number of Mexico offices to 11 and increase the number of DEA agents from 81 to nearly 100, officials from both countries have said.

It would also give U.S. anti-drug agents a key foothold in the crime-ridden border region.

The U.S. ambassador to Mexico, Tony Garza, has harshly criticized Mexico's failure to stem the violence along the border. But on Thursday, he urged both countries to cooperate "in an atmosphere of mutual respect and trust."

"The Mexican people and the American people are simply unwilling to continue to hand their communities and their safety over to criminals and drug traffickers," Garza said.

Cooperation between U.S. and Mexican law enforcement has increased in recent years, with Mexico extraditing to the United States a record 63 accused criminals last year.

But those efforts are not enough, said Gonzales, a Houston native and former Texas Supreme Court justice.

"Our law enforcement officials must be able to cooperate with one another on a broader scale and in an atmosphere of mutual trust," he said, "if we are going to be able to turn back the tide of recent violence and crime that so adversely affects us all."

Drug Battle: Gonzales Afraid Mexican Violence Will 'spill Into U.S.' (LAREDOMT)

By Clay Reddick, LAREDO MORNING TIMES

Laredo (TX) Morning Times, January 11, 2007

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales toured the World Trade Bridge on Wednesday, announcing a new effort to fight drug traffickers on the border."We're concerned about violence in Mexico spilling into the U.S.," Gonzales said.

Gonzales announced $300,000 would be spent on a new federal drug taskforce that would fight drug cartels. Cuellar said the money is a good start, but we need to do more, like adding federal prosecutors to handle the border's busy drug and immigration dockets.

U.S. Rep. Henry Cuellar, D-Laredo, said he asked Gonzales in September to visit because of recent increases in border violence, and he called the visit significant. "It sends a strong message that he knows what's happening on the ground," Cuellar said from Washington, D.C.

However, William Slemaker, who has become a spokesman for families of people missing in Mexico, said he didn't find any answers in Gonzales' visit.

"I felt that he came to spit in our face," Slemaker said.

Slemaker and other kidnapping victims' families held signs near the World Trade Bridge as Gonzales' motorcade arrived and left.

Slemaker said the proposal sounds like more of the same old thing, and he believes everyone keeps talking about border violence without thinking of the actual victims.

Gonzales announced the new law enforcement task force would consist of a number of federal and state agencies, including the FBI, IRS and Texas Department of Public Safety. The "strike force" would target drug cartels, smugglers and money launderers.

He was scheduled to meet with his Mexican counterpart later Wednesday. Gonzales said Mexico's new government presents an opportunity for progress and early signs indicate that the country is moving in a positive direction. Cuellar also said he is optimistic that President Felipe Calderón is headed the right way.

DOJ_NMG_0115805

Gonzales touted the success of existing task forces, such as the Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force (OCDETF) based out of Houston and the Laredo-based Violent Crime Impact Team (VCIT).

According to the Department of Justice, the OCDETF stopped over 30 tons of cocaine from entering the country and seized over $32 million from traffickers since the program's inception in Oct. 2005.

The VCIT boasts the capture of over 200 firearms in 2006 as well as the arrests of over 69 fugitives, according to the DOJ.

The task force was responsible for nabbing accused kidnappers Jose A. Garza-Robles and Hector Herrera-Sifuentes plus Jesus Alberto De Leon, who is accused of trying to kidnap a man by chasing him with a shotgun into a Target store in north Laredo on Sept. 25.

Gonzales said he wants to secure the border in a way that allows trade between Mexico and the U.S., and he also said the DOJ is focusing on workplace enforcement of immigration laws in the interior of the country.

Although he didn't meet with Slemaker's group, Gonzales said the issue of Americans missing in Mexico is important to President Bush.

(Clay Reddick may be reached at (956) 728-2582 or by e-mail at clay@lmtonline.com)

Deputy Marshal Accused Of Leaking In Mob Case (AP)

By Mike Robinson, The Associated Press

AP, January 11, 2007

A federal deputy marshal was charged today with leaking information about a reputed mobster's cooperation with prosecutors as they investigated the top echelon of Chicago's organized crime family.

John Thomas Ambrose, 38, a former supervisory inspector of the U.S. Marshals Service's Great Lakes Regional Fugitive Task Force, surrendered voluntarily Thursday at the FBI's Chicago office, officials said.

He is accused of revealing information concerning the cooperation and travel plans of Nicholas Calabrese, who is expected to be a key witness in the government's Operation Family Secrets murder conspiracy case.

Prosecutors said Ambrose told them in a Sept. 6 interview that he passed the information to an associate of reputed mob boss John "No Nose" DiFronzo in hopes of getting information on the whereabouts of then-fugitive organized crime figure Joseph "Joey the Clown" Lombardo.

But prosecutors said that in later interviews Ambrose said he never believed the information would be passed to organized crime figures.

Lombardo, among those charged in the Operation Family Secrets indictment, was subsequently captured and is due to stand trial starting in May along with the others accused in the case.

Calabrese, 63, of Chicago, and his brother, Frank Calabrese, 68, of Oak Brook, are among 14 defendants charged in a sweeping indictment alleging a long-term conspiracy by Chicago mobsters to commit at least 18 murders.

The murders include that of Tony "The Ant" Spilotro, the mob's one-time man in Las Vegas, who was beaten to death and buried in a corn field.

Prosecutors said Ambrose leaked information concerning Nicholas Calabrese while Calabrese was in the witness security program operated by the Marshals Service. They said in court papers that the information Ambrose leaked was given to members of the Chicago Outfit.

Gary Shapiro, the first assistant U.S. attorney in Chicago, said Ambrose's action "constitutes an egregious breach of his law enforcement duties."

"The investigation so far has not uncovered any evidence that either this witness or another was ever in danger and there is no evidence that any attempt was made to harm any protected witness," Shapiro said.

Prosecutors said that between January and June 2003 they intercepted 11 conversations that took place when reputed mob boss Michael Marcello visited his brother, James, at the federal prison in Milan, Mich. Both Marcello brothers are charged in the Family Secrets indictment.

DOJ_NMG_0115806

Prosecutors said the conversations showed that Michael Marcello had an inside source of information concerning Nicholas Calabrese. They said the conversations also indicated that the source was a federal lawman with access to the files of the Marshals Service witness program.

Michael Marcello himself may have given federal officials their best hint when he said that the source, who he described as "the Babysitter," was the son of a defendant in the so-called "Marquette 10" police corruption case.

Ambrose's father, Thomas Ambrose, died in prison while serving his bribery sentence stemming from the Marquette 10 case, prosecutors said. They said that the conduit who received the Calabrese information also had been a defendant in the police corruption case.

John Thomas Ambrose was a member of the Marshals Service's so-called Calabrese detail and would have had access to the information, they said. They said Ambrose's fingerprints were then found on Calabrese documents.

Ambrose has been on leave since September. He is charged with theft of government property, which carries a maximum penalty of 10 years in federal prison and a $250,000 fine.

U.S. Marshal Charged With Information Leak (CHIST)

By Frank Main And Natasha Korecki, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, January 11, 2007

A deputy U.S. marshal was charged today with leaking information about the whereabouts of a Chicago Outfit mobster in witness protection.

John Ambrose is charged with using his official position to obtain and disseminate information relating to the status, substance of cooperation and travel of Nick Calabrese, who was in the U.S. Marshals Service's witness security program.

Nick Calabrese is a key witness in the upcoming Family Secrets mob trial, scheduled to begin in May. Calabrese is the brother of Frank Calabrese Sr., a man charged in 13 mob hits and one of the top mobsters on trial in the case.

The Chicago Sun-Times reported in September that Ambrose was placed on administrative leave while federal authorities investigated the allegations.

The deputy, a member of the Great Lakes Regional Fugitive Task Force, was required to surrender his badge and gun, sources said.

In 2005, federal authorities charged 14 people in the sweeping mob indictment. The investigation, which is continuing, pinned 18 previously unsolved murders on the Chicago Outfit.

Ambrose has spearheaded several high-profile fugitive arrests, including the capture of an Italian mobster living in the west suburbs and a Chicago street gang member named as one of the country's 15 most-wanted fugitives.

Feds: Marshal Double-Crossed Protected Mobster (WMAQ)

WMAQ-TV, NBC 5, Chicago, January 11, 2007

Agent Hired To Protect Calabrese Suspected Of Giving Up His Identity

CHICAGO -- A long and twisted look into the innerworkings of embattled Chicago mobsters, an investigation culminated Thursday when a U.S. marshal was charged in Chicago for revealing sensitive information about a protected, organized crime witness.

Related Content: Video | U.S. Marshal Accused Of Revealing Info On Witness | Images: A Century Of Chicago Mob Bosses

John Thomas Ambrose, 38, was charged in a criminal complaint filed Thursday, which states that Ambrose revealed information relating to the status of cooperating witness Nicholas Calabrese while Calabrese was in the Witness Security Program.

According to the FBI's affidavit, witness Calabrese admitted to the government that he was a "made" member of the Chicago mob (a.k.a. the "Chicago Outfit") and provided federal agents with the most expansive overview ever of murders allegedly committed by its members. In 2002, Calabrese agreed to cooperate in the investigation of alleged Outfit members, including his brother, Frank Calabrese Sr. and two other men -- brothers James and Michael Marcello.

Nicolas Calabrese was moved to a secure prison facility in August of 2002, based on his ability to testify in 38 murders -- 16 of which he admits he participated. An investigation ensued, resulting in the April 2005 indictment of 14 defendants in U.S. vs.

DOJ_NMG_0115807

Nicolas Calabrese et al., which alleges a 40-year racketeering conspiracy involving 18 previously unsolved Outfit murders of suspected government witnesses between 1970 and 1986. That's according to a release by the Chicago FBI.

The case against the remaining 12 defendants is scheduled for trial in May.

As part of his promise to the government, Calabrese was brought back to Chicago two times in fall of 2002 and spring of 2003, when he assisted the FBI in locating murder scenes. Both of these trips involved highly secret travel details to which only a handful of government personnel were privvy -- and that included Ambrose. In fact, during both stays, Ambrose worked night duty to protect Calabrese.

During the first half of 2003, the feds intercepted 11 prison conversations between the brothers Marcello which led them to suspect Ambrose of being corrupt. In five of those conversations -- which were coded and whispered -- Michael Marcello reported to incarcerated James that he had an inside source he called "the Babysitter".

"In a recorded conversation on March 24, 2003, Michael Marcello indentified his source of information ... not by name, but by a description that could fit no other law enforcement officer (but Ambrose)," stated an FBI release Thursday.

In a twist, Marcello revealed that "The Babysitter" was the son of embattled Chicago officer Thomas Ambrose, who died in prison serving time for being convicted of bribery in a high-profile corruption case called "Marquette 10."

The FBI also claims that in additon to other evidence, John Ambrose's fingerprints were found on highly sensitive documents regarding Calabrese.

Ambrose, who joined the marshals in 1998, was placed on administrative leave last September when he was questioned by federal agents regarding the case. He surrendered voluntarily at the FBI's Chicago office, according to First Assistant U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of Illinois Gary Shapiro.

"While this defendant's conduct in revealing closely guarded and highly sensitive information regarding a protective witness constitutes an egregious breach of his law enforcement duties, the investigation so far has not uncovered any evidence that either this witness or any other was ever in danger," said Shapiro. "There is no evidence that any attempt was made to harm (the) protected witness."

If convicted, Ambrose could search 10 years on each charge and a $250,000 fine.

"I hope that the fact that John's father was convicted by this office many years ago has had on this," said Frank Lipuma, Ambrose's attorney. "I would be shocked if it did. I expect the U.S. Attorney's Office to take a higher road, and I'm sure they took a higher road."

Marshal Accused Of Leaking Info On Mob Witness (CBS2CHI)

CBS 2 Chicago, January 12, 2007

Deputy Allegedly Told Targets Of Mob Murder Probe About A Cooperating Witness

(CBS) CHICAGO A deputy U.S. Marshal was in federal custody Thursday morning for allegedly disclosing confidential, highly sensitive information about an organized crime witness who was under federal protection.

John Thomas Ambrose is charged in a criminal complaint with theft of government property, accused of illegally using his position to obtain information about Nicholas Calabrese while Calabrese was in the U.S. Marshal's Witness Security Program, according to the U.S. Attorney's office. That information was later transmitted to the Chicago Outfit.

Calabrese is expected to be a key witness in the government's Operation Family Secrets murder conspiracy case.

Ambrose, 38, a deputy marshal since January 1998 and a supervisory inspector for the U.S. Marshals Service's Great Lakes Regional Fugitive Task Force, was placed on administrative leave last September. He is scheduled for an initial hearing this afternoon before a U.S. magistrate judge at the Dirksen Federal Building.

Prosecutors said Ambrose told them in a Sept. 6 interview that he passed the information to an associate of reputed mob boss John "No Nose" DiFronzo in hopes of getting information on the whereabouts of then-fugitive organized crime figure Joseph "Joey the Clown" Lombardo.

Gary Shapiro, the first assistant U.S. attorney in Chicago, said Ambrose's action "constitutes an egregious breach of his law enforcement duties."

DOJ_NMG_0115808

Calabrese is still in protective custody, set to testify in Operation Family Secrets, the massive case involving several alleged mobsters including Calabrese's brother Frank, Sr.

The feds say despite the leak, Calabrese was never in any danger, but he and others could have been.

"The investigation so far has not uncovered any evidence that either this witness or another was ever in danger and there is no evidence that any attempt was made to harm any protected witness," Shapiro said.

"As a federal prosecutor, this is the sort of case we never hope to see," Shapiro said.

"He is surprised he's been connected to the mob. He's not tied to the mob in any way," said Ambrose's attorney, Francis Lipuma.

Lombardo, among those charged in the Operation Family Secrets indictment, was subsequently captured and is due to stand trial starting in May along with the others accused in the case.

Calabrese, 63, of Chicago and his brother, Frank Calabrese, 68, of Oak Brook are among 14 defendants charged in a sweeping indictment alleging a long-term conspiracy by Chicago mobsters to commit at least 18 murders.

The murders include that of Tony "The Ant" Spilotro, the mob's one-time man in Las Vegas, who was beaten to death and buried in a corn field.

Federal prosecutors say Calabrese has been cooperating with their investigation of Chicago Outfit members and, as an admitted "made" man in the Outfit, he has provided authorities "with the most expansive overview ever of Chicago Outfit murders," including testimony about 16 murders in which he participated and 22 others about which he had second-hand knowledge.

In 2002, he agreed to cooperate in the investigation of alleged Outfit members, including his brother Frank Calabrese, Sr., and brothers James and Michael Marcello. He was formally admitted into witness protection in 2002 and moved to a secure federal prison facility.

The first official disclosure of Calabrese's cooperation in the Outfit murder investigation was in 2005 at a detention hearing for James and Michael Marcello, who were indicted in connection to the murders.

In a number of secretly recorded conversations between the Marcello brothers in 2003, while James was incarcerated in Michigan, authorities learned Michael Marcello had an inside source with information about Nicholas Calabrese's cooperation with the feds, according to an affidavit.

In a recorded conversation in March 2003, Michael Marcello identified his source, whom he called "the Babysitter," as Ambrose, not by name, but by a description that could fit no other law enforcement officer, according to the affidavit.

"We eventually determined the reference to the Babysitter was to James Ambrose," Shapiro said.

The feds also found Ambrose's fingerprints on confidential documents about Nick Calabrese.

The Marcellos allegedly discussed those documents in a recorded conversation.

But Ambrose's lawyer contends the Marcellos' leak may not be his client.

"The Marcellos referred to, for instance, other attorneys, some criminal defense attorneys, guards at the Metropolitan Correctional Center, other law enforcement personnel and even made a reference to the U.S. Attorney office, and an individual in U.S. Attorney's office," Lipuma said.

However, on those tapes, the Marcellos also indicate their sources' father was a member of the Marquette Ten, a group of Chicago cops convicted of corruption in the 1980s.

John Ambrose's father, Thomas, was one of the lead defendants in that case. He died in prison.

The feds charge that John Ambrose was leaking the information on Nick Calabrese to an unnamed "Individual A," another member of the Marquette Ten.

Ambrose lives in a quiet Tinley Park neighborhood. Officials say he was a respected marshal.

If convicted, Ambrose faces up to 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

CBS 2's Dana Kozlov and Derrick Blakley and the Associated Press contributed to this report.

Feds: Marshal Aided Mob (CHIT)

By Matt O'Connor, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, January 12, 2007

Officer charged with leaking crucial information about Outfit

John T. Ambrose was barely a teenager when his dad, Thomas, was convicted in the "Marquette 10" police corruption trial in the 1980s.

The father died after just a year in prison and never saw that Ambrose grew up to be a law-enforcement officer—a decorated supervisor in the U.S. marshal's office.

Federal prosecutors said he followed too closely in his father's footsteps. In a case that shows the long shadow of one of Chicago's most notorious police corruption scandals, Ambrose was accused Thursday of passing secrets to the mob.

With his own dad gone, Ambrose had come to look upon another one of the convicted Marquette 10 as a father figure, according to court papers.

Ambrose is charged with passing highly confidential information about Nicholas Calabrese's cooperation in dozens of gangland slayings to that man, who allegedly in turn fed everything to the mob.

Chicago attorney Thomas Royce, who defended Ambrose's dad at the Marquette 10 trial, recalled Thursday that Ambrose occasionally sat in the courtroom watching his father's trial. He turned 14 during the trial.

"I am truly surprised John would ever have an evil motive," said Royce, who has kept in contact with Ambrose. "He was very aggressive, in my belief, in trying to overcome his father's image."

Confronted about the allegations in September, Ambrose allegedly told authorities he passed the information on to a person identified by authorities as Individual A because he wanted to impress this father figure with his involvement in a high-profile case.

Individual A has been identified by sources as William Guide, who was convicted in the 1980s in the Marquette 10 trial.

Ambrose had worked a security detail when Calabrese, who was in the Witness Security Program while in federal prison, was brought to Chicago in 2002 and 2003 to show investigators where some of the mob murders had occurred.

Ambrose allegedly passed the information to Guide, who knew mob boss John "No Nose" DiFronzo. The two had met while in the Marion federal prison in the '80s and '90s.

Ambrose's alleged role as the inside source came to light in cryptic conversations between imprisoned Outfit boss James Marcello and his brother, Michael. Federal authorities secretly videotaped and audiotaped their conversations in a federal prison in Michigan during 2003, the charges alleged.

The conversations indicated that the source of the inside information, nicknamed "the Baby-sitter" by the Marcellos, was someone within federal law enforcement who had access to protectees under the Witness Security Program, authorities said.

In one conversation, Michael Marcello referred to the source as the son of one of the Marquette 10 officers convicted in 1982, authorities said.

"That's pretty singular information that in our view points to only one person," First Assistant U.S. Atty. Gary Shapiro said at a news conference.

In addition, two latent fingerprints of Ambrose's were found in sensitive records about Calabrese's cooperation contained in a file cabinet off-limits to anyone but Witness Security Program deputies, authorities said.

Shapiro said the most damaging revelation by Ambrose was his disclosure to Individual A that the imprisoned Calabrese had returned to Chicago twice, including to lead investigators to the sites of several of the gangland murders.

Within hours of completing his last security shift, Ambrose made a 14-minute call to Individual A's work phone, authorities said telephone records show.

Only a handful of law-enforcement officials should have known about the trips, but the Marcellos were caught in the recorded conversations discussing both after the fact, Shapiro said.

A case 'we hope to never see'

"For a federal prosecutor, this case is the sort that we hope to never see," said Shapiro, the No. 2 official in the U.S. attorney's office.

Ambrose's lawyer blasted the government's evidence as weak and vowed to fight the case to trial.

The lawyer, Francis Lipuma, denied that Ambrose disclosed anything sensitive to Individual A, saying there had already been press accounts about Calabrese's cooperation at the time.

DOJ_NMG_0115810

Lipuma also noted that nowhere on the recordings did the Marcellos name Ambrose as the inside source.

Lipuma said the government omitted "many material facts" in the charges, chief among them that in the recorded conversations the Marcellos claimed to have multiple sources of information, including criminal-defense attorneys, correctional officers at a federal Loop jail, other law-enforcement personnel and an individual in the U.S. attorney's office.

"The U.S. attorney's office should take a look at its own house and in other areas instead of pinning this on John Ambrose," Lipuma told reporters after Ambrose had been freed on his own recognizance following a brief appearance in the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse. He was charged with theft of government property.

Shapiro and Kim Widup, the U.S. marshal in Chicago, said the Marshals Service will closely examine what went wrong with the security breach and make any necessary changes.

"A day like today is a tough day for everybody in law enforcement," Widup said.

Shapiro said no evidence was uncovered that Calabrese was ever in danger or that the mob plotted against him.

Calabrese, described by Shapiro as the only "made" member of the Chicago Outfit ever to become a government informant, provided unprecedented cooperation, detailing 16 gangland murders in which he took part and another 22 homicides that he knew about.

His cooperation led to charges against himself and 13 others, including the Marcello brothers, in connection with 18 Outfit murders dating to the 1970s and 1980s, as well as illegal gambling and loan sharking.

Shapiro acknowledged that the investigation was made more difficult by the cryptic nature of the Marcellos' conversations at the prison.

"They were often whispered, they used hand signals, they leaned close together when talking and routinely spoke ... in code," Shapiro said. The audio quality was often poor, and portions were unintelligible, he added.

Deputy marshal won praise

Ambrose, 38, a 10-year veteran of the Marshals Service, had been deputy commander of the Great Lakes Regional Fugitive Task Force for more than two years when he was placed on paid leave in September amid the investigation.

Federal authorities even conceded that Ambrose had a stellar law-enforcement career until the allegations surfaced.

A front-page story in the Tribune in 2000 detailed how Ambrose had led the eight-month manhunt that ended in the capture of a high-ranking Gangster Disciple who was working in a cheese factory in Wisconsin.

"He used to find people no one else could find really," said U.S. District Judge Charles Kocoras. "There was no question about his ability."

Tom Ptak, Ambrose's father-in-law and a retired Chicago police detective, said, "He's a very, very good man, and he does a very good job, and he loves his family." Ambrose is married and has four children.

mo'connor@tribune.com

Fatal Raid Linked To Lies For Warrant In Drug Case (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

ATLANTA, Jan. 11 — A narcotics team that shot and killed an elderly woman while raiding her home lied to obtain the search warrant, one team member has told federal investigators, according to news reports confirmed by a person familiar with the investigation who requested anonymity.

The officers falsely claimed that a confidential informant had bought $50 worth of crack at the house, the team member, Gregg Junnier, told the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Mr. Junnier retired from the Atlanta Police Department last week.

The story backs up statements by Alex White, a police informant, who said that after the shooting the police had asked him to claim, falsely, that he had bought crack at the modest home of the woman, Kathryn Johnston, whose age has been reported as both 88 and 92.

Ms. Johnston, pictured wearing a birthday crown in a widely used photograph, quickly became Exhibit A for complaints of excessive force by the police, prompting packed, angry town-hall-style meetings, accusations of systematic civil rights violations and calls for civilian review of police shootings in Atlanta.

The incident has also demoralized a police force where the number of narcotics officers has dwindled while, some critics say, pressure to make arrests has increased.

"The rest of the world is now hearing from the mouths of the police officers involved what we knew all along," said the Rev. Markel Hutchins, a spokesman for Ms. Johnston's relatives, who have maintained that she had nothing to do with illegal drugs and that neither her house nor her basement, which had a separate entrance, was used by dealers.

Spokesmen with the F.B.I.'s Atlanta office and the United States attorney here declined to comment. The shooting occurred on Nov. 21, after three members of the narcotics team arrested a suspected street marijuana dealer, Fabian Sheats, who said he could help the officers hook a bigger fish.

Mr. Sheats pointed out Ms. Johnston's house on Neal Street, near a high-crime area, saying a dealer there had a kilogram of cocaine. The officers, according to the reports of Mr. Junnier's account, tried to get an informant to the house to make a drug buy. But when that effort hit a snag, a request for a search warrant was drawn up anyway.

The paper, signed by Officer J. R. Smith, one of the three officers who made the arrest, claimed that a buy had been made from a dealer named Sam, and that a "no-knock" warrant was needed because Sam had security cameras outside the house — another detail that was fabricated, according to the accounts of what Mr. Junnier told the F.B.I.

Mr. Smith's lawyer, JohnGarland, declined to comment.

After a judge signed the warrant, the officers pried open Ms. Johnston's burglar bars and broke down her door. She responded with gunshots from a handgun that neighbors said she kept for defense. The officers, three of whom were injured, returned fire and killed her. No cocaine was found.

Mr. Junnier's lawyer, Rand Csehy, confirmed that his client was cooperating with investigators. William McKenney, a lawyer for Arthur Tesler, the third officer involved in the arrest, said his client would also cooperate.

Illinois Doctor Sentenced For Illegal Prescribing Over Net (IDG)

By Grant Gross

IDG News Service, January 12, 2007

He prescribed more than 62 million doses of drugs, the DOJ says

January 11, 2007 (IDG News Service) -- An Illinois doctor was sentenced today to more than three years in prison for illegally prescribing drugs over the Internet, the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) said.

Michael Millette, 46, of Crystal Lake, Ill., is the ninth doctor to be sentenced in an Internet pharmacy investigation conducted by the U.S. Attorney's office for the Northern District of Iowa. U.S. District Judge Linda Reade sentenced Millette to 41 months in prison and a $1.6 million fine.

Millette pleaded guilty in July to conspiring to dispense Schedule III and Schedule IV controlled substances without a legitimate medical purpose and outside the usual course of medical practice. He also pleaded guilty to laundering proceeds of the illegal prescriptions.

Schedule III drugs are classified in the U.S. as those with potential for moderate physical dependence and include anabolic steroids, codeine and some barbiturates. Schedule IV drugs have the potential for limited physical dependence and include Valium and Xanax, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

During his plea hearing, Millette said he prescribed more than 62 million doses of drugs illegally over the Internet, the DOJ said in a statement. Millette also said he laundered the money he received from the Internet companies that employed him.

Millette has also pleaded guilty to charges from the Middle District of Florida, where he was charged with a separate drug conspiracy related to the Internet distribution of Schedule III and Schedule IV controlled substances, the DOJ said. The Florida charges were transferred to the Northern District of Iowa for a consolidated sentencing.

It is illegal for a doctor to prescribe controlled substances unless the prescription is based on a legitimate doctor/patient relationship, the DOJ said. Many of the drugs Millette prescribed online are "addictive and dangerous if abused," the DOJ said.

The DOJ said it has made it a priority to crack down on Internet pharmacies because of the potential for death or serious injury if the drugs are not monitored by doctors.

Doctors from Connecticut, Florida, Louisiana and New York have also been sentenced to probation or prison terms in the investigation. Three doctors have pleaded guilty to related charges and are awaiting sentencing.

Among the doctors already sentenced, Millette faces the longest prison sentence and the largest forfeiture of prescription profits.

'Ecstasy' Dealer Sent To Prison (FLJOURNAL)

By Kim Crawford

Flint Journal (MI), January 12, 2007

A Flushing business owner will spend more than seven years in federal prison for his role in importing tens of thousands of "ecstasy" pills between 2001 and 2004.

Jared Petiprin, 31, owner of Five Star Auto and Jeep Outfitters, a used car dealership and customizing business, pleaded guilty in September to conspiracy to distribute a controlled substance. On Wednesday, he was sentenced to 87 months in prison by U.S. District Judge Paul V. Gadola.

Petiprin sobbed as he apologized to his family and customers.

"I feel as though they will be punished more than I am," he said before he was sentenced.

Petiprin is the latest - but not necessarily the last - in a string of defendants involved in the large-scale distribution and sale of "ecstasy" or cocaine who were charged in an investigation by the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Department of Homeland Security-Immigration Customs Enforcement over the past two years.

Michael P. Manley, Petiprin's attorney, said his client had voluntarily gotten out of the drug business to start legitimate businesses, while others who were charged in the case stayed involved in drugs. Manley also noted Petiprin was losing "everything" he had - his wife, his infant son and the businesses he built.

Gadola said he was impressed that Petiprin had good track records as a worker and a businessman, and that he had no prior criminal involvement. But Petiprin's involvement in drugs was "a despicable course of conduct," the judge said.

Court records show that the cases against Petiprin and nine other defendants who were indicted in 2004 began when Hugh V. Poteat III of Flint was stopped at the border in Detroit, coming back from Canada in June of 2001. He was arrested and charged when drugs were found in his vehicle, and he was ultimately sentenced to 18 months in prison.

Manley said Poteat and Petiprin were roommates when Poteat was arrested. Court documents show that U.S. authorities moved to have Poteat's prison sentenced reduced because of his cooperation with investigators.

An investigation showed that a group of men imported and distributed thousands of ecstasy pills from Canada around southeastern Michigan over the past few years.

Since Poteat's arrest - and before Petiprin pleaded guilty in the fall - nine other men were indicted in 2004. Manley noted that the other suspects, all of whom pleaded guilty over the past two years, received less prison time than federal sentencing guidelines suggested for Petiprin. Those men and their sentences were:

Stuart Waitman, 75 months; Matthew Kachman, 84 months; Michael Kuhlman, 37 months; Jason Minteer, 12 months; Dustin Wells, 60 months; Eric Bootz, 24 months; Shawn Gleason, 12 months; Mark Hoffman, 36 months; and Jordan Vandesteene, 23 months.

Petiprin's sentence is the heaviest given so far, but Manley said he could serve less than the full 87 months if he completes drug treatment and maintains good behavior while incarcerated.

Petiprin's family reacted emotionally to his sentence, with some crying and at least one man cursing.

In May 2005, federal agents raided Petiprin's businesses at 1519 E. Pierson Road. At that time, Petiprin told reporters the ICE agents were investigating one of his former employees, while agents declined to comment.

Cocaine Cowboys Corralled (CAPN9)

By Ken Jubie

Capital News 9, January 12, 2007

The Cocaine Cowboys are outlaws no more. Ten Members of the New York City based gang have been indicted on felony charges of conspiracy to distribute a controlled substance.

DOJ_NMG_0115813

"We were able to attack and take down an entire organization that were distributing cocaine in this particular area," said Albany County Assistant District Attorney Francisco Calderone.

They said the drug gang was peddling between one and two kilos of crack and coke from the city into the Capital Region every two weeks, moving about $40,000 worth of the drugs each week.

But, they weren't selling on the streets. They sold to other drug dealers and made their headquarters in a house on Utica Avenue in Colonie.

"The idea behind the business is, would be just like a pizzeria if you called and ordered product. They would solicit orders and then agree on making deliveries," Calderone said.

People living on Utica Avenue said it's pretty quiet and safe.

That's why it's surprising to find out a drug gang set up shop just down the street.

"When I heard about it, I was just absolutely shocked. I was surprised. I did not even know that that was going on, and I only live a couple houses away," said Antoinette Randall.

"There was not a lot of traffic. It wasn't like there were different cars parked there all the time or that kind of thing. So, it didn't draw a lot of attention," said Mary D'Ambrosio.

But, D'Ambrosio did notice lots of different people coming and going, and neighbors said, in hindsight, there were some unusual things happening.

Still, investigators said the Cocaine Cowboys ran a sophisticated operation.

"These people were embedded in our suburban community. They were well-disciplined. They did nothing to draw attention to themselves," said Albany County District Attorney David Soares.

That low profile is why Soares said it took the collaborative efforts of state and local law enforcers and the DEA during the past six months to corral the Cocaine Cowboys.

10 Charged In Narcotics Raids (ALBANYTU)

By Jordan Carleo-evangelist, Staff Writer

Albany Times Union, January 12, 2007

Latham rental home allegedly was outpost for well-organized operation

ALBANY -- A Bronx-based drug syndicate with the trappings of a corporate empire -- rewarding hard work with end-of-year bonuses and punishing poor performance with fines -- was upended by police raids over the last week, authorities said.

Ten alleged members, who prosecutors say moved as much as $100,000 in crack and cocaine through the region every two weeks, were indicted Wednesday in federal court.

The probe that began with street-level buys last summer uncovered a crew with a reverence for corporate culture and adherence to a strict code of conduct, prosecutors said.

Workers who routinely ferried drugs were given cash bonuses for avoiding speeding tickets and contact with police. Others, overheard on wiretaps, lobbied for promotions to management positions, prosecutors said.

"If you took a business trip on behalf of the organization, you could get reimbursed," said Francisco Calderon, an assistant Albany County prosecutor. He and colleague Eric Galarneau, both members of the street crimes unit, steered the far-reaching investigation from the Albany district attorney's office.

Shunning the competition and prying police eyes in the region's cities, the group set up a branch office in a bland, white rental house in suburban Latham, near the hamlet's trademark checkered water tower.

Authorities said they targeted the Albany area in part to capitalize on the price markup available far from saturated downstate drug markets.

"It was only getting more sophisticated and larger," said Galarneau, adding that the group appeared to idolize the so-called Cocaine Cowboys: Colombian drug rings that infiltrated Miami in the 1980s and are said to have inspired the movie "Scarface." A copy of a new documentary on the drug rings was found in their safe house, authorities said.

Since late August, the case swelled from a series of street-level buys around the Capital Region, leading investigators up the group's so-called corporate ladder.

By 10 p.m. Friday, authorities were lying in wait, knowing that a significant shipment was scheduled to head north. That night, on the I-90 ramp to I-787, police intercepted a van with three alleged workers and more than two pounds of crack and cocaine stashed in a customized dashboard hideaway.

Almost simultaneously, police and federal agents raided the Latham house, at 6 Utica Ave., where they arrested another alleged member and seized what they describe as business records, digital scales and other tools of the drug trade.

From that house, workers rotating from downstate would field orders from what prosecutors describe as independent contractors: sellers who would purchase relatively large amounts for re-sale across the region.

The crew's most active days were early in the work week, prosecutors said. On others, they offered specials on certain drugs, "part of that business mentality," Calderon said.

The integrity of the safe house was paramount, he said. No buyers were allowed near it, and workers returning from deliveries were required to make several random stops. An open garage door would be waiting at the home.

Just hours before the shipment was overtaken Friday, the crew's alleged ringleader, Juan P. "China" Montalvo, 24, was arrested on an unrelated gun charge in the Bronx, Calderon said.

Apparently fearing search warrants might follow, several of Montalvo's downstate confederates went to his apartment to clear it of evidence, authorities said.

Agents from the federal Drug Enforcement Administration were waiting for them outside, seizing, among other things, two guns and a large amount of cash, Calderon said. He credited the DEA, troopers, and police from Albany, Watervliet and Colonie with making the coordinated arrests work.

State Police Investigator Christopher Gilroy and DEA Special Agent Terrance Dunlap played a large role in building the case, which spanned months and 140 miles of Thruway, he said.

Wiretaps and surveillance had tipped authorities to the shipment allegedly arranged by Omar Astacio, the 26-year-old man authorities say kept a tight watch on the ring's finances. The rental property, its cable television service and several vehicles were in his name.

Authorities first thought the shipment was headed toward Albany's downtown bus terminal, but the carrier instead took a train to Rensselaer. He and two others were the ones stopped on I-90.

Jonathan "Smoke" Gordon, the group's local leader, was arrested the same night in Watervliet, prosecutors said.

Prosecutors said the group has not been linked to any specific acts of violence, but Calderon said the two guns seized from Montalvo's Bronx home show they were willing to defend the business.

At least in the short term, the arrests "put a major stranglehold" on the flow of cocaine here, he said. Once the group's hierarchy was revealed, "it was a matter of figuring out who's who," he added.

Targeting the organizations that supply Albany's drug markets has increasingly become a priority, Calderon said. "David Soares' objective has been to have us work on larger, long-term investigations."

The case has been handed over to the U.S. Attorney's Office. All 10 defendants, all of whom are being held in Albany County jail without bail, are expected to be arraigned today in U.S. District Court.

Jordan Carleo-Evangelist can be reached at 454-5445 or by e-mail at jcarleo-evangelist@ timesunion.com.

The suspects

Addresses for the 10 people charged were not immediately available. All were indicted Wednesday in federal court for allegedly conspiring to distribute crack and cocaine.

Juan P. ``China" Montalvo, 24, the alleged leader, based in the Bronx. Arrested early Friday on a gun charge authorities say was unrelated to the drug sweep.

Omar Astacio, 26; authorities say he was a manager who tightly controlled the group's finances. The van stopped Friday was registered to him at an address on Third Street in Albany.

Jonathan ``Smoke" Gordon, 25, was arrested in Watervliet. Authorities say he was the local manager for the drug operation, overseeing activity at the Latham safe house.

Joey ``Crack" Corretjer Jr., 23, was arrested at the group's Latham stash house. He is alleged to have been one of the workers who made deliveries ``like ordering a pizza."

DOJ_NMG_0115815

Morris S. Alvarez, 23, was arrested Friday night in the van stopped on Interstate 90. He gave police an address in the Bronx.

Sean Torres, 26, was also arrested in the traffic stop in Albany. He gave police an address in the Griswold Heights Apartments in Troy.

Jean C. Gonzalez, 25, was arrested with Sean Torres and Alvarez. He gave police a Bronx address and was one of five of the defendants arraigned Saturday in Albany City Court.

Anthony Torres, age not immediately available, was arrested in the Bronx with several others. Authorities said they were trying to clear evidence from a Bronx apartment.

Joan Ogando-Ramirez, age not immediately available, was also arrested in the Bronx by agents from the federal Drug Enforcement Administration.

Yadira Polanco, age not immediately available. Authorities said she is Montalvo's girlfriend and was among those arrested while trying to clear out the Bronx apartment.

Source: court records and prosecutors

Operation Cocaine Cowboys: Massive Drug Pipeline Busted (WTEN)

WTEN-TV,, January 12, 2007

Major Drug Pipeline from NYC to Latham Busted

Police say what operated as a "delivery service" for dealers around the area, is now out of business.

That pipeline began down in New York City, and shipped drugs up the Thruway to Latham. Police say in order to distribute the goods, the dealers set up what they call a "satellite base" right here in the Capital Region, on Utica Avenue in Latham.

It was from that home that police say the dealers did so much business, they managed to take in more than 30-grand in just four days. NEWS10's Latricia Thomas explains how police busted the business.

It is a quiet street in Latham - in fact, a quiet house.

"I never saw any activity there, never...in the daytime anyway," says neighbor, Beatrice Vinciguerra.

But authorities say what was going on inside, was elaborate and planned out, allegedly by 10 suspects - operated exactly like a well-oiled business.

"They were a very organized and structured group, in that they wanted to follow a business model," says Francisco Calderone, with the Albany County District Attorney's Office.

A business model that investigators say cycled one to two-kilos every two weeks.

"The idea behind the business would be just like a pizzeria...if you ordered, called and ordered product, they would solicit deliveries, and then go to that specific address," Calderone says.

It was a smooth operation, until last Friday, when police say the group brought cocaine up from the city by train, and got busted at a traffic stop.

"It is not just a simple individual or a simple drug courier who was arrested in connection with this case, but an entire organization," says Eric Galerneau, with the Albany County D.A.'s Office.

All 10 suspects were arraigned in Federal Court Thursday. Their case is now being handled by the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Federal Fugitive Found In Morgan County Jail (AP)

AP, January 12, 2007

DECATUR, Ala. (AP) — A Morgan County sheriff's investigator helped find a federal fugitive who was already jailed in the county under a false name.

A federal grand jury indicted Ulises Torres Cruz, 31, in July on charges of conspiracy to traffic methamphetamine as part of a major drug trafficking organization in North Alabama.

But authorities could not find Cruz and he was placed on the Drug Enforcement Administration's most wanted list.

Investigator Jim England saw a picture of Cruz on the list and thought he looked like a man who had been arrested by Decatur police in February on charges of trafficking methamphetamine.

The man had told police his name was Martin Contera Vera, but Huntsville DEA agents confirmed that Vera and Cruz were the same person.

Jill Ellis, a spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office, said Cruz will be arraigned in U.S. District Court and will be put in line for the regular court schedule.

Cruz had been in the Morgan County Jail on June 27 when authorities seized tons of drugs throughout North Alabama and made 29 arrests.

U.S. Attorney Alice Martin said the investigation brought down a ring allegedly run by Oscar Xicotencah Salomon, 34, of Decatur.

Ellis didn't believe the federal charges would supersede felony charges filed locally, but said that the matter could depend on whether the county arrested Cruz as a result of a connection with the Salomon ring.

Federal Fugitive Found In Jail Here (DECDAILY)

By Seth Burkett

The Decatur Daily, January 12, 2007

A Morgan County sheriff's investigator exposed a man arrested locally under an assumed name as a fugitive on the Drug Enforcement Administration's most wanted list this week.

When a federal grand jury indicted Ulises Torres Cruz, 31, in July on charges of conspiracy to traffic in methamphetamine as part of a major drug trafficking organization in North Alabama, authorities apparently were unaware that Cruz had already been jailed by local authorities months earlier under the alias Martin Contera Vera.

Decatur police had arrested Vera on charges of trafficking in methamphetamine in February.

He was in the Morgan County Jail on June 27 while teams of federal and local authorities descended on homes and safe houses in Decatur, Hartselle, Huntsville, Madison, Limestone County and Cullman County, seizing tons of drugs and making 29 arrests in the course of the day.

The effort brought down a drug trafficking ring allegedly run by Oscar Xicotencah Salomon, 34, of Decatur, U.S. Attorney Alice H. Martin said. Martin said Salomon's alleged organization brought drugs into the U.S. from Mexico through the Texas border.

Investigator's discovery

The diligence of an investigator on the county drug task force helped federal agents finally locate Cruz, who was considered a fugitive.

Investigator Jim England occasionally digs back through cases to check arrests against federal wanted lists, said Chief Deputy Mike Corley.

"From time to time, he has a guy that is on the most wanted list by the feds. In checking that, just as he randomly does, he saw a picture of a subject on there that he thought he recognized," Corley said.

Corley said England forwarded the Sheriff's Department's information on Vera to DEA agents in Huntsville, who confirmed that Vera and Cruz were the same person.

"They will place a hold on him, and he will be brought over for arraignment in U.S. District Court. He'll be put in line for the regular court schedule," said Jill Ellis, a spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office.

Ellis said she didn't believe the federal charges would supercede felony charges filed locally, but said that the matter could depend upon whether Cruz was arrested by Morgan County as a result of a connection with the Salomon ring.

"It depends on when they picked him up and what he was doing. What the genesis of their charges was," she said.

More Drugs, Fewer Narcs (TIME)

By Brian Bennett

Time, January 12, 2007

Though the global drugÂ trade is heating up, expect a lighter U.S. enforcement presence on the streets. The White House's Office of National Drug Control Policy estimates that opium production in Afghanistan, which not only provides 90% of the heroin consumed globally but also funds Taliban activities, rose 61% last year over 2005. Some 670 tons of heroin are expected to flood the market, and that should slash the street price of a kilo of Southwest Asian heroin, now about $90,000 in Los Angeles. Yet the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA), which annually loses some 3% of its 5,000 agents to attrition, has a two-year hiring freeze because of budget cuts to U.S. programs. DEA bean counters say they would need an additional $12 million to maintain current agent levels. The DEA's overseas funding has increased, but overall, DEA chief financial officer Frank Kalder admits, "there will be less drug enforcement going on. There's no getting around that."

General James Jones, who worked in Afghanistan, calls the cuts "astounding." But other experts think it's wasteful to crack down on drug dealers without reducing drug use. In other words, manage both sides of the problem. Narcs or not, the new crop hits streets this spring.

Nation's Drug Czar Lauds Wayne County's Handling Of Fentanyl Cases (DEN)

By Ronald J. Hansen

Detroit News, January 12, 2007

DETROIT -- The nation's drug czar commended Wayne County officials Thursday for their teamwork with others last year during a rash of drug overdoses from the powerful painkiller fentanyl.

"Your collaboration as a group was outstanding," said John P. Walters, Director of the White House Office of National Drug Policy. "You saved lives and you helped save lives in other places."

Fentanyl overdoses killed at least 179 people in Wayne County in the first 11 months last year, officials said. The problem here became apparent after county officials had 12 overdoses in a 24-hour period. Officials across the country later realized fentanyl overdoses surged across the Midwest, from Pennsylvania to Chicago beginning in the fall of 2005.

The death toll in Wayne County peaked in May and June, prompting county authorities to work with health and law enforcement to raise awareness of the problem.

The Fentanyl Substance Abuse Work Group, as it is known, still meets in an effort to rein in fentanyl-related overdoses. Fentanyl overdoses dropped to as little as eight in August, but rose again in October and November to 18 and 16, respectively.

Walters said it is unclear whether the continuing fentanyl deaths are attributable to a sizable production of the drug that is still in circulation or if others are manufacturing it.

Those killed last year typically overdosed by unwittingly taking heroin or cocaine laced with fentanyl. The drug is considered 80 times more powerful than morphine and can cause instant death.

You can reach Ronald J. Hansen at (313) 222-2019 or rhansen@detnews.com.

U.S. Drug Czar Praises Detroit's Fentanyl Battle (FREEP)

By Jim Schaefer, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, January 12, 2007

U.S. drug czar John Walters met with and praised Wayne County officials Thursday who have battled a deadly epidemic of fentanyl deaths that hit the area over the past 15 months, but warned there is more work to do amid a continuing string of deaths.

“You helped save lives and you helped save lives in other places,” Walters told the gathering of county and state public health and law enforcement officials. The fentanyl work group, as it is called, comes together once a month to compare notes about fentanyl’s status in Wayne County, which has had the largest number of identified fentanyl-related deaths in Michigan.

The group came together after 12 people died in overdoses involving the powerful painkiller during a 24-hour period in May. The deaths punctuated a trend that began nine months earlier, when clandestinely produced fentanyl began showing up in combination with heroin and cocaine in some U.S. cites, including Detroit.

Walters blamed the initial delay in recognizing the outbreak here and nationwide to the lack of a national reporting system for such drug epidemics.

At today's gathering, at the Wayne County Medical Examiner’s Office in Detroit, Walters asked the work group for its advice on how to create standards for reporting and gathering of information that could spot emerging drug epidemics sooner.

From September 2005 through November 2006, about 218 drug overdoses in Wayne County were linked to fentanyl, according to the medical examiner’s office.

Oakland County, which also handles Genessee County cases, counted 75 such deaths for the same time period, with most occurring in Oakland. In Macomb County, about 20 deaths were identified over that period.

Contact Jim Schaefer at 313-223-4542 or jschaefer@freepress.com.

DOJ_NMG_0115818

Bonds Named In Test Reports (LAT)

By Bill Shaikin, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2007

He doesn't admit or deny positive results last season for amphetamine but apologizes to Giants and teammate allegedly blamed by slugger.

The first player to reportedly test positive under baseball's new amphetamine ban is Barry Bonds, the one most prominently associated with a federal investigation into steroid abuse — and the one on the verge of breaking one of the sport's most cherished records.

Bonds' test result from last season was first reported Thursday by the New York Daily News. Although the disclosure revived concern about whether players could trust promises of confidentiality in drug testing, the San Francisco Chronicle reported Thursday that Bonds himself shared news of the test result within the San Francisco Giants' clubhouse.

"Barry is the guy who went around telling everybody he tested positive," a baseball source told the Chronicle.

Bonds initially blamed the positive test on a substance he took from the locker of teammate Mark Sweeney, the papers reported.

Bonds issued a statement Thursday in which he did not confirm, deny or address the positive test but did apologize to the Giants and their fans in general and Sweeney in particular.

"He is both my teammate and my friend," Bonds said. "He did not give me anything whatsoever and has nothing to do with this matter, contrary to recent reports."

Under baseball's current drug policy, players testing positive for amphetamines are not publicly identified after a first offense but are subject to counseling and additional testing. Players are suspended 25 games upon a second positive test and 80 games upon a third.

Players testing positive for steroids are suspended 50 games for a first offense and 100 games for a second offense.

Sweeney often stood up for Bonds in interviews last season; he paid for engraved champagne glasses to toast Bonds in May, after the slugger passed Babe Ruth and moved into second place on the all-time home run list, according to MLB.com.

"He did not give anything to anybody and he doesn't have anything illegal," the agent for Sweeney, Barry Axelrod, told the Associated Press.

The disclosure thrusts more turbulence into Bonds' flight toward the record. He needs 22 home runs to pass Hank Aaron atop the all-time list.

But he went virtually unwanted as a free agent this winter, and with the Giants finally agreeing Dec. 7 to bring him back for one year, at $16 million. However, the contract has yet to be finalized because of reported disputes over whether the team would continue to provide clubhouse access to Bonds' associates and could penalize him if legal issues force him to miss games.

A San Francisco grand jury is investigating whether Bonds committed perjury in 2003 when he testified he had not knowingly used steroids. In December, an appellate court ruled prosecutors in the case could have access to the names of about 100 players who tested positive for steroids in 2003, a year in which players were promised test results would remain confidential. The players' union vowed to challenge the ruling.

One union official on Thursday called the disclosure of Bonds' positive amphetamine test "disconcerting" but wouldn't confirm or deny the result.

Baseball began testing for amphetamines last season, with 30 stimulants on the banned list. Gary Wadler, a New York physician and advisor to the World Anti-Doping Agency, said baseball officials could best attack amphetamine use by releasing which stimulants resulted in positive tests — and how many — without violating the confidentiality of first offenders.

"The Bonds thing is really a metaphor for a much bigger problem," Wadler said. "You need to quantify the problem. That kind of information is very helpful if you're going to seriously address this."

Rob Manfred, baseball's executive vice president in charge of labor relations, said the drug policy prevented him from disclosing how many players tested positive, and for which stimulants.

That information is shared, he added, with medical advisors selected jointly by the commissioner's office and the union.

"There's no real need to make that information public," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0115819

bill.shaikin@latimes.com

Barry Bonds Comes To Teammate's Defense (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 12, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Barry Bonds said he did not get amphetamines from teammate Mark Sweeney, but did not deny a report Thursday saying he tested positive for the drugs last season. According to a story in the New York Daily News, the San Francisco slugger failed an amphetamines test in 2006. The newspaper reported that when first informed of the positive result, Bonds attributed it to a substance he had taken from Sweeney's locker.

Thursday, Bonds did not deny that but did apologize to Sweeney.

"He is both my teammate and my friend," Bonds said in a statement. "He did not give me anything whatsoever and has nothing to do with this matter, contrary to recent reports.

"I want to express my deepest apologies especially to Mark and his family as well as my other teammates, the San Francisco Giants organization and the fans," he said.

That's all the Giants star, shadowed by steroids allegations and only 22 home runs from breaking Hank Aaron's career home run record, said about the alleged positive drug test. Bonds has steadfastly denied used performance-enhancing drugs.

"Obviously, we're pleased that Barry has straightened this out," said Sweeney's agent, Barry Axelrod.

Bonds' reported positive test could be another snag in contract negotiations with the Giants. The sides reached a preliminary agreement on a $16 million, one-year contract Dec. 7, but the seven-time NL MVP still hasn't signed the deal or taken the mandatory physical that is part of the process.

The sides have been working to finalize complicated language in the contract that concerns the left fielder's compliance with team rules, as well as what would happen if he were to be indicted or have other legal troubles.

"Last night was the first time we heard of this recent accusation against Barry Bonds," the Giants said in the statement. "Under Major League Baseball's collective bargaining agreement with the Major League Baseball Players Association, clubs are not notified after a player receives a first positive test for amphetamines."

Rob Manfred, baseball's executive vice president for labor relations, refused comment, according to spokesman Rich Levin.

"I don't comment on the drug program, and I've never heard Barry Bonds blame anybody for anything," Gene Orza, the union's chief operating officer, said in an e-mail to The Associated Press.

San Francisco's front office and fan base long have stood by Bonds through his off-the-field problems and injuries. So have his teammates, deciding in spring training last year to support him every step of the way.

"There are so many substances out there right now you don't know what you should take or what you should not," Giants shortstop Omar Vizquel said Thursday. "Right now, I'm afraid to take vitamins for the same reason. You don't know what's going to be positive or what's going to be negative. The best way for players is to stay natural. Anything with chemicals in it can be bad. I know what I do. I don't know what the other guys do, and I don't really care.

"I tell the younger guys, but you don't need to be telling Barry Bonds and Mark Sweeney what they should take or what they should not."

There's a long history of amphetamines -- or speed and more commonly called "greenies" in the baseball world -- fueling generations of baseball players. Many turned to the stimulants for a way to get pepped up when their bodies couldn't do so on their own during a long season.

The pills, widely used even until recently, helped with energy for day games following night games and other times when players were short on sleep, such as after a long cross-country flight.

Baseball banned the uppers for the first time starting last season. A player is not identified until after failing two amphetamines tests, which also results in a 25-game suspension. The first failed steroids test, by comparison, is a 50-game suspension.

A first amphetamines offense, however, does require six additional drug tests over the following six months.

DOJ_NMG_0115820

Baseball commissioner Bud Selig wouldn't address the report directly.

"Amphetamines have been around for seven or eight decades and this is the first time on the advice of doctors, trainers and everybody else that we dealt with it," he said. "We banned amphetamines and that's very significant and we're going to continue to monitor it all very closely."

Selig did say management and the union discussed the report Thursday."

"I think maybe they have some suspicion on how it leaked out," he said.

Bonds did not appeal the positive test, according to the Daily News, which said Sweeney learned of Bonds' positive test from Orza. The newspaper reported Orza told Sweeney he should remove any troublesome substances from his locker and should not share said substances. Sweeney then said there was nothing of concern in his locker.

Before Bonds' statement, Axelrod told the AP that his client received a call informing him that his name had come up in regard to the testing.

"He responded at that time ... he did not give anything to anybody and he doesn't have anything illegal," Axelrod said. "That was the end of it, as far as we were concerned, until yesterday. We thought it was just a sort of procedural thing."

A federal grand jury is investigating whether Bonds perjured himself when he testified in 2003 in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroid distribution case that he hadn't knowingly taken any performance-enhancing drugs. He told that 2003 grand jury he believed his trainer, Greg Anderson, had given him flaxseed oil and arthritic balm, not steroids.

Bonds, who's coming off October surgery on his troublesome left elbow, played regularly in 2006.

After missing all but 14 games in 2005 following three operations on his right knee, Bonds batted .270 with 26 homers and 77 RBIs in 130 games last year. He passed Babe Ruth to move into second place on the career home run list May 28.

Bonds has spent 14 of his 21 big league seasons with San Francisco and helped the Giants draw 3 million fans in all seven seasons in their waterfront ballpark. The team is counting on him to be part of the hype leading up to its hosting of the All-Star game in July.

Bonds said he noticed an improved vibe in the clubhouse last season with the additions of Steve Finley, Sweeney and Todd Greene. The slugger was more sociable too, playing cards or chess with his teammates or trainers before games -- and even making a rare appearance in the team photo.

Bonds and Sweeney appeared to be good friends, with Sweeney speaking to the slugger by phone recently this offseason.

"This year we had the best chemistry on the team. I felt like the team was clicking," Vizquel said. "It's sad a stupid instance like this might rupture something that was going pretty good. I don't think the players will turn on each other. We are a veteran team. We should know what (substance) is good and what is bad."

AP Baseball Writer Ronald Blum in New York and AP Sports Writer Colin Fly in Milwaukee contributed to this report.

Bonds: No Amphetamines From Teammate (USAT)

By Bob Nightengale, Usa Today

USA Today, January 12, 2007

Barry Bonds said he did not get amphetamines from teammate Mark Sweeney, but the San Francisco Giants slugger did not deny a report Thursday saying he tested positive for the drugs last season.

COMMENTARY: Lopresti on the continuing Bonds saga

Earlier Thursday, four people with knowledge of the test results told USA TODAY that Bonds, who already is under investigation by the federal government for perjury, tested positive for the use of amphetamines last summer.

In a statement reported by the Associated Press, Bonds said that Sweeney, "is both my teammate and my friend. He did not give me anything whatsoever and has nothing to do with this matter, contrary to recent reports.

"I want to express my deepest apologies especially to Mark and his family as well as my other teammates, the San Francisco Giants organization and the fans," Bonds said.

Bonds was told of the test result last August, according to a person close to Bonds.

SPORTS SCOPE: Readers react.

DOJ_NMG_0115821

The four people with knowledge of the test results requested anonymity because players who test positive for amphetamines the first time under Major League Baseball's policy are not publicly identified.

Jeff Borris, Bonds' agent, declined comment Thursday. When asked in August by USA TODAY whether he could confirm an anonymous person's rumor that Bonds tested positive, he said: "Are you asking me whether Barry tested positive? Sorry, I can't answer that. I'm not going to confirm or deny that."

Bonds, who had a private meeting Thursday afternoon with Borris in Beverly Hills, Calif., also did not comment.

Bonds, according to Thursday's New York Daily News, never denied taking amphetamines but when informed of his positive test told baseball authorities he took the amphetamines out of Sweeney's locker. Sweeney denied the accusation, and told USA TODAY he confronted Bonds about it.

"I asked him why my name would be out there," Sweeney said. "I told him that I didn't understand why my name was even being talked about. He told me it was a misunderstanding."

Sweeney said Gene Orza, chief operating officer of the players association, informed him his name had surfaced in reference to Bonds' drug test.

"If you have anything like that in your locker, get rid of it," Orza told Sweeney, according to Barry Axelrod, Sweeney's agent. "Mark said, 'I don't know what you're talking about. I don't have anything or (haven't) given anything to anybody.'

"Mark has never tested positive, ever. What's unfortunate is that what is supposed to be confidential information somehow gets public. But Mark has never provided anything to Barry Bonds or anybody else. He's never had anything illegal in his locker or in his possession."

Orza declined comment on the conversation with Sweeney and said Bonds didn't implicate his teammate.

"Barry Bonds has never blamed anybody for anything as far as I know," Orza said. "I don't comment on the drug program at all. You know that. It's confidential."

Sweeney said he has never tested positive for amphetamines. He declined to divulge details of his conversation with Bonds.

"I think everything else has to come from his side," Sweeney said. "Barry's going to have to deal with all of that. I just don't understand why I'm even thrown into this. My mom, my dad and all my friends have to hear about this. It sucks. People don't know the true story. That's what bothers me.

"But the simple fact is that I'm perfectly comfortable what I've done and haven't done. I have nothing to be ashamed about. This isn't an issue of a guilty conscious. I've never done anything wrong. I respect the game. I have nothing to hide from."

Commissioner Bud Selig declined comment, and the Giants said they first learned of allegations against Bonds from the Daily News story on Wednesday night. Yet, at least two members of the Giants' front office were told of allegations last summer by USA TODAY.

"Last night was the first time we heard of this recent accusation against Barry Bonds," the Giants said in a statement. "Under Major League Baseball's collective bargaining agreement with Major League Baseball Players Association, clubs are not notified after a player receives a first positive test for amphetamines. ... Consistent with requirements of the basic agreement, the club will have no further comment on allegations with respect to any player's testing history."

Players are not publicly identified for a first positive test for amphetamines. They are subject to an additional six drug tests over a six-month period and receive treatment and counseling. Players who test positive a second time are subject to a 25-game suspension and an 80-game suspension for a third time.

For a positive test on steroids or other illegal performance-enhancing drugs, players receive a 50-game suspension.

The Giants and Borris refused to address whether the failed drug test will have a bearing on Bonds' contract. He agreed to a one-year, $16 million contract in December to return to the Giants, but it remains unsigned. The two sides had been working on details to determine whether Bonds would receive any compensation loss for games missed because of possible legal hearings, according to The Associated Press.

Contributing: Hal Bodley, Mel Antonen, Associated Press

3,000 Tests For Amphetamines, But Only Bonds Is In The Spotlight (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0115822

By Michael S. Schmidt

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

The statement was not a direct admission of guilt. But the 64 words attached to Barry Bonds's name last night will probably be viewed as an acknowledgment by the embattled 42-year-old outfielder that he indeed tested positive for amphetamines at some point in 2006, thus raising questions about his status for 2007.

In his statement, Bonds did not dispute an assertion in yesterday's Daily News that he had tested positive for the first time last season, an infraction that calls for follow-up tests but does not provide for a suspension or the disclosure of his name.

But now Bonds's name is out, along with a separate assertion in The Daily News that when he was first notified of the positive test he tried to pass the blame to a Giants teammate, the utility player Mark Sweeney, saying he had taken a substance from Sweeney's locker.

It was Sweeney who was the focus of Bonds's statement last night, with Bonds calling him "both my teammate and my friend."

"He did not give me anything whatsoever and has nothing to do with this matter, contrary to recent reports," the statement said. "I want to express my deepest apologies, especially to Mark and his family as well as my other teammates, the San Francisco Giants organization and the fans."

The statement does not directly deny that Bonds might have originally pointed to Sweeney as the source of his problem. That could create continuing problems for Bonds within a Giants clubhouse in which he has long operated by his own rules.

Bonds's criminal lawyer, Michael Rains, said his client was in Los Angeles yesterday, meeting with his agent, Jeff Borris, to discuss security issues surrounding the 2007 season, one in which Bonds will need 22 more home runs to pass Hank Aaron for the career home run mark.

Bonds is already a highly controversial figure, currently under investigation by a federal grand jury in connection with the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroid-distribution case. Although Bonds has reached a $16 million preliminary contract agreement with the Giants for 2007, it has not been completed, and it is conceivable that the Giants may attempt to walk away from the deal.

Barry Axelrod, the agent for Sweeney, confirmed yesterday in a telephone interview that Sweeney had been contacted last season and advised that his name had been brought up in connection "with something involving Bonds."

Who contacted Sweeney? "I wasn't privy to the conversation," Axelrod said. "He was contacted. I don't know if it was baseball or the union. We didn't get into the nature of the call. It was, 'Your name came up, hopefully, you don't have anything that would cause you problems.' He said he didn't.

If Bonds did test positive for amphetamines, it was as one of approximately 3,000 tests that baseball conducted last season for the stimulant, which has long been part of baseball's culture. Last season was the first time that baseball tested for amphetamines, with each player on the 40-man rosters of the 30 major league teams tested at least twice, and others tested more than that because of the 580 additional random tests provided for in the agreement between baseball and the players' association. Under the agreement, players who tested positive a first time would receive counseling and six follow-up tests over the next 12 months. Any player who tested positive twice would be publicly identified and suspended for 25 games.

In 2006, no player tested positive twice, so no one was punished. But if Bonds tested positive once, how many other players did, too? That answer is not publicly known because the testing agreement for amphetamines does not allow baseball to report the total number of first-time positive tests even though no players' names would be attached to the overall number.

Why? The reason apparently has to do with concern within baseball, and particularly in the union, that amphetamine use would not disappear quickly and that first-year testing might produce an embarrassing, number of first-time positive tests.

So what the number actually was for 2006 remains undisclosed. In contrast, there are no shields for players who test positive for steroids, whether they are first-time or repeat violators. They are identified and suspended, under guidelines that have been toughened several times. In all, 15 major leaguers and 119 minor leaguers tested positive for steroids over the past two seasons, with the number declining in 2006.

Under the amphetamine testing guidelines, when a player tests positive for the first time, only the player, the union, baseball's vice president for labor relations and a committee that oversees the testing program are to be informed.

DOJ_NMG_0115823

Even the player's team is supposed to be kept in the dark, which may be why the Giants issued a statement yesterday saying that "last night was the first time we heard of this recent accusation against Barry Bonds."

But now they know, and the question is what they intend to do.

Report Of Bonds' Failed Test Might Hinder Negotiations (AP)

Associated Press

AP, January 12, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Barry Bonds' reported positive test for amphetamines last season could be another snag in contract negotiations with the San Francisco Giants.

News of the failed test, reported Thursday in the Daily News, is the latest in a long list of allegations surrounding the slugger, who will face more questions this season about whether he used performance-enhancing drugs in his pursuit of Hank Aaron's home run record.

According to the report, Bonds failed an amphetamines test in 2006, then blamed it on a teammate. The New York City newspaper reported that when first informed of the positive result, Bonds attributed it to a substance he had taken from utilityman Mark Sweeney's locker.

Just when everybody thought the Giants were getting along well for a change.

Bonds is set to begin his 15th season with the Giants only 22 home runs shy of passing Aaron's career record of 755.

San Francisco and Bonds reached a preliminary agreement on a $16 million, one-year contract Dec. 7, the final day of baseball's winter meetings. But the seven-time NL MVP still hasn't signed the deal or taken the mandatory physical that is part of the process.

The sides have been working to finalize complicated language in the contract that concerns the left fielder's compliance with team rules, as well as what would happen if he were to be indicted or have other legal troubles.

Giants owner Peter Magowan and executive vice president Larry Baer did not immediately return calls for comment Thursday. Neither did Bonds' agent, Jeff Borris, Sweeney or his agent, Barry Axelrod. Borris repeatedly has declined to comment on specifics of the negotiations.

San Francisco's brass and fan base long have stood by Bonds through his off-the-field problems and injuries. So have his teammates, deciding in spring training last year to support him every step of the way.

"There are so many substances out there right now you don't know what you should take or what you should not," Giants shortstop Omar Vizquel said Thursday. "Right now, I'm afraid to take vitamins for the same reason. You don't know what's going to be positive or what's going to be negative. The best way for players is to stay natural. Anything with chemicals in it can be bad. I know what I do. I don't know what the other guys do, and I don't really care.

"I tell the younger guys, but you don't need to be telling Barry Bonds and Mark Sweeney what they should take or what they should not."

There's a long history of amphetamines -- or speed and more commonly called greenies in the baseball world -- fueling generations of baseball players. Many turned to the stimulants for a way to get pepped up when their bodies couldn't do so on their own during a long season. The pills, widely used even until recently, helped with energy for day games following night games and other times when players were short on sleep, such as after a long cross-country flight.

Baseball banned the uppers for the first time starting last season. A player is not identified until after failing two amphetamines tests, which also results in a 25-game suspension. The first failed steroids test, by comparison, is a 50-game suspension.

A first amphetamines offense, however, does require six additional drug tests over the following six months.

Bonds did not appeal the positive test, according to the Daily News, which said Sweeney learned of Bonds' positive test from players association chief Gene Orza. He told Sweeney, the paper said, that he should remove any troublesome substances from his locker and should not share said substances. Sweeney then said there was nothing of concern in his locker.

Bonds, who has denied using steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs, long has been under the microscope. A federal grand jury is investigating whether he perjured himself when he testified in 2003 in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroid distribution case that he hadn't knowingly taken any performance-enhancing drugs. He told that 2003 grand jury he believed his trainer, Greg Anderson, had given him flaxseed oil and arthritic balm, not steroids.

DOJ_NMG_0115824

Bonds, who's coming off October surgery on his troublesome left elbow, played regularly in 2006 -- 130 games -- even appearing in day games that followed night games, which he typically used to sit out. He trimmed up after carrying extra weight early in the year and seemed to bounce back well from minor injuries.

After missing all but 14 games in 2005 following three operations on his right knee, Bonds batted .270 with 26 homers and 77 RBIs in 367 at-bats in 2006. He passed Babe Ruth to move into second place on the career home run list May 28.

Bonds has spent 14 of his 21 big league seasons with San Francisco and helped the Giants draw 3 million fans in all seven seasons at their waterfront ballpark. The club is counting on him to be part of the hype leading up to its hosting of the All-Star game in July.

Bonds said he noticed an improved vibe in the clubhouse last season with the additions of Steve Finley, Sweeney and Todd Greene. The slugger was more sociable too, playing cards or chess with his teammates or trainers before games -- and even making a rare appearance in the team photo.

Bonds and Sweeney appeared to be good friends, with Sweeney speaking to the slugger by phone recently this offseason.

"This year we had the best chemistry on the team. I felt like the team was clicking," Vizquel said. "It's sad a stupid instance like this might rupture something that was going pretty good. I don't think the players will turn on each other. We are a veteran team. We should know what (substance) is good and what is bad."

Ecuador, Colombia OK Deal On Fumigation (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 12, 2007

QUITO, Ecuador (AP)-- Ecuador's president-elect said Thursday a diplomatic spat over Colombia's fumigation of coca has been resolved, a disagreement that had spurred debate over the U.S. drug policy and prompted Ecuador to withdraw its ambassador.

Rafael Correa, a leftist economist who takes office Monday, told reporters in Quito that the agreement with Colombian President Alvaro Uribe marked "a huge step forward" in cross-border ties.

Ecuador withdrew its ambassador from Bogota after Colombia renewed spraying in December to eradicate fields of coca, the raw material for cocaine, within 350 feet of their shared border.

Colombian officials, under the protection of U.S.-supplied Black Hawk helicopters, have been spraying to eradicate the plant as part of a U.S.-supported effort to fight drug trafficking.

Correa recently canceled a trip to Bogota to protest the spraying, reflecting opposition among some Latin nation to the U.S.-led anti-narcotics strategy. Peru and Bolivia cooperate with U.S. counter-drug policies, but have long resisted Colombia's aerial fumigation policy.

Correa's decision to cancel came at the end of talks in Venezuela with President Hugo Chavez, who has described the U.S. drug war "the imperialists excuse to penetrate our countries, run roughshod over our people and justify their military presence in Latin America."

But Uribe and Correa met Wednesday in Nicaragua during the inauguration of President Daniel Ortega and reached an agreement under which Ecuador would be notified of any spraying along the border, Correa said.

They also agreed to create a three-party commission, with representatives from both countries and a third from the Organization of American States, that would ensure that the spray does not enter Ecuadorean territory.

But Ecuador's outgoing Foreign Minister Francisco Carrion criticized the pact and said Ecuador would not reinstate its ambassador in Bogota until the spraying was halted entirely. It was not immediately clear how Correa's deal with Uribe would affect that position.

IMMIGRATION:

DOJ_NMG_0115825

Grand Jury Indicts Cuban Exile Militant Luis Posada Carriles And Two Associates (MH)

By Alfonso Chardy And Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, January 12, 2007

A federal grand jury in El Paso, Texas handed down a seven-count indictment today against Cuban exile militant Luis Posada Carriles, charging him with lying about how he sneaked into the United States in March 2005. It is the first time the CIA-trained Posada has been charged with a crime in the United States.

His chief benefactor, Santiago Alvarez, and another supporter -- Osvaldo Mitat -- were also indicted after they refused to testify before the same grand jury today. They were charged with contempt of court when they invoked their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

The indictment accused Posada, 78, of making false statements to immigration officials about how he arrived in the United States. Posada has insisted he came through the Mexican border, but the indictment asserted Posada entered the United States by sea aboard the shrimping vessel Santrina crewed by Alvarez, Mitat and others.

This is the first time Posada has been criminally charged in the United States, the country he viewed as an ally and safe haven because of his past connections to the CIA and the U.S. military. By indicting Posada, the federal government ensures his continued detention.

The possibility of Posada's release loomed closer after a federal judge in El Paso, in a separate case, set a Feb. 1 deadline for the U.S. government to justify the militant's continued detention. The judge's action came after a federal magistrate recommended that Posada be released. The U.S. government objected on the ground that releasing Posada -- who Cuba and Venezuela consider a "terrorist" -- could pose adverse foreign policy consequences.

Posada has been in the custody of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement since he was detained in Miami-Dade County on May 17, 2005. He was then flown to El Paso where he has been held at an immigration facility.

Posada is wanted in Venezuela for his alleged role in the bombing of a Cuban airliner in 1976 that killed 73 people and in Cuba for his alleged role in the bombing of several tourist sites in 1997 that killed one Italian tourist.

The indictment alleged Posada made the false statements on his application for naturalization "on or about Sept. 10, 2005," the Justice Department said.

The indictment also alleges that he knowingly made false statements under oath during his naturalization interview with Department of Homeland Security officials on April 25 and 26, 2006.

In his naturalization interview, the Justice Department said, Posada allegedly made several false statements regarding his March 2005 entry into the United States, ``including statements about the transportation routes and methods used, as well as individuals who accompanied him."

For example, the indictment charges that Posada said he "traveled from Honduras through Belize and entered the United States over land near Matamoros, Mexico, and Brownsville, Texas," with the assistance of an unidentified alien smuggler.

In fact, the indictment said, Posada entered the United States aboard the Santrina accompanied by Alvarez and Mitat among others.

Cuban Militant Indicted, Accused Of Lying About Entering U.S. (SAEN)

By Guillermo Contreras, Express-News

San Antonio Express-News, January 12, 2007

A former CIA operative who was linked to plots to assassinate Cuban leader Fidel Castro is now facing charges in Texas.

A federal grand jury in El Paso indicted Luis Posada Carriles on Thursday on one count of naturalization fraud and six counts of making false statements in a naturalization proceeding, the Justice Department said in a news release.

A hero to the anti-Castro establishment, Posada, 78, is accused of lying to immigration agents about how he entered the United States in 2005, when he sought political asylum, according to the indictment.

Posada claims he entered through the Texas-Mexican border, but U.S. authorities allege he sneaked into Florida in March 2005 aboard a shrimp boat co-owned by Santiago Alvarez, a prominent South Florida supporter and benefactor of Posada, according to court records and newspaper reports.

Alvarez and Osvaldo Mitat, who reportedly worked for Alvarez, also were indicted by the El Paso grand jury Thursday on charges of refusing to testify at the grand jury proceedings, their indictments show.

Posada remained Thursday in a federal immigration jail in El Paso, one of the more infamous inmates there because of his background, which includes involvement in the 1961 Bay of Pigs operation — a U.S.-backed attempt by Cuban exiles to overthrow Castro.

Alvarez and Mitat were sentenced to federal prison in November after pleading guilty to federal weapons charges in Florida over machine guns, a grenade launcher and other items stored in an apartment complex that Alvarez, a real estate developer in Miami, owns.

In September 2005, an immigration judge ordered Posada deported to any country other than Cuba or Venezuela that will take him. That judge wrote that Posada's "case reads like one of Robert Ludlum's espionage thrillers, with all the plots and twists and turns Ludlum is known for."

For example, Posada was admitted to the United States as a permanent resident in 1962 and received military training in this country, serving as a second lieutenant in the Army. He later became a CIA operative, delivering guns to the Cuban coast until he was dropped by the CIA in 1967, his immigration file says. He later gave up his U.S. residency when he moved to Venezuela and became a citizen there, according to the file.

His file also contains many alleged links to militant acts, such as the Oct. 6, 1976, bombing of a Cubana Airlines jet off the coast of Barbados that killed all 73 occupants. Posada was charged, tried and acquitted in a military court in Venezuela. He escaped from a Venezuelan prison in 1985 while awaiting retrial in a civilian court. Venezuela has an extradition request for his return, and Cuba also wants him tried. Posada denies involvement in the bombing.

The Posada file also says he went to El Salvador and re-established ties with the CIA. There, he supplied arms and materials for the U.S.-backed Contras fighting the Sandinistas in Nicaragua, in an effort known as the Iran-Contra affair, the file said.

He later moved to Guatemala and was shot several times in the face in an assassination attempt in February 1990, according to his file. In the late 1990s, he was suspected of being involved in a series of bombings in Cuba, one of which killed an Italian tourist.

Cuba also accuses him of plotting to kill Castro in Panama in 2000.

As Alvarez and Mitat were being prosecuted in Florida, the Fort Lauderdale Sun-Sentinel reported, Posada refused to testify on their behalf despite a court order, opting instead for his Fifth Amendment right to remain silent. gcontreras@express-news.net

Suspected Bomber Of Cuban Airliner Indicted (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2007

The anti-Castro exile is charged with violating U.S. immigration law, but another court has scheduled his release.

MIAMI — A federal grand jury on Thursday indicted militant Cuban exile Luis Posada Carriles on immigration violations that could send the 79-year-old to prison for at least 10 years.

But those charges may not be enough to keep him locked up beyond another federal court's Feb. 1 release order.

Posada is wanted in Cuba and Venezuela for his alleged role in the 1976 bombing of a Cuban airliner in which all 73 aboard perished, as well as for a string of hotel bombings on the Communist-ruled island in the late 1990s that killed an Italian tourist.

The indictment by a West Texas grand jury alleges Posada lied on his application for U.S. naturalization and during subsequent immigration proceedings. A New Jersey grand jury is investigating the terrorism issues and has yet to issue any action.

A former CIA operative and veteran of the failed Bay of Pigs invasion, Posada made a career of trying to bring down the regime of Cuban President Fidel Castro, allegedly with the help of U.S. intelligence forces also opposed to the Communist leader.

DOJ_NMG_0115827

Posada served four years in a Panamanian prison for a 2000 assassination plot against Castro. He was freed in a gesture of support to President Bush during his 2004 reelection battle, when Miami's powerful exile community was lobbying the White House to help fellow anti-Castro fighters.

Posada has been in a federal immigration lockup in El Paso since his May 2005 arrest on charges of illegally entering the U.S. He told an immigration court in September of that year that he had made his way into Texas in March 2005 with the help of a smuggler.

But Cuban media alleged as soon as he surfaced in Miami later that month that Posada had been picked up from Mexico's Yucatan peninsula by four fellow exiles on a shrimp boat owned by influential Cuban American developer Santiago Alvarez and brought to a Florida Gulf Coast marina.

Alvarez and another Cuban militant, Oswaldo Mitat, pleaded guilty last year to reduced charges of amassing weapons for a strike on Castro. Both were summoned to testify before the West Texas grand jury last week and are believed to have supplied information incriminating Posada on one count of naturalization fraud and six of making false statements to immigration authorities.

Posada was convicted in late 2005 of immigration violations and was ordered deported. But a federal judge ruled that he couldn't be extradited to Cuba or Venezuela because of the possibility he would be tortured or abused in the custody of those governments.

U.S. efforts to deport him to other countries failed.

Posada's attorney, Eduardo Soto, filed a writ of habeas corpus in August challenging his client's continued detention. After U.S. Magistrate Norbert Garney recommended a month later that Posada be released, Department of Justice authorities urged U.S. District Judge Philip Martinez in El Paso to keep Posada jailed, claiming he is "an admitted mastermind of terrorist plots and attacks."

Thursday's grand jury indictment "shows that the Justice Department is serious about pursuing Posada but still leaves his case in the immigration courts instead of addressing his terrorist background," said Peter Kornbluh of the independent National Security Archive at George Washington University.

Kornbluh suspects the Bush administration is reluctant to put Posada on trial for sabotage or acts of terrorism because of his close ties to U.S. security and intelligence operations over the years.

Soto has also alluded to his client's knowledge of clandestine activities and their potential to embarrass past Republican administrations.

President George H.W. Bush, the current president's father, was CIA director during the Iran-Contra affair in which Posada played a key role.

Whether the immigration charges will be sufficient to keep Posada in jail beyond Feb. 1 depends on the outcome of his first court appearance, expected next week, when bail and other pre-trial conditions are determined.

carol.williams@latimes.com

Immigration Charges For Cuban Militant (AP)

By Alicia A. Caldwell, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 12, 2007

A Cuban exile suspected of plotting the bombing of a jetliner 30 years ago in Venezuela was indicted Thursday on charges of lying during naturalization proceedings, the Justice Department said.

The presence of Luis Posada Carriles on American soil has put federal officials in a difficult position — critics accuse the U.S. of harboring a terrorist, yet federal policy has typically protected anti-Castro Cuban exiles.

Posada, 78, a former CIA operative with ties to the failed Bay of Pigs invasion in the 1960s, is wanted by the governments of Cuba and Venezuela to face trial in the 1976 Cuban jetliner bombing. But a federal immigration judge who ordered Posada out of the United States ruled he could not be sent to either country.

Several countries have rejected U.S. requests for Posada to be sent there.

DOJ_NMG_0115828

Posada, who was born in Cuba and is a naturalized citizen of Venezuela, is charged with one count of naturalization fraud and six counts of making false statements in a naturalization proceeding, according to the Justice Department.

The indictment alleges that Posada knowingly lied on his application and under oath when applying for naturalization to the United States in September 2005 and April 2006.

He said he traveled from Honduras through Belize, ultimately reaching the United States near Brownsville, Texas, with the help of a human smuggler. But Posada actually entered the country by sea on a boat with four others, according to the indictment.

Santiago Alvarez, a key Posada benefactor, and Osvaldo Mitat, one of Alvarez's employees, were indicted in El Paso on a charge of failing to appear before the grand jury. Both pleaded guilty to a weapons charge in Florida last year and are in prison there.

The indictment also says Posada had a fake Guatemalan passport bearing his photograph and the name Manuel Enrique Castillo Lopez.

Posada attorney Felipe Millan said he believes Posada told the truth during the naturalization interview and in documents.

If convicted, Posada faces a maximum of 10 years in prison on the naturalization fraud count and five years in prison on each of the false statement counts.

Posada is expected to appear in court next week on the charges, Millan said.

The indictment beats a Feb. 1 deadline set by a judge that forced the U.S. government to provide evidence justifying Posada's detention pending deportation.

It is unclear what impact the indictment could have on the pending deportation order. If the indictment proceeds, Posada could ask to be set free on bond, Millan said, a move that would probably draw Justice Department opposition.

Posada, who Millan has said is in poor health, has denied any wrongdoing in the jetliner bombing or any other attacks against Cuban interests.

Peter Kornbluh, of George Washington University's National Security Archive, said the indictment does not address Posada's perceived role in the bombing in Venezuela.

"The administration has to get into his terrorist crimes before it is clear that it is serious about bringing Posada to justice," Kornbluh said.

Posada's lawyers contend the United States is violating a 2001 Supreme Court ruling that foreign nationals who can't be deported could not be held indefinitely. The high court set a six-month maximum, and Posada has been in U.S. custody in El Paso since May 2005.

___

Associated Press writer Jeff Carlton in Dallas contributed to this report.

Cuban Terror Suspect Indicted By U.S. On Immigration Charges (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, January 12, 2007

Jan. 11 (Bloomberg) -- A Cuban terrorist suspect was indicted by a U.S. grand jury in Texas on charges that he unlawfully tried to become a naturalized American citizen.

Luis Posada Carriles, 78, was charged with knowingly making false statements on his citizenship application in September 2005 and later in interviews with U.S. immigration officials. He is currently in custody and is expected to appear in court in El Paso, Texas, early next week, the U.S. Justice Department said in a statement.

Posada Carriles is wanted by Venezuela for allegedly planning the 1976 bombing of a Cuban airliner that killed 73 people. An immigration judge in 2005 barred Posada Carriles's extradition to Cuba or Venezuela, saying there was no guarantee he wouldn't be tortured if returned to those countries.

Last September, Venezuela asked the United Nations to force the U.S. to turn Posada Carriles over.

If convicted, Posada Carriles would face a maximum of 10 years in prison on one charge of naturalization fraud and up to five years on each of six counts of lying in interviews with immigration officials.

Anti-Castro Militant Indicted In US On Immigration Charges (AFP)

AFP, January 12, 2007

A US federal grand jury has indicted anti-Castro militant Luis Posada Carriles for lying in naturalization proceedings, the Department of Justice said.

Posada Carriles is wanted by Venezuela and Cuba in the 1976 bombing of a Cuban airliner that killed 73 people.

The indictment handed down by a federal jury in Texas accuses Posada Carriles of making false statements on his application for naturalization as a US citizen in September 2005 and of lying under oath during an interview with US officials in April 2006, the Justice Department said in a statement.

Posada Carriles, 78, told authorities he had travelled from Honduras through Belize and entered the US state of Texas over land from Mexico with help from a smuggler. But the indictment states Posada Carriles entered the United States by sea aboard the motor vessel "Santrina" accompanied by four individuals.

Venezuela has demanded the United States extradite Posada Carriles to face terrorism charges.

US officials refuse to release him to Venezuela, where he holds citizenship, or Cuba, where he was born, saying he might be tortured. But they also have refused to free him, calling the former CIA operative a threat to national security.

Posada Carriles was detained by immigration officials in May 2005 for entering the United States illegally.

Posada Carriles was jailed for eight years in Panama in a bomb plot to assassinate Cuban leader Fidel Castro during an Ibero-American summit in Panama in 2000. He was pardoned by outgoing president Mireya Moscoso.

Cuban and Venezuelan authorities accuse the US government of harboring a known terrorist.

Recently declassified US documents show that Posada Carriles had worked for the CIA at least from 1965 until June 1976, and he reportedly helped the US government ferry supplies to so-called Contra rebels, who waged a bloody campaign to topple the Marxist Sandinistas in Nicaragua in the 1980s.

Alleged FBI Impersonator Indicted (CBS2CHI)

CBS 2 Chicago, January 12, 2007

(STNG) A 40-year-old man was indicted Wednesday with allegedly impersonating an FBI agent so he could dupe immigrants out of money.

Omar Abbas, who is currently in custody on a $100,000 bond, was indicted on two counts each of extortion and making false statements within the jurisdiction of the FBI, and one count each of impersonating a United States officer and bribery.

Court records show he is slated for arraignment at 9 a.m. on Tuesday, Jan. 16, before U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve.

Abbas went by many aliases as he made several unkept promises to help immigrants in exchange for bribes, the indictment, obtained Thursday in federal court, alleges.

One man gave Abbas $8,500 because Abbas allegedly said he was an FBI agent. Another trusted Abbas to be a high-level attorney and paid him $5,500, charges allege. But Abbas was nothing but an extortionist, the FBI said.

Abbas made promises he didn't keep as he collected $25,000 from three people, according to charges originally filed against Abbas on Oct. 13, 2006.

He usually preyed on immigrants caught in tough circumstances, authorities said. Law enforcement officials believe more immigrants have been scammed but haven't alerted authorities because they fear their legal status will be questioned, FBI spokesman Tom Simon said.

In one case, a man asked Abbas for help in getting his son out of jail pending his trial. Abbas said he was connected to assistant state's attorneys, who would get the man's son out of jail immediately for the right price, the indictment alleges.

The two met at the Daley Center downtown where the man handed cash to Abbas, then never saw him again, according to the indictment. The man's son wasn't released until months later.

The indictment also accuses Abbas of representing himself as an FBI agent to a man facing deportation and said he would fix the problem. Abbas allegedly took payments from the man and did nothing else.

Anyone with information regarding the alleged scheme is asked to call the FBI at (312) 421-6700.

TAX:

Plea In Tax-Shelter Probe (WSJ)

By A Wall Street Journal Staff Reporter

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

A Saipan man pleaded guilty to making false statements in connection with the government's probe into allegedly fraudulent tax shelters marketed by former executives of KPMG LLP.

The plea was the second in the government's tax-shelter investigation secured by prosecutors in as many days.

Michael Grandinetti, a senior executive with the United Micronesia Development Association, entered his plea at a hearing before U.S. District Judge Thomas P. Griesa in Manhattan.

Mr. Grandinetti, 54 years old, said he lied to a prosecutor and an Internal Revenue Service agent when he told them in a March 2006 telephone call that he had disclosed to the UMDA's board that he received secret side payments from a group of tax-shelter promoters for UMDA engaging in certain tax-shelter transactions.

Mr. Grandinetti faces up to five years in prison on the charge. Bail was set at $10,000.

Agents Say Fast Audits Hurt I.R.S. (NYT)

By David Cay Johnston

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

Top officials at the Internal Revenue Service are pushing agents to prematurely close audits of big companies with agreements to have them pay only a fraction of the additional taxes that could be collected, according to dozens of I.R.S. employees who say that the policy is costing the government billions of dollars a year.

"It's catch and release," said Douglas R. Johnson, an I.R.S. auditor in Colorado for three decades who said he grew so frustrated at how large corporations were allowed to pay far less than what he thought they owed that he transferred to the agency's small-business division.

With one exception, other working agents would talk about the issue only on condition they not be identified because they feared being fired. They said a policy intended to avoid delays in auditing corporations was being pushed so rigidly that it prevented them from pursuing numerous examples of questionable corporate tax deductions.

I.R.S. officials said the complaints were misguided. In an interview yesterday, Debbie Nolan, the I.R.S. executive in charge of auditing large and medium-size businesses, denied that audits were being closed over the objections of agents who had evidence that significant additional taxes were owed. Ms. Nolan said she had not heard any such complaints from auditors.

She noted that the amount of additional tax recommended for each hour auditors spend on large and medium-size companies more than doubled, to $5,195 in 2006 from $2,394 in 2002. And she said that internal reviews of corporate tax audits showed that their quality had improved.

"On the whole, we are moving in the right direction," she said. "All of our indicators tell me that we are doing the right thing."

But auditors said they were told to limit questioning only to those specific issues that the I.R.S. and the companies had agreed in advance to examine. When other questionable deductions emerged in the course of the audit, they said, additional taxes were ignored.

Rank-and-file auditors said that the sharp rise in tax dollars collected per hour of audit was not a sign of an improved auditing system but simply reflected the fact that abusive and illegal tax shelters had become so common that it was easy to find additional taxes due.

James Lynch, who retired 18 months ago after two decades auditing large corporations in the San Diego area, said that "of course dollars per hour are up, because they put in smaller teams and you just grab what you can and get out."

Of roughly 50 auditors interviewed, only one said he agreed with the new policy, arguing that it was better to audit more companies lightly than a few thoroughly as a strategy to improve compliance with the tax laws. But even this agent agreed with the others that large companies were being allowed to pay far less than they owed.

DOJ_NMG_0115831

Mr. Johnson and some of these agents also said that I.R.S. management reports indicate that the quality of audits was improving only because the agency did not accurately record these actions.

One longtime auditor in New York said that when ordered not to pursue an issue "you just write 'closed per case manager' to cover yourself."

The auditor was asked why she did not file an official memo indicating that she disagreed and that she believed it was premature or improper to close the audit.

"Why would I do that?" the auditor replied. "So my manager will give me a bad performance review?" Others gave similar explanations.

Ms. Nolan said agents who believed that an important issue should have been pursued should report the matter to higher-level supervisors or go to the inspector general's office. She said she was not aware of any such complaints.

But Coleen M. Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union, said that Ms. Nolan should not be surprised that there was widespread unhappiness in the ranks about the quality of audits.

"We have been hearing complaints since they started the policies of short cycle time and limited-scope audits," Ms. Kelley said. "These are policy decisions the I.R.S. has the right to make, whether they are right or wrong."

She said any agent who went up the chain of command would have the complaint rejected out of hand.

"The agents are told that this is the scope of the audit and this is the time you have to deliver," Ms. Kelley said. "Their professional judgment is being ignored."

Ron McGinley said it was clear when the new policies went into effect in 2003, shortly before he retired as an I.R.S. economist in Southern California, that tax law enforcement was being weakened.

Mr. McGinley drew an analogy contrasting the I.R.S. approach to the way the government investigated John Gotti, the organized crime boss known as the Teflon Don.

"The way they limit audits," he said, "is like the FBI going to the Teflon Don and saying, 'We'd like to look around, so what are you willing to let us see?' "

Across the country, several presidents of local I.R.S. union chapters said there had been a steady flow of complaints from auditors, specialists and others who examine tax returns that they are not being allowed to do their jobs. They said some of the most highly trained and respected auditors had quit or plan to leave the moment they were eligible to retire.

"Agents in the large- and mid-sized business division complain to me constantly that what are supposed to be estimated dates to complete audits are hard deadlines," said Frank Heffler, president of the local in Manhattan, which has the largest contingent of I.R.S. corporate tax auditors.

The auditors said that many companies were cooperative, but others took advantage of the shortened time periods to delay turning over crucial documents until the end of the audit.

Two auditors told of corporations that when asked for a specific document, produced thousands of pages of ill-organized material in an apparent effort to waste their time and limit the issues that would be fully examined. Both auditors said they complained to supervisors, but to no avail.

Kay Rogers, the union president in Orange County, Calif., said that official I.R.S. policy calls upon auditors to "do the right thing" and pursue an audit beyond the deadline if the issues warrant it. But in practice, Ms. Rogers said, that does not happen.

The reason, she explained, is because supervisors receive cash bonuses, promotions and other benefits based on closing cases within the time allowed, not on the quality of audits or the dollars collected.

"When a person is rewarded monetarily for keeping to the cycle time," she said, they are going to close audits to get their reward.

Individual auditors in eight states, interviewed over the last seven months, told of case managers and higher supervisors ordering them to drop issues because it would prevent closing the audit by a predetermined date.

Many of these agents said they were troubled most when the sums involved pre-negotiated agreements with the I.R.S. on how much profit multinational companies could take overseas in tax havens and how much must be taken inside the United States.

"They are giving away the store," one agent in New Jersey said.

DOJ_NMG_0115832

Agents told of being refused access to specialists, including economists, engineers and historians, because if these specialists developed an issue the audit would have to continue past the deadline.

"They are not letting us do our job, which is to enforce the law," said one I.R.S. auditor who handles the most complicated international cases.

Ms. Nolan, the official in charge of the division, said that such comments reflected the difficulty many I.R.S. veterans were having in adapting to new policies, not any flaws in those policies.

Mr. Lynch, the auditor who retired in California, and many others complained that the effect of the policy was to allow the Bush administration to achieve administratively a further easing of the corporate income tax burden far beyond what Congress has approved legislatively.

According to Melanie Fox, the only current auditor besides Mr. Johnson who agreed to be quoted by name, a large number of the most experienced corporate auditors plan to retire as quickly as they can because they feel their efforts are not respected.

"A lot of audit experience is about to walk out the door," Ms. Fox said. "And then what will happen?"

Judge Blocks IRS From Role In Case (BUFFNEWS)

By Matt Gryta, News Staff Reporter

Buffalo News, January 12, 2007

State Supreme Court Justice John A. Michalek on Wednesday refused to allow the Internal Revenue Service to intervene in state court proceedings aimed at closing the financial books and paying workers of the former St. Augustine human resource center.

U.S. District Judge John V. Elfvin two weeks ago quashed an IRS effort to have the matter handled in federal court, when the case was returned to Michalek.

Lisa L. Bellamy, a U.S. Justice Department attorney who made the intervention request Friday, could not be reached to comment Wednesday.

As the result of a state Labor Department suit, Michalek ordered the closing of the debt-plagued center 11 months ago. The nonprofit human services agency for decades served Buffalo's black community.

In court papers, Bellamy contended that the IRS has a $592,325.54 lien on the St. Augustine operations for unpaid federal taxes and penalties.

After Wednesday's court session, Adam W. Perry, the center's state court-appointed receiver, said he is preparing a report for Michalek on paying off center creditors and obtaining back pay for 85 employees who worked months without pay last year while transferring clients to other agencies.

In court papers, Bellamy contended that the IRS has a right to intervene in the case to assist in the final disbursement of the center's funds.

Bellamy says that at least $178,262.82 of the center's assets have been accumulated by Perry for distribution to creditors and former employees.

FEDERAL DIARY: $5 More To Cure Rider's Block (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, January 12, 2007

The Internal Revenue Service has increased the maximum monthly transit subsidy to $110 for 2007 as part of its inflation-adjustment procedures.

That's a $5 increase in the tax-free benefit, which was last adjusted in 2005.

The transit benefit is especially popular in Washington-area government offices, where workers in the executive, legislative and judicial branches are eligible to receive the payments.

Government agencies use the benefit to encourage their employees to take the subway and use van pools rather than drive to work in the city and increase congestion. In the Washington area, about 163,000 federal employees receive Metrocheks, a fare card voucher, a Metro spokesman said.

DOJ_NMG_0115833

Washington-area federal employees began receiving the benefit as an addition to their salaries under a presidential order issued in 2000. It directed agencies in the national capital region to offer a transit benefit equal to commuting costs but not to exceed the IRS limit.

Agencies outside the D.C. area also may offer the benefit as a pretax payroll deduction. But many have chosen instead to pay for the transit benefit to ensure their employees are treated on par with those in Washington.

For information on transit benefits, go to http://www.publictransportation.org, sponsored by the American Public Transportation Association, and http://www.bwc.gov, the Best Workplaces for Commuters Web site, sponsored by the Environmental Protection Agency and the Transportation Department.

The IRS also has increased the standard mileage rates used to calculate deductions for taxpayers who use cars for business, charitable, medical and moving purposes to 48.5 cents per mile, up by 4 cents from last year.

The General Services Administration sets the reimbursement rate for federal employees who use their cars for official business and typically raises the rate to the level allowed by the IRS. GSA officials hope to have a new rate ready by mid-February.

Yesterday , Colleen M. Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union, urged the GSA to move quickly and approve an increase in the reimbursement rate.

"Federal employees face the same costs as those in the private sector, including rising gas prices, and they deserve the same rate increase," she said.FirstGov.gov Goodbye

The government's official Web portal has changed its name from FirstGov.gov to USA.gov in response to feedback from the public that suggests the old name never caught on.

According to a notice posted yesterday at the portal, 79 percent of respondents to a telephone survey last year preferred the name USA.gov.

The notice also suggested that the public finds the new name to be more intuitive. More than 600,000 people last year typed "usa.gov" into their Web browsers when looking for government information, the notice said.

USA.gov officially launches Thursday, GSA officials said, though the new name was on display yesterday for Web surfers.

Federal officials created the portal about six years ago to provide one-stop shopping for people seeking information from federal, state and local agencies and tribal governments. The database contains more than 50 million documents and images.

The Web site's basic look remained unchanged yesterday, but two new features have been added. They are a "chat with government" box that permits users to message back and forth with a contract employee hired to field questions, and a special page designed for people who live overseas and plan to visit the United States or come here for business.

To get the word out about the name change, the Web site plans to promote USA.gov on the back of about 17 million federal tax refund checks mailed between February and April, the notice said.Talk Shows

Kathryn Turman, program director of the FBI's Victims Assistance Unit, will be the guest on "FedTalk" at 11 a.m. today on http://federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

R. David Paulison, director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Passes Bill For Stem Cell Research (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, January 12, 2007

The Democratic-controlled House Thursday passed a bill bolstering embryonic stem cell research that advocates say shows promise for numerous medical cures.

But the 253-174 vote fell short of the two-thirds margin required to overturn President Bush's promised veto, despite gains made by supporters in the November elections. Bush vetoed identical legislation last year and the White House on Thursday promised he would veto it again.

DOJ_NMG_0115834

The White House said the bill — the third bill of the Democrats' first 100 hours agenda to pass the House — "would use federal taxpayer dollars to support and encourage the destruction of human life for research."

At stake was whether research on cells taken from human embryos — considered by scientists to be the most promising approach to developing potential treatments or cures for dozens of diseases — should be underwritten with taxpayer funds.

The debate raises passions because the research typically involves the destruction of frozen embryos created for in vitro fertilization. It draws fierce opposition from anti-abortion lawmakers and like-minded constituents who believe their taxes should not fund such research. Proponents of the research said it is done on embryos that would otherwise be discarded from fertility clinics anyway.

"I support stem cell research with only one exception — research that requires killing human life," said Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio. "Taxpayer-funded stem cell research must be carried out in an ethical manner in a way that respects the sanctity of human life. Fortunately, ethical stem cell alternatives continue to flourish in the scientific community."

Democrats countered with Rep. James Langevin, D-R.I., an anti-abortion lawmaker who is paralyzed from the chest down from a handgun accident that occurred when he was a teenager. The research, Langevin said, offers "tremendous hope that not only stem cell research might lead one day to a cure for spinal cord injuries but one day a child with diabetes will no longer have to endure a lifetime of painful shots and tests."

Dr. Robert Lanza, a top stem cell researcher at Advanced Cell Technology, Inc., said that stem cell-based treatments could be just a few years away for eye and spinal cord injuries, but that a decade or more of research is needed before treatments might become available for diseases such as diabetes and Alzheimer's.

Polls show most Americans support embryonic stem cell research, and Democrats say the issue played a big role in the Nov. 7 elections that returned their party to the majority in the House and Senate.

But in the House, Democratic gains of 30 seats don't translate into anywhere near that number of new votes for the embryonic stem cell research bill, sponsored by Reps. Diana DeGette, D-Colo., and Mike Castle, R-Del.

For starters, many Democratic freshmen defeated more moderate Republicans who voted for the bill when it originally passed in 2005 and on an unsuccessful veto override attempt last year. And some Republicans who supported the bill have been replaced with opponents of the measure.

As a result, House embryonic stem cell research proponents have gained only 15 votes over the high-water mark of 238 in the prior GOP-controlled House.

If every House member votes, it takes 290 votes to override a veto, and both the House and Senate must override a veto for a bill to become law without a president's signature.

Scientists still say, however, that embryonic stem cells so far are backed by the most promising evidence that one day they might be used to grow replacements for damaged tissue, such as new insulin-producing cells for diabetics or new nerve connections to restore movement after spinal injury.

The legislation would lift Bush's 2001 ban on federal dollars spent on deriving new stem cells from fertilized embryos. Bush's veto of the bill last year was the first veto of his presidency.

Embryonic stem cells are able to morph into any of the more than 220 cell types that make up the human body. Bush on Aug. 9, 2001, restricted government funding to research using only the embryonic stem cell lines then in existence, groups of stem cells kept alive and propagating in lab dishes.

But those 21 stem cell lines have many problems, and researchers say 300 newer lines, culled from fertility clinic leftovers otherwise destined to be thrown away, are considered better suited for implantation into sick Americans.

Scientists take those cells from a 5-day-old embryo, when it's bigger than the period at the end of this sentence.

Stem Cell Bill Sails Through The House (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115835

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 — The House voted overwhelmingly on Thursday to broaden federal support for embryonic stem cell research, stepping up a confrontation with President Bush over a thorny scientific and ethical issue that Democrats hope to capitalize on in the next election.

The vote, 253 to 174, was not enough to overturn a likely presidential veto of the measure, which would authorize federal support for research using stem cells derived from excess embryos that fertility clinics would otherwise discard.

The White House said Thursday that the president would veto the bill, just as he did last year. "The bill would compel all American taxpayers to pay for research that relies on the intentional destruction of human embryos," the White House statement said.

It would take 290 House votes to override a veto.

But the vote fulfilled a Democratic promise from the November elections, when about a dozen winning House candidates and at least two winning Senate candidates campaigned heavily on the issue. And with 37 Republicans joining 216 Democrats to support the measure, Democrats said the vote also ensured that the issue would remain alive for the 2008 election. The measure's passage in the Senate is almost certain.

"We can do this the easy way or the hard way," said Representative Diana DeGette, a Colorado Democrat who was a sponsor of the bill.

"By January 2009, we will have a president who favors embryonic stem cell research," Ms. DeGette added, noting that at the moment the leading presidential candidates in both parties support it.

Of the three most emotional social issues of the day — abortion rights, same-sex marriage and embryonic stem cell research — the last is the only one on which the public, by a growing majority, clearly favors the liberal position, said Michael Dimock, a pollster at the Pew Forum on People and the Press.

Proponents say research on embryonic stem cells could lead to treatments for cancer, heart disease, diabetes, Alzheimer's disease, Parkinson's disease and other illnesses.

In the weeks before the Nov. 7 election, the actor Michael J. Fox campaigned for several Democrats on the issue. Mr. Fox has Parkinson's disease and presented himself as living evidence of the need to support stem cell research.

After the vote on Thursday, Representative Debbie Wasserman Schultz, Democrat of Florida, said, "This is a matter of life and death."

Social conservatives argue that destroying any human embryo means taking a life. Some compare the bill's stipulations about using leftover embryos to financing deadly research experiments on death row inmates.

Supporting research in leftover embryos "will create a market for creating and cloning more human embryos for the express purpose of killing them," said Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, a group of conservative Christians.

Echoing arguments by the White House, House Republicans opposed to the measure noted that some studies suggested that stem cells taken either from adults or from amniotic fluid might provide alternatives to using those from human embryos.

"I support ethical stem cell research that does not spend public dollars to fund studies that many Americans find morally reprehensible," said Representative Jeb Hensarling of Texas, recently named head of the House conservatives' Republican Study Committee.

But the distinction between embryonic and other stem cells has not sunk in with the public, Mr. Dimock of the Pew Forum said, adding, "We don't find much of a difference in the responses if you add or subtract the word 'embryonic.' "

He said that in polls posing a choice between saving an embryo and pursuing the potential treatments from stem cell research, 56 percent of respondents favored research and 32 percent favored the protection of embryos.

In 2001, Mr. Bush issued an order prohibiting the use of federal money for research on any new stem cells derived from embryos. His order limited federal financing to the handful of lines of embryonic stem cells then in existence. But researchers have complained that most of those cells were damaged or inadequate.

The White House said that under the guidelines the government had spent $130 million on embryonic stem cell research using existing lines. Including other sources of financing, researchers had spent a total of $3 billion on stem cell research of all kinds, the White House said.

DOJ_NMG_0115836

Bill's Backers Predict End To Stem Cell Limits (USAT)

USA Today, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — Despite threats of a presidential veto, supporters of research on embryonic stem cells say an end to restrictions on federal funding is inevitable after an overwhelming House vote Thursday.

The House of Representatives voted 253-174 on a stem cell research bill identical to one President Bush vetoed last year. Supporters were 37 votes shy of the 290 needed to override a veto but got 14 more votes than last year.

White House spokesman Tony Fratto said Bush remains opposed to the legislation. "We believe we should not be using tax dollars to provide incentives for the continued destruction of embryos," Fratto said.

In the Senate, Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, said he has 66 votes lined up in favor of the bill; he needs 67 to override Bush. "We're working on everybody," Harkin said.

Harkin and other proponents of research with embryonic stem cells — basic building blocks that can be coaxed into developing into a wide range of cells — say the work holds the promise of curing a number of diseases.

Opponents such as Rep. Dave Weldon, R-Fla., say it's an unproven field of study that involves the destruction of human life, because embryos are used to obtain the stem cells. "This is not necessary, and it's morally wrong," said Weldon, a doctor. He and others argued that medical breakthroughs can be achieved by using adult stem cells, such as those derived from a pregnant woman's uterus.

At issue is whether to lift restrictions on funding for embryonic stem cell research that Bush established early in his first term. In an Aug. 9, 2001, order, Bush approved federal funding for research on stem cells but limited it to lines created before that date. Of the $600 million the National Institutes of Health provides for stem cell research, $39 million went to human embryonic stem cells last year. The rest went for studies on animal and adult stem cells.

"None offer as much promise as human embryonic stem cells," said Rep. Louise Slaughter, D-N.Y., a microbiologist.

Rep. Diana DeGette, D-Colo., and other bill supporters said the measure would provide a positive use for leftover embryos kept at fertility clinics and destined for destruction. That was the reason Rep. Dale Kildee, D-Mich., switched his vote this year to support the bill. "He felt that since the embryos were going to be destroyed anyway, it was better that some good come out of it," said Christopher Mansour, Kildee's chief of staff. Rep. Rob Bishop, R-Utah, said federal funding for the research would amount to endorsing "a policy that innocent life can be destroyed for utilitarian purposes."

Some lawmakers cited friends and family members they said might be aided by embryonic stem cell research. Freshman Rep. Phil Hare, D-Ill., said the research could help his predecessor, Lane Evans, an Illinois Democrat who retired last year because of Parkinson's disease. Rep. Joe Sestak, D-Pa., told members about his 5-year-old daughter's battle with brain cancer.

In all, 38 freshmen lawmakers voted for the bill. "I'm a pro-life Democrat," said Rep. Jason Altmire of Pennsylvania. "This is a pro-life vote."

DeGette and Rep. Mike Castle, R-Del., the bill's sponsors, said the growing support in the House of Representatives is a sign that political momentum is shifting. "This will be the law of the land in 2009 no matter what," said Rep. Mark Kirk, R-Ill., referring to the year Bush's term ends. "Our job is to get the inevitable to happen as early as possible."

DeGette said she's eager to discuss a compromise with the White House, but she said Bush has rejected offers to meet with her and GOP bill supporters.

House Passes Bill Relaxing Limits On Stem Cell Research (WP)

By Rick Weiss

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

The House yesterday overwhelmingly approved a bill that would loosen the restrictions on human embryonic stem cell research imposed by President Bush in 2001, inaugurating the second such assault on the administration's stem cell policy in as many years.

Thirty-seven Republicans joined 216 Democrats to pass the Stem Cell Research Enhancement Act, which would allow federal funding of research on stem cells from embryos slated for destruction at fertility clinics.

DOJ_NMG_0115837

The 253 to 174 vote fell 37 votes short of what it would take to override the veto that Bush yesterday promised would be forthcoming, assuming the Senate passes the same bill, as expected. Bush vetoed the legislation after it passed last year.

But buoyant research proponents said they still have several options and promised to persevere until the legislation becomes law.

"While it's not enough to override a veto, it's enough to show we have tremendous momentum," said Rep. Diana DeGette (D-Colo.), who led the House effort with Rep. Michael N. Castle (R-Del.).

With the Senate already within one vote of having the two-thirds majority it needs for an override, and with the Democrats now in a majority position that will allow them to use procedural rules in their favor, DeGette suggested that it is time for the president to begin negotiating with Congress over compromise language.

"The vote today shows that productive discussions might be a very, very good idea for all concerned," she said.

Under the existing policy, federal funds may be used to study only those stem cells taken from embryos destroyed by Aug. 9, 2001 -- or about 21 of the nearly 400 stem cell colonies created since 1998.

The House-based bill would expand that pool of available cells to include those from any of the thousands of embryos that are discarded by fertility clinics each year, as long as those cells were freely donated for research by the parents. It would also impose some of the country's first ethics rules on embryo research.

The vote came after about three hours of impassioned speeches by lawmakers on both sides of the issue.

Rep. Roger Wicker (R-Miss.) warned that passage would lead to a "slippery slope." Before long, he said, scientists would routinely be creating human embryos "for the express purpose of killing that embryo" for research.

Rep. Roscoe G. Bartlett (R-Md.), touting his credentials as a former research scientist who studied human embryology, spoke up for alternative methods of getting stem cells -- methods that virtually all leading stem cells scientists have discounted as having uncertain value.

"The assumption by many people that you have to kill human embryos to get embryonic stem cells just isn't true," Bartlett said.

On the other side, Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.) warned that if Congress does not override a Bush veto this time, "this will be remembered as a Luddite Moment in American history, where fear triumphed over hope and ideology triumphed over science."

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) wondered aloud -- not seriously, he assured -- whether those voting against the bill would be willing to waive their right to access the cures that would come from the work.

When the final vote was tallied, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) took to the podium and announced with apparent glee: "The bill is passed!"

Passage came into question only briefly when Rep. Michael C. Burgess (R-Tex.) introduced a motion that would have amended the bill to include broad new limits on scientists' ability to clone human embryos for research.

Scientists have said that cloned human embryos offer a unique opportunity to create stem cells with particular genetic defects, giving researchers an unprecedented window into the underpinnings of birth defects and a wide range of diseases.

Current federal policy already precludes the use of federal funds for such studies. But Burgess's motion would have cut off all federal embryonic stem cell grant money for any laboratory where embryo cloning research was underway, even with private money.

The motion was defeated 238 to 189 after a frantic effort by leaders in both parties.

Senate leaders have said they plan to take up the bill next month.

US Democratic-led House Challenges Bush On Stem-cell Research (AFP)

By Stephanie Griffith

AFP, January 12, 2007

In a first major challenge to President George W. Bush, the Democratic-controlled US House of Representatives voted to lift his limits on federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research.

The White House said Bush would veto the legislation if it came to his desk.

DOJ_NMG_0115838

The bill was approved on a 253-174 vote, short of the two-thirds majority needed to override an expected veto by Bush. The US Senate was due to vote on an identical measure in the coming weeks.

The Democrats chose the hot-button issue of stem-cell research to launch their first direct legislative assault on the Republican president since they swept to power in Congress in the November elections.

Bush, who opposes the harvesting of stem cells from discarded embryos as "anti-life," has sharply limited federal financing for the process seen by advocates as vital to advanced medical research.

"The president will certainly veto the legislation if it comes to his desk because it would compel all American taxpayers to pay for research that relies on the intentional destruction of human embryos for the derivation of stem cells," said Tony Fratto, a Bush spokesman.

"The bill passed today is seriously flawed and would undo essential ethical protections, and slow the development of new techniques that avoid bio-ethical concerns," Fratto said.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi hailed Thursday's vote as a victory for the effort to find cures for a number of diseases, including diabetes and cancer.

"Today, by passing legislation to expand stem-cell research, the House gave voice to the hopes of more than 100 million Americans and their families," Pelosi said.

"With today's strong bipartisan vote, we now challenge President Bush to join members from both sides of the aisle in supporting the hope of stem-cell research," she said.

Despite their strong majority, the Democrats do not have enough Republican allies backing the measure to muster the two-thirds majority need to override a presidential veto in both chambers of Congress.

Pelosi said the Stem Cell Research Enhancement Act would expand federal funding for the research that uses stem cell lines generated from embryos that would have otherwise been discarded by fertility clinics.

"Unlike President Bush's current policy, this legislation includes strong ethical guidelines for conducting stem-cell research," she said.

The text of the House bill approved Thursday was similar to one approved by the then-Republican-controlled Congress last year and vetoed by Bush, the only time he used the executive power in his six years in office.

House Republicans said they would offer a proposal to instead boost federal funding for new research in amniotic non-embryonic stem cells.

Opponents of stem cell research -- which many researchers say holds great promise in treating now-incurable diseases -- welcomed a US study published Sunday that showed stem cells derived from amniotic fluid could offer much the same potential as those taken from embryos.

Researchers from Wake Forest and Harvard Medical School were able to manipulate the cells to create muscle, bone, fat, blood vessel, nerve and liver cells. Tested in mice, the stem cells repaired damage and grew replacement tissue.

"We don't have to split the nation on this if we have got an alternative," Phil Gingrey, a Republican congressman, gynecologist and adamant opponent of embryonic stem-cell research, said in response to the study findings.

Bush decided in August 2001 to ban federal financing of research with new lines of stem cells from human embryos, limiting it to existing lines, which numbered about 60.

These stem cells come from multiple embryos generated by couples trying to produce a pregnancy using in vitro fertilization.

Bush and his allies on the religious right believe the use of embryonic stem cells leads to the destruction of embryos, which they consider a human life, even though embryos are routinely destroyed by clinics.

House Revisits Stem Cell Research (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — The House plunged back into the emotional debate over embryonic stem cells Thursday, overwhelmingly passing a bill to expand federal funding for the controversial research.

DOJ_NMG_0115839

The bill, part of Speaker Nancy Pelosi's 100-hour agenda, has broad support in both chambers, but is likely to face opposition from President Bush, who imposed strict limits on federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research in 2001 and used his veto power for the only time in 2006 to reject an identical bill.

"It is time for President Bush to allow this groundbreaking research to move forward," said Rep. Diana DeGette, D-Colo., the main author of the bill, which had 218 co-sponsors. "This is a victory for ethical science as well as true bipartisanship. The American people clearly support scientific funding and the use of embryonic stem cells to address some of our most debilitating diseases."

The bill passed 253 to 174, with 37 Republicans joining most Democrats in favor, and 16 Democrats opposing it.

In three hours of often charged debate, lawmakers spoke of parents, children and friends who they said could be helped by embryonic stem cells, while others warned that the legislation would involve the government in the destruction of life in the form of human embryos.

Rep. Joe Sestak, D-Pa., rose to speak about his young daughter's malignant brain tumor and his hopes that the promising research would not be ignored. "Why would we preclude options for potential treatment?" he asked.

But Georgia Republican John Linder warned of a hidden agenda. "Are we seeking a way of getting the government's imprimatur on ending a life that is not useful?" he asked. Referring to Adolf Hitler, he told his colleagues, "The first in the gas chamber were retarded children . . . . We are moving in that direction today."

Embryonic stem cells are valuable to researchers because they can be coaxed to grow into any kind of tissue. Scientists see in them an opportunity for medical advances on diseases like Alzheimer's, Parkinson's and diabetes, as well as spinal cord injuries, but the field is still in its infancy -- the cells were discovered in 1998 -- and researchers are years away from producing results.

The House legislation would allow federal funding for research on stem cells drawn from embryos that would otherwise be discarded by fertility clinics. They can only be used if the donors give their written consent and receive no money or inducement for the embryos.

Only a limited number of cell lines are currently available to researchers. On Aug. 9, 2001, Bush issued an executive order that limited federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research to cell lines that existed before that date. At the time there were 78. Today, 22 cell lines are still available to researchers, but many of them have been contaminated and are of questionable value.

There are 400,000 embryos currently stored at in vitro clinics across the U.S., according to Rep. Michael Castle, R-Del., a co-sponsor of the legislation.

The federal government currently spends $25 billion a year on scientific research, while funding for embryonic stem cells is about $15 million a year, according to Lawrence Stoler, vice president for government relations at the Juvenile Diabetes Research Foundation, which lobbies for greater use of embryonic stem cells.

In Thursday's debate, social conservatives spoke about the embryonic stem-cell issue as an extension of the abortion debate, while the bill's supporters framed it as a matter of medical research.

Conservatives also cited recent research showing that amniotic fluid stem cells could be used to produce several different kinds of tissue without the destruction of embryos.

"This research offers the potential for a new consensus approach to the difficult issue of stem cell research, and I am disappointed the Democratic majority was not willing to allow time for this new development to be thoroughly examined," said Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio.

DeGette urged research- on all kinds of stem cells and cited polls that show over 71 percent of the public backs embryonic stem-cell research, a 20 percentage point increase since the House passed an identical bill in 2005.

The Senate is expected to pass similar legislation later this year and, although lawmakers hold out the hope for compromise with the White House, Bush has refused to meet with DeGette or Castle on the issue. If the president vetoes another stem-cell bill, Congress can try to vote to override him. This would take 67 votes in the Senate and 290 votes in the House, which is seen as unlikely.

House Expands Stem-cell Research (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0115840

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, January 12, 2007

The House yesterday passed a bipartisan bill expanding federal funding of embryonic stem-cell research, although not with enough support to override a likely presidential veto.

The Stem Cell Research Enhancement Act of 2007, which passed by a vote of 253-174, is identical to legislation that President Bush vetoed last summer -- an act that the White House yesterday vowed to repeat.

The measure, which Democrats expect to be approved by the Senate, increases the limited number of embryonic stem-cell lines eligible for federal funding from the 78 the White House allows under an August 2001 executive order.

Despite the promise of a veto, the new Democratic majority says expanding stem-cell research is a winning issue that paints Mr. Bush as extreme.

Backers of the bill say embryonic stem-cell research can be used to develop treatments for diseases, such as Parkinson's. Supporters also said yesterday that they have other options of expanding stem-cell research, including attaching the issue to a "must-pass" bill such as a spending measure.

"We have a moral obligation to provide our scientific community with the tools it needs to save lives," said Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland.

The bill states that the research would be done under "strict ethical guidelines" and that funding would only apply to stem-cell lines from embryos that "would otherwise be discarded by fertility clinics."

But pro-life members from both parties oppose embryonic stem-cell research, arguing that it destroys life in the process of harvesting the cells. They also said the measure should have been put on hold because of recent research showing that amniotic fluid can be used to produce stem cells without destroying life.

Minority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio urged his colleagues to instead study those new methods, saying, "We are going to find out that we are not going to need to destroy human embryos to get the kind of promise that we want.

"I've got 11 brothers and sisters. I'm sure it wasn't convenient for my mother to have twelve of us, but I'm sure glad that she did," he said. "Taxpayer funds shouldn't be used to destroy the human life, pure and simple."

Researchers at the Wake Forest and Harvard medical schools concluded that stem cells found in amniotic fluid are versatile and available and could have equal benefits to embryonic cells.

However, the measure's sponsors, Democratic Rep. Diana DeGette of Colorado and Republican Rep. Michael N. Castle of Delaware, said the lead scientist wrote a letter, saying the study should not slow down embryonic research.

Stem-cell-research supporters have gained votes since failing to override Mr. Bush's July veto, the first of his presidency. That vote was 235-193, 55 votes shy of the needed majority.

The Democrats campaigned on a pledge to fund stem-cell research, an issue that resonated with the American people in part because of the advocacy work of celebrities, including actor Michael J. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease and appeared in ads for candidates who supported the research.

Mrs. DeGette cited a poll showing 71 percent of Americans support embryonic research and said U.S. researchers are "tethered" by Mr. Bush's six-year-old policy.

Yesterday's debate allowed freshmen Democrats to give floor speeches and refer to constituents with diseases who could benefit from the research.

Freshman Rep. Harry Mitchell of Arizona called the bill "the best hope for a cure," and Rep. Patrick J. Murphy of Pennsylvania said embryonic research is a "medical miracle."

All but three of the Democratic freshmen supported the bill.

Mrs. DeGette said Mr. Bush has refused to meet with her or Mr. Castle, but they hope to convince him that opinion -- and votes -- are on their side.

"While that is not enough to overcome a veto threat, it is enough to show that we've got tremendous momentum," Mrs. DeGette said.

Rep. Mark Steven Kirk said the measure's passage is symbolic.

DOJ_NMG_0115841

"In my view, this policy will become the law of the land [in] January 2009 no matter what," the Illinois Republican said. "Senator McCain, right now the leading Republican candidate for president, is pro-stem-cell research, as is Senator Clinton, so our job here is to get the inevitable to happen as early as possible."

He was referring to Sen. John McCain of Arizona and Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York -- both of whom are considered front-runners for their party's nomination.

Many praised the measure as helping the United States remain globally competitive.

Rep. Christopher Shays, Connecticut Republican, said the measure also helps encourage scientists to be patient and not to leave the country for places such as Britain, which allows such research.

"This is not a matter of pro-life versus pro-choice but rather a matter of humanity," Mr. Shays said, later declaring, "The dark ages are over. ... God gave us the intellect to differentiate between dogma and science."

But Rep. Roscoe G. Bartlett, Maryland Republican and a scientist, said, "It is unnecessary to harm or destroy embryos to obtain cell lines for research."

Concerns Of Dashed Hopes From Promised Miracles (NYT)

By Nicholas Wade

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

It was a day of promised miracles in the House of Representatives. Almost every other lawmaker who spoke during the debate on the stem cell bill told of a close relative with a deadly affliction whose cure depended on generating new human embryonic stem cell lines.

But the bill that was passed, on a 253-to-174 vote, had a more modest goal than the oratory implied. It would merely allow scientists supported by the federal government to derive new cultures of stem cells from the early embryos discarded by clinics using in-vitro fertilization.

That would overturn President Bush's decision of Aug. 9, 2001, which restricted the scientists' research to the cell lines already derived by that date. But even with the faster pace of research and discovery that new cell lines might allow, many scientists believe it will be years before any cures for disease could be developed.

The striking hopes that stem cell advocates have raised in order to overturn Mr. Bush's decision may generate public disenchantment with such research if its promise is not quickly fulfilled.

"In those places like California where the public has been sold the Golden Gate Bridge for stem cell research and it doesn't pay off, there might be some difficulty," said Dr. Leon Kass, former chairman of the President's Council on Bioethics.

Even scientists who believe that the restrictions on embryonic stem cell research have been harmful are concerned about the overstatements.

"We don't know yet how valuable this technology is going to be," said Thomas Cech, president of the Howard Hughes Medical Institute. "All of a sudden, the content increases in value just because you can't have it," Dr. Cech said.

Wild overpromise was not confined to supporters of the House bill, which was identical to one passed by the House and Senate last year and then vetoed by President Bush.

Opponents of the measure, and a White House report issued on Wednesday, made much of the idea that alternatives to embryonic stem cells were close at hand. Several House members on Thursday cited a report published last week by Anthony Atala of the Wake Forest University School of Medicine that said embryoniclike stem cells could be obtained from amniotic fluid.

But scientific literature is several stages removed from accepted truth. It is more like an arena in which most novel claims are shot down by fellow scientists, making it rash to bet on the longevity of any new claim.

Dr. Atala reported that amniotic stem cells could generate six kinds of mature cells, implying they were versatile enough to substitute for embryonic stem cells. But leading scientists were skeptical.

"The evidence that they can make neurons is extremely poor," said Dr. Arnold Kriegstein of the University of California, San Francisco, an expert on neural stem cells.

John Gearhart, an embryonic stem cell specialist at Johns Hopkins University, said that the amniotic cells were "certainly not in the category of embryonic stem cells."

DOJ_NMG_0115842

Many biologists believe that the most promising immediate use of embryonic stem cells is in the study of disease-specific cells, an idea long advocated by Dr. Irving Weissman of Stanford University. If scientists could generate embryonic cells from patients' adult cells, they could study Parkinson's or diabetes, for example, from its earliest moments, laying the groundwork for rebuilding a patient's diseased tissues.

But this approach requires generating stem cell lines to order, from adult cells, and the House bill does not address this issue. It only permits the creation of more lines from surplus fertility clinic embryos, similar to those already available.

For that reason Dr. Kass, who opposes the generation of new embryonic stem cell lines, sees the House bill as lacking in substance.

"From the point of view of science, I don't see the current legislation as being terribly important," he said. "I see it as being symbolically important to the scientists who wish to say, 'Get your moral views off our backs.' "

The president's August 2001 decision can be seen as an artful compromise. It appeased opponents of research, but removed the roadblocks that existed in the Clinton administration, and at least allowed scientists to get started. Had they produced dramatic results in the last five years, they would have provided the president political ground to shift his position. But research, as is often the case, has been slow, and dramatic therapies with embryonic stem cells have not yet emerged.

But Dr. Kass believes Mr. Bush's decision was made more on moral than political grounds.

"He's not going to change his mind," Dr. Kass said. "This was fundamentally decided as a matter of complicated moral principle: not to incentivize or reward any future destruction of nascent human life. And if you understood that, you wouldn't expect anything different from him."

Thus Congress's expected passage of the bill, and Mr. Bush's probable veto, will not address the looming issue of whether to permit generations of disease-specific lines.

As before, it is legal for privately financed researchers to do so. But if the vast body of federally financed researchers is sidelined, the pace of advance will be much slower.

Stem Cell Miracle? (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

When President Bush announced in August 2001 his restrictive funding decision for federal embryonic stem cell research, he was widely attacked for an unwarranted intrusion of religion into scientific research. His solicitousness for a 200-cell organism -- the early embryo that Bush declared should not be destroyed to produce a harvest of stem cells -- was roundly denounced as reactionary and anti-scientific. And cruel to boot. It was preventing a cure for thousands of people with hopeless and terrible diseases, from diabetes to spinal cord injury. As John Edwards put it most starkly and egregiously in 2004: If John Kerry becomes president, Christopher Reeve will walk again.

This kind of stem cell advocacy did not just shamefully inflate its promise. It tended to misrepresent the basis for putting restrictions on embryonic research, insisting that it was nothing more than political enforcement of the religious fundamentalist belief that life begins at conception.

This has always been a tendentious characterization of the argument for restricting stem cell research that relies on the destruction of embryos. I have long supported legal abortion. And I don't believe that life -- meaning the attributes and protections of personhood -- begins at conception. Yet many secularly inclined people such as myself have great trepidation about the inherent dangers of wanton and unrestricted manipulation -- to the point of dismemberment -- of human embryos.

You don't need religion to tremble at the thought of unrestricted embryo research. You simply have to have a healthy respect for the human capacity for doing evil in pursuit of the good. Once we have taken the position of many stem cell research advocates that embryos are discardable tissue with no more intrinsic value than a hangnail or an appendix, then all barriers are down. What is to prevent us from producing not just tissues and organs but humanlike organisms for preservation as a source of future body parts on demand?

DOJ_NMG_0115843

South Korea enthusiastically embraced unrestricted stem cell research. The subsequent greatly heralded breakthroughs -- accompanied by lamentations that America was falling behind -- were eventually exposed as a swamp of deception, fraud and coercion.

The slope is very slippery. Which is why, even though I disagreed with where the president drew the line -- I would have permitted the use of fertility-clinic embryos that are discarded and are going to die anyway -- I applauded his insistence that some line must be drawn, that human embryos are not nothing and that societal values, not just the scientific imperative, should determine how they are treated.

The House voted yesterday to erase Bush's line. But future generations may nonetheless thank Bush for standing athwart history, if only for a few years. It gave technology enough time to catch up and rescue us from the moral dilemmas of embryonic destruction. It has just been demonstrated that stem cells with enormous potential can be harvested from amniotic fluid.

This is a revolutionary finding. Amniotic fluid surrounds the baby in the womb during pregnancy. It is routinely drawn out by needle in amniocentesis. The procedure carries little risk and is done for legitimate medical purposes that have nothing to do with stem cells. If it nonetheless yields a harvest of stem cells, we have just stumbled upon an endless supply.

And not just endless, but uncontroversial. No embryos are destroyed. The cells are just floating there, as if waiting for science to discover them.

Even better, amniotic fluid might prove to yield an ideal stem cell -- not as primitive as embryonic stem cells and therefore less likely to grow uncontrollably into tumors, but also not as developed as adult stem cells and therefore with more "pluripotential" in the kinds of tissues it can produce.

If it is proved that these are the Goldilocks of stem cells, history will record the amniotic breakthrough as the turning point in the evolution of stem cell research from a narrow, difficult, delicate and morally dubious enterprise into an uncontroversial one with raw material produced unproblematically every day.

It will have turned out that Bush's unpopular policy held the line, however arbitrary and temporary, against the wanton trampling of the human embryo just long enough for a morally neutral alternative to emerge. And it did force the country to at least ponder the moral cost of turning one potential human being into replacement parts for another. Who will be holding the line next time, when another Faustus promises medical nirvana if he is permitted to transgress just one moral boundary?

Stem Cell Games (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2007

TO SCIENTISTS, amniotic stem cells are tools that could help make life-saving treatments for human ailments. To religiously conservative politicians, they are an excuse to disregard embryonic stem cell research altogether. And to the House of Representatives, they provide a useful reminder of the importance of overturning the federal ban on embryonic stem cell research.

Research published this week shows that stem cells harvested from amniotic fluid — easily accomplished through the common practice of amniocentesis — can be used to create human tissues. Unlike embryonic stem cells, they do not appear to form tumors when implanted in animals. And they do not raise the same religious or ethical objections as embryonic stem cells because no embryos are destroyed in the process.

This could be an impressive new medical tool. But it also could be a convenient pretext for pushing embryonic stem cell research aside — and that shouldn't be allowed to happen. For all the potential uses of amniotic cells, they are likely to prove less adaptable than embryonic cells. Exclusive focus on amniotic stem cells would divert attention and time away from potentially more promising lines of research.

All new science in the stem cell field is welcome. But because of President Bush's adamant refusal to fund most embryonic stem cell research, too much scientific effort is being pressed into finding ways around religious opposition to the field instead of furthering the search for treatments.

Less than six months ago, another scientific research team announced that it had found a way to use a single cell from early stage embryos to create stem cells, which would quell some opposition because the method does not destroy an embryo.

DOJ_NMG_0115844

The House came up with a better solution Thursday, passing a bill that would extend federal funding of stem cell research to embryos that would have been discarded by fertility clinics anyway. Although the bill passed 253 to 174 — a clear and commanding margin — it falls short of the two-thirds needed to override the president's promised veto. That's a shame, but at least it vividly illustrates to the public — which largely favors stem cell research — exactly who is responsible for halting progress.

Bush Threatens Veto Of Medicare Drug Bill, But A Senator Is Seeking A Middle Ground (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 — President Bush threatened on Thursday to veto legislation that would require the government to negotiate with pharmaceutical companies to obtain lower drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries.

But chances for passage of some version of the legislation increased when a pivotal figure, the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said Congress should repeal a provision of the 2003 Medicare law that prohibits such negotiations.

The chairman, Senator Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana, said he did not favor price controls, but did believe that Medicare should be able to negotiate prices in "discrete areas where seniors need our help the most."

House Democrats would go further, requiring the secretary of health and human services to negotiate the prices that may be charged for most drugs covered by Medicare.

The House is scheduled to vote Friday on that proposal. While the Democratic bill is expected to pass, the White House announced the veto threat on Thursday in an effort to hold down the number of votes and to prevent the measure from gaining any more momentum.

"Government interference impedes competition, limits access to lifesaving drugs, reduces convenience for beneficiaries and ultimately increases costs to taxpayers, beneficiaries and all American citizens alike," the White House said in a written statement on the House bill.

Mr. Baucus said he was seeking a middle ground between Republicans, who strongly support the existing ban on federal price negotiations, and House Democratic leaders, who want to require the secretary to negotiate.

"The total prohibition on negotiation should be eliminated," Mr. Baucus said after listening to two and a half hours of testimony from experts at a Finance Committee hearing. Mr. Baucus is acutely sensitive to public concern about drug prices because he is up for re-election in 2008.

The debate over Medicare drug prices epitomizes the profound differences between the parties over the proper role of government in the nation's health care system. Democrats would prefer that government play a stronger role in guaranteeing access to care at lower prices. Many Republicans, on the other hand, say the market would work better if government got out of the way.

Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, said the Democratic proposals were "a stalking horse for price controls." In seeking a larger federal role, he said, they remind him of the Clinton administration's ill-fated plan for universal insurance coverage.

"We have enough votes to sustain a veto," Mr. Grassley said.

Mr. Baucus and other Senate Democrats said the government should negotiate drug prices in a few, carefully selected areas where competition had not driven down prices.

Senator Olympia J. Snowe, Republican of Maine, said Mr. Baucus's position was highly significant. "It paves the way for the possibility" of giving the government the authority to negotiate, she said.

On Wednesday, Ms. Snowe and Senator Ron Wyden, Democrat of Oregon, introduced a bill that would repeal the ban on drug price negotiations. The bill would require Medicare to help negotiate contracts for a drug if the federal government had invested a substantial amount of money in its development.

It would also require Medicare to negotiate contracts when a brand-name drug was available from only one manufacturer and no substitute or "therapeutic equivalent" was available.

Mr. Baucus said, "For certain unique drugs, it seems that the prices are way too high."

DOJ_NMG_0115845

But Richard G. Frank, a professor of health economics at Harvard, said that some of these drugs "really make a difference in people's lives." The drugs may be expensive, Dr. Frank said, but imposing cost controls may pose "particular risks to precisely the research and development that should be most encouraged."

The Congressional Research Service said that if the government negotiated lower drug prices for Medicare, pharmaceutical companies might respond by increasing prices for other buyers.

"While drug prices paid by Medicare beneficiaries may fall, overall drug prices may increase for other consumers, specifically for the under-65 population," the research agency said.

The White House and drug manufacturers say Medicare is such a large buyer of prescription drugs that it could, in many cases, dictate prices.

Ms. Snowe and Mr. Wyden rejected that argument. Their bill says the secretary cannot set prices or establish a uniform list of covered drugs, known as a formulary.

Representative John D. Dingell, Democrat of Michigan, the chief sponsor of the bill requiring federal price negotiations, said Thursday, "The purchasing power of more than 40 million Medicare beneficiaries will allow the secretary to achieve lower prescription drug prices."

But the Congressional Budget Office said the bill would have only "a negligible effect on federal spending." Under the bill, it said, the government could not encourage Medicare beneficiaries to use particular drugs and therefore "would lack the leverage to obtain significant discounts in negotiations with drug manufacturers."

GOP: Bush Would Veto Medicare Reforms (AP)

By David Espo

AP, January 12, 2007

President Bush promised on Thursday to veto Democratic-drafted legislation requiring the government to negotiate with drug companies for lower prices under Medicare.

The House is to debate and vote Friday on the bill, which is one of a handful of priority items for Democrats who gained control of Congress in last fall's elections.

"Government interference impedes competition, limits access to lifesaving drugs, reduces convenience for beneficiaries and ultimately increases costs to taxpayers, beneficiaries and all American citizens alike," the administration said in a written statement.

Further, it said, competition already "is reducing prices to seniors, providing a wide range of choices and leading to a more productive environment for the development of new drugs."

Bush had already threatened to veto another of the top six bills Democrats are pushing across the House floor in the first two weeks of the new Congress. That's the measure, approved Thursday, to expand the extent to which federal funds could be used for embryonic stem cell research.

Several Democrats campaigned last fall as critics of the one-year-old program that offers prescription drug coverage under Medicare, saying it tilted too heavily toward profits for the pharmaceutical and insurance industries.

Currently, private drug plans negotiate how much they'll pay for the medicine their customers take. But the legislation under consideration Friday would require the secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services to do so.

"It is clear Medicare can do better and we are insisting that they do so," said Rep. John Dingell, R-Mich., the bill's author.

Democrats have said they would use the savings produced by the negotiations to reduce a coverage gap that is common in many plans.

Republicans argue that individual insurance companies already negotiate lower prices on behalf of their customers, and that the Democratic approach was tantamount to calling for federal price controls.

They note that the program is coming in under budget and seniors are expressing support for the benefit.

"What we set out to do, we accomplished," said Sen. Jim Bunning, R-Ky., during a hearing Thursday about the drug benefit. "We had a success, a very big success."

Also, the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office said the legislation was unlikely to result in lower prices.

DOJ_NMG_0115846

"The secretary would be unable to negotiate prices across the broad range of covered Part D drugs that are more favorable than those obtained by (the plans) under current law," Donald B. Marron, the CBO's acting director, has written.

Actuaries for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services came to the same conclusion Thursday.

Dingell, a leading supporter of the legislation, dismissed the CBO's letter.

"This isn't the first time the Congress and CBO differed on the amount of savings a particular bill would achieve," he said. "Common sense tells you that negotiating with the purchasing power of 43 million Medicare beneficiaries behind you would result in lower drug prices."

The legislation, expected on the House floor on Friday, also would ban any attempt to limit the array of drugs available to Medicare beneficiaries by creating formularies. That stands in contrast to the Veterans Administration, which has lower prices for its beneficiaries but uses formularies that limit patient choice.

Under the Medicare prescription drug program, insurance companies offer competing coverage plans, and seniors may enroll in the one they like best. The administration announced on Wednesday that 23.5 million seniors had enrolled in stand-alone plans as of Jan. 1.

While a majority of seniors are expressing satisfaction with the program, surveys also indicate that they overwhelmingly want the government to have the power to negotiate drug prices.

A survey of seniors for the Kaiser Family Foundation showed that about 81 percent of seniors want to let the government use its buying power to negotiate drug prices, including 67 percent who said they strongly favor such negotiations. Democrats say that another survey showed that requiring government negotiations polled more favorably than any other issue that Democrats included for their first 100 hours of the new Congress.

The issue is expected to have a tougher time in the Senate. However, Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., gave supporters of the measure a lift on Thursday when he said the total prohibition on government negotiations for Medicare beneficiaries should be eliminated.

"I do not buy the argument that the sky will fall on the prescription drug market if we remove this clause," said Baucus, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, which has jurisdiction over Medicare.

Drug Bill Demonstrates Lobby's Pull (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith And Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

Before taking control of the House last week, Democratic leaders briefly considered proposing a new government-run prescription drug program as a way to reduce seniors' drug costs, according to Democratic aides and lawmakers involved in the deliberations.

But House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and her allies chose a far less ambitious plan -- to require the government to negotiate for lower Medicare drug prices -- that will come to a vote today. They stepped back largely out of concern that the pharmaceutical industry would stall a complex change, denying them a quick victory on a top consumer-oriented priority, aides say.

They had reason to be wary: Despite years of lopsidedly favoring GOP lawmakers with campaign cash and other benefits, the drug lobby continues to wield tremendous power in the Democratic-controlled Congress. It also still has the backing of the White House: President Bush said yesterday that he will veto the Democratic proposal if it lands on his desk.

To strengthen their position, drug firms and their trade groups have been transforming their Washington operations by hiring top Democratic lobbyists to gain access to new committee chairmen, bolstering Democratic political donations and spending millions on public relations campaigns to overcome an image, indicated in recent surveys, that the industry puts profits ahead of patients.

Even longtime industry nemeses like Rep. Fortney "Pete" Stark (D-Calif.), chairman of a House health panel, are impressed. "They're pretty potent," he said this week. "They're not bush-leaguers when it comes to spending money and lobbying."

DOJ_NMG_0115847

This month alone, the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America spent more than $1 million on full-page newspaper ads touting the success of the existing Medicare drug system.

Drug companies spent more on lobbying than any other industry between 1998 and 2005 -- $900 million, according to the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics. They donated a total of $89.9 million in the same period to federal candidates and party committees, nearly three-quarters of it to Republicans.

"You can hardly swing a cat by the tail in Washington without hitting a pharmaceutical lobbyist," said Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), a key sponsor of the 2003 legislation that created the current program.

The industry worked closely with the Republican Congress to shape the Medicare prescription drug program, which included a provision barring the government from negotiating with the pharmaceutical industry for lower prices. In the three-year run-up to passage, industry lobbyists poured more than $6 million into both Republican and Democratic campaign coffers, dispatched an army of more than 800 lobbyists to Capitol Hill and quietly funded seniors organizations and patient advocacy groups that opposed Democratic alternatives.

Democrats opposed the legislation, but now that they have a chance to rewrite the law, they are pressing for what party leaders concede is only a minor alteration. "This is a first step," said Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee.

The House proposal would require the government to negotiate with the pharmaceutical industry for lower prices on behalf of the private insurers that run the drug benefit program. The impact on prices could be small, however, since the government does not buy drugs directly for Medicare and manufacturers could ignore federal pressure to lower prices without consequence.

The Bush administration has long opposed the idea of direct government negotiation with drug companies for Medicare, asserting that it would impede competition among the private drug plans. Mike Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, has said he does not want to implement such a measure.

The bill leaves intact three provisions of the 2003 law that industry analysts agree played a more direct role in boosting pharmaceutical profits. These include a controversial ban on the importation of cheaper medicines from Canada, a provision that forces roughly 7 million Medicaid patients to buy drugs that are not subject to price limitations, and provisions requiring private insurance plans to remain small and numerous, which dilutes their leverage in price negotiations with drugmakers.

Rep. Marion Berry (D-Ark.), a registered pharmacist, lined up more than 170 House Democrats last year to support a Medicare-run drug plan meant to force sharply lower prices, and he said the House leadership considered seeking it now but set it aside. "It was primarily a judgment call from the speaker, to keep everybody on board," Berry said. Pelosi aides confirmed the account.

The drug industry lobbying effort started to tilt Democratic as soon as it was clear that Democrats were headed for victory in the midterm elections. The industry is working "to expand areas of contact, develop relationships with those who are in charge," said former senator John Breaux (D-La.), a lobbyist for the industry.

The political action committee of the drug company Amgen gave Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.), the new chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, $8,500 during the 2006 election cycle, amounting to three-quarters of all its donations to him over the past decade. In the Senate, GlaxoSmithKline's PAC contributed $8,000 during the cycle to Sen. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.), the new Budget Committee chairman. That is more than the $6,000 total that the PAC had given to Conrad since 1997.

Helping lead the industry's charge is Breaux, the former senator, who is one of only two Democrats who played a role in drafting the 2003 bill. He said he plans to hopscotch the country holding public seminars on solving health-care problems, often in the states and districts of members of Congress who are pivotal to drug legislation. It is part of a program, called Ceasefire on Health Care, that is bankrolled by the drug company Pfizer and has featured speakers such as Sen. Blanche Lincoln (D-Ark.) and Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.), who both sit on the Finance Committee.

"We need to get access to key Democrats now," said former representative James C. Greenwood (R-Pa.), president of the Biotechnology Industry Organization, a prominent industry group.

In an effort to bolster its image, Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America is also sponsoring a program that distributes low- and no-cost drugs to poor people, called the Partnership for Prescription Assistance. A few of the program's beneficiaries have been brought to Washington and given media training so they can promote the program in local news outlets and in television ads.

DOJ_NMG_0115848

While the association has told House members that it has "issues" with today's measure, most of its focus will be on the Senate, where lobbyists say they have a better chance of blocking the bill. Democrats control that chamber, 51 to 49, and 60 votes are needed to pass such controversial bills.

Even if the House bill passes both chambers of Congress, supporters take seriously the veto threat by Bush, who got $1.17 million from the industry for his 2004 reelection campaign.

Staff writer Christopher Lee, research database editor Derek Willis and staff researcher Richard S. Drezen contributed to this report.

Price Negotiating's Hidden Costs (WT)

By Jim Mccrery

The Washington Times, January 12, 2007

Everyone wants to make sure that America's seniors get the prescription drugs they need at the best possible price. But the proposal to have the government negotiate Medicare drug costs that the Democratic leadership hopes to ram through the House of Representatives this week will either be largely ineffective, or it will cause undesirable results: it will restrict seniors' choices, devastate local pharmacies, raise prescription drug costs for veterans and stifle innovation.

The Democratic proposal that was introduced last Friday would require the secretary of Health and Human Services to negotiate to reduce Medicare prescription-drug prices without limiting the prescription medications seniors can have access to. But allowing the HHS secretary to negotiate without being able to reduce the list of medications would be largely ineffective. As the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office has found, government-negotiated prices for prescription drugs will not produce significant savings. Because the plans that Medicare already uses are successfully negotiating discounts for drugs, CBO found that "the Secretary would not be able to negotiate prices that further reduce federal spending to a significant degree."

It is clear, based on experience with other programs in which the government tries to negotiate discounts, that if there are savings, they will come from reduced choice for seniors and other Medicare beneficiaries. For example, the Veterans Administration -- frequently cited by supporters of Medicare negotiation as a model -- offers less than one-third of the medications that seniors can currently receive under Medicare plans. Similarly, several state Medicaid programs limit the number of prescriptions beneficiaries can get, and often make beneficiaries and their physicians go through difficult administrative procedures to get the drugs they need. The United Kingdom's National Health Service -- another example Democrats cite -- frequently denies patients access to new life-saving medicines, including, in one well-known recent case, the revolutionary new breast cancer drug Herceptin.

One other way that the government can hold down prices is by limiting patients' access to community pharmacies. The Veterans Administration distributes most of its medications through its network of VA hospitals and clinics, or by mail. As many as 80 percent of veterans currently get their drugs through mail order, compared with only 2 percent of Medicare beneficiaries. Since veterans are a relatively small part of the drug market, that doesn't have too much impact on our pharmacies. But shifting the 42 million Medicare beneficiaries to the VA model would destroy local pharmacies -- often the center of small-town life in America, and a valuable resource for seniors to receive counseling from a local pharmacist.

There are a number of reasons that the Veterans Administration can now offer lower prescription drug prices than Medicare, but simple economics shows that if the VA model is expanded to include all Medicare beneficiaries, America's veterans will face higher prescription drug costs. Under current law, the Veterans Administration is guaranteed a substantial discount (24 percent) off the market price of brand-name medications, and then negotiates from there. Pharmaceutical manufacturers can offer the VA such discounts because veterans represent only about 2 percent of the market for prescription drugs.

If the tens of millions of Americans who receive Medicare -- who are responsible for over 40 percent of all spending on prescription drugs -- are added to the government-negotiated-price drug market, that arrangement will be untenable. Prices for our veterans -- the elderly survivors of the Greatest Generation who served in Europe and the Pacific, as well as young men and women returning from Afghanistan and Iraq, and everyone in between -- will rise substantially.

DOJ_NMG_0115849

What does the Democratic government-price-control legislation mean for innovative treatments just being developed? Will Medicare beneficiaries be denied groundbreaking new medications in the future? According to one recent study, it costs over $800 million to develop and get government approval for one new prescription drug. It is important to recognize that the modern American pharmaceutical industry is not organized like a Thomas Nast cartoon. It is not a gang of old men in pinstriped suits smoking cigars and plotting to exploit older Americans.

The profits that drug companies make on successful drugs pay for the research that creates new medicines. For each drug that successfully reaches the market, more than 500 don't pan out. If the government squeezes these companies by arbitrarily cutting payments, the sure and certain result will be less research and fewer new cures.

Changes in the system for Medicare prescription drugs affect practically every American -- those in the Medicare system, those who receive their medication from the Veterans Administration, and every American who hopes to benefit from new medications that could hold the key to curing or treating Alzheimer's, breast cancer, or Parkinson's disease. These changes are far too important to be rushed through the House for political gain or a soundbite about the "100 Hours." The plan that is in place under Medicare Part D is working, and working well, for the benefit of seniors. The Democratic plan before the House offers nothing but the prospect of a diminished benefit due to heavy-handed government control of this important program.

Rep. Jim McCrery of Louisiana is the ranking Republican on the House Ways and Means Committee.

Negotiating Lower Drug Prices (NYT)

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

From all the ruckus raised by the administration and its patrons in the pharmaceutical industry, you would think that Congressional Democrats were out to destroy the free market system when they call for the government to negotiate the prices of prescription drugs for Medicare beneficiaries. Yet a bill scheduled for a vote in the House of Representatives today is sufficiently flexible to allow older Americans to benefit from the best efforts of both the government and the private drug plans.

The secretary of health and human services should be able to exert his bargaining power with drug companies in those cases in which the private plans have failed to rein in unduly high prices — leaving the rest to the drug plans. The result could be lower costs for consumers and savings for the taxpayers who support Medicare.

Under current law, written to appease the pharmaceutical industry, the government is explicitly forbidden from using its huge purchasing power to negotiate lower drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries. That job is left to the private health plans that provide drug coverage under Medicare and compete for customers in part on the basis of cost.

The Democrats' bill would end the prohibition and require — not just authorize — the secretary of health and human services to negotiate prices with the manufacturers. That language is important since the current secretary, Michael Leavitt, has said he does not want the power to negotiate.

No data is publicly available to indicate what prices the private health plans actually pay the manufacturers. But judging from what they charge their beneficiaries, it looks like they pay significantly more for many drugs than do the Department of Veterans Affairs — which by law gets big discounts — the Medicaid programs for the poor, or foreign countries.

The administration argues, correctly, that the private plans have held costs down and that there is no guarantee the government will do any better. The bill, for example, prohibits the secretary from limiting which drugs are covered by Medicare, thus depriving him of a tool used by private plans and the V.A. to win big discounts from companies eager to get their drugs on the list. The secretary does have the bully pulpit, which he can use to try to bring down the cost of overpriced drugs.

The bill also does not require the secretary to negotiate prices for all 4,400 drugs used by beneficiaries. A smart secretary could simply determine which prices paid by the plans seemed most out of line with the prices paid by other purchasers and then negotiate only on those drugs. The private plans are explicitly allowed to negotiate even lower prices if they can. This sort of flexibility should pose no threat to the free market. It is time for the Medicare drug program to work harder for its beneficiaries without worrying so much about the pharmaceutical companies.

Democrats In Senate Fail To Block Bill On Ethics (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0115850

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 — After campaigning for months on a promise to tighten ethics rules, Senate Democratic leaders tried unsuccessfully Thursday to block a measure that would shine a light on the shadowy practice of earmarking federal money for lawmakers' pet projects.

Last week the House Democrats passed an unexpectedly broad change to their chamber's rules that would disclose the size, purpose and sponsor of any earmark.

But on Thursday, when Senator Jim DeMint, Republican of South Carolina, introduced the same thing in the Senate, Democratic leaders moved quickly to squash it, calling the House bill ill thought out.

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said he was happy to see the House "moving things along very quickly." But, Mr. Reid said, "frankly, I don't think they spent the time on this that we have."

The Democratic leaders' effort to block the DeMint proposal was defeated by a vote of 51 to 46, surprising almost everyone in the Senate. The outcome reflected the keen desire of many lawmakers to appear to be on the side of openness and reform after an election that turned in part on Congressional corruption scandals.

The reputation of earmarks, which are pet projects individual lawmakers tuck into complicated bills behind the scenes, was tarnished because they figured in several of the scandals. But lawmakers cherished them as a tool of political power used to reward supporters and gain favor with constituents.

On Thursday night, Jim Manley, a spokesman for Mr. Reid, said, "We are continuing to negotiate with Republicans on how to deal with earmark reform."

Mr. Reid started the week by introducing a bipartisan ethics and lobbying proposal negotiated with the Republican leader, Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky. It contained a comparatively weak measure on earmarks that would require disclosure of the individual lawmakers sponsoring only a small fraction of them.

The bill excluded all earmarks dispensed through the federal government, including military contracts and civil engineering projects, two of the largest pools of earmarks. It also excluded all earmarks written in the explanatory reports accompanying spending bills rather than in the bills themselves, another broad category.

Mr. Reid offered his own amendment that would ban gifts or trips from lobbyists and the discounted use of corporate jets, but he left the weak earmark provision intact.

Mr. DeMint's amendment to the ethics bill would have eliminated the loopholes and would apparently apply to all earmarks, just as the new House rules do.

After the move to block it failed, Mr. Reid and Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the second-ranking Democrat, argued vigorously against the measure, saying it could have unintended effects.

"Earmark disclosure will be a major change in the way the Senate works," Mr. Reid said. "We should adopt the Reid-McConnell version rather than the House version in the DeMint amendment. If we need to revisit the issue later, we can do that."

Mr. DeMint argued that if the original bill was not strengthened, "the public's going to know from Day 1 that the idea of being open and transparent is just a scam."

Senate Democrats Stall Pork-reform Vote (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 12, 2007

Senate Democrats backed off promises to reform pork spending yesterday, using procedural tactics similar to ones they attacked Republicans for employing in past Congresses.

Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, stalled a vote on a Republican amendment that would require full disclosure of the spending provisions, also known as earmarks. The maneuver -- which continued through last night and into today -- gives Mr. Reid time to turn Democrats against the measure, which is similar to the ethics rules adopted with much fanfare last week by the new Democrat-led House.

DOJ_NMG_0115851

Immediately before Mr. Reid stopped the amendment to the Legislative Transparency and Accountability Act of 2007, the Senate expressed its support for it, rejecting a bid to kill it on a 51-46 vote. The measure would require that members of Congress disclose all earmarks they request.

"Democratic leaders are stalling in an attempt to strong-arm more Democrats into voting to table the amendment," said Thomas A. Schatz, president of Citizens Against Government Waste. "This is not a promising beginning to the new Congress when the first effort to improve accountability and transparency is being shot down by the Democratic leadership."

In addition to stopping the provision, Mr. Reid also criticized the first accomplishments by the new Democrat-led House.

"This is exactly like the House provision," he said on the Senate floor. "That's one of the problems I have. I frankly don't think that they spent the time on this that we have."

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, through a spokesman, defended the House earmarks rule as part of the "most sweeping" ethics reforms in congressional history.

"From our perspective, that's what we felt we needed," spokesman Drew Hammill said. "The Senate and the House are different bodies. They can't operate the same way. The Senate is always going to move slower."

The delaying tactic, which caused a brief uproar on the Senate floor, was reminiscent of House Republicans in the 2003 vote on the new Medicare prescription drug benefit extending the time for voting to allow leaders to persuade members to change their votes -- a maneuver roundly criticized by Democrats at the time.

"I'd hoped the Senate would be different," Sen. Jim DeMint, South Carolina Republican, told the chamber. "We're doing exactly the same thing."

Reid spokesman Jim Manley said yesterday's drawn-out vote bore "absolutely no comparison to the strong-arm tactics" of former House Speaker Tom DeLay, Texas Republican, in 2003.

Republicans said the episode smacked of hypocrisy by Democrats, who campaigned heavily on ethics reform and what they characterized as the Republicans' heavy-handed control of Congress.

"Senator Reid's actions today embodied the attitude voters rejected in November," said John Hart, spokesman for Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican and a fierce opponent of pork. "While his behavior may pass muster with the parliamentarian, it won't with taxpayers in Peoria."

The amendment by Mr. DeMint adopted the House's wider definition of "earmarks," to include Army Corps of Engineers water projects, Pentagon weapon systems, and items from other federal entities. Mr. Reid wants only to require disclosure of earmarks for nonfederal entities such as city parks, state universities and private contractors.

Mr. DeMint criticized the unamended ethics bill for revealing a mere 5 percent of earmarks lawmakers bury in complex legislation.

"If we take this bill as it is now," he said, "the public is going to know from Day One that this idea of being open and transparent is just a scam."

Democrats Stumble On Special Projects (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, January 12, 2007

The Senate's new Democratic leaders, the fragility of their thin majority on display for the first time, were set back Thursday when nine Democrats joined with Republicans in support of stricter House-passed rules on lawmakers' pet projects

Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., was forced to delay a final vote on a measure he opposes after losing 51-46 a parliamentary attempt to kill it.

The measure, an amendment to an ethics and lobbying bill, would have adopted a wider definition of "earmarks," specific projects inserted in bills, to include Corps of Engineer water projects, Pentagon weapon systems and items from other federal entities.

The language favored by Reid and Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., would require disclosure of only targeted funds directed to nonfederal entities such as a city park, state universities or private contractors.

DOJ_NMG_0115852

"If we're going to go through all this process, if we're going to change the laws and try to tell the American people that now you can see what we're doing, let's don't try to pull the wool over their eyes," said Sen. Jim DeMint, R-S.C., sponsor of the amendment.

Among the Democrats siding with DeMint were possible presidential candidates Barack Obama, D-Ill., and John Kerry, D-Mass., freshmen Jim Webb of Virginia and Jon Tester of Montana, and Mary Landrieu of Louisiana, who faces a tough reelection bid in 2008.

DeMint insisted that the Senate definition would catch only about 5 percent of earmarks, saying that in most instances lawmakers insert their pet projects not into the bill itself but into the explanatory report language that accompanies the bill and is not subject to a vote.

Rep. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., said that of some 12,852 earmarks found in bills last year, only 534 would be subject to Senate disclosure rules.

The conservative DeMint praised new House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., for backing the more comprehensive earmark rules that the House approved last week. "I'm here to defend her language on behalf of the Democrat colleagues on the House side."

After the move to kill the DeMint language failed, Democrats refused to allow the amendment to be approved by voice, a normal procedure, and an hour later Reid called the entire Senate to the floor to beseech them to reconsider. He did not set a time for a final vote.

"It's important that the Senate rules be amended slowly and with careful bipartisan deliberation," Reid said, stressing that the House didn't spend much time on their version and the Senate approach was "so much better."

Reid argued that his version was stronger than DeMint's in disclosing lawmakers seeking special tax benefits for a small group of people or an industry, and included language requiring lawmakers to certify that they had no personal stake in earmarks they support.

Democratic Whip Dick Durbin, D-Ill., also said the DeMint provision was "unworkable" because it was so broad that it could be applied to thousands of projects included in federal spending bills.

Nine Democrats and independent Joe Lieberman of Connecticut voted against killing the DeMint amendment. Seven Republicans voted against DeMint. The Democrats hold a majority with 49 Democrats and two independents who support the party. Republicans hold 49 seats.

The ethics and lobbying bill, which toughens laws barring lobbyists from providing gifts, meals and free travel to lawmakers, is expected to be on the Senate floor through next week.

Earmark Entertainment (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

Speaking of earmarks (see related Review & Outlook1), Democrats are having their own problems cleaning up bad spending habits, and that's after only a few days in power. Yesterday on the Senate floor, Majority Leader Harry Reid was caught pulling out every stop to kill his own party's plan for earmark reform.

To Speaker Nancy Pelosi's credit, House Democrats recently passed ethics legislation that included provisions making earmarks more transparent. The House bill included a broad definition of earmarks, thereby making it harder to hide them in, say, last-minute conference reports. It also requires Members to file a public disclosure form when they request an earmark, and to state that neither they nor their spouses will financially benefit. It's hard to argue that this is anything but elementary good government.

Unless you are Harry Reid. The ethics reform offered by Senate Democrats contained none of these tougher earmark provisions. So Senate Republicans, led by South Carolina's Jim DeMint, cheekily took the identical language of the House earmark bill and offered it as an amendment to the Senate version. Numerous Democrats instantly denounced it, apparently unaware (or unconcerned) that the language had been sponsored by Ms. Pelosi.

Democrat Dick Durbin then moved to table the amendment, though he lost by 51 to 46. Of the 46 Senators who voted to banish Ms. Pelosi's reform, 38 of them were her fellow Democrats. The seven Republicans who went along with Mr. Reid included some of the GOP's biggest spenders (Trent Lott) and Members of the Appropriations Committee, aka Earmark Central Station. When Senator DeMint then moved to have his amendment accepted by voice vote -- which is customary -- Mr. Durbin objected. The effect of these procedural run-arounds was to give Mr. Reid more time to twist a few more Democratic arms into killing earmark reform.

DOJ_NMG_0115853

By our deadline last night, he still hadn't succeeded, though Senate sources told us that Mr. Reid was considering filing for cloture on the entire ethics bill, thereby foreclosing a vote on the current DeMint amendment. If he prevails, voters will know just much "fiscal discipline" to expect from the new majority.

GOP Flake Out (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

One big test of a new minority is to draw the right lesson from its drubbing at the polls. House Republicans have a long way to go, judging by House Minority Leader John Boehner's decision this week to punish Arizona's Jeff Flake by tossing him off the Judiciary Committee. The offense? Porkbusting.

Mr. Flake should be getting a promotion to the leadership, given how prescient he was in warning his colleagues about the perils of their run-amok "earmarking." He and a few comrades sponsored more than 40 House floor amendments last year to strip pork projects from spending bills. The National Taxpayers Union ranked him the most fiscally conservative member of the House. None of that sits very well with his House colleagues, who blame Mr. Flake for shining public attention on their spend thrift ways. They're especially angry that he talked about this with CBS's "60 Minutes," which chose to run the program on election eve weekend.

A spokesman for Mr. Boehner says Mr. Flake's Judiciary ejection isn't punitive, and is merely the bad luck of the draw now that the GOP has fewer seats in the minority. However, that is hard to credit given that Mr. Flake had more seniority on Judiciary than six other Republicans who didn't lose their seats. Mr. Flake retains seats on two lesser committees.

Meanwhile, Mr. Boehner has asked California's Jerry Lewis to remain the ranking Republican on the Appropriations Committee. As Chairman, Mr. Lewis allowed 13,997 earmarks in the 2005 budget. He is also under investigation for relationships with lobbyists amid allegations of "pay to play" earmarking. The Duke Cunningham payments-for-pork crimes happened on his watch. If Republicans truly believed in limited government, Mr. Flake would be running Appropriations and Mr. Lewis would be a back-bencher.

Only last year, while making his move to replace Tom DeLay as Republican Majority Leader, Mr. Boehner ran as a budget reformer. He declared that "My Republican colleague, Jeff Flake of Arizona, has bold ideas to solve this problem. . . . I support his efforts." Well, never mind. If Republicans think that punishing their most principled Members is smart politics, their time in exile could be very long indeed.

GOP Hits Pelosi's 'Hypocrisy' On Wage Bill (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 12, 2007

House Republicans yesterday declared "something fishy" about the major tuna company in House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's San Francisco district being exempted from the minimum-wage increase that Democrats approved this week.

"I am shocked," said Rep. Eric Cantor, Virginia Republican and his party's chief deputy whip, noting that Mrs. Pelosi campaigned heavily on promises of honest government. "Now we find out that she is exempting hometown companies from minimum wage. This is exactly the hypocrisy and double talk that we have come to expect from the Democrats."

On Wednesday, the House voted to raise the minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 per hour.

The bill also extends for the first time the federal minimum wage to the U.S. territory of the Northern Mariana Islands. However, it exempts American Samoa, another Pacific island territory that would become the only U.S. territory not subject to federal minimum-wage laws.

One of the biggest opponents of the federal minimum wage in Samoa is StarKist Tuna, which owns one of the two packing plants that together employ more than 5,000 Samoans, or nearly 75 percent of the island's work force. StarKist's parent company,

DOJ_NMG_0115854

Del Monte Corp., has headquarters in San Francisco, which is represented by Mrs. Pelosi. The other plant belongs to California-based Chicken of the Sea.

"There's something fishy going on here," said Rep. Patrick T. McHenry, North Carolina Republican.

During the House debate yesterday on stem-cell research, Mr. McHenry raised a parliamentary inquiry as to whether an amendment could be offered that would exempt American Samoa from stem-cell research, "just as it was for the minimum-wage bill."

A clearly perturbed Rep. Barney Frank, the Massachusetts Democrat who was presiding, cut off Mr. McHenry and shouted, "No, it would not be."

"So, the chair is saying I may not offer an amendment exempting American Samoa?" Mr. McHenry pressed.

"The gentleman is making a speech and will sustain," Mr. Frank shouted as he slammed his large wooden gavel against the rostrum.

Some Republicans who voted in favor of the minimum-wage bill were particularly irritated to learn yesterday -- after their vote -- that the legislation did not include American Samoa.

"I was troubled to learn of this exemption," said Rep. Mark Steven Kirk, Illinois Republican. "My intention was to raise the minimum wage for everyone. We shouldn't permit any special favors or exemptions that are not widely discussed in Congress. This is the problem with rushing legislation through without full debate."

A spokeswoman for Mrs. Pelosi said Wednesday that the speaker has not been lobbied in any way by StarKist or Del Monte.

Bush-Democrat Alliance On Education Law Feared (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, January 12, 2007

Some conservatives on Capitol Hill are worried that President Bush will cut a deal with Democrats that would not only renew his education law, but also dramatically expand it, including perhaps more requirements for the high school level.

"I am concerned, and I think a lot of conservatives are," said Rep. Jeff Flake, Arizona Republican.

Mr. Bush is urging Congress this year to renew one of his biggest domestic accomplishments, the No Child Left Behind (NCLB) law of 2002, which aims to increase student achievement through more testing and by tracking results of schools and holding them accountable. Democrats, who now control the House and Senate, are demanding some changes to the law, most notably a significant boost in funding levels.

The option of adding high school reform to this year's "to-do" list hasn't been publicly discussed lately, but Mr. Bush included the makings of such a plan in his budget proposal last year. The NCLB law focuses on grade school and requires testing just once in reading and math from grades 10 to 12. His plan from last year would have expanded high school testing to all three years.

All these factors could add up to the perfect storm of more funding and more school requirements, some Republicans worry. Mr. Flake said he sees a scenario in which Mr. Bush gives Democrats the increased funding they want in exchange for including more requirements for high school.

"Conservatives don't fear the president will work with Democrats to expand No Child Left Behind, we expect it," said Rep. Mike Pence, Indiana Republican. "It's going to be more red tape and more resources."

"It's a legitimate concern," agreed Rep. Dan Lungren, California Republican.

Republicans are basing much of their fear on what happened in 2001, when Mr. Bush teamed up with Democrats such as Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts to win overwhelming approval in Congress. But conservatives -- several of whom voted against the legislation as a federal intrusion into the classroom -- said the good administration ideas, such as increased funding flexibility for states, were watered down by the time the measure reached the president's desk.

Rep. Steve King, Iowa Republican, said education policy seems to be an issue on which Mr. Bush thinks he can work with Democrats to accomplish his goals, especially in these last two years of his presidency.

"My rationale is that the president's agenda is not going to keep him from working with the Democrats at the expense of the Republicans," Mr. King said. "The president is concerned about his legacy."

DOJ_NMG_0115855

So far, Mr. Bush has praised the NCLB law and urged Congress to renew it. He has agreed to work with Congress on some changes to it, but he hasn't indicated his position on the Democrats' funding demands. The high school reform issue didn't come up in a Monday meeting between Mr. Bush and top education lawmakers -- Mr. Kennedy, the new chairman of the Senate education, panel; House education panel Chairman George Miller, California Democrat; and their Republican counterparts, Sen. Michael B. Enzi of Wyoming and Rep. Howard P. "Buck" McKeon of California.

Mr. McKeon, who says it's too soon to fully expand the law in high schools, said: "I hope that it's not something they push for."

Mr. Kennedy supports working on high school reform as part of the NCLB renewal, a spokeswoman said. Mr. Miller doesn't want to simply overlay the NCLB framework onto the high school level, but he thinks high school reform is "critically important," a spokesman said.

White House spokesman Chad Colby said this week, "The administration still believes NCLB should be expanded in high schools as part of broader high school reform."

The administration will submit its 2008 budget request to Congress next month.

Mr. Lungren said conservatives should bend Mr. Bush's ear before he starts negotiating education policy with liberals such as Mr. Kennedy. But this negotiating "dance" will be a challenge, Mr. Lungren acknowledged, especially because many Republicans have spent their entire Capitol Hill careers as members of the majority party.

"We've got to be on our toes," he said.

Rising Costs Make Climb To Higher Education Steeper (USAT)

By Sandra Block

USA Today, January 12, 2007

At a time when even entry-level jobs often require a bachelor's degree, hardly anyone disputes the importance of a college education. Even so, many parents and students struggle to understand why college costs so much.

There's no easy answer.

The House is scheduled to vote Wednesday on a Democratic plan to reduce the cost of borrowing for college. But easing student-loan interest rates won't provide much relief, critics say, unless lawmakers can somehow also slow the inexorable rise in the cost of college.

Laurel Hinshaw of Anchorage says her daughter, Marissa, is attending Bemidji State University in Bemidji, Minn., because she couldn't afford a school closer to home. Marissa, a freshman, looked into several West Coast schools, Hinshaw says.

But "even with the scholarships they were offering, tuition was way out of reach for us," she says.

In the past five years, the average cost of in-state tuition and fees at public colleges has jumped 35% — after adjustment for inflation — according to the College Board. In the past 25 years, the average cost of tuition and fees has risen faster than personal income, consumer prices and even health insurance.

For academic year 2006-07, the average cost of tuition, room and board at a public university was $12,796; for a private school, the total averaged $30,367.

During the same period, the amount of federal direct aid — money that doesn't have to be repaid — has declined, forcing more students to borrow. Nearly two-thirds of college graduates leave school with debt, up from less than half in 1993, according to the non-profit Project on Student Debt. And among those with loans, the average debt has jumped from $9,250 in 1993 to $19,200, a 58% increase after adjustment for inflation.

Many conservatives argue that increasing federal aid will just encourage colleges to raise tuition even more.

"When colleges know if they keep raising tuition, the government is going to keep sending them more aid, they don't have a reason to stop raising it," says Leslie Carbone, an adjunct scholar at the Lexington Institute in Arlington, Va.

Others note, though, that in the past five years, college costs continued to rise faster than inflation, even though financial aid declined.

"Financial aid over the years has had a very minimal effect on increased college costs," says Michael Dannenberg, director of education policy for the New America Foundation and former aide to Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass.

DOJ_NMG_0115856

Pamela Hrovoski says her daughter, Sarah, a junior at the Maryland Institute College of Art in Baltimore, received scholarships that cover only about a fifth of her costs. The Hrovoskis, who live in a suburb of Pittsburgh, also cleaned out their emergency savings account and their college savings fund and borrowed from Pamela's 401(k) plan. Still, Sarah will graduate with about $45,000 in loans.

Complicating matters, Sarah's tuition has risen every year she's been in school, usually by $1,500 to $2,000.

"How do you budget for that?" Hrovoski says. "They make it harder and harder every year."

While conservatives and liberals disagree on the solution to the problem, there's surprising consensus on the reasons for the sharp rise in college costs. Among them:

•Declining state support. At state colleges and universities, which enroll about 75% of all college students, tuition covers only about a third of the cost of educating an in-state student, according to the College Board. The rest of the cost is covered by state subsidies.

But state funding hasn't kept pace with inflation or rising enrollment. State funding is at its lowest in three decades, according to a report released last summer by a commission on higher education created by Education Secretary Margaret Spellings. When state subsidies shrink, colleges and universities have to make up the difference by increasing tuition, cutting programs, or both.

Dannenberg predicts that public college costs won't increase as sharply in 2007 because economic growth has boosted state tax revenue. Still, a return to the days of generous state subsidies for higher education seems unlikely. State budgets are already being squeezed by health care costs for state employees and low-income residents. And those costs are expected to increase as millions of public employees retire.

•An educational arms race. In an effort to reach the top of ranking surveys, such as the popular annual list put out by U.S. News and World Report, many schools spend heavily on state-of-the-art dorms, athletic facilities and well-known professors, analysts say.

While the most excessive spending occurs at elite private schools, it tends to create a Darwinian culture that filters down to smaller and state schools, too, says James Duderstadt, former president of the University of Michigan and a member of the Spellings commission.

"As a university becomes richer and richer, it's able to pick off the best faculty," Duderstadt says. "Institutions that are trying to compete for their own reputations are finding they have to invest enormous resources to build a new lab for a chemistry professor because he's getting offers from other institutions."

Edward Elmendorf, senior vice president for government relations at the American Association of State Colleges and Universities, contends that arms-race spending by public colleges and universities is rare.

"You don't find many state colleges and universities that have their own (funding) sources to build buildings that haven't been approved by the state legislature," he says. "They're public entities and have to respond and be accountable to the state."

•Uneven financial aid. College officials argue that the "sticker price" of college is misleading because most students receive financial aid — in effect, a discount. Yet, critics counter that the system forces students to rely too heavily on loans and fails to provide direct aid to students who need it most.

The Free Application for Federal Student Aid, used by the federal government, states and individual schools to determine financial need, is so complicated "that a lot of people just get discouraged and don't bother to fill it out," Duderstadt says.

Even if parents soldier through the application, they usually don't learn how much aid they'll receive until the spring of their child's senior year in high school. That makes it difficult for families to compare financial aid packages from different schools. In many cases, students don't know how much aid they'll get until they've selected the school they'll attend.

Early-admission programs make it even harder for students and their parents to comparison-shop, Dannenberg says. Harvard and Princeton announced last year that they're abandoning early admission, which forces students to decide as early as December where they'll go to college, but the majority of elite private schools still offer it. Early admission, Dannenberg says, "discriminates against students who need a financial aid package."

Laurel Hinshaw believes her daughter could have qualified for scholarships if she had applied earlier.

DOJ_NMG_0115857

"By the time she figured out what school she wanted to go to, it was too late to apply for academic scholarships, which nobody really tells you," Hinshaw says. "Being first-time college parents, we didn't get it all together in time."

Marissa received a $2,000 volleyball scholarship to attend Bemidji State University, where tuition, room and board cost $12,300 a year. But the family didn't qualify for federal financial aid, so Marissa had to borrow to pay the balance of her college costs.

In many cases, financial aid goes to families who understand the process, not those with the greatest need.

Three-quarters of full-time, dependent students at private schools receive direct aid, and those aid packages average $9,400 a year, according to the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities. Of that, an average of $8,000 is awarded by the college or university, the association says.

But unless a family knows that, they might not even bother to apply to a private school, says James Boyle, president of College Parents of America, an advocacy group. "Many families dismiss higher education in general or particular colleges because they believe, sometimes erroneously, that they can't afford a school, or can't afford college, period."

An even more troubling trend, some analysts say, is a shift toward merit-based aid and tax credits. This type of aid tends to go to students from more affluent families, Duderstadt says.

"You now have this horrible dilemma in which students from prosperous backgrounds are getting more financial aid than students from impoverished backgrounds," he says.

•Economics 101. Finally, colleges and universities raise tuition because they can. The high school graduating class of 2008-09 is expected to be the largest in history, even as the number of seats at traditional four-year colleges has remained about the same. Meanwhile, the income gap between workers with only a high school diploma and those with a college degree continues to widen.

The rising demand means "schools can continue to keep their prices elevated," says Boyle of College Parents of America. "Despite their concerns, people are voting with their feet, and they're willing to pay."

Paul Middendorf, 54, of Richmond, Texas, agrees. The youngest of his three sons will graduate from Texas Christian University in May. When his first son, now 26, applied for college, the Middendorfs applied for dozens of scholarships but were told they earned too much money to qualify for financial aid. They had to finance their children's college education with a mix of savings and federal parent loans.

"My wife and I feel the same way: It's very important to go to college," Middendorf says. "I think that even though we've had our share of soup instead of going out for steak, it's definitely worth it."

OMB Risk Assessment Plan Called Flawed (AP)

By Randolph E. Schmid

AP, January 12, 2007

Federal agencies seeking to protect the public, the environment or setting rules in general often have to prepare risk assessments. A Bush administration attempt to standardize that process didn't work out, though, and will go back to the drawing board.

The Office of Management and Budget said it will not finalize its original proposal after the independent National Research Council called the plan "fundamentally flawed."

Steven Aitken, acting administrator for OMB's office of information and regulatory affairs, said his agency will study the report as well as comments from the public and other government offices and will "seek to develop improved guidance for risk assessment."

Aitken said OMB is pleased that the Research Council agreed on the need to improve the quality of risk assessments, and takes very seriously the panel's criticism of the original plan. OMB had asked the council to review the proposed standards, which it issued last January.

Many federal agencies conduct risk assessments as part of their regulatory activities, ranging from such topics as exposure to chemicals to the safety of construction projects.

DOJ_NMG_0115858

But the Council said OMB's definition of risk assessment was too broad and said the proposed standards move into "territory beyond what previous reports have recommended and beyond the current state of the science."

"We began our review of the draft bulletin thinking we would only be recommending changes, but the more we dug into it, the more we realized that from a scientific and technical standpoint, it should be withdrawn altogether," John F. Ahearne, chair of the committee that wrote the report, said in a statement.

Ahearne is director of the ethics program at Sigma Xi, the scientific research society, based in Research Triangle Park, N.C.

The report said many of the standards are unclear and several topics are omitted.

The report also questioned OMB's definition of an adverse health effect as something than is clinically diagnosed. That ignores a basic public health goal to control exposures before they cause physical damage, the report said.

The NRC report urged OMB to issue a new standards outlining goals and general principles for risk assessments, but directing federal agencies to develop their own technical guidelines.

The National Research Council is an arm of the National Academy of Sciences, an independent organization chartered by Congress to advise the government on scientific matters.

White House, In Rare Move, Yields To Scientific Panel On Policy Plan (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON -- In what could be a first for the Bush administration, a panel of outside scientists has prompted the White House to overturn a policy initiative, as officials withdrew proposed changes in the way federal agencies conduct risk assessments.

The Office of Management and Budget said it will back off from a proposal to overhaul how the government weighs the wisdom of adopting new health, environmental and safety rules. The National Research Council, in an unusual critique, had derided the administration plan as "too simplistic" and "fundamentally flawed."

The controversy involves an analytical tool called "risk assessment," essentially a written synthesis of scientific evidence and statistical analysis to project whether a rule may be justified by the potential of a hazard or danger to human health, safety or the environment. Consumer groups had complained that the change would set an imprudently high bar to new regulations.

The NRC, a branch of the nonprofit, federally chartered National Academy of Sciences, reviewed the proposal at OMB's request and said the White House should defer more to the rule-making agency's experts, rather than setting guidelines that the council's experts found "too simplistic" and that might "create confusion" in individual agencies.

Following the council's criticism, OMB regulatory chief Steven Aitken said that the White House will modify its plan before making it final. He didn't say how it would be modified, however.

Rep. John Dingell of Michigan, chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, applauded the move and urged the OMB to abandon the effort altogether, saying it "ignores the specific statutory directives" Congress gives federal agencies.

The American Chemistry Council called for the OMB to try another version of the proposal. "OMB has a necessary and important role in advancing the technical quality and objectivity of risk assessments by providing appropriate guidance across the federal government," said the group, which represents the chemical industry.

John Ahearne, who headed the National Research Council panel, said the group's initial intention was to recommend a few changes. "But the more we dug into [the proposal] the more we realized that from a scientific and technical standpoint, it should be withdrawn altogether," he said.

The panel found that the OMB had erred in calling for evidence of adverse health effects, when public-health needs might be better served by regulations that reduce risks before they cause human impairment.

Mr. Ahearne heads the ethics program at Sigma Xi, a scientific-research society based in Research Triangle Park, N.C. Neither Mr. Ahearne nor Mr. Aitken could recall an earlier instance where a panel of outside scientists had prompted the withdrawal of a White House policy initiative.

Risk-Assessment Plan Is Withdrawn (NYT)

By Cornelia Dean

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

The Bush administration yesterday withdrew a proposal to change the way federal agencies assess environmental hazards, health threats and other risks, after an expert panel declared that it was so scientifically flawed that it "could not be rescued."

The panel, appointed by an arm of the National Academy of Sciences, had been convened to evaluate a proposal by the White House Office of Management and Budget to standardize evaluation procedures. The budget office, which proposed the changes a year ago, said they would improve the quality of risk assessments by the Environmental Protection Agency, the Department of Transportation and other agencies.

Critics said the proposed changes were an effort to weaken government regulatory protections against environmental and other hazards.

In sharp contrast to the academy's normally staid language, the panel called the proposal simplistic and said it was "fundamentally flawed" and lacked "information for gauging the benefits to be achieved" by putting it into effect.

The panel said that the agency's standards were unclear, incomplete and unbalanced. The budget office's definition of risk assessment itself "conflicts with long-established concepts and practices," the panel said, and, as a result, "could cause great confusion."

Although the panel endorsed the idea of improving risk assessment in the federal government, it recommended that the development of technical standards "be left to the agencies" conducting the assessments.

Steven Aitkin, a spokesman for the budget office, said the agency was glad that the academy panel supported the idea of improving the evaluation of risk but, given its concerns, would not make the proposal final "in its present form."

Mr. Aitkin said agency officials would decide what to do next after reviewing the report along with comments from the public and the results of an interagency review of the proposal.

"It would still be our plan to develop improved guidance," he said.

Ailing Senator Is Moved From Intensive Care (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 (AP) — Senator Tim Johnson has been transferred out of intensive care and has started to speak, nearly a month after suffering a brain hemorrhage, his doctor said Thursday.

The senator's neurosurgeon, Dr. Vivek Deshmukh, said a magnetic resonance imaging exam on Tuesday showed that the speech centers in his brain were spared injury in the hemorrhage on Dec. 13

"This is confirmed by the fact that he is following commands and has started to say words," Dr. Deshmukh said in a statement from the office of the senator, a South Dakota Democrat.

The senator is to have "aggressive therapy" in inpatient rehabilitation at George Washington University Hospital, the statement said.

On Monday, Mr. Johnson's condition was upgraded to fair from critical, and his doctors said he no longer needed a ventilator. He was being weaned off the tracheotomy tube in his neck, his office said Wednesday.

Mr. Johnson's office has said that recovery is expected to take several months.

Doctors determined that the senator had arteriovenous malformation, a condition that causes arteries and veins to grow abnormally large, become tangled and sometimes burst.

Mr. Johnson's sudden illness raised questions about the Democrats' 51-to-49 majority in the Senate. South Dakota's governor, Mike Rounds, a Republican, would appoint a replacement if Mr. Johnson's seat became vacant because of death or resignation. A Republican appointee would could give Republicans control because of Vice President Dick Cheney's tie-breaking vote.

Tomlinson May Be Going, But He's Staying (WP)

By Al Kamen

DOJ_NMG_0115860

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

Broadcasting Board of Governors Chairman Kenneth Y. Tomlinson has asked President Bush not to nominate him for another term -- probably a good idea, because there was no chance he was going to get confirmed anyway.

But Tomlinson, who got some bad publicity recently when the State Department's inspector general criticized him for overbilling the government and for giving a friend a job, may be around for many months, since he told Bush he would stay until a successor is confirmed.

As it turns out, everyone on the eight-member BBG (there's one opening) is serving on an expired four-year term: Their terms expired in the past few years, but the law lets them continue until replaced. On Tuesday, Bush nominated for new terms his former media adviser, Mark McKinnon, and Washington lawyer D. Jeffrey Hirschberg, but neither is to replace Tomlinson.

Tomlinson told Bush it had been an honor. "However, I have concluded that it would be far more constructive to write a book about my experiences rather than to seek to continue government service," he said in his letter to the president.

Given the critical need for U.S. image improvement abroad, and the BBG's role in overseeing the Voice of America, Radio Free Europe, Radio Free Asia, the Middle East Broadcasting Networks and the Cuba broadcasting operation, that must be one juicy book he's thinking about writing.

Well, maybe not. It'll be a rebuttal of the inspector general's allegations, he said yesterday, and about "the criminalization of politics" in Washington, covering his 28-year career here, going back to his days with Reader's Digest, then to running the VOA and other jobs.

So get those rÃ©sumÃ©s in to White House personnel. The broadcasting board's chairmanship is only half-time, with a nice office, and is paid at the rate of $143,000 a year. We are assured the Senate will immediately confirm almost anyone picked to replace Tomlinson. Forty-eight hours, tops.The Greens Are Seeing Red

Meanwhile, the White House has gotten kudos this week from libs for dropping four especially controversial judicial nominees. But enviros are ripping over some nominees to key environmental posts, zeroing in on Susan E. Dudley, director of the anti-regulatory Mercatus Center at George Mason University. Her nomination to be regulatory chief at the Office of Management and Budget, a pivotal post for enviro issues, died last year in the Republican-controlled Congress.

Even Republicans distanced themselves. Sen. John Warner (Va.), who introduced Dudley at her Senate confirmation hearing, quickly went over her rÃ©sumÃ©, noted she'd been controversial, told her to stand up for her views and said, "I wish you luck, and you're on your own."

Dudley doesn't stand a prayer of confirmation with the Democrats in charge. Enviros say the plan is to put her on the payroll as an adviser and then, at the first opportunity, give her a recess appointment. Such appointments would now be good until the end of 2008, or nearly the end of the administration.

Enviros are also keying on the nomination of William Wehrum, who has been acting head of the air-pollution program at the Environmental Protection Agency since 2005. Wehrum, according to Frank O'Donnell of Clean Air Watch, has been "a principal architect" of administration efforts to weaken standards for smog, soot and mercury. Wehrum is also reported to be likely to get a recess appointment.

Another top recess-appointment prospect is John Correll, who's been renominated as director of the Office of Surface Mining Reclamation and Enforcement at the Interior Department. Enviros and the United Mine Workers don't like his views on environmental and safety standards, O'Donnell noted in an article for TomPaine.com.Burns for the Defense

Who says chivalry is dead? Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns has come to the defense of his colleague, undersecretary for public diplomacy -- and very close Bush friend -- Karen Hughes, in the latest issue of the Foreign Service Journal, which is put out by the career diplomat association.

Burns, in a quite lengthy and impassioned rebuttal to an October article in the journal, wrote "to express my strong disagreement with several assertions" in the piece, especially that she was "wary of the foreign service" and prefers "political appointees."

Arrant balderdash! "Karen is an inclusive leader who has shown great respect for the Foreign and Civil Service," wrote Burns, and career folks "in her office feel a great sense of loyalty to her."

DOJ_NMG_0115861

Yes, indeed. "Karen Hughes is a compassionate and generous person who has bent over backward to rely" on the career people, Burns said.

She's also, as the purportedly offensive October article noted, "really smart, flexible and adaptable, and willing to change her tactics to accommodate the facts." And she's quite capable of defending herself.The Internet Has Many Fathers

Puffery alert! We all know that Al Gore invented the Internet. Now we learn he was hardly the only one. In a news release announcing his new job working for his former chief of staff, former senator Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) has been "praised as 'one of the fathers of the modern Internet.' "

And on the Hill, a news release tells us that Rep. Juanita Millender-McDonald (D-Calif.) is taking over "the reins of the Committee on House Administration, a mammoth organization [and] prestigious Committee."

You mean the one former representative Bob Ney (R-Ohio) used to run?

Inside The Ring (WT)

By Bill Gertz And Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 12, 2007

NDU hacked

Computers and information networks at the National Defense University (NDU), the Joint Chiefs military education school at Fort McNair in Washington, were hacked and damaged by unknown attackers, defense officials said.

The attacks, described by officials only as "malicious activity," caused the university to shut down all its network servers and replace laptop computers after the activity was detected last month. The costs were high, officials said.

Officials close to the situation said the computer intrusions were identified during routine maintenance and led to suspicions that the hackers had planted clandestine "trap doors" into the system that would allow them future access, or would facilitate computer attacks.

The only way to ensure the security of the systems was to replace them, we are told.

The shutdown forced the university's faculty and students to rely on personal e-mail and laptops, limiting work at the school.

NDU spokesman Dave Thomas declined to comment when asked about the hacking but said some laptops were replaced for faculty members.

Officials would not say where the attacks originated, but the shutdown of the entire computer network at NDU lasted from Dec. 18 until earlier this week. Official suspicions are focused on Chinese hackers, based on similar attacks on Pentagon and military computer networks.

Chinese-origin computer attacks, most likely government-sponsored action by hackers, crippled information systems at the Naval War College in Rhode Island in November and forced a similar collegewide shutdown.

Chinese hackers also were involved in the electronic theft in 2005 of hundreds of evaluation reports on Air Force officers, ranging from generals to captains. The information in the reports would be valuable to Chinese intelligence for its targeted agent recruitment efforts.

The U.S. Strategic Command, which is in charge of Defense Department computer security, issued an alert Nov. 17, calling for raising the security alert level for about 12,000 Pentagon computer networks and 5 million computers.

Somalian suspect

The United States thinks an air strike Monday in southern Somalia may have wounded an al Qaeda-trained leader of the most violent militia that helped seize the capital, Mogadishu, earlier this year.

Defenses sources said Aden Hashi Ayro, who led the Hizbul Shabaab, a violent army of young Islamists within the Somalian Islamic Courts Union, "is thought to have been wounded." The Islamic Courts Union captured the capital last year, but a combined Ethiopian-Somalian government force routed the Islamists last month and regained Mogadishu.

The sources said the United States obtained bloody clothes at the scene where five to 10 al Qaeda-linked suspects were killed.

The sources declined to say how the clothing was obtained, but one source said U.S. commandos were operating in Somalia.

DOJ_NMG_0115862

Ayro is no small fish. He was trained in one of Osama bin Laden's terror camps in Afghanistan before the 2001 U.S.-led invasion to topple the hard-line Taliban regime. He operated with al Qaeda members in Somalia and was thought to have associated with the three main targets of Monday's attack: Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, Saleh Ali Saleh Nabhan and Abu Taha al-Sudani.

Mohammed and Nabhan are wanted by the United States on suspicion of planning and carrying out the 1998 bombings of two U.S. embassies in East Africa. Al-Sudani is an explosives specialist suspected of ties to al Qaeda.

Ayro was quickly moving up the chain of command among Islamists in Somalia. The United States viewed him as perhaps the future leader of al Qaeda in the region, a post held by Mohammed.

A U.S. official in Nairobi told reporters yesterday that none of the top three targets was killed.

Intelligence backlog

Army Lt. Gen. Keith B. Alexander, the director of the National Security Agency, told Congress recently that the NSA is struggling to deal with a large volume of foreign language intercepts on terrorism.

Gen. Alexander said there is a backlog of untranslated electronic intelligence leads on terrorists that has grown since 2001.

"Unfortunately, it is a very labor intensive exercise to sift through large volumes of foreign language data and painstakingly attempt to separate the wheat from the chaff," he said in written answers to questions from senators.

"This dilemma is compounded by the fact that the target set has expanded exponentially since 2001 in terms of geographic reach and languages used," he said. "Today's backlog is no longer confined to Arabic and its multiple dialects, but also includes a variety of other less commonly taught languages, where linguists eligible for security clearances are in short supply."

Gen. Alexander said spying on "vague and fragmentary" terrorist communications is only one step in foiling attacks. "It is more likely that a combination of intelligence sources will be necessary to prevent a terrorist attack," he said, warning that al Qaeda is still plotting "catastrophic" attacks.

"What [signals intelligence] can do is work hand-in-glove with other intelligence agencies, the military and law enforcement to enable key takedowns, so that the details of a plot can be uncovered through interrogation and forensics exploitation," he said.

"That being said, the translation backlog can prevent the timely delivery of key information to NSA's customers and stall development efforts against new targets."

NSA currently is hiring linguists capable of translating "GWOT languages," he said, using the Pentagon acronym for the global war on terrorism.

Lots of laughs

Soldiers in Iraq haven't lost their sense of humor. A few of them created a cartoon strip that pokes fun at colleagues and allies.

Of the many Army officers who come to Baghdad to write "lessons learned" reports, a cartoon shows a soldier flying in on one plane and quickly leaving on another.

"You see them at the end of every month," the caption says. "Teams from the CTCs, Center for Army Lessons Learned, and the Pentagon. They are here to help with advice while collecting combat pay and combat patches. They land in one plane and leave for home on the next one leaving. They slap on a combat patch and make up some war stories on the way to the next bird. You know who you are."

Another cartoon pokes fun at Air Force personnel on the tarmac.

"Don't let the cool glasses and baggy clothes confuse you. These guys are not dancing. They are communicating through sign language. They have cool names like Stabs, Chum, Snapper and Radar. They fly through the sky with the greatest of ease and talk about it later at Al Udeid over three beers."

Al Udeid is the vast U.S. air base in Qatar in the Persian Gulf.

Coins Used To Spy On Pentagon Contractors (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

DOJ_NMG_0115863

The Washington Times, January 12, 2007

Foreign spies are literally following the money to keep a close eye on Pentagon contractors, who are reporting that Canadian coins with Radio Frequency Identification chips have been planted in their clothing.

"On at least three separate occasions between October 2005 and January 2006, cleared defense contractors' employees traveling through Canada have discovered radio frequency transmitters embedded in Canadian coins placed on their persons," according to a report by the U.S. Defense Security Service titled "Technology Collections Trends in the U.S. Defense Industry."

Martha Deutscher, a spokeswoman for the security service, confirmed the report and said it was intended to notify security officials, defense contractors and Pentagon policy-makers of spy technology being used.

"We want people to be aware of new technology and that there are all kinds of ways to collect information," Miss Deutscher said.

The Washington Times reported last week that officials think China, Russia and Iran are leaders in using the technology to spy. The security service report said recent cases of spies targeting contractors include a foreign national attempting to hack a computer system and a woman who tried to seduce a contractor into giving up a password.

Radio Frequency Identification (RFID) chips transmit information to a portable device and are used for tracking. They often are implanted in pets so the animals can be tracked if they are stolen or lost.

The Times reported in December 2004 that badges worn by high-level attendees of the World Summit on the Information Society were affixed with the chips without their knowledge.

Gary Fowlie, a spokesman for the International Telecommunication Union, which hosted the Geneva event, scoffed at concerns by privacy advocates that the technology could be used to monitor a person's movement.

The revelation of the chips in the badges "sent off a shot heard around the world," said Katherine Albrecht, director of Consumers Against Supermarket Privacy Invasion and Numbering, a leading opponent of RFID technology.

The Canadian Security Intelligence Service told the Associated Press it has no knowledge of who is distributing the coins or planting the objects on U.S. officials, and rejected any assertion that Canada's government is spying on Americans.

"It would seem unthinkable," said David Harris, former chief of strategic planning for the Canadian service. "I wouldn't expect to see any offensive operation against the Americans."

The CIA has developed a U.S. silver-dollar coin in which film or other tiny objects can be hidden. Canada's largest coin is more than an inch wide.

"I'm surprised this is getting so much attention. We fell into the middle of a hot technology debate," Miss Deutscher said.

Mrs. Bush Praises Treasury Renovation (AP)

By Martin Crutsinger

AP, January 12, 2007

First lady Laura Bush went next door to the Treasury Department Thursday and pronounced herself impressed with the remodeling at 1500 Pennsylvania Avenue.

Mrs. Bush joined Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson in a ribbon cutting ceremony to mark the completion of a 10-year renovation of the Treasury Building, which is the third oldest government structure in Washington behind the Capitol and the White House.

"All Americans will benefit by having this historic landmark preserved for future generations," Mrs. Bush told the crowd.

Paulson said that a building housing the U.S. Treasury had been on the same spot next to the White House since 1800. But Paulson said at times it would have been "helpful to be a little farther away," such as in 1814 when British troops, after setting fire to the White House, decided to torch the Treasury building for good measure.

The current structure, begun in 1836, had not undergone a major renovation since the beginning of the last century.

The 10-year project, finished at a cost of $247 million, restored the buildings' lost grandeur by uncovering painted ceilings and skylights that had not been seen for decades and by refurbishing the ornate Cash Room, site of Ulysses Grant's first inaugural ball in 1869.

DOJ_NMG_0115864

The renovation also included a major upgrade of heating, plumbing and electrical systems to bring the building into the computer age.

Mrs. Bush, who has been a big supporter of historic preservation, was given a tour of some of the restored rooms including the Salmon P. Chase suite, where Abraham Lincoln's Treasury secretary had his offices, and the Andrew Johnson suite, where Lincoln's successor worked for eight weeks in 1865 after the assassination.

In her remarks, Mrs. Bush praised Chase, who went on to become chief justice of the Supreme Court, for being the first official to introduce women into the federal work force by hiring them to replace men who had left to fight in the Civil War.

The Treasury Department is open during the week only to visitors with appointments, but the public can take guided tours on Saturday by making advance reservations through their congressional offices.

No Small Change At The Treasury (WP)

By Laura Sessions Stepp

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

Poor Treasury Building. We hardly pay it any attention, except yesterday when the first lady took a tour.

More than 500,000 gross square feet, made of magnificent granite, it sits on Pennsylvania Avenue NW adjacent to its famous first cousin, the White House. It houses 760 people who tax us, manage our money and fight money-laundering schemes here and abroad.

It has been described as among the country's first office buildings when it was occupied in 1839, and its picture adorns the back of every $10 bill.

Yet few stop by. No crowds huddle on the plaza on the Pennsylvania Avenue side, no lines snake past the statue of Alexander Hamilton, the first Treasury secretary. Perhaps that's because it takes a call to a member of Congress to arrange a tour. But when was the last time you saw tourists anywhere near it clicking their disposable cameras? Or a broadcast reporter doing a stand-up?

Official tours take place every Saturday, but only half of those who sign up show up, according to Treasury spokeswoman Eileen Gilligan.

Yesterday, for a few minutes, more than a few people took notice. Sort of. Like the wallflower who glams up before going to a party, hoping someone will pay attention, Treasury has just completed a $247 million renovation, and a hundred or so people were on hand to witness Laura Bush celebrate the moment.

So, okay, maybe most of those people came to see the first lady, including the half-dozen reporters and photographers who accompanied her on a private tour of the building's most-prized rooms. Gilligan seemed thrilled to see so much media attention.

One of them offered that the Treasury doesn't exactly draw throngs.

"You're going to change that, aren't you?" she asked.

The restoration was for more than looks, apparently. According to Treasury officials, the old lady was downright feeble. Her plumbing was falling apart, her heating system was inefficient, her elevators stalled between floors, and her building and safety codes were out of date.

Nineteenth-century history buffs and fans of America's Gilded Age will rejoice that in the process of remedying those deficiencies, several rooms were returned to their luxurious past state.

The Andrew Johnson Suite, overlooking the White House, is decorated in the ornamental style of the 19th-century New York firm Pottier & Stymus. Gold leaf is everywhere; think Manhattan's Plaza Hotel in its heyday. It is in these rooms that upon Lincoln's death, Andrew Johnson took up residence for six weeks while Mary Todd Lincoln recovered from her husband's death and planned her departure. He held his first Cabinet meeting here.

The Chase Room, named for Salmon Chase, who was Treasury secretary under Lincoln and later a Supreme Court chief justice, displays some of the department's 5,000 art objects collected by Andrew Mellon when he was Treasury secretary.

The Cash Room and the West Dome, actually three small glass domes modeled on the originals of 1867-69, are regarded as the department's most important architectural spaces. The two-story Cash Room, called that because in the early days, anyone could walk in and cash a government check, is the most ornate of all the rooms, built of seven kinds of marble and featuring a gilded ceiling.

DOJ_NMG_0115865

It is also a room with a story, told yesterday by Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson. It seems that prior to opening as a bank, the room was chosen to host the inaugural reception for President Ulysses S. Grant on March 4, 1869. Two thousand invitations were sold, each admitting one man and two women.

March can be mighty chilly in Washington. No one had anticipated 6,000 guests turning up in coats, but they did. The coats were piled in the fourth-floor cloakroom, with no regard for a numbering system. According to a report the next day in the Evening Star, a "wild hunt for overcoats" ensued, with some guests waiting for hours for their garments, and others leaving without wraps and returning the next day to try again.

Six thousand guests. Those were the days.

OTHER NEWS:

Fed Official Outlines Threats To Economy (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

New York Fed President Timothy Geithner delivered one of his strongest warnings yet on threats facing the U.S. economy, citing the budget deficit, fixed exchange rates and growing inequality.

In his three years on the job, Mr. Geithner has taken on the New York Fed's traditional role as chief worry wart. But some of his past warnings have been muffled by opaque and wonky language. (Read the full speech.1)

He was far clearer in a speech today to the Council on Foreign Relations in New York. He said some countries, to keep their currencies fixed to the dollar, are accumulating big reserves of dollar-denominated securities, thereby holding down long-term interest rates, which might be distorting U.S. growth and investment. He didn't name the offenders, but China and some Persian Gulf oil exporters are probable candidates.

He also ventured into politically charged terrain that Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke has tried to avoid. (He will be tested on that when he appears before the Senate Budget Committee next Thursday.) Mr. Geithner warned that current year deficits are too high while Mr. Bernanke has generally limited his concerns to the threat of higher entitlement spending in later years.

Mr. Geithner said, "Even … before the increase in number of retirees starts to have a major impact on Social Security and Medicare expenditures, we are running an unsustainably large fiscal deficit."

Mr. Bernanke has refused to comment on the budget process, but Mr. Geithner explicitly endorsed the new Democratic majority's move to restore "pay-go" rules that require new tax cuts or spending programs to be funded with offsetting revenues or spending cuts. But "they need to be complemented by a consensus on policy changes that will produce smaller future deficits."

WSJ's Greg Ip, economist David Resler3 of Nomura Securities and CNBC's Rick Santelli discuss recent comments from Federal Reserve Bank of New York President Timothy Geithner regarding financial markets.

He also echoed San Francisco Fed President Janet Yellen on the threat of growing inequality. And paraphrasing his former boss, former Treasury Secretary Lawrence Summers, he said it's "not enough" to say globalization is inevitable and protectionism will only hurt. Nor, he suggested, is it enough to call for more education and a better safety net: they "have a long fuse and they may not yield the hoped-for increase in support." He didn't, however, say what steps should be taken.

After the speech he said he took little comfort in the lack of broader fallout from the demise of the hedge fund Amaranth. "It was very interesting but very special" episode that may not have broader lessons on the impact of hedge funds, he said.

While Mr. Geithner has yet to state a view on whether the Fed should adopt an inflation target, he said such a target was compatible with the Fed's existing mandate to aim for both stable prices and full employment.

Separately, Boston Federal Reserve President Cathy Minehan is set to retire in 2007, according to a statement from the Boston Fed published Thursday. Ms. Minehan, who will be a voting member of the Federal Open Market Committee this year, has headed the Boston Fed since 1994. She had joined the New York Fed in 1968.

DOJ_NMG_0115866

"I am proud of my service at the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston, and earlier at the New York Fed," Ms. Minehan said in a statement. However, she added that "at this point in my life, I have decided that the time is right to move on in the interests of broadening and diversifying my career."

According to the press release, Ms. Minehan doesn't have any specific future plans, and will continue as president of the Boston Fed until her successor is in place. "I look forward to actively leading the excellent staff of the Bank and service on the Federal Open Market Committee until the selection process is complete," she said in the press release.

A search committee will be formed and headed by Lisa Lynch, chairwoman of the Boston Fed's board of directors. The committee will be made up of bank directors, the statement said. Lynch is Professor of International Economic Affairs at Tufts University's Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy.

--Madeleine Lim contributed to this article.

Jobless Claims Tumble In Latest Week (WSJ)

By Brian Blackstone

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The number of U.S. workers filing new claims for unemployment benefits tumbled in the latest week, pushing below a key threshold and providing further evidence that labor market conditions remain quite strong.

New claims for unemployment insurance decreased by 26,000 to 299,000 in the week ended Jan. 6, the Labor Department said Thursday, the lowest level since July 22, when claims were also 299,000. Economists consider claims levels consistently below 300,000 as consistent with very tight labor markets. The prior week's reading was revised to 325,000 from a previously reported level of 329,000.

There were no special factors in the latest week, the Labor Department said, though an official pointed out that seasonal volatility related to the holidays is pronounced this time of year. The official said weekly readings should stabilize by mid-January.

The claims data were well below Wall Street expectations. The median forecast of economists surveyed by Dow Jones Newswires was for claims to fall by just 9,000 to 320,000. The four-week average, which smooths out weekly fluctuations, fell by 1,750 to 314,750.

The claims data for early January come on the heels of a surprisingly strong December employment report, suggesting that labor markets remain tight. Payrolls expanded by 167,000 in December, and the unemployment rate sits at just 4.5%. Last week's robust December jobs report dashed hopes for any near-term reduction in official interest rates by the Federal Reserve, which remains on guard for heightened inflation pressures.

In the Labor Department report Thursday, continuing claims for workers drawing unemployment benefits for more than a week decreased by 3,000 to 2,428,000 in the week ended Dec. 30, the latest week for which such data are available.

The jobless rate for workers with unemployment insurance was 1.9% in the week ended Dec. 30, unchanged from the previous week.

The Labor Department said 28 states and territories reported an increase in jobless claims during the Dec. 30 week, while 25 reported a decrease. Wisconsin reported the biggest increase in claims, 17,462, because of layoffs in construction, trade, service, transportation and manufacturing industries. California reported the biggest decrease, 9,084, due to fewer layoffs in trade and service industries.

Rapid Plunge In Price Of Oil May Fuel Growth (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse, Ann Davis And Bhushan Bahree

Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

Oil prices fell sharply yesterday and are now hovering at their lowest levels since mid-2005, raising the prospect of significant changes in the outlook for corporate profits, consumer spending and the global economy.

Crude oil fell another $2.14, or 4%, to $51.88 a barrel yesterday on the New York Mercantile Exchange. The price has plunged 15% since the year began, and hasn't closed as low since May 27, 2005. Oil is now down 33% from its record finish of $77.03 on July 14.

DOJ_NMG_0115867

The slide, which market participants said was fueled in part by speculative hedge-fund trading and a retreat by other investors, helped send stocks higher as investors bet lower energy prices would fatten corporate profits and strengthen economic growth, particularly in the U.S., the world's leading oil consumer. The Dow Jones Industrial Average jumped 72.82 points, or 0.59%, to a record close of 12514.98. (See related article1).

The price of oil tends to be volatile, and it could bounce back quickly. But if sustained, the decline in prices would have a big impact on everything from the American consumer to the profits of giant energy companies. It also could dent the revenues -- and the political clout -- of major oil-producing nations like Russia, Iran and Venezuela.

A senior official of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries said yesterday that OPEC will consider the need for an emergency meeting to weigh what it should do to halt the price slide. OPEC already was cutting back its production sharply, the official said. He didn't specify whether the cartel would consider cuts beyond the 1.7 million barrels a day it has already pledged to remove from the market.

If lower oil prices lead to a reduction in what American consumers spend on gasoline, it would leave them with more money for all kinds of discretionary purchases, such as restaurant meals, movies and vacations. That spending could provide a welcome cushion for the U.S. economy, which is grappling with a sharp downturn in the housing sector. It could also give a boost to airlines and auto makers, which have been hurt by high fuel prices.

As yet, the drop in oil prices hasn't produced much relief at the gas pump. Regular gasoline is selling at a nationwide average of $2.28 a gallon -- down from more than $3 this summer in many parts of the country -- but just a penny less than in December, according to auto club AAA.

Nonetheless, oil's pullback "is coming at a great moment for the U.S. economy," says Ethan Harris, chief U.S. economist at Lehman Brothers in New York, who estimates that each $10 reduction in oil prices adds about a half percentage point to annualized growth in inflation-adjusted gross domestic product -- a broad measure of economic activity.

"You're worried about this one-two punch from housing -- first construction collapses, and then the consumer collapses. Lower energy prices are acting as a sort of smelling salt," Mr. Harris said.

Indeed, many economists credit the retreat of energy prices from their summer peaks for a recent bout of stronger-than-expected economic performance. Nonfarm payrolls in the U.S. grew by a seasonally adjusted 167,000 jobs in December, and economists expect inflation-adjusted consumer spending to have grown more than 4% in the fourth quarter of 2006. That has led some to raise their estimates of inflation-adjusted GDP growth in the fourth quarter to an annual rate of more than 3%, compared with forecasts of about 2% just a month ago.

The added impetus for the U.S. economy could change the picture for the Federal Reserve, which is trying to keep short-term interest rates high enough to keep inflation under control, but not so high as to cripple the economy. In recent months, prices in bond and futures markets have suggested that investors expect a slowing economy and receding inflation pressures to allow the Fed to lower interest rates in 2007. As oil prices have fallen, though, those expectations have changed.

"If this acts like a tax cut and consumers spend a lot of it, then it just makes the Fed more and more likely to stay on hold and to watch carefully what happens to inflation," said Richard Berner, chief U.S. economist at Morgan Stanley in New York. In futures markets yesterday, investors placed a 30% probability on the Fed lowering short-term interest rates to 5% by July from the current 5.25%. That was down from 44% Wednesday.

The strength of the U.S. and global economies is one reason many doubt oil prices will remain weak for long. "I would expect to see the market bounce back," said Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at consulting firm Global Insight. "The fundamental in terms of the oil market is demand growth, which comes from economic growth. From that perspective, we don't see any further weakening."

Analysts attribute lower oil prices in part to the fact that, with the start of the new year, many large institutional investors, such as pension funds, have been pulling back from energy investments. Also, unseasonably warm weather in many parts of the U.S. spilled into January, temporarily reducing oil demand.

If it continues, however, the current drop in oil prices would create a number of winners and losers. Companies whose fortunes depend on heavy oil consumption, from auto makers to airlines, could see their profits grow. On the other hand, oil companies would see their earnings fall, and investors that bet big on rising oil prices could find themselves in trouble.

DOJ_NMG_0115868

Lower oil prices are "a plus for us," said Paul Ballew, top sales analyst at General Motors Corp., noting that higher oil prices significantly crimped auto demand last year. GM is a top producer of gas-guzzling sport-utility vehicles and pickup trucks and is counting on big sales of its new Chevrolet Silverado; the auto maker has blitzed the airwaves with ads for the pickup during football games.

Auto makers suffered as sales of profitable trucks and SUVs plummeted during the second half of 2006. Gasoline prices that hovered around $3 a gallon pushed consumers away from those vehicles, especially SUVs. Light-truck sales dropped nearly 6% in 2006, according to Autodata Corp.

Even lower prices at the pump, however, wouldn't be a panacea for GM, Ford Motor Co. or DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group. GM and Ford, which have reported billion-dollar losses, are in the midst of restructuring plans that include worker buyouts. And Chrysler, which reported a $1.5 billion loss in last year's third quarter, is set to announce a restructuring plan next month.

Rising oil prices over the past several years have transformed the cost structure of the U.S. airline industry, causing jet fuel to displace labor costs as the industry's No. 1 expense. For every penny decrease in the price of a gallon of jet fuel, the U.S. airline industry saves as much as $195 million in costs annually. At AMR Corp.'s American Airlines, the world's largest carrier by passenger traffic, that amounts to a saving of $30 million a year, or $80 million each time crude oil prices drop by $1 per barrel.

"A drop of any amount is clearly good for the industry, but it's still really high," said John Heimlich, chief economist of the Air Transport Association, a trade group for U.S. airlines.

Cheaper oil would sharply lower earnings of major oil-producing nations, including those in OPEC. Leo Drollas, deputy director of London's International Centre for Global Energy Studies, estimates that OPEC's 11 members earned $518 billion in 2006, up from $437 billion in 2005.

Assuming a fall of about $4 a barrel in oil prices on average this year, and lower output to shore up prices, Mr. Drollas estimates that OPEC export revenues would fall to $488 billion this year. But if prices average about what they are now for all of 2007, the export earnings of OPEC countries -- leaving out Angola, which just joined Jan. 1 -- would fall to 2005 levels, or less if the exporters group slashed output further to support prices.

Major oil companies are also likely to see shrinking earnings from their oil-production operations, the largest source of income for integrated oil companies like Exxon Mobil Corp. BP PLC, Royal Dutch Shell, Chevron Corp. and others. Yesterday, the New York Stock Exchange index of energy shares was down 11% from a recent peak on Dec. 14. Over that period, Exxon Mobil shares have fallen 9.8%, BP shares have shed 9.5%, and Chevron is down 9.6%.

Crude Oil Falls Further, Gratifying Consumers More Than Investors (NYT)

By Clifford Krauss

New York Times, January 12, 2007

HOUSTON, Jan. 11 — Oil prices sank on Thursday to the lowest level in 19 months, providing potential relief to consumers. But investors in energy stocks may wish for a cold spell after they see the fourth-quarter earnings of their stocks in the next few weeks.

The prices of big energy companies have mostly been on a charge up the charts the last few years, as oil prices more than tripled since the beginning of the decade, to about $77 a barrel at one point in July.

But with oil prices sliding in recent weeks — on the New York Mercantile Exchange yesterday, crude oil for February delivery fell $2.14 a barrel, to $51.88 — several Wall Street analysts are predicting that the large integrated companies, refiners and smaller independents will all report significant declines in profit. “It’s not going to be very pretty,” said Fadel Gheit, senior energy analyst at Oppenheimer & Company. “There will be no more record earnings.”

Declining oil prices helped drive up the broader stock market, raising hopes that with inflation fears abating somewhat, the Federal Reserve may even consider lowering interest rates in the coming months. It was a turbulent day for energy traders, with the price of a barrel of oil opening just over $53, climbing at one point beyond $54, and then falling as low as $51.80. Traders who held large positions in oil futures dumped them, while speculators joined in short selling to take advantage of sliding prices.

DOJ_NMG_0115869

"Everyone is looking for the bottom," said Michael Rose, director of the energy trading desk at Angus Jackson in Fort Lauderdale, Fla. "But where is the bottom? Is it $50 a barrel, 40, 30? Nobody knows."

The president of the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, Muhammad bin Dhaen al-Hamli of the United Arab Emirates, was said to have told the Emirates news agency that the group would move to prop up prices if necessary. "OPEC will act to stabilize the market if needed," he was quoted as saying.

But few American analysts seemed to take his implied warning of possible future production cuts very seriously. "We're looking at inventories that are very full," Mr. Rose said. "Even if we have a cold snap, we have the reserves."

As for the major oil companies, predictions of disappointing earnings are based on a fall in the average spot price for benchmark crude oil to $60.06 a barrel last quarter from $70.56 the quarter before. And that slide came as OPEC announced two production cuts in two months at the end of last year.

The price dropped below $52 on Thursday for the first time since May 2005, a move all the more remarkable because it comes as Venezuela gains attention with talk of nationalizing energy and other industries, oil production in Nigeria is threatened by increasing violence, Iranian production is slipping and Russia sporadically cuts the flow to energy to other European nations.

Elsewhere, natural gas futures fell more than 6 percent amid an easing of demand and ample supplies.

Most analysts say oil prices have declined in part because of the uncommonly warm weather until recently in much of the United States and Europe, and amid conservation efforts by business and consumers.

Although retail gasoline prices have dropped considerably since the summer, to a nationwide average just under $2.30 a gallon from just over $3, they have barely moved since the beginning of the year as crude oil fell further. Several energy companies have alerted investors that for the time being at least, their feast of riches is over.

ConocoPhillips announced last week that its refining and marketing margins for the fourth quarter might be down as much as 25 percent. Chevron, the second-largest American energy company, warned this week that it "expects results in the fourth quarter to be adversely affected by lower commodity prices, lower downstream margins and lower refinery utilization attributable to planned maintenance and construction activities worldwide."

BP has reported that its daily oil production declined in the recent quarter to 3.82 million barrels from 4.02 million barrels. Part of BP's problems come from its inability so far to restart production at its giant Thunder Horse platform in the Gulf of Mexico, which was damaged by hurricanes in 2005.

Most of the big producers have been hurt by increased labor and service costs and by declines in oil and gas output in mature fields in North America and the North Sea. Many companies urgently need to modernize and otherwise reinvest in pipeline networks and refineries, and their increasing dependence on finding reserves in unstable areas like Venezuela and Nigeria creates higher security costs.

In recent years, many of those problems were negated by the rising commodity prices of oil and gas, and by share buybacks which increased the value of their stock.

Analysts are divided whether the expected tail-off in energy earnings is temporary or longer-lasting. And while they acknowledge that future oil prices cannot be predicted, they say there is little sign of an immediate rebound, given that American inventories of crude oil are 7 percent higher than the five-year average of 315 million barrels reported by the Energy Department.

"I think this is a seasonal pullback," said Nicole Decker of Bear Stearns, who predicts a rebound in the spring. She said the current drop has pushed oil prices down to levels roughly equivalent to those at this time last year.

Mr. Gheit of Oppenheimer said he expected further pressure on oil prices. "I see prices drifting lower, barring international crises," he said, but then quickly adding, "I would not rule out $80 oil if we invade Iran."

On Wall Street Thursday, ConocoPhillips fell $2.71, or 4.2 percent, to $61.82; Chevron lost 72 cents, or just over 1 percent, ending at $68.69; and BP edged up 12 cents, to $61.59.

Dow Sets Another Record High As Oil Prices, Jobless Claims Decline (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115870

NEW YORK, Jan. 11 -- Investors regained some of their swagger Thursday, sending stocks higher and the Dow Jones industrial average to another record close after oil prices plunged and a drop in unemployment claims indicated that the economy was not slowing too quickly.

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 72.82, or 0.59 percent, to 12,514.98, topping the previous record close reached on Dec. 27 by 4.41 points. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 8.97, or 0.63 percent, to 1423.82. The Nasdaq composite index advanced 25.52, or 1.04 percent, to 2484.85.

Strength in employment indicates that the economy is holding up well as it slows, and a number of strong profit forecasts lent support to that notion Thursday. However, investors want the economy to give off some signs of gradual slowdown so the Federal Reserve will cut interest rates.

Light, sweet crude, which has already declined 15 percent in 2007, fell to its lowest level since May 2005, settling down $2.14 to $51.88 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. A pullback by investment funds and an unusually warm winter has unnerved some investors and in recent days suggested that a period of enormous profits at energy companies might be nearing an end.

The Labor Department said the number of newly laid off workers seeking unemployment benefits fell to a six-month low last week, dropping by 26,000, to 299,000 on a seasonally adjusted basis. It was the first time jobless claims have moved below 300,000 since July.

Comments from a handful of companies on profits added to the upbeat mood on Wall Street and suggested earnings remained strong in the final quarter of 2006.

Movers

Genentech rose $3.66, to $87.40, after reporting that demand for its cancer drugs helped push fourth-quarter profit up 75 percent.

AirTran Holdings rose 48 cents, to $12.40, after sweetening its cash-and-stock offer for rival Midwest Air Group, increasing its bid by about 18 percent.

Midwest gained 50 cents, to $13.40.

Amdocs, a maker of customer-service software, lost $3.63, to $35.70, after lowering its revenue forecast for 2007.

Dow Hits High As Oil Drop Loosens Up Investors (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

With oil futures falling below $52 for the first time since 2005, the Dow Jones Industrial Average jumped to 12514.98, its first record finish of the new year.

Stock investors are showing signs of shaking off the grumpiness with which they began the year, and more than twice as many stocks were up on the New York Stock Exchange as were down. The Dow industrials put in their strongest gain of 2007, rising 72.82 points, or 0.59%. After dipping into the red for the year last week, they have edged back into the black, up 0.4%.

"Oil was the real driver," said Robert Harrington, head of U.S. stock trading at UBS's U.S. brokerage arm. "Lower energy prices are like a tax cut for the consumer."

It was the Dow's 23rd record finish since the start of October, when it first surpassed the record that dated from January 2000. Since moving past that mark, 11722.98, the blue-chip average has risen almost 800 points.

On top of the optimism that cheaper gasoline and other energy costs would help most businesses and consumers, investors are coming to terms with the idea that the Federal Reserve may be slower to cut interest rates than some had hoped.

Signs of economic strength, including positive profit news and last week's report of robust December payrolls, initially worried people who feared it would prevent the Fed from cutting rates in the spring or summer. One reason for last year's rally was the expectation of those cuts, which would reduce borrowing costs for businesses and consumers.

Now, investors seem to be concluding that sustained economic growth and good profits may be enough to keep stocks rising, even if the Fed is slow to cut rates.

DOJ_NMG_0115871

"Perhaps what the market is now saying is, 'OK, we don't get a rate cut, but the economy is fine,' " said Gordon Fowler, chief investment officer at Philadelphia money-management firm Glenmede Trust.

Crude-oil futures, whose decline has accelerated this year, fell $2.14, or 3.96%, to $51.88, the lowest New York finish since May 2005.

Investors reacted to reports that, despite threats from the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries to cut production, OPEC exports have remained strong. That, together with warm weather, suggested supplies will more than cover demand.

Some investors began buying oil stocks again, figuring that the heavy selling was dying down and that the shares were due for a bounce. But at day's end the group sagged. Exxon Mobil, up most of the day, finished slightly lower.

Some people began to hope that the stock-market softness early this year was simply a hangover from last year's big gains. According to that reasoning, investors in the autumn piled into the year's winners in hopes of boosting 2006 performance, and didn't take profits until 2007. Among other things, that permitted them to put off paying capital-gains taxes until 2008.

Treasury-bond prices continued to fall, pushing yields higher. The bond market had widely expected a Fed rate cut by summer. If those prospects are diminished, it means future interest rates will be higher than anticipated, making existing bonds less attractive compared with future ones. The yield of the 10-year Treasury note, 4.737%, was the highest since October.

Apple fell following news that Cisco Systems was suing it over use of the iPhone name, but that didn't prevent resurgent technology stocks from continuing to rise.

Traders said some money managers appeared to be shifting to tech stocks, which trailed the market last year, from once-strong oil stocks. Some analysts forecast that tech stocks would catch up with the broader market this year.

The Nasdaq Composite Index, replete with tech stocks, hit a six-year high, rising 1.04%, or 25.52 points, to 2484.85. It is up 2.9% in 2007.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index advanced 0.63%, or 8.97 points, to 1423.82, up 0.4% this year.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.61%, or 1.44 points, to 238.39.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks advanced1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.94 billion shares, with 2,325 stocks rising and 997 falling.

Bond prices declined2. The 10-year Treasury note fell 14/32, or $4.38 for each $1,000 invested. The 30-year bond was down 26/32 to yield 4.823%.

The dollar strengthened3. Late in New York, it traded at 120.50 yen, up from 119.62, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2894 from $1.2939.

Falling Oil Prices, Jobs Report Spark Stocks (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, January 12, 2007

Investors considered the positive side of falling oil prices Thursday as jobless data indicated the economy's growth is slowing at a moderate pace.

The price of a barrel of oil fell sharply again Thursday by $2.14 to $51.88. Crude is now down 15% this year. Stock investors applauded the decline because it was accompanied by news showing the number of workers seeking new unemployment benefits last week dropped to a six-month low.

Those pieces of news together prompted the Dow Jones industrials to gain 72.82 points to 12,514.98. That's a new record, and pushes the Dow into the black for the year (story, 1B).

The benchmark Standard & Poor's 500 index gained 8.97 points to 1423.82, largely due to strong performances by stocks in the automotive retail, general merchandise stores and information technology services industries. The S&P is up 0.4% this year.

But the biggest winners have been technology stocks. The Nasdaq composite index leapt 25.52 points to 2484.85, pushing it up 2.9% this year and to its highest close since Feb. 15, 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0115872

Some are hoping the Nasdaq's rally could be a start of better performance from growth companies, says John Carey, portfolio manager at Pioneer Investments. "Maybe we're finally seeing the resurgence in the growth sector of the market."

Investors, though, above all celebrated Thursday's evidence of the increasing possibility that the economy's slowdown is "not going to be a hard landing, but a soft landing," says Hugh Johnson of Johnson Illington Advisors. Falling oil prices help consumers, explaining why retail stocks have done so well this year. "Consumers have more money to spend," he says.

Highlights:

Genentech, a biotech firm, jumped $3.66 to $87.40. The company late Wednesday reported 77% higher fourth-quarter profit of $594 million or 55 cents a share.

•Hornbeck Offshore Services, an oil services firm, tanked $7.37 to $26.14 after cutting its outlook for fourth-quarter earnings due to volatile demand for equipment in the Gulf of Mexico.

•Google jumped $10.26 to $499.72 as investors scrambled to increase their exposure to technology stocks.

•ICT Group, a business outsourcing company, fell $2.46 to $26.58. The company cut its fourth-quarter earnings estimates because snowstorms in Colorado hurt its call-center profitability.

Suit Against Vatican Can Proceed (LCJ)

By Jason Riley, The Courier-Journal

Louisville (KY) Courier-Journal, January 12, 2007

Child sex abuse cover-up is alleged

A federal judge in Louisville issued a "historic" decision yesterday by refusing to dismiss a lawsuit against the Vatican that alleges a cover-up to protect priests who molested American children.

"This is the first and only case which has as its sole objective holding the Vatican financially accountable for all of the childhood sexual abuses committed in the U.S.," said Louisville attorney William McMurry, who filed the suit in 2004 on behalf of three men who allege abuse dating as far back as 1928.

If U.S. District Judge John Heyburn II's decision stands, it could open the door for attorneys to take depositions of Vatican officials -- including Pope Benedict XVI -- obtain copies of church records and documents and ultimately determine "what prompted all of the bishops to keep quiet, hide these pedophiles and refuse to report child abusers," McMurry said. He called the decision "historic."

But Jeffrey Lena of Berkeley, Calif., counsel for the Vatican, known legally as the Holy See, said Heyburn's decision rejected portions of McMurry's lawsuit and left the case hanging on a "fairly weak linchpin" -- that U.S. Catholic clergy are employees of the Vatican.

"The Holy See is just not responsible for this, and that's the bottom line," Lena said.

Regardless, the case could be entangled in appeals for years before eventually ending up at the U.S. Supreme Court, McMurry and Lena said.

One of the three plaintiffs is Michael Turner of Louisville, who also filed the first in a wave of roughly 250 sexual-abuse lawsuits against the Archdiocese of Louisville between 2002 and 2003. The litigation culminated in a $25.7 million settlement with most of the plaintiffs. McMurry and his legal team received 40 percent of most plaintiffs' payments.

The two other plaintiffs in the Vatican suit are James H. O'Bryan and Donald E. Poppe, both of whom live in California and say they were abused by priests while growing up in Louisville. All three are asking for unspecified monetary damages from the Vatican.

McMurry also is requesting injunctions requiring the Vatican to "cease its violations of the internationally recognized human rights of children" and "to report all allegations of childhood sexual abuse" in the United States. And he is asking a federal judge to supervise the Vatican's conduct for 10 years.

Legal scholars contacted yesterday said they hadn't thought the lawsuit -- the only sexual-abuse suit naming the Vatican as the sole defendant -- would make it this far, and they still doubt it will survive.

"The Holy See is not responsible for the day-to-day supervision, appointments and discipline of individual clerics," said Mark Chopko, general counsel for the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

DOJ_NMG_0115873

Other legal experts say that no matter the result, it may be impossible to win damages from the Vatican, which is a sovereign state with many legal protections.

"The question is whether you can get a judgment against the Vatican and have them actually pay," said Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond. "I'm surprised you can get jurisdiction in a U.S. court over the Vatican."

But Jeff Anderson, a Minnesota-based attorney who filed a similar suit against the Vatican in 2003 that also has been allowed to go forward, said since the Vatican does business in this country, it submits itself to U.S. laws and legal obligations.

In his ruling, Heyburn refused to dismiss allegations that the Vatican failed to report incidents of child abuse and failed to warn parishioners that their children would be under the care of known or suspected pedophiles. The other claims that remain against the Vatican, according to the ruling, are outrage and emotional distress and violations of the customary law of human rights.

Heyburn, however, did dismiss a negligence claim that the Vatican failed to provide safe care of children entrusted to the clergy. The judge also dismissed deceit and misrepresentation claims.

Lena said the Vatican did not present any evidence before the decision. He said the ruling is based on a preliminary legal challenge in which the judge must treat the facts stated in the complaint as if they were true.

David Clohessy, national director of Survivors Network of those Abused by Priests, said the ruling is a step "towards the truth."

"This is part of a slow but clear trend by judges everywhere to hold wrongdoers responsible for child sex crimes, even if they wear clerical garb."

McMurry is basing a large part of his claim on a secret 1962 Vatican document.

Leaked to the public last year, the document, approved by then-Pope John XXIII, calling for strict secrecy in handling priests accused of soliciting sex in the confessional, he said.

McMurry called it a "smoking gun" that also requires Catholic Church leaders to keep secret other allegations of sexual misconduct.

Some experts in church law have downplayed the significance of the document. They say it only required secrecy in the church disciplinary process and did not prevent a bishop from reporting crimes to police.

McMurry is seeking to have the Vatican suit certified as a class-action case, saying he believes there are "at least several thousand" victims nationwide.

Given Pope Benedict XVI's age, 79, McMurry said he will request that attorneys be able to depose the pope now.

McMurry said that is important because the pope was a bishop on a commission that dealt with priests accused of sexual abuse. "He knows where all the bones are buried," McMurry said.

Reporter Jason Riley can be reached at (502) 582-4727.

Dodd Declares '08 Presidential Candidacy (AP)

By Beth Fouhy

AP, January 12, 2007

Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd announced Thursday he will run for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008, saying problems at home and abroad meant it was time for him to "get out of the bleachers and onto the arena floor."

Dodd, a 26-year Senate veteran, told the "Imus in the Morning" radio show he will file paperwork to establish a campaign committee later in the day.

"I know how to do this. I know what has to be done. I'm going to get out and make my case," Dodd said. He described himself as a dark horse in a Democratic field dominated by Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois — neither of whom have yet entered the race.

"There's a heightened sense of urgency about the condition of the country. But it isn't just Iraq — there are problems here at home that are huge," Dodd said. He said he planned to focus on issues like education, energy policy and health care in his campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0115874

Dodd planned to travel late Thursday to Iowa, home to the first nominating caucus in January 2008. On Sunday, Dodd intended to visit South Carolina, an early primary state.

Several other Democrats have already entered the race or are expected to do so soon.

Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, who leaves office Friday, has announced his presidential candidacy, as have former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich and Delaware Sen. Joe Biden. New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson also probably will run.

Dodd's career in Washington began in 1974 when he was elected to the House in the wake of the Watergate scandal. His father, Thomas J. Dodd, served two terms in the Senate; the younger Dodd won a Senate seat in 1980.

Dodd has forged strong ties with labor unions, advocated fiscal accountability for corporations and championed education and other children's issues. This month, he became chairman of the influential Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee and is a senior member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Dodd voted in 2002 to authorize military intervention in Iraq, but has become an outspoken critic of the war and now calls his vote a mistake. He has said he would oppose an escalation of U.S. forces in Iraq and has said Congress should consider withholding funding for such a troop increase.

Dodd was the chief Senate sponsor of the 1993 Family and Medical Leave Act, which allows workers up to 12 weeks of unpaid leave for the birth or adoption of a child, or to tend to a personal or family illness. He also helped rewrite the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, worked to create after-school initiatives and has introduced legislation to reform the 2002 No Child Left Behind law.

Dodd was a driving force behind the 2002 law that toughened disclosure and conflict-of-interest rules for accounting firms in the wake of securities fraud scandals. He also helped write a terrorism insurance bill, an issue important to his state's insurance industry.

A fluent speaker of Spanish, Dodd served in the Peace Corps in a rural village in Dominican Republic from 1966-68 and has had a strong interest in Latin American affairs throughout his career. As the ranking Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee's western hemisphere subcommittee, he's been able to wield a heavy influence on U.S. involvement in the region.

Although he is firmly positioned in his party's liberal wing, Dodd is noted for a willingness to compromise that has made him capable for forging coalitions with members of both parties.

His role as chairman of the Banking Committee — which oversees the nation's banking, financial services and insurance industries — creates new fundraising opportunities, a potential boost for a long-shot prospect like Dodd who must prove he can raise the tens of million of dollars needed to stay competitive in the 2008 presidential campaign.

Dodd has been politically active on behalf of other Democrats, raising money and campaigning for candidates across the country and headed the Democratic National Committee from 1995-96.

Dodd and his wife, Jackie Marie Clegg, have two daughters, age 5 and 22 months.

The difficulty Dodd faces trying to breakthrough the public consciousness in a race that starts off dominated by political celebrities was underscored in a good-natured exchange with radio host Don Imus.

"I'll tell you who I saw last night who was very impressive was Barack Obama," Imus told Dodd.

"I'm not one of those Hollywood phonies jumping on the Barack Obama bandwagon — I'm going to vote for McCain at this point," Imus added, referring to Arizona Sen. John McCain, the front-runner for the Republican presidential nomination.

"Now wait a minute, wait a minute," Dodd interjected. "I come on the program, I blow everybody else off, I announce here — at least leave the door open a little bit for me here. ... And I'm your pal — 14 years — you can't just walk away from me. You leave that door open a little bit."

Chuckling, Imus responded: "I'm not walking away ... I'm not closing the door, senator."

Dodd Touts Presidential Bid On 'Imus' (CP)

By Peter Urban

Connecticut Post, January 12, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115875

WASHINGTON — After six months of testing the waters, Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd dove headfirst into the 2008 presidential contest Thursday, saying he has the experience and vision to lead the nation in a time of urgency.

"People are crying out for leadership. They want people who can come up with bold solutions on health care, energy policy, environmental questions, education," Dodd said. "I know how to do this. On every major foreign policy and domestic issue for the last quarter century, I've been deeply involved."

Dodd filed a statement of candidacy with the Federal Election Commission on Thursday that will allow him to begin raising funds directly as a presidential candidate. He plans to transfer nearly $5 million sitting in his Senate campaign into the new effort.

He announced his intentions publicly on "Imus in the Morning," a radio show based in New York City. Imus praised Dodd's experience and intellect and said he would raise the level of debate but admitted he was backing Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., for president in 2008.

"Wait a minute. Wait a minute. I come on the program. I blow everybody else off. I announce here. I mean, at least leave the door open for me a little here," Dodd cajoled. "A little quid pro quo, I mean I'm your pal."

Dodd later made a round of telephone calls to reporters from his townhouse here.

In a 10-minute conversation with the Connecticut Post, Dodd acknowledged that winning the Democratic nomination would be difficult but is possible.

Advertisement

He stressed that he will run a positive campaign that focuses on his attributes and ideas. Dodd, 62, has served 26 years in the Senate. He is chairman of the Banking Committee, second in rank on the Health, Education and Labor Committee, and a long-standing member of the Foreign Relations Committee.

"I think experience does matter. I think it matters more this time around as well as the ability to connect with people and bring people together on issues. I have a proven ability to do those things," Dodd said.

Dodd has strong backing for his candidacy from Connecticut Democratic leaders.

Rosa DeLauro, who served as Dodd's chief of staff before being elected to the House, was absolutely enthused by Dodd's decision to run, saying he has the experience and interest to work on behalf of American families.

"This is a time where we are looking for people who can lead, who have both the intellectual and personal makeup to really connect," she said. "Chris Dodd has that vision."

State Party Chairwoman Nancy DiNardo expects Connecticut Democrats will flock to his campaign.

"I think it is exciting for Democrats and for Connecticut," she said.

DiNardo said that Dodd also has a national base of support from his days as general chairman of the Democratic National Committee in the mid-'90s. Sen. Joe Lieberman wished Dodd well in his presidential race but said that he is focusing on his Senate work and not involving himself in any campaigns at this time. Lieberman made a brief, unsuccessful run for the Democratic presidential nod in 2004 and was Al Gore's vice presidential candidate in 2000. Gary Rose, a professor of politics at Sacred Heart University in Fairfield, said that Dodd could easily appeal to voters who are looking for experience — particularly on foreign policy issues.

"He is probably the most substantive on domestic and foreign policy issues among the candidates who are considered viable," Rose said. "It is a very volatile world, and people may be looking for someone who really is experienced."

Larry Sabato, a professor of politics at the University of Virginia, said Dodd should not be written off as a second-tier candidate given the fact that there is no president or vice president in the field.

At the same time, he acknowledged that Dodd would need to raise his name recognition and increase his fundraising to compete with the early frontrunners — Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y.; Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., and former Sen. John Edwards, D-S.C.

Sabato estimated that candidates would need more than $30 million during the primary campaign.

"He is a long shot but there are plenty of long shots who either win the nomination or do very well," Sabato said. "Lightning could strike — everyone else."

DOJ_NMG_0115876

While Dodd has experience on domestic and foreign relations issues, he also has a long voting record as a liberal and will have to overcome what will likely be resistance from many voters to having another Northeast Democratic senator at the top of the ticket, Sabato said.

Dodd said he would advocate a 10-year plan to wean America from its dependence on Middle Eastern oil. He also opposes a military escalation in Iraq and would instead intensify diplomatic efforts in the region — particularly with Syria and Iran.

Dodd described the sectarian strife, insurgent fighting and terrorist threats in Iraq as a "Rubik's Cube" that cannot be resolved with military might alone.

Dodd acknowledged he is a dark horse but is hopeful that voters — particularly those in early primary and caucus states — will give him a chance.

Dodd Says He'll Run For White House (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd, a 30-year Capitol Hill veteran who once headed the national Democratic Party, pitched himself as a voice of experience and a new face in declaring his presidential candidacy Thursday on a radio and cable show.

Normally, Dodd told MSNBC talk-show host Don Imus, 25 years in the Senate (preceded by six in the House) would "exclude you from even considering higher office. But I think people this time around believe experience matters."

Dodd is the latest Democrat to join an expanding field. Outgoing Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich and former North Carolina senator John Edwards, the 2004 vice presidential nominee, are among those already running. Other possible contenders include New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, Delaware Sen. Joseph Biden, Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson.

Dodd acknowledges his odds are long, calling himself "not as well known" as other prospects. He said the first contests are a year away and lightning could strike. "I wanted to get out of the bleachers and onto the arena floor and make my case," he said.

Dodd, 62, said he has been involved with "every major foreign policy and domestic issue of the last quarter century." He also said he's a "fresh face."

Political analysts agree that he is not a household name, which is a problem after 30 years in politics. "He has not staked out a national reputation or a national identity of any kind," said Dan Carter, a political historian teaching at the University of Richmond.

In a statement Thursday, Dodd highlighted his stewardship of the Family and Medical Leave Act "long before children's issues were a priority in Washington." The law allows workers to take unpaid leave to care for newborns or relatives.

This week Dodd, the new chairman of the Banking Committee, told a New York audience he wants to bring financial services to lower income people who pay huge amounts to cash paychecks, pay bills and borrow money.

Dodd recently visited the Middle East and has criticized U.S. policy in Iraq. At a Senate hearing Thursday, he told Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice the United States could not "bludgeon" its way to victory with more troops.

Yet the hearing underscored how hard it will be for Dodd or any Democrat to stand out on Iraq. The participants included Dodd, Kerry, Obama and Biden. All of them oppose President Bush's plan; all asked Rice tough questions.

Dodd does have one notable characteristic that won't be helpful: his New England roots. Ken Dautrich, a public policy professor at the University of Connecticut, said Democrats may associate Dodd with losses by Kerry in 2004 and Michael Dukakis in 1988. "They understand that a Northeastern Democrat probably is not the best person to take back the presidency," he said.

Senator Dodd Of Connecticut Announces Bid For Presidency (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115877

HARTFORD, Jan. 11 — As he formally announced his candidacy for president on Thursday, Senator Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut said he saw himself as the "dark horse" in the expanding Democratic field, an "unknown quantity with experience."

He made his announcement on "Imus in the Morning," a nationally syndicated radio and cable television show featuring Don Imus, and later, in an interview, he said this would be a one-time shot at the White House.

"I am not going to run again — this is not a warm-up," Mr. Dodd said. "I realize I am not a household name, but in 12 months we'll still be talking about primaries. It is a long way away, and there are plenty of chances to break through."

Mr. Dodd will have stiff competition in the Democratic field. The announced candidates include John Edwards, the former senator from North Carolina; Senator Joseph R. Biden of Delaware, an ally of Mr. Dodd's in Washington; and Tom Vilsack, who stepped down as Iowa governor on Thursday. The potential Democratic candidates include Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

Mr. Dodd was first elected to the House in 1974, in a Democratic wave after Watergate. He was elected to the Senate six years later, taking the office once held by his father, Thomas J. Dodd.

He has about $5 million on hand for his run, and his advisers say they hope his fund-raising ability will be bolstered by his position as chairman of the Senate Banking Committee. He is also a former chairman of the national Democratic Party.

A senior Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and a former Peace Corps volunteer, Mr. Dodd said he would spend much of his time concentrating on international affairs.

"People are asking a critical question — what kind of experience do you need? — especially after watching an administration that seems to have needed more on-the-job training instead of understanding as you go in. I have worked at this stuff for a long time."

Mr. Dodd voted in favor of the 2002 Senate resolution supporting the administration plan to invade Iraq, but he has since said he regrets that vote.

In a Senate hearing with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Thursday, the day after President Bush's televised address calling for more troops in Iraq, Mr. Dodd said it would be "unsound strategy" to add more troops and urged a greater effort at diplomatic contacts instead.

In the interview, he also said he would vote in favor of withholding money for more troops. "Everyone knows this is a failed policy," Mr. Dodd said of the president's war leadership. "This is hardly a change of policy; it is more of the same, which hasn't been working."

Mr. Dodd traveled to Iowa on Thursday afternoon and is to spend part of the weekend in South Carolina, to rally support in two states that are critical in early campaigning.

Even as he cited his decades in Congress, Mr. Dodd joked that he is a "fresh face" in the presidential field. During the radio and cable show, Mr. Imus needled Mr. Dodd by saying he was particularly impressed with Mr. Obama and planned to vote for Senator John McCain of Arizona, a Republican.

"Now wait a minute, wait a minute," Mr. Dodd said with a chuckle and a bit of indignation. "I come on the program, I blow everyone else off, I announce here — at least leave the door open a little bit for me."

Mr. Dodd, 62, is married to Jackie Marie Clegg, a consultant, and they have two young daughters.

He plans to name the Connecticut attorney general, Richard Blumenthal, as his state campaign chairman, and Representative Rosa DeLauro of Connecticut, who was once Mr. Dodd's chief of staff, as a national chairwoman.

Dodd Carries Northeast Liberal Tag Into 2008 Race (NSDY/AP)

By Andrew Miga

Long Island Newsday, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Christopher Dodd's image as a Northeast liberal could pose a hurdle in his longshot bid for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination.

The Connecticut senator will be running in the turbulent wake of another prominent New England liberal, Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass.

DOJ_NMG_0115878

Kerry's losing 2004 campaign embittered some Democrats who contend he squandered a prime chance for his party to capture the White House. Those bad feelings have lingered as the 2008 contest begins to unfold.

"The party just nominated a New England liberal whose campaign was a failure," said Dante Scala, an associate professor of politics at Saint Anselm College in New Hampshire who wrote "Stormy Weather," a book about the state's primary. "That's going to be one strike against" Dodd.

Dodd brushed aside any suggestion that his Northeast liberal roots could hurt his candidacy.

"It's a false assumption," Dodd said in a telephone interview Thursday with The Associated Press. "People don't think in those terms... Most Americans don't care about these labels we put on."

Most voters are more concerned about bread-and-butter issues such as health care and jobs, not political labels, said Dodd, a five-term senator.

"The overwhelming number of people want to know what you can do to put the country back on track," Dodd said. "They don't care about labels."

Another Northeast liberal, New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, could also pose problems for Dodd if, as expected, she joins the expanding Democratic field.

"If Hillary Clinton gets in, she casts a long shadow _ especially over fellow Northeastern senators like Dodd," said Scala.

Clinton, with her star power and her ability to raise large amounts of campaign cash, ranks as one of the race's prospective heavyweights. Illinois Sen. Barack Obama cuts a similar high-voltage profile.

Kerry, meanwhile, is also considering running again in 2008. His candidacy would add yet another Northeast liberal to the crowded Democratic pack, crowding Dodd.

Several Democrats have already entered the race or are expected to do so soon.

Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, who leaves office Friday, former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich and Delaware Sen. Joe Biden have joined the field. New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson also probably will run.

Dodd is little-known in key primary and caucus states, which will make it hard for him to break through.

"He's one of many senators with presidential ambitions," said Earl Black, a Rice University political scientist. "Nothing leaps to the mind that would make a unique case for Dodd."

Scala sees a two-tier race unfolding with the "haves" against the "have nots."

The upper tier includes Clinton, Edwards and Obama. The lower tier is pretty much everyone else.

"Chris Dodd is among everybody else right now," said Scala, noting that despite his New England roots, his name recognition in New Hampshire is low.

Dodd, 62, has begun building a national campaign in earnest. He's hiring staff, expanding his fundraising base and planning more trips to early-voting states.

But in key presidential primary and caucus states like Iowa and New Hampshire, where the jockeying for the party nomination is already intense, Dodd's footprint is light. Other Democratic hopefuls boast higher profiles and more commitments from the local party activists who are the lifeblood of primary campaigns.

Dodd, however, hopes to spotlight his work on health care and children's issues to win over liberal voters who dominate Democratic primaries. He's also confident his quarter-century of foreign policy experience in the Senate will strike a chord with voters worried about national security and America's place in the world.

Dodd said he has raised "just shy" of $5 million for his White House bid. Dodd's numbers are eclipsed by rivals such as Clinton and Kerry, who each have about $14 million in campaign funds.

"It gives us a good start," he said. "We're getting a good start." ___P>

Democratic Party Selects Denver For '08 Presidential Convention (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Sreet Journal/AP, January 12, 2007

NEW YORK -- Democrats selected Denver to host their 2008 presidential convention, turning down New York in favor of a problematic but enthusiastic bid from a city in the increasingly Democratic Rocky Mountain West.

DOJ_NMG_0115879

"There is no question that the West is important to the future of the Democratic Party," Democratic Chairman Howard Dean said in a statement Thursday. "The recent Democratic gains in the West exemplify the principle that when we show up and ask for people's votes and talk about what we stand for, we can win in any part of the country."

Denver mounted a spirited effort to win the convention, organizing a sophisticated public relations campaign and enlisting help from Democratic lawmakers throughout the West. But the bid was fraught with logistical problems, among them a lack of close-in hotel rooms, its ability to raise the necessary $55 million to run the convention and serious labor concerns.

The city's bid was nearly scuttled last month when the influential stagehands union refused to agree not to strike if the convention was held at the nonunion Pepsi Center.

In the end, Mr. Dean enlisted the help of labor leaders in Washington, including AFL-CIO President John Sweeney and Andy Stern, president of the Service Employees International Union. A compromise was reached to staff the Pepsi Center entirely with union labor for the duration of the convention, effectively taking the last major obstacle off the table.

"We are very, very excited -- it's a tremendous team effort by everybody in Denver. And we're going to put on the best convention the Democrats have ever had," said Debbie Willhite, director of Denver's Host Committee.

New York, for its part, had eagerly sought the convention for months, but its mayor, Michael Bloomberg, said in recent weeks he would not commit the city to underwrite the convention's costs. "We are disappointed, but as I had pointed out a number of times, these conventions have gotten very expensive," Mr. Bloomberg told reporters at an event in Brooklyn.

Several members of Congress urged Mr. Dean to choose Denver to help cement recent Democratic victories in the Republican-leaning West. Since 2002, Democrats have won GOP-held governorships in Colorado and six other Western states, and in November, Democrats picked up a Republican-held Senate seat in Montana and GOP-held House seats in Colorado and Arizona.

Democrats in other Western states have pledged to help with fundraising.

The convention -- which is expected to attract 35,000, including 4,950 delegates and alternates -- will be held from Aug. 25-28 after the Summer Olympics in Beijing.

The Republican National Convention will start just four days later, on Sept. 1 in Minneapolis-St. Paul, Minn.

In November 2005, the Democratic National Committee invited 35 cities to apply to host the convention. Eleven cities eventually submitted applications, but only three were selected as finalists -- Denver, New York and Minneapolis-St. Paul, which withdrew its bid this fall after it was selected to host the GOP convention.

Denver last hosted the Democratic National Convention in 1908, when Democrats nominated William Jennings Bryan of Nebraska in his third unsuccessful effort as the party's standard-bearer.

As States Innovate, Schwarzenegger Blurs Lines (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 11 — So, who is Arnold Schwarzenegger anyway?

Is he an extreme environmentalist, proposing California be the first state to limit carbon dioxide emissions from cars? Or a foe of wildlife, with his desire for above-ground water storage, announced hours after his move to limit emissions?

Does his heart bleed for the disadvantaged, as suggested by his call for universal health care? Or does he turn a hard eye toward entitlements, as his plan to cut welfare benefits for children seems to indicate?

In many ways, Mr. Schwarzenegger is sui generis, a celebrity-turned-politician hurled toward the center by California's Democratic majority. And since he can never run for president, his governorship is most likely the outlet for his more audacious ideas.

But Mr. Schwarzenegger's recent leadership is also the largest example of a growing movement in which state leaders are crossing party lines to get things done. While partisan polarization limits activity in Washington, D.C., state governments are addressing issues the federal government has not tackled.

Massachusetts was first, with a Republican governor and a Democratic-led legislature compromising on an expansive health care law. Colorado — with bipartisanship — and Georgia both passed restrictive immigration bills last year after Congress could not. Indeed, 32 states approved 84 immigration laws in 2006, out of a record 570 immigration bills introduced, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures.

DOJ_NMG_0115880

Nearly 30 states have passed bills raising the minimum wage, many through ballot initiatives, but many others via legislatures. And last year alone, more than a half-dozen states tightened restrictions on relations between lawmakers and lobbyists.

"In recent years as we have seen gridlock in Washington," said William Pound, the conference's executive director, "you have seen the pressure building on states to do something. I think you are going to see even more of it in the next couple of years, because we are on a wave right now with the states being innovative on policy. And frankly the Congress and the federal government have financial problems."

Often, the most effective approaches fly in the face of core political party values. Mr. Schwarzenegger is promoting ideas that offer something for everyone in Sacramento to love, and to despise.

"There is method to the madness," said Bruce Cain, director of the Institute of Governmental Studies at the University of California, Berkeley. "The middle is a place of much inconsistency. The fact that no one knows exactly where Arnold is on the political spectrum means that everyone can imagine that he is closer to them."

The challenges Mr. Schwarzenegger faces for being, as he calls himself, "post-partisan," and pushing the legislation he craves, were evident Tuesday night in Sacramento when he addressed the Legislature.

His plans for spending money — on new bond issues, on health care, on the environment — were met with grimaces from many Republican colleagues, who were buoyed by his promises to build more prisons and increase college tuition, ideas that offend more liberal lawmakers.

Right before the speech, State Senator Abel Maldonado, a Republican, cornered Mr. Schwarzenegger's communications director, Adam Mendelsohn, to complain about part of the governor's health care plan that would charge businesses that have more than 10 workers but do not provide health insurance.

"Your district has a lot of E.R.'s full of" illegal immigrants, Mr. Mendelsohn said, pointing out that those patients cost taxpayers money.

"I've got a lot of family businesses in my district," Mr. Maldonado countered.

At the same time, the State Democratic Party was attacking the governor's budget as stingy and unfair.

Yet partisan cross-dressing is in vogue in many states.

"Arnold wants to cut emissions, cover everyone's health insurance, possibly reduce prison crowding by sentencing reform," said William T. Cunningham, who helped run both of Michael R. Bloomberg's campaigns for mayor of New York on themes of social liberalism and fiscal restraint.

"Eliot Spitzer wants to cut property taxes and reform the Medicaid system due to its costs," Mr. Cunningham added, referring to New York's new Democratic governor. "Republicans domestically used to be the law and order guys and the Dems were the education and social service guys. All that has changed."

In his spate of policy and budget announcements this week, Mr. Schwarzenegger showed many sides to his political form, proposing to insure all citizens, but also to end welfare grants for children whose parents do not participate in return-to-work programs. He called for helping criminals reform, but cut drug treatment programs.

He also said he would ask state regulators to require petroleum refiners and gasoline sellers doing business in California to cut by 10 percent the emissions of heat-trapping gases, even as he pushed for the water storage methods opposed by groups that argue that above-ground storage disrupts the surrounding environment. "We are not waiting for the federal government to act," Mr. Schwarzenegger said. "We are not waiting, period."

Other states have reached the same conclusion. Last summer, Georgia and Colorado enacted extensive laws intended to curb the effects of illegal immigration. "Immigration is the best example of where the feds bear the lion's share of the responsibility and have done almost nothing to fulfill that responsibility," said the speaker of the Colorado House, Andrew Romanoff.

DOJ_NMG_0115881

Georgia's omnibus law, which goes into effect in July, makes many requirements of employers and workers. "People were frustrated that federal government was not acting swiftly enough," the State Senate spokeswoman, Merri Brantley, said. "We are among the fastest-growing immigration states in the nation."

In the interest of protecting residents from identity theft and privacy invasion, 35 states have enacted legislation in recent years requiring companies or state agencies to disclose security breaches involving personal information. The federal government has yet to pass comprehensive legislation on the issue.

Other states have also passed or are seriously considering emissions standards, renewable energy requirements, education overhauls and comprehensive health care packages. On some of these issues, California — led by its governor — may simply be furthering its role as the nation's policy petri dish.

Mr. Schwarzenegger "is showing what leadership can be when it is nonpartisan," said Mr. Mendelsohn, his communications director. "It is where the country is."

California Emissions Target Hands Task To Industry (WSJ)

By Jeffrey Ball

Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's plan to require a 10% cut in the carbon content of its transportation fuels embodies a strategy to combat global warming that is likely to become more common around the world.

Instead of mandating the rollout of specific technologies, such as electric cars or ethanol pumps, California has set an emissions-related target and says it will leave it up to industry to figure out how to meet it.

In doing so, it is taking a political gamble: that the hands-off approach will unleash fights of economic self-interest among various industries -- fights that will, in the end, force industry to support a broad, economywide cap on carbon emissions. The broader the effort, the cheaper it is likely to be for any given company to cut its carbon emissions.

Gov. Schwarzenegger this week said he plans to issue an executive order calling for the state to reduce the carbon intensity of passenger-vehicle fuels 10% by 2020. The state expects that will translate into replacing 20% of California's on-road gasoline consumption with lower-carbon fuels. That would more than triple the amount of alternative fuels consumed on California roads today, the state says. Today, the vast majority of alternative transportation fuel in California, as across the U.S., is corn-based ethanol that is blended with conventional gasoline.

Central to California's plan is the creation of a market in which fuel producers can reduce their cost of compliance by buying and selling carbon "credits." Under the plan, transportation fuel sold in California will be subject to a ceiling on the amount of carbon it can emit per unit of energy it contains. The limit will take into account the carbon produced throughout the fuel's entire "life cycle": from the making of the fuel to its consumption in a car or truck.

That means California is pushing not just for any alternative fuels, but for those that are the most energy-efficient. That makes certain types of ethanol, for instance, more attractive than others.

Though the details have yet to be worked out, producers whose fuel has a lower carbon content than the standard will have excess emission credits they can sell on a market. Those whose fuel is too high in carbon will have to buy extra credits.

Oil producers Chevron Corp. and ConocoPhillips expressed support for the broad intent of the new California rule. The industry increasingly has concluded it will get slapped with some sort of carbon cap, and, based on the broad outlines it has seen so far, it thinks California's approach is as flexible an offer as the industry's likely to get. "The good news is it's not picking winners and losers," says Joe Sparano, president of the Western States Petroleum Association, the oil industry's Sacramento-based trade group. The group itself hasn't taken a position.

Because it faces its own carbon rule, the oil industry in California is likelier to support such policies throughout the country. While stressing his organization doesn't endorse a national global-warming-emission cap, Mr. Sparano said a national emissions-trading market would be beneficial "so that California companies are not unfairly disadvantaged."

For its own competitive reasons, the auto industry is talking even more bullishly about California's push for lower-carbon fuels. Auto makers already face a California mandate to reduce global-warming emissions from the cars and trucks they sell in the state by roughly 30% by 2016 -- a law the industry has sued to block, arguing it amounts to a state effort to regulate automotive fuel economy, which is barred by federal law.

DOJ_NMG_0115882

Yet the auto industry is under mounting pressure to reduce the oil consumption of its fleet. So, over the past year, it has promised to ramp up its production of versions of its conventional vehicles that have been tweaked so they can run mostly on ethanol. For auto makers, the California low-carbon-fuels rule is a welcome way to ensure an increased supply of ethanol for those vehicles.

General Motors Corp. hasn't taken an official position on the California low-carbon-fuel rule, said David Barthmuss, a GM spokesman. But, he noted, when Gov. Schwarzenegger's office asked GM what the auto maker thought about the fuels rule, "we told them we think fuels like this are very important to the vehicles and technologies we're putting on the road right now."

The fact that the oil and auto industries, each for their own reasons, are endorsing the notion of applying emissions regulations broadly across the economy highlights the divide-and-conquer strategy at the heart of California's approach. Said Hal Harvey, director of the environment program at the William and Flora Hewlett Foundation, and a close adviser to California officials in coming up with the fuels plan: "When you have two giant, politically powerful industries aiming their arrows at each other, it's possible to get things done."

Golden State Gamble (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

A few days ago. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger unveiled an ambitious plan to bring universal health insurance to California. And I'm of two minds about it.

On one side, it's very encouraging to see another Republican governor endorse the principle that all Americans are entitled to essential health care. Not long ago we were wondering whether the Bush administration would succeed in dismantling Social Security. Now we're discussing proposals for universal health care. What a difference two years makes!

And if California — America's biggest state, with a higher-than-average percentage of uninsured residents — can achieve universal coverage, so can the nation as a whole.

On the other side, Mr. Schwarzenegger's plan has serious flaws. Maybe those flaws could be fixed once the principle of universal coverage was established — but there's also the chance that we would end up stuck with those flaws, the way we ended up stuck with a dysfunctional system of insurance tied to employment.

Furthermore, in the end health care should be a federal responsibility. State-level plans should be seen as pilot projects, not substitutes for a national system. Otherwise, some states just won't do the right thing. Remember, almost 25 percent of Texans are uninsured.

To understand both what's right and what's wrong with Mr. Schwarzenegger's plan, let's compare what he's proposing with the plan he rejected. Last summer, the California Legislature passed a bill that would have created a single-payer health insurance system for the state — that is, a system similar to Medicare, under which residents would have paid fees into a state fund, which would then have provided insurance to everyone.

But the governor vetoed that bill, which would have bypassed private insurance companies. He appears to sincerely want universal coverage, but he also wants to keep insurance companies in the loop. As a result, he came up with a plan that, like the failed Clinton health care plan of the early 1990s, is best described as a Rube Goldberg device — a complicated, indirect way of achieving what a single-payer system would accomplish simply and directly.

There are three main reasons why many Americans lack health insurance. Some healthy people decide to save money and take their chances (and end up being treated in emergency rooms, at the public's expense, if their luck runs out); some people are too poor to afford coverage; some people can't get coverage, at least without paying exorbitant rates, because of pre-existing conditions.

Single-payer insurance solves all three problems at a stroke. The Schwarzenegger plan, by contrast, is a series of patches. It forces everyone to buy health insurance, whether they think they need it or not; it provides financial aid to low-income families, to help them bear the cost; and it imposes “community rating” on insurance companies, basically requiring them to sell insurance to everyone at the same price.

DOJ_NMG_0115883

As a result, the plan requires a much more intrusive government role than a single-payer system. Instead of reducing paperwork, the plan adds three new bureaucracies: one to police individuals to make sure they buy insurance, one to determine if they’re poor enough to receive aid, and one to police insurers to make sure they don’t discriminate against the unwell.

The plan’s supporters say that it would save money all the same. Those who are currently uninsured would receive preventive care, which is often cheaper than waiting until they show up in emergency rooms. Insurers would spend less money trying to weed out high-risk clients and more money actually paying for health care: the plan would require that insurers spend at least 85 percent of premiums on health care, considerably more than most insurers do now.

Still, why all the complexity? The smart, well-intentioned economists who devised the plan think they’re being more politically realistic than single-payer advocates — that it’s necessary to placate the insurers. But that’s what Bill and Hillary Clinton thought, too — only to find that their plan’s complexity confused the public, while the insurance industry went all-out to defeat it anyway.

So am I for or against the Schwarzenegger plan? That’s a tough question. As a practical matter, however, I suspect that the real question is what to do after the plan founders from its own complexity. And the answer is, damn the insurers — full speed ahead.

Ex-President Bush May Put Hip To Test In '09 (HC)

By Tony Freemantle

Houston Chronicle, January 12, 2007

A week after getting a new right hip, former President George H.W. Bush is recuperating at his Houston home, receiving visitors, worrying about his children, dutifully doing physical therapy and already thinking about jumping out of an airplane again.

He's going to do it in June 2009 for his 85th birthday, he said. For sure. Even though his wife, Barbara, thinks it's crazy.

His hip is fine, Bush said in a brief interview Wednesday. He's in and out of bed, he's walking and he's managing to follow his doctors' instructions.

The 82-year-old former president was released Saturday from the Mayo Clinic in Minnesota where surgeons replaced his hip. He checked in to the hospital immediately after attending the funeral of former President Gerald Ford in Washington, D.C., on Jan. 2.

It was Bush's second hip replacement — his left hip was replaced at the Mayo Clinic in 2000.

Bush keeps a busy schedule. He's looking forward to the commissioning in November of a nuclear-powered aircraft carrier that bears his name.

"I can't tell you how exciting that is to look forward to," he said.

In February, he travels to Qatar for the opening of a new engineering building at Texas A&M University's campus there.

Bush said he still occasionally works with former President Bill Clinton on fundraising efforts for the victims of the 2004 Southeast Asian tsunami and of Hurricane Katrina.

His skydiving career began during World War II when the torpedo bomber he was flying was shot down in the Pacific. In June 2004, to mark his 80th birthday, Bush jumped from 13,500 feet and landed on a field near his library on the A&M campus.

The Reliable Source (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

The Next Guv May Have a Gig Still Left in Him

Fear not, Free State music fans: Rumors that Maryland's guv-to-be is breaking up the band are somewhat exaggerated.

But when exactly Martin O'Malley will next take the concert stage -- with or without O'Malley's March-- remains unclear.

An Associated Press story this week about O'Malley's transition plans stated that his band will not perform at Wednesday's inaugural ball in Baltimore because it "has broken up," a newsflash that sent waves of harp-throwing hysteria throughout the region's Celtic-rock community. (Okay, we're making that last part up -- but it did catch our attention.)

DOJ_NMG_0115884

Almost two years ago, the Baltimore mayor declared an official end to the band he formed 20 years ago (while working as a young Gary Hart campaign aide), citing the need to devote himself to his gubernatorial campaign. But groupies and political analysts were quick to parse his farewell -- saying "this will be my last St. Patrick's season" left a lot of potential concert dates open. And indeed, O'Malley's March continued to reunite during the campaign, at a handful of Irish festivals and fundraisers.

O'Malley spokesman Rick Abbruzzese clarified for us yesterday that there has been no final breakup. And yet, "no plans for a reunion tour either."

A better-known Irish band called the Saw Doctors will play at the inaugural ball. Earlier this week in Annapolis, O'Malley hinted that he might -- just might-- take the stage with the group. Uh-oh -- would that mean the end of O'Malley's March?

"We're all good friends, and it's not like those friendships or the music ever disintegrated," he told our colleague John Wagner last night. "It can be reignited by a single spark."GET THIS

George H.W. Bush is going to jump out of yet another airplane, despite objections from his wife. The former president, who is recovering from hip replacement surgery, told the Houston Chronicle he'll mark his 85th birthday in 2009 with another parachute jump. "I almost fell off my chair when I heard him say this, but he is serious," said chief of staff Jean Becker.

Bush took the plunge for his 75th birthday, and again for his 80th -- when Barbara Bush told him, "One way or another, George, this will be your final jump." Guess not. Says Becker: "She's just given up. She's decided he's 82 and he can make his own decision."

LOVE, ETC.

Â· Split: Cameron Diaz and Justin Timberlake, after a four-year romance. According to a statement the couple released yesterday: "We have, in fact, ended our romantic relationship, and have done so mutually and as friends, with continued love and respect for one another." The 34-year-old actress and 25-year-old former boy band singer, despite all naysayers, lasted longer than most Hollywood marriages. Hey, Justin: Ya hear your old flame Britney is available?

Â· Stiffed: Singer James Brown left his longtime companion, Tomi Rae Hynie, and their 5-year-old son, James Jr., out of his will, reports the Associated Press. The will, which was read yesterday but has not been filed, splits the Brown's estate among his six adult children. Hynie was locked out of Brown's home shortly after the Godfather of Soul died on Christmas Day but was present for the reading of the will. Sounds like a pending lawsuit . . .HEY, ISN'T THAT . . . ?

Â· Plain ol' Rep. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) at Peking Gourmet on Wednesday night. The former speaker had dinner with a couple of other members, then raced off to comment on the president's speech. And those burly guys who left with him? Turns out he didn't lose all his security, after all, but has a smaller detail for an unspecified period of time.

Â· Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton breakfasting yesterday morning with Andy Stern, president of the Service Employees International Union, and another union rep at Bistro Bis yesterday morning. Probably never hurts for a presidential hopeful to break bread with the man who reps for a couple million union members.

Forum-Shopper Of The Year (WSJ)

By Ronald A. Cass

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

Anna Nicole Smith makes for good copy. America's most gaudy litigant has spent the last few months dodging eviction notices in the Bahamas and paternity-test subpoenas in the U.S. A few days after the death of her son, she donned a wedding dress for a "commitment ceremony" with her attorney, then made almost a million dollars selling photos of her late son's last hours, her new baby and her "wedding" to tabloid magazines. In the midst of all of this, she has kept up her long-running litigation over the estate of her late husband, J. Howard Marshall II. The litigation, which initially was filed more than a dozen years ago against heirs to the estate of her husband, has changed into a suit against the heirs of E. Pierce Marshall, her husband's son, who died unexpectedly last summer.

Ms. Smith, a Texan who married a Texan, still comes to court in California seeking a sizeable share of J. Howard Marshall's Texas-based estate. At the same time, she asserts that she is now a resident of the Bahamas, so California courts lack jurisdiction over her in the paternity litigation. Outlandish as this soap opera appears, her manipulation of our legal system could have significance to the law and to the rule of law. That is why devotees of serious news, as well as tabloid aficionados, should give heed. * * *

DOJ_NMG_0115885

Ms. Smith's litigation begins with her brief marriage to J. Howard Marshall, when she was 26 and he nearly 90. Mr. Marshall formally memorialized their marriage with a $6 million gift to Ms. Smith but chose not to put her in his estate plan. Ms. Smith sued in Texas probate court seeking half his fortune, estimated at $1 billion, alleging that he had promised this to her only to have his son frustrate those wishes. The Texas court rejected her claims after a lengthy trial, but that didn't end matters because Ms. Smith, after suing in Texas as a Texas resident, had instituted an action in federal bankruptcy court in California as a California resident. She sought asset protection following a default judgment against her (on a sexual harassment claim by her personal assistant). That judgment later was compromised for a smaller sum, but by then she had imported the essence of her Texas claims into the California proceeding.

The federal judge in California drew conclusions directly opposite those reached in Texas, a decision overturned by the Federal Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, primarily on the ground that, under the "probate exception," federal courts lack jurisdiction to hear matters within the competence of state probate courts. That conclusion was in turn reversed by the Supreme Court, which sent the case back to the appeals court to consider other reasons for overturning the lower court decision.

Proceedings in California between the parties have resumed, and the Ninth Circuit will likely take this matter up again in the spring. When it does, it will look at alternative doctrines that could avoid conflict between state and federal decisions. For example, "claim preclusion" prevents a second court (federal or state) from deciding a legal claim that was asserted in another court and "issue preclusion" prevents decision on a particular issue that was disposed of by another court. These doctrines are broader than the "probate exception" to federal jurisdiction addressed by the Supreme Court but do not have the same tension with federal court supremacy.

The legal system generally arrives at predictable outcomes in logical venues based on reasonably foreseeable legal rules. But litigants can frame claims to induce application of less foreseeable rules in less logical venues. However much judges in California federal courts might endeavor to interpret Texas state law the way they believe Texas state judges would, the interpretations inevitably diverge -- and the effort to engage a more remote forum often looks intended to take advantage of the divergence. The difference between determinations in two different court systems was the difference between an $88 million award and nothing.

The case is likely to come to an end with a decision on one of the preclusion doctrines. The decision of the state probate court, based on the more extensive proceeding in the more logical venue, will then stand as the final word on the claims Ms. Smith has asserted. That does not, however, make this a story of the legal system working well; it is a story of the system working eventually.

If litigation were costless and decision makers consistent, forum shopping would present little problem. But litigation can be costly. A study estimates legal and administrative costs in tort suits (just a portion of the litigation landscape) at $140 billion per year and overall costs at $250 billion. And decisions on some questions, such as punitive damages, vary enough that the process has been compared to a "lawsuit lottery."

The problem is particularly acute for businesses, which fear that threats of costly litigation will be leverage for settlements. Such strategic use of litigation can occur because the litigation costs and risks are not symmetrical -- some litigants have more to lose than others. Some law firms specializing in suing businesses, and some state attorneys general, rely on strategies that exploit risk sensitivity to extract settlements, at times very substantial ones. The behavior of former AG Eliot Spitzer and indictments of key partners at the plaintiffs' law firm Milberg Weiss highlight the problem. Risks associated with ordinary litigation are magnified by opportunities to choose favorable venues for litigation, and even more by the prospect that litigants can engage in a repeat-play game, trying successive venues in search of a sympathetic forum. Forum shopping smacks of manipulation to reduce predictability and to secure biased decision makers.

Of course, some risks associated with conflicting decisions in parallel litigation are unavoidable in a complex system with overlapping competences in different jurisdictions. Attempting to minimize those risks, courts and lawmakers have developed rules that harmonize and prioritize conflicting legal commands and jurisdictions, that allow courts to stay their hand to avoid conflicts, and that provide for recognition of earlier decisions on the same issue or claim. But the degree to which those rules work efficiently -- the degree to which they effectively limit the ability of determined litigants to exploit slack in the system and craft claims in creative ways that give them strategic advantage -- is open to question.

DOJ_NMG_0115886

And problems in the U.S. legal system are only one part of the picture. Once a strictly domestic game, forum-shopping has gone international. Not only can a growing roster of foreign enterprises and authorities enter the game, American businesses keen to restrain more successful competitors have a world of opportunities for doing so. If they cannot succeed with litigation at home, they can seek friendlier venues in many parts of the world. Thus, Microsoft, Intel and other market leaders now face proceedings in Europe, South Korea and elsewhere at the urging of American rivals such as IBM, Adobe and AMD.

Ms. Smith's story demonstrates that a determined litigant with resources can move litigation among legal forums, tailor legal claims to prolong litigation, tie up assets, and make life difficult enough that most opponents would pay substantial amounts merely to bring the matter to a close. A victory for her would encourage forum-shopping, multiply costs and undermine the predictability of legal rules, doing damage that would last well beyond her 15 minutes of fame. A defeat for her would show that the system can at long last bring such manipulation to an end. And if that is what comes from her extended venture into the American court system, it would be a better legacy than any other she is apt to leave behind.

Mr. Cass is chairman of the Center for the Rule of Law and dean emeritus of Boston University School of Law.

U.S. Troops Went Into Somalia After Raid (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

NAIROBI, Jan. 11 -- A small team of American military personnel entered southern Somalia to try to determine exactly who was killed in a U.S. airstrike Monday that targeted suspected al-Qaeda figures thought to be hiding in swampy mangrove forests along the Indian Ocean, U.S. sources said Thursday.

So far, "no one can confirm a high-value target" among the dead, said one U.S. source, who spoke on condition of anonymity. But items recovered at the strike site -- a piece of bloody clothing and a document -- indicated that Aden Ayrow, head of the military arm of the deposed Islamic Courts movement, had been at the scene.

The strike killed eight to 10 people suspected of terrorist links, according to another source, a high-ranking U.S. official in the region who spoke Thursday and declined to be identified. The people were fleeing with remnants of the Courts movement, which was swept from power last month by invading Ethiopian forces who installed in its place the country's U.S.-backed transitional government.

The search team marks the first known case of U.S. military boots hitting Somalian soil since a disastrous mission to stabilize the country ended in 1994 after Somali militiamen downed two Black Hawk helicopters and killed 18 U.S. soldiers in the capital, Mogadishu. It was unclear Thursday if the search team remained inside Somalia.

The air attack was carried out early Monday by a U.S. Air Force AC-130 gunship flying from a base in Djibouti, a tiny Horn of Africa country, as U.S. Navy ships patrolled offshore. By one official's account, the strike was triggered by a cellphone intercept and targeted a convoy of vehicles.

The U.S. military has worked closely with Ethiopian ground and air forces operating in Somalia and has shared intelligence and target lists. But American decision-makers have been cautious about sending U.S. personnel into Somalian territory. In the aftermath of the AC-130 attack, it was seen as a necessary risk in the effort to positively identify the casualties.

After past airstrikes against suspects in other countries, U.S. intelligence officials have often been frustrated at the inability to ascertain the identities of people killed. In many cases, the sites have been off-limits to detailed inspection.

U.S. officials have long said they wanted to kill or capture three al-Qaeda figures they say took shelter in Somalia after organizing the bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998. But officials emphasized Thursday that the U.S. government and Ethiopia have a far longer list of targets that includes Ayrow and other members of the Islamic Courts leadership.

Hassan Dahir Aweys, chairman of the Courts, was put on the U.S. terrorist list in 2001 as the head of a radical group accused of having links to al-Qaeda in the 1990s.

DOJ_NMG_0115887

Regional analysts have said, however, that the connections between al-Qaeda and the Courts movement are tenuous and hinge on one or two leaders. Other leaders within the Islamic movement were considered moderates, and it is unclear what their fate will be.

Meanwhile, reports from the area surrounding Ras Kamboni, where Monday's strike hit, suggest that 20 civilians may have been killed. The human rights group Amnesty International questioned whether the airstrike violated international law against indiscriminate attacks.

One U.S. official said Thursday that no civilians were killed.

U.S. officials repeatedly emphasized close coordination with the Ethiopian military, saying that continuing air attacks by the Ethiopians in the south were motivated by intelligence reports that one of the three embassy suspects, Abu Talha al-Sudani, a Sudanese, was in the area.

The U.S. military action in the southernmost tip of Somalia has been widely criticized by European diplomats, the U.N. secretary general and the chairman of the 53-member African Union, who are concerned that it will work against efforts to stabilize a country that has been without a central government since 1991.

In the chaotic capital, Mogadishu, the weak transitional government, backed by the United States and Ethiopia, is struggling to assert control in a city still full of Islamic Courts fighters, as well as militias of clans and sub-clans who feel marginalized by the new government and resentful of the presence of Ethiopian soldiers in the city.

Several skirmishes between militiamen and Ethiopian troops have broken out in recent days. Thursday night, a grenade was fired from a truck full of militiamen at a hotel full of government officials, according to reports from the city. There was a brief exchange of gunfire and one hotel security guard was injured.

Raid Killed Somali Allies Of Al Qaeda, U.S. Says (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Jan. 11 (AP) — A top American official in the Horn of Africa said Thursday that none of the suspected members of Al Qaeda believed to be hiding in Somalia died in the American airstrike this week, but added that Somalis with close ties to the terrorist group were killed.

Somali officials said Wednesday that Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, a main suspect in the bombings of the American Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998, had been killed in the American attack.

United States officials immediately distanced themselves from the Somali claim, saying that they were not even sure Mr. Fazul was among the terrorism suspects hiding in southern Somalia with Islamist fighters. They did say then that Abu Taha al-Sudani, a top aide to Mr. Fazul, and Aden Hashi Ayrow, a Somali terrorism suspect, might have been killed.

But on Thursday, the American official, based in Kenya, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the news media, said American special forces and Ethiopian troops — who are in the country to battle the Islamists and support Somalia's transitional government — were still pursuing Al Qaeda suspects in southern Somalia.

American and Somali officials have acknowledged that a small team of American Special Operations forces are in Somalia hunting suspected Qaeda fighters and providing military advice to Ethiopian and Somali forces on the ground.

The American forces entered Somalia with Ethiopian forces late last month when Ethiopians launched their attack against the Islamic movement, one official said on condition of anonymity.

Mr. Fazul, one of the F.B.I.'s most wanted terrorism suspects, has evaded capture for eight years. The Somali president's chief of staff said Wednesday that he had been killed in an American airstrike in southern Somalia.

The American official in the region said 8 to 10 individuals had been killed in the attack, most of whom were Somalis with close ties to Al Qaeda.

Meanwhile, Somali and Ethiopian forces skirmished with Islamic militiamen near Ras Kamboni in Somalia's southernmost tip early Thursday, part of mop-up operations that Mr. Meles said his troops were carrying out against the fighters that were driven from Somalia's capital weeks ago.

DOJ_NMG_0115888

The Ethiopian Information Ministry said Thursday that its military was also launching helicopter and troop attacks around Dobley, about four miles from the Kenyan border.

A rights group in Fanole, in the south, said Thursday that thousands of Somalis fleeing the fighting were now stranded on the Kenyan border, which has been largely closed.

"Thousands are in a bad condition and they do not have food and water," said Ali Bashi, chairman of the Fanole Human Rights Center. "They are stranded at the border after Kenya closed it and they cannot go back to their houses for two reasons: the ongoing airstrikes and lack of transportation."

Ethiopian, U.S. Pursue Somalia Al-Qaida (AP)

By Chris Tomlinson

AP, January 12, 2007

Ethiopian and U.S. forces were in pursuit of three top al-Qaida suspects Thursday, with a senior U.S. official confirming that none of them were killed in a U.S. airstrike and were believed to still be in Somalia.

The official in Kenya, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to address the media, said U.S. special operations forces were focused solely on tracking down the suspected terrorists and not members of the Somali Islamic movement that had challenged the country's government for power.

A day earlier, Abdirizak Hassan, the Somali president's chief of staff, said a U.S. intelligence report had referred to the death of Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, one of the three senior al-Qaida members blamed for the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

But the U.S. official said he was confident none of the three top al-Qaida suspects believed to be in Somalia was killed in the airstrike Monday.

"The three high-value targets are still of intense interest to us," the official said. "What we're doing is still ongoing, we're still in pursuit, us and the Ethiopians."

The official also contradicted numerous statements by Somali government officials in recent days, saying the U.S. had carried out just one airstrike and only eight to 10 militants with ties to al-Qaida were killed. He said subsequent reports of more airstrikes and civilian casualties were rumors and disinformation spread by the Islamic extremists.

Michael E. Ranneberger, the U.S. ambassador to Kenya, also told the British Broadcasting Corp. on Thursday that Fazul had not been killed.

U.S. and Somali officials said Wednesday that U.S. special forces were in Somalia hunting al-Qaida fighters and providing military advice to Ethiopian and Somali forces. The U.S. forces entered the country last month when Ethiopia launched its attack against the Islamic movement, one of the officials said on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the information.

Most of the Islamic militiamen have since dispersed, but a few hardcore members have fled to Somalia's southernmost point between the Kenyan border and the Indian Ocean.

The U.S. has repeatedly accused the group of harboring three top terror suspects wanted in connection with the 1998 embassy bombings: Fazul, Abu Talha al-Sudani and Saleh Ali Saleh Nabhan.

The U.S. Navy has moved additional forces into waters off the Somali coast, where they have monitored maritime traffic and interrogated crews on suspicious ships in international waters.

The U.S. official in Kenya said Kenyan naval forces had set up a blockade along the sea border to make sure no suspected terrorists could infiltrate the country. The Kenyan army is also intercepting suspects trying to sneak across the land border, which is closed, he added.

Earlier this week, police at the Kenyan coastal border town of Kiunga arrested the wives and children of two of the embassy bombing suspects after they managed to slip across the frontier, according to an internal police report seen by The Associated Press on Wednesday.

Meanwhile, Somali and Ethiopian forces skirmished with Islamic militiamen in the far south of Somalia on Thursday as part of mop-up operations against the fighters.

DOJ_NMG_0115889

One resident in the area, Mosa Aden Hersi, said there were numerous militant and civilian casualties in the fighting. "We saw the dead bodies of 17 men in military uniform under a small hill, but we do not know their identity," he said by two-way radio.

The remote, forested area has few residents and high-frequency radio is the only reliable form of communications.

The Ethiopian Information Ministry said its military had also launched helicopter and troop attacks around the town of Dhobley, about four miles from the Kenyan border.

A Somali human rights group said Thursday that thousands of Somalis fleeing the fighting were now stranded on the Kenyan border, which has been closed.

"Thousands are in a bad condition and they do not have food and water. They are stranded at the border after Kenya closed it and they cannot go back to their houses for two reasons: the ongoing airstrikes and lack of transportation," said Ali Bashi, chairman of the Fanole group.

The Red Cross said more than 850 wounded people, both civilians and soldiers, have been treated at medical facilities since fighting began last month.

Somalia has not had an effective central government since clan-based warlords toppled dictator Mohamed Siad Barre in 1991 and then turned on each other. The interim government was established with the help of the United Nations in 2004.

Somalia Targets Survived, U.S. Says (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2007

NAIROBI, KENYA — None of the three most-wanted Al Qaeda suspects believed to be hiding in southern Somalia were killed by a U.S. airstrike this week, a senior U.S. official here said Thursday.

"The three high-value targets are still of intense interest to us," said the official, who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to speak on the record.

The attack Sunday night by a U.S. Air Force AC-130 gunship killed eight to 10 people believed to be linked to the Al Qaeda terrorist network, the official said.

Previous reports from other U.S. and Somalian sources suggested that the dead might include suspects in the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, or the 2002 bombing of a Kenyan seaside resort and a subsequent missile attack against an Israeli airliner.

In an interview Thursday with the BBC's Somalian-language news service, U.S. Ambassador to Kenya Michael E. Ranneberger confirmed that Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, who is wanted by the FBI for his alleged role in the 1998 attack, had not been captured or killed.

The senior official said the other two Al Qaeda suspects also remained at large, probably hiding in Somalia.

They are Abu Taha al Sudani of Sudan, who is accused of planning the 2002 Paradise Hotel bombing in Kenya, and Saleh Ali Saleh Nabhan of Kenya, also wanted in connection with the hotel attack.

The official said that the three men were not the primary targets of Sunday's attack, which instead was aimed at a separate but significant Al Qaeda operative who was moving with a group of about 20 individuals.

According to some reports, a small number of U.S. special forces were pursuing the suspects in Somalia, but the official denied those reports.

Amid mounting criticism over reports of ongoing U.S. airstrikes and claims that scores of civilians have died, Ranneberger launched a public-relations offensive Thursday, insisting that the U.S. launched only one strike and that there were no civilian casualties.

"It's been troubling to see these reports about bombing and all these activities killing civilians," the ambassador told the BBC. "I can tell you categorically that no civilians were killed or injured as a result of that action."

U.S. involvement in Somalia, its first overt military intervention in the country since 1994, has set off a flurry of criticism and anti-American sentiment throughout East Africa. The banner headline Tuesday in one of Kenya's largest daily newspapers read: "U.S. Warplane Rains Death on Somalia."

DOJ_NMG_0115890

Somalian government officials and witnesses claim scores of civilians have been killed by ongoing airstrikes in more than half a dozen villages in southern Somalia, with reports of new strikes as late as Wednesday. Officials suspect Ethiopia, which sent 4,000 troops to Somalia last month, may be involved in some of the strikes. The Ethiopian government has not commented.

Watira Suldan Farah, a mother of five, said Thursday that she fled her home village of Butiya shortly before it was attacked Wednesday by a "large white plane with a black tail. I don't know what kind of plane it was. People were saying it was an AC-130. All I know is that it was doing a terrible bombing."

Another report said five clan elders trying to reach the port city of Kismayo on Wednesday were shot to death by a gunship.

"We are victims," said Hussein Tarabi, who said he lost 30 cattle in an airstrike against his village Wednesday. "We ask the U.S. government to stop the genocide and give us compensation. This is against humanity."

On Wednesday, Amnesty International said the reports of heavy civilian casualties raised questions about whether the U.S. military had violated international law.

But U.S. officials insist they have not carried out any additional airstrikes since Sunday. The senior official said it was possible that Ethiopia was engaged in air attacks in pursuit of fighters with Somalia's Islamic Courts Union.

Ethiopia helped Somalia's transitional government crush the once-powerful alliance of religious leaders and continues to launch operations to capture or kill remnants of the Islamist movement.

Somalian politician Abdirashid Mohamed Hidig said he witnessed airstrikes Tuesday, which he said were conducted by the U.S. and Ethiopia. He told reporters that at least 50 civilians were killed.

Abdirahman Dinari, spokesman for the transitional government, dismissed such reports. Though Dinari previously told local reporters that the U.S. attacks were continuing through Tuesday, he said Thursday that there had been only one U.S. strike.

"The only casualties we know about are the eight people," he said. "The rest is propaganda intended to mislead the people." Dinari denied that Ethiopia had conducted any airstrikes in Somalia.

U.S. officials said operations to capture or kill the three Al Qaeda suspects would continue. Five ships have been dispatched to the region, including the aircraft carrier Dwight D. Eisenhower and the guided missile cruiser Anzio.

Somalia Strike 'missed Al-Qaeda Targets' (FT)

By Andrew England

Financial Times, January 12, 2007

The controversial US air strike in southern Somalia missed all three top al-Qaeda members Washington alleges are hiding out in the country, a senior US official said on Thursday.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said eight to 10 "al-Qaeda affiliated terrorists" were killed in Monday's attack, but gave no details.

On Tuesday the Pentagon confirmed that an AC130 aircraft was used to target "the principal al-Qaeda leadership in the region". The attack marked the first overt US military intervention in the Horn of Africa nation since its doomed invasion in the 1990s.

The strike was criticised by the European Commission, as well as the Arab League which claimed it had killed "many innocent victims" and demanded that Washington refrain from further attacks. There were no accurate casualty figures.

Washington's main accusation against a Somali Islamist movement was that it was sheltering three al-Qaeda members wanted in connection with the 1998 US embassy attacks in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam and 2002 attacks in Kenya.

The air strike was launched after an Ethiopian-led offensive forced the Islamists to abandon their major strongholds and flee south towards Somalia's border with Kenya. Ethiopia, an important US ally in the region, deployed thousands of troops into its Muslim neighbour and backs the weak Somali transitional government.

The Islamists alliance, which had controlled much of southern Somalia before Ethiopia's offensive, denied having any links to terrorism

Observers say the US strike and the presence of Ethiopian forces in Somalia could increase the unpopularity of the Somali administration and help stoke a potential insurgency.

DOJ_NMG_0115891

But a more immediate concern is attempting to ensure that the transitional administration, which has little legitimacy or credibility among many Somalis, begins a process of genuine reconciliation. If not, the country is likely to remain in chaos and violence, observers say.

The 15 years of lawlessness was a key reason for the US to consider Somalia a potential haven for terrorists.

Faction leaders defeated by the Islamists have already begun moving back to Mogadishu, and the government was forced to abandon a plan to disarm clan militias.

"Ethiopia has to withdraw, the US has to stop its engagement and the government's leadership has to offer real reconciliation which it is extremely reluctant to do and is very difficult to achieve," said one western diplomat. "What is hindering this is the presence of Ethiopian troops and, more importantly, the arrogance of the government."

Since it was formed two years ago at an UN-backed conference, divisions have racked the government, which is led by Abdullahi Yusuf, the president and a veteran warlord. Before Ethiopia launched its offensive, it had little influence outside of the central town of Baidoa and it is deeply unpopular among the important Hawiye clan that dominates Mogadishu, the capital.

The 275-member parliament and the government are supposed to represent Somalia's complex clan system, but Hawiye claim that Ethiopia and its allied Somali faction leaders handpicked its representatives, including the prime minister.

The administration's security is dependent on the presence of Ethiopian forces and it has few means of generating revenue – the European Commission, the UK, Sweden and Norway fund MPs monthly sitting allowances ranging from $1,000 to $1,500. Donors also provide financing in other areas, including establishing a new police force, transport and refurbishing buildings.

The debate among donors is whether to pour more funds into the administration in the hope that it produces benefits and encourages the government to broaden its base or whether its support should be dependent on conditions.

Days before its air strike, the US announced it would provide $40m to Somalia in political, humanitarian and peacekeeping assistance. Other diplomats want to see a more cautious approach.

"We want to say you must address the political situation or we will not stand by you, we must use the stick and carrot," said one western diplomat.

Another diplomat said it was time the international community took risks in a bid to make the transitional institutions effective.

"We have no option but to give the transitional government our support and take a leap of faith that it will deliver," he said.

Al Qaeda Threat Seen Looming If Government Fails (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, January 12, 2007

Somalia and its neighbors in the Horn of Africa risk falling under the sway of al Qaeda and violent Islamist movements if the United States and its allies fail to back the transitional government in Mogadishu, a top Somalian foreign ministry official said in an interview yesterday.

"If we fail in Somalia, you will have [al Qaeda second-in-command Ayman] al-Zawahri's men taking over Somalia, Ethiopia and Kenya, because he has the resources and determination if he is not stopped," Daahir Mireh Jibreel, permanent secretary for international cooperation in Somalia's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, told The Washington Times.

Mr. Jibreel made his appeal on a day when U.S. officials in the region said that an air strike Monday in southern Somalia had failed to kill suspected senior al Qaeda leaders, including Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, the terrorist suspected of plotting the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

Disputing earlier Somalian claims, a U.S. official in Kenya, speaking on background, told the Associated Press that eight to 10 Somalis with ties to al Qaeda had been killed, but not the top leaders targeted in the strike.

The official revealed that a small team of U.S. special operations troops has entered Somalia and is working with Somalian and Ethiopian forces to hunt down suspected al Qaeda operatives.

In New York, U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon expressed concern about Monday's air strike, but called on the international community to step up efforts to stabilize the country.

DOJ_NMG_0115892

"I believe we must make every effort to protect civilians and be cautious of other unintended consequences in this situation," Mr. Ban told reporters.

Mr. Jibreel said the transitional government supported the U.S. strikes.

"We have full intelligence coordination with the United States on these individuals," he said. "We want them taken out of Somalia, either dead or alive."

Ethiopian troops in a Christmas Eve invasion routed the fundamentalist Islamic Courts Union, which had seized control of Mogadishu and much of the country's south. The Bush administration and countries in the region had worried openly about the Islamists' ties to al Qaeda and other jihadist movements.

Mr. Jibreel said he was not surprised by the Islamists' sudden collapse and dismissed fears of an Iraq- or Afghan-type insurgency against the federal government.

"They had no popular support, either from religious groups or from the clans," he said.

"Their leaders could not hide among the people, not in Mogadishu and not in the countryside, because the people would not let them. The idea that this is another Iraq or Afghanistan situation is wrong," he said.

But Mr. Jibreel noted that al Qaeda's al-Zawahri has explicitly called on Islamist fighters to target the Somalian government, which is struggling to re-establish effective central control for the first time since dictator Mohamed Siad Barre was ousted by the country's warlords 16 years ago.

Mr. Jibreel said the transitional government had support from all of the country's major clans, but needed Ethiopian military support because the Somalian Islamists had seized heavy weaponry from the country's warlords. He said the government wants to see the Ethiopian forces leave, but not if their departure creates a "security vacuum."

The State Department said this week it would consider a U.N. peacekeeping force for Somalia. Uganda so far is the only country to offer troops for a stabilization force, although other African Union countries may contribute as well.

Mr. Jibreel, who is meeting with lawmakers and State Department officials during his Washington visit, outlined an extensive program of U.S. public and private support for Somalia. The list included full diplomatic recognition of the government in Mogadishu, private investment, and technical and financial aid to build up the country's civil service, security forces, and tax and legal systems.

The transitional government has been criticized for factionalism and corruption, but analysts say rising regional and international awareness of the dangers of a failed state could help Somalia.

"The coming months will determine whether Somalia emerges as a functioning state or follows the Iraqi and Afghan route back into anarchy," wrote Nick Grono, vice president of the International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based think tank, in a recent analysis.

Can African Peacekeepers Tame Somalia? (CSM)

By Scott Baldauf And Alexis Okeowo

The Christian Science Monitor, January 12, 2007

JOHANNESBURG, SOUTH AFRICA AND KAMPALA, UGANDA

Pushing Somalia's Islamists out of power in Mogadishu took less than two weeks for Somali government and Ethiopian forces. Keeping them out, and keeping the peace in the midst of what some say is becoming an Iraq-style insurgency, could be a much more difficult job.

Western money will help to foot the bill, but it will be African peacekeepers, from countries like Uganda, Nigeria, and South Africa, who risk their lives in Somali towns that haven't known peace for more than 15 years. The United Nations Security Council on Wednesday backed the speedy deployment of an African peacekeeping force.

Sending African troops may please Western powers, but it doesn't go down well at home, where poor African countries like Uganda and Nigeria have myriad problems of their own, from unemployment and illiteracy to ongoing domestic conflicts. And, while many see the moment as an opportunity to provide African solutions to African problems, the failure of the African Union peacekeeping force to provide security in Darfur, Sudan, is not an promising sign.

DOJ_NMG_0115893

"What we've learned over the years is that if you want peacekeeping, you have to have peace, and you don't have it in Somalia," says Alex de Waal, an Africa expert at the Social Science Research Council in New York. "That's the reason the African Union mission has failed in Darfur, and it's the main reason the proposed UN mission for Chad is also problematic."

"The African Union has a lot of ongoing peacekeeping missions that are extremely risky," says Mr. De Waal. "The powers that be are beating their heads against the wall trying to get the AU to move, but everything we know about peacekeeping says that this is not how we do it. What we would see in the future is a very difficult set of problems arising, trying to fight an urban confrontation like the one in 1993, when the US took on General Aideed and you had 'Black Hawk Down'." Somali anger after US airstrike

The situation in Mogadishu now is growing worse, with reports of Somali and Ethiopian soldiers skirmishing with Islamic militiamen.

The increased violence comes days after the US launched at least one airstrike aimed at killing suspected Al Qaeda terrorists in southern Somalia. Reports earlier this week that the strike killed Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, one of the three senior Al Qaeda members blamed for the 1998 bombings of the US embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, proved to be false.

In Uganda, President Yoweri Museveni unveiled plans to send a battalion of at least 700 Ugandan troops specially trained and equipped for the job. So far, he is the only African leader who has committed to sending troops.

Ethiopia, which sent thousands of troops into Somalia to fight alongside Somali government forces, has indicated that its troops will be withdrawn within weeks. Other East African member-nations in the Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD) gave their support to Ethiopia's intervention on condition that Ethiopia would quickly withdraw. Amid Western pressure, Africans concerned

Despite Mr. Museveni's enthusiasm, many Ugandan leaders have repeatedly expressed concerns about sending soldiers to Somalia.

"We want to know, what is our objective? How long are we going to stay? And how will we be able to pull out?" says Oryem Okello, the state minister for Foreign Affairs in Museveni's own government.

Many Ugandans say their country should not participate until it resolves its own conflicts.

"Is 20 years and more of war in Uganda not enough to let us build and consolidate peace first in Uganda?" asks Vincent Abura, a Ugandan resident.

Yet a quiet but feverish round of diplomacy by Washington has sweetened the deal. The US has agreed to donate $16 million for the proposed African force, which was endorsed by the UN before the war. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told Uganda's foreign minister, Sam Kutesa, in Washington last month that she believes Al Qaeda elements are backing the Somali Islamists.

Uganda Presidential Press Secretary Tamale Mirundi confirmed a recent phone conversation between President George Bush and Museveni in which Uganda was asked to intervene in Somalia.

"The motivation of Uganda is political, partly to keep in America's good books," says de Waal. "Museveni's record on democracy leaves a lot to be desired, and closer to home he's fearful of a resurgence in militant Islam. So the Ugandans want to make sure they are part of some regional coalition with Nigeria and Ethiopia to keep it at bay."

Nigeria, too, has practical reasons for joining the peacekeeping mission in Somalia, says de Waal. "The US could cut a lot of slack for Nigeria. If they stay on side, they can get away with fiddling with elections, get away with corruption. Being a friendly nation is very helpful."

Yet John Prendergast, a senior adviser for the International Crisis Group in Washington, says that the new strategy of forcing peacekeeping onto the backs of poorer nations is a moral failure of the UN and the richer nations of the West.

"This should be a UN responsibility," says Mr. Prendergast. "We are placing all of the burdens of responding to African conflicts on Africa, while the UN deals with the rest of the world, because we want to keep these crises at arm's length. This is a perverse trend that will be reversed years from now only through failure, resulting from too few troops with too little support from donor nations. In the meantime, people from Darfur and Somalia will be left to suffer the consequences."

Iran Nuke Work Seems Slow, Puzzling West (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0115894

By George Jahn

AP, January 12, 2007

Iran's uranium enrichment program appears stalled despite tough talk from the Tehran leadership, leaving intelligence services guessing about why it has not made good on plans to press ahead with activities that the West fears could be used to make nuclear arms, diplomats said Thursday.

Outside monitoring of Iran's nuclear endeavors is restricted to International Atomic Energy Agency inspections of declared sites leaving significant blind spots for both the agency and intelligence agencies of member countries trying to come up with the full picture.

Still, Tehran's reluctance to crank up activities at its declared enrichment site at Natanz when it seems to have the technical know-how is puzzling the diplomatic and intelligence communities — with some saying it was potentially worrisome.

Diplomats accredited or otherwise linked to the Vienna-based IAEA, speaking on condition of anonymity in exchange for discussing restricted information on the Iranian program, said some intelligence services believed that the Natanz site was a front.

While the world's attention is focused on Natanz, Iranian scientists and military personnel could be working on a secret enrichment program at one or more unknown sites that are much more advanced than what is going on at the declared site, they said.

At the same time, they said the lack of new activity at the two pilot enrichment plants set up at Natanz could be good news.

The diplomats said they could suggest Iranian hesitancy to provoke U.N. Security Council sanctions harsher than the relatively mild penalties agreed last month in response to Tehran's refusal to heed an August deadline to suspend enrichment. Or, they said, the hesitation is a sign of headway by relative moderates in the leadership unhappy with the confrontational nuclear antics of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Anthony Cordesman, an Iran expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, suggested an additional possibility linked to theories that Tehran was forging ahead with its enrichment program and undisclosed locations: fear that any major progress at Natanz could provoke military action by Israel or the United States.

"It's a known facility and more and more of the subject of discussion as a possible Israeli or U.S. target," Cordesman said from Washington. "So, do you use this facility now or wait to see what threat ... you face?"

IAEA inspectors arrived at Natanz on Wednesday for a routine round of monitoring. But one of the diplomats said they were unlikely to find anything but the status quo — two small pilot plants assembled in 164-centrifuge "cascades" but working only sporadically to produce small quantities of non-weapons grade enriched uranium and other individual centrifuges undergoing mechanical testing. That has essentially been the situation at Natanz since late November, he said.

There have been no signs of any activity linked to Iranian plans to assemble 3,000 centrifuges at Natanz and move them into an underground facility as the start of an ambitious program foreseeing 50,000 centrifuges producing enriched material, said the diplomats.

Enrichment can result in either low-level nuclear fuel or the highly processed fissile core for nuclear weapons. Tehran insists it is interested only in generating power with the program.

Dangerous Territory With Aid, U.S. Widens Role In Palestinian Crisis (WSJ)

By Cam Simpson And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

JERUSALEM -- In a move fraught with risk and historical ironies, the Bush administration is preparing to pour $86 million into strengthening security forces loyal to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas.

The plan, which has sparked a behind-the-scenes debate in Congress, is intended to fortify Mr. Abbas against armed assaults from Hamas, a militant, Iran-backed Islamist group committed to the destruction of Israel. It is just one example of how a new Bush administration focus on countering Iranian influence in the Middle East is quickly reshaping and regionalizing conflicts.

DOJ_NMG_0115895

Critics say that Mr. Abbas's Fatah party is hardly a reliable ally. Under Mr. Abbas's predecessor, Yasser Arafat, Fatah was widely reviled for corruption. And its members in the past have launched terrorist attacks against Israelis and Americans. Some analysts worry the new effort could backfire on the U.S., inflaming Palestinian strife and supplying guns that could be turned against Israel some day.

"I think we are playing with fire," says Robert Malley, Middle East director for the International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based think tank focused on conflict resolution. He sees a "classic arms-race dynamic" taking shape.

The security program, which would provide more than the combined total of all money the U.S. has given to the Palestinian Authority since its formation in 1994, was detailed recently in classified briefings for Congress by a U.S. general who now serves as an adviser to Mr. Abbas, the primary U.S. ally in the Palestinian territories.

The initiative precedes a weeklong swing through the Middle East by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, which kicks off in Jerusalem tomorrow. In exchange for support countering Iran across the region, Ms. Rice and the White House are promising Arab regimes political progress for the Palestinians in their attempts to establish a state next to Israel. Because Israel and the U.S. won't deal with Hamas, progress on that front means trying to bolster Mr. Abbas's position against the group. Israeli officials back the plan.

Mr. Abbas was voted president before Hamas won parliamentary elections last year. In essence, the Bush administration, which pushed for the Palestinian elections under its emphasis on promoting democracy across the Middle East, now wants to strengthen the armed forces of those who lost at the ballot box.

At a minimum, U.S. officials want to keep Mr. Abbas's forces strong enough to maintain a military stalemate with Hamas. Mr. Abbas is widely viewed by U.S. and other Western leaders as an earnest partner, although he has yet to achieve significant reforms within Fatah. U.S. officials say they don't intend for the money to go directly for weapons, although it is unclear how that aim would be enforced. Israeli officials have said in interviews and public statements that the U.S. approved two major arms shipments to Mr. Abbas's forces in the past seven months from U.S. allies in the region as part of the new approach.

Mr. Abbas's forces were originally formed to serve his predecessor, Mr. Arafat. They have a history of alleged human-rights violations and have long been accused of fostering a culture of corruption when Fatah dominated the Palestinian Authority. Those sorts of problems led many regular Palestinians, even some who don't accept an Islamist vision of governance, to support Hamas in the elections it won last year.

Dennis Ross, a former top Middle East adviser to both Democratic and Republican administrations, says the Bush strategy is based on flawed assumptions. "The $86 million reflects the basic sense in the [Bush] administration that the only way to change things is through confrontation," he says.

Last week the ranking Republican on the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida, asked the Democratic chairman, Rep. Tom Lantos, to put an "informational hold" on the cash, according to senior Democratic and Republican House aides. Mr. Lantos has not placed a hold on the money, but his staff says he is seeking more details from the administration. The White House gave Congress a legally required notice Dec. 28 that it planned to move ahead with the program, but the president still hasn't taken the next and final step, sending a waiver to Capitol Hill. His signature on such a waiver is mandated by a law that bans most aid to the Palestinian Authority.

One key reason Bush administration officials are anxious to move fast: They say they see Hamas as better-equipped, better-armed and better-trained, and argue that's due to help from Iran. Because of this, they contend the new support is aimed at halting confrontation, not fueling it, by evening the balance. Nimer Hamad, a senior political adviser to Mr. Abbas, says a Palestinian civil war is not the goal. Ultimately, he says, Mr. Abbas needs to be strong enough to press for a political solution. A balance of power "will oblige [Hamas] to the field of negotiations and dialogue."

Last Chance

Israeli security officials, who strongly back the American program and have quietly assisted Washington, relay their own sense of desperation. Many of them believe this is the last chance to keep Islamists from consolidating a long-term hold on power next door. "If I have to choose between confrontation [among Palestinians] or the dominance of Hamas, I choose confrontation," said a senior Israeli defense official, speaking on condition of anonymity. Another senior Israeli security official also said time is short for Mr. Abbas to regain momentum.

DOJ_NMG_0115896

No matter whom they support politically -- Hamas, Fatah or any of the smaller Palestinian political groups and armed militias -- Palestinians have a deep distrust in American involvement with Palestinian Authority security forces. A European-funded poll conducted in May found only 16% of the 1,800 Palestinians surveyed in East Jerusalem, the West Bank and Gaza Strip trusted U.S. and Canadian assistance and counsel in security matters.

From the inception of the Palestinian Authority under the 1993 Oslo agreement, the U.S. and Israel pressed Mr. Arafat for security services willing and able to disarm militants such as Hamas who reject peace with Israel. Almost from the start, this placed Palestinian security men in a precarious position within their own society. Rather than crack down on Palestinian militants at the behest of Israel, some members of the groups looked the other way or even participated in attacks against the Jewish state.

Palestinian and international groups complained of deeply rooted, Mafia-style corruption within these forces during Mr. Arafat's reign, in addition to alleged human-rights abuses. Some of these abuses are confirmed by former members of the security services. During Mike Canawati's service in Mr. Arafat's presidential guard in the 1990s, Mr. Canawati says he was deployed to collect personal debts, extort businessmen and arrest fellow Palestinians who wouldn't cooperate. He says shame forced him into early retirement. "It's not the job of presidential security to do the job of the Mafia," says Mr. Canawati, a member of a prominent Bethlehem family who quit the presidential guard in 1999, blaming Mr. Arafat's lieutenants.

Mr. Hamad, the Palestinian presidential adviser, says: "I don't want to defend the past. There were so many problems." But he adds Mr. Abbas should be credited for his courage in publicly acknowledging the widespread nature of graft and other problems within the ranks of his own Fatah movement. "Since he was elected as president of the Palestinian mission and authority, at least there is no new corruption," Mr. Hamad says.

Like many Palestinians, Mr. Hamad also blames the Israeli Defense Forces for targeted attacks against the Palestinian security infrastructure during the so-called second intifada, the bloody Palestinian-Israeli conflict that began in 2000.

With Israeli encouragement, the U.S. gave up on the security forces under Mr. Arafat, accusing them of involvement in terrorism during that period.

After Mr. Arafat's death, and Mr. Abbas's election to succeed him, the U.S. began working with Palestinian forces again. Ms. Rice announced the move in February 2005 on her first mission as America's top diplomat, appointing Lt. Gen. William Ward as the U.S. security adviser. She emphasized Gen. Ward would be "responsible for helping the Palestinians in reform of their security forces" and for coordinating security with Israel. She also declared it "the most promising moment for progress between Palestinians and Israelis" in recent memory.

After just a few months on the job, Gen. Ward pointed to problems beyond corruption. The forces were dysfunctional and ill-prepared, he told the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee on June 30, 2005. He added that as many as 38,000 men on the payrolls never showed up for work. The security services were long used as a patronage base for Fatah, giving the Palestinian territories last year the world's highest ratio of security-service personnel to civilians, according to the Geneva Centre for the Democratic Control of Armed Forces, a think tank.

Insecure Citizens

Yet Palestinians themselves remained among the world's most insecure citizens. One reform considered crucial by Gen. Ward, enacted in the first year of renewed U.S. efforts on the security front, was the consolidation of the security forces under the Palestinian Authority's Ministry of Interior. Before that the roughly 60,000 security personnel were scattered among more than a dozen different services, often with overlapping responsibilities, few clear command lines and sometimes-fierce rivalries. That state of affairs, critics say, was fostered by Mr. Arafat and other Fatah bosses in order to maintain rule. Gen. Ward and other international advisers reported finding services organized more along clan loyalties rather than transparent institutions.

But the Ministry of Interior, where at least a semblance of command was being organized, has been in the control of Hamas since the Islamist group took over the government last March. Now the American advisers who saw the move as a crucial first step toward reform can't even speak with beat cops, let alone commanders, under the ministry. American officials are forbidden from dealing with anyone inside an entity controlled by Hamas, because it's designated as a terrorist group under U.S. law.

DOJ_NMG_0115897

As tensions with Hamas have escalated, Mr. Abbas has responded by issuing presidential orders pulling Ministry of Interior forces under the command of the president's office. Gen. Ward left before Hamas won the election, and has since been replaced by Lt. Gen. Keith Dayton, the official who recently briefed Congress.

Bassam Eid, head of the Palestinian Human Rights Monitoring Group in East Jerusalem, believes little has changed within the security services since the time of Mr. Arafat's reign. Mr. Eid's organization has tracked about 550 Palestinian murders in the territories since 2000. Of these, an estimated 120 were killings of suspected "collaborators" with Israel. But the other roughly 430 remain unsolved. He said his group has amassed detailed evidence that the vast majority of open cases are linked to Fatah.

"Don't tell me Fatah can be considered a moderate movement," Mr. Eid said, adding, "What Mr. Bush will do with this money is double the number of thugs." Palestinian murders aren't the only ones that remain unsolved. Ms. Rice herself, in announcing Gen. Ward's appointment, said she had been assured by Mr. Abbas that he would "bring to justice those who murdered" three American security contractors in a 2003 terrorist attack in Gaza. That case, too, remains open.

A senior American official involved in the effort said the U.S. would screen everyone receiving assistance under the new program to weed out suspected terrorists and human-rights abusers.

Meanwhile, much of Mr. Abbas's security force remains deeply opposed to Israel. Indeed, Israeli security services say members have carried out terrorist attacks against Israelis in recent years. Some worry the guns being funneled to Fatah now will ultimately be aimed at Israelis or even Americans, regardless of background checks. Many commanders and foot soldiers maintain dual loyalties, overlapping their official employment with membership in militias and terrorist groups loyal to Fatah, most notably the Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades. Both the U.S. and European Union designate it as a terrorist organization.

Mahmoud Damra, the senior commander in the West Bank for one of Mr. Abbas's most elite forces, was arrested by the Israelis in September. Mr. Damra, more commonly known by his nom de guerre, Abu Awad, is accused of planning and ordering a spate of attacks, including one at a Jerusalem social security office in which an American citizen was killed. Mr. Damra was arrested by Israeli border police as he rolled into Israel at a border crossing just north of Ramallah.

Succession Issue Stirs Dissent In Egypt (WSJ)

By Mariam Fam

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

CAIRO, Egypt -- Egyptian journalist Ibrahim Essa believes his phone lines are tapped, and says he has been advised by some friends and foes alike to tone down his writings. As it stands, he faces a one-year prison sentence.

The reason? Mr. Essa says the Mubarak regime wants to intimidate him for, among other things, harshly criticizing the current president and raising a stink about who Egypt's next president might be. Mr. Essa worries it could be Gamal Mubarak, son of President Hosni Mubarak -- a prospect Mr. Essa loathes. "The issue of succession will be a watershed in Egypt," says Mr. Essa. "Continuing with Hosni Mubarak in office is a disaster, but passing power on to Gamal Mubarak is an even bigger disaster."

Detractors blame the Mubarak regime for the unemployment, poverty and corruption afflicting Egypt -- and claim it has no intention of loosening its grip on power. The president has recently asked parliament to amend some constitutional articles, in part to encourage more political participation by opposition parties, but the opposition is skeptical there will be real liberalization. And while President Mubarak sees his regime as a stabilizing force in the Middle East, and Egypt remains a main U.S. ally in the region, many feel Cairo's clout as a peacemaker and power broker has waned amid the rising influence of hard-liners such as Iran.

Mr. Essa is part of a growing group of Egyptian activists talking publicly about a topic the regime would probably like to see left alone -- even as private discussion and speculation over what has become known as the "inheritance scenario" have burgeoned. The 78-year-old President Mubarak won a fifth six-year term in office in 2005 elections. As he grew older, his long-standing refusal to name a vice president fueled speculation that he was leaving the way clear for his 43-year-old son to succeed him.

It only fed the rumor mill further when the younger Mr. Mubarak, the second son of the president, began taking on higher-profile public roles, rising rapidly through the ranks of the ruling National Democratic Party until he became its deputy secretary general. Last year, he visited the White House for talks that were unannounced until an Arab station broke the news.

DOJ_NMG_0115898

Meanwhile, critics say, the regime has been cracking down on opposition figures in part to eliminate possible challengers to the younger Mubarak. They say the regime wants to bill him as the only alternative to the Islamist Muslim Brotherhood, its strongest opponent. Secular and liberal opposition parties here pose little threat, as they enjoy little popularity, weakened by government restrictions and their own divisions and inability to win constituents' confidence.

The succession issue -- troubling for many who hope that the end of the quarter-century Mubarak reign will help usher in more democracy -- has taken on new significance as parliament prepares to amend a constitutional article that the opposition says is tailored to filter out opponents of the ruling party's presidential candidate.

Both Mubaraks have previously denied there are plans for the son to succeed the father.

To his supporters, Gamal Mubarak is a champion of political and economic overhaul and a force for change within the ruling party. Party members say the possibility of him becoming president isn't officially discussed, but add that many of them expect it might happen. Gehad Auda, a member of the NDP's policy committee, says he supports having Gamal Mubarak at the helm. He credits him with attracting fresh blood and talent to the party and with working toward establishing a popular base of support for it. "He's a very good leader. ... He's a good listener and he recognizes challenges," Mr. Auda said.

Critics such as Mr. Essa say the younger Mr. Mubarak has led a sheltered life and is too close to Egypt's elite business circles, both problematic in a country where the gap between rich and poor is a major source of tension.

"He has never taken a bus ... never hailed a cab or haggled with a cab driver," Mr. Essa wrote in a front-page editorial that ran recently in Al-Dustour newspaper, of which he is the editor in chief. "His only encounters with poor people are those with the state security informants." In another piece, Mr. Essa wrote of the political apathy gripping many here: "It is difficult to persuade the people that they're the only ones capable of changing Mubarak and of stopping his son from sitting on his father's throne for another quarter-century that will see Egypt waste away."

Mr. Auda sees Mr. Essa's writings on the issue as proof the regime is opening up and allowing more freedoms. But the 41-year-old journalist sees the shift as a cosmetic modification of the regime's tactics rather than strategy. Opposition journalists say that instead of directly silencing them, the regime tries to intimidate some critics and co-opt others, going after outspoken ones through libel suits usually filed by regime supporters.

Others voice similar views and run into the same challenges. The pro-reform movement Kifaya, or "Enough" in English, helped break taboos with slogans that singled out Mr. Mubarak and his son. "Oh, Gamal, forget about inheriting [office]. Tell your father to have some shame," a group of Kifaya supporters yelled in a recent protest in downtown Cairo.

But catchy as they are, Kifaya protests don't usually boast a high turnout. Other activists have resorted to the Internet, dissecting Mr. Gamal's perceived ambitions on blogs or launching cyber initiatives to block the prospect. Other Egyptians have used comedy to express their opposition. All this is a far cry from the Egypt in which the president and his family long were immune from public criticism. In recent years, the push for democracy and some regional changes -- as well as a clique of new satellite channels, independent newspapers and Internet blogs providing opponents with a podium -- have helped push the envelope.

When Mr. Essa's Al-Dustour newspaper opened in 1995, it had to tiptoe around sensitive issues. "It was known in all of Egypt that the president constituted a red line," he said, "so to get around this we would write a story, for instance, about the people surrounding the president instead."

In 1998, Al-Dustour was ordered shut. Out of work, Mr. Essa wrote a novel in 1999 about a ruler who was killed in his sleep and who had wanted to install his son after him. "I set up this story in Egypt with all its details," Mr. Essa said. "But of course I didn't say so in writing for reasons you know." Still, more than 2,500 copies of the novel were confiscated, he said. But some were leaked, and he managed to privately sell a few hundred more.

Since Al-Dustour has been closed, nine papers that Mr. Essa attempted to launch or was involved with were blocked or banned one way or another, he said. A television show he presented on a private Egyptian channel was pulled off the air after the owner was subjected to "economic pressure" by the government, Mr. Essa added.

But with the country abuzz with talk of liberalization, Al-Dustour was allowed to publish again in 2005. Mr. Essa's novel, "The Assassination of the Big Man," was also reprinted and distributed. Then, in June 2006, a court sentenced Mr. Essa and a journalist at his newspaper to a year in prison on charges of libeling President Mubarak. Mr. Essa has appealed the sentence.

DOJ_NMG_0115899

Mr. Essa says he has little illusion that his writings can rouse ordinary Egyptians from the helplessness he feels is gripping many, but adds that he won't stop exposing issues such as the succession.

"Egypt is going through a historical situation and it's my job as an intellectual to help change this situation," he said. "We talk, and the government talks. I may go to jail because I talk."

Carter Center Board Members Resign Over Palestine Book (WSJ)

By Rick Brooks And Betsy Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

ATLANTA -- Fourteen members of an advisory board at the Carter Center resigned today, concluding they could "no longer in good conscience continue to serve" following publication of former President Jimmy Carter's controversial book, "Palestine Peace Not Apartheid."

"It seems that you have turned to a world of advocacy, including even malicious advocacy," the board members wrote in a letter, a copy of which was reviewed by The Wall Street Journal. "We can no longer endorse your strident and uncompromising position. This is not the Carter Center or Jimmy Carter we came to respect and support. Therefore it is with sadness and regret that we hereby tender our resignation from the Board of Councilors of the Carter Center effective immediately."

RESIGNATION LETTERS

Read the text of two letters1 sent Thursday, Jan. 11, by members of the Carter Center Board of Councilors.

The advisory board is comprised of more than 200 members, including representatives from leading businesses and other groups in the Atlanta area.

Some of the Carter Center board members who quit in protest have known Mr. Carter for decades. William B. Schwartz Jr., whose name is on the list of those resigning today, was U.S. ambassador to the Bahamas during the Carter administration. S. Stephen Selig III, chairman and president of Atlanta real-estate developer Selig Enterprises Inc., was a top White House aide to Mr. Carter who led outreach to the business community. Mr. Selig was chairman of the host committee for the 1988 Democratic National Convention in Atlanta.

Steve Berman, 51 years old and one of the board members who quit, said in an interview that the departing members "were greatly concerned that the book was not steeped in fact. It departed radically from his role and went to one-sided advocacy." Recent media comments by Mr. Carter "have been most disturbing," he added.

The resigning board members also include: Michael J. Coles, chairman and chief executive of Caribou Coffee Co., Minneapolis; Barbara Babbit Kaufman, founder of Chapter 11 Discount Bookstores, a bookstore chain based in Atlanta; and Liane Levetan, former DeKalb County, Ga., chief executive. That is the top elected position in a county that includes a sliver of Atlanta.

Ms. Levetan, who is Jewish and served on the Carter Center board for several years, told The Wall Street Journal in an interview that she decided to quit because "you can't sit back and know something isn't the truth." While she hasn't read President Carter's controversial book, Ms. Levetan said her background is a factor in her criticism of the book's contents. Ms. Levetan was born in Vienna and fled to London with her parents in 1939, moving to the U.S. in 1951.

Ambassador Schwartz said the letter speaks for itself, declining further comment.

In a written statement, John Hardman, executive director of the Carter Center, said the organization is "grateful to these Board of Councilors members for their years of service and support for The Carter Center in advancing peace and health around the world. The Carter Center's Board of Councilors is an advisory body of community leaders and business people who are briefed quarterly on the Center's work and serve as emissaries of the Center to the greater community. They are not engaged in implementing work of the Center and are not a governing board. There are more than 200 members of the Board of Councilors. The Center's governing board is the Board of Trustees."

Mr. Carter couldn't be reached to comment. Deanna Congileo, head of public information at the Carter Center, responded to an interview request with the written statement from Mr. Hardman, adding that it is "the only response I anticipate," according to an email.

DOJ_NMG_0115900

"Palestine" has sparked outrage among some critics who claim it is unfairly harsh toward Israel and contains historical inaccuracies. Mr. Carter's use of the word "apartheid" has been particularly controversial, with critics saying it evokes unjust comparisons with South Africa's former system of racial segregation.

Mr. Carter's book was published Nov. 14 by CBS Corp.'s Simon & Schuster imprint. It has gone back to press five times, and now has 450,000 hardcovers in print. The book debuted at No. 11 on the New York Times best-seller list and reached as high as No. 5. By means of comparison, Mr. Carter's last book, "Our Endangered Values," published Nov. 1, 2005, debuted at No. 1 and now has 760,000 hardcovers in print. There are also 200,000 copies of the paperback edition of that title in print.

The Carter Center was founded in 1982 by Mr. Carter and his wife Rosalynn. The nonprofit organization, closely associated with Emory University in Atlanta, has a staff of about 150 and has worked on human rights, disease control and prevention, antipoverty and democracy-related projects in more than 65 countries. In November, Carter Center representatives monitored the presidential election in Nicaragua that was won by former Sandinista leader Daniel Ortega.

The Carter Center had revenue of $149.9 million and expenses of $121.4 million in the year ended August 31, 2005. It received contributions of $41.4 million during fiscal 2005, the latest year for which financial figures were immediately available.

According to a Carter Center annual report, the advisory board was founded in 1987 and is a "leadership group that promotes understanding of and support for the Carter Center in advancing peace and health around the world." Members meet quarterly and "act as advocates" for the organization.

The Carter Center's governing board of trustees currently is comprised of 21 members and two trustees emeritus, and is led by John Moores, owner of the San Diego Padres. Mr. and Mrs. Carter hold seats on the board, and 10 of the slots are filled through appointments by Mr. Carter and trustees not affiliated with Emory's board.

Carter Center Advisers Quit To Protest Book (NYT)

By Brenda Goodman

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

ATLANTA, Jan. 11 — Fourteen of the city's business and civic leaders resigned from the Carter Center's advisory board on Thursday to protest former President Jimmy Carter's recent criticisms of Israel and American Jewish political power.

Their joint letter of resignation denounced Mr. Carter's best-selling book, "Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid," for its criticisms of Israel's treatment of Palestinians. The letter also took issue with comments Mr. Carter has made suggesting that Israel's supporters in the United States are using their power to stifle debate on the issue.

"It seems you have turned to a world of advocacy, even malicious advocacy," the letter said. "We can no longer endorse your strident and uncompromising position. This is not the Carter Center or the Jimmy Carter we came to respect and support."

The 14 who resigned were members of the center's board of councilors, a group of more than 200 local leaders who act as ambassadors and fund-raisers for the center but do not determine its policy or direct its operations.

Among the letter signers were Michael Coles, the chief executive of the Caribou Coffee Company; William B. Schwartz Jr., the ambassador to the Bahamas during Mr. Carter's presidency; Liane Levetan, a former chief executive of DeKalb County, Ga.; and S. Stephen Selig III, who served as national finance chairman for the Carter-Mondale Presidential Committee.

"I felt very passionate about this," Ms. Levetan said. "You can't, when something is not correct, sit back. You have to stand up for what you believe."

Several members said they had admired Mr. Carter for years and found it difficult to resign, but could not remain associated with his recent statements.

"I was very offended with the views that he espoused in that book," said Jonathan Golden, a board member for 10 years and chairman of the Arnall Golden Gregory law firm in Atlanta.

In an e-mailed statement responding to the resignations, John Hardman, executive director of the Carter Center, thanked the resigning members for their "years of service and support," but also played down the significance of their departure. Mr. Hardman pointed out that those who resigned were just a fraction of the overall board and were not "engaged in implementing the work of the center."

DOJ_NMG_0115901

The resignations are the latest in a recent string of public defections from Mr. Carter and the ideas he espouses in his book, which has been on The New York Times best-seller list for the last five weeks.

In December, Kenneth W. Stein, a professor at Emory University who was the first executive director at the Carter Center, resigned his most recent position as a fellow there. Days later, Dennis Ross, a former envoy to the Middle East who is now a news analyst, accused Mr. Carter of using maps that Mr. Ross created without his permission, and mislabeling them in the book.

The Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith recently placed advertisements criticizing Mr. Carter in several major newspapers, and the Central Conference of American Rabbis, representing Reform Judaism, announced that its members would not visit the Carter Center, as planned, during a coming conference in Atlanta.

Mr. Carter has defended his views, along with his use of the word "apartheid" in the book's title, saying he intended the book to spark discussion.

The letter from resigning board members accuses Mr. Carter of having abandoned his role as a peace broker in the Middle East, and said his statements had proven useful to white supremacists and other anti-Semites.

"In its work in conflict resolution, the Carter Center has always played the useful and constructive role of honest broker and mediator between warring parties," the letter says. "In your book, which portrays the conflict between Israel and her neighbors as a purely one-sided affair with Israel holding all of the responsibility for resolving the conflict, you have clearly abandoned your historic role of broker in favor of becoming an advocate for one side."

Bangladesh President Steps Down (AP)

By Farid Hossain

AP, January 12, 2007

The president Thursday declared a state of emergency, stepped down as interim leader of Bangladesh's caretaker government and postponed this month's elections following violent protests by a key political alliance that has said it would boycott the vote.

President Iajuddin Ahmed said in a televised speech that the balloting, which had been scheduled for Jan. 22, would be delayed, and he did not give a new date.

"It's not possible to hold the elections on schedule. We need a flawless voter list to ensure that the elections are free, fair and credible," Ahmed said.

A new voter list had been among the key demands of a major political alliance that has orchestrated paralyzing protests and strikes in recent months, alleging Ahmed's administration favored its rivals and saying it would boycott the vote. Ahmed's removal as head of the caretaker government was the alliance's other main demand.

"I've decided to step down as the chief adviser of the caretaker government and I will, in a couple of days, appoint a new interim leader to hold an election in which all parties will be able to participate," Ahmed said in a televised speech.

In the meantime, one of his advisers, Fazlul Haque, would serve as the head of the caretaker government, he said.

Ahmed said he would remain Bangladesh's president, a largely ceremonial role.

The state of emergency raised concern in a country with a history of military rule. Two presidents had been slain and 19 other coup attempts failed in Bangladesh since it gained independence from Pakistan in 1971.

Under the constitution, the state of emergency suspends the fundamental rights of citizens.

The country's eight private television stations were told by the information ministry to suspend news programming and relay bulletins from state-run television, according to the stations' broadcasts.

"The restriction will be effective until further order from the ministry," Khairul Alam Mukul, a news editor at the private NTV television center told The Associated Press.

Indefinite night curfew was imposed for the capital, Dhaka, and more than 60 other cities and towns, state-run TV reported. The curfew will remain in force each night from 11 p.m. until dawn, the station reported, quoting an announcement from the president's office.

Troops had already been deployed for election duties.

DOJ_NMG_0115902

The South Asian nation has been crippled by strikes and blockades orchestrated by former Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina and her 19-party alliance that opposes the election. The alliance plans a series of strikes and blockades starting Sunday.

Hasina's alliance alleged that Ahmed's interim government, charged with holding the polls, favors her arch rival, former Prime Minister Khaleda Zia. The alliance demands Ahmed's resignation and a delay in the election to allow for reforms.

It has claimed that the voters' list for the election has flaws, including fake names. Other demands include the use of transparent ballot boxes and the removal of about 345 field-level election officials allegedly biased toward Zia.

Last month, the U.S.-based National Democratic Institute's Dhaka office said in a report that 10 million names on the current voting list were "errors" or duplications — representing 13 percent of the country's 93 million voters.

The United Nations and the European Union election observation mission in Bangladesh have suspended election-related activities and support for the South Asian nation, citing lack of legitimacy of the balloting.

The European Union on Thursday recalled election observers from Bangladesh while the U.N. suspended all technical support for Bangladesh's polls, including its International Coordination Office in Dhaka.

"The political crisis in Bangladesh has severely jeopardized the legitimacy of the electoral process," U.N. spokeswoman Michele Montas said Wednesday in New York.

Bangladesh Postpones Elections (FT)

By Tom Joehnk

Financial Times, January 12, 2007

Bangladesh postponed controversial elections set for January 22 after the president quit as head of the interm government and declared a state of emergency on Thursday.

The decision follows weeks of violent protests and rioting between the opposition parties and police ahead of the planned parliamentary elections.

Iajuddin Ahmed, the president, said in a televised address to the nation that he would step down as chief adviser to the unelected interim government in favour of Justice Fazlul Haque, one of the most influential figures on the government's panel of advisers. Mr Ahmed will remain as president.

The declared aim of the move is to form a new interim government that will oversee fresh and credible elections under a new election commission within 120 days, the maximum duration of a state of emergency under the constitution.

The announcement came within hours of the European Union suspending its election observation mission, following a pull-out by US and other monitoring missions a day earlier.

Graham Elson, the EU deputy chief observer, said it was "not the business of observer teams to scrutinise elections whose credibility clearly falls short of international standards" and said the decision was a "logical consequence" of conditions on the ground.

A curfew will start from 11pm until 5am every day until further notice and fundamental rights have been suspended. The government has banned private media, and news bulletins on private channels have been taken off the air. Private TV channels would carry only the state-run Bangladesh Television, said the Information Ministry.

Pressure on Mr Ahmed intensified on Thursday when his 10 advisers said they would not support a decision to go ahead with the planned election.

Earlier in the day, Renata Lok Dessallien, the UN resident co-ordinator in Dhaka, said an election "under current circumstances without participation of major political parties would not be considered credible or legitimate".

Last hopes that the opposition might participate in the polls were dashed on Wednesday when Sheikh Hasina, leader of the opposition Awami League, told a rally of 100,000 supporters it would continue its agitation programme which has cut transport links, crippling the economy. Ms Hasina alleged that the BNP-Jamaat alliance was controlling Mr Ahmed by "remote control".

Diplomats said they hoped the army would continue to play a neutral role. But an outright military takeover cannot be ruled out. "The political class still hopes that Bangladesh can still avoid a Pakistan solution," Hossain Zillur Rahman, a Dhaka-based political commentator, told the FT earlier in the week.

DOJ_NMG_0115903

But Mr Rahman said then that this confidence might be misplaced. “In the political party’s respective demands there is no solution to the political crisis,“ he said.

In Bangladesh, State Of Emergency And Election Delay (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

NEW DELHI, Jan. 11 — The president of Bangladesh declared a state of emergency on Thursday evening, suspending certain fundamental rights, imposing a nighttime curfew, and effectively postponing elections that were scheduled to be held in less than two weeks. He then resigned as the chief of the caretaker government entrusted to run the vote.

An alliance of political parties had promised to boycott the elections, scheduled for Jan. 22. And in the past couple of days, as the nation of 140 million people sank deeper into political violence, virtually all international backing for the vote fell away.

The president, Iajuddin Ahmed, said in a televised address in Dhaka on Thursday night that it would be impossible to hold elections that would be acceptable to all parties by the scheduled date. He referred specifically to the contention that the voters' list had been stuffed with 14 million fake names, one of the main grounds for the boycott.

“It’s not possible to hold the elections on schedule,” Mr. Ahmed said, according to The Associated Press. “We need a flawless voter list to ensure that the elections are free, fair and credible.”

Mr. Ahmed, who will retain the largely ceremonial presidency, said he would appoint an advisory council to conduct the elections at an unspecified date. The state news agency reported that he saw his resignation as being “essential to keep the economy going and maintain law and order.”

He had earlier insisted that the Constitution permitted no postponement of the elections.

Emergency rule paves the way for the army to take control of law and order and imposes new restrictions on the news media, measures that have not been applied in Bangladesh since the restoration of democracy 16 years ago.

The emergency declaration came a day after the United Nations suspended technical support for the coming elections, saying that they would not be “considered credible or legitimate.” Two teams of American election observers, as well as one that was to be dispatched by the European Union, also pulled out.

This week, an alliance of political parties, led by the former opposition Awami League, which had already said it would boycott the elections, announced that they would “resist,” which most Bangladeshis understood to be a barely concealed threat of violence.

The British Foreign Office issued a statement on Thursday urging both parties to compromise in an effort to produce elections that could be seen as “credible, peaceful and universally accepted.” Clashes between the police and political activists in recent days presaged further violence in the days before the elections.

The United Nations said in a statement on Wednesday, “The United Nations is concerned that Bangladesh’s democratic advances and international standing will be affected if the current crisis continues.”

The country’s two main leaders, Sheik Hasina Wazed, leader of the Awami League, and Khaleda Zia, both former prime ministers, have been battling each other for power since 1991, when they and their supporters restored democracy after nine years of military rule. Since then, they have fought bitterly for control of the government and together they have given their country a singular reputation for political violence.

Mrs. Zia’s Bangladesh Nationalist Party stepped down from power last October, when an interim caretaker government took over, with responsibility for running the elections.

The election process then became the heart of the controversy. Sheik Hasina’s party accused Mrs. Zia’s party of having stacked the election commission with partisans and stuffed the voter list with fake names. It also accused President Ahmed of being biased in favor of Mrs. Zia’s alliance. Mrs. Zia’s party, in turn, insisted that the elections could not be postponed, because the Constitution stipulated that they be held within 90 days of an interim government taking over.

Before the emergency order on Thursday, some of Mr. Ahmed’s critics pressed him to be flexible and, for the sake of neutrality, to refer the matter to the Supreme Court. “The Constitution is not the Koran in that it can’t be changed,” Syed Manzur

DOJ_NMG_0115904

Elahi, a prominent businessman and a member of two previous caretaker governments, said by telephone Thursday afternoon from Dhaka, the capital.

He said he feared for his country's standing in the world. "As it is, we have an image problem," he added. "This will multiply the problem."

The most dire warning came from the United Nations, which said Wednesday that any moves toward military rule could cost Bangladesh its handsome earnings from participation in United Nations peacekeeping operations. Bangladesh regularly contributes hefty numbers of troops.

The statement read: "Should the 22 January parliamentary elections proceed without participation of all major political parties, deployment of the armed forces in support of the election process raises questions. This may have implications for Bangladesh's future role in U.N. peacekeeping operations."

Venezuela May Nationalize Oil Belt Projects (AP)

AP, January 12, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela (AP) -- Venezuela could nationalize four projects in the oil-rich Orinoco River basin if the state is unable to negotiate a majority stake with the foreign oil companies that run them, the finance minister said yesterday.

The state could nationalize the four projects in the Orinoco oil belt "if the negotiations with the foreign oil companies that control them fail," Finance Minister Rodrigo Cabezas said in an interview on state television.

His remarks clarified that the government is still seeking to obtain majority control through talks with the companies after President Hugo Chavez announced plans this week to take control of "strategic sectors" in telecommunications, power, oil and natural gas.

Separately, Mr. Cabezas told the Venezuelan newspaper El Universal that as the state nationalizes C.A. Nacional Telefonos de Venezuela, or CANTV, "shareholders will receive the fair price of their value of their shares."

Asked whether the call for nationalization includes top power company La Electricidad de Caracas, owned by the Arlington, Va., company AES Corp., Mr. Cabezas said, "It includes the entire electricity sector."

Venezuela's government has been in talks since last year with foreign oil companies that operate heavy crude upgrading projects in the eastern Orinoco area, seeking a government-controlling stake through the formation of new "mixed companies." Such joint ventures have already been formed in other parts of the South American country, and most companies have shown a willingness to continue investing under new terms.

The six firms that currently control the Orinoco projects include British Petroleum PLC, Exxon Mobil Corp., Chevron Corp., ConocoPhillips Co., Total SA and Statoil ASA.

Mr. Chavez is seeking special powers from the National Assembly to allow him to enact "revolutionary laws" by decree, and Mr. Cabezas told state TV they would likely include reworking the country's banking laws and reforms for insurance companies.

"Next week we will decide for sure what laws fall under the president's special powers," he said.

Venezuela has strict controls in place that limit currency trading, and Mr. Cabezas noted that the price of the dollar in the black market has risen to historic levels but said there are no plans to devalue the Venezuelan currency, the bolivar.

He said in Mr. Chavez's new six-year term, the government will seek to raise taxes on companies with hefty profits but will allow private companies to continue to operate freely.

China's Rights Record Criticized (WP)

By Maureen Fan

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

BEIJING, Jan. 11 -- Human rights conditions in China deteriorated significantly in 2006, with about 100 activists, lawyers, writers and academics subjected to police custody, house arrest, incommunicado confinement, pressure in their jobs and surveillance by plainclothes security forces, a new report by Human Rights Watch said.

Several widely publicized cases involving journalists and rights lawyers were cited in the report as evidence of a severe crackdown, prompted in large part by fears that individual cases of unrest might lead to regional instability. There were 39,000 cases of "public order disruptions," or large protests, in the first half of 2006, four times as many as 10 years ago, according to data from the Public Security Ministry.

DOJ_NMG_0115905

Authorities fired and jailed journalists, shut down more than 700 online forums and ordered eight Internet search engines to filter "subversive and sensitive content" based on 10,000 key words, according to the report, which was released Thursday by the New York-based watchdog group. Lawyers who represented peasants protesting mistreatment were badly beaten, detained and arrested. In March, new restrictions were announced requiring protesters' attorneys to report to local judges in cases involving 10 or more plaintiffs.

In an indication of official attention being paid to perceived agitators, China's top security chief last weekend toured Shandong province, where a blind legal activist was jailed after revealing abuses stemming from China's one-child-only policy. Luo Gan, a member of the Communist Party's Politburo Standing Committee, ordered judicial departments to deal with "discordant elements" at their source.

"Last year, the environment for rights defenders worsened," said Liu Shaobo, a leading intellectual and writer. "The government increased its crackdown on lawyers and also its controls on the Internet and the media. I saw more wronged cases last year than in previous years under President Hu Jintao's governance. And dissidents were under closer surveillance."

Contributing factors include China's growing economic power and Washington's diminished clout with regard to human rights, Kenneth Roth, executive director of Human Rights Watch, said in an introduction to the report. China's leaders remain at best indifferent to human rights abuses in China and elsewhere because they consider the issue an internal matter, Roth said.

Liu said there were some examples of increased openness last year. Newspapers in China's south were allowed to push the envelope more often than the mainstream state-run media. "Though government enforced controls most of the time, it really wanted to show its open-minded side, especially at the end of the year," said Liu, whose home is often monitored by police.

Analysts have noted that as preparations for the 2008 Olympics continue, officials appear eager to demonstrate that China is modernizing. The government recently announced that journalists can now travel freely without first obtaining permission from local officials, although they stressed that many local officials might not yet be aware of the new rules.

"On the one hand, they consider rights defenders a challenge to authority and a threat to stability, but on the other hand, they want to build up a good international image for the Olympics," Liu said.

In Nigeria, A Bill To Punish Gays Divides A Family (WSJ)

By Mark Schoofs

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

LAGOS, Nigeria -- Augustus Olakunle Macaulay founded the Bible university that trained his son in theology. He founded the evangelical ministry that ordained his son as a minister. And he is president of Nigeria's Association of Christian Theologians, which counts his son as a member.

But now Prof. Macaulay supports a proposed law that could criminalize his son's new Christian church and put him behind bars. That's because his son, the Rev. Rowland Jide Macaulay, has founded House of Rainbow, a church that caters to Nigeria's gay men and lesbians -- a first for Africa's most populous country.

The relationship between Prof. Macaulay and his son mirrors some of the conflicting forces buffeting homosexuals in Nigeria. Gay men and lesbians are becoming more visible, even as their society, which is hostile to homosexuality, threatens to become still less tolerant of them.

In his New Year's Eve sermon, Rev. Jide, as he is called by his small but growing flock, declared himself a "happy, holy homosexual." He said, "We are all God's children, no matter what some people tell us." The more than 100 attendees, all male, clapped and sang out their approval.

After the service, the church sponsored a party. In keeping with a church function, no alcohol was served. But the event featured exuberant drag queens lip-synching disco hits. The party's highlight: a "Mr. Bloke" beauty contest with contenders strutting their stuff in traditional African garb, corporate wear and swimwear.

DOJ_NMG_0115906

House of Rainbow -- a member of a gay-affirming U.S. umbrella church organization -- would almost certainly run afoul of Nigeria's proposed law. Homosexual sex is already punishable by up to 14 years in prison -- or death by stoning in the Muslim north, though that Shariah sentence is rarely meted out.

The sweeping new bill would punish by up to five years in prison anyone who enters into a gay marriage, "performs, witnesses, aids or abets the ceremony of same-sex marriage" or is "involved in the registration of gay clubs, societies and organizations, sustenance, procession or meetings." The U.S. State Department has denounced the bill, proposed in January last year, as a violation of basic freedoms.

But the bill is widely expected to pass. It is supported by most mainstream Christian and Muslim clergy in Nigeria, including Peter Akinola, the Anglican archbishop who is leading an international revolt of conservative Episcopalians angry about the ordination of gay priests and the consecration of gay unions.

Archbishop Akinola, who also opposes the ordination of women priests, has become the spiritual leader of more than 20 American conservative churches that have broken away from the world-wide Anglican Communion.

Anglican Christianity was brought to Nigeria in 1842 by a particularly conservative group of British missionaries, and "there has been a hardening of attitudes as the West has liberalized," says Philip Jenkins, professor of history and religious studies at Pennsylvania State University and author of "The New Faces of Christianity: Believing the Bible in the Global South."

Prof. Jenkins notes that many African societies still derive their norms from agrarian life and that animal sacrifice and polygamy are common in many parts of Africa. "The Bible carries a lot more weight among ordinary Africans, partly because people can identify with the society it describes," he says. "They recognize it as their world." This leads Africans to a more literal interpretation of Scripture, he believes. The rise of fundamentalist Islam also puts pressure on African Christians to draw a hard line against homosexuals, he says.

Advance of Rights

But urban Nigerians are increasingly aware of the advance of gay rights not only in the U.S. but also in South Africa, which enshrines equal rights for homosexuals in its constitution and recently legalized marriage for same-sex couples. The fact that Nigeria's legislature is considering the new bill testifies to the growing visibility of gay men and lesbians in Nigeria.

As for the Macaulays, the father and son are both polite, well-educated and well-traveled. The elder Macaulay is 69 but looks so young that he and his 41-year-old son are sometimes mistaken for brothers. And they were close even as the younger Macaulay was struggling in secret.

Born in London, Rev. Jide says he had his first homosexual experience in Nigeria, where he spent his teenage years. Ashamed of his attraction to men, he married a Nigerian woman in London in 1991 and had a son with her. About three years later, increasingly depressed, he told his wife the truth. They divorced and he was expelled from their church. He says he and his wife now speak only to discuss their son, with whom Rev. Jide remains close.

Rev. Jide says that for many years he wanted to tell his father, but, he says, "I couldn't find the courage." Then, during a visit Prof. Macaulay made to his son's London home in 2003, he noticed some books on homosexuality. He confronted his son, admonishing him that homosexuality was against God's will and urging him to change.

Rev. Jide remained silent, both men recall. "In truth, I felt for him, because I am a father too," the younger man says. "I have two generations on either side of me bearing the brunt of my being gay."

Indeed, last September after Rev. Jide discussed his sexuality on a BBC television show, his 14-year-old son sent him a cellphone text message that read in part "i HATE u" and "ur not my dad nemore." The two reconciled a few days later, but Rev. Jide believes his son's emotional turmoil is stoked in part by relatives telling him the Bible condemns homosexuality.

Many Nigerians say they would disown a gay child. But Prof. Macaulay, who comes from a family so prominent that a street in Lagos is named after one of his uncles, tries to take a love-the-sinner-hate-the-sin approach. In a letter to his son shortly after discovering his son's homosexuality, he wrote, "People in Nigeria here love you and rate you high in their lives." But in that same letter he warned that his son's homosexuality "is not only ABOMINABLE but a great DISGRACE to our family."

To the extent that his son's church affirms homosexuality, it is "of Satan," the father says.

So, despite protests from his wife, Prof. Macaulay supports the anti-gay legislation. He says he "won't feel very bad" if his son winds up in prison, which he even sees as a possible means of turning his son straight.

DOJ_NMG_0115907

Family Struggle

At House of Rainbow, Rev. Jide repeatedly encounters his own family struggle in members of his flock. "The biggest issue," he says, "is people have been wounded in their family by being rejected, by being totally unloved."

Another key issue, he says, is nurturing healthy relationships in "a society that is very, very brutal" toward gay people. Gay men tend to meet in the relative safety of the Internet, but relationships often founder because the men can't build a life together, says Adebisi Alimi, a member of House of Rainbow and one of Nigeria's very few openly gay activists.

Fearing gay bashers -- always a threat in Nigeria, where homosexuals can't count on police to protect them -- Rev. Jide arranged for the New Year's Eve service and party to be held on the far outskirts of Lagos. The event was held under the moon in an open-air courtyard with a dirt floor. Electricity, always sporadic in Lagos, kept cutting out as the backup generator sputtered. But as midnight approached, the congregation counted down the seconds with gusto, then hugged and danced before resuming the service to take communion.

When Rev Jide announced he would offer a blessing for gay singles, dozens rushed to him, some kneeling. "May you find a fine boyfriend," Rev. Jide prayed.

Revisiting Issue, U.N. Chief Clarifies Death-Penalty Stance (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 11 — Ban Ki-moon, the new secretary general, sought Thursday to change the impression he left in his first public utterance as United Nations head last week about his position on the death penalty.

“I recognize the growing trend in international law and in national practice towards a phasing out of the death penalty,” Mr. Ban said in a statement at a news conference on Thursday, his first since taking office Jan. 1. “I encourage that trend.”

Mr. Ban, the mild-spoken former foreign minister of South Korea, made unaccustomed waves last Tuesday when he declined to criticize the death penalty applied to Saddam Hussein.

His comment appeared to contradict the longtime United Nations stance against the death penalty and put him at unwanted odds with his predecessor, Kofi Annan, who frequently cited his opposition to capital punishment on human rights grounds.

After clarifying his position on Thursday, Mr. Ban told reporters, “Ladies and gentlemen, thank you for letting me get that off my chest.”

But in another instance of his early actions raising doubts, Mr. Ban was asked about reports that he had not conducted formal job interviews with some of his appointees to high-ranking management positions. He has said that tightening the United Nations’ much criticized management would be a priority of his administration.

He said that these were “unsubstantiated misperceptions,” and that he had relied on his own associations and conversations with the candidates and on discussions about their qualifications with others.

“I sincerely hope that instead of judging by what you heard from different sources that you will judge my appointments on the basis of merit and on the basis of their performance,” he said.

The three people mentioned were Asha-Rose Mtengeti-Migiro, the foreign minister of Tanzania, whom Mr. Ban chose as deputy secretary general; Alicia Bárcena Ibarra of Mexico, Mr. Annan’s chief of staff, who becomes under secretary general for management; and John Holmes, the British ambassador to France, who becomes under secretary for humanitarian affairs.

Mr. Ban said he would be demanding “performance targets” of senior officials, which would be reviewed at the end of the year to measure their achievement.

Asked if he would use a scheduled visit to the White House next week to ask President Bush to close the United States detention center at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, he said he agreed with his predecessor, Mr. Annan, that it should be shut down.

He added that he believed Mr. Bush himself shared that objective. Mr. Ban declined to give his reaction to President Bush’s announcement of new troop levels in Iraq.

“Broadly speaking, however,” he said, “the United Nations would welcome genuine efforts to improve security for ordinary Iraqis as well as to stabilize the country through a combination of security, political and economic means.”

DOJ_NMG_0115908

The United Nations presence in Iraq was sharply cut back in 2003 after the bombing of its headquarters in Baghdad, which killed 22 people, including the mission chief, Sergio Vieira de Mello.

Since then, the United Nations has provided assistance in drafting a constitution and organizing elections, two functions Mr. Ban referred to in answering a question about whether he planned to expand the current mission.

"We will continue to participate in that process as much as we can, but our participation and contribution at this time is largely dictated by the security situations on the ground," he said.

A Test On Burma (WP)

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

THE BUSH administration is pressing the U.N. Security Council to vote, possibly as early as today, to condemn one of the world's worst human rights violators: the military regime of Burma. The resolution doesn't call for sanctions or other punitive measures; it would simply make clear that the most august assembly of nations finds Burma's behavior unacceptable and will press for change. Nonetheless, China and Russia are threatening a veto. How it turns out should provide, at least, a moment of clarity in global affairs.

Burma's government is not only one of the world's most repressive; it's also a rare case of a dictatorship that can't even pretend to legitimacy. That's because in 1990 the generals permitted a reasonably free election. The overwhelming winner was Aung San Suu Kyi, daughter of Burma's independence hero, and her National League for Democracy. The junta refused to cede power; it has kept Aung San Suu Kyi, a Nobel Peace Prize winner, under house arrest for most of the years since the election while locking up many of her colleagues. The generals have waged terrible war against various nationalities in the hills of their lush Southeast Asian nation, displacing more than 1 million people; led the world in the use of rape and forced labor as military weapons; and draped a blanket of fear over their 50 million subjects.

The U.N. resolution stems from a 2005 report commissioned by retired archbishop Desmond Tutu of South Africa and former president Vaclav Havel of the Czech Republic that made the case that Burma's internal failures end up threatening neighboring states, by means of refugee flows, drug trafficking and the spread of HIV, among a number of factors. But Burma is also, as Undersecretary of State Nicholas R. Burns argues, "a classic case of a country about which the Security Council needs to speak out" -- especially since the newly created U.N. human rights committee has proven to be such a disappointment. "The onus is going to be on China or Russia, if they do veto," Mr. Burns said. "It will be very clear that they have no regard for what is really a deplorable situation within that country."

A U.N. resolution by itself won't bring change. But a resolution as part of a concerted international campaign might. Just this week, hoping to head off a vote, Burma released five political dissidents from prison (leaving about 1,100). From deep in her enforced isolation, Aung San Suu Kyi has gotten word out that she and other courageous democrats are aware of, and strengthened by, efforts to stand by them. Those efforts include first lady Laura Bush's drawing attention to her plight. A vote for human decency in her country shouldn't be a hard call.

DOJ_NMG_0115909

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, JANUARY 12, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Gonzales Talks Tough Against Terrorists (TSSC) 4
"It's Very Important To Us That We Make Sure We Recognize Any Potential Threat" (WLTX) 4
U.S. Preparing For Trials Of Top Qaeda Detainees (NYT) 5
80 Arrested Protesting Guantanamo Detentions (WP)..... 6
Unveiled Threats (WP)..... 6
U.S. Has Lost Credibility On Rights, Group Asserts (WP) 7
Man Captured, Returned To U.S. To Face Terror-Related Charges (WNBC)..... 8
Alleged Sri Lankan Rebel Extradited To America On Terrorism Charges (AP) 8
Blast At U.S. Embassy Called 'Terrorism' (AP) 8
Southeast Asians Consider Pact Against Terrorism (NYT)..... 9

Homeland Response:

Administration Offers Plan To Ease Rules On Asylum (NYT)..... 9
For A Fee, Fliers Won't Shed Shoes (USAT) 10
Shin Bet Questions Ex-American Suspected Of Aiding Islamic Jihad (HAARETZ) 11
Lawyer: Cleric Being Questioned; Arrest Will Be Appealed (ABJ)11
White Powder Found At Two South Florida Courthouses (MH).. 12
Poison Found On Envelopes At PBC Courthouse (PALMBEACHP)..... 12
Powder Scare Hits Courthouses In West Palm Beach, Fort Lauderdale (FLSUNSEN) 13
Powder Found At 2 S. Fla. Courthouses (BRAH)..... 14
E.U. Satisfied With Data Sharing (WP)..... 14
Pork, Peanut Butter And Security (NYT) 15
Jury Awards $2.5M In Punitive Damages In Katrina Suit Against State Farm (AP)..... 15

War News:

Bush Cheered At Fort Benning (AP)..... 16
Bush Gets Cool Response From Troops Set For Iraq (WT) 17
Bush Meets With Fort Benning Troops Army Soldiers Scheduled To Join Iraq Buildup (AJC)..... 18
Bush Pitches Iraq Plan To Ft. Benning Soldiers (LAT)..... 19
At Fort Benning, A Quiet Response To A Presidential Visit (WP)20
Bush Speaks And Base Is Subdued (NYT) 20
At A Post In Georgia, A Job To Do (USAT)..... 21
U.S. Unit Patrolling Baghdad Sees Flaws In Bush Strategy (WP)22
U.S. Expects New Reliability From Iraqi Forces (USAT)..... 24
Sales Job Kicks Off For Bush Iraq Plan (USAT) 25
Poll: Americans Oppose Iraq Troop Surge (AP)..... 26
In Pennsylvania, President's Plan Draws Mixed Responses And Hardens Opinions (NYT) 26
String Of Hopefuls For 2008 Choose Sides In Iraq Plan (WSJ).. 27
Wartime Linguistics (LAT)..... 28
Surge Towards Debacle In Iraq And MidEast (FT)..... 29
Why Bush's War Plan Can Work (CSM)..... 30
'Unity Of Effort' (WSJ) 31
Bush's Iraq Plan, Between The Lines (NYT) 33
Five Flaws In The President's Plan (WP) 33
Criticism Comforts Enemy (USAT) 33
Make Them Fight All Of Us (NYT)..... 34
Wisdom From Down The Chain Of Command (WP) 35
Thinking War-War Again (WP) 36
Tears Are Shed At The White House For A Marine's Bravery In Iraq (NYT) 37
A 2-Month White House Debate On Iraq, Capped By 'the Big Push' (NYT) 38
New Strategy Vindicates Ex-Army Chief Shinseki (NYT)..... 39
It May Be Too Late To Secure Baghdad's Mix (LAT) 40
Bush Stands Alone With 'new Way Forward' (FT) 42
Several In GOP Hit Bush 'Blunder' (WT) 42
Convincing Still Required For Bush Iraq Plan (LAT)..... 43
Bush Bets Congress Will Have To Back Plan (WSJ) 46
Analysis: Democrats' Delicate Strategy (AP)..... 47
Bush's Iraq Plan Meets Skepticism On Capitol Hill (WP) 48
Bush War Plan Draws Fire On Capitol Hill (AP) 49
Rice, Gates Face Hill Heat Over Iraq Plan (WT) 51
Senate Panel Scraps With Rice Over Iraq Strategy (USAT)..... 52
Lawmakers Grill Rice Over The Iraq War (AP)..... 53
Rice, A Uniter Of The Divided (WP) 54
Bush's Plan For Iraq Runs Into Opposition In Congress (NYT) .. 55
Devastating Criticism On Iraq By Both Parties (NYT) 57
Getting Iraq To Work (WSJ)..... 58
Rice Seeks Backing Abroad For Iraq Plan (WP) 60
The Women's Channel (TIME) 61
Fight And Talk (WP)..... 62
In Arab World, U.S. Approaches Falling Short (LAT) 62
Iran, Syria Denounce Bush's Iraq Plan (AP)..... 64
Iraqi Government Welcomes Bush Strategy (AP) 65
In Baghdad, Bush Policy Is Met With Resentment (NYT) 66

Bush Plan Receives Tepid Baghdad OK (WT/AP) 68
Bush's New Iraq Strategy 'Makes Sense': Blair (AFP) 68
Gates Urges Increase In Army, Marines (WP) 69
Gates Requests 92,000 Increase In Active Forces (WT) 70
Pentagon To Recall Army National Guard Units (LAT) 71
Military Eases Its Rules For Mobilizing Reserves (NYT) 72
Britain Signals Plans To Reduce, Not Increase, Troop Levels In Iraq (NYT) 73
Intelligence Chiefs Pessimistic In Assessing Worldwide Threats (WP) 74
Shiite Radicalism Could Fuel Wider Violence, Official Warns (NYT) 74
Intelligence Officials See Growing Sectarian Split In Iraq (WT) .. 75
US Names Retired Diplomat At Iraq Reconstruction Chief (AFP)76
U.S. Detains 6 Iranians In Irbil Raid (AP) 77
G.I.'s In Iraq Raid Iranians' Offices (NYT) 78
U.S. Raids In Northern Iraq Nab Several Iranians (MERCN) 80
Pentagon Intensifies Pressure On Iran (WSJ) 81
U.S. Troops Raid 2 Iranian Targets In Iraq, Detain 5 People (WP) 82
Squeezing Iran (WSJ) 83
Diyala Sweep Finds No Evidence Of Insurgent Force (LAT) 84
Hussein Cousin Says He Ordered Executions (NYT) 85
Insurgents Play Role In Bin Laden Escape (AP) 85
NATO Says Afghan Clash May Have Killed Scores Of Rebels (NYT) 86
Scores Of Insurgents Killed In Afghan Border Area (WP) 86
Attacks Heat Up Afghan-Pakistani Border (CSM) 87

DOJ:

Justice Dept. Hit With Hiring Freeze (AP) 88
Lam Is Asked To Step Down (SDUT) 89

Corporate Scandals:

U.S. Scrutinizes Grant To Jobs (WSJ) 91
Broadcom Chief Says Restatements Will Be Made Shortly (Update2) (BLOOM) 92
Siemens Ex-CFO Named In Bribery Probe (FT) 93
Ex-Merrill Brokers Probed By NYSE In Timing Case (WSJ) 93

Criminal Law:

As Libby Goes To Trial, Case Appears Weakened (WSJ) 94
Puerto Rico Seeks FBI Raid Documents (WP/AP) 95
Jury Charged In Calvin Williams Trial (WMC) 95
Federal Jury To Deliberate Williams' Fate Today (MCA) 96
Queens Mover, Mother-in-law Charged In Thefts Of Picasso Drawings (NSDY/AP) 97
Thieves Steal Two Picassos (NSDY) 97
Arrests Made In Case Of Picasso Robbery (NYS) 98
Picassos' Theft Contributes To Mystery Of Eccentric Collector's Art Trove (NYT) 98
3 Detained In Tenn. Couple's Killing (AP) 99
Porn Studios Raided To Ensure Adult-only Casts (LAT) 100
False Property Appraisals Get Man 30 Months In Prison (PPG)101
Man Gets 30 Months For Bogus Appraisals (PTR) 102
Pa. Man Sentenced To Prison For Fraudulent Property Appraisals (TLPA) 102
Jury Hears Kopp Saying He Killed Slepian (BUFFNEWS) 103
Mob Figure Sentenced To Five Years In Prison For Extortion (PROJO) 104
Ex-Cleveland Clinic Employee Pleads Guity To Stealing Patient Information (NAPLESDN) 105
Hospital Receptionist Pleads Guilty To Fraud Charges (MH) ... 105
Apartment Is A Real Steal (NYDN) 105
Former Ark. Trooper Sentenced On Child Porn Charges (AP) . 106
Man Pleads Guilty To Assaulting Girl He Met On MySpace.com (AP) 106
Ex-Prosecutor Is Accused Of Running Escort Service (LAW) .. 107

Civil Law:

Jackson Psychiatrist Pays $216,000 To Settle Fraud Case (BSH) 108

Civil Rights:

State To Appeal Chastang Ruling (MR) 108
Legislator Asks Probe Of Gunfire At House (BRADV) 109
D.C. Will Investigate Patient's Death (WP) 110
LAPD Chief Would Open Meetings To Public (LAT) 111
The Blue Fog (LAT) 111
Duke Accuser Contradicts Herself (NYT) 112
L.A. Man Sues To Take Wife's Last Name (USAT) 113
Civil Rights For A New Generation (USAT) 114

Antitrust:

Bristol Finds Alliances, And Perhaps A Suitor (NYT) 115
Thomson Must Defend Antitrust Suit Over Its Bar-Exam Courses (BLOOM) 116
EU Delays Universal-BMG Ruling (AP) 117
EC Delays Ruling On Publishing Deal (HOLLYREP) 117
At Heart Of Cisco's IPhone Trademark Lawsuit: A Desire For Open Standards (WSJ) 118
Letters (WSJ) 119

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

U.S. Attorney General Lauds Calderon's Anti-drug Moves (AP)121
Attorneys General Cite Shared Responsibility (HC) 121
Drug Battle: Gonzales Afraid Mexican Violence Will 'spill Into U.S.' (LAREDOMT) 122
Deputy Marshal Accused Of Leaking In Mob Case (AP) 123
U.S. Marshal Charged With Information Leak (CHIST) 123
Feds: Marshal Double-Crossed Protected Mobster (WMAQ) ... 124
Marshal Accused Of Leaking Info On Mob Witness (CBS2CHI)125
Feds: Marshal Aided Mob (CHIT) 126
Fatal Raid Linked To Lies For Warrant In Drug Case (NYT) 127
Illinois Doctor Sentenced For Illegal Prescribing Over Net (IDG)128
'Ecstasy' Dealer Sent To Prison (FLJOURNAL) 129
Cocaine Cowboys Corralled (CAPN9) 129
10 Charged In Narcotics Raids (ALBANYTU) 130
Operation Cocaine Cowboys: Massive Drug Pipeline Busted (WTEN) 131
Federal Fugitive Found In Morgan County Jail (AP) 132
Federal Fugitive Found In Jail Here (DECDAILY) 132

DOJ_NMG_0115911

More Drugs, Fewer Narcs (TIME)..... 133
Nation's Drug Czar Lauds Wayne County's Handling Of Fentanyl Cases (DEN)..... 133
U.S. Drug Czar Praises Detroit's Fentanyl Battle (FREEP)..... 133
Bonds Named In Test Reports (LAT) 134
Barry Bonds Comes To Teammate's Defense (AP)..... 135
Bonds: No Amphetamines From Teammate (USAT)..... 136
3,000 Tests For Amphetamines, But Only Bonds Is In The Spotlight (NYT) 137
Report Of Bonds' Failed Test Might Hinder Negotiations (AP).. 138
Ecuador, Colombia OK Deal On Fumigation (AP)..... 139

Immigration:

Grand Jury Indicts Cuban Exile Militant Luis Posada Carriles And Two Associates (MH) 140
Cuban Militant Indicted, Accused Of Lying About Entering U.S. (SAEN)..... 141
Suspected Bomber Of Cuban Airliner Indicted (LAT)..... 141
Immigration Charges For Cuban Militant (AP)..... 142
Cuban Terror Suspect Indicted By U.S. On Immigration Charges (BLOOM)..... 143
Anti-Castro Militant Indicted In US On Immigration Charges (AFP)..... 144
Alleged FBI Impersonator Indicted (CBS2CHI) 144

Tax:

Plea In Tax-Shelter Probe (WSJ)..... 144
Agents Say Fast Audits Hurt I.R.S. (NYT)..... 145
Judge Blocks IRS From Role In Case (BUFFNEWS) 146
FEDERAL DIARY: $5 More To Cure Rider's Block (WP) 147

Congress-Administration:

House Passes Bill For Stem Cell Research (AP)..... 148
Stem Cell Bill Sails Through The House (NYT)..... 149
Bill's Backers Predict End To Stem Cell Limits (USAT)..... 150
House Passes Bill Relaxing Limits On Stem Cell Research (WP)150
US Democratic-led House Challenges Bush On Stem-cell Research (AFP) 151
House Revisits Stem Cell Research (LAT)..... 152
House Expands Stem-cell Research (WT)..... 153
Concerns Of Dashed Hopes From Promised Miracles (NYT)... 154
Stem Cell Miracle? (WP)..... 155
Stem Cell Games (LAT)..... 156
Bush Threatens Veto Of Medicare Drug Bill, But A Senator Is Seeking A Middle Ground (NYT)..... 157
GOP: Bush Would Veto Medicare Reforms (AP)..... 158
Drug Bill Demonstrates Lobby's Pull (WP) 159
Price Negotiating's Hidden Costs (WT) 160
Negotiating Lower Drug Prices (NYT) 161
Democrats In Senate Fail To Block Bill On Ethics (NYT)..... 162
Senate Democrats Stall Pork-reform Vote (WT) 162
Democrats Stumble On Special Projects (AP) 163
Earmark Entertainment (WSJ)..... 164
GOP Flake Out (WSJ) 165
GOP Hits Pelosi's 'Hypocrisy' On Wage Bill (WT)..... 165
Bush-Democrat Alliance On Education Law Feared (WT)..... 166
Rising Costs Make Climb To Higher Education Steeper (USAT)166
OMB Risk Assessment Plan Called Flawed (AP)..... 168
White House, In Rare Move, Yields To Scientific Panel On Policy Plan (WSJ) 169
Risk-Assessment Plan Is Withdrawn (NYT) 170
Ailing Senator Is Moved From Intensive Care (NYT/AP)..... 170
Tomlinson May Be Going, But He's Staying (WP) 170
Inside The Ring (WT)..... 172
Coins Used To Spy On Pentagon Contractors (WT)..... 173
Mrs. Bush Praises Treasury Renovation (AP)..... 174
No Small Change At The Treasury (WP) 174

Other News:

Fed Official Outlines Threats To Economy (WSJ)..... 175
Jobless Claims Tumble In Latest Week (WSJ) 176
Rapid Plunge In Price Of Oil May Fuel Growth (WSJ) 176
Crude Oil Falls Further, Gratifying Consumers More Than Investors (NYT)..... 178
Dow Sets Another Record High As Oil Prices, Jobless Claims Decline (WP/AP)..... 179
Dow Hits High As Oil Drop Loosens Up Investors (WSJ) 180
Falling Oil Prices, Jobs Report Spark Stocks (USAT)..... 181
Suit Against Vatican Can Proceed (LCJ)..... 181
Dodd Declares '08 Presidential Candidacy (AP) 182
Dodd Touts Presidential Bid On 'Imus' (CP)..... 183
Dodd Says He'll Run For White House (USAT)..... 185
Senator Dodd Of Connecticut Announces Bid For Presidency (NYT) 185
Dodd Carries Northeast Liberal Tag Into 2008 Race (NSDY/AP)186
Democratic Party Selects Denver For '08 Presidential Convention (WSJ/AP)..... 187
As States Innovate, Schwarzenegger Blurs Lines (NYT)..... 188
California Emissions Target Hands Task To Industry (WSJ) 189
Golden State Gamble (NYT)..... 190
Ex-President Bush May Put Hip To Test In '09 (HC)..... 191
The Reliable Source (WP) 191
Forum-Shopper Of The Year (WSJ)..... 192
U.S. Troops Went Into Somalia After Raid (WP)..... 193
Raid Killed Somali Allies Of Al Qaeda, U.S. Says (NYT/AP)..... 194
Ethiopian, U.S. Pursue Somalia Al-Qaida (AP) 195
Somalia Targets Survived, U.S. Says (LAT)..... 196
Somalia Strike 'missed Al-Qaeda Targets' (FT) 197
Al Qaeda Threat Seen Looming If Government Fails (WT) 198
Can African Peacekeepers Tame Somalia? (CSM) 199
Iran Nuke Work Seems Slow, Puzzling West (AP)..... 200
Dangerous Territory With Aid, U.S. Widens Role In Palestinian Crisis (WSJ) 201
Succession Issue Stirs Dissent In Egypt (WSJ) 203
Carter Center Board Members Resign Over Palestine Book (WSJ) 204
Carter Center Advisers Quit To Protest Book (NYT)..... 206
Bangladesh President Steps Down (AP)..... 206
Bangladesh Postpones Elections (FT) 207
In Bangladesh, State Of Emergency And Election Delay (NYT)208
Venezuela May Nationalize Oil Belt Projects (AP) 209

DOJ_NMG_0115912

China's Rights Record Criticized (WP) 209
In Nigeria, A Bill To Punish Gays Divides A Family (WSJ)..... 210
Revisiting Issue, U.N. Chief Clarifies Death-Penalty Stance (NYT) 212
A Test On Burma (WP)..... 212

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales Talks Tough Against Terrorists (TSSC)

By Rick Brundrett

The State (SC), January 12, 2007

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales gave a pep talk in Columbia on Thursday afternoon to U.S. attorneys from around the country attending a conference on combating terrorism.

"For us in the law enforcement community, every day must be September 12th," the nation's top prosecutor said, referring to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Gonzales spoke to about 100 mainly U.S. attorneys at the National Advocacy Center — a training facility for state and federal prosecutors — on USC's campus. Reggie Lloyd, the U.S. attorney for South Carolina, attended.

Gonzales noted he spent earlier Thursday in Mexico City and met with senior Mexican officials to discuss organized crime and other issues.

Gonzales told the U.S. attorneys that the "single most important part" of their jobs is preventing terrorist attacks in the U.S.

"Our success or failure in this one endeavor will define in the eyes of some President Bush and his legacy," he said. "It will be the legacy of every one of us who is serving in the administration."

Although the country responded to the 9/11 attacks by invading Afghanistan, reorganizing government and passing new laws to combat terrorism, more needs to be done because terrorists "change tactics in response to what we do," he said.

He praised U.S. attorneys for combating "crimes that can fuel terrorism," such as identification and immigration fraud. He noted that seven of the 9/11 hijackers had fraudulent Virginia identification cards.

Gonzales also said the federal government is "not engaged in a struggle against a faith or religion" and urged U.S. attorneys to improve communication with Muslim leaders in their districts.

"We very much need the partnership of the Muslim community," he said. "Discouraging radicalism is vital, and that cannot be done effectively without Muslim community leadership."

Reach Brundrett at (803) 771-8484.

"It's Very Important To Us That We Make Sure We Recognize Any Potential Threat" (WLTX)

WLTX-TV, CBS 19, Columbia, SC, January 12, 2007

US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was in Columbia Thursday night to talk about preventing terrorist attacks - Ashley Yarchin reports

(Columbia) - After a lengthy standing ovation from a crowd of US attorneys, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales quieted the crowd, "Okay, I think you guys just want to play on my softball team. That's what all that's about."

He began on a lighter note, "Everything you do for the American people, I am really, really proud of you."

But Gonzales' pep talk quickly got serious, "I must speak bluntly and urgently about the single most important part of our jobs, which is preventing terrorist attacks on American soil."

He asked the men and women who filled a room at USC's National Advocacy Center to help stop terrorists from living, traveling and working freely in our communities.

"And very often, the cells that are broken up are not in New York, they're not in LA," said South Carolina U.S. Attorney Reggie Lloyd. "You look at the case in Portland or the case in Buffalo. You have these individuals that are sleeping in communities all across the country."

He said that's what puts our state on the map when it comes to protection and prevention. "It's very important to us that we make sure we recognize any potential threat even if it's not a direct threat here in South Carolina," said Lloyd.

Lloyd said the lecture inspired him to get back to work and back in our neighborhoods to ensure statewide and nationwide safety. "You know, you're always on pins and needles until he leaves," Lloyd said of Gonzales' visit, "but it's good to hear from him."

DOJ_NMG_0115913

U.S. Preparing For Trials Of Top Qaeda Detainees (NYT)

By David Johnston And Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 — The Bush administration has set up a secret war room in a Virginia suburb where it is assembling evidence to prosecute high-ranking detainees from Al Qaeda including the man accused of being the mastermind of the September 2001 attacks, Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, government officials said this week.

The effort to sift the classified files of the Pentagon, F.B.I., C.I.A. and other intelligence agencies amounts to the first concrete steps that the government has taken to press ahead with war crimes trials of high-level terror suspects under a plan announced by President Bush in a speech last September.

At the time, Mr. Bush said that Mr. Mohammed and 13 other high-level terror suspects had been transferred from secret prisons around the world to the military detention center at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, where they would be held pending trial.

The preparation of cases against the high-value operatives appears to rebut many who doubted that Qaeda suspects like Mr. Mohammed would ever be brought to trial. Critics in Congress and human rights groups had asserted that such trials would not be feasible because they would expose harsh interrogation techniques used by the Central Intelligence Agency.

The officials who discussed the preparations have been briefed on the effort in detail and represented several agencies. They declined to speak on the record about deliberations in advance of criminal prosecutions involving national security.

The prosecution team for the Qaeda defendants will be a mix of military and civilian prosecutors. Some officials said no decision had been made about who would lead each prosecution, but others said the trial of Mr. Mohammed would probably be undertaken principally by Justice Department lawyers, who would run the prosecution in a military courtroom in Guantánamo.

Mr. Mohammed, whose alleged role in the Sept. 11 attacks would make him the centerpiece of the government's effort to bring terrorists to justice in a court of law, could be held responsible for about 3,000 deaths in the attacks, officials have said.

The prosecution of high-value detainees is separate from the long planned trials of lower-level Qaeda figures, some of whom have been at Guantánamo since 2002 and who are expected to be tried before the more important terrorist suspects.

However, both high- and low-level suspects will be tried under the same rules, which are contained in legislation approved in October.

Officials said that they were hoping to bring the first charges against leaders of Al Qaeda this summer or fall and that trials could get under way in early 2008. The current plans are to use the new trial procedures first against some of the lesser Guantánamo defendants as kind of a test run beginning this summer.

Those trials would involve some of the detainees who had already been charged under the previous system of military commissions that was struck down by the Supreme Court.

The initial trials of detainees held at Guantánamo will not carry the possibility of a death penalty. But officials said that they expected to seek to have some of the senior Qaeda officials executed if convicted.

A team of lawyers from the Justice and Defense Departments, along with civilian and military investigators, has begun poring over intelligence files and interrogation reports, about Mr. Mohammed's role in the Sept. 11 attacks and other potentially prosecutable crimes, like the killing of a reporter for The Wall Street Journal, Daniel Pearl, and other terror plots, including an aborted plan in 2003 to use smuggled explosives to blow up gas stations, railroad tracks and a bridge in New York.

According to the final report of the independent commission that investigated the 2001 attacks, Mr. Mohammed acknowledged under interrogation that he was a major planner of the 9/11 plot. The report said that Mr. Mohammed first proposed the airliner attacks to Osama bin Laden and supervised the core group responsible for the hijackings.

Other prosecutions, like the cases related to the attack in 2000 on the Navy destroyer Cole in Yemen which killed 17 sailors, are likely to be led by military lawyers.

The Qaeda detainees at Guantánamo who the authorities have said were involved in planning the Cole attack include Abd al-Rahim al Nashiri, the accused mastermind, and Walid bin Attash, known as Khallad, who worked with Mr. Nashiri.

In preparation for the trials, the Justice Department has been quietly recruiting lawyers from the ranks of experienced terrorism prosecutors, mainly in New York and Virginia.

The new war crimes trials will operate according to rules modeled after the military justice system which were approved in legislation known at the Military Commission Act, which was signed into law last fall. The law has been criticized by some Democrats in Congress and human rights groups who say the procedures are flawed because they tilt in the government's favor.

Prosecutors could use hearsay evidence or second-hand testimony, but could not use information obtained under torture. Even so, that would mean virtually any information obtained by the C.I.A would appear to be admissible because, under Justice Department legal opinions, none of the harsh techniques amounted to torture.

DOJ_NMG_0115914

At their trials, the accused would have the right not to testify and would have the opportunity to present evidence and cross-examine witnesses against them. The trials would be open unless a military judge determined that they should be closed to protect classified information. Defendants would have the right to review the evidence to be used against them.

The C.I.A. indicated in court filings last November how it hopes to deal with efforts by defendants to bring up the issue of their interrogations. In a case involving one of the 14 high-level Qaeda detainees, the intelligence agency asked a federal judge to rule that the prisoner could not describe details of his confinement because of national security concerns. No ruling has yet been issued.

The case involves Majid Khan, a Pakistani who authorities have said was selected by Mr. Mohammed in 2002 to take part in a possible attack in the United States.

When civil liberties lawyers filed a petition on Mr. Khan's behalf in federal court in Washington, the C.I.A. submitted an affidavit saying that if specific interrogation techniques were disclosed, "It would permit terrorist organizations to adapt their training to counter the tactics that C.I.A. can employ in interrogations."

80 Arrested Protesting Guantanamo Detentions (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

More than 80 protesters were arrested inside the federal courthouse in Washington yesterday after a demonstration that called for closing the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The demonstrators were commemorating the fifth anniversary of the opening of the Guantanamo detention facility. They targeted the courthouse where lawyers have challenged the legality of indefinitely imprisoning hundreds of suspected enemy fighters and terrorists at Guantanamo.

Those arrested were part of a group of nearly 300 demonstrators -- a loose coalition of antiwar, civil liberty and religious organizations. The group had a permit to protest outside the courthouse at Third Street and Constitution Avenue NW.

But dozens of protesters filed through a side entrance and began to gather in the building's central atrium, chanting, "Stop torture" and wearing shirts reading "Shut Down Guantanamo." Others wearing orange jumpsuits -- similar to those worn by detainees at the prison that now houses 400 Muslim men from foreign countries -- were barred from entering the courthouse as a security risk, and marshals locked the court's front doors about noon.

U.S. District Chief Judge Thomas F. Hogan tried to reach an accommodation with the protesters inside, ordering that they be allowed to remain if they removed or covered their shirts and put away their signs so as not to disrupt trials underway. Court security officials said it was the first time in recent history that a protest had been allowed inside the federal court.

But, after a brief discussion with U.S. Marshal George Walsh, the group refused, and a team of deputy marshals arrested the praying, kneeling protesters one by one, putting them in flexible plastic handcuffs and taking them to a booking and holding cell in the court basement.

Many of the people prayed and repeatedly sang, "Peace, Salam, Shalom" as they were waiting to be cuffed and led away. They were charged with disorderly conduct on a federal property, a misdemeanor. All were expected to be released last night.

"If you accuse someone of a crime, you have evidence, you have a trial!" Maria Allwine, of the Baltimore group Iraq Pledge of Resistance, shouted as a marshal led her away. "Where is the evidence?"

Earlier in the day, Amnesty International, the Center for Constitutional Rights and defense attorneys for some detainees held a news conference and rally at the U.S. Supreme Court urging supporters worldwide to pressure the U.S. government to close the detention facility.

It was opened Jan. 11, 2002, to house alleged terrorists and Taliban fighters rounded up in Afghanistan and Pakistan during the U.S. war in Afghanistan. The prison has been plagued by allegations of detainee abuse, and the military has been embarrassed by revelations that FBI agents warned their bosses that they considered detainee treatment there cruel and inhumane.

Last week, FBI documents released as part of a lawsuit by the American Civil Liberties Union included new allegations of questionable treatment of Muslim prisoners at Guantanamo Bay. One interrogator allegedly infuriated a prisoner by squatting over a Koran, and two agents reported witnessing military personnel using vicious dogs to intimidate prisoners, the documents show.

Unveiled Threats (WP)

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

MOST AMERICANS understand that legal representation for the accused is one of the core principles of the American way. Not, it seems, Cully Stimson, deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs. In a repellent interview yesterday with Federal News Radio, Mr. Stimson brought up, unprompted, the number of major U.S. law firms that have helped represent detainees at Guantanamo Bay.

DOJ_NMG_0115915

"Actually you know I think the news story that you're really going to start seeing in the next couple of weeks is this: As a result of a FOIA [Freedom of Information Act] request through a major news organization, somebody asked, 'Who are the lawyers around this country representing detainees down there,' and you know what, it's shocking," he said.

Mr. Stimson proceeded to reel off the names of these firms, adding, "I think, quite honestly, when corporate CEOs see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line back in 2001, those CEOs are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms, and I think that is going to have major play in the next few weeks. And we want to watch that play out."

Asked who was paying the firms, Mr. Stimson hinted of dark doings. "It's not clear, is it?" he said. "Some will maintain that they are doing it out of the goodness of their heart, that they're doing it pro bono, and I suspect they are; others are receiving monies from who knows where, and I'd be curious to have them explain that."

It might be only laughable that Mr. Stimson, during the interview, called Guantanamo "certainly, probably, the most transparent and open location in the world."

But it's offensive -- shocking, to use his word -- that Mr. Stimson, a lawyer, would argue that law firms are doing anything other than upholding the highest ethical traditions of the bar by taking on the most unpopular of defendants. It's shocking that he would seemingly encourage the firms' corporate clients to pressure them to drop this work. And it's shocking -- though perhaps not surprising -- that this is the person the administration has chosen to oversee detainee policy at Guantanamo.

U.S. Has Lost Credibility On Rights, Group Asserts (WP)

By Nora Boustany

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

The advocacy group Human Rights Watch said yesterday that Washington's once-powerful role as a prime defender of human rights had effectively ended because of arbitrary detentions and reports of torture since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and the group urged the European Union to step up as a leader of the cause.

Kenneth Roth, executive director of Human Rights Watch, released the group's World Report 2007, an assessment of last year's global human rights practices, by saying that the counterterrorism record of the United States over the past five years has tarnished its credibility as an influential moral voice.

He listed several practices he said were being used by the Bush administration in its fight against terrorism, including torture, arbitrary detentions, allowing CIA interrogators to use coercive techniques and the unsupervised handling of so-called enemy combatants held in other countries.

"This catastrophic path has left the United States effectively incapable of defending some of the most basic rights," Roth said in the report, released on the fifth anniversary of the arrival of the first detainees at the U.S. prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Roth said Sudan, where the people of the western Darfur region are subject to mass murder, rape and forcible displacement, finds it easier to resist an international protection force because of the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq.

"The trend is bleak, but not irreversible," Roth wrote in an introduction to the report, saying it was up to the new Democratic-led Congress to repudiate past abuses, press for policy change and seek accountability.

The report listed the governments of North Korea, Burma and Turkmenistan as "repressive" and as imposing "enormous cruelty" on their populations. Saudi Arabia, Syria and Vietnam remain closed dictatorships. Russia and Egypt are cracking down on nongovernmental organizations, while Peru and Venezuela are considering the same path. Iran and Ethiopia are silencing dissidents with impunity, the report said.

The report's introduction lamented the poor performance of the new U.N. Human Rights Council and called it hardly an improvement over its predecessor, the Commission on Human Rights. Though the council's central duty is to pressure highly abusive governments to change, it "has so far failed to criticize any government other than Israel," in "a mockery of the high principles of its founding."

With Washington's voice diminished, the E.U. should be the strongest and most potent defender of human rights, Roth said, but as the group seeks consensus among its enlarged membership, its impact on the world stage is much less than its potential.

"We are looking for a powerful actor. The Europeans say all the right things, but there is no sense of immersion, no sense of duty," Roth said in an interview Wednesday. "When you have 27 members, how do you decide on common policy?" He also criticized Europe's role in the rights council as being "too micro-tactical and one of a micromanager worried with changing words here and there rather than being effective."

DOJ_NMG_0115916

Roth also said the E.U.'s current system of a six-month rotating presidency hampers the group's effectiveness.

"Human rights work is about sustained follow-up. You come back and you come back until you get someone or a country to change its behavior," Roth said. "When you have this rotating blur of presidencies . . . it is a recipe for failure. The most reluctant member determines E.U. policy, so the whole is less than the sum of its parts."

Man Captured, Returned To U.S. To Face Terror-Related Charges (WNBC)

By Joseph Valiquette

WNBC-TV, January 12, 2007

NEW YORK -- A key associate of a foreign terrorist organization has been captured in Indonesia and returned to New York to face federal charges including conspiracy to provide material support and resources to the Tamil Tigers.

Thavarajah Pratheepan was arrested by Interpol and placed in FBI custody. At his arraignment Thursday afternoon in federal court in Brooklyn, he pleaded not guilty and was ordered held without bail. His next court appearance will be on Jan. 18.

Pratheepan was named along with nine others in court papers unsealed in August accusing the defendants of being closely connected with the leaders of the Tamil Tigers in Sri Lanka.

Founded in 1976, the Tamil Tigers, also called the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, seek to establish an independent Tamil state in northern Sri Lanka. The group is accused of using terrorism to achieve its goal.

The group's campaign includes 200 suicide bombings and political assassinations, including the May 1991 assassination of former Indian Prime Minister Rajiv Ghandi and the 1993 assassination of the president of Sri Lanka, Ranasinghe Premadasa.

Since April, more than 1,700 people have been killed in the escalating conflict. The U.S. State Department designated the group a Foreign Terrorist Organization in 1997.

The Joint Terrorism Task Force based in Newark, N.J., arrested four of the men on Long Island last August in a sting operation after three of them traveled from Canada to purchase Russian-made SA-18 surface-to-air missiles, missile launchers and AK-47s from an undercover agent.

Pratheepan is identified in the court papers as being the main liaison between the leadership of the Tamil Tigers and its supporters in North America, Europe and Asia, as well as being involved in procuring equipment for the group.

Alleged Sri Lankan Rebel Extradited To America On Terrorism Charges (AP)

AP, January 12, 2007

JAKARTA, Indonesia: Indonesian authorities on Wednesday handed an alleged Sri Lankan Tamil Tiger rebel to the United States where he has been sentenced to 15 years in prison in absentia for trying to smuggle weapons to his homeland, a police spokesman said.

Tharajah Piratheeban, 32, was escorted by FBI agents on a flight to the United States from Jakarta's Sukarno-Hatta Airport, Col. Bambang Kuncoko said.

Kuncoko said Piratheeban was convicted on terrorism charges by a New York district court for purchasing weapons in the United States and trying to export them to Sri Lanka.

Indonesian officials could not confirm reports he was also suspected of plotting an attack in New York.

He was detained Jan. 4 in Indonesia trying to board a flight to Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, Kuncoko said.

Today in Asia - Pacific

Bangladesh president steps down as government leader

Missing passenger jet's debris found in Indonesian sea

150 insurgents killed in Afghanistan, NATO says

In Colombo, spokesman Keheliya Rambukwella said "the Sri Lankan government is happy that the world is getting united in fighting terrorism" and had approved the transfer with Indonesian officials.

U.S. officials could not be immediately reached for comment Wednesday.

The Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, or LTTE, have fought the Sri Lankan government since 1983 for an independent homeland for the nation's ethnic Tamils. A cease-fire brokered by Norway in 2002 temporarily stopped the fighting, but renewed violence in the north and east has escalated since late 2005.

Blast At U.S. Embassy Called 'Terrorism' (AP)

By Nicholas Paphitis

AP, January 12, 2007

A rocket was fired at the U.S. embassy early Friday, striking the front of the building but causing no injuries. A senior police official said the blast was an act of terrorism.

Police cordoned off streets around the heavily guarded building after the explosion shortly before 6 a.m. The shell struck the third floor and smashed glass in nearby buildings.

Investigators found the device used to fire the rocket shell at a construction site near the embassy.

"This is an act of terrorism. We don't know where from," Attica Police Chief Asimakis Golfis said. "There was a shell that exploded in the toilets of the building ... It was fired from street level."

Embassy officials confirmed that an explosion had taken place and said that no one had been injured. U.S. ambassador Charles Reis said the damage was "not extensive."

"There can be no justification for such a senseless act of violence ... The embassy was occupied at the time (but) nobody was hurt, he said.

Authorities were searching apartment buildings near the U.S. Embassy and a nearby hospital for evidence.

"I heard a loud bang I didn't realize what was going on," said Giorgos Yiannoulis, who runs a kiosk near the embassy.

Traffic came to a standstill across parts of central Athens, as police and emergency services scrambled to the embassy building, which is a frequent destination for protest groups.

It was the first major attack against a U.S. target in more than a decade, following the arrest of members of Greece's far-left November 17 terrorist group. The group was blamed for killing 23 people — including U.S., British and Turkish officials — and dozens of bomb attacks.

In 2003, a special court gave multiple life sentences to November 17's leader, chief assassin and three other members. Lesser sentences were given to 10 others.

Southeast Asians Consider Pact Against Terrorism (NYT)

By Carlos H. Conde

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

CEBU, the Philippines, Jan. 11 — Ten Southeast Asian countries meeting here are hammering out a regional antiterrorism agreement, officials said Thursday, the day after a series of terrorist bombings in the southern Philippines underscored the need for such a measure.

“The terrorists merely accomplished the opposite of what they wanted,” said Victoriano Lecaros, a Philippine government spokesman. “The attacks only emphasized the need to address terrorism in Southeast Asia. There is now a renewed urgency to deal with terrorism.”

Leaders of the 10 members of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations, or Asean, will consider the measure, the Asean Convention on Counterterrorism, at their annual summit meeting here on Saturday. The agreement aims to improve information and intelligence sharing among the group’s members and encourage them to adopt domestic antiterrorism laws, officials said.

“Global terrorism has assumed new forms of virulence, and we will make sure that the community is more secure and resistant to the threat of terror,” said Alberto Romulo, the Philippine foreign minister.

Bombs ripped through three southern cities here on Wednesday night, killing eight people and wounding dozens, the police said. No group claimed responsibility, but two radical Islamist groups, Abu Sayyaf and Jemaah Islamiyah, are suspected, an official said, because they were behind similar bombings in the past.

Foreign ministers meeting here before the summit meeting discussed the convention on Wednesday night. Opponents of the antiterrorism agreement fear that it could be used to suppress human rights.

One result of the discussions was that Indonesia invited several countries, including the Philippines, Malaysia, Thailand and Australia, to meet in March to discuss terrorism.

The attacks Wednesday in the southern region of Mindanao, where there is an active Islamist separatist movement, followed claims by President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo in recent weeks that her government had made progress fighting terrorists.

“They were trying to send a message,” said Oscar Calderon, the chief of the national police, referring to the attackers. “They wanted to embarrass the government because of the meetings in Cebu.”

The Philippine police and military have been receiving help from the United States and Australia in fighting Abu Sayyaf, which has been giving refuge to Jemaah Islamiyah members. Jemaah Islamiyah is a Southeast Asian terrorism network that originated in Indonesia and was said to be behind the 2002 Bali bombings that killed more than 200 people.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Administration Offers Plan To Ease Rules On Asylum (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0115918

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 — After months of pressure from lawmakers, conservative groups and advocates for immigrants, the Bush administration announced plans on Thursday to seek legislation that would provide relief to thousands of refugees and asylum seekers who have been inadvertently denied refuge because of antiterrorism laws.

The laws, including the USA Patriot Act and the Real ID Act, deny entry to anyone who belongs to or has provided material support to armed rebel groups, even if that support was coerced and even if the armed groups fought alongside American troops or opposed authoritarian governments criticized by the Bush administration.

The new legislative proposal would allow the resettlement of combatants and members of those armed groups, including refugees fleeing the authoritarian government of Myanmar, formerly known as Burma; hundreds of refugees from Vietnam and Laos who fought alongside American troops in the Vietnam War; and dozens of Cubans who supported armed groups opposed to Fidel Castro in the 1960s.

The Bush administration would also exercise its authority to provide waivers to allow the resettlement of thousands of refugees from Myanmar, Vietnam, Tibet and Cuba who provided material support to rebel groups. It would also, for the first time, provide relief to the 5,600 people from those countries whose asylum claims have been placed on hold here or who have been admitted as refugees but prevented from becoming permanent residents here because of the antiterrorism laws.

The administration would also allow some individuals who were forced to provide support to groups deemed as terrorist to be resettled or granted asylum here. Many were barred because the statutes broadened the definition of terrorist groups to include any group of two or more people who take up arms against a state, even if the group supports the aims of American foreign policy and do not appear on the government's designated list of terrorist groups.

Refugee advocacy groups, including Human Rights First and Human Rights Watch, and conservative groups like Concerned Women for America and the National Association of Evangelicals, had pressed for such changes for months. And officials acknowledge that many refugees suffered from the "unintended consequences" of the antiterrorism laws, remaining stranded in bleak refugee camps or in American jails while immigration courts debated their fates.

But Paul Rosenzweig, acting assistant secretary for international affairs at the Department of Homeland Security, told reporters that the administration expected to present legislation to Congress by the end of the month and to exercise most of its waivers within a day or so. The waivers allowing for relief for Hmong and Montagnard refugees, who fought with American troops in Vietnam, are also being processed.

"There isn't anybody in this room who doesn't wish we could have moved more quickly than we have," Mr. Rosenzweig said.

Advocacy groups hailed the decision as an important step forward, but warned that it would still leave many people vulnerable.

Under the new plan, for instance, refugees and asylum seekers forced to cooperate with groups on the government's list of terrorist groups would be ineligible for resettlement or asylum here. That would affect Colombians forced to support their country's largest rebel group, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, among others.

The process would also leave out individuals who do not belong to the ethnic groups named in the waivers.

"I think they have made some real progress, and as a result more people will be protected," said Jennifer Daskal of Human Rights Watch. "But many people will continue to be barred and put at real risk. There's a need to go further."

For A Fee, Fliers Won't Shed Shoes (USAT)

By Thomas Frank, Usa Today

USA Today, January 12, 2007

Footwear scanner now used at Orlando airport

A new machine will allow some air travelers to avoid a post-9/11 hassle starting today — taking off shoes at a checkpoint.

Orlando International starts using the ShoeScanner this morning but only for people who pay an annual fee and pass a background check. Those fee-paying travelers will soon find the machines at Indianapolis, San Jose and Cincinnati airports and in Terminal 7 at New York's Kennedy International.

The ShoeScanner detects explosives in shoes when people stand on its platform for 20 to 25 seconds, allowing the machine to shoot radio waves at footwear to provide a molecular peek inside.

This is "going to make it less of a hassle for passengers," said Indianapolis airport security director Reggie Baumgardner.

Travelers in the USA have been largely required to remove their shoes at checkpoints since December 2001, when al-Qaeda recruit Richard Reid unsuccessfully tried to blow up a trans-Atlantic jetliner with explosives in his sneakers.

DOJ_NMG_0115919

ShoeScanners will be available only to people who join the Registered Traveler program, which allows faster security lines for passengers paying about $100 a year. The Transportation Security Administration approved ShoeScanners only for Registered Traveler and has no plans to expand it to regular checkpoints because of cost and time concerns.

The ShoeScanner's $200,000 per unit cost is being paid by Verified Identity Pass, a Manhattan company that several airports have hired to run Registered Traveler.

"This (machine) is what some airports have been waiting for," said Orlando security director Brigitte Goersch. Orlando runs a Registered Traveler program with 30,000 enrollees.

Tim Anderson, deputy operations director at Minneapolis-St. Paul International, said the ShoeScanner "is just a marginal improvement" that won't propel the airport to start Registered Traveler.

The machine is made by GE Security. Airport consultant Rich Roth said it's not infallible. Scanners may miss plastic knives or other non-explosives, he said, adding, "It would be far safer if we made everyone take their shoes off."

Shin Bet Questions Ex-American Suspected Of Aiding Islamic Jihad (HAARETZ)

By Yossi Melman

Haaretz, January 12, 2007

Israeli authorities who arrested the former imam of Ohio's largest mosque who was deported from the United States have questioned him about his connections to Islamic Jihad, his attorney said Wednesday.

Palestinian Fawaz Damra's American citizenship was revoked due to suspicions that he raised funds for Islamic Jihad 15 years ago. Damra has admitted to raising money for the Palestinian cause, said his attorney, Smadar Ben-Natan.

Damra was transferred to Israeli custody on a "secret flight" coordinated by the FBI and Israeli security services.

Ben-Natan met with Damra at the Kishon prison on Wednesday. She is representing him at his family's request.

Damra told Ben-Natan that he had raised funds for the Palestinian cause in 1991. He also told U.S. judicial authorities that his sermons had included harsh words against Israel and the Jews, whom he described as "pigs and monkeys."

Nonetheless, Damra said he changed his worldviews after 1993, attended university and began working at organizations that promote interreligious dialogue.

Damra said his citizenship was revoked despite his change in opinion. Several days ago, he boarded a special plane destined for Jordan at New Jersey's Newark Airport, along with six drug dealers. Following a short interrogation, Jordanian authorities transferred him to the Shin Bet and Israel Police via Allenby Bridge.

Damra, a 46-year-old Palestinian whose family lives in Nablus, served as the imam of the Cleveland mosque for several years.

He was arrested in the United States about a year ago on suspicion of raising funds for Islamic Jihad in 1991, but not enough evidence was found to prosecute him. To avoid an acquittal, the U.S. ruled to revoke Damra's citizenship in a legal proceeding, arguing that Damra had violated immigration laws by not handing over information on the organizations with which he was involved prior to receiving citizenship.

Damra's situation is unique, as he is a U.S. citizen who was arrested on U.S. territory. Most suspects transferred via secret flights have been arrested in countries such as Afghanistan, Pakistan and Egypt.

Lawyer: Cleric Being Questioned; Arrest Will Be Appealed (ABJ)

By Aron Heller

Akron Beacon Journal, January 12, 2007

JERUSALEM - Israeli authorities who arrested the former imam of Ohio's largest mosque after he was deported from the United States have questioned him about the militant Palestinian group Islamic Jihad, his attorney said Thursday.

Fawaz Damra, 46, was arrested and accused of having ties with Islamic Jihad 15 years ago, said Smadar Ben-Natan, Damra's Israeli lawyer. Islamic Jihad, responsible for numerous suicide bombings and other attacks on Israelis, is classified by Israel and the U.S. as a terrorist organization.

Ben-Natan met her client for the first time on Wednesday at the Kishon prison in northern Israel and said he was being treated well. She said she would appeal his arrest later Thursday.

Damra, 46, a Palestinian from the West Bank city of Nablus, was deported by U.S. authorities last week because he was convicted of concealing his ties to terrorist groups when he applied for American citizenship in 1994.

During his trial in 2004, jurors were shown evidence that Damra raised money for the organization, along with footage of a 1991 speech in which he called Jews "the sons of monkeys and pigs." He later apologized for making anti-Semitic statements.

Relatives expecting him to enter the West Bank on Friday reported he never showed up. Ben-Natan said he was apprehended by Israeli authorities at the Allenby crossing with Jordan and taken into custody.

DOJ_NMG_0115920

Israel's internal security service, the Shin Bet, confirmed Tuesday that Damra was arrested because of his ties to Islamic Jihad. It provided no other details.

On Wednesday, an Israeli judge extended Damra's detention by 15 days, Ben-Natan said.

Ben-Natan said the contact Damra is accused of having with Islamic Jihad took place in 1991 and that Damra was unaware the money was going to the militant organization.

Damra, whose wife and three daughters remain in the U.S., served as the imam, or religious leader, of the Islamic Center of Cleveland.

Despite a campaign by his family and supporters to keep him in the U.S., Damra was deported after spending a year in a Michigan jail. His relatives in the U.S. said they hadn't been notified he had been deported, and found out only when his lawyer arrived at the jail and found him gone.

White Powder Found At Two South Florida Courthouses (MH)

By Trenton Daniel And Jennifer Lebovich

The Miami Herald, January 12, 2007

Authorities found mysterious powders in two South Florida courthouses -- one in Broward, the other in Palm Beach -- Thursday but neither substance proved a threat.

Fort Lauderdale officials received a call at 4:29 p.m. of an unknown powder in the first-floor mailroom of the downtown courthouse, said Assistant Fire Chief Stephen McInerny. The letter the powder was found in was addressed to the clerk of the courts.

Hazardous material teams from Fort Lauderdale responded to the call at 201 SE Sixth St. The area near the mailroom was evacuated, said McInerny.

Tests of the substance showed that it didn't appear to be hazardous, McInerny said.

"It appears to be some sort of a sugar substitute," McInerny said. ``We know we're dealing with a non-harmful product."

Three mailroom employees were exposed to the "brown granular powder" but no one was injured, he said.

The false alarm coincided with the discovery of a silvery-white powdery substance found earlier in the day at the Palm Beach County Courthouse. Five people were decontaminated but there were no injuries.

"There's no threat found associated with the powder that was there," said Judy Orihuela, a spokeswoman for the FBI, which responded.

It was not immediately known if the two scares were related, but investigators planned to look into the matter.

"It's coincidental," said McInerny.

In Palm Beach County a mail worker discovered the substance around 11:30 a.m. as she was delivering mail to the chambers of two judges on the building's ninth floor, said Teri Barbera, a spokeswoman for the Palm Beach Sheriff's Office. She had just visited the first-floor law library.

On the envelope, investigators found tellurium, a rare chemical element that can take the form of a silvery-white powdery substance. Tellurium is listed as a chemical hazard on the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's website. Garlic breath and drowsiness are key symptoms of ingestion.

Fire-rescue units responded, and decontaminated five people who may have come in contact with the substance, said Barbera. The FBI also arrived, to assist with the investigation.

The mailroom, law library, and the judges' chambers were evacuated after the scare, but the courthouse resumed normal operations late in the afternoon.

Since FBI agents found no serious threat in the envelope -- a letter from an attorney to a judge requesting a motion hearing -- local agencies will take over the investigation to see who's responsible for planting the substance, said Barbera.

Poison Found On Envelopes At PBC Courthouse (PALMBEACHP)

By Susan Spencer-Wendel, Laura Green, Palm Beach Post Staff Writers

Palm Beach Post (FL), January 12, 2007

WEST PALM BEACH — A letter with a poisonous shiny powder stuck to the outside closed the Palm Beach County courthouse to entrants for hours Thursday afternoon and sent five court employees to an inflatable tent where a hazardous materials team stripped them naked and decontaminated them.

All five were given thorough health checks and reported no ill effects, a fire department spokesperson said.

More than two hours after the powderâ€™s discovery at about 11:30 a.m., fire officials identified the substance as tellurium, a poisonous alloying agent used for things like coloring glass or strengthening lead. If ingested, it can cause abdominal disruptions, and if inhaled, can cause drowsiness, headache, nausea and a garlic odor, according to the Centers for Disease Control.

DOJ_NMG_0115921

The substance was stuck to the outside of an envelope addressed to Circuit Judge John Hoy from a local law firm, said court operations manager Rick Hussey. Hussey saw the envelope and said the powder looked like it had been transferred there from somewhere else, possibly postal equipment.

Investigators donned hazardous material suits Thursday evening to pore through 200 pieces of mail, looking for the source. Two judicial assistants left the letter with powder stuck to it down in the mailroom, but carried other mail which had the substance on it up to nine floors above to the judgesâ€™ chambers, widely spreading exposure, officials said.

Capt. Frank DeMario, who oversees courthouse security, called it an "expensive training exercise" and blamed a failure to follow protocol established for suspicious mail since the anthrax attack of 2001.

On Thursday, ambulances and fire-trucks lined the south side of the courthouse for hours, and the road was closed to traffic.

The FBI and Homeland Security joined the investigation. People could not enter the building for most of the afternoon, but court cases continued as usual.

The scene was similar to one in Fort Lauderdale where at about 4:30 p.m. officials received a call of an unknown powder discovery in the first-floor mailroom of the downtown courthouse. Hazardous material teams responded and the area near the mailroom was evacuated, said Fort Lauderdaleâ€™s Assistant Fire Chief Stephen McInerny.

The letter the powder was found in was addressed to the clerk of the courts. But tests of the substance showed that it didnâ€™t appear to be hazardous, but "some sort of sugar substitute," McInerny said.

In West Palm Beach, Hussey, the courthouseâ€™s emergency coordinator, said all mail is opened in the mailroom, to contain any such events there. Employees have received training to stay in the mailroom and contact authorities. "Iâ€™m disappointed. It never should have turned into this," Hussey said.

Hussey was one of the five employees who had to be stripped and showered following his exposure. Rescue workers in space suits and plastic masks placed every piece of clothing and jewelry on him in sealed bags, then showered him off twice. The substance tested negative for radioactivity, he said.

A batch of mail in the same area of the mailroom was taken to a lab to be analyzed hoping to find some answer to where it came from, he said.

Staff researcher Melanie Mena and the Miami Herald contributed to this story.

Powder Scare Hits Courthouses In West Palm Beach, Fort Lauderdale (FLSUNSEN)

By Sofia Santana And Missy Diaz, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, January 12, 2007

Suspicious powder found in the mail at the Broward and Palm Beach county courthouses Thursday caused firefighters to isolate several employees who came into contact with the substances, but no one was injured or appeared sick.

Officials did not know whether the two cases were related and are trying to determine where the letters came from. In Palm Beach County, the substance was tellurium, a rare chemical element, a Fire Rescue spokesman said. Prelimiary indications are that the substance in Broward appears to be some sort of food additive, possibly a sugar substitute, a fire official said.

In West Palm Beach, firefighters decontaminated five people who touched two envelopes tainted with traces of tellurium, a silvery white substance. None had an adverse reaction, Fire Rescue spokesman Phil Kaplan said.

A byproduct of electrolytic copper refining, tellurium can cause garlic-like odor to breath and sweat in small exposure. Heavy exposure may result in headache, drowsiness, metallic taste, loss of appetite, nausea, tremors, convulsions and respiratory arrest.

Three mailroom employees in the Broward courthouse were exposed to a light brown powder, said Stephen McInerny, Fort Lauderdale Fire-Rescue assistant chief. The Sheriff's Office crime lab will try to determine exactly what the powder is.

"We escorted the three in the mailroom to the bathroom, where they washed their hands up real good," McInerny said.

The three workers were examined by firefighters but declined medical treatment, he said.

About 11:45 a.m., assistants for Palm Beach Circuit Court Judges John Hoy and Karen Miller went to the first-floor mailroom to pick up mail and noticed a crystallized, powdery substance on the outside of an envelope addressed to Hoy, said courthouse spokesman Rick Hussey. The assistants left the letter in the mailroom and returned to their ninth-floor office with a bag of mail only to find that the substance was stuck on other mail inside the bag, said Hussey, who reported the suspicious find to authorities.

Hussey, who was among those who were decontaminated, said he had to strip,, bathe in a milky substance and then get hosed down by firefighters. "This could have been a minor thing and it turned out a lot worse because the procedures weren't followed," Hussey said.

Firefighters in Fort Lauderdale received a call about brown powder in a letter addressed to the clerk of courts at the courthouse at 201 SE Sixth St. just after 4:30 p.m. A mailroom employee had opened the letter, exposing two other co-workers. All three were isolated for several hours. Some firefighters donned white chemical suits fitted with breathing masks and oxygen tanks and collected samples of the suspicious substance, carrying small bags out in a green plastic grocery basket.

The courthouse remained open much of the evening, but sheriff's deputies had to block the main entrance at times so firefighters could enter and exit easily.

The incident turned out to be a good exercise for firefighters and courthouse employees, who following proper procedure, McInerny said. "They didn't leave the room, and they followed the exact plan they had in place," he said of the mailroom staff.

FBI agents were called to both courthouses, but declined to launch an investigation in Palm Beach County. FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said agents were looking into the Broward case.

Powder Found At 2 S. Fla. Courthouses (BRAH)

The Bradenton Herald, January 12, 2007

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. - Powdery substances were tested by authorities Thursday after being discovered at two south Florida courthouses.

A white substance found on the outside of two letters at the Palm Beach County Courthouse tested positive for tellurium, which can be hazardous if enough is ingested. But there was not enough present to be considered dangerous, Palm Beach County Sheriff's spokeswoman Teri Barbera said.

Five unidentified courthouse employees had to strip off their clothes and shower in a decontamination tent set up outside, Barbera said. Authorities were going through additional mail to determine if there was more of the substance.

A brown, granular powder found in the mailroom of the Broward County Courthouse in Fort Lauderdale also was being tested, but it did not appear to be hazardous, Assistant Fire Chief Stephen McInerny told The Miami Herald.

Three employees in the mail room there were exposed to the unknown substance, the South Florida Sun-Sentinel reported.

It was not clear whether the incidents were related.

Tellurium can cause liver damage and affect a person's central nervous system, according to U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

In Palm Beach, the letters were carried by a mail clerk into the law library and two judges' chambers on the building's ninth floor. Barbera said those areas were sealed off and evacuated, but business went on elsewhere in the courthouse, including several trials.

E.U. Satisfied With Data Sharing (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

European Union officials said yesterday that the U.S. government had allayed their concerns about a homeland security program that creates and retains risk assessments on millions of air travelers to the United States.

But privacy advocates here and in Europe this week sent a letter to E.U. privacy commissioners charging that the Department of Homeland Security's Automated Targeting System "directly contravenes" a European-U.S. agreement on air-passenger data sharing.

The computerized screening program was designed to help U.S. Customs and Border Protection identify potential terrorists and prevent them from entering the United States. The system is used on about 90 million air passengers, cruise-ship passengers and some automobile drivers and passengers entering the country each year, Customs officials said. Those it flags are further scrutinized.

An E.U. spokesman in Washington, Telmo Baltazar, said Homeland Security officials assured the Europeans that the screening system observed privacy protections called for in the data-sharing agreement.

"A risk assessment is a normal law enforcement tool," Baltazar said yesterday. "The alternative to risk assessments is to consider everyone alike."

But in a letter to the chief privacy officials of 27 countries, the American Civil Liberties Union and London-based Privacy International said the Automated Targeting System violated the October data-sharing accord, U.S. law and European data-protection laws.

DOJ_NMG_0115923

The system's creation of terrorist risk assessments on all passengers, the storing of profiles for as long as 40 years, and the fact that passengers have no right to see, modify or correct the information violates the agreement, the groups said.

"The ATS is a clear threat to privacy and human rights," Simon Davies, the director of Privacy International and Barry Steinhardt, the ACLU's Technology and Liberty Project director, said in the letter.

Jarrod Agen, a Department of Homeland Security spokesman, said the program did not violate the requirement that European passenger data be stored for 3 1/2 years at the most. He said the U.S.-E.U. agreement stipulates that some information may be kept for less than 40 years.

The air-passenger profiling program has been operating for about 10 years, Customs officials said, but its existence was not widely known until November, when it was described in the Federal Register

Under the U.S.-E.U. agreement, up to 34 types of information can be collected, including names, credit card data and flight itineraries. Sharing and use of the information is restricted. The agreement is due to be renegotiated this summer.

Concerns also have been raised in Congress and by privacy advocates that information can be shared with a wide range of federal, state, and local government agencies for purposes other than border security and that the passenger assessments violated a congressional ban on developing such programs.

Pork, Peanut Butter And Security (NYT)

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

Making his umpteenth pitch to Congress to provide more security money for New York City, Mayor Michael Bloomberg stated the obvious when he said that money to defend against terrorism should be divvied up based on an assessment of risks, not “spread across the country like peanut butter.” After all, his testimony to the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee echoed one of the key recommendations of the 9/11 Commission. The mayor estimated that more than $3 billion had been distributed in this lunatic way to date.

Unfortunately, the committee’s incoming chairman, Senator Joseph Lieberman, is partial to peanut butter. Mr. Lieberman, who won re-election last November as an independent with help from Mr. Bloomberg, continues to believe that every state, regardless of the risks or threats it faces, should be getting antiterrorism money. In negotiations with the House, Mr. Lieberman is seeking a “compromise” formula that preserves guaranteed minimums for relatively low-risk places like his home state of Connecticut. The minimums he wants well exceed the financing favored by the House, and cannot be justified on the basis of national security.

Mr. Lieberman also wants to increase the overall amount of money budgeted for state and local antiterrorism efforts. He is right about that. High-risk jurisdictions like New York have been unfairly burdened by the steep decrease in spending recently. But without a formula adjustment that minimizes the pork barreling that now sends antiterrorism money needed in New York City to places like Nebraska, it would also increase the waste.

Mr. Lieberman fought the odds, held his seat and got this chairmanship. Now it’s up to him to use the power responsibly.

Jury Awards $2.5M In Punitive Damages In Katrina Suit Against State Farm (AP)

By Garry Mitchell, The Associated Press

AP, January 12, 2007

A Mississippi jury on Thursday awarded $2.5 million in punitive damages to a couple who sued State Farm Fire & Casualty Co. for denying their claim after Hurricane Katrina, a decision that could benefit hundreds of other homeowners challenging insurers for refusing to cover billion of dollars in storm damage.

A federal judge only hours earlier had taken part of the case out of jurors' hands before they awarded punitive damages to State Farm policyholders Norman and Genevieve Broussard.

U.S. District Judge L.T. Senter Jr. ruled Thursday morning that State Farm is liable for $223,292 in damage Hurricane Katrina caused to the Broussards' home. Senter left it to a jury to decide whether to award punitive damages.

Senter's decision to make a directed verdict rather than let the jury decide the entire case appeared to surprise everyone in the courtroom. After he explained his ruling, Senter ordered a recess to give attorneys time "to get over the shock."

Some of Senter's earlier rulings in other Katrina cases have favored the insurance industry, but his decision Thursday calls into question the companies' refusal to cover billions of dollars in damage from Katrina's storm surge.

The Broussards sued State Farm for refusing to pay for any damage to their home, which Katrina reduced to a slab. The couple, who wanted State Farm to pay for the full insured value of their home plus $5 million in punitive damages, claimed that a tornado during the hurricane destroyed their home. State Farm blamed all the damage on Katrina's storm surge.

DOJ_NMG_0115924

State Farm and other insurers say their homeowner policies cover damage from wind but not from water, and that the policies exclude damage that could have been caused by a combination of both, even if hurricane-force winds preceded a storm's rising water.

Senter, however, ruled that State Farm couldn't prove that Katrina's storm surge was responsible for all of the damage to the Broussards' home. The judge also said the testimony failed to establish how much damage was caused by wind and how much resulted from storm surge.

"We are surprised and disappointed by the court's ruling," said State Farm spokesman Phil Supple. "The expert testimony supported a different result. After the conclusion of this case, we will evaluate our next steps in this lawsuit."

In his closing argument Thursday, one of the Broussards' attorneys, William Walker, said State Farm had breached their contract "in a bad way" by denying their claim. State Farm "acted like a chiseler," he said, adding, "The pocketbook is what they listen to."

State Farm attorney John Banahan urged jurors to "use your head and your heart" in deciding on punitive damages and to reject an attempt by the Broussards' attorney to demonize the company as an "evil empire."

Robert Hartwig, chief economist for the Insurance Information Institute in New York, said before the jury announced its decision that a punitive damage award would be "distressing" for insurers.

"It adds even more cost and more uncertainty to the other problems that already exist in the Mississippi homeowners insurance market," he said.

The Broussards' case isn't directly involved in recent settlement talks between State Farm Fire & Casualty Co., Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood and policyholders' lawyers.

People with direct knowledge of the settlement talks told The Associated Press this week that State Farm, Mississippi's largest home insurer, is considering paying hundreds of millions of dollars to settle more than 600 lawsuits and resolve thousands of other disputed claims.

Richard "Dickie" Scruggs, an attorney who represents 639 State Farm policyholders in the settlement talks, said he doesn't know how the judge's ruling on Thursday will affect the negotiations.

Randy Maniloff, a Philadelphia-based lawyer who represents insurers and has closely followed the Katrina litigation, said Senter's ruling is a "huge verdict" for homeowners even if the jury didn't award punitive damages.

"That settlement is looking awfully good for State Farm now," he added.

Associated Press writer Michael Kunzelman contributed to this report.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Cheered At Fort Benning (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, January 12, 2007

President Bush, surrounded on Thursday by cheering soldiers in camouflage, defended his decision to send 21,500 more U.S. troops to Iraq and cautioned that the buildup will not produce quick results. "It's going to take awhile," he said.

With Americans overwhelmingly opposed to the increase, Bush said the U.S. commitment to the war was not open-ended — although he put no timetable on how long it would last. While more bloodshed can be expected, Bush said, Americans should give the Iraqi government time to prove its resolve to stop violence and unify the nation.

Fort Benning, south of Columbus, Ga., offered Bush a patriotic backdrop and a friendly audience in which to sell his retooled plan for Iraq, which drew heavy fire on Capitol Hill from Democrats and some Republicans. Some 4,000 members of Fort Benning's 3rd Brigade Combat Team are being sent to Iraq earlier than planned because of the president's decision.

"The new strategy is not going to yield immediate results. It's going to take awhile," Bush said. "The American people have got to understand that suicide bombings won't stop immediately."

The increase in soldiers is a hard sell. An Associated Press-Ipsos poll released Thursday said 70 percent of Americans oppose sending more troops. Bush's overall job approval slumped to 32 percent, a new low in AP-Ipsos polling. Sixty percent think it is unlikely that a stable, democratic Iraqi government will be established.

Outside the gates of the military base, dozens of demonstrators protested the war.

"Insanity is doing the same thing and expecting different results," said Jim Steen, an 81-year-old veteran who held a sign that read, "Surge for Peace."

DOJ_NMG_0115925

Some lawmakers have threatened to withhold financial support for an escalating the war. White House counselor Dan Bartlett said that the White House was closely monitoring sentiment in Congress, but he said those who reject the president's plan before it has a chance to work have the burden of proposing an alternative.

Bush said his new plan has a well-defined mission — something that military leaders have insisted upon if more troops were sent.

"The mission is to help Iraqis clear and secure neighborhoods, to help Iraqis protect the local population, and to ensure that the Iraqi forces that are left behind will be capable of providing the security necessary in the capital city of Iraq. That's the mission," he said.

Bush had lunch with about 300 military personnel and their relatives, saw a paratrooper training exercise and met with relatives of 25 soldiers who died in Iraq and Afghanistan.

He met Dave Tainsh, a retired Marine sergeant-major, and his wife, Deb, whose son, 33-year-old Army Sgt. Patrick Tainsh, was killed by a roadside bomb near the Baghdad Airport on Feb. 11, 2004. Deb Tainsh has at least 100 e-mails from parents of fallen soldiers or parents of soldiers who are about to depart for Iraq — all pledging support for Bush.

"Every one of these letters says, 'Mr. President, we support you,'" she said. "The consensus is that they ... want him to do everything he can to win this war and that our prayers are with him."

Before visiting Georgia, Bush awarded the Medal of Honor, posthumously, to Marine Cpl. Jason Dunham of Scio, N.Y. He was only the second recipient of the nation's highest military honor from the Iraq war.

"I've lost my son, but he became a part of history," Dunham's mother, Deb, said after the ceremony. "It still hurts as a parent, but the pride that you have from knowing he did the right thing makes it easier."

Bush Gets Cool Response From Troops Set For Iraq (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 12, 2007

FORT BENNING, Ga. -- President Bush sought a friendly audience and a patriotic backdrop yesterday to continue to make his case for sending 21,000 more troops to Iraq, but he received only tepid applause at this Army base, where the commanding general forbade soldiers from talking to reporters.

The president's speech was similar to the national address he delivered Wednesday night, but he used firm language when speaking about what is coming for insurgents in Iraq. He also hailed efforts by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki against militias responsible for continual waves of sectarian killings in Iraq.

"Yesterday, the resolve was seen when Prime Minister Maliki made it clear that illegal militias, including the Mahdi Army, have a choice to make: either lay down your arms or face justice," Mr. Bush said. "That's the kind of leadership that the Iraqi people expect, and that's the kind of leadership I expect, and the American people expect."

He added, "Our support is not open-ended. If the Iraqis demonstrate a willingness to fight for a better future, we'll help them. It's in our interests that we do so. Not only do we expect to see action militarily, as I mentioned, we expect to see them fulfill the benchmarks that they laid out for their people."

Mr. Bush visited Fort Benning because the base will send a combat brigade to Iraq earlier than planned, by March instead of late May or early June. The brigade has done two tours in Iraq, and on its last yearlong deployment, in 2005, 34 soldiers from the 4,000-member unit were killed.

In his speech, Mr. Bush also reiterated the warning he gave in his prime-time address: His planned troop surge would not be a quick fix.

"The new strategy is not going to yield immediate results. It's going to take awhile," he said. "The American people have got to understand that suicide bombings won't stop immediately."

Before meeting with families, Mr. Bush watched as five members of a parachute team floated to the ground in a demonstration of base training.

"We're proud of you," he told the men.

Earlier in the day, the president awarded the Medal of Honor to the late Marine Cpl. Jason Dunham of Scio, N.Y., who covered a hand grenade in Iraq two years ago, saving the lives of his comrades. He is the second Iraq war soldier to receive the prestigious award.

"I've lost my son, but he became a part of history," Cpl. Dunham's mother, Deb, said after the ceremony, which drew tears from Mr. Bush. "It still hurts as a parent, but the pride that you have from knowing he did the right thing makes it easier."

The 300 soldiers who, with their families, heard the afternoon speech were banned by Maj. Gen. Walter Wojdakowski, commandant of the 32,000-soldier base, from talking to reporters. Journalists were barred from re-entering Freedom Hall, where Mr. Bush delivered the speech, or from approaching soldiers outside the hall.

DOJ_NMG_0115926

While the president met with family members of 25 soldiers from the base who were killed in the Iraq and Afghanistan wars, several reporters waited for word from the base on whether the ban would be lifted. A senior administration official said, "We have no control over that."

Bush Meets With Fort Benning Troops Army Soldiers Scheduled To Join Iraq Buildup (AJC)

By Ron Martz, David A. Markiewicz

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 12, 2007

Columbus — A day after President George Bush outlined his new plan for Iraq, he came to Fort Benning, an Army training base, to sell it to the soldiers who will have to implement it.

"Everywhere soldiers from this base serve, you leave you mark and I hope it will be a legacy of peace and freedom," Bush told an audience of 210 soldiers and 90 civilian family members.

Bush spoke to the group following a lunch in a makeshift cafeteria in the reception area where troops leave for and return from Iraq. A contingent of about 4,000 soldiers from the 3rd Brigade of the 3rd Infantry Division who are based here are scheduled to go to Iraq later this year. Their departure, originally scheduled for late spring or early summer, is now expected to be moved up to late February or early March.

Bush's speech here was a virtual carbon copy of his national TV address Wednesday night, in which he laid out his plans for Iraq.

Bush's comments were met with relatively polite but restrained applause on several occasions, but the soldiers broke into a spontaneous ovation when he said he was in favor of increasing the overall size of the military.

Bush also reiterated his concern of what would happen in Iraq if support to the fledgling Iraqi government was withdrawn.

"I understand the consequences of failure [in Iraq] are unacceptable," Bush said. But he said that he has made it clear to Iraqi officials that they will have to meet certain benchmarks in their progress toward defending their own country.

"I have made it clear that the patience of the American people is not unlimited and now is the time to act," the president said.

Soldiers at the luncheon were prohibited from speaking to members of the media after Bush's speech by Maj. Gen. Walter Wojdakowski, commander of Ft. Benning and the infantry center here.

Following lunch, Bush attended a demonstration that included a jump by paratroopers and later was to meet with family members of soldiers who have died in Iraq. He was scheduled to depart around 4:45.

Protesters, supporters await Bush

As a town that is a gatepost for the Army Infantry prepared for a visit from President Bush, many residents appeared to back the president's plan to send 21,500 additional U.S. troops into the Iraq war, but dozens of protesters outside the base decried it.

The president is due to have lunch here Thursday at Fort Benning, meet with troops and watch an Infantry demonstration, all the while selling the plan for more troop deployments that he announced Wednesday night on national television announced.

Today, on Victory Drive just outside the Army base, about 50 protesters made their opinion clear. Many waved signs, beat drums and shouted at passing motorists who occasionally honked their support.

One protester, dressed as the devil, adorned with horns, a red cape billowing in the breeze and a rubber Bush mask, held a sign that said: "Bush: Lord of the Lies," a reference to the popular William Golding novel.

Gloria Tatum, 63, of Decatur, said she travelled to Columbus because Bush "lied us into war. He was wrong then and he's wrong now."

"We voted [in November] and the vote was that [the war in Iraq] was a mistake."

Her sign read: "Bush, Lord of the Lies."

Local organizers said there are about 200 similar protests planned across the country, all organized within the last few days.

Other examples of signs included "Pull every American - Cancel escalation" and "Iraq is Arabic for Vietnam."

Jim Allen, 71, of Lanett, Ala., a Navy veteran, said the most unusual thing about the protest was that he was seeing more and more people from Columbus, a military town, speaking out against the war.

But residents of Columbus said the town still backs Bush.

Larry Love, who owns Diamond Exchange, a jewelry and pawn shop on Victory Road, which leads to the fort's gate, summed up the sentiment of many.

"I think we should give him all the assistance he needs to let him clean the mess up over there. If we don't take care of terrorists now, we are going to be fighting in our own backyard," said Love.

DOJ_NMG_0115927

The thousand of soldiers who move through this western Georgia town while receiving basic or advance Infantry training tell Love they strongly support the war and the president's efforts.

"I hear from the troops that they are happy to go over there and fight because it is a great cause. And they say we are winning. The people over there are so glad we're there. They are changing their whole way of life. The troops are eager and really committed," Love said.

Protestors are scheduled to demonstrate outside the fort about noon.

Love wrote them off, sounding like the bored resident who sees thousands of protestors every November at the annual demonstration against the School of the Americas, which trains combat troops, mostly from Latin America.

"Most of the time, when the protestors come, someone is paying for their room and their meals. They are almost paid to do what they do," said Love.

Bush Pitches Iraq Plan To Ft. Benning Soldiers (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2007

FT. BENNING, GA. — President Bush argued the case for his new Iraq strategy Thursday at an Army post where a combat brigade will be hurried to Baghdad as part of the revised effort to establish peace in the war-torn capital.

The plan calls for the brigade, which includes soldiers who will be making a third tour in Iraq, to be deployed in March, a couple of months earlier than planned.

Bush reprised the key points from his nationally televised Wednesday night speech, acknowledging that the administration's policies have failed to quell sectarian violence raging in Iraq — especially in Baghdad. The president conceded the situation had "turned out differently than I had anticipated."

But to a greater degree than he did Wednesday, Bush focused on the potentially dire effects of diminishing the U.S. commitment in Iraq and beginning a withdrawal of American troops.

Such moves would cause Islamic extremists to "grow in strength," he warned. "They would be emboldened. It would make it easier" for them to recruit followers and threaten other governments throughout the Middle East.

With polls showing strong public opposition to his new plan and with sharp criticism of it coming even from some fellow Republicans, Bush also sought to spell out the possible consequences for Americans of a failure to stabilize Iraq.

"Imagine what would happen if [Islamic] extremists who hate America and our way of life gained control of energy reserves," he said. "You can bet they would use those reserves to blackmail economies in order to achieve their objective."

Under his redrawn blueprint for Iraq, 21,500 soldiers and Marines will be added in the coming months to the 132,000 U.S. troops now in the country.

Working in closer concert with Iraqi army and police forces — which the government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki has pledged to bolster — the American troops will launch more intense and sustained efforts to stem the violence in Baghdad and Al Anbar province.

Bush said that "what's new about this plan is that there will be enough troops to clear, build and hold" neighborhoods in those areas, "and that our troops will be able to move alongside the Iraqis without political interference. And that's very important."

The president and his aides have stressed that they expect — and have been promised — greater cooperation and commitment by Maliki's government to reining in Iraq's warring elements. Bush reiterated that point Thursday.

"The prime minister and I have had some plain talking," he said. "I have made it clear that the patience of the American people is not unlimited."

But Bush also asked for patience as the plan is put into effect, cautioning that it "is not going to yield immediate results…. The American people have got to understand that suicide bombings won't stop immediately."

Bush spoke to about 300 soldiers and family members at Ft. Benning. His audience was friendly, but his sober address received a less enthusiastic reception than has been the case on his past visits to military bases to promote his Iraq policy.

White House and Army officials prohibited reporters from interviewing soldiers before Bush spoke or immediately after his remarks.

For most of his five hours at the post, Bush was surrounded by troops in pale green camouflage uniforms — first at a lunch, then watching a demonstration of paratrooper training, then shaking the hands of hundreds of young soldiers before Air Force One departed.

With the exception of recruits undergoing basic training, nearly all the soldiers at Ft. Benning have served in Iraq.

One of the few times Bush's speech was interrupted by applause came when he repeated his goal of seeking overall increases in Army and Marine Corps personnel.

DOJ_NMG_0115928

He also told the soldiers he would try to get them "all the resources you need in this war on terror, and that means good equipment and training, good housing."

"I understand full well, if your family is happy, you're happy," he said, sparking laughter by adding, "The same thing in my house, by the way."

At Fort Benning, A Quiet Response To A Presidential Visit (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

FORT BENNING, Ga., Jan. 11 -- The pictures were just what the White House wanted: A teary-eyed President Bush presenting the Medal of Honor posthumously to a slain war hero in the East Room, then flying here to join the chow line with camouflage-clad soldiers as some of them prepare to return to Iraq.

There are few places the president could go for an unreservedly enthusiastic reception the day after unveiling his decision to order 21,500 more troops to Iraq. A military base has usually been a reliable backdrop for the White House, and so Bush aides chose this venerable Army installation in western Georgia to promote his revised strategy to the nation while his Cabinet secretaries tried to sell it on Capitol Hill.

To ensure that there would be no discordant notes here, Maj. Gen. Walter Wojdakowski, the base commander, prohibited the 300 soldiers who had lunch with the president from talking with reporters. If any of them harbored doubts about heading back to Iraq, many for the third time, they were kept silent.

"It's going to require sacrifice, and I appreciate the sacrifices our troops are willing to make," Bush told the troops. "Some units are going to have to deploy earlier than scheduled as a result of the decision I made. Some will remain deployed longer than originally anticipated."

Among those going early will be members of the 3rd Brigade Combat Team from the 3rd Infantry Division based here. Theirs was the division that spearheaded the invasion into Iraq in March 2003 and captured Baghdad. They returned in 2005 and lost 34 troops. Now, instead of heading back in May or June, they will return to Iraq in March.

Soldiers being soldiers, those who met the commander in chief Thursday saluted smartly and applauded politely. But it was hardly the boisterous, rock-star reception Bush typically gets at military bases. During his lunchtime speech, the soldiers were attentive but quiet. Not counting the introduction of dignitaries, Bush was interrupted by applause just three times in 30 minutes -- once when he talked about a previous Medal of Honor winner from Fort Benning, again when he pledged to win in Iraq and finally when he repeated his intention to expand the Army.

Bush's speech essentially repeated his address to the nation the night before, and he appeared a little listless as he talked. Aides said he was deliberately low-key to reflect the serious situation. Whether the audience was sobered by the new mission or responding to Bush's subdued tone was unclear, because reporters were ushered out as soon as his talk ended.

White House officials had promised reporters they could talk with soldiers. But that was not good enough for Wojdakowski. "The commanding general said he does not want media talking to soldiers today," spokeswoman Tracy Bailey said. "He wants the focus to be on the president's speech." Only hours later, after reporters complained, did the base offer to make selected soldiers available, but the White House plane was nearing departure.

For Bush, it was a day of military events and images. He began at the White House, presenting the Medal of Honor to the parents of a Marine slain in Iraq. Cpl. Jason Dunham, who died after falling on a grenade to save colleagues two years ago, became the second service member in Iraq to receive the nation's highest military decoration.

After flying here, Bush attended a U.S. Army Airborne School training demonstration as troops parachuted out of a helicopter. He also met privately with the families of 25 soldiers killed in Iraq or Afghanistan.

White House counselor Dan Bartlett said Bush was impressed by the "warm reception." "The perception is he's coming here to motivate the troops," Bartlett said, "but it has as much of an impact on him."

Bush Speaks And Base Is Subdued (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

FORT BENNING, Ga., Jan. 11 — President Bush came to this Georgia military base looking for a friendly audience to sell his new Iraq strategy. But his lunchtime talk received a restrained response from soldiers who clapped politely but showed little of the wild enthusiasm that they ordinarily shower on the commander in chief.

Under the new plan, more than 20,000 additional troops will be sent to Iraq, some from Fort Benning who learned Thursday that they would go earlier than expected. But instead of centering his address on the soldiers' situation, Mr. Bush seemed to be aiming his talk at ordinary Americans and members of Congress who are skeptical of his proposal.

DOJ_NMG_0115929

Mr. Bush acknowledged, as he did in his televised address to the nation on Wednesday night, that he had miscalculated the number of troops necessary to execute the military's "clear, hold and build" strategy of securing Baghdad neighborhoods and tamping down sectarian violence.

"What's new about this plan is there will be enough troops to clear, build and hold, and that our troops will be able to move alongside the Iraqis without political interference, and that's very important," the president said. He added, "This is something different that enables the military folks to predict that we will succeed in helping quell sectarian violence in Baghdad."

Mr. Bush pledged that the strategy would produce a return to peaceful society in Baghdad, but said it would take time. "The new strategy is not going to yield immediate results, it's going to take a while," he said, adding, "Yet over time, we can expect to see positive results."

The president was not specific about how long he meant. But a senior official at the National Security Council who helped develop the policy said the administration's target is significant improvement in a year.

"By the end of this year," this official said, "Baghdad's got to look significantly different. Decisive change in Baghdad is the focus."

Senior aides to Mr. Bush acknowledge that he is taking a risk in putting his faith in the government of Iraq's prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki. Mr. Bush said Thursday that he had been heartened this week by Iraqi and American forces fighting together to root out terrorists on Haifa Street in Baghdad, and that he also was encouraged by Mr. Maliki's recent statements that sectarian violence would not be tolerated.

"The prime minister and I have had some plain talking," the president said. "I have made it clear that the patience of the American people is not unlimited."

As Mr. Bush spoke here, two members of his cabinet, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, were testifying about the plan on Capitol Hill, where Democrats are promising a vote on the plan and may go so far as to place limits on financing for the war. Traveling with Mr. Bush to Fort Benning, Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president, warned that if Democrats were going to criticize, they must come up with something better.

"Those who have decided to judge this plan before it has a chance to work have a greater responsibility to propose something that will work," Mr. Bartlett said. "We've yet to see that from the Democrats."

Soldiers from Fort Benning have already contributed heavily to the Iraq war effort. Members of the Third Infantry Division, Third Brigade, have served two tours in Iraq, and some were notified Thursday that they would serve a third starting in mid-March, about two months ahead of schedule, as a result of the president's plan.

In his speech, Mr. Bush took note of that, saying, "I appreciate the sacrifices our troops are willing to make." But he did not dwell on sacrifice; a senior White House official said the president did not want that to be the major theme of his talk.

It was difficult to know how the soldiers felt about returning to the war zone, or the president's new Iraq plan. Though Mr. Bush's lunch was open to the press, the base commander, Maj. Gen. Walter Wojdakowski, would not let the troops in attendance talk to reporters. His spokeswoman said the commander wanted "the focus to be on the president."

At A Post In Georgia, A Job To Do (USAT)

By Larry Copeland

USA Today, January 12, 2007

COLUMBUS, Ga. — U.S. Army Staff Sgt. Bobby Dorsey has been deployed to the Middle East three times since 2003, but he's ready to go again.

Dorsey, 26, serves with the 3rd Brigade Combat Team at the Army's sprawling Fort Benning training complex near here. He's been to Iraq twice and Kuwait once. He figures that the increase of 21,500 troops that President Bush ordered for Baghdad and the rest of Iraq this week will make a difference.

"The more boots you have on the ground, the better you can control an area without having to stretch troops so far," said Dorsey, a six-year veteran who expects to return to Iraq soon. "You'll be able to recycle some troops, get them a little down time."

Soldiers from the Fort Benning-based 3rd Brigade of the 3rd Infantry Division are among the combat troops scheduled to go to Iraq.

In 2005, the 3rd Brigade Combat Team conducted 24,000 combat patrols and 3,500 joint operations with Iraqi army and police forces, said Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for the National Security Council. About 4,000 members of the unit will deploy to Iraq soon.

On Thursday, a day after Bush announced his new strategy in a prime-time address, there was a sense of a quickening at some of the businesses that cater to soldiers here. At Ranger Joe's, a military supply store on Victory Drive, soldiers bustled in and out all afternoon, picking up uniforms and other items.

DOJ_NMG_0115930

Bush visited Fort Benning, ate lunch with soldiers and watched training exercises. "On September the 11th, our nation saw firsthand the destructive vision of a new kind of enemy, and once again the men and women of Fort Benning answered the call to protect our country from that enemy," Bush said. "The fortunate thing for this country is that those who wear the uniform have never forgotten the threat. You understand the stakes."

Outside Ranger Joe's, Army 1st Sgt. Mecko Johnson said he agrees with the president's strategy — up to a point. "The more soldiers you get on the ground, it always helps," said Johnson, 39, a 19-year veteran awaiting orders to ship out. "As far as (the troop increase) changing the whole situation in Iraq, I'll be up for questioning on that. I'm not sure that's what we need right now. We need the Iraqi people to take more control of their own country."

Johnson will be going to Iraq for the third time. He was there for Operation Desert Storm in 1991 and for the Army's initial entry into Baghdad during the 2003 invasion.

"I think it'll be different this time," he said. "Then, we were there to liberate Iraq. Now, we're there as a training force and peacekeeping presence."

Reaction from some military families around the USA was mixed:

·Lynne Stamm of Wickliffe, Ohio, whose son did three tours in Iraq, said in an e-mail that the United States has done enough: "We deposed Saddam Hussein, Iraq drafted their own constitution, they held free elections and established their own government. We have done what was promised and so much more at a steep cost: over 3,000 American dead and billions upon billions of dollars spent. George Bush needs to face the reality in front of him: Iraq is in a civil war and just like any unhappy marriage, if you step in between the warring parties often the rage gets turned on you."

·Stormie Thompson, 21, whose husband, Matthew, is an Army sergeant serving in Iraq, said in an e-mail that "only time will tell if he is required to be extended as a result of the president's new plan." She lives in Germany, where her husband is stationed, but is visiting family in Oklahoma.

"I miss him terribly and can't wait to be reunited … but this is his job," she said. "Of course, we want our troops to be home and for there to be peace in the world, but that is not a reality now. People seem to forget that we have military forces for exactly this purpose — for them to fight when called upon by our nation's leaders. "

The impact of the new deployments was being felt strongly Thursday both inside and outside Fort Benning.

At Rose's Caribbean Restaurant (lunch special, $5.50, 10% military discount) on Fort Benning Road a half-mile from the post, owner Rose Collins said the deployment will have a devastating impact on her business, which is already down sharply.

"Our business, 90% is military," said Collins, who's had a restaurant here for 14 years, including three years at the current location. "People don't understand that when the soldiers are gone, we have no business."

Alek Ansley, co-owner and general manager of JudyBug's Books in nearby Columbus, said the comings and goings from Fort Benning affect businesses in town, but merchants no longer are wholly dependent on the troops.

"My biggest concern is for the families of the soldiers themselves," said Ansley, 39. "I know people who have been over there many times. I feel like it's another Vietnam, because I just think it's a war that can't be won. I think we'll win some battles, but I think even with these soldiers, we're not going to win the war."

Dorsey, who expects to return to Iraq in early spring, said he sees it differently. "We got a lot of good things accomplished," he said. "We got schools up and running. We built water-treatment plants. The guys over there are really helping the people learn how to sustain themselves. I think the additional troops will really help."

U.S. Unit Patrolling Baghdad Sees Flaws In Bush Strategy (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 11 -- A few hours before another mission into the cauldron of Baghdad, Spec. Daniel Caldwell's wife instant-messaged him Thursday morning. President Bush, Kelly wrote, wanted to send more than 20,000 U.S. troops and extend deployments in Iraq. Eight weeks pregnant, she was worried.

Caldwell, a tall, lean 20-year-old from Montesano, Wash., wondered whether he would miss the birth of his child. He walked outside and joined his comrades of Apache Company, 1st Battalion, 23rd Infantry Regiment, Stryker Brigade. They, too, had heard the news.

Moments before he stepped into his squad's Stryker -- a large, bathtub-shaped vehicle encased in a cage -- Caldwell echoed a sentiment shared by many in his squad: "They're kicking a dead horse here. The Iraqi army can't stand up on their own."

Bush's decision to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq rests on a key assumption: that the Iraqi government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki can produce a well-disciplined, impartial army capable of taking the lead in securing Baghdad. U.S. troops, the president said, would now play more of a background role.

DOJ_NMG_0115931

The day after his speech, the soldiers of Apache Company went on a mission to the volatile neighborhood of Hurriyah that underscored the challenges confronting U.S. troops as they attempt to clear neighborhoods of sectarian fighters and keep them that way under Iraqi control.

Across Baghdad, Iraq's mostly Shiite security forces have proved unable to keep neighborhoods secure on their own. Sunni Arabs deeply mistrust the army and police, viewing them as a sectarian weapon of the Shiite-led government. Iraqi army commanders say their soldiers lack training and equipment, while some U.S. officials worry that Iraq's troops are too dependent on their American counterparts and will become even more so with the expected surge.

The Stryker rolled through the mud of Camp Liberty and made its way to Hurriyah, a mostly Shiite area nestled west of the Tigris River. Apache Company's mission: to search a few houses for weapons caches based on intelligence reports. Caldwell and his soldiers worried about the intelligence they had been given. It had come from an Iraqi army -- or "IA," in U.S. soldier lingo -- officer a week ago. They wondered whether they were being set up for an ambush.

"It's a joke," said Pfc. Drew Merrell, 22, of Jefferson City, Mo., shaking his head and flashing a smile as the Stryker rolled through Baghdad.

"They feed us what they want," said Spec. Josh Lake, 26, of Ventura, Calif., referring to the intelligence. "I guarantee that everyone in the city knows where we're going. Because the IA told them. The only thing they don't know is how big a force we're coming with."

On this morning, 22 U.S. soldiers were in the Stryker convoy along with one Iraqi interpreter, whom the soldiers called Joey. He didn't want his real name used for security reasons.

"Pretty soon the Shiites will be tired of our presence, just like the Sunnis," said Lake, noting that the squad now makes almost daily trips to Hurriyah.

"The general feeling among us is we're not really doing anything here," Caldwell said. "We clear one neighborhood, then another one fires up. It's an ongoing battle. It never ends."

"We're constantly being told that it's not our fight. It is their fight," said Sgt. Jose Reynoso, 24, of Yuma, Ariz., speaking of the Iraqi army. "But that's not the case. Whenever we go and ask them for guys, they almost always say no, and we have to do the job ourselves."

"You do have corruption problems among the ranks," said Sgt. Justin Hill, 24, of Abilene Tex., the squad leader. "I don't know what they can do about that. They have militias inside them. They are pretty much everywhere."

"The intel they give us and the intel we get are two different things," Lake said.

Caldwell, as he listened to the conversation, leaned his head back and said:

"I want to go back and play my PlayStation.'"'We Need the Americans'

In Hurriyah, the convoy pulled up outside the Muheaman Mosque, a tan Sunni house of worship overlooking a dirt field with junked cars. Last month, militiamen from the Mahdi Army, the force of radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, killed several mosque workers. Now, an Iraqi army unit, with all Shiites, was stationed inside the mosque. The area, they said, was controlled by the Mahdi force.

Lt. Dan Futrell, 23, of Santa Clara, Calif., walked into the mosque, flanked by his comrades. Unarmed, bleary-eyed Iraqi soldiers greeted him and called for their commander, Maj. Saad Khalid Fetlawi, who wore a red beret.

Futrell asked him for 10 Iraqi soldiers to help search the targeted houses. Fetlawi immediately agreed and ordered his men to report for duty. As he waited, Fetlawi said he had heard that the United States was sending thousands of extra troops.

"This is good news. We have a weak government and a weak army. We need training, we need more equipment," Fetlawi said. "We need the Americans to help us go forward. Iraqi army soldiers are not ready to do all this themselves. At the moment, 20,000 is a good number to help us to bring security."

His soldiers came out with old, rusting AK-47 assault rifles and mismatched uniforms. One soldier wore baby blue running shoes with his beige camouflage gear. Some wore black masks so they wouldn't be recognized in the community. Another soldier tucked silver shears into his chest strap.

"This is one of the more squared-away units," Hill said.

"That's something," quipped Merrell, looking at the soldier with the shears. "The Iraqis are always ready to prune a good hedge."

"Okay," barked Hill, looking at the Iraqis. "You guys will lead out."

They walked around the corner, onto a narrow, unpaved street with two-story houses. Residents watched from their walled yards as the Iraqi soldiers politely knocked on the doors of the targeted houses. They went in, followed by the Apache Company troops.

Inside one house, an Iraqi soldier walked up to Reynoso. He had found two AK-47 magazine clips. By law, the family can own only one. The Iraqi soldier asked Reynoso what he should do.

DOJ_NMG_0115932

"I am not going to tell you what to do," Reynoso said, clearly trying to wean the soldier from depending on him. "It is against the law, but it is up to you to decide."

The Iraqi soldier smiled. Then, he handed back the magazine clip to a member of the family.

In another house, an Iraqi soldier asked whom he should take orders from, the Americans or his Iraqi squad leader.

"I'll tell your squad leader what to do, and he will tell his squad what to do," replied Sgt. Justin Mongol, 25, of New Market, Va., as Joey translated.

After nearly a half-hour, the soldiers had not unearthed a single weapon. Futrell asked Joey to see whether they were near Mahanara School, as the informant had told them. They weren't. They were near Imam Ali School.

The houses they were meant to search were in another section of Hurriyah.

Some of the American soldiers were angry. They had wasted their time and put their lives at risk.

"Are we even in Hurriyah?" Mongol demanded.

"We're chasing a ghost," Hill said.

They returned to the mosque and asked Fetlawi for a map of Hurriyah.

"I have no map of the place. I came here two days ago," he said.

Still, Fetlawi made a call and was able to find the correct school. He dispatched a pickup truck with his men to guide the U.S. soldiers.

Inside the Stryker, Lake fumed: "A debacle," he declared.

"Same old bull. . . ," Caldwell said, using an expletive.No Help Without Orders

The Stryker stopped along a main street in Hurriyah.

The soldiers walked into a compound, the base of the Iraqi army unit in charge of a nearby checkpoint. The targeted house was across the street. And Futrell needed the help of Sgt. Ahmed Faisal. He needed some of his men to help raid the house.

Faisal refused.

"Our duty is only at this checkpoint, not inside the sector," Faisal said. "We can't send any men with you. I can't work without orders."

So the Americans crossed the street and searched the two-story house. They examined a red trunk on the roof and dug through a pile of sand. No weapons. "I think it's a dry hole," Mongol said, with disappointment.

Inside the Stryker, as it headed back to the base, the soldiers of Apache Company wondered whether they had been given false information by their Iraqi army contact. "They know things we don't," Lake said, repeating what he had said on the way to Hurriyah.

"That's why we're still here. That's why we will be here for years."

U.S. Expects New Reliability From Iraqi Forces (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush's plan to secure Iraq by committing 21,500 more U.S. troops rests on a shaky foundation: the Iraqi military.

Recent reports by the Pentagon and the Government Accountability Office (GAO) say Iraqi security forces, primarily the military and police, suffer from a lack of training, supplies and availability.

Though 322,600 Iraqi security personnel had been trained and equipped by last month, "the number of present-for-duty soldiers and police is much lower," according to a Pentagon progress report released in December. That's because so many Iraqi troops are on scheduled leave, are absent without leave or have left the service entirely, the report says.

Things will change under the new plan, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said Thursday. Two Iraqi troops will join each U.S. soldier under the plan to secure Baghdad, he said.

How much the Iraqi military can be relied upon to provide the manpower, however, is uncertain. The Iraqi government promised six battalions last summer to help secure Baghdad; only two showed up.

The United States has had to adjust its plans to reduce troop levels in Iraq at least three times since 2004 because of the Iraqis' inability to provide security, a GAO study released Tuesday says.

Although U.S. forces transferred security responsibilities to the Iraqis, "overall security conditions in Iraq have continued to deteriorate and have grown more complex," says the report by GAO, Congress' investigative arm.

The Iraqis must follow through this time, Defense Secretary Robert Gates said Thursday. "American patience is limited," he said. The United States will revisit its strategy if the Iraqis don't deliver on their new promises, he said.

Among key elements of the Baghdad plan, according to Pace:

DOJ_NMG_0115933

·An Iraqi commander will oversee security of all of Baghdad, which will be divided into nine districts. Each district will have an Iraqi brigade supported by a U.S. battalion. U.S. brigades have 3,500 to 5,000 troops; a battalion has about 700 to 1,000 troops.

·All allied forces in Baghdad — the Iraqi army and police, and U.S. and coalition troops — will be based at three or four police stations in each sector. They'll mount daily patrols, perform door-to-door work and provide a presence to help develop security.

·Quick-reaction forces based at the police stations will aid Iraqi forces that encounter trouble.

The recent reports questioned the Iraqi forces' ability to handle their assigned roles.

The Pentagon report said the Iraqi army's inability to plan and deliver supplies to its troops means it will continue to "rely heavily" on U.S. quick-reaction forces.

The Pentagon report also said sectarian militias had infiltrated the Iraqi police units that the plan counts on for security.

The militias often dominate large sections of Baghdad. In the past, the Iraqi government has prevented U.S. troops from operating in those neighborhoods, such as the Shiite area called Sadr City. Gates told the House Armed Services Committee that Iraq's government will now allow coalition forces to operate in all neighborhoods.

There are about 42,000 Iraqi security forces and 24,000 U.S. troops now in Baghdad, Pace said. The president's plan would add 17,500 U.S. troops in the capital. Four thousand Marines will be added in Anbar province west of Baghdad, the heart of a Sunni-based insurgency.

The boost is coming too late, Armed Services Chairman Ike Skelton, D-Mo., told Gates. "The time for a so-called surge in troop numbers was back in 2003," he said.

Earlier Thursday, Gates told a White House briefing that the troop increase is considered "temporary," but "I think no one has a really clear idea of how long that might be."

Gates told the committee he favored adding 65,000 soldiers and 27,000 Marines to the military. Over five years, the Army would grow to 547,000 soldiers and the Marine Corps to 202,000 troops.

Sales Job Kicks Off For Bush Iraq Plan (USAT)

By David Jackson And Bill Nichols

USA Today, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — The White House is embarking on a weekend campaign to sell President Bush's new Iraq strategy to the nation amid fierce criticism from Democrats and some Republicans on Capitol Hill.

President Bush will appear Sunday on CBS' 60 Minutes, which airs after an NFL playoff game. Vice President Cheney will appear on Fox News Sunday to defend the plan to boost U.S. troop levels by 21,500.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice leaves today on a week-long trip to the Middle East and Europe to brief U.S. allies on the plan.

White House spokesman Tony Snow, who held interviews with radio and television hosts Thursday, said the communications plan will continue in coming weeks.

Snow and others said the strategy is aimed at several distinct audiences, including Congress, servicemembers, Iraqis and other Middle Eastern countries, as well as the American public. "This is something the president will do on an ongoing basis," White House communications director Kevin Sullivan said. "We'll do it in a lot of different ways."

Bush told about 300 soldiers and family members at Fort Benning in Georgia on Thursday that Americans must brace for more violence in the short term as insurgents resist the additional troops.

"The American people have got to understand that suicide bombings won't stop immediately," Bush said. "Yet over time, we can expect to see positive results."

In Congress, Bush's plan, which he unveiled in a prime-time speech Wednesday, found few supporters in a day of combative appearances by Rice and Defense Secretary Robert Gates. As Rice briefed the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Nebraska Republican Chuck Hagel, a Vietnam War veteran, said Bush's strategy was "the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam, if it's carried out."

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., plans to introduce a resolution next week expressing disapproval of Bush's plan and possibly force senators to make a non-binding vote for or against it.

"In choosing to escalate the war, the president stands virtually alone," Reid said.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., and other Republicans defended the plan. McConnell threatened to block the resolution.

Democratic leaders in the House remain undecided on when a vote might be held on the new policy. Hearings in the House are set for next Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0115934

Poll: Americans Oppose Iraq Troop Surge (AP)

By Nancy Benac

AP, January 12, 2007

Seventy percent of Americans oppose sending more troops to Iraq, according to a new poll that provides a devastatingly blunt response to President Bush's plan to bolster military forces there.

All sides in the Iraq debate are keenly aware of mounting public dissatisfaction with the situation: Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday it's one thing on which all Americans — including administration officials — are united.

Yet the Associated Press-Ipsos poll found widespread disagreement with the Bush administration over its proposed solution, and growing skepticism that the United States made the right decision in going to war in the first place.

Just as 70 percent of Americans oppose sending more troops to Iraq, a like number don't think such an increase would help stabilize the situation there, the poll suggested. When asked to name the most important problem facing the U.S., 38 percent of those polled volunteered war, up significantly from 24 percent three months ago.

The AP-Ipsos telephone survey of 1,002 adults was conducted Monday through Wednesday night, when the president made his speech calling for an increase in troops. News had already surfaced before the polling period that Bush planned to boost U.S. forces in Iraq.

The public's concern over Iraq was a prominent topic on Capitol Hill on Thursday as legislators reacted to the president's plan to increase troop levels by 21,500.

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph Biden, D-Del., harked back to the Vietnam War as he warned Rice that any solution to the Iraq problem must have public support. "They've got to sign on," he told her.

Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., told Rice: "You are not listening to the American people. ... And you wonder why there is a dark cloud of skepticism and pessimism over this nation."

But Republican Sen. John McCain of Arizona said it would be an oversimplification to think that people just want the United States out of Iraq.

"They're understandably frustrated, they're understandably saddened," he said. "But if you can show the American people that there is a way forward to success, and also describe to them the consequences of failure, I believe this policy can be supported."

Iraq is a drag on Bush's overall job approval rating, too. That rating is at 32 percent in the latest survey, a new low in AP-Ipsos polling.

Just 35 percent of Americans think it was right for the United States to go to war, another record low in AP polling and a reversal from two years ago when two-thirds of Americans thought it was the correct move. Sixty percent, meanwhile, think it is unlikely that a stable, democratic Iraqi government will be established.

Democrats are far more inclined to oppose an increase of troops, with 87 percent against the idea, compared with 42 percent of Republicans.

Opposition to boosting troop levels is highest in the Northeast, where 79 percent of those surveyed were against the idea. That compares with 68 percent in the South and 67 percent in the Midwest and West.

The survey had a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

In Pennsylvania, President's Plan Draws Mixed Responses And Hardens Opinions (NYT)

By Ian Urbina

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

CLIFTON HEIGHTS, Pa., Jan. 11 — Hunched over a beer with a crowd of other veterans at the American Legion here Thursday, Rocco Polidoro was sure of one thing: President Bush's plan to send some 20,000 more troops to Iraq would only make matters worse.

"What I don't understand is who the president is listening to," said Mr. Polidoro, a lifelong Republican who, like a majority in this Republican district, voted for an antiwar Democrat in the last election. "If vets, military brass, the Baker committee, the international community and now most voters say it's time to get out, then in my view it's time to get out."

Frustrated by mounting deaths of United States soldiers in Iraq, voters in this former mill town wedged between more liberal Philadelphia and more conservative rural areas, responded to the president's plan with feelings ranging from outrage and resignation to guarded skepticism and qualified support.

In warning Americans of the risks of withdrawing too early, Mr. Bush, in his speech on Wednesday night, seemed to harden opinions rather than change minds here just two months after a resounding Democratic election victory was seen as a rejection of his Iraq policy.

DOJ_NMG_0115935

"It's one thing to be steadfast and another to be stubborn," said Rick Lacey, another Republican at the Legion hall who voted for a Democrat in the last election. "A guy like McCain, I don't agree with him on this troop increase issue, but he is steadfast because he bases his decisions on experience. Our president, he bases it on ideology and being stubborn."

Carlos Figueroa, a chef and Vietnam veteran from Villanova, said he would prefer to see an even larger increase in troop numbers. "The biggest concern I have is about morale of the troops over there," Mr. Figueroa said, "and I think that by sending even larger numbers we would get the place under control and help boost spirits of our folks and Iraqis."

But other supporters of the president's decision said they were left with an unsettling sense that the troop increase was part of a broader approach lacking in clear goals and a concrete exit plan.

"I do think increasing troops may make sense because if you go to war, you go to win," said John Carson, 71, a Democrat and Korean War veteran who was getting a trim at the A Cut barbershop in Bensalem, a Bucks County town in another conservative Congressional district that swung to an antiwar Democrat in November. Were he on the front lines, Mr. Carson said, he, too, would hope to get all the help available. "But the terms have to be clear," he added. "What milestones? When will we get out? What is our limit?"

Standing near a statue of Uncle Sam riding a bicycle, Hugh Morrow, 64, a Republican who served in Vietnam and who owns the barbershop, intervened.

"Now, wait a minute," Mr. Morrow said, turning off his clippers. "The guy keeps digging us deeper and deeper into this mess — why not start pulling us out now?"

At Mary Jeffery's house, also in Bensalem, the conversation among 10 Democrats who had gathered to watch Mr. Bush's speech erupted into a heated free-for-all when one asked whether Democrats in Congress actually had the authority and the spine to block the president's plan.

"Of course they do," said Ms. Jeffery, a Democrat whose son is stationed in Cyprus.

"It's not too late for impeachment," someone yelled from the back of the room.

"Congressional hearings will apply pressure, we have to apply pressure," another person said, adding that the long-term solution was to reinstate the draft. Others suggested staging street protests and encouraging soldiers to refuse to serve.

"Look," interrupted John Daily, 46, a Navy veteran. "If the president wants to send troops, he has the constitutional power to do it."

"I don't know that cutting off funding is a fair thing to do to the troops," he added, as the room fell silent.

In Washington, while Senate Democrats condemned Mr. Bush's proposal and promised a nonbinding vote on it, and House Democrats threatened to limit financing for the president's plan, Republican lawmakers faced either breaking with Mr. Bush or embracing an unpopular policy just as the 2008 race for the White House picks up.

Virtually everywhere across these districts, talk of what Mr. Bush's plan means in relation to the last election quickly moved to speculation about the next.

"The pressure is actually on the Democrats now to prove that when given the chance to make a difference they take the opportunity," said Bill Lewis, 66, a Vietnam veteran, at a shopping mall in Springfield. "We had a 70 percent turnout for the first time in years here in Delaware County with a lot of independents and Republicans voting Democratic. But those folks won't do that again if the Democrats fail to act."

In national polling by The New York Times and CBS News, the percentage of Americans who say the United States did the right thing in taking military action in Iraq dropped to 38 percent last week from a high of 64 percent in December 2003.

And many voters here said the war was playing an increasingly important role in how they voted, even beyond party affiliation.

"I'm as devout a Democrat as they come," Mr. Daily said. "But if we are still in the war in two years and a Republican candidate for president like Hagel or Brownback is more antiwar than the Democrat, then I will vote Republican." He was referring to Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas, who has formed a presidential exploratory committee, a step that allows him to raise money as he gauges support, and Senator Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, widely mentioned as a possible candidate in 2008.

Some Democrats said the real reason for their anger at the president's decision was that it implied a larger misunderstanding of the problem in Iraq.

"He keeps trying to solve a political problem with a military solution," said Jim Bodnar, 61, who served in the Vietnam War. He said he thought the toppling of Saddam Hussein had inflamed ethnic, regional and religious rivalries that would not be mended by military force. But when he asked what Democrats should do to better address these political problems, Mr. Bodnar paused.

"I'm frustrated," he said, "but I'm not saying there are any easy answers here."

String Of Hopefuls For 2008 Choose Sides In Iraq Plan (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0115936

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

Iraq Debate Clouds 2008 picture.

McCain braces for fallout from troop surge that's smaller than he favored. His Republican presidential rival Romney, hurt by social-issue flip-flops, takes cautious approach with low-key endorsement of more troops.

Dark-horse Brownback gambles by opposing surge, targeting the one-third of Republicans who disapprove of Bush's policy. As liberal groups prepare ads opposing "escalation," new Democratic candidate Dodd pressures Obama and Clinton by praising Kennedy's call to block Bush. "She's worried about the left," says one Democratic Senate colleague of Clinton.

War critic Hagel, saying he may yet enter the Republican race, predicts mounting public protests.

Drug industry aims to hold down score on today's Medicare vote.

While House approval of requiring government negotiations over Medicare prices isn't in doubt, large-scale Republican defections would damp industry hopes of prevailing in Senate. Pharmaceutical lobbyists hope for just 20 Republican renegades; Democrats predict fewer, but Republican leaders warn the number could top 30.

Democratic leaders credit White House for promoting the message that Medicare's benefit has cost less than forecast, though they blame low enrollment. Opponents of negotiation say slowdown in drug spending argues against change; Medicare actuaries join Congressional Budget Office in saying House bill won't save taxpayer money.

Democrats seek to isolate Republicans with narrow tax-increase targets.

House Speaker Pelosi identifies $500,000 earners -- a more exclusive group than party leaders have previously targeted -- as source of revenue for cutting middle-class taxes. Imposing pre-Bush 39.6% rate on those with incomes over $500,000 would raise more than $85 billion over four years, Tax Policy Center estimates.

White House sees any tax increases heightening Democrats' vulnerability. Crediting Bush cuts with fueling growth, ranking Senate Finance Committee Republican Grassley asks, "Why would they want to kill the goose that laid the golden egg?"

"The upper-class squeeze -- now that's an issue Republicans can run on," taunts former Bill Clinton aide Bruce Reed.

PRESIDENTIAL PRIORITY? Former Clinton aide Dan Tarullo says Bush must "become personally involved" to restart Doha trade talks. Though Bush's negotiating authority expires in June, trade representative Schwab says "content will dictate over chronology" in talks with Europe, Brazil and India.

PENNY-WISE? Rice may speak on Afghanistan on coming overseas trip, while State and Pentagon team up to seek $6 billion for added Afghan troop training, border protection, road building and other projects. But they face pushback from Bush budgeteers, who aim to cut those figures in half.

BUSH AIDES BLAME television networks for audio problems during president's Iraq speech. "The feed went out of here clean," a spokesman says. Bush will keep relatively low-profile on Iraq next week as he wraps up budget decisions and Jan. 23 State of the Union speech.

JUDICIAL POLARIZATION? Memory of late U.S. Supreme Court Chief Justice Rehnquist divides Middlebury College in Vermont after professorship is named for him. "Rehnquist had the opportunity to grant civil rights to African-Americans and gays and lesbians, and he consistently used that power to deny them," Kevin Moss, professor of Russian, tells the student newspaper. Faculty votes 52-43 for resolution affirming commitment to diversity.

WHITE HOUSE BATTLES Democratic resistance on judges.

Despite withdrawal of four conservative nominees, Democrats say Bush is still playing hardball. California Sen. Feinstein fumes after Bush ignores her and Sen. Boxer in renominating Randy Smith of Idaho for a Ninth Circuit appeals-court seat traditionally held by a Californian.

Conservative dominance on Virginia-based Fourth Circuit, which has three vacancies, is at risk. Freshman Democratic Sen. Webb objects to some candidates proposed by Republican Sen. Warner; the Virginia colleagues meet to discuss working together on judges.

Democrats seek records from Fifth District appointee Leslie Southwick's service in Reagan White House at time of Bork's Supreme Court nomination.

MINOR MEMOS: Democratic Congress makes Rep. Oberstar chairman of House transportation panel and burnishes memory of his late boss and predecessor John Blatnik; Mr. Oberstar takes Blatnik's portrait from storage to hang in committee hearing room. ... Cheering union allies, Democrats rename House Education and the Workforce Committee to Education and Labor.

Wartime Linguistics (LAT)

By Frank Luntz

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115937

NOT SINCE THE frigid days of the Cold War have so many people parsed the lexicon of a world leader. Americans tuned in Wednesday night to hear the president's plan for a "new way forward" in Iraq. We also tuned in to be convinced and reassured that President Bush was the right man to execute that plan.

The speech was a clear attempt to draw a distinct line between the past and the future. The president addressed head-on the most common attacks on him and his administration, countering "inflexible," "unrealistic" and "incompetent" — three words pollsters like myself have heard from an angry electorate for more than a year — with "adjust" and "change," "scrutiny," "responsibility" and, again and again, "our new strategy." Speaking from the White House library, a different setting befitting a different strategy, the president attempted to make the case that things in Iraq were going to be different from now on.

The problem is, for most Americans it is too little and too late.

In the president's own words:

"Our past efforts to secure Baghdad failed…. "

True enough, but Americans had already figured that out. Now they are asking themselves why it took him so long. The rising troop death toll, the increasingly cruel and inhumane violence by Iraqis against Iraqis and the steady stream of graphic videos belie this attempt at linguistic minimization.

"There were not enough Iraqi and American troops…. And there were too many restrictions on the troops we did have."

These two sentences, while seemingly straightforward, may well become the most important of the entire speech. Americans have been told repeatedly that the commanders and troops would be given everything they need to win the war. Apparently, even the president now admits that wasn't the case.

"We will give our commanders and civilians greater flexibility to spend funds for economic assistance."

Given the unemployment in our own Rust Belt, Bush's jobs program for Iraq forces deficit-conscious Americans to choose between U.S. security and Iraqi security, between American economic development and Iraqi economic development. For most Americans, that choice is a no-brainer.

"We will double the number of provincial reconstruction teams … to help local Iraqi communities pursue reconciliation."

Reconciliation? It surely is an admirable long-term goal, but before you can break bread together, you first have to stop killing each other. For two years, we've been treated to horrific videos of mass sectarian violence. The picture conjured by "reconciliation" doesn't match anything that is in our visual databank.

"To empower local leaders, Iraqis plan to hold provincial elections…. "

We all remember with pride the purple fingers defiantly waving in the air last year. But if you asked Americans (and probably Iraqis as well) which is a higher priority, they'd wish for peace and calm ahead of another trip to the ballot box.

Not all of the speech was miscast. There were several examples of credibility-building passages and real-life references that will be well received by the American masses.

"A democratic Iraq will not be perfect. But it will be a country that fights terrorists instead of harboring them."

This is the most tangible reference to a genuine benefit that Americans can appreciate and share, regardless of ideological persuasion. It is a fact that we haven't had a successful terrorist attack on American soil since 9/11. Although many Democrats would deny him any credit, the president does still earn positive marks for the aggressive prosecution of the war on terror.

"If we increase our support at this crucial moment … we can hasten the day our troops begin coming home." Finally, a nod to an end to the conflict. What has been missing from the Bush rhetoric for more than a year is the proverbial light at the end of the tunnel — a chance for Americans to put the war behind them and focus on a more hopeful future.

If the president had his verbal ups and downs, the Democrats' response wasn't brilliant rhetoric either. They should probably consider themselves fortunate that the networks didn't want to delay or preempt even a minute of fare such as "Deal or No Deal." Their stringent rhetoric and unwillingness to compromise highlights their continued inability to put forward a comprehensive, credible alternative.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's spokesperson told USA Today that her boss would subject Bush's proposal to "harsh scrutiny." Words like "examination" or "accountability" would have been a more objective and less political approach for a party desperate to demonstrate that it isn't too partisan or too negative.

Similarly, "We're not going to baby-sit a civil war" — Sen. Barack Obama's sound bite — ignores widespread American concern that a civil war today could spin into a regional war tomorrow, with worldwide consequences. The image of "baby-sitting" lacks the gravitas that a conflict that has taken thousands of American lives, and tens of thousands of Iraqi lives, deserves.

In times of war, the American people have the right to expect a president who is straight with them linguistically, whether he's delivering good news or bad news, and an opposition party that uses words to unite and explain rather than divide and attack. Too bad we haven't had enough of either.

Surge Towards Debacle In Iraq And MidEast (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0115938

Financial Times, January 12, 2007

George W. Bush's new direction in Iraq is certainly not a strategy for victory, whatever that word, which is used ever more desperately by the US president, now means. It may be one last heave. It may be a cover for US withdrawal. But two things are quite clear.

Right now, Mr Bush has the support of no more than one in four Americans for this so-called surge of an extra 20,000 or so troops. Very soon, as the already indecipherable ethnic and sectarian patchwork of Iraq is pulled further and even more bloodily to pieces, he will have none.

Second, this policy will not succeed in fixing an Iraq traumatised by tyranny and war and then broken by invasion and occupation. But it may end with the US "surging" into Iran – and taking the Middle East to a new level of mayhem that will spill into nearby regions and western capitals.

Mr Bush's body language in the speech bespoke a chastened man. Yet, caught in a wilfully spun web of delusion and denial, he seems still unable to comprehend the depths of the debacle he has caused in Iraq.

Iraq has reached advanced societal breakdown, with ethnic cleansing on a regional, neighbourhood and even street-by-street basis. There has been a mass exodus of its professionals and managers, civil servants and entrepreneurs, a haemorrhage of its future. The time for the occupying authorities to have surged was 2003, after the fall of Baghdad; like everything they have tried since, this is far too little, much too late. The US deployed a similar number of troops last summer to "lock down" Baghdad, since when the number of killed in the capital alone has rocketed to more than 100 a day, while on average an attack occurs against Anglo-American forces every 10 minutes, and this in a fight now mainly between the minority Sunni deposed from power and the hitherto dispossessed Shia majority drunk with it.

It is hard, even for ardent democrats, to see this Iraq as a young democracy fighting for its life, as Mr Bush's discourse of good guys against bad guys would have it. The invasion has solidified a system divided into sects and operating on the basis of patronage and intimidation. The composition of parliament is nearly two thirds Islamist. There are no institutions. Ministries are sectarian booty and factional bastions. The one institution that did more or less survive Saddam Hussein, the national army, was disbanded by the occupation and current attempts to reconstitute it have failed to move beyond rebadged militia. The three brigades the Shia-dominated government of Nuri al-Maliki has promised to add to the five extra US brigades are mostly Peshmerga – Kurdish militiamen – adding another account to be settled once the Americans withdraw.

What is still, in spite of Mr Bush's attempts to dress it up, an essentially military strategy is just not credible. The US army is not designed to deal with insurgency and, in any case, does not have the troops to master one on this scale – especially if its own masters are planning to open a new front.

It has failed to control the insurgency in the Sunni triangle – a rebellion by a minority of the minority. Now it aims to confront Moqtada al-Sadr, the Shia radical, and his 60,000-strong Mahdi army, in a fight that could set fire to east Baghdad and south Iraq, where British troops could easily be enveloped in the flames.

The contradiction at the heart of the US approach, however, is this: after casually overturning the Sunni order in Iraq and empowering the Shia in an Arab heartland country for the first time in nearly a millennium, Washington took fright at the way this had enlarged the power of the Shia Islamist regime in Iran. Now, while dependent on Tehran-aligned forces in Baghdad, and unable to dismantle the Sunni Jihadistan it has created in western Iraq, the US is trying to put together an Arab Sunni alliance against Iran. This is a fiasco with the fuel to combust into a region-wide conflagration.

The only feasible way forward is the approach of the bipartisan Baker-Hamilton commission – which the new US Congress should embrace and insist on.

This would make support for the Iraqi government and army conditional on their real effort to promote national reconciliation, which would in turn, as it progressed, be rewarded with billions of dollars in long-term aid from the US and Iraq's neighbours. This external support – from Turkey to Saudi Arabia and Iran to Syria – would be built up within a wide-ranging diplomatic offensive in the region that would include Tehran and Damascus. Mr Bush is instead threatening to expand the war.

"Iran is providing material support for attacks on American troops" he said on Wednesday. "We will disrupt the attacks on our forces. We will interrupt the flow of support from Iran and Syria." The Iraq surge is beginning to look like the Vietnam escalation, spilling over into Iran and Syria the way that one did into Cambodia and Laos.

Mr Bush is right to argue that defeat in Iraq would be very serious. He is wrong in failing to recognise defeat is what he is staring at – and that this approach will help guarantee it.

Why Bush's War Plan Can Work (CSM)

By Mackubin Thomas Owens

The Christian Science Monitor, January 12, 2007

NEWPORT, R.I.

DOJ_NMG_0115939

The strategy that the president outlined Wednesday night does not represent an altogether new approach to Iraq, but a necessary adaptation of the previous strategy to changed circumstances. It is, in effect, an updating of the National Strategy for Victory in Iraq he issued in November 2005.

President Bush's prime-time address acknowledged the shortcomings of past efforts to secure Baghdad. And he implied that this new effort to do so represents a final opportunity to salvage victory in Iraq. Failure in Iraq, he warned, would be a disaster. But Mr. Bush's plan can work.

Strategy is the interplay of ends, ways, and means. Strategic thinking implies limited means. There are never enough resources to achieve all goals, so choices must be made concerning how best to apply limited resources.

In the case of Iraq, America's strategic goal is a "unified democratic federal Iraq that can govern itself, defend itself, sustain itself, and is an ally in the war on terror." The key to achieving this strategic goal is to provide security for the Iraqi people. This, in turn, requires defeating the insurgents.

Until February of last year, the key to victory was the defeat of the Sunni insurgency centered in Anbar Province. This took the form of a campaign to destroy the Sunni insurgency by depriving it of its base in the Sunni Triangle and its "ratlines" - the infiltration routes that run from the Syrian border into the heart of Iraq. The operational concept was "clear and hold."

No force can continue to fight if it is deprived of sanctuary and logistics support. Accordingly, the central goal of the US strategy before February 2006 was to destroy the ratlines following the Euphrates and Tigris rivers.

This campaign began in November 2004 with the takedown of Fallujah. Wresting Fallujah from the jihadis was critically important: Control of the town had given them crucial infrastructure to attack Iraqi and coalition targets.

The loss of Fallujah didn't cause the insurgency to collapse, but it did deprive the rebels of an indispensable sanctuary.

The coalition continued a high tempo of offensive operations. Although successful in many respects, these operations seemed like the "Whac-A-Mole" arcade game: towns were cleared of insurgents, but because of limited manpower, they could not be held. Insurgents returned once coalition forces moved on.

In February 2006, when Sunni extremists destroyed the Shiite mosque in Samarra, sectarian violence exploded, especially in Baghdad. American and Iraqi troops had to redeploy to confront the new threat, and in doing so, the gains that had been achieved against the Sunni insurgents were lost.

The new plan is a response to these changing conditions. The main reason for the so-called surge is to provide enough troops to provide security for Baghdad while regaining the initiative against the Sunni fighters in Anbar. It also recognizes that the Shiite militias causing most of the deaths in Baghdad must be neutralized.

It includes not only a military component but political and economic elements, as well. The adage - to defeat an insurgency, "win the hearts and minds" of the people - is true. But to do that, the people must have security. And to achieve security, it is often necessary to kill and capture the insurgents. Thus, military success is a necessary, if not sufficient, cause for defeating an insurgency.

This point is illustrated by an objective analysis of the Vietnam War. As Mark Moyar demonstrates in his remarkable new book, "Triumph Forsaken," the government of Ngo Dinh Diem had broken the communist insurgency in South Vietnam by 1960 by killing and capturing communist cadres in unprecedented number, leading many survivors to defect to the government's side. And in his book, "A Better War," Lewis Sorley shows how the US did the same in the late 1960s and 1970s.

Will Bush's approach work? This depends on at least three factors. The first is the adequacy of the force. Many commentators have called for troop increases of 40,000 to 50,000, but 20,000, which Bush called for, is the maximum number that can be culled from the current force. In any case, the key to success is not the number of troops but how they are used.

The second factor is the Iraqi government. Until now, the Shiite militias have been off limits. That has to change, and Bush put Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki on notice that this is the case.

The third factor is Congress. Would the Democrats rather see Bush lose or the US win? Let us hope that the Demo-crats take the wise counsel of one of their own, Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, who reminded us the other day that the stark choice in Iraq is between victory and defeat.

'Unity Of Effort' (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

Immediately after the president's speech, House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer said, "I heard nothing new." Nothing? When Gen. David Petraeus takes command of U.S. forces in Iraq, it will mark the start of an historic turn in military strategy in Iraq and perhaps in U.S. war-fighting doctrine.

The U.S.'s primary problem in Iraq, manifest across 2006, has been an urban insurgency in a 30-mile radius around Baghdad and in Anbar province. The Petraeus command is the overdue beginning of the counterinsurgency.

DOJ_NMG_0115940

This isn't a one-off effort as at Fallujah, but counterinsurgency as daily U.S. military policy. It is the product of an enormous amount of self-criticism and analysis done by military and civilian analysts in and out of government. It does not mean, as often suggested the past 24 hours, that 20,000 U.S. troops are now going to run out and look for gun battles with insurgents in back alleys.

In broadest outline, the plan divides Baghdad into nine districts, essentially neighborhoods. The job of providing daily security in each district will be undertaken by an Iraqi army brigade of several thousand soldiers, a U.S. support battalion of up to 1,000 troops, and most importantly, about 20 U.S. military "embeds" or advisers.

Some of us predicted late last year that advisory embeds would be part of the new Bush strategy on reading National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley's November memo of advice to the president in the New York Times. After a late November trip to Iraq, Mr. Hadley said four times in the memo that the U.S. should embed coalition forces with Iraq's army and dysfunctional police.

The source of this idea, in part, was a successful Marine experiment in Anbar province. Rather than attach just a single U.S. military adviser to an Iraqi commander at the division level, the Marines put advisers alongside Iraqi units down to the NCO level. They stayed with and fought with their Iraqi counterparts 24/7. And the Marines reported that the Iraqis fought with more confidence and effect, aka spine-stiffening.

In 2004, a similar but broader effort at integration between U.S. and Iraqi forces was planned in Anbar province by Marine Maj. Gen. James Mattis. The Mattis plan is summarized in the middle of the Army's new Counterinsurgency Manual, released just last month. The manual's drafting was overseen by Gen. David Petraeus, who will now direct the U.S. military effort in the neighborhoods of Baghdad. It's not a coincidence. The manual describes in detail the purpose, theory, tactics and problems (including spikes in violence and casualties) likely to emerge during the new counterinsurgency strategy.

At the end of the manual there is a bibliography of books, studies and articles on fighting insurgency. It includes classics, such as Alistair Horne's "A Savage War of Peace," but what's interesting is how many of them were published since 2003, amid the Iraq war. Out of this effort has emerged a "best practices" for the U.S. when fighting an insurgency, as now.

Whether the U.S. should have done this back when Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and his foreign suicide bombers emerged is a legitimate question. The point is this: The Iraq violence has not been running like an untended open hydrant. Some of our best and brightest have been thinking hard about how to shut the valve. Last month AEI released a plan reflecting similar counterinsurgency ideas by military specialist Fred Kagan and the Army's former vice chief of staff, Gen. Jack Keane.

In November, the Bush administration joined the rethinking. The participants in that process looked at the whole range of criticisms and formal critiques of what the U.S. had been doing in Iraq to that point. They concluded the one thing that wouldn't change is the goal, mainly establishing a democratic government in Iraq. What would change, heretofore a nonsubject, were the strategic concept and the level of resources.

Some of this came out of Gen. Petraeus's Counterinsurgency Manual, some from U.S. commanders in the field and some from the military think tanks. Suggestions that had gotten a "no" before, now got a "yes."

Is it all a day late and a dollar short? Maybe. Some 20,000 more troops may be insufficient. The inevitable front-page casualty reports and blood-soaked photos may still drain the will of domestic pundits. But what we are seeing in the Petraeus command is the kind of step back that the military sometimes excels at. This the U.S. military at its potential best -- remaking itself, as it did with the transition to training a volunteer army after Vietnam.

It is not the least bit obvious that this counterinsurgency plan will fail, and only the most churlishly neurotic Bush hater would want it to. The stakes for the region and the war on terror have been described many times. There is another reason: How this ends will have an important effect on the morale of our officer corps, the people who must summon the gumption to protect us. They deserve a final chance to succeed. This is the chance.

An idea one finds in the counterinsurgency literature, crucial to the success of any such strategy, is known as "unity of effort." Basically, it means all oars pulling in the same direction. The Iraqi government, for instance, has told the U.S. it will stop interfering in the military's rules of engagement. Tuesday's victorious 10-hour battle on Baghdad's Haifa Street, by a combined U.S.-Iraqi force, looked like a successful test of unified effort. It remains to discover whether anything resembling unity of effort can be achieved along Constitution Avenue.

Nothing would more raise the tenor of this debate than if some member of the Democratic Party would take ownership of the subject of military doctrine in Iraq. On the evidence of their statements the past 24 hours, barely a Democrat exists with has a clue of what Gen. Petraeus is about to do or why.

Sen. Barack Obama, presidential second-runner, said, "We are not going to babysit a civil war." Democrats will get a chance soon at Senate confirmation hearings to question Gen. Petraeus. Babysitter is not the word he brings to mind. His appointment is the result of a ferment in American military thinking on Iraq that goes well past George Bush "alone." They should hear him out before deciding whether to support this effort, or remain in the opposition.

DOJ_NMG_0115941

Bush's Iraq Plan, Between The Lines (NYT)

By Anthony H. Cordesman

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

PRESIDENT BUSH has presented a new strategy for the war in Iraq that he feels can reverse the country's drift toward large-scale civil war. The new plan focuses on stabilizing Baghdad by adding thousands of American troops with newly expanded powers to take on Shiite as well as Sunni rebels. It also includes a limited increase in United States forces in Anbar Province, and calls for Iraqi forces to take formal control of the security mission in November. The president was refreshingly candid, saying that "where mistakes have been made, the responsibility rests with me."

But taken as a whole, the speech raised more questions than it answered. I've selected a number of important phrases from the address that beg for more detailed discussion, and included my own analysis of the validity and practicality of what the president seems to have in mind.

Anthony H. Cordesman is a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

Five Flaws In The President's Plan (WP)

By Zbigniew Brzezinski

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

The president's speech gives rise to five broad observations:

Â· It provided a more realistic analysis of the situation in Iraq than any previous presidential statement. It acknowledged failure, though it dodged accountability for that failure by the standard device of assuming personal responsibility. Its language was less Islamophobic than has been customary with President Bush's rhetoric since Sept. 11, though the president still could not resist the temptation to engage in a demagogic oversimplification of the challenge the United States faces in Iraq, calling it a struggle to safeguard "a young democracy" against extremists and an effort to protect American society from terrorists. Both propositions are more than dubious.

Â· The commitment of 21,500 more troops is a political gimmick of limited tactical significance and of no strategic benefit. It is insufficient to win the war militarily. It will engage U.S. forces in bloody street fighting that will not resolve with finality the ongoing turmoil and the sectarian and ethnic strife, not to mention the anti-American insurgency.

Â· The decision to escalate the level of the U.S. military involvement while imposing "benchmarks" on the "sovereign" Iraqi regime, and to emphasize the external threat posed by Syria and Iran, leaves the administration with two options once it becomes clear -- as it almost certainly will -- that the benchmarks are not being met. One option is to adopt the policy of "blame and run": i.e., to withdraw because the Iraqi government failed to deliver. That would not provide a remedy for the dubious "falling dominoes" scenario, which the president so often has outlined as the inevitable, horrific consequence of U.S. withdrawal. The other alternative, perhaps already lurking in the back of Bush's mind, is to widen the conflict by taking military action against Syria or Iran. It is a safe bet that some of the neocons around the president and outside the White House will be pushing for that. Others, such as Sen. Joseph Lieberman, may also favor it.

Â· The speech did not explore even the possibility of developing a framework for an eventual political solution. The search for a political solution would require a serious dialogue about a joint American-Iraqi decision regarding the eventual date of a U.S. withdrawal with all genuine Iraqi political leaders who command respect and wield physical power. The majority of the Iraqi people, opinion polls show, favor such a withdrawal within a relatively short period. A jointly set date would facilitate an effort to engage all of Iraq's neighbors in a serious discussion about regional security and stability. The U.S. refusal to explore the possibility of talks with Iran and Syria is a policy of self-ostracism that fits well into the administration's diplomatic style of relying on sloganeering as a substitute for strategizing.

Â· The speech reflects a profound misunderstanding of our era. America is acting like a colonial power in Iraq. But the age of colonialism is over. Waging a colonial war in the post-colonial age is self-defeating. That is the fatal flaw of Bush's policy.

The writer, who was national security adviser to President Jimmy Carter, is the author of the forthcoming book "Second Chance: Three Presidents and the Crisis of American Superpower."

Criticism Comforts Enemy (USAT)

By Andrew C. Mccarthy And Clifford D. May

USA Today, January 12, 2007

Opponents of President Bush's plan for salvaging the dire situation in Iraq have every right to speak out. And those in Congress who believe it pointless to do anything other than accept defeat have the power to cut off funds.

But the President of the United States has rights and powers as well. He is the commander in chief, and his war-fighting abilities cannot be micro-managed. The president's critics also should consider how their words sound to those dispatching suicide bombers, planting roadside bombs and looking forward to the day they can burn down the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad on CNN and al-Jazeera.

DOJ_NMG_0115942

Skepticism about the new approach is widespread — and not just among Democrats. There are those who fear Bush is not committing enough troops to get the job done. Others worry that the administration's actions won't match Bush's rhetoric. Some say the plan relies too much on Iraqi officials and forces that have proven unreliable.

There are two logical responses: Propose a better way forward, or candidly call for the United States to accept defeat — without trying to spin that as "redeployment" or some other transparent euphemism.

In the end, we don't think most Democrats will want to be in the position of saying they support the troops in Iraq even as they hold back the reinforcements needed to complete their mission.

After the swift toppling of Saddam Hussein's regime, things got tougher. Some leading Democrats have tried to draw a distinction between the war in Iraq (a war they overwhelming favored at the start) and the wider war on terrorism. The distinction was never valid, and today it is less so than ever. Osama bin Laden himself regards Iraq as the central front in al-Qaeda's jihad.

There's no sugarcoating it: A defeat for the United States in Iraq would be a victory for our mortal enemies. It would lead to other defeats for U.S. forces on other battlefields. It would guarantee more terrorism and more dead American citizens.

So scrutinize and criticize, if you must. But then give us a plan to win. Our nation can accept nothing less.

Andrew C. McCarthy is a former federal prosecutor and director of the Foundation for Defense of Democracies' Center for Law & Counterterrorism. Clifford D. May is president of the FDD.

Make Them Fight All Of Us (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

I've heard the president's surge speech, and I have a reaction, an observation and some advice.

My reaction to the president's speech was to recall a line from Bill Maher's book about the war against terrorists: "Make them fight all of us."

Mr. President, you want a surge? I'll surge. I'll surge on the condition that you once and for all enlist the entire American people in this war effort, and stop putting it all on the shoulders of 130,000 military families, and now 20,000 more. I'll surge on the condition that you make them fight all of us — and that means a real energy policy, with a real gasoline tax, that ends our addiction to oil, shrinks the flow of petro-dollars to bad actors and makes America the world's leader in conservation.

But please, Mr. President, stop insulting our intelligence by telling us that this is the "decisive ideological struggle of our time," but we're going to put the whole burden of victory on 150,000 U.S. soldiers. Yes, you're right, confronting violent Islamic radicalism by trying to tilt Iraq and the Arab-Muslim world onto a more progressive track is indeed hugely important. But the way you have fought this war — with our pinky — is contemptible. For three years you would not summon the military means to back your lofty ends.

That led to a vacuum. The Sunnis, who refused to accept majority rule by Shiites, went on a murderous rampage, and that rampage has now metastasized into five different wars in Iraq: Sunnis against Shiites; Sunnis and Shiites against the U.S. "occupiers"; Al Qaeda against the U.S.; Shiite theocratic thugs against ordinary Shiites; and Iran, Syria and all the Arab autocrats against any kind of democratic, Shiite-led Iraq that could be a model for their own people.

Hence my observation: The notion that the only war in Iraq now is good guys versus terrorists is ludicrous. There is no center in Iraq. And when there is no center and you put in more troops, you end up supporting a side. (See Lebanon: 1982)

And now for the advice. At this 11th hour, with Iraq's sectarian fires raging, the only way more U.S. troops might bring stability is if you add two missing elements: a deadline and a floor.

You need to tell Iraqis that by calling for a surge in troops you're giving them one last chance to reconcile, otherwise we're gone by Dec. 1. And you need to tell Americans that you're creating a $45-a-barrel floor price for imported oil, so investors can safely finance alternatives without worrying that they'll be undercut by OPEC.

By not setting a hard date to leave Iraq, we are only putting a floor under bad behavior and allowing Iraqi leaders to pay wholesale, not retail, for their tribal politics. If Sunnis or Shiites want it "all" in Iraq, they have to pay for it all.

Of course, just leaving would be bad for us and terrible for those Iraqis who have worked with us. We need to give them all U.S. passports. We have a moral responsibility to them. But it would also be bad for a lot of bad people. They would be left to fight it out with each other. And yes, Syria and Iran would "win" Iraq — meaning they'd win the responsibility of managing the mess there or have it spill over on them. Have a nice day.

And by not setting a hard floor price for oil to promote alternative energy, we are only helping to subsidize bad governance by Arab leaders toward their people and bad behavior by Americans toward the climate.

DOJ_NMG_0115943

Make them fight all of us, Mr. President, or don't do it at all! If we made ourselves energy independent, we would bring down global oil prices, which would not only shrink the resources for mischief by our enemies and limit Saudi Arabia's ability to transform Islam all over the world into its most intolerant Wahhabi form, but also, more important, would force the Arab world to reform. It would force Arab leaders, including Iraqis, to organize their societies in ways that would tap their people, not just their oil wells — whether our troops were there or not. Also, if the rest of the world saw all of us sacrificing to win this war, we might actually be able to enlist them to help a little.

More troops alone will not suffice. The only tiny hope left of transforming Iraq is if its leaders have to pay the full retail price of their passions and we have to pay the full retail price of our oil. And if even that won't work, then setting a date and setting an oil price will extract us from this disaster and make us less vulnerable to the madness we leave behind.

If we fail in Iraq, at least let America be stronger — by being energy independent — the morning after.

Wisdom From Down The Chain Of Command (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

Rep. Chet Edwards, a middle-of-the-road Texas Democrat who numbers President Bush among his constituents, did not judge the commander in chief's words about Iraq on Wednesday night through the lens of his party affiliation or personal predispositions.

His standard was set by an Army officer who sent the congressman a powerfully honest, thoughtful and sophisticated 3,800-word memo based on the soldier's experiences in Iraq.

With eloquence and urgency, the officer -- Edwards said he agreed not to disclose his identity -- showed how the most important battles in Iraq are not military but political. The officer worries that, despite the heroic efforts of our troops, this aspect of the mission is not going well.

After receiving the soldier's permission, Edwards shared the memo with me on the day of the president's speech. The congressman was not trying to score political points, especially since his informant accepts the goals of the war and writes not a critical word about the president.

Rather, Edwards, who chairs the appropriations subcommittee that deals with military construction and veterans affairs and who represented Fort Hood for 13 years, believes that "younger soldiers, both commissioned and non-commissioned," can often provide more candid testimony than higher-ups constrained in their ability to present "bad news."

For this officer, winning entails getting the politics right in Iraq at both the local and national levels. Locally, he says, our military has enjoyed considerable success. But he's worried about the will and capacity of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to take on the Shiite militias.

"Our real goal," he wrote, "was to persuade our Iraqi friends and allies to actively and publicly support us . . . to help us tip the balance of public opinion in our favor." That meant helping them with security and "civil works projects" and giving them "prestige by showing publicly that our commander listened to their advice."

Then these shrewd words: "We discovered that we were not fighting a military campaign, but a political campaign -- not too different from what a small town mayor might do to win reelection back in the U.S. . . . Fighting terrorists was only something we did when needed, because it interfered with our political objectives. If we could ignore the terrorists, we were winning. If we had to stop our economic and political activities in order to fight terrorists, they were winning."

The core problem, the officer said, lay in the unwillingness of Shiites in the Iraqi security forces to confront their own side. "Most officers did a great job when facing Sunni-based insurgents," he wrote. "In fact, we had to keep a close eye on most units to make sure they were not too heavy-handed against the Sunnis."

On the other hand: "When we dealt with the Shia, especially the Mahdi militia, things got a lot more complicated. Many officers were reluctant to fight the Shia militias because they had a well-justified fear for the security of their family. I have seen senior Iraqi officers flat refuse to follow American soldiers in pursuit of Shia insurgents -- even when those insurgents just killed their own soldiers."

The trouble goes all the way to the top. "We will never reach any kind of acceptable political settlement as long as the Coalition and the Iraqi government allow legitimate political parties to hold seats in the National Assembly while they finance and maintain military auxiliary wings that attack and kill Iraqi and American soldiers. These parties have enough clout in PM Maliki's administration to effectively block any major military operation against the militias. This is an impossible situation.

"I don't have the expertise to comment on whether or not a temporary 'troop surge' is necessary," he said. "I can say, however, that a troop surge is pointless if we cannot set the political conditions beforehand that allow us to act freely against the militia."

DOJ_NMG_0115944

In other words, the success of Bush's new plan hangs on whether he is right in putting our troops behind the idea that Maliki heads a "unity government" and not an administration actually dedicated to Shiite dominance.

The officer concluded that he has "no idea how the American expedition in Iraq will end."

"I doubt it will end well," he wrote. "But I do hope that the courage and civility of the American soldiers who fought there will not be forgotten both here and in Iraq." Amen.

If Iraq does not end well, our men and women in uniform will not get the blame. The fault will lie with leaders in Washington who failed to face the politics of the situation as squarely as this soldier has.

postchat@aol.com

Thinking War-War Again (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

Listening to George W. Bush announce his fantasy-based escalation of the war in Iraq, which could only make sense in some parallel universe where pigs fly and fish commute on bicycles, I flashed on something Bush's hero Winston Churchill once said: "A fanatic is one who can't change his mind and won't change the subject." By that standard, President Bush is no fanatic.

True, he scores off the charts on the part about inflexibility of mind. But the Decider changes the subject all the time. First, the way to fight the "war on terror" was to invade Afghanistan, where the Taliban regime was sheltering Osama bin Laden and al-Qaeda. Before finishing that job, Bush decided to invade Iraq, which had nothing to do with al-Qaeda or the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. And now, with Iraq mired in bloody chaos, he seems to be changing the subject yet again -- to Iran.

I won't spend much time on the president's new "strategy" for Iraq, because at best it's a modest change in tactics -- tragically, one that further plunges U.S. forces into the kind of urban warfare in which insurgents and guerrillas always have the advantage. The battle of Baghdad promises to look like the battle of Fallujah writ large, and it promises to solve nothing. In the end, Bush still has to depend on the Iraqi "unity" government to end the sectarian civil war, but it's clear that the Shiite-dominated regime will do no such thing as long as the Shiites are winning.

On the shift to Iran, I hope I'm wrong but fear I'm right. In his speech Wednesday night, Bush went out of his way to lay out the goal of "stabilizing the region in the face of extremist challenges," specifying that this new task "begins with addressing Iran and Syria."

Of course, he doesn't mean addressing them with tough-minded diplomacy, which is what the Iraq Study Group suggested. Bush decided long ago that talking to regimes he doesn't like amounts to rewarding bad people for bad behavior. However dangerous a world this reckless president leaves behind for his successor, at least we can be thankful that he wasn't anywhere near the White House during the Cold War. He probably would have disconnected the hotline to the Kremlin, or at least kept Leonid Brezhnev on permanent hold.

"Iran is providing material support for attacks on American troops," Bush said. "We will disrupt the attacks on our forces."

Those words had hardly escaped his lips when U.S. forces stormed an Iranian government office in Irbil, a city in the Kurdish region of Iraq, and hauled away five Iranian staff members regardless of their diplomatic status. Local Kurdish officials apparently were not told in advance of the raid, which looked as if it were meant to underscore the president's point -- or even provoke an intemperate reaction from Tehran.

Bush also mentioned that he has sent a second aircraft carrier group to the Persian Gulf region. The USS John C. Stennis, with its attendant mini-fleet, is on its way to join the USS Dwight D. Eisenhower. That's generally known as gunboat diplomacy.

All this comes shortly after someone leaked to the Sunday Times of London that Israeli pilots are busy training for a mission to destroy Iran's key nuclear facilities with "bunker-busting" low-yield nuclear weapons. The Israeli government promptly denied the story, but not without adding that somebody had better bring an end to Iran's nuclear program, and soon. That somebody could only be the United States.

Meanwhile, much about Iran's nuclear program -- and about the country's intentions -- remains unknown. Experts disagree on how much success the Iranians are having in their uranium enrichment program and on how close they are to actually being able to build a nuclear bomb -- estimates range from two to 10 years. We're not even sure where all the key nuclear facilities are or how hardened they are against attack.

As cynical as I am about this administration, it's hard for me to imagine that at this point, with all the push-back he's getting from Congress and the public about escalating American involvement in Iraq, George W. Bush would even think about launching a new military adventure in Iran. But you have to worry about a president who talks so much about the judgment of history and who has such a Manichaean view of the world.

I have the sinking feeling that he's never heard another famous Churchill quote: "To jaw-jaw is always better than to war-war."

DOJ_NMG_0115945

Tears Are Shed At The White House For A Marine's Bravery In Iraq (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 — In April 2004, Cpl. Jason L. Dunham, an ordinary recruit from a small town in upstate New York, did something extraordinary: he threw himself on a grenade to shield two men in his unit as they battled insurgents on a road in Iraq.

On Thursday, President Bush gave Corporal Dunham, who was 22 when he died, the Medal of Honor, the nation's highest military award, presenting it to his mother and father in a somber East Room ceremony attended by his relatives and friends.

In an interview on Tuesday, as she was preparing to make the six-hour trip to Washington for the ceremony, Corporal Dunham's mother, Debra, said she wished her son could "receive it himself." "But we will receive it for him, and he will be watching us do that," she said.

Corporal Dunham, who was a rifle squad leader in the Marines, is the second soldier to receive the medal for service in the current war in Iraq. Prior to that, the 1993 conflict in Mogadishu, Somalia, was the last to produce Medal of Honor recipients; two Delta Army Force soldiers died protecting a downed helicopter pilot there in actions later depicted in the movie "Black Hawk Down."

In presenting the award to the Dunhams, President Bush, who on Wednesday night told the nation he would send 20,000 additional troops to Iraq, cited Corporal Dunham's uncommon valor and said that he "gave his own life so that the men under his command might live."

The president shed tears during the ceremony.

"He was the guy who signed on for an extra two months in Iraq so he could stay with his squad," President Bush said. "As he explained it, he wanted to make sure that everyone makes it home alive. Corporal Dunham took that promise seriously and would give his own life to make it good."

Corporal Dunham's story is of a young man from a little-known town called Scio, about 80 miles southeast of Buffalo, who saw the military not just as a way to serve the country but also as an opportunity to pay for college.

He had just enrolled at a college near his battalion's base in Twentynine Palms, Calif., before being deployed to Iraq, where his actions placed him in a "select group" of the nation's military heroes, as President Bush put it on Thursday.

Mr. Bush approved Corporal Dunham's nomination for the medal in November, ending a two-year process that required his commanding officers to investigate his actions in battle.

Since the medal was created during the Civil War, it has been bestowed on more than 3,400 soldiers, sailors, airmen, marines and coast guardsmen, according to the Congressional Medal of Honor Society in Mount Pleasant, S.C.

While recipients include the likes of Theodore Roosevelt (for his charge up San Juan Hill in the Spanish-American War), it was not entirely an elite medal at first. But the requirements were tightened and only slightly more than 840 medals have been awarded since World War II.

In his hometown of Scio, with a population of about 2,000, Corporal Dunham was considered an accomplished athlete in high school. His batting average in a single season, .414, still stands as a local league record.

His mother, a teacher, said that he was quietly generous and that she learned of one of his acts of kindness only after he had died. In a letter, a childhood friend described how Corporal Dunham went out of his way to console her when other children taunted her on a bus ride home.

"All he did was sit with her on the bus," his mother recalled. "He had a quiet way about doing the right thing."

After joining the Marines, he was chosen at 22 to become a squad leader with Kilo Company, Third Battalion, Seventh Marine Regiment in September 2003. His mother said he had wanted to continue his college education and also to take the New York State Police entrance exam once he returned from Iraq.

But the events of April 14, 2004, changed everything. That day, Corporal Dunham and his men were in the town of Karabilah, near the Syrian border, when they received reports that insurgents had ambushed a marine convoy. Corporal Dunham and his men boarded Humvees and headed toward the area, where they spotted a convoy of cars filled with Iraqis fleeing, according to various accounts.

The patrol led by Corporal Dunham stopped the Iraqi convoy and began inspecting the vehicles for weapons. As Corporal Dunham inspected one vehicle, a man jumped out and grabbed him by the throat. Two other marines ran over to subdue the attacker, who dropped a grenade, according to the accounts. It was then that Corporal Dunham made a fateful decision: he threw his Kevlar helmet and held it down over the grenade. He died a few days later from his wounds .

In addition to his mother and his father, Daniel, Corporal Dunham is survived by two brothers and a sister: Justin, 23, Kyle, 18, and Katelyn, 14. For a family still deeply in grief, the award presented on Thursday seemed to bring some measure of relief.

DOJ_NMG_0115946

"He will be recognized and memorialized in history," his mother said. "He is in the company of remarkable men."

A 2-Month White House Debate On Iraq, Capped By 'the Big Push' (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg, David E. Sanger And Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 — Even before the November elections, President Bush and his national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, were informally discussing what Mr. Hadley was calling "the big push" — whether it made sense to make a show of increased American force in Baghdad to take back the city.

But when Mr. Hadley traveled to Iraq in late October, the commander there, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., repeated his frequent warning that to send more troops to Iraq could be counterproductive, because it might make the Iraqi government less likely to defend itself. By the time Mr. Bush met Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki in Jordan on Nov. 30, Mr. Maliki was insisting upon taking control over all Iraqi troops and urging the Americans to withdraw to the outskirts of his capital.

Over the past two months those diametrically opposed options — adding American troops, or pulling back to let the Iraqi factions fight it out — marked the boundaries of a vigorous debate inside the Bush administration. At one point, as Mr. Bush, Mr. Hadley, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the newly appointed secretary of defense, Robert M. Gates, weighed their options, the president asked his deputies, in effect: "Why can't we just pull out of Baghdad and let the factions fight it out themselves?"

Ultimately, the president and his advisers came back to the idea of adding American troops — the new approach they concluded was the best of a series of difficult choices, according to a senior administration official involved in the process.

A narrative pieced together from interviews with participants and from public testimony suggests that through much of the process, generals who had been on the ground in Iraq during the past year had favored that the new strategy begin with a substantially smaller force than the one that President Bush announced to the nation on Wednesday night. In the end, it was Mr. Bush who appeared to drive his commanders along to the conclusion that more troops were needed.

In an appearance before Congress on Thursday, Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, confirmed that General Casey had requested only two new American brigades, about 9,000 troops, for Baghdad, along with three Iraqi brigades. The White House gave him five brigades. Gen. John P. Abizaid, who heads the Central Command, was opposed to any increase in American troop levels until mid-November, when he became convinced that the economic commitments by both Iraq and the United States made it worth adding troops.

White House officials were clearly sensitive on Thursday about any suggestions that the president countermanded his generals, and said his new plan had their full support. They said the generals sought and received assurances that the Iraqis would undertake political initiatives and end the practice of releasing militia figures who were friends of the government and captured by American or Iraqi forces.

In public comments before the elections, Mr. Bush resisted calls for troop increases from some of his own supporters, saying his generals saw no such need. During an interview session with conservative columnists in September, Mr. Bush said: "If General Casey feels like he needs more troops, we'll send them," according to a transcript posted by The National Review. Asked by an interviewer, "What if he's wrong?" Mr. Bush shot back, "Then I picked the wrong general."

Still far ahead of Election Day, Mr. Bush had decided to oust Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld. Mr. Rumsfeld was seen by people inside and outside the administration as opposed to a major change. "It was clear Rumsfeld was committed to the strategy that he had employed from the beginning," Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, said. Several officials inside and outside the administration said Mr. Rumsfeld's departure on Nov. 8 helped to empower Mr. Hadley, along with his deputy at the National Security Council, Jack D. Crouch, as they ran the review process inside the White House. Both said they considered many options. But Mr. Hadley was clearly focused on troop levels early on, suggesting in a Nov. 8 memorandum that the president should ask the Pentagon and General Casey to recommend whether more forces were needed in Baghdad.

Mr. Hadley believed from the start of the review that the administration's approach through much of 2006 — that political reconciliation would lead to stability — was not working. "You have this Catch-22 element," Mr. Hadley said in a conversation in his office before he took his late-October trip to Baghdad. "You can't have security without political and economic progress, but it's hard to have political and economic progress without security."

One senior official involved in the discussions said that Mr. Bush's instinct toward the start of the review process — and that of others — was to consider a withdrawal from Baghdad, allow Iraqi-vs.-Iraqi fighting to settle itself, and dedicate United States forces to focus on pursuing Qaeda fighters. "As you peel that back and look at it, it just doesn't war-game out for you," said the official. "You're supposed to go flying through Baghdad looking for Al Qaeda, and when you see ethnic cleansing going on look the other way?"

DOJ_NMG_0115947

In the end, the official said, Mr. Hadley's teams concluded that an American withdrawal from Baghdad would "crater the government."

Another option discussed was to try to steer the Iraqi government toward a political realignment that would essentially depose Mr. Maliki, and put a stronger figure in place. By elimination, those discussions led Mr. Bush's top advisers back to the idea of a troop increase. According to an account by one senior official, General Pace traveled to Crawford, Tex., to meet with Mr. Bush after Christmas and took with him a recommendation calling for two more American brigades in Baghdad, with three more American brigades on call, along with two additional American battalions for Anbar.

According to a senior administration official, Vice President Dick Cheney was among those who wanted a bigger force. Ultimately, Mr. Bush concluded that General Pace's initial request was too small and should be augmented by three more American brigades for Baghdad. General Pace said that General Abizaid, who is retiring this year, had opposed the idea of a troop increase. But General Abizaid came around, General Pace said, when he saw that the additional American combat forces would be accompanied by a "political and economic surge."

New Strategy Vindicates Ex-Army Chief Shinseki (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 — After President Bush told the nation on Wednesday night that he was ordering a rapid increase of American forces in Iraq, Gen. Eric K. Shinseki was not among the retired officers to offer instant analysis on television.

But the president's new strategy, with its explicit acknowledgment that not enough troops had been sent to Iraq to establish control, was a vindication for General Shinseki, who as Army chief of staff publicly told Congress as much just before the war began in 2003.

First vilified, then marginalized by the Bush administration after those comments, General Shinseki retired and faded away, even as lawmakers, pundits and politicians increasingly cited his prescience.

"We never had enough troops to begin with," Senator Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, said just before the president's televised address. "A month or two ago we found out the Army is broken, and they agreed that General Shinseki was right."

Gen. John P. Abizaid, the departing commander of American forces in the Middle East, told Congress late last year, "General Shinseki was right that a greater international force contribution, U.S. force contribution and Iraqi force contribution should have been available immediately after major combat operations."

In his prime-time address on Wednesday, even President Bush said the main reason past efforts to stabilize Baghdad had failed was that "there were not enough Iraqi and American troops to secure neighborhoods that had been cleared of terrorists and insurgents."

The acknowledgment was far different from the harsh administration rebuttals after General Shinseki electrified Washington with his blunt warning that victory in Iraq would require more troops than were being deployed for the invasion.

He was the target of immediate rebuke from the Pentagon leadership, in particular from Donald H. Rumsfeld, then secretary of defense, and his deputy, Paul D. Wolfowitz. Mr. Wolfowitz dismissed the testimony as "wildly off the mark."

Some civilians in government and military officers say General Shinseki's treatment intimidated other top officers.

"It sent a very clear signal to the military leadership about how that kind of military judgment was going to be valued," said Kori Schake, the director for defense strategy on the National Security Council staff from 2002 to 2005, now a fellow at the Hoover Institution and a professor at West Point. "So it served to silence critics just at the point in time when, internal to the process, you most wanted critical judgment."

General Shinseki has kept a strict public silence since retiring in June 2003 and would often say to his associates, "I do not want to criticize while my soldiers are still bleeding and dying in Iraq."

He now splits his time between his suburban Washington home and his native Hawaii, consulting with academic organizations, private companies and military support groups. He declined to comment for this article.

"This is a man who is totally loyal to the Army, which was his life," said David R. Gergen, director of the Center for Public Leadership at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government. Mr. Gergen works with General Shinseki on the center's advisory board, and the general regularly meets with students there.

"General Shinseki draws an enormous crowd, especially of former and active-duty military," said Mr. Gergen, who was an adviser to Presidents Nixon, Ford, Reagan and Clinton. "They hold General Shinseki in awe."

"He has been very discreet in his comments about what happened," Mr. Gergen added. "Just as he has been in public, he is reluctant in private to say anything that would disparage the commander in chief."

DOJ_NMG_0115948

The general, who throughout his career was known for his selfless, or at least self-effacing, bearing, did not go before Congress on that day in February 2003 planning to stir things up. But he is also not one who backs down easily; he had risen to the top of the Army after surviving grievous injury in Vietnam, and under withering cross-examination by Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan, he spoke matter-of-factly.

"Something on the order of several hundred thousand soldiers are probably, you know, a figure that would be required" to stabilize Iraq after an invasion, he said.

"We're talking about post-hostilities control over a piece of geography that's fairly significant, with the kinds of ethnic tensions that could lead to other problems," he added. "And so it takes a significant ground force presence to maintain a safe and secure environment, to ensure that people are fed, that water is distributed, all the normal responsibilities that go along with administering a situation like this."

His comments brought to a boil long-simmering tensions with Mr. Rumsfeld, who had been scrubbing the war plans to reduce the number of invading troops. And they were politically explosive, coming less than a month before the start of the war, which proponents were saying confidently would be anything but a quagmire.

Former aides to the general said his estimate summarized back-of-the-envelope calculations but had been based on experiences as a commander in postwar Bosnia, where the United States sent 50,000 troops to quiet five million people, a population one-fifth that of Iraq. American troops in Iraq reached a peak of more than 160,000 in December 2005. There are now about 132,000.

General Shinseki was not fired for his comments, but his influence as a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff certainly was never the same. He retired as scheduled.

During a House Armed Services Committee hearing on Thursday, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs, was asked specifically why General Shinseki's recommendation of more troops had not been adopted, and he replied: "General Shinseki was not advocating for that number as an answer. He gave that as a guesstimate of what it might take. So I just want to put that in historical context."

Some critics say General Shinseki should have spoken out more after his Senate testimony, and others ask why he did not resign to protest the war plan if he thought it would not assure victory. Even in retirement he declined to join the so-called generals' revolt of retired officers calling for Mr. Rumsfeld to resign last year.

These days, Army officers are pointing to another instance of his impolitic remarks coming true years later.

In his retirement speech, General Shinseki warned against trying to carry out a "12-division strategy" with a "10-division army," counsel that the Pentagon's leaders rejected.

In his speech on Wednesday night, Mr. Bush vowed "to increase the size of the active Army and Marine Corps, so that America has the armed forces we need for the 21st century." That, too, could be heard as an affirmation of the general's long-held view.

It May Be Too Late To Secure Baghdad's Mix (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2007

BAGHDAD — Mohammed Rubaie, 28, is the sort of person President Bush's new Baghdad security plan was designed to protect. But for him and his neighbors and many like them across this city, the plan comes months too late.

One of the chief rationales for sending five additional U.S. brigades to Baghdad is to secure the city's mixed neighborhoods, U.S. military planners say. If residents feel they are safe in their homes, they will no longer turn to sectarian militias to protect them, the strategists argue.

But many of the districts that U.S. planners might have wanted to protect already have been taken over by sectarian gunmen and their allies. Formerly mixed areas, including Rubaie's Hurriya neighborhood, have been transformed by fear and violence. Standing in their place are militantly sectarian communities, their borders hardened by concrete barriers and vigilante-run checkpoints.

Hurriya, where Rubaie was born and grew up, was one of those mixed neighborhoods — a place in Baghdad's northwestern corner where Sunni Arabs and Shiite Muslims lived in relative peace.

But this fall, the militias saw to it that Hurriya would no longer be mixed. One harrowing October night, "there were two gunmen dressed in black, with the police backing them up. They were saying, 'Sunnis, you should leave now. It's the last warning to you all. We're going to burn your houses one by one,' " Rubaie said.

"When our neighbor's house was burned, I felt it was time for us to leave," he added.

DOJ_NMG_0115949

Rubaie's family joined a widening flood of Baghdad residents who have abandoned their home districts as the violence between Shiite militiamen and Sunni insurgents has reshaped Baghdad's neighborhoods. In many cases, U.S. officials say, violent sectarian "cleansing" has been abetted by elements of the Iraqi security forces.

The violence has tilted the demographics of some neighborhoods from one sect to the other. In other neighborhoods, it has consolidated sectarian populations and hardened religious boundaries.

Lines are shifting

The United Nations estimates that at least 300,000 Baghdad residents have fled the country since 2003, when the capital's population was approximately 6 million people.

In the last 11 months, since the February bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra triggered Iraq's plunge into civil war, about 60,000 Baghdad residents have left their homes for other neighborhoods within the city, according to the Iraqi Ministry of Migration and Displacement.

In the last year, the lines dividing Sunnis from Shiites in Baghdad have shifted steadily to the west — deep into what was formerly the center of the city's Sunni population.

As recently as last summer, many people here considered the Tigris River, which snakes through the center of the capital, a rough boundary between the predominantly Sunni west bank and the largely Shiite east side. But Shiite militias, who are widely believed to have seized the advantage in Baghdad, have pushed the battle lines across the river into places such as Hurriya. By contrast, Sunni fighters have been unable to sustain advances into east Baghdad.

"They're both taking territory from each other, but the Shiites have the upper hand in Baghdad because of Sadr's movement," said a U.S. advisor, referring to radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr's Al Mahdi army, a powerful militia. "They're very aggressively taking over areas and putting Shiite families into Sunni homes," said the advisor, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the matter publicly.

The militias are often backed up by sectarian elements within Iraq's security forces. U.S. officials said they hoped that the infusion of new troops would halt sectarian sweeps, but acknowledged that in the meantime, the fighting was likely to get worse.

"Both sides are solidifying their ground right now," the advisor said.

The list of neighborhoods that have been subjected to sectarian cleansing is long. In recent months, Sunnis have pushed Shiite families out of some neighborhoods west of the Tigris, including Yarmouk and Mansour.

Shiites have pushed Sunnis out of a longer list of neighborhoods in central Baghdad, including Babil and Riyadh. They also now dominate the Karada district, which was once heavily Christian.

Shiite militiamen have also struck deep into west Baghdad, taking over neighborhoods such as Jihad, which was recently a majority Sunni area.

U.S. advisors say the best they can hope for with Bush's new plan is to stop future sectarian cleansing campaigns and hold Baghdad's skewed demographics as they are, leaving restoration of abandoned, plundered and commandeered homes and neighborhoods for another day.

The balkanization of Baghdad's neighborhoods also raises the specter of future clashes if residents who have been cast out decide to return and retake their domiciles.

A domino effect

The Sunni exodus from Hurriya illustrates the dynamics of sectarian cleansing. When Shiite fighters pushed out the Sunni residents, the residents fled south into the nearby community of Adil, where Sunnis already were in the majority, and drove out that neighborhood's Shiites.

"The displaced from Hurriya tried to create problems and displace Shiites in Adil," said Adnan Dulaimi, a Sunni Arab member of parliament. When Dulaimi played host to peace negotiations with local Shiites at a mosque, five mortar rounds struck the building and derailed the talks.

Sheik Mahmoud abu Abdullah, a spokesman for the Muslim Scholars Assn., a hard-line Sunni clerical group, said the Shiites have been so successful in their assaults because they constitute the majority in Baghdad and have the backing of Iraqi security forces.

"First the militias raid a Sunni area, conduct assassinations, kidnappings," he said. "Then when the people resist, they distribute threatening pamphlets in the area. If pamphlets don't work, the Iraqi security forces come in."

Baghdad City Councilman Siyyid Yacoub Bukhati said commandos in one predominantly Shiite neighborhood in west Baghdad removed checkpoints recently to allow sectarian fighters into the district.

"A few days ago, six to seven cars full of gunmen came in and started shooting and told six houses of Sunnis to leave the area," Bukhati said. "The main reason this happens is because the security forces are weak and unwilling to apply the law."

U.S. military officials have also complained that Iraqi security forces at times appear to be assisting sectarian militias. In a recent news briefing, Army Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, the day-to-day commander for operations in Iraq, said that an earlier

DOJ_NMG_0115950

Baghdad security plan called Operation Together Forward failed because sectarian elements within Iraq's security forces allowed abuses to occur.

The perceived complicity of Iraqi police and soldiers poses yet another problem for Bush's plan because the U.S. strategy calls for Iraqi security forces to supply 20,000 troops to assist in protecting Baghdad neighborhoods.

Many here say they have little faith in those forces.

"In our neighborhood, the militias try to kidnap Sunnis from their houses," said Abu Abdullah Maslawi, a resident of the Mansour neighborhood. "If the militias fail, the police come and arrest the people who fired at the militias. Now families are even resisting the police, because they believe they are the same as the militias."

Bush Stands Alone With 'new Way Forward' (FT)

By Ed Luce In Washington

Financial Times, January 12, 2007

President George W. Bush on Thursday cut an increasingly lonely and embattled figure as opposition Democrats and fellow Republicans greeted his "new way forward" in Iraq with a barrage of denunciation.

Although Tony Blair, the UK prime minister, said that Mr Bush's plan to send a further 21,500 troops to Iraq "made sense", the US president appeared more isolated than ever before. Republicans pointed to the fact that Mr Bush's address came as the UK plans to announce by the end of next month the withdrawal of about 2,600 troops from Iraq.

"Why is it just the United States that is shouldering this?" said Lisa Murkowski, a Republican senator. "Why is Great Britain withdrawing? Why are we the only ones that are moving forward with this new plan?"

Republican senators who publicly opposed Mr Bush's plan included Norm Coleman of Minnesota and Sam Brownback – both of whom have traditionally backed the White House – in addition to a growing list of Republicans facing 2008 election campaigns.

This show of Republican opposition prompted comparisons with Richard Nixon during the Vietnam era.

"Republican support for the president is draining rapidly," said a party strategist. "It is almost unheard of for Republicans to criticise a Republican president at war so soon after he has made an appeal for support."

Democrat leaders were scathing in their response, accusing Mr Bush of having betrayed his promise of bipartisanship following the Republican defeat in midterm elections last November.

Chris Dodd, a Democrat presidential hopeful, accused the Bush administration of living in a "fool's paradise". Joe Biden, another Democrat presidential candidate, called Mr Bush's troop "surge" a "big mistake".

There is little Congress can do to prevent the president from conducting the war in the manner he wishes but Democrats are considering symbolic legislation that would rebuke Mr Bush's Iraq strategy.

"The president could find himself so isolated so quickly that he would be forced to fundamentally revise his strategy in Iraq, which he has not done," said Zbigniew Brzezinski, a national security adviser under former president Jimmy Carter. "My real fear is that a president who is backed into a corner and prone to demagoguery will listen to the neoconservatives and expand this war to Iran or Syria."

Polls on Thursday showed an overwhelming majority of Americans opposing Mr Bush's troop "surge".

"This administration took a gamble [by going to war in Iraq]," said Barack Obama, a potential Democrat presidential candidate. "It staked American prestige on the premise that it could overthrow a dictator and bring democracy to Iraq. It appears that gamble has failed."

Stephen Hess, a former Nixon administration official, said Mr Bush was unlikely to be derailed from his chosen course in Iraq.

Several In GOP Hit Bush 'Blunder' (WT)

By Charles Hurt And Jon Ward

The Washington Times, January 12, 2007

Republican leaders on Capitol Hill staunchly back President Bush's proposal to boost troop levels in Iraq but support among the party's rank and file may be crumbling.

"At this late stage, interjecting more young American troops into the crossfire of an Iraqi civil war is simply not the right approach," Rep. Ric Keller, a Florida Republican who has been steadfastly supportive of the war, said on the House floor yesterday. "We are not going to solve an Iraqi political problem with an American military solution."

Sen. Chuck Hagel, Nebraska Republican, predicted that the plan would be "the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in the country since Vietnam -- if it is carried out."

DOJ_NMG_0115951

"I think what [Mr. Bush has] decided to do is both courageous and correct," Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, told reporters yesterday. "It strikes me, in listening to the critics emerging already, that the president can't win either way. Before he changed directions, he was being criticized. And now that he's changing directions, he's being criticized."

Mr. McConnell yesterday hinted that Senate Republicans would filibuster any resolution by Democrats expressing disapproval of the war in Iraq or Mr. Bush's plan to add more than 21,000 troops to the battlefield.

"Congress is completely incapable of dictating the tactics in a war," he said, adding that if Democrats are so unhappy, they should cut off funding.

"What they want to do, apparently, is to leave," Mr. McConnell said. "And there is only one effective device of Congress that can be employed to bring about that result, and that opportunity will be provided when the supplemental appropriation comes up in February. If they want to cut off money for the troops, that's the time to do it."

Opposition to their commander in chief appears to be considerable, especially for a conference that has been overwhelmingly supportive of the Bush administration for the past six years. However, it is unlikely that there is much Republican congressional critics can or will do to alter the president's military plans in Iraq.

An informal survey by The Washington Times yesterday, for instance, found nine Senate Republicans who have "doubts" about Mr. Bush's proposal, and seven who reject it. Eleven other senators expressed conditional support.

Twenty-one Republican senators offered unqualified support. Only Sen. Wayne Allard, Colorado Republican, did not respond to requests for comment.

Mr. Bush went into his Wednesday speech with opinion polls showing strong disapproval of his handling of Iraq, and initial reaction suggests he didn't sway many voters.

"When you've got a 30 percent overall rating, you've got a credibility problem," said pollster John Zogby, who said Mr. Bush needed to "hit a grand slam home run" Wednesday to earn back public confidence, and didn't.

"At best, he presented a solution that was one of several bad alternatives, and the one that polls at least, and I'm just a public opinion guy, that polls show was the worst."

However, an ABC-Washington Post poll taken after the speech and released yesterday found Mr. Bush had gained some ground with Americans on his handling of Iraq overall, to reach 34 percent, or 7 percent higher than last month's survey. But asked about Mr. Bush's new plan, 61 percent said they oppose it.

Even among his strongest supporters in the Senate, Mr. Bush faces new scrutiny. "That's why you're seeing tougher and tougher questions being asked by us," said Sen. Saxby Chambliss, Georgia Republican.

Sen. Pat Roberts, Kansas Republican, called Mr. Bush's proposal "the only realistic choice given the regional instability and danger we face. But this support is not without limits."

Other Republicans were more critical of the president's proposal. Sen. Gordon H. Smith of Oregon called it Mr. Bush's "Hail Mary pass."

Sen. Norm Coleman, Minnesota Republican, said that "to put the lives of [more] Americans soldiers" into the Iraq conflict, "without first having something that's substantial, something we can point to, other than this sense of trust, other than looking someone in the eye, having a conversation. I'm not prepared, at this time, to support that. The cost is too great."

Many of the Republican senators criticizing the president yesterday are up for re-election in 2008, such as Mr. Hagel, Mr. Smith and Mr. Coleman. Mr. Hagel has hinted he may run for president.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, at a briefing with other Senate Democratic leaders, boasted that he could win over 12 Republicans to sign a nonbinding resolution opposing a troop increase.

Democrats say they hope to bring the resolution to a vote next week and confront Mr. Bush with official opposition from senators in his own party. "That will be the beginning of the end of the war in Iraq," Mr. Reid said.

The seven Republican senators who are openly opposed to sending more troops are Mr. Hagel, Mr. Smith, Mr. Coleman, Sen. Susan Collins of Maine, Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, Sen. Olympia J. Snowe of Maine and Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania.

The nine Republican senators who appear to be undecided, if not opposed, are Sen. Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, Sen. George V. Voinovich of Ohio, Sen. Bob Corker of Tennessee, Sen. Michael D. Crapo of Idaho, Sen. Richard G. Lugar of Indiana, Sen. Lisa Murkowski of Alaska, Sen. John E. Sununu of New Hampshire, Sen. John W. Warner of Virginia and Sen. David Vitter of Louisiana.

Convincing Still Required For Bush Iraq Plan (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115952

WASHINGTON — One day after President Bush unveiled his plan to send 21,500 additional U.S. troops to Iraq, administration officials today sought to convince a skeptical public and Congress that the strategy can work.

But Democratic leaders stood firmly opposed to the president's plan, lashing out at what they called "a tragic mistake" and talking about cutting off funds for the war.

"In choosing to escalate the war, the president virtually stands alone," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said in a statement today.

Skepticism to the plan is so widespread — Sen. Barak Obama (D-Ill.) likened the president's strategy to a gambler increasing the size of his bet to cover his previous losses — that even Republicans railed about the war.

Sen. George Voinovich (R-Ohio), who until now has supported the war, said he no longer believes the civil war in Iraq can be tamed by sending more U.S. troops to aid in the fight.

"We don't want any more American soldiers killed … in the name of civil war," he said, noting that the letter he sends to families of fallen soldiers now has to be rewritten, not to praise them for dying in a grand cause but in the name of security. "I've gone along with the president's dream," he said. "I just don't think it's going to happen."

Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.), questioning the Iraqi government's resolve to crack down on sectarian violence, asked, "Why put more Americans on the line now in hopes that this time they will make the right decision? Fooled twice, shame on me."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, testifying before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee today, said the administration is "clear-eyed, too, about the fact that the Iraqi government has to perform, and the fact that they haven't in the past."

She noted that stability in Iraq will take both resolve and capability.

"The president sees this as an effort to help the Iraqis with an urgent task so that sectarian violence does not outrun the political process," she said.

The president began the day by hailing the heroism of individual soldiers. Bush awarded the Medal of Honor posthumously to Marine Corps Cpl. Jason Dunham for falling on a grenade hurled by an Iraqi during an attack near the Syrian border.

"By his selflessness, Cpl. Dunham saved the lives of two of his men and showed the world what it means to be a Marine," Bush said in a White House ceremony attended by Dunham's family.

Defense Secretary Robert Gates, in an early morning news conference, said the number of American troops will be gradually raised in Iraq. "There will be no D-Day," Gates said. "It won't look like the Gulf War."

With Iraq putting increased stress on the U.S. military, Gates said he will recommend that Bush increase U.S. armed forces by 92,000 over the next five years — with 27,000 more Marines and 65,000 more soldiers.

Rice said that even as the Pentagon sends additional troops to the battlefield, diplomats will step up political and economic reconstruction efforts in Iraq. Naming Tim Carney, a former ambassador to Sudan and Haiti, to oversee the nonmilitary effort in the field, Rice told the Senate committee today that civilian reconstruction efforts in the Al Anbar province, a stronghold of insurgents, were having an effect.

"We in the State Department recognize the need for a diplomatic surge," she said. "We need to get diplomats out of the Green Zone, into Iraq."

Reaction to Rice's testimony in the committee room showed the administration's tough task in selling the plan for additional troops to the public and to Congress.

At one point during her testimony, a protester yelled out, "More lies…all lies…stop the lies!"

Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) told Rice that adding troops is "the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam" and challenged her assessment that the strategy was "an augmentation" rather than "an escalation" and that sectarian violence does not yet constitute a full-scale civil war.

Insisting that "not all of Baghdad has fallen into civil war," Rice said that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki understands he must gain control of extremists from both the Shia and Sunni sects.

Some in Congress defended the policy. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said today that the Bush plan may not guarantee success, but it's worth trying because the consequences of failure are greater.

"If we do fail," McCain said, "there is going to be chaos in the region and we will pay an even heavier price in American blood and treasure."

House Democratic leaders are considering bringing the issue of funding the war to a vote on the House floor.

McCain, a GOP presidential candidate, said Congress had the right to cut off funding but that "if the vote is successful, those who are proponents of it (must) assume responsibility for the consequences of failures."

During committee hearings and morning broadcast news shows, Democrats made clear they remain furious about the war and the president's attempt to expand the U.S. commitment to Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0115953

"We're not going to baby-sit a civil war," said Obama on NBC's "Today Show." On CBS' "Early Show," Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) said that with Democrats now in charge of both houses of Congress, "questions are now being asked of this administration that haven't been asked for almost four years."

At the start of a Senate committee meeting, Chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.) said Bush's strategy is "not a solution," adding that he believed the idea of sending more troops is "a tragic mistake."

One day after President Bush unveiled his plan to send 21,500 additional U.S. troops to Iraq, administration officials today sought to convince a skeptical public and Congress that the strategy can work.

But Democratic leaders stood firmly opposed to the president's plan, lashing out at what they called "a tragic mistake" and talking about cutting off funds for the war.

"In choosing to escalate the war, the president virtually stands alone," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said in a statement today.

Skepticism to the plan is so widespread — Sen. Barak Obama (D-Ill.) likened the president's strategy to a gambler increasing the size of his bet to cover his previous losses — that even Republicans railed about the war.

Sen. George Voinovich (R-Ohio), who until now has supported the war, said he no longer believes the civil war in Iraq can be tamed by sending more U.S. troops to aid in the fight.

"We don't want any more American soldiers killed … in the name of civil war," he said, noting that the letter he sends to families of fallen soldiers now has to be rewritten, not to praise them for dying in a grand cause but in the name of security. "I've gone along with the president's dream," he said. "I just don't think it's going to happen."

Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.), questioning the Iraqi government's resolve to crack down on sectarian violence, asked, "Why put more Americans on the line now in hopes that this time they will make the right decision? Fooled twice, shame on me."

Bush, speaking to troops today at Ft. Benning, Ga., defended his strategy, saying that the new plan will help Iraqis secure troubled neighborhoods and quell the sectarian violence that has crippled the nation.

What's more, Bush said, is that Prime Minister Nouri Maliki has promised to end "political interference," and that Bush in turn has promised "enough troops to clear, build and hold."

Saying "there is no doubt in my mind we will prevail," Bush added, "The purpose really is to crush these insurrections now, so that the democracy in Iraq can develop, has a chance to make it."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, testifying before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said the administration is "clear-eyed, too, about the fact that the Iraqi government has to perform, and the fact that they haven't in the past."

She noted that stability in Iraq will take both resolve and capability.

"The president sees this as an effort to help the Iraqis with an urgent task so that sectarian violence does not outrun the political process," she said.

The president began the day by hailing the heroism of individual soldiers. Bush awarded the Medal of Honor posthumously to Marine Corps Cpl. Jason Dunham for falling on a grenade hurled by an Iraqi during an attack near the Syrian border.

"By his selflessness, Cpl. Dunham saved the lives of two of his men and showed the world what it means to be a Marine," Bush said in a White House ceremony attended by Dunham's family.

Defense Secretary Robert Gates, in an early morning news conference, said the number of American troops will be gradually raised in Iraq. "There will be no D-Day," Gates said. "It won't look like the Gulf War."

With Iraq putting increased stress on the U.S. military, Gates said he will recommend that Bush increase U.S. armed forces by 92,000 over the next five years — with 27,000 more Marines and 65,000 more soldiers.

Rice said that even as the Pentagon sends additional troops to the battlefield, diplomats will step up political and economic reconstruction efforts in Iraq. Naming Tim Carney, a former ambassador to Sudan and Haiti, to oversee the nonmilitary effort in the field, Rice told the Senate committee today that civilian reconstruction efforts in the Al Anbar province, a stronghold of insurgents, were having an effect.

"We in the State Department recognize the need for a diplomatic surge," she said. "We need to get diplomats out of the Green Zone, into Iraq."

Reaction to Rice's testimony in the committee room showed the administration's tough task in selling the plan for additional troops to the public and to Congress.

At one point during her testimony, a protester yelled out, "More lies…all lies…stop the lies!"

Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) told Rice that adding troops is "the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam" and challenged her assessment that the strategy was "an augmentation" rather than "an escalation" and that sectarian violence does not yet constitute a full-scale civil war.

Insisting that "not all of Baghdad has fallen into civil war," Rice said that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki understands he must gain control of extremists from both the Shia and Sunni sects.

DOJ_NMG_0115954

Some in Congress defended the policy. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said today that the Bush plan may not guarantee success, but it's worth trying because the consequences of failure are greater.

"If we do fail," McCain said, "there is going to be chaos in the region and we will pay an even heavier price in American blood and treasure."

House Democratic leaders are considering bringing the issue of funding the war to a vote on the House floor.

McCain, a GOP presidential candidate, said Congress had the right to cut off funding but that "if the vote is successful, those who are proponents of it (must) assume responsibility for the consequences of failures."

During committee hearings and morning broadcast news shows, Democrats made clear they remain furious about the war and the president's attempt to expand the U.S. commitment to Iraq.

"We're not going to baby-sit a civil war," said Obama on NBC's "Today Show." On CBS' "Early Show," Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) said that with Democrats now in charge of both houses of Congress, "questions are now being asked of this administration that haven't been asked for almost four years."

At the start of a Senate committee meeting, Chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.) said Bush's strategy is "not a solution," adding that he believed the idea of sending more troops is "a tragic mistake."

That theme resonated throughout the morning as senators from both parties criticized the Bush administration for its failures in Iraq.

Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) berated Rice for "not listening to the American people." Reminding Rice that she will bear the personal agony of lost family members in Iraq, Boxer also noted that the British are withdrawing their troops from Iraq.

"We are all alone," Boxer said. "There is no other country standing with us in this escalation."

Obama, saying that Bush "took a gamble" and then kept "doubling down," argued that the administration should fix a date at which it would walk away.

"It seems as if the solution is always six months away," he said. "What leverage do we have to provide assurance that six months from now you will not be saying it didn't work … and we can't afford to fail?"

Rice replied that the administration is "not going to stay married to a plan that's not working in Baghdad if the Iraqis are not living up to" their end of the bargain.

Bush Bets Congress Will Have To Back Plan (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

FORT BENNING, Ga. -- As President Bush presses his latest Iraq strategy, he is gambling that the new Democratic Congress will give him the same broad discretion to prosecute the war that he has had for the past four years.

Yesterday, a wide number of Democrats and Republicans blasted the approach. White House officials calculate that Democrats will be stymied by practical problems, legislative maneuvering and internal divisions in their attempt to prevent the administration from sending 21,500 more soldiers -- and more money -- to Iraq.

"There are a lot of divisions among the Democrats, and you see them tiptoeing around it because they understand the consequences of such a vote," White House Counselor Dan Bartlett said during a trip with Mr. Bush, who was pushing his case for sending new forces to Iraq in a speech to hundreds of soldiers on this military base.

Mr. Bush's call to send more troops to Baghdad and restive Anbar province moved the White House closer to open confrontation with Congress, where lawmakers have been denouncing the proposal while considering whether to impose conditions on the White House's plans.

Speaking to a roomful of troops, Mr. Bush said he planned to work with "the Congress to provide all the resources you need in this war on terror." He gave no indication of willingness to accommodate congressional criticism.

Democratic leaders hope to pass a nonbinding measure opposing the troop escalation in the Senate as early as this week and are openly discussing ways to block funding for it, or otherwise tying the president's hands. White House officials downplayed the possibility of Congress blocking troop escalation, noting that the administration has enough money to send most of the additional "surge" forces to Iraq. That means any Democratic move to limit funding would effectively impact money used for sustaining troops already in the field.

The nonbinding measures criticizing the war may also face a rockier-than-expected path. The Senate's top Republican, Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, has threatened to filibuster the surge resolution, which could force Democrats to soften their language or delay bringing it to a vote.

With polls showing the U.S. public highly skeptical of the new Iraq approach -- and even many congressional Republicans raising criticism -- Democratic leaders in Congress are trying to calibrate their own strategy, figuring out whether to condemn the new approach or try to take firmer steps, such as limiting funding or other restrictions.

DOJ_NMG_0115955

During previous similarly unpopular conflicts, lawmakers regularly passed measures dictating the way administrations should conduct military operations. During the Vietnam era, for instance, lawmakers passed measures requiring President Nixon to set a timetable for withdrawing American forces from the country and barring them from being deployed into Cambodia. Lawmakers later passed measures barring the CIA from operating in Angola and Nicaragua. In the early 1990s, Congress approved legislation setting a firm timetable for the withdrawal of military personnel from Somalia.

Congress gave Mr. Bush broad authority to wage the Iraq war in 2002, and when the Capitol was under Republican leadership, lawmakers did little to challenge the president on his handling of the conflict. The new Congress has said it would push to rein in the White House. Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.) has written an amendment that would require congressional approval for any Iraq troop increase, and the number of Democrats supporting the measure has increased.

For the moment, though, Democrats seem to be focusing on laying down a public marker opposing the troop escalation rather than trying to direct the conduct of military operations in Iraq. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada says he hopes to introduce a nonbinding resolution against the troop increase by the end of next week, and Democrats claim that as many as 12 Republican senators could support it. The House plans to consider an identical measure as early as next week. The administration's talk of escalating confrontation with Iran and Syria within Iraq stirred similarly sharp concerns, leading senior Democrats like Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph Biden of Delaware to say he was prepared to limit Mr. Bush's authority to carry any fight outside Iraq's borders.

"We can do just about anything, given our constitutional powers of the purse," said one Senate Democratic leader's chief of staff. "But right now, politically, we don't want to do anything that could be seen as shortchanging the troops in the field."

Indeed, several newly elected Democrats who had made the war a central part of their campaigns stopped short of restrictions on troop levels. Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.), chairman of the House Appropriations defense subcommittee, said such language could be part of future spending legislation, but some Democrats said they were not yet prepared to back such a measure.

"We're not at that point yet," said Rep. Patrick Murphy, a Pennsylvania Democrat and Iraq veteran.

Analysis: Democrats' Delicate Strategy (AP)

By David Espo

AP, January 12, 2007

Majority Democrats face a delicate mission in their first foreign policy clash with President Bush, determined to force an end to the Iraq war but eager to support the troops who are doing the fighting.

No strangers to political combat, Republicans don't intend to make it easy on them.

"What they really want is to cut off funding for the troops," Senate GOP Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, said Thursday.

It was a claim that Democrats rebutted in advance.

"The Congress and the American people will continue to support them and provide them with every resource they need," the top four Democrats in Congress pledged Wednesday night as they attacked President Bush's plans to deploy an additional 21,500 troops.

"Our military forces deserve a policy commensurate with the sacrifices they have been asked to make. Regrettably, the president has not provided that tonight," added Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, as well as Reps. Steny Hoyer of Maryland and Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois.

For the first time since the war began, Democrats have public opinion on their side — and know it for sure.

The midterm elections that swept Republicans from power in both the House and Senate demonstrated that, and comments by one-time Republican supporters of the president's war policy confirm it daily.

Sen. Gordon Smith, an Oregon Republican who faces the voters in 2008, checked out in December. He called the war effort absurd and said he would never have voted to authorize combat if he had known that prewar intelligence was wrong.

Other Republicans are following.

Eight members of the House rank-and-file wrote Bush on Jan. 4, urging him "to reject any recommendation for either a short or long term increase in the number of U.S. troops. We are persuaded by all available evidence that an escalation of U.S. troop levels is not the way forward in Iraq."

Bush was persuaded otherwise, and suffered further political erosion within hours.

"At this late stage, interjecting more young American troops into the crossfire of an Iraqi civil war is simply not the right approach," Republican Rep. Ric Keller said on the morning after the president's speech.

DOJ_NMG_0115956

Across the Capitol complex, Republican Sen. George Voinovich of Ohio addressed Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice: "I've gone along with the president on this and I've bought into his dream, and at this stage of the game I just don't think it's going to happen."

Both Pelosi and Reid intend to hold votes in Congress within a few weeks on Bush's revised Iraq policy. It would be the equivalent of a congressional referendum, advisory in nature, and give Democrats a way to show their opposition and force Republicans to make a choice.

Many Democrats in both houses prefer a stronger approach. — Sen. Edward M. Kennedy pre-empted Reid this week by unveiling a bill to block the use of funds for Bush's plans to increase the size of the force in the war zone.

In private sessions, House Democrats have prodded Pelosi to be more forceful, and Democratic presidential contenders are likely to compete for the support of anti-war voters, as well. As a result, it seems inevitable that there will be efforts to limit funding for the war later in the year.

For now, though, according to several officials, the leadership in both houses would prefer a more cautious approach when it comes to legislation, building additional pressure on the president through extensive hearings into the war.

Their hope is that will leave the public focus on Bush as steward of a war that has claimed the lives of more than 3,000 U.S. troops and eroded his standing with the electorate.

Reid, in particular, has said he favors a bipartisan repudiation of Bush's new policy. "The president's going to have to take note of that. I think that's the beginning of the end, as far as I'm concerned," he said.

Bush's Iraq Plan Meets Skepticism On Capitol Hill (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

President Bush's proposal to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq encountered strong bipartisan opposition on Capitol Hill yesterday, and his top national security advisers, dispatched to defend the strategy, were greeted with a skepticism not seen from Congress over the past six years.

Lawmakers said they have little confidencethat the Iraqi government has the capacity to deliver on promises to take the lead in cracking down on violent militias and providing security in Baghdad, as the president's plan contemplates. Democrats and Republicans alike said they are concerned that Bush's plan, announced Wednesday night in a nationally televised prime-time address, is too little and too late and does not appear very different from previous efforts to secure the capital.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates sought to assure lawmakers that the plan can work if given time. Gates said he detected a much greater determination from Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to go after "all lawbreakers" with "no exceptions." He suggested that the prime minister will confront the militias fueling sectarian violence, including insurgents controlled by radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr.

Still, the ferocity of the congressional condemnation dismayed the White House, which had hoped to rebuild an element of bipartisan consensus around Bush's plan. It was further indication that the new Democratic Congress is headed toward a series of potentially epic clashes and floor votes over the conduct and funding of the nearly four-year-old war.

Congressional skepticism is being fueled by the public: A majority of Americans oppose Bush's decision to send more troops, and only one in three said the plan will probably make victory in Iraq more likely, according to a new Washington Post-ABC News poll.

Rice appeared to be on the receiving end of the toughest grilling yesterday, before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Not a single senator from either party expressed support for the president's plan, many posed hostile questions, and others expressed deep doubt about the Bush administration's premise of creating a viable democracy in the heart of the Middle East.

"I've gone along with the president on this, and I bought into his dream," Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) told Rice bluntly. "And at this stage of the game, I don't think it's going to happen."

Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) offered a similar assessment. "I have supported you and the administration on the war, and I cannot continue to support the administration's position," he said. "I have not been told the truth over and over again by administration witnesses, and the American people have not been told the truth."

Rice maintained her composure throughout the hearing, which lasted more than three hours, conceding that doubts are warranted but pleading for patience. "I want you to understand that I, personally, too, understand and know the skepticism that is felt about Iraq and indeed the pessimism that some feel," Rice said.

Asked if she has confidence in the Maliki government, Rice said she did, adding: "I think he knows that his government is on borrowed time."

DOJ_NMG_0115957

Appearing at Fort Benning, Ga., Bush told soldiers that daily life in Iraq will eventually improve but that his new strategy will not yield immediate results. "The American people have got to understand that suicide bombings won't stop immediately," Bush said. "The IED attacks won't stop immediately."

Administration officials said nothing to suggest that the troops will be coming home any time soon. At a morning news conference, Gates said the increase in troops is being viewed as a "temporary surge" but added: "No one has a really clear idea of how long that might be."

Gates also announced that he is recommending an increase in the size of the Marine Corps and Army by 92,000 troops over the next five years, and he joined other administration officials in offering new warnings about the power of Iran. He said one consequence of a failed U.S. effort in Iraq would be "an emboldened and strengthened Iran."

Former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), co-chairmen of the Iraq Study Group, issued a statement last night in which they raised questions about the "nature of the surge" and urged the president to further consider other recommendations in the group's report, including conditioning support for the Iraqi government on its meeting of benchmarks, creating an international support group for Iraq and beginning a transition that could enable U.S. forces to begin to leave.

In addition to the new security plan, Bush also called Wednesday for additional funds for economic reconstruction, and like the Iraq Study Group, for political benchmarks for the Iraqi government -- such as a new oil law and provincial elections. But unlike the study group, Bush would impose no penalties on the Iraqis for lack of compliance.

The White House is running the risk that the widespread discontent on Capitol Hill will mushroom into an embarrassing resolution disapproving the president's plan or, worse, the imposition of limitations on funding for the war. White House aides said they fully expected criticism from many quarters, but they expressed disappointment that, as they saw it, many lawmakers do not appear to be giving the new strategy more than a cursory review. More than 130 lawmakers trooped to the White House for personal briefings from the president in recent days -- but to little apparent effect.

Still, White House counselor Dan Bartlett expressed optimism that a showdown with Congress over funding can be avoided, despite a vow by some House Democratic leaders to try to derail funding for the additional troops. "It appears the Democrats are divided on that issue themselves," he said. "We obviously hope it doesn't get to that point -- and my personal opinion is I don't think it will."

Bartlett added that critics should do more than take shots at Bush's plan. "We do believe that those who have decided to reject this plan before it has an opportunity to work have a greater responsibility to propose something that will work," he said. "We have yet to see that from Democrats."

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) vowed to filibuster Democratic efforts to bring to a vote a resolution disapproving the policy, but opponents of the plan may be able to muster the 60 votes needed to break his parliamentary obstacle. Half a dozen Senate Republicans have come out against sending more troops to Iraq, with at least four others expressing skepticism. Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) predicted that the resolution would pick up 12 GOP votes, a count McConnell did not dispute.

Across Capitol Hill yesterday, the administration also found the going rough. At the House Armed Services Committee, Gates and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, were questioned extensively about the timing of the "surge" in troops, with several committee members from both parties questioning the level of commitment from the Iraqi government.

A House Republican letter to Bush opposing any increase in troop strength garnered nine signatures. Meanwhile, Democratic leaders said they will push a resolution on support for the president's proposal, and House Republicans said Bush risks a major defeat. For Republicans who narrowly escaped defeat in November, the coming vote could be a nightmare, they said.

"The White House will have to work 24 hours a day to find people on our side who aren't going to jump ship," said Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.). "This is a real serious dilemma for members in difficult seats. The next election will be about the White House, not the House. We will rise or fall on our nominee and how this war is going."

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) said he "would not say there are a lot of enthusiastic members over here" in support of the president. "I have zero comfort level with escalating this," he said.

Bush War Plan Draws Fire On Capitol Hill (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, January 12, 2007

President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq ran into a wall of criticism on Capitol Hill on Thursday as administration officials drew confrontational, sometimes mocking challenges from both Democrats and Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0115958

Defense Secretary Robert Gates said in response that the administration might abandon the increase if the Iraqi government doesn't do its part, but he provided no timetable. "I think most of us, in our minds, are thinking of it as a matter of months, not 18 months or two years," he told the House Armed Services Committee.

Bush and top members of his national security team sought to rally support for the troop buildup a day after he unveiled his plan for turning around a conflict that has lasted nearly four years and cost more than 3,000 American military lives.

Instead, Gates and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice found themselves embroiled in the first pitched exchanges in a battle that is likely to dominate Congress for months or longer and is already shaping the 2008 presidential election.

"I think this speech given last night by this president represents the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam, if it's carried out," Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, a potential 2008 presidential contender, told Rice. While he is a Republican, administration officials were defending the plan for the first time to the Democratic-controlled Congress.

Bill Nelson, D-Fla., noted his own past support for the administration on the war but said he could not continue. He declared, "I have not been told the truth over and over again by administration witnesses, and the American people have not been told the truth."

A new AP-Ipsos poll found approval for Bush's handling of Iraq hovering near a record low — 29 percent of Americans approve and 68 percent disapprove.

Bush, visiting with troops at Fort Benning, Ga., cautioned that the troop increase "is not going to yield immediate results. It's going to take awhile."

His plan, outlined in a prime-time address to the nation on Wednesday, would raise troop levels in Iraq by 21,500 — from 132,000 to 153,500 — at a cost of $5.6 billion. It also calls for the Iraqi government to increase its own forces and to do more to quell sectarian violence

"American patience is limited, and obviously if the Iraqis fail to maintain their commitments we'll have to revisit our strategy," said Gates.

At one point Gates, just three weeks on the job, told lawmakers, "I would confess I'm no expert on Iraq." Later, asked about reaching the right balance between American and Iraqi forces, he told the panel he was "no expert on military matters."

Committee members pressed Gates, who replaced Donald H. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon, on an exit strategy for the U.S.

"At the outset of the strategy, it's a mistake to talk about an exit strategy," he said.

Gates, in testimony to the committee and earlier at a news conference, said he was requesting increasing the size of the Army and Marine Corps by 92,000 troops over the next five years.

He also said the Pentagon would recall to duty sooner than planned some National Guard and Reserve troops who have served yearlong tours in Iraq or Afghanistan.

As Rice testified to the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Rep. Howard Berman, D-Calif., likened Bush's plan to a "hail Maliki pass" — jokingly combining Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's name with the football "Hail Mary" desperation pass.

The U.S. led a coalition that invaded Iraq in March 2003, despite failing to win U.N. Security Council support. The government of Saddam Hussein quickly crumbled and Bush declared major combat operations over two months later.

Bush's war effort initially had strong support, both in Congress and among other Americans. Yet that support has eroded as violence has continued.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said he hoped to bring up a nonbinding resolution next week expressing opposition to any troop buildup. A similar move is expected in the House.

Reid, in a Senate speech, said Bush ignored the results of November's midterm elections that ended 12 years of GOP control of Congress, the advice of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group and that of his own top generals. "In choosing to escalate the war, the president virtually stands alone," Reid said.

The Senate's top Republican, Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, threatened a filibuster — a delaying tactic — to block any legislation expressing disapproval of the buildup plan.

McConnell conceded that GOP lawmakers as well as Democrats are troubled by Bush's new policy, but he said, "Congress is completely incapable of dictating the tactics of the war."

Options for critics of the war to try forcing its end are limited, given the slim margin of Democratic control, especially in the Senate. But votes stating symbolic opposition to the troop buildup could embarrass many Republicans leery of supporting Bush's plan.

Rice appeared in the morning before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and in the afternoon before the House counterpart. She was grilled sharply by members of both parties.

Not a single member of the Senate panel expressed outright support for the president's plan. One after another offered skepticism on various points — from the rationale for the war to al-Maliki's sincerity and resolve, from the need for additional troops to the administration's ruling out talking to Iran and Syria.

DOJ_NMG_0115959

"You're going to have to do a much better job" explaining the rationale for the war, "and so is the president," said Sen. George Voinovich, R-Ohio. He said Bush could no longer count on his support for the war.

Rice acknowledged widespread skepticism among Americans. "I want you to know that I understand and indeed feel the heartbreak that Americans feel at the continued sacrifice of American lives," she said.

Rice engaged several tense exchanges with members, including with Hagel, a Vietnam veteran and longtime critic of Bush's Iraq policy. She disputed his characterization of Bush's buildup as an "escalation."

"Putting in 22,000 more troops is not an escalation?" Hagel asked. Responded Rice: "I think, senator, escalation is not just a matter of how many numbers you put in."

"Would you call it a decrease?" Hagel asked.

"I would call it, senator, an augmentation that allows the Iraqis to deal with this very serious problem that they have in Baghdad," she said.

When Rice disputed Hagel's contention that Iraq was in the throes of civil war, Hagel shot back: "To sit there and say that, that's just not true."

Said Committee Chairman Joe Biden of Delaware: "I believe the president's strategy is not a solution, Secretary Rice. I believe it's a tragic mistake"

Rice told senators there was a "national imperative not to fail."

The Senate panel was flush with 2008 presidential hopefuls and possible contenders, including Hagel, Biden and Democrats John Kerry of Massachusetts, Christopher Dodd of Connecticut and Barack Obama of Illinois.

Meanwhile, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., another presidential hopeful, said after a meeting at the White House that he was concerned about al-Maliki's capabilities as well as "whether these are sufficient number of troops.

But, he said, "I do think we can succeed." McCain is among a handful of lawmakers who have called for more — not fewer — U.S. troops in Iraq.

Rice, Gates Face Hill Heat Over Iraq Plan (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, January 12, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates met hostility yesterday on Capitol Hill when they tried to defend President Bush's decision to send about 21,500 more combat troops to Iraq.

"I believe it's a tragic mistake," said Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and one of five presidential aspirants on the panel that questioned Miss Rice.

Sen. Barbara Boxer, California Democrat, noted Miss Rice has no children of her own to lose overseas, as Democrats flexed their new majority to force debate on Mr. Bush's Iraq policy -- something they said has been missing under Republican control.

"Who pays the price?" Mrs. Boxer repeatedly demanded. "You're not going to pay a particular price," she told Miss Rice, because the secretary has no "immediate family" at risk.

The comments came after Miss Rice opened the hearing by acknowledging widespread concerns about the war and called for "a national imperative not to fail in Iraq."

"Americans broadly agree -- and we in the administration count ourselves among them -- that the situation in Iraq is unacceptable," said Miss Rice.

Neither Miss Rice nor Mr. Gates guaranteed that the troop surge announced by Mr. Bush on Wednesday night will succeed in stabilizing Baghdad, but they said there were indications that it would. They said it will be clear within a couple of months whether the Iraqis will fulfill their commitment to crack down on militias and death squads.

"I don't think anybody has a definite idea of how long a surge would last," Mr. Gates told the House Armed Services Committee. "I think for most of us, in our minds, we are thinking of it as a matter of months, not 18 months or two years."

The secretary, who took charge of the Pentagon from Donald H. Rumsfeld last month and was joined by Joint Chiefs Chairman Gen. Peter Pace, said the additional troops would arrive in Iraq in waves and suggested that some may be held back if the Iraqi government does not keep its end of the bargain.

"American patience is limited, and obviously if the Iraqis fail to maintain their commitments we'll have to revisit our strategy," Mr. Gates said.

The administration pleaded for Congress to study the proposal rather than ruling it out immediately, as Mr. Bush and top members of his national security team began their first push for support.

While his secretaries were taking the heat, Mr. Bush traveled to the friendlier environs of Fort Benning, Ga., where he cautioned that the troop increase "is not going to yield immediate results. It's going to take awhile."

DOJ_NMG_0115960

Mr. Bush's plan, outlined in a prime-time address to the nation, would raise troop levels in Iraq by 21,500 -- from 132,000 to 153,500 -- at a cost of $5.6 billion. It also calls for the Iraqi government to increase its own forces and to do more to quell sectarian violence.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, promised to give the new plan careful consideration, but he said on the Senate floor, "In choosing to escalate the war, the president virtually stands alone."

Many of the Senate panel's Republicans also were critical, including Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, John E. Sununu of New Hampshire and Lisa Murkowski of Alaska.

"I think this speech given last night by this president represents the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam, if it's carried out," Mr. Hagel said.

Miss Rice engaged in a tense exchange with Mr. Hagel, a Vietnam veteran and longtime critic of Mr. Bush's Iraq policy, disputing his characterization of Mr. Bush's buildup as an "escalation."

"Putting in 22,000 more troops is not an escalation?" Mr. Hagel asked. "Would you call it a decrease?"

Miss Rice replied: "I would call it, Senator, an augmentation that allows the Iraqis to deal with this very serious problem that they have in Baghdad."

Mr. Hagel told Miss Rice, "Madame Secretary, Iraqis are killing Iraqis. We are in a civil war. This is sectarian violence out of control."

She disputed that Iraq was in the throes of a civil war. To that, Mr. Hagel said, "To sit there and say that, that's just not true."

Meanwhile, after a meeting at the White House, Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, expressed both doubts and optimism about the strategy.

"I do not guarantee victory or success," Mr. McCain told reporters. "If we do fail, there is going to be chaos in the region, and I believe that we would pay an even heavier price in American blood and treasure."

Miss Rice, in comments overheard on an open microphone between TV interviews, said she did not plan to "descend" on Baghdad during a Middle East trip beginning today, because it is not the time to "beat their brains out."

The government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki should be given some "breathing space" after listening to Mr. Bush describe the situation in Iraq as unacceptable, she said.

The secretary yesterday appointed a retired career diplomat, Timothy Carney, to coordinate economic aid and reconstruction efforts in Baghdad. Mr. Carney, a former ambassador to Haiti, served as an adviser to the U.S. occupation authority in Iraq in 2003.

"In order to better deliver on the governance and economic side, the United States is further decentralizing and diversifying our civilian presence," Miss Rice said at the Senate hearing. "We need to get civilians out of our embassy, out of the Green Zone, into the field across Iraq."

Senate Panel Scraps With Rice Over Iraq Strategy (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — Congressional critics of President Bush's new Iraq strategy say it includes bellicose threats that might provoke Iran and lead to a wider regional conflict.

In his speech Wednesday, Bush said he was sending a second aircraft-carrier battle group to the region and Patriot missiles to U.S. Arab allies. He promised to "seek out and destroy" Iranian and Syrian networks providing arms and training to Iraqi insurgents and militias.

The U.S. arrest of six Iranians on Thursday in the northern Iraqi region of Kurdistan added to the level of congressional anxiety about U.S. policy. The Pentagon denied the Iranians were diplomats.

On Thursday, Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph Biden of Delaware asked Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice whether Bush thought he had authority to send U.S. forces into Iran in pursuit of those supporting attacks on U.S. troops.

"We believe we can do what we need to do inside Iraq," Rice said.

Biden warned that Congress had not authorized an expanded war and that the administration would face a "constitutional confrontation in the Senate" if it tried to broaden the conflict without congressional approval.

The incident in the Kurdish city of Irbil followed a similar one last month in Baghdad where U.S. troops detained two Iranians in the compound of a pro-Iranian Iraqi leader, Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim. The two were subsequently released.

DOJ_NMG_0115961

"When you set in motion the kind of policy the president is talking about here, it's very, very dangerous," Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., said in reference to Bush's policy on Iran. "To ask our young men and women to sacrifice their lives to be put in the middle of a civil war is wrong," he added.

Hagel and Biden have urged the administration to start talks with Iran and Syria, a proposal that Rice rejected. Efforts to talk to Syria during the first Bush term failed, she said, and Iran must end its efforts to enrich uranium before the United States would begin a dialogue with Iran. The United States says Iran is trying to make a nuclear bomb.

Before a skeptical bipartisan audience at the Foreign Relations Committee, Rice defended Bush's plan to increase the number of troops in Iraq by more than 21,000. There are currently about 132,000 U.S. troops in Iraq.

Rice and new Defense Secretary Robert Gates said the strategy would change, although they did not say how, if Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki did not live up to his commitments to promote political reconciliation. Rice would not put a time limit on the escalation. Gates said it would last for "months, not 18 months or two years."

Some of the criticism was predictable from a body that includes several presidential aspirants, but some of the critics were new, such as Sens. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., and George Voinovich, R-Ohio.

Coleman said he was not prepared to support the administration's new policy because he had not seen a sufficient "level of commitment and resolve" from the al-Maliki government and "the cost (to American families) is too high."

"You're going to have to do a much better job, and so is the president, in explaining this to us," Voinovich told Rice. "I've gone along with the president and bought into his dream" of an Iraqi democracy, but no longer, he said.

Lawmakers Grill Rice Over The Iraq War (AP)

By Calvin Woodward

AP, January 12, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice found herself at the intersection of anger and ambition when senators called her to account Thursday for a deeply unpopular war.

Five presidential aspirants on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, as well as other up-and-comers in the new Democratic majority, made sure their voices were heard. And these voices — Republican ones included — were full of frustration and mistrust about how President Bush has prosecuted and pitched the Iraq war.

Even Rice's status as a single woman was fair game.

Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., noted Rice has no children of her own to lose overseas. "Who pays the price?" Boxer repeatedly demanded. "You're not going to pay a particular price," she told Rice, because the secretary has no "immediate family" at risk.

On the other side of the Capitol, Defense Secretary Robert Gates, a new face on the years-old Iraq policy, largely got a pass when he testified before the House Armed Service Committee about Bush's Iraq strategy.

Rice is notably unflappable. Her face was tight, her voice even, occasionally and briefly speeding up to meet the jabs coming her way. She did not give much away or lose her temper.

But she might find her trip to the volatile Middle East starting Friday a vacation compared with her time before the committee.

Rice calmly walked the committee through the revamped war plan while acknowledging that what has been done until now has not succeeded. "I ask that you give it a chance to work," she said.

"There have been other critical times for America, when we have united as one nation to meet great challenges. Now must be such a time, for it is a national desire and a national imperative not to fail in Iraq."

Years of pent-up frustration in both parties spilled over.

A "fool's paradise," was how Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd, who had just announced his Democratic presidential candidacy hours earlier, described Iraq policy.

"A tragic mistake," was how Delaware Sen. Joe Biden, the committee chairman and White House hopeful, put it.

And this, from a Republican who also has presidential aspirations: "The most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam." Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska was talking about Bush's speech on Wednesday night, when the president announced his plan to increase U.S. troops in Iraq.

Hagel has opposed the Bush policy for some time. But Sen. Bill Nelson, a moderate Democrat from Florida, has supported it. No more.

"I have not been told the truth," Nelson said. "I have not been told the truth over and over again."

Two more presidential aspirants weighed in. "Unbelievably off the mark," Democratic Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts said of Bush's approach. Democratic Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois picked through the Iraq policy in a restrained fashion.

Boxer made it personal.

DOJ_NMG_0115962

"I'm not going to pay a personal price," she said. "My kids are too old and my grandchild is too young. You're not going to pay a particular price, as I understand it, with an immediate family."

Boxer talked about families losing loved ones and soldiers in hospital burn units. "These are the people who pay the price."

Rice said evenly that she understands the sacrifice of service members and families.

"I visit them. I know what they're going through. I talk to their families. I see it. I could never and I can never do anything to replace any of those lost men and women in uniform, or the diplomats, some of whom. ..."

Boxer cut her off.

"Madam Secretary, please," she said. "I know you feel terrible about it. That's not the point. I was making the case as to who pays the price for your decisions."

In the House, lawmakers appeared mindful of Gates' status as the newcomer on the Bush administration's Iraq team and largely avoided the kind of tough questions and pointed comments that senators heaved at Rice.

"We are blessed to have you, Mr. Secretary," the committee chairman, Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., said at the outset.

Gates, sworn in Dec. 18, noted that his testimony came on "the anniversary of the conclusion of my third week in the job."

Some of the toughest comments were directed toward Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

"This is the craziest, dumbest plan I've ever seen or heard of in my life," Rep. Neil Abercrombie, D-Hawaii, told Pace.

Rice, A Uniter Of The Divided (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

Within minutes of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's arrival on Capitol Hill yesterday, it became apparent that the Bush administration had, after four divisive years, finally succeeded in uniting Congress on the war in Iraq.

Unfortunately for Rice, the lawmakers were unified in opposition to President Bush's new policy.

"I have to say, Madam Secretary," a seething Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) told Rice, "that I think this speech given last night by this president represents the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam."

"Madam Secretary," added Sen. Bill Nelson of Florida, a moderate Democrat, "I have supported you and the administration on the war, and I cannot continue to support the administration's position. . . . I have not been told the truth over and over again."

"You're going to have to do a much better job," lectured Sen. George Voinovich, an Ohio Republican. "I've gone along with the president on this, and I bought into his dream, and at this stage of the game, I don't think it's going to happen."

It was a bipartisan scolding of the sort rarely seen in the Bush presidency, and Rice endured it, for the most part, with quiet indignation. She stared expressionlessly at her tormentors or looked down at the table, occasionally noting their complaints on a memo pad with her No. 2 pencil: "Crisis in the region . . . Iraqis killing Iraqis . . . Withdrawal." The oversized yellow leather chair at the witness table made Rice look small, and for much of the hearing she sat hunched, her hands clasped tightly in her lap. Only once did she betray her agitation by pounding her clasped hands to her thigh, out of the senators' view.

Rice tried not to be baited. A ferocious Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), noting that the childless Rice is not at risk of losing her own offspring in Iraq, displayed a 2005 quote from the secretary saying she had "no doubt" about a troop reduction in Iraq. "You had absolutely no doubt about how great it was going," Boxer said.

"Senator, let's not overstate the case," Rice soothed. "I don't think I said it was going great."

But ultimately, Rice could not avoid quarrels. Hagel, a Vietnam veteran, angrily condemned the "escalation" of the war. "To ask our young men and women to sacrifice their lives to be put in the middle of a civil war is . . . morally wrong. It's tactically, strategically, militarily wrong."

"I don't see it, and the president doesn't see it, as an escalation," Rice replied.

Hagel looked stunned. "Putting 22,000 new troops, more troops in, is not an escalation?"

"Escalation is not just a matter of how many numbers you put in," Rice ventured.

"Would you call it a decrease?" Hagel pressed.

"I would call it, Senator, an augmentation."

Rice rejected lawmakers' pleas to consider talks with Iran and Syria ("That's not diplomacy; that's extortion") and refused to promise that Bush would seek permission from Congress before attacking either country.

The senators reacted with a palpable fury. "I send letters out to the families and tell them about how brave their sons were and that the work they're doing there and the deaths were as important as what we had in the Second World War," Voinovich told Rice. "But I have to rewrite the letter today."

Rice had little with which to answer him. "I think that we don't have an option to fail in Iraq," she replied.

Voinovich glared from the dais.

DOJ_NMG_0115963

The Foreign Relations panel is a murderers' row of political egos, with seven members who have contemplated 2008 presidential runs. But the frustration with Rice's answers had the salutary effect of breaking down party divisions. Democrat Chris Dodd (Conn.), who had just announced his presidential candidacy on "Imus in the Morning," gave a hug to Republican Hagel. Democrat Nelson praised Republican Norm Coleman (Minn.). Republican Lisa Murkowski (Alaska) concurred with Democrat Boxer. And Democrat Russ Feingold (Wis.) had only the warmest words for Hagel.

Some lawmakers wanted withdrawal from Iraq, others favored a bigger U.S. commitment, but most everybody saw Bush's plan as inadequate. "I hope you'll convey to the president," Chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.) urged Rice, "that you heard 21 members, with one or two notable exceptions, expressing outright hostility, disagreement and/or overwhelming concern with the president's proposal."

Indeed, the lone lawmaker showing some sympathy was Republican Johnny Isakson of Georgia, who muddied his defense with an extended metaphor about gambling. He said Bush's speech Wednesday night made clear "this one is for all the marbles," and he advised Iraqis to heed "Kenny Rogers' old song, 'You got to know when to hold 'em and know when to fold 'em.' It's time for them to deliver on the hand that they've dealt."

But Barack Obama, for one, wasn't playing at Isakson's table. "This administration took a gamble," the Illinois Democrat said. "It appears that it has failed, and essentially the administration repeatedly has said we're doubling down."

There were demonstrators in the room: a woman from a left-wing group who applauded when Dodd labeled the Iraq policy "a fool's paradise," and a man who was led off by police shouting, "Lies! It's all lies!" But such heckling was redundant at a hearing in which more than a dozen senators vied for time to berate the witness. "Quite possibly the greatest foreign policy mistake in the history of our nation," Feingold proclaimed.

Less shrill but more powerful were the words of Bush's loyal supporters, who wore queasy looks as they challenged the new Iraq policy. Coleman rested his forehead on his hand, then asked Rice: "Why wouldn't it be wiser to hold the Iraqis to certain benchmarks?" John Sununu (R-N.H.) complained of a "refusal to share information." David Vitter (R-La.) judged: "Too little, maybe too late."

Even Murkowski, a junior senator who rarely breaks with the administration, joined in the denunciations. "You've clearly heard the skepticism that has been expressed this morning -- so many of my colleagues, and for good reason, skepticism about a lot of things," she said. The Alaskan spoke of her "great concern" that the United States is now in "a situation that I had hoped we would not be in."

Murkowski pleaded with Rice for assurances "that this is going to yield us a better result, a different result than what we have seen in the past."

Rice could offer none. "Senator," she said, "there aren't any guarantees."

Bush's Plan For Iraq Runs Into Opposition In Congress (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And David S. Cloud

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 President Bush's call to increase the American military commitment in Iraq ran into intense Congressional opposition Thursday from Democrats and from moderate Republicans who expressed profound skepticism.

A day after the president set out a new strategy for bringing stability to Iraq, the White House found few allies on either side of the aisle when Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice appeared before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The reception she received suggested that Mr. Bush's prime-time address to the nation on Wednesday had done little to build political support for sending additional troops to Baghdad.

"I think what occurred here today was fairly profound, in the sense that you heard 21 members, with one or two notable exceptions, expressing outright hostility, disagreement and or overwhelming concern with the president's proposal," the committee's new Democratic chairman, Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, said at the conclusion of Ms. Rice's testimony.

Republicans were more supportive in the House, where the new defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, and Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, testified before the Armed Services Committee. But Democrats were scathing in their criticism, and in both the House and the Senate, Democratic leaders moved ahead with plans to oppose Mr. Bush's plan through nonbinding resolutions.

While saying they do not plan any immediate effort to try to thwart the Bush plan by cutting off funds, some Democrats said they would continue to consider placing limitations on the administration when Congress considers a war spending measure later in the year.

Despite the decision by many members of his party to break with the White House over the troop increase, the Republican leader in the Senate, Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, said he would use parliamentary tactics to try to thwart the Democratic effort to adopt the Senate resolution opposing the plan.

DOJ_NMG_0115964

In Baghdad, Iraq's Shiite-led government responded tepidly to Mr. Bush's announcement that he would send more than 20,000 additional troops to Iraq to bolster the effort to curb rampant sectarian violence.

Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki failed to appear as scheduled at a news conference and did not make any public comment.

Meanwhile, President Bush and his top cabinet officials spent Thursday traveling and testifying in support of his new Iraq strategy.

Early in the day, in an emotional ceremony at the White House, Mr. Bush awarded the Medal of Honor to the family of Cpl. Jason Dunham, a marine from Scio, N.Y., who was killed in Iraq in 2004 when he threw himself on a grenade to save the rest of his unit. The president began crying during the ceremony. It was the second Medal of Honor proceeding to come out of the Iraq war.

Afterward, he traveled to Fort Benning, Ga., where he spoke to Army soldiers about the Iraq plan. He said his approach would not produce an immediate reduction in violence but represented "our best chance for success." Some of the troops based at Fort Benning have already served twice in Iraq and are scheduled for a third deployment.

Ms. Rice appeared on morning news programs before joining Mr. Gates at a news conference in the White House. Both then moved to Capitol Hill for a first substantive showdown with the new Democratic majority and an encounter with the shifting politics of the war.

At the House Armed Services Committee hearing, it was standing-room-only, with some spectators sprawled on the floor and others spilling out the door.

In the Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing room, Senator Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, a Republican who has been critical of the administration's handling of the war, drew applause when he described the president's proposals as a "dangerous foreign policy blunder," and vowed to oppose them. Senator Russell D. Feingold, a Wisconsin Democrat and a vigorous opponent of the war, spoke of it as "quite possibly the greatest foreign policy mistake in the history of our nation."

Expressing doubt about whether Iraqis "are done killing each other," Senator Norm Coleman, Republican of Minnesota, said, "Why put more American lives on the line now in the hope that this time they'll make the difficult choice?"

Several Republicans questioned the Bush plan without rejecting it outright, but their call for greater detail made it clear they remained unconvinced. Senator John Sununu of New Hampshire agreed that approving new legislation in Iraq on sharing oil revenue would be central to weaving estranged Sunni Arabs into the political process, but he said no United States government official could describe the law to him.

"It's the most remarkable law that no one has ever seen," he said.

Away from the Congressional hearings, White House and Pentagon officials held a series of private meetings with lawmakers on Thursday in an attempt to blunt the criticism, especially from Republicans.

Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new American commander in Iraq, waved off reporters as he shuttled between the offices of Republican Senators John W. Warner of Virginia and Jeff Sessions of Alabama. "Please, guys. Can I just make the rounds up here?" he said, declining to answer further questions.

During their testimony, Mr. Gates and Ms. Rice declined to specify a time limit on the troop increase and were cautious about predicting rapid improvements in security in Baghdad, where most of the additional troops will be positioned, saying progress is likely to come gradually.

"I think that we all know that the stakes in Iraq are enormous and that the consequences of failure would also be enormous not just for America and for Iraq, but for the entire region of the Middle East and indeed for the world," Ms. Rice said.

The deployment schedule, in which more than 20,000 fresh soldiers and marines would roll into Iraq over several months, was intended to give the president time to reconsider the increase should the Iraqi government fail to provide its share of security forces as promised, Ms. Rice said.

"I have met Prime Minister Maliki," she said. "I was with him in Amman. I saw his resolve. I think he knows that his government is, in a sense, on borrowed time, not just in terms of the American people, but in terms of the Iraqi people."

Still, she spoke directly about Mr. Maliki's failure to come through on his past promises to bring additional Iraqi troops into Baghdad. "They haven't performed in the past and so the president is absolutely right, and we have all been saying to them, 'You have to perform,'" she said.

Mr. Gates would not say when asked whether the planned American troop increases over the next few months could be withheld if additional Iraqi units promised for Baghdad failed to materialize.

"We are going to have a number of opportunities to go back to the Iraqis and point out where they have failed to meet their commitments," he said, adding, "I think our assumption going forward is that they have every intention of making this work."

Pressed repeatedly by members of both parties about what steps the Bush administration would take if Iraq continued to balk, he added, "We would clearly have to relook at the strategy."

DOJ_NMG_0115965

Mr. Gates said the Pentagon was revising rules governing mobilization of Army National Guard and Reserve members so troops who had already done a tour in Iraq in the past five years could now be sent back to Iraq if their units was remobilized. But the new policy would aim to shorten the time Guard members were mobilized to a maximum of a year.

He also announced a large permanent increase in the active duty Army and Marine Corps, a repudiation of the approach of former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who argued for keeping ground force levels low and insisted that authorization for any additional troops be done temporarily.

Under Mr. Bush's plan, the active duty Army total manpower over the next five years would grow to 547,000, an increase of 39,000 over the current level. In addition, the Marine Corps would grow to 202,000, an increase of 23,000. The expansions would have to be approved by Congress.

Democrats in both the House and Senate would not rule out eventually putting limitations on financing for the war if Mr. Bush continued on a course they contended defied the will of Congress and the American public. But they say that possibility, which could open them to Republican attacks, will have to be faced later when an emergency spending request and Pentagon spending are considered in the spring and summer.

Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, the Democratic chairman of the appropriations subcommittee that sets military spending and a leading party critic of the war, is exploring ways to attach conditions to a Pentagon measure.

Representative David R. Obey, Democrat of Wisconsin and chairman of the Appropriations Committee, said "a wide variety of ideas are bubbling forth," for how the party should respond to the president. But beyond voting on a resolution to symbolically oppose the Iraq plan, he said it remained unlikely that Democrats could block the troop increase to Baghdad.

"If you were going to have a so-called surge, part of that is supposedly by keeping people there longer," Mr. Obey said. "It's pretty hard to shut off funds for troops who are already there, so it gets very, very complicated."

Late Thursday, James A. Baker III and Lee Hamilton, the co-chairmen of the Iraq Study Group, whose report in November the Bush administration largely spurned, said in a statement that some of its recommendations were reflected in Mr. Bush's plan and urged the White House to give "further consideration" to the panel's remaining ideas.

At the Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing, Mr. Biden issued a sharp warning to the administration after Mr. Gates discussed recent raids against Iranians in Iraq, including one in Erbil early Thursday, and described them as part of a new effort "to root out the networks" involved in bringing Iranian-supplied explosive devices into Iraq.

Mr. Biden responded by saying that the vote to authorize the president to order the use of force to topple Saddam Hussein should not be used as a vehicle for mounting attacks inside Iran, even in pursuit of cells or networks assisting insurgents or sectarian militias.

"I just want the record to show and I would like to have a legal response from the State Department if they think they have authority to pursue networks or anything else across the border into Iran and Iraq that will generate a constitutional confrontation here in the Senate, I predict to you," Mr. Biden said.

Also, the State Department announced on Thursday that Timothy Carney, a retired Foreign Service officer who served as a senior civilian American authority in Iraq for three months in 2003, is the new coordinator for Iraq reconstruction.

Devastating Criticism On Iraq By Both Parties (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 — From the very first remarks, the tone was set: courteous, serious — and devastating.

When Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice appeared before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Thursday, the Democrats, newly ascendant in Congress and frustrated by the war in Iraq, controlled the microphone.

Senator Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut accused the administration of letting American soldiers be used as "cannon fodder." Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., the chairman, called the president's new strategy "a tragic mistake" and said the plan "is more likely to make things worse." Senator Bill Nelson, of Florida, and a former supporter of administration policy, said he could no longer back the president.

"I have not been told the truth," Mr. Nelson said. "I have not been told the truth over and over again by administration witnesses, and the American people have not been told the truth."

Perhaps surprisingly, the language changed little when it was the Republicans' turn. "You've clearly heard the skepticism that has been expressed this morning by so many of my colleagues, and for good reason," said Senator Lisa Murkowski of Alaska. Senator George V. Voinovich of Ohio, noting that he previously went along with the president and "bought into his dream," demanded the administration "do a much better job" of explaining its strategy. A smattering of applause erupted when Senator Chuck Hagel of Nebraska warned that Mr. Bush's new plan would be "the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam, if it's carried out."

DOJ_NMG_0115966

On a committee renowned for its bipartisanship and restraint, the questioning on Thursday, the day after a major presidential address on Iraq, amounted to a powerful blast. Though the mood was somber and the tone remained polite, members of the committee pressed Ms. Rice with extraordinary sharpness. And on a panel with at least five lawmakers considering running for president, members kept reminding the secretary — and one another — that the stakes were extraordinarily high.

"The fundamental question that the American people — and, I think, every senator on this panel, Republican and Democrat — are having to face now is, at what point do we say, 'Enough'?" said Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, a likely Democratic presidential contender.

Administration officials fanned out across Capitol Hill to answer that question, over and over, on Thursday, facing a hostile Congress and varying degrees of partisanship.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, who inherited the war in Iraq just three weeks ago, appeared before members of the House Armed Services Committee to discuss the increase in troop levels. Members thanked him for his candor, seemingly grateful to have a new witness before them, rather than former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who was often combative.

The soft-spoken Mr. Gates, making his first appearance as defense secretary before the committee that oversees the military, admitted that "mistakes have certainly been made by the United States in Iraq, just like in virtually every war in human history."

"That is the nature of war," Mr. Gates said. "But however we got to this moment, the stakes now are incalculable."

The party lines were clearer in the House hearing before the Armed Services committee, where Representative Duncan Hunter of California, the most senior Republican and other Republicans offered their support for the administration and Democrats pressed for an exact calendar in Iraq. "At what point do we say, 'Enough is enough'?" said Representative Martin T. Meehan, Democrat of Massachusetts.

But it was left to Ms. Rice, an important fixture — and survivor — in an administration now in its seventh year, to defend against the tough condemnations in the Senate, where a vote on a resolution about the war could take place as early as next week.

Seated alone at a large table in front of the committee in a chilly Senate hearing room, where the front rows were filled with protesters, Ms. Rice appeared frustrated at times, as committee members variously interrupted her, challenged her or all but accused her of representing a dishonest administration.

Lawmakers argued with Ms. Rice over what to call the latest plan — she corrected critics who referred to it as an "escalation," describing it as an "augmentation" — and over whether a civil war is underway.

When Ms. Rice asserted that insurgents, not warring Shiite and Sunni factions, were mainly responsible for American casualties, Mr. Hagel shot back, "Madame Secretary, your intelligence and mine is a lot different."

He added, "To sit there and say that, Madame Secretary, that's just not true."

"Well, Senator, if you'll — ," Ms. Rice began.

"That is not true," Mr. Hagel repeated.

"Senator, if you'll allow me to finish," Ms. Rice said, visibly exasperated, finally conceding that Iraqi attacks on other Iraqis are taking place in the form of death squads.

Even with at least five members of the committee preparing to run against one another for president, their themes were unified. Mr. Biden, who has said he will run, deftly called on his potential rivals, including Mr. Dodd, who had announced his candidacy hours earlier on the Don Imus radio show, and Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, the former Democratic presidential nominee.

Mr. Biden and Mr. Hagel, another possible contender, exchanged whispers at various points; Mr. Obama stopped to chat with Mr. Biden before leaving the hearing early.

Perhaps the most aggressive questioner of Ms. Rice was the Democrat who has announced he will not run: Senator Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin, who has consistently opposed the war and demanded Thursday that Congress "use the power of the purse" to cut off financing and take American troops out of Iraq.

In an especially contentious exchange, Mr. Feingold asked Ms. Rice: "Is the United States more secure now as a result of our military incursion into Iraq than we were before we entered Iraq?" Dissatisfied with her responses, Mr. Feingold repeated the same line three more times.

The only moment of levity came as a protester was dragged from the room; Mr. Hagel joked that the man must have been from Delaware, Mr. Biden's home state.

Getting Iraq To Work (WSJ)

By Rudy Giuliani And Newt Gingrich

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

The American mission in Iraq must succeed. Our goal -- promoting a stable, accountable democracy in the heart of the Middle East -- cannot be achieved by purely military means.

Iraqis need to establish a civil society. Without the support of mediating civic and social associations -- the informal ties that bind us together -- no government can long remain stable and no cohesive nation can be maintained. To establish a civil society, Iraqis must rebuild their basic infrastructure. Iraqis must take control of their destiny by rebuilding houses, stores, schools, roads, highways, mosques and churches.

But the constant threat of violence, combined with a high unemployment rate estimated between 30% and 50%, fundamentally undermines that effort. This not only sustains the fertile breeding ground for terrorist recruiters but has the same corrosive effect as it would in any city -- raising the likelihood of further violence, civic decay and a crippling sense of powerlessness.

A massive effort must be made to engage in a well organized plan to rebuild Iraq. The goal: an infrastructure to support and encourage a strong, stable civil society.

The week before Christmas, the Pentagon asked Congress to approve a supplemental $100 billion for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, on top of the estimated $500 billion spent to date. The administration should direct a small percent of that amount to create an Iraqi Citizen Job Corps, along the lines of FDR's civilian conservation corps during the Great Depression. The Job Corps can operate under the supervision of our military and with its protection. The Army Corps of Engineers might be particularly helpful in directing this effort. It will place our military in a constructive relationship with the Iraqis -- both literally and figuratively.

Today, Iraq has almost 200 state-owned factories that have been abandoned by the governing authorities since the outbreak of war in 2003. Deputy Undersecretary of Defense Paul A. Brinkley has led a team to 26 of those facilities, traveling far beyond the Green Zone to idled plants from Fallujah to Ramadi. Mr. Brinkley believes that under Department of Defense leadership, at least 10 of these facilities could be re-opened almost immediately, putting more than 10,000 Iraqis to work within weeks. This should be done without delay -- and it is only the beginning.

The wages that these thousands of gainfully employed workers receive will be used to purchase goods and services that will employ other Iraqis. Those goods and services must be produced by still other Iraqis. These are the first steps in creating the requisite conditions of a stable functioning economy and the best hope of displacing retribution and violence with hope and opportunity.

We must try to achieve constructive and compassionate goals through conservative means -- jump starting civic improvement and the individual work ethic in Iraq, without creating permanent subsidies. The goal is to get more Iraqis working, especially young males, who are most susceptible to the terrorist and warlord recruiters.

There are many lessons from the successful welfare reforms in New York City that can be readily applied in Iraq. In the early 1990s, New York City suffered an average of 2,000 murders a year while more than 1.1 million people -- one out of every seven New Yorkers -- were unemployed and on welfare. Too many neighborhoods were pervaded by a sense of hopelessness that came from a combination of high crime, high unemployment and despair. "Workfare" proved an excellent method to change this destructive decades-long paradigm. It required able-bodied welfare recipients to work 20 hours a week in exchange for their benefits. In the process, we reasserted the value of the social contract, which says that for every right there is a responsibility, for every benefit an obligation.

As many as 37,000 people participated at a single time, working in the neighborhoods that most needed their help, cleaning up streets with the Sanitation Department, removing graffiti from schools and government buildings, or helping to beautify public spaces in the Parks Department.

More than 250,000 individuals went through our Workfare program between 1994 and 2001, and their effort helped to visibly improve the quality of life in New York City. Many of them moved on to permanent employment. This change from welfare to work did as much as the New York Police Department Compstat program to keep reducing crime. A similar model can work in Iraq.

There is an opportunity not only to increase employment by rebuilding roads, houses, schools and government buildings, but also to engage the Iraqi people to participate in laying the foundation for a civil and prosperous society.

The population of Iraq is roughly 30 million with a pre-war median annual income equivalent to $700. Subsidizing unemployed Iraqis with a meaningful wage in exchange for meaningful work rebuilding their society is well within the means of the U.S. and its allies.

DOJ_NMG_0115968

The entire effort will help stabilize and grow the Iraqi economy. It should be open to all willing Iraqis -- Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds -- as a means of helping to create a common culture through shared participation in work projects to rebuild and take ownership of their nation.

One word of caution: The program should be overseen by the U.S. military, not private contractors, to avoid unnecessary delays in deployment or accusations of cronyism in the bidding process. Our military will still be devoted to its primary role of hunting down terrorists and patrolling the streets, but administering a jobs program would be a direct extension of their effort to secure law and order. After the program has been started and becomes successful, it can be transferred to a civilian authority within the Iraqi government.

The creation of an Iraqi Citizen Job Corps will help expedite the establishment of a more stable civil society and improve the growing Iraqi economy through the transforming power of an honest day's work.

Mr. Giuliani is the former mayor of New York City. Mr. Gingrich is a former speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives.

Rice Seeks Backing Abroad For Iraq Plan (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

With President Bush's plan to boost troops in Iraq facing blistering criticism at home, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice departs today on another difficult sales mission: winning the support of Arabs for the Iraq plan and seeking momentum for a renewed push on Middle East peace.

Rice endured hours of tough questions in both the Senate and House foreign policy panels yesterday over the administration's strategy for Iraq and its diplomacy toward Iraq's neighbors, particularly Iran and Syria. She had prepared for the hearings carefully, anticipating some of the toughest questions at several practice sessions known as "murder boards," and so remained unruffled when lawmakers pummeled her with complaints.

The stakes could not be higher on Rice's week-long trip to Israel, Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Germany and Britain. She is trying to knit together her vision of a "new Middle East" from the turmoil and conflict spawned in part by the Iraq war and the rising influence of radical Islamic groups, such as Hezbollah and Hamas. Iran has emerged as a more powerful regional power partly because of U.S. missteps in Iraq. Administration officials say the rise of Iran has to some extent given such historic antagonists as Israel and Saudi Arabia common strategic interests.

Rice has said she sees the turmoil as offering opportunity. "This is a different Middle East," she told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee yesterday. "This Middle East is a Middle East in which there really is a new alignment of forces," pitting "reformers and responsible leaders" in Israel, Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Iraq and the Palestinian territories against "extremists of every sect and ethnicity who use violence to spread chaos, to undermine democratic governments and to impose agendas of hatred and intolerance."

The glue that is supposed to help link the positive forces is a sustained personal effort by Rice to make progress on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, administration officials and diplomats said. Bush has called repeatedly for a "two-state solution" to the conflict, but Arabs and outside analysts have complained that in the past six years the administration has frequently disengaged when the obstacles seemed too great.

Philip D. Zelikow, until earlier this month Rice's counselor at the State Department, said the new effort has "three big pillars," including a comprehensive effort in the Middle East to win support for the Iraqi government and rallying the region to stand up to the extremism of Iran and al-Qaeda.

"Undergirding the rest is an intensified effort on the next phase of the Israeli-Palestinian peace process," Zelikow said, adding that it would include winning greater public backing for Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas from Arab countries such as Saudi Arabia.

U.S. officials quietly encouraged Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert recently to say something positive about a 2002 Saudi peace plan that included recognition of Israel as a way of breaking the ice between the Jewish state and the kingdom with Islam's holiest sites. Olmert's predecessor, Ariel Sharon, had shunned the Saudi plan.

In recent months, Rice has initiated a new forum known as the "GCC plus two," which brings together the six nations in the Gulf Cooperation Council with Egypt and Jordan. Arab sources say the participants have agreed to the meetings with great reluctance, believing they could not afford to cross Rice. Another meeting is scheduled for Rice's stop in Kuwait.

A senior administration official acknowledged yesterday there is concern that the forum will be seen as an anti-Iranian alliance but said it has proved to be "quite productive for consultations."

Rice's aides have tried to lower expectations for this round of diplomacy, saying she was mainly hoping to listen to ideas. The official yesterday denied a report in the upcoming issue of Time magazine that Rice had joined with Israeli Foreign Minister

DOJ_NMG_0115969

Tzipi Livni in a bid to put aside a previous peace plan known as the "road map" and leap right to final-status talks to bolster Abbas. An Israeli official also denied the report.

Still, diplomats who have met with Rice say they have been impressed with her sense of personal commitment to trying to make a breakthrough this year.

Dennis Ross, a former Middle East envoy who has known Rice since they were both young Soviet specialists in Northern California, said: "I think that Condi is seriously contemplating what she can do. I am not saying she will do it. There is a big difference between contemplating something and doing it."

Indeed, analysts and administration officials acknowledged that the moment is not auspicious for any sort of breakthrough. Abbas is battling against Hamas, which won legislative elections a year ago and refuses to renounce its goal of eliminating Israel. Abbas has suggested he will call elections to end the political crisis, but there is no guarantee that he will win. Meanwhile, Olmert has low approval ratings because of public disapproval of his handling of last summer's war with Hezbollah.

"The moon, the sun and stars are not in auspicious alignment," said Aaron David Miller, a fellow at the Woodrow Wilson Center and longtime peace negotiator through successive administrations. "With due respect to anyone who wants to deal with this, it has 'loser' written all over it."

The Women's Channel (TIME)

By Walter Isaacson

Time, January 22, 2007

Condoleezza Rice has a lot in common with her secret new soul mate, Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni. Both are women with razor-sharp intellects, center-right convictions and an odd blend of rigid righteousness and pragmatism. Both work under men whose popularity has plummeted because of the bungled conduct of a war (Iraq for George Bush, Lebanon for Ehud Olmert). And both realize that this vulnerability, combined with the even greater weakness of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, has made the timing ripe for a new strategy for an Israeli-Palestinian peace.

Up until now, Rice has not spearheaded any ambitious new diplomatic initiatives in the manner of the predecessors she admires, such as George Marshall, Dean Acheson and Henry Kissinger. But a Palestinian-Israeli peace could transform her legacy. Rice has told friends in Washington that she sees her latest trip to the region as the beginning of a prolonged, personal effort to achieve a breakthrough.

Rice and Livni discussed their new approach in Washington in early December, and since then they have had frequent phone conversations. Their strategy is to put aside the step-by-step road map, which requires that the Palestinians dismantle their terrorist infrastructure before any new phase of negotiations begins, and instead leap right to final-status talks with moderate Palestinians about what a two-state solution would look like. If a suitable framework for a Palestinian state is reached, Abbas would then go to his people with a referendum: Do you want it or not? He is convinced that more than 70% would vote yes, thus marginalizing the Hamas resisters. Olmert would do the same, and probably get close to the same support.

The outlines of a two-state framework are clear. Everyone knows, within a few hundred yards or so, where the borders would be, and a variety of land swaps could be worked out so that Israel could keep some of its major settlements that are on its side of its new security barrier. Perhaps some Israeli land containing Arab communities could be swapped to the Palestinians, but Bush would go along with that only if the affected Arab-Israelis agree. The issue of Jerusalem and the rights of refugees could be compromised along the lines almost agreed to in 2000, with an international fund providing incentives for Palestinian refugees to return to the new Palestinian state. Livni has quietly been meeting with Palestinian moderates, and they support this approach.

Both Rice and Livni face hard-liners in their governments who want to stick to the road map and make any movement on the peace process contingent on the Palestinians halting terrorism and cease-fire violations. But that gives Hamas veto power over all progress and could require Israel to occupy the West Bank indefinitely. "The principle of two nation-states is not only an Israeli gift to the Palestinians but a promotion of Israel's interests," Livni says.

Bush has come down on the side of pursuing a two-state framework now. To White House visitors he has provided his own savvy analysis of Olmert's precarious political situation and how both Olmert and Abbas need a breakthrough. Left unspoken is that Bush could use one as well. That is why he is sending Rice to make such an effort.

A Palestinian-Israeli peace will not solve America's woes in Iraq, of course. But Rice and Livni believe it could serve a broader strategic goal. They see the primary divide in the Middle East as being between the forces of moderation and those of extremism. The rise of Iran and its extremist clients has created a potential alliance among moderate Palestinians, Israelis and the leaders of Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Jordan and the gulf states. "There is a growing understanding among the Israelis, Palestinians and the moderate Arab nations that the real threat is Iran and the radicalism it supports, so it's in all of their interest to work now for a comprehensive solution," says Israel's just-departed ambassador to the U.S., Daniel Ayalon, who is now working on ideas for achieving such a peace.

DOJ_NMG_0115970

In order to create this concert of moderate forces in the Middle East, Rice wants her new Israeli-Palestinian peace process to be done under the auspices of the Saudi proposals of 2002, which suggested that moderate Arab nations would establish relations with Israel as part of a two-state solution. Those countries could also serve as guarantors, custodians and funders if a peace agreement is reached.

Olmert is slightly uneasy about his Foreign Minister's new joint venture. Livni has made it known that she wants to follow in the footsteps of Israel's only other female Foreign Minister, Golda Meir, by becoming Prime Minister someday. Bush, on the other hand, has no such competitive worries about Rice. If she succeeds in creating a Middle East legacy other than the morass in Iraq, so does he.

Fight And Talk (WP)

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

PRESIDENT BUSH promised in his speech Wednesday night to "use America's full diplomatic resources" in support of his new plan to stabilize Iraq. But the tour of the region that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is beginning today looks like a sideshow. Ms. Rice will talk with Israelis and Palestinians and meet with ministers from Egypt, Jordan and the Gulf states; her idea, she told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee yesterday, is "to work with those governments that share our idea of where the Middle East should be going." Since that excludes two of Iraq's neighbors, Iran and Syria, as well as the two countries that now stand in the way of progress in the Palestinian territories and in Lebanon -- again, Iran and Syria -- it's hard to see how her diplomacy can accomplish much.

Indeed, President Bush's speech gave the impression that military steps have priority in the administration's regional policy. The president said he had ordered another carrier group to the area; that Patriot air defense systems would be deployed "to reassure our friends and allies"; and that the United States "will seek out and destroy the networks" supported by Iran and Syria that provide "advanced weaponry and training to our enemies in Iraq." Hours after he spoke, U.S. forces raided an Iranian government office in Irbil, northern Iraq.

Some of this makes sense. Iran and Syria are engaged in their own offensive across the Middle East: In addition to supporting attacks on Americans in Iraq, they are trying to overthrow the pro-Western Lebanese government and are supporting terrorism carried out by the Palestinian Islamic groups Hamas and Islamic Jihad. The first response to that cannot be offers of "engagement"; some pushing back is also needed. Ms. Rice argued yesterday, as she has before, that a Bush administration offer of bilateral talks with Iran before it freezes uranium enrichment would undermine the multilateral effort to stop its nuclear program, while Syria could be expected to make unacceptable demands about Lebanon.

It is nevertheless the case, as former secretary of state James A. Baker III has pointed out, that diplomacy consists of talking to enemies as well as friends. It's even possible to talk to enemies while using sanctions or force against them; certainly the Iranians and Syrians do it.

There are ways in which the administration could step up its diplomatic efforts on Iraq without falling into the traps that Ms. Rice described. The Iraqi government has proposed a regional conference in Baghdad, hoping to include all of its neighbors; the United States should support that idea and join in. Both Ms. Rice and Mr. Bush mentioned the Iraq International Compact, an ongoing U.N.-brokered initiative under which the Iraqi government is to commit itself to economic reforms in exchange for international aid. Iran and Syria already have participated in meetings on the compact, along with the United States. It wouldn't be hard to beef up and expand that process to cover more issues, such as guarantees for Iraq's minority groups and steps to prevent violence from spreading outside the country -- or deterring outside intervention.

Regional diplomacy will not solve Iraq's problems. An Israeli-Palestinian settlement will not cause sectarian warriors in Baghdad to disarm. But given the seriousness of the situation, the administration is foolish not to use every resource at its disposal. Mr. Bush is already pursuing strategies on the ground in Iraq that look like long shots; he should be willing to take more diplomatic chances, as well.

In Arab World, U.S. Approaches Falling Short (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack And Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2007

CAIRO, Egypt — In ordering more American soldiers into Iraq, President Bush said he was sending a message of hope to millions of Arabs and Afghans trapped in violence. But to many on the ground in the Mideast, the speech spoke volumes of a disconnect between U.S. promises and a turbulent reality.

DOJ_NMG_0115971

After years of war and political disillusionment, Bush would have been hard-pressed to come up with any message to please the Arab world. Many here, long mired in bloodshed and sinking deeper into sectarian tensions, hold America squarely to blame for the bloodletting in Iraq and the Palestinian territories.

They say the U.S. presence in Iraq has poisoned the mood so thoroughly that secular and moderate activists stay silent for fear of being tarred as American agents.

"What the United States did for the region is destruction for the forces who believe in democracy, rule of law and human rights," said Raji Sourani, director of the Palestinian Center for Human Rights in Gaza City. "We are the real victims."

The Bush administration has portrayed the invasion of Iraq as a boost, albeit painful, for Arab democracy and human rights. Victory in Baghdad would bring a brighter era to the entire region, U.S. officials have promised.

But after waves of outrage over torture in Abu Ghraib; the spectacle of Saddam Hussein's trial and execution; and religious slaughter in the streets of Baghdad, few people in the region can articulate what, exactly, the United States is trying to accomplish.

"The U.S. should pull out its troops from Iraq because innocent people are dying every day, including U.S. soldiers," said Karim Salhab, a 25-year-old accountant in Beirut. "I don't think it's fair for the families of these soldiers that their kids die for nothing."

Conventional wisdom here holds that, since the U.S. invasion pitched Iraq into civil war, only a U.S. withdrawal could set the nation back on the road toward stability.

"(Bush) mismanaged and brutalized Iraq too long to even hope for stability while the troops stay," said Mohammed el-Sayed Said, an analyst at Cairo's al-Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies. "The reservoir of violence and bitterness and agonies is so huge that hoping for stability in the immediate future is self-deception at best."

If the United States wanted to boost stability, many Arabs say, the Bush administration would aggressively seek a cure for the regional sore spot of Israeli-Palestinian violence.

Bush's announcement comes at a particularly sensitive moment. The region is still reeling with indignation over the images that emerged of Saddam's execution, in which the toppled Sunni Arab president was forced to endure the sectarian taunts of Shiite guards while in the hangman's noose.

Besides rubbing raw nerves by degrading a onetime Sunni leader on the dawn of a sacred Islamic holiday, Saddam's hanging also tapped directly into deep popular fears that the war in Iraq left the country in the hands of Shiites -- shifting the power balance in a way that threatens many Sunnis.

Sunni governments such as Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Jordan are longtime allies to the United States, while Shiite-ruled Iran has long been an American nemesis. But the rise of Shiite political power in post-Saddam Iraq, along with the growing regional influence of Iran, have left many Sunnis feeling insecure.

Foremost among the causes of bloodshed in Iraq, according to an editorial in Thursday's pan-Arab Al-Quds Al-Arabi newspaper, "is the U.S. occupation's bias in favor of one sect at the expense of the other, and its humiliation of the members of the latter in a manner that reveals a strong desire for revenge."

Some Sunnis have fretted quietly about the possibility of a U.S. withdrawal. They fear that Iraq's minority Sunni Arab population, already under attack by Shiite militias, would face even harsher retribution from Shiites after the departure of U.S. soldiers.

But Thursday, those voices were all but silent.

Meanwhile, neighboring Iran also warned against boosting the number of American troops in Iraq.

"The increase in the number of American military forces can escalate insecurity and tension in Iraq and work against solving that country's problems," Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini told reporters in Tehran. "America is trying to accuse and blame other countries for interference in Iraq to cover its policy-making mistakes in that country."

Palestinians said Bush's emphasis on Iraq was backward. Only by making peace between Palestinians and Israelis, they said, would stability come to the region as a whole.

"If there is peace here, there will be peace in Iraq," said Badar Salem, a 26-year-old office worker shopping in the West Bank city of Ramallah. "If Bush solves the Palestinian question first, then he will put an end to extremists, mainly the Islamic extremists, because they will not use the Palestinian question as a pretext for their activities everywhere."

Those sentiments echo the report issued in Washington last month by the Iraq Study Group, which linked stability in Iraq to progress in settling the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

In Afghanistan, people were too focused on "survival and getting through the winter" to pay much heed to Bush's plans for Iraq, said George Varughese, the acting country representative in Afghanistan for the Asia Foundation.

"What happens in Iraq is just not something that's front and center for them," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0115972

---------- Stack reported from Cairo and Ellingwood from Jerusalem. Times staff writers Kim Murphy in London, Laura King in Dubai and special correspondents Raed el Rafei in Beirut, Lebanon, Maher Abukhater in Ramallah and Rushdi abu Alouf in Gaza City contributed to this report.

Iran, Syria Denounce Bush's Iraq Plan (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, January 12, 2007

Iran and Syria on Thursday denounced President Bush's new Iraq strategy that blames them for fueling violence in the war-torn country, and they said the plan to send more U.S. troops would only increase bloodshed. Bush's speech Wednesday night underlined his staunch rejection of recommendations that Washington reach out to Syria and Iran in an attempt to calm Iraq.

Instead, Bush set out plans to isolate the two countries, calling on help from Arab allies and vowing to cut off Syrian and Iranian aid to militants in Iraq. He announced the deployment of an additional aircraft carrier battle group and Patriot air defense missiles to the region — seen as muscle-flexing toward Iran.

In Tehran, Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini said Bush's plan to send 21,000 more troops to Iraq was a "continuation of occupation" that will only "extend insecurity, danger and tension in the country. This will not help to solve Iraq's problems."

Syrian Vice President Farouk al-Sharaa said Wednesday prior to Bush's speech that the American troop surge was "not a positive step" and would only "pour oil on the fire."

Iran has close ties to Shiite militias blamed in Iraq's wave of sectarian killings, and Washington accuses it of providing the fighters with weapons and money. The United States also accuses Syria — Iran's ally — of providing refuge for some leaders of the Sunni-led insurgency and allowing militants to cross its border into Iraq.

As Bush spoke in Washington, U.S.-led multinational forces detained five Iranians in an overnight raid on Tehran's diplomatic mission in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil, local officials said. Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini denounced the raid, saying it reflected a "continuation of pressure" on Iran, aiming to "create tension" between Iraq and its neighbors.

The bipartisan Iraqi Study Group said last month the U.S. should put aside misgivings and engage Syria, Iran and the leaders of insurgent forces in negotiations on Iraq's future.

However, Bush has said he would not deal with countries that fund terrorism. He vowed in his speech Wednesday that U.S. troops will "interrupt the flow of support from Iran and Syria."

Iran and Syria both denied supporting fighters in Iraq. Hosseini said the U.S. was trying to "cover up its wrong policies" by accusing other countries of meddling in Iraq.

The new offensive by U.S. forces, along with Iraqi troops, aims to put down both Sunni insurgents and Shiite militiamen in Baghdad. But there was widespread skepticism in the Arab world that the Shiite-led Iraqi government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki will act against the militias, even though it has said it will.

Iran depicted the U.S. plan as an attempt to control Iraq for the benefit of Israel. Hosseini said the deployment of Patriot missiles in the region "is part of the U.S. policy direction to create a support umbrella for the Zionist regime through an Islamic country."

Commentators in Iran and Syria predicted the new Bush strategy would fail. The plan's "failure will register the name of Bush as a vanquished president in the political history of the U.S.," Iranian state television said in a commentary.

In Damascus, there were signs of disappointment that Washington had rejected the idea of opening a dialogue with the country. Syrian analyst Imad Shueibi, who often reflects the government's view, called Bush's accusations of Syrian and Iranian support for militants "a worthless broken record."

"If Bush wants to ignore Syria, he would thereby ignore the possibility of finding a solution to the situation in Iraq and to stability in the region," he said.

The state-run Syrian newspaper Tishrin predicted "Bush's strategy will be another catastrophe and the Iraqi people will be the only loser."

In the streets of Tehran, there was dismay at the prospect of the U.S. increasing its military presence in neighboring Iraq.

"Sending more troops more means more casualties. Any simple military personnel know it," said Hossein Rahimi, a veteran of Iran's war with Iraq in the 1980s.

"The U.S has already spent a lot for military purposes in Iraq. If it had spend it for reconstruction and development, then Iraq could have been a role model for the whole region," said Reza Mahmoudi, a 50-year-old engineer.

DOJ_NMG_0115973

Iraqi Government Welcomes Bush Strategy (AP)

By Bassem Mroue

AP, January 12, 2007

The Iraqi government spokesman chided the United States, Iran and Syria on Thursday for using his country as a political battleground, saying "we pay the price for the tension" between the three rivals and urging them to improve their relations.

Ali al-Dabbagh also called on Syria and Iran not to interfere in Baghdad's internal affairs. Both have been accused by the United States and Iraq of supporting insurgents and militias that are ravaging Iraq with sectarian war.

"Sometimes we pay the price for the tension in relations between Iran and the United States and Syria and the United States, therefore it is in our interest as Iraqis that these relations improve," al-Dabbagh said. "For that reason, we hope, encourage and are playing a role in bringing closer together their points of view."

The spokesman's comments came as Iraq's government welcomed President Bush's new strategy and promised it was committed to making sure it succeeds.

Ordinary Iraqis, however, gave it mixed reviews, with many expressing skepticism that an increase in U.S. troops would quell the violence ransacking their country.

In a speech broadcast live on Iraqi state television, Bush said he was increasing U.S. troops by 21,500 — including 17,500 in Baghdad, where much of the sectarian violence has been blamed on predominantly Shiite militias.

Sunni lawmaker Hussein al-Falluji rejected Bush's plan to send more troops, calling instead for a timetable for them to withdraw and for direct negotiations with insurgents.

"Bush's plan could be the last attempt to fix the chaos created after the invasion of Iraq. Yet, sending more troops will not end the problem. On the contrary, there will be more bloodshed," al-Falluji said.

Sadiq al-Rikabi, an adviser to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, warned "failure in Iraq will not only affect this country but the rest of the region and the world, including the United States."

"The current situation is not acceptable — not only for the American people but also for the Iraqis and their government. As Iraqis and as an elected government, we welcome the American commitment for success," he said. "The Iraqi government also is committed to succeed."

Al-Rikabi stressed the importance of the Iraqis taking the lead in military operations.

"The American plan cannot succeed without us because we work in the same field in order to defeat violence and terrorism and boost the democratic system," al-Rikabi said.

Baghdad residents from both sects, however, said they were not optimistic Bush's new strategy would end the Sunni-Shiite attacks that have spiraled in the capital and elsewhere since the bombing last February of a revered Shiite shrine in Samarra. Others offered a weary acceptance of any effort to curb the violence after several failed attempts.

"More U.S. troops will mean more wasted blood and more people killed," said Osama Ahmed who works in the Ministry of Higher Education and said he got up early to watch the speech, which aired at 5 a.m. in Iraq. "The violence will surge unless the U.S. administration decides to curb militiamen who are part of the Iraqi government."

He accused the Shiite-dominated government of backing the militias in attacking Sunnis, saying, "There is no point of giving more security responsibilities to the Iraqi government because it is a sectarian government and it is responsible for the violence hitting the country."

Abdel-Karim Jassim, a 44-year-old Shiite trader, said he had hoped Bush would come up with something other than a troop increase.

"Sending more troops will not solve the problem," he said, while acknowledging that Iraq cannot handle security on its own because of "sectarian divisions and the strong militias and insurgents."

Rahim al-Waeli, a 40-year-old Shiite Health Ministry employee, expressed hope the Bush plan would succeed because it included efforts to boost economic aid and job creation.

"I am relatively optimistic because this time the plan is not only about using force, it has some economic and service aspects," he said.

Shiite politician Mariam al-Rayes also welcomed the new effort, but noted opposition from Democrats to the troop increase.

"Some consider President Bush an adventurer," she told the state-run Iraqiya station. "But he has found that his role now is to support this government."

In the past, the Iraqi government has tried to prevent American military operations against the Mahdi Army, the militia loyal to radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, while giving U.S. forces a free hand against Sunni militants. The Bush administration has pushed al-Maliki to curb his militia allies or allow U.S. troops to do the job.

DOJ_NMG_0115974

University professor Hafidh Issam, 49, said the United States had made many mistakes in Iraq and accused it of contributing to the chaos to serve its own interests in the Middle East.

"They built a constant base in Iraq that would be able to threaten the neighboring countries, especially Iran and the gulf countries," he said.

Awad Mukhtar, a 35-year-old technician, said Bush's new proposals could be Iraq's "last chance" for peace.

"The security situation in Iraq is very bad, we are facing death at any moment daily," Mukhtar said. "I see the new Bush strategy as the last chance for Iraqis to save their lives ... we have no other choice, only to wait and see the results."

In Baghdad, Bush Policy Is Met With Resentment (NYT)

By John F. Burns And Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 11 — Iraq's Shiite-led government offered only a grudging endorsement on Thursday of President Bush's proposal to deploy more than 20,000 additional troops in an effort to curb sectarian violence and regain control of Baghdad. The tepid response immediately raised questions about whether the government would make a good-faith effort to prosecute the new war plan.

The Iraqi leader, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, failed to appear at a news conference and avoided any public comment. He left the government's response to an official spokesman, Ali al-Dabbagh, who gave what amounted to a backhanded approval of the troop increase and emphasized that Iraqis, not Americans, would set the future course in the war.

Mr. Dabbagh said that the government's objective was to secure the eventual withdrawal of American troops, and that for that to be possible there had to be security for Iraqis. "If this can be achieved by increasing either Iraqi or multinational forces," he added, "the government, for sure, will not stand against it."

Mr. Dabbagh suggested that much about the Bush plan depended on how circumstances in Iraq would evolve over the coming months — an echo, in its way, of senior Bush administration officials. They have implied that they might halt the month-by-month inflow of additional troops if they think Mr. Maliki is failing to meet the political and military benchmarks Mr. Bush identified as the Iraqi government's part in making the new war plan work.

"The plan can be developed according to the needs," Mr. Dabbagh said. Then he added tartly, "What is suitable for our conditions in Iraq is what we decide, not what others decide for us."

The spokesman's remarks, and a similarly dyspeptic tone that was adopted by Shiite politicians with close ties to Mr. Maliki, pointed to the double-bind Mr. Bush finds himself in. Faced with low levels of public support for his new military push and a Democratic leadership in Congress that has said it will fight him over it, he also confronts the uncomfortable prospect of foot-dragging in Baghdad over the troop increases and the benchmarks he has set for the Iraqis.

While senior officials in Washington have presented the new war plan as an American adaptation of proposals that were first put to Mr. Bush by Mr. Maliki when the two men met in the Jordanian capital of Amman in November, the picture that is emerging in Baghdad is quite different. What Mr. Maliki wanted, his officials say, was in at least one crucial respect the opposite of what Mr. Bush decided: a lowering of the American profile in the war, not the increase Mr. Bush has ordered.

These Iraqi officials say Mr. Maliki, in the wake of Mr. Bush's setback in the Democratic sweep in November's midterm elections, demanded that American troops be pulled back to the periphery of Baghdad and that the war in the capital, at least, be handed to Iraqi troops. The demand was part of a broader impatience among the ruling Shiites to be relieved from American oversight so as to be able to fight and govern according to the dictates of Shiite politics, not according to strictures from Washington.

What transpired, in Mr. Bush's speech on Wednesday night, appears to have been a hybrid: a plan that aims at marrying the Maliki government's urgency for a broader license to act with Mr. Bush's determination to make what American officials here see as a last-chance push for success in Iraq on American terms. And that, as Mr. Bush made clear on Wednesday, implies objectives that will be difficult — many Iraqis say impossible — to square with Mr. Maliki's goals.

The differences seemed clear on Thursday as Iraqis responded to Mr. Bush's speech. In the streets of Baghdad, reactions followed, broadly, the familiar pattern in a city that is more and more divided on sectarian lines. Many Shiites said Iraq's own security forces, which are predominantly Shiite, should be left to do the job of stabilizing the city, while many Sunnis, shocked by the violence of Shiite death squads in recent months, said they would welcome the Americans if they could rein the sectarian killing in.

Mr. Dabbagh, the government spokesman, emphasized the parts of the Bush plan that best suited the Maliki government's political ambitions. He said the "good thing in this plan is that it determines that responsibility should be transferred from the Americans to the Iraqis." This was a prime point with Mr. Bush, too, when he said that the role of American troops under the new plan would be to "help the Iraqis" secure neighborhoods in Baghdad, protect the local population and maintain security in areas that American and Iraqi forces have cleared.

DOJ_NMG_0115975

Within hours of Mr. Bush's speech, American commanders were meeting with their Iraqi counterparts in Baghdad to work out the details of a new command arrangement that would give Mr. Maliki a direct role in overseeing the new crackdown. The Iraqis named a commander for the operation, Lt. Gen. Aboud Gambar, a Shiite from southern Iraq who was a top general in Saddam Hussein's army until the American-led invasion in 2003.

General Gambar will report directly to Mr. Maliki, outside the chain of command that runs through the Defense Ministry, which the Maliki government has long viewed as a bastion of American influence, and, because the defense minister is a Sunni, of resistance to Shiite control. General Gambar will have two deputies, one for the heavily Shiite east part of Baghdad, another for the mostly Sunni west part, and they will oversee nine new military districts, each assigned an Iraqi brigade.

As details of the Bush plan became known on Wednesday, Iraqi officials said that the new arrangements would give Iraqis operational control of the new push in Baghdad. But Mr. Dabbagh and others were quick to pull back on Thursday, acknowledging that Baghdad would remain under American operational control at least until later this year. American officials noted that American officers would be assigned to General Gambar's headquarters, that an American battalion would be twinned with each Iraqi brigade and that every Iraqi unit, down to the company level, would have American military advisers.

If this fell a long way short of the plan for full Iraqi control in Baghdad that Mr. Maliki set out in November, his officials were at pains to say that the prime minister would decide the issue of most concern to the Iraqi leader: whether, and when, Iraqi and American forces would be allowed to move in force into Sadr City. That Shiite working-class district in northeast Baghdad is the stronghold of the Mahdi Army, the most powerful of the Shiite militias, and the main power base of Moktada al-Sadr, the Mahdi Army leader, whose parliamentary bloc sustains Mr. Maliki in office.

"It's been agreed that in order to succeed they have to consult," Mr. Dabbagh said — a bland requirement as he stated it — but some distance from the formula put forward at Washington briefings on the new plan. Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates, at a news conference on Wednesday, said that American and Iraqi troops would be free to go into "all parts of Baghdad, including Sadr City" and that one benchmark in the plan was that there would be no "political interference" with military operations or attempts to protect death squad leaders.

That appeared to be an allusion to the past American experience with Mr. Maliki, who has consistently refused to sanction major offensives in Sadr City. On at least one occasion, he intervened to secure the release of a man captured by American troops and identified by American commanders as a death squad leader with links to Mr. Sadr. Mr. Maliki's argument has been that the solution to the problem of militias, including Mr. Sadr's, must be political, not military, but he has simultaneously postponed any action on a new law to disarm and demobilize the militias.

One of Mr. Maliki's political allies, Sheik Khalid al-Attiya, who is deputy speaker of the Iraqi Parliament, said Thursday that he expected the benchmarks set by Mr. Bush to take 6 to 12 months to be met. With American commanders in Baghdad saying they hope to have the main parts of the city stabilized by late summer — allowing American troops to be pulled back to bases outside the city as Mr. Maliki has demanded — the Americans seem likely to run out of patience with Mr. Maliki long before Mr. Attiya's timetable plays out.

A Shiite political leader who has worked closely with the Americans in the past said the Bush benchmarks appeared to have been drawn up in the expectation that Mr. Maliki would not meet them. "He cannot deliver the disarming of the militias," the politician said, asking that he not be named because he did not want to be seen as publicly criticizing the prime minister. "He cannot deliver a good program for the economy and reconstruction. He cannot deliver on services. This is a matter of fact. There is a common understanding on the American side and the Iraqi side."

Views such as these — increasingly common among the political class in Baghdad — are often accompanied by predictions that Mr. Maliki will be forced out as the crisis over the militias builds. The Shiite politician who described him as incapable of disarming militias suggested he might resign; others have pointed to an American effort in recent weeks to line up a "moderate front" of Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish political leaders outside the government, and said that the front might be a vehicle for mounting a parliamentary coup against Mr. Maliki, with behind-the-scenes American support.

Hussein's Will Sought No Mercy

CAIRO, Egypt, Jan. 11 (AP) — Hours before Saddam Hussein's execution, the ousted Iraqi dictator asked his lawyers not to appeal for his life and accused the United States and Iran of collaborating to hang him, according to a copy of his will.

Mr. Hussein gave his chief lawyer, Khalil al-Dulaimi, the right to "decide whatever is related to me except appealing for the life of Saddam Hussein to any of the presidents, kings, Arabs or foreigners," reads a copy of the will obtained by The Associated Press.

He also asked to be buried in either Ouja, his birthplace, or in Ramadi, the capital of Anbar Province, where many of the country's Sunni Arab insurgents are fighting, depending on his daughter Raghad's decision. He was buried in Ouja.

DOJ_NMG_0115976

Bush Plan Receives Tepid Baghdad OK (WT/AP)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra

The Washington Times, January 12, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Iraq's government gave a tepid endorsement yesterday of President Bush's plan to boost U.S. troops, amid condemnation from Sunni and Kurdish lawmakers, ordinary Iraqis and criticism throughout the Muslim world.

"As Iraqis and as an elected government, we welcome the American commitment for success," said Sadiq al-Rikabi, an aide to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

"The Iraqi government also is committed to succeed," he said.

Mr. al-Rikabi said that the Iraqi government must take the lead in the military action. The plan envisions a "surge" of about 10,000 to 12,000 Iraqi troops to secure Baghdad neighborhoods, along with about 16,000 extra U.S. troops in the capital.

Sunni lawmaker Hussein al-Falluji said the additional U.S. presence will only boost the death toll.

"Bush's plan could be the last attempt to fix the chaos created after the invasion of Iraq. Yet, sending more troops will not end the problem; on the contrary, there will be more bloodshed," he said.

Kurdish lawmaker Mahmoud Othman said the "plan will fail. Sending more troops and financial support will not help if there is no sectarian and political solution."

Abdel-Karim Jassim, a 44-year-old Shi'ite trader, said he had hoped Mr. Bush would come up with something other than the troop increase.

"Sending more troops will not solve the problem," he said.

Iran and Syria denounced the U.S. troop surge and also condemned the plan, a predictable response given Mr. Bush's vow during his Wednesday speech to cut off Syrian and Iranian aid to militants and insurgents.

But there was widespread skepticism in the Arab world that the Shi'ite-led Iraqi government of Mr. al-Maliki will act against Shi'ite militias and death squads.

Mr. Bush "is drowning and trying to get out of the Iraqi trap, but he's submerging deeper," said Salem al-Falahat, head of Jordan's hard-line Muslim Brotherhood Movement, warning that the plan "aims to plunge the region into more destruction and bloodshed and leave Iraq with sectarian hatred for many decades to come."

Mustafa al-Ani, a military analyst with the Gulf Research Center in Dubai, said the American military has to take down the Shi'ite militias -- particularly the feared Mahdi Army, loyal to anti-U.S. cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, an ally of Mr. al-Maliki. Otherwise, the United States will lose any support among Iraq's Sunnis.

"They need to use the same force against the Mahdi Army as they do against al Qaeda. They need to establish new credibility and they must be evenhanded," Mr. al-Ani said.

Mr. al-Maliki has resisted U.S. pressure to move against Sheik al-Sadr's militia, but Iraqi officials said Wednesday the prime minister agreed to crack down, warning his ally that "there will be no escape from attack."

But many in the Arab world profoundly distrust Mr. al-Maliki's government, believing it is serving the interests of Iran, which is predominantly Shi'ite,

"Al-Maliki's government is part of the problem, not the solution," Areeb el-Rentawi, head of the Al-Quds Center for Political Studies, in Amman, Jordan, told Al Jazeera satellite TV.

Mr. Bush said he planned to send 21,500 more U.S. troops to Iraq, with about 16,000 deployed in and around Baghdad.

"Whatever the size of the troops, as long as this is a war between a regular army, in the face of gang-style militant groups, Americans will fail," said Galal Nassar, a fellow with the Nasser Military Academy in Egypt.

"Twenty-one thousand soldiers are a drop in a sea," said Ayed al-Manna, a political science teacher at the Arab Open University in Kuwait. "More U.S. troops would only mean more soldiers to be hunted by insurgents in the absence of a defined plan by Americans and Iraqis."

Bush's New Iraq Strategy 'Makes Sense': Blair (AFP)

By Katherine Haddon

AFP, January 12, 2007

Prime Minister Tony Blair said that US President George W. Bush's policy switch in Iraq "makes sense", while his foreign minister stressed it did not necessarily herald "a change of direction" from London.

"Given the conditions in Baghdad at the moment, I think it makes sense for them to increase the number of their forces, provided it's to back up an increasing Iraqi capability," Blair said in a television interview.

Bush is sending 21,500 extra US troops to Iraq, while Britain's policy is to pull back troops and hand areas including the second city of Basra over to Iraqi control.

DOJ_NMG_0115977

But Blair insisted that troops from the two different countries faced different situations.

Meanwhile, Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett seemed to leave the door open for a possible change in British policy, saying it was not the government's intention "at the present time" to send more troops.

"Obviously it's an issue that people will look at but I would say that it's a change of direction, as the president says, for the United States and doesn't necessarily imply a change of direction for us," she said.

Speaking at a joint session of parliament's defence and foreign affairs select committees, she added that the implications of the US change in policy for Britain would be "somewhat limited".

Blair emphasised that Britain's situation in Basra, southern Iraq, was not comparable to the one faced by the US in the Iraqi capital and said it would be a "misunderstanding" to say that the two countries' policies were diverging.

"The truth is the conditions in Baghdad are different from those in Basra.

"The reason why the Americans are having to surge forces in Baghdad is because the security condition there is completely different," Blair told Westcountry Television during a visit to southwest England.

Britain has to grapple with rival Shiite power blocs while US troops face not only a Sunni Muslim insurgency backed at times by foreign Islamist fighters but also spiraling Shiite-Sunni violence.

Blair said that in Basra, "we don't have the same type of sectarian fighting, we don't have Al-Qaeda operating in the same way" as in Baghdad.

Asked about a report in the Daily Telegraph newspaper that Britain would pull out around 2,700 troops from southern Iraq by the end of May, he would only say it was right that Britain moved to a "support role" once the Iraqi authorities could handle their own security.

The broadsheet said Blair, who is facing growing political and popular opposition to the war in Iraq, will announce the decision within the next two weeks.

It said that after Basra comes under Iraqi control in a few months, the British Army will redeploy to a major base being expanded at Basra air station, while a 200-strong force will remain in central Basra.

Maysan province, currently patrolled by 600 Queen's Royal Lancers, will be handed over by the end of February, according to the report.

Blair's official spokesman said it was premature to talk of withdrawal dates.

With the second-largest troop deployment in Iraq, Britain has been the United States' staunchest ally since the March 2003 invasion of Iraq which toppled the dictator Saddam Hussein.

In a televised address Wednesday, Bush took the blame for strategic blunders in Iraq, ordered 21,500 more US troops into battle, and warned Baghdad's leaders to do more to shore up ebbing US support.

Bush said he aimed to crush terrorists, insurgents and rogue militias and help Iraq's security forces take control of the country by November.

Gates Urges Increase In Army, Marines (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson And Josh White

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates yesterday proposed adding 92,000 troops to the Army and Marine Corps, initiating the biggest increase in U.S. ground forces since the 1960s to shore up a military that top officers warn is on the verge of breaking from prolonged fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The permanent increase of 65,000 soldiers and 27,000 Marines would cost more than $10 billion annually and take five years to achieve, underscoring the Pentagon's conviction that today's wars and anti-terrorism operations will endure for many years. "We call those 'long war' forces," a senior military official said.

The growth also reflects mounting concern among Army leaders over a deepening readiness crisis, as repeated war-zone rotations have worn out troops and equipment, leaving two-thirds of Army combat units in the United States unprepared to deploy. The active-duty Army would increase to 547,000 troops and the Marine Corps to 202,000.

"It will take some time for these new troops to become available for deployment, but it is important that our men and women in uniform know that additional manpower and resources are on the way," Gates told a packed House Armed Services Committee hearing yesterday. Lawmakers have expressed bipartisan support for permanent growth of the military over the past few years and applauded the proposal.

Gates also announced a politically sensitive policy change to allow the remobilization of National Guard and reserve units, in which thousands of reservists who have already served in Iraq could be involuntarily called up for another tour. The major changes -- both sharp reversals from the direction taken by former defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld -- show that Gates is moving on issues that had festered for years at the Pentagon.

DOJ_NMG_0115978

Taken together, the decisions mark an acknowledgment of the degree to which the all-volunteer force has been overextended since 2001, despite dire warnings during the 2000 presidential election by Republican candidates George W. Bush and Richard B. Cheney that the U.S. military was "overused," "under-resourced" and "in decline."

Yesterday, tens of thousands of soldiers and Marines and their families learned that President Bush's call for additional troops in Iraq means their units will be ordered to stay in Iraq longer than planned, or may leave home early for combat.

To help achieve the surge of 21,500 troops, the Pentagon will extend the service of several units already in Iraq. A Minnesota National Guard Brigade with about 4,000 troops in Iraq will stay an extra four months, until August, and two Marine Corps battalions and a Marine Expeditionary Unit with a total of about 4,000 troops in the country will remain there for two or three extra months, the officials said.

In addition, three Army brigades -- two from the Third Infantry Division at forts Stewart and Benning, Ga., and a Stryker Brigade from Fort Lewis, Wash. -- were placed on orders to deploy to Iraq, and Army officials said they could deploy one to two months earlier than scheduled.

Still, Gates and other senior officials strongly suggested that they could withhold these additional forces if Iraqi leaders do not fulfill their pledges for the surge: to provide nine brigades of Iraqi troops to secure Baghdad and lift restrictions on targeting areas such as Sadr City, as well as some individual extremists.

"The timetable for the introduction of additional U.S. forces will provide ample opportunity early on, and before many of the additional U.S. troops actually arrive in Iraq, to evaluate the progress of this endeavor and whether the Iraqis are fulfilling their commitments to us," Gates said earlier yesterday at a news conference in the Old Executive Office Building.

Both Gates and Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said yesterday that the Iraqi government has agreed to lift political restrictions on U.S. operations and that U.S. forces will be allowed to move freely into some areas they have had to avoid. Pace said operations will begin in mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhoods, with Iraqi forces and U.S. troops working together to clear, hold and build areas throughout Baghdad. A combined U.S. and Iraqi command cell would oversee and coordinate the operations, the senior military official said.

Gates and Pace acknowledged, under sharp questioning from members of Congress, that similar efforts failed because there were not enough troops to hold certain areas, then build them back up.

"The analogy that I've used is that the tide came in and the tide went out, and . . . at the end, you couldn't tell there was a difference," Gates said. "The difference is, this time, to try and get some time under the hold phase for the build to actually take place."

Pace said he is confident the strategy will work, but only if political and economic efforts are pursued in earnest alongside the military approach. He said there initially will be an additional 8,000 Iraqi troops in Baghdad -- bringing the total to 50,000 -- and then 7,000 more U.S. troops in Baghdad, bringing the total to 31,000.

Another 10,500 U.S. troops will be "in the pipeline" to go to Iraq if the strategy looks as if it is working, he said.

Still, other officials expressed uncertainty about whether the Iraqis would come through with the required nine brigades. "We're watching them down to the finite details . . . [such as] how many got on the bus?" the senior military official said.

The permanent troop increase and the recalling of Guard and reserve units will not have an immediate impact on the addition of U.S. ground troops in Iraq, which Gates said yesterday would last only several months. But they would be vital to sustaining an escalation -- or even the regular rotation -- over the long term. By January 2008, National Guard combat brigades are expected to be called up for the rotation to provide relief for active-duty combat brigades, including those involved in the current surge, Gates and other senior officials said.

Under the policy change, National Guard and reserve forces will be called up as units, rather than as individuals, meaning that some reservists who have already served in Iraq or Afghanistan will be remobilized without having the planned five years at home. The duration of the call-ups will be shortened, however, from 18 months to one year.

Both active-duty and reserve personnel will be compensated if required to deploy faster than the usual turnaround time.

The total growth in the Army and Marine Corps would cost more than $10 billion a year for payroll and individual gear alone, according to Army data.

The Army has permanent active-duty personnel -- its congressionally authorized "endstrength" -- of 482,000, but in recent years it was allowed to grow temporarily by 30,000, and this year it expects to reach 512,000. Under Gates's plan, the Army would add 7,000 soldiers a year, to reach a total of 547,000 by 2012.

The Marine Corps has a permanent active-duty "endstrength" of 175,000 and has been allowed to increase temporarily to 180,000. It would grow by 5,000 Marines a year to attain a total of 202,000.

Gates Requests 92,000 Increase In Active Forces (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

DOJ_NMG_0115979

The Washington Times, January 12, 2007

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates announced yesterday that he is asking Congress to expand the active armed forces by 92,000 members to meet the demands of what the administration says will be a "long war" against terrorism.

"We should recognize that while it may take some time for these new troops to become available for deployment, it is important that our men and women in uniform know that additional manpower and resources are on the way," Mr. Gates said at a White House press conference to announce a new Iraq war strategy.

Although an increase in "end strength," as the military's active force is called, is not directly related to President Bush's announced new Iraq strategy, it is an outgrowth of the nearly four-year-old war. The stress of deploying Marine and Army ground forces with little rest back home has begun to tear at the fabric of the 1.4 million active force, senior retired officers said.

The 92,000-troop spike is for ground forces, the busiest combatants in the war on terror.

Mr. Gates said he will achieve a 65,000 Army increase over time. First, the 30,000 temporary increase under which the Army has operated will be made permanent. Another 35,000 soldiers will be added at a rate of 7,000 annually for five years. The Army will boost end strength by bolstering recruitment and retention. At the end, the Army will stand at 547,000 soldiers.

The Marine Corps will acquire 27,000 more troops to reach 202,000. It will keep its allotment of 5,000 temporary troops and add 5,000 a year for four years.

Gen. Peter Schoomaker, Army chief of staff, had pressed in recent months for more soldiers, saying the Army was in danger of breaking. His argument did not seem to sway Donald H. Rumsfeld, who as defense secretary approved the temporary increase.

Mr. Gates was more receptive, as was Mr. Bush, after hearing last month from three retired four-star generals who pushed for more soldiers.

Congressional Democrats who criticized Mr. Bush's plan to increase troops in Iraq nonetheless praised the policy of more soldiers and Marines.

"Every time I had a chance to say we need more Army troops, more Marines, I said it," House Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton, Missouri Democrat, said yesterday at a hearing on Iraq. "And I'm delighted to have the president and you, Mr. Secretary, chiming in this chorus. Our soldiers particularly, I feel, are worn out. This increase is a smart policy. I'm more than pleased to say, 'Better late than never.' "

The reason the Army may be "worn out" is that soldiers typically have spent only one year, instead of the usual two years, back in the States before deploying again to war.

Pentagon To Recall Army National Guard Units (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — Confronted with the increasing demands of the Iraq war, the Pentagon announced plans Thursday to recall Army National Guard units that have already fought in Iraq to serve second tours in the war, reversing a long-standing policy that allowed guardsmen to return home for five years before being redeployed.

No new Guard units have been included in the first wave of forces going to Iraq as part of President Bush's 21,500-troop increase announced Wednesday night and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates insisted the change in policy was made independently of the Iraq buildup.

But other Pentagon officials have acknowledged that additional Guard and Army Reserve units are essential to sustaining Bush's increase in combat forces in Iraq over the course of the year. The military likely will need to tap into the pool of previously deployed Guard units this fall to keep 20 combat brigades in Iraq, the level of the surge. Army Reserve units also are affected by the policy change.

"The reserve component are going to have to help bear the burden on the backside of this (build) up," said a senior military official, discussing internal Pentagon decision making on condition of anonymity. "I would presume by this time next year, we would be calling on our reserve component brigades to contribute in Iraq."

Gates also announced he has asked the president to expand the Army and Marine Corps by 92,000 troops, arguing the military's land forces must be increased to meet ongoing threats even beyond the Iraq campaign.

Under the plans, the Army will grow by 65,000 to 547,000 soldiers, the biggest it has been since the end of the Cold War, and the Marines will grow by 27,000 to 202,000. Like the new Guard policy, the decision to enlarge the size of the U.S. military's ground forces is a reversal for the Bush administration.

Former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld objected to expanding the Army and Marines, arguing it would be too costly. The administration's delay in making the decision means the expansion will not help alleviate the strain on the Army and Marines for several years, the amount of time it will take to reach the new limits.

DOJ_NMG_0115980

"It will take some time for these new troops to become available for deployment," Gates said Thursday at a congressional hearing. "But it is important that our men and women in uniform know that additional manpower and resources are on the way."

The changes in policy came as the Army and Marine Corps formally notified five Army combat brigades that they were being rushed to Baghdad as part of Bush's plan to increase American forces in Iraq. One of the units, the 2nd Brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division, was already en route to Kuwait to serve as a backup unit, and now will be redirected to the Iraqi capital.

For each of the next four months, additional Army brigades scheduled to deploy to Iraq this year will head toward Baghdad ahead of schedule.

In February, the 4th Brigade of the 1st Infantry Division will arrive earlier than planned; in March, the 3rd Brigade of the 3rd Infantry Division will be sent; followed in April by the 4th Brigade of the 2nd Infantry Division and in May by the 2nd Brigade of the 3rd Infantry Division.

In addition, two Marine battalions that were scheduled to go home next month -- the 3rd Battalion of the 4th Marine Regiment, and the 1st Battalion of the 6th Marine Regiment -- will have their return postponed by two to three months to provide the extra 4,000 troops needed for western Anbar province.

And a combat brigade from the Minnesota National Guard is being extended by four months to provide extra soldiers for the expanded effort while other units are arriving.

These units will allow U.S. forces levels in Iraq to grow to about 153,000 by the summer. But military planners will have to make another round of decisions starting in July about how they will sustain those troop levels. Several Army brigades are scheduled to return home from July through September, and officials would have to extend their tours to maintain the 20 brigades Bush has ordered.

More than 200,000 guardsmen and reservists have left civilian life over the past five years to serve in Iraq and Afghanistan, and stand to be summoned back into active duty under the policy change. Of 3,018 U.S. military deaths in Iraq, 383 have been soldiers from the Army National Guard, according to icasulaties.com, a research group that tracks military deaths. Another 214 were Army and Marine reservists.

Pentagon officials have said that Guard units most likely to be called up in the next round of deployments are those which were among the first regiments sent to Iraq in 2003 and early 2004.

In an attempt to head off opposition to remobilizing Guard brigades, the Pentagon said it would reduce the length of time Guard units must serve if they are called up again. In previous deployments to Iraq, guardsmen frequently found themselves activated for as long as 18 months, including several months to organize and train and at least a year in the war zone.

Under the new policy, Guard units would only be mobilized for a year, meaning that they would likely spend nine or 10 months in Iraq once sent overseas. In addition, Pentagon officials said guardsmen would receive extra pay if forced to deploy a second time before they have spent five years at home.

Meanwhile, the Pentagon is reviewing its "hardship waiver program," in which both Guard and active-duty Army soldiers can escape deployment if their families would encounter exceptional difficulties related to a repeat tour in Iraq. The review could lead to more such waivers.

Military Eases Its Rules For Mobilizing Reserves (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 — The Pentagon announced steps Thursday to make more reservists available for duty in Iraq and Afghanistan by changing the policies that govern how often members of the Army National Guard and Reserve can be mobilized.

The new rules mean that individual Guard members and entire units that have already been deployed in the last five years may be called up again for as long as 24 consecutive months, officials said. In practice, the Pentagon intends to try to limit future mobilizations to no more than a year, once every five years, Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told reporters.

The policy change was brought on by the prolonged American troop commitments in Iraq and Afghanistan, and military officials said it would have been necessary even if President Bush had not decided to send more than 20,000 additional troops to Iraq.

The change, announced by Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates at a White House news conference, will enable the Bush administration to call up tens of thousands of Guard members who were off limits under the previous rules, without having to issue another politically delicate mobilization order.

The decision to send five active-duty combat brigades to Iraq in the next few months means the Army will need to call up National Guard combat brigades that have already done one-year tours in Iraq, and to do so sooner, officials said.

A senior military official said that by "this time next year," the Pentagon "probably will be calling again on Guard units that have previously done combat tours."

General Pace told reporters that some of the Guard units "that will be mobilized in the coming period will not have had five years since their last mobilization." Some, he said, will have been home for four years and some for only three.

Until now, the Defense Department's policy on employing Guard and Reserve units was that soldiers' time on active duty could not exceed a cumulative total of 24 months in any five-year period. Under the new rules, the cumulative limit is removed.

The result, officials said, is that soldiers who have already done a tour in Iraq in the last five years can now be sent back to Iraq if their entire unit is remobilized. The goal of limiting deployments to a year is meant to offset the burden on Guard members, who must leave civilian jobs to serve.

Until now, many members of the Army National Guard, which has an authorized total strength of 350,000 soldiers, have been deployed to Iraq or Afghanistan as individuals, sometimes for 18 months or longer. Mr. Gates said the Pentagon would now mobilize units, not individuals. Any soldiers who have already done tours will again be eligible, regardless of previous deployments, if their units are called into service.

Britain Signals Plans To Reduce, Not Increase, Troop Levels In Iraq (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 11 — Britain, which had been America's closest and most pliant ally in Iraq, said Thursday that it would not follow the United States in raising troop levels there and signaled that it would proceed with plans to hand over security responsibilities to Iraqi forces in the south.

Britain has about 7,000 troops in Iraq, most in the southern city of Basra, and says the situation there is far less dire than in Baghdad.

Officials here dismissed as speculation, though, a report in The Daily Telegraph on Thursday that those numbers would be cut by 3,000 before the end of May.

British officials offered a cautious welcome for President Bush's announcement but made clear that it would not distract them from trying to reduce British forces. In recent months, senior British commanders have voiced increasing concern that, with thousands of troops also fighting on a second front in Afghanistan, the British Army is overstretched.

The announcement by Mr. Bush of an increase in the American troop level in Iraq spread unease among some opposition politicians here who expressed concern that an American crackdown in Baghdad could provoke fighting in Basra.

"Many of us do not accept the apparent belief of the prime minister that U.S. action in Baghdad can have no conceivable effect on the security position in southern Iraq," said David Heath, a spokesman for the small antiwar Liberal Democrat opposition.

Prime Minister Tony Blair's spokesman, who customarily speaks on condition of anonymity, was asked Thursday whether Mr. Blair supported Mr. Bush's announcement. "What the prime minister fully supports is the efforts of the U.S., as announced, the efforts of the Iraqi government, and our own efforts to create the space and time to allow the Iraqi government to establish its authority and make Iraq a more prosperous country," the spokesman said. He said Britain would not decide on troop reductions until its forces had completed a drive to purge the local police in the areas where they are stationed of what it calls rogue elements.

Margaret Beckett, the foreign secretary, acknowledged that Britain had not marched in lock step with the White House on the current troop issue, as it has been accused of doing in the past by its critics in Europe and at home. Mr. Blair has announced that he will step down this year, and some political analysts say that he wants a significant troop withdrawal from Iraq to offset the damage to his legacy caused by the war there.

Speaking to a parliamentary panel on Thursday, Ms. Beckett said the impact of the change in American strategy would be "somewhat limited" for Britain. "Obviously it's an issue that people will look at, but I would say that it's a change of direction, as the president says, for the United States and doesn't necessarily imply a change of direction for us," she said.

Earlier, she told reporters: "We are dealing with the security situation in Basra. It is not our intention at the present time to send more troops."

She added: "We are under way with the process of handover as the security situation improves. We will make our judgments and our decisions depending on the progress of those events."

Some Britons were openly critical of Mr. Bush's decision. "I do not think that he has put his finger on a solution for the problem," said Sir Jeremy Greenstock, a former senior British envoy to Baghdad. He said he agreed that Baghdad should be the focus and that more American troops were needed.

DOJ_NMG_0115982

But, he said, that alone would not solve the problem. “Other things also have to be brought into this to fill the gap,” he said, “which is represented by the failure of the government in the Green Zone in Baghdad to have any real effect on the sectarian politics.”

Intelligence Chiefs Pessimistic In Assessing Worldwide Threats (WP)

By Dafna Linzer And Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

Iraq is at a violent and "precarious juncture," while al-Qaeda is significantly expanding its global reach, effectively immune to the loss of leaders in battle, Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte told Congress yesterday. He also warned that the Taliban is mounting a vigorous insurgency in Afghanistan, that Pakistan has become a safe haven for top terrorists and that Iran's growing regional power is threatening Middle East stability.

In their annual worldwide threat assessment before the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Negroponte and other top intelligence chiefs provided a bleak assessment of regions and conflicts at the center of President Bush's foreign policy agenda.

One day after Bush unveiled a plan to send more than 21,000 additional troops to work alongside Iraqi troops in an increasingly violent war, the head of the Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency said Iraqi forces could not combat the insurgency there.

Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples said Iraqi security forces have been thoroughly infiltrated by Shiite militias and "are presently unable to stand alone against Sunni insurgents, al-Qaeda in Iraq" or the militias themselves. Negroponte, who was ambassador to Iraq in 2004-05, said sectarian violence had become the greatest problem inside the country.

"The struggle among and within Iraqi communities over national identity and the distribution of power has eclipsed attacks by Iraqis against the coalition forces as the greatest impediment to Iraq's future as a peaceful, democratic and unified state," he said.

The assessments, and Bush's plan for additional troops, drew fierce criticism from the intelligence panel's Democratic chairman, John D. Rockefeller IV (W.Va.). Rockefeller said he is "extremely concerned that well-intentioned but misguided policies of the administration have increased the threats facing our nation, and hampered our ability to isolate and defeat al-Qaeda and other terrorists that seek to strike against the United States."

As they have for several years, the intelligence chiefs said al-Qaeda remains the greatest threat to the U.S. homeland. Negroponte claimed four U.S. successes in 2006 in what Bush has called the global war on terrorism, one being the U.S. military's killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq. Despite Zarqawi's death in June, violence in Iraq has increased substantially.

Maples said that al-Qaeda "has consistently recovered from losses of senior leadership," and that its "increasing cooperation with like-minded groups has improved its ability to facilitate, support and direct its objectives." Negroponte said the group's leaders have found a haven in secure locations in Pakistan.

He said a second major threat stemmed from nuclear weapons in the hands of U.S. enemies, with Iran and North Korea of greatest concern. But, he said, "Iran's influence is rising in ways that go beyond the menace of its nuclear program."

He said Hezbollah in Lebanon, which receives considerable logistical and financial support from Iran, also poses a significant threat in the region. Despite its 34-day war with Israel last summer, "Hezbollah's leadership remains unscathed and probably has already replenished its weapons stockpiles with Iranian and Syrian assistance," Maples said.

Negroponte said stability in Iraq will depend in part on persuading Iran and Syria "to stop the flow of militants and munitions across their borders." For the first time, he said, "forty to 70 foreign fighters every month come over the Syrian border." Maples said foreign fighters account for less than 10 percent of insurgents and usually are recruited as suicide bombers.

The officials said Iran is providing Shiite militias with sophisticated anti-armor projectiles capable of penetrating U.S. armored vehicles. Negroponte added that Iran, in the past, supported the idea of a Shiite-dominated stable Iraq. But he now believes Tehran may be shifting to a more aggressive posture.

Shiite Radicalism Could Fuel Wider Violence, Official Warns (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 — The nation’s top intelligence official said Thursday that the spiraling violence in Iraq, along with Iran’s ascendancy in the Middle East, had led to a rebirth of Shiite Islamic radicalism that could fuel sectarian violence and destabilize nations across the region.

DOJ_NMG_0115983

In his annual presentation on the global threats facing the United States, the departing director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte, spoke of the "shadow" that Iran was casting across the Middle East and warned members of Congress that Iran could be emboldened to dispatch Hezbollah operatives to attack American targets.

Intelligence officials have long assumed that Iran's primary goal in Iraq was establishing a weak, but viable, state dominated by Shiites. But Mr. Negroponte suggested Thursday that Iran's steady arms shipments into Iraq, which American military officials say they have documented, and the political manipulation of Iraqi Shiite politicians could signal that Iran is trying to worsen the sectarian war and anarchy there, rather than seeking relative stability.

In a Senate Intelligence Committee hearing, Mr. Negroponte also testified that Al Qaeda's "resilient" senior leadership continues to play a central planning role from remote hideouts in Pakistan. This conclusion about Al Qaeda reflects a shift in thinking among intelligence officials, who as recently as last summer had assessed that terrorist leaders like Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahri had become largely isolated from their network of supporters, reducing their role to being more inspirational than operational.

As have previous years' assessments, Mr. Negroponte said Al Qaeda remained the organization most capable of carrying out another devastating attack on American soil. But Thursday's testimony from Mr. Negroponte and other top intelligence officials showed a mounting concern about the threat of militant Shiite groups.

Mr. Negroponte cited Iran's burgeoning nuclear weapons program, its flood of oil revenue and Hezbollah's perceived victories against the Israeli Army last summer as signs that both Iran and its client terrorist organization could be interested in moving more aggressively around the globe.

"As a result of last summer's hostilities, Hezbollah's self-confidence and hostility toward the United States as a supporter of Israel could cause the group to increase its contingency planning against United States' interests," Mr. Negroponte said.

He offered no evidence to lawmakers that Hezbollah was planning any attacks.

But committee Democrats, along with some of the Republican minority, chose to spend most of their time with the intelligence officials asking pointed questions about the new strategy for Iraq laid out by President Bush on Wednesday night.

Echoing their colleagues at other hearings throughout the day, the lawmakers expressed deep skepticism that increasing the American troop presence in Iraq could halt the steadily escalating violence there.

"I don't get the feasibility, I don't get the achievability, I don't get the sustainability," said Senator Barbara A. Mikulski, Democrat of Maryland.

The intelligence officials defended the new Iraq strategy, and Mr. Negroponte said it had a good chance of succeeding despite Iraq's "precarious" state.

The Central Intelligence Agency director, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, said that so far the Iraqi government had fallen short in its efforts to halt sectarian violence. "The track record of this government isn't one that would give you great confidence," General Hayden said.

The other intelligence officials who testified at the hearing were Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples of the Defense Intelligence Agency, Robert S. Mueller III of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and Randall M. Fort, who leads the Bureau of Intelligence and Research at the State Department.

The officials agreed that the Iraq war had helped fuel Islamic radicalism around the globe and had most likely bolstered the recruiting efforts of Al Qaeda.

The takeover of the American Embassy in Tehran in 1979 and the bombing of the Marine barracks in Beirut in 1983 made Shiite radicalism a primary concern of American officials during the 1980s and much of the 1990s. It was not until the rise of Osama bin Laden's Al Qaeda network in the mid-1990s that parallel concerns about Sunni extremism grew among intelligence officials and terrorism experts.

But intelligence officials point to last February's bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra, a sacred Shiite shrine, as a watershed moment that stoked Shiite anger throughout the Middle East and set off a wave of reprisals against Sunnis inside Iraq.

Mr. Negroponte said Thursday that governments across the region were concerned that the violence in Iraq could spill across the country's borders and embolden ethnic minorities to carry out attacks against majority sects.

He also warned of the successes that a resurgent Taliban is having in Afghanistan in its attempts to destabilize the government of President Hamid Karzai.

The intelligence chief said the Taliban "probably" does not directly threaten the viability of Mr. Karzai's government. At the same time, he said the Taliban is achieving more limited goals of impeding economic development in southern and eastern Afghanistan and undermining popular support for the government in Kabul.

Intelligence Officials See Growing Sectarian Split In Iraq (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, January 12, 2007

Sectarian divisions and related violence in Iraq are growing, as al Qaeda remains the most serious national-security threat facing the United States, senior U.S. intelligence officials told Congress yesterday.

Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte said during the annual threat briefing for the Senate intelligence committee that "sectarian divisions are widening," despite efforts by the new government.

Defense Intelligence Agency Director Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples told the hearing that "violence in Iraq, as measured over the past year, continued to increase in scope, complexity and lethality.'

The intelligence officials painted a dire picture of the insurgency in Iraq and spoke a day after President Bush announced a new plan to stabilize Baghdad with an additional 21,500 troops.

Mr. Negroponte said Iraq is "at a precarious juncture."

"Communal violence accelerated by the attack on the Samarra mosque in February 2006 -- and scant common ground between Shi'as, Sunnis and Kurds have polarized politics," Mr. Negroponte said.

Additionally, political factions are unable to compromise on key issues and public services are inadequate, including a decline in the daily hours of electrical power, while oil output remains below prewar levels, he said.

"With political reconciliation stalled, Iraqis increasingly resort to violence," Mr. Negroponte said.

The government's most senior intelligence official said stabilizing Iraq in the next year will depend on the Iraqi government's ability to create national instead of sectarian-ruled institutions.

Additionally, Mr. Negroponte warned that the terrorist threat from the Iranian-backed terror group Hezbollah is increasing. He noted that recent fighting by Hezbollah against Israel in Lebanon, "could cause the group to increase its contingency planning against U.S. interests."

On China, Mr. Negroponte said Beijing is continuing its rapid military buildup, including placing large numbers of missiles opposite Taiwan, but despite this, "prospects of a cross-strait conflict with Taiwan have diminished."

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III told the hearing that al Qaeda is planning attacks in the United States through "infiltrating operatives" from overseas and that the group is seeking to use some form of chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear material in weapons.

"Al Qaeda's choice of targets and attack methods will most likely continue to focus on economic targets such as aviation, the energy sector and mass transit; soft targets such as large public gatherings; and symbolic targets such as monuments and government buildings," Mr. Mueller said.

Gen. Maples,, said some developments in Iraq "give hope for progress," although "the Sunni Arab-based insurgency continues to gain strength and capacity."

The three-star general also warned that Iraq is in danger of a breakdown of central authority that would pose a threat to the Iraq, the region and U.S. strategic interests.

"DIA judges that continued coalition presence is the primary counter to a breakdown of central authority," Gen. Maples said.

"The conflict remains a sectarian struggle for power and the right to define Iraq's future identity," Gen. Maples said, noting that attacks averaged 160 per day in December, down slightly from 180 a day in October.

Ten percent of the insurgents in Iraq are foreign terrorists, many of whom are dispatched to the country to conduct suicide car bombings, Gen. Maples said.

US Names Retired Diplomat At Iraq Reconstruction Chief (AFP)

AFP, January 12, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced the appointment of a retired diplomat, Timothy Carney, to head a US push to boost Iraq's moribund economy.

Carney, a former ambassador to Haiti and Sudan, will be the Coordinator for Iraq Transitional Assistance under President George W. Bush's just announced new plan for stabilizing Iraq, she said.

"Our military operations must be fully supported and integrated with our civilian and diplomatic efforts across the entire US Government to help Iraqis clear, hold and build throughout all of Iraq," she said.

Rice said a key element of the new strategy will involve increasing the number of so-called Provincial Reconstruction Teams (PRT) tasked with helping develop economic projects and provide jobs.

"We are ready to strengthen, indeed, to surge our civilian efforts," she said, saying the number of PRT's around Iraq will be increase from 10 to 18, including five new units for Baghdad and a tripling of the teams in Anbar province, a center of anti-US insurgency, from one to three.

DOJ_NMG_0115985

In his speech Wednesday night, Bush announced that Washington would spend an additional one billion dollars on Iraq reconstruction and that the Iraqi government of Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki had pledged to devote 10 billion dollars to rebuilding and economic development.

The Bush administration has already sent 21 billion dollars to Iraq for reconstruction and job creation projects, including efforts to rebuild key infrastructure like electricity production and water treatment.

But many of the projects were destroyed by anti-US insurgents and significant sums were lost to corruption.

Carney will oversee the enhanced PRTs operations from Baghdad she said, noting that the former diplomat has "experience in post-conflict stabilization and reconstruction and development" from his time in Haiti.

Carney, a 32-year foreign service veteran, was the US ambassador to Haiti in 1998 and 1999 after holding the top US post in Khartoum from 1995 to 1997.

He served briefly with the US occupation authority in Iraq immediately after the March 2003 invasion which toppled Saddam Hussein.

Earlier in his career, Carney served in Vietnam and Cambodia during the Vietnam War, and Lesotho and South Africa before the end of apartheid and worked with UN peacekeeping operations, including in Somalia, the State Department said.

U.S. Detains 6 Iranians In Irbil Raid (AP)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra

AP, January 12, 2007

U.S.-led multinational forces detained six Iranians Thursday at an Iranian government office in the northern city of Irbil, Iraqi officials said, as President Bush accused Iran and Syria of aiding militants and promised to "interrupt" the flow of support as part of his new war strategy.

The U.S. military said it had taken six people into custody in the Irbil region but made no mention of a raid on the Iranian government office.

The forces entered the building about 3 a.m., detaining the Iranians and confiscating computers and documents, two senior local Kurdish officials said, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the information. Irbil is a city in the Kurdish-controlled northern part of Iraq, 220 miles from Baghdad.

A resident living near the building said the troops used stun bombs and brought down an Iranian flag from the roof. As the operation went on, two helicopters flew overhead, the resident said on condition of anonymity for fear of reprisals.

At the Pentagon, a senior U.S. military official said the building was not a consulate and did not have any diplomatic status. The six Iranians were taken in a "cordon-and-knock" operation, said the official who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to release the information.

Iraqi government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh said Baghdad was seeking clarification from the U.S. and Iran "about these people and what they were doing there and whether they were employees."

The regional Kurdish government condemned the arrests and called for the immediate release of the Iranians. It added that the government "was not aware in advance of the raid."

Iran's Foreign Ministry summoned the Iraqi and Swiss ambassadors in Tehran and "demanded an explanation" about the incident. Switzerland represents American interests in Iran, where there is no U.S. embassy.

Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini told state-run radio the raid was "against a diplomatic mission" since the "presence of Iranian staffers in Irbil was legal." Hosseini claimed the action by coalition forces reflected a "continuation of pressure" on Iran, aiming to "create tension" between Iraq and its neighbors.

Late last month, the White House said U.S. troops elsewhere in Iraq detained two Iranians during a raid on suspected insurgents and released two others who had diplomatic immunity. A Pentagon official said U.S. forces had found "indications and evidence" that two of the Iranians were involved in the transfer from Iran to Iraq of technology to make small bombs.

Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said the U.S. military would continue to target networks of individuals, regardless of their nationality, that are providing weapons designed to kill American troops in Iraq.

"I think it's instructive that in the last couple of weeks two of those raids that we conducted to go after these folks that are providing these kinds of weapons — two of those raids had policed up Iranians. So it is clear that the Iranians are complicit in providing weapons," he said.

The arrests come as tensions are high between Iran and the United States. The Bush administration has accused Iran of seeking to develop nuclear weapons and of helping fuel violence in Iraq. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, meanwhile, is trying to expand Tehran's role in Iraq as a counter to U.S. influence in the Persian Gulf region.

Al-Dabbagh, the Iraqi government spokesman, said any improvement in relations between the United States, Syria and Iran would only help Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0115986

"Sometimes we pay the price for the tension in relations between Iran and the United States and Syria, therefore it is in our interest ... that these relations improve, but not at the expense of Iraq," he said.

Bush's new strategy, however, ignores key recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, which in December called for a new diplomatic offensive and an outreach to Syria and Iran. Instead, the president accused both countries of aiding terrorists and insurgents in Iraq.

"We will disrupt the attacks on our forces," Bush said. "We will interrupt the flow of support from Iran and Syria."

Politicians and ordinary Iraqis, meanwhile, expressed skepticism Thursday that Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq will quell the violence in their country, but some offered weary acceptance of any effort to stop the carnage after several failed past attempts.

The varied reactions underscore the challenges facing the Shiite-dominated Iraqi government, which is under pressure to rein in predominantly Shiite militias as well as Sunni insurgents as both sides have killed thousands in spiraling sectarian attacks.

An aide to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki welcomed the new strategy but stressed that the government must take the lead in the military action. The plan also envisions 10,000 to 12,000 Iraqi troops to secure Baghdad neighborhoods, and al-Maliki has announced plans for a new Iraqi security operation, although similar past efforts have been unsuccessful.

"The failure in Iraq will not only affect this country only but the rest of the region and the world, including the United States," al-Maliki aide Sadiq al-Rikabi said.

"The current situation is not acceptable — not only for the American people but also for the Iraqis and their government. As Iraqis and as an elected government we welcome the American commitment for success," he added. "The Iraqi government also is committed to succeed."

A Sunni lawmaker rejected the plan to send more U.S. troops and called instead for a timetable for them to withdraw, while other critics from both sects said it wouldn't succeed because of the power of mostly Shiite militias that have been blamed for much of the recent sectarian violence.

"Bush's plan could be the last attempt to fix the chaos created after the invasion of Iraq. Yet, sending more troops will not end the problem, on the contrary, there will be more bloodshed," said Sunni lawmaker Hussein al-Falluji.

Kurdish lawmaker Mahmoud Othman said the "plan will fail. Sending more troops and financial support will not help if there is no sectarian and political solution."

Osama Ahmed, a 50-year-old Sunni who works in the Ministry of Higher Education, said he got up early to watch the speech, which was broadcast live at 5 a.m. Thursday on Iraqi state television.

"More U.S. troops will mean more wasted blood and more people killed," Ahmed said. "The violence will surge unless U.S. administration decides to curb militiamen who are part of the Iraqi government."

Abdel-Karim Jassim, a 44-year-old Shiite trader, said he had hoped Bush would come up with something other than the troop increase.

"Sending more troops will not solve the problem," he said, although he acknowledged that "Iraqis cannot handle security issue on their own because of the sectarian divisions and the strong militias and insurgents."

Awad Mukhtar, a 35-year-old technician, said Bush's new proposals could be Iraq's "last chance" for peace.

"The security situation in Iraq is very bad, we are facing death at any moment daily," Mukhtar said. "I see the new Bush strategy as the last chance for Iraqis to save their lives ... we have no other choice, only to wait and see the results."

G.I.'s In Iraq Raid Iranians' Offices (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, January 12, 2007

ERBIL, Iraq, Jan. 11 — American troops backed by attack helicopters and armored vehicles raided an Iranian diplomatic office in the dead of night early Thursday and detained as many as six of the Iranians working inside.

The raid was the second surprise seizure of Iranians by the American military in Iraq in recent weeks and came a day after President Bush bluntly warned Iran to quit meddling in Iraqi affairs.

There was a tense standoff later in the day between the American soldiers and about 100 Kurdish troops, who surrounded the American armored vehicles for about two hours in this northern Iraqi city.

The attack was denounced by senior Kurdish officials, who are normally America's closest allies in Iraq but regarded the action as an affront to their sovereignty in this highly tribal swath of the country. Iran's Foreign Ministry reacted in Tehran with a harsh denunciation that threatened to escalate tensions with the Bush administration.

The American military said that it had been "conducting routine security operations in Erbil Jan. 11 and detained six individuals suspected of being closely tied to activities targeting Iraqi and coalition forces. One individual was released and five remain in custody."

DOJ_NMG_0115987

American officials have long accused Iran of sending weapons and money into Iraq. In late December the American military detained a number of Iranians in Baghdad, including two diplomats and two who turned out to be senior Iranian military officials. The diplomats were released but the others were forced to leave Iraq under suspicion that they had been working with Shiite militias. The incident also comes at a time when tensions are high between the United States and Iran over its nuclear program.

The incident was a major embarrassment for the Iraqi government, which has been trying to foster initiatives with its neighbor for improving regional security and trade, as well as other issues, and it calls into question the extent of Iraqi control over its own affairs.

In Thursday's raid, attack helicopters roared above the normally placid neighborhood here, as American troops backed by armored vehicles broke into the office at around 3:30 a.m., carrying away documents and computer equipment.

American Black Hawk helicopters also swooped over the confrontation with the Kurdish troops, and at least two landed, said an American witness. But there were no reports of shots being fired, and the incident ended peacefully.

Witnesses said the attack was directed at a building that an American official described as a liaison office that was properly accredited with Iraq as an Iranian government facility. It was unclear whether the Iranians who were arrested carried diplomatic passports and whether the office was supposed to share some of the immunities enjoyed by embassies and consulates.

Local residents said the main function of the office was to process papers for people who want to go to Iran for visits or medical treatment.

Muhammad Ahmad, who lives near the neighborhood, known as Old Korea, said that he was awakened by shooting and helicopters. "These kinds of actions are totally unacceptable and the Kurdish leadership is very angry," said Fuad Hussein, the spokesman for the president of the semiautonomous territory, Massoud Barzani. Mr. Hussein called the raid an "abduction."

The Iranian government said the raid violated international law and demanded the detainees' release.

"This is a provocative action by the United States and is against all international laws and regulations," said the Foreign Ministry spokesman, Mohammad Ali Hosseini, the state-run radio reported.

"The Americans are following two aims," he said. "They want to continue their pressure against Iran and, secondly, to create tension among Iraq's neighbors."

He added: "The provocative and mischievous actions cannot damage the friendly relations with Iraq."

A senior State Department official said that the Iranian office in Erbil was not technically a consulate, but rather a liaison office which also provided some consular services.

He said that American officials believed that the Iranians intended to turn the office into a consulate at some point, but that had not yet happened. Therefore, he said, the State Department does not consider the office to be Iranian territory.

Thursday afternoon, the Kurdish interior minister, Karim Sinjari, appeared surprised when an American reporter asked him during a meeting with American businessmen to confirm the raid on the liaison.

"Yes," Mr. Sinjari said tightly. "It was American-led." Asked for further details, he said: "We have no information. They did it by themselves." He then cut off questions.

The standoff began around 11 a.m. in Einkawa, a pleasant and predominantly Christian suburb of Erbil where many Western officials live and keep offices. Possibly angered by the earlier raid, the Kurdish forces refused to let several American Humvees through a checkpoint.

"It was the Americans' fault," said a Kurdish guard from the checkpoint, who refused to give his name. "We asked them to stop but they did not stop. That is why we pointed our guns at each other."

The standoff, while tense, was carefully controlled by the Kurds. The American who witnessed it said that as the lines of traffic lengthened on the blocked road, the Kurds began waving cars through and they drove directly past the stopped Humvees.

The Iranian Foreign Ministry summoned the Iraqi and Swiss ambassadors in Tehran in protest, and demanded the immediate release of what it called diplomats, the state-run television reported.

The Swiss represent American interests in Tehran. The United States has had no embassy in Iran since 1979, when radical students attacked the American Embassy in Tehran and took 44 diplomats hostage.

Mr. Hosseini told state-run television on Thursday that the consulate in Erbil was set up after coordination with Iraqi officials and that "it was involved in consulate work."

A measured statement late in the day from Mr. Barzani's office expressed "its sadness over these actions," indicating that it believed the building had diplomatic immunity. "It is better to inform the Kurdistan government before taking actions against anybody," the office said.

The American military said in a statement that "the documents and equipment that were removed will be examined to determine the extent of the alleged illegal or terrorist activity. Based on the outcome of that investigation, appropriate action will be taken regarding the detainees."

DOJ_NMG_0115988

U.S. Raids In Northern Iraq Nab Several Iranians (MERCN)

By Jonathan S. Landay And Nancy A. Youssef

The San Jose Mercury News, January 12, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq - U.S. troops detained at least five Iranians in two raids in northern Iraq just hours before President Bush vowed in a nationally televised speech to clamp down on support that Iran allegedly is providing to militants in Iraq, Iraqi officials said Thursday.

Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshayr Zebari called the U.S. raids "very, very embarrassing." One resulted in the arrest of legitimate Iranian diplomats and the second nearly triggered a gunfight between American and local Iraqi security forces, he said.

In Washington, several senior Democratic and Republic lawmakers expressed alarm that Bush's plan to interdict alleged support for Iraqi insurgents could lead to secret military strikes inside Iran and Syria. Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., warned that such action would require congressional approval, while Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Nebraska, called the policy "very, very dangerous."

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said operations will take place only inside Iraq and that there were no plans for cross-border strikes. But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said that President Bush "isn't going to rule anything out to protect our troops."

The Pentagon announced Thursday that as part of the new strategy, the USS John C. Stennis, an aircraft carrier, and its strike group - five surface ships, a submarine, a support vessel and about 80 aircraft - and an Army battalion of four Patriot air defense missile batteries were being ordered to the region to boost security.

A senior defense official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue, said that the ships were being sent in part to signal to Iran and Syria and "anyone else who thinks the United States is cutting and running (from Iraq) that it is not."

In unveiling his new Iraq policy, Bush laid out a tougher policy toward Iran, which he accused of supplying arms to Iraqi militants, and toward Syria, which he said allows terrorists to cross into Iraq.

He repeated a long-standing U.S. charge that Iran is secretly developing nuclear weapons and vowed the United States would work to prevent Tehran from "dominating" the Middle East.

Senators grilling Rice warned that an overly aggressive U.S. response would risk escalating frictions throughout the already tension-fraught region.

Both Tehran and Damascus have supporters in Iraq who could retaliate against U.S. forces or the Iraqi government. Both countries could also sponsor attacks by Islamic extremists on American targets in the Middle East or other parts of the world.

Bush has spurned bipartisan calls to negotiate with Iran and Syria.

The U.S. raids in Irbil, the main city of the semi-autonomous Kurdistan region, came just hours before Bush's speech.

At around 2 a.m. local time, U.S. troops stormed a building that functioned as an Iranian consulate, arrested five men and seized computers and files, Iraqi officials said.

A U.S. military statement confirmed the raid and said six persons closely tied to attacks on U.S. and Iraqi forces had been arrested.

It did not disclose the names or nationalities of the detainees.

The regional Kurdish government called the arrests unacceptable, complaining that local authorities had not been forewarned of the operation.

Mithal Alusi, a member of the national Parliament, charged that the detainees were Iranian intelligence officers involved in terrorist activities in northern Iraq. He insisted that they did not have diplomatic status.

Iraqi Foreign Minister Zebari, however, told McClatchy Newspapers that the Iranian office had operated in Irbil for more than 10 years and the Iranians were in Iraq legally. "This is very, very embarrassing," he said. "The Iraqi government was aware of who was in that office."

Later Thursday, U.S. forces staged a second raid, attempting to enter Irbil airport and abduct a group of unidentified individuals, he said.

Members of a Kurdish paramilitary force known as peshmerga confronted the Americans when they refused to identify themselves, and a gun battle was narrowly averted "at the 11th hour," said Zebari.

He said U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad told him that the first raid was aimed at people who were trying to harm U.S. troops. Khalilzad said he was unaware of the operation at the airport.

Zebari said the raids were part of a pattern of stepped up U.S. operations against Iranian operatives. "That is in line with their approach, yes."

U.S. troops detained several Iranian diplomats and officials last month in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0115989

The issue dominated the opening of Rice's Senate hearing yesterday.

Biden, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, pressed Rice on whether operations against alleged Iranian and Syrian support networks would include cross-border strikes against "persons . . . or governments."

"Obviously the president isn't going to rule anything out to protect our troops, but the plan is to take down these networks in Iraq," she replied.

She sidestepped a question about whether Bush could mount cross-border operations without Congress' approval.

"I believe . . . he does need congressional authority to do that," replied Biden.

Biden later wrote to Bush asking him to state whether he believed he had the constitutional authority to order cross-border strikes without congressional authorization.

Rice's answers also failed to satisfy Hagel, an Army veteran of the Vietnam war, who said that former President Nixon "lied" in denying that he had ordered U.S. forces to invade Cambodia in 1970.

"No one in our government can sit here today and tell Americans that we won't engage the Iranians and the Syrians cross-border," said Hagel. "When you set in motion the kind of policy that the president is talking about here, it's very, very dangerous."

Pentagon Intensifies Pressure On Iran (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Even as President Bush seeks larger numbers of troops to stabilize Iraq, the Pentagon is intensifying operations there on another front: challenging Iran over its alleged role in destabilizing its Arab neighbor.

Yesterday, multinational forces including U.S. troops detained six Iranian officials in Iraqi Kurdistan suspected of aiding Shiite Muslim militants in Iraq. It was the second detainment by U.S.-led forces of Iranian officials in Iraq in less than a month. The U.S. and its allies have also sought to seal off Iran's ability to penetrate Iraq and ship arms there, with British forces stepping up patrols along the Iran-Iraq border and U.S. warships and aircraft carriers increasing patrols in the Persian Gulf. Mr. Bush, in his speech to the nation Wednesday, announced the deployment of a second aircraft-carrier battle group to patrol the Gulf.

And the Pentagon has significantly increased its intelligence activities targeting suspected Iranian agents and Shiite Muslim militants, U.S. intelligence officials said. Besides working with Iraqi security forces, the U.S. has intensified information-sharing with dissident Iranian groups such as Mujahedin-e Khalq, according to officials associated with the group.

U.S. officials say the intensifying actions targeting Iran are central to the new White House push to underpin the shaky government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. They come against a backdrop of growing, broader tensions between Washington and Tehran, over Iran's suspected pursuit of nuclear weapons, U.S. efforts to curb Iran's financial transactions and Tehran's moves to increase its influence throughout the Middle East.

Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of state for political affairs, said the administration is seeking to counter Iranian provocations across the region as part of a broader strategy. "Iran needs to learn to respect us," he said. "And Iran certainly needs to respect American power in the Middle East."

Some U.S. lawmakers and many Arab officials fear the U.S.'s latest tactics could stoke a broader regional conflict.

A number of Democratic and Republican lawmakers yesterday drew analogies to the Vietnam War, when American military activities secretly moved into neighboring Cambodia and Laos from Vietnam. These lawmakers said U.S. efforts to target insurgents and alleged Iranian agents in Iraq could spill over into Iran and Syria, and potentially spark wider, sectarian conflicts between Sunni and Shiite Muslims around the region.

"When you set in motion the kind of policy that the president is talking about here, it's very, very dangerous," said Sen. Chuck Hagel, a Republican from Nebraska and a Vietnam veteran.

Mr. Bush Wednesday hinted at a significant hardening of policy toward Iran and Syria, saying the U.S. "will seek out and destroy the networks providing advanced training and weaponry to our enemies in Iraq." Mr. Bush and other U.S. officials have regularly accused Iran and Syria of arming and funding militants fighting in Iraq, charges both countries deny.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice pushed an even-harder line toward Tehran yesterday. Washington "will continue to work with the Iraqis and use all our power to limit and counter activities of Iranian agents who are attacking our people and innocent civilians in Iraq," she said.

The White House's emerging policy on Iran's role in Iraq directly counters recommendations made last month by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group. The congressionally funded group, headed by former U.S. Secretary of State James Baker and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton, had recommended that the U.S. directly engage Tehran and Damascus to build a regional consensus on how to stabilize Iraq.

Bush administration officials working on Middle East policy said the White House's moves to confront Tehran directly in Iraq predates the ISG study, having been in development for nearly six months. From the earliest days of the U.S. invasion of Iraq in 2003, Pentagon officials have voiced fears that Iran was using the fall of Saddam Hussein to increase its influence among Iraqi Shiites, who constitute a majority in the country but had lived under Sunni Muslim rule for decades prior to Mr. Hussein's fall.

DOJ_NMG_0115990

And U.S. intelligence officials said that during the past year, they have noticed a significant increase of munitions and designs for the construction of improvised explosive devices, or IEDs, coming across the Iranian border. IEDs are the largest killers of U.S. soldiers in Iraq, according to the Pentagon.

Of particular concern to Pentagon planners is the alleged role of Qods Force, the international arm of Tehran's Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps, in trafficking IEDs into Iraq, intelligence officials said. The guard corps is believed to have developed close ties to both the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia headed by the Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, and the Badr Brigade, the militant arm of Iraq's largest Shiite political party, the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq.

The Pentagon moves in Iraq to arrest Iranian diplomats in both Irbil and Baghdad over the past month were directly aimed at trying to stanch the flow of IEDs and other armaments into Iraq, U.S. officials involved in the program said. The U.S. has alleged that the Revolutionary Guard corps has used front companies and religious foundations to move some of these armaments over the Iran-Iraq border. And U.S. officials said they have extensive intelligence showing many of the diplomats detained were senior members of the corps.

The Iranian government immediately protested the U.S. moves, while Iraqi and Kurdish officials asked the U.S. to show restraint in confronting Iran. Baghdad views Tehran as an increasingly important economic partner and crucial to its internal stability. "Sometimes we pay the price for the tension in relations between Iran and the U.S. and Syria," said Iraqi government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh, according to the Associated Press.

Aside from escalating strains between the U.S. and Iran, Middle East analysts said Mr. Bush's new Iraq strategy -- such as adding more than 10,000 troops in Baghdad -- will inevitably increase tensions between American forces and the Mahdi Army, which controls much of the Iraqi capital, and that an escalation in fighting could turn Iraq's Shiite majority even further against the U.S.

Of more concern to U.S. lawmakers is the potential that these U.S. actions against Iran could escalate. Under one possible scenario, U.S. forces could cross into Iran or Syria in pursuit of suspected insurgents or their allies, or use alleged Iranian activities inside Iraq as a pretext for a wider assault on Iran. The fear is that any such military activities could ignite a wider conflict.

"The potential for sparking a wider conflict is great," said Trita Parsi, an Iran analyst and president of the National Iranian American Council in Washington. "I think that if we're going for a confrontation with Iran, the pretext will be Iraq."

U.S. Troops Raid 2 Iranian Targets In Iraq, Detain 5 People (WP)

By Robin Wright And Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, January 12, 2007

U.S. troops launched two raids on Iranian targets in Iraq yesterday, following through on President Bush's vow to confront and break up Tehran's networks inside Iraq. Five Iranians were detained, and vast amounts of documents and computer data were confiscated, according to U.S., Iraqi and Iranian officials.

The two raids are part of a new U.S. intelligence and military operation launched last month against Iran, U.S. officials said. The United States is trying to identify and detain top officials of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards' al-Quds Brigade operating in Iraq. The al-Quds Brigade is active in arming, training and funding militant movements, such as Lebanon's Hezbollah, throughout the Middle East.

"Throughout Iraq, operations are currently ongoing against individuals suspected of being closely tied to activities targeting Iraqi and Coalition forces," the headquarters of the U.S.-led Multi-National Force-Iraq said in a statement yesterday.

While the public focus is on Iraq, the administration is now spending as much time on plans to contain Iran as on a strategy to end Iraq's violence, U.S. officials said.

Last month, U.S. forces seized two senior Iranians -- Brig. Gen. Mohsen Chirazi and Col. Abu Amad Davari -- in the first round of raids. Chirazi is the No. 3 official in the al-Quds Brigade and the highest ranking Iranian ever held by the United States.

Yesterday's raids were both in Irbil, a Kurdish city in northern Iraq. One was carried out at 3 a.m. on the Iranian Liaison Office, which is used by the Iranian Revolutionary Guards as a local headquarters, U.S. officials said. Kurdish officials said U.S. troops came in helicopters. They disarmed the security guards, broke through the gate, entered the building and detained six men, Iranian officials told the Iranian news agency. One was later released.

The other raid was at the Irbil airport, where U.S. forces tried to detain people until Kurdish troops intervened -- and almost ended up in a confrontation with U.S. troops, said Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari. "A massacre was avoided at the last minute," he said. A U.S. official confirmed that the incident nearly resulted in U.S. and Kurdish allies firing at one another.

DOJ_NMG_0115991

The action in Irbil is one of the genuinely new additions to the U.S. strategy in Iraq. Bush said Wednesday that the United States will now "seek out and destroy the networks" arming and training U.S. enemies. He also announced that he is ordering another aircraft carrier and supporting ships to the Persian Gulf area near Iran in a show of force.

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, the Joint Chiefs of Staff chairman, charged yesterday that Iran is "complicit" in providing weapons designed to kill American troops. "We will do all we need to do to defend our troops in Iraq by going after the entire network regardless of where those people come from," he said at a news conference with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates.

Rice outlined a carrot-and-stick strategy, offering to meet with her Iranian counterpart "anytime, anywhere" to discuss "every facet" of U.S.-Iranian relations -- with the condition that Tehran suspend its program for enriching uranium, which can be used for nuclear weapons as well as for generating energy. Until that time, she said, the United States will "use all our power to limit and counter the activities of Iranian agents who are attacking our people and innocent civilians in Iraq."

Rice effectively dismissed a key recommendation of the Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan panel that last month urged the administration to launch a dialogue with Iran and Syria to help stabilize Iraq. She told reporters that Tehran and Damascus should not "be paid" to end their "destabilizing behavior," and that such a move would both demoralize friends and embolden enemies across the Middle East.

But the new U.S. policy to confront Iranians in Iraq has already sparked divisions within the administration. The Pentagon wanted to hold the two top al-Quds officials for questioning, but the State Department backed an Iraqi request to deport them. They were sent home a week after their capture.

The Kurdish government had approved the opening of the Iranian Liaison Office, which provided consular services and which Iran wants to upgrade to a formal consulate, the Iraqi foreign minister said. Before the raids, U.S. forces did not consult with the Iraqi government, which is now trying to establish procedures and agreements for future operations, he said. "This is a very, very dangerous thing," he said.

Iran's foreign ministry summoned Iraqi and Swiss diplomats to protest and demand an explanation, according to Iran's mission to the United Nations. Switzerland represents U.S. interests in Iran. Tehran contends that the five men detained are all diplomats, an assertion that Iraq's foreign minister and U.S. officials reject.

Squeezing Iran (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2007

The United States has known for years that Syria and Iran are supporting Sunni insurgents and Shiite radicals in Iraq -- support that has taken a heavy toll in American lives. On Wednesday, President Bush finally suggested he'll do something about it.

"We will disrupt the attacks on our forces," Mr. Bush said. "We will interrupt the flow of support from Iran and Syria. And we will seek out and destroy the networks providing advanced weaponry and training to our enemies in Iraq."

Those sound like fighting words, and even before he spoke U.S. forces raided the Iranian "office of relations" in the Kurdish city of Irbil, arresting five of its employees and seizing documents and other property. That raid follows the arrest of two Iranian diplomatic officers in Baghdad last month; they were expelled to Tehran, but they were found with incriminating documents that probably led to yesterday's raid in Irbil.

It's about time, and we hope the Administration keeps showing Tehran that it will pay a price for continued subversion in Iraq. There's certainly much more coalition forces can do.

Consider the problem of Iranian-manufactured improvised explosive devices, or IEDs, some of which are capable of penetrating M-1 tank armor. According to information provided by an Iranian opposition group with a track record for accuracy, many of those IEDs arrive in Iraq via the southern Shalamche and central Mehran-Badreh border crossings with the connivance of Iraqi officials friendly to the Iranian regime. At a minimum, coalition forces can police and seal those crossings.

The U.S. can also shut down the network of charities and "cultural institutions" that serve as front groups for Iranian terrorist activities. Iran's so-called Qods (Jerusalem) Force, the terrorist arm of its elite Revolutionary Guards, operates in Iraq under the aegis of the Al-Najaf Al-Ashraf Al-Saqafieh Establishment, based in the city of Najaf and run by Iranian mullah Hamid Hosseini.

Arms deliveries are organized by the innocuously named "Headquarters for Reconstruction of Iraq's Holy Sites," which is supposed to work at rebuilding and preserving Shiite shrines but is said to be under the control of a Qods Force general. Money for these groups arrives in Iraq through a number of Iranian-controlled currency exchanges. Iran is also attempting to establish a branch of Hezbollah in Iraq even as it trains Iraqi Shiite militants at bases in Iran.

Less information is publicly available on Syria's current support for the insurgency, but what we do know is damning. After the battle for Fallujah in November 2004, U.S. troops seized GPS systems "with waypoints originating in western Syria," according to the Washington Post, while captured fedayeen reported receiving small arms and explosives training in Syrian camps. Syria is also suspected of harboring former Saddam loyalists such as Izzat Ibrahim Al Douri, King of Clubs on the card deck of Iraq's most-wanted and now the self-declared successor to Saddam as President of Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0115992

We wouldn't rule out incursions into either country, if military circumstances warrant. This does not mean another invasion, but Predator strikes or special forces raids against terror camps in either country are surely justified to protect American lives and help the new Iraqi government succeed. Syria's Assad family has a long history of meddling in the affairs of its neighbors -- not just Iraq but also Israel, Turkey and Lebanon. But the Assads also understand the language of force, as when they swiftly shut down the anti-Turkish terrorist PKK operations after Turkey threatened to invade in 1998.

Iran is also susceptible to U.S. pressure, both military and non-military. The President's decision to deploy another carrier battle group to the Persian Gulf suggests he is prepared to counter any Iranian moves to interfere with maritime traffic in the area, as it did in the late 1980s. We are also heartened by signals from the Administration that it has all but given up on its mostly fruitless attempt to sanction Iran's nuclear transgressions at the United Nations. On Tuesday, the Treasury Department designated state-owned Bank Sepah for its role in Iran's missile procurement network; more can be done to freeze or seize the assets of key Iranian officials whose personal assets are usually parked abroad.

One failure of Mr. Bush's war leadership has been to clearly define the enemy in Iraq, which for a long time has included Syria and Iran. The more we have shown forbearance, the nastier their actions have become. We hope Mr. Bush's remarks Wednesday, and the actions in recent days, signal a new determination to take the battle to that enemy.

Diyala Sweep Finds No Evidence Of Insurgent Force (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2007

Turki, Iraq — As a heavy fog lifted Thursday in Diyala province, U.S. and Iraqi soldiers pressed into a warren of reed-choked canals and found secret tunnels, weapons caches and a roadside bomb.

But there was little evidence of the fighters they believed might be massing there for a final stand as a joint offensive against a reputed safe haven and training ground for Sunni Arab insurgents entered its eighth day.

U.S. forces said that in the last week, they had already killed at least 90 gunmen spotted maneuvering in the area or planting explosives in the road as nearly 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi government troops closed in and blocked escape routes.

Seven more were reported killed Thursday as they advanced on U.S. and Iraqi forces on the outskirts of Turki, the main village in the area.

"I think we killed the people that were going to fight," said Capt. Stephen Dobbins, a troop commander in the 5th Squadron, 73rd Cavalry. "Anybody else potentially thought that was a bad idea and melted back into the civilian population."

But he said U.S. and Iraqi forces could still meet resistance as they press forward.

Commanders have said success will ultimately depend on building a patrol station and establishing a permanent presence in the isolated region east of Baghdad, where until recently Iraqi security forces had refused to venture without U.S. backup.

The crackle of heavy guns punctuated by grenade blasts echoed through desolate farmland as soldiers in armored trucks fired into the canals before climbing down to search them on foot. Attack helicopters circled overhead.

When U.S. forces last swept through the area in November, they encountered fierce resistance from well-trained bands of insurgents, who used the canal network in a battle of the trenches that left two American soldiers and many more insurgents dead.

The region is a stronghold of the powerful Al Daini tribe, which includes many disaffected former officers in Saddam Hussein's army.

U.S. officers believe tribe members have established links with al-Qaida in Iraq and other militant groups, offering important logistics and training support from this rural region. They are also accused of kidnappings and killings in a bid to purge area villages of Shiite Muslims and other rival tribesmen.

