The Wall Street Journal (6/13, 2.11M) editorializes, "If there's any scandal here, it's that anti-U.S. activists have made it so difficult to handle al Qaeda prisoners in a more efficient manner. On the one hand they complain of the 'incredible despair' (Human Rights Watch) of indefinite detention. On the other, they have done their best to prevent the U.S. from processing them through the military court system that President Bush authorized in late 2001. … The activists shouldn't be allowed to have it both ways. Either the Gitmo detainees are legitimate prisoners of war, in which case they can't be prosecuted but can be held for the duration of the conflict as in all previous wars. Or they are unlawful combatants (because they fought out of uniform and targeted civilians), in which case there should be no issue at all about moving ahead and trying them in military tribunals."

Religious Leaders Call On US To Ban Torture. Twenty-seven religious leaders have signed a statement urging the US to abolish torture. The Washington Post (6/13, A4, Cooperman, 744K) reports that the statement, which was signed by megachurch pastor Rick Warren, Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel and Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick of Washington, among others, is "being published in newspaper advertisements starting today." It is "the opening salvo of a new organization called the National Religious Campaign Against Torture, which has formed in response to allegations of human rights abuse at U.S. detention centers in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba." The Post adds, "The signers come from a broad range of denominations and include notable religious conservatives, such as the Rev. Ted Haggard, president of the National Association of Evangelicals; Archbishop Demetrios, primate of the Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of America; and the Rev. William J. Byron, former president of Catholic University."

Canadian Terror Suspects Allegedly Trained Near US Border. The CBS Evening News (6/12, story 8, 2:45, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Most of the 17 men arrested in an alleged terror plot in Canada were in court there today for a bail hearing. No one was granted bail." CBS (Keteyian) added, "It was here in these remote wooded grounds north of Toronto where prosecutors say terrorists talk turned to action. According to the government's charges reviewed by CBS News, 13 of the 17 suspects now in custody were here just a few hours from the US border attending a terrorist training camp just before last Christmas. Wearing camouflage clothing, they allegedly engaged in marches and survival training, took turns on guard duty and practiced firing a 9-millimeter semiautomatic pistol and pellet gun. What the group didn't know is they were being watched by authorities the whole time."

Defense Lawyers Terror Suspects Were Beaten. Defense lawyers representing several of the men being held in an Ontario prison on terrorism charges say their clients have been beaten by guards, threatened and held in isolation. The New York Times (6/13, Depalma, 1.19M) reports, "The lawyers made the accusations outside the courtroom here as preliminary bail hearings were about to begin for the 17 suspects arrested June 3. … A spokeswoman for the prison where most of the men are being held said the accusations were being investigated."

Arrests Raise Concerns About Influence Of Fundamentalist Imams In Canada. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Cherney, 2.11M) reports that the terror arrests in Canada have "lifted the lid on a simmering controversy among Canada's Muslims: A segment of this growing community worries that an increasing number of mosques have come under the sway of fundamentalist imams." The arrests "have given worried congregants an opportunity to raise a red flag. They say the messages delivered in some mosques -- such as the Al-Rahman Islamic Center here -- may help explain why police believe the 17 men and youths might have been drawn into a group that allegedly conspired to blow up buildings in the Toronto area and schemed about taking politicians hostage in Ottawa."

DOJ_NMG_0032978

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Technology Association Study Criticizes VoIP Wiretapping Rules. CNET News.com (6/12, Broache, McCullagh) reports, "Federal regulations saying that police must be able to tap into Internet phone conversations with ease are coming under renewed attack from academics, engineers and one of the Net's founding fathers." An Information Technology Association of America study to be released today "says that because VoIP relies on a fundamentally different network architecture from that of traditional phone lines, such a mandate would pose 'enormous costs' to the industry and could even introduce significant security risks." The study adds that "allowing full access by law enforcement would almost certainly require overhauling inherently decentralized networks to allow for certain points where interception would take place," which could "arguably make it easier for hackers to capture identity information and passwords, engage in 'man-in-the-middle alteration of data,' or potentially spoof the communications going on."

Air Marshals Say Ammunition Not Safe For Use In Air. The Washington Times (6/13, Hudson, 90K) reports air marshals testifying "in a recently completed House Judiciary Committee investigation of policies marshals deemed dangerous" said "their guns are loaded with bullets capable of running through more than one person, metal doors and thick glass -- too much firepower for an airplane." They "say their bullets can penetrate most of the material in planes, leaving pilots and the plane's hydraulics and flight-control system vulnerable if a weapon is discharged." The Times adds that the TSA's response to the ammunition concerns was redacted from the House Judiciary report released last week.

Kelly Says Lower Manhattan Initiative Put On Hold Due To Reduced Funding. The New York Times (6/13, Baker, Chan, 1.19M) reports New York City's plan "to install a sprawling security camera system in the Wall Street area" this year "is being rethought since the Department of Homeland Security cut the city's security grant to $124.5 million this year from $207.6 million last year, Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly said yesterday" in testimony before a City Council hearing on the impact of the reduction. Kelly said afterwards that the plan, called the Lower Manhattan Security Initiative, had "been put on hold until we can take a look at the funding stream." DHS spokesman Russ Knocke said yesterday that "an undersecretary would work closely with the city to help expedite the flow of dollars from Washington. But he said it fell to city officials to prioritize which projects to pay for."

Author Says DHS Allowed To Act Like "Keystone Stasi." Ray LeMoine, coauthor of "Babylon by Bus," which records his experiences working for the Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq, in an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (6/13, 958K) writes that upon arrival at JFK from Dubai recently, he was stopped "at customs by an officer from the Department of Homeland Security and directed to a drab backroom filled with Arabs, South Asians and Africans." LeMoine writes that he had "just spent six months working and traveling in the Islamic world," and thought it "was just protocol." Instead, LeMoine writes that he was questioned about selling T-shirts outside sporting events and an NYPD bench warrant from 2004. LeMoine continues, "Homeland Security, the $40-billion-a-year agency set up to combat terrorism after 9/11, has been given universal jurisdiction and can hold anyone on Earth for crimes unrelated to national security — even me for a court date I missed while I was in Iraq helping America deter terror — without asking what I had been doing in Pakistan among Islamic extremists the agency is designated to stop." DHS is "scarily bringing the words 'police' and 'state' closer together. As long as we allow Homeland Security to act like a Keystone Stasi, terrorism will continue to win in destroying our freedom."

Evacuations Ordered In Florida As Alberto Approaches Landfall. Alberto, the first named storm of the 2006 hurricane season, gained intensity Monday, prompting evacuations along Florida's Gulf Coast and heavy media coverage throughout the nation. ABC World News Tonight (6/12, lead story, 1:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reports, "We knew they'd come often this year. We didn't know they'd come this early." When Alberto "hits Florida's Gulf Coast tomorrow, it could well be at hurricane strength. Not a major hurricane, perhaps, but the state of Florida is taking this storm very seriously."

DOJ_NMG_0032979

In a second story, ABC World News Tonight (6/12, story 2, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reports, "What seemed like an ordinary storm just last night is now generating winds close to 75 miles per hour. A sudden shift that forced Florida's Governor to issue those mandatory evacuations." Gov. Jeb Bush: "If you're ordered to evacuate, you really should do it. Don't think you can ride out a storm. It's not worth losing one's life." ABC (Cuomo): "With Alberto still 150 miles from expected landfall, FEMA is mobilizing 96 trucks with food, water and ice, in the Gulf states. And Coast Guard aircraft are tracking the storm."

The AP (6/13, Stacy) reports, "More than 20,000 people along Florida's Gulf Coast were ordered to clear out Monday as Alberto…unexpectedly picked up steam and threatened to come ashore as a hurricane. … Gov. Jeb Bush signed a declaration of emergency allowing him to call up the National Guard and put laws against price gouging into effect." Max Mayfield, director of the National Hurricane Center, said Alberto is "not a Katrina or a Wilma, but storm surge and flooding could still cause loss of life."

The Tallahassee Democrat (6/13, Cotterell, 51K) reports that in "a hastily-called evening briefing," Bush told residents that if they were planning to evacuate, they needed to do so "tonight, not tomorrow morning. Tonight is the night to do this."

The CBS Evening News (6/12, lead story, 2:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported Alberto is "barreling toward Florida's Gulf Coast tonight with heavy rain, winds near 70 miles an hour, hurricane warnings are up along the coast, best estimates are the storm will hit land tomorrow and could reach hurricane strength and even if it doesn't, it could bring a storm surge ten feet tall." CBS (Acosta) added, "That was all Florida officials needed to see to issue a mandatory evacuation order across 100 miles of the state's Gulf Coast." Gov. Jeb Bush, Florida: "If you're ordered to evacuate, you should do it. Don't think you can ride out a storm. It's not worth losing one's life."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/12, Candioti) reported that Florida Gov. Jeb Bush has "issued a State of Emergency and has ordered mandatory evacuations for several counties in low-lying areas. Also he just said that 17 shelters will be opening up shortly, again, for people in areas where they are expecting inland flooding because of the rain. We are expecting anywhere from 8-10 inches and storm surges that could go maybe 8-10 feet above normal." Bush "also said that they were doing a hurricane prep exercise just this very day, and now he's admitting that they might have to push things back, as we are obviously getting storms earlier and earlier in the hurricane season."

NBC Nightly News (6/12, lead story, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Coming off last hurricane season, this is a cruel, early arrival and so it's being taken seriously tonight in the state of Florida, where a state of emergency has been declared and 20,000 people have been ordered evacuated along 200 miles of Florida coastline." NBC (Potter) added, "Although Alberto is still a tropical storm, officials are worried about storm-surge flooding along the Florida Gulf Coast, in some areas, up to 10 feet." NBC (Potter): "Joining with state emergency managers, FEMA officials say they too are prepared and will be sending in nearly 100 trucks with food, water and ice for those hardest hit if needed."

FEMA Ready With Buses, Supplies. In an article appearing on at least 48 news websites, the AP (6/13, Jordan) reports FEMA spokesman Aaron Walker said that while Florida "has indicated that they have the situation well under control," the agency had buses and supplies ready "should Tropical Storm Alberto take a nasty turn into regions still left vulnerable by Hurricane Katrina, including Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. Those supplies, warehoused in Louisiana and Alabama, could be sent to Florida if necessary, he said." Meanwhile, Secretary Chertoff "postponed a weeklong trip to Europe to monitor the storm, said spokesman Russ Knocke. Chertoff also called Florida Gov. Jeb Bush to offer help, but the Republican governor said his state did not have any immediate needs from Washington."

The Miami Herald/KRT (6/13, Merzer, Fineout) reports, "State officials said that local communities were gearing up to deal with the storm and that 17 shelters would open. An estimated 7,500 National Guard were on alert and ready to be deployed if needed." The Herald adds, "Alberto grew out of the year's first tropical depression Sunday, an ominous sign of things to come during the hurricane season -- which was only 11 days old."

USA Today (6/13, Leinwand, 2.31M) reports hurricane center forecaster Eric Blake said the storm is expected "to grow to Category 1 hurricane speeds by the time it reaches land but they do not expect it to intensify much further." The Orlando Sentinel (6/13, Stratton, Hollis, 265K) notes, "If Alberto comes ashore as a hurricane, it would be the earliest in 40 years to hit the United States, forecasters said."

The New York Times (6/13, Aguayo, 1.19M) reports Florida's emergency management chief Craig Fugate "and other state officials said they remained worried that Tropical Storm Alberto might prove to be a repeat of a storm that struck the East Coast in March 1993 and left more than 40 people dead in Florida. That 1993 storm was not a hurricane, but it pushed an enormous wall of water into the same areas now in Tropical Storm Alberto's path. Ten people died in Taylor County, part of which was ordered evacuated on Monday."

DOJ_NMG_0032980

The Washington Post (6/13, A3, Whoriskey, 744K) reports, "Along the coast on Monday, tourists headed out, and news crews rushed in to capture what may be the first hurricane after Hurricane Katrina. … Officials with the Federal Emergency Management Agency said they were meeting with state emergency managers and 'mobilizing' 96 trucks with food, water and ice."

Paulison Says FEMA Ready For Alberto. On Fox News' Big Story (6/12, Napolitano) Paulison was asked whether FEMA was ready for Alberto. Paulison: "We're ready. I think what this storm shows us is how unpredictable hurricanes are. We thought it would be nothing but a rain storm, now here it is almost a hurricane." Paulison added, "Right now we're very lucky that this first hurricane of the season is going to a state like Florida who is very well prepared. We're working with the state, we have people in the state EOC, but frankly the state really does have their arms around this and they are ready for this. We have, however, prepositioned supplies all along the Gulf Coast, just to be ready to move in case Florida does need assistance from FEMA." Paulison was also asked if his agency is ready for "the next Katrina." He said, "We are as ready as we can be for the next Katrina. That was an overwhelming storm, obviously, and so we have done quite a bit to make sure that FEMA is much better prepared this year than we were last year, mainly with logistics, with communications, with situational awareness, and also victim registration. So we have taken all those lessons learned, we've picked up after Katrina, Rita, Wilma also, and applied those in place so we can be ready if we do get another major hurricane in this country."

Appearing on Bloomberg After Hours (6/12), Paulison said, "The communications right now is working very well. I talked personally to Craig Fugate. I know Secretary Chertoff has talked personally to the governor. We have people at the state emergency management office and people at the hurricane center to make sure we keep the lines of communications open and that we go into the hurricane and storm as partners and not waiting for one to be overwhelmed before we step in."

Insurance Regulators Call On Congress For Help Dealing With Disasters. USA Today (6/13, Adams, 2.31M) reports the National Association of Insurance Commissioners, who are urging Congress "to investigate ways to help states, insurers and homeowners to better deal with disasters such as Hurricane Katrina," have adopted "a resolution proposing a Federal Natural Catastrophe Preparedness Commission." Following losses from last year's hurricanes "and forecasts of more powerful storms, insurance companies are refusing to renew hundreds of thousands of coastal homeowners' policies in Florida, Texas, New York, Massachusetts and other states. … State regulators worry that a shortage of private insurance and the lack of an overall federal catastrophe strategy will put more pressure on individual states and their taxpayers when disaster strikes."

Spellings Announces Grants For New Orleans Charter Schools. The New York Times (6/13, Saulny, 1.19M) reports Education Secretary Margaret Spellings announced a $24 million grant Monday that is "likely to cement the role of New Orleans — where the public school system is barely functional — as the nation's pre-eminent laboratory for the widespread use of charter schools." The city's "school system is now dominated by charter operators. Eighteen of the 25 schools open in New Orleans are charter schools, receiving public financing but operating independently." Spellings said "charter schools are the best way to jump-start the state's education recovery," echoing "the Bush administration's support for such schools across the nation."

New Orleans Police Department Struggling To Recover From Katrina. The New York Times (6/13, Drew, 1.19M) reports that "as residents return and another hurricane season begins" in New Orleans, "the police force is still struggling to recover from the calamity of Hurricane Katrina, which knocked out its headquarters, overwhelmed its ability to maintain control and prompted desertions that tarnished the force's reputation. Now, as the department tries to fight its way back, sharp budget cuts — and a recent spike in drug-related killings in the city — are adding to fears that years of overhauls and modernization may be undone, and that New Orleans could return to its former notoriety as one of the nation's murder capitals." Meanwhile, "For some residents, the sense that the city is on edge and the department's future uncertain has brought echoes of the days when the local police were considered among the least competent and most racist and brutal in the nation."

DOJ_NMG_0032981

AFL-CIO Investment May Provide New Orleans "Development Boom." USA Today (6/13, Konigsmark, 2.31M) reports, "In what may be the start of the city's development boom, the AFL-CIO plans to invest $1 billion to develop 10,000 affordable homes and a new downtown hotel. The investment "is one of the largest yet for New Orleans and seeks to bring new housing to a city where Hurricane Katrina destroyed more than 100,000 homes." USA Today adds, "Development activity is picking up for several reasons, not the least of which is that billions in federal dollars to buy people out of their flood-damaged homes is set to begin flowing this summer."

Katrina Continues To Take Emotional Toll On Children. The Washington Post (6/13, A1, Cass, 744K) reports that in New Orleans, Hurricane Katrina's "emotional effect on children is proving to be long and lasting. Two studies of children affected by the hurricane have found high rates of depression, anxiety, behavioral problems and post-traumatic stress disorder." Irwin Redlener, director of Columbia University's National Center for Disaster Preparedness and president of the Children's Health Fund, said that while children affected by the Oklahoma City bombing or 9/11 "could go to a place of normalcy," Katrina was different because of "the scope of devastation" and "the prolonged dislocation with an uncertain timeline."

Clinton Says Global Warming Will Lead To More Hurricanes. The AP (6/12, Farrington) reports that speaking at a fundraiser for the Florida Democratic Party Monday, former President Clinton "predicted…that Republican environmental policies will lead to more severe storms." Clinton said that while he and Al Gore "were ridiculed" for their views on global warming, it is "a serious problem" that will "lead to more hurricanes." The Palm Beach Post (FL) (6/13, 160K) reports that "Clinton railed against the Republican decision to invade Iraq and their stance on the national deficit, health care, lobbyists and environmental regulations during a wide-ranging speech."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Meets With National Security Team On Iraq. President Bush yesterday met his national security team at Camp David to discuss the US policy in Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (6/13, Gerstenzang, 958K) reports that "among those joining Bush were Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, John Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, director of the Central Intelligence Agency, and Gen. Peter Pace of the Marine Corps, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff." White House counselor Dan Bartlett, who took part in the meetings, "said the sessions were organized because Iraq was facing a 'fundamental break point.'" The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (6/13, Herman, Deans, 430K) notes that today, Bush "will meet Iraq's new leaders…in a teleconference."

Much of the media coverage places the meeting in the context of domestic politics, as part of an Administration effort to bolster congressional Republicans for the midterm elections. The New York Times (6/13, Sanger, Rutenberg, 1.19M), for example, reports the meeting "came as Republicans began a new effort to use last week's events to turn the war to their political advantage after months of anxiety, and to sharpen attacks against Democrats. On Monday night, the president's top political strategist, Karl Rove, told supporters in New Hampshire that if the Democrats had their way, Iraq would fall to terrorists and Abu Musab al-Zarqawi would not have been killed." Democrats "countered Monday that the Republicans were playing partisan politics with the war. 'Apparently, the American people will still have to wait for a serious debate on Iraq that is aimed at correcting bad policies instead of bad poll numbers,' said Representative Rahm Emanuel, an Illinois Democrat." Similarly, the Washington Times (6/13, Dinan, 90K) reports the meetings "were scheduled even before Zarqawi was killed last week, but that news has given the administration a window to make a case to voters that U.S. forces have made progress."

NBC Nightly News (6/12, story 4, 2:15, Gregory, 9.87M), for example, reported, "With the war a growing political liability for the President and his party, the White House is trying hard to appear more pragmatic about the conflict and more open to outside advice. The President today avoided overselling progress after a briefing by his ambassador in Baghdad." President Bush: "I thought your assessment of the situation in Iraq was very realistic."

On the CBS Evening News (6/12, story 6, 1:35, Axelrod, 7.66M), Bush was shown saying, "Success in Iraq will depend upon the capacity of the new government to provide for its people. We recognize that." Axelrod: "The Administration says a new government creates a crucial opportunity for the Iraqis, but with the number of military dead now approaching 2,500, the injured 18,000 and the cost at more than $300 billion and rising, the Administration may be approaching a make-or-break point with the American people, and that may explain the President's call for more countries to share the financial burden."

DOJ_NMG_0032982

ABC World News Tonight (6/12, story 3, 2:30, Tapper, 8.78M) reported, "The President is under tremendous political pressure, with low poll numbers and his own party worrying about what effect this unpopular war will have on midterm elections." But the White House "cautioned that this meeting will not lead to announcement of reductions in the 126,000 US troops in Iraq." Fox News' Special Report (6/12, Hume) also said the meeting "created some speculation before hand but no major shake-ups or new strategy would emerge."

The Financial Times (6/13, Dinmore) reports, "Confronted by growing discontent with the cost of the Iraq war among Americans in the run-up to congressional mid-term elections, Mr Bush repeatedly declared at a brief news conference: 'The stakes are worth it.'"

CNN's The Situation Room (6/12, Henry) reported that President Bush "sees some momentum from Iraq with the death of al-Zarqawi."

Bush Seeks Input From Critics. Knight Ridder (6/13, Hutcheson) reports, "Looking for new ideas on Iraq…Bush sought advice from his critics Monday at an unusual two-day war council," as "at least one of the experts who met with Bush has advocated sending 77,000 more service members to join the 130,000 who are already in Iraq. 'It may be that the fastest way to turn Iraq over to the Iraqis and draw down American forces is not a steady decline of troop numbers. Instead, the fastest possible "exit strategy" may require one last surge effort,' military historian Frederick Kagan, a scholar at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, wrote last year." After he left the Camp David briefing, Kagan "declined to comment on what was said there beyond, 'It was a good discussion.'" Knight Ridder adds, "All four of the experts who were invited to join Bush at his hideaway in Maryland's Catoctin Mountains supported the Iraq invasion, but they haven't always been pleased with its prosecution. In addition to Kagan, Bush heard from Eliot Cohen, a professor of strategic studies at Johns Hopkins University; journalist Robert Kaplan; and former CIA officer Michael Vickers, who's now with the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments."

The Washington Post (6/13, A1, Partlow, Abramowitz, 744K) also reports "the four have in the past been critical of how the Bush administration has handled Iraq, though not necessarily from the same perspective." Vickers "has argued that the United States ought to have a smaller, more effective presence in Iraq, with more emphasis on developing advisers for the nascent Iraqi security forces. Kagan, by contrast, recently wrote in the Weekly Standard that the United States should consider deploying more troops and prosecuting the battle against insurgents more aggressively. Cohen has also questioned the vigor with which the military has pursued the war, as well as the competence of the administration."

The Boston Globe (6/13, Klein, 484K) reports the "unusual Iraq war summit…reflects a new White House attitude that includes a willingness to consider dissenting views and take a more deliberate approach to policy questions, a style change for a president known to keep close counsel, according to political observers and Republican lawmakers." The "shifts" are "largely credited to new White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten." They "suggest Bush desperately wants to shed his image as a stubborn partisan who listens to few outside voices, said" Texas professor Bruce Buchanan, "who has followed the president closely since Bush was governor of Texas." Buchanan said, "He's reaching out for a little empathy. It's an effort to get people to acknowledge that he is at least trying and needs their support, and at least soften their opposition."

Rove Says Republicans Should Not Avoid Iraq On Campaign Trail. The AP (6/13, Love) reports that during his appearance at a fundraising dinner for New Hampshire Republicans, Rove said "that Republicans facing midterm elections should campaign on the economy's strength and discuss the war in Iraq with no qualms." Rove said, "We have no excuses to make for it." War supporters "need not apologize for removing the threat of Saddam Hussein, and with so much work left to do, now is not the time to talk about leaving Iraq, he said." He added that Democrats "pushing for the withdrawal of American troops should be the ones facing tough questions for wanting to 'cut and run.' He targeted Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry and Pennsylvania Rep. John Murtha, both Democrats and vocal supporters of getting out of Iraq."

PoliticsNH.com (6/13, Pindell) reports Rove was "hoping to encourage state Republicans the election year won't be as bad as some pundits say." But his "keynote at a State Republican Committee fund-raiser also motivated Democrats and other like-mined organizations. About 75 protestors held signs like 'Karl: 666' and 'No More Roving Jam Sessions,' in response to Republican operatives who jammed Democrats get out the vote phone lines in 2002." It is the "phone jamming scandal, which has criminally convicted three Republican operatives, which helped to deplete state party resources to $700 cash on hand last month. Beyond money, the Democrats have leveraged the issue into one they use every chance they can in hopes it puts Republicans on the defensive." And while "the 500 people who bought tickets helped the state party raise an estimated $55,000-$60,000 at the dinner, it did not help that Rove's own office has now been linked to the scandal." The Washington Post (6/13, A7, Farenthold, 744K) runs a similar story under the headline "Rove's Speech to N.H. Republicans Keeps to Partisan Line."

DOJ_NMG_0032983

Gallup Poll Shows Bush's Approval Up To 38%, 47% Say Things "Going Well" In Iraq. USA Today (6/13, Nichols, 2.31M) reports, "In the wake of terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's death, President Bush is seeing improvement in public confidence that the Iraq war is winnable, a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll shows. The new poll found that 48% believe the United States probably or definitely will win the war, up from 39% in April. It also found that 47% believe things are going well in Iraq, up from 38% in March." The survey, taken Friday to Sunday and released Monday, also "showed Bush's approval rating going up to 38% from 36% earlier this month and an all-time low of 31% in May. The poll news came as Bush and members of his Cabinet met at Camp David to discuss ways to help the recently formed government in Iraq. … Still, 51% say the war was a mistake."

In CNN Poll, 43% Say Things "Going Well." CNN's The Situation Room (6/12, Blitzer) reported, "Our latest CNN poll shows the death of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi naturally have boosted Americans' optimism about the war, at least modestly in this new CNN poll taken after the terror leader was killed. Forty-three percent now say things are 'going well' for the United States. That's up five percentage points from March. But 54 percent still say things are going badly."

Bush Gets No Bounce After Zarqawi In CBS News Poll. The CBS Evening News (6/12, story 5, 0:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Eliminating Zarqawi may have been a significant military achievement, but it did not seem to help the President from the standpoint of domestic politics. In a CBS News poll out tonight, only 33% of those polled said that they approve of the job the President is doing. That is about the same as last month."

House To Debate GOP Iraq War Resolution. The Washington Times (6/13, Bellantoni, 90K) reports, "The House of Representatives this week will engage in a rare election-year debate on the Iraq war, with Republicans hoping to showcase the good news on the ground and Democrats fractured on whether the United States should begin withdrawing troops." Lawmakers "are tentatively scheduled to begin debating the Republican-authored resolution Thursday. A vote on the measure, called 'Declaring that the United States will prevail in the global war on terror, the struggle to protect freedom from the terrorist adversary,' is slated for Friday."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/12, Koppel) that the GOP resolution's purpose "is to build on what you just mentioned there, the success in killing al Zarqawi and also to try to build some momentum going into November. In particular, on the Iraq war." CNN noted that there are ""a couple of red flags that are going to jump out at Democrats if they stay in this draft language. One that has to do with declaring that it is not in the national security interests of the United States to set an arbitrary date for the withdrawal or redeployment of United States armed forces from Iraq. Another red flag declares that the United States is committed to the completion of the mission to create a sovereign, free, secure and united Iraq. These two graphs in particular are designed to try to flush out some of the Democrats who are going to be painted as not supporting US troops in Iraq."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/13, Feldmann, 61K) reports that "members, including antiwar Republicans and Democrats, also welcome a debate, as long as the terms are fair, they say. At time of writing, the text of the resolution to be debated had not been released, but congressional sources indicated that it would frame the Iraq war as part of the broader war on terror, a point of controversy." The Monitor adds, "At a highly politicized time, with the fall midterm elections approaching and future control of Congress in question, some political analysts see risks for both parties in an Iraq debate. Public support for the war has been on a long, downward slide, and Bush's own job approval rating and policy agenda have been damaged by Iraq more than anything else."

Senate Democrats To Offer Amendments Calling For US Withdrawal From Iraq. CNN's The Situation Room (6/12, Koppel) reported that in the Senate, "we are expecting three Democratic amendments to be offered this week, all of them calling for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq by the end of the war. Two of the names won't surprise you, John Kerry and Russ Feingold. But the third should. It's Carl Levin of Michigan, who is one of the senior members of the Democratic Caucus, who is not seen -- he -- first of all, he's not throwing his hat into the presidential ring. And, so, what he says will carry weight, and could also complicate Harry Reid, the Democratic leader's efforts to try to beat the Republicans at their own game, to try to show his caucus as being united on Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0032984

Reid Says Iraq War An "Intractable Conflict," Calls For Exit Strategy. The AP (6/12, Riechmann) reports "Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, in a speech in Washington, called the war in Iraq an 'intractable conflict' and said Americans deserve a plan from the president that provides troops with an exit strategy. 'It is no longer sufficient to say "we will stand down as the Iraqis stand up,"' Reid said, quoting a Bush refrain."

The Washington Times (6/13, Pfeiffer, 90K) reports Reid "told a gathering of Democratic and liberal activists in Washington yesterday that 'we have to start bringing our troops home.'" Reid "opened his remarks at the Take Back America 2006 Conference by criticizing the Bush administration's handling of the war in Iraq. The conference is hosted by the Campaign for America's Future (CAF), a liberal advocacy organization." Reid said, "Our troops deserve an exit strategy." Reid "seemed to make a more direct call for withdrawal of troops than his previous remarks, but the senator's office disagreed." A Democratic aide "in attendance, who because of the staffer's ongoing relations with Mr. Reid asked to remain anonymous, said the senator gave a similar, less pointed speech in Nevada during the weekend. 'But at the end of the speech, people in the crowd started chanting, 'Bring them home,' the staffer said."

The Washington Post (6/13, Milbank, 744K) reports the "liberal activists assembled for the annual 'Campaign for America's Future' conference were so hungry yesterday, in fact, that it was difficult to hear Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) speak over the din of forks clinking on salad plates. That's too bad, because he was telling the lefties what they like to hear." Reid said, "I don't know how many times we have heard the president say: 'We will stand down as Iraqis stand up.' I don't want to hear that anymore. It seems to me that that mantra no longer stands. That is, we have to start bringing our troops home." The Post adds, "The activists -- at least those who could hear him -- applauded Reid's unexpected and unscripted call for withdrawal." That Reid, "an antiabortion Mormon who voted to authorize force in Iraq, would be breaking bread at all with the liberal activists speaks to a different hunger. Interest groups, hoping for a win in the November midterms, have toned down their fratricidal attacks on elected Democrats. And Democratic lawmakers, emboldened by President Bush's slump, aren't as afraid to be seen with the lefties who make up their 'base.'"

US, Iraqi Forces Launched 200 Raids Against Insurgents Since Zarqawi's Death.

USA Today (6/13, Soriano, 2.31M) reports, "US and Iraqi forces have launched 200 raids against insurgents since killing Abu Musab al-Zarqawi last week, dealing a blow to his terrorist organization, al-Qaeda in Iraq, US and Iraqi officials said Monday." The raids "have led to the capture of more than 200 suspected insurgents and 33 deaths. … The intelligence that led up to the bombing and the raids may be the best chance of cracking the terrorist group dominated by foreign fighters."

Al Qaeda In Iraq Names Zarqawi Successor. The AP (6/12, El-Magd) reports, "Al-Qaida in Iraq named a successor Monday to Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and said he would stick to the slain leader's path — attacks on Shiites as well as on U.S. and Iraqi forces. The new leader, identified by the nom de guerre Abu Hamza al-Muhajer in a statement posted on the Web, appeared to be a foreign Arab, like his predecessor." But "otherwise he is an unknown. The name has not appeared in previous al-Qaida in Iraq propaganda or on U.S. lists of terrorists with rewards on their heads, suggesting he is a lower-level figure or someone more prominent who has taken a new pseudonym." President Bush "said Monday that al-Muhajer would join the ranks of those sought by the US. 'I think the successor to Zarqawi is going to be on our list to bring to justice,' Bush said."

The New York Times (6/13, Burns, Filkins, 1.19M) also says Muhajir "is something of a mystery," and "senior Iraqi officials said they were unfamiliar with anyone by that name. One clue was that the word 'muhajir' usually refers to an Islamic militant who has traveled beyond his own country to fight for his faith. 'He is not an Iraqi -- that is my first impression,' said the Iraqi national security adviser, Mowaffak al-Rubaie, adding that he had not heard of Mr. Muhajir."

US Military Releases Zarqawi Autopsy. The US military released the autopsy report on Abu Musab al Zarqawi

DOJ_NMG_0032985

to prevent or limit the spread of misinformation or conspiracy theories about his death. NBC Nightly News (6/12, story 3, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Today an FBI DNA test positively ID'd Zarqawi and the US military revealed in detail the results of his autopsy to dispel any questions, conspiracy theories or propaganda about how he died. There were no signs of gunshot wounds, nor was Zarqawi torn apart by the air strike. Instead, the report said he was killed by the bomb's crushing blast wave that caused his lungs to expand like balloons and bleed in his chest." The autopsy "said Zarqawi was in the house when it was bombed and also suffered a broken leg and shrapnel wounds." Also "surviving the blast, Zarqawi's diary, phone numbers, and computer files. The US military used that intelligence to launch 11 raids in the last 48 hours on al Qaeda suspects in the Baghdad area, even as two more car bombs exploded here as insurgents promised to avenge Zarqawi's death."

The CBS Evening News (6/12, story 4, 2:50, Schieffer, 7.66M) quoted Col. Stephen Jones, chief surgeon, Multinational Force: "The injuries to his lungs were not survivable, that's what killed him."

ABC World News Tonight (6/12, story 5, :25, Gibson, 8.78M) reports the military "said US troops reached Zarqawi 28 minutes after the bombing and provided first aid before he died 52 minutes after the attack. The autopsy found he died from catastrophic lung injuries. There was no evidence he was beaten or shot. And the military says, information from Zarqawi's safe house has led to the arrest or capture of 210 suspected terrorists."

The Washington Post (6/13, A1, Partlow, Abramowitz, 744K) reports Zarqawi "lived for 52 minutes, in and out of consciousness, before he succumbed to massive internal injuries caused by the concussive blasts from two 500-pound bombs dropped by a U.S. fighter jet, U.S. military officials in Baghdad said Monday."

Jordanian Officials Played Role In Zarqawi Hunt. The Los Angeles Times (6/13, Daragahi, Meyer, 958K) reports, "Shocked into action by violence on their own soil, Jordan officials months ago began an intensive campaign of spying on insurgents in neighboring Iraq, a gambit that ultimately helped lead to the death of militant leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, Jordan's top spies said Monday." Maj. Gen. Muhammed Dahabi, director of Jordan's General Intelligence Department, and Col. Ali Burjaq, his chief of counterterrorism, "said in a rare interview Monday that a splashy video tape al-Zarqawi released earlier this spring helped Jordanian intelligence pinpoint his approximate location at the time, a key lead that ultimately led to al-Zarqawi's death in a U.S. aerial bombing attack last week." The Times adds, "Al-Zarqawi's need to micromanage all aspects of his al-Qaida in Iraq organization, from finances to operations, also made him vulnerable to discovery, the two intelligence officials said."

Castro Calls Zarqawi Bombing "A Barbarity." Fox News' Special Report (6/12, Hume) reported, "Fidel Castro called the air strike that killed Zarqawi 'a barbarity' saying he should have been captured and tried."

More Commentary. In his Wall Street Journal column (6/13), Bret Stephens writes that "the most significant fact here isn't that Zarqawi was killed -- he could have met his end in any number of ways. It's that he was found. Pause a minute to consider what this means. Plenty has been written about the shortcomings of US war-fighting, political and counterinsurgency strategies in Iraq, and some of it is true. Comparably little has been written about the insurgents' shortcomings. Yet Zarqawi was located because he and his spiritual adviser, Abdul Rahman, were betrayed by someone in their own camp, someone close enough to track their movements exactly. Therein must lie a tale." The insurgency's "aura has been dimmed, its organizational structure cracked and its internal fissures exposed. That's something the US and the new Iraqi government can capitalize on by launching sustained offensive operations in the Sunni Triangle and doing their utmost to secure Baghdad. Doing so will take another 30,000 troops. But having mostly squandered the initiative against the insurgents in the first year of the war, this is the administration's rare chance to even the score. It must seize it."

Insurgent Attacks Kill More Than 50 In Baghdad. The CBS Evening News (6/12, story 4, 2:50, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "This was another bad day in Iraq. Bombs killed more than 50 Iraqis as attacks continued into the night." CBS (Palmer) added, "Baghdad had been anxiously waiting for Zarqawi's followers to strike and tonight the capital was shaken by a series of bombings aimed at civilians." But "the killing of the most-wanted terrorist in Iraq last Thursday, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, has meant a wartime windfall for the Coalition forces. In the past 48 hours, the US Military announced it's carried out 140 major operations, killed 32 insurgents, and detained 178, including one described as a high-value target with a $50,000 price tag on his head. But today a US raid on a house near where Zarqawi died was both a military victory and a human tragedy. American forces killed seven more men they call terrorists linked to al Qaeda but two children also died in the attack and another one was injured."

DOJ_NMG_0032986

Bloggers Illustrate Life In Iraq. The New York Times (6/13, 1.19M) editorializes on the window into Iraqi life provided by the country's bloggers: "Reading the bloggers has helped to fill one of the big gaps in Americans' view of the war in Iraq. Danger in the streets and security fears for anyone seen speaking with Western reporters has made it increasingly hard to get real glimpses of what it's like for the people who have to live there." Bloggers have written of changes in society throughout 2006: "There was less talk of shoddy infrastructure and running for cover from American soldiers, and more fear of radical Islamists and the Sunni and Shiite death squads bringing terror to their neighborhoods. The watershed they referred to repeatedly was the destruction of the golden dome of the Askariya mosque in Samarra, a revered Shiite shrine, on Feb. 22. The bloggers also wrote more about the increasing presence of Taliban-like Islamists."

US Army Officer Helps Iraqi Convict. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Jaffe, 2.11M) reports on Capt. Philip Carter, who is trying to obtain the release of a convicted Iraqi killer, Hamid Abboud. Carter's work reflects a new strategy of trying to have Iraqis fix their own system: he "could demand Mr. Abboud's release and the Iraqis would likely comply. But he doesn't. Instead he prods judges and prosecutors in this province an hour's drive from Baghdad to uphold Iraqi law and set Mr. Abboud free on their own." The Journal says the case illustrates both "how the American strategy has changed" into one of devolving power to Iraqis and "how painful and halting progress in Iraq can be."

Basra Spiraling Into Corruption. The New York Times (6/13, Tavernise, Mizher, 1.19M) reports that "oil, politics, and bloodshed" have corrupted Basra. Initially one of the cities "most receptive" to the 2003 invasion, Basra is "is being pulled apart by Shiite political parties that want to control the region and its biggest prize, oil. But in today's Iraq, politics and power flow from the guns of militias." The Times reports, "Basra has a soaring murder rate (the 85 killings in May were nearly triple the number in January), a tattered oil industry and a terrified population."

Hussein Witnesses Admit Perjury. The Los Angeles Times (6/13, Roug, 958K) reports, "The trial of Saddam Hussein reached a moment of high drama today when four defense witnesses recanted previous testimony, swearing in written statements that Hussein's lawyers had bribed them to lie in court." The witnesses say they were promised "life-long salaries" by attorney Khalil Dulaymi if they "testified that scores of executed prisoners ... were alive and well."

Funeral Held For CBS Cameraman Killed In Iraq. The CBS Evening News (6/12, story 12, 1:45, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "It was two weeks ago today, Memorial Day, that CBS News cameraman Paul Douglas and soundman James Brolan were killed and correspondent Kimberly Dozier was critically wounded by a car bomb in Iraq. Today in Bedford, England, 500 of Paul's friends and family said goodbye."

37 Taliban Members Killed In Battles. USA Today (6/13, 2.31M) reports, "Afghan and U.S.-led coalition forces fought Taliban militants in three battles, killing 37 fighters, including a relative of Taliban leader Mullah Omar, an Afghan army general said Monday."

Afghan Drug Trade Described. The Christian Science Monitor (6/13, Baldauf, 61K) reports on four corrupt Afghan law enforcers who have trafficked in drugs. It writes, "Top Afghan officials privately admit that perhaps 80 percent of the personnel at the Ministry of Interior, Afghanistan's chief law-enforcement agency - from local police chiefs up to the top bureaucrats - may be benefiting from the drug trade. ... The result is a government that is either incapable or unwilling to prevent a trade that is rapidly undermining the country's rule of law and the Afghan people's faith in their leadership."

NATO Seen As Increasing Role In War On Terror. In the Wall Street Journal, columnist Melanie Kirkpatrick optimistically relates an interview with NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer in which they discuss NATO's increasing activity outside Europe: "Afghanistan is NATO's first mission outside Europe and a crucial test of the alliance's relevance in a post-Cold War world. Defense ministers meeting in Brussels voted Thursday to proceed with a plan to increase alliance forces in Afghanistan to 17,000 from 9,000 and to expand into the violence-plagued south." Kirkpatrick notes problems that NATO has, such as insufficient spending by most members and a near-total lack of airlift capacity, but she concludes, "That 25,000-soldier rapid response force should be up and running by Riga. The Afghanistan mission and the potential acquisition of airlift are also signs of progress. NATO isn't fully 'transformed' yet, but it's getting there."

DOJ_NMG_0032987

Congress Gives Pentagon More Budgetary Authority. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Rogers, 2.11M) reports, "Congress is giving the Pentagon unusual authority to shift money in its budget to cope with an anticipated multibillion-dollar payroll shortfall that could have an impact on ground troops in Iraq." The move is meant to "avoid any pay disruption before the end of this fiscal year on Sept. 30" and increases the Pentagon's "existing authority" by one-third; without it, the Army could have a year-end shortfall of "$1.4 billion for active personnel." The Journal attributes the "persistent scramble for funds" of the Army and Marines to the cost of "a prolonged overseas deployment" of a professional military.

Army Changes Pain Treatment For Wounded Soldiers. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, McGough, 2.11M) reports on the work of Sorenson Medical, the manufacturer of an "infusion pump" that has "helped transform how the Army treats and transports wounded soldiers." Its product reduces the suffering of injured troops: "Injected anesthetics are eliminated quickly from the body, so they deaden nerves for only a few hours. Pumps that infuse anesthetics, performing what are known as 'continuous peripheral nerve blocks,' can hold off pain for days at a time, helping outpatients in particular. That allows patients to cut back on or eliminate opioid pain medicines like Vicodin, which affect the entire body, and can cause nausea, vomiting and intestinal blockage." Sorenson is parlaying its success in military usage to the slower-moving civilian market.

Rival US Labs Compete To Build Safer Nuclear Bomb. The Los Angeles Times (6/13, Vartabedian, 958K) reports, "Scientists at Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico are locked in an intense competition with rivals at Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory in the Bay Area to design the nation's first new nuclear bomb in two decades." The bomb is meant to ensure the "long-term reliability" of the aging American arsenal. The article describes the objections of detractors: "But some veterans of nuclear arms development are strongly opposed, contending that building new weapons could trigger another arms race with Russia and China, as well as undermine arguments to stop nuclear developments in Iran, North Korea and elsewhere. And, the critics say, It would eventually increase pressure to resume underground nuclear testing, which the U.S. halted 14 years ago."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Interspeed Official Convicted Of Fraud. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Bulkeley) reports, "Arthur Goodwin, former senior vice president for sales of the now-defunct Interspeed Inc., was convicted of eight-counts of fraud in connection with inflating the sales of the Internet equipment company." The Journal continues, "Mr. Goodwin, 45, was convicted by a jury in the courtroom of U.S. District Judge Richard G. Stearns. He is scheduled for sentencing on Oct. 5." The Journal adds, "The U.S. attorney's office said that evidence in the case established that Mr. Goodwin falsely overstated sales by $9 million, which was 60% of the company's reported revenue in 1999. … The overstatement made it appear that Interspeed, North Andover, Mass., was meeting growth targets. He accomplished the overstatement by fraudulent acts including giving customers secret side-letters that allowed them to return the equipment. He also altered a key contract on what was said to be the largest sales in company history to make it acceptable to the company's finance department."

US Subpoenas Monster In Widening Options Probe. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Bulkeley) reports, "Monster Worldwide Inc. said it received a U.S. attorney's subpoena for information on its stock-option grants, as investigations into possible options backdating widened." The Journal continues, L"Monster, an online job-search and advertising firm based in New York, issued a series of options between 1997 and 2001 in a pattern that was favorable to executives receiving the grants, including James J. Treacy, its former president. The odds of so favorable a pattern occurring randomly are about nine million to one, according to a Wall Street Journal analysis1 published in yesterday's edition. Monster shares slid $3.40, or 8.1%, to $38.60 in 4 p.m. composite trading yesterday on the Nasdaq Stock Market." The Journal adds, "Monster, which is conducting an internal inquiry into the options, said it will cooperate with the inquiry and subpoena, issued by the U.S. attorney in Manhattan. Mr. Treacy, who no longer works for Monster, has said he didn't have anything to do with the timing of the grants, which were authorized by the board. … Two other high-tech concerns, Comverse Technology Inc. and Applied Micro Circuits Corp., announced delays in filings of financial reports due to options investigations. In addition, Applied Micro Circuits, Sunnyvale, Calif., and two other companies said they had received informal inquiries for information on the timing of stock-options grants from the Securities and Exchange Commission. The newly identified companies bring to at least 43 the number of firms that have acknowledged internal or external inquiries into their stock-option timing."

DOJ_NMG_0032988

Pension Funds Sue Amid Widening Options Probe. The Financial Times (6/13, Grant) reports, "Shareholder anger over US executive compensation practices spilled into the open on Monday as two big US pension funds sued companies involved in an investigation into the timing of stock-option awards." The Times continues, "Darren Robbins, a partner at Lerach Coughlin, said his San Diego law firm was also representing pension funds in Europe and Australia that were preparing similar action. … 'People are very upset about this. There have been at least five pension funds that have filed cases in the last 72 business hours in court houses from California to Boston,' he told the Financial Times." The Times adds, "McAfee, a software security maker, was sued on Monday in federal court in the Northern District of California by the Heavy & General Laborers' Pension and Annuity Funds, alleging 'constructive fraud' through the backdating of stock options. … Juniper Networks, a technology company, was hit with a similar complaint by the Employer-Teamsters Pension Health and Welfare Funds. … Four separate companies revealed on Monday that they were being investigated by regulators over their options grants. More than 40 companies have become ensnared in one of the widest criminal and regulatory investigations into white-collar compensation in recent years. The probe is emerging as a test of years of executive compensation practices and has started to draw the anger of unions."

Manne Argues Case For Insider Trading. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (6/13), Henry Manne, dean emeritus of George Mason University School of Law, writes, "Behavioral finance, a developing field of academic research that emphasizes investor irrationality (and ignorance) and the inefficiency of markets, has been hailed by defenders of the SEC as offering a solid economic rationalization for our vast scheme of federal securities regulations. Even apart from the obvious implications for the regulatory system of ignorance and irrationality on the part of regulators, a closer examination of the logic of behavioral finance leaves little for the pro-regulation crowd to crow about." Manne continues, "The literature on prediction markets makes clear that the more participants in a contest and the better informed they are, the more likely is the weighted average of their guesses to be the correct one. … We should rethink any current policies based on a view of pricing in which we exclude the best-informed traders and discard the wisdom of the many. … Since such trading clearly makes the market process work more efficiently, it aids capital allocation decisions and informs business executives through market-price feedback of the best predictions about the value of new plans."

Bill Would Limit Use Of Pension Accounting Benefit. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Jones, 2.11M) reports, "The balances of public-company pension plans had been improving until the stock market swooned again. Congressional action could deal many of these funds another setback. The House and Senate both have passed versions of a bill that could limit the use of a key pension-accounting benefit. The legislation would affect dozens of companies in the automotive, aerospace and basic-materials industries. At issue are credit balances, which companies accumulate by putting more money into a plan than required in a given year to meet obligations to retirees."

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Reports First Rise In Violent Crime In Five Years. The FBI yesterday released the preliminary Annual Uniform Crime Report, which found that the US violent-crime index increased in 2005, the first rise in five years. The murder rate led the way – with a 5% increase – and, among the four categories in the index, only the number of rapes declined.

The story was covered by all three network news broadcasts, with CBS characterizing the rise as "disturbing" and NBC calling it "troubling," while ABC focused on speculation about factors fuelling the rise. The CBS Evening News (6/12, story 9, 0:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) noted, "The FBI says that violent crime in this country was up 2.5% last year. While that is not a huge increase, it is the first increase since 2001. Murder led the way. … By far, the biggest increase in murders, up more than 12%, was in mid-sized cities, cities with populations under a quarter of a million." NBC Nightly News (6/12, story 5, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) similarly reported, "The overall increase nationwide was modest, 2.5%, but that was the largest increase since 1991. … Murder was up 4.8% last year. Across the country, big cities bore the brunt of the increase, we're told. Houston's murder rate was up 23% last year, Philadelphia, up 14%, Las Vegas, up 10%."

DOJ_NMG_0032989

In its "A Closer Look" segment, ABC World News Tonight (6/12, story 8, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "For the first time in five years, there has been a significant rise in the violent crime rate." ABC (Thomas) added, "Why the surge?" Northeastern University Prof. James Fox: "We've seen gang activity making a great resurgence. … We see more guns floating on to the street." Thomas: "Criminologists say large numbers of violent, career criminals are getting out of prison," and "the nation is paying a price for slashing successful effort efforts, such as community policing and crime prevention programs -- programs they say led to a decade-long decline in crime." LAPD Chief William Bratton: "Unfortunately, starting after 9/11, we diverted the money to terrorism -- which was important -- but we started neglecting old-fashion crime. You have to fight both wars at the same time."

The major dailies all cover the FBI report prominently, with speculation about the causes echoing the ABC story: gangs, cuts in federal funds, and criminals completing 1990s prison terms. USA Today (6/13, Johnson, 2.31M) notes, "The FBI report also is renewing the debate over whether the U.S. government's dropping of an ambitious police-hiring program — along with many law enforcement agencies' new emphasis on preventing terrorism — have made crime prevention more difficult. … 'This should be a loud wake-up call for the country to get back to doing what worked in the 1990s,' Fox says," referring "in part to the Bush administration's phasing out of a Clinton-era program aimed at putting 100,000 new cops on U.S. streets. Police chiefs nationwide have called for renewing the program to offset local cutbacks." USA adds, "Justice Department officials cautioned against reading too much into the FBI report. 'The crime rate is so low in some communities that relatively modest increases can result in what appear to be fairly stark increases,' says Richard Hertling, deputy assistant attorney general for the Office of Legal Policy."

In a front-page story, the Washington Post (6/13, Eggen, 744K) reports, "The jump could also represent a lingering effect of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, some experts said, because governments at all levels have diverted resources away from traditional crime fighting in favor of anti-terrorism and homeland security programs." Hertling "said the FBI statistics are 'a yellow flag' but do not represent a trend, in part because the numbers are preliminary and do not include full reports from all jurisdictions." In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/13, Sherman) notes, "The FBI data, compiled from reports by more than 12,000 law enforcement agencies, does not contain overall crime numbers in any category nor does it offer any explanation for the changes. The FBI's final annual crime report comes out in the fall. Criminal justice experts said the statistics reflect the nation's complacency in fighting crime, a product of dramatic declines in the 1990s and the abandonment of effective programs that emphasized prevention, putting more police officers on the street and controlling the spread of guns."

The New York Times (6/13, Newman, 1.19M) reports, "Law enforcement officials and other experts on crime cautioned that this latest report did not necessarily mean crime would start to run rampant again." Carnegie Mellon University criminologist Alfred Blumstein said, "I want to be careful to not overstate a one-year trend as the start of something much bigger, because it could well go in the other direction next year." The Financial Times (6/13, Kirchgaessner) adds, "Justice Department officials on Monday said it was too soon to attribute the increases to a wider trend in violent crime and that it was too early to determine the cause of the spikes, although they acknowledged that the migration of gang activity from large to smaller cities was a possibility." The FT notes that Hertling "said it was unclear whether a 23 per cent increase in the number of murders that was reported in Houston, Texas, was linked to the influx of people into the city after Hurricane Katrina…or whether the increase was something that 'played out' over the course of the year."

NPR's All Things Considered (6/12, Sullivan) reported, "Justice Department officials say crime-fighting has been a priority of the Bush administration for the past six years and point to millions of dollars the Justice Department has spent on anti-gang initiatives and community programs such as Project Safe Neighborhoods." The Los Angeles Times (6/13, Havemann, 958K), Washington Times (6/13, Seper, Cella, 90K) and UPI also report on the FBI preliminary statistics.

DOJ_NMG_0032990

North Carolina City Bucks Trend With Experimental Program. The CBS Evening News (6/12, story 10, 2:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported High Point, N.C., "is bucking the trend. Crime there is actually going down." CBS (Pitts) added, "High Point…was once so violent police wouldn't get out of their patrol cars in some neighborhoods, but not now. … What's going on is a model for cities from Chicago to Tucson. … Suspected drug dealers are called into police headquarters. First they're verbally strip searched…then given one last chance. Community leaders like Reverend Quentin Boger provide the carrot." Boger: "We have partnered with the police department to say enough is enough." CBS noted, "In the two years of the program, the violent crime rate on the rise in other parts of the country has dropped 20% in High Point."

FBI Data Receives Heavy Local TV, Newspaper Coverage. The FBI data also was reported widely by local TV news and newspapers in communities all across the country, which focused on their local statistics. Some examples: The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/13, Moran, 423K) reports, "Philadelphia suffered one of the worst increases in homicides among major cities last year, the FBI reported yesterday. … Deputy Police Commissioner Richard J. Ross said Philadelphia is facing an 'uphill battle' trying to control the flood of illegal guns in the city and the street mentality that makes it easy to pull the trigger. … More weapons in the hands of immature youths has resulted in more 'craziness,' Ross said."

The AP (6/13, de la Cruz) reports, "Jersey City saw increases in all of its violent crime indexes, except for forcible rape. The murder rate increased 65.2 percent with 38 murders in 2005 compared with 23 in 2004. … Criminal justice experts said the statistics reflect the nation's complacency in fighting crime, a product of dramatic declines in the 1990s and the abandonment of effective programs that emphasized prevention, putting more police officers on the street and controlling the spread of guns. In New Jersey, Michael Wagers, executive director of the Police Institute at Rutgers-Newark, attributed the bulk of violence to the availability of guns."

The Miami Herald (6/13, Vasquez, DeMarzo, 323K) reports, "The number of murders, robberies and aggravated assaults rose nationally in 2005," but "FBI data for South Florida's biggest cities told a different story: In six out of eight cities, violent crime was down. … 'We've obviously been very aggressive,' Miami Police Chief John Timoney said. 'The whole idea of crime and quality of life has been our number one priority here.' Regarding the higher crime figures in other parts of the country, Timoney called it 'cause for concern' but urged caution in analyzing the data."

The Dayton Daily News (6/13, Wynn) All violent crimes in the city fell last year except rape, according to the FBI's 2005 preliminary Annual Uniform Crime Report. Rapes in Dayton increased to 140 in 2005 from 127 in 2004." Dayton Police Lt. John Huber "said when police turned in their information to the state they reported 33 homicides in 2004 and 32 homicides in 2005, but the FBI listed 32 for both years. Huber said he didn't know how the mistake occurred. No one at the FBI national press office could be reached for comment."

WRTV-TV Indianapolis (6/12) reports, "In Indianapolis, there were 7,948 violent crimes reported in 2005, up almost 900 from 2004. The number of murders in Indy actually declined slightly, from 109 murders in 2004 to 108 in 2005, but other crimes were up substantially."

The Minneapolis Star-Tribune (6/13, Gordon, Chanen, Padilla) reports, "The FBI released data Monday indicating that violent crime surged 35.5 percent in Minneapolis last year, but the city's Police Department said a computer glitch grossly exaggerated what was actually a 15 percent jump from 2004. A 15 percent increase is still six times the 2.5 percent national rise," but "the volume of violent crime in Minneapolis is about 30 percent below levels in the mid-1990s." The Star-Tribune notes, "An FBI spokeswoman said she expects the bureau to accept Minneapolis' revisions."

The Coloradoan (6/13) reports, "Overall violent crime…was up 23 percent in Fort Collins, the second-highest increase in Colorado behind Westminster among cities with more than 100,000 people, according to the FBI report. The picture was better in property crime…which declined by 5 percent in Fort Collins."

KTVT-TV Dallas-Fort Worth (6/12, Richie) reports, "Eleven people were shot in downtown Dallas early Saturday morning. There have been 78 murders in the first five months of the year. But violent crime in Dallas is actually plummeting. … Violent crime in Dallas was down nearly 5 percent from 2004 to 2005. Murders were down 19 percent."

KIRO-TV Seattle (6/12) reports, "The FBI's latest crime statistics show a drop in rapes in Bellevue, Seattle, and Tacoma, Wash.," but overall, "crime in Seattle and Tacoma continues to rise. Burglaries have dropped by 14 percent in Seattle but that was the only decrease noted among crimes listed in the report. Violent crime has declined in Tacoma but like the other cities, crimes involving theft and robberies have increased."

DOJ_NMG_0032991

"Most Wanted" Houston Katrina Evacuee Arrested For Murder. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/13) reports, "A Hurricane Katrina evacuee who police called one of the Houston area's 'most wanted killers,' has been arrested in Louisiana on charges of killing a fellow evacuee" while robbing him for his FEMA relief funds. "Ricardo Irvin, 18, told the Houston officers who picked him up from authorities in New Iberia, La., that 'he got tired of running from the law' and admitted killing fellow evacuee Gregory Sartain." The AP notes, "Katrina evacuees have been involved in more than two dozen killings, either as suspects or victims, since about 150,000 Louisiana evacuees arrived last September, police said. FBI crime data released Monday showed a 23 percent spike in murders in Houston in the past year."

Libby Lawyers May Call Memory Expert. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (6/12, 2.11M), "The defense team for former Vice Presidential Chief of Staff I. Lewis Libby said it is considering calling a memory expert to testify at his trial early next year. … Attorneys representing Libby have said in court filings that any erroneous statements made to Federal Bureau of Investigation agents or the grand jury were the result of a faulty memory, and not intentional lies. It isn't clear if the federal judge hearing the case would allow such testimony."

Judge Dismisses Part Of Charge Against Safavian As Trial Goes To Jury. The AP (6/13, Yost) reports US District Judge Paul Friedman "dismissed part of one criminal charge against a former official in the Bush administration Monday, as the first trial in the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling scandal moved toward a conclusion." Friedman's decision "represented a small courtroom victory for defendant David Safavian, who is accused of five felony charges that he concealed Abramoff's efforts to acquire two pieces of government property." The judge "threw out language from the indictment that said Safavian lied by telling a GSA ethics officer Abramoff had no business with the GSA and was not seeking to do business with the agency. There was no evidence during the trial that Safavian ever made such statements to the GSA, Friedman said."

The Washington Post (6/13, A6, Birnbaum, 744K) reports the Safavian trial "went to the jury yesterday, as a prosecutor in closing arguments accused him of lying to federal investigators to conceal the fact that he was 'doing Jack Abramoff's bidding.'" In response, Safavian's attorney "said that the government's case was weak because Abramoff, a disgraced lobbyist who pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to corrupt public officials, did not testify at the three-week trial." Federal prosecutor Nathaniel B. Edmonds "told the jury in his closing argument that Safavian maintained a 'secret, inappropriate and unethical relationship' with Abramoff, his former boss, when Safavian became the deputy chief of staff and then chief of staff of the General Services Administration, the U.S. government's landlord agency."

The New York Times (6/13, Shenon, 1.19M) reports Judge Friedman "handed a small victory to" Safavian, who is "on trial for lying about his ties to the Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, dismissing a specific charge in the indictment." But "other, larger charges against the former aide, David H. Safavian, were left intact for the jury, which is scheduled to begin deliberations on Tuesday in the first trial to result from the influence-peddling scandals centered on Mr. Abramoff."

Shadegg Circulates Article Linking Lewis, Earmark Corruption. The Hill (6/13, O'Connor) reports Rep. John Shadegg, "a leading fiscal conservative in the House has stoked debate over pork by circulating a newspaper story linking Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) to 'the inherent risk of corruption at the heart of the congressional earmark process.'" Rep. Shadegg, "who ran for the majority leadership on a platform of fiscal retrenchment, sent reelection supporters an opinion piece on the federal investigation surrounding the House Appropriations Committee chairman." The Journal piece "condenses newspaper reports about connections among Lewis, a political action committee run by his stepdaughter and the lobbying firm of a close friend and former colleague." The questions "surrounding Lewis, his staff and the lobbying firm, Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White, are not directly connected to the bitter dispute between conservatives and Appropriations Committee members over earmarks, the special projects inserted into the annual spending bills." But some conservatives "argue that the news stories refocus attention on reform just as the guilty pleas of former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham (R-Calif.) and disgraced Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff fade from the headlines."

DOJ_NMG_0032992

McCain Says Earmarking System Is Broken. Sen. John McCain said on Fox News' On the Record with Greta Van Susteren (6/12), "I think we have a broken system here it is called earmarking in which good people do bad things sometimes. People are able to divert tens of millions of dollars. And they haven't had the scrutiny and competition." McCain added, "When you see a Duke Cunningham do what he did the first question is why. Why would an individual betray his people and oath of office and his nation that way? The second question is how, how did he get away with it just one congressman and one lobbyist? It means that there is a broken system here that he was able to get away with that."

SCOTUS Ruling Sends Texas Death Penalty Case Back For Possible Fourth Trial. The AP (6/13, Graczyk) reports, "One of the longest and most contentious death penalty cases in Texas is heading back for yet another trial." The AP continues, "The U.S. Supreme Court, acting Monday on an appeal from the Texas Attorney General's Office, refused to reinstate the death sentence of Johnny Paul Penry, clearing the way for another jury to consider punishment for a fourth time. Penry was convicted of raping and fatally stabbing a woman at her home in Livingston in 1979. … Penry turned 50 last month and has spent more than half of his life on death row for the slaying of 22-year-old Pamela Moseley Carpenter. He confessed to attacking the woman and stabbing her with scissors, but his attorneys have contended Penry, who says he believes in Santa Claus, has the reasoning capacity of a 7-year-old." The AP adds, "While psychological tests have put Penry's IQ between 50 and 60, at least five juries have found Penry to be legally competent to stand trial or have rejected defenses based on mental retardation. The high court in 2002 ruled mentally retarded people, generally considered having an IQ below 70, may not be executed. … The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals last October, in a 5-4 ruling, sent Penry's death sentence back for another punishment hearing, citing what judges said were improper instructions that prevented jurors from considering the full scope of Penry's retardation claims. It was that decision the attorney general's office appealed to the high court."

Utah Professor Has Anderson Documents, But Will Keep Them From FBI. KSL-TV Salt Lake City (6/12, Dunnreports on its Web site, "Over the last few months, the FBI has turned to Jack Anderson's papers," and "KSL Newsradio has learned that thousands of pages of those documents are right here in Salt Lake City," collected by University of Utah Professor Tim Chambless. "Chambless says when FBI Director Robert Mueller visited Salt Lake City last week, he wanted to come clean about his six boxes full of papers, and wanted to tell the bureau why it will never see them. 'I believe in the First Amendment. Jack Anderson believed in the First Amendment,' Chambless says. Chambless sent a letter through his lawyer to Mueller, asking him to announce the end of the pursuit of the papers," and "attorney Pat Shea says the papers are now hidden where no one will find them."

The Deseret Morning News (6/13, Winslow) notes, "Initially, Chambless provided the FBI with a catalog of what the papers said. Now, he fears the FBI may come with subpoenas demanding everything," prompting him "and his lawyer fired off a letter Monday to FBI Director Robert Mueller, telling him to back off." Chambless "suggested the FBI wanted them because 'political security' was threatened." The Morning News adds, "Some have suggested the Anderson papers are a stepping stone for a Bush administration crackdown on reporters who publish classified documents and refuse to reveal sources. While in Utah last week, Mueller denied those accusations. 'We're trying to determine whether or not national security would be adversely impacted by the disclosure of these documents. … 'I hardly think that is an assault on the press.'"

Supreme Court Issues Two Restrictive Death Penalty Rulings. ABC World News Tonight (6/12, story 6, 1:55, Gibson, 8.78M) reports, "The Supreme Court issued two significant decisions today involving the death penalty. The rulings signal a new caution on capital punishment. One decision could delay many executions. The other could give those facing capital punishment a better chance for a new trial." ABC (Cochran) added the court's ruling in the case of cop killer Clarence Hill "means Hill and more than 3,000 other condemned killers will have more leeway to argue that those injections are cruel and unusual punishment, and therefore unconstitutional." In the second case, "the court ruled that Paul House, who has been on death row for 20 years, can use new DNA evidence as he argues that he did not rape and kill Caroline Muncie. The court said if evidence is truly important, it can be used."

The AP (6/13, Locy) reports, "Kennedy said jurors could find reasonable doubt because DNA evidence points to Muncey's husband as a suspect and because small blood stains found on House's jeans may have spilled on the pants from vials of blood taken from Muncey during an autopsy. … House, who was on parole for a sex offense in Utah, was convicted of luring Muncey from her home by telling her that her husband, Hubert, had been hurt in a car accident. Her body was found the next afternoon in an area where witnesses had seen House. … His original lawyer failed to locate several witnesses who said years later that Hubert Muncey had abused his wife, had fought with her the night of her murder and had confessed later to killing her."

DOJ_NMG_0032993

The Legal Times (6/13, Mauro) reports, "Peter Neufeld, co-director of the Innocence Project, said that House 'recognizes that scientific advances have transformed our criminal justice system and must be weighed heavily in determining whether innocent people have been wrongly convicted.' The ruling, the first dealing directly with DNA evidence as a factor in reopening a death penalty case, will have a broad impact, Neufeld said."

This morning, the Washington Post (6/13, A20, 744K) editorializes on the House case, saying, "Given how many innocents have been wrongly convicted and later freed from death row and lengthy prison terms, opening the door for review makes a great deal of sense." And the Los Angeles Times (6/13, 958K) editorializes, "Welcome as this decision is, the best way to prevent unjust impositions of the death penalty is to do away with capital punishment altogether, as other civilized societies have done. Unfortunately, as the Supreme Court grows ever more uneasy with the death penalty, elected officials agitate ever more aggressively for it."

The Financial Times (6/13, Waldmeir) says the court "chipped away at the edifice of capital punishment in America, issuing two rulings that give prisoners on death row more power to challenge their sentences." USA Today (6/13, Biskupic, 2.31M) runs a similar story titled "High Court Rulings Chip At Death Penalty." The Los Angeles Times (6/13, Savage, 958K), meanwhile, headlines its report "Supreme Court Assists Death Row Challengers."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/13, Richey, 61K) reports that "in a 9-0 decision announced Monday, the US Supreme Court left the door propped open for a significant number of condemned prisoners to sue to force an examination of whether lethal injection is a humane method of capital punishment." Such method-of-execution suits "have become the most active area of capital punishment litigation in recent years. Many states and the Bush administration had expressed concern that to allow such challenges might create another layer of delay in carrying out executions." The case, Hill v. McDonough, "did not test the constitutionality of lethal injection. Instead, it raised a technical issue: whether such legal challenges had to be filed under the more restrictive habeas statute or could be pursued as a civil rights matter. The high court said inmates could file appeals under the civil rights law." The Washington Post (6/13, A3, Lane, 744K) notes "earlier this year, an Atlanta-based federal appeals court threw out Hill's case, ruling that it was a disguised attack on his death sentence." The New York Times (6/13, Greenhouse, 1.19M) runs a similar story.

Death Penalty Seen As "Tumbling Down." Annette Fuentes, adjunct professor at the Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism, writes in USA Today (6/13, 2.31M), "In addition to Hill's case, nine other executions have been stayed this year because of the lethal injection issue, according to Richard Dieter of the Death Penalty Information Center, a group opposed to capital punishment. And in California, federal courts have effectively imposed a moratorium on the death penalty while that state studies the issue. The heightened debate about lethal injections, which are used in 37 states, raises a larger question: Can there ever be a right way to execute someone? … It seems inevitable, and just, that slowly but surely capital punishment will come tumbling down under the weight of its own injustices, uselessness and immorality."

Former FBI Boston SAC Testifies At Wrongful Death Trial. The Boston Globe (6/13, Murphy, 484K) reports, "A retired FBI official who has been critical of the agency's handling of gangsters James 'Whitey' Bulger and Stephen 'The Rifleman' Flemmi testified yesterday that the FBI coined a phrase for agents who got too cozy with their informants: 'Going native.'" Robert Fitzpatrick said that "when he arrived as second-in-command of the FBI's Boston office in 1981, there was a high-level, internal investigation underway into whether Bulger's FBI handlers had leaked him information that compromised a State Police investigation of Bulger and other underworld leaders." The Globe adds that Fitzpatrick "said the FBI's priority at the time was targeting members of La Cosa Nostra, commonly known as the Mafia. Cultivating organized crime informants was critical to that mission, he said." The Boston Herald (6/13, Sweet, 220K) also reports, "The FBI called it 'going native' - a humiliating label for G-men who became enamored of their mobster informants," and Fitzpatrick said that "when he came to Boston…he heard a lot of talk by then-Special-Agent-in-Charge Lawrence Sarhatt about agents suspected of turning rotten." However, "Fitzpatrick said it was 'a high priority' of the FBI to keep the identities of informants…confidential for the sake of their well-being. It was expected of agents, he said, that 'You adhere to the law, you adhere to the guidelines and you do what is correct and true.'"

DOJ_NMG_0032994

Nevada Judge Shot In Courthouse By Sniper. ABC World News Tonight (6/12, story 7, :20, Gibson) reports, "And in Reno, Nevada, today, a sniper shot and seriously wound a judge at the local courthouse. Police sealed off a six-block area as they hunted for the sniper who fired at family court Judge Chuck Weller, hitting him in the chest as he stood near a third floor courthouse window. The injuries are not considered to be life threatening."

The AP (6/13, Sonner) reports, "A family court judge was shot and wounded as he stood near a third-floor courthouse window Monday, and police were looking for man suspected in a slaying across town who had appeared before the judge in a divorce case." The AP continues, "Investigators said Darren Roy Mack, a suspect in a killing reported at a Reno, Nev., apartment building was a 'person of interest' in the shooting at the courthouse earlier in the day, Reno Deputy Police Chief Jim Johns said." The AP adds, "Judge Chuck Weller was hit in the chest around midday by a shot or shots that came through his office window at the Mills B. Lane Justice Center, and police sealed off the area and searched nearby parking garages for a sniper. … Police also reported that a bomb-sniffing dog had alerted officers to the judge's car in the court's parking garage and that a bomb squad was investigating."

The New York Times (6/13, Reed) reports, "Johns said Mr. Mack 'had recent dealings with the judge and court.' … 'The suspect,' Chief Johns said, 'is known to have access to firearms.'" The Times adds, "Court documents show that a hearing in a contested divorce between Mr. Mack and Charla M. Mack is scheduled for Sept. 7 before Judge Weller. … The case involves children. … The police would not release the name of the victim of the homicide or the victim's relationship to Mr. Mack."

Wisconsin Procurement Official Convicted Of Contract Fraud. The Milwaukee Journal-Sentinel (6/13, Schultze) reports Wisconsin purchasing supervisor Georgia Thompson yesterday was convicted "of fixing a travel contract for a contributor to Gov. Jim Doyle's campaign, adding a potentially explosive issue to the race for governor this fall. … U.S. Attorney Steven Biskupic said after the verdict that the case was about 'Georgia Thompson and Georgia Thompson alone.'" Still, State Republican Party Chairman Rick Graber…was quick to go on the attack. He said Thompson's trial 'showed how far this administration is willing to go to reward political cronies and campaign donors.'" The AP (6/13, Foley) notes, "Prosecutors accused Thompson…of steering a contract to book state travel to Adelman Travel Group last year. The firm's CEO gave $10,000 to Doyle before and after winning the contract, worth an estimated $750,000. Prosecutors used e-mails and other records to paint a cozy relationship between Doyle's administration and Adelman."

Witness Testifies Daley Aide Told Him To Lie To Press About Political Hire. The Chicago Sun-Times (6/13, Korecki, Warmbir, Spielman) reports, "A Mayor Daley press aide told a deputy commissioner to lie to the public and say the city hired a 19-year-old building inspector without knowing he was the son of a clout-heavy union official, a witness testified in the City Hall hiring trial Monday." Deputy commissioner Christopher Kozicki "also testified Monday that the FBI asked him about John Daley in three different interviews, leading a defense lawyer to call Daley a 'mooch' who bummed rides off of people." The Sun-Times notes that Andy Ryan "was hired as a building inspector even though the city requires all inspectors to have completed a four-year apprenticeship and have two years work experience. Ryan is the son of Tom Ryan, the secretary-treasurer of Carpenters Local 13," which "was Mayor Daley's largest campaign contributor in 2003. Kozicki testified that Breelyn Pete, former spokeswoman for the city Buildings and Procurement Services Department, told Kozicki to tell the press he didn't know about Ryan's connections."

The Chicago Tribune (6/13, Bush, Mihalopoulos, 643K) reports, "Three times this year, federal prosecutors have questioned a high-ranking city official and prominent member of the 11th Ward Democratic Organization about Mayor Richard Daley's brother, John Daley, it was revealed in court Monday." Former Buildings Department managing deputy Christopher Kozicki "did not detail what prosecutors wanted to know about Cook County Commissioner John Daley as he testified in the trial of the mayor's former patronage chief, Robert Sorich." But defense lawyer Thomas Anthony Durkin "suggested to Kozicki that prosecutors 'wanted to try to indict Mayor Daley and his brother John.' U.S. District Judge David Coar sustained prosecutors' objections to that and similar questions." The Tribune adds, "Also Monday, a former city computer technician testified that he removed a program from Sorich's laptop computer in 2002. The program tracked city job seekers by their race and political affiliation, according to witness Ben Campney. … 'Robert joked that, after this was over, we would throw the hard drives in Lake Michigan,' Campney said."

DOJ_NMG_0032995

Former Pennsylvania Police Chief Pleads Guilty To Drug, Obstruction Charges. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/13, Silver, Ward, 261K) reports, "Former West Mifflin Police Chief Frank Diener pleaded guilty yesterday to federal drug charges and was presented with a new 19-count criminal complaint from the Allegheny County district attorney's office alleging that he created a slush fund and stole thousands of dollars of borough and private property. … The complaint stems from an 18-month investigation by the state police organized crime unit and the FBI." The Post-Gazette adds that Diener "also pleaded guilty to instructing witnesses to lie and destroy evidence. On March 9, when Mr. Diener learned that there was an ongoing FBI investigation, he gave a paint can containing 25 grams of cocaine and 387 grams of marijuana to one of the cooperating witnesses so it wouldn't be found in any search of his home." The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (6/13) notes, "Investigators said in court paperwork that Diener took numerous items -- including a video gambling machine, narcotics, tools, firearms and ammunition -- from the police department and its evidence room. Investigators also contend that Diener instructed officers to fix cases. He resigned the chief's post in October 2005." The AP (6/13) also reports on Diener's plea.

Fake Precious Metals Traders Caught In FBI Sting Face Sentencing. The Miami Herald (6/13, Santiago, 323K) reports, "They claimed to handle gold and silver, but after Monday, the only metal objects these two convicted Broward con artists could be seeing are iron prison bars." Charles Paul Hoffecker of Pompano Beach and Charles Edward Meyers of Fort Lauderdale "could face up to 10 years in federal prison when they are sentenced June 19 before U.S. District Judge Katherine Hayden in Newark." The Herald notes, "The two had been the focus of a lengthy investigation by the FBI and U.S. Postal Inspection Service that started in 1996. To nab them, the FBI and postal officials set up their own faux boiler room…in 1997 in East Brunswick, N.J."

FBI Interested In Tape Of West Bank Man's Interview In Michigan MySpace Case. The AP (6/13, Charlton) reports, "The FBI and local investigators said Monday that they are interested in a television station's tape of a purported interview with a West Bank man who says he paid for a 16-year-old American girl to fly to the Middle East after meeting her on the internet." The AP continues, "Katherine R. Lester disappeared June 5 from her home in rural Michigan. After the FBI helped track her to the airport in Amman, Jordan, U.S authorities persuaded her to board a return flight. She returned home Friday night. … Authorities have said the girl apparently planned to visit a man who describes himself as a 25-year-old from Jericho on his account with MySpace.com, a social networking Web site where the two met." The AP adds, "WNEM-TV in Saginaw broadcast a telephone interview with a man who said he actually was 20 and only identified himself as Abdullah. … In the interview Saturday, he said he was a wealthy businessman who met Lester online seven months ago. He said he wanted to marry her and sent her money for a plane ticket to visit him. … The station said it got the man's MySpace identity from Lester's sister, Mary, who found it on a computer they share. WNEM said it messaged him on MySpace and asked him for his cell phone number for an interview. … 'We're aware of the existence of the tape,' Tuscola County sheriff's Sgt. Michael Pine said. 'We're talking to the FBI. It's part of the investigation.' … Neither he nor FBI spokesman Terry Booth would say whether they had requested the tape from the station or whether they believed the man was who he said he was."

Virginia Sex Offenders To Be Monitored By GPS Technology. The Washington Times (6/13, Bomey) reports, "Sex offenders in Virginia will be monitored more closely via Global Positioning System (GPS) technology and an upgraded registry, state officials announced yesterday." The Times continues, "The changes that are to take effect July 1 will broaden the number of offenders eligible to be listed in the statewide online registry. The names and photos of nonviolent sex offenders will be accessible, expanding the registry to about 13,000 names." The Times adds, "Two similar bills making their way through the General Assembly would authorize administrative personnel and state troopers to help monitor sex offenders and enforce state law, Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell said in an interview yesterday. … Technological upgrades and the hiring of about 50 troopers and six administrative workers to maintain the registry would cost about $10.5 million, said Mr. McDonnell, a Republican." The Times notes, "The revamped registry Web site, (sex-offender.vsp.virginia.gov), is maintained by the Virginia State Police and allows users to locate the residences of offenders on a map. Its search engine can sort by city, county, ZIP code and name. … The list of offenses that require a criminal's name to be in the registry will be expanded to include, for example, those convicted of possessing child pornography on the first offense." The Washington Post (6/13, Stockwell) also reports this story.

DOJ_NMG_0032996

Pellicano Lawyers Say Prosecutors Slow To Turn Over Evidence. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/13, Risling) reports that at a hearing before US District Judge Dale Fischer yesterday, defense lawyers for Hollywood private investigator Anthony Pellicano "scolded federal prosecutors…for not turning over evidence. 'It's their obligation to provide us what we need to exonerate our clients,' said Terree Bowers…who said the process has been 'like pulling teeth.'" But "prosecutors said part of the delay has come from difficulty decrypting about 1,300 audio files made by Pellicano of his telephone conversations with clients and others." Referring to Pellicano, Assistant US Attorney Daniel Saunders said that "if defense attorneys 'are so eager to get the tapes decrypted, the one man who has the password is sitting right over there." The New York Times (6/13, Halbfinger, Weiner, 1.19M) adds that "the nearly four-year federal investigation…has turned up only a single recording in which two people were unknowingly wiretapped," and "barring a last-minute break in the investigation, the government's case will be based far more on circumstantial evidence and witnesses' testimony than on direct evidence of illegal wiretapping." The Times notes that at yesterday's hearing, "Mr. Bowers pleaded with the court to order the government to provide a breakdown of all the recordings prosecutors had not turned over, detailing what they contain and the government's reason for withholding them from the defense. Judge Fisher agreed, ordering that an outside referee be appointed to review the government's evidence and decide whether it should be turned over to the defense."

The Los Angeles Times (6/13, Krikorian, 958K) reports, "Saunders did not provide details on the techniques used by the FBI to decode the encrypted recordings but acknowledged that the methods were not ones that the government would want to share in open court. Other law enforcement sources have said for months that the FBI brought in encryption experts from other federal agencies to help crack the codes allegedly used by Pellicano to safeguard his recordings. … Last week, one person close to the federal investigation said it was possible that the government will never decipher the remaining recordings because Pellicano's encryption methods 'are that good.'" But the unnamed source added, "We're going to keep moving forward, but we've already got plenty of evidence."

Los Angeles Private Eye Says Work Has Cooled Since Pellicano Indictment. The Los Angeles Times (6/13, Abramowitz) reports, "It's 10 p.m., and John Nazarian, a burly 53-year-old private eye, is hurtling around Beverly Hills in his immaculate red Scion looking for garbage. Nazarian treats trash as his private archeological site, the detritus of human existence that exposes all our hidden vulnerabilities — financial documents, prescription bottles, booze bottles and anything, anything, that might sport DNA." The Times continues, "Yes, it's a dirty job being a private investigator, but Nazarian is prepared to do it. As he likes to say over and over again, he is one of the most expensive private eyes in L.A., charging $10,000 to $20,000 on retainer and $400 an hour for his services. He's racked up a number of celebrity clients, including singer Peggy Lee (whom he assiduously protected from the paparazzi to preserve the public's memory of her as a blond bombshell), Dean Martin, kooky billionaire Doris Duke and her butler, Bernard Lafferty. He's caught stalkers for CBS Chairman Les Moonves and former 'NYPD Blue' star Andrea Thompson. … And then there are the 20 or so unnamed Hollywood wives with philandering husbands for whom Nazarian and his crew of 22 ex-cops and sundry specialists seem to be working in perpetuity." The Times adds, "Nazarian is part of a long, not particularly illustrious tradition of Hollywood private eyes, from fictional antiheroes, such as Sam Spade and 'Chinatown's' Jake Gittes, to real-life swaggerer Fred Otash, the investigator for the scandal sheet Confidential Magazine, and Anthony Pellicano, the infamous gumshoe who sits in jail awaiting trial on more than 100 counts of wiretapping and witness intimidation. … This is why Nazarian keeps no records. Nothing. … Things have cooled down in Nazarian's line of work since the Pellicano indictment."

DOJ_NMG_0032997

CIVIL LAW:

High Court Rulings Curb Use Of Civil RICO. The National Law Journal (6/13, Coyle) reports, "Although the U.S. Supreme Court last week ducked the questions everyone expected it to answer in two unrelated challenges under RICO, the justices did tighten the reins on the law generally viewed by the business community as a legal plague." The Journal continues, "Even though the Court on Monday turned aside E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co.'s petition in a Benlate case, the issues not resolved last week -- the scope of the 'enterprise' definition in RICO and whether 'reliance' is required in RICO mail and wire fraud claims -- will continue to divide the lower courts and inevitably return to the Supreme Court, according to RICO litigators and scholars. … But those watching the high court's RICO cases last week viewed the outcome basically as a victory for anti-civil RICO forces." The Journal adds, "In Anza v. Ideal Steel Supply Corp., No. 04-433, a challenge involving two competing businesses, the justices essentially said they meant what they said in a 1992 decision: The alleged RICO violation must be the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries. The law does not permit suits by parties who have been injured only indirectly, wrote Justice Anthony M. Kennedy for the 7-2 majority. … And, in Mohawk Industries v. Williams, No. 05-465, the high court delivered a blow to a RICO class action arising out of claims that Mohawk and its outside recruiting agents hired illegal aliens to depress wages for its legal workers. The justices, in an unsigned decision, vacated the workers' favorable judgment by the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and directed that appellate court to reconsider in light of its proximate cause ruling in Anza. … 'I think the Court remains concerned about the potential sweep of civil RICO litigation,' said Gene C. Schaerr of the Washington office of Chicago's Winston & Strawn, who filed an amicus brief in Anza on behalf of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. 'The statute was passed originally to allow people to seek damages for harm as a result of mob activity. In the years since it was passed, it has gradually metamorphosed into a general purpose, business tort statute that gets raised in all kinds of business litigation where there is any allegation of fraud or dishonesty of any kind.'"

CIVIL RIGHTS:

11th Circuit Upholds Dismissal Of Florida Deputies Who Appeared In Online Porn. The Miami Daily Business Review (6/13, Jones) reports, "The Palm Beach, Fla., Sheriff's Office did not violate the U.S. Constitution when it fired two deputies for appearing in pornography distributed on the Internet, a federal appeals court has decided." The Review continues, "A three-judge panel of the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals unanimously held late last month that the deputies' online escapades were not constitutionally protected because government employees may be limited in their speech if that speech has a negative or detrimental effect on the integrity of the government." The Review adds, "In an opinion written by Judge Stanley F. Birch Jr., the 11th Circuit panel said former Deputies Ronald Thaeter and Timothy Moran were not engaged in a protected form of speech when they appeared in the pornographic photos and videos. Furthermore, since government employees can have their free speech restricted more than that of other Americans, the panel found that U.S. District Judge Daniel T.K. Hurley was right to dismiss the deputies' civil rights lawsuit against the sheriff's office. … West Palm Beach attorney Fred H. Gelston, who served as outside counsel for the sheriff's office, said deputies and other government employees are free to take part in whatever sexual activities they want. But 'it's when they put it on the [Internet] that it becomes a problem,' Gelston said. 'And that's what the lawyers on the other side didn't understand.' … One of the deputies' attorneys said he plans to appeal the 11th Circuit's decision, either by filing a petition for rehearing or asking for a writ of certiorari from the U.S. Supreme Court."

Senate One Vote Away From Passing Flag Desecration Amendment. USA Today (6/13, Stone, 2.31M) reports, "The Senate is one vote away from passing a constitutional amendment that would ban desecration of the US flag, the closest that amendment supporters have been to passage." The American Legion, which supports the amendment, and the American Civil Liberties Union, "which opposes it, both say there are 66 votes to pass it. Whether advocates can find the 67th vote to send the flag amendment to the states for ratification remains unclear. A Senate vote is set for the week of June 26."

DOJ_NMG_0032998

ANTITRUST:

Former Energy Trader Pleads Guilty To Manipulating Natural Gas Prices. The AP (6/10) reported, "A former trader at Williams Energy Marketing & Trading pleaded guilty in federal court to manipulating natural gas prices, authorities said Friday." Daryl Russell Brown "admitted that between 1998 and 2002, he conspired with others at the Tulsa trading company to report fictitious trades to two industry newsletters," which "provided traders with bogus information that gas was trading at levels higher than it actually was – forcing natural gas prices to rise."

AGs Ask DOJ To Crack Down On Rising Gas Prices. The AP (6/13, Miga) reports, "Massachusetts Attorney General Tom Reilly says the Bush administration needs to deliver a tough new message to big oil companies about rising gas prices: enough already." The AP continues, "Reilly emerged from a meeting with (US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales) on Monday saying oil companies deserve a 'very good tongue-lashing' from top administration officials warning that unless 'price gouging' stops, the government will crack down. … 'This administration is going to have to get tough with them, call them in,' said Reilly, a Democratic candidate for governor. 'This administration can reign them in by calling them in and saying, "Listen, enough is enough, the American people have had enough, you either do this or we are going to do this for you".'" The AP adds, "Reilly and attorneys general from Connecticut and several other states met for about an hour at the Justice Department with (Gonzales) and Federal Trade Commission Chairwoman Deborah Platt Majoras. … Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal said he proposed a joint federal-state investigation and prosecution against any illegal practices by the oil industry that are increasing gasoline prices." The AP notes, "The Justice Department said it was working with states on the issue. … 'We are focusing on doing our part to look at this issue and we are encouraging the states to do the same,' said Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos. 'Today's meeting was part of an ongoing dialogue with them to insure that all appropriate steps are being taken.'"

Barr Pharma Settles Novartis Suit. The AP (6/13) reports, "Drug maker Barr Pharmaceuticals Inc. said Monday it agreed to pay $22.5 million to settle a lawsuit with a unit of Novartis, and said the payout will lower profit for the June quarter by 13 cents per share." The AP continues, "The litigation stems from a suit Invamed Inc. and Apothecon Inc. filed in 1998 charging Barr with violating antitrust laws and illegally blocking access to the raw material source for warfarin sodium, a drug that prevents blood clots. An appeals court in October 2004 reversed a lower court's ruling and found the two plaintiffs raised issues of material fact on their antitrust claims. The trial was scheduled to start on Monday."

Mittal Will Not Raise Arcelor Bid. The AP (6/13, White) reports, "Steelmaker Arcelor SA rejected a revised offer from Mittal Steel Co., which refused again Monday to raise its 25.8 billion euros ($33 billion) bid for its rival and criticized the value of the company's deal with Russia's OAO Severstal as 'entirely fictitious.' … But Arcelor left the door open for Mittal, saying the Severstal transaction did not preclude an offer by Mittal and it was ready to meet Mittal again to explore a better deal." The AP continues, "Arcelor said Mittal's current offer 'is inadequate as it continues to undervalue' the company and called the Severstal transaction 'a more attractive alternative from a strategic, financial and social point of view.'" The AP adds, "Arcelor valued itself at 44 euros ($55.70) a share in an offer to buy back up to a quarter of its capital — the same price Severstal Chairman Alexei Mordashov is paying to buy 32 percent of the company. … Mittal and Arcelor representatives met last week for the first time since Mittal made its surprise offer in January. Arcelor had previously refused Mittal's overtures, saying they could meet only when Mittal furnished a standalone business plan — which it did on June 2, the same day it got EU antitrust clearance."

EU Moves Toward Inclusion Of Turkey, Croatia. The New York Times (6/13, Kanter) reports, "The European Union pushed forward with enlargement plans today, conducting a first round of membership negotiations with Turkey and Croatia and signing a premembership agreement with Albania." The Times continues, "The talks with Turkey proceeded after a compromise was reached over a demand by Cyprus, a European Union member, that Ankara put into effect a protocol it signed with Europe last year and open up its ports and airports to trade with new member states, including Cyprus. What Cyprus got was a message from European Union foreign ministers meeting in Luxembourg asking Turkey to do just that, or face delays in 'the overall progress in the negotiations.' … Cyprus then dropped its objections to the start of talks and Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul of Turkey departed for Luxembourg to join the meeting." The Times adds, "The foreign ministers' talks today, on science and research , were the first of 35 rounds of negotiations to be held with Turkey in the accession process, which is expected to take at least a decade. … The moves toward further enlargement are continuing despite doubts among some in Europe after the last round of enlargement — to 25 from 15 countries — two years ago. There is also concern about absorbing not just Turkey, which would be the first mainly Muslim country to enter the union, but also countries in the Balkans. … Even so, the enlargement process still is proceeding, despite the huge financial commitments involved in integrating such economies, because of the European Union's central belief that every citizen has the right to benefit from the continent's growth. European Union states formally set the process in motion in October. Policy makers say that the criteria required for enlargement can make for stable, prosperous, Western-oriented neighbors — even if circumstances change and candidate states do not eventually join the bloc."

DOJ_NMG_0032999

Mirant Withdraws Bid For NRG. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Murti) reports, "Mirant Corp. withdrew its $7.9 billion hostile bid for rival power company NRG Energy Inc. following opposition from its own shareholders, saying it was disappointed NRG was unwilling to discuss the proposal." The Journal continues, "The withdrawal ends a bitter takeover battle involving the two power companies as well as Goldman Sachs Group Inc., which initially advised Mirant before it stepped down amid allegations from NRG that it shared nonpublic information about the company with Mirant. The battle marks the increased value seen in power-generation assets after a tough period in the industry, during which both companies sought bankruptcy-court protection." The Journal adds, "Mirant said a long and contested pursuit isn't in the best interests of the Atlanta company and its shareholders and that it will continue its efforts to create value for shareholders. NRG said the rise in its share price during the past 24 months showed the market recognized the soundness of the Princeton, N.J., company's strategy."

Zale Ends Merger Discussions With Signet. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Hudson) reports, "Zale Corp. said it ended tentative merger talks with chief rival Signet Group PLC, abandoning one of its options as it scrambles to recover from a poor holiday season and three years of losing ground to other jewelry sellers in the U.S." The Journal continues, "Had a deal been struck, it would have combined the two leading specialty-jewelry retailers in the U.S., but it also would have resulted in significant overlap of their store bases. London-based Signet operates 1,837 stores, including 1,246 in the U.S., under the Kay Jewelers and Jared brands. Zale, based in Irving, Texas, operates 2,345 stores, including 2,100 in the U.S., mostly under its flagship Zales Jewelers brand." The Journal adds, "Zale has struggled after its strategy last year to shift its merchandise assortment and advertising to appeal to a more fashionable, upscale clientele resulted in lost sales and a sharp profit drop in its Christmas quarter. The retailer subsequently ousted its top management and scrapped much of the overhaul. It now faces an accounting investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, while its search for a new chief executive officer continues. … Meanwhile, Signet's U.S. division last year surpassed Zale in U.S. sales for the first time. Zale's total revenue in the fiscal year ended July 21, 2005, was $2.38 billion. Signet had revenue of £1.75 billion, or $3.22 billion, in the fiscal year ended Jan. 28, 2006."

BBVA Set To Enter Market For US-To-Mexico Payments. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Mollenkamp, Johnson) reports, "Banco Bilbao Vizcaya Argentaria SA's Texas spending spree -- including the $2.2 billion purchase of Texas Regional Bancshares Inc. and the $480 million purchase of State National Bancshares -- sets the stage for the big Spanish bank to become a major player in the competitive market for remittances between the U.S. and Mexico and could lead to further acquisitions." The Journal continues, "Under a deal announced yesterday, BBVA, Spain's second-largest bank in terms of market value, after Grupo Santander SA, said it would pay $2.16 billion for Texas Regional, whose branches stretch along the Rio Grande Valley. The acquisition is expected to close in the fourth quarter after shareholder and regulatory approval. Separately, BBVA also said it would buy State National, a Fort Worth bank with 44 branches and a sizable El Paso presence. The acquisitions give BBVA ownership of branches along the Texas-Mexico border stretching from El Paso eastward to McAllen, where Texas Regional is based. … The purchase could allow BBVA to gain a larger share of the remittance business that flows between the U.S. and Mexico."

DOJ_NMG_0033000

RIAA Head Says Illegal Song-Sharing "Contained." USA Today (6/13, Graham) reports, "Nearly a year after the Supreme Court issued a landmark ruling against online music file-sharing services, the CEO of the Recording Industry Association of America says unauthorized song swapping has been 'contained.' … 'The problem has not been eliminated,' says association CEO Mitch Bainwol. 'But we believe digital downloads have emerged into a growing, thriving business, and file-trading is flat.'" USA continues, "That's an optimistic view from an industry that saw its numbers slide to near oblivion after the launch of the original Napster in 1999. CD sales fell as much as 30%, and the RIAA pressed Congress and the courts for relief against what it said was rampant piracy. … After the Supreme Court ruled that the services could be liable for piracy by their users, the RIAA sent cease-and-desist letters to several firms. Most — including BearShare, WinMX and Grokster — shut down. EDonkey and others said they would switch to a licensed, paid model. … EDonkey, which along with BitTorrent is one of the most-used file-sharing services, has yet to make the switch." USA adds, "Even with Grokster and WinMX shut down, their software programs still exist. Eric Garland, CEO of Internet measurement firm BigChampagne, says that more people than ever are using file-sharing networks. 'Nearly 10 million people are online, swapping media, at any given time,' he says. That May figure is up from 8.7 million people in 2005, he says. … Garland says the RIAA has made some inroads. 'They have removed the profiteers from online piracy,' he says. 'They've also embarked on a very successful education campaign. Kids now know about copyright, and the consequences.'"

German Antitrust Authorities Scrutinize Web Rights Deal. The AP (6/13) reports, "Germany's antitrust authority said Monday it is examining the compromise deal between the German soccer league and Deutsche Telekom AG for Internet broadcasting rights after receiving complaints." The AP continues, "The Federal Cartel Office said it had received complaints from rival Internet service providers that Deutsche Telekom is abusing its dominant position." The AP adds, "Under the agreement reached last Wednesday with the German soccer league, or DFL, the telecom will broadcast Bundesliga soccer games online and provide content to its T-Mobile subscribers' cell phones. … Deutsche Telekom -- which won the rights to broadcast German soccer league matches via the Internet in an auction last December -- will not, however, distribute the Internet signal through its cable and satellite operations, both companies said in a statement. In return, Deutsche Telekom agreed to pay less for the Internet rights than originally agreed. … At the same time, it was announced that pay-TV company Arena, which won the television broadcasting rights, will no longer have the right to broadcast over the Internet or to sublicense its Internet broadcasting rights."

ENVIRONMENT:

Pipe Company Official Sentenced To Prison For Rigging Pollution Tests. The AP (6/13) reports, "An executive for a cast-iron pipe foundry in Provo was sentenced Monday to a year in prison for rigging a pollution test." The AP continues, "Charles Matlock, who was vice president and general manager of Pacific States Cast Iron Pipe Co., also was fined $20,000 by U.S. District Judge Dee Benson. … Matlock pleaded guilty in February to violating the Clean Air Act by manipulating an emissions test at Pacific States, a division of Birmingham, Ala.-based McWane Inc." The AP adds, "At issue was a furnace stack test conducted in 2000. An indictment accused the company of feeding crude iron instead of its usual supply of contaminated automobile scrap into the foundry to cover up pollution violations. … The 2000 test was used to file emissions reports to government regulators in 2001, 2002 and 2003. McWane paid a $3 million fine for falsifying the test. … 'When senior corporate executives cheat on required tests, public health and the environment suffer,' said David Uhlmann, chief of the environmental crimes section of the U.S. Department of Justice. … Matlock's sentencing 'is further proof of the McWane legacy: a repeat offender that committed years of environmental and worker safety violations at facilities across the country,' Uhlmann said in a statement."

EPA Rule Loosened After Texas Oil Exec Lobbied Rove. The Los Angeles Times (6/13, Hamburger, Wallsten, 958K) reports a rule "designed by the Environmental Protection Agency to keep groundwater clean near oil drilling sites and other construction zones was loosened after White House officials rejected it amid complaints by energy companies that it was too restrictive and after a well-connected Texas oil executive appealed to White House senior advisor Karl Rove." The new rule, "which took effect Monday, came after years of intense industry pressure, including court battles and behind-the-scenes agency lobbying." But environmentalists "vowed Monday that the fight was not over, distributing internal White House documents that they said portrayed the new rule as a political payoff to an industry long aligned with the Republican Party and President Bush."

DOJ_NMG_0033001

McCain Says There Will Be "Heavy Price" For Failing To Act On Climate Change. Sen. John McCain said on Fox News' On The Record with Greta Van Susteren (6/12) that "we are going to pay a very heavy price for" failing to act sooner on climate change. McCain added, "We have an opportunity now in my view because of the high energy costs to move the ethanol and hydrogen and go back to nuclear power and really combine an effort to be much greener with financial incentives to do so. When oil is $10 a barrel I don't think much of ethanol. When it is $70 a barrel it is a very viable energy source."

NYTimes Urges Kempthorne To "Resurrect" Interior's "Stewardship Of Public Lands." The New York Times (6/13, 1.19M) editorializes, "Dirk Kempthorne's chief task as the new secretary of the interior is to resurrect his department's long tradition of responsible stewardship of the public lands. … As she was going out the door, Ms. Norton resolved a long and complicated dispute over who controls thousands of miles of ancient cowpaths and other trails throughout the West in favor of state and local interests. Many of these trails run through national parks, wildlife refuges and monuments, and as things stand now, there is little to prevent the states from paving them and using them to promote commerce. Mr. Kempthorne should revisit this decision. If he does not, Congress should revisit it for him."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Four Face Drug Charges In Connecticut Following Three-Month Investigation. In Manchester, the Hartford (CT) Courant (6/12, Marteka) reports a three-month police investigation "has resulted in the arrests of four men on drug charges, including two who were on parole. … The program was part of Operation SNAG, also known as 'spring-narcotics-arrest and grab,' according to Manchester police Sgt. Sandy Ficara. … During the operation, East Central Narcotics along with the assistance of federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents arrested Daniel Cote on charges of illegally manufacturing steroids and selling them online."

"Pill-Popping" Parties Become Popular As More Teens Abuse Prescription Drugs. USA Today (6/13, Leinwand) reports drug counselors across the USA "are beginning to hear about…pill-popping parties, which are part of a rapidly developing underground culture that surrounds the rising abuse of prescription drugs by teens and young adults. It's a culture with its own lingo: Bowls and baggies of random pills often are called 'trail mix,' and on Internet chat sites, collecting pills from the family medicine cabinet is called 'pharming.' … To try to reduce the supply of prescription drugs on the black market, authorities have shut down several 'pill mills' — where doctors prescribe inordinate amounts of narcotics — as well as Internet pharmacies that ship drugs with little medical consultation, says Catherine Harnett, chief of demand reduction for the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA)."

Tennessee Ranked Nation's Third-Highest State Encountering Meth "Scourge." In a story titled, "The Ground War Against Meth," Adweek (6/12) writes, "Methamphetamines have hit Tennessee hard. Incidents at labs where the drug is cooked using ingredients found at the nearest pharmacy reached 850 last year, including explosions and seizures, making the state the third highest in the country to experience the scourge, according to Drug Enforcement Administration figures. When the Partnership for a Drug-Free America asked The Buntin Group, a small Nashville agency, to develop a pro-bono campaign to fight meth, shop officials there knew they needed more powerful weapons than just TV and print ads to reach the state's more rural areas."

MLB Suspends Grimsley For Using Human Growth Hormone. The AP (6/13) reports pitcher Jason Grimsley "was suspended 50 games by Major League Baseball on Monday, less than a week after federal agents raided his home during an investigation into performance-enhancing drugs. Commissioner Bud Selig's office suspended Grimsley for violating baseball's Joint Drug Prevention and Treatment Program, based on his statements to authorities regarding human growth hormone."

DOJ_NMG_0033002

Diamondbacks "Infuriated." USA Today (6/12, Nightengale) reports the Arizona Diamondbacks, "infuriated and embarrassed by reliever Jason Grimsley's involvement with steroids and human growth hormone, vow to release any player caught using illegal performance-enhancing drugs in the future," Diamondbacks managing general partner Ken Kendrick said. "Particularly unsettling, Kendrick said, was that Grimsley never informed the team he was being targeted as part of a probe into illegal drug use."

Nearly 2 Percent Of American Indian Population Said To Be Using Meth. The AP (6/12) reports, "Statistics on Indian meth use are scarce, but [a] survey found in 2004 that almost 2 percent of the American Indian population was using meth. Robert McSwain, deputy director of the Indian Health Service, told a congressional panel earlier this month that the rate of Indians using meth appears to have dramatically increased in the past five years. This poses a major problem for states and Indian reservations, Barton said, as some states have passed laws that essentially punish property owners for meth contamination. Some landlords -- including Indian housing authorities -- have been forced to pay for cleanup of meth labs, which can cost thousands of dollars."

Afghanistan Seen As "Narco-State." In a story about the Afghan drug trade, the Christian Science Monitor (6/13, Baldauf) writes from Kabul, "Afghan officials and foreign diplomats increasingly call this central Asian country a 'narco-state,' as top officials find it more profitable to flout laws than enforce them. Very few major Afghan officials have been removed for involvement in drug trafficking, in part because of the lack of evidence, and in part because the country has only recently created special tribunals to handle major drug cases."

Some Violence In Afghanistan Seen As Attempt To Undermine Anti-Narcotics Campaign. The AP (6/12) reports from Kandahar that a "surge in fighting has killed about 550 people, mostly militants, since mid-May." U.S. Ambassador Ronald Neumann "said the rebels have stepped up attacks to scare away NATO. … Neumann said he also believes some of the violence is being caused by drug barons inciting fighting in an effort to destabilize the region and undermine the government's U.S.-backed counternarcotics campaign."

On its Web site, Voice of America (6/12) writes Neumann "told reporters that drug lords, mostly in Southern Afghanistan, hope the insurgency will effectively incapacitate Afghan President Hamid Karzai's counter-narcotics program. 'This year, President Karzai led a very strong policy to eradicate poppy. There were efforts by drug-dealers and terrorists together to prevent that,' he said."

Marshals Service Takes Over Operation Of Connecticut Trash Hauling Business. The AP (6/13, Apuzzo) reports, "After allegedly operating for years with the Mafia as its silent partner, southern Connecticut's largest garbage-hauling conglomerate started work this week backed by some new muscle: federal marshals." The AP continues, "In the largest federal business takeover in Connecticut history, authorities seized control Friday of 25 companies suspected of helping carve out mob-controlled garbage routes. Now marshals must lawfully run a business in an industry that prosecutors say has been dirty since the 1980s … 'We seize assets all the time, but running a business is something new for us here,' said U.S. Marshal John Bardelli." The AP adds, "Marshals spent the weekend at the Danbury compound that's home to businessman James Galante's trash empire. With Galante in prison and locked out of his more than 60 business and personal bank accounts, authorities must keep the trucks running and avoid letting the garbage pile up. … Galante's companies serve about 20 southern Connecticut and eastern New York towns. His transfer station handles about 80 percent of the region's garbage and his pickup businesses are among the most dominant in the area. … Federal prosecutors say the Genovese crime family ensured that dominance in exchange for quarterly payments of $30,000. … The companies are required by a court order to maintain their service. The marshals are there to ensure that happens, institute new accounting standards and sign off on every financial transaction the companies make."

Suspect In Abortion Clinic Bomb Plot Appears In Court. The Washington Post (6/13, B9, Castaneda) reports, "The Prince George's man charged with building a pipe bomb he allegedly wanted to use to attack a Greenbelt abortion clinic appeared in federal court yesterday wearing an antiabortion T-shirt." The Post continues, "On the front of Robert Weiler Jr.'s green shirt were the words 'Help Cure Abortion.' On the back was 'ABORTION: The leading cause of death in America,' as well as writing that said abortion claims 1,200,000 lives annually." The Post adds, "Weiler, 25, said little during his initial court appearance in Greenbelt before U.S. Magistrate Judge Charles B. Day. Assistant U.S. Attorney Bryan E. Foreman asked Day to order Weiler to remain in custody, saying the serious charges against him make him a flight risk. … Weiler did not enter a plea, and his attorney, Assistant Public Defender Michael Citara Manis, said Weiler waived his right to a detention hearing. Day scheduled a preliminary hearing for June 22, and until then Weiler will remain in custody. … Weiler is charged with four federal offenses, including possession of an unregistered destructive device and possession of a stolen firearm. Each carries a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison."

DOJ_NMG_0033003

IMMIGRATION:

Sensenbrenner, Tancredo Criticize Senate Immigration Bill. The Washington Times (6/13, Hurt, 90K) reports, "The Senate's immigration-reform bill grants broad amnesty to illegal aliens and is even worse than previously thought, say House Republicans who have read the 850-page Senate bill and must approve any final legislation that Congress sends President Bush." House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., "said of the bill that was largely penned by Sens. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, and John McCain," Arizona Republican, "The more people see of this Senate bill, the less they like it." He also said "allowing illegals to collect Social Security benefits based on past illegal work, for instance, is 'outrageous.'" Also, Rep. Tom Tancredo "said he met last week with a group of hotel executives from Marriott International Inc. who favor increased immigration to bring them more cheap labor to work as hotel maids. He told them about the consultation requirement."

Court Nixes Colorado Immigration Ballot Initiative. USA Today (6/13, Kenworthy, 2.31M) reports Colorado "had been planning a showdown over a ballot initiative to prohibit illegal immigrants from receiving some government services. But the Colorado Supreme Court on Monday rejected the controversial measure, ruling 5-2 that it violates a constitutional requirement that initiatives deal with just one subject." Even "without the measure on the November ballot, Colorado voters are likely to remain at the center of the USA's boisterous immigration debate. The contentious issue could be a factor in competitive elections here for governor, Congress and control of the Legislature." GOP consultant Katy Atkinson said, "It's an issue that kind of exploded here. This will still be an issue, especially in federal races and the governor's race."

TAX:

Nevada Man Sentenced To 4 Years In Prison For Tax Fraud. WebCPA.com (6/12) reports, "More than 2,000 false income and trust tax returns later, a Nevada man has been sentenced to four-and-a-half years in prison. R. Scot Stokes, of Henderson, Nev., was sentenced to 54 months for conspiring to defraud the United States and conspiring to commit mail and wire fraud, in connection with the promotion of a tax and investment fraud scheme, the Department of Justice and the Internal Revenue Service announced." WebCPA notes, "In February 2005, he pleaded guilty to conspiracy and admitted that the filing of false returns had resulted in a loss of federal tax revenue between $7 million and $10 million." Stokes also "said that he participated in fraudulent investment schemes that caused customers to lose between $2.5 million and $5 million."

Sloan Says Estate Tax Repeal Would Hurt The "Small Rich." In his "Deals" column in the Washington Post (6/13, D2, 744K), Allan Sloan writes, "When the Senate turned down President Bush's bid to repeal the estate tax permanently last week, it actually did a favor for tens of thousands of moderately well-off households -- the 'small rich,' if you prefer. That's because such households would be worse off under the full repeal scheduled for 2010 (which Bush wants to make permanent) than they would be under the 2009 rules, which are more favorable for estates than today's rules." Sloan adds that lawmakers should not "benefit a handful of very rich people by eliminating the estate tax 2010-style at the expense of the small rich and everyone else. We've already made a major mistake by allowing the alternative minimum tax…to hit the middle and upper-middle classes but not the truly wealthy. Let's try not to make that same mistake with the estate tax."

WPost Laments Need For Wolf's Proposed Tax Code Commission. An editorial in the Washington Post (6/13, A20, 744K) says, "The political system is proving itself incapable of addressing hard budgetary questions even as the time to act grows shorter. … Into this standoff comes Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.) with a proposal for a base-closure-style commission to beat all commissions. It would look at the tax code and the array of entitlement programs and produce a set of recommendations, decided by a two-thirds vote, to put them on a fiscally sustainable course. … Its recommendations would come before Congress for an up-or-down vote, although the president or either chamber's budget committee would also be able to submit alternatives." The Post says the Wolf proposal "is laudable in some ways, disturbing in others." The Post says lawmakers "should look at Mr. Wolf's proposal and feel embarrassed that it has come to this."

DOJ_NMG_0033004

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Expected To Approve $94.5 Billion Supplemental Spending Bill. The Washington Post (6/13, Weisman, Murray, 744K) reports the House "is expected to approve a record-breaking $94.5 billion emergency spending bill today to fund the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, Gulf Coast hurricane relief, border security and avian flu preparation. With Senate passage expected later in the week, the bill would push the cost of the Iraq war to nearly $320 billion, according to the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service." The "cost of the war may be escalating, but don't expect many lawmakers to stand against a measure to fund military operations." The real debates "will begin after the spending bill is on its way to Bush. On Thursday, the House will get to a long-delayed day of discussions on Iraq and the fight against terrorism, taking up a resolution to urge 'continued resolve by the United States as it moves forward toward achievement of' stability in Iraq." The Senate, "as it considers its annual defense policy bill, will be having a similar discussion, thanks to an amendment by Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) calling for Bush to reach agreement with Iraq on a schedule for troop withdrawals this year."

Schwab Says US Eager For WTO Agreement, Not "Watered-Down" Compromise. On her first day as US trade representative, the Washington Post (6/13, D1, Blustein, 744K) reports Susan Schwab "promptly made it clear that she views her appointment in much different terms than Washington's chattering classes," who have "dismissed her as something of a caretaker because of the way President Bush nominated her." In an interview with the Post, Schwab said, "The fact that the president chose to announce my nomination the same day as Ambassador Portman's was announced was evidence that the president wanted to send a message—that he wanted a seamless transition and continued high priority on trade." To "underscore the point," she emphasized that she plans "to stick resolutely to the position Portman staked out" at the ongoing Doha round of the World Trade Organization. The administration is "eager for an agreement that would sharply lower trade barriers" among the WTO's members, especially in farm products, and "is not interested in a watered-down compromise of the sort some countries are pushing," Schwab told the Post.

Conservatives Pressure Bush To End Probe Of OSC Official. The Hill (6/13, Bolton) reports a "group of prominent conservatives have signed a letter to President Bush aimed at calling off an investigation of Scott Bloch, the administration official tasked with protecting the rights of federal workers." Clay Johnson III, "the deputy director for management at the Office of Management and Budget (OMB), ordered the Office of Personnel Management (OPM) to investigate Bloch in response to a complaint filed last year by several anonymous career employees at the Office of Special Counsel, which Bloch heads." Several conservatives "behind the letter to Bush say that administration officials are trying to pressure Bloch to resign his post because he doesn't believe that sexual orientation should be considered akin to race and religion as a class of civil-rights protection and this view has sparked controversy within his office and Congress." The "potential dispute between social-conservative leaders and the Bush administration comes at a time when GOP strategists are trying to boost support among the conservative wing of the party in preparation for the midterm election." Among the conservative leaders who signed the letter were Tony Perkins, Paul Weyrich, and the Rev. Louis Sheldon.

Before Joining White House Staff, Zinsmeister Blasted Clintons, Gore. The Washington Post (6/13, A19, Baker, 744K) reports, "Bill Clinton is a 'virtuoso deceiver' and Hillary Rodham Clinton a 'true chameleon' guilty of 'self-serving behavior, comparative radicalism, and dubious personal morality.' Al Gore is a 'mad dog' known to 'foam at the mouth.' John McCain is given to 'showboating.' And Jacques Chirac, Nelson Mandela, Gerhard Schroeder and Kofi Annan are all 'feckless fools.' Says who? President Bush's new chief domestic policy adviser." The Post adds, "While most White House aides carefully trim their public commentary, they can't take back what they said before arriving in the West Wing, and few in this day and age arrive with a more provocative paper trail than Karl Zinsmeister, who started his new job yesterday. For a dozen years until his appointment, Zinsmeister held forth on all manner of issues and personalities as editor in chief of the American Enterprise Institute's magazine. … A review of years of articles reveals a formidable thinker with a powerful sense of what he considers right and wrong." For example, "as Zinsmeister sees it, racial profiling by the police makes sense; the military, if anything, treats terrorist suspects too gently; and casual sex has led to wrecked cities, violence and 'endless human misery.' … Although Zinsmeister wrote admiringly of Bush, his future boss was not exempt from remonstration when he seemed to stray." Zinsmeister "chided candidate Bush for promising he would make it easier for legal immigrants to bring in relatives and questioned whether incumbent Bush 'actually has a soft spot for big government.'"

DOJ_NMG_0033005

Budget Deficit Down 16.6% From Last Year. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Solomon, Walsh, 2.11M) reports, "Surging individual and corporate income-tax receipts in May continued to help the federal government shrink the budget deficit to $227 billion for the first eight months of the fiscal year, down 16.6% from the same period a year earlier." The Federal government "did run a larger monthly budget deficit of $42.8 billion in May, widening 21% from $35.4 billion a year earlier." However, "economists said that increase was a quirk of the calendar that shifted some federal program payments into May and from accounting changes that increased the cost of subsidized student loans."

Lobby Firms Paid For 90 Congressional Trips Over 2000-05. The Hill (6/13, Snyder) reports, "Lobbying firms and lobbyists were listed as paying all or part of the costs for 90 congressional trips taken between 2000 and 2005, according to a new report by the Center for Public Integrity, Northwestern University's Medill News Service and American Public Media." Lobbyists and lobbying firms "are not allowed under congressional ethics rules to pay for congressional travel." The "total cost of the trips was roughly $145,000."

NYTimes Says Congress Won't Reform Abuse Of Free Trips. The New York Times (6/13, 1.19M) editorializes that even "in Congress's own sloppy paperwork, the bottom line for junketeering looks shameful: Over just five and a half years, lawmakers and members of their staffs went off on 23,000 'fact-finding' trips worth almost $50 million, with the tab picked up by private sponsors intent on capturing legislative access and favors. Expense-paid fact finding proved particularly irresistible in Paris, the destination of more than 200 trips, Hawaii (150) and Italy (140)." The Times adds, "Unfortunately, this Congress will soon reaffirm its addiction to special-interest junketeering when it strikes a cosmetic deal on ethics reform that does little to end the all-too-clear abuses."

Pelosi Takes Case For Ousting Jefferson From Key Panel To Black Media. Roll Call (6/13, Kornacki) reports the "fight over the Ways and Means Committee seat held by Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) is now playing out on the airwaves and in the pages of publications aimed at blacks, as House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) seeks to dispel the notion that she's enforcing a double standard by demanding that Jefferson step down prior to any criminal charges being filed against him." Unless Jefferson "changes course and leaves Ways and Means on his own, the Louisianan is expected to be booted from the exclusive committee Thursday night — an extraordinary step encouraged by Pelosi, who first called on Jefferson to leave the tax-writing panel three weeks ago 'in the interest of upholding the high ethical standards of the Democratic Caucus.'" Pelosi "appeared on the radio show of Joe Madison, who calls himself 'the Black Eagle.' She also hosted a conference call with black reporters and sat for a one-on-one session with a nationally known black columnist."

Wickham Says Jefferson Should Step Down From Ways And Means Panel. DeWayne Wickham writes in USA Today (6/13, 2.31M) that the Congressional Black Caucus' expected defense of Rep. William Jefferson as the House Democratic Caucus meets Thursday to decide whether he should be stripped of his seat on the Ways and Means Committee "is a fight that shouldn't happen." The CBC has "denounced the effort to oust Jefferson from the committee, saying such a move against an unindicted member of Congress is unprecedented. As defenses go, that's a pretty weak one." Wickham adds that Jefferson "should acquiesce to Pelosi's demand that he step down from the committee whose membership he is accused of abusing. If such a request is unprecedented, it is also long overdue."

DOJ_NMG_0033006

Supporters Rally To Hoyer In Wake Of Murtha Challenge. The Hill (6/13, Hearn) reports allies of Rep. Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) "rushed to his defense Monday as the minority whip faced a challenge from Rep. Jack Murtha (D-Pa.) for the post of majority leader, should Democrats win control of the House in November." Hoyer's backers "expressed concern that the race would hurt their ability to reach voters on policy issues." Rep. Barney Frank said, "I regret that we're going to have this contest. It will be portrayed in the media as a sign of Democratic disorder. It will distract attention from Democrats' efforts to win back the House." The Hill adds a Democratic member "who is backing Hoyer said that the whip was surprised by Murtha's announcement and had been 'playing catch-up' all weekend by calling colleagues." Many Democrats "were curious what role House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) may have had in Murtha's decision. Murtha and Pelosi are close allies."

Roll Call (6/13, Kornacki) reports "there are no signs that Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) will take any steps — publicly or privately — to steer her party away from a potentially divisive leadership fight as a crucial election approaches." Pelosi is "considered the only Democrat with the clout to back Murtha off his challenge, but on Monday she remained unavailable for comment, the same approach she took Friday, when Murtha floored his colleagues by declaring his intention to challenge Hoyer for Majority Leader if the party takes back the House."

Murtha Says He Would Provide "Change In Direction" As Leader. Rep. John Murtha said on MSNBC's Hardball (6/12), "I believe that the public -- Democrats in particular throughout the country -- have been way ahead of the Congress, and some of the members have kind of hung back for one reason or another. I think it's absolutely imperative -- there's no more important issue to this country than the war. That's why I got involved in the majority leader's race." Murtha added, "I think the American public want to change the direction. That's what I'm hearing. They don't want to go down this same road and just hear the same rhetoric over and over and over again. They want a change in direction, and a change in direction means some changes at the top so that these folks have something to look forward to."

Congressional Democrats To Host Town Hall Meeting On 2006 Platform. Roll Call (6/13, Billings) reports congressional Democratic leaders "on Wednesday afternoon will return to the issues that have largely defined their party over the past decade, hosting a town hall meeting to highlight the domestic priorities of their 2006 platform." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) "will headline the forum with other Congressional leaders at the Kennedy Recreation Center in Northwest Washington, D.C. The leaders are taking a different approach to laying out the third component of their platform, holding an issues discussion rather than a ceremonial event designed to energize the party faithful." Sources said "the leaders plan to promote Democratic plans on health care, energy, the economy and education, while challenging what they argue are the failed policies of the Bush administration and the GOP-led Congress."

Pelosi Says Time To Roll Out Democratic Agenda Has Arrived. The Hill (6/13, Hearn) reports with Republicans "seeking to define Democrats by their votes on such hot-button issues as gay marriage, the estate tax and flag burning," House Minority Leader Pelosi (D-Calif.) is arguing that Democrats need to tell voters about themselves before Republicans succeed in doing it for them." Pelosi said the "the time to criticize the Republicans' 'culture of corruption,' a Democratic refrain for nearly a year, is at an end," and Democrats "need to begin promoting their own vision of America." Pelosi said, "Now it's time to talk about us. Enough of the Republicans. It's time for us to talk about what are the priorities we'd like to see addressed, if we have the opportunity." The Hill adds Democrats "have been struggling for months to devise a unified message to take to voters, debating whether to be general or detailed, to come out early or late, or to present a succinct list of points like the GOP's 1994 Contract With America. Pelosi has been seen as favoring an early message, while Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) and Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), who head up the campaign committees for House and Senate Democrats, have argued for focusing on Republican misdeeds." Pelosi "outlined three areas where Democrats would seek to differentiate themselves from Republicans: integrity, civility and accountability. If Democrats were to take control of the House in November, their first actions would focus on promoting those values, she said." The "three themes are similar to the message Democrats ran on in 2004, when they lost two House seats in part because of redistricting in Texas that defeated five Democratic incumbents." But "perhaps more important, Pelosi is vowing to run the House — a body of Congress marked by intense partisanship for decades — in a bipartisan fashion."

DOJ_NMG_0033007

Energy Department Informs 1,500 Workers Hacker May Have Accessed Personal ID. The AP (6/13, Hebert) reports Energy Department officials "have informed nearly 1,500 individuals that their Social Security numbers and other information may have been compromised when a hacker gained entry to a department computer system eight months ago, a spokesman said Monday." The workers, "mostly contract employees, worked for the National Nuclear Security Administration, a semiautonomous agency within the department that deals with the government's nuclear weapons programs." The computer theft "occurred last September, but Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman and his deputy, Clay Sell, were not informed of it until last week."

Voinovich Bill Aimed At Strengthening Performance Appraisal System. The Washington Post (6/13, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that Sen. George Voinovich today plans to offer a bill that would "require federal managers to provide their employees with a written performance evaluation each year and would prohibit pay raises for employees rated as less than successful." Voinovich "said his bill would strengthen the employee performance appraisal system and help lay the foundation for an overhaul of federal pay." The Post adds, "Voinovich's bill appears designed to find middle ground between proponents and opponents of performance-based pay for the federal workforce."

Byrd Becomes Longest-Serving Senator. Sen. Robert Byrd yesterday became the longest serving senator in US history. The Washington Post (6/13, A6, Babington, 744K) reports that Byrd "marked his 17,327th day in the Senate by visiting his wife's grave and then listening to several colleagues praise his career." Byrd "left the floor without speaking, struggling to maintain his composure." ABC World News Tonight (6/12, story 12, :35, Gibson, 8.78M) and NBC Nightly News (6/12, story 9, 2:35, Reid, 9.87M) also reported on Byrd.

Bush Daughter Moving To Manhattan. The Washington Post (6/13, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable Source" column that President Bush's daughter Barbara "has pulled up stakes for Manhattan, sources confirmed yesterday. What the First Daughter has planned for NYC remains unknown; the White House maintains a firm policy of not commenting about the twins' personal lives."

Pentagon's Small Institute Of Heraldry Creates All Presidential Seals, Plaques. The New York Times (6/13, Eckholm, 1.19M) reports on the Institute of Heraldry, the government's chief guardian of insignia and heraldic tradition. The Institute of Heraldry, "located for historical reasons within the Army, has a budget of $2.3 million and 24 employees, including four well-schooled 'heraldic designers.' But the handiwork of this little office has had an outsize influence on the public face of the military and the government. All plaques bearing presidential or vice-presidential seals, as seen on news conference lecterns and the bulkhead of Air Force One, are hand-sculpted and painted here."

WSJournal Criticizes Hayden Testimony. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/13, 2.11M) says "newly minted CIA Director Michael Hayden" has "done the Bush Administration a huge disservice by reinforcing the Democrats' 'Bush lied' theme in his confirmation testimony." Hayden's testimony, "along with his subsequent failure to follow through on promises to correct the record, do not make for an auspicious, truth-telling start at CIA."

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Continue Slump On Interest Rate, Growth Worries. ABC World News Tonight (6/12, story 9, :15, Gibson, 8.78M) reports, "On Wall Street today, investor worries about rising interest rates and economic growth pushed stocks down, again as last week's sell-off continued. The Dow Jones Industrial Average was down another 99 points to close at 10,792. On the Nasdaq, stocks were down nearly 44 points [to close at 2091.32.]"

Also, says the New York Times (6/13, Bajaj, Peters, 1.19M), the Standard & Poor's 500-stock "index fell 1.3 percent, erasing all of its gains for the year and closing at its lowest level since November." But the damage was far worse in some other parts of the world. Trading at the Colombian stock exchange was briefly halted after its benchmark index fell more than 10 percent. Mexico's benchmark stock index fell 4.3 percent, its biggest one-day decline in more than three years. Markets in India, Brazil and Hungary also tumbled.'"

DOJ_NMG_0033008

The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Browning, 2.11M), Washington Post (6/13, Masters, 744K) and USA Today (6/13, Krantz, 2.31M), among other sources, also report on the market.

Fed Officials Continue To Sound "Inflation Alarms." USA Today (6/13, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports, "Federal Reserve policymakers continued to sound inflation alarms Monday, strengthening expectations that they will raise interest rates for a 17th-straight time when they meet this month. 'The recent news on inflation troubles me,' Cleveland Fed President Sandra Pianalto said in a speech to members of the Broadcast Cable Financial Management Association in Orlando." She "noted the so-called core consumer price index, which excludes volatile food and energy prices, rose more than 3% at an annual pace during the first three months of 2006." Board Gov. Susan Bies also "said inflation data have been coming in high. She said the economy is growing rapidly, while energy prices are high -- factors that could add to already elevated price pressures."

Dummar Takes Another Shot At Claiming Hughes Estate. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Karp) reports, "Melvin Dummar had long since given up on getting a share of the late billionaire Howard Hughes's fortune. And for good reason: In 1978, Mr. Dummar became a national joke when a Las Vegas jury ruled that the basis for his claim -- a handwritten will that surfaced mysteriously -- was fake. … 'I've never really gotten over it,' Mr. Dummar says. 'For 30 years, everybody just laughed at me and treated me like some kind of criminal, a forger. Until a few months ago, I thought it was a lost cause.' … But now Mr. Dummar is back, seeking another day in court and what he considers his rightful share of Mr. Hughes's estate. In a lawsuit filed yesterday, Mr. Dummar claims to have new evidence and a compelling new witness: a pilot who says he flew the late Mr. Hughes to a brothel near where Mr. Dummar claims he happened on to him." The Journal continues, "With the suit filed yesterday in federal district court in Salt Lake City, Mr. Dummar began another chapter in one of the wildest estate battles in U.S. history. … When the eccentric billionaire died in 1976, Mr. Dummar (pronounced Doo-MAR) emerged as an improbable heir. He said a will delivered to a gas station he ran in Utah entitled him to $156 million, a reward for the night in 1967 when he said he had found a dazed man face down on a desert road and drove him to Las Vegas. That man, Mr. Dummar claimed, told him he was Howard Hughes. … But Mr. Dummar's tale fell apart at trial. And he got nothing but a dubious place in history, folklore and Hollywood, thanks to the Oscar-winning 1980 film 'Melvin and Howard.' … Now 61 years old and eking out a living delivering meat along those same desolate Nevada roads, Mr. Dummar is hoping for a real-life sequel. His co-stars this time include an author who once was a Federal Bureau of Investigation agent; a former Hughes pilot who is breaking his silence; a prostitute with a diamond-encrusted tooth; and a lawyer who has a weekly radio show about estate planning. … The lawsuit is based on new evidence that purportedly corroborates Mr. Dummar's claim that Mr. Hughes indeed was in the desert that late-December 1967 night. The defendants are two elderly Hughes beneficiaries: William Lummis, the main family heir, and Frank Gay, a former Hughes executive. Mr. Dummar alleges fraud, unjust enrichment and racketeering during the probate case, and requests $156 million, plus interest since 1978, and punitive damages."

Conflict Questions Raised About Getty Book Deal. The Los Angeles Times (6/13, Frammolino, Felch) reports, "Former J. Paul Getty Trust chief Barry Munitz agreed to pay retired Getty board Chairman David Gardner nearly $300,000 to write a coffee-table book after Gardner left the foundation's board in 2004. … Gardner was hired to write the book just months after he intervened on Munitz's behalf to help the chief executive secure a five-year contract rather than the one-year extension some board members favored." The Times continues, "The book deal came after years of pressure from Gardner on Munitz and other Getty officials to find a way to compensate him for his service on the board, records and interviews show. The will of J. Paul Getty, whose oil fortune financed the educational trust that bears his name, specifically stipulates that board members are to serve without pay. … Plans for the book, which was to commemorate the Getty's 25th anniversary, were canceled in March, a month after Munitz resigned amid turmoil at the nonprofit foundation — but not before Gardner had collected $178,000 over 19 months for little work." The Times adds, "Gardner says he produced a rough outline during that time but did not conduct interviews or begin writing. He blamed his lack of progress on the trust, which he said did not provide the necessary cooperation. … Internal Getty documents show that Munitz and his staff were discussing a book deal for Gardner in 2003, while Gardner was chairman and Munitz was negotiating his own contract. Around the same time, Munitz also spoke directly to Gardner about writing a book after he stepped down as chairman, according to two former Getty officials familiar with the discussions. Citing ongoing investigations of the Getty, the officials asked not to be identified. … Munitz and Gardner, a former president of the University of California, deny any impropriety in the book deal. .. Several experts on the laws governing nonprofits, however, said that discussions of the book deal while Gardner was chair created a potential conflict of interest, because both men stood to benefit personally from the official actions of the other."

DOJ_NMG_0033009

Webb, Miller Stump For Votes On Eve Of Virginia Senate Primary. Virginia voters will go to the polls today to decide a winner in the U.S. Senate primary race between Democrats James Webb and Harris Miller. The winner will take on Virginia Sen. George Allen (R) in November. The Washington Post (6/13, B1, Shear, Jenkins, 744K) reports that Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry (D) appeared at a rally with Webb yesterday in Arlington County, VA. Appearing before "about 250 people," Kerry "heartily endorsed Webb, President Ronald Reagan's former Navy secretary, saying that the Senate needs the 'confident leadership' and 'independent thinking' that Webb has offered during the campaign." Miller, meanwhile, "spent the afternoon making last-minute phone calls to prospective voters and later held a rally at his Northern Virginia headquarters in McLean." The candidates "continued to run campaign ads touting their ability to defeat" Allen. Miller's spots, "made possible by his investing $1 million of his personal wealth, hammer Webb on his Republican past."

USA Today (6/13, Lawrence, 2.31M) relates that a number of Senate Democrats, including Kerry, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, DSCC Chairman Charles Schumer and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, have said that Webb "is their 'best hope' to gain a seat and hobble Allen's White House ambitions. Mark Plotkin, a political analyst for Washington's WTOP-radio, calls the senators' intervention 'unprecedented.' In Webb's Renaissance-man résumé, his GOP past and his macho persona, Plotkin says, top Democrats see 'political nirvana' -- the return of white, male, rural and military voters to the Democratic Party." Miller, meanwhile, has been endorsed by The Washington Post's editorial board, which "called him 'better-briefed, better-focused and more thoughtful' than Webb." The candidates "disagree on a few issues, but the main contrast between them is style. Webb drives a camouflage-painted Jeep and campaigns in combat boots that belong to his son, a Marine bound for Iraq in fall." Miller says of himself: "I've been accused of being a policy wonk. … I plead guilty. U.S. senators are supposed to talk about policy."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/13, Chaddock, 61K) reports that while Senate Democratic leaders such as Schumer have backed Webb, "it's not clear that Virginia Democrats expected to turn out in Tuesday's primary election got the memo. At an annual dinner on Friday, not a hint of applause from Arlington County Democrats greeted Mr. Webb's announcement that 13 Democratic senators had 'stood up and endorsed my candidacy.'" Miller, "who was chairing the Fairfax County Democratic Committee when Mr. Webb, a Reagan Democrat, joined the Reagan administration," has the backing of many of the rank-and-file state Democrats, including Margaret Whipple, "who chairs the state Senate Democratic Caucus." Whipple said, "I've known [Mr. Harris] for 20-plus years. He's a Democrat whose values I share." But "if Webb were to pull off a primary victory, he could expect a surge of national funding to defeat Senator Allen, who is also a probable 2008 presidential contender."

The Hill (6/13, Blake) notes that Schumer's "rare, last-minute backing of" Webb "is seen as an indication that Webb would receive more national attention and help than Miller would in the Democrats' quest to unseat Allen. Indeed, national Democrats aren't saying Webb is the better candidate so much as that he is the candidate better able to defeat Allen. A Rasmussen poll from April shows Webb trailing Allen by 20 points, while an earlier Zogby poll showed him behind by seven. Webb was closer than Miller in both polls." The Cook Political Report's Jennifer Duffy "said the decisionmakers at the DSCC 'are sticking their neck out' for Webb." Miller "touts support from dozens of state lawmakers, mayors and council members and said that, while national Democrats throw their support to Webb, local politicians have been hitting the ground for him. 'Chuck Schumer's a good senator for New York City, and Harry Reid's a nice senator for Las Vegas,' Miller said. 'But I have the support of the people here in Virginia, and those are the people that count.'"

Schumer's Endorsement Of Webb Rankles Some Democratic Fundraisers. The Washington Post (6/13, A9, Cillizza, 744K) reports that while it's unclear whether Schumer's backing of Webb "will help move votes," it "did move money -- away from Schumer and the" DSCC. The Post relates, "The most immediate fallout of Schumer's endorsement was the relocation of a post-primary fundraiser for the DSCC that was scheduled to be at the home of former lieutenant governor Donald S. Beyer Jr. and his wife, Megan. The longtime Democratic fundraisers are Miller supporters. The Beyers begged off after Schumer's move, for which they received no advance notice. The event will be at another venue, but is likely to bring in considerably less money as irritated Miller backers join the Beyers in taking a pass on helping the DSCC." Beyer "said the DSCC should have stayed out. 'They've dug a hole that was unnecessary,' he said. 'If Harris wins, they are going to look ridiculous. They will have irritated an awful lot of people.'"

DOJ_NMG_0033010

Allen Will Hold Huge Fundraising Lead Over Democratic Winner. The Washington Times (6/13, McLaughlin, 90K) notes, "Both campaigns have scrambled to raise money. As of May 25, Mr. Miller had raised $1.2 million -- of which $675,000 is his own money -- and Mr. Webb has raised $547,000 -- which includes a $100,000 loan. The winner of today's primary will face an uphill battle against Mr. Allen, who has more than $7 million in his campaign war chest."

GOP Seen As Profiting From Good News Week. In his Roll Call column (6/13), David Winston says, "That sound you heard all over Washington, D.C., last Wednesday morning was Republicans breathing a huge collective sigh of relief that Republican Brian Bilbray had defeated Democrat Francine Busby in the special election to fill California's 50th district House seat. That GOP victory, however, was just the first in a series of political and policy events that challenged the prevailing conventional wisdom and sent Democrats scurrying to their spin doctors for something — anything — positive to say about what quickly turned into a 72-hour political nightmare." The "loss of the special election was only the beginning of a bad week for Democrats. By Thursday, they once again found themselves on the defensive when good news arrived from Iraq — news too big to be ignored. Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the most wanted terrorist in Iraq, had been killed by U.S. military air strikes on the same day that the new Iraqi government had filled its last and most important cabinet posts, Defense and Interior." But if Thursday "was bad for Democrats, by Friday, things had gotten even worse. Rumors of serious rifts in the House Democratic leadership burst into the open Friday as an apparently clairvoyant Murtha announced his intention to seek the Majority Leader's job if Democrats win the House in November."

Bell Seen As Having Uphill Struggle In Texas Gubernatorial Race. The Washington Times (6/13, Aynesworth, 90K) reports Texas Democrats "emerged from their convention here over the weekend with conviction and verve, but they still face an uphill battle to take back the governor's mansion." Former Rep. Chris Bell, "who was gerrymandered out of his district in 2002, is the party's choice to oppose Republican Gov. Rick Perry." Bell "said he could win if the party faithful would stick together. The Houston Democrat certainly needs that, but his own campaign workers concede that few voters have ever heard of Mr. Bell, making name recognition a dominant theme in the campaign."

Eleven Senators May Run for Presidency In '08. Roll Call (6/13, Billings) reports with "an extraordinary 11 sitting Senators seriously eyeing a bid for the White House in 2008, both parties are already dealing with logistical and personality headaches as the lawmakers use the chamber as a testing ground for their competing agendas." At least "five Republican and six Democratic Senators are currently looking at the idea of mounting presidential campaigns — the most in recent memory. And, at least one other Member of Congress, Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), is considered a possible candidate." On the Democratic side, "Sens. Evan Bayh (Ind.), Joseph Biden (Del.), Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), Chris Dodd (Conn.), Russ Feingold (Wis.) and John Kerry (Mass.) already are viewed as committed contenders. Despite his protests, Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) is also seen by some observers as a possible candidate, although many believe he is disinclined to run in 2008." The early Republican field "includes Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.), who is retiring after this Congress, as well as Sens. John McCain (Ariz.), Chuck Hagel (Neb.), Sam Brownback (Kan.) and George Allen (Va.)." Aides and Senators "from both parties said managing the presidential hopefuls' egos will be tricky at a time when both parties are banking on heightened unity to gain an election-year advantage on the issues of the day. But those sources are quick to note that personalities always play a role in the Senate regardless of whether a lawmaker is aspiring for another office."

Kansas GOP Split Could Foreshadow 2008 Presidential Primary. The Los Angeles Times (6/13, Riccardi, 958K) reports former state Republican chairman Mark Parkinson "announced he was running for lieutenant governor — as a Democrat. He said he no longer felt welcome in the increasingly conservative Kansas Republican Party." Parkinson "became the third Republican politician in the last nine months to startle this red state by switching to the minority party. The other two are targeting GOP incumbents in the attorney general's office and in the state House of Representatives." Political observers "say the fracture within the Kansas GOP may foreshadow the future for the national party. The division between moderates and social conservatives is expected to define the contest for the party's 2008 presidential nomination." Moderates who "emphasize economic development and religious conservatives concerned with limiting abortion and gay rights have battled for more than a decade for control of the Kansas Republican Party, which dominates the state with 48% of registered voters. The remaining voters are split evenly between Democratic and Independent registration."

DOJ_NMG_0033011

Laura Bush To Raise Funds For Santorum, Kean. The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/13, 423K) reports as Republican candidates "around the country avoid appearances with President Bush or Vice President Cheney, two in the Philadelphia area - U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania and Senate challenger Thomas H. Kean Jr. in New Jersey - welcome visiting Laura Bush today with open war chests." People "don't blame her for the war in Iraq, rising gasoline prices, or unpopular administration policies." Laura Bush is "scheduled to appear this morning at a fund-raising breakfast for Santorum at the Appleford Estate in Villanova. Santorum is hoping for 300 attendees and $400,000, according to spokeswoman Virginia Davis." Bush also is "to attend an afternoon reception for Kean at a law office in Lakewood, N.J., where the Kean campaign expects as many as 500 guests and at least $500,000 in contributions, which it will split with the New Jersey Republican Committee."

Study Finds Volunteerism Rising. The Washington Times (6/13, Hausner, 90K) reports that a recent study found that volunteerism is on the rise. A "federal study on state volunteerism, released yesterday by the Corporation for National and Community Service (CNCS)," found that "65.4 million (28.8 percent) of American adults volunteered last year. In every region and state, women volunteered at a higher rate than men and married people were more likely to donate time and resources than single people. The study also showed that more Americans 35 to 44 years old volunteered than any other age group."

WSJournal Says 2003 Principle Should Apply When Justices Hear Punitive Damages Case. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/13, 2.11M) says that when the Supreme Court laid down a marker on excessive punitive damages in the 2003 State Farm case, "we suggested it might take more than one try before courts at the lower level got the message. The high court has now agreed to hear an appeal in an Oregon case in which Philip Morris was dinged for punitive damages 97 times greater than the compensatory damages awarded in a smoker's death." The Supreme Court "acknowledged in State Farm that punitive damages may play a role to deter bad conduct. But it was also clear that they're not intended to cover damages to non-parties to these cases or to take account of the losing party's net worth. … The same would seem to apply here; the question is whether the new cast of players at the High Court will see it the same way."

El-Baradei Criticizes Iranian Data Gaps. While Iran continues to mull its response to an international incentives package in exchange for nuclear cubs, the New York Times (6/13, Sciolino, 1.19M) reports, "The chief of the International Atomic Energy Agency on Monday faulted Iran for failing to provide information crucial to understanding fully the nature and intent of its nuclear program." Mohamed El-Baradei said publicly that "his agency 'has not made much progress in resolving outstanding verification issues.' He added, 'I would continue to urge Iran to provide the cooperation needed to resolve these issues.'" El-Baradei "kept his comments on Iran short and declined to take questions from reporters. Still, he made it clear that he welcomed the initiative by the six nations, calling it a way 'to reach a comprehensive agreement that would address the need of the international community to establish confidence in the exclusively peaceful nature of Iran's nuclear program, while also simultaneously addressing Iran's security, technology and economic needs.'"

Meanwhile, Bloomberg (6/13, Tirone) notes, "El-Baradei said a US offer to join direct talks with Iran about security issues may provide an end to the stalemate over the Islamic Republic's atomic program."

Japan Skeptical About Sanctions Proposal. The Washington Post (6/13, A14, Faiola, Linzer, 744K) reports,

DOJ_NMG_0033012

"Despite months of pressure from Washington, Japan has become increasingly reluctant to join a Bush administration plan for sanctions against Iran if negotiations fail to resolve concerns over the country's nuclear program." Tokyo has hinted they "may not join in punitive measures unless there is a broad international consensus along the lines of a UN Security Council resolution or other measure backed by nations now reluctant to impose sanctions, such as China." The Post says a financial sanctions regime "depends strongly on Japanese participation. Without it, administration officials have calculated, the impact would significantly decrease." The Post goes on to report Secretary Rice and Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso "discussed the Iranian situation by telephone, agreeing to cooperate in resolving the standoff."

China Opposes Joint Statement; Russia Could Follow. The AP (6/13, Jahn) reports Beijing and Moscow "are holding back from a united message with Western powers to insist that Tehran halt uranium enrichment, a stance that could encourage Iranian defiance, diplomats said Monday." China is said to be "opposed to signing a joint statement and Russia was leaning against participating."

Iran Plan Said To Mirror Clinton-Era Pyongyang Overture. In an analytical piece, the Wall Street Journal (6/13, Solomon, 2.11M) reports, "As President Bush contemplates the possibility of nonproliferation talks with Iran, he runs some of the same risks he said the Clinton administration took when dealing with North Korea. Mr. Bush and his top aides were critical five years ago of the Clinton team's negotiating tactics with the regime in Pyongyang," and "now the Bush team has opened the door to the possibility of holding similar talks with Iran." According to the Journal, "Many counterproliferation experts support this evolving US approach, saying it is a more realistic and potentially sustainable than avoiding direct talks. They also see the White House's diplomatic U-turn as an unstated recognition of the limits of unilateral American power." The Carnegie Endowment's George Perkovich is quoted saying, "They were in the bunker at the White House, thinking, eventually, these countries would have to succumb to our power. ... But it turns out we can't do everything out there alone."

Christopher Sees Parallels To Iranian Hostage Talks. Former Secretary of State Warren Christopher writes in the New York Times (6/13, 1.19M), "The welcome recent announcement that the United States is willing to join face-to-face talks with Iran rekindled memories of my own experiences, 25 years ago, as chief negotiator in the Iranian hostage crisis. The subject of that negotiation was the 52 American diplomats who were taken hostage in Tehran on Nov. 4, 1979. The result was their release, 444 days later, on the day of Ronald Reagan's inauguration in 1981. Since that day we have had no diplomatic relations and virtually no direct dialogue with Iran." He adds "there are lessons from our 1979-81 negotiations with Iran that can inform our efforts in 2006. First, we must be sure we are talking with the right people. One of the most frustrating dead ends we encountered in the hostage negotiations was learning that despite prolonged efforts to forge a settlement with President Abolhassan Bani-Sadr, he did not even have the power to move the hostages from one location to another, much less cause their release. If our 2006 negotiators study the vectors of power in Iran, they may be able to avoid such frustrations. … As in the hostage crisis, a military solution is unwise and probably infeasible."

Hamas, Fatah Gunmen Go On Rampage In Palestinian Territories. The New York Times (6/13, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports, "Hundreds of Palestinian security personnel loyal to" President Mahmoud Abbas "went on a rampage Monday night in the West Bank town of Ramallah, attacking the parliament and cabinet buildings controlled by his rivals in the Hamas-led government. The attack…came after Hamas gunmen attacked the Gaza headquarters of the Fatah-dominated security forces with rockets and grenades." According to the Times, "Mr. Abbas declared a state of emergency and ordered people off the streets on a chaotic and violent day."

Meanwhile, the Financial Times (6/13, Morris, Ben Hall) reports, "Hamas on Monday deferred a parliamentary motion to outlaw a national referendum called by Mr. Abbas for July 26 that would ask the electorate to vote on proposals that implicitly recognize Israel. Hamas...has declared the referendum illegal." The AP (6/12, Daraghmeh), Chicago Tribune (6/13, Greenberg, 643K) and Washington Post (6/13, A14, Wilson, 744K) run similar reports.

Rockets Lobbed At Israeli Towns; Generals Recommend Gaza Invasion. The Washington Times (6/13, Mitnick, 90K) reports, "Israel and Hamas seemed on the brink of abandoning a 17-month calm on Wednesday as Islamic militants lobbed rockets at Israeli towns and Israeli generals reportedly recommended an invasion of Gaza to snuff out the salvos, but officials and analysts think both sides will honor the informal cease-fire. … Both Israel and the Palestinian Authority face growing domestic pressure to launch retaliatory attacks. Seven Palestinians from one family were killed on a Gaza beach by an errant explosive, and the southern Israeli city of Sderot has come under frequent attack by Qassam rockets. So far, political leaders have resisted the temptation."

DOJ_NMG_0033013

Israel Says Palestinians Not Killed By Israeli Shells. NBC Nightly News (6/12, story 6, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported on the deaths of seven Palestinians on a Gaza Beach after an Israeli-Palestinian military confrontation. NBC (Fletcher) added the "shocking pictures" have turned Huda Ghaliya "into a Palestinian symbol around the world. President Mahmud Abbas called her the daughter of the Palestinian people. But there is confusion as to what really happened. Friday afternoon, the Israeli army and Palestinian militants from Hamas had been exchanging rocket fire. Hamas immediately blamed Israel for the tragedy and called off a 16-month truce, swearing revenge. Israel said it regretted the loss of life and brought Huda's two wounded sisters and her brother to an Israeli hospital for treatment. But tonight, Israeli military sources tell NBC News they have examined shrapnel taken from Huda's siblings and they've confirmed that the shrapnel does not come from an Israeli artillery shell."

Blair, Olmert Push For "Negotiated" Solution. The Financial Times (6/13, Ben Hall) reports British Prime Minister Tony Blair "on Monday urged Israelis and Palestinians to pursue a negotiated settlement of their conflict, but did not endorse a unilateral Israeli solution in the event of a stalemate. Speaking in Downing Street after talks with" Israeli Premier Ehud Olmert, "Mr. Blair promised to give 'every support and every impetus we can from the international community' to ensure that talks could begin." For his part, Olmert "reiterated his willingness to work towards a negotiated solution, which he said was based on 'a generous compromise' by Israel. He would 'go a long way' to convincing the Palestinians that it was worthwhile entering talks, under conditions set out in the international road map. 'We are not impatient, therefore we are willing to give it some time,' Mr Olmert said, revealing that he would be meeting Mr Abbas within the next few weeks."

However, says the AP (6/12, Weizman), Olmert also said that "he would make 'every possible effort' to negotiate peace with the Palestinians but will act unilaterally without an agreement."

Expert Says North Korea Trying To Get US Attention. AFP (6/12, Parameswaran) reports, "North Korea's preparations for possible long-range missile tests -- its first in nearly a decade -- may be an attempt to grab the attention of a US government distracted by its nuclear row with Iran, experts said." A senior US official said in a weekend report that there were "'enough indications' to suggest that the Stalinist state was getting ready to test-fire an intercontinental ballistic missile, eight years after sending a missile over northern Japan. Current test preparations are reportedly far more advanced than on previous occasions when North Korea appeared to be gearing up for a missile launch."

Coburn Meets With UN Deputy Secretary General. The Washington Times (6/13, Pisik, 90K) reports that Sen. Tom Coburn visited UN Deputy Secretary General Malloch Brown yesterday "to explain that Middle America does appreciate the work of the world body, they just want to see it better managed." Coburn met with brown "to rebut what he considered unfair criticism of the American people. 'I expressed disappointment on the lack of insight that was displayed in the speech given last week,' Mr. Coburn told reporters after meeting in Mr. Malloch Brown's office. 'The vast majority of Oklahomans believe in the function of the U.N. and recognize the positive contributions.' However, he added, the international organization still suffers from a lack of transparency and accountability."

Cuba Cuts Power To US Mission In Havana. The AP (6/12) reports that the State Department said yesterday that the Cuban government cut off electricity to the US diplomatic mission in Havana and "US requests for power to be restored have gone unanswered." The facility "has been operating with generator power." The AP adds, "Work at the mission continues, including interviews of refugees and outreach programs for the Cuban people, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said."

The Washington Times (6/13, Carter, 90K) reports, "The State Department called the power cut part of a campaign of harassment of US diplomats by the Cuban government. … The State Department said the harassment is thought to be the Cuban response to the U.S. Interests Section's 'outreach' on behalf of the Cuban people."

DOJ_NMG_0033014

Islamic Leader In Somalia Seeks "Understanding" With US. Knight Ridder (6/13, Allam) reports that Somalian Islamic leader Sheik Sherif Ahmed said yesterday that he seeks "am understanding" with the US. Ahmed, whose Islamic Courts Union militia seized control of Mogadishu last week also "denied that his group is sheltering al-Qaida terrorists." Ahmed "told Knight Ridder that he doesn't plan full ties with the United States, and he dodged questions about his views on al-Qaida."

Roberts Says State Department's Disclosure Of Covert Program Made Somalia Efforts More Difficult. John B. Roberts II, who served in the Reagan White House, writes in the Washington Times (6/13, 90K) that under presidential authority, Washington "launched a covert action program relying on a coalition of secular Somali warlords called the Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counter-Terrorism" to contain al Qaeda in Somalia. Roberts adds that the success of these CIA-backed warlords in containing al Qaeda has been made more difficult "by State Department disclosure of the covert program. How CIA Director Michael Hayden and Deputy Director Steve Kappes handle the Nairobi station chief will be closely watched by CIA officers, especially in operations. This is the acid test of whether the new CIA is a risk-averse agency where creativity and daring will be rewarded." To send a message throughout CIA, Messrs. Hayden and Kappes should promote the Nairobi station chief instead of sacrificing him to appease critics in other agencies or Congress."

World Bank Says Indonesia Lacks Funds To Fight Bird Flu. The AP (6/13) reports Indonesia's fight against bird flu is "under-funded and poorly coordinated," the World Bank said, "urging the government to be more aggressive in culling fowl in infected areas." The bank, in a report to be released today to Indonesia's biggest aid donors, also said the Indonesian government needed to "improve surveillance of poultry stocks to better detect outbreaks of the disease and to modify its vaccination program." Indonesia estimated it will need $900 million over the next three years to fight the H5N1 virus, but has budgeted only $59 million for 2006.

Chinese Officials Divided Over Booming Auto Market. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (6/13, Fairclough, Oster, 2.11M) reports on china's auto market, noting that nearly 1,000 new cars hit the streets of Beijing each day, "crowding a city already choked with pollution. Levels of nitrogen dioxide currently exceed the World Health Organization's clean-air guidelines by 78%." The Journal adds, "The rise of the automobile highlights the wrenching balancing act China faces as it tries to join the ranks of modern consumer societies: improving living standards and creating jobs for the country's 1.3 billion people while keeping pollution and oil demand under control. Officials from China's central government are divided over how to proceed."

Russian TV Show Promises Seats In Parliament To Young People. A front page story in the Washington Post (6/13, A1, Finn, 744K) reports on a Russian television show called Political Factory on which a group of potential legislators, picked from obscurity, will compete to "join the Russian ruling class by October." In April, the Supreme Council of United Russia, the political party which controls legislatures at both the federal and regional levels, "decided that 20 percent of all candidates on party lists in future elections must be between 21 and 28 years of age. The move is part of efforts to broaden the party's membership beyond the stolid bureaucrats and businessmen who currently stuff its ranks -- many of them inspired not by ideological fervor but by the party's almost complete electoral dominance." On June 4," the original field of 60 was cut to 20, half of whom had no previous affiliation with United Russia or Young Guard, according to their questionnaires. … On June 27, five final winners will be chosen in Lipetsk and added to the party list. Three of those will almost certainly end up in parliament."

US Urged To Avoid "Public Spitting Match" With Egypt. Jon B. Alterman, who directs the Middle East Program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, writes in the Washington Post (6/13, A21, 744K), "There are many in Washington who think that Egyptian politics turned around last spring because of President Bush's demonstrated resolve to promote political change in that country. They further believe that the leadership in Cairo reverted to its bad old ways when Bush's attention strayed. They are wrong on both counts. Profound change was never in the air in Egypt." The US "needs to continue to press for greater openness and participation in Egypt. … Our role should be to encourage and prod. Getting into a public spitting match with the Egyptian government would have precisely the opposite effect."

DOJ_NMG_0033015

Kristof Calls For Debate On Effectiveness Of Foreign Aid. Nicholas Kristof writes in the New York Times (6/13, 1.19M) that Americans should not "shy away from a conversation about the effectiveness of [foreign] aid. The problems are real, but so are the millions of people alive today who wouldn't be if not for aid. In the end, if we have tough conversations about foreign aid, then I believe Americans will acknowledge the challenges -- and then, clear-eyed, agree to dig more deeply than ever, for that is simply the best way we have of asserting our own humanity."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Zarqawi Attack Put Jordan Hot On His Trail."
"Getty Book Deal Led To Questions Of Conflict."
"He's No Angel, He's A P.I."
"Rival U.S. Labs In Arms Race To Build Safer Nuclear Bomb."
"L.A. Convention Center To Get Major Hotel Tower."
"In Kansas, A Troubling Fissure For GOP."
"High Court Scrutinizing Capital Cases."

USA Today:
"Poll Sees A Boost For Bush, Iraq War."
"Prescription Drugs Find Place In Teen Culture."
"AFL-CIO Plans New Orleans Boom."

New York Times:
"Violence Erupts Among Factions Of Palestinians."
"Prisoners Gain In Suit Attacking Lethal Injection."
"U.S. Muslims Confront Taboo On Nursing Homes."
"Police Struggles In New Orleans Raise Old Fears."
"Dogs And Discriminating Noses Are Following New Career Paths."
"Oil, Politics And Bloodshed Corrupt An Iraqi City."

Washington Post:
"Violent Crime Rises In U.S."
"Hope Has Faded For Md. Publisher."
"Rail Car Problems Delay Metro Relief."
"Russian Party Asks Young: Who Wants To Be A Deputy?"
"Officials Detail Zarqawi's Last Hour."
"For Many Of Katrina's Young Victims, The Scars Are More Than Skin Deep."

Washington Times:
"Zarqawi Successor The New Target."
"Church Revisits Views On Gays."
"Air Marshals Warn Their Bullets Are Too Powerful."
"Ex-Morales Backer Decries Party Betrayal."
"Chinese Muslims Search For Sanctuary."
"The Social Butterflies Drawn To The Polo Match."

Detroit Free Press:
"Optimism In Tough Times."
"Wiretap Suit All About Power."
"NWA, Flight Attendants Ease Strike Fear With Talks."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Students' Scores Highlight Disparity."
"Water Squeeze Brings First ban."
"Guard's Arrival At Border Stifles Illegal Crossings."
"Worries Not For The Lack Of Rain."
"Court Bows To Science, Allows New Execution Appeals."

Houston Chronicle:
"Mystery Man Takes Al-Zarqawi's Place."
"Violent Crimes Rise 2.5% In '05."
"Jurors Complain Of Push To Convict."
"Pollutant Study Gives The County A Cleanup 'To-Do' List, Mayor Says."
"Tijuana's Poor Adore Flamboyant Mayor."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Tropical Storm Alberto; Alberto Preparations; Bush-War Cabinet; Zarqawi Replacement; Zarqawi Autopsy; Supreme Court-Death Penalty; NV-Judge Shot; Violent Crime; Stock Markets; US Soccer Team; Steelers QB Accident; Byrd-Longest Senate Tenure; Zoo Elephants.
CBS: Tropical Storm Alberto; Alberto Forecast; Zarqawi's Replacement; Iraq Violence; Bush-Approval Ratings; Bush-War Cabinet; Gitmo Suicides; Canadian Terror Plot; Violent Crime; NC-Anti-Crime Program; Steelers QB Accident; Funeral-CBS Cameraman.
NBC: Tropical Storm Alberto; Alberto Preparations; Zarqawi Autopsy; Bush-War Cabinet; Violent Crime; Gaza-Palestinian Family; Steelers QB Accident; Type 2 Diabetes; Byrd-Longest Senate Tenure.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Tropical Storm Alberto; Bush-Camp David Meeting; Zarqawi Successor Named; NV-Judge Shooting.

DOJ_NMG_0033016

CBS: Tropical Storm Alberto; Iraq Bombs; Iraq-CBS News Poll; Zarqawi Autopsy; Roethlisberger-Motorcycle Accident; Real Estate Prices.
NPR: Tropical Storm Alberto; ACLU-Warrantless Wiretap Suit; Zarqawi Successor Named; Wall Street; Dallas-Setser Convicted; Monster.Com-Stock Options.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Holds a video teleconference with the Iraqi Cabinet in Baghdad, Camp David; holds press availability, Rose Garden.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Speaks at a Santorum Victory Committee breakfast, Appleford Estate, Villanova, Pa.; speaks at a Kean-NJ Victory '06 Committee reception, Bathgate, Wegener and wolf, Lakewood, N.J.

US Senate: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 9:45 a.m. -- Meets for morning business. Highlights: After morning business, resumes consideration of S. 2766, Defense Authorization and pending amendment on successful mission to eliminate Zarqawi. 12:15 p.m. Roll call vote on Zarqawi Amendment. 3:30 p.m. Vote on motion to invoke cloture on nomination of Richard Stickler to be assistant secretary of labor for mine safety and health.

9:30 a.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on counterterrorism. State Department Counterterrorism Coordinator Henry A. Crumpton; retired Vice Adm. John Scott Redd, director, National Counterterrorism Center; John E. McLaughlin, School of Advanced International Studies; Daniel Benjamin, Center for Strategic and International Studies. Location: Room 419, Dirksen.

9:30 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Constitution, Civil Rights and Property Rights Subcommittee. Hearing on the need for Section 203 provisions for limited English speakers. John Transvina, Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund, Los Angeles; Margaret Fung, Asian American Legal Defense and Education Fund, New York; Mauro E. Mujica, U.S. English; Deborah Wright, California Department of Registrar-Recorder; Peter N. Kirsanow, National Labor Relations Board. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

10 a.m. AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION AND FORESTRY _ Full Committee. Oversight hearing on USDA farm loan programs. Glenn Keppy, associate administrator for programs, Farm Service Agency; Carolyn Cooksie, deputy administrator for farm loan programs, FSA; Dennis A. Everson, president, Agribusiness Division, First Dakota National Bank, Yankton, S.D.; Betsy Senter, National Association of Credit Specialists; Karen Krub, Farmers' Legal Action Group Inc., St. Paul. Location: Room 328A, Russell.

10 a.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Full Committee. Hearing on a substitute version of S.2686, the Communications Act of 2006. Location: Room 106, Dirksen.

10 a.m. FINANCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on corporate tax issues. IRS Commissioner Mark Everson, Comptroller General David Walker, Assistant Attorney General eileen O'Connor; George Pleski, University of Connecticut; attorney Edward Kleinbard; tax analyst Martin Sullivan. Location: Room 215, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Readiness and Management Support Subcommittee. Hearing on the FY07 budget for business systems modernization and financial management. Comptroller General David Walker; Undersecretary of Defense Kenneth Kreig; Principal Deputy Undersecretary of Defense J. Davide Patterson. Location: Room 222, Russell.

2:30 p.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Federal Financial Management, Government Information, and International Security Subcommittee. Hearing on autopilot budgeting. Clay Johnson III, OMB; Eileen Norcross, George Mason University; Adam Hughes, OMB Watch. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Meeting on pending business. Closed. Location: Room 219, Hart.

3 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Administrative Oversight and the Courts Subcommittee. Hearing on H.R. 1038 - Multidistrict Litigation Jurisdiction. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 9:30 a.m. FLOOR SCHEDULE _ Meets for morning hour and at 11 a.m. for legislative business. At 11:25 Rep-elect Brian Bilbray will be sworn in on the House floor. At about 11:35 a.m. there will be a mock swearing in photo opportunity in H-210, Capitol. Highlights: Suspensions (3 bills): 1) H.Con.Res. 372 - Recognizing the 50th Anniversary of the Interstate Highway System; 2) H.R. 5117 - To exempt persons with disabilities from the prohibition against providing section 8 rental assistance to college students; 3) H.Res. 318 - Supporting responsible fatherhood, promoting marriage, and encouraging greater involvement of fathers in the lives of their children, especially on Father's Day. H.R. 5576 - Transportation, Treasury, Housing and Urban Development, the Judiciary, the District of Columbia, and Independent Agencies Appropriations Act for Fiscal Year 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0033017

9:30 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Crime, Terrorism and Homeland Security Subcommittee. Hearing on improving restitution for crime victims. Testimony from the National Crime Victim Law Institute, Lewis and Clark Law School; Parents of Murdered Children, Inc.; and the Committee on Corrections and Sentencing, American Bar Association. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

10 a.m. FINANCIAL SERVICES _ financial Institutions and Consumer Credit Subcommittee. Hearing on the Home Mortgage Disclosure Act. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

10 a.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Railroads Subcommittee. Hearing on issues in rail transportation of hazardous materials. Witnesses include Joseph Boardman, Administrator, Federal Railroad Administration; Robert Chipkevich, Director, NTSB, Office of Railroad Investigations; Edward Hamberger, CEO, Association of American Railroads; Richard Timmons, President, American Short Line and Regional Railroad Assoc.; Thomas Pontolillo, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and Trainmen; the American Chemistry Council; Augusta Fire Department; American Trial Lawyers Assoc.; others. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

10:30 a.m. EDUCATION AND THE WORKFORCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on minority test scores and the No Child Left Behind law. Deputy Education Secretary Raymond Simon; Cynthia Kuhlman, principal, Centennial Place Elementary, Atlanta; Deputy Maryland State Education Superintendent Ronald Peiffer. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

10:30 a.m. SCIENCE _ Space and Aeronautics Subcommittee. Hearing on the NASA worlforce, retention and reinforcing the workforce. Assistant Administrator Toni Dawsey, David Black, National Research Council; Gregory Junemann, International Federation of Progessional and Technical Engineers; John Douglass, Aerospace Industries Association. Location: Room 2318, Rayburn.

1 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on H.R. 5200 - National Defense Enhancement and National Guard Empowerment Act of 2006. Adm. Edmund P. Giambastiani - vice chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff; Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon R. England; Gen. Richard Cody, vice chief of staff, Army; Gen. John D.W. Corley, vice chief of staff, Air Force; retired Air Force Brig. Gen. Stephen Koper, president, National Guard Association of the U.S.; Maj. Gen. Roger P. Lempke, president, Adjutants General Association of the United States. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

2 p.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee. Hearing on NIH research policies regarding human tissue samples. Witness scheduled: Dr. Susan Molchan, Neuroscience and Neuropsychology of Aging Program, National Institute on Aging, Bethesda, Md. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Federal Workforce and Agency Organization Subcommittee. Hearing on information technology in the federal employees health benefits program. Dan Green, Deputy Associate Director, Center for Employee and Family Support Policy, OPM; Charles Fallis, President, National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association; Colleen Kelley, National President, National Treasury Employees Union; Jacqueline Simon, Director of Public Policy, American Federation of Government Employees; Archelle Georgion, MD, Executive VP, Strategic Relations, Specialized Care Services, UnitedHealth Group; Stephen W. Gammarino, Senior Vice President, National Programs, Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association; Joe Witkowski, Vice President, Government Employees Hospital Association, Inc. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ National Security, Emerging threats and International Relations Subcommittee. Hearing on private security firms on the battlefield.William Solis, GAO; Greg Starr, State Department; James Undar, USAID; Chris Taylor, Blackwater USA; retired Maj. Gen. Robert Rosenkranz, DynCorp International; Ignacio Balderas, Triple Canopy; Doug Brooks, International Peace Operations Association. Location: Room 2247, Rayburn.

2 p.m. RULES _ Full Committee. Meeting to set rules for floor debate on H.Res. ___ - Declaring that the U.S. will complete the mission in Iraq and prevail in the Global War on Terror, the struggle to protect freedom from the terrorist adversary. Location: Room H-313, Capitol.

3 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Commercial and Administrative Law Subcommittee. Hearing on state taxation of interstate telecommunications services. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

DOJ_NMG_0033018

Other: LATIN AMERICAN DEVELOPMENT _ The Inter-American Development Bank holds a conference on a new initiative to deal with Latin American development. Highlights: 9 a.m. Former President Bill Clinton. Location: IADB, 1330 New York Ave. NW.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH _ Annual meeting of the National Family Planning and Reproductive Health Association. Highlights: 12 p.m. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton delivers the keynote address. Sewall-Belmont House, 1444 Constitution Ave. NW. Location: Omni Shoreham Hotel, 2500 Calvert St. NW, unless otherwise noted.

KATRINA-PROTEST _ Survivors of hurricane Katrina and Rita hold demonstrations to protest FEMA's decision to end housing benefits. Highlights: 10 a.m. Demonstration outside FEMA, 500 C St. SW. 12 p.m. News conference. Holiday Inn, 550 C St. SW. 3 p.m. Presentation at Katrina housing series congressional forum. room 2200, Rayburn.

REGIONAL LEADERS _ 8 a.m. Rep. Ruben Hinojosa hosts the 5th Regional Leaders Conference for local elected officials, education administrators, municipal representatives others. Highlights: 9 a.m. Rep. Chet Edwards on improving health care access for veterans. 11 a.m. Federal Reserve Board Chairman Ben Bernanke. 11:30 a.m. Rep. Charles Gonzales on reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act. 12 p.m. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison. Location: Jefferson Building, Library of Congress.

VILSACK-FOREIGN POLICY _ 8:30 a.m. - 10 a.m. The Johns Hopkins Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies (SAIS) Ceter for Transatlantic Relations hosts a foreign policy briefing, ``Foreign Policy: A Governor's View." Governor Tom Vilsack, D-Iowa, will give the keynote remarks. Other panelists include Chrystia Freeland, U.S. managing editor of the Financial Times, and Robert Guttman, editor-in-chief of Transatlantic magazine at SAIS. Location: Room 500, Bernstein-Offit Building, 1717 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

REAL ESTATE _ 9:30 a.m. Assistant Treasury Secretary Emil Henry, Jr., speaks on the economy at the Real Estate Roundtable.

IRS _ 10:30 a.m. President Colleen Kelley of the National Treasury Employees Union and Rep. Steven Rothman hold a media briefing by telephone to discuss their joint effort to prevent the Internal Revenue Service from hiring private sector debt collectors. Contacts: Dina Long, 202-572-5500. Notes: Callin number: 888-296-1938; passcode: 953743.

TEACHING AWARD _ 11 a.m. Education Secretary Spellings speaks at the National Kinder Excellence Teaching Award news conference. Location: Willard Inter-Continental Hotel, 1401 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

BOEHNER _ 11:30 a.m. House Majority Leader Rep. John Boehner holds a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-107, Capitol.

DISASTER PREPAREDNESS _ 11:45 a.m. - 1:30 p.m. The SCI FI channel hosts a media roundtable, ``Are We Prepared? For Pandemic, Nuclear Terrorism or Asteroid Collision?," exploring how prepared the US government is to deal with the potential catastrophic dangers posed by a flu pandemic, nuclear terrorism and collision with a near-Earth object. Participants include Reps. Rep. Nita Lowey, D-N.Y., James Langevin, D-R.I., and Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., and Irwin Redlener, Associate Dean for Public Health Advocacy and Preparedness, and Director of its National Center for Disaster Preparedness, joseph L. Mailman School of Public Health, Columbia University; Joe Cirincione, Senior Vice President for National Security and International Policy at the Center for American Progress in Washington, D.C.; and Ed Lu, NASA Shuttle astronaut, astrophysicist. Location: Room S-120, Capitol.

HOYER _ 12:30 a.m. House Democratic Whip Rep. Steny Hoyer holds a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-306, Capitol.

CHINA _ 12 p.m. The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace holds a discussion with Joshua Kurlantzick about the rise of China's soft power. Location: 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

FOUNDERS-RELIGION _ 12 p.m. Inaugural luncheon of the Reese Roundtable, a forum of Christian conservatives, with James Hutson of the Library of Congress discussing his book on the religious beliefs of the Founding Fathers. Location: Room B-340, Rayburn.

MUSLIMS-KOSOVO _ 1 p.m. Reps. Eliot Engel and Joseph Crowley hold a news conference to respond to a published anti-Muslim ad regarding Kosovo. Location: Cannon Terrace.

HIV-DRUG USERS _ 2 p.m. Rep. Raul Grijalva and the HIV Prevention Action Committee of the Federal AIDS policy Partnership hold a briefing on HIV prevention among drug-using populations, with don Des Jarlais of Beth Israel Medical Center, Nabila El-Bassel of Columbia University School of Social Work, Baltimore Health Commissioner Joshua

DOJ_NMG_0033019

Sharstein, and Ron Daniels of Prevention Works in D.C. Location: Room 2168, Rayburn.

US FOREIGN POLICY _ 2 p.m. - 3:30 p.m. There will be a Brookings-Pew Research Center briefing. ``Global Attitudes Toward U.S. Foreign Policy.'' Participants are: Andrew Kohut, president, Pew Research Center; director, Pew Global Attitudes Project; Carlos Pascual, vice president and director, Foreign Policy Studies, The Brookings Institution; William Kristol, editor, The Weekly Standard; and Susan E. Rice, senior fellow, The Brookings Institution. Location: Brookings Institution, Saul/Zilkha Room, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

US-VIETNAM _ 3:30 p.m. USTR Susan Schwab participates in the U.S.-Vietnam WTO Coalition Congressional rollout for Vietnam's PNTR. Location: Room HC-5, Capitol.

DEMOCRATIC FUNDRAISER _ 5:30 p.m. DNC Chairman Howard Dean attends the DNC Washington Grassroots Fundraiser. Location: Presidential Ballroom, Capital Hilton, 16th and K Sts. NW.

IRAQ FILM _ 5:30 p.m. Showing of a Showtime film, ``Home Front,'' about a blinded Iraq veteran and his experiences since returning home. Location: Room 418, Russell.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, JUNE 13, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

DOJ Defends Domestic Surveillance Program In Detroit Courtroom ... 3
2nd Circuit Panel Presses CIA Attorney Over Withheld Documents ... 3
Administration Backs Away From Official's Remarks On Guantanamo Suicides ... 4
Religious Leaders Call On US To Ban Torture ... 5
Canadian Terror Suspects Allegedly Trained Near US Border ... 5

Homeland Response:

Technology Association Study Criticizes VoIP Wiretapping Rules 5
Air Marshals Say Ammunition Not Safe For Use In Air ... 5
Kelly Says Lower Manhattan Initiative Put On Hold Due To Reduced Funding ... 6
Author Says DHS Allowed To Act Like "Keystone Stasi." ... 6
Evacuations Ordered In Florida As Alberto Approaches Landfall . 6
Insurance Regulators Call On Congress For Help Dealing With Disasters ... 7
Spellings Announces Grants For New Orleans Charter Schools .. 8

War News:

Bush Meets With National Security Team On Iraq ... 8
US, Iraqi Forces Launched 200 Raids Against Insurgents Since Zarqawi's Death ... 11
Insurgent Attacks Kill More Than 50 In Baghdad ... 12
US Army Officer Helps Iraqi Convict ... 12
Basra Spiraling Into Corruption ... 13
Hussein Witnesses Admit Perjury ... 13
Funeral Held For CBS Cameraman Killed In Iraq ... 13
37 Taliban Members Killed In Battles ... 13
NATO Seen As Increasing Role In War On Terror ... 13
Congress Gives Pentagon More Budgetary Authority ... 13
Army Changes Pain Treatment For Wounded Soldiers ... 13
Rival US Labs Compete To Build Safer Nuclear Bomb ... 13

Corporate Scandals:

Former Interspeed Official Convicted Of Fraud ... 14
US Subpoenas Monster In Widening Options Probe ... 14
Manne Argues Case For Insider Trading ... 14
Bill Would Limit Use Of Pension Accounting Benefit ... 15

Criminal Law:

FBI Reports First Rise In Violent Crime In Five Years ... 15
Libby Lawyers May Call Memory Expert ... 17
Judge Dismisses Part Of Charge Against Safavian As Trial Goes To Jury ... 17
Shadegg Circulates Article Linking Lewis, Earmark Corruption .. 17
SCOTUS Ruling Sends Texas Death Penalty Case Back For Possible Fourth Trial ... 18
Utah Professor Has Anderson Documents, But Will Keep Them From FBI ... 18
Supreme Court Issues Two Restrictive Death Penalty Rulings .. 18
Former FBI Boston SAC Testifies At Wrongful Death Trial ... 19
Nevada Judge Shot In Courthouse By Sniper ... 19
Wisconsin Procurement Official Convicted Of Contract Fraud ... 20
Witness Testifies Daley Aide Told Him To Lie To Press About Political Hire ... 20
Former Pennsylvania Police Chief Pleads Guilty To Drug, Obstruction Charges ... 20
Fake Precious Metals Traders Caught In FBI Sting Face Sentencing ... 20
FBI Interested In Tape Of West Bank Man's Interview In Michigan MySpace Case ... 21
Virginia Sex Offenders To Be Monitored By GPS Technology ... 21
Pellicano Lawyers Say Prosecutors Slow To Turn Over Evidence ... 21

Civil Law:

High Court Rulings Curb Use Of Civil RICO ... 22

Civil Rights:

11th Circuit Upholds Dismissal Of Florida Deputies Who Appeared In Online Porn ... 22
Senate One Vote Away From Passing Flag Desecration Amendment ... 23

Antitrust:

Former Energy Trader Pleads Guilty To Manipulating Natural Gas Prices ... 23
AGs Ask DOJ To Crack Down On Rising Gas Prices ... 23
Barr Pharma Settles Novartis Suit ... 23
Mittal Will Not Raise Arcelor Bid ... 23
EU Moves Toward Inclusion Of Turkey, Croatia ... 24

Mirant Withdraws Bid For NRG 24
Zale Ends Merger Discussions With Signet..... 24
BBVA Set To Enter Market For US-To-Mexico Payments 24
RIAA Head Says Illegal Song-Sharing "Contained."..... 25
German Antitrust Authorities Scrutinize Web Rights Deal..... 25

Environment:

Pipe Company Official Sentenced To Prison For Rigging Pollution Tests 25
EPA Rule Loosened After Texas Oil Exec Lobbied Rove 25
McCain Says There Will Be "Heavy Price" For Failing To Act On Climate Change 26
NYTimes Urges Kempthorne To "Resurrect" Interior's "Stewardship Of Public Lands." 26

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Four Face Drug Charges In Connecticut Following Three-Month Investigation..... 26
"Pill-Popping" Parties Become Popular As More Teens Abuse Prescription Drugs 26
Tennessee Ranked Nation's Third-Highest State Encountering Meth "Scourge." 26
MLB Suspends Grimsley For Using Human Growth Hormone ... 26
Nearly 2 Percent Of American Indian Population Said To Be Using Meth..... 26
Afghanistan Seen As "Narco-State."..... 27
Marshals Service Takes Over Operation Of Connecticut Trash Hauling Business 27
Suspect In Abortion Clinic Bomb Plot Appears In Court..... 27

Immigration:

Sensenbrenner, Tancredo Criticize Senate Immigration Bill 27

Tax:

Nevada Man Sentenced To 4 Years In Prison For Tax Fraud 28
Sloan Says Estate Tax Repeal Would Hurt The "Small Rich." 28
WPost Laments Need For Wolf's Proposed Tax Code Commission 28

Congress-Administration:

House Expected To Approve $94.5 Billion Supplemental Spending Bill 28
Schwab Says US Eager For WTO Agreement, Not "Watered-Down" Compromise..... 28
Conservatives Pressure Bush To End Probe Of OSC Official 29
Before Joining White House Staff, Zinsmeister Blasted Clintons, Gore 29
Budget Deficit Down 16.6% From Last Year 29
Lobby Firms Paid For 90 Congressional Trips Over 2000-05 29
Pelosi Takes Case For Ousting Jefferson From Key Panel To Black Media 30
Supporters Rally To Hoyer In Wake Of Murtha Challenge..... 30
Congressional Democrats To Host Town Hall Meeting On 2006 Platform..... 30
Energy Department Informs 1,500 Workers Hacker May Have Accessed Personal ID 31
Voinovich Bill Aimed At Strengthening Performance Appraisal System 31
Byrd Becomes Longest-Serving Senator..... 31
Bush Daughter Moving To Manhattan 31
Pentagon's Small Institute Of Heraldry Creates All Presidential Seals, Plaques 31
WSJournal Criticizes Hayden Testimony..... 31

Other News:

Stocks Continue Slump On Interest Rate, Growth Worries..... 31
Dummar Takes Another Shot At Claiming Hughes Estate..... 32
Conflict Questions Raised About Getty Book Deal..... 32
Webb, Miller Stump For Votes On Eve Of Virginia Senate Primary..... 33
GOP Seen As Profiting From Good News Week 34
Bell Seen As Having Uphill Struggle In Texas Gubernatorial Race..... 34
Eleven Senators May Run for Presidency In '08 34
Kansas GOP Split Could Foreshadow 2008 Presidential Primary34
Laura Bush To Raise Funds For Santorum, Kean 34
Study Finds Volunteerism Rising 35
WSJournal Says 2003 Principle Should Apply When Justices Hear Punitive Damages Case 35
El-Baradei Criticizes Iranian Data Gaps 35
Hamas, Fatah Gunmen Go On Rampage In Palestinian Territories..... 36
Expert Says North Korea Trying To Get US Attention..... 36
Coburn Meets With UN Deputy Secretary General..... 37
Cuba Cuts Power To US Mission In Havana..... 37
Islamic Leader In Somalia Seeks "Understanding" With US 37
World Bank Says Indonesia Lacks Funds To Fight Bird Flu 37
Chinese Officials Divided Over Booming Auto Market 37
Russian TV Show Promises Seats In Parliament To Young People..... 37
US Urged To Avoid "Public Spitting Match" With Egypt 38
Kristof Calls For Debate On Effectiveness Of Foreign Aid 38

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 38

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 39

DOJ_NMG_0033022

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ Defends Domestic Surveillance Program In Detroit Courtroom. The AP (6/13, Karush) reports, "The U.S. government defended warrantless domestic surveillance in court for the first time Monday, saying the program is well within the president's authority but arguing that it would require revealing state secrets to prove that point." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit heard arguments in a case brought by the American Civil Liberties Union against the National Security Agency. The ACLU is asking for an immediate halt to the program, arguing that it violates the rights to free speech and privacy. … The Bush administration has asked Taylor to dismiss the lawsuit on state-secrets grounds. … The ACLU says the Bush administration already has publicly revealed enough information about the program for Taylor to rule it is illegal. … But government attorney Anthony J. Coppolino told Taylor on Monday that the case cannot be decided based on a 'scant public record.' … 'This case does not involve easy questions,' he said. 'It's a case that requires a robust factual record.' … Coppolino alluded several times to a classified court filing, which Taylor indicated she had not yet reviewed. In that brief, 'we demonstrate that it (the program) is narrowly and specifically focused on al-Qaida,' he said. … The plaintiffs do not have access to the classified brief, and Taylor would have to make a special request and travel to Washington to read it, said Ann Beeson, the ACLU's associate legal director and the lead attorney for the plaintiffs."

The New York Times (6/13, Liptak) reports, "A National Security Agency program that listens in on international communications involving people in the United States is both vital to national security and permitted by the Constitution, a government lawyer told a judge here today in the first major court argument on the program. … But, the lawyer went on …, 'the evidence we need to demonstrate to you that it lawful cannot be disclosed without that process itself causing grave harm to United States national security.' … The only solution to this impasse, the lawyer, Anthony J. Coppolino, said, was for Judge Taylor to dismiss the lawsuit before her, an American Civil Liberties Union challenge to the eavesdropping program, under the state secrets privilege. The privilege can limit and even extinguish cases that would reveal national security information, and it is fast becoming one of the Justice Department's favorite tools in defending court challenges to its efforts to combat terrorism." The Times notes, "The Detroit case was filed in January on behalf of journalists, scholars, lawyers and nonprofit organizations who contended that the possibility of government eavesdropping interfered with their work. In remarks to reporters after the 90-minute argument, Anthony D. Romero, the A.C.L.U.'s executive director, called the government's invocation of the state secrets privilege 'Orwellian doublespeak.' … 'They argued essentially that the N.S.A. program was off-limits to judicial review,' Mr. Romero said."

Knight Ridder distributes a Detroit Free Press article (6/13, Warikoo) that reports, "In vigorous arguments that offered clashing views on the limits of state authority, the U.S. Justice Department and civil rights advocates squared off in a packed Detroit courtroom for a hearing on whether the government's domestic surveillance program violates the U.S. Constitution." The Free Press continues, "The talk inside U.S. District Court on Monday morning went to the core of what should define American government and was followed across the country by legislators and citizens debating an essential question: How much power should the president have? … Making its case in court for the first time, the government argued that the president needs as much power as necessary to secure the country, especially as al-Qaida continues to threaten the United States with terrorist attacks. But an attorney with the American Civil Liberties Union said that President Bush can't violate the law while trying to protect the country." Judge Taylor "set July 10 as the next court date to address the government's state secret arguments. Taylor did not say when she might make a ruling."

UPI (6/13) also reports on the courtroom arguments.

2nd Circuit Panel Presses CIA Attorney Over Withheld Documents. The New York Times (6/13, Hartocollis) reports, "A federal appeals court panel in Manhattan questioned a lawyer for the federal government yesterday as to whether the Central Intelligence Agency had a legitimate national security interest in refusing to confirm or deny the existence of documents authorizing it to detain and interrogate terrorism suspects overseas." The Times continues, "The tough questioning came in oral arguments by the American Civil Liberties Union and lawyers for the C.I.A. before the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. The civil liberties group is trying to force the C.I.A. to disclose how much authority it has been given to interrogate detainees since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001." The Times adds, "Through the Freedom of Information Act, the A.C.L.U. is seeking documents, including a directive said to have been signed by President Bush, giving the agency the authority to set up detention sites outside the United States and to interrogate prisoners. In its lawsuit, the group says the existence of these documents has been hinted at in news reports. … But the government has refused to confirm or deny the documents' existence, saying that to do so would jeopardize national security by revealing C.I.A. methods and activities. Last September, Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein of Federal District Court upheld that position, and yesterday's hearing was part of the A.C.L.U.'s appeal of his ruling. … The three-judge appeals panel seemed divided on the issue, with Judge John Gleeson asking the most forceful questions of the government lawyer, Peter Skinner. Judge Gleeson seemed to be trying to determine whether the A.C.L.U. was right in contending that the agency was acting to avoid political embarrassment, rather than out of national security interest."

DOJ_NMG_0033023

Administration Backs Away From Official's Remarks On Guantanamo Suicides. The AP (6/13, Gearan) reports the Administration "distanced itself Monday from remarks by a U.S. diplomat that the weekend suicides of three Arab detainees at the Guantanamo Bay military prison were a 'good P.R. move.'" Assistant Secretary McCormack is quoted saying, "I would just point out in public that we would not say that it was a P.R. stunt. We have serious concerns anytime anybody takes their own life." The AP says Deputy Assistant Secretary Colleen Graffy "told the" BBC "that the deaths at the US-run camp in Cuba were a 'good P.R. move to draw attention'" and 'a tactic to further the jihadi cause.'" The AP notes, "Graffy's unscripted remarks threw a monkey wrench in the administration's careful plan to demonstrate concern over the deaths and respond to rising criticism of the U.S. operation of the prison. [President] Bush expressed 'serious concern' Saturday over the suicides, and he directed an aggressive effort by his administration to reach out diplomatically while it investigates."

Knight Ridder (6/13, Rosenberg, Clark) notes Graffy's job as the "deputy assistant secretary of state for public diplomacy…involves improving US public relations, especially in the Muslim world." The New York Times (6/13, Cloud, 1.19M) runs a similar report.

Military To Review Rules For Guantanamo Detainees In Wake Of Suicides. The CBS Evening News (6/12, story 7, 0:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported after three Guantanamo Bay detainees committed suicide over the weekend, "US military officials announced they will review the rules for handling and monitoring detainees at the prison camp. This will be an internal review separate from the Navy's criminal investigation."

Meanwhile, Knight Ridder (6/13, Rosenberg, Clark) reports "military pathologists have completed clinical autopsies of the three captives who hanged themselves over the weekend." Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand, prison spokesman, said, "'Now it's the analytical part of the autopsy, compiling the report and making conclusions," adding "the team of medical examiners from the Armed Forces Institute of Pathology arrived Saturday and departed Sunday."

Detainee Has Been Cleared For Transfer. The AP (6/12, Selsky) reports, "One of the Guantanamo detainees who committed suicide had been cleared for transfer to another country, a second allegedly was involved in an Afghanistan prison uprising in which a CIA agent died, and a third had ties to al-Qaida." The Defense Department on Sunday "identified the three as Mani Shaman Turki al-Habardi Al-Utaybi, Yassar Talal Al-Zahrani and Ali Abdullah Ahmed of Yemen." Al-Utaybi "had been recommended for transfer to another country for continued detention, though the Defense Department did not specify where."

Groups Call For Independent Probe. The Washington Post (6/13, A4, White, 744K) reports, "Human rights groups and defense lawyers yesterday called for an independent investigation into the three detainee suicides at the US detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, questioning the military's preliminary explanation of how the men killed themselves and the way US officials have characterized the deaths." Amnesty International "officials said yesterday that an independent investigation 'is a matter of absolute urgency.'"

US Continues To Search For Country To Take Chinese Detainees. The Washington Times (6/13, Konviser, 90K) reports, "Authorities are looking for a new home for five Chinese Muslims who have been held in a refugee camp in a diplomatic limbo since being transferred to Albania from the US prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, last month." Albanian officials "say they see no viable future for the men in one of Europe's poorest countries, where no one speaks their language and the culture is fundamentally alien to their central Asian background."

More Commentary. Douglas W. Kmiec, professor of constitutional law at Pepperdine University and former constitutional legal counsel to Presidents Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush, writes in USA Today (6/13, 2.31M), "Some foreign leaders posture as if Guantanamo's doors should just fly open. Residents of Madrid and London might dissent. Even so, the international criticism should not be dismissed. It should be seen as implied willingness to share the cost and burden of detention. If we can't try all the detainees, serious thought ought be given to having the UN convene an ad hoc international court."

USA Today (6/13, 2.31M) editorializes, "President Bush insists he 'would like to end' Guantanamo but needs first to wait for the Supreme Court ruling. That won't do. What Guantanamo represents needs changing, and immediately. It's time to lay out the evidence against those who need to be charged and release those who don't."

The Wall Street Journal (6/13, 2.11M) editorializes, "If there's any scandal here, it's that anti-U.S. activists have made it so difficult to handle al Qaeda prisoners in a more efficient manner. On the one hand they complain of the 'incredible despair' (Human Rights Watch) of indefinite detention. On the other, they have done their best to prevent the U.S. from processing them through the military court system that President Bush authorized in late 2001. … The activists shouldn't be allowed to have it both ways. Either the Gitmo detainees are legitimate prisoners of war, in which case they can't be prosecuted but can be held for the duration of the conflict as in all previous wars. Or they are unlawful combatants (because they fought out of uniform and targeted civilians), in which case there should be no issue at all about moving ahead and trying them in military tribunals."

DOJ_NMG_0033024

Religious Leaders Call On US To Ban Torture. Twenty-seven religious leaders have signed a statement urging the US to abolish torture. The Washington Post (6/13, A4, Cooperman, 744K) reports that the statement, which was signed by megachurch pastor Rick Warren, Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel and Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick of Washington, among others, is "being published in newspaper advertisements starting today." It is "the opening salvo of a new organization called the National Religious Campaign Against Torture, which has formed in response to allegations of human rights abuse at U.S. detention centers in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba." The Post adds, "The signers come from a broad range of denominations and include notable religious conservatives, such as the Rev. Ted Haggard, president of the National Association of Evangelicals; Archbishop Demetrios, primate of the Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of America; and the Rev. William J. Byron, former president of Catholic University."

Canadian Terror Suspects Allegedly Trained Near US Border. The CBS Evening News (6/12, story 8, 2:45, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Most of the 17 men arrested in an alleged terror plot in Canada were in court there today for a bail hearing. No one was granted bail." CBS (Keteyian) added, "It was here in these remote wooded grounds north of Toronto where prosecutors say terrorists talk turned to action. According to the government's charges reviewed by CBS News, 13 of the 17 suspects now in custody were here just a few hours from the US border attending a terrorist training camp just before last Christmas. Wearing camouflage clothing, they allegedly engaged in marches and survival training, took turns on guard duty and practiced firing a 9-millimeter semiautomatic pistol and pellet gun. What the group didn't know is they were being watched by authorities the whole time."

Defense Lawyers Terror Suspects Were Beaten. Defense lawyers representing several of the men being held in an Ontario prison on terrorism charges say their clients have been beaten by guards, threatened and held in isolation. The New York Times (6/13, Depalma, 1.19M) reports, "The lawyers made the accusations outside the courtroom here as preliminary bail hearings were about to begin for the 17 suspects arrested June 3. … A spokeswoman for the prison where most of the men are being held said the accusations were being investigated."

Arrests Raise Concerns About Influence Of Fundamentalist Imams In Canada. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Cherney, 2.11M) reports that the terror arrests in Canada have "lifted the lid on a simmering controversy among Canada's Muslims: A segment of this growing community worries that an increasing number of mosques have come under the sway of fundamentalist imams." The arrests "have given worried congregants an opportunity to raise a red flag. They say the messages delivered in some mosques -- such as the Al-Rahman Islamic Center here -- may help explain why police believe the 17 men and youths might have been drawn into a group that allegedly conspired to blow up buildings in the Toronto area and schemed about taking politicians hostage in Ottawa."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Technology Association Study Criticizes VoIP Wiretapping Rules. CNET News.com (6/12, Broache, McCullagh) reports, "Federal regulations saying that police must be able to tap into Internet phone conversations with ease are coming under renewed attack from academics, engineers and one of the Net's founding fathers." An Information Technology Association of America study to be released today "says that because VoIP relies on a fundamentally different network architecture from that of traditional phone lines, such a mandate would pose 'enormous costs' to the industry and could even introduce significant security risks." The study adds that "allowing full access by law enforcement would almost certainly require overhauling inherently decentralized networks to allow for certain points where interception would take place," which could "arguably make it easier for hackers to capture identity information and passwords, engage in 'man-in-the-middle alteration of data,' or potentially spoof the communications going on."

Air Marshals Say Ammunition Not Safe For Use In Air. The Washington Times (6/13, Hudson, 90K) reports air marshals testifying "in a recently completed House Judiciary Committee investigation of policies marshals deemed dangerous" said "their guns are loaded with bullets capable of running through more than one person, metal doors and thick glass -- too much firepower for an airplane." They "say their bullets can penetrate most of the material in planes, leaving pilots and the plane's hydraulics and flight-control system vulnerable if a weapon is discharged." The Times adds that the TSA's response to the ammunition concerns was redacted from the House Judiciary report released last week.

DOJ_NMG_0033025

Kelly Says Lower Manhattan Initiative Put On Hold Due To Reduced Funding. The New York Times (6/13, Baker, Chan, 1.19M) reports New York City's plan "to install a sprawling security camera system in the Wall Street area" this year "is being rethought since the Department of Homeland Security cut the city's security grant to $124.5 million this year from $207.6 million last year, Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly said yesterday" in testimony before a City Council hearing on the impact of the reduction. Kelly said afterwards that the plan, called the Lower Manhattan Security Initiative, had "been put on hold until we can take a look at the funding stream." DHS spokesman Russ Knocke said yesterday that "an undersecretary would work closely with the city to help expedite the flow of dollars from Washington. But he said it fell to city officials to prioritize which projects to pay for."

Author Says DHS Allowed To Act Like "Keystone Stasi." Ray LeMoine, coauthor of "Babylon by Bus," which records his experiences working for the Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq, in an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (6/13, 958K) writes that upon arrival at JFK from Dubai recently, he was stopped "at customs by an officer from the Department of Homeland Security and directed to a drab backroom filled with Arabs, South Asians and Africans." LeMoine writes that he had "just spent six months working and traveling in the Islamic world," and thought it "was just protocol." Instead, LeMoine writes that he was questioned about selling T-shirts outside sporting events and an NYPD bench warrant from 2004. LeMoine continues, "Homeland Security, the $40-billion-a-year agency set up to combat terrorism after 9/11, has been given universal jurisdiction and can hold anyone on Earth for crimes unrelated to national security — even me for a court date I missed while I was in Iraq helping America deter terror — without asking what I had been doing in Pakistan among Islamic extremists the agency is designated to stop." DHS is "scarily bringing the words 'police' and 'state' closer together. As long as we allow Homeland Security to act like a Keystone Stasi, terrorism will continue to win in destroying our freedom."

Evacuations Ordered In Florida As Alberto Approaches Landfall. Alberto, the first named storm of the 2006 hurricane season, gained intensity Monday, prompting evacuations along Florida's Gulf Coast and heavy media coverage throughout the nation. ABC World News Tonight (6/12, lead story, 1:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reports, "We knew they'd come often this year. We didn't know they'd come this early." When Alberto "hits Florida's Gulf Coast tomorrow, it could well be at hurricane strength. Not a major hurricane, perhaps, but the state of Florida is taking this storm very seriously."

In a second story, ABC World News Tonight (6/12, story 2, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reports, "What seemed like an ordinary storm just last night is now generating winds close to 75 miles per hour. A sudden shift that forced Florida's Governor to issue those mandatory evacuations." Gov. Jeb Bush: "If you're ordered to evacuate, you really should do it. Don't think you can ride out a storm. It's not worth losing one's life." ABC (Cuomo): "With Alberto still 150 miles from expected landfall, FEMA is mobilizing 96 trucks with food, water and ice, in the Gulf states. And Coast Guard aircraft are tracking the storm."

The AP (6/13, Stacy) reports, "More than 20,000 people along Florida's Gulf Coast were ordered to clear out Monday as Alberto…unexpectedly picked up steam and threatened to come ashore as a hurricane. … Gov. Jeb Bush signed a declaration of emergency allowing him to call up the National Guard and put laws against price gouging into effect." Max Mayfield, director of the National Hurricane Center, said Alberto is "not a Katrina or a Wilma, but storm surge and flooding could still cause loss of life."

The Tallahassee Democrat (6/13, Cotterell, 51K) reports that in "a hastily-called evening briefing," Bush told residents that if they were planning to evacuate, they needed to do so "tonight, not tomorrow morning. Tonight is the night to do this."

The CBS Evening News (6/12, lead story, 2:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported Alberto is "barreling toward Florida's Gulf Coast tonight with heavy rain, winds near 70 miles an hour, hurricane warnings are up along the coast, best estimates are the storm will hit land tomorrow and could reach hurricane strength and even if it doesn't, it could bring a storm surge ten feet tall." CBS (Acosta) added, "That was all Florida officials needed to see to issue a mandatory evacuation order across 100 miles of the state's Gulf Coast." Gov. Jeb Bush, Florida: "If you're ordered to evacuate, you should do it. Don't think you can ride out a storm. It's not worth losing one's life."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/12, Candioti) reported that Florida Gov. Jeb Bush has "issued a State of Emergency and has ordered mandatory evacuations for several counties in low-lying areas. Also he just said that 17 shelters will be opening up shortly, again, for people in areas where they are expecting inland flooding because of the rain. We are expecting anywhere from 8-10 inches and storm surges that could go maybe 8-10 feet above normal." Bush "also said that they were doing a hurricane prep exercise just this very day, and now he's admitting that they might have to push things back, as we are obviously getting storms earlier and earlier in the hurricane season."

DOJ_NMG_0033026

NBC Nightly News (6/12, lead story, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Coming off last hurricane season, this is a cruel, early arrival and so it's being taken seriously tonight in the state of Florida, where a state of emergency has been declared and 20,000 people have been ordered evacuated along 200 miles of Florida coastline." NBC (Potter) added, "Although Alberto is still a tropical storm, officials are worried about storm-surge flooding along the Florida Gulf Coast, in some areas, up to 10 feet." NBC (Potter): "Joining with state emergency managers, FEMA officials say they too are prepared and will be sending in nearly 100 trucks with food, water and ice for those hardest hit if needed."

FEMA Ready With Buses, Supplies. In an article appearing on at least 48 news websites, the AP (6/13, Jordan) reports FEMA spokesman Aaron Walker said that while Florida "has indicated that they have the situation well under control," the agency had buses and supplies ready "should Tropical Storm Alberto take a nasty turn into regions still left vulnerable by Hurricane Katrina, including Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. Those supplies, warehoused in Louisiana and Alabama, could be sent to Florida if necessary, he said." Meanwhile, Secretary Chertoff "postponed a weeklong trip to Europe to monitor the storm, said spokesman Russ Knocke. Chertoff also called Florida Gov. Jeb Bush to offer help, but the Republican governor said his state did not have any immediate needs from Washington."

The Miami Herald/KRT (6/13, Merzer, Fineout) reports, "State officials said that local communities were gearing up to deal with the storm and that 17 shelters would open. An estimated 7,500 National Guard were on alert and ready to be deployed if needed." The Herald adds, "Alberto grew out of the year's first tropical depression Sunday, an ominous sign of things to come during the hurricane season -- which was only 11 days old."

USA Today (6/13, Leinwand, 2.31M) reports hurricane center forecaster Eric Blake said the storm is expected "to grow to Category 1 hurricane speeds by the time it reaches land but they do not expect it to intensify much further." The Orlando Sentinel (6/13, Stratton, Hollis, 265K) notes, "If Alberto comes ashore as a hurricane, it would be the earliest in 40 years to hit the United States, forecasters said."

The New York Times (6/13, Aguayo, 1.19M) reports Florida's emergency management chief Craig Fugate "and other state officials said they remained worried that Tropical Storm Alberto might prove to be a repeat of a storm that struck the East Coast in March 1993 and left more than 40 people dead in Florida. That 1993 storm was not a hurricane, but it pushed an enormous wall of water into the same areas now in Tropical Storm Alberto's path. Ten people died in Taylor County, part of which was ordered evacuated on Monday."

The Washington Post (6/13, A3, Whoriskey, 744K) reports, "Along the coast on Monday, tourists headed out, and news crews rushed in to capture what may be the first hurricane after Hurricane Katrina. … Officials with the Federal Emergency Management Agency said they were meeting with state emergency managers and 'mobilizing' 96 trucks with food, water and ice."

Paulison Says FEMA Ready For Alberto. On Fox News' Big Story (6/12, Napolitano) Paulison was asked whether FEMA was ready for Alberto. Paulison: "We're ready. I think what this storm shows us is how unpredictable hurricanes are. We thought it would be nothing but a rain storm, now here it is almost a hurricane." Paulison added, "Right now we're very lucky that this first hurricane of the season is going to a state like Florida who is very well prepared. We're working with the state, we have people in the state EOC, but frankly the state really does have their arms around this and they are ready for this. We have, however, prepositioned supplies all along the Gulf Coast, just to be ready to move in case Florida does need assistance from FEMA." Paulison was also asked if his agency is ready for "the next Katrina." He said, "We are as ready as we can be for the next Katrina. That was an overwhelming storm, obviously, and so we have done quite a bit to make sure that FEMA is much better prepared this year than we were last year, mainly with logistics, with communications, with situational awareness, and also victim registration. So we have taken all those lessons learned, we've picked up after Katrina, Rita, Wilma also, and applied those in place so we can be ready if we do get another major hurricane in this country."

Appearing on Bloomberg After Hours (6/12), Paulison said, "The communications right now is working very well. I talked personally to Craig Fugate. I know Secretary Chertoff has talked personally to the governor. We have people at the state emergency management office and people at the hurricane center to make sure we keep the lines of communications open and that we go into the hurricane and storm as partners and not waiting for one to be overwhelmed before we step in."

Insurance Regulators Call On Congress For Help Dealing With Disasters. USA Today (6/13, Adams, 2.31M) reports the National Association of Insurance Commissioners, who are urging Congress "to investigate ways to help states, insurers and homeowners to better deal with disasters such as Hurricane Katrina," have adopted "a resolution proposing a Federal Natural Catastrophe Preparedness Commission." Following losses from last year's hurricanes "and forecasts of more powerful storms, insurance companies are refusing to renew hundreds of thousands of coastal homeowners' policies in Florida, Texas,

DOJ_NMG_0033027

New York, Massachusetts and other states. … State regulators worry that a shortage of private insurance and the lack of an overall federal catastrophe strategy will put more pressure on individual states and their taxpayers when disaster strikes."

Spellings Announces Grants For New Orleans Charter Schools. The New York Times (6/13, Saulny, 1.19M) reports Education Secretary Margaret Spellings announced a $24 million grant Monday that is "likely to cement the role of New Orleans — where the public school system is barely functional — as the nation's pre-eminent laboratory for the widespread use of charter schools." The city's "school system is now dominated by charter operators. Eighteen of the 25 schools open in New Orleans are charter schools, receiving public financing but operating independently." Spellings said "charter schools are the best way to jump-start the state's education recovery," echoing "the Bush administration's support for such schools across the nation."

New Orleans Police Department Struggling To Recover From Katrina. The New York Times (6/13, Drew, 1.19M) reports that "as residents return and another hurricane season begins" in New Orleans, "the police force is still struggling to recover from the calamity of Hurricane Katrina, which knocked out its headquarters, overwhelmed its ability to maintain control and prompted desertions that tarnished the force's reputation. Now, as the department tries to fight its way back, sharp budget cuts — and a recent spike in drug-related killings in the city — are adding to fears that years of overhauls and modernization may be undone, and that New Orleans could return to its former notoriety as one of the nation's murder capitals." Meanwhile, "For some residents, the sense that the city is on edge and the department's future uncertain has brought echoes of the days when the local police were considered among the least competent and most racist and brutal in the nation."

AFL-CIO Investment May Provide New Orleans "Development Boom." USA Today (6/13, Konigsmark, 2.31M) reports, "In what may be the start of the city's development boom, the AFL-CIO plans to invest $1 billion to develop 10,000 affordable homes and a new downtown hotel. The investment "is one of the largest yet for New Orleans and seeks to bring new housing to a city where Hurricane Katrina destroyed more than 100,000 homes." USA Today adds, "Development activity is picking up for several reasons, not the least of which is that billions in federal dollars to buy people out of their flood-damaged homes is set to begin flowing this summer."

Katrina Continues To Take Emotional Toll On Children. The Washington Post (6/13, A1, Cass, 744K) reports that in New Orleans, Hurricane Katrina's "emotional effect on children is proving to be long and lasting. Two studies of children affected by the hurricane have found high rates of depression, anxiety, behavioral problems and post-traumatic stress disorder." Irwin Redlener, director of Columbia University's National Center for Disaster Preparedness and president of the Children's Health Fund, said that while children affected by the Oklahoma City bombing or 9/11 "could go to a place of normalcy," Katrina was different because of "the scope of devastation" and "the prolonged dislocation with an uncertain timeline."

Clinton Says Global Warming Will Lead To More Hurricanes. The AP (6/12, Farrington) reports that speaking at a fundraiser for the Florida Democratic Party Monday, former President Clinton "predicted…that Republican environmental policies will lead to more severe storms." Clinton said that while he and Al Gore "were ridiculed" for their views on global warming, it is "a serious problem" that will "lead to more hurricanes." The Palm Beach Post (FL) (6/13, 160K) reports that "Clinton railed against the Republican decision to invade Iraq and their stance on the national deficit, health care, lobbyists and environmental regulations during a wide-ranging speech."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Meets With National Security Team On Iraq. President Bush yesterday met his national security team at Camp David to discuss the US policy in Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (6/13, Gerstenzang, 958K) reports that "among those joining Bush were Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, John Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, director of the Central Intelligence Agency, and Gen. Peter Pace of the Marine Corps, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff." White House counselor Dan Bartlett, who took part in the meetings, "said the sessions were organized because Iraq was facing a 'fundamental break point.'" The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (6/13, Herman, Deans, 430K) notes that today, Bush "will meet Iraq's new leaders…in a teleconference."

Much of the media coverage places the meeting in the context of domestic politics, as part of an Administration effort to bolster congressional Republicans for the midterm elections. The New York Times (6/13, Sanger, Rutenberg, 1.19M), for example, reports the meeting "came as Republicans began a new effort to use last week's events to turn the war to their political advantage after months of anxiety, and to sharpen attacks against Democrats. On Monday night, the president's top political strategist, Karl Rove, told supporters in New Hampshire that if the Democrats had their way, Iraq would fall to terrorists and Abu Musab al-Zarqawi would not have been killed." Democrats "countered Monday that the Republicans were playing partisan politics with the war. 'Apparently, the American people will still have to wait for a serious debate on Iraq that is aimed at correcting bad policies instead of bad poll numbers,' said Representative Rahm Emanuel, an Illinois Democrat." Similarly, the Washington Times (6/13, Dinan, 90K) reports the meetings "were scheduled even before Zarqawi was killed last week, but that news has given the administration a window to make a case to voters that U.S. forces have made progress."

DOJ_NMG_0033028

NBC Nightly News (6/12, story 4, 2:15, Gregory, 9.87M), for example, reported, "With the war a growing political liability for the President and his party, the White House is trying hard to appear more pragmatic about the conflict and more open to outside advice. The President today avoided overselling progress after a briefing by his ambassador in Baghdad." President Bush: "I thought your assessment of the situation in Iraq was very realistic."

On the CBS Evening News (6/12, story 6, 1:35, Axelrod, 7.66M), Bush was shown saying, "Success in Iraq will depend upon the capacity of the new government to provide for its people. We recognize that." Axelrod: "The Administration says a new government creates a crucial opportunity for the Iraqis, but with the number of military dead now approaching 2,500, the injured 18,000 and the cost at more than $300 billion and rising, the Administration may be approaching a make-or-break point with the American people, and that may explain the President's call for more countries to share the financial burden."

ABC World News Tonight (6/12, story 3, 2:30, Tapper, 8.78M) reported, "The President is under tremendous political pressure, with low poll numbers and his own party worrying about what effect this unpopular war will have on midterm elections." But the White House "cautioned that this meeting will not lead to announcement of reductions in the 126,000 US troops in Iraq." Fox News' Special Report (6/12, Hume) also said the meeting "created some speculation before hand but no major shake-ups or new strategy would emerge."

The Financial Times (6/13, Dinmore) reports, "Confronted by growing discontent with the cost of the Iraq war among Americans in the run-up to congressional mid-term elections, Mr Bush repeatedly declared at a brief news conference: 'The stakes are worth it.'"

CNN's The Situation Room (6/12, Henry) reported that President Bush "sees some momentum from Iraq with the death of al-Zarqawi."

Bush Seeks Input From Critics. Knight Ridder (6/13, Hutcheson) reports, "Looking for new ideas on Iraq…Bush sought advice from his critics Monday at an unusual two-day war council," as "at least one of the experts who met with Bush has advocated sending 77,000 more service members to join the 130,000 who are already in Iraq. 'It may be that the fastest way to turn Iraq over to the Iraqis and draw down American forces is not a steady decline of troop numbers. Instead, the fastest possible "exit strategy" may require one last surge effort,' military historian Frederick Kagan, a scholar at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, wrote last year." After he left the Camp David briefing, Kagan "declined to comment on what was said there beyond, 'It was a good discussion.'" Knight Ridder adds, "All four of the experts who were invited to join Bush at his hideaway in Maryland's Catoctin Mountains supported the Iraq invasion, but they haven't always been pleased with its prosecution. In addition to Kagan, Bush heard from Eliot Cohen, a professor of strategic studies at Johns Hopkins University; journalist Robert Kaplan; and former CIA officer Michael Vickers, who's now with the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments."

The Washington Post (6/13, A1, Partlow, Abramowitz, 744K) also reports "the four have in the past been critical of how the Bush administration has handled Iraq, though not necessarily from the same perspective." Vickers "has argued that the United States ought to have a smaller, more effective presence in Iraq, with more emphasis on developing advisers for the nascent Iraqi security forces. Kagan, by contrast, recently wrote in the Weekly Standard that the United States should consider deploying more troops and prosecuting the battle against insurgents more aggressively. Cohen has also questioned the vigor with which the military has pursued the war, as well as the competence of the administration."

The Boston Globe (6/13, Klein, 484K) reports the "unusual Iraq war summit…reflects a new White House attitude that includes a willingness to consider dissenting views and take a more deliberate approach to policy questions, a style change for a president known to keep close counsel, according to political observers and Republican lawmakers." The "shifts" are "largely credited to new White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten." They "suggest Bush desperately wants to shed his image as a stubborn partisan who listens to few outside voices, said" Texas professor Bruce Buchanan, "who has followed the president closely since Bush was governor of Texas." Buchanan said, "He's reaching out for a little empathy. It's an effort to get people to acknowledge that he is at least trying and needs their support, and at least soften their opposition."

Rove Says Republicans Should Not Avoid Iraq On Campaign Trail. The AP (6/13, Love) reports that during his appearance at a fundraising dinner for New Hampshire Republicans, Rove said "that Republicans facing midterm elections should campaign on the economy's strength and discuss the war in Iraq with no qualms." Rove said, "We have no excuses to make for it." War supporters "need not apologize for removing the threat of Saddam Hussein, and with so much work left to do, now is not the time to talk about leaving Iraq, he said." He added that Democrats "pushing for the withdrawal of American troops should be the ones facing tough questions for wanting to 'cut and run.' He targeted Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry and Pennsylvania Rep. John Murtha, both Democrats and vocal supporters of getting out of Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0033029

PoliticsNH.com (6/13, Pindell) reports Rove was "hoping to encourage state Republicans the election year won't be as bad as some pundits say." But his "keynote at a State Republican Committee fund-raiser also motivated Democrats and other like-mined organizations. About 75 protestors held signs like 'Karl: 666' and 'No More Roving Jam Sessions,' in response to Republican operatives who jammed Democrats get out the vote phone lines in 2002." It is the "phone jamming scandal, which has criminally convicted three Republican operatives, which helped to deplete state party resources to $700 cash on hand last month. Beyond money, the Democrats have leveraged the issue into one they use every chance they can in hopes it puts Republicans on the defensive." And while "the 500 people who bought tickets helped the state party raise an estimated $55,000-$60,000 at the dinner, it did not help that Rove's own office has now been linked to the scandal." The Washington Post (6/13, A7, Farenthold, 744K) runs a similar story under the headline "Rove's Speech to N.H. Republicans Keeps to Partisan Line."

Gallup Poll Shows Bush's Approval Up To 38%, 47% Say Things "Going Well" In Iraq. USA Today (6/13, Nichols, 2.31M) reports, "In the wake of terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's death, President Bush is seeing improvement in public confidence that the Iraq war is winnable, a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll shows. The new poll found that 48% believe the United States probably or definitely will win the war, up from 39% in April. It also found that 47% believe things are going well in Iraq, up from 38% in March." The survey, taken Friday to Sunday and released Monday, also "showed Bush's approval rating going up to 38% from 36% earlier this month and an all-time low of 31% in May. The poll news came as Bush and members of his Cabinet met at Camp David to discuss ways to help the recently formed government in Iraq. … Still, 51% say the war was a mistake."

In CNN Poll, 43% Say Things "Going Well." CNN's The Situation Room (6/12, Blitzer) reported, "Our latest CNN poll shows the death of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi naturally have boosted Americans' optimism about the war, at least modestly in this new CNN poll taken after the terror leader was killed. Forty-three percent now say things are 'going well' for the United States. That's up five percentage points from March. But 54 percent still say things are going badly."

Bush Gets No Bounce After Zarqawi In CBS News Poll. The CBS Evening News (6/12, story 5, 0:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Eliminating Zarqawi may have been a significant military achievement, but it did not seem to help the President from the standpoint of domestic politics. In a CBS News poll out tonight, only 33% of those polled said that they approve of the job the President is doing. That is about the same as last month."

House To Debate GOP Iraq War Resolution. The Washington Times (6/13, Bellantoni, 90K) reports, "The House of Representatives this week will engage in a rare election-year debate on the Iraq war, with Republicans hoping to showcase the good news on the ground and Democrats fractured on whether the United States should begin withdrawing troops." Lawmakers "are tentatively scheduled to begin debating the Republican-authored resolution Thursday. A vote on the measure, called 'Declaring that the United States will prevail in the global war on terror, the struggle to protect freedom from the terrorist adversary,' is slated for Friday."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/12, Koppel) that the GOP resolution's purpose "is to build on what you just mentioned there, the success in killing al Zarqawi and also to try to build some momentum going into November. In particular, on the Iraq war." CNN noted that there are ""a couple of red flags that are going to jump out at Democrats if they stay in this draft language. One that has to do with declaring that it is not in the national security interests of the United States to set an arbitrary date for the withdrawal or redeployment of United States armed forces from Iraq. Another red flag declares that the United States is committed to the completion of the mission to create a sovereign, free, secure and united Iraq. These two graphs in particular are designed to try to flush out some of the Democrats who are going to be painted as not supporting US troops in Iraq."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/13, Feldmann, 61K) reports that "members, including antiwar Republicans and Democrats, also welcome a debate, as long as the terms are fair, they say. At time of writing, the text of the resolution to be debated had not been released, but congressional sources indicated that it would frame the Iraq war as part of the broader war on terror, a point of controversy." The Monitor adds, "At a highly politicized time, with the fall midterm elections approaching and future control of Congress in question, some political analysts see risks for both parties in an Iraq debate. Public support for the war has been on a long, downward slide, and Bush's own job approval rating and policy agenda have been damaged by Iraq more than anything else."

Senate Democrats To Offer Amendments Calling For US Withdrawal From Iraq. CNN's The Situation Room (6/12, Koppel) reported that in the Senate, "we are expecting three Democratic amendments to be offered this week, all of them calling for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq by the end of the war. Two of the names won't surprise you, John Kerry and Russ Feingold. But the third should. It's Carl Levin of Michigan, who is one of the senior members of the Democratic Caucus, who is not seen -- he -- first of all, he's not throwing his hat into the presidential ring. And, so, what he says will carry weight, and could also complicate Harry Reid, the Democratic leader's efforts to try to beat the Republicans at their own game, to try to show his caucus as being united on Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0033030

Reid Says Iraq War An "Intractable Conflict," Calls For Exit Strategy. The AP (6/12, Riechmann) reports "Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, in a speech in Washington, called the war in Iraq an 'intractable conflict' and said Americans deserve a plan from the president that provides troops with an exit strategy. 'It is no longer sufficient to say "we will stand down as the Iraqis stand up,"' Reid said, quoting a Bush refrain."

The Washington Times (6/13, Pfeiffer, 90K) reports Reid "told a gathering of Democratic and liberal activists in Washington yesterday that 'we have to start bringing our troops home.'" Reid "opened his remarks at the Take Back America 2006 Conference by criticizing the Bush administration's handling of the war in Iraq. The conference is hosted by the Campaign for America's Future (CAF), a liberal advocacy organization." Reid said, "Our troops deserve an exit strategy." Reid "seemed to make a more direct call for withdrawal of troops than his previous remarks, but the senator's office disagreed." A Democratic aide "in attendance, who because of the staffer's ongoing relations with Mr. Reid asked to remain anonymous, said the senator gave a similar, less pointed speech in Nevada during the weekend. 'But at the end of the speech, people in the crowd started chanting, 'Bring them home,' the staffer said."

The Washington Post (6/13, Milbank, 744K) reports the "liberal activists assembled for the annual 'Campaign for America's Future' conference were so hungry yesterday, in fact, that it was difficult to hear Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) speak over the din of forks clinking on salad plates. That's too bad, because he was telling the lefties what they like to hear." Reid said, "I don't know how many times we have heard the president say: 'We will stand down as Iraqis stand up.' I don't want to hear that anymore. It seems to me that that mantra no longer stands. That is, we have to start bringing our troops home." The Post adds, "The activists -- at least those who could hear him -- applauded Reid's unexpected and unscripted call for withdrawal." That Reid, "an antiabortion Mormon who voted to authorize force in Iraq, would be breaking bread at all with the liberal activists speaks to a different hunger. Interest groups, hoping for a win in the November midterms, have toned down their fratricidal attacks on elected Democrats. And Democratic lawmakers, emboldened by President Bush's slump, aren't as afraid to be seen with the lefties who make up their 'base.'"

US, Iraqi Forces Launched 200 Raids Against Insurgents Since Zarqawi's Death. USA Today (6/13, Soriano, 2.31M) reports, "US and Iraqi forces have launched 200 raids against insurgents since killing Abu Musab al-Zarqawi last week, dealing a blow to his terrorist organization, al-Qaeda in Iraq, US and Iraqi officials said Monday." The raids "have led to the capture of more than 200 suspected insurgents and 33 deaths. … The intelligence that led up to the bombing and the raids may be the best chance of cracking the terrorist group dominated by foreign fighters."

Al Qaeda In Iraq Names Zarqawi Successor. The AP (6/12, El-Magd) reports, "Al-Qaida in Iraq named a successor Monday to Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and said he would stick to the slain leader's path — attacks on Shiites as well as on U.S. and Iraqi forces. The new leader, identified by the nom de guerre Abu Hamza al-Muhajer in a statement posted on the Web, appeared to be a foreign Arab, like his predecessor." But "otherwise he is an unknown. The name has not appeared in previous al-Qaida in Iraq propaganda or on U.S. lists of terrorists with rewards on their heads, suggesting he is a lower-level figure or someone more prominent who has taken a new pseudonym." President Bush "said Monday that al-Muhajer would join the ranks of those sought by the US. 'I think the successor to Zarqawi is going to be on our list to bring to justice,' Bush said."

The New York Times (6/13, Burns, Filkins, 1.19M) also says Muhajir "is something of a mystery," and "senior Iraqi officials said they were unfamiliar with anyone by that name. One clue was that the word 'muhajir' usually refers to an Islamic militant who has traveled beyond his own country to fight for his faith. 'He is not an Iraqi -- that is my first impression,' said the Iraqi national security adviser, Mowaffak al-Rubaie, adding that he had not heard of Mr. Muhajir."

US Military Releases Zarqawi Autopsy. The US military released the autopsy report on Abu Musab al Zarqawi to prevent or limit the spread of misinformation or conspiracy theories about his death. NBC Nightly News (6/12, story 3, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Today an FBI DNA test positively ID'd Zarqawi and the US military revealed in detail the results of his autopsy to dispel any questions, conspiracy theories or propaganda about how he died. There were no signs of gunshot wounds, nor was Zarqawi torn apart by the air strike. Instead, the report said he was killed by the bomb's crushing blast wave that caused his lungs to expand like balloons and bleed in his chest." The autopsy "said Zarqawi was in the house when it was bombed and also suffered a broken leg and shrapnel wounds." Also "surviving the blast, Zarqawi's diary, phone numbers, and computer files. The US military used that intelligence to launch 11 raids in the last 48 hours on al Qaeda suspects in the Baghdad area, even as two more car bombs exploded here as insurgents promised to avenge Zarqawi's death."

The CBS Evening News (6/12, story 4, 2:50, Schieffer, 7.66M) quoted Col. Stephen Jones, chief surgeon,

DOJ_NMG_0033031

Multinational Force: "The injuries to his lungs were not survivable, that's what killed him."

ABC World News Tonight (6/12, story 5, :25, Gibson, 8.78M) reports the military "said US troops reached Zarqawi 28 minutes after the bombing and provided first aid before he died 52 minutes after the attack. The autopsy found he died from catastrophic lung injuries. There was no evidence he was beaten or shot. And the military says, information from Zarqawi's safe house has led to the arrest or capture of 210 suspected terrorists."

The Washington Post (6/13, A1, Partlow, Abramowitz, 744K) reports Zarqawi "lived for 52 minutes, in and out of consciousness, before he succumbed to massive internal injuries caused by the concussive blasts from two 500-pound bombs dropped by a U.S. fighter jet, U.S. military officials in Baghdad said Monday."

Jordanian Officials Played Role In Zarqawi Hunt. The Los Angeles Times (6/13, Daragahi, Meyer, 958K) reports, "Shocked into action by violence on their own soil, Jordan officials months ago began an intensive campaign of spying on insurgents in neighboring Iraq, a gambit that ultimately helped lead to the death of militant leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, Jordan's top spies said Monday." Maj. Gen. Muhammed Dahabi, director of Jordan's General Intelligence Department, and Col. Ali Burjaq, his chief of counterterrorism, "said in a rare interview Monday that a splashy video tape al-Zarqawi released earlier this spring helped Jordanian intelligence pinpoint his approximate location at the time, a key lead that ultimately led to al-Zarqawi's death in a U.S. aerial bombing attack last week." The Times adds, "Al-Zarqawi's need to micromanage all aspects of his al-Qaida in Iraq organization, from finances to operations, also made him vulnerable to discovery, the two intelligence officials said."

Castro Calls Zarqawi Bombing "A Barbarity." Fox News' Special Report (6/12, Hume) reported, "Fidel Castro called the air strike that killed Zarqawi 'a barbarity' saying he should have been captured and tried."

More Commentary. In his Wall Street Journal column (6/13), Bret Stephens writes that "the most significant fact here isn't that Zarqawi was killed -- he could have met his end in any number of ways. It's that he was found. Pause a minute to consider what this means. Plenty has been written about the shortcomings of US war-fighting, political and counterinsurgency strategies in Iraq, and some of it is true. Comparably little has been written about the insurgents' shortcomings. Yet Zarqawi was located because he and his spiritual adviser, Abdul Rahman, were betrayed by someone in their own camp, someone close enough to track their movements exactly. Therein must lie a tale." The insurgency's "aura has been dimmed, its organizational structure cracked and its internal fissures exposed. That's something the US and the new Iraqi government can capitalize on by launching sustained offensive operations in the Sunni Triangle and doing their utmost to secure Baghdad. Doing so will take another 30,000 troops. But having mostly squandered the initiative against the insurgents in the first year of the war, this is the administration's rare chance to even the score. It must seize it."

Insurgent Attacks Kill More Than 50 In Baghdad. The CBS Evening News (6/12, story 4, 2:50, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "This was another bad day in Iraq. Bombs killed more than 50 Iraqis as attacks continued into the night." CBS (Palmer) added, "Baghdad had been anxiously waiting for Zarqawi's followers to strike and tonight the capital was shaken by a series of bombings aimed at civilians." But "the killing of the most-wanted terrorist in Iraq last Thursday, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, has meant a wartime windfall for the Coalition forces. In the past 48 hours, the US Military announced it's carried out 140 major operations, killed 32 insurgents, and detained 178, including one described as a high-value target with a $50,000 price tag on his head. But today a US raid on a house near where Zarqawi died was both a military victory and a human tragedy. American forces killed seven more men they call terrorists linked to al Qaeda but two children also died in the attack and another one was injured."

Bloggers Illustrate Life In Iraq. The New York Times (6/13, 1.19M) editorializes on the window into Iraqi life provided by the country's bloggers: "Reading the bloggers has helped to fill one of the big gaps in Americans' view of the war in Iraq. Danger in the streets and security fears for anyone seen speaking with Western reporters has made it increasingly hard to get real glimpses of what it's like for the people who have to live there." Bloggers have written of changes in society throughout 2006: "There was less talk of shoddy infrastructure and running for cover from American soldiers, and more fear of radical Islamists and the Sunni and Shiite death squads bringing terror to their neighborhoods. The watershed they referred to repeatedly was the destruction of the golden dome of the Askariya mosque in Samarra, a revered Shiite shrine, on Feb. 22. The bloggers also wrote more about the increasing presence of Taliban-like Islamists."

US Army Officer Helps Iraqi Convict. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Jaffe, 2.11M) reports on Capt. Philip Carter, who is trying to obtain the release of a convicted Iraqi killer, Hamid Abboud. Carter's work reflects a new strategy of trying to have Iraqis fix their own system: he "could demand Mr. Abboud's release and the Iraqis would likely comply. But he doesn't. Instead he prods judges and prosecutors in this province an hour's drive from Baghdad to uphold Iraqi law and set Mr. Abboud free on their own." The Journal says the case illustrates both "how the American strategy has changed" into one of devolving power to Iraqis and "how painful and halting progress in Iraq can be."

DOJ_NMG_0033032

Basra Spiraling Into Corruption. The New York Times (6/13, Tavernise, Mizher, 1.19M) reports that "oil, politics, and bloodshed" have corrupted Basra. Initially one of the cities "most receptive" to the 2003 invasion, Basra is "is being pulled apart by Shiite political parties that want to control the region and its biggest prize, oil. But in today's Iraq, politics and power flow from the guns of militias." The Times reports, "Basra has a soaring murder rate (the 85 killings in May were nearly triple the number in January), a tattered oil industry and a terrified population."

Hussein Witnesses Admit Perjury. The Los Angeles Times (6/13, Roug, 958K) reports, "The trial of Saddam Hussein reached a moment of high drama today when four defense witnesses recanted previous testimony, swearing in written statements that Hussein's lawyers had bribed them to lie in court." The witnesses say they were promised "life-long salaries" by attorney Khalil Dulaymi if they "testified that scores of executed prisoners ... were alive and well."

Funeral Held For CBS Cameraman Killed In Iraq. The CBS Evening News (6/12, story 12, 1:45, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "It was two weeks ago today, Memorial Day, that CBS News cameraman Paul Douglas and soundman James Brolan were killed and correspondent Kimberly Dozier was critically wounded by a car bomb in Iraq. Today in Bedford, England, 500 of Paul's friends and family said goodbye."

37 Taliban Members Killed In Battles. USA Today (6/13, 2.31M) reports, "Afghan and U.S.-led coalition forces fought Taliban militants in three battles, killing 37 fighters, including a relative of Taliban leader Mullah Omar, an Afghan army general said Monday."

Afghan Drug Trade Described. The Christian Science Monitor (6/13, Baldauf, 61K) reports on four corrupt Afghan law enforcers who have trafficked in drugs. It writes, "Top Afghan officials privately admit that perhaps 80 percent of the personnel at the Ministry of Interior, Afghanistan's chief law-enforcement agency - from local police chiefs up to the top bureaucrats - may be benefiting from the drug trade. ... The result is a government that is either incapable or unwilling to prevent a trade that is rapidly undermining the country's rule of law and the Afghan people's faith in their leadership."

NATO Seen As Increasing Role In War On Terror. In the Wall Street Journal, columnist Melanie Kirkpatrick optimistically relates an interview with NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer in which they discuss NATO's increasing activity outside Europe: "Afghanistan is NATO's first mission outside Europe and a crucial test of the alliance's relevance in a post-Cold War world. Defense ministers meeting in Brussels voted Thursday to proceed with a plan to increase alliance forces in Afghanistan to 17,000 from 9,000 and to expand into the violence-plagued south." Kirkpatrick notes problems that NATO has, such as insufficient spending by most members and a near-total lack of airlift capacity, but she concludes, "That 25,000-soldier rapid response force should be up and running by Riga. The Afghanistan mission and the potential acquisition of airlift are also signs of progress. NATO isn't fully 'transformed' yet, but it's getting there."

Congress Gives Pentagon More Budgetary Authority. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Rogers, 2.11M) reports, "Congress is giving the Pentagon unusual authority to shift money in its budget to cope with an anticipated multibillion-dollar payroll shortfall that could have an impact on ground troops in Iraq." The move is meant to "avoid any pay disruption before the end of this fiscal year on Sept. 30" and increases the Pentagon's "existing authority" by one-third; without it, the Army could have a year-end shortfall of "$1.4 billion for active personnel." The Journal attributes the "persistent scramble for funds" of the Army and Marines to the cost of "a prolonged overseas deployment" of a professional military.

Army Changes Pain Treatment For Wounded Soldiers. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, McGough, 2.11M) reports on the work of Sorenson Medical, the manufacturer of an "infusion pump" that has "helped transform how the Army treats and transports wounded soldiers." Its product reduces the suffering of injured troops: "Injected anesthetics are eliminated quickly from the body, so they deaden nerves for only a few hours. Pumps that infuse anesthetics, performing what are known as 'continuous peripheral nerve blocks,' can hold off pain for days at a time, helping outpatients in particular. That allows patients to cut back on or eliminate opioid pain medicines like Vicodin, which affect the entire body, and can cause nausea, vomiting and intestinal blockage." Sorenson is parlaying its success in military usage to the slower-moving civilian market.

Rival US Labs Compete To Build Safer Nuclear Bomb. The Los Angeles Times (6/13, Vartabedian, 958K) reports, "Scientists at Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico are locked in an intense competition with rivals at Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory in the Bay Area to design the nation's first new nuclear bomb in two decades." The bomb is meant to ensure the "long-term reliability" of the aging American arsenal. The article describes the objections of detractors: "But some veterans of nuclear arms development are strongly opposed, contending that building new weapons could trigger another arms race with Russia and China, as well as undermine arguments to stop nuclear developments in Iran, North Korea and elsewhere. And, the critics say, It would eventually increase pressure to resume underground nuclear testing, which the U.S. halted 14 years ago."

DOJ_NMG_0033033

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Interspeed Official Convicted Of Fraud. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Bulkeley) reports, "Arthur Goodwin, former senior vice president for sales of the now-defunct Interspeed Inc., was convicted of eight-counts of fraud in connection with inflating the sales of the Internet equipment company." The Journal continues, "Mr. Goodwin, 45, was convicted by a jury in the courtroom of U.S. District Judge Richard G. Stearns. He is scheduled for sentencing on Oct. 5." The Journal adds, "The U.S. attorney's office said that evidence in the case established that Mr. Goodwin falsely overstated sales by $9 million, which was 60% of the company's reported revenue in 1999. … The overstatement made it appear that Interspeed, North Andover, Mass., was meeting growth targets. He accomplished the overstatement by fraudulent acts including giving customers secret side-letters that allowed them to return the equipment. He also altered a key contract on what was said to be the largest sales in company history to make it acceptable to the company's finance department."

US Subpoenas Monster In Widening Options Probe. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Bulkeley) reports, "Monster Worldwide Inc. said it received a U.S. attorney's subpoena for information on its stock-option grants, as investigations into possible options backdating widened." The Journal continues, L"Monster, an online job-search and advertising firm based in New York, issued a series of options between 1997 and 2001 in a pattern that was favorable to executives receiving the grants, including James J. Treacy, its former president. The odds of so favorable a pattern occurring randomly are about nine million to one, according to a Wall Street Journal analysis1 published in yesterday's edition. Monster shares slid $3.40, or 8.1%, to $38.60 in 4 p.m. composite trading yesterday on the Nasdaq Stock Market." The Journal adds, "Monster, which is conducting an internal inquiry into the options, said it will cooperate with the inquiry and subpoena, issued by the U.S. attorney in Manhattan. Mr. Treacy, who no longer works for Monster, has said he didn't have anything to do with the timing of the grants, which were authorized by the board. … Two other high-tech concerns, Comverse Technology Inc. and Applied Micro Circuits Corp., announced delays in filings of financial reports due to options investigations. In addition, Applied Micro Circuits, Sunnyvale, Calif., and two other companies said they had received informal inquiries for information on the timing of stock-options grants from the Securities and Exchange Commission. The newly identified companies bring to at least 43 the number of firms that have acknowledged internal or external inquiries into their stock-option timing."

Pension Funds Sue Amid Widening Options Probe. The Financial Times (6/13, Grant) reports, "Shareholder anger over US executive compensation practices spilled into the open on Monday as two big US pension funds sued companies involved in an investigation into the timing of stock-option awards." The Times continues, "Darren Robbins, a partner at Lerach Coughlin, said his San Diego law firm was also representing pension funds in Europe and Australia that were preparing similar action. … 'People are very upset about this. There have been at least five pension funds that have filed cases in the last 72 business hours in court houses from California to Boston,' he told the Financial Times." The Times adds, "McAfee, a software security maker, was sued on Monday in federal court in the Northern District of California by the Heavy & General Laborers' Pension and Annuity Funds, alleging 'constructive fraud' through the backdating of stock options. … Juniper Networks, a technology company, was hit with a similar complaint by the Employer-Teamsters Pension Health and Welfare Funds. … Four separate companies revealed on Monday that they were being investigated by regulators over their options grants. More than 40 companies have become ensnared in one of the widest criminal and regulatory investigations into white-collar compensation in recent years. The probe is emerging as a test of years of executive compensation practices and has started to draw the anger of unions."

Manne Argues Case For Insider Trading. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (6/13), Henry Manne, dean emeritus of George Mason University School of Law, writes, "Behavioral finance, a developing field of academic research that emphasizes investor irrationality (and ignorance) and the inefficiency of markets, has been hailed by defenders of the SEC as offering a solid economic rationalization for our vast scheme of federal securities regulations. Even apart from the obvious implications for the regulatory system of ignorance and irrationality on the part of regulators, a closer examination of the logic of behavioral finance leaves little for the pro-regulation crowd to crow about." Manne continues, "The literature on prediction markets makes clear that the more participants in a contest and the better informed they are, the more likely is the weighted average of their guesses to be the correct one. … We should rethink any current policies based on a view of pricing in which we exclude the best-informed traders and discard the wisdom of the many. … Since such trading clearly makes the market process work more efficiently, it aids capital allocation decisions and informs business executives through market-price feedback of the best predictions about the value of new plans."

DOJ_NMG_0033034

Bill Would Limit Use Of Pension Accounting Benefit. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Jones, 2.11M) reports, "The balances of public-company pension plans had been improving until the stock market swooned again. Congressional action could deal many of these funds another setback. The House and Senate both have passed versions of a bill that could limit the use of a key pension-accounting benefit. The legislation would affect dozens of companies in the automotive, aerospace and basic-materials industries. At issue are credit balances, which companies accumulate by putting more money into a plan than required in a given year to meet obligations to retirees."

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Reports First Rise In Violent Crime In Five Years. The FBI yesterday released the preliminary Annual Uniform Crime Report, which found that the US violent-crime index increased in 2005, the first rise in five years. The murder rate led the way – with a 5% increase – and, among the four categories in the index, only the number of rapes declined.

The story was covered by all three network news broadcasts, with CBS characterizing the rise as "disturbing" and NBC calling it "troubling," while ABC focused on speculation about factors fuelling the rise. The CBS Evening News (6/12, story 9, 0:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) noted, "The FBI says that violent crime in this country was up 2.5% last year. While that is not a huge increase, it is the first increase since 2001. Murder led the way. … By far, the biggest increase in murders, up more than 12%, was in mid-sized cities, cities with populations under a quarter of a million." NBC Nightly News (6/12, story 5, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) similarly reported, "The overall increase nationwide was modest, 2.5%, but that was the largest increase since 1991. … Murder was up 4.8% last year. Across the country, big cities bore the brunt of the increase, we're told. Houston's murder rate was up 23% last year, Philadelphia, up 14%, Las Vegas, up 10%."

In its "A Closer Look" segment, ABC World News Tonight (6/12, story 8, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "For the first time in five years, there has been a significant rise in the violent crime rate." ABC (Thomas) added, "Why the surge?" Northeastern University Prof. James Fox: "We've seen gang activity making a great resurgence. … We see more guns floating on to the street." Thomas: "Criminologists say large numbers of violent, career criminals are getting out of prison," and "the nation is paying a price for slashing successful effort efforts, such as community policing and crime prevention programs -- programs they say led to a decade-long decline in crime." LAPD Chief William Bratton: "Unfortunately, starting after 9/11, we diverted the money to terrorism -- which was important -- but we started neglecting old-fashion crime. You have to fight both wars at the same time."

The major dailies all cover the FBI report prominently, with speculation about the causes echoing the ABC story: gangs, cuts in federal funds, and criminals completing 1990s prison terms. USA Today (6/13, Johnson, 2.31M) notes, "The FBI report also is renewing the debate over whether the U.S. government's dropping of an ambitious police-hiring program — along with many law enforcement agencies' new emphasis on preventing terrorism — have made crime prevention more difficult. … 'This should be a loud wake-up call for the country to get back to doing what worked in the 1990s,' Fox says," referring "in part to the Bush administration's phasing out of a Clinton-era program aimed at putting 100,000 new cops on U.S. streets. Police chiefs nationwide have called for renewing the program to offset local cutbacks." USA adds, "Justice Department officials cautioned against reading too much into the FBI report. 'The crime rate is so low in some communities that relatively modest increases can result in what appear to be fairly stark increases,' says Richard Hertling, deputy assistant attorney general for the Office of Legal Policy."

In a front-page story, the Washington Post (6/13, Eggen, 744K) reports, "The jump could also represent a lingering effect of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, some experts said, because governments at all levels have diverted resources away from traditional crime fighting in favor of anti-terrorism and homeland security programs." Hertling "said the FBI statistics are 'a yellow flag' but do not represent a trend, in part because the numbers are preliminary and do not include full reports from all jurisdictions." In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/13, Sherman) notes, "The FBI data, compiled from reports by more than 12,000 law enforcement agencies, does not contain overall crime numbers in any category nor does it offer any explanation for the changes. The FBI's final annual crime report comes out in the fall. Criminal justice experts said the statistics reflect the nation's complacency in fighting crime, a product of dramatic declines in the 1990s and the abandonment of effective programs that emphasized prevention, putting more police officers on the street and controlling the spread of guns."

The New York Times (6/13, Newman, 1.19M) reports, "Law enforcement officials and other experts on crime cautioned that this latest report did not necessarily mean crime would start to run rampant again." Carnegie Mellon University criminologist Alfred Blumstein said, "I want to be careful to not overstate a one-year trend as the start of something much bigger, because it could well go in the other direction next year." The Financial Times (6/13, Kirchgaessner) adds, "Justice Department officials on Monday said it was too soon to attribute the increases to a wider trend in violent crime and that it was too early to determine the cause of the spikes, although they acknowledged that the migration of gang activity from large to smaller cities was a possibility." The FT notes that Hertling "said it was unclear whether a 23 per cent increase in the number of murders that was reported in Houston, Texas, was linked to the influx of people into the city after Hurricane Katrina…or whether the increase was something that 'played out' over the course of the year."

DOJ_NMG_0033035

NPR's All Things Considered (6/12, Sullivan) reported, "Justice Department officials say crime-fighting has been a priority of the Bush administration for the past six years and point to millions of dollars the Justice Department has spent on anti-gang initiatives and community programs such as Project Safe Neighborhoods." The Los Angeles Times (6/13, Havemann, 958K), Washington Times (6/13, Seper, Cella, 90K) and UPI also report on the FBI preliminary statistics.

North Carolina City Bucks Trend With Experimental Program. The CBS Evening News (6/12, story 10, 2:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported High Point, N.C., "is bucking the trend. Crime there is actually going down." CBS (Pitts) added, "High Point…was once so violent police wouldn't get out of their patrol cars in some neighborhoods, but not now. … What's going on is a model for cities from Chicago to Tucson. … Suspected drug dealers are called into police headquarters. First they're verbally strip searched…then given one last chance. Community leaders like Reverend Quentin Boger provide the carrot." Boger: "We have partnered with the police department to say enough is enough." CBS noted, "In the two years of the program, the violent crime rate on the rise in other parts of the country has dropped 20% in High Point."

FBI Data Receives Heavy Local TV, Newspaper Coverage. The FBI data also was reported widely by local TV news and newspapers in communities all across the country, which focused on their local statistics. Some examples: The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/13, Moran, 423K) reports, "Philadelphia suffered one of the worst increases in homicides among major cities last year, the FBI reported yesterday. … Deputy Police Commissioner Richard J. Ross said Philadelphia is facing an 'uphill battle' trying to control the flood of illegal guns in the city and the street mentality that makes it easy to pull the trigger. … More weapons in the hands of immature youths has resulted in more 'craziness,' Ross said."

The AP (6/13, de la Cruz) reports, "Jersey City saw increases in all of its violent crime indexes, except for forcible rape. The murder rate increased 65.2 percent with 38 murders in 2005 compared with 23 in 2004. … Criminal justice experts said the statistics reflect the nation's complacency in fighting crime, a product of dramatic declines in the 1990s and the abandonment of effective programs that emphasized prevention, putting more police officers on the street and controlling the spread of guns. In New Jersey, Michael Wagers, executive director of the Police Institute at Rutgers-Newark, attributed the bulk of violence to the availability of guns."

The Miami Herald (6/13, Vasquez, DeMarzo, 323K) reports, "The number of murders, robberies and aggravated assaults rose nationally in 2005," but "FBI data for South Florida's biggest cities told a different story: In six out of eight cities, violent crime was down. … 'We've obviously been very aggressive,' Miami Police Chief John Timoney said. 'The whole idea of crime and quality of life has been our number one priority here.' Regarding the higher crime figures in other parts of the country, Timoney called it 'cause for concern' but urged caution in analyzing the data."

The Dayton Daily News (6/13, Wynn) All violent crimes in the city fell last year except rape, according to the FBI's 2005 preliminary Annual Uniform Crime Report. Rapes in Dayton increased to 140 in 2005 from 127 in 2004." Dayton Police Lt. John Huber "said when police turned in their information to the state they reported 33 homicides in 2004 and 32 homicides in 2005, but the FBI listed 32 for both years. Huber said he didn't know how the mistake occurred. No one at the FBI national press office could be reached for comment."

WRTV-TV Indianapolis (6/12) reports, "In Indianapolis, there were 7,948 violent crimes reported in 2005, up almost 900 from 2004. The number of murders in Indy actually declined slightly, from 109 murders in 2004 to 108 in 2005, but other crimes were up substantially."

The Minneapolis Star-Tribune (6/13, Gordon, Chanen, Padilla) reports, "The FBI released data Monday indicating that violent crime surged 35.5 percent in Minneapolis last year, but the city's Police Department said a computer glitch grossly exaggerated what was actually a 15 percent jump from 2004. A 15 percent increase is still six times the 2.5 percent national rise," but "the volume of violent crime in Minneapolis is about 30 percent below levels in the mid-1990s." The Star-Tribune notes, "An FBI spokeswoman said she expects the bureau to accept Minneapolis' revisions."

The Coloradoan (6/13) reports, "Overall violent crime…was up 23 percent in Fort Collins, the second-highest increase in Colorado behind Westminster among cities with more than 100,000 people, according to the FBI report. The picture was better in property crime…which declined by 5 percent in Fort Collins."

KTVT-TV Dallas-Fort Worth (6/12, Richie) reports, "Eleven people were shot in downtown Dallas early Saturday morning. There have been 78 murders in the first five months of the year. But violent crime in Dallas is actually plummeting. … Violent crime in Dallas was down nearly 5 percent from 2004 to 2005. Murders were down 19 percent."

DOJ_NMG_0033036

KIRO-TV Seattle (6/12) reports, "The FBI's latest crime statistics show a drop in rapes in Bellevue, Seattle, and Tacoma, Wash.," but overall, "crime in Seattle and Tacoma continues to rise. Burglaries have dropped by 14 percent in Seattle but that was the only decrease noted among crimes listed in the report. Violent crime has declined in Tacoma but like the other cities, crimes involving theft and robberies have increased."

"Most Wanted" Houston Katrina Evacuee Arrested For Murder. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/13) reports, "A Hurricane Katrina evacuee who police called one of the Houston area's 'most wanted killers,' has been arrested in Louisiana on charges of killing a fellow evacuee" while robbing him for his FEMA relief funds. "Ricardo Irvin, 18, told the Houston officers who picked him up from authorities in New Iberia, La., that 'he got tired of running from the law' and admitted killing fellow evacuee Gregory Sartain." The AP notes, "Katrina evacuees have been involved in more than two dozen killings, either as suspects or victims, since about 150,000 Louisiana evacuees arrived last September, police said. FBI crime data released Monday showed a 23 percent spike in murders in Houston in the past year."

Libby Lawyers May Call Memory Expert. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (6/12, 2.11M), "The defense team for former Vice Presidential Chief of Staff I. Lewis Libby said it is considering calling a memory expert to testify at his trial early next year. … Attorneys representing Libby have said in court filings that any erroneous statements made to Federal Bureau of Investigation agents or the grand jury were the result of a faulty memory, and not intentional lies. It isn't clear if the federal judge hearing the case would allow such testimony."

Judge Dismisses Part Of Charge Against Safavian As Trial Goes To Jury. The AP (6/13, Yost) reports US District Judge Paul Friedman "dismissed part of one criminal charge against a former official in the Bush administration Monday, as the first trial in the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling scandal moved toward a conclusion." Friedman's decision "represented a small courtroom victory for defendant David Safavian, who is accused of five felony charges that he concealed Abramoff's efforts to acquire two pieces of government property." The judge "threw out language from the indictment that said Safavian lied by telling a GSA ethics officer Abramoff had no business with the GSA and was not seeking to do business with the agency. There was no evidence during the trial that Safavian ever made such statements to the GSA, Friedman said."

The Washington Post (6/13, A6, Birnbaum, 744K) reports the Safavian trial "went to the jury yesterday, as a prosecutor in closing arguments accused him of lying to federal investigators to conceal the fact that he was 'doing Jack Abramoff's bidding.'" In response, Safavian's attorney "said that the government's case was weak because Abramoff, a disgraced lobbyist who pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to corrupt public officials, did not testify at the three-week trial." Federal prosecutor Nathaniel B. Edmonds "told the jury in his closing argument that Safavian maintained a 'secret, inappropriate and unethical relationship' with Abramoff, his former boss, when Safavian became the deputy chief of staff and then chief of staff of the General Services Administration, the U.S. government's landlord agency."

The New York Times (6/13, Shenon, 1.19M) reports Judge Friedman "handed a small victory to" Safavian, who is "on trial for lying about his ties to the Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, dismissing a specific charge in the indictment." But "other, larger charges against the former aide, David H. Safavian, were left intact for the jury, which is scheduled to begin deliberations on Tuesday in the first trial to result from the influence-peddling scandals centered on Mr. Abramoff."

Shadegg Circulates Article Linking Lewis, Earmark Corruption. The Hill (6/13, O'Connor) reports Rep. John Shadegg, "a leading fiscal conservative in the House has stoked debate over pork by circulating a newspaper story linking Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) to 'the inherent risk of corruption at the heart of the congressional earmark process.'" Rep. Shadegg, "who ran for the majority leadership on a platform of fiscal retrenchment, sent reelection supporters an opinion piece on the federal investigation surrounding the House Appropriations Committee chairman." The Journal piece "condenses newspaper reports about connections among Lewis, a political action committee run by his stepdaughter and the lobbying firm of a close friend and former colleague." The questions "surrounding Lewis, his staff and the lobbying firm, Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White, are not directly connected to the bitter dispute between conservatives and Appropriations Committee members over earmarks, the special projects inserted into the annual spending bills." But some conservatives "argue that the news stories refocus attention on reform just as the guilty pleas of former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham (R-Calif.) and disgraced Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff fade from the headlines."

McCain Says Earmarking System Is Broken. Sen. John McCain said on Fox News' On the Record with Greta Van Susteren (6/12), "I think we have a broken system here it is called earmarking in which good people do bad things sometimes. People are able to divert tens of millions of dollars. And they haven't had the scrutiny and competition." McCain added, "When you see a Duke Cunningham do what he did the first question is why. Why would an individual betray his people and oath of office and his nation that way? The second question is how, how did he get away with it just one congressman and one lobbyist? It means that there is a broken system here that he was able to get away with that."

DOJ_NMG_0033037

SCOTUS Ruling Sends Texas Death Penalty Case Back For Possible Fourth Trial. The AP (6/13, Graczyk) reports, "One of the longest and most contentious death penalty cases in Texas is heading back for yet another trial." The AP continues, "The U.S. Supreme Court, acting Monday on an appeal from the Texas Attorney General's Office, refused to reinstate the death sentence of Johnny Paul Penry, clearing the way for another jury to consider punishment for a fourth time. Penry was convicted of raping and fatally stabbing a woman at her home in Livingston in 1979. … Penry turned 50 last month and has spent more than half of his life on death row for the slaying of 22-year-old Pamela Moseley Carpenter. He confessed to attacking the woman and stabbing her with scissors, but his attorneys have contended Penry, who says he believes in Santa Claus, has the reasoning capacity of a 7-year-old." The AP adds, "While psychological tests have put Penry's IQ between 50 and 60, at least five juries have found Penry to be legally competent to stand trial or have rejected defenses based on mental retardation. The high court in 2002 ruled mentally retarded people, generally considered having an IQ below 70, may not be executed. … The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals last October, in a 5-4 ruling, sent Penry's death sentence back for another punishment hearing, citing what judges said were improper instructions that prevented jurors from considering the full scope of Penry's retardation claims. It was that decision the attorney general's office appealed to the high court."

Utah Professor Has Anderson Documents, But Will Keep Them From FBI. KSL-TV Salt Lake City (6/12, Dunnreports on its Web site, "Over the last few months, the FBI has turned to Jack Anderson's papers," and "KSL Newsradio has learned that thousands of pages of those documents are right here in Salt Lake City," collected by University of Utah Professor Tim Chambless. "Chambless says when FBI Director Robert Mueller visited Salt Lake City last week, he wanted to come clean about his six boxes full of papers, and wanted to tell the bureau why it will never see them. 'I believe in the First Amendment. Jack Anderson believed in the First Amendment,' Chambless says. Chambless sent a letter through his lawyer to Mueller, asking him to announce the end of the pursuit of the papers," and "attorney Pat Shea says the papers are now hidden where no one will find them."

The Deseret Morning News (6/13, Winslow) notes, "Initially, Chambless provided the FBI with a catalog of what the papers said. Now, he fears the FBI may come with subpoenas demanding everything," prompting him "and his lawyer fired off a letter Monday to FBI Director Robert Mueller, telling him to back off." Chambless "suggested the FBI wanted them because 'political security' was threatened." The Morning News adds, "Some have suggested the Anderson papers are a stepping stone for a Bush administration crackdown on reporters who publish classified documents and refuse to reveal sources. While in Utah last week, Mueller denied those accusations. 'We're trying to determine whether or not national security would be adversely impacted by the disclosure of these documents. … 'I hardly think that is an assault on the press.'"

Supreme Court Issues Two Restrictive Death Penalty Rulings. ABC World News Tonight (6/12, story 6, 1:55, Gibson, 8.78M) reports, "The Supreme Court issued two significant decisions today involving the death penalty. The rulings signal a new caution on capital punishment. One decision could delay many executions. The other could give those facing capital punishment a better chance for a new trial." ABC (Cochran) added the court's ruling in the case of cop killer Clarence Hill "means Hill and more than 3,000 other condemned killers will have more leeway to argue that those injections are cruel and unusual punishment, and therefore unconstitutional." In the second case, "the court ruled that Paul House, who has been on death row for 20 years, can use new DNA evidence as he argues that he did not rape and kill Caroline Muncie. The court said if evidence is truly important, it can be used."

The AP (6/13, Locy) reports, "Kennedy said jurors could find reasonable doubt because DNA evidence points to Muncey's husband as a suspect and because small blood stains found on House's jeans may have spilled on the pants from vials of blood taken from Muncey during an autopsy. … House, who was on parole for a sex offense in Utah, was convicted of luring Muncey from her home by telling her that her husband, Hubert, had been hurt in a car accident. Her body was found the next afternoon in an area where witnesses had seen House. … His original lawyer failed to locate several witnesses who said years later that Hubert Muncey had abused his wife, had fought with her the night of her murder and had confessed later to killing her."

The Legal Times (6/13, Mauro) reports, "Peter Neufeld, co-director of the Innocence Project, said that House 'recognizes that scientific advances have transformed our criminal justice system and must be weighed heavily in determining whether innocent people have been wrongly convicted.' The ruling, the first dealing directly with DNA evidence as a factor in reopening a death penalty case, will have a broad impact, Neufeld said."

DOJ_NMG_0033038

This morning, the Washington Post (6/13, A20, 744K) editorializes on the House case, saying, "Given how many innocents have been wrongly convicted and later freed from death row and lengthy prison terms, opening the door for review makes a great deal of sense." And the Los Angeles Times (6/13, 958K) editorializes, "Welcome as this decision is, the best way to prevent unjust impositions of the death penalty is to do away with capital punishment altogether, as other civilized societies have done. Unfortunately, as the Supreme Court grows ever more uneasy with the death penalty, elected officials agitate ever more aggressively for it."

The Financial Times (6/13, Waldmeir) says the court "chipped away at the edifice of capital punishment in America, issuing two rulings that give prisoners on death row more power to challenge their sentences." USA Today (6/13, Biskupic, 2.31M) runs a similar story titled "High Court Rulings Chip At Death Penalty." The Los Angeles Times (6/13, Savage, 958K), meanwhile, headlines its report "Supreme Court Assists Death Row Challengers."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/13, Richey, 61K) reports that "in a 9-0 decision announced Monday, the US Supreme Court left the door propped open for a significant number of condemned prisoners to sue to force an examination of whether lethal injection is a humane method of capital punishment." Such method-of-execution suits "have become the most active area of capital punishment litigation in recent years. Many states and the Bush administration had expressed concern that to allow such challenges might create another layer of delay in carrying out executions." The case, Hill v. McDonough, "did not test the constitutionality of lethal injection. Instead, it raised a technical issue: whether such legal challenges had to be filed under the more restrictive habeas statute or could be pursued as a civil rights matter. The high court said inmates could file appeals under the civil rights law." The Washington Post (6/13, A3, Lane, 744K) notes "earlier this year, an Atlanta-based federal appeals court threw out Hill's case, ruling that it was a disguised attack on his death sentence." The New York Times (6/13, Greenhouse, 1.19M) runs a similar story.

Death Penalty Seen As "Tumbling Down." Annette Fuentes, adjunct professor at the Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism, writes in USA Today (6/13, 2.31M), "In addition to Hill's case, nine other executions have been stayed this year because of the lethal injection issue, according to Richard Dieter of the Death Penalty Information Center, a group opposed to capital punishment. And in California, federal courts have effectively imposed a moratorium on the death penalty while that state studies the issue. The heightened debate about lethal injections, which are used in 37 states, raises a larger question: Can there ever be a right way to execute someone? … It seems inevitable, and just, that slowly but surely capital punishment will come tumbling down under the weight of its own injustices, uselessness and immorality."

Former FBI Boston SAC Testifies At Wrongful Death Trial. The Boston Globe (6/13, Murphy, 484K) reports, "A retired FBI official who has been critical of the agency's handling of gangsters James 'Whitey' Bulger and Stephen 'The Rifleman' Flemmi testified yesterday that the FBI coined a phrase for agents who got too cozy with their informants: 'Going native.'" Robert Fitzpatrick said that "when he arrived as second-in-command of the FBI's Boston office in 1981, there was a high-level, internal investigation underway into whether Bulger's FBI handlers had leaked him information that compromised a State Police investigation of Bulger and other underworld leaders." The Globe adds that Fitzpatrick "said the FBI's priority at the time was targeting members of La Cosa Nostra, commonly known as the Mafia. Cultivating organized crime informants was critical to that mission, he said." The Boston Herald (6/13, Sweet, 220K) also reports, "The FBI called it 'going native' - a humiliating label for G-men who became enamored of their mobster informants," and Fitzpatrick said that "when he came to Boston…he heard a lot of talk by then-Special-Agent-in-Charge Lawrence Sarhatt about agents suspected of turning rotten." However, "Fitzpatrick said it was 'a high priority' of the FBI to keep the identities of informants…confidential for the sake of their well-being. It was expected of agents, he said, that 'You adhere to the law, you adhere to the guidelines and you do what is correct and true.'"

Nevada Judge Shot In Courthouse By Sniper. ABC World News Tonight (6/12, story 7, :20, Gibson) reports, "And in Reno, Nevada, today, a sniper shot and seriously wound a judge at the local courthouse. Police sealed off a six-block area as they hunted for the sniper who fired at family court Judge Chuck Weller, hitting him in the chest as he stood near a third floor courthouse window. The injuries are not considered to be life threatening."

The AP (6/13, Sonner) reports, "A family court judge was shot and wounded as he stood near a third-floor courthouse window Monday, and police were looking for man suspected in a slaying across town who had appeared before the judge in a divorce case." The AP continues, "Investigators said Darren Roy Mack, a suspect in a killing reported at a Reno, Nev., apartment building was a 'person of interest' in the shooting at the courthouse earlier in the day, Reno Deputy Police Chief Jim Johns said." The AP adds, "Judge Chuck Weller was hit in the chest around midday by a shot or shots that came through his office window at the Mills B. Lane Justice Center, and police sealed off the area and searched nearby parking garages for a sniper. … Police also reported that a bomb-sniffing dog had alerted officers to the judge's car in the court's parking garage and that a bomb squad was investigating."

DOJ_NMG_0033039

The New York Times (6/13, Reed) reports, "Johns said Mr. Mack 'had recent dealings with the judge and court.' … 'The suspect,' Chief Johns said, 'is known to have access to firearms.'" The Times adds, "Court documents show that a hearing in a contested divorce between Mr. Mack and Charla M. Mack is scheduled for Sept. 7 before Judge Weller. … The case involves children. … The police would not release the name of the victim of the homicide or the victim's relationship to Mr. Mack."

Wisconsin Procurement Official Convicted Of Contract Fraud. The Milwaukee Journal-Sentinel (6/13, Schultze) reports Wisconsin purchasing supervisor Georgia Thompson yesterday was convicted "of fixing a travel contract for a contributor to Gov. Jim Doyle's campaign, adding a potentially explosive issue to the race for governor this fall. … U.S. Attorney Steven Biskupic said after the verdict that the case was about 'Georgia Thompson and Georgia Thompson alone.'" Still, State Republican Party Chairman Rick Graber…was quick to go on the attack. He said Thompson's trial 'showed how far this administration is willing to go to reward political cronies and campaign donors.'" The AP (6/13, Foley) notes, "Prosecutors accused Thompson…of steering a contract to book state travel to Adelman Travel Group last year. The firm's CEO gave $10,000 to Doyle before and after winning the contract, worth an estimated $750,000. Prosecutors used e-mails and other records to paint a cozy relationship between Doyle's administration and Adelman."

Witness Testifies Daley Aide Told Him To Lie To Press About Political Hire. The Chicago Sun-Times (6/13, Korecki, Warmbir, Spielman) reports, "A Mayor Daley press aide told a deputy commissioner to lie to the public and say the city hired a 19-year-old building inspector without knowing he was the son of a clout-heavy union official, a witness testified in the City Hall hiring trial Monday." Deputy commissioner Christopher Kozicki "also testified Monday that the FBI asked him about John Daley in three different interviews, leading a defense lawyer to call Daley a 'mooch' who bummed rides off of people." The Sun-Times notes that Andy Ryan "was hired as a building inspector even though the city requires all inspectors to have completed a four-year apprenticeship and have two years work experience. Ryan is the son of Tom Ryan, the secretary-treasurer of Carpenters Local 13," which "was Mayor Daley's largest campaign contributor in 2003. Kozicki testified that Breelyn Pete, former spokeswoman for the city Buildings and Procurement Services Department, told Kozicki to tell the press he didn't know about Ryan's connections."

The Chicago Tribune (6/13, Bush, Mihalopoulos, 643K) reports, "Three times this year, federal prosecutors have questioned a high-ranking city official and prominent member of the 11th Ward Democratic Organization about Mayor Richard Daley's brother, John Daley, it was revealed in court Monday." Former Buildings Department managing deputy Christopher Kozicki "did not detail what prosecutors wanted to know about Cook County Commissioner John Daley as he testified in the trial of the mayor's former patronage chief, Robert Sorich." But defense lawyer Thomas Anthony Durkin "suggested to Kozicki that prosecutors 'wanted to try to indict Mayor Daley and his brother John.' U.S. District Judge David Coar sustained prosecutors' objections to that and similar questions." The Tribune adds, "Also Monday, a former city computer technician testified that he removed a program from Sorich's laptop computer in 2002. The program tracked city job seekers by their race and political affiliation, according to witness Ben Campney. … 'Robert joked that, after this was over, we would throw the hard drives in Lake Michigan,' Campney said."

Former Pennsylvania Police Chief Pleads Guilty To Drug, Obstruction Charges. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/13, Silver, Ward, 261K) reports, "Former West Mifflin Police Chief Frank Diener pleaded guilty yesterday to federal drug charges and was presented with a new 19-count criminal complaint from the Allegheny County district attorney's office alleging that he created a slush fund and stole thousands of dollars of borough and private property. … The complaint stems from an 18-month investigation by the state police organized crime unit and the FBI." The Post-Gazette adds that Diener "also pleaded guilty to instructing witnesses to lie and destroy evidence. On March 9, when Mr. Diener learned that there was an ongoing FBI investigation, he gave a paint can containing 25 grams of cocaine and 387 grams of marijuana to one of the cooperating witnesses so it wouldn't be found in any search of his home." The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (6/13) notes, "Investigators said in court paperwork that Diener took numerous items -- including a video gambling machine, narcotics, tools, firearms and ammunition -- from the police department and its evidence room. Investigators also contend that Diener instructed officers to fix cases. He resigned the chief's post in October 2005." The AP (6/13) also reports on Diener's plea.

Fake Precious Metals Traders Caught In FBI Sting Face Sentencing. The Miami Herald (6/13, Santiago, 323K) reports, "They claimed to handle gold and silver, but after Monday, the only metal objects these two convicted Broward con artists could be seeing are iron prison bars." Charles Paul Hoffecker of Pompano Beach and Charles Edward Meyers of Fort Lauderdale "could face up to 10 years in federal prison when they are sentenced June 19 before U.S. District Judge Katherine Hayden in Newark." The Herald notes, "The two had been the focus of a lengthy investigation by the FBI and U.S. Postal Inspection Service that started in 1996. To nab them, the FBI and postal officials set up their own faux boiler room…in 1997 in East Brunswick, N.J."

DOJ_NMG_0033040

FBI Interested In Tape Of West Bank Man's Interview In Michigan MySpace Case. The AP (6/13, Charlton) reports, "The FBI and local investigators said Monday that they are interested in a television station's tape of a purported interview with a West Bank man who says he paid for a 16-year-old American girl to fly to the Middle East after meeting her on the internet." The AP continues, "Katherine R. Lester disappeared June 5 from her home in rural Michigan. After the FBI helped track her to the airport in Amman, Jordan, U.S authorities persuaded her to board a return flight. She returned home Friday night. … Authorities have said the girl apparently planned to visit a man who describes himself as a 25-year-old from Jericho on his account with MySpace.com, a social networking Web site where the two met." The AP adds, "WNEM-TV in Saginaw broadcast a telephone interview with a man who said he actually was 20 and only identified himself as Abdullah. … In the interview Saturday, he said he was a wealthy businessman who met Lester online seven months ago. He said he wanted to marry her and sent her money for a plane ticket to visit him. … The station said it got the man's MySpace identity from Lester's sister, Mary, who found it on a computer they share. WNEM said it messaged him on MySpace and asked him for his cell phone number for an interview. … 'We're aware of the existence of the tape,' Tuscola County sheriff's Sgt. Michael Pine said. 'We're talking to the FBI. It's part of the investigation.' … Neither he nor FBI spokesman Terry Booth would say whether they had requested the tape from the station or whether they believed the man was who he said he was."

Virginia Sex Offenders To Be Monitored By GPS Technology. The Washington Times (6/13, Bomey) reports, "Sex offenders in Virginia will be monitored more closely via Global Positioning System (GPS) technology and an upgraded registry, state officials announced yesterday." The Times continues, "The changes that are to take effect July 1 will broaden the number of offenders eligible to be listed in the statewide online registry. The names and photos of nonviolent sex offenders will be accessible, expanding the registry to about 13,000 names." The Times adds, "Two similar bills making their way through the General Assembly would authorize administrative personnel and state troopers to help monitor sex offenders and enforce state law, Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell said in an interview yesterday. … Technological upgrades and the hiring of about 50 troopers and six administrative workers to maintain the registry would cost about $10.5 million, said Mr. McDonnell, a Republican." The Times notes, "The revamped registry Web site, (sex-offender.vsp.virginia.gov), is maintained by the Virginia State Police and allows users to locate the residences of offenders on a map. Its search engine can sort by city, county, ZIP code and name. … The list of offenses that require a criminal's name to be in the registry will be expanded to include, for example, those convicted of possessing child pornography on the first offense." The Washington Post (6/13, Stockwell) also reports this story.

Pellicano Lawyers Say Prosecutors Slow To Turn Over Evidence. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/13, Risling) reports that at a hearing before US District Judge Dale Fischer yesterday, defense lawyers for Hollywood private investigator Anthony Pellicano "scolded federal prosecutors…for not turning over evidence. 'It's their obligation to provide us what we need to exonerate our clients,' said Terree Bowers…who said the process has been 'like pulling teeth.'" But "prosecutors said part of the delay has come from difficulty decrypting about 1,300 audio files made by Pellicano of his telephone conversations with clients and others." Referring to Pellicano, Assistant US Attorney Daniel Saunders said that "if defense attorneys 'are so eager to get the tapes decrypted, the one man who has the password is sitting right over there." The New York Times (6/13, Halbfinger, Weiner, 1.19M) adds that "the nearly four-year federal investigation…has turned up only a single recording in which two people were unknowingly wiretapped," and "barring a last-minute break in the investigation, the government's case will be based far more on circumstantial evidence and witnesses' testimony than on direct evidence of illegal wiretapping." The Times notes that at yesterday's hearing, "Mr. Bowers pleaded with the court to order the government to provide a breakdown of all the recordings prosecutors had not turned over, detailing what they contain and the government's reason for withholding them from the defense. Judge Fisher agreed, ordering that an outside referee be appointed to review the government's evidence and decide whether it should be turned over to the defense."

The Los Angeles Times (6/13, Krikorian, 958K) reports, "Saunders did not provide details on the techniques used by the FBI to decode the encrypted recordings but acknowledged that the methods were not ones that the government would want to share in open court. Other law enforcement sources have said for months that the FBI brought in encryption experts from other federal agencies to help crack the codes allegedly used by Pellicano to safeguard his recordings. … Last week, one person close to the federal investigation said it was possible that the government will never decipher the remaining recordings because Pellicano's encryption methods 'are that good.'" But the unnamed source added, "We're going to keep moving forward, but we've already got plenty of evidence."

DOJ_NMG_0033041

Los Angeles Private Eye Says Work Has Cooled Since Pellicano Indictment. The Los Angeles Times (6/13, Abramowitz) reports, "It's 10 p.m., and John Nazarian, a burly 53-year-old private eye, is hurtling around Beverly Hills in his immaculate red Scion looking for garbage. Nazarian treats trash as his private archeological site, the detritus of human existence that exposes all our hidden vulnerabilities — financial documents, prescription bottles, booze bottles and anything, anything, that might sport DNA." The Times continues, "Yes, it's a dirty job being a private investigator, but Nazarian is prepared to do it. As he likes to say over and over again, he is one of the most expensive private eyes in L.A., charging $10,000 to $20,000 on retainer and $400 an hour for his services. He's racked up a number of celebrity clients, including singer Peggy Lee (whom he assiduously protected from the paparazzi to preserve the public's memory of her as a blond bombshell), Dean Martin, kooky billionaire Doris Duke and her butler, Bernard Lafferty. He's caught stalkers for CBS Chairman Les Moonves and former 'NYPD Blue' star Andrea Thompson. … And then there are the 20 or so unnamed Hollywood wives with philandering husbands for whom Nazarian and his crew of 22 ex-cops and sundry specialists seem to be working in perpetuity." The Times adds, "Nazarian is part of a long, not particularly illustrious tradition of Hollywood private eyes, from fictional antiheroes, such as Sam Spade and 'Chinatown's' Jake Gittes, to real-life swaggerer Fred Otash, the investigator for the scandal sheet Confidential Magazine, and Anthony Pellicano, the infamous gumshoe who sits in jail awaiting trial on more than 100 counts of wiretapping and witness intimidation. … This is why Nazarian keeps no records. Nothing. … Things have cooled down in Nazarian's line of work since the Pellicano indictment."

CIVIL LAW:

High Court Rulings Curb Use Of Civil RICO. The National Law Journal (6/13, Coyle) reports, "Although the U.S. Supreme Court last week ducked the questions everyone expected it to answer in two unrelated challenges under RICO, the justices did tighten the reins on the law generally viewed by the business community as a legal plague." The Journal continues, "Even though the Court on Monday turned aside E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co.'s petition in a Benlate case, the issues not resolved last week -- the scope of the 'enterprise' definition in RICO and whether 'reliance' is required in RICO mail and wire fraud claims -- will continue to divide the lower courts and inevitably return to the Supreme Court, according to RICO litigators and scholars. … But those watching the high court's RICO cases last week viewed the outcome basically as a victory for anti-civil RICO forces." The Journal adds, "In Anza v. Ideal Steel Supply Corp., No. 04-433, a challenge involving two competing businesses, the justices essentially said they meant what they said in a 1992 decision: The alleged RICO violation must be the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries. The law does not permit suits by parties who have been injured only indirectly, wrote Justice Anthony M. Kennedy for the 7-2 majority. … And, in Mohawk Industries v. Williams, No. 05-465, the high court delivered a blow to a RICO class action arising out of claims that Mohawk and its outside recruiting agents hired illegal aliens to depress wages for its legal workers. The justices, in an unsigned decision, vacated the workers' favorable judgment by the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and directed that appellate court to reconsider in light of its proximate cause ruling in Anza. … 'I think the Court remains concerned about the potential sweep of civil RICO litigation,' said Gene C. Schaerr of the Washington office of Chicago's Winston & Strawn, who filed an amicus brief in Anza on behalf of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. 'The statute was passed originally to allow people to seek damages for harm as a result of mob activity. In the years since it was passed, it has gradually metamorphosed into a general purpose, business tort statute that gets raised in all kinds of business litigation where there is any allegation of fraud or dishonesty of any kind.'"

CIVIL RIGHTS:

11th Circuit Upholds Dismissal Of Florida Deputies Who Appeared In Online Porn. The Miami Daily Business Review (6/13, Jones) reports, "The Palm Beach, Fla., Sheriff's Office did not violate the U.S. Constitution when it fired two deputies for appearing in pornography distributed on the Internet, a federal appeals court has decided." The Review continues, "A three-judge panel of the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals unanimously held late last month that the deputies' online escapades were not constitutionally protected because government employees may be limited in their speech if that speech has a negative or detrimental effect on the integrity of the government." The Review adds, "In an opinion written by Judge Stanley F. Birch Jr., the 11th Circuit panel said former Deputies Ronald Thaeter and Timothy Moran were not engaged in a protected form of speech when they appeared in the pornographic photos and videos. Furthermore, since government employees can have their free speech restricted more than that of other Americans, the panel found that U.S. District Judge Daniel T.K. Hurley was right to dismiss the deputies' civil rights lawsuit against the sheriff's office. … West Palm Beach attorney Fred H. Gelston, who served as outside counsel for the sheriff's office, said deputies and other government employees are free to take part in whatever sexual activities they want. But 'it's when they put it on the [Internet] that it becomes a problem,' Gelston said. 'And that's what the lawyers on the other side didn't understand.' … One of the deputies' attorneys said he plans to appeal the 11th Circuit's decision, either by filing a petition for rehearing or asking for a writ of certiorari from the U.S. Supreme Court."

DOJ_NMG_0033042

Senate One Vote Away From Passing Flag Desecration Amendment. USA Today (6/13, Stone, 2.31M) reports, "The Senate is one vote away from passing a constitutional amendment that would ban desecration of the US flag, the closest that amendment supporters have been to passage." The American Legion, which supports the amendment, and the American Civil Liberties Union, "which opposes it, both say there are 66 votes to pass it. Whether advocates can find the 67th vote to send the flag amendment to the states for ratification remains unclear. A Senate vote is set for the week of June 26."

ANTITRUST:

Former Energy Trader Pleads Guilty To Manipulating Natural Gas Prices. The AP (6/10) reported, "A former trader at Williams Energy Marketing & Trading pleaded guilty in federal court to manipulating natural gas prices, authorities said Friday." Daryl Russell Brown "admitted that between 1998 and 2002, he conspired with others at the Tulsa trading company to report fictitious trades to two industry newsletters," which "provided traders with bogus information that gas was trading at levels higher than it actually was – forcing natural gas prices to rise."

AGs Ask DOJ To Crack Down On Rising Gas Prices. The AP (6/13, Miga) reports, "Massachusetts Attorney General Tom Reilly says the Bush administration needs to deliver a tough new message to big oil companies about rising gas prices: enough already." The AP continues, "Reilly emerged from a meeting with (US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales) on Monday saying oil companies deserve a 'very good tongue-lashing' from top administration officials warning that unless 'price gouging' stops, the government will crack down. … 'This administration is going to have to get tough with them, call them in,' said Reilly, a Democratic candidate for governor. 'This administration can reign them in by calling them in and saying, "Listen, enough is enough, the American people have had enough, you either do this or we are going to do this for you".'" The AP adds, "Reilly and attorneys general from Connecticut and several other states met for about an hour at the Justice Department with (Gonzales) and Federal Trade Commission Chairwoman Deborah Platt Majoras. … Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal said he proposed a joint federal-state investigation and prosecution against any illegal practices by the oil industry that are increasing gasoline prices." The AP notes, "The Justice Department said it was working with states on the issue. … 'We are focusing on doing our part to look at this issue and we are encouraging the states to do the same,' said Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos. 'Today's meeting was part of an ongoing dialogue with them to insure that all appropriate steps are being taken.'"

Barr Pharma Settles Novartis Suit. The AP (6/13) reports, "Drug maker Barr Pharmaceuticals Inc. said Monday it agreed to pay $22.5 million to settle a lawsuit with a unit of Novartis, and said the payout will lower profit for the June quarter by 13 cents per share." The AP continues, "The litigation stems from a suit Invamed Inc. and Apothecon Inc. filed in 1998 charging Barr with violating antitrust laws and illegally blocking access to the raw material source for warfarin sodium, a drug that prevents blood clots. An appeals court in October 2004 reversed a lower court's ruling and found the two plaintiffs raised issues of material fact on their antitrust claims. The trial was scheduled to start on Monday."

Mittal Will Not Raise Arcelor Bid. The AP (6/13, White) reports, "Steelmaker Arcelor SA rejected a revised offer from Mittal Steel Co., which refused again Monday to raise its 25.8 billion euros ($33 billion) bid for its rival and criticized the value of the company's deal with Russia's OAO Severstal as 'entirely fictitious.' … But Arcelor left the door open for Mittal, saying the Severstal transaction did not preclude an offer by Mittal and it was ready to meet Mittal again to explore a better deal." The AP continues, "Arcelor said Mittal's current offer 'is inadequate as it continues to undervalue' the company and called the Severstal transaction 'a more attractive alternative from a strategic, financial and social point of view.'" The AP adds, "Arcelor valued itself at 44 euros ($55.70) a share in an offer to buy back up to a quarter of its capital — the same price Severstal Chairman Alexei Mordashov is paying to buy 32 percent of the company. … Mittal and Arcelor representatives met last week for the first time since Mittal made its surprise offer in January. Arcelor had previously refused Mittal's overtures, saying they could meet only when Mittal furnished a standalone business plan — which it did on June 2, the same day it got EU antitrust clearance."

DOJ_NMG_0033043

EU Moves Toward Inclusion Of Turkey, Croatia. The New York Times (6/13, Kanter) reports, "The European Union pushed forward with enlargement plans today, conducting a first round of membership negotiations with Turkey and Croatia and signing a premembership agreement with Albania." The Times continues, "The talks with Turkey proceeded after a compromise was reached over a demand by Cyprus, a European Union member, that Ankara put into effect a protocol it signed with Europe last year and open up its ports and airports to trade with new member states, including Cyprus. What Cyprus got was a message from European Union foreign ministers meeting in Luxembourg asking Turkey to do just that, or face delays in 'the overall progress in the negotiations.' … Cyprus then dropped its objections to the start of talks and Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul of Turkey departed for Luxembourg to join the meeting." The Times adds, "The foreign ministers' talks today, on science and research , were the first of 35 rounds of negotiations to be held with Turkey in the accession process, which is expected to take at least a decade. … The moves toward further enlargement are continuing despite doubts among some in Europe after the last round of enlargement — to 25 from 15 countries — two years ago. There is also concern about absorbing not just Turkey, which would be the first mainly Muslim country to enter the union, but also countries in the Balkans. … Even so, the enlargement process still is proceeding, despite the huge financial commitments involved in integrating such economies, because of the European Union's central belief that every citizen has the right to benefit from the continent's growth. European Union states formally set the process in motion in October. Policy makers say that the criteria required for enlargement can make for stable, prosperous, Western-oriented neighbors — even if circumstances change and candidate states do not eventually join the bloc."

Mirant Withdraws Bid For NRG. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Murti) reports, "Mirant Corp. withdrew its $7.9 billion hostile bid for rival power company NRG Energy Inc. following opposition from its own shareholders, saying it was disappointed NRG was unwilling to discuss the proposal." The Journal continues, "The withdrawal ends a bitter takeover battle involving the two power companies as well as Goldman Sachs Group Inc., which initially advised Mirant before it stepped down amid allegations from NRG that it shared nonpublic information about the company with Mirant. The battle marks the increased value seen in power-generation assets after a tough period in the industry, during which both companies sought bankruptcy-court protection." The Journal adds, "Mirant said a long and contested pursuit isn't in the best interests of the Atlanta company and its shareholders and that it will continue its efforts to create value for shareholders. NRG said the rise in its share price during the past 24 months showed the market recognized the soundness of the Princeton, N.J., company's strategy."

Zale Ends Merger Discussions With Signet. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Hudson) reports, "Zale Corp. said it ended tentative merger talks with chief rival Signet Group PLC, abandoning one of its options as it scrambles to recover from a poor holiday season and three years of losing ground to other jewelry sellers in the U.S." The Journal continues, "Had a deal been struck, it would have combined the two leading specialty-jewelry retailers in the U.S., but it also would have resulted in significant overlap of their store bases. London-based Signet operates 1,837 stores, including 1,246 in the U.S., under the Kay Jewelers and Jared brands. Zale, based in Irving, Texas, operates 2,345 stores, including 2,100 in the U.S., mostly under its flagship Zales Jewelers brand." The Journal adds, "Zale has struggled after its strategy last year to shift its merchandise assortment and advertising to appeal to a more fashionable, upscale clientele resulted in lost sales and a sharp profit drop in its Christmas quarter. The retailer subsequently ousted its top management and scrapped much of the overhaul. It now faces an accounting investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, while its search for a new chief executive officer continues. … Meanwhile, Signet's U.S. division last year surpassed Zale in U.S. sales for the first time. Zale's total revenue in the fiscal year ended July 21, 2005, was $2.38 billion. Signet had revenue of £1.75 billion, or $3.22 billion, in the fiscal year ended Jan. 28, 2006."

BBVA Set To Enter Market For US-To-Mexico Payments. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Mollenkamp, Johnson) reports, "Banco Bilbao Vizcaya Argentaria SA's Texas spending spree -- including the $2.2 billion purchase of Texas Regional Bancshares Inc. and the $480 million purchase of State National Bancshares -- sets the stage for the big Spanish bank to become a major player in the competitive market for remittances between the U.S. and Mexico and could lead to further acquisitions." The Journal continues, "Under a deal announced yesterday, BBVA, Spain's second-largest bank in terms of market value, after Grupo Santander SA, said it would pay $2.16 billion for Texas Regional, whose branches stretch along the Rio Grande Valley. The acquisition is expected to close in the fourth quarter after shareholder and regulatory approval. Separately, BBVA also said it would buy State National, a Fort Worth bank with 44 branches and a sizable El Paso presence. The acquisitions give BBVA ownership of branches along the Texas-Mexico border stretching from El Paso eastward to McAllen, where Texas Regional is based. …

DOJ_NMG_0033044

The purchase could allow BBVA to gain a larger share of the remittance business that flows between the U.S. and Mexico."

RIAA Head Says Illegal Song-Sharing "Contained." USA Today (6/13, Graham) reports, "Nearly a year after the Supreme Court issued a landmark ruling against online music file-sharing services, the CEO of the Recording Industry Association of America says unauthorized song swapping has been 'contained.' … 'The problem has not been eliminated,' says association CEO Mitch Bainwol. 'But we believe digital downloads have emerged into a growing, thriving business, and file-trading is flat.'" USA continues, "That's an optimistic view from an industry that saw its numbers slide to near oblivion after the launch of the original Napster in 1999. CD sales fell as much as 30%, and the RIAA pressed Congress and the courts for relief against what it said was rampant piracy. … After the Supreme Court ruled that the services could be liable for piracy by their users, the RIAA sent cease-and-desist letters to several firms. Most — including BearShare, WinMX and Grokster — shut down. EDonkey and others said they would switch to a licensed, paid model. … EDonkey, which along with BitTorrent is one of the most-used file-sharing services, has yet to make the switch." USA adds, "Even with Grokster and WinMX shut down, their software programs still exist. Eric Garland, CEO of Internet measurement firm BigChampagne, says that more people than ever are using file-sharing networks. 'Nearly 10 million people are online, swapping media, at any given time,' he says. That May figure is up from 8.7 million people in 2005, he says. … Garland says the RIAA has made some inroads. 'They have removed the profiteers from online piracy,' he says. 'They've also embarked on a very successful education campaign. Kids now know about copyright, and the consequences.'"

German Antitrust Authorities Scrutinize Web Rights Deal. The AP (6/13) reports, "Germany's antitrust authority said Monday it is examining the compromise deal between the German soccer league and Deutsche Telekom AG for Internet broadcasting rights after receiving complaints." The AP continues, "The Federal Cartel Office said it had received complaints from rival Internet service providers that Deutsche Telekom is abusing its dominant position." The AP adds, "Under the agreement reached last Wednesday with the German soccer league, or DFL, the telecom will broadcast Bundesliga soccer games online and provide content to its T-Mobile subscribers' cell phones. … Deutsche Telekom -- which won the rights to broadcast German soccer league matches via the Internet in an auction last December -- will not, however, distribute the Internet signal through its cable and satellite operations, both companies said in a statement. In return, Deutsche Telekom agreed to pay less for the Internet rights than originally agreed. … At the same time, it was announced that pay-TV company Arena, which won the television broadcasting rights, will no longer have the right to broadcast over the Internet or to sublicense its Internet broadcasting rights."

ENVIRONMENT:

Pipe Company Official Sentenced To Prison For Rigging Pollution Tests. The AP (6/13) reports, "An executive for a cast-iron pipe foundry in Provo was sentenced Monday to a year in prison for rigging a pollution test." The AP continues, "Charles Matlock, who was vice president and general manager of Pacific States Cast Iron Pipe Co., also was fined $20,000 by U.S. District Judge Dee Benson. … Matlock pleaded guilty in February to violating the Clean Air Act by manipulating an emissions test at Pacific States, a division of Birmingham, Ala.-based McWane Inc." The AP adds, "At issue was a furnace stack test conducted in 2000. An indictment accused the company of feeding crude iron instead of its usual supply of contaminated automobile scrap into the foundry to cover up pollution violations. … The 2000 test was used to file emissions reports to government regulators in 2001, 2002 and 2003. McWane paid a $3 million fine for falsifying the test. … 'When senior corporate executives cheat on required tests, public health and the environment suffer,' said David Uhlmann, chief of the environmental crimes section of the U.S. Department of Justice. … Matlock's sentencing 'is further proof of the McWane legacy: a repeat offender that committed years of environmental and worker safety violations at facilities across the country,' Uhlmann said in a statement."

EPA Rule Loosened After Texas Oil Exec Lobbied Rove. The Los Angeles Times (6/13, Hamburger, Wallsten, 958K) reports a rule "designed by the Environmental Protection Agency to keep groundwater clean near oil drilling sites and other construction zones was loosened after White House officials rejected it amid complaints by energy companies that it was too restrictive and after a well-connected Texas oil executive appealed to White House senior advisor Karl Rove." The new rule, "which took effect Monday, came after years of intense industry pressure, including court battles and behind-the-scenes agency lobbying." But environmentalists "vowed Monday that the fight was not over, distributing internal White House documents that they said portrayed the new rule as a political payoff to an industry long aligned with the Republican Party and President Bush."

DOJ_NMG_0033045

McCain Says There Will Be "Heavy Price" For Failing To Act On Climate Change. Sen. John McCain said on Fox News' On The Record with Greta Van Susteren (6/12) that "we are going to pay a very heavy price for" failing to act sooner on climate change. McCain added, "We have an opportunity now in my view because of the high energy costs to move the ethanol and hydrogen and go back to nuclear power and really combine an effort to be much greener with financial incentives to do so. When oil is $10 a barrel I don't think much of ethanol. When it is $70 a barrel it is a very viable energy source."

NYTimes Urges Kempthorne To "Resurrect" Interior's "Stewardship Of Public Lands." The New York Times (6/13, 1.19M) editorializes, "Dirk Kempthorne's chief task as the new secretary of the interior is to resurrect his department's long tradition of responsible stewardship of the public lands. … As she was going out the door, Ms. Norton resolved a long and complicated dispute over who controls thousands of miles of ancient cowpaths and other trails throughout the West in favor of state and local interests. Many of these trails run through national parks, wildlife refuges and monuments, and as things stand now, there is little to prevent the states from paving them and using them to promote commerce. Mr. Kempthorne should revisit this decision. If he does not, Congress should revisit it for him."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Four Face Drug Charges In Connecticut Following Three-Month Investigation. In Manchester, the Hartford (CT) Courant (6/12, Marteka) reports a three-month police investigation "has resulted in the arrests of four men on drug charges, including two who were on parole. … The program was part of Operation SNAG, also known as 'spring-narcotics-arrest and grab,' according to Manchester police Sgt. Sandy Ficara. … During the operation, East Central Narcotics along with the assistance of federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents arrested Daniel Cote on charges of illegally manufacturing steroids and selling them online."

"Pill-Popping" Parties Become Popular As More Teens Abuse Prescription Drugs. USA Today (6/13, Leinwand) reports drug counselors across the USA "are beginning to hear about…pill-popping parties, which are part of a rapidly developing underground culture that surrounds the rising abuse of prescription drugs by teens and young adults. It's a culture with its own lingo: Bowls and baggies of random pills often are called 'trail mix,' and on Internet chat sites, collecting pills from the family medicine cabinet is called 'pharming.' … To try to reduce the supply of prescription drugs on the black market, authorities have shut down several 'pill mills' — where doctors prescribe inordinate amounts of narcotics — as well as Internet pharmacies that ship drugs with little medical consultation, says Catherine Harnett, chief of demand reduction for the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA)."

Tennessee Ranked Nation's Third-Highest State Encountering Meth "Scourge." In a story titled, "The Ground War Against Meth," Adweek (6/12) writes, "Methamphetamines have hit Tennessee hard. Incidents at labs where the drug is cooked using ingredients found at the nearest pharmacy reached 850 last year, including explosions and seizures, making the state the third highest in the country to experience the scourge, according to Drug Enforcement Administration figures. When the Partnership for a Drug-Free America asked The Buntin Group, a small Nashville agency, to develop a pro-bono campaign to fight meth, shop officials there knew they needed more powerful weapons than just TV and print ads to reach the state's more rural areas."

MLB Suspends Grimsley For Using Human Growth Hormone. The AP (6/13) reports pitcher Jason Grimsley "was suspended 50 games by Major League Baseball on Monday, less than a week after federal agents raided his home during an investigation into performance-enhancing drugs. Commissioner Bud Selig's office suspended Grimsley for violating baseball's Joint Drug Prevention and Treatment Program, based on his statements to authorities regarding human growth hormone."

Diamondbacks "Infuriated." USA Today (6/12, Nightengale) reports the Arizona Diamondbacks, "infuriated and embarrassed by reliever Jason Grimsley's involvement with steroids and human growth hormone, vow to release any player caught using illegal performance-enhancing drugs in the future," Diamondbacks managing general partner Ken Kendrick said. "Particularly unsettling, Kendrick said, was that Grimsley never informed the team he was being targeted as part of a probe into illegal drug use."

Nearly 2 Percent Of American Indian Population Said To Be Using Meth. The AP (6/12) reports, "Statistics on Indian meth use are scarce, but [a] survey found in 2004 that almost 2 percent of the American Indian population was using meth. Robert McSwain, deputy director of the Indian Health Service, told a congressional panel earlier this month that the rate of Indians using meth appears to have dramatically increased in the past five years. This poses a major problem for states and Indian reservations, Barton said, as some states have passed laws that essentially punish property owners for meth contamination. Some landlords -- including Indian housing authorities -- have been forced to pay for cleanup of meth labs, which can cost thousands of dollars."

DOJ_NMG_0033046

Afghanistan Seen As "Narco-State." In a story about the Afghan drug trade, the Christian Science Monitor (6/13, Baldauf) writes from Kabul, "Afghan officials and foreign diplomats increasingly call this central Asian country a 'narco-state,' as top officials find it more profitable to flout laws than enforce them. Very few major Afghan officials have been removed for involvement in drug trafficking, in part because of the lack of evidence, and in part because the country has only recently created special tribunals to handle major drug cases."

Some Violence In Afghanistan Seen As Attempt To Undermine Anti-Narcotics Campaign. The AP (6/12) reports from Kandahar that a "surge in fighting has killed about 550 people, mostly militants, since mid-May." U.S. Ambassador Ronald Neumann "said the rebels have stepped up attacks to scare away NATO. … Neumann said he also believes some of the violence is being caused by drug barons inciting fighting in an effort to destabilize the region and undermine the government's U.S.-backed counternarcotics campaign."

On its Web site, Voice of America (6/12) writes Neumann "told reporters that drug lords, mostly in Southern Afghanistan, hope the insurgency will effectively incapacitate Afghan President Hamid Karzai's counter-narcotics program. 'This year, President Karzai led a very strong policy to eradicate poppy. There were efforts by drug-dealers and terrorists together to prevent that,' he said."

Marshals Service Takes Over Operation Of Connecticut Trash Hauling Business. The AP (6/13, Apuzzo) reports, "After allegedly operating for years with the Mafia as its silent partner, southern Connecticut's largest garbage-hauling conglomerate started work this week backed by some new muscle: federal marshals." The AP continues, "In the largest federal business takeover in Connecticut history, authorities seized control Friday of 25 companies suspected of helping carve out mob-controlled garbage routes. Now marshals must lawfully run a business in an industry that prosecutors say has been dirty since the 1980s … 'We seize assets all the time, but running a business is something new for us here,' said U.S. Marshal John Bardelli." The AP adds, "Marshals spent the weekend at the Danbury compound that's home to businessman James Galante's trash empire. With Galante in prison and locked out of his more than 60 business and personal bank accounts, authorities must keep the trucks running and avoid letting the garbage pile up. … Galante's companies serve about 20 southern Connecticut and eastern New York towns. His transfer station handles about 80 percent of the region's garbage and his pickup businesses are among the most dominant in the area. … Federal prosecutors say the Genovese crime family ensured that dominance in exchange for quarterly payments of $30,000. … The companies are required by a court order to maintain their service. The marshals are there to ensure that happens, institute new accounting standards and sign off on every financial transaction the companies make."

Suspect In Abortion Clinic Bomb Plot Appears In Court. The Washington Post (6/13, B9, Castaneda) reports, "The Prince George's man charged with building a pipe bomb he allegedly wanted to use to attack a Greenbelt abortion clinic appeared in federal court yesterday wearing an antiabortion T-shirt." The Post continues, "On the front of Robert Weiler Jr.'s green shirt were the words 'Help Cure Abortion.' On the back was 'ABORTION: The leading cause of death in America,' as well as writing that said abortion claims 1,200,000 lives annually." The Post adds, "Weiler, 25, said little during his initial court appearance in Greenbelt before U.S. Magistrate Judge Charles B. Day. Assistant U.S. Attorney Bryan E. Foreman asked Day to order Weiler to remain in custody, saying the serious charges against him make him a flight risk. … Weiler did not enter a plea, and his attorney, Assistant Public Defender Michael Citara Manis, said Weiler waived his right to a detention hearing. Day scheduled a preliminary hearing for June 22, and until then Weiler will remain in custody. … Weiler is charged with four federal offenses, including possession of an unregistered destructive device and possession of a stolen firearm. Each carries a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison."

IMMIGRATION:

Sensenbrenner, Tancredo Criticize Senate Immigration Bill. The Washington Times (6/13, Hurt, 90K) reports, "The Senate's immigration-reform bill grants broad amnesty to illegal aliens and is even worse than previously thought, say House Republicans who have read the 850-page Senate bill and must approve any final legislation that Congress sends President Bush." House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., "said of the bill that was largely penned by Sens. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, and John McCain," Arizona Republican, "The more people see of this Senate bill, the less they like it." He also said "allowing illegals to collect Social Security benefits based on past illegal work, for instance, is 'outrageous.'" Also, Rep. Tom Tancredo "said he met last week with a group of hotel executives from Marriott International Inc. who favor increased immigration to bring them more cheap labor to work as hotel maids. He told them about the consultation requirement."

DOJ_NMG_0033047

Court Nixes Colorado Immigration Ballot Initiative. USA Today (6/13, Kenworthy, 2.31M) reports Colorado "had been planning a showdown over a ballot initiative to prohibit illegal immigrants from receiving some government services. But the Colorado Supreme Court on Monday rejected the controversial measure, ruling 5-2 that it violates a constitutional requirement that initiatives deal with just one subject." Even "without the measure on the November ballot, Colorado voters are likely to remain at the center of the USA's boisterous immigration debate. The contentious issue could be a factor in competitive elections here for governor, Congress and control of the Legislature." GOP consultant Katy Atkinson said, "It's an issue that kind of exploded here. This will still be an issue, especially in federal races and the governor's race."

TAX:

Nevada Man Sentenced To 4 Years In Prison For Tax Fraud. WebCPA.com (6/12) reports, "More than 2,000 false income and trust tax returns later, a Nevada man has been sentenced to four-and-a-half years in prison. R. Scot Stokes, of Henderson, Nev., was sentenced to 54 months for conspiring to defraud the United States and conspiring to commit mail and wire fraud, in connection with the promotion of a tax and investment fraud scheme, the Department of Justice and the Internal Revenue Service announced." WebCPA notes, "In February 2005, he pleaded guilty to conspiracy and admitted that the filing of false returns had resulted in a loss of federal tax revenue between $7 million and $10 million." Stokes also "said that he participated in fraudulent investment schemes that caused customers to lose between $2.5 million and $5 million."

Sloan Says Estate Tax Repeal Would Hurt The "Small Rich." In his "Deals" column in the Washington Post (6/13, D2, 744K), Allan Sloan writes, "When the Senate turned down President Bush's bid to repeal the estate tax permanently last week, it actually did a favor for tens of thousands of moderately well-off households -- the 'small rich,' if you prefer. That's because such households would be worse off under the full repeal scheduled for 2010 (which Bush wants to make permanent) than they would be under the 2009 rules, which are more favorable for estates than today's rules." Sloan adds that lawmakers should not "benefit a handful of very rich people by eliminating the estate tax 2010-style at the expense of the small rich and everyone else. We've already made a major mistake by allowing the alternative minimum tax…to hit the middle and upper-middle classes but not the truly wealthy. Let's try not to make that same mistake with the estate tax."

WPost Laments Need For Wolf's Proposed Tax Code Commission. An editorial in the Washington Post (6/13, A20, 744K) says, "The political system is proving itself incapable of addressing hard budgetary questions even as the time to act grows shorter. … Into this standoff comes Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.) with a proposal for a base-closure-style commission to beat all commissions. It would look at the tax code and the array of entitlement programs and produce a set of recommendations, decided by a two-thirds vote, to put them on a fiscally sustainable course. … Its recommendations would come before Congress for an up-or-down vote, although the president or either chamber's budget committee would also be able to submit alternatives." The Post says the Wolf proposal "is laudable in some ways, disturbing in others." The Post says lawmakers "should look at Mr. Wolf's proposal and feel embarrassed that it has come to this."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Expected To Approve $94.5 Billion Supplemental Spending Bill. The Washington Post (6/13, Weisman, Murray, 744K) reports the House "is expected to approve a record-breaking $94.5 billion emergency spending bill today to fund the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, Gulf Coast hurricane relief, border security and avian flu preparation. With Senate passage expected later in the week, the bill would push the cost of the Iraq war to nearly $320 billion, according to the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service." The "cost of the war may be escalating, but don't expect many lawmakers to stand against a measure to fund military operations." The real debates "will begin after the spending bill is on its way to Bush. On Thursday, the House will get to a long-delayed day of discussions on Iraq and the fight against terrorism, taking up a resolution to urge 'continued resolve by the United States as it moves forward toward achievement of' stability in Iraq." The Senate, "as it considers its annual defense policy bill, will be having a similar discussion, thanks to an amendment by Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) calling for Bush to reach agreement with Iraq on a schedule for troop withdrawals this year."

Schwab Says US Eager For WTO Agreement, Not "Watered-Down" Compromise. On her first day as US trade representative, the Washington Post (6/13, D1, Blustein, 744K) reports Susan Schwab "promptly made it clear that she views her appointment in much different terms than Washington's chattering classes," who have "dismissed her as something of a caretaker because of the way President Bush nominated her." In an interview with the Post, Schwab said, "The fact that the president chose to announce my nomination the same day as Ambassador Portman's was announced was evidence that the president wanted to send a message—that he wanted a seamless transition and continued high priority on trade." To "underscore the point," she emphasized that she plans "to stick resolutely to the position Portman staked out" at the ongoing Doha round of the World Trade Organization. The administration is "eager for an agreement that would sharply lower trade barriers" among the WTO's members, especially in farm products, and "is not interested in a watered-down compromise of the sort some countries are pushing," Schwab told the Post.

DOJ_NMG_0033048

Conservatives Pressure Bush To End Probe Of OSC Official. The Hill (6/13, Bolton) reports a "group of prominent conservatives have signed a letter to President Bush aimed at calling off an investigation of Scott Bloch, the administration official tasked with protecting the rights of federal workers." Clay Johnson III, "the deputy director for management at the Office of Management and Budget (OMB), ordered the Office of Personnel Management (OPM) to investigate Bloch in response to a complaint filed last year by several anonymous career employees at the Office of Special Counsel, which Bloch heads." Several conservatives "behind the letter to Bush say that administration officials are trying to pressure Bloch to resign his post because he doesn't believe that sexual orientation should be considered akin to race and religion as a class of civil-rights protection and this view has sparked controversy within his office and Congress." The "potential dispute between social-conservative leaders and the Bush administration comes at a time when GOP strategists are trying to boost support among the conservative wing of the party in preparation for the midterm election." Among the conservative leaders who signed the letter were Tony Perkins, Paul Weyrich, and the Rev. Louis Sheldon.

Before Joining White House Staff, Zinsmeister Blasted Clintons, Gore. The Washington Post (6/13, A19, Baker, 744K) reports, "Bill Clinton is a 'virtuoso deceiver' and Hillary Rodham Clinton a 'true chameleon' guilty of 'self-serving behavior, comparative radicalism, and dubious personal morality.' Al Gore is a 'mad dog' known to 'foam at the mouth.' John McCain is given to 'showboating.' And Jacques Chirac, Nelson Mandela, Gerhard Schroeder and Kofi Annan are all 'feckless fools.' Says who? President Bush's new chief domestic policy adviser." The Post adds, "While most White House aides carefully trim their public commentary, they can't take back what they said before arriving in the West Wing, and few in this day and age arrive with a more provocative paper trail than Karl Zinsmeister, who started his new job yesterday. For a dozen years until his appointment, Zinsmeister held forth on all manner of issues and personalities as editor in chief of the American Enterprise Institute's magazine. … A review of years of articles reveals a formidable thinker with a powerful sense of what he considers right and wrong." For example, "as Zinsmeister sees it, racial profiling by the police makes sense; the military, if anything, treats terrorist suspects too gently; and casual sex has led to wrecked cities, violence and 'endless human misery.' … Although Zinsmeister wrote admiringly of Bush, his future boss was not exempt from remonstration when he seemed to stray." Zinsmeister "chided candidate Bush for promising he would make it easier for legal immigrants to bring in relatives and questioned whether incumbent Bush 'actually has a soft spot for big government.'"

Budget Deficit Down 16.6% From Last Year. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Solomon, Walsh, 2.11M) reports, "Surging individual and corporate income-tax receipts in May continued to help the federal government shrink the budget deficit to $227 billion for the first eight months of the fiscal year, down 16.6% from the same period a year earlier." The Federal government "did run a larger monthly budget deficit of $42.8 billion in May, widening 21% from $35.4 billion a year earlier." However, "economists said that increase was a quirk of the calendar that shifted some federal program payments into May and from accounting changes that increased the cost of subsidized student loans."

Lobby Firms Paid For 90 Congressional Trips Over 2000-05. The Hill (6/13, Snyder) reports, "Lobbying firms and lobbyists were listed as paying all or part of the costs for 90 congressional trips taken between 2000 and 2005, according to a new report by the Center for Public Integrity, Northwestern University's Medill News Service and American Public Media." Lobbyists and lobbying firms "are not allowed under congressional ethics rules to pay for congressional travel." The "total cost of the trips was roughly $145,000."

NYTimes Says Congress Won't Reform Abuse Of Free Trips. The New York Times (6/13, 1.19M) editorializes that even "in Congress's own sloppy paperwork, the bottom line for junketeering looks shameful: Over just five and a half years, lawmakers and members of their staffs went off on 23,000 'fact-finding' trips worth almost $50 million, with the tab picked up by private sponsors intent on capturing legislative access and favors. Expense-paid fact finding proved particularly irresistible in Paris, the destination of more than 200 trips, Hawaii (150) and Italy (140)." The Times adds, "Unfortunately, this Congress will soon reaffirm its addiction to special-interest junketeering when it strikes a cosmetic deal on ethics reform that does little to end the all-too-clear abuses."

DOJ_NMG_0033049

Pelosi Takes Case For Ousting Jefferson From Key Panel To Black Media. Roll Call (6/13, Kornacki) reports the "fight over the Ways and Means Committee seat held by Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) is now playing out on the airwaves and in the pages of publications aimed at blacks, as House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) seeks to dispel the notion that she's enforcing a double standard by demanding that Jefferson step down prior to any criminal charges being filed against him." Unless Jefferson "changes course and leaves Ways and Means on his own, the Louisianan is expected to be booted from the exclusive committee Thursday night — an extraordinary step encouraged by Pelosi, who first called on Jefferson to leave the tax-writing panel three weeks ago 'in the interest of upholding the high ethical standards of the Democratic Caucus.'" Pelosi "appeared on the radio show of Joe Madison, who calls himself 'the Black Eagle.' She also hosted a conference call with black reporters and sat for a one-on-one session with a nationally known black columnist."

Wickham Says Jefferson Should Step Down From Ways And Means Panel. DeWayne Wickham writes in USA Today (6/13, 2.31M) that the Congressional Black Caucus' expected defense of Rep. William Jefferson as the House Democratic Caucus meets Thursday to decide whether he should be stripped of his seat on the Ways and Means Committee "is a fight that shouldn't happen." The CBC has "denounced the effort to oust Jefferson from the committee, saying such a move against an unindicted member of Congress is unprecedented. As defenses go, that's a pretty weak one." Wickham adds that Jefferson "should acquiesce to Pelosi's demand that he step down from the committee whose membership he is accused of abusing. If such a request is unprecedented, it is also long overdue."

Supporters Rally To Hoyer In Wake Of Murtha Challenge. The Hill (6/13, Hearn) reports allies of Rep. Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) "rushed to his defense Monday as the minority whip faced a challenge from Rep. Jack Murtha (D-Pa.) for the post of majority leader, should Democrats win control of the House in November." Hoyer's backers "expressed concern that the race would hurt their ability to reach voters on policy issues." Rep. Barney Frank said, "I regret that we're going to have this contest. It will be portrayed in the media as a sign of Democratic disorder. It will distract attention from Democrats' efforts to win back the House." The Hill adds a Democratic member "who is backing Hoyer said that the whip was surprised by Murtha's announcement and had been 'playing catch-up' all weekend by calling colleagues." Many Democrats "were curious what role House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) may have had in Murtha's decision. Murtha and Pelosi are close allies."

Roll Call (6/13, Kornacki) reports "there are no signs that Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) will take any steps — publicly or privately — to steer her party away from a potentially divisive leadership fight as a crucial election approaches." Pelosi is "considered the only Democrat with the clout to back Murtha off his challenge, but on Monday she remained unavailable for comment, the same approach she took Friday, when Murtha floored his colleagues by declaring his intention to challenge Hoyer for Majority Leader if the party takes back the House."

Murtha Says He Would Provide "Change In Direction" As Leader. Rep. John Murtha said on MSNBC's Hardball (6/12), "I believe that the public -- Democrats in particular throughout the country -- have been way ahead of the Congress, and some of the members have kind of hung back for one reason or another. I think it's absolutely imperative -- there's no more important issue to this country than the war. That's why I got involved in the majority leader's race." Murtha added, "I think the American public want to change the direction. That's what I'm hearing. They don't want to go down this same road and just hear the same rhetoric over and over and over again. They want a change in direction, and a change in direction means some changes at the top so that these folks have something to look forward to."

Congressional Democrats To Host Town Hall Meeting On 2006 Platform. Roll Call (6/13, Billings) reports congressional Democratic leaders "on Wednesday afternoon will return to the issues that have largely defined their party over the past decade, hosting a town hall meeting to highlight the domestic priorities of their 2006 platform." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) "will headline the forum with other Congressional leaders at the Kennedy Recreation Center in Northwest Washington, D.C. The leaders are taking a different approach to laying out the third component of their platform, holding an issues discussion rather than a ceremonial event designed to energize the party faithful." Sources said "the leaders plan to promote Democratic plans on health care, energy, the economy and education, while challenging what they argue are the failed policies of the Bush administration and the GOP-led Congress."

Pelosi Says Time To Roll Out Democratic Agenda Has Arrived. The Hill (6/13, Hearn) reports with Republicans "seeking to define Democrats by their votes on such hot-button issues as gay marriage, the estate tax and flag burning," House Minority Leader Pelosi (D-Calif.) is arguing that Democrats need to tell voters about themselves before Republicans succeed in doing it for them." Pelosi said the

DOJ_NMG_0033050

"the time to criticize the Republicans' 'culture of corruption,' a Democratic refrain for nearly a year, is at an end," and Democrats "need to begin promoting their own vision of America." Pelosi said, "Now it's time to talk about us. Enough of the Republicans. It's time for us to talk about what are the priorities we'd like to see addressed, if we have the opportunity." The Hill adds Democrats "have been struggling for months to devise a unified message to take to voters, debating whether to be general or detailed, to come out early or late, or to present a succinct list of points like the GOP's 1994 Contract With America. Pelosi has been seen as favoring an early message, while Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) and Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), who head up the campaign committees for House and Senate Democrats, have argued for focusing on Republican misdeeds." Pelosi "outlined three areas where Democrats would seek to differentiate themselves from Republicans: integrity, civility and accountability. If Democrats were to take control of the House in November, their first actions would focus on promoting those values, she said." The "three themes are similar to the message Democrats ran on in 2004, when they lost two House seats in part because of redistricting in Texas that defeated five Democratic incumbents." But "perhaps more important, Pelosi is vowing to run the House — a body of Congress marked by intense partisanship for decades — in a bipartisan fashion."

Energy Department Informs 1,500 Workers Hacker May Have Accessed Personal ID. The AP (6/13, Hebert) reports Energy Department officials "have informed nearly 1,500 individuals that their Social Security numbers and other information may have been compromised when a hacker gained entry to a department computer system eight months ago, a spokesman said Monday." The workers, "mostly contract employees, worked for the National Nuclear Security Administration, a semiautonomous agency within the department that deals with the government's nuclear weapons programs." The computer theft "occurred last September, but Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman and his deputy, Clay Sell, were not informed of it until last week."

Voinovich Bill Aimed At Strengthening Performance Appraisal System. The Washington Post (6/13, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that Sen. George Voinovich today plans to offer a bill that would "require federal managers to provide their employees with a written performance evaluation each year and would prohibit pay raises for employees rated as less than successful." Voinovich "said his bill would strengthen the employee performance appraisal system and help lay the foundation for an overhaul of federal pay." The Post adds, "Voinovich's bill appears designed to find middle ground between proponents and opponents of performance-based pay for the federal workforce."

Byrd Becomes Longest-Serving Senator. Sen. Robert Byrd yesterday became the longest serving senator in US history. The Washington Post (6/13, A6, Babington, 744K) reports that Byrd "marked his 17,327th day in the Senate by visiting his wife's grave and then listening to several colleagues praise his career." Byrd "left the floor without speaking, struggling to maintain his composure." ABC World News Tonight (6/12, story 12, :35, Gibson, 8.78M) and NBC Nightly News (6/12, story 9, 2:35, Reid, 9.87M) also reported on Byrd.

Bush Daughter Moving To Manhattan. The Washington Post (6/13, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable Source" column that President Bush's daughter Barbara "has pulled up stakes for Manhattan, sources confirmed yesterday. What the First Daughter has planned for NYC remains unknown; the White House maintains a firm policy of not commenting about the twins' personal lives."

Pentagon's Small Institute Of Heraldry Creates All Presidential Seals, Plaques. The New York Times (6/13, Eckholm, 1.19M) reports on the Institute of Heraldry, the government's chief guardian of insignia and heraldic tradition. The Institute of Heraldry, "located for historical reasons within the Army, has a budget of $2.3 million and 24 employees, including four well-schooled 'heraldic designers.' But the handiwork of this little office has had an outsize influence on the public face of the military and the government. All plaques bearing presidential or vice-presidential seals, as seen on news conference lecterns and the bulkhead of Air Force One, are hand-sculpted and painted here."

WSJournal Criticizes Hayden Testimony. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/13, 2.11M) says "newly minted CIA Director Michael Hayden" has "done the Bush Administration a huge disservice by reinforcing the Democrats' 'Bush lied' theme in his confirmation testimony." Hayden's testimony, "along with his subsequent failure to follow through on promises to correct the record, do not make for an auspicious, truth-telling start at CIA."

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Continue Slump On Interest Rate, Growth Worries. ABC World News Tonight (6/12, story 9, :15, Gibson, 8.78M) reports, "On Wall Street today, investor worries about rising interest rates and economic growth pushed stocks down, again as last week's sell-off continued. The Dow Jones Industrial Average was down another 99 points to close at 10,792. On the Nasdaq, stocks were down nearly 44 points [to close at 2091.32.]"

DOJ_NMG_0033051

Also, says the New York Times (6/13, Bajaj, Peters, 1.19M), the Standard & Poor's 500-stock "index fell 1.3 percent, erasing all of its gains for the year and closing at its lowest level since November." But the damage was far worse in some other parts of the world. Trading at the Colombian stock exchange was briefly halted after its benchmark index fell more than 10 percent. Mexico's benchmark stock index fell 4.3 percent, its biggest one-day decline in more than three years. Markets in India, Brazil and Hungary also tumbled.'" The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Browning, 2.11M), Washington Post (6/13, Masters, 744K) and USA Today (6/13, Krantz, 2.31M), among other sources, also report on the market.

Fed Officials Continue To Sound "Inflation Alarms." USA Today (6/13, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports, "Federal Reserve policymakers continued to sound inflation alarms Monday, strengthening expectations that they will raise interest rates for a 17th-straight time when they meet this month. 'The recent news on inflation troubles me,' Cleveland Fed President Sandra Pianalto said in a speech to members of the Broadcast Cable Financial Management Association in Orlando." She "noted the so-called core consumer price index, which excludes volatile food and energy prices, rose more than 3% at an annual pace during the first three months of 2006." Board Gov. Susan Bies also "said inflation data have been coming in high. She said the economy is growing rapidly, while energy prices are high -- factors that could add to already elevated price pressures."

Dummar Takes Another Shot At Claiming Hughes Estate. The Wall Street Journal (6/13, Karp) reports, "Melvin Dummar had long since given up on getting a share of the late billionaire Howard Hughes's fortune. And for good reason: In 1978, Mr. Dummar became a national joke when a Las Vegas jury ruled that the basis for his claim -- a handwritten will that surfaced mysteriously -- was fake. … 'I've never really gotten over it,' Mr. Dummar says. 'For 30 years, everybody just laughed at me and treated me like some kind of criminal, a forger. Until a few months ago, I thought it was a lost cause.' … But now Mr. Dummar is back, seeking another day in court and what he considers his rightful share of Mr. Hughes's estate. In a lawsuit filed yesterday, Mr. Dummar claims to have new evidence and a compelling new witness: a pilot who says he flew the late Mr. Hughes to a brothel near where Mr. Dummar claims he happened on to him." The Journal continues, "With the suit filed yesterday in federal district court in Salt Lake City, Mr. Dummar began another chapter in one of the wildest estate battles in U.S. history. … When the eccentric billionaire died in 1976, Mr. Dummar (pronounced Doo-MAR) emerged as an improbable heir. He said a will delivered to a gas station he ran in Utah entitled him to $156 million, a reward for the night in 1967 when he said he had found a dazed man face down on a desert road and drove him to Las Vegas. That man, Mr. Dummar claimed, told him he was Howard Hughes. … But Mr. Dummar's tale fell apart at trial. And he got nothing but a dubious place in history, folklore and Hollywood, thanks to the Oscar-winning 1980 film 'Melvin and Howard.' … Now 61 years old and eking out a living delivering meat along those same desolate Nevada roads, Mr. Dummar is hoping for a real-life sequel. His co-stars this time include an author who once was a Federal Bureau of Investigation agent; a former Hughes pilot who is breaking his silence; a prostitute with a diamond-encrusted tooth; and a lawyer who has a weekly radio show about estate planning. … The lawsuit is based on new evidence that purportedly corroborates Mr. Dummar's claim that Mr. Hughes indeed was in the desert that late-December 1967 night. The defendants are two elderly Hughes beneficiaries: William Lummis, the main family heir, and Frank Gay, a former Hughes executive. Mr. Dummar alleges fraud, unjust enrichment and racketeering during the probate case, and requests $156 million, plus interest since 1978, and punitive damages."

Conflict Questions Raised About Getty Book Deal. The Los Angeles Times (6/13, Frammolino, Felch) reports, "Former J. Paul Getty Trust chief Barry Munitz agreed to pay retired Getty board Chairman David Gardner nearly $300,000 to write a coffee-table book after Gardner left the foundation's board in 2004. … Gardner was hired to write the book just months after he intervened on Munitz's behalf to help the chief executive secure a five-year contract rather than the one-year extension some board members favored." The Times continues, "The book deal came after years of pressure from Gardner on Munitz and other Getty officials to find a way to compensate him for his service on the board, records and interviews show. The will of J. Paul Getty, whose oil fortune financed the educational trust that bears his name, specifically stipulates that board members are to serve without pay. … Plans for the book, which was to commemorate the Getty's 25th anniversary, were canceled in March, a month after Munitz resigned amid turmoil at the nonprofit foundation — but not before Gardner had collected $178,000 over 19 months for little work." The Times adds, "Gardner says he produced a rough outline during that time but did not conduct interviews or begin writing. He blamed his lack of progress on the trust, which he said did not provide the necessary cooperation. … Internal Getty documents show that Munitz and his staff were discussing a book deal for Gardner in 2003, while Gardner was chairman and Munitz was negotiating his own contract. Around the same time, Munitz also spoke directly to Gardner about writing a book after he stepped down as chairman, according to two former Getty officials familiar with the discussions. Citing ongoing investigations of the Getty, the officials asked not to be identified. … Munitz and Gardner, a former president of the University of California, deny any impropriety in the book deal. .. Several experts on the laws governing nonprofits, however, said that discussions of the book deal while Gardner was chair created a potential conflict of interest, because both men stood to benefit personally from the official actions of the other."

DOJ_NMG_0033052

Webb, Miller Stump For Votes On Eve Of Virginia Senate Primary. Virginia voters will go to the polls today to decide a winner in the U.S. Senate primary race between Democrats James Webb and Harris Miller. The winner will take on Virginia Sen. George Allen (R) in November. The Washington Post (6/13, B1, Shear, Jenkins, 744K) reports that Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry (D) appeared at a rally with Webb yesterday in Arlington County, VA. Appearing before "about 250 people," Kerry "heartily endorsed Webb, President Ronald Reagan's former Navy secretary, saying that the Senate needs the 'confident leadership' and 'independent thinking' that Webb has offered during the campaign." Miller, meanwhile, "spent the afternoon making last-minute phone calls to prospective voters and later held a rally at his Northern Virginia headquarters in McLean." The candidates "continued to run campaign ads touting their ability to defeat" Allen. Miller's spots, "made possible by his investing $1 million of his personal wealth, hammer Webb on his Republican past."

USA Today (6/13, Lawrence, 2.31M) relates that a number of Senate Democrats, including Kerry, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, DSCC Chairman Charles Schumer and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, have said that Webb "is their 'best hope' to gain a seat and hobble Allen's White House ambitions. Mark Plotkin, a political analyst for Washington's WTOP-radio, calls the senators' intervention 'unprecedented.' In Webb's Renaissance-man résumé, his GOP past and his macho persona, Plotkin says, top Democrats see 'political nirvana' -- the return of white, male, rural and military voters to the Democratic Party." Miller, meanwhile, has been endorsed by The Washington Post's editorial board, which "called him 'better-briefed, better-focused and more thoughtful' than Webb." The candidates "disagree on a few issues, but the main contrast between them is style. Webb drives a camouflage-painted Jeep and campaigns in combat boots that belong to his son, a Marine bound for Iraq in fall." Miller says of himself: "I've been accused of being a policy wonk. … I plead guilty. U.S. senators are supposed to talk about policy."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/13, Chaddock, 61K) reports that while Senate Democratic leaders such as Schumer have backed Webb, "it's not clear that Virginia Democrats expected to turn out in Tuesday's primary election got the memo. At an annual dinner on Friday, not a hint of applause from Arlington County Democrats greeted Mr. Webb's announcement that 13 Democratic senators had 'stood up and endorsed my candidacy.'" Miller, "who was chairing the Fairfax County Democratic Committee when Mr. Webb, a Reagan Democrat, joined the Reagan administration," has the backing of many of the rank-and-file state Democrats, including Margaret Whipple, "who chairs the state Senate Democratic Caucus." Whipple said, "I've known [Mr. Harris] for 20-plus years. He's a Democrat whose values I share." But "if Webb were to pull off a primary victory, he could expect a surge of national funding to defeat Senator Allen, who is also a probable 2008 presidential contender."

The Hill (6/13, Blake) notes that Schumer's "rare, last-minute backing of" Webb "is seen as an indication that Webb would receive more national attention and help than Miller would in the Democrats' quest to unseat Allen. Indeed, national Democrats aren't saying Webb is the better candidate so much as that he is the candidate better able to defeat Allen. A Rasmussen poll from April shows Webb trailing Allen by 20 points, while an earlier Zogby poll showed him behind by seven. Webb was closer than Miller in both polls." The Cook Political Report's Jennifer Duffy "said the decisionmakers at the DSCC 'are sticking their neck out' for Webb." Miller "touts support from dozens of state lawmakers, mayors and council members and said that, while national Democrats throw their support to Webb, local politicians have been hitting the ground for him. 'Chuck Schumer's a good senator for New York City, and Harry Reid's a nice senator for Las Vegas,' Miller said. 'But I have the support of the people here in Virginia, and those are the people that count.'"

Schumer's Endorsement Of Webb Rankles Some Democratic Fundraisers. The Washington Post (6/13, A9, Cillizza, 744K) reports that while it's unclear whether Schumer's backing of Webb "will help move votes," it "did move money -- away from Schumer and the" DSCC. The Post relates, "The most immediate fallout of Schumer's endorsement was the relocation of a post-primary fundraiser for the DSCC that was scheduled to be at the home of former lieutenant governor Donald S. Beyer Jr. and his wife, Megan. The longtime Democratic fundraisers are Miller supporters. The Beyers begged off after Schumer's move, for which they received no advance notice. The event will be at another venue, but is likely to bring in considerably less money as irritated Miller backers join the Beyers in taking a pass on helping the DSCC." Beyer "said the DSCC should have stayed out. 'They've dug a hole that was unnecessary,' he said. 'If Harris wins, they are going to look ridiculous. They will have irritated an awful lot of people.'"

DOJ_NMG_0033053

Allen Will Hold Huge Fundraising Lead Over Democratic Winner. The Washington Times (6/13, McLaughlin, 90K) notes, "Both campaigns have scrambled to raise money. As of May 25, Mr. Miller had raised $1.2 million -- of which $675,000 is his own money -- and Mr. Webb has raised $547,000 -- which includes a $100,000 loan. The winner of today's primary will face an uphill battle against Mr. Allen, who has more than $7 million in his campaign war chest."

GOP Seen As Profiting From Good News Week. In his Roll Call column (6/13), David Winston says, "That sound you heard all over Washington, D.C., last Wednesday morning was Republicans breathing a huge collective sigh of relief that Republican Brian Bilbray had defeated Democrat Francine Busby in the special election to fill California's 50th district House seat. That GOP victory, however, was just the first in a series of political and policy events that challenged the prevailing conventional wisdom and sent Democrats scurrying to their spin doctors for something — anything — positive to say about what quickly turned into a 72-hour political nightmare." The "loss of the special election was only the beginning of a bad week for Democrats. By Thursday, they once again found themselves on the defensive when good news arrived from Iraq — news too big to be ignored. Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the most wanted terrorist in Iraq, had been killed by U.S. military air strikes on the same day that the new Iraqi government had filled its last and most important cabinet posts, Defense and Interior." But if Thursday "was bad for Democrats, by Friday, things had gotten even worse. Rumors of serious rifts in the House Democratic leadership burst into the open Friday as an apparently clairvoyant Murtha announced his intention to seek the Majority Leader's job if Democrats win the House in November."

Bell Seen As Having Uphill Struggle In Texas Gubernatorial Race. The Washington Times (6/13, Aynesworth, 90K) reports Texas Democrats "emerged from their convention here over the weekend with conviction and verve, but they still face an uphill battle to take back the governor's mansion." Former Rep. Chris Bell, "who was gerrymandered out of his district in 2002, is the party's choice to oppose Republican Gov. Rick Perry." Bell "said he could win if the party faithful would stick together. The Houston Democrat certainly needs that, but his own campaign workers concede that few voters have ever heard of Mr. Bell, making name recognition a dominant theme in the campaign."

Eleven Senators May Run for Presidency In '08. Roll Call (6/13, Billings) reports with "an extraordinary 11 sitting Senators seriously eyeing a bid for the White House in 2008, both parties are already dealing with logistical and personality headaches as the lawmakers use the chamber as a testing ground for their competing agendas." At least "five Republican and six Democratic Senators are currently looking at the idea of mounting presidential campaigns — the most in recent memory. And, at least one other Member of Congress, Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), is considered a possible candidate." On the Democratic side, "Sens. Evan Bayh (Ind.), Joseph Biden (Del.), Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), Chris Dodd (Conn.), Russ Feingold (Wis.) and John Kerry (Mass.) already are viewed as committed contenders. Despite his protests, Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) is also seen by some observers as a possible candidate, although many believe he is disinclined to run in 2008." The early Republican field "includes Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.), who is retiring after this Congress, as well as Sens. John McCain (Ariz.), Chuck Hagel (Neb.), Sam Brownback (Kan.) and George Allen (Va.)." Aides and Senators "from both parties said managing the presidential hopefuls' egos will be tricky at a time when both parties are banking on heightened unity to gain an election-year advantage on the issues of the day. But those sources are quick to note that personalities always play a role in the Senate regardless of whether a lawmaker is aspiring for another office."

Kansas GOP Split Could Foreshadow 2008 Presidential Primary. The Los Angeles Times (6/13, Riccardi, 958K) reports former state Republican chairman Mark Parkinson "announced he was running for lieutenant governor — as a Democrat. He said he no longer felt welcome in the increasingly conservative Kansas Republican Party." Parkinson "became the third Republican politician in the last nine months to startle this red state by switching to the minority party. The other two are targeting GOP incumbents in the attorney general's office and in the state House of Representatives." Political observers "say the fracture within the Kansas GOP may foreshadow the future for the national party. The division between moderates and social conservatives is expected to define the contest for the party's 2008 presidential nomination." Moderates who "emphasize economic development and religious conservatives concerned with limiting abortion and gay rights have battled for more than a decade for control of the Kansas Republican Party, which dominates the state with 48% of registered voters. The remaining voters are split evenly between Democratic and Independent registration."

Laura Bush To Raise Funds For Santorum, Kean. The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/13, 423K) reports as Republican candidates "around the country avoid appearances with President Bush or Vice President Cheney, two in the Philadelphia area - U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania and Senate challenger Thomas H. Kean Jr. in

DOJ_NMG_0033054

New Jersey - welcome visiting Laura Bush today with open war chests." People "don't blame her for the war in Iraq, rising gasoline prices, or unpopular administration policies." Laura Bush is "scheduled to appear this morning at a fund-raising breakfast for Santorum at the Appleford Estate in Villanova. Santorum is hoping for 300 attendees and $400,000, according to spokeswoman Virginia Davis." Bush also is "to attend an afternoon reception for Kean at a law office in Lakewood, N.J., where the Kean campaign expects as many as 500 guests and at least $500,000 in contributions, which it will split with the New Jersey Republican Committee."

Study Finds Volunteerism Rising. The Washington Times (6/13, Hausner, 90K) reports that a recent study found that volunteerism is on the rise. A "federal study on state volunteerism, released yesterday by the Corporation for National and Community Service (CNCS)," found that "65.4 million (28.8 percent) of American adults volunteered last year. In every region and state, women volunteered at a higher rate than men and married people were more likely to donate time and resources than single people. The study also showed that more Americans 35 to 44 years old volunteered than any other age group."

WSJournal Says 2003 Principle Should Apply When Justices Hear Punitive Damages Case. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/13, 2.11M) says that when the Supreme Court laid down a marker on excessive punitive damages in the 2003 State Farm case, "we suggested it might take more than one try before courts at the lower level got the message. The high court has now agreed to hear an appeal in an Oregon case in which Philip Morris was dinged for punitive damages 97 times greater than the compensatory damages awarded in a smoker's death." The Supreme Court "acknowledged in State Farm that punitive damages may play a role to deter bad conduct. But it was also clear that they're not intended to cover damages to non-parties to these cases or to take account of the losing party's net worth. … The same would seem to apply here; the question is whether the new cast of players at the High Court will see it the same way."

El-Baradei Criticizes Iranian Data Gaps. While Iran continues to mull its response to an international incentives package in exchange for nuclear cubs, the New York Times (6/13, Sciolino, 1.19M) reports, "The chief of the International Atomic Energy Agency on Monday faulted Iran for failing to provide information crucial to understanding fully the nature and intent of its nuclear program." Mohamed El-Baradei said publicly that "his agency 'has not made much progress in resolving outstanding verification issues.' He added, 'I would continue to urge Iran to provide the cooperation needed to resolve these issues.'" El-Baradei "kept his comments on Iran short and declined to take questions from reporters. Still, he made it clear that he welcomed the initiative by the six nations, calling it a way 'to reach a comprehensive agreement that would address the need of the international community to establish confidence in the exclusively peaceful nature of Iran's nuclear program, while also simultaneously addressing Iran's security, technology and economic needs.'"

Meanwhile, Bloomberg (6/13, Tirone) notes, "El-Baradei said a US offer to join direct talks with Iran about security issues may provide an end to the stalemate over the Islamic Republic's atomic program."

Japan Skeptical About Sanctions Proposal. The Washington Post (6/13, A14, Faiola, Linzer, 744K) reports, "Despite months of pressure from Washington, Japan has become increasingly reluctant to join a Bush administration plan for sanctions against Iran if negotiations fail to resolve concerns over the country's nuclear program." Tokyo has hinted they "may not join in punitive measures unless there is a broad international consensus along the lines of a UN Security Council resolution or other measure backed by nations now reluctant to impose sanctions, such as China." The Post says a financial sanctions regime "depends strongly on Japanese participation. Without it, administration officials have calculated, the impact would significantly decrease." The Post goes on to report Secretary Rice and Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso "discussed the Iranian situation by telephone, agreeing to cooperate in resolving the standoff."

China Opposes Joint Statement; Russia Could Follow. The AP (6/13, Jahn) reports Beijing and Moscow "are holding back from a united message with Western powers to insist that Tehran halt uranium enrichment, a stance that could encourage Iranian defiance, diplomats said Monday." China is said to be "opposed to signing a joint statement and Russia was leaning against participating."

Iran Plan Said To Mirror Clinton-Era Pyongyang Overture. In an analytical piece, the Wall Street Journal (6/13, Solomon, 2.11M) reports, "As President Bush contemplates the possibility of nonproliferation talks with Iran, he runs some of the same risks he said the Clinton administration took when dealing with North Korea. Mr. Bush and his top aides were critical five years ago of the Clinton team's negotiating tactics with the regime in Pyongyang," and "now the Bush team has opened the door to the possibility of holding similar talks with Iran." According to the Journal, "Many counterproliferation experts support this evolving US approach, saying it is a more realistic and potentially sustainable than avoiding direct talks. They also see the White House's diplomatic U-turn as an unstated recognition of the limits of unilateral American power." The Carnegie Endowment's George Perkovich is quoted saying, "They were in the bunker at the White House, thinking, eventually, these countries would have to succumb to our power. ... But it turns out we can't do everything out there alone."

DOJ_NMG_0033055

Christopher Sees Parallels To Iranian Hostage Talks. Former Secretary of State Warren Christopher writes in the New York Times (6/13, 1.19M), "The welcome recent announcement that the United States is willing to join face-to-face talks with Iran rekindled memories of my own experiences, 25 years ago, as chief negotiator in the Iranian hostage crisis. The subject of that negotiation was the 52 American diplomats who were taken hostage in Tehran on Nov. 4, 1979. The result was their release, 444 days later, on the day of Ronald Reagan's inauguration in 1981. Since that day we have had no diplomatic relations and virtually no direct dialogue with Iran." He adds "there are lessons from our 1979-81 negotiations with Iran that can inform our efforts in 2006. First, we must be sure we are talking with the right people. One of the most frustrating dead ends we encountered in the hostage negotiations was learning that despite prolonged efforts to forge a settlement with President Abolhassan Bani-Sadr, he did not even have the power to move the hostages from one location to another, much less cause their release. If our 2006 negotiators study the vectors of power in Iran, they may be able to avoid such frustrations. … As in the hostage crisis, a military solution is unwise and probably infeasible."

Hamas, Fatah Gunmen Go On Rampage In Palestinian Territories. The New York Times (6/13, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports, "Hundreds of Palestinian security personnel loyal to" President Mahmoud Abbas "went on a rampage Monday night in the West Bank town of Ramallah, attacking the parliament and cabinet buildings controlled by his rivals in the Hamas-led government. The attack…came after Hamas gunmen attacked the Gaza headquarters of the Fatah-dominated security forces with rockets and grenades." According to the Times, "Mr. Abbas declared a state of emergency and ordered people off the streets on a chaotic and violent day."

Meanwhile, the Financial Times (6/13, Morris, Ben Hall) reports, "Hamas on Monday deferred a parliamentary motion to outlaw a national referendum called by Mr. Abbas for July 26 that would ask the electorate to vote on proposals that implicitly recognize Israel. Hamas...has declared the referendum illegal." The AP (6/12, Daraghmeh), Chicago Tribune (6/13, Greenberg, 643K) and Washington Post (6/13, A14, Wilson, 744K) run similar reports.

Rockets Lobbed At Israeli Towns; Generals Recommend Gaza Invasion. The Washington Times (6/13, Mitnick, 90K) reports, "Israel and Hamas seemed on the brink of abandoning a 17-month calm on Wednesday as Islamic militants lobbed rockets at Israeli towns and Israeli generals reportedly recommended an invasion of Gaza to snuff out the salvos, but officials and analysts think both sides will honor the informal cease-fire. … Both Israel and the Palestinian Authority face growing domestic pressure to launch retaliatory attacks. Seven Palestinians from one family were killed on a Gaza beach by an errant explosive, and the southern Israeli city of Sderot has come under frequent attack by Qassam rockets. So far, political leaders have resisted the temptation."

Israel Says Palestinians Not Killed By Israeli Shells. NBC Nightly News (6/12, story 6, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported on the deaths of seven Palestinians on a Gaza Beach after an Israeli-Palestinian military confrontation. NBC (Fletcher) added the "shocking pictures" have turned Huda Ghaliya "into a Palestinian symbol around the world. President Mahmud Abbas called her the daughter of the Palestinian people. But there is confusion as to what really happened. Friday afternoon, the Israeli army and Palestinian militants from Hamas had been exchanging rocket fire. Hamas immediately blamed Israel for the tragedy and called off a 16-month truce, swearing revenge. Israel said it regretted the loss of life and brought Huda's two wounded sisters and her brother to an Israeli hospital for treatment. But tonight, Israeli military sources tell NBC News they have examined shrapnel taken from Huda's siblings and they've confirmed that the shrapnel does not come from an Israeli artillery shell."

Blair, Olmert Push For "Negotiated" Solution. The Financial Times (6/13, Ben Hall) reports British Prime Minister Tony Blair "on Monday urged Israelis and Palestinians to pursue a negotiated settlement of their conflict, but did not endorse a unilateral Israeli solution in the event of a stalemate. Speaking in Downing Street after talks with" Israeli Premier Ehud Olmert, "Mr. Blair promised to give 'every support and every impetus we can from the international community' to ensure that talks could begin." For his part, Olmert "reiterated his willingness to work towards a negotiated solution, which he said was based on 'a generous compromise' by Israel. He would 'go a long way' to convincing the Palestinians that it was worthwhile entering talks, under conditions set out in the international road map. 'We are not impatient, therefore we are willing to give it some time,' Mr Olmert said, revealing that he would be meeting Mr Abbas within the next few weeks."

However, says the AP (6/12, Weizman), Olmert also said that "he would make 'every possible effort' to negotiate peace with the Palestinians but will act unilaterally without an agreement."

Expert Says North Korea Trying To Get US Attention. AFP (6/12, Parameswaran) reports, "North Korea's preparations for possible long-range missile tests -- its first in nearly a decade -- may be an attempt to grab the attention of a US government distracted by its nuclear row with Iran, experts said." A senior US official said in a weekend report that there were "'enough indications' to suggest that the Stalinist state was getting ready to test-fire an intercontinental ballistic missile, eight years after sending a missile over northern Japan. Current test preparations are reportedly far more advanced than on previous occasions when North Korea appeared to be gearing up for a missile launch."

DOJ_NMG_0033056

Coburn Meets With UN Deputy Secretary General. The Washington Times (6/13, Pisik, 90K) reports that Sen. Tom Coburn visited UN Deputy Secretary General Malloch Brown yesterday "to explain that Middle America does appreciate the work of the world body, they just want to see it better managed." Coburn met with brown "to rebut what he considered unfair criticism of the American people. 'I expressed disappointment on the lack of insight that was displayed in the speech given last week,' Mr. Coburn told reporters after meeting in Mr. Malloch Brown's office. 'The vast majority of Oklahomans believe in the function of the U.N. and recognize the positive contributions.' However, he added, the international organization still suffers from a lack of transparency and accountability."

Cuba Cuts Power To US Mission In Havana. The AP (6/12) reports that the State Department said yesterday that the Cuban government cut off electricity to the US diplomatic mission in Havana and "US requests for power to be restored have gone unanswered." The facility "has been operating with generator power." The AP adds, "Work at the mission continues, including interviews of refugees and outreach programs for the Cuban people, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said."

The Washington Times (6/13, Carter, 90K) reports, "The State Department called the power cut part of a campaign of harassment of US diplomats by the Cuban government. … The State Department said the harassment is thought to be the Cuban response to the U.S. Interests Section's 'outreach' on behalf of the Cuban people."

Islamic Leader In Somalia Seeks "Understanding" With US. Knight Ridder (6/13, Allam) reports that Somalian Islamic leader Sheik Sherif Ahmed said yesterday that he seeks "am understanding" with the US. Ahmed, whose Islamic Courts Union militia seized control of Mogadishu last week also "denied that his group is sheltering al-Qaida terrorists." Ahmed "told Knight Ridder that he doesn't plan full ties with the United States, and he dodged questions about his views on al-Qaida."

Roberts Says State Department's Disclosure Of Covert Program Made Somalia Efforts More Difficult. John B. Roberts II, who served in the Reagan White House, writes in the Washington Times (6/13, 90K) that under presidential authority, Washington "launched a covert action program relying on a coalition of secular Somali warlords called the Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counter-Terrorism" to contain al Qaeda in Somalia. Roberts adds that the success of these CIA-backed warlords in containing al Qaeda has been made more difficult "by State Department disclosure of the covert program. How CIA Director Michael Hayden and Deputy Director Steve Kappes handle the Nairobi station chief will be closely watched by CIA officers, especially in operations. This is the acid test of whether the new CIA is a risk-averse agency where creativity and daring will be rewarded." To send a message throughout CIA, Messrs. Hayden and Kappes should promote the Nairobi station chief instead of sacrificing him to appease critics in other agencies or Congress."

World Bank Says Indonesia Lacks Funds To Fight Bird Flu. The AP (6/13) reports Indonesia's fight against bird flu is "under-funded and poorly coordinated," the World Bank said, "urging the government to be more aggressive in culling fowl in infected areas." The bank, in a report to be released today to Indonesia's biggest aid donors, also said the Indonesian government needed to "improve surveillance of poultry stocks to better detect outbreaks of the disease and to modify its vaccination program." Indonesia estimated it will need $900 million over the next three years to fight the H5N1 virus, but has budgeted only $59 million for 2006.

Chinese Officials Divided Over Booming Auto Market. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (6/13, Fairclough, Oster, 2.11M) reports on china's auto market, noting that nearly 1,000 new cars hit the streets of Beijing each day, "crowding a city already choked with pollution. Levels of nitrogen dioxide currently exceed the World Health Organization's clean-air guidelines by 78%." The Journal adds, "The rise of the automobile highlights the wrenching balancing act China faces as it tries to join the ranks of modern consumer societies: improving living standards and creating jobs for the country's 1.3 billion people while keeping pollution and oil demand under control. Officials from China's central government are divided over how to proceed."

Russian TV Show Promises Seats In Parliament To Young People. A front page story in the Washington Post (6/13, A1, Finn, 744K) reports on a Russian television show called Political Factory on which a group of potential legislators, picked from obscurity, will compete to "join the Russian ruling class by October." In April, the Supreme Council of United Russia, the political party which controls legislatures at both the federal and regional levels, "decided that 20 percent of all candidates on party lists in future elections must be between 21 and 28 years of age. The move is part of efforts to broaden the party's membership beyond the stolid bureaucrats and businessmen who currently stuff its ranks -- many of them inspired not by ideological fervor but by the party's almost complete electoral dominance." On June 4," the original field of 60 was cut to 20, half of whom had no previous affiliation with United Russia or Young Guard, according to their questionnaires. … On June 27, five final winners will be chosen in Lipetsk and added to the party list. Three of those will almost certainly end up in parliament."

DOJ_NMG_0033057

US Urged To Avoid "Public Spitting Match" With Egypt. Jon B. Alterman, who directs the Middle East Program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, writes in the Washington Post (6/13, A21, 744K), "There are many in Washington who think that Egyptian politics turned around last spring because of President Bush's demonstrated resolve to promote political change in that country. They further believe that the leadership in Cairo reverted to its bad old ways when Bush's attention strayed. They are wrong on both counts. Profound change was never in the air in Egypt." The US "needs to continue to press for greater openness and participation in Egypt. … Our role should be to encourage and prod. Getting into a public spitting match with the Egyptian government would have precisely the opposite effect."

Kristof Calls For Debate On Effectiveness Of Foreign Aid. Nicholas Kristof writes in the New York Times (6/13, 1.19M) that Americans should not "shy away from a conversation about the effectiveness of [foreign] aid. The problems are real, but so are the millions of people alive today who wouldn't be if not for aid. In the end, if we have tough conversations about foreign aid, then I believe Americans will acknowledge the challenges -- and then, clear-eyed, agree to dig more deeply than ever, for that is simply the best way we have of asserting our own humanity."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Zarqawi Attack Put Jordan Hot On His Trail."
"Getty Book Deal Led To Questions Of Conflict."
"He's No Angel, He's A P.I."
"Rival U.S. Labs In Arms Race To Build Safer Nuclear Bomb."
"L.A. Convention Center To Get Major Hotel Tower."
"In Kansas, A Troubling Fissure For GOP."
"High Court Scrutinizing Capital Cases."

USA Today:
"Poll Sees A Boost For Bush, Iraq War."
"Prescription Drugs Find Place In Teen Culture."
"AFL-CIO Plans New Orleans Boom."

New York Times:
"Violence Erupts Among Factions Of Palestinians."
"Prisoners Gain In Suit Attacking Lethal Injection."
"U.S. Muslims Confront Taboo On Nursing Homes."
"Police Struggles In New Orleans Raise Old Fears."
"Dogs And Discriminating Noses Are Following New Career Paths."
"Oil, Politics And Bloodshed Corrupt An Iraqi City."

Washington Post:
"Violent Crime Rises In U.S."
"Hope Has Faded For Md. Publisher."
"Rail Car Problems Delay Metro Relief."
"Russian Party Asks Young: Who Wants To Be A Deputy?"
"Officials Detail Zarqawi's Last Hour."
"For Many Of Katrina's Young Victims, The Scars Are More Than Skin Deep."

Washington Times:
"Zarqawi Successor The New Target."
"Church Revisits Views On Gays."
"Air Marshals Warn Their Bullets Are Too Powerful."
"Ex-Morales Backer Decries Party Betrayal."
"Chinese Muslims Search For Sanctuary."
"The Social Butterflies Drawn To The Polo Match."

Detroit Free Press:
"Optimism In Tough Times."
"Wiretap Suit All About Power."
"NWA, Flight Attendants Ease Strike Fear With Talks."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Students' Scores Highlight Disparity."
"Water Squeeze Brings First ban."
"Guard's Arrival At Border Stifles Illegal Crossings."
"Worries Not For The Lack Of Rain."
"Court Bows To Science, Allows New Execution Appeals."

Houston Chronicle:
"Mystery Man Takes Al-Zarqawi's Place."
"Violent Crimes Rise 2.5% In '05."
"Jurors Complain Of Push To Convict."
"Pollutant Study Gives The County A Cleanup 'To-Do' List, Mayor Says."
"Tijuana's Poor Adore Flamboyant Mayor."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Tropical Storm Alberto; Alberto Preparations; Bush-War Cabinet; Zarqawi Replacement; Zarqawi Autopsy; Supreme Court-Death Penalty; NV-Judge Shot; Violent Crime; Stock Markets; US Soccer Team; Steelers QB Accident; Byrd-Longest Senate Tenure; Zoo Elephants.

DOJ_NMG_0033058

CBS: Tropical Storm Alberto; Alberto Forecast; Zarqawi's Replacement; Iraq Violence; Bush-Approval Ratings; Bush-War Cabinet; Gitmo Suicides; Canadian Terror Plot; Violent Crime; NC-Anti-Crime Program; Steelers QB Accident; Funeral-CBS Cameraman.
NBC: Tropical Storm Alberto; Alberto Preparations; Zarqawi Autopsy; Bush-War Cabinet; Violent Crime; Gaza-Palestinian Family; Steelers QB Accident; Type 2 Diabetes; Byrd-Longest Senate Tenure.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Tropical Storm Alberto; Bush-Camp David Meeting; Zarqawi Successor Named; NV-Judge Shooting.
CBS: Tropical Storm Alberto; Iraq Bombs; Iraq-CBS News Poll; Zarqawi Autopsy; Roethlisberger-Motorcycle Accident; Real Estate Prices.
NPR: Tropical Storm Alberto; ACLU-Warrantless Wiretap Suit; Zarqawi Successor Named; Wall Street; Dallas-Setser Convicted; Monster.Com-Stock Options.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Holds a video teleconference with the Iraqi Cabinet in Baghdad, Camp David; holds press availability, Rose Garden.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Speaks at a Santorum Victory Committee breakfast, Appleford Estate, Villanova, Pa.; speaks at a Kean-NJ Victory '06 Committee reception, Bathgate, Wegener and wolf, Lakewood, N.J.

US Senate: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 9:45 a.m. -- Meets for morning business. Highlights: After morning business, resumes consideration of S. 2766, Defense Authorization and pending amendment on successful mission to eliminate Zarqawi. 12:15 p.m. Roll call vote on Zarqawi Amendment. 3:30 p.m. Vote on motion to invoke cloture on nomination of Richard Stickler to be assistant secretary of labor for mine safety and health.

9:30 a.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on counterterrorism. State Department Counterterrorism Coordinator Henry A. Crumpton; retired Vice Adm. John Scott Redd, director, National Counterterrorism Center; John E. McLaughlin, School of Advanced International Studies; Daniel Benjamin, Center for Strategic and International Studies. Location: Room 419, Dirksen.

9:30 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Constitution, Civil Rights and Property Rights Subcommittee. Hearing on the need for Section 203 provisions for limited English speakers. John Transvina, Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund, Los Angeles; Margaret Fung, Asian American Legal Defense and Education Fund, New York; Mauro E. Mujica, U.S. English; Deborah Wright, California Department of Registrar-Recorder; Peter N. Kirsanow, National Labor Relations Board. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

10 a.m. AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION AND FORESTRY _ Full Committee. Oversight hearing on USDA farm loan programs. Glenn Keppy, associate administrator for programs, Farm Service Agency; Carolyn Cooksie, deputy administrator for farm loan programs, FSA; Dennis A. Everson, president, Agribusiness Division, First Dakota National Bank, Yankton, S.D.; Betsy Senter, National Association of Credit Specialists; Karen Krub, Farmers' Legal Action Group Inc., St. Paul. Location: Room 328A, Russell.

10 a.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Full Committee. Hearing on a substitute version of S.2686, the Communications Act of 2006. Location: Room 106, Dirksen.

10 a.m. FINANCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on corporate tax issues. IRS Commissioner Mark Everson, Comptroller General David Walker, Assistant Attorney General eileen O'Connor; George Pleski, University of Connecticut; attorney Edward Kleinbard; tax analyst Martin Sullivan. Location: Room 215, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Readiness and Management Support Subcommittee. Hearing on the FY07 budget for business systems modernization and financial management. Comptroller General David Walker; Undersecretary of Defense Kenneth Kreig; Principal Deputy Undersecretary of Defense J. Davide Patterson. Location: Room 222, Russell.

2:30 p.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Federal Financial Management, Government Information, and International Security Subcommittee. Hearing on autopilot budgeting. Clay Johnson III, OMB; Eileen Norcross, George Mason University; Adam Hughes, OMB Watch. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Meeting on pending business. Closed. Location: Room 219, Hart.

3 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Administrative Oversight and the Courts Subcommittee. Hearing on H.R. 1038 - Multidistrict Litigation Jurisdiction. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 9:30 a.m. FLOOR SCHEDULE _ Meets for morning hour and at 11 a.m. for legislative business. At 11:25 Rep-elect Brian Bilbray will be sworn in on the House floor. At about 11:35 a.m. there will be a mock swearing in photo opportunity in H-210, Capitol. Highlights: Suspensions (3 bills): 1) H.Con.Res. 372 - Recognizing the 50th Anniversary of the Interstate Highway System; 2) H.R. 5117 - To exempt persons with disabilities from the prohibition against providing section 8 rental assistance to college students; 3) H.Res. 318 - Supporting responsible fatherhood, promoting marriage, and encouraging greater involvement of fathers in the lives of their children, especially on Father's Day. H.R. 5576 - Transportation, Treasury, Housing and Urban Development, the Judiciary, the District of Columbia, and Independent Agencies Appropriations Act for Fiscal Year 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0033059

9:30 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Crime, Terrorism and Homeland Security Subcommittee. Hearing on improving restitution for crime victims. Testimony from the National Crime Victim Law Institute, Lewis and Clark Law School; Parents of Murdered Children, Inc.; and the Committee on Corrections and Sentencing, American Bar Association. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

10 a.m. FINANCIAL SERVICES _ financial Institutions and Consumer Credit Subcommittee. Hearing on the Home Mortgage Disclosure Act. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

10 a.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Railroads Subcommittee. Hearing on issues in rail transportation of hazardous materials. Witnesses include Joseph Boardman, Administrator, Federal Railroad Administration; Robert Chipkevich, Director, NTSB, Office of Railroad Investigations; Edward Hamberger, CEO, Association of American Railroads; Richard Timmons, President, American Short Line and Regional Railroad Assoc.; Thomas Pontolillo, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and Trainmen; the American Chemistry Council; Augusta Fire Department; American Trial Lawyers Assoc.; others. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

10:30 a.m. EDUCATION AND THE WORKFORCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on minority test scores and the No Child Left Behind law. Deputy Education Secretary Raymond Simon; Cynthia Kuhlman, principal, Centennial Place Elementary, Atlanta; Deputy Maryland State Education Superintendent Ronald Peiffer. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

10:30 a.m. SCIENCE _ Space and Aeronautics Subcommittee. Hearing on the NASA worlforce, retention and reinforcing the workforce. Assistant Administrator Toni Dawsey, David Black, National Research Council; Gregory Junemann, International Federation of Progessional and Technical Engineers; John Douglass, Aerospace Industries Association. Location: Room 2318, Rayburn.

1 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on H.R. 5200 - National Defense Enhancement and National Guard Empowerment Act of 2006. Adm. Edmund P. Giambastiani - vice chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff; Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon R. England; Gen. Richard Cody, vice chief of staff, Army; Gen. John D.W. Corley, vice chief of staff, Air Force; retired Air Force Brig. Gen. Stephen Koper, president, National Guard Association of the U.S.; Maj. Gen. Roger P. Lempke, president, Adjutants General Association of the United States. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

2 p.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee. Hearing on NIH research policies regarding human tissue samples. Witness scheduled: Dr. Susan Molchan, Neuroscience and Neuropsychology of Aging Program, National Institute on Aging, Bethesda, Md. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Federal Workforce and Agency Organization Subcommittee. Hearing on information technology in the federal employees health benefits program. Dan Green, Deputy Associate Director, Center for Employee and Family Support Policy, OPM; Charles Fallis, President, National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association; Colleen Kelley, National President, National Treasury Employees Union; Jacqueline Simon, Director of Public Policy, American Federation of Government Employees; Archelle Georgion, MD, Executive VP, Strategic Relations, Specialized Care Services, UnitedHealth Group; Stephen W. Gammarino, Senior Vice President, National Programs, Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association; Joe Witkowski, Vice President, Government Employees Hospital Association, Inc. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ National Security, Emerging threats and International Relations Subcommittee. Hearing on private security firms on the battlefield.William Solis, GAO; Greg Starr, State Department; James Undar, USAID; Chris Taylor, Blackwater USA; retired Maj. Gen. Robert Rosenkranz, DynCorp International; Ignacio Balderas, Triple Canopy; Doug Brooks, International Peace Operations Association. Location: Room 2247, Rayburn.

2 p.m. RULES _ Full Committee. Meeting to set rules for floor debate on H.Res. ___ - Declaring that the U.S. will complete the mission in Iraq and prevail in the Global War on Terror, the struggle to protect freedom from the terrorist adversary. Location: Room H-313, Capitol.

3 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Commercial and Administrative Law Subcommittee. Hearing on state taxation of interstate telecommunications services. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

Other: LATIN AMERICAN DEVELOPMENT _ The Inter-American Development Bank holds a conference on a new initiative to deal with Latin American development.
Highlights: 9 a.m. Former President Bill Clinton. Location: IADB, 1330 New York Ave. NW.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH _ Annual meeting of the National Family Planning and Reproductive Health Association. Highlights: 12 p.m. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton delivers the keynote address. Sewall-Belmont House, 1444 Constitution Ave. NW. Location: Omni Shoreham Hotel, 2500 Calvert St. NW, unless otherwise noted.

DOJ_NMG_0033060

KATRINA-PROTEST _ Survivors of hurricane Katrina and Rita hold demonstrations to protest FEMA's decision to end housing benefits. Highlights: 10 a.m. Demonstration outside FEMA, 500 C St. SW. 12 p.m. News conference. Holiday Inn, 550 C St. SW. 3 p.m. Presentation at Katrina housing series congressional forum. room 2200, Rayburn.

REGIONAL LEADERS _ 8 a.m. Rep. Ruben Hinojosa hosts the 5th Regional Leaders Conference for local elected officials, education administrators, municipal representatives others. Highlights: 9 a.m. Rep. Chet Edwards on improving health care access for veterans. 11 a.m. Federal Reserve Board Chairman Ben Bernanke. 11:30 a.m. Rep. Charles Gonzales on reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act. 12 p.m. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison. Location: Jefferson Building, Library of Congress.

VILSACK-FOREIGN POLICY _ 8:30 a.m. - 10 a.m. The Johns Hopkins Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies (SAIS) Ceter for Transatlantic Relations hosts a foreign policy briefing, ``Foreign Policy: A Governor's View." Governor Tom Vilsack, D-Iowa, will give the keynote remarks. Other panelists include Chrystia Freeland, U.S. managing editor of the Financial Times, and Robert Guttman, editor-in-chief of Transatlantic magazine at SAIS. Location: Room 500, Bernstein-Offit Building, 1717 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

REAL ESTATE _ 9:30 a.m. Assistant Treasury Secretary Emil Henry, Jr., speaks on the economy at the Real Estate Roundtable.

IRS _ 10:30 a.m. President Colleen Kelley of the National Treasury Employees Union and Rep. Steven Rothman hold a media briefing by telephone to discuss their joint effort to prevent the Internal Revenue Service from hiring private sector debt collectors. Contacts: Dina Long, 202-572-5500. Notes: Callin number: 888-296-1938; passcode: 953743.

TEACHING AWARD _ 11 a.m. Education Secretary Spellings speaks at the National Kinder Excellence Teaching Award news conference. Location: Willard Inter-Continental Hotel, 1401 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

BOEHNER _ 11:30 a.m. House Majority Leader Rep. John Boehner holds a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-107, Capitol.

DISASTER PREPAREDNESS _ 11:45 a.m. - 1:30 p.m. The SCI FI channel hosts a media roundtable, ``Are We Prepared? For Pandemic, Nuclear Terrorism or Asteroid Collision?," exploring how prepared the US government is to deal with the potential catastrophic dangers posed by a flu pandemic, nuclear terrorism and collision with a near-Earth object. Participants include Reps. Rep. Nita Lowey, D-N.Y., James Langevin, D-R.I., and Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., and Irwin Redlener, Associate Dean for Public Health Advocacy and Preparedness, and Director of its National Center for Disaster Preparedness, joseph L. Mailman School of Public Health, Columbia University; Joe Cirincione, Senior Vice President for National Security and International Policy at the Center for American Progress in Washington, D.C.; and Ed Lu, NASA Shuttle astronaut, astrophysicist. Location: Room S-120, Capitol.

HOYER _ 12:30 a.m. House Democratic Whip Rep. Steny Hoyer holds a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-306, Capitol.

CHINA _ 12 p.m. The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace holds a discussion with Joshua Kurlantzick about the rise of China's soft power. Location: 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

FOUNDERS-RELIGION _ 12 p.m. Inaugural luncheon of the Reese Roundtable, a forum of Christian conservatives, with James Hutson of the Library of Congress discussing his book on the religious beliefs of the Founding Fathers. Location: Room B-340, Rayburn.

MUSLIMS-KOSOVO _ 1 p.m. Reps. Eliot Engel and Joseph Crowley hold a news conference to respond to a published anti-Muslim ad regarding Kosovo. Location: Cannon Terrace.

HIV-DRUG USERS _ 2 p.m. Rep. Raul Grijalva and the HIV Prevention Action Committee of the Federal AIDS policy Partnership hold a briefing on HIV prevention among drug-using populations, with don Des Jarlais of Beth Israel Medical Center, Nabila El-Bassel of Columbia University School of Social Work, Baltimore Health Commissioner Joshua Sharstein, and Ron Daniels of Prevention Works in D.C. Location: Room 2168, Rayburn.

US FOREIGN POLICY _ 2 p.m. - 3:30 p.m. There will be a Brookings-Pew Research Center briefing. ``Global Attitudes Toward U.S. Foreign Policy." Participants are: Andrew Kohut, president, Pew Research Center; director, Pew Global Attitudes Project; Carlos Pascual, vice president and director, Foreign Policy Studies, The Brookings Institution; William Kristol, editor, The Weekly Standard; and Susan E. Rice, senior fellow, The Brookings Institution. Location: Brookings Institution, Saul/Zilkha Room, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

US-VIETNAM _ 3:30 p.m. USTR Susan Schwab participates in the U.S.-Vietnam WTO Coalition Congressional rollout for Vietnam's PNTR. Location: Room HC-5, Capitol.

DEMOCRATIC FUNDRAISER _ 5:30 p.m. DNC Chairman Howard Dean attends the DNC Washington Grassroots Fundraiser. Location: Presidential Ballroom, Capital Hilton, 16th and K Sts. NW.

IRAQ FILM _ 5:30 p.m. Showing of a Showtime film, ``Home Front," about a blinded Iraq veteran and his experiences since returning home. Location: Room 418, Russell.

DOJ_NMG_0033061

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, June 13, 2006 8:29 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Tuesday, June 13, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips060613.pdf; dojclips060613.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, JUNE 13, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

U.S. Government Defends Domestic Spying In Court In Detroit (FINDLAW/AP) 5
U.S. Asks Judge To Drop Suit On N.S.A. Spying (NYT) 5
Wiretap Suit All About Power (KRT) 7
Judge Hears Arguments On Domestic Spying (UPI) 8
Judges Press C.I.A. Lawyer Over Withheld Documents (NYT) .8
U.S. Distances Itself From Gitmo Remarks (AP) 9
State Department Tries To Distance Itself From Guantanamo Remark (KRT) 11
State Dept. Disavows Statement On Suicides (NYT) 12
Gitmo: Autopsies Complete, Analysis Underway (KRT) 13
Gitmo Detainee Was Cleared For Transfer (AP) 14
Independent Probe Urged For Suicides Of Detainees (WP) ..15
Chinese Muslims Search For Sanctuary (WT) 16
Suicides Change Nothing (USAT) 17
Guantanamo Deaths Deepen Harm To U.S. Image Abroad (USAT) 17
The Gitmo Suicides (WSJ) 18
Religious Leaders Urge U.S. To Ban Torture (WP) 19
Terror Suspects Charge Abuse In Canada Prison (NYT) 19
Canada's Social Stance Is Tested By Arrests (WSJ) 20

Homeland Response:

Technologists Assail Federal Net-tapping Rules (CNET) 22
Air Marshals Warn Their Bullets Are Too Powerful (WT) 23
City Rethinking Security Plan After Cut In Homeland Aid (NYT) 24
Terrorist In A Bootleg T-shirt (LAT) 25
Alberto Prompts Evacuation On Fla. Coast (AP) 26
'The Storm Has Accelerated;' Landfall Expected At 8 A.m. (TALLDEM) 27
FEMA Stockpiles Supplies Ahead Of Alberto (AP) 27
Swift Evacuations Urged As Alberto Approaches (KRT) 28
Fla. Braces Itself As Alberto Rolls In (USAT) 30
Florida On Alert As Alberto Revs Up (ORS) 31
Storm Nears Hurricane Strength And The Gulf Coast Of Florida (NYT) 32
Florida Braces For Early-Arriving Alberto (WP) 33
Insurance Regulators Get Busy (USAT) 34
U.S. Gives Charter Schools A Big Push In New Orleans (NYT) 35
Police Struggles In New Orleans Raise Old Fears (NYT) 36
AFL-CIO Plans New Orleans Boom (USAT) 38
For Many Of Katrina's Young Victims, The Scars Are More Than Skin Deep (WP) 38
Clinton Links GOP Policies To More Storms (AP) 40
President Clinton Slams GOP In Orlando Speech (PALMBEACHP) 40

War News:

Bush: Zarqawi's Death "A Major Blow To Al Qaeda" (LAT) 41
Bush Confers Today With Iraqi Leaders (AJC) 42
White House Hones A Strategy For Post-Zarqawi Era (NYT) .43
Zarqawi Successor The New Target (WT) 45
Bush In Drive To Back Iraq Government (FT) 46
Bush Invites His Critics To A War Council At Camp David (KRT) 46
Officials Detail Zarqawi's Last Hour (WP) 47
Bush Reaches Out In Bid To Shed Go-it-alone Image (BOS)49
Rove: Republicans Should Address Iraq War (AP) 51
Rove Defends Primary, And Says NH Still 'a Red State' (PNH)52
Rove's Speech To N.H. Republicans Keeps To Partisan Line (WP) 52
Poll Sees A Boost For Bush, Iraq War (USAT) 53
Rare House Debate To Focus On Iraq War (WT) 54
The Iraq War Debate Reopens In Washington (CSM) 55
Bush: US Ready To Help New Iraq Gov't (AP) 56
Reid Tells Liberal Activists Troops Must Come Home (WT) .57
The Liberals' Lunch Special: Democratic Harmony (WP) 58

Blitz Against Al-Qaeda In Iraq Continues (USAT) 59
Al-Qaida In Iraq Names New Leader (AP) 60
A Jihadist Web Site Says Zarqawi's Group In Iraq Has A New Leader In Place (NYT) 61
Jordan Details Its Role In Finding Al-Zarqawi (LAT) 63
Zarqawi Is Dead. What Now? (WSJ) 65
Life During Wartime (NYT) 66
Legal Maneuver To Make A Point, An Army Officer Helps Iraqi Convict (WSJ) 67
Oil, Politics And Bloodshed Corrupt An Iraqi City (NYT) 71
Hussein Defense Witnesses Admit Lying (LAT) 73
37 Taliban Militants Killed In Afghanistan (USAT) 73
Inside The Afghan Drug Trade (CSM) 74
NATO Goes Global (WSJ) 77
Congress Yields To Pentagon On Army Pay Crunch (WSJ) ... 78
Pain Pump Tested In Battle (WSJ) 79
Race Is On For Next Generation Of Nuclear Weapons (LAT) 81

Corporate Scandals:

Former Interspeed Executive Convicted Of Fraud Charges (WSJ) 84
Monster Gets U.S. Subpoena In Widening Options Inquiry (WSJ) 84
Funds Sue Amid Probe Into Timing Of Options (FT) 85
Efficient Markets The Welfare Of American Investors (WSJ) . 86
Outside Audit Big Pension Plans Are At Risk Of Losing Accounting Benefit (WSJ) 88

Criminal Law:

Gang Activity Cited For Jump In U.S. Homicides (USAT) 89
Violent Crime Rises In U.S. (WP) 90
Violent Crime Up For 1st Time In 5 Years (WP) 91
Violent Crime Rose In '05, With Murders Up By 4.8% (NYT) .. 92
Murder Rate Up In Small US Cities (FT) 93
U.S. Violent Crime Rises At Pace Unseen In 10 Years (NPR) 93
Crime Drops In L.A., Rises Nationally (LAT) 94
Violent Crime Increases In U.S. (WT) 94
FBI: Violent Crime Up Last Year In U.S. (UPI/UPI) 95
FBI: Violent Crime Up In Majority Of NJ's Biggest Cities (NSDY/AP) 95
Violent Crime Rises In U.S., But S. Florida Fares Better (MH) 96
Rapes Increase In Dayton, FBI Report Says (DDN) 97
Indy Crime Rate Mirrors Midwest Increases (WRTV-TV) 98
However Tallied, Minneapolis Crime Is Up (MINNST) 98
Violent Crime Jumps In Fort Collins (COLO) 100
Violent Crime Up Across Texas, But Down In Dallas (KTVT-TV) 100
Rapes On Decline In Seattle Area (KIRO-TV) 101
Katrina Evacuee Arrested In Killing (NSDY/AP) 101
Washington Wire (WSJ) 101
Part Of Charge Vs. Ex-Bush Official Tossed (AP-Y2) 101
Safavian Case Goes To Jurors (WP) 102
Judge Lets Stand Major Charges Against Ex-Aide (NYT) 103
Shadegg's Memo Stokes Fight On Pork (HILL) 103
Texas Death Penalty Case Headed For Possible Fourth Trial (AP) 105
U Of U Professor Knows Location Of Documents FBI Wants (KSL-TV) 106
Utahn Keeps Watch Over Jack Anderson Papers (DESERET) 106
Supreme Court Allows Fresh Evidence In Death Case (FINDLAW/AP) 107
Supreme Court Allows Challenges To Lethal Injections (LAW) 107
Widening The Gateway (WP) 109
Lifesaving Evidence (LAT) 109
Death Row Inmates Can Pursue Appeals (FT) 110
High Court Rulings Chip At Death Penalty (USAT) 111
Supreme Court Assists Death Row Challengers (LAT) 111
High Court Keeps Door Open To Death-penalty Lawsuits (CSM) 112
Justices Open Door For Injection Case (WP) 113
Prisoners Gain In Suit Attacking Lethal Injection (NYT) 114
A 'Right' Way To Kill Someone? (USAT) 115
Ex-FBI Agent Tells Of '81 Probe (BOS) 117
FBI Knew Agents Had Mob Pals (BOSH) 118
Police Seek Suspect In Shooting Of Nevada Judge, Later Slaying Across Town (LAW/AP) 118
Judge Is Hurt In Shooting At A Court In Nevada (NYT) 119
Official Convicted In Travel Deal (MJS) 119
Jury Convicts Wisonsin Official Of Fraud (STPPP) 121
Witness: City Aide Told Me To Lie (CHIST) 122
Witness: FBI Asked About Mayor's Brother (CHIT) 123
Former West Mifflin Police Chief Pleads Guilty To Drug Charges (PPG) 124
Former Police Chief Pleads Guilty To Drug Charges (PTR) 125
Suburban Pittsburgh Police Chief Pleads Guilty To Drug Charges (TLPA) 125
Two Sentenced For Fraudulent Gold-silver Sales Scam (MH) 126
FBI Eyes Purported Tape Of American Teen's West Bank Boyfriend (FINDLAW/AP) 127
GPS Will Track Sex Offenders (WT) 127

DOJ_NMG_0033065

Improvements In Registry Announced (WP) 128
Defense In Hollywood Wiretaps Case Demands Prosecution Evidence (CCT) 128
Dispute Over Evidence In Pellicano Wiretap Case (NYT) 129
Many Of Pellicano's Recordings Still Secret (LAT) 131
He's No Angel, He's A Private Investigator (LAT) 132

Civil Law:

High Court Reins In RICO (LAW) 136

Civil Rights:

11th Circuit Upholds Firing Of Fla. Deputies Who Appeared In Online Porn (LAW) 138
Flag-desecration Amendment Needs 1 More Vote (USAT) . 140

Antitrust:

Third Trader Pleads Guilty To Manipulating Natural Gas Price (SDUT/AP) 140
AGs Want Bush Administration To Get Tough On Gas Prices (AP) 141
Barr Settles Novartis Suit, Sees Charge (AP) 142
Mittal Refuses To Raise Arcelor Bid Staff And Agencies (AP) 142
European Union Takes First Steps To Include Turkey And Croatia (NYT) 143
Mirant Rescinds Unsolicited Bid To Acquire NRG (WSJ) 144
Zale Ends Merger Talks With Signet (WSJ) 144
BBVA Carves Out Niche In U.S.-to-Mexico Payments (WSJ) 145
RIAA Chief Says Illegal Song-sharing 'contained' (USAT) 146
German Authorities Examine Web Rights Deal (AP) 147

Environment:

Pipe Company Executive Gets Prison For Rigging Pollution Test (AP) 147
EPA Rule Loosened After Oil Chief's Letter To Rove (LAT) .. 148
Dirk Kempthorne Arrives (NYT) 150

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Four Face Drug Charges (HARTC) 151
Prescription Drugs Find Place In Teen Culture (USAT) 151
The Ground War Against Meth (ADW) 154
Baseball Suspends Grimsley For 50 Games (AP) 155
D'backs Issue No-tolerance Stand On Grimsley Flap (USAT) 156
Meth Takes A Toll On Indian Reservations (AP) 157
Suspected Militants Killed In Afghanistan (AP) 158
US Says Drug Lords Fuel Afghan Insurgency (VOA) 159
Feds Run Trash Hauling In Largest-ever Conn. Business Takeover (AP) 160
Bomb Suspect's Shirt Does The Talking (WP) 160

Immigration:

House Republicans Hit Senate Immigration Bill (WT) 161
Immigration Takes Center Stage In Colorado (USAT) 162

Tax:

Nevada Man Gets 54 Months For Trust Scheme (WEBCPA) 163
Estate-Tax Repeal Would Hurt The 'Small Rich' (WP) 164
The Everything Commission (WP) 165

Congress-Administration:

Necessary Spending Or Political Trap? (WP) 165
Dealt A Difficult Hand, Trade Official Presses On (WP) 166
Bush Is Told To Defend Bloch's Back (HILL) 168
A Bush Aide's Blunt Words (WP) 169
U.S. Budget Gap Shrinks On Surge In Tax Receipts (WSJ) . 171
Lobbyists Paid For Members' Trips (HILL) 172
Someone Has To Find Facts In Paris (NYT) 172
Pelosi Takes Case To Black Media (RC) 172
Jefferson Showdown Hurts Only Democrats (USAT) 173
Hoyer Marshals Forces (HILL) 174
Pelosi Mum On Murtha's Move (RC) 175
Democrats Set To Unveil Domestic Platform For '06 (RC) .. 177
Pelosi: It's Definition Time For Democrats (HILL) 178
Agency Informs Workers About Data Theft (AP-Y2) 180
Senator Wants Raise-for-Performance Pay System (WP) 181
Byrd Truly The Elder Statesman (WP) 182
The Reliable Source (WP) 183
A Federal Office Where Heraldry Of Yore Is Only Yesterday (NYT) 183
Correcting The Hayden Record (WSJ) 185

Other News:

Broad Economic Worries Drive A Global Sell-Off (NYT) 186
Dow Industrials Tumble 99.34 Points As Rate Worries Continue To Take Toll (WSJ) 187
S& P 500 Tumbles To A 7-Month Low As Once-Key Sectors Fall Out Of Favor (WP) 188
Nasdaq Arrives In Correction Zone (USAT) 189
Fed Officials Reveal More Worries About Inflation (USAT) ... 189
Mr. Dummar Is Back, Taking Another Shot At The Hughes Estate (WSJ) 190
Getty Book Deal Led To Questions Of Conflict (LAT) 192
Webb, Miller Refuel The Fires (WP) 196
A Clash Of Styles In Virginia Vote (USAT) 197
Will State Democrats Back D.C.'s Horse? (CSM) 198
The Sway Of Senate Leaders Is Put To The Test In Virgina (HILL) 199
Schumer Gets Cold Shoulder For Endorsement (WP) 200

DOJ_NMG_0033066

Miller, Webb Await Verdict In Primary (WT) 201
A Week Of Blessings For A GOP Majority That Needed
Them (RC) 202
Texas Democrat Faces Uphill Fight (WT) 203
'08 Hopefuls May Cause Leaders Fits (RC) 204
In Kansas, A Troubling Fissure For GOP (LAT) 206
Area Candidates Embrace A Visit By Laura Bush (PHI).....208
More Adults Are Finding Time To Volunteer (WT).....209
Getting Punitive (WSJ).....209
Nuclear Monitor Says Iran Fails To Provide Data (NYT) 210
ElBaradei Sees U.S.-Iran Talks As Ending Stalemate
(BLOOM) 211
Japan Wary Of Plan For Sanctions Against Iran (WP) 212
China Opposed To Joint Statement On Iran (AP) 213
U.S. Approach To Iran Has A Familiar Ring (WSJ) 214
Welcome To The Bazaar (NYT) 216
Violence Erupts Between Fatah And Hamas (NYT).....217
Hamas Gunmen Rampage Through Ramallah (FT) 219
Palestinian Security Men Go On Rampage (AP).....219
Fatah Gunmen Go On Rampage In West Bank (CHIT) 221
Fatah Officers Attack Hamas Sites In West Bank (WP) 222
Violence Strains Informal Cease-Fire (WT).....223
Blair Urges Negotiated Mideast Solution (FT) 224
Olmert Won't Rule Out Unilateral Action (AP).....224
North Korea Flexes Missile Muscle To Grab US Attention
(AFP) 225
Senator Scolds U.N.'s No. 2 For Snub (WT).....226
Cuba Cuts Off Power To U.S. Mission (AP) 227
U.S. Mission Hit By Power Failure, Water Shortage (WT).....227
Leader Of Islamic Forces In Somalia Seeks "Understanding"
With U.S. (KRT) 228
Setback In Somalia (WT) 229
Indonesia Lacks Funds To Fight Flu, World Bank Says (AP)230
Bumpy Ride As China's Auto Market Booms, Leaders Clash
Over Heavy Toll (WSJ) 231
Russian Party Asks Young: Who Wants To Be A Deputy?
(WP) 233
The Wrong Way To Sway Egypt (WP) 235
Foreign Aid Has Flaws. So What? (NYT) 236

DOJ_NMG_0033067

TERRORISM NEWS:

U.S. Government Defends Domestic Spying In Court In Detroit (FINDLAW/AP)

By Sarah Karush, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 13, 2006

(AP) - DETROIT-The U.S. government defended warrantless domestic surveillance in court for the first time Monday, saying the program is well within the president's authority but arguing that it would require revealing state secrets to prove that point.

U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit heard arguments in a case brought by the American Civil Liberties Union against the National Security Agency. The ACLU is asking for an immediate halt to the program, arguing that it violates the rights to free speech and privacy.

The Bush administration has asked Taylor to dismiss the lawsuit on state-secrets grounds.

The ACLU says the Bush administration already has publicly revealed enough information about the program for Taylor to rule it is illegal.

But government attorney Anthony J. Coppolino told Taylor on Monday that the case cannot be decided based on a "scant public record."

"This case does not involve easy questions," he said. "It's a case that requires a robust factual record."

Coppolino alluded several times to a classified court filing, which Taylor indicated she had not yet reviewed. In that brief, "we demonstrate that it (the program) is narrowly and specifically focused on al-Qaida," he said.

The plaintiffs do not have access to the classified brief, and Taylor would have to make a special request and travel to Washington to read it, said Ann Beeson, the ACLU's associate legal director and the lead attorney for the plaintiffs.

The administration has acknowledged eavesdropping on Americans' international communications without first seeking court approval. President George W. Bush has said the eavesdropping is legal because of a congressional resolution passed after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks that authorized him to use force in the fight against terrorism.

The parties in the ACLU lawsuit, who include journalists, scholars and lawyers, say the program has hampered their ability to do their jobs because it has made international contacts, such as sources and potential witnesses, wary of sharing information over the phone.

Monday's hearing was the first time the issues were argued in court. A similar lawsuit has filed in federal court in New York by the Center for Constitutional Rights, but no hearings have been held there yet.

U.S. Asks Judge To Drop Suit On N.S.A. Spying (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

DETROIT, June 12 — A National Security Agency program that listens in on international communications involving people in the United States is both vital to national security and permitted by the Constitution, a government lawyer told a judge here today in the first major court argument on the program.

But, the lawyer went on, addressing Judge Anna Diggs Taylor of the Federal District Court, "the evidence we need to demonstrate to you that it lawful cannot be disclosed without that process itself causing grave harm to United States national security."

The only solution to this impasse, the lawyer, Anthony J. Coppolino, said, was for Judge Taylor to dismiss the lawsuit before her, an American Civil Liberties Union challenge to the eavesdropping program, under the state secrets privilege. The privilege can limit and even extinguish cases that would reveal national security information, and it is fast becoming one of the Justice Department's favorite tools in defending court challenges to its efforts to combat terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0033068

The Detroit case was filed in January on behalf of journalists, scholars, lawyers and nonprofit organizations who contended that the possibility of government eavesdropping interfered with their work. In remarks to reporters after the 90-minute argument, Anthony D. Romero, the A.C.L.U.'s executive director, called the government's invocation of the state secrets privilege "Orwellian doublespeak."

"They argued essentially that the N.S.A. program was off-limits to judicial review," Mr. Romero said.

The small courtroom was jammed for the argument, with a dozen people standing in the aisles and journalists sitting in the jury box.

In her presentation, Ann Beeson, the A.C.L.U.'s associate legal director, asked Judge Taylor to shut down the surveillance program based on publicly available information.

The case boiled down to two legal questions, Ms. Beeson said. The first is whether the plaintiffs have suffered the sort of direct injury necessary to establish that they have standing to bring suit. The second is whether President Bush was authorized by Congress or by the Constitution to violate the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, a 1978 law that forbids surveillance of people inside the United States without a warrant.

The Bush administration has acknowledged that it has not complied with the law but has said that a Congressional authorization in 2001 to use military force against Al Qaeda and the president's inherent constitutional powers allowed him to violate it.

The government's main argument today, repeated numerous times, was that more facts are required in the case but that more facts cannot be disclosed. Judge Taylor asked few questions but at one point appeared frustrated by this approach.

"You have conceded, have you not, that a program has been authorized?" she asked Mr. Coppolino. He responded that the administration's public defense of the program has been too general to serve as the basis for judicial adjudication. "There is very much a difference," Mr. Coppolino said, "between the existence of an activity and the details of that activity."

Even portions of the government's brief that were said to demonstrate why further information about the program cannot be disclosed have not been filed in court. Instead, the government "lodged" the brief and other classified papers at the Justice Department in Washington, inviting Judge Taylor to make arrangements to see them. At today's hearing, she shook her head no when Mr. Coppolino asked her whether she had "had a chance to review our classified submission."

Judge Taylor has scheduled a separate argument next month to consider the government's motion to dismiss the case based on the state secrets privilege. While she could theoretically rule on the plaintiffs' request to block the program before then, she is more likely to consider the two motions simultaneously.

Calling the plaintiffs' position extreme, Mr. Coppolino said the 1978 law cannot constitutionally constrain the president when the nation's safety is at risk.

"The president's constitutional power doesn't simply disappear when Congress enacts a statute," Mr. Coppolino said. "Surveillance of an enemy is indeed a necessary incident of war."

Ms. Beeson said the 1978 law, often called FISA, gave the president all the flexibility he needed. "If FISA didn't work," she said, "the proper procedure under our constitutional system was for the president to go back to Congress and ask it to amend the law."

"Our constitutional system was set up to require the president to follow the law just like anyone else," she added. "If our view of the separation of powers is extreme, then the Constitution is extreme."

Mr. Coppolino also argued that the plaintiffs were not entitled to sue in the first place because they cannot show they have been injured. "You don't get standing," he said, "simply because you say the president has a program and I think it might cover me."

Ms. Beeson countered that her clients have suffered concrete harms. "Journalists' sources have dried up," she said. And lawyers for people suspected of terrorism have had to resort to alternatives to phone calls and e-mails to ensure the confidentiality of their communications, she said. "They have had to make expensive oversees trips to gather evidence," Ms. Beeson said.

DOJ_NMG_0033069

Mr. Coppolino said the government is not able clarify whether the plaintiffs' fears are justified. "The government cannot confirm or deny whether a particular individual is subject to surveillance or what the criteria is," he said. "Indicating that someone is not subject to surveillance is itself revealing."

Mr. Coppolino indicated that some plaintiffs may have more reason to be concerned than others. Lawyers who represent suspected terrorists, he said, "come closer to being in the ballpark of the terrorist surveillance program."

But here too, he said, "the critical facts necessary to adjudicate" the standing question "are subject to the state secrets privilege."

As Ms. Beeson concluded her argument, which had been uninterrupted by questions, Judge Taylor called her back to the lectern. "Talk about standing some more," Judge Taylor said, perhaps identifying the part of the plaintiffs' case she considered the most difficult.

Wiretap Suit All About Power (KRT)

By Niraj Warikoo, Detroit Free Press

Knight Ridder, June 13, 2006

DETROIT - In vigorous arguments that offered clashing views on the limits of state authority, the U.S. Justice Department and civil rights advocates squared off in a packed Detroit courtroom for a hearing on whether the government's domestic surveillance program violates the U.S. Constitution.

The talk inside U.S. District Court on Monday morning went to the core of what should define American government and was followed across the country by legislators and citizens debating an essential question: How much power should the president have?

Making its case in court for the first time, the government argued that the president needs as much power as necessary to secure the country, especially as al-Qaida continues to threaten the United States with terrorist attacks. But an attorney with the American Civil Liberties Union said that President Bush can't violate the law while trying to protect the country.

The federal judge hearing the case, U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor, set July 10 as the next court date to address the government's state secret arguments. Taylor did not say when she might make a ruling.

An attorney with the Justice Department, Tony Coppolino, cited the actions of past presidents during war as precedents.

He told the court that a congressional resolution approved following the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks allowed Bush to authorize wiretaps. But Coppolino stopped short of describing how the program operates, saying that doing so would reveal national security secrets and help the country's enemies. Thus, he said Monday, the case should be dismissed.

Bush is permitted to take "all necessary and appropriate means" to defend Americans, Coppolino said. Referring to the actions of former Presidents Woodrow Wilson and Franklin D. Roosevelt during World Wars I and II, Coppolino added: "You need to know what the enemy is doing in the United States."

Coppolino repeatedly referred to al-Qaida during his 50-minute talk, saying that the terrorist group "attacked and killed thousands" and "threatens to attack us again."

For that reason, he said, the U.S. government must be allowed to eavesdrop on the phone calls and e-mails of Americans in some cases.

He stressed that any surveillance is "narrowly and specifically focused on al-Qaida."

It was standing room only inside the courtroom, as attorneys, civil rights advocates, local Muslims and journalists crowded inside for a hearing that advocates say is the first on the constitutionality of the National Security Agency's eavesdropping program. The program has come under fire from a number of civil liberties groups.

In January, the American Civil Liberties Unions, local Muslims and a host of other groups and individuals filed a suit against the federal agency for eavesdropping on Americans without court approval. They argue that the government must seek approval for eavesdropping from courts under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

The act was passed in 1978 following criticism of the Nixon administration for how it used executive powers during Watergate and the Vietnam War.

DOJ_NMG_0033070

Speaking first in court Monday, Ann Beeson, associate legal director for the ACLU, said that the government has the right to conduct surveillance under FISA, as long as it gets court approval.

But instead of following FISA, Bush "broke the law" and allowed a new program that violated the Constitution.

In her arguments, Beeson said that "electronic surveillance is akin to a dragnet."

Both sides invoked American history in its arguments. While Coppolino said that previous U.S. presidents used domestic surveillance, Beeson said that the country's founding fathers would be opposed to Bush's plan.

Beeson cited the abuses of British King George III in the 18th century in arguing that the government often misuses blanket authority "to spy on political dissenters."

Beeson argued partly on behalf of local Muslims, who say they fear that their communications are being monitored.

Nazih Hassan of Ypsilanti, Mich., is a plaintiff in the case and a member of the Michigan chapter of the Council on American-Islamic Relations, which also is part of the suit.

Hassan, who attended the hearing, criticized the government's stance at a news conference held by the ACLU outside the courthouse. Attorneys spoke to a throng of media outlets about their concerns.

Hassan has said that he fears the government may be targeting him because he was friends with Rabih Haddad, an Ann Arbor, Mich., Muslim leader who the government says associated with al-Qaida while spending time in Pakistan. The government never filed terrorism charges against Haddad but deported him to Lebanon in 2003 on immigration violations.

The government said Monday that the lawsuit can't be fully addressed in open court because it would require a full airing of facts. But doing that would reveal national security secrets. The government has filed a classified brief in the case, which Coppolino would not disclose. According to ACLU attorneys, the filing is in a secret location in Washington, D.C.

Judge Hears Arguments On Domestic Spying (UPI)

UPI, June 13, 2006

A U.S. Justice Department lawyer argued Monday in Detroit that the Bush administration's domestic wiretapping is too sensitive to be defended in open court.

U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor heard arguments in a suit over the controversial National Security Administration program, The New York Times reported. The American Civil Liberties Union argues that the program violates the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which set up a procedure for judicial oversight of wiretaps in sensitive security cases, provides adequate protection for law enforcement and the public.

Anthony Coppolino, a lawyer with the department's civil division, said that the government's inability to provide public evidence to defend the program is an argument for dismissal, the Times reported. The Justice Department has not filed classified portions of its briefs with the court, saying that the judge must make special arrangements to read them.

The evidence that would demonstrate the program is legal is so sensitive that it "cannot be disclosed without that process itself causing grave harm to United States national security," Coppolino said.

The judge scheduled a hearing for July.

Judges Press C.I.A. Lawyer Over Withheld Documents (NYT)

By Anemona Hartocollis

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

A federal appeals court panel in Manhattan questioned a lawyer for the federal government yesterday as to whether the Central Intelligence Agency had a legitimate national security interest in refusing to confirm or deny the existence of documents authorizing it to detain and interrogate terrorism suspects overseas.

The tough questioning came in oral arguments by the American Civil Liberties Union and lawyers for the C.I.A. before the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. The civil liberties group is trying to force the C.I.A. to disclose how much authority it has been given to interrogate detainees since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Through the Freedom of Information Act, the A.C.L.U. is seeking documents, including a directive said to have been signed by President Bush, giving the agency the authority to set up detention sites outside the United States and to interrogate prisoners. In its lawsuit, the group says the existence of these documents has been hinted at in news reports.

But the government has refused to confirm or deny the documents' existence, saying that to do so would jeopardize national security by revealing C.I.A. methods and activities. Last September, Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein of Federal District Court upheld that position, and yesterday's hearing was part of the A.C.L.U.'s appeal of his ruling.

The three-judge appeals panel seemed divided on the issue, with Judge John Gleeson asking the most forceful questions of the government lawyer, Peter Skinner. Judge Gleeson seemed to be trying to determine whether the A.C.L.U. was right in contending that the agency was acting to avoid political embarrassment, rather than out of national security interest.

The judge asked Mr. Skinner whether the C.I.A.'s position had "shifted a little bit" during the litigation. Initially, Judge Gleeson said, the government seemed to be refusing to disclose even whether the C.I.A. had an "interest" in the questioning of detainees abroad.

Now, he said, the C.I.A. seemed to be admitting it had an interest in helping other agencies question detainees. The government was arguing, he said, that the C.I.A. wanted to safeguard information about whether it had been granted any independent authority to set up detention centers and interrogate prisoners.

"Independent engagement as opposed to helping out other agencies," Judge Gleeson said.

Mr. Skinner denied that the government had shifted its argument, though he suggested that it had clarified it. The C.I.A., he said, acknowledged all along that it had helped other agencies in interrogations and that when it did so, it was governed by Justice Department rules.

But, Mr. Skinner said, the agency "never acknowledged an interest or ability to go beyond those legal limitations" and was not going to do so now.

Megan Lewis, the lawyer for the A.C.L.U., argued that any information that would be revealed by merely acknowledging the existence of the documents would be so general that it would not jeopardize national security or betray specific intelligence-gathering methods. To argue otherwise, Ms. Lewis said, is "tantamount to the C.I.A. attempting to deny its interest in spying."

Outside court later, she said the documents, if they existed — "and I believe they do" — might be revealing, but "that's another fight for another day."

The A.C.L.U. seeks disclosure of two documents. One is said to be a Justice Department memorandum "specifying interrogation methods that the C.I.A. may use against top Al Qaeda members." The second is the directive said to be signed by Mr. Bush authorizing the agency to set up detention facilities outside the United States "and/or outlining interrogation methods that may be used against detainees."

Although oral arguments in the appeals court are often delivered in legal shorthand, yesterday's seemed even more opaque than usual. Almost apologetically, Mr. Skinner told the judges he was "somewhat constrained" in his ability to explain his argument and "connect the dots" because some of the C.I.A.'s reasoning in the case was classified.

The agency has submitted papers to the court that even the plaintiffs have not been allowed to see.

As the hearing came to a close, Judge Joseph M. McLaughlin made a joke about the obscurity, quoting a Jesuit logician, Father John Gerard, who in 1597 told a British interrogator: "I do not know where he is. But if I did, I could not and would not tell you."

The Jesuit doctrine of equivocation, Judge McLaughlin said, "lives on."

U.S. Distances Itself From Gitmo Remarks (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, June 12, 2006

The Bush administration distanced itself Monday from remarks by a U.S. diplomat that the weekend suicides of three Arab detainees at the Guantanamo Bay military prison were a "good P.R. move."

"I would just point out in public that we would not say that it was a P.R. stunt," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, using the abbreviation for public relations. "We have serious concerns anytime anybody takes their own life."

Colleen Graffy, deputy assistant U.S. secretary of state for public diplomacy, told the British Broadcasting Corp. that the deaths at the U.S.-run camp in Cuba were a "good P.R. move to draw attention."

Graffy also told the BBC the deaths were "a tactic to further the jihadi cause."

DOJ_NMG_0033072

Graffy's unscripted remarks threw a monkey wrench in the administration's careful plan to demonstrate concern over the deaths and respond to rising criticism of the U.S. operation of the prison.

Bush expressed "serious concern" Saturday over the suicides, and he directed an aggressive effort by his administration to reach out diplomatically while it investigates.

"He wants to make sure that this thing is done right from all points of view," White House press secretary Tony Snow said Saturday evening.

Graffy's boss, Undersecretary of State Karen Hughes, is charged with improving the U.S. image in the Arab world. The former White House communications adviser and longtime Bush aide heads an office at the State Department that monitors and quickly responds to inaccurate or distorted portrayals of U.S. views and actions in the Arab media.

Graffy's remarks were quickly picked up in the Arab press.

"Her comments quickly appeared to be bad P.R. moves for the U.S. administration," an article on the Web site of Lebanon's The Daily Star newspaper said.

Two Saudis and one Yemeni hanged themselves Saturday, the first successful suicides at the base after dozens of attempts.

Military officials said the suicides were coordinated acts of protest, but human rights activists and defense attorneys said the deaths signaled the desperation of many of the 460 detainees held on suspicion of links to al-Qaida and the Taliban.

Only 10 detainees have been charged with crimes after more than four years behind bars. The Supreme Court is expected to rule this month on whether President Bush overstepped his power in setting up war crimes trials for those detainees.

The administration's controversial detentions at Guantanamo Bay are a point of contention between the United States and many of its allies in Europe and the Mideast, and the suicides renewed international pressure to shut the prison.

The European Union on Monday called the Guantanamo Bay detention center an "anomaly," and said it would urge Bush to shut it down when he comes to Europe for a trans-Atlantic summit next week.

"Humanitarian standards and human rights have to be observed" in the fight against terrorism, Austrian Foreign Minister Ursula Plassnik told reporters. "For the United States, a country committed to freedom, the rule of law and due process, this is an anomaly."

A group of prominent religious leaders endorsed a statement, which is set to appear in The New York Times on Tuesday, protesting any American use of torture as "morally intolerable." The White House has said the U.S. does not condone or practice torture.

"Nothing less is at stake in the torture abuse crisis than the soul of our nation," the ad reads. "Let America abolish torture now — without exceptions."

Among the signers to the statement are the Rev. Ted Haggard, president of the National Association of Evangelicals; the Rev. Rick Warren, author of "The Purpose Driven Life"; and retiring Roman Catholic Cardinal Theodore McCarrick. Organizers say former President Jimmy Carter has also signed onto the ad, along with several Jewish, Muslim and black leaders.

Also, the American Medical Association said Monday the direct involvement of doctors in prisoner interrogation is unethical and violates their oath to do no harm.

"Physicians in all circumstances must never be involved in activities that are physically or mentally coercive. If physicians engage in such activities, the whole profession is tainted," according to the new policy adopted by delegates at the AMA's annual meeting.

The suicides prompted an extraordinary round of global outreach by officials from the White House's National Security Council, the State Department and Bush's congressional liaisons.

Within hours of the deaths, the Bush administration had contacted the United Nations, the European Union, most European nations individually, the embassies of Mideast and near-Mideast countries, the International Committee of the Red Cross, bipartisan members of the congressional leadership and the ranking Republican and Democratic members of the House and Senate Foreign Relations and Intelligence committees, Snow said.

DOJ_NMG_0033073

Graffy's remarks were sharper than those of other U.S. officials, but not entirely off-message. The camp commander at Guantanamo, Rear Adm. Harry Harris, told reporters Sunday that the detainees "have no regard for human life, neither ours nor their own."

"I believe this was not an act of desperation but an act of asymmetric warfare against us," Harris said.

State Department Tries To Distance Itself From Guantanamo Remark (KRT)

By Carol Rosenberg, Lesley Clark

Knight Ridder, June 12, 2006

GUANTANAMO BAY NAVY BASE, Cuba - The State Department attempted to distance itself Monday from one of its own officials, who called the suicides by three detainees at the U.S. terror prison "a good PR move to draw attention."

Colleen Graffy, the deputy assistant secretary of state for public diplomacy, whose job involves improving U.S. public relations, especially in the Muslim world, made the comment Sunday in a British Broadcasting Corp. interview.

She called the suicides "a tactic to further the jihadi cause," the BBC reported.

"I would not characterize it as a PR stunt," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Monday in reply to a reporter's question at the daily news briefing. "We have serious concern any time anybody takes their own life."

Even before the suicides, the European Union and individual countries, including Britain, had called on the United States to close the prison. About 460 prisoners are in custody at Guantanamo as "enemy combatants," a category that the Bush administration created and isn't covered by international agreements on the treatment of prisoners of war.

Civilian defense lawyers have described Guantanamo captives held for more than four years as increasingly desperate. They say the detainees have few ways, other than to harm themselves, to protest their indefinite confinement.

Ali Abdullah Ahmed of Yemen and Mani Shaman Turki al-Habardi al-Utaybi and Yassar Talal al-Zahrani of Saudi Arabia hanged themselves at the remote island prison early Saturday.

The Pentagon said in a news release Monday that Ahmed was "a mid- to high-level al-Qaida operative," Utaybi was a member of the al-Qaida-linked militant group Jama'at Tabligh and other Islamist terrorist groups, and Zahrani was a Taliban fighter.

The prison camp's spokesman said a team of military pathologists had completed autopsies of the three men on Sunday.

"The bodies are now in the morgue at the naval hospital in Guantanamo, and they are being handled with great reverence and respect and observance of the Islamic rules with regard to the handling of the deceased," said the spokesman, Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand.

A Muslim chaplain, Navy Lt. Abuhena Saiful Islam, said the bodies would be washed, wrapped in white shrouds and placed in coffins facing the direction of Mecca. Prayers would be said.

U.S. diplomats were negotiating with Saudi Arabia and Yemen on whether the bodies would be sent to their homelands for burial. Military sources said repatriation was likely.

It wasn't known whether the three men were among the 25 percent of detainees being regularly interrogated at this remote, offshore Navy base.

The military said none of the three men who killed themselves had lawyers, and none had been charged with war crimes.

Also, none had "ongoing psychological illness" or was taking prescription drugs, said the Pentagon's top medical professional, Dr. William Winkenwerder Jr., the assistant secretary of defense for health affairs.

The deaths added fuel to international calls that the Bush administration close the offshore detention and interrogation center.

Attorneys at the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents many of the detainees, argued that the interrogation methods and the indeterminate detentions were causing the men to try to kill themselves.

They presented reporters with a timeline of efforts they made to see that the detainees received some sort of physical or psychiatric medical care.

The Bush administration rejected most of the efforts, attorney Gitanjali Gutierrez said.

DOJ_NMG_0033074

"The deaths over the weekend came as absolutely no surprises to the attorneys," she said, adding that the center has been working since February 2002 "to get the military to concern itself with mental health and living conditions."

"The notion that (the detainees) had the ability to protest, to raise concerns, is unfounded," she said. Lawyers had met with 130 of the detainees as of January and the "vast majority have no access to any outside counsel."

"They are entering their fifth year of imprisonment, held in isolation," she said. "The amount of psychiatric stress cannot be underestimated." She called the uncertainty over their fates "unacceptable" under U.S. law and basic civil rights.

The American Civil Liberties Union called for an independent investigation of the detainees' suicides and conditions at the prison.

"The shroud of secrecy surrounding Guantanamo Bay must be lifted, with independent access to and monitoring of the facilities on an ongoing basis," said ACLU Executive Director Anthony Romero. "This monitoring should include the medical treatment of detainees, especially those who have chosen to engage in hunger-striking as a way to draw attention to their conditions of confinement."

Leonard Rubenstein, the director of Physicians for Human Rights, said his group had asked the government to allow for independent medical evaluations - "the kind we conduct in all kinds of other countries" - but the request was ignored.

Josh Colangelo-Bryan, an attorney for detainee Jumah Al Dossari, who has repeatedly attempted suicide, said Dossari was often despondent and held in isolation for extended times.

Dossari had described being interrogated while wrapped in an Israeli flag and questioned as a female interrogator wiped menstrual blood on his face, he said.

At one point, Colangelo-Bryan said his client asked him, "What do I do to keep myself from going crazy here?"

State Dept. Disavows Statement On Suicides (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 12 — The Bush administration distanced itself on Monday from comments by a State Department official that the suicides of three prisoners at the military prison at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, were a "good P.R. move."

The official, Colleen P. Graffy, deputy assistant secretary of state for public diplomacy, made the comments in an interview on the British Broadcasting Corporation program "Newshour" on Sunday, a day after two Saudis and a Yemeni hanged themselves in their cells.

"Taking their own lives was not necessary, but it certainly is a good P.R. move," Ms. Graffy said. "It does sound like this is part of a strategy — in that they don't value their own lives, and they certainly don't value ours; and they use suicide bombings as a tactic."

But the State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, told reporters at the department's daily briefing on Monday, "I would just point out in public that we would not say that it was a P.R. stunt."

Mr. McCormack noted that President Bush had said he "had serious concerns about what had happened."

Ms. Graffy, a former law professor at Pepperdine University, works in the Bureau of European and Eurasian Affairs at the State Department with Karen P. Hughes, under secretary of state for public diplomacy, on improving the United States' image abroad, especially in Islamic countries, according to her biography on the State Department Web site.

Officials said it was unlikely Ms. Graffy would be reprimanded.

Her comments parallel those made by some White House officials, who portrayed the suicides in recent days as the acts of unrepentant jihadists, and Rear Adm. Harry Harris, the commander of the prison camp, who told reporters on Saturday that the suicides were acts of "asymmetric warfare."

He added, "They carry out individual acts of violence against others when they can and against themselves, in the name of jihad."

Barbara Olshansky, a lawyer with the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents many Guantánamo prisoners, said Monday, "When somebody has no recourse at all, they have no way of talking to anybody and the only statement they can make is to take their own life, I can't imagine that is a P.R. stunt."

State Department officials are talking with the Saudi and Yemeni governments about arrangements for returning the bodies. The Pentagon said that there had been 41 suicide attempts by about 25 detainees before this weekend, but that American medical personnel were able to save them.

Gitmo: Autopsies Complete, Analysis Underway (KRT)

By Carol Rosenberg And Lesley Clark

Knight Ridder, June 12, 2006

GUANTANAMO BAY NAVY BASE, Cuba -- Military pathologists have completed clinical autopsies of the three captives who hanged themselves over the weekend inside their cells at this offshore detention center, the military announced this afternoon.

"Now it's the analytical part of the autopsy, compiling the report and making conclusions," said Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand, prison spokesman, adding the team of medical examiners from the Armed Forces Institute of Pathology arrived Saturday and departed Sunday.

Army Gen. Bantz Craddock, commander of the U.S. Southern Command based in Miami, toured the terror prison here on Sunday and declared the autopsies underway, as well as an internal examination by the Navy Criminal Investigative Services.

Guards found two Saudis and a Yemeni hanging in their cells at Camp 1 long before dawn on Saturday, officials said. The military said they fashioned nooses from their bedsheets in what the prison camps commander, Rear Adm. Harry Harris, called ``an act of asymmetrical warfare waged against us."

Civilian defense lawyers have described increasing desperation by captives held for more than four years here. They say the detainees have few ways -- other than to harm themselves -- to protest their indefinite confinement.

"The deaths over the weekend came as absolutely no surprises to the attorneys," Gitanjali Gutierrez of the Center for Constitutional Rights told reporters in Washington.

She said the center, which coordinates some captives' federal habeas corpus petitions, has worked since February 2002 ``to get the military to concern itself with mental health and living conditions."

Lawyers for some of the detainees held a news conference in Washington to urge closure of this prison camp in light of the weekend suicides.

No timeline was available today on when the autopsy results might be made public.

A Muslim Navy cleric arrived from Quantico, Va., Sunday and as of today was working with other Muslim military employees to make sure the bodies of the deceased captives were receiving proper Muslim rites and preparation.

"The bodies are now in the morgue at the naval hospital in Guantánamo and they are being handled with great reverence and respect and observance of the Islamic rules with regard to the handling of the deceased," said Durand.

At the same time, U.S. diplomats were negotiating with Saudi Arabia and Yemen on whether they would be sent to their homelands for burial.

Military sources say repatriation is likely.

The Muslim chaplain, Navy Lt. Abuhena Saiful Islam, said the bodies would be washed, wrapped in white shrouds and placed in a coffin here, facing the direction of Mecca. Prayers would also be said, according to Saiful Islam, who is an imam , a Muslim prayer leader.

Commanders would decide whether fellow detainees would be able to participate in the prayers, he added.

Sunday night, the Pentagon issued a release that described the three men as captured in Afghanistan, two with ties to al Qaeda and the third as a Taliban fighter.

One, Ali Abdullah Ahmed, was described as an al Qaeda operative with alleged links to the now U.S.-held al Qaeda mastermind known as Abu Zubaydeh. Another, Mani Shaman Turki al Habardi al Utaybi, had been cleared for release from the prison, so long as he was transferred to detention elsewhere.

The alleged Taliban fighter is Yassar Talal al Zahrani, a 21-year-old Saudi who would have been captured and brought here as a teenager.

It is not yet known if the three men were among the 25 percent of detainees being regularly interrogated at this remote, offshore Navy base.

DOJ_NMG_0033076

None had previously attempted suicide, Durand said.

He did not know if the Saudi cleared for release had been intended to be aboard a May 18 Saudi Airways flight that left this base with 15 detainees, for continued investigation and possible trial in their oil-rich kingdom.

The Saudi foreign minister had announced the deal in mid-May, saying the kingdom had arranged to take 16 citizens from this remote, offshore detention center. In the end, though, the U.S. military released only 15.

The military said none of the three men who killed themselves had lawyers, and none faced war-crimes charges.

Also, none had "ongoing psychological illness," said the Pentagon's top medical professional, Dr. William Winkenwerder Jr., who accompanied the general on Sunday's visit. Moreover, none of the three were on prescription drugs, said Winkenwerder, assistant secretary of defense for health affairs.

According to the Center for Constitutional Rights, lawyers had by January met with only 130 of the detainees here.

A "vast majority have no access to any outside counsel," Gutierrez said. ``They are entering their fifth year of imprisonment, held in isolation. The amount of psychiatric stress cannot be underestimated."

Gitmo Detainee Was Cleared For Transfer (AP)

By Andrew Selsky

AP, June 12, 2006

One of the Guantanamo detainees who committed suicide had been cleared for transfer to another country, a second allegedly was involved in an Afghanistan prison uprising in which a CIA agent died, and a third had ties to al-Qaida.

The Defense Department on Sunday identified the three as Mani Shaman Turki al-Habardi Al-Utaybi, Yassar Talal Al-Zahrani and Ali Abdullah Ahmed of Yemen.

The U.S. military said the bodies of the two Saudis and one Yemeni were found in their cells on Saturday, hanging from sheets and clothing. Officials said all three left suicide notes, the contents of which have not been made public.

Their deaths touched off new scrutiny and criticism of the prison, with human rights groups and foreign officials demanding the facility be closed.

An influential U.S. senator called for the government to move faster in determining the fate of hundreds of Guantanamo detainees who have been imprisoned for up to 4 1/2 years.

President Bush, who was spending the weekend at Camp David, expressed "serious concern" about the incident, White House press secretary Tony Snow said.

His immediate concerns were making sure that an investigation was being conducted and that the bodies were "treated humanely and with cultural sensitivity," Snow said.

About 460 people are being held on suspicion of links to al-Qaida and the Taliban at the isolated U.S. military base in southeastern Cuba.

The military maintains the detainees pose a danger to the United States and its allies. But only 10 detainees have been charged, and many claim they were not involved in al-Qaida or were low-level Taliban members who never intended to harm the United States.

None of the three who committed suicide had been formally charged. Al-Utaybi and Al-Zahrani were identified earlier by Saudi authorities.

U.S. authorities allege Ahmed, 28, was a mid- to high-level al-Qaida operative with ties to key al-Qaida facilitators and senior membership. He had been noncompliant and hostile to guards throughout his time in Guantanamo and participated in a hunger strike from late 2005 to May 2006, the Defense Department said. Ahmed was born in Shebwa, Yemen.

Al-Zahrani, 21, was accused of being a front-line fighter for the Taliban who facilitated weapons purchases for Taliban offensives against U.S. and coalition forces. Born in Yenbo, Saudi Arabia, he was allegedly involved in a 2001 prison uprising in Mazar-e-Sharif, Afghanistan, that resulted in the death of CIA officer Johnny Michael Spann.

The U.S. military accused al-Utaybi, 30, of being a member of a militant missionary group, Jama'at Al Tablighi. He was born in Al-Qarara, Saudi Arabia, according to a Defense Department list of Guantanamo detainees.

DOJ_NMG_0033077

Al-Utaybi had been recommended for transfer to another country for continued detention, though the Defense Department did not specify where. Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand, a spokesman for the Guantanamo detention center, said he did not know whether al-Utaybi had been informed about the transfer recommendation before he killed himself.

Though the military termed the deaths apparent suicides, the Navy was investigating to establish the official cause of death. Military medical experts completed autopsies on the men on Sunday afternoon, Durand said. He did not know when the autopsy report would be issued.

The detainees tried to prevent guards from seeing them commit suicide, The New York Times reported Monday, raising questions about long it took military guards to discover them. The newspaper quoted Durand as saying one of the prisoners hanged himself behind laundry drying from the ceiling of his cell and had arranged to make his bed look as if he were still in it. He said the two other detainees took similar steps.

Navy Lt. Abuhena M. Saiful-Islam, an imam, was brought to the base to ensure that the bodies were handled according to Islamic rites, and Guantanamo officials were prepared to perform an Islamic burial at the base if needed, Durand said.

While U.S. officials argued the suicides were political acts aimed at hurting the United States' standing in the world, defense lawyers, human rights activists and former detainees said prisoners are desperate after years in captivity and some view suicide as the only way out — even though Islam forbids it.

"A stench of despair hangs over Guantanamo," said Mark Denbeaux, a law professor at Seton Hall University in New Jersey who along with his son, Joshua, represents two Tunisians at Guantanamo. "Everyone is shutting down and quitting."

International demands to close the prison grew over the weekend.

Danish Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen, who supported President Bush in the Iraq war, said the detention center's procedures violate "the very principle of the rule of law" and weaken the fight against terrorism.

Swedish Foreign Minister Jan Eliasson said the deaths underlined the need to close the camp and bring detainees to trial or free them. Eliasson said the 25-nation European Union believes the facility should be closed.

The suicides hit a sore point with Saudis, who are angry that more than 130 of their countrymen are at Guantanamo. The country's semiofficial human rights organization demanded an independent investigation, questioning whether torture drove the men to suicide.

"There are no independent monitors at the detention camp so it is easy to pin the crime on the prisoners, considering it is possible they were tortured," said Mufleh al-Qahtani, the group's deputy director.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said he would like to see the detainees' cases judged more quickly.

"Where we have evidence they ought to be tried, and if convicted they ought to be sentenced," he said on CNN's "Late Edition."

Specter said that without charges, many of the prisoners are "just out there in limbo."

U.S. authorities said they were considering suspending hearings by military tribunals pending a Supreme Court ruling on whether Bush overstepped his authority in setting up the tribunals.

Until the deaths, officials reported 41 unsuccessful suicide attempts by 25 detainees since the U.S. began taking prisoners to the base in January 2002. Defense lawyers contend the number of suicide attempts is higher.

Independent Probe Urged For Suicides Of Detainees (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

Human rights groups and defense lawyers yesterday called for an independent investigation into the three detainee suicides at the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, questioning the military's preliminary explanation of how the men killed themselves and the way U.S. officials have characterized the deaths.

Since the detainees used makeshift nooses in their cells early Saturday, U.S. officials have called the three deaths an act of "asymmetric warfare" and a public relations move aimed at riling the international community. Military commanders said the men -- described as having terrorist ties -- used creative methods to surreptitiously kill themselves while seeking martyrdom, and dismissed assertions that the suicides were the desperate acts of depressed captives.

DOJ_NMG_0033078

Amnesty International officials said yesterday that an independent investigation "is a matter of absolute urgency" and is the only way to find out what happened in the detainees' cells. In a written statement, the officials said an ongoing Naval Criminal Investigative Service probe will not be sufficient in light of comments U.S. officials have made.

The International Committee of the Red Cross, which has open and regular access to the Guantanamo Bay facility, plans to send a delegation in coming days to look into the suicides. The group made a similar assessment there last month, when there was a riot after a series of suicide attempts.

"This is no inquiry or investigation; it's a follow-up to find out what happened, to assess the mood in the camp," said Simon Schorno, an ICRC spokesman in Washington. "It's routine."

The Bush administration sought to distance itself from comments Colleen Graffy, deputy assistant U.S. secretary of state for public diplomacy, made to the BBC, in which she called the suicides a "good P.R. move." Sean McCormack, a State Department spokesman, said yesterday that the department would not characterize the deaths that way and said that U.S. officials "have serious concerns anytime anybody takes their own life."

Pentagon officials have provided some details about the deaths, saying that the detainees secretly fashioned nooses out of clothes and bedsheets, then evaded the guards' attention long enough to take their lives.

David Remes, a defense lawyer for 17 Yemeni detainees at Guantanamo Bay, said he is skeptical of the military's version.

"There's no way to verify anything that the military says down there because as usual, their stance is: 'Trust us,' " Remes said. "We have to take their word for it. What's really needed is an independent investigation."

Chinese Muslims Search For Sanctuary (WT)

By Bruce I. Konviser

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

TIRANA, Albania -- Authorities are looking for a new home for five Chinese Muslims who have been held in a refugee camp in a diplomatic limbo since being transferred to Albania from the U.S. prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, last month.

Albanian officials say they see no viable future for the men in one of Europe's poorest countries, where no one speaks their language and the culture is fundamentally alien to their central Asian background.

The five ethnic Uighurs, from western China, arrived here a month ago after the U.S. administration brokered a deal for them to be given political asylum. The Bush administration released them after determining that they did not pose a terrorist threat but will not allow them to resettle in the United States and fears they will be tortured or executed if they are returned to China.

Beijing considers the men terrorists for advocating independence and is demanding that they be repatriated. Albanian officials insist that the men will not be sent to China in spite of intense pressure from Beijing but say they should not remain permanently in Albania.

"Their future is not here," said Argita Totozani, the national commissioner for refugees. "There is not a Uighur community. They don't speak any Albanian. They don't speak any Chinese. There is no integration possibility for them here."

The United States hoped that the men -- who had asked to go to a European country after being told they could not live in the United States -- would readily assimilate in Albania, which shares their Muslim faith. But the Uighurs' distinct language is not spoken in Albania.

Albanian officials made it nearly impossible to interview the men, even when arrangements were made in advance with their attorney.

Mrs. Totozani said arrangements to meet the five should be made through Ali Rasha, the director of the refugee camp where they are being held. But Mr. Rasha said he could not help, insisting, "I don't have the authority."

Regardless of religious persuasion or cultural background, Albania is a grim place to live. Fewer than 100 people have sought long-term resettlement here in the past 10 years, according to Albanian and U.N. officials.

DOJ_NMG_0033079

"Albania is a transit country," said Hossein Kheradmand of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. "People don't come here for asylum because of the economic situation. They come from the east and try to cross Albania to get into Western Europe. When they are intercepted by police because of illegal entry, then they apply for asylum."

The per capita income of Albania's 3.5 million people is a little more than $2,000 a year, according to the World Bank. The official unemployment rate is 16 percent, but in reality, it is probably higher than 30 percent.

The CIA Web site reports that more than 50 percent of the country's road network remains unpaved. And there are only eight phone lines per 100 people, the lowest line density in Europe.

The five Uighurs were apparently swept up by bounty hunters in Pakistan and delivered to U.S. forces in the aftermath of the September 11 attacks on the United States.

"After these men were determined not to be enemy combatants, the United States reached out to over 100 countries to try to arrange for their resettlement," a senior State Department official said in an exchange of e-mails. The official said an "administrative decision" had been made not to offer them asylum in the United States.

The administration has not publicly explained why the men cannot resettle in the United States, but Mrs. Totozani said her government understood that "because of the atmosphere and the September 11 story, the Americans would not really want Guantanamo Bay ex-prisoners to be part of their society."

An American attorney is actively looking for a new home for the men, Mrs. Totozani said.

"They are trying to find a resettlement somewhere else -- in America or Canada," she said. "I've heard they have relatives in Canada. There is a good community in Canada for Uighurs."

Suicides Change Nothing (USAT)

By Douglas W. Kmiec

USA Today, June 13, 2006

In 2004, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that "the capture, detention and trial of unlawful combatants" is important in war for the purpose of preventing "captured individuals from returning to the field of battle and taking up arms once again."

The unfortunate suicides of three Guantanamo Bay detainees do not change this.

We are fighting an unprovoked war on terror that began in the 1990s with the radical Islamic jihad "to kill Americans wherever found." It has included assaults on our military personnel in Somalia, the 1993 World Trade Center bombings, the destruction of U.S. Embassies in Africa, the 2000 bombing of the USS Cole, and the unrequited murder of nearly 3,000 civilians on 9/11.

Most Guantanamo detainees were captured in Afghanistan. The president ordered them treated "humanely." While each has been interrogated for information to forestall future attacks, each has also had chances to explain perceived assistance to al-Qaeda.

These status reviews were intended to fulfill Geneva standards. With its Detainee Treatment Act, Congress implicitly recognized and improved their fairness, providing for appeal to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. This respected court will also review war crime trials before military commissions. If the Supreme Court OKs the commissions, Osama bin Laden's driver and others can then face trial in the support of terrorist actions.

In earlier wars, detainees were held for years with no thought of trial. That said, the Janus-faced peace that uneasily coexists with a terror war perplexes us, and so it was right to release about 300 Guantanamo detainees, even as some rejoined enemy ranks.

Some foreign leaders posture as if Guantanamo's doors should just fly open. Residents of Madrid and London might dissent. Even so, the international criticism should not be dismissed. It should be seen as implied willingness to share the cost and burden of detention. If we can't try all the detainees, serious thought ought be given to having the U.N. convene an ad hoc international court. As mother used to say, "It's easy to criticize."

Douglas W. Kmiec, professor of constitutional law at Pepperdine University, is a former constitutional legal counsel to Presidents Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush.

Guantanamo Deaths Deepen Harm To U.S. Image Abroad (USAT)

USA Today, June 13, 2006

Over the weekend, three detainees at the U.S. prison camp at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, did what many had failed to do before them: They committed suicide. That might not seem like a big deal when set against the scores who die violently in Iraq and elsewhere every week.

The camp commander, Rear Adm. Harry Harris, said the suicides were "not an act of desperation, but an act of asymmetrical warfare waged against us" that proves the detainees "have no regard for life."

So, is it all right to say good riddance, pronounce the deaths yet more regrettable casualties of an ugly war, and move on?

Unfortunately, no.

Most of those still held at Guantanamo Bay are undoubtedly opposed to everything America represents, and conditions at Guantanamo have given them a weapon in the battle to persuade Muslims that we are a nation that preaches ideals for others but fails to live by them ourselves.

The Founding Fathers created the USA as a new and different nation, one based on rights and laws. Guantanamo Bay achieves the opposite. The inmates are being kept in a Kafkaesque legal limbo. When the prison opened in January 2002, the Bush administration officially declared them "enemy combatants" and said they were not protected under the Geneva Conventions.

Since then, the administration has been secretive about who the detainees are, what their alleged crimes are and what conditions they are being kept in. Reports from the United Nations and others allege treatment tantamount to torture.

There has been some minor relief. The United States has quietly released about 300 prisoners — it holds more than 400 now — and admitted that some should never have been held. Under pressure, it said it would abide by Geneva Conventions' guidelines and in April released the detainees' names.

After the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in 2004 that the Guantanamo prisoners were entitled to due process, the administration said it would revive World War II military tribunals in which standards are lower and much of the evidence is secret. Only 10 cases have been brought, though, and none tried. The high court is expected to rule soon on a case, involving Osama bin Laden's former driver, that will determine whether the tribunals are sufficient.

The United States cannot be naive about people it captures. In their initial months in custody, some might provide useful intelligence — though it's hard to believe any of those still at Guantanamo do now.

But every day that Guantanamo remains a symbol of un-American behavior, it inspires more al-Qaeda recruits and more terrorism. International calls for its closure have reached a deafening crescendo, including, recently, from close ally Britain.

Reports of hunger strikes and suicides add to the sense that the prison has become more of a liability than an asset in the war on terrorism. A poll last year by the Pew Research Center indicated as much, as it recorded widespread international resentment of the United States.

President Bush insists he "would like to end" Guantanamo but needs first to wait for the Supreme Court ruling. That won't do. What Guantanamo represents needs changing, and immediately. It's time to lay out the evidence against those who need to be charged and release those who don't.

The Gitmo Suicides (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

The suicide of three prisoners at Guantanamo Bay has elicited another chorus of anti-U.S. rhetoric from the self-styled "human rights" crowd. Sigh.

The dead men were among the most irredeemable jihadists, which is why they were still there this long after the fall of the Taliban regime in Afghanistan. One of them participated in the Mazar-e-Sharif prison uprising in which CIA officer Johnny "Mike" Spann was killed. Another was an al Qaeda recruiter. The third was an al Qaeda operative who had lately been engaging in hunger strikes and other disruptive behavior.

Many other Gitmo detainees have long since been released, although getting other countries to accept their return hasn't been as easy as their champions would have you believe. Guantanamo guards have also gone to extraordinary lengths to keep many of these people alive, force-feeding hunger strikers and thwarting what the press has reported to be 41 suicide attempts already.

DOJ_NMG_0033081

If there's any scandal here, it's that anti-U.S. activists have made it so difficult to handle al Qaeda prisoners in a more efficient manner. On the one hand they complain of the "incredible despair" (Human Rights Watch) of indefinite detention. On the other, they have done their best to prevent the U.S. from processing them through the military court system that President Bush authorized in late 2001. The Supreme Court is due to rule on one of these challenges -- Hamdan v. Rumsfeld -- later this month.

The activists shouldn't be allowed to have it both ways. Either the Gitmo detainees are legitimate prisoners of war, in which case they can't be prosecuted but can be held for the duration of the conflict as in all previous wars. Or they are unlawful combatants (because they fought out of uniform and targeted civilians), in which case there should be no issue at all about moving ahead and trying them in military tribunals.

Religious Leaders Urge U.S. To Ban Torture (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

Twenty-seven religious leaders, including megachurch pastor Rick Warren, Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel and Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick of Washington, have signed a statement urging the United States to "abolish torture now -- without exceptions."

The statement, being published in newspaper advertisements starting today, is the opening salvo of a new organization called the National Religious Campaign Against Torture, which has formed in response to allegations of human rights abuse at U.S. detention centers in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Titled "Torture is a Moral Issue," the statement says that torture "violates the basic dignity of the human person" and "contradicts our nation's most cherished values." "Nothing less is at stake in the torture abuse crisis than the soul of our nation. What does it signify if torture is condemned in word but allowed in deed?" it asks.

The signers come from a broad range of denominations and include notable religious conservatives, such as the Rev. Ted Haggard, president of the National Association of Evangelicals; Archbishop Demetrios, primate of the Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of America; and the Rev. William J. Byron, former president of Catholic University.

By suggesting that recent abuse of prisoners may not be just an aberration but a reflection of U.S. policy, the statement contains an implicit challenge to the Bush administration, according to some signers.

"I'm not persuaded that this issue has been put to bed yet by the Bush administration," said David P. Gushee, a philosophy professor at Union University in Tennessee who wrote an influential article against torture this year in Christianity Today, an evangelical magazine. "I'm worried that we still don't truly know what is going on in all our detention centers around the world."

Deputy White House press secretary Dana Perino said the administration has "the utmost respect for all these religious leaders." But, she said, "I'll simply repeat what the president has said many times, which is that this government does not torture, and we adhere to the international conventions against torture. That is our policy, and it will remain our policy."

On its Web site, the National Religious Campaign Against Torture urges Congress and the president to "remove all ambiguities" by prohibiting secret U.S. prisons around the world, ending the rendition of suspects to countries that use torture, granting the Red Cross access to all detainees and not exempting any arm of the government from human rights standards.

McCarrick said last night that he had signed on to "the general principle" that torture is unacceptable but had not seen the new organization's specific proposals. Gushee said he is "not sure that everyone who signed the statement would concur with that platform," though he said he, personally, does.

Terror Suspects Charge Abuse In Canada Prison (NYT)

By Anthony DePalma

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

BRAMPTON, Ontario, June 12 — Defense lawyers representing several of the men held on terrorism charges in an Ontario maximum security prison say their clients have been beaten by guards, threatened by other inmates and held in isolation.

DOJ_NMG_0033082

The lawyers made the accusations outside the courtroom here as preliminary bail hearings were about to begin for the 17 suspects arrested June 3.

Two were reprimanded in the courtroom when they shouted that they had been abused. "These wounds speak for themselves," one of them yelled from the prisoner box, as they held up shackled hands.

A spokeswoman for the prison where most of the men are being held said the accusations were being investigated.

Several hours after the lawyers repeated the abuse accusations in court, the presiding justice issued a publication ban on the bail hearings for all 17 suspects, at the request of the prosecutor and one of the suspects.

The ban prohibits reporting on evidence presented in court during the bail proceedings. Proceedings involving the five suspects charged as young offenders were already subject to a ban. Because the lawyers initially made the abuse accusations outside court on Monday, those statements were not covered by the ban.

Bail proceedings in Canada are routinely subject to such bans, which are intended to keep potential jurors from being tainted by news reports.

Several defense lawyers objected to the gag order, saying the charges that the men plotted to terrorize Canada with truck bombs and other kidnappings were baseless and should be subjected to public scrutiny.

"I want the public to know exactly the allegations against my client," said Rocco Galati, who represents Ahmad Mustafa Ghany, 21, of Mississauga, Ontario, who is accused of participating in a terrorist group. "Up to now, the public has seen only what the police want them to see by filtering and selecting information."

Lawyers also hoped to speak freely about the conditions under which the suspects were being detained.

David Kolinsky, who represents Zakaria Amara, 20, said his client was pinned to the ground a few days ago by a guard who poked his finger into Mr. Amara's cheek and flicked him in the eye. "His face is still sore," Mr. Kolansky said.

Most of the suspects have been held at the Maplehurst Correctional Center in Milton, Ontario, west of Toronto. The maximum-security prison, one of the largest in Canada, holds about 1,100 inmates, said Julia Noonan, the prison's spokeswoman.

"We take any allegations that come forward very seriously, and we look into them," she said. But she said the prison had received no reports of any abuse before Monday.

Ms. Noonan said it was common at Maplehurst to keep cell lights on 24 hours a day. At night those lights are dimmed, but the corridors remain fully lighted, she said.

A 20-minute exercise period is standard, and inmates are monitored by video camera outside their cells to protect them from attacks by other inmates, she said.

Canada's Social Stance Is Tested By Arrests (WSJ)

By Elena Cherney

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

MISSISSAUGA, Ontario -- The recent arrest of 17 Ontario suspects on terrorism-related charges has lifted the lid on a simmering controversy among Canada's Muslims: A segment of this growing community worries that an increasing number of mosques have come under the sway of fundamentalist imams.

While the validity of the allegations -- from planned bombings to hostage-taking -- remains to be seen, the arrests in themselves have given worried congregants an opportunity to raise a red flag. They say the messages delivered in some mosques -- such as the Al-Rahman Islamic Center here -- may help explain why police believe the 17 men and youths might have been drawn into a group that allegedly conspired to blow up buildings in the Toronto area and schemed about taking politicians hostage in Ottawa. Most of those arrested, age 15 to 43 years old, have spent all or most of their lives in Canada.

News of an alleged homegrown terrorist plot has shocked Canadians and stirred questions about the country's liberal immigration program and its policy of multiculturalism. Even on the left, some Canadians are now questioning whether the country's "mosaic" approach to cultural communities has encouraged some to resist embracing values broadly shared by other Canadians.

DOJ_NMG_0033083

The men, handcuffed and shackled at the ankles, appeared yesterday in court in Brampton, west of Toronto. Bail hearings were postponed until later this week, with some hearings delayed until later in the month.

Some defense lawyers argued that their clients' solitary confinement in small cells, with the lights on 24 hours a day, violates their rights. One lawyer told the court his client was beaten by a guard, while another said a guard threatened one suspect with gang rape; prosecutors responded that prisoner treatment isn't within their office's jurisdiction. With details about the government's case still sketchy, defense lawyer Rocco Galati demanded that the hearings be broadcast live from the courtroom "to counteract the frenzy" that he says is resulting from "misinformation" that is being leaked selectively.

Justice Keith Currie of the Ontario Court of Justice granted the crown prosecutor's request for a publication ban, meaning there will be a media blackout on details at least until the trial. Lawyers for at least two media outlets are expected to challenge the ban.

Critics of the mosques say that few imams -- if any -- overtly advocate violence. But by telling worshippers that Islam is under siege and that Muslims are being victimized in North America, these spiritual leaders, many of whom are schooled overseas before arriving in Canada, may foster a breeding ground for Canadian extremists, the critics say.

While most of Canada's estimated 750,000 Muslims don't share the views of these imams, few are willing to stand up and object to their clerics, some moderates say. "Extremists have not only penetrated the community, they dominate the community," says Salim Mansur, a political science professor at the University of Western Ontario. "This storm that has hit Canada has been brewing throughout Canada for at least a decade."

Other community leaders question whether extremists have gained broad influence over Muslim communities. At most prayer services, "the message is love, peace, harmony, respect for your fellow man," says Shafiq Qaadri, a member of the Ontario legislature whose constituency includes an area with many Muslim voters. Mr. Qaadri says he believes "there are perhaps some radical elements. No doubt they exist." But he adds that their message is delivered to "a subselection of people" at small study groups.

Senior officials of the new Conservative government in Ottawa say the recent arrests show the country's efforts to combat terrorism are working. Most of those arrested are Canadian citizens, they note. And cooperation from the Muslim community has been instrumental in helping authorities' anti-terrorism efforts, officials say.

Other observers say it is mistaken to blame multiculturalism for creating enclaves. "Multiculturalism celebrates diversity," says Colin Kenny, chairman of the Canadian Senate's committee on national security.

Seven of the arrested men were regulars at the Al-Rahman Islamic Center in a Mississauga strip mall, including the oldest, Qayyum Abdul Jamal, 43, and Fahim Ahmad, 21, both of whom face explosives charges. Messrs. Jamal and Ahmad, along with five others, were part of a Quran study group that also met for activities such as soccer and Chinese meals, according to a friend of the group.

One of the religious leaders at the storefront mosque is a Saudi-educated imam. He declined a request for an interview through the mosque's lawyer, Tariq Shah. Al-Rahman sermons didn't seek to stir worshippers to jihad, Mr. Shah says.

Anjum Ahmed, who owns the Hasty Market convenience store next to the mosque, says he prayed there on Fridays. When he saw the news reports of the arrests among his fellow worshippers, he says, "I was shocked." The men sometimes popped into his store "to buy pop, ice cream. They seemed like normal people."

Mr. Jamal wasn't a leader at the mosque but rather a dedicated volunteer who "was always willing to come forward and put the garbage out. He would change the toilet paper," says his lawyer, Mr. Shah. Despite the high-profile arrests, he added, "most of the Muslims, they love the country they live in."

But Munir Sami, a director of the Muslim Canadian Congress, says multiculturalism has helped foster "ghettoes" of middle-class Muslims in places such as Mississauga, a city of more than 500,000 west of Toronto where most of the arrested men lived with their families and attended mosques.

Aly Hindy, the imam of one of the two mosques frequented by members of the group, rejects suggestions that he or his congregants are extremists. Mr. Hindy says the allegations against the 17 are trumped up by Canadian security officials to justify their budgets.

DOJ_NMG_0033084

Many Canadian imams are educated at Saudi universities and follow an extreme fundamentalist version of the religion, says Tarek Fatah, a spokesman for the Muslim Canadian Congress, a self-described "grassroots" group that favors a modern approach to Islam.

Until now, many moderates stayed quiet, some observers say. "They have been pretty well intimidated" by the fundamentalists, says Martin Collacott, a former Canadian ambassador to the Middle East who wrote a recent report for the Fraser Institute, a think tank, on Canada's response to terrorism. "They are going to have to speak up."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Technologists Assail Federal Net-tapping Rules (CNET)

By Anne Broache And Declan McCullagh, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News.com, June 13, 2006

Federal regulations saying that police must be able to tap into Internet phone conversations with ease are coming under renewed attack from academics, engineers and one of the Net's founding fathers.

A 21-page study to be released Tuesday says it's impossible for the government to expect all products that use voice over Internet protocol, or VoIP, to comply with the Federal Communications Commission's September 2005 requirement mandating wiretapping backdoors for government surveillance. That requirement is backed by the Bush administration.

The study, organized by the Information Technology Association of America, says that because VoIP relies on a fundamentally different network architecture from that of traditional phone lines, such a mandate would pose "enormous costs" to the industry and could even introduce significant security risks.

The nine contributors included Vint Cerf, Google's chief Internet evangelist and one of the Net's founding fathers; Steven Bellovin and Matt Blaze, both prominent computer security professors who specialize in security; Clinton Brooks, a former National Security Agency official; and engineers from Sun Microsystems and Intel.

The report follows a ruling Friday by a federal appeals court in Washington, D.C., that upheld the legality of the FCC's wiretapping regulations. Librarians, community colleges, and companies including Sun had challenged the rules, saying the FCC did not have the authority to extend the Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act, or CALEA, to the Internet. (The decision may be appealed.)

Even without the FCC rules that are scheduled to take effect in May 2007, police have the legal authority to conduct Internet wiretaps--that's precisely what the FBI's Carnivore system was designed to do. Still, the FBI has claimed, the need for "standardized broadband intercept capabilities is especially urgent in light of today's heightened threats to homeland security and the ongoing tendency of criminals to use the most clandestine modes of communication."

The controversy over the FCC mandatory wiretapping regulations comes as the Bush administration is facing increasing congressional pressure, especially from Sen. Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, over its telephone and Internet surveillance program overseen by the National Security Agency. AT&T is being sued in a separate case in San Francisco over allegations that it cooperated in a way that violated federal privacy laws.

The nature of VoIP could also elevate the risk that authorities aren't eavesdropping on the person they originally had in mind, the ITAA report's authors argue. Because it's theoretically simple for an individual to acquire multiple VoIP phone numbers, "recognizing and tracking the multiple identities that are so natural to the Internet lifestyle would be taxing."

In addition, the study says, allowing full access by law enforcement would almost certainly require overhauling inherently decentralized networks to allow for certain points where interception would take place--and open up new security risks in the process. That's because such an arrangement would arguably make it easier for hackers to capture identity information and passwords, engage in "man-in-the-middle alteration of data," or potentially spoof the communications going on.

"It's sort of like if you were chasing someone and you knew they had to go over a particular bridge," said Mark Uncapher, a senior vice president at ITAA.

Though there may be some security concerns, the benefits of mandating wiretapping access outweigh the costs, said Tim Richardson, senior legislative liaison for the Fraternal Order of Police. (Many police organizations, including the National Sheriffs'

DOJ_NMG_0033085

Association, the Police Executive Research Forum, the Illinois State Police and the Tennessee Bureau of Investigation petitioned the FCC in favor of the wiretapping rules.)

"If that was going to increase the propensity for crime, that's something that law enforcement would take a look at," Richardson said. "But the adaptability of technology is so great in this day and age that I have a high degree of faith in the initiative that (companies would employ to find something) that's not as costly and doesn't compromise the security of their networks."

Complexities involved in meeting such a mandate exist on a number of levels, the ITAA report said. One problem is that, in contrast to traditional telephones, whose calls can virtually always be traced to a centralized switching location, VoIP users are often nomadic.

"The paradigm of VoIP intercept difficulty is a call between two road warriors who constantly change locations and who, for example, may call from a cafe in Boston to a hotel room in Paris and an hour later from an office in Cambridge to a gift shop at the Louvre," the report says, and adds that building in mandatory wiretapping hubs for real-time interception is so expensive that it could put smaller companies out of business.

Air Marshals Warn Their Bullets Are Too Powerful (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

Federal air marshals say their guns are loaded with bullets capable of running through more than one person, metal doors and thick glass -- too much firepower for an airplane.

"Not only is the person getting shot in danger, but everyone on the plane is because of the distance it travels," said one air marshal who testified in a recently completed House Judiciary Committee investigation of policies marshals deemed dangerous.

Several marshals say their bullets can penetrate most of the material in planes, leaving pilots and the plane's hydraulics and flight-control system vulnerable if a weapon is discharged. Cockpit doors have been hardened with steel, but the walls on either side of the door have not.

Another marshal told the House committee agents should be issued ammunition loaded with frangible bullets, which break into smaller pieces on impact and thus have limited power to exit the target and continue.

"An aircraft is made up of composites, plastics, and aluminum. If a round were to penetrate through the front plastic/composite windshield of the aircraft, the results would be catastrophic at 500 miles per hour. We should be using frangible ammunition. It's a no-brainer," the Nov. 27 memo said.

The House Judiciary report, released last week, included the committee's concerns about the ammunition, but the Transportation Security Administration's response was redacted from the report.

Federal Air Marshal Service Director Dana Brown is reviewing the agency's use of a .357-caliber handgun and Speer Gold Dot .357 SIG round, nonfrangible ammunition, said FAMS spokesman Conan Bruce.

Mr. Bruce said air marshals used to use frangible ammunition but switched weapons and ammunition after researching testing by outside groups. The change was approved by former FAMS Director Thomas Quinn, a former Secret Service agent.

Massad Ayoob, a ballistics authority and director of the Lethal Force Institute, calls the ammunition "an excellent load" that the Secret Service uses to protect the president. The bullet is designed to expand in the body to cause greater physical harm.

"If you get a peripheral hit in the arm, it has enough power to keep going and kill whoever it hits," said Mr. Ayoob, who explained that the bullet moves 1,350 feet per second.

"It's no trick to change the ammunition load they are using now to 1,500 feet per second to get a 10-inch, very substantial wound, and it would minimize the likelihood of an exit," Mr. Ayoob said. "That would reduce penetration by a few inches and widen the wound, which brings about a faster cessation of the action."

Federal air marshals have tough shooting requirements and "are among the best shooters in law enforcement," Mr. Ayoob says.

Don Strange, former special agent in charge of the FAMS Atlanta field office, said the ammunition FAMS agents use is good for the Secret Service and other law enforcement but not in the "tube of an airplane."

"It would penetrate at least the first body, but it can also penetrate a second and possibly third body," Mr. Strange said.

DOJ_NMG_0033086

Mr. Strange has more than 30 years of federal law-enforcement experience but says he was fired from FAMS by Mr. Quinn for criticizing the agency's choice of ammunition, dress code and other policies.

When Mr. Strange informed officials at FAMS headquarters of his concern about the weapon's load, "I told them I hoped the reason we were using it was not because Quinn wants us to, and they said that is the reason."

Philip Van Cleave, a former deputy sheriff and president of the Virginia Citizens Defense League, said he was surprised to learn the marshals are not using frangible firepower.

"It's ironic that the very people who are carrying the guns are complaining, that tells you something there -- they don't want to be underarmed, but they want to be able to protect passengers," Mr. Van Cleave said.

Several thousand pilots are trained to carry guns to protect the cockpit, however David Mackett, president of the Airline Pilots Security Alliance, declined to say what kind of weapons or ammunition are used by federal flight-deck officers.

"The federal air marshals are competent and experienced law enforcement, and I would take any recommendations they would make very seriously," Mr. Mackett said.

The House investigation said in its report released last week that policies dictating dress and boarding procedures in sight of passengers undermine the marshals' anonymity and suggested that any marshal who initiated changes fell victim to retaliation.

In its response to the committee, the Transportation Security Administration, which manages FAMS, said the policies have been changed. Air marshals who spoke to panel lawyers disagreed with the TSA's claims in interviews with The Washington Times.

City Rethinking Security Plan After Cut In Homeland Aid (NYT)

By Al Baker And Sewell Chan

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

The Bloomberg administration wanted to spend $111 million in the coming year to install a sprawling security camera system in the Wall Street area. To be modeled on London's so-called Ring of Steel, the plan involved placing video cameras at half of the 535 intersections south of Canal Street and installing surveillance equipment capable of zeroing in on details as small as a license plate.

It also included beefing up police patrols and using officers specially trained to handle truck and car bombs, as well as employing mobile barriers to protect bridges, tunnels and streets, police officials said.

But the plan, the Lower Manhattan Security Initiative, is being rethought since the Department of Homeland Security cut the city's security grant to $124.5 million this year from $207.6 million last year, Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly said yesterday. He was testifying at a City Council hearing on the impact of the reduction.

"The immediate impact — the biggest impact — will be a cessation of the Lower Manhattan Security Initiative," Mr. Kelly said. "We're going to have to regroup and take a very hard look at that plan."

When questioned after the hearing, he said, "This program right now has been put on hold until we can take a look at the funding stream."

The commissioner's testimony seemed to strike a different tone from city officials' public declarations two weeks ago, when they learned of the cutbacks. Many had said the city would find a way to plug any financial holes itself. They also said no programs would be noticeably altered.

The cuts have prompted officials of both parties to question the Department of Homeland Security. Last week, leaders in New York's financial services industry, including Goldman Sachs, sent a letter to Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, calling for the money to be restored.

Yesterday, Russ Knocke, a department spokesman, said an undersecretary would work closely with the city to help expedite the flow of dollars from Washington. But he said it fell to city officials to prioritize which projects to pay for.

The city asked for about $450 million in grants this year. Its application included a request for $219.7 million for police initiatives, including $81.5 million toward the Lower Manhattan Security Initiative.

The government said the city had done a poor job articulating how the money it sought would help reduce risk in the city, and rated some highly publicized counterterrorism measures as below average in how they could be sustained financially.

DOJ_NMG_0033087

Now, with several city agencies vying for a smaller pot of federal aid, it is not just the police programs that are in jeopardy, a spokesman for Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said. The spokesman, Jordan Barowitz, said the city's counterterrorism measures spanned the Police, Fire and Health Departments. "We have difficult decisions to make," he said.

Stuart A. Klein, first deputy director of the city's Office of Management and Budget, said no final decisions had been made about which projects, within the $124.5 million, the city would pursue.

"Since we were recently notified of the reduction, we're going through a process now, analyzing the projects, working with the mayor's office and the other agencies, including Commissioner Kelly," Mr. Klein said in response to questions from Council members at the hearing. "And when a decision is made, we will forward the review of that to Homeland Security."

The Police Department's counterterrorism efforts had previously been praised by federal officials. The F.B.I. director, Robert S. Mueller III, has called its programs "models for the nation."

Police officials pointed out that in 2004, after a plot to sabotage some city financial assets was exposed, Tom Ridge, the former Department of Homeland Security secretary, came to New York and said that he doubted whether any other city had done more to prevent another terrorist attack.

Terrorist In A Bootleg T-shirt (LAT)

By Ray Lemoine, Ray Lemoine Is Coauthor, With Jeff Neumann And Donovan Webster, Of "Babylon By Bus," An Account Of L

The Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

The author mingled at madrasas and hung with Hezbollah, but that's not why Homeland Security picked him up.

Arriving at JFK from Dubai recently, I was stopped at customs by an officer from the Department of Homeland Security and directed to a drab backroom filled with Arabs, South Asians and Africans. I wasn't surprised, really, having just spent six months working and traveling in the Islamic world — Turkey, Lebanon, Egypt and Pakistan. If ever there were a DHS red-flag candidate,

I was it, and I assumed this was just protocol.

Four of those months were in Pakistan, and I had just spent a week with a journalist friend going to different madrasas, including one Islamic school visited by one of the bombers in the July 2005 attacks in London. Possibly I caught their attention by poking around the Karachi Marriot's parking lot, across from the U.S. consulate, where a suicide bomber's attack had killed a U.S. diplomat just two months before.

How about the hundreds of phone calls I made from Pakistan to friends and family back home that inevitably mentioned the Taliban's resurgence and criticized President Bush. Was I wiretapped? Certainly Homeland Security, whose stated mission is to "lead the unified national effort to secure America … prevent and deter terrorist attacks and protect against and respond to threats and hazards to the nation," had detained me for such a reason.

Or maybe officers had questions about the Jamaat-ud-Dawa rally I'd witnessed in Kashmir. The group was protesting against the United States because it recently had been added to the State Department's list of groups designated as terrorist organizations. Then there was Lebanon, where I'd traveled deep into the Hezbollah-held south.

If only.

No, these frontline warriors in the global war on terrorism at Homeland Security had far more pressing issues to question me about. "Why did you infringe on the Boston Celtics' copyright in Boston in 2003?" asked my case officer, Malik — ironically a Pakistani — from behind his high desk. Uh, because I used to sell T-shirts outside sporting events, I said, wondering what this had to do with national security.

"You've got a long record," he said. Sure, for peddling "Yankees Suck" T-shirts — sans permit, which isn't a crime but a code violation — not for promoting "Bin Laden Rulz!" DVDs or the "Idiot's Guide to Suicide Bombing."

"You know, we could have you sent up to Boston for the unresolved T-shirt infractions," Malik said. "But what we're holding you for is an NYPD bench warrant from 2004. You were in a fight with a parking attendant, found not guilty and then missed a court date." All true. But how and why does Homeland Security share the NYPD's jurisdiction in cases unrelated to counter-terrorism? A fight over a parking space hardly counts as terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0033088

"We're calling NYPD to come to pick you up," Malik told me, without asking a single question about Pakistan, terrorism, Islam or madrasas.

So I sat and waited. Four DHS officers working two cases — a Senegalese guy who was caught with $100,000 in a suitcase and mine — couldn't even get the NYPD on the phone. A debate then broke out among Malik, his co-worker and their boss about how to call the NYPD. Six hours later, the DHS still hadn't gotten word from the NYPD. A shift change was coming up, and officers aren't allowed to leave until finishing all their cases.

Instead of protecting the homeland from such a dangerous T-shirt-selling, off-road-rager like me, Malik set me free, so he could get home in time to watch Mike and the Mad Dog ("Eh, is Pedro pitchin' tonight?" I overheard an officer ask). As he closed out my paperwork, Malik asked, "So, ah, Mr. LeMoine, why did you miss that court date anyway?"

"I was in Iraq."

"Doing what? Like a contractor, soldier?"

"No. I had volunteered to run a humanitarian program for the Coalition Provisional Authority but left when they started killing Westerners."

"Damn terrorists. Take care of that warrant. And welcome home."

Welcome home indeed.

Homeland Security, the $40-billion-a-year agency set up to combat terrorism after 9/11, has been given universal jurisdiction and can hold anyone on Earth for crimes unrelated to national security — even me for a court date I missed while I was in Iraq helping America deter terror — without asking what I had been doing in Pakistan among Islamic extremists the agency is designated to stop. Instead, some of its actions are erasing the lines of jurisdiction between local police and the federal state, scarily bringing the words "police" and "state" closer together. As long as we allow Homeland Security to act like a Keystone Stasi, terrorism will continue to win in destroying our freedom.

Alberto Prompts Evacuation On Fla. Coast (AP)

By Mitch Stacy

The AP, June 12, 2006

More than 20,000 people along Florida's Gulf Coast were ordered to clear out Monday as Alberto — the very first tropical storm of the new hurricane season — unexpectedly picked up steam and threatened to come ashore as a hurricane.

Forecasters posted a hurricane warning for the Gulf Coast and a tropical storm warning from north of Daytona Beach to the Georgia-South Carolina line, saying Alberto could begin battering the coast early Tuesday. Gov. Jeb Bush signed a declaration of emergency allowing him to call up the National Guard and put laws against price gouging into effect.

"We're talking about powerful forces of nature," Bush said. "People need to take this very seriously."

If Alberto came ashore as a hurricane, it would be the earliest hurricane in 40 years to hit the United States, according to the National Hurricane Center. The earliest on record is Alma, which in 1966 struck the Florida Panhandle on June 9 — the ninth day of the hurricane season.

Alberto started as a tropical depression on Saturday, and forecasters over the weekend were confident it would not become a hurricane. But the storm's winds accelerated with startling speed from 50 mph to 70 mph in just three hours Monday morning. The minimum for a hurricane is 74 mph.

"We were surprised, but we've been surprised before," said Richard Pasch of the hurricane center. "The center in disorganized storms can re-form and jump."

Florida homeowners stocked up on chain saws, plywood and other emergency supplies. Employees at a marina in St. Petersburg said they planned to work through the night securing more than 600 boats against the wind and waves.

"This is a little earlier that I expected," said marina manager Walter Miller. "But we've had a bad couple of years, so it's not entirely unexpected."

Forecasters said Alberto would probably become only a weak Category 1 hurricane, meaning winds of 74 mph to 95 mph, because the warm water from which hurricanes draw their strength is not particularly deep in the area.

DOJ_NMG_0033089

At 5 p.m. EDT, Alberto was centered about 145 miles southwest of Cedar Key and was moving northeast at about 10 mph. Its top sustained winds remained at 70 mph.

"We don't want to overdo it. It's not a Katrina or a Wilma, but storm surge and flooding could still cause loss of life," said Max Mayfield, director of the National Hurricane Center.

Evacuation orders were posted for people in mobile homes or low-lying areas in at least five coastal counties stretching more than 100 miles. Those ordered to leave included about 21,000 residents of Citrus, Levy and Taylor counties.

Alberto was expected to blow ashore anywhere from north of Tampa to the Panhandle. Forecasters said it could bring 4 to 10 inches of rain to central Florida and southeastern Georgia. Rain already was falling Monday and at least two tornados had formed, but there were no immediate reports of any injuries or damage.

Dick Grier, a retiree from Homosassa, said he planned to gas up his car and bring in law chairs. But "at this point I don't think it's the kind of thing that we worry about," he said.

Alberto also prevented the crew of space shuttle Discovery from flying to the Kennedy Space Center from Houston for several days of dress rehearsals for their expected launch in July.

On Monday, Alberto drenched western Cuba after a weekend of heavy rains prompted evacuations, caused some dilapidated buildings to collapse and flooded low-lying areas in Havana. There were no reports of other major damage or injuries.

More than 12 inches of rain fell in some rural areas over the weekend, the official Prensa Latina news agency reported.

Scientists say the 2006 season could produce as many as 16 named storms, six of them major hurricanes. Last year's hurricane season was the most destructive on record and the busiest in 154 years of storm tracking, with a record 28 named storms and a record 15 hurricanes.

The first named storm of 2005, Tropical Storm Arlene, formed June 9 and came ashore just west of Pensacola in the Florida Panhandle.

'The Storm Has Accelerated;' Landfall Expected At 8 A.m. (TALLDEM)

By Bill Cotterell

Tallahassee Democrat, June 13, 2006

Governor Jeb Bush urged coastal residents to evacuate immediately if their homes are in low-lying areas of the Big Bend and central Gulf Coast threatened by a strengthening, accelerating Tropical Storm Alberto.

At a hastily-called evening briefing, Bush and state meteorologist Ben Nelson said the storm is expected to come ashore by about 8 a.m. in Taylor County. They said the Dixie, Levy and Taylor County area is the most threatened by storm surges of 7 to 10 feet and winds currently projected at 70 miles an hour — just four short of hurricane strength.

"The storm has accelerated," Bush said. "This brings the added problem of high tide, so we want to make sure people take this very, very seriously."

He said there are 26 shelters open in 16 counties.

"If you were planning to evacuate, you need to do it tonight, not tomorrow morning," said Bush. "Tonight is the night to do this."

Nelson said Alberto was caught by a steering current that did not affect is size or strength but moved it faster toward the Big Bend. He said hurricane warnings are posted from the Ocholockonee River to Longboat Key — from Wakulla to Manatee counties — and that there is a thunderstorm warning for Franklin County.

Bush said mandatory evacuation orders have been issued for Wakulla County in the Panacea, Ochlockonee Bay and St. Marks areas, as well as low-lying and coastal regions. Also under evacuation orders are low-lying coastal areas from the Aucilla River to Steinhatchee in Taylor County, and parts of Levy, Dixie, Citrus and Franklin County.

That includes Alligator Point and low-lying coastal areas of Franklin County.

FEMA Stockpiles Supplies Ahead Of Alberto (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

The AP, June 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033090

The nation's disaster response agency said Monday that evacuation buses and truckloads of food, water and ice were standing by for the year's first big tropical storm. But state officials across the Gulf Coast hadn't asked for any immediate help from Washington.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency did not stockpile supplies in Florida because the state "has indicated that they have the situation well under control," said FEMA spokesman Aaron Walker. But he said buses and supplies were ready should Tropical Storm Alberto take a nasty turn into regions still left vulnerable by Hurricane Katrina, including Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. Those supplies, warehoused in Louisiana and Alabama, could be sent to Florida if necessary, he said.

Additionally, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers stockpiled tens of thousands of tons of concrete, stone and sandbags to safeguard against any levee breaches around Florida's Lake Okeechobee.

Florida emergency director Craig Fugate said state and local responders "were managing to keep an even keel here." Any federal help — like damage assessments and reimbursements — might be needed after the storm passed, he said.

"We're not in a situation where we need any federal assistance for the response phase," Fugate told The Associated Press. "We're looking at the federal impact after the storm if it would warrant any assistance financially."

However, FEMA officials were monitoring the storm from Florida's emergency operations center in Tallahassee. The agency also put its regional response coordination office in Atlanta on alert, and ordered its Washington headquarters to be staffed around the clock to answer any incoming calls for aid.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, whose department oversees FEMA, postponed a weeklong trip to Europe to monitor the storm, said spokesman Russ Knocke. Chertoff also called Florida Gov. Jeb Bush to offer help, but the Republican governor said his state did not have any immediate needs from Washington.

Similarly, the governors of Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana have not asked for any federal assistance. But FEMA dispatched 96 truckloads of food, ice and water to holding points in Selma, Ala., and Montgomery, Ala., ready to go to disaster areas in those three states if needed, Walker said.

Additionally, 50 buses and 100 drivers were standing by in Carville, La., to help evacuate potential victims, he said.

Despite lessening concerns about Lake Okeechobee's levees, Army Corps spokeswoman Nanciann Regalado said the agency stockpiled 35,000 tons of concrete, stone and sandbags and ordered another 65,000 tons delivered. However, lake levels were still six feet below where levees might be expected to crack, Regalado said.

The Coast Guard also is warning at-sea mariners and boaters to stay away from coastal waters. Officials are reviewing plans to move aircraft at the region's air stations inland and out of the way of storm.

So far there have been no active duty deployments for Alberto through U.S. Northern Command, which oversees military units in the United States.

"There will be minimal or no need for active duty forces because the state of Florida, its first responders, and its state militia are well prepared to assist citizens of Florida," said Northern Command spokesman Michael Kucharek.

The command has asked the military services to be prepared to respond and provide needed supplies, equipment or the use of Defense Department installations.

Swift Evacuations Urged As Alberto Approaches (KRT)

By Martin Merzer And Gary Fineout

Knight Ridder, June 12, 2006

Tropical Storm Alberto, pushing a dome of sea water toward shore, quickened its assault on North Florida this evening. Officials urged coastal residents to swiftly evacuate the area.

"Its arrival on our shores will be much quicker than we were anticipating a few hours ago," Gov. Jeb Bush said shortly after 5:30 p.m. ``They need to get to high ground and they need to get safe."

The 2006 hurricane season is just 12 days old.

"Good God, who would have thunk it," Bush said.

During the past two seasons, eight hurricanes struck or brushed Florida.

Meanwhile, South Floridians were advised to expect heavy rain and gusty winds as squalls roam through the area.

DOJ_NMG_0033091

Farther north, forecasters hurriedly issued a precautionary hurricane warning from Longboat Key near Sarasota through the Big Bend area to the Ochlockonee River south of Tallahassee. That means hurricane conditions -- wind stronger than 74 mph and heavy rain -- are expected within 24 hours.

The greatest danger: an eight- to 10-foot storm surge, the dome of water that rushes ashore as the storm's center approaches.

"It's the storm surge that will be a problem," said Stanley Bair, owner of The Island Hotel on Cedar Key, an island just off Florida's Big Bend. ``It won't get into the hotel, but it will surround it, and people won't be able to get on or off the island."

Bair said every room is booked, largely by news crews, and ``we'll have rollaways in the lobby."

The hotel was built in 1859 and has survived every hurricane since.

Officials in six coastal counties, from Franklin County to Citrus County, told more than 20,000 residents to leave.

"It's not worth losing your life . . .," Bush said earlier today. ``Property can be rebuilt."

Several of those counties, including Wakulla, Taylor and Dixie, have been hit in the past with flooding due to storm surge from large storms.

Last year, Hurricane Dennis unexpectedly created a backwash of water into Wakulla County, while the infamous no-name storm of 1993 killed unsuspecting residents of Taylor County in the middle of the night.

"This is a part of the state where it doesn't take a big storm to cause a significant amount of flooding," said Craig Fugate, the state's emergency management chief.

Fortunately, the area is sparsely populated and can be quickly evacuated.

State officials said that local communities were gearing up to deal with the storm and that 17 shelters would open. An estimated 7,500 National Guard were on alert and ready to be deployed if needed.

"We're used to catching those first storms here in North Florida," said Chris Floyd, emergency services director of the Capital Area Chapter of the Red Cross in Tallahassee. ``We've got a lot of experience. Not that we necessarily want it to happen here, but I believe we're as prepared as we can be."

The 5 p.m. EDT forecast called for the center of Alberto to make landfall in the Big Bend area Tuesday morning as a borderline Category 1 hurricane with winds of about 75 mph, but most of its weather reached land long ahead of the center.

Isolated tornadoes were possible throughout much of the state, particularly in Central Florida and the Panhandle.

"Preparations to protect life and property should be rushed to completion," said forecaster Richard Pasch of the National Hurricane Center in West Miami-Dade County.

Bush issued a state of emergency for the entire state, an action that triggers laws against price gouging and gives him the power to waive tolls, activate the National Guard and close state facilities.

"This is a serious storm and we're taking it seriously," he said.

In South Florida, commuters traveled to work under gray skies, occasional showers and a heavy blanket of humidity. They were advised to expect soaking rain later in the day.

Forecasters also reinstated concerns over the possibility of severe thunderstorms, waterspouts and tornadoes, particularly in Central Florida and along the lower Gulf Coast, but also possibly in and near Miami-Dade and Broward counties.

A tornado watch was issued for Glades, Hendry and Collier counties.

Alberto grew out of the year's first tropical depression Sunday, an ominous sign of things to come during the hurricane season -- which was only 11 days old.

The storm initially struggled to keep itself together, but it coalesced and grew stronger overnight.

"The storm has been interacting with the warm Gulf of Mexico loop current, which has likely been a contributor to the intensification," Pasch said.

It then moved over cooler water and encountered hostile crosswinds, two factors that inhibited significant additional strengthening, he said.

Portions of Central and North Florida could absorb eight to 10 inches of rain, a prospect welcomed by firefighters who have been battling wildfires in those regions.

DOJ_NMG_0033092

Farther south, Alberto produced 10 to 20 inches of rain over the western half of Cuba, with isolated totals of 30 inches over higher terrain

The six-month hurricane season, which began June 1 and ends Nov. 30, is expected to be another unusually active one.

The government's official outlook calls for 13 to 16 tropical storms that would become eight to 10 hurricanes, including four to six intense hurricanes with winds above 110 mph. Government experts expect two to four hurricanes to hit the United States this year.

Fla. Braces Itself As Alberto Rolls In (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, June 13, 2006

TAMPA — An unexpectedly strong Tropical Storm Alberto on Monday threatened to become the first hurricane of the season as it bore down on Florida's northern Gulf Coast, prompting an evacuation order for 20,000 people.

Florida prepared for heavy rains and possible flooding from Alberto, which was due to come ashore early today during high tide somewhere between Tampa and the Panhandle.

Late Monday, the storm had sustained winds of 70 mph, just shy of the 74 mph threshold for a hurricane.

Forecasters issued hurricane warnings after Alberto shot up from 50 mph in three hours.

If it becomes a hurricane, Alberto would be the earliest hurricane of the season to strike land since Alma in 1966, the National Weather Service said.

Florida Gov. Jeb Bush urged people in low-lying parts of the coast to get out. “The storm has accelerated,” he said. “This brings the added problem of high tide, so we want to make sure people take this very, very seriously.”

Bush said there are 26 shelters open in 16 counties.

“If you were planning to evacuate, you need to do it tonight, not tomorrow morning,” he said.

More than 20,000 residents in low-lying areas along a 100-mile stretch of Citrus, Levy and Taylor counties were told to evacuate. An alert issued by the state emergency center warned that Alberto could come ashore at high tide, creating a 5- to 8-foot storm surge.

At the National Hurricane Center in Miami, forecaster Eric Blake said Alberto “went from a modest tropical storm to a strong tropical storm very quickly.” Blake said forecasters expect the storm to grow to Category 1 hurricane speeds by the time it reaches land but they do not expect it to intensify much further.

In Tampa, where a light drizzle fell Monday evening, most residents were not too worried about the storm. Windows remained free of plywood. Stores displayed full stocks of batteries, water and flashlights. Restaurants and bars buzzed with business.

“It's just not going to be a big wind event,” said Laura McCoy, 41, a bookkeeper and massage therapist who lives near the beach in Largo. “We have a generator. We have stuff left over from last year.

“I'm not worried about this one,” she said. “I'm a little worried about what the season holds ahead.”

Jill Jones, 41, a nurse from Tampa, made her hurricane preparations before the season began June 1. She has checked with her insurer to be sure she's fully covered, and she had her trees trimmed.

“My freezer is filled with ice. There's gas for the grill and a plan for the pets. I have a tarp if the roof blows off and plenty of candles,” Jones says.

Alberto formed off the coast of Cuba on Saturday, about 40 miles from Key West. Tropical-storm-force winds stretched 230 miles from its center, the National Hurricane Center reported.

Forecasters said 4 to 10 inches of rain could fall across Florida through today. Much of the rain is welcome in areas where wildfires have been common this spring, such as Volusia County on the Atlantic coast.

“We're looking forward to the moisture it is going to drop on us,” said Pat Kuehn, a spokeswoman for Volusia County Fire Services.

DOJ_NMG_0033093

Last year's hurricane season was the most destructive on record with 28 named storms and a record 15 hurricanes. Hurricane Katrina devastated Louisiana and Mississippi and was blamed for more than 1,570 deaths among Louisiana residents alone.

Florida On Alert As Alberto Revs Up (ORS)

By Jim Stratton And Mark Hollis

The Orlando Sentinel, June 13, 2006

The first named storm of the hurricane season rumbled through the Gulf of Mexico on Monday, bringing much-needed rain to kindling-dry Central Florida but leaving low-lying coastal communities along the state's Big Bend region facing the specter of floods.

Tropical Storm Alberto strengthened in the Gulf and was expected to make landfall sometime early today. Late Monday, the storm had winds of near 70 mph, just 4 mph short of becoming a hurricane.

The state ordered 20,000 people living in low-lying areas along the Gulf to flee. Residents there could see a storm surge of 8 to 10 feet, enough to swamp homes, businesses and roads.

"The rain and the storm surge is a huge concern," said Daryll Gunter, commission chairman in the Gulf Coast area of Taylor County. "So much of the county is so low, even just a foot or two will be enough to cause major problems."

Mandatory evacuation orders were in place for low-lying areas in Taylor, Dixie, Levy, Franklin, Wakulla and Citrus counties. The National Hurricane Center posted a hurricane warning from Longboat Key near Sarasota to the Ochlockonee River near Tallahassee.

"We don't want to overdo it. It's not a Katrina or a Wilma, but storm surge and flooding could still cause loss of life," said Max Mayfield, director of the center west of Miami.

If Alberto comes ashore as a hurricane, it would be the earliest in 40 years to hit the United States, forecasters said. The earliest on record is Hurricane Alma, which, in 1966, hit the Florida Panhandle on June?9 -- the ninth day of the hurricane season.

"Good God...Who would have thunk it?" said Gov. Jeb Bush, who signed an order placing Florida under a state of emergency. "This could potentially be a hurricane. It has a wide impact for a lot of people in our state." Most at risk appeared those living in the flood-prone areas along Florida's Big Bend. At least 17 shelters were opened in 11 counties along the Gulf.

Forecasters said the biggest concern was storm surge because the shallow waters in the Gulf allow the water to travel long distances without dissipating.

Even so, on Cedar Key, a popular tourist destination at the end of State Road 24, residents were generally unimpressed by Alberto, with many saying they planned to stay put.

"I can't change what's happening," said Ronnie Beckham, 54, a fisherman. "We'll just have to wait to see what happens tomorrow."

Beckham, however, did plan to move his 24-foot clam boat to higher ground.

The National Hurricane Center warned that Alberto could pick up strength throughout the night.

"Tuesday is a washout," said State Meteorologist Ben Nelson, "especially for the northern part of the state."

In Central Florida, Alberto spawned heavy downpours throughout Monday dumping almost 2 inches of rain at Orlando International Airport. Daytona Beach received 2 1/2 inches of rain. Today, Alberto is expected produce thunderstorms that might be accompanied by heavy downpours.

The storm is expected generate winds of 25 to 30 mph in and around Orlando by early today. North of the city -- in parts of Lake and western Volusia counties -- winds could reach 40?mph with gusts of 50 mph.

Monday, Alberto caused a handful of problems throughout the region.

Volusia County officials reported that wind gusts or a small tornado caused by the storm damaged two Enterprise homes on the shore of Little Lake. One home lost half its roof; the other had its chimney blown off.

The burst, which occurred a little after 1p.m., also pushed a boat parked in a driveway into a van parked nearby. No one was injured.

DOJ_NMG_0033094

Resident Robert Evans said he heard "trees breaking" and "snapping metal," then he saw his neighbor's roof come off.

The neighbor, 67-year-old Cille Morris, is in Ireland where she lives half the year and does not know about the damage to her home, said friends who gathered in front of her house and watched as six firefighters pulled a blue tarp over the exposed roof. Her lawn was littered with scattered pieces of aluminum strips filled with nails and tufts of yellow insulation.

The home was outfitted with hurricane shutters.

"They took great care to have the place storm ready," said Carolyn Creech, who used to live up the road. "It's so sad." In Kissimmee, a giant osprey nest was blown from the top of a high-voltage utility pole onto the power lines below. The 300-pound nest, which appeared to contain no eggs or birds, knocked out power to more than 1,300 Kissimmee Utility Authority customers for more than an hour.

But in many ways, Alberto was a welcome visitor in parts of Central Florida.

Wildfires have smoldered for weeks in some counties, and the storm brought a heavy rain that officials hoped would finally let them get the upper hand.

"It's certainly going to help," said Orlando Dominguez, spokesman for Brevard County Fire Rescue. "This is the type of rain we need to soak into the ground."

In Brevard, smoke and flames from brush fires have caused numerous traffic accidents and forced officials to periodically shut down Interstate 95 and other major roads during the past several weeks.

In Volusia County, wildfires have burned more than 25,000 acres, said Timber Weller of the State Division of Forestry. Though county officials said all the fires have been contained, the bone-dry conditions have kept firefighters on alert.

"When the woods are as dry as they have been, fires just won't die," Weller said. "We have to keep going out there and monitoring them or at the least mopping them down."

In Osceola County, the rain was expected to help contain a 250-acre muck fire near U.S. Highway 192 and State Road 429. Friday, smoke from the underground fire had shut down a half-mile stretch of the area's busy tourist corridor. The road reopened Monday, but officials continued to monitor the fire, which, in some places, is burning 2 feet under the surface.

"It's like a big cigar out there smoldering," said Tom Donohoe of the Division of Forestry. "It takes quite a bit of rainfall to totally extinguish that thing."

That rain could come in the future, but it might not be nearly as innocuous as the soaking provided by Alberto.

Forecasters expect another busy hurricane season, predicting up to 17 named storms with up to nine hurricanes. Of those, up to six could be become major storms.

Storm Nears Hurricane Strength And The Gulf Coast Of Florida (NYT)

By Terry Aguayo

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

MIAMI, June 12 — A hurricane warning was issued on Monday and evacuations were ordered for parts of the Florida Gulf Coast as the season's first tropical storm intensified on a path that could bring it ashore as a hurricane.

The National Hurricane Center put out the warning for a 300-mile stretch from Longboat Key, near Sarasota, to Ochlockonee Bay, south of Tallahassee.

Early Monday evening, the storm, named Alberto, had winds of 70 miles per hour, just 4 m.p.h. shy of hurricane speed. Landfall is expected Tuesday.

"We're forecasting the worst-case scenario just to be sure everyone is prepared in case a minor fluctuation does occur," said Michelle Mainelli, at the hurricane center.

Forecasters were mostly concerned with an expected four to six inches of rain and flooding from storm surges along parts of the coast, Ms. Mainelli said.

"We're really stressing those as our main concerns," she said. "Some isolated areas may even see up to 10 inches of rainfall."

DOJ_NMG_0033095

Gov. Jeb Bush told reporters at an afternoon briefing at the state's Emergency Operations Center in Tallahassee that evacuation orders had been issued for residents in low-lying areas in six counties between Tampa and Tallahassee along the Gulf coast.

"If you are ordered to evacuate, you should really do it," Mr. Bush said. "Don't think you can ride out a storm. It's not worth losing one's life."

The governor said that 17 shelters in 11 counties were ready to open. He declared a state of emergency for the state, giving him the power to enforce price-gouging laws and activate 7,500 National Guard troops.

The areas singled out for evacuation are less populated than many other areas of Florida, and Craig Fugate, the emergency management chief, said that because they were not in major media markets, it might be harder to get the word out.

Mr. Fugate and other state officials said they remained worried that Tropical Storm Alberto might prove to be a repeat of a storm that struck the East Coast in March 1993 and left more than 40 people dead in Florida.

That 1993 storm was not a hurricane, but it pushed an enormous wall of water into the same areas now in Tropical Storm Alberto's path. Ten people died in Taylor County, part of which was ordered evacuated on Monday.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency said it was "coordinating with state and local officials as they make decisions for their communities on evacuations and response activities."

Gulf Coast residents were making their own preparations. At a Home Depot in St. Petersburg, Frances Musgrave, 79, shopped for sandbags.

"I always keep a little dried milk, boil my eggs and make sure I have bread and sandwich meats," Ms. Musgrave said.

The storm began as a tropical depression on Saturday, nine days into the hurricane season, which ends Nov. 30. Before threatening Florida, it caused flooding in Cuba and prompted the evacuation of 25,000 people in Pinar del Rio province, the Cuban newspaper Granma reported.

Government forecasters have predicted that 13 to 16 tropical storms will form in the Atlantic Ocean this season. Of those, 8 to 10 are likely to become hurricanes, they say, and as many as 6 may be Category 3 strength or higher, carrying winds stronger than 111 m.p.h.

Florida Braces For Early-Arriving Alberto (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

MIAMI -- Thousands of residents along Florida's Gulf Coast were ordered to evacuate Monday as Tropical Storm Alberto, which had intensified unexpectedly, threatened to become the state's earliest hurricane in decades to make landfall.

Gov. Jeb Bush declared a state of emergency and urged residents of low-lying coastal areas, where the storm surge is estimated to be as high as 10 feet, to evacuate. He also expressed the widespread sense of surprise at the possibility of Alberto reaching land so soon after the June 1 start of the hurricane season.

"Good God. Who would have thunk it?" he said. "This potentially could be a hurricane."

Hurricane aircraft reconnaissance on Monday showed that Alberto had almost reached hurricane strength, with winds of nearly 70 mph. The storm evolved from a tropical depression that formed in the northwestern Caribbean on Saturday. It then drew strength from the warm waters of the "loop current" in the Gulf of Mexico.

The storm is large, with tropical storm-force winds extending 230 miles from its center, and hurricane warnings were in effect for a long stretch of Florida's Gulf Coast. Storms are deemed hurricanes once sustained winds reach 74 mph.

"We're getting everyone out now," said Maj. Bill Poole of the Wakulla County Sheriff's Office. "The National Weather Service predicts that we should have a possible 10-foot surge at 4:47 a.m. That could put us close to the same situation we had in Hurricane Dennis."

The surge from Dennis caused widespread flooding and damage in the area, he said.

Along the coast on Monday, tourists headed out, and news crews rushed in to capture what may be the first hurricane after Hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0033096

Grocery stores filled with residents seeking supplies; marinas were busy with sailors hauling their boats out; and cars lined up at gas stations as people topped off their tanks.

Officials with the Federal Emergency Management Agency said they were meeting with state emergency managers and "mobilizing" 96 trucks with food, water and ice.

"The tourists are gone," said Stanley Bair, the owner of the historic Island Hotel on Cedar Key. "If it hits at high tide, which it's predicted to, we could get some severe flooding."

Eric Blake, a meteorologist at the National Hurricane Center, said that if Alberto makes landfall as a hurricane, it would be the earliest a hurricane has struck the state in 40 years.

"Hurricanes making landfall in June are few and far between," he said.

Many residents read the early arrival of Alberto as a portent of a rough hurricane season. the National Hurricane Center has warned that storm activity will be above normal, possibly producing as many as 16 named storms. Last year was the busiest on record.

But Blake played down Alberto's value as an omen.

"Early-season storms of this type don't tell us much," he said.

Moreover, it was still not clear whether Alberto would attain hurricane status and maintain it through landfall early Tuesday morning.

Forecasters were predicting that Alberto's winds would reach 75 mph before landfall, but hurricane intensity is notoriously difficult to predict.

By the 5 p.m. report from the National Hurricane Center, Alberto had passed by the warm water of the loop current that had helped it intensify earlier, and there was some doubt that its winds would reach the 74-mph mark of a hurricane.

"After the sudden strengthening episode observed earlier today, the storm has leveled off in intensity," the National Hurricane Center forecasters said. "The cloud pattern has become rather elongated. . . . Nonetheless, slight strengthening is still possible before landfall."

Insurance Regulators Get Busy (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — The nation's insurance regulators are calling on Congress to investigate ways to help states, insurers and homeowners to better deal with disasters such as Hurricane Katrina.

The National Association of Insurance Commissioners, state officials who regulate the property insurance industry, adopted at a quarterly meeting here a resolution proposing a Federal Natural Catastrophe Preparedness Commission.

Among the proposals the regulators want the panel to consider: a national catastrophe fund to backstop private insurance companies to encourage them to stay in the market.

The resolution comes in the wake of nearly $60 billion in hurricane-related property insurance losses last year. The first named storm of the 2006 hurricane season, Alberto, is expected to hit Florida's Gulf Coast today.

Alarmed by their recent hurricane losses and forecasts of more powerful storms, insurance companies are refusing to renew hundreds of thousands of coastal homeowners' policies in Florida, Texas, New York, Massachusetts and other states.

Insurance premiums for windstorm insurance coverage in many coastal areas have skyrocketed.

Last week, Allstate, the USA's second-biggest property insurer, announced it's dropping earthquake coverage for 352,000 policyholders nationwide — 86% of all earthquake policies it has issued — to cut its risk of catastrophe losses.

Maine Insurance Superintendent Alessandro Iuppa, who heads the NAIC, said that a federally coordinated program is the best way to address threats from hurricanes, earthquakes and floods.

“No place in the country is immune to natural disaster,” Iuppa said.

State regulators worry that a shortage of private insurance and the lack of an overall federal catastrophe strategy will put more pressure on individual states and their taxpayers when disaster strikes.

DOJ_NMG_0033097

In Florida, for example, the state legislature just voted to spend $1.2 billion in tax funds to bolster its state-run insurer and improve hurricane preparedness.

Florida's state-run insurance company, which sells policies to homeowners when they can't get coverage in the private market, is expected to become the state's biggest property insurer. That's because private companies have dropped so many policies.

Because of the huge storm losses last year, private insurance companies are also paying more for reinsurance, the insurance they buy to protect themselves from unexpectedly high claims.

And it's harder to get. Demand for reinsurance far exceeds supply, Bradley Kading, the president of a trade association representing reinsurers, told an NAIC committee on Monday. Laws regulating building codes, storm preparedness and insurance coverage vary by state. Among the issues the NAIC wants the proposed commission to consider:

•Incentives for states to adopt stronger building codes that would make buildings more resistant to disaster damage.

•Incentives for property owners to retrofit existing homes and buildings to harden them against storms and earthquakes.

•Allowing private insurers nationwide to accumulate reserves tax-deferred so they have sufficient cash for insurance claims after a disaster.

U.S. Gives Charter Schools A Big Push In New Orleans (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, June 12 — Education Secretary Margaret Spellings announced Monday that $24 million in federal aid had been awarded to Louisiana for the development of charter schools, more than doubling what the state has already received to help create such schools in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

The grant is likely to cement the role of New Orleans — where the public school system is barely functional — as the nation's pre-eminent laboratory for the widespread use of charter schools. The schools are paid for with public money but are usually operated by nonprofit groups or parent organizations.

There are at least 45 charter schools in Louisiana, with most having opened since Hurricane Katrina. The highest concentration is in New Orleans, where the school system is now dominated by charter operators. Eighteen of the 25 schools open in New Orleans are charter schools, receiving public financing but operating independently.

With the arrival of so many charter schools so quickly, a majority of the city's students will be part of the experiment, whether they want to be or not, because the number of traditional public schools has dwindled to seven.

Ms. Spellings spoke at a school in rural, flood-ruined Plaquemines Parish, south of New Orleans along the Mississippi River, where only three of nine public schools survived.

Given similar widespread devastation across the state after Hurricane Katrina and then Hurricane Rita, she said, charter schools are the best way to jump-start the state's education recovery. Her comments echoed the Bush administration's support for such schools across the nation.

The city's public school system was already in chaos and considered among the most abysmal in the nation before the storm. After Hurricane Katrina, it suffered a near total collapse and has not even begun to bounce back, though the state has taken control of most of New Orleans's schools.

"Just the fact that the charter schools are the ones that are open is testament to their ability to cut through red tape and be responsive to families where and when they need them," Ms. Spellings said in an interview.

So far, it is difficult to judge the schools academically. Those evaluations are expected sometime this summer.

"We'll keep a watchful eye on that," Ms. Spellings said. "But so far, so good."

She said she hoped the infusion of money would help expand existing charter schools and open 20 to 30 more across the state.

The expansion is prompting debate in New Orleans and elsewhere about whether this is the right path to follow. At least one large national study due to be released next month suggests that classroom instruction is no better in the city's charter schools and that the schools are hampered by logistical problems and a lack of citywide coherence.

DOJ_NMG_0033098

"That's part of the puzzle that no one's addressing yet, and it worries me over the long run," said Michael Casserly, executive director of the Council of the Great City Schools, a lobbying group for urban districts that conducted the study. "The grand intent to remake teaching and schools so far only extends to a conversation of who gets to run them, not what gets taught in them."

"Nobody is quite rushing to say let's model ourselves after New Orleans," Mr. Casserly said, "because it's not clear at this early point whether this strategy is likely to work."

Officials of the charter schools, however, expressed enthusiasm about Ms. Spellings's visit and the additional grant money.

"We're proud that the federal government continues to support charter schools," said David Grubb, the communications director for the Algiers Charter Schools Association, which operates six schools in New Orleans. "This can go a long way to restructure and rehabilitate what has been a hard-hit educational system."

Police Struggles In New Orleans Raise Old Fears (NYT)

By Christopher Drew

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, June 9 — Within the Police Department here, the SWAT team is known as The Final Option. Before Hurricane Katrina, it was assigned to the city's worst crimes, and as residents return, it is once again kicking in the doors at the worst drug dens and engaging in shootouts with violent offenders.

But the team is also running dangerously low on firepower. Flooding ruined 300 of its guns, its bullet-resistant shields and the bulk of its ammunition, none of which have been replaced more than nine months after the hurricane. The 40-man team has had to borrow body armor from suburban forces, and the Police Department is lining up corporate sponsors to contribute more.

"I tell you what: we're hurting," said the team's commander, Capt. Jeffrey Winn.

The SWAT unit's difficulties reflect how far from normal many police operations remain here, as residents return and another hurricane season begins. Like the rest of the city, the police force is still struggling to recover from the calamity of Hurricane Katrina, which knocked out its headquarters, overwhelmed its ability to maintain control and prompted desertions that tarnished the force's reputation.

Now, as the department tries to fight its way back, sharp budget cuts — and a recent spike in drug-related killings in the city — are adding to fears that years of overhauls and modernization may be undone, and that New Orleans could return to its former notoriety as one of the nation's murder capitals.

There is also concern that the department's own notoriety could resurface. For some residents, the sense that the city is on edge and the department's future uncertain has brought echoes of the days when the local police were considered among the least competent and most racist and brutal in the nation.

"Given where they are mentally and emotionally, we've gotten more citizen complaints about the way the police are treating people than we have in a long time," said Oliver M. Thomas Jr., the City Council president. "Over the last two years, they'd been getting better and more professional. But I've been hearing lots of complaints about verbal abuse."

The blunt-talking new police superintendent, Warren J. Riley, insists he will not let the drug dealers and "gutter punks" take over again. Mr. Riley says many officers have not gotten the credit they deserve for "standing tall" during the storm, and he is determined to restore discipline and a sense of professionalism among the others. He has also formed an intelligence unit to track the most ruthless crime suspects and built strong ties with federal authorities to help catch them. But in other areas, problems abound.

More than 200 officers deserted during the storm and were fired or suspended. Many veteran officers retired, and some of the youngest officers quit and left town. As a result, the size of the force has dropped to about 1,400 officers on the street now, from nearly 1,700 before the hurricane. Recruiting replacements is difficult, partly because it is hard for candidates to find affordable housing, Mr. Riley said.

Because of the deterioration of the city's finances, he said, the department's budget has been slashed by 19 percent, from $124 million in 2005 to $100 million this year. It has received federal or state aid to replace many of the 300 patrol cars lost to flooding, buy new uniforms and restore its communications system. But it is awaiting federal assistance to replace other gear, like the SWAT team's weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0033099

With the police headquarters still shuttered, Mr. Riley and his top commanders are working out of trailers. And while forensic experts are making progress in restoring many of the items from the flooded police evidence room, newly gathered evidence is being stored in rental trucks parked at what was once a motor-vehicle inspection station.

The storm has also left a lingering emotional toll. More than 80 percent of the officers lost their homes, and some have had to double up with other officers or move to distant suburbs to find housing they can afford on their salaries of $35,000 to $50,000. Many who were heroes in the storm, plucking victims out of the floodwaters, are also resentful that their actions were overshadowed by those who abandoned their posts.

And with many residents here under stress, the police say they are also receiving more back talk from people stopped for even minor violations. "Since the storm, you have a lot of displaced anger among many people, and it seems that police officers always get the brunt of that displaced anger," said Capt. Kevin B. Anderson, the police commander in the French Quarter.

But in the end, nearly everyone here realizes that what defines the Police Department is how well it handles crime, particularly in terms of the murder rate. Before the storm, the city averaged 250 to 300 murders a year, always placing it at, or near, the top spot in the nation on a per-capita basis. So far this year, there have been 45 murders — most of them in the last two months — compared with 114 at this time in 2005, when the city's population was at least twice what it is now.

Superintendent Riley — who was promoted from the department's No. 2 job after his more flamboyant predecessor, Edwin P. Compass III, resigned after criticism over the police response to the hurricane — appeared on radio talk shows recently to outline his crime-fighting plans. They include repeated raids in the poorer neighborhoods that have been resettled, where he said drug dealers who had lived in different parts of the city were converging and killing one another over turf.

The superintendent also urged residents to band together to demand a toughening of the city's criminal justice system, where jury trials resumed only recently. Drug dealers who evacuated to Houston are returning home because it is much easier here to avoid jail, Mr. Riley said, through the "revolving door" of the New Orleans court system.

The courts have long been criticized as relying on plea bargains and setting lenient bail. And since the hurricane, the public defender system has been so short of money and staffing that one judge, Arthur L. Hunter Jr., recently moved to let some people already in custody back onto the streets.

Mr. Riley said, for instance, that police officers were in a shootout last month with one man who had been roaming a deserted neighborhood while wearing an ankle bracelet. He was supposed to be under house arrest while awaiting trial on a burglary charge, but the authorities had apparently not responded to the bracelet monitoring system.

"Obviously, the murder risk factors are coming back," said Peter Scharf, a criminologist at the University of New Orleans, "and this creates incredible challenges." Whether a growing nervousness about the murder rate gives way again to a feeling of being under siege could end up determining if many people return home and tourists start coming back.

Captain Anderson, the French Quarter commander, said there had been only two murders there this year, along with several stabbings among construction workers carousing on Bourbon Street. He also said the SWAT team had been called in for undercover patrols after groups of youths had accosted people.

James F. Scott, the deputy police superintendent, said the department's intelligence bureau had focused on 112 drug dealers and murder suspects, and 30 had since been captured. Mr. Scott said some drug dealers who evacuated to Houston were killed in turf wars with gangs there, while others were now moving back and forth between the two cities, almost like commuters.

He added that federal prosecutors here were now bringing charges in smaller drug-sale and gun-possession cases to help get criminals off the street. "Since the storm, that is one of the most positive things that has happened to the Police Department," Mr. Scott said.

The department has also worked with the Louisiana National Guard to avoid a repeat of last year's disastrous storm response. Superintendent Riley said 3,000 troops could be in the city ahead of a storm, with high-water trucks and satellite communications gear positioned to assist each police district. There will also be more boats on hand for search-and-rescue operations.

Barring another disaster, Mr. Riley said, "Katrina has given us an opportunity to refocus our educational system, our economic system and our law-enforcement efforts, and change the culture of this city."

DOJ_NMG_0033100

"If we're able to change it," he said, "that would give us a silver lining."

AFL-CIO Plans New Orleans Boom (USAT)

By Anne Rochell Konigsmark

USA Today, June 13, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — In what may be the start of the city's development boom, the AFL-CIO plans to invest $1 billion to develop 10,000 affordable homes and a new downtown hotel.

The investment, confirmed Monday by the AFL-CIO, is the labor coalition's most ambitious funding project ever. It also is one of the largest yet for New Orleans and seeks to bring new housing to a city where Hurricane Katrina destroyed more than 100,000 homes.

The money will come from the AFL-CIO's 40-year-old Housing Investment Trust, which invests worker pensions in affordable housing and requires union labor on the projects.

"So little has been done," AFL-CIO President John Sweeney says, referring to the dearth of new development in the nine months since the storm. "It feels like this is the city that America forgot, and I hope our investment will jump-start other investments."

After months of sluggish recovery, there has been a flurry of development news in recent weeks in New Orleans, including plans for a $700 million jazz district downtown. There are several affordable housing plans in the works: Enterprise Community Partners wants to build 6,500 affordable units in partnership with the Archdiocese of New Orleans. Habitat for Humanity soon will begin building 10 houses every two weeks with a goal of building 1,500 in the next three to five years.

The AFL-CIO plans to begin by buying 200 blighted or abandoned properties owned by the city in the historic Treme, a working-class, mostly black neighborhood that saw minor damage from Katrina. The plan also calls for construction of a high-rise hotel along the Mississippi River.

Jim Kelly of Catholic Charities, which is working with Enterprise and the AFL-CIO, says the city needs all the affordable housing it can get. "We were a poor city prior to Katrina," he says.

Development activity is picking up for several reasons, not the least of which is that billions in federal dollars to buy people out of their flood-damaged homes is set to begin flowing this summer.

Some developers are worried that because of tax incentives, there will be too much affordable housing and not enough mixed income developments.

"You can overload the city with affordable housing," local developer Pres Kabakoff says. "It's important we don't end up with concentratedly poor neighborhoods."

For Many Of Katrina's Young Victims, The Scars Are More Than Skin Deep (WP)

By Julia Cass

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- This year's hurricane season has just begun, and already it is producing a new surge of anxiety in Gulf Coast children.

Children at a day-care center in Gautier, Miss., ask their caregivers every day: "Did you watch the Weather Channel? What does the Weather Channel say?" In a New Orleans trailer park, a 12-year-old boy who spent five days outside the convention center after Hurricane Katrina and saw a woman in a wheelchair slowly die pleads with his mother to buy a car so they can escape the next big one. An 8-year-old girl is convinced that another hurricane will hit New Orleans -- she is even sure it will be on June 15 and a Category 8 (a rating that doesn't exist).

Ten months after Katrina, its emotional effect on children is proving to be long and lasting. Two studies of children affected by the hurricane have found high rates of depression, anxiety, behavioral problems and post-traumatic stress disorder.

A Louisiana State University mental health screening of nearly 5,000 children in schools and temporary housing in the state found that 96 percent saw hurricane damage to their homes or neighborhoods, 22 percent had relatives or friends who were injured, 14 percent had relatives or friends who died, and 35 percent lost pets. Thirty-four percent were separated from their primary caregivers at some point; 9 percent still are.

DOJ_NMG_0033101

The concern for the Katrina children is not just the immediate trauma from the storm, but that so much of their lives remains disrupted.

A report prepared for Congress last November estimated that 189,000 children were dislocated by Katrina; about 110,000 still do not live where they did nine months ago. Some children have attended as many as nine schools since August. Those who have returned to school in New Orleans often do not attend the same schools with the same students or teachers as before.

"Disasters like Oklahoma City and 9/11 were time-limited," said Irwin Redlener, director of Columbia University's National Center for Disaster Preparedness and president of the Children's Health Fund, an advocacy group and care provider for medically underserved children. "The children who were affected psychologically could go to a place of normalcy. The difference here is not only the scope of devastation but the prolonged dislocation with an uncertain timeline. The trauma has not yet ended."

Justyn Green, 12, and his brother Jaleel, 8, spent six days at the Louisiana Superdome in New Orleans with their mother and father -- hot, hungry, thirsty, dirty and frightened. They heard gunfire and saw dead people. They got out at one point, only to be forced to return when police in a nearby town turned away thousands of evacuees at gunpoint. When they finally boarded a bus to leave -- after enduring a line so long they could barely stand -- they thought the horror was over, but it wasn't. The bus flipped over near Opelousas, and their father was killed.

The boys "didn't say a word" at the Superdome, said their mother, Joy Green. "They looked so lost and scared. There was no security at all. You were on your own."

The boys still don't talk much. In their ranch-style brick home in Algiers, which in the end suffered no storm damage, they sit at the kitchen table and draw pictures. They have been drawing for months, encouraged by a psychiatrist as a way to express themselves and describe their experiences.

"At first, they drew a lot of coffins," said the psychiatrist, Barbara Hamm. "Now they draw the Dome and men with guns." She and their mother attribute their obsession with guns and what they call "Army men" to having guns pointed at them and to their perception of the military men in the Superdome as menacing rather than protective.

The boys' 17-year-old brother, James, who was named after their father, evacuated to Arkansas with friends. Although he didn't experience the horrors of the Superdome, he has dropped out of school and won't go for counseling with his mother and siblings. "He won't talk about it, so I'm not sure what's going on with him," Joy Green said. "He did say one time that he shouldn't have told us to evacuate. He said, 'If I hadn't have told you to go, Daddy would still be alive.' "

Many children are having difficulties adjusting after Katrina. The screening by LSU found that more than 30 percent of them showed symptoms of depression or post-traumatic stress disorder.

In a study by Columbia University and the Children's Health Fund of 665 displaced families, nearly half of the parents reported that at least one child in their household had emotional or behavioral difficulties that were not present before the hurricane. Symptoms involve feeling sad or depressed, being nervous or afraid, and having problems sleeping or getting along with others. Compared with children surveyed in Louisiana in 2003, Katrina's victims were more than twice as likely to have behavioral or conduct problems; the same was true of depression and anxiety, the survey found.

Patterns are beginning to emerge. "The younger children lack the cognitive ability to grasp the idea of a once-in-a-hundred-year storm," said Elmore Rigamer, a psychiatrist who is medical director of Catholic Charities Archdiocese of New Orleans. "For them, if it happened once, the world is an unsafe place."

Elementary and middle school children can be both more withdrawn and more aggressive, and their anxiety often comes out in physical symptoms such as headaches and stomachaches. Rigamer described a 6-year-old boy from hurricane-devastated St. Bernard Parish. "He's a meticulous boy who'd started to collect stamps and toy soldiers. Now, they're all gone," she said. "His mother brought him to me because he's punching kids at school, he quit learning to read and he's hoarding food."

Rainy days frighten the weather-obsessed children at Gautier Academy Child Development Center in Gautier, near Pascagoula. "When it's cloudy, they don't want to go outside," said Cynthia Matthews, the academy's owner. "It's as if they're afraid of the sky."

DOJ_NMG_0033102

Teenagers seem affected most by social isolation. Joy Osofsky, an LSU professor of pediatrics and psychiatry, said that when she worked with a group of young people in a shelter in rural Louisiana about a week after the storm, she expected to hear stories of terrible experiences; some of them had been in the Superdome or were rescued from rooftops.

"Some talked about that, but what they talked about more was missing friends," she said. "They used to be in constant touch by e-mail or cellphones, and they felt very isolated."

The older children, while suffering, often show strength, said Howard Osofsky, chairman of LSU's psychiatry department, who with his wife is leading the university's screening of Katrina children.

"One reason our clinicians work around the clock and are so dedicated is how inspiring these kids can be. They really do have symptoms of mental distress," he said. "Yet when you ask their first concerns, so many say they want to help their parents or help in the rebuilding."

Younger children can be especially resilient, Joy Osofsky said. "If their parents are able to give them support and stability, most will bounce back and do what children do -- play," she said.

For this reason, experts say that efforts to help Katrina children should focus not just on them but on their families. A number of charities and nonprofit organizations have established or are raising money for programs such as free family mental health screening, trauma counseling in schools, and summer programs for children who have fallen behind in school or who live in Federal Emergency Management Agency trailer parks, which have no playgrounds.

Some advocates, including the Children's Health Fund, have called on the federal government to allocate $100 million to send a force of pediatricians, family doctors, specially trained mental health workers and mobile medical vans to the Gulf Coast. The Children's Defense Fund, another advocacy group, likewise is calling for emergency health and mental health services.

For parents, their children's well-being has become one of their biggest concerns in trying to return to a normal life.

Joy Green hasn't yet returned to her job at the Zatarain's plant, which packages rice, because of her worries about her three sons. "I can't hardly focus. It's depressing. The only thing that keeps me going are my kids," she said. "I'm afraid for them."

Clinton Links GOP Policies To More Storms (AP)

By Brendan Farrington

The AP, June 12, 2006

As Tropical Storm Alberto threatened to strengthen into the ninth hurricane in 22 months to affect Florida, former President Clinton predicted Monday that Republican environmental policies will lead to more severe storms.

"It is now generally recognized that while Al Gore and I were ridiculed, we were right about global warming," Clinton said at a fundraiser for the Florida Democratic Party. "It's a serious problem. It's going to lead to more hurricanes."

Gore's documentary, "An Inconvenient Truth," chronicles the former vice president's efforts to educate the public about global warming. It's in limited release around the country.

In his critique of the GOP, Clinton also touched on the war in Iraq, the rising federal deficit and high health care costs. The crowd of about 500 greeted him with loud applause and shouts of "We love you, Bill!" and "Four more years!"

Jeff Sadosky, spokesman for the state Republican Party, decried Clinton's rhetoric. "Bill Clinton's class warfare and race-baiting message gets us no closer to solutions for the issues he brings up," he said.

Sadosky referred in part to Clinton's comments earlier this month in Arizona. At that event, Clinton characterized Republican Party leaders as right-wing, white Southerners.

President Clinton Slams GOP In Orlando Speech (PALMBEACHP)

By Alan Gomez

Palm Beach Post (FL), June 13, 2006

ORLANDO — President Clinton railed against the Republican decision to invade Iraq and their stance on the national deficit, health care, lobbyists and environmental regulations during a wide-ranging speech Monday.

But his core message to a group of about 500 Democrats was a plea to unify their message during the upcoming elections.

"We believe in equal opportunity and shared responsibilities and an inclusive American community," Clinton said, repeating the phrase three times during his speech.

By contrast, he said Republicans stood only for concentrating wealth and power in the hands of those who agree with them.

"Those are their values," he said. "They think they're good people and they're better than we are and that America works better when they run everything."

Clinton's speech came during his second Florida stop in as many days.

On Sunday, he helped raise over $500,000 for U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson in his bid to win reelection over a crowded Republican field led by U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris. On Monday, he headlined a Florida Democratic Party event that was supposed to feature both Democratic gubernatorial candidates — U.S. Rep. Jim Davis of Tampa and state Sen. Rod Smith of Alachua.

Smith didn't show due to the harsh weather caused by Tropical Storm Alberto, while Davis took full advantage of the solo appearance by shaking hands and offering a fiery speech to the crowd.

But the main draw of the event was clear even before Clinton even spoke a word. People raced into the convention room to line up along the path he took to the podium and a man garnered a loud ovation when he yelled out "four more years" as Clinton took the stage.

Party spokesman Mark Bubriski said the event netted over $250,000, with tickets starting at $200 and about 75 people taking advantage of a $2,000 offer to snap a photo with Clinton.

But hearing how clearly Clinton was able to offer not just a scalding of the Republican-led administration but an articulate alternative was both exciting and depressing for some in attendance.

"I really wish we could get someone who could speak as clearly as him," said Jeff Dearmin, 52, an Orlando computer programmer.

Dearmin said he will wait until the September primary before deciding whether to vote for Davis or Smith, who appear to be in a dead heat to win the Democratic nomination. Dearmin said he will vote for whoever is up in the polls at that time, since neither of them have been able to make it clear to Floridians who is the better choice.

That sentiment was echoed often in the Orlando convention hall.

"Either of them would be acceptable," said Chris Goff, 54, of Winter Park.

When told that her comment sounded far from a glowing endorsement of either candidate, Goff amended her thought.

"Ok. Either of them would be a drastic improvement over what we have now," she said. "It's time for the Bushes to go away."

While Clinton opened his comments explaining that his current role as world-traveling humanitarian kept him out of the political arena, he quickly embarked on a long diatribe against the Republican-led institutions in Washington.

When speaking about the federal government's inability to provide adequate health care to Americans and the confusing mess that they've made of the Medicare drug plan for seniors, he quickly pointed to the work his wife, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, is doing in New York.

He said he agreed with U.S. Sen. Bob Graham that America should have finished the job in Afghanistan and given United Nations inspectors more time in Iraq before going after Saddam Hussein.

"We believe we should act with others whenever we can and act alone only when we're forced to, and they believe it the other way around -- they should act alone when they can and work with others only when they're forced to," Clinton said.

Above all, Clinton said, Democrats must offer an alternative to the Republicans rather than simply focusing on their struggles in recent years.

He urged the group to explain their values and principles to other voters in the upcoming elections instead of simply pointing out Republican flaws.

"We're going to do just fine," he said.

WAR NEWS:

Bush: Zarqawi's Death "A Major Blow To Al Qaeda" (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033104

WASHINGTON — President Bush said today the death of Abu Musab Zarqawi would not end the war in Iraq, but "it was a major blow to Al Qaeda" and its allies.

Bush spoke during a day-long series of meetings at Camp David with his top national security advisors assessing the progress of the war and looking at prospects for success in coming months.

The president summoned cabinet members to the presidential retreat in Maryland's Catoctin Mountains for the meetings today. On Tuesday, they will be joined in a video conference with the leaders of the new Iraqi government reporting from Baghdad.

With reporters and photographers present for a three-minute photo session after a briefing by Gen. John Abizaid, the commander of the Central Command, and Gen. George Casey, the commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, Bush praised the military officers and Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, for what he said was realistic assessment of the situation there.

"Your recommendations are valid," he said. Officials did not disclose details of the talks.

Bush also asked them to relay his congratulations to the troops who worked on the ground "bringing Zarqawi to justice."

"I fully recognize that's not going to end the war," the president said. "On the other hand, it was a major blow to Al Qaeda and the killers and terrorists that are trying to spread violence and suffering, and stop the emergence of a new democracy."

The sessions took place at the Laurel lodge. Among those joining Bush were Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, John Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, director of the Central Intelligence Agency, and Gen. Peter Pace of the Marine Corps, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

An afternoon session was to include a discussion with non-governmental experts on Iraq, terrorism and the Middle East.

White House counselor Dan Bartlett, who took part in the meetings, said the sessions were organized because Iraq was facing a "fundamental break point."

"The post-Zarqawi climate is still viewed as serious and vexing.....It's still too early to tell," he said of what may happen in the period after the death, as the result of a U.S. air raid, of the Al Qaeda leader in Iraq.

Bartlett said Bush and Casey did not talk about troop levels, and administration officials have said for several days that the meetings were not scheduled to consider such details as how many troops were needed in Iraq.

Rather, Bartlett said, the group talked about "bolstering the Baghdad area, how intelligence is developing....and how to act on that intelligence."

Bush Confers Today With Iraqi Leaders (AJC)

By Ken Herman, Bob Deans

Atlanta Journal-Constitution, June 13, 2006

After a day of talks with his advisers and critics of his strategy in Iraq, President Bush will meet Iraq's new leaders today in a teleconference.

"Success in Iraq will depend upon the capacity of the new government to provide for its people," Bush said after the private sessions at Camp David, Md.

Despite last week's bombing of terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, public opinion remains negative on Bush's handling of the war. Monday night, CBS released poll results showing the president's approval rating had actually declined since May, from 35 percent to 33 percent.

On Capitol Hill, Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) launched what is expected to be a week of debate in the Senate on Iraq. He introduced a plan that would require Bush to bring all U.S. combat troops out of Iraq by year's end, leaving behind only a small team to fight insurgents and enough soldiers to train Iraqi security forces.

To help end the bloodshed in Iraq, Kerry called for a global summit modeled after the Dayton, Ohio, diplomacy that helped bring an end to fighting in Bosnia a decade ago.

Kerry's measure was an amendment to a bill that would authorize $509 billion in military spending for the next fiscal year. In a speech opening debate on the bill, Sen. Saxby Chambliss (R-Ga.) denounced any call for mandated troop withdrawals.

DOJ_NMG_0033105

"I believe that there might be some amendments filed to this bill that seek to immediately withdraw troops or set a timetable for troop withdrawal," Chambliss said. "Clearly, both these approaches are extremely unwise."

The House will debate Iraq policy on Thursday as part of a GOP election-year strategy to draw distinctions between parties. "There are clear differences between Republicans and Democrats on how best to confront the global war on terror," House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said.

Bush, at Camp David, made no move toward troop withdrawals. But his guest list for the session there indicated the White House is more willing than in the past to hear from naysayers. The four invited experts all supported the invasion of Iraq, but have accused Bush of incompetence.

The experts were Fred Kagan of the American Enterprise Institute, Eliot Cohen of Johns Hopkins University's Nitze School of Advanced International Studies, journalist and Middle East expert Robert Kaplan and Michael Vickers of the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments.

Cohen has written about "cockamamie schemes" by the White House and reassessed his support of the war in July 2005 as his son prepared to deploy to Iraq. "What I did not know then that I do know now is just how incompetent we would be at carrying out that task," he wrote.

In an August 2005 online chat with The Washington Post, Kagan agreed with Bush that early troop withdrawals were not the way to go. But he was critical of past tactics.

"We went into Iraq with too few troops and an insufficiently developed plan for the post-war situation," Kagan said.

He said the administration made a "terrible mistake" in disbanding the Iraqi army after the invasion. The result, said Kagan, left ex-soldiers armed, "shamed and unemployed."

Vickers wrote in June 2004 that the effort in Iraq was hamstrung by "unrealistic expectations and flawed political and military strategies." Kaplan has warned against "lust to implement democracy overnight in a country with no tradition of it."

Bush said he convened the Camp David meeting with Vice President Dick Cheney and a dozen top national security officials to map steps to bolster the newly installed Iraqi government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

White House counselor Dan Bartlett said Bush's goal was "to accomplish our mission as quickly as possible so our troops can come home," adding: "That's what the president has pledged to the American people, but I don't think the American people want us to do it in a premature way in which we don't complete the mission."

White House Hones A Strategy For Post-Zarqawi Era (NYT)

By David E. Sanger, Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

THURMONT, Md., June 12 — President Bush gathered top aides at Camp David here on Monday to calibrate the best way forward in Iraq during what the administration described as a critical juncture, following the death last week of the most-wanted terrorist in Iraq and the final formation of a unity government there.

The meeting was as much a media event as it was a high-level strategy session, devised to send a message that this is "an important break point for the Iraqi people and for our mission in Iraq from the standpoint of the American people," in the words of the White House counselor, Dan Bartlett.

It came as Republicans began a new effort to use last week's events to turn the war to their political advantage after months of anxiety, and to sharpen attacks against Democrats. On Monday night, the president's top political strategist, Karl Rove, told supporters in New Hampshire that if the Democrats had their way, Iraq would fall to terrorists and Abu Musab al-Zarqawi would not have been killed.

"When it gets tough, and when it gets difficult, they fall back on that party's old pattern of cutting and running," Mr. Rove said at a state Republican Party gathering in Manchester.

Speaking with reporters at the end of the first day of a two-day war summit meeting, Mr. Bush began to shift responsibility for Iraq's future to its new government. "Success in Iraq will depend upon the capacity of the new government to provide for its people — we recognize that," said Mr. Bush, who was flanked by Vice President Dick Cheney, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and several other cabinet secretaries. The message to the Iraqi government, he said, "is that we stand with you."

DOJ_NMG_0033106

Mr. Bush did not address the question of when American troops might begin to come home. But he emphasized efforts to build loyalty to the government of the new prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, something he said could be done in part by creating a fund to help Iraqis share in Iraq's oil revenues.

The proposal represented a new twist on the administration's optimistic prewar projections, which suggested that oil revenues might foot the bill for Iraqi reconstruction.

On Capitol Hill, leading Republicans in the House were preparing for a week of legislative maneuvers meant to portray them as better equipped to fight terrorism and Democrats as blanching in the face of a tough enemy.

Leaders in the House and the Senate have scheduled several debates and votes intended to shore up public support for the war, culminating Thursday with a House vote on a resolution declaring Iraq a central part of "the global war on terror" and criticizing any move to set "an arbitrary date" for the withdrawal of American forces. In a statement, Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the House majority leader, said the debate and vote would show Americans that "there are clear differences between Republicans and Democrats on how best to confront the global war on terror."

The resolution and debate seemed intended to force Democrats to take a stand on setting a date for the withdrawal of American troops, a divisive issue. Taken together, the steps underscored how Republicans are pouncing on the first positive developments in months in Iraq to reverse a steep slide in support for the war.

The decline in public approval for the war — and a corresponding drop for the president — has emerged as the single biggest cloud over the Republicans' prospects for elections this year.

Democrats countered Monday that the Republicans were playing partisan politics with the war. "Apparently, the American people will still have to wait for a serious debate on Iraq that is aimed at correcting bad policies instead of bad poll numbers," said Representative Rahm Emanuel, an Illinois Democrat.

Democrats were planning to capitalize on displeasure with the war this week with their own maneuvers, like as a proposed amendment by Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts setting a timetable for the withdrawal of most American combat troops from Iraq this year.

Mr. Kerry scoffed at Republican charges that withdrawals were a strategy of "cut and run," which he described as a "simplistic knee-jerk expression used to avoid the realities of war in Iraq."

Even so, Democrats are far from united, and party leaders were consulting across the caucus to seek a consensus position.

"Everyone supports responsible redeployment," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the minority leader. "Everyone supports resolving sectarian differences and revitalizing reconstruction efforts. The question is, given the intractable nature of this war, how do we proceed from here?"

In his address on Monday night, Mr. Rove highlighted what Republicans see as Democratic vulnerabilities in calling for a troop withdrawal, specifically skewering Mr. Kerry and Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, a retired Marine colonel who fought in Vietnam and has become a leading war critic and proponent of redeployment.

"If Murtha had his way, American troops would have been gone by the end of April, and we wouldn't have gotten Zarqawi," Mr. Rove said.

Both sides agree that the politics of Iraq are far from clear. A CBS News opinion poll conducted over the weekend and released Monday suggested that the killing of Mr. Zarqawi had done little to change public perceptions about the war in Iraq, or about Mr. Bush.

Stan Greenberg, a Democratic pollster, said that the latest Republican moves could help galvanize core voters who may be conflicted about the war now, but that the effort "all falls away if sectarian violence continues and Iraq continues to be ground down in a war that has no sign of success."

Representative Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut, said in an interview, "The public is going to have a wait-and-see approach."

Administration officials have acknowledged that they have learned from the past, and they were careful again on Monday not to overplay the significance of the killing of Mr. Zarqawi at the risk of having it followed by a new round of mayhem.

DOJ_NMG_0033107

Reporters were ushered into the president's meeting to hear a brief fragment of his conversation with the American ambassador in Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad. At one point, Mr. Bush said that the killing of Mr. Zarqawi was "not going to end the war."

Zarqawi Successor The New Target (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

President Bush said yesterday that U.S. forces will now hunt down the next leader of al Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, who was named by a Web site as the replacement for slain terrorist Abu Musab Zarqawi.

"The successor to Zarqawi is going to be on our list to bring to justice," Mr. Bush said after spending the day discussing strategy with U.S. officials at Camp David, the presidential retreat in Maryland.

Al-Muhajer was not among the names that U.S. intelligence officials reportedly expected as successors. His name was posted on a Web site used by al Qaeda in Iraq, which called him "a beloved brother with jihadi experience and a strong footing in knowledge," according to the Associated Press.

The administration argues that with Zarqawi dead and a new government in Iraq, the nation has a chance to prove that it can succeed. Mr. Bush said yesterday that Iraq's neighbors must step up to help out.

Mr. Bush also repeated his pledge to let the level of U.S. troops in Iraq be based on "conditions on the ground." White House officials said troop levels were not a part of Mr. Bush's discussion with his team during yesterday morning's session.

Vice President Dick Cheney, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley and top intelligence officials met yesterday at Camp David and were joined in a teleconference yesterday by U.S. military officials in Iraq and the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad.

Today, Mr. Bush and members of his Cabinet will have a teleconference with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and members of his Cabinet to figure out ways that the United States can help Iraqi leaders achieve their goals.

The meetings were scheduled even before Zarqawi was killed last week, but that news has given the administration a window to make a case to voters that U.S. forces have made progress.

The Iraq debate promises to heat up in Congress this week. The House is scheduled to debate a Republican-written resolution that praised the U.S. efforts in Iraq, Afghanistan and other fronts in the war on terror and opposes setting a date for troop withdrawal.

In the Senate, Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, said he will introduce an amendment to the defense bill on the Senate floor this week calling for U.S. troops to be pulled out by the end of this year.

Mr. Kerry wants to couple troop withdrawals with a political settlement he said could be achieved by convening a summit of Iraq's new government, leaders from the nations that border it and representatives of international organizations such as the United Nations' Security Council and the European Union.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, said that the administration must make a policy change and that Zarqawi's death and the new government present such an opportunity.

"Right now, the administration does not have a strategy for victory in Iraq -- it has a strategy to prevent defeat," Mr. Biden said. "I hope that will begin to change at Camp David."

Mr. Bush also said Iraq's neighbors "ought to do more" to help the nation stabilize.

"We're constantly working with our friends in the neighborhood to encourage them to support this new democracy," he said, adding that nations that have pledged about $13 billion to help must stick to their commitments.

He said one problem is religion -- Iraq has a Shi'ite prime minister and most neighboring nations are led by Sunni governments. But he said those other countries should see Iraq's constitution as a model for unity.

White House counselor Dan Bartlett said Mr. Bush and his advisers did talk about Zarqawi's death and his new successor, though he said it's too early to tell what his death will mean. Mr. Bartlett said the group talked about whether groups will try to take advantage of a leadership vacuum.

DOJ_NMG_0033108

Last week, asked whether Zarqawi's location could have been tipped off by someone looking to take his place, White House press secretary Tony Snow said that would have been a dumb move.

"That would be a really stupid terrorist, because the life expectancy of people who have been succeeding these guys and the life expectancy of being Zarqawi's number two has not been very good," Mr. Snow said.

Bush In Drive To Back Iraq Government (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, June 13, 2006

President George W. Bush launched a strategic reassessment of US policy in Iraq on Monday, joined by his cabinet and military commanders at a "breakpoint" two-day meeting in Camp David that focused on how to help implement the new Iraqi government's "Maliki plan".

A senior White House official said the aim of the military discussions was not how to reduce US troop numbers but rather the implementation of specific operations – in Baghdad, the insurgent stronghold of Ramadi, and in the southern city of Basra, where British troops are based.

Nuri al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister, is scheduled to join the strategy session on Tuesday by secure video link-up from Baghdad. Discussions yesterday also focused on economic development and how to boost oil production.

US military commanders and the US ambassador to Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, were also connected by video from Baghdad's Green Zone.

Confronted by growing discontent with the cost of the Iraq war among Americans in the run-up to congressional mid-term elections, Mr Bush repeatedly declared at a brief news conference: "The stakes are worth it."

Commenting on reports that al-Qaeda in Iraq had appointed a successor to Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, their leader killed last week in a US airstrike, Mr Bush said the new name would be added to "our list to bring to justice". Earlier he had asked his generals to thank US forces for bringing Zarqawi "to justice" last Wednesday.

A website used by Iraq's al-Qaeda claimed the group had appointed the previously unknown Abu Hamza al-Muhajer as its new leader. Some Iraqi officials, however, suggested that Mr Muhajer – whose name means "the immigrant" – might be a pseudonym for Abu al-Masri, an Egyptian who, according to US military officials, had been designated by Zarqawi as his successor. Dan Bartlett, White House counsellor, described the formation of the Iraqi government of national unity and the Camp David strategic assessment as a "fundamental breakpoint" for the Iraqi people and the US mission in Iraq.

Camp David was a "soup-to-nuts look across all government agencies" to help the new government. Mr Bartlett said that on the military side, much of the focus was on "bolstering" Iraqi security forces in Baghdad under what he called the "Maliki plan", aimed at preventing suicide attacks and stopping the growing sectarian violence by dealing with militias. Qubad Talabani, representative to the US of the Iraqi Kurdish regional government and son of the Iraqi president, yesterday urged Washington not to transfer to Iraq its domestic political battles between Republicans and Democrats.

"We don't need the US fighting its internal battle on our turf," he said, appealing for continued support for the new government from the Bush administration. "We can't do it on our own," he said, addressing the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Bush Invites His Critics To A War Council At Camp David (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson

Knight Ridder, June 12, 2006

THURMONT, Md. - Looking for new ideas on Iraq, President Bush sought advice from his critics Monday at an unusual two-day war council.

Closeted with his senior advisers at the presidential retreat at Camp David, Bush opened the conclave with a three-and-a-half hour briefing from top U.S. officials in Baghdad before having lunch with outside experts who've criticized his handling of the war.

He joined his aides for more talks in the afternoon and over dinner. On Tuesday, the president and his advisers will participate in a video conference with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his Cabinet in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0033109

Administration officials said the sessions were focused on improving security in Iraq and helping Maliki's new government succeed, not setting a timetable for reducing U.S. troop levels. In fact, at least one of the experts who met with Bush has advocated sending 77,000 more service members to join the 130,000 who are already in Iraq.

"It may be that the fastest way to turn Iraq over to the Iraqis and draw down American forces is not a steady decline of troop numbers. Instead, the fastest possible `exit strategy' may require one last surge effort," military historian Frederick Kagan, a scholar at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, wrote last year.

After he left the Camp David briefing Monday, Kagan declined to comment on what was said there beyond, "It was a good discussion."

With his popularity declining and support for the war fading, Bush has a made an effort to reach beyond his tight-knit circle of advisers headed by Vice President Dick Cheney. Still, it isn't clear how much influence outsiders have had on the president's thinking.

All four of the experts who were invited to join Bush at his hideaway in Maryland's Catoctin Mountains supported the Iraq invasion, but they haven't always been pleased with its prosecution.

In addition to Kagan, Bush heard from Eliot Cohen, a professor of strategic studies at Johns Hopkins University; journalist Robert Kaplan; and former CIA officer Michael Vickers, who's now with the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments.

Cohen, whose son was deployed to Iraq with the Army Rangers, has acknowledged second thoughts about his support for the war.

"What I did not know then that I do know now is just how incompetent we would be at carrying out that task," he wrote last summer in a guest column for The Washington Post. "If we fail in Iraq - and I don't think we will - it won't be because the American people lack heart, but because leaders and institutions have failed."

Kaplan has faulted Bush for failing to resolve disputes between the State Department and the Defense Department over postwar planning.

"The failure thus far to secure Iraq raises the issue - despite the incompetence of the administration - of whether the invasion was a flawed idea to begin with," he wrote in April for the Los Angeles Times. "Those whose task it was to plan the invasion and occupation of Iraq not only spoke in idealistic terms about the Iraqis, they apparently believed their own rhetoric to the exclusion of other, more troubling realities."

Kagan has accused Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld of "failing to focus on the war at hand" in his zeal to streamline the military.

"Claims that there are no serious problems with military policy in Iraq and Afghanistan, or with the equipment our soldiers have, or with the number of troops available, are childish and damaging to efforts to identify and solve real problems," he wrote in January 2005.

"These problems don't result from the liberal media or the antiwar crowd making a ruckus about nothing. They result from Rumsfeld's stubborn adherence to a wrongheaded policy."

Bush didn't mention his lunchtime conversation with the outside experts when he summarized the day's events for reporters. He warned Americans to expect more violence in Iraq, although he said he remained confident that it could become a stable democracy.

"Ultimately, the Iraqi people are going to have to make up their mind: Do they want to live in terror or do they want to live in peace?" he said. "There's no question the fighting is tough. There is no question the enemy is violent and mean. But the enemy doesn't stand for anything."

Officials Detail Zarqawi's Last Hour (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

BAGHDAD, June 12 -- Insurgent leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi lived for 52 minutes, in and out of consciousness, before he succumbed to massive internal injuries caused by the concussive blasts from two 500-pound bombs dropped by a U.S. fighter jet, U.S. military officials in Baghdad said Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0033110

In an attempt to end speculation on the circumstances of Zarqawi's death last Wednesday, the U.S. military provided charts, skeleton diagrams and descriptions by forensic pathologists of his autopsy to explain the last hour of Zarqawi's violent life.

At the same time, President Bush opened a two-day retreat at Camp David aimed at assessing where the United States stands in Iraq and how to bolster the new government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Bush and his top advisers, including Vice President Cheney, were briefed in the morning by video conference from Baghdad by Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. John P. Abizaid, the head of U.S. Central Command, and Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq.

The president was joined in the afternoon by members of his cabinet to discuss other challenges in Iraq, such as how to do a better job providing electricity and protecting the country's oil infrastructure, administration officials said.

On Zarqawi's death, Col. Stephen Jones, command surgeon for multinational forces in Iraq, said the shock waves from the bombs, ricocheting inside the hideout north of Baghdad, burst Zarqawi's blood vessels in his lungs and ears. When an American medic cleared his airway, blood flowed from Zarqawi's mouth.

Zarqawi died because his lungs failed to take in oxygen, military pathologists said. His broken right leg and scratches and cuts "were likely due to flying debris or Zarqawi being thrown against a hard object by the force of the blast," Jones said.

"No evidence of beating and no evidence of any firearm injuries," said a forensic pathologist who took part in the autopsy and spoke to reporters by phone from the United States, on condition he not be identified. A team of five people performed the autopsy Saturday; it involved body X-rays, toxicology tests and internal organ exams.

A statement on a Web site used by the organization al-Qaeda in Iraq claimed Monday to name Zarqawi's successor, Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, and pledged to carry on his violent legacy. Muhajer is the fourth highest-ranking member of al-Qaeda in Iraq and oversees the religious court that sentences those captured by the organization, said another al-Qaeda in Iraq official, who goes by the nom de guerre Abu Jihad.

Two women, a girl and two other men, including Zarqawi's spiritual adviser, Sheik Abdel Rahman, were also killed in the bombing. Rahman's skull was broken in the left temporal area, as well as several ribs and his left arm, as if he were thrown against the wall, Jones said. "Death was instantaneous," he said.

After the 6:12 p.m. airstrike, Iraqi police were the first to arrive, followed by U.S. forces at about 6:40 p.m., said Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the senior American spokesman in Iraq. He would not reveal which military unit was the first to respond. He said Zarqawi's body was treated with respect.

"He was treated better in death than he treated others in life," Caldwell said.

The results of DNA tests performed by the FBI confirmed that Zarqawi died from the bombing, Caldwell said.

Finding Zarqawi's location, near Baqubah, involved the help of "Jordanian assets," said Caldwell, after days of reports that Jordanian intelligence played a crucial role. "Jordan was extremely important and very informative in helping us establish and be able to prosecute this operation," he said.

Zarqawi, a native of Jordan, had asserted responsibility for three hotel bombings that killed 60 people, plus three bombers, in Amman, that country's capital. "Zarqawi was a wanted man in Jordan as he is wanted in Iraq," Jordanian government spokesman Nasir Judah said. "There was a continuous flow of information between Iraq and Jordan that has been ongoing for a while."

At Camp David, the president was joined by four nongovernment military experts who have generally supported the war in Iraq but have criticized different elements of U.S. efforts: author Robert Kaplan, Eliot A. Cohen of Johns Hopkins University, Frederick W. Kagan of the American Enterprise Institute and Michael Vickers of the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments.

The four have in the past been critical of how the Bush administration has handled Iraq, though not necessarily from the same perspective. Vickers has argued that the United States ought to have a smaller, more effective presence in Iraq, with more emphasis on developing advisers for the nascent Iraqi security forces. Kagan, by contrast, recently wrote in the Weekly Standard that the United States should consider deploying more troops and prosecuting the battle against insurgents more aggressively. Cohen has also questioned the vigor with which the military has pursued the war, as well as the competence of the administration.

DOJ_NMG_0033111

Bush appeared outside one of the cabins at the presidential retreat and told reporters that success in Iraq "will depend upon the capacity of the new government to provide for its people. . . . We're encouraged by the formation of a unity government, and we recognize our responsibilities to help that new government."

Bush and White House aides declined to offer many details of what had been discussed, although they indicated no imminent plan to reduce the level of U.S. ground troops in Iraq, now at about 130,000. "This is a process of getting to know . . . the Iraqi capabilities, particularly the command and control structure, and what we need to do to help them achieve victory," the president said.

Bush urged Iraq's neighbors to do more to speed the reconstruction of the country and said he and his advisers spent considerable time discussing how to boost oil production. "The government ought to use the oil as a way to unite the country and ought to think about having a tangible fund for the people, so the people have faith in central government," Bush said.

In Iraq, U.S.-led forces raided 140 locations in the past two days -- 11 of which emerged directly from intelligence gathered from the bomb site -- in an attempt to further dismantle al-Qaeda in Iraq's network, officials announced. American forces killed 32 insurgents, detained 178 people and captured a "high value" individual who had a $50,000 bounty on his head, Caldwell said.

During one operation in Baqubah, U.S. forces came under gunfire from a rooftop and responded by killing nine people including two young boys, military officials said. Caldwell said seven were insurgents and offered his "deepest condolences" for the boys, one less than a year old and the other about 4 years old.

The nine dead were all members of a well-known family in the village of Arab Nazzal who began shooting to repel American forces they mistook for insurgents, said Warrant Officer Zaidan Salem of the 2nd Battalion of the Iraqi army.

Elsewhere, 31 people were killed in violence across the country, according to Iraqi police officials. Two car bombs exploded in quick succession in downtown Balad, north of Baghdad, about 6:30 p.m., said 1st Lt. Raeid Abdul Mahdi of the Balad police. The two explosions, within five minutes of each other, killed six people and injured 50 others, said Zagid Hussein, a physician in the emergency room at Balad General Hospital.

Ten Oil Ministry employees were killed and 12 more wounded when men ambushed their bus with rocket-propelled grenades as it drove to an oil refinery in the Dora area in Baghdad, Gen. Saad al-Dulaimi said from the Interior Ministry operations room. A third car bomb detonated near a Shiite mosque in Baghdad's Shula neighborhood about 9 a.m., killing six people and wounding five others, he said.

In Amarah, a Shiite city in the south, British forces clashed with armed protesters for one hour, Dulaimi said, leaving eight civilians dead and 20 wounded.

A U.S. soldier from the 34th Infantry Division's 1st Brigade Combat Team was killed Friday night by a roadside bomb while on patrol near Diwaniyah, the military said in a statement yesterday. The soldier's name was being withheld pending notification of his next of kin.

The trial of former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein also continued Monday with four defense witnesses who admitted they had lied on the stand. One witness, who worked in Hussein's security services, said one of the defense attorneys, Khalil al-Dulaimi, and one of the president's former bodyguards said they would give him a permanent job in Syria if he testified in Hussein's defense and kill his family if he didn't, according to the witness's statement that was read in court. The witness said he was paid $500.

"They made me defend Saddam in my testimony," he said.

Hussein responded that the four witnesses had been investigated in "an atmosphere of threats" and that there were too many conspiracies in Iraq.

Bush Reaches Out In Bid To Shed Go-it-alone Image (BOS)

By Rick Klein

The Boston Globe, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The unusual Iraq war summit President Bush is hosting at Camp David this week reflects a new White House attitude that includes a willingness to consider dissenting views and take a more deliberate approach to policy questions, a style change for a president known to keep close counsel, according to political observers and Republican lawmakers.

The two-day conference that ends today seems designed to show Bush personally grappling with Iraq war policy along with his top aides and outside experts. The high-profile meetings of the president's ``war council'' -- along with a revamped policy team and a more nimble communications operation -- could revive his low standing with the public and help rehabilitate his strained relationship with Congress, said Bruce Buchanan, a government professor at the University of Texas.

The shifts -- largely credited to new White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten -- suggest Bush desperately wants to shed his image as a stubborn partisan who listens to few outside voices, said Buchanan, who has followed the president closely since Bush was governor of Texas.

``He's reaching out for a little empathy,'' he said. ``It's an effort to get people to acknowledge that he is at least trying and needs their support, and at least soften their opposition.''

The changes haven't lifted the president's near-record-low approval ratings, though, and considering new ideas doesn't mean the White House will use them. But last Wednesday's killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi could offer Bush a chance to change perceptions of the war in Iraq, one of the biggest drags on his popularity, White House allies say.

Signs of the new approach under Bolten abound. Instead of Bush's customary defense of the Guantanamo Bay detention facility, the White House expressed concern over three suicides there this past weekend. Bush, who once challenged foes in Iraq to ``bring 'em on,'' announced Zarqawi's death last week with a subdued address that warned of future violence there.

Recently, Bush surprised observers by acknowledging that his ``tough talk'' as US forces fought in Iraq and Afghanistan ``sent the wrong signal to people,'' especially that taunt to Iraqi insurgents and his ``wanted -- dead or alive'' declaration about Osama bin Laden.

Some of the administration's toughest Iraq war critics, including former secretary of state Madeleine K. Albright and retired Army general Barry McCaffrey, have been invited to Oval Office meetings with Bush himself. And, under Bolten, the White House is consulting more often with Congress and hosting more informal gatherings for lawmakers from both parties.

``It's more give and take, rather than, `Here's what I'm trying to sell,' '' said Candida Wolff, the head of Bush's legislative affairs office. ``Where Congress is at this point, you can't simply say, `This is what we're thinking, we hope you can pass it.' . . . We're doing much more outreach.''

Wolff said the congressional get-togethers helped convince the president to send the National Guard to the US-Mexico border after several members of Congress suggested it as a bold step to help stop illegal immigration. Bush announced the decision in a prime-time televised speech from the Oval Office, trading the campaign rally-style events he favors for a more statesmanlike setting.

Bush's new openness with Congress bespeaks Bolten's more personal approach, observers say. Unlike Andrew H. Card Jr., Bush's first chief of staff whom he replaced in April, Bolten nurtured his relationships with members of Congress as he rose through the ranks of the administration, and that has served him well in his current post, said Senator John E. Sununu, a New Hampshire Republican whose father was chief of staff for President George H. W. Bush.

``He has a lot of recent experience working very closely with members on sort of basic, nuts-and-bolts issues that cut across the entire scope of federal government,'' Sununu said.

It remains to be seen whether the changes will ultimately transform the White House and its policies. The president is still pushing his conservative agenda, and he hasn't publicly changed course on the war; meanwhile, the probable loss of GOP House seats in November's mid-term elections could drain more of his diminished political capital. Some critics say his abysmal public opinion poll numbers have forced Bush to adjust his style to preserve his power.

But the style makeover has already had visible effects.

Last month, when legislative leaders from both parties objected to FBI agents raiding the office of Representative William J. Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat suspected of taking bribes, Bush quickly sealed the seized records for a 45-day cooling-off period. The move undercut Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, but it averted a potentially embarrassing showdown with the House.

When some lawmakers publicly raised doubts about Air Force General Michael Hayden -- overseer of the president's controversial domestic eavesdropping program and Bush's choice to lead the CIA -- the White House surprised Congress by giving members what they had demanded for months: more details about that top-secret program. Within days, the Senate approved Hayden's nomination quickly and decisively.

DOJ_NMG_0033113

The strategy in that case appears to reflect Vice President Dick Cheney's diminished influence in the White House. Cheney, considered the most powerful vice president in US history, had insisted that Congress didn't need to be informed, said Representative John F. Tierney, a Salem, Mass., Democrat who serves on the House intelligence committee.

``Cheney's been a little bit dinged by some of the things going on around him, with the CIA leak investigation," Tierney said, referring to the federal investigation of the leaking of the name of an undercover CIA agent, which has led to the indictment of Cheney's former chief of staff , Lewis Libby .

If the White House is sincere about changing, Tierney said, it would consult Congress even more and use more ideas from Capitol Hill. ``They still have a long distance to go before they get to that point," he said.

Still, the changes have been greeted warmly in Congress, where lawmakers from both parties are still smarting from the February clash over a Dubai-controlled company's bid to take over operations of several US ports -- a deal that the administration approved without input from lawmakers.

The uproar over that deal marked a nadir in relations between Bush and GOP leaders in Congress, who largely delivered on Bush's priorities in his first term.

Wolff, Bush's legislative affairs chief, called it the ``straw that broke the camel's back," and said it underscored the need for the changes in how the White House works with Congress. It was also a catalyst to shake up a badly fatigued staff that had barely changed since Bush took office in 2001.

Earlier this year, Bush aides ``were in a position where they were just trying to stop shots on goal, and that just encouraged people to try to score on them," said Grover Norquist, an antitax activist with close ties to the White House. ``Now they can play offense rather than defense. [Revamping the staff] wasn't a panicked set of moves, but it's making a difference."

Rove: Republicans Should Address Iraq War (AP)

By Norma Love

The Associated Press, June 13, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H. —

White House adviser Karl Rove said Monday that Republicans facing midterm elections should campaign on the economy's strength and discuss the war in Iraq with no qualms.

"We have no excuses to make for it," Rove said during a fundraising dinner for New Hampshire Republicans. War supporters need not apologize for removing the threat of Saddam Hussein, and with so much work left to do, now is not the time to talk about leaving Iraq, he said.

Rove said Democrats pushing for the withdrawal of American troops should be the ones facing tough questions for wanting to "cut and run." He targeted Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry and Pennsylvania Rep. John Murtha, both Democrats and vocal supporters of getting out of Iraq.

"They are profoundly wrong," he said.

More than 400 people paid $100 to have dinner and hear Rove rally the faithful to work to retain Republican dominance in a state now viewed as a swing state in presidential elections. Dinner and a private reception with Rove cost $250.

Democrats won New Hampshire in three of the last four presidential elections _ only narrowly losing in 2000. Also, Democrats have won four of the last five gubernatorial elections.

The shift at the top has raised hopes among Democrats and concerns among Republicans about eventual parity in the state House and Senate _ long Republican bastions.

Some are concerned President Bush's poor approval ratings will hurt Republicans in state races this fall.

At an event last month, Rove blamed the war in Iraq for hurting Bush's job approval ratings in national polls. Rove said people like Bush but don't like the war.

About two dozen to three dozen protesters gathered Monday across the street from the Center of New Hampshire, where the event was being held. Democratic protesters said New Hampshire Republicans needed a big draw like Rove to help pay legal fees in a phone jamming case. Three GOP officials have been convicted of charges stemming from the jamming of Democratic get-out-the-vote lines on Election Day 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0033114

"Americans don't like cheaters, these people cheated," said Herb Moyer, 60, a Democrat from Exeter. The sign he carried read, "Karl Rove and New Hampshire GOP: Where criminals congregate."

State Democrats have sued Republicans, partly to try to force disclosure of who among national GOP officials might have had knowledge of the plot. Republicans insist the operation was strictly local.

State GOP Chairman Wayne Semprini said Friday the party will use half or more of Monday's proceeds to help candidates this fall. The rest of the money will pay for operating expenses, including legal fees racked up defending the Democratic lawsuit.

Rove Defends Primary, And Says NH Still 'a Red State' (PNH)

By James W. Pindell

PoliticsNH.com, June 13, 2006

MANCHESTER – President Bush's trusted political mind Karl Rove spoke in New Hampshire for the first time in three years Monday night hoping to encourage state Republicans the election year won't be as bad as some pundits say.

His keynote at a State Republican Committee fund-raiser also motivated Democrats and other like-mined organizations. About 75 protestors held signs like "Karl: 666" and "No More Roving Jam Sessions," in response to Republican operatives who jammed Democrats get out the vote phone lines in 2002.

It is the phone jamming scandal, which has criminally convicted three Republican operatives, which helped to deplete state party resources to $700 cash on hand last month. Beyond money, the Democrats have leveraged the issue into one they use every chance they can in hopes it puts Republicans on the defensive.

And while the 500 people who bought tickets helped the state party raise an estimated $55,000-$60,000 at the dinner, it did not help that Rove's own office has now been linked to the scandal. It was learned in the Spring that phone calls from one of those convicted where placed to Rove's department in the White House.

Republican lawyer Ovide Lamontagne repeated his insistence that of course calls where going to the White House about the high profile U.S. Senate race that year.

"[The protestors] are just a continuation of a party that is bankrupt," Lamontagne said using a play on words. "The Democrats are bankrupt on ideas so they keep talking about this."

Rove said he came to the Granite State with two messages. First, he thanked the Republican audience for teaching President Bush a valuable lesson when he was handily defeated here in the 2000 presidential primary and second that despite recent voting trends New Hampshire is still a "red" state.

On issues, Rove said that while each Congressional and Senatorial seat will be influenced on local issues, he believes there are two national issues that will be at play: the economy and terrorism.

Rove said President Bush's tax cuts have created the strongest economy in the world and a shorter recession that was expected. On the war he talked about U.S. Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass) and U.S. Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) who have been critical of the Iraq war.

"Like too many Democrats it strikes me that they are ready to give the green light to go to war, but when it gets tough and when it gets difficult they fall back on that party's pattern of cutting and running," Rove said. "They are wrong and they are profoundly in their approach."

It was the first event Rove has attended in New Hampshire since the final days of the 2004 election and the first public speech since 2003.

Rove's Speech To N.H. Republicans Keeps To Partisan Line (WP)

By David A. Farenthold

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H., June 12 -- The Bush administration is said to have a new playbook, with a more inclusive attitude toward critics and an openness to skeptical debate.

Karl Rove, apparently, still has his copy of the old playbook.

DOJ_NMG_0033115

In a speech to New Hampshire Republican officials here Monday night, the White House deputy chief of staff attacked Democrats who have criticized the U.S. war effort in Iraq, such as Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.) and Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.), who he said advocate "cutting and running."

"They may be with you for the first shots," Rove said of such opponents. "But they're not going . . . to be with you for the tough battles."

President Bush's approval ratings have plummeted amid concerns about the war, and Rove touched on two standard elements of his rhetorical sales pitch for the 2006 elections. He talked about the economy, ascribing its health to a combination of Republican tax cuts and fiscal restraint, and he talked about national security and the war.

Bush has called for a compromise on immigration and recently appointed a Treasury secretary who disagrees with him on the environment. But it was difficult to hear in this speech any signs of a more conciliatory White House.

Instead, Rove's speech was about sharpening the differences between the GOP and its opponents.

"They're for higher taxes. We're for lower taxes," he said during his description of the economy. "They're for more spending. We're for less spending."

Rove made similarly blunt points about the war. He defended the administration's decision to invade Iraq by laying out Saddam Hussein's "vital interest" in acquiring advanced weapons technology.

"We were absolutely right" to remove him, Rove said of the former leader. He added, "We have no excuses to make for it."

Rove singled out Kerry by reading quotes from before the war in which the senator expressed support for an invasion, and then making a joke about him being for the invasion before he was against it.

He also returned several times to Murtha, a Marine veteran who said last fall that troops should be withdrawn from Iraq. Rove said a precipitous departure would leave the United States weakened and a terrorist-friendly regime in Baghdad.

"It would provide a launching pad for the terrorists to strike the United States and the West," he said.

Rove's speech came at a critical point for Republicans, both nationally and in the Granite State, where Bush's approval ratings have mirrored their fall nationally.

The state Republican Party has been hit by a scandal that began when GOP operatives used computerized phone calls to jam the lines at get-out-the-vote operations run by Democrats and labor unions on Election Day in 2002. That scandal has resulted in three convictions and huge legal bills for the party. The state party chairman estimated that 10 to 15 percent of the receipts from Monday night's dinner will go to pay legal bills.

Rove did not spend much time on the party's difficulties, but they may have been reflected in his final point, which was less about the Bush administration's triumphs than its day-to-day perseverance.

He told the story about a friend from Texas who gave him a photo of President Lyndon B. Johnson in despair as he read over a list of Vietnam War casualties. Rove said the friend meant it as a sign that the presidency could break a person. He promised that Bush will not be broken.

And then Rove referenced what he said was his favorite presidential quote, from Warren G. Harding.

"This damn job will kill you," he quoted Harding as saying.

"But it will not this man," Rove said, meaning Bush.

Poll Sees A Boost For Bush, Iraq War (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — In the wake of terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's death, President Bush is seeing improvement in public confidence that the Iraq war is winnable, a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll shows.

The new poll found that 48% believe the United States probably or definitely will win the war, up from 39% in April. It also found that 47% believe things are going well in Iraq, up from 38% in March.

The survey, taken Friday to Sunday and released Monday, also showed Bush's approval rating going up to 38% from 36% earlier this month and an all-time low of 31% in May. The poll news came as Bush and members of his Cabinet met at Camp David to discuss ways to help the recently formed government in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0033116

"Good news makes people feel better," says political analyst Stuart Rothenberg, editor of the non-partisan Rothenberg Political Report. "This is the first break the president has gotten in about 18 months."

Still, 51% say the war was a mistake. Rothenberg and other analysts cautioned that long-term public confidence will grow only if the death of Zarqawi is followed up by increasing Iraq's stability.

"Unless there is clear, sustainable progress in Iraq, these numbers will be just a brief blip," says Ted Galen Carpenter, a foreign policy analyst at the libertarian Cato Institute think tank.

Rothenberg said that even minor improvements in Bush's poll numbers create an "openness" that may allow the White House to press its message more successfully. "It's hard to deliver good news with the public in a foul mood," he said.

At the presidential retreat in Maryland, Bush and his aides discussed redeveloping Iraq's oil industry, tracking down the remnants of Zarqawi's network and pressuring nations to follow through on $13 billion in aid. Bush declined to make predictions about U.S. troop withdrawals. "Whatever we do will be based on the conditions on the ground," he said.

Also this week, the House of Representatives is scheduled to hold its first full-scale debate about the war since it began in 2003. The debate, scheduled to begin Thursday, will center on a Republican resolution stating that the United States must prevail in Iraq and in the global war on terrorism.

Other poll highlights:

•Fifty-three percent said the killing of Zarqawi was a "major achievement."

•Twenty percent said Zarqawi's death will reduce insurgent attacks in Iraq; 30% said insurgent attacks will increase.

Rare House Debate To Focus On Iraq War (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

The House of Representatives this week will engage in a rare election-year debate on the Iraq war, with Republicans hoping to showcase the good news on the ground and Democrats fractured on whether the United States should begin withdrawing troops.

Lawmakers are tentatively scheduled to begin debating the Republican-authored resolution Thursday. A vote on the measure, called "Declaring that the United States will prevail in the global war on terror, the struggle to protect freedom from the terrorist adversary," is slated for Friday.

"There are clear differences between Republicans and Democrats on how best to confront the global war on terror," said Majority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio, who pushed getting the resolution on the floor.

Mr. Boehner said the debate will address the question of whether the United States defeats or retreats.

"It will be instructional and educational for the public," Mr. Boehner said, and will allow members to highlight "success stories that no one ever hears about."

However, some Democrats attacked the resolution as not really allowing for a genuine discussion of the issues, since Republicans wrote it and today will set parameters for debate.

"We promised and owe the American people a focused and dedicated debate about our policy and the future of American commitment in Iraq," Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri wrote yesterday in a letter to Mr. Boehner.

Mr. Skelton, the ranking Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee, said the resolution fails to provide such a forum. He said he was "distressed" the substance of the measure primarily focuses on the war on terrorism, with references to Libya and Afghanistan.

"I think you well understand that the war in Iraq is a separate conflict, an insurgency with terrorist elements and sectarian violence," he said.

The resolution states that Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein was a threat against global peace and security, and also declares the United States is committed to "the completion of the mission to create a sovereign, free, secure and united Iraq."

"It is not in the national security interest of the United States to set an arbitrary date for the withdrawal or redeployment" of troops, states the resolution, written by Republican leaders on the International Relations, Armed Services and intelligence committees.

DOJ_NMG_0033117

Friday's vote on the resolution could be used this fall, when the entire House is up for re-election and Democrats have high hopes for capturing at least the 15 seats needed to win back a majority.

Political observers note that both parties must walk a fine line on the war, since the majority of Americans now say it was a mistake, but lawmakers do not want to appear unsupportive of the troops in Iraq.

"Democrats are not in lock step on this issue," said House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland.

He said he thinks the war was "the right thing to do and we did it in the wrong way," particularly by not sending enough troops. He anticipates some Democrats will argue the country was misled by President Bush and the United States should never have gone to Iraq in the first place.

The resolution also praises the formation of the Iraqi government and the writing of the constitution, and applauds the troops on their work and for killing terrorist Abu Musab Zarqawi.

The debate marks the first discussion on the war since November, when Rep. John P. Murtha, a decorated veteran, called for starting a six-month withdrawal of U.S. troops in Iraq.

After the Pennsylvania Democrat's call, Republicans pushed another resolution, which called for immediate pullout, to the floor for a vote in hopes to embarrass Democrats, who called the move "shameful." It was rejected on a vote of 403-3 following a raucous debate.

The Iraq War Debate Reopens In Washington (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

Christian Science Monitor, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON

The No. 1 issue for American voters - the future of the Iraq war - moves to the fore this week, both among President Bush's wartime advisers and on the floor of Congress.

For supporters of the war, long thirsting for signs of progress, the timing seems fortuitous. Last week, US forces killed Iraq's most wanted terrorist, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, and the Iraqi prime minister finally completed his national-unity government. Monday, at Camp David, the president gathered his war cabinet and outside experts for a two-day strategy session, and Wednesday he meets at the White House with the bipartisan Iraq Study Group. In Congress, both houses are set to vote for supplemental war funding.

But it is the full-day debate on Iraq on the floor of the House of Representatives, scheduled for Thursday, that is the least predictable of the forums. The last time the House took to debating Iraq, last November, the scene deteriorated into recriminations over a resolution calling for immediate withdrawal that Democrats called a political stunt. House majority leader John Boehner (R) of Ohio, who has long planned for this week's debate, hopes to match the serious, dignified tone of deliberation that preceded the Gulf war, in 1991. Most of his GOP colleagues support the idea.

"The House is a debating society in the best sense of the word," says Rep. Henry Hyde (R) of Illinois, chairman of the International Relations Committee. "Everyone that listens with an open mind will find an aspect to this that they hadn't thought of."

Other members, including antiwar Republicans and Democrats, also welcome a debate, as long as the terms are fair, they say. At time of writing, the text of the resolution to be debated had not been released, but congressional sources indicated that it would frame the Iraq war as part of the broader war on terror, a point of controversy. Many war critics argue that the US role in Iraq has deflected attention from the larger war on terror, and thus antiwar members may feel compelled to vote against the resolution. But that may prove politically risky, as the resolution will also express support for American troops, and no member wants to be seen opposing the men and women in harm's way.

At a highly politicized time, with the fall midterm elections approaching and future control of Congress in question, some political analysts see risks for both parties in an Iraq debate. Public support for the war has been on a long, downward slide, and Bush's own job approval rating and policy agenda have been damaged by Iraq more than anything else.

"I don't think the floor is the place to have a debate on Iraq - ours is not a parliamentary system," says GOP strategist Ed Rollins, who argues that such discussion is better handled by members in their districts. "If you get into a big all-out debate, it becomes a referendum on whether the president is right or whether those who voted for it are right. It's not a pretty thing for the public to watch, especially for our troops in the field."

DOJ_NMG_0033118

Other Republicans say that with public opinion on the war so low, Bush and his supporters have nowhere to go but up.

The debate could also serve to highlight divisions among Democrats over the war. Until now, Republicans have suffered most of the political pain over Iraq, and Democrats have managed to keep their differences away from broad public scrutiny.

For some Republicans who strongly support the US role in Iraq, political expediency or risk are beside the point: A sober, public debate on how to proceed in Iraq, at a critical turning point in that country's development, is an important way for elected representatives to help shape the future.

"It's the right thing to do," says Rep. Christopher Shays (R) of Connecticut, who has been to Iraq 12 times, more than any other member. "There's a logic in debating an issue that has not turned out like any of us hoped, and then determine why that's the case."

Still, he remains hopeful about what the US can accomplish in Iraq, and sees congressional debate as useful to advancing the public dialogue. "My big fear about Iraq is not that we're going to lose the Iraqi war in Iraq, but that we would lose the Iraqi war here at home," says Mr. Shays, who is locked in a tough reelection battle. "I think members should have an opportunity to say what they want to say - to ... have everybody on the record."

Rep. Walter Jones of North Carolina, a conservative Republican known for his highly publicized turn against the war, also views the coming debate hopefully, as long as it is "fair and open" and the rule allows for "adequate division of time" among opponents and proponents of the war.

Democratic Rep. Marcy Kaptur of Ohio also welcomes the debate: "The American people are wondering what course will lead us to redeploying our forces out of Iraq. This debate allows us to focus on a strategic discussion of what's ahead, rather than just a few people briefed at the highest levels. The American people expect Congress to assume its rightful authority in warmaking...."

Bush: US Ready To Help New Iraq Gov't (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, June 12, 2006

President Bush reassured Iraqis on Monday that the United States stands ready to help their new government, but said success in Iraq largely depends on Baghdad's ability to secure the nation and care for its citizens.

Beginning a two-day strategy session on Iraq at Camp David, Bush also said Iraq's neighbors should be doing more to help. He said the United States expects countries that have promised $13 billion in financial assistance to make good on their pledges.

Bush's huddle with top advisers was a chance to outline ways the U.S. government can best help Iraq, where the power runs sporadically and Iraqi civilian and U.S. troop deaths are mounting. White House advisers said the U.S. mission in Iraq was at a breakpoint, rhetoric that suggests the administration is anxious to shift responsibility for the future of Iraq to the Iraqis.

"The best way to win this war against an insurgency is to stand up a unity government which is capable of defending itself, but also providing tangible benefits to the people," Bush said, standing outside a cabin at the secluded, wooded presidential retreat with his national security team and members of his Cabinet.

"Ultimately, the Iraqi people are going to have to make up their mind. Do they want to live in terror, or do they want to live in peace?" he said.

Now in its fourth year, the war also was an issue Monday on Capitol Hill.

The Senate opened debate on a military policy bill, and John Kerry, D-Mass., intended to offer a plan to withdraw U.S. combat troops from Iraq by the end of the year. The White House has long opposed setting deadlines in Iraq, and Kerry's amendment is expected to be defeated in a vote later this week.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, in a speech in Washington, called the war in Iraq an "intractable conflict" and said Americans deserve a plan from the president that provides troops with an exit strategy. "It is no longer sufficient to say 'we will stand down as the Iraqis stand up,'" Reid said, quoting a Bush refrain.

DOJ_NMG_0033119

The House and Senate are poised to deal with a $94.5 billion measure to fund Iraq and provide additional aid for the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast. The bill should receive easy approval, even as impatience is growing with the Iraq war and its $8 billion monthly tab.

On Thursday, the House will vote on a resolution supporting the U.S. mission in Iraq.

The Camp David meeting came as the Bush administration was trying to capitalize on momentum generated by last week's swearing-in of key Iraqi national security officials and the U.S. airstrike that killed Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, al-Qaida's leader in Iraq.

Al-Qaida named a successor Monday to al-Zarqawi and said he would stick to the slain leader's path — attacks on Shiites as well as on U.S. and Iraqi forces. Bush warned, "I think the successor to Zarqawi is going to be on our list to bring to justice."

The highlight of the Camp David work session is Tuesday's secured video teleconference with new Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and members of his cabinet. During the first day of meetings, Bush and his advisers addressed violence in Iraq, especially in Baghdad and Basra, as well as the Iraqi economy and oil.

Bush suggested that the Iraqi government use the nation's vast supply of oil as a way to unite the country, perhaps creating a fund for the Iraqi people to restore their faith in the new unified central government.

The war is weighing down Bush's approval rating at home, and Republicans are worried about losing control of Congress in November's midterm elections. Only a third of respondents to an Associated Press-Ipsos poll in early June supported Bush's handling of the situation — an all-time low.

"I keep reminding the American people that the stakes are worth it," Bush said. "It is worth it to help Iraq succeed. It is worth it to have a democracy in the Middle East."

Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Baghdad, said he thinks it will be possible to withdraw some of the 130,000 U.S. forces in the months ahead as long as Iraq's government and security forces make progress.

But Bush, who noted that Iraq's new defense minister was just sworn in last week, made no predictions about U.S. troop withdrawals. He said Casey would make recommendations after assessing the Iraqis' ability to take the fight to the enemy and secure the country.

"Whatever we do will be based upon the conditions on the ground," Bush said.

Reid Tells Liberal Activists Troops Must Come Home (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid told a gathering of Democratic and liberal activists in Washington yesterday that "we have to start bringing our troops home."

The Nevada Democrat opened his remarks at the Take Back America 2006 Conference by criticizing the Bush administration's handling of the war in Iraq. The conference is hosted by the Campaign for America's Future (CAF), a liberal advocacy organization.

"As we meet here today, the president is meeting with his Cabinet to talk about Iraq. As well he should," Mr. Reid said to applause.

President Bush has stated his position repeatedly: " 'As Iraqi forces stand up, American forces will stand down.' "

"I don't want to hear that anymore," Mr. Reid said. "Our troops deserve an exit strategy."

Mr. Reid seemed to make a more direct call for withdrawal of troops than his previous remarks, but the senator's office disagreed.

"It's consistent with the Democrats proposal for a responsible redeployment of troops," Reid spokesman Jim Manley said. "And it's in line with the bill that passed the Senate last year with bipartisan support calling for a 'significant transition' of troops from Iraq in 2006."

In his speech, Mr. Reid made repeated reference to the Senate bill as "law" that Mr. Bush must follow.

One Democratic staffer in attendance, who because of the staffer's ongoing relations with Mr. Reid asked to remain anonymous, said the senator gave a similar, less pointed speech in Nevada during the weekend.

DOJ_NMG_0033120

"But at the end of the speech, people in the crowd started chanting, 'Bring them home,' " the staffer said.

Mr. Reid spoke on the first day of CAF's three-day conference. Admission to the week's speeches, workshops and a gala dinner cost $125 to $410.

Other prominent Democrats, including Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California and Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts are scheduled to appear today.

Participating groups include the American Civil Liberties Union, Wal-Mart Watch and the Truman National Security Project.

CAF says its goals for the conference are to "educate, inspire and engage" progressive activists.

As Mr. Reid criticized the administration, he received hisses of agreement from the crowd. "Distract, distort, divide. That's what this administration has done," Mr. Reid said. "We can't continue to be bogged down in Iraq."

Most in attendance seemed to approve of the speech by the soft-spoken senator.

"I'd like to give him some of whatever they gave Bruce Banner to become the Incredible Hulk," said Charles Bright of Alexandria. "But after his speech, I felt like calling myself a Democrat, instead of an independent liberal, which is how I've described myself the last several years."

The Liberals' Lunch Special: Democratic Harmony (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

The left-wingers are hungry.

The liberal activists assembled for the annual "Campaign for America's Future" conference were so hungry yesterday, in fact, that it was difficult to hear Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) speak over the din of forks clinking on salad plates. That's too bad, because he was telling the lefties what they like to hear.

"I don't know how many times we have heard the president say: 'We will stand down as Iraqis stand up.' I don't want to hear that anymore," Reid told the luncheon crowd at the Washington Hilton. "It seems to me that that mantra no longer stands. That is, we have to start bringing our troops home."

The activists -- at least those who could hear him -- applauded Reid's unexpected and unscripted call for withdrawal.

That Reid, an antiabortion Mormon who voted to authorize force in Iraq, would be breaking bread at all with the liberal activists speaks to a different hunger. Interest groups, hoping for a win in the November midterms, have toned down their fratricidal attacks on elected Democrats. And Democratic lawmakers, emboldened by President Bush's slump, aren't as afraid to be seen with the lefties who make up their "base."

"Senator Harry Reid gets it!" exulted environmentalist Jerome Ringo, the luncheon's emcee.

Last year, only two members of Congress -- both backbenchers from the liberal fringe -- were on the program. This year, the conference is getting the full Monty from Democratic leaders and presidential aspirants: Reid and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), John Kerry (Mass.), Russ Feingold (Wis.) and Barack Obama (Ill.); Govs. Tom Vilsack (Iowa) and Ed Rendell (Pa.); and 10 members of the House. Sen. Debbie Stabenow (Mich.) wasn't on the program but came anyway for lunch.

As they did last year, event organizers made efforts to display harmony within the Democratic Party. The first booth at the entrance to the exhibit hall featured a new publication called "The Democratic Strategist," a joint venture by party liberals and moderates. A few booths down was a movement to draft Al Gore -- a charter member of the centrist Democratic Leadership Council. The opening luncheon put leaders of the normally feuding labor and environmental movements together on the stage to promote an energy policy.

Despite this choreography, participants had not entirely shed their antipathy toward elected Democrats. Pollster Stan Greenberg, married to a Democratic member of Congress, said GOP poll numbers gave Democrats "an immense opportunity, if anybody had an idea what the Democrats stood for." As Greenberg described the ideal candidate's positions, Leo Gerard, president of the steelworkers union, blurted out: "Not one of the [expletive] presidential candidates fits that."

The Nation's Katrina Vanden Heuvel won whoops and cheers for decrying Democratic leadership as "hapless" and "timid," and "often too fearful of its own shadow."

DOJ_NMG_0033121

It was potentially hostile terrain. But Reid, who has scored points with liberals over the past year, was not about to let those descriptions stick to him; taking a page from George W. Bush's strategy, he was playing to the base. Arriving at the Hilton, he sat down for a radio interview with the "Jon Elliott Show" (slogan: "The most dangerous liberal in America"). Trailed by two beefy bodyguards, Reid went next to Ellen Ratner of Talk Radio News Service. "Democrats, of course, are together" on Iraq, he said. "It's time that we started bringing our people home."

At lunch, the liberal diners were not sure how to greet Reid. About a quarter of the audience rose to give him a standing ovation; the rest remained planted. Reid began to speak, but was barely audible.

"We can't hear you!" audience members called out. Reid adjusted the microphone, with little effect.

What the minority leader lacked in audibility, he had in embellishment. His prepared text said "close to 2,500 U.S. troops killed" in Iraq; he made it "about 2,500." His text said the war is "costing over $8 billion per month"; Reid made that "costing us $10 billion a month." The text described as "good news" the killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and the forming of an Iraqi cabinet; Reid left that out entirely.

Instead, he called for the start of a troop withdrawal, which wasn't in the text. "Iraq is not a matter for future presidents, as President Bush has said," he charged. "It's his war and it's his responsibility."

If Reid wasn't quite "Give 'Em Hell, Harry," he was certainly "Give 'Em a Hard Time, Harry." The senator spoke of the "rubber-stamp Congress," the "overall incompetence of this administration" and a Bush strategy to "distort, distract, divide." He warned that "the ice caps are melting on both ends of the Earth," and alluded to this year's first tropical storm, Alberto, which he renamed. "I personally have to say that Alfredo has proven to me again that global warming's here," he said. He attacked Condoleezza Rice for allowing Chevron to name an oil tanker after her, and he led the audience in a responsive chant:

"How many subpoenas has any committee issued on spying? You got it: Zero."

"How many subpoenas have they issued on the price gouging, these gas prices? Zero."

"How many subpoenas have they issued on the war in Iraq? Zero."

Nobody attempted another standing ovation when he finished. But the applause was liberal.

Blitz Against Al-Qaeda In Iraq Continues (USAT)

By César G. Soriano

USA Today, June 13, 2006

BAGHDAD — U.S. and Iraqi forces have launched 200 raids against insurgents since killing Abu Musab al-Zarqawi last week, dealing a blow to his terrorist organization, al-Qaeda in Iraq, U.S. and Iraqi officials said Monday.

The raids have led to the capture of more than 200 suspected insurgents and 33 deaths.

“We are cautiously optimistic that we have been very successful thus far in the ongoing operations,” military spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said.

Zarqawi was killed when an F-16 dropped two 500-pound bombs on his hide-out Wednesday. The U.S. military and Iraqi government knew Zarqawi was in the house because of a tip that allowed coalition forces a look inside Zarqawi's tight band of followers.

“We have managed to infiltrate al-Qaeda in Iraq,” said Mouwafak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser. He declined to elaborate.

The intelligence that led up to the bombing and the raids may be the best chance of cracking the terrorist group dominated by foreign fighters.

Even if the raids do lasting damage to the organization, Iraq will have to deal with violence from other sources, including sectarian militias and insurgent cells that continue to function.

“We know this is not going to end the insurgency. It will take the people of Iraq to make that decision with their Iraqi security forces,” Caldwell said.

“The more the Iraqi people take control of their destiny,” he said, “that will be the key to success and ending the insurgency in Iraq.”

Bombings and other violence killed more than 50 people across Iraq on Monday, the Associated Press reported.

DOJ_NMG_0033122

Eleven raids by U.S. and Iraqi forces over the weekend were based directly on intelligence coalition troops gleaned by combing through the rubble of Zarqawi's hide-out in Hibhib north of Baghdad, Caldwell said.

In a raid Monday, coalition troops attacked an insurgent cell in Baqouba, not far from where Zarqawi was killed. Coalition forces killed seven people with suspected ties to al-Qaeda in Iraq leaders, the U.S. military said in a statement.

Two children were killed in the firefight. The insurgents had children with them when they fired on coalition troops from the rooftop of a building, Caldwell said.

The intelligence breakthrough represented by Zarqawi's death and the raids is among the most encouraging developments of the three-year battle against the insurgency, some military experts said.

"This was not one big break. If you look back six months, there has been a consistent improvement in U.S. intelligence targeting," said Anthony Cordesman of the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "We've seen one report after another of senior al-Qaeda people being captured or killed in the last six months."

By contrast, the capture of Saddam Hussein in December 2003 was a propaganda victory for coalition forces but led to no improvement in intelligence, said Daniel Byman of the Brookings Institution.

The raids have led to the biggest intelligence boon in years, said Edward O'Connell, a defense analyst for the RAND Corp. think tank. "It's been a long time coming," he said. "It takes hard-core detective work … to infiltrate the enemy."

An Internet statement attributed to al-Qaeda in Iraq named Sheik Abu Hamza al-Muhajir to replace Zarqawi. The statement, which was posted on a militant website, could not be verified.

The name — a pseudonym, as most militants are known by — apparently was not on any U.S. lists of terrorists who have rewards on their heads, the Associated Press reported.

President Bush said al-Muhajir probably will be added to the wanted roster. "I think the successor to Zarqawi is going to be on our list to bring to justice," Bush said.

Al-Qaida In Iraq Names New Leader (AP)

By Nadia Abou El-magd

AP, June 12, 2006

Al-Qaida in Iraq named a successor Monday to Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and said he would stick to the slain leader's path — attacks on Shiites as well as on U.S. and Iraqi forces.

The new leader, identified by the nom de guerre Abu Hamza al-Muhajer in a statement posted on the Web, appeared to be a foreign Arab, like his predecessor.

But otherwise he is an unknown. The name has not appeared in previous al-Qaida in Iraq propaganda or on U.S. lists of terrorists with rewards on their heads, suggesting he is a lower-level figure or someone more prominent who has taken a new pseudonym.

President Bush said Monday that al-Muhajer would join the ranks of those sought by the U.S. "I think the successor to Zarqawi is going to be on our list to bring to justice," Bush said.

The lack of detail appeared to reflect a new emphasis on secrecy by the group. U.S. forces have launched a series of raids against al-Qaida in Iraq based on intelligence found in the safehouse where al-Zarqawi was killed by an American airstrike Wednesday. The group may fear infiltration or that al-Zarqawi's public stance led to his downfall.

"Al-Qaida in Iraq's council has agreed on Sheik Abu Hamza al-Muhajer to be the successor of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in the leadership of the organization," the group said.

The authenticity of the statement could not be independently confirmed. It was posted on an Islamic militant Web forum where al-Qaida in Iraq often posts messages.

The posting said al-Muhajer was "a beloved brother with jihadi (holy war) experience and a strong footing in knowledge.

"We ask Almighty God to strengthen him that he may accomplish what Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, God have mercy on his soul, began," it said.

That could mean he will continue the strategy the Jordanian-born al-Zarqawi followed: a campaign of brutal attacks on Shiite civilians, aimed at sparking a Sunni-Shiite civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0033123

The attacks sparked tensions between al-Zarqawi's group and some Iraqi insurgents who felt the bloodshed hurt the image of their resistance against U.S. forces. They wanted to focus attacks on American and Iraqi troops.

Iraqi insurgents loyal to Saddam Hussein made a rare public acknowledgment of disputes with al-Zarqawi in a condolence letter posted on the same Web site.

"Although there were many matters we differed with him on and him with us, ... what united us was something greater," said the statement by the Fedayeen Saddam. It said the group had "the honor" of fighting alongside al-Zarqawi and that "our determination is only increased for waging jihad."

Al-Zarqawi's death raised speculation the group might turn to an Iraqi leader to smooth over the differences with Iraqis. Al-Zarqawi's deputy is an Iraqi known as Abu Abdul-Rahman al-Iraqi. The U.S. military told The Associated Press on Monday that he was not a man identified as "Abdul-Rahman" who was killed with al-Zarqawi.

The name al-Muhajer, Arabic for "immigrant," suggested the new leader was not Iraqi. The name is often used by foreign Arab militants, referring to the "muhajereen," Islam's early converts who fled persecution in Mecca to join the Prophet Muhammad in Medina.

Rohan Gunaratna, a terror expert at Singapore's Institute of Defense and Strategic Studies, said the choice of a non-Iraqi means the group is "likely to continue the foreign operations."

Al-Zarqawi had sought to expand his campaign beyond Iraq, including a triple suicide bombing against hotels in Jordan last November that killed 60 people.

Al-Zarqawi also had links to al-Qaida's branch in Saudi Arabia, which in a statement Monday thanked him for helping its fight against the kingdom's rulers. "We will not forget his favors to jihad and the mujahedeen in the prophet's peninsula," the group said.

The U.S. military had predicted a militant named Abu Ayyub al-Masri would become al-Qaida in Iraq's leader. Al-Masri, an Egyptian associate of al-Zarqawi, has a $50,000 reward on his head.

Militants usually adopt a pseudonym made up of a nickname called a "kunya" in Arabic — "Abu," meaning "father of," plus a name that sometimes refers to an actual child of the militant. The second part of the pseudonym is usually an adjective denoting the militant's nationality.

Al-Zarqawi was born Ahmad Fadhil Nazzal al-Khalayleh, but took a pseudonym from Zarqa, his hometown in Jordan. He had a child named Musab, so took the kunya of "Abu Musab."

The secrecy surrounding the new leader could hurt the group's ability to carry out attacks, said Egyptian analyst Diaa Rashwan. Al-Zarqawi built a reputation as a holy warrior, helping draw foreign militants to carry out suicide bombings.

"Al-Zarqawi's charisma was very important factor for many to join his organization," Rashwan said. "All al-Zarqawi had was car bombs and people ready to blow themselves up."

"My feeling is that they are going to have establish a persona for him," said Evan Kohlmann, a New York-based terror consultant and founder of globalterroralert.com. "They're going to have to introduce this fellow to the world."

A Jihadist Web Site Says Zarqawi's Group In Iraq Has A New Leader In Place (NYT)

By John F. Burns And Dexter Filkins

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 12 — An Islamic militant Web site said Monday that a new leader had been named to replace Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the Jordanian terrorist killed last week, as the head of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia.

The statement, which appeared on the jihadi Web site Al Hesba, announced that a man named Abu Hamza al-Muhajir would replace Mr. Zarqawi, who was killed in an American airstrike in the village of Hibhib, about 35 miles north of Baghdad.

Mr. Muhajir is something of a mystery; his name does not appear on any of the charts of wanted leaders of Al Qaeda previously issued by the American command, or on any of the dozens of previous statements by Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia posted on the Internet. Senior Iraqi officials said they were unfamiliar with anyone by that name.

One clue was that the word "muhajir" usually refers to an Islamic militant who has traveled beyond his own country to fight for his faith.

DOJ_NMG_0033124

"He is not an Iraqi — that is my first impression," said the Iraqi national security adviser, Mowaffak al-Rubaie, adding that he had not heard of Mr. Muhajir.

The group that made the statement is called the Council of Freedom Fighters, an umbrella organization whose formation was announced in January and which Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia claimed to have joined.

The council is said to be run by an Iraqi named Abdullah al-Rashid al-Baghdadi. At the time, Mr. Zarqawi was said to be under pressure to turn over more power to Iraqis. Many terrorism experts regarded the council as a fiction or, at best, a front organization that appeared to give local control to Iraqis while leaving Mr. Zarqawi in charge.

"Sheik Abu Hamza al-Muhajir, may God preserve him, a good brother, has previous jihadi experience and a deep foot in the pool of knowledge," the statement said. "We ask God to guide him and to continue what Sheik Abu Musab started by his hands."

A three-hour autopsy conducted over the weekend on the body of Mr. Zarqawi showed that he died of extensive "tearing and bruising" of his lungs caused by the blast wave from the two 500-pound bombs dropped on the safe house where he was hiding last Wednesday, American military officials and medical specialists said Monday.

The chief spokesman for the American military command in Iraq, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, said Mr. Zarqawi, 39, died 52 minutes after the airstrike. That was when an American military medic, who had gone to his aid when the first American troops arrived, "realized that Zarqawi was dead," General Caldwell said.

The general said the American troops, arriving at the scene by helicopter 28 minutes after the bombing, "took possession" of Mr. Zarqawi from the Iraqi police, who were first on the scene. He said that the American medic found that Mr. Zarqawi's breathing was "shallow and labored," and that he had a barely detectable pulse that "quickly deteriorated." Even though the medic tried to revive Mr. Zarqawi's breathing and heartbeat, he realized that "that Zarqawi's death was imminent."

"The medic registered no pulse or respirations, and at 7:04 p.m. on June 7 realized that Zarqawi was dead," General Caldwell said. "This was approximately 24 minutes after the coalition forces arrived, or approximately 52 minutes after the first airstrike on the safe house" in Hibhib.

"The injuries to his lungs were not survivable," Col. Stephen Jones, command surgeon for the American military in Iraq, said at a news conference here. Colonel Jones said the extent of Mr. Zarqawi's blast injuries, which had virtually exploded his lungs, were characteristic of "enclosed space" wounds suffered by bombing victims.

The injuries indicated that Mr. Zarqawi was inside the house, not running for cover in the palm grove outside, as some reports had suggested, when the bombs struck, Colonel Jones said.

At the news conference, which General Caldwell said had been called to dispel some of the "propaganda and misinformation" that had swirled around Mr. Zarqawi's death, one of two American forensic pathologists who participated in the autopsy said there was "no evidence of beating and no evidence of firearm injuries."

That appeared aimed at countering news accounts that had quoted Iraqi villagers who claimed to have seen American troops beating Mr. Zarqawi. One villager reporting seeing a soldier hit him with a rifle butt.

General Caldwell said tests made of Mr. Zarqawi's DNA also confirmed that he was the person killed in the bombing. When Mr. Zarqawi was found by American forces, he was wearing his signature black outfit, the general added.

Sheik Abd al-Rahman, Mr. Zarqawi's spiritual adviser and one of those killed in the airstrike, died from "blast injuries caused by flying shrapnel, flying debris and being thrown against a hard object by the force of the blast," also inside the house, said Colonel Jones, the command surgeon.

Mr. Rahman's injuries included a skull fracture that caused extensive internal bleeding, severe bleeding into his left lung and lacerations of his liver. Colonel Jones said Mr. Rahman's death, unlike Mr. Zarqawi's was "instantaneous."

In addition to Mr. Zarqawi and Mr. Rahman, the American command said, a third man, two women and a girl of about 5 or 6 were killed in the airstrike. The bodies of the women and the girl were turned over to the local hospital, General Caldwell said, while the body of the third man, who was not identified, remained in American custody.

General Caldwell said the Americans were discussing with Iraqi officials what to do with the bodies of Mr. Zarqawi and Mr. Rahman, whom some officials have described as a non-Iraqi.

DOJ_NMG_0033125

General Caldwell's news conference did not dispel all of the questions surrounding the operation that killed Mr. Zarqawi, however, particularly questions about whether American commandos were in the area before the attack.

General Caldwell said there were no "coalition forces" on the ground in the vicinity of the house at the time of the strike.

"Coalition forces include all forces operating in the country of Iraq," he said.

But one senior military official and one senior Pentagon adviser, both speaking on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to comment publicly, said there were a number of Special Operations troops near the safe house before the strike. At least two Iraqis living near the house described seeing American commandos sliding down ropes from helicopters and encircling the house before the bombs landed.

A series of raids that began after Mr. Zarqawi was killed continued over the weekend, General Caldwell said, with American troops carrying out 140 operations in the past 48 hours. Those raids killed 32 insurgents and captured 178 others, he said. He added that 11 of the raids had resulted directly from intelligence gathered at Mr. Zarqawi's safe house.

Two Iraqi boys, one 6 months old, the other 4 years old, were killed Monday during an operation near Baquba, when American forces came under machine-gun fire from a rooftop, the military said.

Missiles, car bombs and roadside explosives killed at least 18 other Iraqi civilians and wounded 101 around the country on Monday, the military said.

And the military said an American soldier had been killed Friday by a roadside bomb while on a logistics patrol in Ad Diwaniya. No other details were released.

Jordan Details Its Role In Finding Al-Zarqawi (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi And Josh Meyer

Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

AMMAN, Jordan -- Shocked into action by violence on their own soil, Jordan officials months ago began an intensive campaign of spying on insurgents in neighboring Iraq, a gambit that ultimately helped lead to the death of militant leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, Jordan's top spies said Monday.

Maj. Gen. Muhammed Dahabi, director of Jordan's General Intelligence Department, and Col. Ali Burjaq, his chief of counterterrorism, said in a rare interview Monday that a splashy video tape al-Zarqawi released earlier this spring helped Jordanian intelligence pinpoint his approximate location at the time, a key lead that ultimately led to al-Zarqawi's death in a U.S. aerial bombing attack last week.

Al-Zarqawi's need to micromanage all aspects of his al-Qaida in Iraq organization, from finances to operations, also made him vulnerable to discovery, the two intelligence officials said.

"We knew him personally," Burjaq said of the Jordanian-born militant, who spent part of the 1990s in Jordanian prisons on terrorism charges.

"We knew how he behaves," the spy continued, speaking at the Jordanian intelligence agency's mountaintop complex in Amman. "He was vicious, mean -- a dictator in his decisions. He didn't allow anyone else to question his decisions."

Until November 2005, when al-Zarqawi operatives allegedly blew up three hotels in Amman, killing more than 60 people, Jordan had barely operated in Iraq.

After the hotel bombings, Iraq became and remains Amman's primary security worry, though Jordan also abuts the simmering troubles in neighboring Israel and the Palestinian territories.

The bombings, the two intelligence officials said, served as a wake-up call for Jordanians, forcing them to seek a more active role in combating Iraq's troubles.

The hotel bombings also showed a skeptical Iraqi government, suspicious of its neighbors' security forces, that al-Zarqawi was training Iraqis for cross-border operations in Jordan, one source close to Jordanian intelligence officials said.

With the permission of Iraq's fledgling government, Jordanian intelligence operatives flooded the war-torn country, cultivating informants and working the periphery of the al-Zarqawi network to find ways into the organization, according to a Jordanian official and intelligence experts.

DOJ_NMG_0033126

The Jordanian GID set up so-called spy bureaus in Iraq, and began working with the Dulaimis, a large, mostly Sunni Arab tribe, some of whose members are closely tied to the insurgency, to gather information about anyone associating with al-Zarqawi and others in militant groups.

For Jordanian intelligence, it marked a watershed. In the past, "we always pursued a defensive policy," against terrorism, Dahabi said. "But ever since I became chief, we started to think of external operations. We wanted to do more daring operations and do external operations."

U.S. military officials have said they managed to track al-Zarqawi's spiritual adviser, Sheikh Abdul Rahman, to the village of Hibhib, north of the provincial capital of Baqouba, where they dropped two 500-pound bombs that led to the al-Qaida leader's death in what has been called a dramatic step in efforts to stabilize Iraq. But Jordan also played a key role in ferreting out al-Zarqawi, U.S. and Jordanian officials have said, providing critical human intelligence which apparently corroborated information the Americans were getting from within the insurgency movement itself.

Jordanian security and intelligence authorities were involved in the hunt for al-Zarqawi from the start, helping trace locations where alZarqawi and his group frequently stayed, said Jordanian government spokesman Nasser Juddeh.

Dahabi and Burjaq, emerging briefly from the shadowy world of surveillance and infiltration, provided the Los Angeles Times with a rare public account of the role their spy service, which is trained, supplied and funded by the U.S., played in hunting al-Zarqawi down.

They also voiced their nation's strong commitment to U.S.-led efforts to stem terrorist attacks, noting Jordan had been among the first to recognize the danger of al-Qaida fighters returning from Afghanistan in the 1990s after fighting against Soviet invaders. The intelligence chiefs said they had a keen understanding of the way al-Qaida militants think, operate, and counter the moves of their enemies.

"Because we started early we gained experience early," said Burjaq, 46.

"Many Americans are advanced in combating certain kinds of operations," said Dahabi, 45, a mild-mannered graduate of the University of Sussex in the Britain who has headed the intelligence service since December 20. "We understand al-Qaida's mentality as Arabs."

The interview took place in Dahabi's spacious office, decorated with a huge, recently completed painting showing Arab tribesman on horseback fighting against Ottoman soldiers during their war for independence at the end of World War I. The faces of King Abdullah bin Hussein, Jordan's monarch, and his two young sons hover over the fiery scene.

In the past, Jordanian intelligence agents have provided the U.S. intelligence that was used to infiltrate terrorist organizations and stop attacks, including their foiling of a plot to blow up sites in the U.S. on New Year's Eve 2000.

Jordan arrested at least 14 suspected al-Qaida operatives in the months leading up to that holiday and provided American officials vast amounts of intelligence used in part to pursue threads in the U.S.

Dahabi and Burjaq, who joined Jordan's spy service in 1983 and helped break up the notorious Abu Nidhal terror ring that purported to fight for the Palestinian cause, said they had been aggressively trailing al-Zarqawi and his adherents for years.

Counterterrorism experts say the influx of Jordanian intelligence assets in Iraq produced results almost immediately, with the number of arrests of key al-Qaida operatives jumping noticably. Americans' understanding of al-Zarqawi's network and its role in the insurgency and terrorist attacks outside Iraq also picked up, officials said.

"The Jordanians are top drawer, probably the best counterterrorism force in the world," said Alexis Debat, a former French defense ministry official who is now a counterterrorism consultant and senior fellow for national security and terrorism at the Nixon Center in Washington. "Any network they put their mind to destroying is gone."

In April, when al-Zarqawi showed up in a highly publicized online propaganda film boasting of his group's prowess, Jordanian analysts scrutinized the surrounding scenery as well as his blustery talk.

The tape confirmed suspicions that al-Zarqawi must be in the Yusifiya area, a volatile insurgent stronghold south of Baghdad, and made it the focus of U.S. and Jordanian intelligence efforts, Burjaq said. Throughout the spring, U.S. military officials, too, were publicly identifying the area south of Baghdad as a likely al-Zarqawi stronghold.

DOJ_NMG_0033127

"At a certain stage, more intelligence (resources) were being devoted to Yusifiya," Burjaq said, noting that Jordan's familiarity with the region and human intelligence networks played a key role in monitoring al-Zarqawi's movements there. "It's not an easy area to get in and out of."

The two declined to confirm whether they had turned any of al-Zarqawi's followers against him. But Dahabi noted, "Some of the people I arrest, I recruit. Some those who were in my jails helped me to carry out operations."

"Sources," Burjaq added, "to us, this is the tool."

Once it became clear the Yusifiya information was accurate, the Jordanians became more confident of their sources. Then when information was received about al-Zarqawi being in the area of Baqouba, northeast of Baghdad, they were confident that he had moved there.

"We started to locate him and the Americans started to locate him," said Burjaq.

Several sources, including a U.S. counterterrorism official, credited both U.S. and Jordanian intelligence with developing information that led to the targeted hit on al-Zarqawi and subsequent raids in at least 17 locations.

"At a certain point, some of the sources connected," said Dahabi.

The Americans say it was a U.S.-recruited human intelligence asset that ultimately led them to the specific house where al-Zarqawi was hiding, allowing warplanes to blow it up. One U.S. official said the CIA recruited someone who identified al-Zarqawi's spiritual adviser Rahman, allowing U.S. authorities to intercept his communications with al-Zarqawi and learn that two would be meeting Wednesday.

From there, the spiritual adviser was followed by an unmanned U.S. aerial vehicle, a Predator, as he entered the house. "When all the intelligence came together, all indications were that this man was in a particular place," said Dahabi.

"The Americans sent F-16s, and they did a good job."

Zarqawi Is Dead. What Now? (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

It will be months, perhaps longer, before we'll be able to gauge the precise impact of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's death last week on the nature, effectiveness and direction of the insurgency in Iraq. But the most significant fact here isn't that Zarqawi was killed -- he could have met his end in any number of ways. It's that he was found.

Pause a minute to consider what this means. Plenty has been written about the shortcomings of U.S. war-fighting, political and counterinsurgency strategies in Iraq, and some of it is true. Comparably little has been written about the insurgents' shortcomings. Yet Zarqawi was located because he and his spiritual adviser, Abdul Rahman, were betrayed by someone in their own camp, someone close enough to track their movements exactly. Therein must lie a tale.

"Zarqawi had become a liability to al Qaeda in Iraq," says Matti Steinberg, an Israeli terrorism expert. He recalls last year's intercepted letter from Ayman Zawahiri, in which the al Qaeda No. 2 begged Zarqawi to tone down his tactics, stop killing Shiites, and strive to broaden his base of public support. "I repeat the warning against separating from the masses, whatever the danger," Zawahiri wrote.

Zarqawi did not pay heed. In September, he formally declared open season on Shiites. In November, he ordered the bombing of three hotels in Amman, Jordan, killing 63 Muslims, most if not all Sunnis, and enraging Arab public opinion that had been previously sympathetic to the insurgents. By December, he was being described by an Iraqi insurgent as "an American, Israeli and Iranian agent who is trying to keep our country unstable so the Sunnis will keep facing occupation."

In January, Zarqawi submerged his organization in the Mujahadeen Shura [consultative] Council -- the insurgents' umbrella group -- and apparently agreed to relinquish his public role to focus on military operations. Within a few months, however, he released his clumsy home video, and the self-publicity probably didn't go down well with the rest of the council. Zarqawi was cut loose.

There's an irony here, since by killing him the U.S. was, in effect, doing the bidding of Zarqawi's enemies within the insurgency. No doubt they have better uses for him as a martyr in Paradise than as a terror on Earth, and this may help them reclaim some lost luster. But it also suggests that the nature of the insurgency will change, perhaps radically, and likely to America's advantage.

DOJ_NMG_0033128

First, the insurgency's sponsorship of terrorism outside of Iraq may end. The bombings in Amman reflected Zarqawi's personal loathing of King Abdullah's Hashemite rule: Their only effect, other than grief, was to provoke the Jordanian mukhabarat into waging its own dedicated campaign against the insurgency. Iraq's neighbors would generally be happy to see the U.S. project in Iraq fail, but not at the price Zarqawi was proposing.

Second, the sectarian violence that was Zarqawi's trademark may abate. Zarqawi's fanatical hatred of Shiites, common among Arab Sunnis outside Iraq, is somewhat alien to Iraqi Sunnis, or was until quite recently. Zawahiri also counseled against a sectarian strategy: "Does this conflict with the Shia lift the burden from the Americans by diverting the mujahadeen to the Shia?" he asked rhetorically. Long term, the Sunni interest in Iraq may be to reassert national dominance. Near term, however, it's to avoid Shiite reprisals; to the extent that the insurgents incite them, they risk losing the popular Sunni support on which they ultimately depend.

Third, Zarqawi's departure may precipitate organizational changes and a concomitant leadership struggle, all of which will take time to sort out. "The insurgents have been able to deal with the fact that we've eliminated hundreds of their operatives, including first-, second- and third-tier leadership," says Jeff White, a 34-year veteran of the Defense Intelligence Agency who is now at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. "On the other hand, Zarqawi was the personification of the movement. His philosophy, commitment, connections, experience, all these things made him a disproportionately significant player."

A personal contest may yet be shaping up between Abdullah Rashid al-Baghdadi, the (apparently) Iraqi "emir" of the Shura Council, and Abu Ayyub al-Masri, an Egyptian. Hardly anything is publicly known about either man or about their relationship. Yet as long as the insurgency lacks an undisputed leader, it will also lack the unity of command that is a basic precept of successful guerrilla warfare. Recall that the Kurdish PKK and Peru's Shining Path both collapsed almost immediately following the capture of their respective leaders, Abdullah Ocalan and Abimael Guzmán.

Finally, the insurgency must contend with a much more experienced and effective U.S. military. "The first year, we were in over our heads," says Mr. White. Since then, however, "there's been a much more powerful and integrated effort to put all the intelligence together in a package, including all sources, all classifications, and then pushing it down to the units that can use it." The military got some lucky breaks in its hunt for Zarqawi. But the fact that it was able to find him at all reflects a broad and serious effort to master the cultural terrain of clans, tribes, kinship networks and political factions in which the insurgency has flourished.

Iraqis will now brace for a large round of terror attacks, which aim to show the insurgency hasn't been dented by Zarqawi's demise. Maybe it hasn't. But its aura has been dimmed, its organizational structure cracked and its internal fissures exposed. That's something the U.S. and the new Iraqi government can capitalize on by launching sustained offensive operations in the Sunni Triangle and doing their utmost to secure Baghdad. Doing so will take another 30,000 troops. But having mostly squandered the initiative against the insurgents in the first year of the war, this is the administration's rare chance to even the score. It must seize it.

Life During Wartime (NYT)

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

About the time the 2006 New Year's confetti was being swept away from Times Square, a small group of Iraqi bloggers began posting for The Times. "It is a new year, but it is not a happy one," said a 57-year-old doctor who called himself Truth Teller.

Reading the bloggers has helped to fill one of the big gaps in Americans' view of the war in Iraq. Danger in the streets and security fears for anyone seen speaking with Western reporters has made it increasingly hard to get real glimpses of what it's like for the people who have to live there.

At the beginning of the year, the bloggers' complaints were less about car bombs than power failures, black-market fuel and a curfew that didn't allow for much, if any, celebrating. But not always. In January, Zeyad, a Baghdad dentist, wrote: "Over the past two years, I have crawled away from two armed clashes and one carjacking incident; I have witnessed two people being shot in the head and one young kid who had been sprayed by bullets begging my friends and me to take him to the hospital ... and just recently, an American sniper shot right at me and missed on a Baghdad highway for no apparent reason when we pulled over behind their convoy. My taxi driver tried to comfort me by saying it was probably just a rubber bullet."

DOJ_NMG_0033129

In May, when three of the bloggers returned — joined by one Iraqi-American writer — their postings had changed. There was less talk of shoddy infrastructure and running for cover from American soldiers, and more fear of radical Islamists and the Sunni and Shiite death squads bringing terror to their neighborhoods. The watershed they referred to repeatedly was the destruction of the golden dome of the Askariya mosque in Samarra, a revered Shiite shrine, on Feb. 22. The bloggers also wrote more about the increasing presence of Taliban-like Islamists, violently imposing restrictions on the Baghdad residents. "These are people who are enforcing their rules by death threats," Hassan, a college student, wrote in May.

Hassan wrote of his 6-year-old sister, who was not allowed to go out to play because her family feared she would be kidnapped or killed. His sister "has never gone to a zoo" and "has only gone to a playground once." Zeyad told the harrowing tale of witnessing the execution of a local generator operator: "When I tried to turn him over so they could carry him into a car, my hands touched his blood-soaked shirt. I could now see that he was shot four times in the chest. There was also a bag nearby with a box of peaches, medication and a Pepsi bottle; he was obviously going to take that home to his kids. I stared in his anguished face again, then at my bloody hands. And that was when I momentarily lost it."

Bloggers, who cannot be fact-checked in normal ways, are no substitute for journalists. But the Iraqis' voices are hypnotic — troubling, fascinating and a critical reminder of the quirky individual humanity of those at the center of what the invasion has unleashed. "[A]midst the blackness of time and the wounds of fate, Iraqis still find a way to crack a smile, even if it hurts," wrote Konfused Kid, a Baghdad college student, at the beginning of the year. "Despite my cynicism, I believe in God (or Allah or whatever you care to name Him), and I pray for the well-being of this country every day. And every day I listen to Metallica and read Philip K. Dick."

"Day to Day in Iraq" can be read online at daytodayiniraq.blogs.nytimes.com.

Legal Maneuver To Make A Point, An Army Officer Helps Iraqi Convict (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

BAQUBAH, Iraq -- Capt. Phillip Carter visits the filthy, overcrowded prison here at least twice a week to meet with the warden and police officers who oversee the facility. Each time he stops by, the warmest greeting he receives comes from a burly 46-year-old convicted murderer.

Hamid Abboud was found guilty in 1998 of killing a man in a fight and sentenced to 20 years in prison. He was released and granted amnesty in 2002. Under Iraqi law, he should now be free. But he was mysteriously re-arrested in 2004 on the old charges and remains incarcerated, ordered to serve out the rest of his sentence.

Capt. Carter, a 30-year-old military police soldier who is a lawyer in civilian life, could demand Mr. Abboud's release and the Iraqis would likely comply. But he doesn't. Instead he prods judges and prosecutors in this province an hour's drive from Baghdad to uphold Iraqi law and set Mr. Abboud free on their own.

"I have faith because of your work," Mr. Abboud told Capt. Carter in late May, when the temperature had risen above 100 degrees and the stench in the prison, crammed to four times its legal capacity, was almost unbearable. "My fate is in your hands."

Why a U.S. Army captain took on the case of a convicted murderer speaks volumes about how the American strategy has changed in Iraq in the past six months, as the U.S. tries to turn control back to the Iraqis. It also shows how painful and halting progress in Iraq can be.

Capt. Carter hopes to use the case to make a larger point: that the Iraqi judicial system, dominated by personal and sectarian grudges, needs to follow its own rules. "It appeared like the perfect test case, because it would show that the result should be dictated by Iraqi law and not by the whim of any individual," he says.

He became interested in the case this spring, when he and fellow officers saw rapidly deteriorating conditions at the jail in Baqubah, a city of about 300,000, about five miles from the spot where notorious terrorist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was killed last week. The jail's population surged to 475 prisoners in March, up from 350 just two months earlier. The facility was so overcrowded that some prisoners had to lie on their sides at night to fit in the jail's four small cells.

DOJ_NMG_0033130

Many prisoners were being held without any charges, say U.S. and Iraqi officials. Others said they had been beaten into confessing to crimes they didn't commit, and bore bruises and scars that seemed to lend credence to their stories, U.S. military officers say. Running the police department's counterterrorism unit was a colonel known to fellow officers as "Ali the Cable," for his history of beating confessions out of suspects with a cable.

Faced with such a problem a year ago, the Americans would have taken over the prison and run it for the Iraqis. Now, the push from the Pentagon is to reduce the U.S. presence in Iraq. "It is all about allowing Iraqi solutions to Iraqi problems that are solved with Iraqi resources," Gen. George Casey, the top military officer in Iraq, says he tells all incoming commanders. "We are here to help them win it; not win it for them. That is the flat-ass rule."

That guidance led Capt. Carter to Mr. Abboud.

Mr. Abboud was among those granted amnesty in 2002 when Saddam Hussein, just before the U.S. invasion, freed tens of thousands of prisoners in Iraq.

Following the fall of Mr. Hussein in 2003, the U.S. decided to honor the amnesty. The decision was made largely out of necessity: It would have been too hard to round up all the prisoners, and then figure out who had been imprisoned legitimately and who had been incarcerated for political reasons, say U.S. officials familiar with the decision. The Iraqi government has let the amnesty stand. So under Iraqi law, prisoners released in 2002 should be free today.

Capt. Carter figured that if he could persuade judges in Baqubah to follow their own rules and release a guilty man, maybe they would be more likely to respect the law in other cases, where the inmates appeared to be innocent. "If we can solve this case according to the law, we can solve all the cases in the jail," he says.

Capt. Carter came to Baqubah in November via an unusual route. After dropping out of high school in Santa Monica, Calif., he earned a graduation-equivalency degree and attended community college. He did well enough to get into the University of California, Los Angeles and, after graduating, became an Army officer.

He spent four years with the military police, leaving the Army to attend UCLA law school, where he graduated in 2004. Last fall, he was practicing at a big law firm in Los Angeles. During that time, he had an Internet blog and wrote occasional opinion pieces in U.S. magazines criticizing the U.S. decision not to follow the Geneva Conventions at its prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

By last year, the Army, desperately short of military police, was calling such officers back. Capt. Carter volunteered to return. He was assigned to a police transition team run by 38-year-old Lt. Col. William Benson.

Technically, the 70-soldier team wasn't supposed to have anything to do with the jail or court system. Its job was to build an Iraqi police force that could stand up to insurgents. The U.S. soldiers helped build a practice range for marksmanship, walked patrols with the Iraqis and taught them to fight as a team. The efforts paid off when insurgents launched a major attack on a police station in Baqubah in March. The Iraqi police, who had fled past assaults, stood and fought, this time driving off insurgents.

After seeing conditions in the jail, Col. Benson concluded that just training the police to fight wasn't enough. "We realized we had a big hole in our campaign strategy," he says. The jail, which has a capacity of about 150, housed about 475 inmates. Some had been held without charges for more than a year. "The perception among the public was that the only way to get out was to bribe someone," Col. Benson says.

Staff Sgt. Bradley Greer, a military-police soldier from Birmingham, Ala., began reading files of about 150 prisoners. "Most of the cases looked like total bull crap. There was no evidence, no information about the incident that led to their arrest. Nothing," he says. When he ventured into the prison, gaunt-looking inmates showed him scars they said came from beatings by the Iraqi Army. Many said they had no idea why they had been arrested. "It just chilled me to see them living like that," he says.

Sgt. Greer says he wanted to confront the chief judge in the province. "I wanted to go in and say, 'You need to let these guys go today!' " he recalls. "That never happened."

Capt. Carter and his boss, Col. Benson, opted for a less-direct approach. They decided to focus attention on all aspects of the legal process, from arrest through imprisonment, and pressure the Iraqis to fix problems on their own.

DOJ_NMG_0033131

Imbuing Baqubah's security forces with a respect for the rule of law, Col. Benson believed, would help stem sectarian violence in the city, which is 50% Shiite, 40% Sunni and 10% Kurd. As long as Sunnis believed the Shiite-dominated security forces could imprison them indefinitely, sectarian fighting would only grow worse. "We as Americans get tied around democracy, democracy, democracy. But the rule of law is really at the heart of stopping the violence here," Col. Benson says.

As a start, Col. Benson's team persuaded the chief judge in the province to teach basic law classes to the police so they would understand what kind of evidence they needed to get a conviction.

Capt. Carter and his Iraqi interpreter also began searching through case files. One of the first was Mr. Abboud's. The file consisted of dozens of handwritten pages bound with string.

Capt. Carter's interpreter, known as "Doc" for his doctorates in political science and law, studied the case. The 42-year-old interpreter, who spent 13 years as a defense attorney in Baqubah, tutored Capt. Carter in intricacies of Iraqi law and engaged him in philosophical debates on legal matters. He also liked to quote Robert Frost and play American country music on his lute. Because of the dangers interpreters face in Iraq, Capt. Carter asked that Doc not be named.

After he reviewed Mr. Abboud's case, Doc says he told Capt. Carter: "This man should be released."

Capt. Carter asked the warden if he could meet with Mr. Abboud. A few minutes later, a barrel-chested man with a black mustache that hangs over his lower lip was escorted into the room.

Mr. Abboud says he was arrested in 1998 after trying to intervene in a fight outside a fish shop he owned. Soon after he arrived, one man stabbed another. Though he says he didn't stab the man who died, he acknowledges participating in the fight. He was sentenced to 20 years in prison.

Freed in 2002, he enjoyed postamnesty freedom for about two years. Then, in June 2004, he was arrested again and thrown back in jail to finish the remaining 18 years of his sentence. He blames a "fat woman in the general prosecutor's office" for his incarceration. "She has a grudge against me because she is related to the man who was stabbed," he says.

Capt. Carter listened to Mr. Abboud's story. "The facts of his crime were almost immaterial," he says. "Under Iraqi law, he should have been released."

Capt. Carter began meeting with judges, prosecutors, detectives and prison officials to talk about problems in the judicial system. The jail's deputy warden, who was assassinated in April, told him shortly before his death that, by his estimate, only about 100 of the 475 inmates actually deserved to be there, Capt. Carter says.

Each time he met with Iraqi officials, he raised Mr. Abboud's case. In April, Capt. Carter told the chief judge in Baqubah about his suspicion that a woman in the general prosecutor's office was blocking Mr. Abboud's release.

The prosecutor's office is supposed to deliver case files to court once a week, so a judge can read them and certify prisoners for release. For some reason, Mr. Abboud's file was never in the stack that went to the judge. Capt. Carter told the judge that he believed the "fat woman" with the "grudge" was removing Mr. Abboud's file each week.

The chief judge promised to make sure Mr. Abboud's file would be in the stack that went for review the next week, according to Capt. Carter's notes from the meeting.

Finally, Mr. Abboud's case seemed unstuck; at least he was going to get a hearing. Capt. Carter and Col. Benson also noticed a broader impact of their inquiries: The provincial governor in April asked four council members to study problems in the prison and judicial system. The deputy governor began making trips to the jail to interview prisoners and suggested bringing in local reporters. "We need to bring media to the prison and document the conditions," Emad Jaleel Abdullah, the deputy governor, told Capt. Carter.

The Iraqis were starting to release inmates -- though not always the ones the Americans recommended. Initially, Capt. Carter and Col. Benson pressed the Iraqis on about 75 cases where there seemed to be a lack of evidence or no charges. Yet only three of those prisoners were released. Capt. Carter says at least one judge openly worried that some of the long-term prisoners on the Americans' list, embittered by incarceration, would be more likely to turn into insurgents if released.

By April 17, the prison population had fallen to about 372. While still far over capacity, the numbers were dropping. "All of our questions seemed like they were unstopping the system," Capt. Carter says.

In rare cases, U.S. advisers will still usurp Iraqi commanders' authority and demand a problem be fixed. In May, Capt. Carter was visiting the prison when he was told that the Iraqi police's counterterrorism unit had a day earlier picked up a man named Muslim, who claimed to have worked with U.S. forces. No one could say exactly why he was being held. The charges were "suspicious activity."

DOJ_NMG_0033132

When Capt. Carter met Muslim, who is in his 20s, the man was trembling with anger and fear. He said Iraqi police had destroyed his home and beaten his pregnant wife so badly that she had a miscarriage. "I need to be released so that I can take my wife to the hospital," he pleaded. "They killed my baby and now my wife is in danger."

Capt. Carter recognized the man from the U.S. base. He sought out the Iraqi police colonel who heads the terrorism unit. "I know this detainee you have. He is a very brave man. We would like to see him released immediately as a favor to the coalition," Capt. Carter said.

The Iraqi colonel called a judge. They chatted and then he handed his cellphone to Doc, who knew the judge from his days as a defense attorney. A few minutes later, Muslim was released.

"Justice by cellphone," Capt. Carter joked.

By May 22, the jail population had dropped to 298, according to the daily tally in the warden's office. Capt. Carter continued to plug away at Mr. Abboud's case, making regular visits to the prison.

He noticed Mr. Abboud seemed to act almost as a member of the prison staff. The inmate often wore a sweatsuit instead of the orange jumpsuit most inmates were required to wear. When the warden had guests, Mr. Abboud was summoned to make tea. In May, the prison transferred 25 of its most violent convicts -- six of whom had been sentenced to death -- to a long-term detention facility in Baghdad. Mr. Abboud rounded up the inmates for the warden, calling their names in a guttural growl.

Sometimes Mr. Abboud would stop Capt. Carter to inquire about his case or chat about his wife and six children. The warden had taken such a shine to him that he had hired one of Mr. Abboud's sons as a prison guard.

"There is something moving and haunting about him," says Capt. Carter of the Iraqi inmate. "It sounds so unsophisticated, but he is kind of a spokesperson for redemption. He acknowledges his crime and has made a commitment to grow beyond it."

Late last month, Mr. Abboud got word that his file had finally made it out of the prosecutor's office to the judge who could approve his release. There was just one problem. All inmates must take a class on morality and religion before they can be released. Although Mr. Abboud took the class -- along with virtually every prisoner in the jail -- there was no record of it in his file. Capt. Carter arranged for the warden and other prison employees to sign a statement that Mr. Abboud had taken the class.

"He is your client," joked the warden. The warden was confident Mr. Abboud would soon be released. "I think by next week he will probably be free," he said on May 24.

For all of the grinding progress that Capt. Carter and Col. Benson have made in eight months in Iraq, there are stark reminders of how far they have to go. Some members of the Iraqi police still believe it is all right to abuse prisoners to secure a conviction. Last month, Col. Benson was discussing "Ali the Cable," the head of the police's counterterrorism unit, with another Iraqi police officer. "If the terrorists don't confess to their crimes, the judge will set them free. The only way to deal with these people is with the cable," said Col. Mustafa Mohammed Alwan, who heads the police department's rapid-reaction force, defending his Iraqi colleague.

"The way you are talking is Saddam's way," Col. Benson told his Iraqi counterpart.

The next day, Capt. Carter returned to the jail to take pictures of eight men who were detained by the Iraqi Army in October and accused of attacking a checkpoint. They included a school headmaster, a farmer, a construction worker, a high-school student, and a taxi driver. Each bore scars from where they said they had been whipped with a cable. Most had burn marks on their legs where they said an Iraqi Army major had placed electrodes and shocked them.

The youngest of the men said he was picked up on Oct. 3 and, after 12 hours of beatings, gave his torturers the names of the first seven people he could think of from his town, including his school headmaster. "He needs names so I gave him names," the teenager said.

The others were arrested on Oct. 4 between 3 a.m. and 4 a.m. The men, all Sunnis, said they were beaten, shocked and urinated on by the Iraqi Army major, who is a Shiite.

They told Capt. Carter they had been tortured for about a week at an Iraqi Army base. Then they were taken to a police station and beaten again until they agreed to sign confessions. They had been languishing in Iraqi prisons ever since, they said. Capt. Carter snapped pictures of their scars and praised them for coming forward before they were taken back to the jail.

DOJ_NMG_0033133

"When there is no rule of law, there is the rule of force. This is what we are trying to change," he said.

In the past two months, the U.S. has documented seven other cases in which Sunni detainees said they were tortured by the same Shiite Iraqi major and his troops. Alyssa Schwenk, an Army lawyer in the region, said the Americans are working with the Iraqi Army to investigate, but progress has been slow. "I am not sure what the outcome will be," she says. One concern is that the prisoners' complaints are now seven months old, making it harder to obtain evidence and track down witnesses.

By May 28, the prison was down to 281 detainees. Mr. Abboud's case, however, was still languishing in the court system. His file, with the letters certifying that he completed his religious classes, finally made it to the felony-court judge. But the judge declined, without explanation, to release him.

Capt. Carter promised Mr. Abboud he will keep pressing the case.

Oil, Politics And Bloodshed Corrupt An Iraqi City (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise And Qais Mizher

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

BASRA, Iraq — Politics, once seen as a solution to the problems of a society broken by years of brutal single-party rule, has paralyzed the heart of Iraq's south.

This once-quiet city of riverside promenades was among the most receptive to the American invasion. Now, three years later, it is being pulled apart by Shiite political parties that want to control the region and its biggest prize, oil. But in today's Iraq, politics and power flow from the guns of militias, and negotiating has been a bloody process.

"We're into political porridge, that's what's changed," said Brig. James Everard, commander of the British forces in Basra. "It's mafia-type politics down here."

Police reports from the past five months read like war chronicles: Eight oil company employees murdered. Twenty caches of Russian rockets discovered, including a pile in the back of an ambulance. A tank of stolen oil found in a fake mosque. Shootouts reported between a politician's militia and the police, and between police officers.

Now, after two years of relative calm, Basra has a soaring murder rate (the 85 killings in May were nearly triple the number in January), a tattered oil industry and a terrified population.

"I cannot talk with you," said Sajid Saad Hassan, a professor at Basra University's agriculture college. "I haven't joined a party and no militia is protecting me."

The story of Basra's descent traces the arc of the war itself. People here, mostly Shiites whom Saddam Hussein oppressed, embraced the invasion. But for the next three years, Baghdad put its resources into fighting insurgents in central and western Iraq, leaving the quiet Shiite south to find its own way.

But the rules have fallen away along with the end of Mr. Hussein's rule, leaving a broken landscape of empty state institutions.

"So much of the state melted after Saddam fell," an American official said. A primordial soup of political parties, their militias and tribes filled the void. They formed morals patrols at the university, commanded entire units of the flimsy police force, and moved into positions of power in the company that controls the vast oil-processing and transportation network.

Now, with provincial elections still many months away, a bloody power grab has ensued. It is a battle being waged from inside Basra's institutions and will be particularly difficult for the prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, to stop. Indeed, three days after he vowed to crack down with an "iron fist" and imposed a state of emergency, a bomb killed 27 in a market here.

In the shadowy world of Shiite politics, the fight is over power. One party, Fadhila, is currently on top. Its members include the governor and the chairman of the Provincial Council. Fadhila has close ties to Moktada al-Sadr, the anti-American cleric whose grass-roots militia is among the most powerful here.

Aqeel Talib, a senior member of the party, argues that a disagreement over federalism is one of the issues dividing the parties. The party and its two main competitors — the Supreme Council of Islamic Revolution in Iraq and the Dawa Party — all had different visions for a southern Shiite region.

DOJ_NMG_0033134

In Fadhila's model, Basra Province, the only one it controls, would stand on its own. "We as Fadhila, we want to make our province our own region," Mr. Talib said. "We have two million people, an airport, a port and oil — everything we need to be a state."

Qadim al-Muqdadi, a professor in Baghdad University's media college, explained: "Each political party believes he is better than the other at running the country. They don't rely on the power of thought; they rely on the power of the gun and the tribe."

At the heart of much of the fighting is oil. The fields in this province are the richest in Iraq, and the crude oil they pump makes up all of Iraq's current exports, which in turn pay civil servants' salaries. Officials in Baghdad say the parties and their militias play a major role in rampant theft.

"If you don't understand what's happening there, follow the dollar sign," said Mowaffak al-Rubaie, the national security adviser. "There is a 6,000-barrel-per-day difference between the level of production for export and the level of actual export. It goes into the pockets of these warlords, militias, organized crime, political parties."

Fadhila, the dominant political party, controls the guard force that protects the vast network run by the state-owned Southern Oil Company.

Fadhila says it has helped keep the oil flowing in hard times; its political opponents argue that it is perfectly positioned to profit. A senior party official in Baghdad denies any profiteering.

The guards "have weapons," said Hassan al-Rashid, the former governor and an opponent of Fadhila, and "these weapons are not in honest hands."

Few in Basra would agree to speak openly about oil, and the industry has been impenetrable to Western officials in Basra, who said they could not even identify the major players.

"It's not just one party, so everyone keeps silent," said a provincial council member, who asked for anonymity out of concern for his safety. "If you tell about me, I tell about you."

Whatever the case, violence has spilled into the industry. From May 5 to May 9, two oil company officials and a harbor official were killed, according to the police reports. In early March a bomb exploded in the office of Aqil Abdel Samad, a senior oil company official, wounding him.

"The violence we're seeing on the street, it is a big turf war," said a Western official, who asked not to be identified because he was not authorized to speak with the media. Basra's police have been unable to separate the warring parties or stop graft because the force, stacked with men who are affiliated with the parties, is part of the problem.

The city's current chaos, in fact, can be traced in part to the formation of the new police force. British military officers acknowledge that the early background checks, which they oversaw, were poor to nonexistent, and the major political parties took the opportunity to pack their people onto the force. A weak-willed police chief allowed himself to be bullied into accepting party loyalists, the current chief said.

"The parties embarrassed him," said the chief, Maj. Gen. Hassan Swadi al-Saad. "Everyone came to him with names and he employed them."

One result is a force that has 37,000 members, 50 percent more than authorized, spread across the four provinces patrolled by the British in southeast Iraq, according to Col. Sundey Sunderland, who is in charge of logistics planning for the British military. (Also, the Facilities Protection Service, which guards schools, oil rigs and mosques and has been heavily infiltrated by militias, numbers 25,000.)

There have been skirmishes among corrupt police units, particularly those dealing with major crimes, internal affairs and criminal investigations.

Some of those forces captured and held two British officers last fall, and the British military has begun to purge them. "They were assassins going around killing people," said Laszlo Szomoru, a British senior police adviser in Basra.

The police reports are illustrative. On May 22, officers from the intelligence unit, one of the more heavily political divisions, raided a Southern Oil Company building, and on April 25, two guards from the oil protection force were charged with breaking into an auto store, killing a guard there, and stealing two cars.

The police have also apparently done nothing in the face of sectarian killings of Sunni Arabs, whose portion of the population has shrunk rapidly over the past year. Some Sunnis suspect the police of carrying out most of the killings.

DOJ_NMG_0033135

The parties' power inside the police complicates law enforcement for the British. In January, for example, they identified several men suspected of running death squads, siphoning oil and shooting at British soldiers. Soldiers arrested them, and for the next three months, the local government refused to speak to the British.

"You arrest someone, and the next day you're on the phone to the governor, to the chief of police," said Brigadier Everard. "We say, 'We know he's yours, but we did it for the following reason.' "

The province has also sunk into political paralysis as the governor, Muhammad al-Waeli, tried but failed to fire General Saad, the police chief. The provincial council has tried, also unsuccessfully, to remove Mr. Waeli, but has not been able to garner the two-thirds majority it needs. The only thing they could all agree on, it seemed, was to refuse all contact with the British.

Baghdad is also powerless to remove provincial officials, who are protected from the central government under Iraqi law.

Basra's troubles would be fewer were it not for the influence of neighboring countries, particularly Iran.

Although the British military is skeptical, General Saad says many of the parties derive their strength from Iran. The parties themselves accuse one another of being Iranian stooges.

"Every day I have reports of 190 pilgrims coming from Iran," he said. "Are they pilgrims or are they intelligence officers?"

Illegal crossings appear to be common. On Feb. 1, the Basra border police arrested 23 Iranians who said they were pilgrims crossing illegally at Chlat, according to a police report. Just five days later, they arrested a man whom they identified as Hadi Dalqi Bukhtyar, a colonel in the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps.

Weapons that have not been seen since the Iran-Iraq war in the 1980's abound, and local police officials say they believe many are coming from Iran. The police noted finds of 106 Russian-made Katyusha rockets and 35 antitank missiles, also Russian, over five months beginning in January.

"Most people here are asking themselves, is this Basra?" Professor Hassan said helplessly.

Hussein Defense Witnesses Admit Lying (LAT)

By Louise Roug

Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

BAGHDAD — The trial of Saddam Hussein reached a moment of high drama today when four defense witnesses recanted previous testimony, swearing in written statements that Hussein's lawyers had bribed them to lie in court.

The witnesses testified that Khalil Dulaymi, one of the lead defense attorneys, had paid hundreds of dollars and promised life-long salaries to the witnesses if they testified that several of executed prisoners, in fact, were alive and well.

During clandestine meetings in Syria, as well as Hussein's hometown of Tikrit, Dulaymi and others had conspired with the witnesses, telling them what to say in court, the witnesses now say. The new allegations against the defense team — and counter-allegations from the defense charging the court with intimidation and threats — were not the only surprises on today.

Appearing in court for the first time, an American attorney for the defense said the court was violating the rights of the defendants.

"As I'm sure any experienced judge will know, it is highly improper for anyone other than the defense lawyers to speak to the defense witnesses," said Curt Doebbler, responding to the new and explosive testimony by the defense witnesses. "We find it quite unfortunate that anybody is speaking with them, even if they are authorized by the court, when it is not in open court."

37 Taliban Militants Killed In Afghanistan (USAT)

USA Today, June 13, 2006

Afghan and U.S.-led coalition forces fought Taliban militants in three battles, killing 37 fighters, including a relative of Taliban leader Mullah Omar, an Afghan army general said Monday.

Omar's brother-in-law, Mullah Amanullah, was among 15 men killed in one of the battles in southern Afghanistan's Uruzgan province, army commander Gen. Rehmatullah Raufi said. Troops stormed the area late Sunday after a tip from tribesmen.

Coalition military spokesman Maj. Quentin Innis could not confirm if Amanullah had been killed.

Six suspected Taliban members were captured and several assault rifles and rocket launchers seized in the village, Raufi said. No Afghan or coalition troops were hurt. In a second raid early Monday, Afghan and coalition troops killed 12 suspected Taliban in southern Kandahar province's Saidan village, Raufi said.

DOJ_NMG_0033136

Ten Taliban militants were killed in neighboring Helmand province in a battle involving British and Afghan forces, Raufi said.

Iranian police officers with batons and shields beat women's rights demonstrators in a downtown Tehran square. The protest by about 200 women was organized by a previously unknown group calling itself the Labor and Communist Party. An invitation delivered to the Associated Press demanded equal rights for women and the nullification of a law allowing Iranian men to have four wives.

“We are women, we are human, but we don't have any rights!” the women chanted.

About 100 police officers, including female officers, attacked the demonstrators and dispersed them about an hour after the protest began.

Cuba has cut electricity to the U.S. diplomatic mission in Havana, a U.S. official said.

“This is the same type of harassment that the Cuban people have had to live with on a daily basis,” State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters.

Mission spokesman Drew Blakeney said the power was cut June 5 to the United States Interests Section in Havana. Requests to the Cuban government to restore power have gone unanswered, he said. The mission is running on generator power.

The mission complained that the cutoff was bullying but vowed to continue business as usual.

Inside The Afghan Drug Trade (CSM)

By Scott Baldauf

Christian Science Monitor, June 13, 2006

The Afghan police chief doesn't realize his voice is being taped. So pardon him if he brags about his life as a drug trafficker.

In a friendly conversation recorded in his home last summer, he tells of his quarrels with another drug-dealing police commander in the country's northern Takhar Province; about driving through a rival's police checkpoint with 500 kilos of heroin in his car; and his adventures in rescuing three heroin-smuggling friends from the clutches of Tajik policemen. It's just another part of the job, he says.

"If my adventure were filmed, it would be a very exciting movie," chuckles the commander, referred to hereafter as "Ahmed Noor." On the tape, he laughs. "The UN should give me an award."

But on one point the former mujahideen commander is certain: "Even if all the world were to come to Afghanistan, they will not be able to stop smuggling."

In relative terms, Mr. Noor is a small player in an illegal business that generates $2.7 billion a year, more than half the value of the country's legal economy. Afghan officials and foreign diplomats increasingly call this central Asian country a "narco-state," as top officials find it more profitable to flout laws than enforce them.

Very few major Afghan officials have been removed for involvement in drug trafficking, in part because of the lack of evidence, and in part because the country has only recently created special tribunals to handle major drug cases.

For this reason, the Monitor launched its own investigation in a province known for trafficking, to see how prevalent the drug trade is among police chiefs and what evidence could be found. Sending an investigative unit with a hidden minidisk recorder to the northern province of Takhar - where Afghanistan's medium and low-grade heroin is trafficked into Tajikistan, and on toward Europe - the Monitor recorded four police commanders.

All of the names in this story have been changed. The Monitor deemed it too dangerous for our investigators to confront each of these commanders with the taped evidence, and too unfair to their reputations to release their names without giving them a chance to defend themselves. But the statements in these tapes - gathered by investigators who have excellent reputations collecting testimony for the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission, among others - provide a rare inside view of how drug corruption has trickled down to the front lines in the country's faltering war on drugs. Commander Dost

"Commander Dost" is commander of a border police unit that patrols a large swath of the border with Tajikistan. In his taped conversation, Dost reveals how widespread the drug trade has become, as police commanders compete with each other to dominate the drug trade in Takhar Province.

DOJ_NMG_0033137

"For one year I did the smuggling," he says, on the lawn of his home. "It was not hidden from anybody. It was obvious to everybody. I put my RPG (rocket-propelled grenade launcher) on my shoulder.... I became a dangerous smuggler."

But increasingly, Dost finds himself being run out of the drug business by a group of more powerful police commanders. These commanders have been shutting out all other competitors in the drug trafficking business, says Commander Dost.

A few years back, one of these commanders sent eight men to ambush Commander Dost. "Fortunately I had 25 of my [tribesmen] with me," says Dost. "I used the RPG and fired at the enemy in front of us, and behind us. Finally I made about $70,000 for myself from the drug money."

But at one point, he was captured with $370,000 worth of heroin, and had to sell everything he had - including his Swiss Rado watches and most of his heavy weapons - in order to pay back the owners of that drug. In another instance, Dost was captured by his chief competitor, another police commander.

The commander "caught me once with 56 kg of drugs. He asked me, 'Will you do it again?' and I told him that I would never do that again. Right after I promised him that I would not do that again, I came home and took another 100 kilos of drug and put it in my Russian jeep and took it to sell."

"These persecutors do it themselves, like 300 kilos to 400 kilos each time," Dost complains. These days, "all the smuggling is now in the hands" of these commanders, "and no one can do anything without [their] permission. Except me. When I do it, I tell my boys, 'Anybody who wants to stop you, you should kill them.' " Commander Nasir

"Commander Nasir" is the police commander of a border district in Takhar Province. Like Commander Dost, Nasir is a relatively small player in the drug trade, but he gives an inside picture of how some of the bigger police commanders - both in Afghanistan and in neighboring Tajikistan - punish drug-trafficking competitors to burnish their law-enforcement credentials, or take bribes from those willing to pay for favorable treatment.

"One day I counted how much I had given" a top police commander, says Nasir, who was a longtime commander during the Russian war, fighting alongside Northern Alliance commander Ahmed Shah Masood. From drug sales and fees, "it was $680,000, just in cash." Nasir pauses. "$680,000! A lot of money, isn't it? But believe me, he [the commander] never had any intention to do anything good for me in return, ever."

Nasir says all the big smuggling these days is being conducted by relatives of this top commander, some of whom are police commanders in Takhar. One relative "takes $50 per kilo to carry it from this side to that side of the border near Tajikistan. And if he catches somebody else smuggling, he takes $5,000 to $10,000 each time."

Nasir says he has stopped taking drugs across the border himself, because he is too well known, but he continues to send his men to do the job instead. Instead of paying his men immediately after a successful mission, now he pays them a week later, so that competing police commanders don't discover his smuggling until it's over.

"When I was a big smuggler, I had relations with the Tajik officers on the other side of the border. But my competitor has relations with the Russian KGB," he says. "[His] people have damaged my business a lot. Once I lost $500,000 of heroin, another time $600,000, another time $700,000, another time $900,000, another time $1.1 million because of [his] people." Nasir laughs. "My opponents have knocked out my 32 teeth."

But as bad as things are with the powerful commander - and after an assassination attempt by the top commander against Nasir, relations are pretty bad - Nasir says he wants to be practical and keep the peace, for now.

"I have a lot of proof and evidence against [the commander]," he says, "but I want to keep my relations good with him." Ahmed Noor

"Ahmed Noor" is the police commander of a market town along the Afghan-Tajik border in Takhar Province. In the tape, Mr. Noor admits that he's involved in drug trafficking, and gives an up-to-date breakdown of how much profit corrupt police officials make per kilo in the drug trade. But Noor notes with chagrin that other, more powerful commanders are making much more money than he is.

Mentioning one police commander by name, Noor says, "[He] is not happy with $20,000 a night from drug money," he says. "He charged $40 per kilo to transport it to the other side of the border. [He] himself is at home, resting and watching movies, and he plays cards with friends."

DOJ_NMG_0033138

This commander moves more than 600 kilos every night, and at $40 a kilo, that's a hefty profit, Noor says. "Believe me, I know he did this six times a week."

But while big players like this commander are able to move large quantities of heroin through Takhar Province, and even through Noor's own district, Noor says that this powerful commander won't share this business with other commanders.

Once, Noor says, this commander warned Noor to stop trafficking in drugs. Noor refused. So the commander started setting up checkpoints to try to catch Noor in the act of smuggling. At one such checkpoint, Noor was driving the car himself, and rather than stop at the checkpoint, he floored the accelerator and attempted to run over an armed soldier blocking the road.

"I had 500 kilos of drugs with me, and I was not going to give up that easily," he says. "So I drove fast to run over the soldier. The soldier runs away and shoots in the air. After I unloaded the car at the border, I came back to the commander of the checkpoint, and asked him why his soldier wanted to stop me. [The checkpoint commander] told me it was the order of [the top commander]. So I warned [the checkpoint commander] and told him that the drug money goes to [the commander's] pocket, but why he is stopping other people's cars. I told him, 'the next time you try to stop me, I will shoot your head to pieces with bullets.' "

Noor admits that the drug business is getting more difficult, and his business partners are becoming less trustworthy. "One day, I took 60 kilos of drugs to the other side of the border to Dushanbe, but the Tajik smuggler took it and did not pay me," he says. "No one can do anything to Tajik smugglers on their soil."

Noor blames the incident on his own sense of trust. "I believed one of my Afghan friends, who told me that this Tajik guy pays better than the others. I believed him." Commander Bilal

"Commander Bilal" is a senior administrator in the provincial Takhar police force, and a former police commander of a border district along the Tajik border. In his tape, Bilal complains that police discipline is breaking down, and the trafficking has become so fractured that even low-level cops are starting to skim profits. More important, he reveals that drug corruption has infiltrated deep within the Ministry of Interior, the chief law- enforcement organization, as top officials take bribes to appoint corrupt drug dealers into top police positions.

On paper, Bilal is one of the most powerful police commanders in his province, with many district commanders under him. But in reality, with district commanders deeply involved in the drug trade, few of the police officials in Takhar pay attention to him. Things were better, Bilal says, when he was a district police commander.

But even then, it wasn't so good. As a trafficking point, his border town was highly overrated.

"What have they seen [about that town]?" he asks. "There is only one bridge, and anyone you send - even your brother - will not bring any smuggler to you. If some one is caught there and brought to me, I will get $10,000 from him [in bribes]. But that poor soldier standing there will accept $200 from the smuggler [to let him pass through] instead of bringing him to me. I can't stand there myself on the bridge, because it is shameful."

In any case, Bilal says his relations with the drug smugglers was never very warm. "I don't know why, but the smugglers did not trust us," says Bilal.

He thinks for a moment, and then continues. One of his colleagues in the police department in the border town, "was playing games with the smugglers. [This commander] is the kind of person who cut a deal with smugglers, takes money from them, and further on up the road, stops and seizes their drugs, too. That was the reason the smugglers did not trust us. "

Bilal says almost all the police commanders in Takhar have paid officials at the Ministry of Interior to get their jobs, and nowadays, commanders have to pay increasing amounts just to keep their jobs.

"Every three months the commanders are pushed a little bit or they are told that they may be replaced. Then everybody rushes toward the ministry with $10,000."

But Bilal says he likes his job. It's not the responsibilities that he likes the most, though. It's the access to the drug trade. "It is a good position," he says. "I pay $1,000 and get $20,000 in profit."

"It has some advantages," he says. At the Ministry of Interior, little effort - or ability - to end a corrosive trade

Top Afghan officials privately admit that perhaps 80 percent of the personnel at the Ministry of Interior, Afghanistan's chief law-enforcement agency - from local police chiefs up to the top bureaucrats - may be benefiting from the drug trade. At a press conference announcing his resignation last fall, Interior Minister Ali Jalali said that the ministry had a list of 100 top officials who were being watched for evidence of drug trafficking. The result is a government that is either incapable or unwilling to prevent a trade that is rapidly undermining the country's rule of law and the Afghan people's faith in their leadership.

DOJ_NMG_0033139

"The wrong elements can be a sapling in our society, and if we act now, we can remove it with less damage," says Habibullah Qaderi, Afghan minister for counternarcotics, a government agency that is separate from the Ministry of Interior. "But if it becomes a tree, there will be more destruction when you remove it."

Already the corrupt sapling is becoming a tree, Mr. Qaderi says, adding that Afghanistan cannot afford to wait for the proof of guilt. "If we had removed these people one by one, the country would have been much much better." The Afghan people need to trust that their government is working in the national interest. "People have to be close with their government. The day there is a distance, that becomes very dangerous."

A note on how we reported this story

The Monitor used a reporting device in this story that it normally avoids: The key interviews, all taped, were with sources who did not realize they were speaking to the press. This presents a risk to fairness and privacy, in that the interviewees might speak more casually and loosely than they would if they knew they were speaking to a reporter. We decided to go forward for several reasons. The subjects in these interviews are all public officials, not private citizens, discussing what should be public business. The issue of drug trafficking, illegal in Afghanistan as nearly everywhere else, is critically important to the future of that country and others. We could find no other safe way to collect direct evidence of this official corruption. But because we could not directly confront these police chiefs without endangering the lives of reporters or interpreters, we decided to withhold their names.

- The editors

NATO Goes Global (WSJ)

By Melanie Kirkpatrick

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

BRUSSELS -- The World Cup has opened in Germany, and NATO is there, out in force. No, war hasn't broken out between soccer rivals France and Germany. The trans-Atlantic defense alliance is present at the invitation of Germany, which is worried about the threat of a terrorist attack. NATO planes are patrolling the skies during the monthlong tournament, just as they did during the pope's visit to Poland last month and at the Olympics in Italy in February. Post-9/11 such deployments -- more than 30 to date -- are part of the alliance's contribution to the defense against global terrorism.

NATO's mission in the age of terror was the subject of a chat last week with Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer at NATO's rambling headquarters here. The lanky Dutchman sprawled on a sofa in his office for an interview with Matthew Kaminski, editor of the Journal Europe's editorial page, and me. If there's a word that can sum up our conversation, it's "global." Mr. Scheffer, who has led NATO for two years, is thinking far beyond the borders of the alliance's 26 member countries.

"If you look at the threats and challenges coming to NATO," he says, "these are of a global nature. Terrorism is of a global nature. Weapons of mass destruction proliferation is a global threat. Failed and failing states are happening on a global scale. . . . NATO needs global partners to face those challenges." As if to prove his point, on an easel in a corner of his office a large map of Afghanistan nearly obscures the map of Europe behind it.

Afghanistan is NATO's first mission outside Europe and a crucial test of the alliance's relevance in a post-Cold War world. Defense ministers meeting in Brussels voted Thursday to proceed with a plan to increase alliance forces in Afghanistan to 17,000 from 9,000 and to expand into the violence-plagued south. "We are going into complicated territory in the south," Mr. Scheffer says. "Taliban heartland. The Taliban is testing us -- playing on public opinion in the nations committing forces." He doesn't demur when I mention that a retired U.S. general told me he believes insurgents had deliberately targeted the four Canadians who were killed in April with the aim of getting Ottawa to withdraw its troops.

Do the allies have the stomach for a fight? "I'm convinced there is the resolve," he says. Consider what would happen "if we were to lose Afghanistan again to the Taliban. . . . That country would be the net exporter of terrorism to the world once again. Where would the consequences of that terrorism land? On U.S. doorsteps and on European doorsteps."

DOJ_NMG_0033140

At the same time, Mr. Scheffer is quick to concede that he's had little success in persuading member nations to spend more on defense. Only seven countries meet NATO's informal requirement that member states spend at least 2% of GDP on defense -- and two of those, Turkey and Greece, target much of their spending for a possible conflict with each other. "The situation is bad," Mr. Scheffer says. "I have no other word for it."

In an age of far-flung deployments, airlift -- NATO has next to none -- is a particularly tough problem. "We need to be able to get [NATO] forces where we need them. That means we need strategic lift, heavy transport aircraft. Those are in short supply." NATO has plenty of helicopters, but no easy way to transport them to Afghanistan.

NATO currently depends on the Yanks and the Brits to take its troops and equipment where they need to be, or it leases planes from the Ukrainians or the Russians. Mr. Scheffer supports a U.S. proposal to encourage some NATO allies to form a consortium to purchase eight C-17s at $225 million apiece. He displays a model of a C-17 in his office, and -- like the professional diplomat he is -- he also displays an A400-M, an Airbus plane that won't come on the market until 2012. "In my ideal world," he says, NATO would buy a combination of the American and European planes. Translation: Let's spread the arms money around.

Mr. Scheffer stresses the need to work more closely with non-NATO countries. In Afghanistan, NATO leads a coalition of 37 nations, including Australia and New Zealand, whose defense ministers attended last week's ministerial meeting for the first time (as did the Afghan defense minister). In the Mediterranean, two Russian warships are joining NATO in a maritime counterterrorism operation; other partners include Tunisia, Algeria, Morocco and Israel. The sec-gen speaks enthusiastically about the officer training academy NATO wants to open in the Middle East. It already trains soldiers in Iraq, a mission Mr. Scheffer hopes to expand.

NATO is even tackling the touchy issue of missile defense. It just completed a 10,000-page initial study concluding that a missile defense is both necessary and viable. "Where that might lead to is of course another matter," he says. "But [NATO] should not shy from debate."

All these subjects are on the agenda for the NATO heads of state meeting in Riga, Latvia, in November. The last meeting -- Prague in 2002 -- was the "transformation" summit, when NATO signed on to the proposition that it needed an expeditionary force capable of responding quickly in the world's hotspots. That 25,000-soldier rapid response force should be up and running by Riga. The Afghanistan mission and the potential acquisition of airlift are also signs of progress. NATO isn't fully "transformed" yet, but it's getting there. Under Mr. Scheffer's leadership, Riga may become known as the "global" summit.

Ms. Kirkpatrick is a deputy editor of The Wall Street Journal's editorial page.

Congress Yields To Pentagon On Army Pay Crunch (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Congress is giving the Pentagon unusual authority to shift money in its budget to cope with an anticipated multibillion-dollar payroll shortfall that could have an impact on ground troops in Iraq.

The Army estimates its year-end shortfall could be as large as $1.4 billion for active personnel, and $1.9 billion when counting the National Guard and reserves. The Marines face less of a shortfall, about $116.5 million, but are a far smaller force and more vulnerable to disruptions to personnel accounts.

The Army's situation is serious enough that lawmakers agreed last week to approve expanded transfer authority of as much as $5 billion for the Defense Department as part of a $92.2 billion wartime spending bill, expected to clear Congress as early as today. The increase represents a one-third rise in the Pentagon's existing authority, and is designed to avoid any pay disruption before the end of this fiscal year on Sept. 30.

The persistent scramble for funds reflects the immense cost pressures of financing a prolonged overseas deployment of the all-volunteer professional military in Iraq, especially when compared with the draftees who provided so much manpower in Vietnam.

Significant bonuses are being paid to retain personnel and recruit new soldiers, adding hundreds of millions of dollars to annual costs. As the mix of personnel has become more tilted toward more senior soldiers, the Pentagon must pay even more.

All the services were affected in the winter when Congress and the White House agreed to a 1% across-the-board cut from fiscal 2006 appropriations without exempting military personnel accounts. In the Army's case, it began about $860 million in the hole, and had never budgeted for some of the recruitment incentives its top command actively promoted.

The added payments, some of which were authorized as late as December, are projected to add about $560 million, officials said. An additional $224 million stems from higher-than-anticipated housing allowances and the cost of paying increasingly senior soldiers. The frequency -- and cost -- of moving soldiers and their families to new stations in anticipation of deployment overseas has increased, adding as much as $100 million to personnel expenditures.

For the Army and the Marines, the situation is complicated by the fact that the two services not only have borne the brunt of the fighting in Iraq but also must lobby Congress for extra money to replace worn equipment.

This has created an implicit competition between personnel and procurement needs. Thus, the Navy had its personnel request increased by $558 million when the emergency supplemental spending bill was negotiated last week. By comparison, the Army and Marine requests were increased modestly, while lawmakers put aside more money for them to buy extra planes and armor.

With less than four months remaining in the current fiscal year, the additional transfer authority is hugely important, and Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England himself intervened with the House Appropriations Committee leadership to help secure the flexibility.

The administration, which has been permitted to transfer as much as $3.75 billion for this fiscal year, proposed in the winter to raise the cap by $1.25 billion to $5 billion -- a 33% increase, The appropriations committees typically are reluctant to give this much power to the executive branch, and the House denied the request in March. The Senate later allowed a $600 million increase in May, but as the personnel-funding crisis became more evident, both houses agreed to go beyond their initial bills.

For the Army, this last portion of the fiscal year is especially important in terms of recruitment. Running low on personnel funds at this juncture would mean trouble, as officials say the service typically signs up about half of its total in the last four months of the fiscal year, after recruits have come out of school.

The House, which took up the funding bill yesterday evening, is expected to complete passage today, and the Senate anticipates sending it on to President Bush soon after. About $65.8 billion would go the Pentagon to replenish accounts strained by the cost of military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan and an additional $19.8 billion is provided for hurricane recovery efforts on the Gulf Coast.

Also included, but not reflected in the $92.2 billion total, is an additional $2.3 billion to help prepare the nation for the threat of avian flu.

Pain Pump Tested In Battle (WSJ)

By Robert McGough

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

When Lt. Col. Chester "Trip" Buckenmaier III was deployed to Iraq three years ago, he was allowed to carry only two bags. His first contained personal effects; what he packed in his second would begin to change the way the Army treats pain.

Lt. Col. Buckenmaier, an Army anesthesiologist, filled one of his two allotted bags with portable infusion pumps made by Sorenson Medical Inc. The pumps, which are about the size of a large tube of toothpaste, deliver a constant infusion of local anesthetic that blocks the pain experienced by soldiers with grievous wounds to their arms and legs. The Sorenson "ambIT" pumps have computer chips that regulate the delivery of anesthetic. The pumps hadn't yet been approved for use by the military, but the Army Surgeon General said if Lt. Col. Buckenmaier wanted to employ them, he could bring them into the field himself.

War has always been a crucible for medical technology. For Sorenson Medical, a small, closely held company outside Salt Lake City, the battlefield has been a proving ground for its infusion pump. Lt. Col. Buckenmaier's bag of pumps has helped transform how the Army treats and transports wounded soldiers.

Sorenson is one of the smaller companies offering post-operative pain-control pumps. Lazard Capital Markets estimates the market for such devices, including those for nerve blocks and wound infusion, is about $115 million a year. So far, Sorenson has been able to parlay the use of its pumps by Lt. Col. Buckenmaier into a two-year contract to be one of two suppliers of such pumps to the military, and into a higher profile in the civilian market than it would otherwise have achieved. In civilian medical care, pain pumps are still just gaining physician acceptance and frequently face hurdles in terms of reimbursement.

DOJ_NMG_0033142

Physicians specializing in regional anesthesia have known for years how to inject local anesthetics near networks of nerves in order to block pain from an arm, leg or joint. The problem, says Kevin Sanborn, an anesthesiologist and nerve-block advocate at St. Luke's-Roosevelt Hospital Center in New York, is that injected anesthetics are eliminated quickly from the body, so they deaden nerves for only a few hours. Pumps that infuse anesthetics, performing what are known as "continuous peripheral nerve blocks," can hold off pain for days at a time, helping outpatients in particular. That allows patients to cut back on or eliminate opioid pain medicines like Vicodin, which affect the entire body, and can cause nausea, vomiting and intestinal blockage.

Sorenson's aim was to create a pump that costs less than institutional models used for hospital inpatients, but retain much of their flexibility in dosing. Mr. Sorenson says it has taken about $20 million to get its current pumps designed and on the market. Sorenson's ambIT pump sells for about $300.

James Lee Sorenson, 55 years old, founded Sorenson Medical in 1999. His father is a serial entrepreneur who is also known for starting the Sorenson Molecular Genealogy Foundation, which can provide genealogical information based on a DNA sample. The younger Mr. Sorenson was interested in medicine-infusion technology, and bought a company that made an infusion device. Problems with cost and patents on the device led Sorenson to develop on its own a portable infusion pump that could, among other things, be used to treat pain by infusing anesthetic to block nerve pathways.

The company has benefited from its connection to the Sorenson family, which was willing to invest money and wait awhile before it began to earn any return. The company just recently turned profitable, Mr. Sorenson says. The company's sales are running at an annual rate of about $10 million, but are more than doubling each quarter, he says, with orders from the military accounting for about 30% of sales.

Although the continuous nerve blocks were developed in the civilian world and their use is growing there, the technology faces hurdles on the home front. Medicare, the government insurance program for the elderly, doesn't reimburse either the extra time physicians require to treat patients with the devices, or the cost of the devices themselves. Many insurers won't reimburse for the use of pumps to infuse anesthetic directly into wounds; more will pay for their use as continuous nerve blocks, but there, too, reimbursement is at times spotty.

Moreover, anesthesiologists require special training to perform continuous nerve blocks. Often the nerves are dangerously close to blood vessels, and care must be taken not to damage the nerves themselves. Surgeons often are reluctant to introduce a new procedure, with the attendant risks and time demands, into operations they perform.

Sorenson is just one of several companies that have developed a range of portable pain pumps, and it faces several larger competitors in a challenging market. The largest player is I-Flow Corp., a Lake Forest, Calif. public company that makes a disposable pump costing less than $200. Like Sorenson, the large orthopedic-device maker Stryker Corp. is making pumps that use computer chips to regulate dosing. Both companies dwarf Sorenson in the sales forces and other resources they can put behind their devices.

So getting noticed and used by the military was an important plus for Sorenson, even though it is a much smaller market. Continuous peripheral nerve blocks are rapidly being adopted by the military because they are so well suited to treating the severe pain caused by wounded arms and legs. When used in operations, the blocks don't require as much medical infrastructure as general anesthesia -- a big advantage in spartan battlefield hospitals. Their use is growing as the military keeps training anesthesiologists in the technique.

Lt. Col. Buckenmaier deployed to Iraq in 2003. He had studied continuous peripheral nerve blocks at Duke University. Lt. Col. Buckenmaier, a physician at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, comes from a long line of soldiers -- he was named after one of Teddy Roosevelt's Rough Riders. He first came across a Sorenson pump at a company display at a medical professional meeting. It wasn't the current pump, but a predecessor version. He favored pumps with computer chips because he valued their flexible dosing, and felt they would deliver a consistent volume of anesthetic even on aircraft, with their attendant changes in air pressure and temperature.

DOJ_NMG_0033143

Lt. Col. Buckenmaier's first patient was Spc. Brian Wilhelm, a 21-year-old soldier who had a large portion of his left calf blown off by shrapnel from a rocket-propelled grenade. In a case report published in "Regional Anesthesia and Pain Medicine," Lt. Col. Buckenmaier described how administering two nerve blocks on major nerves running into the leg changed the soldier's evaluation of his pain from 10 on a 10-point scale -- "the worst pain imaginable" -- to zero. The nerve blocks remained in place for 15 days, and the soldier remained largely pain-free, while he was flown to Germany and then to Walter Reed in Washington for medical care. The pump described in the article was the Sorenson ambIT.

Based on the ambIT pump's use in Iraq, the military contacted Sorenson and sought a contract to supply pumps for two years. Sorenson sent its top engineer to work with military testers who wanted to make sure it would function in vibrating helicopters, and in evacuation planes at altitude (one test: explosive decompression). Sorenson produces pumps for the military with special coloring, and with key military uses easily programmed by pushing buttons on the device. Sorenson's current contract is temporary and the company is in negotiations for another, longer-term pact. Currently, the military uses Sorenson pumps as nerve blocks at Walter Reed and for general pain control on evacuation flights; Stryker pumps are also widely used in Iraq as nerve blocks.

Sorenson Medical must tread carefully in parlaying its military business into sales back home. To avoid tripping over Pentagon rules, it can't say the military endorses its product, only that Sorenson supplies infusion pumps to the military. But mentions of the company's ambIT pump, in the medical-journal article and in broader press articles, can be handed out by the sales force and provided at trade shows. The company can say its pump passed airworthiness trials for the military, suggesting its robustness for use outside the hospital. A nurse and nurse practitioner working for the company sometimes make general presentations about pain management during hospital "grand rounds," and they work in a reference to the company's pumps and their use by the military.

Race Is On For Next Generation Of Nuclear Weapons (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian

Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

In the Cold War arms race, scientists rushed to build thousands of warheads to counter the Soviet Union. Today, those scientists are racing once again, but this time to rebuild an aging nuclear stockpile.

Scientists at Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico are locked in an intense competition with rivals at Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory in the San Francisco Bay Area to design the nation's first new nuclear bomb in two decades.

Since the 1950s, the two labs have fiercely competed in the bomb trade with technologies as different as Microsoft and Apple.

The new weapon, under development for about a year, is intended to ensure the long-term reliability of the nation's inventory of bombs. Program backers say that with greater confidence in the quality of its weapons the nation could draw down its stockpile, estimated at about 6,000 warheads.

Scientists also intend for the new weapons to be less vulnerable to accidental detonation and to be so secure that any stolen or lost weapon would be unusable.

By law, the new weapons would pack the same explosive power as existing warheads and be suitable only for the same kinds of military targets as the weapons they replace. As a result, unlike past proposals for new atomic weapons, the current project has captured bipartisan support in Congress.

But some veterans of nuclear arms development are strongly opposed, arguing that building new weapons could trigger another arms race with Russia and China, as well as undermine arguments to stop nuclear developments in Iran, North Korea and elsewhere. And, the critics say, it would eventually increase pressure to resume underground nuclear testing, which the U.S. halted 15 years ago.

Inside the labs, however, emotions and enthusiasm for the new designs are running high.

"I have had people working nights and weekends," said Joseph Martz, the head of the Los Alamos design team. "I have to tell them to go home. I can't keep them out of the office. This is a chance to exercise skills that we have not had a chance to use for 20 years."

DOJ_NMG_0033144

A thousand miles away at Livermore, Bruce Goodwin, associate director for nuclear weapons, describes a similar picture: The lab is running supercomputer simulations around the clock and teams of scientific experts working on all phases of the project "are extremely excited."

Building the new bomb, known as the reliable replacement warhead, or RRW, was approved by Congress in 2005 as part of a defense spending bill. The design work is being supervised by the National Nuclear Security Administration, which is part of the Energy Department.

The laboratories submitted detailed design proposals at the end of March that run more than a thousand pages each to the Nuclear Weapons Council, the secretive federal panel that oversees the nation's nuclear weapons. A winner will be declared later this year.

If the program is implemented, it would require an expensive remobilization of the nation's nuclear weapons complex, creating a capacity to turn out bombs at the rate of three or more a week.

Proponents of the project foresee a time when nuclear deterrence will increasingly rest on the capacity of the U.S. to build new bombs, rather than on maintaining a massive stockpile.

The proposal comes as Russia and the United States have agreed to further reduce nuclear stockpiles. The Moscow Treaty signed in 2002 by President Bush and Russian President Vladimir Putin calls for the two countries to each cut inventories to between 1,700 to 2,200 warheads by 2012.

Without the reliable replacement warhead, U.S. scientists say the nation will end up with old and potentially unreliable bombs within the next 15 years, allowing future adversaries to challenge U.S. supremacy and erode the nation's so called "strategic deterrent."

The new bomb "is one way of ensuring that our capability is second to none," said Paul Hommert, a physicist who heads X Division, the Los Alamos unit that built the first atomic bomb during World War II. "Not only today, but in 2025."

But critics say the program could plant the seeds of a new arms race.

The existing stockpile will be safe and reliable for decades to come, according to defense experts and nuclear scientists who have long supported strategic weapons. Rather than making the nation safer, the program will squander resources, broadcast the message that arms control is dead and even undermine the reliability of U.S. weapons, they say.

The new bomb would have to be built and deployed without testing. The U.S. last conducted an underground test in Nevada in 1991 and has since imposed a moratorium on new testing.

But without a single test, doubts about the new bomb's reliability will eventually grow, said Sydney Drell, former director of the Stanford Linear Accelerator and a longtime advisor to the Energy Department.

"If anybody thinks we are going to be designing new warheads and not doing testing, I don't know what they are smoking," Drell said. "I don't know of a general, an admiral, a president or anybody in responsibility who would take an untested new weapon that is different from the ones in our stockpile and rely on it without resuming testing."

If the U.S. breaks the international moratorium on testing, then Russia, China, India and Pakistan, if not Great Britain and France, would also conduct tests, said Phillip Coyle, former assistant secretary of defense and former deputy director of Livermore. All of those countries would gain more information from testing than would the U.S., which has invested heavily in scientific research as a surrogate to testing.

Richard Garwin, the physicist who helped design the first H-bomb in 1952 and remains a leading authority on nuclear weapons, opposes the new bomb and is worried it will lead to new testing. "We don't need it," he said. "No science will be able to keep these political doubts away."

Linton Brooks, chief of the National Nuclear Security Administration, disagrees, saying warheads based on modern technology and advanced electronics will be clearly more reliable.

"We are more likely to face a problem if we stick with the existing stockpile," Brooks said. "It is easy to overstate the degree to which the current stockpile (has been) tested," he adds.

The stockpile includes thousands of weapons held in reserve as a hedge in case a defect is discovered. Each year, some of those weapons are disassembled and cut apart for inspection. The U.S. could significantly reduce the reserve if it had greater confidence in the reliability of its warheads, Brooks said.

DOJ_NMG_0033145

The driving force for developing the new weapon has come from the scientific community and members of Congress. Although the Defense Department did not initiate the program, it has won wide support within the military as well as the Bush administration.

Democrats who are closely involved in nuclear weapons issues, including Rep. Ellen O. Tauscher, D-Calif., Rep. John M. Spratt, D-S.C., and Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., have also given the program support, according to their spokesmen.

Tauscher and the other lawmakers say they support the effort if it is accompanied by a reduction in the total number of U.S. nuclear weapons and if no testing is involved -- precisely the policy set up by Rep. Dave Hobson, R-Ohio, who has been a primary proponent of the program in Congress.

In the past, a wide range of proposals for new bombs fizzled politically, including the neutron bomb, the bunker-busting "mini-nuke" and the "Robust Nuclear Earth Penetrator." Each represented weapons envisioned for specific military missions, triggering fears that they might be used preemptively rather than to deter an attack.

The reliable replacement warhead has dodged such opposition, largely because it is not intended for a new military mission.

Actual production would require approval by Congress and construction of new manufacturing facilities -- all of which is at least several years off.

Meanwhile, the Los Alamos and Livermore labs are rewing up their culture of one-upmanship.

During the Cold War, the scientists adhered to a motto that the Soviet Union was the rival, but the competing lab was "the enemy." Still, it is a scholarly competition with few fighting words.

"I feel we have a great design for the country," said Martz, 41, the Los Alamos program manager who began working at the lab as an 18-year-old undergraduate. "Ours is better without a doubt."

But Goodwin, 55, counters: "We have chosen a particularly effective design. I believe we have done the better job."

Brooks, the federal nuclear weapons chief, gives no hint about whose bomb he favors, saying only that both "are very good designs, very responsive to what we are trying to do."

Since the end of the Cold War, the labs' top priority has been to maintain existing weapons. The labs predict that the plutonium components in existing weapons have a life of 45 to 60 years, meaning that in the next 15 years some will begin to deteriorate and replacements will be needed.

Christopher Paine, a program critic and nuclear weapons specialist at the Natural Resources Defense Council, contends the labs have everything to gain from these kinds of assessments -- generating funds for a new program even though older weapons remain in perfect condition.

But the labs say their actions are subject to outside oversight by government agencies and independent boards. "We take the integrity of our job pretty seriously," adds Hommert, the Los Alamos division chief.

While the labs say they're still working on cost estimates, they believe the reliable replacement warhead will save money over time. They aren't providing any details.

On average, the U.S. has spent an estimated $6 million per warhead since World War II, according to Steven Schwartz, author of Atomic Audit, the authoritative history of strategic weapons costs. Based on that, replacing all of the nation's 6,000 nuclear weapons could cost $36 billion.

So far a fraction of the ultimate cost of the program has been spent -- Congress approved funding of $25 million this fiscal year.

A portion of the cost involves engineering designed to make the bombs more secure. In charge of that is Sandia National Laboratory, which has vowed to make sure terrorists could never use a stolen or lost weapon.

"We are setting the goal of absolute control -- that you always know where the weapon is and what state it is in and that you have absolute control over its state," said Joan B. Woodard, executive vice president at Sandia. "People will say you can break the bank achieving that goal, but it is the right goal to set."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ_NMG_0033146

Former Interspeed Executive Convicted Of Fraud Charges (WSJ)

By William M. Bulkeley

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

BOSTON -- Arthur Goodwin, former senior vice president for sales of the now-defunct Interspeed Inc., was convicted of eight-counts of fraud in connection with inflating the sales of the Internet equipment company.

Mr. Goodwin, 45, was convicted by a jury in the courtroom of U.S. District Judge Richard G. Stearns. He is scheduled for sentencing on Oct. 5.

The U.S. attorney's office said that evidence in the case established that Mr. Goodwin falsely overstated sales by $9 million, which was 60% of the company's reported revenue in 1999.

The overstatement made it appear that Interspeed, North Andover, Mass., was meeting growth targets. He accomplished the overstatement by fraudulent acts including giving customers secret side-letters that allowed them to return the equipment. He also altered a key contract on what was said to be the largest sales in company history to make it acceptable to the company's finance department.

Interspeed's board of directors fired Mr. Goodwin in September 2000 after discovering his actions. Attorneys for Mr. Goodwin couldn't be reached for comment.

In 2003, William J. Burke, a former Interspeed financial executive, was sentenced to three years' probation, after pleading guilty one-count of falsification of Interspeed's books and records.

Monster Gets U.S. Subpoena In Widening Options Inquiry (WSJ)

By William M. Bulkeley

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

Monster Worldwide Inc. said it received a U.S. attorney's subpoena for information on its stock-option grants, as investigations into possible options backdating widened.

Monster, an online job-search and advertising firm based in New York, issued a series of options between 1997 and 2001 in a pattern that was favorable to executives receiving the grants, including James J. Treacy, its former president. The odds of so favorable a pattern occurring randomly are about nine million to one, according to a Wall Street Journal analysis1 published in yesterday's edition. Monster shares slid $3.40, or 8.1%, to $38.60 in 4 p.m. composite trading yesterday on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Monster, which is conducting an internal inquiry into the options, said it will cooperate with the inquiry and subpoena, issued by the U.S. attorney in Manhattan. Mr. Treacy, who no longer works for Monster, has said he didn't have anything to do with the timing of the grants, which were authorized by the board.

Two other high-tech concerns, Comverse Technology Inc. and Applied Micro Circuits Corp., announced delays in filings of financial reports due to options investigations. In addition, Applied Micro Circuits, Sunnyvale, Calif., and two other companies said they had received informal inquiries for information on the timing of stock-options grants from the Securities and Exchange Commission. The newly identified companies bring to at least 43 the number of firms that have acknowledged internal or external inquiries into their stock-option timing.

Comverse, a Woodbury, N.Y., maker of telecommunications billing systems, said it expects the Nasdaq Stock Market to warn it that its tardiness may cause it to be delisted. Comverse, which has said it is in the process of preparing restatements for five years of financial reports due to options-dating problems, yesterday fell 13%, or $3.09, to $20.48 on the Nasdaq.

Options give holders the right to buy a stock at a strike price, typically the market value on the day of the award. The options are supposed to give executives incentive to boost the company's stock price so that they will benefit along with other shareholders. But if companies choose dates before the award date when the stock was particularly low, it undermines the incentive because the executives' options are already profitable. Moreover, backdated options affect the tax and accounting treatment of the options, and if they weren't disclosed, they raise the potential for criminal fraud charges.

If firms find options were backdated, accounting rules require them to review all the years in which the grants were made for possible restatements and higher tax bills. Such accounting changes are time-consuming, explaining Comverse's delay.

DOJ_NMG_0033147

Comverse said it plans to file results for its fiscal year 2006 ended Jan. 31 and its first quarter ended April 30, in addition to prior years, "as soon as practicable." The company was subpoenaed in May in connection with the issuance of stock-option grants. Its chief executive, Kobi Alexander, and two other officials subsequently resigned.

The firms that said the SEC had issued informal inquiries are Broadcom Corp., an Irvine, Calif., maker of communications chips, Applied Micro Circuits, a computer-networking hardware maker, and Equinix Inc., a Foster City, Calif., firm that provides data centers for online services.

All three were among 32 firms cited as potential options trouble spots in a study issued last month by the Center for Financial Research and Analysis, Rockville, Md. Each of the three yesterday said it started an internal investigation after the CFRA report was issued. The study looked at options grant dates for the 100 companies that issued options heavily before changes in reporting requirements in 2002 made backdating more difficult.

Applied Micro Circuits said that because its internal investigation of stock-option timing hasn't been completed, it won't be able to file its annual report with the SEC by June 14 as scheduled and expects to request a delay.

Broadcom said its internal investigation covered all its option grants since its initial public offering in 1998. Spokesman Bill Blanning said that 95% of Broadcom's options during that period were made to employees below the ranks of top executives. CFRA's report listed three dates in 2000 and 2002 when options were granted at points close to the stock's low in a 40-day period.

Equinix said that its board's audit committee is investigating its options timing. Margie Backaus, chief business officer, said that the grant noted by CFRA in 2001 came at a period when Equinix stock was at 38 cents. She said the date coincided with a major layoff and the options were designed "to retain and motivate the employees who were left." The next year, Equinix had a 1-for-32 reverse split, giving the options a exercise price of $12.16.

Funds Sue Amid Probe Into Timing Of Options (FT)

By Jeremy Grant

Financial Times, June 13, 2006

Shareholder anger over US executive compensation practices spilled into the open on Monday as two big US pension funds sued companies involved in an investigation into the timing of stock-option awards.

Darren Robbins, a partner at Lerach Coughlin, said his San Diego law firm was also representing pension funds in Europe and Australia that were preparing similar action.

“People are very upset about this. There have been at least five pension funds that have filed cases in the last 72 business hours in court houses from California to Boston,” he told the Financial Times.

McAfee, a software security maker, was sued on Monday in federal court in the Northern District of California by the Heavy & General Laborers’ Pension and Annuity Funds, alleging “constructive fraud” through the backdating of stock options.

Juniper Networks, a technology company, was hit with a similar complaint by the Employer-Teamsters Pension Health and Welfare Funds. Neither McAfee nor Juniper were immediately available for comment.

Mr Robbins said his firm had been directed to take similar action by clients “in at least 34 different situations”.

Four separate companies revealed on Monday that they were being investigated by regulators over their options grants. More than 40 companies have become ensnared in one of the widest criminal and regulatory investigations into white-collar compensation in recent years. The probe is emerging as a test of years of executive compensation practices and has started to draw the anger of unions.

The AFL-CIO said last week that the stock option backdating scandal “shares many similarities to the after-hours trading of mutual funds, where favoured insiders received preferential terms that were hidden from public investors”.

Four companies – Broadcom, Equinix, Applied Micro Circuits and Cyberonics – said they were the subject of investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Monster Worldwide, the operator of an online recruitment site, said it had formed an independent committee of directors to conduct an internal review of all stock options grants made by the company.

DOJ_NMG_0033148

Investigations are focusing on the award of stock options to executives on dates that immediately preceded a sharp rise in the companies' share prices.

Such a move would immediately have put the options “in the money”, requiring proper disclosure to shareholders. Some companies have been hit with class-action lawsuits from public pension funds alleging that no such disclosure was made and that shareholders were defrauded.

The focus of investigations is in the years before 2002, when tough Sarbanes-Oxley corporate governance rules limited the scope for backdating of options.

New accounting rules requiring options expensing were introduced last year.

Efficient Markets The Welfare Of American Investors (WSJ)

By Henry G. Manne

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

Behavioral finance, a developing field of academic research that emphasizes investor irrationality (and ignorance) and the inefficiency of markets, has been hailed by defenders of the SEC as offering a solid economic rationalization for our vast scheme of federal securities regulations. Even apart from the obvious implications for the regulatory system of ignorance and irrationality on the part of regulators, a closer examination of the logic of behavioral finance leaves little for the pro-regulation crowd to crow about.

Initially, behavioral finance emerged as an academic antidote to a claim of substantial market perfection in the finance field, the well-known "efficient market" theory of stock prices. Numerous "anomalies" or irrationalities were discovered in the market for securities, such as various kinds of over- or under-reactions to new information, herding behavior, endowment effects, January effects, weekend effects, small-firm or distressed-firm effects, bubbles and crashes -- to name a few.

Faulty Data

Most of these alleged peculiarities proved in time to be far less anomalous than was first thought. The data on which they were based were often faulty, or the econometric models were measuring the wrong thing, or various kinds of relevant transactions costs were ignored. The effects of irrational or uninformed behavior were often canceled out by opposite forces, and much of it was simply irrelevant. Furthermore, the behavioralists did not -- and do not -- have a general theory that can explain why financial markets work as well as they do. Some close approximation of the efficient market theory is still the most accurate and useful model of the stock market that we have.

Still, some of the behavioralists' criticisms stuck, especially in regard to crashes and bubbles, events that arguably should not occur in perfectly efficient markets. In this connection the efficient market theorists had no choice but to reexamine and refine their own models, which they have now done with some success. Perhaps the most important behavioralist contribution to economics has been their reminder that the market-model claim of rationality often does not comport with actual human behavior.

Economists frequently failed to qualify economic pronouncements as being limited in application to aggregate behavior. Too many assumed that if markets in the aggregate behave rationally, it must be because the "marginal" participant -- the trader who has the correct information about what a price should be -- was himself a perfectly rational maximizer. This better-informed and rational trader would always arbitrage away any discrepancies from efficiency that a market displayed.

But there is a vast difference between economics and psychology, and we can thank the behavioralists for forcing economics back into its correct posture of dealing with aggregate behavior. We can also thank the behavioralists for demonstrating that the marginal trader/arbitrage theory cannot explain all price formation, since we have no way, a priori, of knowing that this hypothetical individual will be rational. Nor can we any longer assume that the arbitrageur (apart from a purchaser of 100% of the securities of a given company) will have all the information necessary to set the correct price.

That discovery left a serious gap in economic theory. The efficient market mavens were indeed correct in their conclusions about aggregate market behavior -- but how could they explain this near perfection of functioning markets while irrational and less-than-fully informed individuals (so-called "noise" traders) were known to abound?

DOJ_NMG_0033149

Traditional economics did contain the start of an answer to this question, most notably in F.A. Hayek's classic "The Use of Knowledge in Society" (1945). There, Hayek (addressing the then-pressing problem of countering socialist doctrine) made the astute observation that centralized or socialist planning can never be economically efficient because it was impossible for a central planner to accumulate all the information needed for correct economic decisions ("correct" in the sense of displaying efficient market allocations of goods). The critical information, he noted, is too scattered in bits and pieces throughout the population ever to be assembled in one person's mind (or computer). Diffused markets, on the other hand, function well because the totality of relevant information, even subjective preferences, can be aggregated through the price mechanism into a correct market valuation.

This insight of Hayek's has been a mainstay of market theory ever since it was advanced, but it remains merely an observation and a conclusion. It does not detail how new information gets so effectively impacted into the prices of goods and services. In other words, how does this "weighted averaging" get done? And why should we assume that the impact of rational participants would dominate that of irrational ones in markets?

Similarly, the efficient market theory was based almost entirely on empirical observations and did not offer a theory of how the market came to be so efficient. Subsequent literature examined the mechanisms of market efficiency (including insider trading), but these were again observational and descriptive works that did not even recognize the absence of a good theory of how new information gets properly integrated into a price. The implicit and often explicit theory of price formation was always the "arbitrage" notion, with the marginal trader calling the shots.

Enter now financial journalist James Suroweicki and his charming and insightful book, "The Wisdom of Crowds" (2004). The book opens with the story of a contest at a county fair in England in 1906 to guess the weight of an ox on display after slaughter and dressing. There were about 800 guesses entered in the contest both by knowledgeable people and by those who had no expertise in such matters. We are not told what the winning guess was, but we are told that the average of all the guesses (1,197 pounds) was virtually identical to the actual weight (1,198 pounds).

Similar results show up regularly in the relatively new use of so-called "prediction" or "virtual" markets, primarily employed today in predicting outcomes of political elections, sporting events, new product introductions or new movies. Though there are still some problems with the technique, these "markets" have proved in the main to be much more accurate than traditional interview polls. And these various illustrations of the wisdom of crowds suggest a solution to the problem of how correct prices are formed in financial markets beset by irrational and poorly informed traders. * * *

Weighted-average results are similar to "correct prices," since informed investors can be assumed to invest more money if their confidence in the validity of their information -- or the intensity of their desire for the product -- is higher, thus imparting a weighted average element to each price. And while the actual weight of an ox is a more objective measure than the "correct" price of a security, the main difference may be between a static and a dynamic figure with the "correct price" of a stock being a kind of moving target.

The literature on prediction markets makes clear that the more participants in a contest and the better informed they are, the more likely is the weighted average of their guesses to be the correct one. That is true, ironically, even though the additional participants have even less knowledge than the earlier ones. The only requirements for these markets to work well are that the various traders be diverse and that their judgments be independent of one another. Clearly, there is still a lot more work of a statistical and mathematical nature to be done before the idea of the wisdom of crowds is turned into a full-fledged theory of price formation, but at least we have identified the problem and made a start towards a solution.

'Wisdom of Crowds'

The implications of what we already know of this "wisdom of crowds" approach to price formation, as against the traditional marginal pricing/arbitrage approach, are apt to be startling. We should rethink any current policies based on a view of pricing in which we exclude the best-informed traders and discard the wisdom of the many. For instance, we now have a new and more powerful argument than we had in the past for legalizing most insider or informed trading.

Since such trading clearly makes the market process work more efficiently, it aids capital allocation decisions and informs business executives through market-price feedback of the best predictions about the value of new plans. Furthermore, the Supreme Court's "fraud on the market" theory of civil liability under the federal securities laws and Congress's ideas of correct civil damage claims for insider trading no longer have any intellectual merit. The same is true of any other part of our securities laws implicitly based on the notion of the marginal trader as a rational arbitrageur of price.

DOJ_NMG_0033150

The new approach would suggest that it is undesirable to have laws discouraging stock trading by anyone who has any knowledge relevant to the valuation of a security. Thus, assembly-line workers, administrative assistants, office boys, accountants, lawyers, salespeople, competitors, financial analysts and, of course, corporate executives (government officials are another story) should all be encouraged to buy or sell stocks based on any new information they might have. Only those privately enjoined by contract or other legal duty from trading should be excluded. The "wisdom of crowds" can do far more for the welfare of American investors than all the mandated disclosures and insider trading laws that the SEC and Congress can think up.

Mr. Manne, a resident of Naples, Fla., is dean emeritus of George Mason University School of Law. This is the first of a two-part series.

Outside Audit Big Pension Plans Are At Risk Of Losing Accounting Benefit (WSJ)

By Steven D. Jones

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

The balances of public-company pension plans had been improving until the stock market swooned again. Congressional action could deal many of these funds another setback.

The House and Senate both have passed versions of a bill that could limit the use of a key pension-accounting benefit. The legislation would affect dozens of companies in the automotive, aerospace and basic-materials industries.

At issue are credit balances, which companies accumulate by putting more money into a plan than required in a given year to meet obligations to retirees.

Stashing extra money sounds like the very model of corporate responsibility. But the accounting associated with this practice can create big problems: Pension-plan administrators are allowed to use an assumed rate of interest -- a rate that may differ from the actual return. Securities filings show that a number of companies are assuming rates of return on their credit balances that are well above what is currently available in stocks and bonds.

The upshot is that a pension plan can technically be considered flush when it is in shortfall.

For example, UAL Corp., operator of United Airlines, relied on credit balances from 1996 to 2004 to meet its annual contributions to a pilots' pension. When the airline slid into bankruptcy, however, it turned out that the program was really underfunded by $3 billion.

The debate about credit balances is separate from the larger brouhaha over the assumptions that companies make about their overall pensions and the impact on earnings. For years, companies have been able to use estimates when calculating the returns on the overall plans. Many have used historical rates of return of about 10% even in years when the stock market was falling. That has often resulted in "overfunded" pensions that in turn allowed companies to lower their annual pension expense and thus increase net income.

President Bush and other critics of pension accounting see the rules for credit balances as a growing threat, and some limits on their use seem certain to be in a final bill that could emerge from a conference committee before Congress's July 4 recess, according to leaders of both houses.

"Companies that built large credit balances can grow and sustain them at an assumed interest rate chosen by the plan actuary, regardless of how the plan assets have performed," says Greg Kelly, a government-affairs analyst at Susquehanna Financial in Bala Cynwyd, Pa. "We believe Congress is going to limit their use."

Mr. Kelly says Congress is considering compelling companies to contribute to their pensions whenever they fall below 80% funded, at which point they would face strict limits on use of credit balances in their funding calculations.

Credit balances reside inside the pension plan itself, not on the company balance sheet, so the balances are often invisible to investors. The only place companies regularly disclose the amount of credit balances is on pension-plan filings made with the Internal Revenue Service.

DOJ_NMG_0033151

Big companies continue to rely on credit balances. General Motors Corp. won't make a cash contribution to the pension plan for its U.S. hourly workers this year, drawing instead on its credit balance of more than $50 billion. GM says its domestic pension plans are well-funded, but that isn't the case for every company that relies on credit balances. * * *

BIG BOARD GORED: Shares of U.S. stock-exchange operators took a beating yesterday, leading some investors and strategists to wonder if NYSE Group Inc.'s mostly share-based deal to merge with Euronext NV will need to be sweetened.

Shares in NYSE Group, the owner of the New York Stock Exchange, fell $4.53 or 7.9%, to $52.62, a 4½-month low that takes the Big Board operator's ticker below where it was when the exchange merged with Archipelago Holdings Inc. to become a public company.

Other exchange stocks also fell, but the plunge in NYSE Group's stock has implications for what would be a historic merger to create the first trans-Atlantic stock exchange. Euronext operates equity exchanges in European cities and a bustling derivatives marketplace in London.

When the deal was unveiled June 2, the NYSE's rising stock implied a slight premium to Euronext's market value at the time.

Big Board shares are off 18% since then, while Euronext shares have shed only 2% over the same period, implying a price for Euronext about €4 ($5.05) share below the company's current value.

The NYSE's stock is suffering with the broader U.S. market, but stocks of merger partners typically move in tandem when investors are certain a deal is likely to be completed.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Gang Activity Cited For Jump In U.S. Homicides (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — The nation's violent-crime rate increased in 2005 for the first time in five years, the FBI said Monday in a report that reflected in part what crime analysts say is a resurgence in gang activity, particularly in the Midwest.

READ THE REPORT: Full data on spike

Of the four crime categories that make up the FBI's violent-crime index — murder, rape, robbery and aggravated assault — only rape declined in the national figures.

In some cities, the increase in violence has led to crime rates that are in line with those posted in the years before the historically low rates that began in the mid-1990s.

The reported jump in homicides — nearly 5% nationwide — was the largest annual increase in the past 15 years. Some of the biggest increases were in Milwaukee, Oklahoma City, Omaha, St. Louis and other Midwestern cities.

Oklahoma City police cited fighting among rival gangs as a major factor in the jump in homicides there, from 39 in 2004 to 54 last year. As a result, police Sgt. Paco Balderrama says, the department is beefing up its anti-gang units: "We're working gangs every night."

Gangs from the East and West coasts "are branching out to smaller cities, where there is still money to be made and turf to be ruled," says James Alan Fox, criminal justice professor at Northeastern University in Boston.

In Omaha, homicides jumped from 20 in 2004 to 31 in 2005. Police Chief Thomas Warren said the city averaged 30-32 homicides a year before a low point in 2004. Despite the rise in homicides, the city recorded an overall decline in violent crime in 2005, a development Warren attributes to the city's aggressive stance against the "ongoing and persistent problem" with criminal gangs.

The FBI report also is renewing the debate over whether the U.S. government's dropping of an ambitious police-hiring program — along with many law enforcement agencies' new emphasis on preventing terrorism — have made crime prevention more difficult.

DOJ_NMG_0033152

"This should be a loud wake-up call for the country to get back to doing what worked in the 1990s," Fox says. "When you look back at the 1990s, we were expanding police forces and pouring more money into after-school programs. Now, we're seeing just the reverse."

Fox was referring in part to the Bush administration's phasing out of a Clinton-era program aimed at putting 100,000 new cops on U.S. streets. Police chiefs nationwide have called for renewing the program to offset local cutbacks.

Despite the popularity of the Community Oriented Policing Services program among police and crime analysts, a USA TODAY review of the program last year found little evidence that it was a big factor in reducing crime.

Justice Department officials cautioned against reading too much into the FBI report. "The crime rate is so low in some communities that relatively modest increases can result in what appear to be fairly stark increases," says Richard Hertling, deputy assistant attorney general for the Office of Legal Policy.

Violent Crime Rises In U.S. (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

Violent crime in 2005 increased at the highest rate in 15 years, driven in large part by a surge of killings and other attacks in many Midwestern cities, the FBI reported yesterday.

The FBI's preliminary annual crime report showed an overall jump of 2.5 percent for violent offenses, including increases in homicide, robbery and assault. It was the first rise of any note since 2001, and rape was the only category in which the number of crimes declined.

In the District, a 14.6 percent jump in the number of robberies caused a 5 percent rise in overall violent crime, more than offsetting a drop in the number of homicides, rapes and assaults. The decrease was particularly dramatic for rapes, which were down 24 percent.

In Baltimore, violent crime dropped about 3.6 percent overall, with decreases in all categories. The city of Alexandria reported a 22 percent increase in violent crime, although the total number of offenses -- 462 -- remained small. The FBI's preliminary report does not include breakdowns for many large suburban jurisdictions, such as Fairfax, Montgomery and Prince George's counties.

The rise in violent offenses nationally represents the largest overall crime increase since 1991. Violent crime peaked in 1992, before beginning to plummet to its lowest levels in three decades.

Overall property crime -- including burglary, theft and arson -- decreased 1.6 percent from 2004.

Criminal justice experts said there were a number of possible explanations for the increase, including an influx of gangs into medium-size cities and a predicted surge in the number of inmates released from U.S. prisons. The jump could also represent a lingering effect of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, some experts said, because governments at all levels have diverted resources away from traditional crime fighting in favor of anti-terrorism and homeland security programs.

"One possibility for the rise overall that we will want to watch is whether the shifting of law enforcement priorities to various kinds of homeland security duties accounts for any of this," said David A. Harris, a University of Toledo law professor who studies homeland security and criminal justice issues.

James Alan Fox, a criminal justice professor at Northeastern University in Boston, said the increase should serve as a "wake-up call in Washington." Lawmakers and the Bush administration have cut back many law enforcement programs popular during the 1990s.

"We have to worry about not just homeland security but also hometown security," Fox said. "High-crime areas have been relatively ignored over the last five years so we can deploy officers to fight terrorism."

Justice Department officials in Washington urged caution in interpreting crime statistics from a single year and noted that the crime rate -- measured on a per-capita basis and not reflected in yesterday's FBI report -- is still low by historical standards.

Richard A. Hertling, a principal deputy assistant attorney general, said the FBI statistics are "a yellow flag" but do not represent a trend, in part because the numbers are preliminary and do not include full reports from all jurisdictions.

DOJ_NMG_0033153

"We don't think these numbers are terribly useful for helping to figure out what is happening on a national level," Hertling said. "That being said, they can be very useful for individual communities to see what their record is and what needs attention."

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and other Justice officials have frequently cited record-low crime rates as evidence of success. Gonzales also has unveiled programs focused on combating gangs and gun crime in many urban areas.

The FBI statistics are taken from reports submitted by more than 12,000 police departments and other law enforcement agencies nationwide. A final report, including more detailed statistics and reports from a larger number of police agencies, will be issued in the fall. Government officials and criminal justice experts said trends in the FBI's final reports usually do not differ widely from conclusions in the preliminary studies.

Cities with more than 1 million residents were the only FBI population category to show a decline in violent crime, though some individual large cities -- such as Phoenix and Houston -- posted increases. Crime reports fell again in New York.

The trend was different for smaller to medium-size cities, which experienced marked increases in most categories of violent crime.

Among violent crimes, the biggest rise in 2005 came in the number of homicides, which leapt 4.8 percent, to nearly 17,000. Some of the hardest-hit cities included Milwaukee (up 40 percent), Cleveland (38 percent), Houston (23 percent) and Phoenix (9 percent).

On a regional basis, the increase disproportionately hit the Midwest. Total violent crime reports there surged 5.7 percent -- at least three times the rate in the Northeast, South or West.

The District's 5 percent increase in violent crime was due to a jump in the number of reported robberies, which rose from 3,057 in 2004 to 3,502 in 2005.

D.C. Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey said the upward trend for robberies appears to be continuing in 2006, particularly among juveniles. Street officers say that more juveniles are holding up people and that they are more often using guns, Ramsey said.

"Four out of every 10 people arrested for robbery this year have been juveniles," Ramsey said. "That's a heck a lot of it right there, that juvenile crime is up."

In Baltimore, reports of violent crime dropped from 2004 by about 3.6 percent, to 11,248 incidents. That nearly returned the city to its 2003 level of 11,183.

Baltimore Police Commissioner Leonard Hamm said he is cautiously pleased with the drop in crime in the city, which has a reputation for violent, drug-filled street corners in some neighborhoods. "We're not having a party yet," Hamm said. "We still have a lot of work to do."

Violent Crime Up For 1st Time In 5 Years (WP)

By Mark Sherman

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Murders, robberies and aggravated assaults in the United States increased last year, spurring an overall rise in violent crime for the first time since 2001, according to FBI data.

Murders rose 4.8 percent, meaning there were more than 16,900 victims in 2005. That would be the most since 1998 and the largest percentage increase in 15 years.

Murders jumped from 272 to 334 in Houston, a 23 percent spike; from 330 to 377 in Philadelphia, a 14 percent rise; and from 131 to 144 in Las Vegas, a 10 percent increase.

Despite the national numbers, Detroit, Los Angeles and New York were among several large cities that saw the number of murders drop.

The overall increase in violent crime was modest, 2.5 percent, which equates to more than 1.4 million crimes. Nevertheless, that was the largest percentage increase since 1991.

The FBI data, compiled from reports by more than 12,000 law enforcement agencies, does not contain overall crime numbers in any category nor does it offer any explanation for the changes. The FBI's final annual crime report comes out in the fall.

DOJ_NMG_0033154

Criminal justice experts said the statistics reflect the nation's complacency in fighting crime, a product of dramatic declines in the 1990s and the abandonment of effective programs that emphasized prevention, putting more police officers on the street and controlling the spread of guns.

"We see that budgets for policing are being slashed and the federal government has gotten out of that business," said James Alan Fox, a criminal justice professor at Northeastern University in Boston. "Funding for prevention at the federal level and many localities are down and the (National Rifle Association) has renewed strength."

Still, Fox said, "We're still far better off than we were during the double-digit crime inflation we saw in the 1970s."

Robberies were up 4.5 percent and aggravated assaults 1.9 percent, according to preliminary data. Alone among violent crime categories, the number of rapes fell 1.9 percent.

Violent crimes peaked at 1.9 million in 1992 and fell steadily through the end of that decade. The number has been relatively stable for the past six years.

Crime last year increased in all regions, although the 5.7 percent rise in the Midwest was at least three times any other region's. These states make up the Midwest: Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, Ohio, South Dakota and Wisconsin.

Fox cautioned against reading too much into year-to-year changes in individual cities, saying some differences result from random variation and marked swings the previous year. Also, some large statistical increases result from some small numerical changes.

In Hartford, Conn. for example, murders jumped more than 50 percent, from 16 to 25.

___

On the Net:

FBI: http://www.fbi.gov/

Violent Crime Rose In '05, With Murders Up By 4.8% (NYT)

By Maria Newman

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

Violent crime increased in the United States for the first time in four years, up 2.5 percent in 2005 from the year before, with the biggest increases in murder coming in medium-size cities and in the Midwest.

A preliminary 2005 crime report issued yesterday by the Federal Bureau of Investigation shows that the total number of murders in the country went up 4.8 percent from the year before. St. Louis, Houston, Philadelphia and Milwaukee saw an increase in murders, while other cities including New York, Los Angeles and Miami saw a drop.

Among violent crimes, the only decrease was in rapes, which fell 1.9 percent. Robberies increased over all by 4.5 percent.

Cities with populations of more than 500,000 had the biggest rise in violent crime, 8.3 percent. In the Midwest, violent crimes increased by 5.7 percent.

The data are considered preliminary until the final statistics are released in October.

The increases in violent crime over all come after years of crime reduction efforts all over the country in the 1990's that are credited with lowering crime rates almost everywhere, especially in the larger urban areas. Law enforcement officials and other experts on crime cautioned that this latest report did not necessarily mean crime would start to run rampant again.

James Alan Fox, a professor of criminal justice at Northeastern University, said that after the sharp decreases during the 1990's, the crime rate over all from 2000 to 2004 was "essentially flat."

"We squeezed all the air out of the balloon after having seven good years of crime decline," Mr. Fox said. "That ended when the 1990's ended. Now the challenge isn't so much to make the crime rate go down more, because that's not necessarily realistic, but the challenge is to make sure that the small blip doesn't become a big one."

Mr. Fox pointed out that some of the cities where murders rose in 2005 had seen small fluctuations in recent years.

Houston, for example, which reported 334 murders in 2005, had 272 in 2004 and 278 the year before.

In Memphis, there were 136 murders in 2005, 107 in 2004 and 126 in 2003.

"I don't think we'd be too obsessed with the day-to-day changes in the stock market," Mr. Fox said.

DOJ_NMG_0033155

The 2005 figures are not necessarily the beginning of a trend upward for everyone, he said, but "the potential does exist."

The annual F.B.I. report is drawn from numbers gathered by state and local law enforcement agencies. They measure four violent offenses (murder, rape, robbery and aggravated assault) and four property crimes (burglary, larceny, auto theft and arson). The report does not measure drug crimes.

The report showed that cities with populations of 100,000 to 249,999 had the greatest increase in murders, up 12.5 percent. Cities with 500,000 to 999,999 inhabitants had the greatest increases in both robbery, 9.9 percent, and aggravated assault, 8.5 percent. The number of rapes fell in all city population groups except in those cities with fewer than 10,000 residents; there, the number of rapes was up 1.5 percent from the 2004 level.

Alfred Blumstein, a criminologist at Carnegie Mellon University in Pittsburgh, said an increase in crime in the last couple of years in some places could be a result of police efforts' being diverted to fighting terrorism, budget cuts that have reduced social services and prisons, and fewer job opportunities for young people in poorer communities.

"I want to be careful to not overstate a one-year trend as the start of something much bigger, because it could well go in the other direction next year," Mr. Blumstein said. "In places that had a good rise in crime, the chances are good that they could see a good fall next year as they pay more attention to the issue."

Murder Rate Up In Small US Cities (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, June 13, 2006

Small cities in the US saw a surge in murders last year, contributing to the first overall increase in violent crime in the US since 2001, according to preliminary data released by the Federal Bureau of Investigation on Monday.

While the largest cities in the US – including New York and Los Angeles – saw an overall decline of 0.4 per cent in violent crime in 2005 and a 0.5 per cent increase in murder, cities with populations of between 50,000 and 250,000 saw a more than 12 per cent jump in the number of murders. Violent crime in cities with populations ranging from 500,000 to 1m increased 8.3 per cent.

“Smaller cities are getting substantially more dangerous – that is very significant. What we are seeing in smaller jurisdictions across the country is that they are now dealing with the drug market, gangs and street violence issues that you used to only see in big cities,” said David Kennedy, director of the centre for crime prevention and control at John Jay College of Criminal Justice in Manhattan.

Justice Department officials on Monday said it was too soon to attribute the increases to a wider trend in violent crime and that it was too early to determine the cause of the spikes, although they acknowledged that the migration of gang activity from large to smaller cities was a possibility. The figures could also reflect the impact former prison inmates have on crime rates when they return to their communities, officials said.

Richard Hertling, deputy assistant attorney-general for legal policy, said it was unclear whether a 23 per cent increase in the number of murders that was reported in Houston, Texas, was linked to the influx of people into the city after Hurricane Katrina, when the city opened its doors to victims of the natural disaster, or whether the increase was something that “played out” over the course of the year.

Officials at the Justice Department warned against taking the figures out of context. A steady decline in violent crime over the past 15 years due to tough law enforcement meant that any increase would appear to be “fairly stark”.

U.S. Violent Crime Rises At Pace Unseen In 10 Years (NPR)

By Laura Sullivan

NPR's All Things Considered, June 13, 2006

Preliminary figures for 2005 indicate a 2.5 percent increase in the number of violent crimes compared with 2004. Click to see previous years' figures.

The nation's four regions all saw increases in violent crime in 2005. The Midwest experienced the steepest jump, 5.7 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0033156

All Things Considered, June 12, 2006 · Violent crime across the nation is up. For the first time since 2001, there are more murders, rapes and assaults, according to the FBI.

But violent crime didn't just rise last year. According to the numbers, it jumped 2.5 percent. That's the biggest increase since 1991, when the country was battling gangs and the crack epidemic.

According to the report, cities with less than a quarter-million people had the largest increases -- homicides alone were up 12 percent last year.

Criminologist speculate that there are several reasons for the rise in violent crime: cutbacks in federal law enforcement grants, a focus on terrorism, a nationwide resurgence in gang activity and signs of increasing youth violence as children born in the 1990s become teenagers.

Justice Department officials say crime-fighting has been a priority of the Bush administration for the past six years and point to millions of dollars the Justice Department has spent on anti-gang initiatives and community programs such as Project Safe Neighborhoods.

The report wasn't all bad. Some of the nation's largest cities, including Los Angeles and New York, continue to show a drop in violent crime. The complete report will be released this fall.

Crime Drops In L.A., Rises Nationally (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Violent crime, on the downswing for three years, skipped back up by 2.5% nationally last year but declined in most categories in Los Angeles, the FBI reported today.

Los Angeles had fewer murders, forcible rapes and robberies in 2005 than 2004, the FBI said. But because figures in 2005 for the fourth category of violent crime — aggravated assault — were not yet available, the FBI could not be sure that violent crime as a whole declined.

Among other Southern California cities with more than 100,000 people, violent crime also fell in Burbank, Downey, El Monte, Fontana, Fullerton, Long Beach, Moreno Valley, Norwalk, Oceanside, Ontario, Orange, Rialto, San Bernardino, San Diego, Santa Ana, Simi Valley, South Gate and West Covina.

But it rose in Anaheim, Chula Vista, Corona, Costa Mesa, Escondido, Garden Grove. Glendale, Huntington Beach, Inglewood, Irvine, Lancaster, Oxnard, Palmdale, Pasadena, Pomona, Rancho Cucamonga, Riverside, Santa Clarita, Thousand Oaks, Torrance and Ventura.

Although violent crime rose nationally in 2005, crime against property fell by 1.6%, the third consecutive year of declines in this category. In Los Angeles, crime against property fell by 6.3%.

Among categories of violent crime, Los Angeles registered declines in murders (from 518 in 2004 to 489 last year), forcible rapes (1,131 to 1,105) and robberies (14,181 to 13,797).

Only New York, with 539, registered more murders. In the category of robberies, Los Angeles trailed both New York and Chicago.

In property crimes, Houston crept ahead of Los Angeles last year, leaving Los Angeles fourth behind also New York and Chicago. The FBI counted 117,285 cases of property crime in Los Angeles in 2005, down from 125,200 in 2004.

But the FBI figures showed Los Angeles to be the arson capital of the United States. Its 2,229 reported cases of arson, up from 1,926 in 2004, led the nation, although the FBI did not have complete figures for New York for either 2004 or 2005.

Violent Crime Increases In U.S. (WT)

By Jerry Seper And Matt Cella

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

Violent crime in the United States increased last year for the first time in five years, led by murders with 16,900 victims or more than 46 a day -- the most since 1998 and the largest percentage increase in reported homicides in 15 years, says the FBI.

DOJ_NMG_0033157

The FBI's Preliminary Annual Uniform Crime Report for 2005, released yesterday, said the number of murders and non-negligent manslaughters rose by 4.8 percent, while robberies increased by 4.5 percent and aggravated assaults were up 1.9 percent.

The number of murders dropped in Washington from 198 in 2004 to 195 last year, in Baltimore from 276 to 269 and in Richmond from 93 to 84, but rose in Alexandria from 2 to 3.

Among the nation's largest cities -- those with populations greater than 1 million -- Atlanta, Dallas, Denver, Detroit, Los Angeles and New York were among those that experienced declines in number of murders.

New York, with 8.1 million residents, ranked last among the nation's 10 largest cities with 2,680 crimes committed per 100,000 residents. Dallas, with a population of 1.21 million, ranked as the most dangerous, with 8,496 crimes per 100,000 residents.

According to the FBI report, forcible rape was the only offense among the four violent crimes -- murder, rape, robbery and assault -- that decreased in volume in 2005, down 1.9 percent from 2004. The report said the overall number of violent-crime offenses rose 2.5 percent.

The report also said the number of reported property crime decreased by 1.6 percent over 2004, including incidences of burglary, larceny-theft and motor vehicle theft. For 2005, it said, the number of larceny-theft offenses was down 2.5 percent, and motor-vehicle thefts showed no significant change from the previous year. But the number of reported incidents of burglary rose by 0.6 percent, the report said.

The FBI based the report on numbers collected by 12,485 law-enforcement agencies nationwide.

According to the report:

• All city population groups experienced increases in violent crime when compared with data reported for the previous year, with the exception of the nation's largest cities with more than 1 million in population, where the number of violent crimes was down 0.4 percent.

•Cities with populations from 500,000 to 999,999 saw the greatest increase in violent crime, a rise of 8.3 percent. Cities with populations of 10,000 to 24,999 saw the smallest increase at 0.5 percent.

•In the nation's metropolitan counties, violent crime was up 2.1 percent, and in nonmetropolitan counties, it increased by 1 percent.

According to the FBI report, the nation's four regions all saw increases in violent crime in 2005. The Midwest experienced the steepest increase at 5.7 percent; the West climbed 1.9 percent over 2004; the South by 1.8 percent; and the Northeast by 1.4 percent. The report said all four regions had increases in murder, robbery and aggravated assault, and contrary to the other three violent-crime offenses, the number of forcible rapes declined in each region.

FBI: Violent Crime Up Last Year In U.S. (UPI/UPI)

United Press International, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 12 (UPI) -- The number of violent crimes reported in the United States rose 2.5 percent last year with the number of homicides up almost 5 percent.

Almost 17,000 homicides were reported, the FBI said. The number of property crimes dropped 1.6 percent.

Violent crime dipped slightly in the largest cities, those with a population of 1 million or more, the FBI said in its Preliminary Annual Uniform Crime Report for 2005. There were increases in all other categories of cities with the biggest, 8.3 percent, in those with a population between 500,000 and 999,999.

Violent crime dropped sharply in the late 1990s and had remained flat since 2001. One expert suggested that the increase last year could be partly the result of the long sentences that became common in the 1980s as well as a consequence of demographic shifts.

"There is an 'echo boom,' with an increasing number of late adolescents, particularly blacks and Latinos," James Fox, a criminal justice expert at Northeastern University, told CNN. "Also, more people incarcerated in the '80s are now being released to their neighborhoods, and some are back to their old ways and old gangs."

FBI: Violent Crime Up In Majority Of NJ's Biggest Cities (NSDY/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0033158

By Donna De La Cruz, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Murders, rapes, robberies and other violent crimes measured by the FBI rose in the majority of New Jersey's six largest cities in 2005, according to FBI statistics released Monday.

The FBI measures statistics in cities with a population of 100,000 or more.

Jersey City saw increases in all of its violent crime indexes, except for forcible rape. The murder rate increased 65.2 percent with 38 murders in 2005 compared with 23 in 2004.

Beside Jersey City, the cities whose statistics were released were Newark, Paterson, Woodbridge Township, Edison Township and Elizabeth. The violent crimes measured were murder, forcible rape, robbery, aggravated assault, property crime, burglary, larceny theft, motor vehicle theft and arson.

Of the six cities, Jersey City's statistics were the worst, Woodbridge's the best.

Newark, the state's largest city, saw its overall violent crime index decline, with decreases in robberies, property crimes, burglaries, larceny thefts and motor vehicle thefts. But the murder rate increased 15.5 percent with 97 murders in 2005, compared to 84 in 2004, and forcible rapes were up 13.7 percent.

The FBI data, compiled from reports by more than 12,000 law enforcement agencies, does not contain overall crime numbers in any category nor does it offer any explanation for the changes. The FBI's final annual crime report comes out in the fall.

Criminal justice experts said the statistics reflect the nation's complacency in fighting crime, a product of dramatic declines in the 1990s and the abandonment of effective programs that emphasized prevention, putting more police officers on the street and controlling the spread of guns.

In New Jersey, Michael Wagers, executive director of the Police Institute at Rutgers-Newark, attributed the bulk of violence to the availability of guns.

"Nine out of 10 homicides in Newark were committed with a gun, compared with the national average of 6 or 7 homicides," Wagers said. "It's alarming to see a number of cities in New Jersey see an uptick in violent crime."

Overall violent crime increased in Paterson, Edison and Elizabeth. Paterson and Elizabeth also saw their murder rates and forcible rapes increase.

Edison had no murders in 2005, compared to two in 2004. The city also saw a decline in its forcible rapes _ 6 in 2005 and 7 in 2004. But an increase in robberies, aggravated assaults, burglaries and arsons increased the city's overall violent crimes total.

Woodbridge had the best statistics with its overall violent crime totals down. The city had two murders last year compared with four in 2004, and decreased property crimes, aggravated assaults, burglaries and arsons. But forcible rapes and robberies were way up _ the city saw a 70 percent increase in rapes with 17 in 2005 compared to 10 in 2004, and a 40 percent increase in robberies with 81 in 2005, compared to 58 in 2004.

Violent Crime Rises In U.S., But S. Florida Fares Better (MH)

By Michael Vasquez And Wanda J. Demarzo

The Miami Herald, June 13, 2006

The number of murders, robberies and aggravated assaults rose nationally in 2005 -- triggering the first overall jump in U.S. violent crime since 2001, according to preliminary annual crime statistics released by the FBI on Monday.

But FBI data for South Florida's biggest cities told a different story: In six out of eight cities, violent crime was down.

In the city of Miami, for example, the number of murders dropped from 69 to 54 (nearly 22 percent) from 2004 to 2005, even as they increased nationally by 4.8 percent -- the largest jump in 15 years.

"We've obviously been very aggressive," Miami Police Chief John Timoney said. ``The whole idea of crime and quality of life has been our number one priority here."

Regarding the higher crime figures in other parts of the country, Timoney called it "cause for concern" but urged caution in analyzing the data.

DOJ_NMG_0033159

"There's never any one answer to these things, and you shouldn't base conclusions on one year or two," Timoney said.

Criminal justice experts said the statistics reflect the nation's complacency in fighting crime, a product of dramatic declines in the 1990s and the abandonment of effective programs that emphasized prevention, putting more police officers on the street and controlling the spread of guns.

"We see that budgets for policing are being slashed and the federal government has gotten out of that business," said James Alan Fox, a criminal justice professor at Northeastern University in Boston. ``Funding for prevention at the federal level and many localities are down and the [National Rifle Association] has renewed strength."

Still, Fox said, ``We're still far better off than we were during the double-digit crime inflation we saw in the 1970s."

Hialeah Police Chief Rolando Bolaños said his department is anything but complacent, and in fact earlier this year launched a 13-member Community Response Team to target high-crime areas. Hialeah's crime numbers were mostly down for 2005, but Bolaños said good police work didn't deserve all the credit -- South Florida has some other advantages.

"To a great extent crime is a function of economics," Bolaños said. ``South Florida, in comparison to other regions of the country, we are doing far better economically."

But 2005 wasn't all good news for local police departments. Fort Lauderdale's violent crime totals inched up about 3 percent, to 1,470. Miramar's went up nearly 5 percent, and that southwest Broward city had three murders in 2005 -- up from two the year before.

After one murder in 2004, Pembroke Pines recorded six in 2005. But three of those homicides occurred during one incident, according to Pembroke Pines spokesman Cmdr. Dave Golt.

On Jan. 30, 2005, Golt said, Adolph Jones, 58, attempted suicide within a day of killing his wife and two stepdaughters. Jones, who was charged with the three homicides, has not been tried for the killings after a Broward Circuit Judge ruled him incompetent to stand trial.

"We did see a slight increase in burglaries and larcenies, thefts, but oddly the number of car thefts we saw bucked the national trend and we were actually lower in 2005 than in the previous year," Golt said.

Miami-Dade police, meanwhile, have coped with a string of homicides in unincorporated parts of the county during the first half of 2006, some apparently gang-related. Up-to-date homicide numbers from the Miami-Dade County police force were not immediately available Monday.

The FBI's preliminary report listed cities larger than 100,000 in population but did not provide county-by-county breakdowns.

It was based on data provided by local law enforcement agencies.

This report was supplemented with material from The Associated Press.

Rapes Increase In Dayton, FBI Report Says (DDN)

By Kelli Wynn, Staff Writer

Dayton Daily News, June 13, 2006

City bucks national trend with decrease in other types of violent crimes.

DAYTON — All violent crimes in the city fell last year except rape, according to the FBI's 2005 preliminary Annual Uniform Crime Report.

Rapes in Dayton increased to 140 in 2005 from 127 in 2004, according to the report, which focused on cities with populations of 100,000 or more.

"As far as having somebody walking down the street being abducted, thrown in the bushes and raped, that's not what is driving these statistics," said Dayton Police Lt. John Huber. In most of the city's rapes, the victims know their attackers, he said.

Huber said when police turned in their information to the state they reported 33 homicides in 2004 and 32 homicides in 2005, but the FBI listed 32 for both years.

Huber said he didn't know how the mistake occurred. No one at the FBI national press office could be reached for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0033160

Nationally, homicides increased 4.8 percent, robberies increased 4.5 percent and aggravated assaults increased 1.9 percent. Rape was the only offense that decreased in 2005, down 1.9 percent from 2004, the FBI said.

The Midwest experienced a 5.7 percent increase in violent crimes, compared with 1.9 percent in the West, 1.8 percent in the South, and 1.4 percent in the Northeast.

Indy Crime Rate Mirrors Midwest Increases (WRTV-TV)

WRTV-TV, June 13, 2006

INDIANAPOLIS -- Murders, robberies and aggravated assaults in the United States increased last year, leading to an overall rise in violent crime for the first time since 2001, according to figures released by the FBI on Monday.

In Indianapolis, there were 7,948 violent crimes reported in 2005, up almost 900 from 2004.

The number of murders in Indy actually declined slightly, from 109 murders in 2004 to 108 in 2005, but other c rimes were up substantially.

Here's a year-to-year breakdown of other crimes:

The number of reported rapes climbed from 479 in 2004 to 527 in 2005.

The number of reported robberies jumped from 2,763 in 2004 to 3,274 in 2005.

Aggravated assault reports increased from 3,716 in 2004 to 4,039 in 2005.

Reported property crimes increased by more than 3,000, from 46,998 to 50,081 from 2004 to 2005.

Burglaries climbed from 10,920 in 2004 to 11,548 in 2005.

Larceny and theft reports jumped from 28,364 in 2004 to 29,541 in 2005.

Reported motor-vehicle thefts increased significantly from 7,714 in 2004 to 8,992 in 2005.

The number of arsons declined from 441 in 2004 to 374 in 2005.

Indianapolis' crime trend climb mirrors that of other Midwest communities.

The nation's four regions all saw increases in violent crime in 2005. The Midwest experienced the steepest increase, 5.7 percent.

However Tallied, Minneapolis Crime Is Up (MINNST)

By Greg Gordon, David Chanen And Howie Padilla, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, June 13, 2006

Police data show violent crime rose 15 percent last year, but it still doesn't approach the levels of the mid-1990s.

The FBI released data Monday indicating that violent crime surged 35.5 percent in Minneapolis last year, but the city's Police Department said a computer glitch grossly exaggerated what was actually a 15 percent jump from 2004.

A 15 percent increase is still six times the 2.5 percent national rise in murders, rapes, robberies and aggravated assaults in 2005, figures disclosed in preliminary data from the FBI's Uniform Crime Report. Still, the volume of violent crime in Minnea polis is about 30 percent below levels in the mid-1990s, when the number of annual murders nearly hit triple digits.

The nationwide increase in violent crime reversed a five-year downward trend, but these crimes are more than 25 percent below the numbers reported in 1992, the start of a years-long decline.

On the downside, violent crime in Minneapolis has increased in every year since 2001. And the data come as the city has grappled with two high-profile homicides in the Downtown and Uptown areas, spreading anxiety among some residents and leaders.

Alfred Blumstein, a Carnegie Mellon University professor who specializes in criminology, said the data "raise a concern about whether we're seeing a turn up in the crime rate," but it's too early to draw meaningful conclusions.

Blumstein said crime increases could be fueled by cutbacks in social services, a diversion of police to fighting terrorism, reductions in police manpower, declining job opportunities for teenagers and the release of 600,000 convicts from prison this year.

The FBI report relies on data reported by 12,000 law enforcement agencies.

DOJ_NMG_0033161

A 35.5 percent increase in violent crime in Minneapolis would have marked the biggest rise among U.S. cities with populations in the range of 350,000 to 400,000. Interim Police Chief Tim Dolan attributed that error to a tight FBI reporting deadline that did not leave time for a department analyst to cross-check the data.

"Obviously we had some sort of computer glitch when we ran the numbers, and we are working to correct that," Dolan said. "Unfortunately, we made a mistake."

The Police Department said the surge in violent crime in Minneapolis resulted largely from a 15 percent rise in robberies and a 19 percent jump in aggravated assaults. No raw numbers were made public.

Murders fall in Minneapolis

Minneapolis' single bright spot in the report was an 11.3 percent drop in murders, from 53 in 2004 to 47 last year, while law enforcement agencies across the country reported an average 4.8 percent rise, to a total of more than 16,900 homicide victims.

Murders rose 76 percent in Birmingham, Ala., 51 percent in St. Louis, 42 percent in Kansas City, Mo., and about 40 percent in Milwaukee.

Despite a national property crime decrease of 1.6 percent, the FBI reported that Minneapolis property crime surged by 11.9 percent over 2004, including an 18 percent rise in burglaries. It was unclear whether the department will seek to revise those figures as well.

An FBI spokeswoman said she expects the bureau to accept Minneapolis' revisions.

Minneapolis' surge helped drive up violent crime in the Midwest by 5.7 percent, the steepest increase of any region. Several other Midwestern cities also reported sizable increases in violent offenses: Milwaukee's incidence rose by 32.5 percent and Detroit's by 31.6 percent.

Robberies rose by 4.5 percent nationally and aggravated assaults increased by 1.9 percent, but the number of rapes declined by 1.9 percent.

The scene in St. Paul

In contrast, violent crime in St. Paul in 2005 rose by a modest 1.5 percent, though the number of murders increased 20 percent, from 20 to 24. Property crimes in St. Paul were 5 percent above 2004.

St. Paul Police Chief John Harrington said that he learned a long time ago not to get too caught up in the numbers. He was taught, he said, that someone willing to take too much credit in the good times will have to take blame when the numbers aren't favorable.

"The community's sense of their well-being and their safety is probably a better indicator of how safe a city is," Harrington said.

St. Paul Council Member Dan Bostrom, a former police officer, said he's confident that Minneapolis officials are addressing the crime issues and worries that St. Paul could pay for their success.

"People that do these crimes," Bostrom said, "will go where there is the least resistance."

Dolan said comparisons with St. Paul aren't fair, because Minneapolis has more economic disparity and greater problems involving juveniles, with the highest ratio of high school dropouts in the state. Gang members also have become younger and more violent, and gangs have become more fragmented, he said. The resulting unequal access to the drug market has forced more gangs to turn to robbery for revenue, Dolan said.

Centralizing the department's juvenile unit is a key strategy to tackle the youth crimes. Department officials hope the eight-officer unit will increase the number of investigations of juvenile crime, which shrank when the unit disappeared three years ago, Dolan said.

Resources are stretched to the limit, Dolan said, because of funding cuts over the past two years, but he said a bigger factor may be the department's failure to move quickly enough to implement crime-fighting strategies in the past year.

A daily battle on the streets

Police introduced the STOP unit -- a 50-officer team that responds to crime hot spots around the city -- last year to combat violent crime and move officers throughout the city as crime necessitated.

Shortly after 8 p.m. Monday, STOP officers Brandon Kitzerow and Jeff Kading responded to a call of "shots fired" on Oliver Avenue N. at the corner of the highly traveled Golden Valley Road.

"He shot me! He shot me!" the man on the ground was yelling, referring to the man sitting on him.

Kitzerow arrested the suspect, and Kading tended to the victim, whose white T-shirt was covered in blood. The officers shooed away kids on bicycles who happened by.

Earlier, two other STOP unit officers patrolled known drug spots and busted a man with marijuana and ticketed a driver with a suspended license.

Staff writer Chao Xiong contributed to this report. Greg Gordon is a correspondent in the Star Tribune Washington Bureau. dchanen@startribune.com • 612-673-4465 hpadilla@startribune.com • 651-298-1551

Violent Crime Jumps In Fort Collins (COLO)

By Coloradoan Staff

The Coloradoan, June 13, 2006

Violent crime increased dramatically in Fort Collins in 2005, though property crimes decreased, according to FBI crime statistics released today.

Fort Collins police received 4,876 reports of serious crimes in 2005, down 3 percent from the previous year, according to the FBI's Preliminary Uniform Crime Report for 2005.

However, the number of robberies reported to police more than doubled, while the number of aggravated assaults were up by 32 percent. Rapes were down 9 percent.

Overall violent crime – murder, rape, robbery and aggravated assault – was up 23 percent in Fort Collins, the second-highest increase in Colorado behind Westminster among cities with more than 100,000 people, according to the FBI report.

The picture was better in property crime – burglary, larceny-theft and motor vehicle theft – which declined by 5 percent in Fort Collins.

The biggest decrease in crime in Fort Collins was in larceny-theft, down 13 percent. However, auto thefts jumped 67 percent, to 431, according to the report.

Nationally, reported violent crimes increased by 2.5 percent in 2005 over the previous year. Property crimes declined by 1.6 percent, according to the FBI report.

Complete details in Tuesday's Coloradoan.

See the FBI report at http://www.fbi.gov/ucr/2005preliminary/index.htm

Violent Crime Up Across Texas, But Down In Dallas (KTVT-TV)

By Brooke Richie

KTVT-TV, June 13, 2006

(CBS 11 News) DALLAS Violent crime is up across the country and in every large North Texas city - except Dallas. That's according to the FBI's preliminary crime report for 2005. So what are different cities doing in the fight against crime?

Eleven people were shot in downtown Dallas early Saturday morning. There have been 78 murders in the first five months of the year. But violent crime in Dallas is actually plummeting.

"Dallas has been known for several years as having one of the highest crime rates in the nation for a population of a million or a more, but now with the crime rate coming down, it's good," said Dallas Police Department spokesperson Lt. Rick Watson.

Violent crime in Dallas was down nearly 5 percent from 2004 to 2005. Murders were down 19 percent - from 248 in 2004 to 202 in 2005. With Dallas in the national spotlight these days, those numbers may be good for business.

"With the NBA finals here, it makes people feel like they're more secure and safer coming to Dallas," Lt. Watson said.

Officials in other cities say - not so fast. They stress the importance of examining the crime rate per capita. And while Fort Worth and Arlington's crime statistics are up, so are both cities' populations.

"Marginal increases, when you take into consideration that we've added 37,000 people to our population last year alone," said Lt. Dean Sullivan of the Fort Worth Police Department.

Both Fort Worth and Arlington saw increases in their violent crime and murder rates. Arlington's murder rate increased 71 percent, from 14 murders to 24. Both cities say they've taken steps to improve. But even Dallas officials say when it comes to crime - no number is low enough.

Rapes On Decline In Seattle Area (KIRO-TV)

KIRO-TV, June 13, 2006

SEATTLE -- The FBI's latest crime statistics show a drop in rapes in Bellevue, Seattle, and Tacoma, Wash.

As far as other crimes reported in the 2005 FBI Uniform Crime Report, results vary.

Bellevue has seen an increase in murders and aggravated assault but theft and robberies have declined.

Crime in Seattle and Tacoma continues to rise.

Burglaries have dropped by 14 percent in Seattle but that was the only decrease noted among crimes listed in the report.

Violent crime has declined in Tacoma but like the other cities, crimes involving theft and robberies have increased.

Katrina Evacuee Arrested In Killing (NSDY/AP)

By Associated Press, June 12, 2006, 10:06 Pm Edt

Long Island Newsday, June 13, 2006

Ricardo Irvin, 18, told the Houston officers who picked him up from authorities in New Iberia, La., that "he got tired of running from the law" and admitted killing fellow evacuee Gregory Sartain, 19, and wounding another man, police spokesman Alvin Wright said.

Police said Irvin and Richard Foster, 17, robbed the two men of money they had received from the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

A tip led to Irvin's arrest in Baton Rouge, La., on June 6. He was transferred to New Iberia, where he also is charged in a murder, before being turned over to Houston officers, authorities said.

Foster was arrested in New Orleans on May 15. The men could face the death penalty if convicted of the Houston murder.

Katrina evacuees have been involved in more than two dozen killings, either as suspects or victims, since about 150,000 Louisiana evacuees arrived last September, police said. FBI crime data released Monday showed a 23 percent spike in murders in Houston in the past year.

Washington Wire (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, June 12, 2006

Libby Defense Team Considers Memory Expert

The defense team for former Vice Presidential Chief of Staff I. Lewis Libby said it is considering calling a memory expert to testify at his trial early next year.

Libby is charged with five counts of lying to federal investigators and the grand jury and obstructing an investigation into whether Bush administration officials wrongfully disclosed the identity of a CIA agent. He has pleaded not guilty.

Attorneys representing Libby have said in court filings that any erroneous statements made to Federal Bureau of Investigation agents or the grand jury were the result of a faulty memory, and not intentional lies. It isn't clear if the federal judge hearing the case would allow such testimony. At a status hearing Monday, Libby's attorneys said they would notify the judge by July 17 if they plan to call such a witness, and the government could then object. – Anne Marie Squeo

Part Of Charge Vs. Ex-Bush Official Tossed (AP-Y2)

By Pete Yost

AP2, June 12, 2006

A judge dismissed part of one criminal charge against a former official in the Bush administration Monday, as the first trial in the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling scandal moved toward a conclusion.

The decision by U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman represented a small courtroom victory for defendant David Safavian, who is accused of five felony charges that he concealed Abramoff's efforts to acquire two pieces of government property.

Safavian was chief of staff at the General Services Administration when he supplied the lobbyist information about government land in Maryland and the Old Post Office, a downtown Washington landmark.

The judge threw out language from the indictment that said Safavian lied by telling a GSA ethics officer Abramoff had no business with the GSA and was not seeking to do business with the agency. There was no evidence during the trial that Safavian ever made such statements to the GSA, Friedman said. The judge left intact the remainder of the count that Safavian concealed his assistance to Abramoff, and deletion of the language was expected to have little substantive impact.

According to testimony, Abramoff used his typically aggressive tactics on an old friend, Safavian, who now faces a lengthy prison term if convicted of covering up his assistance to the influence peddler.

The prosecution and defense were to make final arguments to the jury Monday afternoon.

During the trial, prosecutors depicted the former top procurement official in the government as a liar who improperly capitalized on his position. Defense lawyers described him as an honest public servant who simply confused the details of his dealings with Abramoff.

Toppled from his White House post last year, Safavian's fate is about to be placed in the hands of a jury that has heard a week of testimony about two pieces of government real estate the lobbyist wanted for himself or his clients.

One of them is the Old Post Office, a Washington landmark that Abramoff envisioned as a redevelopment project for his Indian tribal clients.

Safavian, once the chief of staff at the General Services Administration, acknowledged giving advice and some "nonpublic information" to the lobbyist and admitted to some lapses of judgment and memory, while insisting he hadn't intentionally misled GSA and Senate investigators.

Safavian said he told an FBI agent he had advised Abramoff on two GSA properties in the fall of 2002, rather than — as actually happened — in the weeks before he took a luxury-filled golf trip to Scotland that Abramoff arranged in August 2002.

"I was just mistaken about the time frame," Safavian testified last week.

If Safavian is acquitted, the prosecution's decision not to put Abramoff on the witness stand would turn out to have been a mistake by the government.

A conviction would follow a trial in which the star witness was not a person, but rather hundreds of e-mails in which Abramoff detailed what he wanted and Safavian responded.

Safavian is accused of two counts of obstruction and three counts of making false statements regarding his statements to the GSA's ethics officer, the Inspector General's office at the agency and a Senate committee chaired by Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz. Each count carries a maximum term of five years in prison.

Safavian Case Goes To Jurors (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

The trial of former federal procurement official David H. Safavian went to the jury yesterday, as a prosecutor in closing arguments accused him of lying to federal investigators to conceal the fact that he was "doing Jack Abramoff's bidding."

In response, Safavian's attorney said that the government's case was weak because Abramoff, a disgraced lobbyist who pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to corrupt public officials, did not testify at the three-week trial.

Safavian is the first person to go to trial for Abramoff-related charges, although four others have pleaded guilty to various allegations. Abramoff is cooperating with prosecutors in what has been a spreading Washington scandal.

Federal prosecutor Nathaniel B. Edmonds told the jury in his closing argument that Safavian maintained a "secret, inappropriate and unethical relationship" with Abramoff, his former boss, when Safavian became the deputy chief of staff and then chief of staff of the General Services Administration, the U.S. government's landlord agency.

Abramoff bestowed on Safavian a long list of favors, including a heavily subsidized golfing trip to Scotland and London on a private jet in the summer of 2002, Edmonds said. In exchange, he added, Safavian offered Abramoff "access, he offered connections, he offered power."

In particular, Edmonds said, Safavian arranged high-level meetings at the GSA and gave Abramoff insider information about two valuable properties that the GSA controlled and that the lobbyist coveted: a parcel of land in White Oak and the Old Post Office Pavilion building, on Pennsylvania Avenue between the White House and Capitol Hill.

Abramoff wanted to relocate a Hebrew academy he founded to White Oak, and he hoped to transform the Old Post Office into a five-star hotel.

DOJ_NMG_0033165

The two men had a "two-way relationship," Edmonds said. When Safavian had the choice of acting on the public's behalf or helping the private interests of Abramoff, he asserted, Safavian chose Abramoff every time. Safavian is charged with lying about and preventing the government from learning about his aid to Abramoff and the expensive golfing trip that Abramoff bankrolled around the same time.

Edmonds also contended that it was merely a matter of "common sense" that Abramoff had "business before" the GSA and that Safavian was misleading investigators and ethics officers when he told them otherwise from 2002 onward. Neil G. Volz, a onetime lobbyist and former staff member for Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio), testified during the trial that Abramoff's team considered Safavian one of the "champions" of its causes inside government.

Safavian's attorney Barbara Van Gelder, said there were "many reasons to doubt the government's evidence." In particular, she asked, "Where's Jack?" -- referring to Abramoff. She said many of the e-mails between Abramoff and Safavian discussed during the trial were weakened as evidence because "Jack Abramoff was not here to answer the questions" that might have arisen about them.

Later, after a private conference with the judge and prosecutors, Van Gelder acknowledged that she could have called Abramoff to the stand, as the prosecutors could have, but chose not to.

She portrayed Safavian's omissions of fact to investigators as "innocent errors" that should not be judged as crimes by the jury because he acted "in good faith." Van Gelder characterized Safavian as "open, courteous, trying to do the right thing" and said he answered any question or requests put to him by investigators.

"There isn't a wrongful, depraved, evil bone in his body," she said. She told members of the jury that they could have witnessed that for themselves when Safavian took the stand in his defense last week, an act that she said he did not have to do.

She also said that Safavian did not assist Abramoff in doing business with the GSA because Abramoff did not have any actual business before the agency. He was not a "contractor," she said.

Besides, she asked, "What did David Safavian do for Jack Abramoff? Nothing." She asserted that Safavian did not have the power to grant Abramoff's wishes on either of the properties.

Judge Lets Stand Major Charges Against Ex-Aide (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 12 — A federal judge on Monday handed a small victory to a former White House aide on trial for lying about his ties to the Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, dismissing a specific charge in the indictment.

But other, larger charges against the former aide, David H. Safavian, were left intact for the jury, which is scheduled to begin deliberations on Tuesday in the first trial to result from the influence-peddling scandals centered on Mr. Abramoff.

In closing arguments in the district court here, a federal prosecutor, Nathaniel Edmonds, accused Mr. Safavian of abandoning his responsibilities as a public servant to "act in Jack Abramoff's interests" and of lying repeatedly when questioned by government investigators about his August 2002 golf trip to Scotland with the lobbyist.

Mr. Safavian, who worked at the time for the General Services Administration, the government's real estate manager, sought approval for the trip by telling colleagues that Mr. Abramoff had no business before the agency.

In fact, prosecutors said, Mr. Safavian was quietly helping Mr. Abramoff obtain information that summer about two real estate properties controlled by the G.S.A. that the lobbyist wanted to acquire.

Mr. Safavian's lawyer, Barbara Van Gelder, described her client as an honest government worker who had gone out of his way to avoid the appearance of conflict of interest in joining the Scotland trip, for which he reimbursed Mr. Abramoff $3,100.

The charge dismissed Monday by the trial judge, Paul L. Friedman, involved accusations that Mr. Safavian had lied to a G.S.A. ethics officer about Mr. Abramoff and his lobbyist business. The judge left the rest of the indictment in place, however, including the larger charges of obstruction of justice and false statements.

Shadegg's Memo Stokes Fight On Pork (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, June 13, 2006

A leading fiscal conservative in the House has stoked debate over pork by circulating a newspaper story linking Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) to "the inherent risk of corruption at the heart of the congressional earmark process."

Rep. John Shadegg (R-Ariz.), who ran for the majority leadership on a platform of fiscal retrenchment, sent reelection supporters an opinion piece on the federal investigation surrounding the House Appropriations Committee chairman.

To build momentum for reform, he wrote, "The debate continues on earmark reform … and, in my ongoing effort to illustrate the potential for abuse in the congressional spending process, created by unlimited earmarks, you may find the following commentary by John Fund at the Wall Street Journal informative."

A potential investigation of Lewis, one of his staff members and a lobbying firm with close ties to the lawmaker have thus become grist for internecine fights and policy disputes among members of the GOP conference.

The Journal piece condenses newspaper reports about connections among Lewis, a political action committee run by his stepdaughter and the lobbying firm of a close friend and former colleague.

Faced with mounting questions, Lewis is being represented by lawyers from the California-based firm of Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher. Rob Bonner, a former U.S. attorney, and Joe Warin, in the firm's Washington office, have taken the lead. His lawyers have brought in Barbara Comstock of Blank Rome Government Relations to handle press inquiries. Comstock assisted former Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) after he was indicted in Texas on campaign-finance charges.

Lewis denies wrongdoing, and his Republican colleagues appeared to support him last week. House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) backed him during a televised press briefing Thursday, and a handful of Republicans interviewed said they had seen no sign that members would pressure him to step aside.

The questions surrounding Lewis, his staff and the lobbying firm, Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White, are not directly connected to the bitter dispute between conservatives and Appropriations Committee members over earmarks, the special projects inserted into the annual spending bills.

But some conservatives argue that the news stories refocus attention on reform just as the guilty pleas of former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) and disgraced Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff fade from the headlines.

The Shadegg e-mail sets up a potentially rancorous debate this week on the House floor over an appropriations bill to fund the Departments of Transportation, the Treasury and Housing and Urban Development (TTHUD).

Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas), who handles budget and spending issues for the conservative Republican Study Committee (RSC), circulated a newsletter last week to RSC colleagues questioning whether outlays listed in the bill were a legitimate reallocation of taxpayer money. The outlays come from unspent highway money allocated in prior legislation; therefore, the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) does not recognize them as savings. The money was redistributed so that the spending bill would not exceed its preset price tag under the budget.

"It strikes me as a budget gimmick," Hensarling said. While he concedes that this accounting method "comports with budget rules," it "breaks with the spirit" of those laws.

Because the bill does not violate budget rules, conservatives in the House cannot raise procedural objections to it or its sections and must vote against the rule for the bill, offer an amendment to reduce the $2.3 billion listed as "un-obligated balances," or vote against the bill itself.

Debate is expected to begin today, and RSC members had not decided on a strategy by press time yesterday. Rule votes are often the best opportunity for Republicans to derail legislation because Democrats usually oppose the rule en masse.

Appropriators argue that offsets are commonly used to fund projects in other bills and that RSC members have proposed similar reallocations in the past to fund previous spending bills.

"CBO says we're at our budget, and that's the end of the discussion," said Appropriations Committee spokesman John Scofield.

Appropriations members have already vowed to fight any move to strip spending from the bill. "I'm not going to take their crap," Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.) said last week. The Illinois appropriator said he included several projects for his district and would fight to keep them all.

DOJ_NMG_0033167

"They think they've gotten a little steam building, and we're going to have to shoot them down," LaHood said. He ripped RSC members this year on the House floor for successfully stripping $507 million in construction projects from a military spending bill.

In addition to fighting over outlays, Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) is expected to introduce amendments to block several earmarks, as he did on other appropriations bills this year.

The complete list of those projects was not yet available by press time, but it included $500,000 to the city of Yucaipa, Calif., "for the design and construction of a multipurpose athletic facility at Crafton Hills College" and $1.5 million for construction of a William Faulkner Museum at the University of Mississippi in Oxford, Miss., where the author attended college.

With stories about Cunningham and Abramoff on the decline, stories surrounding Lewis are driving reform, two conservative Republicans said last week on the condition of anonymity.

Boehner publicly supports sweeping earmark reform, and his office included it as part of a report on oversight expected to be released today. The leader and House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) promised Republicans on the Appropriations Committee that they would not bring a lobbying reform bill to the floor that does not apply the earmark language to each of the authorizing and tax committees.

The Speaker is expected to name conferees this week. They will work out the details of broader earmark reforms with Senate conferees, Boehner spokesman Kevin Madden said yesterday.

Asked whether press reports about the chairman's connection with lobbyists seeking projects from his committee had any effect on the passage of appropriations bills this year, LaHood said, "It hasn't so far. … The committee is working together."

Texas Death Penalty Case Headed For Possible Fourth Trial (AP)

By Michael Graczyk, Associated Press

AP, June 13, 2006

One of the longest and most contentious death penalty cases in Texas is heading back for yet another trial.

The U.S. Supreme Court, acting Monday on an appeal from the Texas Attorney General's Office, refused to reinstate the death sentence of Johnny Paul Penry, clearing the way for another jury to consider punishment for a fourth time. Penry was convicted of raping and fatally stabbing a woman at her home in Livingston in 1979.

Penry turned 50 last month and has spent more than half of his life on death row for the slaying of 22-year-old Pamela Moseley Carpenter. He confessed to attacking the woman and stabbing her with scissors, but his attorneys have contended Penry, who says he believes in Santa Claus, has the reasoning capacity of a 7-year-old.

While psychological tests have put Penry's IQ between 50 and 60, at least five juries have found Penry to be legally competent to stand trial or have rejected defenses based on mental retardation. The high court in 2002 ruled mentally retarded people, generally considered having an IQ below 70, may not be executed.

The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals last October, in a 5-4 ruling, sent Penry's death sentence back for another punishment hearing, citing what judges said were improper instructions that prevented jurors from considering the full scope of Penry's retardation claims. It was that decision the attorney general's office appealed to the high court.

"That's good news for us," said John Wright, of Huntsville, who has been one of Penry's lawyers since the beginning of his case. "We're looking at another trial — if we can't settle it. And I would think by now we could."

"There have been so many disappointments in regard to this case, you kind of become conditioned to adversity," said William Lee Hon, the Polk County assistant prosecutor who has been handling the case for more than two decades. "So you take these blows as they come, and you do the best you can."

Hon said he was anticipating Penry's lawyers would suggest an agreement to a sentence less than death to avoid another trial but said there were "a whole lot of considerations to look at" before deciding for a fourth time to seek a death sentence.

"The parole eligibility is huge and he might very well be parole eligible," Hon said. "Is there any guarantee to keep him in prison if we choose to seek a life sentence? I don't know. That's one of the big questions to resolve in the process."

He also said the relatives of the victim, whose brother is former Washington Redskins kicker Mark Moseley, would be consulted.

DOJ_NMG_0033168

Penry was on parole about three months after serving two years of a five-year rape conviction when he was arrested for the 1979 attack on Carpenter, who lived long enough to identify him as her assailant.

He was arrested later that day and has been in custody since. He's among the longest-serving of the 399 inmates on death row in Texas.

"Why don't they just lock me up and throw away the key," Penry told The Associated Press in 2001. "That's all I want."

In 2000, he got within about three hours of execution when the justices halted the punishment.

The Supreme Court first agreed to hear Penry's case in 1988, and the following year overturned his death sentence on 5-4 vote. In that same decision, justices clashed over whether mentally retarded people can be executed. More than decade later, in a North Carolina case, justices took the issue up again and barred capital punishment for retarded killers.

Penry was resentenced to death and in 2001 the Supreme Court on a 6-3 vote voided that death sentence too. Both times the high court reasoned the jury was not allowed to properly weigh Penry's alleged retardation.

A new trial in 2002 led to the death sentence that was reversed last year by the Court of Criminal Appeals.

Hon said depending on the court's schedule, it was possible a new punishment trial could be held by late this year. Wright speculated a trial wasn't likely until next year.

U Of U Professor Knows Location Of Documents FBI Wants (KSL-TV)

By Jon Dunn

KSL-TV, June 13, 2006

Over the last few months, the FBI has turned to Jack Anderson's papers — papers the deceased investigative journalist amassed over the years in his work. KSL Newsradio has learned that thousands of pages of those documents are right here in Salt Lake City.

University of Utah Professor Tim Chambless befriended Anderson over the years, and has built his own collection of papers by writing about the columnist.

"The FBI was informed by the Anderson family that I was a person who knew more than anyone else," Chambless says.

Chambless says when FBI Director Robert Mueller visited Salt Lake City last week, he wanted to come clean about his six boxes full of papers, and wanted to tell the bureau why it will never see them.

"I believe in the First Amendment. Jack Anderson believed in the First Amendment," Chambless says.

Chambless sent a letter through his lawyer to Mueller, asking him to announce the end of the pursuit of the papers. Attorney Pat Shea says the papers are now hidden where no one will find them.

Utahn Keeps Watch Over Jack Anderson Papers (DESERET)

By Ben Winslow, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, June 13, 2006

U. professor fends off FBI's efforts to obtain documents

Six boxes of Jack Anderson's papers that a University of Utah professor has been keeping are safe from the FBI's reach for now.

Michael Brandy, Deseret Morning News

University of Utah professor Tim Chambless has given collection of Jack Anderson's papers to attorney Pat Shea, in the background. The FBI wants the papers of the late muckraking journalist because it believes some of the documents in the collection contain classified information dealing with national security.

University of Utah political science professor Tim Chambless, who wrote a dissertation on Anderson, has collected the documents for years. Anderson, who died last year at 83, gave him many of the documents.

Initially, Chambless provided the FBI with a catalog of what the papers said. Now, he fears the FBI may come with subpoenas demanding everything.

His worry that he might be asked to provide more information came after the FBI contacted the Anderson family this spring, wanting to look at approximately 200 boxes of the journalist's papers at George Washington University in Washington, D.C. During a congressional hearing last week, Anderson's son said his family would defy an FBI subpoena.

In Utah, Chambless took a similar stance, and his lawyer fired off a letter Monday to FBI Director Robert Mueller, telling him to back off.

"The Anderson papers Professor Chambless has will not be released to any third parties, including the FBI," Pat Shea wrote in the letter. During a news conference at his law office, Shea said Chambless had given him the boxes.

Chambless said he just wants to continue writing a book about Anderson and the many government scandals he uncovered.

"I share with Jack Anderson a strong view of the First Amendment," Chambless said.

Chambless said nothing in the documents threatens American national security. He suggested the FBI wanted them because "political security" was threatened.

"Certainly administrations would prefer not to have their mistakes made known to the working press," Chambless said. Some have suggested the Anderson papers are a stepping stone for a Bush administration crackdown on reporters who publish classified documents and refuse to reveal sources.

While in Utah last week, Mueller denied those accusations.

"We're trying to determine whether or not national security would be adversely impacted by the disclosure of these documents. That's our sole intent," he said on Wednesday. "I hardly think that is an assault on the press."

Supreme Court Allows Fresh Evidence In Death Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Toni Locy, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 13, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-A death-row inmate can use DNA evidence to attempt to show his innocence 20 years after he was convicted of murdering a neighbor, the Supreme Court ruled Monday.

The high court's decision is significant because numerous exonerations in recent years of death-row and other criminal defendants through DNA testing have raised concerns among civil libertarians, prosecutors and Supreme Court Justice John Paul Stevens that an innocent person may be executed, or already has been.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, writing for the court, said the evidence in the case was a "close" call for a jury. But he said that inmate Paul Gregory House could proceed with a lawsuit in federal court claiming innocence for the murder of Carolyn Muncey, a young mother of two, in the state of Tennessee in July 1985.

Twenty years after his conviction, DNA testing revealed that semen found on the murder victim's nightgown and underwear belonged to her husband, not House.

"This is not a case of conclusive exoneration," Kennedy wrote on behalf of himself and four other justices.

Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas dissented. Justice Samuel Alito did not participate in the case because it was argued before he joined the high court.

Kennedy said jurors could find reasonable doubt because DNA evidence points to Muncey's husband as a suspect and because small blood stains found on House's jeans may have spilled on the pants from vials of blood taken from Muncey during an autopsy.

House, who was on parole for a sex offense in Utah, was convicted of luring Muncey from her home by telling her that her husband, Hubert, had been hurt in a car accident. Her body was found the next afternoon in an area where witnesses had seen House.

His original lawyer failed to locate several witnesses who said years later that Hubert Muncey had abused his wife, had fought with her the night of her murder and had confessed later to killing her.

Supreme Court Allows Challenges To Lethal Injections (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 13, 2006

In a pair of opinions written by Justice Anthony Kennedy, the Supreme Court on Monday kept alive the appeals of death row inmates in Florida and Tennessee, adding new fuel to the debate over the death penalty.

DOJ_NMG_0033170

In the Florida case, Hill v. McDonough, the Court ruled unanimously that inmate Clarence Hill is entitled to challenge the state's lethal injection method as a Section 1983 federal civil rights action, rather than being limited to the more restricted habeas corpus route. But the Court, citing the interest of the state and crime victims in "timely enforcement of a sentence," cautioned that its ruling should not be read to encourage automatic stays or long delays in executions.

In the Tennessee decision, House v. Bell, unusual for its extensive discussion of the trial evidence, a more divided Court said that DNA evidence offered by defendant Paul House years after his conviction entitled him to habeas review in federal court.

Both rulings were hailed by death penalty critics, and both highlighted Kennedy's pivotal role in the new Roberts Court. In the House case the vote was 5-3, with Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. and Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas in dissent. Justice Samuel Alito Jr. did not participate because the case was argued before he joined the Court.

Peter Neufeld, co-director of the Innocence Project, said that House "recognizes that scientific advances have transformed our criminal justice system and must be weighed heavily in determining whether innocent people have been wrongly convicted." The ruling, the first dealing directly with DNA evidence as a factor in reopening a death penalty case, will have a broad impact, Neufeld said.

The Hill decision, though not a ruling for or against lethal injections, may hasten the day when the Supreme Court will consider one of a growing number of claims that the combination of drugs used in lethal injections can cause excruciating pain, violating the Eighth Amendment bar against "cruel and unusual punishments." In May, however, the Court denied review in a Tennessee case that would have presented the issue directly.

Lethal injections, required in 19 states and available in 37 of 38 death penalty states, came into vogue in the past decade as a more humane method than electrocution. But human rights groups have questioned that premise in recent years, and during oral argument in the Hill case, Justice John Paul Stevens noted that veterinary groups have deemed the method as too cruel to use in euthanizing pets.

In the procedure the inmate is injected with three drugs in sequence that first lead to rapid unconsciousness, then muscle paralysis of the lungs and diaphragm, and, finally, cardiac arrest. Critics say that if the initial anesthetic does not take hold quickly enough, the inmate can suffer extreme pain and a feeling of suffocation.

Clarence Hill, convicted of murder in 1983, has challenged his death sentence ever since, with some success -- it was vacated twice. But in 1995 the Florida Supreme Court reimposed the death penalty. He kept appealing, and when Florida adopted lethal injections in 2000, Hill filed requests seeking details on the chemicals and the procedure to be used. He finally sued under Section 1983, but state and federal courts ruled that it was the functional equivalent of a successive habeas petition, which is foreclosed under existing law.

Kennedy's ruling reversed the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Because it is a challenge to the specific method of execution, not an attack on the sentence itself, Kennedy said it could proceed under Section 1983. Noting that other lethal injection methods are possible, Kennedy wrote that "Hill's action if successful would not necessarily prevent the state from executing him by lethal injection." Some states have developed different procedures and sequences for administering the drugs.

In House v. Bell, the defendant has also been claiming innocence and challenging his conviction for more than 20 years. At his trial, the prosecution used blood and semen evidence to connect House with the rape and murder of Carolyn Muncey.

After failing in several post-conviction appeals, House won a hearing in federal court to determine if his case fell into an "actual innocence" exception that allows further appeals that ordinarily would be procedurally barred. Using modern DNA evidence and other testimony, House alleged that the victim's husband committed the murder. The 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals returned the case to Tennessee courts for further review. The Tennessee Supreme Court declined, and on further review the 6th Circuit upheld the denial of habeas relief.

Kennedy's majority opinion said that House's case fits under the rule announced in the 1995 case Schlup v. Delo, which allows innocence claims to reopen appeals if, in light of new evidence, "it is more likely than not that no reasonable juror would have found petitioner guilty."

After assessing the new evidence, Kennedy concluded that "this is not a case of conclusive exoneration." But because the new evidence called into question the blood and semen testimony, the Schlup standard was met. But he said House's case does not rise to the level of another precedent, Herrera v. Collins, which lays out procedures for handling "truly persuasive" innocence claims.

DOJ_NMG_0033171

Roberts' dissent agreed with the majority on the Herrera issue but argued that despite the new evidence, "the case against House remains substantially unaltered from the case presented to the jury." As a result, Roberts said, the Schlup standard is not met because "I do not find it probable that no reasonable juror would vote to convict him."

Widening The Gateway (WP)

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

OF ALL THE cases of possibly innocent people in state prisons, Paul House's hardly seems the most compelling. Convicted and sentenced to die in Tennessee for the murder of a woman two decades ago, Mr. House has mustered some considerable new evidence suggesting his innocence. But his claim is hardly overpowering. Ironically, that is exactly what makes the Supreme Court's decision yesterday allowing federal review of his conviction significant.

Oftentimes, serious legal deficiencies in state convictions, including capital convictions, escape federal review because of technical errors that prevented them from being raised in state courts first. Normally, the federal courts' attitude is that this is the inmate's tough luck. In recent years, however, the courts have acknowledged that in cases where an inmate has a particularly strong claim of innocence, those procedural barriers sometimes have to give way to prevent a miscarriage of justice. Yet clearing this hurdle requires an especially demanding showing -- so in practice, it doesn't offer much hope. The question in Mr. House's case was whether his showing of innocence was strong enough to let him proceed with a challenge that would otherwise be barred. The court voted 5 to 3 that it was.

Mr. House's claim seems powerful on its face. He has produced DNA evidence that semen stains left on the victim's clothing were not his but her husband's. He has offered indications that the victim's blood left on his pants might be the result of lab spillage, and not from the crime scene. And two witnesses have come forward -- years after the fact -- alleging that the victim's husband confessed to the crime. Yet as Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. argued in dissent -- joined by Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas -- significant evidence of Mr. House's guilt remains, and the judge who considered his new evidence up close did not find it persuasive. In other words, to let Mr. House into court, the justices have had to widen significantly the gateway for review in such cases.

But this is not, as the dissenters imply, a problem; rather, it is a good development and overdue. It does not mean that inmates will go free on inconclusive showings of innocence; Mr. House still has a long way to go to get his conviction overturned. It means only that inmates who can raise a serious factual question about their guilt should have a somewhat easier time getting into the courthouse in the first place. Given how many innocents have been wrongly convicted and later freed from death row and lengthy prison terms, opening the door for review makes a great deal of sense.

Lifesaving Evidence (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

EVEN MANY SUPPORTERS OF capital punishment probably assume that a death row inmate is guaranteed another day in court if new evidence, especially DNA evidence, emerges that undermines the original case against him. Until Monday, they would have been wrong.

That was when the Supreme Court, by a 5-3 vote, ordered a federal district judge to provide a new habeas corpus hearing for Paul G. House, a Tennessee man who was sentenced to death in the 1985 kidnapping and murder of a young mother. Unlike some of the court's fact-specific death penalty decisions, this one could have wide application as more convicted defendants seek exoneration through DNA evidence. That's because the decision requires a judge considering a convicted defendant's habeas corpus petition to view the jury deliberations at his trial as part of a "holistic" process — one in which one sort of evidence affects how a jury views other evidence.

In asking jurors to sentence House to death, prosecutors suggested that he had sexually assaulted Carolyn Muncey and then killed her because she resisted or because he wanted to cover up his deed. But later, DNA testing indicated that semen found on Muncey's nightgown did not come from House.

DOJ_NMG_0033172

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy's majority opinion calls the belated DNA evidence a "new disclosure of central importance" in the way jurors would look at the case. In a 1995 case, the high court ruled that prisoners who otherwise had exhausted their appeals could pursue a writ of habeas corpus if, in light of new evidence, it was more probable than not that "no juror, acting reasonably, would have voted to find him guilty beyond a reasonable doubt." House met that test, Kennedy concluded.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., joined in dissent by justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, disagreed. "The question," Roberts wrote, "is not whether House was prejudiced at his trial because the jurors were not aware of the new evidence but whether all the evidence, considered together, proves that House was actually innocent, so that no reasonable juror would vote to convict him."

At first glance, the outcome of this case — while obviously good news for House — might seem to offer little encouragement to other death row inmates seeking to challenge their convictions. After all, both Kennedy and Roberts purported to be applying the same legal standard to a specific set of facts. But Kennedy's "holistic" approach sends a clear signal to lower-court judges: Henceforth, they must take a generous view of the way new evidence, scientific and otherwise, might undermine convictions.

From now on, a defendant need not offer evidence disputing each piece of evidence offered against him. It will be enough to cast doubt on information that affected how jurors weighed the credibility of nonscientific evidence. For example, if a juror believes that flawed DNA evidence establishes a defendant's presence at a murder scene, she is more likely to credit an eyewitness identification.

Welcome as this decision is, the best way to prevent unjust impositions of the death penalty is to do away with capital punishment altogether, as other civilized societies have done. Unfortunately, as the Supreme Court grows ever more uneasy with the death penalty, elected officials agitate ever more aggressively for it.

Death Row Inmates Can Pursue Appeals (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir

Financial Times, June 13, 2006

The US Supreme Court on Monday chipped away at the edifice of capital punishment in America, issuing two rulings that give prisoners on death row more power to challenge their sentences.

In one case, the court ruled that a Tennessee man should get a second chance to prove his innocence, since DNA and other evidence cast serious doubt on whether he was guilty. The second case gave death-row inmates more avenues to challenge and possibly delay their execution, by using civil rights laws.

"Today's decisions are further evidence of the Supreme Court's increasing discomfort with many aspects of the death penalty system and further evidence of the growing national concern about executing innocent people by mistake," the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) said.

In recent years, the court has issued several rulings reining in the administration of the death penalty. Several rulings have dealt with the problem of incompetent counsel and racial bias by juries. The court has also issued controversial rulings abolishing the death penalty for juveniles and the mentally retarded.

The rulings come amid a marked decline in US executions. "Prosecutors aren't seeking [the death penalty] as often, juries aren't imposing it as often. Certainly, everybody is giving it a second look," says Ron Weich, a death penalty specialist who is senior counsel to Harry Reid, the top Democrat in the Senate. He predicts a "gradual withering away" of capital punishment over time.

Monday's DNA case, which was decided 5-3 in the Supreme Court, was a "rare case where – had the jury heard all the conflicting testimony – it is more likely than not that no reasonable juror would have found the petitioner guilty beyond a reasonable doubt", Justice Anthony Kennedy wrote for the majority. Chief Justice John Roberts dissented.

The Tennessee man, Paul Gregory House, was convicted of murdering a woman in 1986. But DNA evidence now proves that semen stains on her clothing did not come from him, and incriminating bloodstains may have been planted. But the court did not order him immediately freed: Mr House will have to pursue his claims before a federal district court, which could find that there are other procedural hurdles to his release.

DOJ_NMG_0033173

Stephen Kissinger, Mr House's attorney, welcomed the ruling, saying it "gives a road map" to other prisoners who want to challenge their convictions. He called on the Tennessee governor to grant clemency to Mr House, since he is gravely ill, and further legal proceedings could take years.

In the other case, decided unanimously, the court gave death-row inmates another avenue to challenge lethal injection, the method used by almost all death penalty states. Inmates who have exhausted their usual appeals can use federal civil rights law to challenge this method, which medical studies have shown may inflict severe and unnecessary pain.

The ruling made it relatively hard to bring such challenges and did not answer the underlying question of whether lethal injection executions are constitutional.

High Court Rulings Chip At Death Penalty (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — In two death-penalty cases Monday, the Supreme Court opened the door to new challenges of state lethal injection methods and ruled that a Tennessee prisoner offering DNA evidence that he might be innocent should get a new hearing.

The latter case, decided by a 5-3 vote over a dissent by Chief Justice John Roberts, was the court's first ruling involving DNA testing, which has been used to exonerate scores of prisoners in recent years. The ruling was focused narrowly on the Tennessee inmate's case. But supporters of DNA testing programs, including the New York-based Innocence Project, took it as a signal that the court's majority is open to prisoners using new scientific evidence to appeal their cases from death row.

Both decisions were written by Justice Anthony Kennedy, who is at the ideological center of the divided, nine-member court and has seen his profile increased by the retirement of moderate Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. The rulings also reinforced a trend in which the court has tried to ensure states have adequate safeguards in imposing the death penalty.

Voting 9-0, the court allowed inmates who have exhausted their regular appeals to invoke a civil rights law to challenge the drugs and procedures used for injection. That execution method, used by almost all of the 38 states that allow capital punishment, has been targeted in lawsuits as "cruel and unusual punishment" that should be deemed unconstitutional.

In Monday's case, Clarence Hill, who was convicted in the shooting death of a police officer in Pensacola, Fla., in 1983, asserts that the three-drug cocktail Florida uses in executions could cause needless pain. Hill says inmates may not be fully anesthetized before the last drug — potassium chloride — is administered to stop the heart.

The justices reversed an appeals court ruling that denied Hill's claim. That court said it was an improper challenge to the constitutionality of his sentence, rather than a civil rights claim.

The justices did not address the merits of arguments against lethal injections. Kennedy said the decision allowing Hill a hearing should not lead judges to routinely postpone executions of prisoners who challenge lethal injection.

The more divisive ruling linked to DNA evidence permits Paul Gregory House, who was convicted of the 1985 murder of a neighbor, to go before a U.S. judge to assert that his trial was constitutionally flawed. Based on new scientific evidence and witness testimony that House says cast suspicion on the victim's husband, the court said jurors likely would not have found House guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

The justices reversed a ruling that had barred House from bringing a claim that his trial lawyer was ineffective, because House had exhausted his regular appeals. Kennedy said House qualified for an exception to the usual rules based on his possible innocence. If House is successful in arguing that his case was constitutionally flawed because of ineffective counsel, he could get a new trial.

Dissenting in the House case were Roberts and Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. They noted that a lower-court judge who had reviewed the new information found that it did not sufficiently undermine "the larger web of evidence" against House. Justice Samuel Alito, who was not on the court when the case was argued in January, did not participate.

Supreme Court Assists Death Row Challengers (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033174

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court opened the doors of the federal courts today to state death row inmates who wish to challenge their convictions based on new DNA evidence or to claim that a poorly administered lethal injection would cause them great pain.

The court's two rulings were narrow and procedural, and they are not likely to affect a large number of convicted murderers. In neither case did the justices say the inmate deserved to win. Rather, they said only that his claim deserved a full hearing.

Nonetheless, the high court made it clear again that the death penalty was special and said federal judges should reopen old cases when "new reliable evidence" raises real doubts about the defendant's guilt.

DNA evidence has already freed scores of prisoners, including some who were on death row. Lawyers for the New York-based Innocence Project predicted today's ruling would have a broad national impact by removing a barrier to having some of these cases heard in federal court.

In the past decade, Congress and the Supreme Court have all but barred federal judges from reopening the cases of long-serving state prisoners.

The court announced two exceptions to that rule today: one for powerful new evidence and the other involving the method of carrying out an execution.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy delivered both decisions for the court. With the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, he has assumed the center spot when the court is closely split along ideological lines.

The DNA case was decided on a 5-3 vote, with new Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. in dissent.

In 1986, Paul House, a paroled rapist and a newcomer to a rural east Tennessee town, was convicted of abducting and murdering a neighbor woman, and he was sentenced to die. But DNA tests a decade later showed the semen stains on her nightgown had come from her husband, not from House, as the jury was told.

Kennedy said the new evidence did not prove House was innocent. He had lied about his whereabouts on the night of the murder, and blood stains from the victim were found on his jeans.

Still, he said, the DNA evidence undercut the prosecution's claim that House had sexually assaulted the victim. "We conclude that this is the rare case where — had the jury heard all the conflicting testimony — it is more likely than not that no reasonable juror" would have voted to convict House, Kennedy said.

In the second case, Kennedy spoke for a unanimous court in saying federal judges should hear claims that a lethal injection may cause an excruciating death if officials do not use a sufficient amount of anesthesia.

Last year, the Lancet, the British medical journal, published a study by four doctors who said some executed men may felt intense, burning pain from the drugs that contracted the muscles of their lungs and heart because they were not given enough of the anesthetic, sodium pentothal.

In response, lawyers for inmates facing execution cited the study and urged judges to intervene. Some did so. U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel in San Jose stopped the execution of Michael Morales and scheduled a hearing for the fall to review California's method of carrying out lethal executions.

Other federal judges said they were barred from reopening these state cases on the eve of an execution.

In today's decision, the high court agreed a federal judge in Florida may hold a hearing to consider the claims of Clarence Hill that another mixture of drugs should be used for his execution.

Kennedy stressed that Hill was not challenging the state's plan to execute him, only its method of doing so.

High Court Keeps Door Open To Death-penalty Lawsuits (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON

Death-row inmates can rely on civil rights law to challenge the use of lethal injection in their executions, even after they have exhausted all their allowable appeals.

In a 9-0 decision announced Monday, the US Supreme Court left the door propped open for a significant number of condemned prisoners to sue to force an examination of whether lethal injection is a humane method of capital punishment.

Such method-of-execution suits have become the most active area of capital punishment litigation in recent years. Many states and the Bush administration had expressed concern that to allow such challenges might create another layer of delay in carrying out executions.

The case, Hill v. McDonough, did not test the constitutionality of lethal injection. Instead, it raised a technical issue: whether such legal challenges had to be filed under the more restrictive habeas statute or could be pursued as a civil rights matter. The high court said inmates could file appeals under the civil rights law.

Writing for the court, Justice Anthony Kennedy said such civil rights suits are different from habeas suits in cases involving the death penalty because they challenge only the way an execution is carried out, not the merits of the underlying conviction.

"Any incidental delay caused by allowing [the death row inmate] to file suit does not cast on his sentence the kind of negative legal implication that would require him to proceed in a habeas action," Justice Kennedy writes.

But Kennedy also warned that the high court's ruling was not a license for death-row inmates to file last-minute challenges to stall an execution. "A stay of execution is an equitable remedy," Kennedy writes. "It is not available as a matter of right."

The decision comes in the case of Florida death-row inmate Clarence Hill, sentenced to die for the 1983 shooting death of a police officer. Hill had used up all his allowable appeals, but as his execution date drew nearer, he adopted a new strategy. Rather than challenging his conviction and death sentence, he sued under a federal civil rights statute challenging the constitutionality of Florida's use of lethal injection. Citing scientific studies, Hill argued that the state's procedure created an unreasonably high risk that he would suffer excruciating pain.

Justices Open Door For Injection Case (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

The Supreme Court gave the green light for a Florida death row inmate to challenge that state's lethal-injection procedures through a federal civil rights lawsuit, in a unanimous ruling that underscored the pivotal role of Justice Anthony M. Kennedy in the court's death-penalty jurisprudence.

Clarence E. Hill, convicted in 1982 of murdering a police officer, did not claim that lethal injection, in and of itself, is cruel and unusual punishment. Instead, he asserted that Florida's method of executing inmates -- which, like that of most other states, employs three chemicals in sequence -- could subject him to excruciating but undetected pain, in violation of his civil rights.

Earlier this year, an Atlanta-based federal appeals court threw out Hill's case, ruling that it was a disguised attack on his death sentence.

But in a 10-page opinion written by Kennedy, the court said Hill's suit was a good-faith challenge that might delay his execution without "necessarily" foreclosing it, because the state has other lethal-injection options. The court sent the case back to the lower courts to rule on the merits of Hill's claim.

The narrow ruling, which Kennedy said hinged on the circumstances of Hill's case, was something of an anticlimax to one of the most closely watched cases of the term. It did not settle the legal question that has divided the courts for years and that the justices seemingly set out to address: whether, and under what circumstances, inmates generally can use civil rights law to challenge states' methods of execution.

Still, legal analysts said the ruling would help death penalty opponents. It left open a legal option for death row inmates that states, with the apparent support of conservatives on the Supreme Court, have long been eager to shut. Opponents of method-of-execution challenges argue that inmates can pursue them indefinitely, postponing execution forever.

"It's discouraging," said Kevin C. Newsom, solicitor general of Alabama, which supported Florida in the case. "The floodgates are, to a certain extent, open."

At the same time, Kennedy warned that "federal courts can and should protect States from dilatory or speculative suits." He offered little guidance on how lower courts should evaluate Hill's claim, leaving room for conservative federal courts in the South, where the death penalty is concentrated, to continue denying stays of execution based on alleged constitutional problems with lethal injection, legal analysts said.

DOJ_NMG_0033176

At oral arguments on April 26, the justices seemed deeply divided along ideological lines. The court's four liberal members emphasized the risk of pain to inmates and the need to give them a day in court to prevent it. Its four conservatives suggested that inmates would use repeated lethal-injection challenges to evade execution.

Kennedy, an appointee of President Ronald Reagan who usually votes with the conservatives but has often sided with the liberals on social issues, did not tip his hand.

Yesterday's ruling may have been unanimous because it effectively papered over these differences, offering a little something for everyone on the court. In recent weeks, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. has spoken publicly of the need for the court to speak with a single voice on controversial issues, even if that means it must rule narrowly.

And the court seems unlikely to return to the issue soon. It recently turned down a lethal-injection appeal by a Tennessee death row inmate that did not pose procedural issues as Hill's did, but directly challenged lethal injection in that state as cruel and unusual punishment.

Kennedy's decisive role was more obvious in yesterday's other death penalty case, House v. Bell , No. 04-8990, in which he also wrote the majority opinion.

Voting 5 to 3, the court gave Paul Gregory House of Tennessee a new chance to challenge the fairness of his 1986 capital murder trial because DNA tests and other new evidence have created doubt that he is guilty.

Liberals Stephen G. Breyer, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, David H. Souter and John Paul Stevens joined Kennedy. Roberts and fellow conservative Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas dissented. Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. did not vote because the court heard the case in January, before he joined the court.

If Kennedy had sided with the conservatives, the 4 to 4 tie would have affirmed a federal appeals court's ruling against House.

The court's ruling favored death penalty opponents, but not quite as much as they had hoped. House and his supporters had wanted the court to rule that death row inmates with particularly strong claims of innocence should be allowed to raise them in court even if they have no other legal claims or have exhausted their appeals.

But the court, leaving House's conviction and sentence intact, at least for now, refused to go that far. Kennedy noted that "this is not a case of conclusive exoneration" but rather a case in which House had raised new evidence that, taken together, makes it more likely than not that jurors would have reasonable doubt as to his guilt.

By meeting that standard, which the court set in a 1995 ruling, House won the right to a hearing in federal court on his claim that he was denied effective legal aid at trial.

Prisoners Gain In Suit Attacking Lethal Injection (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 12 — The Supreme Court opened the door Monday for death-row inmates to challenge the way most states carry out executions by lethal injection.

In its unanimous opinion, the court expressed no view on the constitutionality either of lethal injection in general or of the specific procedures and combination of chemicals that a Florida inmate, Clarence E. Hill, and numerous others around the country have recently challenged in federal court.

The justices addressed themselves solely to the procedural route that such lawsuits must take, and chose the route that is by far the more inmate-friendly from the two options that the case presented.

Nonetheless, it was the tight focus of the case, an appeal by Mr. Hill of a ruling by the federal appeals court in Atlanta, that probably enabled the justices to maintain their unanimity. It remains to be seen how they would rule on the underlying constitutional question of whether the disputed lethal injection method violates the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment.

DOJ_NMG_0033177

Just three weeks ago the court turned down, without comment, a case from Tennessee, Abdur'Rahman v. Bredesen, that presented that issue directly. The justices have also permitted several executions to be carried out by lethal injection, without intervening, while the Florida case was pending.

Federal courts around the country have begun wrestling with the issue, which opponents of the death penalty have brought to the fore in recent months on the basis of a report last year in a British medical journal, The Lancet.

The focus of concern is two of the three chemicals that make up the lethal cocktail used by most states. One is sodium pentothal, an anesthetic, which Mr. Hill argues in his lawsuit is insufficient to make the procedure painless.

The second is pancuronium bromide, which causes muscle paralysis but does not block pain or interfere with consciousness. Studies indicate that while inmates who receive this drug look calm and peaceful as the third chemical, potassium chloride, is administered to stop the heart, they can actually feel intense pain without being able to express themselves.

Mr. Hill's suit maintains that Florida's procedure for administering these three drugs presents a "foreseeable risk of gratuitous and unnecessary pain."

Having been convicted in 1983 of killing a police officer, Mr. Hill had long since run through the ordinary appeals process by the time he filed his suit in state court last December, with his execution set for Jan. 24. After the Florida courts threw the case out, and with the clock running, he turned to federal court with an equally poor result. He was strapped to a gurney, intravenous lines to administer the chemicals already inserted, when Justice Anthony M. Kennedy issued a stay nearly five months ago.

The case was filed under the Civil Rights Act of 1871, a Reconstruction-era law usually referred to as Section 1983, for its placement in the compilation of federal statutes. Section 1983 permits suits against government officials for violation of rights guaranteed by the Constitution or federal laws.

The lower federal courts dismissed the suit, however, on the ground that the only way for an inmate to challenge the method by which he is to be executed is through a petition for a writ of habeas corpus.

While such a petition, like a Section 1983 case, can raise constitutional issues, there is a major problem: both Congress and the Supreme Court have placed high hurdles in the path of inmates seeking habeas corpus. For example, it is almost impossible for an inmate who has filed an initial habeas corpus petition to receive permission to file another one, and Mr. Hill had filed one years earlier. Declaring that his Section 1983 suit was the equivalent of a new habeas corpus petition, the lower courts declared that it was barred.

In his opinion for the Supreme Court on Monday, Justice Kennedy said this analysis was mistaken. He said that while a habeas corpus petition was the only way to challenge the constitutionality of a sentence, Mr. Hill was challenging not his "lethal injection sentence as a general matter," but only the way in which the sentence was to be carried out.

Justice Kennedy noted that if Mr. Hill eventually won his case, Florida would not be barred from executing him by lethal injection but would simply have to use a different protocol.

Mr. Hill is now entitled to pursue his Section 1983 suit in the Federal District Court in Tallahassee, where he filed it in January.

When the case, Hill v. McDonough, No. 05-8794, was argued in April, there was considerable debate over whether Mr. Hill should be required to demonstrate his sincerity by specifying a method acceptable to him. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. was among the justices who appeared to endorse such a requirement. But the justices evidently decided to set that argument aside for now, for the sake of unanimity.

The precedent for the ruling on Monday was a 2004 decision in which the court permitted an inmate to use Section 1983 to challenge a surgical procedure that Alabama proposed to use to gain access to his collapsed veins for the purpose of administering a lethal injection.

A 'Right' Way To Kill Someone? (USAT)

By Annette Fuentes

USA Today, June 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033178

When North Carolina executed death row inmate John Daniels in 2003, his end was hardly quick and painless. His attorney later described the terrible scene she witnessed after Daniels received the lethal injections. Daniels started to convulse violently, then sat up and gagged. Witnesses watching through a window heard and saw him sit up and gag and choke again, his arms struggling to move. He appeared to be in pain until finally he lay down and was still.

The details of Daniels' execution and other similarly gruesome descriptions were included in a lawsuit challenging North Carolina's capital punishment method. Across the country, lethal injection executions are being challenged by death row inmates and their advocates as a violation of the Eighth Amendment's protection against cruel and unusual punishment.

On Monday, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that a death row inmate — in this case Clarence Hill in Florida — could file a last-minute appeal to lethal injections even after all regular appeals have been exhausted. The court, however, did not rule on the use of injections.

Other executions stayed

In addition to Hill's case, nine other executions have been stayed this year because of the lethal injection issue, according to Richard Dieter of the Death Penalty Information Center, a group opposed to capital punishment. And in California, federal courts have effectively imposed a moratorium on the death penalty while that state studies the issue.

The heightened debate about lethal injections, which are used in 37 states, raises a larger question: Can there ever be a right way to execute someone?

Doctors have played a large role in the debate. A study in the medical journal Lancet found that "methods of lethal injection anesthesia are flawed, and some inmates might experience awareness and suffering during execution."

Lethal injections usually use a three-drug combination: sodium thiopental, an anesthesia to induce unconsciousness, pancuronium bromide to cause paralysis and potassium chloride to stop the heart. If the anesthesia isn't administered in a sufficient dose, the person could be conscious when the painful final shot is given.

In the Lancet study, the physicians reviewed blood tests from 49 inmates executed in Arizona, Georgia, North Carolina and South Carolina and found that in 43, the anesthesia level was lower than that used for surgery. In 21 instances, the amount of anesthesia was "consistent with awareness." The authors concluded, "It is possible that some of these inmates were fully aware during their executions. We certainly cannot conclude that these inmates were unconscious and insensate. However, with no monitoring and with use of the paralytic agent, any suffering of the inmate would be undetectable."

But here's a Catch-22 for states. The best person to guarantee that an inmate is fully unconscious is a physician, who must follow the Hippocratic oath to "do no harm." The American Medical Association's ethical guidelines prohibit physicians from participating in executions, except to pronounce death afterward.

A California judge stumbled on this problem in the case of death row inmate Michael Morales, who challenged his lethal injection execution on the ground that it violates the Eighth Amendment. U.S. District Court Judge Jeremy Fogel ordered the state to employ two anesthesiologists. But the doctors refused to participate. Morales' execution has been put on hold until a September hearing.

The debate about lethal injections and doctors' role might pose important medical questions about the least painful method to kill a human. But, in the end, no method can be humane. While the doctors' revolt against assisting in executions is worthy, it should only serve to spotlight the barbarity of the death penalty.

Moratorium stirred reviews

Six years ago, then-Illinois governor George Ryan made headlines by imposing a moratorium on executions after revelations that innocent people were on death row in his state. Ryan's action deserves to be front and center again in our public discussion of crime and punishment. When the Illinois moratorium was enacted, it caused many states to reconsider their death penalty laws. New Jersey now has a moratorium. Kansas' death penalty law was declared unconstitutional. Americans reacted viscerally to the idea that innocent people could not only be imprisoned for crimes they didn't commit, they could also be executed for them.

According to the federal Bureau of Justice Statistics, the number of death sentences imposed each year has dropped dramatically from 1999 through 2004 — from 276 to 125. One reason is juries are giving more life sentences. Our collective appetite for retribution has diminished. Public support for capital punishment has plummeted from 80% in 1994 to 65% this year, according to a Gallup poll.

DOJ_NMG_0033179

With Monday's Supreme Court ruling, more states will grapple with the constitutionality of lethal injections. Just as the Ryan moratorium and the innocence issue exposed one weakness of the death penalty system, lethal injections have spotlighted yet another.

It seems inevitable, and just, that slowly but surely capital punishment will come tumbling down under the weight of its own injustices, uselessness and immorality.

Annette Fuentes is adjunct professor at the Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism.

Ex-FBI Agent Tells Of '81 Probe (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, June 13, 2006

Agency was wary of Bulger, he says

A retired FBI official who has been critical of the agency's handling of gangsters James ``Whitey'' Bulger and Stephen ``The Rifleman'' Flemmi testified yesterday that the FBI coined a phrase for agents who got too cozy with their informants: ``Going native.''

Robert Fitzpatrick , who taught a course for FBI agents on the psychology of informants, said ``going native'' is when an agent becomes friends with an informant, loses objectivity, and ``might be sharing information they shouldn't.''

In fact, Fitzpatrick said, when he arrived as second-in-command of the FBI's Boston office in 1981, there was a high-level, internal investigation underway into whether Bulger's FBI handlers had leaked him information that compromised a State Police investigation of Bulger and other underworld leaders.

Fitzpatrick wasn't asked whether there were concerns in the FBI in the 1980s that Bulger's handlers were ``going native.''

Fitzpatrick was called to testify yesterday in US District Court in Boston in a $50 million wrongful death suit that the family of Quincy fisherman John McIntyre has filed against the government. He's expected to resume testifying today. McIntyre's mother, Emily, and brother, Christopher, assert the government was negligent because of the FBI's mishandling of Bulger and Flemmi.

Last week, Flemmi testified that he and Bulger killed McIntyre on Nov. 30, 1984, because their handler, former FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr., warned them that McIntyre was cooperating against them. McIntyre had been involved in an unsuccessful plot by Bulger and his associates to ship seven tons of weapons to the outlawed Irish Republican Army and began cooperating with the US Customs Service and the FBI about six weeks before his slaying.

Connolly is serving a 10-year sentence for his 2002 racketeering conviction. He was found guilty of warning Bulger to flee just before the gangster's 1995 indictment on racketeering and extortion charges. Bulger remains a fugitive.

Fitzpatrick, who served as special agent-in-charge of the FBI's Boston office from 1981 to 1986, said the FBI's priority at the time was targeting members of La Cosa Nostra, commonly known as the Mafia. Cultivating organized crime informants was critical to that mission, he said.

Fitzpatrick testified that he was advised in 1981 by the top agent in the FBI's Boston office ``that he was handling an internal investigation that was sensitive, confidential, and handled at the highest level,'' involving a dispute between the State Police and the FBI over Bulger.

The State Police had been bugging a garage on Lancaster Street, near the old Boston Garden, where Bulger did business with drug dealers, bookmakers, and local Mafia leaders. But, when Bulger abruptly stopped talking inside the building, the State Police, who suspected Bulger was an FBI informant, accused the FBI of tipping off the gangster.

``The accusation was that Bulger was getting and giving information against their investigation,'' Fitzpatrick said.

In his testimony last week, Flemmi said the tip had actually come from retired Massachusetts State Police lieutenant Richard Schneiderhan , who was convicted in 2003 of obstruction of justice. Schneiderhan was found guilty of warning a Bulger associate in 1999 that the FBI was monitoring the telephones of Bulger's brothers, William and John, in a bid to capture the fugitive gangster.

DOJ_NMG_0033180

Flemmi is serving a life sentence for killing McIntyre and nine other people. He began cooperating with the government three years ago .

Though Bulger has been touted as a valuable informant, Fitzpatrick said, Bulger ``wasn't giving us information he could have been giving us."

FBI Knew Agents Had Mob Pals (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet

Boston Herald, June 13, 2006

The FBI called it "going native" - a humiliating label for G-men who became enamored of their mobster informants.

G-men like John "Zip" Connolly. Top-echelon rats like James "Whitey" Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi.

"We used to call it 'going native' - an agent who would perhaps become friends with the informant and not be as objective as he should be. I heard it. More than once," said Robert Fitzpatrick, former second-in-command of the FBI's Boston office, who testified yesterday in U.S. District Court.

In fact, said Fitzpatrick, when he came to Boston in 1981, he heard a lot of talk by then-Special-Agent-in-Charge Lawrence Sarhatt about agents suspected of turning rotten.

Fitzpatrick is a defendant in the $50 million wrongful-death lawsuit filed against the FBI by the family of John McIntyre, 32, of Quincy, a government witness Bulger and Flemmi tortured and murdered in 1984. The civil trial is now in its second week.

Last week, Flemmi testified it was Connolly, his former handler, who tipped off him and Bulger that a crewman on the fishing boat Valhalla was going to tell the feds their gang tried to ship guns to the Irish Republican Army. Flemmi and Bulger tricked McIntyre into admitting he was the snitch and then shot him to death. His body was not found for 16 years.

McIntyre's mother, Emily McIntyre, 77, openly sobbed as she appeared in court for the first time yesterday.

Fitzpatrick said it was "a high priority" of the FBI to keep the identities of informants, also known as 137s, confidential for the sake of their well-being.

It was expected of agents, he said, that "You adhere to the law, you adhere to the guidelines and you do what is correct and true."

Police Seek Suspect In Shooting Of Nevada Judge, Later Slaying Across Town (LAW/AP)

By Scott Sonner, The Associated Press

AP, June 13, 2006

A family court judge was shot and wounded as he stood near a third-floor courthouse window Monday, and police were looking for man suspected in a slaying across town who had appeared before the judge in a divorce case.

Investigators said Darren Roy Mack, a suspect in a killing reported at a Reno, Nev., apartment building was a "person of interest" in the shooting at the courthouse earlier in the day, Reno Deputy Police Chief Jim Johns said.

Judge Chuck Weller was hit in the chest around midday by a shot or shots that came through his office window at the Mills B. Lane Justice Center, and police sealed off the area and searched nearby parking garages for a sniper.

Police also reported that a bomb-sniffing dog had alerted officers to the judge's car in the court's parking garage and that a bomb squad was investigating.

Weller, 53, was taken by ambulance to a hospital, where he was reported in serious but stable condition.

"He is conscious and talking with his family," police spokesman Steve Frady said.

Mack, a Reno businessman, had a connection to both the judge and the family court, through a recent divorce case, Johns said.

"We do not have enough information to say he is a suspect" in the shooting of Weller, Johns said.

"He had recent dealings with the judge and the family court section. ... It is an obvious connection we are obviously going to investigate," he said.

The victim in the homicide had not been identified.

Weller was shot in the chest "at least once" by a "high velocity projectile, possibly a rifle," Johns said.

DOJ_NMG_0033181

Judge Is Hurt In Shooting At A Court In Nevada (NYT)

By Kathryn Reed

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

RENO, Nev., June 12 — A family court judge standing at a third floor window of his downtown court building here was shot in the chest shortly before noon on Monday.

The police said that the judge, Chuck Weller, 53, who was elected to the bench in 2004, was conscious and speaking to family members.

Darren R. Mack, who owns Palace Jewelry and Loan downtown, was sought by the authorities in a killing on Monday at an apartment in Reno as well as for questioning in Judge Weller's shooting.

Deputy Police Chief Jim Johns said Mr. Mack "had recent dealings with the judge and court."

"The suspect," Chief Johns said, "is known to have access to firearms."

Court documents show that a hearing in a contested divorce between Mr. Mack and Charla M. Mack is scheduled for Sept. 7 before Judge Weller.

The case involves children.

The police would not release the name of the victim of the homicide or the victim's relationship to Mr. Mack.

Chief Johns said it was possible that the judge was shot before the homicide was called in at 3 p.m.

Judge Weller was shot one to five times, Chief Johns said.

The judge was listed in serious to critical condition at the Washoe Medical Center.

His family requested that no further information be released.

The authorities would not speculate on a motive, though they said family court cases could be volatile.

"We are looking into his caseload and past cases," a spokesman for the police, Steve Frady, said.

Mr. Frady said he was not aware of threats against Judge Weller.

Also injured in the shooting, at 11:15, was a woman, whose identity remained unclear.

The woman had superficial wounds to the left arm, left neck area and right hip, Mr. Frady said, although it was not known what had struck her. Mr. Frady said he did not know whether the hospital had admitted her.

Floyd Pearson of Lake Head, Calif., said he and his partner pulled into a parking garage structure about 500 yards across the Truckee River from the courthouse about 11:10 and had just locked their vehicle when a sound startled them.

"We heard a very large noise," Mr. Pearson said. "I thought a big transformer blew up. I didn't see anyone outside."

Boyd Cox, who owns Antiques and Treasures, said he locked his store's doors for hours because he is close to the courthouse.

"I didn't want anyone to come in and take hostages," Mr. Cox said.

He fed the 20 people in his shop hot dogs and sodas.

Mr. Frady said some nearby buildings were evacuated, while people in other buildings across a three-by-five-block area cordoned off by police tape were told to remain inside.

Officers scoured the area for clues. Mr. Frady did not say whether any had been found.

Official Convicted In Travel Deal (MJS)

By Steve Schultze Sschultze@journalsentienl.com

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, June 13, 2006

She acted on own, Doyle says, but case may be election issue

A federal jury on Monday convicted a state procurement official of fixing a travel contract for a contributor to Gov. Jim Doyle's campaign, adding a potentially explosive issue to the race for governor this fall.

Doyle and his top aides stressed that the two felony convictions represented an isolated instance.

"It is clear that Georgia Thompson acted on her own, and that no other state employee was involved," Doyle said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0033182

"As I have stated before, I have zero tolerance for ethical lapses in government. When public servants abuse the public's trust, they forfeit their rights to continue in the state's employ."

Thompson will likely be fired, pending a required review of her case, Doyle officials said.

U.S. Attorney Steven Biskupic said after the verdict that the case was about "Georgia Thompson and Georgia Thompson alone." She was found guilty of manipulating the travel bidding to "cause political advantage for her supervisors" and bolster her own job security.

Biskupic said the team that investigated the case, which included him, Attorney General Peg Lautenschlager and Dane County District Attorney Brian Blanchard, would meet soon to discuss matters.

He declined to say whether any other Doyle administration officials or others would now be targeted.

"I don't want people to read too much into it, other than we are trying to be careful in what we do," said Biskupic, an appointee of President Bush's.

Like Doyle, Lautenschlager and Blanchard are Democrats.

Steve Bablitch, Doyle's top government aide, said at the federal courthouse in Milwaukee that his own in-house inquiry into what Republicans dubbed "Travelgate" found no evidence that any of Thompson's bosses at the Administration Department urged her to steer a $750,000 contract to Adelman Travel Group of Glendale last year. Doyle canceled the contract after Thompson's indictment in January.

State Republican Party Chairman Rick Graber, however, was quick to go on the attack. He said Thompson's trial "showed how far this administration is willing to go to reward political cronies and campaign donors."

U.S. Rep. Mark Green, Doyle's Republican opponent, refrained from direct criticism of Doyle and renewed his support for a ban on campaign contributions from officials of companies seeking state contracts. No 'play for pay' allegations

The case against Thompson, 56, of Waunakee, did not include any direct allegations of "pay to play" - that the contract was a reward for contributions. Still, Biskupic noted in court Monday that the thousands of dollars given by Adelman executives around the time the contract was awarded were part of an overall picture.

Adelman executives donated $20,000 to Doyle's campaign in the months around the March 2005 contract award.

Graber said Doyle owes voters a better explanation of his involvement and that of Marc Marotta, the former administration secretary who is Doyle's re-election campaign chairman. Marotta said last week that he would be out of the country on business Monday and unreachable for comment.

Testimony at the trial showed that Doyle and Marotta had separate meetings with Adelman executives before the contract was awarded, and that Marotta's office was in phone contact with Adelman officials when key issues on the contract were being decided.

Bablitch, however, said no evidence was presented "that the governor had anything to do with this."

He predicted that the case would have little impact on voters, who he said would pay more attention to Doyle's record on cutting the state deficit without raising taxes, improving education and improving the state's business climate.

Charles Franklin, a University of Wisconsin-Madison political scientist, said the trial could contribute to a perception problem for Doyle.

"I think Doyle has a problem in that tainted money has been coming up for him repeatedly," Franklin said. "Some of that has been fair and some of that hasn't been fair, but politics isn't about fair."

Franklin said any damage was minimized in that nothing in the trial implicated Doyle or any of his political appointees.

Thompson was a civil service hire in 2001 under then-Republican Gov. Scott McCallum. She has been described as somewhat apolitical. She testified that no one pressured her to help Adelman win the contract and that the process employed to select Adelman saved the state money.

Thompson appeared shaken after the verdict and declined to speak to reporters. Her attorney, Stephen Hurley, also would not comment on the outcome. Biskupic said he expected Hurley to appeal the convictions.

Thompson's sentencing was scheduled for Sept. 22. She faces up to 20 years in prison, but federal guidelines will likely recommend a far lesser term, Biskupic said.

During closing arguments Monday, Biskupic labeled Thompson a liar.

DOJ_NMG_0033183

"She lied; we know she lied," Biskupic said, noting that Thompson's story in court differed from what several prosecution witnesses recalled her saying.

Thompson used political considerations to alter the process to steer the contract to Adelman, according to Biskupic. Although she was one of seven members of a committee that evaluated proposals, she engineered a move to take "best and final" offers that resulted in a reversal of the outcome, Biskupic said. No charges against Adelman

Omega World Travel of Fairfax, Va., had initially scored higher than Adelman.

"It couldn't have worked better (for Adelman) if they had had one of their own employees on that committee," Biskupic told jurors.

No one from Adelman has been charged in the case.

Hurley said no direct evidence proving Thompson had rigged the contract had been presented at her trial, which began a week ago before U.S. District Judge Rudolph Randa.

Several witnesses testified that after Omega appeared to be the winning bidder, Thompson said that would pose political problems. She also feared having to tell her bosses the winner wasn't Adelman and that the result should be different, according to trial testimony.

Hurley said none of those witnesses, however, could remember exactly what was said. State travel consultant Ian Thomas, who testified that Thompson had said, "I don't know how I'm going to tell my bosses it's not Adelman," later testified that Thompson might have said something about wanting a "local company" to win the contract.

The prosectors' case against Thompson boiled down to "bits and pieces" that misinterpreted events in the most damning light, Hurley said. A common-sense reading of all the facts presented shows she was not guilty, Hurley said.

"Proof is required, not a suspicion," he said.

Doyle campaign aide Anson Kaye said Monday that Doyle would not return the Adelman contributions because only Thompson was involved in wrongdoing.

Patrick Marley and Jesse Garza of the Journal Sentinel staff contributed to this report.

From the June 13, 2006 editions of the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel

Have an opinion on this story? Write a letter to the editor or start an online forum.

Subscribe today and receive 4 weeks free! Sign up now.

Jury Convicts Wisonsin Official Of Fraud (STPPP)

By Ryan J. Foley

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, June 13, 2006

MILWAUKEE - Jurors convicted a state purchasing official of fraud charges Monday, agreeing with federal prosecutors that she illegally steered a contract to a company with ties to Gov. Jim Doyle.

Jurors found Georgia Thompson guilty of causing a misapplication of state funds and participating in a scheme to defraud the state. The charges carry up to 20 years in prison, but prosecutors said she would receive less.

Prosecutors accused Thompson, a Department of Administration purchasing supervisor, of steering a contract to book state travel to Adelman Travel Group last year.

The firm's CEO gave $10,000 to Doyle before and after winning the contract, worth an estimated $750,000. Prosecutors used e-mails and other records to paint a cozy relationship between Doyle's administration and Adelman.

But Thompson, a 56-year-old civil servant who took the stand in her own defense, contended she was under no pressure from Doyle aides to give the contract to Adelman and was unaware of the campaign donations.

She showed no emotion when the verdict was read, but two of her supporters in the gallery broke into tears.

Thompson and her lawyer, Stephen Hurley, declined comment as they left the courtroom.

Sentencing was scheduled for Sept. 22.

The state Republican Party said the case was evidence that Doyle, a Democrat running for re-election, rewarded campaign contributors with state work. Doyle has denied those claims.

Doyle has acknowledged being longtime friends with the Adelman family. The governor canceled the contract after Thompson was indicted but has retained the campaign contributions from Adelman and an additional $10,000 from a Milwaukee businessman on the company's board.

He issued a statement Monday saying trial testimony and evidence showed Thompson "acted on her own and that no other state employee was involved."

Witness: City Aide Told Me To Lie (CHIST)

By NATASHA KORECKI, STEVE WARMBIR AND FRAN SPIELMAN, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, June 13, 2006

A Mayor Daley press aide told a deputy commissioner to lie to the public and say the city hired a 19-year-old building inspector without knowing he was the son of a clout-heavy union official, a witness testified in the City Hall hiring trial Monday.

The deputy commissioner, Christopher Kozicki, a onetime secretary in John Daley's 11th Ward political organization, also testified Monday that the FBI asked him about John Daley in three different interviews, leading a defense lawyer to call Daley a "mooch" who bummed rides off of people.

Also, prosecutors said they plan to call City Corporation Counsel Mara Georges to the stand today to ask her about 2005 interviews with Robert Sorich and Tim McCarthy, who are now on trial. At the time, Georges questioned them about the Office of Intergovernmental Affairs' role in city hiring, prosecutors say.

In September 2004, Sun-Times columnist Carol Marin reported that Andy Ryan, 19, was hired as a building inspector even though the city requires all inspectors to have completed a four-year apprenticeship and have two years work experience. Ryan is the son of Tom Ryan, the secretary-treasurer of Carpenters Local 13. The union was Mayor Daley's largest campaign contributor in 2003.

Kozicki testified that Breelyn Pete, former spokeswoman for the city Buildings and Procurement Services Department, told Kozicki to tell the press he didn't know about Ryan's connections.

"You were given orders to effectively lie to the press?" defense lawyer Tom Durkin asked.

Kozicki said yes.

'I never advised him to lie'

Durkin represents Daley patronage chief Sorich, on trial along with his IGA assistant McCarthy and two others for allegedly rigging the city's hiring system to give jobs to political favorites.

Reached Monday, Pete flatly denied the accusation.

"He was told by me? Never at any time did that conversation take place," said Pete, who left City Hall to join the Children's Museum. "I never advised him to lie to the media or to anyone else about Andy Ryan and his father."

At the time, the mayor blamed then-Building Commissioner Stan Kaderbek for the hiring. In a sidebar outside of the jury's presence, Durkin referenced a "damage control" meeting suggesting higher-ups steered the decision to lie about Ryan. The mayor's chief of staff, press secretary, Kaderbek and Georges, were among those in attendance, Durkin said.

"It was decided that Kozicki would tell the press that story," Durkin said.

Kozicki wasn't present for that alleged conversation and couldn't testify to it. Prosecutors want to block Durkin from asking Georges today about that alleged conversation.

While prosecutors called Kozicki to the stand, they treated him as a "hostile witness" saying he all along said that IGA, Timothy McCarthy, former Daley aide John Doerrer and Kaderbek were all involved in rigging Ryan's hiring. Kozicki later testified though that Kaderbek was the "driving force" behind the hiring.

Prosecutors said he "exaggerated the role of Kaderbek ... and minimized the role of IGA in hiring generally ... in a manner inconsistent with his previous grand jury testimony." He did it, Assistant U.S. Attorney Philip Guentert suggested in questioning, to take the blame off his friend and fellow 11th warder McCarthy. But Kozicki lawyer Ted Poulos said his client has been consistent in his dealings with the government all along.

John Daley called a ride 'mooch'

DOJ_NMG_0033185

Meanwhile, Durkin suggested that prosecutors questioned Kozicki because they "wanted to try to indict Mayor Daley and his brother John based on this evidence," and asked if prosecutors were trying to link John Daley to criminal activity. Kozicki said he was asked about John Daley during three different interviews. He acknowledged he sometimes drove John Daley downtown if he asked for a ride and that Daley helped him get his job with the city. A source with knowledge of Kozicki's government interviews said their questions about John Daley were innocuous.

Kozicki agreed when Durkin asked if Daley was just a "mooch" who asked other people -- including Sorich -- for rides.

"Did John Daley in your rides downtown ever attempt to influence the performance of your official duties?" Durkin asked.

"No," he said.

Witness: FBI Asked About Mayor's Brother (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush And Dan Mihalopoulos, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, June 13, 2006

Three times this year, federal prosecutors have questioned a high-ranking city official and prominent member of the 11th Ward Democratic Organization about Mayor Richard Daley's brother, John Daley, it was revealed in court Monday.

Witness Christopher Kozicki, a former managing deputy in the Buildings Deparment, did not detail what prosecutors wanted to know about Cook County Commissioner John Daley as he testified in the trial of the mayor's former patronage chief, Robert Sorich.

But Sorich's attorney, Thomas Anthony Durkin, suggested to Kozicki that prosecutors "wanted to try to indict Mayor Daley and his brother John." U.S. District Judge David Coar sustained prosecutors' objections to that and similar questions.

Prosecutors charge that Sorich and three other former city officials rigged hiring and promotions for many blue-collar city jobs in favor of people who campaigned for groups loyal to the mayor.

The trial has put a spotlight on the mayor's administration and included testimony from several current and former top city officials. The prosecution could call City Corporation Counsel Mara Georges as early as Tuesday.

John Daley's name surfaced as prosecutors sought to treat Kozicki, whom they called to the stand, as a hostile witness.

Prosecutors were surprised by Kozicki's testimony last week that former Buildings Commissioner Stan Kaderbek, and not the mayor's office, was mainly responsible for the 2004 hiring of a young, unqualified building inspector. The testimony Thursday deviated from a sworn statement Kozicki made in February, prosecutors charged.

Prosecutors allege that pressure from Sorich aide Timothy McCarthy and another top Office of Intergovernmental Affairs official prompted the hiring of Andrew Ryan, then 19.

Ryan was hired because his father is a top official in Carpenters' Union Local 13 and despite his lack of experience, Kozicki testified. He said he rigged a job interview to ensure Ryan's hiring.

Kozicki received immunity from prosecution for his cooperation with the government.

But Kozicki's testimony last week was "entirely consistent" with defense arguments in the trial, prosecutors asserted in a court filing Monday.

"Kozicki exaggerated the role of Kaderbek in the hiring of Andrew Ryan and minimized the role of [Intergovernmental Affairs] in hiring generally," prosecutors charged.

Back in court Monday, Kozicki insisted that he has consistently told prosecutors that Kaderbek was the "driving force" behind Ryan's hiring.

Prosecutors suggested that Kozicki's political allegiances colored his testimony. Assistant U.S. Atty. Philip Guentert asked Kozicki about those connections on the stand, particularly his work as secretary to the Democratic organization in the Daley family's traditional 11th Ward power base. John Daley leads the 11th Ward Democratic Organization, whose members include Sorich and McCarthy, a co-defendant.

Kozicki acknowledged that, like Sorich, he used to drive John Daley from his home in the Bridgeport neighborhood to his office downtown.

"While you were working for John Daley, that was also one of your responsibilities?" Guentert asked.

"It was not a responsibility, but I did it," Kozicki responded.

DOJ_NMG_0033186

On cross-examination, Kozicki said he would give John Daley a ride whenever he asked and Kozicki happened to be leaving for work at the same time.

"John Daley's kind of a mooch in that regard?" Durkin asked.

"Yes," Kozicki said.

The hiring of Ryan and another unqualified son of a union official embarrassed the Daley administration. Officials fired Ryan and the other building inspector in September 2004, contending publicly that they had been duped into hiring them.

After the scandal broke, Kozicki said, Buildings Department spokeswoman Breelyn Pete instructed him to tell reporters that he was unaware Ryan's father was a top union official.

"You were given orders to effectively lie to the press?" Durkin asked.

"Yes," Kozicki replied.

Pete, who is now vice president at the Chicago Children's Museum, said when reached by telephone that she never gave Kozicki that instruction.

Kozicki recently was reassigned to a high-level post in the city Planning Department.

After his testimony, jurors heard from a man who said he unsuccessfully applied for the building inspector openings in 2004. Jeffrey Harness said the city rejected him for the $50,000-a-year post despite a résumé that listed 17 years of experience in the building trades and familiarity with the city building code.

Harness later told reporters that he was "a little angry" that he was passed over in favor of a teenager.

"At that age, you're not really qualified to be in a position where people's lives are at stake," Harness said.

Also Monday, a former city computer technician testified that he removed a program from Sorich's laptop computer in 2002. The program tracked city job seekers by their race and political affiliation, according to witness Ben Campney.

He said he created the program after Daley was elected mayor in 1989 at the request of top Daley political aide Timothy Degnan.

Campney said that, during a 2002 meeting in Sorich's office, he deleted the program and its files from Sorich's laptop at his request.

"Robert joked that, after this was over, we would throw the hard drives in Lake Michigan," Campney said.

Campney testified that he did not talk about the 2002 meeting with Sorich when federal investigators first interviewed him last year. He only told them about it in April.

"I felt it was the right thing to do," Campney said.

Under cross-examination by Durkin, Campney said he did not deliberately lie to authorities in his first meeting with them but had 'needed more time to think about it.'"

rrbush@tribune.com

dmihalopoulos@tribune.com

Former West Mifflin Police Chief Pleads Guilty To Drug Charges (PPG)

By Jonathan D. Silver And Paula Reed Ward, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, June 13, 2006

New complaint accuses him of theft

Former West Mifflin Police Chief Frank Diener pleaded guilty yesterday to federal drug charges and was presented with a new 19-count criminal complaint from the Allegheny County district attorney's office alleging that he created a slush fund and stole thousands of dollars of borough and private property.

The complaint and affidavit against Mr. Diener, 57, of Saniel Drive in West Mifflin, also accuses him of obstructing investigations, peddling guns and voiding traffic tickets.

Investigators allege the crimes took place from 1994 to 2006, while Mr. Diener was chief. The complaint stems from an 18-month investigation by the state police organized crime unit and the FBI.

Over the years, according to the complaint, Mr. Diener stole a range of items, including a video poker machine, two trailers, tools, a generator, a pair of police computers, borough shredders and ammunition.

DOJ_NMG_0033187

Police also said Mr. Diener took possession of a piece of excavation equipment called a skid loader and sold a deceased officer's pistol to a Munhall man without completing the proper paperwork.

Mr. Diener created a $4,962 slush fund in 2000 by fabricating a portion of an order for bulletproof vests, investigators said. He used the money to buy guns and equipment for himself and other West Mifflin police officers, according to the complaint.

The district attorney's office said the investigation is continuing and will result in more arrests.

Mr. Diener was arraigned yesterday and held on $5,000 straight bond for the county charges. A preliminary hearing was scheduled for Thursday.

Mr. Diener and his attorney, Robert Stewart, declined comment in federal court, where Mr. Diener pleaded guilty to possession with intent to distribute cocaine, possession with intent to distribute marijuana and obstruction of justice.

According to Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen S. Stallings, Mr. Diener was caught stealing drugs from his department's evidence room when several cooperating witnesses made undercover recordings.

U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said prosecutors are not aware of any cases from West Mifflin being compromised by the theft of the drugs from the evidence locker.

"This is not a reflection of the West Mifflin Police Department as a whole," state police Maj. Frank Monaco said.

The former chief also pleaded guilty to instructing witnesses to lie and destroy evidence.

On March 9, when Mr. Diener learned that there was an ongoing FBI investigation, he gave a paint can containing 25 grams of cocaine and 387 grams of marijuana to one of the cooperating witnesses so it wouldn't be found in any search of his home, Mr. Stallings said.

Eight days later, when the witness asked Mr. Diener what he should do with the drugs, the chief told him to destroy them, Mr. Stallings said.

Mr. Diener is to be sentenced Oct. 13 on the federal charges.

In October, Mr. Diener resigned following a series of suspensions over allegations that he used a borough vehicle for personal reasons, allowed officers without proper qualifications to carry firearms and engaged in conduct unbecoming a law enforcement officer.

Former Police Chief Pleads Guilty To Drug Charges (PTR)

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, June 13, 2006

Former West Mifflin police Chief Frank Diener plead guilty in federal court Monday on two felony drug charges and one count of obstruction of justice.

Immediately following his appearance before U.S. District Judge Joy Flowers Conti, Diener, 58, of West Mifflin, was taken by Pennsylvania State Police officers to Pittsburgh Municipal Court where he was arraigned on 19 state charges, including theft by deception.

Investigators said in court paperwork that Diener took numerous items -- including a video gambling machine, narcotics, tools, firearms and ammunition -- from the police department and its evidence room.

Investigators also contend that Diener instructed officers to fix cases. He resigned the chief's post in October 2005.

Diener is scheduled to be sentenced Oct. 13 in U.S. District court. Diener's preliminary hearing on the state charges is scheduled for Thursday before Brookline District Judge Charles McLaughlin. Robert Stewart, Diener's attorney, said that hearing will likely be postponed.

Suburban Pittsburgh Police Chief Pleads Guilty To Drug Charges (TLPA)

Times Leader (NE PA), June 13, 2006

PITTSBURGH - A suburban police chief who resigned after being repeatedly suspended pleaded guilty Monday to federal drug charges.

Former West Mifflin Police Chief Frank Diener, 57, pleaded guilty to possession of cocaine and marijuana with intent to distribute as well as obstruction of justice, U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said.

Diener resigned in October after being suspended for using a borough vehicle for personal reasons and allowing officers to carry firearms without proper qualifications.

He faces a maximum penalty of 35 years in prison and a fine of as much as $1.75 million when he is sentenced October 13.

Two Sentenced For Fraudulent Gold-silver Sales Scam (MH)

By Roberto Santiago

The Miami Herald, June 13, 2006

They claimed to handle gold and silver, but after Monday, the only metal objects these two convicted Broward con artists could be seeing are iron prison bars.

Charles Paul Hoffecker, 53, of Pompano Beach and Charles Edward Meyers, 66, of Fort Lauderdale could face up to 10 years in federal prison when they are sentenced June 19 before U.S. District Judge Katherine Hayden in Newark.

Their sentencing caps nearly a 10-year investigation that was scripted like a Hollywood caper movie. The scam, similar to the plot of the 2000 film Boiler Room, involved smooth-talking salesmen who ran an elaborate telemarketing scheme from rented offices around the country, with the largest operation in Fort Lauderdale.

Authorities, who cracked the case by setting up their own phony boiler room in New Jersey, said the hustlers ultimately fleeced more than 1,000 investors across the nation out of more than $14 million.

Four victims who testified at the trial said they were bilked of anywhere from $40,000 to $120,000.

The duo claimed they ran Amitex Investment Services Ltd., a Bahamian company that bought and stored precious commodities like gold and silver.

Amitex was actually a one-room office in the Bahamas. The money-generating sales pitches were done in boiler rooms they ran in New York, Nevada, California, Georgia and Florida, according to New Jersey's Robert Kirsch, an assistant U.S. attorney who helped prosecute the case.

"The largest Amitex boiler room was located in Fort Lauderdale on Commercial Boulevard," said Kirsch, who said the operation was in an office.

A boiler room is a base of operations from which con artists run phony telemarketing schemes from a secret location -- often a rented office or basement in a home -- where they set up a bank of telephones and make cold calls.

The two were found guilty in March after a three-month jury trial. They were each convicted on several counts of mail and wire fraud.

Since the conviction, Hoffecker has been held in the Passaic County jail.

Myers is being transported to Newark from the Miami Correctional Facility by the U.S. Marshal Service.

As part of a deal, Meyers was allowed to return to his home in Fort Lauderdale, under 24-hour house arrest, to await sentencing.

He was taken into custody after authorities learned that he sold his house.

The two had been the focus of a lengthy investigation by the FBI and U.S. Postal Inspection Service that started in 1996.

To nab them, the FBI and postal officials set up their own faux boiler room -- called Commodities Investors Corp. -- in 1997 in East Brunswick, N.J..

A press release from New Jersey Attorney's office said that Hoffecker tried to ``recruit the operators of CIC to sell the Amitex investment."

The two were indicted in 2003 and had a trial that ended in a hung jury in 2004.

Retried this year, they were found guilty three months ago.

Hoffecker got into the phony offshore commodities sales business after he was banned in 1991 from selling commodities on credit in the United States by a U.S. District judge in Florida.

He built a fortune using smooth-talking, unscrupulous telemarketers.

"Hoffecker and Meyers are experienced in telemarketing and they knew well that most -- if not the overwhelming majority of those -- that are called with regards to promoting these sorts of investments hang up," Kirsch said.

"But they also know that a percentage, however small, who are most vulnerable and most naive, fall prey to smooth-talking fraudsters," Kirsch said.

DOJ_NMG_0033189

FBI Eyes Purported Tape Of American Teen's West Bank Boyfriend (FINDLAW/AP)

By Brian Charlton, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 13, 2006

(AP) - CARO, Michigan-The FBI and local investigators said Monday that they are interested in a television station's tape of a purported interview with a West Bank man who says he paid for a 16-year-old American girl to fly to the Middle East after meeting her on the internet.

Katherine R. Lester disappeared June 5 from her home in rural Michigan. After the FBI helped track her to the airport in Amman, Jordan, U.S authorities persuaded her to board a return flight. She returned home Friday night.

Authorities have said the girl apparently planned to visit a man who describes himself as a 25-year-old from Jericho on his account with MySpace.com, a social networking Web site where the two met.

WNEM-TV in Saginaw broadcast a telephone interview with a man who said he actually was 20 and only identified himself as Abdullah.

In the interview Saturday, he said he was a wealthy businessman who met Lester online seven months ago. He said he wanted to marry her and sent her money for a plane ticket to visit him.

The station said it got the man's MySpace identity from Lester's sister, Mary, who found it on a computer they share. WNEM said it messaged him on MySpace and asked him for his cell phone number for an interview.

The Associated Press also messaged him and called the number, but he declined comment.

"We're aware of the existence of the tape," Tuscola County sheriff's Sgt. Michael Pine said. "We're talking to the FBI. It's part of the investigation."

Neither he nor FBI spokesman Terry Booth would say whether they had requested the tape from the station or whether they believed the man was who he said he was.

"I haven't seen the tape, so I can't comment on the accuracy," Booth said from Detroit.

Authorities were trying to determine whether any laws were broken. The age of sexual consent in Michigan is 16.

The girl was in seclusion to escape the attention surrounding her travels, an attorney for the girl's family said Monday.

"Katherine does not want the media attention. The parents don't want the media attention on their daughter," lawyer Renee Wood said.

Tuscola County Sheriff Tom Kern said the girl did not want to return home when authorities approached her at the airport in Amman, but once they realized she was 16 and her mother wanted her back, they seized her passport.

MySpace.com, owned by News Corp., has more than 72 million members that lets users post photos, Web logs and journals. Its popularity with teenagers has raised concerns, and there have been scattered accounts of sexual predators targeting minors they met through the site.

GPS Will Track Sex Offenders (WT)

By Nathan Bomey

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

Sex offenders in Virginia will be monitored more closely via Global Positioning System (GPS) technology and an upgraded registry, state officials announced yesterday.

The changes that are to take effect July 1 will broaden the number of offenders eligible to be listed in the statewide online registry. The names and photos of nonviolent sex offenders will be accessible, expanding the registry to about 13,000 names.

Two similar bills making their way through the General Assembly would authorize administrative personnel and state troopers to help monitor sex offenders and enforce state law, Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell said in an interview yesterday.

Technological upgrades and the hiring of about 50 troopers and six administrative workers to maintain the registry would cost about $10.5 million, said Mr. McDonnell, a Republican.

The revamped registry Web site, (sex-offender.vsp.virginia.gov), is maintained by the Virginia State Police and allows users to locate the residences of offenders on a map. Its search engine can sort by city, county, ZIP code and name.

DOJ_NMG_0033190

The list of offenses that require a criminal's name to be in the registry will be expanded to include, for example, those convicted of possessing child pornography on the first offense.

"There's dramatic new resources going into monitoring these offenders, so we know exactly where they are," Mr. McDonnell said. "And we think it's going to work more accurately with these new resources employed."

The changes come after Gov. Timothy M. Kaine in April signed a dozen bills aimed at cracking down on sexual predators.

GPS technology will be used to track sex offenders convicted of major crimes from three years to life after they are released from prison. Offenders who fail to register promptly will have to wear a tracking bracelet.

Mr. McDonnell said GPS technology is ready to be used in law enforcement. "It has been used in your golf cart and your car for about 10 years for commercial purposes," he said.

Col. W. Steven Flaherty, superintendent of the Virginia State Police, said the "opportunity to track these people in their neighborhoods" is invaluable.

"We have more people paying attention, making sure that people who have to register are registering accurately and that they aren't in places where they shouldn't be," Col. Flaherty said.

Improvements In Registry Announced (WP)

By Jamie Stockwell

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

Upgrades have been made to Virginia's online sex offender registry, including mapping features that allow users to pinpoint where offenders live and work in their neighborhoods, officials said yesterday.

The enhancements, part of a $10.5 million effort to improve the registry, were announced in Richmond at a news conference held by Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell and Col. W. Steven Flaherty, superintendent of the Virginia State Police. The changes, they said, were a result of legislation intended to provide more rigorous supervision of the state's nearly 13,000 sexual predators.

"We want to make it a bit tougher for them here," said Lt. Col. H.C. Davis in a telephone interview yesterday. "All of the changes will help us more actively monitor the offenders."

As part of the upgrades, the registry, launched in 1999, now enables visitors to search by name, Zip code, city or county or to use a map to search the area around a specific address. Users can view a list of incarcerated offenders, offenders living nearby and those wanted by authorities for failing to register. Virtual thumbtacks appear on a map, and when a user clicks on one,a photograph of the offender appears on the screen along with the name, aliases, address and offense.

Beginning July 1, the database will include all of the state's nonviolent sex offenders. Until the changes in state law, the list of nonviolent offenders was known only to law enforcement officials. Visitors to the Web site also will be able to see where nonviolent offenders live and work, said Lt. Tommy Turner of the state police.

Work addresses were necessary, Turner said, because "offenders learned to circumvent the system."

"It doesn't help if you have a guy who lives in downtown Manassas but spends all day in Fairfax County working at a plumbing company," Turner said. He said part of the money allocated for registry improvements will be used to hire officers who will be responsible for checking on offenders who fail to re-register with the state.

Under the omnibus bill signed into law this spring, violent sex offenders -- including those convicted of such crimes as murder, rape and child molestation -- are now required to register with the state every 30 days, instead of every 90 days. Those classified as nonviolent will have to register every six months, Davis said.

Should the offenders not register, Davis said, they will be flagged on the registry. If they fail to register more than twice , or if they are convicted of another sex crime while on the registry, they will be required to wear GPS monitors under the new law.

Davis said an unknown number of offenders are unaccounted for or have failed to register on time. The changes to the registry, he said, should make it much easier to find them.

As of July 1, Davis also said, offenders convicted of certain violent sex acts against children younger than 13 will face a mandatory minimum sentence of 25 years. Under the old law, they have faced a sentence of five years to life.

Defense In Hollywood Wiretaps Case Demands Prosecution Evidence (CCT)

By Greg Risling

The Contra Costa Times, June 13, 2006

LOS ANGELES - Defense attorneys in a Hollywood wiretapping case scolded federal prosecutors on Monday for not turning over evidence.

"It's their obligation to provide us what we need to exonerate our clients," said Terree Bowers, a defense attorney who said the process has been "like pulling teeth."

Defense attorneys pointed out that the 112-count indictment against private investigator Anthony Pellicano was unsealed in February after an investigation that lasted more than three years.

Prosecutors alleged that Pellicano tapped the phones of Hollywood stars such as Sylvester Stallone; and paid two police officers to run names, including comedians Garry Shandling and Kevin Nealon, through a government database.

A total of 14 people have been charged, including Pellicano. Six have pleaded guilty to a variety of charges, including conspiracy and wiretapping.

Pellicano's trial is scheduled for Oct. 24.

More than 23,000 pages of documents have been provided by federal prosecutors, but defense attorneys argue the process has moved too slowly and they have yet to receive all of the evidence.

Prosecutors turned over some evidence to defense attorneys before Monday's hearing. Defense attorney Chad Hummel said he plans to file a motion that would ask U.S. District Court Judge Dale Fischer to throw out any evidence offered by prosecutors in the future.

Fischer ordered that a special master be appointed to review the evidence and determine what defense attorneys should be allowed to see.

Prosecutors said part of the delay has come from difficulty decrypting about 1,300 audio files made by Pellicano of his telephone conversations with clients and others. More than 350 audio files have been given to defense attorneys, but others haven't because the material isn't relevant to the case or doesn't rise to the level of filing criminal charges, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Saunders.

If defense attorneys "are so eager to get the tapes decrypted, the one man who has the password is sitting right over there," said Saunders, referring to Pellicano.

Saunders added a "select few" files deal with an ongoing investigation, but he didn't elaborate. Prosecutors have promised more charges are forthcoming.

Meanwhile, Fischer ordered prosecutors to hand over the remaining confidential FBI documents to defense attorneys. Some of the summaries, which cited interviews with top Hollywood power brokers, were leaked to the media and prompted an investigation into who may have released the information.

Defense attorneys maintained in court Monday that they were not responsible for the leaks.

Dispute Over Evidence In Pellicano Wiretap Case (NYT)

By David M. Halbfinger And Allison Hope Weiner

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

LOS ANGELES, June 12 — The nearly four-year federal investigation of Anthony Pellicano, the Hollywood private eye accused of masterminding a sprawling eavesdropping operation, has turned up only a single recording in which two people were unknowingly wiretapped, prosecutors said in court on Monday.

Even code-crackers from unspecified government agencies have failed so far to decipher the passwords Mr. Pellicano may have used to stash away many more surreptitiously recorded phone calls in his computer drives, prosecutors said.

Defense lawyers, meanwhile, are questioning whether even the single wiretap the government claims to have discovered is really that, or something else entirely.

The government said its evidence included hundreds of recorded calls in which Mr. Pellicano can be heard boasting of his wiretaps, describing them in detail, and even playing back portions of them for his clients. The detective routinely recorded his own calls, and the government has not faced the same encryption problems with those.

DOJ_NMG_0033192

The disclosures mean that, barring a last-minute break in the investigation, the government's case will be based far more on circumstantial evidence and witnesses' testimony than on direct evidence of illegal wiretapping.

The developments came in a contentious court hearing over evidence that defense lawyers have been waiting for since the indictments of Mr. Pellicano and seven other people on wiretapping and conspiracy charges in February. Defense lawyers complained Monday that prosecutors had turned over too little, too late, missing a Friday deadline and continuing to withhold a large amount of important evidence.

For example, prosecutors said they still would not turn over some 250 recorded phone calls and other evidence that remain the focus of the ongoing investigation. The lead prosecutor, Daniel A. Saunders, an assistant United States attorney, has said that more indictments are forthcoming.

Mr. Saunders and another prosecutor, Kevin M. Lally, said they had turned over some 22,000 pages of written evidence and would soon provide another 100,000 pages of case files from underlying legal matters that Mr. Pellicano was investigating. The government charges that Mr. Pellicano put his wiretapping to work on behalf of corrupt lawyers seeking an illegal and unfair advantage in litigation — much of it involving the entertainment industry, but also including divorces and criminal cases.

What has not been publicly disclosed are the details of the single recording in the government's possession that it says is an illegal wiretap. According to written summaries of F.B.I. interviews seen by The New York Times, the recording concerns events that led to the divorce of a Los Angeles billionaire, Alec E. Gores, from his wife, Lisa A. Gores, in 2001.

If the government fails to crack Mr. Pellicano's passwords and turn up other direct evidence of wiretaps, that means the prosecution's star witnesses could be forced to make their painful private drama public.

Mr. Gores, principal of the private equity firm Gores Technology Group, admitted hiring Mr. Pellicano in 2000 to investigate his suspicions that his wife was cheating on him with his younger brother, Thomas T. Gores, another billionaire investor, according to summaries of F.B.I. interviews with all three family members. (A third brother, Sam Gores, runs the Paradigm talent agency.)

Mr. Pellicano installed wiretaps on both Lisa and Tom Gores's telephones, the summaries show, and confirmed Alec Gores's suspicions that the two had become inappropriately involved. Alec Gores admitted to the F.B.I. that he listened to Mr. Pellicano's wiretaps on several occasions, the summaries show. Alec Gores has not been charged, and has been assured he is only a witness in the case, said his lawyer, Louis Miller, who is also known as Skip.

The sole recording the government says was a wiretap contains a conversation that occurred the evening of Jan. 8, 2001, as Lisa and Tom Gores spoke on the phone hours after they had met at the Beverly Hills Hotel. Last November, F.B.I. summaries show, Lisa Gores listened to the recording and confirmed for investigators that the voices on it were hers and Tom Gores's.

But defense lawyers dispute whether the recording is really a wiretap. "Just because they say it, doesn't mean it's true," said Steven F. Gruel, Mr. Pellicano's lawyer. "It could be anything."

Defense lawyers said that Mr. Pellicano routinely taped his own phone calls, and that he frequently played previously recorded conversations for his clients over the phone, rather than in person. Thus, they say, the recording of Lisa and Tom Gores could actually have been a second-generation recording, rather than an original wiretap.

"Pellicano's position has been, all along, there are no wiretaps," Mr. Gruel said.

With a trial set for Oct. 24 and the federal investigation far from complete, both the strengths and the weaknesses of the government's case were on full display Monday.

Beyond whether the Gores recording is an original wiretapped recording, for example, there is the question of how strong a witness Alec Gores will be, given his own admissions that he knew of Mr. Pellicano's illegal activity. In his F.B.I. interview, Alec Gores said he paid Mr. Pellicano at least $50,000, lent him at least $50,000 more that was never repaid, and paid for a Hawaii vacation for Mr. Pellicano's whole family as a bonus for his work. He said Mr. Pellicano had worked for him for five to six months. And he said that "on at least two occasions, and possibly a third, Pellicano played Gores recordings of Lisa and Tom Gores talking on the telephone."

Mr. Miller, Alec Gores's lawyer, insisted that his client "has done absolutely nothing wrong." Asked about the summaries of Mr. Gores's statements to the F.B.I., Mr. Miller said he wished he could "comment to correct and/or clarify some of the information" contained in them, but "since my client is a witness, I cannot do so."

DOJ_NMG_0033193

Even without a single undisputed wiretap to play for a jury, Mr. Saunders and Mr. Lally argued in court that they had plenty of ammunition with which to convict Mr. Pellicano and his co-defendants. They said they had "dozens of witnesses" who listened to wiretaps or even helped implement them, and "hundreds of calls" in which Mr. Pellicano played previously wiretapped conversations. In many of those recordings, the prosecutors said, Mr. Pellicano boasted to clients of what he had heard on his wiretaps — often reporting that he had eavesdropped on their legal adversaries discussing their litigation strategy.

Defense lawyers on Monday made much of the government's failure thus far to break the password protection on many of Mr. Pellicano's audio files. Prosecutors said they could at least provide a breakdown of the call times, participants and subject matter, because Mr. Pellicano incorporated that information into his computer file names.

But defense lawyers complained to Judge Dale S. Fischer of United States District Court that Mr. Pellicano's still-encrypted files could contain vital exculpatory evidence. "We're just wandering in the fog right now, without much clarity," said Terree A. Bowers, who is defending Terry N. Christensen, the lead partner in a Century City law firm, who is charged with wiretapping and conspiracy.

Mr. Saunders retorted that "passwords don't change the content" of Mr. Pellicano's digital recordings. "They don't make Terry Christensen say, 'Oh, please wiretap her, when he said, 'No, please don't wiretap her,' " he said.

Mr. Bowers pleaded with the court to order the government to provide a breakdown of all the recordings prosecutors had not turned over, detailing what they contain and the government's reason for withholding them from the defense. Judge Fischer agreed, ordering that an outside referee be appointed to review the government's evidence and decide whether it should be turned over to the defense.

Mr. Bowers scolded the prosecutors, saying they had moved ahead with indictments while still unprepared for trial.

"We need to know what they're withholding and why they're withholding it," Mr. Bowers said of the government. "We urged the government not to go into this prematurely. Here we are still waiting for the tapes to be decoded."

Mr. Saunders, in response, said that if defense lawyers were so eager to crack the code, they could simply consult Mr. Pellicano, who sat opposite the government's table, in chains and a green jailhouse jacket. "The man with the passwords, your honor, is sitting right there across the courtroom," Mr. Saunders said.

Many Of Pellicano's Recordings Still Secret (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

Hundreds of the private eye's tapes have not been decoded, U.S. lawyers say. Defense says feds are withholding evidence.

Federal prosecutors said Monday that they were still trying to unravel more than 275 encrypted recordings made by Hollywood private eye Anthony Pellicano.

Although the exact nature of the contents of the tapes will only be known if government cryptographers successfully break the powerful encryption software that Pellicano used to scramble the conversations, they could provide new evidence in the case against Pellicano and his six co-defendants or other Pellicano clients and associates not yet indicted.

Prosecutors disclosed the existence of the still-encrypted recordings at the outset of an acrimonious hearing before U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer as they clashed with defense attorneys who alleged the government was intentionally withholding evidence that might exonerate their clients.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Kevin Lally told the crowded courtroom that authorities recovered about 1,300 audio files from Pellicano's offices and have turned over 367 of them to defense lawyers. As many as 400 other Pellicano recordings are considered privileged communications, primarily between Pellicano and his attorneys, and are not part of the case. About 250 recordings relate to the government's ongoing probe but are not relevant to any of the named defendants, Lally said.

That leaves just over 275 recordings that have yet to be decoded. Commercially available encryption software enables computer users to protect digital information using mathematical formulas, or algorithms, that require powerful computers to break.

In addition to the recordings that have been turned over to defense attorneys, Lally said the government has to date turned over 100,000 additional pages of documents in the case.

Lally's statement triggered a sharp reaction from defense attorneys, who suggested that authorities are purposely dragging their feet. "It is clear we have a major problem," said attorney Chad Hummel, who represents Mark Arneson, a former Los Angeles Police Department sergeant accused of participating in Pellicano's alleged conspiracy to wiretap and intimidate others on behalf of the private eye's clients.

"I have great concerns at this point," added Terree Bowers, who represents another defendant, prominent entertainment attorney Terry Christensen.

"We are still waiting, astonishingly, for discovery of a great number of tapes…. I don't see how we are in that position this late in the game," Bowers added, referring to the scheduled October start of the trial. "We need to know what they are withholding and why they are withholding it."

Lally and co-prosecutor Daniel Saunders disagreed with the contention that they had purposely withheld evidence from defense attorneys. To the contrary, Saunders told the judge, authorities have turned over huge volumes of evidence and have been stymied in producing more tape-recordings because of the complexity of Pellicano's encryption methods.

If defense attorneys "are so desperate to get those files … ," Saunders said, glancing at Pellicano, "the man with the password is sitting right there."

The private eye, who grinned often during the courtroom discussion about evidence in the case, has been in federal custody for three years — first for pleading guilty to possession of illegal explosives and, since February, on the current charges that he directed a racketeering enterprise that included wiretapping, witness tampering and other crimes.

During his time behind bars, federal authorities have been poring over tens of thousands of documents taken from his Sunset Boulevard offices, as well as the 1,300 recordings seized by FBI agents.

At Monday's court hearing, prosecutor Saunders alleged the recordings include "at least one" illegally intercepted conversation as well as "hundreds of calls" in which Pellicano allegedly spoke to clients about wiretaps. Saunders also said there was evidence from dozens of witnesses alleging that Pellicano had engaged in wiretapping.

Saunders did not provide details on the techniques used by the FBI to decode the encrypted recordings but acknowledged that the methods were not ones that the government would want to share in open court.

Other law enforcement sources have said for months that the FBI brought in encryption experts from other federal agencies to help crack the codes allegedly used by Pellicano to safeguard his recordings.

Whether authorities will ever decode all of the alleged evidence remains a mystery.

Last week, one person close to the federal investigation said it was possible that the government will never decipher the remaining recordings because Pellicano's encryption methods "are that good." But the same person considered that possibility insignificant in the overall scheme of the case.

"We're going to keep moving forward, but we've already got plenty of evidence," said the source, who declined to be identified because of an ongoing protective order in the case.

Steven Gruel, Pellicano's attorney, took umbrage at the government's suggestion that Pellicano himself holds the key to evidence sought by the defense.

"They have had almost four years to do this," Gruel said, referring to the time since the FBI's first search of Pellicano's office in late 2002. "And Mr. Pellicano is not going to make their job any easier."

Before the end of Monday's hearing, the judge told attorneys for both sides that she would authorize a special master, possibly a retired federal judge, to help expedite disputes over evidence still being sought in the case.

Outside court, prosecutor Saunders rejected the suggestion by defense attorneys that the government was moving slowly, because it is still putting its case together. "We are prepared to go to trial tomorrow if that is what the defense really wants," he said.

He's No Angel, He's A Private Investigator (LAT)

By Rachel Abramowitz, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033195

John Nazarian shares Pellicano's profession, but his reputation is cleaner. Even if he does dig for DNA in rich people's trash.

It's 10 p.m., and John Nazarian, a burly 53-year-old private eye, is hurtling around Beverly Hills in his immaculate red Scion looking for garbage. Nazarian treats trash as his private archeological site, the detritus of human existence that exposes all our hidden vulnerabilities — financial documents, prescription bottles, booze bottles and anything, anything, that might sport DNA.

"I would love to find condoms," he said, and cackled. "It's kind of disgusting to be pawing around other people's personal waste."

Yes, it's a dirty job being a private investigator, but Nazarian is prepared to do it. As he likes to say over and over again, he is one of the most expensive private eyes in L.A., charging $10,000 to $20,000 on retainer and $400 an hour for his services. He's racked up a number of celebrity clients, including singer Peggy Lee (whom he assiduously protected from the paparazzi to preserve the public's memory of her as a blond bombshell), Dean Martin, kooky billionaire Doris Duke and her butler, Bernard Lafferty. He's caught stalkers for CBS Chairman Les Moonves and former "NYPD Blue" star Andrea Thompson.

And then there are the 20 or so unnamed Hollywood wives with philandering husbands for whom Nazarian and his crew of 22 ex-cops and sundry specialists seem to be working in perpetuity.

Nazarian is part of a long, not particularly illustrious tradition of Hollywood private eyes, from fictional antiheroes, such as Sam Spade and "Chinatown's" Jake Gittes, to real-life swaggerer Fred Otash, the investigator for the scandal sheet Confidential Magazine, and Anthony Pellicano, the infamous gumshoe who sits in jail awaiting trial on more than 100 counts of wiretapping and witness intimidation.

This is why Nazarian keeps no records. Nothing. Tonight's game plan merely consists of a 3-by-5 card with an address.

"The D.A.s get furious with me," he said in a broad Boston accent. "We've had our documents requested, and I said I don't have 'em."

For this particular jaunt around Beverly Hills and Bel-Air, Nazarian has opted for a black muscle shirt and black sweats. He is officially dressed down, having left much of what he calls his costume at home. That includes a hat, oversize designer shades and bling — most notably his trademark rings, two hunks of gold and platinum that look like smashed golf balls. He designed them himself, as he did the idiosyncratic cut of his dyed black beard. It looks as if his goatee sprouted two slender butterfly wings. He shaves what's left of his hair, like Kojak. The general look suggests menace, and that's the point.

"As a private detective, the more bad things you say about me, the more valuable my trade becomes," he said.

Pellicano Fallout

Things have cooled down in Nazarian's line of work since the Pellicano indictment.

"I said to the lawyers, all the good wire guys, they've all gone to Chicago for the summer. Anybody who goes out and wiretaps and does bugging now, they've got to be out of their minds."

Nazarian said he didn't bug because "I'm too old to go to jail." As a former cop, he insisted he knew how to push the boundaries without going over the line.

"I have a huge amount of sympathy for Anthony," he said as he zipped through the canyons looking for the house. "If I was his office manager, I would have made sure that none of that happened." As for the lawyers who employed Pellicano, he groaned theatrically. "I feel horrible for those guys. A lawyer always trusts me to do the right thing. Not that we break the law, but a private eye, by the mere fact of what we do, it's not like we're a bunch of choirboys. We're not."

Nazarian is almost compulsively upfront about the people who don't like him — the California Assn. of Licensed Investigators, for one, which recently suspended him from its e-mail list serve for 30 days after he sent a nasty e-mail. Nazarian thinks most private investigators are "clowns" who rack up bills and don't deliver.

"I saw what all those other private eyes were doing, and I thought I shared nothing in common … that's why I don't associate with any of them." Nazarian owns a cream-colored Bentley and a Rolls-Royce, and, as he said, 'I don't go to their conferences, because where am I going to park this Bentley in a parking lot full of Camrys?"

He also brings up a case from the early '90s, when he was working as a private eye in San Francisco. Police suspected a ring of Gypsies was swindling elderly victims out of their savings, then poisoning them with digitalis. Nazarian, something of a

DOJ_NMG_0033196

Gypsy specialist, began investigating on his own. He was later accused of scheming to sell a confidential police affidavit to Hollywood and then to the defense.

Nazarian adamantly denies trying to peddle the affidavit to the defense and says it's not his fault that the police file fell into his lap. "How do I force a police inspector to give me something? What size gun was I pointing at him?"

He did, however, register the information with the Writers Guild of America. Nazarian was never charged with any wrongdoing.

Nazarian unabashedly loves the limelight and has just wrapped his first film role, essentially playing a version of himself opposite Anthony Hopkins in "Fracture," directed by Gregory Hoblit. (Nazarian once found someone who had been stalking Hoblit's wife, actress Debrah Farentino). He's worked for the tabloid show "Extra," which last week sent him to Mexico, with a camera in tow, to hunt for Olivia Newton-John's longtime boyfriend, Patrick McDermott, who disappeared a year ago.

Nazarian employs his team of experts to do what he can't: a former Beverly Hills cop for handwriting analysis, a forensic accountant, a lab guy, tech guys for debugging or to apply Global Positioning System tracking devices to cars (the latest way to follow spouses), a European detective to handle cases that go Continental. For people worried about wiretapping, he offers simple advice: Buy a bag of disposable cellphones.

Nazarian says he tries to work with the police, particularly the Los Angeles Police Department's Threat Management Unit, which deals with celebrities and stalking.

"I always tell my clients whenever I have the police involved, if you're lying to me and they pull out a big ugly skeleton, I'm getting up and leaving you there," Nazarian said.

Det. Jeff Dunn of the Threat Management Unit declined to comment.

Former "NYPD Blue" star Thompson worked with Nazarian and the Threat Management Unit when she had a menacing and persistent stalker.

"John saved my life and my son's life," said Thompson, explaining that Nazarian not only set up surveillance at her house and kept an armed guard there at nights, but he also helped her learn skills such as hand-to-hand combat and defensive driving.

Although he does a smattering of criminal cases, family law accounts for about 70% of his business.

He is the only investigator used by 79-year-old attorney Sorrell Trope — often referred to as the dean of L.A. divorce lawyers. Trope, who has represented Cary Grant and Nicole Kidman, among other stars, has employed Nazarian to serve subpoenas and to get background information to facilitate in searches for hidden assets. "The principal thing is, he's honest," Trope said. "He's legitimate."

Family law attorney Lisa Helfend Meyer says she tried a lot of private eyes before she met Nazarian in the courthouse. "I wasn't happy because most of them are flaky.... I trust John, and I don't trust the majority of private investigators I've worked with."

In one Meyer case, Nazarian tracked down a husband who'd gone to Mexico with his wife to try to reconcile their marital differences but then vanished after five days. (Nazarian found the faithless husband with his girlfriend). In another case, a doctor claimed that he couldn't pay his child support because he was too ill to work; he was healthy enough to treat Nazarian, though, when he came in posing as a patient.

Attorney Cary Goldstein, who specializes in palimony cases, uses Nazarian "for questioned documents and handwriting analysis, surveillance."

"Investigators are kind of interesting characters," Goldstein said. "What they do is sell information, and sometimes you just want to know things about people and you don't want it to be the same kind of baloney that anyone can pull off a Google search. You want to know the real stuff.... John has a web of operatives and a way ... of casually obtaining relevant information about people. That's what you pay for with someone like Nazarian."

What's notable these days about Trope, Meyer and Goldstein is that none of their names has surfaced among the widening ring of pricey L.A. attorneys who used Pellicano. However, all of them have battled with Pellicano's employers, most notably Dennis Wasser, Tom Cruise's divorce attorney, and celebrity litigator Bert Fields, both of whom have been officially notified by the U.S. attorney's office that they're "subjects of interest" in the inquiry. (Wasser and Fields have denied any wrongdoing.)

Nazarian believes — but can't prove — that he tangled with Pellicano during the acrimonious palimony battle between former Miss USA Shanna Moakler and boxer Oscar De La Hoya.

DOJ_NMG_0033197

A few hours after Moakler aired her grievances against De La Hoya on Court TV in October 2000, a crew of burly paramilitary-style operatives barged into the home she once shared with De La Hoya. According to court documents and the police report, they also ringed the perimeter and harassed friends who were trying to enter. Moakler had called Nazarian, who arrived with his crew to protect her before police came and dispersed De La Hoya's operatives. Fields represented De La Hoya at the time. Stephen Espinoza, a former attorney for Fields' firm who was working on De La Hoya's behalf, insists that the men who arrived at Moakler's house were not Pellicano's but from a different security firm employed by De La Hoya.

Nazarian definitely butted heads with Pellicano after the wife of Pellicano's former accountant sued Nazarian for several million dollars. "She wanted her husband's horses killed, and I balked at it. She sued me for breach of contract. Six months later she came back to me, asking for my help," Nazarian said.

In the interim, the former client allegedly hired Pellicano to investigate Nazarian.

"He couldn't do much. He sent a packet to my home demanding all my files, all my records. Don't contact her. Don't do this. I have power of attorney. I basically laughed at him."

Not everybody admires Nazarian's methods.

One family law attorney, Lynn Soodik, says Nazarian tried to intimidate her while she took his deposition in a case.

"He sent me a greeting card at home. On the surface, it was not threatening, but you knew he was saying, 'I know where you live.' I just thought it was unprofessional," Soodik said.

Nazarian said he also went through her trash, just to unnerve her.

"I think it's funny Lynn Soodik would say something that I did was unprofessional," he said with a smirk. "You know the difference between a private eye and a lawyer? They have a nicer office."

Determination Pays Off

Nazarian pulls up in front of a red brick house. The light in the garage is on, and the trash is, unfortunately, sitting at the side of the house behind a gate. His language turns blue. "Again there's no trash," he said.

This is the second time Nazarian has hit this house, and he's frustrated, but the night is still young. He decides to come back later, and scoots over to Bel-Air to check on a husband who his client thinks is cheating on her.

"Trust me. Just like Bugs Bunny gets a carrot, I'll get my … trash." (Indeed, a couple of weeks later, he reported finding enough blood to get a pregnancy test, as well as enough bottles of alcohol to suggest massive consumption.) Nazarian is vague about exactly what he's trying to prove, saying only that it's a family law case.

Nazarian dabbled in many professions before he became a private eye. His past incarnations include mortician, prison guard (at the Californian Institution for Women, where he got to know the Manson women), a heavy-equipment operator, the owner of a lawn business, a sheriff's deputy in San Francisco and a small-town cop in Mendota, Calif., where he worked with juveniles.

He was well known as one of the first openly gay cops in San Francisco. Nazarian says he's actually bisexual, although he generally doesn't discuss his sex life. "To classify myself, I would never say gay, but I consider myself fairly happy. I'm an across-the-board lover of trees, women, men, dogs, horses," he said. When he started out as a private eye, he worked often for people who were dying of AIDS and wanted to find lost loved ones. "All my friends who came on the department with me died of AIDS. It was a big part of the reason I left San Francisco. I lost all my friends when I was in my 30s."

Now infidelity pays the bills.

He's driving up to a client's house in Bel-Air, a $12-million mansion surrounded by foliage and mostly obscured from the street except for a portico with cars. Nazarian gets very excited because one is gone, the BMW that belongs to the spouse he's keeping tabs on.

He calls his client only to learn that the missing husband is not missing at all … but with her.

"She was laughing. 'My God, you're doing a good job of keeping track of him,' " said Nazarian, who seemed at least pleased to prove to his employer that he was working hard on her case. In the next week, he did the trash at this house and discovered that the spouse dined on TV dinners while his wife was away. "I'll never understand an unhappy multimillionaire who doesn't eat well," Nazarian said.

DOJ_NMG_0033198

The majority of Nazarian's clients are women, and it's easy to see why. While Pellicano oozed a kind of predatory, oleaginous charm, Nazarian is more like a pit bull — ferocious to strangers, but deeply loyal and solicitous to his masters.

"Women gravitate toward him because they feel comfortable with him," Meyer said. "It's hard when a woman goes through a divorce. They've relied on their husbands, and now they're adrift. John comes through for them."

Nazarian also caters to the wealthy women who don't want to give up the Jaguars and the Beverly Hills mansion — they just want to know where their husbands are sleeping.

"They basically want to keep track of the flavor of the month," Nazarian said as he cruised back to the Beverly Hills house to see if the trash was out. "The men think they're in charge, but the women are always in charge."

Nazarian earns a lot of money because of men who can't stay faithful. He loves to find people's secrets, and he reels off some recent discoveries like a hunter bragging about his kills — the wealthy couple's box of sex toys, the nude photographs that had been shredded but that his team managed to piece back together.

"It's not an honorable profession," he said, sighing.

But he's no Pellicano, the disgraced avatar of Hollywood gumshoes.

"Some of the stuff Pellicano did was overboard," Nazarian said. "It was like putting too much garlic in the sauce. He didn't need to do that."

CIVIL LAW:

High Court Reins In RICO (LAW)

By Marcia Coyle, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, June 13, 2006

Although the U.S. Supreme Court last week ducked the questions everyone expected it to answer in two unrelated challenges under RICO, the justices did tighten the reins on the law generally viewed by the business community as a legal plague.

Even though the Court on Monday turned aside E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co.'s petition in a Benlate case, the issues not resolved last week -- the scope of the "enterprise" definition in RICO and whether "reliance" is required in RICO mail and wire fraud claims -- will continue to divide the lower courts and inevitably return to the Supreme Court, according to RICO litigators and scholars.

But those watching the high court's RICO cases last week viewed the outcome basically as a victory for anti-civil RICO forces.

In Anza v. Ideal Steel Supply Corp., No. 04-433, a challenge involving two competing businesses, the justices essentially said they meant what they said in a 1992 decision: The alleged RICO violation must be the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries. The law does not permit suits by parties who have been injured only indirectly, wrote Justice Anthony M. Kennedy for the 7-2 majority.

And, in Mohawk Industries v. Williams, No. 05-465, the high court delivered a blow to a RICO class action arising out of claims that Mohawk and its outside recruiting agents hired illegal aliens to depress wages for its legal workers. The justices, in an unsigned decision, vacated the workers' favorable judgment by the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and directed that appellate court to reconsider in light of its proximate cause ruling in Anza.

"I think the Court remains concerned about the potential sweep of civil RICO litigation," said Gene C. Schaerr of the Washington office of Chicago's Winston & Strawn, who filed an amicus brief in Anza on behalf of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "The statute was passed originally to allow people to seek damages for harm as a result of mob activity. In the years since it was passed, it has gradually metamorphosed into a general purpose, business tort statute that gets raised in all kinds of business litigation where there is any allegation of fraud or dishonesty of any kind."

The Supreme Court has been making it more difficult for plaintiffs to bring civil RICO cases since the early 1990s, said Kevin P. Roddy of Wilentz, Goldman & Spitzer in Woodbridge, N.J., counsel to Ideal Steel.

DOJ_NMG_0033199

"I think the Court doesn't like the statute," he said, adding, "The work that the [U.S.] Chamber has done over the last 20 years has borne fruit. They're very concerned about business being targeted with RICO cases, and that has finally resonated with the Court. But there's roughly the same number of RICO cases that are filed each year as there are antitrust cases, and I've never heard anyone say antitrust liability has run amok."

RICO prohibits certain conduct involving a "pattern of racketeering activity." The statute, which permits the award of treble damages and attorney fees, provides a private right of action under §1964(c) to any person "injured in his business or property by reason of a violation" of the act's substantive provisions.

Ideal Steel Supply Corp. sells steel mill products, supplies and services, and operates stores in the New York City boroughs of Queens and the Bronx. National Steel Supply, owned by Joseph and Vincent Anza, is Ideal's principal competitor and also operates stores in Queens and in the Bronx.

Ideal sued National under §1964(c), charging that National had engaged in an unlawful pattern of racketeering activity by failing to charge New York sales tax to cash-paying customers and fraudulently concealing the practice from the state. Ideal alleged that this practice allowed National to reduce its prices without affecting its profit margin, and thus put Ideal at a competitive disadvantage.

The district court dismissed Ideal's complaint, but the 2nd Circuit reversed.

FRAUDULENT-CONDUCT RELIANCE

The high court originally granted review to decide whether a party seeking damages under RICO for mail or wire fraud had to prove that it had relied on the fraudulent conduct and that the reliance had resulted in injury.

"The issue most burning for the bar is where a plaintiff says, 'I didn't rely on this but my customers relied on it or the bank relied on it.' Must you always have reliance in a RICO case predicated on mail or wire fraud?" said Jeffrey E. Grell of Ricoact.com, a law firm in Edina, Minn.

"For years, lower courts and parties have been struggling with what degree, if any, reliance is required," he said. "You've got three different standards relating to reliance. I was hoping [the justices] would at least advance that debate," said Grell, who teaches civil RICO at the University of Minnesota Law School.

But, instead, the high court on June 5 said its analysis "begins ... and largely ends" with its 1992 decision in Holmes v. Securities Investor Protection Corp., 503 U.S. 258. In Holmes, the justices held that §1964(c) requires proof of "some direct relation between the injury asserted and the injurious conduct alleged."

Writing for the majority, Kennedy said Ideal had not satisfied the proximate cause requirement of Holmes. The direct victim of the alleged RICO violation, he said, was the state of New York: "It was the state that was being defrauded and the state that lost tax revenue as a result."

Ideal's asserted harms, he said, were caused by a set of actions -- National's offering of lower prices -- "entirely distinct" from the alleged RICO violation, defrauding the state.

The "directness requirement" is necessary because of the difficulty that courts may have when trying to determine damages caused by some remote action, he said. There is also an appreciable risk of duplicative recoveries without it.

"A RICO plaintiff cannot circumvent the proximate-cause requirement simply by claiming that the defendant's aim was to increase market share at a competitor's expense," wrote Kennedy. In evaluating a RICO claim for proximate causation, he said, "the central question" a court must ask is "whether the alleged violation led directly to the plaintiff's injuries."

But Justice Clarence Thomas, in dissent, said the majority's "restrictive proximate-cause test" would prevent an honest businessman from recovering for competitive injuries inflicted by an organized crime group using threats of violence on a supplier to get goods at cost that it could then resell at lower prices than its competitor. And that kind of organized crime, he wrote, was the principal concern of RICO.

In Mohawk, the justices agreed to decide whether the carpet manufacturer, working with outside hiring agencies to employ illegal aliens, was an association-in-fact enterprise under RICO. But the justices sent the case back to the 11th Circuit for further consideration in light of the Anza decision.

DOJ_NMG_0033200

"Those of us who watch this were surprised when the Court granted cert in Mohawk not on the issue of causation but on a different issue," said Ideal Steel counsel Roddy. "I suspect when the court heard argument in Anza on March 27 and later in Mohawk, it realized there was a connecting thread, which is causation.

"I think Justice Thomas got it right in Anza," he added. "We had an extensive discussion in our brief that if you went back to the '50s and '60s and the organized crime commission reports, there was recognition that one of the ways organized criminals do business is they evade their taxes. These competitor versus competitor cases do not arise very often and now there is another set of fence-posts for plaintiffs."

Plaintiffs now will have a higher pleading burden to show direct injury in order to overcome a defendant's motion to dismiss or for summary judgment, he and others said.

With the Anza decision, "The Supreme Court is saying, 'We need to circumscribe the application of civil RICO and we're going to do so through the proximate-cause vehicle,'" said Mohawk counsel Juan P. Morillo of the Washington office of Sidley Austin. "It is requiring the lower courts to more strictly apply the direct injury requirement and to pay attention to the related issue of the speculative nature of damages."

The Court's concern, said Morillo, is "how tenuous the link is" between the alleged RICO activity (in Anza, defrauding the state, and in Mohawk, hiring illegal aliens) and the alleged injury (in Anza, lowering prices, and in Mohawk, the effect on wages). "The two situations are perfectly analogous," he said.

But Morillo's high court opponent doesn't see it that way.

"Anza says the direct victim is the state," said Howard Foster of Chicago's Johnson & Bell. "In my case, I assume Mohawk would argue the U.S. government is really the party that has been injured because illegal immigrants have been hired. But the government has not suffered a monetary injury in my case, and I don't think it could bring a lawsuit for money damages. There is no Anza problem. So the extensive analysis of proximate causation which 11th Circuit has already done would not be affected."

Since the 11th Circuit found that there was proximate cause, "You could read into the tea leaves [of what the Supreme Court did in Mohawk] that there was something wrong in the 11th Circuit's analysis," suggested Grell of Ricoact.com.

But, he added, "The courts are all very respectful of their respective authority. The 11th Circuit can make up its own mind and it tends to be more RICO plaintiff-friendly than some of the other circuits, like the 7th Circuit, which is very anti-RICO plaintiff."

Foster does agree that the Supreme Court is "reining in" RICO. Anza, he said, cut back on business competitors' standing to sue.

The Anza decision closes the door on RICO suits based on indirect injuries, said Winston & Strawn's Schaerr.

"From the standpoint of a business litigator, it's a good thing," he added. "You don't want to have some vaguely phrased exception that every plaintiff is going to argue he falls within. What the Court did is very important in ensuring the RICO statute, at least in the civil arena, goes back to being confined to cases closer to what Congress had in mind."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

11th Circuit Upholds Firing Of Fla. Deputies Who Appeared In Online Porn (LAW)

By Carl Jones, Daily Business Review

Miami Daily Business Review, June 13, 2006

The Palm Beach, Fla., Sheriff's Office did not violate the U.S. Constitution when it fired two deputies for appearing in pornography distributed on the Internet, a federal appeals court has decided.

A three-judge panel of the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals unanimously held late last month that the deputies' online escapades were not constitutionally protected because government employees may be limited in their speech if that speech has a negative or detrimental effect on the integrity of the government.

In an opinion written by Judge Stanley F. Birch Jr., the 11th Circuit panel said former Deputies Ronald Thaeter and Timothy Moran were not engaged in a protected form of speech when they appeared in the pornographic photos and videos. Furthermore, since government employees can have their free speech restricted more than that of other Americans, the panel found that U.S. District Judge Daniel T.K. Hurley was right to dismiss the deputies' civil rights lawsuit against the sheriff's office.

DOJ_NMG_0033201

Judges Phyllis A. Kravitch and Richard D. Cudahy, sitting by designation, concurred.

West Palm Beach attorney Fred H. Gelston, who served as outside counsel for the sheriff's office, said deputies and other government employees are free to take part in whatever sexual activities they want. But "it's when they put it on the [Internet] that it becomes a problem," Gelston said. "And that's what the lawyers on the other side didn't understand."

One of the deputies' attorneys said he plans to appeal the 11th Circuit's decision, either by filing a petition for rehearing or asking for a writ of certiorari from the U.S. Supreme Court.

"We're very disappointed that the 11th Circuit thinks that they can monitor police officers' nonobscene conduct outside the office," said Fort Lauderdale solo attorney Richard L. Rosenbaum. Fort Lauderdale Daniel A. Aaronson also represented the deputies at trial and on appeal.

In 2000, deputy sheriffs Thaeter and Moran were asked by the wife of a fellow deputy, Jack Maxwell, to appear, along with their wives, in online pornography available to the public for pay. Deputy Maxwell and his wife also participated in the porn session.

During a single shoot, still photos and some video of the deputies engaged in group sex were shot. Eventually, those images were posted on several pay-per-view Internet sites. The three deputies had requested that their faces be blurred, but their faces were reportedly recognizable in a handful of the images.

In October 2000, an anonymous tip led officials at the sheriff's office to Web sites featuring the images of the three deputies. An investigator found the photos and video, but concluded the photos had no explicit connection to the sheriff's office unless someone happened to recognize the men as sheriff's deputies in the few photos where their faces were available. An image showing a nude woman, which turned out to be Elizabeth Maxwell, posing in front of a sheriff's office patrol car also was found, but Maxwell's body blocked the name of the county on the car.

Still, the sheriff's office pursued a variety of ethics charges against the three deputies. They were accused of failing to obtain authorization for off-duty employment and violating a pledge that states: "I will keep my private life unsullied as an example to all."

During the first phase of the investigation, Maxwell, without knowing about the investigation, resigned to open a nutrition food store. After a series of findings and appeals by the sheriff's office, then-Sheriff Ed Bieluch approved the termination of Thaeter and Moran.

In May 2002, Thaeter and Moran then filed a federal suit, claiming that the sheriff's office violated their First and 14th Amendment rights. In 2003, Judge Hurley granted a motion by the sheriff's office to dismiss the suit for failure to state a claim that could be resolved by the court. The fired deputies appealed.

The appellate panel noted that there was no dispute that Thaeter and Moran had not sought prior authorization to accept the outside employment as porn actors.

As to the free speech controversy, the court said the deputies' speech was not protected because it did not involve matters of great public interest. That holding was based on a 2004 opinion by the U.S. Supreme Court, which found that a San Diego police officer was not protected by the First Amendment when he sold on eBay a pornographic video of himself performing various sex acts.

In that case, the officer wore a generic police uniform in the video, which he sold along with genuine San Diego police gear under the same online moniker. That decision, City of San Diego v. Roe, was issued the day before the parties in the Palm Beach County case presented oral arguments before the 11th Circuit.

As in Roe, the 11th Circuit said that Thaeter and Moran were not advancing a protected form of speech.

But Rosenbaum said the firing of the two deputies and the 11th Circuit ruling mark government over-reaching into people's personal lives. As long as the conduct is not illegal, he said, "what you do on your own time is your own business."

He also criticized the sheriff's office required pledge that officers must keep their private life "unsullied." Rosenbaum said, "I've tried as best as I can to figure what [unsullied] means, and if I don't know, I don't know how a regular police officer can be put on notice about what he can and can't do."

Gelston responded that "there's nothing in the canon of ethics that says you can't murder people either. But law enforcement officers don't need to be told that."

DOJ_NMG_0033202

Flag-desecration Amendment Needs 1 More Vote (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate is one vote away from passing a constitutional amendment that would ban desecration of the U.S. flag, the closest that amendment supporters have been to passage.

The American Legion, which supports the amendment, and the American Civil Liberties Union, which opposes it, both say there are 66 votes to pass it.

Whether advocates can find the 67th vote to send the flag amendment to the states for ratification remains unclear. A Senate vote is set for the week of June 26.

Elections, post-9/11 patriotism and the Iraq war have improved the measure's prospects since the Senate last voted in 2000, says Patrick Brady of the Citizens Flag Alliance. "We're very hopeful we'll get it," he says.

The House of Representatives last year approved the flag amendment 286-130. It was the seventh time it had done so since the U.S. Supreme Court overturned a Texas law banning flag burning in 1989. The next year, the court ruled that the federal Flag Protection Act violated the First Amendment's free speech guarantee.

"The American flag is a unique symbol that should be protected," said Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, the chief sponsor.

Paul McMasters of the non-partisan First Amendment Center, which works to protect that amendment's freedoms, says the Senate is trying to provide "a radical solution to a non-problem. It's unwise, unnecessary and un-American."

Four times in the Senate, the flag measure has failed to receive the two-thirds majority required of constitutional amendments. In 2000, the amendment came up four votes short with 63.

But as Flag Day approaches Wednesday, advocates on both sides of the issue say momentum has shifted. Reasons:

•Republican gains. Sens. George Allen of Virginia, John Thune of South Dakota, John Ensign of Nevada and Richard Burr of North Carolina, all supporters of an amendment, replaced Democrats who opposed one.

•Supportive Democrats. Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and at least 13 other Democrats have voted for or voiced support for the amendment. New Jersey's Robert Menendez voted for it as a House member, and his spokesman, Allyn Brooks-LaSure, says his "current intention" is to do so as a senator. Menendez replaced now-Gov. Jon Corzine, who had opposed it.

•State resolutions. All 50 states have approved non-binding resolutions endorsing an amendment. "That is unprecedented and shouldn't be ignored," American Legion legislative director Steve Robertson says. "We will see if the senators are listening to their constituents or not."

Thirty-eight, or three-fourths, of the 50 states must ratify the measure to make it the 28th Amendment.

It took a record 202 years for states to ratify the 27th Amendment, which says a congressional pay raise can't take effect until after the next election has been held. The 26th Amendment, guaranteeing 18-year-olds the right to vote, was the quickest to be ratified: It took 100 days in 1971.

For now, enough senators — including three Republicans — remain opposed to the flag amendment to keep it from getting to the states. Sen. Robert Bennett of Utah wants to write a law instead of rewriting the Constitution. Majority Whip Mitch McConnell of Kentucky objects to altering the First Amendment. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island also voted no in 2000.

John Vile, a constitutional law expert at Middle Tennessee State University, says some believe that the amendment "would be the first in U.S. history to restrict the Bill of Rights."

Despite ads by the Citizens Flag Alliance urging his support, Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., has no plans to vote yes and does not believe his re-election will be affected. Says spokesman Chris Thorne: "This is not an issue that people are talking to us about."

ANTITRUST:

Third Trader Pleads Guilty To Manipulating Natural Gas Price (SDUT/AP)

Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, June 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033203

SAN FRANCISCO – A former trader at Williams Energy Marketing & Trading pleaded guilty in federal court to manipulating natural gas prices, authorities said Friday.

Daryl Russell Brown, 36, pleaded guilty in federal court to conspiracy to manipulate natural gas prices over approximately four years.

Brown admitted that between 1998 and 2002, he conspired with others at the Tulsa trading company to report fictitious trades to two industry newsletters – "Inside FERC's Gas Market Report" and the "Bidweek Survey."

The false reports, which were published, provided traders with bogus information that gas was trading at levels higher than it actually was – forcing natural gas prices to rise.

Brown was a trader and manager of operations at the Williams Companies' subsidiary based in Tulsa, Okla. He is the third Williams trader to be convicted of the conspiracy.

"Mr. Brown admitted that approximately 75 percent of the trades he reported to industry newsletters were deliberately fabricated," said U.S. Attorney Kevin V. Ryan.

Brown faces a maximum five years imprisonment.

AGs Want Bush Administration To Get Tough On Gas Prices (AP)

By Andrew Miga, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Massachusetts Attorney General Tom Reilly says the Bush administration needs to deliver a tough new message to big oil companies about rising gas prices: enough already.

Reilly emerged from a meeting with U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez on Monday saying oil companies deserve a "very good tongue-lashing" from top administration officials warning that unless "price gouging" stops, the government will crack down.

"This administration is going to have to get tough with them, call them in," said Reilly, a Democratic candidate for governor. "This administration can reign them in by calling them in and saying, 'Listen, enough is enough, the American people have had enough, you either do this or we are going to do this for you'."

Reilly and attorneys general from Connecticut and several other states met for about an hour at the Justice Department with Gonzalez and Federal Trade Commission Chairwoman Deborah Platt Majoras.

Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal said he proposed a joint federal-state investigation and prosecution against any illegal practices by the oil industry that are increasing gasoline prices.

"As a first step, this conversation was encouraging, although the test will be whether there is real information sharing and joint efforts to investigate and prosecute anti-trust and price-gouging violations," Blumenthal said.

The Justice Department said it was working with states on the issue.

"We are focusing on doing our part to look at this issue and we are encouraging the states to do the same," said Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos. "Today's meeting was part of an ongoing dialogue with them to insure that all appropriate steps are being taken."

President Bush has urged America to reduce its dependence on foreign oil by improving conservation, expanding domestic production and developing alternative energy sources such as ethanol.

Reilly says Bush officials have dismissed recent increases as market fluctuations in the wake of hurricanes Katrina and Rita last year. But Reilly says large refiners, not retail gas stations, were behind the steep price increases.

Federal officials should use antitrust laws to break the oil companies' grip over consumers, Reilly said.

"They have market control, they have concentration of power and they are exploiting that power on the backs of consumers, an obscene amount of profit," Reilly said at a news conference on a sidewalk outside the Justice Department.

"If we have to change the laws, then let's change the laws and deal with these companies right now," he said. "If these laws are insufficient, let's work to change these laws."

DOJ_NMG_0033204

Gasoline prices, meanwhile, were up for a second week in a row in Massachusetts, with self-serve regular unleaded averaging $2.99 per gallon, up three cents from last week and back to where it was a month ago, according to AAA Southern New England. One year ago, the price was $2.12.

In Connecticut, the average price for a gallon of regular gas was $3.14 Monday, compared with $3.06 a month ago and $2.22 a year ago, according to AAA.

Barr Settles Novartis Suit, Sees Charge (AP)

AP, June 13, 2006

Barr Pharmaceuticals Settles Lawsuit With Novartis Unit, Sees Charge in June Quarter

WOODCLIFF LAKE, N.J. (AP) -- Drug maker Barr Pharmaceuticals Inc. said Monday it agreed to pay $22.5 million to settle a lawsuit with a unit of Novartis, and said the payout will lower profit for the June quarter by 13 cents per share.

The litigation stems from a suit Invamed Inc. and Apothecon Inc. filed in 1998 charging Barr with violating antitrust laws and illegally blocking access to the raw material source for warfarin sodium, a drug that prevents blood clots. An appeals court in October 2004 reversed a lower court's ruling and found the two plaintiffs raised issues of material fact on their antitrust claims. The trial was scheduled to start on Monday.

Both Invamed and Apothecon have been acquired by Swiss drug maker Novartis AG since they filed the suit. Barr said it thought the lawsuit was without merit, but decided to settle to avoid further expense.

Barr said it would record a one-time payment of $22.5 million for the quarter ending June 30.

Mittal Refuses To Raise Arcelor Bid Staff And Agencies (AP)

By Aoife White, AP Business Writer

AP, June 13, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium - Steelmaker Arcelor SA rejected a revised offer from Mittal Steel Co., which refused again Monday to raise its 25.8 billion euros ($33 billion) bid for its rival and criticized the value of the company's deal with Russia's OAO Severstal as "entirely fictitious."

But Arcelor left the door open for Mittal, saying the Severstal transaction did not preclude an offer by Mittal and it was ready to meet Mittal again to explore a better deal.

Arcelor said Mittal's current offer "is inadequate as it continues to undervalue" the company and called the Severstal transaction "a more attractive alternative from a strategic, financial and social point of view."

Arcelor valued itself at 44 euros ($55.70) a share in an offer to buy back up to a quarter of its capital — the same price Severstal Chairman Alexei Mordashov is paying to buy 32 percent of the company.

"We have made a very compelling offer to shareholders offering a 70 percent premium to the pre-offer all-time-high share price of Arcelor," Mittal said. "The idea that the Severstal transaction values Arcelor at 44 euros is entirely fictitious and without market substantiation."

They will also decide if Arcelor can go ahead with plans for the share buyback. Arcelor's board seemed to ease off its battle against Mittal by saying it would not launch the self-tender offer until after Mittal announces how many shares it has bought.

Georges Ugeux, chairman and CEO of Galileo Global Advisors, said Arcelor shareholders are confronted with a very complicated financial transaction.

Mittal and Arcelor representatives met last week for the first time since Mittal made its surprise offer in January. Arcelor had previously refused Mittal's overtures, saying they could meet only when Mittal furnished a standalone business plan — which it did on June 2, the same day it got EU antitrust clearance.

Financier Romain Zaleski — who recently bought 5 percent of Arcelor, making him one of the largest shareholders — told Dow Jones Newswires in Italy that he believed Mittal could raise its offer again.

Dexia analyst Mickael Van den Hauwe said the Arcelor board was doing everything it could to push the valuation up, while Edmund Shing of Kepler Equities in Paris said Arcelor knows the deal is crucial for Mittal.

"They're saying, we can negotiate, but you have to pay us more," Shing said. "For Mittal, there's no comparable deal of size or fit. Mittal is saying, 'We either stay as we are or do the big deal, even if it's more expensive. It's the imperative deal."

DOJ_NMG_0033205

However, Ugeux said Mittal simply could not afford to take on more debt to make a much higher.

"They have more tons but the profitability and revenues are not as good as Arcelor. There is a limit of what he can do," he said.

European Union Takes First Steps To Include Turkey And Croatia (NYT)

By James Kanter, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

BRUSSELS, June 12 — The European Union pushed forward with enlargement plans today, conducting a first round of membership negotiations with Turkey and Croatia and signing a premembership agreement with Albania.

The talks with Turkey proceeded after a compromise was reached over a demand by Cyprus, a European Union member, that Ankara put into effect a protocol it signed with Europe last year and open up its ports and airports to trade with new member states, including Cyprus. What Cyprus got was a message from European Union foreign ministers meeting in Luxembourg asking Turkey to do just that, or face delays in "the overall progress in the negotiations."

Cyprus then dropped its objections to the start of talks and Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul of Turkey departed for Luxembourg to join the meeting.

The foreign ministers' talks today, on science and research , were the first of 35 rounds of negotiations to be held with Turkey in the accession process, which is expected to take at least a decade.

The talks with Turkey and Croatia remain on target, Krisztina Nagy, the spokeswoman for Olli Rehn, the European Union enlargement commissioner, said today. "We welcome the fact that a compromise could be made."

The moves toward further enlargement are continuing despite doubts among some in Europe after the last round of enlargement — to 25 from 15 countries — two years ago. There is also concern about absorbing not just Turkey, which would be the first mainly Muslim country to enter the union, but also countries in the Balkans.

Even so, the enlargement process still is proceeding, despite the huge financial commitments involved in integrating such economies, because of the European Union's central belief that every citizen has the right to benefit from the continent's growth. European Union states formally set the process in motion in October. Policy makers say that the criteria required for enlargement can make for stable, prosperous, Western-oriented neighbors — even if circumstances change and candidate states do not eventually join the bloc.

"The political price of stopping the process of enlargement now is very large," said Katinka Barysch, chief economist at the Center for European Reform, in London.

Another important factor is that "the process of accession can virtually transform a country," Ms. Barysch said, using as examples the transformation of the economy in Poland and other East European countries.

In addition to formally opening membership talks with Croatia, the European Union today recognized Montenegro as Europe's newest sovereign state. The agreement with Albania commits the formerly Stalinist country to intensify economic and political reforms in exchange for greater trade withEurope, but offers no entry date.

European leaders have grown wary about enlarging the European Union following the rejection by French and Dutch voters of a European constitution last spring. The votes were seen as a 'no' vote to a larger union after eight formerly Communist countries joined the bloc two years ago, along with Cyprus and Malta.

Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany has backed a partnership with Turkey, rather than full membership.

In France, Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy has said that further enlargement of the European Union should be limited to Romania and Bulgaria, which are set join by January 2008 at the latest.

Such views show "deep concern within the E.U. about not enlarging too far or too fast," Michael Emerson, a senior research fellow at the European Center for Policy Studies, in Brussels, said today.

For Turkey, and Prime Minister Recip Tayyip Erdogan, the stakes are high. Mr. Erdogan's popularity has slumped amid accelerating inflation and a drop in the value of the Turkish lira, making the prospect of European Union membership even more important in boosting standards of living, foreign investment and employment.

DOJ_NMG_0033206

Even so, Mr. Erdogan wants to avoid being seen as a hostage to European interests or being humiliated if the Union changes its view and puts new obstacles in the way of membership. In a pointed warning today, Mr. Erdogan said his enthusiasm for the European Union could wane "if politics becomes involved in this process."

European Union diplomats warned that developments today could be a harbinger of obstacles ahead, including a larger showdown between Cyprus and Turkey — still in a standoff over control of Cyprus.The government of the Greek Cypriot south of the island is the internationally recognized administration, while the Turkish north is recognized only by Turkey.

"I think there are difficult questions about what this means for the future if even today progress was so hard to achieve," one European Union diplomat said. "That's a bit strange, and suggests that we don't quite know where we are going."

The compromise today allowed Turkey to proceed with additional steps toward reaching European Union standards. The membership process requires candidate countries to put in place reforms in a wide range of areas — culture and education probably are next — and to overhaul policies in such technical areas as trade law and antitrust law.

Croatia hopes to join the union by 2009, but experts like Mr. Emerson say 2010 is a more likely date.

Few people expect Turkey, even if negotiations stay on track, to be a member until about 2016. As for Albania, the European Union urged Tirana to make improvements in public sector governance, media freedoms, property restitution and minority rights, The Associated Press reported.

Mirant Rescinds Unsolicited Bid To Acquire NRG (WSJ)

By Bhattiprolu Murti

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

Mirant Corp. withdrew its $7.9 billion hostile bid for rival power company NRG Energy Inc. following opposition from its own shareholders, saying it was disappointed NRG was unwilling to discuss the proposal.

The withdrawal ends a bitter takeover battle involving the two power companies as well as Goldman Sachs Group Inc., which initially advised Mirant before it stepped down amid allegations from NRG that it shared nonpublic information about the company with Mirant. The battle marks the increased value seen in power-generation assets after a tough period in the industry, during which both companies sought bankruptcy-court protection.

At 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, shares of NRG fell $3.93, or 7.7%, to $46.92, while Mirant's shares slipped seven cents to $24.38.

Mirant said a long and contested pursuit isn't in the best interests of the Atlanta company and its shareholders and that it will continue its efforts to create value for shareholders. NRG said the rise in its share price during the past 24 months showed the market recognized the soundness of the Princeton, N.J., company's strategy.

Earlier yesterday, hedge fund Pirate Capital LLC, run by activist investor Thomas R. Hudson Jr., sent a letter to Mirant's independent directors, saying if Mirant didn't publicly abandon its bid to acquire NRG by tomorrow and announce the hiring of an investment bank for the sale of the company, it would seek a special shareholder meeting. In the letter, filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission, Pirate Capital told Mirant's independent directors that if they didn't take appropriate action, it plans to solicit support to meet the 40% threshold to call a special stockholder meeting seeking to increase the board's size and remove some incumbent directors.

Pirate Capital is the beneficial owner of about five million Mirant shares, or 1.6% of its common stock.

Mirant, which emerged from bankruptcy protection in January, made a hostile, or unsolicited, bid in late May to acquire NRG for about $7.9 billion. Mirant subsequently sued NRG over its rejection, saying that decision was based on a false claim that Mirant had improperly obtained confidential information about NRG through independent adviser Goldman Sachs. Goldman Sachs, which resigned from the assignment, has said it did nothing wrong and provided advice based only on public information.

Pirate Capital, Omega Advisors and Jana Partners LLC sent letters to Mirant earlier this month asking the company to abandon its plans to buy NRG. Together, the three entities own 3.6% of Mirant's stock.

Zale Ends Merger Talks With Signet (WSJ)

By Kris Hudson

DOJ_NMG_0033207

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

Zale Corp. said it ended tentative merger talks with chief rival Signet Group PLC, abandoning one of its options as it scrambles to recover from a poor holiday season and three years of losing ground to other jewelry sellers in the U.S.

Had a deal been struck, it would have combined the two leading specialty-jewelry retailers in the U.S., but it also would have resulted in significant overlap of their store bases. London-based Signet operates 1,837 stores, including 1,246 in the U.S., under the Kay Jewelers and Jared brands. Zale, based in Irving, Texas, operates 2,345 stores, including 2,100 in the U.S., mostly under its flagship Zales Jewelers brand.

Zale has struggled after its strategy last year to shift its merchandise assortment and advertising to appeal to a more fashionable, upscale clientele resulted in lost sales and a sharp profit drop in its Christmas quarter. The retailer subsequently ousted its top management and scrapped much of the overhaul. It now faces an accounting investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, while its search for a new chief executive officer continues.

Meanwhile, Signet's U.S. division last year surpassed Zale in U.S. sales for the first time. Zale's total revenue in the fiscal year ended July 21, 2005, was $2.38 billion. Signet had revenue of £1.75 billion, or $3.22 billion, in the fiscal year ended Jan. 28, 2006.

The merger talks were reported by Britain's Mail on Sunday. After initially declining to comment, Signet issued a statement early yesterday morning confirming the "preliminary discussions" of a merger with Zale but noting the uncertainty of the outcome. By midday, Signet announced the talks had ended.

Zale followed in the afternoon with its own statement, explaining that Signet had approached it about a merger, but the Zale board decided against the combination. Zale's directors "concluded that its shareholders are best served by continuing as an independent company," according to the statement.

Zale also said in its statement that it anticipates introducing a new CEO "within the next several weeks." Interim CEO Mary "Betsy" Burton, who doesn't aspire to keep the job permanently, said late last month that Zale had narrowed the search to two outside candidates.

News of the merger talks boosted Zale's stock by as much as 16% to $27.75 yesterday before it was announced negotiations had ended. In 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange, Zale shares were up 3.5% to $24.70. Signet's American depositary shares gained 3.6% to $18.11 on the NYSE.

BBVA Carves Out Niche In U.S.-to-Mexico Payments (WSJ)

By Carrick Mollenkamp And Keith Johnson

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

Banco Bilbao Vizcaya Argentaria SA's Texas spending spree -- including the $2.2 billion purchase of Texas Regional Bancshares Inc. and the $480 million purchase of State National Bancshares -- sets the stage for the big Spanish bank to become a major player in the competitive market for remittances between the U.S. and Mexico and could lead to further acquisitions.

Under a deal announced yesterday, BBVA, Spain's second-largest bank in terms of market value, after Grupo Santander SA, said it would pay $2.16 billion for Texas Regional, whose branches stretch along the Rio Grande Valley. The acquisition is expected to close in the fourth quarter after shareholder and regulatory approval. Separately, BBVA also said it would buy State National, a Fort Worth bank with 44 branches and a sizable El Paso presence. The acquisitions give BBVA ownership of branches along the Texas-Mexico border stretching from El Paso eastward to McAllen, where Texas Regional is based.

The purchase could allow BBVA to gain a larger share of the remittance business that flows between the U.S. and Mexico.

Though a huge business -- some 40 million remittance transactions sent money to Mexico from the U.S. in 2003, according to a Pew Hispanic Center report -- big banks such as Citigroup Inc., Bank of America Corp., and Wells Fargo & Co. have won only a small part of that business. Much of the rest is done by wire-transfer services.

BBVA, which made another acquisition in Texas last year, has had investment bankers in Houston scoping out potential bids as part of Chairman Francisco González's ambitions to turn BBVA into one of the world's largest banking companies by 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0033208

After bulking up the bank through acquisitions in Latin America in the 1990s, Mr. González has said BBVA needs more muscle in the U.S., Europe and Asia. BBVA tried and failed to acquire an Italian lender, Banco Nazionale di Lavoro, last year. BBVA may now seek to link up its new U.S. presence with its Mexican unit, Bancomer, to make a direct play on the remittance market, potentially giving it an advantage against larger U.S. banks. For the past two years, the Madrid-based bank has focused U.S. expansion on border areas ripe for remittance business in Texas and California.

By contrast, its main domestic rival and Spain's largest bank, Santander has sought to grab a piece of the mainstream U.S. retail market. This spring, the bank got regulatory approval for the purchase of a 20% stake in Philadelphia-based Sovereign Bancorp Inc., giving it entry into the cutthroat northeastern U.S. banking market.

Texas Regional shares have risen 47% in the past year amid speculation the bank was an acquisition target. BBVA's offer values Texas Regional's stock at $38.90 a share. The stock yesterday rose $3.50, or 10%, to $37.70 in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. In 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading, BBVA's American depositary receipts fell 21 cents, or 1.1%, $18.98. Keefe, Bruyette & Woods advised Texas Regional with legal advice from Rogers & Whitley. Morgan Stanley acted as BBVA's adviser in both purchases. Law firm Sullivan & Cromwell advised on the Texas Regional purchase while Cleary Gottlieb Steen & Hamilton handled the State National deal.

Though little known outside of Texas bank circles, Texas Regional, the parent of Texas State Bank, has built a powerhouse bank in the Rio Grande Valley, located in deep south Texas bordering Mexico. The bank is led by Glen Roney, a 75-year-old Texas bank veteran who also has expanded Texas Regional into cities such as Houston.

BBVA already owns Laredo National Bancshares Inc. Laredo, also located along the U.S.-Mexican border, is northwest of McAllen. Its latest acquisition will pit the Spanish bank against J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. and a host of independent banks operating in the Rio Grande Valley and in Texas as well as banks such as Wachovia Corp. that have expanded in the state.

Under Mr. Roney, Texas Regional worked through the Texan bank crisis of the 1980s and ultimately gathered more than $6 billion in assets, according to Keefe, Bruyette and research firm SNL Financial.

Still, the 73-branch bank has struggled like other banks against a narrowing between short- and long-term interest rates that has cut into profits. Texas Regional also has fought to keep down souring loans; last year, Mr. Roney and the executives at the bank said they wouldn't pay bonuses until nonperforming loans were halved, Keefe, Bruyette said in a report. In fact, yesterday's announcement said Texas Regional shareholders may receive a special dividend of as much as 10 cents a share if the bank can collect on a souring loan to one business client.

RIAA Chief Says Illegal Song-sharing 'contained' (USAT)

By Jefferson Graham

USA Today, June 13, 2006

LOS ANGELES — Nearly a year after the Supreme Court issued a landmark ruling against online music file-sharing services, the CEO of the Recording Industry Association of America says unauthorized song swapping has been "contained."

"The problem has not been eliminated," says association CEO Mitch Bainwol. "But we believe digital downloads have emerged into a growing, thriving business, and file-trading is flat."

That's an optimistic view from an industry that saw its numbers slide to near oblivion after the launch of the original Napster in 1999. CD sales fell as much as 30%, and the RIAA pressed Congress and the courts for relief against what it said was rampant piracy.

After the Supreme Court ruled that the services could be liable for piracy by their users, the RIAA sent cease-and-desist letters to several firms. Most — including BearShare, WinMX and Grokster — shut down. EDonkey and others said they would switch to a licensed, paid model.

EDonkey, which along with BitTorrent is one of the most-used file-sharing services, has yet to make the switch.

Even with Grokster and WinMX shut down, their software programs still exist. Eric Garland, CEO of Internet measurement firm BigChampagne, says that more people than ever are using file-sharing networks. "Nearly 10 million people are online, swapping media, at any given time," he says. That May figure is up from 8.7 million people in 2005, he says.

DOJ_NMG_0033209

Garland says the RIAA has made some inroads. “They have removed the profiteers from online piracy,” he says. “They've also embarked on a very successful education campaign. Kids now know about copyright, and the consequences.”

The RIAA has sued just over 18,000 individuals for sharing songs online, with 4,500 settling for about $4,000 per case.

Album sales are still down — about 3% this year. But Bainwol says digital sales — up 77% — make up for the shortfall.

The wide availability of legitimate alternatives to file-sharing services has helped wean computer users away, says Russ Crupnick, president of the music group for market tracker NPD Group.

Apple's iTunes has sold more than 1 billion songs to consumers, and online stores Rhapsody and Napster are gaining traction. Crupnick says digital store purchases have “almost doubled” while file-sharing is flat among computer users in 12,000 homes in an NPD survey.

Meanwhile, the RIAA is suing XM Satellite Radio, which introduced a portable $399 player (from Pioneer and Samsung) that lets subscribers record songs.

Bainwol says he doesn't mind consumers acquiring songs on the device — it's just that XM hasn't licensed the songs for download.

“We love the technology and think it's cool, but if you want to be an iTunes clone, you should pay for it,” he says. XM has called the RIAA lawsuit a “negotiating” tactic.

About 1.5 billion songs are available for free swapping at any given time on file-sharing networks, says Garland, a mix of current hits and songs from such artists as the Beatles and Led Zeppelin that have yet to be released to the digital music stores.

That number is huge but hasn't grown substantially, while video piracy has. “The music industry isn't seeing double-digit growth in piracy anymore, but Hollywood is,” Garland says.

German Authorities Examine Web Rights Deal (AP)

AP, June 13, 2006

German Antitrust Authorities Examine Internet-Rights Deal Between Soccer League and Deutsche Telekom

BERLIN (AP) -- Germany's antitrust authority said Monday it is examining the compromise deal between the German soccer league and Deutsche Telekom AG for Internet broadcasting rights after receiving complaints.

The Federal Cartel Office said it had received complaints from rival Internet service providers that Deutsche Telekom is abusing its dominant position.

Under the agreement reached last Wednesday with the German soccer league, or DFL, the telecom will broadcast Bundesliga soccer games online and provide content to its T-Mobile subscribers' cell phones.

Deutsche Telekom -- which won the rights to broadcast German soccer league matches via the Internet in an auction last December -- will not, however, distribute the Internet signal through its cable and satellite operations, both companies said in a statement. In return, Deutsche Telekom agreed to pay less for the Internet rights than originally agreed.

At the same time, it was announced that pay-TV company Arena, which won the television broadcasting rights, will no longer have the right to broadcast over the Internet or to sublicense its Internet broadcasting rights.

Smaller internet service providers had hoped that they could receive a license from Arena to offer German soccer games to their customers over the Internet.

T-Online is Europe's largest Internet service provider, with some 13.5 million subscribers. Besides Germany, T-Online owns Club Internet in France and Ya.com in Spain.

Shares of Deutsche Telekom were down 0.6 percent to euro12.93 (US$16.37) in Frankfurt trading.

ENVIRONMENT:

Pipe Company Executive Gets Prison For Rigging Pollution Test (AP)

AP, June 13, 2006

SALT LAKE CITY -- An executive for a cast-iron pipe foundry in Provo was sentenced Monday to a year in prison for rigging a pollution test.

DOJ_NMG_0033210

Charles Matlock, who was vice president and general manager of Pacific States Cast Iron Pipe Co., also was fined $20,000 by U.S. District Judge Dee Benson.

Matlock pleaded guilty in February to violating the Clean Air Act by manipulating an emissions test at Pacific States, a division of Birmingham, Ala.-based McWane Inc.

At issue was a furnace stack test conducted in 2000. An indictment accused the company of feeding crude iron instead of its usual supply of contaminated automobile scrap into the foundry to cover up pollution violations.

The 2000 test was used to file emissions reports to government regulators in 2001, 2002 and 2003. McWane paid a $3 million fine for falsifying the test.

"When senior corporate executives cheat on required tests, public health and the environment suffer," said David Uhlmann, chief of the environmental crimes section of the U.S. Department of Justice.

Matlock's sentencing "is further proof of the McWane legacy: a repeat offender that committed years of environmental and worker safety violations at facilities across the country," Uhlmann said in a statement.

The Justice Department said it had obtained convictions against McWane foundries for Clean Air Act violations at Anniston, Ala.; Birmingham, Ala. Phillipsburg, N.J., and Tyler, Texas. It was at Birmingham where McWane in December was ordered to pay a $5 million fine for discharging industrial waste.

In a statement, McWane, a family-owned company, insisted it never did harm to the environment or its workers. Long before the federal investigation began, the Provo foundry upgraded its emissions control system, reducing carbon monoxide emissions by 95 percent and volatile organic compounds by nearly half, the company said.

The Provo foundry casts water and sewer pipes, fire hydrants and fittings.

EPA Rule Loosened After Oil Chief's Letter To Rove (LAT)

By Tom Hamburger And Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — A rule designed by the Environmental Protection Agency to keep groundwater clean near oil drilling sites and other construction zones was loosened after White House officials rejected it amid complaints by energy companies that it was too restrictive and after a well-connected Texas oil executive appealed to White House senior advisor Karl Rove.

The new rule, which took effect Monday, came after years of intense industry pressure, including court battles and behind-the-scenes agency lobbying. But environmentalists vowed Monday that the fight was not over, distributing internal White House documents that they said portrayed the new rule as a political payoff to an industry long aligned with the Republican Party and President Bush.

In 2002, a Texas oilman and longtime Republican activist, Ernest Angelo, wrote a letter to Rove complaining that an early version of the rule was causing many in the oil industry to "openly express doubt as to the merit of electing Republicans when we wind up with this type of stupidity."

Rove responded by forwarding the letter to top White House environmental advisors and scrawling a handwritten note directing an aide to talk to those advisors and "get a response ASAP."

Rove later wrote to Angelo, assuring him that there was a "keen awareness" within the administration of addressing not only environmental issues but also the "economic, energy and small business impacts" of the rule.

Environmentalists pointed to the Rove correspondence as evidence that the Bush White House, more than others, has mixed politics with policy decisions that are traditionally left to scientists and career regulators. At the time, Rove oversaw the White House political office and was directing strategy for the 2002 midterm elections.

Angelo had been mayor of Midland, Texas, when Bush ran an oil firm there. He is also a longtime hunting partner of Rove's. The two men first worked together when Angelo managed Ronald Reagan's 1980 presidential campaign in Texas.

In an interview Monday, Angelo welcomed the new groundwater rule and said his letter might have made a difference in how it was written. But he waved off environmentalists' questions about Rove's involvement.

DOJ_NMG_0033211

"I'm sure that his forwarding my letter to people that were in charge of it might have had some impression on them," Angelo said. "It seems to me that it was a totally proper thing to do. I can't see why anybody's upset about it, except of course that it was effective."

Asked why he wrote to Rove and not the Environmental Protection Agency or to some other official more directly associated with the matter, Angelo replied: "Karl and I have been close friends for 25 years. So, why wouldn't I write to him? He's the guy I know best in the administration."

White House spokesmen said Monday that the rule was revised as part of the federal government's standard rule-making process. They said the EPA was simply directed by White House budget officials to make the rule comply with requirements laid out by Congress in a sweeping new energy law passed last year.

The issue has been a focus of lobbying by the oil and gas industry for years, ever since Clinton administration regulators first announced their intent to require special EPA permits for construction sites smaller than five acres, including oil and gas drilling sites, as a way to discourage water pollution.

Energy executives, who have long complained of being stifled by federal regulations limiting drilling and exploration, sought and received a delay in that permit requirement in 2003. Eventually, Congress granted a permanent exemption that was written into the 2005 energy legislation.

The EPA rule issued Monday adds fine print to that broad exception in ways that critics, including six members of the Senate, say exceeds what Congress intended.

For example, the new rule generally exempts sediment — pieces of dirt and other particles that can gum up otherwise clear streams — from regulations governing runoff that may flow from oil and gas production or construction sites.

Sen. James M. Jeffords (I-Vt.), who joined five Democrats in objecting to the rule, wrote in March that there was nothing in the energy law suggesting that such an exclusion of sediment "had even entered the mind of any member of Congress as it considered the Energy Policy Act of 2005." Moreover, Jeffords wrote, the rule violated the intentions of Congress when it passed the Clean Water Act 19 years ago.

White House and administration officials disagreed.

At the EPA, Assistant Administrator Benjamin H. Grumbles said the rule responded directly to congressional action. He cited a letter from Sen. James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.), chairman of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, endorsing it. He added that the rule still allows states to regulate pollution, and that it continues to regulate sediment that contains "toxic" ingredients.

Lisa Miller, a spokeswoman for another senior lawmaker, Rep. Joe L. Barton (R-Texas), chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said Monday that the rule was designed to hold oil companies accountable for putting toxic substances in the soil, but not for dirt that results from storms.

"When it rains, storm water gets muddy, regardless of whether there's an oil well in the neighborhood," Miller said. "Congress told EPA to do this, and now they have. If there's oil in the water, a producer has to clean it up. If it's nature, they don't."

The change in the rule occurred last year when staffers in the White House Office of Management and Budget began editing an early version drafted by EPA technical staff. The Office of Management and Budget oversees another division, the Office of Information and Regulatory Policy, which critics complain has served as a central hub in the Bush White House for making government regulations more business-friendly.

A spokesman for the White House budget office, Scott Milburn, said Monday that the White House's involvement in making rules was intended to "ensure that agencies issue regulations that follow the law."

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino rejected the suggestion that Rove was involved in the rule change. Rove frequently receives requests, she said, and that he tries to reply and direct those requests to the appropriate people. She said that for environmentalists to accuse Rove of manipulating the EPA rule was a "typical overreach" by administration critics.

"That is quite an overreach, when it was the United States Congress that passed the Energy Act in a bipartisan way to ask the EPA to undertake this rulemaking," she said.

In their March letter, Jeffords and his Democratic colleagues asked EPA officials whether the correspondence with Rove influenced the final rule.

A response written by Grumbles did not directly address the Rove question. But the Natural Resources Defense Council and other environmental groups assert that they know the answer.

"We can't say that Karl Rove walked over to OMB and demanded these changes," said Sharon Buccino, director of the Natural Resources Defense Council's land program. "But it is clear that there was direction coming from the top of the White House, and this was a result of the thinking of the White House as opposed to environmental experts at EPA."

Buccino called the rule "yet another example of the Bush administration rewarding their friends in the oil and gas industry at the expense of the environment and the public's health."

In his letter to Rove, Angelo did not hide his political feelings. He thanked Rove for "all you do," and added words of encouragement on another topic: "The president has the opposition on the run on the Iraq issue."

His letter appeared to gain notice at the highest levels of the administration. Three months after Angelo sent it, a top EPA official wrote to tell him that the agency had decided to impose the temporary delay on the construction permitting rule for oil and gas companies.

The letter was copied to Rove, White House environmental advisor James L. Connaughton and then-EPA Administrator Christine Todd Whitman.

Dirk Kempthorne Arrives (NYT)

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

Dirk Kempthorne's chief task as the new secretary of the interior is to resurrect his department's long tradition of responsible stewardship of the public lands. That guiding philosophy has been seriously breached only twice, during the dismal Reagan years and again during the tenure of Gale Norton, the person Mr. Kempthorne succeeds.

With Vice President Dick Cheney cheering from the sidelines, Ms. Norton replaced the department's conservation ethic with policies that favored commercial exploitation of the vast publicly owned resources the department manages, which amount to one-fifth of the nation's land. Redressing the balance will not only bring praise from the usual suspects in the environmental community, it will also win the admiration of many of Mr. Kempthorne's fellow Republicans.

Unless he has been sound asleep during his years as Idaho's governor, Mr. Kempthorne must surely know that the administration's headlong rush to drill for oil and gas throughout the Rocky Mountain West ignited rebellious feelings among legions of President Bush's natural constituents, including ranchers worried about the impact on their land and water, and hunters and anglers who feared the destruction of landscapes rich with wildlife.

Conservationists do not dispute the need to look for oil and gas. The question is where. Fully 85 percent of the oil and gas deposits on federal lands are already open for development, and over the last two years the Interior Department has granted more new leases than the industry knows what to do with. At issue, really, are scraps of land, places the Wilderness Society once called "too wild to drill." What's being asked for is a measured approach honoring the claims of nature generally and of these rare landscapes in particular.

Ms. Norton has left a bleak legacy in other places, as well. One is the national park system, which has taken a beating. In addition to chronic financial shortfalls, which have affected everything from policing the parks to interpreting them for visitors, the administration embarked on a disastrous effort to rewrite the management policies that govern the parks. Despite moderating changes, the rewrite still tilts in favor of recreation and commercial use over preservation. The new secretary would do everyone a favor — and give the National Park Service a huge morale boost — by setting it aside.

There's one more balance issue. As she was going out the door, Ms. Norton resolved a long and complicated dispute over who controls thousands of miles of ancient cowpaths and other trails throughout the West in favor of state and local interests. Many of these trails run through national parks, wildlife refuges and monuments, and as things stand now, there is little to prevent the states from paving them and using them to promote commerce. Mr. Kempthorne should revisit this decision. If he does not, Congress should revisit it for him.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

DOJ_NMG_0033213

Four Face Drug Charges (HARTC)

By Peter Marteka, Courant Staff Writer

The Hartford Courant, June 12, 2006

Two Of The Men Already On Parole

MANCHESTER -- A three-month police investigation has resulted in the arrests of four men on drug charges, including two who were on parole.

Members of the East Central Narcotics regional task force arrested the four men Thursday and Friday on arrest and search warrants. The program was part of Operation SNAG, also known as "spring-narcotics-arrest and grab," according to Manchester police Sgt. Sandy Ficara.

German Gortiz, 22, of 506 Burnside Ave., East Hartford, was arrested without incident in a McDonald's restaurant parking lot off Burnside Avenue in East Hartford. Officer Richard Boyle and his canine partner Marco found 1.5 ounces of crack cocaine and 20 bundles of heroin from inside Gortiz's car, police said.

Gortiz, who was on parole and wearing an electronic ankle bracelet at the time of his arrest, was charged with possession of heroin, possession of heroin with intent to sell, possession of cocaine and possession of cocaine with intent to sell over 1 ounce. Bail for Gortiz was set at $250,000.

Orlando Morales, 35, of 435 Burnside Avenue, Apt. 2, East Hartford, was arrested on warrants charging him with selling cocaine to an undercover officer in the area of East Hartford, Vernon and Manchester. Morales had 1.5 ounces of powder cocaine, $217 in cash and two counterfeit $100 bills at the time of his arrest, police said. Police also found marijuana, drug paraphernalia and a scale with cocaine residue in his apartment.

Morales, who police said was on probation, was charged with possession of cocaine, possession of cocaine with intent to sell over 1 ounce, possession of marijuana, first-degree forgery, operating a drug factory and possession of drug paraphernalia. Morales was also charged in warrants with possession of cocaine and sale of cocaine. His bail was set at $400,000.

Brandon Rolax, 19, of 64 Elida Court, East Hartford - also on parole - was arrested on warrants charging him with the sale of crack cocaine to an undercover officer in Manchester, police said. Police apprehended Rolax as he fled from officers on West Middle Turnpike, along the way tossing 21 grams of crack cocaine on the street, police said.

Police charged Rolax with four counts each of possession of cocaine, sale of cocaine, possession of cocaine within 1,500 feet of a school and possession of cocaine with intent to sell within 1,500 feet of a school. His bail was set at $400,000.

During the operation, East Central Narcotics along with the assistance of federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents arrested Daniel Cote on charges of illegally manufacturing steroids and selling them online.

Cote, 35, of 5 Ridgewood St., Manchester, was charged with possession of a controlled substance, possession of drug paraphernalia, possession with intent to sell and operating a drug factory. Police said officers found a large amount of drugs and equipment in Cote's home. His bail was $250,000.

All four will be arraigned in Superior Court in Manchester today.

Prescription Drugs Find Place In Teen Culture (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, June 13, 2006

When a teenager in Jan Sigerson's office mentioned a “pharm party” in February, Sigerson thought the youth was talking about a keg party out on a farm.

“Pharm,” it turned out, was short for pharmaceuticals, such as the powerful painkillers Vicodin and OxyContin. Sigerson, program director for Journeys, a teen drug treatment program in Omaha, soon learned that area youths were organizing parties to down fistfuls of prescription drugs. Since February, several more youths at Journeys have mentioned that they attended pharm parties, Sigerson says.

“When you start to see a pattern, you know it's becoming pretty widespread,” she says. “I expect it to get worse before it gets better.”

DOJ_NMG_0033214

Drug counselors across the USA are beginning to hear about similar pill-popping parties, which are part of a rapidly developing underground culture that surrounds the rising abuse of prescription drugs by teens and young adults.

It's a culture with its own lingo: Bowls and baggies of random pills often are called "trail mix," and on Internet chat sites, collecting pills from the family medicine cabinet is called "pharming."

Carol Falkowski, director of research communications for the Hazelden Foundation, says young abusers of prescription drugs also have begun using the Internet to share "recipes" for getting high. Some websites are so simplistic, she says, that they refer to pills by color, rather than their brand names, content or potency.

That, Falkowski says, could help explain why emergency rooms are reporting that teens and young adults increasingly are showing up overdosed on bizarre and potentially lethal combinations of pills.

Overdoses of prescription and over-the-counter drugs accounted for about one-quarter of the 1.3 million drug-related emergency room admissions in 2004, the federal Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration reported last month.

The abuse of prescription and over-the-counter drugs — which barely registered a blip in drug-use surveys a decade ago — is escalating at what Falkowski and other analysts say is an alarming rate.

In a 2005 survey by the Partnership for a Drug-Free America, 19% of U.S. teenagers — roughly 4.5 million youths — reported having taken prescription painkillers such as Vicodin or OxyContin or stimulants such as Ritalin or Adderall to get high.

Vicodin has been particularly popular in recent years; a study by the University of Michigan in 2005 found that nearly 10% of 12th-graders had used it in the previous year. About 5.5% said they had used OxyContin. Both drugs are now more popular among high school seniors than Ecstasy and cocaine.

Marijuana is still the most popular drug by far; about one-third of the 12th-graders surveyed said they had used it in the previous year.

Falkowski, whose foundation is a treatment center based in Center City, Minn., says prescription pills have become popular among youths because they are easy to get and represent a more socially acceptable way of getting high than taking street drugs.

Some kids, she says, are self-medicating undiagnosed depression or anxiety, while others are using stimulants to try to get an edge on tests and studying.

Falkowski says prescription drugs are familiar mood-altering substances for a generation that grew up as prescriptions soared for Ritalin and other stimulants to treat maladies such as attention-deficit disorder. "Five million kids take prescription drugs every day for behavior disorders," she says.

"It's not unusual for kids to share pills with their friends. There have been incidents where kids bring a Ziploc baggie full of pills to school and share them with other kids."

Pharm parties, she says, are "simply everyone pooling whatever pills they have together and having a good time on a Saturday night. Kids … don't think about the consequences."

Lisa Cappiello, 39, of Brooklyn, N.Y., says that seemed to be the case with her son, Eddie. She says she knew that he had tried marijuana at 15 and sneaked beers at school.

But it wasn't until after he graduated from high school and took a year off before college that Cappiello realized the extent of her son's drug use — and the hold prescription drugs had on him.

"In what seemed like the blink of an eye, it went from marijuana and an occasional beer to so much Xanax that (one day) my husband had to pick him up when he feel asleep on a street corner waiting for some friends," she said. "He hid his drug use from me so well."

The next day, Eddie Cappiello admitted to his parents that he had taken 15 pills of Xanax, a brand name for benzodiazepine that acts as a sedative. He told his parents Xanax helped him deal with anxiety and depression.

Eddie rejected professional help and vowed to stop taking pills, his mother says. He was clean for 10 months, she says, before he was hospitalized in July 2005 after overdosing.

DOJ_NMG_0033215

Two months later, he entered a 28-day treatment program, his mother says. After he was discharged, he stayed clean for about two months — then relapsed into weekend binging: 40 to 50 pills and a quart of Jack Daniel's, sometimes by himself, sometimes with friends, Lisa Cappiello says.

Eddie Cappiello, 22, died in his bed on Feb. 17 after overdosing on a mix of pharmaceuticals. He left behind a girlfriend and two young children.

A toxicology report said he had 134 milligrams of Xanax — the equivalent of 67 pills — and an opioid derivative in his system, his mother says.

"Before four years ago, I never even heard the word Xanax," Lisa Cappiello says. "Now … I know kids as young as 12 are using it. Then I found out that Vicodin was a very big party drug. Before school, after school, at parties. Kids mixed them with alcohol and Ecstasy. It was baffling to me."

Cappiello says police, teachers and parents are so fixated on street drugs such as marijuana, cocaine and Ecstasy that they are missing the start of an epidemic.

"Eddie was not the first kid to die in this neighborhood from prescription drugs," she says.

In recent months, federal anti-drug officials have acknowledged that they didn't anticipate the quick escalation of prescription-drug abuse. Most government-sponsored drug prevention programs focus on marijuana, tobacco, alcohol and methamphetamine.

"We were taken by surprise when we started to see a high instance of abuse of prescription drugs," says Nora Volkow, director of the National Institute of Drug Abuse (NIDA), which is collecting information about how teens perceive, get and use prescription drugs so it can try to craft an effective prevention campaign.

In a bulletin last year, NIDA called the increase in pharmaceutical drug abuse among teens "disturbing" and said pharm parties were a "troubling trend."

The increasing availability of prescription drugs is a big reason for the rise in their abuse, Volkow and other drug specialists say.

Pharmaceutical companies' production of two often-abused prescription drugs — hydrocodone and oxycodone, the active ingredients in drugs such as Vicodin and OxyContin — has risen dramatically as the drugs' popularity for legitimate uses has increased. Drug companies made 29 million doses of oxycodone in 2004, up from 15 million four years earlier. Hydrocodone doses rose from 14 million in 2000 to 24 million in 2004.

The 2005 Partnership survey found that more than three in five teens can easily get prescription painkillers from their parents' medicine cabinets. And as Falkowski says, the rising number of youths being treated with stimulants has made it easier for kids to use such drugs illicitly. About 3% of children are treated with a stimulant such as Adderall or Ritalin, up from less than 1% in 1987.

Almost all of the 13 youths at Phoenix House's intensive outpatient treatment program on New York City's Upper West Side have dabbled in prescription drugs, director Tessa Vining says.

"There's definitely easy access," she says. "Maybe a parent had some surgery and took one or two painkillers from a bottle of 10, and the rest are just hanging out in the medicine cabinet."

After her son died, Cappiello says she wondered how kids in her area were getting pills. She says she learned from police that one local dealer got Xanax from his mother, who had been given a prescription for the drug. Instead of taking the pills, she gave them to her son to sell for $2 to $3 each.

Paul Michaud, 18, of Boston, says he got his first taste of OxyContin pills — he calls them OCs — from a friend during his freshman year in high school.

Until then, Michaud says, he had smoked marijuana daily and taken a Percocet pill occasionally. Michaud's father had recently died of cancer, and Michaud says he was depressed and feeling like an outsider at school. The prescription painkiller made him feel like nothing could faze him, he recalls.

"The first time I did it, I was hooked," says Michaud, who is four months into a yearlong drug treatment program at Phoenix House in Springfield, Mass. He says he quickly became a daily OxyContin user, breaking apart the time-release capsules, crushing pills and snorting the powder from five 80-milligram pills a day.

DOJ_NMG_0033216

"They're not very hard to get. I could find OCs easier than I could find pot," Michaud says. "There were plenty of people who sold them," including some dealers who got pills illicitly by mail order.

To try to reduce the supply of prescription drugs on the black market, authorities have shut down several "pill mills" — where doctors prescribe inordinate amounts of narcotics — as well as Internet pharmacies that ship drugs with little medical consultation, says Catherine Harnett, chief of demand reduction for the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA).

Last September, DEA agents arrested 18 people allegedly responsible for 4,600 such pharmacies.

A tricky part of the prescription-drug problem, Harnett says, is addressing the perception among youths that pills are safe because they are "medicine." Many teens don't equate taking such pills with using drugs such as heroin or cocaine, she says.

"If you start with pills, it seems fairly sanitary and legitimate," she says. "Kids have been lulled into believing that good medicine can be used recreationally."

Two in five teens in the Partnership study said prescription medicines, even if they are not prescribed by a doctor, are "much safer" to use than illegal drugs.

Phil Bauer of York, Pa., believes his son, Mark, 18, an avid weight lifter, started using prescription drugs to relieve chronic back pain and didn't appreciate the potential risks of taking the drugs.

Bauer says his son never behaved as he imagined a drug addict would. "He wasn't hanging out all night. He had parents who wouldn't let him do that."

Mark Bauer died of an overdose on May 28, 2004. The toxicology report found morphine, oxycodone and acetaminophen — the active ingredient in Tylenol but also an ingredient in Vicodin — in his system, Phil Bauer says.

Before his son's death, "we didn't see a bleary-eyed guy. He wasn't slurring his words," the father says. "He seemed to have a lot to live for. I did not know prescription-drug abuse was a problem. There's so much guilt in that. I don't know if I stuck my head in the ground. I did not see this coming."

Michaud says he didn't equate his OxyContin addiction with hard-core drug abuse. "Where I come from, OC is a rich boys' drug," he says. "I thought, heroin abuse, that's pretty low. I'd never stick a needle in my arm."

However, Michaud says he eventually switched to heroin. "I sniffed it and a week later, I was shooting," he says. "I thought I wasn't like other people doing heroin. I wasn't that low. Come to figure out, it all leads to the same place."

The Ground War Against Meth (ADW)

By Wendy Melillo

Adweek, June 12, 2006

Methamphetamines have hit Tennessee hard. Incidents at labs where the drug is cooked using ingredients found at the nearest pharmacy reached 850 last year, including explosions and seizures, making the state the third highest in the country to experience the scourge, according to Drug Enforcement Administration figures.

When the Partnership for a Drug-Free America asked The Buntin Group, a small Nashville agency, to develop a pro-bono campaign to fight meth, shop officials there knew they needed more powerful weapons than just TV and print ads to reach the state's more rural areas. "We wanted to turn entire towns into messages about the effects of meth to rally the community against the drug," says agency president and ecd Jeffrey Buntin Jr. "Our [research] led us to realize the collateral damage meth does not just to the user, but to the air, the water, the school system, the real estate market and the police force. This stuff can do wholesale damage, if not shut down entire communities."

The elements the agency crafted, which will begin appearing in Tennessee communities in July, take a guerrilla-style, in-your-face, everyone-is-affected approach. Picture a shack in the middle of a school parking lot with a sign that says: "If you can read this, you're already dead. ... The total number of meth labs is unknown. What we do know is that they can be anywhere and often explode."

There is an estimated $250,000 in donated media time and production costs for the campaign, according to the PDFA. The Buntin Group will place 210 displays around the state, including cardboard images of police officers in parks, with copy that reads: "This is a cardboard cutout of someone who could help you. But we have to spend millions on meth addicts and related damages. It's infecting you right now." And a spray-painted, graffiti-style mural will be placed on the side of a building where garbage is kept. The nose of the character in the picture is strategically placed near the real garbage on the ground so it looks like the trash is being snorted, one way users take meth.

DOJ_NMG_0033217

The campaign's tagline, "Infected by meth," will appear along with a biohazard sign. The biohazard theme will be picked up in other displays that show how drinking water becomes polluted when meth cooks dump toxic waste on the ground. "Advertising works when the message is put in the place that is the most relevant to the product," says Buntin cd Pat Harris. "It was important for us to imagine ourselves in these communities and to put ourselves in their daily lives. How am I, at this point in time, being affected by meth whether I have anything to do with the drug or not?"

The campaign includes TV, print and radio ads by Buntin that show the effects of the drug. In one radio spot, a high truck driver plows through a restaurant. It's also part of a national anti-meth effort launched by the Partnership last November, with work from JWT New York and Leo Burnett Chicago. Meth is a growing problem, with nationwide treatment admissions rising 11 percent in 2004, according to the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration.

Mike Townsend, the Partnership's evp and director of meth demand reduction programs, says the drug is as addictive as crack cocaine and heroin, with typical users between 18 and 25. One in four teens report they have friends who use meth, one in five have been offered it and only half see a risk in trying it once or twice, according to Partnership data.

"The worrisome thing is we are now seeing meth creeping into the teen party scene the way ecstasy did," Townsend says. "Meth was once pigeonholed as a poor person's drug that teens wouldn't bother using, but now there are signs it is becoming more accepted."

Christine Rasmuson, the Partnership's deputy director of creative development, says her group had expected a more traditional out-of-home, billboard and bus-shelter type of campaign from the Nashville agency. "But when they came to us with their first round [of work], they blew the doors off the Creative Review Committee," Rasmuson says. "I never saw a CRC meeting where there were 30-plus creative ideas presented and the committee just kept saying, 'Great, keep going.' They came in with their Southern charm and wowed a group of mostly New York elite creative minds."

Ruth Wooden, president of New York-based public opinion research group Public Agenda and former Ad Council president, says it is very difficult to communicate the idea that there are serious consequences for communities when resources are diverted to problems caused by drugs. "This approach really makes the point quickly, and with huge impact," Wooden says. "It will definitely create a word-of-mouth buzz that will bring people to look right at it. I also imagine it will generate tons of free press in newspapers and other mainstream media. But mostly, it is a community message right in the middle of where people live—like getting a sermon right in church."

Baseball Suspends Grimsley For 50 Games (AP)

AP, June 13, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- Embattled pitcher Jason Grimsley was suspended 50 games by Major League Baseball on Monday, less than a week after federal agents raided his home during an investigation into performance-enhancing drugs.

Commissioner Bud Selig's office suspended Grimsley for violating baseball's Joint Drug Prevention and Treatment Program, based on his statements to authorities regarding human growth hormone.

"I think he earned it," Arizona Diamondbacks managing general partner Ken Kendrick said. "I think it sends a message and an appropriate message."

"He violated the agreement. Obviously MLB feels that he did. That's Bud's decision and I think it's the right decision and I applaud him for it," he said.

The Diamondbacks released the reliever last Wednesday -- they don't intend to pay him, either -- and his agent said he did not expect Grimsley to pitch again. If Grimsley returns, the penalty would take effect when he's placed on a 40-man roster.

"Nothing's changed," agent Joe Bick said Monday.

Last Tuesday, 13 agents searched Grimsley's Arizona home following his admission he had used HGH, steroids and amphetamines.

According to court documents, authorities tracked a package containing two "kits" of HGH -- about a season's worth -- that was delivered at Grimsley's house on April 19. He failed a baseball drug test in 2003, documents showed.

DOJ_NMG_0033218

Acting on those documents, MLB suspended him for his alleged possession, admitted use and intended use of HGH. Baseball toughened its drug program and penalties this season, but there is no test for HGH.

"He's retired. It's a moot point," Detroit Tigers closer Todd Jones said. "He didn't test positive, but because he said he did, they're going to suspend him?

"It's kind of like giving a speeding ticket to a guy that got killed in a car wreck," he said.

The 38-year-old Grimsley was 1-2 with a 4.88 ERA in 19 games as a long reliever this season, his first with Arizona.

"The suspension will become effective only if Jason chooses to continue his playing career," said Michael Weiner, general counsel to the players union. "The association will confer with Jason as to whether, under the circumstances, he wishes to grieve the suspension."

Grimsley and the Diamondbacks are currently in a dispute over payment of the remainder of his $825,000 salary.

Grimsley asked for his release last week and Arizona granted it. At the time, Bick said there had been no negotiation about money and added, "Released players get paid."

But the team later said it did not intend to pay him the rest, and filed a notice of termination Monday.

"This guy did no less than steal from us," Kendrick said Saturday night.

Bick responded by saying Grimsley would contest the Diamondbacks' decision, and Weiner said the union would soon file a grievance.

"The Diamondbacks' release of Jason is a clear violation of the Basic Agreement," Weiner said.

AP Baseball Writer Ronald Blum and AP Sports Writers Bob Baum in Phoenix and Larry Lage in Detroit contributed to this report.

D'backs Issue No-tolerance Stand On Grimsley Flap (USAT)

By Bob Nightengale, Usa Today

USA Today, June 12, 2006

The Arizona Diamondbacks, infuriated and embarrassed by reliever Jason Grimsley's involvement with steroids and human growth hormone, vow to release any player caught using illegal performance-enhancing drugs in the future, Diamondbacks managing general partner Ken Kendrick told USA TODAY.

"I don't think this should even be part of the collective bargaining agreement," Kendrick said Sunday by telephone. "This is something we all need to get our hands around. There's no limit as leaders to what we should do or where we should go. We want to make it clear that we do not condone or accept the kind of behavior Jason Grimsley has admittedly engaged in for a lot of years.

"We will not be rewarding bad behavior. I don't want anybody on our team involved in this. If they do, and we find out, we will act in the same way no matter whether it's a player with a three-year guaranteed contract with millions of dollars coming or anyone else."

"They will, in no way, play another game in an Arizona Diamondbacks uniform."

The Diamondbacks released Grimsley on Wednesday and informed his agent, Joe Bick, Friday he will be not be paid the remainder of his $825,000 contract. Kendrick, who said he plans to file termination papers today with Major League Baseball, contends Grimsley should forfeit the remaining $527,490 owed to him because he violated the terms of a standard player's contract. He was unfit to perform, Kendrick said, after Grimsley admitted to federal agents he used steroids, HGH and illegal performance-enhancing drugs.

"This guy's behavior was egregious," Kendrick said. "He's a representative of the culture of cheating. To financially reward him in the future for that is wrong."

Particularly unsettling, Kendrick said, was that Grimsley never informed the team he was being targeted as part of a probe into illegal drug use. According to court records, Grimsley told federal agents on April 19 — after being caught accepting $3,200 worth of HGH delivered to his home — that he has used illegal performance-enhancing drugs throughout his 11-year major league career. He also identified other major leaguers who used steroids, HGH and amphetamines. Federal agents raided his

DOJ_NMG_0033219

Scottsdale, Ariz., home for six hours on Tuesday. He never informed the Diamondbacks of the raid until the news broke during their game that night.

"Here's a guy who has known about this whole set of circumstances for six weeks," Kendrick said. "He spent the day with 13 federal agents. They broke his door down to get into his house. They told him that this was going to be made public. He still comes to the ballpark and still doesn't tell his agent, his manager or his teammates. We had no warning whatsoever. We all have to learn about this during the game from news reports.

"What kind of person is that? I think he was mentally impaired. He cheated us. He cheated his teammates."

Meanwhile, former Sen. George Mitchell has requested an interview with San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds as part of their steroid investigation. Bonds' attorney, Michael Rains, told the New York Daily News that Bonds won't talk unless he can be assured his statements won't later be used against him in a federal perjury investigation.

In other news, Bonds' lawsuit against two San Francisco Chronicle reporters who published parts of his grand jury testimony in the best-selling book Game of Shadows was dismissed.

Meth Takes A Toll On Indian Reservations (AP)

AP, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Leah Fyten believes every family on her South Dakota reservation has been affected by methamphetamine use. The drug has torn apart these families, led to increases in crime and bumped mortality rates. And now, the director of the Flandreau Santee Sioux Housing Authority says, it's affecting the reservation's already desperate housing situation.

Housing is not only ruined by meth labs, which are highly poisonous and often difficult to spot, but also by the destructive habits that often accompany drug use. The housing authority on the Flandreau reservation has spent countless dollars fixing up holes in the walls, broken windows, ruined appliances and other damage wrought by the violent habits of drug users, Fyten said.

"We have a small budget that decreases every year and families are growing," she said. "Housing gets worse every year. And to try to repair houses that are damaged by alcohol and drug abuse puts a strain on your budget."

Last year, Fyten's reservation recruited Jay Barton to help alleviate the problem. Barton, an Oklahoma police officer who also works for the National American Indian Housing Council, is traveling around the country teaching Indian housing officials what the drug does and how to spot it. Fyten and others say the council's seminars are breaking through in communities that have so far ignored and denied the problem, helping reservations lessen meth's collateral damage.

Barton likes to say he is shocking his students out of complacency.

"The response has been tremendous," he said. "Especially with the funding cuts that tribes have received, this is really important."

Barton teaches his students all about the drug -- its effects, its origins, its market and its chemistry. He shows them pictures of users with their teeth rotting out and tells them about the drug's poisonous effect on children who come anywhere near it.

Statistics on Indian meth use are scarce, but an administration survey found in 2004 that almost 2 percent of the American Indian population was using meth. Robert McSwain, deputy director of the Indian Health Service, told a congressional panel earlier this month that the rate of Indians using meth appears to have dramatically increased in the past five years.

This poses a major problem for states and Indian reservations, Barton said, as some states have passed laws that essentially punish property owners for meth contamination. Some landlords -- including Indian housing authorities -- have been forced to pay for cleanup of meth labs, which can cost thousands of dollars.

In addition, few states have published standards for cleanup. Congress is pushing the Environmental Protection Agency to develop federal guidelines, as there is still some confusion about the effects of chemicals involved in producing the drug.

Because it is often up to the reservations to pick up the work and also the tab, and because most of these reservations have dramatic housing shortages, Barton said there is a critical need for education about meth.

Indian housing has been a problem for decades. According to a 2003 survey, an estimated 200,000 housing units are needed immediately in Indian country and approximately 90,000 Indian families are homeless or "under-housed."

DOJ_NMG_0033220

"If we can make them aware of the costs and also the people that are abusing meth, then hopefully we can cut down on the costs," Barton said.

His seminars have led to at least one drug bust in Juneau, Alaska, where a maintenance worker who had attended a seminar identified a meth lab in his hotel.

Ron Peltier, director of the Turtle Mountain Housing Authority in North Dakota, said he hopes Barton, who gave a seminar there in early May, will be able to similarly help his reservation.

"We have a lot of workers who are unaware of how meth labs look, and we have a feeling that some of our units are being used," Peltier said. "We hear a lot of rumors. But when we go there, we don't know what to look for."

Joe Shirley Jr., president of the Navajo Nation in Arizona, says training people to spot the drug is paramount because meth is "cutting into the kinship we have as Navajo people."

"If you can't catch them there's no way to treat them," he said.

Despite their success, federal cuts to Indian programs have threatened Barton's seminars. He conducted about 50 last year, but he said fewer are scheduled in 2006 because of less federal money allocated for the National American Indian Housing Council, a quasi-government organization. After that, Barton said, organizers will have to come up with some sort of alternative.

The meth problem in Indian country has shown few signs of slowing, however. At the congressional hearing earlier this year, McSwain said the situation could be described in a single word: "crisis."

"I think what we are seeing now is that if communities don't take action it's going to get a whole lot worse," said Fyten. "It's very sad and it's very scary. People have to wake up. There's a lot of people that don't understand meth and how to detect it."

^------

On the Net:

National American Indian Housing Council: http://naihc.net/

Indian Health Service: http://www.ihs.gov/

Suspected Militants Killed In Afghanistan (AP)

AP, June 12, 2006

KANDAHAR, Afghanistan (AP) -- Security forces raided a southern Afghan village and killed 15 suspected militants, including a relative of Taliban leader Mullah Omar, while fighting and attacks elsewhere left 25 people dead, an army general said Monday.

The violence extends three weeks of the fiercest battles since the Taliban's fall in 2001, and U.S. Ambassador Ronald Neumann said the insurgents are proving to be better organized and greater in numbers than expected.

Neumann predicted there would be no letup in the offensive against the Taliban when thousands of British, Canadian and Dutch troops deploy to the volatile south by next month to take over for U.S. troops.

"I think you will now see a very strong press-back," he told reporters in Kabul. "I think a lot of unfortunate people who believe the Taliban and fight with them are going to die."

Mullah Omar's brother-in-law, Mullah Amanullah, was killed along with 14 other insurgents in Siachave village, Uruzgan province, when troops stormed the area late Sunday after a tip from tribesmen, said Afghan army commander Gen. Rehmatullah Raufi.

Amanullah, whose body was recovered from the village, was the Taliban commander in the province's Dihrawud district and responsible for numerous rebel attacks, Raufi said.

It was not clear how close Amanullah was to Omar, who is believed hiding in mountains along Afghanistan's rugged border with Pakistan.

Coalition military spokesman Sgt. Chris Miller said the military was looking into the report that Amanullah had been killed.

Six other suspected militants were captured and several assault rifles and rocket launchers seized in the raid on the village, 50 miles north of Kandahar city, Raufi said.

Two Canadian soldiers were wounded Monday in a battle with the Taliban outside Kandahar, Canadian media reported. Canadian Press said the soldiers were in serious condition.

DOJ_NMG_0033221

In a second raid early Monday, Afghan and coalition troops killed 12 suspected militants in southern Kandahar province's Saidan village, Raufi said.

The rebels were discovered hiding in a shop selling dried fruit, sparking a fierce gunbattle that followed a two-day operation tracking the insurgents.

Ten other militants were killed in neighboring Helmand province's Sangin district late Sunday in a battle involving Afghan and British forces, the Afghan general said. One British solider was killed and two were seriously wounded, Raufi said.

The British Defense Ministry reported the death Sunday and said British soldiers were on mobile patrol when the firefight broke out.

Two civilians were killed and six others wounded when a bomb hit their car as it was crossing a bridge in eastern Paktia province, said local police chief Abdulanan Raufi. It was not clear why they were targeted.

The surge in fighting has killed about 550 people, mostly militants, since mid-May. Neumann said the rebels have stepped up attacks to scare away NATO.

"They are making a major effort, believing wrongly that the European, Canadian forces will not have the will to fight," he said.

The new troops are part of a NATO force that is assuming responsibility for security in the south from the U.S.-led coalition. The number of foreign combat soldiers in the region will double once the transition is complete.

Neumann said he also believes some of the violence is being caused by drug barons inciting fighting in an effort to destabilize the region and undermine the government's U.S.-backed counternarcotics campaign.

Neumann said a campaign by President Hamid Karzai's administration to forcibly eradicate poppies prompted the drug lords to take action.

"President Karzai led a very strong policy to have governors eradicate poppy and to tell people not to grow," the ambassador said. "There were efforts by drug dealers and terrorists together to prevent that. Now they are trying to use the violence to guard their wealth."

Afghanistan supplies nearly 90 percent of the world's opium and heroin, and some of the drug profits have long been believed to fund the Taliban.

Associated Press correspondent Daniel Cooney in Kabul contributed to this report.

US Says Drug Lords Fuel Afghan Insurgency (VOA)

Voice of America, June 12, 2006

US Ambassador to Afghanistan Ronald Neumann speaks to media during a press conference at his embassy in KabulU.S. officials in Afghanistan say the country's powerful drug cartels are fueling the region's violent insurgency, in order to protect their own illegal opium networks. The allegations come amid a sharp rise in insurgent attacks in recent weeks.

U.S. Ambassador Ronald Neumann told reporters that drug lords, mostly in Southern Afghanistan, hope the insurgency will effectively incapacitate Afghan President Hamid Karzai's counter-narcotics program.

"This year, President Karzai led a very strong policy to eradicate poppy. There were efforts by drug-dealers and terrorists together to prevent that," he said. "They did not prevent it, and, I think, now, they are trying to use the violence to guard their wealth."

The U.N. says roughly two-thirds of the world's opium supply is cultivated in Afghanistan.

The illegal harvest produces billions-of-dollars every year, most of which is controlled by a relatively small group of powerful drug barons.

The largest harvests are found in Southern Afghanistan in Helmand and Kandahar provinces, which are also the Taleban's traditional strongholds.

Violence throughout the region has surged in recent weeks, as Taleban militants stage a series of deadly anti-government attacks.

The insurgent offensive comes as NATO gets ready to take over security operations in Southern Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0033222

By the end of July, U.S. forces in the region will be replaced by NATO peacekeepers, primarily British, Dutch and Canadian troops.

Ambassador Neumann says the Taleban are apparently trying to intimidate the less experienced NATO troops, who are arriving in Afghanistan.

"This is being proved wrong, and I think that a lot of people who believe the Taleban fight with them are going to die, because these forces will fight very strongly," noted Neumann.

U.S. and NATO forces say they have already responded to the Taleban attacks with their own string of powerful counter-strikes.

In the past month, more than 500 people have been killed, most of them militants.

Afghan officials say local and U.S.-led coalition forces in Southern Afghanistan killed another 37 suspected insurgents, including a brother-in-law of the Taleban's fugitive leader Mullah Mohammad Omar.

Feds Run Trash Hauling In Largest-ever Conn. Business Takeover (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 13, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- After allegedly operating for years with the Mafia as its silent partner, southern Connecticut's largest garbage-hauling conglomerate started work this week backed by some new muscle: federal marshals.

In the largest federal business takeover in Connecticut history, authorities seized control Friday of 25 companies suspected of helping carve out mob-controlled garbage routes. Now marshals must lawfully run a business in an industry that prosecutors say has been dirty since the 1980s.

"We seize assets all the time, but running a business is something new for us here," said U.S. Marshal John Bardelli.

Marshals spent the weekend at the Danbury compound that's home to businessman James Galante's trash empire. With Galante in prison and locked out of his more than 60 business and personal bank accounts, authorities must keep the trucks running and avoid letting the garbage pile up.

"We had a couple calls this morning from residents that were a little anxious," Danbury Mayor Mark Boughton said. "But we haven't had any complaints. I was out this morning and trucks were driving around doing their pickups.

Galante's companies serve about 20 southern Connecticut and eastern New York towns. His transfer station handles about 80 percent of the region's garbage and his pickup businesses are among the most dominant in the area.

Federal prosecutors say the Genovese crime family ensured that dominance in exchange for quarterly payments of $30,000.

The companies are required by a court order to maintain their service. The marshals are there to ensure that happens, institute new accounting standards and sign off on every financial transaction the companies make.

Leonard Briskman, who supervises these types of business operations for the U.S. Marshals Service, said marshals prepare for months before leading up to an indictment, researching companies and industries. Briskman's teams have seized control of casinos, horse farms, supermarkets, gas stations and, now, trash companies.

"In many cases, the businesses end up more efficient," he said. "There's a second set of eyes and many of the illegal activities have stopped, so more cash is being retained."

Cheryl D. Reedy, director of the Housatonic Resources Recovery Authority, the public agency that oversees trash pickup in the region, said she plans to meet with federal authorities this week to find out how things are working.

"Garbage and recyclables need to keep moving through that place and payments need to keep moving," she said.

It's a daunting task, Bardelli said, one that marshals are still trying to grasp. Experienced officials arrived from Washington last week to oversee the takeover and, in the coming weeks, a management company likely will be hired to run operations in the year or more until trial.

"If everything goes according to plan, the customer will not notice any difference," Bardelli said.

Bomb Suspect's Shirt Does The Talking (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda

DOJ_NMG_0033223

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

The Prince George's man charged with building a pipe bomb he allegedly wanted to use to attack a Greenbelt abortion clinic appeared in federal court yesterday wearing an antiabortion T-shirt.

On the front of Robert Weiler Jr.'s green shirt were the words "Help Cure Abortion." On the back was "ABORTION: The leading cause of death in America," as well as writing that said abortion claims 1,200,000 lives annually.

Weiler, 25, said little during his initial court appearance in Greenbelt before U.S. Magistrate Judge Charles B. Day. Assistant U.S. Attorney Bryan E. Foreman asked Day to order Weiler to remain in custody, saying the serious charges against him make him a flight risk.

Weiler did not enter a plea, and his attorney, Assistant Public Defender Michael Citara Manis, said Weiler waived his right to a detention hearing. Day scheduled a preliminary hearing for June 22, and until then Weiler will remain in custody.

Weiler is charged with four federal offenses, including possession of an unregistered destructive device and possession of a stolen firearm. Each carries a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison.

He was taken into custody at a rest stop in Western Maryland early Thursday. By dawn that day, the bomb he had allegedly built and stored at a friend's home in the Riverdale Heights area had been partially detonated by bomb squad technicians.

Weiler's father, Robert F. Weiler Sr., told The Washington Post on Friday that he and his wife turned his son in to authorities. He said that although he opposes abortion, he felt he had no choice but to turn in his son.

In the interview, he said he and his wife, Catherine, contacted Prince George's police June 4 to report their suspicions.

According to a sworn affidavit signed by two agents with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the younger Weiler admitted planning to attack the clinic and said he intended to "shoot doctors who provided abortions." A loaded gun was found in the glove box of his car when he was arrested, the affidavit says.

IMMIGRATION:

House Republicans Hit Senate Immigration Bill (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

The Senate's immigration-reform bill grants broad amnesty to illegal aliens and is even worse than previously thought, say House Republicans who have read the 850-page Senate bill and must approve any final legislation that Congress sends President Bush.

"The more people see of this Senate bill, the less they like it," House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican, said of the bill that was largely penned by Sens. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, and John McCain, Arizona Republican.

Allowing illegals to collect Social Security benefits based on past illegal work, for instance, is "outrageous," said Mr. Sensenbrenner.

But few provisions of the Senate bill have caused more head-scratching among opponents than a last-minute amendment that requires the U.S. to consult with Mexican officials before commencement of any fence construction along the border.

"I don't know what they were thinking on that one," Mr. Sensenbrenner said.

Rep. Tom Tancredo, Colorado Republican, said he met last week with a group of hotel executives from Marriott International Inc. who favor increased immigration to bring them more cheap labor to work as hotel maids. He told them about the consultation requirement.

"People in the front of the room were saying, 'No. No. That's not possible,' " he recounted. "Really," he told them. "I'm not making this up."

The provision was inserted in the bill moments before it was voted on at the behest of Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, Connecticut Democrat. It says soliciting views "of affected communities lessen tensions and foster greater understanding."

"It is simply common sense and common courtesy to consult those individuals in our own communities and in affected communities on the other side of the border before constructing a fence," Mr. Dodd said.

DOJ_NMG_0033224

The consultation amendment, he said, would "foster the kind of cooperation that is vital if we are going to once and for all secure our borders."

But, Mr. Sensenbrenner said, there are far more serious problems with the Senate bill.

For instance, the bill allows for the discounted in-state tuition rates at state colleges and universities for illegal aliens who reside in those states. Meanwhile, legal immigrants and citizens who reside outside that state must still pay the full price.

And while proponents of the bill cringe whenever people say it grants "amnesty" to illegal aliens, they don't dispute that the bill grants complete amnesty to employers who have illegally hired the millions of aliens and provided the magnet that drew them here in the first place.

And while aliens will be fined $2,000 before obtaining citizenship, opponents say it's hardly comparable punishment for the array of crimes the illegals have committed while working here. In addition to sneaking across the border, many have counterfeited documentation, committed Social Security fraud and cheated on taxes.

"An American who commits Social Security fraud ends up going to jail. An American who fails to pay taxes for two years ends up in the federal penitentiary," Mr. Sensenbrenner said. "An illegal alien who does this gets citizenship."

Mr. Tancredo said he is amazed at how little senators know about illegal entry, considering the importance Americans give it.

"They'll just trust Ted Kennedy to put this thing together for them," Mr. Tancredo said.

The president's prime-time speech last month essentially endorsing the Senate plan and arguing that it does not amount to "amnesty" caused Mr. Tancredo to do a double take.

"It's all so Clintonesque. It was horrible," he said, referring to former President Bill Clinton's penchant for parsing words. "I was listening to President Bush speak on the border, and I'm thinking to myself, 'I'm listening to Bill Clinton reworking every word, reworking every definition.' "

Immigration Takes Center Stage In Colorado (USAT)

By Tom Kenworthy

USA Today, June 13, 2006

DENVER — When 75,000 people marched on the Colorado Capitol six weeks ago for immigrant rights, it showed how big the issue of immigration is in this non-border state.

Some of the state's politicians are leading the drive for immigration changes nationwide. And the state had been planning a showdown over a ballot initiative to prohibit illegal immigrants from receiving some government services.

But the Colorado Supreme Court on Monday rejected the controversial measure, ruling 5-2 that it violates a constitutional requirement that initiatives deal with just one subject.

Even without the measure on the November ballot, Colorado voters are likely to remain at the center of the USA's boisterous immigration debate. The contentious issue could be a factor in competitive elections here for governor, Congress and control of the Legislature.

“It's an issue that kind of exploded here,” says Katy Atkinson, a Republican consultant in Denver. “This will still be an issue, especially in federal races and the governor's race.”

Dick Lamm, a former three-term governor who was helping lead the group pushing the initiative, Defend Colorado Now, called the ruling “outrageous judicial activism.” He conceded that the chances of resurrecting the measure this year “are dim.”

Federico Pea, a former Denver mayor who chairs the group opposing the measure, Keep Colorado Safe, hailed the ruling as “a victory for all of Colorado.” Pea, who was a Cabinet secretary in the Clinton administration, said Hispanics in Colorado “feel under attack.”

Hispanic influence in Colorado is longstanding, dating to land grants issued by Spain, when it controlled southern Colorado as part of its New Mexico Territory. The land-grant system was continued by Mexico after it won independence from Spain in 1821. Land grants fostered early immigration from Mexico, particularly in southern Colorado's San Luis Valley.

Today, immigration is a major issue here for several reasons:

DOJ_NMG_0033225

•The state's Hispanic population is growing — up to 19% in 2004 from 5.8% in 1980, according to the Census. Colorado has been a magnet because of economic opportunity and "a very strong multi-generational Hispanic base," Pea said.

•Two national leaders in the drive to crack down on illegal immigration hail from Colorado: U.S. Rep. Tom Tancredo, a Republican and a high-profile spokesman for tougher measures, and Lamm, co-director of a public policy institute at the University of Denver who has long argued that illegal immigration depresses U.S. wages.

•A history of tension includes a 2002 ballot effort to end bilingual education and the 2005 murder of a Denver police officer, allegedly by an illegal immigrant from Mexico who will stand trial in September.

The ballot measure would have limited the "provision of non-emergency services" by state and local governments to U.S. citizens and immigrants lawfully residing here. It would not apply to federally mandated services such as public education and emergency medical care, or major state services such as welfare and food stamps that illegal immigrants already cannot receive.

Democratic political consultant Rick Ridder says that even without the ballot measure, "immigration will still be an issue. Whether or not it is front and center is yet to be seen."

In November, Colorado voters decide who will replace Republican Gov. Bill Owens, who can't run again because of term limits. Also at stake is whether Democrats keep control of the Legislature, which they captured in 2004 for the first time in 40 years. There's an open U.S. House seat now held by Rep. Bob Beauprez, a Republican who is running for governor.

Democratic candidate for governor Bill Ritter, a former Denver district attorney, opposed the ballot initiative, calling it a "symbolic" response to a problem that can only be solved in Washington. Beauprez, his most likely opponent in the November election, favored it. Beauprez also voted for the tough House bill passed in December that would make illegal immigration a felony and emphasizes border security.

Eric Sondermann, a Denver political analyst who is non-partisan, says immigration "poses tricky dynamics to both candidates, but is a slightly greater challenge to Ritter." Blue-collar Democrats could defect to the GOP if they perceive Beauprez as tougher on immigration, he said.

Ritter predicts many voters will see immigration as a federal issue with no connection to state races.

Nonetheless, he says, "it will be part of the conversation" and could pose problems for all Republican candidates.

The death of the ballot initiative should lead to a more decorous debate on immigration, says political consultant Manolo Gonzalez-Estay, lead plaintiff in the suit decided by Monday. "Now we can have an educated, rational discussion about how we find real solutions," he says.

TAX:

Nevada Man Gets 54 Months For Trust Scheme (WEBCPA)

WebCPA.com, June 13, 2006

Washington (June 12, 2006) - More than 2,000 false income and trust tax returns later, a Nevada man has been sentenced to four-and-a-half years in prison.

R. Scot Stokes, of Henderson, Nev., was sentenced to 54 months for conspiring to defraud the United States and conspiring to commit mail and wire fraud, in connection with the promotion of a tax and investment fraud scheme, the Department of Justice and the Internal Revenue Service announced.

Stokes will serve three years of supervised release upon the completion of jail time.

In February 2005, he pleaded guilty to conspiracy and admitted that the filing of false returns had resulted in a loss of federal tax revenue between $7 million and $10 million. Piled on to that admission, Stokes said that he participated in fraudulent investment schemes that caused customers to lose between $2.5 million and $5 million.

He is one of 11 individuals who have pleaded guilty in this case, including four attorneys and one CPA.

According to papers filed with the court, Stokes admitted that between 1994 and 2004, he and his conspirators -- under the business names Advanta Strategies, World Contractual Services and CornerStone West -- marketed and sold a fraudulent trust scheme to over 300 clients through domestic and offshore seminars, promotional material and opinion letters.

DOJ_NMG_0033226

Estate-Tax Repeal Would Hurt The 'Small Rich' (WP)

By Allan Sloan

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

When the Senate turned down President Bush's bid to repeal the estate tax permanently last week, it actually did a favor for tens of thousands of moderately well-off households -- the "small rich," if you prefer. That's because such households would be worse off under the full repeal scheduled for 2010 (which Bush wants to make permanent) than they would be under the 2009 rules, which are more favorable for estates than today's rules. According to a study by Congress's nonpartisan Joint Committee on Taxation, 7,500 estates would be better off under full repeal in 2010 than under the 2009 rules -- but more than 60,000 would be worse off.

This isn't exactly what you heard during last week's debate, is it? How on earth could the beneficiary of any estate be better off under the 2009 rules than under the 2010 version of permanent repeal? The answer gets a little complicated -- but please bear with me. It has to do with the difference between so-called stepped-up tax basis and carry-over tax basis.

Under current law, when you die your heirs get stepped-up tax basis. That means the assets you bequeath are valued for income-tax purposes at what they were worth the day you died -- not what you originally paid for them. Say you paid $50,000 for stock that's worth $500,000 when you die. Your heirs can sell it for $500,000 and owe no tax on the $450,000 gain. As long as your total estate doesn't exceed the exemption limits, there's no estate tax, either.

Now watch. Under the 2009 rules, estates of up to $3.5 million ($7 million for a married couple) would be exempt from federal estate tax. The tax rate on assets above that level would be 45 percent. Inheritors would be able to step up the basis of $3.5 million (or $7 million) of inherited assets to their value the day they inherit them. Fast-forward to 2010, when the estate tax is repealed. Yes, the estate tax would be gone. But heirs would be able to step up only $1.3 million in assets to their value on the day of death. (Don't ask why; that's just how it is.)

Assets beyond $1.3 million would be valued for tax purposes at carry-over basis -- their cost (for income-tax purposes) for the person who died. So any estate with $1.3 million to $3.5 million in assets ($2.6 million to $7 million for a married couple) is worse off under full repeal in 2010 than it would be in 2009. Inheritors in the $1.3 million-to-$3.5 million range would face higher taxes if they sold inherited assets than they would under the 2009 rules. At the very least, they would have complicated paperwork to deal with. They'd be much better off inheriting in 2009 than in 2010. But if you're dealing with an estate of $3.5 billion rather than $3.5 million, you'd be far better off inheriting in 2010.

How many estates are we talking about? To answer that, let's consult the aforementioned study by the Joint Committee on Taxation. The study, requested by John Buckley, chief Democratic tax counsel for the House Ways and Means Committee, projects that 7,500 people who die in 2009 will have an estate-tax liability -- remember, that's estates of more than $3.5 million. The study also projects that 71,400 people will leave estates of $1.3 million or more. This means that 63,900 people -- 71,400 less 7,500 -- will leave estates of $1.3 million to $3.5 million. As I've shown, such estates are better off in 2009 than in 2010. "There are lots more losers than winners under full repeal compared to the 2009 rules," says Buckley, who used the study for a 2005 paper in Tax Notes, a professional journal. Yes, Buckley's a partisan. But it doesn't make him wrong -- the numbers are the numbers.

Under current law, the estate-tax exemption drops to $1 million in 2011. (The Bushies built that into their 2001 tax cut to make its total cost seem more reasonable.) This would subject broad swaths of the middle and upper-middle classes to the estate tax -- which is one reason the "eliminate the death tax" crowd got so much political traction in the first place. The original idea of an estate tax was to assess a handful of very rich people to avoid excessive concentrations of wealth while helping to finance the system that made that wealth possible.

It seems to me that adopting the 2009 rules, indexing the exemption for inflation and allowing stepped-up basis would get us back to the original intent of the estate tax. Taxing 7,500 estates a year doesn't seem unfair. And it would generate significant revenue.

What we shouldn't do is benefit a handful of very rich people by eliminating the estate tax 2010-style at the expense of the small rich and everyone else. We've already made a major mistake by allowing the alternative minimum tax, originally designed to make sure that tax-dodging rich people paid at least something to the IRS, to hit the middle and upper-middle classes but not the truly wealthy. Let's try not to make that same mistake with the estate tax.

DOJ_NMG_0033227

Sloan is Newsweek's Wall Street editor. His e-mail address issloan@panix.com.

The Everything Commission (WP)

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

THE POLITICAL system is proving itself incapable of addressing hard budgetary questions even as the time to act grows shorter. President Bush tried -- and failed -- on Social Security, the easiest of the three big entitlement programs to "fix." His efforts on tax reform fizzled -- though less spectacularly, since the president never put his energy into the issue in the first place. Congress had such a hard time agreeing on small cuts in Medicare and Medicaid last year that it abandoned any pretense of trying again this time around. And Mr. Bush's proposal for a bipartisan commission to examine the costly health-care programs has foundered as Democrats balked at signing up for any examination that put taxes off the table.

Into this standoff comes Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.) with a proposal for a base-closure-style commission to beat all commissions. It would look at the tax code and the array of entitlement programs and produce a set of recommendations, decided by a two-thirds vote, to put them on a fiscally sustainable course. Its 15 members would be appointed by the president (three members) and the congressional leadership (three each for the House and Senate majority and minority leaders). Its recommendations would come before Congress for an up-or-down vote, although the president or either chamber's budget committee would also be able to submit alternatives.

Mr. Wolf's proposal is laudable in some ways, disturbing in others. The congressman, who supported all of Mr. Bush's tax cuts, deserves credit for being explicitly willing to put tax increases on the table. New revenue is a necessary part of any solution, a reality Mr. Bush and his fellow tax-cutters have been unwilling to acknowledge. As Mr. Wolf said in announcing his plan last week, "Given the enormity of the challenge, the commission needs to be able to look at every component of our fiscal policy to fairly assess where we stand and how we can best move toward a sound fiscal future."

Mr. Wolf's big-picture approach also has much to recommend it. These issues are complex on their own but they are also interrelated, with trade-offs to be made that can't be addressed if each program is considered individually. Chipping away problem by problem might be easier -- though even that approach has proved all but impossible -- but it would avoid an urgently needed discussion of national priorities.

What gives us pause is the acknowledgment, implicit in Mr. Wolf's base-closing-commission approach, that the political system is so broken it must outsource these fundamental policy questions. Perhaps that is true; certainly, the evidence supports this gloomy assessment. But rewriting the tax code, restructuring Social Security and reshaping government-paid health care are not parochial matters like military bases that call for a special process to overcome elected officials' geographic and political self-interest. They are the bedrock questions of government and the job of elected officials, who should look at Mr. Wolf's proposal and feel embarrassed that it has come to this.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Necessary Spending Or Political Trap? (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

Both sides of the Capitol will be ringing with debate on the war in Iraq this week, first on its cost, then on its course -- with a healthy dose of election-year politics mixed in.

The House is expected to approve a record-breaking $94.5 billion emergency spending bill today to fund the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, Gulf Coast hurricane relief, border security and avian flu preparation. With Senate passage expected later in the week, the bill would push the cost of the Iraq war to nearly $320 billion, according to the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service. Military and diplomatic costs in Iraq this fiscal year will have reached $101.8 billion, up from $87.3 billion in 2005, $77.3 billion in 2004 and $51 billion in 2003, the year of the invasion, congressional analysts said.

DOJ_NMG_0033228

The House will act first on the emergency measure, with final passage scheduled for today. Nearly $66 billion would go to the Pentagon to pay for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, and an additional $4 billion would be spent on foreign assistance, including $66 million to promote democracy in neighboring Iran.

Congress delivered the dollar total that President Bush had requested in war funding. But lawmakers made several key changes, including adding $725 million to ensure that Army tracked combat vehicles such as Abrams tanks are upgraded and available to National Guard units. They also added $480 million for newer Humvees, for a total investment of $890 million, to replace retrofitted models.

The bill also would provide $2 billion to develop countermeasures to the makeshift bombs that kill many U.S. troops. But the measure knocked down Bush's request for training funds, providing $4.85 billion to prepare Iraqi and Afghan troops -- about $1 billion less than what Bush had sought.

The package also includes nearly $20 billion to help the Federal Emergency Management Agency and other local, state and federal entities continue disaster recovery and relief efforts in Louisiana and Mississippi. And Congress tucked in numerous unrelated items, including $500 million in agricultural assistance; $2.3 billion to prepare for an avian flu outbreak; and $1.9 billion to bolster security along the U.S. border, including by hiring 1,000 more border agents and adding 4,000 detention beds.

The cost of the war may be escalating, but don't expect many lawmakers to stand against a measure to fund military operations.

The real debates will begin after the spending bill is on its way to Bush. On Thursday, the House will get to a long-delayed day of discussions on Iraq and the fight against terrorism, taking up a resolution to urge "continued resolve by the United States as it moves forward toward achievement of" stability in Iraq.

The Senate, as it considers its annual defense policy bill, will be having a similar discussion, thanks to an amendment by Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) calling for Bush to reach agreement with Iraq on a schedule for troop withdrawals this year.

The House debate has been brewing for months, pushed in part by a bipartisan petition to devote the House floor to a resolution requiring Bush to develop and implement a withdrawal plan. House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) announced this spring that he would schedule a daylong debate on the war, but the timing is proving fortuitous: With the death of al-Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, Republican leaders think momentum is on their side.

To help spur the outcome GOP leaders want, the resolution was drafted to put the Iraq conflict firmly within the larger fight against terrorism, a war few politicians could oppose.

"The war on Iraq is a critical element in the broader war on terror," Boehner said last week. "There is a fundamental question here that I hope becomes the issue of this debate, and that is: What do we do about terrorists?"

Such pronouncements have made Democrats -- and some Republicans -- leery of a political trap. Five House Republicans -- Howard Coble (N.C.), Wayne T. Gilchrest (Md.), Walter B. Jones Jr. (N.C.), Jim Leach (Iowa) and Ron Paul (Tex.) -- have broken with their leaders and signed on to a petition by Democrats to debate a withdrawal plan. Jones said the group will meet today to discuss whether Thursday's session is the open and honest debate they called for or another political stunt. If it is the latter, they probably will denounce it tomorrow, then decline to participate.

"If this is just to say we support winning the war on terror, we all support that. That's a political statement, not a policy statement," said Jones, who garnered headlines in the run-up to the war, when he renamed the french fries on the House dining room menu "freedom fries."

"I would hope those who are making these decisions are smarter than that," he added. "The American people have the right, and we have the duty, to have an open and honest debate."

Dealt A Difficult Hand, Trade Official Presses On (WP)

By Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

Tuesday, June 13, 2006; Yesterday was Susan C. Schwab's first full day as U.S. trade representative, and she promptly made it clear that she views her appointment in much different terms than Washington's chattering classes.

DOJ_NMG_0033229

Yes, she knows that pundits have dismissed her as something of a caretaker because of the way President Bush nominated her in April to replace Rob Portman, who was named White House budget director. Yes, she recognizes that because the job shuffle came as global trade talks are in serious trouble, with a major deadline looming, her promotion to Portman's post has deepened skepticism that the talks will lead to a dramatic revision in international trade rules.

But the truth, Schwab said in an interview, is that she has been charged with aggressively advancing Bush's trade agenda. "The fact that the president chose to announce my nomination the same day as Ambassador Portman's was announced was evidence that the president wanted to send a message -- that he wanted a seamless transition and continued high priority on trade," she said.

To underscore the point, she emphasized that she plans to stick resolutely to the position Portman staked out in the global talks, which are known as the Doha round for the Qatari capital where they were launched at a World Trade Organization meeting in 2001. The administration is eager for an agreement that would sharply lower trade barriers among the WTO's 149 member countries, especially in farm products, and is not interested in a watered-down compromise of the sort some countries are pushing, Schwab said. And, though the United States hopes to avoid a collapse in the negotiations, it will not strike a deal that stops short of opening major new export opportunities for nations around the world, she added, declaring that a weak accord "wastes a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity."

The comments were delivered in the pleasant but steely tone Schwab has honed over nearly three decades in the trade field, most recently as one of Portman's deputies but, before that, as a Senate staffer, top Commerce Department official, academic specialist and business executive. The Senate confirmed her Thursday night, and she was sworn in Friday afternoon.

"I'll match credentials with anybody," she said, betraying a trace of irritation at the naysaying about her selection.

Schwab's training in dealing with foreigners came early -- as the daughter of a foreign service officer, moving with her parents to Togo, Nigeria, Sierra Leone, Tunisia and Thailand and spending 14 of her first 18 years abroad before attending college in the United States.

"When you're a foreign service brat, you grow up feeling that your job is to represent the United States of America, even if you're a 5- or 6-year-old kindergartner in Lome, Togo, even if you're the only American kid in the local American school -- which I was," she said. "We were in Togo during independence; we used to go out and sing the French national anthem, until one day we were singing the Togolese national anthem. I needed to show my fellow classmates that I could sing the American national anthem."

She started as an economist at the trade representative's office in the mid-1970s, trying to open the Japanese market for U.S. beef and citrus products, and also worked on trade issues at the U.S. Embassy in Tokyo. Her influence soared in the 1980s when she moved to Capitol Hill, where she joined the staff of John C. Danforth, then a senator from Missouri and the chairman of the Finance Committee's international trade subcommittee, and became a powerful shaper of U.S. trade policy as a key drafter of landmark trade legislation in 1984 and 1988. A profile published in The Washington Post in 1987 noted that her critics viewed her as a "closet protectionist" for her get-tough stance on foreign trading practices, but her admirers called her a "hard-nosed pragmatist, well versed in arcane trade economics, and a dazzling strategist and negotiator."

Schwab served as assistant secretary of commerce during President George H.W. Bush's administration, heading a department unit that promotes U.S. exports from embassies and consulates around the world. After a stint at Motorola Inc., she got her PhD and became dean of the University of Maryland School of Public Policy. Late last year, she was named one of Portman's deputies, with ambassadorial rank and responsibility for issues including U.S. relations with Europe and the Americas as well as the WTO.

The big question is whether all this experience will help her forge a meaningful agreement in the Doha talks, which are ostensibly aimed at making rules governing WTO members much more beneficial to developing countries.

An enormous gap separates the United States from the European Union on the politically sensitive issue of farm trade. Washington argues that the only way to help poor, largely agrarian countries is to slash agricultural tariffs, so it has proposed to cut them by about two-thirds while leaving only a handful of "sensitive" products exempt from such cuts. The Europeans, whose farmers are accustomed to extensive government protection, have offered cuts of less than 40 percent and insist on keeping many more sensitive products sheltered from foreign competition. An alliance of developing countries is in between the two points of view, though closer to the U.S. position.

DOJ_NMG_0033230

Late this month, Schwab will go to WTO headquarters in Geneva for a meeting that has been billed as make-or-break for the Doha round, with the aim of crafting the broad outlines of a pact. Failure at that meeting could doom the round because Bush's congressional authority to negotiate new trade deals expires in July 2007, leaving little time for the extensive drafting required before an agreement can be submitted to Capitol Hill for approval.

Schwab said that because of her duties as deputy trade representative, she knows the ministers from other WTO countries and has been interacting with them. But, she acknowledged, "the disheartening thing is that there are a number of countries that think some minimalist outcome is going to be satisfactory. But that is not an outcome that will be satisfactory to the United States."

Bush Is Told To Defend Bloch's Back (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, June 13, 2006

A group of prominent conservatives have signed a letter to President Bush aimed at calling off an investigation of Scott Bloch, the administration official tasked with protecting the rights of federal workers.

Clay Johnson III, the deputy director for management at the Office of Management and Budget (OMB), ordered the Office of Personnel Management (OPM) to investigate Bloch in response to a complaint filed last year by several anonymous career employees at the Office of Special Counsel, which Bloch heads. Johnson attended Yale University with Bush and is one of his oldest friends.

Several conservatives behind the letter to Bush say that administration officials are trying to pressure Bloch to resign his post because he doesn't believe that sexual orientation should be considered akin to race and religion as a class of civil-rights protection and this view has sparked controversy within his office and Congress.

The potential dispute between social-conservative leaders and the Bush administration comes at a time when GOP strategists are trying to boost support among the conservative wing of the party in preparation for the midterm election. Political observers viewed last week's Senate vote on a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage as a direct appeal to Republicans' conservative base.

Twenty-four conservative leaders signed the letter to Bush, which is dated June 9, including Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, one of the nation's largest Christian conservative advocacy groups; Paul Weyrich, a founding father of the modern conservative movement and chairman of Coalitions for America; Jim Backlin, vice president of legislative affairs for the Christian Coalition; and the Rev. Louis Sheldon, chairman of the Traditional Values Coalition, according to a copy obtained by The Hill.

After Bloch took office in January 2004, he reversed his Democratic-appointed predecessor's interpretation of the statute that governs federal employment. Bloch favored an interpretation of the policy that made it more difficult for gay employees to allege discrimination, said Elaine Kaplan, Bloch's predecessor, who served in the position from 1998 to 2003.

Bloch set off a firestorm by removing statements regarding job discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation from the Office of Special Counsel's website.

"The special counsel looks forward to having his name cleared and we are looking forward to an expedited conclusion to the investigation," said Loren Smith, the director of congressional and public affairs at the Office of Special Counsel. In response to Kaplan's statement defending her interpretation of statute, Smith said that the office "honors the law as written."

Several Office of Special Counsel employees later filed a complaint against Bloch after he tried to transfer them to a new field office in Detroit. The employees said they were being retaliated against for leaking information to the press about Bloch's handling of the sexual-orientation policy, one source who was granted anonymity said.

Johnson said that he had yet to receive a copy of the conservatives' letter but insisted that the investigation is justified.

"What we can tell you is that the employees of the Office of Special Counsel have made serious allegations that merit an impartial investigation," he said. "Ordinarily these kinds of complaints would be investigated by the Office of Special Counsel.

DOJ_NMG_0033231

Clearly, in this case, that does not make sense. That's why an investigation of these matters has been undertaken by the inspector general for the Office of Personnel Management, at my request."

Gay-rights advocates criticized the conservatives' letter.

Brad Luna, spokesman for the Human Rights Campaign, the nation's largest gay-rights organization, said it would be disgraceful if the OPM investigation were called off. Luna called Bloch a renegade employee who must be reined in.

Some conservatives say that the administration is putting pressure on Bloch because he has stirred up controversy over the discrimination policy. Kaplan, Bloch's Clinton-appointed predecessor, who served during the first few years of the Bush administration, said that Bush supports the interpretation that sexual orientation could serve as the basis of alleged discrimination.

Bloch's rejection of that interpretation has attracted the attention of several critics in Congress. In the wake of the controversy that greeted the beginning of Bloch's five-year term, the House Government Reform Committee passed a bill in November stating that Congress repudiates any assertion that federal employees are not protected from discrimination based on sexual orientation. Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) also wrote a series of letters to the administration about Bloch.

In their letter to Bush, conservative leaders defended Bloch and asked Bush to intervene. They argued that Bloch has been unfairly targeted for removing Clinton-era policy that "with no regard to congressionally approved statutes" added sexual orientation to the list of protected classes of race, color, religion, sex and national origin.

"For this act of faithfully upholding the rule of law, Mr. Bloch has been and continues to be attacked personally and professionally by activist groups and certain Members of Congress," the leaders wrote. "Mr. Bloch's compliance with the law has drawn harsh criticism from your political opponents and resulted in retaliatory investigations, including the ongoing investigation by the Inspector General of the Office of Personnel Management."

The conservatives concluded their letter by asking Bush to come to Bloch's defense. "Now that Mr. Bloch has come under attack for complying with Administration policy and upholding federal law, we ask that you take action to protect Scott Bloch from further harassment so that he might continue to faithfully serve you and the American public," they wrote.

One person familiar with the events that spurred the conservatives to draft the letter said that the OPM investigation has picked up in intensity in recent weeks.

When Josh Bolten took over as White House chief of staff in April, he promised to shake up the administration's management.

A Bush Aide's Blunt Words (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

Bill Clinton is a "virtuoso deceiver" and Hillary Rodham Clinton a "true chameleon" guilty of "self-serving behavior, comparative radicalism, and dubious personal morality."

Al Gore is a "mad dog" known to "foam at the mouth." John McCain is given to "showboating." And Jacques Chirac, Nelson Mandela, Gerhard Schroeder and Kofi Annan are all "feckless fools."

Says who? President Bush's new chief domestic policy adviser. While most White House aides carefully trim their public commentary, they can't take back what they said before arriving in the West Wing, and few in this day and age arrive with a more provocative paper trail than Karl Zinsmeister, who started his new job yesterday.

For a dozen years until his appointment, Zinsmeister held forth on all manner of issues and personalities as editor in chief of the American Enterprise Institute's magazine. With a sharp pen, he skewered the left, taking special aim at environmentalists, anti-globalists, feminists, contemporary artists, university faculties, Hollywood, Broadway and particularly the media, composed mainly of "left-wing, cynical, wiseguy Ivy League types, with a high prima donna quotient."

A review of years of articles reveals a formidable thinker with a powerful sense of what he considers right and wrong. As Zinsmeister sees it, racial profiling by the police makes sense; the military, if anything, treats terrorist suspects too gently; and casual sex has led to wrecked cities, violence and "endless human misery." In a "soft, often amoral, and self-indulgent age," he warned, some children "will be ruined without a whip hand," and he assured that "things generally go better with God."

DOJ_NMG_0033232

Although Zinsmeister wrote admiringly of Bush, his future boss was not exempt from remonstration when he seemed to stray. Zinsmeister chided candidate Bush for promising he would make it easier for legal immigrants to bring in relatives and questioned whether incumbent Bush "actually has a soft spot for big government."

"Though he talks a good line about battling government bloat," he wrote this year, "our current President has shown an eerie lackawanna when it comes to actually keeping a lid on the federal Pandora's box. Quite apart from Katrina or the war on terror, there has been a pattern of troublesome spending spikes right from the beginning of the Bush Administration."

For Zinsmeister, provocation has been his stock in trade. "That's kind of my M.O., for better or worse," he said by phone last week. "My main beef with much of the Washington discussion is you're forced to be so mealy-mouthed. I had the luxury as an outsider of being as blunt as I wanted. When you're outside trying to push the elephant even an inch, you have to be very crisp and uncouched."

But Zinsmeister said he understands that must change now that he advises the president. "When you're inside the tent, you have to shift gears. That's a double standard, but it's an appropriate one."

White House Deputy Chief of Staff Joel D. Kaplan said he believes that Zinsmeister will be able to make that transition. "He's here because of his powerful intellect and reputation for outside-the-box solutions to public policy problems," Kaplan said. "An outside-the-Beltway perspective, we thought, would be helpful."

In his new post, Zinsmeister will oversee the president's domestic policy process and help shape White House positions on a wide array of issues, including immigration, Social Security and energy. The position has been key in past administrations, although in this White House, it has at times been overshadowed by other aides such as Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove. Zinsmeister's predecessor, Claude A. Allen, resigned after being accused of trying to fleece retail stores in a product-exchange scam.

With scant experience in government or campaigns, Zinsmeister seemed an unlikely choice for White House domestic policy chief. Until his appointment, he was little known in Washington. At 6-foot-5, he would have stood out in the capital, but he edited the American Enterprise magazine from Cazenovia in upstate New York. He finds Washington so distasteful that even for his new job he plans to move his family no closer than Baltimore.

In fact, his antipathy for Washington got him in trouble when he was appointed. In a 2004 profile by the Syracuse New Times, Zinsmeister was quoted as saying, "People in Washington are morally repugnant, cheating, shifty human beings." But the New York Sun discovered last month that he doctored that and other quotes when he posted the profile on the AEI Web site. The edited quote said, "I learned in Washington that there is an 'overclass' in this country stocked with cheating, shifty human beings that's just as morally repugnant as our 'underclass.' "

Zinsmeister later said he was "foolish" to change the quotes and only did so because he had been misquoted. The New Times denied that and denounced him for altering its account. White House spokesman Tony Snow defended him and described Zinsmeister as someone with "sharp elbows" who "expresses himself with a certain amount of piquancy."

Another question about Zinsmeister's past arose when the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank, accused him of rÃ©sumÃ© padding. The White House release said he "founded" the American Enterprise, although the magazine had been around for four years when he took over in 1994. The White House took the blame, saying that Zinsmeister actually used the term "formulated" because he revamped the magazine but that a White House aide misunderstood and wrote "founded."

A native of Cazenovia, Zinsmeister, 47, is himself an "Ivy League type" who graduated from Yale University before working for Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan (D-N.Y.) and serving on an Education Department advisory board. He has also worked as a writer, film producer and radio commentator.

At the American Enterprise Institute, Zinsmeister stood out in a think tank known for a more libertarian, economic conservatism. Beyond cultural and social issues, he also took a special interest in Iraq. Unlike most pundits, he embedded with U.S. troops four times to get a firsthand look. The result has been two books on the war, a Marvel Comics chronicle of soldiers in Iraq and a forthcoming PBS documentary.

His faith in U.S. power translated into an optimistic view of the war. In 2003, he mocked the BBC for claiming the United States "could take, bluntly, a couple to 3,000 casualties." Later that year, he wrote, "Not too far down the road, today's drumbeat about America's failure to bring instant recovery to Iraq may look quite rash."

DOJ_NMG_0033233

A year later, he wrote a piece titled "How America Is Winning a Guerilla War." A year after that, he declared victory. "The War is Over, and We Won," announced a June 2005 piece. "With the exception of periodic flare-ups in isolated corners, our struggle in Iraq as warfare is over," he wrote. Although there will still be "egregious acts of terror," he said, "contrary to the impression given by most newspaper headlines, the United States has won the day in Iraq."

Media coverage of the war has been a favorite target. He called journalists who embedded in 2003 "whiny and appallingly soft" and later condemned the "relentlessly gloomy reporting." In March, he wrote, "More than perhaps any news event in a generation, coverage of the Iraq war has been unbalanced and incomplete."

Although Bush avoids casting terrorism as a battle with Islam, Zinsmeister has not been so reluctant. "First, let's recognize that we're in a full-blown war; that (contrary to mealy-mouthed platitudes) it is indeed a war against a considerable part of Islam," he wrote in 2001. Yet he fretted at American sensitivity. "Would you believe that the number of formal U.S. investigations of how terror detainees are being treated recently reached 189?" he wrote last fall. "What mad self-doubt and softness!"

Foreign policy won't fall under his new portfolio, but he has written extensively on social issues that will, such as race, class and culture. He has condemned "feminist absolutism," "Green irrationality," "limousine leftists" and "the dreary left-wing, homophilic P.C. propaganda that has dominated Broadway."

Zinsmeister lamented a "forced diversity crusade" that fuels more alienation than it solves and argued that "Americans should jettison affirmative action and all racial preferences." He dismissed reparations for slavery as "a clear absurdity" because "the U.S. already made a mighty payment for the sin of slavery. It was called the Civil War." He traces wrongheaded political correctness to colleges that have become "virtual one-party states, ideological monopolies, badly unbalanced ecosystems."

The Clintons are particularly anathema. He is "a chronic liar, an out-of-control adulterer, an obstructer of justice, a draft dodger, an all-round morally challenged sleazeball." She has shown "a disturbing pattern of reflexive truth-stretching and reality-doctoring."

At a time when Bush has lost support among some conservatives, the Zinsmeister appointment may reassure some of the disaffected in the party that a strong voice will be heard in the White House. Snow said Zinsmeister will be useful for his challenging viewpoints.

"You want interesting people who are smart, who have serious policy credentials and who are able to make other people think," Snow said. But not necessarily, he added, in public anymore. "I think he'll be careful with his words."

U.S. Budget Gap Shrinks On Surge In Tax Receipts (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon And Campion Walsh

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Surging individual and corporate income-tax receipts in May continued to help the federal government shrink the budget deficit to $227 billion for the first eight months of the fiscal year, down 16.6% from the same period a year earlier.

The federal government did run a larger monthly budget deficit of $42.8 billion in May, widening 21% from $35.4 billion a year earlier. However, economists said that increase was a quirk of the calendar that shifted some federal program payments into May and from accounting changes that increased the cost of subsidized student loans. "It's entirely a calendar effect," said Mike Englund, chief economist at Action Economics LLC.

The narrowing budget deficit for the fiscal year so far came even as spending increased, with federal outlays up nearly 8% so far this year to $1.77 trillion. That spending was offset by strong tax receipts, which totaled $1.54 trillion so far this year, up 13% from the same period a year earlier. Tax receipts for May climbed 26% to $192.6 billion, up from $152.7 billion in May 2005.

The White House is scheduled to release next month its updated forecast for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1. The government ran a deficit of $318 billion last year.

To date, much of the deficit reduction stems from taxes being paid by corporations, which are seeing increased profits, and from high-income individuals, who are paying taxes on capital gains.

DOJ_NMG_0033234

So far this fiscal year, individual income-tax receipts have climbed about 14% to $687 billion. Much of the increase in individual income taxes is coming from nonwithheld taxes, taxes paid on capital gains and other sources of income other than wages. Nonwithheld tax payments are up about 22% so far this year. Corporate income-tax receipts are up 30% to $184 billion.

In May alone, the government paid $20.93 billion in net interest on the federal debt. Net interest on the federal debt excludes interest paid on government debt held by federal trust funds, such as Social Security.

Lobbyists Paid For Members' Trips (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, June 13, 2006

Lobbying firms and lobbyists were listed as paying all or part of the costs for 90 congressional trips taken between 2000 and 2005, according to a new report by the Center for Public Integrity, Northwestern University's Medill News Service and American Public Media.

Lobbyists and lobbying firms are not allowed under congressional ethics rules to pay for congressional travel. Trade associations can pay for travel as long as the purpose of the trip is educational.

According to the Center for Public Integrity's website, around 20 percent of the forms that listed lobbyists or lobbying firms as sponsors of the trips had been amended to list new sponsors to comply with ethics rules.

The total cost of the trips was roughly $145,000.

The new report is part of an investigation into congressional travel. Last week, the Center for Public Integrity, Medill News Service and American Public Media reported that over the past five and a half years members of Congress and their aides went on 23,000 trips that were paid for by private interests, at a total cost of $50 million.

Someone Has To Find Facts In Paris (NYT)

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

Even in Congress's own sloppy paperwork, the bottom line for junketeering looks shameful: over just five and a half years, lawmakers and members of their staffs went off on 23,000 "fact-finding" trips worth almost $50 million, with the tab picked up by private sponsors intent on capturing legislative access and favors. Expense-paid fact finding proved particularly irresistible in Paris, the destination of more than 200 trips, Hawaii (150) and Italy (140).

True, there were four trips to Sudan, but the overall result is bad news for taxpayers who try to catch their lawmakers' attention from the wrong side of the velvet travel ropes.

Fresh tales of $500-a-night freebie hotel rooms and $25,000 rides on corporate jets are coming to light just in time for the two houses to cut a final toothless sellout of all of last year's grand promises to toughen ethics enforcement and rein in Washington's booming lobbying industry. No wonder House Republicans backed away from vows to ban private travel: their new majority leader, John Boehner of Ohio, averaged a month of privately paid trips each year, according to a vetting of travel vouchers by the nonpartisan Center for Public Integrity, American Public Media and Northwestern University's Medill News Service. The study established that bipartisanship survives in junketeering. Representative Gregory Meeks, a Democrat from Queens, and his staff were among the top 10 frequent fliers, scoring at least $350,000 in privately paid travel.

Unfortunately, this Congress will soon reaffirm its addiction to special-interest junketeering when it strikes a cosmetic deal on ethics reform that does little to end the all-too-clear abuses.

Pelosi Takes Case To Black Media (RC)

By Steve Kornacki

Roll Call, June 13, 2006

The fight over the Ways and Means Committee seat held by Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) is now playing out on the airwaves and in the pages of publications aimed at blacks, as House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) seeks to dispel the notion that she's enforcing a double standard by demanding that Jefferson step down prior to any criminal charges being filed against him.

DOJ_NMG_0033235

Unless Jefferson changes course and leaves Ways and Means on his own, the Louisianan is expected to be booted from the exclusive committee Thursday night — an extraordinary step encouraged by Pelosi, who first called on Jefferson to leave the tax-writing panel three weeks ago "in the interest of upholding the high ethical standards of the Democratic Caucus."

Jefferson is expected to face indictment on bribery-related charges, but Rep. Mel Watt (N.C.), the chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, and other leading black House Democrats have protested that their colleague is being treated differently than other Caucus members who have been suspected of, but not charged with, criminal wrongdoing.

Pelosi has said very little about the topic at her weekly press conferences. But last week, as her hand-picked members of the Democratic Steering and Policy Committee voted to recommend Jefferson's expulsion precursor to action by the full Caucus, Pelosi granted a series of interviews to black media figures.

The Minority Leader appeared on the radio show of Joe Madison, who calls himself "the Black Eagle." She also hosted a conference call with black reporters and sat for a one-on-one session with a nationally known black columnist.

"She has wanted to make sure that people understand what the Democratic Caucus was doing, and that it was about upholding a high ethical standard for the entire Democratic Caucus," said Jennifer Crider, Pelosi's press secretary.

The suggestion of a double standard, some in the CBC have warned, threatens Democrats' standing this fall with black voters, who have long been the most reliable component of the party's coalition. Democrats running for the Senate and governor might face particular fallout, Rep Donald Payne (N.J.), a former CBC chairman, warned.

"In the South Ward of Newark, Jon Corzine got 93 percent of the vote last year for governor," said Payne, who represents Newark. "If you start to erode that, you're going to see Democrats suddenly having trouble winning statewide elections."

The feedback on black talk shows, Payne declared, will determine whether the furor over Jefferson's committee seat makes waves outside of Washington, D.C.

"We don't know yet, but they're the ones who a lot of this can resonate through," he said.

Jefferson Showdown Hurts Only Democrats (USAT)

By DeWayne Wickham

USA Today, June 13, 2006

This is a fight that shouldn't happen. When the House Democratic Caucus meets Thursday to decide whether Louisiana's Rep. William Jefferson should be stripped of his seat on the powerful Ways and Means Committee, members of the Congressional Black Caucus (CBC) are expected to mount a bruising defense of their colleague.

Last week, the steering committee of the Democratic Caucus voted to temporarily remove Jefferson from the Ways and Means Committee while federal investigators determine whether he broke the law while trying to help a Kentucky company launch a high-tech business in Africa.

"We're asking him to take leave (from the committee) until he clears up this matter," House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi told me. "He can return with full seniority" if he's cleared.

While Jefferson has yet to be charged with any wrongdoing, the Kentucky business owner and a former congressional aide have pleaded guilty to bribing him. In an affidavit it used to get a warrant to search his congressional office, the FBI said it videotaped Jefferson taking $100,000 in marked bills from a businesswoman-turned-informant. The G-men later found $90,000 of that money hidden in the freezer of Jefferson's Washington home.

On Thursday, the CBC denounced the effort to oust Jefferson from the committee, saying such a move against an unindicted member of Congress is unprecedented.

Feeble defense

As defenses go, that's a pretty weak one. Sure, Pelosi might be hard pressed to point to another case in which a Democrat was forced to give up a committee assignment before being indicted. But every precedent has a beginning. And when it comes to the kind of ethical and criminal violations Jefferson is accused of, a beginning is just what's needed if Democrats want to claim the ethical high ground in Washington.

It wasn't long ago that Democrats seemed to have Republicans, who control both houses of Congress, on the ropes with charges that the Republican Party had created a "culture of corruption."

DOJ_NMG_0033236

One bribe-taking Republican, former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham of California, has landed in jail, and Tom DeLay of Texas, the once-dreaded majority leader of the House of Representatives, quit Congress on Friday as another corruption investigation — involving former lobbyist Jack Abramoff — nips at his heels. Before Abramoff's case runs its course, several other Republicans might have to fall on their swords.

Lost opportunity

Democrats had hoped the GOP's problems would help them pick up enough voter support in November to retake control of Congress. But the looming showdown between the CBC and the Democratic Caucus, which threatens to pit black and white Democrats against each other, could hurt the chances of a political revival.

CBC's chairman, Rep. Mel Watt, D-N.C., said blacks might view the Democratic Caucus' move against Jefferson in racial terms. "You've got a whole base of people out there who believe that the Democratic Party takes them for granted already," Watt said last week.

He's right. But in this case it is Jefferson who appears to be taking blacks for granted. By clinging to his committee seat, Jefferson has sparked a rupture among House Democrats that threatens to inflict lasting wounds. The only beneficiary would be the GOP, which black voters have roundly rejected in virtually every recent federal election.

Jefferson's problems — captured by FBI video and audio recordings — are of his own making. Maybe the investigation will conclude that they amount only to bad judgment. Maybe he's simply guilty of being in the wrong place at the wrong time. Or, maybe the legal trouble he faces is much more serious.

Whatever the case, Jefferson should acquiesce to Pelosi's demand that he step down from the committee whose membership he is accused of abusing. If such a request is unprecedented, it is also long overdue.

DeWayne Wickham writes weekly for USA TODAY.

Hoyer Marshals Forces (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, June 13, 2006

Allies of Rep. Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) rushed to his defense Monday as the minority whip faced a challenge from Rep. Jack Murtha (D-Pa.) for the post of majority leader, should Democrats win control of the House in November.

Murtha wrote colleagues Friday to announce his interest in the position, a move that drew a mixture of surprise and consternation and left Democrats contemplating the prospect of a contentious leadership race as they try to defy the odds and win back the House.

Hoyer's backers expressed concern that the race would hurt their ability to reach voters on policy issues.

"I regret that we're going to have this contest," said Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), a Hoyer supporter. "It will be portrayed in the media as a sign of Democratic disorder. It will distract attention from Democrats' efforts to win back the House."

Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.), another Hoyer backer, echoed those comments.

"This is not the time for an internal battle. Our battle must be to elect Democrats in a minimum of 15 more seats in November. When that happens, Steny Hoyer, who has been a tireless and loyal advocate for the party, will be the right person to serve as our Majority Leader."

A spokeswoman for Murtha had no comment.

Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.) praised Hoyer's work as whip, saying in a statement, "I know Steny Hoyer. He's a bridge builder, he brings people together, and he works not just for the people of Maryland but for the whole Democratic Caucus."

A Democratic member who is backing Hoyer said that the whip was surprised by Murtha's announcement and had been "playing catch-up" all weekend by calling colleagues.

"Steny is a lot more effective for Democrats when he's making fundraising calls instead of making majority-leader-race calls," the member said.

Many Democrats were curious what role House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) may have had in Murtha's decision. Murtha and Pelosi are close allies. Murtha managed her successful 2001 campaign for whip against Hoyer. Earlier this year, he managed the caucus vice-chairmanship campaign of Rep. John Larson (D-Conn.), widely seen as Pelosi's chosen candidate to occupy the fourth-ranking House Democratic leadership post.

DOJ_NMG_0033237

Pelosi was instrumental in bringing about Murtha's November call for redeployment of American troops out of Iraq. Even as she initially distanced herself from his plan, her staff handed out materials at his press events.

A Pelosi spokeswoman said she was "traveling and unavailable for comment" yesterday.

A Democratic official said that Murtha told Pelosi about his ambitions Thursday and that she had neither encouraged nor deterred him from moving forward.

Many members of the caucus remain perplexed by a Hoyer-Murtha match-up. While Murtha has delighted the liberal wing of the party with calls for redeployment, his overall record is conservative. He is a strong supporter of the military, an opponent of abortion rights and a foe of gay-marriage advocates.

He also carries decades-old ethical baggage from the Abscam scandal, a fact that could make Democrats wary of elevating him during a time when they hope to chart the high road on ethics. To make matters worse, he was one of four Democrats who recently voted against the Democrats' own lobbying and ethics reform package, earning excoriation from The Washington Post's editorial board.

His lack of involvement in the affairs of the Democratic caucus could also rile members. He rarely attends weekly caucus meetings, several sources said, and has raised only about $500,000 for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) as of late May, despite having assumed a national profile with redeployment calls, his critics charge. Hoyer has raised about $2 million for the committee and its affiliated programs.

The two are about even with their member-dues payments to the DCCC. Murtha has paid $200,000 of $250,000, while Hoyer has forked over $500,000 of $600,000. Members of leadership pay higher dues.

Nonetheless, Murtha's stature in the caucus as a behind-the-scenes dealmaker is nearly unrivaled and those who discount him often pay dearly. From his perch on the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, he is in a prime position to rack up favors from colleagues. And he has quietly run two successful leadership campaigns in recent years.

His background as a decorated Vietnam veteran may also appeal to Democrats eager to build credibility on the war.

Murtha's candidate in the January vice-chairmanship race vanquished Hoyer's candidate by roughly the same margin as Pelosi beat Hoyer in 2001, an indication to many that the same calculus that existed five years ago persists. If that is true and Murtha can translate support for Pelosi into support for her campaign manager, then his prospects look good.

Pelosi Mum On Murtha's Move (RC)

By Steve Kornacki

Roll Call, June 13, 2006

Three days into Rep. John Murtha's (Pa.) surprise bid to supplant Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (Md.) as the second-ranking House Democrat, there are no signs that Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) will take any steps — publicly or privately — to steer her party away from a potentially divisive leadership fight as a crucial election approaches.

Pelosi is considered the only Democrat with the clout to back Murtha off his challenge, but on Monday she remained unavailable for comment, the same approach she took Friday, when Murtha floored his colleagues by declaring his intention to challenge Hoyer for Majority Leader if the party takes back the House.

"She's not going to put a stop to it," a Democratic aide said. "You're going to have to deal with it. It's more like 'how will this thing play out?' than 'will she put a stop to it?'"

Murtha is one of Pelosi's closest allies, a prime shaper, along with Rep. George Miller (Calif.), of her 23-vote win over Hoyer for Minority Whip in 2001 — a triumph that put Pelosi on track to become the top Democrat in the House when then-Rep. Richard Gephardt (Mo.) stepped aside a year later.

Murtha apprised Pelosi of his plans shortly before springing them on his fellow Democrats, and while she declined to try to stop him, some Hoyer allies had hoped that a backlash would emerge over the weekend, forcing Pelosi to take a strong stand against Murtha's move and effectively nipping his campaign in the bud.

DOJ_NMG_0033238

But, for now at least, the race is on, with Hoyer privately scrambling to shore up commitments even as he publicly plays the confident frontrunner and Murtha apparently convinced he can ride the personal ties he's forged in his 17 terms in the House and the celebrity he's accrued from his recent anti-war outspokenness to victory.

With Pelosi refusing to wade in, Democrats are looking to past leadership contests for clues about whether the Hoyer-Murtha race is destined to serve as a repeat of the Pelosi-Hoyer contest in 2001 and the more recent fight for Caucus vice chairman. In both cases, Pelosi's side bested Hoyer's by a few dozen votes.

But even though the current situation is probably too fluid to anoint anyone as the frontrunner, Hoyer supporters were already expressing confidence in their man's prospects Monday.

As the head of his party's Whip operation for the past three years and a veteran of numerous leadership races, Hoyer starts off with a well-oiled organization — he has, for instance, access to the mobile phone number of every Democratic Member — not to mention some significant goodwill for his work to unify the Caucus.

For instance, early last week Hoyer bent over backwards at a session with reporters to swear off any challenge to Pelosi, his old foe, whether the Democrats gain or lose seats this year, by him or anyone else. Against that backdrop, Murtha's declaration three days later may have rubbed some prospective backers the wrong way.

"I find it regrettable that our party is focusing now on a leadership race that is seven months away," said Rep. Jane Harman, one of five California Democrats who have already lined up with Hoyer. "This race should not distract us from the effort to build one, united majority party."

The other Golden State Democrats on board with Hoyer are Reps. Ellen Tauscher, a co-chairwoman of the New Democrat Coalition, Dennis Cardoza, the Blue Dog Coalition's chairman, Tom Lantos and Henry Waxman. Tauscher was alone among California Democrats in backing Hoyer over Pelosi in 2001, and Cardoza was not elected to the House until 2002.

Pelosi's 118-95 win over Hoyer was keyed by four factors: her built-in homestate support; her appeal to the liberal wing of the Caucus; the enthusiasm some Democrats felt for elevating a woman to the leadership for the first time; and, not insignificantly, her status as the top fundraiser for House Democrats in the 2000 cycle.

Hoyer enthusiasts believe those factors would either be inoperative or neutralized in a contest with Murtha. Just by making inroads into the California delegation, Hoyer could erase much of his 2001 shortfall, and since it's a race between two white men, the issue of gender won't be a factor.

Hoyer's primary trump cards, though, may be fundraising and ideology.

As a leadership member, Hoyer has already traveled to 47 districts spread out over 24 states this cycle, and he's personally raised more than $2 million for the party's candidates. Murtha, by contrast, doesn't have a political action committee through which to dole out large sums of money to candidates — some of whom would be freshmen voting in the race for Majority Leader.

Hoyer is also to the left of Murtha on abortion and gun control, two hot-button issues. In 2005, Hoyer received a 100 score from NARAL Pro-Choice America, while Murtha scored a 0, raising questions about how many progressives — women in particular — will feel comfortable turning over a prime leadership spot to Murtha.

Still, the core of Hoyer's support rests in the center-right segment of the Caucus, hence his support from the Blue Dog and New Democrat leaders. Some members of those two groups fret that Murtha's candidacy could be a power grab by liberals designed to wipe Hoyer and his moderate allies out of a prospective Democratic majority leadership.

"If [Murtha] were to win," an aide to one such Member said, "it would be impossible for red-state Democrats to either campaign with or to publicly support a single member of our party's leadership. ... [Hoyer] does a fantastic job in those parts of the country, and he provides a contrast for swing voters who are concerned about Nancy Pelosi as Speaker."

The genesis of Murtha's bid remains somewhat mysterious. It's a campaign few of his colleagues ever imagined him waging, until last November, when his change of heart on the Iraq war transformed him from an almost reclusive creature of the backrooms into one of the international public faces of war opposition.

But, as he proved with Pelosi in 2001 and again in the vice chairman's race this past winter, Murtha is a powerful force in Democratic leadership elections, owing to the immense personal respect many Members have for him and his role as an influential appropriator. And despite his social conservatism and previous hawkishness on defense issues, Murtha has emerged as a grass-roots hero to progressives over Iraq. Iraq alone might be reason enough for progressive Caucus members to overlook other policy disagreements and embrace Murtha as one of their leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0033239

"My sense is he's trying to play up the whole war angle," an aide to a Democratic Member said, "and the idea that grass-roots Democrats are sick of the Hoyers of the world sticking up for the war."

As he spearheaded Rep. John Larson's (D-Conn.) upset win in January's vice chairmanship race, Murtha frequently reminded allies that his candidates were undefeated in leadership elections. The low-key, under-the-radar strategy Murtha favored in that race — Larson stopped releasing supporters' names a month before the vote, mistakenly leading many observers to write his candidacy off — seems to mirror his approach now. He appeared on MSNBC to promote his candidacy Monday night, but isn't pushing other Members to line up publicly.

"I'm sure he's telling people, 'Don't talk,'" the same aide said.

Democrats Set To Unveil Domestic Platform For '06 (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, June 13, 2006

Congressional Democratic leaders on Wednesday afternoon will return to the issues that have largely defined their party over the past decade, hosting a town hall meeting to highlight the domestic priorities of their 2006 platform.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) will headline the forum with other Congressional leaders at the Kennedy Recreation Center in Northwest Washington, D.C.

The leaders are taking a different approach to laying out the third component of their platform, holding an issues discussion rather than a ceremonial event designed to energize the party faithful.

Sources said the leaders plan to promote Democratic plans on health care, energy, the economy and education, while challenging what they argue are the failed policies of the Bush administration and the GOP-led Congress.

Joining Reid and Pelosi at the town hall will be Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin (Ill.), Caucus Secretary Debbie Stabenow (Mich.), Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.), along with House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (Md.), Caucus Chairman James Clyburn (S.C.) and Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.).

Democrats also have invited a student, a senior citizen, a farmer and a laid-off worker to help put a face to their initiatives.

In particular, Democrats will call for plans to increase the minimum wage, heighten access to health care and prescription drug coverage, improve retirement security, lay out a strategy for energy independence, boost college affordability, enact pay-as-you-go budgeting and drive down the price of gasoline.

"As Republicans seek to distract and divide and push their partisan priorities, Democrats will fight for the priorities of working families," said one senior Democratic aide. "We are listening to the concerns of everyday Americans and are united behind a positive agenda that will get America back on track."

Few of the specific agenda items are new, aides acknowledged. Some of the proposals have been part of the Democratic agenda for some time, while others have been crafted over the course of several months as the minority eyes the November elections.

This election is shaping up to be one of high stakes for both parties, and Democrats see their best chance in more than a decade to make significant gains. Some even suggest that the minority could win back at least one of the chambers, most likely the House, where Democrats believe they have a shot at regaining 15 Republican-held seats.

Still, Democrats continue to come under fire for failing to present themselves as a viable alternative to the Republican majority.

Republicans, as part of their election year strategy, are attempting to poke holes in the Democrats' ideas, and they accuse the minority of following an agenda of no ideas and "obstruction" of the majority's initiatives.

A senior Republican aide said that this week's Democratic event offers just one more example of a party trying "to recycle their same old tired efforts at an agenda." This staffer added, however, that the exercise "is certainly fun to watch if you are a Republican."

DOJ_NMG_0033240

Democrats, meanwhile, have spent the better part of a year narrowing down their 2006 message and policy blueprint for a prospective majority. The party initially planned to kick off its platform last November but pushed it off until January when attention on the Congress and the election was higher.

Democrats launched the first piece of the blueprint in January when they outlined plans to restore ethical standards to Congress and reduce the influence of lobbyists. Two months later, party leaders unveiled their second plank, laying out their national security and anti-terrorism agenda.

Pelosi: It's Definition Time For Democrats (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, June 13, 2006

With Republicans seeking to define Democrats by their votes on such hot-button issues as gay marriage, the estate tax and flag burning, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is arguing that Democrats need to tell voters about themselves before Republicans succeed in doing it for them.

The time to criticize the Republicans' "culture of corruption," a Democratic refrain for nearly a year, is at an end, Pelosi said; Democrats need to begin promoting their own vision of America.

"Now it's time to talk about us. Enough of the Republicans. It's time for us to talk about what are the priorities we'd like to see addressed, if we have the opportunity," Pelosi said in an interview with The Hill on Wednesday.

Democrats have been struggling for months to devise a unified message to take to voters, debating whether to be general or detailed, to come out early or late, or to present a succinct list of points like the GOP's 1994 Contract With America. Pelosi has been seen as favoring an early message, while Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) and Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), who head up the campaign committees for House and Senate Democrats, have argued for focusing on Republican misdeeds.

Democrats are poised this week to unveil a portion of their domestic-policy agenda dealing with family economic issues.

"What we have to do is define ourselves so that Republicans do not define us. This is a define-or-be-defined business that we're in, so you can't leave it out in the open," Pelosi said.

She outlined three areas where Democrats would seek to differentiate themselves from Republicans: integrity, civility and accountability. If Democrats were to take control of the House in November, their first actions would focus on promoting those values, she said.

"These are not full-blown initiatives," she cautioned, "[but] they are a beginning to differentiate from the Republicans' misguided priorities of taking us deeply into debt, bringing up divisive social issues instead and raising those issues instead of raising the minimum wage."

The three themes are similar to the message Democrats ran on in 2004, when they lost two House seats in part because of redistricting in Texas that defeated five Democratic incumbents. The Democrats' 2004 New Partnership for America's Future contained six "core values," of which accountability was one. Under accountability, Democrats called for "integrity in the electoral process" and "civility in public debate."

But perhaps more important, Pelosi is vowing to run the House — a body of Congress marked by intense partisanship for decades — in a bipartisan fashion.

"You can't name a Democratic bill that's come to [a vote] in the House of Representatives. That's just not right. … I would hope that we could find common ground [with President Bush and Hill Republicans] because I do believe bipartisanship is important."

Pelosi, regularly criticized by leading Republicans as an extreme liberal, has attracted praise from centrist House Democrats for her leadership approach. For instance, she has downplayed the chances Democrats in the next Congress would move to impeach Bush for his administration's controversial telephone surveillance program. Pelosi told The Hill last week that she is not interested in censuring Bush either.

But any majority Pelosi might have in 2007 will likely be slim, making bipartisanship a must if Democrats are to move legislation should they control the chamber.

DOJ_NMG_0033241

Even while she discussed the possibility of a Democratic House and her role as Speaker, Pelosi declined to predict that Democrats would take control, saying, "Five months from now is an eternity."

Some Democrats are concerned that when they do finalize their message and it comes time to broadcast it to voters they may not have the requisite money at the Democratic National Committee (DNC) to counter the growing war chest of the Republican National Committee (RNC).

Emanuel reportedly stormed out of a meeting with DNC Chairman Howard Dean, disgusted that Dean was spending money on his "50 State" program rather than hoarding it for congressional races.

The DNC had $9.4 million at the end of April, while the RNC had $44.7 million.

Pelosi called Emanuel's complaints legitimate.

"If we can't have enough money to do the get-out-the-vote, to do the grassroots, the field operations, then we'll have to do that ourselves, and that's what the party usually does, so I think that Rahm's right," she said.

Pelosi would not say whether she would ask Emanuel to serve another term as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

She likewise deflected a question about who would occupy certain leadership positions in a Democratic House. On Friday, Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) announced he would challenge House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) for the position of majority leader.

"I'm even hard put to say what our agenda will be when we win, so I'm certainly not going into the politics of the caucus," she said. "That is as unimportant an issue to me right now as it could be."

Pelosi also responded to critics who have called her a poor spokeswoman for the party and lambasted her recent appearance on NBC's "Meet the Press."

"I have a big job to do here," she argued, noting that her critics did not have the day-to-day duties of a leadership post to contend with. "What do [the critics] do all day but get ready for their appearances? I don't have time for that. But when I do, that will be fine. I'm the leader for a reason, and my colleagues have confidence in me to do the job."

Hoyer praised Pelosi's leadership last week, calling her the hardest-working member of Congress he had seen in his 26 years in office.

"That's probably right!" she said of Hoyer's comments, which she had not seen. "I work constantly. I think it's so urgent that we win this election. ... I don't want to rest for one minute or one day until we can get through this election."

She dismissed a question about when she might retire. "Why would I even talk about such a thing?" the 66-year-old grandmother of five asked. "I haven't even gotten there yet."

She similarly dismissed her recent tension with the Congressional Black Caucus, a Democratic group that attacked her move to oust one of its own, Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), from the Ways and Means Committee while he faces a government corruption investigation.

"I feel very confident about my relationships one on one with just about everyone in the Congressional Black Caucus. ... I value their advice and counsel. In these kind of situations, people have to do what they have to do. And so do I."

Excerpts from interview with Rep. Pelosi

Q: As you know, there's been some friction between [Rep.] Rahm Emanuel [D-Ill.] and Howard Dean, especially on fundraising. The Republican National Committee has a major fundraising advantage [over the Democratic National Committee (DNC)], and that can severely affect the effort to win back the House this fall. Do you think [DNC Chairman] Howard Dean is doing a good job?

A: The issue that Rahm has with Howard Dean I think is a legitimate one. We're exactly where we need to be. We've recruited the candidates, we've raised the issues and we have raised the money. We're competitive with the Republicans for first time ever. … I'm saying if we don't have enough money to counter the deluge of money from the Republican National Committee then it's a problem for us and Rahm is correct to point that out.

Q: What were some of the lessons you learned — this is your second election as leader — from 2004? What went right? What went wrong?

DOJ_NMG_0033242

A: It's two different elections altogether. … When I first became leader, we were putting together our ideas. People said to me, "It doesn't matter. Nobody's going to care. It's only about the presidential," and they were right. … But this is a completely different race, and I always analyze elections one race at a time.

Q: Would you like Rahm to stay on as chairman [of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee]?

A: I probably see Rahm's family in my office more than he sees them because of all the travel that he has to do. … I have a feeling his wife is counting the days.

Q: If you do in fact win the House, [Steny] Hoyer will be majority leader. Who will be whip?

A: You know what? We have to win the House first. I'm even hard put to say what our agenda will be when we win, so I'm not certainly going into the politics of the caucus, that is as unimportant an issue to me right now as it could be.

Q: There's been some headlines about your counterpart in the Senate, Sen. Harry Reid [D-Nev.]. Do you think there's anything he did wrong there, or are the Republicans trying to play politics?

A: I think it's the Republicans trying to play politics. I think they dug and dug and dug and dug and that's all they could come up with. Harry Reid is a person of faith and integrity, and I wouldn't mess with him near a boxing ring.

Q: But Senator [John] McCain [R-Ariz.] did [reimburse for boxing tickets] differently. …

A: I don't know that he did it differently. I have absolutely no idea what the facts are there. I just don't know. So I don't want to go into what Senator McCain did or what whoever did. … But that is nothing [compared to the allegations about GOP corruption]. That's quite a different thing than if someone handled boxing tickets correctly.

Q: There's a lot of speculation about [House Speaker] Dennis Hastert [R-Ill.], whether he'll stay or go. Do you see any end in sight for you?

A:No.

Q: Why?

A: Why would I even talk about such a thing?

Q: Well a lot of the members say they'd like to see their grandchildren more… But you see no end in sight?

A: The question is — we have to win, we have to achieve the goal. … I have absolutely no intention of engaging any conversation about when I'm leaving. I haven't even gotten there yet.

Q: Are you concerned with the Congressional Black Caucus [about Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.)]? Could that end up being a problem if you were ever Speaker, in the sense they will control four committee chairs, maybe even five?

A: I have a very long and serious and deep relationship with members of the Congressional Black Caucus. I feel comfortable when I go to that caucus, as I do any place in politics. We have shared values. We've worked hard on issues for many, many years. Some of us go back 30 years. … In these kinds of situations, people have to do what they have to do.

Agency Informs Workers About Data Theft (AP-Y2)

By H. Josef Hebert

AP2, June 12, 2006

Energy Department officials have informed nearly 1,500 individuals that their Social Security numbers and other information may have been compromised when a hacker gained entry to a department computer system eight months ago, a spokesman said Monday.

The workers, mostly contract employees, worked for the National Nuclear Security Administration, a semiautonomous agency within the department that deals with the government's nuclear weapons programs.

The computer theft occurred last September, but Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman and his deputy, Clay Sell, were not informed of it until last week. It was first publicly disclosed at a congressional hearing on Friday.

Bryan Wilkes, a spokesman for the NNSA, said about 800 workers were reached over the weekend and by late Monday all but a small number had been contacted. "We will keep calling until we get all of them," said Wilkes, adding that notifications also were being sent by mail.

DOJ_NMG_0033243

The security breach occurred in a computer system at a service center in Albuquerque, N.M. The file that was compromised contained the names, Social Security numbers, security clearance levels and place of employment of 1,502 people working throughout the government nuclear weapons complex.

The system contained sensitive, but not classified material, department officials said. The NNSA also has a more secure computer system that includes nuclear weapons data and other classified material.

NNSA Administrator Linton Brooks told a House hearing on Friday that he learned of the security breach late last September, but did not inform either the two men to whom he reports — Bodman or Sell.

Bodman learned of the incident last week.

Brooks blamed a misunderstanding for the communications failure.

Rep. Joe Barton (news, bio, voting record), R-Texas., chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, on Friday said Brooks, a former ambassador and nuclear arms control negotiator, should resign over the incident.

Stevens on Monday declined to speculate on Brooks' future. Bodman wants the department's inspector general's office to investigate the communications failure.

___

On the Net:

Energy Department: http://www.energy.gov

National Nuclear Security Administration: http://www.nnsa

Senator Wants Raise-for-Performance Pay System (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

A key senator plans to introduce a bill today that would require federal managers to provide their employees with a written performance evaluation each year and would prohibit pay raises for employees rated as less than successful.

Describing current requirements as "vague," Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio), who oversees the civil service as chairman of a Senate subcommittee, said his bill would strengthen the employee performance appraisal system and help lay the foundation for an overhaul of federal pay.

"We must engage in a dialogue about the future of the public service and ask the difficult questions about what we want it to achieve and how do we make it happen," Voinovich said in remarks prepared for the bill's introduction. "This conversation will make many people uncomfortable, but it must take place."

Following the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, Congress gave the green light to the departments of Homeland Security and Defense to revamp their pay and workplace rules so they could reward their best workers with higher pay. Last year, the Bush administration urged Congress to shift the rest of the government into pay-for-performance systems and abolish the largest government-wide pay system, the General Schedule, by 2010.

The administration's proposal fizzled, however. Congress signaled it would rather see how well the new rules at the Homeland Security and Defense departments worked before taking up government-wide pay changes. Unions, meanwhile, have slowed the rollout of the new rules at the two departments through lawsuits filed in federal courts.

Voinovich's bill appears designed to find middle ground between proponents and opponents of performance-based pay for the federal workforce. "Instead of taking one giant bite at the apple, I believe it will be easier for federal agencies to implement enhanced employee appraisals first," Voinovich said in the prepared remarks. "By instituting a more rigorous performance-management standard on top of the current General Schedule, I am optimistic this will create less anxiety among federal employees."

Numerous federal employees prefer the approach of the General Schedule, which provides predictable raises over the course of a career in government. In their view, the General Schedule protects them against favoritism and political pressure. They are wary of promises that a performance-based pay system could be administered fairly.

But Voinovich said he believes that pay for performance "can work" and that employees should receive "a rigorous evaluation each year and that their pay should be determined based upon their performance."

DOJ_NMG_0033244

"I would like to transform the culture of the federal workforce into a high-performing, continually improving organization," Voinovich added in his remarks. The government "must be as agile, nimble and intellectually energetic as the leading nongovernmental organizations or dot-com companies," he said.

Voinovich chairs the Senate subcommittee for federal management policy and federal workforce issues. His office provided an advance copy of his remarks, which expand on comments he made in May about tightening the government's job evaluation system.

Prospects for Voinovich's bill are uncertain. Congress is dealing with several contentious issues, such as Iraq and immigration, and is likely to be in session fewer days than normal because this is an election year. Unions and some Democrats also will probably raise numerous questions about the bill.

Voinovich said in the prepared remarks that he will pursue bipartisan support for his effort. The bill, he said, "is not set in stone, and I imagine that it will undergo many changes."Congressional Honors

The Blinded American Veterans Foundation will honor Sens. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho) and Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.) at its 21st annual congressional awards ceremony on Thursday.

The foundation, which is headed by John Fales and supports research, rehabilitation and reemployment of disabled veterans, also will present awards for media coverage and volunteer efforts on veterans' behalf. This year's corporate volunteer award goes to McCormick & Schmick's Seafood Restaurants.

Byrd Truly The Elder Statesman (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

Robert C. Byrd, a champion of classical oratory in the Senate and pork barrel spending back home, yesterday became the longest-serving senator in U.S. history.

The West Virginia Democrat marked his 17,327th day in the Senate by visiting his wife's grave and then listening to several colleagues praise his career. Uncharacteristically for a man who has rhapsodized about spring, Mother's Day and countless other topics in the Senate chamber, Byrd left the floor without speaking, struggling to maintain his composure.

"My darling wife, I just wish she had lived to see this day," he told reporters as he left. Erma Ora James Byrd, who died March 25, would have turned 89 yesterday.

Byrd, 88, eclipsed the late Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) in Senate tenure. He long has held the record for the most Senate votes cast, and Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said yesterday that he "has held more leadership positions than any other senator."

Byrd aims to keep setting records, running this fall for a ninth six-year term, which would end when he is 95. In a state whose legislature named him "West Virginian of the 20th Century," Byrd is generally favored to defeat GOP business executive John Raese.

Although he is frail and walks with two canes, Byrd still gives theatrical speeches on the importance of preserving the Senate's traditional powers and other issues dear to him. Some of his most emotional orations in the past three years have involved the Iraq war, which he opposed from the start and considers a historic misadventure. He often rips President Bush, whom he has called "dangerous, reckless and arrogant," for launching the invasion with an incomplete assessment of Iraq's weapons.

Beyond Capitol Hill, Byrd's greatest legacy is in the asphalt, concrete, steel and hefty payrolls of the scores of federal projects he has steered to West Virginia from his Appropriations Committee seat, to which his ally Lyndon B. Johnson appointed him. He once said he wanted to be the state's "billion-dollar industry." Analysts say he exceeded the goal, planting major facilities for the FBI, the Treasury Department, Internal Revenue Service and many other agencies in the Mountain State.

Byrd's legacy has its darker sides, most notably his membership in the Ku Klux Klan as a young man eager to enter politics in the 1940s. He repeatedly calls it "the greatest mistake of my life" and acknowledges it will be part of his obituary.

Byrd's love of quoting the Bible, the Constitution, Shakespeare, Cicero, Thucydides and others is all the more notable because he entered office with one semester of college completed. He spent a dozen years in the West Virginia legislature and

DOJ_NMG_0033245

U.S. House before winning election to the Senate in November 1958. He earned a law degree at American University while he mastered the Senate's rules and climbed its leadership ranks.

Byrd co-wrote a four-volume history of the Senate and published a hefty autobiography last year, "Robert C. Byrd: Child of the Appalachian Coalfields." In an unusually testy exchange in 2002 with then-Treasury Secretary Paul H. O'Neill, Byrd attacked what he called executive branch abuses and arrogance, adding: "I lived in a house without electricity, too. No running water, no telephone, a little wooden outhouse. . . . I started out in life without any rungs in the bottom ladder."

Yesterday, Byrd played the humble official hoping to win one more election. "The people of West Virginia," he told reporters, "are the people to whom I owe the greatest of praise."

The Reliable Source (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

Washington Wives Were Goin' Out of Their Heads Over Faux Four Seasons

If the cast of Broadway's "Jersey Boys" had notions of celebrating hard after their big wins at Sunday's Tony Awards -- not a chance. They had a big date to keep with the Senate wives.

Oh, technically it was the Senate Spouses Club -- guys were invited, really! -- but it was clearly a chick thing as the four supple-voiced cuties who portray the Four Seasons in the jukebox musical serenaded Laura Bush's luncheon guests at the White House yesterday. The spouses of Senate and Cabinet members swayed and sang along to boomer classics such as "Big Girls Don't Cry," "Rag Doll" and "Can't Take My Eyes Off You." For one romantic song, cast member J. Robert Spencer asked to dim the East Room chandeliers "to set the mood." No go, but People magazine's Sandra Sobieraj spotted one wife jumping up on the press riser several times to get photos of the boys with her own happy-snap camera. Swoon!

The first lady caught the show in New York before her U.N. speech on AIDS a few weeks ago. Sunday night, after "Jersey Boys" won best musical, the whole cast bused down to D.C: Spencer, John Lloyd Young (best actor in a musical for his portrayal of Frankie Valli), Christian Hoff (upset winner for best featured actor) and Daniel Reichard .

Mrs. Bush hosted the luncheon to thank the group for a dress auction that raised funds for her library charity. The meal of grilled tuna, vichyssoise and white chocolate almond terrine was served on historic White House china going all the way back to the FDR years. Yeah -- totally a chick event!

Start Spreading the News: Bush Twin Decides She'll Take Manhattan

Sorry, Washington: We're back to being a one-twin town. Barbara Bush -- the dark-haired, older-by-minutes one -- has pulled up stakes for Manhattan, sources confirmed yesterday. What the First Daughter has planned for NYC remains unknown; the White House maintains a firm policy of not commenting about the twins' personal lives. But then, it was never clear what exactly she had been up to the past several months in D.C. After graduating from Yale in '04, Barbara campaigned for her dad's reelection, then vanished from the scene to volunteer quietly at a South African hospital last summer.

She resurfaced at Thanksgiving, around the time of her 24th birthday. While sister Jenna was tied down to her D.C. charter-school teaching job, Barbara got to accompany her mother to the Winter Olympics in Turin and the inauguration of Liberia's female president. When she was spotted last month on a multi-hour date with a cute guy at Alexandria's Indigo Landing, we all hoped that perhaps she had found reason to stick around town -- alas, apparently not.

A Federal Office Where Heraldry Of Yore Is Only Yesterday (NYT)

By Erik Eckholm

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

FORT BELVOIR, Va. — "A wives' tale," scoffed one official. "An urban myth," said another.

They would know. The officials were from the Institute of Heraldry, the government's chief guardian of insignia and heraldic tradition, and they were dismissing an oft-repeated canard about the presidential seal.

According to legend, the eagle in the seal faced the arrow-holding talon in times of war and switched its stern gaze toward the olive branch in times of peace.

DOJ_NMG_0033246

The eagle's glare did indeed get reversed — just once, by President Harry S. Truman in 1945. But only, it turns out, to correct the grievous heraldic error that President Rutherford B. Hayes had made 65 years before, when he designed the first seal to adorn White House invitations.

"In point of fact, the viewer's left is the dexter side, the honorable side on any shield," said Joe Spollen, head sculptor at the heraldry institute, which among its other duties nurtures rules and terminology from the Middle Ages. "The sinister side, on the viewer's right, is the less honorable."

And so Truman, after learning the truth from the director of the heraldry office at the time, switched the gaze from sinister to dexter, where it remains today.

The Institute of Heraldry, located for historical reasons within the Army, has a budget of $2.3 million and 24 employees, including four well-schooled "heraldic designers." But the handiwork of this little office has had an outsize influence on the public face of the military and the government.

All plaques bearing presidential or vice-presidential seals, as seen on news conference lecterns and the bulkhead of Air Force One, are hand-sculpted and painted here.

The institute, conjoining modern images with ancient traditions, designs the shoulder insignia unique to every military unit and supervises their production. It designs military medals, with the Iraq Campaign Medal being one of the latest. It also, together with the captains, designs a custom coat of arms for every new ship in the Navy.

Though civilian agencies are not required to hire the institute's services, many consult it when they need a new seal for their doors and stationery.

"People rally around these symbols," said Charles V. Mugno, a retired Marine officer who heads the institute. "Each seal carries the strengths and identity of an institution."

Every new sub-office of the bureaucracy, it seems, needs its own emblem. So when the Pentagon recently created an obscure civilian agency called the Test Resource Management Center, which evaluates range and test facilities for the military, the heraldry institute was ready and able.

As the institute describes the final design, three crossed arrows signify the new center's three areas of responsibility: oversight of facilities, strategic planning and reviewing of budgets. A chevron of white and green is crisscrossed with grid lines, to evoke "a graph and the measurement of resources."

"America has a funny relationship with heraldry," said Francois Velde, an economist at the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago who is an amateur expert and maintains the heraldica.org Web site.

The Constitution expressly forbids the government to grant titles of nobility, but nearly half the signers of the Declaration of Independence had family coats of arms, Mr. Velde noted.

"The association of heraldry with aristocracy is really inaccurate," he said. "It's a system of identification for people and institutions, not just nobles and knights."

The intricate rules governing symbols and colors emerged rather suddenly in 12th-century Europe, Mr. Velde said, and spread quickly.

In the United States, European-style coats of arms, with lions and Latin, have been especially popular with universities, but several presidents were also "armigerous," as the American Heraldry Society describes them, including Washington and both Roosevelts.

President Dwight D. Eisenhower called on the heraldry office to invent his — featuring an anvil, a crest of five stars and the motto "Peace Through Understanding" — because he needed family arms in order to receive the Order of the Elephant from the Kingdom of Denmark.

The founding fathers wasted no time in devising a distinctly American seal. In 1782, years before the Constitution, Congress adopted the same two-sided Great Seal visible on every dollar bill today, describing it in full-fledged heraldic argot. On the front side is the familiar eagle, "holding in its dexter talon an olive branch, and in his sinister a bundle of 13 arrows," and in his beak a scroll inscribed "E pluribus unum." On the reverse side, "a pyramid unfinished" and "in the zenith an eye in a triangle, surrounded by a glory, proper."

DOJ_NMG_0033247

From the beginning, the Great Seal's eagle faced the dexter talon; why President Hayes switched directions for his similar-looking presidential emblem is lost to the ages.

Mr. Mugno, the institute director, had been a student of military heraldry and said he got a thrill at the outset of the Iraq war, while he was still in the Marines and working in the Pentagon, when his proposal for the campaign medal was used on the reverse side.

The front of the medal, given to all who serve in Iraq, is a map of the country surrounded by palm wreaths. The back, drawing on Mr. Mugno's idea, features the Statue of Freedom from atop the Capitol and two scimitars with their blades arcing downward — a deliberate inversion, Mr. Mugno said, of a giant arch of crossed swords that Saddam Hussein had built in honor of himself in Baghdad.

When he heard that the institute directorship was coming open, Mr. Mugno said, he could not resist applying, even though it meant he had to retire from his beloved Marines. He has a dream for this office, he said, which could play a far more systematic role in overseeing the nation's insignia.

"Should there be a National Institute of Heraldry?" he asked. "One office overseeing the symbolism of the country and setting the standards?"

Correcting The Hayden Record (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

So what should we think of a senior official who knocks his own Administration to win easy Senate confirmation, apologizes profusely in private and promises to correct the record, and then fails to follow through on his promise?

That's the behavior of newly minted CIA Director Michael Hayden, who has done the Bush Administration a huge disservice by reinforcing the Democrats' "Bush lied" theme in his confirmation testimony. At his Senate hearing last month, General Hayden told Michigan Democrat Carl Levin not once but twice that he was not "comfortable" with intelligence-related work that had been done by an office reporting to former Undersecretary of Defense Doug Feith. He also suggested such work had been "wrong," "inaccurate," and "misleading."

As General Hayden would have known all too well, Mr. Feith's office has been an obsession of Senator Levin, who contends despite all evidence that mistakes on Iraq intelligence were all the fault of civilian appointees at the Pentagon. The truth, as a bipartisan report from his own committee attests, is that the CIA made most of the errors on its own.

Not surprisingly, Mr. Feith called General Hayden to object to his testimony. And, according to Mr. Feith, General Hayden was apologetic. He said he had not intended to say what he appeared to, and promised to issue a statement correcting the record. Arizona Senator Jon Kyl tells us he had a similar conversation with General Hayden, during which the CIA director promised a remedial letter that could be entered into the Congressional record. "He told us he did not intend those remarks to suggest Doug Feith or the Department of Defense did anything wrong, inaccurate or misleading. That is precisely what he told me," says Mr. Kyl.

But the General's subsequent effort, provided to us by Mr. Kyl, is no retraction or correction at all. It says only that his concern about bad intelligence methodology "is not confined to any specific program." Both Mr. Feith and the Senator have asked Mr. Hayden to be more specific, but so far to no avail. Mr. Hayden also declined to comment for this editorial.

Let's be clear that while the CIA director apparently insists he was offering a generic statement on intelligence craft, he was not asked a generic question. Here's the exchange:

Senator Levin: "While the intelligence community was consistently dubious about links between Iraq and al Qaeda, Mr. Feith produced an alternative analysis, asserting that there was a strong connection. Were you comfortable with Mr. Feith's office's approach to intelligence analysis?"

General Hayden: "No, sir, I wasn't . . . No, sir, I wasn't comfortable."

Mr. Levin: ". . . well, what were you uncomfortable about?"

General Hayden: "Well, there were a couple of things." He then went on to suggest that, in the case of al Qaeda links to Iraq, the Pentagon had somehow become too "laser beam focused" and had not recognized "left-and-right-hand boundaries," whatever in the world that meant. And the General added, "That would be very wrong. That would be inaccurate. That would be misleading."

DOJ_NMG_0033248

These and other similar remarks obviously pleased the likes of Senator Levin, who cited them specifically in justifying his vote for confirmation, and led other Democrats to back General Hayden in the 78-15 confirmation vote. But the remarks also fed an antiwar Democratic mythology evident in the fallacious premise of Senator Levin's question.

Mr. Feith's office did not freelance an "alternative analysis." Much of the work it did on the Iraq-al Qaeda connection was a response to a question for the record posed by the Senate Intelligence Committee itself. Nor did the Defense Department "assert" a "strong connection." Judging by leaked excerpts of the still highly classified work printed in the Weekly Standard, DOD merely provided the committee with a list of raw intelligence items on the topic.

The issue here is bigger than the credibility of General Hayden, or of Mr. Feith. Senator Levin has been pushing the Senate Intelligence Committee to publish a report, before this November's election, that would accuse Bush officials of misusing intelligence to push the country into war. General Hayden has played into the Senator's highly partisan, and historically inaccurate, hands. We can understand why the General is reluctant to take back his testimony at this stage and risk offending Mr. Levin, who can make life miserable for the CIA chief. But the General also has an obligation to the truth and to the President who appointed him.

His testimony, along with his subsequent failure to follow through on promises to correct the record, do not make for an auspicious, truth-telling start at CIA.

OTHER NEWS:

Broad Economic Worries Drive A Global Sell-Off (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj And Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

Fears about higher interest rates, rising inflation and a slowing economy sent stocks sharply and broadly lower yesterday, with emerging markets taking the biggest hit.

In the United States, the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 1.3 percent, erasing all of its gains for the year and closing at its lowest level since November. The Nasdaq fell more than 2 percent and the Dow Jones industrial average fell almost 1 percent.

But the damage was far worse in some other parts of the world. Trading at the Colombian stock exchange was briefly halted after its benchmark index fell more than 10 percent. Mexico's benchmark stock index fell 4.3 percent, its biggest one-day decline in more than three years. Markets in India, Brazil and Hungary also tumbled.

Emerging markets had enjoyed a strong surge in recent years because low interest-rate policies around the world pumped cheap money into the global economy, analysts said.

"Global liquidity has helped drive a lot of these risky assets," said Larry Adam, chief investment strategist at Deutsche Bank Alex.Brown. "And now you are seeing this flight to quality," including cash and investments in developed countries, he said.

At first glance, stocks in the United States and Western Europe do not appear to have benefited from the emerging-market retreat, but money coming out of emerging markets may be helping to cushion the blow, Mr. Adam said.

Yesterday's sell-off started early and gathered pace throughout the day. Some analysts suggested that a major catalyst was a speech by the president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Cleveland, Sandra Pianalto, in which she said that inflation was higher than her "comfort level."

Ms. Pianalto was the latest Fed official to express concerns about inflation in the last several days, a drumbeat that many investors think is a not-so-subtle message that the central bank will raise short-term interest rates, now at 5 percent, at its next meeting on June 29. Earlier, the Fed had indicated that it might pause in its two-year campaign of raising rates.

The Fed is "adding to a little of this hysteria that is building," said James W. Paulsen, chief investment strategist at Wells Capital Management.

DOJ_NMG_0033249

To be sure, Ms. Pianalto, who is one of the 11 officials who vote on Fed's interest rate policies, said that inflation, though worrisome, was not an ominous threat to the economy.

"Measures of long-term inflation expectations have been mixed lately, but, on the whole, I regard them as remaining contained," she said to a gathering of the Broadcast Cable Financial Management Association in Florida. The challenge of Fed policy makers, she said, "is to make sure that they stay contained."

The government will issue reports on wholesale and consumer inflation today and Wednesday. Excluding energy and food prices, economists expect both the producer price and consumer price indexes to have risen 0.2 percent in May, a rate considered to be modest by most experts.

The biggest loser yesterday, as in the last few weeks, was the technology industry. Many large technology companies, struggling to match past growth as they mature, have been lowering their profit projections.

For the second quarter, the technology area's profits are expected to fall 2 percent from the same period last year while the overall increase in the S.& P. 500 is expected be 10 percent, noted Howard Silverblatt, senior index analyst at Standard & Poor's. "This is supposed to be a growth industry," he said.

The Nasdaq was led downward by Qualcomm, the maker of wireless technology, which fell 5 percent yesterday after it filed a complaint against its rival Nokia as part of a lengthy patent fight.

Shares of Apple fell almost 4 percent, apparently reflecting investors' concerns about efforts by some European countries to force the company to open up its music software to devices other than the iPod.

One of the few exception to yesterday's broad sell-off was General Motors, which rose 43 cents, or 1.7 percent, to $25.78. It was the Dow's biggest gainer. The shares moved higher as the president of the United Automobile Workers, the company's biggest union, told members that the union would have to rethink its traditional positions to ensure the domestic automobile industry's survival.

The stock also appeared to be reflecting investors reaction to news of an agreement late Friday that could avert a costly strike at G.M.'s largest supplier, Delphi.

Many market experts remain convinced that the recent correction in stock prices will prove temporary and will be contained to a few areas. They note that inflation, though rising, remains low by historical standards.

But the market's volatility has intensified and will probably remain high, analysts say.

"It is a retrenchment," Mr. Silverblatt said. But "companies are still in good shape."

The Dow fell 99.34 points, to close at 10,792.58, its lowest level since Feb. 7. The S.& P. 500 declined 15.90 points, to 1,236.40. The Nasdaq fell 43.74 points, to 2,091.32. The Russell 2000 stock indexof smaller-capitalization companies, fell 18.2 points, or 2.6 percent, to 683.19. Declining issues led advancing stocks by 3½ to 1 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Treasuries fell slightly. The price of the benchmark 10-year note fell 1/32, to 1014/32. The yield, which moves in the opposite direction of the price, rose to 4.98 percent, from 4.97 on Friday.

Here are the results of yesterday's auction of three- and six-month Treasury bills:

Dow Industrials Tumble 99.34 Points As Rate Worries Continue To Take Toll (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

Continuing interest-rate anxiety drove the Dow Jones Industrial Average down an additional 99.34 points, marking the sixth decline in the past seven sessions and leaving it up less than 1% for the year.

The beleaguered Nasdaq Composite Index, whose many technology stocks have been under attack for weeks, fell 2.05%, or 43.74 points, to 2091.32. That put the Nasdaq down 11.8% from the five-year high it hit in April. Wall Street terms that a correction -- or a decline of more than 10%. The Nasdaq is at its lowest point since October, though still well short of a bear market -- or 20% decline. It is down 5.2% since the year began.

The Dow industrials, which fell 0.91% to 10792.58, are 7.3% off the six-year high they hit last month. They are short of a 10% correction but up just 0.7% since the year began.

Some emerging markets tumbled again; shares in India fell 3%, and Brazil and Mexico slid more than 4% each.

DOJ_NMG_0033250

Investors fear another quarter-point interest-rate increase when the Federal Reserve holds its next policy meeting on June 28 and 29. Many people are concerned about more rate increases after that, and worry that the higher rates will spread pain through the economy, crimping consumer spending and corporate profits.

Adding to the anxiety, the government releases May wholesale-price data today and consumer-price data tomorrow. On top of that, Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke was scheduled to speak three separate times this week, most notably Thursday to the Economic Club of Chicago.

"The speeches and the inflation data are holding people at bay," keeping them from buying stocks, said Mike Viracola, head of trading at brokerage firm Canaccord Adams, based in Boston.

Stoking the interest-rate concerns, Cleveland Federal Reserve Bank President Sandra Pianalto told a business group that inflation at recent levels "exceeds my comfort level."

Some investors were surprised that the Dow industrials and Standard & Poor's 500-stock index last week both posted their worst weekly declines in more than a year. They are worried that interest-rate uncertainty could last into the summer.

The S&P 500 yesterday fell 1.27%, or 15.90 points, to 1236.40. It is down 1% for 2006, 6.7% off its recent high and at its lowest point since last year.

But higher interest rates make the dollar more desirable, so the U.S. currency continued its rebound against the euro and the yen. Oil and gold fell.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks retreated. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.25 billion shares; 716 stocks rose and 2,591 fell.

Bond prices were mixed. The 10-year Treasury note fell 1/32, or 31 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.983%. The 30-year bond was up 1/32 to yield 5.024%.

The dollar strengthened. The currency traded at 114.30 yen, up from 113.97, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2599 from $1.2642.

S& P 500 Tumbles To A 7-Month Low As Once-Key Sectors Fall Out Of Favor (WP)

By Brooke A. Masters

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

NEW YORK, June 12 -- U.S. stocks continued their five-week slide Monday as the Dow Jones industrial average lost about 100 points and the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell to its lowest point in seven months, erasing all its gains for 2006.

World stock indexes from Germany and Britain to Mexico and Egypt also did badly as investors concerned about a tightening world monetary supply continue to flee high-risk investments such as emerging markets and commodities.

The tremendous amount of money available to be invested "fueled the commodity boom, the housing bubble, and the small and microcap stocks," said Liz Ann Sonders, chief investment strategist for Charles Schwab & Co. "Now the tide is going out, and it's taking out the same boats that it brought in."

The Dow, which closed at 10,792.58, has fallen 7.3 percent since its recent peak on May 10. The S&P 500, which closed at 1236.40, down 15.9, has dropped below its December 2005 close and is down 6.5 percent since the May peak. The technology-heavy Nasdaq composite index, which fell 43.74 to close at 2091.32, is down nearly 10 percent since May.

Among the big losers since that peak: housing-related firms, including KB Home, Home Depot Inc. and Pulte Homes Inc.; and industrial companies such as Caterpillar Inc., Alcoa Inc. and 3M Co.

The speed of the decline has surprised analysts, many of whom still believe that the U.S. economy is in reasonable shape and will continue to grow, albeit at a slower pace.

Hedge funds and other institutional investors may be one reason for the slide, said Dreyfus Corp. chief economist Richard B. Hoey. Over the past decade, these lightly regulated investment pools have exploded in size from $500 million in assets under management in 2000 to more than $1.1 trillion today, and many of them use borrowed money to make short-term trades to try to capitalize on market momentum.

DOJ_NMG_0033251

While small investors "tend to react slowly, hoping it will turn around, this leveraged institutional money, when [the market] stops going, they tend to get out fast," Hoey said.

Some market watchers also argue that some investors are worried that the central banks in general -- and the Federal Reserve in particular -- will overreact to the early signs of inflation that emerged last month and raise interest rates high enough to push the U.S. economy into recession.

U.S. investors are waiting for two key monthly economic reports that may give clearer signals about inflation: the producer price index, due to be released Tuesday, and consumer price index, which comes out Wednesday. Most economists expect the core CPI rate, minus energy and food, to be up two-tenths of a percent.

If it comes in lower "you're going to see a monster rally," predicted Alec Young, equity market strategist for Standard & Poor's. "With every [down] day like this the risk-reward ratio gets more and more favorable, especially for people who didn't have a lot of money in the market run-up of the last three years."

But Schwab's Sonders cautioned that the tighter money supply could continue to put a damper on stock prices. "I don't see a near-term buying opportunity," she said, adding that Schwab is encouraging its customers to keep more money than usual in cash.

Nasdaq Arrives In Correction Zone (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, June 13, 2006

A month ago, investors focused on the market's multiyear highs and how long-term damage to their portfolios was finally being erased. Now, the focus is on how quickly the bull market is limping toward the rendering plant.

Monday, stock investors got a double dose of bad news as the Nasdaq composite officially entered correction territory. The Nasdaq bled 44 points to 2091, knocking it down 11.8% from its 2006 high in April and down 5.2% for the year. A correction is commonly considered a more than 10% drop from a recent high.

And if that wasn't dire enough, the benchmark Standard & Poor's 500 dipped into the red for 2006 for the first time this year after falling 16 points to 1236. That's down only 1% from where it ended 2005 but a big reversal from its 6.2% gain for 2006 back on May 5.

Troubles with the mainstream Nasdaq and S&P make some suspect what started as a pullback in speculative assets such as commodities, emerging markets and small-company stocks is spreading. That would not be a happy prospect. For example, emerging markets measured by the iShares MSCI Emerging Markets ETF fell 3.7% Monday and have lost 25% since early May.

Talk is quickly morphing into speculation about a possible bear market. Already, the S&P is down 6.7% from its 2006 high and the Dow Jones industrials 7.3%. “This is a first leg of a moderate bear market,” says Charles Blood, strategist at Brown Bros. Harriman.

The troubles suffered by speculative areas of stocks, most recently the Nasdaq, are spreading because of:

•Tighter cash. Ready access to cash, enabled by accommodative global central banks, is ending, says Liz Ann Sonders, strategist at Charles Schwab. “There were tremendous amounts of individual investor, hedge fund and mutual fund money all moving in the same direction,” she says. Now, “Investors of all kinds are rushing to the exits.”

It's happening worldwide. Japan, for instance, has seen its money supply contract by 15% over the past two months, says Michael Holland, chairman of Holland & Co. That leaves less cash to buy “our stocks and commodities,” he says.

•Loser mentality. Hedge funds and other large investors, burned by big bets on commodities that have gone sour, are hoping to end the pain by selling mainstream assets, Holland says. “There is a negative psychology,” he says.

•Leadership vacuum. Even the big tech idols, Microsoft and Intel, are getting hammered as investors frustrated by waiting six years for gains are finally giving up, says Louise Yamada of Louise Yamada Technical Research Advisors.

Sonders says large-company stocks may hold up better than the riskier parts of the markets, as they have historically done. But she warns nothing is safe: “We have not seen a bottom.”

Fed Officials Reveal More Worries About Inflation (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

DOJ_NMG_0033252

USA Today, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve policymakers continued to sound inflation alarms Monday, strengthening expectations that they will raise interest rates for a 17th-straight time when they meet this month.

"The recent news on inflation troubles me," Cleveland Fed President Sandra Pianalto said in a speech to members of the Broadcast Cable Financial Management Association in Orlando. She noted the so-called core consumer price index, which excludes volatile food and energy prices, rose more than 3% at an annual pace during the first three months of 2006.

"This inflation picture, if sustained, exceeds my comfort level," she said.

Board Gov. Susan Bies also said inflation data have been coming in high. She said the economy is growing rapidly, while energy prices are high — factors that could add to already elevated price pressures.

"At some point, that's putting pressure" on inflation, Bies told members of the Financial Women's Association here.

The latest inflation talk came a week after Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke jolted financial markets when he said inflation had risen to an "unwelcome" level. Stock prices continued falling Monday as investors were unnerved by the Fed officials' latest inflation warnings.

Earlier this month, investors and economists were evenly split about the chances the Fed would raise interest rates — its weapon against price pressures because higher interest rates curb borrowing and spending — at the next meeting June 28 and 29. Since the chairman's speech, the odds on another quarter-percentage point rate increase have risen significantly.

Helping cement those expectations: Other Fed officials, including Gov. Donald Kohn and the Atlanta Fed's Jack Guynn, also said last week that inflation is above desirable levels.

"It looks like they are all in agreement," says Christopher Rupkey, chief financial economist at Bank of Tokyo-Mitsubishi in New York. "They are very afraid of letting inflation get away from them."

Bernanke did not discuss inflation, the economy or the outlook for interest rates in a speech Monday to the American Bankers Association's Stonier Graduate School of Banking, mainly focusing on risk management practices for banks.

Fed officials have raised the target for short-term interest rates 16 times in quarter-percentage point steps over the past two years. That's been partly to remove stimulus the Fed put in place earlier this decade when it lowered rates to bolster a slowing economy.

The Fed's target for short-term interest rates, which influence borrowing costs across the economy, is 5%, the highest in more than five years. But that's considerably below the 6.5% peak hit in the last rate-raising cycle, which ended in 2000. Both Bies and Pianalto said the Fed likely isn't far from the interest rate peak for this cycle. But where that end point is, is unclear.

"If you ask me today, 'Sue, where are you going to stop?' I couldn't tell you," Bies said. "The economy is much stronger if we keep inflation low. That is why we are focusing on it."

More inflation news arrives today when the Labor Department issues data on producer prices in May and Wednesday when it reports on consumer prices. Rupkey says even if the data point to a small amount of inflation, the Fed will raise rates this month.

"It's not so much that inflation is a problem right now, but what about six to nine months from now?" Rupkey says. "Because inflation is so threatening, it's time to take away the punch bowl, because the economic party is in full swing."

Mr. Dummar Is Back, Taking Another Shot At The Hughes Estate (WSJ)

By Jonathan Karp

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

Melvin Dummar had long since given up on getting a share of the late billionaire Howard Hughes's fortune. And for good reason: In 1978, Mr. Dummar became a national joke when a Las Vegas jury ruled that the basis for his claim -- a handwritten will that surfaced mysteriously -- was fake.

"I've never really gotten over it," Mr. Dummar says. "For 30 years, everybody just laughed at me and treated me like some kind of criminal, a forger. Until a few months ago, I thought it was a lost cause."

But now Mr. Dummar is back, seeking another day in court and what he considers his rightful share of Mr. Hughes's estate. In a lawsuit filed yesterday, Mr. Dummar claims to have new evidence and a compelling new witness: a pilot who says he flew the late Mr. Hughes to a brothel near where Mr. Dummar claims he happened on to him.

DOJ_NMG_0033253

With the suit filed yesterday in federal district court in Salt Lake City, Mr. Dummar began another chapter in one of the wildest estate battles in U.S. history.

When the eccentric billionaire died in 1976, Mr. Dummar (pronounced Doo-MAR) emerged as an improbable heir. He said a will delivered to a gas station he ran in Utah entitled him to $156 million, a reward for the night in 1967 when he said he had found a dazed man face down on a desert road and drove him to Las Vegas. That man, Mr. Dummar claimed, told him he was Howard Hughes.

But Mr. Dummar's tale fell apart at trial. And he got nothing but a dubious place in history, folklore and Hollywood, thanks to the Oscar-winning 1980 film "Melvin and Howard."

Now 61 years old and eking out a living delivering meat along those same desolate Nevada roads, Mr. Dummar is hoping for a real-life sequel. His co-stars this time include an author who once was a Federal Bureau of Investigation agent; a former Hughes pilot who is breaking his silence; a prostitute with a diamond-encrusted tooth; and a lawyer who has a weekly radio show about estate planning.

The lawsuit is based on new evidence that purportedly corroborates Mr. Dummar's claim that Mr. Hughes indeed was in the desert that late-December 1967 night. The defendants are two elderly Hughes beneficiaries: William Lummis, the main family heir, and Frank Gay, a former Hughes executive. Mr. Dummar alleges fraud, unjust enrichment and racketeering during the probate case, and requests $156 million, plus interest since 1978, and punitive damages.

Admitting the odds are long, Mr. Dummar says this won't be a "cakewalk." The new complaint doesn't specifically ask the court to reconsider the validity of the will. Rather, it contends, among other allegations, that Mr. Dummar was cheated out of a fair trial because Messrs. Lummis and Gay allegedly concealed evidence of Mr. Hughes's movements. Mr. Dummar's allies hope that new witnesses and indirect evidence will be enough to generate a settlement, if not a favorable verdict.

Mr. Lummis, a cousin of Mr. Hughes, declined to comment. At 77, he lives in Houston and serves as a trustee for the nonprofit Howard Hughes Medical Institute. Mr. Gay, 85 and living in the Houston suburb of Humble, also declined to comment. He recently stepped down from the medical institute's board of trustees, his last tie to the Hughes empire.

The original Dummar claim was based on a document dubbed the "Mormon will," because it was disclosed by the Mormon Church. The will divided Mr. Hughes's $2.5 billion estate among several medical, educational and social groups, and relatives and employees. The Mormon Church was to receive one-sixteenth of the fortune, as was "Melvin DuMar."

But his credibility collapsed under attack by Hughes family lawyers. Mr. Dummar admitted he had lied when he said he didn't know about the will. In fact, he had steamed open an envelope left with him but addressed to the president of the Mormon Church. Because he had read it, he knew he was a named beneficiary when he dropped the envelope off at Mormon headquarters in Salt Lake City. The seven-month trial featured dueling testimony by handwriting and ink experts. Moreover, the Hughes entourage argued that the industrialist never left the suite he holed up in at Las Vegas's Desert Inn between 1966 and 1970. Therefore, Mr. Dummar couldn't be telling the truth about his supposed desert encounter with Mr. Hughes.

Broke from the trial and scorned as a con man, Mr. Dummar drifted from job to job and settled in Brigham City, Utah. He started Dummar's Premium Food -- bacon is his best seller -- and makes four-day delivery runs to rural Nevada and Wyoming in a pickup with nearly 400,000 miles of wear, and a broken radio and air conditioner.

Mr. Dummar suffered two bouts of non-Hodgkin's lymphoma. In 2002, bald from chemotherapy and bedridden, he had a visit from Gary Magnesen, a former FBI agent who is the brother of a man for whom Mr. Dummar had worked. Mr. Magnesen took an interest in the case. "I was very skeptical of Melvin, but I decided to investigate as a personal challenge," says Mr. Magnesen, who in the FBI had battled organized crime in Las Vegas for 16 years.

At his own expense, Mr. Magnesen tracked down Hughes associates and pored over obscure property deeds. His confidence in Mr. Dummar grew as he developed a theory about why the reclusive billionaire might have ventured to the wasteland northwest of Las Vegas: Mr. Hughes had been buying mines in the area where Mr. Dummar said he found him.

Then a man named Robert Deiro -- once a Hughes Tool Co. pilot -- surfaced with a sexier explanation. Mr. Deiro had long dismissed Mr. Dummar as a charlatan. But in 2004, Mr. Deiro, a Las Vegas businessman, read a story in the Las Vegas Review-Journal that sent him bounding for the telephone to contact Mr. Dummar. A detail in the article, in which Mr. Dummar was interviewed, made him think: "Jesus Christ, this guy's telling the truth!"

DOJ_NMG_0033254

That clue was Mr. Dummar's stray reference to finding Mr. Hughes near the Cottontail Ranch brothel. In 1967, Mr. Deiro was managing a North Las Vegas airport owned by Mr. Hughes and occasionally flying the boss on discreet missions. One night between Christmas and New Year's, Mr. Deiro says, he flew Mr. Hughes to the holiday-festooned Cottontail for a regular tryst with Sunny, a redhead who had a diamond in an upper incisor. "You couldn't see it unless she smiled broadly," he recalls. "She was the class of the field."

By Mr. Deiro's account, he fell asleep on a banquette in the brothel's kitchen, waking up around 4 a.m. to be told that his "friend," Mr. Hughes, had left. Mr. Deiro flew back to Las Vegas. No one mentioned the incident, and he never again saw Mr. Hughes or the aide who had arranged the secret flights.

Mr. Deiro says before that fateful night, he and Mr. Hughes had been in frequent contact. They flew together to scout sites for Mr. Hughes's dream: an airport for supersonic airliners.

Having run a side business of "midnight special" flights to brothels from Las Vegas, Mr. Deiro says he assumed that role for Mr. Hughes. On their first jaunt, "I had to get $100 from petty cash, and Hughes took it from me to pay," he recalls. In 1967, he says, he flew the billionaire to meet Sunny twice at Ash Meadows brothel and twice at Cottontail.

Mr. Deiro left Hughes for an aviation job in California that he believes Mr. Hughes arranged. Before he quit Hughes, he says, his boss ripped out pages of his pilot logbook to get rid of records of the brothel runs, and Mr. Deiro says he had to sign a nondisclosure agreement. He decided to go public after the 2004 newspaper article because "I felt instant empathy for Melvin. I realized he'd been diddled," the 68-year-old says.

Mr. Magnesen, the former FBI agent, checked Mr. Deiro's background and worked his account into a book about his investigation, which he published late last year. The revelations would have been little more than consolation to Mr. Dummar had Stuart Stein not read the book and called him.

Mr. Stein is an estate-planning lawyer in Albuquerque. He invited Messrs. Dummar and Magnesen to be guests on his Saturday morning radio show in January. Besides its entertainment value, Mr. Stein felt, the Hughes case was a cautionary tale: Let a professional prepare your will to avoid any probate "silliness." After some research, the 59-year-old lawyer agreed to represent Mr. Dummar. "It's karma coming back to right a terrible wrong," Mr. Stein says.

It could also make several people very rich if Mr. Dummar wins -- or settles. Mr. Stein, as his lawyer, stands to collect a share. Mr. Magnesen says he will collect 10% of any court award. Mr. Deiro, who says he used to get kickbacks from brothels in his pilot days, says, "I don't have a dog in this hunt. I have my own money."

Getty Book Deal Led To Questions Of Conflict (LAT)

By Ralph Frammolino And Jason Felch, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

Ex-board chairman got contract after leaning on Munitz and others for pay and perks.

Former J. Paul Getty Trust chief Barry Munitz agreed to pay retired Getty board Chairman David Gardner nearly $300,000 to write a coffee-table book after Gardner left the foundation's board in 2004.

Gardner was hired to write the book just months after he intervened on Munitz's behalf to help the chief executive secure a five-year contract rather than the one-year extension some board members favored.

The book deal came after years of pressure from Gardner on Munitz and other Getty officials to find a way to compensate him for his service on the board, records and interviews show. The will of J. Paul Getty, whose oil fortune financed the educational trust that bears his name, specifically stipulates that board members are to serve without pay.

Plans for the book, which was to commemorate the Getty's 25th anniversary, were canceled in March, a month after Munitz resigned amid turmoil at the nonprofit foundation — but not before Gardner had collected $178,000 over 19 months for little work.

Gardner says he produced a rough outline during that time but did not conduct interviews or begin writing. He blamed his lack of progress on the trust, which he said did not provide the necessary cooperation.

Internal Getty documents show that Munitz and his staff were discussing a book deal for Gardner in 2003, while Gardner was chairman and Munitz was negotiating his own contract. Around the same time, Munitz also spoke directly to Gardner about writing a book after he stepped down as chairman, according to two former Getty officials familiar with the discussions. Citing ongoing investigations of the Getty, the officials asked not to be identified.

Munitz and Gardner, a former president of the University of California, deny any impropriety in the book deal.

Several experts on the laws governing nonprofits, however, said that discussions of the book deal while Gardner was chair created a potential conflict of interest, because both men stood to benefit personally from the official actions of the other.

They said that the book deal could also be viewed by tax authorities as a waste of the Getty's charitable assets — because no book was produced — or even as an "inurement," a serious misuse of tax-exempt resources to benefit an insider. Though rarely pursued by the IRS, a finding of inurement can lead to revocation of tax-exempt status.

"This is beyond self-dealing," said Frances Hill, a professor at the University of Miami School of Law. "It's insiders with a sweetheart deal."

Munitz and Gardner, who have known each other for 30 years, say there was no connection between the contract talks and the book assignment.

"There was absolutely no deal or arrangement linking the [book] project and the contract," Munitz said in an e-mail to The Times.

He added that Gardner, who sat on the executive compensation committee, played no direct role in negotiating Munitz's 2004 contract. Like most other board members, Gardner voted in January of that year to approve the committee's recommendation of a five-year pact.

Gardner, who holds a PhD in higher education and has written and edited several books, said he never discussed a possible book project until his last week as chairman in June 2004.

"Such a prospect never came up, until just before I left," said Gardner, 73. He said Munitz first suggested the idea the week before Gardner stepped down, and no deal was finalized until after he was off the board.

Gardner said he has not been asked, nor does he intend, to return the money. He said the questions he raised about compensation and perks were reasonable, and that he enjoyed similar benefits at UC.

John Biggs, the current board chairman and widely considered an authority on corporate governance, said in a recent interview that he was informed in advance about the book deal and raised no objection.

"I think it's the most honorable relationship that I can imagine," said Biggs, adding that the amount paid to Gardner was "peanuts."

Munitz resigned amid an investigation by the state attorney general into allegations that he steered grants to friends, used staff extensively for personal errands and spent the nonprofit's money on expensive or questionable trips. Munitz agreed to pay the Getty $250,000 and to forgo $2 million in severance pay.

The relationship between Gardner and Munitz goes back to the 1970s, when they were both involved in higher education policy. In 1991, when Munitz came to California to become chancellor of the California State University system, Gardner, then president of the UC system, welcomed him with a reception.

Gardner retired a year later, after the Board of Regents voted in a closed-door session to give him an extra $857,000 in pension benefits. Coming in the midst of a state budget crunch and student fee increases, the deal triggered a public outcry and prompted an outside review that concluded Gardner's administration had acted contrary to "principles of public accountability and public trust."

That year, Gardner was named to the Getty board. He later served on the search committee that picked Munitz for the Getty's top job in 1997. Gardner was chosen as board chairman in 2000.

Several trust officials said Gardner put pressure on Munitz and his staff to find a way to compensate him. "This was a never-ending fixation," said one former senior Getty official. "It was a topic that never went away."

In 1999, Gardner asked Munitz and other trustees about the possibility of changing J. Paul Getty's will to allow board members to be compensated for attending four or five meetings a year and performing other oversight duties. A Getty review prompted by Gardner's request determined that, although many private foundations pay their boards, most museums do not. The Getty is a hybrid, with a trust controlling a museum and related institutes.

DOJ_NMG_0033256

The idea was dismissed after an outside attorney for the Getty warned that paying trustees would require going to court to change the will and might draw opposition from the state attorney general.

Gardner continued to push for benefits such as secretarial help and a Getty-financed office in his Park City, Utah, home, but the staff concluded that such perks could violate Getty's will. He ultimately was given a cellphone and a computer.

He then asked for permission to have his wife travel with him on official business at Getty expense. Outside counsel had advised that the travel support might also violate Getty's will. Biggs introduced a rule change intended to get around the restriction by designating spouses of the board chairman and CEO as "senior volunteers" so that their travel could be covered as a business expense, records and interviews show.

"We in fact made an exception for the chairman of the board," Biggs said, conceding it was a stretch. "I think he would have declined to be board chairman" without the perk.

Gardner said he wasn't making demands, only raising unrelated questions about the possibility of changing Getty's will, receiving office support as chairman and having his wife's travel expenses covered.

"Each one seemed to me to be a perfectly reasonable, discrete inquiry, and that's how I approached it," Gardner said. "I didn't say, what can I get out of the Getty?"

Several former Getty officials said that pressure from Gardner for compensation and perks gave staff nowhere to turn with their concerns about Munitz's lavish spending.

"You felt like there's no one to go to," said a former senior official. "It's like the scene in Chinatown where the guy says, 'Why don't you to go the cops?' and the girl says, 'My father owns the cops.' "

By 2002, Munitz had begun having conversations with staff members about finding some kind of paid position for Gardner after he retired from the board, according to the former Getty officials. By 2003, Munitz was also talking generally to Gardner about the book project, two of the former Getty officials said.

Interviews and records show that by June 2003, as the book idea was taking shape, Getty chief of staff Jill Murphy became concerned about the discussions of work for Gardner and brought them to the attention of Getty general counsel Peter Erichsen.

In anticipation of a meeting between Gardner and Munitz, Erichsen issued a memo warning the chief executive to avoid any "formal exploration" of a book deal with Gardner "while he is a trustee and chair of the board."

"To do otherwise," Erichsen wrote, "would expose the trust and its board members to unnecessary legal jeopardy and accusations of self-dealing and conflict of interest, and, worst of all, could embarrass our distinguished chair."

Erichsen pointed to three legal areas that could be troublesome if his advice was ignored: IRS rules prohibiting self-dealing, the prohibition on trustee compensation in Getty's will, and conflict-of-interest law.

Two days later, Munitz and Gardner met to discuss complaints about Munitz's performance. Not long after, according to records and interviews, two key trustees approached Gardner with serious concerns about Munitz's out-of-town travel and his deteriorating relationship with then-museum director Deborah Gribbon.

Trustee Lewis Bernard, a retired Morgan Stanley executive who chaired the compensation committee, wanted to send a warning to Munitz by extending his contract for just one year, Gardner said. Bernard declined to comment for this story.

Gardner said he told Bernard that such a move would "undermine [Munitz's] position at the Getty." Gardner said he coached Munitz on how to be a better manager and then reported back to Bernard and others that Munitz was making progress. By the time the contract vote came up in January 2004, Bernard had changed his mind and recommended that Munitz be given a five-year deal, Gardner said. Gardner signed the contract in February 2004.

Over the next four months, Munitz and Gardner on at least two occasions discussed possible future compensated work for Gardner, a Getty review later found. In the first conversation, they discussed a management consulting job that never came to fruition, the review found.

Munitz's handwritten notes from the second conversation, which took place days before Gardner stepped down as chairman on June 30, show the two discussed the book project and whether the Getty would pay Gardner's wife to work as a researcher or editor, the review later found.

Records show that Munitz wrote Biggs in mid-July to report that Gardner was "willing, indeed happy, to consider taking the lead in writing what we discussed as a … visually attractive 'coffee-table volume' " and accompanying analysis for the board.

DOJ_NMG_0033257

Gardner named his price, and Munitz agreed to pay him $8,000 a month for three years starting Sept. 1, 2004. Plans called for him to visit Getty projects in Tunisia, Egypt, China and Italy at trust expense as part of his research, records and interviews show.

Gardner said he met several times with Getty staff to view documents he needed for the project, but he found the records in disarray. The staff eventually sent him a laptop computer containing the records.

Gardner said the trust denied his request for access to its oral history collection, and that Getty officials eventually stopped returning his calls as they dealt with growing controversies.

In the fall, Munitz's staff proposed narrowing the scope of the book to a series of essays, with Gardner as editor and contributor, Gardner said. He realized the more modest effort was also in trouble when he called Munitz at home in early February, only to discover that the chief executive had resigned the day before, he said.

Gardner said he then called Biggs, who subsequently decided to cancel the project. Gardner, who recently moved to Bellevue, Wash., was taken off the payroll March 31, records show.

"I think they compensated me reasonably for what they asked me to do, and the fact that I wasn't able to do it was through no fault of my own," said Gardner. "None."

Federal tax law requires charitable institutions to disclose any transactions that involve self-dealing, the use of tax-exempt dollars for the personal benefit of top officials. The Getty did not report the book deal in its latest tax filing, but after questions from The Times, trust officials said they may amend the return. Biggs said he asked attorneys with Munger, Tolles & Olson to investigate whether the deal involved a quid pro quo between Munitz and Gardner.

During an internal review of the transaction, one person told investigators that the book deal was intended to reward Gardner for his help with Munitz's contract, Biggs said. But he added that the statement "doesn't hold any water" and that the investigation has turned up no credible evidence of a quid pro quo.

"We talked about it and came to the conclusion it was baloney," Biggs said, declining to disclose the details of the claim. "The person's not credible."

Biggs said the decision to terminate Gardner's contract was made because of other controversies engulfing the Getty. The institution is still recovering from the Munitz resignation, and its former antiquities curator is on trial in Rome for allegedly conspiring to buy looted art.

"We decided given what's happening, we didn't think this was a great time to write a history of the Getty," he said.

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Anatomy of a deal

Discussions of a $300,000 book deal for J. Paul Getty Trust Chairman David Gardner overlapped with contract negotiations for Getty Chief Executive Barry Munitz's 2004 contract. Experts say the timing raises serious questions.

The chronology:

1992: David Gardner joins the board of the J. Paul Getty Trust.

1997: Munitz is hired as the trust's chief executive. Gardner is on the search committee that picks him.

October 1999: Gardner inquires about changing J. Paul Getty's will to allow for the compensation of trustees.

June 2000: Gardner is named chairman of the board.

January 2001: Munitz's new three-year contract is approved by the full board, granting him a substantial increase in retirement benefits. Gardner sits on the compensation committee and signs the contract.

January 2003: Munitz begins negotiating his next contract. Munitz and his staff also start discussing hiring Gardner to write a Getty book after he leaves the board.

June 2003: Two days before he is scheduled to meet with Gardner, the Getty's general counsel warns Munitz to avoid "formal exploration" of the project with the board chairman.

November 2003: Gardner discourages compensation committee Chairman Lewis Bernard from limiting Munitz's next contract to a one-year extension.

January 2004: The Getty board approves a five-year contract for Munitz. Gardner votes for it and later signs it.

DOJ_NMG_0033258

June 2004: Six days before Gardner retires from the board, Munitz and Gardner discuss the book project in detail.
Sept. 1, 2004: Gardner is put on the Getty payroll at $8,000 per month plus expenses to write the book.
August 2005: California's attorney general opens an investigation into Munitz's use of Getty resources.
February 2006: Munitz resigns as chief executive of the Getty Trust amid allegations he misused trust assets.
March 31, 2006: The book project is canceled by board Chairman John Biggs, after Gardner had been paid $178,000.
Source: Times reporting

Webb, Miller Refuel The Fires (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Chris L. Jenkins
The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

Virginia Senate candidate James Webb rallied supporters yesterday with the Democratic Party's 2004 presidential nominee, Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), hoping to spark interest in a primary that is expected to draw a tiny percentage of voters today.

Before about 250 people in Arlington County, Kerry heartily endorsed Webb, President Ronald Reagan's former Navy secretary, saying that the Senate needs the "confident leadership" and "independent thinking" that Webb has offered during the campaign.

Webb's opponent, former lobbyist Harris Miller, spent the afternoon making last-minute phone calls to prospective voters and later held a rally at his Northern Virginia headquarters in McLean.

"We cannot rest. We need to win this election tomorrow so that we can win this election in November and get the country going back in the right direction," Miller told several dozen volunteers.

Both candidates continued to run campaign ads touting their ability to defeat incumbent Sen. George Allen (R) in the fall. Miller's television ads, made possible by his investing $1 million of his personal wealth, hammer Webb on his Republican past.

"The good news for Democrats is that both Miller and Webb have shown they've got the ability to take it to Senator Allen this fall," said former governor Mark R. Warner (D). "I don't think anyone would have thought nine months ago that we would have had two competitive candidates."

Miller and Webb jumped into the void left last year when Warner decided not to challenge Allen. Since then, the two Democratic candidates have waged a spirited and at times nasty campaign that has often involved questions about what it means to be a loyal Virginia Democrat.

In stump speeches and in his campaign commercials, Miller has never missed a chance to remind voters that Webb endorsed Allen in 2000 and campaigned for George Bush that same year. Webb responded by accusing Miller of making campaign contributions to several senior Republican lawmakers, including House of Representatives Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (Ill.).

Political observers, and even the candidates themselves, say they do not know how the primary will turn out. Elections officials have said they expect between 3 percent and 5 percent of the state's registered voters to show up at the polls.

"It's impossible to know what's going to happen in this primary," Webb told about a dozen supporters at a downtown Richmond restaurant yesterday afternoon.

Later, he thanked his campaign supporters in a speech in front of his Arlington campaign headquarters. He spent much of his speech attacking President Bush, the Iraq war and Allen for what he described as failed policies.

"We have a country to lead, and the way you lead is to come together and look to the future," he said. "We need to bring an end to the Iraq war. We need to focus on economic fairness for all America. These are the issues I want to bring to the United States Senate."

Kerry also criticized Allen for supporting the war in Iraq. He said Webb would bring a fresh perspective to the Senate.

"He's a man of integrity," Kerry said of Webb during a 10-minute address that often took a populist tone. "He is the kind of person that we need who will speak across party lines, who will reach out to people whether they are Republican, independent or Democrat and talk common sense . . . to America." He called Webb someone who would "bring truth" to the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0033259

"When Jim Webb writes fiction, it's a best-selling book. When George Allen writes fiction, it's a campaign platform," Kerry said.

Miller started yesterday at the crack of dawn, greeting commuters at the Vienna Metro station. Just after lunch, he joined about three dozen campaign volunteers and thanked them for their efforts during the primary battle.

The volunteers had been going through the tedious task of calling to remind prospective voters -- largely those who had cast ballots in recent Democratic primaries -- that they had a chance to vote.

The college students, senior citizens and Miller's wife, Deborah Kahn, ate pizza, sandwiches and chocolate chip cookies as they listened to the candidate encourage them to keep up their effort for another 24 hours.

"We must get through the challenge of tomorrow," Miller said. "The Democratic Party needs someone at the top of the ticket who can win in November."

A Clash Of Styles In Virginia Vote (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — One is a warrior, the other a wonk. One says he was "born fighting," the other says he was "born to be bringing people together." One was a Republican for decades, the other is a lifelong Democrat.

Candidate A is James Webb, 60, a former Reagan administration Navy secretary who is also a decorated Marine veteran, best-selling novelist (Fields of Fire), award-winning journalist and Hollywood screenwriter (Rules of Engagement). Candidate B is Harris Miller, 54, a former Democratic congressional candidate and county chairman who represented 350 high-tech companies as president of the Information Technology Association of America.

Virginia Democrats will nominate one of them today to take on Sen. George Allen, a former governor and likely Republican presidential candidate. Prominent Senate Democrats — Majority Leader Harry Reid, 2004 presidential nominee John Kerry, Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer, Illinois' Barack Obama — already have made their choice. They say Webb is their "best hope" to gain a seat and hobble Allen's White House ambitions.

Mark Plotkin, a political analyst for Washington's WTOP-radio, calls the senators' intervention "unprecedented." In Webb's Renaissance-man résumé, his GOP past and his macho persona, Plotkin says, top Democrats see "political nirvana" — the return of white, male, rural and military voters to the Democratic Party.

In Miller's corner, The Washington Post. The editorial board called him "better-briefed, better-focused and more thoughtful" than Webb.

Webb and Miller often criticize President Bush's policies and Allen's support for them, but the Allen camp is holding its fire for now. Dick Wadhams, Allen's campaign manager, says "there's more to this campaign than not liking President Bush. We'll see who emerges from the Democratic primary and whether they have more to offer."

Allen, known for his cowboy boots, sports metaphors and Reaganesque style, is preparing for a 2008 presidential run. He's traveled to several key states this year and he's scheduled to speak Saturday in Des Moines. But he'll be campaigning for re-election in Virginia all summer, his onetime shoo-in status complicated by a national climate favoring Democrats.

On money, Allen is the clear leader. As of March 31, he had raised $10.4 million, according to the non-partisan Center for Responsive Politics. The Democrats were way behind and dipping into personal funds. Webb had raised $253,000 (40% his own), compared with Miller's $537,000 (33% his own).

Webb and Miller disagree on a few issues, but the main contrast between them is style. Webb drives a camouflage-painted Jeep and campaigns in combat boots that belong to his son, a Marine bound for Iraq in fall. "I was raised to lead from when I was a kid," he says.

Miller says his people skills will make him an effective senator. His website is laden with 10- and 15-point plans to solve problems. (By contrast, major issues get just a paragraph apiece from Webb). "I've been accused of being a policy wonk," Miller says. "I plead guilty. U.S. senators are supposed to talk about policy."

Aiming at loyal Democrats most likely to vote in the primary, Miller attacks Webb's votes in 2000 for Allen and Bush. He notes his own long record of helping elect Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0033260

Webb's campaign has tried mightily to reinforce his new Democratic identity. At a spring rally in the Washington suburb of Arlington, Democratic county official Jay Fisette repeatedly referred to Webb as "our guy" — as in, "our guy" opposed the Iraq war before it started and "our guy" believes in the right to choose abortion.

Webb says defense, national security and veterans issues drew him to the GOP, but "I was never comfortable with Republicans on social policy." After the Iraq and Hurricane Katrina debacles, he says, he decided it was time for "new eyes" on national problems.

As for 2000, Webb says it was a mistake to vote for Allen instead of Democratic Sen. Chuck Robb. He says 11 former Robb aides now support him, and he notes that Miller has contributed to prominent Republicans such as House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill. Miller says he made the donations — $5,500 vs. $250,000 to Democrats — because his job required bipartisanship.

Conflicts over race and religion have roiled the campaign. Webb called Miller, who is Jewish, "the anti-Christ of outsourcing." Then a Webb brochure, circulated at a union event in southwestern Virginia, caricatured Miller as a hook-nosed "job-killer" with cash spilling from his lapel pocket.

Miller called the illustration a classic "Jewish financier stereotype." "I do not believe Jim Webb is anti-Semitic," he said, "but clearly there are just elements of what he's done and said that are not ready for prime time."

Webb said the brochure was not anti-Semitic. "I would never engage in that sort of conduct," he said in a debate Friday, but apologized if anyone perceived it that way. He then accused Miller of playing "the race card" by distorting Webb's views on affirmative action. Spokeswoman Kristian Denny-Todd said Webb has always supported affirmative action for African-Americans but believes any broader application should also include poor white people.

Will State Democrats Back D.C.'s Horse? (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, June 13, 2006

ARLINGTON, VA.

War hero and former Reagan Navy secretary James Webb is the name that Senate Democrats hope will lead the ticket against Republican Sen. George Allen in this fall's election, because they're convinced he could win.

"He's our best hope for defeating Allen in November," said Sen. Charles Schumer (D) of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, in a statement last week.

But it's not clear that Virginia Democrats expected to turn out in Tuesday's primary election got the memo.

At an annual dinner on Friday, not a hint of applause from Arlington County Democrats greeted Mr. Webb's announcement that 13 Democratic senators had "stood up and endorsed my candidacy."

"I'm a yellow dog Democrat," explained retired teacher Jean Barton, a Democratic Party activist since the 1960s, in a reference to Southern Democrats' historical pattern of voting for their party's candidates whether they like them or not. "I like to dance with the guy who brought me."

That guy would be high-tech lobbyist and consultant Harris Miller, who was chairing the Fairfax County Democratic Committee when Mr. Webb, a Reagan Democrat, joined the Reagan administration.

"I've known [Mr. Harris] for 20-plus years. He's a Democrat whose values I share," says Mary Margaret Whipple of Arlington, Va., who chairs the state Senate Democratic Caucus.

"It wasn't easy to be a Democrat in Virginia in the 1980s," Mr. Miller told a hometown crowd in the state's most liberal district. He said he has driven more than 24,000 campaign-trail miles in his "hybrid vehicle" since January. He has also contributed nearly $1 million of his own money to his campaign, more than double what Webb has raised for this fight.

But if Webb were to pull off a primary victory, he could expect a surge of national funding to defeat Senator Allen, who is also a probable 2008 presidential contender.

"Webb would be a candidate that Allen cannot afford to ignore," says Larry Sabato, a political scientist at the University of Virginia. "Webb can serve as a very useful standard-bearer for the Democratic Party nationally, not just in Virginia. He's exactly the image that Democrats need to project to win in some red states."

DOJ_NMG_0033261

Allen, elected to the Senate in 2000, is no longer a sure thing in Virginia, especially if state Democratic voters go with Webb as the challenger, says Jennifer Duffy, who handicaps Senate races for the Cook Political Report.

"Virginia is changing," she says. "It is not a solidly red state anymore."

Allen, she adds, "has been hampered by all the talk of his 2008 ambitions. Webb is a strong candidate because he speaks to all those voters who have a problem with the war." The Allen campaign launched its first TV ads last week.

A decorated marine, award-winning journalist, and author of six best-selling novels, Webb came out in opposition to the war in Iraq, which he characterized as the greatest strategic blunder in modern times, back in September 2002. His antiwar stance could draw antiwar conservatives, as well as libertarians, from the Allen camp.

"If Webb got the nomination, it would be an interesting opportunity for libertarians to think whether they prefer an orthodox, conservative, Bush Republican against an unorthodox antiwar Democrat," says David Boaz, executive vice president of the Cato Institute, a libertarian think tank. "He's very critical of the war, but from a perspective that is not far left. It's a patriotic, mainstream, American criticism of the war. He was Reagan's secretary of the Navy, [he's] not [House Democratic leader] Nancy Pelosi."

Webb and Harris both oppose the war, but Webb did so earlier and publicly. The war would turn troops into "terrorist targets," and there was not an exit strategy "because the principal architects of this war did not intend for us to leave," he said last week during a debate with Harris on MSNBC's "Hardball."

They also take bookend positions on outsourcing of US jobs, especially high-tech jobs. Miller, a former president of the Information Technology Association of America, says outsourcing is good for the economy. Webb promises to stop good jobs from being exported overseas.

But asked at the end of the MSNBC debate whether he would endorse Hillary Rodham Clinton or popular former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner (D) for the presidency in 2008 - a no-brainer for a Virginia Democrat - Webb said he was undecided.

"He's undisciplined as a candidate," says Ms. Duffy of the Cook Political Report.

While Harris has focused his campaign on traditional Democratic groups, Webb is counting on support from new voters, many recruited from the blogosphere.

In a race with no polling, and with the turnout percentage among Democrats expected to be in single digits, it's tough to predict the outcome. "If voters behave the way the textbook says they do, then Miller wins," she adds. "If voters start to contemplate electability, than Webb wins."

The Sway Of Senate Leaders Is Put To The Test In Virgina (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, June 13, 2006

Democratic Senate candidate Harris Miller spent a lot of time this past weekend glad-handing at Northern Virginia Metro stations, just a few stops from both the place he is trying to get to and the place that is standing in his way — Capitol Hill.

Meanwhile, Miller's Virginia primary opponent, Jim Webb, took the slate of Washington endorsements he has recently received from high-profile senators and the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) and made his final push for today's Democratic primary farther south.

The race to take on incumbent Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) this November is shaping up to be a test of how much influence Washington has on local politics across the Potomac River.

Miller noted that he has previously spent a good deal more time outside of Northern Virginia than inside it, traveling dozens of times to places like Norfolk and Hampton Roads. But he said the votes around the Beltway will play big today.

"Clearly, a large percentage of the votes are going to come from Northern Virginia — probably a third or more," said Miller, a businessman and lobbyist. "At the end of the day, there are a lot of voters up here."

Webb, a war hero and author who was Navy secretary under President Ronald Reagan and recently became an anti-war Democrat, has gathered endorsements from nine Democratic senators, including Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.), 2004 presidential candidate John Kerry (Mass.) and senior senators Chris Dodd (Conn.) and Carl Levin (Mich.). He also has the support of Rep. John Murtha (Pa.), 2004 presidential candidate Gen. Wesley Clark and three well-known former senators.

DOJ_NMG_0033262

The rare, last-minute backing of DSCC Chairman Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) last week, though, topped it all off. The move is seen as an indication that Webb would receive more national attention and help than Miller would in the Democrats' quest to unseat Allen.

Indeed, national Democrats aren't saying Webb is the better candidate so much as that he is the candidate better able to defeat Allen. A Rasmussen poll from April shows Webb trailing Allen by 20 points, while an earlier Zogby poll showed him behind by seven. Webb was closer than Miller in both polls.

Primary endorsements from national committees are rare and potentially embarrassing, Jennifer Duffy of the Cook Political Report said. Just last week, the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) repeatedly lampooned its House Democratic counterpart for endorsing primary loser Steve Filson in California's 11th District. Filson lost June 6 by nearly a 2-to-1 ratio.

The NRCC has also criticized the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) for its support of two other primary losers — Andrew Horne in Kentucky's 3rd District and Joe Sulzer in Ohio's 18th — though the DCCC says it remained neutral in both races. Sulzer finished third, and Horne did only slightly better than Filson.

Duffy said the decisionmakers at the DSCC "are sticking their neck out" for Webb.

"If you're them, maybe it's worth taking the gamble," she said. "But if Webb is the nominee, they're going to have to work with him a lot."

Miller, on the other hand, received his biggest national endorsement from Rep. Jim Moran (D-Va.), who offered it before Webb joined the race and said Webb would also be a "good alternative" to Allen.

Moran said that he is not heavily involved in Miller's campaign and that he understands why national Democrats are pushing Webb.

"I think they're looking at his résumé, and they think Webb has an interesting story to tell," Moran said. "Harris Miller is seen as the urban sophisticate in some people's minds."

Rep. Bobby Scott (D-Va.), who hasn't endorsed either candidate, downplayed the effect national Democrats like himself can have on Virginia voters: "Usually, Virginians make up their own minds."

That's what Miller is counting on. He touts support from dozens of state lawmakers, mayors and council members and said that, while national Democrats throw their support to Webb, local politicians have been hitting the ground for him.

"Chuck Schumer's a good senator for New York City, and Harry Reid's a nice senator for Las Vegas," Miller said. "But I have the support of the people here in Virginia, and those are the people that count.

"[Local leaders] have the lists. They're calling out their troops to support me too. And that's what really counts on Election Day."

Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny-Todd said the national endorsements have overshadowed the amount of local support Webb has received — almost 50 local Democratic elected officials and 2,800 daily volunteers.

"I challenge the Miller campaign to come up with anything close to that number [of volunteers]," Todd said. Miller spokeswoman Taylor West said the campaign has exceeded every goal it's had for volunteer support.

DSCC spokesman Phil Singer declined to say how the committee's backing of Webb translates into physical or monetary support for the final weekend of the campaign. Of the decision to support Webb's coming as late as it did, he said it was simply "the right time for us to mix in, and so we did."

While Webb has carved out a niche with the national support, help from bloggers and his personal biography, Miller's superior fundraising and political experience have helped him run a traditional campaign that many say would be just fine under other circumstances. He has outraised Webb more than 2-1.

Tuesday's primary is expected to be close, though Webb has touted sizable victories in several straw polls around the state, including Fairfax County in Northern Virginia.

Allen, who is running unopposed in the GOP primary, ran television ads over the weekend touting him as "independent" and a "common sense" leader.

Schumer Gets Cold Shoulder For Endorsement (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0033263

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

It's not yet clear whether New York Sen. Charles E. Schumer's endorsement of James Webb over Harris Miller in today's Democratic Senate primary in Virginia will help move votes. But it did move money -- away from Schumer and the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee he leads.

The DSCC's decision to break with custom and wade into a primary battle on behalf of a Reagan administration official against a longtime Democratic loyalist outraged many influential Democrats, including some who raise a lot of money that now won't be going to the DSCC.

The most immediate fallout of Schumer's endorsement was the relocation of a post-primary fundraiser for the DSCC that was scheduled to be at the home of former lieutenant governor Donald S. Beyer Jr. and his wife, Megan. The longtime Democratic fundraisers are Miller supporters. The Beyers begged off after Schumer's move, for which they received no advance notice.

The event will be at another venue, but is likely to bring in considerably less money as irritated Miller backers join the Beyers in taking a pass on helping the DSCC.

Phil Singer, communications director at the DSCC, said his organization does not discuss internal fundraising matters.

Schumer, Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) and some other Washington Democrats believe that Webb, a former Republican and an opponent of the Iraq war, would be a more electable nominee against Sen. George Allen (R-Va.). Miller has focused his campaign more locally, touting his endorsements from Virginia leaders and his record of working to elect Democrats. Fueled by his own money, Miller has flooded the radio airwaves with ads attacking Webb's Democratic bona fides, pointing out that he endorsed Allen over Democratic Sen. Charles S. Robb in 2000.

Beyer said the DSCC should have stayed out. "They've dug a hole that was unnecessary," he said. "If Harris wins, they are going to look ridiculous. They will have irritated an awful lot of people."Iowa Still Loves Edwards

The Des Moines Register recently released the results of a poll of likely 2008 Democratic caucus participants that established John Edwards -- not Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) -- as the current Iowa front-runner. Edwards, a former North Carolina senator and 2004 vice presidential nominee, took 30 percent to Clinton's 26 percent.

John Kerry, the party's 2004 presidential nominee, garnered 12 percent, while Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack had 10 percent. Other candidates who are expected to enter the 2008 Democratic presidential contest, such as former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner and Sen. Evan Bayh (Ind.), garnered single-digit support.

Edwards finished a strong second behind Kerry in the 2004 Iowa caucuses and has never shut down his operation there. (Several top Edwards aides in Iowa are involved in Secretary of State Chet Culver's 2006 gubernatorial campaign.) Edwards spent Sunday and yesterday campaigning and raising money for Culver and Bruce Braley, the Democratic nominee in the open 1st Congressional District.

If Edwards was the clear winner in the Register poll, the most obvious loser was Vilsack, who could do no better than fourth in his home state. While few political observers expect Vilsack to be able to equal or surpass Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin's 76 percent showing in the 1992 Democratic caucuses, anything other than a victory in the state in the 2008 caucuses would almost certainly cripple the governor's chances in New Hampshire and beyond.

Miller, Webb Await Verdict In Primary (WT)

By Seth McLaughlin

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

The two Democrats vying to unseat Sen. George Allen have spent more than $1 million leading up to today's Democratic primary in Virginia.

The outcome will show how well Harris N. Miller, a former information-technology executive from McLean, and James H. Webb Jr., former Navy secretary under President Reagan, have pinpointed who will turn out at the polls today.

"You can't predict it," Mr. Webb, a decorated Vietnam War veteran from Falls Church, told The Washington Times last month.

DOJ_NMG_0033264

Polls will be open from 6 a.m. to 7 p.m.

Both campaigns agree it is tough to forecast who will show up at the polls because voter turnout in primaries tends to be low. For example, in the 2005 Democratic primary for lieutenant governor, 115,379 people voted, which was less than 3 percent of the 4.4 million registered voters in Virginia.

Kristian Denny-Todd, a spokeswoman for Mr. Webb, said it also is difficult to target voters because Virginia does not require voters to register with a party, so anyone from any party can vote. And there have been a limited number of statewide Democratic primaries for federal office.

"It's not easy in Virginia," Mrs. Denny-Todd told The Times. "These kinds of primaries are few and far between."

That means "there is a huge influence to be had with a good get-out-the-vote operation," said Taylor West, a spokeswoman for Mr. Miller.

Both camps have analyzed poll numbers in previous primary elections and the 2004 presidential election, and taken into account an estimated 500,000 residents who moved to Virginia since Mr. Allen was elected in 2000.

"There is also a little bit of extra attention because of George Allen, who might run for president," Mrs. Denny-Todd said.

"So we make the assumption that a few more people might come out because George Allen has voted for [President] Bush 97 percent of the time."

Both campaigns have scrambled to raise money. As of May 25, Mr. Miller had raised $1.2 million -- of which $675,000 is his own money -- and Mr. Webb has raised $547,000 -- which includes a $100,000 loan.

The winner of today's primary will face an uphill battle against Mr. Allen, who has more than $7 million in his campaign war chest. Independent Green Party candidate Gail Parker, a retired federal employee from Alexandria, also is running.

In other primaries today, Democrats Andrew L. Hurst and Ken Longmyer face off for their party's nomination to run against Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, and Republicans Mark W. Ellmore and Tom M. O'Donoghue will challenge each other for their party's nomination to try to unseat Rep. James P. Moran, Virginia Democrat.

A Week Of Blessings For A GOP Majority That Needed Them (RC)

By David Winston

Roll Call, June 13, 2006

That sound you heard all over Washington, D.C., last Wednesday morning was Republicans breathing a huge collective sigh of relief that Republican Brian Bilbray had defeated Democrat Francine Busby in the special election to fill California's 50th district House seat. That GOP victory, however, was just the first in a series of political and policy events that challenged the prevailing conventional wisdom and sent Democrats scurrying to their spin doctors for something — anything — positive to say about what quickly turned into a 72-hour political nightmare.

It began with Busby's loss. For weeks, Democrats had been positioning for a win in this GOP-leaning seat, asserting that the "culture of corruption" would claim its first of many GOP victims thanks to the bribery conviction of ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.).

Instead, Bilbray won the special election against Busby, who, despite the national hype, eked out only 45 percent of the vote — roughly the same percentage that the past two Democratic presidential candidates managed in the district. Clearly, predictions that voters would be outraged over Republican "corruption" and were ready to flock to the Democratic fold were wildly overblown.

Voters were indeed unhappy, but the target of their ire was another national issue: immigration. And on this topic, Busby was on the wrong side of the majority, particularly when she dropped her bombshell comment that illegal immigrants "don't need papers to vote." This from a candidate offering herself up as an ethical alternative to corrupt Republicans.

It was Bilbray who reflected the immigration views of the majority of voters — a focus on securing the border first, a view that separated him publicly from Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and his "comprehensive" position. On Wednesday, Democrats woke up to find that a seat they thought was in their grasp had slipped through their fingers.

If Democrats are to have any hope of winning back the House in November, California's 50th district is exactly the kind of seat they have to win. Yet they failed to do so, despite pouring millions into a district that had been represented by the House's poster boy for political corruption. What Democrats forgot is that when you try to nationalize an election, as they did using the "culture of corruption" mantra, winning candidates must offer voters more than an attack strategy. They also must have a platform of ideas that voters care about — a fact that Republicans understood in 1994.

DOJ_NMG_0033265

But the loss of the special election was only the beginning of a bad week for Democrats. By Thursday, they once again found themselves on the defensive when good news arrived from Iraq — news too big to be ignored. Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the most wanted terrorist in Iraq, had been killed by U.S. military air strikes on the same day that the new Iraqi government had filled its last and most important cabinet posts, Defense and Interior.

While many Democrats praised the military for their success, it was the outspoken and harsh comments of some in the party that put the media spotlight on the Democrats' schizophrenic view of the war. Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) said, "I don't think we can win this," while Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.) predicted, "Two weeks from now you're going to be showing people ripped off buses and beheaded."

Rep. Pete Stark (D-Calif.) won the prize, however, with his over-the-top comment that "this is just to cover Bush's [rear] so he doesn't have to answer" for the deaths of Iraqi civilians killed by the U.S. military. Other Bush critics such as The Nation's David Corn tried desperately to downplay the significance of Zarqawi's death by describing this most powerful of terrorists as "something of a sideshow." Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio) called Zarqawi a minor part in a "growing anti-American insurgency" and called for the U.S. to get out. This kind of naysaying about an undeniably important military victory won't sit well with most Americans.

But if Thursday was bad for Democrats, by Friday, things had gotten even worse. Rumors of serious rifts in the House Democratic leadership burst into the open Friday as an apparently clairvoyant Murtha announced his intention to seek the Majority Leader's job if Democrats win the House in November. Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) did nothing to stop what was sure to be seen by Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) and his supporters as a leadership "coup."

Pelosi, still clinging to her "culture of corruption" strategy despite the Busby loss, had on Thursday evening tried and failed, at least temporarily, to oust the ethically challenged William Jefferson (D-La.) from his Ways and Means Committee post. In reality, she did little more than remind Americans about Democratic corruption while in the process angering the Congressional Black Caucus.

Murtha's announcement only added to the perception that the Democratic House leadership is in disarray — hardly unified behind a national strategy or agenda to win in November. For Murtha to fire a shot over Hoyer's bow almost five months before an election is a gift that Republicans hadn't counted on.

Hoyer — who, unlike Pelosi, seems to have a better grasp of electoral reality — probably hadn't counted on it either. Interestingly, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, took great pains Sunday on ABC's "This Week" to avoid taking a position on the Murtha bid — a bit of a surprise from the Democrats' usually pragmatic "Enforcer."

In 1997, as a member of the leadership senior staff, I saw the impact of an attempted leadership "coup" on the morale and management of a House majority. It wasn't pretty, and it certainly didn't produce positive election results. The 1998 elections, in which the GOP lost seats counter to historical trends, offered proof that dissension can trigger negative outcomes.

Whether Pelosi was behind Murtha's move or simply let it happen, the prospect of one of the House's most hard-core liberals teaming with one of its most strident anti-war Democrats as the "face" of the Democratic Party this fall has Republicans smiling for a change.

One good week, however, doesn't mean the GOP won't face a big challenge in November. It will, and most GOP leaders understand that. But for Republicans who have suffered through a long spell of bad news, they were grateful that Democrats reminded the country last week why it remains a minority party.

David Winston is president of The Winston Group, a Republican polling firm.

Texas Democrat Faces Uphill Fight (WT)

By Hugh Aynesworth

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033266

FORT WORTH, Texas -- State Democrats emerged from their convention here over the weekend with conviction and verve, but they still face an uphill battle to take back the governor's mansion.

Chris Bell, the one-term congressman from Houston who was gerrymandered out of his district in 2002, is the party's choice to oppose Republican Gov. Rick Perry. Mr. Perry is seeking his second full term.

Mr. Bell, 46, said he could win if the party faithful would stick together.

The Houston Democrat certainly needs that, but his own campaign workers concede that few voters have ever heard of Mr. Bell, making name recognition a dominant theme in the campaign.

"If we don't solve this problem," said Bell spokesman Jason Stanford, "then nothing else matters."

Texas Monthly magazine recently nicknamed the likable Mr. Bell "Sisyphus," after the mythological Greek figure who spent most of his life unsuccessfully trying to roll a huge stone to the top of a mountain.

But Mr. Bell is an optimist, and he was buoyed by the excitement of an estimated 6,000 people who packed the convention. He told them that he would lead a "new Texas revolution" to make the state's school and health systems among the best in the nation.

He urged delegates to embrace "the party's traditional core issues of education and health care" as the key to winning in November.

The 2006 governor's race is one of the most interesting -- and probably the most unpredictable -- in recent memory. There are likely to be five candidates -- Republican incumbent Mr. Perry; Mr. Bell; two independent candidates, Carole Keeton Strayhorn and Kinky Friedman; and Libertarian James Werner.

Mr. Perry has led most every early poll, hanging solidly at 35 percent to 40 percent. Mrs. Strayhorn -- once a Democrat, then a Republican, now independent -- usually has placed second.

Mr. Bell finished second in a March poll commissioned by the Wall Street Journal, getting 21 percent of public support to Mr. Perry's 36 percent, with Mrs. Strayhorn and Mr. Friedman at 19 percent and 17 percent, respectively.

To win the office, a majority of the vote is not needed. The candidate with the most votes wins. Some say that unless there is a huge turnout, the next governor could garner less than 40 percent of the vote.

Although his campaign says name recognition is Mr. Bell's biggest hurdle, there seems little doubt that money is also a problem.

Campaign-expense reports won't be made public for a few days, but Bell staffers privately say he has raised "more than $1 million." Mr. Perry reported more than $9 million before the March primary election, and Mrs. Strayhorn came in at more than $8 million. Mr. Bell had only about $100,000 at that point.

"He's got to find some deep pockets, or he can't compete," said Ray Gravely, a San Antonio salesman. "Texas is so vast. It costs so much to run."

’08 Hopefuls May Cause Leaders Fits (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, June 13, 2006

With an extraordinary 11 sitting Senators seriously eyeing a bid for the White House in 2008, both parties are already dealing with logistical and personality headaches as the lawmakers use the chamber as a testing ground for their competing agendas.

At least five Republican and six Democratic Senators are currently looking at the idea of mounting presidential campaigns — the most in recent memory. And, at least one other Member of Congress, Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), is considered a possible candidate.

“It’s going to be an absolute circus,” acknowledged one GOP Senate aide. “There’s going to be a lot of thumping of the chests, a lot of third-person speaking.”

On the Democratic side, Sens. Evan Bayh (Ind.), Joseph Biden (Del.), Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), Chris Dodd (Conn.), Russ Feingold (Wis.) and John Kerry (Mass.) already are viewed as committed contenders. Despite his protests, Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) is also seen by some observers as a possible candidate, although many believe he is disinclined to run in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0033267

The early Republican field includes Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.), who is retiring after this Congress, as well as Sens. John McCain (Ariz.), Chuck Hagel (Neb.), Sam Brownback (Kan.) and George Allen (Va.).

While none of the dozen or so Members has formally launched campaigns, the groundswell of interest from sitting lawmakers makes it likely they will surpass the most recent high-water mark for Members seeking the White House, set in 1972 when nine Members of Congress officially launched bids. Then, five Senators and four House Members threw their hats in the ring, resulting in the nomination of South Dakota Democrat George McGovern, the last sitting Senator to win either party's nomination until Kerry accomplished the feat in 2004.

Aides and Senators from both parties said managing the presidential hopefuls' egos will be tricky at a time when both parties are banking on heightened unity to gain an election-year advantage on the issues of the day. But those sources are quick to note that personalities always play a role in the Senate regardless of whether a lawmaker is aspiring for another office.

As such, leaders in both parties recognize there is little they can do to restrain individual Senators as they seek to carve out their presidential platforms. But several senior Senate aides said leadership continues to press the case internally that sticking together — at least through this high-stakes election year — is a priority.

"Right now, '06 is keep people pretty unified," said one GOP Senate aide. "Next year it will be a much bigger problem."

Sen. Rick Santorum (Pa.), the GOP Conference chairman and candidate for Majority Whip in the 110th Congress, said the real difficulties are likely to develop in the months leading up to the major presidential primaries when Senators are spending more time on the campaign trail than on the floor. Ensuring that Senators are present for key votes will be the pressing issue for leadership on both sides of the aisle, he said. The fact that the chamber could be even more closely divided in 2007 only exacerbates that.

"Counting votes will be the struggle," said Santorum, stressing he personally has no plans to pursue the White House in 2008. "There could be a big logistical challenge as we approach the next Congress."

Santorum harkened back to 2004, when Democrats Kerry and then-Sen. John Edwards (N.C.), then the minority party's ticket for president, were often absent as they campaigned across the country.

Those two had squared off, among others, against two House Members and two other Senators for the Democratic nomination. Then-Rep. Richard Gephardt (Mo.), Rep. Dennis Kucinich (Ohio), then-Sen. Bob Graham (Fla.) and Sen. Joe Lieberman (Conn.) also had hopes of knocking off President Bush in 2004.

Santorum said that depending on the outcome of the November election, the vote-casting problems could even be heightened next year if the margins of Republican to Democratic control narrow. Many observers predict Democrats will at least close the 55-44 gap in November, meaning that even one Senator's vote could tip the scales on key votes.

"Who knows what the situation will be," Santorum said, but "under the worst-case scenario" leadership could have serious challenges to overcome.

A former aide to then-Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) said that inevitably "it gets more difficult when you have people staking out differences and positions as they run or try to position themselves to run." The aide said that for Democrats, led by now-Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.), "the biggest challenge is managing egos — that's the hardest part of the job in the Senate — managing everyone.

"They really think they are the smartest person in the room and know better than everyone else."

In the nearer term, the Republicans have had a unique set of circumstances as Frist toys with a presidential bid of his own. Several Senate aides said the next six months are likely to be awkward for the GOP Conference as Frist pushes a prospective vote-courting agenda, as well as an election-year platform designed to sustain the party's majorities.

"Sen. Frist still needs to demonstrate to his colleagues that he can run this place," said a senior GOP aide.

Some believe that once Frist leaves office, the job of managing presidential hopefuls will become simpler on the Republican side knowing that the majority leader's White House bid rests largely on his stewardship of the Senate.

Others, however, believe the task will become more difficult since the contenders will inevitably kick their campaigns into high gear.

DOJ_NMG_0033268

Sen. Debbie Stabenow (Mich.), the No. 4 Senate Democrat as Caucus secretary, said she believes, at least on the Democratic side, that leadership will be able to keep the contenders in check through 2008. She said Senators are in sync on the vast majority of the party's priorities and will stick together moving through the cycle as they oppose the GOP-Bush agenda.

"Certainly there are always challenges, but on our side of the aisle there is real unity for what we stand for and what we are fighting for," she said. "It will sort itself out. I'm not worried about it."

Kerry said he doesn't fear that the number of Senators running for the White House will hamstring progress in the chamber, although he acknowledged that it is a time-consuming venture and in many ways "a full-time job."

"You have to decide which votes are the most important, and obviously you will miss a few," Kerry said. "But it is an important aspect of public life."

While clearly not a discouraging factor, few Senators in the nation's history have ascended from Capitol Hill to Pennsylvania Avenue. In fact, the last Member of Congress to win the slot was then-Sen. John Kennedy (D-Mass.), who secured the presidency in 1960.

But 2008 is shaping up to be a rare election year since Bush is a lame-duck president whose second in command, Vice President Cheney, is not running to succeed him.

While keeping coy about his presidential plans, Allen said his approach to the Senate remains consistent — keeping focus as a Virginia Senator on the issues and values about which he has fought as governor and now in Congress. When asked about how the number of White House candidates could affect the Senate in the coming months, Allen would only say that it inevitably creates more commitments.

"You end up getting more invitations to different places, to speak here or there across the country," he said.

Biden agreed, noting that even on the Foreign Relations Committee, on which he serves as ranking member, at least three other Senate Democrats and two other Republicans are possible contenders.

But Biden said that for him, individually, 2008 is a different climate than in 1988 when he first ran as a younger, more junior Senator who lacked the profile he enjoys now both in stature and on national security issues. Plus, he said, it is easier to run as a member of the minority party simply because the Republicans control, set and manage the Senate floor.

"For all those reasons, it is more manageable to be a responsible Senator than it was 20 years ago," Biden said.

In Kansas, A Troubling Fissure For GOP (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi

The Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

TOPEKA, Kan. — Mark Parkinson got his start in Republican politics at age 19, as a precinct committeeman. He served six years as a Republican state legislator, eventually becoming state Republican chairman.

But two weeks ago, Parkinson announced he was running for lieutenant governor — as a Democrat. He said he no longer felt welcome in the increasingly conservative Kansas Republican Party.

Parkinson became the third Republican politician in the last nine months to startle this red state by switching to the minority party. The other two are targeting GOP incumbents in the attorney general's office and in the state House of Representatives.

Political observers say the fracture within the Kansas GOP may foreshadow the future for the national party. The division between moderates and social conservatives is expected to define the contest for the party's 2008 presidential nomination.

Kansas has been at the forefront of the culture wars that helped the Republican Party gain national dominance this decade. Twice in the last seven years, its Board of Education voted to teach alternatives to evolution in public schools. Voters in 2005 overwhelmingly approved a ban on gay marriage. The state's attorney general last year subpoenaed medical records of abortion patients.

"A lot of people in Kansas are feeling lost right now," said Parkinson, 48, who was invited onto the ticket by popular Democratic incumbent Gov. Kathleen Sebelius. "I decided I'd rather spend time building great universities than wondering if Charles Darwin was right."

DOJ_NMG_0033269

Moderates who emphasize economic development and religious conservatives concerned with limiting abortion and gay rights have battled for more than a decade for control of the Kansas Republican Party, which dominates the state with 48% of registered voters. The remaining voters are split evenly between Democratic and Independent registration.

In 1994, when the GOP won both houses of Congress for the first time in 40 years, a group of religious conservatives in Kansas ousted the moderates who ran the party. The intramural squabbling grew so great that four years later, the then-chair of the party unsuccessfully ran against the moderate Republican governor.

Today, websites for some county branches of the party instruct on how to identify RINOs — Republicans In Name Only — and keep them from gaining influence. Social conservatives have solidified their power over the party and are especially influential in low-turnout primaries and local elections. Increasing numbers of moderates like Parkinson are saying they've had enough.

Alan Cigler, a political science professor at the University of Kansas, compares the intra-party turmoil to the national schism between business-friendly moderate Republicans and cultural conservatives over illegal immigration.

"The state is kind of dividing up," Cigler said. "It's the Christian right versus the business interests of the Republican party. That's what Kansas is all about now."

The Kansas Republican Party, Cigler said, "has been ahead of the curve."

Ron Freeman, executive director of the state GOP, says the recent defections are due to the personal ambitions of the politicians, not because of any ideological shift.

"To say it's gone way to the right, that's not a fair analysis," Freeman said, noting that two of the party's four statewide officeholders back abortion rights.

One of those officials, Insurance Commissioner Sandy Praeger, is opposed in the GOP primary by a candidate opposed to abortion rights. Another moderate, Secretary of State Ron Thornburg, is facing a primary challenge from a female GOP state senator who was reported in 2001 as saying family values began to erode when women got the right to vote.

Some Kansas voters say they feel shut out. "I'm absolutely fed up with the conservative Republicans," said Richard Meidinger, a retired physician in Topeka. "All the abortion stuff, gay marriage stuff doesn't belong in the legislative debate."

Martin Hawver has a name for lifelong members of the GOP like Meidinger: "failed Republicans." The editor of a respected Kansas political newsletter, Hawver's Capitol Report, Hawver counts himself among their number, occasionally doing the unthinkable and voting Democratic.

"It used to be you could never go wrong with voting for who the Republicans nominated," Hawver said. "But that's changing now. People are a little uneasy."

Cindy Neighbor is one of them. A veteran member of her local school board and a moderate, Neighbor, 57, unsuccessfully ran against a conservative for an open seat in the statehouse in 2000. She narrowly lost, but won in 2002.

Neighbor wasn't long for Kansas Republican politics, however. She backed an education bill that could have raised taxes, and party conservatives told her there would be retaliation. She lost the next primary to the same representative she'd ousted two years earlier. Another moderate Republican who'd co-sponsored her bill — Bill Kassebaum, the son of former Kansas U.S. Sen. Nancy Kassebaum Baker — was ousted at the same time.

Now Neighbor's running for her old seat — as a Democrat.

"It was, 'If you don't like this — goodbye,' " she said of her struggles to stay in the Republican Party. As a Democrat, Neighbor added, "you can still have your ideas and you're accepted."

Paul Morrison, the 51-year-old district attorney of the state's largest county, also switched to the Democratic Party. The laconic Morrison, who served as Johnson County's top prosecutor for 17 years, said he'd never been particularly partisan but thought the Democratic Party was "a better fit" for challenging state Atty. Gen. Phill Kline.

An outspoken evangelical, Kline has gained national attention for subpoenaing records of patients who had abortions at two Kansas clinics, as well as for saying that state social workers and psychologists are required to report teenagers who admit they have sex so law enforcement can conduct child abuse investigations. Morrison criticized Kline for "forging a public policy that fits a narrow agenda that most people don't agree with."

DOJ_NMG_0033270

Whitney Watson, a spokesman for Kline, dismissed Morrison's challenge and noted that all of Kansas' county sheriffs, including some Democrats, had endorsed Kline. "It's unfortunate that Mr. Morrison believes that protecting Kansas children … is a peripheral issue," Watson said.

When Morrison announced he was challenging Kline last fall, Parkinson, a longtime friend, endorsed him. Parkinson said he figured it was the end of his political career. So the former GOP chairman and legislator was surprised to get a call from the Sebelius campaign exploring whether he'd join the governor's ticket.

Sebelius, whose Cabinet includes a former Republican governor, said she contacted Parkinson because she knew him from his time in the Legislature, not because of his party. Democrats in Kansas, she said, have a natural inclination to reach across party lines.

"Even if 100% of Democrats vote for something," Sebelius said, "it won't happen unless you can draw out Republicans."

Area Candidates Embrace A Visit By Laura Bush (PHI)

By Cynthia Burton

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 13, 2006

As Republican candidates around the country avoid appearances with President Bush or Vice President Cheney, two in the Philadelphia area - U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania and Senate challenger Thomas H. Kean Jr. in New Jersey - welcome visiting Laura Bush today with open war chests.

"Laura Bush is safe," Republican political consultant Dave Murray said.

People don't blame her for the war in Iraq, rising gasoline prices, or unpopular administration policies.

"It's a simple matter of arithmetic. Her numbers are better," said Democratic consultant David Axelrod, who has worked for U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D., N.Y.) and Mayor Street. "Despite her husband's travails, she remains an enormously popular figure."

She also helps raise money.

Laura Bush is scheduled to appear this morning at a fund-raising breakfast for Santorum at the Appleford Estate in Villanova. Santorum is hoping for 300 attendees and $400,000, according to spokeswoman Virginia Davis.

Bush also is to attend an afternoon reception for Kean at a law office in Lakewood, N.J., where the Kean campaign expects as many as 500 guests and at least $500,000 in contributions, which it will split with the New Jersey Republican Committee.

Kean and Santorum have avoided being seen with icons of the Bush administration, whose popularity has plunged in Pennsylvania and New Jersey. Polls show about 80 percent are favorable toward Laura Bush, while approval ratings of her husband and Cheney are in the low 30s.

Santorum, who trails Democrat Bob Casey Jr. in opinion polls, ducked the president at recent Pennsylvania appearances.

Kean famously was "stuck in traffic" and was late for a March fund-raiser featuring Cheney in Newark, N.J.

Laura Bush has stumped for other Senate and House candidates in North Carolina, New Mexico, Missouri, Vermont and Connecticut.

"I have been pleasantly surprised on this fund-raiser," said Republican lion Lawrence Bathgate, host of today's Kean event.

He said Democrats also planned to attend, though with tickets bought by their companies or Republican associates.

"Whether you're a Republican or a Democrat or an independent, one thing about her is she is absolutely a very, very nice person," said Bathgate, who has raised money for President Bush, Bush's father, Kean's father, and President Ronald Reagan. "And she is a good wife and a good mother. She's not trying to run the country."

Kean may not be able to duck the president for long. He trails his Democratic opponent, U.S. Sen. Robert Menendez, in the money race, and the president is a prodigious fund-raiser.

Kean campaign spokeswoman Jill Hazelbaker said, "There have been no discussions about having fund-raisers with the president."

According to Aaron McLear, regional press secretary for the Republican National Committee, the president has raised $125 million at 37 events for candidates in this election cycle. Cheney has hauled in $22 million from 66 events. Laura Bush has brought in $8.2 million at 17 events.

DOJ_NMG_0033271

Murray, who has worked for Kean's father - a former governor - and former Gov. Christie Whitman, said that if the opposition wanted to link Kean with the Bush administration, it would just go ahead and do it.

"Politicians are very image-conscious," Murray said, reflecting on the distance Kean and Santorum have tried to keep between themselves and the administration. "They believe in guilt or credit by association."

Menendez was appointed to the Senate seat vacated by Gov. Corzine.

He and Kean have launched a vigorous battle and have agreed to two televised debates before the end of the month. So far, Menendez has raised more than $7.1 million to Kean's $2.6 million.

In Pennsylvania, Santorum and Casey have attacked each other for months. So far, Santorum has raised about $16 million to Casey's $8 million.

Traffic Alert

Laura Bush is scheduled to appear at a fund-raising breakfast today for U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum (R., Pa.) at the Appleford Estate in Villanova and at an afternoon reception for New Jersey U.S. Senate candidate Thomas H. Kean Jr. at a law office in Lakewood, N.J.

Expect major roads in those areas to be shut down for her motorcade. Check traffic reports before heading out on the road.

More Adults Are Finding Time To Volunteer (WT)

By Stefanie Hausner

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

Volunteerism is on the rise as 5.6 million more Americans donated their time last year than in 2002, a recent study found, with women besting men in every state.

A federal study on state volunteerism, released yesterday by the Corporation for National and Community Service (CNCS), found that 65.4 million (28.8 percent) of American adults volunteered last year. In every region and state, women volunteered at a higher rate than men and married people were more likely to donate time and resources than single people.

The study also showed that more Americans 35 to 44 years old volunteered than any other age group.

The CNCS hopes states will use the report to do a "strong self-assessment" to determine the effectiveness of their volunteer outreach. Although the CNCS is a federal agency, Chief Executive Officer David Eisner said they "long ago realized that the most important work toward building momentum around service actually happens at the state and local levels."

State patterns varied, with Utah leading the nation with the highest volunteer rate and intensity in every age group. The Midwest held the highest regional volunteer rate at 33.3 percent. However, the largest growth in volunteering comes from the South (2.4 million) and the West (2 million).

Last year, Americans contributed 8.2 billion hours of volunteer work, totaling nearly $150 billion in service. The greatest percentage of volunteers worked primarily through religious organizations. Top volunteer activities include coaching, teaching or mentoring (35 percent); fundraising (29.7 percent); and collecting, preparing and distributing food (26.3 percent).

The study also found that "youth who regularly attend religious services" are nearly twice as likely to be "regular volunteers" as those who did not attend any services. Young people from a family where at least one parent volunteers are almost twice as likely to volunteer as a youth with no family members who volunteer, and nearly three times as likely to regularly volunteer.

The District held the highest percentage of people volunteering in civic, political, professional or international organizations, the study showed.

Marcus Rosano, coordinator of communications and media relations for the National Capital Area Red Cross, said area volunteer rates tend to fluctuate. After events, such as September 11, and the recent tsunami and hurricanes, he said the Red Cross sees more of an "episodic volunteer turnover." Many people from Virginia, Maryland and the District called the Red Cross hoping to be deployed to the Gulf Coast, while others asked how they could help with office work.

The CNCS is not daunted by a fluctuation of volunteers. No one was surprised to see involvement rise after September 11.

Mr. Eisner said a "fair amount of the growth" resulted from recent disasters, but he is optimistic that the CNCS can add 10 million more volunteers by 2010.

Getting Punitive (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0033272

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

One of the great sources of disrespect for the law in our time has been outlandish punitive damages. So when the Supreme Court laid down a marker on excessive damages in the 2003 State Farm case, we suggested it might take more than one try before courts at the lower level got the message.

The high court has now agreed to hear an appeal in an Oregon case in which Philip Morris was dinged for punitive damages 97 times greater than the compensatory damages awarded in a smoker's death. Looks like the moment of revisitation has arrived. The Supreme Court had already sent the judgment back to the state courts once, but on remand the Oregon Supreme Court upheld the judgment. So the high court's decision to hear the case suggests that the Justices have decided someone isn't getting the State Farm message.

In that case Justice Anthony Kennedy, writing for the 6-3 majority, refused to establish a "bright line" rule for any ratio between compensatory and punitive damages, but he offered some hints. "Quadruple damages" were an instructive guidepost, the Justice wrote. He also implied that a punitive award very much higher than a single-digit ratio to the actual damages probably raised due-process concerns.

Still, a series of state-court decisions have tried to test the outer limits of State Farm, so it could be that the Philip Morris case is intended to clear all this up. Alas, only four members of the original majority remain. Besides, there are no clear ideological battle lines on this issue; in State Farm, Ruth Bader Ginsburg's dissent was joined by Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. It's hard to know how Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito might rule.

That said, Philip Morris v. Williams seems clearly to run afoul of the standards set down in State Farm. Jesse Williams smoked Marlboros for decades before dying of lung cancer in 1997. His wife, Mayola Williams, sued the tobacco company and won a judgment of about $821,000 in compensatory damages -- and $79.5 million in punitive damages. Six months after the State Farm decision, the Supreme Court vacated the Philip Morris judgment and remanded it to the Oregon Supreme Court for reconsideration in light of the earlier ruling. The state Supreme Court upheld the decision and its huge award, citing the length of Philip Morris's bad behavior and the "reprehensibility" of its conduct.

It appears that wasn't the answer the Supreme Court was looking for when it vacated the $79.5 million judgment in 2003. The reference to "reprehensibility" comes straight from State Farm and an earlier case, BMW v. Gore, in which a plaintiff had been awarded millions over a touched-up paint job on his new car. But this term has been widely misinterpreted. As described in both cases, "reprehensibility" is one of three factors to consider in weighing whether punitive damages are warranted at all. It's not a carte blanche for punitive-damage ratios in some ballpark between 500-to-1 or 97-to-1.

The Supreme Court acknowledged in State Farm that punitive damages may play a role to deter bad conduct. But it was also clear that they're not intended to cover damages to non-parties to these cases or to take account of the losing party's net worth. Justice Kennedy wrote in State Farm that the case was "neither difficult nor close." The same would seem to apply here; the question is whether the new cast of players at the High Court will see it the same way.

Nuclear Monitor Says Iran Fails To Provide Data (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

PARIS, June 12 — As Iran weighs how to respond to an international package of incentives intended to curb its nuclear activities, the chief of the International Atomic Energy Agency on Monday faulted Iran for failing to provide information crucial to understanding fully the nature and intent of its nuclear program.

In prepared remarks in Vienna opening the agency's 35-country board meeting, Mohamed ElBaradei, the director general, said his agency "has not made much progress in resolving outstanding verification issues." He added, "I would continue to urge Iran to provide the cooperation needed to resolve these issues."

Dr. ElBaradei's assessment was expected. Since February, Iran has substantially reduced access to dozens of atomic sites, programs and personnel, abiding only by the minimum cooperation required under arms-control accords.

DOJ_NMG_0033273

But the board meeting of the agency, the United Nations' nuclear monitoring group, comes at a delicate diplomatic moment as Iran is considering an offer by the United States, China, Russia and three European nations to freeze major nuclear activities in exchange for the promise of economic and political incentives.

Dr. ElBaradei kept his comments on Iran short and declined to take questions from reporters.

Still, he made it clear that he welcomed the initiative by the six nations, calling it a way "to reach a comprehensive agreement that would address the need of the international community to establish confidence in the exclusively peaceful nature of Iran's nuclear program, while also simultaneously addressing Iran's security, technology and economic needs."

The incentives package, the details of which have not been made public, offers Iran the chance, among other things, to buy light-water reactors for energy purposes and new civilian airplanes and spare parts for its aging fleet as well as to hold substantive talks with the United States.

Iran would be required to agree to freeze its uranium enrichment-related and reprocessing activities before formal talks on the substance of the package could begin, and the freeze would continue until Iran met a strict list of requirements. Because of opposition from the United States, the package does not include an offer to open an intergovernmental dialogue with Iran about security issues.

Dr. ElBaradei did not refer to the fact that Iran restarted enriching uranium in Natanz last Tuesday. On Monday, Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, said he expected an initial response from Iran at any time.

In Tehran on Monday, an Iranian government spokesman, Gholam Hossein Elham, suggested that the country was unwilling to bend to the will of the outside world and freeze its enrichment-related activities.

"Iran has achieved nuclear fuel technology," he told reporters. "And we will not negotiate our absolute right with anyone."

ElBaradei Sees U.S.-Iran Talks As Ending Stalemate (BLOOM)

By Jonathan Tirone

Bloomberg, June 13, 2006

June 12 (Bloomberg) -- United Nations nuclear chief Mohammed ElBaradei said a U.S. offer to join direct talks with Iran about security issues may provide an end to the stalemate over the Islamic Republic's atomic program.

A U.S.-backed European proposal given to Iran ``would address the need of the international community to establish confidence in the exclusively peaceful nature of Iran's nuclear program, while also simultaneously addressing Iran's security, technology and economic needs," ElBaradei, director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, said today in Vienna.

ElBaradei's comments came during opening remarks at a regular meeting of the 35-member IAEA board of governors. He outlined the results of the agency's latest inspections of Iran's nuclear facilities, which will be presented in a report to the board this week.

The Bush administration on May 31 said it would join its European allies in direct talks with Iran, ending a 27-year U.S. diplomatic embargo, if the Islamic Republic stopped making nuclear fuel and accepted the EU proposal. The U.S. agreed to enter negotiations after gaining assurances from Russia and China that they wouldn't block a U.S.-led effort for UN sanctions against Iran if the talks fail or never get started.

Iran is continuing with the nuclear program in defiance of international pressure and a non-binding UN resolution. The nation has yet to react to the European Union plan, which offers technological and economic incentives for Iran to end its atomic work. The U.S. accuses Iran of developing a bomb, in violation of the Non-Proliferation Treaty, while Iran maintains the program is aimed at generating electricity in compliance with the accord.

`Diplomatic Opportunity'

The U.S. and other board members want Iran to ``refrain from further uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities, including research and development, and to take advantage of the enormous diplomatic opportunity that lays in front," the U.S. ambassador to the IAEA, Gregory Schulte, said today at a briefing in Vienna.

EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana, who carried the offer to Tehran last week, said he expects an Iranian response ``very soon. I hope before the end of the week I will have contact with them."

DOJ_NMG_0033274

Speaking after a meeting of EU foreign ministers in Luxembourg today, Solana said ``there are a lot of things in it. It is not easy to digest in a short period of time."

ElBaradei also urged Iran to provide better cooperation and to address unanswered questions by IAEA inspectors about the nature and intent of the nuclear program.

Iran today reiterated that the nuclear program wasn't negotiable, Agence France-Presse reported from Tehran.

Iran will not ``compromise" or ``negotiate" its rights, Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Hamid Reza Asefi said yesterday. The country ``will act on the basis of its responsibilities, duties and rights," he said, adding that ``Iran has the initiative."

Saudi Backing

Saudi Arabian Foreign Minister Prince Saud al-Faisal told reporters in Tehran today that his country believes Iran has the right to the peaceful use of nuclear technology, Kuwait's state- run news agency reported.

The IAEA board sent the Iranian case to the UN Security Council on Feb. 4, after the Islamic Republic refused to heed calls for the suspension of the enrichment program.

Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, yesterday expressed optimism about the European-led proposal.

``What was given is a program with a positive tendency toward Iran and there is no mention of punishments," the state- run Iranian Students News Agency quoted Larijani as saying in Cairo yesterday. ``It is said that a deadline has been set for Iran, which is not correct."

The incentive plan was agreed on June 1 by diplomats from the five permanent members of the UN Security Council -- the U.S., China, Russia, the U.K. and France -- as well as by Germany. Each of the permanent members has a veto over the council's resolutions.

Japan Wary Of Plan For Sanctions Against Iran (WP)

By Anthony Faiola And Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

TOKYO, June 12 -- Despite months of pressure from Washington, Japan has become increasingly reluctant to join a Bush administration plan for sanctions against Iran if negotiations fail to resolve concerns over the country's nuclear program, Japanese and U.S. officials said Monday.

Japanese officials are suggesting that their country, which has more at stake in Iran financially than any other potential sanctions partner, may not join in punitive measures unless there is a broad international consensus along the lines of a U.N. Security Council resolution or other measure backed by nations now reluctant to impose sanctions, such as China. The White House had hoped instead to bring Japan into a "coalition of the willing" that avoided dealing with "recalcitrants" such as Russia and China.

The administration's fallback plan if talks with Iran fail -- tough financial measures imposed by a small group of like-minded countries -- depends strongly on Japanese participation. Without it, administration officials have calculated, the impact would significantly decrease.

Japan consumes 22 percent of Iranian oil exports and is slated to begin development this year of the largest and most modern onshore petroleum fields built in Iran since the 1979 Islamic revolution. That has caused Japan to experience an uncomfortable tug of war between its allegiance to Washington and its financial and energy interests in Iran.

Analysts and Western diplomats have called the Bush administration's bid to sway Japan -- by far Iran's largest trading partner -- a key test of the likelihood that U.S. allies will ultimately agree to make painful sacrifices to force Tehran into compliance.

At a meeting of finance ministers of the Group of Eight major industrial powers in Russia last Friday, Treasury Secretary John W. Snow asked Japan to consider sanctions, including barring financial institutions from conducting transactions in Iran. Japan's finance minister, Sadakazu Tanigaki, replied that any such move would first need to be discussed "more broadly with Europe and others."

On Monday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso discussed the Iranian situation by telephone, agreeing to cooperate in resolving the standoff, the Japanese Foreign Ministry said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0033275

Initial sanctions under consideration against Iran would largely spare the global trade in Iranian crude oil. But the most severe sanctions -- including cutting Tehran off from access to the dollar, euro, British pound and yen -- would be a step "potentially imperiling European and Japanese trade, including the oil trade," according to a Treasury Department task force report on the measures' likely international impact.

Privately, Japanese officials have said they intend to set a high bar for any action. "We would not do anything without the full support of the international community," a senior Japanese government official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity. "For example, we would need a vote of the U.N. Security Council or a similar measure that would have to include China and Russia. Otherwise, Japan might end up moving out of Iran only to see someone else's oil companies rush in."

Japanese officials have said that while they have deep concerns about Iran's nuclear program, they worry that aggressive sanctions could create a foothold for China. Viewed by Japan as its prime competitor in the global energy market, China ranks just behind Japan in consumption of Iranian oil.

Iranian officials have already threatened to nullify a massive contract signed with Tokyo-based Inpex, an energy giant that is partly owned by the Japanese government, for development of the Azadegan petroleum fields along Iran's long and treacherous border with Iraq.

Inpex has so far postponed full-scale development work, citing a dispute over the number of land mines to be cleared from a drilling area that is estimated to contain reserves of about 26 billion barrels of oil. But sources familiar with the project have also described the delay as an effort by Japan to buy time -- to ensure that progress is made in the nuclear standoff before the Japanese company pumps hundreds of millions of dollars into the project.

The Iranians appear to be running out of patience. Last week, Iran's oil minister reiterated on national television a threat to cancel the contract. "If the Japanese do not develop Azadegan, we will not tolerate any more delay and will hand over the job to our own engineers," Kazem Vaziri Hamaneh said.

Since Inpex struck the Azadegan deal with Iran in 2004, Bush administration officials have sniped at it repeatedly. Japanese officials characterize this as a rare cold patch in otherwise very warm U.S.-Japan relations.

The Japanese call the project essential to securing increasingly rare dedicated energy sources for the world's second-largest economy. U.S. officials insist it would only make Japan more dependent on Iran. "I ask Japan not to be pressed into a dilemma on the nuclear proliferation issue by Iran, which is using oil resources as its shield," the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton, said in a March interview with Japan's Nihon Keizai newspaper.

Japanese pundits are increasingly citing "U.S. pressure" on Japan over Iran. Earlier this month, President Bush placed a call to Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, urging his friend to support a consensus that Iran must open its nuclear program to international security.

Japan is smarting about being largely left out of negotiations with Iran even while it is being asked to make the largest potential sacrifice. A new proposal -- including incentives for Iran to open its nuclear program that have somewhat brightened the prospects for a negotiated settlement -- was presented to Tehran this month by a club of nations comprising the United States, Britain, France, Germany, Russia and China.

As a country whose armed forces are restricted by a postwar pacifist constitution and which is protected by the American nuclear umbrella, Japan often finds that its interests naturally coincide with Washington's. But there is a growing sentiment in Japan that, particularly in the Iranian situation, Tokyo and Washington have divergent interests and that Japan's support for U.S. policy is being taken for granted.

"I think we should stand with the international community once a consensus is made on the Iran nuclear issue," said Hideki Wakabayashi, a member of Japan's upper house who was part of a delegation to Iran last month from the opposition Democratic Party of Japan. "But it's not a good idea for the Bush administration to pressure Japan before negotiations fail."

China Opposed To Joint Statement On Iran (AP)

By George Jahn

AP, June 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033276

China and Russia are holding back from a united message with Western powers to insist that Tehran halt uranium enrichment, a stance that could encourage Iranian defiance, diplomats said Monday.

Speaking outside a meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency's 35-nation board, the diplomats told The Associated Press that China was opposed to signing a joint statement and Russia was leaning against participating.

Their reluctance reflected the East-West divide among the six world powers that just two weeks ago appeared to be in agreement about how to engage Iran over enrichment and to persuade it to give up technology that could be used to make nuclear arms. Iran says its program has the sole purpose of generating electricity.

"China is not OK and Russia might follow" Beijing's lead in opposing the joint statement, said a diplomat accredited to the meeting, who like other diplomats agreed to discuss the issue only if not quoted by name because the information was confidential.

Another diplomat said China appeared to be feeling pressure from the Nonaligned Movement, which last month emphatically backed Iran in its nuclear standoff with the West.

Russia's stance was less clear. But Moscow for months has hindered attempts by the United States and its European allies to turn up the heat on Iran in the U.N. Security Council.

Resistance by Russia and China to tough U.N. action contributed to Washington's decision last month to reverse decades of policy and agree to join in multinational talks with Iran — if Tehran accepts a package of rewards, freezes enrichment during the talks and places a long-term moratorium on such activity.

British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett announced at the end of high-level talks in Vienna on June 2 that all five permanent Security Council members plus Germany supported the joint approach on engaging Iran.

But the signs of discord Monday reflected continuing differences despite the public show of unity.

One diplomat said Britain, France and Germany — the three European nations participating in the six-nation Iran package — were modifying a draft statement on Iran hoping to secure Moscow's and Beijing's backing on a final version.

Other diplomats spoke of more potential divisions. China, Russia and possibly Germany might push to allow Iran some tightly controlled small-scale enrichment rather than see talks founder. Russia and China also might balk at enforcing selective U.N. sanctions on Iranian officials and activities.

But long-term, verifiable suspension of Iranian enrichment is a "red line" for the United States and its key Western allies, one diplomat said.

While the IAEA meeting is not expected to formally focus on the Iranian nuclear standoff until Wednesday at the earliest, the issue dominated the gathering on its first day Monday.

IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei told the meeting his agency had not made much progress in resolving verification issues with Iran, alluding to suspicions that some of Tehran's nuclear activities could be used for the development of an atomic weapons program.

He described the rewards offered to entice the Tehran regime into negotiations as addressing "the need of the international community to establish confidence in the exclusively peaceful nature of Iran's nuclear program."

Chief U.S. delegate Gregory L. Schulte called on Iran to respond positively to the offer for talks — and suspend enrichment, which can be used both to produce fuel for nuclear reactors that generate power and to create the core of atomic warheads.

"The next decision needs to be taken not in Vienna but in Tehran," Schulte told reporters.

In Luxembourg, the European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, said he expected an Iranian response to the six-power offer this week.

But Iran suggested it was digging in its heels on enrichment. When asked if Iran would suspend enrichment for the sake of negotiations, spokesman Gholam Hossein Elham repeated the government line that enrichment is Iran's "obvious right."

U.S. Approach To Iran Has A Familiar Ring (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033277

WASHINGTON -- As President Bush contemplates the possibility of nonproliferation talks with Iran, he runs some of the same risks he said the Clinton administration took when dealing with North Korea.

Mr. Bush and his top aides were critical five years ago of the Clinton team's negotiating tactics with the regime in Pyongyang, charging that despotic states made unstable, untrustworthy negotiating partners. The White House's fears about Pyongyang remain, as American officials say they see signs North Korea may be preparing to test a long-range missile.

Now the Bush team has opened the door to the possibility of holding similar talks with Iran -- not direct talks, but as part of an international dialogue already started by America's European allies. Indeed, these talks could ultimately lead to an agreement like the one the Clinton team reached with North Korea.

The reasons for such a profound shift in the Bush foreign-policy agenda say much about the struggles the administration faced during its first term trying to contain both Pyongyang and Tehran, say current and former American diplomats.

Many counterproliferation experts support this evolving U.S. approach, saying it is a more realistic and potentially sustainable than avoiding direct talks. They also see the White House's diplomatic U-turn as an unstated recognition of the limits of unilateral American power.

"They were in the bunker at the White House, thinking, eventually, these countries would have to succumb to our power," says George Perkovich, a counterproliferation expert at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, a Washington think tank. "But it turns out we can't do everything out there alone."

In recent weeks, American officials say, U.S. spy satellites have picked up images from North Korea indicating Pyongyang is preparing to test launch its long-range missile, the Taepo Dong-2, which American intelligence believes has the potential to hit U.S. territory. A launch would be seen as a move by North Korean leader Kim Jong Il to wrest more economic incentives from Washington in return for Pyongyang dismantling its weapons systems.

Before al Qaeda's Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the U.S., North Korea's nuclear program was among the Bush administration's top foreign-policy issues. President Clinton had forged a deal with Pyongyang in his first term, whereby North Korea agreed to give up its capacity for producing nuclear fuel in exchange for what were described as proliferation-proof light-water nuclear reactors. The Agreed Framework, as it was called, also pledged economic incentives for Pyongyang and a gradual normalization of relations between the U.S. and North Korea.

The Bush administration, from its earliest days, challenged the terms of the 1994 Clinton agreement. In 2001, the White House tried to broaden the deal, citing the need to discuss human rights and North Korea's conventional military forces if relations were to be normalized between Washington and Pyongyang. They also questioned the amount of monitoring the international community was able to pursue inside North Korea through the United Nations' International Atomic Energy Agency.

Ultimately, the entire Agreed Framework would collapse in 2002 after North Korean diplomats admitted to an American delegation that it had been cheating by seeking to develop a separate nuclear-fuel source. The collapse of the deal has ushered in nearly four years of new talks among the U.S., North Korea and four other regional powers, in a bid to come to a more comprehensive agreement.

No new agreement has been made with Pyongyang's leadership. Repeated attempts by the U.S. to bring Pyongyang back to the negotiating table have so far failed. A North Korean missile launch could significantly increase tensions.

Counterproliferation experts say the White House could ultimately agree to engage in a similar multiparty structure for its talks with Iran, though the members would be different.

Many former and current Bush administration officials also say any talks with Iran could very well end up producing a deal mirroring the original Agreed Framework. Last week, Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign-policy chief, presented to Tehran a list of incentives that the U.S. and the U.N. Security Council would support if Iran agreed to freeze its nuclear program. Among the perks are light-water nuclear reactors and fuel guarantees as well as a list of economic incentives that includes lifting the ban on the sale of airplane parts to Tehran and assistance in Iran's bid to join the World Trade Organization.

The U.S. didn't offer to normalize relations with Iran. But the White House did vow to work to establish a security framework for the Middle East, which could assuage some of Iran's concerns about the U.S. military presence in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0033278

Iran's leadership says it is studying the package offered by the U.S. and its partners but gave no specific time frame for responding. Iran's lead negotiator on the nuclear issue, Ali Larijani, said last week that Tehran was eager to negotiate but that Iran maintains its right to develop uranium-enrichment technologies.

"This is all a Middle East equivalent of an Agreed Framework, essentially offering economic incentives in return for certain behavior on the nuclear program," says Richard Haass, who headed the State Department's policy-planning staff during the first Bush administration. "It's structurally very similar" to what was offered to North Korea.

American diplomats involved in the Iran issue say there are many reasons why talks with Tehran could prove more productive then those that have stalled with North Korea. For one, they say Iran fears it could be isolated economically if it doesn't come to an agreement with the U.S. and its dialogue partners. While Pyongyang, they say, seems to covet its international pariah status, Iran seems to want to integrate economically to placate a growing, and young, population.

And they stress that any formal agreements made by the international community with Tehran would likely be much easier to verify.

Still, there are many in the counterproliferation community who fear Tehran is essentially preparing to mirror North Korea's efforts to wait out the international community. They say even if Tehran fails to comply with Western demands to freeze its uranium-enrichment programs, there are indications China and Russia still wouldn't agree to coercive measures.

"The Iranians could hardly think the situation North Korea finds itself in is bad," says Henry Sokolski of the Nonproliferation Education Policy Center in Washington. "They haven't been punished at all," and they continue to fail to comply.

Welcome To The Bazaar (NYT)

By Warren Christopher

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

Los Angeles

THE welcome recent announcement that the United States is willing to join face-to-face talks with Iran rekindled memories of my own experiences, 25 years ago, as chief negotiator in the Iranian hostage crisis. The subject of that negotiation was the 52 American diplomats who were taken hostage in Tehran on Nov. 4, 1979. The result was their release, 444 days later, on the day of Ronald Reagan's inauguration in 1981. Since that day we have had no diplomatic relations and virtually no direct dialogue with Iran.

There are obvious differences between the situation in 1979-81 and now. Then it was the United States that wanted face-to-face negotiations. Today it is Iran that wants direct talks — talks that will help make up for what its leaders view as decades of humiliation and abuse by America. While the negotiations 25 years ago involved the future and well-being of 52 individuals, the 2006 negotiations, if they occur, will deal with a problem that potentially threatens the lives of millions.

Nevertheless, there are lessons from our 1979-81 negotiations with Iran that can inform our efforts in 2006. First, we must be sure we are talking with the right people. One of the most frustrating dead ends we encountered in the hostage negotiations was learning that despite prolonged efforts to forge a settlement with President Abolhassan Bani-Sadr, he did not even have the power to move the hostages from one location to another, much less cause their release. If our 2006 negotiators study the vectors of power in Iran, they may be able to avoid such frustrations.

At the moment, Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, is riding high. But he may not be as powerful as he seems and, in any event, power may shift over time. Ultimate authority remains with Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, and we have not heard from Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, former two-term president and now chairman of the Expediency Council. In short, we should look for seams, even small ones, in the cloak of power.

Second, our negotiators should prepare themselves for what might be called "bazaar behavior." For all my difficult dealings with interlocutors like China's foreign minister, Qian Qichen, I always knew what he really wanted and that if an agreement was reached, its terms would be carried out. But with the Iranians, the negotiating style is likely to resemble that of a Middle Eastern marketplace, with outlandish demands, feints at abandoning the process and haggling over minor details up to the very last moment.

DOJ_NMG_0033279

Even after the agreement was signed on Jan. 19, 1981, the Iranians disavowed a vital technical annex. To bring them back in line, I directed the pilot of my plane, on a telephone line that I knew was tapped, to warm up the engines. The Iranians quickly dropped their claim, and a day later the hostages were released.

If the Iranians ultimately come to the table, our negotiators will need to be patient, almost superhumanly so. The subtext for everything the Iranians do and say will be their historic sense of grievance against the United States, stretching back at least to the C.I.A.-engineered overthrow of the government and restoration of the shah to his throne in 1953.

The hostage crisis probably dragged on because the Iranians wanted to maximize their exposure on the world stage and to humiliate the Great Satan (and its president) for as long as possible. One long and bewildering delay occurred when the Iranians refused to sign any direct agreement with the United States. We finally suggested that the agreement take the form of mutually dependent promises to Algeria, and that was acceptable for reasons that still remain obscure.

Third, if the new package of incentives offered by Britain, China, France, Germany, Russia and the United States does not persuade the Iranians to suspend their enrichment program, which was Washington's condition for joining the talks, I believe sanctions can play a valuable role. The hostage crisis shows that we must assemble the broadest possible spectrum of participants, including the Russians, in any sanctions regime. Although enforcement of the sanctions we achieved through the United Nations began to fray toward the end of the 444-day ordeal, they plainly had an impact on the Iranian population. When the Iranian leadership had to assess the potential benefits of keeping the hostages against the costs of doing so, sanctions must have weighed heavily in the balance.

As in the hostage crisis, a military solution is unwise and probably infeasible. Though possible use of our military should not be taken off the table, we must stay on the diplomatic and, if necessary, the punitive economic track. Our negotiators must be firm and resolute not just with their counterparts, but with those in the press, the administration and the public who will inevitably pressure them to declare prematurely that the talking is over.

Shortly before Christmas in 1980, in the gloom of a defeated administration, we received a message from the Iranians tripling their monetary demand to $24 billion for the release of our hostages. I was tempted to pull the plug and leave the matter for resolution by the incoming Reagan administration, but I concluded we had come too far to give up. Ultimately, those demands were dropped and the negotiations concluded on terms similar to what we had previously offered. When those who represent America in any coming negotiations face similar moments — and they inevitably will — I hope they will recognize that persevering is indispensable to our national interest.

Warren Christopher, secretary of state from 1993 to 1997, is the co-chairman of the Pacific Council on International Policy.

Violence Erupts Between Fatah And Hamas (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

JERUSALEM, June 12 — Hundreds of Palestinian security personnel loyal to the Palestinian leader, Mahmoud Abbas, went on a rampage Monday night in the West Bank town of Ramallah, attacking the parliament and cabinet buildings controlled by his rivals in the Hamas-led government.

The attack by forces from the Fatah faction loyal to Mr. Abbas, who fired bullets at the buildings and set them on fire, came after Hamas gunmen attacked the Gaza headquarters of the Fatah-dominated security forces with rockets and grenades.

The Ramallah buildings were not occupied at the time, but the fire gutted a floor of one of the two cabinet buildings after the security forces, joined by gunmen from Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, part of the Fatah movement, shot out the windows of the parliament building and tried to prevent firefighters from entering the area.

In the growing violence between the major Palestinian factions, at least 2 people were killed and 15 wounded in the fighting in Gaza. In Ramallah, a member of the security forces told The Associated Press, "Every time they touch one of ours in Gaza, we will get 10 of theirs in the West Bank."

Mr. Abbas declared a state of emergency and ordered people off the streets on a chaotic and violent day. The Palestinian leader, who advocates negotiation with Israel, is facing increasing political isolation, especially in the wake of Friday's killing of seven members of a Palestinian family on a Gaza beach, apparently by an errant Israeli shell. The deaths have strengthened Hamas, which refuses to recognize Israel's legitimacy.

DOJ_NMG_0033280

The Hamas majority in parliament decided Monday to allow dialogue between the factions to continue on a unified political platform, hoping to make a referendum called by Mr. Abbas for July 26 unnecessary.

Hamas had called the emergency session of the legislature to challenge the referendum on a document drafted by Palestinian prisoners calling for a Palestinian state within pre-1967 borders, implicitly recognizing Israel.

Hamas opposes the referendum as illegal and vows to block it. The main Hamas negotiator on the document, Abdel Khaleq Natche — the highest-ranking Hamas prisoner held by Israel — said Sunday that he had withdrawn his support. He accused Mr. Abbas of "unacceptable abuse" of the document and exploiting it for political gain, saying that it was intended to promote unity.

Hamas has refused demands from Mr. Abbas and other nations to recognize the right of Israel to exist and to accept previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements that are explicit in their support of a two-state solution. Hamas sees the referendum as an effort by Mr. Abbas to undermine its authority.

But Hamas legislators pulled back a little on Monday, criticizing Mr. Abbas for exceeding his legal powers but voting for a continuation of talks between the factions. "We are going to continue our efforts over the coming days and are hopeful of resolving the whole crisis," said the speaker, Aziz Dweik of Hamas.

Hamas said it would wait until June 20 before bringing the referendum back before the legislature. "If we succeed through dialogue in stopping the referendum then it will be better, but if we hit a dead end, parliament will assume its responsibilities and hold the vote," said a Hamas legislator and spokesman, Mushir al-Masri.

It is unclear whether Mr. Abbas has the authority to call a referendum or what a vote in parliament against holding it would mean.

In Damascus, Syria, Moussa Abu Marzouk, deputy chief of Hamas's political bureau in Syria, told The Associated Press that Hamas would do its best to stop the vote. "Even if it is carried out, Hamas would not recognize it or accept its outcome, whatever it might be," he said.

In Gaza, Hamas gunmen fired rocket-propelled grenades and antitank rockets at the Rafah headquarters of the Preventive Security force loyal to Mr. Abbas and Fatah. Two people were killed, including a deaf passer-by, Suleiman Zanoun, 34, and at least 15 people were wounded in the fighting, which involved at least 100 armed men.

Earlier in the day, a Hamas paramilitary fighter was killed when fighting erupted after a funeral for another Hamas militant who died overnight from wounds suffered 10 days ago in a previous intra-Palestinian clash.

Hamas accused the Preventive Security force of being behind Monday's shooting, and a Palestinian security officer was shot and critically wounded later on his way home from work in Rafah. At least 20 people, mostly gunmen, have been killed in clashes between the factions in Gaza in the past two months.

As the barrage of Qassam rockets from Gaza into Israel slowed Monday, Israeli officials warned Hamas leaders that they would have no immunity from assassination if they were responsible for the deaths of Israeli civilians. A senior member of the ruling Kadima Party, Tzachi Hanegbi, said the Hamas prime minister, Ismail Haniya, could be assassinated if the group began further suicide bombings in Israel.

Referring to previous Hamas leaders assassinated by Israel, Mr. Hanegbi said, "Yassin and Rantissi are waiting for you, Haniya, if you implement the same stance of liquidating Jews, indiscriminate firing and suicide terror attacks aimed at paralyzing Israeli society anew."

Mr. Haniya said the threat was an example "of a type of political madness from some Israeli leaders."

Israeli newspapers suggested that the defense minister, Amir Peretz, leader of the Labor Party, had rejected army plans for intensified airstrikes against rocket-launching teams and sites, including some Hamas workshops where the crude Qassam rockets are assembled. Mr. Peretz, according to the news media, told the generals to keep planning.

At the same time, an Israeli investigation continued into the deaths of eight Palestinian civilians on a northern Gaza beach on Friday, with Israeli officials continuing to suggest that the explosion may not have been caused by an Israeli artillery shell, but by an errant Qassam rocket or explosives hidden in the sand.

DOJ_NMG_0033281

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert was in London meeting with his British counterpart, Tony Blair, who said Israel was right to have no contacts with Hamas until it renounces violence. Mr. Olmert repeated his promise to try to negotiate first with Mr. Abbas.

Asked about the comments by Mr. Hanegbi, the Kadima Party member, Mr. Olmert, said, "Whoever is implicated in terrorism cannot claim to have immunity," and added: "I do not think it would be wise of me to be more specific."

Hamas Gunmen Rampage Through Ramallah (FT)

By Harvey Morris, Ben Hall

Financial Times, June 13, 2006

Gunmen loyal to Fatah rampaged through the West Bank city of Ramallah on Monday night, shooting up parliament and torching the prime minister's office in a worsening power struggle with the ruling Hamas movement.

The attacks were launched after Hamas militants besieged the southern Gaza headquarters of the Palestinian preventive security force, which is Fatah-controlled, and fired rocket-propelled grenades. Five people were wounded in the assault.

The events in Ramallah began shortly after Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority's Fatah president, ordered security forces on to the streets to maintain law and order in the light of the Gaza violence. The prime minister's office and parliament building are both symbols of Hamas power following the Islamists' victory in elections in January.

Ismail Haniya, the Hamas prime minister, is banned by Israel from leaving the Gaza Strip. Hamas on Monday deferred a parliamentary motion to outlaw a national referendum called by Mr Abbas for July 26 that would ask the electorate to vote on proposals that implicitly recognise Israel.

Hamas, which does not recognise Israel, has declared the referendum illegal. The gunmen involved in the Ramallah attacks included security men and elements of the Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, a Fatah military wing. Police on Monday night entered the prime minister's office to evict them.

The Hamas government, locked in a power struggle with the president and his party, has set up a 3,000-strong security force that answers to it directly but which is deployed only in the Gaza Strip.

The deterioration in the Palestinian territories came as Ehud Olmert, the Israeli prime minister, held talks in London to try to gain international support for his plans to redefine Israel's borders, with or without Palestinian consent. Tony Blair, Britain's prime minister, urged both sides to pursue a negotiated settlement of their conflict, but did not endorse a unilateral Israeli solution in the event of a stalemate. Speaking in Downing Street after talks with Mr Olmert, Mr Blair promised to give "every support and every impetus we can from the international community" to ensure that talks could begin.

Mr Olmert is on the first leg of a European tour to win support for his proposals to withdraw from large parts of the West Bank and define Israel's borders unilaterally if talks with Mr Abbas fail to produce a deal. Mr Blair said the Palestinians had to recognise Israel's right to exist and renounce violence. Both sides had to adhere to the international community's "road map" for talks, he said.

Israel also needed to address the "main issue" of how to create a viable Palestinian state. Only a negotiated settlement was likely to last, Mr Blair said. But he acknowledged that there had to be progress towards some form of resolution to prevent a slipping back into "chaos", and hinted that could lead to a unilateral redrawing of the borders. "This thing either moves forward by way of agreement or other ways of moving it forward have to be found," he said.

Palestinian Security Men Go On Rampage (AP)

By Mohammed Daraghmeh

AP, June 12, 2006

Hundreds of Palestinian security men loyal to President Mahmoud Abbas went on a rampage against the Hamas-led government Monday, riddling the parliament building and Cabinet offices with bullets before setting them ablaze in retaliation for an attack by Hamas gunmen in the Gaza Strip.

The violence was the most serious in the West Bank since Hamas defeated Abbas' Fatah movement in legislative elections in January and raised new fears the Palestinians could be headed toward civil war. It also cast doubt on renewed calls for Palestinian unity by the rival factions.

DOJ_NMG_0033282

Abbas, a moderate who was elected separately last year, has been locked in a bitter power struggle with Hamas. The dispute has focused largely on control of the powerful security forces.

In Monday's unrest, hundreds of members of the Preventive Security force shot out the windows of the parliament building before storming the two-building Cabinet complex, where they smashed furniture, destroyed computers and tore up documents. No casualties were reported.

Shooting wildly in the air, the mob then set fire to one of the Cabinet buildings, gutting the fourth floor. When a fire engine approached the scene, one gunman lay on the road, preventing it from reaching the building.

"Every time they touch one of ours in Gaza, we will get 10 of theirs in the West Bank," said one member of the Preventive Security force. Dozens of gunmen from the Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, a pro-Fatah militia, joined the mob.

The crowd also set fire to the parliament building and a Hamas office. Both blazes were quickly contained. Abbas' presidential guard later arrived to guard the burnt-out parliament and Cabinet buildings.

Late Monday, Fatah gunmen briefly abducted a Hamas lawmaker, Khalil Rabei, after attacking his office and setting it on fire. Rabei said he was kicked and threatened before he was released.

Abbas' personal guard granted refuge to Rabei and nine other Hamas lawmakers, and was ordered to escort the men home safely.

The rampage in Ramallah followed an earlier attack by Hamas gunmen on a Preventive Security installation in Gaza. The attack set off daylong clashes that left two people dead and 14 wounded.

Most of the Palestinian infighting in recent weeks has occurred in Gaza, Hamas' stronghold. Monday's incident signaled that Fatah is now ready to move the conflict to its West Bank power center.

Abbas was in Gaza at the time of the rampage, where he has been holding negotiations with Hamas in hopes of ending the political deadlock.

"The president strongly condemns the attacks and the assault against the public institutions and the building that took place in the West Bank tonight," said a statement issued by Abbas' office.

"Whatever is going on must be stopped," said Nabil Abu Rdeneh, a close aide to Abbas. "Everybody must obey the law."

Officials said Abbas had appointed a retired commander to serve as a military adviser and liaison to the Hamas-run Interior Ministry. The appointment of Lt. Gen. Abdel Razek Majaide could help ease tensions. Majaide is respected by Fatah and Hamas alike.

Internal tensions have heightened since Abbas scheduled a July 26 referendum on a plan that calls for recognition of Israel. Abbas has endorsed the plan as a way out of the stalemate. But Hamas objects to the vote.

In a conciliatory gesture, the Hamas-dominated Palestinian parliament pulled back from a plan to block the referendum, delaying a vote on the issue until June 20 to allow negotiations to continue. But the violence cast serious doubts on the efforts to bridge the gaps.

Early Tuesday, several thousand Hamas supporters demonstrated outside the Palestinian parliament building in Gaza. They condemned the violence in Ramallah, rejected the referendum and threatened retaliation against the Preventive Security forces.

"What happened today in Ramallah is very shameful and I think the president did not use all his efforts to prevent it," said Hamas spokesman Sami Abu Zuhri.

Seeking a way out of the infighting, Abbas last weekend scheduled the referendum on a plan calling for a Palestinian state alongside Israel, implicitly recognizing the Jewish state.

Abbas believes a unified political platform by Palestinian factions would help end crushing international sanctions against the Hamas-led government and allow him to restart peace talks with Israel.

Hamas, which is sworn to Israel's destruction, opposes the referendum vote. But it has entered a "dialogue" with Abbas over the plan. The sides were meeting late Monday when violence erupted in the West Bank.

"We want to get to a situation of calm and prevent the shedding of Palestinian blood," said Hamas lawmaker Khalil al-Haye.

Abbas is pushing forward with the referendum despite calls for a delay following an explosion on a Gaza beach Friday that killed eight civilians.

DOJ_NMG_0033283

Palestinians said an Israeli artillery shell caused the explosion, which has inflamed passions against Israel. Israel is conducting an investigation and has suggested its army wasn't responsible.

Israel-Palestinian violence has escalated since the beach explosion, with Hamas officially calling off a 16-month truce.

Hamas militants have fired several dozen rockets at southern Israel, including one that landed in the southern town of Sderot on Monday, slightly wounding a woman in the shoulder. A total of three people have been wounded in the recent rocket attacks, including one man in serious condition.

The end of the truce has raised concerns that Hamas could resume the suicide attacks. But with Hamas now the governing power, it might pressure its military wing to avoid deadly confrontation with Israel for fear of deepening its international isolation.

Fatah Gunmen Go On Rampage In West Bank (CHIT)

By Joel Greenberg

Chicago Tribune, June 13, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Palestinian gunmen from the Fatah movement of President Mahmoud Abbas went on a rampage against the Hamas-led government in the West Bank city of Ramallah on Monday night, shooting at the Cabinet and parliament buildings and setting them on fire.

The attack by scores of armed men, many from the Fatah-dominated Preventive Security force, followed a deadly clash between Hamas gunmen and security officers in the Gaza Strip and signaled a spread of factional violence to the West Bank.

The rampage was the worst outbreak of internal unrest in the West Bank since Hamas defeated Fatah in legislative elections in January and raised new fears of possible civil war. It showed that Fatah was ready to take its confrontation with Hamas to its West Bank power center.

The unrest has been fueled by a power struggle between Abbas and the Hamas-led government that has focused on control of the security forces and Abbas's call for a referendum on a statehood plan that implicitly recognizes Israel. Hamas, whose charter calls for Israel's destruction, has rejected the referendum.

In Monday's shooting spree, the Fatah gunmen targeted the symbols of Hamas rule.

At the Cabinet complex, gunmen destroyed computers and smashed furniture, hurled office equipment out of windows and tore up documents. The fourth floor was set on fire, and a fire truck was blocked from approaching by a gunman who lay on the road.

Gunmen also stormed the parliament building, shooting out the windows and bursting inside, where they set fire to offices. The blazes in both buildings were quickly contained.

A Hamas lawmaker, Khalil al-Rabai, was briefly abducted outside another building, but was later released to Abbas's presidential guard, which rushed reinforcements to the area.

Several Hamas lawmakers were evacuated to safety in the presidential compound.

The Fatah gunmen included members of the group's armed wing, Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, who joined the officers of Preventive Security, which has spearheaded recent clashes with Hamas in Gaza.

Violence was also reported in Nablus, where gunmen fired at parliament offices, and in Jenin, where Fatah gunmen took to the streets, firing in the air.

The unrest was triggered by clashes earlier in the day in the Gaza Strip town of Rafah, where Hamas gunmen battled officers at Preventive Security headquarters, hurling grenades and firing anti-tank rockets, according to reports from the scene.

The firefight, which erupted during the funeral of a Hamas militant killed in an earlier clash, left two people dead—a Hamas gunman and a bystander—and more than a dozen wounded.

Mushir al-Masri, a Hamas lawmaker, said the rampage in Ramallah was carried out by "gangs" who want to "make the government fail."

Ahmad Abdel Rahman, an adviser to Abbas, said the source of the problem was a new Hamas-led security force put on the streets of Gaza in defiance of a presidential veto. The force has been involved in repeated clashes with Preventive Security members in recent weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0033284

"This match must be removed from the streets," Abdel Rahman told the Arabic satellite channel Al-Jazeera.

Abbas was in Gaza on Monday, where he has been meeting with Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas in an effort to end the political stalemate, so far without success.

In an emergency parliament session Monday, Hamas lawmakers challenged the legality of Abbas's referendum decree but put off a vote on the issue, saying they want to give more time for negotiations.

After the events in Ramallah, Abbas issued a presidential order banning displays of weapons on the streets, Abdel Rahman said. However similar orders in the past have been ignored.

"The president strongly condemns the attacks and the assault against the public institutions and the building that took place in the West Bank tonight," said a statement from Abbas's office.

Early Tuesday, a few thousand Hamas supporters demonstrated outside the Palestinian parliament building in Gaza, condemning the violence in Ramallah.

"What happened today in Ramallah is very shameful, and I think the president did not make every effort to prevent it," said Sami Abu Zuhri, the Hamas spokesman.

Fatah Officers Attack Hamas Sites In West Bank (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

JERUSALEM, June 12 -- Several hundred members of the Fatah-dominated Palestinian security services shot up or set fire to two official buildings associated with the rival Hamas movement in the West Bank city of Ramallah on Monday, hours after partisan clashes killed two people and wounded 15 others in the Gaza Strip.

The assaults on the buildings were among the biggest shows of force in weeks of clashes between rival Palestinian factions in the occupied territories.

Members of security services loyal to Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas savaged the Palestinian parliament building and the cabinet headquarters, the homes of institutions run by Hamas. The radical Islamic movement won January parliamentary elections, ending Fatah's long monopoly on Palestinian political power.

After shooting out the windows of parliament, the officers entered the cabinet headquarters, where they smashed furniture and computers before setting the building on fire. Witnesses said the armed men, including some members of Fatah's military wing, known as the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, prevented firefighters from putting out the blaze.

Late Monday, Fatah gunmen abducted a Hamas lawmaker, Khalil Rabei, after setting fire to his office in Ramallah. He was released soon after to Abbas's bodyguards and took refuge along with seven other Hamas legislators in the Muqata government compound. Abbas, who is the Palestinian Authority president, ordered his bodyguards to protect the group.

Palestinian security services, with more than 70,000 members, are dominated by Fatah loyalists. Because of economic sanctions that Israel and foreign donors have imposed against the Hamas-led government, most of the men have not received any pay in three months.

Hamas officials, meanwhile, have deployed a 3,000-member security force on the streets of Gaza that is filled out mostly by members of its armed wing.

The divide within the security forces, widening at a time of increasing political rivalry between Abbas and the Hamas leadership, has led to deadly clashes in recent weeks. Most of those have occurred in Gaza. Monday's rampage showed that the partisan violence can spread to the West Bank as well.

"Every time they touch one of ours in Gaza, we will get 10 of theirs in the West Bank," a member of the Fatah-dominated Preventive Security Service told the Associated Press.

Earlier in the day in Gaza, Hamas and Fatah gunmen battled in the streets of Rafah, leaving one Hamas gunman and one civilian dead. Fifteen others were wounded; their partisan allegiances were unclear.

There were differing accounts as to how this fighting began. Some witnesses said Fatah gunmen fired on a Hamas funeral procession, while others said Hamas gunmen attacked the Preventive Security headquarters along the procession's route with rifles and rocket-propelled grenades.

DOJ_NMG_0033285

The clashes came as the Palestinian parliament, which Hamas controls, debated Abbas's plan to hold a referendum on the shape of a future Palestinian state.

The July 26 vote would ask Palestinians to vote yes or no on an 18-point document drafted by the leaders of Hamas, Fatah and other Palestinian factions in Israeli prisons. At the heart of the "prisoners' document," signed by major Palestinian leaders held in Israeli jails, is a proposal for a future Palestinian state in the West Bank, Gaza and East Jerusalem -- all territories that Israel occupied in the 1967 Middle East war.

Abbas favors such a state alongside Israel. But Hamas, which does not recognize the Jewish state's right to exist, has long called for a Palestinian state on land that now includes Israel. The prisoners, a very influential group in Palestinian politics, withdrew their support for the document after Abbas issued a presidential decree Saturday setting the date for a nonbinding vote on it.

The session Monday was called by Hamas legislators in the hopes of blocking the referendum, although whether the parliament has the legal standing to do so is unclear. After hours of sometimes angry debate, Hamas lawmakers decided to postpone a vote on the issue until next week, saying they wanted to give talks between Abbas and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas a chance to reach a compromise.

Violence Strains Informal Cease-Fire (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

TEL AVIV -- Israel and Hamas seemed on the brink of abandoning a 17-month calm on Wednesday as Islamic militants lobbed rockets at Israeli towns and Israeli generals reportedly recommended an invasion of Gaza to snuff out the salvos, but officials and analysts think both sides will honor the informal cease-fire.

Hamas and Fatah loyalists showed no such restraint yesterday. Two Palestinians died in internecine Gaza street battles, while gunmen linked to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah party ransacked and burned government buildings in Ramallah.

Meanwhile, the Hamas-majority parliament delayed a decision on a measure that would outlaw a referendum. Mr. Abbas backs the referendum, which seeks implicit recognition of a two-state solution.

Both Israel and the Palestinian Authority face growing domestic pressure to launch retaliatory attacks. Seven Palestinians from one family were killed on a Gaza beach by an errant explosive, and the southern Israeli city of Sderot has come under frequent attack by Qassam rockets. So far, political leaders have resisted the temptation.

Attacks on Israel would disrupt Hamas' effort to consolidate its power after taking over the government in March, said a member of the Hamas-run Cabinet. The government also has struggled with a suspension of international aid to the Palestinian Authority, which has left government employees without pay for at least three months.

"The military escalation is the last thing that the government needs," said Abdel Rahman Zaidan, the Palestinian minister of public works.

Israelis hope to avoid a risky military gambit that could undermine international support for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's "realignment" plan to uproot settlement in the West Bank.

"What can we do? Reinvade Gaza? We've been there already," said Labor parliament member Efraim Sneh.

Israeli Defense Minister Amir Peretz said he turned down a recommendation from Israeli generals for a large-scale offensive against the cells that launch the homemade rockets into Israel. His decision is aimed at allowing tempers to cool.

For the first time in months, Hamas' military wing took responsibility for the rocket salvos, prompting Israeli talk of assassination strikes on senior figures in the organization.

Critics of the government's policy said Israel should move against rocket foundries in Gaza and against weapons smugglers to weaken a militant group that has used the calm to restock.

But backers of the defense minister said the price -- Israeli military casualties, international criticism and a cancellation of the Palestinian referendum -- was too high. Even though Israel could justify the offensive, it is likely to strengthen Hamas' hand against Fatah.

DOJ_NMG_0033286

"You can have some short-term gains," said Yossi Alpher, the former head of Tel Aviv University's Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies, but in the long term, "there is no military solution. And it's not going to change anything."

Blair Urges Negotiated Mideast Solution (FT)

By Ben Hall In London

Financial Times, June 13, 2006

Tony Blair, UK prime minister, on Monday urged Israelis and Palestinians to pursue a negotiated settlement of their conflict, but did not endorse a unilateral Israeli solution in the event of a stalemate.

Speaking in Downing Street after talks with Ehud Olmert, Israel's new prime minister, Mr Blair promised to give "every support and every impetus we can from the international community" to ensure that talks could begin.

Mr Olmert is on the first leg of a European tour to win support for his proposals to withdraw from large parts of the West Bank and define Israel's borders unilaterally if talks with Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president, fail to produce a deal.

Mr Blair said the Palestinians had to recognise Israel's right to exist and renounce violence and both sides had to adhere to the international community's "road map" for talks. Israel also needed to address the "main issue" of how to create a viable Palestinian state.

Only a negotiated settlement was likely to last, Mr Blair said. But he acknowledged that there had to be progress towards some form of resolution to prevent the Middle East from slipping back into "chaos", and hinted that that could require a unilateral redrawing of the borders.

"This thing either moves forward by way of agreement or other ways of moving it forward have to be found," he said.

The Israeli leader reiterated his willingness to work towards a negotiated solution, which he said was based on "a generous compromise" by Israel. He would "go a long way" to convincing the Palestinians that it was worthwhle entering talks, under conditions set out in the "international road map".

"We are not impatient, therefore we are willing to give it some time," Mr Olmert said, revealing that he would be meeting Mr Abbas within the next few weeks.

But he also re-stated his readiness to go it alone in re-drawing Israel's map, adding that only a few years ago an Israeli offer to vacate 90 per cent of the West Bank would have been considered a "miracle".

"In spite of our obvious efforts, we may not be able to achieve our primary goal to negotiate with the Palestinians on the principles of the road map. We will have to move forward...to separate from the Palestinians, pull out from areas of the West Bank to realign Israelis to other parts of Israel to leave very large contiguous territories for a state to be formed by the Palestinians," he said.

Mr Blair agreed that negotiations could not start until the Palestinians renounced violence and accepted Israel's right to exist.

However, he declined to endorse Mr Olmert's view – expressed last week in an interview with the Financial Times – that a proposed referendum on Palestinian peace proposals was "meaningless".

Mr Olmert dismissed the referendum on proposals that implicitly recognise Israel as an internal Palestinian "game between one faction and another".

Mr Blair said that "anything that helps move the peace process forward is valuable".

The Israeli prime minister said his country could not allow Iran to "cross the nuclear threshold", warning that equipped with atomic weapons it would pose a "serious danger to the entire world".

Olmert Won't Rule Out Unilateral Action (AP)

By Steve Weizman

AP, June 12, 2006

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Monday that he would make "every possible effort" to negotiate peace with the Palestinians but will act unilaterally without an agreement.

DOJ_NMG_0033287

Olmert said at a news conference with British Prime Minister Tony Blair that Israel "will not tolerate nuclear weapons in the hands of Iran" — but sidestepped a question about possible Israeli action.

Olmert went further than before in his statements about a pullout from the West Bank, suggesting that a withdrawal would encompass "90 percent" of the territory Israel occupies, although he said that figure was approximate.

He left the door open to future negotiated pullouts even after a unilateral and partial withdrawal.

The prime minister is visiting Britain and France to win support for his approach to the West Bank. Under his plan, Israel would pull out of most of the territory and dismantle dozens of Jewish settlements but retain key areas, including major settlement blocs and east Jerusalem, which the Palestinians seek for a capital.

"What will happen when we will come to the point of the 90 percent of the territories, and the remaining 10 percent remains to be seen?" Olmert said.

If "the day will come when the Palestinians will be ready to negotiate with us ... I will then be willing to come to discuss it in detail," he continued.

In a briefing with reporters later, he said he was "not talking precisely down to the millimeter."

Asked about the prospect of a nuclear-armed Iran, Olmert said Israel "will not be able to accept such a reality."

Olmert sidestepped a question on whether Israel would act alone against Iran's nuclear program — as it did in 1981, when Israeli warplanes destroyed Iraq's Osirak nuclear facility. He said he hoped recent U.S. and European efforts "will stop any events that will advance Iran toward the possession of nuclear weapons."

Blair's response to Olmert's pullout comments balanced support for negotiations with a nuanced acceptance of what Israel calls its other options should talks lead nowhere.

Israel withdrew unilaterally from all of the Gaza Strip last year.

On the West Bank, Olmert has signaled he will give the Palestinians until year's end to resume peace talks before unilateral action. The Palestinians view a unilateral pullout as a way to strengthen Israel's hold on parts of the West Bank that the Jewish state would retain.

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas is eager to restart negotiations with Israel. But Olmert has said meaningful talks cannot take place as long as the militant group Hamas, which controls the Palestinian legislature and Cabinet, remains committed to Israel's destruction.

North Korea Flexes Missile Muscle To Grab US Attention (AFP)

By P. Parameswaran

AFP, June 12, 2006

North Korea's preparations for possible long-range missile tests -- its first in nearly a decade -- may be an attempt to grab the attention of a US government distracted by its nuclear row with Iran, experts said.

A senior US official said in a weekend report that there were "enough indications" to suggest that the Stalinist state was getting ready to test-fire an intercontinental ballistic missile, eight years after sending a missile over northern Japan.

Current test preparations are reportedly far more advanced than on previous occasions when North Korea appeared to be gearing up for a missile launch.

Pyongyang, which claims to have nuclear bombs, has frequently used missile tests and other provocative military activity to spur either diplomatic efforts or to shake up what they view as a unfavourable diplomatic situations.

But Pyongyang's latest demonstration of a planned long range missile test, against the backdrop of stalled nuclear talks, is seen by some analysts as a plea for US attention.

"It is very likely that North Korea believes that with Iran being offered a very reasonable package of incentives to abandon their nuclear program, they too would like to ensure that they are geting the appropriate attention and incentives from the United States," said Jon Wolfsthal, a weapons expert at the Washington-based Center for Strategic and International Studies.

North Korea's missile test preparations pre-date a US offer this month to join in the negotiations between Iran and the European nations to end a nuclear standoff with the Islamic republic.

DOJ_NMG_0033288

But Wolfsthal said the hardline communist state's stepped up missile activity could be an indication that Pyongyang "is very frustrated with its inability to get political and economic benefits from its nuclear program."

The United States had been involved with China, Russia, Japan and South Korea in talks with North Korea to disband the reclusive state's nuclear arms in return for security and diplomatic guarantees and critical energy aid.

Six-party talks climaxed in September 2005, with North Korea agreeing in principle to end its atomic weapons program.

But negotiations have collapsed since November, after the United States imposed financial sanctions on Pyongyang for alleged counterfeiting and money laundering activities.

During the impasse, Washington has been actively involved in diplomacy to defuse the Iranian nuclear crisis.

It has offered to directly talk to the Iranians and provide various incentives to encourage Tehran to suspend uranium enrichment, a process that could lead to making nuclear bombs.

"The North Koreans do not like to be ignored and they are famous for staging provocative actions to remind the United States that they are still potentially dangerous," noted Joseph Cirincione, a nuclear expert at the Center for American Progress.

He said that increased activity at a North Korean missile launch site, being monitored by US satellites, may be aimed more at "stimulating the six-party negotiating process than actually developing a capability that could actually threaten the United States."

Indications are that the North Koreans are itching for a nuclear deal but are frustrated by the on-again, off-again negotiating tactics of the United States.

Recently, the administration of President George W. Bush signalled it was prepared to consider opening a parallel track of negotiations with North Korea on a peace treaty to replace the 1953 armistice that ended the Korean War.

Some believe the move could result in a breakthrough to get talks moving again.

"But we haven't seen any results of the reported action yet, and the North Koreans may be getting impatient and are sort of puffing themselves up," Cirincione said.

Senator Scolds U.N.'s No. 2 For Snub (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

NEW YORK -- One of the Senate's most prominent conservatives came to the United Nations yesterday to explain that Middle America does appreciate the work of the world body, they just want to see it better managed.

Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, visited Deputy Secretary-General Mark Malloch Brown to rebut what he considered unfair criticism of the American people.

"I expressed disappointment on the lack of insight that was displayed in the speech given last week," Mr. Coburn told reporters after meeting in Mr. Malloch Brown's office. "The vast majority of Oklahomans believe in the function of the U.N. and recognize the positive contributions."

However, he added, the international organization still suffers from a lack of transparency and accountability. Mr. Coburn has scheduled a hearing on plans to renovate the aging U.N. headquarters later this month.

Mr. Malloch Brown, the senior deputy to U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, set off a firestorm of criticism last Tuesday when he said that "Middle America" doesn't know about the good work the United Nations does because Washington rarely defends the world body against its critics.

"The prevailing practice of seeking to use the U.N. almost by stealth as a diplomatic tool, while failing to stand up for it against its domestic critics, is simply not sustainable," Mr. Malloch Brown told two left-leaning think tanks.

He also said that U.N. successes are better reported in the Middle East than in Middle America because "much of the public discourse that reaches the U.S. heartland has been largely abandoned to its loudest detractors such as Rush Limbaugh and Fox News."

The next day U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton blasted the remarks as "condescending" and "patronizing," and threatened to make the United Nations "a victim" if Mr. Annan did not immediately repudiate the speech.

But Mr. Annan is standing by his deputy, and on Thursday urged everyone to let it go.

DOJ_NMG_0033289

Bush administration officials have not fleshed out the details of their strategy, but they do note that the organization is less than three weeks away from a fiscal crisis.

The U.N.'s current spending authority expires at the end of June and Washington and other key donor states must come to an agreement with the rest of the membership on how to make substantial management changes before that time.

The United States pays one-quarter of the U.N.'s operating budget.

"We are now perilously near the deadline, and it is far from clear that enough reform to satisfy them has been achieved," wrote Mr. Annan in an op-ed piece in yesterday's Financial Times. "Neither side has found a way of engaging with the other to agree on further reforms."

Although Mr. Malloch Brown, who is British, has insisted that he is not anti-American, his remarks have riled Midwestern lawmakers. Rep. Dan Burton, Indiana Republican and an outspoken critic of U.N. mismanagement, was scheduled to take the House floor last night "to support the deputy secretary-general's immediate removal," said his spokesman, Stephen Schatz.

Cuba Cuts Off Power To U.S. Mission (AP)

AP, June 12, 2006

The Cuban government cut off electricity to the U.S. diplomatic mission in Havana a week ago, and U.S. requests for power to be restored have gone unanswered, the State Department said Monday.

The facility has been operating with generator power.

Work at the mission continues, including interviews of refugees and outreach programs for the Cuban people, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

"I would just say that the bullying tactics of the Castro regime aren't going to work," he added.

He said Cuban authorities also reduce the availability of water to the mission from time to time.

McCormack said he suspects that the decision to cut the power was in response to efforts by the mission to provide information to the Cuban people.

"That, of course, is not something that the Castro regime takes kindly to," he said.

In January, President Fidel Castro complained about use of the U.S. mission to carry human rights messages to passersby on outdoor electronic signs.

Castro called the signs provocations.

U.S. Mission Hit By Power Failure, Water Shortage (WT)

By Tom Carter

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

The main office of the U.S. diplomatic mission in Havana has been without electricity since June 5, water is available only sporadically and U.S. diplomats have begun burning "nonessential" documents, the State Department said yesterday.

The State Department called the power cut part of a campaign of harassment of U.S. diplomats by the Cuban government.

"On Monday, June 5th, at approximately 3:00 a.m., electricity to the main building at the U.S. Interests Section in Havana was cut off," said department spokesman Sean McCormack. "The U.S. Interests Section building is the only building in the neighborhood without electricity. I wonder how that happened."

The U.S. mission is running on backup generators.

Cuba and the United States do not have diplomatic relations. Rather than embassies, they maintain "interests sections" in each other's capital. Switzerland acts as the official go-between.

Calls to the Swiss Embassy and the Cuba Interests Section in Washington yesterday seeking comment were not returned.

Drew G. Blakeney, a spokesman for the U.S. Interests Section in Havana, said the harassment of U.S. diplomats was minor compared with the repression of the Cuban people by the regime led by President Fidel Castro.

"The Cuban people, especially human rights and pro-democracy activists, continue to suffer much more severe harassment on a daily basis than does the U.S. Interests Section in Havana," Mr. Blakeney said.

The State Department said the harassment is thought to be the Cuban response to the U.S. Interests Section's "outreach" on behalf of the Cuban people.

DOJ_NMG_0033290

The U.S. mission infuriated the Castro government at Christmastime when it displayed a lighted sign on the building to flash news and messages to the Cuban people. The initial sign displayed "75" -- the number of dissidents jailed by the regime in the past few years.

The Cuban government responded in January by erecting a large billboard to block the messages from the thousands of Cubans who drive, bicycle or walk past the Interests Section each day.

"The American requests to the Cuban government to restore power have gone unanswered," Mr. McCormack said. "As of this morning, the power remains cut off and the U.S. Interests Section is operating on generator power."

He added that work at the Interests Section "continues unabated, including interviews of refugees and direct outreach to the Cuban people."

"I would just say that the bullying tactics of the Castro regime aren't going to work," Mr. McCormack said.

The Miami Herald reported late yesterday afternoon that the Interests Section had begun burning "nonessential" papers. State Department officials confirmed the report but said this is a standard procedure when power is out.

The cutoff continues even though Cuban Basic Industry Minister Yadira Garcia told parliament Saturday that a $1 billion program to link hundreds of large generators to the energy grid meant more power was available for peak energy demands.

"In less than eight months, conditions have been created that guarantee that there will be no blackouts in our country due to a lack of generating capacity," the minister said in her report, published by the official press yesterday.

Leader Of Islamic Forces In Somalia Seeks "Understanding" With U.S. (KRT)

By Hannah Allam

Knight Ridder, June 12, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia -The Islamist leader whose Islamic Courts Union militia seized control of this lawless east African capital last week after fierce fighting with U.S.-backed warlords said Monday that he seeks "an understanding" with the United States and denied that his group is sheltering al-Qaida terrorists.

But in his first face-to-face interview with an American journalist since his forces' triumph, Sheik Sherif Ahmed told Knight Ridder that he doesn't plan full ties with the United States, and he dodged questions about his views on al-Qaida.

"The Americans were getting wrong information from the warlords, and since that strategy failed, the Americans have a good opportunity," Ahmed said. "They can help us with offers of humanitarian assistance. We cannot say there will be full cooperation, but we can foresee an understanding between the United States and Somalia."

He also said he would never agree to a call for international peacekeepers by Somalia's nearly powerless transitional government, based 150 miles away in the city of Baidoa.

"They only brought destruction and killing when they were here," he said. "There is no reason for the request for foreign troops. The cruel warlords were totally eliminated by the uprising."

Ahmed has been the focus of international speculation about whether he plans to create a Taliban-style state that would shelter al-Qaida in this strategic Horn of Africa country. But Ahmed offered no clear political agenda during the interview, which was conducted in his heavily fortified office on a leafy residential street in the capital.

Ahmed said he believes "the world is truly governed by God," but that his religious courts will reach out to intellectuals, secular politicians and clan elders as the Islamists craft a plan for the city.

"Our people have been freed from the warlords. Now, we want all Somali people to decide their future," he said.

Outside, boyish-looking militia members, most still in their teens, patrolled in castoff military uniforms aboard trucks affixed with anti-aircraft artillery. There were no sounds of fighting, and residents said the militia introduced a fragile calm after 15 years of bloodshed.

The United States ended direct involvement in Somalia in 1994, after 18 Army Rangers were killed when rebels shot down a military helicopter in Mogadishu - an event dramatized in the film "Black Hawk Down." In the years since, the city has been the subject of near constant violence as rival clans competed for control.

DOJ_NMG_0033291

The Bush administration is widely believed to have begun providing covert funding to some of the warlords during the past year in an effort to thwart the Islamic Courts' rise. It's a claim the administration hasn't confirmed, but one that Ahmed and others here believe.

President Bush said last week that the administration's "first concern would be to make sure that Somalia does not become an al-Qaida safe haven, doesn't become a place from which terrorists plot and plan."

"So we're watching very carefully developments there," Bush said.

Somalis who took part in the formation of the Islamic Courts Union in 2003 say Ahmed, a scion of one of Somalia's most powerful clans who studied law in Libya, was installed as chairman because of his reputation for fairness.

"He was the consensus person," said Abdullahi M. Shirwa, a secular peace activist who was involved in the establishment of the Islamic Courts Union. "He got support from the clans, from the neighborhoods, from civil society and from the Islamists. He's a politician more than he's a religious man."

In person, Ahmed appears far younger than his 42 years and eschews the traditional trappings of power. His entire two-story compound is treated as a holy site. Visitors are required to take off their shoes when entering, and Ahmed was barefoot throughout the interview. His office furnishings consisted of a desk and a chair. He declined to discuss personal details of his life. "I'm from the people," he said.

During a casual first meeting Sunday night, he came across as charming, with a good sense of humor. But he was far more guarded during Monday's formal interview, during which he occasionally shifted into fluent Arabic from his native Somali.

He didn't lose his sense of humor, however. Asked to pose with a reporter for a picture, Ahmed at first hesitated. "It might be dangerous for you," he said with a laugh, before agreeing to the request.

The Islamic Courts Union is still in battle mode, preparing for fresh clashes as the group moves to the outskirts of Mogadishu in a push to take the last warlord strongholds. Ahmed defended the leader of his military wing, Adan Hashi Ayro, who reportedly fought U.S. troops alongside the Taliban in Afghanistan.

"One should not be taken in by Western propaganda," he said in response to questions about Ayro.

The sheik also said that the United States hasn't responded to a letter he wrote in which he categorically denied that his group is sheltering al-Qaida figures thought to be responsible for attacks on American targets.

"Al-Qaida or terrorist members are not here at all," Ahmed said. "As far as we know, the claims by the Americans against Somali suspects are exaggerated."

Setback In Somalia (WT)

By John B. Roberts

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

Two-and-a-half years ago, I first learned of the CIA's covert program to use secular warlords to contain al Qaeda in Somalia. As early as 2002 intelligence officials concluded that al Qaeda had re-established an operational network in Somalia after being routed in Afghanistan. Some reports even suggested that Osama bin Laden crossed the Arabian Sea in a dhow and found sanctuary in Somalia after escaping the noose in Tora Bora.

Until now, I refrained from writing about the Somali front in the war on al Qaeda because of its extreme sensitivity and its vital importance. Regrettably, State Department career officials, in order to condemn the program, have now confirmed to the New York Times the existence of the covert operation being run by the CIA station in Nairobi, Kenya. This is an unconscionable breach of security that ought to outrage us all.

The links between Somalia and al Qaeda predate September 11 and unlike the disputed links between al Qaeda and Iraq before the war, these ties are incontestable. The 1998 bombings of our embassies in Tanzania and Kenya were carried out through the Somali networks. Since September 11, Somali-linked terrorists have bombed a hotel catering to Israeli tourists in Mombasa, attempted to shoot down an Israeli airliner, have been tied to the London transit bombings and were caught with radioactive contraband in Britain.

DOJ_NMG_0033292

To counter the risk that Somalia will become a terrorist safe haven, the United States has stationed 2,000 fast-reaction troops in neighboring Djibouti. Under presidential authority, Washington also launched a covert action program relying on a coalition of secular Somali warlords called the Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counter-Terrorism.

The alliance has been used to harass and disrupt terrorist operations in Somalia and to capture al Qaeda operatives like Suleiman Abdalla Salim Hemed for interrogation by the United States. The callow exposure of this program's existence complicates our ability to work through proxy allies in fighting terrorism.

Critics who charge that the alliance has been counterproductive and resulted in new support for the Islamic court militias who claim to have seized Mogadishu ignore the fact that al Qaeda was already well-established in Somalia before the CIA program began.

This creative, risk-taking approach to the Somali problem exemplifies the best of the CIA. It was overseen by a talented CIA station chief with a long history in the region. It was a vital program because the other alternatives are so dire.

There is no easy solution in Somalia. Allowing the country to become a safe haven for terrorists threatens not only the entire Arabian Peninsula and the Gulfs of Aden and Oman but gives al Qaeda a base for global operations. This is why Secretary of State Colin Powell, in Senate testimony in 2003, named Somalia on a short list of countries where the U.S. might have to take military action after Iraq.

The military option is undesirable for several reasons. Because of the clan structure of Somali society and widespread possession of arms, an invasion would require a level of civilian casualties that would horrify U.S. and world public opinion. Occupying forces would face an insurgency even more tenacious than in Iraq.

That is why it is crucial for the CIA-backed warlords to succeed in containing al Qaeda. But the odds have been made much more difficult by State Department disclosure of the covert program.

Every CIA officer knows covert action can be a career killer when operations are exposed or fail. The political fallout and second-guessing has just begun. How CIA Director Michael Hayden and Deputy Director Steve Kappes handle the Nairobi station chief will be closely watched by CIA officers, especially in operations. This is the acid test of whether the new CIA is a risk-averse agency where creativity and daring will be rewarded.

To send a message throughout CIA, Messrs. Hayden and Kappes should promote the Nairobi station chief instead of sacrificing him to appease critics in other agencies or Congress.

John B. Roberts II served in the Reagan White House. He writes frequently on terrorism and national security.

Indonesia Lacks Funds To Fight Flu, World Bank Says (AP)

The Associated Press, June 13, 2006

JAKARTA, Indonesia -- Indonesia's fight against bird flu is underfunded and poorly coordinated, the World Bank said, urging the government to be more aggressive in culling fowl in infected areas.

The bank, in a report to be released today to Indonesia's biggest aid donors, also said the government needed to improve surveillance of poultry stocks to better detect outbreaks of the disease and to modify its vaccination program.

Indonesia has said it will need $900 million over the next three years to fight the H5N1 virus, which has killed at least 37 people in the nation, but has budgeted only $59 million for 2006.

"The current allocation of donor funds, about $55 million, does not correct this imbalance," the bank said yesterday, adding that it is "unclear how the government of Indonesia intends to finance the shortfall."

Bird flu has killed at least 128 people world-wide since late 2003.

So far, most human cases have been linked to contact with infected birds, but experts fear the virus could mutate into a form more easily transmissible between humans, potentially sparking a pandemic that could kill millions world-wide.

Indonesia trails only Vietnam, where 42 people have died, in human bird-flu deaths and the H5N1 virus is considered endemic in poultry in most provinces across the sprawling archipelago.

"But surveillance coverage is limited and generally unreliable to detect outbreaks," the bank said, adding that "control measures, including vaccination and culling of infected stocks are seriously underfinanced and fraught with implementation problems."

DOJ_NMG_0033293

Mass culling of poultry in infected areas is one of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization's most basic containment guidelines, but Indonesia has said it can't afford to compensate farmers.

The World Bank also expressed concern about a recent cluster of cases on Sumatra island, which has raised suspicions of limited human-to-human transmission.

Bumpy Ride As China's Auto Market Booms, Leaders Clash Over Heavy Toll (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough And Shai Oster

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

BEIJING -- Nearly 1,000 new cars hit the streets here every day, crowding a city already choked with pollution. Levels of nitrogen dioxide currently exceed the World Health Organization's clean-air guidelines by 78%.

The mayor, Wang Qishan, complains that the number of cars flooding the roads makes it "more difficult to run the city." Local officials are so worried about air quality for the 2008 summer Olympic Games that they are considering a temporary ban on private cars.

At the same time, the city owns Beijing Automotive Industry Corp., a car maker that has joint ventures with DaimlerChrysler AG and South Korea's Hyundai Motor Co. Last year, the company and its affiliates made more than 500,000 cars, trucks and buses, employed 48,000 workers and paid more than $500 million in local taxes. By 2008, they expect to produce one million vehicles a year.

After various on-and-off restrictions, Beijing, which has more vehicles than any other Chinese city, has almost no limitations on car usage.

"This is something of great difficulty for us. The contradiction of population and the environment -- for us and the whole of China," said Mr. Wang at a March meeting.

The rise of the automobile highlights the wrenching balancing act China faces as it tries to join the ranks of modern consumer societies: improving living standards and creating jobs for the country's 1.3 billion people while keeping pollution and oil demand under control.

Officials from China's central government are divided over how to proceed. The country's powerful economic planners see the auto industry as a "pillar" of the national economy. Others, including those from the State Environmental Protection Administration, argue that China needs to limit car use and move more quickly to tighten clean-air rules.

Local leaders are also torn. Many city and provincial governments, like Beijing, have a financial stake in the industry and are eager to capitalize on ramped-up production. But they also face complaints from citizens about snarled traffic and dirty air.

China's car debate stands out because its population is the planet's largest. Across the country, rising incomes and falling auto prices have led to an explosion in car sales, up 54% in the first three months of 2006, compared with the year-earlier period. China's auto market is now the world's second biggest, and the motor-vehicle industry employs 1.7 million workers.

The shift is happening so quickly that McDonald's Corp. said last week that it expects at least half of its new outlets in China to be drive-throughs.

And the car craze here has just begun. China now has about 25 vehicles -- and fewer than seven cars -- for every thousand people, roughly the same level as the U.S. had in 1915. If auto sales continue apace, there will be more than 130 million vehicles on China's roads by 2020 -- up from about 33 million today. That could help double China's demand for crude oil and lead to a sharp increase in greenhouse-gas emissions, according to estimates by the government and environmental groups.

"If we follow the current track of consumption patterns to develop the automobile in China," says Pan Yue, vice minister of the State Environmental Protection Administration, "the world will not be able to support" it.

Complicating matters, Chinese gasoline contains high levels of sulfur and other contaminants. It will take years and billions of dollars to improve China's refineries to make higher-quality, cleaner-burning gas.

So far, calls for stricter car controls have been largely muted by the powerful National Development and Reform Commission, which sets the country's economic-development policies.

DOJ_NMG_0033294

The commission has put a priority on expanding the economy to generate jobs for the millions streaming into cities from China's countryside. Officials of provincial governments and cities -- whose performance is judged largely on their ability to boost gross domestic product -- are rushing into auto-making.

Guangdong, long known as China's export capital for consumer goods, says it wants to triple its auto-making capacity by 2010.

"How many color TV sets and refrigerators are equal to one automobile?" asked Huang Huahua, governor of Guangdong on China's southern coast, at a government conference earlier this year. "You are a fool if you don't make cars....If we still depend on color TVs and a few similar industries, then Guangdong's 9% GDP growth can no longer be assured."

In 1997, Anhui province, one of the poorest in China, teamed up with the city of Wuhu to start a government-owned car maker, Chery Automobile Co. Last year, Chery sold nearly 190,000 vehicles, more than double its sales from 2004. The company says it has had trouble expanding capacity to keep pace with demand for its cars, which sell from $3,700 up to about $25,000.

In some cases, local governments share directly in car manufacturers' profits. Shanghai's government, for example, controls and receives dividend payments from state-owned Shanghai Automotive Industry Corp., which has joint ventures with both General Motors Corp. and Volkswagen AG.

For most of the auto's history in China, there were few cars and different priorities. After the Communists rose to power in 1949, China's auto industry focused on building military vehicles, buses and trucks. The Cultural Revolution of the mid-1960s to the mid-1970s, which led to mass upheavals, hobbled the industry.

A Shift in the 1980s

China's modern car market grew slowly at first, as demand for relatively expensive cars was limited largely to government and Communist Party officials. After launching market overhauls more than two decades ago, China decided to bring in foreign expertise. In 1983, state-run Beijing Automotive signed the first joint-venture deal with American Motors Corp. to make Jeeps. Soon after, Shanghai Automotive went into business with Volkswagen.

By 1994, the government had decided that cars should play a central role in driving the country's industrial engine. The official government policy nodded toward environmental concerns, saying the government "encourages" the use of "fuel-efficient and low-polluting" vehicles. At the same time, however, officials also pressed for stepped-up production.

Even then, officials in Beijing and other cities were worried about mounting congestion and auto pollution. Beijing put varying restrictions on small cars and trucks, limiting where and when they could drive.

Development of mass transit lagged in Beijing and many other cities, creating more demand for cars. In the late 1990s, more than a dozen cities wanted subway systems. But China's central government delayed approval, partly due to budget constraints. Beijing's main east-west subway line was only finished in 2000, and large parts of the city are still inaccessible by rail.

The central government, meanwhile, was looking to strengthen the car industry by bringing in additional foreign expertise and resources. In 1997, GM won a coveted deal for a joint venture with Shanghai Automotive that now produces Buicks and other models. Many other foreign auto makers followed.

After China joined the World Trade Organization in 2001, falling prices sparked a jump in car purchases by China's more-affluent consumers.

Today, demand by middle-class buyers is surging as salaries rise and car prices, driven down by competition, plummet.

Liu Yunzhi, a 25-year-old computer-hardware designer, bought his first car, a $5,200 Chinese-made hatchback, soon after moving into an apartment in a Beijing suburb last year. He used it to haul furniture to his new home from Ikea.

"You don't have to be a rich guy to own a car," says Mr. Liu. "You can enjoy your life more."

Price wars have heated up as more local manufacturers have entered the fray. Mr. Liu's hatchback, for instance, was made by Geely Holding Group, which moved into autos after making motorcycles. BYD Co., a producer of cellphone batteries, got into the car business in 2003 after acquiring a formerly state-run assembly plant.

Rolling Stock

In Chongqing, a city in southwest China that is hoping to become the nation's car capital, auto factories spread over more than 20 million square meters, or around 5,000 acres. Metal-stamping plants, paint shops and assembly lines churned out more than 600,000 cars and other vehicles last year -- capacity that city officials hope to more than double by 2010.

DOJ_NMG_0033295

Even in Shanghai's relatively diverse economy, the auto industry employed nearly 416,000 people, accounting for about 3.4% of GDP and more than $900 million in taxes in 2005, according to government figures.

Li Qisheng is 24 and has spent two years working on assembly lines for Geely in Zhejiang province, south of Shanghai. The son of farmers, Mr. Li now earns about $250 a month, or about $1.27 an hour, doing quality-control checks on new vehicles.

Mr. Li, who also receives subsidized meals and housing in a company dormitory, says he sends about half of his earnings home every month. "It relieves the pressure on my parents," he says. Last year, his family used the money to build a new, five-story concrete house to replace an old two-floor wood home. "I'm proud of myself," Mr. Li says.

The trickle-down of industry benefits has made it hard to put on the brakes. In 2000, Shanghai decided to tighten restrictions on new car registrations, auctioning off a limited number of license plates annually. But it has gradually loosened the strictures.

During the first year of the new program, Shanghai issued 14,000 plates for an average price of $1,700. Last year, it issued 67,078 for an average price of more than $4,000.

"Residents have a very strong demand of car use," says Zhu Junyi, a researcher at the Shanghai Information Center, a government think tank. The government, he adds, "has to try its best to meet the demand."

High Toll

The toll is high. Exhaust from an estimated 2.5 million vehicles has helped make Beijing one of the most polluted cities in China, even though it has shuttered many of the coal-burning factories that once fouled its air. In 2004, levels of airborne particulate in Beijing were more than six times as high as in New York, and sulfur-dioxide levels were more than double, according to Chinese and U.S. government figures.

It wasn't until 2000 that China passed its first comprehensive emissions law and made catalytic converters, which clean vehicle exhaust, mandatory. China has modeled is auto-emissions standards after those in Europe. Still, most of the country still lags behind Europe, using rules implemented there back in 1996. Beijing has a stricter standard, in line with regulations set by the European Union in 2000. The entire nation is slated to move to that cleaner standard by 2008.

Emissions testing for cars has been spotty, and experts complain that little is known about what comes out of China's tailpipes. Beijing officials say that more than 60% of the vehicles in the city have some emissions controls, an acknowledgment that up to 40% of them -- mostly older models -- have none at all.

In 2005, China imposed its first fuel-efficiency standards, which some analysts say will eventually be stricter than in the U.S. Earlier this year, the central government called on cities like Beijing to lift bans originally imposed on small cars in order to encourage purchases of more energy-efficient models. The government also instituted a graduated tax on new cars, designed to discourage purchases of gas guzzlers.

But to really limit cars' environmental toll and energy consumption, experts such as Lee Schipper, director of research at the World Resources Institute's Embarq Center for Transportation and the Environment in Washington, D.C., say China needs to levy road-use fees, lift gas prices and encourage the use of mass transit, as well as hybrid and electric vehicles.

"The rapid rate of growth is more than government institutions are prepared to deal with," says Mr. Schipper. When he suggests to local officials that Chinese cities limit the number of cars on the road, he says they resist. "They say: 'You can't restrict cars.' "

Russian Party Asks Young: Who Wants To Be A Deputy? (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

LIPETSK, Russia -- To the list of contest prizes that stoke fantasies worldwide -- riches, fame, a dream date, a new washer-dryer -- add another: a seat in parliament.

Shunning pinstripes for shorts and bathing suits, a group of potential legislators was unveiled at a beach party here last weekend -- the first-round winners in a competition called Political Factory, modeled on the popular Russian television show "Star Factory." Plucked from obscurity, a few of these aspiring lawmakers, or deputies, are due to join the Russian ruling class by October.

DOJ_NMG_0033296

"I'm ready to fight and to solve the problems of young people!" proclaimed a beaming Svetlana Kondakova, 21, on hearing she'd made the cut. When a DJ in wraparound shades remarked that what her bikini top concealed would help her advance in politics, the crowd roared its approval.

In April, the Supreme Council of United Russia, the political party that supports President Vladimir Putin and controls legislatures at both the federal and regional levels, decided that 20 percent of all candidates on party lists in future elections must be between 21 and 28 years of age.

The move is part of efforts to broaden the party's membership beyond the stolid bureaucrats and businessmen who currently stuff its ranks -- many of them inspired not by ideological fervor but by the party's almost complete electoral dominance.

Lipetsk's regional governor, Oleg Korolyov, joined United Russia last October, part of a wave of political grandees switching sides. But how to recruit at the entry level? Young Guard, the party's youth wing, hatched the idea of a reality contest and opened it up to all comers. The competition was launched in May in nine regions, including Lipetsk, that are scheduled to hold local parliamentary elections in the fall.

"It's the first time in Russian history that a party has made a decision to share real power . . . on every level from local to federal," said Ivan Demidov, a Young Guard leader and well-known television personality. "It's the first actual step toward renewing the elite."

According to surveys, young people in Russia are largely indifferent to politics, despite Kremlin fears that they could become the vanguard of the kind of popular revolt that toppled governments in neighboring Ukraine and Georgia. Although a host of youth organizations were formed in the last two years to tame or channel youth activism, most of them quickly faded.

So Young Guard used modern marketing to try to attract recruits.

You are young.

You are active.

You are moving forward,

And Political Factory will open the doors for you!

Political Factory gives you a chance to get to power!

So promised a jingle aired over the last two months on local radio stations in Lipetsk, which is about 225 miles south of Moscow.

Critics call this approach a desperate gimmick. "Demidov is a showman," said Vladimir Pribylovsky, head of the Panorama research institute in Moscow. "The president asked him to propagandize among young people and he had to come up with something new to generate some interest. But I don't believe they'll give away parliamentary seats. There are too many of the party's adults who want them."

One young person who embraced the idea was Kondakova. "You look at politicians, and all you see are middle-aged men -- and how are they going to solve the questions of young people?" she said, speaking on the beach of an artificial lake outside Lipetsk. "This competition is a real surprise and a chance for young people to actually do things."

Contestants were invited to come to a Young Guard office in the city. There they had to fill out a long questionnaire on their personal backgrounds and political views.

"The USA is our friend, enemy or economic partner?" one question asked. Respondents were instructed to elaborate on their answers. There are no set correct answers, they were told.

"The U.S. is our strong competitor," wrote Andrei Trofimenkov, 26, who works for a local private group that promotes cooperation between government and business, in a fairly typical response. The Lipetsk branch of Young Guard provided The Washington Post with the completed questionnaires of all 60 people who entered the contest in the city.

"It is not our friend because it is not interested in restoring Russia's greatness," continued Trofimenkov. "Neither is it our enemy because it's not interested in Russia's total elimination."

"It's too tough to say enemy," wrote Dmitry Zakhvatayev, 24, a manager at a small company. "But they don't wish us any good, that's for sure."

DOJ_NMG_0033297

Some responses were inflammatory. Asked what the first action of a new youth movement should be, Kondakova wrote that she would like "to disperse a gay parade." An attempt to stage the first gay and lesbian pride parade in Moscow last month ended in violence when it was broken up by police and skinheads.

"I expected worse," Demidov said after reviewing questionnaires from the first nine regions taking part in the contest. "We wanted to find those who have desire, who identify themselves as leaders. There was a lot of confusion about ideology, in their understanding of power, but the main thing is they have the desire to take part. Some people say it's an artificial thing. It's always difficult to find talented people, but it's better to have this 20 percent as a door, rather than the wall we've had until now."

One question asked why Mikhail Khodorkovsky, the Russian oil tycoon who clashed with the Kremlin, was in prison. Almost everyone wrote that he was guilty of financial crimes.

But others showed independence from the government's line.

Pavel Lysenko, a 21-year-old who works for the local Interior Ministry, said Khodorkovsky was in jail only because "he was able to earn money and the Russian mentality can't tolerate that." Yevgeny Zenkov, a 23-year-old chemistry teacher and boy scout leader, said Khodorkovsky was "in jail for his political views."

Both Lysenko and Zenkov are still in the contest.

Entrants also recorded 45-second videos in which they stated why they wanted to be members of parliament. A panel of judges, including Young Guard activists and well-known young people from Lipetsk, conducted follow-up interviews by phone.

"I was looking for some creativity," said Maxim Bereznev, a 23-year-old break dancer who took part in the judging.

On June 4, the original field of 60 was cut to 20, half of whom had no previous affiliation with United Russia or Young Guard, according to their questionnaires.

Contestants heard the news on the beach, where United Russia had set up a stage and DJs from a local radio station played Russian hip-hop and house music. To the side, under a stand of trees, young activists grilled hot dogs and people helped themselves to the mineral water for which Lipetsk has been famous since the days of Czar Peter the Great.

The winners were called up to the stage in groups of four. In responses to a DJ, the fledgling politicians proclaimed their devotion to the party, democracy and the Russian way of life.

"It's not important which party you belong to," said Sergei Pozdnyakov, 26, a former Communist Party loyalist who was among the 20 preliminary winners. "The main thing is to be with people who have some sincere beliefs."

Over the next month, the winners have to gather the signatures of 500 people who pledge to support them in the fall elections. They also have to organize some local events to show their political smarts. The contest will end with a debate among the 20 aspirants before the judging panel makes its final decision.

On June 27, five final winners will be chosen in Lipetsk and added to the party list. Three of those will almost certainly end up in parliament.

"We're looking for energetic, thinking patriots," said Alexei Demikhov, head of Young Guard in Lipetsk. "And our main task is to choose those we won't feel ashamed of when they become deputies."

The Wrong Way To Sway Egypt (WP)

By Jon B. Alterman

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

There are many in Washington who think that Egyptian politics turned around last spring because of President Bush's demonstrated resolve to promote political change in that country. They further believe that the leadership in Cairo reverted to its bad old ways when Bush's attention strayed.

They are wrong on both counts. Profound change was never in the air in Egypt. Some Americans may have been ebullient about changes afoot there, but Egyptians' level of political participation told a different story: Fewer than 5 percent of the electorate bothered to vote in last May's referendum on allowing multi-candidate elections for president, and perhaps 20 percent voted in the presidential election itself.

Misreading this history causes many to believe that the United States should turn up the pressure and condition its aid to Egypt on continued political reform. This is a move that makes sense on its face. It also happens to make bad policy. The U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0033298

government should continue to press hard for reform in Egypt, and it should closely scrutinize the aid package. But linking the two would be counterproductive, if not disastrous.

Like the aging villas in downtown Cairo, U.S. aid to Egypt is the fading legacy of another time. In the 1970s, when peace between Israel and any of its Arab neighbors was a fantastic dream, and when picking Egypt off from the East Bloc was a major coup in the Cold War, Egypt was worth every penny of the billions of dollars in U.S. aid that it received.

Three decades later, the Soviet Union is gone, the Arab League has embraced a two-state solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict, and al-Jazeera's maps label Israel as such. Egypt helps the United States in a wide number of areas -- especially with regard to counterterrorism cooperation and Arab-Israeli peace issues -- but it is increasingly difficult to find instances in which Egyptian assistance has been vital to the success of a critical U.S. mission.

Meanwhile, more than $60 billion in U.S. assistance over 30 years has engendered little goodwill on Egypt's streets. According to a Gallup poll released last month, 72 percent of Egyptians believe that the United States is not serious about improving economic conditions in the Middle East -- U.S. assistance notwithstanding.

The United States may well decide to reduce assistance to Egypt on the merits. But reducing it as part of a conditionality scheme would not only not work, it would also be damaging.

Studies strongly suggest that foreign aid conditionality works best when it concentrates on objective measures of actions that are controlled by a small group of people. Conditioning preferential interest rates on monetary reserve targets is a perfect example. Tying assistance to democratization is exactly the opposite. Democratization is notoriously subjective, and the product of millions of small decisions every day. By many measures, especially freedom of speech, Egypt is far freer than it was even three years ago. But the brutal repression of street demonstrations in recent weeks is a sign that freedom of action lags behind. Measuring either one with precision is impossible.

Outside of the academic literature, there are other reasons political conditionality is unlikely to work with Egypt. First, even millions of dollars in aid are unlikely to persuade the Egyptian leadership to roll the dice when it feels its very survival is at stake. The breakdown of public order in Iraq further undermines the confidence of Egypt's leaders that Americans' judgment is better than their own in this regard. Second, Egyptian officials feel outsiders are deeply naive about the threats posed by local radical groups, which many of Egypt's oppressive measures seek to curtail. Third, for more than a century Egyptians have been hypersensitive to foreign diktats because of the country's long history of occupation.

Thus far the Egyptian government has discredited advocates of democratization as foreign agents while gaining domestic credit for defending the nation against foreign intrigue. In any highly public spat over whether Egypt has met U.S.-imposed conditions, citizens would almost certainly rally around the government, and our friends would be isolated. In addition, the Egyptian government would be far less cooperative on a variety of important security issues, significantly increasing the cost of U.S. military and intelligence operations. There is no question that the Egyptian government would rather harm its own interests than be humiliated.

Conditioning aid might make us feel better, but it would not change Egypt. We need a less flashy but more effective approach. We do need to redesign the aid program, but we should do so in a way that allows Egyptians to claim victory while diminishing the overall amount of aid.

We also need to have our security and intelligence professionals work with their Egyptian counterparts to reach common understandings of common threats, especially with regard to radicalism and violence. Such efforts should simultaneously seek to reach agreement on the kinds of political activity that are not threatening to public order.

Finally, the United States needs to continue to press for greater openness and participation in Egypt. The world is changing, and the old methods of political control no longer work. The Egyptian government knows this, and it is seeking to adapt. Its efforts may be insufficient or ineffective, and it will have to live with the consequences. Our role should be to encourage and prod. Getting into a public spitting match with the Egyptian government would have precisely the opposite effect.

The writer directs the Middle East Program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

Foreign Aid Has Flaws. So What? (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

DOJ_NMG_0033299

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

Don't tell anyone, but a dirty little secret within the foreign aid world is that aid often doesn't work very well.

Now that truth has been aired (and sometimes exaggerated) in a provocative new book by William Easterly, "The White Man's Burden." Mr. Easterly, a former World Bank official who is now an economics professor at New York University, has tossed a hand grenade at the world's bleeding hearts — and, worst of all, he makes some valid points.

Let me say right off that stingy Republicans should not read this book. It might inflame their worst suspicions.

But the rest of us should read it, because there is a growing constituency for fighting global poverty, and we need to figure out how to make that money more effective.

I disagree with many of Professor Easterly's arguments, but he's right about one central reality: helping people can be much harder than it looks. When people are chronically hungry, for example, shipping in food can actually make things worse, because the imported food lowers prices and thus discourages farmers from planting in the next season. (That's why the United Nations, when spending aid money, tries to buy food in the region rather than import it.)

On one of my last trips to Darfur, I had dinner at a restaurant in Nyala called K2. Out back were 18 big white S.U.V.'s belonging to the U.N. and aid groups; that amounted to nearly $1 million worth of vehicles, in a country where people are starving.

The aid workers are struggling heroically in a dangerous and difficult place, and I don't begrudge them reliable vehicles. But something seems wrong when international agencies are more successful at maintaining S.U.V.'s than clinics. (One reason is that budgeting is often done annually, and one of the ways to spend a grant in a single year is to buy a vehicle.)

It's well-known that the countries that have succeeded best in lifting people out of poverty (China, Singapore, Malaysia) have received minimal aid, while many that have been flooded with aid (Niger, Togo, Zambia) have ended up poorer. Thus many economists accept that aid doesn't generally help poor countries grow, but argue that it does stimulate growth in poor countries with good governance. That was the conclusion of a study in 2000 by Craig Burnside and David Dollar.

Professor Easterly repeated that study, using a larger pool of data, and — alas — found no improvement even in countries with good governance.

Saddest of all, Raghuram Rajan and Arvind Subramanian of the International Monetary Fund have found that "aid inflows have systematic adverse effects on a country's competitiveness." One problem is that aid pushes up the local exchange rate, discouraging local manufacturing. Mr. Subramanian also argues that aid income can create the same kinds of problems as oil income — that famous "oil curse" — by breeding dependency and undermining local institutions.

All these findings can be pretty shattering to a bleeding-heart American. But cheer up.

Some other studies indicate that aid does improve growth (economists don't agree about this any more than they agree about anything else). And whatever the impact on economic growth rates, aid definitely does something far more important: it saves lives.

For pennies, you can vaccinate a child and save his or her life. For $5 you can buy a family a large mosquito net and save several people from malaria. For $250, you can repair a teenage girl's fistula, a common childbirth injury, and give her a life again.

The Center for Global Development, a Washington think tank, has published a terrific book, "Millions Saved," demonstrating how health projects have saved lives. Eradicating smallpox and reducing river blindness have improved the lives of more people for less money than almost any investment imaginable. In Darfur, we haven't done nearly enough. But our aid shipments have kept alive hundreds of thousands of people.

For my whole adult life, I've sponsored children through Plan USA, and in visiting my "adopted" child in places like the Philippines and Sudan, I've seen how the kids' lives are transformed by American sponsors. Aid is no panacea, but it is a lifesaver.

So let's not shy away from a conversation about the effectiveness of aid. The problems are real, but so are the millions of people alive today who wouldn't be if not for aid. In the end, if we have tough conversations about foreign aid, then I believe Americans will acknowledge the challenges — and then, clear-eyed, agree to dig more deeply than ever, for that is simply the best way we have of asserting our own humanity.

DOJ_NMG_0033300

DOJ_NMG_0033301

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, JUNE 13, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

U.S. Government Defends Domestic Spying In Court In Detroit (FINDLAW/AP) ... 4
U.S. Asks Judge To Drop Suit On N.S.A. Spying (NYT) ... 4
Wiretap Suit All About Power (KRT) ... 5
Judge Hears Arguments On Domestic Spying (UPI) ... 6
Judges Press C.I.A. Lawyer Over Withheld Documents (NYT) ... 7
U.S. Distances Itself From Gitmo Remarks (AP) ... 8
State Department Tries To Distance Itself From Guantanamo Remark (KRT) ... 9
State Dept. Disavows Statement On Suicides (NYT) ... 10
Gitmo: Autopsies Complete, Analysis Underway (KRT) ... 11
Gitmo Detainee Was Cleared For Transfer (AP) ... 12
Independent Probe Urged For Suicides Of Detainees (WP) ... 13
Chinese Muslims Search For Sanctuary (WT) ... 13
Suicides Change Nothing (USAT) ... 14
Guantanamo Deaths Deepen Harm To U.S. Image Abroad (USAT) ... 15
The Gitmo Suicides (WSJ) ... 15
Religious Leaders Urge U.S. To Ban Torture (WP) ... 16
Terror Suspects Charge Abuse In Canada Prison (NYT) ... 16
Canada's Social Stance Is Tested By Arrests (WSJ) ... 17

Homeland Response:

Technologists Assail Federal Net-tapping Rules (CNET) ... 18
Air Marshals Warn Their Bullets Are Too Powerful (WT) ... 19
City Rethinking Security Plan After Cut In Homeland Aid (NYT) ... 20
Terrorist In A Bootleg T-shirt (LAT) ... 21
Alberto Prompts Evacuation On Fla. Coast (AP) ... 22
'The Storm Has Accelerated;' Landfall Expected At 8 A.m. (TALLDEM) ... 23
FEMA Stockpiles Supplies Ahead Of Alberto (AP) ... 23
Swift Evacuations Urged As Alberto Approaches (KRT) ... 24
Fla. Braces Itself As Alberto Rolls In (USAT) ... 25
Florida On Alert As Alberto Revs Up (ORS) ... 26
Storm Nears Hurricane Strength And The Gulf Coast Of Florida (NYT) ... 28
Florida Braces For Early-Arriving Alberto (WP) ... 28
Insurance Regulators Get Busy (USAT) ... 29
U.S. Gives Charter Schools A Big Push In New Orleans (NYT) ... 30
Police Struggles In New Orleans Raise Old Fears (NYT) ... 31
AFL-CIO Plans New Orleans Boom (USAT) ... 32
For Many Of Katrina's Young Victims, The Scars Are More Than Skin Deep (WP) ... 33
Clinton Links GOP Policies To More Storms (AP) ... 34
President Clinton Slams GOP In Orlando Speech (PALMBEACHP) ... 35

War News:

Bush: Zarqawi's Death "A Major Blow To Al Qaeda" (LAT) ... 36
Bush Confers Today With Iraqi Leaders (AJC) ... 36
White House Hones A Strategy For Post-Zarqawi Era (NYT) ... 37
Zarqawi Successor The New Target (WT) ... 38
Bush In Drive To Back Iraq Government (FT) ... 39
Bush Invites His Critics To A War Council At Camp David (KRT) ... 40
Officials Detail Zarqawi's Last Hour (WP) ... 41
Bush Reaches Out In Bid To Shed Go-it-alone Image (BOS) ... 43
Rove: Republicans Should Address Iraq War (AP) ... 44
Rove Defends Primary, And Says NH Still 'a Red State' (PNH) ... 45
Rove's Speech To N.H. Republicans Keeps To Partisan Line (WP) ... 45
Poll Sees A Boost For Bush, Iraq War (USAT) ... 46
Rare House Debate To Focus On Iraq War (WT) ... 47
The Iraq War Debate Reopens In Washington (CSM) ... 47
Bush: US Ready To Help New Iraq Gov't (AP) ... 48
Reid Tells Liberal Activists Troops Must Come Home (WT) ... 49
The Liberals' Lunch Special: Democratic Harmony (WP) ... 50
Blitz Against Al-Qaeda In Iraq Continues (USAT) ... 51
Al-Qaida In Iraq Names New Leader (AP) ... 52
A Jihadist Web Site Says Zarqawi's Group In Iraq Has A New Leader In Place (NYT) ... 53
Jordan Details Its Role In Finding Al-Zarqawi (LAT) ... 54
Zarqawi Is Dead. What Now? (WSJ) ... 56
Life During Wartime (NYT) ... 57
Legal Maneuver To Make A Point, An Army Officer Helps Iraqi Convict (WSJ) ... 58
Oil, Politics And Bloodshed Corrupt An Iraqi City (NYT) ... 61
Hussein Defense Witnesses Admit Lying (LAT) ... 63
37 Taliban Militants Killed In Afghanistan (USAT) ... 63
Inside The Afghan Drug Trade (CSM) ... 64
NATO Goes Global (WSJ) ... 67
Congress Yields To Pentagon On Army Pay Crunch (WSJ) ... 68
Pain Pump Tested In Battle (WSJ) ... 69
Race Is On For Next Generation Of Nuclear Weapons (LAT) ... 70

Corporate Scandals:

Former Interspeed Executive Convicted Of Fraud Charges (WSJ) ... 72
Monster Gets U.S. Subpoena In Widening Options Inquiry (WSJ) ... 73
Funds Sue Amid Probe Into Timing Of Options (FT) ... 74
Efficient Markets The Welfare Of American Investors (WSJ) ... 74
Outside Audit Big Pension Plans Are At Risk Of Losing Accounting Benefit (WSJ) ... 76

Criminal Law:

Gang Activity Cited For Jump In U.S. Homicides (USAT) ... 77
Violent Crime Rises In U.S. (WP) ... 78
Violent Crime Up For 1st Time In 5 Years (WP) ... 79
Violent Crime Rose In '05, With Murders Up By 4.8% (NYT) ... 80
Murder Rate Up In Small US Cities (FT) ... 80
U.S. Violent Crime Rises At Pace Unseen In 10 Years (NPR) ... 81
Crime Drops In L.A., Rises Nationally (LAT) ... 81
Violent Crime Increases In U.S. (WT) ... 82
FBI: Violent Crime Up Last Year In U.S. (UPI/UPI) ... 83
FBI: Violent Crime Up In Majority Of NJ's Biggest Cities (NSDY/AP) ... 83
Violent Crime Rises In U.S., But S. Florida Fares Better (MH) ... 83
Rapes Increase In Dayton, FBI Report Says (DDN) ... 84
Indy Crime Rate Mirrors Midwest Increases (WRTV-TV) ... 85
However Tallied, Minneapolis Crime Is Up (MINNST) ... 85
Violent Crime Jumps In Fort Collins (COLO) ... 86
Violent Crime Up Across Texas, But Down In Dallas (KTVT-TV) 87
Rapes On Decline In Seattle Area (KIRO-TV) ... 87
Katrina Evacuee Arrested In Killing (NSDY/AP) ... 87
Washington Wire (WSJ) ... 88
Part Of Charge Vs. Ex-Bush Official Tossed (AP-Y2) ... 88
Safavian Case Goes To Jurors (WP) ... 89
Judge Lets Stand Major Charges Against Ex-Aide (NYT) ... 89
Shadegg's Memo Stokes Fight On Pork (HILL) ... 90
Texas Death Penalty Case Headed For Possible Fourth Trial (AP) ... 91
U Of U Professor Knows Location Of Documents FBI Wants (KSL-T V) ... 92
Utahn Keeps Watch Over Jack Anderson Papers (DESERET) ... 92
Supreme Court Allows Fresh Evidence In Death Case (FINDLAW/AP) ... 93
Supreme Court Allows Challenges To Lethal Injections (LAW) ... 93
Widening The Gateway (WP) ... 94
Lifesaving Evidence (LAT) ... 95
Death Row Inmates Can Pursue Appeals (FT) ... 96
High Court Rulings Chip At Death Penalty (USAT) ... 96
Supreme Court Assists Death Row Challengers (LAT) ... 97
High Court Keeps Door Open To Death-penalty Lawsuits (CSM) 98
Justices Open Door For Injection Case (WP) ... 98
Prisoners Gain In Suit Attacking Lethal Injection (NYT) ... 99
A 'Right' Way To Kill Someone? (USAT) ... 100
Ex-FBI Agent Tells Of '81 Probe (BOS) ... 101
FBI Knew Agents Had Mob Pals (BOSH) ... 102
Police Seek Suspect In Shooting Of Nevada Judge, Later Slaying Across Town (LAW/AP) ... 103
Judge Is Hurt In Shooting At A Court In Nevada (NYT) ... 103
Official Convicted In Travel Deal (MJS) ... 104
Jury Convicts Wisonsin Official Of Fraud (STPPP) ... 105
Witness: City Aide Told Me To Lie (CHIST) ... 106
Witness: FBI Asked About Mayor's Brother (CHIT) ... 107
Former West Mifflin Police Chief Pleads Guilty To Drug Charges (PPG) ... 108
Former Police Chief Pleads Guilty To Drug Charges (PTR) ... 109
Suburban Pittsburgh Police Chief Pleads Guilty To Drug Charges (TLPA) ... 109
Two Sentenced For Fraudulent Gold-silver Sales Scam (MH) ... 109
FBI Eyes Purported Tape Of American Teen's West Bank Boyfriend (FINDLAW/AP) ... 110
GPS Will Track Sex Offenders (WT) ... 111
Improvements In Registry Announced (WP) ... 111
Defense In Hollywood Wiretaps Case Demands Prosecution Evidence (CCT) ... 112
Dispute Over Evidence In Pellicano Wiretap Case (NYT) ... 112
Many Of Pellicano's Recordings Still Secret (LAT) ... 114
He's No Angel, He's A Private Investigator (LAT) ... 115

Civil Law:

High Court Reins In RICO (LAW) ... 118

Civil Rights:

11th Circuit Upholds Firing Of Fla. Deputies Who Appeared In Online Porn (LAW) ... 120
Flag-desecration Amendment Needs 1 More Vote (USAT) ... 122

Antitrust:

Third Trader Pleads Guilty To Manipulating Natural Gas Price (SDUT/AP) ... 122
AGs Want Bush Administration To Get Tough On Gas Prices (AP) ... 123
Barr Settles Novartis Suit, Sees Charge (AP) ... 123
Mittal Refuses To Raise Arcelor Bid Staff And Agencies (AP) ... 124
European Union Takes First Steps To Include Turkey And Croatia (NYT) ... 124
Mirant Rescinds Unsolicited Bid To Acquire NRG (WSJ) ... 125
Zale Ends Merger Talks With Signet (WSJ) ... 126
BBVA Carves Out Niche In U.S.-to-Mexico Payments (WSJ) ... 126
RIAA Chief Says Illegal Song-sharing 'contained' (USAT) ... 127
German Authorities Examine Web Rights Deal (AP) ... 128

Environment:

Pipe Company Executive Gets Prison For Rigging Pollution Test (AP) ... 128
EPA Rule Loosened After Oil Chief's Letter To Rove (LAT) ... 129
Dirk Kempthorne Arrives (NYT) ... 131

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Four Face Drug Charges (HARTC) ... 131
Prescription Drugs Find Place In Teen Culture (USAT) ... 132
The Ground War Against Meth (ADW) ... 134
Baseball Suspends Grimsley For 50 Games (AP) ... 135

D'backs Issue No-tolerance Stand On Grimsley Flap (USAT) .. 136
Meth Takes A Toll On Indian Reservations (AP) 137
Suspected Militants Killed In Afghanistan (AP) 138
US Says Drug Lords Fuel Afghan Insurgency (VOA) 139
Feds Run Trash Hauling In Largest-ever Conn. Business Takeover (AP) 139
Bomb Suspect's Shirt Does The Talking (WP) 140

Immigration:

House Republicans Hit Senate Immigration Bill (WT) 140
Immigration Takes Center Stage In Colorado (USAT) 141

Tax:

Nevada Man Gets 54 Months For Trust Scheme (WEBCPA)... 142
Estate-Tax Repeal Would Hurt The 'Small Rich' (WP) 143
The Everything Commission (WP) 144

Congress-Administration:

Necessary Spending Or Political Trap? (WP) 144
Dealt A Difficult Hand, Trade Official Presses On (WP) 145
Bush Is Told To Defend Bloch's Back (HILL) 146
A Bush Aide's Blunt Words (WP) 147
U.S. Budget Gap Shrinks On Surge In Tax Receipts (WSJ) 149
Lobbyists Paid For Members' Trips (HILL) 150
Someone Has To Find Facts In Paris (NYT) 150
Pelosi Takes Case To Black Media (RC) 150
Jefferson Showdown Hurts Only Democrats (USAT) 151
Hoyer Marshals Forces (HILL) 152
Pelosi Mum On Murtha's Move (RC) 153
Democrats Set To Unveil Domestic Platform For '06 (RC) 154
Pelosi: It's Definition Time For Democrats (HILL) 155
Agency Informs Workers About Data Theft (AP-Y2) 157
Senator Wants Raise-for-Performance Pay System (WP) 158
Byrd Truly The Elder Statesman (WP) 159
The Reliable Source (WP) 159
A Federal Office Where Heraldry Of Yore Is Only Yesterday (NYT) 160
Correcting The Hayden Record (WSJ) 161

Other News:

Broad Economic Worries Drive A Global Sell-Off (NYT) 162
Dow Industrials Tumble 99.34 Points As Rate Worries Continue To Take Toll (WSJ) 163
S& P 500 Tumbles To A 7-Month Low As Once-Key Sectors Fall Out Of Favor (WP) 164
Nasdaq Arrives In Correction Zone (USAT) 165
Fed Officials Reveal More Worries About Inflation (USAT) 165
Mr. Dummar Is Back, Taking Another Shot At The Hughes Estate (WSJ) 166
Getty Book Deal Led To Questions Of Conflict (LAT) 168
Webb, Miller Refuel The Fires (WP) 171
A Clash Of Styles In Virginia Vote (USAT) 172
Will State Democrats Back D.C.'s Horse? (CSM) 173
The Sway Of Senate Leaders Is Put To The Test In Virgina (HILL) 174
Schumer Gets Cold Shoulder For Endorsement (WP) 175
Miller, Webb Await Verdict In Primary (WT) 176
A Week Of Blessings For A GOP Majority That Needed Them (RC) 176
Texas Democrat Faces Uphill Fight (WT) 177
'08 Hopefuls May Cause Leaders Fits (RC) 178
In Kansas, A Troubling Fissure For GOP (LAT) 180
Area Candidates Embrace A Visit By Laura Bush (PHI) 181
More Adults Are Finding Time To Volunteer (WT) 182
Getting Punitive (WSJ) 183
Nuclear Monitor Says Iran Fails To Provide Data (NYT) 183
ElBaradei Sees U.S.-Iran Talks As Ending Stalemate (BLOOM)184
Japan Wary Of Plan For Sanctions Against Iran (WP) 185
China Opposed To Joint Statement On Iran (AP) 186
U.S. Approach To Iran Has A Familiar Ring (WSJ) 187
Welcome To The Bazaar (NYT) 188
Violence Erupts Between Fatah And Hamas (NYT) 189
Hamas Gunmen Rampage Through Ramallah (FT) 191
Palestinian Security Men Go On Rampage (AP) 191
Fatah Gunmen Go On Rampage In West Bank (CHIT) 192
Fatah Officers Attack Hamas Sites In West Bank (WP) 193
Violence Strains Informal Cease-Fire (WT) 194
Blair Urges Negotiated Mideast Solution (FT) 195
Olmert Won't Rule Out Unilateral Action (AP) 196
North Korea Flexes Missile Muscle To Grab US Attention (AFP)196
Senator Scolds U.N.'s No. 2 For Snub (WT) 197
Cuba Cuts Off Power To U.S. Mission (AP) 198
U.S. Mission Hit By Power Failure, Water Shortage (WT) 198
Leader Of Islamic Forces In Somalia Seeks "Understanding" With U.S. (KRT) 199
Setback In Somalia (WT) 200
Indonesia Lacks Funds To Fight Flu, World Bank Says (AP) ... 201
Bumpy Ride As China's Auto Market Booms, Leaders Clash Over Heavy Toll (WSJ) 201
Russian Party Asks Young: Who Wants To Be A Deputy? (WP)203
The Wrong Way To Sway Egypt (WP) 205
Foreign Aid Has Flaws. So What? (NYT) 206

DOJ_NMG_0033304

TERRORISM NEWS:

U.S. Government Defends Domestic Spying In Court In Detroit (FINDLAW/AP)

By Sarah Karush, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 13, 2006

(AP) - DETROIT-The U.S. government defended warrantless domestic surveillance in court for the first time Monday, saying the program is well within the president's authority but arguing that it would require revealing state secrets to prove that point.

U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit heard arguments in a case brought by the American Civil Liberties Union against the National Security Agency. The ACLU is asking for an immediate halt to the program, arguing that it violates the rights to free speech and privacy.

The Bush administration has asked Taylor to dismiss the lawsuit on state-secrets grounds.

The ACLU says the Bush administration already has publicly revealed enough information about the program for Taylor to rule it is illegal.

But government attorney Anthony J. Coppolino told Taylor on Monday that the case cannot be decided based on a "scant public record."

"This case does not involve easy questions," he said. "It's a case that requires a robust factual record."

Coppolino alluded several times to a classified court filing, which Taylor indicated she had not yet reviewed. In that brief, "we demonstrate that it (the program) is narrowly and specifically focused on al-Qaida," he said.

The plaintiffs do not have access to the classified brief, and Taylor would have to make a special request and travel to Washington to read it, said Ann Beeson, the ACLU's associate legal director and the lead attorney for the plaintiffs.

The administration has acknowledged eavesdropping on Americans' international communications without first seeking court approval. President George W. Bush has said the eavesdropping is legal because of a congressional resolution passed after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks that authorized him to use force in the fight against terrorism.

The parties in the ACLU lawsuit, who include journalists, scholars and lawyers, say the program has hampered their ability to do their jobs because it has made international contacts, such as sources and potential witnesses, wary of sharing information over the phone.

Monday's hearing was the first time the issues were argued in court. A similar lawsuit has filed in federal court in New York by the Center for Constitutional Rights, but no hearings have been held there yet.

U.S. Asks Judge To Drop Suit On N.S.A. Spying (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

DETROIT, June 12 — A National Security Agency program that listens in on international communications involving people in the United States is both vital to national security and permitted by the Constitution, a government lawyer told a judge here today in the first major court argument on the program.

But, the lawyer went on, addressing Judge Anna Diggs Taylor of the Federal District Court, "the evidence we need to demonstrate to you that it lawful cannot be disclosed without that process itself causing grave harm to United States national security."

The only solution to this impasse, the lawyer, Anthony J. Coppolino, said, was for Judge Taylor to dismiss the lawsuit before her, an American Civil Liberties Union challenge to the eavesdropping program, under the state secrets privilege. The privilege can limit and even extinguish cases that would reveal national security information, and it is fast becoming one of the Justice Department's favorite tools in defending court challenges to its efforts to combat terrorism.

The Detroit case was filed in January on behalf of journalists, scholars, lawyers and nonprofit organizations who contended that the possibility of government eavesdropping interfered with their work. In remarks to reporters after the 90-minute argument, Anthony D. Romero, the A.C.L.U.'s executive director, called the government's invocation of the state secrets privilege "Orwellian doublespeak."

"They argued essentially that the N.S.A. program was off-limits to judicial review," Mr. Romero said.

DOJ_NMG_0033305

The small courtroom was jammed for the argument, with a dozen people standing in the aisles and journalists sitting in the jury box.

In her presentation, Ann Beeson, the A.C.L.U.'s associate legal director, asked Judge Taylor to shut down the surveillance program based on publicly available information.

The case boiled down to two legal questions, Ms. Beeson said. The first is whether the plaintiffs have suffered the sort of direct injury necessary to establish that they have standing to bring suit. The second is whether President Bush was authorized by Congress or by the Constitution to violate the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, a 1978 law that forbids surveillance of people inside the United States without a warrant.

The Bush administration has acknowledged that it has not complied with the law but has said that a Congressional authorization in 2001 to use military force against Al Qaeda and the president's inherent constitutional powers allowed him to violate it.

The government's main argument today, repeated numerous times, was that more facts are required in the case but that more facts cannot be disclosed. Judge Taylor asked few questions but at one point appeared frustrated by this approach.

"You have conceded, have you not, that a program has been authorized?" she asked Mr. Coppolino. He responded that the administration's public defense of the program has been too general to serve as the basis for judicial adjudication. "There is very much a difference," Mr. Coppolino said, "between the existence of an activity and the details of that activity."

Even portions of the government's brief that were said to demonstrate why further information about the program cannot be disclosed have not been filed in court. Instead, the government "lodged" the brief and other classified papers at the Justice Department in Washington, inviting Judge Taylor to make arrangements to see them. At today's hearing, she shook her head no when Mr. Coppolino asked her whether she had "had a chance to review our classified submission."

Judge Taylor has scheduled a separate argument next month to consider the government's motion to dismiss the case based on the state secrets privilege. While she could theoretically rule on the plaintiffs' request to block the program before then, she is more likely to consider the two motions simultaneously.

Calling the plaintiffs' position extreme, Mr. Coppolino said the 1978 law cannot constitutionally constrain the president when the nation's safety is at risk.

"The president's constitutional power doesn't simply disappear when Congress enacts a statute," Mr. Coppolino said. "Surveillance of an enemy is indeed a necessary incident of war."

Ms. Beeson said the 1978 law, often called FISA, gave the president all the flexibility he needed. "If FISA didn't work," she said, "the proper procedure under our constitutional system was for the president to go back to Congress and ask it to amend the law."

"Our constitutional system was set up to require the president to follow the law just like anyone else," she added. "If our view of the separation of powers is extreme, then the Constitution is extreme."

Mr. Coppolino also argued that the plaintiffs were not entitled to sue in the first place because they cannot show they have been injured. "You don't get standing," he said, "simply because you say the president has a program and I think it might cover me."

Ms. Beeson countered that her clients have suffered concrete harms. "Journalists' sources have dried up," she said. And lawyers for people suspected of terrorism have had to resort to alternatives to phone calls and e-mails to ensure the confidentiality of their communications, she said. "They have had to make expensive oversees trips to gather evidence," Ms. Beeson said.

Mr. Coppolino said the government is not able clarify whether the plaintiffs' fears are justified. "The government cannot confirm or deny whether a particular individual is subject to surveillance or what the criteria is," he said. "Indicating that someone is not subject to surveillance is itself revealing."

Mr. Coppolino indicated that some plaintiffs may have more reason to be concerned than others. Lawyers who represent suspected terrorists, he said, "come closer to being in the ballpark of the terrorist surveillance program."

But here too, he said, "the critical facts necessary to adjudicate" the standing question "are subject to the state secrets privilege."

As Ms. Beeson concluded her argument, which had been uninterrupted by questions, Judge Taylor called her back to the lectern. "Talk about standing some more," Judge Taylor said, perhaps identifying the part of the plaintiffs' case she considered the most difficult.

Wiretap Suit All About Power (KRT)

By Niraj Warikoo, Detroit Free Press

Knight Ridder, June 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033306

DETROIT - In vigorous arguments that offered clashing views on the limits of state authority, the U.S. Justice Department and civil rights advocates squared off in a packed Detroit courtroom for a hearing on whether the government's domestic surveillance program violates the U.S. Constitution.

The talk inside U.S. District Court on Monday morning went to the core of what should define American government and was followed across the country by legislators and citizens debating an essential question: How much power should the president have?

Making its case in court for the first time, the government argued that the president needs as much power as necessary to secure the country, especially as al-Qaida continues to threaten the United States with terrorist attacks. But an attorney with the American Civil Liberties Union said that President Bush can't violate the law while trying to protect the country.

The federal judge hearing the case, U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor, set July 10 as the next court date to address the government's state secret arguments. Taylor did not say when she might make a ruling.

An attorney with the Justice Department, Tony Coppolino, cited the actions of past presidents during war as precedents.

He told the court that a congressional resolution approved following the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks allowed Bush to authorize wiretaps. But Coppolino stopped short of describing how the program operates, saying that doing so would reveal national security secrets and help the country's enemies. Thus, he said Monday, the case should be dismissed.

Bush is permitted to take "all necessary and appropriate means" to defend Americans, Coppolino said. Referring to the actions of former Presidents Woodrow Wilson and Franklin D. Roosevelt during World Wars I and II, Coppolino added: "You need to know what the enemy is doing in the United States."

Coppolino repeatedly referred to al-Qaida during his 50-minute talk, saying that the terrorist group "attacked and killed thousands" and "threatens to attack us again."

For that reason, he said, the U.S. government must be allowed to eavesdrop on the phone calls and e-mails of Americans in some cases.

He stressed that any surveillance is "narrowly and specifically focused on al-Qaida."

It was standing room only inside the courtroom, as attorneys, civil rights advocates, local Muslims and journalists crowded inside for a hearing that advocates say is the first on the constitutionality of the National Security Agency's eavesdropping program. The program has come under fire from a number of civil liberties groups.

In January, the American Civil Liberties Unions, local Muslims and a host of other groups and individuals filed a suit against the federal agency for eavesdropping on Americans without court approval. They argue that the government must seek approval for eavesdropping from courts under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

The act was passed in 1978 following criticism of the Nixon administration for how it used executive powers during Watergate and the Vietnam War.

Speaking first in court Monday, Ann Beeson, associate legal director for the ACLU, said that the government has the right to conduct surveillance under FISA, as long as it gets court approval.

But instead of following FISA, Bush "broke the law" and allowed a new program that violated the Constitution.

In her arguments, Beeson said that "electronic surveillance is akin to a dragnet."

Both sides invoked American history in its arguments. While Coppolino said that previous U.S. presidents used domestic surveillance, Beeson said that the country's founding fathers would be opposed to Bush's plan.

Beeson cited the abuses of British King George III in the 18th century in arguing that the government often misuses blanket authority "to spy on political dissenters."

Beeson argued partly on behalf of local Muslims, who say they fear that their communications are being monitored.

Nazih Hassan of Ypsilanti, Mich., is a plaintiff in the case and a member of the Michigan chapter of the Council on American-Islamic Relations, which also is part of the suit.

Hassan, who attended the hearing, criticized the government's stance at a news conference held by the ACLU outside the courthouse. Attorneys spoke to a throng of media outlets about their concerns.

Hassan has said that he fears the government may be targeting him because he was friends with Rabih Haddad, an Ann Arbor, Mich., Muslim leader who the government says associated with al-Qaida while spending time in Pakistan. The government never filed terrorism charges against Haddad but deported him to Lebanon in 2003 on immigration violations.

The government said Monday that the lawsuit can't be fully addressed in open court because it would require a full airing of facts. But doing that would reveal national security secrets. The government has filed a classified brief in the case, which Coppolino would not disclose. According to ACLU attorneys, the filing is in a secret location in Washington, D.C.

Judge Hears Arguments On Domestic Spying (UPI)

UPI, June 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033307

A U.S. Justice Department lawyer argued Monday in Detroit that the Bush administration's domestic wiretapping is too sensitive to be defended in open court.

U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor heard arguments in a suit over the controversial National Security Administration program, The New York Times reported. The American Civil Liberties Union argues that the program violates the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which set up a procedure for judicial oversight of wiretaps in sensitive security cases, provides adequate protection for law enforcement and the public.

Anthony Coppolino, a lawyer with the department's civil division, said that the government's inability to provide public evidence to defend the program is an argument for dismissal, the Times reported. The Justice Department has not filed classified portions of its briefs with the court, saying that the judge must make special arrangements to read them.

The evidence that would demonstrate the program is legal is so sensitive that it "cannot be disclosed without that process itself causing grave harm to United States national security," Coppolino said.

The judge scheduled a hearing for July.

Judges Press C.I.A. Lawyer Over Withheld Documents (NYT)

By Anemona Hartocollis

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

A federal appeals court panel in Manhattan questioned a lawyer for the federal government yesterday as to whether the Central Intelligence Agency had a legitimate national security interest in refusing to confirm or deny the existence of documents authorizing it to detain and interrogate terrorism suspects overseas.

The tough questioning came in oral arguments by the American Civil Liberties Union and lawyers for the C.I.A. before the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. The civil liberties group is trying to force the C.I.A. to disclose how much authority it has been given to interrogate detainees since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Through the Freedom of Information Act, the A.C.L.U. is seeking documents, including a directive said to have been signed by President Bush, giving the agency the authority to set up detention sites outside the United States and to interrogate prisoners. In its lawsuit, the group says the existence of these documents has been hinted at in news reports.

But the government has refused to confirm or deny the documents' existence, saying that to do so would jeopardize national security by revealing C.I.A. methods and activities. Last September, Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein of Federal District Court upheld that position, and yesterday's hearing was part of the A.C.L.U.'s appeal of his ruling.

The three-judge appeals panel seemed divided on the issue, with Judge John Gleeson asking the most forceful questions of the government lawyer, Peter Skinner. Judge Gleeson seemed to be trying to determine whether the A.C.L.U. was right in contending that the agency was acting to avoid political embarrassment, rather than out of national security interest.

The judge asked Mr. Skinner whether the C.I.A.'s position had "shifted a little bit" during the litigation. Initially, Judge Gleeson said, the government seemed to be refusing to disclose even whether the C.I.A. had an "interest" in the questioning of detainees abroad.

Now, he said, the C.I.A. seemed to be admitting it had an interest in helping other agencies question detainees. The government was arguing, he said, that the C.I.A. wanted to safeguard information about whether it had been granted any independent authority to set up detention centers and interrogate prisoners.

"Independent engagement as opposed to helping out other agencies," Judge Gleeson said.

Mr. Skinner denied that the government had shifted its argument, though he suggested that it had clarified it. The C.I.A., he said, acknowledged all along that it had helped other agencies in interrogations and that when it did so, it was governed by Justice Department rules.

But, Mr. Skinner said, the agency "never acknowledged an interest or ability to go beyond those legal limitations" and was not going to do so now.

Megan Lewis, the lawyer for the A.C.L.U., argued that any information that would be revealed by merely acknowledging the existence of the documents would be so general that it would not jeopardize national security or betray specific intelligence-gathering methods. To argue otherwise, Ms. Lewis said, is "tantamount to the C.I.A. attempting to deny its interest in spying."

Outside court later, she said the documents, if they existed — "and I believe they do" — might be revealing, but "that's another fight for another day."

The A.C.L.U. seeks disclosure of two documents. One is said to be a Justice Department memorandum "specifying interrogation methods that the C.I.A. may use against top Al Qaeda members." The second is the directive said to be signed by Mr. Bush authorizing the agency to set up detention facilities outside the United States "and/or outlining interrogation methods that may be used against detainees."

DOJ_NMG_0033308

Although oral arguments in the appeals court are often delivered in legal shorthand, yesterday's seemed even more opaque than usual. Almost apologetically, Mr. Skinner told the judges he was "somewhat constrained" in his ability to explain his argument and "connect the dots" because some of the C.I.A.'s reasoning in the case was classified.

The agency has submitted papers to the court that even the plaintiffs have not been allowed to see.

As the hearing came to a close, Judge Joseph M. McLaughlin made a joke about the obscurity, quoting a Jesuit logician, Father John Gerard, who in 1597 told a British interrogator: "I do not know where he is. But if I did, I could not and would not tell you."

The Jesuit doctrine of equivocation, Judge McLaughlin said, "lives on."

U.S. Distances Itself From Gitmo Remarks (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, June 12, 2006

The Bush administration distanced itself Monday from remarks by a U.S. diplomat that the weekend suicides of three Arab detainees at the Guantanamo Bay military prison were a "good P.R. move."

"I would just point out in public that we would not say that it was a P.R. stunt," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, using the abbreviation for public relations. "We have serious concerns anytime anybody takes their own life."

Colleen Graffy, deputy assistant U.S. secretary of state for public diplomacy, told the British Broadcasting Corp. that the deaths at the U.S.-run camp in Cuba were a "good P.R. move to draw attention."

Graffy also told the BBC the deaths were "a tactic to further the jihadi cause."

Graffy's unscripted remarks threw a monkey wrench in the administration's careful plan to demonstrate concern over the deaths and respond to rising criticism of the U.S. operation of the prison.

Bush expressed "serious concern" Saturday over the suicides, and he directed an aggressive effort by his administration to reach out diplomatically while it investigates.

"He wants to make sure that this thing is done right from all points of view," White House press secretary Tony Snow said Saturday evening.

Graffy's boss, Undersecretary of State Karen Hughes, is charged with improving the U.S. image in the Arab world. The former White House communications adviser and longtime Bush aide heads an office at the State Department that monitors and quickly responds to inaccurate or distorted portrayals of U.S. views and actions in the Arab media.

Graffy's remarks were quickly picked up in the Arab press.

"Her comments quickly appeared to be bad P.R. moves for the U.S. administration," an article on the Web site of Lebanon's The Daily Star newspaper said.

Two Saudis and one Yemeni hanged themselves Saturday, the first successful suicides at the base after dozens of attempts.

Military officials said the suicides were coordinated acts of protest, but human rights activists and defense attorneys said the deaths signaled the desperation of many of the 460 detainees held on suspicion of links to al-Qaida and the Taliban.

Only 10 detainees have been charged with crimes after more than four years behind bars. The Supreme Court is expected to rule this month on whether President Bush overstepped his power in setting up war crimes trials for those detainees.

The administration's controversial detentions at Guantanamo Bay are a point of contention between the United States and many of its allies in Europe and the Mideast, and the suicides renewed international pressure to shut the prison.

The European Union on Monday called the Guantanamo Bay detention center an "anomaly," and said it would urge Bush to shut it down when he comes to Europe for a trans-Atlantic summit next week.

"Humanitarian standards and human rights have to be observed" in the fight against terrorism, Austrian Foreign Minister Ursula Plassnik told reporters. "For the United States, a country committed to freedom, the rule of law and due process, this is an anomaly."

A group of prominent religious leaders endorsed a statement, which is set to appear in The New York Times on Tuesday, protesting any American use of torture as "morally intolerable." The White House has said the U.S. does not condone or practice torture.

"Nothing less is at stake in the torture abuse crisis than the soul of our nation," the ad reads. "Let America abolish torture now — without exceptions."

Among the signers to the statement are the Rev. Ted Haggard, president of the National Association of Evangelicals; the Rev. Rick Warren, author of "The Purpose Driven Life"; and retiring Roman Catholic Cardinal Theodore McCarrick. Organizers say former President Jimmy Carter has also signed onto the ad, along with several Jewish, Muslim and black leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0033309

Also, the American Medical Association said Monday the direct involvement of doctors in prisoner interrogation is unethical and violates their oath to do no harm.

"Physicians in all circumstances must never be involved in activities that are physically or mentally coercive. If physicians engage in such activities, the whole profession is tainted," according to the new policy adopted by delegates at the AMA's annual meeting.

The suicides prompted an extraordinary round of global outreach by officials from the White House's National Security Council, the State Department and Bush's congressional liaisons.

Within hours of the deaths, the Bush administration had contacted the United Nations, the European Union, most European nations individually, the embassies of Mideast and near-Mideast countries, the International Committee of the Red Cross, bipartisan members of the congressional leadership and the ranking Republican and Democratic members of the House and Senate Foreign Relations and Intelligence committees, Snow said.

Graffy's remarks were sharper than those of other U.S. officials, but not entirely off-message. The camp commander at Guantanamo, Rear Adm. Harry Harris, told reporters Sunday that the detainees "have no regard for human life, neither ours nor their own."

"I believe this was not an act of desperation but an act of asymmetric warfare against us," Harris said.

State Department Tries To Distance Itself From Guantanamo Remark (KRT)

By Carol Rosenberg, Lesley Clark

Knight Ridder, June 12, 2006

GUANTANAMO BAY NAVY BASE, Cuba - The State Department attempted to distance itself Monday from one of its own officials, who called the suicides by three detainees at the U.S. terror prison "a good PR move to draw attention."

Colleen Graffy, the deputy assistant secretary of state for public diplomacy, whose job involves improving U.S. public relations, especially in the Muslim world, made the comment Sunday in a British Broadcasting Corp. interview.

She called the suicides "a tactic to further the jihadi cause," the BBC reported.

"I would not characterize it as a PR stunt," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Monday in reply to a reporter's question at the daily news briefing. "We have serious concern any time anybody takes their own life."

Even before the suicides, the European Union and individual countries, including Britain, had called on the United States to close the prison. About 460 prisoners are in custody at Guantanamo as "enemy combatants," a category that the Bush administration created and isn't covered by international agreements on the treatment of prisoners of war.

Civilian defense lawyers have described Guantanamo captives held for more than four years as increasingly desperate. They say the detainees have few ways, other than to harm themselves, to protest their indefinite confinement.

Ali Abdullah Ahmed of Yemen and Mani Shaman Turki al-Habardi al-Utaybi and Yassar Talal al-Zahrani of Saudi Arabia hanged themselves at the remote island prison early Saturday.

The Pentagon said in a news release Monday that Ahmed was "a mid- to high-level al-Qaida operative," Utaybi was a member of the al-Qaida-linked militant group Jama'at Tabligh and other Islamist terrorist groups, and Zahrani was a Taliban fighter.

The prison camp's spokesman said a team of military pathologists had completed autopsies of the three men on Sunday.

"The bodies are now in the morgue at the naval hospital in Guantanamo, and they are being handled with great reverence and respect and observance of the Islamic rules with regard to the handling of the deceased," said the spokesman, Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand.

A Muslim chaplain, Navy Lt. Abuhena Saiful Islam, said the bodies would be washed, wrapped in white shrouds and placed in coffins facing the direction of Mecca. Prayers would be said.

U.S. diplomats were negotiating with Saudi Arabia and Yemen on whether the bodies would be sent to their homelands for burial. Military sources said repatriation was likely.

It wasn't known whether the three men were among the 25 percent of detainees being regularly interrogated at this remote, offshore Navy base.

The military said none of the three men who killed themselves had lawyers, and none had been charged with war crimes.

Also, none had "ongoing psychological illness" or was taking prescription drugs, said the Pentagon's top medical professional, Dr. William Winkenwerder Jr., the assistant secretary of defense for health affairs.

The deaths added fuel to international calls that the Bush administration close the offshore detention and interrogation center.

Attorneys at the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents many of the detainees, argued that the interrogation methods and the indeterminate detentions were causing the men to try to kill themselves.

DOJ_NMG_0033310

They presented reporters with a timeline of efforts they made to see that the detainees received some sort of physical or psychiatric medical care.

The Bush administration rejected most of the efforts, attorney Gitanjali Gutierrez said.

"The deaths over the weekend came as absolutely no surprises to the attorneys," she said, adding that the center has been working since February 2002 "to get the military to concern itself with mental health and living conditions."

"The notion that (the detainees) had the ability to protest, to raise concerns, is unfounded," she said. Lawyers had met with 130 of the detainees as of January and the "vast majority have no access to any outside counsel."

"They are entering their fifth year of imprisonment, held in isolation," she said. "The amount of psychiatric stress cannot be underestimated." She called the uncertainty over their fates "unacceptable" under U.S. law and basic civil rights.

The American Civil Liberties Union called for an independent investigation of the detainees' suicides and conditions at the prison.

"The shroud of secrecy surrounding Guantanamo Bay must be lifted, with independent access to and monitoring of the facilities on an ongoing basis," said ACLU Executive Director Anthony Romero. "This monitoring should include the medical treatment of detainees, especially those who have chosen to engage in hunger-striking as a way to draw attention to their conditions of confinement."

Leonard Rubenstein, the director of Physicians for Human Rights, said his group had asked the government to allow for independent medical evaluations - "the kind we conduct in all kinds of other countries" - but the request was ignored.

Josh Colangelo-Bryan, an attorney for detainee Jumah Al Dossari, who has repeatedly attempted suicide, said Dossari was often despondent and held in isolation for extended times.

Dossari had described being interrogated while wrapped in an Israeli flag and questioned as a female interrogator wiped menstrual blood on his face, he said.

At one point, Colangelo-Bryan said his client asked him, "What do I do to keep myself from going crazy here?"

State Dept. Disavows Statement On Suicides (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 12 — The Bush administration distanced itself on Monday from comments by a State Department official that the suicides of three prisoners at the military prison at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, were a "good P.R. move."

The official, Colleen P. Graffy, deputy assistant secretary of state for public diplomacy, made the comments in an interview on the British Broadcasting Corporation program "Newshour" on Sunday, a day after two Saudis and a Yemeni hanged themselves in their cells.

"Taking their own lives was not necessary, but it certainly is a good P.R. move," Ms. Graffy said. "It does sound like this is part of a strategy — in that they don't value their own lives, and they certainly don't value ours; and they use suicide bombings as a tactic."

But the State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, told reporters at the department's daily briefing on Monday, "I would just point out in public that we would not say that it was a P.R. stunt."

Mr. McCormack noted that President Bush had said he "had serious concerns about what had happened."

Ms. Graffy, a former law professor at Pepperdine University, works in the Bureau of European and Eurasian Affairs at the State Department with Karen P. Hughes, under secretary of state for public diplomacy, on improving the United States' image abroad, especially in Islamic countries, according to her biography on the State Department Web site.

Officials said it was unlikely Ms. Graffy would be reprimanded.

Her comments parallel those made by some White House officials, who portrayed the suicides in recent days as the acts of unrepentant jihadists, and Rear Adm. Harry Harris, the commander of the prison camp, who told reporters on Saturday that the suicides were acts of "asymmetric warfare."

He added, "They carry out individual acts of violence against others when they can and against themselves, in the name of jihad."

Barbara Olshansky, a lawyer with the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents many Guantánamo prisoners, said Monday, "When somebody has no recourse at all, they have no way of talking to anybody and the only statement they can make is to take their own life, I can't imagine that is a P.R. stunt."

State Department officials are talking with the Saudi and Yemeni governments about arrangements for returning the bodies. The Pentagon said that there had been 41 suicide attempts by about 25 detainees before this weekend, but that American medical personnel were able to save them.

DOJ_NMG_0033311

Gitmo: Autopsies Complete, Analysis Underway (KRT)

By Carol Rosenberg And Lesley Clark

Knight Ridder, June 12, 2006

GUANTANAMO BAY NAVY BASE, Cuba -- Military pathologists have completed clinical autopsies of the three captives who hanged themselves over the weekend inside their cells at this offshore detention center, the military announced this afternoon.

"Now it's the analytical part of the autopsy, compiling the report and making conclusions," said Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand, prison spokesman, adding the team of medical examiners from the Armed Forces Institute of Pathology arrived Saturday and departed Sunday.

Army Gen. Bantz Craddock, commander of the U.S. Southern Command based in Miami, toured the terror prison here on Sunday and declared the autopsies underway, as well as an internal examination by the Navy Criminal Investigative Services.

Guards found two Saudis and a Yemeni hanging in their cells at Camp 1 long before dawn on Saturday, officials said. The military said they fashioned nooses from their bedsheets in what the prison camps commander, Rear Adm. Harry Harris, called ``an act of asymmetrical warfare waged against us."

Civilian defense lawyers have described increasing desperation by captives held for more than four years here. They say the detainees have few ways -- other than to harm themselves -- to protest their indefinite confinement.

"The deaths over the weekend came as absolutely no surprises to the attorneys," Gitanjali Gutierrez of the Center for Constitutional Rights told reporters in Washington.

She said the center, which coordinates some captives' federal habeas corpus petitions, has worked since February 2002 ``to get the military to concern itself with mental health and living conditions."

Lawyers for some of the detainees held a news conference in Washington to urge closure of this prison camp in light of the weekend suicides.

No timeline was available today on when the autopsy results might be made public.

A Muslim Navy cleric arrived from Quantico, Va., Sunday and as of today was working with other Muslim military employees to make sure the bodies of the deceased captives were receiving proper Muslim rites and preparation.

"The bodies are now in the morgue at the naval hospital in Guantánamo and they are being handled with great reverence and respect and observance of the Islamic rules with regard to the handling of the deceased," said Durand.

At the same time, U.S. diplomats were negotiating with Saudi Arabia and Yemen on whether they would be sent to their homelands for burial.

Military sources say repatriation is likely.

The Muslim chaplain, Navy Lt. Abuhena Saiful Islam, said the bodies would be washed, wrapped in white shrouds and placed in a coffin here, facing the direction of Mecca. Prayers would also be said, according to Saiful Islam, who is an imam, a Muslim prayer leader.

Commanders would decide whether fellow detainees would be able to participate in the prayers, he added.

Sunday night, the Pentagon issued a release that described the three men as captured in Afghanistan, two with ties to al Qaeda and the third as a Taliban fighter.

One, Ali Abdullah Ahmed, was described as an al Qaeda operative with alleged links to the now U.S.-held al Qaeda mastermind known as Abu Zubaydeh. Another, Mani Shaman Turki al Habardi al Utaybi, had been cleared for release from the prison, so long as he was transferred to detention elsewhere.

The alleged Taliban fighter is Yassar Talal al Zahrani, a 21-year-old Saudi who would have been captured and brought here as a teenager.

It is not yet known if the three men were among the 25 percent of detainees being regularly interrogated at this remote, offshore Navy base.

None had previously attempted suicide, Durand said.

He did not know if the Saudi cleared for release had been intended to be aboard a May 18 Saudi Airways flight that left this base with 15 detainees, for continued investigation and possible trial in their oil-rich kingdom.

The Saudi foreign minister had announced the deal in mid-May, saying the kingdom had arranged to take 16 citizens from this remote, offshore detention center. In the end, though, the U.S. military released only 15.

The military said none of the three men who killed themselves had lawyers, and none faced war-crimes charges.

Also, none had "ongoing psychological illness," said the Pentagon's top medical professional, Dr. William Winkenwerder Jr., who accompanied the general on Sunday's visit. Moreover, none of the three were on prescription drugs, said Winkenwerder, assistant secretary of defense for health affairs.

DOJ_NMG_0033312

According to the Center for Constitutional Rights, lawyers had by January met with only 130 of the detainees here.

A "vast majority have no access to any outside counsel," Gutierrez said. ``They are entering their fifth year of imprisonment, held in isolation. The amount of psychiatric stress cannot be underestimated."

Gitmo Detainee Was Cleared For Transfer (AP)

By Andrew Selsky

AP, June 12, 2006

One of the Guantanamo detainees who committed suicide had been cleared for transfer to another country, a second allegedly was involved in an Afghanistan prison uprising in which a CIA agent died, and a third had ties to al-Qaida.

The Defense Department on Sunday identified the three as Mani Shaman Turki al-Habardi Al-Utaybi, Yassar Talal Al-Zahrani and Ali Abdullah Ahmed of Yemen.

The U.S. military said the bodies of the two Saudis and one Yemeni were found in their cells on Saturday, hanging from sheets and clothing. Officials said all three left suicide notes, the contents of which have not been made public.

Their deaths touched off new scrutiny and criticism of the prison, with human rights groups and foreign officials demanding the facility be closed.

An influential U.S. senator called for the government to move faster in determining the fate of hundreds of Guantanamo detainees who have been imprisoned for up to 4 1/2 years.

President Bush, who was spending the weekend at Camp David, expressed "serious concern" about the incident, White House press secretary Tony Snow said.

His immediate concerns were making sure that an investigation was being conducted and that the bodies were "treated humanely and with cultural sensitivity," Snow said.

About 460 people are being held on suspicion of links to al-Qaida and the Taliban at the isolated U.S. military base in southeastern Cuba.

The military maintains the detainees pose a danger to the United States and its allies. But only 10 detainees have been charged, and many claim they were not involved in al-Qaida or were low-level Taliban members who never intended to harm the United States.

None of the three who committed suicide had been formally charged. Al-Utaybi and Al-Zahrani were identified earlier by Saudi authorities.

U.S. authorities allege Ahmed, 28, was a mid- to high-level al-Qaida operative with ties to key al-Qaida facilitators and senior membership. He had been noncompliant and hostile to guards throughout his time in Guantanamo and participated in a hunger strike from late 2005 to May 2006, the Defense Department said. Ahmed was born in Shebwa, Yemen.

Al-Zahrani, 21, was accused of being a front-line fighter for the Taliban who facilitated weapons purchases for Taliban offensives against U.S. and coalition forces. Born in Yenbo, Saudi Arabia, he was allegedly involved in a 2001 prison uprising in Mazar-e-Sharif, Afghanistan, that resulted in the death of CIA officer Johnny Michael Spann.

The U.S. military accused al-Utaybi, 30, of being a member of a militant missionary group, Jama'at Al Tablighi. He was born in Al-Qarara, Saudi Arabia, according to a Defense Department list of Guantanamo detainees.

Al-Utaybi had been recommended for transfer to another country for continued detention, though the Defense Department did not specify where. Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand, a spokesman for the Guantanamo detention center, said he did not know whether al-Utaybi had been informed about the transfer recommendation before he killed himself.

Though the military termed the deaths apparent suicides, the Navy was investigating to establish the official cause of death. Military medical experts completed autopsies on the men on Sunday afternoon, Durand said. He did not know when the autopsy report would be issued.

The detainees tried to prevent guards from seeing them commit suicide, The New York Times reported Monday, raising questions about long it took military guards to discover them. The newspaper quoted Durand as saying one of the prisoners hanged himself behind laundry drying from the ceiling of his cell and had arranged to make his bed look as if he were still in it. He said the two other detainees took similar steps.

Navy Lt. Abuhena M. Saiful-Islam, an imam, was brought to the base to ensure that the bodies were handled according to Islamic rites, and Guantanamo officials were prepared to perform an Islamic burial at the base if needed, Durand said.

While U.S. officials argued the suicides were political acts aimed at hurting the United States' standing in the world, defense lawyers, human rights activists and former detainees said prisoners are desperate after years in captivity and some view suicide as the only way out — even though Islam forbids it.

"A stench of despair hangs over Guantanamo," said Mark Denbeaux, a law professor at Seton Hall University in New Jersey who along with his son, Joshua, represents two Tunisians at Guantanamo. "Everyone is shutting down and quitting."

DOJ_NMG_0033313

International demands to close the prison grew over the weekend.

Danish Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen, who supported President Bush in the Iraq war, said the detention center's procedures violate "the very principle of the rule of law" and weaken the fight against terrorism.

Swedish Foreign Minister Jan Eliasson said the deaths underlined the need to close the camp and bring detainees to trial or free them. Eliasson said the 25-nation European Union believes the facility should be closed.

The suicides hit a sore point with Saudis, who are angry that more than 130 of their countrymen are at Guantanamo. The country's semiofficial human rights organization demanded an independent investigation, questioning whether torture drove the men to suicide.

"There are no independent monitors at the detention camp so it is easy to pin the crime on the prisoners, considering it is possible they were tortured," said Mufleh al-Qahtani, the group's deputy director.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said he would like to see the detainees' cases judged more quickly.

"Where we have evidence they ought to be tried, and if convicted they ought to be sentenced," he said on CNN's "Late Edition."

Specter said that without charges, many of the prisoners are "just out there in limbo."

U.S. authorities said they were considering suspending hearings by military tribunals pending a Supreme Court ruling on whether Bush overstepped his authority in setting up the tribunals.

Until the deaths, officials reported 41 unsuccessful suicide attempts by 25 detainees since the U.S. began taking prisoners to the base in January 2002. Defense lawyers contend the number of suicide attempts is higher.

Independent Probe Urged For Suicides Of Detainees (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

Human rights groups and defense lawyers yesterday called for an independent investigation into the three detainee suicides at the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, questioning the military's preliminary explanation of how the men killed themselves and the way U.S. officials have characterized the deaths.

Since the detainees used makeshift nooses in their cells early Saturday, U.S. officials have called the three deaths an act of "asymmetric warfare" and a public relations move aimed at riling the international community. Military commanders said the men -- described as having terrorist ties -- used creative methods to surreptitiously kill themselves while seeking martyrdom, and dismissed assertions that the suicides were the desperate acts of depressed captives.

Amnesty International officials said yesterday that an independent investigation "is a matter of absolute urgency" and is the only way to find out what happened in the detainees' cells. In a written statement, the officials said an ongoing Naval Criminal Investigative Service probe will not be sufficient in light of comments U.S. officials have made.

The International Committee of the Red Cross, which has open and regular access to the Guantanamo Bay facility, plans to send a delegation in coming days to look into the suicides. The group made a similar assessment there last month, when there was a riot after a series of suicide attempts.

"This is no inquiry or investigation; it's a follow-up to find out what happened, to assess the mood in the camp," said Simon Schorno, an ICRC spokesman in Washington. "It's routine."

The Bush administration sought to distance itself from comments Colleen Graffy, deputy assistant U.S. secretary of state for public diplomacy, made to the BBC, in which she called the suicides a "good P.R. move." Sean McCormack, a State Department spokesman, said yesterday that the department would not characterize the deaths that way and said that U.S. officials "have serious concerns anytime anybody takes their own life."

Pentagon officials have provided some details about the deaths, saying that the detainees secretly fashioned nooses out of clothes and bedsheets, then evaded the guards' attention long enough to take their lives.

David Remes, a defense lawyer for 17 Yemeni detainees at Guantanamo Bay, said he is skeptical of the military's version.

"There's no way to verify anything that the military says down there because as usual, their stance is: 'Trust us,' " Remes said. "We have to take their word for it. What's really needed is an independent investigation."

Chinese Muslims Search For Sanctuary (WT)

By Bruce I. Konviser

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

TIRANA, Albania -- Authorities are looking for a new home for five Chinese Muslims who have been held in a refugee camp in a diplomatic limbo since being transferred to Albania from the U.S. prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, last month.

DOJ_NMG_0033314

Albanian officials say they see no viable future for the men in one of Europe's poorest countries, where no one speaks their language and the culture is fundamentally alien to their central Asian background.

The five ethnic Uighurs, from western China, arrived here a month ago after the U.S. administration brokered a deal for them to be given political asylum. The Bush administration released them after determining that they did not pose a terrorist threat but will not allow them to resettle in the United States and fears they will be tortured or executed if they are returned to China.

Beijing considers the men terrorists for advocating independence and is demanding that they be repatriated. Albanian officials insist that the men will not be sent to China in spite of intense pressure from Beijing but say they should not remain permanently in Albania.

"Their future is not here," said Argita Totozani, the national commissioner for refugees. "There is not a Uighur community. They don't speak any Albanian. They don't speak any Chinese. There is no integration possibility for them here."

The United States hoped that the men -- who had asked to go to a European country after being told they could not live in the United States -- would readily assimilate in Albania, which shares their Muslim faith. But the Uighurs' distinct language is not spoken in Albania.

Albanian officials made it nearly impossible to interview the men, even when arrangements were made in advance with their attorney.

Mrs. Totozani said arrangements to meet the five should be made through Ali Rasha, the director of the refugee camp where they are being held. But Mr. Rasha said he could not help, insisting, "I don't have the authority."

Regardless of religious persuasion or cultural background, Albania is a grim place to live. Fewer than 100 people have sought long-term resettlement here in the past 10 years, according to Albanian and U.N. officials.

"Albania is a transit country," said Hossein Kheradmand of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. "People don't come here for asylum because of the economic situation. They come from the east and try to cross Albania to get into Western Europe. When they are intercepted by police because of illegal entry, then they apply for asylum."

The per capita income of Albania's 3.5 million people is a little more than $2,000 a year, according to the World Bank. The official unemployment rate is 16 percent, but in reality, it is probably higher than 30 percent.

The CIA Web site reports that more than 50 percent of the country's road network remains unpaved. And there are only eight phone lines per 100 people, the lowest line density in Europe.

The five Uighurs were apparently swept up by bounty hunters in Pakistan and delivered to U.S. forces in the aftermath of the September 11 attacks on the United States.

"After these men were determined not to be enemy combatants, the United States reached out to over 100 countries to try to arrange for their resettlement," a senior State Department official said in an exchange of e-mails. The official said an "administrative decision" had been made not to offer them asylum in the United States.

The administration has not publicly explained why the men cannot resettle in the United States, but Mrs. Totozani said her government understood that "because of the atmosphere and the September 11 story, the Americans would not really want Guantanamo Bay ex-prisoners to be part of their society."

An American attorney is actively looking for a new home for the men, Mrs. Totozani said.

"They are trying to find a resettlement somewhere else -- in America or Canada," she said. "I've heard they have relatives in Canada. There is a good community in Canada for Uighurs."

Suicides Change Nothing (USAT)

By Douglas W. Kmiec

USA Today, June 13, 2006

In 2004, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that "the capture, detention and trial of unlawful combatants" is important in war for the purpose of preventing "captured individuals from returning to the field of battle and taking up arms once again."

The unfortunate suicides of three Guantanamo Bay detainees do not change this.

We are fighting an unprovoked war on terror that began in the 1990s with the radical Islamic jihad "to kill Americans wherever found." It has included assaults on our military personnel in Somalia, the 1993 World Trade Center bombings, the destruction of U.S. Embassies in Africa, the 2000 bombing of the USS Cole, and the unrequited murder of nearly 3,000 civilians on 9/11.

Most Guantanamo detainees were captured in Afghanistan. The president ordered them treated "humanely." While each has been interrogated for information to forestall future attacks, each has also had chances to explain perceived assistance to al-Qaeda.

DOJ_NMG_0033315

These status reviews were intended to fulfill Geneva standards. With its Detainee Treatment Act, Congress implicitly recognized and improved their fairness, providing for appeal to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. This respected court will also review war crime trials before military commissions. If the Supreme Court OKs the commissions, Osama bin Laden's driver and others can then face trial in the support of terrorist actions.

In earlier wars, detainees were held for years with no thought of trial. That said, the Janus-faced peace that uneasily coexists with a terror war perplexes us, and so it was right to release about 300 Guantanamo detainees, even as some rejoined enemy ranks.

Some foreign leaders posture as if Guantanamo's doors should just fly open. Residents of Madrid and London might dissent. Even so, the international criticism should not be dismissed. It should be seen as implied willingness to share the cost and burden of detention. If we can't try all the detainees, serious thought ought be given to having the U.N. convene an ad hoc international court. As mother used to say, "It's easy to criticize."

Douglas W. Kmiec, professor of constitutional law at Pepperdine University, is a former constitutional legal counsel to Presidents Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush.

Guantanamo Deaths Deepen Harm To U.S. Image Abroad (USAT)

USA Today, June 13, 2006

Over the weekend, three detainees at the U.S. prison camp at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, did what many had failed to do before them: They committed suicide. That might not seem like a big deal when set against the scores who die violently in Iraq and elsewhere every week.

The camp commander, Rear Adm. Harry Harris, said the suicides were "not an act of desperation, but an act of asymmetrical warfare waged against us" that proves the detainees "have no regard for life."

So, is it all right to say good riddance, pronounce the deaths yet more regrettable casualties of an ugly war, and move on?

Unfortunately, no.

Most of those still held at Guantanamo Bay are undoubtedly opposed to everything America represents, and conditions at Guantanamo have given them a weapon in the battle to persuade Muslims that we are a nation that preaches ideals for others but fails to live by them ourselves.

The Founding Fathers created the USA as a new and different nation, one based on rights and laws. Guantanamo Bay achieves the opposite. The inmates are being kept in a Kafkaesque legal limbo. When the prison opened in January 2002, the Bush administration officially declared them "enemy combatants" and said they were not protected under the Geneva Conventions.

Since then, the administration has been secretive about who the detainees are, what their alleged crimes are and what conditions they are being kept in. Reports from the United Nations and others allege treatment tantamount to torture.

There has been some minor relief. The United States has quietly released about 300 prisoners — it holds more than 400 now — and admitted that some should never have been held. Under pressure, it said it would abide by Geneva Conventions' guidelines and in April released the detainees' names.

After the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in 2004 that the Guantanamo prisoners were entitled to due process, the administration said it would revive World War II military tribunals in which standards are lower and much of the evidence is secret. Only 10 cases have been brought, though, and none tried. The high court is expected to rule soon on a case, involving Osama bin Laden's former driver, that will determine whether the tribunals are sufficient.

The United States cannot be naive about people it captures. In their initial months in custody, some might provide useful intelligence — though it's hard to believe any of those still at Guantanamo do now.

But every day that Guantanamo remains a symbol of un-American behavior, it inspires more al-Qaeda recruits and more terrorism. International calls for its closure have reached a deafening crescendo, including, recently, from close ally Britain.

Reports of hunger strikes and suicides add to the sense that the prison has become more of a liability than an asset in the war on terrorism. A poll last year by the Pew Research Center indicated as much, as it recorded widespread international resentment of the United States.

President Bush insists he "would like to end" Guantanamo but needs first to wait for the Supreme Court ruling. That won't do. What Guantanamo represents needs changing, and immediately. It's time to lay out the evidence against those who need to be charged and release those who don't.

The Gitmo Suicides (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033316

The suicide of three prisoners at Guantanamo Bay has elicited another chorus of anti-U.S. rhetoric from the self-styled "human rights" crowd. Sigh.

The dead men were among the most irredeemable jihadists, which is why they were still there this long after the fall of the Taliban regime in Afghanistan. One of them participated in the Mazar-e-Sharif prison uprising in which CIA officer Johnny "Mike" Spann was killed. Another was an al Qaeda recruiter. The third was an al Qaeda operative who had lately been engaging in hunger strikes and other disruptive behavior.

Many other Gitmo detainees have long since been released, although getting other countries to accept their return hasn't been as easy as their champions would have you believe. Guantanamo guards have also gone to extraordinary lengths to keep many of these people alive, force-feeding hunger strikers and thwarting what the press has reported to be 41 suicide attempts already.

If there's any scandal here, it's that anti-U.S. activists have made it so difficult to handle al Qaeda prisoners in a more efficient manner. On the one hand they complain of the "incredible despair" (Human Rights Watch) of indefinite detention. On the other, they have done their best to prevent the U.S. from processing them through the military court system that President Bush authorized in late 2001. The Supreme Court is due to rule on one of these challenges -- Hamdan v. Rumsfeld -- later this month.

The activists shouldn't be allowed to have it both ways. Either the Gitmo detainees are legitimate prisoners of war, in which case they can't be prosecuted but can be held for the duration of the conflict as in all previous wars. Or they are unlawful combatants (because they fought out of uniform and targeted civilians), in which case there should be no issue at all about moving ahead and trying them in military tribunals.

Religious Leaders Urge U.S. To Ban Torture (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

Twenty-seven religious leaders, including megachurch pastor Rick Warren, Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel and Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick of Washington, have signed a statement urging the United States to "abolish torture now -- without exceptions."

The statement, being published in newspaper advertisements starting today, is the opening salvo of a new organization called the National Religious Campaign Against Torture, which has formed in response to allegations of human rights abuse at U.S. detention centers in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Titled "Torture is a Moral Issue," the statement says that torture "violates the basic dignity of the human person" and "contradicts our nation's most cherished values." "Nothing less is at stake in the torture abuse crisis than the soul of our nation. What does it signify if torture is condemned in word but allowed in deed?" it asks.

The signers come from a broad range of denominations and include notable religious conservatives, such as the Rev. Ted Haggard, president of the National Association of Evangelicals; Archbishop Demetrios, primate of the Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of America; and the Rev. William J. Byron, former president of Catholic University.

By suggesting that recent abuse of prisoners may not be just an aberration but a reflection of U.S. policy, the statement contains an implicit challenge to the Bush administration, according to some signers.

"I'm not persuaded that this issue has been put to bed yet by the Bush administration," said David P. Gushee, a philosophy professor at Union University in Tennessee who wrote an influential article against torture this year in Christianity Today, an evangelical magazine. "I'm worried that we still don't truly know what is going on in all our detention centers around the world."

Deputy White House press secretary Dana Perino said the administration has "the utmost respect for all these religious leaders." But, she said, "I'll simply repeat what the president has said many times, which is that this government does not torture, and we adhere to the international conventions against torture. That is our policy, and it will remain our policy."

On its Web site, the National Religious Campaign Against Torture urges Congress and the president to "remove all ambiguities" by prohibiting secret U.S. prisons around the world, ending the rendition of suspects to countries that use torture, granting the Red Cross access to all detainees and not exempting any arm of the government from human rights standards.

McCarrick said last night that he had signed on to "the general principle" that torture is unacceptable but had not seen the new organization's specific proposals. Gushee said he is "not sure that everyone who signed the statement would concur with that platform," though he said he, personally, does.

Terror Suspects Charge Abuse In Canada Prison (NYT)

By Anthony DePalma

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033317

BRAMPTON, Ontario, June 12 — Defense lawyers representing several of the men held on terrorism charges in an Ontario maximum security prison say their clients have been beaten by guards, threatened by other inmates and held in isolation.

The lawyers made the accusations outside the courtroom here as preliminary bail hearings were about to begin for the 17 suspects arrested June 3.

Two were reprimanded in the courtroom when they shouted that they had been abused. "These wounds speak for themselves," one of them yelled from the prisoner box, as they held up shackled hands.

A spokeswoman for the prison where most of the men are being held said the accusations were being investigated.

Several hours after the lawyers repeated the abuse accusations in court, the presiding justice issued a publication ban on the bail hearings for all 17 suspects, at the request of the prosecutor and one of the suspects.

The ban prohibits reporting on evidence presented in court during the bail proceedings. Proceedings involving the five suspects charged as young offenders were already subject to a ban. Because the lawyers initially made the abuse accusations outside court on Monday, those statements were not covered by the ban.

Bail proceedings in Canada are routinely subject to such bans, which are intended to keep potential jurors from being tainted by news reports.

Several defense lawyers objected to the gag order, saying the charges that the men plotted to terrorize Canada with truck bombs and other kidnappings were baseless and should be subjected to public scrutiny.

"I want the public to know exactly the allegations against my client," said Rocco Galati, who represents Ahmad Mustafa Ghany, 21, of Mississauga, Ontario, who is accused of participating in a terrorist group. "Up to now, the public has seen only what the police want them to see by filtering and selecting information."

Lawyers also hoped to speak freely about the conditions under which the suspects were being detained.

David Kolinsky, who represents Zakaria Amara, 20, said his client was pinned to the ground a few days ago by a guard who poked his finger into Mr. Amara's cheek and flicked him in the eye. "His face is still sore," Mr. Kolansky said.

Most of the suspects have been held at the Maplehurst Correctional Center in Milton, Ontario, west of Toronto. The maximum-security prison, one of the largest in Canada, holds about 1,100 inmates, said Julia Noonan, the prison's spokeswoman.

"We take any allegations that come forward very seriously, and we look into them," she said. But she said the prison had received no reports of any abuse before Monday.

Ms. Noonan said it was common at Maplehurst to keep cell lights on 24 hours a day. At night those lights are dimmed, but the corridors remain fully lighted, she said.

A 20-minute exercise period is standard, and inmates are monitored by video camera outside their cells to protect them from attacks by other inmates, she said.

Canada's Social Stance Is Tested By Arrests (WSJ)

By Elena Cherney

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

MISSISSAUGA, Ontario -- The recent arrest of 17 Ontario suspects on terrorism-related charges has lifted the lid on a simmering controversy among Canada's Muslims: A segment of this growing community worries that an increasing number of mosques have come under the sway of fundamentalist imams.

While the validity of the allegations -- from planned bombings to hostage-taking -- remains to be seen, the arrests in themselves have given worried congregants an opportunity to raise a red flag. They say the messages delivered in some mosques -- such as the Al-Rahman Islamic Center here -- may help explain why police believe the 17 men and youths might have been drawn into a group that allegedly conspired to blow up buildings in the Toronto area and schemed about taking politicians hostage in Ottawa. Most of those arrested, age 15 to 43 years old, have spent all or most of their lives in Canada.

News of an alleged homegrown terrorist plot has shocked Canadians and stirred questions about the country's liberal immigration program and its policy of multiculturalism. Even on the left, some Canadians are now questioning whether the country's "mosaic" approach to cultural communities has encouraged some to resist embracing values broadly shared by other Canadians.

The men, handcuffed and shackled at the ankles, appeared yesterday in court in Brampton, west of Toronto. Bail hearings were postponed until later this week, with some hearings delayed until later in the month.

Some defense lawyers argued that their clients' solitary confinement in small cells, with the lights on 24 hours a day, violates their rights. One lawyer told the court his client was beaten by a guard, while another said a guard threatened one suspect with gang rape; prosecutors responded that prisoner treatment isn't within their office's jurisdiction. With details about the government's case still sketchy, defense lawyer Rocco Galati demanded that the hearings be broadcast live from the courtroom "to counteract the frenzy" that he says is resulting from "misinformation" that is being leaked selectively.

DOJ_NMG_0033318

Justice Keith Currie of the Ontario Court of Justice granted the crown prosecutor's request for a publication ban, meaning there will be a media blackout on details at least until the trial. Lawyers for at least two media outlets are expected to challenge the ban.

Critics of the mosques say that few imams -- if any -- overtly advocate violence. But by telling worshippers that Islam is under siege and that Muslims are being victimized in North America, these spiritual leaders, many of whom are schooled overseas before arriving in Canada, may foster a breeding ground for Canadian extremists, the critics say.

While most of Canada's estimated 750,000 Muslims don't share the views of these imams, few are willing to stand up and object to their clerics, some moderates say. "Extremists have not only penetrated the community, they dominate the community," says Salim Mansur, a political science professor at the University of Western Ontario. "This storm that has hit Canada has been brewing throughout Canada for at least a decade."

Other community leaders question whether extremists have gained broad influence over Muslim communities. At most prayer services, "the message is love, peace, harmony, respect for your fellow man," says Shafiq Qaadri, a member of the Ontario legislature whose constituency includes an area with many Muslim voters. Mr. Qaadri says he believes "there are perhaps some radical elements. No doubt they exist." But he adds that their message is delivered to "a subselection of people" at small study groups.

Senior officials of the new Conservative government in Ottawa say the recent arrests show the country's efforts to combat terrorism are working. Most of those arrested are Canadian citizens, they note. And cooperation from the Muslim community has been instrumental in helping authorities' anti-terrorism efforts, officials say.

Other observers say it is mistaken to blame multiculturalism for creating enclaves. "Multiculturalism celebrates diversity," says Colin Kenny, chairman of the Canadian Senate's committee on national security.

Seven of the arrested men were regulars at the Al-Rahman Islamic Center in a Mississauga strip mall, including the oldest, Qayyum Abdul Jamal, 43, and Fahim Ahmad, 21, both of whom face explosives charges. Messrs. Jamal and Ahmad, along with five others, were part of a Quran study group that also met for activities such as soccer and Chinese meals, according to a friend of the group.

One of the religious leaders at the storefront mosque is a Saudi-educated imam. He declined a request for an interview through the mosque's lawyer, Tariq Shah. Al-Rahman sermons didn't seek to stir worshippers to jihad, Mr. Shah says.

Anjum Ahmed, who owns the Hasty Market convenience store next to the mosque, says he prayed there on Fridays. When he saw the news reports of the arrests among his fellow worshippers, he says, "I was shocked." The men sometimes popped into his store "to buy pop, ice cream. They seemed like normal people."

Mr. Jamal wasn't a leader at the mosque but rather a dedicated volunteer who "was always willing to come forward and put the garbage out. He would change the toilet paper," says his lawyer, Mr. Shah. Despite the high-profile arrests, he added, "most of the Muslims, they love the country they live in."

But Munir Sami, a director of the Muslim Canadian Congress, says multiculturalism has helped foster "ghettoes" of middle-class Muslims in places such as Mississauga, a city of more than 500,000 west of Toronto where most of the arrested men lived with their families and attended mosques.

Aly Hindy, the imam of one of the two mosques frequented by members of the group, rejects suggestions that he or his congregants are extremists. Mr. Hindy says the allegations against the 17 are trumped up by Canadian security officials to justify their budgets.

Many Canadian imams are educated at Saudi universities and follow an extreme fundamentalist version of the religion, says Tarek Fatah, a spokesman for the Muslim Canadian Congress, a self-described "grassroots" group that favors a modern approach to Islam.

Until now, many moderates stayed quiet, some observers say. "They have been pretty well intimidated" by the fundamentalists, says Martin Collacott, a former Canadian ambassador to the Middle East who wrote a recent report for the Fraser Institute, a think tank, on Canada's response to terrorism. "They are going to have to speak up."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Technologists Assail Federal Net-tapping Rules (CNET)

By Anne Broache And Declan McCullagh, Staff Writer, CNET News.com
CNET News.com, June 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033319

Federal regulations saying that police must be able to tap into Internet phone conversations with ease are coming under renewed attack from academics, engineers and one of the Net's founding fathers.

A 21-page study to be released Tuesday says it's impossible for the government to expect all products that use voice over Internet protocol, or VoIP, to comply with the Federal Communications Commission's September 2005 requirement mandating wiretapping backdoors for government surveillance. That requirement is backed by the Bush administration.

The study, organized by the Information Technology Association of America, says that because VoIP relies on a fundamentally different network architecture from that of traditional phone lines, such a mandate would pose "enormous costs" to the industry and could even introduce significant security risks.

The nine contributors included Vint Cerf, Google's chief Internet evangelist and one of the Net's founding fathers; Steven Bellovin and Matt Blaze, both prominent computer security professors who specialize in security; Clinton Brooks, a former National Security Agency official; and engineers from Sun Microsystems and Intel.

The report follows a ruling Friday by a federal appeals court in Washington, D.C., that upheld the legality of the FCC's wiretapping regulations. Librarians, community colleges, and companies including Sun had challenged the rules, saying the FCC did not have the authority to extend the Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act, or CALEA, to the Internet. (The decision may be appealed.)

Even without the FCC rules that are scheduled to take effect in May 2007, police have the legal authority to conduct Internet wiretaps--that's precisely what the FBI's Carnivore system was designed to do. Still, the FBI has claimed, the need for "standardized broadband intercept capabilities is especially urgent in light of today's heightened threats to homeland security and the ongoing tendency of criminals to use the most clandestine modes of communication."

The controversy over the FCC mandatory wiretapping regulations comes as the Bush administration is facing increasing congressional pressure, especially from Sen. Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, over its telephone and Internet surveillance program overseen by the National Security Agency. AT&T is being sued in a separate case in San Francisco over allegations that it cooperated in a way that violated federal privacy laws.

The nature of VoIP could also elevate the risk that authorities aren't eavesdropping on the person they originally had in mind, the ITAA report's authors argue. Because it's theoretically simple for an individual to acquire multiple VoIP phone numbers, "recognizing and tracking the multiple identities that are so natural to the Internet lifestyle would be taxing."

In addition, the study says, allowing full access by law enforcement would almost certainly require overhauling inherently decentralized networks to allow for certain points where interception would take place--and open up new security risks in the process. That's because such an arrangement would arguably make it easier for hackers to capture identity information and passwords, engage in "man-in-the-middle alteration of data," or potentially spoof the communications going on.

"It's sort of like if you were chasing someone and you knew they had to go over a particular bridge," said Mark Uncapher, a senior vice president at ITAA.

Though there may be some security concerns, the benefits of mandating wiretapping access outweigh the costs, said Tim Richardson, senior legislative liaison for the Fraternal Order of Police. (Many police organizations, including the National Sheriffs' Association, the Police Executive Research Forum, the Illinois State Police and the Tennessee Bureau of Investigation petitioned the FCC in favor of the wiretapping rules.)

"If that was going to increase the propensity for crime, that's something that law enforcement would take a look at," Richardson said. "But the adaptability of technology is so great in this day and age that I have a high degree of faith in the initiative that (companies would employ to find something) that's not as costly and doesn't compromise the security of their networks."

Complexities involved in meeting such a mandate exist on a number of levels, the ITAA report said. One problem is that, in contrast to traditional telephones, whose calls can virtually always be traced to a centralized switching location, VoIP users are often nomadic.

"The paradigm of VoIP intercept difficulty is a call between two road warriors who constantly change locations and who, for example, may call from a cafe in Boston to a hotel room in Paris and an hour later from an office in Cambridge to a gift shop at the Louvre," the report says, and adds that building in mandatory wiretapping hubs for real-time interception is so expensive that it could put smaller companies out of business.

Air Marshals Warn Their Bullets Are Too Powerful (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

Federal air marshals say their guns are loaded with bullets capable of running through more than one person, metal doors and thick glass -- too much firepower for an airplane.

DOJ_NMG_0033320

"Not only is the person getting shot in danger, but everyone on the plane is because of the distance it travels," said one air marshal who testified in a recently completed House Judiciary Committee investigation of policies marshals deemed dangerous.

Several marshals say their bullets can penetrate most of the material in planes, leaving pilots and the plane's hydraulics and flight-control system vulnerable if a weapon is discharged. Cockpit doors have been hardened with steel, but the walls on either side of the door have not.

Another marshal told the House committee agents should be issued ammunition loaded with frangible bullets, which break into smaller pieces on impact and thus have limited power to exit the target and continue.

"An aircraft is made up of composites, plastics, and aluminum. If a round were to penetrate through the front plastic/composite windshield of the aircraft, the results would be catastrophic at 500 miles per hour. We should be using frangible ammunition. It's a no-brainer," the Nov. 27 memo said.

The House Judiciary report, released last week, included the committee's concerns about the ammunition, but the Transportation Security Administration's response was redacted from the report.

Federal Air Marshal Service Director Dana Brown is reviewing the agency's use of a .357-caliber handgun and Speer Gold Dot .357 SIG round, nonfrangible ammunition, said FAMS spokesman Conan Bruce.

Mr. Bruce said air marshals used to use frangible ammunition but switched weapons and ammunition after researching testing by outside groups. The change was approved by former FAMS Director Thomas Quinn, a former Secret Service agent.

Massad Ayoob, a ballistics authority and director of the Lethal Force Institute, calls the ammunition "an excellent load" that the Secret Service uses to protect the president. The bullet is designed to expand in the body to cause greater physical harm.

"If you get a peripheral hit in the arm, it has enough power to keep going and kill whoever it hits," said Mr. Ayoob, who explained that the bullet moves 1,350 feet per second.

"It's no trick to change the ammunition load they are using now to 1,500 feet per second to get a 10-inch, very substantial wound, and it would minimize the likelihood of an exit," Mr. Ayoob said. "That would reduce penetration by a few inches and widen the wound, which brings about a faster cessation of the action."

Federal air marshals have tough shooting requirements and "are among the best shooters in law enforcement," Mr. Ayoob says.

Don Strange, former special agent in charge of the FAMS Atlanta field office, said the ammunition FAMS agents use is good for the Secret Service and other law enforcement but not in the "tube of an airplane."

"It would penetrate at least the first body, but it can also penetrate a second and possibly third body," Mr. Strange said.

Mr. Strange has more than 30 years of federal law-enforcement experience but says he was fired from FAMS by Mr. Quinn for criticizing the agency's choice of ammunition, dress code and other policies.

When Mr. Strange informed officials at FAMS headquarters of his concern about the weapon's load, "I told them I hoped the reason we were using it was not because Quinn wants us to, and they said that is the reason."

Philip Van Cleave, a former deputy sheriff and president of the Virginia Citizens Defense League, said he was surprised to learn the marshals are not using frangible firepower.

"It's ironic that the very people who are carrying the guns are complaining, that tells you something there -- they don't want to be underarmed, but they want to be able to protect passengers," Mr. Van Cleave said.

Several thousand pilots are trained to carry guns to protect the cockpit, however David Mackett, president of the Airline Pilots Security Alliance, declined to say what kind of weapons or ammunition are used by federal flight-deck officers.

"The federal air marshals are competent and experienced law enforcement, and I would take any recommendations they would make very seriously," Mr. Mackett said.

The House investigation said in its report released last week that policies dictating dress and boarding procedures in sight of passengers undermine the marshals' anonymity and suggested that any marshal who initiated changes fell victim to retaliation.

In its response to the committee, the Transportation Security Administration, which manages FAMS, said the policies have been changed. Air marshals who spoke to panel lawyers disagreed with the TSA's claims in interviews with The Washington Times.

City Rethinking Security Plan After Cut In Homeland Aid (NYT)

By Al Baker And Sewell Chan

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

The Bloomberg administration wanted to spend $111 million in the coming year to install a sprawling security camera system in the Wall Street area. To be modeled on London's so-called Ring of Steel, the plan involved placing video cameras at half of the 535 intersections south of Canal Street and installing surveillance equipment capable of zeroing in on details as small as a license plate.

DOJ_NMG_0033321

It also included beefing up police patrols and using officers specially trained to handle truck and car bombs, as well as employing mobile barriers to protect bridges, tunnels and streets, police officials said.

But the plan, the Lower Manhattan Security Initiative, is being rethought since the Department of Homeland Security cut the city's security grant to $124.5 million this year from $207.6 million last year, Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly said yesterday. He was testifying at a City Council hearing on the impact of the reduction.

"The immediate impact — the biggest impact — will be a cessation of the Lower Manhattan Security Initiative," Mr. Kelly said. "We're going to have to regroup and take a very hard look at that plan."

When questioned after the hearing, he said, "This program right now has been put on hold until we can take a look at the funding stream."

The commissioner's testimony seemed to strike a different tone from city officials' public declarations two weeks ago, when they learned of the cutbacks. Many had said the city would find a way to plug any financial holes itself. They also said no programs would be noticeably altered.

The cuts have prompted officials of both parties to question the Department of Homeland Security. Last week, leaders in New York's financial services industry, including Goldman Sachs, sent a letter to Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, calling for the money to be restored.

Yesterday, Russ Knocke, a department spokesman, said an undersecretary would work closely with the city to help expedite the flow of dollars from Washington. But he said it fell to city officials to prioritize which projects to pay for.

The city asked for about $450 million in grants this year. Its application included a request for $219.7 million for police initiatives, including $81.5 million toward the Lower Manhattan Security Initiative.

The government said the city had done a poor job articulating how the money it sought would help reduce risk in the city, and rated some highly publicized counterterrorism measures as below average in how they could be sustained financially.

Now, with several city agencies vying for a smaller pot of federal aid, it is not just the police programs that are in jeopardy, a spokesman for Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said. The spokesman, Jordan Barowitz, said the city's counterterrorism measures spanned the Police, Fire and Health Departments. "We have difficult decisions to make," he said.

Stuart A. Klein, first deputy director of the city's Office of Management and Budget, said no final decisions had been made about which projects, within the $124.5 million, the city would pursue.

"Since we were recently notified of the reduction, we're going through a process now, analyzing the projects, working with the mayor's office and the other agencies, including Commissioner Kelly," Mr. Klein said in response to questions from Council members at the hearing. "And when a decision is made, we will forward the review of that to Homeland Security."

The Police Department's counterterrorism efforts had previously been praised by federal officials. The F.B.I. director, Robert S. Mueller III, has called its programs "models for the nation."

Police officials pointed out that in 2004, after a plot to sabotage some city financial assets was exposed, Tom Ridge, the former Department of Homeland Security secretary, came to New York and said that he doubted whether any other city had done more to prevent another terrorist attack.

Terrorist In A Bootleg T-shirt (LAT)

By Ray Lemoine, Ray Lemoine Is Coauthor, With Jeff Neumann And Donovan Webster, Of "Babylon By Bus," An Account Of L

The Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

The author mingled at madrasas and hung with Hezbollah, but that's not why Homeland Security picked him up.

Arriving at JFK from Dubai recently, I was stopped at customs by an officer from the Department of Homeland Security and directed to a drab backroom filled with Arabs, South Asians and Africans. I wasn't surprised, really, having just spent six months working and traveling in the Islamic world — Turkey, Lebanon, Egypt and Pakistan. If ever there were a DHS red-flag candidate,

I was it, and I assumed this was just protocol.

Four of those months were in Pakistan, and I had just spent a week with a journalist friend going to different madrasas, including one Islamic school visited by one of the bombers in the July 2005 attacks in London. Possibly I caught their attention by poking around the Karachi Marriot's parking lot, across from the U.S. consulate, where a suicide bomber's attack had killed a U.S. diplomat just two months before.

How about the hundreds of phone calls I made from Pakistan to friends and family back home that inevitably mentioned the Taliban's resurgence and criticized President Bush. Was I wiretapped? Certainly Homeland Security, whose stated mission is to "lead the unified national effort to secure America … prevent and deter terrorist attacks and protect against and respond to threats and hazards to the nation," had detained me for such a reason.

DOJ_NMG_0033322

Or maybe officers had questions about the Jamaat-ud-Dawa rally I'd witnessed in Kashmir. The group was protesting against the United States because it recently had been added to the State Department's list of groups designated as terrorist organizations. Then there was Lebanon, where I'd traveled deep into the Hezbollah-held south.

If only.

No, these frontline warriors in the global war on terrorism at Homeland Security had far more pressing issues to question me about. "Why did you infringe on the Boston Celtics' copyright in Boston in 2003?" asked my case officer, Malik — ironically a Pakistani — from behind his high desk. Uh, because I used to sell T-shirts outside sporting events, I said, wondering what this had to do with national security.

"You've got a long record," he said. Sure, for peddling "Yankees Suck" T-shirts — sans permit, which isn't a crime but a code violation — not for promoting "Bin Laden Rulz!" DVDs or the "Idiot's Guide to Suicide Bombing."

"You know, we could have you sent up to Boston for the unresolved T-shirt infractions," Malik said. "But what we're holding you for is an NYPD bench warrant from 2004. You were in a fight with a parking attendant, found not guilty and then missed a court date." All true. But how and why does Homeland Security share the NYPD's jurisdiction in cases unrelated to counter-terrorism? A fight over a parking space hardly counts as terrorism.

"We're calling NYPD to come to pick you up," Malik told me, without asking a single question about Pakistan, terrorism, Islam or madrasas.

So I sat and waited. Four DHS officers working two cases — a Senegalese guy who was caught with $100,000 in a suitcase and mine — couldn't even get the NYPD on the phone. A debate then broke out among Malik, his co-worker and their boss about how to call the NYPD. Six hours later, the DHS still hadn't gotten word from the NYPD. A shift change was coming up, and officers aren't allowed to leave until finishing all their cases.

Instead of protecting the homeland from such a dangerous T-shirt-selling, off-road-rager like me, Malik set me free, so he could get home in time to watch Mike and the Mad Dog ("Eh, is Pedro pitchin' tonight?" I overheard an officer ask). As he closed out my paperwork, Malik asked, "So, ah, Mr. LeMoine, why did you miss that court date anyway?"

"I was in Iraq."

"Doing what? Like a contractor, soldier?"

"No. I had volunteered to run a humanitarian program for the Coalition Provisional Authority but left when they started killing Westerners."

"Damn terrorists. Take care of that warrant. And welcome home."

Welcome home indeed.

Homeland Security, the $40-billion-a-year agency set up to combat terrorism after 9/11, has been given universal jurisdiction and can hold anyone on Earth for crimes unrelated to national security — even me for a court date I missed while I was in Iraq helping America deter terror — without asking what I had been doing in Pakistan among Islamic extremists the agency is designated to stop. Instead, some of its actions are erasing the lines of jurisdiction between local police and the federal state, scarily bringing the words "police" and "state" closer together. As long as we allow Homeland Security to act like a Keystone Stasi, terrorism will continue to win in destroying our freedom.

Alberto Prompts Evacuation On Fla. Coast (AP)

By Mitch Stacy

The AP, June 12, 2006

More than 20,000 people along Florida's Gulf Coast were ordered to clear out Monday as Alberto — the very first tropical storm of the new hurricane season — unexpectedly picked up steam and threatened to come ashore as a hurricane.

Forecasters posted a hurricane warning for the Gulf Coast and a tropical storm warning from north of Daytona Beach to the Georgia-South Carolina line, saying Alberto could begin battering the coast early Tuesday. Gov. Jeb Bush signed a declaration of emergency allowing him to call up the National Guard and put laws against price gouging into effect.

"We're talking about powerful forces of nature," Bush said. "People need to take this very seriously."

If Alberto came ashore as a hurricane, it would be the earliest hurricane in 40 years to hit the United States, according to the National Hurricane Center. The earliest on record is Alma, which in 1966 struck the Florida Panhandle on June 9 — the ninth day of the hurricane season.

Alberto started as a tropical depression on Saturday, and forecasters over the weekend were confident it would not become a hurricane. But the storm's winds accelerated with startling speed from 50 mph to 70 mph in just three hours Monday morning. The minimum for a hurricane is 74 mph.

DOJ_NMG_0033323

"We were surprised, but we've been surprised before," said Richard Pasch of the hurricane center. "The center in disorganized storms can re-form and jump."

Florida homeowners stocked up on chain saws, plywood and other emergency supplies. Employees at a marina in St. Petersburg said they planned to work through the night securing more than 600 boats against the wind and waves.

"This is a little earlier that I expected," said marina manager Walter Miller. "But we've had a bad couple of years, so it's not entirely unexpected."

Forecasters said Alberto would probably become only a weak Category 1 hurricane, meaning winds of 74 mph to 95 mph, because the warm water from which hurricanes draw their strength is not particularly deep in the area.

At 5 p.m. EDT, Alberto was centered about 145 miles southwest of Cedar Key and was moving northeast at about 10 mph. Its top sustained winds remained at 70 mph.

"We don't want to overdo it. It's not a Katrina or a Wilma, but storm surge and flooding could still cause loss of life," said Max Mayfield, director of the National Hurricane Center.

Evacuation orders were posted for people in mobile homes or low-lying areas in at least five coastal counties stretching more than 100 miles. Those ordered to leave included about 21,000 residents of Citrus, Levy and Taylor counties.

Alberto was expected to blow ashore anywhere from north of Tampa to the Panhandle. Forecasters said it could bring 4 to 10 inches of rain to central Florida and southeastern Georgia. Rain already was falling Monday and at least two tornados had formed, but there were no immediate reports of any injuries or damage.

Dick Grier, a retiree from Homosassa, said he planned to gas up his car and bring in law chairs. But "at this point I don't think it's the kind of thing that we worry about," he said.

Alberto also prevented the crew of space shuttle Discovery from flying to the Kennedy Space Center from Houston for several days of dress rehearsals for their expected launch in July.

On Monday, Alberto drenched western Cuba after a weekend of heavy rains prompted evacuations, caused some dilapidated buildings to collapse and flooded low-lying areas in Havana. There were no reports of other major damage or injuries.

More than 12 inches of rain fell in some rural areas over the weekend, the official Prensa Latina news agency reported.

Scientists say the 2006 season could produce as many as 16 named storms, six of them major hurricanes. Last year's hurricane season was the most destructive on record and the busiest in 154 years of storm tracking, with a record 28 named storms and a record 15 hurricanes.

The first named storm of 2005, Tropical Storm Arlene, formed June 9 and came ashore just west of Pensacola in the Florida Panhandle.

'The Storm Has Accelerated;' Landfall Expected At 8 A.m. (TALLDEM)

By Bill Cotterell

Tallahassee Democrat, June 13, 2006

Governor Jeb Bush urged coastal residents to evacuate immediately if their homes are in low-lying areas of the Big Bend and central Gulf Coast threatened by a strengthening, accelerating Tropical Storm Alberto.

At a hastily-called evening briefing, Bush and state meteorologist Ben Nelson said the storm is expected to come ashore by about 8 a.m. in Taylor County. They said the Dixie, Levy and Taylor County area is the most threatened by storm surges of 7 to 10 feet and winds currently projected at 70 miles an hour — just four short of hurricane strength.

"The storm has accelerated," Bush said. "This brings the added problem of high tide, so we want to make sure people take this very, very seriously."

He said there are 26 shelters open in 16 counties.

"If you were planning to evacuate, you need to do it tonight, not tomorrow morning," said Bush. "Tonight is the night to do this."

Nelson said Alberto was caught by a steering current that did not affect is size or strength but moved it faster toward the Big Bend. He said hurricane warnings are posted from the Ocholockonee River to Longboat Key — from Wakulla to Manatee counties — and that there is a thunderstorm warning for Franklin County.

Bush said mandatory evacuation orders have been issued for Wakulla County in the Panacea, Ochlockonee Bay and St. Marks areas, as well as low-lying and coastal regions. Also under evacuation orders are low-lying coastal areas from the Aucilla River to Steinhatchee in Taylor County, and parts of Levy, Dixie, Citrus and Franklin County.

That includes Alligator Point and low-lying coastal areas of Franklin County.

FEMA Stockpiles Supplies Ahead Of Alberto (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

DOJ_NMG_0033324

The AP, June 12, 2006

The nation's disaster response agency said Monday that evacuation buses and truckloads of food, water and ice were standing by for the year's first big tropical storm. But state officials across the Gulf Coast hadn't asked for any immediate help from Washington.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency did not stockpile supplies in Florida because the state "has indicated that they have the situation well under control," said FEMA spokesman Aaron Walker. But he said buses and supplies were ready should Tropical Storm Alberto take a nasty turn into regions still left vulnerable by Hurricane Katrina, including Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. Those supplies, warehoused in Louisiana and Alabama, could be sent to Florida if necessary, he said.

Additionally, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers stockpiled tens of thousands of tons of concrete, stone and sandbags to safeguard against any levee breaches around Florida's Lake Okeechobee.

Florida emergency director Craig Fugate said state and local responders "were managing to keep an even keel here." Any federal help — like damage assessments and reimbursements — might be needed after the storm passed, he said.

"We're not in a situation where we need any federal assistance for the response phase," Fugate told The Associated Press. "We're looking at the federal impact after the storm if it would warrant any assistance financially."

However, FEMA officials were monitoring the storm from Florida's emergency operations center in Tallahassee. The agency also put its regional response coordination office in Atlanta on alert, and ordered its Washington headquarters to be staffed around the clock to answer any incoming calls for aid.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, whose department oversees FEMA, postponed a weeklong trip to Europe to monitor the storm, said spokesman Russ Knocke. Chertoff also called Florida Gov. Jeb Bush to offer help, but the Republican governor said his state did not have any immediate needs from Washington.

Similarly, the governors of Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana have not asked for any federal assistance. But FEMA dispatched 96 truckloads of food, ice and water to holding points in Selma, Ala., and Montgomery, Ala., ready to go to disaster areas in those three states if needed, Walker said.

Additionally, 50 buses and 100 drivers were standing by in Carville, La., to help evacuate potential victims, he said.

Despite lessening concerns about Lake Okeechobee's levees, Army Corps spokeswoman Nanciann Regalado said the agency stockpiled 35,000 tons of concrete, stone and sandbags and ordered another 65,000 tons delivered. However, lake levels were still six feet below where levees might be expected to crack, Regalado said.

The Coast Guard also is warning at-sea mariners and boaters to stay away from coastal waters. Officials are reviewing plans to move aircraft at the region's air stations inland and out of the way of storm.

So far there have been no active duty deployments for Alberto through U.S. Northern Command, which oversees military units in the United States.

"There will be minimal or no need for active duty forces because the state of Florida, its first responders, and its state militia are well prepared to assist citizens of Florida," said Northern Command spokesman Michael Kucharek.

The command has asked the military services to be prepared to respond and provide needed supplies, equipment or the use of Defense Department installations.

Swift Evacuations Urged As Alberto Approaches (KRT)

By Martin Merzer And Gary Fineout

Knight Ridder, June 12, 2006

Tropical Storm Alberto, pushing a dome of sea water toward shore, quickened its assault on North Florida this evening. Officials urged coastal residents to swiftly evacuate the area.

"Its arrival on our shores will be much quicker than we were anticipating a few hours ago," Gov. Jeb Bush said shortly after 5:30 p.m. ``They need to get to high ground and they need to get safe."

The 2006 hurricane season is just 12 days old.

"Good God, who would have thunk it," Bush said.

During the past two seasons, eight hurricanes struck or brushed Florida.

Meanwhile, South Floridians were advised to expect heavy rain and gusty winds as squalls roam through the area.

Farther north, forecasters hurriedly issued a precautionary hurricane warning from Longboat Key near Sarasota through the Big Bend area to the Ochlockonee River south of Tallahassee. That means hurricane conditions -- wind stronger than 74 mph and heavy rain -- are expected within 24 hours.

The greatest danger: an eight- to 10-foot storm surge, the dome of water that rushes ashore as the storm's center approaches.

DOJ_NMG_0033325

"It's the storm surge that will be a problem," said Stanley Bair, owner of The Island Hotel on Cedar Key, an island just off Florida's Big Bend. ``It won't get into the hotel, but it will surround it, and people won't be able to get on or off the island."

Bair said every room is booked, largely by news crews, and ``we'll have rollaways in the lobby."

The hotel was built in 1859 and has survived every hurricane since.

Officials in six coastal counties, from Franklin County to Citrus County, told more than 20,000 residents to leave.

"It's not worth losing your life . . .," Bush said earlier today. ``Property can be rebuilt."

Several of those counties, including Wakulla, Taylor and Dixie, have been hit in the past with flooding due to storm surge from large storms.

Last year, Hurricane Dennis unexpectedly created a backwash of water into Wakulla County, while the infamous no-name storm of 1993 killed unsuspecting residents of Taylor County in the middle of the night.

"This is a part of the state where it doesn't take a big storm to cause a significant amount of flooding," said Craig Fugate, the state's emergency management chief.

Fortunately, the area is sparsely populated and can be quickly evacuated.

State officials said that local communities were gearing up to deal with the storm and that 17 shelters would open. An estimated 7,500 National Guard were on alert and ready to be deployed if needed.

"We're used to catching those first storms here in North Florida," said Chris Floyd, emergency services director of the Capital Area Chapter of the Red Cross in Tallahassee. ``We've got a lot of experience. Not that we necessarily want it to happen here, but I believe we're as prepared as we can be."

The 5 p.m. EDT forecast called for the center of Alberto to make landfall in the Big Bend area Tuesday morning as a borderline Category 1 hurricane with winds of about 75 mph, but most of its weather reached land long ahead of the center.

Isolated tornadoes were possible throughout much of the state, particularly in Central Florida and the Panhandle.

"Preparations to protect life and property should be rushed to completion," said forecaster Richard Pasch of the National Hurricane Center in West Miami-Dade County.

Bush issued a state of emergency for the entire state, an action that triggers laws against price gouging and gives him the power to waive tolls, activate the National Guard and close state facilities.

"This is a serious storm and we're taking it seriously," he said.

In South Florida, commuters traveled to work under gray skies, occasional showers and a heavy blanket of humidity. They were advised to expect soaking rain later in the day.

Forecasters also reinstated concerns over the possibility of severe thunderstorms, waterspouts and tornadoes, particularly in Central Florida and along the lower Gulf Coast, but also possibly in and near Miami-Dade and Broward counties.

A tornado watch was issued for Glades, Hendry and Collier counties.

Alberto grew out of the year's first tropical depression Sunday, an ominous sign of things to come during the hurricane season -- which was only 11 days old.

The storm initially struggled to keep itself together, but it coalesced and grew stronger overnight.

"The storm has been interacting with the warm Gulf of Mexico loop current, which has likely been a contributor to the intensification," Pasch said.

It then moved over cooler water and encountered hostile crosswinds, two factors that inhibited significant additional strengthening, he said.

Portions of Central and North Florida could absorb eight to 10 inches of rain, a prospect welcomed by firefighters who have been battling wildfires in those regions.

Farther south, Alberto produced 10 to 20 inches of rain over the western half of Cuba, with isolated totals of 30 inches over higher terrain

The six-month hurricane season, which began June 1 and ends Nov. 30, is expected to be another unusually active one.

The government's official outlook calls for 13 to 16 tropical storms that would become eight to 10 hurricanes, including four to six intense hurricanes with winds above 110 mph. Government experts expect two to four hurricanes to hit the United States this year.

Fla. Braces Itself As Alberto Rolls In (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, June 13, 2006

TAMPA — An unexpectedly strong Tropical Storm Alberto on Monday threatened to become the first hurricane of the season as it bore down on Florida's northern Gulf Coast, prompting an evacuation order for 20,000 people.

DOJ_NMG_0033326

Florida prepared for heavy rains and possible flooding from Alberto, which was due to come ashore early today during high tide somewhere between Tampa and the Panhandle.

Late Monday, the storm had sustained winds of 70 mph, just shy of the 74 mph threshold for a hurricane.

Forecasters issued hurricane warnings after Alberto shot up from 50 mph in three hours.

If it becomes a hurricane, Alberto would be the earliest hurricane of the season to strike land since Alma in 1966, the National Weather Service said.

Florida Gov. Jeb Bush urged people in low-lying parts of the coast to get out. “The storm has accelerated,” he said. “This brings the added problem of high tide, so we want to make sure people take this very, very seriously.”

Bush said there are 26 shelters open in 16 counties.

“If you were planning to evacuate, you need to do it tonight, not tomorrow morning,” he said.

More than 20,000 residents in low-lying areas along a 100-mile stretch of Citrus, Levy and Taylor counties were told to evacuate. An alert issued by the state emergency center warned that Alberto could come ashore at high tide, creating a 5- to 8-foot storm surge.

At the National Hurricane Center in Miami, forecaster Eric Blake said Alberto “went from a modest tropical storm to a strong tropical storm very quickly.” Blake said forecasters expect the storm to grow to Category 1 hurricane speeds by the time it reaches land but they do not expect it to intensify much further.

In Tampa, where a light drizzle fell Monday evening, most residents were not too worried about the storm. Windows remained free of plywood. Stores displayed full stocks of batteries, water and flashlights. Restaurants and bars buzzed with business.

“It's just not going to be a big wind event,” said Laura McCoy, 41, a bookkeeper and massage therapist who lives near the beach in Largo. “We have a generator. We have stuff left over from last year.

“I'm not worried about this one,” she said. “I'm a little worried about what the season holds ahead.”

Jill Jones, 41, a nurse from Tampa, made her hurricane preparations before the season began June 1. She has checked with her insurer to be sure she's fully covered, and she had her trees trimmed.

“My freezer is filled with ice. There's gas for the grill and a plan for the pets. I have a tarp if the roof blows off and plenty of candles,” Jones says.

Alberto formed off the coast of Cuba on Saturday, about 40 miles from Key West. Tropical-storm-force winds stretched 230 miles from its center, the National Hurricane Center reported.

Forecasters said 4 to 10 inches of rain could fall across Florida through today. Much of the rain is welcome in areas where wildfires have been common this spring, such as Volusia County on the Atlantic coast.

“We're looking forward to the moisture it is going to drop on us,” said Pat Kuehn, a spokeswoman for Volusia County Fire Services.

Last year's hurricane season was the most destructive on record with 28 named storms and a record 15 hurricanes. Hurricane Katrina devastated Louisiana and Mississippi and was blamed for more than 1,570 deaths among Louisiana residents alone.

Florida On Alert As Alberto Revs Up (ORS)

By Jim Stratton And Mark Hollis

The Orlando Sentinel, June 13, 2006

The first named storm of the hurricane season rumbled through the Gulf of Mexico on Monday, bringing much-needed rain to kindling-dry Central Florida but leaving low-lying coastal communities along the state's Big Bend region facing the specter of floods.

Tropical Storm Alberto strengthened in the Gulf and was expected to make landfall sometime early today. Late Monday, the storm had winds of near 70 mph, just 4 mph short of becoming a hurricane.

The state ordered 20,000 people living in low-lying areas along the Gulf to flee. Residents there could see a storm surge of 8 to 10 feet, enough to swamp homes, businesses and roads.

"The rain and the storm surge is a huge concern," said Daryll Gunter, commission chairman in the Gulf Coast area of Taylor County. "So much of the county is so low, even just a foot or two will be enough to cause major problems."

Mandatory evacuation orders were in place for low-lying areas in Taylor, Dixie, Levy, Franklin, Wakulla and Citrus counties. The National Hurricane Center posted a hurricane warning from Longboat Key near Sarasota to the Ochlockonee River near Tallahassee.

"We don't want to overdo it. It's not a Katrina or a Wilma, but storm surge and flooding could still cause loss of life," said Max Mayfield, director of the center west of Miami.

DOJ_NMG_0033327

If Alberto comes ashore as a hurricane, it would be the earliest in 40 years to hit the United States, forecasters said. The earliest on record is Hurricane Alma, which, in 1966, hit the Florida Panhandle on June?9 -- the ninth day of the hurricane season.

"Good God...Who would have thunk it?" said Gov. Jeb Bush, who signed an order placing Florida under a state of emergency. "This could potentially be a hurricane. It has a wide impact for a lot of people in our state." Most at risk appeared those living in the flood-prone areas along Florida's Big Bend. At least 17 shelters were opened in 11 counties along the Gulf.

Forecasters said the biggest concern was storm surge because the shallow waters in the Gulf allow the water to travel long distances without dissipating.

Even so, on Cedar Key, a popular tourist destination at the end of State Road 24, residents were generally unimpressed by Alberto, with many saying they planned to stay put.

"I can't change what's happening," said Ronnie Beckham, 54, a fisherman. "We'll just have to wait to see what happens tomorrow."

Beckham, however, did plan to move his 24-foot clam boat to higher ground.

The National Hurricane Center warned that Alberto could pick up strength throughout the night.

"Tuesday is a washout," said State Meteorologist Ben Nelson, "especially for the northern part of the state."

In Central Florida, Alberto spawned heavy downpours throughout Monday dumping almost 2 inches of rain at Orlando International Airport. Daytona Beach received 2 1/2 inches of rain. Today, Alberto is expected produce thunderstorms that might be accompanied by heavy downpours.

The storm is expected generate winds of 25 to 30 mph in and around Orlando by early today. North of the city -- in parts of Lake and western Volusia counties -- winds could reach 40?mph with gusts of 50 mph.

Monday, Alberto caused a handful of problems throughout the region.

Volusia County officials reported that wind gusts or a small tornado caused by the storm damaged two Enterprise homes on the shore of Little Lake. One home lost half its roof; the other had its chimney blown off.

The burst, which occurred a little after 1p.m., also pushed a boat parked in a driveway into a van parked nearby. No one was injured.

Resident Robert Evans said he heard "trees breaking" and "snapping metal," then he saw his neighbor's roof come off.

The neighbor, 67-year-old Cille Morris, is in Ireland where she lives half the year and does not know about the damage to her home, said friends who gathered in front of her house and watched as six firefighters pulled a blue tarp over the exposed roof. Her lawn was littered with scattered pieces of aluminum strips filled with nails and tufts of yellow insulation.

The home was outfitted with hurricane shutters.

"They took great care to have the place storm ready," said Carolyn Creech, who used to live up the road. "It's so sad." In Kissimmee, a giant osprey nest was blown from the top of a high-voltage utility pole onto the power lines below. The 300-pound nest, which appeared to contain no eggs or birds, knocked out power to more than 1,300 Kissimmee Utility Authority customers for more than an hour.

But in many ways, Alberto was a welcome visitor in parts of Central Florida.

Wildfires have smoldered for weeks in some counties, and the storm brought a heavy rain that officials hoped would finally let them get the upper hand.

"It's certainly going to help," said Orlando Dominguez, spokesman for Brevard County Fire Rescue. "This is the type of rain we need to soak into the ground."

In Brevard, smoke and flames from brush fires have caused numerous traffic accidents and forced officials to periodically shut down Interstate 95 and other major roads during the past several weeks.

In Volusia County, wildfires have burned more than 25,000 acres, said Timber Weller of the State Division of Forestry. Though county officials said all the fires have been contained, the bone-dry conditions have kept firefighters on alert.

"When the woods are as dry as they have been, fires just won't die," Weller said. "We have to keep going out there and monitoring them or at the least mopping them down."

In Osceola County, the rain was expected to help contain a 250-acre muck fire near U.S. Highway 192 and State Road 429. Friday, smoke from the underground fire had shut down a half-mile stretch of the area's busy tourist corridor. The road reopened Monday, but officials continued to monitor the fire, which, in some places, is burning 2 feet under the surface.

"It's like a big cigar out there smoldering," said Tom Donohoe of the Division of Forestry. "It takes quite a bit of rainfall to totally extinguish that thing."

That rain could come in the future, but it might not be nearly as innocuous as the soaking provided by Alberto.

Forecasters expect another busy hurricane season, predicting up to 17 named storms with up to nine hurricanes. Of those, up to six could be become major storms.

DOJ_NMG_0033328

Storm Nears Hurricane Strength And The Gulf Coast Of Florida (NYT)

By Terry Aguayo

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

MIAMI, June 12 — A hurricane warning was issued on Monday and evacuations were ordered for parts of the Florida Gulf Coast as the season's first tropical storm intensified on a path that could bring it ashore as a hurricane.

The National Hurricane Center put out the warning for a 300-mile stretch from Longboat Key, near Sarasota, to Ochlockonee Bay, south of Tallahassee.

Early Monday evening, the storm, named Alberto, had winds of 70 miles per hour, just 4 m.p.h. shy of hurricane speed. Landfall is expected Tuesday.

"We're forecasting the worst-case scenario just to be sure everyone is prepared in case a minor fluctuation does occur," said Michelle Mainelli, at the hurricane center.

Forecasters were mostly concerned with an expected four to six inches of rain and flooding from storm surges along parts of the coast, Ms. Mainelli said.

"We're really stressing those as our main concerns," she said. "Some isolated areas may even see up to 10 inches of rainfall."

Gov. Jeb Bush told reporters at an afternoon briefing at the state's Emergency Operations Center in Tallahassee that evacuation orders had been issued for residents in low-lying areas in six counties between Tampa and Tallahassee along the Gulf coast.

"If you are ordered to evacuate, you should really do it," Mr. Bush said. "Don't think you can ride out a storm. It's not worth losing one's life."

The governor said that 17 shelters in 11 counties were ready to open. He declared a state of emergency for the state, giving him the power to enforce price-gouging laws and activate 7,500 National Guard troops.

The areas singled out for evacuation are less populated than many other areas of Florida, and Craig Fugate, the emergency management chief, said that because they were not in major media markets, it might be harder to get the word out.

Mr. Fugate and other state officials said they remained worried that Tropical Storm Alberto might prove to be a repeat of a storm that struck the East Coast in March 1993 and left more than 40 people dead in Florida.

That 1993 storm was not a hurricane, but it pushed an enormous wall of water into the same areas now in Tropical Storm Alberto's path. Ten people died in Taylor County, part of which was ordered evacuated on Monday.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency said it was "coordinating with state and local officials as they make decisions for their communities on evacuations and response activities."

Gulf Coast residents were making their own preparations. At a Home Depot in St. Petersburg, Frances Musgrave, 79, shopped for sandbags.

"I always keep a little dried milk, boil my eggs and make sure I have bread and sandwich meats," Ms. Musgrave said.

The storm began as a tropical depression on Saturday, nine days into the hurricane season, which ends Nov. 30. Before threatening Florida, it caused flooding in Cuba and prompted the evacuation of 25,000 people in Pinar del Rio province, the Cuban newspaper Granma reported.

Government forecasters have predicted that 13 to 16 tropical storms will form in the Atlantic Ocean this season. Of those, 8 to 10 are likely to become hurricanes, they say, and as many as 6 may be Category 3 strength or higher, carrying winds stronger than 111 m.p.h.

Florida Braces For Early-Arriving Alberto (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

MIAMI -- Thousands of residents along Florida's Gulf Coast were ordered to evacuate Monday as Tropical Storm Alberto, which had intensified unexpectedly, threatened to become the state's earliest hurricane in decades to make landfall.

Gov. Jeb Bush declared a state of emergency and urged residents of low-lying coastal areas, where the storm surge is estimated to be as high as 10 feet, to evacuate. He also expressed the widespread sense of surprise at the possibility of Alberto reaching land so soon after the June 1 start of the hurricane season.

"Good God. Who would have thunk it?" he said. "This potentially could be a hurricane."

Hurricane aircraft reconnaissance on Monday showed that Alberto had almost reached hurricane strength, with winds of nearly 70 mph. The storm evolved from a tropical depression that formed in the northwestern Caribbean on Saturday. It then drew strength from the warm waters of the "loop current" in the Gulf of Mexico.

DOJ_NMG_0033329

The storm is large, with tropical storm-force winds extending 230 miles from its center, and hurricane warnings were in effect for a long stretch of Florida's Gulf Coast. Storms are deemed hurricanes once sustained winds reach 74 mph.

"We're getting everyone out now," said Maj. Bill Poole of the Wakulla County Sheriff's Office. "The National Weather Service predicts that we should have a possible 10-foot surge at 4:47 a.m. That could put us close to the same situation we had in Hurricane Dennis."

The surge from Dennis caused widespread flooding and damage in the area, he said.

Along the coast on Monday, tourists headed out, and news crews rushed in to capture what may be the first hurricane after Hurricane Katrina.

Grocery stores filled with residents seeking supplies; marinas were busy with sailors hauling their boats out; and cars lined up at gas stations as people topped off their tanks.

Officials with the Federal Emergency Management Agency said they were meeting with state emergency managers and "mobilizing" 96 trucks with food, water and ice.

"The tourists are gone," said Stanley Bair, the owner of the historic Island Hotel on Cedar Key. "If it hits at high tide, which it's predicted to, we could get some severe flooding."

Eric Blake, a meteorologist at the National Hurricane Center, said that if Alberto makes landfall as a hurricane, it would be the earliest a hurricane has struck the state in 40 years.

"Hurricanes making landfall in June are few and far between," he said.

Many residents read the early arrival of Alberto as a portent of a rough hurricane season. the National Hurricane Center has warned that storm activity will be above normal, possibly producing as many as 16 named storms. Last year was the busiest on record.

But Blake played down Alberto's value as an omen.

"Early-season storms of this type don't tell us much," he said.

Moreover, it was still not clear whether Alberto would attain hurricane status and maintain it through landfall early Tuesday morning.

Forecasters were predicting that Alberto's winds would reach 75 mph before landfall, but hurricane intensity is notoriously difficult to predict.

By the 5 p.m. report from the National Hurricane Center, Alberto had passed by the warm water of the loop current that had helped it intensify earlier, and there was some doubt that its winds would reach the 74-mph mark of a hurricane.

"After the sudden strengthening episode observed earlier today, the storm has leveled off in intensity," the National Hurricane Center forecasters said. "The cloud pattern has become rather elongated. . . . Nonetheless, slight strengthening is still possible before landfall."

Insurance Regulators Get Busy (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — The nation's insurance regulators are calling on Congress to investigate ways to help states, insurers and homeowners to better deal with disasters such as Hurricane Katrina.

The National Association of Insurance Commissioners, state officials who regulate the property insurance industry, adopted at a quarterly meeting here a resolution proposing a Federal Natural Catastrophe Preparedness Commission.

Among the proposals the regulators want the panel to consider: a national catastrophe fund to backstop private insurance companies to encourage them to stay in the market.

The resolution comes in the wake of nearly $60 billion in hurricane-related property insurance losses last year. The first named storm of the 2006 hurricane season, Alberto, is expected to hit Florida's Gulf Coast today.

Alarmed by their recent hurricane losses and forecasts of more powerful storms, insurance companies are refusing to renew hundreds of thousands of coastal homeowners' policies in Florida, Texas, New York, Massachusetts and other states.

Insurance premiums for windstorm insurance coverage in many coastal areas have skyrocketed.

Last week, Allstate, the USA's second-biggest property insurer, announced it's dropping earthquake coverage for 352,000 policyholders nationwide — 86% of all earthquake policies it has issued — to cut its risk of catastrophe losses.

Maine Insurance Superintendent Alessandro Iuppa, who heads the NAIC, said that a federally coordinated program is the best way to address threats from hurricanes, earthquakes and floods.

“No place in the country is immune to natural disaster,” Iuppa said.

State regulators worry that a shortage of private insurance and the lack of an overall federal catastrophe strategy will put more pressure on individual states and their taxpayers when disaster strikes.

DOJ_NMG_0033330

In Florida, for example, the state legislature just voted to spend $1.2 billion in tax funds to bolster its state-run insurer and improve hurricane preparedness.

Florida's state-run insurance company, which sells policies to homeowners when they can't get coverage in the private market, is expected to become the state's biggest property insurer. That's because private companies have dropped so many policies.

Because of the huge storm losses last year, private insurance companies are also paying more for reinsurance, the insurance they buy to protect themselves from unexpectedly high claims.

And it's harder to get. Demand for reinsurance far exceeds supply, Bradley Kading, the president of a trade association representing reinsurers, told an NAIC committee on Monday. Laws regulating building codes, storm preparedness and insurance coverage vary by state. Among the issues the NAIC wants the proposed commission to consider:

·Incentives for states to adopt stronger building codes that would make buildings more resistant to disaster damage.

·Incentives for property owners to retrofit existing homes and buildings to harden them against storms and earthquakes.

·Allowing private insurers nationwide to accumulate reserves tax-deferred so they have sufficient cash for insurance claims after a disaster.

U.S. Gives Charter Schools A Big Push In New Orleans (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, June 12 — Education Secretary Margaret Spellings announced Monday that $24 million in federal aid had been awarded to Louisiana for the development of charter schools, more than doubling what the state has already received to help create such schools in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

The grant is likely to cement the role of New Orleans — where the public school system is barely functional — as the nation's pre-eminent laboratory for the widespread use of charter schools. The schools are paid for with public money but are usually operated by nonprofit groups or parent organizations.

There are at least 45 charter schools in Louisiana, with most having opened since Hurricane Katrina. The highest concentration is in New Orleans, where the school system is now dominated by charter operators. Eighteen of the 25 schools open in New Orleans are charter schools, receiving public financing but operating independently.

With the arrival of so many charter schools so quickly, a majority of the city's students will be part of the experiment, whether they want to be or not, because the number of traditional public schools has dwindled to seven.

Ms. Spellings spoke at a school in rural, flood-ruined Plaquemines Parish, south of New Orleans along the Mississippi River, where only three of nine public schools survived.

Given similar widespread devastation across the state after Hurricane Katrina and then Hurricane Rita, she said, charter schools are the best way to jump-start the state's education recovery. Her comments echoed the Bush administration's support for such schools across the nation.

The city's public school system was already in chaos and considered among the most abysmal in the nation before the storm. After Hurricane Katrina, it suffered a near total collapse and has not even begun to bounce back, though the state has taken control of most of New Orleans's schools.

"Just the fact that the charter schools are the ones that are open is testament to their ability to cut through red tape and be responsive to families where and when they need them," Ms. Spellings said in an interview.

So far, it is difficult to judge the schools academically. Those evaluations are expected sometime this summer.

"We'll keep a watchful eye on that," Ms. Spellings said. "But so far, so good."

She said she hoped the infusion of money would help expand existing charter schools and open 20 to 30 more across the state.

The expansion is prompting debate in New Orleans and elsewhere about whether this is the right path to follow. At least one large national study due to be released next month suggests that classroom instruction is no better in the city's charter schools and that the schools are hampered by logistical problems and a lack of citywide coherence.

"That's part of the puzzle that no one's addressing yet, and it worries me over the long run," said Michael Casserly, executive director of the Council of the Great City Schools, a lobbying group for urban districts that conducted the study. "The grand intent to remake teaching and schools so far only extends to a conversation of who gets to run them, not what gets taught in them."

"Nobody is quite rushing to say let's model ourselves after New Orleans," Mr. Casserly said, "because it's not clear at this early point whether this strategy is likely to work."

Officials of the charter schools, however, expressed enthusiasm about Ms. Spellings's visit and the additional grant money.

DOJ_NMG_0033331

"We're proud that the federal government continues to support charter schools," said David Grubb, the communications director for the Algiers Charter Schools Association, which operates six schools in New Orleans. "This can go a long way to restructure and rehabilitate what has been a hard-hit educational system."

Police Struggles In New Orleans Raise Old Fears (NYT)

By Christopher Drew

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, June 9 — Within the Police Department here, the SWAT team is known as The Final Option. Before Hurricane Katrina, it was assigned to the city's worst crimes, and as residents return, it is once again kicking in the doors at the worst drug dens and engaging in shootouts with violent offenders.

But the team is also running dangerously low on firepower. Flooding ruined 300 of its guns, its bullet-resistant shields and the bulk of its ammunition, none of which have been replaced more than nine months after the hurricane. The 40-man team has had to borrow body armor from suburban forces, and the Police Department is lining up corporate sponsors to contribute more.

"I tell you what: we're hurting," said the team's commander, Capt. Jeffrey Winn.

The SWAT unit's difficulties reflect how far from normal many police operations remain here, as residents return and another hurricane season begins. Like the rest of the city, the police force is still struggling to recover from the calamity of Hurricane Katrina, which knocked out its headquarters, overwhelmed its ability to maintain control and prompted desertions that tarnished the force's reputation.

Now, as the department tries to fight its way back, sharp budget cuts — and a recent spike in drug-related killings in the city — are adding to fears that years of overhauls and modernization may be undone, and that New Orleans could return to its former notoriety as one of the nation's murder capitals.

There is also concern that the department's own notoriety could resurface. For some residents, the sense that the city is on edge and the department's future uncertain has brought echoes of the days when the local police were considered among the least competent and most racist and brutal in the nation.

"Given where they are mentally and emotionally, we've gotten more citizen complaints about the way the police are treating people than we have in a long time," said Oliver M. Thomas Jr., the City Council president. "Over the last two years, they'd been getting better and more professional. But I've been hearing lots of complaints about verbal abuse."

The blunt-talking new police superintendent, Warren J. Riley, insists he will not let the drug dealers and "gutter punks" take over again. Mr. Riley says many officers have not gotten the credit they deserve for "standing tall" during the storm, and he is determined to restore discipline and a sense of professionalism among the others. He has also formed an intelligence unit to track the most ruthless crime suspects and built strong ties with federal authorities to help catch them. But in other areas, problems abound.

More than 200 officers deserted during the storm and were fired or suspended. Many veteran officers retired, and some of the youngest officers quit and left town. As a result, the size of the force has dropped to about 1,400 officers on the street now, from nearly 1,700 before the hurricane. Recruiting replacements is difficult, partly because it is hard for candidates to find affordable housing, Mr. Riley said.

Because of the deterioration of the city's finances, he said, the department's budget has been slashed by 19 percent, from $124 million in 2005 to $100 million this year. It has received federal or state aid to replace many of the 300 patrol cars lost to flooding, buy new uniforms and restore its communications system. But it is awaiting federal assistance to replace other gear, like the SWAT team's weapons.

With the police headquarters still shuttered, Mr. Riley and his top commanders are working out of trailers. And while forensic experts are making progress in restoring many of the items from the flooded police evidence room, newly gathered evidence is being stored in rental trucks parked at what was once a motor-vehicle inspection station.

The storm has also left a lingering emotional toll. More than 80 percent of the officers lost their homes, and some have had to double up with other officers or move to distant suburbs to find housing they can afford on their salaries of $35,000 to $50,000. Many who were heroes in the storm, plucking victims out of the floodwaters, are also resentful that their actions were overshadowed by those who abandoned their posts.

And with many residents here under stress, the police say they are also receiving more back talk from people stopped for even minor violations. "Since the storm, you have a lot of displaced anger among many people, and it seems that police officers always get the brunt of that displaced anger," said Capt. Kevin B. Anderson, the police commander in the French Quarter.

But in the end, nearly everyone here realizes that what defines the Police Department is how well it handles crime, particularly in terms of the murder rate. Before the storm, the city averaged 250 to 300 murders a year, always placing it at, or near, the top spot in the nation on a per-capita basis. So far this year, there have been 45 murders — most of them in the last two months — compared with 114 at this time in 2005, when the city's population was at least twice what it is now.

DOJ_NMG_0033332

Superintendent Riley — who was promoted from the department's No. 2 job after his more flamboyant predecessor, Edwin P. Compass III, resigned after criticism over the police response to the hurricane — appeared on radio talk shows recently to outline his crime-fighting plans. They include repeated raids in the poorer neighborhoods that have been resettled, where he said drug dealers who had lived in different parts of the city were converging and killing one another over turf.

The superintendent also urged residents to band together to demand a toughening of the city's criminal justice system, where jury trials resumed only recently. Drug dealers who evacuated to Houston are returning home because it is much easier here to avoid jail, Mr. Riley said, through the "revolving door" of the New Orleans court system.

The courts have long been criticized as relying on plea bargains and setting lenient bail. And since the hurricane, the public defender system has been so short of money and staffing that one judge, Arthur L. Hunter Jr., recently moved to let some people already in custody back onto the streets.

Mr. Riley said, for instance, that police officers were in a shootout last month with one man who had been roaming a deserted neighborhood while wearing an ankle bracelet. He was supposed to be under house arrest while awaiting trial on a burglary charge, but the authorities had apparently not responded to the bracelet monitoring system.

"Obviously, the murder risk factors are coming back," said Peter Scharf, a criminologist at the University of New Orleans, "and this creates incredible challenges." Whether a growing nervousness about the murder rate gives way again to a feeling of being under siege could end up determining if many people return home and tourists start coming back.

Captain Anderson, the French Quarter commander, said there had been only two murders there this year, along with several stabbings among construction workers carousing on Bourbon Street. He also said the SWAT team had been called in for undercover patrols after groups of youths had accosted people.

James F. Scott, the deputy police superintendent, said the department's intelligence bureau had focused on 112 drug dealers and murder suspects, and 30 had since been captured. Mr. Scott said some drug dealers who evacuated to Houston were killed in turf wars with gangs there, while others were now moving back and forth between the two cities, almost like commuters.

He added that federal prosecutors here were now bringing charges in smaller drug-sale and gun-possession cases to help get criminals off the street. "Since the storm, that is one of the most positive things that has happened to the Police Department," Mr. Scott said.

The department has also worked with the Louisiana National Guard to avoid a repeat of last year's disastrous storm response. Superintendent Riley said 3,000 troops could be in the city ahead of a storm, with high-water trucks and satellite communications gear positioned to assist each police district. There will also be more boats on hand for search-and-rescue operations.

Barring another disaster, Mr. Riley said, "Katrina has given us an opportunity to refocus our educational system, our economic system and our law-enforcement efforts, and change the culture of this city."

"If we're able to change it," he said, "that would give us a silver lining."

AFL-CIO Plans New Orleans Boom (USAT)

By Anne Rochell Konigsmark

USA Today, June 13, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — In what may be the start of the city's development boom, the AFL-CIO plans to invest $1 billion to develop 10,000 affordable homes and a new downtown hotel.

The investment, confirmed Monday by the AFL-CIO, is the labor coalition's most ambitious funding project ever. It also is one of the largest yet for New Orleans and seeks to bring new housing to a city where Hurricane Katrina destroyed more than 100,000 homes.

The money will come from the AFL-CIO's 40-year-old Housing Investment Trust, which invests worker pensions in affordable housing and requires union labor on the projects.

“So little has been done,” AFL-CIO President John Sweeney says, referring to the dearth of new development in the nine months since the storm. “It feels like this is the city that America forgot, and I hope our investment will jump-start other investments.”

After months of sluggish recovery, there has been a flurry of development news in recent weeks in New Orleans, including plans for a $700 million jazz district downtown. There are several affordable housing plans in the works: Enterprise Community Partners wants to build 6,500 affordable units in partnership with the Archdiocese of New Orleans. Habitat for Humanity soon will begin building 10 houses every two weeks with a goal of building 1,500 in the next three to five years.

DOJ_NMG_0033333

The AFL-CIO plans to begin by buying 200 blighted or abandoned properties owned by the city in the historic Treme, a working-class, mostly black neighborhood that saw minor damage from Katrina. The plan also calls for construction of a high-rise hotel along the Mississippi River.

Jim Kelly of Catholic Charities, which is working with Enterprise and the AFL-CIO, says the city needs all the affordable housing it can get. “We were a poor city prior to Katrina,” he says.

Development activity is picking up for several reasons, not the least of which is that billions in federal dollars to buy people out of their flood-damaged homes is set to begin flowing this summer.

Some developers are worried that because of tax incentives, there will be too much affordable housing and not enough mixed income developments.

“You can overload the city with affordable housing,” local developer Pres Kabakoff says. “It's important we don't end up with concentratedly poor neighborhoods.”

For Many Of Katrina's Young Victims, The Scars Are More Than Skin Deep (WP)

By Julia Cass

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- This year's hurricane season has just begun, and already it is producing a new surge of anxiety in Gulf Coast children.

Children at a day-care center in Gautier, Miss., ask their caregivers every day: "Did you watch the Weather Channel? What does the Weather Channel say?" In a New Orleans trailer park, a 12-year-old boy who spent five days outside the convention center after Hurricane Katrina and saw a woman in a wheelchair slowly die pleads with his mother to buy a car so they can escape the next big one. An 8-year-old girl is convinced that another hurricane will hit New Orleans -- she is even sure it will be on June 15 and a Category 8 (a rating that doesn't exist).

Ten months after Katrina, its emotional effect on children is proving to be long and lasting. Two studies of children affected by the hurricane have found high rates of depression, anxiety, behavioral problems and post-traumatic stress disorder.

A Louisiana State University mental health screening of nearly 5,000 children in schools and temporary housing in the state found that 96 percent saw hurricane damage to their homes or neighborhoods, 22 percent had relatives or friends who were injured, 14 percent had relatives or friends who died, and 35 percent lost pets. Thirty-four percent were separated from their primary caregivers at some point; 9 percent still are.

The concern for the Katrina children is not just the immediate trauma from the storm, but that so much of their lives remains disrupted.

A report prepared for Congress last November estimated that 189,000 children were dislocated by Katrina; about 110,000 still do not live where they did nine months ago. Some children have attended as many as nine schools since August. Those who have returned to school in New Orleans often do not attend the same schools with the same students or teachers as before.

"Disasters like Oklahoma City and 9/11 were time-limited," said Irwin Redlener, director of Columbia University's National Center for Disaster Preparedness and president of the Children's Health Fund, an advocacy group and care provider for medically underserved children. "The children who were affected psychologically could go to a place of normalcy. The difference here is not only the scope of devastation but the prolonged dislocation with an uncertain timeline. The trauma has not yet ended."

Justyn Green, 12, and his brother Jaleel, 8, spent six days at the Louisiana Superdome in New Orleans with their mother and father -- hot, hungry, thirsty, dirty and frightened. They heard gunfire and saw dead people. They got out at one point, only to be forced to return when police in a nearby town turned away thousands of evacuees at gunpoint. When they finally boarded a bus to leave -- after enduring a line so long they could barely stand -- they thought the horror was over, but it wasn't. The bus flipped over near Opelousas, and their father was killed.

The boys "didn't say a word" at the Superdome, said their mother, Joy Green. "They looked so lost and scared. There was no security at all. You were on your own."

The boys still don't talk much. In their ranch-style brick home in Algiers, which in the end suffered no storm damage, they sit at the kitchen table and draw pictures. They have been drawing for months, encouraged by a psychiatrist as a way to express themselves and describe their experiences.

"At first, they drew a lot of coffins," said the psychiatrist, Barbara Hamm. "Now they draw the Dome and men with guns." She and their mother attribute their obsession with guns and what they call "Army men" to having guns pointed at them and to their perception of the military men in the Superdome as menacing rather than protective.

The boys' 17-year-old brother, James, who was named after their father, evacuated to Arkansas with friends. Although he didn't experience the horrors of the Superdome, he has dropped out of school and won't go for counseling with his mother and siblings. "He won't talk about it, so I'm not sure what's going on with him," Joy Green said. "He did say one time that he shouldn't have told us to evacuate. He said, 'If I hadn't have told you to go, Daddy would still be alive.' "

DOJ_NMG_0033334

Many children are having difficulties adjusting after Katrina. The screening by LSU found that more than 30 percent of them showed symptoms of depression or post-traumatic stress disorder.

In a study by Columbia University and the Children's Health Fund of 665 displaced families, nearly half of the parents reported that at least one child in their household had emotional or behavioral difficulties that were not present before the hurricane. Symptoms involve feeling sad or depressed, being nervous or afraid, and having problems sleeping or getting along with others. Compared with children surveyed in Louisiana in 2003, Katrina's victims were more than twice as likely to have behavioral or conduct problems; the same was true of depression and anxiety, the survey found.

Patterns are beginning to emerge. "The younger children lack the cognitive ability to grasp the idea of a once-in-a-hundred-year storm," said Elmore Rigamer, a psychiatrist who is medical director of Catholic Charities Archdiocese of New Orleans. "For them, if it happened once, the world is an unsafe place."

Elementary and middle school children can be both more withdrawn and more aggressive, and their anxiety often comes out in physical symptoms such as headaches and stomachaches. Rigamer described a 6-year-old boy from hurricane-devastated St. Bernard Parish. "He's a meticulous boy who'd started to collect stamps and toy soldiers. Now, they're all gone," she said. "His mother brought him to me because he's punching kids at school, he quit learning to read and he's hoarding food."

Rainy days frighten the weather-obsessed children at Gautier Academy Child Development Center in Gautier, near Pascagoula. "When it's cloudy, they don't want to go outside," said Cynthia Matthews, the academy's owner. "It's as if they're afraid of the sky."

Teenagers seem affected most by social isolation. Joy Osofsky, an LSU professor of pediatrics and psychiatry, said that when she worked with a group of young people in a shelter in rural Louisiana about a week after the storm, she expected to hear stories of terrible experiences; some of them had been in the Superdome or were rescued from rooftops.

"Some talked about that, but what they talked about more was missing friends," she said. "They used to be in constant touch by e-mail or cellphones, and they felt very isolated."

The older children, while suffering, often show strength, said Howard Osofsky, chairman of LSU's psychiatry department, who with his wife is leading the university's screening of Katrina children.

"One reason our clinicians work around the clock and are so dedicated is how inspiring these kids can be. They really do have symptoms of mental distress," he said. "Yet when you ask their first concerns, so many say they want to help their parents or help in the rebuilding."

Younger children can be especially resilient, Joy Osofsky said. "If their parents are able to give them support and stability, most will bounce back and do what children do -- play," she said.

For this reason, experts say that efforts to help Katrina children should focus not just on them but on their families. A number of charities and nonprofit organizations have established or are raising money for programs such as free family mental health screening, trauma counseling in schools, and summer programs for children who have fallen behind in school or who live in Federal Emergency Management Agency trailer parks, which have no playgrounds.

Some advocates, including the Children's Health Fund, have called on the federal government to allocate $100 million to send a force of pediatricians, family doctors, specially trained mental health workers and mobile medical vans to the Gulf Coast. The Children's Defense Fund, another advocacy group, likewise is calling for emergency health and mental health services.

For parents, their children's well-being has become one of their biggest concerns in trying to return to a normal life.

Joy Green hasn't yet returned to her job at the Zatarain's plant, which packages rice, because of her worries about her three sons. "I can't hardly focus. It's depressing. The only thing that keeps me going are my kids," she said. "I'm afraid for them."

Clinton Links GOP Policies To More Storms (AP)

By Brendan Farrington

The AP, June 12, 2006

As Tropical Storm Alberto threatened to strengthen into the ninth hurricane in 22 months to affect Florida, former President Clinton predicted Monday that Republican environmental policies will lead to more severe storms.

"It is now generally recognized that while Al Gore and I were ridiculed, we were right about global warming," Clinton said at a fundraiser for the Florida Democratic Party. "It's a serious problem. It's going to lead to more hurricanes."

Gore's documentary, "An Inconvenient Truth," chronicles the former vice president's efforts to educate the public about global warming. It's in limited release around the country.

In his critique of the GOP, Clinton also touched on the war in Iraq, the rising federal deficit and high health care costs. The crowd of about 500 greeted him with loud applause and shouts of "We love you, Bill!" and "Four more years!"

DOJ_NMG_0033335

Jeff Sadosky, spokesman for the state Republican Party, decried Clinton's rhetoric. "Bill Clinton's class warfare and race-baiting message gets us no closer to solutions for the issues he brings up," he said.

Sadosky referred in part to Clinton's comments earlier this month in Arizona. At that event, Clinton characterized Republican Party leaders as right-wing, white Southerners.

President Clinton Slams GOP In Orlando Speech (PALMBEACHP)

By Alan Gomez

Palm Beach Post (FL), June 13, 2006

ORLANDO — President Clinton railed against the Republican decision to invade Iraq and their stance on the national deficit, health care, lobbyists and environmental regulations during a wide-ranging speech Monday.

But his core message to a group of about 500 Democrats was a plea to unify their message during the upcoming elections.

"We believe in equal opportunity and shared responsibilities and an inclusive American community," Clinton said, repeating the phrase three times during his speech.

By contrast, he said Republicans stood only for concentrating wealth and power in the hands of those who agree with them.

"Those are their values," he said. "They think they're good people and they're better than we are and that America works better when they run everything."

Clinton's speech came during his second Florida stop in as many days.

On Sunday, he helped raise over $500,000 for U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson in his bid to win reelection over a crowded Republican field led by U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris. On Monday, he headlined a Florida Democratic Party event that was supposed to feature both Democratic gubernatorial candidates — U.S. Rep. Jim Davis of Tampa and state Sen. Rod Smith of Alachua.

Smith didn't show due to the harsh weather caused by Tropical Storm Alberto, while Davis took full advantage of the solo appearance by shaking hands and offering a fiery speech to the crowd.

But the main draw of the event was clear even before Clinton even spoke a word. People raced into the convention room to line up along the path he took to the podium and a man garnered a loud ovation when he yelled out "four more years" as Clinton took the stage.

Party spokesman Mark Bubriski said the event netted over $250,000, with tickets starting at $200 and about 75 people taking advantage of a $2,000 offer to snap a photo with Clinton.

But hearing how clearly Clinton was able to offer not just a scalding of the Republican-led administration but an articulate alternative was both exciting and depressing for some in attendance.

"I really wish we could get someone who could speak as clearly as him," said Jeff Dearmin, 52, an Orlando computer programmer.

Dearmin said he will wait until the September primary before deciding whether to vote for Davis or Smith, who appear to be in a dead heat to win the Democratic nomination. Dearmin said he will vote for whoever is up in the polls at that time, since neither of them have been able to make it clear to Floridians who is the better choice.

That sentiment was echoed often in the Orlando convention hall.

"Either of them would be acceptable," said Chris Goff, 54, of Winter Park.

When told that her comment sounded far from a glowing endorsement of either candidate, Goff amended her thought.

"Ok. Either of them would be a drastic improvement over what we have now," she said. "It's time for the Bushes to go away."

While Clinton opened his comments explaining that his current role as world-traveling humanitarian kept him out of the political arena, he quickly embarked on a long diatribe against the Republican-led institutions in Washington.

When speaking about the federal government's inability to provide adequate health care to Americans and the confusing mess that they've made of the Medicare drug plan for seniors, he quickly pointed to the work his wife, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, is doing in New York.

He said he agreed with U.S. Sen. Bob Graham that America should have finished the job in Afghanistan and given United Nations inspectors more time in Iraq before going after Saddam Hussein.

"We believe we should act with others whenever we can and act alone only when we're forced to, and they believe it the other way around -- they should act alone when they can and work with others only when they're forced to," Clinton said.

Above all, Clinton said, Democrats must offer an alternative to the Republicans rather than simply focusing on their struggles in recent years.

He urged the group to explain their values and principles to other voters in the upcoming elections instead of simply pointing out Republican flaws.

DOJ_NMG_0033336

"We're going to do just fine," he said.

WAR NEWS:

Bush: Zarqawi's Death "A Major Blow To Al Qaeda" (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush said today the death of Abu Musab Zarqawi would not end the war in Iraq, but "it was a major blow to Al Qaeda" and its allies.

Bush spoke during a day-long series of meetings at Camp David with his top national security advisors assessing the progress of the war and looking at prospects for success in coming months.

The president summoned cabinet members to the presidential retreat in Maryland's Catoctin Mountains for the meetings today. On Tuesday, they will be joined in a video conference with the leaders of the new Iraqi government reporting from Baghdad.

With reporters and photographers present for a three-minute photo session after a briefing by Gen. John Abizaid, the commander of the Central Command, and Gen. George Casey, the commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, Bush praised the military officers and Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, for what he said was realistic assessment of the situation there.

"Your recommendations are valid," he said. Officials did not disclose details of the talks.

Bush also asked them to relay his congratulations to the troops who worked on the ground "bringing Zarqawi to justice."

"I fully recognize that's not going to end the war," the president said. "On the other hand, it was a major blow to Al Qaeda and the killers and terrorists that are trying to spread violence and suffering, and stop the emergence of a new democracy."

The sessions took place at the Laurel lodge. Among those joining Bush were Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, John Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, director of the Central Intelligence Agency, and Gen. Peter Pace of the Marine Corps, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

An afternoon session was to include a discussion with non-governmental experts on Iraq, terrorism and the Middle East.

White House counselor Dan Bartlett, who took part in the meetings, said the sessions were organized because Iraq was facing a "fundamental break point."

"The post-Zarqawi climate is still viewed as serious and vexing.....It's still too early to tell," he said of what may happen in the period after the death, as the result of a U.S. air raid, of the Al Qaeda leader in Iraq.

Bartlett said Bush and Casey did not talk about troop levels, and administration officials have said for several days that the meetings were not scheduled to consider such details as how many troops were needed in Iraq.

Rather, Bartlett said, the group talked about "bolstering the Baghdad area, how intelligence is developing....and how to act on that intelligence."

Bush Confers Today With Iraqi Leaders (AJC)

By Ken Herman, Bob Deans

Atlanta Journal-Constitution, June 13, 2006

After a day of talks with his advisers and critics of his strategy in Iraq, President Bush will meet Iraq's new leaders today in a teleconference.

"Success in Iraq will depend upon the capacity of the new government to provide for its people," Bush said after the private sessions at Camp David, Md.

Despite last week's bombing of terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, public opinion remains negative on Bush's handling of the war. Monday night, CBS released poll results showing the president's approval rating had actually declined since May, from 35 percent to 33 percent.

On Capitol Hill, Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) launched what is expected to be a week of debate in the Senate on Iraq. He introduced a plan that would require Bush to bring all U.S. combat troops out of Iraq by year's end, leaving behind only a small team to fight insurgents and enough soldiers to train Iraqi security forces.

To help end the bloodshed in Iraq, Kerry called for a global summit modeled after the Dayton, Ohio, diplomacy that helped bring an end to fighting in Bosnia a decade ago.

Kerry's measure was an amendment to a bill that would authorize $509 billion in military spending for the next fiscal year. In a speech opening debate on the bill, Sen. Saxby Chambliss (R-Ga.) denounced any call for mandated troop withdrawals.

DOJ_NMG_0033337

"I believe that there might be some amendments filed to this bill that seek to immediately withdraw troops or set a timetable for troop withdrawal," Chambliss said. "Clearly, both these approaches are extremely unwise."

The House will debate Iraq policy on Thursday as part of a GOP election-year strategy to draw distinctions between parties. "There are clear differences between Republicans and Democrats on how best to confront the global war on terror," House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said.

Bush, at Camp David, made no move toward troop withdrawals. But his guest list for the session there indicated the White House is more willing than in the past to hear from naysayers. The four invited experts all supported the invasion of Iraq, but have accused Bush of incompetence.

The experts were Fred Kagan of the American Enterprise Institute, Eliot Cohen of Johns Hopkins University's Nitze School of Advanced International Studies, journalist and Middle East expert Robert Kaplan and Michael Vickers of the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments.

Cohen has written about "cockamamie schemes" by the White House and reassessed his support of the war in July 2005 as his son prepared to deploy to Iraq. "What I did not know then that I do know now is just how incompetent we would be at carrying out that task," he wrote.

In an August 2005 online chat with The Washington Post, Kagan agreed with Bush that early troop withdrawals were not the way to go. But he was critical of past tactics.

"We went into Iraq with too few troops and an insufficiently developed plan for the post-war situation," Kagan said.

He said the administration made a "terrible mistake" in disbanding the Iraqi army after the invasion. The result, said Kagan, left ex-soldiers armed, "shamed and unemployed."

Vickers wrote in June 2004 that the effort in Iraq was hamstrung by "unrealistic expectations and flawed political and military strategies." Kaplan has warned against "lust to implement democracy overnight in a country with no tradition of it."

Bush said he convened the Camp David meeting with Vice President Dick Cheney and a dozen top national security officials to map steps to bolster the newly installed Iraqi government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

White House counselor Dan Bartlett said Bush's goal was "to accomplish our mission as quickly as possible so our troops can come home," adding: "That's what the president has pledged to the American people, but I don't think the American people want us to do it in a premature way in which we don't complete the mission."

White House Hones A Strategy For Post-Zarqawi Era (NYT)

By David E. Sanger, Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

THURMONT, Md., June 12 — President Bush gathered top aides at Camp David here on Monday to calibrate the best way forward in Iraq during what the administration described as a critical juncture, following the death last week of the most-wanted terrorist in Iraq and the final formation of a unity government there.

The meeting was as much a media event as it was a high-level strategy session, devised to send a message that this is "an important break point for the Iraqi people and for our mission in Iraq from the standpoint of the American people," in the words of the White House counselor, Dan Bartlett.

It came as Republicans began a new effort to use last week's events to turn the war to their political advantage after months of anxiety, and to sharpen attacks against Democrats. On Monday night, the president's top political strategist, Karl Rove, told supporters in New Hampshire that if the Democrats had their way, Iraq would fall to terrorists and Abu Musab al-Zarqawi would not have been killed.

"When it gets tough, and when it gets difficult, they fall back on that party's old pattern of cutting and running," Mr. Rove said at a state Republican Party gathering in Manchester.

Speaking with reporters at the end of the first day of a two-day war summit meeting, Mr. Bush began to shift responsibility for Iraq's future to its new government. "Success in Iraq will depend upon the capacity of the new government to provide for its people — we recognize that," said Mr. Bush, who was flanked by Vice President Dick Cheney, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and several other cabinet secretaries. The message to the Iraqi government, he said, "is that we stand with you."

Mr. Bush did not address the question of when American troops might begin to come home. But he emphasized efforts to build loyalty to the government of the new prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, something he said could be done in part by creating a fund to help Iraqis share in Iraq's oil revenues.

The proposal represented a new twist on the administration's optimistic prewar projections, which suggested that oil revenues might foot the bill for Iraqi reconstruction.

On Capitol Hill, leading Republicans in the House were preparing for a week of legislative maneuvers meant to portray them as better equipped to fight terrorism and Democrats as blanching in the face of a tough enemy.

DOJ_NMG_0033338

Leaders in the House and the Senate have scheduled several debates and votes intended to shore up public support for the war, culminating Thursday with a House vote on a resolution declaring Iraq a central part of "the global war on terror" and criticizing any move to set "an arbitrary date" for the withdrawal of American forces. In a statement, Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the House majority leader, said the debate and vote would show Americans that "there are clear differences between Republicans and Democrats on how best to confront the global war on terror."

The resolution and debate seemed intended to force Democrats to take a stand on setting a date for the withdrawal of American troops, a divisive issue. Taken together, the steps underscored how Republicans are pouncing on the first positive developments in months in Iraq to reverse a steep slide in support for the war.

The decline in public approval for the war — and a corresponding drop for the president — has emerged as the single biggest cloud over the Republicans' prospects for elections this year.

Democrats countered Monday that the Republicans were playing partisan politics with the war. "Apparently, the American people will still have to wait for a serious debate on Iraq that is aimed at correcting bad policies instead of bad poll numbers," said Representative Rahm Emanuel, an Illinois Democrat.

Democrats were planning to capitalize on displeasure with the war this week with their own maneuvers, like as a proposed amendment by Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts setting a timetable for the withdrawal of most American combat troops from Iraq this year.

Mr. Kerry scoffed at Republican charges that withdrawals were a strategy of "cut and run," which he described as a "simplistic knee-jerk expression used to avoid the realities of war in Iraq."

Even so, Democrats are far from united, and party leaders were consulting across the caucus to seek a consensus position.

"Everyone supports responsible redeployment," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the minority leader. "Everyone supports resolving sectarian differences and revitalizing reconstruction efforts. The question is, given the intractable nature of this war, how do we proceed from here?"

In his address on Monday night, Mr. Rove highlighted what Republicans see as Democratic vulnerabilities in calling for a troop withdrawal, specifically skewering Mr. Kerry and Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, a retired Marine colonel who fought in Vietnam and has become a leading war critic and proponent of redeployment.

"If Murtha had his way, American troops would have been gone by the end of April, and we wouldn't have gotten Zarqawi," Mr. Rove said.

Both sides agree that the politics of Iraq are far from clear. A CBS News opinion poll conducted over the weekend and released Monday suggested that the killing of Mr. Zarqawi had done little to change public perceptions about the war in Iraq, or about Mr. Bush.

Stan Greenberg, a Democratic pollster, said that the latest Republican moves could help galvanize core voters who may be conflicted about the war now, but that the effort "all falls away if sectarian violence continues and Iraq continues to be ground down in a war that has no sign of success."

Representative Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut, said in an interview, "The public is going to have a wait-and-see approach."

Administration officials have acknowledged that they have learned from the past, and they were careful again on Monday not to overplay the significance of the killing of Mr. Zarqawi at the risk of having it followed by a new round of mayhem.

Reporters were ushered into the president's meeting to hear a brief fragment of his conversation with the American ambassador in Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad. At one point, Mr. Bush said that the killing of Mr. Zarqawi was "not going to end the war."

Zarqawi Successor The New Target (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

President Bush said yesterday that U.S. forces will now hunt down the next leader of al Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, who was named by a Web site as the replacement for slain terrorist Abu Musab Zarqawi.

"The successor to Zarqawi is going to be on our list to bring to justice," Mr. Bush said after spending the day discussing strategy with U.S. officials at Camp David, the presidential retreat in Maryland.

Al-Muhajer was not among the names that U.S. intelligence officials reportedly expected as successors. His name was posted on a Web site used by al Qaeda in Iraq, which called him "a beloved brother with jihadi experience and a strong footing in knowledge," according to the Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0033339

The administration argues that with Zarqawi dead and a new government in Iraq, the nation has a chance to prove that it can succeed. Mr. Bush said yesterday that Iraq's neighbors must step up to help out.

Mr. Bush also repeated his pledge to let the level of U.S. troops in Iraq be based on "conditions on the ground." White House officials said troop levels were not a part of Mr. Bush's discussion with his team during yesterday morning's session.

Vice President Dick Cheney, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley and top intelligence officials met yesterday at Camp David and were joined in a teleconference yesterday by U.S. military officials in Iraq and the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad.

Today, Mr. Bush and members of his Cabinet will have a teleconference with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and members of his Cabinet to figure out ways that the United States can help Iraqi leaders achieve their goals.

The meetings were scheduled even before Zarqawi was killed last week, but that news has given the administration a window to make a case to voters that U.S. forces have made progress.

The Iraq debate promises to heat up in Congress this week. The House is scheduled to debate a Republican-written resolution that praised the U.S. efforts in Iraq, Afghanistan and other fronts in the war on terror and opposes setting a date for troop withdrawal.

In the Senate, Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, said he will introduce an amendment to the defense bill on the Senate floor this week calling for U.S. troops to be pulled out by the end of this year.

Mr. Kerry wants to couple troop withdrawals with a political settlement he said could be achieved by convening a summit of Iraq's new government, leaders from the nations that border it and representatives of international organizations such as the United Nations' Security Council and the European Union.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, said that the administration must make a policy change and that Zarqawi's death and the new government present such an opportunity.

"Right now, the administration does not have a strategy for victory in Iraq -- it has a strategy to prevent defeat," Mr. Biden said. "I hope that will begin to change at Camp David."

Mr. Bush also said Iraq's neighbors "ought to do more" to help the nation stabilize.

"We're constantly working with our friends in the neighborhood to encourage them to support this new democracy," he said, adding that nations that have pledged about $13 billion to help must stick to their commitments.

He said one problem is religion -- Iraq has a Shi'ite prime minister and most neighboring nations are led by Sunni governments. But he said those other countries should see Iraq's constitution as a model for unity.

White House counselor Dan Bartlett said Mr. Bush and his advisers did talk about Zarqawi's death and his new successor, though he said it's too early to tell what his death will mean. Mr. Bartlett said the group talked about whether groups will try to take advantage of a leadership vacuum.

Last week, asked whether Zarqawi's location could have been tipped off by someone looking to take his place, White House press secretary Tony Snow said that would have been a dumb move.

"That would be a really stupid terrorist, because the life expectancy of people who have been succeeding these guys and the life expectancy of being Zarqawi's number two has not been very good," Mr. Snow said.

Bush In Drive To Back Iraq Government (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, June 13, 2006

President George W. Bush launched a strategic reassessment of US policy in Iraq on Monday, joined by his cabinet and military commanders at a “breakpoint” two-day meeting in Camp David that focused on how to help implement the new Iraqi government’s “Maliki plan”.

A senior White House official said the aim of the military discussions was not how to reduce US troop numbers but rather the implementation of specific operations – in Baghdad, the insurgent stronghold of Ramadi, and in the southern city of Basra, where British troops are based.

Nuri al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister, is scheduled to join the strategy session on Tuesday by secure video link-up from Baghdad. Discussions yesterday also focused on economic development and how to boost oil production.

US military commanders and the US ambassador to Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, were also connected by video from Baghdad’s Green Zone.

Confronted by growing discontent with the cost of the Iraq war among Americans in the run-up to congressional mid-term elections, Mr Bush repeatedly declared at a brief news conference: “The stakes are worth it.”

DOJ_NMG_0033340

Commenting on reports that al-Qaeda in Iraq had appointed a successor to Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, their leader killed last week in a US airstrike, Mr Bush said the new name would be added to "our list to bring to justice". Earlier he had asked his generals to thank US forces for bringing Zarqawi "to justice" last Wednesday.

A website used by Iraq's al-Qaeda claimed the group had appointed the previously unknown Abu Hamza al-Muhajer as its new leader. Some Iraqi officials, however, suggested that Mr Muhajer – whose name means "the immigrant" – might be a pseudonym for Abu al-Masri, an Egyptian who, according to US military officials, had been designated by Zarqawi as his successor. Dan Bartlett, White House counsellor, described the formation of the Iraqi government of national unity and the Camp David strategic assessment as a "fundamental breakpoint" for the Iraqi people and the US mission in Iraq.

Camp David was a "soup-to-nuts look across all government agencies" to help the new government. Mr Bartlett said that on the military side, much of the focus was on "bolstering" Iraqi security forces in Baghdad under what he called the "Maliki plan", aimed at preventing suicide attacks and stopping the growing sectarian violence by dealing with militias. Qubad Talabani, representative to the US of the Iraqi Kurdish regional government and son of the Iraqi president, yesterday urged Washington not to transfer to Iraq its domestic political battles between Republicans and Democrats.

"We don't need the US fighting its internal battle on our turf," he said, appealing for continued support for the new government from the Bush administration. "We can't do it on our own," he said, addressing the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Bush Invites His Critics To A War Council At Camp David (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson

Knight Ridder, June 12, 2006

THURMONT, Md. - Looking for new ideas on Iraq, President Bush sought advice from his critics Monday at an unusual two-day war council.

Closeted with his senior advisers at the presidential retreat at Camp David, Bush opened the conclave with a three-and-a-half hour briefing from top U.S. officials in Baghdad before having lunch with outside experts who've criticized his handling of the war.

He joined his aides for more talks in the afternoon and over dinner. On Tuesday, the president and his advisers will participate in a video conference with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his Cabinet in Baghdad.

Administration officials said the sessions were focused on improving security in Iraq and helping Maliki's new government succeed, not setting a timetable for reducing U.S. troop levels. In fact, at least one of the experts who met with Bush has advocated sending 77,000 more service members to join the 130,000 who are already in Iraq.

"It may be that the fastest way to turn Iraq over to the Iraqis and draw down American forces is not a steady decline of troop numbers. Instead, the fastest possible `exit strategy' may require one last surge effort," military historian Frederick Kagan, a scholar at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, wrote last year.

After he left the Camp David briefing Monday, Kagan declined to comment on what was said there beyond, "It was a good discussion."

With his popularity declining and support for the war fading, Bush has a made an effort to reach beyond his tight-knit circle of advisers headed by Vice President Dick Cheney. Still, it isn't clear how much influence outsiders have had on the president's thinking.

All four of the experts who were invited to join Bush at his hideaway in Maryland's Catoctin Mountains supported the Iraq invasion, but they haven't always been pleased with its prosecution.

In addition to Kagan, Bush heard from Eliot Cohen, a professor of strategic studies at Johns Hopkins University; journalist Robert Kaplan; and former CIA officer Michael Vickers, who's now with the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments.

Cohen, whose son was deployed to Iraq with the Army Rangers, has acknowledged second thoughts about his support for the war.

"What I did not know then that I do know now is just how incompetent we would be at carrying out that task," he wrote last summer in a guest column for The Washington Post. "If we fail in Iraq - and I don't think we will - it won't be because the American people lack heart, but because leaders and institutions have failed."

Kaplan has faulted Bush for failing to resolve disputes between the State Department and the Defense Department over postwar planning.

"The failure thus far to secure Iraq raises the issue - despite the incompetence of the administration - of whether the invasion was a flawed idea to begin with," he wrote in April for the Los Angeles Times. "Those whose task it was to plan the invasion and occupation of Iraq not only spoke in idealistic terms about the Iraqis, they apparently believed their own rhetoric to the exclusion of other, more troubling realities."

DOJ_NMG_0033341

Kagan has accused Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld of "failing to focus on the war at hand" in his zeal to streamline the military.

"Claims that there are no serious problems with military policy in Iraq and Afghanistan, or with the equipment our soldiers have, or with the number of troops available, are childish and damaging to efforts to identify and solve real problems," he wrote in January 2005.

"These problems don't result from the liberal media or the antiwar crowd making a ruckus about nothing. They result from Rumsfeld's stubborn adherence to a wrongheaded policy."

Bush didn't mention his lunchtime conversation with the outside experts when he summarized the day's events for reporters. He warned Americans to expect more violence in Iraq, although he said he remained confident that it could become a stable democracy.

"Ultimately, the Iraqi people are going to have to make up their mind: Do they want to live in terror or do they want to live in peace?" he said. "There's no question the fighting is tough. There is no question the enemy is violent and mean. But the enemy doesn't stand for anything."

Officials Detail Zarqawi's Last Hour (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

BAGHDAD, June 12 -- Insurgent leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi lived for 52 minutes, in and out of consciousness, before he succumbed to massive internal injuries caused by the concussive blasts from two 500-pound bombs dropped by a U.S. fighter jet, U.S. military officials in Baghdad said Monday.

In an attempt to end speculation on the circumstances of Zarqawi's death last Wednesday, the U.S. military provided charts, skeleton diagrams and descriptions by forensic pathologists of his autopsy to explain the last hour of Zarqawi's violent life.

At the same time, President Bush opened a two-day retreat at Camp David aimed at assessing where the United States stands in Iraq and how to bolster the new government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Bush and his top advisers, including Vice President Cheney, were briefed in the morning by video conference from Baghdad by Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. John P. Abizaid, the head of U.S. Central Command, and Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq.

The president was joined in the afternoon by members of his cabinet to discuss other challenges in Iraq, such as how to do a better job providing electricity and protecting the country's oil infrastructure, administration officials said.

On Zarqawi's death, Col. Stephen Jones, command surgeon for multinational forces in Iraq, said the shock waves from the bombs, ricocheting inside the hideout north of Baghdad, burst Zarqawi's blood vessels in his lungs and ears. When an American medic cleared his airway, blood flowed from Zarqawi's mouth.

Zarqawi died because his lungs failed to take in oxygen, military pathologists said. His broken right leg and scratches and cuts "were likely due to flying debris or Zarqawi being thrown against a hard object by the force of the blast," Jones said.

"No evidence of beating and no evidence of any firearm injuries," said a forensic pathologist who took part in the autopsy and spoke to reporters by phone from the United States, on condition he not be identified. A team of five people performed the autopsy Saturday; it involved body X-rays, toxicology tests and internal organ exams.

A statement on a Web site used by the organization al-Qaeda in Iraq claimed Monday to name Zarqawi's successor, Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, and pledged to carry on his violent legacy. Muhajer is the fourth highest-ranking member of al-Qaeda in Iraq and oversees the religious court that sentences those captured by the organization, said another al-Qaeda in Iraq official, who goes by the nom de guerre Abu Jihad.

Two women, a girl and two other men, including Zarqawi's spiritual adviser, Sheik Abdel Rahman, were also killed in the bombing. Rahman's skull was broken in the left temporal area, as well as several ribs and his left arm, as if he were thrown against the wall, Jones said. "Death was instantaneous," he said.

After the 6:12 p.m. airstrike, Iraqi police were the first to arrive, followed by U.S. forces at about 6:40 p.m., said Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the senior American spokesman in Iraq. He would not reveal which military unit was the first to respond. He said Zarqawi's body was treated with respect.

"He was treated better in death than he treated others in life," Caldwell said.

The results of DNA tests performed by the FBI confirmed that Zarqawi died from the bombing, Caldwell said.

Finding Zarqawi's location, near Baqubah, involved the help of "Jordanian assets," said Caldwell, after days of reports that Jordanian intelligence played a crucial role. "Jordan was extremely important and very informative in helping us establish and be able to prosecute this operation," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0033342

Zarqawi, a native of Jordan, had asserted responsibility for three hotel bombings that killed 60 people, plus three bombers, in Amman, that country's capital. "Zarqawi was a wanted man in Jordan as he is wanted in Iraq," Jordanian government spokesman Nasir Judah said. "There was a continuous flow of information between Iraq and Jordan that has been ongoing for a while."

At Camp David, the president was joined by four nongovernment military experts who have generally supported the war in Iraq but have criticized different elements of U.S. efforts: author Robert Kaplan, Eliot A. Cohen of Johns Hopkins University, Frederick W. Kagan of the American Enterprise Institute and Michael Vickers of the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments.

The four have in the past been critical of how the Bush administration has handled Iraq, though not necessarily from the same perspective. Vickers has argued that the United States ought to have a smaller, more effective presence in Iraq, with more emphasis on developing advisers for the nascent Iraqi security forces. Kagan, by contrast, recently wrote in the Weekly Standard that the United States should consider deploying more troops and prosecuting the battle against insurgents more aggressively. Cohen has also questioned the vigor with which the military has pursued the war, as well as the competence of the administration.

Bush appeared outside one of the cabins at the presidential retreat and told reporters that success in Iraq "will depend upon the capacity of the new government to provide for its people. . . . We're encouraged by the formation of a unity government, and we recognize our responsibilities to help that new government."

Bush and White House aides declined to offer many details of what had been discussed, although they indicated no imminent plan to reduce the level of U.S. ground troops in Iraq, now at about 130,000. "This is a process of getting to know . . . the Iraqi capabilities, particularly the command and control structure, and what we need to do to help them achieve victory," the president said.

Bush urged Iraq's neighbors to do more to speed the reconstruction of the country and said he and his advisers spent considerable time discussing how to boost oil production. "The government ought to use the oil as a way to unite the country and ought to think about having a tangible fund for the people, so the people have faith in central government," Bush said.

In Iraq, U.S.-led forces raided 140 locations in the past two days -- 11 of which emerged directly from intelligence gathered from the bomb site -- in an attempt to further dismantle al-Qaeda in Iraq's network, officials announced. American forces killed 32 insurgents, detained 178 people and captured a "high value" individual who had a $50,000 bounty on his head, Caldwell said.

During one operation in Baqubah, U.S. forces came under gunfire from a rooftop and responded by killing nine people including two young boys, military officials said. Caldwell said seven were insurgents and offered his "deepest condolences" for the boys, one less than a year old and the other about 4 years old.

The nine dead were all members of a well-known family in the village of Arab Nazzal who began shooting to repel American forces they mistook for insurgents, said Warrant Officer Zaidan Salem of the 2nd Battalion of the Iraqi army.

Elsewhere, 31 people were killed in violence across the country, according to Iraqi police officials. Two car bombs exploded in quick succession in downtown Balad, north of Baghdad, about 6:30 p.m., said 1st Lt. Raeid Abdul Mahdi of the Balad police. The two explosions, within five minutes of each other, killed six people and injured 50 others, said Zagid Hussein, a physician in the emergency room at Balad General Hospital.

Ten Oil Ministry employees were killed and 12 more wounded when men ambushed their bus with rocket-propelled grenades as it drove to an oil refinery in the Dora area in Baghdad, Gen. Saad al-Dulaimi said from the Interior Ministry operations room. A third car bomb detonated near a Shiite mosque in Baghdad's Shula neighborhood about 9 a.m., killing six people and wounding five others, he said.

In Amarah, a Shiite city in the south, British forces clashed with armed protesters for one hour, Dulaimi said, leaving eight civilians dead and 20 wounded.

A U.S. soldier from the 34th Infantry Division's 1st Brigade Combat Team was killed Friday night by a roadside bomb while on patrol near Diwaniyah, the military said in a statement yesterday. The soldier's name was being withheld pending notification of his next of kin.

The trial of former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein also continued Monday with four defense witnesses who admitted they had lied on the stand. One witness, who worked in Hussein's security services, said one of the defense attorneys, Khalil al-Dulaimi, and one of the president's former bodyguards said they would give him a permanent job in Syria if he testified in Hussein's defense and kill his family if he didn't, according to the witness's statement that was read in court. The witness said he was paid $500.

"They made me defend Saddam in my testimony," he said.

Hussein responded that the four witnesses had been investigated in "an atmosphere of threats" and that there were too many conspiracies in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0033343

Bush Reaches Out In Bid To Shed Go-it-alone Image (BOS)

By Rick Klein

The Boston Globe, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The unusual Iraq war summit President Bush is hosting at Camp David this week reflects a new White House attitude that includes a willingness to consider dissenting views and take a more deliberate approach to policy questions, a style change for a president known to keep close counsel, according to political observers and Republican lawmakers.

The two-day conference that ends today seems designed to show Bush personally grappling with Iraq war policy along with his top aides and outside experts. The high-profile meetings of the president's ``war council'' -- along with a revamped policy team and a more nimble communications operation -- could revive his low standing with the public and help rehabilitate his strained relationship with Congress, said Bruce Buchanan, a government professor at the University of Texas.

The shifts -- largely credited to new White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten -- suggest Bush desperately wants to shed his image as a stubborn partisan who listens to few outside voices, said Buchanan, who has followed the president closely since Bush was governor of Texas.

``He's reaching out for a little empathy,'' he said. ``It's an effort to get people to acknowledge that he is at least trying and needs their support, and at least soften their opposition.''

The changes haven't lifted the president's near-record-low approval ratings, though, and considering new ideas doesn't mean the White House will use them. But last Wednesday's killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi could offer Bush a chance to change perceptions of the war in Iraq, one of the biggest drags on his popularity, White House allies say.

Signs of the new approach under Bolten abound. Instead of Bush's customary defense of the Guantanamo Bay detention facility, the White House expressed concern over three suicides there this past weekend. Bush, who once challenged foes in Iraq to ``bring 'em on,'' announced Zarqawi's death last week with a subdued address that warned of future violence there.

Recently, Bush surprised observers by acknowledging that his ``tough talk'' as US forces fought in Iraq and Afghanistan ``sent the wrong signal to people,'' especially that taunt to Iraqi insurgents and his ``wanted -- dead or alive'' declaration about Osama bin Laden.

Some of the administration's toughest Iraq war critics, including former secretary of state Madeleine K. Albright and retired Army general Barry McCaffrey, have been invited to Oval Office meetings with Bush himself. And, under Bolten, the White House is consulting more often with Congress and hosting more informal gatherings for lawmakers from both parties.

``It's more give and take, rather than, `Here's what I'm trying to sell,' '' said Candida Wolff, the head of Bush's legislative affairs office. ``Where Congress is at this point, you can't simply say, `This is what we're thinking, we hope you can pass it.' . . . We're doing much more outreach.''

Wolff said the congressional get-togethers helped convince the president to send the National Guard to the US-Mexico border after several members of Congress suggested it as a bold step to help stop illegal immigration. Bush announced the decision in a prime-time televised speech from the Oval Office, trading the campaign rally-style events he favors for a more statesmanlike setting.

Bush's new openness with Congress bespeaks Bolten's more personal approach, observers say. Unlike Andrew H. Card Jr., Bush's first chief of staff whom he replaced in April, Bolten nurtured his relationships with members of Congress as he rose through the ranks of the administration, and that has served him well in his current post, said Senator John E. Sununu, a New Hampshire Republican whose father was chief of staff for President George H. W. Bush.

``He has a lot of recent experience working very closely with members on sort of basic, nuts-and-bolts issues that cut across the entire scope of federal government,'' Sununu said.

It remains to be seen whether the changes will ultimately transform the White House and its policies. The president is still pushing his conservative agenda, and he hasn't publicly changed course on the war; meanwhile, the probable loss of GOP House seats in November's mid-term elections could drain more of his diminished political capital. Some critics say his abysmal public opinion poll numbers have forced Bush to adjust his style to preserve his power.

But the style makeover has already had visible effects.

Last month, when legislative leaders from both parties objected to FBI agents raiding the office of Representative William J. Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat suspected of taking bribes, Bush quickly sealed the seized records for a 45-day cooling-off period. The move undercut Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, but it averted a potentially embarrassing showdown with the House.

When some lawmakers publicly raised doubts about Air Force General Michael Hayden -- overseer of the president's controversial domestic eavesdropping program and Bush's choice to lead the CIA -- the White House surprised Congress by giving members what they had demanded for months: more details about that top-secret program. Within days, the Senate approved Hayden's nomination quickly and decisively.

DOJ_NMG_0033344

The strategy in that case appears to reflect Vice President Dick Cheney's diminished influence in the White House. Cheney, considered the most powerful vice president in US history, had insisted that Congress didn't need to be informed, said Representative John F. Tierney, a Salem, Mass., Democrat who serves on the House intelligence committee.

``Cheney's been a little bit dinged by some of the things going on around him, with the CIA leak investigation," Tierney said, referring to the federal investigation of the leaking of the name of an undercover CIA agent, which has led to the indictment of Cheney's former chief of staff , Lewis Libby .

If the White House is sincere about changing, Tierney said, it would consult Congress even more and use more ideas from Capitol Hill. ``They still have a long distance to go before they get to that point," he said.

Still, the changes have been greeted warmly in Congress, where lawmakers from both parties are still smarting from the February clash over a Dubai-controlled company's bid to take over operations of several US ports -- a deal that the administration approved without input from lawmakers.

The uproar over that deal marked a nadir in relations between Bush and GOP leaders in Congress, who largely delivered on Bush's priorities in his first term.

Wolff, Bush's legislative affairs chief, called it the ``straw that broke the camel's back," and said it underscored the need for the changes in how the White House works with Congress. It was also a catalyst to shake up a badly fatigued staff that had barely changed since Bush took office in 2001.

Earlier this year, Bush aides ``were in a position where they were just trying to stop shots on goal, and that just encouraged people to try to score on them," said Grover Norquist, an antitax activist with close ties to the White House. ``Now they can play offense rather than defense. [Revamping the staff] wasn't a panicked set of moves, but it's making a difference."

Rove: Republicans Should Address Iraq War (AP)

By Norma Love

The Associated Press, June 13, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H. —

White House adviser Karl Rove said Monday that Republicans facing midterm elections should campaign on the economy's strength and discuss the war in Iraq with no qualms.

"We have no excuses to make for it," Rove said during a fundraising dinner for New Hampshire Republicans. War supporters need not apologize for removing the threat of Saddam Hussein, and with so much work left to do, now is not the time to talk about leaving Iraq, he said.

Rove said Democrats pushing for the withdrawal of American troops should be the ones facing tough questions for wanting to "cut and run." He targeted Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry and Pennsylvania Rep. John Murtha, both Democrats and vocal supporters of getting out of Iraq.

"They are profoundly wrong," he said.

More than 400 people paid $100 to have dinner and hear Rove rally the faithful to work to retain Republican dominance in a state now viewed as a swing state in presidential elections. Dinner and a private reception with Rove cost $250.

Democrats won New Hampshire in three of the last four presidential elections _ only narrowly losing in 2000. Also, Democrats have won four of the last five gubernatorial elections.

The shift at the top has raised hopes among Democrats and concerns among Republicans about eventual parity in the state House and Senate _ long Republican bastions.

Some are concerned President Bush's poor approval ratings will hurt Republicans in state races this fall.

At an event last month, Rove blamed the war in Iraq for hurting Bush's job approval ratings in national polls. Rove said people like Bush but don't like the war.

About two dozen to three dozen protesters gathered Monday across the street from the Center of New Hampshire, where the event was being held. Democratic protesters said New Hampshire Republicans needed a big draw like Rove to help pay legal fees in a phone jamming case. Three GOP officials have been convicted of charges stemming from the jamming of Democratic get-out-the-vote lines on Election Day 2002.

"Americans don't like cheaters, these people cheated," said Herb Moyer, 60, a Democrat from Exeter. The sign he carried read, "Karl Rove and New Hampshire GOP: Where criminals congregate."

State Democrats have sued Republicans, partly to try to force disclosure of who among national GOP officials might have had knowledge of the plot. Republicans insist the operation was strictly local.

DOJ_NMG_0033345

State GOP Chairman Wayne Semprini said Friday the party will use half or more of Monday's proceeds to help candidates this fall. The rest of the money will pay for operating expenses, including legal fees racked up defending the Democratic lawsuit.

Rove Defends Primary, And Says NH Still 'a Red State' (PNH)

By James W. Pindell

PoliticsNH.com, June 13, 2006

MANCHESTER – President Bush's trusted political mind Karl Rove spoke in New Hampshire for the first time in three years Monday night hoping to encourage state Republicans the election year won't be as bad as some pundits say.

His keynote at a State Republican Committee fund-raiser also motivated Democrats and other like-mined organizations. About 75 protestors held signs like "Karl: 666" and "No More Roving Jam Sessions," in response to Republican operatives who jammed Democrats get out the vote phone lines in 2002.

It is the phone jamming scandal, which has criminally convicted three Republican operatives, which helped to deplete state party resources to $700 cash on hand last month. Beyond money, the Democrats have leveraged the issue into one they use every chance they can in hopes it puts Republicans on the defensive.

And while the 500 people who bought tickets helped the state party raise an estimated $55,000-$60,000 at the dinner, it did not help that Rove's own office has now been linked to the scandal. It was learned in the Spring that phone calls from one of those convicted where placed to Rove's department in the White House.

Republican lawyer Ovide Lamontagne repeated his insistence that of course calls where going to the White House about the high profile U.S. Senate race that year.

"[The protestors] are just a continuation of a party that is bankrupt," Lamontagne said using a play on words. "The Democrats are bankrupt on ideas so they keep talking about this."

Rove said he came to the Granite State with two messages. First, he thanked the Republican audience for teaching President Bush a valuable lesson when he was handily defeated here in the 2000 presidential primary and second that despite recent voting trends New Hampshire is still a "red" state.

On issues, Rove said that while each Congressional and Senatorial seat will be influenced on local issues, he believes there are two national issues that will be at play: the economy and terrorism.

Rove said President Bush's tax cuts have created the strongest economy in the world and a shorter recession that was expected. On the war he talked about U.S. Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass) and U.S. Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) who have been critical of the Iraq war.

"Like too many Democrats it strikes me that they are ready to give the green light to go to war, but when it gets tough and when it gets difficult they fall back on that party's pattern of cutting and running," Rove said. "They are wrong and they are profoundly in their approach."

It was the first event Rove has attended in New Hampshire since the final days of the 2004 election and the first public speech since 2003.

Rove's Speech To N.H. Republicans Keeps To Partisan Line (WP)

By David A. Farenthold

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H., June 12 -- The Bush administration is said to have a new playbook, with a more inclusive attitude toward critics and an openness to skeptical debate.

Karl Rove, apparently, still has his copy of the old playbook.

In a speech to New Hampshire Republican officials here Monday night, the White House deputy chief of staff attacked Democrats who have criticized the U.S. war effort in Iraq, such as Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.) and Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.), who he said advocate "cutting and running."

"They may be with you for the first shots," Rove said of such opponents. "But they're not going . . . to be with you for the tough battles."

President Bush's approval ratings have plummeted amid concerns about the war, and Rove touched on two standard elements of his rhetorical sales pitch for the 2006 elections. He talked about the economy, ascribing its health to a combination of Republican tax cuts and fiscal restraint, and he talked about national security and the war.

Bush has called for a compromise on immigration and recently appointed a Treasury secretary who disagrees with him on the environment. But it was difficult to hear in this speech any signs of a more conciliatory White House.

Instead, Rove's speech was about sharpening the differences between the GOP and its opponents.

DOJ_NMG_0033346

"They're for higher taxes. We're for lower taxes," he said during his description of the economy. "They're for more spending. We're for less spending."

Rove made similarly blunt points about the war. He defended the administration's decision to invade Iraq by laying out Saddam Hussein's "vital interest" in acquiring advanced weapons technology.

"We were absolutely right" to remove him, Rove said of the former leader. He added, "We have no excuses to make for it."

Rove singled out Kerry by reading quotes from before the war in which the senator expressed support for an invasion, and then making a joke about him being for the invasion before he was against it.

He also returned several times to Murtha, a Marine veteran who said last fall that troops should be withdrawn from Iraq. Rove said a precipitous departure would leave the United States weakened and a terrorist-friendly regime in Baghdad.

"It would provide a launching pad for the terrorists to strike the United States and the West," he said.

Rove's speech came at a critical point for Republicans, both nationally and in the Granite State, where Bush's approval ratings have mirrored their fall nationally.

The state Republican Party has been hit by a scandal that began when GOP operatives used computerized phone calls to jam the lines at get-out-the-vote operations run by Democrats and labor unions on Election Day in 2002. That scandal has resulted in three convictions and huge legal bills for the party. The state party chairman estimated that 10 to 15 percent of the receipts from Monday night's dinner will go to pay legal bills.

Rove did not spend much time on the party's difficulties, but they may have been reflected in his final point, which was less about the Bush administration's triumphs than its day-to-day perseverance.

He told the story about a friend from Texas who gave him a photo of President Lyndon B. Johnson in despair as he read over a list of Vietnam War casualties. Rove said the friend meant it as a sign that the presidency could break a person. He promised that Bush will not be broken.

And then Rove referenced what he said was his favorite presidential quote, from Warren G. Harding.

"This damn job will kill you," he quoted Harding as saying.

"But it will not this man," Rove said, meaning Bush.

Poll Sees A Boost For Bush, Iraq War (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — In the wake of terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's death, President Bush is seeing improvement in public confidence that the Iraq war is winnable, a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll shows.

The new poll found that 48% believe the United States probably or definitely will win the war, up from 39% in April. It also found that 47% believe things are going well in Iraq, up from 38% in March.

The survey, taken Friday to Sunday and released Monday, also showed Bush's approval rating going up to 38% from 36% earlier this month and an all-time low of 31% in May. The poll news came as Bush and members of his Cabinet met at Camp David to discuss ways to help the recently formed government in Iraq.

“Good news makes people feel better,” says political analyst Stuart Rothenberg, editor of the non-partisan Rothenberg Political Report. “This is the first break the president has gotten in about 18 months.”

Still, 51% say the war was a mistake. Rothenberg and other analysts cautioned that long-term public confidence will grow only if the death of Zarqawi is followed up by increasing Iraq's stability.

“Unless there is clear, sustainable progress in Iraq, these numbers will be just a brief blip,” says Ted Galen Carpenter, a foreign policy analyst at the libertarian Cato Institute think tank.

Rothenberg said that even minor improvements in Bush's poll numbers create an “openness” that may allow the White House to press its message more successfully. “It's hard to deliver good news with the public in a foul mood,” he said.

At the presidential retreat in Maryland, Bush and his aides discussed redeveloping Iraq's oil industry, tracking down the remnants of Zarqawi's network and pressuring nations to follow through on $13 billion in aid. Bush declined to make predictions about U.S. troop withdrawals. “Whatever we do will be based on the conditions on the ground,” he said.

Also this week, the House of Representatives is scheduled to hold its first full-scale debate about the war since it began in 2003. The debate, scheduled to begin Thursday, will center on a Republican resolution stating that the United States must prevail in Iraq and in the global war on terrorism.

Other poll highlights:

·Fifty-three percent said the killing of Zarqawi was a “major achievement.”

·Twenty percent said Zarqawi's death will reduce insurgent attacks in Iraq; 30% said insurgent attacks will increase.

DOJ_NMG_0033347

Rare House Debate To Focus On Iraq War (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

The House of Representatives this week will engage in a rare election-year debate on the Iraq war, with Republicans hoping to showcase the good news on the ground and Democrats fractured on whether the United States should begin withdrawing troops.

Lawmakers are tentatively scheduled to begin debating the Republican-authored resolution Thursday. A vote on the measure, called "Declaring that the United States will prevail in the global war on terror, the struggle to protect freedom from the terrorist adversary," is slated for Friday.

"There are clear differences between Republicans and Democrats on how best to confront the global war on terror," said Majority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio, who pushed getting the resolution on the floor.

Mr. Boehner said the debate will address the question of whether the United States defeats or retreats.

"It will be instructional and educational for the public," Mr. Boehner said, and will allow members to highlight "success stories that no one ever hears about."

However, some Democrats attacked the resolution as not really allowing for a genuine discussion of the issues, since Republicans wrote it and today will set parameters for debate.

"We promised and owe the American people a focused and dedicated debate about our policy and the future of American commitment in Iraq," Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri wrote yesterday in a letter to Mr. Boehner.

Mr. Skelton, the ranking Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee, said the resolution fails to provide such a forum. He said he was "distressed" the substance of the measure primarily focuses on the war on terrorism, with references to Libya and Afghanistan.

"I think you well understand that the war in Iraq is a separate conflict, an insurgency with terrorist elements and sectarian violence," he said.

The resolution states that Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein was a threat against global peace and security, and also declares the United States is committed to "the completion of the mission to create a sovereign, free, secure and united Iraq."

"It is not in the national security interest of the United States to set an arbitrary date for the withdrawal or redeployment" of troops, states the resolution, written by Republican leaders on the International Relations, Armed Services and intelligence committees.

Friday's vote on the resolution could be used this fall, when the entire House is up for re-election and Democrats have high hopes for capturing at least the 15 seats needed to win back a majority.

Political observers note that both parties must walk a fine line on the war, since the majority of Americans now say it was a mistake, but lawmakers do not want to appear unsupportive of the troops in Iraq.

"Democrats are not in lock step on this issue," said House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland.

He said he thinks the war was "the right thing to do and we did it in the wrong way," particularly by not sending enough troops. He anticipates some Democrats will argue the country was misled by President Bush and the United States should never have gone to Iraq in the first place.

The resolution also praises the formation of the Iraqi government and the writing of the constitution, and applauds the troops on their work and for killing terrorist Abu Musab Zarqawi.

The debate marks the first discussion on the war since November, when Rep. John P. Murtha, a decorated veteran, called for starting a six-month withdrawal of U.S. troops in Iraq.

After the Pennsylvania Democrat's call, Republicans pushed another resolution, which called for immediate pullout, to the floor for a vote in hopes to embarrass Democrats, who called the move "shameful." It was rejected on a vote of 403-3 following a raucous debate.

The Iraq War Debate Reopens In Washington (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

Christian Science Monitor, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON

The No. 1 issue for American voters - the future of the Iraq war - moves to the fore this week, both among President Bush's wartime advisers and on the floor of Congress.

For supporters of the war, long thirsting for signs of progress, the timing seems fortuitous. Last week, US forces killed Iraq's most wanted terrorist, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, and the Iraqi prime minister finally completed his national-unity government.

DOJ_NMG_0033348

Monday, at Camp David, the president gathered his war cabinet and outside experts for a two-day strategy session, and Wednesday he meets at the White House with the bipartisan Iraq Study Group. In Congress, both houses are set to vote for supplemental war funding.

But it is the full-day debate on Iraq on the floor of the House of Representatives, scheduled for Thursday, that is the least predictable of the forums. The last time the House took to debating Iraq, last November, the scene deteriorated into recriminations over a resolution calling for immediate withdrawal that Democrats called a political stunt. House majority leader John Boehner (R) of Ohio, who has long planned for this week's debate, hopes to match the serious, dignified tone of deliberation that preceded the Gulf war, in 1991. Most of his GOP colleagues support the idea.

"The House is a debating society in the best sense of the word," says Rep. Henry Hyde (R) of Illinois, chairman of the International Relations Committee. "Everyone that listens with an open mind will find an aspect to this that they hadn't thought of."

Other members, including antiwar Republicans and Democrats, also welcome a debate, as long as the terms are fair, they say. At time of writing, the text of the resolution to be debated had not been released, but congressional sources indicated that it would frame the Iraq war as part of the broader war on terror, a point of controversy. Many war critics argue that the US role in Iraq has deflected attention from the larger war on terror, and thus antiwar members may feel compelled to vote against the resolution. But that may prove politically risky, as the resolution will also express support for American troops, and no member wants to be seen opposing the men and women in harm's way.

At a highly politicized time, with the fall midterm elections approaching and future control of Congress in question, some political analysts see risks for both parties in an Iraq debate. Public support for the war has been on a long, downward slide, and Bush's own job approval rating and policy agenda have been damaged by Iraq more than anything else.

"I don't think the floor is the place to have a debate on Iraq - ours is not a parliamentary system," says GOP strategist Ed Rollins, who argues that such discussion is better handled by members in their districts. "If you get into a big all-out debate, it becomes a referendum on whether the president is right or whether those who voted for it are right. It's not a pretty thing for the public to watch, especially for our troops in the field."

Other Republicans say that with public opinion on the war so low, Bush and his supporters have nowhere to go but up.

The debate could also serve to highlight divisions among Democrats over the war. Until now, Republicans have suffered most of the political pain over Iraq, and Democrats have managed to keep their differences away from broad public scrutiny.

For some Republicans who strongly support the US role in Iraq, political expediency or risk are beside the point: A sober, public debate on how to proceed in Iraq, at a critical turning point in that country's development, is an important way for elected representatives to help shape the future.

"It's the right thing to do," says Rep. Christopher Shays (R) of Connecticut, who has been to Iraq 12 times, more than any other member. "There's a logic in debating an issue that has not turned out like any of us hoped, and then determine why that's the case."

Still, he remains hopeful about what the US can accomplish in Iraq, and sees congressional debate as useful to advancing the public dialogue. "My big fear about Iraq is not that we're going to lose the Iraqi war in Iraq, but that we would lose the Iraqi war here at home," says Mr. Shays, who is locked in a tough reelection battle. "I think members should have an opportunity to say what they want to say - to ... have everybody on the record."

Rep. Walter Jones of North Carolina, a conservative Republican known for his highly publicized turn against the war, also views the coming debate hopefully, as long as it is "fair and open" and the rule allows for "adequate division of time" among opponents and proponents of the war.

Democratic Rep. Marcy Kaptur of Ohio also welcomes the debate: "The American people are wondering what course will lead us to redeploying our forces out of Iraq. This debate allows us to focus on a strategic discussion of what's ahead, rather than just a few people briefed at the highest levels. The American people expect Congress to assume its rightful authority in warmaking...."

Bush: US Ready To Help New Iraq Gov't (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, June 12, 2006

President Bush reassured Iraqis on Monday that the United States stands ready to help their new government, but said success in Iraq largely depends on Baghdad's ability to secure the nation and care for its citizens.

Beginning a two-day strategy session on Iraq at Camp David, Bush also said Iraq's neighbors should be doing more to help. He said the United States expects countries that have promised $13 billion in financial assistance to make good on their pledges.

DOJ_NMG_0033349

Bush's huddle with top advisers was a chance to outline ways the U.S. government can best help Iraq, where the power runs sporadically and Iraqi civilian and U.S. troop deaths are mounting. White House advisers said the U.S. mission in Iraq was at a breakpoint, rhetoric that suggests the administration is anxious to shift responsibility for the future of Iraq to the Iraqis.

"The best way to win this war against an insurgency is to stand up a unity government which is capable of defending itself, but also providing tangible benefits to the people," Bush said, standing outside a cabin at the secluded, wooded presidential retreat with his national security team and members of his Cabinet.

"Ultimately, the Iraqi people are going to have to make up their mind. Do they want to live in terror, or do they want to live in peace?" he said.

Now in its fourth year, the war also was an issue Monday on Capitol Hill.

The Senate opened debate on a military policy bill, and John Kerry, D-Mass., intended to offer a plan to withdraw U.S. combat troops from Iraq by the end of the year. The White House has long opposed setting deadlines in Iraq, and Kerry's amendment is expected to be defeated in a vote later this week.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, in a speech in Washington, called the war in Iraq an "intractable conflict" and said Americans deserve a plan from the president that provides troops with an exit strategy. "It is no longer sufficient to say 'we will stand down as the Iraqis stand up,'" Reid said, quoting a Bush refrain.

The House and Senate are poised to deal with a $94.5 billion measure to fund Iraq and provide additional aid for the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast. The bill should receive easy approval, even as impatience is growing with the Iraq war and its $8 billion monthly tab.

On Thursday, the House will vote on a resolution supporting the U.S. mission in Iraq.

The Camp David meeting came as the Bush administration was trying to capitalize on momentum generated by last week's swearing-in of key Iraqi national security officials and the U.S. airstrike that killed Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, al-Qaida's leader in Iraq.

Al-Qaida named a successor Monday to al-Zarqawi and said he would stick to the slain leader's path — attacks on Shiites as well as on U.S. and Iraqi forces. Bush warned, "I think the successor to Zarqawi is going to be on our list to bring to justice."

The highlight of the Camp David work session is Tuesday's secured video teleconference with new Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and members of his cabinet. During the first day of meetings, Bush and his advisers addressed violence in Iraq, especially in Baghdad and Basra, as well as the Iraqi economy and oil.

Bush suggested that the Iraqi government use the nation's vast supply of oil as a way to unite the country, perhaps creating a fund for the Iraqi people to restore their faith in the new unified central government.

The war is weighing down Bush's approval rating at home, and Republicans are worried about losing control of Congress in November's midterm elections. Only a third of respondents to an Associated Press-Ipsos poll in early June supported Bush's handling of the situation — an all-time low.

"I keep reminding the American people that the stakes are worth it," Bush said. "It is worth it to help Iraq succeed. It is worth it to have a democracy in the Middle East."

Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Baghdad, said he thinks it will be possible to withdraw some of the 130,000 U.S. forces in the months ahead as long as Iraq's government and security forces make progress.

But Bush, who noted that Iraq's new defense minister was just sworn in last week, made no predictions about U.S. troop withdrawals. He said Casey would make recommendations after assessing the Iraqis' ability to take the fight to the enemy and secure the country.

"Whatever we do will be based upon the conditions on the ground," Bush said.

Reid Tells Liberal Activists Troops Must Come Home (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid told a gathering of Democratic and liberal activists in Washington yesterday that "we have to start bringing our troops home."

The Nevada Democrat opened his remarks at the Take Back America 2006 Conference by criticizing the Bush administration's handling of the war in Iraq. The conference is hosted by the Campaign for America's Future (CAF), a liberal advocacy organization.

"As we meet here today, the president is meeting with his Cabinet to talk about Iraq. As well he should," Mr. Reid said to applause.

President Bush has stated his position repeatedly: " 'As Iraqi forces stand up, American forces will stand down.' "

"I don't want to hear that anymore," Mr. Reid said. "Our troops deserve an exit strategy."

DOJ_NMG_0033350

Mr. Reid seemed to make a more direct call for withdrawal of troops than his previous remarks, but the senator's office disagreed.

"It's consistent with the Democrats proposal for a responsible redeployment of troops," Reid spokesman Jim Manley said. "And it's in line with the bill that passed the Senate last year with bipartisan support calling for a 'significant transition' of troops from Iraq in 2006."

In his speech, Mr. Reid made repeated reference to the Senate bill as "law" that Mr. Bush must follow.

One Democratic staffer in attendance, who because of the staffer's ongoing relations with Mr. Reid asked to remain anonymous, said the senator gave a similar, less pointed speech in Nevada during the weekend.

"But at the end of the speech, people in the crowd started chanting, 'Bring them home,' " the staffer said.

Mr. Reid spoke on the first day of CAF's three-day conference. Admission to the week's speeches, workshops and a gala dinner cost $125 to $410.

Other prominent Democrats, including Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California and Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts are scheduled to appear today.

Participating groups include the American Civil Liberties Union, Wal-Mart Watch and the Truman National Security Project.

CAF says its goals for the conference are to "educate, inspire and engage" progressive activists.

As Mr. Reid criticized the administration, he received hisses of agreement from the crowd. "Distract, distort, divide. That's what this administration has done," Mr. Reid said. "We can't continue to be bogged down in Iraq."

Most in attendance seemed to approve of the speech by the soft-spoken senator.

"I'd like to give him some of whatever they gave Bruce Banner to become the Incredible Hulk," said Charles Bright of Alexandria. "But after his speech, I felt like calling myself a Democrat, instead of an independent liberal, which is how I've described myself the last several years."

The Liberals' Lunch Special: Democratic Harmony (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

The left-wingers are hungry.

The liberal activists assembled for the annual "Campaign for America's Future" conference were so hungry yesterday, in fact, that it was difficult to hear Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) speak over the din of forks clinking on salad plates. That's too bad, because he was telling the lefties what they like to hear.

"I don't know how many times we have heard the president say: 'We will stand down as Iraqis stand up.' I don't want to hear that anymore," Reid told the luncheon crowd at the Washington Hilton. "It seems to me that that mantra no longer stands. That is, we have to start bringing our troops home."

The activists -- at least those who could hear him -- applauded Reid's unexpected and unscripted call for withdrawal.

That Reid, an antiabortion Mormon who voted to authorize force in Iraq, would be breaking bread at all with the liberal activists speaks to a different hunger. Interest groups, hoping for a win in the November midterms, have toned down their fratricidal attacks on elected Democrats. And Democratic lawmakers, emboldened by President Bush's slump, aren't as afraid to be seen with the lefties who make up their "base."

"Senator Harry Reid gets it!" exulted environmentalist Jerome Ringo, the luncheon's emcee.

Last year, only two members of Congress -- both backbenchers from the liberal fringe -- were on the program. This year, the conference is getting the full Monty from Democratic leaders and presidential aspirants: Reid and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), John Kerry (Mass.), Russ Feingold (Wis.) and Barack Obama (Ill.); Govs. Tom Vilsack (Iowa) and Ed Rendell (Pa.); and 10 members of the House. Sen. Debbie Stabenow (Mich.) wasn't on the program but came anyway for lunch.

As they did last year, event organizers made efforts to display harmony within the Democratic Party. The first booth at the entrance to the exhibit hall featured a new publication called "The Democratic Strategist," a joint venture by party liberals and moderates. A few booths down was a movement to draft Al Gore -- a charter member of the centrist Democratic Leadership Council. The opening luncheon put leaders of the normally feuding labor and environmental movements together on the stage to promote an energy policy.

Despite this choreography, participants had not entirely shed their antipathy toward elected Democrats. Pollster Stan Greenberg, married to a Democratic member of Congress, said GOP poll numbers gave Democrats "an immense opportunity, if anybody had an idea what the Democrats stood for." As Greenberg described the ideal candidate's positions, Leo Gerard, president of the steelworkers union, blurted out: "Not one of the [expletive] presidential candidates fits that."

DOJ_NMG_0033351

The Nation's Katrina Vanden Heuvel won whoops and cheers for decrying Democratic leadership as "hapless" and "timid," and "often too fearful of its own shadow."

It was potentially hostile terrain. But Reid, who has scored points with liberals over the past year, was not about to let those descriptions stick to him; taking a page from George W. Bush's strategy, he was playing to the base. Arriving at the Hilton, he sat down for a radio interview with the "Jon Elliott Show" (slogan: "The most dangerous liberal in America"). Trailed by two beefy bodyguards, Reid went next to Ellen Ratner of Talk Radio News Service. "Democrats, of course, are together" on Iraq, he said. "It's time that we started bringing our people home."

At lunch, the liberal diners were not sure how to greet Reid. About a quarter of the audience rose to give him a standing ovation; the rest remained planted. Reid began to speak, but was barely audible.

"We can't hear you!" audience members called out. Reid adjusted the microphone, with little effect.

What the minority leader lacked in audibility, he had in embellishment. His prepared text said "close to 2,500 U.S. troops killed" in Iraq; he made it "about 2,500." His text said the war is "costing over $8 billion per month"; Reid made that "costing us $10 billion a month." The text described as "good news" the killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and the forming of an Iraqi cabinet; Reid left that out entirely.

Instead, he called for the start of a troop withdrawal, which wasn't in the text. "Iraq is not a matter for future presidents, as President Bush has said," he charged. "It's his war and it's his responsibility."

If Reid wasn't quite "Give 'Em Hell, Harry," he was certainly "Give 'Em a Hard Time, Harry." The senator spoke of the "rubber-stamp Congress," the "overall incompetence of this administration" and a Bush strategy to "distort, distract, divide." He warned that "the ice caps are melting on both ends of the Earth," and alluded to this year's first tropical storm, Alberto, which he renamed. "I personally have to say that Alfredo has proven to me again that global warming's here," he said. He attacked Condoleezza Rice for allowing Chevron to name an oil tanker after her, and he led the audience in a responsive chant:

"How many subpoenas has any committee issued on spying? You got it: Zero."

"How many subpoenas have they issued on the price gouging, these gas prices? Zero."

"How many subpoenas have they issued on the war in Iraq? Zero."

Nobody attempted another standing ovation when he finished. But the applause was liberal.

Blitz Against Al-Qaeda In Iraq Continues (USAT)

By César G. Soriano

USA Today, June 13, 2006

BAGHDAD — U.S. and Iraqi forces have launched 200 raids against insurgents since killing Abu Musab al-Zarqawi last week, dealing a blow to his terrorist organization, al-Qaeda in Iraq, U.S. and Iraqi officials said Monday.

The raids have led to the capture of more than 200 suspected insurgents and 33 deaths.

“We are cautiously optimistic that we have been very successful thus far in the ongoing operations,” military spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said.

Zarqawi was killed when an F-16 dropped two 500-pound bombs on his hide-out Wednesday. The U.S. military and Iraqi government knew Zarqawi was in the house because of a tip that allowed coalition forces a look inside Zarqawi's tight band of followers.

“We have managed to infiltrate al-Qaeda in Iraq,” said Mouwafak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser. He declined to elaborate.

The intelligence that led up to the bombing and the raids may be the best chance of cracking the terrorist group dominated by foreign fighters.

Even if the raids do lasting damage to the organization, Iraq will have to deal with violence from other sources, including sectarian militias and insurgent cells that continue to function.

“We know this is not going to end the insurgency. It will take the people of Iraq to make that decision with their Iraqi security forces,” Caldwell said.

“The more the Iraqi people take control of their destiny,” he said, “that will be the key to success and ending the insurgency in Iraq.”

Bombings and other violence killed more than 50 people across Iraq on Monday, the Associated Press reported.

Eleven raids by U.S. and Iraqi forces over the weekend were based directly on intelligence coalition troops gleaned by combing through the rubble of Zarqawi's hide-out in Hibhib north of Baghdad, Caldwell said.

In a raid Monday, coalition troops attacked an insurgent cell in Baqouba, not far from where Zarqawi was killed. Coalition forces killed seven people with suspected ties to al-Qaeda in Iraq leaders, the U.S. military said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0033352

Two children were killed in the firefight. The insurgents had children with them when they fired on coalition troops from the rooftop of a building, Caldwell said.

The intelligence breakthrough represented by Zarqawi's death and the raids is among the most encouraging developments of the three-year battle against the insurgency, some military experts said.

“This was not one big break. If you look back six months, there has been a consistent improvement in U.S. intelligence targeting,” said Anthony Cordesman of the Center for Strategic and International Studies. “We've seen one report after another of senior al-Qaeda people being captured or killed in the last six months.”

By contrast, the capture of Saddam Hussein in December 2003 was a propaganda victory for coalition forces but led to no improvement in intelligence, said Daniel Byman of the Brookings Institution.

The raids have led to the biggest intelligence boon in years, said Edward O'Connell, a defense analyst for the RAND Corp. think tank. “It's been a long time coming,” he said. “It takes hard-core detective work … to infiltrate the enemy.”

An Internet statement attributed to al-Qaeda in Iraq named Sheik Abu Hamza al-Muhajir to replace Zarqawi. The statement, which was posted on a militant website, could not be verified.

The name — a pseudonym, as most militants are known by — apparently was not on any U.S. lists of terrorists who have rewards on their heads, the Associated Press reported.

President Bush said al-Muhajir probably will be added to the wanted roster. “I think the successor to Zarqawi is going to be on our list to bring to justice,” Bush said.

Al-Qaida In Iraq Names New Leader (AP)

By Nadia Abou El-magd

AP, June 12, 2006

Al-Qaida in Iraq named a successor Monday to Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and said he would stick to the slain leader's path — attacks on Shiites as well as on U.S. and Iraqi forces.

The new leader, identified by the nom de guerre Abu Hamza al-Muhajer in a statement posted on the Web, appeared to be a foreign Arab, like his predecessor.

But otherwise he is an unknown. The name has not appeared in previous al-Qaida in Iraq propaganda or on U.S. lists of terrorists with rewards on their heads, suggesting he is a lower-level figure or someone more prominent who has taken a new pseudonym.

President Bush said Monday that al-Muhajer would join the ranks of those sought by the U.S. "I think the successor to Zarqawi is going to be on our list to bring to justice," Bush said.

The lack of detail appeared to reflect a new emphasis on secrecy by the group. U.S. forces have launched a series of raids against al-Qaida in Iraq based on intelligence found in the safehouse where al-Zarqawi was killed by an American airstrike Wednesday. The group may fear infiltration or that al-Zarqawi's public stance led to his downfall.

"Al-Qaida in Iraq's council has agreed on Sheik Abu Hamza al-Muhajer to be the successor of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in the leadership of the organization," the group said.

The authenticity of the statement could not be independently confirmed. It was posted on an Islamic militant Web forum where al-Qaida in Iraq often posts messages.

The posting said al-Muhajer was "a beloved brother with jihadi (holy war) experience and a strong footing in knowledge.

"We ask Almighty God to strengthen him that he may accomplish what Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, God have mercy on his soul, began," it said.

That could mean he will continue the strategy the Jordanian-born al-Zarqawi followed: a campaign of brutal attacks on Shiite civilians, aimed at sparking a Sunni-Shiite civil war.

The attacks sparked tensions between al-Zarqawi's group and some Iraqi insurgents who felt the bloodshed hurt the image of their resistance against U.S. forces. They wanted to focus attacks on American and Iraqi troops.

Iraqi insurgents loyal to Saddam Hussein made a rare public acknowledgment of disputes with al-Zarqawi in a condolence letter posted on the same Web site.

"Although there were many matters we differed with him on and him with us, ... what united us was something greater," said the statement by the Fedayeen Saddam. It said the group had "the honor" of fighting alongside al-Zarqawi and that "our determination is only increased for waging jihad."

Al-Zarqawi's death raised speculation the group might turn to an Iraqi leader to smooth over the differences with Iraqis. Al-Zarqawi's deputy is an Iraqi known as Abu Abdul-Rahman al-Iraqi. The U.S. military told The Associated Press on Monday that he was not a man identified as "Abdul-Rahman" who was killed with al-Zarqawi.

DOJ_NMG_0033353

The name al-Muhajer, Arabic for "immigrant," suggested the new leader was not Iraqi. The name is often used by foreign Arab militants, referring to the "muhajereen," Islam's early converts who fled persecution in Mecca to join the Prophet Muhammad in Medina.

Rohan Gunaratna, a terror expert at Singapore's Institute of Defense and Strategic Studies, said the choice of a non-Iraqi means the group is "likely to continue the foreign operations."

Al-Zarqawi had sought to expand his campaign beyond Iraq, including a triple suicide bombing against hotels in Jordan last November that killed 60 people.

Al-Zarqawi also had links to al-Qaida's branch in Saudi Arabia, which in a statement Monday thanked him for helping its fight against the kingdom's rulers. "We will not forget his favors to jihad and the mujahedeen in the prophet's peninsula," the group said.

The U.S. military had predicted a militant named Abu Ayyub al-Masri would become al-Qaida in Iraq's leader. Al-Masri, an Egyptian associate of al-Zarqawi, has a $50,000 reward on his head.

Militants usually adopt a pseudonym made up of a nickname called a "kunya" in Arabic — "Abu," meaning "father of," plus a name that sometimes refers to an actual child of the militant. The second part of the pseudonym is usually an adjective denoting the militant's nationality.

Al-Zarqawi was born Ahmad Fadhil Nazzal al-Khalayleh, but took a pseudonym from Zarqa, his hometown in Jordan. He had a child named Musab, so took the kunya of "Abu Musab."

The secrecy surrounding the new leader could hurt the group's ability to carry out attacks, said Egyptian analyst Diaa Rashwan. Al-Zarqawi built a reputation as a holy warrior, helping draw foreign militants to carry out suicide bombings.

"Al-Zarqawi's charisma was very important factor for many to join his organization," Rashwan said. "All al-Zarqawi had was car bombs and people ready to blow themselves up."

"My feeling is that they are going to have establish a persona for him," said Evan Kohlmann, a New York-based terror consultant and founder of globalterroralert.com. "They're going to have to introduce this fellow to the world."

A Jihadist Web Site Says Zarqawi's Group In Iraq Has A New Leader In Place (NYT)

By John F. Burns And Dexter Filkins

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 12 — An Islamic militant Web site said Monday that a new leader had been named to replace Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the Jordanian terrorist killed last week, as the head of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia.

The statement, which appeared on the jihadi Web site Al Hesba, announced that a man named Abu Hamza al-Muhajir would replace Mr. Zarqawi, who was killed in an American airstrike in the village of Hibhib, about 35 miles north of Baghdad.

Mr. Muhajir is something of a mystery; his name does not appear on any of the charts of wanted leaders of Al Qaeda previously issued by the American command, or on any of the dozens of previous statements by Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia posted on the Internet. Senior Iraqi officials said they were unfamiliar with anyone by that name.

One clue was that the word "muhajir" usually refers to an Islamic militant who has traveled beyond his own country to fight for his faith.

"He is not an Iraqi — that is my first impression," said the Iraqi national security adviser, Mowaffak al-Rubaie, adding that he had not heard of Mr. Muhajir.

The group that made the statement is called the Council of Freedom Fighters, an umbrella organization whose formation was announced in January and which Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia claimed to have joined.

The council is said to be run by an Iraqi named Abdullah al-Rashid al-Baghdadi. At the time, Mr. Zarqawi was said to be under pressure to turn over more power to Iraqis. Many terrorism experts regarded the council as a fiction or, at best, a front organization that appeared to give local control to Iraqis while leaving Mr. Zarqawi in charge.

"Sheik Abu Hamza al-Muhajir, may God preserve him, a good brother, has previous jihadi experience and a deep foot in the pool of knowledge," the statement said. "We ask God to guide him and to continue what Sheik Abu Musab started by his hands."

A three-hour autopsy conducted over the weekend on the body of Mr. Zarqawi showed that he died of extensive "tearing and bruising" of his lungs caused by the blast wave from the two 500-pound bombs dropped on the safe house where he was hiding last Wednesday, American military officials and medical specialists said Monday.

The chief spokesman for the American military command in Iraq, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, said Mr. Zarqawi, 39, died 52 minutes after the airstrike. That was when an American military medic, who had gone to his aid when the first American troops arrived, "realized that Zarqawi was dead," General Caldwell said.

DOJ_NMG_0033354

The general said the American troops, arriving at the scene by helicopter 28 minutes after the bombing, "took possession" of Mr. Zarqawi from the Iraqi police, who were first on the scene. He said that the American medic found that Mr. Zarqawi's breathing was "shallow and labored," and that he had a barely detectable pulse that "quickly deteriorated." Even though the medic tried to revive Mr. Zarqawi's breathing and heartbeat, he realized that "that Zarqawi's death was imminent."

"The medic registered no pulse or respirations, and at 7:04 p.m. on June 7 realized that Zarqawi was dead," General Caldwell said. "This was approximately 24 minutes after the coalition forces arrived, or approximately 52 minutes after the first airstrike on the safe house" in Hibhib.

"The injuries to his lungs were not survivable," Col. Stephen Jones, command surgeon for the American military in Iraq, said at a news conference here. Colonel Jones said the extent of Mr. Zarqawi's blast injuries, which had virtually exploded his lungs, were characteristic of "enclosed space" wounds suffered by bombing victims.

The injuries indicated that Mr. Zarqawi was inside the house, not running for cover in the palm grove outside, as some reports had suggested, when the bombs struck, Colonel Jones said.

At the news conference, which General Caldwell said had been called to dispel some of the "propaganda and misinformation" that had swirled around Mr. Zarqawi's death, one of two American forensic pathologists who participated in the autopsy said there was "no evidence of beating and no evidence of firearm injuries."

That appeared aimed at countering news accounts that had quoted Iraqi villagers who claimed to have seen American troops beating Mr. Zarqawi. One villager reporting seeing a soldier hit him with a rifle butt.

General Caldwell said tests made of Mr. Zarqawi's DNA also confirmed that he was the person killed in the bombing. When Mr. Zarqawi was found by American forces, he was wearing his signature black outfit, the general added.

Sheik Abd al-Rahman, Mr. Zarqawi's spiritual adviser and one of those killed in the airstrike, died from "blast injuries caused by flying shrapnel, flying debris and being thrown against a hard object by the force of the blast," also inside the house, said Colonel Jones, the command surgeon.

Mr. Rahman's injuries included a skull fracture that caused extensive internal bleeding, severe bleeding into his left lung and lacerations of his liver. Colonel Jones said Mr. Rahman's death, unlike Mr. Zarqawi's was "instantaneous."

In addition to Mr. Zarqawi and Mr. Rahman, the American command said, a third man, two women and a girl of about 5 or 6 were killed in the airstrike. The bodies of the women and the girl were turned over to the local hospital, General Caldwell said, while the body of the third man, who was not identified, remained in American custody.

General Caldwell said the Americans were discussing with Iraqi officials what to do with the bodies of Mr. Zarqawi and Mr. Rahman, whom some officials have described as a non-Iraqi.

General Caldwell's news conference did not dispel all of the questions surrounding the operation that killed Mr. Zarqawi, however, particularly questions about whether American commandos were in the area before the attack.

General Caldwell said there were no "coalition forces" on the ground in the vicinity of the house at the time of the strike.

"Coalition forces include all forces operating in the country of Iraq," he said.

But one senior military official and one senior Pentagon adviser, both speaking on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to comment publicly, said there were a number of Special Operations troops near the safe house before the strike. At least two Iraqis living near the house described seeing American commandos sliding down ropes from helicopters and encircling the house before the bombs landed.

A series of raids that began after Mr. Zarqawi was killed continued over the weekend, General Caldwell said, with American troops carrying out 140 operations in the past 48 hours. Those raids killed 32 insurgents and captured 178 others, he said. He added that 11 of the raids had resulted directly from intelligence gathered at Mr. Zarqawi's safe house.

Two Iraqi boys, one 6 months old, the other 4 years old, were killed Monday during an operation near Baquba, when American forces came under machine-gun fire from a rooftop, the military said.

Missiles, car bombs and roadside explosives killed at least 18 other Iraqi civilians and wounded 101 around the country on Monday, the military said.

And the military said an American soldier had been killed Friday by a roadside bomb while on a logistics patrol in Ad Diwaniya. No other details were released.

Jordan Details Its Role In Finding Al-Zarqawi (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi And Josh Meyer

Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

AMMAN, Jordan -- Shocked into action by violence on their own soil, Jordan officials months ago began an intensive campaign of spying on insurgents in neighboring Iraq, a gambit that ultimately helped lead to the death of militant leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, Jordan's top spies said Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0033355

Maj. Gen. Muhammed Dahabi, director of Jordan's General Intelligence Department, and Col. Ali Burjaq, his chief of counterterrorism, said in a rare interview Monday that a splashy video tape al-Zarqawi released earlier this spring helped Jordanian intelligence pinpoint his approximate location at the time, a key lead that ultimately led to al-Zarqawi's death in a U.S. aerial bombing attack last week.

Al-Zarqawi's need to micromanage all aspects of his al-Qaida in Iraq organization, from finances to operations, also made him vulnerable to discovery, the two intelligence officials said.

"We knew him personally," Burjaq said of the Jordanian-born militant, who spent part of the 1990s in Jordanian prisons on terrorism charges.

"We knew how he behaves," the spy continued, speaking at the Jordanian intelligence agency's mountaintop complex in Amman. "He was vicious, mean -- a dictator in his decisions. He didn't allow anyone else to question his decisions."

Until November 2005, when al-Zarqawi operatives allegedly blew up three hotels in Amman, killing more than 60 people, Jordan had barely operated in Iraq.

After the hotel bombings, Iraq became and remains Amman's primary security worry, though Jordan also abuts the simmering troubles in neighboring Israel and the Palestinian territories.

The bombings, the two intelligence officials said, served as a wake-up call for Jordanians, forcing them to seek a more active role in combating Iraq's troubles.

The hotel bombings also showed a skeptical Iraqi government, suspicious of its neighbors' security forces, that al-Zarqawi was training Iraqis for cross-border operations in Jordan, one source close to Jordanian intelligence officials said.

With the permission of Iraq's fledgling government, Jordanian intelligence operatives flooded the war-torn country, cultivating informants and working the periphery of the al-Zarqawi network to find ways into the organization, according to a Jordanian official and intelligence experts.

The Jordanian GID set up so-called spy bureaus in Iraq, and began working with the Dulaimis, a large, mostly Sunni Arab tribe, some of whose members are closely tied to the insurgency, to gather information about anyone associating with al-Zarqawi and others in militant groups.

For Jordanian intelligence, it marked a watershed. In the past, "we always pursued a defensive policy," against terrorism, Dahabi said. "But ever since I became chief, we started to think of external operations. We wanted to do more daring operations and do external operations."

U.S. military officials have said they managed to track al-Zarqawi's spiritual adviser, Sheikh Abdul Rahman, to the village of Hibhib, north of the provincial capital of Baqouba, where they dropped two 500-pound bombs that led to the al-Qaida leader's death in what has been called a dramatic step in efforts to stabilize Iraq. But Jordan also played a key role in ferreting out al-Zarqawi, U.S. and Jordanian officials have said, providing critical human intelligence which apparently corroborated information the Americans were getting from within the insurgency movement itself.

Jordanian security and intelligence authorities were involved in the hunt for al-Zarqawi from the start, helping trace locations where alZarqawi and his group frequently stayed, said Jordanian government spokesman Nasser Juddeh.

Dahabi and Burjaq, emerging briefly from the shadowy world of surveillance and infiltration, provided the Los Angeles Times with a rare public account of the role their spy service, which is trained, supplied and funded by the U.S., played in hunting al-Zarqawi down.

They also voiced their nation's strong commitment to U.S.-led efforts to stem terrorist attacks, noting Jordan had been among the first to recognize the danger of al-Qaida fighters returning from Afghanistan in the 1990s after fighting against Soviet invaders. The intelligence chiefs said they had a keen understanding of the way al-Qaida militants think, operate, and counter the moves of their enemies.

"Because we started early we gained experience early," said Burjaq, 46.

"Many Americans are advanced in combating certain kinds of operations," said Dahabi, 45, a mild-mannered graduate of the University of Sussex in the Britain who has headed the intelligence service since December 20. "We understand al-Qaida's mentality as Arabs."

The interview took place in Dahabi's spacious office, decorated with a huge, recently completed painting showing Arab tribesman on horseback fighting against Ottoman soldiers during their war for independence at the end of World War I. The faces of King Abdullah bin Hussein, Jordan's monarch, and his two young sons hover over the fiery scene.

In the past, Jordanian intelligence agents have provided the U.S. intelligence that was used to infiltrate terrorist organizations and stop attacks, including their foiling of a plot to blow up sites in the U.S. on New Year's Eve 2000.

Jordan arrested at least 14 suspected al-Qaida operatives in the months leading up to that holiday and provided American officials vast amounts of intelligence used in part to pursue threads in the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0033356

Dahabi and Burjaq, who joined Jordan's spy service in 1983 and helped break up the notorious Abu Nidhal terror ring that purported to fight for the Palestinian cause, said they had been aggressively trailing al-Zarqawi and his adherents for years.

Counterterrorism experts say the influx of Jordanian intelligence assets in Iraq produced results almost immediately, with the number of arrests of key al-Qaida operatives jumping noticably. Americans' understanding of al-Zarqawi's network and its role in the insurgency and terrorist attacks outside Iraq also picked up, officials said.

"The Jordanians are top drawer, probably the best counterterrorism force in the world," said Alexis Debat, a former French defense ministry official who is now a counterterrorism consultant and senior fellow for national security and terrorism at the Nixon Center in Washington. "Any network they put their mind to destroying is gone."

In April, when al-Zarqawi showed up in a highly publicized online propaganda film boasting of his group's prowess, Jordanian analysts scrutinized the surrounding scenery as well as his blustery talk.

The tape confirmed suspicions that al-Zarqawi must be in the Yusifiya area, a volatile insurgent stronghold south of Baghdad, and made it the focus of U.S. and Jordanian intelligence efforts, Burjaq said. Throughout the spring, U.S. military officials, too, were publicly identifying the area south of Baghdad as a likely al-Zarqawi stronghold.

"At a certain stage, more intelligence (resources) were being devoted to Yusifiya," Burjaq said, noting that Jordan's familiarity with the region and human intelligence networks played a key role in monitoring al-Zarqawi's movements there. "It's not an easy area to get in and out of."

The two declined to confirm whether they had turned any of al-Zarqawi's followers against him. But Dahabi noted, "Some of the people I arrest, I recruit. Some those who were in my jails helped me to carry out operations."

"Sources," Burjaq added, "to us, this is the tool."

Once it became clear the Yusifiya information was accurate, the Jordanians became more confident of their sources. Then when information was received about al-Zarqawi being in the area of Baqouba, northeast of Baghdad, they were confident that he had moved there.

"We started to locate him and the Americans started to locate him," said Burjaq.

Several sources, including a U.S. counterterrorism official, credited both U.S. and Jordanian intelligence with developing information that led to the targeted hit on al-Zarqawi and subsequent raids in at least 17 locations.

"At a certain point, some of the sources connected," said Dahabi.

The Americans say it was a U.S.-recruited human intelligence asset that ultimately led them to the specific house where al-Zarqawi was hiding, allowing warplanes to blow it up. One U.S. official said the CIA recruited someone who identified al-Zarqawi's spiritual adviser Rahman, allowing U.S. authorities to intercept his communications with al-Zarqawi and learn that two would be meeting Wednesday.

From there, the spiritual adviser was followed by an unmanned U.S. aerial vehicle, a Predator, as he entered the house. "When all the intelligence came together, all indications were that this man was in a particular place," said Dahabi.

"The Americans sent F-16s, and they did a good job."

Zarqawi Is Dead. What Now? (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

It will be months, perhaps longer, before we'll be able to gauge the precise impact of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's death last week on the nature, effectiveness and direction of the insurgency in Iraq. But the most significant fact here isn't that Zarqawi was killed -- he could have met his end in any number of ways. It's that he was found.

Pause a minute to consider what this means. Plenty has been written about the shortcomings of U.S. war-fighting, political and counterinsurgency strategies in Iraq, and some of it is true. Comparably little has been written about the insurgents' shortcomings. Yet Zarqawi was located because he and his spiritual adviser, Abdul Rahman, were betrayed by someone in their own camp, someone close enough to track their movements exactly. Therein must lie a tale.

"Zarqawi had become a liability to al Qaeda in Iraq," says Matti Steinberg, an Israeli terrorism expert. He recalls last year's intercepted letter from Ayman Zawahiri, in which the al Qaeda No. 2 begged Zarqawi to tone down his tactics, stop killing Shiites, and strive to broaden his base of public support. "I repeat the warning against separating from the masses, whatever the danger," Zawahiri wrote.

Zarqawi did not pay heed. In September, he formally declared open season on Shiites. In November, he ordered the bombing of three hotels in Amman, Jordan, killing 63 Muslims, most if not all Sunnis, and enraging Arab public opinion that had been previously sympathetic to the insurgents. By December, he was being described by an Iraqi insurgent as "an American, Israeli and Iranian agent who is trying to keep our country unstable so the Sunnis will keep facing occupation."

DOJ_NMG_0033357

In January, Zarqawi submerged his organization in the Mujahadeen Shura [consultative] Council -- the insurgents' umbrella group -- and apparently agreed to relinquish his public role to focus on military operations. Within a few months, however, he released his clumsy home video, and the self-publicity probably didn't go down well with the rest of the council. Zarqawi was cut loose.

There's an irony here, since by killing him the U.S. was, in effect, doing the bidding of Zarqawi's enemies within the insurgency. No doubt they have better uses for him as a martyr in Paradise than as a terror on Earth, and this may help them reclaim some lost luster. But it also suggests that the nature of the insurgency will change, perhaps radically, and likely to America's advantage.

First, the insurgency's sponsorship of terrorism outside of Iraq may end. The bombings in Amman reflected Zarqawi's personal loathing of King Abdullah's Hashemite rule: Their only effect, other than grief, was to provoke the Jordanian mukhabarat into waging its own dedicated campaign against the insurgency. Iraq's neighbors would generally be happy to see the U.S. project in Iraq fail, but not at the price Zarqawi was proposing.

Second, the sectarian violence that was Zarqawi's trademark may abate. Zarqawi's fanatical hatred of Shiites, common among Arab Sunnis outside Iraq, is somewhat alien to Iraqi Sunnis, or was until quite recently. Zawahiri also counseled against a sectarian strategy: "Does this conflict with the Shia lift the burden from the Americans by diverting the mujahadeen to the Shia?" he asked rhetorically. Long term, the Sunni interest in Iraq may be to reassert national dominance. Near term, however, it's to avoid Shiite reprisals; to the extent that the insurgents incite them, they risk losing the popular Sunni support on which they ultimately depend.

Third, Zarqawi's departure may precipitate organizational changes and a concomitant leadership struggle, all of which will take time to sort out. "The insurgents have been able to deal with the fact that we've eliminated hundreds of their operatives, including first-, second- and third-tier leadership," says Jeff White, a 34-year veteran of the Defense Intelligence Agency who is now at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. "On the other hand, Zarqawi was the personification of the movement. His philosophy, commitment, connections, experience, all these things made him a disproportionately significant player."

A personal contest may yet be shaping up between Abdullah Rashid al-Baghdadi, the (apparently) Iraqi "emir" of the Shura Council, and Abu Ayyub al-Masri, an Egyptian. Hardly anything is publicly known about either man or about their relationship. Yet as long as the insurgency lacks an undisputed leader, it will also lack the unity of command that is a basic precept of successful guerrilla warfare. Recall that the Kurdish PKK and Peru's Shining Path both collapsed almost immediately following the capture of their respective leaders, Abdullah Ocalan and Abimael Guzmán.

Finally, the insurgency must contend with a much more experienced and effective U.S. military. "The first year, we were in over our heads," says Mr. White. Since then, however, "there's been a much more powerful and integrated effort to put all the intelligence together in a package, including all sources, all classifications, and then pushing it down to the units that can use it." The military got some lucky breaks in its hunt for Zarqawi. But the fact that it was able to find him at all reflects a broad and serious effort to master the cultural terrain of clans, tribes, kinship networks and political factions in which the insurgency has flourished.

Iraqis will now brace for a large round of terror attacks, which aim to show the insurgency hasn't been dented by Zarqawi's demise. Maybe it hasn't. But its aura has been dimmed, its organizational structure cracked and its internal fissures exposed. That's something the U.S. and the new Iraqi government can capitalize on by launching sustained offensive operations in the Sunni Triangle and doing their utmost to secure Baghdad. Doing so will take another 30,000 troops. But having mostly squandered the initiative against the insurgents in the first year of the war, this is the administration's rare chance to even the score. It must seize it.

Life During Wartime (NYT)

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

About the time the 2006 New Year's confetti was being swept away from Times Square, a small group of Iraqi bloggers began posting for The Times. "It is a new year, but it is not a happy one," said a 57-year-old doctor who called himself Truth Teller.

Reading the bloggers has helped to fill one of the big gaps in Americans' view of the war in Iraq. Danger in the streets and security fears for anyone seen speaking with Western reporters has made it increasingly hard to get real glimpses of what it's like for the people who have to live there.

At the beginning of the year, the bloggers' complaints were less about car bombs than power failures, black-market fuel and a curfew that didn't allow for much, if any, celebrating. But not always. In January, Zeyad, a Baghdad dentist, wrote: "Over the past two years, I have crawled away from two armed clashes and one carjacking incident; I have witnessed two people being shot in the head and one young kid who had been sprayed by bullets begging my friends and me to take him to the hospital ...

DOJ_NMG_0033358

and just recently, an American sniper shot right at me and missed on a Baghdad highway for no apparent reason when we pulled over behind their convoy. My taxi driver tried to comfort me by saying it was probably just a rubber bullet."

In May, when three of the bloggers returned — joined by one Iraqi-American writer — their postings had changed. There was less talk of shoddy infrastructure and running for cover from American soldiers, and more fear of radical Islamists and the Sunni and Shiite death squads bringing terror to their neighborhoods. The watershed they referred to repeatedly was the destruction of the golden dome of the Askariya mosque in Samarra, a revered Shiite shrine, on Feb. 22. The bloggers also wrote more about the increasing presence of Taliban-like Islamists, violently imposing restrictions on the Baghdad residents. "These are people who are enforcing their rules by death threats," Hassan, a college student, wrote in May.

Hassan wrote of his 6-year-old sister, who was not allowed to go out to play because her family feared she would be kidnapped or killed. His sister "has never gone to a zoo" and "has only gone to a playground once." Zeyad told the harrowing tale of witnessing the execution of a local generator operator: "When I tried to turn him over so they could carry him into a car, my hands touched his blood-soaked shirt. I could now see that he was shot four times in the chest. There was also a bag nearby with a box of peaches, medication and a Pepsi bottle; he was obviously going to take that home to his kids. I stared in his anguished face again, then at my bloody hands. And that was when I momentarily lost it."

Bloggers, who cannot be fact-checked in normal ways, are no substitute for journalists. But the Iraqis' voices are hypnotic — troubling, fascinating and a critical reminder of the quirky individual humanity of those at the center of what the invasion has unleashed. "[A]midst the blackness of time and the wounds of fate, Iraqis still find a way to crack a smile, even if it hurts," wrote Konfused Kid, a Baghdad college student, at the beginning of the year. "Despite my cynicism, I believe in God (or Allah or whatever you care to name Him), and I pray for the well-being of this country every day. And every day I listen to Metallica and read Philip K. Dick."

"Day to Day in Iraq" can be read online at daytodayiniraq.blogs.nytimes.com.

Legal Maneuver To Make A Point, An Army Officer Helps Iraqi Convict (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

BAQUBAH, Iraq -- Capt. Phillip Carter visits the filthy, overcrowded prison here at least twice a week to meet with the warden and police officers who oversee the facility. Each time he stops by, the warmest greeting he receives comes from a burly 46-year-old convicted murderer.

Hamid Abboud was found guilty in 1998 of killing a man in a fight and sentenced to 20 years in prison. He was released and granted amnesty in 2002. Under Iraqi law, he should now be free. But he was mysteriously re-arrested in 2004 on the old charges and remains incarcerated, ordered to serve out the rest of his sentence.

Capt. Carter, a 30-year-old military police soldier who is a lawyer in civilian life, could demand Mr. Abboud's release and the Iraqis would likely comply. But he doesn't. Instead he prods judges and prosecutors in this province an hour's drive from Baghdad to uphold Iraqi law and set Mr. Abboud free on their own.

"I have faith because of your work," Mr. Abboud told Capt. Carter in late May, when the temperature had risen above 100 degrees and the stench in the prison, crammed to four times its legal capacity, was almost unbearable. "My fate is in your hands."

Why a U.S. Army captain took on the case of a convicted murderer speaks volumes about how the American strategy has changed in Iraq in the past six months, as the U.S. tries to turn control back to the Iraqis. It also shows how painful and halting progress in Iraq can be.

Capt. Carter hopes to use the case to make a larger point: that the Iraqi judicial system, dominated by personal and sectarian grudges, needs to follow its own rules. "It appeared like the perfect test case, because it would show that the result should be dictated by Iraqi law and not by the whim of any individual," he says.

He became interested in the case this spring, when he and fellow officers saw rapidly deteriorating conditions at the jail in Baqubah, a city of about 300,000, about five miles from the spot where notorious terrorist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was killed last week. The jail's population surged to 475 prisoners in March, up from 350 just two months earlier. The facility was so overcrowded that some prisoners had to lie on their sides at night to fit in the jail's four small cells.

Many prisoners were being held without any charges, say U.S. and Iraqi officials. Others said they had been beaten into confessing to crimes they didn't commit, and bore bruises and scars that seemed to lend credence to their stories, U.S. military officers say. Running the police department's counterterrorism unit was a colonel known to fellow officers as "Ali the Cable," for his history of beating confessions out of suspects with a cable.

Faced with such a problem a year ago, the Americans would have taken over the prison and run it for the Iraqis. Now, the push from the Pentagon is to reduce the U.S. presence in Iraq. "It is all about allowing Iraqi solutions to Iraqi problems that are solved with Iraqi resources," Gen. George Casey, the top military officer in Iraq, says he tells all incoming commanders. "We are here to help them win it; not win it for them. That is the flat-ass rule."

DOJ_NMG_0033359

That guidance led Capt. Carter to Mr. Abboud.

Mr. Abboud was among those granted amnesty in 2002 when Saddam Hussein, just before the U.S. invasion, freed tens of thousands of prisoners in Iraq.

Following the fall of Mr. Hussein in 2003, the U.S. decided to honor the amnesty. The decision was made largely out of necessity: It would have been too hard to round up all the prisoners, and then figure out who had been imprisoned legitimately and who had been incarcerated for political reasons, say U.S. officials familiar with the decision. The Iraqi government has let the amnesty stand. So under Iraqi law, prisoners released in 2002 should be free today.

Capt. Carter figured that if he could persuade judges in Baqubah to follow their own rules and release a guilty man, maybe they would be more likely to respect the law in other cases, where the inmates appeared to be innocent. "If we can solve this case according to the law, we can solve all the cases in the jail," he says.

Capt. Carter came to Baqubah in November via an unusual route. After dropping out of high school in Santa Monica, Calif., he earned a graduation-equivalency degree and attended community college. He did well enough to get into the University of California, Los Angeles and, after graduating, became an Army officer.

He spent four years with the military police, leaving the Army to attend UCLA law school, where he graduated in 2004. Last fall, he was practicing at a big law firm in Los Angeles. During that time, he had an Internet blog and wrote occasional opinion pieces in U.S. magazines criticizing the U.S. decision not to follow the Geneva Conventions at its prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

By last year, the Army, desperately short of military police, was calling such officers back. Capt. Carter volunteered to return. He was assigned to a police transition team run by 38-year-old Lt. Col. William Benson.

Technically, the 70-soldier team wasn't supposed to have anything to do with the jail or court system. Its job was to build an Iraqi police force that could stand up to insurgents. The U.S. soldiers helped build a practice range for marksmanship, walked patrols with the Iraqis and taught them to fight as a team. The efforts paid off when insurgents launched a major attack on a police station in Baqubah in March. The Iraqi police, who had fled past assaults, stood and fought, this time driving off insurgents.

After seeing conditions in the jail, Col. Benson concluded that just training the police to fight wasn't enough. "We realized we had a big hole in our campaign strategy," he says. The jail, which has a capacity of about 150, housed about 475 inmates. Some had been held without charges for more than a year. "The perception among the public was that the only way to get out was to bribe someone," Col. Benson says.

Staff Sgt. Bradley Greer, a military-police soldier from Birmingham, Ala., began reading files of about 150 prisoners. "Most of the cases looked like total bull crap. There was no evidence, no information about the incident that led to their arrest. Nothing," he says. When he ventured into the prison, gaunt-looking inmates showed him scars they said came from beatings by the Iraqi Army. Many said they had no idea why they had been arrested. "It just chilled me to see them living like that," he says.

Sgt. Greer says he wanted to confront the chief judge in the province. "I wanted to go in and say, 'You need to let these guys go today!' " he recalls. "That never happened."

Capt. Carter and his boss, Col. Benson, opted for a less-direct approach. They decided to focus attention on all aspects of the legal process, from arrest through imprisonment, and pressure the Iraqis to fix problems on their own.

Imbuing Baqubah's security forces with a respect for the rule of law, Col. Benson believed, would help stem sectarian violence in the city, which is 50% Shiite, 40% Sunni and 10% Kurd. As long as Sunnis believed the Shiite-dominated security forces could imprison them indefinitely, sectarian fighting would only grow worse. "We as Americans get tied around democracy, democracy, democracy. But the rule of law is really at the heart of stopping the violence here," Col. Benson says.

As a start, Col. Benson's team persuaded the chief judge in the province to teach basic law classes to the police so they would understand what kind of evidence they needed to get a conviction.

Capt. Carter and his Iraqi interpreter also began searching through case files. One of the first was Mr. Abboud's. The file consisted of dozens of handwritten pages bound with string.

Capt. Carter's interpreter, known as "Doc" for his doctorates in political science and law, studied the case. The 42-year-old interpreter, who spent 13 years as a defense attorney in Baqubah, tutored Capt. Carter in intricacies of Iraqi law and engaged him in philosophical debates on legal matters. He also liked to quote Robert Frost and play American country music on his lute. Because of the dangers interpreters face in Iraq, Capt. Carter asked that Doc not be named.

After he reviewed Mr. Abboud's case, Doc says he told Capt. Carter: "This man should be released."

Capt. Carter asked the warden if he could meet with Mr. Abboud. A few minutes later, a barrel-chested man with a black mustache that hangs over his lower lip was escorted into the room.

DOJ_NMG_0033360

Mr. Abboud says he was arrested in 1998 after trying to intervene in a fight outside a fish shop he owned. Soon after he arrived, one man stabbed another. Though he says he didn't stab the man who died, he acknowledges participating in the fight. He was sentenced to 20 years in prison.

Freed in 2002, he enjoyed postamnesty freedom for about two years. Then, in June 2004, he was arrested again and thrown back in jail to finish the remaining 18 years of his sentence. He blames a "fat woman in the general prosecutor's office" for his incarceration. "She has a grudge against me because she is related to the man who was stabbed," he says.

Capt. Carter listened to Mr. Abboud's story. "The facts of his crime were almost immaterial," he says. "Under Iraqi law, he should have been released."

Capt. Carter began meeting with judges, prosecutors, detectives and prison officials to talk about problems in the judicial system. The jail's deputy warden, who was assassinated in April, told him shortly before his death that, by his estimate, only about 100 of the 475 inmates actually deserved to be there, Capt. Carter says.

Each time he met with Iraqi officials, he raised Mr. Abboud's case. In April, Capt. Carter told the chief judge in Baqubah about his suspicion that a woman in the general prosecutor's office was blocking Mr. Abboud's release.

The prosecutor's office is supposed to deliver case files to court once a week, so a judge can read them and certify prisoners for release. For some reason, Mr. Abboud's file was never in the stack that went to the judge. Capt. Carter told the judge that he believed the "fat woman" with the "grudge" was removing Mr. Abboud's file each week.

The chief judge promised to make sure Mr. Abboud's file would be in the stack that went for review the next week, according to Capt. Carter's notes from the meeting.

Finally, Mr. Abboud's case seemed unstuck; at least he was going to get a hearing. Capt. Carter and Col. Benson also noticed a broader impact of their inquiries: The provincial governor in April asked four council members to study problems in the prison and judicial system. The deputy governor began making trips to the jail to interview prisoners and suggested bringing in local reporters. "We need to bring media to the prison and document the conditions," Emad Jaleel Abdullah, the deputy governor, told Capt. Carter.

The Iraqis were starting to release inmates -- though not always the ones the Americans recommended. Initially, Capt. Carter and Col. Benson pressed the Iraqis on about 75 cases where there seemed to be a lack of evidence or no charges. Yet only three of those prisoners were released. Capt. Carter says at least one judge openly worried that some of the long-term prisoners on the Americans' list, embittered by incarceration, would be more likely to turn into insurgents if released.

By April 17, the prison population had fallen to about 372. While still far over capacity, the numbers were dropping. "All of our questions seemed like they were unstopping the system," Capt. Carter says.

In rare cases, U.S. advisers will still usurp Iraqi commanders' authority and demand a problem be fixed. In May, Capt. Carter was visiting the prison when he was told that the Iraqi police's counterterrorism unit had a day earlier picked up a man named Muslim, who claimed to have worked with U.S. forces. No one could say exactly why he was being held. The charges were "suspicious activity."

When Capt. Carter met Muslim, who is in his 20s, the man was trembling with anger and fear. He said Iraqi police had destroyed his home and beaten his pregnant wife so badly that she had a miscarriage. "I need to be released so that I can take my wife to the hospital," he pleaded. "They killed my baby and now my wife is in danger."

Capt. Carter recognized the man from the U.S. base. He sought out the Iraqi police colonel who heads the terrorism unit. "I know this detainee you have. He is a very brave man. We would like to see him released immediately as a favor to the coalition," Capt. Carter said.

The Iraqi colonel called a judge. They chatted and then he handed his cellphone to Doc, who knew the judge from his days as a defense attorney. A few minutes later, Muslim was released.

"Justice by cellphone," Capt. Carter joked.

By May 22, the jail population had dropped to 298, according to the daily tally in the warden's office. Capt. Carter continued to plug away at Mr. Abboud's case, making regular visits to the prison.

He noticed Mr. Abboud seemed to act almost as a member of the prison staff. The inmate often wore a sweatsuit instead of the orange jumpsuit most inmates were required to wear. When the warden had guests, Mr. Abboud was summoned to make tea. In May, the prison transferred 25 of its most violent convicts -- six of whom had been sentenced to death -- to a long-term detention facility in Baghdad. Mr. Abboud rounded up the inmates for the warden, calling their names in a guttural growl.

Sometimes Mr. Abboud would stop Capt. Carter to inquire about his case or chat about his wife and six children. The warden had taken such a shine to him that he had hired one of Mr. Abboud's sons as a prison guard.

"There is something moving and haunting about him," says Capt. Carter of the Iraqi inmate. "It sounds so unsophisticated, but he is kind of a spokesperson for redemption. He acknowledges his crime and has made a commitment to grow beyond it."

DOJ_NMG_0033361

Late last month, Mr. Abboud got word that his file had finally made it out of the prosecutor's office to the judge who could approve his release. There was just one problem. All inmates must take a class on morality and religion before they can be released. Although Mr. Abboud took the class -- along with virtually every prisoner in the jail -- there was no record of it in his file. Capt. Carter arranged for the warden and other prison employees to sign a statement that Mr. Abboud had taken the class.

"He is your client," joked the warden. The warden was confident Mr. Abboud would soon be released. "I think by next week he will probably be free," he said on May 24.

For all of the grinding progress that Capt. Carter and Col. Benson have made in eight months in Iraq, there are stark reminders of how far they have to go. Some members of the Iraqi police still believe it is all right to abuse prisoners to secure a conviction. Last month, Col. Benson was discussing "Ali the Cable," the head of the police's counterterrorism unit, with another Iraqi police officer. "If the terrorists don't confess to their crimes, the judge will set them free. The only way to deal with these people is with the cable," said Col. Mustafa Mohammed Alwan, who heads the police department's rapid-reaction force, defending his Iraqi colleague.

"The way you are talking is Saddam's way," Col. Benson told his Iraqi counterpart.

The next day, Capt. Carter returned to the jail to take pictures of eight men who were detained by the Iraqi Army in October and accused of attacking a checkpoint. They included a school headmaster, a farmer, a construction worker, a high-school student, and a taxi driver. Each bore scars from where they said they had been whipped with a cable. Most had burn marks on their legs where they said an Iraqi Army major had placed electrodes and shocked them.

The youngest of the men said he was picked up on Oct. 3 and, after 12 hours of beatings, gave his torturers the names of the first seven people he could think of from his town, including his school headmaster. "He needs names so I gave him names," the teenager said.

The others were arrested on Oct. 4 between 3 a.m. and 4 a.m. The men, all Sunnis, said they were beaten, shocked and urinated on by the Iraqi Army major, who is a Shiite.

They told Capt. Carter they had been tortured for about a week at an Iraqi Army base. Then they were taken to a police station and beaten again until they agreed to sign confessions. They had been languishing in Iraqi prisons ever since, they said. Capt. Carter snapped pictures of their scars and praised them for coming forward before they were taken back to the jail.

"When there is no rule of law, there is the rule of force. This is what we are trying to change," he said.

In the past two months, the U.S. has documented seven other cases in which Sunni detainees said they were tortured by the same Shiite Iraqi major and his troops. Alyssa Schwenk, an Army lawyer in the region, said the Americans are working with the Iraqi Army to investigate, but progress has been slow. "I am not sure what the outcome will be," she says. One concern is that the prisoners' complaints are now seven months old, making it harder to obtain evidence and track down witnesses.

By May 28, the prison was down to 281 detainees. Mr. Abboud's case, however, was still languishing in the court system. His file, with the letters certifying that he completed his religious classes, finally made it to the felony-court judge. But the judge declined, without explanation, to release him.

Capt. Carter promised Mr. Abboud he will keep pressing the case.

Oil, Politics And Bloodshed Corrupt An Iraqi City (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise And Qais Mizher

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

BASRA, Iraq — Politics, once seen as a solution to the problems of a society broken by years of brutal single-party rule, has paralyzed the heart of Iraq's south.

This once-quiet city of riverside promenades was among the most receptive to the American invasion. Now, three years later, it is being pulled apart by Shiite political parties that want to control the region and its biggest prize, oil. But in today's Iraq, politics and power flow from the guns of militias, and negotiating has been a bloody process.

"We're into political porridge, that's what's changed," said Brig. James Everard, commander of the British forces in Basra. "It's mafia-type politics down here."

Police reports from the past five months read like war chronicles: Eight oil company employees murdered. Twenty caches of Russian rockets discovered, including a pile in the back of an ambulance. A tank of stolen oil found in a fake mosque. Shootouts reported between a politician's militia and the police, and between police officers.

Now, after two years of relative calm, Basra has a soaring murder rate (the 85 killings in May were nearly triple the number in January), a tattered oil industry and a terrified population.

"I cannot talk with you," said Sajid Saad Hassan, a professor at Basra University's agriculture college. "I haven't joined a party and no militia is protecting me."

DOJ_NMG_0033362

The story of Basra's descent traces the arc of the war itself. People here, mostly Shiites whom Saddam Hussein oppressed, embraced the invasion. But for the next three years, Baghdad put its resources into fighting insurgents in central and western Iraq, leaving the quiet Shiite south to find its own way.

But the rules have fallen away along with the end of Mr. Hussein's rule, leaving a broken landscape of empty state institutions.

"So much of the state melted after Saddam fell," an American official said. A primordial soup of political parties, their militias and tribes filled the void. They formed morals patrols at the university, commanded entire units of the flimsy police force, and moved into positions of power in the company that controls the vast oil-processing and transportation network.

Now, with provincial elections still many months away, a bloody power grab has ensued. It is a battle being waged from inside Basra's institutions and will be particularly difficult for the prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, to stop. Indeed, three days after he vowed to crack down with an "iron fist" and imposed a state of emergency, a bomb killed 27 in a market here.

In the shadowy world of Shiite politics, the fight is over power. One party, Fadhila, is currently on top. Its members include the governor and the chairman of the Provincial Council. Fadhila has close ties to Moktada al-Sadr, the anti-American cleric whose grass-roots militia is among the most powerful here.

Aqeel Talib, a senior member of the party, argues that a disagreement over federalism is one of the issues dividing the parties. The party and its two main competitors — the Supreme Council of Islamic Revolution in Iraq and the Dawa Party — all had different visions for a southern Shiite region.

In Fadhila's model, Basra Province, the only one it controls, would stand on its own. "We as Fadhila, we want to make our province our own region," Mr. Talib said. "We have two million people, an airport, a port and oil — everything we need to be a state."

Qadim al-Muqdadi, a professor in Baghdad University's media college, explained: "Each political party believes he is better than the other at running the country. They don't rely on the power of thought; they rely on the power of the gun and the tribe."

At the heart of much of the fighting is oil. The fields in this province are the richest in Iraq, and the crude oil they pump makes up all of Iraq's current exports, which in turn pay civil servants' salaries. Officials in Baghdad say the parties and their militias play a major role in rampant theft.

"If you don't understand what's happening there, follow the dollar sign," said Mowaffak al-Rubaie, the national security adviser. "There is a 6,000-barrel-per-day difference between the level of production for export and the level of actual export. It goes into the pockets of these warlords, militias, organized crime, political parties."

Fadhila, the dominant political party, controls the guard force that protects the vast network run by the state-owned Southern Oil Company.

Fadhila says it has helped keep the oil flowing in hard times; its political opponents argue that it is perfectly positioned to profit. A senior party official in Baghdad denies any profiteering.

The guards "have weapons," said Hassan al-Rashid, the former governor and an opponent of Fadhila, and "these weapons are not in honest hands."

Few in Basra would agree to speak openly about oil, and the industry has been impenetrable to Western officials in Basra, who said they could not even identify the major players.

"It's not just one party, so everyone keeps silent," said a provincial council member, who asked for anonymity out of concern for his safety. "If you tell about me, I tell about you."

Whatever the case, violence has spilled into the industry. From May 5 to May 9, two oil company officials and a harbor official were killed, according to the police reports. In early March a bomb exploded in the office of Aqil Abdel Samad, a senior oil company official, wounding him.

"The violence we're seeing on the street, it is a big turf war," said a Western official, who asked not to be identified because he was not authorized to speak with the media. Basra's police have been unable to separate the warring parties or stop graft because the force, stacked with men who are affiliated with the parties, is part of the problem.

The city's current chaos, in fact, can be traced in part to the formation of the new police force. British military officers acknowledge that the early background checks, which they oversaw, were poor to nonexistent, and the major political parties took the opportunity to pack their people onto the force. A weak-willed police chief allowed himself to be bullied into accepting party loyalists, the current chief said.

"The parties embarrassed him," said the chief, Maj. Gen. Hassan Swadi al-Saad. "Everyone came to him with names and he employed them."

One result is a force that has 37,000 members, 50 percent more than authorized, spread across the four provinces patrolled by the British in southeast Iraq, according to Col. Sundey Sunderland, who is in charge of logistics planning for the

DOJ_NMG_0033363

British military. (Also, the Facilities Protection Service, which guards schools, oil rigs and mosques and has been heavily infiltrated by militias, numbers 25,000.)

There have been skirmishes among corrupt police units, particularly those dealing with major crimes, internal affairs and criminal investigations.

Some of those forces captured and held two British officers last fall, and the British military has begun to purge them. "They were assassins going around killing people," said Laszlo Szomoru, a British senior police adviser in Basra.

The police reports are illustrative. On May 22, officers from the intelligence unit, one of the more heavily political divisions, raided a Southern Oil Company building, and on April 25, two guards from the oil protection force were charged with breaking into an auto store, killing a guard there, and stealing two cars.

The police have also apparently done nothing in the face of sectarian killings of Sunni Arabs, whose portion of the population has shrunk rapidly over the past year. Some Sunnis suspect the police of carrying out most of the killings.

The parties' power inside the police complicates law enforcement for the British. In January, for example, they identified several men suspected of running death squads, siphoning oil and shooting at British soldiers. Soldiers arrested them, and for the next three months, the local government refused to speak to the British.

"You arrest someone, and the next day you're on the phone to the governor, to the chief of police," said Brigadier Everard. "We say, 'We know he's yours, but we did it for the following reason.' "

The province has also sunk into political paralysis as the governor, Muhammad al-Waeli, tried but failed to fire General Saad, the police chief. The provincial council has tried, also unsuccessfully, to remove Mr. Waeli, but has not been able to garner the two-thirds majority it needs. The only thing they could all agree on, it seemed, was to refuse all contact with the British.

Baghdad is also powerless to remove provincial officials, who are protected from the central government under Iraqi law.

Basra's troubles would be fewer were it not for the influence of neighboring countries, particularly Iran.

Although the British military is skeptical, General Saad says many of the parties derive their strength from Iran. The parties themselves accuse one another of being Iranian stooges.

"Every day I have reports of 190 pilgrims coming from Iran," he said. "Are they pilgrims or are they intelligence officers?"

Illegal crossings appear to be common. On Feb. 1, the Basra border police arrested 23 Iranians who said they were pilgrims crossing illegally at Chlat, according to a police report. Just five days later, they arrested a man whom they identified as Hadi Dalqi Bukhtyar, a colonel in the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps.

Weapons that have not been seen since the Iran-Iraq war in the 1980's abound, and local police officials say they believe many are coming from Iran. The police noted finds of 106 Russian-made Katyusha rockets and 35 antitank missiles, also Russian, over five months beginning in January.

"Most people here are asking themselves, is this Basra?" Professor Hassan said helplessly.

Hussein Defense Witnesses Admit Lying (LAT)

By Louise Roug

Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

BAGHDAD — The trial of Saddam Hussein reached a moment of high drama today when four defense witnesses recanted previous testimony, swearing in written statements that Hussein's lawyers had bribed them to lie in court.

The witnesses testified that Khalil Dulaymi, one of the lead defense attorneys, had paid hundreds of dollars and promised life-long salaries to the witnesses if they testified that several of executed prisoners, in fact, were alive and well.

During clandestine meetings in Syria, as well as Hussein's hometown of Tikrit, Dulaymi and others had conspired with the witnesses, telling them what to say in court, the witnesses now say. The new allegations against the defense team — and counter-allegations from the defense charging the court with intimidation and threats — were not the only surprises on today.

Appearing in court for the first time, an American attorney for the defense said the court was violating the rights of the defendants.

"As I'm sure any experienced judge will know, it is highly improper for anyone other than the defense lawyers to speak to the defense witnesses," said Curt Doebbler, responding to the new and explosive testimony by the defense witnesses. "We find it quite unfortunate that anybody is speaking with them, even if they are authorized by the court, when it is not in open court."

37 Taliban Militants Killed In Afghanistan (USAT)

USA Today, June 13, 2006

Afghan and U.S.-led coalition forces fought Taliban militants in three battles, killing 37 fighters, including a relative of Taliban leader Mullah Omar, an Afghan army general said Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0033364

Omar's brother-in-law, Mullah Amanullah, was among 15 men killed in one of the battles in southern Afghanistan's Uruzgan province, army commander Gen. Rehmatullah Raufi said. Troops stormed the area late Sunday after a tip from tribesmen.

Coalition military spokesman Maj. Quentin Innis could not confirm if Amanullah had been killed.

Six suspected Taliban members were captured and several assault rifles and rocket launchers seized in the village, Raufi said. No Afghan or coalition troops were hurt. In a second raid early Monday, Afghan and coalition troops killed 12 suspected Taliban in southern Kandahar province's Saidan village, Raufi said.

Ten Taliban militants were killed in neighboring Helmand province in a battle involving British and Afghan forces, Raufi said.

Iranian police officers with batons and shields beat women's rights demonstrators in a downtown Tehran square. The protest by about 200 women was organized by a previously unknown group calling itself the Labor and Communist Party. An invitation delivered to the Associated Press demanded equal rights for women and the nullification of a law allowing Iranian men to have four wives.

“We are women, we are human, but we don't have any rights!” the women chanted.

About 100 police officers, including female officers, attacked the demonstrators and dispersed them about an hour after the protest began.

Cuba has cut electricity to the U.S. diplomatic mission in Havana, a U.S. official said.

“This is the same type of harassment that the Cuban people have had to live with on a daily basis,” State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters.

Mission spokesman Drew Blakeney said the power was cut June 5 to the United States Interests Section in Havana. Requests to the Cuban government to restore power have gone unanswered, he said. The mission is running on generator power.

The mission complained that the cutoff was bullying but vowed to continue business as usual.

Inside The Afghan Drug Trade (CSM)

By Scott Baldauf

Christian Science Monitor, June 13, 2006

The Afghan police chief doesn't realize his voice is being taped. So pardon him if he brags about his life as a drug trafficker.

In a friendly conversation recorded in his home last summer, he tells of his quarrels with another drug-dealing police commander in the country's northern Takhar Province; about driving through a rival's police checkpoint with 500 kilos of heroin in his car; and his adventures in rescuing three heroin-smuggling friends from the clutches of Tajik policemen. It's just another part of the job, he says.

"If my adventure were filmed, it would be a very exciting movie," chuckles the commander, referred to hereafter as "Ahmed Noor." On the tape, he laughs. "The UN should give me an award."

But on one point the former mujahideen commander is certain: "Even if all the world were to come to Afghanistan, they will not be able to stop smuggling."

In relative terms, Mr. Noor is a small player in an illegal business that generates $2.7 billion a year, more than half the value of the country's legal economy. Afghan officials and foreign diplomats increasingly call this central Asian country a "narco-state," as top officials find it more profitable to flout laws than enforce them.

Very few major Afghan officials have been removed for involvement in drug trafficking, in part because of the lack of evidence, and in part because the country has only recently created special tribunals to handle major drug cases.

For this reason, the Monitor launched its own investigation in a province known for trafficking, to see how prevalent the drug trade is among police chiefs and what evidence could be found. Sending an investigative unit with a hidden minidisk recorder to the northern province of Takhar - where Afghanistan's medium and low-grade heroin is trafficked into Tajikistan, and on toward Europe - the Monitor recorded four police commanders.

All of the names in this story have been changed. The Monitor deemed it too dangerous for our investigators to confront each of these commanders with the taped evidence, and too unfair to their reputations to release their names without giving them a chance to defend themselves. But the statements in these tapes - gathered by investigators who have excellent reputations collecting testimony for the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission, among others - provide a rare inside view of how drug corruption has trickled down to the front lines in the country's faltering war on drugs. Commander Dost

DOJ_NMG_0033365

"Commander Dost" is commander of a border police unit that patrols a large swath of the border with Tajikistan. In his taped conversation, Dost reveals how widespread the drug trade has become, as police commanders compete with each other to dominate the drug trade in Takhar Province.

"For one year I did the smuggling," he says, on the lawn of his home. "It was not hidden from anybody. It was obvious to everybody. I put my RPG (rocket-propelled grenade launcher) on my shoulder.... I became a dangerous smuggler."

But increasingly, Dost finds himself being run out of the drug business by a group of more powerful police commanders. These commanders have been shutting out all other competitors in the drug trafficking business, says Commander Dost.

A few years back, one of these commanders sent eight men to ambush Commander Dost. "Fortunately I had 25 of my [tribesmen] with me," says Dost. "I used the RPG and fired at the enemy in front of us, and behind us. Finally I made about $70,000 for myself from the drug money."

But at one point, he was captured with $370,000 worth of heroin, and had to sell everything he had - including his Swiss Rado watches and most of his heavy weapons - in order to pay back the owners of that drug. In another instance, Dost was captured by his chief competitor, another police commander.

The commander "caught me once with 56 kg of drugs. He asked me, 'Will you do it again?' and I told him that I would never do that again. Right after I promised him that I would not do that again, I came home and took another 100 kilos of drug and put it in my Russian jeep and took it to sell."

"These persecutors do it themselves, like 300 kilos to 400 kilos each time," Dost complains. These days, "all the smuggling is now in the hands" of these commanders, "and no one can do anything without [their] permission. Except me. When I do it, I tell my boys, 'Anybody who wants to stop you, you should kill them.' " Commander Nasir

"Commander Nasir" is the police commander of a border district in Takhar Province. Like Commander Dost, Nasir is a relatively small player in the drug trade, but he gives an inside picture of how some of the bigger police commanders - both in Afghanistan and in neighboring Tajikistan - punish drug-trafficking competitors to burnish their law-enforcement credentials, or take bribes from those willing to pay for favorable treatment.

"One day I counted how much I had given" a top police commander, says Nasir, who was a longtime commander during the Russian war, fighting alongside Northern Alliance commander Ahmed Shah Masood. From drug sales and fees, "it was $680,000, just in cash." Nasir pauses. "$680,000! A lot of money, isn't it? But believe me, he [the commander] never had any intention to do anything good for me in return, ever."

Nasir says all the big smuggling these days is being conducted by relatives of this top commander, some of whom are police commanders in Takhar. One relative "takes $50 per kilo to carry it from this side to that side of the border near Tajikistan. And if he catches somebody else smuggling, he takes $5,000 to $10,000 each time."

Nasir says he has stopped taking drugs across the border himself, because he is too well known, but he continues to send his men to do the job instead. Instead of paying his men immediately after a successful mission, now he pays them a week later, so that competing police commanders don't discover his smuggling until it's over.

"When I was a big smuggler, I had relations with the Tajik officers on the other side of the border. But my competitor has relations with the Russian KGB," he says. "[His] people have damaged my business a lot. Once I lost $500,000 of heroin, another time $600,000, another time $700,000, another time $900,000, another time $1.1 million because of [his] people." Nasir laughs. "My opponents have knocked out my 32 teeth."

But as bad as things are with the powerful commander - and after an assassination attempt by the top commander against Nasir, relations are pretty bad - Nasir says he wants to be practical and keep the peace, for now.

"I have a lot of proof and evidence against [the commander]," he says, "but I want to keep my relations good with him." Ahmed Noor

"Ahmed Noor" is the police commander of a market town along the Afghan-Tajik border in Takhar Province. In the tape, Mr. Noor admits that he's involved in drug trafficking, and gives an up-to-date breakdown of how much profit corrupt police officials make per kilo in the drug trade. But Noor notes with chagrin that other, more powerful commanders are making much more money than he is.

Mentioning one police commander by name, Noor says, "[He] is not happy with $20,000 a night from drug money," he says. "He charged $40 per kilo to transport it to the other side of the border. [He] himself is at home, resting and watching movies, and he plays cards with friends."

This commander moves more than 600 kilos every night, and at $40 a kilo, that's a hefty profit, Noor says. "Believe me, I know he did this six times a week."

But while big players like this commander are able to move large quantities of heroin through Takhar Province, and even through Noor's own district, Noor says that this powerful commander won't share this business with other commanders.

DOJ_NMG_0033366

Once, Noor says, this commander warned Noor to stop trafficking in drugs. Noor refused. So the commander started setting up checkpoints to try to catch Noor in the act of smuggling. At one such checkpoint, Noor was driving the car himself, and rather than stop at the checkpoint, he floored the accelerator and attempted to run over an armed soldier blocking the road.

"I had 500 kilos of drugs with me, and I was not going to give up that easily," he says. "So I drove fast to run over the soldier. The soldier runs away and shoots in the air. After I unloaded the car at the border, I came back to the commander of the checkpoint, and asked him why his soldier wanted to stop me. [The checkpoint commander] told me it was the order of [the top commander]. So I warned [the checkpoint commander] and told him that the drug money goes to [the commander's] pocket, but why he is stopping other people's cars. I told him, 'the next time you try to stop me, I will shoot your head to pieces with bullets.' "

Noor admits that the drug business is getting more difficult, and his business partners are becoming less trustworthy. "One day, I took 60 kilos of drugs to the other side of the border to Dushanbe, but the Tajik smuggler took it and did not pay me," he says. "No one can do anything to Tajik smugglers on their soil."

Noor blames the incident on his own sense of trust. "I believed one of my Afghan friends, who told me that this Tajik guy pays better than the others. I believed him." Commander Bilal

"Commander Bilal" is a senior administrator in the provincial Takhar police force, and a former police commander of a border district along the Tajik border. In his tape, Bilal complains that police discipline is breaking down, and the trafficking has become so fractured that even low-level cops are starting to skim profits. More important, he reveals that drug corruption has infiltrated deep within the Ministry of Interior, the chief law- enforcement organization, as top officials take bribes to appoint corrupt drug dealers into top police positions.

On paper, Bilal is one of the most powerful police commanders in his province, with many district commanders under him. But in reality, with district commanders deeply involved in the drug trade, few of the police officials in Takhar pay attention to him. Things were better, Bilal says, when he was a district police commander.

But even then, it wasn't so good. As a trafficking point, his border town was highly overrated.

"What have they seen [about that town]?" he asks. "There is only one bridge, and anyone you send - even your brother - will not bring any smuggler to you. If some one is caught there and brought to me, I will get $10,000 from him [in bribes]. But that poor soldier standing there will accept $200 from the smuggler [to let him pass through] instead of bringing him to me. I can't stand there myself on the bridge, because it is shameful."

In any case, Bilal says his relations with the drug smugglers was never very warm. "I don't know why, but the smugglers did not trust us," says Bilal.

He thinks for a moment, and then continues. One of his colleagues in the police department in the border town, "was playing games with the smugglers. [This commander] is the kind of person who cut a deal with smugglers, takes money from them, and further on up the road, stops and seizes their drugs, too. That was the reason the smugglers did not trust us. "

Bilal says almost all the police commanders in Takhar have paid officials at the Ministry of Interior to get their jobs, and nowadays, commanders have to pay increasing amounts just to keep their jobs.

"Every three months the commanders are pushed a little bit or they are told that they may be replaced. Then everybody rushes toward the ministry with $10,000."

But Bilal says he likes his job. It's not the responsibilities that he likes the most, though. It's the access to the drug trade. "It is a good position," he says. "I pay $1,000 and get $20,000 in profit."

"It has some advantages," he says. At the Ministry of Interior, little effort - or ability - to end a corrosive trade

Top Afghan officials privately admit that perhaps 80 percent of the personnel at the Ministry of Interior, Afghanistan's chief law-enforcement agency - from local police chiefs up to the top bureaucrats - may be benefiting from the drug trade. At a press conference announcing his resignation last fall, Interior Minister Ali Jalali said that the ministry had a list of 100 top officials who were being watched for evidence of drug trafficking. The result is a government that is either incapable or unwilling to prevent a trade that is rapidly undermining the country's rule of law and the Afghan people's faith in their leadership.

"The wrong elements can be a sapling in our society, and if we act now, we can remove it with less damage," says Habibullah Qaderi, Afghan minister for counternarcotics, a government agency that is separate from the Ministry of Interior. "But if it becomes a tree, there will be more destruction when you remove it."

Already the corrupt sapling is becoming a tree, Mr. Qaderi says, adding that Afghanistan cannot afford to wait for the proof of guilt. "If we had removed these people one by one, the country would have been much much better." The Afghan people need to trust that their government is working in the national interest. "People have to be close with their government. The day there is a distance, that becomes very dangerous."

A note on how we reported this story

The Monitor used a reporting device in this story that it normally avoids: The key interviews, all taped, were with sources who did not realize they were speaking to the press. This presents a risk to fairness and privacy, in that the interviewees might speak more casually and loosely than they would if they knew they were speaking to a reporter. We decided to go forward for several reasons. The subjects in these interviews are all public officials, not private citizens, discussing what should be public business. The issue of drug trafficking, illegal in Afghanistan as nearly everywhere else, is critically important to the future of that country and others. We could find no other safe way to collect direct evidence of this official corruption. But because we could not directly confront these police chiefs without endangering the lives of reporters or interpreters, we decided to withhold their names.

DOJ_NMG_0033367

- The editors

NATO Goes Global (WSJ)

By Melanie Kirkpatrick

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

BRUSSELS -- The World Cup has opened in Germany, and NATO is there, out in force. No, war hasn't broken out between soccer rivals France and Germany. The trans-Atlantic defense alliance is present at the invitation of Germany, which is worried about the threat of a terrorist attack. NATO planes are patrolling the skies during the monthlong tournament, just as they did during the pope's visit to Poland last month and at the Olympics in Italy in February. Post-9/11 such deployments -- more than 30 to date -- are part of the alliance's contribution to the defense against global terrorism.

NATO's mission in the age of terror was the subject of a chat last week with Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer at NATO's rambling headquarters here. The lanky Dutchman sprawled on a sofa in his office for an interview with Matthew Kaminski, editor of the Journal Europe's editorial page, and me. If there's a word that can sum up our conversation, it's "global." Mr. Scheffer, who has led NATO for two years, is thinking far beyond the borders of the alliance's 26 member countries.

"If you look at the threats and challenges coming to NATO," he says, "these are of a global nature. Terrorism is of a global nature. Weapons of mass destruction proliferation is a global threat. Failed and failing states are happening on a global scale. . . . NATO needs global partners to face those challenges." As if to prove his point, on an easel in a corner of his office a large map of Afghanistan nearly obscures the map of Europe behind it.

Afghanistan is NATO's first mission outside Europe and a crucial test of the alliance's relevance in a post-Cold War world. Defense ministers meeting in Brussels voted Thursday to proceed with a plan to increase alliance forces in Afghanistan to 17,000 from 9,000 and to expand into the violence-plagued south. "We are going into complicated territory in the south," Mr. Scheffer says. "Taliban heartland. The Taliban is testing us -- playing on public opinion in the nations committing forces." He doesn't demur when I mention that a retired U.S. general told me he believes insurgents had deliberately targeted the four Canadians who were killed in April with the aim of getting Ottawa to withdraw its troops.

Do the allies have the stomach for a fight? "I'm convinced there is the resolve," he says. Consider what would happen "if we were to lose Afghanistan again to the Taliban. . . . That country would be the net exporter of terrorism to the world once again. Where would the consequences of that terrorism land? On U.S. doorsteps and on European doorsteps."

At the same time, Mr. Scheffer is quick to concede that he's had little success in persuading member nations to spend more on defense. Only seven countries meet NATO's informal requirement that member states spend at least 2% of GDP on defense -- and two of those, Turkey and Greece, target much of their spending for a possible conflict with each other. "The situation is bad," Mr. Scheffer says. "I have no other word for it."

In an age of far-flung deployments, airlift -- NATO has next to none -- is a particularly tough problem. "We need to be able to get [NATO] forces where we need them. That means we need strategic lift, heavy transport aircraft. Those are in short supply." NATO has plenty of helicopters, but no easy way to transport them to Afghanistan.

NATO currently depends on the Yanks and the Brits to take its troops and equipment where they need to be, or it leases planes from the Ukrainians or the Russians. Mr. Scheffer supports a U.S. proposal to encourage some NATO allies to form a consortium to purchase eight C-17s at $225 million apiece. He displays a model of a C-17 in his office, and -- like the professional diplomat he is -- he also displays an A400-M, an Airbus plane that won't come on the market until 2012. "In my ideal world," he says, NATO would buy a combination of the American and European planes. Translation: Let's spread the arms money around.

Mr. Scheffer stresses the need to work more closely with non-NATO countries. In Afghanistan, NATO leads a coalition of 37 nations, including Australia and New Zealand, whose defense ministers attended last week's ministerial meeting for the first time (as did the Afghan defense minister). In the Mediterranean, two Russian warships are joining NATO in a maritime counterterrorism operation; other partners include Tunisia, Algeria, Morocco and Israel. The sec-gen speaks enthusiastically about the officer training academy NATO wants to open in the Middle East. It already trains soldiers in Iraq, a mission Mr. Scheffer hopes to expand.

DOJ_NMG_0033368

NATO is even tackling the touchy issue of missile defense. It just completed a 10,000-page initial study concluding that a missile defense is both necessary and viable. "Where that might lead to is of course another matter," he says. "But [NATO] should not shy from debate."

All these subjects are on the agenda for the NATO heads of state meeting in Riga, Latvia, in November. The last meeting -- Prague in 2002 -- was the "transformation" summit, when NATO signed on to the proposition that it needed an expeditionary force capable of responding quickly in the world's hotspots. That 25,000-soldier rapid response force should be up and running by Riga. The Afghanistan mission and the potential acquisition of airlift are also signs of progress. NATO isn't fully "transformed" yet, but it's getting there. Under Mr. Scheffer's leadership, Riga may become known as the "global" summit.

Ms. Kirkpatrick is a deputy editor of The Wall Street Journal's editorial page.

Congress Yields To Pentagon On Army Pay Crunch (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Congress is giving the Pentagon unusual authority to shift money in its budget to cope with an anticipated multibillion-dollar payroll shortfall that could have an impact on ground troops in Iraq.

The Army estimates its year-end shortfall could be as large as $1.4 billion for active personnel, and $1.9 billion when counting the National Guard and reserves. The Marines face less of a shortfall, about $116.5 million, but are a far smaller force and more vulnerable to disruptions to personnel accounts.

The Army's situation is serious enough that lawmakers agreed last week to approve expanded transfer authority of as much as $5 billion for the Defense Department as part of a $92.2 billion wartime spending bill, expected to clear Congress as early as today. The increase represents a one-third rise in the Pentagon's existing authority, and is designed to avoid any pay disruption before the end of this fiscal year on Sept. 30.

The persistent scramble for funds reflects the immense cost pressures of financing a prolonged overseas deployment of the all-volunteer professional military in Iraq, especially when compared with the draftees who provided so much manpower in Vietnam.

Significant bonuses are being paid to retain personnel and recruit new soldiers, adding hundreds of millions of dollars to annual costs. As the mix of personnel has become more tilted toward more senior soldiers, the Pentagon must pay even more.

All the services were affected in the winter when Congress and the White House agreed to a 1% across-the-board cut from fiscal 2006 appropriations without exempting military personnel accounts. In the Army's case, it began about $860 million in the hole, and had never budgeted for some of the recruitment incentives its top command actively promoted.

The added payments, some of which were authorized as late as December, are projected to add about $560 million, officials said. An additional $224 million stems from higher-than-anticipated housing allowances and the cost of paying increasingly senior soldiers. The frequency -- and cost -- of moving soldiers and their families to new stations in anticipation of deployment overseas has increased, adding as much as $100 million to personnel expenditures.

For the Army and the Marines, the situation is complicated by the fact that the two services not only have borne the brunt of the fighting in Iraq but also must lobby Congress for extra money to replace worn equipment.

This has created an implicit competition between personnel and procurement needs. Thus, the Navy had its personnel request increased by $558 million when the emergency supplemental spending bill was negotiated last week. By comparison, the Army and Marine requests were increased modestly, while lawmakers put aside more money for them to buy extra planes and armor.

With less than four months remaining in the current fiscal year, the additional transfer authority is hugely important, and Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England himself intervened with the House Appropriations Committee leadership to help secure the flexibility.

The administration, which has been permitted to transfer as much as $3.75 billion for this fiscal year, proposed in the winter to raise the cap by $1.25 billion to $5 billion -- a 33% increase, The appropriations committees typically are reluctant to give this much power to the executive branch, and the House denied the request in March. The Senate later allowed a $600 million increase in May, but as the personnel-funding crisis became more evident, both houses agreed to go beyond their initial bills.

For the Army, this last portion of the fiscal year is especially important in terms of recruitment. Running low on personnel funds at this juncture would mean trouble, as officials say the service typically signs up about half of its total in the last four months of the fiscal year, after recruits have come out of school.

The House, which took up the funding bill yesterday evening, is expected to complete passage today, and the Senate anticipates sending it on to President Bush soon after. About $65.8 billion would go the Pentagon to replenish accounts strained by the cost of military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan and an additional $19.8 billion is provided for hurricane recovery efforts on the Gulf Coast.

DOJ_NMG_0033369

Also included, but not reflected in the $92.2 billion total, is an additional $2.3 billion to help prepare the nation for the threat of avian flu.

Pain Pump Tested In Battle (WSJ)

By Robert McGough

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

When Lt. Col. Chester "Trip" Buckenmaier III was deployed to Iraq three years ago, he was allowed to carry only two bags. His first contained personal effects; what he packed in his second would begin to change the way the Army treats pain.

Lt. Col. Buckenmaier, an Army anesthesiologist, filled one of his two allotted bags with portable infusion pumps made by Sorenson Medical Inc. The pumps, which are about the size of a large tube of toothpaste, deliver a constant infusion of local anesthetic that blocks the pain experienced by soldiers with grievous wounds to their arms and legs. The Sorenson "ambIT" pumps have computer chips that regulate the delivery of anesthetic. The pumps hadn't yet been approved for use by the military, but the Army Surgeon General said if Lt. Col. Buckenmaier wanted to employ them, he could bring them into the field himself.

War has always been a crucible for medical technology. For Sorenson Medical, a small, closely held company outside Salt Lake City, the battlefield has been a proving ground for its infusion pump. Lt. Col. Buckenmaier's bag of pumps has helped transform how the Army treats and transports wounded soldiers.

Sorenson is one of the smaller companies offering post-operative pain-control pumps. Lazard Capital Markets estimates the market for such devices, including those for nerve blocks and wound infusion, is about $115 million a year. So far, Sorenson has been able to parlay the use of its pumps by Lt. Col. Buckenmaier into a two-year contract to be one of two suppliers of such pumps to the military, and into a higher profile in the civilian market than it would otherwise have achieved. In civilian medical care, pain pumps are still just gaining physician acceptance and frequently face hurdles in terms of reimbursement.

Physicians specializing in regional anesthesia have known for years how to inject local anesthetics near networks of nerves in order to block pain from an arm, leg or joint. The problem, says Kevin Sanborn, an anesthesiologist and nerve-block advocate at St. Luke's-Roosevelt Hospital Center in New York, is that injected anesthetics are eliminated quickly from the body, so they deaden nerves for only a few hours. Pumps that infuse anesthetics, performing what are known as "continuous peripheral nerve blocks," can hold off pain for days at a time, helping outpatients in particular. That allows patients to cut back on or eliminate opioid pain medicines like Vicodin, which affect the entire body, and can cause nausea, vomiting and intestinal blockage.

Sorenson's aim was to create a pump that costs less than institutional models used for hospital inpatients, but retain much of their flexibility in dosing. Mr. Sorenson says it has taken about $20 million to get its current pumps designed and on the market. Sorenson's ambIT pump sells for about $300.

James Lee Sorenson, 55 years old, founded Sorenson Medical in 1999. His father is a serial entrepreneur who is also known for starting the Sorenson Molecular Genealogy Foundation, which can provide genealogical information based on a DNA sample. The younger Mr. Sorenson was interested in medicine-infusion technology, and bought a company that made an infusion device. Problems with cost and patents on the device led Sorenson to develop on its own a portable infusion pump that could, among other things, be used to treat pain by infusing anesthetic to block nerve pathways.

The company has benefited from its connection to the Sorenson family, which was willing to invest money and wait awhile before it began to earn any return. The company just recently turned profitable, Mr. Sorenson says. The company's sales are running at an annual rate of about $10 million, but are more than doubling each quarter, he says, with orders from the military accounting for about 30% of sales.

Although the continuous nerve blocks were developed in the civilian world and their use is growing there, the technology faces hurdles on the home front. Medicare, the government insurance program for the elderly, doesn't reimburse either the extra time physicians require to treat patients with the devices, or the cost of the devices themselves. Many insurers won't reimburse for the use of pumps to infuse anesthetic directly into wounds; more will pay for their use as continuous nerve blocks, but there, too, reimbursement is at times spotty.

Moreover, anesthesiologists require special training to perform continuous nerve blocks. Often the nerves are dangerously close to blood vessels, and care must be taken not to damage the nerves themselves. Surgeons often are reluctant to introduce a new procedure, with the attendant risks and time demands, into operations they perform.

Sorenson is just one of several companies that have developed a range of portable pain pumps, and it faces several larger competitors in a challenging market. The largest player is I-Flow Corp., a Lake Forest, Calif. public company that makes a disposable pump costing less than $200. Like Sorenson, the large orthopedic-device maker Stryker Corp. is making pumps that use computer chips to regulate dosing. Both companies dwarf Sorenson in the sales forces and other resources they can put behind their devices.

DOJ_NMG_0033370

So getting noticed and used by the military was an important plus for Sorenson, even though it is a much smaller market. Continuous peripheral nerve blocks are rapidly being adopted by the military because they are so well suited to treating the severe pain caused by wounded arms and legs. When used in operations, the blocks don't require as much medical infrastructure as general anesthesia -- a big advantage in spartan battlefield hospitals. Their use is growing as the military keeps training anesthesiologists in the technique.

Lt. Col. Buckenmaier deployed to Iraq in 2003. He had studied continuous peripheral nerve blocks at Duke University. Lt. Col. Buckenmaier, a physician at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, comes from a long line of soldiers -- he was named after one of Teddy Roosevelt's Rough Riders. He first came across a Sorenson pump at a company display at a medical professional meeting. It wasn't the current pump, but a predecessor version. He favored pumps with computer chips because he valued their flexible dosing, and felt they would deliver a consistent volume of anesthetic even on aircraft, with their attendant changes in air pressure and temperature.

Lt. Col. Buckenmaier's first patient was Spc. Brian Wilhelm, a 21-year-old soldier who had a large portion of his left calf blown off by shrapnel from a rocket-propelled grenade. In a case report published in "Regional Anesthesia and Pain Medicine," Lt. Col. Buckenmaier described how administering two nerve blocks on major nerves running into the leg changed the soldier's evaluation of his pain from 10 on a 10-point scale -- "the worst pain imaginable" -- to zero. The nerve blocks remained in place for 15 days, and the soldier remained largely pain-free, while he was flown to Germany and then to Walter Reed in Washington for medical care. The pump described in the article was the Sorenson ambIT.

Based on the ambIT pump's use in Iraq, the military contacted Sorenson and sought a contract to supply pumps for two years. Sorenson sent its top engineer to work with military testers who wanted to make sure it would function in vibrating helicopters, and in evacuation planes at altitude (one test: explosive decompression). Sorenson produces pumps for the military with special coloring, and with key military uses easily programmed by pushing buttons on the device. Sorenson's current contract is temporary and the company is in negotiations for another, longer-term pact. Currently, the military uses Sorenson pumps as nerve blocks at Walter Reed and for general pain control on evacuation flights; Stryker pumps are also widely used in Iraq as nerve blocks.

Sorenson Medical must tread carefully in parlaying its military business into sales back home. To avoid tripping over Pentagon rules, it can't say the military endorses its product, only that Sorenson supplies infusion pumps to the military. But mentions of the company's ambIT pump, in the medical-journal article and in broader press articles, can be handed out by the sales force and provided at trade shows. The company can say its pump passed airworthiness trials for the military, suggesting its robustness for use outside the hospital. A nurse and nurse practitioner working for the company sometimes make general presentations about pain management during hospital "grand rounds," and they work in a reference to the company's pumps and their use by the military.

Race Is On For Next Generation Of Nuclear Weapons (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian

Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

In the Cold War arms race, scientists rushed to build thousands of warheads to counter the Soviet Union. Today, those scientists are racing once again, but this time to rebuild an aging nuclear stockpile.

Scientists at Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico are locked in an intense competition with rivals at Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory in the San Francisco Bay Area to design the nation's first new nuclear bomb in two decades.

Since the 1950s, the two labs have fiercely competed in the bomb trade with technologies as different as Microsoft and Apple.

The new weapon, under development for about a year, is intended to ensure the long-term reliability of the nation's inventory of bombs. Program backers say that with greater confidence in the quality of its weapons the nation could draw down its stockpile, estimated at about 6,000 warheads.

Scientists also intend for the new weapons to be less vulnerable to accidental detonation and to be so secure that any stolen or lost weapon would be unusable.

By law, the new weapons would pack the same explosive power as existing warheads and be suitable only for the same kinds of military targets as the weapons they replace. As a result, unlike past proposals for new atomic weapons, the current project has captured bipartisan support in Congress.

But some veterans of nuclear arms development are strongly opposed, arguing that building new weapons could trigger another arms race with Russia and China, as well as undermine arguments to stop nuclear developments in Iran, North Korea and elsewhere. And, the critics say, it would eventually increase pressure to resume underground nuclear testing, which the U.S. halted 15 years ago.

Inside the labs, however, emotions and enthusiasm for the new designs are running high.

"I have had people working nights and weekends," said Joseph Martz, the head of the Los Alamos design team. "I have to tell them to go home. I can't keep them out of the office. This is a chance to exercise skills that we have not had a chance to use for 20 years."

A thousand miles away at Livermore, Bruce Goodwin, associate director for nuclear weapons, describes a similar picture: The lab is running supercomputer simulations around the clock and teams of scientific experts working on all phases of the project "are extremely excited."

Building the new bomb, known as the reliable replacement warhead, or RRW, was approved by Congress in 2005 as part of a defense spending bill. The design work is being supervised by the National Nuclear Security Administration, which is part of the Energy Department.

The laboratories submitted detailed design proposals at the end of March that run more than a thousand pages each to the Nuclear Weapons Council, the secretive federal panel that oversees the nation's nuclear weapons. A winner will be declared later this year.

If the program is implemented, it would require an expensive remobilization of the nation's nuclear weapons complex, creating a capacity to turn out bombs at the rate of three or more a week.

Proponents of the project foresee a time when nuclear deterrence will increasingly rest on the capacity of the U.S. to build new bombs, rather than on maintaining a massive stockpile.

The proposal comes as Russia and the United States have agreed to further reduce nuclear stockpiles. The Moscow Treaty signed in 2002 by President Bush and Russian President Vladimir Putin calls for the two countries to each cut inventories to between 1,700 to 2,200 warheads by 2012.

Without the reliable replacement warhead, U.S. scientists say the nation will end up with old and potentially unreliable bombs within the next 15 years, allowing future adversaries to challenge U.S. supremacy and erode the nation's so called "strategic deterrent."

The new bomb "is one way of ensuring that our capability is second to none," said Paul Hommert, a physicist who heads X Division, the Los Alamos unit that built the first atomic bomb during World War II. "Not only today, but in 2025."

But critics say the program could plant the seeds of a new arms race.

The existing stockpile will be safe and reliable for decades to come, according to defense experts and nuclear scientists who have long supported strategic weapons. Rather than making the nation safer, the program will squander resources, broadcast the message that arms control is dead and even undermine the reliability of U.S. weapons, they say.

The new bomb would have to be built and deployed without testing. The U.S. last conducted an underground test in Nevada in 1991 and has since imposed a moratorium on new testing.

But without a single test, doubts about the new bomb's reliability will eventually grow, said Sydney Drell, former director of the Stanford Linear Accelerator and a longtime advisor to the Energy Department.

"If anybody thinks we are going to be designing new warheads and not doing testing, I don't know what they are smoking," Drell said. "I don't know of a general, an admiral, a president or anybody in responsibility who would take an untested new weapon that is different from the ones in our stockpile and rely on it without resuming testing."

If the U.S. breaks the international moratorium on testing, then Russia, China, India and Pakistan, if not Great Britain and France, would also conduct tests, said Phillip Coyle, former assistant secretary of defense and former deputy director of Livermore. All of those countries would gain more information from testing than would the U.S., which has invested heavily in scientific research as a surrogate to testing.

Richard Garwin, the physicist who helped design the first H-bomb in 1952 and remains a leading authority on nuclear weapons, opposes the new bomb and is worried it will lead to new testing. "We don't need it," he said. "No science will be able to keep these political doubts away."

Linton Brooks, chief of the National Nuclear Security Administration, disagrees, saying warheads based on modern technology and advanced electronics will be clearly more reliable.

"We are more likely to face a problem if we stick with the existing stockpile," Brooks said. "It is easy to overstate the degree to which the current stockpile (has been) tested," he adds.

The stockpile includes thousands of weapons held in reserve as a hedge in case a defect is discovered. Each year, some of those weapons are disassembled and cut apart for inspection. The U.S. could significantly reduce the reserve if it had greater confidence in the reliability of its warheads, Brooks said.

DOJ_NMG_0033372

The driving force for developing the new weapon has come from the scientific community and members of Congress. Although the Defense Department did not initiate the program, it has won wide support within the military as well as the Bush administration.

Democrats who are closely involved in nuclear weapons issues, including Rep. Ellen O. Tauscher, D-Calif., Rep. John M. Spratt, D-S.C., and Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., have also given the program support, according to their spokesmen.

Tauscher and the other lawmakers say they support the effort if it is accompanied by a reduction in the total number of U.S. nuclear weapons and if no testing is involved -- precisely the policy set up by Rep. Dave Hobson, R-Ohio, who has been a primary proponent of the program in Congress.

In the past, a wide range of proposals for new bombs fizzled politically, including the neutron bomb, the bunker-busting "mini-nuke" and the "Robust Nuclear Earth Penetrator." Each represented weapons envisioned for specific military missions, triggering fears that they might be used preemptively rather than to deter an attack.

The reliable replacement warhead has dodged such opposition, largely because it is not intended for a new military mission.

Actual production would require approval by Congress and construction of new manufacturing facilities -- all of which is at least several years off.

Meanwhile, the Los Alamos and Livermore labs are revving up their culture of one-upmanship.

During the Cold War, the scientists adhered to a motto that the Soviet Union was the rival, but the competing lab was "the enemy." Still, it is a scholarly competition with few fighting words.

"I feel we have a great design for the country," said Martz, 41, the Los Alamos program manager who began working at the lab as an 18-year-old undergraduate. "Ours is better without a doubt."

But Goodwin, 55, counters: "We have chosen a particularly effective design. I believe we have done the better job."

Brooks, the federal nuclear weapons chief, gives no hint about whose bomb he favors, saying only that both "are very good designs, very responsive to what we are trying to do."

Since the end of the Cold War, the labs' top priority has been to maintain existing weapons. The labs predict that the plutonium components in existing weapons have a life of 45 to 60 years, meaning that in the next 15 years some will begin to deteriorate and replacements will be needed.

Christopher Paine, a program critic and nuclear weapons specialist at the Natural Resources Defense Council, contends the labs have everything to gain from these kinds of assessments -- generating funds for a new program even though older weapons remain in perfect condition.

But the labs say their actions are subject to outside oversight by government agencies and independent boards. "We take the integrity of our job pretty seriously," adds Hommert, the Los Alamos division chief.

While the labs say they're still working on cost estimates, they believe the reliable replacement warhead will save money over time. They aren't providing any details.

On average, the U.S. has spent an estimated $6 million per warhead since World War II, according to Steven Schwartz, author of Atomic Audit, the authoritative history of strategic weapons costs. Based on that, replacing all of the nation's 6,000 nuclear weapons could cost $36 billion.

So far a fraction of the ultimate cost of the program has been spent -- Congress approved funding of $25 million this fiscal year.

A portion of the cost involves engineering designed to make the bombs more secure. In charge of that is Sandia National Laboratory, which has vowed to make sure terrorists could never use a stolen or lost weapon.

"We are setting the goal of absolute control -- that you always know where the weapon is and what state it is in and that you have absolute control over its state," said Joan B. Woodard, executive vice president at Sandia. "People will say you can break the bank achieving that goal, but it is the right goal to set."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Interspeed Executive Convicted Of Fraud Charges (WSJ)

By William M. Bulkeley

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

BOSTON -- Arthur Goodwin, former senior vice president for sales of the now-defunct Interspeed Inc., was convicted of eight-counts of fraud in connection with inflating the sales of the Internet equipment company.

DOJ_NMG_0033373

Mr. Goodwin, 45, was convicted by a jury in the courtroom of U.S. District Judge Richard G. Stearns. He is scheduled for sentencing on Oct. 5.

The U.S. attorney's office said that evidence in the case established that Mr. Goodwin falsely overstated sales by $9 million, which was 60% of the company's reported revenue in 1999.

The overstatement made it appear that Interspeed, North Andover, Mass., was meeting growth targets. He accomplished the overstatement by fraudulent acts including giving customers secret side-letters that allowed them to return the equipment. He also altered a key contract on what was said to be the largest sales in company history to make it acceptable to the company's finance department.

Interspeed's board of directors fired Mr. Goodwin in September 2000 after discovering his actions. Attorneys for Mr. Goodwin couldn't be reached for comment.

In 2003, William J. Burke, a former Interspeed financial executive, was sentenced to three years' probation, after pleading guilty one-count of falsification of Interspeed's books and records.

Monster Gets U.S. Subpoena In Widening Options Inquiry (WSJ)

By William M. Bulkeley

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

Monster Worldwide Inc. said it received a U.S. attorney's subpoena for information on its stock-option grants, as investigations into possible options backdating widened.

Monster, an online job-search and advertising firm based in New York, issued a series of options between 1997 and 2001 in a pattern that was favorable to executives receiving the grants, including James J. Treacy, its former president. The odds of so favorable a pattern occurring randomly are about nine million to one, according to a Wall Street Journal analysis1 published in yesterday's edition. Monster shares slid $3.40, or 8.1%, to $38.60 in 4 p.m. composite trading yesterday on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Monster, which is conducting an internal inquiry into the options, said it will cooperate with the inquiry and subpoena, issued by the U.S. attorney in Manhattan. Mr. Treacy, who no longer works for Monster, has said he didn't have anything to do with the timing of the grants, which were authorized by the board.

Two other high-tech concerns, Comverse Technology Inc. and Applied Micro Circuits Corp., announced delays in filings of financial reports due to options investigations. In addition, Applied Micro Circuits, Sunnyvale, Calif., and two other companies said they had received informal inquiries for information on the timing of stock-options grants from the Securities and Exchange Commission. The newly identified companies bring to at least 43 the number of firms that have acknowledged internal or external inquiries into their stock-option timing.

Comverse, a Woodbury, N.Y., maker of telecommunications billing systems, said it expects the Nasdaq Stock Market to warn it that its tardiness may cause it to be delisted. Comverse, which has said it is in the process of preparing restatements for five years of financial reports due to options-dating problems, yesterday fell 13%, or $3.09, to $20.48 on the Nasdaq.

Options give holders the right to buy a stock at a strike price, typically the market value on the day of the award. The options are supposed to give executives incentive to boost the company's stock price so that they will benefit along with other shareholders. But if companies choose dates before the award date when the stock was particularly low, it undermines the incentive because the executives' options are already profitable. Moreover, backdated options affect the tax and accounting treatment of the options, and if they weren't disclosed, they raise the potential for criminal fraud charges.

If firms find options were backdated, accounting rules require them to review all the years in which the grants were made for possible restatements and higher tax bills. Such accounting changes are time-consuming, explaining Comverse's delay.

Comverse said it plans to file results for its fiscal year 2006 ended Jan. 31 and its first quarter ended April 30, in addition to prior years, "as soon as practicable." The company was subpoenaed in May in connection with the issuance of stock-option grants. Its chief executive, Kobi Alexander, and two other officials subsequently resigned.

The firms that said the SEC had issued informal inquiries are Broadcom Corp., an Irvine, Calif., maker of communications chips, Applied Micro Circuits, a computer-networking hardware maker, and Equinix Inc., a Foster City, Calif., firm that provides data centers for online services.

All three were among 32 firms cited as potential options trouble spots in a study issued last month by the Center for Financial Research and Analysis, Rockville, Md. Each of the three yesterday said it started an internal investigation after the CFRA report was issued. The study looked at options grant dates for the 100 companies that issued options heavily before changes in reporting requirements in 2002 made backdating more difficult.

Applied Micro Circuits said that because its internal investigation of stock-option timing hasn't been completed, it won't be able to file its annual report with the SEC by June 14 as scheduled and expects to request a delay.

Broadcom said its internal investigation covered all its option grants since its initial public offering in 1998. Spokesman Bill Blanning said that 95% of Broadcom's options during that period were made to employees below the ranks of top executives. CFRA's report listed three dates in 2000 and 2002 when options were granted at points close to the stock's low in a 40-day period.

Equinix said that its board's audit committee is investigating its options timing. Margie Backaus, chief business officer, said that the grant noted by CFRA in 2001 came at a period when Equinix stock was at 38 cents. She said the date coincided with a major layoff and the options were designed "to retain and motivate the employees who were left." The next year, Equinix had a 1-for-32 reverse split, giving the options a exercise price of $12.16.

Funds Sue Amid Probe Into Timing Of Options (FT)

By Jeremy Grant

Financial Times, June 13, 2006

Shareholder anger over US executive compensation practices spilled into the open on Monday as two big US pension funds sued companies involved in an investigation into the timing of stock-option awards.

Darren Robbins, a partner at Lerach Coughlin, said his San Diego law firm was also representing pension funds in Europe and Australia that were preparing similar action.

“People are very upset about this. There have been at least five pension funds that have filed cases in the last 72 business hours in court houses from California to Boston,” he told the Financial Times.

McAfee, a software security maker, was sued on Monday in federal court in the Northern District of California by the Heavy & General Laborers’ Pension and Annuity Funds, alleging “constructive fraud” through the backdating of stock options.

Juniper Networks, a technology company, was hit with a similar complaint by the Employer-Teamsters Pension Health and Welfare Funds. Neither McAfee nor Juniper were immediately available for comment.

Mr Robbins said his firm had been directed to take similar action by clients “in at least 34 different situations”.

Four separate companies revealed on Monday that they were being investigated by regulators over their options grants. More than 40 companies have become ensnared in one of the widest criminal and regulatory investigations into white-collar compensation in recent years. The probe is emerging as a test of years of executive compensation practices and has started to draw the anger of unions.

The AFL-CIO said last week that the stock option backdating scandal “shares many similarities to the after-hours trading of mutual funds, where favoured insiders received preferential terms that were hidden from public investors”.

Four companies – Broadcom, Equinix, Applied Micro Circuits and Cyberonics – said they were the subject of investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Monster Worldwide, the operator of an online recruitment site, said it had formed an independent committee of directors to conduct an internal review of all stock options grants made by the company.

Investigations are focusing on the award of stock options to executives on dates that immediately preceded a sharp rise in the companies' share prices.

Such a move would immediately have put the options “in the money”, requiring proper disclosure to shareholders. Some companies have been hit with class-action lawsuits from public pension funds alleging that no such disclosure was made and that shareholders were defrauded.

The focus of investigations is in the years before 2002, when tough Sarbanes-Oxley corporate governance rules limited the scope for backdating of options.

New accounting rules requiring options expensing were introduced last year.

Efficient Markets The Welfare Of American Investors (WSJ)

By Henry G. Manne

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

Behavioral finance, a developing field of academic research that emphasizes investor irrationality (and ignorance) and the inefficiency of markets, has been hailed by defenders of the SEC as offering a solid economic rationalization for our vast scheme of federal securities regulations. Even apart from the obvious implications for the regulatory system of ignorance and irrationality on the part of regulators, a closer examination of the logic of behavioral finance leaves little for the pro-regulation crowd to crow about.

Initially, behavioral finance emerged as an academic antidote to a claim of substantial market perfection in the finance field, the well-known "efficient market" theory of stock prices. Numerous "anomalies" or irrationalities were discovered in the market for securities, such as various kinds of over- or under-reactions to new information, herding behavior, endowment effects, January effects, weekend effects, small-firm or distressed-firm effects, bubbles and crashes -- to name a few.

DOJ_NMG_0033375

Faulty Data

Most of these alleged peculiarities proved in time to be far less anomalous than was first thought. The data on which they were based were often faulty, or the econometric models were measuring the wrong thing, or various kinds of relevant transactions costs were ignored. The effects of irrational or uninformed behavior were often canceled out by opposite forces, and much of it was simply irrelevant. Furthermore, the behavioralists did not -- and do not -- have a general theory that can explain why financial markets work as well as they do. Some close approximation of the efficient market theory is still the most accurate and useful model of the stock market that we have.

Still, some of the behavioralists' criticisms stuck, especially in regard to crashes and bubbles, events that arguably should not occur in perfectly efficient markets. In this connection the efficient market theorists had no choice but to reexamine and refine their own models, which they have now done with some success. Perhaps the most important behavioralist contribution to economics has been their reminder that the market-model claim of rationality often does not comport with actual human behavior.

Economists frequently failed to qualify economic pronouncements as being limited in application to aggregate behavior. Too many assumed that if markets in the aggregate behave rationally, it must be because the "marginal" participant -- the trader who has the correct information about what a price should be -- was himself a perfectly rational maximizer. This better-informed and rational trader would always arbitrage away any discrepancies from efficiency that a market displayed.

But there is a vast difference between economics and psychology, and we can thank the behavioralists for forcing economics back into its correct posture of dealing with aggregate behavior. We can also thank the behavioralists for demonstrating that the marginal trader/arbitrage theory cannot explain all price formation, since we have no way, a priori, of knowing that this hypothetical individual will be rational. Nor can we any longer assume that the arbitrageur (apart from a purchaser of 100% of the securities of a given company) will have all the information necessary to set the correct price.

That discovery left a serious gap in economic theory. The efficient market mavens were indeed correct in their conclusions about aggregate market behavior -- but how could they explain this near perfection of functioning markets while irrational and less-than-fully informed individuals (so-called "noise" traders) were known to abound?

Traditional economics did contain the start of an answer to this question, most notably in F.A. Hayek's classic "The Use of Knowledge in Society" (1945). There, Hayek (addressing the then-pressing problem of countering socialist doctrine) made the astute observation that centralized or socialist planning can never be economically efficient because it was impossible for a central planner to accumulate all the information needed for correct economic decisions ("correct" in the sense of displaying efficient market allocations of goods). The critical information, he noted, is too scattered in bits and pieces throughout the population ever to be assembled in one person's mind (or computer). Diffused markets, on the other hand, function well because the totality of relevant information, even subjective preferences, can be aggregated through the price mechanism into a correct market valuation.

This insight of Hayek's has been a mainstay of market theory ever since it was advanced, but it remains merely an observation and a conclusion. It does not detail how new information gets so effectively impacted into the prices of goods and services. In other words, how does this "weighted averaging" get done? And why should we assume that the impact of rational participants would dominate that of irrational ones in markets?

Similarly, the efficient market theory was based almost entirely on empirical observations and did not offer a theory of how the market came to be so efficient. Subsequent literature examined the mechanisms of market efficiency (including insider trading), but these were again observational and descriptive works that did not even recognize the absence of a good theory of how new information gets properly integrated into a price. The implicit and often explicit theory of price formation was always the "arbitrage" notion, with the marginal trader calling the shots.

Enter now financial journalist James Suroweicki and his charming and insightful book, "The Wisdom of Crowds" (2004). The book opens with the story of a contest at a county fair in England in 1906 to guess the weight of an ox on display after slaughter and dressing. There were about 800 guesses entered in the contest both by knowledgeable people and by those who had no expertise in such matters. We are not told what the winning guess was, but we are told that the average of all the guesses (1,197 pounds) was virtually identical to the actual weight (1,198 pounds).

Similar results show up regularly in the relatively new use of so-called "prediction" or "virtual" markets, primarily employed today in predicting outcomes of political elections, sporting events, new product introductions or new movies. Though there are still some problems with the technique, these "markets" have proved in the main to be much more accurate than traditional interview polls. And these various illustrations of the wisdom of crowds suggest a solution to the problem of how correct prices are formed in financial markets beset by irrational and poorly informed traders. * * *

DOJ_NMG_0033376

Weighted-average results are similar to "correct prices," since informed investors can be assumed to invest more money if their confidence in the validity of their information -- or the intensity of their desire for the product -- is higher, thus imparting a weighted average element to each price. And while the actual weight of an ox is a more objective measure than the "correct" price of a security, the main difference may be between a static and a dynamic figure with the "correct price" of a stock being a kind of moving target.

The literature on prediction markets makes clear that the more participants in a contest and the better informed they are, the more likely is the weighted average of their guesses to be the correct one. That is true, ironically, even though the additional participants have even less knowledge than the earlier ones. The only requirements for these markets to work well are that the various traders be diverse and that their judgments be independent of one another. Clearly, there is still a lot more work of a statistical and mathematical nature to be done before the idea of the wisdom of crowds is turned into a full-fledged theory of price formation, but at least we have identified the problem and made a start towards a solution.

'Wisdom of Crowds'

The implications of what we already know of this "wisdom of crowds" approach to price formation, as against the traditional marginal pricing/arbitrage approach, are apt to be startling. We should rethink any current policies based on a view of pricing in which we exclude the best-informed traders and discard the wisdom of the many. For instance, we now have a new and more powerful argument than we had in the past for legalizing most insider or informed trading.

Since such trading clearly makes the market process work more efficiently, it aids capital allocation decisions and informs business executives through market-price feedback of the best predictions about the value of new plans. Furthermore, the Supreme Court's "fraud on the market" theory of civil liability under the federal securities laws and Congress's ideas of correct civil damage claims for insider trading no longer have any intellectual merit. The same is true of any other part of our securities laws implicitly based on the notion of the marginal trader as a rational arbitrageur of price.

The new approach would suggest that it is undesirable to have laws discouraging stock trading by anyone who has any knowledge relevant to the valuation of a security. Thus, assembly-line workers, administrative assistants, office boys, accountants, lawyers, salespeople, competitors, financial analysts and, of course, corporate executives (government officials are another story) should all be encouraged to buy or sell stocks based on any new information they might have. Only those privately enjoined by contract or other legal duty from trading should be excluded. The "wisdom of crowds" can do far more for the welfare of American investors than all the mandated disclosures and insider trading laws that the SEC and Congress can think up.

Mr. Manne, a resident of Naples, Fla., is dean emeritus of George Mason University School of Law. This is the first of a two-part series.

Outside Audit Big Pension Plans Are At Risk Of Losing Accounting Benefit (WSJ)

By Steven D. Jones

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

The balances of public-company pension plans had been improving until the stock market swooned again. Congressional action could deal many of these funds another setback.

The House and Senate both have passed versions of a bill that could limit the use of a key pension-accounting benefit. The legislation would affect dozens of companies in the automotive, aerospace and basic-materials industries.

At issue are credit balances, which companies accumulate by putting more money into a plan than required in a given year to meet obligations to retirees.

Stashing extra money sounds like the very model of corporate responsibility. But the accounting associated with this practice can create big problems: Pension-plan administrators are allowed to use an assumed rate of interest -- a rate that may differ from the actual return. Securities filings show that a number of companies are assuming rates of return on their credit balances that are well above what is currently available in stocks and bonds.

The upshot is that a pension plan can technically be considered flush when it is in shortfall.

For example, UAL Corp., operator of United Airlines, relied on credit balances from 1996 to 2004 to meet its annual contributions to a pilots' pension. When the airline slid into bankruptcy, however, it turned out that the program was really underfunded by $3 billion.

The debate about credit balances is separate from the larger brouhaha over the assumptions that companies make about their overall pensions and the impact on earnings. For years, companies have been able to use estimates when calculating the returns on the overall plans. Many have used historical rates of return of about 10% even in years when the stock market was falling. That has often resulted in "overfunded" pensions that in turn allowed companies to lower their annual pension expense and thus increase net income.

DOJ_NMG_0033377

President Bush and other critics of pension accounting see the rules for credit balances as a growing threat, and some limits on their use seem certain to be in a final bill that could emerge from a conference committee before Congress's July 4 recess, according to leaders of both houses.

"Companies that built large credit balances can grow and sustain them at an assumed interest rate chosen by the plan actuary, regardless of how the plan assets have performed," says Greg Kelly, a government-affairs analyst at Susquehanna Financial in Bala Cynwyd, Pa. "We believe Congress is going to limit their use."

Mr. Kelly says Congress is considering compelling companies to contribute to their pensions whenever they fall below 80% funded, at which point they would face strict limits on use of credit balances in their funding calculations.

Credit balances reside inside the pension plan itself, not on the company balance sheet, so the balances are often invisible to investors. The only place companies regularly disclose the amount of credit balances is on pension-plan filings made with the Internal Revenue Service.

Big companies continue to rely on credit balances. General Motors Corp. won't make a cash contribution to the pension plan for its U.S. hourly workers this year, drawing instead on its credit balance of more than $50 billion. GM says its domestic pension plans are well-funded, but that isn't the case for every company that relies on credit balances. * * *

BIG BOARD GORED: Shares of U.S. stock-exchange operators took a beating yesterday, leading some investors and strategists to wonder if NYSE Group Inc.'s mostly share-based deal to merge with Euronext NV will need to be sweetened.

Shares in NYSE Group, the owner of the New York Stock Exchange, fell $4.53 or 7.9%, to $52.62, a 4½-month low that takes the Big Board operator's ticker below where it was when the exchange merged with Archipelago Holdings Inc. to become a public company.

Other exchange stocks also fell, but the plunge in NYSE Group's stock has implications for what would be a historic merger to create the first trans-Atlantic stock exchange. Euronext operates equity exchanges in European cities and a bustling derivatives marketplace in London.

When the deal was unveiled June 2, the NYSE's rising stock implied a slight premium to Euronext's market value at the time.

Big Board shares are off 18% since then, while Euronext shares have shed only 2% over the same period, implying a price for Euronext about €4 ($5.05) share below the company's current value.

The NYSE's stock is suffering with the broader U.S. market, but stocks of merger partners typically move in tandem when investors are certain a deal is likely to be completed.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Gang Activity Cited For Jump In U.S. Homicides (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — The nation's violent-crime rate increased in 2005 for the first time in five years, the FBI said Monday in a report that reflected in part what crime analysts say is a resurgence in gang activity, particularly in the Midwest.

READ THE REPORT: Full data on spike

Of the four crime categories that make up the FBI's violent-crime index — murder, rape, robbery and aggravated assault — only rape declined in the national figures.

In some cities, the increase in violence has led to crime rates that are in line with those posted in the years before the historically low rates that began in the mid-1990s.

The reported jump in homicides — nearly 5% nationwide — was the largest annual increase in the past 15 years. Some of the biggest increases were in Milwaukee, Oklahoma City, Omaha, St. Louis and other Midwestern cities.

Oklahoma City police cited fighting among rival gangs as a major factor in the jump in homicides there, from 39 in 2004 to 54 last year. As a result, police Sgt. Paco Balderrama says, the department is beefing up its anti-gang units: "We're working gangs every night."

Gangs from the East and West coasts "are branching out to smaller cities, where there is still money to be made and turf to be ruled," says James Alan Fox, criminal justice professor at Northeastern University in Boston.

In Omaha, homicides jumped from 20 in 2004 to 31 in 2005. Police Chief Thomas Warren said the city averaged 30-32 homicides a year before a low point in 2004. Despite the rise in homicides, the city recorded an overall decline in violent crime in 2005, a development Warren attributes to the city's aggressive stance against the "ongoing and persistent problem" with criminal gangs.

DOJ_NMG_0033378

The FBI report also is renewing the debate over whether the U.S. government's dropping of an ambitious police-hiring program — along with many law enforcement agencies' new emphasis on preventing terrorism — have made crime prevention more difficult.

"This should be a loud wake-up call for the country to get back to doing what worked in the 1990s," Fox says. "When you look back at the 1990s, we were expanding police forces and pouring more money into after-school programs. Now, we're seeing just the reverse."

Fox was referring in part to the Bush administration's phasing out of a Clinton-era program aimed at putting 100,000 new cops on U.S. streets. Police chiefs nationwide have called for renewing the program to offset local cutbacks.

Despite the popularity of the Community Oriented Policing Services program among police and crime analysts, a USA TODAY review of the program last year found little evidence that it was a big factor in reducing crime.

Justice Department officials cautioned against reading too much into the FBI report. "The crime rate is so low in some communities that relatively modest increases can result in what appear to be fairly stark increases," says Richard Hertling, deputy assistant attorney general for the Office of Legal Policy.

Violent Crime Rises In U.S. (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

Violent crime in 2005 increased at the highest rate in 15 years, driven in large part by a surge of killings and other attacks in many Midwestern cities, the FBI reported yesterday.

The FBI's preliminary annual crime report showed an overall jump of 2.5 percent for violent offenses, including increases in homicide, robbery and assault. It was the first rise of any note since 2001, and rape was the only category in which the number of crimes declined.

In the District, a 14.6 percent jump in the number of robberies caused a 5 percent rise in overall violent crime, more than offsetting a drop in the number of homicides, rapes and assaults. The decrease was particularly dramatic for rapes, which were down 24 percent.

In Baltimore, violent crime dropped about 3.6 percent overall, with decreases in all categories. The city of Alexandria reported a 22 percent increase in violent crime, although the total number of offenses -- 462 -- remained small. The FBI's preliminary report does not include breakdowns for many large suburban jurisdictions, such as Fairfax, Montgomery and Prince George's counties.

The rise in violent offenses nationally represents the largest overall crime increase since 1991. Violent crime peaked in 1992, before beginning to plummet to its lowest levels in three decades.

Overall property crime -- including burglary, theft and arson -- decreased 1.6 percent from 2004.

Criminal justice experts said there were a number of possible explanations for the increase, including an influx of gangs into medium-size cities and a predicted surge in the number of inmates released from U.S. prisons. The jump could also represent a lingering effect of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, some experts said, because governments at all levels have diverted resources away from traditional crime fighting in favor of anti-terrorism and homeland security programs.

"One possibility for the rise overall that we will want to watch is whether the shifting of law enforcement priorities to various kinds of homeland security duties accounts for any of this," said David A. Harris, a University of Toledo law professor who studies homeland security and criminal justice issues.

James Alan Fox, a criminal justice professor at Northeastern University in Boston, said the increase should serve as a "wake-up call in Washington." Lawmakers and the Bush administration have cut back many law enforcement programs popular during the 1990s.

"We have to worry about not just homeland security but also hometown security," Fox said. "High-crime areas have been relatively ignored over the last five years so we can deploy officers to fight terrorism."

Justice Department officials in Washington urged caution in interpreting crime statistics from a single year and noted that the crime rate -- measured on a per-capita basis and not reflected in yesterday's FBI report -- is still low by historical standards.

Richard A. Hertling, a principal deputy assistant attorney general, said the FBI statistics are "a yellow flag" but do not represent a trend, in part because the numbers are preliminary and do not include full reports from all jurisdictions.

"We don't think these numbers are terribly useful for helping to figure out what is happening on a national level," Hertling said. "That being said, they can be very useful for individual communities to see what their record is and what needs attention."

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and other Justice officials have frequently cited record-low crime rates as evidence of success. Gonzales also has unveiled programs focused on combating gangs and gun crime in many urban areas.

DOJ_NMG_0033379

The FBI statistics are taken from reports submitted by more than 12,000 police departments and other law enforcement agencies nationwide. A final report, including more detailed statistics and reports from a larger number of police agencies, will be issued in the fall. Government officials and criminal justice experts said trends in the FBI's final reports usually do not differ widely from conclusions in the preliminary studies.

Cities with more than 1 million residents were the only FBI population category to show a decline in violent crime, though some individual large cities -- such as Phoenix and Houston -- posted increases. Crime reports fell again in New York.

The trend was different for smaller to medium-size cities, which experienced marked increases in most categories of violent crime.

Among violent crimes, the biggest rise in 2005 came in the number of homicides, which leapt 4.8 percent, to nearly 17,000. Some of the hardest-hit cities included Milwaukee (up 40 percent), Cleveland (38 percent), Houston (23 percent) and Phoenix (9 percent).

On a regional basis, the increase disproportionately hit the Midwest. Total violent crime reports there surged 5.7 percent -- at least three times the rate in the Northeast, South or West.

The District's 5 percent increase in violent crime was due to a jump in the number of reported robberies, which rose from 3,057 in 2004 to 3,502 in 2005.

D.C. Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey said the upward trend for robberies appears to be continuing in 2006, particularly among juveniles. Street officers say that more juveniles are holding up people and that they are more often using guns, Ramsey said.

"Four out of every 10 people arrested for robbery this year have been juveniles," Ramsey said. "That's a heck a lot of it right there, that juvenile crime is up."

In Baltimore, reports of violent crime dropped from 2004 by about 3.6 percent, to 11,248 incidents. That nearly returned the city to its 2003 level of 11,183.

Baltimore Police Commissioner Leonard Hamm said he is cautiously pleased with the drop in crime in the city, which has a reputation for violent, drug-filled street corners in some neighborhoods. "We're not having a party yet," Hamm said. "We still have a lot of work to do."

Violent Crime Up For 1st Time In 5 Years (WP)

By Mark Sherman

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Murders, robberies and aggravated assaults in the United States increased last year, spurring an overall rise in violent crime for the first time since 2001, according to FBI data.

Murders rose 4.8 percent, meaning there were more than 16,900 victims in 2005. That would be the most since 1998 and the largest percentage increase in 15 years.

Murders jumped from 272 to 334 in Houston, a 23 percent spike; from 330 to 377 in Philadelphia, a 14 percent rise; and from 131 to 144 in Las Vegas, a 10 percent increase.

Despite the national numbers, Detroit, Los Angeles and New York were among several large cities that saw the number of murders drop.

The overall increase in violent crime was modest, 2.5 percent, which equates to more than 1.4 million crimes. Nevertheless, that was the largest percentage increase since 1991.

The FBI data, compiled from reports by more than 12,000 law enforcement agencies, does not contain overall crime numbers in any category nor does it offer any explanation for the changes. The FBI's final annual crime report comes out in the fall.

Criminal justice experts said the statistics reflect the nation's complacency in fighting crime, a product of dramatic declines in the 1990s and the abandonment of effective programs that emphasized prevention, putting more police officers on the street and controlling the spread of guns.

"We see that budgets for policing are being slashed and the federal government has gotten out of that business," said James Alan Fox, a criminal justice professor at Northeastern University in Boston. "Funding for prevention at the federal level and many localities are down and the (National Rifle Association) has renewed strength."

Still, Fox said, "We're still far better off than we were during the double-digit crime inflation we saw in the 1970s."

Robberies were up 4.5 percent and aggravated assaults 1.9 percent, according to preliminary data. Alone among violent crime categories, the number of rapes fell 1.9 percent.

Violent crimes peaked at 1.9 million in 1992 and fell steadily through the end of that decade. The number has been relatively stable for the past six years.

DOJ_NMG_0033380

Crime last year increased in all regions, although the 5.7 percent rise in the Midwest was at least three times any other region's. These states make up the Midwest: Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, Ohio, South Dakota and Wisconsin.

Fox cautioned against reading too much into year-to-year changes in individual cities, saying some differences result from random variation and marked swings the previous year. Also, some large statistical increases result from some small numerical changes.

In Hartford, Conn. for example, murders jumped more than 50 percent, from 16 to 25.

___

On the Net:

FBI: http://www.fbi.gov/

Violent Crime Rose In '05, With Murders Up By 4.8% (NYT)

By Maria Newman

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

Violent crime increased in the United States for the first time in four years, up 2.5 percent in 2005 from the year before, with the biggest increases in murder coming in medium-size cities and in the Midwest.

A preliminary 2005 crime report issued yesterday by the Federal Bureau of Investigation shows that the total number of murders in the country went up 4.8 percent from the year before. St. Louis, Houston, Philadelphia and Milwaukee saw an increase in murders, while other cities including New York, Los Angeles and Miami saw a drop.

Among violent crimes, the only decrease was in rapes, which fell 1.9 percent. Robberies increased over all by 4.5 percent.

Cities with populations of more than 500,000 had the biggest rise in violent crime, 8.3 percent. In the Midwest, violent crimes increased by 5.7 percent.

The data are considered preliminary until the final statistics are released in October.

The increases in violent crime over all come after years of crime reduction efforts all over the country in the 1990's that are credited with lowering crime rates almost everywhere, especially in the larger urban areas. Law enforcement officials and other experts on crime cautioned that this latest report did not necessarily mean crime would start to run rampant again.

James Alan Fox, a professor of criminal justice at Northeastern University, said that after the sharp decreases during the 1990's, the crime rate over all from 2000 to 2004 was "essentially flat."

"We squeezed all the air out of the balloon after having seven good years of crime decline," Mr. Fox said. "That ended when the 1990's ended. Now the challenge isn't so much to make the crime rate go down more, because that's not necessarily realistic, but the challenge is to make sure that the small blip doesn't become a big one."

Mr. Fox pointed out that some of the cities where murders rose in 2005 had seen small fluctuations in recent years.

Houston, for example, which reported 334 murders in 2005, had 272 in 2004 and 278 the year before.

In Memphis, there were 136 murders in 2005, 107 in 2004 and 126 in 2003.

"I don't think we'd be too obsessed with the day-to-day changes in the stock market," Mr. Fox said.

The 2005 figures are not necessarily the beginning of a trend upward for everyone, he said, but "the potential does exist."

The annual F.B.I. report is drawn from numbers gathered by state and local law enforcement agencies. They measure four violent offenses (murder, rape, robbery and aggravated assault) and four property crimes (burglary, larceny, auto theft and arson). The report does not measure drug crimes.

The report showed that cities with populations of 100,000 to 249,999 had the greatest increase in murders, up 12.5 percent. Cities with 500,000 to 999,999 inhabitants had the greatest increases in both robbery, 9.9 percent, and aggravated assault, 8.5 percent. The number of rapes fell in all city population groups except in those cities with fewer than 10,000 residents; there, the number of rapes was up 1.5 percent from the 2004 level.

Alfred Blumstein, a criminologist at Carnegie Mellon University in Pittsburgh, said an increase in crime in the last couple of years in some places could be a result of police efforts' being diverted to fighting terrorism, budget cuts that have reduced social services and prisons, and fewer job opportunities for young people in poorer communities.

"I want to be careful to not overstate a one-year trend as the start of something much bigger, because it could well go in the other direction next year," Mr. Blumstein said. "In places that had a good rise in crime, the chances are good that they could see a good fall next year as they pay more attention to the issue."

Murder Rate Up In Small US Cities (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, June 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033381

Small cities in the US saw a surge in murders last year, contributing to the first overall increase in violent crime in the US since 2001, according to preliminary data released by the Federal Bureau of Investigation on Monday.

While the largest cities in the US – including New York and Los Angeles – saw an overall decline of 0.4 per cent in violent crime in 2005 and a 0.5 per cent increase in murder, cities with populations of between 50,000 and 250,000 saw a more than 12 per cent jump in the number of murders. Violent crime in cities with populations ranging from 500,000 to 1m increased 8.3 per cent.

"Smaller cities are getting substantially more dangerous – that is very significant. What we are seeing in smaller jurisdictions across the country is that they are now dealing with the drug market, gangs and street violence issues that you used to only see in big cities," said David Kennedy, director of the centre for crime prevention and control at John Jay College of Criminal Justice in Manhattan.

Justice Department officials on Monday said it was too soon to attribute the increases to a wider trend in violent crime and that it was too early to determine the cause of the spikes, although they acknowledged that the migration of gang activity from large to smaller cities was a possibility. The figures could also reflect the impact former prison inmates have on crime rates when they return to their communities, officials said.

Richard Hertling, deputy assistant attorney-general for legal policy, said it was unclear whether a 23 per cent increase in the number of murders that was reported in Houston, Texas, was linked to the influx of people into the city after Hurricane Katrina, when the city opened its doors to victims of the natural disaster, or whether the increase was something that "played out" over the course of the year.

Officials at the Justice Department warned against taking the figures out of context. A steady decline in violent crime over the past 15 years due to tough law enforcement meant that any increase would appear to be "fairly stark".

U.S. Violent Crime Rises At Pace Unseen In 10 Years (NPR)

By Laura Sullivan

NPR's All Things Considered, June 13, 2006

Preliminary figures for 2005 indicate a 2.5 percent increase in the number of violent crimes compared with 2004. Click to see previous years' figures.

The nation's four regions all saw increases in violent crime in 2005. The Midwest experienced the steepest jump, 5.7 percent.

All Things Considered, June 12, 2006 · Violent crime across the nation is up. For the first time since 2001, there are more murders, rapes and assaults, according to the FBI.

But violent crime didn't just rise last year. According to the numbers, it jumped 2.5 percent. That's the biggest increase since 1991, when the country was battling gangs and the crack epidemic.

According to the report, cities with less than a quarter-million people had the largest increases -- homicides alone were up 12 percent last year.

Criminologist speculate that there are several reasons for the rise in violent crime: cutbacks in federal law enforcement grants, a focus on terrorism, a nationwide resurgence in gang activity and signs of increasing youth violence as children born in the 1990s become teenagers.

Justice Department officials say crime-fighting has been a priority of the Bush administration for the past six years and point to millions of dollars the Justice Department has spent on anti-gang initiatives and community programs such as Project Safe Neighborhoods.

The report wasn't all bad. Some of the nation's largest cities, including Los Angeles and New York, continue to show a drop in violent crime. The complete report will be released this fall.

Crime Drops In L.A., Rises Nationally (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Violent crime, on the downswing for three years, skipped back up by 2.5% nationally last year but declined in most categories in Los Angeles, the FBI reported today.

Los Angeles had fewer murders, forcible rapes and robberies in 2005 than 2004, the FBI said. But because figures in 2005 for the fourth category of violent crime — aggravated assault — were not yet available, the FBI could not be sure that violent crime as a whole declined.

DOJ_NMG_0033382

Among other Southern California cities with more than 100,000 people, violent crime also fell in Burbank, Downey, El Monte, Fontana, Fullerton, Long Beach, Moreno Valley, Norwalk, Oceanside, Ontario, Orange, Rialto, San Bernardino, San Diego, Santa Ana, Simi Valley, South Gate and West Covina.

But it rose in Anaheim, Chula Vista, Corona, Costa Mesa, Escondido, Garden Grove. Glendale, Huntington Beach, Inglewood, Irvine, Lancaster, Oxnard, Palmdale, Pasadena, Pomona, Rancho Cucamonga, Riverside, Santa Clarita, Thousand Oaks, Torrance and Ventura.

Although violent crime rose nationally in 2005, crime against property fell by 1.6%, the third consecutive year of declines in this category. In Los Angeles, crime against property fell by 6.3%.

Among categories of violent crime, Los Angeles registered declines in murders (from 518 in 2004 to 489 last year), forcible rapes (1,131 to 1,105) and robberies (14,181 to 13,797).

Only New York, with 539, registered more murders. In the category of robberies, Los Angeles trailed both New York and Chicago.

In property crimes, Houston crept ahead of Los Angeles last year, leaving Los Angeles fourth behind also New York and Chicago. The FBI counted 117,285 cases of property crime in Los Angeles in 2005, down from 125,200 in 2004.

But the FBI figures showed Los Angeles to be the arson capital of the United States. Its 2,229 reported cases of arson, up from 1,926 in 2004, led the nation, although the FBI did not have complete figures for New York for either 2004 or 2005.

Violent Crime Increases In U.S. (WT)

By Jerry Seper And Matt Cella

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

Violent crime in the United States increased last year for the first time in five years, led by murders with 16,900 victims or more than 46 a day -- the most since 1998 and the largest percentage increase in reported homicides in 15 years, says the FBI.

The FBI's Preliminary Annual Uniform Crime Report for 2005, released yesterday, said the number of murders and non-negligent manslaughters rose by 4.8 percent, while robberies increased by 4.5 percent and aggravated assaults were up 1.9 percent.

The number of murders dropped in Washington from 198 in 2004 to 195 last year, in Baltimore from 276 to 269 and in Richmond from 93 to 84, but rose in Alexandria from 2 to 3.

Among the nation's largest cities -- those with populations greater than 1 million -- Atlanta, Dallas, Denver, Detroit, Los Angeles and New York were among those that experienced declines in number of murders.

New York, with 8.1 million residents, ranked last among the nation's 10 largest cities with 2,680 crimes committed per 100,000 residents. Dallas, with a population of 1.21 million, ranked as the most dangerous, with 8,496 crimes per 100,000 residents.

According to the FBI report, forcible rape was the only offense among the four violent crimes -- murder, rape, robbery and assault -- that decreased in volume in 2005, down 1.9 percent from 2004. The report said the overall number of violent-crime offenses rose 2.5 percent.

The report also said the number of reported property crime decreased by 1.6 percent over 2004, including incidences of burglary, larceny-theft and motor vehicle theft. For 2005, it said, the number of larceny-theft offenses was down 2.5 percent, and motor-vehicle thefts showed no significant change from the previous year. But the number of reported incidents of burglary rose by 0.6 percent, the report said.

The FBI based the report on numbers collected by 12,485 law-enforcement agencies nationwide.

According to the report:

· All city population groups experienced increases in violent crime when compared with data reported for the previous year, with the exception of the nation's largest cities with more than 1 million in population, where the number of violent crimes was down 0.4 percent.

·Cities with populations from 500,000 to 999,999 saw the greatest increase in violent crime, a rise of 8.3 percent. Cities with populations of 10,000 to 24,999 saw the smallest increase at 0.5 percent.

·In the nation's metropolitan counties, violent crime was up 2.1 percent, and in nonmetropolitan counties, it increased by 1 percent.

According to the FBI report, the nation's four regions all saw increases in violent crime in 2005. The Midwest experienced the steepest increase at 5.7 percent; the West climbed 1.9 percent over 2004; the South by 1.8 percent; and the Northeast by 1.4 percent. The report said all four regions had increases in murder, robbery and aggravated assault, and contrary to the other three violent-crime offenses, the number of forcible rapes declined in each region.

DOJ_NMG_0033383

FBI: Violent Crime Up Last Year In U.S. (UPI/UPI)

United Press International, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 12 (UPI) -- The number of violent crimes reported in the United States rose 2.5 percent last year with the number of homicides up almost 5 percent.

Almost 17,000 homicides were reported, the FBI said. The number of property crimes dropped 1.6 percent.

Violent crime dipped slightly in the largest cities, those with a population of 1 million or more, the FBI said in its Preliminary Annual Uniform Crime Report for 2005. There were increases in all other categories of cities with the biggest, 8.3 percent, in those with a population between 500,000 and 999,999.

Violent crime dropped sharply in the late 1990s and had remained flat since 2001. One expert suggested that the increase last year could be partly the result of the long sentences that became common in the 1980s as well as a consequence of demographic shifts.

"There is an 'echo boom,' with an increasing number of late adolescents, particularly blacks and Latinos," James Fox, a criminal justice expert at Northeastern University, told CNN. "Also, more people incarcerated in the '80s are now being released to their neighborhoods, and some are back to their old ways and old gangs."

FBI: Violent Crime Up In Majority Of NJ's Biggest Cities (NSDY/AP)

By Donna De La Cruz, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Murders, rapes, robberies and other violent crimes measured by the FBI rose in the majority of New Jersey's six largest cities in 2005, according to FBI statistics released Monday.

The FBI measures statistics in cities with a population of 100,000 or more.

Jersey City saw increases in all of its violent crime indexes, except for forcible rape. The murder rate increased 65.2 percent with 38 murders in 2005 compared with 23 in 2004.

Beside Jersey City, the cities whose statistics were released were Newark, Paterson, Woodbridge Township, Edison Township and Elizabeth. The violent crimes measured were murder, forcible rape, robbery, aggravated assault, property crime, burglary, larceny theft, motor vehicle theft and arson.

Of the six cities, Jersey City's statistics were the worst, Woodbridge's the best.

Newark, the state's largest city, saw its overall violent crime index decline, with decreases in robberies, property crimes, burglaries, larceny thefts and motor vehicle thefts. But the murder rate increased 15.5 percent with 97 murders in 2005, compared to 84 in 2004, and forcible rapes were up 13.7 percent.

The FBI data, compiled from reports by more than 12,000 law enforcement agencies, does not contain overall crime numbers in any category nor does it offer any explanation for the changes. The FBI's final annual crime report comes out in the fall.

Criminal justice experts said the statistics reflect the nation's complacency in fighting crime, a product of dramatic declines in the 1990s and the abandonment of effective programs that emphasized prevention, putting more police officers on the street and controlling the spread of guns.

In New Jersey, Michael Wagers, executive director of the Police Institute at Rutgers-Newark, attributed the bulk of violence to the availability of guns.

"Nine out of 10 homicides in Newark were committed with a gun, compared with the national average of 6 or 7 homicides," Wagers said. "It's alarming to see a number of cities in New Jersey see an uptick in violent crime."

Overall violent crime increased in Paterson, Edison and Elizabeth. Paterson and Elizabeth also saw their murder rates and forcible rapes increase.

Edison had no murders in 2005, compared to two in 2004. The city also saw a decline in its forcible rapes _ 6 in 2005 and 7 in 2004. But an increase in robberies, aggravated assaults, burglaries and arsons increased the city's overall violent crimes total.

Woodbridge had the best statistics with its overall violent crime totals down. The city had two murders last year compared with four in 2004, and decreased property crimes, aggravated assaults, burglaries and arsons. But forcible rapes and robberies were way up _ the city saw a 70 percent increase in rapes with 17 in 2005 compared to 10 in 2004, and a 40 percent increase in robberies with 81 in 2005, compared to 58 in 2004.

Violent Crime Rises In U.S., But S. Florida Fares Better (MH)

By Michael Vasquez And Wanda J. Demarzo

The Miami Herald, June 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033384

The number of murders, robberies and aggravated assaults rose nationally in 2005 -- triggering the first overall jump in U.S. violent crime since 2001, according to preliminary annual crime statistics released by the FBI on Monday.

But FBI data for South Florida's biggest cities told a different story: In six out of eight cities, violent crime was down.

In the city of Miami, for example, the number of murders dropped from 69 to 54 (nearly 22 percent) from 2004 to 2005, even as they increased nationally by 4.8 percent -- the largest jump in 15 years.

"We've obviously been very aggressive," Miami Police Chief John Timoney said. ``The whole idea of crime and quality of life has been our number one priority here."

Regarding the higher crime figures in other parts of the country, Timoney called it "cause for concern" but urged caution in analyzing the data.

"There's never any one answer to these things, and you shouldn't base conclusions on one year or two," Timoney said.

Criminal justice experts said the statistics reflect the nation's complacency in fighting crime, a product of dramatic declines in the 1990s and the abandonment of effective programs that emphasized prevention, putting more police officers on the street and controlling the spread of guns.

"We see that budgets for policing are being slashed and the federal government has gotten out of that business," said James Alan Fox, a criminal justice professor at Northeastern University in Boston. ``Funding for prevention at the federal level and many localities are down and the [National Rifle Association] has renewed strength."

Still, Fox said, ``We're still far better off than we were during the double-digit crime inflation we saw in the 1970s."

Hialeah Police Chief Rolando Bolaños said his department is anything but complacent, and in fact earlier this year launched a 13-member Community Response Team to target high-crime areas. Hialeah's crime numbers were mostly down for 2005, but Bolaños said good police work didn't deserve all the credit -- South Florida has some other advantages.

"To a great extent crime is a function of economics," Bolaños said. ``South Florida, in comparison to other regions of the country, we are doing far better economically."

But 2005 wasn't all good news for local police departments. Fort Lauderdale's violent crime totals inched up about 3 percent, to 1,470. Miramar's went up nearly 5 percent, and that southwest Broward city had three murders in 2005 -- up from two the year before.

After one murder in 2004, Pembroke Pines recorded six in 2005. But three of those homicides occurred during one incident, according to Pembroke Pines spokesman Cmdr. Dave Golt.

On Jan. 30, 2005, Golt said, Adolph Jones, 58, attempted suicide within a day of killing his wife and two stepdaughters. Jones, who was charged with the three homicides, has not been tried for the killings after a Broward Circuit Judge ruled him incompetent to stand trial.

"We did see a slight increase in burglaries and larcenies, thefts, but oddly the number of car thefts we saw bucked the national trend and we were actually lower in 2005 than in the previous year," Golt said.

Miami-Dade police, meanwhile, have coped with a string of homicides in unincorporated parts of the county during the first half of 2006, some apparently gang-related. Up-to-date homicide numbers from the Miami-Dade County police force were not immediately available Monday.

The FBI's preliminary report listed cities larger than 100,000 in population but did not provide county-by-county breakdowns.

It was based on data provided by local law enforcement agencies.

This report was supplemented with material from The Associated Press.

Rapes Increase In Dayton, FBI Report Says (DDN)

By Kelli Wynn, Staff Writer

Dayton Daily News, June 13, 2006

City bucks national trend with decrease in other types of violent crimes.

DAYTON — All violent crimes in the city fell last year except rape, according to the FBI's 2005 preliminary Annual Uniform Crime Report.

Rapes in Dayton increased to 140 in 2005 from 127 in 2004, according to the report, which focused on cities with populations of 100,000 or more.

"As far as having somebody walking down the street being abducted, thrown in the bushes and raped, that's not what is driving these statistics," said Dayton Police Lt. John Huber. In most of the city's rapes, the victims know their attackers, he said.

Huber said when police turned in their information to the state they reported 33 homicides in 2004 and 32 homicides in 2005, but the FBI listed 32 for both years.

DOJ_NMG_0033385

Huber said he didn't know how the mistake occurred. No one at the FBI national press office could be reached for comment.

Nationally, homicides increased 4.8 percent, robberies increased 4.5 percent and aggravated assaults increased 1.9 percent. Rape was the only offense that decreased in 2005, down 1.9 percent from 2004, the FBI said.

The Midwest experienced a 5.7 percent increase in violent crimes, compared with 1.9 percent in the West, 1.8 percent in the South, and 1.4 percent in the Northeast.

Indy Crime Rate Mirrors Midwest Increases (WRTV-TV)

WRTV-TV, June 13, 2006

INDIANAPOLIS -- Murders, robberies and aggravated assaults in the United States increased last year, leading to an overall rise in violent crime for the first time since 2001, according to figures released by the FBI on Monday.

In Indianapolis, there were 7,948 violent crimes reported in 2005, up almost 900 from 2004.

The number of murders in Indy actually declined slightly, from 109 murders in 2004 to 108 in 2005, but other crimes were up substantially.

Here's a year-to-year breakdown of other crimes:

The number of reported rapes climbed from 479 in 2004 to 527 in 2005.

The number of reported robberies jumped from 2,763 in 2004 to 3,274 in 2005.

Aggravated assault reports increased from 3,716 in 2004 to 4,039 in 2005.

Reported property crimes increased by more than 3,000, from 46,998 to 50,081 from 2004 to 2005.

Burglaries climbed from 10,920 in 2004 to 11,548 in 2005.

Larceny and theft reports jumped from 28,364 in 2004 to 29,541 in 2005.

Reported motor-vehicle thefts increased significantly from 7,714 in 2004 to 8,992 in 2005.

The number of arsons declined from 441 in 2004 to 374 in 2005.

Indianapolis' crime trend climb mirrors that of other Midwest communities.

The nation's four regions all saw increases in violent crime in 2005. The Midwest experienced the steepest increase, 5.7 percent.

However Tallied, Minneapolis Crime Is Up (MINNST)

By Greg Gordon, David Chanen And Howie Padilla, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, June 13, 2006

Police data show violent crime rose 15 percent last year, but it still doesn't approach the levels of the mid-1990s.

The FBI released data Monday indicating that violent crime surged 35.5 percent in Minneapolis last year, but the city's Police Department said a computer glitch grossly exaggerated what was actually a 15 percent jump from 2004.

A 15 percent increase is still six times the 2.5 percent national rise in murders, rapes, robberies and aggravated assaults in 2005, figures disclosed in preliminary data from the FBI's Uniform Crime Report. Still, the volume of violent crime in Minneapolis is about 30 percent below levels in the mid-1990s, when the number of annual murders nearly hit triple digits.

The nationwide increase in violent crime reversed a five-year downward trend, but these crimes are more than 25 percent below the numbers reported in 1992, the start of a years-long decline.

On the downside, violent crime in Minneapolis has increased in every year since 2001. And the data come as the city has grappled with two high-profile homicides in the Downtown and Uptown areas, spreading anxiety among some residents and leaders.

Alfred Blumstein, a Carnegie Mellon University professor who specializes in criminology, said the data "raise a concern about whether we're seeing a turn up in the crime rate," but it's too early to draw meaningful conclusions.

Blumstein said crime increases could be fueled by cutbacks in social services, a diversion of police to fighting terrorism, reductions in police manpower, declining job opportunities for teenagers and the release of 600,000 convicts from prison this year.

The FBI report relies on data reported by 12,000 law enforcement agencies.

A 35.5 percent increase in violent crime in Minneapolis would have marked the biggest rise among U.S. cities with populations in the range of 350,000 to 400,000. Interim Police Chief Tim Dolan attributed that error to a tight FBI reporting deadline that did not leave time for a department analyst to cross-check the data.

"Obviously we had some sort of computer glitch when we ran the numbers, and we are working to correct that," Dolan said. "Unfortunately, we made a mistake."

DOJ_NMG_0033386

The Police Department said the surge in violent crime in Minneapolis resulted largely from a 15 percent rise in robberies and a 19 percent jump in aggravated assaults. No raw numbers were made public.

Murders fall in Minneapolis

Minneapolis' single bright spot in the report was an 11.3 percent drop in murders, from 53 in 2004 to 47 last year, while law enforcement agencies across the country reported an average 4.8 percent rise, to a total of more than 16,900 homicide victims.

Murders rose 76 percent in Birmingham, Ala., 51 percent in St. Louis, 42 percent in Kansas City, Mo., and about 40 percent in Milwaukee.

Despite a national property crime decrease of 1.6 percent, the FBI reported that Minneapolis property crime surged by 11.9 percent over 2004, including an 18 percent rise in burglaries. It was unclear whether the department will seek to revise those figures as well.

An FBI spokeswoman said she expects the bureau to accept Minneapolis' revisions.

Minneapolis' surge helped drive up violent crime in the Midwest by 5.7 percent, the steepest increase of any region. Several other Midwestern cities also reported sizable increases in violent offenses: Milwaukee's incidence rose by 32.5 percent and Detroit's by 31.6 percent.

Robberies rose by 4.5 percent nationally and aggravated assaults increased by 1.9 percent, but the number of rapes declined by 1.9 percent.

The scene in St. Paul

In contrast, violent crime in St. Paul in 2005 rose by a modest 1.5 percent, though the number of murders increased 20 percent, from 20 to 24. Property crimes in St. Paul were 5 percent above 2004.

St. Paul Police Chief John Harrington said that he learned a long time ago not to get too caught up in the numbers. He was taught, he said, that someone willing to take too much credit in the good times will have to take blame when the numbers aren't favorable.

"The community's sense of their well-being and their safety is probably a better indicator of how safe a city is," Harrington said.

St. Paul Council Member Dan Bostrom, a former police officer, said he's confident that Minneapolis officials are addressing the crime issues and worries that St. Paul could pay for their success.

"People that do these crimes," Bostrom said, "will go where there is the least resistance."

Dolan said comparisons with St. Paul aren't fair, because Minneapolis has more economic disparity and greater problems involving juveniles, with the highest ratio of high school dropouts in the state. Gang members also have become younger and more violent, and gangs have become more fragmented, he said. The resulting unequal access to the drug market has forced more gangs to turn to robbery for revenue, Dolan said.

Centralizing the department's juvenile unit is a key strategy to tackle the youth crimes. Department officials hope the eight-officer unit will increase the number of investigations of juvenile crime, which shrank when the unit disappeared three years ago, Dolan said.

Resources are stretched to the limit, Dolan said, because of funding cuts over the past two years, but he said a bigger factor may be the department's failure to move quickly enough to implement crime-fighting strategies in the past year.

A daily battle on the streets

Police introduced the STOP unit -- a 50-officer team that responds to crime hot spots around the city -- last year to combat violent crime and move officers throughout the city as crime necessitated.

Shortly after 8 p.m. Monday, STOP officers Brandon Kitzerow and Jeff Kading responded to a call of "shots fired" on Oliver Avenue N. at the corner of the highly traveled Golden Valley Road.

"He shot me! He shot me!" the man on the ground was yelling, referring to the man sitting on him.

Kitzerow arrested the suspect, and Kading tended to the victim, whose white T-shirt was covered in blood. The officers shooed away kids on bicycles who happened by.

Earlier, two other STOP unit officers patrolled known drug spots and busted a man with marijuana and ticketed a driver with a suspended license.

Staff writer Chao Xiong contributed to this report. Greg Gordon is a correspondent in the Star Tribune Washington Bureau. dchanen@startribune.com · 612-673-4465 hpadilla@startribune.com · 651-298-1551

Violent Crime Jumps In Fort Collins (COLO)

By Coloradoan Staff

The Coloradoan, June 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033387

Violent crime increased dramatically in Fort Collins in 2005, though property crimes decreased, according to FBI crime statistics released today.

Fort Collins police received 4,876 reports of serious crimes in 2005, down 3 percent from the previous year, according to the FBI's Preliminary Uniform Crime Report for 2005.

However, the number of robberies reported to police more than doubled, while the number of aggravated assaults were up by 32 percent. Rapes were down 9 percent.

Overall violent crime – murder, rape, robbery and aggravated assault – was up 23 percent in Fort Collins, the second-highest increase in Colorado behind Westminster among cities with more than 100,000 people, according to the FBI report.

The picture was better in property crime – burglary, larceny-theft and motor vehicle theft – which declined by 5 percent in Fort Collins.

The biggest decrease in crime in Fort Collins was in larceny-theft, down 13 percent. However, auto thefts jumped 67 percent, to 431, according to the report.

Nationally, reported violent crimes increased by 2.5 percent in 2005 over the previous year. Property crimes declined by 1.6 percent, according to the FBI report.

Complete details in Tuesday's Coloradoan.

See the FBI report at http://www.fbi.gov/ucr/2005preliminary/index.htm

Violent Crime Up Across Texas, But Down In Dallas (KTVT-TV)

By Brooke Richie

KTVT-TV, June 13, 2006

(CBS 11 News) DALLAS Violent crime is up across the country and in every large North Texas city - except Dallas. That's according to the FBI's preliminary crime report for 2005. So what are different cities doing in the fight against crime?

Eleven people were shot in downtown Dallas early Saturday morning. There have been 78 murders in the first five months of the year. But violent crime in Dallas is actually plummeting.

"Dallas has been known for several years as having one of the highest crime rates in the nation for a population of a million or a more, but now with the crime rate coming down, it's good," said Dallas Police Department spokesperson Lt. Rick Watson.

Violent crime in Dallas was down nearly 5 percent from 2004 to 2005. Murders were down 19 percent - from 248 in 2004 to 202 in 2005. With Dallas in the national spotlight these days, those numbers may be good for business.

"With the NBA finals here, it makes people feel like they're more secure and safer coming to Dallas," Lt. Watson said.

Officials in other cities say - not so fast. They stress the importance of examining the crime rate per capita. And while Fort Worth and Arlington's crime statistics are up, so are both cities' populations.

"Marginal increases, when you take into consideration that we've added 37,000 people to our population last year alone," said Lt. Dean Sullivan of the Fort Worth Police Department.

Both Fort Worth and Arlington saw increases in their violent crime and murder rates. Arlington's murder rate increased 71 percent, from 14 murders to 24. Both cities say they've taken steps to improve. But even Dallas officials say when it comes to crime - no number is low enough.

Rapes On Decline In Seattle Area (KIRO-TV)

KIRO-TV, June 13, 2006

SEATTLE -- The FBI's latest crime statistics show a drop in rapes in Bellevue, Seattle, and Tacoma, Wash.

As far as other crimes reported in the 2005 FBI Uniform Crime Report, results vary.

Bellevue has seen an increase in murders and aggravated assault but theft and robberies have declined.

Crime in Seattle and Tacoma continues to rise.

Burglaries have dropped by 14 percent in Seattle but that was the only decrease noted among crimes listed in the report.

Violent crime has declined in Tacoma but like the other cities, crimes involving theft and robberies have increased.

Katrina Evacuee Arrested In Killing (NSDY/AP)

By Associated Press, June 12, 2006, 10:06 Pm Edt

Long Island Newsday, June 13, 2006

Ricardo Irvin, 18, told the Houston officers who picked him up from authorities in New Iberia, La., that "he got tired of running from the law" and admitted killing fellow evacuee Gregory Sartain, 19, and wounding another man, police spokesman Alvin Wright said.

DOJ_NMG_0033388

Police said Irvin and Richard Foster, 17, robbed the two men of money they had received from the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

A tip led to Irvin's arrest in Baton Rouge, La., on June 6. He was transferred to New Iberia, where he also is charged in a murder, before being turned over to Houston officers, authorities said.

Foster was arrested in New Orleans on May 15. The men could face the death penalty if convicted of the Houston murder.

Katrina evacuees have been involved in more than two dozen killings, either as suspects or victims, since about 150,000 Louisiana evacuees arrived last September, police said. FBI crime data released Monday showed a 23 percent spike in murders in Houston in the past year.

Washington Wire (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, June 12, 2006

Libby Defense Team Considers Memory Expert

The defense team for former Vice Presidential Chief of Staff I. Lewis Libby said it is considering calling a memory expert to testify at his trial early next year.

Libby is charged with five counts of lying to federal investigators and the grand jury and obstructing an investigation into whether Bush administration officials wrongfully disclosed the identity of a CIA agent. He has pleaded not guilty.

Attorneys representing Libby have said in court filings that any erroneous statements made to Federal Bureau of Investigation agents or the grand jury were the result of a faulty memory, and not intentional lies. It isn't clear if the federal judge hearing the case would allow such testimony. At a status hearing Monday, Libby's attorneys said they would notify the judge by July 17 if they plan to call such a witness, and the government could then object. – Anne Marie Squeo

Part Of Charge Vs. Ex-Bush Official Tossed (AP-Y2)

By Pete Yost

AP2, June 12, 2006

A judge dismissed part of one criminal charge against a former official in the Bush administration Monday, as the first trial in the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling scandal moved toward a conclusion.

The decision by U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman represented a small courtroom victory for defendant David Safavian, who is accused of five felony charges that he concealed Abramoff's efforts to acquire two pieces of government property.

Safavian was chief of staff at the General Services Administration when he supplied the lobbyist information about government land in Maryland and the Old Post Office, a downtown Washington landmark.

The judge threw out language from the indictment that said Safavian lied by telling a GSA ethics officer Abramoff had no business with the GSA and was not seeking to do business with the agency. There was no evidence during the trial that Safavian ever made such statements to the GSA, Friedman said. The judge left intact the remainder of the count that Safavian concealed his assistance to Abramoff, and deletion of the language was expected to have little substantive impact.

According to testimony, Abramoff used his typically aggressive tactics on an old friend, Safavian, who now faces a lengthy prison term if convicted of covering up his assistance to the influence peddler.

The prosecution and defense were to make final arguments to the jury Monday afternoon.

During the trial, prosecutors depicted the former top procurement official in the government as a liar who improperly capitalized on his position. Defense lawyers described him as an honest public servant who simply confused the details of his dealings with Abramoff.

Toppled from his White House post last year, Safavian's fate is about to be placed in the hands of a jury that has heard a week of testimony about two pieces of government real estate the lobbyist wanted for himself or his clients.

One of them is the Old Post Office, a Washington landmark that Abramoff envisioned as a redevelopment project for his Indian tribal clients.

Safavian, once the chief of staff at the General Services Administration, acknowledged giving advice and some "nonpublic information" to the lobbyist and admitted to some lapses of judgment and memory, while insisting he hadn't intentionally misled GSA and Senate investigators.

Safavian said he told an FBI agent he had advised Abramoff on two GSA properties in the fall of 2002, rather than — as actually happened — in the weeks before he took a luxury-filled golf trip to Scotland that Abramoff arranged in August 2002.

"I was just mistaken about the time frame," Safavian testified last week.

If Safavian is acquitted, the prosecution's decision not to put Abramoff on the witness stand would turn out to have been a mistake by the government.

DOJ_NMG_0033389

A conviction would follow a trial in which the star witness was not a person, but rather hundreds of e-mails in which Abramoff detailed what he wanted and Safavian responded.

Safavian is accused of two counts of obstruction and three counts of making false statements regarding his statements to the GSA's ethics officer, the Inspector General's office at the agency and a Senate committee chaired by Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz. Each count carries a maximum term of five years in prison.

Safavian Case Goes To Jurors (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

The trial of former federal procurement official David H. Safavian went to the jury yesterday, as a prosecutor in closing arguments accused him of lying to federal investigators to conceal the fact that he was "doing Jack Abramoff's bidding."

In response, Safavian's attorney said that the government's case was weak because Abramoff, a disgraced lobbyist who pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to corrupt public officials, did not testify at the three-week trial.

Safavian is the first person to go to trial for Abramoff-related charges, although four others have pleaded guilty to various allegations. Abramoff is cooperating with prosecutors in what has been a spreading Washington scandal.

Federal prosecutor Nathaniel B. Edmonds told the jury in his closing argument that Safavian maintained a "secret, inappropriate and unethical relationship" with Abramoff, his former boss, when Safavian became the deputy chief of staff and then chief of staff of the General Services Administration, the U.S. government's landlord agency.

Abramoff bestowed on Safavian a long list of favors, including a heavily subsidized golfing trip to Scotland and London on a private jet in the summer of 2002, Edmonds said. In exchange, he added, Safavian offered Abramoff "access, he offered connections, he offered power."

In particular, Edmonds said, Safavian arranged high-level meetings at the GSA and gave Abramoff insider information about two valuable properties that the GSA controlled and that the lobbyist coveted: a parcel of land in White Oak and the Old Post Office Pavilion building, on Pennsylvania Avenue between the White House and Capitol Hill.

Abramoff wanted to relocate a Hebrew academy he founded to White Oak, and he hoped to transform the Old Post Office into a five-star hotel.

The two men had a "two-way relationship," Edmonds said. When Safavian had the choice of acting on the public's behalf or helping the private interests of Abramoff, he asserted, Safavian chose Abramoff every time. Safavian is charged with lying about and preventing the government from learning about his aid to Abramoff and the expensive golfing trip that Abramoff bankrolled around the same time.

Edmonds also contended that it was merely a matter of "common sense" that Abramoff had "business before" the GSA and that Safavian was misleading investigators and ethics officers when he told them otherwise from 2002 onward. Neil G. Volz, a onetime lobbyist and former staff member for Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio), testified during the trial that Abramoff's team considered Safavian one of the "champions" of its causes inside government.

Safavian's attorney Barbara Van Gelder, said there were "many reasons to doubt the government's evidence." In particular, she asked, "Where's Jack?" -- referring to Abramoff. She said many of the e-mails between Abramoff and Safavian discussed during the trial were weakened as evidence because "Jack Abramoff was not here to answer the questions" that might have arisen about them.

Later, after a private conference with the judge and prosecutors, Van Gelder acknowledged that she could have called Abramoff to the stand, as the prosecutors could have, but chose not to.

She portrayed Safavian's omissions of fact to investigators as "innocent errors" that should not be judged as crimes by the jury because he acted "in good faith." Van Gelder characterized Safavian as "open, courteous, trying to do the right thing" and said he answered any question or requests put to him by investigators.

"There isn't a wrongful, depraved, evil bone in his body," she said. She told members of the jury that they could have witnessed that for themselves when Safavian took the stand in his defense last week, an act that she said he did not have to do.

She also said that Safavian did not assist Abramoff in doing business with the GSA because Abramoff did not have any actual business before the agency. He was not a "contractor," she said.

Besides, she asked, "What did David Safavian do for Jack Abramoff? Nothing." She asserted that Safavian did not have the power to grant Abramoff's wishes on either of the properties.

Judge Lets Stand Major Charges Against Ex-Aide (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033390

WASHINGTON, June 12 — A federal judge on Monday handed a small victory to a former White House aide on trial for lying about his ties to the Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, dismissing a specific charge in the indictment.

But other, larger charges against the former aide, David H. Safavian, were left intact for the jury, which is scheduled to begin deliberations on Tuesday in the first trial to result from the influence-peddling scandals centered on Mr. Abramoff.

In closing arguments in the district court here, a federal prosecutor, Nathaniel Edmonds, accused Mr. Safavian of abandoning his responsibilities as a public servant to "act in Jack Abramoff's interests" and of lying repeatedly when questioned by government investigators about his August 2002 golf trip to Scotland with the lobbyist.

Mr. Safavian, who worked at the time for the General Services Administration, the government's real estate manager, sought approval for the trip by telling colleagues that Mr. Abramoff had no business before the agency.

In fact, prosecutors said, Mr. Safavian was quietly helping Mr. Abramoff obtain information that summer about two real estate properties controlled by the G.S.A. that the lobbyist wanted to acquire.

Mr. Safavian's lawyer, Barbara Van Gelder, described her client as an honest government worker who had gone out of his way to avoid the appearance of conflict of interest in joining the Scotland trip, for which he reimbursed Mr. Abramoff $3,100.

The charge dismissed Monday by the trial judge, Paul L. Friedman, involved accusations that Mr. Safavian had lied to a G.S.A. ethics officer about Mr. Abramoff and his lobbyist business. The judge left the rest of the indictment in place, however, including the larger charges of obstruction of justice and false statements.

Shadegg's Memo Stokes Fight On Pork (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, June 13, 2006

A leading fiscal conservative in the House has stoked debate over pork by circulating a newspaper story linking Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) to "the inherent risk of corruption at the heart of the congressional earmark process."

Rep. John Shadegg (R-Ariz.), who ran for the majority leadership on a platform of fiscal retrenchment, sent reelection supporters an opinion piece on the federal investigation surrounding the House Appropriations Committee chairman.

To build momentum for reform, he wrote, "The debate continues on earmark reform … and, in my ongoing effort to illustrate the potential for abuse in the congressional spending process, created by unlimited earmarks, you may find the following commentary by John Fund at the Wall Street Journal informative."

A potential investigation of Lewis, one of his staff members and a lobbying firm with close ties to the lawmaker have thus become grist for internecine fights and policy disputes among members of the GOP conference.

The Journal piece condenses newspaper reports about connections among Lewis, a political action committee run by his stepdaughter and the lobbying firm of a close friend and former colleague.

Faced with mounting questions, Lewis is being represented by lawyers from the California-based firm of Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher. Rob Bonner, a former U.S. attorney, and Joe Warin, in the firm's Washington office, have taken the lead. His lawyers have brought in Barbara Comstock of Blank Rome Government Relations to handle press inquiries. Comstock assisted former Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) after he was indicted in Texas on campaign-finance charges.

Lewis denies wrongdoing, and his Republican colleagues appeared to support him last week. House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) backed him during a televised press briefing Thursday, and a handful of Republicans interviewed said they had seen no sign that members would pressure him to step aside.

The questions surrounding Lewis, his staff and the lobbying firm, Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White, are not directly connected to the bitter dispute between conservatives and Appropriations Committee members over earmarks, the special projects inserted into the annual spending bills.

But some conservatives argue that the news stories refocus attention on reform just as the guilty pleas of former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) and disgraced Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff fade from the headlines.

The Shadegg e-mail sets up a potentially rancorous debate this week on the House floor over an appropriations bill to fund the Departments of Transportation, the Treasury and Housing and Urban Development (TTHUD).

Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas), who handles budget and spending issues for the conservative Republican Study Committee (RSC), circulated a newsletter last week to RSC colleagues questioning whether outlays listed in the bill were a legitimate reallocation of taxpayer money. The outlays come from unspent highway money allocated in prior legislation; therefore, the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) does not recognize them as savings. The money was redistributed so that the spending bill would not exceed its preset price tag under the budget.

"It strikes me as a budget gimmick," Hensarling said. While he concedes that this accounting method "comports with budget rules," it "breaks with the spirit" of those laws.

DOJ_NMG_0033391

Because the bill does not violate budget rules, conservatives in the House cannot raise procedural objections to it or its sections and must vote against the rule for the bill, offer an amendment to reduce the $2.3 billion listed as "un-obligated balances," or vote against the bill itself.

Debate is expected to begin today, and RSC members had not decided on a strategy by press time yesterday. Rule votes are often the best opportunity for Republicans to derail legislation because Democrats usually oppose the rule en masse.

Appropriators argue that offsets are commonly used to fund projects in other bills and that RSC members have proposed similar reallocations in the past to fund previous spending bills.

"CBO says we're at our budget, and that's the end of the discussion," said Appropriations Committee spokesman John Scofield.

Appropriations members have already vowed to fight any move to strip spending from the bill. "I'm not going to take their crap," Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.) said last week. The Illinois appropriator said he included several projects for his district and would fight to keep them all.

"They think they've gotten a little steam building, and we're going to have to shoot them down," LaHood said. He ripped RSC members this year on the House floor for successfully stripping $507 million in construction projects from a military spending bill.

In addition to fighting over outlays, Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) is expected to introduce amendments to block several earmarks, as he did on other appropriations bills this year.

The complete list of those projects was not yet available by press time, but it included $500,000 to the city of Yucaipa, Calif., "for the design and construction of a multipurpose athletic facility at Crafton Hills College" and $1.5 million for construction of a William Faulkner Museum at the University of Mississippi in Oxford, Miss., where the author attended college.

With stories about Cunningham and Abramoff on the decline, stories surrounding Lewis are driving reform, two conservative Republicans said last week on the condition of anonymity.

Boehner publicly supports sweeping earmark reform, and his office included it as part of a report on oversight expected to be released today. The leader and House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) promised Republicans on the Appropriations Committee that they would not bring a lobbying reform bill to the floor that does not apply the earmark language to each of the authorizing and tax committees.

The Speaker is expected to name conferees this week. They will work out the details of broader earmark reforms with Senate conferees, Boehner spokesman Kevin Madden said yesterday.

Asked whether press reports about the chairman's connection with lobbyists seeking projects from his committee had any effect on the passage of appropriations bills this year, LaHood said, "It hasn't so far. … The committee is working together."

Texas Death Penalty Case Headed For Possible Fourth Trial (AP)

By Michael Graczyk, Associated Press

AP, June 13, 2006

One of the longest and most contentious death penalty cases in Texas is heading back for yet another trial.

The U.S. Supreme Court, acting Monday on an appeal from the Texas Attorney General's Office, refused to reinstate the death sentence of Johnny Paul Penry, clearing the way for another jury to consider punishment for a fourth time. Penry was convicted of raping and fatally stabbing a woman at her home in Livingston in 1979.

Penry turned 50 last month and has spent more than half of his life on death row for the slaying of 22-year-old Pamela Moseley Carpenter. He confessed to attacking the woman and stabbing her with scissors, but his attorneys have contended Penry, who says he believes in Santa Claus, has the reasoning capacity of a 7-year-old.

While psychological tests have put Penry's IQ between 50 and 60, at least five juries have found Penry to be legally competent to stand trial or have rejected defenses based on mental retardation. The high court in 2002 ruled mentally retarded people, generally considered having an IQ below 70, may not be executed.

The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals last October, in a 5-4 ruling, sent Penry's death sentence back for another punishment hearing, citing what judges said were improper instructions that prevented jurors from considering the full scope of Penry's retardation claims. It was that decision the attorney general's office appealed to the high court.

"That's good news for us," said John Wright, of Huntsville, who has been one of Penry's lawyers since the beginning of his case. "We're looking at another trial — if we can't settle it. And I would think by now we could."

"There have been so many disappointments in regard to this case, you kind of become conditioned to adversity," said William Lee Hon, the Polk County assistant prosecutor who has been handling the case for more than two decades. "So you take these blows as they come, and you do the best you can."

DOJ_NMG_0033392

Hon said he was anticipating Penry's lawyers would suggest an agreement to a sentence less than death to avoid another trial but said there were "a whole lot of considerations to look at" before deciding for a fourth time to seek a death sentence.

"The parole eligibility is huge and he might very well be parole eligible," Hon said. "Is there any guarantee to keep him in prison if we choose to seek a life sentence? I don't know. That's one of the big questions to resolve in the process."

He also said the relatives of the victim, whose brother is former Washington Redskins kicker Mark Moseley, would be consulted.

Penry was on parole about three months after serving two years of a five-year rape conviction when he was arrested for the 1979 attack on Carpenter, who lived long enough to identify him as her assailant.

He was arrested later that day and has been in custody since. He's among the longest-serving of the 399 inmates on death row in Texas.

"Why don't they just lock me up and throw away the key," Penry told The Associated Press in 2001. "That's all I want."

In 2000, he got within about three hours of execution when the justices halted the punishment.

The Supreme Court first agreed to hear Penry's case in 1988, and the following year overturned his death sentence on 5-4 vote. In that same decision, justices clashed over whether mentally retarded people can be executed. More than decade later, in a North Carolina case, justices took the issue up again and barred capital punishment for retarded killers.

Penry was resentenced to death and in 2001 the Supreme Court on a 6-3 vote voided that death sentence too. Both times the high court reasoned the jury was not allowed to properly weigh Penry's alleged retardation.

A new trial in 2002 led to the death sentence that was reversed last year by the Court of Criminal Appeals.

Hon said depending on the court's schedule, it was possible a new punishment trial could be held by late this year. Wright speculated a trial wasn't likely until next year.

U Of U Professor Knows Location Of Documents FBI Wants (KSL-T V)

By Jon Dunn

KSL-TV, June 13, 2006

Over the last few months, the FBI has turned to Jack Anderson's papers — papers the deceased investigative journalist amassed over the years in his work. KSL Newsradio has learned that thousands of pages of those documents are right here in Salt Lake City.

University of Utah Professor Tim Chambless befriended Anderson over the years, and has built his own collection of papers by writing about the columnist.

"The FBI was informed by the Anderson family that I was a person who knew more than anyone else," Chambless says.

Chambless says when FBI Director Robert Mueller visited Salt Lake City last week, he wanted to come clean about his six boxes full of papers, and wanted to tell the bureau why it will never see them.

"I believe in the First Amendment. Jack Anderson believed in the First Amendment," Chambless says.

Chambless sent a letter through his lawyer to Mueller, asking him to announce the end of the pursuit of the papers. Attorney Pat Shea says the papers are now hidden where no one will find them.

Utahn Keeps Watch Over Jack Anderson Papers (DESERET)

By Ben Winslow, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, June 13, 2006

U. professor fends off FBI's efforts to obtain documents

Six boxes of Jack Anderson's papers that a University of Utah professor has been keeping are safe from the FBI's reach for now.

Michael Brandy, Deseret Morning News

University of Utah professor Tim Chambless has given collection of Jack Anderson's papers to attorney Pat Shea, in the background. The FBI wants the papers of the late muckraking journalist because it believes some of the documents in the collection contain classified information dealing with national security.

University of Utah political science professor Tim Chambless, who wrote a dissertation on Anderson, has collected the documents for years. Anderson, who died last year at 83, gave him many of the documents.

Initially, Chambless provided the FBI with a catalog of what the papers said. Now, he fears the FBI may come with subpoenas demanding everything.

His worry that he might be asked to provide more information came after the FBI contacted the Anderson family this spring, wanting to look at approximately 200 boxes of the journalist's papers at George Washington University in Washington, D.C. During a congressional hearing last week, Anderson's son said his family would defy an FBI subpoena.

DOJ_NMG_0033393

In Utah, Chambless took a similar stance, and his lawyer fired off a letter Monday to FBI Director Robert Mueller, telling him to back off.

"The Anderson papers Professor Chambless has will not be released to any third parties, including the FBI," Pat Shea wrote in the letter. During a news conference at his law office, Shea said Chambless had given him the boxes.

Chambless said he just wants to continue writing a book about Anderson and the many government scandals he uncovered.

"I share with Jack Anderson a strong view of the First Amendment," Chambless said.

Chambless said nothing in the documents threatens American national security. He suggested the FBI wanted them because "political security" was threatened.

"Certainly administrations would prefer not to have their mistakes made known to the working press," Chambless said. Some have suggested the Anderson papers are a stepping stone for a Bush administration crackdown on reporters who publish classified documents and refuse to reveal sources.

While in Utah last week, Mueller denied those accusations.

"We're trying to determine whether or not national security would be adversely impacted by the disclosure of these documents. That's our sole intent," he said on Wednesday. "I hardly think that is an assault on the press."

Supreme Court Allows Fresh Evidence In Death Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Toni Locy, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 13, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-A death-row inmate can use DNA evidence to attempt to show his innocence 20 years after he was convicted of murdering a neighbor, the Supreme Court ruled Monday.

The high court's decision is significant because numerous exonerations in recent years of death-row and other criminal defendants through DNA testing have raised concerns among civil libertarians, prosecutors and Supreme Court Justice John Paul Stevens that an innocent person may be executed, or already has been.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, writing for the court, said the evidence in the case was a "close" call for a jury. But he said that inmate Paul Gregory House could proceed with a lawsuit in federal court claiming innocence for the murder of Carolyn Muncey, a young mother of two, in the state of Tennessee in July 1985.

Twenty years after his conviction, DNA testing revealed that semen found on the murder victim's nightgown and underwear belonged to her husband, not House.

"This is not a case of conclusive exoneration," Kennedy wrote on behalf of himself and four other justices.

Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas dissented. Justice Samuel Alito did not participate in the case because it was argued before he joined the high court.

Kennedy said jurors could find reasonable doubt because DNA evidence points to Muncey's husband as a suspect and because small blood stains found on House's jeans may have spilled on the pants from vials of blood taken from Muncey during an autopsy.

House, who was on parole for a sex offense in Utah, was convicted of luring Muncey from her home by telling her that her husband, Hubert, had been hurt in a car accident. Her body was found the next afternoon in an area where witnesses had seen House.

His original lawyer failed to locate several witnesses who said years later that Hubert Muncey had abused his wife, had fought with her the night of her murder and had confessed later to killing her.

Supreme Court Allows Challenges To Lethal Injections (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 13, 2006

In a pair of opinions written by Justice Anthony Kennedy, the Supreme Court on Monday kept alive the appeals of death row inmates in Florida and Tennessee, adding new fuel to the debate over the death penalty.

In the Florida case, Hill v. McDonough, the Court ruled unanimously that inmate Clarence Hill is entitled to challenge the state's lethal injection method as a Section 1983 federal civil rights action, rather than being limited to the more restricted habeas corpus route. But the Court, citing the interest of the state and crime victims in "timely enforcement of a sentence," cautioned that its ruling should not be read to encourage automatic stays or long delays in executions.

In the Tennessee decision, House v. Bell, unusual for its extensive discussion of the trial evidence, a more divided Court said that DNA evidence offered by defendant Paul House years after his conviction entitled him to habeas review in federal court.

DOJ_NMG_0033394

Both rulings were hailed by death penalty critics, and both highlighted Kennedy's pivotal role in the new Roberts Court. In the House case the vote was 5-3, with Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. and Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas in dissent. Justice Samuel Alito Jr. did not participate because the case was argued before he joined the Court.

Peter Neufeld, co-director of the Innocence Project, said that House "recognizes that scientific advances have transformed our criminal justice system and must be weighed heavily in determining whether innocent people have been wrongly convicted." The ruling, the first dealing directly with DNA evidence as a factor in reopening a death penalty case, will have a broad impact, Neufeld said.

The Hill decision, though not a ruling for or against lethal injections, may hasten the day when the Supreme Court will consider one of a growing number of claims that the combination of drugs used in lethal injections can cause excruciating pain, violating the Eighth Amendment bar against "cruel and unusual punishments." In May, however, the Court denied review in a Tennessee case that would have presented the issue directly.

Lethal injections, required in 19 states and available in 37 of 38 death penalty states, came into vogue in the past decade as a more humane method than electrocution. But human rights groups have questioned that premise in recent years, and during oral argument in the Hill case, Justice John Paul Stevens noted that veterinary groups have deemed the method as too cruel to use in euthanizing pets.

In the procedure the inmate is injected with three drugs in sequence that first lead to rapid unconsciousness, then muscle paralysis of the lungs and diaphragm, and, finally, cardiac arrest. Critics say that if the initial anesthetic does not take hold quickly enough, the inmate can suffer extreme pain and a feeling of suffocation.

Clarence Hill, convicted of murder in 1983, has challenged his death sentence ever since, with some success -- it was vacated twice. But in 1995 the Florida Supreme Court reimposed the death penalty. He kept appealing, and when Florida adopted lethal injections in 2000, Hill filed requests seeking details on the chemicals and the procedure to be used. He finally sued under Section 1983, but state and federal courts ruled that it was the functional equivalent of a successive habeas petition, which is foreclosed under existing law.

Kennedy's ruling reversed the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Because it is a challenge to the specific method of execution, not an attack on the sentence itself, Kennedy said it could proceed under Section 1983. Noting that other lethal injection methods are possible, Kennedy wrote that "Hill's action if successful would not necessarily prevent the state from executing him by lethal injection." Some states have developed different procedures and sequences for administering the drugs.

In House v. Bell, the defendant has also been claiming innocence and challenging his conviction for more than 20 years. At his trial, the prosecution used blood and semen evidence to connect House with the rape and murder of Carolyn Muncey.

After failing in several post-conviction appeals, House won a hearing in federal court to determine if his case fell into an "actual innocence" exception that allows further appeals that ordinarily would be procedurally barred. Using modern DNA evidence and other testimony, House alleged that the victim's husband committed the murder. The 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals returned the case to Tennessee courts for further review. The Tennessee Supreme Court declined, and on further review the 6th Circuit upheld the denial of habeas relief.

Kennedy's majority opinion said that House's case fits under the rule announced in the 1995 case Schlup v. Delo, which allows innocence claims to reopen appeals if, in light of new evidence, "it is more likely than not that no reasonable juror would have found petitioner guilty."

After assessing the new evidence, Kennedy concluded that "this is not a case of conclusive exoneration." But because the new evidence called into question the blood and semen testimony, the Schlup standard was met. But he said House's case does not rise to the level of another precedent, Herrera v. Collins, which lays out procedures for handling "truly persuasive" innocence claims.

Roberts' dissent agreed with the majority on the Herrera issue but argued that despite the new evidence, "the case against House remains substantially unaltered from the case presented to the jury." As a result, Roberts said, the Schlup standard is not met because "I do not find it probable that no reasonable juror would vote to convict him."

Widening The Gateway (WP)

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

OF ALL THE cases of possibly innocent people in state prisons, Paul House's hardly seems the most compelling. Convicted and sentenced to die in Tennessee for the murder of a woman two decades ago, Mr. House has mustered some considerable new evidence suggesting his innocence. But his claim is hardly overpowering. Ironically, that is exactly what makes the Supreme Court's decision yesterday allowing federal review of his conviction significant.

Oftentimes, serious legal deficiencies in state convictions, including capital convictions, escape federal review because of technical errors that prevented them from being raised in state courts first. Normally, the federal courts' attitude is that this is the inmate's tough luck. In recent years, however, the courts have acknowledged that in cases where an inmate has a particularly strong claim of innocence, those procedural barriers sometimes have to give way to prevent a miscarriage of justice. Yet clearing this hurdle requires an especially demanding showing -- so in practice, it doesn't offer much hope. The question in Mr. House's case was whether his showing of innocence was strong enough to let him proceed with a challenge that would otherwise be barred. The court voted 5 to 3 that it was.

DOJ_NMG_0033395

Mr. House's claim seems powerful on its face. He has produced DNA evidence that semen stains left on the victim's clothing were not his but her husband's. He has offered indications that the victim's blood left on his pants might be the result of lab spillage, and not from the crime scene. And two witnesses have come forward -- years after the fact -- alleging that the victim's husband confessed to the crime. Yet as Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. argued in dissent -- joined by Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas -- significant evidence of Mr. House's guilt remains, and the judge who considered his new evidence up close did not find it persuasive. In other words, to let Mr. House into court, the justices have had to widen significantly the gateway for review in such cases.

But this is not, as the dissenters imply, a problem; rather, it is a good development and overdue. It does not mean that inmates will go free on inconclusive showings of innocence; Mr. House still has a long way to go to get his conviction overturned. It means only that inmates who can raise a serious factual question about their guilt should have a somewhat easier time getting into the courthouse in the first place. Given how many innocents have been wrongly convicted and later freed from death row and lengthy prison terms, opening the door for review makes a great deal of sense.

Lifesaving Evidence (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

EVEN MANY SUPPORTERS OF capital punishment probably assume that a death row inmate is guaranteed another day in court if new evidence, especially DNA evidence, emerges that undermines the original case against him. Until Monday, they would have been wrong.

That was when the Supreme Court, by a 5-3 vote, ordered a federal district judge to provide a new habeas corpus hearing for Paul G. House, a Tennessee man who was sentenced to death in the 1985 kidnapping and murder of a young mother. Unlike some of the court's fact-specific death penalty decisions, this one could have wide application as more convicted defendants seek exoneration through DNA evidence. That's because the decision requires a judge considering a convicted defendant's habeas corpus petition to view the jury deliberations at his trial as part of a "holistic" process — one in which one sort of evidence affects how a jury views other evidence.

In asking jurors to sentence House to death, prosecutors suggested that he had sexually assaulted Carolyn Muncey and then killed her because she resisted or because he wanted to cover up his deed. But later, DNA testing indicated that semen found on Muncey's nightgown did not come from House.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy's majority opinion calls the belated DNA evidence a "new disclosure of central importance" in the way jurors would look at the case. In a 1995 case, the high court ruled that prisoners who otherwise had exhausted their appeals could pursue a writ of habeas corpus if, in light of new evidence, it was more probable than not that "no juror, acting reasonably, would have voted to find him guilty beyond a reasonable doubt." House met that test, Kennedy concluded.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., joined in dissent by justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, disagreed. "The question," Roberts wrote, "is not whether House was prejudiced at his trial because the jurors were not aware of the new evidence but whether all the evidence, considered together, proves that House was actually innocent, so that no reasonable juror would vote to convict him."

At first glance, the outcome of this case — while obviously good news for House — might seem to offer little encouragement to other death row inmates seeking to challenge their convictions. After all, both Kennedy and Roberts purported to be applying the same legal standard to a specific set of facts. But Kennedy's "holistic" approach sends a clear signal to lower-court judges: Henceforth, they must take a generous view of the way new evidence, scientific and otherwise, might undermine convictions.

From now on, a defendant need not offer evidence disputing each piece of evidence offered against him. It will be enough to cast doubt on information that affected how jurors weighed the credibility of nonscientific evidence. For example, if a juror believes that flawed DNA evidence establishes a defendant's presence at a murder scene, she is more likely to credit an eyewitness identification.

Welcome as this decision is, the best way to prevent unjust impositions of the death penalty is to do away with capital punishment altogether, as other civilized societies have done. Unfortunately, as the Supreme Court grows ever more uneasy with the death penalty, elected officials agitate ever more aggressively for it.

DOJ_NMG_0033396

Death Row Inmates Can Pursue Appeals (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir

Financial Times, June 13, 2006

The US Supreme Court on Monday chipped away at the edifice of capital punishment in America, issuing two rulings that give prisoners on death row more power to challenge their sentences.

In one case, the court ruled that a Tennessee man should get a second chance to prove his innocence, since DNA and other evidence cast serious doubt on whether he was guilty. The second case gave death-row inmates more avenues to challenge and possibly delay their execution, by using civil rights laws.

"Today's decisions are further evidence of the Supreme Court's increasing discomfort with many aspects of the death penalty system and further evidence of the growing national concern about executing innocent people by mistake," the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) said.

In recent years, the court has issued several rulings reining in the administration of the death penalty. Several rulings have dealt with the problem of incompetent counsel and racial bias by juries. The court has also issued controversial rulings abolishing the death penalty for juveniles and the mentally retarded.

The rulings come amid a marked decline in US executions. "Prosecutors aren't seeking [the death penalty] as often, juries aren't imposing it as often. Certainly, everybody is giving it a second look," says Ron Weich, a death penalty specialist who is senior counsel to Harry Reid, the top Democrat in the Senate. He predicts a "gradual withering away" of capital punishment over time.

Monday's DNA case, which was decided 5-3 in the Supreme Court, was a "rare case where – had the jury heard all the conflicting testimony – it is more likely than not that no reasonable juror would have found the petitioner guilty beyond a reasonable doubt", Justice Anthony Kennedy wrote for the majority. Chief Justice John Roberts dissented.

The Tennessee man, Paul Gregory House, was convicted of murdering a woman in 1986. But DNA evidence now proves that semen stains on her clothing did not come from him, and incriminating bloodstains may have been planted. But the court did not order him immediately freed: Mr House will have to pursue his claims before a federal district court, which could find that there are other procedural hurdles to his release.

Stephen Kissinger, Mr House's attorney, welcomed the ruling, saying it "gives a road map" to other prisoners who want to challenge their convictions. He called on the Tennessee governor to grant clemency to Mr House, since he is gravely ill, and further legal proceedings could take years.

In the other case, decided unanimously, the court gave death-row inmates another avenue to challenge lethal injection, the method used by almost all death penalty states. Inmates who have exhausted their usual appeals can use federal civil rights law to challenge this method, which medical studies have shown may inflict severe and unnecessary pain.

The ruling made it relatively hard to bring such challenges and did not answer the underlying question of whether lethal injection executions are constitutional.

High Court Rulings Chip At Death Penalty (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — In two death-penalty cases Monday, the Supreme Court opened the door to new challenges of state lethal injection methods and ruled that a Tennessee prisoner offering DNA evidence that he might be innocent should get a new hearing.

The latter case, decided by a 5-3 vote over a dissent by Chief Justice John Roberts, was the court's first ruling involving DNA testing, which has been used to exonerate scores of prisoners in recent years. The ruling was focused narrowly on the Tennessee inmate's case. But supporters of DNA testing programs, including the New York-based Innocence Project, took it as a signal that the court's majority is open to prisoners using new scientific evidence to appeal their cases from death row.

Both decisions were written by Justice Anthony Kennedy, who is at the ideological center of the divided, nine-member court and has seen his profile increased by the retirement of moderate Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. The rulings also reinforced a trend in which the court has tried to ensure states have adequate safeguards in imposing the death penalty.

Voting 9-0, the court allowed inmates who have exhausted their regular appeals to invoke a civil rights law to challenge the drugs and procedures used for injection. That execution method, used by almost all of the 38 states that allow capital punishment, has been targeted in lawsuits as "cruel and unusual punishment" that should be deemed unconstitutional.

DOJ_NMG_0033397

In Monday's case, Clarence Hill, who was convicted in the shooting death of a police officer in Pensacola, Fla., in 1983, asserts that the three-drug cocktail Florida uses in executions could cause needless pain. Hill says inmates may not be fully anesthetized before the last drug — potassium chloride — is administered to stop the heart.

The justices reversed an appeals court ruling that denied Hill's claim. That court said it was an improper challenge to the constitutionality of his sentence, rather than a civil rights claim.

The justices did not address the merits of arguments against lethal injections. Kennedy said the decision allowing Hill a hearing should not lead judges to routinely postpone executions of prisoners who challenge lethal injection.

The more divisive ruling linked to DNA evidence permits Paul Gregory House, who was convicted of the 1985 murder of a neighbor, to go before a U.S. judge to assert that his trial was constitutionally flawed. Based on new scientific evidence and witness testimony that House says cast suspicion on the victim's husband, the court said jurors likely would not have found House guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

The justices reversed a ruling that had barred House from bringing a claim that his trial lawyer was ineffective, because House had exhausted his regular appeals. Kennedy said House qualified for an exception to the usual rules based on his possible innocence. If House is successful in arguing that his case was constitutionally flawed because of ineffective counsel, he could get a new trial.

Dissenting in the House case were Roberts and Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. They noted that a lower-court judge who had reviewed the new information found that it did not sufficiently undermine “the larger web of evidence” against House. Justice Samuel Alito, who was not on the court when the case was argued in January, did not participate.

Supreme Court Assists Death Row Challengers (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court opened the doors of the federal courts today to state death row inmates who wish to challenge their convictions based on new DNA evidence or to claim that a poorly administered lethal injection would cause them great pain.

The court's two rulings were narrow and procedural, and they are not likely to affect a large number of convicted murderers. In neither case did the justices say the inmate deserved to win. Rather, they said only that his claim deserved a full hearing.

Nonetheless, the high court made it clear again that the death penalty was special and said federal judges should reopen old cases when "new reliable evidence" raises real doubts about the defendant's guilt.

DNA evidence has already freed scores of prisoners, including some who were on death row. Lawyers for the New York-based Innocence Project predicted today's ruling would have a broad national impact by removing a barrier to having some of these cases heard in federal court.

In the past decade, Congress and the Supreme Court have all but barred federal judges from reopening the cases of long-serving state prisoners.

The court announced two exceptions to that rule today: one for powerful new evidence and the other involving the method of carrying out an execution.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy delivered both decisions for the court. With the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, he has assumed the center spot when the court is closely split along ideological lines.

The DNA case was decided on a 5-3 vote, with new Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. in dissent.

In 1986, Paul House, a paroled rapist and a newcomer to a rural east Tennessee town, was convicted of abducting and murdering a neighbor woman, and he was sentenced to die. But DNA tests a decade later showed the semen stains on her nightgown had come from her husband, not from House, as the jury was told.

Kennedy said the new evidence did not prove House was innocent. He had lied about his whereabouts on the night of the murder, and blood stains from the victim were found on his jeans.

Still, he said, the DNA evidence undercut the prosecution's claim that House had sexually assaulted the victim. "We conclude that this is the rare case where — had the jury heard all the conflicting testimony — it is more likely than not that no reasonable juror" would have voted to convict House, Kennedy said.

In the second case, Kennedy spoke for a unanimous court in saying federal judges should hear claims that a lethal injection may cause an excruciating death if officials do not use a sufficient amount of anesthesia.

Last year, the Lancet, the British medical journal, published a study by four doctors who said some executed men may felt intense, burning pain from the drugs that contracted the muscles of their lungs and heart because they were not given enough of the anesthetic, sodium pentothal.

DOJ_NMG_0033398

In response, lawyers for inmates facing execution cited the study and urged judges to intervene. Some did so. U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel in San Jose stopped the execution of Michael Morales and scheduled a hearing for the fall to review California's method of carrying out lethal executions.

Other federal judges said they were barred from reopening these state cases on the eve of an execution.

In today's decision, the high court agreed a federal judge in Florida may hold a hearing to consider the claims of Clarence Hill that another mixture of drugs should be used for his execution.

Kennedy stressed that Hill was not challenging the state's plan to execute him, only its method of doing so.

High Court Keeps Door Open To Death-penalty Lawsuits (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON

Death-row inmates can rely on civil rights law to challenge the use of lethal injection in their executions, even after they have exhausted all their allowable appeals.

In a 9-0 decision announced Monday, the US Supreme Court left the door propped open for a significant number of condemned prisoners to sue to force an examination of whether lethal injection is a humane method of capital punishment.

Such method-of-execution suits have become the most active area of capital punishment litigation in recent years. Many states and the Bush administration had expressed concern that to allow such challenges might create another layer of delay in carrying out executions.

The case, Hill v. McDonough, did not test the constitutionality of lethal injection. Instead, it raised a technical issue: whether such legal challenges had to be filed under the more restrictive habeas statute or could be pursued as a civil rights matter. The high court said inmates could file appeals under the civil rights law.

Writing for the court, Justice Anthony Kennedy said such civil rights suits are different from habeas suits in cases involving the death penalty because they challenge only the way an execution is carried out, not the merits of the underlying conviction.

"Any incidental delay caused by allowing [the death row inmate] to file suit does not cast on his sentence the kind of negative legal implication that would require him to proceed in a habeas action," Justice Kennedy writes.

But Kennedy also warned that the high court's ruling was not a license for death-row inmates to file last-minute challenges to stall an execution. "A stay of execution is an equitable remedy," Kennedy writes. "It is not available as a matter of right."

The decision comes in the case of Florida death-row inmate Clarence Hill, sentenced to die for the 1983 shooting death of a police officer. Hill had used up all his allowable appeals, but as his execution date drew nearer, he adopted a new strategy. Rather than challenging his conviction and death sentence, he sued under a federal civil rights statute challenging the constitutionality of Florida's use of lethal injection. Citing scientific studies, Hill argued that the state's procedure created an unreasonably high risk that he would suffer excruciating pain.

Justices Open Door For Injection Case (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

The Supreme Court gave the green light for a Florida death row inmate to challenge that state's lethal-injection procedures through a federal civil rights lawsuit, in a unanimous ruling that underscored the pivotal role of Justice Anthony M. Kennedy in the court's death-penalty jurisprudence.

Clarence E. Hill, convicted in 1982 of murdering a police officer, did not claim that lethal injection, in and of itself, is cruel and unusual punishment. Instead, he asserted that Florida's method of executing inmates -- which, like that of most other states, employs three chemicals in sequence -- could subject him to excruciating but undetected pain, in violation of his civil rights.

Earlier this year, an Atlanta-based federal appeals court threw out Hill's case, ruling that it was a disguised attack on his death sentence.

But in a 10-page opinion written by Kennedy, the court said Hill's suit was a good-faith challenge that might delay his execution without "necessarily" foreclosing it, because the state has other lethal-injection options. The court sent the case back to the lower courts to rule on the merits of Hill's claim.

The narrow ruling, which Kennedy said hinged on the circumstances of Hill's case, was something of an anticlimax to one of the most closely watched cases of the term. It did not settle the legal question that has divided the courts for years and that the justices seemingly set out to address: whether, and under what circumstances, inmates generally can use civil rights law to challenge states' methods of execution.

DOJ_NMG_0033399

Still, legal analysts said the ruling would help death penalty opponents. It left open a legal option for death row inmates that states, with the apparent support of conservatives on the Supreme Court, have long been eager to shut. Opponents of method-of-execution challenges argue that inmates can pursue them indefinitely, postponing execution forever.

"It's discouraging," said Kevin C. Newsom, solicitor general of Alabama, which supported Florida in the case. "The floodgates are, to a certain extent, open."

At the same time, Kennedy warned that "federal courts can and should protect States from dilatory or speculative suits." He offered little guidance on how lower courts should evaluate Hill's claim, leaving room for conservative federal courts in the South, where the death penalty is concentrated, to continue denying stays of execution based on alleged constitutional problems with lethal injection, legal analysts said.

At oral arguments on April 26, the justices seemed deeply divided along ideological lines. The court's four liberal members emphasized the risk of pain to inmates and the need to give them a day in court to prevent it. Its four conservatives suggested that inmates would use repeated lethal-injection challenges to evade execution.

Kennedy, an appointee of President Ronald Reagan who usually votes with the conservatives but has often sided with the liberals on social issues, did not tip his hand.

Yesterday's ruling may have been unanimous because it effectively papered over these differences, offering a little something for everyone on the court. In recent weeks, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. has spoken publicly of the need for the court to speak with a single voice on controversial issues, even if that means it must rule narrowly.

And the court seems unlikely to return to the issue soon. It recently turned down a lethal-injection appeal by a Tennessee death row inmate that did not pose procedural issues as Hill's did, but directly challenged lethal injection in that state as cruel and unusual punishment.

Kennedy's decisive role was more obvious in yesterday's other death penalty case, House v. Bell , No. 04-8990, in which he also wrote the majority opinion.

Voting 5 to 3, the court gave Paul Gregory House of Tennessee a new chance to challenge the fairness of his 1986 capital murder trial because DNA tests and other new evidence have created doubt that he is guilty.

Liberals Stephen G. Breyer, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, David H. Souter and John Paul Stevens joined Kennedy. Roberts and fellow conservative Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas dissented. Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. did not vote because the court heard the case in January, before he joined the court.

If Kennedy had sided with the conservatives, the 4 to 4 tie would have affirmed a federal appeals court's ruling against House.

The court's ruling favored death penalty opponents, but not quite as much as they had hoped. House and his supporters had wanted the court to rule that death row inmates with particularly strong claims of innocence should be allowed to raise them in court even if they have no other legal claims or have exhausted their appeals.

But the court, leaving House's conviction and sentence intact, at least for now, refused to go that far. Kennedy noted that "this is not a case of conclusive exoneration" but rather a case in which House had raised new evidence that, taken together, makes it more likely than not that jurors would have reasonable doubt as to his guilt.

By meeting that standard, which the court set in a 1995 ruling, House won the right to a hearing in federal court on his claim that he was denied effective legal aid at trial.

Prisoners Gain In Suit Attacking Lethal Injection (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 12 — The Supreme Court opened the door Monday for death-row inmates to challenge the way most states carry out executions by lethal injection.

In its unanimous opinion, the court expressed no view on the constitutionality either of lethal injection in general or of the specific procedures and combination of chemicals that a Florida inmate, Clarence E. Hill, and numerous others around the country have recently challenged in federal court.

The justices addressed themselves solely to the procedural route that such lawsuits must take, and chose the route that is by far the more inmate-friendly from the two options that the case presented.

Nonetheless, it was the tight focus of the case, an appeal by Mr. Hill of a ruling by the federal appeals court in Atlanta, that probably enabled the justices to maintain their unanimity. It remains to be seen how they would rule on the underlying constitutional question of whether the disputed lethal injection method violates the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment.

DOJ_NMG_0033400

Just three weeks ago the court turned down, without comment, a case from Tennessee, Abdur'Rahman v. Bredesen, that presented that issue directly. The justices have also permitted several executions to be carried out by lethal injection, without intervening, while the Florida case was pending.

Federal courts around the country have begun wrestling with the issue, which opponents of the death penalty have brought to the fore in recent months on the basis of a report last year in a British medical journal, The Lancet.

The focus of concern is two of the three chemicals that make up the lethal cocktail used by most states. One is sodium pentothal, an anesthetic, which Mr. Hill argues in his lawsuit is insufficient to make the procedure painless.

The second is pancuronium bromide, which causes muscle paralysis but does not block pain or interfere with consciousness. Studies indicate that while inmates who receive this drug look calm and peaceful as the third chemical, potassium chloride, is administered to stop the heart, they can actually feel intense pain without being able to express themselves.

Mr. Hill's suit maintains that Florida's procedure for administering these three drugs presents a "foreseeable risk of gratuitous and unnecessary pain."

Having been convicted in 1983 of killing a police officer, Mr. Hill had long since run through the ordinary appeals process by the time he filed his suit in state court last December, with his execution set for Jan. 24. After the Florida courts threw the case out, and with the clock running, he turned to federal court with an equally poor result. He was strapped to a gurney, intravenous lines to administer the chemicals already inserted, when Justice Anthony M. Kennedy issued a stay nearly five months ago.

The case was filed under the Civil Rights Act of 1871, a Reconstruction-era law usually referred to as Section 1983, for its placement in the compilation of federal statutes. Section 1983 permits suits against government officials for violation of rights guaranteed by the Constitution or federal laws.

The lower federal courts dismissed the suit, however, on the ground that the only way for an inmate to challenge the method by which he is to be executed is through a petition for a writ of habeas corpus.

While such a petition, like a Section 1983 case, can raise constitutional issues, there is a major problem: both Congress and the Supreme Court have placed high hurdles in the path of inmates seeking habeas corpus. For example, it is almost impossible for an inmate who has filed an initial habeas corpus petition to receive permission to file another one, and Mr. Hill had filed one years earlier. Declaring that his Section 1983 suit was the equivalent of a new habeas corpus petition, the lower courts declared that it was barred.

In his opinion for the Supreme Court on Monday, Justice Kennedy said this analysis was mistaken. He said that while a habeas corpus petition was the only way to challenge the constitutionality of a sentence, Mr. Hill was challenging not his "lethal injection sentence as a general matter," but only the way in which the sentence was to be carried out.

Justice Kennedy noted that if Mr. Hill eventually won his case, Florida would not be barred from executing him by lethal injection but would simply have to use a different protocol.

Mr. Hill is now entitled to pursue his Section 1983 suit in the Federal District Court in Tallahassee, where he filed it in January.

When the case, Hill v. McDonough, No. 05-8794, was argued in April, there was considerable debate over whether Mr. Hill should be required to demonstrate his sincerity by specifying a method acceptable to him. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. was among the justices who appeared to endorse such a requirement. But the justices evidently decided to set that argument aside for now, for the sake of unanimity.

The precedent for the ruling on Monday was a 2004 decision in which the court permitted an inmate to use Section 1983 to challenge a surgical procedure that Alabama proposed to use to gain access to his collapsed veins for the purpose of administering a lethal injection.

A 'Right' Way To Kill Someone? (USAT)

By Annette Fuentes

USA Today, June 13, 2006

When North Carolina executed death row inmate John Daniels in 2003, his end was hardly quick and painless. His attorney later described the terrible scene she witnessed after Daniels received the lethal injections. Daniels started to convulse violently, then sat up and gagged. Witnesses watching through a window heard and saw him sit up and gag and choke again, his arms struggling to move. He appeared to be in pain until finally he lay down and was still.

The details of Daniels' execution and other similarly gruesome descriptions were included in a lawsuit challenging North Carolina's capital punishment method. Across the country, lethal injection executions are being challenged by death row inmates and their advocates as a violation of the Eighth Amendment's protection against cruel and unusual punishment.

DOJ_NMG_0033401

On Monday, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that a death row inmate — in this case Clarence Hill in Florida — could file a last-minute appeal to lethal injections even after all regular appeals have been exhausted. The court, however, did not rule on the use of injections.

Other executions stayed

In addition to Hill's case, nine other executions have been stayed this year because of the lethal injection issue, according to Richard Dieter of the Death Penalty Information Center, a group opposed to capital punishment. And in California, federal courts have effectively imposed a moratorium on the death penalty while that state studies the issue.

The heightened debate about lethal injections, which are used in 37 states, raises a larger question: Can there ever be a right way to execute someone?

Doctors have played a large role in the debate. A study in the medical journal Lancet found that "methods of lethal injection anesthesia are flawed, and some inmates might experience awareness and suffering during execution."

Lethal injections usually use a three-drug combination: sodium thiopental, an anesthesia to induce unconsciousness, pancuronium bromide to cause paralysis and potassium chloride to stop the heart. If the anesthesia isn't administered in a sufficient dose, the person could be conscious when the painful final shot is given.

In the Lancet study, the physicians reviewed blood tests from 49 inmates executed in Arizona, Georgia, North Carolina and South Carolina and found that in 43, the anesthesia level was lower than that used for surgery. In 21 instances, the amount of anesthesia was "consistent with awareness." The authors concluded, "It is possible that some of these inmates were fully aware during their executions. We certainly cannot conclude that these inmates were unconscious and insensate. However, with no monitoring and with use of the paralytic agent, any suffering of the inmate would be undetectable."

But here's a Catch-22 for states. The best person to guarantee that an inmate is fully unconscious is a physician, who must follow the Hippocratic oath to "do no harm." The American Medical Association's ethical guidelines prohibit physicians from participating in executions, except to pronounce death afterward.

A California judge stumbled on this problem in the case of death row inmate Michael Morales, who challenged his lethal injection execution on the ground that it violates the Eighth Amendment. U.S. District Court Judge Jeremy Fogel ordered the state to employ two anesthesiologists. But the doctors refused to participate. Morales' execution has been put on hold until a September hearing.

The debate about lethal injections and doctors' role might pose important medical questions about the least painful method to kill a human. But, in the end, no method can be humane. While the doctors' revolt against assisting in executions is worthy, it should only serve to spotlight the barbarity of the death penalty.

Moratorium stirred reviews

Six years ago, then-Illinois governor George Ryan made headlines by imposing a moratorium on executions after revelations that innocent people were on death row in his state. Ryan's action deserves to be front and center again in our public discussion of crime and punishment. When the Illinois moratorium was enacted, it caused many states to reconsider their death penalty laws. New Jersey now has a moratorium. Kansas' death penalty law was declared unconstitutional. Americans reacted viscerally to the idea that innocent people could not only be imprisoned for crimes they didn't commit, they could also be executed for them.

According to the federal Bureau of Justice Statistics, the number of death sentences imposed each year has dropped dramatically from 1999 through 2004 — from 276 to 125. One reason is juries are giving more life sentences. Our collective appetite for retribution has diminished. Public support for capital punishment has plummeted from 80% in 1994 to 65% this year, according to a Gallup poll.

With Monday's Supreme Court ruling, more states will grapple with the constitutionality of lethal injections. Just as the Ryan moratorium and the innocence issue exposed one weakness of the death penalty system, lethal injections have spotlighted yet another.

It seems inevitable, and just, that slowly but surely capital punishment will come tumbling down under the weight of its own injustices, uselessness and immorality.

Annette Fuentes is adjunct professor at the Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism.

Ex-FBI Agent Tells Of '81 Probe (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, June 13, 2006

Agency was wary of Bulger, he says

DOJ_NMG_0033402

A retired FBI official who has been critical of the agency's handling of gangsters James ``Whitey" Bulger and Stephen ``The Rifleman" Flemmi testified yesterday that the FBI coined a phrase for agents who got too cozy with their informants: ``Going native."

Robert Fitzpatrick , who taught a course for FBI agents on the psychology of informants, said ``going native" is when an agent becomes friends with an informant, loses objectivity, and ``might be sharing information they shouldn't."

In fact, Fitzpatrick said, when he arrived as second-in-command of the FBI's Boston office in 1981, there was a high-level, internal investigation underway into whether Bulger's FBI handlers had leaked him information that compromised a State Police investigation of Bulger and other underworld leaders.

Fitzpatrick wasn't asked whether there were concerns in the FBI in the 1980s that Bulger's handlers were ``going native."

Fitzpatrick was called to testify yesterday in US District Court in Boston in a $50 million wrongful death suit that the family of Quincy fisherman John McIntyre has filed against the government. He's expected to resume testifying today. McIntyre's mother, Emily, and brother, Christopher, assert the government was negligent because of the FBI's mishandling of Bulger and Flemmi.

Last week, Flemmi testified that he and Bulger killed McIntyre on Nov. 30, 1984, because their handler, former FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr., warned them that McIntyre was cooperating against them. McIntyre had been involved in an unsuccessful plot by Bulger and his associates to ship seven tons of weapons to the outlawed Irish Republican Army and began cooperating with the US Customs Service and the FBI about six weeks before his slaying.

Connolly is serving a 10-year sentence for his 2002 racketeering conviction. He was found guilty of warning Bulger to flee just before the gangster's 1995 indictment on racketeering and extortion charges. Bulger remains a fugitive.

Fitzpatrick, who served as special agent-in-charge of the FBI's Boston office from 1981 to 1986, said the FBI's priority at the time was targeting members of La Cosa Nostra, commonly known as the Mafia. Cultivating organized crime informants was critical to that mission, he said.

Fitzpatrick testified that he was advised in 1981 by the top agent in the FBI's Boston office ``that he was handling an internal investigation that was sensitive, confidential, and handled at the highest level," involving a dispute between the State Police and the FBI over Bulger.

The State Police had been bugging a garage on Lancaster Street, near the old Boston Garden, where Bulger did business with drug dealers, bookmakers, and local Mafia leaders. But, when Bulger abruptly stopped talking inside the building, the State Police, who suspected Bulger was an FBI informant, accused the FBI of tipping off the gangster.

``The accusation was that Bulger was getting and giving information against their investigation," Fitzpatrick said.

In his testimony last week, Flemmi said the tip had actually come from retired Massachusetts State Police lieutenant Richard Schneiderhan , who was convicted in 2003 of obstruction of justice. Schneiderhan was found guilty of warning a Bulger associate in 1999 that the FBI was monitoring the telephones of Bulger's brothers, William and John, in a bid to capture the fugitive gangster.

Flemmi is serving a life sentence for killing McIntyre and nine other people. He began cooperating with the government three years ago .

Though Bulger has been touted as a valuable informant, Fitzpatrick said, Bulger ``wasn't giving us information he could have been giving us."

FBI Knew Agents Had Mob Pals (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet

Boston Herald, June 13, 2006

The FBI called it “going native” - a humiliating label for G-men who became enamored of their mobster informants.

G-men like John “Zip” Connolly. Top-echelon rats like James “Whitey” Bulger and Stephen “The Rifleman” Flemmi.

“We used to call it ‘going native’ - an agent who would perhaps become friends with the informant and not be as objective as he should be. I heard it. More than once,” said Robert Fitzpatrick, former second-in-command of the FBI’s Boston office, who testified yesterday in U.S. District Court.

In fact, said Fitzpatrick, when he came to Boston in 1981, he heard a lot of talk by then-Special-Agent-in-Charge Lawrence Sarhatt about agents suspected of turning rotten.

Fitzpatrick is a defendant in the $50 million wrongful-death lawsuit filed against the FBI by the family of John McIntyre, 32, of Quincy, a government witness Bulger and Flemmi tortured and murdered in 1984. The civil trial is now in its second week.

Last week, Flemmi testified it was Connolly, his former handler, who tipped off him and Bulger that a crewman on the fishing boat Valhalla was going to tell the feds their gang tried to ship guns to the Irish Republican Army. Flemmi and Bulger tricked McIntyre into admitting he was the snitch and then shot him to death. His body was not found for 16 years.

McIntyre's mother, Emily McIntyre, 77, openly sobbed as she appeared in court for the first time yesterday.

Fitzpatrick said it was "a high priority" of the FBI to keep the identities of informants, also known as 137s, confidential for the sake of their well-being.

It was expected of agents, he said, that "You adhere to the law, you adhere to the guidelines and you do what is correct and true."

Police Seek Suspect In Shooting Of Nevada Judge, Later Slaying Across Town (LAW/AP)

By Scott Sonner, The Associated Press

AP, June 13, 2006

A family court judge was shot and wounded as he stood near a third-floor courthouse window Monday, and police were looking for man suspected in a slaying across town who had appeared before the judge in a divorce case.

Investigators said Darren Roy Mack, a suspect in a killing reported at a Reno, Nev., apartment building was a "person of interest" in the shooting at the courthouse earlier in the day, Reno Deputy Police Chief Jim Johns said.

Judge Chuck Weller was hit in the chest around midday by a shot or shots that came through his office window at the Mills B. Lane Justice Center, and police sealed off the area and searched nearby parking garages for a sniper.

Police also reported that a bomb-sniffing dog had alerted officers to the judge's car in the court's parking garage and that a bomb squad was investigating.

Weller, 53, was taken by ambulance to a hospital, where he was reported in serious but stable condition.

"He is conscious and talking with his family," police spokesman Steve Frady said.

Mack, a Reno businessman, had a connection to both the judge and the family court, through a recent divorce case, Johns said.

"We do not have enough information to say he is a suspect" in the shooting of Weller, Johns said.

"He had recent dealings with the judge and the family court section. ... It is an obvious connection we are obviously going to investigate," he said.

The victim in the homicide had not been identified.

Weller was shot in the chest "at least once" by a "high velocity projectile, possibly a rifle," Johns said.

Judge Is Hurt In Shooting At A Court In Nevada (NYT)

By Kathryn Reed

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

RENO, Nev., June 12 — A family court judge standing at a third floor window of his downtown court building here was shot in the chest shortly before noon on Monday.

The police said that the judge, Chuck Weller, 53, who was elected to the bench in 2004, was conscious and speaking to family members.

Darren R. Mack, who owns Palace Jewelry and Loan downtown, was sought by the authorities in a killing on Monday at an apartment in Reno as well as for questioning in Judge Weller's shooting.

Deputy Police Chief Jim Johns said Mr. Mack "had recent dealings with the judge and court."

"The suspect," Chief Johns said, "is known to have access to firearms."

Court documents show that a hearing in a contested divorce between Mr. Mack and Charla M. Mack is scheduled for Sept. 7 before Judge Weller.

The case involves children.

The police would not release the name of the victim of the homicide or the victim's relationship to Mr. Mack.

Chief Johns said it was possible that the judge was shot before the homicide was called in at 3 p.m.

Judge Weller was shot one to five times, Chief Johns said.

The judge was listed in serious to critical condition at the Washoe Medical Center.

His family requested that no further information be released.

The authorities would not speculate on a motive, though they said family court cases could be volatile.

"We are looking into his caseload and past cases," a spokesman for the police, Steve Frady, said.

Mr. Frady said he was not aware of threats against Judge Weller.

Also injured in the shooting, at 11:15, was a woman, whose identity remained unclear.

The woman had superficial wounds to the left arm, left neck area and right hip, Mr. Frady said, although it was not known what had struck her. Mr. Frady said he did not know whether the hospital had admitted her.

DOJ_NMG_0033404

Floyd Pearson of Lake Head, Calif., said he and his partner pulled into a parking garage structure about 500 yards across the Truckee River from the courthouse about 11:10 and had just locked their vehicle when a sound startled them.

"We heard a very large noise," Mr. Pearson said. "I thought a big transformer blew up. I didn't see anyone outside."

Boyd Cox, who owns Antiques and Treasures, said he locked his store's doors for hours because he is close to the courthouse.

"I didn't want anyone to come in and take hostages," Mr. Cox said.

He fed the 20 people in his shop hot dogs and sodas.

Mr. Frady said some nearby buildings were evacuated, while people in other buildings across a three-by-five-block area cordoned off by police tape were told to remain inside.

Officers scoured the area for clues. Mr. Frady did not say whether any had been found.

Official Convicted In Travel Deal (MJS)

By Steve Schultze Sschultze@journalsentienl.com

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, June 13, 2006

She acted on own, Doyle says, but case may be election issue

A federal jury on Monday convicted a state procurement official of fixing a travel contract for a contributor to Gov. Jim Doyle's campaign, adding a potentially explosive issue to the race for governor this fall.

Doyle and his top aides stressed that the two felony convictions represented an isolated instance.

"It is clear that Georgia Thompson acted on her own, and that no other state employee was involved," Doyle said in a statement.

"As I have stated before, I have zero tolerance for ethical lapses in government. When public servants abuse the public's trust, they forfeit their rights to continue in the state's employ."

Thompson will likely be fired, pending a required review of her case, Doyle officials said.

U.S. Attorney Steven Biskupic said after the verdict that the case was about "Georgia Thompson and Georgia Thompson alone." She was found guilty of manipulating the travel bidding to "cause political advantage for her supervisors" and bolster her own job security.

Biskupic said the team that investigated the case, which included him, Attorney General Peg Lautenschlager and Dane County District Attorney Brian Blanchard, would meet soon to discuss matters.

He declined to say whether any other Doyle administration officials or others would now be targeted.

"I don't want people to read too much into it, other than we are trying to be careful in what we do," said Biskupic, an appointee of President Bush's.

Like Doyle, Lautenschlager and Blanchard are Democrats.

Steve Bablitch, Doyle's top government aide, said at the federal courthouse in Milwaukee that his own in-house inquiry into what Republicans dubbed "Travelgate" found no evidence that any of Thompson's bosses at the Administration Department urged her to steer a $750,000 contract to Adelman Travel Group of Glendale last year. Doyle canceled the contract after Thompson's indictment in January.

State Republican Party Chairman Rick Graber, however, was quick to go on the attack. He said Thompson's trial "showed how far this administration is willing to go to reward political cronies and campaign donors."

U.S. Rep. Mark Green, Doyle's Republican opponent, refrained from direct criticism of Doyle and renewed his support for a ban on campaign contributions from officials of companies seeking state contracts. No 'play for pay' allegations

The case against Thompson, 56, of Waunakee, did not include any direct allegations of "pay to play" - that the contract was a reward for contributions. Still, Biskupic noted in court Monday that the thousands of dollars given by Adelman executives around the time the contract was awarded were part of an overall picture.

Adelman executives donated $20,000 to Doyle's campaign in the months around the March 2005 contract award.

Graber said Doyle owes voters a better explanation of his involvement and that of Marc Marotta, the former administration secretary who is Doyle's re-election campaign chairman. Marotta said last week that he would be out of the country on business Monday and unreachable for comment.

Testimony at the trial showed that Doyle and Marotta had separate meetings with Adelman executives before the contract was awarded, and that Marotta's office was in phone contact with Adelman officials when key issues on the contract were being decided.

Bablitch, however, said no evidence was presented "that the governor had anything to do with this."

He predicted that the case would have little impact on voters, who he said would pay more attention to Doyle's record on cutting the state deficit without raising taxes, improving education and improving the state's business climate.

DOJ_NMG_0033405

Charles Franklin, a University of Wisconsin-Madison political scientist, said the trial could contribute to a perception problem for Doyle.

"I think Doyle has a problem in that tainted money has been coming up for him repeatedly," Franklin said. "Some of that has been fair and some of that hasn't been fair, but politics isn't about fair."

Franklin said any damage was minimized in that nothing in the trial implicated Doyle or any of his political appointees.

Thompson was a civil service hire in 2001 under then-Republican Gov. Scott McCallum. She has been described as somewhat apolitical. She testified that no one pressured her to help Adelman win the contract and that the process employed to select Adelman saved the state money.

Thompson appeared shaken after the verdict and declined to speak to reporters. Her attorney, Stephen Hurley, also would not comment on the outcome. Biskupic said he expected Hurley to appeal the convictions.

Thompson's sentencing was scheduled for Sept. 22. She faces up to 20 years in prison, but federal guidelines will likely recommend a far lesser term, Biskupic said.

During closing arguments Monday, Biskupic labeled Thompson a liar.

"She lied; we know she lied," Biskupic said, noting that Thompson's story in court differed from what several prosecution witnesses recalled her saying.

Thompson used political considerations to alter the process to steer the contract to Adelman, according to Biskupic. Although she was one of seven members of a committee that evaluated proposals, she engineered a move to take "best and final" offers that resulted in a reversal of the outcome, Biskupic said. No charges against Adelman

Omega World Travel of Fairfax, Va., had initially scored higher than Adelman.

"It couldn't have worked better (for Adelman) if they had had one of their own employees on that committee," Biskupic told jurors.

No one from Adelman has been charged in the case.

Hurley said no direct evidence proving Thompson had rigged the contract had been presented at her trial, which began a week ago before U.S. District Judge Rudolph Randa.

Several witnesses testified that after Omega appeared to be the winning bidder, Thompson said that would pose political problems. She also feared having to tell her bosses the winner wasn't Adelman and that the result should be different, according to trial testimony.

Hurley said none of those witnesses, however, could remember exactly what was said. State travel consultant Ian Thomas, who testified that Thompson had said, "I don't know how I'm going to tell my bosses it's not Adelman," later testified that Thompson might have said something about wanting a "local company" to win the contract.

The prosectors' case against Thompson boiled down to "bits and pieces" that misinterpreted events in the most damning light, Hurley said. A common-sense reading of all the facts presented shows she was not guilty, Hurley said.

"Proof is required, not a suspicion," he said.

Doyle campaign aide Anson Kaye said Monday that Doyle would not return the Adelman contributions because only Thompson was involved in wrongdoing.

Patrick Marley and Jesse Garza of the Journal Sentinel staff contributed to this report.

From the June 13, 2006 editions of the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel

Have an opinion on this story? Write a letter to the editor or start an online forum.

Subscribe today and receive 4 weeks free! Sign up now.

Jury Convicts Wisonsin Official Of Fraud (STPPP)

By Ryan J. Foley

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, June 13, 2006

MILWAUKEE - Jurors convicted a state purchasing official of fraud charges Monday, agreeing with federal prosecutors that she illegally steered a contract to a company with ties to Gov. Jim Doyle.

Jurors found Georgia Thompson guilty of causing a misapplication of state funds and participating in a scheme to defraud the state. The charges carry up to 20 years in prison, but prosecutors said she would receive less.

Prosecutors accused Thompson, a Department of Administration purchasing supervisor, of steering a contract to book state travel to Adelman Travel Group last year.

The firm's CEO gave $10,000 to Doyle before and after winning the contract, worth an estimated $750,000. Prosecutors used e-mails and other records to paint a cozy relationship between Doyle's administration and Adelman.

But Thompson, a 56-year-old civil servant who took the stand in her own defense, contended she was under no pressure from Doyle aides to give the contract to Adelman and was unaware of the campaign donations.

She showed no emotion when the verdict was read, but two of her supporters in the gallery broke into tears.

Thompson and her lawyer, Stephen Hurley, declined comment as they left the courtroom.

Sentencing was scheduled for Sept. 22.

The state Republican Party said the case was evidence that Doyle, a Democrat running for re-election, rewarded campaign contributors with state work. Doyle has denied those claims.

Doyle has acknowledged being longtime friends with the Adelman family. The governor canceled the contract after Thompson was indicted but has retained the campaign contributions from Adelman and an additional $10,000 from a Milwaukee businessman on the company's board.

He issued a statement Monday saying trial testimony and evidence showed Thompson "acted on her own and that no other state employee was involved."

Witness: City Aide Told Me To Lie (CHIST)

By NATASHA KORECKI, STEVE WARMBIR AND FRAN SPIELMAN, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, June 13, 2006

A Mayor Daley press aide told a deputy commissioner to lie to the public and say the city hired a 19-year-old building inspector without knowing he was the son of a clout-heavy union official, a witness testified in the City Hall hiring trial Monday.

The deputy commissioner, Christopher Kozicki, a onetime secretary in John Daley's 11th Ward political organization, also testified Monday that the FBI asked him about John Daley in three different interviews, leading a defense lawyer to call Daley a "mooch" who bummed rides off of people.

Also, prosecutors said they plan to call City Corporation Counsel Mara Georges to the stand today to ask her about 2005 interviews with Robert Sorich and Tim McCarthy, who are now on trial. At the time, Georges questioned them about the Office of Intergovernmental Affairs' role in city hiring, prosecutors say.

In September 2004, Sun-Times columnist Carol Marin reported that Andy Ryan, 19, was hired as a building inspector even though the city requires all inspectors to have completed a four-year apprenticeship and have two years work experience. Ryan is the son of Tom Ryan, the secretary-treasurer of Carpenters Local 13. The union was Mayor Daley's largest campaign contributor in 2003.

Kozicki testified that Breelyn Pete, former spokeswoman for the city Buildings and Procurement Services Department, told Kozicki to tell the press he didn't know about Ryan's connections.

"You were given orders to effectively lie to the press?" defense lawyer Tom Durkin asked.

Kozicki said yes.

'I never advised him to lie'

Durkin represents Daley patronage chief Sorich, on trial along with his IGA assistant McCarthy and two others for allegedly rigging the city's hiring system to give jobs to political favorites.

Reached Monday, Pete flatly denied the accusation.

"He was told by me? Never at any time did that conversation take place," said Pete, who left City Hall to join the Children's Museum. "I never advised him to lie to the media or to anyone else about Andy Ryan and his father."

At the time, the mayor blamed then-Building Commissioner Stan Kaderbek for the hiring. In a sidebar outside of the jury's presence, Durkin referenced a "damage control" meeting suggesting higher-ups steered the decision to lie about Ryan. The mayor's chief of staff, press secretary, Kaderbek and Georges, were among those in attendance, Durkin said.

"It was decided that Kozicki would tell the press that story," Durkin said.

Kozicki wasn't present for that alleged conversation and couldn't testify to it. Prosecutors want to block Durkin from asking Georges today about that alleged conversation.

While prosecutors called Kozicki to the stand, they treated him as a "hostile witness" saying he all along said that IGA, Timothy McCarthy, former Daley aide John Doerrer and Kaderbek were all involved in rigging Ryan's hiring. Kozicki later testified though that Kaderbek was the "driving force" behind the hiring.

Prosecutors said he "exaggerated the role of Kaderbek ... and minimized the role of IGA in hiring generally ... in a manner inconsistent with his previous grand jury testimony." He did it, Assistant U.S. Attorney Philip Guentert suggested in questioning, to take the blame off his friend and fellow 11th warder McCarthy. But Kozicki lawyer Ted Poulos said his client has been consistent in his dealings with the government all along.

John Daley called a ride 'mooch'

Meanwhile, Durkin suggested that prosecutors questioned Kozicki because they "wanted to try to indict Mayor Daley and his brother John based on this evidence," and asked if prosecutors were trying to link John Daley to criminal activity. Kozicki said he was asked about John Daley during three different interviews. He acknowledged he sometimes drove John Daley downtown if he asked for a ride and that Daley helped him get his job with the city. A source with knowledge of Kozicki's government interviews said their questions about John Daley were innocuous.

DOJ_NMG_0033407

Kozicki agreed when Durkin asked if Daley was just a "mooch" who asked other people -- including Sorich -- for rides.

"Did John Daley in your rides downtown ever attempt to influence the performance of your official duties?" Durkin asked.

"No," he said.

Witness: FBI Asked About Mayor's Brother (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush And Dan Mihalopoulos, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, June 13, 2006

Three times this year, federal prosecutors have questioned a high-ranking city official and prominent member of the 11th Ward Democratic Organization about Mayor Richard Daley's brother, John Daley, it was revealed in court Monday.

Witness Christopher Kozicki, a former managing deputy in the Buildings Deparment, did not detail what prosecutors wanted to know about Cook County Commissioner John Daley as he testified in the trial of the mayor's former patronage chief, Robert Sorich.

But Sorich's attorney, Thomas Anthony Durkin, suggested to Kozicki that prosecutors "wanted to try to indict Mayor Daley and his brother John." U.S. District Judge David Coar sustained prosecutors' objections to that and similar questions.

Prosecutors charge that Sorich and three other former city officials rigged hiring and promotions for many blue-collar city jobs in favor of people who campaigned for groups loyal to the mayor.

The trial has put a spotlight on the mayor's administration and included testimony from several current and former top city officials. The prosecution could call City Corporation Counsel Mara Georges as early as Tuesday.

John Daley's name surfaced as prosecutors sought to treat Kozicki, whom they called to the stand, as a hostile witness.

Prosecutors were surprised by Kozicki's testimony last week that former Buildings Commissioner Stan Kaderbek, and not the mayor's office, was mainly responsible for the 2004 hiring of a young, unqualified building inspector. The testimony Thursday deviated from a sworn statement Kozicki made in February, prosecutors charged.

Prosecutors allege that pressure from Sorich aide Timothy McCarthy and another top Office of Intergovernmental Affairs official prompted the hiring of Andrew Ryan, then 19.

Ryan was hired because his father is a top official in Carpenters' Union Local 13 and despite his lack of experience, Kozicki testified. He said he rigged a job interview to ensure Ryan's hiring.

Kozicki received immunity from prosecution for his cooperation with the government.

But Kozicki's testimony last week was "entirely consistent" with defense arguments in the trial, prosecutors asserted in a court filing Monday.

"Kozicki exaggerated the role of Kaderbek in the hiring of Andrew Ryan and minimized the role of [Intergovernmental Affairs] in hiring generally," prosecutors charged.

Back in court Monday, Kozicki insisted that he has consistently told prosecutors that Kaderbek was the "driving force" behind Ryan's hiring.

Prosecutors suggested that Kozicki's political allegiances colored his testimony. Assistant U.S. Atty. Philip Guentert asked Kozicki about those connections on the stand, particularly his work as secretary to the Democratic organization in the Daley family's traditional 11th Ward power base. John Daley leads the 11th Ward Democratic Organization, whose members include Sorich and McCarthy, a co-defendant.

Kozicki acknowledged that, like Sorich, he used to drive John Daley from his home in the Bridgeport neighborhood to his office downtown.

"While you were working for John Daley, that was also one of your responsibilities?" Guentert asked.

"It was not a responsibility, but I did it," Kozicki responded.

On cross-examination, Kozicki said he would give John Daley a ride whenever he asked and Kozicki happened to be leaving for work at the same time.

"John Daley's kind of a mooch in that regard?" Durkin asked.

"Yes," Kozicki said.

The hiring of Ryan and another unqualified son of a union official embarrassed the Daley administration. Officials fired Ryan and the other building inspector in September 2004, contending publicly that they had been duped into hiring them.

After the scandal broke, Kozicki said, Buildings Department spokeswoman Breelyn Pete instructed him to tell reporters that he was unaware Ryan's father was a top union official.

"You were given orders to effectively lie to the press?" Durkin asked.

"Yes," Kozicki replied.

DOJ_NMG_0033408

Pete, who is now vice president at the Chicago Children's Museum, said when reached by telephone that she never gave Kozicki that instruction.

Kozicki recently was reassigned to a high-level post in the city Planning Department.

After his testimony, jurors heard from a man who said he unsuccessfully applied for the building inspector openings in 2004. Jeffrey Harness said the city rejected him for the $50,000-a-year post despite a résumé that listed 17 years of experience in the building trades and familiarity with the city building code.

Harness later told reporters that he was "a little angry" that he was passed over in favor of a teenager.

"At that age, you're not really qualified to be in a position where people's lives are at stake," Harness said.

Also Monday, a former city computer technician testified that he removed a program from Sorich's laptop computer in 2002. The program tracked city job seekers by their race and political affiliation, according to witness Ben Campney.

He said he created the program after Daley was elected mayor in 1989 at the request of top Daley political aide Timothy Degnan.

Campney said that, during a 2002 meeting in Sorich's office, he deleted the program and its files from Sorich's laptop at his request.

"Robert joked that, after this was over, we would throw the hard drives in Lake Michigan," Campney said.

Campney testified that he did not talk about the 2002 meeting with Sorich when federal investigators first interviewed him last year. He only told them about it in April.

"I felt it was the right thing to do," Campney said.

Under cross-examination by Durkin, Campney said he did not deliberately lie to authorities in his first meeting with them but had 'needed more time to think about it.'"

rrbush@tribune.com

dmihalopoulos@tribune.com

Former West Mifflin Police Chief Pleads Guilty To Drug Charges (PPG)

By Jonathan D. Silver And Paula Reed Ward, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, June 13, 2006

New complaint accuses him of theft

Former West Mifflin Police Chief Frank Diener pleaded guilty yesterday to federal drug charges and was presented with a new 19-count criminal complaint from the Allegheny County district attorney's office alleging that he created a slush fund and stole thousands of dollars of borough and private property.

The complaint and affidavit against Mr. Diener, 57, of Saniel Drive in West Mifflin, also accuses him of obstructing investigations, peddling guns and voiding traffic tickets.

Investigators allege the crimes took place from 1994 to 2006, while Mr. Diener was chief. The complaint stems from an 18-month investigation by the state police organized crime unit and the FBI.

Over the years, according to the complaint, Mr. Diener stole a range of items, including a video poker machine, two trailers, tools, a generator, a pair of police computers, borough shredders and ammunition.

Police also said Mr. Diener took possession of a piece of excavation equipment called a skid loader and sold a deceased officer's pistol to a Munhall man without completing the proper paperwork.

Mr. Diener created a $4,962 slush fund in 2000 by fabricating a portion of an order for bulletproof vests, investigators said. He used the money to buy guns and equipment for himself and other West Mifflin police officers, according to the complaint.

The district attorney's office said the investigation is continuing and will result in more arrests.

Mr. Diener was arraigned yesterday and held on $5,000 straight bond for the county charges. A preliminary hearing was scheduled for Thursday.

Mr. Diener and his attorney, Robert Stewart, declined comment in federal court, where Mr. Diener pleaded guilty to possession with intent to distribute cocaine, possession with intent to distribute marijuana and obstruction of justice.

According to Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen S. Stallings, Mr. Diener was caught stealing drugs from his department's evidence room when several cooperating witnesses made undercover recordings.

U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said prosecutors are not aware of any cases from West Mifflin being compromised by the theft of the drugs from the evidence locker.

"This is not a reflection of the West Mifflin Police Department as a whole," state police Maj. Frank Monaco said.

The former chief also pleaded guilty to instructing witnesses to lie and destroy evidence.

DOJ_NMG_0033409

On March 9, when Mr. Diener learned that there was an ongoing FBI investigation, he gave a paint can containing 25 grams of cocaine and 387 grams of marijuana to one of the cooperating witnesses so it wouldn't be found in any search of his home, Mr. Stallings said.

Eight days later, when the witness asked Mr. Diener what he should do with the drugs, the chief told him to destroy them, Mr. Stallings said.

Mr. Diener is to be sentenced Oct. 13 on the federal charges.

In October, Mr. Diener resigned following a series of suspensions over allegations that he used a borough vehicle for personal reasons, allowed officers without proper qualifications to carry firearms and engaged in conduct unbecoming a law enforcement officer.

Former Police Chief Pleads Guilty To Drug Charges (PTR)

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, June 13, 2006

Former West Mifflin police Chief Frank Diener plead guilty in federal court Monday on two felony drug charges and one count of obstruction of justice.

Immediately following his appearance before U.S. District Judge Joy Flowers Conti, Diener, 58, of West Mifflin, was taken by Pennsylvania State Police officers to Pittsburgh Municipal Court where he was arraigned on 19 state charges, including theft by deception.

Investigators said in court paperwork that Diener took numerous items -- including a video gambling machine, narcotics, tools, firearms and ammunition -- from the police department and its evidence room.

Investigators also contend that Diener instructed officers to fix cases. He resigned the chief's post in October 2005.

Diener is scheduled to be sentenced Oct. 13 in U.S. District court. Diener's preliminary hearing on the state charges is scheduled for Thursday before Brookline District Judge Charles McLaughlin. Robert Stewart, Diener's attorney, said that hearing will likely be postponed.

Suburban Pittsburgh Police Chief Pleads Guilty To Drug Charges (TLPA)

Times Leader (NE PA), June 13, 2006

PITTSBURGH - A suburban police chief who resigned after being repeatedly suspended pleaded guilty Monday to federal drug charges.

Former West Mifflin Police Chief Frank Diener, 57, pleaded guilty to possession of cocaine and marijuana with intent to distribute as well as obstruction of justice, U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said.

Diener resigned in October after being suspended for using a borough vehicle for personal reasons and allowing officers to carry firearms without proper qualifications.

He faces a maximum penalty of 35 years in prison and a fine of as much as $1.75 million when he is sentenced October 13.

Two Sentenced For Fraudulent Gold-silver Sales Scam (MH)

By Roberto Santiago

The Miami Herald, June 13, 2006

They claimed to handle gold and silver, but after Monday, the only metal objects these two convicted Broward con artists could be seeing are iron prison bars.

Charles Paul Hoffecker, 53, of Pompano Beach and Charles Edward Meyers, 66, of Fort Lauderdale could face up to 10 years in federal prison when they are sentenced June 19 before U.S. District Judge Katherine Hayden in Newark.

Their sentencing caps nearly a 10-year investigation that was scripted like a Hollywood caper movie. The scam, similar to the plot of the 2000 film Boiler Room, involved smooth-talking salesmen who ran an elaborate telemarketing scheme from rented offices around the country, with the largest operation in Fort Lauderdale.

Authorities, who cracked the case by setting up their own phony boiler room in New Jersey, said the hustlers ultimately fleeced more than 1,000 investors across the nation out of more than $14 million.

Four victims who testified at the trial said they were bilked of anywhere from $40,000 to $120,000.

The duo claimed they ran Amitex Investment Services Ltd., a Bahamian company that bought and stored precious commodities like gold and silver.

Amitex was actually a one-room office in the Bahamas. The money-generating sales pitches were done in boiler rooms they ran in New York, Nevada, California, Georgia and Florida, according to New Jersey's Robert Kirsch, an assistant U.S. attorney who helped prosecute the case.

DOJ_NMG_0033410

"The largest Amitex boiler room was located in Fort Lauderdale on Commercial Boulevard," said Kirsch, who said the operation was in an office.

A boiler room is a base of operations from which con artists run phony telemarketing schemes from a secret location -- often a rented office or basement in a home -- where they set up a bank of telephones and make cold calls.

The two were found guilty in March after a three-month jury trial. They were each convicted on several counts of mail and wire fraud.

Since the conviction, Hoffecker has been held in the Passaic County jail.

Myers is being transported to Newark from the Miami Correctional Facility by the U.S. Marshal Service.

As part of a deal, Meyers was allowed to return to his home in Fort Lauderdale, under 24-hour house arrest, to await sentencing.

He was taken into custody after authorities learned that he sold his house.

The two had been the focus of a lengthy investigation by the FBI and U.S. Postal Inspection Service that started in 1996.

To nab them, the FBI and postal officials set up their own faux boiler room -- called Commodities Investors Corp. -- in 1997 in East Brunswick, N.J..

A press release from New Jersey Attorney's office said that Hoffecker tried to ``recruit the operators of CIC to sell the Amitex investment."

The two were indicted in 2003 and had a trial that ended in a hung jury in 2004.

Retried this year, they were found guilty three months ago.

Hoffecker got into the phony offshore commodities sales business after he was banned in 1991 from selling commodities on credit in the United States by a U.S. District judge in Florida.

He built a fortune using smooth-talking, unscrupulous telemarketers.

"Hoffecker and Meyers are experienced in telemarketing and they knew well that most -- if not the overwhelming majority of those -- that are called with regards to promoting these sorts of investments hang up," Kirsch said.

"But they also know that a percentage, however small, who are most vulnerable and most naive, fall prey to smooth-talking fraudsters," Kirsch said.

FBI Eyes Purported Tape Of American Teen's West Bank Boyfriend (FINDLAW/AP)

By Brian Charlton, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 13, 2006

(AP) - CARO, Michigan-The FBI and local investigators said Monday that they are interested in a television station's tape of a purported interview with a West Bank man who says he paid for a 16-year-old American girl to fly to the Middle East after meeting her on the internet.

Katherine R. Lester disappeared June 5 from her home in rural Michigan. After the FBI helped track her to the airport in Amman, Jordan, U.S authorities persuaded her to board a return flight. She returned home Friday night.

Authorities have said the girl apparently planned to visit a man who describes himself as a 25-year-old from Jericho on his account with MySpace.com, a social networking Web site where the two met.

WNEM-TV in Saginaw broadcast a telephone interview with a man who said he actually was 20 and only identified himself as Abdullah.

In the interview Saturday, he said he was a wealthy businessman who met Lester online seven months ago. He said he wanted to marry her and sent her money for a plane ticket to visit him.

The station said it got the man's MySpace identity from Lester's sister, Mary, who found it on a computer they share. WNEM said it messaged him on MySpace and asked him for his cell phone number for an interview.

The Associated Press also messaged him and called the number, but he declined comment.

"We're aware of the existence of the tape," Tuscola County sheriff's Sgt. Michael Pine said. "We're talking to the FBI. It's part of the investigation."

Neither he nor FBI spokesman Terry Booth would say whether they had requested the tape from the station or whether they believed the man was who he said he was.

"I haven't seen the tape, so I can't comment on the accuracy," Booth said from Detroit.

Authorities were trying to determine whether any laws were broken. The age of sexual consent in Michigan is 16.

The girl was in seclusion to escape the attention surrounding her travels, an attorney for the girl's family said Monday.

"Katherine does not want the media attention. The parents don't want the media attention on their daughter," lawyer Renee Wood said.

DOJ_NMG_0033411

Tuscola County Sheriff Tom Kern said the girl did not want to return home when authorities approached her at the airport in Amman, but once they realized she was 16 and her mother wanted her back, they seized her passport.

MySpace.com, owned by News Corp., has more than 72 million members that lets users post photos, Web logs and journals. Its popularity with teenagers has raised concerns, and there have been scattered accounts of sexual predators targeting minors they met through the site.

GPS Will Track Sex Offenders (WT)

By Nathan Bomey

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

Sex offenders in Virginia will be monitored more closely via Global Positioning System (GPS) technology and an upgraded registry, state officials announced yesterday.

The changes that are to take effect July 1 will broaden the number of offenders eligible to be listed in the statewide online registry. The names and photos of nonviolent sex offenders will be accessible, expanding the registry to about 13,000 names.

Two similar bills making their way through the General Assembly would authorize administrative personnel and state troopers to help monitor sex offenders and enforce state law, Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell said in an interview yesterday.

Technological upgrades and the hiring of about 50 troopers and six administrative workers to maintain the registry would cost about $10.5 million, said Mr. McDonnell, a Republican.

The revamped registry Web site, (sex-offender.vsp.virginia.gov), is maintained by the Virginia State Police and allows users to locate the residences of offenders on a map. Its search engine can sort by city, county, ZIP code and name.

The list of offenses that require a criminal's name to be in the registry will be expanded to include, for example, those convicted of possessing child pornography on the first offense.

"There's dramatic new resources going into monitoring these offenders, so we know exactly where they are," Mr. McDonnell said. "And we think it's going to work more accurately with these new resources employed."

The changes come after Gov. Timothy M. Kaine in April signed a dozen bills aimed at cracking down on sexual predators.

GPS technology will be used to track sex offenders convicted of major crimes from three years to life after they are released from prison. Offenders who fail to register promptly will have to wear a tracking bracelet.

Mr. McDonnell said GPS technology is ready to be used in law enforcement. "It has been used in your golf cart and your car for about 10 years for commercial purposes," he said.

Col. W. Steven Flaherty, superintendent of the Virginia State Police, said the "opportunity to track these people in their neighborhoods" is invaluable.

"We have more people paying attention, making sure that people who have to register are registering accurately and that they aren't in places where they shouldn't be," Col. Flaherty said.

Improvements In Registry Announced (WP)

By Jamie Stockwell

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

Upgrades have been made to Virginia's online sex offender registry, including mapping features that allow users to pinpoint where offenders live and work in their neighborhoods, officials said yesterday.

The enhancements, part of a $10.5 million effort to improve the registry, were announced in Richmond at a news conference held by Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell and Col. W. Steven Flaherty, superintendent of the Virginia State Police. The changes, they said, were a result of legislation intended to provide more rigorous supervision of the state's nearly 13,000 sexual predators.

"We want to make it a bit tougher for them here," said Lt. Col. H.C. Davis in a telephone interview yesterday. "All of the changes will help us more actively monitor the offenders."

As part of the upgrades, the registry, launched in 1999, now enables visitors to search by name, Zip code, city or county or to use a map to search the area around a specific address. Users can view a list of incarcerated offenders, offenders living nearby and those wanted by authorities for failing to register. Virtual thumbtacks appear on a map, and when a user clicks on one,a photograph of the offender appears on the screen along with the name, aliases, address and offense.

Beginning July 1, the database will include all of the state's nonviolent sex offenders. Until the changes in state law, the list of nonviolent offenders was known only to law enforcement officials. Visitors to the Web site also will be able to see where nonviolent offenders live and work, said Lt. Tommy Turner of the state police.

Work addresses were necessary, Turner said, because "offenders learned to circumvent the system."

DOJ_NMG_0033412

"It doesn't help if you have a guy who lives in downtown Manassas but spends all day in Fairfax County working at a plumbing company," Turner said. He said part of the money allocated for registry improvements will be used to hire officers who will be responsible for checking on offenders who fail to re-register with the state.

Under the omnibus bill signed into law this spring, violent sex offenders -- including those convicted of such crimes as murder, rape and child molestation -- are now required to register with the state every 30 days, instead of every 90 days. Those classified as nonviolent will have to register every six months, Davis said.

Should the offenders not register, Davis said, they will be flagged on the registry. If they fail to register more than twice, or if they are convicted of another sex crime while on the registry, they will be required to wear GPS monitors under the new law.

Davis said an unknown number of offenders are unaccounted for or have failed to register on time. The changes to the registry, he said, should make it much easier to find them.

As of July 1, Davis also said, offenders convicted of certain violent sex acts against children younger than 13 will face a mandatory minimum sentence of 25 years. Under the old law, they have faced a sentence of five years to life.

Defense In Hollywood Wiretaps Case Demands Prosecution Evidence (CCT)

By Greg Risling

The Contra Costa Times, June 13, 2006

LOS ANGELES - Defense attorneys in a Hollywood wiretapping case scolded federal prosecutors on Monday for not turning over evidence.

"It's their obligation to provide us what we need to exonerate our clients," said Terree Bowers, a defense attorney who said the process has been "like pulling teeth."

Defense attorneys pointed out that the 112-count indictment against private investigator Anthony Pellicano was unsealed in February after an investigation that lasted more than three years.

Prosecutors alleged that Pellicano tapped the phones of Hollywood stars such as Sylvester Stallone; and paid two police officers to run names, including comedians Garry Shandling and Kevin Nealon, through a government database.

A total of 14 people have been charged, including Pellicano. Six have pleaded guilty to a variety of charges, including conspiracy and wiretapping.

Pellicano's trial is scheduled for Oct. 24.

More than 23,000 pages of documents have been provided by federal prosecutors, but defense attorneys argue the process has moved too slowly and they have yet to receive all of the evidence.

Prosecutors turned over some evidence to defense attorneys before Monday's hearing. Defense attorney Chad Hummel said he plans to file a motion that would ask U.S. District Court Judge Dale Fischer to throw out any evidence offered by prosecutors in the future.

Fischer ordered that a special master be appointed to review the evidence and determine what defense attorneys should be allowed to see.

Prosecutors said part of the delay has come from difficulty decrypting about 1,300 audio files made by Pellicano of his telephone conversations with clients and others. More than 350 audio files have been given to defense attorneys, but others haven't because the material isn't relevant to the case or doesn't rise to the level of filing criminal charges, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Saunders.

If defense attorneys "are so eager to get the tapes decrypted, the one man who has the password is sitting right over there," said Saunders, referring to Pellicano.

Saunders added a "select few" files deal with an ongoing investigation, but he didn't elaborate. Prosecutors have promised more charges are forthcoming.

Meanwhile, Fischer ordered prosecutors to hand over the remaining confidential FBI documents to defense attorneys. Some of the summaries, which cited interviews with top Hollywood power brokers, were leaked to the media and prompted an investigation into who may have released the information.

Defense attorneys maintained in court Monday that they were not responsible for the leaks.

Dispute Over Evidence In Pellicano Wiretap Case (NYT)

By David M. Halbfinger And Allison Hope Weiner

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

LOS ANGELES, June 12 — The nearly four-year federal investigation of Anthony Pellicano, the Hollywood private eye accused of masterminding a sprawling eavesdropping operation, has turned up only a single recording in which two people were unknowingly wiretapped, prosecutors said in court on Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0033413

Even code-crackers from unspecified government agencies have failed so far to decipher the passwords Mr. Pellicano may have used to stash away many more surreptitiously recorded phone calls in his computer drives, prosecutors said.

Defense lawyers, meanwhile, are questioning whether even the single wiretap the government claims to have discovered is really that, or something else entirely.

The government said its evidence included hundreds of recorded calls in which Mr. Pellicano can be heard boasting of his wiretaps, describing them in detail, and even playing back portions of them for his clients. The detective routinely recorded his own calls, and the government has not faced the same encryption problems with those.

The disclosures mean that, barring a last-minute break in the investigation, the government's case will be based far more on circumstantial evidence and witnesses' testimony than on direct evidence of illegal wiretapping.

The developments came in a contentious court hearing over evidence that defense lawyers have been waiting for since the indictments of Mr. Pellicano and seven other people on wiretapping and conspiracy charges in February. Defense lawyers complained Monday that prosecutors had turned over too little, too late, missing a Friday deadline and continuing to withhold a large amount of important evidence.

For example, prosecutors said they still would not turn over some 250 recorded phone calls and other evidence that remain the focus of the ongoing investigation. The lead prosecutor, Daniel A. Saunders, an assistant United States attorney, has said that more indictments are forthcoming.

Mr. Saunders and another prosecutor, Kevin M. Lally, said they had turned over some 22,000 pages of written evidence and would soon provide another 100,000 pages of case files from underlying legal matters that Mr. Pellicano was investigating. The government charges that Mr. Pellicano put his wiretapping to work on behalf of corrupt lawyers seeking an illegal and unfair advantage in litigation — much of it involving the entertainment industry, but also including divorces and criminal cases.

What has not been publicly disclosed are the details of the single recording in the government's possession that it says is an illegal wiretap. According to written summaries of F.B.I. interviews seen by The New York Times, the recording concerns events that led to the divorce of a Los Angeles billionaire, Alec E. Gores, from his wife, Lisa A. Gores, in 2001.

If the government fails to crack Mr. Pellicano's passwords and turn up other direct evidence of wiretaps, that means the prosecution's star witnesses could be forced to make their painful private drama public.

Mr. Gores, principal of the private equity firm Gores Technology Group, admitted hiring Mr. Pellicano in 2000 to investigate his suspicions that his wife was cheating on him with his younger brother, Thomas T. Gores, another billionaire investor, according to summaries of F.B.I. interviews with all three family members. (A third brother, Sam Gores, runs the Paradigm talent agency.)

Mr. Pellicano installed wiretaps on both Lisa and Tom Gores's telephones, the summaries show, and confirmed Alec Gores's suspicions that the two had become inappropriately involved. Alec Gores admitted to the F.B.I. that he listened to Mr. Pellicano's wiretaps on several occasions, the summaries show. Alec Gores has not been charged, and has been assured he is only a witness in the case, said his lawyer, Louis Miller, who is also known as Skip.

The sole recording the government says was a wiretap contains a conversation that occurred the evening of Jan. 8, 2001, as Lisa and Tom Gores spoke on the phone hours after they had met at the Beverly Hills Hotel. Last November, F.B.I. summaries show, Lisa Gores listened to the recording and confirmed for investigators that the voices on it were hers and Tom Gores's.

But defense lawyers dispute whether the recording is really a wiretap. "Just because they say it, doesn't mean it's true," said Steven F. Gruel, Mr. Pellicano's lawyer. "It could be anything."

