Aides to Olmert sought to dampen expectations that the meeting, which isn't even being termed a "summit," would produce a breakthrough.

"We're building the confidence to get to negotiations," Olmert spokeswoman Miri Eisin said after the meeting. "There isn't going to be a meeting and, wow, everything is going to be solved. No, no, no. This isn't about substance yet."

Palestinians were more upbeat. Walid Awad, a spokesman for Abbas' Fatah party, welcomed the news. "A meeting with Secretary Rice and Olmert will give it more value, and it will help move the peace process forward," Awad said.

Rice's announcement is part of Israel and the United States' effort to bolster Abbas. The moderate Palestinian leader's power and authority were undermined a year ago when the hard-line Islamist group Hamas won control of the Palestinian parliament and gained the right to run the Cabinet.

Since then, Israel, the United States and much of the international community have been shunning the Palestinian government until its Hamas leadership renounces its longstanding vow to destroy Israel.

Abbas and Hamas have tried for months to agree on a new government that would accept the international demands. Until the deadlock is broken, it's unlikely that the Bush administration will be able to make significant progress on any negotiations aimed at ending the decades-long conflict.

Rice's new tack is essentially an admission that the old strategy didn't work.

DOJ_NMG_0116423

That strategy focused on the long-dormant, U.S.-backed "road map" for peace. But Israelis and Palestinians never got beyond the first phase. That phase called for Palestinians to halt terror attacks against Israel and establish a unified security force and for Israel to dismantle illegal West Bank settlements and halt the expansion of existing settlements.

Rice said she, Olmert and Abbas will "have discussions about the broad issues on the horizon, so we can work on the road map, to try to accelerate the road map and move to the establishment of a Palestinian state."

Part of the U.S. interest in renewing peace efforts lies in its need to get Arab leaders, whose populations sympathize with the Palestinians, to help the United States stabilize Iraq and contain Iran.

Rice got at least rhetorical support on that score Monday from Egypt.

Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit expressed support for Bush's new Iraq strategy and agreed that Iran should stop meddling in Iraq. "Regarding Iran, Egypt reaffirms that no one should interfere in the internal affairs of Iraq," he said.

Nissenbaum reported from Jerusalem.

Mideast Leaders Agree To Meeting (LAT)

By Paul Richter And Richard Boudreaux

The Los Angeles Times, January 16, 2007

LUXOR, EGYPT — Seeking a fresh start for stalled Mideast peace efforts, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Monday won promises from the leaders of Israel and the Palestinian Authority to meet with her next month for their first discussion of a final peace deal in more than six years.

Rice said Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas had agreed to meet for "informal, broad discussions" about the final moves toward a Palestinian state in hopes of injecting new energy into talks that have been in near-gridlock over initial steps.

"The parties haven't talked about these [final-stage] issues for a long time," Rice said after a meeting with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak in this city on the banks of the Nile. "It seems wise to begin this … to really just sit and talk about the issues."

U.S. officials believe that by shifting the focus to what the outcome would look like, they could galvanize a process that has been bogged down for four years in discussion of difficult preliminary issues.

The initiative from Rice, who spent the last three days meeting with Israeli and Palestinian officials, comes at a time of widespread gloom about the prospects for peace. The Bush administration, besieged with problems elsewhere and running out of time, is desperate to show progress.

The goal is to move the two sides toward such "final-status" issues as the shape of the new Palestinian state, the claims of Palestinian refugees to return to sites now in Israel, and the fate of Jerusalem.

New momentum would help build Palestinian support for the moderate, politically weak Abbas, and would encourage Arab governments to provide crucial help to the United States in its efforts to pacify Iraq and contain Iran's influence.

But in a reminder of the difficulties that negotiators face, on the day that Rice met with Olmert, the Israeli Housing Ministry announced plans to expand Maale Adumim, a large Jewish settlement in the West Bank just east of Jerusalem. The ministry plans to build an additional 44 units.

U.S. officials have protested continued building in the West Bank, but Israeli officials defended the decision. They said it would not expand the perimeter of the settlement, and that it was consistent with an agreement reached with then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell before the U.S.-backed "road map" peace plan called for a building freeze.

Saeb Erekat, a veteran Palestinian negotiator, said: "We condemn this step. This undermines efforts by Dr. Rice to revive the peace process and the road map. Israel must choose between building settlements and peace."

U.S. officials remained vague about the goals of the three-way meeting, but a senior official traveling with Rice said the talks would explore "where do we want to go" and develop "some joint understanding of what's in it for each side."

Israeli officials said they had agreed to the talks, but emphasized that Olmert would continue with bilateral meetings dealing with the nuts-and-bolts issues of the relationship — such as movement and access, funds, prisoners, and violence.

DOJ_NMG_0116424

Those often-stalled talks have been complicated by conflicts between Abbas' Fatah movement and the militant group Hamas, which now controls the Palestinian government.

"There is no doubt that we must, at the same time, continue the bilateral meetings between us and them," Olmert said after his morning session with Rice.

His remarks reflect Israel's preference to control the pace and scope of any talks with the Palestinians, rather than submitting to third-party oversight.

He told Israeli lawmakers from his Kadima party that if a Palestinian unity government made up of Hamas and Fatah members agreed to the peace plan's conditions — recognition of Israel, renunciation of violence and acceptance of previous accords — then negotiations on a peace settlement could be possible.

Palestinian officials reacted cautiously.

Ahmed Abdel-Rahman, a political advisor to Abbas, said Abbas was ready "in principle" to attend the three-way summit but was waiting for a date and a venue to be agreed on.

Since 2003, U.S. officials have said they were following the blueprint laid out in the peace initiative, which is backed by the so-called Quartet: the U.S., Russia, the European Union and the United Nations. The plan outlines the steps, such as reining in violence by Palestinian militants and halting Israeli settlement construction, that are intended to lead to peace.

Although the peace plan says the parties should concentrate on the next step before them, slowly building toward the major issues dividing Israelis and Palestinians, the new approach would have them simultaneously concentrating on the early issues and later ones.

Some outside experts have urged the Bush administration to begin talking about these later issues. They were last discussed in 2000 when, at the end of his second term, former President Clinton made a last intense attempt to work out the issues between the two sides.

Another advocate of discussing them is Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, who has been promoting a plan along these lines in recent weeks.

She has argued that if the Palestinians are offered a look at how the talks may turn out, producing a state for them, "it will help them do the difficult things they have to do now for stage one of the road map," said one Israeli official, who declined to be identified.

Rice emphasized that the United States remained committed to the peace plan. U.S. officials said they wanted to hold the meeting in the Middle East but had not yet set a date or a location.

Strengthening Abbas has become a priority for the United States since March, when Hamas took control of the Palestinian parliament after elections in January.

Olmert and Abbas held face-to-face talks last month. Though their agreements were hailed by the Americans as a sign of progress, movement has been slow. Olmert agreed to turn over $100 million of the more than $500 million in tax revenue that Israel has collected for the Palestinians, but has not yet done so, Palestinian officials say. They say promises to ease travel restrictions also have not been carried out.

Fawzi Barhoum, a Hamas spokesman, called Rice's visit part of "an American-Israeli plan to support the Zionist occupation and harm the national interests of the Palestinians.

"Hamas and the majority of the Palestinian people are not expecting anything good from these summits," he said.

"The new settlement [housing] in the West Bank is a new slap to everyone who still believes that the Americans are aiming to help the Palestinians," Barhoum said. "It is very strange for the secretary of State to talk about peace while the occupation is carrying out crimes day and night."

Rice Says Planned Mideast Talks Most Ambitious In Six Years (AFP)

By Sylvie Lanteaume

AFP, January 16, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said that a planned summit with the Israeli and Palestinian leaders could herald the most serious Middle East peace effort in six years.

DOJ_NMG_0116425

Rice, on a whistle-stop tour of the region aimed at shoring up the ailing "roadmap" peace plan, announced a three-way summit with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas within a month.

"It has been at least six years since they talked about these issues," Rice said at a news conference in the southern Egyptian city of Luxor held jointly with Foreign Minister Ahmed Abul Gheit.

Speaking after a meeting with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, Rice said the three-way summit would "focus on what would lead to the establishment of a Palestinian state."

No date has yet been set for the summit but a US official said earlier it was expected to take place in three or fours weeks. Abul Gheit said Egypt was ready to host it.

Olmert welcomed the summit but stressed that any Palestinian government involved in peace talks should recognise Israel's right to exist.

"There have not been many summit level meetings after all between the Palestinians and Israelis in the last years," a senior US official travelling with Rice said.

"They haven't sat for six years to talk about issues as ambitious as looking at what would be necessary to get a Palestinian state," the official said on condition of anonymity.

Week-long Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiations took place in January 2001 in the Egyptian Red Sea resort of Taba under the patronage of former US president Bill Clinton.

The last ditch talks -- held in the dying days of Clinton's tenure and before Israeli elections that saw the hawkish Ariel Sharon take over -- failed to yield a breakthrough but are considered to be the closest negotiations ever got to a comprehensive settlement.

"There are a number of issues, some old, some new, that will have to be resolved if there is to be a Palestinian state," Rice said, stressing the meeting would only be a prelude to the resumption of final settlement negotiations.

"I am very clear about one thing we do not want to do, which is to rush the formal negotiations before things are fully prepared, before people are fully prepared," she said.

Abul Gheit said the Palestinian political crisis needed to be contained and contacts resumed between Israel and the Palestinians, in what he described as "a stabilisation phase".

"Then you will start the second phase whereby everything is discussed in relation to the establishment of this Palestinian state," he added.

Rice's diplomatic offensive suffered a blow earlier Monday when Israel invited bids for new Jewish settlement homes in the West Bank even as she was exploring solutions for the region in a meeting with Olmert in Israel.

"Israel must make a choice between peace and settlements. It cannot have both," Palestinian chief negotiator Saeb Erakat told AFP. "It's defying the international community and undermining Secretary of State Rice's peace efforts."

When asked to comment on the bids, Rice's spokesman Sean McCormack said only that there is "no change in our policy."

In Rice's lightning visit to neighboring Jordan late Sunday, King Abdullah II told Washington's top diplomat that concrete progress needed to be made on the peace blueprint if the region was to be spared fresh bloodshed.

"Without tangible, specific steps to activate the implementation of the roadmap in the near future, the cycle of violence will widen," he warned.

In the West Bank town of Ramallah on Sunday, Abbas refused "any temporary or transitional solutions, including a state with temporary borders, because we do not believe it to be a realistic choice that can be built upon."

Rice has made clear since the outset of her tour that she is bringing no US proposals to jumpstart the moribund peace process, saying: "I think no plan can be 'Made in America.'"

Rice is also seeking to promote US President George W. Bush's new policy to quell surging sectarian violence in Iraq with the deployment of 21,500 more troops.

The plan revealed Wednesday has come under fire in many Arab capitals, even among staunch allies in the Gulf, with critics saying it provides a recipe for more sectarian violence in Iraq that could spread elsewhere in the region.

But Abul Gheit offered Egypt's support for the controversial plan.

DOJ_NMG_0116426

"We are supportive of the plan ... We are hopeful that plan will lead to the stabilisation of, unity and cohesion of the Iraqi government," he said.

Later, Rice met with Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah outside Riyadh on the latest leg of her regional tour. Their discussions covered "developments on the regional and international scenes, chiefly the Palestinian issue and the situation in Iraq," the official SPA news agency reported.

Rice met the Saudi monarch in a richly decorated desert tent in Rawdat Khraim outside Riyadh, and conveyed to him greetings from US President George W. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney, according to reporters at the scene.

Abdullah, who remarked that Bush's father, former president George Bush, had visited the place, talked for around 10 minutes with Rice before they moved on to dinner, followed by Saudi dignitaries.

On Tuesday, she will hold a joint news conference with her Saudi counterpart Prince Saud al-Faisal and go on to Kuwait.

Rice Announces 3-Way Talks On Palestinian State (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

LUXOR, Egypt, Jan. 15 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced Monday that Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas would meet with her for a three-way informal discussion of issues that must be cleared away to establish a Palestinian state.

No date or location has been set for the gathering, but it would signal deepening involvement by the Bush administration in stalled Israeli-Palestinian peace talks at a time when Rice is seeking greater support from Arab leaders in helping to stabilize Iraq.

Rice made her statement after meeting with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak at this ancient city on the Nile. Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit, addressing reporters with Rice, said Egypt supported President Bush's new plan for Iraq.

Rice said she was going "to try to help the parties come together, to look at how they can move through the road map," referring to the U.S.-backed peace plan that was launched, without success, in 2003. In order to establish a Palestinian state, she said, "there are a number of issues -- some old, some new -- that will ultimately need to be resolved."

The road map set out detailed sequential steps that would lead first to an interim state and then a permanent one. But the Israelis and the Palestinians have never managed to get past the first phase, which among other things required the Palestinian government to crack down on anti-Israeli radical groups and Israel to freeze expansion of Jewish settlements in the Palestinian territories.

The road map envisioned fulfilling the first stage before addressing such vexing issues as the precise borders of a future Palestinian state, the status of Jerusalem, and the claim of Palestinian refugees and their descendants of a right to return to homes in Israel that were abandoned in 1948.

The process was further frozen when the radical Islamic group Hamas, which is devoted to the destruction of Israel, last year won legislative elections in the Palestinian territories. Meanwhile, Israel has not met its obligations. On the same day the meeting was announced, Israel's Housing Ministry solicited bids to build 44 housing units in the West Bank settlement of Maale Adumim, which Olmert has declared would be part of Israel under any final deal.

Now, in a shift for the Bush administration, Rice is calculating that dialogue on the end result -- what she calls the "political horizon" -- might loosen the logjam, aides said.

Bush took office in 2001 critical of the intense engagement in the peace process by his predecessor, Bill Clinton, including sketching the final borders of a Palestinian state. Bush's aides suggested that the collapse of Clinton's involvement led to the outbreak of violence known as the second intifada.

"The parties haven't talked about these issues for a long time. It's been at least six years since they talked about these issues," Rice said, referring to Clinton's efforts. "It seems wise to begin this, as what President Abbas has called an informal discussion, to just really sit and talk about the issues."

DOJ_NMG_0116427

Bush is already on record on two key issues. To the fury of Arabs, he gave a letter in 2004 to Ariel Sharon, then Israeli prime minister, saying that Palestinian refugees could not expect to return to Israel and that Israel would be expected to retain major settlement blocks in the West Bank.

Israeli and Palestinian officials confirmed the planned meeting, which officials said is likely to be held next month. The deal came about after Rice shuttled between Jerusalem, the Jordanian capital of Amman and Abbas's West Bank headquarters in Ramallah on Sunday and then secured Olmert's agreement Monday morning for the meeting. After talks with Egyptian officials here, she flew to Riyadh for dinner with Saudi King Abdullah.

Rice hopes to use the prospect of renewed U.S. involvement in the Middle East peace process to help win Arab support for the Iraqi government and a campaign to combat the rising influence of Iran. She is to meet with Persian Gulf foreign ministers in Kuwait City on Tuesday.

Both Olmert and Abbas are politically weakened, making prospects slim for the success of their talks. Olmert's approval rating is 14 percent, and Abbas is struggling against the Hamas-led government.

Fawzi Barhoum, a Hamas spokesman, said the planned meeting was "against our Palestinian unity."

"Up to now we have heard nothing about our rights or about breaking the international siege against our Palestinian government," Barhoum said, referring to the international aid embargo imposed on the Palestinian Authority after Hamas unexpectedly won the parliamentary elections. "We do not support this meeting."

Miri Eisin, a spokeswoman for Olmert, described the talks as part of the "pre-negotiation stage" in which issues of substance would not be discussed. "What we're doing is trying to get to a point where each side trusts the other," she said, adding that some of the discussion with Rice will be aimed at determining a role for the United States, as well as for moderate Arab states such as Jordan, in any future negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians.

Rice's presence at the meeting would mark the first time in four years that the Bush administration has intervened so directly in the long-running conflict. In June 2003, the road map was launched with great fanfare at a summit in Aqaba, Jordan, attended by Bush, Sharon and Abbas, at the time the Palestinian prime minister.

But the Americans quickly found themselves dragged into a tedious discussion about highway checkpoints, settlement construction and prisoner exchanges. The process collapsed a few months later when Abbas quit in a dispute with then-Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

In their first one-on-one meeting, Olmert last month promised Abbas that he would remove some military checkpoints in the West Bank and release $100 million of the more than $500 million in frozen tax revenue that Israel collects on behalf of the Palestinians. But Olmert, who has pledged to strengthen Abbas's political standing as he confronts Hamas, has yet to release the promised funds. And there has been virtually no progress in reducing the Israeli obstacles to Palestinian movement inside the West Bank.

Rice said that Olmert and Abbas were developing a "fruitful channel bilaterally" for such issues and that it was not her intention to insert "an American presence" at every meeting between the two men.

Rice To Hold Three-way Talks With Mideast Leaders (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, January 16, 2007

LUXOR, Egypt — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Monday she would bring the leaders of Israel and the Palestinian Authority together soon for "informal broader discussions" on creating a Palestinian state.

Making good on a pledge she made last year to intensify her involvement in trying to resolve the Arab-Israeli dispute, Rice announced no date or location for the three-way talks and said they were not meant to substitute for other meetings between Palestinians and Israelis.

"There are a number of issues, some old, some new, that will ultimately have to be resolved if there is to be a Palestinian state," Rice said in the ancient Egyptian city of Luxor, where she stopped Monday for talks with Egyptian leaders after two days in Israel and the Palestinian territories. "The parties have not talked about these issues for a long time (and) it seems wise to begin this informal discussion."

DOJ_NMG_0116428

U.S. Arab allies and the bipartisan Iraq Study Group have urged a higher U.S. profile on the Israeli-Palestinian front to strengthen pro-U.S. governments in the region and take away a potent tool of anti-U.S. regimes such as Iran's.

But there was skepticism about how much the Bush administration could accomplish in its final two years in office, given its preoccupation with Iraq and the weakness of Israeli and Palestinian leaders.

Joseph Alpher, an Israeli strategic expert who advised former Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak during unsuccessful Camp David peace talks in 2000, said he would have been more impressed if Rice had stayed in Israel for a third day and brought the two sides together now.

"I think she's much more focused on Iraq and Iran" than the Arab-Israeli dispute, Alpher said.

President Bush hosted a summit in Jordan in 2003 with then Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and then Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas that launched a so-called roadmap to Palestinian statehood. There was little U.S. followup, however, and the Bush administration and Israel refused to deal with then Palestinian President Yasser Arafat. The Israelis confined Arafat to his Ramallah headquarters, accusing him of encouraging anti-Israel terrorism.

In 2005, Israel withdrew unilaterally from Gaza. Israeli troops and settlers remain throughout the West Bank.

Abbas was elected president in 2005 following Arafat's death and lacks his predecessor's authority. He was weakened further when the militant Hamas movement won parliamentary elections a year ago.

Abbas met last month with Ehud Olmert, who succeeded Sharon after he suffered a massive stroke in late 2005. The talks focused on taxes and prisoners, not issues involving statehood: the boundaries of a future Palestinian state, the fate of Jerusalem and the status of millions of Palestinian refugees.

Rice said it was important to deal with day-to-day concerns as well as to create a "political horizon" for statehood that could strengthen Abbas.

Also much less popular than his predecessor, Olmert is blamed by Israelis for lackluster military performance in a 34-day war last summer between Israel and the Iranian-backed Lebanese movement, Hezbollah.

Rice confirmed that the Bush administration wants $86 million to equip and train about 30,000 Palestinian security personnel, including Abbas' 3,700-member presidential guard. The money would go for mess kits, uniforms and communication gear. The funding would require congressional approval.

On Sunday, Abbas reiterated his opposition to establishment of a provisional Palestinian state with temporary borders, a possible interim step before a permanent peace can be negotiated with Israel.

Abbas also complained that IOlmert has failed to deliver on recent promises to release Palestinian prisoners, cut the number of Israeli checkpoints in the West Bank and hand over $100 million in Palestinian taxes Israel has collected.

Hamas, which rejects Israel's right to exist, has been locked in a stalemate with Abbas over formation of a Cabinet. Recent violence between Hamas and Abbas' Fatah movement has killed nearly 40 people.

Hamas has about 6,000 armed men and has vowed to double the force.

Rice Speaks Softly In Egypt, Avoiding Democracy Push (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

CAIRO, Jan. 15 — In the days before Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met with officials in Egypt, the news media here were filled with stories detailing charges of corruption, cronyism, torture and political repression.

Cellphone videos posted on the Internet showed the police sodomizing a bus driver with a broomstick. Another showed the police hanging a woman by her knees and wrists from a pole for questioning. A company partly owned by a member of the governing party distributed tens of thousands of bags of contaminated blood to hospitals around the country. And just 24 hours before Ms. Rice arrived, the authorities arrested a television reporter on charges of harming national interests by making a film about police torture. The reporter was released, but the authorities kept the tapes.

Ms. Rice, who once lectured Egyptians on the need to respect the rule of law, did not address those domestic concerns. Instead, with Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit by her side, she talked about her appreciation for Egypt's support in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0116429

It was clear that the United States — facing chaos in Iraq, rising Iranian influence and the destabilizing Israeli-Palestinian conflict — had decided that stability, not democracy, was its priority, Egyptian political commentators, political aides and human rights advocates said.

But the calculus of stabilization is complicated and fraught in a region as fragile as the Middle East, where interests are defined by religion, geography, geopolitics and political opportunism. And it is not at all clear that the new (old) approach will work. The United States is so unpopular in the region now, many here say, that its support is enough to undermine a government's legitimacy with its public.

"The former pressure was an illusion and the lack of any pressure now will push the crisis between the people and their rulers to the edge," said Ibrahim Eissa, the editor of Al Dustoor, a weekly independent newspaper in Egypt that is critical of the government. That eliminates "all false appearances that the Arab regimes are against the United States in defense of their independent sovereignty and that the United States is supporting democracy when it is in strict alliance with the oppressive regimes," he added.

The dynamics of the region have also changed over the years, and it is no longer clear what the payoff is for Washington in return for overlooking rights violations. It is not certain, for example, that the Egypt of 2007 can deliver the kind of influence it once wielded when it was seen as the political and cultural center of the Arab world. Egypt has failed to calm fighting between Palestinian factions, or to help negotiate the release of Palestinian prisoners in exchange for an Israeli soldier held by Palestinian militants.

At the same time, where Washington was criticized in the past for supporting repressive governments, it risks even sharper criticism now because it made such a public commitment to promoting democracy.

Ms. Rice raised the bar herself when she visited American University here in 2005 and said in a speech: "We are all concerned for the future of Egypt's reforms when peaceful supporters of democracy — men and women — are not free from violence. The day must come when the rule of law replaces emergency decrees — and when the independent judiciary replaces arbitrary justice."

Since then, Egypt's government has piled up a long list of repressive actions, including ordering the police to block people from voting in parliamentary elections; delaying local elections by two years; imprisoning an opposition leader, Ayman Nour, on charges widely seen as politically motivated; battling with judges who have demanded oversight of elections; and imprisoning Talaat el-Sadat, a member of Parliament and the nephew of President Anwar el-Sadat, for a year in a military jail after he criticized the armed forces on television.

Recently, President Hosni Mubarak proposed amending the Constitution in ways that would make it easier for Egypt's toothless opposition parties to field candidates for president. But the proposals would ban truly independent candidates from running, limit the role judges play in monitoring elections and permanently outlaw any party with a religious bent.

Perhaps more to the point, the government has done little if anything to improve a climate across the country that discourages participation in opposition politics, many political analysts said.

"The government has said to us, 'Stop, we are closing all the windows and doors we had opened,' said Hafez Abu Seada, secretary general of the Egyptian Organization for Human Rights.

Three hours north of Cairo, in Kafr Ghamam, a village of about 40,000 people, a small group of men said they had tried to build a following for the Wafd Party, which would seem to be uncontroversial. It is, after all, a legal opposition party and, like other government-sanctioned parties, has virtually no influence.

To win support from the village, the men tried to persuade the government to cover a pit where raw sewage was dumped and to repair a bridge that ran over the pit. But the men said no one would sign a letter to the government requesting the aid because they were afraid to be identified with an opposition party.

"My father threatened to kick me out of the house if I got involved with this party," said Mustafa Ibrahim Abdel Hamid, a 21-year-old in the village.

What are people afraid of? A knock at the door, many people there said. Last month, after a group of party organizers gathered to discuss who would hold which position in the nascent organization, two men who took over leading posts were visited by state security, they said.

DOJ_NMG_0116430

"I got scared and I wanted to resign," said one of the men, Al Sayed Muhammad Ibrahim. "I wanted to resign. I have daughters. I don't want any problems. My daughters, my son, my wife, all asked me to resign."

In Luxor on Monday afternoon, the Egyptian authorities organized a news conference with Ms. Rice and Mr. Aboul Gheit.

"I especially want to thank President Mubarak for receiving me and for spending so much time with me to talk about the issues of common interest here in the Middle East," Ms. Rice said. "Obviously the relationship with Egypt is an important strategic relationship — one that we value greatly."

Bush Ally Hopes To Win Over Islamic World (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, January 16, 2007

Lambasted by some as the US's chief propagandist – or as head of its "Muslim outreach" – Karen Hughes has the unenviable task of improving her country's image in the world.

But as a former senior White House counsellor and close friend of George W. Bush, the under-secretary for public diplomacy wields an influence few others possess in Washington.

Having got off to a bad start in mid-2005 when she was pilloried by the US media for having little knowledge of the Middle East, Ms Hughes has maintained a low domestic profile since then, tending to channel her public message to the media of countries she is visiting.

Although not confined to the Middle East, Ms Hughes acknowledges that her most important task is in the Islamic world.

"The number one problem is that the west is seen as somehow being in conflict with Islam," she said in an interview at her State Department office in Washington.

"When I meet Muslim clerics, they are always surprised to hear that the US is also a country of faith . . . They are also surprised to hear that I represent 7m American Muslims who are as free to worship as any other Americans."

Unlike many of her colleagues, Ms Hughes is happy to give interviews to al-Jazeera and has even visited its headquarters in Qatar. Although she says she disputes some of the TV station's journalistic practices, ignoring it is not an option.

Al-Jazeera is by far the most popular source of television news in the Arabic-speaking world.

"When I came here there was an undeclared policy of not talking to al-Jazeera," she said. "It is not an endorsement to talk to them."

Critics say that Ms Hughes' efforts, which include promoting foreign exchanges of students, journalists, military personnel and clerics, are worse than doing nothing at all, since foreigners are as capable of seeing through spin as Americans.

But Ms Hughes' easy access to Mr Bush – she is among his three or four closest confidantes in Washington, having been his communications director in Texas in the 1990s – enables her to tell the president directly what the rest of the world thinks of the US.

Ms Hughes emphasises two themes she says have most damaged America's image in the eyes of the world – perceptions of the mistreatment of alleged terrorist detainees at Guantánamo Bay and elsewhere, and the view that Washington is not doing enough to promote the creation of a Palestinian state.

She says she has frequently conveyed both observations to the US president. Ms Hughes did not mention the war in Iraq. "The toughest thing I've told the president is that he needed to improve the detainee policy," she said. "I felt it was important it was understood that was how we were being seen in the world."

Her goal of disseminating the US message abroad is constrained by the fact that public diplomacy is a low budget priority. In concert with Dina Habib Powell, her Egypt-born colleague, Ms Hughes recently launched a "public relations coalition" to encourage US companies to promote positive images of the US abroad and to fund projects, such as English-language teaching, which assist it.

Participants included Accenture, Disney, Mastercard, Citigroup and Burson-Marsteller. Part of the object is to get many more foreigners, in particular from the Islamic world, to visit the US.

That means she often beats a trail to the Department of Homeland Security, which has been heavily criticised by private sector groups for its strict post-9/11 visa policy and for the offhand way that many immigration officials treat arriving foreigners.

DOJ_NMG_0116431

As a result, many companies and universities now hold conferences outside the US to spare foreign participants the potential humiliation. Likewise, the number of foreign students studying in the US fell after the September 11 terrorist attacks.

"I understand – no customs officer wants to be the one to let a hijacker into the country," she said. "But it is also important to be welcoming. Our most important tool of public diplomacy in the last 50 years has been the [foreign] exchange programme."

Somalia's Transitional Government Shuts 3 Radio Stations (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Jan. 15 — Somalia's transitional government shut three of the country's biggest radio stations on Monday, accusing them of broadcasting incendiary propaganda.

Then, in a show of force, hundreds of government soldiers stormed into the streets of Mogadishu, the capital, as tanks from neighboring Ethiopia, which has been providing military support to the government, chugged through downtown, drawing crowds of onlookers and the occasional rock.

Somalia's government, which declared a state of emergency on Saturday, seems intent on using its newfound powers to crush the seeds of a growing insurgency. On Sunday night, gunmen attacked an Ethiopian convoy, setting off an intense hourlong firefight in one of Mogadishu's ramshackle neighborhoods.

Ethiopian troops last month helped rout Somalia's Islamist forces, which had controlled much of the country, but the Islamists have vowed to regroup underground.

As the days pass, the insurgent attacks grow more frequent and more lethal. The government has not released casualty figures, but Mogadishu residents said more than a dozen people had been killed in gun battles over the past week.

Executives of the radio stations, however, said that was no excuse to force them off the air.

"All we have done is voice different opinions," said Mohammed Amiin, deputy chairman of Shabelle Media Network. "We never expected this to happen."

Abdirahman Dinari, spokesman for the transitional government, accused Shabelle, along with the other stations, of making false reports to stir up the people against the government.

"They said our soldiers were looting the markets and harassing people, which was totally untrue," he said. "They are using the media to undermine the government. They have been doing this for months."

Security officials have summoned station owners to a meeting on Tuesday, and Mr. Dinari said there was a possibility that the stations would soon be back on the air, after they were given a warning.

In a land of rival clans, there is a clan dimension to all this. The owners of both Shabelle and Horn Afrik, another station that was closed down, are members of the Ayr, a branch of the powerful Hawiye clan, and many government officials blame the Ayr for the rising level of violence.

"The Ayr clan is part of the problem," Mr. Dinari said.

The Ayr was closely associated with the Islamist movement, with several top Islamist leaders from the Ayr. Many residents say they suspect that Ayr members are the backbone of the insurgency, though Ayr elders vehemently deny this.

So far, the most intense fighting — and the most intense crackdowns — has been in Ayr neighborhoods, and it is beginning to fuel Ayr resentment.

"We are being harassed simply because of our clan," said Abdi Ali Halaneh, an Ayr businessman who sells building materials in north Mogadishu.

Mr. Halaneh said that many of his friends now wanted to leave Somalia.

"There may be no place for us here," he said.

The government also closed the Mogadishu office of Al Jazeera and a Somali religious radio station, which some people feared could play into the hands of the Islamists.

In the Bakara market, where even the tiniest tin kiosk has a radio, shoppers and shopkeepers moaned and hissed when the music and news turned to static. Many shook their radios.

DOJ_NMG_0116432

Some derided the government and accused it of being hypocritical because, just a few months ago, government officials had criticized the Islamists for not allowing radio stations to play Western music. Now the government was going further by closing the same stations.

"Totalitarian rule has arrived," said Asho Elmi Ahmed, a shopper. "And it didn't take long."

Somalia's Window Of Opportunity (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 16, 2007

Having ousted the Islamic regime, Ethiopia must act quickly to broker peace talks in the war-torn land.

ETHIOPIA HAS DONE its fellow Africans a good turn by ousting the increasingly radical Islamic Courts Union regime in Somalia. And thankfully, Addis Ababa has the wisdom to admit what everyone knows: that the Ethiopians have about 3.3 nanoseconds to get their troops out of xenophobic Somalia before they will be even more hated than the thugs they ousted. Now the question is: Who can bring order to this anarchic land?

The only move as foolish as sending U.S. troops to occupy Somalia would be for the international community to do nothing except watch it slip back into chaos. Somalia, you will recall, is a poster child for failed states. It is a place so violent that the Taliban imitators of the Islamic Courts, with their brutal "justice," were still seen as vastly preferable to the khat-fueled warlord gunplay that made a misery of life in Mogadishu for more than a decade previous. The irony is that the perpetually feuding Somali clans were finally able to unite behind the Islamists — even though most disliked their ideology — because they were so desperate for stability. The challenge is to provide order without a radical Islamist face.

Now that Ethiopia has done the heavy military lifting, U.S. forces are trying to bomb the Al Qaeda leaders who have followed Osama bin Laden's orders to regroup in Somalia. But unilateral fly-by interventions from 30,000 feet are not going to do the job alone.

If the Somalis want to get rid of the Ethiopians — and they do — they must be helped to hammer out a political settlement. The Ethiopians can deliver their allies — the transitional national government — to the bargaining table. The Arab League can bring the moderate clan leaders who backed the Islamists, and without whom no peace can hold in Mogadishu. The African Union can help deliver other factions. The U.N. and permanent Security Council members must use their diplomatic muscle to link reconstruction to a cessation of violence. African Union troops, with or without blue helmets, should then follow. Somalis have had enough strife for a lifetime.

Castro Reportedly In Grave Condition (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

MADRID, Spain -- Ailing Cuban leader Fidel Castro is in "very grave" condition after three failed operations and complications from an intestinal infection, a Spanish newspaper said Tuesday.

The newspaper El Pais cited two unnamed sources from the Gregorio Maranon hospital in the Spanish capital of Madrid. The facility employs surgeon Jose Luis Garcia Sabrido, who flew to Cuba in December to treat the 80-year-old Castro.

In a report published on its Web site, El Pais said: "A grave infection in the large intestine, at least three failed operations and various complications have left the Cuban dictator, Fidel Castro, laid up with a very grave prognosis."

Cuba has released little information on Castro's condition since he temporarily ceded power in July to his brother, Defense Minister Raul Castro, until he could recover from emergency intestinal surgery, prompting much speculation and rumor in the country and around the world.

El Pais' report, which could not immediately be confirmed, was a rare detailed description from a major media outlet about Castro's condition.

The U.S. government had speculated that Castro could suffer from cancer _ a supposition denied by Sabrido. Some U.S. doctors believed Castro was suffering from diverticular disease, which can cause bleeding in the lower intestine, especially in people over 60. In severe cases, emergency surgery may be required.

That idea was supported by El Pais, which reported that its sources said Castro had suffered a bout of the disease.

DOJ_NMG_0116433

"In the summer, the Cuban leader bled abundantly in the intestine," El Pais reported. "This adversity led him to the operating table, according to the medical sources. His condition, moreover, was aggravated because the infection spread and caused peritonitis, the inflammation of the membrane that covers the digestive organs."

El Pais said that in December, when Garcia Sabrido visited, Castro had an abdominal wound that was leaking more than a pint of fluids a day, causing "'a severe loss of nutrients." The Cuban leader was being fed intravenously, the report said.

A statement attributed to Castro was released on New Year's Eve saying his recovery was "far from being a lost battle."

Cuban officials told visiting U.S. lawmakers last month that Castro does not have cancer or a terminal illness and will eventually return to public life, although it was not clear whether he would return to the same kind of absolute control as before.

Venezuela Ends Oil Negotiations (DJ/AP)

Dow Jones/Associated Press, January 16, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela, Jan. 15 — Venezuela will end negotiations with foreign oil companies over how it will take a majority control of their operations along the Orinoco River, the country's oil minister, Rafael Ramírez, said on Monday.

Mr. Ramírez said that "there's no possible negotiation" with the foreign companies, but he said that private companies would be allowed to own minority stakes in lucrative oil projects in the Orinoco River basin.

"Every case will be different," Mr. Ramírez said. "We will have an effective majority control."

The government negotiated last year with the companies about its plans to take majority control of oil operations in the country, but no agreements were reached.

In a speech to Congress last week, President Hugo Chávez said the private companies — BP, Exxon Mobil, Chevron, ConocoPhillips, Total and Statoil — would be given the option to stay on as minority partners.

Mr. Chávez also announced plans to nationalize companies within Venezuela's telecommunications, electricity and natural gas industries.

The government has already taken majority ownership of Venezuelan oil-producing operations outside the Orinoco region through joint ventures controlled by the state oil company.

With New Urgency, U.S. And South Korea Seek Free-Trade Deal (NYT)

By Choe Sang-hun

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

SEOUL, South Korea, Jan. 15 — United States and South Korean officials resumed free-trade talks Monday amid growing skepticism that the two governments can narrow their differences before President Bush's authority to move an agreement quickly through Congress expires.

Success would give Washington its biggest trade deal since the North American Free Trade Agreement a decade ago, while expanding market opportunities for exporters in both countries.

About 2,000 police officers in riot gear stood guard around the Shilla Hotel, where the negotiators met for a sixth round of talks since June. Thousands more were dispatched to parks in the city center, where farmers and factory workers planned large protest rallies. Nine lawmakers opposing the talks began a hunger strike in a tent pitched outside the hotel.

"We have made important progress to date, but we still have a lot of work to do," said Wendy Cutler, an assistant trade representative and the lead negotiator for the United States. She said she was optimistic that a deal could be concluded before President Bush's special trade negotiation powers, known as "fast track" authority, lapsed at the end of June.

Under the fast-track mechanism, President Bush can submit an agreement deal to Congress for a straight yes-or-no vote. An agreement would have to go to Washington by the end of March because lawmakers would need to review it before a vote. After President Bush's authority expires, however, the Congress — now controlled by the Democrats — can place amendments on the trade deal, crippling its chances of speedy ratification.

Thomas Kim, executive director of the Korea Policy Institute, said: "I don't think it's going to happen. There are too many major concessions that would have to be made on both sides, and too many unknown political variables."

DOJ_NMG_0116434

The talks stalled over United States requests for greater access for American cars, rice and drugs, and over South Korea's demand that Washington change antidumping rules applied to South Korean steel, cars, computer chips and textiles. Seoul also wants goods produced by South Korean factories in North Korea included in the agreement.

"The more important question probably isn't whether they'll make the deadline," Mr. Kim said, but whether a trade agreement will be reached at all, "and if not, how long will it be before the two governments try again."

If signed, a free-trade deal would add a measure of success to Mr. Bush's embattled presidency, said Usha Haley, professor of international business and director of the Global Business Center at the University of New Haven. A deal with South Korea is central to Washington's strategy of stemming the loss of economic influence in Asia to China.

For South Korea, a deal would mean bigger access for its products in its second-largest export market after China. By exposing the South Korean economy to United States rivals, it would also serve as a catalyst for economic reforms, South Korean officials said.

South Korea is the United States' seventh-largest trading partner, with bilateral trade topping $74 billion a year. An accord could lift American exports to South Korea by $19 billion, while Korean exporters could expect an additional $10 billion in sales in the United States, according to the United States International Trade Commission.

"President Roh Moo-hyun is now entering his final year in office and wants an agreement and its economic benefits to become the legacy of his otherwise disappointing presidency," Ms. Haley said. "Growth is now a very scarce commodity, so the government needs to secure future growth opportunities for the economy. But his unpopularity is also weighing on the trade deal."

Farmers, labor unions and movie workers, all important segments of support for Mr. Roh's liberal Uri Party, have protested the prospect of a trade deal.

Beijing Vows To Rein In Trade Surplus (WSJ)

By Andrew Batson

The Wall Street Journal, January 16, 2007

BEIJING -- China's leadership is increasingly determined to bring its much-criticized trade surplus under control, as a consensus appears to be building that the imbalance is an economic problem for the country and not simply a political irritant.

Minister of Commerce Bo Xilai, in his first public remarks since China last week reported that its trade surplus surged 74% to a record $177.47 billion in 2006, said reducing that excess will be a top priority for 2007. According to the official Xinhua news agency, he said yesterday that an excessively large surplus isn't beneficial to the economy and noted that China's disputes with the European Union and U.S., its two largest trading partners, have been increasing.

Mr. Bo's new pledge to trim the surplus, delivered at a conference of commerce officials from around the country, is particularly unusual coming from the head of an institution that has long existed mainly to promote the nation's exports. It highlights how the record trade gaps of the past two years have helped shift official thinking from a growth-at-all-costs mentality to one that recognizes growing imbalances.

Because China sells so many more goods to foreigners than it buys from them, the earnings from those export sales have been piling up in its domestic banking system. Economists worry that all that excess cash is pushing up inflation, now running at 1.9%, and contributing to froth in the stock markets and real estate. At the same time, the trade gap is straining relationships with the EU and U.S., which are demanding China allow its tightly controlled currency, the yuan, or renminbi, to strengthen more quickly and take other measures to open its markets to foreign goods and services.

"It won't be easy to solve this problem quickly, but it's important that the issue has been raised," said Zuo Xiaolei, chief economist at China Galaxy Securities in Beijing. "The appreciation of the renminbi by itself won't resolve the issue. And structural economic reform is a slow process."

Because gains in the currency make Chinese goods more expensive, the exporters' lobby has been a powerful voice against exchange-rate moves. In a sign that resistance may be weakening, a research institute run by Mr. Bo's ministry issued a report yesterday finding that gains so far in the yuan have had no obvious impact on China's imports, exports or foreign investment. The report said the currency, which strengthened 2.6% in 2005 and 3.4% in 2006, could gain as much as 5% annually without disrupting trade.

DOJ_NMG_0116435

Separately, the Ministry of Commerce said foreign direct investment into China -- money spent to acquire or build up businesses in the country -- dropped 4.1% to $69.47 billion in 2006, from $72.41 billion in 2005. Investment inflows in 2005 were boosted by an unusual number of big-ticket deals as foreign institutions bought into China's state-owned banks.

Spanish Premier Admits Mistakes With Separatists Tied To Bombing (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

MADRID, Jan. 15 (AP) — Spain's prime minister apologized Monday for putting his faith in a Basque peace effort that collapsed in a deadly car bombing in December, but he insisted he was right to have sought negotiations with separatist militants and appealed to his political foes for unity at a time of crisis.

In a speech to Parliament that was often interrupted by jeers and grumbles from conservative lawmakers, Prime Minister José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero did not announce any concrete new measures against the armed separatist group ETA.

He said that police pressure and court trials had continued during the now ended cease-fire with the group, and that such measures would remain. "I want to recognize the clear mistake I made before all Spanish citizens," he said.

Mr. Zapatero, the Socialist leader, who faces a general election in early 2008, appeared at a session of Parliament dedicated exclusively to the government's policy toward ETA in the wake of the bombing, the group's first fatal one since May 2003.

He defended his record and sought to muster support for his government, though the conservatives have called him naïve for seeking to negotiate with what they called a terrorist group that could not be trusted.

The bombing on Dec. 30 destroyed a parking garage outside of Madrid's airport and killed two young Ecuadorean men.

In Spain, Bitter Rift Over Fighting Terror (CSM)

By Geoff Pingree And Lisa Abend

The Christian Science Monitor, January 16, 2007

from the January 16, 2007 edition - http://www.csmonitor.com/2007/0116/p07s02-woeu.html In Spain, bitter rift over fighting terror For the first time since the 1970s, a major political party decided not to join in an anti-ETA march.

By Geoff Pingree and Lisa Abend | Correspondents of The Christian Science Monitor

MADRID

Two weeks after a bombing by the Basque separatist group ETA brought a fledgling peace process to an abrupt halt, the government of Prime Minister José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero is confronting political strife as vicious as any seen in Spain's three decades of democracy.

Saturday, an estimated 200,000 Spaniards took to the streets to protest ETA's bombing of a multi-tiered parking lot at Madrid's Barajas airport, which killed two workers. But at this anti-ETA demonstration, unlike all others since Spain became a democracy in the 1970s, a major party refused to participate.

The center-right Popular Party denounced the protest as a government attempt to garner support for its strategy of negotiation with the group, sparking criticisms that parties are politicizing the fight against terrorism for their own benefit ahead of upcoming local and national elections.

"It's every Spaniard's civic duty to support the victims and show we're united against violence and terrorism," said Martín Moreno, a computer consultant marching Saturday with his 9-year-old daughter, Sara. "It seems that opposing the government is more important to the Popular Party than fighting ETA, and that's terrible, just terrible. With that attitude, we all lose."

When three hooded ETA members appeared on a videotape aired on Basque television in March to declare a "permanent" cease-fire, many Spaniards harbored cautious optimism that 40 years of separatist violence might finally end. ETA had not launched a fatal attack in over three years, and this, along with the government's own assessment of the group's intentions, led Mr. Zapatero to request and receive permission from Parliament to begin discussions. Although negotiations appeared to have stalled in recent months, the prime minister himself declared on Dec. 29 that within a year the ETA situation would be "better than where we are today."

The following day's bombing, ETA's most materially destructive yet, dashed those hopes.

DOJ_NMG_0116436

"I wasn't surprised by the attack," says Professor María Sagrario Morán, author of several books on ETA. "Things were happening, like kale borroka [low-level street violence and vandalism] and the discovery of the weapons cache in France, that also preceded the rupture of [ETA's previous] 1998 cease-fire. You could tell that things weren't going well."

Nevertheless, not all believe the Barajas bombing was meant to demolish the peace process. "In the past, ETA has always given advance notice that it was breaking a truce," says Ignacio Sánchez-Cuenca, an ETA expert at Madrid's Complutense University. "They didn't give warning that the cease-fire was over this time because they didn't think the bomb would kill anyone. So they didn't think of it as a rupture."

ETA did place several warning calls about the car bomb, and police attempted to evacuate the area before it exploded, but two Ecuadorean men sleeping in their cars failed to hear the announcements and were killed.

Batasuna, ETA's political wing, told the press that it had not expected the attack, leading many to wonder about a rift between ETA and Batasuna.

"I'm sure that there's disagreement between them," says Professor Sánchez-Cuenca. "Batasuna has nothing to gain by the attack. And in these kinds of processes, there are always hard-liners and moderates."

But both ETA and Batasuna seemed to agree that the peace process was still in effect. At a press conference on the day of the bombing, Batasuna spokesperson Arnaldo Otegi blamed the government for "not making a single gesture in nine months of truce," and insisted that the peace process remained intact. On Jan. 9, ETA claimed responsibility for the bombing and criticized the government for not upholding its end of the bargain, but insisted that "the permanent cease-fire ... is still in effect."

Within the Socialist Party, there was no such agreement. Zapatero's initial statement that the peace process was "suspended" contrasted sharply with Interior Minister Alfred Pérez Rubalcaba's declarations that it was definitively over, and that "ETA had lost all credibility."

No rift has been as bitter as that between the Socialist government and the Popular Party (PP). Although the PP lent grudging support to Zapatero's investigation into the seriousness of ETA's declared intentions to abandon violence, the party has since renewed its relentless attack on the government for negotiating with ETA.

The PP declined to participate in Saturday's march, says PP senator Ignacio Cosido, because, "It was clear to us that the intent of the demonstration was to support the government in its strategy to negotiate. "There is profound division in Spain over how to end ETA's terrorism," he adds. "Zapatero's plan is to negotiate. The PP's plan is to destroy terrorism." Minister of Labor Jesús Caldera blamed the PP for politicizing the event. "The PP has made a strategic decision to use its absence as a political weapon," he told press at the march. With local elections in May, and national ones in 2008, the stakes are high for Zapatero, who has planted his political fortunes squarely on achieving peace.

Eoin O'Broin, spokesman for Sinn Fein, says he saw something similar in the early stages of Northern Ireland's peace process. "It's a high-risk game for Zapatero. If he messes this one up, he'll lose the election. But lately his calculations have been made more on electoral projections than on a strategy for peace. [Former British Prime Minister] John Major made exactly the same mistake."

In a speech before parliament on Monday, Zapatero called for a unified antiterrorism policy and admitted that he had made a "clear mistake" in being too optimistic last month when he said that the peace process would be farther along in a year. Popular Party leader Mariano Rajoy, however, was not satisfied with that position. He said Zapatero had lost all credibility, and demanded that the prime minister admit his mistake in negotiating with ETA.

At the march, Celeste Echegaray summed up the feeling of many participants. "This is a time to come together, not a time for political bickering," said the law student. "The parties have politicized the demonstration, but in the fight against terrorism, here in the street, people are united."

France Proposed Merger With Britain In '56 (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 15 (AP) — France's government proposed forming a union with Britain in 1956, and also discussed joining the Commonwealth, the British Broadcasting Corporation reported Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0116437

Citing documents in the National Archives, the BBC said Prime Minister Guy Mollet of France had discussed the possibility of a merger between the countries with Sir Anthony Eden, the British prime minister at the time.

That discussion took place on Sept. 10, 1956, when Mr. Mollet visited London, but Sir Anthony rejected the idea, the BBC said.

At the time, France was smarting over the loss of the Suez Canal and Egyptian support for separatists in Algeria and was trying very hard to get British assistance in responding, the BBC reported.

The discussions came to nothing. The BBC said the documents were declassified about 20 years ago but had not been noticed until now.

This Queen Of France Had A Very Short Reign (WT/AP)

By Raphael G. Satter

The Washington Times, January 16, 2007

LONDON -- Could France have been better off as subjects of Queen Elizabeth II?

The revelation that the French government proposed a union of Britain and France in 1956 -- even offering to accept the sovereignty of the British queen -- has scholars on both sides of the channel astonished -- and a lot of Frenchmen spluttering with disbelief and indignation.

Newly discovered documents in Britain's National Archives reveal that 50 years ago Prime Minister Guy Mollet discussed the possibility of a merger between the two nations with British Prime Minister Anthony Eden.

"I completely fell off my seat," says Richard Vinen, a specialist in French history at King's College in London. "It's such a bizarre thing to propose."

Mr. Eden rejected the idea of a union but liked the French proposal to join the British Commonwealth. One document says that Mr. Mollet "had not thought there need be difficulty over France accepting the headship of Her Majesty [Queen Elizabeth II]."

While the two nations -- separated by a narrow body of water called by different names in France and England -- have been bitter rivals since the Middle Ages, the two EU partners now trade tourists rather than prisoners. What animosity remains has been relegated to world culinary name-calling, with the French and British reduced to calling each other froggies and "rosbifs" (or roast beefs).

Proposals for Anglo-French unity are not necessarily new. English royalty claimed the title of "King (or Queen) of France" into the 19th century. Winston Churchill, in a last-ditch attempt to keep France on the side of the Allies in World War II, appealed for a full union of the two nations in June 1940.

The proposals all shared an element of desperation, says Kevin Ruane, a historian at Canterbury Christ Church University in England.

Threatened by an Arab revolt in French Algeria and hobbled by instability at home, France was desperate to maintain its independence from both the Soviet Union and the United States, Mr. Ruane says. Mr. Eden, who fought in France during World War I and spoke the language well enough that the French were not notably offended by his accent, might have seemed particularly approachable to Mr. Mollet, a onetime English teacher.

But even under all those circumstances, the suggestion that France accept the British queen strikes historians as bizarre, and Frenchmen as unspeakable.

Mr. Mollet was a socialist, and Frenchmen usually regard the execution of King Louis XVI as one of the crowning achievements of the French Revolution. They would have been unlikely to welcome a foreign monarch with open arms, though not necessarily the guillotine.

The Mollet memoirs show nothing about the proposal, says Francois Lafon, a history professor at La Sorbonne in Paris and a Mollet biographer.

A year after Britain turned down France's proposal, the French joined the Common Market, the European Union's predecessor. By the time Britain tried to join seven years later, the tables had turned.

Charles de Gaulle had brought a new order to French political life and improved its international standing, even as Britain's economy stagnated. Mr. de Gaulle vetoed Britain's attempts to join the European Economic Community -- twice.

DOJ_NMG_0116438

The documents, which have been declassified for more than 20 years, were found by a British Broadcasting Corp. producer late last month.

Beyond PR At BP (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 16, 2007

Don't expect much sympathy for John Browne now that his tenure as chief executive of BP has been cut short by 17 months. Sorrow certainly wasn't the sentiment expressed by investors, who have sent BP shares up more than 2.2% in London and nearly 5% on Wall Street since Friday's announcement that Lord Browne would leave the oil giant this summer rather than at the end of next year.

Big Oil is one of the most vilified industries among politicians and the press, many of whom would have you believe that running these companies involves little more than deciding how badly to "gouge" gasoline consumers after hurricanes. Lord Browne is paying the price for BP's struggles in recent years, most notably an explosion at a Texas refinery that killed 15 workers, oil spills in Alaska and alleged market manipulation in the U.S.

Then again, Lord Browne didn't help himself by trying to persuade the world that British Petroleum wasn't in the oil biz. In 2000, BP launched its $200 million "Beyond Petroleum" campaign to reshape its image, running ads that shifted emphasis from oil and gasoline to more politically correct fuels. The company is spending $8 billion over 10 years to boost its alternative fuels business.

Yet at about the same time BP embarked on a plan to cut costs at all of its refineries by 25%, according to investigators with the U.S. Chemical Safety Board who are looking into the 2005 Texas City refinery accident. That cost-cutting, the CSB says, undermined routine maintenance that might have prevented the blast. BP has denied the link between cost-cutting and safety, including oil leaks from corroded pipelines. But a report due to be released today by former Secretary of State James Baker is expected to echo these concerns.

Contrast BP's record with that of ExxonMobil, which has been demonized even more than other oil majors for refusing to toe the environmentalist line on climate change. Yet over the past decade it has largely avoided the kinds of troubles that have socked BP. Companies must be free to reduce expenses, and it's impossible to say whether BP shifted too much money from maintenance to PR. What is clear is that BP's shareholders don't like receiving news of an oil spill any more than environmentalists do. An oil company's first obligation is to its oil business.

Car Washes And Genocide (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

Genocide may be the worst of crimes, but historically it has also brought out the best in some people.

The Raoul Wallenbergs of 2007 speckle America and the globe. And I don't just mean the aid workers — 13 of whom have been murdered for their efforts in Darfur since last May — but also those ordinary Americans who have united in a grass-roots campaign to try to stop genocide half a world away in Sudan.

President Bush and other world leaders have dropped the ball on Darfur. But that vacuum of moral leadership has been filled by university students, churches and temples, celebrities like George Clooney and Mia Farrow, and armies of schoolchildren.

Their arsenal — green armbands, phone calls to the White House, bake sales to raise money — all seem pallid. How can a "Save Darfur" lawn sign in Peoria intimidate government-backed raiders in Sudan or Chad who throw babies into bonfires?

Yet, finally, we see evidence that those armbands and lawn signs can make a difference. Last week, the Save Darfur Coalition — the grass-roots organization that puts out those lawn signs — sponsored a trip by Bill Richardson, the New Mexico governor, to Khartoum to negotiate with President Omar al-Bashir.

Sure, it's a little weird when a private advocacy group undertakes freelance diplomacy. But if George W. Bush, Tony Blair, Jacques Chirac and Hu Jintao twiddle their thumbs, then more power to the freelancers.

DOJ_NMG_0116439

Mr. Richardson worked out a joint statement in which Sudan agreed to a 60-day cease-fire to allow peace talks to resume, provided the Darfur rebels go along as well. Mr. Bashir also agreed that Sudan would prosecute rapes and stop painting its military aircraft to look as if they belong to the U.N.

The first thing to say is that Mr. Bashir has repeatedly broken his pledges in the past. Count me deeply skeptical about whether it will be any different this time. Mudawi Ibrahim Adam, a Sudanese human rights campaigner, told me he thinks that President Bashir simply made cosmetic concessions in hopes of winning the chairmanship of the African Union later this month.

That said, there may be a path forward here. While U.N. peacekeepers and a no-fly zone are needed, ultimately the only way to end the slaughter is to achieve a peace agreement in Darfur. And that seems more feasible today than it was a week ago.

Most striking, it's clear that the cease-fire was a consequence of all those armbands and lawn signs. Mr. Richardson told me that Mr. Bashir was motivated by concern at the way the killings have been spotlighted by Darfur activists. Mr. Richardson quoted him as saying, "These guys have caused me a lot of damage."

Ken Bacon, who heads Refugees International and accompanied Mr. Richardson, said of President Bashir: "One thing that was very clear was that the Save Darfur movement has gotten under his skin. The vilification of the Khartoum regime in columns and editorials and ads is making a difference."

So cherish this historical moment. The long record of genocide is one overwhelmingly of acquiescence, but this time ordinary citizens are trying to write a different ending.

There are the students at Santa Clara University in California who replicated a mini refugee camp and slept in it. They limited themselves to 1,000 calories a day — because that's what Darfuris are limited to — and donated the savings to aid groups.

Or there's Jason Miller, a California M.D./Ph.D student who in his spare time has become the foremost expert on how investments by foreign companies underwrite the Sudanese genocide. Or Beth Reilly, a stay-at-home mom in Indiana who works on Darfur a little bit every day. Or the legions of schoolkids who organize car washes, and ask for donations in lieu of birthday presents, in hopes of saving other children halfway around the globe.

Sudan's leaders are used to bullying everyone. Jan Pronk, who was the United Nations envoy in Sudan until Khartoum ejected him, reports in his Weblog that a U.N. official recently went to the authorities in Darfur to complain about human rights violations. A Sudanese official retorted: "You better shut up. We can always expel you, as we have proven."

But finally President Bashir is confronting people whom he can't bully. Let's have no illusions about how much more pressure will be necessary to stop the slaughter, but let's also celebrate this moment. Mr. Bashir has blinked, showing that it just may be possible to fight genocide with moral courage and lawn signs.

DOJ_NMG_0116440

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, JANUARY 16, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Cheney: Feds' Review Of Credit Records Legal (USAT) 4
Cheney: Credit Checks Aren't Illegal (AP) 4
Cheney Defends Efforts To Obtain Records (NYT) 5
Cheney Defends Pentagon (LAT) 6
Pentagon Disavows Official's Comments About Firms Defending Gitmo Detainees (WSJ/AP) 7
Interrogation Research Is Lacking, Report Says (WP) 7
Some At Guantanamo Mark 5 Years In Limbo (WP) 8
Tribunal Rules Made Secretly (HILL) 10
Mr. Stimson And The American Way (WSJ) 11
Sliming The Defense (LAT) 12
Cuba: Charge Posada With Terror, Not Lying (AP) 12
Jury Told Botched Bombing Was Still Punishable Crime (WT/AP) 13
Britain Tries 6 In Bomb Plot That Fizzled (NYT) 14
Trial Opens In London Transit Bombing Plot (WP) 15
Europe Hopes To Thwart Terrorists With A High-Tech Aircraft That Snoops (WP) 16

Homeland Response:

Trying To Execute Reform (USNEWS) 18
CIA Emphasizes Flexibility In New Strategy (USAT) 18
Bioterror Antidote: Unfulfilled Prescription (WP) 19
BWI Second In Losses Of Uniforms, ID Cards (WT) 21
U.S. Enacts New Air Travel Passport Rules (BSUN) 22
Terror Official: 'We're Going To Get Hit' (NSWK) 23
A Personnel Challenge At DHS (WP) 23
Once More Into The Security Breach (NYT) 24
Port Security Goes Overboard (LAT) 25

War News:

Republicans Revolt Over Bush's Iraq Plan (NSWK) 26
When A President Owns A War (USNEWS) 27
Iraq Realigns American Politics (NSWK) 28
Vermont Pays A Huge Toll In Iraq (USNEWS) 28
Bush's Legacy Hinges On Al-Maliki's Actions (WT) 29
Bush's Iraq Plan Races Against Two Clocks (CSM) 29
Analysis: Differences Snarl Iraq Plan (AP) 31
Use Of Kurdish Troops In Baghdad Debated (WP) 31
U.S. Commander Warns Of Long Struggle In Iraq (NYT) 32
U.S. Puts Faith In Iraqi Politicians To Lead Security Effort (LAT) 33
More Troops In Iraq, But Success Will 'Take Time' (USAT) 34
Casey Says Results In Iraq Won't Be Fast (AP) 35
Maliki Attacked For Ties To Shia Militants (FT) 36
'Give Us A Chance' (NSWK) 36
Poll: Bush's New Iraq Strategy Fails To Rally Public Support (USAT) 38
What Congress Can (And Can't) Do On Iraq (WP) 39
Has Bush Ordered Secret War On Iran? (NSWK) 40
Rice Arranges Three-way Mideast Summit (AP) 40
U.S. Courts Allies' Support On Iran (WSJ) 41
Iranian Leaders Speak Out Against US (FT) 42
Defense Secretary, In Afghan Capital, Scolds Iran (NYT) 43
Gates Sees Iran As 'Negative' (WT) 44
U.S. Beefs Up Force To Calm Gulf Fears (WT) 44
Gates: Time Is Not Right For Iran Talks (AP) 45
Israel Buzzes Over Notion Of Attacking Iran (CSM) 45
Iraqi Government Cultivates Iranian Ties (LAT) 47
Is Iran Driving New Saudi Diplomacy? (CSM) 48
Iraqi Hangings Bring More Denunciations (WP) 49
Second Hanging Also Went Awry, Iraq Tape Shows (NYT) 51
Sunni Anger Over Bungling Of Execution (FT) 53
Anger Greets Bodies Of Executed In Tikrit (LAT) 54
Sunnis Blast Hanging Of 2 Saddam Aides (AP) 55
Saddam Kin Beheaded By Hanging (WT/AP) 56
Town Honors Executed Former Hussein Aides (LAT) 57
Execution Of Saddam Accomplices Goes Awry (MCT) 58
Rice Vilifies Handling Of Iraq Hangings (AP) 59
CONFLICT IN IRAQ Iraq Refugee Crisis Exploding 40% Of Middle Class Believed To Have Fled Crumbling Nation (SFC) 59
Former Iraqi Translator Tells Of Threats (AP) 61
Iraqi Refugees Find Sanctuary, And Fellow Iraqis, In Sweden (NYT) 62
Why They Fight -- From Within (WP) 63
On Day Honoring Pacifist, Troops Join In Dissent Of War (VAPILOT) 64
Pakistan Will Close Four Camps To Foil Afghan Terror (WT) 65

DOJ:

Lam's Ouster Concerns Lawmakers (SDUT) 66
U.S. Attorney Vacancies Spark Concerns (WSJ) 67
Nevada U.S. Attorney Given Walking Papers (LVRJ) 67
Politicizing Prosecutors (NYT) 69

Corporate Scandals:

H-P Leak Probe Brings Guilty Plea (WSJ)..... 69
U.S. Gets Aid Of Detective In H-P Case (WSJ) 70

Criminal Law:

Libby Trial Starts This Week Under Dimmer Spotlight (USAT)... 70
Trial Is Set To Begin For Former Cheney Adviser (NYT)..... 71
At Libby Trial, Power Players Face Uncomfortable Spotlight (WP)..... 73
Politics At Forefront In Libby Trial (AP)..... 74
Libby Trial To Open With Eye On Cheney (WT) 75
Political Theater Awaited At Libby Trial (LAT) 76
Cheney Calls Ex-Aide Libby 'Honest' (AP) 78
NYC Has Three Capital Trials All At Once (AP) 78
'Cub Fan Bandit' Only The Latest In Long Line Of Chicago Robbers (WP) 80
Fraud Cases Are Rising, F.B.I. Says (NYT) 81
Mortgage Fraud's New Super Sleuths (KCS)..... 81
Williams Is Third Guilty In 'Waltz' (MCA)..... 83
Bruno Bought Stock With Campaign Funds (NYT) 84
'Yes, I'm Guilty' Say Two Morial Cohorts (NOTP) 85
Pipe Bomb Found On Truck Driven By Witness (MH) 88
FBI: Bomb Found Fixed To Federal Witness' Car (BRAH) 89
Selling Coca-Cola's Secrets To Pepsi? (AP)..... 89
Questions Raised In Probe Of Anello That Began In 2004 (BUFFNEWS) 90
The Legal Tangles Of Data Collection (WP)..... 91
Descending To New Depths (column) (NYT) 92
The Mentally Ill, Behind Bars (NYT)..... 93

Civil Law:

Who Pays For Protection? (WP)..... 94
Tracking Outsourced Bonanzas (NYT)..... 95
Better Oversight Of Contractors (BOS) 96
Oversight And Democrats: Easy, Now. (But Not Too Easy.) (USAT) 97

Civil Rights:

Bush: Honor King's Legacy By Helping All (AP)..... 98
Volunteers Take 'Day On' For King (WT) 99
Walking Just Like King Did (WP) 100
Martin Luther King Papers Go On Display (AP) 100
MLK Exhibit Draws Record Opening Crowd King's Words Retain Allure (AJC)..... 102
At King Events, Politicians Mount New Calls For Justice (NYT) 102
Lee Honors Postponed To April (WT)..... 103
Alleged Voting Rights Violation With Twist Goes To Trial (WP) 104
Compass Settles Claim It Discriminated Against Unmarried Car Buyers (BIRMBIZ)..... 105
Compass Settles Complaint (BN) 105
State Police Panel Reviewing Claim Trooper Was Told To Lie To Monitors (BERGENCR)..... 106
Legislation Targets Human Trafficking In State (LAWET)..... 107
Suit Calls Sacrifice A Religious Right (WT) 108
Virginia Assembly To Tackle Abortion (WP)..... 109
The Republicans' Gamble (WP) 110

Antitrust:

Blitz Of Mergers, Buyouts Sets A Record (CSM) 110
Brocade-McData Deal Forces FTC Juggling (DEAL)..... 111
DOJ Details Plans In Lawsuit Against Realtors (INMAN)..... 112
GE Buys Aerospace Unit For $4.8 Billion (AP)..... 114
Steel Firms' Deal Challenged (WSJ) 114

Environment:

Out Of Sight, Under Fire Over Leases (NYT)..... 115
Oil Industry Braces For A Big Tax Hit (HILL)..... 117
The OPEC Energy Security Act (WSJ)..... 118
Energy Time (NYT) 119
Senators Poised To Reintroduce Global-warming Bill (HILL).... 120
Cutbacks Impede Climate Studies (WP) 120
Warming Trend Visible In The Trees (USAT)..... 121
When Being Green Raises The Heat (NYT)..... 122
Park Police Short On Funds (WT) 123
Park Service Seeks Outside Aid (WT/AP)..... 123
Ethanol Could Fuel Rise In Corn (WSJ) 124
Conservation Group, Unions Joining Forces (WP)..... 125
The Other Team's Playbook (WP)..... 126

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

DEA Raids Sweep Valley (TVH)..... 127
Colombian Police Arrest Drug Kingpin (NYT/AP)..... 128
Is Baseball Drugs Ruling A Fourth-Amendment Foul? (WSJ)... 128
Sen.: Drugs Smuggled To Haiti By Plane (WP/AP)..... 130
Ecuador's Divided Loyalties (LAT)..... 130
Member Of Ruling Kuwait Family Condemned (NYT/AP)..... 132
A Rifle In Every Pot (NYT) 132

Immigration:

FBI Probes Fatal Ariz. Border Shooting (NSDY/AP) 133

Tax:

IRS's Free File Gets A Revamp (WSJ)..... 134
The Light-Touch Tax Audit (NYT)..... 134

Congress-Administration:

Bush Plots Health-Care Push (WSJ)..... 134
Unlikely Allies Advocate Healthcare Overhaul (LAT)..... 136
Groups Unite On Healthcare (HILL) 137
State Plans Miss The Point (USAT)..... 138
Both Plans Go Too Far. Government Meddling Can't Fix This. (USAT)..... 139
Burden Set To Shift On Balanced Budget (WP)..... 139
The Tough Part Is Up Next: How To Pay For Agenda (RC)..... 141
Democrats Seek The Middle On Social Issues (NYT) 142
Pit Bulls Vs. Stalwarts In House GOP (WT) 143
Senators Will Have To Pay For Their Seats In Skyboxes If Ban Approved (USAT) 144
Testing Reid's Ethical Limits (WP)..... 145
Ethics Fencing In The Senate (NYT)..... 146
Democrats Vow 5-day Workweek... Sort Of (AP)..... 146
In Six Years In Office, One Year At Camp David (WP)..... 147
Major Farm Bill Divides Lawmakers, Bush (AP)..... 148
Democrats Look To Boost Investor Rights (FT) 150

DOJ_NMG_0116442

Hill Moves To Pull Pensions (RC) ... 150
Ethics Panels Staffing Up (HILL) ... 151
Rules Changes (NYT) ... 152
Ethical Progress (WP) ... 153
Shadow Delegation Toils In Obscurity For D.C.'s Day In The Sun (WP) ... 153
The Hill's Revolving-Door Rules Don't Work In Both Directions (WP) ... 155
FEDERAL DIARY: A Fight Over Fines For Social Security Workers (WP) ... 156
Pelosi's Tuna Surprise (WSJ) ... 157

Other News:

A Ticket On A Taurus Grows Into Much More (WP) ... 157
Choice Of Martinez Sparks GOP Rebellion (WT) ... 159
Report: Sen. Allard Won't Seek 3rd Term (AP) ... 160
Allard Bows Out, Setting Off Skirmish (DENP) ... 160
Allard: No Third Term (RMNA) ... 161
Sen. Allard Says He Will Retire In 2008 (WP) ... 162
Colorado Senator Won't Seek Re-election (WT) ... 163
Task Gets Taller For G.O.P. (NYT) ... 164
Population Shifts (NYT) ... 164
NRCC's Cole Optimistic About Lost GOP Majority (HILL) ... 164
Two Davids Contemplate N.Y. Goliath (RC) ... 166
Iraq Plan Tricky For '08 Aspirants (USAT) ... 167
Obama, McCain: 2 War Views (CHIT) ... 168
Bush's Troop 'surge' Shapes 2008 Race (CSM) ... 169
Our Tunnel Vision (WP) ... 170
Echoing King In New York, Edwards Calls For War's End (NYT) 171
Edwards Echoes King's Anti-war Message (AP) ... 171
Are Bill's Friends Hill's Friends, Too? (AP) ... 172
Obama Inches Closer To Announcing (CHIT) ... 173
Biden Wants Confederate Flag Off Grounds (AP) ... 174
Napolitano's Dilemma (RC) ... 174
Gingrich Sees Error In Pull Of Voter Base (WT) ... 175
In '08 Race, Hopefuls Bag Early Support (HILL) ... 176
A Dark Horse's War Edge (WP) ... 177
Confederate Flag Should Go, 2 Presidential Hopefuls Say (MBSN/MCT) ... 178
Joseph Biden Can Now Strut His Stuff (RC) ... 179
Nevada Is Game For '08 Caucuses (LAT) ... 180
New Orleans Feels Pain Of Mental Health Crisis (USAT) ... 182
51% Of Women Are Now Living Without Spouse (NYT) ... 184
Intelligence In The Classroom (WSJ) ... 186
Mr. Ehrlich's Legacy (WP) ... 187
Rice Arranges Meeting Between Olmert, Abbas (WT) ... 188
Rice Plans A Joint Meeting With Mideast Leaders (NYT) ... 189
Big 3-Way Summit? Or Just Another Meeting? (WSJ) ... 190
Rice To Preside Over Meeting With Israelis, Palestinians (MCT) 190
Mideast Leaders Agree To Meeting (LAT) ... 191
Rice Says Planned Mideast Talks Most Ambitious In Six Years (AFP) ... 192
Rice Announces 3-Way Talks On Palestinian State (WP) ... 193
Rice To Hold Three-way Talks With Mideast Leaders (USAT) . 195
Rice Speaks Softly In Egypt, Avoiding Democracy Push (NYT) 196
Bush Ally Hopes To Win Over Islamic World (FT) ... 197
Somalia's Transitional Government Shuts 3 Radio Stations (NYT) ... 198
Somalia's Window Of Opportunity (LAT) ... 199
Castro Reportedly In Grave Condition (WP/AP) ... 199
Venezuela Ends Oil Negotiations (DJ/AP) ... 200
With New Urgency, U.S. And South Korea Seek Free-Trade Deal (NYT) ... 200
Beijing Vows To Rein In Trade Surplus (WSJ) ... 201
Spanish Premier Admits Mistakes With Separatists Tied To Bombing (NYT/AP) ... 201
In Spain, Bitter Rift Over Fighting Terror (CSM) ... 201
France Proposed Merger With Britain In '56 (NYT/AP) ... 203
This Queen Of France Had A Very Short Reign (WT/AP) ... 203
Beyond PR At BP (WSJ) ... 204
Car Washes And Genocide (NYT) ... 204

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0116443

TERRORISM NEWS:

Cheney: Feds' Review Of Credit Records Legal (USAT)

USA Today, January 15, 2007

Vice President Cheney said Sunday that the Pentagon and CIA are not violating anyone's rights by examining the banking and credit records of people suspected of terrorism or espionage in the USA. "This is an authority that goes back three or four decades. It was reaffirmed in the Patriot Act," Cheney said on Fox News Sunday. "It's a perfectly legitimate activity. There's nothing wrong with it or illegal."

The vice president said that the Defense Department "gets involved because we've got hundreds of bases inside the United States that are potential terrorist targets."

Rep. Silvestre Reyes, D-Texas, chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, said that "any expansion by the department into intelligence collection" is something the committee will want to thoroughly review.

The issue arose after The New York Times reported Sunday that the Pentagon and CIA had issued up to 500 national security letters that permit the executive branch to seek records without a judge's approval or grand jury subpoena. Most are issued by the FBI, the lead agency in terrorism and espionage investigations.

The letters have generated criticism and court challenges from the American Civil Liberties Union and other privacy advocates.

Obama to announce decision soon

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., said he will "be making an announcement fairly soon" about whether he will seek his party's nomination for president. "Obviously, there's been a lot of talk. It's something that I've been considering," Obama said on CBS' Face the Nation.

Among Democrats running or considering a campaign are Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut, former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack, former North Carolina senator John Edwards, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Delaware Sen. Joseph Biden and Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry.

Cheney: Credit Checks Aren't Illegal (AP)

AP, January 15, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney said Sunday the Pentagon and CIA are not violating people's rights by examining the banking and credit records of hundreds of Americans and others suspected of terrorism or espionage in the United States.

Rep. Silvestre Reyes, D-Texas, the new chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, said his panel will be the judge of that.

National security letters permit the executive branch to seek records about people in terrorism and spy investigations without a judge's approval or grand jury subpoena.

"The Defense Department gets involved because we've got hundreds of bases inside the United States that are potential terrorist targets," Cheney said.

"The Department of Defense has legitimate authority in this area. This is an authority that goes back three or four decades. It was reaffirmed in the Patriot Act," he said. "It's perfectly legitimate activity. There's nothing wrong with it or illegal. It doesn't violate people's civil rights."

In a statement Sunday, Reyes promised that his panel would take a careful look at those claims.

"Any expansion by the department into intelligence collection, particularly on U.S. soil, is something our committee will thoroughly review," Reyes said.

"We want our intelligence professionals to have strong tools that will enable them to interrupt the planning process of our enemies and to stop attacks against our country," he said. "But in doing so, we also want those tools to comply fully with the law and the Constitution."

The Pentagon and the CIA, to a lesser extent, have used this little-known power, officials said. The FBI, the lead agency on domestic counterterrorism and espionage, has issued thousands of such letters since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

The letters have generated criticism and court challenges from civil liberties advocates who claim they invade the privacy of Americans' lives, even though banks and other financial institutions typically turn over the financial records voluntarily.

DOJ_NMG_0116444

The vast majority of national security letters are issued by the FBI, but in rare circumstances they have been used by the CIA before and after Sept. 11, according to a U.S. intelligence official. The CIA has used these noncompulsory letters in espionage investigations and other circumstances, the official said.

The New York Times, which reported Sunday on the expanded use of the technique by the Pentagon and CIA, said military intelligence officers have sent the letters in up to 500 investigations.

"This is a dramatic story, but I think it's important for people to understand here this is a legitimate security effort that's been under way for a long time, and it does not represent a new departure from the standpoint of our efforts to protect ourselves against terrorist attacks," the vice president said.

Cheney Defends Efforts To Obtain Records (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, January 15, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney yesterday defended efforts by the Pentagon and the Central Intelligence Agency to obtain financial records of Americans suspected of terrorism or espionage, calling the practice a "perfectly legitimate activity" used partly to protect troops stationed on military bases in the United States.

But the chairman of the House Intelligence Committee expressed concern over the expansion of the military's domestic intelligence collection efforts and said his committee would investigate how the Pentagon was using its authority.

Appearing on "Fox News Sunday," Mr. Cheney said "national security letters" issued to banks and credit agencies were an essential tool for investigating terrorism cases in the United States.

He said the Pentagon had crossed no legal boundaries in issuing the letters independent of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

"There's nothing wrong with it or illegal," Mr. Cheney said. "It doesn't violate people's civil rights. And if an institution that receives one of these national security letters disagrees with it, they're free to go to court to try to stop its execution."

Representative Silvestre Reyes, a Texas Democrat who is the new chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, said his panel would examine the matter. Mr. Reyes also indicated that he might renew efforts to pass a law requiring various agencies to get court approval before issuing national security letters.

"Any expansion by the department into intelligence collection, particularly on U.S. soil, is something our committee will thoroughly review," he said in a statement issued to the news media.

Since the Sept. 11 attacks, the Pentagon has issued hundreds of letters to American banks and other financial institutions seeking information about suspects in counterterrorism or counterespionage investigations.

Banks are not required to hand over the information, but Pentagon officials said that financial institutions usually complied.

The C.I.A. also uses the letters as an investigative tool, but issues them far less frequently than does the Pentagon, intelligence officials said.

The use of the national security letters by the Pentagon and the C.I.A. was first reported in The New York Times yesterday.

By law, the Pentagon and the C.I.A. are barred from any domestic law enforcement activities. But government officials said that their authority to issue the letters dated back several decades and was strengthened by the USA Patriot Act, an antiterrorism law passed in 2001.

Mr. Cheney said yesterday that the letters were valuable for protecting American forces stationed at hundreds of bases in the United States.

Since Sept. 11, the Pentagon has increased its domestic intelligence collection efforts to help ensure that American bases are protected from potential terrorist attacks.

The efforts have been criticized by civil liberties organizations, who say the Pentagon is using "force protection" to spy on Americans and collect information on groups like war protesters.

The American Civil Liberties Union said yesterday that it had "serious concerns" about the use of the letters by the Pentagon and the C.I.A., and it called for a Congressional investigation to examine the frequency and legal basis for the records demands, along with civil liberties safeguards in place.

"This country has a long tradition of rejecting the use of the C.I.A. and the Pentagon to spy on Americans, and rightfully so," said Caroline Fredrickson, director of the A.C.L.U.'s Washington office. "Today's published report that the Pentagon and C.I.A. have been relying on 'national security letters' to collect the financial records of Americans without judicial supervision or Congressional oversight raises a host of questions that need to be answered."

Pentagon officials said the financial documents obtained through the national security letters usually did not establish an individual's links to terrorism or espionage and had rarely led to criminal charges.

DOJ_NMG_0116445

But officials said the records still had intelligence value, and the Pentagon plans within the next year to incorporate the records into a database at its Counterintelligence Field Activity office.

With the Democrats now in charge of both houses of Congress, the House and the Senate Intelligence Committees are planning hearings on various intelligence programs conducted by the Bush administration since Sept. 11, 2001.

At the top of the agenda are hearings on the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program and the C.I.A.'s detention and interrogation of terrorism suspects.

Mr. Reyes indicated yesterday that the military's domestic collection efforts could also be a priority for his committee.

"We want our intelligence professionals to have strong tools that will enable them to interrupt the planning process of our enemies and to stop attacks against our country," his statement said.

"But in doing so, we also want those tools to comply fully with the law and the Constitution."

Cheney Defends Pentagon (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, January 15, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon is not violating privacy rights by requesting information from financial institutions, telephone companies or credit bureaus in suspected espionage and terrorism cases, Vice President Dick Cheney said Sunday.

He defended the requests as a "perfectly legitimate activity" that serves in part to protect personnel on hundreds of military bases within the United States — "potential terrorist targets," in Cheney's words.

The issuance of "national security letters," he told "Fox News Sunday," is a critical investigative tool that allows "us to collect financial information, for example, on … people we have reason to suspect."

But new House Intelligence Committee Chairman Silvestre Reyes (D-Texas) said Sunday that he would hold hearings on the Defense Department requests. The law bars the agency from domestic espionage activities.

"Any expansion by the department into intelligence collection, particularly on U.S. soil, is something our committee will thoroughly review," he said in a statement issued by his office.

Unlike the controversial national security letters issued by the FBI, which compel institutions to turn over information, these letters merely request data. Companies that receive letters are not obligated to provide the information, officials said.

In the last five years, the Pentagon has issued requests in as many as 500 investigations, according to a report Saturday by the New York Times.

Intelligence officials contacted by the Los Angeles Times said the CIA — which also is prohibited from domestic activity — had made similar requests, though far less frequently.

Cheney told "Fox News Sunday": "This is an authority that goes back three or four decades. It was reaffirmed in the Patriot Act that was renewed here about a year or so ago.

"It's a perfectly legitimate activity. There's nothing wrong with it or illegal. It doesn't violate people's civil rights. And if an institution that receives one of these national security letters disagrees with it, they're free to go to court to try to stop its execution."

According to a privacy-law expert, a person's bank records are not deemed private in national security investigations, so government agencies, including the Pentagon, can request these records without a warrant.

"This is almost surely legal. It is not like warrantless wiretapping," said James X. Dempsey, policy director at the Center for Democracy & Technology, a Washington policy center that studies civil liberties in the digital age.

Bank privacy laws make an exception for government requests in investigations related to "intelligence or counterintelligence or international terrorism," and the Pentagon says it can gather intelligence to protect its bases from spies and saboteurs.

But just because the activity is legal "doesn't mean it's a good idea," Dempsey said. "The Defense Department is exploiting a gray zone in the law."

In the past, the Supreme Court has drawn a distinction between what is truly private and what may be searched by the government.

For example, homes and phone conversations are deemed private, and the government cannot enter a home or listen to a phone call without a search warrant from a judge.

However, in the 1970s, the court said that bank records and lists of phone numbers called were not truly private, and that officials could obtain these records if they had a good reason.

Afterward, Congress passed laws requiring banks and phone companies to keep customers' records private, but these measures included exceptions for national security investigations.

DOJ_NMG_0116446

Though the FBI has the legal authority to require banks and other institutions to turn over records, the Pentagon is simply asking to see the records, officials emphasize.

"This puts the bank between a rock and hard place," Dempsey said. "They want to be a good citizen, especially if there is a terrorism threat. They also want to stay within the letter of the law."

And because the request is secret, it is not likely that the person whose records are being sought will complain: Under bank privacy laws, "no financial institution, or officer or employee shall disclose to any person that a government authority [conducting an intelligence investigation] has sought or obtained access to a customer's financial records."

Dempsey questioned why the Pentagon, and not the FBI, was conducting these investigations.

"This concept of 'force protection' is elastic. There is no firm definition in the law," he said.

"I don't see why [the Defense Department] is going it alone and not involving the FBI. This suggests they are still not connecting the dots."

Pentagon Disavows Official's Comments About Firms Defending Gitmo Detainees (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, January 15, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Pentagon disavowed a senior official's remarks suggesting companies boycott law firms that represent detainees at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Charles "Cully" Stimson, the deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, said in a radio interview last week that companies might want to consider taking their business to other firms that do not represent suspected terrorists.

Mr. Stimson's remarks were viewed by legal experts and advocacy groups as an attempt to intimidate law firms that provide legal help to all people, even unpopular defendants.

A Pentagon spokesman, Lt. Col. Brian Maka, said Saturday Mr. Stimson wasn't speaking for the Bush administration. Mr. Stimson's comments "do not represent the views of the Department of Defense or the thinking of its leadership," Mr. Maka said.

Mr. Stimson's "shameful and irresponsible" remarks deserve condemnation, said Neal Sonnett, a Miami lawyer and president of the American Judicature Society, a nonpartisan group of judges, lawyers and others.

Mr. Sonnett said in a statement that Mr. Stimson had made a "blatant attempt to intimidate lawyers and their firms who are rendering important public service in upholding the rule of law and our democratic ideals." Mr. Stimson on Thursday told Federal News Radio, a local commercial station that covers the government, that he found it "shocking" that lawyers at many of the U.S.' top law firms represent detainees. (See related article1.)

Mr. Stimson listed the names of more than a dozen major firms he suggested should be boycotted. "And I think, quite honestly, when corporate CEOs see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line back in 2001, those CEOs are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms," Mr. Stimson said.

Asked who might be paying the law firms to represent Guantanamo detainees, Mr. Stimson hinted at wrongdoing for which some explaining should be done. "It's not clear, is it? Some will maintain that they're doing it out of the goodness of their heart -- that they're doing it pro bono, and I suspect they are," he said.

"Others are receiving monies from who knows where and I'd be curious to have them explain that." Mr. Stimson also described Guantanamo as "certainly, probably the most transparent and open location in the world" because of visits from more than 2,000 journalists since it opened five years ago.

However, journalists aren't allowed to talk to detainees on those visits, their photos are censored and their access to the base has at times been shut off entirely." He discounted international outrage over the detention center as "small little protests around the world" that were "drummed up by Amnesty International" and inflated in importance by liberal news media outlets.

Interrogation Research Is Lacking, Report Says (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

There is almost no scientific evidence to back up the U.S. intelligence community's use of controversial interrogation techniques in the fight against terrorism, and experts believe some painful and coercive approaches could hinder the ability to get good information, according to a new report from an intelligence advisory group.

The 374-page report from the Intelligence Science Board examines several aspects of broad interrogation methods and approaches, and it finds that no significant scientific research has been conducted in more than four decades about the effectiveness of many techniques the U.S. military and intelligence groups use regularly. Intelligence experts wrote that a lack of research could explain why abuse has been alleged at U.S. facilities in Afghanistan, Cuba and Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0116447

"Since there had been little or no development of sustained capacity for interrogation practice, training, or research within intelligence or military communities in the post-Soviet period, many interrogators were forced to 'make it up' on the fly," wrote Robert A. Fein, chairman of the study, published by the National Defense Intelligence College. "This shortfall in advanced, research-based interrogation methods at a time of intense pressure from operational commanders to produce actionable intelligence from high-value targets may have contributed significantly to the unfortunate cases of abuse that have recently come to light."

The report explores scientific knowledge on interrogation in the wake of reported abuse around the globe. The study, sponsored by the Defense Intelligence Agency and the Pentagon's Counterintelligence Field Activity, was posted yesterday on the Federation of American Scientists' Web site, at http://www.fas.org/irp/dni/educing.pdf.

In it, experts find that popular culture and ad hoc experimentation have fueled the use of aggressive and sometimes physical interrogation techniques to get those captured on the battlefields to talk, even if there is no evidence to support the tactics' effectiveness. The board, which advises the director of national intelligence, recommends studying the matter.

"There is little systematic knowledge available to tell us 'what works' in interrogation," wrote Robert Coulam, a research professor at the Simmons School for Health Studies in Boston. Coulam also wrote that interrogation practices that offend ethical concerns and "skirt the rule of law" may be narrowly useful, if at all, because such practices could undermine the legitimacy of government action and support for the fight against terrorism.

The Bush administration has long advocated the ability to use aggressive interrogation tactics on terrorism suspects. After abuse came to light at Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison and the Navy's prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, Congress forced the government to limit its approaches to long-standing military doctrine but allowed a loophole that lets the CIA continue such techniques.

The Army's new field manual on intelligence, approved in September, specifically bans some of the most aggressive techniques -- such as "waterboarding," beatings, sensory deprivation and depriving a detainee of food -- and draws clear boundaries for all military personnel who participate in interrogations. Army officials abandoned more coercive techniques because of the abuse scandals and evidence that Army and contract interrogators had developed approaches in the field based on vague guidance.

The new study finds that there may be no value to coercive techniques.

"The scientific community has never established that coercive interrogation methods are an effective means of obtaining reliable intelligence information," wrote Col. Steven M. Kleinman, who has served as the Pentagon's senior intelligence officer for special survival training.

Kleinman wrote that intelligence gathered with coercion is sometimes inaccurate or false, noting that isolation, a tactic U.S. officials have used regularly, causes "profound emotional, psychological, and physical discomfort" and can "significantly and negatively impact the ability of the source to recall information accurately."

Some At Guantanamo Mark 5 Years In Limbo (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Julie Tate

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

Shackled at the wrists and blinded by special goggles, the first captives from the U.S. war in Afghanistan were ushered to makeshift prison cells thousands of miles from the battle, at the U.S. naval station at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, five years ago last week.

Gholam Ruhani was among them, the prison's third official inmate, flown in by cargo plane with the first group of 20 men. The 23-year-old Afghan shopkeeper, who spoke a little English, was seized near his hometown of Ghazni when he agreed to translate for a Taliban government official seeking a meeting with a U.S. soldier.

Ruhani is still at Guantanamo, marking the fifth anniversary of the prison and his own captivity. He remains as stunned about his fate, according to transcripts of his conversations with military officers, as he was when U.S. military police led him inside the razor wire on Jan. 11, 2002, and accused him of being America's enemy.

"I never had a war against the United States, and I am surprised I'm here," Ruhani told his captors during his first chance to hear the military's reasons for holding him, three years after he arrived at Guantanamo. "I tried to cooperate with Americans. I am no enemy of yours."

Now prison and prisoner are forever linked, joined by hasty decisions made in war and trapped by that fateful beginning.

Guantanamo, which is struggling to rid itself of roughly 200 of its 393 remaining detainees, served its original purpose of taking dozens of terrorism suspects and enemy fighters from the chaotic Afghan battlefield and elsewhere, administration officials and the prison's supporters say.

DOJ_NMG_0116448

But after five years and more than $600 million, it has failed to quickly and fairly handle the cases of hundreds of people such as Ruhani, against whom the government has no clear evidence of a role in attacks against the United States, according to current and former government officials and attorneys for detainees.

In the administration's effort to obtain raw intelligence, officials said, it was easier to ship hundreds of men with unclear allegiances to a naval base in Cuba in early 2002 and ask the hard questions later. But with a government focused on interrogations, a bureaucracy lacking tolerance for risk and a detention policy under legal attack, the United States has found it difficult to free many of the detainees, regardless of the information it has on the threat they pose.

"We of course had to make snap judgments in the battlefield," said one administration official involved in reviewing Guantanamo cases, who spoke anonymously to avoid angering superiors. "Where we had problems was that once we had individuals in custody, no one along the layers of review wanted to take a risk. So they would take a shred of evidence that a detainee was associated with another bad person and say that's a reason to keep them."

That policy, and persistent reports of detainee abuse inside Guantanamo's walls, have provided rallying points for Islamic radicals, undermined international support for U.S. efforts to track down terrorists and ignited a legal effort that has repeatedly embarrassed the administration.

"Guantanamo took on a life of its own," said Pierre-Richard Prosper, a former U.S. ambassador at large for war crime issues. "What started as a solution to an immediate problem became both a more permanent place and a cause celebre internationally."

The White House and the Defense Department say the detention and interrogation facility they call Joint Task Force Guantanamo has been a success in protecting Americans and helping U.S. officials learn more about terrorist networks. Dangerous men are inside the prison, among them Khalid Sheik Mohammed, alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, and Ramzi Binalshibh, who is accused of aiding him. They were among 14 detainees transferred there last year as the administration sought, and later won, a law that restricts detainees from challenging their imprisonment in U.S. courts.

So far, 10 detainees have been designated to stand trial before special military commissions, and the Defense Department expects that 80 more will face a similar fate.

"In Guantanamo, we have held the engine of al-Qaeda -- the recruiters, smugglers, trainers, facilitators, financiers, bombmakers and potential suicide bombers -- detained and out of the fight," said Lt. Cmdr. Chito Peppler, a Defense Department spokesman. "We have no desire to be the world's jailer and do not hold detainees for any longer than necessary. We have in place a rigorous process to ensure those held at Guantanamo Bay belong at Guantanamo."

The prison has changed dramatically since its inception, after a battlefield crisis in north-central Afghanistan over Thanksgiving weekend in 2001. For four days, U.S. and British forces fought a prisoner uprising in a fortress used by the CIA as an interrogation site in Mazar-e Sharif. By Nov. 28, hundreds of prisoners were dead and the U.S. military had taken custody of an estimated 200 survivors and suspects.

Army Gen. Tommy R. Franks, in charge of the assault on Afghanistan's al-Qaeda and Taliban strongholds, urged the military to find a site outside the country to hold and evaluate this expanding group of suspects. The job had also overwhelmed his detention facility, a converted machine shop at Bagram air base.

Back in Washington that December, someone floated an idea: What about taking the prisoners to the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay? Then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld liked it. By the next month, military cargo planes were bringing Muslim men seized in Afghanistan and Pakistan to Cuba, 20 and 30 at a time.

President Bush, relying on advisers' untested legal theories, declared a week after the prison opened that the captives were not entitled to Geneva Conventions protections or prisoner-of-war status and could be held in Cuba, without charges, indefinitely.

Between its opening and Feb. 14, 2002, the number of prisoners at Guantanamo swelled to 300. In late January of that year, Vice President Cheney said the detainees were "the worst of a very bad lot" and added: "They are very dangerous. They are devoted to killing millions of Americans."

But of the 773 detainees who have spent time in Guantanamo, the government has released roughly half, most because they had no information and no role in any fighting. The majority were sent home after the evidence against each was formally reviewed at military hearings required in 2004 by the Supreme Court, which rejected the Bush administration's claim that it could detain foreign nationals indefinitely without such sessions.

Of the 393 prisoners who remain today, the military has determined that 85 pose so little threat, they should be transferred to their home countries. Officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity because some evidence about the prisoners is classified, estimate that about 200 pose a danger to Americans.

It is unknown what classified evidence exists to hold Ruhani, who said he was newly married and trying to help his elderly father run an electrical supply store when he was arrested on Dec. 9, 2001. The military tribunal that reviewed his case in 2004 publicly concluded that he was a danger because he was captured with a senior Taliban intelligence officer, was carrying rounds for his pistol and had worked as a part-time aide in a Taliban security office.

DOJ_NMG_0116449

Ruhani told the three-officer tribunal that he had been waiting for three years to set the record straight, transcripts show. He contended that the Taliban required all young men to fight in its army but said he was able to avoid going to the front lines by agreeing to do menial cleaning and clerical jobs at a nearby police office.

"I was afraid I would be killed," he told them.

He had learned a little English to make some sense of the electronics manuals in his family's shop. And, he said, he was happy to help translate when asked by a fellow villager -- Abdul Haq Wasiq, a Taliban official who later became a prisoner with him at Guantanamo -- because he considered the Americans friendly. He said almost everyone in Afghanistan carries a weapon for protection but he handed his over to the Americans as he entered the meeting.

"I believed I was on the Americans' side. I expected to leave that meeting and return to my life, my shop and my family. Instead, I was arrested," he said, adding: "All I want to say is that I am not guilty. I am asking for your help."

The military decided to continue holding Ruhani. At a review hearing the next year, he seemed bewildered that the Americans had not yet determined that his detention was a mistake.

"If there is a misunderstanding, please don't hold that against me," Ruhani said. "When will they let me know that I'll be released?"

One major obstacle for Ruhani and dozens of others still at the prison is nationality. The U.S. government has determined that Afghanistan, and a few other countries, cannot keep track of released detainees who the United States believes are low-risk but need monitoring.

Afghans make up the largest group of current detainees. Yemenis and Saudis, whose countries either cannot handle released detainees or do not want them, also remain in large numbers.

The detainees in that first group of 20 are emblematic of Guantanamo's prisoners. Half have been released. Of the remaining 10, one is David Hicks -- prisoner No. 2 -- an Australian who fought in the Kosovo Liberation Army, then converted to Islam and was captured in Afghanistan. Two are admitted Taliban commanders.

Three others are more like Ruhani, with public files that appear to make them unlikely enemies of the United States.

One is Shakhrukh Hamiduva, an 18-year-old Uzbek refugee who fled his country after the government there killed one of his uncles and jailed other relatives. He tried to cross the border from Afghanistan when U.S. bombs started falling but was captured by a tribal leader and sold to U.S. forces for a bounty. He said soldiers told him he would be released, but instead he ended up in Cuba.

"We went after small fries at every turn," said Neal Katyal, a Georgetown University law professor who helped argue the Supreme Court case last June that struck down the government's original plan for military trials. "Gitmo blew our credibility. And it's going to take a long time to get it back."

Tribunal Rules Made Secretly (HILL)

By Eugene R. Fidell And Kathleen A. Duignan

The Hill, January 16, 2007

Last summer, the National Institute of Military Justice testified about the Military Commissions Act of 2006 (MCA), then under consideration on Capitol Hill. Congress passed the MCA because the Supreme Court had ruled in the Hamdan case on June 29, 2006 that the Guantanamo military commissions, as originally created by the administration, were illegal. The bill, which is now law, authorized military commissions and gave President Bush wide latitude in fashioning rules to implement the statute.

Once the MCA was enacted, the administration began working on the new rules that would be presented to Congress in mid-January. Given the importance of those rules and the flaws in the earlier rules they will replace, a number of organizations asked that the new rules be made available in draft so that the public could submit comments before they were promulgated in final form. That is the process used for other federal rulemaking, although it is not required by statute for military commission rules. NIMJ submitted the first request for notice-and-comment rulemaking on Sept. 28, 2006, followed soon after by the New York City Bar Association and the American Bar Association. The Pentagon never responded to any of these letters. Other organizations submitted letters to Congress and the Department of Defense, and urged their members to do so as well. At a dinner meeting of the ABA's Standing Committee on Law and National Security on Dec. 1, 2006, a Pentagon official revealed — in response to a question from the floor — that the Pentagon would not be providing an opportunity for public comment on the draft because the MCA set a deadline — which has arrived today — for submission of the final rules to Congress. The claim was there was no time to accommodate a public comment period.

DOJ_NMG_0116450

Because these rules were not developed in the open, confidence that the trials will be conducted in a fair and just manner is necessarily compromised. The rules were drafted and reviewed in secret, and are due to be finalized today, without the slightest recognition that transparency and public confidence in the administration of justice are inextricably linked.

In a society that claims to be open, free, and fair, lawmakers should have demanded that every step in the creation of the new generation of military commissions was conducted in public. It is certainly peculiar, in a country that prides itself on the constitutional right to a public trial, that the rules that will govern these important trials, under new legislation, were framed in secret. Public comment would not only have fostered public confidence in the end product, but also may have led to improvements in the rules. Whether you like the idea of military commissions, or dislike it, there was no reason to cut the public and the bar out of this process, and certainly no basis for claiming that the administration had no alternative. Congress often places reporting and submission deadlines on government agencies, but it also regularly relaxes such requirements. In this instance the Pentagon plunged ahead, did not seek any extension, and used the deadline as a shield. Congress should have put a stop to this and instructed the Pentagon that it need not — and should not — file the rules until the public had been afforded at least 60 days to comment on the draft. Instead it allowed another step toward unchecked executive-branch power in the implementation of military commissions.

It's bad enough that Congress engaged in midnight deal-making when it framed the MCA. It could have made amends, at least in part, by subjecting the implementing rules to the harsh disinfectant of sunlight before they took effect. Now that this opportunity is passing today, the 110th Congress must exercise its oversight power to review the new rules for consistency with American values of fairness and due process, or start over again and amend the MCA.

Mr. Stimson And The American Way (WSJ)

By Charles Fried

The Wall Street Journal, January 16, 2007

Defense Department official Charles Stimson showed ignorance and malice in deploring the pro bono representation of Guantanamo detainees by lawyers in some of the nation's leading law firms, and in calling on their corporate clients to punish them for this work.

That some of the law firms Mr. Stimson singles out represent large employers defending discrimination and disability suits, major corporations accused of price fixing, securities fraud and pollution is not because the right hand -- so to speak -- does not know what the left is doing, nor because these firms are major-league hypocrites. On the contrary, they act in the best traditions of the profession -- traditions that are ignored in today's China or Putin's Russia.

It is the pride of a nation built on the rule of law that it affords to every man a zealous advocate to defend his rights in court, and of a liberal profession in such a nation that not only is the representation of the dishonorable honorable (and any lawyer is free to represent any person he chooses), but that it is the duty of the profession to make sure that every man has that representation. So, for instance, it is only the ideologically blinded who would criticize the great John W. Davis for having presented the case for school segregation to the Supreme Court in Brown v. Board of Education, or the ignorant who did not know that he had denounced the Ku Klux Klan and, as Solicitor General, had defended the voting rights of African-Americans.

All that can be said in explanation, if not mitigation, of Mr. Stimson's egregious statements is that he may have been led on by the extravagant rhetoric of ideologues at the other end of the spectrum, who regularly inveigh against law firms which make their living by defending corporate interests accused of abusing employees, consumers and the environment. It was a regular event on law school campuses to see such ideologues picketing campus recruiters from these law firms, and to hear speeches by professors and even law school deans deploring the fact that graduates regularly took up employment in them.

And the hapless Mr. Stimson may also have fallen victim to that lawyers' occupational disease, Acquired Conviction Syndrome. It is too bad that lawyers in this country feel bound not only to submit the best possible arguments for their clients -- virtuous or deplorable -- but also to stump for them in the press, before legislative bodies and in professional organizations. Debate in the American Bar Association and American Law Institute, for instance, has been degraded in recent years by their members carrying their representation of their clients' interest into fora in which their best independent expert judgment is asked for. How unfortunate that in this country we have plaintiffs' lawyers and defendants' lawyers, lawyers who represent only unions and others who represent only management. One looks with nostalgia at the British bar, where barristers will prosecute one day and defend the next.

It may just be that Mr. Stimson is annoyed that his overstretched staff lawyers are opposed by highly trained and motivated elite lawyers working in fancy offices with art work in the corridors and free lunch laid on in sumptuous cafeterias. But it has ever been so; it is the American way. The right to representation does not usually mean representation by the best, brightest and sleekest. That in this case it does is just an irony -- one to savor, not deplore. * * *

DOJ_NMG_0116451

It is no surprise that firms like Wilmer Hale (which represents both Big Pharma and Tobacco Free Kids), Covington and Burling (which represents both Big Tobacco and Guantanamo detainees), and the other firms on Mr. Stimson's hit list, are among the most sought-after by law school graduates, and retain the loyalty and enthusiasm of their partners. They offer their lawyers the profession at its best, and help assure that the rule of law is not just a slogan but a satisfying way of life.

Mr. Fried teaches at Harvard Law School.

Sliming The Defense (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 16, 2007

A Pentagon official's overboard criticism of Gitmo lawyers is consistent with one bad strain of White House thought.

THE PENTAGON has disavowed some offensive criticism by one of its officials regarding American lawyers who have represented accused terrorists imprisoned at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. But the crankish comments of Charles "Cully" Stimson, the deputy assistant secretary of Defense for detainee affairs, reflect a more pervasive reluctance by the Bush administration to acknowledge that injustices have occurred at Guantanamo.

Sounding more like a first-time caller than a government official, Stimson told a radio interviewer last week that "when corporate CEOs see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line back in 2001, those CEOs are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms." Not content to float the idea of a boycott, Stimson, a lawyer too, speculated darkly that although some attorneys representing detainees may be doing so as a public service, "others are receiving monies from who knows where, and I'd be curious to have them explain that." In an earlier period in U.S. history, that sort of hit-and-run insinuation was called McCarthyism.

Amid condemnation of Stimson's remarks from the legal profession, a Pentagon spokesman said they "do not represent the views of the Department of Defense or the thinking of its leadership." (Apparently a deputy assistant secretary is not part of the leadership.) For good measure, Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales said that "good lawyers representing the detainees is the best way to ensure that justice is done in these cases."

But contradicting Stimson — or, even better, firing him — can't alter the fact that his comments in one sense reflect the administration's attitude. Stimson referred not to "accused terrorists" or "suspected terrorists" but to "terrorists." From President Bush on down, the administration has downplayed the possibility that some of the more than 700 people who have been confined at Guantanamo were imprisoned unjustly (not to mention treated inhumanely). Never mind that about half of the original detainees have been released.

Before the U.S. Supreme Court ruled otherwise, the administration insisted that detainees at Guantanamo had no right to challenge their confinement in a U.S. court. The administration devised its own rules for military commissions to try them for alleged war crimes, until the high court ruled that Congress had to be involved. (Even then, the administration was able to convince Congress that detainees shouldn't be allowed to file habeas corpus petitions.)

These policies bespoke an exaggerated understanding of executive power, even in wartime, but they also reflected a certitude bordering on smugness that has characterized too much of the administration's conduct of the war on terror.

Many of the lawyers involved in detainee issues on a pro bono basis are motivated by loyalty to the Constitution, which the administration has sometimes appeared eager to overlook. Advocacy on behalf of due process is a form of patriotism and public service. Criminal prosecutors aren't usually in the business of tarnishing defense attorneys, for good reason, and it's important that the government maintain the same professionalism when prosecuting the war on terror.

Cuba: Charge Posada With Terror, Not Lying (AP)

AP, January 16, 2007

HAVANA - (AP) -- Cuban militant Luis Posada Carriles must be charged with terrorism, not just with lying during U.S. naturalization proceedings, the Cuban government said today in criticizing a recent U.S. Justice Department decision.

"The U.S. government knows very well -- and has all the proof -- of the innumerable acts of terrorism committed by Posada Carriles," the Foreign Ministry said in the statement published on the front page of Granma, the Communist Party's daily newspaper.

Posada, a former CIA operative with ties to the failed Bay of Pigs invasion in the 1960s, is suspected of plotting the bombing of a Cuban jetliner 30 years ago in Venezuela. He was indicted last week in El Paso, Texas, on charges of lying on his application and under oath when applying for naturalization to the United States in September 2005 and April 2006.

The statement said the foreign ministry hopes the recent charges ``won't become a smoke screen to extend immunity for the serious crime of terrorism."

DOJ_NMG_0116452

Cuba and Venezuela say Posada, 78, should face trial in the 1976 Cuban jetliner bombing, either in Venezuela or before an international tribunal. But a federal immigration judge who ordered Posada out of the United States ruled he could not be sent to either country.

Several countries have rejected U.S. requests that Posada be sent there.

In last week's indictment, Posada was charged with one count of naturalization fraud and six counts of making false statements in a naturalization proceeding.

He said he traveled from Honduras through Belize, ultimately reaching the United States near Brownsville, Texas, with the help of a human smuggler. But the U.S. indictment alleges Posada actually entered the country by sea on a boat with four other people.

The trip by sea was mentioned by Cuban President Fidel Castro in a series of speeches about Posada in the spring of 2005. The indictment shows that "the U.S. government was forced to admit that our commander in chief was right," today's statement said.

The indictment also says Posada had a fake Guatemalan passport bearing his photograph and the name Manuel Enrique Castillo Lopez.

If convicted, Posada faces a maximum of 10 years in prison on the naturalization fraud count and five years in prison on each of the false statement counts.

Cuba called for a more serious punishment, saying ``the families of the victims demand justice."

Posada has denied any wrongdoing in the bombing, which killed 73 people, or any other attacks against Cuban interests.

Jury Told Botched Bombing Was Still Punishable Crime (WT/AP)

By Jill Lawless

The Washington Times, January 16, 2007

LONDON -- Six men plotted to kill London subway and bus passengers with bombs made from hydrogen peroxide and flour two weeks after suicide bombers killed 52 commuters in the city, a prosecutor told a jury yesterday.

No one was killed in the attempted bombings of three subway trains and a bus on July 21, 2005, because the devices failed to explode.

"We say that the failure of these bombs to explode owed nothing to the intentions of the defendants. It was simply the good fortune of the traveling public that this day they were spared," prosecutor Nigel Sweeney said in outlining the government's case.

"This case is concerned with an extremist Muslim plot, the ultimate objective of which was to carry out a number of murders and suicide bombings," Mr. Sweeney told jurors.

The men, who are largely of East African descent, have pleaded not guilty to charges of plotting to bomb London's transport network two weeks after suicide attackers killed 52 commuters in the city on July 7, 2005.

Muktar Said Ibrahim, 28; Ramzi Mohamed, 25; Yassin Omar, 26; Manfu Asiedu, 33; Adel Yahya, 24; and Hussain Osman, 28 -- all from London -- deny charges of conspiracy to murder and conspiracy to cause explosions.

Mr. Sweeney said Mr. Osman had told police the bombs were "a deliberate hoax in order to make a political point" and were not intended to kill. But Mr. Sweeney said forensic scientists had tested the mixture, and "in every experiment this mixture has exploded."

The main explosive charge was 70 percent liquid hydrogen peroxide and 30 percent flour of the type used for chapatis, a type of Indian flat bread, Mr. Sweeney said.

The detonators contained triacetone triperoxide (TATP), an explosive used by Palestinian suicide bombers and by Richard Reid, who tried to detonate a shoe bomb on a U.S.-bound aircraft. The explosives were packed in plastic tubs, with screws, bolts and other pieces of metal taped on the outside as shrapnel, the prosecutor said.

Commercially available hydrogen peroxide is too diluted to be an effective explosive, Mr. Sweeney said, so the conspirators bought a total of 284 bottles and boiled down the substance to increase the concentration.

Traces of hydrogen peroxide and TATP were found in Mr. Omar's apartment, along with evidence that hydrogen peroxide had been boiled.

Mr. Sweeney said the components for the bombs were bought beginning in April 2005, proving the attacks were "not some hastily arranged copycat" of July 7.

Mr. Sweeney said the suspects -- most of whom were born in Ethiopia or Somalia -- were well known to one another long before the attacks, and five had been photographed by police on a camping trip in the Lake District of northern England in May 2004.

Most of the suspects were arrested in Britain a few days after the failed bombings. Mr. Osman fled to Italy and was detained in Rome a week after the attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0116453

Eleven others -- including Mr. Osman's wife and sister-in-law -- have been charged with assisting the accused or failing to disclose information. Their trials are expected later this year.

Britain Tries 6 In Bomb Plot That Fizzled (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 15 — The city was still edgy, two weeks after the London bombings of July 2005, when suddenly on a summer's day the horror seemed to return. On three subway cars and a bus, young men boarded with backpacks stuffed full of explosives, but there was an all-important difference: this time the explosives failed to detonate.

On Monday, in a courthouse here close to the high-security Belmarsh prison, six men appeared on trial, charged with conspiracy to murder and cause explosions on July 21, 2005. They are accused of attempting an attack that seemed to mimic the one on July 7 in which four bombers killed themselves and 52 bus and subway travelers in London's bloodiest peacetime attack.

The men have pleaded not guilty to the charges against them.

The prosecution did not directly link the two events. But "it is our case that the events with which this case is concerned are plainly not some hastily arranged copycat," Nigel Sweeney, a prosecutor, said when the men's trial opened Monday. The evidence, he said, "shows that the conspiracy had been in existence long before the events of July 7."

In Monday's session, devoted entirely to the prosecution, all six men were accused of taking part in what Mr. Sweeney called "an extremist Muslim plot, the ultimate objective of which was to carry out a number of murders and suicide bombings."

His opening statement was the first comprehensive official account of the events by British authorities. The allegations offered a remarkable insight into the makings of an alleged jihadist conspiracy.

Mr. Sweeney denied a claim by one of the men that the bombs had been meant as a politically motivated hoax, to frighten — not kill. "We say that the failure of these bombs to explode has nothing to with the intentions of the defendants," he said. "It was simply the good fortune of the traveling public that this day they were spared."

The bombs failed to explode because the concentration of one ingredient in the explosive, hydrogen peroxide, was too low, the prosecutor said, so the detonators went off but did not ignite the main charge.

Outlining the prosecution case, he painted a picture of young Muslims, one of them alleged to have been trained in Sudan and Pakistan, preparing homemade explosives in a bomb factory in a north London housing project and setting out to create carnage with bombs wrapped in shrapnel, hidden in backpacks.

He said two of the men had at one time prayed at the Finsbury Park mosque run by Abu Hamza al-Masri, a radical Egyptian-born cleric currently serving a prison term for incitement to murder.

Even after the failure of the alleged attack, the drama did not cease. One man fled north on a bus to Birmingham clad in a loose-fitting Muslim woman's gown called a burqa, which conceals the face and body. Another used a brother's passport to slip by the police and board a train to Paris before heading to Rome. Both were arrested soon after fleeing.

The defendants are Muktar Said Ibrahim, 28; Ramzi Mohamed, 25; Yassin Omar, 26; Manfu Asiedu, 33; Adel Yahya, 24; and Hussain Osman, 28. All were living in London. Some were born in the Horn of Africa.

In his statement to the court, Mr. Sweeney provided what he said was a detailed description of the six men's preparation for the attack, some of them attending fitness camps in Scotland and in the Lake District of England, where the police had kept a group of men under surveillance in May 2004, including five of the accused.

The prosecutor said that the role of Mr. Ibrahim, Mr. Asiedu, Mr. Osman, Mr. Omar and Mr. Mohamed was ultimately "that of would-be suicide bombers," and that Mr. Yahya had taken part in "some of the essential preparation done in furtherance of the conspiracy." Mr. Sweeney said Mr. Yahya left Britain six weeks before the attempt and was still out of the country when it failed. He was arrested when he returned.

The preparations began with the purchase of chemicals in April or May 2005, Mr. Sweeney said, adding that one of the men had told witnesses he had trained in Sudan in 2003 and Pakistan a year later.

Pakistan has frequently been accused in British terrorism cases of providing training bases in plots ascribed to descendants of Pakistani immigrants, including three of the four July 7 bombers.

Mr. Sweeney said Mr. Ibrahim "had been trained for jihad in Sudan in 2003 and had gone to Pakistan in December of 2004 in order to take part in jihad or to train for it."

"The evidence shows that events in this conspiracy began in earnest not long after Ibrahim had returned from Pakistan in mid-March 2005," the prosecutor said.

DOJ_NMG_0116454

At that time, according to the prosecution, the suspects began assembling material to fashion an explosive made of hydrogen peroxide mixed with flour. The detonators were made of a high explosive called triacetone triperoxide, or TATP, and would be set off by an electrical current from a nine-volt battery.

The main explosives were to be packed in plastic containers surrounded with “screws, tacks, washers or nuts,” Mr. Sweeney said, adding that when the attempts took place, one of the men, Mr. Asiedu, lost his nerve and “dumped his bomb in a wooded area.”

But Mr. Ibrahim, Mr. Osman, Mr. Omar and Mr. Mohamed set off with bombs on July 21, three of them on subway trains and one on a bus, the prosecutor said, a configuration of targets similar to that of July 7.

Mr. Mohamed, he said, wore a “distinctive New York top, the words New York across his chest, no doubt connected with the events of 9/11.”

In all four cases, the detonators exploded but the main charges did not, because the hydrogen peroxide was not sufficiently concentrated, Mr. Sweeney said. The men bought 284 bottles of hydrogen peroxide — sold in a diluted form — and sought to make it more concentrated by warming it or boiling it over a stove at Mr. Omar’s apartment using two saucepans and a frying pan on an electric cooker, the prosecutor said.

The men purchased the peroxide using a cover story that they needed it for stripping wallpaper or bleaching wood, Mr. Sweeney said. He said they also made a suicide video at Mr. Mohamed’s home in West London.

When the bombs failed, Mr. Osman fled to Italy while Mr. Omar left London disguised as a woman in a burqa, taking a bus to Birmingham on July 22, Mr. Sweeney said.

The trial is expected to last four months. Eleven more defendants, including Mr. Osman’s wife and sisterin-law, are to be tried on charges of assisting the suspects or failing to give information about them to the authorities.

At one point on Monday, the jury was shown a video of a similar explosive made by government scientists being detonated successfully. The video was shown in slow motion.

“It is going so slowly, it takes its time, but you can now see that the metal plate with the wooden surround in front of the bomb is starting to be affected by it,” Mr. Sweeney said. “Now imagine that on a tube train or a bus.”

Trial Opens In London Transit Bombing Plot (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan And Karla Adam

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 15 -- The London transit system escaped a repeat of the devastating suicide bombings of July 7, 2005, only through "good fortune," possibly hot summer weather or the faulty mixing of an explosive compound, a London jury was told Monday at the start of the trial of six men accused in the follow-on plot.

Two weeks after the fatal attacks, three subway trains and a bus were boarded by four men carrying backpacks that concealed bombs made from hydrogen peroxide, flour and other chemicals in a one-bedroom apartment, prosecutors said. In each case, the detonators went off but failed to set off the bombs' main charges, they said.

Opening the long-awaited trial of the four men and two others accused in the plot, prosecutor Nigel Sweeney disclosed extensive findings of an intense investigation that has proceeded under strict secrecy for the last 18 months.

"It was simply the good fortune of the traveling public that this day they were spared," perhaps because the bombs were made improperly or the hot weather affected the chemicals, he said in the heavily guarded Woolwich Crown Court. He told jurors that the defendants were part of an "extremist Muslim plot" to carry out "murderous suicide bombings."

Five of the defendants had been under police surveillance during a camping trip 15 months before the attempted attack, according to Sweeney, who did not elaborate on why police were watching them. One attempted to escape wearing a Muslim woman's burqa.

The six men, all of them London residents originally from Africa, have pleaded not guilty to charges of conspiracy to commit murder. One of them reportedly said at the time of his arrest that the devices were not intended to explode, merely to make a political statement.

The bomb incidents in the summer of 2005 were the first major acts of religious extremist violence in Britain since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States. Most of the July 7 bombers, who killed themselves and 52 passengers, and the July 21 suspects were British citizens or residents who had apparently been radicalized in Britain.

The July 21 incident roiled a city only just recovering from the loss of the 52. Adding to the horror was that the second attack seemed modeled precisely on the first, targeting three subway trains and a bus. Only this time, passengers heard only loud popping sounds as the detonators went off, then saw the would-be bombers dashing out the car doors.

Police staged a massive manhunt for the suspects, one of whom managed to slip out of the country but was captured in Rome.

DOJ_NMG_0116455

In the courtroom Monday, five of the defendants wore dark business suits, while the sixth wore dark pants and a black sweater. They watched with little apparent emotion from behind plexiglas flanked by 10 police officers in the packed courtroom.

Because all four July 7 bombers died, the July 21 defendants are the first to face trial over incidents that continue to create public apprehension.

Swearing in the jury Friday, Judge Adrian Fulford cautioned the nine women and three men that they must consider only the evidence and remain "wholly unaffected by any feelings of apprehension that you might have had in 2005."

The defendants are Muktar Said Ibrahim, Manfo Asiedu, Hussain Osman, Yassin Hassan Omar, Ramzi Mohammed and Adel Yahya. Yahya allegedly was involved in the planning of attacks but was out of the country on July 21. He was arrested at London's Gatwick Airport on his return from Ethiopia in December 2005.

The trial is expected to last three or four months. Eleven other people charged with assisting them, or failing to notify police of their intentions, face trial later this year.

In court Monday, Sweeney said that Osman, who fled to Rome and was arrested a week later, told police that the plot was not a serious attempt to kill, but rather "a hoax in order to make a political point."

"Given the weight of the evidence as to his involvement, what could he say?" Sweeney said, adding that the hoax defense was undermined by the fact that Mohammed had written a suicide note found by police. "This was no hoax," Sweeney said.

Sweeney told the jury that although the July 21 plot closely resembled the July 7 bombings, it was "plainly not some hastily arranged copycat." Sweeney said evidence collected by police shows that the defendants bought components for the bombs in April, well before the July 7 attack.

Police have never publicly said the two attacks were linked, and Sweeney did not suggest any link Monday.

Sweeny also said that Ibrahim had "been trained for jihad" in 2003 in Sudan, where he practiced firing rocket-propelled grenades, and in 2004 traveled to Pakistan "to take part in jihad or to train for it." Prosecutors will present evidence that most of the defendants "held extremist views" and had "spoken about carrying out jihad."

Police also discovered a wide variety of video footage, showing beheadings and other extremist violence, at apartments used by the defendants. Sweeney said Omar, Yahya and Ibrahim attended the Finsbury Park mosque in north London to hear sermons by Abu Hamza Masri, a radical cleric convicted last year of soliciting murder and inciting racial hatred. He said Omar and Ibrahim had tapes of Masri's speeches.

Sweeney devoted much of his opening statement to explaining the chemical makeup of the bombs. Omar's one-bedroom London apartment was used as a "bomb factory" where the defendants boiled at least 284 bottles of hydrogen peroxide to create a more concentrated mixture. He said that was then mixed with the flour in 1.6-gallon plastic tubs that were surrounded with nuts, screws, tacks and other metal taped to the package to act as shrapnel. He held up a replica for the jurors to see.

Sweeney said the detonator was several grams of triacetone triperoxide, or TATP, which can be mixed using commonly available ingredients. Richard C. Reid, the British citizen who tried to blow up an American jetliner in December 2001 with explosives hidden in his shoes, also had a TATP detonator.

Sweeney said the TATP was placed inside a modified flashlight bulb. He said the device was designed to explode when two small wires attached to the bulb were connected to a nine-volt battery. But while the detonators worked as planned, they failed to detonate the main charge.

Sweeney told the jurors that Mohammed, Omar and Osman carried bombs in backpacks onto three subway trains, while Ibrahim carried his onto a bus. He said Asiedu was supposed to be the fifth bomber but "lost his nerve at the last minute" and dumped his bomb in a London park, where it was found two days later.

Europe Hopes To Thwart Terrorists With A High-Tech Aircraft That Snoops (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

PARIS -- Imagine stepping aboard Europe's anti-terrorist plane of the future.

At the door, a hand-held electronic nose reputedly 30 times more sensitive than a dog's snout sniffs passengers for dangerous chemicals and vapors.

After takeoff, computers monitoring cabin conversations pick up suspicious words in Seat 9B, fingernail-size video cameras detect nervous facial tics on the passenger in 21F, and a hidden microphone records questionable noises from the passenger in the rear toilet. Buzzers or flashing lights on a computer screen warn the crew and pilot of potential trouble in each spot.

If a hijacker manages to bypass the fingerprint-activated locks on the cockpit door and grabs the controls, an internal computer takes over and diverts the plane from high-rise buildings, a nuclear plant or any other pre-programmed no-fly zone.

The SAFEE project -- Security of Aircraft in the Future European Environment -- is the first coordinated international effort to create an airplane system capable of thwarting hijackings and terrorist attacks. It is under development in classified laboratories in 11 European countries and Israel. Much of the technology is in advanced stages of development, though systems for accurately analyzing facial expressions remain problematic.

DOJ_NMG_0116456

The director of the $50 million program, Daniel Gaultier, works in a modernist, mirrored building overlooking the Seine River, where entry to his office is controlled by the same kind of fingerprint lock that the plane's cockpit would have. He describes the system -- being developed largely in secret by the European Commission (the European Union's executive arm) and 31 aircraft, avionics, computer and security companies and university research centers -- as "a last defense against attack" in a post-9/11 world.

The project faces serious opposition. Human rights officials are concerned about passenger privacy, pilot groups are fearful of computers usurping their authority, and airline marketers wonder about the eventual price tag.

"The eavesdropping is incredible," Sophia in't Veld, a Dutch member of the European Parliament, said in a telephone interview from Washington, where she was meeting with members of Congress on anti-terrorism and privacy issues. "We have to sacrifice some privacy and some freedom, but people have to have the proper means of redress to defend themselves against unnecessary invasion of privacy or abuses of data by public authorities."

"The trade-off between technology and human rights is a tricky and tough area," Gaultier agreed. "When there's a crisis, everyone will accept it. Six months after the crisis, everyone will forget. You always have to be careful how you deal with passenger rights."

The use of potentially intrusive monitoring systems -- such as those that would record passenger movements and facial expressions and eavesdrop on private conversations and toilet visits -- is a particularly sensitive issue in Europe. Watchdog commissions here have engaged in transatlantic battles over U.S. rules requiring airlines to report personal data about incoming passengers to U.S. authorities.

Testing of most of the technologies in simulators is to begin this fall and continue through early next year, Gaultier said.

The package of systems found to work is unlikely to be available on commercial aircraft for as long as a decade because most would need to be incorporated into the airframes of planes under construction. The cost of retrofitting existing aircraft would be prohibitively high, according to Gaultier.

None of the systems is more controversial than the onboard video and audio sensors designed to detect erratic or suspicious behavior. Some critics argue that the systems could be prone to false alarms or prove unrealistic for commercial use.

Researchers at Britain's BAE Systems are attempting to compile a database of algorithms to allow computers to differentiate between the "micro-expressions" and facial tics of a person nervous about flying and a person nervous because he's about to detonate a bomb.

Researchers at the University of Reading in England, meanwhile, are working on the system that would quickly analyze such data and deliver it to the crew and the pilot. "Airlines are afraid of this product," Gaultier said. "They have to face marketing it to passengers."

As to whether this technology can be perfected to operate as envisioned, Gaultier said: "We're just getting started. It needs a lot more research."

Gaultier said crew members would not monitor actual videos but would respond to computer-generated signals warning of a potential problem in a specific seat or other location. He said the video images could be destroyed at the end of each flight.

As for other intrusions, "No video in the toilet," he said, "though they would have microphones in the toilet." The monitoring devices could also be used for detecting drunken or other unruly passengers, he said.

Gaultier's company, Sagem D?fense S?curit?, is developing technology to improve security in communications between pilots and control towers and to prevent cyber hacking into airplane systems, especially when commercial aircraft begin introducing onboard Internet services.

Another French company, Thales Avionics, is testing a new collision-avoidance system that would build on existing short-range systems that warn a pilot when a plane is in imminent danger of crashing. The new system could be programmed to avoid not only dangerous terrain such as mountains, but tall buildings or cities hosting vulnerable events such as the Olympics or political summits.

Gaultier refers to the system as "never again the twin towers." He added, however, that "pilots will think that's an intrusion" because the system would take control out of their hands in the event of a hijacking or other emergency and allow the aircraft's computer system to guide the plane.

Other pieces of the SAFEE system would detect gases from a bomb being assembled on a plane and use laser beams to detect potentially dangerous chemicals that had evaded airport security checks.

But even with the new protections, Gaultier acknowledged, the system cannot guarantee an end to terrorist attacks. "Security level zero never exists," he said. "It's crazy to say, 'I have a system that provides 100 percent security.' "

DOJ_NMG_0116457

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Trying To Execute Reform (USNEWS)

By Angie C. Marek

U.S. News and World Report, January 15, 2007

Last fall, Harold Ford Jr., a charismatic Democratic Senate candidate from Tennessee, filmed a campaign ad in the cramped aisle of a passenger plane. "The bipartisan 9/11 commission says our airports fail on security five years after September 11," Ford said in the ad, holding a copy of the commission's report and a plastic bottle meant to evoke liquid explosives. "It's time to set aside politics [and] adopt the commission's 41 recommendations."

Ford was one of many Democratic candidates to use the pitch during the fall campaign. He lost, but his party took over Congress. And not surprisingly, last week the House passed the Implementing the 9/11 Commission Recommendations Act of 2007 as part of the Dems' blitz marking their first 100 working hours in power. But it won't be easy going from here. Although the 9/11 commissioners have praised the bill, it's been criticized for including several initiatives the 9/11 report didn't even address. There's opposition in the Senate, and the White House called it "unconstitutional." How much survives-and how much should-are still very open questions.

"Herculean." Since the commission released its report in 2004, a flurry of legislation has addressed at least some of its recommendations. A massive intelligence reform act-the result of what Republican Sen. Susan Collins calls a "herculean bipartisan effort" in late 2004-restructured the intelligence community the way the commission wanted, adding a director of national intelligence. A major port security bill and a measure giving the Department of Homeland Security power to regulate chemical plants followed this fall. Still, Lee Hamilton, the Democratic vice chair of the commission, said last week he thought "roughly half" the recommendations still needed to be addressed.

Clocking in at 279 pages, the new House bill aimed to fix that. One of the more significant measures would ensure that 90 percent of the roughly $2 billion handed out in homeland security grants each year would be divvied up according to risk calculations, instead of like political pork, a bit to each state. Another section mandates that 100 percent of sea cargo headed to the United States be scanned for explosives abroad within five years. All cargo carried on U.S. commercial flights would be scanned in just three years.

Supporters admit the bill was thrown together quickly-and critics say it shows. Although the measure creates three new grant programs-for items like better communications equipment and local intelligence centers for first responders-nowhere does it mention any specific costs or deal with how to pay for new programs. And Republican Rep. John Mica complained to U.S. News last week about a clause that gives aviation screeners collective bargaining rights, potentially restricting the ability of DHS to shift workers to busy airports during the holidays. "Nowhere in the 9/11 commission report," Mica said, "did it recommend [any of] that." Other commission recommendations are entirely unaddressed. For instance, commissioners said the maze of congressional panels overseeing pieces of DHS-79 by today's count-represents "the single largest obstacle impeding" success for the mammoth agency. The new bill doesn't deal with the problem.

All that controversy is clouding the bill's prospects. The Bush administration stopped short of a veto threat but said last week that it has "constitutional concerns" about portions of the measure-including a move to create a privacy and civil liberties board with subpoena power. As a result, the White House said, it "cannot support ... passage ... in its current form."

The Senate-where Democrats hold a 50-to-49 margin-will take up its own bill by late January. Passage is likely, but the Senate bill is expected to have "more compromises," says Stephen Flynn with the Council on Foreign Relations, "and less kinks."

Because rural members have more clout there, the Senate has rejected past efforts to allocate 90 percent of terrorism funds by risk alone. And staffers say they're more hesitant about the feasibility and multibillion-dollar costs of 100 percent sea cargo scanning; DHS is slated to test such an idea for the first time this year. Joe Lieberman, the new head of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, said last week he'd try to implement the commission's recommendations "as much as we can, as quick as we can, and as fully as we can." Given what's happened so far, that could be a tall order.

CIA Emphasizes Flexibility In New Strategy (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, January 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — The CIA plans to increase its use of "open sources" such as newspapers and blogs and to outsource more software development to commercial contractors under a 22-point strategy being put in place.

DOJ_NMG_0116458

The CIA's "Strategic Intent," distributed to agency employees in December and posted on its public website this month, stresses improved flexibility and fewer barriers between departments. It contains several corporate-style flourishes, including ongoing employee input, an advisory board drawn from business and academia and "action teams" assigned to implement the plan.

In a speech to CIA workers at the agency's Langley, Va., headquarters Jan. 4, CIA Director Michael Hayden said the plan aims to reassert the 60-year-old agency's primacy in the intelligence community.

"The operational demands of the recent past too often limited the time and energy CIA has to address the demands of the future," Hayden said. "We've gotten away with it for a few years — and for very good reasons — but no organization can thrive indefinitely without tending to strategic imperatives."

The changes come as President Bush has chosen retired vice admiral J. Michael McConnell as director of national intelligence. He would replace John Negroponte, who will become the top deputy to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. McConnell, like Hayden, is a former National Security Agency head.

Among the CIA plan's goals:

·Break down traditional barriers between spies who collect intelligence and analysts who use the data for reports. In the agency's operations center, a wall that divided representatives of the two disciplines was dismantled the last week in December.

·Make greater use of the Web to distribute intelligence reports and data. The CIA, which has its own intranet, will have its "brand" on intelligence it distributes on secure networks maintained by the departments of State and Defense, Hayden said.

·Install new hiring and promotion policies, including pay grades tied to performance rather than seniority, and a common training course that will require new analysts and clandestine officers to work together from their first days at the agency.

·Post more analysts overseas to improve their understanding of the areas they report on.

·Give specialists in "open source" intelligence equal standing with spies and intelligence analysts in the operations center and elsewhere.

Open source "isn't just the wave of the future, it's here right now," said Walid Phares, senior fellow and al-Qaeda specialist at the Foundation for the Defense of Democracies in Washington.

Phares said he does much of his research by monitoring Islamic websites and chat rooms.

Last year, a House Intelligence Committee review criticized intelligence agencies for failing to "embrace more fully" open source intelligence. The committee report said "it will take a dramatic change in cultural philosophy" before intelligence services rely on materials they did not gather through "secret means."

John McLaughlin, a former longtime CIA official and its acting director in 2004, said Hayden's plan "hits the right things" and is "very countercultural."

"It's kind of inside baseball," he said, "but things like knocking down the wall in the ops center are significant. It's been there forever."

The strategic plan also adds layers of bureaucracy that could prove hard to manage, said John Prados, fellow at the National Security Archive, a private research group that is sometimes critical of the CIA.

"Hayden is going to spend a lot of time at meetings … because of his desire to monitor and keep track of what's happening," said Prados, author of the book Safe For Democracy: The Secret Wars of the CIA.

Hayden established an oversight panel within the CIA that will resolve conflicts between civilian and military agencies that do "human intelligence collection"— spying. Hayden said he will chair the first meeting of the panel himself.

Hayden took over as CIA director last June. He inherited an agency that has been buffeted by bad news.

Both the 9/11 Commission in 2004 and a panel in 2005 that explored intelligence on Iraq's biological, chemical and nuclear weapons programs faulted the agency, among others, for shortcomings in developing and sharing useful information.

Ted Gup, author of The Book of Honor, a study of heroism by covert CIA officers, said Hayden's plan "seems to make all the right sounds" but glosses over the agency's recent problems.

"They are too anxious to move forward without the deep soul searching that seems to be required," Gup said. "A sober-eyed analysis of what went wrong should be reflected (in the new plan), but it isn't."

In his six months on the job, Hayden has striven to improve morale by hosting a family day and reaching out to retirees through a series of e-mails.

About 40% of the agency's workforce has joined since the 9/11 terrorist attacks, Hayden said in an interview in November.

The agency receives about 130,000 job applications annually, Hayden said.

Before 9/11, about 65,000 job seekers applied each year, former director McLaughlin said.

Bioterror Antidote: Unfulfilled Prescription (WP)

By Renae Merle

DOJ_NMG_0116459

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

When President Bush goes before Congress later this month, it will mark four years since he used his State of the Union address to launch Project BioShield, an ambitious effort to counter bioterrorism attacks with vast new stockpiles of vaccines and treatments.

Progress, however, has been slow.

The $5.6 billion program is still struggling to define its priorities, and officials have spent less than a quarter of their budget. Last month, the project endured the collapse of its largest program, an effort to produce enough advanced anthrax vaccine for roughly the population of Washington and New York. And still unresolved is how the government will address threats like acute radiation sickness or treat the estimated 10 million people with impaired immune systems who cannot take advantage of current stockpiles of smallpox vaccines. In his speech, Bush listed the Ebola virus and plague as among the threats the program would address, but little significant action has been taken on those, either.

The government has yet to release a plan outlining what drugs it will buy and in what quantities, though it says it will do so in the next few months.

Congress passed legislation late last year revamping BioShield, allowing the Department of Health and Human Services to pour more money into the small companies spearheading the effort more quickly and reorganizing the program's management. But HHS officials acknowledge that tougher challenges lie ahead.

"BioShield is still a young program," said Gerald Parker, the principal deputy assistant secretary for preparedness and response at HHS.

The first phase of the program "was low-hanging fruit, taking things that were already in development" and putting them in the stockpile, Parker said. "Now we're getting into the harder phase of this."

Here is a look at BioShield's fitful progress on some of government's top priorities, those bioterror agents that have been labeled national security threats by the Department of Homeland Security:Anthrax

Anthrax is best known for the October 2001 attack in which envelopes containing anthrax spores were sent through the mail, killing five people and sickening others. The attack prompted worries that an antibiotic-restraint strain of anthrax could be developed, moving the threat to the top of federal health officials' priority list.

As the result of an effort that began before BioShield, there are enough antibiotics in the national stockpile to treat 40 million people for more than 60 days, HHS says. Stockpiles also include 9 million doses of an anthrax vaccine produced by Emergent BioSolutions of Gaithersburg, with another 1 million to be delivered by the first quarter of this year. In an emergency, the usual six doses of the vaccine necessary for immunity could be cut to three and used with an antibiotic, HHS says. That should be enough to treat 1.3 million patients.

Rockville-based Human Genome Sciences and Cangene of Winnipeg, Canada, are scheduled to deliver 30,000 doses of an anthrax antitoxin. HGS is scheduled to begin delivery in 2009 and Cangene is scheduled to begin delivery later this year, according to HHS.

The agency is struggling to develop a more modern anthrax vaccine that could be administered in fewer doses and with fewer side effects. In 2004, the agency tapped a small California firm, VaxGen, for an $877 million contract to deliver 75 million doses of an anthrax vaccine. VaxGen encountered delays and technical problems, and HHS canceled the contract in December after the firm failed to begin human testing on time. HHS officials are examining ways to get the effort back on track.Botulism

Botulism is a concern because the natural toxin can be easily produced and transported, making it a major threat. The Japanese cult Aum Shinrikyo tried and failed to disperse the botulinum toxin in the 1990s in downtown Tokyo and at U.S. military installations.

A far more serious threat would be if someone managed to get the toxin in the food supply, said Gerald L. Epstein, a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. An attack using botulinum toxin could cause hundreds of thousands of causalities, according to DHS.

Cangene has begun delivering the first of 200,000 doses of an antitoxin, which would have to be delivered shortly after patients show symptoms to counteract the effects of the toxin. There are currently no plans to pursue a vaccine, according to HHS.Smallpox

Smallpox was eradicated in the 1970s, and there are only two official repositories of the disease, in the United States and Russia. But before the Soviet Union collapsed it adapted large quantities of smallpox for use in bombs and missiles, according to the Center for Biosecurity of the University of Pittsburgh Medical Center.

That has spurred concerns that stocks may fall into the hands of terrorists or countries considered rogue states by the United States. Since standard smallpox vaccination ended in the United States more than 30 years ago, the population could be vulnerable to attack, according to the biosecurity center.

DOJ_NMG_0116460

There is a stockpile of more than 300 million doses of smallpox vaccine, enough for everyone in the United States, according to HHS. That effort began before BioShield.

The agency is also pursuing another version of the smallpox vaccine that could be used by people with impaired immune systems, a growing population of cancer survivors, organ transplant recipients and HIV-infected patients. A BioShield competition began in 2005, but no winner has been announced. HHS officials said a contract could come sometime this year.Radiation, 'Dirty Bomb'

Authorities worry that people could become exposed to radiation either through a direct nuclear attack or the use of a "dirty bomb," which would employ conventional explosives or other means to spread radioactive materials.

Enough potassium iodide to treat 1 million people is already in the national stockpile, according to HHS. Potassium iodide doesn't treat most aspects of radiation exposure, but scientists believe it can protect the thyroid gland from cancer in such an attack.

Fleming & Co. Pharmaceuticals received two BioShield contracts to deliver 4.8 million bottles of a liquid form of potassium iodide for children. It has delivered 1.9 million bottles so far. Akorn Inc. has begun delivering 450,000 doses of an anti-radiation drug therapy that would adhere to radioactive particles in the blood stream and flush them out of the body.

To address acute radiation sickness, HHS launched a competition in 2005 for 100,000 doses of a drug treatment that would address the infections and uncontrolled bleeding caused by exposure. After several delays, HHS officials said they expect to announce a contract this year.Plague, Ebola

Plague is blamed for killing a third of Europe's population in the 14th and 15th centuries. The pneumonic form of the disease could be caused by releasing plague bacteria in an aerosol attack. The disease is considered nearly always fatal unless antibiotic treatment is started with 24 hours of infection, according to HHS.

Another potential bioterror threat, Ebola, is a hemorrhagic fever caused by a virus that first appeared in Africa in the 1970s. The virus can spread from person to person and kills most of the people it infects, causing massive hemorrhaging that dissolves their insides and sends blood oozing from the orifices of their bodies. Experts believe Ebola is a threat in the hands of terrorists, and the Soviet Union is believed to have created Ebola weapons before it collapsed. Aum Shinrikyo, the Japanese religious cult that released sarin nerve gas in the Tokyo subway system in 1995, went to Zaire to learn more about Ebola.

Despite President Bush's mention of plague and Ebola in his State of the Union speech, the government has yet to contract with any company to produce a defense. HHS officials say the implementation plan to be issued in the next few months will include a roadmap to address both threats.

Meanwhile, the National Institutes of Health is pursuing research on vaccines for both. NIH has completed the first phase of human testing for the Ebola version and is seeking volunteers for the second, according to an NIH official, who said it would be several years before it could be stockpiled.

BWI Second In Losses Of Uniforms, ID Cards (WT)

By Sean Lengell

The Washington Times, January 16, 2007

At least 426 uniforms and identification cards issued to security screeners at Baltimore-Washington International Thurgood Marshall Airport have been lost or stolen since late 2001, according to Transportation Security Administration records.

The only other airport to report more missing uniforms and badges in the past five years is Los Angeles International Airport, whose security screeners lost at least 789.

More than 3,600 TSA or Homeland Security Department airport security uniforms and credentials have disappeared from November 2001, when the TSA was created, through Sept. 30, records show.

Some lawmakers worry the missing items may find their way into the hands of terrorists. The agency, however, denies the problem poses a national security risk.

Screeners at BWI reported 321 uniforms and 105 identity cards lost or stolen during the five-year period ending Sept. 30.

The number peaked during the 12 months ending Sept. 30, 2003, when 128 uniforms and 31 identity badges disappeared. Since then, the annual rate of missing items has dropped significantly.

BWI screeners reported seven uniforms and five badges missing for the 12 months ending Sept. 30, 2006.

The Linthicum, Md., airport, which is publicly owned and operated by the Maryland Aviation Authority, also issues identification credentials to TSA employees, but BWI spokesman Jonathan Dean said there has been "no unusual or suspicious level of missing airport-issued identification."

Security screeners at Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport reported 132 missing or stolen items -- 97 uniforms and 35 ID cards -- for the five-year period. It was the fifth-highest tally nationally.

Washington Dulles International Airport had among the fewest missing items: seven uniforms and no ID cards.

DOJ_NMG_0116461

Reagan and Dulles airports are operated by the Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority, an independent agency created by Congress.

TSA officials said the missing uniforms and badges alone aren't enough to gain access to sensitive areas of any airport.

"This is not a security threat," agency spokeswoman Amy Kudwa said. "One number of a combination of a bank vault won't get you access inside, and a TSA ID card or uniform will not allow you access at the airport either."

The cards are used only for visual identification and are not programmed to be scanned or swiped.

Because TSA screeners work in teams, anyone who tries to pose as an agency employee would be identified immediately as an impostor, Ms. Kudwa said. "There are a number of [security] layers."

Where the uniforms and badges have gone is uncertain. Most of the items are thought to have been lost or misplaced, not stolen, Ms. Kudwa said.

Rep. Lamar Smith, Texas Republican and member of the House Homeland Security Committee, has proposed biometric badges that identify TSA workers through their fingerprints, eyes, facial patterns or other physical characteristics. He also wants to impose penalties for losing uniforms or credentials.

"TSA badges and uniforms can provide individuals with access to airport areas and equipment -- so the fact that they cannot be accounted for is a security threat," Mr. Smith wrote to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff on Dec. 13.

TSA policy requires employees to report any loss of badges or uniform articles immediately to a supervisor. The supervisor is required to notify local law enforcement if theft is suspected. No disciplinary action is taken unless misconduct or malfeasance is found, the policy states.

Employees wear white shirts emblazoned with "TSA" on the back and navy blue pants. The agency also issues jackets, sweater vests, ties and other uniform items.

Ms. Kudwa said she wasn't sure how many missing items have been recovered, but a TSA jacket was found last month at a San Antonio thrift store and turned over to the agency.

U.S. Enacts New Air Travel Passport Rules (BSUN)

By Meredith Cohn

The Baltimore Sun, January 16, 2007

Travelers flying between the United States and the Caribbean, Mexico and Canada this month will need a passport -- the first of sweeping changes in documentation resulting from the terrorist attacks in 2001.

The new Department of Homeland Security rules for air travelers go into effect Jan. 23 and extend to land and sea travel next year. Most people enter or leave the United States by land. Requiring passports -- instead of commonly used birth certificates or drivers' licenses -- was recommended by the Sept. 11 commission and mandated by Congress in 2004. But the change was delayed and implementation staggered to ease fears of hurting tourism and to allay concerns of passengers and trading partners.

"There were concerns that applying this law might discourage travelers," said Steve Royster, a State Department spokesman. "But security is paramount."

Along with new passports this summer that will be embedded with computer chips holding passenger information, the rules are designed to reduce forgery and ease lines at the nation's borders. They will become part of an overall Homeland Security effort to shore up the borders with troops, terrorist watch lists, and cargo and passenger screening after years of criticism that security is lax.

The rules for air travel will affect millions of people, including the bulk of those traveling to and from Baltimore-Washington International Thurgood Marshall Airport. Seven of 10 international cities with direct routes to BWI are in regions where the changes apply.

Birth certificates and drivers licenses had long been used by those frequently crossing the borders with Mexico or Canada for work or leisure because they were convenient and cheaper than a $97 passport. But State Department officials say thousands of U.S. agencies issue the other documents, making authentication tough and time-consuming. In 2005, the U.S. government confiscated 75,000 fraudulent documents.

Already, State Department officials say more than a quarter of Americans, or 72 million people, have a passport and new applications have been pouring in. The State Department reports that in November, 1.1 million people applied for a passport, up about 60 percent from the year before.

"Officials will have much greater confidence in the documents," said Derwood Staeben, a senior adviser on passports at the State Department. "This is security. But we expect the lines to go faster."

DOJ_NMG_0116462

Exceptions to the new passport rules will be those with special cards issued to those traveling between Canada and the United States for work, merchant mariners with Coast Guard documents and permanent residents with "green cards." Existing passports are good until their expiration date.

U.S. citizens already needed a passport to go to Central and South America, but for the first time will need a passport to return home.

The State Department also is developing a new passport card for frequent travelers who cross land and sea borders with neighboring countries. The documents will be the size of a credit card, cost less than a passport and won't have to be removed from a wallet or car to be read.

For many world travelers, the new rules shouldn't have too great an impact because passports already are required elsewhere, said Kevin Mitchell of the Business Travel Coalition, which represents corporate travel managers.

"Most business travelers that travel globally obviously have them," he said. "Twenty percent of all travel by U.S. corporations is out of the country. Road warriors are taken care of."

The coalition and other travel groups did not oppose the new passport rules. Mitchell said the rules might confuse or annoy some frequent travelers and could dampen travel. But five years after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, he said the federal government needed to have a better idea of who was crossing the border.

The electronic passports have, however, caused some concern. Mitchell and privacy advocates lobbied for protection from outsiders trying to steal information with remote electronic readers. But he said the government has taken encouraging steps, such as adding metallic covers that prevent them from being read when closed.

The Air Transport Association, a trade group representing U.S. airlines, was more concerned with timing. It didn't want new rules implemented until after the busy holiday season.

At BWI, close to two dozen flights a day come and go from Toronto, Mexico City and Montego Bay, Jamaica, among others. It has a fraction of the international travelers of the country's biggest hubs, but has a mix that favors the Western Hemisphere. An airport spokesman said federal and airline officials are doing a good job of advertising the new rules.

It appears, however, that many people at BWI didn't need notice. Dawna Elias, a native of Canada who now lives in Baltimore, said she used to travel back and forth without a passport. But the Sept. 11 attacks gave her pause.

"I just got one recently," said Elias, who was seeing her mother, Edie, off on an afternoon flight from BWI to Toronto. "It seemed like a good idea to have one. I anticipated that they'd start requiring one."

Elias said she'd now have to get her 11-month-old daughter, Eva, her own passport.

On her mother's flight, a steady flow of passengers presented passports. About 58 percent of U.S. travelers to and from Mexico already have a passport. The number rises to 69 percent for Canada and 75 percent for the Caribbean, according to Homeland Security data.

Passports could be a bigger issue next year when those traveling by land or sea are subject to the new rule. More than 300 million people entered the country last year at land crossings. Of the 422 million visitors to the United States last year, 87 million came by air.

Terror Official: 'We're Going To Get Hit' (NSWK)

Newsweek, January 22, 2007

Jan. 22, 2007 issue - Intel director John Negroponte gave Congress a sobering assessment last week of the continued threats from groups like Al Qaeda and Hizbullah. But even gloomier comments came from Henry Crumpton, the outgoing State Department terror coordinator. An ex-CIA operative, Crumpton told NEWSWEEK that a worldwide surge in Islamic radicalism has worsened recently, increasing the number of potential terrorists and setting back U.S. efforts in the terror war. "Certainly, we haven't made any progress," said Crumpton. "In fact, we've lost ground." He cites Iraq as a factor; the war has fueled resentment against the United States.

Crumpton noted some successes, such as improved joint efforts with foreign governments and a weakening of Al Qaeda's leadership structure. But he warned of future attacks. "We don't want to acknowledge we're going to get hit again in the homeland, but we are," he said. "That's a hard, ugly fact. But it's going to happen." Crumpton cited no specific intel, but said the most worrisome scenarios involve lone operatives who slip into the country and take directions through cyberspace. "How do you penetrate that?" he asked. Citing family financial pressures, Crumpton leaves office in two weeks. A State official, anonymous when discussing personnel matters, said no one has been nominated to replace him, so it could be a while before the post—a top counterterror job—is filled.

A Personnel Challenge At DHS (WP)

By Stephen Barr

DOJ_NMG_0116463

The Washington Post, January 15, 2007

At the Department of Homeland Security, Marta Brito Perez works 12-hour days looking for ways to move the personnel practices of a mega-bureaucracy closer to those of a Fortune 500 company.

"You want people to see things the way you see them," she said. "Is it easy all the time? No. Is it worth the challenge? Yes."

Perez knows about challenges. She was born in Cuba and came to Rockville with her family in 1968, when she was 14. Her father had owned a printing shop, and her mother was a math professor. The family's move, which was four years in the making, was sponsored by a Methodist church in Rockville.

At Homeland Security, where her title is chief human capital officer, Perez wants to improve recruitment, speed up hiring, rotate executives through the department to broaden their leadership potential, and get moving on a new pay-for-performance system that has stalled because of a court fight with unions and funding cuts on Capitol Hill.

She has to sell many of her policy changes to personnel directors in the 22 agencies that were merged to form Homeland Security. Creating a Team DHS also means turning around morale and reassuring 180,000 employees that they will have opportunities to advance their careers.

In a survey released in 2005, employees gave the department low marks on leadership, innovation and fairness. The department's score was next to last among the 30 agencies surveyed.

Perez sees the department's employees as vital to the department's success -- a refrain often heard in federal personnel offices. "People pay lip service to that" she said. "I happen to believe it."

She also is counting on her experience with unions to soften workplace friction. She worked for eight years as director of human resources for the Montgomery County government, conducting labor negotiations, and implementing a pay system designed to help the county recruit and retain middle and senior managers.

When she took the county post, relations with unions were at a low point; Perez turned them around, said Douglas M. Duncan, who was county executive at the time. "She is very bright and a quick study, and she does work very well with others," he said.

John Sparks, president of the Montgomery County Career Fire Fighters Association, said Perez "seemed to have a true appreciation for working families, was very forthright and never misleading." Gino Renne, president of the public employee union UFCW Local 1994, said he "enjoyed a very productive, collaborative relationship" with Perez.

Before her stint in Montgomery County, Perez spent 17 years as a manager at the International Association of Chiefs of Police, a nonprofit group in Northern Virginia, where she led training programs.

Perez jumped from county government to the federal sector in 2002, when Bush administration officials recruited her to work at the Office of Personnel Management. She took a top policy job and helped create new standards for managing the government's 1.8 million civil service employees.

Last year, White House officials asked Perez to move to Homeland Security, an offer she said she could not resist because of her long interest in law enforcement. Perez earned a bachelor's degree in criminology at the University of Maryland and has a master's in organization development and human resources from Johns Hopkins.

Perez is the third person to serve as the department's personnel chief. Congress created the position in 2002 at large agencies in an attempt to improve personnel management.

Perez said she hoped to create a workplace in which "managers have the opportunity to communicate expectations and employees know exactly what is expected of them."

One of the most pressing issues Perez must deal with involves redrafting department rules that were intended to limit the number of issues that unions could negotiate, and to scale back other labor rights. Federal unions went to court and blocked the changes; the department must provide a status report on any next steps to a federal judge by mid-July.

Perez also wants to make the department more competitive in hiring and keeping talented young professionals. "The private sector invests in making their organizations attractive so that people want to work there," she said. "The government traditionally doesn't do that. They just assume people are going to flock and come and want to work. People may, but it may not be the right people."

Although her job requires long-term strategic planning skills, Perez acknowledged that she never really plotted a career path for herself. "My dad always said you work hard at what you are doing and the rest will work itself out," she said.

Stephen Barr's e-mail address isbarrs@washpost.com.

Once More Into The Security Breach (NYT)

By Kathryn Harrison

The New York Times, January 15, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0116464

SUNDAY, Jan. 7. Newark International Airport.

I disembark at Gate C85, with my two daughters, from Continental Flight 488 at 5:55 a.m. We've just arrived from Puerto Rico, our skin tight with sunburn and salt. I navigate the terminal at the minimal level of consciousness required to find the baggage claim, collect our suitcases, and get into the taxi line.

Tempted to buy coffee from the kiosk between Baggage Carousels 2 and 3, I discover I don't have my wallet. I must have left it on or around my seat, 23B, where I paused to rifle through my carry-on to be sure I wasn't leaving any of my younger daughter's toys or games behind.

Jolted by adrenaline, I instruct my daughters, ages 16 and 6, to remain at the baggage claim while I try to retrieve my wallet. Carrying only my passport, I run upstairs to find someone who can issue me a gate pass allowing my return through security to Concourse C.

Impressing the validity of my request on one distracted airline employee after another takes a discouragingly long time. I am referred to and from and back again to the agent at Desk 72. By the time I pass through the gantlet of uniformed security personnel busy separating travelers from their toothpaste and emollients, I've lost 30 minutes, more than long enough for a cleaning crew to straighten, vacuum and de-wallet the airplane. I run, my shoes in one hand, passport in the other, to Gate C85, at the end of the abandoned concourse. Gates 85, 84, 83 — all gates in sight — are bereft of both airline and airport personnel, but my plane's still there; I can see it through the window.

I stand at the closed metal door that separates Gate 85 from its jetway. Hello, I call, idiotically, and I knock, as loudly as possible, using the heel of my shoe. Surprisingly, when I turn the handle of the door to the jetway, I find it unlocked. Unsurprisingly, when I push it open, an alarm goes off. I stand there, holding the handle, waiting for someone official to come, expecting to be chastised and confident that, as I am holding a valid United States passport and making no attempt to flee, I can explain my predicament.

But no one answers the alarm, which is shatteringly loud and still ringing. The handful of travelers in the waiting area, rumpled middle-aged men, watch without expression as I prop the door open with my little black shoe — in case it's locked from the other side — and disappear down the jetway toward the plane. Am I a federal criminal now? Does anyone care?

The airplane's front hatch is open, and I enter, disappointed to see that each seat already holds a tidy white pillow and plastic-wrapped blanket. The cleaning crew has come and gone. I search under and around Seat 23B. My wallet is nowhere to be found. Back at the gate, my little black shoe still holds the door open, the alarm still rings, and the rumpled middle-aged men in the waiting area continue to read their Sunday papers. I retrieve my shoe; the door closes; the alarm stops.

You what! says the woman at Continental's customer service desk after I've told her what I've just done. You can't, you cannot, do that. You cannot. I know, I tell her, but my wallet is missing, I've left my children at the baggage claim, and there's no one at Gate 85 or any of the adjacent gates. Anyway, I say, I waited for security but no one came.

It's your own fault you lost your wallet, she says when I ask her to contact the cleaning crew. She gives me a sharp look I interpret as her judgment that violators of federal airline security regulations deserve no special courtesies.

Back at the baggage claim area, I file a lost item report, collect my children and our luggage, and use my cellphone to wake my husband. Does he have enough cash to pay our cab fare from Newark to Brooklyn? I'll explain when we get home, I tell him.

When I do, he shakes his head. Let me get this straight, he says. Unauthorized, you open the gate door to the airplane. You set off a very loud security alarm. You wait a few minutes, and then take it upon yourself to enter the empty aircraft. You spend some time moving around its interior. No one sees you there. You leave of your own accord. You exit the way you came and you stop the alarm from ringing. And you confessed this, chapter and verse, to airline personnel and nothing happened?

Yes, I say. Exactly so.

Port Security Goes Overboard (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 15, 2007

We need to ensure the safety of U.S. ports. We don't need political grandstanding on Capitol Hill.

THE STATED PURPOSE of the 279-page anti-terrorism bill rammed through the House last week by the new Democratic majority was to implement the long-stalled recommendations of the 9/11 commission. But we're still thumbing through our copy of the 9/11 report to find exactly where it recommends political grandstanding. Because that's what the Democrats' efforts to protect U.S. ports amount to.

The bill, passed Tuesday by a margin of 299 to 128, mandates that foreign ports scan each and every cargo container bound for the United States for nuclear material before it ships out. Large international ports would have three years to comply; smaller ones five. Each scanned container must then bear an electronic seal that, if broken, would send an automatic signal to U.S. authorities. Such seals don't yet exist, but the bill calls for their use when the technology becomes available.

DOJ_NMG_0116465

Not covered in the bill is who's supposed to pay for all this or how much it would cost. But the implication is clear: Foreign ports and shippers would foot the bill, not the U.S. government. Thus, the U.S. would demand that all 700 worldwide ports buy, install and operate expensive and futuristic equipment if they want to keep doing business with the largest economy in the world. Yet the bill does not demand the same from U.S. ports for outbound cargo — this is strictly a one-way deal, aimed at foreigners and private industry.

Such aggressive unilateralism could seriously damage U.S. trade relationships. It would be highly disruptive to trade, on which the U.S. economy is deeply and increasingly reliant, and would disproportionately punish Los Angeles County, which operates the nation's biggest port complex.

The bill is not at all what the 9/11 commission had in mind. The government, the report recommended, should "identify and evaluate the transportation assets that need to be protected, set risk-based priorities for defending them, select the most practical and cost-effective ways of doing so and then develop a plan, budget and funding to implement the effort." In other words, be realistic. The House bill instead aims at the fantastical goal of inspecting 100% of cargo, while ignoring costs and setting aside no funding.

Much more work is needed to secure American ports against terrorist attacks, such as setting standards on cargo inspection records and coming up with detailed emergency plans. But these are not the kinds of measures that lend themselves to legislation. The technology for scanning containers for radiation is in its infancy and is capable of detecting only the most primitive of "dirty" bombs; it will probably take years to work out the technical and logistical bugs. Congress can help by setting aside funds to get the research done, not by political posturing.

Democrats are eager to prove that they, not Republicans, deserve to be considered the more muscular defenders of the homeland. But haste and over-reaching do not equal muscle. The House anti-terror bill has some worthwhile provisions, but we're counting on the Senate to strip out its worst elements, starting with the counterproductive mandate on foreign ports.

WAR NEWS:

Republicans Revolt Over Bush's Iraq Plan (NSWK)

By Richard Wolffe, Holly Bailey And Eleanor Clift

Newsweek, January 15, 2007

Jan. 22, 2007 issue - Last Tuesday afternoon, a day before President George W. Bush went on TV to explain his decision to send more troops to Iraq, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell called his Republican colleagues together for a private talk. Several GOP senators had already come out against the plan. McConnell, Bush's closest Senate supporter on Iraq, hoped to keep others from defecting. He urged his colleagues to stand together at least until Bush had the chance to speak to the country. After the meeting, the senators went outside the room to display their unity to waiting reporters. McConnell said he thought more troops were just the thing to "give us a chance to succeed." He then stepped aside so the other senators could second his sentiments. No one came forward. McConnell's eye fell on Trent Lott. "Trent?" McConnell said, motioning him toward the microphone. "I don't think I have anything to add," said Lott.

Bush expected at least a handful of Republican senators—critics like Chuck Hagel and George Voinovich—to run from a troop increase. But the White House was surprised when even pro-war senators, including Sam Brownback and Lisa Murkowski, came out against the plan. Other prominent senators, including Lott and John Warner, the senior Republican on the Armed Services Committee, have been quiet. They aren't bashing the idea, but they aren't promoting it either. Warner and Richard Lugar, the ranking Republican on the Foreign Relations Committee, are contemplating a resolution to draw bipartisan support for the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group report.

Senior administration officials, who declined to speak on the record about private deliberations, say the president knows he has to show real improvements in Iraq within two or three months or risk losing even more GOP support. "All the talking points aren't going to make the difference," says a senior aide. "What matters is what happens ... on the streets and the neighborhoods of Baghdad."

A former senior Bush aide who is still close to the White House says if things don't improve, a delegation of Republican senators could one day show up in the Oval Office to tell Bush that the party is no longer with him and the war must end—much like Sen. William Fulbright's forcefully urging Lyndon Johnson to bring the Vietnam War to a close. (Last week Warner told NEWSWEEK he "wouldn't hesitate" to tell Bush if he came to believe Bush's policy was failing.) Bush's challenge isn't just to take control of Baghdad, but to win back control of his party. "Before this, the president's credibility was hanging by a thread," says the former aide. "After this, I don't know. It may be lost."

DOJ_NMG_0116466

When A President Owns A War (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, January 15, 2007

'It's a brave new world for George Bush," New York Sen. Chuck Schumer told reporters a day after the president announced he was sending 21,500 more American troops to Iraq. "For the first time, people who have the ability to change course in Iraq are asking hard questions." And yet, for all the recent developments that would have seemed to usher in a pullback from Iraq-from the sweeping Democratic gains of November, to the Iraq Study Group's damning report in December, to poll numbers earlier this month showing public support for more troops hovering around 18 percent-last week's White House announcement delivered exactly the opposite news. Even Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, seated next to Schumer at last week's briefing, suggested Capitol Hill might be powerless to stop the president's so-called surge: "I'm not the president, I'm not secretary of state, I'm not secretary of defense." In the short run, Congress cannot run a war.

At the same time, though, Washington's reaction to the president's speech marked an unmistakable turning point in the politics of the war. Stopping short of pursuing Massachusetts Sen. Ted Kennedy's bill-which would withhold funding for a troop increase and give Congress authority to cap troop levels-Senate and House Democratic leadership set to work crafting a nonbinding resolution that opposed a troop increase, expecting a vote as early as this week. In a handful of committee hearings, lawmakers unloaded their anger over the president's troop plan on officials like Defense Secretary Robert Gates and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. A growing GOP contingent, meanwhile, expressed opposition to Bush's plan, with Reid saying he'd lined up as many as a dozen Republicans for a resolution opposing what he branded "escalation."

Caution. Even with Republicans in a tough political spot, however, the way forward for Democrats is far from clear. As Hill Democrats worked on a nonbinding resolution, leaders in the House also wrestled with whether to pursue more muscular legislation to withhold funding for prospective troops or to attach serious restrictions on funding for the White House's next defense funding request for Iraq-expected in February or March. "After the commander in chief announces his strategy, it's Congress's responsibility to step back and say, 'Is this the best use of our resources?'" says Rep. Joe Sestak, a Navy vice admiral elected last year. But Democrats, wary of the decades-long political cost of voting to cut off funding for the Vietnam War, are proceeding cautiously. Rep. Bennie Thompson, though a member of the Out of Iraq Caucus, spoke for many Democrats in warning that a cut in funds for a prospective deployment "might send the message that we're not supporting the troops." And there are constitutional questions about how far Congress can go in shaping the war policies of the commander in chief. In the weeks ahead, the question of what Democrats are willing-and able-to do to shape the president's Iraq strategy may determine whether Reid is correct in saying that his nonbinding resolution "will be the beginning of the end of the Iraq war."

Many Democrats attacked Bush's surge plan as a willful rebuff of the electorate but played down their own ability to block it. "We have one commander in chief, not 535," says a top Democratic strategist. But in a memo to Democrats last week, the liberal Center for American Progress outlined a variety of congressional options that, apart from withholding funds for current or future deployments, included the ability to "cap the size of military deployments" and to "condition, limit, or shape the timing and nature of troop deployments." The document listed historical examples of congressional troop caps, from Lebanon in 1983, to U.S. military assistance to Colombia in 2000. "There's probably a lot of confusion," says the Center for American Progress's Larry Korb, who coauthored the memo. "I don't think [Democrats] realize they can do much."

But James Thurber, a congressional and presidential scholar at American University, says Democrats are being coy in claiming the most they can do to block a troop increase is pass a nonbinding resolution expressing disapproval. "They know full well what they can do, but they don't have the votes" for a bill to cut off funding, Thurber says. For now, Democratic congressional leaders say the nonbinding vote is the key first step to responding to the White House because it will force Republican lawmakers into the uncomfortable political position of having to vote for or against the president's plan. Says GOP strategist Tony Fabrizio: "The first rule of politics is never interrupt your enemy when he's making a mistake." Democrats also believe that voters cast ballots for bipartisanship and moderation in the last election, so they want to avoid being seen as wild-eyed zealots. "It's not enough-it's the first step," says newly elected Ohio Sen. Sherrod Brown of a nonbinding resolution. "We're building opposition to escalation of the war by talking to Republicans."

In the meantime, Hill Democrats will channel most of their Iraq war opposition into a blizzard of committee hearings scheduled over the next month or so. The House and Senate intelligence committees will examine issues from how well America's spy agencies are supporting the U.S. effort in Iraq to how the Bush administration used intelligence in the run-up to the invasion. Democrats have also resurrected the House Armed Services subcommittee on oversight, disbanded by Republicans in 1995. Subcommittee Chairman Martin Meehan of Massachusetts is hiring five investigators to look into issues like corruption among defense contractors and troop equipment shortfalls.

DOJ_NMG_0116467

But oversight hearings will do little to placate the Democratic base, where pollster John Zogby says support for the war has dwindled to 7 percent. "The Democratic constituency is looking for a resolution to the war," says Zogby. Indeed, the president's Iraq speech unleashed a national wave of antiwar activism last week, with the liberal group MoveOn picking up 65,000 new members in just two days. MoveOn had planned to devote last week to applauding Democrats for passing its "first 100 hours" package of domestic legislation, but it is now E-mailing members daily-a pace typically reserved for the week before a national election-with entreaties to pressure Congress to pass legislation like Kennedy's. At the moment, however, officials at MoveOn and other liberal groups say they trust Democratic leaders on Capitol Hill who say that the endgame on funding and troop caps won't come for several weeks or even months, perhaps when the White House submits its request for supplemental war money.

The White House is betting that Democrats won't do anything in the short term. Which isn't to say the administration is resting easy. One concern is an expected spike in casualties following the troop increase. "Every time we've been more involved on the ground, casualties have gone up," says a Bush adviser. That's bound to make the antiwar drumbeat, in Congress and in the country, even louder..

Iraq Realigns American Politics (NSWK)

By Howard Fineman

Newsweek, January 15, 2007

Jan. 22, 2007 issue - Ted Kennedy speaks with the voice of history. White-maned and nearing 75, the brother of two assassinated heroes and a veteran of 44 Senate years, he is—in defiance of the odds—again in his prime: a chairman in good health with a doting wife and a packed legislative agenda.

No one tells Ted Kennedy what to do; in any case, the Senate's Democratic leaders were fine with his plan to give a big speech two days before President George W. Bush announced a troop "surge" in Iraq. They are generally glad to let Kennedy play the role he relishes: Irish-American Isaiah, calling his party to account even as legislative insiders keep their distance.

This time party brass got more than they bargained for. Summoning the authority of his years as an intimate witness to history, Kennedy made an eloquent case for a Senate vote on the surge and for a court test of its legitimacy under the War Powers Resolution. "Iraq is George Bush's Vietnam!" he thundered. "Echoes of that disaster are all around us today!"

It was, in its own way, a defining moment. He got a standing ovation and, the next day, congratulations all around on the Hill. By the end of the week—in the aftermath of Bush's tepid speech and Condi Rice's evasive testimony—Kennedy looked prescient.

A generation ago, a war—Vietnam—launched a realignment of American politics. Now, it seems increasingly clear, Iraq is doing the same. In 1968 college students flocked to the New Hampshire primary to protest Lyndon Johnson's policies, sparking a civil war in the Democratic Party on foreign policy that lasted for a generation. By contrast, Vietnam united the GOP around an anti-communist crusade that endured for decades. "Ronald Reagan was gung-ho about Vietnam," says Craig Shirley, a GOP operative and Reagan biographer. "It solidified his world view, and the party's."

Now a mirror image is developing. Democrats seem to be uniting around a theme—the primacy of global diplomacy and congressional review. Republicans, by contrast, have lost the unity that they had during the cold war and the early years of the war on terror.

As Republican divisions grow, Democrats, pressed by their antiwar grass roots, are drawing together. Except for "Independent Democrat" Sen. Joe Lieberman, Dems are increasingly of one mind about Iraq in particular and antiterrorism strategy in general. A vote on surge spending—which Democratic Senate leaders had hoped to avoid and which is technically difficult to devise—now is likely at some point. In general, the party seems less fearful of the old "soft on defense" shibboleth, and ever more tolerant of groups such as Win Without War and Move On. One of the Senate's few other hawkish Democrats, Sen. Evan Bayh, told me that he opposes the surge, and agreed that Congress might have to face the question of funding at some point. The Senate's growing ranks of Democratic presidential contenders—Chris Dodd jumped in last week, Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama are expected to do so soon—are gravitating toward a bring-them-home-quickly stance. "We don't want to come off looking like wimps," said Terry McAuliffe, a Clinton supporter and former party chairman. But he added: "We're jumping all over ourselves now to see who can be the toughest on Bush and the war." It's a fateful competition—which Ted Kennedy already won.

Vermont Pays A Huge Toll In Iraq (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, January 15, 2007

Vermont, where nearly three quarters of residents oppose the Iraq war, has the nation's highest per capita death rate in the conflict. It's a statistic seemingly at odds with the state's reputation as a liberal utopia, a low-stress playground for snowboarders and the escape-from-New York crowd. But with the tally of dead American servicemen and women now past 3,000, the situation in Iraq grim, and President Bush calling for more troops, many Vermonters are asking whether they've already sacrificed too much for a cause whose lofty aims they think may be unreachable.

DOJ_NMG_0116468

Bush's Legacy Hinges On Al-Maliki's Actions (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 16, 2007

President Bush's legacy is now in the hands of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, the head of Iraq's government who is in a tenuous position in Baghdad and quickly losing the confidence of Congress and the Bush administration.

"That is the biggest of potential weak links in the president's program because Maliki has, in a number of ways over a period of time, demonstrated he really can't be counted on for significant cooperation and assertive action," said James F. Hoge Jr., editor of Foreign Affairs magazine.

In November, Mr. Bush met with Mr. al-Maliki in Jordan and declared him "the right guy for Iraq." The prime minister received no such praise in the president's major prime-time speech last week. Senior White House officials have expressed "skepticism," and top lawmakers worry that Mr. Bush has placed too much confidence in Mr. al-Maliki.

"So much of our future in that place is in the hands of Maliki," said Sen. George V. Voinovich, Ohio Republican and a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, who added that he doubts the prime minister is up to the challenge. "I don't think he is."

Mr. al-Maliki took office in May, three months after the bombing of the Shi'ites' Golden Mosque in Samarra, and has been dealing with sectarian violence from the start of his term.

Mr. Bush last week announced a plan to send more than 21,000 additional troops -- 17,000 to Baghdad and 4,000 to Anbar province in the west -- in what may be the last major U.S. hope for leaving Iraq a stable nation.

The soldiers being sent to Baghdad are supposed to be coupled with more Iraqi units, who Mr. Bush has said will take the lead in fighting in and around the city. In addition, Mr. Bush said he secured an agreement from Mr. al-Maliki that the Iraqi and American forces will have the freedom to pursue anyone they see as a threat, which would include Shi'ite militias that have been considered off-limits.

The main question, Mr. Voinovich and Mr. Hoge said, is Mr. al-Maliki's relationship with Sheik Muqtada al-Sadr. They wonder whether the prime minister would confront the powerful Shi'ite religious leader, who many observers say is key to Mr. al-Maliki's power base.

"Too much of the evidence to date points to [the prime minister] as being a Shi'a advocate for Shi'a dominance and for a certain amount of payback to Sunnis for what they've done over many, many years. That, of course, is not a scenario we endorse," Mr. Hoge said.

Mr. Voinovich fears that Sheik al-Sadr has ambitions to turn Iraq into "a Shi'ite theocracy like they have in Iran, and he will be the new ayatollah."

Mr. al-Maliki has lost the confidence of his own countrymen. A September poll by Opinion Research Business, or ORB, based in Britain, found that 29 percent of Iraqi adults had a favorable opinion of the prime minister, down 50 percent from a June poll that put his approval at 58 percent.

American opinion is just as pessimistic. A CNN poll taken Jan. 11 found that just 38 percent were very or somewhat confident "in the ability of the Iraqi government to handle the situation in Iraq."

In the days since Mr. Bush's speech, Mr. al-Maliki has been silent.

"It's extremely important he gets out in a news conference and makes very clear that what the president is proposing, that he supports it," Mr. Voinovich said, adding that Iraqis must recognize the plan as a proposal from their own government rather than as a U.S. dictate.

The White House tried to counter those concerns. Spokesman Tony Snow said last week that Mr. al-Maliki has larger worries than U.S. perception.

"He's not responding to the U.S. press corps. What he's doing is, he's responding to the Iraqi public," Mr. Snow said. "What he's been talking about the last couple of days were what his constituents want to hear about."

The White House also has issued two memorandums to reporters detailing statements from other Iraqi leaders -- from the president to the deputy prime minister to Mr. al-Maliki's spokesman -- backing Mr. Bush's plan.

Mr. al-Maliki has hinted that he doesn't want the challenge. In an interview with the Wall Street Journal published two weeks ago, he lamented about his job: "I wish I could be done with it even before the end of this term."

Bush's Iraq Plan Races Against Two Clocks (CSM)

By Peter Grier

DOJ_NMG_0116469

The Christian Science Monitor, January 16, 2007

posted January 16, 2007 - http://www.csmonitor.com/2007/0116/p25s02-uspo.html Bush's Iraq plan races against two clocks A troop 'surge' in Baghdad could falter if Congress balks or Iraqis don't meet their security commitments on time.

By Peter Grier | Staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor

WASHINGTON

For President Bush's new plan for Iraq, the clock is already ticking. It appears to face time pressure on at least two fronts.

On Capitol Hill, the patience of the Democratic-controlled Congress for the proposal to dispatch 21,500 more US troops to the country is clearly limited. It's possible that the antipathy of many lawmakers towards the plan could foreshadow a resolution of disapproval - or even attempts to limit funds for the war.

In Iraq, the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is supposed to move new Iraqi forces into Baghdad within weeks. If these Iraqi units don't materialize, the US may be forced to reevaluate its strategy, according to administration officials.

Thus by early next month the political and military context for the US troop buildup could look very different than it does today. It is even possible that the White House could stop the surge of increased US forces before it gets fully under way.

"I think we're going to know fairly early in this process whether the Iraqis are in fact prepared to fulfill the commitments they've made to us," said Secretary of Defense Robert Gates at a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing on Friday.

This is not to say that the White House is hedging on its strategy. Administration witnesses defended it vigorously in congressional testimony following President Bush's Wednesday speech to the nation.

"After a lot of thought and after looking at a lot of different options, the president very much decided that this is the best option for us going forward," said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in a Thursday appearance before the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

But the White House appeared somewhat taken aback by the vehemence of congressional reaction to the plan, which would raise US troop levels in Iraq by 21,500, while calling on the Iraqi government to increase its own forces in Baghdad and do more to quell sectarian violence.

For the administration, the nadir in Washington was perhaps Thursday's hearing of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, a panel that includes at least seven lawmakers who have contemplated running for president themselves. Secretary of State Rice was hammered by committee members, Republicans as well as Democrats.

Sen. Chuck Hagel (R) of Nebraska went so far as to say that the president's new plan "represents the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam."

Democratic leaders say they intend within a few weeks to hold votes in both House and Senate on symbolic resolutions of disapproval of the Bush's strategy. Though nonbinding, such votes could be difficult ones for many Republicans, considering the extent of public disapproval of the Iraqi situation.

Whether Democrats would go further, and try to curb funding for the troop increase, remains unclear. Some party leaders, such as Sen. Joseph Biden (D) of Delaware, have cast doubt on the constitutional powers of Congress in this regard. But Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell has charged that this is what Democrats really want to do - and has vowed to try to block votes critical of administration policies.

"Congress is completely incapable of dictating the tactics of the war," Senator McConnell said this week.

The bigger influence on the course of the US troop buildup in Iraq, however, may be the Iraqis themselves.

Administration officials this week were careful to note that the Iraqis have specific tasks to accomplish within a short period of time. One new Iraqi brigade should be moved to Baghdad by Feb. 1, noted Secretary of Defense Gates before the Senate Armed Services Committee. Another should be in place two weeks later.

"The premise of this entire strategy is the Iraqis taking the lead and fulfilling those commitments," he said.

The Iraqis seem eager to take control of the security situation, and the US has received commitments of support from officials throughout the Iraqi government, not just Prime Minister Maliki, said Gates.

But the new defense chief readily admitted that the Iraqi government has made such promises before, and they have come to naught. "Their record of fulfilling promises is not an encouraging one," he said.

Administration officials did not directly say they would put the brakes on the troop buildup if the Iraqis do not move as intended. But they did say that such a situation would case a reevaluation of US strategy.

"Before we have sent in very many additional troops we will have a pretty good idea, at least on the military side, as to whether the Iraqis have stepped up to the plate to fulfill their commitments," said Gates.

On the other hand, if all works as planned and the new deployments tamp down Iraqi violence, a US drawdown might follow later this year, according to Gates.

Meanwhile, support for President Bush's policies continues to hover near record lows. An AP-Ipsos poll found 68 percent of respondents disapproving of Bush's handling of Iraq.

Analysis: Differences Snarl Iraq Plan (AP)

By Robert H. Reid

AP, January 16, 2007

President Bush's plan to bring peace to Iraq, already facing resistance in Congress, also has highlighted differences between Washington and Baghdad over how to deal with Syria and Iran.

Bush and U.S. officials say Iraq's two large neighbors are supporting the insurgency, and American forces have twice detained Iranians in Iraq. Iraq, however, has recently been making overtures to Iran and Syria.

"We have to live in this part of the world," Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari told CNN on Sunday. "We have to live with Iran. We have to live with Syria and Turkey and other countries."

It's not the first time Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government has taken a public stand at odds with Washington — despite the fact that the Iraqi leadership relies heavily on U.S. protection for its survival.

But the differences between the two administrations could hamper efforts to forge a united strategy to deal with Iraq's sectarian violence, while adding pressure on the White House to end America's role there.

The differences over Iran and Syria may seem insignificant compared with the huge U.S. political problems facing the Bush plan, including opposition in Congress and widespread skepticism from Americans. But they point to a deeper problem — a widening gulf between U.S. and Iraqi perceptions of each side's national interest at a time when Americans are growing weary of the conflict.

In announcing his new plan, Bush brushed aside recommendations by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group to seek Syrian and Iranian help in curbing the Iraqi violence.

Instead, he accused both countries of aiding Iraqi insurgents and pledged to "seek out and destroy the networks providing advanced weaponry and training to our enemies in Iraq."

Administration officials insisted that would not include attacks against Iran or Syria. But Bush also said he was dispatching an additional carrier strike group and Patriot missile batteries to the region "to bolster the security of Iraq and protect American interests."

President Jalal Talabani, meanwhile, was making a landmark visit to Syria, the first by an Iraqi head of state in nearly three decades.

Iraqi authorities also were demanding the release of five Iranians arrested by U.S. troops in Iraq recently for allegedly supporting Iraqi insurgents. The Iraqis described the five as diplomats who should have enjoyed immunity from arrest.

The idea of engaging Iran and Syria does not sit well with influential conservative groups within the United States and was rejected by Bush.

Washington is deeply concerned about Iran's nuclear program and its growing influence throughout the entire Middle East.

The U.S. military accuses Iran of providing weapons to Iraqi insurgents and to Shiite militias blamed for sectarian violence around Baghdad. U.S. officials have likewise accused Syria of harboring leaders of the Sunni insurgency and of allowing foreign fighters to slip into Iraq.

"Iran and Syria have been very much part of the problem in Iraq, and cannot be trusted to be part of a genuine solution," wrote Middle East experts James Phillips and James Carafano in a study published last month by The Heritage Foundation, a conservative think-tank.

But there have been other points of tension between the U.S. and Iraqi administrations.

Last summer, for example, al-Maliki, a Shiite, spoke out strongly against Israel for its attack against Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Al-Maliki also so far has done little to crack down on Shiite militias, despite strong U.S. pressure to do so.

At such a sensitive point, any policy divergence between the U.S. and Iraq can fuel demands for the Bush administration to end the American military mission in Iraq.

Critics can point to comments like those made recently by Iraqi elder statesman Mahmoud Othman, who said recently: "Our interests differ from those of the United States. The enmity between the United States and Syria and Iran doesn't benefit the situation in Iraq."

Use Of Kurdish Troops In Baghdad Debated (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

The Kurdish makeup of two of the three Iraqi army brigades due to be sent to Baghdad under President Bush's new strategic plan is drawing concern from Iraqi and U.S. experts.

DOJ_NMG_0116471

Questions have been raised about whether the Kurds would fight Sunni insurgents in Baghdad at a time when some Sunni clerics and organizations have spoken out against aiding U.S. troops and the Iraqi government. But there is also concern that the soldiers would be heavy-handed if sent into heavily Shiite areas.

Recognized as being among the better-trained fighters in Iraq, the two brigades were formed out of Kurdistan's pesh merga militia. They received training from the U.S. military and were integrated into the Iraqi army. Some battalions were used successfully in the Mosul area in November 2004. Others fought in Fallujah, and some Kurds are part of the mixed Iraqi special operations forces brigade that has seen action in Baghdad.

Sunni Muslim in religion, the Kurds consider themselves ethnically distinct from Arabs, a group that includes most Shiite and Sunni Iraqis. While many of their officers speak some Arabic, most of the troops do not. Their government flies the Kurdish, not Iraqi, flag and desires independence.

North of Baghdad, in oil-rich Kirkuk, pesh merga troops have been fighting for more than a year against Shiite militiamen linked to Moqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army. Sadr's group is supporting Shiites being forced from the city by Kurds interested in their autonomous region annexing Kirkuk.

A former senior CIA operations officer who is familiar with Iraq said yesterday that sending the units into Baghdad "will not make many friends for the Kurds, depending on where they go." But, said the officer, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, "if you are going in to clear a majority-Sunni area, better to use Kurdish rather than Shia troops. . . . They are obviously better than Iraqi police and more professional."

Last week, Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish lawmaker and a prominent member of the Iraqi Kurdish Coalition, declared his opposition to Kurds going into Baghdad.

"There are fears that a fight like this, pitting Kurds against the Arabs, is bound to add an ethnic touch to the conflict," Othman told the Iraqi newspaper Az-Zaman. "I am against the move . . . and there are many in the Iraqi parliament who are against it, too."

But the deployment holds appeal for the Kurdistan Regional Government, because in return, the Baghdad government would be ready to provide it an additional share of the national budget, a Kurdish official told the New Anatolian, a Kurdish newspaper, last week.

A senior U.S. military officer familiar with Iraq, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said the Kurdish troops' "salaries, equipment and operating expenses are paid for by the Iraqi MOD [Ministry of Defense], so that's probably just the usual attempt to bargain for a little extra."

Former U.S. ambassador Peter W. Galbraith, who has helped Kurdish officials in the post-Saddam Hussein period, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee last Thursday that the Kurdish fighters "are ultimately loyal not to the national chain of command or the nominal chain of command, but to their political party leaders" -- in this case, to the regional government.

At a hearing Friday of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said that the deployment of the Kurds in Baghdad could bring "balance in that they are not either for Sunnis or for Shia but for Iraq." But Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) countered, "I think they are for the Kurds."

Anthony H. Cordesman, an analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies who has studied the Iraq war, described Bush's new strategy yesterday as "an experiment based on high risks," only one of which is the use of the Kurds.

"They were brought in because other Iraqi army units are too Shiite," he said, "and so are the lesser of two evils."

U.S. Commander Warns Of Long Struggle In Iraq (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 15 — With the first wave of additional soldiers already arriving in Iraq to bolster a new campaign to secure this beleaguered capital city, the top American military commander warned that it could take months before there are any real signs of progress.

“As with any plan, there are no guarantees of success, and it’s not going to happen overnight,” said Gen. George Casey. “But with sustained political support and the concentrated efforts on all sides I believe that this plan can work.”

General Casey made his remarks at a press conference here today, where he was joined by the United States ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad. President Bush recently announced that both men will soon be replaced.

The two officials played down reports of tension between the American military command and the Iraqi government led by Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, saying that any period of transition will have some “friction.”

Over the past year, as the sectarian violence between Sunnis and Shiite intensified, American officers said that their efforts to bring order back to Baghdad’s streets was repeatedly hampered by the interference of Mr. Maliki’s Shiite-dominated government. They complained that Americans were kept out of Shiite militia strongholds and that the government offered protection to suspected militia members who had been arrested.

DOJ_NMG_0116472

Mr. Maliki has offered only tepid public support for the new security plan, waiting a full 48 hours after President Bush announced the new strategy before commenting.

At the press conference today, General Casey and Ambassador Khalilzad said repeatedly that they believe that the Iraqi government was committed to working toward an even-handed policy that treated Sunni and Shiite neighborhoods equally. But they cautioned that only time will tell.

"I've discussed these issues with the prime minister and he's said they need to move, not because of what we say or what's said in Washington, but he has said, 'We have to move to secure the capital city because of Iraqi interests,'" said Ambassador Khalilzad.

General Casey and Ambassador Khalilzad said repeatedly that the new security plan was "conceived" by the Iraqis and the Americans and Iraqi officials have been huddled for days trying to iron out the details of the new strategy.

However, until recently, Mr. Maliki reportedly staunchly opposed having more American troops sent to Baghdad, and voiced his opposition to President Bush as recently as November in a meeting in Jordan.

The claim that the new strategy was an Iraqi plan was met by skepticism by both the Iraqi and foreign press. General Casey later elaborated, saying that American forces would remain firmly and completely under American control.

In fact, the plan, as outlined by American military officials familiar with the details, is very similar to the American approach in Tel Afar in 2005. In the new approach, American soldiers will establish a much greater physical presence in neighborhoods across Baghdad, operating hand-in-hand with the Iraqi Army and police at newly created joint security sites.

At every level of command, Americans and Iraqis would be closely paired in an attempt to establish trust between the Iraqi citizens and their security forces.

General Casey acknowledged systemic problems within the Iraqi security forces and said that is part of the reason the effort will take time to succeed.

"I think you'll see a gradual evolution over the next two to three months, and then you'll see things continue to get better up through the summer and fall. It'll take some time," he said.

American military officers believe that for the plan to have any chance of succeeding, it must be viewed as treating Sunni neighborhoods in the same way as Shiite neighborhoods.

In this regard, the cooperation of the prime minister's office will be critical. As it stands, according to military officers familiar with the planning, no decision has been made as to whether American troops would operate within the Shiite stronghold of Sadr City.

When asked about the plan for Sadr City, General Casey did not go into specifics, but repeated his pledge that all areas would be treated equally.

Ambassador Khalilzad concurred.

"No militia will be a replacement for the state or control local security," the ambassador said. "The military commanders will have freedom of action and the ability to do what's needed without political interference or micromanagement. They won't be told, `Don't do this. Don't go into this or that neighborhood.' Therefore, it will be fair."

Iraqi Army brigades from around the country are expected to join the effort, including soldiers from the Kurdish north.

The government's security forces across the country have been repeatedly targeted. This evening, in the northern city of Mosul, a suicide bomber attacked the headquarters of the Kurdish forces, killing at least four people, including a woman, and wounding 24, according to a local health official.

Abdullah Museeb 25, a student, said that "the explosion was so huge that some houses were destroyed," collapsing right on top of the residents. "Operations to rescue the civilians and search for survivors are still going on," he said.

U.S. Puts Faith In Iraqi Politicians To Lead Security Effort (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 16, 2007

— U.S. officials here said Monday that the latest plan to calm war-addled Baghdad, where dozens more were killed or found dead in political violence during the day, will succeed because Iraqi politicians will come through this time.

Despite widespread doubts about the efficacy and loyalties of Iraq's Shiite-dominated government and armed forces, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr. said at a news briefing that American officials had put Iraqis at the helm of security operations. "We will support them, but the Iraqis will be in the lead," Khalilzad said.

U.S. officials have voiced frustration over the failure of the Iraqi government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki to confront Shiite militias that have ties to political parties in the government. U.S. commanders say Iraqi officials forbid them from going after suspected gunmen in Shiite neighborhoods. Some voiced outrage when Maliki appointed a relative unknown, Lt. Gen. Abud Qanbar, to head the Baghdad security plan, passing over the Americans' choice for the post.

DOJ_NMG_0116473

The new plan follows two efforts last year to quell the violence in the capital, which U.S. and Iraqi officials acknowledge have been failures. The number of civilian deaths spiraled upward as Shiite militias rampaged through Sunni neighborhoods and Sunni insurgents bombed Shiite marketplaces, police patrols and U.S. military convoys.

Khalilzad and Casey said the new plan had a greater chance of success because it was part of a broad strategy that includes billions in reconstruction spending, the controversial addition of 21,500 U.S. troops proposed by President Bush and confrontation with Iranian and Syrian elements that U.S. officials allege are sowing chaos in Iraq.

The plan also involves additional training of Iraqi security forces and a revamped command-and-control structure, which will have Qanbar at the helm. However, Casey said the American forces would take orders only from U.S. commanders.

"Our forces, frankly, will not be at greater risk, although the more forces you bring here, the greater the risk of casualties," he said. "But they won't be put at risk because of command relationships."

The plan is part of an effort by the White House to revamp its Iraq policy based on a new set of assumptions, according to public documents outlining the strategy. Though it long considered the Sunni insurgency the main threat in Iraq, it now acknowledges "violent extremists from all communities." Before, the Bush administration assumed political progress would calm violence. Now it acknowledges that little political or economic progress can be made without a minimum of security.

The new strategy also advocates paying attention to political actors outside Baghdad's high-security Green Zone. But political figures more hostile to the U.S., such as radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr and the Sunni Muslim Scholars Assn., already vehemently reject Bush's proposal to increase the number of troops in the country.

Khalilzad and Casey, who will be replaced within weeks, said this plan has the support of Iraqi political figures.

"There's a strong political commitment from the government to the plan, including the will to act, and including the will not to impose constraints on coalition and Iraqi security forces," Casey said.

Some Iraqi officials said the new plan includes far more input by Iraqi leaders than did the previous ones.

"The last operations that were carried out were American operations, not Iraqi operations," said Hoshyar Zebari, Iraq's foreign minister. "They were doing their things, they blew it up and they blame us for it. This is an Iraqi plan."

Violence continued across much of Iraq on Monday. Authorities in the capital discovered the bullet-riddled bodies of at least 30 men, most of them in west Baghdad. Four homemade bombs targeting Iraqi security forces killed at least seven and injured eight in the capital. A suicide bomber struck an Iraqi army checkpoint in west Baghdad, killing four soldiers and injuring three.

Two car bombs in downtown Kirkuk killed at least 12 civilians and injured 14, police said. A Katyusha rocket struck a house in the contested oil-rich northern city, killing one person. Farther north, in Mosul, a suicide car bomber targeting an Iraqi army patrol killed six and injured 28, a police spokesman said.

An Iraqi contractor supplying food to a U.S. base near the southern city of Kut was slain. Authorities there also discovered the bodies of three Iraqi soldiers killed with bullets to the head and chest.

More Troops In Iraq, But Success Will 'Take Time' (USAT)

By Rick Jervis, Usa Today

USA Today, January 16, 2007

First of extra 21,500 vowed by Bush arrive

BAGHDAD — The new security plan for Iraq will need time to take hold and may not yield significant results for several months, the outgoing U.S. commander there cautioned Monday.

Gen. George Casey told reporters that some of the 21,500 additional U.S. troops President Bush promised for Iraq last week have already begun arriving.

However, their success in calming sectarian violence will depend on better cooperation from Iraq's military and police and broad support from Iraqi politicians that has been lacking, Casey said.

"As with any plan, there are no guarantees of success, and it's not going to happen overnight. But with sustained political support, and the concentrated efforts on all sides, I believe that this plan can work," Casey said at a joint news conference with the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad.

"I think you'll see a gradual evolution over the next two to three months, and then you'll see things continue to get better out through the spring, out through the summer and fall. But it will take some time," Casey said.

Both Casey and Khalilzad repeatedly said they had assurances that no areas of Baghdad would be allowed to serve as sanctuaries for gunmen. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has until now been hesitant to enforce crackdowns on some militias, including the Mahdi Army of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, one of al-Maliki's key political supporters.

DOJ_NMG_0116474

The drive to secure Iraq is likely to fail without strong backing from al-Maliki, said Stephen Biddle, a military analyst at the New York-based Council on Foreign Relations.

"The issue is whether the different states' interests are aligned," Biddle said. "If they're not, it's a serious, serious problem. And it's not at all clear if the Maliki interests and the U.S. interests are aligned."

Casey said the new security plan will give al-Maliki unprecedented power at the top of the command structure, though U.S. troops will still be under control of American commanders.

"(The plan) is Iraqi-conceived and will be Iraqi-led — not only on the security side but on the political, economic and media/public affairs sides," Casey said.

Casey and Khalilzad also said that five Iranian citizens arrested by U.S. forces Thursday in Irbil, in Iraq's northern Kurdish region, were "intelligence agents" working to undermine the government and target coalition troops.

Iran has said the men were diplomats and demanded their release.

"These gentlemen were not diplomats," Khalilzad said, adding they had ties to the Iranian Revolutionary Guard, a paramilitary force that answers directly to Iran's Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. "We have an understanding with the prime minister that we'll target these networks."

Casey said: "We have statements made by people in detention, and we have records that give us great confidence that these are, in fact, intelligence operatives."

At least 55 people were killed or found dead across Iraq on Monday, according to the Associated Press. The U.S. military announced the deaths of two more soldiers, both killed in Baghdad.

Casey Says Results In Iraq Won't Be Fast (AP)

By Kim Gamel

AP, January 16, 2007

There are no guarantees of overall success or quick results in the new U.S.-Iraqi security drive in Baghdad, the U.S. commander in Iraq said Monday.

Gen. George Casey told reporters he did not expect significant results until the summer and fall, for the first time putting a timeframe around the plan announced Wednesday by President Bush.

"As with any plan, there are no guarantees of success, and it's not going to happen overnight but with sustained political support and the concentrated efforts on all sides I believe that this plan can work," Casey said at a news conference.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, who joined Casey at the podium, declared there were no deadlines being imposed on the Iraqis to take action against gunmen, but the pressure was a perception that existed because of the Shiite-dominated government's failure in the past to weed out Shiite militia fighters.

"The statements that have been made about the urgency for action reflects this doubt or concern that exists in many places about whether the Iraqis or the Iraqi leadership will decide to do what's necessary," Khalilzad said.

"I've discussed these issues with the prime minister and he's said they need to move, not because of what we say or what's said in Washington, but he has said 'we have to move to secure the capital city because of Iraqi interests,'" the U.S. envoy said.

Their responses simply mirrored what other U.S. officials have said in defense of Bush's plan against a wave of criticism given the failure of two previous drives to secure the capital.

Casey and Khalilzad — both set to leave their jobs soon — showed little emotion and did not offer much new information in the face of probing questions from reporters.

Asked how things would be different this time, Casey, who has expressed reservations about increasing U.S. troop strength in Iraq, said he couldn't offer any guarantees.

"But I do believe that with continued political reinforcement and political support, this plan can go forward," he said. "And it's an opportunity for the Iraqi people to get on board and support their security forces to move this whole country forward."

Casey dismissed reports about disagreements between Iraqi and U.S. officials over the command structure of the operation to curb sectarian violence in Baghdad, although Iraqi officials said many hotly disputed issues were unresolved.

"We have been here before ... but what's different is a stronger level of political commitment from the government and a better organization on the Iraqi side to help their own plan succeed. And I will tell you yes, there are still difficulties with the Iraqi security forces. That has been a challenge," said Casey, who will cede command of U.S. forces to Gen. David Petraeus.

Petraeus has served a total of nearly 29 months in Iraq.

Khalilzad also is leaving his post for the United Nations, where he will become the U.S. envoy if confirmed by the Senate. He is being replaced by Ryan Crocker, current ambassador to Pakistan.

DOJ_NMG_0116475

Both Casey and Khalilzad also repeatedly said they had assurances that no areas of Baghdad would be allowed to serve as sanctuaries for gunmen, a direct reference to past interference on the part of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to protect the Mahdi Army militia of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, one of the Iraqi leader's key political backers.

"No militia will be a replacement for the state or control local security," the ambassador said. The military commanders will have freedom of action and the ability to do what's needed without political interference or micromanagement. They won't be told, `Don't do this. Don't go into this or that neighborhood.' Therefore, it will be fair."

Casey also said the security drive might take months to show results.

"I think you'll see a gradual evolution over the next two to three months, and then you'll see things continue to get better up through the summer and fall. It'll take some time," he said.

Casey said al-Maliki had approved the insertion of 21,500 new American troops into Iraq and would be consulted on all future U.S. troop additions or withdrawals.

The top U.S. commander said recent U.S. detentions of Iranians in Iraq were justified because the men taken captive were working for the Iranian government to supply weapons and other aid to insurgents and other anti-U.S. and Iraqi forces.

Five Iranians were taken in a raid on an Iranian facility in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil on Thursday

"These gentlemen were not diplomats that we're holding, and all (of them) by discussions that I've had with people ... they are Revolution Guard representatives up in a Kurdish area of Iraq. ...

"These folks that we have captured are foreign intelligence agents in this country working with Iraqis to destabilize Iraq and target coalition forces that are here at Iraq's request. I don't think there is any disagreement on that," Casey said.

Maliki Attacked For Ties To Shia Militants (FT)

By Daniel Dombey And Steve Negus

Financial Times, January 16, 2007

Iraq's most senior Sunni politician on Monday launched a bitter personal attack on the country's prime minister, warning Nouri al-Maliki that the Iraqi government had only limited time to break with sectarian groups and start delivering to ordinary citizens.

In comments to the media in London, where he also met top British officials, Tariq al-Hashimi, Iraq's vice president, said Mr Maliki had failed to break his ties with Shia militias and that Washington would only give him a limited time to succeed.

Mr Hashimi's comments came on the day that Saddam Hussein's two co-defendants, his half brother Barzan al-Tikriti and revolutionary court judge Awadh al-Bandar, were executed in Iraq; Mr Tikriti's head was ripped from his body during the hanging.

Mr Hashimi said that Mr Maliki had to try to be a prime minister "for all the people" rather than maintaining his affiliation with the radical Shia cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. He said Mr Maliki had to be "encouraged" to break away from Mr Sadr and unite with other groups in Iraqi society, such as the Sunni and the Kurds. Mr Hashimi said US officials believed Mr Maliki was "behind schedule" and only had limited time to try for national reconciliation.

At present, he said, 200-300 Sunni were leaving Baghdad every day for Jordan and Syria and that the west of Baghdad was at risk of becoming a "no man's land" for the Sunni community.

Both Sunni and Shia members of Mr Maliki's national unity government regularly accuse each other of acting in bad faith and of providing political cover for armed groups rather than pursuing a policy of reconciliation.

US officials meanwhile have been walking a delicate line in their public statements, acknowledging the widespread perception that Mr Maliki's government was weak or indecisive, but praising the prime minister's resolve.

On Monday, the leading US military and civilian officials in Baghdad said they had confidence in his government. The outgoing US ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, said there were no deadlines imposed on Mr Maliki's government to neutralise militias, although he did say there were doubts about the Iraqi leadership's commitment to do so.

"The statements that have been made about the urgency for action reflects this doubt or concern that exists in many places about whether the Iraqis or the Iraqi leadership will decide to do what's necessary," Mr Khalilzad said.

"I've discussed these issues with the prime minister and he's said they need to move, not because of what we say or what's said in Washington, but he has said 'we have to move to secure the capital city because of Iraqi interests,'" the US envoy said.

The top US commander in Iraq General George Casey meanwhile said that Iraq's government was exerting a new level of commitment towards improving the security situation. He also said that he did not expect significant results from a new US-Iraqi push to contain insurgent and militia violence until the summer.

'Give Us A Chance' (NSWK)

By Eleanor Clift

DOJ_NMG_0116476

Newsweek, January 16, 2007

Jan. 15, 2007 - Virginia Senator John Warner is the senior Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee and a trusted voice on both sides of the aisle. He is withholding judgment for now on the president's new plan to send more troops to Iraq, but makes it clear in an interview with NEWSWEEK's Eleanor Clift that Congress is prepared to assert its rightful role as an equal partner in the war-making powers of the administration. Excerpts:

NEWSWEEK: As we look at this confrontation between Congress and the White House over this new policy towards Iraq, a lot of people are looking to you to either lead the way to support the president, or deliver the word to him that this can't be sustained. Please give me a sense of where you are.

Warner: When I got back from Iraq in October I made the statement that this situation is neither going forward or backward; it's going sideways…At the current time I've indicated that [the president's plan] deserves very serious consideration by the Congress. I'm studying that report in the context of the Baker-Hamilton commission and I made a request of the chairman of the Joint Chiefs [of Staff] to look at some of the A-team, B-team—red team, blue team—type of analysis that's done in the Pentagon.

That's like war games.

Yes, war games. I also expressed to [Joint Chiefs chairman Peter] Pace my great concern about getting the American G.I. in the crossfire of hatred between Sunni and Shia. Those hatreds go back over 1,000 years; they're predicated on strong religious differences. And that's not for the American G.I. to settle; it's for the Iraqi G.I. to settle. [Also,] three, four months ago in the Armed Services committee, together with [Michigan Democratic Sen.] Carl Levin, I put an amendment in requiring the executive branch to prepare a National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq…That document could bear on the decision making. There's a lot to be studied, and I just urge my colleagues not to jump to their [conclusions] until they've had a chance to do some studying.

In the meantime, the troops in the surge are already in Iraq.

While some of the first increments of troops have arrived, more will arrive in February, more in March, so it's the sequencing of this flow of troops—but a small percentage have arrived to date.

There is speculation that if the initial reports of this new strategy are grim that it would fall to you as a senior Republican to go to the White House with the bad news, or to broker some sort of compromise.

I don't want to appoint myself to any position. I just stepped down as [committee] chairman after six years under our rules. But you can be sure that I think my past actions have indicated my willingness to do what I think is in the best interest of the nation—and if that necessitated visiting the president as I've done twice [in the last two weeks]—I wouldn't hesitate.

Did you say visiting the president?

The president asked a group of us to come down [on Jan. 5] and we went down for a 20-minute meeting and stayed almost an hour. It was a very constructive give and take. I then returned at the invitation of the president [last] Monday accompanying nine or 10 other senators. I urged the president last fall that before he laid down his plan it would be wise to consult with the Congress—and a measure of consultation has taken place, and it's continuing. I also urged the president to be open-minded about some ideas to incorporate in the plan, and he specifically put that in his statement [in last week's speech.]

But if you came to believe his policy is not working, you wouldn't hesitate to tell him that.

No, I wouldn't hesitate to tell him privately. Privately.

What are your feelings about the Baker-Hamilton commission?

[The report] had some very good points in it. I think there's more substance in that than they're given credit for—I think they did a good job.

It seems to be you could easily have a bipartisan resolution that would get a lot of Democratic and Republican support.

To the extent that we could achieve a significant bipartisan position, I think it would be helpful to the president and to the country. But it's too early—we're barely in the formative stages. You've got to remember, the president started working on this [plan] in October. He worked intensely October, November, December—and the Senate has had this 48 hours. So give us a chance.

But meanwhile the war's been going on for [almost] four years, and you wish that a lot of this study had gone on two years ago, three years ago.

You are correct, but this is where we are.

You met with General [David] Petraeus [newly appointed as top U.S. military commander in Iraq]. Are you convinced that he's convinced that this surge can work?

The general is a very impressive military professional, and I've been dealing with these people ever since I was secretary of the Navy. He's a very exceptional person. I think it's premature to ask him that question.

The speculation is that the generals were strong-armed into supporting this plan—that they had reservations.

I'm going to withdraw from any observations on that at this time. I leave that to you.

So much of this rests on the willingness or ability of Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki. In your questions [during the committee hearing], you seemed less than convinced that the White House had a handle on his motivations, and ability.

I think the president and his team as well as the Congress have to deal with realities that there are question marks with regard to Maliki….He's not the Rock of Gibraltar but we've got to deal with the cards that we're dealt.

And the speculation that the administration may widen the war to Iran?

I [asked] that specific question and [Defense Secretary Robert] Gates was very forthcoming, as was the chairman of the Joint Chiefs. [They said] that to the extent Iran and Syria have been infiltrating into Iraq, then all of those measures to curtail that be done within the sovereign territory of Iraq.

American troops stormed diplomatic ground [during a raid on an Iranian consulate in northern Iraq last week.] That seems to be crossing that line a bit.

I thought you were talking about whether we would—like in Vietnam—have incursions across sovereign territory of Iraq into either Syria or Iran. At the moment, Gates and the chairman said that was not being contemplated.

You lived through Vietnam. Are you getting a sense of deja vu here?

Well, it's an entirely different military operation and geography and the like. The only aspect of Vietnam we must watch now is the gradual withdrawal of the people and then the Congress from supporting the troops. And fortunately thus far both Republicans and Democrats—and I certainly strongly support this—have a great admiration for the troops and have no intentions in any way to restrict their funding.

Poll: Bush's New Iraq Strategy Fails To Rally Public Support (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, January 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush's address to the nation last week failed to move public opinion in support of his plan to increase U.S. troop levels in Iraq and left Americans more pessimistic about the likely outcome of the war.

In a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Friday through Sunday, more than 6 of 10 people back the idea of a non-binding congressional resolution expressing opposition to Bush's plan to commit an additional 21,500 U.S. troops to Iraq.

POLL RESULTS: New Iraq policy

However, those surveyed are split, 47%-50%, over whether Congress should deny funding for the additional troops.

The telephone poll of 1,003 adults nationwide has a margin of error of +/—3 percentage points. The results were compared with a survey taken before the speech, on Jan. 5-7, of a similar sample. The movement on several key questions was within the error margin and therefore not considered statistically significant.

That's not surprising, says Charles Franklin, a political scientist at the University of Wisconsin at Madison who studies polling.

"We've had four years to think about the war," Franklin says. "This is not him making a speech about a policy that the public hasn't been debating for a long time. … At this point, it's very hard for a speech to make much difference."

White House spokesman Jeanie Mamo agrees. "As we made clear, one speech will not change public opinion," she says. "But as conditions improve in Iraq, so will the public's approval of the plan."

Among key findings:

·The central elements of Bush's "new way forward" in Iraq command limited public support. Now, 38% support a significant increase in U.S. troop levels, up from 36% before the speech.

Six in 10 have little or no confidence the Iraqi government will be able to take responsibility for handling security there by November, as Bush suggested. And by more than 2-1, those surveyed oppose his plan to send an additional $1 billion in economic aid.

·Americans feel more pessimistic about the war in the wake of Bush's speech. For the first time, a narrow plurality — 49%-47% — say the United States is likely to lose the war. Before the speech, they said by 50% to 46% that the United States was likely to win.

·The proportion who predict that political stability around the world will improve this year dropped by 9 points, to 32%.

·Those who say Bush has a "clear plan" for Iraq rose a bit, to 29% from 25%. Those who say congressional Democrats have a clear plan dropped to 21% from 25%.

Even so, by 51% to 36%, those surveyed have more confidence in congressional Democrats to handle Iraq than in the president.

·Optimism that the president and congressional Democrats would work together more closely this year plunged. Before the speech, Americans divided 50%-50% on that question. After the speech — and the almost uniform Democratic criticism of it — 62% of those surveyed say more cooperation isn't likely.

DOJ_NMG_0116478

·Approval of Bush's handling of Iraq moved up a tick, from a low point of 26% before the speech to 28% now. His overall job-approval rating dipped 3 points, to 34%.

What Congress Can (And Can't) Do On Iraq (WP)

By David B. Rivkin Jr. And Lee A. Casey

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

Congressional Democrats (and Republicans) who oppose President Bush's decision to send additional American troops to Iraq may frustrate his plan, but not -- as suggested by Democratic Whip Jim Clyburn -- by imposing 21,500 strings on the 21,500 new troops. Just as there are constraints on the president's constitutional authority as commander in chief, there are limits on Congress's ability to direct presidential action. In particular, Congress cannot use its power of the purse to micromanage the president's execution of his office. Indeed, although the prosecution of the Iraq war looms large in today's political discourse, the consequences of substantive decisions related to the war are dwarfed by the imperatives of protecting the integrity of the core rules governing interactions between the executive and legislative branches, which are rooted in our distinctive constitutional fabric.

This constitutional fabric features two coordinate political branches, with unique responsibilities and independent legitimacies. Thus, even if one assumes that, as critics allege, the November election results were a call for disengaging from Iraq, efforts by some congressional Democrats to chastise the president through a resolution of "no confidence" in his Iraq policy have no place in our constitutional culture. The Framers did not establish a parliamentary system.

This does not mean, of course, that Congress is powerless. It could -- if the leadership mustered veto-proof majorities -- immediately cut off funding for U.S. operations in Iraq. Alternatively, Congress could refuse to pass new appropriations once the current ones expire. The refusal to pay for particular policies -- whether in war or peace -- has been the most important check on executive power in the Anglo-American political tradition, dating to the British Parliament's ancient insistence on the right to seek redress of grievances before voting supplies (i.e., money) to the monarch. Under our constitutional system, however, the power to cut off funding does not imply the authority to effect lesser restrictions, such as establishing benchmarks or other conditions on the president's direction of the war. Congress cannot, in other words, act as the president's puppet master, and so long as currently authorized and appropriated funding lasts, the president can dispatch additional troops to Iraq with or without Congress's blessing.

The precise line between congressional and presidential authority is sometimes unclear, and no court has jurisdiction to rule on the issue. The analysis, however, is straightforward. When the two political branches exercise their respective constitutional powers in a way that brings them into conflict -- a scenario clearly envisioned by the Framers -- the relevant constitutional principle is that neither branch can vitiate the ability of the other to discharge its core constitutional responsibilities. Just as the president cannot raise his own funds (by obtaining loans unauthorized by Congress, for example), the legislature cannot attach conditions to federal spending that would destroy the president's authority to direct the military's tactical and strategic operations. This balance makes perfect sense; if Congress could closely direct how the executive branch spends appropriated funds, it would vitiate the president's core responsibilities as chief executive and commander in chief, transforming him into a cipher. This outcome would fundamentally warp the Framers' entire constitutional fabric.

To maintain the integrity of this original design, the Supreme Court has long ruled, in such cases as United States v. Klein (1872) and United States v. Lovett (1946), that Congress cannot attach unconstitutional conditions to otherwise proper legislation, including spending bills. As explained by Professor Walter Dellinger -- President Bill Clinton's chief constitutional lawyer at the Justice Department -- "[b]road as Congress' spending power undoubtedly is, it is clear that Congress may not deploy it to accomplish unconstitutional ends." This includes restricting the president's authority as commander in chief to direct the movement of U.S. armed forces. In that regard, Dellinger quoted Justice Robert Jackson -- who said while serving as President Franklin Roosevelt's attorney general: "The President's responsibility as Commander-in-Chief embraces the authority to command and direct the armed forces in their immediate movements and operations, designed to protect the security and effectuate the defense of the United States."

Although this system may seem unsatisfactory to those who disagree with President Bush's Iraq policy, it has two great virtues. First, it bolsters the Constitution's fundamental design -- the separation of powers between the coequal branches of government. The Framers vested executive authority in a president for a reason. As Alexander Hamilton explained in the Federalist Papers: "Energy in the executive is a leading character in the definition of good government. It is essential to the protection of the community against foreign attacks." Second, requiring Congress to exercise its power in dramatic ways ensures political accountability. If Congress believes the war is lost, or not worth winning, it must take responsibility for the consequences of forcing a U.S. withdrawal. Otherwise, it must leave the president to direct the war and to bear responsibility for the decisions he has made and will make.

DOJ_NMG_0116479

The writers are Washington lawyers who served in the Justice Department during the administrations of Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush.

Has Bush Ordered Secret War On Iran? (NSWK)

Newsweek, January 22, 2007

Jan. 22, 2007 issue - Has George W. Bush ordered up a "secret war" against Iran and Syria? Some administration opponents on Capitol Hill began asking this question after U.S. forces in recent weeks arrested two groups of Iranian government representatives inside Iraq. Bush particularly alarmed critics when, in announcing his new Iraq policy, he pledged to "interrupt the flow of support from Iran and Syria" and to "seek out and destroy the networks." Sen. Joseph Biden, now Senate Foreign Relations Committee chairman (and a Dem presidential contender), sent a letter to Bush after a question-and-answer confrontation with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Biden said Rice had been evasive on whether Bush's statements meant that U.S. military personnel could cross into Iran or Syria in pursuit of insurgent support networks. He also asked whether the administration believes the president could order such action without first seeking explicit congressional approval—as Biden thinks he must. A White House aide declined to comment on Biden's letter. But the tough approach stunned even America's firmest Iraqi allies, the Kurds. Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari, a Kurd, told NEWSWEEK that one of the U.S. Special Forces raids on Iranians working in Iraq "caught everyone by surprise. We should have been alerted and informed."

In fact, administration officials (anonymous due to diplomatic sensitivities) concede that Bush's Iran language may have been overly aggressive, raising unwarranted fears about military strikes on Tehran. Instead, they say, Bush was trying to warn Iran to keep its operatives out of Iraq, and to reassure Gulf allies—including Saudi Arabia—that the United States would protect them against Iranian aggression. A senior administration official, not authorized to speak on the record, says the policy is part of the new Iraq offensive. "All this comes out of our very detailed, lengthy review of strategy from last fall," he says. Recent intel indicates the government of Iran, or elements in it, have stepped up interference in Iraqi political affairs and the supply of weapons to Iraqi Shiite insurgents, say several U.S. intel and national-security officials, anonymous when discussing sensitive material. "The reason you keep hearing about Iran is we keep finding their stuff there," Joint Chiefs Chairman Peter Pace said Friday. Two of the officials, however, indicated Bush had not signed a secret order—known as an intel "finding"—authorizing the CIA or other undercover units to launch covert operations to undermine the governments of Iran and Syria.

—Mark Hosenball, Michael Hirsh, Babak Dehghanpisheh and Richard Wolffe

Rice Arranges Three-way Mideast Summit (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, January 16, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Monday she will bring together the Israeli and Palestinian leaders in the coming weeks for a summit dedicated to exploring ideas for an eventual Palestinian state.

The announcement came after Rice met with President Hosni Mubarak in this southern Egyptian town following a three-day visit to Israel and the Palestinian territories.

Rice's talks were aimed at breathing new life into stalled Mideast efforts and bolstering the moderate Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, in his standoff with the Islamic militant group Hamas.

Rice said her talks during the visits dealt with laying the groundwork for "a political horizon that will lead to a Palestinian state."

"I will soon meet with (Israeli Prime Minister Ehud) Olmert and President Abbas to have discussions on the broad issues of that horizon, so we can work on the road map and try to accelerate the road map to move to a Palestinian state," she told reporters in Luxor.

She said the summit with Olmert and Abbas would take place "relatively soon" but did not set a date.

In Israel, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert told lawmakers of his Kadima party that he and the secretary of state had agreed on "a three-way meeting with Abbas" — also known as Abu Mazen — to be organized "in a short time."

"It was agreed upon by both of us that the road map will continue to form the basis of the process," Olmert said, referring to the stalled peace plan backed by the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations. The plan calls for the establishment of an independent Palestinian state.

"My meeting with Abu Mazen caused a momentum and this momentum has to continue," Olmert said, referring to his talks with President Mahmoud Abbas on Dec. 23. "This meeting is not a replacement, and will not be a replacement, for the bilateral negotiations between us and the Palestinians," Olmert added.

Saeb Erekat, an aide to Abbas, could not confirm whether Abbas would attend, but said "in principle" the Palestinians are prepared to take part.

DOJ_NMG_0116480

"The seriousness Dr. Rice reflected yesterday was genuine," he said. "She reflected seriousness, interest. She reflected an understanding of the bigger picture of what is going on in the region, and the need to put this thing behind us, the Arab-Israeli conflict."

Olmert and Abbas had held their first official meeting on Dec. 23. The Israeli leader promised a series of goodwill gestures to Abbas at that time, including the transfer of $100 million in frozen tax money and the easing of West Bank travel restrictions. But the Palestinians have complained about Israel not following through on its pledges.

Arab allies have been asking the Bush administration for some time to work harder for an Israeli-Palestinian peace settlement, arguing that the lingering conflict undermines efforts to make progress on other Mideast problems, including in Iraq and Iran.

Arab officials said they now will propose a broad bargain to Rice, dubbed "Iraq for Land."

The deal reflects widespread Arab feeling that a lasting Middle East peace is impossible unless Israel agrees to hand over lands it occupied during the 1967 Mideast war to the Palestinians, Syria and Lebanon.

On a related front Rice is asking Arab allies to help support the fragile government in Iraq, on whose success much of President Bush's new plan to turn the war around will depend.

Rice was meeting diplomats and leaders in Egypt and Saudi Arabia on Monday, a day after a similar session in Jordan.

Moderate Arab governments plan to tell Rice they will help Washington stabilize Iraq if the U.S. takes more active steps to revive a broad peace initiative between Israel and its neighbors, Arab officials and media said Sunday.

The scheduled meetings with Sunni Arab leaders fell on the same day that Saddam Hussein's half brother and the former head of Iraq's Revolutionary Court were hanged in Iraq. The Sunni former Iraqi dictator's chaotic execution two weeks ago incited Sunni anger and drew worldwide criticism.

The top U.S. diplomat is also meeting Tuesday with counterparts from eight Arab countries in Kuwait.

Jordanian King Abdullah II warned Rice that Iraqi political reconciliation would fail if Sunni Iraqis were not engaged in their country's decision-making.

"Any political process that doesn't ensure the participation of all segments of Iraqi society will fail and will lead to more violence," Abdullah told Rice, according to a statement by his press office.

"As a key component of the Iraqi social fabric, the Iraqi Sunni community must be included as partners in building Iraq's future," said the king, a leading U.S. ally in the Mideast.

Along with other U.S. allies like Egypt and Saudi Arabia, Jordan is concerned about the growing Shiite Muslim influence, stretching from Iran through Iraq, Syria and Lebanon. The fear is that the hardline Tehran government will dominate the Mideast and give rise to more extremism, jeopardizing a Mideast settlement and threatening those nations.

Bush's new strategy to send thousands more troops to Iraq met with strong skepticism across the Mideast.

There were deep doubts that U.S. troops, or the Shiite-led Iraqi government, would tackle what many in the Sunni-dominated Arab world see as the chief threat to Iraq: Shiite militias, blamed for fueling the cycle of sectarian slayings.

Mustafa al-Ani, a military analyst with the Gulf Research Center in Dubai, said the American military has to take down the Shiite militias — particularly the most feared of them, the Mahdi Army, loyal to cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, an ally of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Otherwise, the U.S. will lose any support among Iraq's Sunnis, he said.

Al-Maliki has resisted U.S. pressure in the past to move against al-Sadr's militia, but last week the prime minister pledged to crack down on the Mahdi Army.

U.S. Courts Allies' Support On Iran (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, January 16, 2007

In hitting the road to sell the new U.S. strategy for Iraq and other aims, two of President Bush's top aides are hammering the same message: that the cost of U.S. failure would be a stronger and increasingly aggressive Iran.

The threat of Iran's rise has become for the U.S. a sort of diplomatic glue, which the globetrotting Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert Gates are now using to patch together an alliance aimed at helping heal not only Iraq, but also Lebanon and the Palestinian conflict.

In one sign of the changing climate, Ms. Rice yesterday announced in Luxor, Egypt, an agreement to hold three-way talks next month with Israeli and Palestinian leaders to try to start hashing out the possible dimensions of a Palestinian state. U.S. officials cited the talks -- the first of their kind in six years -- as evidence that the Arab world is increasingly keen to make peace with Israel so it can turn its attention toward containing Iran.

But winning broad support in the Persian Gulf region for the weak Iraqi government, or even for an overt campaign against Iran, won't be easy. The region's Sunni Arab states -- most of which either Mr. Gates or Ms. Rice are visiting this week -- are leery of the Shiite-dominated government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. They are also apprehensive about lining up too publicly alongside the U.S. in a Cold War-style, anti-Iran bloc.

DOJ_NMG_0116481

Mr. Gates, who in 2004 advocated engagement with Iran, sounded a tough tone yesterday after meeting with NATO officials in Brussels. "The Iranians believe that we are tied down in Iraq and they have the initiative," he said. "They are doing nothing constructive in Iraq" and "are acting in a very negative way in many respects."

Mr. Gates, who then flew to Afghanistan on a trip that will take him to the Gulf region and Iraq in coming days, wants to make sure that U.S. allies in the region "understand the consequences of sitting on the sidelines if they are concerned about Iran," said a senior defense official. The Sunni-dominated monarchies are increasingly concerned that Shia-dominated Iran will try to dominate the region by appealing to Shiites in such places as Bahrain, Lebanon and Saudi Arabia.

Ms. Rice's six-country swing has a similar purpose, but with an emphasis at the start on trying to revive the long-moribund Middle East peace effort. She hopes that by having Israeli and Palestinians leaders focus on the outlines of a future settlement in direct talks, the three parties might begin to overcome longstanding differences -- and at the same time marginalize the Iranian-backed militant group Hamas, which controls the Palestinian government.

The Bush administration is promising to step up actions against Iranian networks operating inside Iraq, and has bulked up its military presence in the Persian Gulf. It moved a second aircraft carrier into the Gulf and sent defensive Patriot antimissile batteries into the region to send a message that the U.S. remains committed to the region.

But U.S. officials say they also need help from America's Gulf allies to bring stability to the increasingly fragile Maliki government in Baghdad. U.S. officials say these Gulf allies can provide critical economic aid to get Iraq's shattered economy up and running. So far U.S. allies in the Persian Gulf have provided little real help to the fledgling Iraqi government over the past three years. The Gulf allies initially pledged billions of dollars of economic aid following the fall of Saddam Hussein in 2003, but have delivered on only a fraction of the promised money, said a senior defense official.

There is growing frustration among senior U.S. officials and Republican lawmakers that the Gulf nations, flush with oil profits, haven't done more to help Iraq. "Gulf states must not fiddle while Baghdad burns," Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) told Mr. Gates last week at a hearing of the Senate Armed Services Committee. "I'd like to see the Saudis, for example, fund a major jobs creation program in Iraq."

Ms. Rice will talk with senior Saudi officials before traveling on to Kuwait for a larger meeting of Gulf ministers, plus Egypt and Jordan.

Iranian Leaders Speak Out Against US (FT)

By Gareth Smyth, Fidelius Schmid And Andrew England

Financial Times, January 16, 2007

Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, the influential former Iranian president, on Monday accused the US of “seeking new adventurism” as Washington stepped up pressure on Tehran over its nuclear programme and Iraq.

Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, the supreme leader, also expressed concern that the US was fostering sectarianism. Meeting Sunni and Shia clerics he stressed that unity between Islam’s two sects was needed to prevent “these governments” – a reference to Sunni Arab regimes – “taking refuge” with the US and Britain.

Iranian warnings came as Ali Larijani, the country's top security official, held meetings in Riyadh, in an apparent attempt to gauge the level of Saudi support for Washington's tougher policy towards Tehran.

The trip came a day before Condoleezza Rice, the US secretary of state, is due in Saudi Arabia - the most powerful Sunni country - for talks on President George W. Bush's new Iraq plan.

The so-called “way forward” for Iraq includes a surge of 20,000 extra troops to pacify Baghdad and increased pressure on Iran, which Washington accuses of fomenting unrest in Iraq through its support for Shia armed groups.

Ms Rice’s regional tour seems partly designed to cement a regional front against Shia Iran at a time when Sunni Arab states are expressing rising alarm over Iranian influence in the region. Last month, Gulf Arab states ordered a study into a possible civilian nuclear programme, a move that was seen as a warning to western governments to deal with Iran’s programme or face a regional arms race.

In Cairo on Monday Ms Rice appeared to have won backing for the Iraq strategy from Ahmed Aboul Gheit, the Egyptian foreign minister, who said Egypt “hopes it is put into force in order to achieve stability in Iraq”. Referring to Iran, Mr Aboul Gheit said “regional forces should refrain from interfering within the Iraqi domestic front”.

Robert Gates, the new US secretary of defence, said on Monday that the US was increasing military activity in the Gulf in response to what he called Tehran's “very negative behaviour”.

“The Iranians clearly believe we are tied down in Iraq, that they have the initiative, that they’re in a position to press us in many ways,” he told reporters at Nato’s Brussels headquarters. The US is planning to send Patriot missile units to the Gulf, to guard against possible Iranian rocket attacks, as well as a second aircraft carrier and support ships. "The Iranians are acting in a very negative way in many respects," Mr Gates said. "They are doing nothing to be constructive in Iraq at this point."

DOJ_NMG_0116482

But he did not exclude the possibility of future negotiations with Tehran. "My view is that when the Iranians are prepared to play a constructive role in dealing with some of these problems, then there might be opportunities for engagement."

As part of its containment efforts, the US is tightening financial sanctions against Iran and asking its allies to go beyond the limited sanctions agreed in a UN resolution last month.

"We would encourage other countries – European countries, the EU, Japan – to consider stronger sanctions than were in the Security Council resolution," Nicholas Burns, US undersecretary of state, told [a news agency] at the weekend. "There are billions of euros of export credits available to European countries from their governments to encourage trade with Iran" that could be curtailed, he said.

Tehran, however, on Monday indicated it would not heed UN Security Council calls for a suspension by the end of February of its uranium enrichment programme, the most sensitive part of its nuclear experiments. Gholam-Hossein Elham, the Iranian government spokesman, claimed Iran would soon increase from 330 to 3,000 the number of centrifuges it uses to enrich uranium.

Tehran also rejected US claims that five nationals seized by US forces in northern Iraq last week were part of a Revolutionary Guard group providing weapons to Iraqi armed organisations.

Hoshyar Zebari, the Iraq foreign minister, cast doubt on the US assertions. He said the individuals arrested were members of a liaison bureau and had been working from an office in Irbil, northern Iraq, for 10 years, providing consular services.

Defense Secretary, In Afghan Capital, Scolds Iran (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, Jan. 15 — Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said Monday that Iran was "acting in a very negative way" in the Middle East and that the United States was building up its forces to demonstrate its resolve to remain in the Persian Gulf.

"The Iranians clearly believe that we are tied down in Iraq, that they have the initiative, that they're in a position to press us in many ways," Mr. Gates said, speaking to reporters at NATO headquarters in Brussels before flying here. "We are simply trying to communicate to the region that we are going to be there for a long time."

Delivering that message to Iran — and to allies in the region worried that Washington is consumed with stabilizing Iraq — is one of Mr. Gates's priorities on a trip to the region this week that will take him later to the Persian Gulf.

Senior Pentagon officials said they also planned to stress to the largely Sunni Arab governments worried about Iran that they must assist the United States in Iraq with reconstruction aid and with putting pressure on fellow Sunnis to reach political reconciliation.

President Bush announced last week, in his speech laying out his new Iraq strategy, that he was also sending a second aircraft carrier and several Patriot antimissile batteries to the Persian Gulf.

"The United States has had a strong presence in the Gulf for a long time," Mr. Gates said. "We are simply reaffirming that" with the buildup, he said.

In Afghanistan, which Mr. Gates is visiting for the first time as defense secretary, he is expected to meet with President Hamid Karzai and with American and NATO commanders. There are about 23,000 American troops in Afghanistan, 11,000 of them under NATO command. Other NATO countries are supplying 20,000 soldiers.

In a stop at NATO headquarters in Brussels before flying to Kabul, Mr. Gates said he had discussed the increase over the last year in Taliban attacks, especially in the south, with Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, NATO's secretary general. Mr. Gates said that there had been "indications that the Taliban were planning a large spring offensive," and that he and Mr. de Hoop Scheffer had talked about "how perhaps to avoid it."

Though Mr. Gates is largely concerned during his trip with explaining the White House plan to stabilize Iraq, he is also dealing with Iran, following a decision announced last week by President Bush.

As part of its review of Iraq strategy, concluded last week, the Bush administration rejected a proposal by the Iraq Study Group to resume diplomatic contacts with Iran.

Mr. Gates, who endorsed resuming diplomatic contacts with Iran in 2004, two years before he joined the Bush administration, said that Iran's behavior had worsened since then and that resuming diplomatic relations would be possible only when Iran was "prepared to play a constructive role in dealing with some of these problems."

DOJ_NMG_0116483

He said Iran “was doing nothing to be helpful” in Iraq, where the American military conducted two recent operations that resulted in the arrest of Iranians who the United States said were suspected of involvement in providing bomb-making materials. He also criticized Iran for aiding Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Bush administration officials have sought to rally international pressure on Iran to halt its nuclear program, which the White House has said is aimed at producing nuclear weapons, which Iran denies.

Gates Sees Iran As 'Negative' (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, January 16, 2007

BRUSSELS -- Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates yesterday said Iran is "doing nothing to be constructive" in Iraq, insisting it was up to Tehran to change its policies in Iraq and across the region before it can hope for better ties with the United States.

But Mr. Gates, meeting briefly with NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer here before making his first trip as Pentagon chief to Afghanistan, also said recent moves by President Bush to bulk up U.S. forces and military assets in the Persian Gulf should not be considered a prelude to possible action against Iran.

Part of the president's new strategy for Iraq outlined last week included the deployment of additional Patriot anti-missile systems to U.S. allies in the region.

The moves are meant to underscore the U.S. commitment to remain engaged throughout the Middle East, regardless of the state of progress in Iraq.

"I think what we are trying to communicate to all the countries of the Gulf area ... is that the stability of the Gulf is a long-term strategic interest of the United States," Mr. Gates said.

Iran, meanwhile, asked Saudi Arabia to help ease tensions between the Islamic republic and the United States in a letter delivered by Tehran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, to the Saudi king, [a] news agency reported yesterday.

The letter from Iranian Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei and President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad wanted Saudi leaders to relay a goodwill message to Washington -- to "help bring opinions together" between the two countries.

Mr. Gates co-authored a 2004 Council on Foreign Relations study advocating a possible rapprochement with Iran, based on Tehran's growing concerns after U.S. military successes in Afghanistan and Iraq. But the defense secretary, who took office just last month, said Iran's attitudes and actions have changed dramatically as the U.S.-led military campaign in Iraq has bogged down.

"Iran is doing nothing to be constructive in Iraq at this point," Mr. Gates said. "It is acting in a very negative way, in my opinion." Only when there is a change of policy in Tehran "will there be room for engagement" with the United States, he said. "The initiative needs to rest with the Iranians."

U.S. military officials say Iran has close ties to Shi'ite Iraqi militia and has supplied explosives and logistical support for attacks on Americans.

On a separate issue, Mr. Gates said senior British military officials had confirmed to him during a Sunday night visit that they planned to begin reducing Britain's 7,000-troop deployment in southern Iraq this year, even as the United States plans to increase its troop deployment by more than 21,000 to combat a spike in violence in Baghdad and Anbar province.

After the United States, Britain is the largest contributor to the multinational force in Iraq and has had primary security responsibility in the Shi'ite southern heartland since 2003.

Mr. Gates and Mr. de Hoop Scheffer said much of their talk centered on bolstering the NATO mission in Afghanistan, which has faced resurgent attacks from Islamist fundamentalist forces.

The defense secretary arrived in Afghanistan last night and is slated to meet President Hamid Karzai and senior U.S. and NATO military commanders today.

U.S. Beefs Up Force To Calm Gulf Fears (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 16, 2007

The Pentagon began building up its military presence in the Persian Gulf, including defensive Patriot missiles, after friendly Arab states privately expressed alarm over Iran's increasingly bellicose pronouncements.

Some in the administration began to fear that unless Washington reassured the Gulf states, it would lose their support at a critical juncture in the Iraq war. Without the support of Jordan, Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and other predominately Sunni Muslim countries, achieving reconciliation in Iraq would be much more difficult, defense sources said.

DOJ_NMG_0116484

"The threat Iran represents is growing. It's multidimensional. And it is, in fact, of concern to everybody in the region," Vice President Dick Cheney said Sunday on Fox News.

President Bush last week, in announcing a new strategy for Iraq, laid out what the administration considers a tough, two-pronged move against Tehran's radical regime. He said the U.S. would actively target Iranian saboteurs in Iraq. Hours later, American commandos raided an Iranian office in Irbil, north of Baghdad, and took five Iranians into custody.

The second prong involves sending two aircraft carriers to the region, plus the anti-missile Patriots, military training and new equipment. This move was aimed not just at sending a message to Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. More importantly, defense sources said, it was meant to calm jittery Gulf countries.

"This is all designed to deter Iran and assure our allies," one source said. "They are very worried about Iran and its nuclear program."

Mr. Ahmadinejad has threatened to destroy Israel, and his regime is widely perceived to be developing nuclear weapons.

But the sources insisted that the Gulf escalation is not a first step toward war with Iran. "That's nonsense," one source said. "No decision has been made about military programs."

A second source said that taking Iranian saboteurs captive in Iraq gives the U.S. "leverage" with Iran. Suddenly, the regime wants something from the U.S. -- the release of its people. But it is not a negotiating tool, the source said. Rather, it just shows the regime there is a cost for its meddling.

Some in the Pentagon think Iran is at war with the U.S., using Shi'ite militia proxies to attack American service members. Iran's al-Quds, a special-operations arm of the regime's Revolutionary Guards, is supplying the Iraqis with weapons, money and training, U.S. officials said.

Because war with Iran was not an option on the table, the sources said, the next best move was to begin capturing Iranians.

"I think the message that the president sent clearly is that we do not want them doing what they can to try to destabilize the situation inside Iraq," Mr. Cheney said. "We think it's very important that they keep their folks at home."

A defense source said the administration, after months of intelligence assessments, has concluded that Iran's intervention in Iraq was based on decisions made at the highest governmental levels in Tehran and not a rogue operation.

Gates: Time Is Not Right For Iran Talks (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, January 16, 2007

Stepped up U.S. military activity in the Persian Gulf is to counter "very negative" behavior by Iran and undercut its belief that American forces are overcommitted in Iraq, Defense Secretary Robert Gates said Monday.

Gates said the time is not right for diplomatic talks with Iran, but left open that possibility for the future.

After meeting with senior officials at NATO headquarters, Gates was asked at a press conference what was behind the Bush administration's decision to deploy a Patriot missile battalion and a second aircraft carrier to the Gulf region — moves announced in connection with a further buildup of ground troops in Iraq.

He noted that the United States has taken a leading role in Gulf security for many decades.

"We are simply reaffirming that statement of the importance of the Gulf region to the United States and our determination to be an ongoing strong presence in that area for a long time into the future," he said.

Gates, who as recently as 2004 publicly called for diplomatic engagement with Iran, said the situation has changed. In 2004 Iran was concerned by the presence of U.S. forces on its eastern and western borders, in Iraq and Afghanistan. More recently, the Iranian government has come to see it differently, he said.

"The Iranians clearly believe that we are tied down in Iraq, that they have the initiative, that they are in position to press us in many ways," he said. "They are doing nothing to be constructive in Iraq at this point."

He added, "And so the Iranians are acting in a very negative way in many respects. My view is that when the Iranians are prepared to play a constructive role in dealing with some of these problems then there might be opportunities for engagement."

Gates spent a few hours at NATO headquarters for his initial meetings with allied officials and American military officials. He arrived in the Belgian capital from London, where he met with British officials on Sunday.

Israel Buzzes Over Notion Of Attacking Iran (CSM)

By Ilene Prusher

The Christian Science Monitor, January 16, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0116485

from the January 16, 2007 edition - http://www.csmonitor.com/2007/0116/p01s02-wome.html Israel buzzes over notion of attacking Iran The country promises intensified diplomatic actions if Iran fails to comply with a UN resolution on its nuclear activities.

By Ilene Prusher | Staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor

JERUSALEM

When a US secretary of State comes to town, all eyes are on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

But as Condoleezza Rice's weekend visit here demonstrated, there is no issue dominating the agenda like the international standoff surrounding Iran's nuclear ambitions.

A report last week in one of Britain's leading newspapers, The Sunday Times, claimed that Israel was making preparations for a conventional attack on Iran to destroy its uranium enrichment facilities. Ms. Rice, asked in an Israeli television interview during her visit if the US would support such an Israeli strike, gave a reply that didn't exactly douse the smoldering signals emanating from Israel and Iran. Rather, the fact that some kind of a confrontation is now talked about openly, she said, is an indication of how grave the situation has become.

"I still think there is room for diplomacy, but even talk of such action shows how serious it would be for Iran to continue its actions unabated," Rice told Israel's Channel 10.

Israeli officials denied The Sunday Times report, but said Israel expects to see more intense diplomatic action against Iran if Iran does not comply with a UN resolution, passed in December, which gives the country two months to suspend its "proliferation of sensitive nuclear activities."

"Israel," says Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev, "is putting its entire support behind UN Security Council [Resolution] 1737. That gives the Iranians 60 days to act, and that's mid-February. If in February there's still more noncompliance, we'll need more robust diplomacy."

But Israel doesn't expect the issue to be solved by then, says Mr. Regev. "We think it's clear that other steps will be necessary," he adds. "It's important that the Iranian leadership be given a crystal-clear choice: either they cease their nuclear program, or they endanger their relationship with the rest of the world."

Rice's visit comes at a time in which nearly every think tank here is turning its spotlight on Iran, and asking rather publicly the questions that used to be asked only in the quiet of intelligence officials' chambers. Would Israel do a replay of its preemptive attack on Iraq's Osirak reactor a quarter-century ago, this time hitting Iran? Should it?

Talk of Israel's nukes no longer taboo

Israel has long treated its own nuclear program as a taboo topic. Last month, however, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said in an interview with German television that Iran aspires to "possess nuclear weapons like US, France, Israel, and Russia." Israeli officials depicted it as a kind of a slip, as it was a divergence from Israel's longstanding policy of nuclear ambivalence.

Today, however, Israel's nuclear program is considered an unofficial fact. The country's stated policy is that it will not be the first to introduce weapons into the region.

It was the same newspaper, The Sunday Times, which published a controversial story on Israel's program in 1986, leading to an 18-year-long incarceration of Israeli technician Mordechai Vanunu, the main source for the story. Other publications have explored the possibility of a strike against Iran, including an April 2006 New Yorker article which revealed that the US was studying the option of hitting Iran's nuclear facilities.

Eldad Pardo, an expert on Iran at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, says he sees reasons for a hint of optimism that diplomacy will work.

"In general, the world is worried and it should be worried," he says.

"If the world is united, and there is effective pressure, they might change course and [supporters of President Mahmoud Ahmedinejad] are going to lose," he says. "If not, I don't think there will be an Israeli attack, but there will be a violent clash, some major confrontation, down the road."

While the controversy over Iran's weapons program is international in scope, Israel finds itself on the front line of the issue: Mr. Ahmedinejad has called for Israel to be wiped out, and Israel blames Iran for keeping Islamic militant groups Hizbullah and Hamas in business. The more public part of Israel's reaction has been to lobby for tougher global sanctions against Iran. And several leading right-wing political figures here – including former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Dore Gold, the head of the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs – are now seeking legal proceedings in Europe against Ahmedinejad in attempt to get him charged with incitement to commit genocide.

But the option on the back burner remains the possibility of military action, in part out of concern that the progress of Iran's nuclear development will outpace diplomacy. In other words, if Iran's program isn't halted now, at what price will it be halted later, if at all?

DOJ_NMG_0116486

That, says Dr. Zvi Shtauber, the director of the Institute for National Strategic Studies at Tel Aviv University, is keeping many minds here focused on whether Israel will find itself at war with Iran.

Will diplomacy prevail?

"At the end of the day, that will be the question: to use military means or not," Dr. Shtauber told reporters in Tel Aviv at a recent press briefing addressing the institute's Middle East outlook.

"Anything can happen," he said, "because we are not in any avenue for discussions."

Ephraim Kam, the deputy director of the institute, expressed concern over whether sanctions, given their rocky record with changing policy elsewhere in the world, would really lure Iran to a more agreeable place on its nuclear program.

"For the time being, priority should be given to the political channels. But a few years from now, Israel might have to make a decision on whether to launch a strike on Iranian military sites," Dr. Kam says. "I think just talking to Iranians is not going to help. Prolonged sanctions could help, but Iran could decide to sustain the losses and continue."

In a development US officials hope will improve Washington's image in the region, Ms. Rice left town with an Israeli-Palestinian nod for the renewed US efforts to revive the peace process, effectively deadlocked since 2000. Before departing Tuesday for Egypt, Rice won an agreement to sponsor a summit between the Israeli and Palestinian leaders in three to four weeks. The US push for the three-way meeting, senior US officials indicated, would stick to the principles of the 2003 road map outlined by the Bush administration.

However, summoning support for pressure against Iran, both on the nuclear issue and on what the US sees as a troubling Iranian role in the Iraqi turmoil, is expected to be on Rice's front burner on her next stops: Kuwait City, Riyadh, London, and Berlin.

Iraqi Government Cultivates Iranian Ties (LAT)

By Louise Roug And Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 16, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq — The Iraqi government is moving to solidify relations with Iran, even as the United States turns up the rhetorical heat and bolsters its military forces to confront Tehran's influence in Iraq.

Iraq's foreign minister, responding to a U.S. raid on an Iranian office in Irbil in northern Iraq last week, said Monday that the government intended to transform similar Iranian agencies into consulates. The minister, Hoshyar Zebari, also said the government planned to negotiate more border entry points with Iran.

The U.S. military is still holding five Iranians detained in Thursday's raid. Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, said records seized in the raid and statements made by the detainees showed that at least some of them worked for Iran's intelligence service.

"I don't think there is any disagreement on the fact that these folks that we have captured are foreign intelligence agents in this country, working with Iraqis to destabilize Iraq and target coalition forces that are here at Iraq's request," Casey said Monday.

Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, added, "We are going after their networks in Iraq."

Iraqis, who have echoed Tehran's calls for the U.S. to release the five men, say the three-way standoff that has ensued reveals more about American meddling in Iraqi affairs than about Iranian influence.

"We, as Iraqis, have our own interest," Zebari said in an interview with The Times. "We are bound by geographic destiny to live with" Iran, adding that the Iraqi government wanted "to engage them constructively."

Zebari's comments reinforced the growing differences between the Iraqi government's approach and that of the Bush administration, which has rejected calls by the nonpartisan Iraq Study Group to open talks with Iran and Syria.

Administration officials accuse Iran of sowing anarchy and violence in the region.

Zebari's remarks came two days after Iraq and Iran announced a security agreement. "Terrorism threatens not only Iraq but all the regional countries," Iranian radio reported Sherwan Waili, Iraq's national security minister, as saying.

The overtures to Tehran also followed Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki's appointment last week of a security commander for Baghdad over the objections of U.S. officials, who favored another candidate.

American officials oppose the presence in Iraq of Iranian officials and members of the Revolutionary Guard, which is controlled by religious hard-liners in Iran. Washington and Tehran have been at odds for decades and are in a standoff over Iran's nuclear ambitions.

But to Iraq, Iran is its biggest trading partner and a source of tourist revenue, mainly from the thousands of Shiite Muslim pilgrims who travel to the holy cities of Najaf and Karbala every year.

In Iraq's semiautonomous Kurdish north, much of the economy is founded on trade with Iran and the smuggling of contraband into the Islamic Republic. Since the 1979 founding of Iran's theocracy, Kurdistan has been a transit point for banned alcohol, movies and satellite dishes.

DOJ_NMG_0116487

The U.S. raid on the Iranian office, which handled visas and other paperwork for Iraqis traveling to Iran, struck at the heart of Kurdistan's economy, which depends on commercial ties with Iran facilitated through that office.

Doing business with Iran also means doing business with the Revolutionary Guard, an institution that controls Iran's borders. Hassan Kazemi-Qomi, Iran's ambassador to Iraq, is a former member of the guard. Any neighboring country that wants to do business with Iran has to deal with members of the force, which was created by Grand Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini to aid the Islamic revolution.

Iraq's Kurds share a storied history with the Revolutionary Guard, fighting side by side against former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein in the 1980-88 Iran-Iraq war.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, once told The Times that he planned military operations against Hussein with Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Iran's controversial president.

Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador, acknowledged the past but said it was time for Iraqis to sever ties to such groups.

"Now Iraq is in a different place," he said. "There cannot be and there should not be relations with security institutions of neighboring states that work against the interests of this new Iraq."

Iraqis and Kurds who oppose the detention of the five Iranians say the U.S. raid made the Iraqi government appear weak or a puppet of the Americans.

"They should help the Iraqi government to demonstrate its independence [and] sovereignty in its dealing with other countries," said Zebari, the foreign minister, referring to U.S. officials. "Because of the simplest things, any country will question the basis of your sovereignty, and that weakens the position of the Iraqi government."

Iraqi officials want the U.S. to release the five Iranians. Zebari described them as "Iranian officials" working in a "liaison office" where Iraqis could go for "consular services like travel permits to Iran."

Kurdish regional authorities and the government in Baghdad knew about the Iranians in Irbil and were in the process of transforming the agency into a consulate, Zebari said.

"This is not a new discovery, this office," he said. The Iranians had been "working there publicly, openly. It was not a clandestine network. That's the thing we need to explain to our friends."

He said the Iraqi government had not been shown any of what Casey said was evidence that the Iranians were spies. He said Iraq had not been part of the interrogation.

While Iraq has been strengthening its ties with Iran, it has also made overtures to its western neighbor Syria. Talabani is on a state visit to Damascus, the first such high-level meeting in almost three decades.

"For some time, we've been working quietly with them to normalize relations, to start up security talks with them," Zebari said.

The Iraq Study Group recommended that the U.S. begin a dialogue with Iran and Syria. But administration officials, under the sway of neoconservative intellectuals who see Iran as a danger to Israel and the U.S., have resisted such calls, saying Tehran must give up its nuclear program and stop supporting militant groups in the Palestinian territories and Lebanon before there can be talks.

Last year, Abdelaziz Hakim, a leading Shiite politician in Iraq who spent years in exile in Iran, tried to improve U.S.-Iran relations by proposing that Iraq act as a go-between or a host for talks between the two nations. Iran rejected the plan when it became public, Zebari said.

Instead, relations have worsened, creating diplomatic headaches in Iraq.

"This is not a clean war," Zebari said. "These complications, embarrassments happen. Through these last three, four years we've been through this many times."

Is Iran Driving New Saudi Diplomacy? (CSM)

By Nicholas Blanford

The Christian Science Monitor, January 16, 2007

BEIRUT, LEBANON

Saudi Arabia is playing a more assertive diplomatic role in Lebanon, attempting to bridge rising tension between Lebanese Sunnis and Shiites while curbing Iran's influence in the tiny Mediterranean country, analysts say.

Wary of its own restless Shiite population, Riyadh is deeply concerned at what it sees as a determined drive by Shiite Iran to expand its influence into the mainly Sunni Middle East.

"The Saudis are fighting Iran in Lebanon now because if they don't, they will be fighting them in their own land," says Sarkis Naoum, a Lebanese political commentator.

The stepped-up diplomacy by the Saudis over the past six months led to an unprecedented meeting in Riyadh on Dec. 26 between Saudi King Abdullah and two senior officials of Lebanon's Iran-backed Hizbullah.

DOJ_NMG_0116488

Just six months ago an encounter between a Saudi monarch and the Shiite militants would have been almost unthinkable. When Hizbullah fighters kidnapped two Israeli soldiers in July, triggering a month-long war with Israel, the Saudis delivered an unusually frank statement, blaming Hizbullah and Iran for "uncalculated adventures."

Hizbullah's stubborn resistance against Israeli however, won it many admirers across the Arab world, making the Saudi leadership look out of step. But Hizbullah's regional popularity has dropped since it switched its attention from confronting Israel to seeking to bring down the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, which is backed by the US and Saudi Arabia.

Many Sunnis who cheered on Hizbullah last summer now regard it as an agent of "Persian" Iran.

"Hizbullah knows that when it comes to Israel and the US – the common enemies – there is common ground between Sunni Salafis and Shiites. But when it comes to domestic politics and political power in these countries, there's much more fear and wariness by Sunnis," says Amal Saad-Ghorayeb of the Carnegie Endowment's Middle East Center in Beirut.

Saudi Arabia traditionally adopts a nonconfrontational approach to regional diplomacy, using its massive oil wealth to buy stability and preserve the status quo. Some Lebanese say that the situation in Lebanon could have been resolved sooner if the Saudis had displayed a more aggressive diplomacy.

"They always thought they could stay away from danger by bribing people, giving money to leaders and states so long as they don't interfere in their own affairs," Mr. Naoum says. "Some of them are seeing now that this policy is not good for their country."

The Saudis stepped up their involvement in Lebanese affairs in August in angry reaction to Syrian President Bashar al-Assad who caustically described in a speech some Arab leaders as "half men" for secretly hoping that Israel would smash Hizbullah.

"The Saudis started playing a serious role in Lebanon after Assad's 'half-men speech,' " says Mohammed Mashnouq, a Lebanese political analyst and former adviser to Rafik Hariri, the former prime minister who was assassinated two years ago. Mr Hariri's son, Saad, heads the anti-Syrian parliamentary majority in Lebanon and enjoys close ties to the Saudi leadership.

"We were always asking for [Saudi] help [to confront Iran in Lebanon]," Mr. Mashnouq says. "Not just military and financial help, but religious help too."

Still, both the Saudis and Hizbullah have good reason to sit down together. Riyadh is worried that Iran could stir up the kingdom's own Shiite minority, long feared as potential fifth columnists by Saudi leaders. Saudi Shiites represent 10 to 15 percent of the population and live in the oil-rich Eastern Province, adjacent to Kuwait and Bahrain, which both have sizable Shiite populations. Talking to the Iran-backed Hizbullah could help ease tensions in Lebanon, while also representing a potential back-door channel to Tehran.

In another sign that Saudi is taking on a larger regional role, Abdullah met with Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani over the weekend. Mr. Larijani delivered a letter to the monarch in which the Islamic Republic asked for help in easing tension between it and the US over Tehran's nuclear program.

[A news agency] reported yesterday that a Saudi official said Iran would like Saudi Arabia to "help bring opinions together" between Iran and the US, the official said, but gave no more details.

For Hizbullah's part, it has domestic and regional motivations for engaging with the Saudis. The Hizbullah-led opposition had gambled on the shock tactics of mass rallies and a sit-in in central Beirut in December bringing the government swiftly to its knees. But the government dug in its heels, creating a stalemate that has lasted six weeks.

The opposition has pledged further demonstrations around the country, but the campaign appears to be running out of steam, analysts say, with Hizbullah perhaps more willing to find an acceptable compromise.

Lebanon's As Safir newspaper reported Monday that Saudi Arabia is working on a new initiative to break the six-week impasse between the Siniora government and the Lebanese opposition. The new proposal, which the Saudi ambassador relayed to Hizbullah officials over the weekend, "set clear solutions to the current crisis," As Safir reported.

Crucially, the political deadlock has worsened Shiite-Sunni tensions in Lebanon. Hizbullah has long spoken out against intra-Muslim discord, believing that it distracts from the more important goal of confronting Israel.

"Hizbullah was playing two roles in meeting the Saudis," says Mr. Saad-Ghorayeb of the Carnegie Endowment. "It was serving a domestic agenda, but also having a positive impact on the wider strategic relations between Iran and Saudi Arabia."

Iraqi Hangings Bring More Denunciations (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Muhanned Saif Aldin

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 15 -- By the time the corpses of Saddam Hussein's half brother and another top official, hanged before dawn Monday, arrived in the village of Auja for burial, the word had spread among the mourners: The head of Hussein's brother had been severed from his body.

DOJ_NMG_0116489

Many of the people who had gathered considered the decapitation of Barzan Ibrahim to be a calculated insult, another act by the Shiite-dominated government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to humiliate followers of the executed former president and all his fellow Sunni Arabs. A doctor inspected the remains to assess the government's explanation that the noose inadvertently took off the head after Ibrahim dropped through the trapdoor of the scaffold.

"We knew that he would be executed and would join a parade of heroes, but Maliki, why did you behead him?" asked Salam al-Tikriti, 41, a relative of Ibrahim. "Why did you insult his body? Are you still afraid of him even after he is dead? We will cut your heads the same way that you are cutting the heads of the heroes of Iraq."

In many parts of Iraq, the executions set off new waves of anger and celebration along sectarian lines, though Maliki's government had gone to great pains to prevent the type of chaotic spectacle that accompanied Hussein's hanging two weeks ago, when Shiite witnesses in the execution chamber taunted Hussein.

Shiites celebrated the new executions, while Sunni politicians vented. Alaa Makki, a Sunni legislator, said that justice was done but the manner of the execution was disturbing. "Everybody knows that when you hang people, rarely the head will be decapitated from the body," he said, criticizing what he called a "revenge on the body."

"It denotes that people are very reactive and very extremist and they want revenge," he said.

Hussein al-Falluji, another Sunni legislator, called the executions "illegitimate and illegal."

The hangings drew criticism from abroad as well. The Moroccan Human Rights Association said they were a "criminal political assassination masterminded by American imperialism."

A U.N. spokesman expressed regret that Secretary General Ban Ki Moon's request to spare the two men's lives was not granted. Jos? Manuel Barroso, president of the European Commission, the European Union's executive arm, said after the hangings that he would back an Italian initiative for a worldwide moratorium on capital punishment under U.N. auspices.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, visiting Egypt, said she believed the hangings of Hussein and the two others were mishandled and should have been carried out with "greater dignity."

Ibrahim, who ran Hussein's intelligence service, or Mukhabarat, and Awad Haman Bander, leader of Hussein's Revolutionary Court, were put to death at 3 a.m. Monday, government spokesman Ali Dabbagh said. They had been sentenced to death for their role in the killings of 148 men and boys from the Shiite village of Dujail following an assassination attempt against Hussein in 1982.

Iraqi officials denied that the decapitation was intentional, saying that Ibrahim's neck had been unable to absorb the noose's force. Dabbagh described it as a "rare incident" in a hanging and said that the proceeding was marked by professionalism and restraint not shown during Hussein's execution.

For Monday's hangings, the Iraqi government restricted the witnesses to a judge, a prosecutor, a doctor, a prison warden and representatives of the Interior Ministry and the prime minister's office, Dabbagh said. They made the attendees sign documents pledging they would not misbehave, Dabbagh added.

"Everyone obeyed the instructions of the government; no violation, chant, slogans or words that would harm the execution of this verdict was registered," he said.

Iraqi officials showed silent video clips of the hangings to reporters at a news conference but did not release the footage to the public.

According to an Associated Press account of the video, the two defendants appeared side by side at the gallows wearing red prison jumpsuits. They were surrounded by five masked men, and black hoods were placed over their heads. After the trapdoors beneath them opened, Bander dangled from the rope, but the shock of the rope going taut severed Ibrahim's head from his body, both of which fell to the floor, the news service reported.

By 6 p.m., the bodies had arrived in Auja, about 100 miles north of Baghdad, and were greeted by more than 1,000 people. The crowd carried the corpses, wrapped in Iraqi flags, on their shoulders into a hall as chants rang out of "Allahu akbar" -- "God is great" -- and guns were fired into the air.

The bodies were washed and wrapped in white shrouds before being buried in a garden plot next to the hall that houses Hussein's grave. The crowd surrounded the bodies, and the sound of crying mixed with chanted praises to God.

"We are so proud that [Bander] died as a martyr defending his beliefs," said Abdulla al-Sadoon, 55, a relative of Bander from Basra. "It is a proud thing to die like this."

Top officials from Salahuddin province attended the burials, and the funerals for Bander and Ibrahim were expected to last three days.

The hangings occurred on a day when two top outgoing U.S. officials in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr. and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, told reporters that they were optimistic about the new plan to secure Baghdad, saying they sensed a deeper commitment by the Iraqi government to combat Sunni and Shiite extremists who are fighting in the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0116490

The Shiite-led Iraqi security forces have been widely accused of operating death squads that target Sunnis while allowing Shiite militias in the capital free rein. But Casey added that he did not expect to see significant improvement in Baghdad's security until the summer or fall.

"There is a strong political commitment from the government of Iraq to the plan, including the will to act, and including the will not to impose constraints on coalition and Iraqi security forces," Casey said, adding: "As with any plan, there are no guarantees of success, and it's not going to happen overnight. But with sustained political support and concentrated efforts on all sides, I believe that this plan can work."

President Bush has committed to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq in order to maintain a more visible presence in Baghdad's embattled neighborhoods and provide more support for Iraqi troops. The first of the reinforcements have arrived, Casey said.

"Yes, there are still difficulties with the Iraqi security forces; that has been a challenge," he said. "The increased deployment of coalition forces will enable us to increase the level of support we are providing to those forces, to strengthen them a little bit as we go forward with this plan."

Also on Monday, the U.S. military announced that a U.S. soldier from the 89th Military Police Brigade died Sunday when a roadside bomb exploded near his vehicle north of Baghdad. The soldier's name was not released.

Second Hanging Also Went Awry, Iraq Tape Shows (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 15 — Iraq's turbulent effort to reckon with the violence of its past took another macabre turn on Monday when the execution of Saddam Hussein's half brother ended with the hangman's noose decapitating him after he dropped through the gallows trapdoor.

An official video played to a small group of Iraqi and Western reporters more than 13 hours after the hanging showed Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti, former head of Mr. Hussein's secret police, standing nervously on the trapdoor in a flame-orange jumpsuit of the kind used at the American detention center at Guantánamo Bay in Cuba, his head and mustache shaved. Beside him, praying feverishly in identical garb, stood the other condemned man, Awad Hamad al-Bandar, the former chief judge of Mr. Hussein's revolutionary court.

After executioners in full-face balaclavas pulled black hoods over the two men's heads, tightened nooses around their necks and pulled the lever opening the trapdoors, both fell like weights. But the hangmen's calculations of weight, gravity and the momentum needed to snap their necks — a grim science that has produced detailed "drop charts" used for decades in hangings around the world — appeared, in Mr. Ibrahim's case, to have gone seriously awry.

Iraqi officials said their execution procedures had been exhaustively reviewed after the Hussein execution on Dec. 30, which culminated with the former dictator facing a volley of verbal abuse from members of the execution party as he waited with the noose around his neck. The officials said that their goal was to prevent a recurrence of those scenes, which were sectarian in nature and set off a storm of protest around the world, and that they had consulted with Western "humanitarian organizations" to get the procedures right.

Under pressure from American officials, the hanging of Mr. Ibrahim and Mr. Bandar, who were sentenced in November for their roles in the torture and execution of scores of Shiites in the town of Dujail after an alleged assassination attempt against Mr. Hussein in 1982, had been delayed for more than two weeks while the Maliki government drew up new guidelines for executions.

American and Iraqi officials said the aim was to prevent a recurrence of the scenes that turned Mr. Hussein, a mass murderer in the eyes of many Iraqis, into something of a sympathetic figure at his death and, across the Arab world, into an icon of dignity and courage.

Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki had assured the Americans that instead of having 25 witnesses, as at the Hussein hanging, only about half as many would attend. Moreover, he pledged to exclude any known loyalists of the Shiite militia leader Moktada al-Sadr, a polarizing figure whose name was invoked by guards to antagonize Mr. Hussein.

With those assurances, the Americans agreed to release the two men, and flew them by helicopter from the American detention center at Camp Cropper to the same execution spot used for Mr. Hussein, at the former headquarters of the Istikhbarat, the deposed government's military intelligence agency.

But events at the gallows in the predawn hours of Monday had something of the same surreal and freakish quality that enveloped the Hussein hanging.

Iraqi officials who attended the hanging said the calculation in the case of Mr. Ibrahim, a 55-year-old of medium height and build, had allowed for a "drop" of eight feet — too much, according to at least one United States Army manual — and about that amount of thick yellow rope could be seen coiled at Mr. Ibrahim's feet before the hanging.

DOJ_NMG_0116491

The video showed his head being snapped off as the rope went taut, and ending up, still inside the hood, lying in the pit of the gallows about five feet from his headless body.

Mr. Bandar could be seen dangling from the rope above Mr. Ibrahim, whose body was lying on its chest on the floor of the dark, dank pit, blood pooling beside his severed neck. The silent, three-minute video then ended abruptly, with officials saying they would run it only once, and not show it in public again.

To ensure no illicit copies of the video were made with cellphone cameras, as happened at the execution of Mr. Hussein, reporters attending the showing had their cellphones taken away by hawk-eyed Iraqi security men.

Ali al-Dabbagh, spokesman for Mr. Maliki who supervised the details of Mr. Hussein's execution, said officials wanted to ensure that Mr. Ibrahim and Mr. Bandar died instantly, and were not left dangling at the end of the hanging rope for 15 to 20 minutes before they were asphyxiated, which he said had been a deliberate tactic used in thousands of hangings under Mr. Hussein. That seemed to suggest that the executioners had deliberately allowed for a long "drop" for the two men hanged Monday, to be sure their necks were broken cleanly by their fall.

The Iraqis described the decapitation of Mr. Ibrahim as a "rare incident," but they acknowledged that a similar thing had happened at least once before in the score or more of hangings that have been carried out since the fall of Mr. Hussein. They cited the case of an Egyptian man hanged in the northern city of Mosul for offenses linked to the insurgency, who had also had his head separated as he fell. In Mr. Hussein's case, an illicit video taken after the hanging showed a bloody, egg-sized gouge in his neck, below his left ear, where the noose had cut into him as he dropped.

An Internet search for manuals on hanging suggested that Mr. Ibrahim was the victim of an overestimate by his executioners. One of the most authoritative manuals, the United States Army's "Procedure for Military Executions," issued under the authority of Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower when he was Army chief of staff in 1947, gave a chart that recommended that a man of about Mr. Ibrahim's weight, about 185 pounds, would need a "drop" of five feet seven inches — nearly two and a half feet less than the drop for Mr. Ibrahim — to assure what the manual called "a proper execution."

The manual added: "A medical officer should be consulted to determine whether any factors, such as age, health or muscular condition, will affect the amount of drop necessary for a proper execution."

At his trial, Mr. Ibrahim, though second only to Mr. Hussein in his angry declamations against his Iraqi and American captors, mentioned his need for medication on a number of occasions, and complained bitterly about the "disgusting" American cigarettes he said he was given in lots of 10 a day.

Mr. Ibrahim's decapitation appeared to have badly unnerved the Maliki government. The Iraqis involved were so shaken that they waited more than seven hours after the 3 a.m. executions to formally announce them, and then read a statement that dwelled on the two men's "big crimes against humanity" while serving as acolytes to Mr. Hussein. The statement made only a passing reference to the severing of Mr. Ibrahim's head.

"In a rare incident, the head of the convict Barzan Ibrahim al-Hassan" — his name as it appeared on court documents — "was separated from his body during the execution," it said.

Further details were left to a news conference called six hours later, when rumors were circulating among Sunni Arab loyalists of the former government, and on Arabic-language television channels broadcasting across the Middle East, that Mr. Ibrahim had been deliberately decapitated in an act of revenge by the Maliki government and as an insult to the Sunni Muslim world.

The depth of suspicion, and the readiness among Sunni Arabs to blame the United States for everything grim in Iraq, was reflected in interviews conducted in neighboring countries after the hangings. "The U.S. is 100 percent guilty," said Turki al-Rasheed, who heads an organization promoting democracy in Saudi Arabia. "It means they cut Barzan's head in the execution chamber."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in Egypt on a Middle East tour, joined the recriminations. "I would be the first to say that we were disappointed that there was not greater dignity given to the accused under these circumstances," she said, referring to Mr. Hussein's execution and the two carried out Monday. "I think that passions run high after years of turmoil, under dictatorship, and that is apparently what happened. But it shouldn't have happened and I think that it did not reflect well on the Iraqi government that it came out that way."

When officials from Mr. Maliki's office appeared at the Baghdad Convention Center with the video of the hangings, they were at pains to offer a minutely detailed account of their procedures. Their accounts were about equally apologetic and assertive as they explained how Mr. Ibrahim had come to have his head severed, and how sympathy for the condemned man and his family should be attenuated in the light of the brutalities he had committed when serving his half brother.

Perhaps significantly, the video was soundless, making it impossible to confirm the officials' assertions that the two condemned men had been spared the verbal abuse that was directed at Mr. Hussein.

DOJ_NMG_0116492

Mr. Dabbagh, the official spokesman, said all attending the Monday executions — all Iraqis, as was the case with Mr. Hussein — had been required to sign documents saying they would behave with dignity and restraint. He held up a signed copy of one of the affidavits as another of Mr. Maliki's aides, Basam Ridha, summarized what he said was the air of restraint at the executions. Mr. Ridha is an Iraqi-American who lived for years in California before returning to Baghdad to a position on Mr. Maliki's staff that made him the point man for the hangings.

"The whole process was very transparent," Mr. Ridha said, comparing the hangings favorably with what happened to Mr. Hussein. "No ethnics, no chanting, everything a very smooth transaction, everyone very well behaved."

Others in the execution party seemed somewhat more taken aback. "When the trapdoor opened, I realized that I was looking at the rope swinging freely, and I asked myself, 'Where did Barzan go?' " said Jaafar al-Moussawi, who was chief prosecutor at the trial that ended with the death sentences for Mr. Hussein, Mr. Ibrahim and Mr. Bandar. He added: "I thought that somehow he had gotten loose. So I moved forward toward the pit and looked down, and saw the convict Barzan lying on the ground without his head."

After Mr. Hussein's hanging, his body was kept on the back of a police pickup truck in the parking lot of Mr. Maliki's office in Baghdad's Green Zone for 18 hours, while an argument raged over whether to hand it over to members of his Albu-Nasir tribe for burial. That dispute was resolved by the Americans, who insisted that the Iraqi leader hand over the body.

After Monday's hangings, the bodies of Mr. Ibrahim and Mr. Bandar were handed over more swiftly, and like Mr. Hussein's, flown by American military helicopter for burial at Mr. Hussein's — and Mr. Ibrahim's — home village of Awja, near the Tigris River city of Tikrit.

Officials in the office of the local governor said that Mr. Bandar's son, Bandar al-Bandar, a defense lawyer at his trial, had accompanied the bodies on the flight from Baghdad, and that Mr. Ibrahim's body had been delivered. Abdullah Jabara, the deputy governor, said that roads between Awja and the American airbase at Camp Speicher, outside Tikrit, had been sealed off by the police, and that the bodies would be buried under cover of darkness on Monday night, with a special grave for Mr. Bandar next to Mr. Hussein in a marbled reception hall at Awja. He made no mention of a grave for Mr. Ibrahim, who had a stormy relationship with Mr. Hussein.

Mr. Bandar's fealty to his old boss, Mr. Hussein, was reflected in his decision, said by Iraqi officials to have been written in his will, to be buried at Tikrit, in Iraq's Sunni heartland, and not in Basra, the predominantly Shiite southern city where Mr. Bandar, a Sunni Arab, was born. After the hangings were announced, Basra residents drove through the city honking car horns and waving Iraqi flags.

"Some people noted that Barzan's head was separated from his body during the execution, and said that this was God's punishment for his crimes," an Iraqi staff member reported from Basra. "They said this punishment was an expression of what a bad man he was during his life."

Sunni Anger Over Bungling Of Execution (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, January 16, 2007

Iraq executed Saddam Hussein's co-defendants on Monday, eliciting fresh controversy after it was revealed that one of the executions was bungled.

Barzan al-Tikriti, Saddam's half brother, and Awadh al-Bandar, a revolutionary court judge, were hanged before dawn.

The pair were convicted alongside the deposed Iraqi leader on November 5 on charges related to a campaign of reprisals against a Shia village where Saddam suffered a 1982 assassination attempt. Scores of villagers were executed and many more subjected to torture and lengthy imprisonment.

The official video of the executions has not been released, but was screened for reporters. It reportedly shows Mr Bandar's body dangling from a rope, and Mr Tikriti's lying on the floor with his severed head a short distance away.

Iraqi government officials claimed there were no "violations" of procedure in Monday's executions, but admitted that Mr Tikriti's head was ripped from his body as he was hanged.

Such incidents can reportedly occur when a hangman misjudges the length of rope required, but Iraqi Sunnis have already accused the government of deliberately mutilating Mr Tikriti's body, considered to be a serious offence in Iraq and many other Muslim societies.

In an example of the potential sectarian backlash, Mr Tikriti's son-in-law said in an interview on pan-Arab al-Jazeera television that "ripping off his head [was] the grudge of the Safavids". He was referring to an Iranian dynasty that some Sunni use as a general insult for Shia, because it emphasises their Iran ties.

Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, issued a muted criticism of the execution. "I would be the first to say that we were disappointed that there was not greater dignity given to the accused under these circumstances.

DOJ_NMG_0116493

"I think that passions run high after years of turmoil, under dictatorship, and that is apparently what happened. But it shouldn't have happened and I think that it did not reflect well on the Iraqi government that it came out that way."

The United Nations had urged Iraq last week to delay the executions. Monday's events came after widespread criticism of violations of due process in the execution of Saddam two weeks ago, and are likely to strain Iraq's relations with its neighbours and with its own Sunni Arab population.

The execution of the former president sparked accusations that the Iraqi government had ignored elements of due process in order to rush him to the gallows. Those criticisms were compounded by mobile phone footage showing executioners taunting Saddam.

Iraq's government may have calculated that it was not worth its while to placate Sunni sensibilities. Many Shia are convinced that Saddam's former ruling Ba'ath party was engineering a return to power. That fear was partially dispelled by executing the Baath's former leaders.

However, Iraq was hoping to win debt relief from Saudi Arabia and other Gulf states as part of the UN-sponsored Compact with Iraq initiative. That initiative, which was supposed to have been signed by the end of 2006, may be delayed by the -executions.

Additional reporting by Andrew England in Cairo

Anger Greets Bodies Of Executed In Tikrit (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 16, 2007

BAGHDAD — Angry crowds in the Sunni Arab town of Tikrit fired weapons into the air as they received the bodies of Barzan Ibrahim Hasan and Awad Hamed Bandar, two associates of Saddam Hussein who were hanged at the gallows this morning for their roles in killing scores of Shiite Muslim villagers in the 1980s.

Hasan, Hussein's half brother and a fellow native of Tikrit, oversaw Iraq's feared intelligence service. Bandar was the chief judge of the Revolutionary Court that sentenced 148 villagers to death.

Hasan's head came off during the hanging in what Iraqi officials described as a freak accident. "It is really rare," said Omer Abdul Sattar, a physician and Sunni member of Iraq's parliament. "I am a doctor and I would not believe such a thing could happen unless the rope is too short or the defendant weighs 400 or 500 pounds."

Despite angry chanting by some of the two defendants' fellow tribesmen, the hangings spurred little of the outrage that followed Hussein's Dec. 30 execution.

In the capital, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr. briefed reporters on the launch of a new plan aimed at stemming sectarian violence in Baghdad. The effort involves additional training for Iraqi security forces, a more robust U.S. troop presence and a revamped command and control structure.

"The plan is based on a key assumption," Khalilzad said. "Increased security for Baghdad is key for allowing political process and securing the rest of the country. The Iraqi government's commitments are all who break the law will be targeted. There will be no sanctuary for criminals or murderers."

Khalilzad and Casey also said the plan is part of a broader strategy to confront what the U.S. sees as interference by Iran and Syria in Iraq and target alleged ringleaders of foreign operations who are supplying armed groups with weapons and training.

Both U.S. officials, slated to leave Baghdad in the coming months, oversaw failed efforts last year to secure Baghdad. But Khalilzad and Casey said the new plan would be different because of the support of Iraqi political figures in the capital.

"There's a strong political commitment from the government to the plan, including the will to act, and including the will not to impose constraints on coalition and Iraqi security forces," Casey said.

Iraq's sectarian civil war pits Sunni insurgents with ties to the country's western tribes against Shiite militiamen with ties to Iran, as well as to Iraq's dominant Shiite political parties and security organs.

Khalilzad declined to comment on the possibility that the Shiite-dominated government will target Sunni neighborhoods and civilians, which has long been a complaint of the Sunni population.

"That's not the premise of the plan," he said. "That's not the reciprocal understanding based on which this plan is being supported."

Outside Baghdad's high-security Green Zone, Iraq's violence continued apace. Three homemade bombs targeting Iraqi security forces killed at least six and injured eight in the capital today. A suicide bomber struck an Iraqi army checkpoint in western Baghdad, killing four soldiers and injuring three.

Two car bomb explosions in downtown Kirkuk killed at least 12 civilians and injured 14, police said. A Katyusha rocket also struck a house in the city, killing one.

DOJ_NMG_0116494

Assassins killed an Iraqi contractor supplying food to a U.S. base near the southern city of Kut, where authorities discovered the bodies of three Iraqi soldiers killed with bullets to the head and chest.

A Basra intelligence officer was injured and his two guards were killed during an ambush in the southern Iraqi city home to rival Shiite militias and political parties. British forces killed a man during a raid in the city, the military said.

Sunnis Blast Hanging Of 2 Saddam Aides (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP, January 16, 2007

The Iraqi government's attempt Monday to close a chapter on Saddam Hussein's repressive regime — by hanging two of his henchmen — only appeared to anger many of Saddam's fellow Sunni Muslims after the former leader's half brother was decapitated on the gallows.

A thickset Barzan Ibrahim plunged through the trap door and was beheaded by the jerk of the thick beige rope at the end of his fall, in the same the execution chamber where Saddam was hanged a little over two weeks earlier.

A government video of the hanging, played at a briefing for reporters, showed Ibrahim's body passing the camera in a blur. The body came to rest on its chest while the severed head lay a few yards away, still wearing the black hood pulled on moments before by one of Ibrahim's five masked executioners.

The decapitation appeared inadvertent, and Iraqi officials seemed anxious to prove they hadn't mutilated Ibrahim's remains.

The hangings came as a suicide car bomber slammed into an Iraqi army patrol in the northern city of Mosul Monday, killing seven people and wounding 40 others, police said. A total of at least 55 people were killed or found dead across Iraq, authorities said.

The U.S. military, meanwhile, announced the deaths of two more soldiers, both killed in Baghdad.

While Ibrahim's body was wrenched apart by the execution, his co-defendant, Awad Hamed al-Bandar, head of Saddam's Revolutionary court, died as expected — swinging at the end of a rope. Both men met death at 3 a.m. wearing reddish orange prison jumpsuits.

Prosecutor Jaafar al-Moussawi, who witnessed the hangings, said Ibrahim looked tense and protested his innocence as he was brought into the chamber. The condemned man had once ran Saddam's feared security agency, the Mukhabarat.

"I did not do anything," al-Moussawi quoted Ibrahim as saying. "It was all the work of Fadel al-Barrak." Al-Barrak ran two intelligence departments in Saddam's feared Mukhabarat.

Saddam was hanged amid shouted taunts and insults from Shiite witnesses — a scene Iraqi officials said was not repeated Monday.

All three executions took place in Saddam-era military intelligence headquarters, located in the north Baghdad neighborhood of Kazimiyah, a Shiite area.

By day's end at least 3,000 angry Sunnis, many firing guns in the air, others weeping or cursing the government, assembled for the burials of Ibrahim and al-Bandar in Saddam's hometown of Ouja, near Tikrit, 80 miles north of Baghdad.

"Where are those who cry out in demands for human rights?" Marwan Mohammed, one of the mourners, asked in grief and frustration. "Where are the U.N. and the world's human rights organizations? Barzan had cancer. They treated him only to keep him alive long enough to kill him. We vow to take revenge, even if it takes years."

Ibrahim's son-in-law, Azzam Saleh Abdullah, said "we heard the news from the media. We were supposed to be informed a day earlier, but it seems that this government does not know the rules."

The execution, he said, reflected what he called the Shiite-led government hatred for Sunnis. "They still want more Iraqi bloodshed," he said. "To hell with this democracy."

The executed men, at their request, were buried in a garden outside a building Saddam had built for religious events. Saddam was buried there on New Year's eve in a grave chipped out of an interior floor.

Ouja, just outside Tikrit — about a 90-minute drive north of Baghdad on the Tigris River — is near the scene of Saddam's capture by American soldiers in December 2003.

Saddam was discovered hiding in a small underground bunker nine months after he fled the U.S.-led invasion that toppled his regime.

Saddam, Ibrahim and al-Bandar were all handed the death sentence after their conviction for crimes against humanity, in connection with the killings of 148 Shiites in Dujail, north of Baghdad, in 1982 — following a failed assassination attempt there against Saddam.

Saddam was executed last month, four days after an Iraqi appeals court upheld the verdicts in the Dujail case. Reportedly, the court was under pressure from Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who wanted Saddam hanged before the end of 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0116495

Iraqi Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi said Monday he should have been consulted before the executions were staged, because he and the two other members of Iraq's presidential council — President Jalal Talabani and Vice President Adil Abdul-Mahdi — had asked for the hangings to be delayed.

The execution video was shown to reporters Monday in an apparent attempt to prove that Ibrahim's corpse was not intentionally mutilated after death.

Video of Saddam's execution was broadcast worldwide. But Ali al-Dabbagh, the government spokesman, said there would be no similar public distribution of the video of Monday's hangings.

"We will not release the video, but we want to show the truth," he said. "The Iraqi government acted in a neutral way."

Monday's video was shown to reporters without sound — as was the official video of Saddam's execution in December. But al-Dabbagh said no taunts greeted Saddam's co-defendants.

"No one shouted slogans or said anything that would taint the execution," he said. "None of those charged were insulted."

The official video of Saddam's hanging was quickly pushed aside by a second one taken with a cell phone camera by a witnesses and leaked to the media. It showed the gallows floor opening, Saddam falling and swinging dead at the end of the rope.

Some of those in attendance could be heard taunting the former Sunni strongman with shouts of "Muqtada, Muqtada," an apparent reference to Muqtada al-Sadr, a radical Shiite cleric.

Al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia is believed responsible for the deaths of thousands of Sunnis in the past year.

The unruly scene at Saddam's hanging drew worldwide protest and calls for Ibrahim and al-Bandar to be spared.

On Monday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Saddam's execution was mishandled and said she hoped that those who made cell phone videos of Saddam's execution would be punished.

"We were disappointed there was not greater dignity given to the accused under these circumstances," Rice said during a news conference with her Egyptian counterpart in Luxor, Egypt.

A spokeswoman for U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon said Monday he "regrets that despite pleas from both himself and the high commissioner for human rights to spare the lives of the two defendants, they were both executed."

After Saddam's execution, Human Rights Watch released a report calling the speedy trial and subsequent hanging of Saddam proof of the new Iraqi government's disregard for human rights.

Saddam Kin Beheaded By Hanging (WT/AP)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra

The Washington Times, January 16, 2007

BAGHDAD -- The head of Saddam Hussein's half brother Barzan Ibrahim was ripped from his body when he and another top aide to the former Iraqi dictator were hanged before dawn yesterday, a government official said.

The accidental beheading prompted expressions of outrage and disgust just 16 days after Saddam was executed in an unruly scene that has drawn worldwide criticism.

Government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh stressed that all laws and rules were respected during yesterday's hanging of Ibrahim, the former intelligence chief, and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, head of Iraq's Revolutionary Court.

"Those present signed documents pledging not to violate the rules or otherwise face legal penalties. All the people present abided by the government's rule, and there were no violations," he said. "No one shouted slogans or said anything that would taint the execution. None of those charged were insulted."

An official government video of the side-by-side hanging that was shown to a small group of reporters showed Ibrahim and al-Bandar wearing red prison jumpsuits. As they reached the gallows, black hoods were put on their heads and five masked men surrounded them.

The silent video showed the trap doors opening. Al-Bandar could be seen dangling from the rope, while Ibrahim's body in a blur fell to the floor, chest down, his still-hooded severed head resting several yards away.

The government played the video for the reporters apparently to allay any suspicions that Ibrahim's body was mutilated after death.

"We will not release the video, but we want to show the truth," Mr. al-Dabbagh said. "The Iraqi government acted in a neutral way."

Many Shi'ites celebrated the hangings but Sunnis denounced them as a partisan act of revenge and European governments expressed disgust at the beheading, the result of miscalculating the proper length of rope for a man of Ibrahim's weight.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said at a press conference in Egypt that the executions had been mishandled, as was that of Saddam.

DOJ_NMG_0116496

"We were disappointed there was not greater dignity given to the accused under these circumstances," she said.

The execution was conducted on the same gallows where Saddam was hanged Dec. 30 in a building located in the Shi'ite neighborhood of Kazimiyah.

Prosecutor Jaafar al-Moussawi said Ibrahim looked tense when he was brought into the room and said, "I did not do anything. It was all the work of Fadel al-Barrak." Ibrahim was referring to a former head of two intelligence departments.

The government came under widespread condemnation because of Saddam's chaotic execution, in which video of the hanging, recorded on a cell-phone camera, showed him being taunted on the gallows.

Ibrahim and al-Bandar had been found guilty along with Saddam in the killing of 148 Shi'ite Muslims after a 1982 assassination attempt on the former leader in the town of Dujail, north of Baghdad.

The bodies were taken after the 3 a.m. hanging to Saddam's hometown of Ouja, near Tikrit, 80 miles north of Baghdad, for burial, and residents fired their weapons into the air intensively, according to Iraqi tradition.

Mr. al-Dabbagh said the gallows were built to international standards and in accordance with human rights organizations.

But Param-Preet Singh, counsel for the international justice program at Human Rights Watch, said she was not aware of any internationally recognized standards for hanging.

"Under no circumstances can an execution be in accordance with human rights standards," she said. "There's a move away from executions in general ... which shows there are no international standards."

Town Honors Executed Former Hussein Aides (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 16, 2007

BAGHDAD — Angry crowds in the Iraqi town of Tikrit fired weapons in the air and chanted "God is great!" on Monday as they received the flag-draped bodies of two former aides to Saddam Hussein who were hanged early in the day.

Barzan Ibrahim Hasan and Awad Hamed Bandar were executed for their roles in killing scores of Shiite Muslim villagers in the 1980s. The hanging ripped off the head of Hasan, Hussein's half brother and a fellow native of Tikrit.

Hasan had served as chief of Iraq's feared intelligence service, while Bandar was in charge of the Revolutionary Court that sentenced 148 villagers to death after a 1982 assassination attempt against Hussein.

The former Iraqi president was taunted by some of those present at his execution Dec. 30, a scene captured on an unauthorized cellphone camera and distributed. The images heightened sectarian tensions between Shiite Muslims and his fellow Sunni Arabs.

Some worried Hasan's beheading could ruffle sensibilities in a Muslim society that reveres the sanctity of corpses. But Iraqi officials described the separation of head and body as a freak accident. Government spokesman Ali Dabbagh told reporters that a doctor present at the executions signed an affidavit attesting to the unintended nature of the beheading.

Still, an official videotape of the hangings shown to Iraqi journalists did not depict the entire execution, and some voiced doubts.

"It is really rare," said Omar Abdul-Sattar, a physician and Sunni member of Iraq's parliament. "I am a doctor and I would not believe such a thing could happen unless the rope is too short or the defendant weighs 400 or 500 pounds."

*

'The head was not there'

Prosecutor Jaafar Mousawi, who witnessed Monday's executions, said the men were side by side and hooded when the executioner released a wooden platform and sent them to their deaths.

"I saw Barzan lying on his stomach, but the head was not there," he said during an interview with Al Arabiya, a satellite news channel. "Then I saw the head lying near a corner."

Shiites in Dujayl, the town targeted after the 1982 assassination attempt, rejoiced Monday at news of the hangings. The once-lush agricultural center with fruit orchards and canals was bulldozed and transformed into an impoverished backwater by Hussein's regime.

"People started distributing candies and visit each other for congratulations," said Mohammed Zubaidi, the town's mayor. "The happiness at the execution of Barzan was more than Saddam. He was directly in charge of what happened in the town at that time."

But many Sunnis denounced the executions as another provocation by the Shiite-dominated government against their community. In Tikrit, the two former aides were hailed as martyrs.

"God has honored them and made them heroes for us and for every honorable Iraqi and Muslim Arabs," said Sabah Khalil, a Tikrit resident attending the funeral of the two men, who were buried side by side near the site where Hussein was laid to rest. "They are being celebrated like grooms on their wedding nights."

DOJ_NMG_0116497

Human rights activists said the death penalty rules of the Iraqi High Tribunal fell far short of worldwide norms.

"Under the international covenant of political rights, anyone sentenced to death has the right to seek commutation," said Richard Dicker of Human Rights Watch, a New York advocacy group. "The IHT statute explicitly prohibits commutation."

Little outrage

But despite angry chanting by some of the two defendants' fellow tribesmen, the hangings spurred little of the outrage that followed Hussein's execution.

"The people convicted represented numbers in the file but the most important number is Saddam," said Abdul-Sattar, the Sunni physician. "No one else could be important after his execution."

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, at the end of a news conference, brushed away a reporter's question about Monday's hangings. "It's an Iraqi process, Iraqi decision, an Iraqi execution," he said as he left the podium and exited the room.

Execution Of Saddam Accomplices Goes Awry (MCT)

By Leila Fadel

McClatchy Newspapers, January 16, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Two weeks after hooting Shiite Muslim guards marred the execution of Saddam Hussein, the Iraqi government's effort to execute two former officials of his regime with more dignity went awry on Monday when one of the men was decapitated by the noose.

Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti, Saddam's once terrifying leader of intelligence, and Awad Hamad al-Bandar, the head of Saddam's revolutionary court, were hanged shortly before dawn. The two men, like Saddam, had been convicted of murder in the deaths of 148 men from the Shiite town of Dujail. A videotape of their execution was later played for reporters.

Bandar shook with fear and wept as men in ski masks tightened the noose around his neck. He repeated the creed of Islam, "There is no god but God and Muhammad is his messenger," even from beneath the darkness of the black hood that was put over his head. Tikriti remained defiant, denying his guilt.

When the trapdoor fell from beneath them, Bandar's body dangled at the end of the twisting rope. But Tikriti's head was ripped from his body, which plunged unhindered to the floor, its head coming to rest a few feet away, still in its black execution hood.

"I came close and looked down and it was so strange," said Jaafar al-Moussawi, the chief prosecutor in the case and a witness to the execution. "We couldn't comprehend it. Barzan's body was lying on his stomach, his head was in the hood, and blood was everywhere."

Bassam Ridha, a spokesman for Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, said the decapitation was an "act of God." Ridha said officials hadn't weighed Tikriti to determine how much slack to leave in the rope, a standard practice in hanging to ensure that the neck is broken, but not severed.

Still, he defended the executions. "There were no mistakes this time," he said. "It was almost ideal."

The video wasn't released to the public, and no audio was available to reporters. Ridha said officials suppressed the sound to protect the identities of the people in the room.

Last month, the Iraqi government came under fire from human rights groups and Sunni Arabs across the region after a surreptitiously recorded cell-phone video revealed that witnesses to Saddam's execution had taunted him and chanted "Muqtada, Muqtada, Muqtada" moments before he was executed. The scene fueled charges that the Maliki government is loyal to anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, whose Mahdi Army militia is suspected of killing hundreds of Sunni men.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, when asked about the executions during a stop in Luxor, Egypt, expressed dismay and said the hangings "shouldn't have happened" in the manner that they did.

"We were disappointed that there was not greater dignity given to the accused under these circumstances," she said. "It did not reflect well on the Iraqi government that it came out that way."

U.S. troops transferred the two men's bodies to officials in Salah ad Din province. The bodies, wrapped in Iraqi flags, were then taken to the town of Awja, where they were quickly buried, said Ridha Muthana, a spokesman for the Salah ad Din province. He said they were buried near Saddam at the request of Saddam's daughter Regah.

Hundreds of people gathered at the cemetery Monday evening as women sobbed and men fired guns into the air.

Some yelled out, "There is no need for shooting all these bullets. ... We need them to defeat our enemy in Iran and their hands in Iraq."

Women also cried, "The Shiites beheaded him, the Shiites beheaded him."

Government spokesmen said they would welcome neutral observers to future executions. "We would like that some human rights groups attend," government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh said.

DOJ_NMG_0116498

Rice Vilifies Handling Of Iraq Hangings (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, January 16, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Monday that executions of Saddam Hussein and two others were mishandled and said she hoped that those responsible for making cell phone videos of Saddam's execution will be punished.

Two top aides to the former Iraqi dictator were hanged before dawn Monday, and the head of one of them — Saddam's half brother Barzan Ibrahim — was severed from his body during the execution, a government official said.

"We were disappointed there was not greater dignity given to the accused under these circumstances," Rice said during a news conference with her Egyptian counterpart.

She said passions are running high in Iraq following the overthrow of Saddam's Sunni-led rule, but she did not excuse the Shiite-led, U.S.-backed government that has taken his place.

"That shouldn't have happened and it did not reflect well on the Iraqi government that it came out that way," Rice said.

Iraqi government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh stressed that all laws and rules were respected during Monday's hangings.

Rice also said the executions were Iraqi government decisions, not those of the United States.

"Let me just say that the decision concerning the execution of Saddam Hussein and the two defendants today were made according to Iraqi process and Iraqi law," she said.

Barzan Ibrahim, Saddam's half brother and former intelligence chief, and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, head of Iraq's Revolutionary Court, had been found guilty along with Saddam in the killing of 148 Shiite Muslims after a 1982 assassination attempt on the former leader in the town of Dujail, north of Baghdad.

Saddam's Dec. 30 execution drew international outrage over the way his hanging was carried out after a clandestine video, recorded on a cell phone camera, was leaked, showing the former dictator being taunted on the gallows. A second leaked video showed Saddam's corpse, with a gaping neck wound.

"I hope that those who are responsible for the way that came out will be indeed punished," Rice said.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has ordered his Interior Ministry to investigate the first video, and authorities have arrested the person believed to have made that recording.

President Bush said he saw part of the Internet-aired video of the execution and, like Rice, said he thought it could have been handled better.

In an interview on CBS's "60 Minutes," Bush said he got no particular satisfaction from seeing Saddam hang. "I'm not a revengeful person," he said.

CONFLICT IN IRAQ Iraq Refugee Crisis Exploding 40% Of Middle Class Believed To Have Fled Crumbling Nation (SFC)

By Carolyn Lochhead, Chronicle Washington Bureau

San Francisco Chronicle, January 16, 2007

(01-16) 04:00 PST Washington -- Iraq is in the throes of the largest refugee crisis in the Middle East since the Palestinian exodus from Israel in 1948, a mass flight out of and within the country that is ravaging basic services and commerce, swamping neighboring nations with nearly 2 million refugees and building intense pressure for emigration to Europe and the United States, according to the United Nations and refugee experts.

The U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees, which appealed for $60 million in emergency aid last week, believes 1.7 million Iraqis are displaced inside Iraq, whose prewar population was 21 million. About 50,000 Iraqis are fleeing inside Iraq each month, the United Nations said, and 500,000 have been displaced since last February's bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra. These figures are as of January 2007.

The Bush administration and the governments of Jordan and Syria, the nations that accept the bulk of the refugees, have been reluctant to acknowledge the humanitarian crisis, experts said.

"I think everyone at this point is in denial about the human consequences of the war," said Kathleen Newland, director of the Migration Policy Institute, who is familiar with the State Department's views.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., has scheduled a hearing today to push for more aid and more U.S. admissions of refugees, especially those facing death threats for working for the U.S. military.

At Kennedy's hearing, the State Department is expected to call for a slight increase in Iraqi admissions to the United States. Just 220 Iraqis were admitted last year, most of them not from the war. The Department of Homeland Security worries that it would be difficult to screen out terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0116499

"I would suspect that the Department of Homeland Security would regard it as a complete security nightmare," Newland said.

Kristele Younes, an advocate at Refugees International, said the refugee problem is growing rapidly.

"At the moment, we're seeing up to 80,000 to 100,000 that are being displaced every month," inside and outside the country, she said. "In Syria alone, there are estimations that there's about 40,000 Iraqis that are coming every month."

Roughly 40 percent of Iraq's middle class is believed to have fled, the U.N. said. Most are fleeing systematic persecution and have no desire to return.

All kinds of people, from university professors to bakers, have been targeted by militias, insurgents and criminals. An estimated 331 school teachers were slain in the first four months of last year, according to Human Rights Watch, and at least 2,000 Iraqi doctors have been killed and 250 kidnapped since the 2003 U.S. invasion. Business owners are especially prone to extortion.

The flight has undermined basic services such as water and sanitation and disrupted commerce, making it increasingly difficult for Iraqi society to function, officials said.

Iraqi Christians were an early target after the 2003 invasion; after the February bombing, Shiite militias began taking revenge on Sunnis. Violence is rising in southern Iraq between rival Shiite factions. Refugees International said many people are targeted for "un-Islamic" dress or behavior.

Iraqis who work for the U.S. government or any Western group, such as nongovernmental organizations and the news media, are especially vulnerable.

"People are targeted in extremely direct ways -- kidnapping, killings, rapes," Younes said. "Every single family we interviewed had gone through such an ordeal, and the tribal system in Iraq is such that revenge is carried out generation to generation, so they feel ... return to Iraq would be tantamount to a death sentence."

While the Bush administration is hastily devising new reconstruction plans for Iraq, refugee advocates say the country most needs emergency humanitarian aid for the most vulnerable, including orphans and women.

U.S. officials have "wanted to keep the impression that they were being successful and that there were Iraqis who were committed to building democracy," said Bill Frelick, refugee policy director at Human Rights Watch and author of an extensive report on the situation. "As it turns out, many of the people who are fleeing are fleeing because of their associations with the United States."

Syria and Jordan, for their part, may want to avoid being formally saddled with refugees who have special international status.

Newland said Syria and Jordan consider the refugees tourists or illegal immigrants, "which sort of implies that the problem will go away or that they would be perfectly within their rights to kick people out."

Jordan, a U.S. ally, has long accepted Arab refugees, and so has Syria's pan-Arabist dictatorship. The fear now is that both may close their borders. Pressure on Jordan, a country of just 6 million, is intense, with Iraqi refugees now accounting for 10 percent of its population -- the equivalent of 30 million landing on U.S. shores. Jordan began restricting entry after Iraqis bombed three hotels in Amman in 2005.

Many Iraqis are also living in Egypt and Lebanon. Iran, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait have barred Iraqis.

"There's just no way a small country like Jordan can, unaided, absorb hundreds of thousands of Iraqi refugees," Newland said.

Despite terrorism concerns, some predict the United States eventually will admit several hundred thousand Iraqi refugees, as it has after most military conflicts.

"Is it going to be one of the unintended consequences of our invasion and occupation of Iraq that we may end up taking hundreds of thousands of Iraqi refugees in this country?" said James Hollifield, an expert in international migration and director of the Tower Center for Political Studies at Southern Methodist University. "I think there's a high probability of that, which is what we saw after Vietnam."

When the South Vietnamese government collapsed, the United States initially accepted 130,000 Vietnamese, including 65,000 fearing their lives because of their collaboration with Americans. Many conferences later, 1.4 million Vietnamese, Cambodians and Laotians had been admitted, according to U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services.

Smaller admissions of refugees and those claiming asylum followed the conflict in Nicaragua in the 1980s, two Cuban crises in the 1960s and 1980s, the 1979 Iranian revolution, the Gulf War in the 1990s and the failed 1956 Hungarian revolution. The United States is the largest refugee host in the world, admitting 2.66 million since 1976.

"The reality is that refuge flows are really tied to foreign policy," said David Reimers, a historian emeritus at New York University. "It's perfectly possible that we could wind up with a couple hundred thousand Iraqi refugees.

DOJ_NMG_0116500

"The parallel to me would be after Vietnam War," Reimers said. "There was a frantic number of Vietnamese who wanted to get out, and we were caught unawares; 130,000 or so climbed aircraft and helicopters," some on their own, some evacuated by the U.S. military. Many more followed, and Thailand was soon swamped. Thailand said it could not handle the flows and was not responsible for them. The initial U.S. evacuation soon became, said Citizenship and Immigration Services, "one of the longest running migration and refugee resettlement programs in the modern era."

"Whether it was guilt feelings or a moral imperative, we began to resettle them," Reimers said.

U.S. refugee policy has long been an ad hoc affair, Hollifield said. "We sort of make it up as we go along ... The fact is, refugee policy is a function of foreign policy, but also a function of our humanitarian instincts. It is in fact a very messy business."

Most Iraqi refugees are determined to be resettled to Europe or North America, advocates say. Life in the host countries has become more difficult, they report. Resentment is growing, and most Iraqis are not legally permitted to work.

Resettlement abroad is considered a last resort on humanitarian and foreign policy grounds. Countries in conflict eventually need their people to take part in their own national struggles, some believe. "If we take all the most educated and bright people from Haiti, Haiti's going to sink into the abyss," Hollifield said the thinking goes.

For now, refugee organizations are calling for increased U.S. aid to Jordan and even, through back channels, to Syria.

Some contend large-scale resettlement to the United States is unlikely because of anti-immigration sentiment and fear of terrorism.

"Islamophobia may be too strong a word, but there is suspicion at least of Muslims from the Middle East, and at this stage -- though this could change -- I think people in this country don't see the United States as being the main cause of the refugee flows," Newland said. "I would guess they see it more as result of Iraqi-on-Iraqi violence."

Despite anti-war sentiment, Newland said, "we have not seen as much of an outpouring of sympathy for the innocent victims of this war from Americans, as we did in the aftermath of that terrible photograph of the little girl on fire with napalm (in Vietnam.) Nothing seems to have quite seized the imagination of the American public about Iraqi civilian victims of war in quite that way. Maybe we're just in the early stages. "

Page A - 1

Former Iraqi Translator Tells Of Threats (AP)

By Larry Margasak

AP, January 16, 2007

A former Iraqi translator for the U.S. military says his life was saved when he was granted a special visa to live in the United States, a status made available to only 50 Afghan and Iraqi nationals annually who served in the same capacity.

The 27-year-old Sunni Arab, set to appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Tuesday, says he was threatened by enraged fellow students at his college, survived a car bombing and learned his name was listed on the doors of mosques calling for his death.

The former translator, who will not use his real name, and a second witness who held a similar job were to testify behind screens to protect their identities.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., has argued for an increase in the number of translator visas. Only the translators themselves count toward the 50-visa limit, but their spouses and children may be able to join them in this country after the visa is issued.

Kennedy, who will head the committee's subcommittee on refugees, said an estimated 1.8 million Iraqis have fled their country since the U.S.-led invasion. The hearing will focus on those who were affiliated with the U.S. government.

"The desperate situation in Iraq has created hundreds of thousands of refugees who are virtually unknown to the rest of the world," Kennedy said in a statement. "We can't continue to ignore their plight."

In his prepared testimony, the translator said that when he was attending Mosul University in October 2003, he escorted a U.S. soldier to the campus.

"I was assaulted and threatened with violence," the translator said. "After the incident, the dean with whom I had discussed the U.S. soldier's visit turned on me and threatened to expel me."

The Iraqi had to leave the school, but later returned for his degree. That incident, however, was only the beginning of the threats.

"My life was in jeopardy," he said, when he translated discussions between U.S. forces and the Mosul police chief, who later was arrested for working with terrorists.

Once his name was listed on the doors of mosques, the translator said, he could no longer attend prayer services.

He became an outcast in his Mosul neighborhood, where "some individuals I have known all my life branded me a traitor and made death threats against me."

The translator resigned his position in 2004, but returned to Iraq the next year to earn his degree. In November 2005, he was seriously injured in a car bombing that singed off his eyebrows. He believes he was targeted.

He arrived in the United States that month on a temporary visitor visa. By March of this year, he had free legal help from a major law firm.

The translator was advised in June that he had become the first to be granted the special visa, which was part of the National Defense Authorization Act for 2006.

Iraqi Refugees Find Sanctuary, And Fellow Iraqis, In Sweden (NYT)

By Ivar Ekman

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

SODERTALJE, Sweden — Former residents of Baghdad living in this calm Swedish town know why they left. "Iraq is finished," said Taghreed Ewas, 34, a chemical engineer who fled last year after she received several death threats and narrowly escaped a kidnapping.

As they flee the mayhem of their homeland, Iraqis have swarmed into neighboring countries in the Middle East by the hundreds of thousands. But they are also increasingly coming to Europe, especially Sweden, one indication of how the war in Iraq is now beginning to have serious consequences for countries far beyond its borders.

Last year, 8,951 Iraqis applied for asylum in Sweden, up from 2,330 in 2005. Of those, almost 3,000 arrived in November and December. Those choosing this relatively small country of nine million people represent nearly half of the Iraqi refugees arriving in Europe and surpass by far the number admitted to the United States each year.

"We don't use words like flood, but it's clear that it's a very large increase," said Krister Isaksson, a forecast analyst at the Swedish Migration Board. "We see no reasons why it would slow down. Instead we believe it might continue to increase."

Ms. Ewas, who fled with the help of smugglers through northern Iraq and Turkey, leaving much of her family behind, has little hope of returning to Iraq. "Every day there is worse than the day before," she said at an immigrant reception center here.

The mass exodus of Iraqis spawned by the deteriorating security situation at home is having the most extreme effect on Iraq's neighbors. The United Nations refugee agency estimates that 500,000 to 1 million displaced Iraqis are in Syria; up to 700,000 in Jordan; 20,000 to 80,000 in Egypt; and up to 40,000 in Lebanon.

But the agency has begun warning that the crisis is spreading beyond the Middle East. In late December, it issued an advisory to governments recommending that asylum seekers from southern and central Iraq "be favorably considered as refugees under the 1951 Refugee Convention."

"People have been optimistic, hoping that the situation would get better," said Paal Aarsaether, the agency's spokesman for the Nordic countries. "But now the international community has realized that this has to be dealt with."

Sweden's relatively liberal asylum laws and immigration regulations have made it by far the most attractive destination in Europe for Iraqi refugees, Ms. Isaksson said. Of the 16,261 Iraqis who applied for asylum in Western Europe from January to November last year, about 45 percent came to Sweden. In November, when 1,413 arrived here, only 13 applied in France, 65 in Denmark and 230 in Germany.

"We give Iraqis residence permits to an extent that isn't done in the rest of Europe," Ms. Isaksson said. Unlike countries that require language knowledge or economic guarantees, she said, citing Denmark and the Netherlands, "we don't put many demands on immigrants."

Another factor is that more than 80,000 Iraqis already live in Sweden, forming the country's second largest immigrant group, after Finns. Many refugees come because they have relatives here.

Sodertalje, a scenic industrial town about 20 miles southwest of Stockholm, is home not just to the truckmaker Scania, which has its main factory here, but also to a thriving and growing population of Iraqis, most of them Christians. Ms. Ewas chose Sodertalje because her brother lives here.

The rapid increase in Iraqi immigrants is having an impact on the communities where they settle. At Sodertalje's immigrant reception center, a converted factory building where refugees and other immigrants come to register with the local authorities, the situation borders on chaotic, said Catharina Helling, the center's director.

"We are feeling the strain," Ms. Helling said, noting that the center's staff has increased to 25 from 8 a year ago. She said that the municipality is having problems recruiting Swedish-language teachers. In December, 131 new immigrants registered at the center, all of them Iraqis.

"This doesn't happen without pain," Ms. Helling said.

Those who arrive also increasingly bring memories of truly harrowing experiences from the chaos in Iraq. The center has hired two staff members to give the refugees counseling, but Ms. Helling admits that this is not enough given the help and understanding many Iraqi refugees need.

DOJ_NMG_0116502

One woman who stopped in at the center this week was Nooralhuda, 63, who arrived in Sodertalje in late 2005. She declined to give her last name because, she said, she is still "living in fear." She left Baghdad after her daughter and three young granddaughters were kidnapped. A few days after their disappearance she was attacked in her home, but survived, and her neighbors persuaded her to flee. She now lives with her son and his family here in Sodertalje.

Nooralhuda said she had not given up hope that her daughter and granddaughters might turn up alive. She often calls her neighbors to ask if they have heard something, she said.

"For Iraq, there is no hope," she said. "For me, my wish is that I get word that my daughter and granddaughters are alive, and that I can help them to come here, to Sweden."

Why They Fight -- From Within (WP)

By Linton Weeks

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

NORFOLK, Jan. 15 -- For Jonathan Hutto and David Rogers, life has become something of a surreality show. The two Navy men, comrades in arms, are waging a war against a war.

Working from within, Hutto, Rogers and others have established AppealforRedress.org , a Web site that enables active-duty, reserve and National Guard troops to appeal directly to Congress to withdraw military personnel from Iraq. On Monday, the group held its coming-out news conference in Norfolk, announcing that more than 1,000 people have signed appeals. On Tuesday, the pleas will be presented to Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich (D-Ohio) on Capitol Hill.

All of this comes at a time when President Bush is sending even more troops to war.

"Just because you joined the military doesn't mean your constitutional rights are suspended," said Hutto, a petty officer third class and 1999 Howard University graduate. "True patriotism is having a questioning attitude about the government."

Redress in this situation means relief, he said. "Relief from this war."

Hutto, 29, works in communications on an aircraft carrier. Rogers, 34, is quartermaster on a frigate. They've been friends since boot camp three years ago. Neither has served in Iraq. But they say 60 percent of the signers have served in the war. The signers are not lawbreakers, deserters or conscientious objectors, Hutto says. They believe in obeying orders.

Some, however, are reticent to appear in public. Organizers estimated that about two dozen active-duty members showed up at the Norfolk event, in a church near the naval base here. They were expecting 50. Hutto pointed out that many of the signers do not live in the Norfolk area.

The Appeal for Redress group has its critics. "The military's job is to carry out and implement foreign policy, not influence it," said Wade Zirkle, the executive director of Vets for Freedom. "That's what separates our country from military dictatorships. That's why we don't have military coups and military people running our country."

For military folks to appeal for redress "is un-American in principle," Zirkle said, and he pointed out that some of the organizers haven't even been to Iraq. A first lieutenant in the Marines, Zirkle served two tours there and was injured by a car bomb.

In between fielding phone calls and hanging banners for the rally, Hutto and Rogers paused for a moment in a downtown park on Sunday. A memorial to Martin Luther King Jr. loomed in the sunny distance. Both men wore Martin Luther King Jr. pins.

The idea for the within-the-ranks antiwar group came after Hutto read "Soldiers in Revolt: GI Resistance During the Vietnam War" by David Cortright. Hutto showed the book to Rogers. They invited Cortright to come to Norfolk.

"I was so impressed by the seriousness of the discussion," said Cortright, who teaches peace studies at the University of Notre Dame. He said it takes guts for active military members to speak out. "But they do it respectfully."

A specialist 4 during Vietnam, Cortright said there were hundreds of active-military antiwar groups by 1970. "They published underground newspapers, ran coffeehouses, organized demonstrations and protests," he said. He recalled that in 1969, a petition signed by more than 1,300 active-duty military people -- calling for a national protest against the Vietnam War -- ran in the New York Times.

A widely circulated appeal for redress is a new wrinkle made possible by the Internet. The plea is simply stated. Here is the nut: I respectfully urge my political leaders in Congress to support the prompt withdrawal of all American military forces and bases from Iraq. Staying in Iraq will not work and is not worth the price. The site is also sponsored by Iraq Veterans Against the War, Veterans for Peace and Military Families Speak Out.

Hutto launched the Web site in October. Signers include:

Kevin Torres, 23, from Brooklyn, a sergeant in the 101st Airborne who has served two tours in Iraq. "I felt like with our being there, we were making more enemies," he said. "The people hated us. They wanted us out of the city."

DOJ_NMG_0116503

And Liam Madden, 22, a Marine sergeant from Vermont. He spent seven months on the ground in Iraq. "I saw Iraq struggling to get on its feet and failing to do so -- despite the best efforts of American military," he said. "I have nothing against the military or my experience. It's the policy I oppose."

Though Madden was braced for some sort of retribution, formal or informal, after he went public with his opposition to the war, "it never came," he said. "I give credit to my chain of command. After all, the appeal for redress is legal."

Madden helped to launch the site last fall. A portion is devoted to the rights and responsibilities of people in military service. A Defense Department directive allows members of the military to send a protected communication to a member of Congress on any matter without blowback.

Kucinich will meet today with representatives of the group to receive the appeals for redress and present them to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

"I think it's important for the troops to have a vehicle by which they can address Congress," Kucinich, a vociferous opponent of the war, said in a phone interview. "We need to hear from them."

He said warriors have the right to question their mission and not be like the cavalry in Alfred, Lord Tennyson's poem "The Charge of the Light Brigade": Theirs not to reason why /Theirs but to do and die.

Hutto and Rogers are aware that the Navy could become more directly involved if the United States turns its attention toward Iran. "I would go, with serious questions," Hutto said. "And with a bit of sorrow."

And, he said, "I would go because I'm in solidarity with the men and women I serve with."

Rogers agreed, though he said the whole affair -- being an antiwar warrior -- reminds him of the novel "Catch-22."

Neither sailor will be in Washington on Tuesday for the presentation of the appeals. Following previous orders, they both are headed to sea.

On Day Honoring Pacifist, Troops Join In Dissent Of War (VAPILOT)

By Louis Hansen, The Virginian-pilot

Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot, January 16, 2007

NORFOLK - On Monday morning, Seaman Javier Capella traded his blue jacket for blue jeans. He also traded his role as a Navy photojournalist to speak out against the Iraq war.

"Somehow this madness must cease. We must stop now," Capella recited from a speech given by the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. in April 1967. "The initiative to stop it must be ours."

About 10 active-duty servicemen were joined for a rally by about 75 peace activists and disillusioned veterans at the Unitarian Church of Norfolk in Ghent.

The rally highlighted efforts by active-duty service members to persuade Congress to stop an unpopular war. The group counts about 1,030 signatures from active-duty service members, ranging from the recently enlisted to veteran officers.

The United States has 2.6 million active-duty service members.

The movement, called An Appeal for Redress, began in October and seeks to persuade Congress to support the prompt withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq.

"Staying in Iraq will not work and is not worth the price," the appeal reads. "It is time for U.S. troops to come home."

Federal law allows active-duty soldiers, sailors and Marines to express their opinions to their members of Congress. About 10 service members attended the event in civilian clothes.

Several service members are scheduled to travel to the Capitol today and meet with U.S. Rep. Dennis Kucinich, an Ohio Democrat. Service members will present the petition to the congressman. Kucinich is the only member of Congress to accept a meeting with the service members so far.

Other members of Congress will receive the names, ranks, and service branches of constituents who have signed the online petition.

Jonathan Hutto, a petty officer third class aboard the carrier Theodore Roosevelt, co-founded the movement. Hutto urged the audience to separate dissent from disloyalty. "The truth must be told," he said.

During the hour-long rally at the waterside chapel, echoes of 1960s protests resonated everywhere: in the Vietnam War patches worn by veterans, the long gray hair of the protesters, and the quotations from King's anti-war speeches.

David Cortright, a University of Notre Dame professor and author of the book "Soldiers in Revolt," told the audience that the efforts during the Vietnam and Iraq wars have strong connections.

"This is not an anti-military movement," he said. "It's a profoundly patriotic movement."

Petty Officer 2nd Class David Rogers, 34, joined the Navy three years ago, after the invasion of Iraq. Rogers disagreed with the invasion but did not believe it would interfere with his responsibilities as a sailor aboard the frigate Hawes.

DOJ_NMG_0116504

"In any job you have, you have to make compromises," Rogers said. But as the war continued, he said, "It's hard to make this compromise."

Capella, 36, joined the Navy two years ago to forge a career as a photojournalist. He's proud of his service aboard the Roosevelt, but he opposes the war. He realizes his opinion may be unpopular in the service, and has kept it mostly to himself, he said.

During a six-month deployment, Capella read a book about the soldiers' protests in Vietnam.

"It kind of opened my eyes," he said. "History is repeating itself."

Pakistan Will Close Four Camps To Foil Afghan Terror (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, January 16, 2007

Pakistan's government will close four refugee camps near its border with Afghanistan to help prevent Afghan insurgents from gunrunning and seeking safe haven in the country, Islamabad's ambassador to the United States said yesterday.

Mahmud Ali Durrani said the residents of two of the camps will soon be sent back to Afghanistan as part of a new program to better control the 1,550-mile shared border.

Agreement on the plan was reached Sunday with national and local leaders in what Pakistan calls the Federally Administered Tribal Areas and the Baluchistan section of the country, Mr. Durrani said at a meeting with editors and reporters at The Washington Times.

"We had seen some level of activity [and so] we thought we need to strengthen our systems," he said. "It is a porous border; it is a very difficult border."

About 20,000 Pakistanis and Afghans cross the border in both directions every day, making it difficult to weed out insurgents who come to Pakistan for medical treatment or a respite from the fighting in Afghanistan.

The four refugee camps hold tens of thousands of the 3 million refugees in the country. Two will be closed around March and the other two later, the ambassador said, adding that arrangements would first be made to receive the refugees in Afghanistan.

In the meantime, Mr. Durrani said, his government will beef up security around the camps, a measure that he said was welcomed by most of the refugees.

Other security measures agreed to Sunday include adding to the 938 border posts strung out through the mountainous region, increasing intelligence activities and tightening central government control over parts of Baluchistan. The government will go ahead with previously announced plans to fence parts of the border.

"We have wanted to do this for a long time," Mr. Durrani said, noting that the refugee camp closure was delayed by the United Nations because of a lack of funds, and that many refugees opposed being returned.

"But after this recent spate of criticism that has come toward Pakistan, we got fed up. We said, 'If this is the problem, then let's remove it.' "

Pakistan has about 70,000 troops in the border region and says Afghanistan's weak central government is not doing enough to secure the border against terrorist activity. Kabul, however, accuses Pakistan of inadequate efforts to seal the border.

Army Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, said in written testimony to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence last week, "Afghanistan's relations with Pakistan are strained due to continued Taliban reliance on safe haven in Pakistan."

Gen. Maples also said an agreement reached in September between Pakistan's government and tribes in North Waziristan is not being honored. "Al Qaeda's network may exploit the agreement for increased freedom of movement and operation," the general said.

Early today, Pakistani troops destroyed three suspected al Qaeda hide-outs near the Afghan border, killing several fighters, the army said.

The military carried out the operation in the South Waziristan tribal region after receiving information that 25 to 30 al Qaeda members were hiding there, said army spokesman Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan.

Mr. Durrani said Pakistan's government has no sympathy for al Qaeda or the ousted Taliban regime. "They are our sworn enemy," he said.

He reiterated Islamabad's objection to statements made last week by Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte that Pakistan, while a key ally in the war on terrorism, was being used as a "secure hide-out" by al Qaeda leaders.

Mr. Negroponte's statements "grossly exaggerated" the level of al Qaeda activity in Pakistan, Mr. Durrani said.

Asked about the U.S. debate on pulling out troops from Iraq, Mr. Durrani said any "abrupt" pullout would be "dangerous."

DOJ_NMG_0116505

"I think it would be devastating to pull out abruptly," he said. "I think it would be equivalent to having just exploded a little bomb in Iraq and then walked away. I don't think you can afford to do that."

He said U.S. forces should be withdrawn over several years.

In an earlier interview, Mr. Durrani said he was angered by reports from the United Nations and NATO that Pakistan was not doing enough to stop Islamic extremists.

"I think Pakistan had done everything that is possible. If there is a genuine feeling that Pakistan has to do X, Y and Z, then we will talk it out," he said.

Chris Alexander, the deputy U.N. representative in Afghanistan, said recently that Taliban leaders identified by the United Nations in 1999 were still active in the region, including Pakistan.

The leaders, he said in Kabul, "continue to organize, plan and carry out terrorist activities in this country and in this region." Some of those key players "were in Pakistan for at least a part of 2006," Mr. Alexander said.

DOJ:

Lam's Ouster Concerns Lawmakers (SDUT)

By Onell R. Soto, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 16, 2007

Senators to seek answers about U.S. attorneys' exits

A national political storm is brewing over the departures of several top prosecutors, including San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam.

Lam has not commented since reports surfaced last week that she was asked to resign as the chief federal law enforcement officer in San Diego.

Sources told The San Diego Union-Tribune that superiors in the Justice Department are unhappy with decreased prosecutions for gun and immigration violations.

Lam, a political independent, was appointed by President Bush in 2002.

In recent months, at least four other U.S. attorneys have announced their departures, two of them confirming that they've been asked to resign.

With reports yesterday that the Department of Justice has demanded the resignation of another top prosecutor, in Las Vegas, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is scheduled this week to answer questions from skeptical senators.

Democratic lawmakers have criticized the recent departures from the ranks of top federal prosecutors as worrisome.

“We have no idea why this is happening,” Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a California Democrat, said in a statement last week. “The attorney general could have a legitimate reason for asking for specific resignations, or this could be motivated by political concerns or worse, derailing ongoing investigations.”

A Feinstein spokesman yesterday declined to comment on the situation in San Diego.

Typically, the nation's 93 U.S. attorneys are appointed by the president and confirmed by the Senate, but a provision in last year's Patriot Act allows the attorney general to make interim appointments with indefinite terms.

Feinstein and other senators introduced legislation that would return the power to appoint interim U.S. attorneys to federal judges.

Gonzales is scheduled to testify Thursday before the Senate Judiciary Committee, of which Feinstein is a member.

Both U.S. senators from Nevada said this weekend that U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden had been asked to step down, according to a report published yesterday in the Las Vegas Review-Journal.

Bogden's spokeswoman wasn't available yesterday, a federal holiday. When asked about her boss' future last week, she told the Union-Tribune “I can't comment on that right now.”

Meanwhile, H.E. “Bud” Cummins, the former U.S. Attorney in Little Rock, Ark., said this weekend that he was, asked to leave his job so the Bush administration could fill it with a political appointee.

Cummins said he had planned to leave the post anyway, so was not troubled by the request.

Arkansas' senators, both Democrats, criticized the appointment of Tim Griffin, a former White House lawyer who also worked for the Republican National Committee, as Cummins' successor.

Outgoing New Mexico U.S. Attorney David Iglesias also said he was asked to resign, but without explanation.

Other U.S. Attorneys who recently announced they are leaving include John McKay in Seattle and Paul Charlton in Phoenix. Neither has said he was pushed out; McKay said he would “be returning to the private sector” while Charlton said he was leaving to join a law firm.

Lam's replacement will say a lot about why she was asked to leave, said former San Diego U.S. Attorney Peter Nuñez.

"If they drag in somebody nobody's ever heard of from D.C. or somebody's cousin or some rich guy's nephew, that will tell you more about what happened than anything else," he said.

U.S. Attorney Vacancies Spark Concerns (WSJ)

By EVAN PEREZ And SCOT J. PALTROW

Wall Street Journal, January 16, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As the Bush administration enters its last two years, a number of U.S. attorneys are departing, causing concern that some high-profile prosecutions may suffer.

As many as seven U.S. attorneys, including prosecutor Kevin V. Ryan, whose San Francisco office is overseeing the investigation of backdating of stock options, are leaving or being pushed out. Others include Carol Lam of San Diego, Daniel Bogden of Nevada, David Iglesias of New Mexico, Paul Charlton of Arizona and John McKay of Seattle. Ms. Lam and Messrs. Ryan and Bogden haven't officially announced their departures.

Democrats claim the administration is using a little-noticed clause in the Patriot Act to circumvent Senate confirmation for some of the interim replacements who otherwise might not be able to win confirmation. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Sen. Patrick Leahy (D., Vt.) and Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D., Calif.) are pushing legislation to undo a 2006 Patriot Act amendment that for the first time gave the attorney general, rather than local federal courts, authority to appoint interim U.S. attorneys. The administration said it needed to be able to do that to ensure no disruption in prosecuting terrorism suspects.

The proposed legislation would restore to the federal courts authority to make the interim appointments.

There is no fixed term for U.S. attorneys. Instead, they typically are appointed at the beginning of a new president's term, and serve throughout that term. If the president is re-elected, they continue to serve, unless of course they decide for some reason that they want to leave.

Lawmakers plan to question Attorney General Alberto Gonzales about the turnover at a Judiciary Committee hearing Thursday. Justice officials say the U.S. attorney changes are normal and that at any one time it is common to have eight to 15 vacancies. Former Justice Department officials, however, say it is unusual for such a large number of U.S. attorneys to leave at one time.

Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said that interim appointments aren't "in any way an attempt to circumvent the confirmation process." He added that the administration's record since last year's Patriot Act amendment "demonstrates we are committed to working with the Senate to nominate candidates for U.S. Attorney positions."

The Justice Department counts 11 vacancies since March 2006. The administration has nominated candidates to fill four of those and is interviewing candidates to fill seven others, officials said. Several departing prosecutors have left for new, and often higher-paying, private-sector jobs.

The departure that started the uproar is that of Bud Cummins in Little Rock, Ark., whose replacement, Timothy Griffin, is a former political official in the Bush White House and the Republican National Committee. Mr. Cummins, in an interview, said a top Justice official asked for his resignation in June, saying the White House wanted to give another person the opportunity to serve.

The departure of Mr. Ryan, who faced some internal criticism for his office operations, is less surprising. He gained a high profile because of the Balco steroids case and the options-backdating cases and in recent months began discussing stepping down.

The Justice Department's request that Ms. Lam step down was first reported last week by the San Diego Union-Tribune. A spokeswoman for Ms. Lam declined to comment on the matter. One possible reason cited for asking Ms. Lam to leave is a decline in her office's prosecutions of routine narcotics and smuggling cases. Ms. Lam instead has made white-collar criminal cases a priority and won the guilty plea in 2005 of former Republican Congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham, who was sentenced to more than eight years in prison for soliciting $2.4 million in bribes.

Write to Evan Perez at evan.perez@wsj.com and Scot J. Paltrow at scot.paltrow@wsj.com

Nevada U.S. Attorney Given Walking Papers (LVRJ)

By Francis Mccabe, REVIEW-JOURNAL

Las Vegas Review-Journal, January 16, 2007

The Bush administration has forced Daniel Bogden out of his position as U.S. attorney for the District of Nevada, Nevada's two senators said Sunday.

It was unclear whether Bogden was fired or asked to resign and for what reason. Exactly when it all happened also was unknown Sunday. Repeated attempts to contact Bogden and his office were unsuccessful. The Review-Journal's phone calls to his spokeswoman, Natalie Collins, were not returned by Sunday night.

Advertisement

Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev., had recommended Bogden, a longtime prosecutor in Reno, to the Bush administration in April 2001. On Sunday, Ensign said Nevada owes a debt of gratitude to Bogden. "His priorities, to prevent terrorism and prosecute violent and drug crimes, have made our communities and families safer," Ensign said.

But a source inside the Nevada U.S. attorney's office said Bogden was seen as indecisive, secretive and insular. Morale in the Southern Nevada office was low and that was partly Bogden's fault and partly the result of inadequate staffing and funding from the Justice Department, the source said.

The Nevada U.S. attorney's office also had at least three major setbacks in Las Vegas last year.

In mid-October, the federal racketeering case against about 40 Hells Angels members unraveled. They had been charged in connection with the motorcycle group's deadly melee with their rivals, the Mongols, inside Harrah's casino in Laughlin during the 2002 Laughlin River Run. In the end, only six Hells Angels faced reduced charges, and charges against the remaining bikers were dismissed.

In February, U.S. District Judge James Mahan threw out a $14 million securities fraud case against Las Vegas attorneys Daniel Chapman and Sean Flanagan and New York attorney Herbert Jacobi after an assistant U.S. attorney failed to produce more than 600 pages of documents.

Also in February, U.S. District Judge Robert Jones dismissed charges against Dr. R.D. Prabhu, a politically active Las Vegas pulmonologist. Prosecutors had alleged that Prabhu had submitted false Medicare claims. He had faced a potential penalty of $22 million.

But Bogden's office also has scored victories at the federal courthouse in downtown Las Vegas, including the convictions of former Clark County commissioners Mary Kincaid-Chauncey and Dario Herrera. They were indicted in 2003 on charges of accepting bribes from Michael Galardi, who was then the owner of strip clubs. Kincaid-Chauncey and Herrera were convicted in May and checked into federal prisons last week.

Bogden is not the only U.S. attorney targeted by the Bush administration.

In San Diego, U.S. Attorney Carol Lam, who prosecuted a public corruption case involving Galardi and former Clark County commissioner Lance Malone in California, was asked to resign in recent weeks, according to the San Diego Union-Tribune. Lam, a 2002 Bush appointee, reportedly was targeted because she failed to make smuggling and gun cases a top priority, according to the Union-Tribune.

Another example is New Mexico U.S. Attorney David Iglesias, who was asked to resign near the end of 2006 and agreed to do so.

"I asked (why) and wasn't given any answers," Iglesias told the Union-Tribune. "I ultimately am OK with that. We all take these jobs knowing we serve at the pleasure of the president."

Some Democratic members of Congress are questioning the motives behind the moves because they have discovered, to their chagrin, that a provision of the Patriot Act allows the U.S. attorney general to make interim appointments that have no time limits and do not have to be confirmed by the Senate.

"The attorney general could have legitimate reasons for asking for specific resignations, or this could be motivated by political concerns or worse, derailing ongoing investigations," Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., has said.

Feinstein, along with Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., and Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., already have introduced legislation to change that portion of the Patriot Act.

A spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said the Nevada Democrat agrees that the law needs to be amended.

In December, Pryor and Sen. Blanche Lincoln, D-Ark., protested the appointment of Tim Griffin as interim U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas. Griffin was White House deputy director of political affairs under Karl Rove and also served as head of opposition research for the Republican National Committee.

Pryor said Griffin should have to face a Senate confirmation vote.

"Arkansas has learned firsthand the unintended consequence of a little-known provision in the Patriot Act," Pryor said. "Unfortunately, the spirit and intent in which this provision was constructed has been abused and needs to be corrected."

During the 2006 reauthorization of the Patriot Act a provision was added that bolstered the attorney general's power regarding appointment of replacement U.S. attorneys. In the past, the attorney general had limited authority only to make interim appointments that were valid only for a limited time.

A Justice Department spokesman told the Union-Tribune that the department is not trying to avoid the Senate confirmation process.

"In every case, it is a goal of this administration to have a U.S. attorney that is confirmed by the Senate," spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said. "It is wrong for a member of Congress to believe that this is in any way an attempt to circumvent the confirmation process."

Of 11 U.S. attorney vacancies since the attorney general gained the authority to make the appointments in March, the Bush administration has nominated four people and interviewed seven others, all of whom are expected to complete the confirmation process, according to the Justice Department.

Review-Journal writer Molly Ball and the Stephens Washington Bureau contributed to this report.

Politicizing Prosecutors (NYT)

The New York Times, January 15, 2007

The Bush administration has appointed an extreme political partisan as the new United States attorney for Arkansas. Normally, the Senate would have vetted him, and quite possibly blocked his appointment. But the White House took advantage of a little-noticed provision of the Patriot Act, which allows it to do an end run around the Senate.

It is particularly dangerous to put United States attorneys' offices in the hands of political operatives because federal prosecutors have extraordinary power to issue subpoenas and bring criminal charges. The Senate should fix the law and investigate whether such offices in Arkansas and elsewhere are being politicized.

H. E. Bud Cummins, the respected United States attorney in Little Rock, recently left office. He has been replaced on an interim basis by J. Timothy Griffin, who has a thin legal record but a résumé that includes working for Karl Rove and heading up opposition research for the Republican National Committee. Senator Mark Pryor, Democrat of Arkansas, wanted to raise concerns about Mr. Griffin's appointment as part of the confirmation process. But he couldn't because there was no confirmation process.

Mr. Pryor, Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, and Senator Patrick Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, have accused the Bush administration of "pushing out U.S. attorneys from across the country under the cloak of secrecy and then appointing indefinite replacements without Senate confirmation." The San Diego Union-Tribune has reported that San Diego's United States attorney was asked to resign, and that even some of her opponents "said the supposed reasons she is being forced out are perplexing."

There could be unsavory political reasons for putting a party operative in charge of federal criminal investigations in Little Rock, which has been home to two possible presidential candidates, Hillary Clinton and former Gov. Mike Huckabee. But it is not necessary to leap to extravagant conclusions. United States attorneys are so powerful that their impartiality must be beyond question. One way to ensure that is to require them to submit to questions from the Senate, and face a confirmation vote.

Senators Feinstein, Leahy and Pryor have a bill to change the method for selecting interim United States attorneys back to what it once was: the federal district court in the jurisdiction would make the appointment. Congress should pass that bill, and take a hard look at how vacancies are being filled. There might not be fire where the senators see smoke. But Congress should not take any chances.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

H-P Leak Probe Brings Guilty Plea (WSJ)

By REX CRUM And PETER WALDMAN

Wall Street Journal, January 15, 2007

An investigator linked to the Hewlett-Packard Co. boardroom-spying scandal has pleaded guilty to federal charges and is offering to cooperate with a U.S. investigation of the case.

Bryan Wagner, 29 years old, of Littleton, Colorado, on Friday entered the plea before Judge Jeremy Fogel in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California, in San Jose. Mr. Wagner, the first to be targeted by the U.S. Justice Department in the scandal, admits being one of the outside investigators involved in the leak probe at Palo Alto, California-based H-P.

The investigators obtained private phone records of company directors, reporters and others to help determine the source of boardroom leaks. Patricia Dunn resigned as H-P chairman because of her role in the probe, which was disclosed in September and has also prompted charges that participants violated California laws.

Steven Naralti, Mr. Wagner's attorney, said his client dealt with intermediaries and never communicated directly with H-P officials. But he said Mr. Wagner can provide important evidence for prosecutors.

DOJ_NMG_0116509

Federal prosecutors said Mr. Wagner pleaded guilty to a charge alleging that conspirators, using email accounts, established online telephone service accounts that allowed them to access phone records. Specifically, Mr. Wagner admitted establishing an online account using the Social Security number of a Wall Street Journal reporter to fraudulently access the reporter's personal telephone records.

The charges against Mr. Wagner include one count of conspiracy, which comes with a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine, and one count of aiding and abetting aggravated identity theft, which comes with a mandatory minimum sentence of two years in prison and another $250,000 fine. He pleaded guilty to both counts in a plea agreement that was filed under seal, according to the U.S. Attorney's office in San Francisco.

Mr. Wagner worked as a subcontractor for Action Research Group of Melbourne, Florida, which itself was hired by Boston-based Security Outsourcing Solutions. Matthew Depante, of Action Research, and Security Outsourcing's Ronald DeLia face four felony charges related to the H-P scandal in California state superior court. Messrs. Depante and DeLia each have pleaded not guilty.

Also facing state charges are Ms. Dunn, and former H-P ethics officer Kevin Hunsaker. Ms. Dunn and Mr. Hunsaker each have pleaded not guilty.

Write to Rex Crum at rex.crum@dowjones.com and Peter Waldman at peter.waldman@wsj.com

U.S. Gets Aid Of Detective In H-P Case (WSJ)

By REX CRUM And PETER WALDMAN

Wall Street Journal, January 16, 2007

An investigator linked to the Hewlett-Packard Co. boardroom spying scandal has offered to cooperate with the Justice Department in its probe involving others in the case, the investigator's lawyer said.

Bryan Wagner, of Littleton, Colo., who entered a guilty plea in connection with the H-P case last week, dealt with intermediaries while working as an investigator for the company and never communicated directly with H-P officials, according to his lawyer, Steven Naralti. Mr. Naralti said Mr. Wagner still can provide important evidence for federal prosecutors, who the attorney said are trying to prosecute other people involved in higher levels of the leak investigation.

The outside investigators obtained private phone records of company directors, reporters and others to help determine the source of leaks from the H-P boardroom. Patricia Dunn resigned as H-P chairman because of her role in the probe, which was disclosed in September and has prompted charges that participants violated California laws.

Mr. Naralti said Mr. Wagner, the first to be targeted by federal prosecutors in the scandal, believes his client can help prove Social Security numbers that were used by investigators in obtaining phone records were provided by H-P employees. Mr. Wagner is accused of using a reporter's Social Security number to obtain private information about that reporter.

The charges against Mr. Wagner include one count of conspiracy, which comes with a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine, and one count of aiding and abetting aggravated identity theft, which comes with a mandatory minimum sentence of two years in prison and another $250,000 fine.

Write to Rex Crum at rex.crum@dowjones.com and Peter Waldman at peter.waldman@wsj.com

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Trial Starts This Week Under Dimmer Spotlight (USAT)

By Bill Nichols, Usa Today

USA Today, January 15, 2007

WASHINGTON — The perjury and obstruction trial of former White House aide Lewis "Scooter" Libby opens Tuesday amid diminished expectations for bombshells from a case that once dominated Washington headlines.

Save for the expected testimony of Vice President Cheney — a first for a sitting vice president in a criminal case, according to presidential historians — the case against Cheney's former chief of staff has lost some of its appeal. "It's going to disappear into the back pages of the newspaper, with the front pages devoted to Bush's new buildup in Iraq," says Paul Light, a presidential historian at New York University.

Libby, 56, is charged with lying to investigators and prosecutors about what he told reporters about former CIA operative Valerie Plame. Libby has pleaded not guilty.

Plame's identity was leaked to reporters around the same time her husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, publicly criticized intelligence used by the White House before the Iraq war.

DOJ_NMG_0116510

Special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald launched an investigation in December 2003, months after Plame's name and covert status were first revealed in a syndicated newspaper column by conservative columnist Robert Novak.

Former secretary of State Richard Armitage subsequently acknowledged being Novak's source. He said naming Plame was inadvertent. White House deputy chief of staff Karl Rove also talked about Plame to reporters. Neither man was charged.

Libby is one of the highest-ranking Bush White House officials to be tried, and Cheney's expected testimony has become the case's centerpiece, vice presidential historian Timothy Walch says.

"This is unprecedented," said Walch, executive director of the Herbert Hoover Presidential Library. "I think that in part the case is enhanced by the authority and power and prestige that Vice President Cheney brings to his office."

In an interview on Fox News Sunday, Cheney would not say whether he would testify in open court or via videotape.

Cheney described Libby as "one of the finest individuals I've ever known."

Asked whether Libby is honest, the vice president replied, "I believe he's one of the more honest men I know. He's a good man. And I obviously appreciate very much his service on my staff over the years and have very high regard for him and his family."

Cheney's role is crucial for both the defense and prosecution.

Libby has contended he forgot details of his conversations with reporters about Plame because he was so busy with crucial national security matters.

"The defense will try to use (Cheney) to show that there was so much distraction at the time, that they were so busy that whatever (Libby) may have said to the grand jury was a lapse of memory," said Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond.

The prosecution plans to show that Libby and the rest of Cheney's office were heavily involved in an effort to discredit Wilson, Tobias said.

The defense's decision to call Cheney will open up possibilities for Fitzgerald in cross-examination. "Who knows where the questions will go," Tobias said.

Libby has long been one of Cheney's key advisers, having worked with him when Cheney was Defense secretary during the administration of the first President Bush. When Cheney became vice president, Libby served as his national security adviser and his chief of staff.

Lawyers for the defense and prosecution could not be reached for comment.

Jury selection is likely to last two or three days. Experts say that despite the publicity surrounding the case, U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton will be able to seat a jury with relative ease.

"News cascades in on you so quickly," said Frank Tuerkheimer, a former federal prosecutor and law professor at the University of Wisconsin. "Most people will remember very little, and what little they do remember will be eclipsed by what they hear at the trial."

Contributing: Wire reports

Trial Is Set To Begin For Former Cheney Adviser (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 14 — I. Lewis Libby Jr., the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, will go on trial on Tuesday, nearly three years after a C.I.A. operative's name appeared in a newspaper column, setting off a major investigation of who leaked the name and why.

But neither Mr. Libby nor anyone else has been charged with disclosing the name, which might have violated a federal law protecting the identities of Central Intelligence Agency officers. Instead, he faces five felony counts that he lied to a grand jury and the F.B.I. agents investigating the leak.

The situation of Mr. Libby, who once worked at the highest reaches of government power in Washington and now faces the possibility of a long jail sentence, is a vivid example of what has become a contemporary capital cliché: "It's not the crime but the cover-up" that often leads to legal problems for officials in high-profile investigations. The perjury and obstruction of justice charges against Mr. Libby stem not from the leak but from his behavior in the leak investigation.

The trial, expected to last at least a month, may serve as a stage for such intriguing issues as how the administration dealt with critics before going to war in Iraq, the changed relationship between journalists and senior government officials, and the always vexing question about the wisdom of using an independent prosecutor to investigate crimes in an administration.

Among the trial's highlights will be a likely appearance from Mr. Cheney, in what historians believe would be the first time a sitting vice president has testified in a criminal trial. Mr. Cheney would testify for the defense. He is expected to praise Mr. Libby as a public servant and attempt to clothe many of his actions in official vice presidential approval.

In an interview on "Fox News Sunday," Mr. Cheney called Mr. Libby "one of the finest individuals I've ever known." Pressed about his former aide's honesty, Mr. Cheney replied, "I believe he's one of the more honest men I know."

Whatever the nature of Mr. Cheney's remarks, if he testifies, the very fact of his appearance would underscore how the trial has created a deeply uncomfortable moment for the White House. It is a problem not only because a former official faces serious charges, but also because the subject is connected closely with how the administration may have used flawed intelligence about Iraq to justify going to war.

Mr. Libby is charged with lying to a grand jury and the F.B.I. agents investigating the leak of the name of the C.I.A. officer, Valerie Wilson, who was known by her maiden name, Valerie Plame. Her name first appeared in a July 14, 2003, column by Robert D. Novak, saying that she worked at the C.I.A. and was married to Joseph C. Wilson IV, a former ambassador. Only days earlier, Mr. Wilson had written an article that was published on the Op-Ed page of The New York Times, charging that the administration twisted intelligence to build a case to invade Iraq.

Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the top federal prosecutor in Chicago, was assigned to investigate whether anyone violated a federal law that prohibits the disclosure of the names of C.I.A. officers, and whether Ms. Wilson's name was leaked in an effort to discredit Mr. Wilson.

Mr. Libby told the grand jury and the Federal Bureau of Investigation that he had not disclosed information about Ms. Wilson to any journalists. But Judith Miller, then a reporter for The New York Times, and Matthew Cooper of Time magazine told the grand jury that Mr. Libby had indeed spoken to them about Ms. Wilson.

Mr. Libby also testified that he learned of Ms. Wilson's identity from a third journalist, Tim Russert of NBC News, but Mr. Russert is expected to testify that that is false. Prosecutors have said that Mr. Libby learned of Ms. Wilson's identity from administration officials including Mr. Cheney.

Looming over the proceedings is speculation that Mr. Libby would be a plausible if not likely recipient of a presidential pardon if convicted.

Away from the wide-angle political drama, the trial will have its own legal script. Court filings and hearings leading to trial have built two views of the case.

The prosecution view goes something like this:

The only issue that should matter to the jury is whether Mr. Libby lied as charged. To avoid the possibility that he could be charged with violating the law that prohibits disclosing C.I.A. officers' names, he decided to lie about his conversations with reporters about Ms. Plame.

Mr. Libby "had strong reason to believe" that the reporters would successfully resist testifying and that the leak investigation would end inconclusively, as so many others had. He concocted the idea that he had learned of Ms. Wilson's identity from Mr. Russert because he thought Mr. Russert would not testify and contradict him.

The defense case goes like this:

Mr. Libby may never even have mentioned Ms. Wilson's name to Mr. Cooper and Ms. Miller, whose testimony to the contrary may be the result of their remembering their conversations incorrectly. But even if he did talk about her and later deny it, it was an innocent case of remembering inaccurately what was a trivial matter compared with his agenda in the summer of 2003.

In addition to his chief of staff duties, Mr. Libby dealt with issues of vast importance as Mr. Cheney's national security adviser. To demonstrate that, defense lawyers are hoping to present the jury with a picture of Mr. Libby's workaday world, a complicated, fast-moving place in which an issue like naming Ms. Wilson was relatively insignificant.

The judge in the case, Reggie M. Walton of Federal District Court in Washington, has so far weighed in on the side of the government in narrowing the issues to whether Mr. Libby's statements to investigators and the grand jury violated the law.

The trial is also notable for its roster of celebrity witnesses. In addition to Mr. Cheney and Mr. Russert, host of "Meet the Press," Bob Woodward of The Washington Post may testify.

Mr. Woodward has acknowledged that although he did not write about it, he learned the identity of Ms. Wilson in 2003 from the man who turned out to be the source for Mr. Novak.

That source was Richard L. Armitage, a former deputy secretary of state, who acknowledged publicly last August that he had told Mr. Fitzgerald he was the original source.

That disclosure raised questions among Mr. Libby's defenders and others about why Mr. Fitzgerald chose to prolong the investigation when he knew as early as October 2003 that Mr. Armitage was the leaker, and that he had not violated any laws because of the circumstances in which he disclosed Ms. Wilson's name.

To those critics, Mr. Fitzgerald's investigation demonstrated the same problems as those conducted by independent counsels in previous cases who, unchecked by normal constraints, often proceeded until they could charge someone with a "process" crime like perjury.

DOJ_NMG_0116512

At Libby Trial, Power Players Face Uncomfortable Spotlight (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 15, 2007

When Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff goes on trial Tuesday on charges of lying about the disclosure of a CIA officer's identity, members of Washington's government and media elite will be answering some embarrassing questions as well.

I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's case will put on display the secret strategizing of an administration that cherry-picked information to justify war in Iraq and reporters who traded freely in gossip and protected their own interests as they worked on one of the big Washington stories of 2003.

The estimated six-week trial will pit current and former Bush administration officials against one another and, if Cheney is called as expected, will mark the first time that a sitting vice president has testified in a criminal case. It also will force the media into painful territory, with as many as 10 journalists called to testify for or against an official who was, for some of them, a confidential source.

Besides Cheney, the trial is likely to feature government and media luminaries including NBC's Tim Russert, former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer, columnist Robert D. Novak and Washington Post Assistant Managing Editor Bob Woodward.

Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald's investigation into the leak of CIA officer Valerie Plame's identity became a popular spectator sport in Washington in the summer of 2004, when reporters were first ordered under threat of jail to reveal their anonymous sources in the administration. In October 2005, Libby was indicted on charges of perjuring himself before a grand jury, making false statements to investigators and obstruction of justice (though he was not one of the leakers to Novak, who first disclosed Plame's identity).

U.S. v. Libby boils down to two drastically different versions of the same events in the spring and summer of 2003. The government alleges that Libby was involved in a concerted White House effort to discredit Plame's husband, former U.S. ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, who had publicly accused the Bush administration of twisting information he provided on Iraq's nuclear weapons program. Wilson led a CIA-sponsored mission to Niger a year earlier and found no grounds for claims that Iraq was trying to obtain uranium there.

Eight days after Wilson went public with his claims, Plame's identity as a CIA officer appeared in Novak's column.

The defense says that neither Libby nor the White House sought to retaliate against Wilson and that Libby misspoke to investigators looking into the disclosure because he was overwhelmed by a crush of national security and other matters. He has said he had no motive to lie about the details or timing of conversations he had with reporters.

The case has largely played out in below-the-radar court hearings as prosecutors and defense lawyers have mapped the boundaries of the trial. Despite speculation at cocktail parties and in law-firm lunchrooms that Bush would pardon Libby to avoid the spectacle of a trial, the date has arrived.

Presiding U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton and lawyers for both sides will begin selecting 12 jurors along with alternates Tuesday. It is not expected to be an easy task, given the heavy publicity and the involvement of two institutions -- the government and the news media -- low in the public's esteem. Preparing for strong feelings from some D.C. residents, Walton has assembled 100 prospective jurors and has a pool of 100 more standing by.

Walton has also girded for intense media coverage, last week issuing unusually strict orders that bar attorneys from commenting publicly during the trial.

Fitzgerald's probe focused on a tense time in Washington, starting in May 2003, when the administration sought to defend its invasion of Iraq even as U.S. troops failed to find weapons of mass destruction, which the administration had cited as one of the main reasons for deposing Saddam Hussein. That month, reporters began writing about anonymous accusations from Wilson that Bush had sold the war to the American public using intelligence Wilson had found to be groundless. Wilson went public with his accusations during the first week of July.

On July 14, Novak published a column identifying Wilson's wife, Plame, as a CIA employee who helped arrange her husband's trip to investigate the Iraq claim. He cited two administration sources.

The government alleges that before Novak's column appeared, Libby set out to discredit and silence Wilson after Cheney shared his irritation about Wilson's claims and Plame's role at the CIA. Libby asked State Department and CIA officials for more information about Wilson's mission and Plame, prosecutors say, then shared Plame's role with a New York Times reporter, Judith Miller. At the time, Miller was trying to defend her own reporting, which had asserted evidence that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction.

"It is hard to conceive of what evidence there could be that would disprove the existence of White House efforts to 'punish' Wilson," Fitzgerald wrote in a court filing last year.

DOJ_NMG_0116513

Later, when a leak investigation was opened, prosecutors allege that Libby lied to FBI agents, telling them that he had learned about Plame from Russert in a telephone call on July 10 or 11 and that he had passed along that information as unconfirmed gossip to two other reporters.

The plainspoken Russert will be a star government witness. He has told Fitzgerald that Libby fabricated parts of a conversation with him. He has said that when he spoke with Libby in mid-July, Plame never came up as Libby complained that MSNBC host Chris Matthews had an antiwar slant.

Russert has said he did not know about Plame until he read Novak's column. A source familiar with the case says his version will be corroborated by testimony from NBC News's former president, Neal Shapiro. Russert told Shapiro about Libby's complaint soon after the call, the source said, saying nothing about Plame.

Miller also will be a key, if hostile, government witness. She chose to go to jail for 85 days rather than reveal her conversations with Libby. After details of her reporting methods were revealed in Fitzgerald's probe, she was assailed by media critics and eventually left the Times.

Another crucial set of witnesses is the eight people who worked in the administration with Libby, who collectively describe him as meticulous about details and keen to obtain and spread information about Wilson and Plame before his July 10 call to Russert.

Randall D. Eliason, a former chief of public corruption cases in the U.S. Attorney's Office, said the evidence appears to make it difficult for Libby to claim forgetfulness. "You have the vice president cutting out a section of the newspaper, circling it and saying, 'Let's find out about this.' You don't rise to the level of being the vice president's chief of staff by letting that kind of thing slip your mind."

The defense contends that Libby forgot how he learned Plame's identity and misspoke when questioned twice by the FBI and twice by a grand jury about his conversations with reporters. He insists that there was no cabal to "get" Wilson and that Cheney wanted him only to rebut what he saw as inaccuracies by Wilson. That Novak first learned about Plame from Richard L. Armitage, then deputy secretary of state and a skeptic of the war, proves there was no conspiracy, the defense maintains.

"Mr. Libby will counter by showing that when he spoke to the FBI and the grand jury, he knew that he was not a source for the public disclosure of Ms. Wilson's employment," his defense lawyers wrote in a recent filing.

Libby's attorneys have said they plan to call Cheney as a witness, presumably to help establish that Libby was indeed engulfed by national security matters and had no motive to lie. It is a bold move, because Cheney would be questioned by prosecutors. Lawyers around town say they would pay for a seat in court when Fitzgerald, one of the best trial prosecutors in the country, cross-examines the vice president, a sharp-tongued debater.

Another key witness for the defense will be Woodward, who after the bulk of the probe was over told Fitzgerald that, a month before Novak's column appeared, he learned of Plame's CIA role from an offhand comment Armitage made while Woodward was interviewing him for a book. He has said he interviewed Libby soon thereafter and cannot rule out the possibility that he talked to Libby about Plame's identity.

That could buttress Libby's claim that Plame's identity was already known by reporters, so there was no reason for him to lie about discussing it with them.

Woodward apologized in November 2005 for not telling his editor about the crucial information, saying he did not want to be drawn into a case in which some colleagues had been threatened with jail for protecting their sources.

Charles Tobin, who heads the media law practice for Holland & Knight, said that the case already has had serious consequences for journalists by forcing them to reveal their sources and that it will continue to hurt newsgathering.

"There's certainly going to be a hesitation among sources as they see this trial unfold and watch what happens with Libby," Tobin said. "Will they have conversations with reporters if they think those conversations can be used to prosecute them?"

Politics At Forefront In Libby Trial (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, January 16, 2007

Potential jurors in the perjury trial of former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby likely will be asked their opinions of the Bush administration, political scandals and the Iraq war Tuesday, foreshadowing the political tenor of a lengthy trial.

Libby is accused of lying to investigators about his conversations with reporters regarding outed CIA officer Valerie Plame. Plame's identity was leaked to reporters in 2003 after her husband criticized the Bush administration's prewar intelligence on Iraq.

The leak touched off a political firestorm and an FBI investigation that Libby is accused of obstructing.

Attorneys for both sides recognize the politics behind the case and have proposed questions for jurors about their views on government, politics and the media.

DOJ_NMG_0116514

The answers will be critical for Libby, a Republican who served as an adviser to President Bush and chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney. The jury is being drawn from a city where Democrats outnumber Republicans more than nine to one.

"What is your political party preference? Democrat, Republican, Independent or other?" defense attorneys wrote on their list of proposed jury questions.

"Please describe any feelings you have about Vice President Cheney," they also asked.

U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton has not released his final list of questions but has indicated that such political questions are needed to select a fair jury.

Walton will put those questions to a group of about 60 potential jurors Tuesday. Each juror will then take the stand for follow-up questions from defense attorneys, prosecutors and the judge.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald's proposed list includes questions about what newspapers and magazines jurors read and where they get their news. Fitzgerald also wants to know whether their opinion of Libby's former job would make it hard for them to be fair.

Defense attorneys are even more pointed in their proposed questions. Among those on their list:

· "Based on what you know at this time, do you believe that the Administration misled the American people to justify going to war?"

· "Have you been following any of the recent political scandals involving Jack Abramoff, William Jefferson, Tom DeLay, Cynthia McKinney, or Mark Foley?"

· Do you have particularly strong feelings about the war in Iraq?

· Based on what you know at this time, do you believe that the administration misled the American people to justify going to war?

All jurors are routinely asked whether they have criminal records. In the Libby case, Walton has said the jurors will also undergo criminal background checks. Fitzgerald requested the background checks because, during his prosecution of former Illinois Gov. George Ryan, two jurors were replaced because they had police records. Defense attorneys are using that to challenge Ryan's conviction and Fitzgerald doesn't want to face the same problem in the Libby case.

Walton expects jury selection to take two to three days and has scheduled opening arguments to begin Monday. The trial is expected to last four to six weeks.

The trial should give the public glimpses of how Bush administration insiders responded to a high-level critic — former ambassador Joseph Wilson — who claimed the president and his closest advisers distorted intelligence and lies to push the nation into war with Iraq.

The case won't assess blame for the leak itself, however. Former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage, who has acknowledged being the original leaker, has not been charged.

Libby plans to be his own star witness. He says he didn't lie to investigators. During the Plame scandal and the FBI investigation, he says he was dealing with terrorist threats, the war in Iraq and emerging nuclear programs in Iran, North Korea and Pakistan. He says those overshadowed the Plame issue and clouded his memory about how and when he learned Plame's identity.

Libby Trial To Open With Eye On Cheney (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 16, 2007

A Chicago prosecutor charged with investigating the leak of a CIA operative's identity targeted senior White House adviser Karl Rove, casting a net so wide that journalists and legal analysts speculated it might ensnare Vice President Dick Cheney.

But all he got was Mr. Cheney's chief of staff.

Today, jury selection begins in the case against I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, who faces perjury and obstruction of justice charges in the investigation of the leak of Valerie Plame's identity to reporters.

The trial is expected to include testimony by several high-profile journalists and Mr. Cheney, marking the first time a sitting vice president has testified at a criminal trial.

Opening arguments are scheduled for Monday.

Mr. Cheney, who has steadfastly defended his former aide, says he likely will testify in the case, but he did not say whether it will be in open court or via television.

Attorneys for Mr. Libby, 56, who faces 30 years in prison if convicted, say the identity of Mrs. Plame was not leaked to reporters as part of a high-level White House conspiracy to retaliate against her husband, former U.S. Ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, a critic of the Iraq war.

During preliminary arguments, defense attorneys have laid out their strategy: Mr. Libby, in his sworn testimony to prosecutors, could not recall details of his conversations with reporters because of far more pressing matters, including the war in Iraq, worldwide terrorist threats, and nuclear ambitions of Iran, North Korea and Pakistan.

The trial is the culmination of a saga that stretches back to July 2003, when Mr. Wilson accused Mr. Rove of outing his wife to punish him for an opinion piece he wrote for the New York Times. Mr. Wilson, who wrote that the administration had exaggerated the threat posed by Iraq to justify military intervention, demanded that the president's top political adviser be "frog-marched out of the White House."

Special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald has since spent more than $1.4 million on his investigation, which has not produced charges against anyone for exposing Mrs. Plame as a CIA employee.

In September, former Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage, who openly criticized the war, acknowledged that he had inadvertently divulged Mrs. Plame's identity. Mr. Armitage has not been charged.

The identity of Mrs. Plame was first made public by conservative columnist Robert Novak. Years later, after the investigation was complete and indictments handed up, Washington Post reporter Bob Woodward said he also was told of her identity in the weeks before the Novak column was published. "Meet the Press" host Tim Russert was also in the loop, but he said he and Mr. Libby never spoke of Mrs. Plame.

All three newsmen are expected to be called during the trial, which is expected to run at least a month.

The makeup of the jury will be crucial to Mr. Libby, but his attorneys have a difficult task: In Washington, Democrats outnumber Republicans 9-to-1. Defense attorneys plan to ask prospective jurors about their political affiliations, as well as their sentiment of Mr. Cheney, according to their list of proposed jury questions.

Mr. Fitzgerald plans to ask about 60 potential jurors what newspapers and magazines they read, among other questions.

U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton, a Republican who was one of Mr. Bush's first judicial nominees in 2001 and who served as deputy drug czar under the first President Bush, has made clear that he will limit arguments to facts and will not allow the proceedings to turn into a circus trial.

Political Theater Awaited At Libby Trial (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, January 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — By his own account, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby was a very busy man on July 10, 2003.

That day, according to his calendar, he had a senior staff meeting; an intelligence briefing with his boss, Vice President Dick Cheney; a CIA briefing; and lunch with Cheney and then-House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.).

He was reviewing more than a dozen terrorist threats and checking up on trouble spots around the globe, such as the ouster of Liberian president Charles Taylor and North Korea's escalating plans for developing nuclear weapons.

Libby also had been busy talking with reporters about a CIA operative who was married to an emerging critic of the Bush administration's march to war in Iraq. On that day in July, he said he had one such conversation, with Tim Russert of NBC News.

Libby goes on trial in U.S. District Court here today, charged with lying to a grand jury about the conversations he had with Russert and other reporters and, in the process, obstructing a federal investigation.

His defense is a novel one: that he was so preoccupied with life-or-death affairs of state that it affected his ability to accurately recall events for federal investigators.

Prosecutors have a simpler explanation: He lied.

The "faulty memory defense," as U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton has called it, is just one intriguing aspect of what promises to be one of the most remarkable trials in Washington in years.

Expected to last six weeks, the trial is likely to provide a glimpse into how the White House responded to critics of its Iraq war policies. It will also include testimony from Cheney, marking the first time that a vice president has appeared in a criminal trial.

At a time when most high-profile Washington criminal defendants cop pleas to avoid the glare of the courtroom, the case should provide a rare display of political theater, a throwback to the days of Watergate and the Iran-Contra arms-for-hostages scandal, which played out in the same federal courthouse where Libby's fate will be decided.

The politically charged case against Libby may be the closest thing that critics of the Bush administration ever get to a public trial dealing with the justifications for the Iraq war.

While Walton has made it clear that he intends to keep the case narrowly focused on questions of whether Libby lied, legal experts say it may be difficult for the jury to leave behind their feelings about the war.

DOJ_NMG_0116516

Libby helped make the case for invading Iraq. Cheney is one of the most polarizing figures in the administration, even among Republicans. And the 12 jurors who will be selected starting today will be drawn from a city where registered Democrats outnumber Republicans 10 to 1.

"In most cases, politics are irrelevant. But this case is political," said Carolyn Koch, a Fairfax, Va., jury consultant. "People are so inflamed about the war in Iraq, and here they have a target in front of them. It is an opportunity to vent some anger.

"If I were Scooter Libby, I would be concerned. That does not mean you are guaranteed to be convicted. But it means you have an uphill battle."

The trial is the culmination of a three-year investigation that began with a July 14, 2003, article by syndicated columnist Robert Novak.

Novak took on former envoy Joseph C. Wilson IV, who had just written an op-ed piece in the New York Times that cast doubt over Bush's assertion in his 2003 State of the Union address that Saddam Hussein was seeking to acquire weapons-grade uranium from Niger. The CIA had sent Wilson to Niger in February 2002 to evaluate reports of sales of nuclear material. Novak suggested in his column that the trip was based on nepotism. Citing administration sources, he wrote that Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, worked at the CIA on weapons of mass destruction issues.

In December 2003, the Justice Department appointed U.S. Atty. Patrick J. Fitzgerald in Chicago as special counsel to investigate whether laws making it a crime to divulge the status of a covert operative were broken.

Fitzgerald turned up evidence that the White House was greatly concerned about Wilson, to the point that Bush declassified a national intelligence document to rebut claims the former envoy was making about Africa. The prosecutor also obtained evidence that other officials, including White House political director Karl Rove, had discussed Plame with journalists before her name was published.

But Fitzgerald never charged anyone with breaking the law that protects covert agents. And he continued to investigate even after learning early on who had leaked Plame's identity to Novak. That person, former Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage, was not charged. Fitzgerald has not said why, although it could be because the law can be used only against someone who knowingly discloses the name of a covert agent whose identity officials are actively trying to protect.

Libby was indicted in October 2005 on charges that he lied under oath about conversations with three reporters about Plame. In testimony, he had acknowledged talking with the reporters about Plame, but said he was passing along tips he had heard from other reporters, including Russert.

But Russert has testified that he was not the source, and the other journalists have said it was Libby who told them about Plame. And Fitzgerald turned up evidence that Libby was assiduously gathering information about Wilson and Plame and learned her identity through a number of sources, including Cheney.

Fitzgerald has said that Libby's testimony set the investigation back months.

The government is expected to call the reporters, then-Time magazine White House correspondent Matthew Cooper, former New York Times reporter Judith Miller, and Russert. Others expected to testify for the prosecution include former White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer, who, according to court documents, had a conversation over lunch where Libby told him about Plame but stressed that the information was "on the q.t."

Libby, who is represented by three major law firms and backed by a legal defense fund that has raised millions, is expected to call other journalists with whom he spoke during that period to show that he did not disclose information about Plame to them or that her identity had become widely known.

He is also expected to challenge the testimony of Cooper and Miller. Each had initially resisted cooperating with Fitzgerald in talking about conversations they had with Libby because they considered him a confidential source they wanted to protect. Miller spent 85 days in jail for contempt before cooperating.

But mainly, Libby is betting on what one lawyer calls his "busy man defense." Walton has said that Libby plans to use "a dizzying panoply" of information to make the point, including CIA-scrubbed summaries of classified information.

"The defendant anticipates using 'dots' on a PowerPoint presentation to show that during the time period critical to the indictment he was presented with several hundred other pieces of classified information," the judge said in an order last month. The defense is unusual because Libby is in essence admitting that he may not have told the truth, which lawyers said is a risky gambit in perjury cases, where defendants usually argue that what they said was technically true or that they were confused by the questions posed to them.

They said they could not recall another case where it had been tried in court, although it has been tried in the court of public opinion. In the 1980s, President Reagan denied trading weapons for hostages in the Iran-Contra affair, but later recanted when confronted with evidence that he did, citing a memory lapse.

Some experts said Libby runs the risk of appearing to believe he's above the law.

"A D.C. jury is quite likely to have its share of people with lower-level government jobs who don't take kindly to self-important claims that the press of business makes it unnecessary to focus on precisely what one says to government investigators and in the grand jury," said Daniel Richman, a former federal prosecutor who teaches criminal law at Fordham Law School.

But others said they could sympathize with Libby's claim.

"I think that people who have been around government will regard this … as not being a frivolous defense," said Stephen Saltzburg, a George Washington University law professor and former Justice Department official. "I can remember myself, there were days in the Justice Department you would be dealing with a different issue every 15 minutes. If someone asked me a week later … who I talked to a week earlier … I could easily have been wrong just because there was so much going on."

Jeffrey Frederick, a Charlottesville, Va., jury consultant, said the test for Fitzgerald would be showing that the conversations with journalists dealt with a subject that was so important that a reasonable person would have remembered it. That could be tough for Libby to overcome because the subject matter was the war and Wilson — whom the White House clearly had concerns about.

"We are not talking about whether you had tuna or sirloin on a Friday night," Frederick said.

Cheney Calls Ex-Aide Libby 'Honest' (AP)

AP, January 15, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney called his former chief of staff, who goes on trial this week in the CIA leak case, "one of the more honest men I know" and said Sunday he expects to testify for the defense.

I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby faces charges of perjury and obstruction of an investigation into the leak of a CIA officer's identity to reporters.

Cheney would not say whether he would testify in open court or possibly via videotape.

"I have indicated from the very beginning my wholehearted cooperation with the investigation and with whatever legal proceedings emerge out of that. And this will all unfold here in the very near future," he said.

Jury selection is to begin in Washington on Tuesday in a trial that should give the public glimpses of how Bush administration insiders responded to one high-level critic — former ambassador Joseph Wilson — who claimed the president and his closest advisers distorted intelligence and lied to push the nation into war with Iraq.

It will be the first time a sitting vice president has testified at a criminal trial, historians say.

Cheney described Libby as "one of the finest individuals I've ever known." Asked in a broadcast interview if Libby is honest, the vice president replied: "I believe he's one of the more honest men I know. He's a good man. And I obviously appreciate very much his service on my staff over the years and have very high regard for him and his family."

Libby's lawyers say the public disclosure of the identity of Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, resulted not because of a grand conspiracy, but rather because of political infighting among the CIA, the White House and the State Department over intelligence failures on Iraq.

Libby plans to testify about the other things he had on his mind when Plame was outed and when the FBI questioned him. He says terrorist threats, Middle East tensions, the war in Iraq and emerging nuclear programs in Iran, North Korea and Pakistan overshadowed the Plame issue and clouded his memory about how and when he learned Plame's identity.

Libby's lawyers say they plan to call Cheney, who can bolster claims that Libby had more pressing things on his mind than Plame.

Wilson says the information about his wife was leaked on purpose as retaliation and was part of an effort to silence other critics in the intelligence world.

The special prosecutor, Patrick Fitzgerald, spent three years investigating that claim but filed no charges based on the leak itself. He says his work is done except for trying Libby, who resigned after being indicted in October 2005.

Given that Libby probably will be the only official charged in the leak investigation, Cheney said, "I have strong views on the subject. I am likely to be a witness in this trial. It would be inappropriate for me, at this point, shortly before the trial begins, to enter into a public dialogue ... about my views on this issue."

The vice president replied, "That's correct," when asked if nothing he had heard or read would shake his confidence in Libby's integrity.

NYC Has Three Capital Trials All At Once (AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 15, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0116518

NEW YORK (AP) - At one point last week, a cop killer, a notorious druglord and a defendant portrayed by prosecutors as a one-man crime wave were fighting for their lives in the same federal courthouse in Brooklyn in an unusual confluence of three death penalty trials under one roof.

A fourth capital trial involving a triple-murder defendant has opened in Manhattan federal court as well.

"It's totally unprecedented to have two, let alone four cases going on at one time in one city," said Kevin McNally, a death penalty expert.

Death penalty opponents have complained that starting with President Bush's first attorney general, John Ashcroft, officials in Washington began rubber-stamping the pursuit of the death penalty in federal cases, particularly in states with no capital punishment laws of their own. In New York, the state's highest court declared the state death penalty statute unconstitutional in 2004.

While the volume of state death penalty cases around the country has decreased in recent years, federal cases have multiplied, said Richard Dieter, executive director of the Death Penalty Information Center.

One result: There are now 46 inmates on the federal death row _ more than double the total in 2000; three, including Timothy McVeigh, have been put to death since 2001.

One of the three men on trial in Brooklyn, Martin "Sassy" Aguilar _ who prosecutors say robbed drug dealers, shot at couples parked in cars for kicks and once killed a man by stabbing him with a screwdriver _ was spared Friday when a jury could not reach the required unanimous verdict on whether he should be executed. That means Aguilar, 33, will automatically get life in prison without parole.

But the death penalty docket in Brooklyn is far from done: Two more capital trials are scheduled to begin in the spring.

Previously, only three capital cases had been tried in Brooklyn since 1994, when Congress dramatically broadened the federal death penalty statute.

Brooklyn U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf declined through a spokesman to discuss the cluster of cases. Justice Department spokesman Erik Ablin said only that the department has a vigorous, closed-door review process designed to apply the federal death penalty "fairly across the country."

The other capital-case defendants in New York could take some solace in the fact that New York juries are reluctant to impose death. The last time a federal death sentence was imposed in the city was for a bank robber who killed an FBI agent _ in 1954. New York state has not executed anyone since 1963.

Defense attorneys in New York say a blatant example of the federal government's hunger for a death sentence was seen last March, when prosecutors announced they were pursuing capital cases against five defendants _ including a mother accused of being a lookout in a murder _ in the case against a notorious crack kingpin, Kenneth "Supreme" McGriff. Less than two weeks later, the prosecutors reversed themselves without explanation, saying McGriff alone would face death.

McGriff's lawyer, David Ruhnke, called the maneuvering "simply absurd."

Today, McGriff sits in a courtroom on the 10th floor of the Brooklyn courthouse, accused of paying $50,000 to have two rivals gunned down in 2001 in an alleged encore to his criminal career.

McGriff, 46, emerged from prison in the 1990s and sought to turn his life around by producing music and movies with the help of Irv "Gotti" Lorenzo, a neighborhood friend who headed the successful Murder Inc. record label, his lawyer said. But prosecutors allege the defendant laundered more than $1 million in drug money through the label.

If a jury convicts McGriff of murder conspiracy and other charges, the panel will be asked to decide whether he should be executed.

Another jury will begin the penalty phase this week in the trial of Ronell Wilson, 23, convicted last month in the execution-style slaying of two police officers during an undercover weapons buy.

A third jury convicted Aguilar, a drug-dealing member of the Latin Kings street gang, last month of shooting a man in the head to pay off a debt to a cocaine supplier. A gravedigger testified that he helped the defendant dump the body down a cemetery storm drain _ "We heard a splash" _ where it was found rotting a year later.

Aguilar also stabbed a fellow inmate before going to court for jury selection, said prosecutor Todd Harrison. "He's committed virtually every kind of crime known to our society," Harrison said.

Aguilar's lawyers sought to persuade jurors to spare his life with testimony from his mother about his rough upbringing. His mother testified that his father slaughtered his pet rabbit to discourage him from becoming a veterinarian and complained that his "Sassy" nickname was "too girly."

The defendant "has a kernel of good in him and if his life is spared, that kernel will grow," defense attorney Lou Freeman told the jury.

The anonymous jurors deliberated for six hours before voting 10-2 against death.

DOJ_NMG_0116519

"As for taking a life, we don't have that right," a woman on the jury said afterward. "God put us here and God should take us."

'Cub Fan Bandit' Only The Latest In Long Line Of Chicago Robbers (WP)

By Kari Lydersen

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

CHICAGO -- Maybe it's not surprising that, in a city famous for bank robbery, two brazen bandits practice their craft with a show of civic pride.

The Chicago Bandit, responsible for at least eight heists, is known for his blue ball cap inscribed with the city's name. The Cubs Fan Bandit, wanted in three robberies, wears headgear celebrating a local baseball team.

Metropolitan Chicago logged a record number of bank robberies in 2006, for the second year in a row. The 284 holdups surpassed the 2005 record of 240. How busy was it? On Sept. 25, a downtown bank was hit twice.

And 2007 is off to a fast start, with six robberies by Jan. 9.

No one really knows why, but the FBI speculates that multiplying storefront and grocery-store branches provide attractive targets.

Chicago is not alone: Los Angeles, New York and Dallas also experienced more bank robberies last year. Dallas County had 145 bank robberies in 2006, up from 64 the year before.

"To have that many in this area is astronomical," said Dallas FBI spokeswoman Beverly Esselbach.

Los Angeles -- "the bank robbery capital," according to FBI spokesman Bill Carter -- led the country with 470 bank robberies, up from 455. L.A. robbers included the camera-toting Paparazzi Bandit, who was known for photographing tellers, and the Goofy Hat Bandit, who wore a black fedora. Washington's total jumped to 50, from 26 in 2005.

New York's total of 290 was up from 229 the year before, but FBI spokesman Jim Margolin said the city's decline in armed heists with the potential for violence is more significant than the uptick in nonviolent "note jobs."

The trend in armed bank robberies "has been down in recent years," he said, noting that there were 45 robberies with a clearly armed assailant in 2005 and 28 in 2006. "We hesitate to speculate why, but some think there's a correlation with the economy or demographics. The aging of the population means a decrease in the male 18- to 30-year-old population, which criminologists believe is responsible for most crimes."

Melvena Cooke certainly doesn't fit that profile. Cooke, 79, is charged with trying to rob a downtown Chicago bank in September with a toy gun. Cooke, who was wearing a visor saying "Princess," left without any money and was quickly arrested.

Several high-profile Chicago suspects were caught in 2006, including the Harry Caray Bandit, who dressed up like the beloved late Cubs announcer, and the Panama Jack Bandit, wanted in 10 robberies and known for wearing a straw hat.

Yates said the FBI increasingly relies on the public's help to catch suspects, because improved surveillance camera technology makes it easier to circulate images of suspects, and FBI resources have been diverted to anti-terrorism duty.

The Goatee Bandit, suspected of 13 robberies, was caught after being featured on a "Chicago's Most Wanted" segment on Fox News. In November, three witnesses caught a suspected bank robber, stained with an exploded dye pack, who was fleeing through an alley. They held him until police arrived.

But the FBI is still searching for a number of Chicago serial robbers. An armed, aggressive suspect nicknamed the Wheaton Bandit tops the list, with at least 16 robberies netting more than $100,000 in the past four years. The FBI is offering $25,000 for tips leading to his arrest. The robber, thought to have military or law enforcement training, enters suburban banks wearing a mask and carrying a gun, then orders everyone to the floor.

Chicago federal agents also want to nab the Carjack Bandit, who steals getaway cars from bank employees or customers; the Newspaper Bandit, who wraps stolen money in a local paper; and the Hardhat Bandit, who has worn a yellow construction helmet in at least five robberies. "Maybe he does it on his way home from work," Chicago FBI spokeswoman Cynthia Yates said.

Chase, the most-robbed bank company in Chicago, has tried to improve security, including adding more bulletproof glass to its facilities, spokeswoman Calmetta Coleman said.

But fatalities in bank robberies are rare; in Chicago last year, there were no deaths or serious injuries. It is not a particularly lucrative crime, with most robbers netting only a few thousand dollars and facing about 75 percent odds of getting caught, Yates said.

Chicago robbers are continuing a long tradition. The city was where Depression-era bandit John Dillinger, perhaps the nation's most famous bank robber, was gunned down in an alley in 1934 after being betrayed to federal agents by a companion.

Other notorious robbers included "Baby Face" Nelson and George "Machine Gun" Kelly. Even current City Council member Walter Burnett Jr. served two years in prison as a young man for his role as a getaway driver in a bank robbery. He was later granted clemency.

Fraud Cases Are Rising, F.B.I. Says (NYT)

By Bob Tedeschi

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

MORTGAGE fraud has continued its climb over the last year, according to new statistics from the Federal Bureau of Investigation, despite increased attention from the financial industry and law enforcement agencies.

"We recognize it's a growing problem, so we've redoubled our efforts to work with the industry and other law enforcement agencies to address it," said William Stern, the F.B.I.'s mortgage fraud coordinator. "We're seeing it spill over to things like organized crime and gangs, which concerns us, too."

Mr. Stern said that as of early January, the bureau had 938 pending mortgage-fraud investigations, compared with 818 at the end of September and 721 in September 2005. The F.B.I. estimated that the actual number of cases was closer to 36,000 for the year ended Sept. 30, compared with 22,000 the previous year.

The bureau's cases typically involve so-called "fraud for profit," which happens when criminals seek to make off with the funds from a loan. Criminals will buy a house, often using a stolen identity, from a legitimate seller, then immediately put the house up for sale. Others in the crime ring will then pose as buyers and work with a corrupt appraiser to assign an inflated value to the house. After finding a mortgage at the inflated value, the buyers split the proceeds from the fraudulent mortgage with the sellers.

The other major category of mortgage fraud involves "fraud for property." In these cases, borrowers typically inflate their incomes on mortgage applications so that they can qualify for loans that would otherwise be outside their reach. Although borrowers can be held legally liable for misstatements, that rarely happens since the authorities say it is much more important for them to pursue "fraud for profit" cases.

Mr. Stern said lenders and other victims were losing bigger amounts to mortgage fraud rings. This year, the F.B.I. began closely tracking victims' losses and found that in 54 percent of the cases they lost more than $1 million. "We've seen a steady rise in both the complexity of the cases and the loss amounts," he said.

Borrowers not directly involved with mortgage fraud might not notice the effects of such crimes, since lending institutions can absorb the financial damage or compensate for the losses in subtle ways. But people who live in areas where mortgage fraud is a problem can be hit hard, said Ann Fulmer, the vice president for industry relations at Interthinx, a mortgage-fraud consultancy in Agoura Hills, Calif.

Before she entered the field, Ms. Fulmer helped uncover a mortgage-fraud ring in Stone Mountain, Ga., an Atlanta suburb, in 1996. The criminals bought 21 of the 2,200 houses in her subdivision — in fact, some who lived only three doors away had also committed violent crimes, she said.

Aside from safety concerns, Ms. Fulmer said, neighborhoods victimized by fraud suffer tax consequences. Assessors, she said, often do not recognize illegitimate transactions and assess neighborhoods at valuations similar to the inflated ones paid in the fraud schemes.

Jay H. Meadows, the chief executive of Rapid Reporting, a Fort Worth company that helps lenders identify potentially fraudulent mortgage applications, said lenders were now putting considerably more effort into preventing fraud than five years ago. But at the same time, Mr. Meadows said, lenders have more aggressively marketed products like stated-income loans that are more open to abuse.

With such mortgages, self-employed applicants and others who do not receive W-2 income statements can choose to estimate their annual income for lenders, who have limited means — or, critics say, willingness — to verify the estimates.

Mr. Meadows said criminals used such mortgages to qualify for loans they had no intention of repaying. "It's like putting $200 on your windshield," he said of lenders who fail to verify applicants' incomes. "I'd hardly call that theft. I'd call that charity."

Mortgage Fraud's New Super Sleuths (KCS)

By Mark Morris

The Kansas City Star, January 16, 2007

Mortgage fraud is being called the country's fastest-growing white-collar crime.

It costs lenders more than $1 billion a year and has turned increasing numbers of federal agents into experts on real estate paperwork. These days, they quickly crack cases that once took years to work, experts say.

Two Kansas City politicians recently learned just how quickly.

The very day last fall when then-Jackson County Executive Katheryn Shields and her husband signed paperwork selling their home, an FBI agent notified them they were the targets of a criminal investigation involving the sale.

DOJ_NMG_0116521

The documents purportedly showed that the $475,000 house they purchased in 1999 somehow was worth a $1.2 million mortgage in 2006.

Agents also wrapped up an investigation of City Councilwoman Saundra McFadden-Weaver just months after she unsuccessfully tried to refinance a $400,000 Lee's Summit home. According to prosecutors, McFadden-Weaver had purchased it even though she had no plans to live there or make payments.

By contrast, the largest previous high-profile case in this area, involving a Belton real estate investor, took years to develop.

Shields, who is campaigning to be Kansas City's mayor, and McFadden-Weaver have pleaded not guilty to conspiracy and wire fraud charges and have denied all wrongdoing. Shields, a Democrat, said she was the target of "political terrorism" by appointees in the Republican Bush administration. McFadden-Weaver said she innocently was trying to help a needy acquaintance in a real estate transaction.

Though these high-profile defendants cast new light on mortgage fraud, it already was a regular docket item in Kansas City and in federal courthouses throughout the country.

Mortgage fraud occurs when somebody lies or misrepresents a fact on a statement that a lender uses to make a loan. Banks and mortgage lenders generally are the prime victims when loans are not repaid, but the fallout from a large-scale scam also can devastate individual investors, who sometimes must file for bankruptcy.

Communities also suffer when swaths of properties sucked into a scheme go vacant and deteriorate as they fall into foreclosure.

Estimates of mortgage fraud losses vary widely, but experts said trend lines pointed up. Although schemes can prosper during good times — such as the recent mid-decade boom when as much as $2.5 trillion in mortgage loans were made each year — they also can flower as the market cools.

"Fraud is always most prevalent when the market is at its worst," said Shana Sowles, president of the Kansas Association of Mortgage Brokers and vice president of Person to Person Mortgage in Overland Park. "You have more desperate players."

Rachel Dollar, a West Coast lawyer whose mortgage fraud blog is widely read in the financial industry, has closely watched the Kansas City area the last few years. The charges against Shields and McFadden-Weaver reflect how agile federal investigators have become in pursuing cases, she said last week.

"I used to see indictments coming four or five years after the fraud," she said, "but now we're seeing them within a year."

A fraud 'hot spot'

Although mortgage fraud has interested investigators and prosecutors for some time, the crime's increasing prominence has focused their attention sharply in the past four years.

Mortgage fraud reports nearly doubled between 2003 and 2004, according to a Treasury Department study in November of "suspicious activity reports" filed by banks and other heavily regulated financial institutions.

That increase continued a longer-term trend that saw a 1,411 percent jump in reports between 1997 and 2005.

Testifying before a Senate committee last month, FBI director Robert S. Mueller III estimated the loss to lending institutions at more than $1 billion a year. Others called this a conservative estimate because much of the mortgage industry was not required to report fraud.

"We're in our infancy in being able to quantify the problem," said Corey Carlisle, senior director for government affairs at the Mortgage Bankers Association. "It's a big problem that we all need to take seriously."

Observers see the impact far beyond financial balance sheets.

Two years ago, fraud in Atlanta had gotten so bad that honest appraisers found it impossible to estimate what homes in some neighborhoods were worth. Real estate agents stopped listing homes in those areas.

Legislators finally made Georgia the first state to enact a law specifically criminalizing mortgage fraud and allowing scam artists to be charged with racketeering.

In recent years, authorities nationally have ranked Missouri as one of the top 10 "hot spots" for mortgage fraud, per capita, in the country.

Federal prosecutors in Kansas City have alleged more than $50 million in fraudulent loans in cases filed since 2004. The FBI counts a Kansas City conviction as one of its most significant successes in the national fight against mortgage fraud.

Belton real estate investor Brent Barber purchased about 300 properties, bought inflated appraisals for them and obtained straw purchasers, who were paid $2,000 for participating. After the straw purchasers made no loan payments, the properties went into foreclosure. By then Barber had the mortgage proceeds.

In October, Barber was sentenced to more than 12 years in prison and ordered to pay $11.2 million in restitution. He had been indicted in 2004 for deals dating back to the late 1990s.

By contrast, charges in McFadden-Weaver's case came just months after the home she purchased went into foreclosure.

DOJ_NMG_0116522

Dollar described Shields' case as a classic "closing table bust," in which investigators swoop in to kill the deal just minutes after the final paperwork has been signed.

Toward solutions

The surge in cases in recent years has led investigators, regulators, lawmakers and industry groups to consider a number of solutions.

Many think that existing fraud statutes are adequate, but four states — New Jersey, Utah, Oklahoma and Colorado — are considering laws that would make mortgage fraud a specific crime, in part to spur more local enforcement.

In Kansas City, FBI agents have become regular speakers at real estate seminars. Their appearances educate industry professionals about what law enforcement is looking for and also generate occasional leads for investigators to follow.

State regulators also are considering steps to take. Janet Carder, executive director of the Missouri Real Estate Commission, said she and other state officials were considering how to uncover the occasional bad actors who were industry insiders, all of whom had to report at some level to state regulators.

"We're trying to figure out how to connect the dots between the real estate licensees, the real estate appraisers and the financial institutions, and that's not easy," Carder said.

Ultimately, though, the real estate industry must work harder to weed out fraud, and consumers must become better educated about complicated, but legally critical, paperwork they are signing.

John Fougere, a spokesman for the Missouri attorney general's office, said if you don't understand what you're being asked to sign, ask more questions until you're comfortable.

"Take that extra step," Fougere said. "You would be amazed at the amount of grief you can save yourself."

How to avoid fraud

The Kansas Association of Mortgage Brokers offers these tips to consumers to avoid committing mortgage fraud inadvertently:

·Verify that the mortgage company is properly licensed in the state. For Kansas, go to www.osbckansas.org, the state banking commission. For Missouri, go to www.missouri-finance.org, the Missouri Division of Finance.

·Thoroughly read all documents provided by your mortgage company. Question anything that might appear out of order.

·Do not sign the loan application if you aren't comfortable with the information typed on it. Remember, any misrepresentation on the application could result in civil or criminal penalties.

·While the loan is being processed, question anything that appears out of the ordinary.

·At closing, read everything thoroughly. Don't sign if you're uncomfortable with any of the information represented. Review the final loan application to see if there is any incorrect information that might affect your approval, such as an investment property marked as your primary residence or your income is significantly incorrect.

Williams Is Third Guilty In 'Waltz' (MCA)

By Lawrence Buser

Memphis Commercial Appeal, January 13, 2007

Federal prosecutor is 'gratified' with verdict

The FBI's Tennessee Waltz undercover sting operation netted its third guilty verdict in as many trials Friday with the bribery and extortion conviction of Calvin Williams, former top aide to the Shelby County Commission.

A federal court jury of six men and six women deliberated 21/2 hours before delivering its decision to U.S. Dist. Court Judge Samuel H. Mays Jr. shortly before noon.

Federal prosecutor Tim Di-Scenza said this and two previous guilty verdicts show the strength of the Tennessee Waltz investigation. There also have been five guilty pleas.

"The significance is that we have a great team of FBI agents working on the case and they've developed extremely compelling evidence to show juries what's been going on out there," DiScenza said. "We're very gratified with the verdict."

Williams, 44, was convicted of soliciting a $1,500 bribe in 2002 to influence the commission's approval of a $100,000 urban renewal grant.

Before the jury returned, Williams shook hands with Di-Scenza and after the verdict said "Good job, guys" to Di-Scenza, prosecutor Lorraine Craig and FBI agents as they headed to an elevator.

"It is not what I wanted, but it is what it is," Williams said of the verdict moments later, still maintaining his innocence. "Whatever it is, it's God's will. I still love Him and I'm sure He still loves me."

Williams technically faces up to 30 years in prison on the two-count conviction when he is sentenced by Mays on April 13, but federal guidelines suggest a sentence far short of that. He said he's ready to face his punishment, however, including incarceration.

DOJ_NMG_0116523

"If that's what the judge has for me, I'll have to do it," he said. "I'm a big boy."

The verdict was the third stemming from the FBI's Tennessee Waltz public corruption investigation, which began in 2002 and has resulted in the indictments of a dozen elected officials or aides.

A key player in the cases has been Williams' former friend and business associate, Tim Willis, a political consultant, aspiring movie-maker and convicted identity theft felon.

Caught in a Juvenile Court inflated-invoice scheme in 2001, Willis began cooperating with the FBI and has played a key role in the convictions of Williams, former state senator Roscoe Dixon and former Hamilton County Commissioner William Cotton of Chattanooga.

In Williams' case, Willis secretly recorded discussions with the defendant about obtaining a grant for the Glenview Community Development Partners and videotaped the $1,500 payment he made to Williams on April 24, 2003.

Williams insisted he exerted no influence over any commissioners, although the tapes presented to the jury showed him boasting of being a major behind-the-scenes political player. Williams insisted on the witness stand that the fee he received from Willis was his legitimate cut from their shared consulting business.

"Tim has managed to defeat Calvin Williams," he said to reporters outside the federal building. "I can't sugarcoat this."

Bruno Bought Stock With Campaign Funds (NYT)

By Mike Mcintire

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

Over the past six years, State Senator Joseph L. Bruno, the majority leader, has invested hundreds of thousands of dollars from two campaign accounts that he controls in at least four Albany-area companies, which have all had personal business dealings with him, a review of state campaign finance records shows.

The investments, though legal, were unusual even for New York, whose election laws are considered relatively lax. While some campaign committees have reported earning interest or dividends from mutual funds, Mr. Bruno, a Republican, appears to be one of only a few lawmakers to use excess campaign funds to make loans to private companies or to buy individual stocks, according to a review of state records.

Mr. Bruno's purchase of stock in a start-up company with volatile prices led him to lose money contributed by supporters. And campaign finance experts say such investments pose the potential for abuse, because it is hard to monitor whether candidates are receiving beneficial treatment from companies.

State campaign finance rules are vague about which details candidates must disclose about investments by their campaign committees. The State Board of Elections does not include investment records in the reports it makes public.

Complicating Mr. Bruno's case is the fact that he had personally invested in two of the companies that his campaign accounts bought stock in, and he had financial dealings with the chairman of two others. The accounts Mr. Bruno used in the investments were held by his re-election committee and the State Senate Republicans' campaign committee.

Last year, the senator's re-election committee reported losing almost $99,000 on an investment in 2000 in Plug Power Inc., a maker of fuel cells based in Latham, N.Y., in which he also personally owned stock, his financial disclosure reports show. In July 2001, a year after he and his committee bought their shares in Plug Power, Mr. Bruno helped secure $500,000 in state money for a research project involving Plug Power, which has also received state contracts and other government aid.

Also in 2001, Mr. Bruno's two committees loaned roughly $200,000 to the Capital Center Credit Corporation, a privately held financial services company in Albany whose chairman, Timothy M. McGinn, was a client of Mr. Bruno's consulting business, according to published reports. Mr. McGinn's firm repaid the loan at an interest rate of 9 percent to 10 percent over about three years.

Mr. Bruno has acknowledged that his consulting business has been under investigation by the Federal Bureau of Investigation since at least early last year. Mr. McGinn said in a recent interview that his firm is cooperating with investigators in that inquiry.

Mr. Bruno's use of campaign money as an investment tool adds a new dimension to a spate of recent reports that he and other lawmakers steered millions in public money to pet causes, including several profit-making companies. Mr. Bruno and other lawmakers have said the grants were economic development incentives intended to help small firms expand.

John McArdle, a spokesman for Mr. Bruno, offered a more pragmatic rationale for the campaign committees' investments, saying they were an attempt to get a better rate of return than what banks were offering. He said the fact that they lost money on some of the investments shows that no favoritism was involved, and he defended the unconventional investments as legitimate and "not uncommon."

DOJ_NMG_0116524

But some campaign finance analysts say the practice is problematic. Because the law permits virtually all manner of investments and does not specify what information about them must be disclosed, they say, there is little to prevent a company from setting an exorbitant rate of return and using it to funnel cash into a campaign.

"You would have no way of knowing that unless there was a regulatory action, like an audit, because it's not required to be disclosed to the public," said Lawrence A. Mandelker, an election lawyer who was a campaign treasurer for former Mayor Edward I. Koch. "That's a shortcoming in the law."

Revelations about Mr. Bruno's campaign investments come as other aspects of his financial dealings are under investigation by a federal grand jury in Albany. The senator has said that federal authorities are examining his business relationships over the past five or six years.

Some of those relationships straddled his personal and public lives. The senator, for example, has held personal investments in, or did business with, companies and businessmen who have also received state assistance, sometimes with Mr. Bruno's help.

The two campaign accounts Mr. Bruno controls together had about $3 million on hand at the end of 2006, but the totals have fluctuated widely over the years. Mr. Bruno, who has been in office for 30 years, has not faced a serious opponent since the early 1990s. He has not spent heavily on his re-election campaigns in many years and has often had large amounts of campaign cash on hand.

Many state legislators, who face re-election every two years, keep their cash in bank accounts where it is readily accessible. It is less common for candidates to invest in mutual funds, and rarer still for them to become equity investors in companies by making loans or direct purchases of stock, according to an analysis of state campaign records. Interest income, dividends and losses are the only data about campaign committee investments that the State Board of Elections makes available to the public.

Lee Daghlian, a spokesman for the elections board, said that committees must also file a document explicitly identifying the investments they make, but that those documents are kept in paper files and are not included in the data available on the board's Web site. He said it was not possible yesterday to determine whether other candidates had made investments similar to Mr. Bruno's.

Mr. McArdle said Mr. Bruno decided in 2000 to have his re-election committee buy $107,000 of stock in Plug Power and $24,000 of stock in a related firm, Mechanical Technology Inc. That was about the same time Mr. Bruno made personal investments in both companies, according to his legislative financial disclosure statements.

After Plug Power went public in 1999 its stock skyrocketed, reaching $150 a share before beginning a long decline in 2000; today it trades at less than $4. Mechanical Technology's stock suffered a similarly steep decline in those years. Mr. Bruno personally lost $36,700 and his committee lost $117,800 in the two stocks when the shares were sold in 2005, Mr. McArdle said. Despite the dismal outcome, he asserted that the investments were viewed at the time as smart alternatives to the meager returns being offered by banks.

"Back then, there was a thought that these types of investments were worth making because the analysts were saying these would be good in the long run," he said. "Everybody was investing in them."

The $500,000 in public money that Mr. Bruno helped win in 2001 was for a fuel cell research project involving Plug Power and Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute in Troy, which is in Mr. Bruno's district. In an interview last month, Cynthia Mahoney White, a spokeswoman for Plug Power, said Mr. Bruno "has been very supportive of us," although she said the company knew nothing about his investments in Plug Power.

In 2001, Mr. Bruno arranged for both campaign committees to lend money to Capital Center Credit, which specialized in providing financing for the installation of security equipment sold by the Integrated Alarm Services Group, another company run by Mr. McGinn. Mr. McArdle said the loans were repaid on a monthly basis, at an interest rate of slightly more than 9 percent, until 2003, when Capital Center's debt was assumed by Integrated Alarm and was repaid at a new interest rate of 10 percent. The loans were paid in full in late 2004.

Mr. McGinn is a principal in McGinn, Smith & Company, an investment firm that recently received a subpoena from the grand jury investigating Mr. Bruno's business activities. The Village Voice reported in 1997 that McGinn, Smith was once a client of Mr. Bruno's private consulting business. In 1999, Mr. Bruno disclosed making a profit from the sale of stock he owned in the Pointe Financial Corporation, a Florida-based bank holding company for which Mr. McGinn was vice chairman and an investor.

Mr. McGinn did not return a call to his office seeking comment. Mr. McArdle said Mr. Bruno directed the investment in Mr. McGinn's company not out of any favoritism, but because "interest rates at that time were around 1 or 2 percent, and this promised a much better rate of return."

'Yes, I'm Guilty' Say Two Morial Cohorts (NOTP)

By Gordon Russell, And Frank Donze%%par%%staff Writers

New Orleans Times-Picayune, January 16, 2007

BARRÉ, DeCAY ADMIT TO CONSPIRACY, FRAUD CHARGES

A yearslong federal probe into a conspiracy by key associates of former Mayor Marc Morial to skim more than $1 million from city contracts took a sudden and stunning turn Sunday with guilty pleas from the two most important remaining defendants.

With the case set for trial on Tuesday, political operative Stan "Pampy" Barré, a restaurateur, and Kerry DeCay, the city's former director of property management, entered an all-but-vacant federal courthouse Sunday morning to admit lead roles in a scheme to loot a massive energy-management contract awarded by Morial in the twilight of his eight years in office.

The collapse of Barré's and DeCay's defense, two days before trial, followed the defection late Friday of fellow defendant Reginald Walker, a construction company owner. Earlier, eight other defendants had pleaded guilty and agreed to testify for the government, among them Terry Songy, an employee of Johnson Controls Inc., the Milwaukee-based company that Morial hired under the terms of a 20-year, $81 million contract to help the city save money on energy bills.

Barré and DeCay pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy, mail fraud and obstruction of justice, which carry maximum cumulative sentences of 20 years in prison and restitution of up to twice the value of goods and money that they obtained in the scheme.

Their acquiescence makes it unlikely that they will receive maximum penalties. Sentencing for the two, as well as Walker, is set for April 18 before U.S. Judge Carl Barbier. The trial of the remaining defendant, glass and door company owner Julius "Jay" Lips Jr., was postponed by Barbier at the request of prosecutors, who want to reassess the case in light of the guilty pleas.

The government believes a new trial centering on Lips -- who is accused of playing a minor role in the conspiracy, giving a $2,600 glass dining table to DeCay in exchange for a contract and then lying to investigators about it -- could be completed in a day.

Prosecutors made clear in their summaries of the proceedings against Barré and DeCay that the probe is not over, however. The documents say that Barré used his "connections or perceived connections" to Morial to demand contracts he didn't deserve. They also name other Morial insiders, including businessman Robert Tucker, lawyer Roy Rodney and financier Rafael "Ray" Valdes, claiming they were paid large sums of otherwise unearned money because of their relationships with Morial, now president of the National Urban League and living in New York City.

The probe, which at one point led to federal agents breaking down the door during a raid on the French Quarter home of Morial's brother, Jacques Morial, had spawned lively debate as to whether Morial was the ultimate target. The talk only increased when Morial's uncle, investment banker Glenn Haydel, who is now in prison, pleaded guilty to bilking the Regional Transit Authority of $540,000. Haydel's wife, Lillian Haydel Smith, is also awaiting sentencing for unrelated offenses in connection with her brokering of school system insurance.

While U.S. Attorney Jim Letten has tried to discourage the media from focusing on Morial and his possible exposure, he made clear Sunday that the former mayor looms large in the mind of federal prosecutors. For perhaps the first time, Letten took a public swipe at the former mayor, saying that the defendants in the Johnson Controls case drew their power to land or control public contracts from their association with Morial.

Still, he cautioned reporters not to read too much into the government's mention of Morial in its summary of the charges to which Barré and DeCay pleaded guilty.

"This should not suggest either that anything will be forthcoming or will not be forthcoming in the future," he said. "It simply states a fact that is critical to our case, and that is: These guys got their juice from trading on their associations with the former mayor. That was critical to the leverage that they influenced. Now, I'd ask you not to draw any further inferences from that. But simply stay tuned."

Star witness appears

Barré and DeCay had steadfastly maintained their innocence since their indictment in June 2005. As recently as a few days ago, Barré was expressing confidence in his odds of avoiding conviction.

But everything changed Friday, when Walker pleaded guilty and agreed to testify about his cohorts' roles in the scheme. With his plea deal, Walker was poised to become a second star witness for Letten's office, which already had wrung guilty pleas from Songy, the former Johnson Controls project manager, and a half-dozen more marginal players.

Attired in dark suits, Barré, 61, and DeCay, 47, maintained their composure as they stood before Barbier to offer their pleas and answer a series of questions establishing that they fully understood their rights and the potential penalties they face.

Barré, the longtime proprietor of Pampy's, the popular 7th Ward eatery on North Broad Street, maintained customary flair by winking at a familiar face as he walked into court and greeting another bystander with his trademark salutation, "Where y'at, baby?"

When Barbier asked Barré whether he fully understood the criminal charges he had agreed to plead to, Barre replied, "Yes, I'm guilty."

DeCay, who received a kidney transplant about a year ago, spent a portion of his time before the judge outlining the daily regimen of "44 pills" he is required to take, as well as the medical device he uses to manage sleep apnea.

Both DeCay and Barré left the commentary to their lawyers, who kept their remarks brief.

"Mr. Barré regrets that he has troubled other people and he will accept whatever punishment he gets," said Jack Martzell, Barré's lawyer.

Arthur "Buddy" Lemann, DeCay's normally colorful attorney, was subdued.

"My client decided it was in his best interest and in the best interest of his wife and young daughter to end this ordeal by 'fessing up to his wrongdoing and asking the court for mercy," Lemann said.

Outside the courthouse, Letten and his first assistant, Jan Mann, said they thought the plea deals by DeCay and Barré reflected the overwhelming nature of the government's case.

They said they hoped the pleas would send a message about the price of dishonest government in a city whose moribund economy owes in part to its reputation for sleazy business dealings.

Letten said the convictions "laid bare . . . the type of corruption which has gutted this city and has kept this city from attracting and keeping industry and business and has made this city, I think, in large measure what it is today."

The convictions, Letten said, should also put the lie to allegations -- made most recently by Lemann, and in the past by Morial supporters, including a group of clergy -- that the federal investigation was rooted in racial or political bias. Letten, a Republican and a career federal prosecutor, was appointed to his post by President George Bush. Morial ran as a Democrat. The defendants who were to have faced trial on Tuesday were African-American, with the exception of Lips, who is white.

"I hope this puts to rest what were the ill-considered, inappropriate, unprofessional and inflammatory comments by defense counsel who, in order to get a few cheap points, claimed during the pendency of this case that this investigation, this prosecution was politically and racially motivated, which it was certainly not," Letten said. "The citizens can see now that this investigation was backed up by powerful evidence of abject corruption."

Mann, the lead prosecutor on the Johnson Controls case, said investigators hope to use the time saved by the cancellation of the trial -- and the cooperation promised by Barré, DeCay and Walker -- to pursue further leads in the case.

"There were some areas that we wanted to investigate after the trial was over," she said. "So, now we have some time on our hands when we thought we were going to be in court. And with their cooperation, we hope to go some other places with it."

She reserved some stinging words for DeCay and Morial, though she did not name either. Both, she suggested, had been derelict in their duties as public officials.

Of DeCay, Mann said: "We have a public official who was more concerned with what he was going to get out of the deals than getting the best deal for the city," which wound up costing the city millions.

Without saying how much involvement she thought Morial had in the deals, she said that "politicians ought to hire honest people, and they ought to refuse to reward their friends when they don't deserve contracts."

She added: "Companies ought to not have to come to New Orleans and pay off friends of politicians to get contracts. That's not the way it's supposed to work. And the politicians, if they find out their friends are doing it, they ought to say, 'I'm not going to hang with you any more if that's the way you're going to operate.' They ought to tell the contractors: 'No one has influence over me; it's who's the best person to get the job.' "

More indictments?

The summaries of the government's cases against DeCay and Barré offer some clues to the "other places" Mann said she hopes to take the investigation.

The only people mentioned in the summaries who have not been indicted are Morial, Rodney, Tucker and Valdes.

It was Valdes who brought the Johnson Controls deal to City Hall and also arranged financing for the city, netting about $2.1 million in fees.

Tucker served as chairman of the RTA during Morial's tenure in office, and also was one of the mayor's closest advisers.

Rodney functioned as the closest thing to an in-house lawyer for members of Morial's inner circle, helping to incorporate businesses for members of the group and serving as counsel for the Morial-led political organization, LIFE. City-related work included serving as a lawyer for the Housing Authority of New Orleans.

The case summary says that Rodney shared in the proceeds from a $10,000-per-month fee Barré received from Walker in exchange for helping Walker land a city recycling contract. The prosecution has characterized the fee as a kickback.

The summary says that Tucker and Valdes, meanwhile, each received fees from Johnson Controls worth $273,000 that were awarded strictly on the basis of their "influence and perceived influence" with Morial. Tucker also received a $90,000 contract for project management.

DOJ_NMG_0116527

Barré requested a similar contract, and received one, upon hearing about the deals landed by Valdes and Tucker, the summary says.

Tucker called the prosecution's assertion, which is signed by Barré, "totally false."

"I was not paid for my influence," Tucker said Sunday. "I was compensated for services rendered, as were other professionals."

Walter Becker, Valdes' lawyer, said he had no comment Sunday.

Eddie Castaing, Rodney's lawyer, said he did not want to comment until he had a chance to read the plea agreements and the case summaries filed by the government.

Barré seen as ringleader

In its summary of the case, and in previous court filings, prosecutors portrayed Barré, who held no official position in the Morial administration, as the ringleader of the scheme to loot the Johnson Controls contract, the largest let by Morial.

Barré took in more than $800,000 in fees and kickbacks but did little or no work, prosecutors have said. DeCay received about $100,000, according to a government news release.

DeCay, whose friendship with Barré dates to 1980s, when both began serving as deputies to another member of the extended Morial political family, Orleans Parish Civil Sheriff Paul Valteau, comes across in various court filings as a subordinate who took his instructions from Barré. "DeCay deferred to Barré on whatever Barré wanted done," the summary says.

For instance, while all of the work performed by Johnson Controls was supposed to reduce the city's energy costs, DeCay told the contractor that he wanted it to perform some nonenergy work, the case summary says. Those jobs -- improvements to the Municipal Auditorium and the Theatre of Performing Arts -- were done solely for the benefit of Barré, the exclusive food and beverage concessionaire for the two buildings, the document says.

Barré was able to steer the $2.5 million subcontract for that work to Moss Creek Development, the construction firm owned by Walker, a longtime friend. Not only did the work by Moss Creek benefit Barré directly, he and the others involved, including Songy, DeCay and Walker, conspired to inflate invoices to overstate the value of the work. Barré then directed Walker to pay him kickbacks, the summary says, some of which he split with DeCay and Songy.

"Barré told Walker that if they were ever questioned about the payments they would say they were consulting fees," the summary says. "The money was not for consulting but rather was paid because Reginald Walker was concerned that he would not get future business if he did not pay off Barré," according to the summary.

The case summary makes clear that the Johnson Controls contract isn't the only one investigators believe was abused by Morial's inner circle.

The summary notes that in a parallel case, Walker -- who had no experience in recycling or trash hauling -- was given a portion of the city's recycling contract through the primary vendor Browning-Ferris Industries. The deal was worth $20,000 per month, for which Walker initially "was performing no work," the summary says.

Barré told Walker he had gotten him the contract and requested that Walker share the money with him, the summary says. In turn, Barré split the $10,000 monthly fee with Rodney, a partner with Barré in numerous ventures, as laid out in an agreement between the two that prosecutors released in a court filing last week.

While the case summaries portray Barré's skimming of the Johnson Controls deal as limited to the Moss Creek subcontract, DeCay admits to having shaken down a number of other subcontractors, with Songy's help.

Songy and DeCay received kickbacks or gifts from Specialty Machine Service, Golden Hammer Construction, National Contractor Services and G&M Electric, the summary says. Those gifts ranged from the $600 pool pump G&M Electric gave DeCay to the $30,000 in cash that both received from National Contractor Services.

The owners of all four of those companies, along with two others, have already pleaded guilty to felony counts. They were expected to testify for the government in the trial of Barré and DeCay.

. . . . . .

Gordon Russell can be reached at grussell@timespicayune.com or (504) 826-3347. Frank Donze can be reached at fdonze@timespicayune.com or (504) 826-3328.

Pipe Bomb Found On Truck Driven By Witness (MH)

By Evan S. Benn

The Miami Herald, January 16, 2007

A potential plot to assassinate a federal witness was thwarted Sunday when police dismantled a pipe bomb strapped to the witness' pickup truck.

The man, who was not identified, noticed the device while he was driving around Hialeah, FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said. He drove to the Hialeah Police Department and alerted officers Sunday afternoon.

DOJ_NMG_0116528

"He saw something on the car and went right to the police station," Orihuela said.

The Miami-Dade bomb squad, summoned to the site, detonated the device. Then officers combed the police station's parking lot, the pickup truck and surrounding areas for evidence.

The remnants of the bomb, with wires and what looked to be gun ammunition, were visible on the ground. The pickup truck was towed from the police station, at 5555 E. Eighth Ave., at about 6:30 p.m.

Orihuela would not disclose the witness' identity or details about the case.

Homemade pipe bombs have caused alarm before in South Florida.

· In June 2005, a 15-inch cylinder containing gunpowder was found underneath the car of James Kelly, the Palm Beach County School District police chief.

· In April 2003, a judge sentenced a Lake Placid man to 42 years in federal prison for planting a pipe bomb under the car of his ex-girlfriend in Marathon. Gene Hodler, now 71, was convicted after a pipe bomb detonated under Evon Leach's Saturn sedan, badly injuring her.

· In August 2001, an inmate used a recorded jailhouse telephone to try to set up a pipe bomb attack to kill Miami-Dade Circuit Judge Peter Lopez. Bryant Williams was convicted for his plot to have nail-filled bombs placed under Lopez's car.

FBI: Bomb Found Fixed To Federal Witness' Car (BRAH)

The Bradenton Herald, January 16, 2007

HIALEAH - A pipe bomb was found Sunday attached to the car of a federal witness and later detonated without incident, authorities said.

The witness drove his vehicle to the Hialeah police headquarters after noticing the device, FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said.

"He was driving around," she said. "He somehow saw something on his car that was suspicious and drove it to the Hialeah Police Department."

The Miami-Dade bomb squad detonated the device, and the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force was investigating, Orihuela said.

No additional details about the witness or vehicle were released. It was unclear if the device was removed from the vehicle before being detonated.

Hialeah and Miami-Dade police referred calls to the FBI.

Selling Coca-Cola's Secrets To Pepsi? (AP)

By HARRY R. WEBER, THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, January 16, 2007

That's what prosecutors say ex-secretary aimed to do

ATLANTA -- Prosecutors say a former Coca-Cola secretary took confidential documents from the beverage giant and samples of products that hadn't been launched with the aim of selling them to rival Pepsi. Her lawyer says she was duped by two ex-cons and didn't commit a crime.

A jury will be asked to determine who is telling the truth. The process of selecting that jury starts today in Joya Williams' trial.

Williams, who was fired as an administrative assistant to The Coca-Cola Co.'s global brand director after the alleged scheme came to light last summer, faces up to 10 years in prison if convicted of conspiracy.

Williams, Edmund Duhaney and Ibrahim Dimson were indicted on the single federal charge, accused of stealing new product samples and confidential documents from Atlanta-based Coca-Cola and trying to sell them to Purchase, N.Y.-based PepsiCo Inc.

The alleged plans were foiled after Pepsi warned Coca-Cola in May, and an undercover FBI investigation was launched.

Dimson and Duhaney have pleaded guilty and are awaiting sentencing. Duhaney is expected to testify against Williams, though it is unclear if Dimson will.

The two men served prison terms at the same time at a federal penitentiary in Montgomery, Ala. Duhaney served nearly five years of a seven-year sentence on a cocaine charge before being released in 2005; Dimson served less than a year of a two-year sentence on a bank fraud charge before his release in 2004.

Williams' lawyer, Janice Singer, said she plans to make the two men's credibility a key issue in her client's defense. Williams does not have a criminal record, another attorney who previously represented her has said.

DOJ_NMG_0116529

"The case is about two felons who manipulated and used my client without her knowledge," Singer said. "She did not take any documents she believed to be trade secrets to share with these people or to harm Coke and benefit Pepsi, nor did she intentionally, knowingly give them any documents."

Singer said that Williams was allowed to take home documents from her job. She suggested that Dimson and Duhaney stole the materials from her.

"We're not denying that she possessed them, but we are denying that she conspired with the other defendants to do anything nefarious or wrong," Singer said.

However, prosecutors say they have a strong case. That includes video surveillance showing Williams at her desk at Coke headquarters going through multiple files looking for documents and stuffing them into bags, according to court records. She also was observed holding a liquid container with a white label, which resembled the description of a new product sample, before placing it into her personal bag, prosecutors say.

The prosecution says a box containing two undisclosed product samples and other confidential company papers were found in Duhaney's home during a search on July 5, the day all three were arrested.

Questions Raised In Probe Of Anello That Began In 2004 (BUFFNEWS)

By DAN HERBECK And GAIL FRANKLIN, News Staff Reporters

Buffalo News, January 15, 2007

With no charges filed, mayor wonders about status of investigation

NIAGARA FALLS - More than three years ago, Mayor Vince Anello accepted a series of no-interest loans from Joseph "Smokin' Joe" Anderson, a prominent cigarette merchant who was developing projects in the city.

FBI agents and the U.S. attorney's office began investigating the $40,000 in loans around May 2004, and Anello and Anderson hired high-profile defense lawyers to represent them. Since then, there have been no indictments or charges. There also have been no statements from law enforcement officials announcing that the investigation is over or that the government has decided against charging anyone.

Now, like many other people in Niagara Falls, Anello still wonders where the investigation is heading.

"I have cooperated with all requests for information. No additional information has been requested of me in 17 months," Anello told The Buffalo News last week. "I have discussed this matter publicly many times."

The region's lead attorney for the Justice Department, U.S. Attorney Terrance P. Flynn, said the investigation is continuing.

No decision has been made yet on whether to file charges against Anello, Anderson or anyone else, Flynn said.

"It's our job to take the time and make sure that we don't accuse somebody [of] a crime until we have all the sufficient, admissible information we need," Flynn said. "We're dealing with a public official who is well-known."

According to several law enforcement officials, some members of the FBI-led Public Corruption Task Force have been upset with Flynn's office over what they see as exceedingly slow movement on the Anello case.

More than a month ago, the officials said, one of the lead FBI agents in the Anello probe resigned from the task force in disgust, requesting and receiving a new work assignment in the Buffalo area.

"[The agent] felt that he turned up some important information, but the U.S. attorney wasn't moving on it," said one source close to the case. "[The agent] felt like this and other cases involving politicians were dead in the water."

Flynn and Buffalo FBI spokesman Paul M. Moskal declined to comment, except in general terms.

"The decision on whether to prosecute rests with the U.S. attorney," Moskal said. "There is give and take in any relationship between investigators and prosecutors. Sometimes, there are disagreements on the best avenues to take, but that doesn't mean that the public isn't being served."

Flynn said any personnel changes among investigators should remain internal.

"That's [the FBI's] business as to why an agent comes or goes. I don't know anything about that," Flynn said. "If they have a case to present to us, our door is always open . . . There's not one bit of reluctance in this office to prosecute public corruption cases."

Flynn and the FBI say investigations into government corruption are a high priority in Western New York. But no significant government corruption indictments have been announced in Buffalo since November 2005, when the FBI held a news conference to announce the creation of its task force.

Debating the probe

Anello, 60, has been mayor since 2004, and his term runs to the end of this year. Many Falls residents wonder if he will seek re-election. Campaigning for the job is likely to begin in April, and Anello has not yet disclosed his plans.

At Gadawski's tavern on Falls Street, a popular watering hole for politicians and city workers, the 86-year-old proprietor, Edward Gadawski, said patrons often debate the FBI probe and Anello.

"I think Vince will run again, [but] I'm sure he's had some sleepless nights over this thing," said Art Garabedian, a businessman who has been a friend of Anello for nearly 40 years.

"A lot of people have been questioning why doesn't the FBI either step up to the plate or drop the issue altogether? If there's nothing there, clear the man," Garabedian said.

Garabedian said the loans Anderson gave Anello "might have just been loans between friends."

At the same time, he said, he understands how the arrangement could sound "kind of fishy" to the FBI.

Councilman Robert Anderson Jr. said he is concerned that publicity about the long-standing investigation - including a 2005 story in the New York Times - has hurt the image of Niagara Falls and its leaders.

"They stereotype Niagara Falls as being corrupt, and people mention that all the time," said Anderson, who was appointed the Council's new chairman this month. "They talk about Niagara Falls and say, "I'm not going to go up there to do any business.' They have fear."

Anderson said he and other Council members would have liked to have known all about Anello's private business dealings with Joseph Anderson when they voted on some of his development projects before the Anello investigation was made public.

The councilman is not related to Joseph Anderson.

"We were blindfolded when we first came in and when we voted the first three months [of 2004] on a lot of things that happened with Smokin' Joe Anderson and others," Robert Anderson said. "And then we find out that they were done underhanded or maybe during shady conditions."

Frank Smith, owner of Third Street Liquors, says he thinks the investigation has hurt downtown development.

He's surprised that recent improvements haven't brought in any chain restaurants or much new development over the last couple of years.

"When comments are made that developers are playing a wait-and-see game, I think that's true," said Smith.

Mary Jo Zacher, president of the Pine Avenue Business Association, paints a different picture of the business climate in another area of the city.

"I don't think the mayor being investigated has affected anyone's business, especially on Pine Avenue," she said. "In the beginning, maybe people were in an uproar about it, but people aren't talking about it anymore."

Denies special treatment

Anello has admitted that in 2003, Joseph Anderson gave him $40,000 in a series of interest-free loans. Anello said he needed cash to pay off some business debts for an electrical contracting company he ran.

But he also said Anderson stepped in to help as an old friend and never received any special treatment for his businesses in the city. Those businesses include two hotels, a bar, a pedestrian mall and an indoor playground known as Smokin' Joe's Family Fun Center.

"I haven't done anything wrong, and I haven't been charged with anything," the mayor said.

The mayor's critics say Anderson did receive benefits, including a 30-year, no-bid lease to operate the pedestrian mall on prime downtown land, a government grant to renovate his bar and a low-interest business loan.

But in building a criminal case against the mayor or Anderson, authorities said, prosecutors would have to prove that benefits given to Anderson were the paybacks from his loans to Anello. That kind of evidence can be difficult to obtain.

Joseph Anderson's attorney, Terrence M. Connors, said authorities have never told him Anderson is a target of their investigation.

"Early on, well over a year ago, [Anderson] was interviewed. He provided the information he had to the best of his knowledge," Connors said. "We haven't heard anything since."

Anello's attorney, Joel L. Daniels, could not be reached.

Has Anello repaid any of the $40,000 that Anderson lent him more than three years ago? The mayor declined to answer.

"It's a matter of my business," he said.

The Legal Tangles Of Data Collection (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

When it comes to data collection, federal laws often have been outpaced by technology, critics say. And sometimes, the executive branch carves out its own exception.

Take eavesdropping.

U.S. law requires that law enforcement officials obtain a warrant to tap someone's phone or intercept e-mail. But President Bush, drawing on decades-old precedent, asserts that he has "inherent authority" to authorize agents to intercept electronic communications without a warrant in the interest of national security.

That is the rationale underpinning the National Security Agency's warrantless-wiretapping program. The new Democratic-run Congress has vowed to renew scrutiny of this program and others that involve collection and analysis of Americans' personal data.

Under the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and Title III of the 1968 Omnibus Crime Control & Safe Streets Act, if the government wants to listen in on phone calls, it must have a warrant or wiretap order showing probable cause that the target is involved in criminal activity or in foreign intelligence or terrorist activity. A later law extended that standard to electronic communications.

But months after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, Bush secretly issued an executive order authorizing warrantless electronic intercepts for national security purposes -- even on U.S. citizens, as long as one party is suspected to be outside the country. This action is at the heart of several lawsuits against the government and telecommunications companies alleged to be collaborating with the government, charging that such eavesdropping is unlawful.

E-mail is a slightly different matter. The law makes a distinction between intercepting e-mail in transit and obtaining stored e-mail from a service provider's servers. The distinction made sense in the 1980s and early 1990s when downloaded e-mail often sat only on the user's computer. If the government wanted the records, it had to go to the e-mail recipient.

These days, most e-mail is held and stored by third parties. So the government claims the authority to read someone's most intimate communications, including stored chat sessions, by serving a subpoena -- no probable cause required. A person may never even know that this has been done, as there is no legal requirement for an Internet service provider to provide notice. In most cases where the government subpoenas the e-mail, it demands that the third party keep that fact confidential, at least for a while.

The same holds true for virtually any information held by a third party: phone company records that indicate who called you, when they called and how long the call lasted; Internet service provider records on what Web sites you visited, when and for how long; tollbooth records; security camera footage; records of emergency calls made from a car; supermarket purchase records. All that and more can be requested by the government with a search warrant, or sometimes with an administrative subpoena or other demand, frequently without judicial review.

Since the Sept. 11 attacks, the government also has vastly increased its power to obtain Americans' private financial, phone-call and Internet-transaction data using national security letters, which do not need the imprimatur of a prosecutor, grand jury or judge. They receive no review after the fact by the Justice Department or Congress. The FBI issues more than 30,000 a year, The Washington Post reported in 2005. And the Pentagon issues its own version, the New York Times reported on Sunday.

Such data can be helpful to law enforcement agents, but sometimes mistakes are made. Last fall, an Internet provider mismatched a customer and an IP address, resulting in a guns-drawn raid by a child-porn squad on a farmer in rural Virginia.

The bottom line, privacy experts say, is that more and more personal data are being stored on the Internet and in databases over which individuals have little or no control. Increasingly, the government, the private sector and criminals are looking for ways to exploit those data. And the laws, the experts say, are not squarely on the citizens' side.

Descending To New Depths (column) (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, January 15, 2007

New Orleans

I was surprised recently by a sudden shift in the tone of a veteran cabdriver, Stanley Taylor, who had been kind enough to take me on a nearly four-hour tour of the flood-wrecked regions of the city.

For most of the afternoon, Mr. Taylor had been wonderfully informative and polite, and his comments had been filled with sympathy for those who had lost so much to Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath.

But as we headed back to my hotel, and darkness began to fall over the eerily still neighborhoods, his tone became unmistakably bitter. We had been talking casually about the thousands of extremely poor evacuees, most of them black, who were still stranded outside New Orleans, some of them scattered to the far reaches of the United States.

Mr. Taylor, who is black, snapped that maybe it would be better if some of them didn't come back. "The poor people that's gone," he said, "they're gonna have to stay gone. That's where all the crime was coming from, see? Folks here want people to come back, but they want people with money to come back. The criminals? Shame on 'em. Sorry for 'em."

During the immediate post-Katrina period, there were essentially two visions of a resurgent New Orleans. One, widely decried as racist, saw the new, improved New Orleans as smaller, whiter and more prosperous.

DOJ_NMG_0116532

This was openly advocated. Just a few days after the storm, a wealthy member of the city's power elite, James Reiss, told The Wall Street Journal: "Those who want to see this city rebuilt want to see it done in a completely different way: demographically, geographically and politically."

Mr. Reiss, who is white and served in Mayor C. Ray Nagin's administration as chairman of the Regional Transit Authority (he has since left the government), said that he and many of his colleagues would leave town if New Orleans did not become a city with better services and fewer poor people.

An alternative (and more widely desired) model of the city coincided with the approach that President Bush seemed to be taking when he made his dramatic appearance in floodlit Jackson Square in mid-September 2005. Mr. Bush promised not just to help rebuild New Orleans, but to confront the long-simmering problems of race and poverty with "bold action."

Supporters of this approach envisioned an effort that would bring desperately needed assistance to the hurricane victims, helping to get them housed and back on their feet, while at the same time constructively engaging the contentious issues that have kept America's blacks and whites in a state of perpetual hostility, and much of the poor in an all-but-permanent morass of ignorance and deprivation.

What is actually happening is worse than anyone had imagined.

New Orleans is a mess. It was brought to its knees by Katrina, and is being kept there by a toxic combination of federal neglect and colossal, mind-numbing ineptitude at the local level.

The police department here is a sour joke, and crime is out of control. More than 16 months after the storm, children roam the streets with impunity during school hours. Debris still covers much of the city. Doctors, hospitals and mental-health facilities are in woefully short supply. Thousands of residents are still living in trailers, and many thousands more are stuck more or less permanently out of town.

The result is that blacks and whites, feeling unsafe physically and frightened by the long-term prospect of dwindling opportunities, are eyeing the exits.

Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu, who lost the mayoral race last May to Mr. Nagin, offered a grim assessment. While the ethnic breakdown may remain roughly the same, he said, the city is on its way to becoming "smaller, poorer and worse than it was before."

Class, at the moment, is trumping race, which is how Mr. Reiss and Mr. Taylor, the cabdriver, came unwittingly to similar stereotyped conclusions. Unless the foundations of a livable city can be put in place — and they are not being put in place now — those with the ability to leave will do so. The poor, neglected as always, will be left behind.

"The same thing is moving African-Americans as is moving whites," Mr. Landrieu said. "Everyone is asking: 'Is it safe? What's the school situation? Can my kids play outside? What does the future hold for them?' "

Without a creative new plan and energetic new leadership, New Orleans will be unable to save itself. Right now it's a city sinking to ever more tragic depths.

The Mentally Ill, Behind Bars (NYT)

By Bernard E. Harcourt

The New York Times, January 15, 2007

Chicago

LAST August, a prison inmate in Jackson, Mich. — someone the authorities described as "floridly psychotic" — died in his segregation cell, naked, shackled to a concrete slab, lying in his own urine, scheduled for a mental health transfer that never happened. Last month in Florida, the head of the state's social services department resigned abruptly after having been fined $80,000 and is facing criminal contempt charges for failing to transfer severely mentally ill jail inmates to state hospitals.

Ten days ago, the Supreme Court agreed to determine when mentally ill death row inmates should be considered so deranged that their execution would be constitutionally impermissible. The case involves a 48-year-old Navy veteran who is a diagnosed schizophrenic. In the decade leading up to the crime he was hospitalized 14 times for severe mental illness.

According to a study released by the Justice Department in September, 56 percent of jail inmates in state prisons and 64 percent of inmates across the country reported mental health problems within the past year.

Though troubling, none of this should come as a surprise. Over the past 40 years, the United States dismantled a colossal mental health complex and rebuilt — bed by bed — an enormous prison. During the 20th century we exhibited a schizophrenic relationship to deviance.

After more than 50 years of stability, federal and state prison populations skyrocketed from under 200,000 persons in 1970 to more than 1.3 million in 2002. That year, our imprisonment rate rose above 600 inmates per 100,000 adults. With the inclusion of an additional 700,000 inmates in jail, we now incarcerate more than two million people — resulting in the highest incarceration number and rate in the world, five times that of Britain and 12 times that of Japan.

DOJ_NMG_0116533

What few people realize, though, is that in the 1940s and '50s we institutionalized people at even higher rates — only it was in mental hospitals and asylums. Simply put, when the data on state and county mental hospitalization rates are combined with the data on prison rates for 1928 through 2000, the imprisonment revolution of the late 20th century barely reaches the level we experienced at mid-century. Our current culture of control is by no means new.

The graph on the left — based on statistics from the federal Census Bureau, Department of Health and Human Services and Bureau of Justice Statistics — shows the aggregate rate of institutionalization per 100,000 adults in the United States from 1928 to 2000, as well as the disaggregated trend lines for mental hospitalization on the one hand and state and federal prisons on the other.

The numbers include only state and county mental hospitals. There were many more kinds of mental institutions at mid-century, ones for "mental defectives and epileptics" and the mentally retarded, psychiatric wards in veterans hospitals, as well as "psychopathic" and private mental hospitals. If we include residents of those facilities, from 1935 to 1963 the United States consistently institutionalized at rates well above 700 per 100,000 adults — with highs of 778 in 1939 and 786 in 1955. It should be clear why there is such a large proportion of mentally ill persons in our prisons: individuals who used to be tracked for mental health treatment are now getting a one-way ticket to jail.

Of course, there are important demographic differences between the two populations. In 1937, women represented 48 percent of residents in state mental hospitals. In contrast, new prison admissions have consistently been 95 percent male. Also, the mental health patients from the 1930s to the 1960s were older and whiter than prison inmates of the 1990s.

But the graph poses a number of troubling questions: Why did we diagnose deviance in such radically different ways over the course of the 20th century? Do we need to be imprisoning at such high rates, or were we right, 50 years ago, to hospitalize instead? Why were so many women hospitalized? Why have they been replaced by young black men? Have both prisons and mental hospitals included large numbers of unnecessarily incarcerated individuals?

Whatever the answers, the pendulum has swung too far — possibly off its hinges.

It would be naïve, today, to address any of these questions without also considering the impact of imprisonment on crime. One of the most reliable studies estimates that the increased prison population over the 1990s accounted for about a third of the overall drop in crime that decade.

However, prisons are not the only institutions that seem to have this effect. In a recent study, I demonstrated that the rate of institutionalization — including mental hospitals — was a far better predictor of serious violent crime from 1926 to 2000 than just prison populations. The data reveal a robust negative relationship between overall institutionalization (prisons and asylums) and homicide. Preliminary findings based on state-level panel data confirm these results.

The effect on crime may not depend on whether the institution is a mental hospital or a prison. Even from a crime-fighting perspective, then, it is time to rethink our prison and mental health policies. A lot more work must be done before proposing answers to those troubling questions. But the first step is to realize that we have been wildly erratic in our approach to deviance, mental health and the prison.

CIVIL LAW:

Who Pays For Protection? (WP)

By Cindy Skrzycki

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

For almost eight years, unions have been waiting for the Labor Department to finish writing rules that would make it clear that employers are supposed to pick up the tab for safety equipment for millions of workers.

Many companies already foot the bill for goggles, hard hats, ear plugs, mesh gloves, safety harnesses and other gear that they have been required to provide since 1994. But some industry sectors, including home building, poultry processing and construction, say a mandate requiring them to pay would be too open-ended.

Labor officials say the complicated nature of the issue, both legal and practical, has caused the delay. The unions claim the Bush administration has stalled because it is looking out for corporate interests.

So on Jan. 3, the AFL-CIO and the United Food and Commercial Workers Union filed suit in the U.S. Court of Appeals in the District to force the government to complete the long-postponed proposal.

"This is an uncomplicated rulemaking on a straightforward, but significant, issue of importance to worker safety and health," the suit says. It asks that the Occupational Safety and Health Administration be directed to complete the regulation within two months of a court order.

DOJ_NMG_0116534

The personal protective equipment industry includes manufacturers such as 3M and DuPont. It has sales of about $10 billion annually, according to the International Safety Equipment Association in Arlington. The government estimates the rule would cost businesses about $62 million a year.

The dispute has a long history. After the initial protective equipment rule was issued in 1994, it said employers had to provide various pieces of safety gear. But unlike a series of health-related OSHA standards, it didn't say who should foot the bill, and not every company did.

Northrop Grumman's Newport News Shipbuilding in Newport News, Va., for example, provides and pays for protective equipment for its 19,000 employees.

"We like consistency," said James Thornton, director of environmental health and safety for the shipyard, which builds and maintains aircraft carriers and submarines. "We prefer that we purchase them, provide them and train employees on the equipment."

The unions believe that lower-paid workers in industries such as poultry processing do not get the same deal.

There is a great deal of debate by some companies over such issues as what items are considered "tools of the trade" and are expected to be owned and paid for by employees, how replacement equipment is covered, what labor agreements might stipulate and whether the rule should cover temporary workers.

"It's the low-wage worker in forgotten industries" who is most affected, said Jacqueline Nowell, director of the occupational, safety and health office for the United Food and Commercial Workers Union.

Nowell said unions have been trying to force completion of the rule since it was proposed in 1999 because these workers sometimes have to pay at least part of the bill for items like wire-mesh gloves, which are used to protect their hands from being cut while processing chickens.

She said workers often go without protection if a glove is lost or stolen, or worn out equipment is used because they are uneasy about asking for a replacement.

OSHA said that spelling out that businesses must pay the bill would prevent an estimated seven deaths and 47,000 injuries a year among the 20 million covered workers. Mishaps still occur because of the use of worn-out or defective equipment, the agency said.

Richard L. Lobb, spokesman for the National Chicken Council in the District, said industry policy is to pay for the original set of protective equipment. When an item wears out, the employee must turn it in to receive a new one. In cases where equipment disappears, Lobb said, employees might be charged for a replacement.

"Obviously, this gives the employee the incentive to take care of equipment and not lose it or wear it out by using it outside the plant," he said. Employees who cannot afford items like wire-mesh gloves, which can cost up to $65, can have the cost deducted from their paychecks, he said.

Over the years, OSHA has issued various interpretations of the protective equipment rule, saying employers had to pay for the gear, too, except for safety shoes, prescription eyewear and logging boots.

The agency lost a key administrative challenge by Union Tank Car of Chicago in 1997. The ruling said OSHA could not make the company pay for welding gloves and special equipment to prevent workers' feet from being crushed.

This led the agency in 1999 to issue the proposal stating explicitly that employers are the financially responsible party.

The unions' recent complaint calls the agency's inability to issue a final rule "an egregious instance of unreasonable delay." OSHA has missed seven of its own deadlines for finishing the rule, despite pressure from congressional appropriators and Hispanic members of Congress to finish the job.

Labor Department officials said in an interview that the issue is complicated and that it is not uncommon for rulemakings to take longer than expected. The scheduled date for a final rule now is May.

"This is not simple," said Bryan Little, deputy assistant secretary for occupational safety and health. "Safety standards aren't always slam-dunks. It's incumbent on us to carefully review the record and come up with the best standard."

OSHA has issued 18,000 citations on the equipment rule since 1999, with violations such as not providing the equipment or not keeping items clean. Cost has not been an issue.

The agency's 2004 response to a query about the issue of who pays may explain why businesses and workers are confused about the rule. It said, in part: ". . . at the present time, OSHA does not view this section as imposing an enforceable obligation on employers to pay for personal protective equipment. Therefore, employees must be afforded the protection of personal protective equipment, regardless of who pays."

Cindy Skrzycki is a regulatory columnist for Bloomberg News. Her e-mail address is cskrzycki@bloomberg.net.

Tracking Outsourced Bonanzas (NYT)

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0116535

The new Congress is promising far tighter oversight of Bush administration spending programs, and few targets are more in need of scrutiny and daylight than the outsourcing of government programs to private contractors. This highly lucrative world quietly ballooned by 86 percent — to $377 billion annually — during the first five years of the Bush administration, according to Congressional estimates. Outsourced spending, on Iraq, Katrina and other bonanzas, has grown twice as fast as other discretionary spending, according to Representative Henry Waxman, the California Democrat who is chairman of the oversight and reform committee.

Mr. Waxman is fairly itching to finally map the waste, fraud and abuse in private contracting that went largely ignored by the previous Republican Congress. Taxpayers should wish him well.

In a preliminary glimpse, 118 contracts worth $745 billion were found by government auditors to be rife with questionable award procedures, mismanagement, overcharging and skimpy to nonexistent oversight. Full inquiries and public hearings are vital if the rich and shadowy world of privatization is ever to be plumbed for the scandal it is nurturing. Taxpayers have only a vague notion of what's gone on, mainly through reporting on the fantastic good fortune of Halliburton, Vice President Dick Cheney's former company, whose contracts increased a whopping 600 percent across five years as the Iraq war costs cascaded. Not incidentally, privatization has been a cash cow in stirring campaign donations from successful contractors.

According to one recent audit reported in The Washington Post, among 49 privatized contracts, three out of five were awarded noncompetitively, lacked oversight, and raised questions of legality. What's been going on out there? This question cries out for an answer from the new Congress.

Better Oversight Of Contractors (BOS)

By Allan Burman And Steven Kelman

The Boston Globe, January 16, 2007

THE NEW Congress will devote a great deal of time and energy to the problems surrounding federal contracting. As the seniormost procurement policy officials in the first Bush and the Clinton administrations, we both agree that this is a golden opportunity to launch a bipartisan effort to go beyond sensationalistic hearings and work constructively to improve a system that is responsible for spending 40 percent of the discretionary budget.

The system's problems need to be kept in perspective. Yes, there is significant cost growth on some weapons systems -- but studies have shown that cost growth on these averages is no greater than for large developmental private-sector infrastructure projects. Yes, new government information technology systems run into problems distressingly often -- but this occurs in the private sector as well, though such problems often don't become public. And, no, contractors are not robbing government blind -- publicly traded firms that report returns separately for government and commercial divisions almost always show lower returns on government than commercial business; in the recent prospectus for its spin off from Halliburton, KBR reported that its Middle East operations for government (basically its Iraq contracts) earned half the return on sales of the KBR unit that builds infrastructure for commercial clients.

Nonetheless, contracting should work better than it does. Congress and the administration should work to address the genuine problems the system faces.

First, it needs to bite the bullet and accept that there are not enough contracting and program management people to develop sound strategies for major procurements and then manage these contracts after award so they produce results and stay within reasonable cost. The procurement workforce was downsized by about a quarter during the 1990s, but this was accompanied by business process changes that reduced the need for people. During the last six years, requirements have increased and spending has grown by over 80 percent while the government contracting workforce has remained basically the same size. Even adding in some contractor support, there is no way this represents a good match of people and money.

Ironically, in the context of procurement crises involving Iraq and Hurricane Katrina, Congress has been willing to appropriate additional funds for staff to identify and investigate mistakes after they have been made -- but not to appropriate funds to hire contracting officers to prevent mistakes from being made in the first place: Almost 500 Inspector-General, General Accounting Office, and auditing staff were assigned to post-Katrina oversight (much though not all regarding contracting), while FEMA's total contracting staff nationwide numbered a mere 40.

Hiring contracting officials is hardly the way to dress for political success -- who wants to bring in more "bureaucrats"? -- but there can't be well-managed contracts without people to manage them. The current situation creates a vicious circle: Overstretched people make mistakes, producing demands for more rules, creating additional burdens, giving people even less time to plan effective procurements and manage performance.

Second, there needs to be a boost in workforce training programs -- especially those geared for the new generation agencies are now hiring -- which provide the essential tools required for negotiating complex contracts and making sound business decisions. Many in the older generation were glorified clerks. Clerks can't run sophisticated efforts such as the Department of Homeland Security's Secure Border Initiative or computerizing case management at the FBI. Again, few political points are to be gained here -- training budgets are typically the first cut when budgets are constrained -- but such an attitude is penny-wise and pound-foolish. Congress should increase the percentage of revenues from General Service Administration sales that are used, according to statute, to fund training.

DOJ_NMG_0116536

Third, the balance between competition and speed needs to be rejiggered. In the 1990s, legislation and regulatory changes made it possible to award contracts quickly but competitively. Unfortunately, many program managers, reacting against the earlier system where it often took two or three years to award contracts, embraced speed but ignored competition. We don't want to go back to the old system, but we need to realize the streamlined competition vision central to 1990s-era reforms.

Fourth, there need to be better incentives for good contractor performance. Congress last year unfortunately let lapse a pilot project promoting experiments with "share-in-savings" contracting, where contractors are paid only as a proportion of savings their efforts generate for government, so large savings produce big payouts but no savings mean no payment. This incentive should be restored, and others should be promoted.

Finally, there needs to be a better balance between punishment and reward for civil servants. In the heated political and media environment currently surrounding contracting, many are terrified, believing mistakes get them pilloried while accomplishments are ignored. How would a corporate CEO behave if earnings shortfalls received wide publicity, but performance above expected earnings was ignored? This is not an environment encouraging civil servants to develop better business solutions, nor one enticing young people to consider jobs in government.

If the new Congress wants to show its commitment to fix contracting, it should do something out of character -- amid hearings exposing waste, fraud, and abuse, maybe a lonely one could be held giving career officials occasions to present innovations they have developed to get better value from contracting.

Yes, the federal contracting system suffers from a range of problems -- fiscal, procedural, and programmatic -- but the system itself isn't broken and can be repaired given appropriate attention and bipartisan support.

Allan Burman is president of Jefferson Solutions. Steven Kelman is professor of public management at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government. Both are former administrators of the Office of Federal Procurement Policy at the US Office of Management and Budget.

Oversight And Democrats: Easy, Now. (But Not Too Easy.) (USAT)

By Ross K. Baker

USA Today, January 16, 2007

"Oversight" has become one of the most widely heard words to ricochet around the national political sphere since the congressional elections. It's one of those peculiar terms that has two definitions that are essentially contradictory. Check out the definition in Webster's New World Dictionary:

·"Supervision, esp. when careful or vigilant," and

·"An unintentional, careless mistake or omission."

In the previous Congress, the second definition fit very nicely the reluctance of the Republican members to hold the Bush administration accountable on such issues as the Iraq war and energy policy. The new Democratic-led Congress will certainly favor the first definition. But while the Republicans in the last Congress resembled the clueless Inspector Clouseau in their approach to supervising the executive branch, could there be a danger that in their zeal, the Democrats will emulate instead the implacable Inspector Javert? Even worse, could it be a combination of both fictional gumshoes? Whatever the eventual result, the oversight hearings got off to a flying start in both houses last week with hearings on topics as diverse as Medicare drug benefits and the plight of Iraqi refugees.

The principle that it is an essential function of a legislative body to oversee the operations of the executive is one that was established by at least the beginning of 17th century Britain where the Parliament functioned as the "grand inquest of the nation." Congress took this inheritance seriously and in 1792, investigated the Indian massacre in Ohio of more than 600 U.S. Army soldiers under Gen. Arthur St. Clair's command and scores of women and children.

Despite the fact that it was controlled by President Washington's own Federalist faction, Congress aggressively challenged Washington's refusal to provide materials on the military debacle. The episode seemed to establish that, irrespective of whether Congress was in the hands of the president's party or the political opposition, the bedrock principle of separation of powers required the House and Senate to ask tough questions of the executive branch. If the White House balked, Congress issued subpoenas to get those answers.

Unlike these earlier congresses, when principled commitment to checks and balances prompted legislators to challenge presidents of their own party, the outgoing Congress acted as a cat's-paw for the Bush administration. The role of "Congress Whisperer" went to Vice President Cheney, whose intimidating appearances on Capitol Hill underscored the president's wish to have Republicans in Congress ask few questions. Regarding Cheney's appearances at the Senate's Tuesday GOP policy lunches, Vermont Democrat Patrick Leahy said, "There is not a lot of dissent that goes on in that room. In 32 years in the Senate, I have never seen a Congress roll over and play dead like this one."

DOJ_NMG_0116537

It is, however, the quality of oversight more than its quantity that is the test of a well-ordered Congress. Democrats are itching to begin ferreting out waste, inefficiency and misdeeds in the executive branch, but they may be less zealous when oversight requires them to change some of their own inefficiencies.

One test of congressional Democrats' sincerity will be to follow the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission and bring into some semblance of order the committees that have jurisdiction over national intelligence agencies.

The enforcement mechanism for oversight is Congress' constitutional power of the purse: Do your job right and you get your money; tolerate corruption or inefficiency, and your appropriation gets cut. But placing oversight responsibilities in one set of committees and spending power in another has been a recipe for confusion in a vital area of national security in which the lines of responsibility ought to be clear and straight. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., has taken a partial step by creating a new intelligence subcommittee, but its power to make spending decisions is limited. In the Senate, no steps have been taken to align oversight and spending.

Another potential problem in oversight is excess zeal, and legitimate questions can be raised about overdoing oversight. Chris Carney, a Democrat, is a former active-duty military intelligence officer who was just elected as a House member from Pennsylvania. He has raised the warning about a congressional probe of pre-Iraq war intelligence failures, saying that such an investigation would burden the CIA and other agencies at the very time that their vigilance is crucial.

"Let's win the war first, then maybe look at how we got into it," Carney told The New York Times. It is true that past exercises of congressional oversight, such as the notorious Army-McCarthy hearings of the 1950s, damaged the institutions they probed, and Carney is correct in urging caution, especially in avoiding the peril of using oversight to settle political scores.

Tempted as the Democrats might be to launch numerous fishing expeditions as payback for years of GOP dominance and arrogance, Americans are sick of tit-for-tat politics.

Rep. Henry Waxman — whose House Committee on Government Reform has, in his own words, "jurisdiction over everything" — has promised to use oversight judiciously. "Doing oversight doesn't mean issuing subpoenas," he said. "It means trying to get information."

Waxman is a tough interrogator, but so much information over the past several years has been withheld that we can afford to tolerate some aggressive probing. The greater risk is the peril of being too passive.

Ross K. Baker is a political science professor at Rutgers University and author of Strangers on a Hill. He also is a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Bush: Honor King's Legacy By Helping All (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, January 16, 2007

Paint brush in hand, President Bush helped spruce up a high school Monday and tried to draw attention to a broader point — the value of community service on a day honoring the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.

"I encourage people all around the country to seize any opportunity they can to help somebody in need," Bush said from the library of Cardozo High, a predominantly poor, minority high school about 10 minutes from the White House.

"By helping somebody in need, you're honoring the legacy of Martin Luther King," the president said. "And by helping somebody in need, you're really helping yourself; you're lifting your soul."

Monday was a federal holiday for King, the slain civil rights leader who built a life around racial equality, nonviolent protest and public service.

Bush said people should treat the day as King's late wife, Coretta Scott King, wanted it. "It is not a day off," Bush said. "It's a day on."

In an unannounced visit, the president joined a community clean up project at Cardozo, where classes were not in session. A few hundred children, parents and local volunteers were at the school, many of them painting murals in the hallways to give the place a livelier look.

Bush, in rolled-up shirt sleeves, walked along a corridor and chatted up the volunteers, including Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

DOJ_NMG_0116538

Bush borrowed a paint brush dabbed in red ink, then carefully colored in the "B" of a stenciled drawing of "Ben's Chili Bowl." The local eatery is a Washington institution, known for its famous chili dogs and its rich history, including surviving the riots after King's assassination.

"Getting the drift of this thing here?" a smiling Bush asked as he painted, seeking approval of his technique. Volunteers nodded yes.

Upstairs in the school's library, children wrote hopeful letters to people in New Orleans who lives were devastated by Hurricane Katrina. The kids seemed unfazed by the presidential visit until Bush entered, and many jumped on chairs to get a glimpse of him as he thanked them.

Volunteers Take 'Day On' For King (WT)

By Natasha Altamirano

The Washington Times, January 16, 2007

Martin Luther King envisioned a world in which people of all backgrounds could work side by side toward a common goal.

That's why Greater D.C. Cares yesterday, on the civil rights leader's birthday, organized a beautification project at Lemon G. Hine Junior High School in Southeast.

The nonprofit service organization enlisted volunteers throughout the area to brighten the learning environment for the school's 400 students.

The event was one of thousands of service projects across the country commemorating the life of the civil rights leader through the Martin Luther King Day of Service.

"I can't think of a better place than our nation's capital to live out Dr. King's vision for the country," D.C. Council member Tommy Wells, Ward 6 Democrat, said during opening remarks to about 350 volunteers.

Siobhan Canty, president and chief executive officer of Greater D.C. Cares, said the goal of yesterday's event -- along with the organization's other service projects -- is twofold: to make a difference through hands-on labor and begin a dialogue among diverse volunteers.

"It's an opportunity to come together and learn about each other," Ms. Canty said. "We always have to remember that Dr. King's legacy is racial equality and social justice."

Yesterday's volunteers came from Target, Marriott International Inc., AmeriCorps, area schools and other service groups.

Washington Capitals players Bryan Muir and John Erskine, despite recent injuries, also helped out.

Some Hine students participated -- raking leaves and re-painting the school's red front doors.

"It's a good way to help out and do something with your time," freshman Alexus Burgess said.

The national service day's motto is, after all, "a day on, not a day off."

About 30 students from the Catholic University of America also volunteered.

The students, with Susan D. Pervi, the university's vice president for student life, cleaned up one of the school's stairwells, wiping down railings and putting a coat of white paint over the yellowing walls.

"Catholic students have a disposition to do service," Mrs. Pervi said.

Other groups painted classrooms and restrooms and cleaned windows.

A beautification project also was under way at Cardozo Senior High School in Northwest, which drew a surprise visit from President Bush.

Mr. Bush, in rolled-up shirt sleeves, walked along a corridor and chatted with the volunteers, including U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales.

Mr. Bush borrowed a paint brush dabbed in red ink, then carefully colored in the "B" of a stenciled drawing of Ben's Chili Bowl. The local eatery is known for its chili dogs and its rich history, including surviving the riots after King's assassination.

"Getting the drift of this thing here?" a smiling Mr. Bush asked as he painted, seeking approval of his technique. Volunteers nodded.

Elsewhere in the District yesterday, hundreds participated in a "peace walk" honoring King.

The walk began at the "Big Chair" landmark in Anacostia and ended at Covenant Baptist Church in Southwest, which hosted a worship service.

D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty attended the memorial march and hosted a musical tribute at the University of the District of Columbia in King's honor.

During the tribute, Mr. Fenty presented the "Living the Dream" awards to the D.C. Boys Choir and to Hal Jackson, a member of the Radio Hall of Fame who became the first black radio sports announcer when he began calling baseball games for Howard University and the Negro Baseball League.

Mr. Jackson also broke color barriers when he began hosting a nightly interview program on local station WINX in 1939.

DOJ_NMG_0116539

Gary Emerling contributed to this article, which is based in part on wire service reports.

Walking Just Like King Did (WP)

By Michael E. Ruane And Hamil R. Harris

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

The opening song was No. 540 in the hymnal, but most people at the Covenant Baptist Church tribute to the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. yesterday already knew the words well.

Lift ev'ry voice and sing, Til earth and heaven ring. . . . Stony the road we trod, Bitter the chast'ning rod. . . .

Inside the venerable Washington church, which was the destination for hundreds participating in the city's Martin Luther King Peace Walk, the throng sang the verses to James Weldon Johnson's civil rights anthem with gusto.

Yet with a steady beat, Have not our weary feet come to the place for which our fathers sighed?

It seemed a fitting climax to the 18-block walk honoring King's birthday, which was led by D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty and wound along Martin Luther King Jr. Avenue SE to the church on South Capitol Street.

It was one of numerous tributes across the region to the slain civil rights leader, who would have turned 78 yes terday. King was assassinated in Memphis on April 4, 1968.

The peace walk began about 10 a.m. at V Street SE in Anacostia after speeches by the mayor and other officials, clergy members and civic leaders. Crowding the sidewalk for blocks, the marchers enjoyed balmy January weather as they strode south on the avenue, chanting slogans and carrying banners.

"Today we're blessed. The weather is not a problem," said Denise Rolark Barnes, one of the walk's organizers. Over the years, King birthday commemorations have been affected by harsh winter weather, she noted.

While an official King Day parade in the District is scheduled for April 7, Barnes said many people believed King's birthday needed to be observed, too. "Many of us who work and live along the avenue just felt as though there was something that we should do. . . . We said, 'Rain, snow, sleet or hail, we would be out here,' and fortunately it doesn't look like we're going to get any of that."

Fenty (D) said the walk would be a simple statement. "We're going to just go out and put one foot in front of the other, and tell people that, although we made a lot of progress, we've got a long way to go." He said it could be especially instructive for the children participating.

"It won't be hard to explain to the kids how Martin Luther King was able to make so much progress just by walking when they're going to do it themselves," Fenty said. "I think they'll appreciate the hours and hours and months and months [spent walking] in the South to get civil rights advancements if we do a little bit of walking here ourselves."

Residents watched from front porches and windows as the march proceeded and a recording of one of King's speeches drifted from a passing car, along with the thump of pop music from another.

Past the avenue's multitude of churches the marchers went, past the nail salons and convenience stores. One house on the route was adorned with the images of King and fellow civil rights champion Malcolm X arrayed on its front steps. There were black marchers and white marchers, people in sneakers and others wearing cuff links.

One marcher, Keith Day, 45, who works at a drug addiction prevention agency, said: "I came down here to keep the legacy of Dr. King alive. If it wasn't for him, none of this would be happening. It took a man like him to stand up for peace."

Elsewhere yesterday, more than 300 people gathered at the La Fontaine Bleu banquet facility in Lanham for the 13th Annual Martin Luther King memorial breakfast sponsored by the Ebony Scholarship Society. There, Bishop Adam Jefferson Richardson Jr. of the Second Episcopal District of the African Methodist Episcopal Church challenged those gathered to go beyond just remembering King.

"From memorial to movement, let the movement begin anew," Richardson said. "It is right for us to be told Dr. King's words, to hear what the words mean in the context of 2007. At a time when we are waging war like swatting flies, it would be refreshing to hear King's words that violence is a poor teacher."

Maryland Del. Carolyn J.B. Howard (D-Prince George's), who attended the event, said that although such programs have become common since King's death, "we still need to remember what he did."

"It is easy to stay away, but we need to come out," she said. "There needs to be a new sense of activism today."

Martin Luther King Papers Go On Display (AP)

By Errin Haines

AP, January 16, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0116540

The first Martin Luther King Jr. Day since the death of King's widow and the chief keeper of his civil rights dream was marked Monday with speeches, visits to the couple's tomb and the opening of a collection of his papers, including a draft of his "I Have a Dream" speech.

Coretta Scott King's legacy loomed large over the 21st observance of the King holiday at the historic Ebenezer Baptist Church, where King preached.

"It is in her memory and her honor that we must carry this program on," said her sister in law, Christine King Farris. "This is as she would have it."

Mayor Shirley Franklin urged the congregation not to pay tribute to King's message of peace and justice on his birthday and then contradict it the next.

"Millions can't find jobs, have no health insurance and struggle to make ends meet, working minimum-wage jobs. What's going on?" Franklin said, repeating a refrain from soul singer Marvin Gaye.

As King condemned the war in Vietnam 40 years ago, Ebenezer's senior pastor, the Rev. Raphael G. Warnock, denounced the war in Iraq.

"The real danger is not that America may lose the war," Warnock said. "The real danger is that America may well lose its soul."

Visitors also paid homage to the slain civil rights leader and his wife at their tomb, not far from the church.

"They're together at last," said Daphne Johnson, who was baptized by King at Ebenezer.

Coretta Scott King died last year on Jan. 31 at age 78. An activist in her own right, she also fought to shape and preserve her husband's legacy after his death, and founded what would become the Martin Luther King Jr. Center for Nonviolent Social Change.

Crowds lined up early at the Atlanta History Center to see the first exhibition of King's collected papers since they were returned to his hometown. The papers brought back difficult memories for some.

"I remember a lot that I don't care to say," said Bertis Post, 70, of Atlanta, who marched with King in Alabama and Atlanta. "I always wanted to see the papers in person — just to be here and be around what you believe."

The exhibit includes King's letter from the Birmingham jail, an early draft of his famous "I Have a Dream" speech, his acceptance speech for the Nobel Prize and more than 600 other personal documents.

In California, Stanford University released some of King's earliest sermons and other writings Monday, a decade after the documents were discovered in a moldy cardboard box in an Atlanta basement.

The texts include sermons written when King was a 19-year-old seminary student in 1948 until 1963.

In a 1949 sermon, King asked God to "help us work with renewed vigor for a warless world, a better distribution of wealth and a brotherhood that transcends race or color."

King also sought a peaceful coexistence between science and religion and rejected a literal reading of the Bible, an approach he said had been used to justify slavery and other racial injustices.

Elsewhere, thousands of volunteers observed the holiday by taking part in service projects. Organizers expected about 50,000 people to participate in about 600 projects, said Todd Bernstein of the group MLK Day of Service.

President Bush, in an unannounced stop at a high school near the White House, said people should honor King on the holiday by finding ways to give back to their communities. Classes were not in session but volunteers were sprucing up the school.

"I encourage people all around the country to seize any opportunity they can to help somebody in need," Bush said. "And by helping somebody in need you're honoring the legacy of Martin Luther King."

Several hundred people gathered in West Columbia, S.C., for a breakfast prayer service, where the Rev. Brenda Kneece said King set the standard for sacrifice and vision.

King's "vision became even more powerful because he understood the risks he was taking," said Kneece, executive minister of the South Carolina Christian Action Council. "It's very important for our children to know that his sacrifice didn't win the war. We still have to keep at it."

At Michigan State University, officials presented a one-day civil rights exhibit that displayed slave shackles, a document from King's voting rights march in Alabama and a fingerprint card for Rosa Parks made after her 1955 arrest for refusing to give up her bus seat to a white man.

Marchers commemorating King Day in Troy, Ohio, were heckled by a group of seven neo-Nazi protesters shouting white power slogans and carrying signs, police said. There were no arrests.

And in North Carolina, 400 workers walked off the job or refused to show up at a huge Smithfield Foods Inc. hog slaughtering plant in Tar Heel after managers refused to grant the King holiday as a paid day off.

The company said a union request last week for the day off came too late for a change of work plans.

DOJ_NMG_0116541

This year's holiday comes on the day King would have turned 78. King was assassinated April 4, 1968, while standing on the balcony of a hotel in Memphis, Tenn. His confessed killer, James Earl Ray, was arrested two months later in London.

MLK Exhibit Draws Record Opening Crowd King's Words Retain Allure (AJC)

By Catherine Fox

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 16, 2007

They arrived by the hundreds. Sometimes three generations together. They came to a place many had never been, parked as much as a half-mile away and put up with long waits — all to be among the first to see "I Have a Dream: The Morehouse College Martin Luther King Jr. Collection" at the Atlanta History Center.

It was, as one awed visitor proclaimed to no one in particular, "a rendezvous with destiny."

In the first 30 minutes after the museum's 10 a.m. opening Monday, about 400 people were on hand to see the exhibit of 600 artifacts, a selection from the trove of 10,000 documents purchased for $32 million by a consortium of Atlanta interests last year.

And they kept on coming. The center, which had instituted a timed entry system because of the crowds, stayed open four hours past its 5 p.m. closing time to accommodate more than 3,500 visitors.

"This is a record opening for an exhibition at the history center," said communications director Hillary Hardwick. She said anecdotal evidence indicated that a majority of the visitors had never been there before.

Mothers with babies on their hips, dads with toddlers on their shoulders, teenage boys in baggy pants — they moved slowly through the exhibition, engrossed in reading King's words. The mood was respectful, almost solemn. Like Alvin and Ishmael Crouch, brothers from Tyrone, the visitors seemed moved. The teens had come at their mother's suggestion, and they were glad they had.

"We had read 'Letter from Birmingham Jail' in literature class," said Alvin, 16. "But to see the actual paper, it was pretty amazing. You read it, and it's 'OK, whatever.' To see it, it does something to you. ... He must have really, really wanted freedom, for him and his people."

The documents were just as affecting for Katie Jones, whose great-grandmother was 8 years old when she was emancipated from slavery. "Every person applying for citizenship should be required to see this show," said the Atlantan, 69. "They should see how this nation was built on the backs of our forefathers."

Crowds clustered around the video screens showing footage of some of King's most famous speeches. The Weatherspoon family of Hamilton Mill was among those watching the landmark "I Have a Dream" speech King delivered in front of the Lincoln Memorial in 1963.

"Every year on King Day we do something, so it's not just a day off, " said Johnny Weatherspoon, 42.

He said he and his wife, Renette, always have made it a point to talk with their two daughters about King and civil rights history, just as their parents had with them, and to take them to the historic sites. But the girls did not remember having watched the speech before.

"It like sent chills to your back to think how it feels to be discriminated against," said Joni, 12.

Justice, 9, was impressed by the quantity and fluidity of King's writing. Standing before a draft of King's last speech, which he wrote on loose-leaf paper with nary a crossed-out line, she observed, "It was like he is really into it. He just keeps on going."

The visit was also a family affair for Bryan Anthony Grant, who spent more than an hour looking at the exhibit with his parents, Bryan Sr. and Avis Franklin-Grant of Kennesaw. This was the family's first visit to the center, but not the last.

"I definitely want to see this again," said Franklin-Grant.

The younger Bryan couldn't yet read cursive, so his parents had to help with him some of the speeches.

But he got the message. When asked what he learned, the 7-year-old said:

"Dr. King fought for equal rights for white and black, and he made good speeches."

At King Events, Politicians Mount New Calls For Justice (NYT)

By Mike Mcintire

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

As New Yorkers gathered yesterday to pay tribute to the legacy of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., it was the memory of another man that asserted itself throughout the day, with political leaders demanding justice for Sean Bell, who was killed in a hail of police bullets last November.

Gov. Eliot Spitzer met with members of Mr. Bell's family before speaking at the Rev. Al Sharpton's annual celebration of Dr. King in Harlem, where a string of politicians followed Mr. Sharpton's cue and addressed the shooting. Mr. Bell, an unarmed black man, was killed by undercover officers outside a Queens nightclub. The case is being investigated by prosecutors.

DOJ_NMG_0116542

Mr. Spitzer said the Bell family "stressed to me with great eloquence their concern that it not happen again."

"I can tell you as the former attorney general and as the governor of the state," he said, "we will do everything we can to make sure that justice is done and to make sure that fairness will begin in the street. It's what we owe you. It is what is right."

Mr. Sharpton said he talked to Mr. Spitzer about holding a statewide forum of political and community leaders to discuss the Bell case and "deal with permanent, legal changes, including the discussion of a permanent special prosecutor on cases, and testing of police officers."

The governor stopped short of endorsing a forum, but pledged to "continue a dialogue and have communication to figure out what we can do better."

Mr. Sharpton, a veteran of police controversies, has emerged as an adviser to the fiancée and relatives of Mr. Bell, whose death on his wedding day has galvanized critics of Police Department policies on use of force and its training of officers. The King Day event at Mr. Sharpton's crowded storefront headquarters, always suffused with political theater, regularly serves as a reminder of his influence over public opinion, and votes, among African-Americans.

The subject of Mr. Bell's death was also raised by officials and pastors who spoke at black churches and at the Brooklyn Academy of Music's annual King Day commemoration, where Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg and City Council Speaker Christine Quinn each invoked Mr. Bell's memory.

Among the other elected officials at Mr. Sharpton's event was the state attorney general, Andrew M. Cuomo, who told the audience that he recently met with Mr. Bell's family. In a speech punctuated by frequent bursts of applause, he placed Mr. Bell in a litany of previous victims of police abuse and decried systemic faults in the criminal justice system.

"Minorities and poor people are disproportionately victims of criminal justice," Mr. Cuomo said. "Criminal justice is supposed to protect everyone, everywhere. And that includes Abner Louima and Amadou Diallo and Sean Bell."

Mr. Bloomberg, though introduced with warm remarks by Mr. Sharpton, faced a chilly reception from some members of the audience, who occasionally interrupted his remarks with loud comments or questions, particularly on the topic of Mr. Bell. The mayor called Mr. Bell's death "a terrible moment for New York," which demonstrated that "despite all the progress we have made in this city, we really do have a long ways to go."

Mr. Bloomberg, who made several public appearances yesterday, had more success connecting with audiences when he reminisced about enjoying the music of the late James Brown and suggested that Representative Charles B. Rangel, a favorite son of Harlem, should run for president. The mayor, a Republican who has deflected speculation about his own possible candidacy in 2008, made his comments about Mr. Rangel at the Convent Avenue Baptist Church in Harlem.

"You should know that Congressman Rangel was one of the first people that urged me to run for mayor," Mr. Bloomberg said. "And I'll never forget the time I called him and said, 'Charlie, I've got some good news and some bad news for you. The good news is I'm going to listen to you and run for mayor. The bad news is I'm not doing it as a Democrat.' "

Lee Honors Postponed To April (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni And Tarron Lively

The Washington Times, January 16, 2007

Robert E. Lee's annual honors in the U.S. Capitol have been postponed from this week to April, as heritage buffs hope to expand the Confederate general's 200th birthday into a yearlong celebration.

Members of the United Daughters of the Confederacy (UDC) for nearly a century have laid a wreath at Gen. Lee's statue in the Capitol's Statuary Hall on his birthday. It's a big soiree marked with dozens of heritage groups invited to offer wreaths of their own, and speeches by Civil War historians.

This year, the UDC will host a smaller ceremony at the statue on Friday, Lee's birthday. The extensive festivities will be held April 7 at the statue.

The delay, caused by the transition from Republican power to a Democratic majority, has been welcomed by organizers who say it allows them to bring renewed and extended attention to Lee's historical significance.

"We're going to commemorate the birthday all year. We have things planned all over the country, so this fit in well with our plans do it up," said UDC member Vicki Heilig, of North Carolina.

The transfer of power from Republican Speaker J. Dennis Hastert to Democratic Speaker Nancy Pelosi slowed down the event-approval process.

Mrs. Pelosi's office was not legally allowed to consider requests until she was sworn in Jan. 4, just a few days before the group's notification deadline to send out invitations.

The new speaker's staff pored through "dozens and dozens" of pending requests, and ultimately approved the UDC event for Saturday, said Pelosi deputy press secretary Drew Hammill.

But that approval came too late to do a "bang-up" job and get 400 engraved invitations into the mail, Miss Heilig said.

DOJ_NMG_0116543

"We didn't feel like we had time to do that," she said, adding, "Besides, April is better weather," for members traveling from all over the country.

The more subdued affair will be held at 11 a.m. Friday in Statuary Hall. Some UDC members plan to dress in period garb of hoop skirts and bonnets.

The Capitol ceremony celebrating Lee's birthday -- he was born Jan. 19, 1807, in Stratford, Va. -- has been held every year since 1911. The Lee statue arrived at the Capitol from Virginia in 1909.

A career officer in the U.S. Army, Lee became one of the most successful Confederate generals after the outbreak of the Civil War, eventually commanding all of the South's armies. After the war, he became president of Washington College (now Washington and Lee University) in Lexington, Va., and advocated reconciliation between North and South.

Some members of local heritage organizations were unhappy about the delayed celebration.

"I think it's outrageous," said Richard Hines, a Northern Virginia business owner and commander of a group called the Noble Order of the Sword of Lee, formed to honor the general's birthday.

Alleged Voting Rights Violation With Twist Goes To Trial (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

MACON, Miss. -- Over the years, Ike Brown has earned a reputation in rural Noxubee County as a wily political boss, and his election triumphs have time and again aroused suspicions of impropriety. But talk of his tactics never carried much farther than this small community of sawmills and catfish ponds.

Today, though, Brown, who is African American, is scheduled to go on trial in federal court in Jackson, where he will face charges from the Justice Department that he violated the political rights of Noxubee's white minority. It is the first time that the 1965 Voting Rights Act has been used to ensure white rights.

About two-thirds of the 8,700 adults in Noxubee County are black, and Brown, the local Democratic committee chief, has been criticized for urging people to "vote black" while engaging in an array of electoral shenanigans.

At issue is whether Brown, 52, has directed "relentless voting-related racial discrimination" against white voters and white candidates through fraudulent election tactics, as federal lawyers say, or whether he was merely operating aggressive political campaigns in a milieu that has long been split along racial lines.

The case is being closely watched, not only for its contrasts to the historic struggle for civil rights here, when the Voting Rights Act was a key legal weapon on behalf of blacks, but for signs of the Bush administration's commitment to minority issues.

Critics view the case as a symbol of the way that the administration has veered away from the traditional mission of the civil rights division at the Justice Department -- eliminating discrimination against African Americans -- in favor of reverse discrimination and religious discrimination matters.

"I played tough, but I played fair," Brown said last week. Whites "stole elections from us for decades and nothing was done about it. Now the slightest inconvenience for the establishment is cause for the Justice Department to come down here."

Brown, a lanky single father, has been a figure of political controversy here for years, but not a flashy one. A former tax preparer, he served a prison sentence in the mid-1990s for preparing fraudulent returns. Now, aside from his political work, he also operates a one-man scrap metal business. He makes less than $30,000 annually all told, he says, and his Macon home, in a predominantly white neighborhood, is assessed for $127,000.

Wil Colom, the prominent black Republican lawyer who has taken Brown's case on a pro bono basis, describes his client and his aggressive tactics as a product of the long and sometimes bitter quest for black representation in Noxubee County.

Brown has run dozens of campaigns here, and Colom traces the fight for black representation in the county to 1971, when, despite the numerical superiority of blacks, no one on the board of supervisors was African American. It was not until the early '90s that African Americans won a majority of seats. Now, four of the five county supervisors are black.

"Majority rule came to South Africa before it came to Noxubee County," Colom said.

In the battle for political representation, he said, Brown fought like "a guerrilla" and his legal troubles stem now from the fact that he did not recognize that he was now in power and did not build coalitions with those he had vanquished. As a result, Colom said, "whites feel alienated."

Still, he said, "it's hard for a black person in Ike Brown's position to stomach somebody complaining about discrimination, considering what's happened to them."

The federal lawsuit enumerates an array of illegal maneuvers in Noxubee County elections engineered by Brown. They include recruiting ineligible black candidates, excluding whites from Democratic Party meetings, manipulating voter registration rolls and collecting improper absentee ballots, partly through teams of notaries who visit homes to help people vote.

DOJ_NMG_0116544

In a 1999 Democratic primary for sheriff, for example, the margin of victory for Brown's preferred candidate was only five votes. A judge ruled that a new election should be held because 52 ballots, most of them from absentees, were found to be invalid.

Brown, as chairman of the Democratic Executive Committee in the county, did not fulfill the judge's order, telling the local paper, the Macon Beacon, that someone would have to file a lawsuit to compel him to do so. No one did.

In 2003, Brown recruited a black lawyer to run against the incumbent white county prosecutor, according to the government's court filings, even though the white lawyer is a Democrat and the black lawyer was ineligible to run in Noxubee because he lived in Jackson. Brown refused to hear the complaints of the prosecutor and dropped the campaign only after a judge ruled against him.

The same year, Brown delivered to the Macon Beacon a list of 170 or so white Republican voters whom he said he would challenge if they tried to vote in the Democratic primary. Critics say he singled out white voters, but Brown indicated that he was only trying to keep Republicans from voting.

Indeed, while federal lawyers link Brown to the racial polarization of county voting, locals on both sides of the divide say race is simply something that politicians in the area have to deal with, and if they choose to, can exploit to their advantage.

"I use rhetoric to try to win, and that may range from saying that, quote, they're not black enough or it may range to saying that they're too black to get anything done," Brown has admitted. "It's just whatever is convenient."

Phillip McGuire, a white jewelry store owner who has been asked to testify, said in a deposition: "You can't live here without couching some things in terms of race. It's just . . . you know, Mississippi."

Compass Settles Claim It Discriminated Against Unmarried Car Buyers (BIRMBIZ)

Birmingham Business Journal, January 15, 2007

Compass Bank has reached a settlement with the U.S. Department of Justice over allegations the bank discriminated against unmarried car-loan applicants.

The Justice Department launched an investigation into Compass' automobile lending practices after the Federal Reserve Board, in a routine 2003 examination, found "reason to believe that Compass Bank's loan pricing procedures and directives constituted a pattern or practice of discrimination," according to a news release Friday.

In its complaint, the Justice Department alleged the Birmingham-based bank had violated the Equal Credit Opportunity Act by charging car loan co-applicants who were not married to one another higher rates than married couples.

In a consent order filed in federal district court in Birmingham, Compass has agreed to pay as much as $1.75 million plus interest to unmarried co-applicants who were charged higher rates. It also will beef up its equal credit opportunity training for employees who set car loan rates. The bank also is required to maintain changes to its lending procedures already in place that explicitly ban distinctions based on marital status.

"Under the law, marital status should have no effect on an individual's access to credit," said Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division, in a news release. "We will continue to vigorously enforce the federal laws that prevent discrimination in credit and lending services. We commend Compass Bank for working cooperatively with the Justice Department in reaching an appropriate resolution of this case."

Since 2001, the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division has filed seven cases under the Equal Credit Opportunity Act.

Compass's agreement with the Justice Department remains subject to court approval.

Compass Settles Complaint (BN)

By Roy L. Williams, News Staff Writer

The Birmingham News (AL), January 16, 2007

Discrimination on car loans alleged

Compass Bank said Monday it settled federal complaints that it engaged in a pattern of lending discrimination against some applicants for car loans based on their marital status.

The Justice Department and Compass said the Birmingham bank will pay up to $1.75 million, plus interest, to non-married loan customers who were charged higher interest rates than married couples.

A consent decree, which still must be approved by a federal judge in Birmingham, says Compass promised it will not discriminate on the basis of marital status in any aspect of its automobile lending.

"Under the law, marital status should have no effect on an individual's access to credit," said Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division.

DOJ_NMG_0116545

Ed Bilek, a Compass senior vice president, said the bank admitted no wrongdoing and noted that the loans in question occurred between May 2001 and May 2003. He declined to say how many loans were involved in the investigation, saying only "it did not represent a significant amount of our business." The probe looked at lending through the bank's operating territory

"While Compass believes its lending practices comply with applicable laws and regulations, we worked closely with the Department of Justice and are happy to resolve this issue," Bilek said Monday,

Compass had revealed in a quarterly filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission last August that the Justice Department was investigating its auto lending practices. In the filing, Compass said the investigation concentrated on its "indirect auto lending" practices. Indirect loans originate at auto dealers and are forwarded to banks for approval.

The Justice Department said Compass has implemented changes to its lending procedures that bar distinctions based on marital status and will maintain those new policies. Compass said it will provide enhanced equal credit opportunity training to its officers and employees who set rates for automobile loans.

Bilek said Compass has reserves set aside for the settlement.

The government's complaint alleges that Compass violated the Equal Credit Opportunity Act, which makes it unlawful for creditors to discriminate against any applicant based on race, color, religion, national origin, sex, marital status or age.

The Federal Reserve Board referred the matter to the Justice Department after a 2003 examination gave the board reason to believe that the bank's loan pricing procedures constituted a pattern of discrimination.

E-mail: rwilliams@bhamnews.com

State Police Panel Reviewing Claim Trooper Was Told To Lie To Monitors (BERGENCR)

By Justo Bautista, STAFF WRITER

Bergen County (NJ) Record, January 15, 2007

A committee appointed by Governor Corzine to take a "hard look" at state police reforms is investigating allegations by a veteran trooper that he was coached on how to mislead federal monitors.

Testifying in November before the Advisory Committee on Police Standards, Sgt. Scott Turner said commanders asked him to "misrepresent" his findings as head of the research and innovation unit that the state police academy at Sea Girt was not complying with the mandates of a federal consent decree signed in 1999 as a result of a racial-profiling scandal. Turner said he refused.

He also testified that high-ranking commanders in the Office of Professional Standards "manipulated and misrepresented" internal affairs data to show that the state police were complying with the consent decree.

"I was instructed to keep my mouth [shut] when speaking with federal monitors, to omit information, and I was even coached on how I can mislead monitors [by] misrepresenting information and how I could limit my responses to their questions," said Turner, who has a whistleblower lawsuit pending against the state police.

The committee's recommendations will help Corzine decide whether the state should join the U.S. Justice Department in filing a motion in U.S. District Court to lift the consent decree, which was signed in December 1999 and allowed federal observers to monitor state police efforts to end racial profiling.

After six years of overseeing state police operations, federal monitors said the reforms have "far exceeded" the court-ordered requirements designed to end racial profiling.

Nevertheless, the committee is "still looking" into Turner's allegations, said James E. Johnson, the committee chairman and a former federal prosecutor.

"He has raised some serious matters, and we intend to look at them carefully," Johnson said.

The deadline for the committee's final report, originally Dec. 31, has been extended to Jan. 31.

Asked about Turner's testimony, state police spokesman Capt. Al Della Fave, said: "We have cooperated fully with the independent monitors since Day One."

Turner said creating a "community police commission" in the Department of the Public Advocate was the "only real solution to provide independent oversight of the state police."

The 21-member advisory committee held four hearings around the state in the fall and "continues to gather data," Johnson said.

The consent decree was signed more than a year after two troopers fired on a van carrying four unarmed minority men on the New Jersey Turnpike. Three of the men were wounded in the shooting, sparking an outcry over racial profiling.

The state Attorney General's Office said in July 1999 that "the problem of racial profiling is real."

Troopers are now operating in a "climate of excellence," State Police Superintendent Rick Fuentes testified in October. He cited the federal monitors' report of 30 consecutive months of substantial compliance with decree requirements -- enough progress for the Justice Department to move for dismissal of the consent decree. The monitors found no indication of racial profiling in state police traffic stops.

DOJ_NMG_0116546

"The prospect of achieving a 100 percent compliance rate with the decree in our line of work was thought by some to be impossible, but it has been attained," Fuentes said.

He added that he wanted the reforms codified by legislation, thus assuring state funding for them.

"What takes place on the road now is testimony to the most constitutional and unbiased policing in the country," David Jones, president of the State Troopers Fraternal Association, told the committee.

But Edward Barocas, legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union of New Jersey, testified that an ACLU study, based on the state's own statistics, showed profiling on the southern portion of the New Jersey Turnpike had not stopped.

"African-Americans now make up a higher percentage of stops than they did before the consent decree began," Barocas said.

While lauding state police progress, the Rev. Reginald T. Jackson, executive director of the Black Ministers Council of New Jersey, strongly urged the committee to keep the consent decree in place.

Jackson said he doubted that the state police "culture" had changed.

"It was this culture which made racial profiling permissible, tolerable and OK," Jackson said. "It was this culture which led the New Jersey State Police to adopt a posture of denial. In fact, to my knowledge, to this date, Nov. 21, the organization has not publicly admitted it practiced racial profiling."

Della Fave contended the culture has changed.

"All of the troopers presently on patrol on the road were inducted during the consent-decree years," Della Fave said. "It's a completely different road from 1999."

To change the police agency's "insular and secretive culture," William H. Buckman, a Moorestown attorney, called in a landmark 1996 racial profiling case for the appointment of a civilian state police commissioner.

"We will not get a handle on profiling unless we get a handle on the culture," Buckman said. "If we can't rely on people within the agency to be able to tell us, without fear of their lives or careers, of wrongdoing, how are we going to know what's going on?"

A Gloucester County judge in that case agreed that troopers were racially profiling motorists on the southern portion of the turnpike.

Legislation Targets Human Trafficking In State (LAWET)

By Gordon Fraser

Lawrence (MA) Eagle Tribune, January 16, 2007

Three state legislators are joining forces to end the human trafficking problem in the Granite State. Which begs the question, is there a human trafficking problem in the Granite State?

"There's no way to know, but common sense just tells you New Hampshire isn't immune," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark Zuckerman. "It's happening all around us. It's happening here, too."

But the evidence is sketchy, Zuckerman said. Since a federal law passed prohibiting human trafficking in 2000, only one New Hampshire case has been prosecuted - the United States v. Timothy Bradley and Kathleen Mary O'Dell.

Bradley and O'Dell, of Litchfield, were convicted in 2003 of forcing four Jamaican men to work for their tree-cutting business. The men lived in unsanitary and unsafe conditions, and received no pay for their work, according to Zuckerman. Both Bradley and O'Dell were sentenced to five years, 10 months in prison.

Human trafficking essentially falls into two categories. The first is forced labor, when people are transported across national borders, often illegally, and forced to work for little or no wages to pay back those who brought them into the country. The Bradley and O'Dell case fell into this category, with one difference - the four Jamaican men were brought into the country legally, on workers' Visas.

The second category involves forced prostitution. Young women or children are transported into a country, and forced to pay back those who brought them in by working in the sex trade.

Just the possibility of a human trafficking problem in New Hampshire is shocking to Rep. Jordan Ulery, R-Hudson, the sponsor of two bills. One of the bills would establish a commission to study human trafficking. The other would make transporting illegal immigrants across the border, or from place to place within the border, a crime.

"One child, one woman, one laborer being abused is too many," he said.

Ulery, a private investigator, said he thinks the human trafficking problem in New Hampshire is worse than people realize.

DOJ_NMG_0116547

"It is so easy to come across the Canadian border," he said, that the major north-south highways in the state have become a conduit for trafficking people to Boston and New York. He theorizes that people from Asia and Europe are trafficked into Canada, then brought down into the United States.

"At the same time," he said, "there are individuals within the state of New Hampshire who are attempting to take advantage of workers, take advantage of human beings."

The problem, thus far, seems to be finding hard evidence of that.

"I think there's no way to know," said Cynthia Magnuson, spokeswoman for the U.S. Department of Justice. "It's difficult to find these cases."

But Magnuson, as well as Zuckerman, thinks the state law would still be a good idea.

According to Zuckerman, a state law against human trafficking would give local police more power to investigate such crimes. Today, they only assist federal authorities already doing investigations.

But not everyone thinks the bill is such a good idea. When Ulery proposed a similar bill last year, he said, he got opposition from groups that thought the basic human rights of illegal immigrants would be at risk.

Opponents of the bill said making the transportation of illegal immigrants within the state a crime would even put charity groups trying to help immigrants at risk.

Ulery wants to leave that to the discretion of prosecutors.

"I trust our attorney general," he said. "She's a pretty astute individual."

Suit Calls Sacrifice A Religious Right (WT)

By Hugh Aynesworth

The Washington Times, January 16, 2007

EULESS, Texas -- Jose Merced said he is tired of Euless police knocking at his door and interrupting his church services.

Police have told Mr. Merced that his Santeria religious rites are against the law in this rapidly growing community because some of its ordination rituals involve the sacrifice of animals. One of his neighbors on the small cul-de-sac registered a complaint, but police did not tell him who.

He said fewer than 10 members of his group meet regularly in his Euless home.

After repeated visits and warnings, Mr. Merced, a 45-year-old airline employee, consulted Ernesto Pichardo, the church's president, and filed a lawsuit against the city claiming his religious freedom had been violated.

"We've been down this road before," Mr. Pichardo told The Washington Times.

In 1993, the U.S. Supreme Court struck down an ordinance in Hialeah, Fla., as a violation of the First Amendment's "free exercise" of religion clause. Justices agreed with Mr. Pichardo, the lead plaintiff in the case, saying the city targeted its law to Santeria sacrificial rites.

The city of Euless refused to comment on the lawsuit, but Avery Jackson, who was waiting in line at City Hall last week, was not so circumspect.

"Would you want children to watch chickens or goats being killed for their blood?" he said. "Come on, get real. They might do that in Haiti or Cuba or somewhere, but in Euless, Texas?"

Mr. Pichardo, 52, a Cuban refugee who lives in Florida, compared the drawing of blood to the Eucharist in Catholicism.

"This is not drinking blood, and we don't sacrifice children," he said. "And we don't go around snatching pets."

Mr. Merced said authorities "just don't understand our religion" and that his group of followers might go as long as a year without such sacrifices.

"This doesn't happen very often," he said. "It's only on special occasions."

Some Santeria members pointed out that Tongans, who have a 4,000-strong community in this metro area, roast as many as 15 pigs at festivals in their United Methodist churches.

The Rev. Alex Latu, minister of the Tongan United Methodist Church, bristled at the comparison of pig roasts to blood sacrifice.

"When we cook pigs, it is not a religious thing. It's cultural," he said. "We simply like pork. It's similar to how Americans cook a turkey to celebrate Thanksgiving."

Mr. Latu said he did not have a strong feeling about the legal argument of Santeria followers, but a ruling "would only affect them, not other religions."

He noted that Mormons were forced to comply with laws against polygamy. "Though I do not want to see the government involved in all such instances, sometimes certain things help the community as a whole," he said.

Santeria originated among the Yoruba in southwestern Nigeria centuries ago and was introduced to Caribbean nations, Cuba primarily, via the slave trade.

DOJ_NMG_0116548

Virginia Assembly To Tackle Abortion (WP)

By Tim Craig, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 15, 2007

One Measure Would Outlaw Most Procedures

RICHMOND -- Abortion rights advocates are gearing up to fight more than a dozen bills before the General Assembly this year, including a measure that would outlaw nearly all abortions in Virginia should the U.S. Supreme Court overturn Roe v. Wade.

The debate over abortion is a yearly ritual for the Republican-controlled General Assembly, but a pending Supreme Court decision on the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act and this fall's legislative races could heighten the discussion this year.

"I have no doubt if the Supreme Court overturns Roe that Virginia would be one of the states that makes it illegal to have an abortion," said Ann O'Hanlon, executive director of NARAL Pro-Choice Virginia.

Many Supreme Court observers have said the court is one or two votes from reversing the 1973 decision that established a woman's right to an abortion.

Abortion has been a tumultuous political issue in Virginia, where polls show that about 40 percent of the electorate identify themselves as born-again Christians. The state is home to Pat Robertson's Christian Broadcasting Network as well as Jerry Falwell Ministries, both of which speak out against abortion.

A Washington Post poll taken during the 2005 governor's race found that 61 percent of Virginia residents think abortion should be legal in all or most cases; 38 percent said they want to outlaw the practice.

A bill by Del. Robert G. Marshall (R-Prince William) causes abortion-rights supporters the greatest concern. The bill proposes that Virginia revert to pre-1973 abortion laws if the Supreme Court overturns Roe v. Wade. Under those laws, abortion would be illegal except if the life of the woman or fetus is endangered.

"The right-to-life folks have not seen their concern addressed in years, so this gives them hope there is still some interest in this issue," Marshall said. He added that abortion opponents are engaged in a long-term struggle to take "a couple of steps" each year to reduce abortions.

"It is our belief a reasonable Supreme Court will reverse most, if not all, of the Roe decisions, and any legislation that brings Virginia in line with that decision we would support," said Victoria Cobb, president of the Family Foundation, a socially conservative group. The foundation is advocating changes to the informed-consent law so abortion clinics would be required to perform an ultrasound before performing an abortion.

In February, the South Dakota legislature set the stage for a direct challenge to Roe v. Wad e when it voted to make it a felony for doctors to perform abortions except to save the life of the woman. Voters overturned the law in a statewide referendum in November.

In Virginia, abortion foes have been more restrained, largely focusing on ways to limit access to abortion slowly. Last year, the House of Delegates approved a plan that would require clinics that perform abortions to meet the same standards as ambulatory surgery centers, but the measure died in a Senate committee.

The bill has been reintroduced this year. "Veterinary clinics are regulated to a higher degree than abortion clinics, and to me, abortion is an invasive procedure and ought to be regulated at least to the same degree," said Del. Phillip A. Hamilton (R-Newport News), chairman of the Health, Welfare and Institutions Committee.

Abortion rights supporters counter that the regulations are not needed because there have been few instances in which health or sanitary conditions have been an issue in one of the state's abortion clinics.

Other proposals under consideration this year include bills that would stiffen penalties for injuring a fetus as well as measures that require women to be given more information about a fetus before an abortion. The General Assembly will also consider a measure to require minors to get parental permission before obtaining birth control and one that would require a doctor to use anesthesia when performing an abortion on a fetus after 20 or more weeks.

Hamilton said he is not sure whether any abortion-related bills would pass the House this year but doubts that there will be much enthusiasm for taking up Marshall's plan for a total ban.

Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) has said he opposes abortion personally but would veto any bill that outlaws abortion. A different political landscape might present itself next year, however, when the Senate committee that has blocked most restrictions on abortion might have a new chairman.

Even if some of the abortion bills pass the House this year, Sen. H. Russell Potts Jr. (R-Winchester), chairman of the Senate Education and Health Committee, said they would face a hostile reaction in his committee.

"It's absolutely outrageous stuff that is just totally out of the mainstream," Potts said. "They just don't get it. Women by the thousands are deserting the Republican Party."

DOJ_NMG_0116549

Some of Potts's Republican colleagues say he's the one out of the mainstream because he's blocking restrictions that a majority of senators support. Sen. Ken Cuccinelli II (R-Fairfax) refers to the Education and Health Committee as the "committee of death."

But Potts, a Republican maverick who angered many party leaders in 2005 when he launched an independent bid for governor, might not be around next year to block abortion-related bills: He said he is considering retiring. If a new chairman takes over and allows antiabortion legislation to reach the full Senate, Potts said, "it has a very good chance to pass."

The Republicans' Gamble (WP)

The Washington Post, January 15, 2007

Change Virginia's redistricting system or roll the dice.

PARTIES THAT command the majority of state legislatures are loath to yield their right to draw district lines on the state's political map. And no wonder: Why voluntarily cede such a sweeping power? But Virginia Republicans, who control both houses of the state legislature, would do well to break the mold this year -- and not only because they would be exposed as bald-faced hypocrites for refusing.

Virginia remains in most ways a majority-Republican state. But after successive Democratic victories in races for governor and senator, plus Democratic pickups in the state legislature for most of this decade, the GOP majority is starting to look shaky. Hence the party's dilemma: If it insists on leaving redistricting in the hands of the majority, as it has in recent years, it may wake up after the 2010 Census startled to find the Democrats in charge of redrawing the political map. If, on the other hand, the Republicans agree now to create a bipartisan system, they may end up with an electoral map more to their liking than if they were left to the Democrats' mercies. The result will be better government and better politics.

It's better government because Virginia's current system has produced a quasi-democracy. Most incumbent lawmakers have districts so gerrymandered in their favor that they face no serious opponent or no opponent at all. In the last elections for the House of Delegates, in 2005, just 12 of the 100 races were competitive enough to end with a margin of victory of less than 10 percentage points; in the last state Senate elections, in 2003, just four of the 40 races were that close. Most of the real contests are in the primaries, which are decided by a tiny handful of the most partisan voters of each party. That produces winners who tend to be the most partisan candidates and the ones least interested in consensus and compromise. The result: polarization and gridlock of the sort that Virginia's legislature has been subjected to for the past several years on transportation and the budget.

Then there's the politics. Fifteen years ago, Virginia Republicans, then in the minority, introduced a constitutional amendment to establish a bipartisan redistricting commission. The commission would consist of four members named by the chief justice of the Virginia Supreme Court -- two from each party but none serving in any elective or official party capacity. The fifth member, the chairman, would be selected by the other four. The GOP's proposed amendment was killed without ado by the then-majority Democrats. The Republican sponsors, who included a certain Del. William J. Howell of Stafford County, cried foul.

Now an identical constitutional amendment, unearthed from the state archives, has been proposed by Virginia's House Democratic leader, Del. Brian Moran of Alexandria. Mr. Howell, whose Republican Party is now in the majority, is speaker of the House. Can he, with a straight face, oppose the amendment that he co-sponsored in 1992?

ANTITRUST:

Blitz Of Mergers, Buyouts Sets A Record (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, January 16, 2007

Corporate merger and buyout activity is now surpassing the record levels reached in 2000 – a trend that holds some risk as well as promise for the global economy.

In the past week:

· US Airways boosted its hostile bid for the struggling airline Delta, to about $10 billion.

· General Electric Co. said it will buy Britain's third largest aerospace company for $4.8 billion. It also is looking to auction off its plastics division, which could be worth $10 billion.

· Jockeying intensified among rivals to buy Hutchison Essar, one of India's biggest wireless phone companies.

With all the stock shares and assets flying back and forth in recent months, even stock exchanges are part of the story. European regulators have just stamped their approval on a proposed merger between the New York Stock Exchange and

DOJ_NMG_0116550

Euronext, an operator of European exchanges. And two venerable Chicago markets for futures and option contracts are in the process of pairing up.

This wave of dealmaking is generally a positive force, analysts say. Mergers or buyouts help many businesses become more competitive – and support their stock prices in the process. But the trend also gives cause for worry. The last time mergers and acquisitions (M&A) hit a peak like this was in 2000, just before a bear market and recession of 2001. The risk is that, once again, stock prices and M&A activity could fuel each other, only to collapse after a speculative frenzy.

"Right now we're not seeing that," says Roger Aguinaldo, who publishes the M&A Advisor, a New York newsletter. "But it could happen."

What's certain is that dealmaking is back in full swing. In 2006, M&A volume worldwide reached $4 trillion, surpassing the previous record of $3.3 trillion set in 2000, according to Dealogic in New York, which analyzes global investment banking and systems. The year's final quarter, in fact, was the fastest-paced.

The trend is driven by a strong global economy, for one. Also, some CEOs feel an "eat or be eaten" pressure, knowing they could lose their jobs if their companies are bought out.

Other causes may be particular to a given company or industry. GE is buying and selling pieces to reposition itself for solid global growth. The US airline industry, analysts say, must consolidate to boost profitability.

Perhaps the biggest force behind the merger wave is the simplest: piles of money. Corporations have built up loads of cash. So have "private equity" funds, created by large investors to buy publicly traded firms, manage them privately for a time, and then relaunch them as public companies.

"We've got a good head of steam," says Joseph Quinlan, chief market strategist at Bank of America Securities in New York. "There's a lot of liquidity out there still."

This is true globally, not just in the US. In half of the 10 biggest transactions of 2006, neither the target nor the acquiring company was from the US, Dealogic reports. Meanwhile, M&A by developing nations nearly doubled in the past year, to half a trillion dollars in value, says Mr. Quinlan.

While some financial experts predict another record in 2007, he says merger activity will probably begin to trail off in the second half of the year. "My hope is it kind of rolls over gently, [that] it doesn't crash," Quinlan says. He expects that the world's central banks will withdraw easy credit conditions before the passion for mergers gets out of control.

The recent dealmaking hasn't generally aroused antitrust concerns. Most industries are competitive. But as the trend continues, consumer protection could become more important. In 2003, for example, an academic analysis of banking mergers found that consolidation has hindered small-business access to loans.

Still, deals in this current period tend to be, on balance, beneficial, many analysts say. The economy "seems to be less vulnerable to excess than, let's say, the late 1990s or 2000," says Pavel Savor, a finance expert at the University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School in Philadelphia.

One reason: Cash-only transactions are now the norm, accounting for three-fourths of the M&A volume last year, according to Dealogic. Dealmakers tend to be more disciplined when using cash than stock, analysts say. Also, corporate directors feel greater pressure to be alert on shareholders' behalf – at risk of being sued.

Brocade-McData Deal Forces FTC Juggling (DEAL)

By Cecile Kohrs Lindell, The Deal

The Deal, January 16, 2007

A merger between competitors might be a great deal for the companies' customers, lowering prices by focusing research and development on the most valuable projects and cutting production costs. Another deal joining competitors, however, could raise prices by decreasing competition, leaving fewer choices to consumers.

The Federal Trade Commission is trying to decide which camp Brocade Communications Systems Inc.'s $735 million purchase of McData Corp. falls into.

Politics at the five-member commission and recent legal precedent are making this case a closer call than most for the agency. First, the agencies have lost several recent merger cases. Next, market entry barriers that aren't easy to assess and a dearth of customer complaints are complicating the FTC's job. Finally, the makeup of the FTC itself changed last year, and the dynamics of the commissioners are still evolving.

The case comes at a time when both the FTC and its sister agency, the Department of Justice's antitrust division, have been losing challenges to mergers. FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras has said she wants to bring a case, and she said, "You can't win if you don't play," but so far, "the right case" has been elusive.

Staff lawyers, who are eager to challenge the deal, have reviewed the Brocade-McData deal, according to several sources following the matter. After that recommendation reached his desk, however, sources following the deal believe FTC Bureau of Competition Director Jeff Schmidt overruled staff and forwarded to the five commissioners a recommendation to let the deal go through.

DOJ_NMG_0116551

Antitrust lawyers say the differing recommendations are understandable because the case is too close to call.

His reluctance to block the merger in court is due in part to a previous case, DOJ's unsuccessful challenge to Oracle Inc.'s purchase of PeopleSoft in 2004. The Justice Department's defeat in that proceeding was seen as a judicial mandate on the need for consumer testimony. In that case, Chief Judge Vaughn Walker of the Northern District of California seemed to say that the government could only block mergers where there is a clear story of imminent consumer harm, as expressed clearly and in unified terms, by the customers in the industry.

In the Brocade-McData case, arbitrators say the FTC has been unable to identify customers who say they will suffer if the merger is completed.

Still other lawyers, including the newest FTC commissioner, Tom Rosch, have publicly said Walker is not right and would like to see antitrust regulators challenge his dictate on consumer testimony before it becomes embedded in antitrust practice. The FTC blocked the merger of H.J. Heinz Co. and Beech-Nut Nutrition Corp. in 2000 when the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit found that a three-to-two merger, sometimes called a merger to duopoly, was illegal. The district court in that case had allowed the deal, which had no adverse customer testimony, but was overturned by the appellate panel.

Indeed, other deals have been blocked in the past, even without customer testimony if there are few competitors in the industry and there are reasons why no new companies could get into the industry.

The Brocade-McData deal focuses on sophisticated switches, called director switches, for computers. Only the merging parties and Cisco Systems Inc. now manufacture the switches. But Cisco may have as much as 30 percent of the market, according to arbitrators, and Cisco is a relative newcomer. That suggests another competitor might enter the market and expand quickly, reducing the ability of the merging firm to create a stranglehold on the market. Cisco, however, is a large networking equipment and network management company that already has a reputation in the computer industry. It's not clear whether another company could replicate its success.

Finally, politics are sure to come into play. Historically, Republicans tend to bring fewer merger challenges, putting their faith in the free-market system, while Democrats tend to block more deals. While Rosch is part of the Republican majority, he's only been at the agency for about a year. He came from Latham & Watkins LLP, where the bulk of his experience was litigating antitrust cases. That experience could lead to a stronger desire to go to court than his fellow Republicans hold, according to some Washington antitrust lawyers. They also see in his recent speeches a desire to use the courts as a means to clarify merger law, suggesting he wants the agency to prove its mettle in court.

But, lawyers note, it would be a bit ironic if Rosch votes with Democrats to challenge the Brocade-McData deal, since Rosch was on the Latham litigation team that won the Oracle-PeopleSoft case.

DOJ Details Plans In Lawsuit Against Realtors (INMAN)

By Glenn Roberts Jr., Inman News

Inman News, January 16, 2007

ZipRealty, former eRealty officials expected to testify

If the antitrust lawsuit filed by the U.S. Justice Department against the National Association of Realtors proceeds to trial, the United States plans to call the Realtor association's general counsel, ZipRealty's CFO, the former president and CEO for eRealty, and the CEO for Home Buyers Marketing II among its witnesses, according to court documents.

The federal government has also identified 20 multiple listing service areas from which it has requested or obtained detailed data and 16 additional MLS areas from which it has collected evidence or will draw evidence.

Lawyers representing the government and Realtor group met last week with a court magistrate for a routine conference in the antitrust lawsuit, which was filed in September 2005. The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in Chicago, charges that the Realtor group approved overly restrictive policies for the online display and sharing of property information among real estate professionals, while the Realtor group has maintained that its policies are not illegal.

Laurie Janik, general counsel for the National Association of Realtors, said lawyers for the association expressed a worry about the possible number of depositions that the government may take to assist in building a case against the Realtor association. Depositions, which are recorded statements given under oath for use in court, can be time-consuming and costly, said Janik, noting the government had announced plans for 10 depositions in one small market area. That number has since been trimmed to three for that market area, she said.

Janik suggested that there are numerous less costly methods for parties to gather information.

Laurie Janik, National Association of Realtors

DOJ_NMG_0116552

"They're very expensive. We've got to send an attorney there (and there is) travel time and attorney time during the deposition. If they were to do 10 depositions I'd probably have an attorney out there for a week, which is unreasonable if we're going to duplicate that in 36 market areas," Janik said.

Prior to announcing the lawsuit, the government took about 10 depositions, Janik said, "including mine and several members of our work group." Lawyers for the National Association of Realtors, meanwhile, took a deposition from a broker in Kansas prior to the government's announced plan for more depositions in that state, Janik said. In a court filing, a U.S. Justice Department attorney stated that the government planned to call Janik as a witness if the case proceeds to trial.

Other witnesses that the government expects to call upon include: Gary Beasley, president and chief financial officer of ZipRealty Inc.; Russell Capper, former president and CEO of eRealty, a company that was acquired by Prudential Real Estate Services; and Steve Polston, CEO for Home Buyers Marketing II.

Janik said the magistrate did provide some assurance that there would not be hundreds of depositions allowed for the case, though no specific limit was set.

Michael Erdman, a Chicago lawyer who has been monitoring the lawsuit, said in a posting at his Web site that the government has said it expects to conduct 45-50 depositions, excluding experts. Also, Erdman stated that the government announced it "is aware of at least forty-eight brokers nationwide that have opted out" under a listings policy adopted by the Realtor group, and has plans to take depositions from a "significant number" of them.

According to the court documents filed by the Justice Department, Beasley of ZipRealty "is likely to testify about the services that ZipRealty offers, the market benefits that competition from ZipRealty offers, and the effects of NAR policies relating to VOWs." It was the Realtor group's approved Virtual Office Web site policy, or VOW policy, that triggered a two-year investigation preceding the lawsuit.

Association leaders reacted to the lawsuit with a public announcement that the group had adopted a new, modified policy to replace its approved VOW policy, though the association later urged Realtor-operated MLSs not to enact the modified policy and not to implement controversial aspects of the VOW policy. The modified policy, known as the Internet Listings Display or ILD policy, and VOW policy provided for the online sharing or withholding (known as "opt-out" provisions) of property information at brokers' Web sites.

ZipRealty has provided "a substantial amount of documents" to the Justice Department, court documents state, and ZipRealty is now fighting in court to block an effort by the National Association of Realtors to obtain more documents that it seeks as evidence in defending against the Justice Department lawsuit. NAR had served ZipRealty with a subpoena "that essentially asks Zip to open its doors to NAR -- one of Zip's competitors -- and allow NAR access not only to the details of Zip's operations, but Zip's unique business model, its 'Coca-Cola formula,' as well," a ZipRealty lawyer stated in a court filing.

Capper, formerly with eRealty and currently with Prudential Real Estate Services, is likely to testify "about the services that eRealty offered prior to its acquisition ... the VOW-related services that Prudential offers now, the market benefits that competition from eRealty offered and that Prudential offers, and the effects of NAR policies relating to VOWs," according to court documents. Janik, meanwhile, "is likely to be asked to testify about the development of the VOW policies and the effects of NAR policies relating to VOWs."

And Polston is expected to testify "about the services that (Home Buyers Marketing II) offers, the market benefits that competition from HBMII offers, and the effects of NAR policies relating to VOWs," court documents state.

A July letter by a U.S. Department official noted, at that time, that the Justice Department was "currently aware of eleven MLS areas in which opt outs occurred," and the department plans to include evidence about those opt outs, or specific situations in which an MLS member opted to withhold property listings from an online broker-exchange system. Those markets, according to the letter, include: Jackson, Wyo.; Marathon, Fla.; Des Moines, Iowa; Hays, Kan.; York, Pa.; Cleveland, Ohio; Hudson, N.Y.; Emporia, Kan.; Detroit, Mich.; and Portland, Ore.

And a Dec. 8 letter from the Justice Department includes a list of 20 MLS areas from which the government "has requested or obtained detailed data," including: Atlanta, Ga.; Austin, Texas; Bakersfield, Calif.; Boston, Mass.; Chicago, Ill.; Dallas, Texas; Denver, Colo.; Detroit, Mich.; Emporia, Kan.; Fargo, N.D.; Hudson, N.Y.; Ithaca, N.Y.; Las Vegas, Nev.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Phoenix, Ariz.; Portland and statewide in Maine; San Diego, Calif.; Tampa and Orlando, Fla.; Washington, D.C., and Baltimore, Md.; and York, Pa.

Among the other MLS area from which the government has drawn evidence or plans to draw evidence: Cleveland, Ohio; Des Moines, Iowa; Hartford, Conn.; Hays, Kan.; Houston, Texas; Jackson, Wyo.; Los Angeles, Calif.; Marathon, Fla.; Miami, Fla.; Minneapolis, Minn.; Portland, Ore.; Sacramento, Calif.; Seattle, Wash.; St. Louis, Mo.; and Tulsa, Okla.

Justice Department officials said in court documents that they may draw upon evidence establishing that "a relatively small group of brokers controls a large share of the market" in some areas, and they may also use national surveys and other analyses of the brokerage industry in their lawsuit.

DOJ_NMG_0116553

The next status conference for the lawsuit will be held Feb. 7.

GE Buys Aerospace Unit For $4.8 Billion (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, January 16, 2007

LONDON -- General Electric Co., the world's largest aircraft engine maker, agreed Monday to buy the aerospace business of Smiths Group PLC, Britain's third-largest aerospace company, for $4.8 billion in cash.

Smiths will return $2.1 billion to shareholders, the London-based company said in a statement. GE and Smiths also announced plans for a joint venture called Smiths GE Detection.

The market reacted enthusiastically, pushing Smiths shares up more than 15 percent to 1,135 pence ($22.24) on the London Stock Exchange. The company has been under shareholder pressure to break itself up, but has resisted.

Fairfield, Connecticut-based GE said the purchases would broaden its aerospace portfolio by adding Smiths' flight management systems, electrical power management, mechanical actuation systems and airborne platform computing systems.

"GE Aviation is growing about 10 percent a year and this acquisition gives us a technology growth platform that will be accretive to our net income and will deliver immediate and future value for our investors," GE Chairman and Chief Executive Jeff Immelt said in the statement.

Smiths Aerospace has more than 11,000 employees and posted revenue of $2.4 billion in 2006. It has been working on projects like Boeing's 787 aircraft, the Airbus A380 as well as the Joint Strike Fighter military project.

Smiths will call an extraordinary shareholders meeting during the second quarter to approve the sale, which is also subject to regulatory approval.

Speaking on a conference call with reporters, Immelt said the acquisition complemented GE's existing business instead of being a consolidation, and he looked forward to "a constructive process" with EU antitrust regulators.

The European Union blocked GE's attempt to take over Honeywell in 2001, although the deal had been approved by U.S. regulators.

Smiths Chief Executive Keith Butler-Wheelhouse said the decision to sell the aerospace arm was made last autumn.

"The structure of the aerospace industry is changing _ in particular its increased capital requirements and the growing importance of supplier scale, especially as the next generation of large programs kicks in."

Butler-Wheelhouse said he had approached GE about buying its Homeland Protection unit during the aerospace negotiations, but was turned down.

The new Smiths GE Detection joint venture will combine Smiths' Detection operations with GE Homeland Protection. Smiths will own 64 percent and GE will have 36 percent, with the partners committed to holding those stakes for at least five years.

"Our combination of technologies will result in the development of more effective products and services to help make the world a safer place," Butler-Wheelhouse said.

The joint venture will have pro-forma annual revenue of about 600 million pounds ($1.2 billion).

Fortis Securities in London commented that the aerospace deal "comes close to a complete break-up" of Smiths.

"The aerospace division is extremely well-placed, having major contracts with Boeing, Lockheed Martin and others, but lacks scale for long-term independence," Fortis commented.

Butler-Wheelhouse said there are currently no talks to sell off the remaining Smiths units, but said "we reconsider these things continuously."

But Keith Bowman, equity analyst at Hargreaves Lansdown stockbrokers, said: "With the group's conglomerate mode now truly broken, the shares will now almost certainly continue to court further rumor and speculation as to the next divisional sale."

Steel Firms' Deal Challenged (WSJ)

By Jamie Miyazaki

The Wall Street Journal, January 16, 2007

Fund Argues Osaka Isn't Paying Enough For Tokyo Kohtetsu

TOKYO -- Activist investment fund Ichigo Asset Management International Pte said it has taken a 10.9% stake in steel maker Tokyo Kohtetsu Co. and is looking to challenge the terms of a merger with a larger rival that it says shortchanges shareholders.

The development is the latest in a string of moves by activist investors attempting to force Japanese management, especially at small-to-midsize firms, into doing more to maximize shareholder value.

DOJ_NMG_0116554

Ichigo's move was triggered by Osaka Steel Co.'s announcement in October that it would be conducting a stock swap with Tokyo Kohtetsu to convert the electric-furnace steel maker into a wholly owned subsidiary by March 31.

"What's frustrating is that this is a very good transaction. It makes a lot of strategic sense, but shareholders are being left behind," said Scott Callon, chief executive officer for Ichigo Asset Management's Japanese unit.

Tokyo Kohtetsu shareholders are set to vote Feb. 22 on the terms of the swap, which would give them 0.228 share of Osaka Steel for each Tokyo Kohtetsu share. That values the company at 8.23 billion yen ($68.4 million), based on Osaka Steel's share price of 2,070 yen the day before the deal was announced, on Oct. 26.

Ichigo, however, says that ratio gives shareholders just a 0.3% premium relative to the company's average share price over the month prior to the merger announcement. The fund is seeking to have that renegotiated to a 30% premium, or 0.295 share of Osaka Steel for one Tokyo Kohtetsu share.

"Ichigo seeks that the shareholders of Tokyo Kohtetsu...be offered an appropriate price which reflects the true value of Tokyo Kohtetsu," Mr. Callon said.

Ichigo, which has its headquarters in Singapore, joins a growing legion of foreign hedge funds that have sought to challenge Japanese management.

In November, the U.S.'s Steel Partners generated a blizzard of publicity after it launched a hostile takeover of noodle maker Myojo Foods Co. in a bid to force management to improve profitability and returns for shareholders. That bid ultimately failed when Myojo was rescued by noodle industry heavyweight Nissin Food Products Co. with a friendly tender offer.

Yesterday, Tokyo Kohtetsu shares ended up 1.8% and Osaka Steel rose 2.5%.

Write to Jamie Miyazaki at jamie.miyazaki@dowjones.com1

ENVIRONMENT:

Out Of Sight, Under Fire Over Leases (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

New York Times, January 16, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 15 — Johnnie M. Burton, who runs the Interior Department's troubled program to collect royalties on oil and gas pumped on public lands, is under attack and out of sight.

As director of the Minerals Management Service, Ms. Burton has faced widespread complaints from Congress for months that her agency is mismanaged, unaccountable and on the verge of losing billions of dollars owed by oil and gas companies that drill in the Gulf of Mexico.

On Thursday, the Interior Department's inspector general is expected to tell the Senate Energy Committee that Ms. Burton either ignored or remained unacceptably blind to a leasing blunder that will, if left unchanged, let oil companies escape as much as $10 billion in royalties over the next five years.

The Senate hearing comes amid rising bipartisan anger about potentially huge losses to taxpayers that have prompted an investigation by the Justice Department into the agency's multibillion dollar "royalty in kind" program.

Yet Ms. Burton — a diminutive Algerian-born former French teacher and state official from Wyoming — will not be testifying. In her place will be an assistant secretary of the Interior, C. Stephen Allred, who joined the department less than four months ago.

Ms. Burton declined requests for an interview. In response to questions, Lucy Querques Denett, associate director of Minerals Management Service, praised Ms. Burton's record in an e-mail statement.

"Her direction to staff has always been to perform our mission in conformance with the laws and regulations," Ms. Denett said. "She has also clearly impressed upon us that we are responsible for collecting every penny due and owed the American public."

Senior Interior officials have kept Ms. Burton out of public view, and many colleagues assume she will soon leave the agency.

It is quite a reversal of fortune for an official who won praise from Congress in her first three years for her expertise in arcane issues about oil and gas accounting.

Ms. Burton, 67, arrived in the United States as a refugee in 1962, after fleeing from Algeria during its war for independence from France. She moved to Wyoming after meeting and marrying a geologist from the state. After working initially as a French teacher, she teamed up with her husband in a small oil exploration business and later started an oil industry news service for the Rocky Mountain region.

DOJ_NMG_0116555

A staunch Republican, Ms. Burton served six years in the Wyoming state legislature. When voters elected a Republican governor, Ms. Burton became director of the state's Department of Revenue for six years. Because Wyoming's state revenue comes almost entirely from energy and mining, Ms. Burton became well-versed in many of the same issues posed in collecting federal royalties on oil and gas.

"She always tried to be perfect at everything she did," said Thomas Strook, a retired oilman and Republican legislator in Wyoming who was close friends with Ms. Burton during her time there.

Ms. Burton lost her job in Wyoming in 2002, after voters ousted the Republican governor, Jim Geringer. While she knew Vice President Dick Cheney, who also comes from Wyoming, acquaintances say it was her ties to state political leaders and her experience with energy taxation that won her the job at Interior.

In recent months, Republicans and Democrats alike have castigated Ms. Burton for only belatedly acknowledging a leasing blunder created by the Clinton administration in the 1990s that is likely to cost the government about $10 billion over the next five years and then insisting that there was little the government could do to fix the problem.

In July, Republicans the House Government Reform Committee accused her agency of stonewalling their investigation. In September, they accused Ms. Burton of going too far in making concessions to oil companies. That same month, the Interior Department's chief independent investigator declared that "short of crime, anything goes at the highest levels of the Department of the Interior."

Democratic lawmakers, now in control of Congressional oversight committees, have vowed to step up their own investigations and overhaul the entire program.

But Ms. Burton has hardly been acting on her own.

Under President Bush, the Interior Department's top ranks were filled with people with close ties to industry. Most prominent were Gale A. Norton, a strong advocate of domestic drilling who recently stepped down as Interior secretary and subsequently joined Shell Oil, and G. Steven Griles, a former industry lobbyist who became deputy secretary and now faces a possible indictment on charges of lying about his dealings with the disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

In November, Interior officials announced that a new task force of outside experts would evaluate the royalty program. Officials named David T. Deal, a longtime lawyer for the American Petroleum Institute, to head the panel.

"Since Bush was elected, there has been a clear agenda to promote oil and gas development wherever and however they can," said Erich Pica, a policy analyst at Friends of the Earth, an environmental policy group. "Time and again, you have seen the administration and its political appointees side with the oil and gas companies."

In 2004, when the Interior Department offered lucrative new royalty incentives to gas producers that drill very deep wells in shallow waters, the final arrangement was negotiated above Ms. Burton's level, in negotiations between top aides to Interior Secretary Norton and White House budget officials, according to current and former administration officials.

But if Ms. Burton has been less a decision maker than a loyal soldier, her responsibility for the leasing program has left her in the line of fire. Lawmakers express outrage over how Ms. Burton and other top officials glossed over the error that occurred when the Interior Department signed 1,100 offshore leases in 1998 and 1999 that let deepwater drillers escape royalties regardless of how high oil and gas prices might climb.

The incentives were supposed to stop if oil prices climbed above a "threshold price" of $34 a barrel, but leasing officials omitted the escape clause for two years.

Though midlevel officials spotted their mistake in 2000, Interior officials never mentioned the mistake in public and never tried to fix the leases until 2006.

Ms. Burton's first reaction was to blame the Clinton administration, saying she did not learn about the problem until early 2006. With anger boiling over in Congress, Ms. Burton announced in June that she would try to persuade oil companies to renegotiate voluntarily.

But the Interior Department's inspector general is expected to report this week that Ms. Burton either knew or should have known about the problem as early as 2004.

The timing is important, because energy prices were much lower in 2004 and many lawmakers contend that the government might have been able to renegotiate the leases without acrimony if it had moved earlier.

Ms. Burton told the House Government Reform Committee last September that she first learned about the problem in early 2006. But investigators say that Thomas Readinger, then associate director of the Minerals Management Service, confirmed to oil companies in 2004 that the escape clause was indeed missing.

Officials involved in the issue said that Earl E. Devaney, the Interior Department's inspector general, found no evidence that Ms. Burton lied in her testimony. But they note that Mr. Readinger was one of Ms. Burton's top deputies and contend that she had little excuse for not knowing about the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0116556

"If she didn't know about it, she should have known about it," said Representative Darrell Issa, a California Republican who headed several hearings on the matter.

In response to questions, the Minerals Management Service said in a statement on Friday that Mr. Readinger routinely discussed issues with oil companies without involving Ms. Burton.

"His contacts with industry were routine and in most instances did not rise to the level of the director," the agency said. "As associate director one of his functions was to provide industry with factual information, not decisions."

On Thursday, House Democrats hope to pass a bill that would pressure companies to change the leases. Companies that refuse to give up the loophole would either be prohibited from acquiring any additional federal leases or would have to pay a "conservation fee" of $9 for each barrel they produce.

Ms. Burton, and the Bush administration in general, have opposed the measure and said it undermined the "sanctity of contracts." But lawmakers in both parties say the measure is all but certain to pass with strong bipartisan support.

Ms. Burton faces other problems. On Tuesday, a federal jury in Denver will hear allegations by a top former auditor at the Minerals Management Service that the Kerr-McGee Corporation cheated the government out of at least $12 million in royalties — and that senior agency officials in Washington ordered him to drop the case.

The allegations are part of a lawsuit by Bobby L. Maxwell, a former auditing supervisor in Denver, who is now suing as a private citizen under a law that rewards whistle blowers for recovering money from companies that defraud the government.

Kerr-McGee has steadfastly denied any wrongdoing, and the Minerals Management Service has insisted that Mr. Maxwell's case has no merit.

But a federal judge has refused to dismiss the allegations, and a jury could reach a verdict by early February. If Mr. Maxwell wins, Kerr-McGee could be required to pay more than $50 million in back royalties and penalties. Ms. Burton would face pressure to explain why her agency swept aside Mr. Maxwell's findings.

Ms. Burton's agency is also the target of two criminal investigations by the Justice Department. One of them concerns allegations that the director and three other employees in the agency's "royalty in kind" program had consulting arrangements with companies seeking contracts to resell government oil.

Investigators hope to finish that inquiry by next spring. But that will hardly be the end. At least three separate House and Senate committees have investigations that are still in their infancy.

Oil Industry Braces For A Big Tax Hit (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, January 16, 2007

Yesterday was a holiday, but this could be a long legislative week for Rep. Gene Green (D-Texas).

That's because it may end up being a costly one for oil companies, which are unpopular in the country at large but the source of thousands of jobs in Green's Houston district.

"I have Big Oil, Middle Oil, and Little Oil," said Green, a Democrat, of his district. All three, he fears, could be nicked by an energy package House Democrats will bring to the floor Thursday, the final piece of the Six in '06 agenda to kick-start their new majority.

The bill could cost the oil industry $15 billion over 10 years. That money would be redirected into a renewable energy development fund.

Last Wednesday, members of an informal oil patch caucus, which includes Green, Chet Edwards (D-Texas) and Charlie Melancon (D-La.), briefed energy lobbyists on the package.

It includes three components. Democrats would exempt oil companies from a manufacturing tax credit Congress passed as part of a broad corporate tax package in 2004. Referred to as Section 199, the tax cut is valued at around $4 billion over 10 years.

Repealing another tax break for a type of oil exploration included in the Energy Policy Act of 2005 would add another $1 billion. The repeal would only affect the six largest oil companies, an effort to distinguish between Big Oil and the rest of the industry.

A much bigger chunk of revenue will come from trying to force oil companies to renegotiate contracts to drill in the Gulf of Mexico signed in 1998 and 1999. Companies could agree either to pay royalties, which kick in when oil prices pass a threshold, or a $9-per-barrel conservation fee. Combined, the provision could add as much $10 billion over the next decade, Green said.

Groups like the Independent Petroleum Association of America (IPAA), whose members drill 90 percent of the oil and gas wells in the United States, remain opposed.

"This measure is purely political with the goal of punishing an industry that has low favorability on Capitol Hill," said IPAA President Barry Russell.

Green, too, has misgivings. He thinks oil companies should get the same tax breaks manufacturing companies get, and doesn't think oil companies should pay a price for a mistake made by the Interior Department in the 1998 and 1999 oil leases.

Still, Democratic leaders were considering "a laundry list" of options that included proposals that would have cut deeper than the measures to be voted on this week.

"The Speaker brought us in and we worked on trying to make a bad situation better," Green said. "We have been a part of the process."

Green said he plans to vote for, if not wholeheartedly support, the Democratic energy package as a workable compromise.

"If you are a purist in Congress, you aren't going to be here very long," Green said.

Senate action on oil and gas measures this week will be limited to one panel: The Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee is holding a hearing on the royalty issue on Thursday. Interior officials and a representative from the Government Accountability Office are expected to testify.

If oil companies are playing defense, another group of special interests, often at odds on issues, are joining forces in a lobbying offensive intended to draw attention to the ever-rising health care costs.

The effort, which is called Divided We Fail, is being supported by the Business Roundtable, the Service Employees International Union and the AARP (see story on page 8).

The three big groups plan a grassroots education campaign on healthcare in states with key presidential primaries.

"There is pain at all levels at this point," Mark Kitchens, an AARP spokesman, told The Hill.

Lobbying and ethics reform will again be the debate in the Senate this week. Several amendments are awaiting floor action, including one the Taxpayers for Common Sense, a spending watchdog group, urged senators to pass.

The amendment, offered by Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), relates to congressional earmarks and is broader than a measure supported by Senate Democratic leadership.

The DeMint bill would include provisions to non-federal and federal entities under the definition of an earmark. And all earmark requests would be posted on the relevant committee's website for the public to see.

"Sen. DeMint's amendment makes several key improvements that will produce a more effective piece of legislation and make it a bigger step forward for earmark transparency," a letter Taxpayers' President Ryan Alexander sent members on Friday states.

The OPEC Energy Security Act (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 16, 2007

House Democrats have finally released the details of their "Energy Security Bill," which will be voted on this week, and they must be cursing their rotten luck. Just when they want to stick it to Big Oil for alleged price gouging, oil and home heating costs are plunging. Never mind; this was a campaign theme amid $3 gasoline, and a detail like $2 gas isn't about to stop Democrats now.

This bill is said to promote America's energy independence, but the biggest winner may be OPEC. This is a lengthy, complicated bill, but the central idea is simple: Raise taxes on domestic oil producers and then spend the money to subsidize ethanol, solar energy, windmills (so long as they're not on Cape Cod), and so on. But if you increase the cost of domestic oil production by $10 billion, you are ensuring that U.S. imports of OPEC oil will rise and domestic production will fall.

The bill also includes a "Strategic Energy Efficiency and Renewables Reserve" fund for alternative fuels. That sounds a lot like the Carter-era Synthetic Fuels Corporation -- one of the more notorious Washington boondoggles of all time, having spent $2.1 billion of tax dollars on alternative fuels before declaring bankruptcy. Today there is no under-investment by the private sector in alternative energy. The research firm New Energy Finance has found that between 2004 and 2006 investment in alternative energy doubled to $63 billion. Venture capital funding of green-energy technologies has quadrupled since 1998.

The Democrats also insist that the big five oil companies have received sweetheart deals from the government that have ripped off taxpayers. So let's take a closer look. The most controversial issue involves $6 billion in royalty payments that oil companies are said to owe the government for oil pumped from federal waters. The facts suggest otherwise.

These were leases for drilling rights in the Gulf of Mexico signed between oil companies and the Clinton Administration's Interior Department in 1998-99. At that time the world oil price had fallen to as low as $10 a barrel and the contracts were signed without a requirement of royalty payments if the price of oil rose above $35 a barrel.

Interior's Inspector General investigated and found that this standard royalty clause was omitted not because of any conspiracy by big oil, but rather because of bureaucratic bungling in the Clinton Administration. The same report found that a year after these contracts were signed Chevron and other oil companies alerted Interior to the absence of royalty fees, and that Interior replied that the contracts should go forward nonetheless.

DOJ_NMG_0116558

The companies have since invested billions of dollars in the Gulf on the basis of those lease agreements, and only when the price of oil surged to $70 a barrel did anyone start expressing outrage that Big Oil was "cheating" taxpayers out of royalties. Some oil companies have voluntarily offered to renegotiate these contracts. The Democrats are now demanding that all these firms do so -- even though the government signed binding contracts.

The Democratic bill strong-arms oil companies into renegotiating the contracts or pay a $9 per barrel royalty fee from these leases. If the companies refuse, they lose their rights to bid for any future leases on federal property. So at the same time that the U.S. is trying to persuade Venezuela and other nations to honor property rights, Congress does its own Hugo Chávez imitation.

Are American taxpayers worse off because of these leasing agreements? Hardly. It's fortunate these contracts were issued when oil prices were so low, because the oil discovered from those leases will do precisely what the Democratic energy bill will not: reduce U.S. dependence on foreign oil. One of the largest oil deposits in the Gulf was recently discovered as a result of these leases.

Democrats also want to raise about $5 to $6 billion by snatching away alleged tax breaks for Big Oil in the Republicans' 2005 energy bill. Sorry, that isn't true either. The Congressional Research Service reports that the net impact of the 2005 energy bill was to raise taxes on the oil and gas industry by $300 million. Nor does it make sense to repeal a domestic oil company's eligibility for a 2004 tax cut that reduced the effective corporate income tax rate to 32% from 35% on U.S. manufacturers. This tax cut increases the competitiveness of U.S. manufacturers that are now penalized by a U.S. corporate tax rate that is among the highest in the industrialized world. Our objection is that every U.S. company should pay the same, lower rate.

The House energy bill is nearly a carbon copy (if we can still use the word "carbon" in polite company) of California's Proposition 87. That 2006 ballot initiative would have taxed California's home-produced oil in order to subsidize "green technology" alternatives. California is a fairly liberal state, but even those voters understood that Prop 87 would have damaged the state's home oil and gas industry, increased foreign oil consumption, and raised the energy bills of state residents. It was clobbered at the polls. The House will plow ahead anyway, but let's hope the Senate has more wisdom.

Energy Time (NYT)

New York Times, January 16, 2007

Al Hubbard, the economic adviser who's coordinating the administration's energy strategy, recently promised that President Bush would produce "headlines above the fold that will knock your socks off in terms of our commitment to energy independence." Every president since Richard Nixon has talked this way, while every year the country slides further into dependency. Mr. Bush's overpromising has included a forecast that we would all be buying hydrogen-fueled cars in 20 years and his pledge a year ago to rid the country of its addiction to oil.

Still, we must hope that Mr. Bush is serious this time, because we simply cannot continue to hold our national security and the health of the planet hostage to our appetite for fossil fuels.

America's closest allies, and increasingly its governors, know this. Last week, the European Union — shaken by Russia's threatened shutdown of oil passing through Belarus — announced a menu of initiatives aimed at reducing Europe's dependence on unreliable suppliers while cutting greenhouse gas emissions with cleaner fuels and new technologies.

Here at home, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger ordered his regulators in California to require fuel oil companies and refiners to start reducing emissions of carbon dioxide and other global-warming gases. The order is expected to help jump-start the production of biofuels and, over time, hydrogen for fuel cell cars. It follows an earlier California directive requiring more fuel-efficient vehicles, and represents an important element in the state's broad plan to cut global-warming emissions from all sources by 25 percent by 2020.

For its part, Congress is churning out energy bills. But this is a recipe for paralysis unless it observes a few basic guideposts.

¶The last thing America needs is another multi-year debate leading to yet another giant bill that offers something for everyone without really changing the way this country produces and uses energy. Senators Harry Reid and Jeff Bingaman have produced the outlines of a bill that could become the template for more specific action. It sets two basic goals: reducing the country's dependency on oil and reducing the risks of global warming. And it focuses on a handful of remedies, including more efficient automobiles, the rapid development of alternative fuels and cleaner ways of producing power.

¶Partisanship and posturing must be resisted. Right now, House Democrats are fixated on eliminating unnecessary tax breaks and closing loopholes that favor the oil and gas industry. Fair enough, but that's not an energy policy. The House has been notoriously unenlightened on energy issues, and Nancy Pelosi, the speaker, has some heavy educating to do to make her colleagues full partners in this essential national enterprise.

DOJ_NMG_0116559

¶Doing things right will take serious money. In recent days, for instance, Gov. Brian Schweitzer of Montana and Senators Barack Obama of Illinois and Jim Bunning of Kentucky — any politician, that is, with coal to sell — have jumped aboard the coal-to-gasoline bandwagon as the answer to dependence on foreign oil.

The world has lots of coal, which can indeed be converted to gasoline. But the process releases enormous amounts of carbon, far more than refining oil into gasoline does. Unless we are willing to invest in technologies that can sequester carbon emissions and keep them out of the atmosphere, turning to coal could be a disaster for global warming.

So far, nobody — not the coal industry, Congress or the White House — has displayed much interest in making these investments, just as nobody except for a few states like New York and some plucky private investors has shown much interest in the investments necessary to produce biofuels on a commercial scale. Without them, we're just talking a good game, which is all Mr. Bush did last year.

Senators Poised To Reintroduce Global-warming Bill (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, January 16, 2007

Freshman Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) will follow in his predecessor's footsteps today, joining 10 colleagues to reintroduce the sweeping bill reining in the spread of global warming that was championed by former Vermont Sen. Jim Jeffords (I).

Senate Environment and Public Works Committee Chairwoman Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) is a lead cosponsor of the measure, which would mandate a reduction of U.S. greenhouse gas emissions to their 1990 levels by the year 2020. The emissions cuts would be achieved through a complex system of benchmarks and milestones for businesses that burn carbon-based fuels.

Boxer has said she will use the bill as a foundation for climate-change legislation to be crafted in committee. The initial draft has earned the backing of 13 leading environmental and government watchdog groups, which will send a joint letter of support to all Senate offices today.

The groups include the Natural Resources Defense Council, Greenpeace and the League of Conservation Voters.

Cutbacks Impede Climate Studies (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

Washington Post, January 16, 2007

The government's ability to understand and predict hurricanes, drought and climate changes of all kinds is in danger because of deep cuts facing many Earth satellite programs and major delays in launching some of its most important new instruments, a panel of experts has concluded.

The two-year study by the National Academy of Sciences, released yesterday, determined that NASA's earth science budget has declined 30 percent since 2000. It stands to fall further as funding shifts to plans for a manned mission to the moon and Mars. The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, meanwhile, has experienced enormous cost overruns and schedule delays with its premier weather and climate mission.

As a result, the panel said, the United States will not have the scientific information it needs in the years ahead to analyze severe storms and changes in Earth's climate unless programs are restored and funding made available.

"NASA's budget has taken a major hit at the same time that NOAA's program has fallen off the rails," said panel co-chairman Berrien Moore III of the University of New Hampshire. "This combination is very, very disturbing, and it's coming at the very time that we need the information most."

NOAA officials announced last week that 2006 was the warmest year on record in the United States -- part of a highly unusual warming trend over several decades that many scientists attribute to greenhouse gases. Some climate experts think that the atmospheric warming could bring more extreme weather -- longer droughts, reduced snowfall and more intense hurricanes such as the ones experienced along the Gulf Coast in 2005.

The budget for earth science programs for NASA and NOAA increased substantially in the 1990s, and that resulted in an unprecedented number of weather- and climate-monitoring missions in the past five years. But the report found that, as the current satellites deteriorate, the number of space-based Earth-observation missions will decline steadily through 2010, as will the number of instruments in space to gather weather, climate and environmental data.

"If things aren't reversed, we will have passed the high-water mark for our Earth observations," said co-chairman Richard Anthes of the University Corporation for Atmospheric Research in Boulder, Colo. "This country should not be headed in this direction. . . . We need to know more, not less, about long-term aspects of climate change, about trends in droughts and hurricanes, about what's happening in terms of fish stocks and deforestation."

DOJ_NMG_0116560

Officials from NASA and NOAA said yesterday that they had just received the report, which was jointly commissioned by the two agencies to prioritize their efforts over the next 10 years.

"This first decadal report will be valuable in our strategic planning within our Science Mission Directorate," NASA said in a statement. "NASA supports the Administration's science policies and priorities, including the way forward on Earth observing systems."

NOAA's administrator, retired Navy Vice Adm. Conrad C. Lautenbacher Jr., added: "We will be working closely with NASA to assess how our two agencies can best address recommendations. . . . Input from the scientific community is critical and this report will help us."

According to the report, NASA invested about $2 billion annually in Earth-monitoring missions from 1996 to 2001, but that figure, when adjusted for inflation, started a decline in 2002 and is projected to be $1.5 billion annually from 2006 through 2010. Since President Bush announced plans in 2004 to return astronauts to the moon and later send them to Mars, many involved with the NASA science program have warned that their efforts are being curtailed, and will be restricted further in the future.

Moore and Anthes said that about $500 million a year is needed to restore NASA's earth science program to health -- essentially a return to the budgets during the Clinton administration.

The problem at NOAA is different, and involves continuing and costly complications with its National Polar-orbiting Operational Environmental Satellite System. Initially conceived in the 1990s as the next-generation weather forecasting satellite for NOAA and the Defense Department, it is now three years behind schedule and as much as $3 billion over budget, according to the Government Accountability Office. In addition, the NSC report says, many of the weather and climate instruments that the satellite was supposed to carry have been dropped to keep costs from further increasing.

Putting together a satellite that could serve the needs of NOAA, the Pentagon and to some extent NASA proved to be "a very severe technological challenge," Anthes said. "And when problems developed, there wasn't enough money to fix the problems."

The review, written by the National Research Council of the congressionally chartered academy and released yesterday at the annual meeting of the American Meteorological Society, is the first major look at the government's long-term planning for space-based observation of Earth -- a reflection of the growing importance of the field. Almost 100 professionals participated in the priority-setting effort, which the report says was made difficult by "major shocks" regarding funding that came late in the study.

The panel offered many detailed recommendations that together sought to "restore U.S. leadership in earth science and applications and avert the potential collapse of the system of environmental satellites."

The recommendations, as outlined in a briefing document, call for increased spending on the study of ice-sheet and sea-level changes as well as extreme weather and "heat events" to better understand climate change, for restoring and expanding the "capability to observe natural hazards and environmental changes," and for making available promising new measurements that will improve weather forecasting.

The panel also recommends that NOAA restore to two satellite projects "key climate, environmental, and weather observation capabilities" that were dropped for financial reasons.

Warming Trend Visible In The Trees (USAT)

By Patrick O'Driscoll

USA Today, January 16, 2007

Rising temperatures are allowing Southern trees to thrive farther north and stressing trees used to colder weather, according to new national guidelines issued by planting experts.

The National Arbor Day Foundation last month updated the Agriculture Department's "hardiness zones" map, which was last issued in 1990. The group acted after noticing that some tree species were thriving where they had not before, while others were doing poorly in what had been a suitable region on previous maps.

The shift in zones may allow people in northern areas to experiment with flowering Southern trees such as apple and cherry where they used to plant only fir, spruce and pine, says group spokesman Woodrow Nelson.

The map divides the nation into 11 planting zones tied to average low temperatures. It shows significant boundary changes as the continent has warmed. For example, in southern Texas, the edge of one zone moved more than 200 miles north to the Panhandle. A few locations jumped two zones.

The map is based on 15 years of minimum temperatures from 5,000 observers used by the National Weather Service.

Last year was the warmest on record for the USA. Twelve of the top 25 warmest years have been since 1990.

The foundation cautions not to dig up gardens or cut down trees just because zones have shifted. The map is a guide for new plantings, especially for seedlings, which are more vulnerable to temperature change than mature trees.

DOJ_NMG_0116561

The Agriculture Department has been reworking its map for several years using 30 years of data instead of 15 but has set no release date. The department's Kim Kaplan says the 1990s "were a very warm decade, but is that a weather cycle or is that a climate cycle? We think 30 years represents the best compromise, smoothing out the natural fluctuations of weather."

Nelson says the foundation will distribute 10 million seedlings this year. "Those need to be planted under the most up-to-date information."

When Being Green Raises The Heat (NYT)

By Ken Caldeira

New York Times, January 16, 2007

Stanford, Calif.

CARBON DIOXIDE is heating up the Earth. Ice caps are melting, ocean levels are rising, hurricanes are intensifying, tropical diseases are spreading and the threat of droughts, floods and famines looms large. Can planting a tree help stop all this from happening?

To some, it's a no-brainer: We add carbon dioxide to the atmosphere every time we use energy from coal, oil or gas; but each tree can remove more than a ton of carbon dioxide from the atmosphere over its lifetime. Based on this logic, it might seem a good idea to go out and plant a tree to slow global heating.

And if you don't have the time, projects have sprung up throughout the world claiming to help cool the earth, ready to accept your money and plant a tree in your name. The computer company Dell will now donate $2 from every laptop sale to planting trees in an effort to offset the carbon dioxide emissions that result from powering their computers. For a 2 percent to 4 percent surcharge on bills, Pacific Gas and Electric will offer to offset its customers' carbon emissions by helping to preserve California's carbon-storing forests.

While preserving and restoring forests is unquestionably good for the natural environment, new scientific studies are concluding that preservation and restoration of forests outside the tropics will do little or nothing to help slow climate change. And some projects intended to slow the heating of the planet may be accelerating it instead.

Trees don't just absorb carbon dioxide — they soak up the sun's heating rays, too. Forests tend to be darker than farms and pastures and therefore tend to absorb more sunlight. This has a warming influence that appears to cancel, on average, the cooling influence of the forest's carbon storage. This effect is most pronounced in snowy areas — snow on bare ground reflects far more sunlight back to space than does a snowed-in forest — so forests in areas with seasonal snow cover can be strongly warming.

In contrast, tropical forests appear to be doubly valuable to the earth's climate system. Not only do they store copious amounts of carbon, the roots of tropical trees reach down deep, drawing up water that they evaporate through their leaves. In the atmosphere, this water may form clouds that reflect sunlight back to space, helping to cool the earth.

These findings have important policy implications. It has been suggested that agreements to limit climate change should consider carbon stored in forests. If so, they would need to consider the direct climate effects of forests so as to avoid perverse incentives to plant warming forests in places like the United States, Canada, Europe and the former Soviet Union. However, tropical forests, which are generally found in developing countries, may be due a double climate credit — one for their carbon storage and another for their cooling clouds.

What does this mean for local reforestation efforts? Consider Pacific Gas and Electric's surcharge plan. While the carbon soaked up by California's forests reduces atmospheric carbon dioxide concentrations everywhere, cooling Crete, Cancún and Calcutta, the sunlight they absorb warms the state and the surrounding region. So, it might even cool us if we were to cut down those dark forests. Lumber interests might look gleefully upon the prospect.

Clear-cutting mountains to slow climate change is, of course, nuts. The broadest goal is neither to slow the growth of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere nor to slow climate change, but rather to preserve the irreplaceable natural balance that sustains life as we know it on this planet. We want to avoid climate change so that we might pass these diverse natural riches on to future generations. In this light, preserving and restoring forests is a valuable activity, regardless of its impact on climate — we need more trees, not fewer.

But the notion that we can save the planet just by planting trees is a dangerous illusion. To preserve our environment, we must drastically reduce carbon dioxide emissions, and this will require a major transformation of our energy system. A primary goal for the next half-century should be to transform our energy system to one based on clean, safe and environmentally acceptable energy sources like wind, solar and perhaps nuclear. This means solving the real problems involved with storing and distributing power, providing energy for transportation, and using nuclear plants.

DOJ_NMG_0116562

We cannot afford to indulge ourselves with well-intentioned activities that do little to solve the underlying problem. Instead, we must demand that our political leaders do more to revolutionize our energy system and preserve our environmental inheritance for future generations.

And then we can plant a tree.

Ken Caldeira is a scientist at the Carnegie Institution's department of global ecology.

Park Police Short On Funds (WT)

By Jerry Seper And Matthew Cella, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 15, 2007

The lack of federal funding for the U.S. Park Police has jeopardized the agency's mission and employees, including vehicles too broken and dangerous to drive, officers and supervisors say.

Though no officer has been hurt or killed as a result of the shortfalls, "it is just a matter of time" before such an episode occurs, said Fraternal Order of Police official James Austin.

"While officers are held accountable for their performance, we expect the same accountability be held to those responsible for the deteriorating financial situation," Mr. Austin, chairman of the union's Park Police Labor Committee, said in a letter to Chief Dwight E. Pettiford.

Several veterans and supervisors also said the agency is having problems fulfilling its mission, which includes protecting the country's national treasures and preserving natural resources.

They said during interviews over the past three weeks that the agency needs more employees and money to meet expanded counterterrorism duties. The officers, who asked not to be identified for fear of losing their jobs, said the agency is about 20 percent understaffed.

"There is a lot of uncertainty among the officers, who know we cannot continue to operate until we get into a better position administratively," Mr. Austin told The Washington Times.

Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, the District's nonvoting congressional representative, said Congress should address the issues, not Chief Pettiford.

Mrs. Norton, a Democrat, said she would seek more money for the agency and called the letter "an astonishing story of congressional neglect."

"Capitol Police has been extravagantly funded since 9/11, [but] Park Police, with far greater territory and responsibility, is barely surviving," she said.

Lt. Scott Fear, a Park Police spokesman, would not comment on the letter or the problems it references. He said an internal letter from the union to the chief "isn't something we're going to play out in the media."

The agency officers and supervisors also pointed out again that former Chief Teresa C. Chambers warned in December 2003 about the lack of employees and resources. Mrs. Chambers' bosses at the Interior Department fired her for publicly discussing her concerns.

Some of the agency employees also said Chief Pettiford, who replaced Mrs. Chambers after she was fired in 2004, has not sought the necessary funding for additional employees and other resources, while others blamed the National Park Service, which oversees the Park Police.

The agency has 621 officers working foot, mounted, marine and air patrols. In addition to protecting the Mall, they have primary jurisdiction in Rock Creek and Anacostia parks and along the Baltimore-Washington and George Washington Memorial parkways. They also are responsible for the Statute of Liberty, the Golden Gate Bridge, dozens of D.C., Maryland and Virginia parks, and escorting Vice President Dick Cheney.

Mr. Austin said that while the Park Police has been struggling with personnel, equipment and training issues for years, members of Congress have "made it very clear" the agency is expected to be more accountable for its financial management.

He also said recruits who were given hiring dates last year and instructed to report for duty later were told their jobs were no longer available and that the agency has no plans for new hires this year. He said without an increase in the number of officers, the agency "is going to be hurting" because of pending retirements and the attrition rate.

Mr. Austin also said he expects that few, if any, new vehicles will replace older ones that need frequent and costly repairs.

"I am aware that the force cannot expend funds without approval of the National Park Service ... but the men and women of the U.S. Park Police deserve an explanation of how the system failed and when we can anticipate positive changes in the current condition," he said.

Park Service Seeks Outside Aid (WT/AP)

By Mary Clare Jalonick

DOJ_NMG_0116563

The Washington Times, January 16, 2007

The National Park Service's new director said the agency will increasingly look to outside sources for money to help maintain parks.

"We're much more business-savvy than we used to be," said Mary A. Bomar, a career employee who became director in October, in one of her first interviews as head of the agency.

A Government Accountability Office report last year said the Park Service is increasingly cutting back on visitor services, education programs and protections for natural and cultural resources because funding has failed to keep pace with operating costs. The agency also has a huge maintenance backlog.

Miss Bomar said the Park Service acknowledges it has challenges, including shrinking staff, aging facilities and a diminished visitor experience. Parks also have lost some of their relevance and connections to younger generations, she said.

She said philanthropy will be a big part of a plan announced this year, called the "centennial challenge," to revitalize and restore parks for the agency's 100th anniversary in 2016.

The agency wants to "look at projects where we could match and leverage funding," she said. "Why not?"

The agency is bringing in 12 percent of its budget from outside sources; a decade ago, almost the entire budget was federally appropriated. Officers have been holding meetings with private interests to increase awareness of the agency's fundraising efforts.

Much of the private support for national parks comes through the National Park Foundation, chartered by Congress in 1967. In past years, companies such as American Airlines Inc., Discovery Communications Inc., Eastman Kodak Co. and Ford Motor Co. have each donated millions to parks.

Some critics have been concerned that more private funding could cross a line. In 2004, the agency proposed letting some employees solicit donations, accepting contributions from alcohol and tobacco companies for the first time and giving donors the right to put their names on rooms, benches and bricks.

Those proposals were scuttled last year after criticism, and Miss Bomar said she has no plans to revisit them.

As part of the centennial challenge, the parks plan several "signature projects," including a new visitor center at Pearl Harbor in Hawaii and restoration of Ellis Island in New York Harbor.

The Park Service has acknowledged that the aging Ellis Island complex has been neglected, and the agency hopes to use some private dollars to restore the historical immigrant gateway.

Miss Bomar said she has no plans to reopen the Statue of Liberty's crown, which has been closed to visitors since the September 11 attacks.

She was less forthcoming about other park policies, saying it would be "inappropriate to discuss" the issue of snowmobiles in Yellowstone National Park.

A temporary plan caps the number of snowmobiles entering Yellowstone at 720 a day and allows 140 snowmobiles a day to enter Grand Teton National Park and the John D. Rockefeller Jr. Memorial Parkway, which connects the two parks.

Critics say the vehicles contribute to noise and air pollution in the parks.

Late last year, the agency issued a draft statement proposing to stick with the current plan. A final decision is expected by next winter.

Ethanol Could Fuel Rise In Corn (WSJ)

By Prasenjit Bhattacharya

The Wall Street Journal, January 16, 2007

Corn prices are likely to reach unprecedented highs in the next two to three years, as an ethanol boom in the U.S. is likely to limit corn's availability for food and feed use.

This has fueled concerns that corn, a staple food ingredient in many countries and widely used as feed in the poultry and livestock sectors, might become out of reach for poorer consumers, boosting food prices in general.

Soaring food prices could cause urban riots in scores of low-income countries that rely on grain imports, such as Indonesia, Egypt, Algeria, Nigeria and Mexico, said Lester Brown, founder of the Earth Policy Institute and author of a recent report about potential corn demand from the ethanol industry.

The report said the ethanol distilleries being built in the U.S. will need 139 million metric tons of corn by the 2008 harvest, far more than a U.S. Department of Agriculture estimate of the requirement, pegged at around 60 million tons.

"If the Earth Policy Institute estimate is at all close to the mark, the emerging competition between cars and people for grain will likely drive grain prices to levels never seen before," Mr. Brown said.

DOJ_NMG_0116564

Apart from being the biggest corn grower, the U.S. is also the leading corn exporter. Since 2006, corn-importing countries have became more dependent on U.S. corn as China cut back on exports amid increased domestic demand from its own ethanol industry and fears of a supply shortage.

Mr. Brown isn't alone in warning that an ethanol boom might lead to sharp rise in corn prices by creating a supply squeeze.

"If biofuels continue to expand globally, you can expect grain prices to move to their energy equivalent, until cellulose and other alternative-energy sources become commercially available," said Simon Bentley, analyst with LMC International, a commodities research firm based in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Bentley said that while sufficient land is available to expand corn output in the U.S. and Brazil, how such expansion will affect output of other crops, especially soybean, and corn prices, remains the key question.

According to a recent report by J.P. Morgan, average corn prices are expected to be about $4.03 a bushel in 2007, up 61% from $2.51 a bushel in 2006.

The most-active March contract on the Chicago Board of Trade closed at $3.9650 a bushel Friday, up 55% from the $2.5525 a bushel the contract traded at on the same day last year.

The J.P. Morgan report said the ethanol industry's growth calls for an additional 500 million to one billion bushels of corn every year.

While such a rapid rise in demand in itself will ensure high corn prices, the study added that any weather threat to the corn crop this year will be "met with record high prices."

China, a large producer and consumer of corn, is already taking measures to ensure domestic availability.

In December, the Chinese government stopped approving new corn-based ethanol plants. "As of now, it seems the government is reluctant to permit additional capacity for corn-based ethanol production, though existing corn-based ethanol plants are functioning normally," said Gu Lifeng, manager of the maize division at the state-run Cofco Maize Co., based in Beijing.

Meanwhile, Chinese corn processors are ramping up their alcohol-production capacity, which can be converted into ethanol plants if the government relaxes its stance.

Arthur Ragauskas, associate professor at the Georgia Institute of Technology, who recently co-wrote a paper on biofuels in the industry journal Science, said the key to a sustainable biofuels industry is cheaper feedstock, not expensive corn.

"As demand for corn increases, so too will its prices. This will drive the ethanol industry to look for lower-cost feedstock and as these alternatives develop, price and demand will stabilize," Mr. Ragauskas said.

He said the food-versus-fuel debate can generate new ideas if there is increased collaboration among academia, governments and the private sector to develop nonfood biomass -- such as switchgrass, recycled waste materials and corn stovers, which is the part of the corn plant that is left over after harvest -- into viable resources for biofuels.

The corn growers' lobby in the U.S., however, continues to argue that there will be enough corn in the long term to meet food, fuel and feed needs.

"All demand for corn -- food, feed, fuel and exports -- are being met. Farmers have always responded to price signals from the marketplace and historically we have had much more challenge with overproduction than shortage," said Rick Tolman, chief executive of the National Corn Growers Association.

"Market forces, not broad assumptions, are driving ethanol and corn markets....There is no conflict between [corn use for food and fuel], nor any pending crisis," Mr. Tolman said.

Conservation Group, Unions Joining Forces (WP)

By Blaine Harden

Washington Post, January 16, 2007

SEATTLE -- In a first-of-its-kind alliance that could fundamentally reshape the environmental movement, 20 labor unions with nearly 5 million members are joining forces with a Republican-leaning umbrella group of conservationists -- the Theodore Roosevelt Conservation Partnership -- to put pressure on Congress and the Bush administration.

The Union Sportsman's Alliance, to be rolled out in Washington on Tuesday after nearly three years of quiet negotiations, is to be a dues-based organization ($25 a year). Its primary goal is to increase federal funding for protecting wildlife habitat while guaranteeing access for hunters and anglers.

The unlikely marriage of union and conservation interests comes at a time when the Bush administration, with its push for oil and gas drilling in the Rocky Mountain West, has limited public access to prime hunting and fishing areas on federal land. This has triggered a bipartisan backlash from sportsmen and conservation groups, as well as from Western politicians in both parties.

The strength of that backlash is making bedfellows of blue-collar workers and old-guard conservationists, who historically have shared little but suspicion and disdain.

DOJ_NMG_0116565

"We can make the union movement and environmentalism compatible and not antagonistic," said Tom Buffenbarger, president of the International Association of Machinists. "As of late, an awareness has grown that our goals are the same. We want good air, clean water and access to the outdoors."

Jim Range, chairman of the board of the Theodore Roosevelt Conservation Partnership, which includes most of the nation's mainline hunting and fishing groups, said his organization forged an alliance with the unions in large measure because of their manpower, money and lobbying savvy.

"It opens up a tremendous amount of territory for us to work on the both sides of the aisle," Range said. He predicted that the alliance will create a sudden and historically unique influx of millions of new people to the cause of land conservation.

The American environmental movement, created and run by upper-middle-class professionals, has tended to look down its nose at blue-collar workers and their tastes in outdoor recreation, said Thomas R. Dunlap, a professor of history at Texas A&M University and an expert in the history of environmentalism.

"This alliance with unions is certainly something quite new," he said. "If it really takes off, it may have a major effect in reshaping the environmental movement for this decade."

Eric Smith, a professor of environmental politics at the University of California at Santa Barbara, describes the alliance as a "huge deal" and a "political breakthrough" that will put substantial pressure on Congress to protect large tracts of federal land, especially in the Rocky Mountain West.

"It is a real creative step in cutting across party lines," Smith said. "It is likely to be a very effective strategy."

Several senior union officials said they wanted to join forces with conservation interests because they are concerned about the declining percentage of unionized employees in the U.S. workforce. They see the alliance as a way to excite and involve blue-collar workers who are passionate about hunting and fishing.

Together with the Theodore Roosevelt Conservation Partnership, the 20 labor unions -- most of them in the building trades -- recently commissioned a poll that found that 70 percent of union members hunt or fish. As important, 72 percent of those polled said they are concerned about the loss of good places to do either. The poll also found that about a quarter of union members said they belonged to the National Rifle Association, an affiliation that displeases some Democratic union leaders.

The NRA in recent years has been strongly allied with the Republican Party and the Bush administration. Some union leaders say they want their new alliance with conservationists to lure the political allegiance of gun-owning union members away from the NRA and its political agenda.

"We know that the NRA is communicating to our members what clearly are anti-union positions and urging them to support anti-union candidates," said Harold Schaitberger, president of the International Association of Fire Fighters.

Schaitberger said the alliance with the Theodore Roosevelt Conservation Partnership "is about connecting with our members, doing good conservation work and offsetting some of these anti-union messages they are getting from the NRA."

Richard Trumka, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO and an enthusiastic supporter of the new alliance, said an additional 33 labor unions in the AFL-CIO may soon join up.

"This is a way for unions to reconnect with workers in another portion of their lives and meet a need that they have," Trumka said. "It is also going to give the conservation movement a lot more muscle."

The Other Team's Playbook (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

Washington Post, January 15, 2007

George W. Bush has managed to isolate himself on Iraq: from world opinion, from domestic opinion and now finally from his own party. But just as Democrats have gained the upper hand on foreign policy, so Republicans have gained the upper hand on health policy. The parties are changing clothes faster than my 3-year-old changes princess dresses.

The health-care inversion is not all about Washington. Last week Arnold Schwarzenegger became the third Republican governor (following Jim Douglas of Vermont and Mitt Romney of Massachusetts) to announce a plan for universal health care; only one Democratic governor (John Baldacci of Maine) has matched that. Meanwhile in Congress, the Pelosicrats have voted to make the federal government negotiate Medicare drug prices, asserting that this will save money. This claim has been analyzed by the Congressional Budget Office and judged wrong. So on this issue, unusually, the Democrats are advocating a faith-based delusion while Republicans represent the reality-based community.

What other role reversals can we look forward to? The Bush administration is already more Wilsonian than Wilson's party, but that's an old piece of cross-dressing dating back to Reagan. Bush's first Treasury secretary complained loudly that foreign aid was money down the drain, but the president has since championed foreign assistance. Stretching just a little bit, Bush may slough off fiscal vandalism and emerge as the lesser of two budgetary evils. Consider: The Democrats have already slammed the door on Social Security reform and are now sorely tempted to propose congressional initiatives that aren't paid for.

DOJ_NMG_0116566

But all this may be eclipsed. The grand prize for Nixon-to-China inversions will go to the administration if it tackles climate change.

A fantasy, you say? On Saturday I put the case for a carbon tax or a cap-and-trade system to James Connaughton, the head of the Council on Environmental Quality at the White House. Far from denouncing these policies as eco-socialist nonsense, Connaughton sounded open to them. "In concept I can agree with you," he said. Something must be done to stem demand for climate-warming energy, and although there are several ways of getting there, a carbon tax or cap-and-trade system would be the most "elegant."

Whoa! This may be spin, but it's certainly new spin. Only a few months ago, Al Hubbard, director of Bush's National Economic Council, brushed aside the idea of a carbon tax: "The American people are not interested in paying more for gasoline," he told me, sounding like a frog in the path of a herd of elephants who says he's not interested in jumping.

Next week we'll see whether Connaughton's reasonable-sounding views are reflected in Bush's State of the Union speech. The key thing to watch is whether Bush talks only about energy security or whether he emphasizes climate. Energy security is mostly a dumb objective, but climate policy is crucial.

It's true that the United States imports 60 percent of its petroleum, about double the share of two decades ago. But cutting U.S. oil imports won't insulate the nation from instability in petro-states. There is a global price for oil, and Americans will feel the hit from a terrorist attack in Saudi Arabia or a rebellion in Nigeria whether they fill their trucks with gas that's foreign or domestic. Equally, cutting U.S. oil imports won't really punish the bad guys in Iran or Venezuela. The United States has shut out Iranian oil imports since 1979, but Iran gets the global price for its crude, no matter whom it sells to.

A mistaken focus on energy security can undermine good policy on climate. If you just want to cut imports, switching cars to corn-based ethanol sounds great: The United States will get its fuel from the Midwest rather than the Middle East, a politically irresistible promise. But corn-based ethanol is only marginally better than gasoline in terms of greenhouse emissions. Federal subsidies for this technology would be better spent elsewhere -- for example on next-generation cellulosic ethanol.

The same is still more clearly true for oil shale and coal-to-oil technology. Both sources of fuel are abundant in the United States; both promise "energy security"; and both are disastrous from a climate perspective. Oil derived from coal puts about 75 percent more greenhouse gases into the air than plain oil, according to Richard Newell of Resources for the Future.

So it will be interesting to watch the administration's energy policy. Does it want to address climate change or merely the chimera of energy security? Is it ready to support the tripartisan cap-and-trade bill introduced last week by Sens. John McCain, Joe Lieberman and Barack Obama? But while you are watching the administration, keep a wary eye out for Democratic inversions, too. In a mistake he needs to disown fast, Obama recently co-sponsored a bill to subsidize coal-to-oil conversion.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

DEA Raids Sweep Valley (TVH)

By Cheryl Winkelman

Tri-Valley (CA) Herald, January 16, 2007

Lathrop, Tracy busts connected with prior ones in Stockton, Sacramento

LATHROP — Federal drug officials raided seven homes Friday, discovering millions of dollars in home-grown marijuana that may be linked to an organized criminal syndicate, agents said.

The 4,931 marijuana plants uncovered in six homes in Lathrop and one in Tracy could have produced more than 4,900 pounds of marijuana annually and garnered about $19.7 million, said Gordon Taylor, an agent with the Drug Enforcement Administration.

A concerned neighbor tipped off the DEA, Taylor said.

Marijuana plants — heated with overhead lighting — lined nearly every square inch from the front door to the back of a home in the 1700 block of McKee Boulevard in Lathrop.

Taylor said the seven homes raided Friday were connected to the 41 homes raided in Stockton, Elk Grove and Sacramento in August and September in which 18,000 plants worth an estimated $74 million were seized.

Those producing and selling the marijuana are Asian, sophisticated — plants were grown on timers — and based out of the Bay Area, Taylor said.

This organization, in our view, is like a weed, he said, spreading from Sacramento down to Lathrop and into Tracy.

Plants also were grown in unexpected places —in nicer, newer communities, such as the new developments on Lathrops west side, Taylor said.

DOJ_NMG_0116567

Eight people were arrested — and nine indicted — as of a result of the late summer raids. One man, Rui Yao Yu, 53, of Sunnyvale was arrested Friday in Lathrop,

Advertisement

Taylor said.

The amount of indoor marijuana seized by the DEA in California has almost quadrupled in the last three years: In 2004, more than 50,000 plants were seized, and more than 195,000 plants were seized in 2006, according to DEA statistics.

Taylor said he attributed that to a permissive attitude to medical marijuana, the vast profits that can be made from selling the green herb and lax state penalties.

To contact Cheryl Winkelman, call (209) 832-6144 or cwinkelman@trivalleyherald.com.

Colombian Police Arrest Drug Kingpin (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

Filed at 10:16 p.m. ET

BOGOTA, Colombia (AP) -- A reputed drug kingpin was captured Monday following a shootout, police said, ending a years-long hunt for a man wanted by American officials for allegedly smuggling tons of cocaine into the United States.

Eugenio Montoya Sanchez is believed by authorities to be a leader of the Norte del Valle drug cartel, which the FBI lists on its Web site as the "most powerful and violent drug-trafficking organization in Colombia."

Together with his brother Diego Montoya Sanchez -- the alleged mastermind of the cartel that operates out of the southern city of Cali -- he is wanted for extradition by a U.S. federal court in Miami for smuggling hundreds of tons of cocaine into the United States.

U.S. anti-narcotic authorities in Colombia had offered a $5 million reward for the capture of each of the brothers.

Eugenio Montoya Sanchez, who goes by the alias Don Hugo, was arrested in the town of El Dovio, 125 miles west of Bogota following a shootout, police said. There were no reports of any injuries.

The Norte del Valle cartel became Colombia's most powerful after the dismantling of the Medellin and Cali cartels in the 1980s and early 90s. Officials believe it is responsible for as much as 30 percent of the more than 550 tons of Colombian cocaine smuggled each year to the United States.

To protect its valuable drug routes, the cartel is believed to have worked closely with right-wing death squads whose umbrella organization, the United Self-Defense Forces of Colombia, is listed as a terrorist organization by Washington.

Authorities have been closing in on the cartel since last year, when the army killed eight members of a private army believed to be protecting Diego Montoya, who sits alongside Osama bin Laden on the FBI's 10 most-wanted list.

Since taking office in 2002, President Alvaro Uribe, a key U.S. ally in Latin America, has approved the extradition of nearly 500 Colombians to the United States, the majority on drug-trafficking charges. For his aggressive stance, the United States has awarded Colombia with more than $700 million in annual anti-narcotic aid.

Most of those extradited have been low or midlevel drug traffickers. High-profile extraditions have included Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela, brothers who helped found the Cali cartel.

Colombia is the source of 90 percent of the cocaine entering the United States. Supply has remained robust despite record extraditions and eradication of coca crops.

Is Baseball Drugs Ruling A Fourth-Amendment Foul? (WSJ)

By Adam Thompson

The Wall Street Journal, January 16, 2007

Major League Baseball has found itself embroiled in a federal investigation into whether some of its biggest stars used performance-enhancing drugs to smash home runs in record numbers. But civil-liberties advocates, as well as unions, worry that a recent legal ruling in the case will reach far beyond the diamond and give the government broad search-and-seizure powers in the digital age.

At the heart of the case is how much freedom the government has to pursue crimes discovered in electronic files while searching for evidence against other people. It turns on just how much protection the Fourth Amendment, written in the 18th century to stop unreasonable searches, affords information in a 21st-century computer database about people other than those targeted by investigators.

"The Supreme Court has never applied the Fourth Amendment to computers," says Orin Kerr, an associate law professor at George Washington University. "The federal courts of appeals are beginning to decide a bunch of cases: in 2006, there were 20 or 30 in the broad area of how the Fourth Amendment applies to computers. But each case is very fact-specific and narrow, so the law remains pretty murky."

DOJ_NMG_0116568

A three-judge panel of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco late last month upheld the government's power to seize computer files from two laboratories that performed mandatory drug tests on major leaguers, including files of professional hockey players and other nonsports patients tested by the labs.

The seizures were part of a federal investigation that began in 2002 into the Bay Area Laboratory Cooperative, which supplied sports stars with performance-enhancing drugs meant to escape detection. The San Francisco Chronicle has reported that baseball superstar Barry Bonds, who has denied knowingly using such substances, is under investigation for perjury connected to his testimony in the Balco case.

Prompted by the investigation and congressional hearings, baseball team owners called for testing all players for steroid use. Baseball's players' union eventually agreed after initial resistance, on the condition that the results would remain secret and used only to determine the extent of the problem.

Players submitted to tests in 2003 at two different laboratories, one in California and the other in Nevada. Later that year, federal investigators, who had zeroed in on 10 baseball players, began asking for the results. Armed with a search warrant for information on the 10, federal agents seized a large number of computer files containing the test results. Not only did they get test results for the 10 they were investigating, they found the names of more than 100 other baseball players who had positive tests for steroid use. A prosecutor told the Ninth Circuit the government would reserve the right to continue investigating those additional players.

CASE STUDY

· The Issue: A U.S. circuit court's decision on seizure of baseball players' drug tests extends past sports and into questions of constitutional law.

· The Debate: How much leeway should the government get in pursuing criminal cases involving the confiscation of computer files, without violating a citizen's privacy?

· What It Means: Without much word so far from the Supreme Court on Fourth Amendment computer issues, this case becomes one to watch.

"We were authorized specifically by the warrant to search every single file in all of their computers," Assistant U.S. Attorney Erika Frick said. "We took only one directory. We were authorized to search every one of those files."

The Major League Baseball Players Association and one of the labs have fought the government's actions, and three lower courts -- two in California and one in Nevada -- ruled in their favor, saying the government overstepped its authority in seizing more files than those pertaining to the 10 players it originally was investigating. A key question was whether the government could act on information it took from the labs against the players not named in the search warrant. One district court judge went so far as to ask, "What happened to the Fourth Amendment? Was it repealed somehow?"

The Fourth Amendment requires authorities prove to a judge that there is evidence that gives them probable cause to search a specific place, as well as list the persons or things to be seized.

"The reason for the warrant requirement is to make clear, before the police seize records, the purpose of the search and the scope of the search," says Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center in Washington, D.C., and an adjunct professor who teaches information privacy law at Georgetown University. "It should not be viewed as unbounded authority to gather all data that is available."

Courts have often struggled to define which searches and seizures are "unreasonable." For instance, authorities are allowed to seize evidence that lies in plain sight, even in if they lack a warrant. In a less complicated criminal case, the doctrine allows, for example, police with a search warrant for drugs to seize an illegal gun they might see on top of a table.

"Normally we all know agents can look in a closet," says Fordham University criminal law professor Dan Richman. "This is a really big and interesting closet."

The government argues it needed to cast a wide net, gathering large bunches of files to make sure to find all pertinent evidence, not merely believing the labels on files in a computer directory. If during that check prosecutors came across evidence of a crime, they could keep it and use it.

Attorneys for the players are in the process of petitioning for a hearing by a 15-judge panel of the Ninth Circuit, which can reverse the three-judge panel.

The MLB Players Association says the Ninth Circuit ruling will hand the government unprecedented entry to private information of large numbers of people accused of no crimes. The government seized files on National Hockey League players and employees of several other sports organizations and businesses unrelated to the investigation. The hockey players' union says it did not know of the governments' actions until Ninth Circuit judge Sidney Thomas issued his dissent. The NHL Players Association supports the baseball union's stance and is examining legal options.

DOJ_NMG_0116569

Addressing concerns that the ruling could open the way for the government to prospectively rummage through the files of people against whom there is no hint of evidence, Judge Diarmuid O'Scannlain, writing for the majority, suggested a magistrate examine and separate pertinent computer evidence from unrelated material. New York-based white-collar defense attorney Andrew Hruska says he likes that idea in principle but questions its applicability in the real world. Pass on 20 gigabytes of data to sift through, he says, and "you will get a very frosty stare from a magistrate."

Write to Adam Thompson at adam.thompson@wsj.com1

Sen.: Drugs Smuggled To Haiti By Plane (WP/AP)

By Stevenson Jacobs, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti -- Drug traffickers are increasingly favoring planes over boats to smuggle U.S.-bound cocaine from South America into Haiti and the Dominican Republic, U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson said Saturday.

The Florida Democrat attributed the drop in sea smuggling to a 1998 agreement allowing U.S. drug agents to patrol Haitian waters for drug traffickers.

"It has been successful and the amount of drugs coming in by sea has been reduced," Nelson told reporters at the end of a two-day visit. "But the amount of drugs coming in by airplane has considerably increased."

Most of the small planes originate from southern and northwestern Venezuela, Nelson said. Venezuela is a major transit point for drugs _ primarily cocaine _ being smuggled out of Colombia for the United States and Europe.

In a speech this past week, Haitian President Rene Preval said U.S. anti-drug aid has not significantly stopped the flow of illegal drugs into his impoverished Caribbean country.

Nelson, who sits on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said Washington's agreement with Haiti only allows U.S. authorities to stop drug traffickers at sea _ not by air _ "because obviously we cannot interdict the plane unless we shoot it down."

The senator said he agreed with Preval's call for more help fighting drug traffickers but stressed that Haiti's national police is the main defense against cocaine-smuggling flights.

"The main way of solving the drug problem coming by air into Haiti is to get the Haitian national police to where they can arrest them when they land," Nelson said.

Haiti's police is among the region's most corrupt, with only a few thousand officers to patrol the nation of 8 million.

Ecuador's Divided Loyalties (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, January 15, 2007

MANTA, ECUADOR — The United States is battling a dangerous new front in its South American drug war — just as a protege of anti-American leader Hugo Chavez comes to power in Ecuador vowing to shut down a U.S. base dedicated to narcotics surveillance.

Officials have expressed growing concern that this Andean nation is being "Colombianized," illustrated by record cocaine seizures in the last two years, the destruction of a major cocaine-processing lab and a recent gangland-style killing.

In recent months, U.S. and Ecuadorean forces have collaborated in the drug fight. But with today's inauguration of leftist President Rafael Correa, some U.S. officials worry the cooperation might be greatly curtailed.

Correa has promised to pursue a socialist agenda similar to that of his political mentor, Chavez, the president of Venezuela. Correa is the fifth left-leaning leader elected in Latin America in a little more than a year.

During his campaign, Correa promised that he would not renew the U.S. military's lease on the Manta air base, where eight drug surveillance planes have been based since 2000.

He said the departure of the U.S. aircraft after the lease expired in 2009 would affirm national sovereignty and open the way for Manta to become an international airport.

The presence of the U.S. planes rankles many Ecuadoreans, who think America's main goal is not to fight drugs but to keep a close eye on leftist guerrillas in Colombia.

Ecuador has tried to keep its distance from its neighbor's 40-year civil war and Plan Colombia, a $4-billion antidrug and antiterrorism program funded by the United States, fearing the Andean nation could be drawn into the conflict.

"Our leaders never got approval to permit the planes in the first place from the National Assembly or the Supreme Court, which they were required to do by law," said Luis Saavedra, president of the Human Rights Advisory Foundation in Quito, the capital. "This could make Manta a military target."

Base plays an integral role

DOJ_NMG_0116570

U.S. officials said that the Manta base played a valuable role in efforts to control drug shipments and that ending the American military presence would make Ecuador more attractive to Colombian traffickers.

"There's concern for all the right reasons," one top U.S. law enforcement official said last month.

Ecuadorean police investigators, U.S. pilots and both countries' navies, working together, seized 33 tons of cocaine in Ecuadorean territory and on vessels in 2006, up from a "small fraction" of that amount in 2003, said a U.S. State Department official responsible for antidrug efforts in Ecuador.

No one knows how much of the estimated 750 tons of cocaine produced annually in Colombia is shipped through Ecuador. But applying one rule of thumb, the 33 tons seized last year could represent one-third of all the cocaine that passed through the country. That would work out to 100 tons, or about 13% of Colombia's cocaine.

The eight surveillance planes were key to the seizures, U.S. officials said, but their importance extends beyond Ecuador. Flights from the Manta air base played a part in 60% of drug interdictions by U.S. and allied fleets in the eastern Pacific last year, said the U.S. military's Southern Command in Miami.

Increased levels of drug trafficking in Ecuador are illustrated by the seizures in the eastern Pacific of Ecuadorean boats packed with cocaine.

They have outnumbered Colombian boats 4 to 1, said the State Department official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because she did not have permission to comment on the record. The amount of cocaine on the boats ranged from 2 to 7 tons, officials said.

"Seizure of Ecuadorean 'mother' boats were unheard of a few years ago," said the State Department official, referring to large boats.

Going through Ecuador

The increase is due to vigilance at Colombia's ports and in its airspace, also a result of the U.S. surveillance planes based in Ecuador, officials say.

The effort has forced drug traffickers to send an increasing share of Colombia's cocaine through Ecuador en route to the North American market.

Boats typically travel as far as 2,000 miles off Ecuador, past the Galapagos Islands, before transferring the cocaine to high-speed boats that complete the smuggling trips to Mexico and Central America, guided by global positioning systems and refueled by makeshift tankers.

"Boats are pushing farther and farther out," said U.S. Air Force Lt. Col. Javier Delucca, the ranking U.S. military officer in Ecuador.

Numerous Colombian drug traffickers have moved to Ecuador in recent years, easily fitting in with the estimated 300,000 Colombians who have sought refuge from the civil war in the last decade.

Antidrug officials say many of the smugglers have clustered around Santo Domingo de los Colorados, a town about 50 miles west of Quito that has become a sort of drug trafficking nerve center.

"There are colonies of refugee and undocumented Colombians in every corner of the country now, mostly dedicated to legal activities. But some are criminals who come here to break the law," Gen. Bolivar Cisneros Galarza, a top commander in Ecuador's anti-narcotics police, said in a telephone interview.

Correa has made no mention of ending U.S.-Ecuadorean cooperation in the drug fight, but some U.S. officials worry that he might follow Chavez's lead and do just that.

U.S. officials in Ecuador, including Ambassador Linda Jewell, have said they will try to persuade Correa to change his mind about the Manta base. The U.S. government is offering to help develop the base as a bigger commercial airport and pay for another runway — if Correa lets the U.S. planes stay.

The U.S. Embassy has encouraged officials and businesses in Manta to tout the base's economic importance, with its 450 local jobs and $7 million in annual spending.

But the chances of changing Correa's mind appear slim, largely because he campaigned so hard on the issue and because of the anti-U.S. tide in the region.

But if he were to change his mind, the decision could be based on self-interest, and that's the tack U.S. officials are taking. Losing the drug surveillance flights, which moved to Ecuador in January 2000 from bases in the Panama Canal Zone, might make his country more vulnerable to traffickers and organized crime.

'That's a scary thing'

Those fears were sparked by the raid of a cocaine-processing lab in El Oro province near the city of Guayaquil last fall. U.S. and Ecuadorean officials said it was the biggest lab seized in that country and was capable of producing as much as 4 tons of cocaine a month.

DOJ_NMG_0116571

"In the past, Ecuadorean cocaine-processing labs were Colombian border spillover situations or hidden somewhere deep in the jungle," said a U.S. anti-narcotics official.

"This one was located right along the coast and was big enough to process 4 tons of Peruvian and Colombia base a month. That's a scary thing."

Also worrisome to many was the gangland-style slaying in December of Blanca Cando, the secretary to Superior Court Judge Pavlova Guerra, who has presided over money-laundering cases involving suspected drug traffickers. Cando was gunned down while having coffee with friends.

For some, the killing was too reminiscent of the deadly efforts to intimidate judges in Colombia.

"Hit the low-level functionary so that the higher-level boss gets the message to back off," one U.S. government official here said.

Cisneros, the police commander, declined to comment on the Manta lease issue but said that U.S.-Ecuadorean cooperation was "excellent" and that the eight U.S. aircraft were a positive factor in the nation's drug fight.

U.S. officials said losing the lease on the base, apart from hurting Ecuador's antidrug efforts, would also be a strategic setback for the United States. Drug traffickers' routes already test the surveillance aircraft's range, and the planes' capabilities would probably be curtailed by their having to be relocated.

"The base here is a terribly important asset in the war on drugs," said Delucca, the U.S. Air Force officer. "The geographical position of Manta is invaluable."

Member Of Ruling Kuwait Family Condemned (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

Filed at 1:55 p.m. ET

KUWAIT CITY (AP) -- A court has convicted a member of Kuwait's ruling family for drug trafficking and it condemned him to death, according to a ruling obtained Monday.

It is believed to be the first time that a member of a ruling family in one of the Gulf Arab states received the death sentence for a drug offense.

The crimes of Sheik Talal Nasser Al Sabah "threatened society ... especially young people," who bought hashish and cocaine from him, Judge Humoud al-Mutawah said in his verdict Sunday.

Sheik Talal had "willingly walked the path of evil" and "deserved no mercy," al-Mutawah said.

It was not immediately clear how closely related Sheik Talal is to the head of the ruling family, which has hundreds of members.

Prominent criminal lawyer Najib al-Wugayyan hailed the verdict and sentence. "This is a magnificent indication to all that nobody is above the law," he said.

The judgment can be appealed.

The panel of three judges also found Sheik Talal guilty of laundering the money he made from trafficking, and illegal possession of two pistols and a shotgun.

The court said hashish and cocaine were found at his home, along with scales and a mixer used to prepare the drugs for sale.

In addition to the death sentence, the court fined Sheik Talal $35,000 for drug trafficking.

For illegal possession of firearms, the court sentenced him to three years in jail. And for laundering about $3 million from the trafficking, the court sentenced him to seven years' imprisonment and ordered him to pay an identical sum as a fine.

The laundering was done by investing the money in real estate in Lebanon and the United Arab Emirates.

Sheik Talal's lawyer could not be reached for comment.

The court convicted three of Sheik Talal's associates -- Faisal al-Enezi, Amirulislam Ali and Abdullah Shignab -- of drug trafficking and sentenced them to life imprisonment.

Two other associates -- Tazhi Hamed and Fadi Habash -- were sentenced to seven years in jail each for money-laundering. The court also ordered them each to pay $3 million in fines -- the same amount as imposed on Sheik Talal.

A Rifle In Every Pot (NYT)

By Glenn Reynolds

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

Knoxville, Tenn.

DOJ_NMG_0116572

IT'S a phenomenon that gives the term "gun control" a whole new meaning: community ordinances that encourage citizens to own guns.

Last month, Greenleaf, Idaho, adopted Ordinance 208, calling for its citizens to own guns and keep them ready in their homes in case of emergency. It's not a response to high crime rates. As The Associated Press reported, "Greenleaf doesn't really have crime ... the most violent offense reported in the past two years was a fist fight." Rather, it's a statement about preparedness in the event of an emergency, and an effort to promote a culture of self-reliance.

And it may not be a bad idea. While pro-gun laws like the one in Greenleaf are mostly symbolic, to the extent that they actually make a difference, it is likely to be a positive one.

Greenleaf is following in the footsteps of Kennesaw, Ga., which in 1982 passed a mandatory gun ownership law in response to a handgun ban passed in Morton Grove, Ill. Kennesaw's crime dropped sharply, while Morton Grove's did not.

To some degree, this is rational. Criminals, unsurprisingly, would rather break into a house where they aren't at risk of being shot. As David Kopel noted in a 2001 article in The Arizona Law Review, burglars report that they try to avoid homes where armed residents are likely to be present. We see this phenomenon internationally, too, with the United States having a lower proportion of "hot" burglaries — break-ins where the burglars know the home to be occupied — than countries with restrictive gun laws.

Likewise, in the event of disasters that leave law enforcement overwhelmed, armed citizens can play an important role in stanching crime. Armed neighborhood watches deterred looting in parts of Houston and New Orleans in the aftermath of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Precisely because an armed populace can serve as an effective backup for law enforcement, the ownership of firearms was widely mandated during Colonial times, and the second Congress passed a statute in 1792 requiring adult male citizens to own guns.

The twin purposes of self and community defense may very well lie behind the Second Amendment's language encompassing both the importance of a well-regulated militia and the right of citizens to keep and bear arms. As the constitutional and criminal law scholar Don Kates has noted in the journal Constitutional Commentary, thinkers at the time when the Constitution was written drew no real distinction between resisting burglars, foreign invaders or domestic tyrants: All were wrongdoers that good citizens had the right, and the duty, to oppose with force.

Greenleaf's ordinance is consistent with this approach. But it may also serve another purpose.

Experts don't think the Kennesaw ordinance, which has never actually been enforced, did much to change gun ownership rates among Kennesaw residents. And, given that Greenleaf's mayor has estimated that 80 percent of the town's residents already own guns, the new ordinance can't make all that much of a difference. But criminals are likely to suspect that towns with laws like these on the books will be unsympathetic to malefactors in general, and to conclude that they will do better elsewhere.

To the extent that's true, we're likely to see other communities adopting similar laws so that criminals won't see them as attractive alternatives. The result may be a different kind of "gun control."

IMMIGRATION:

FBI Probes Fatal Ariz. Border Shooting (NSDY/AP)

By Associated Press, January 15, 2007, 7:34 Pm Est

Long Island Newsday, January 16, 2007

Francisco Javier Dominguez-Rivera, 22, of Puebla, Mexico, was killed Friday in a confrontation with the unidentified agent north of the U.S.-Mexico border between Bisbee and Douglas.

On Sunday, Calderon expressed his "most energetic protest" against the shooting.

A group of seven people were crossing the desert and the agent took six of them into custody without incident, authorities said.

But the agent and Dominguez-Rivera began fighting, authorities said. The agent, who believed his life was in danger, shot and killed the man, the Border Patrol said previously. An autopsy was scheduled Wednesday.

The agent was put on paid administrative leave pending the investigation.

FBI spokeswoman Deborah McCarley and Gustavo Soto, a spokesman with the U.S. Border Patrol Tucson sector, both declined Monday to provide details of the case.

DOJ_NMG_0116573

TAX:

IRS's Free File Gets A Revamp (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, January 16, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Internal Revenue Service today is expected to unveil its revamped Free File program, which allows taxpayers with adjusted incomes of less than $52,000 a year to file their tax returns online for free through privately run Web sites.

IRS officials estimate about 95 million people will qualify to use the program.

About 20 companies, including two that will offer services in Spanish, are expected to join the program, created five years ago to promote online filing and cut paperwork.

In recent years, the program has come under fire from Congress and the National Taxpayer Advocate, a quasi-independent government office that addresses various taxpayers' concerns.

Some critics have charged that the IRS gave the private companies too much leeway to market add-ons, and, in some cases, confused many consumers into thinking that paying for the extra services wasn't optional.

In congressional hearings last year, Nina Olson, chief of the National Taxpayer Advocate, said many taxpayers complained about the Free File program.

One of the changes in this year's program includes elimination of refund-anticipation loans, in which companies lend money to filers -- sometimes at high interest rates -- who don't want to wait for the IRS to send expected refunds.

Taxpayers also will be able to use the Free File program to request refunds, usually ranging from $30 to $60, due to the end of the telephone excise tax.

Except for the cost of postage, filing is free, at least for those who do their own taxes.

Filing online does carry a cost because of the software program used to fill out forms, often in the $30 range.

The IRS doesn't want high fees to discourage online tax filing because it is easier and more accurate.

Write to Robert GuyMatthews at robertguy.matthews@wsj.com1

The Light-Touch Tax Audit (NYT)

The New York Times, January 15, 2007

With corporations posting record profits amid nonstop accounting scandals, one would assume that the Internal Revenue Service is looking long and hard at big companies' tax returns. Unfortunately, the opposite is true.

Since 2003, I.R.S policy has called for spending less time on any one large corporate audit, with the purported aim of auditing more big businesses. But as The Times's David Cay Johnston reported last week, I.R.S. auditors are being pushed by the agency's top officials to prematurely close audits of large corporations with agreements that they pay only a fraction of the additional taxes that could be collected. Dozens of auditors said they were instructed to limit their examinations to issues that the I.R.S. and the companies agreed to in advance, even if suspicious deductions or other questionable tax tactics emerged during the audit.

Recently released I.R.S statistics — which the agency is required to disclose, but which it had long withheld — underscore Mr. Johnston's report. In 2006, the time devoted to each large-company audit was nearly 21 percent below what it was in 2002. From 2003 through 2005, an ever larger share of companies was audited; but in 2006, the share declined from a high of 44 percent in 2005, to 34 percent, about where it was in 2002.

The I.R.S. says its light-touch approach is successful because auditors are finding much more tax owed for each hour they work than they did in 2002. But auditors interviewed by Mr. Johnston dispute that claim. They say that abusive and illegal tax shelters have become so pervasive that it's easy to find additional taxes due. So the overall figure rises, even though companies are being allowed to pay far less than they owe. Economists and tax experts who have looked at the I.R.S. statistics have also raised the possibility that an increase in corporate noncompliance is behind the increased tax-due amounts, not more effective auditing.

Congress must ensure that the agency justifies its policy or changes it.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Plots Health-Care Push (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0116574

By John D. Mckinnon And Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, January 16, 2007

WASHINGTON -- With health-care costs emerging as one of voters' biggest domestic concerns, President Bush is considering promoting a tax-code change making it easier for people to buy health insurance for themselves in the open market, rather than relying on employers.

The president's coming State of the Union address and annual budget proposal are likely to include other ideas for easing the crunch, Republicans close to the White House said. Those would build on the administration's efforts to encourage states to create special insurance pools for lower-income individuals and small businesses. The administration also is likely to make another push for expanding health savings accounts. The accounts, first authorized in 2003, allow people to save tax-free for health-care needs provided they choose low-cost, high-deductible coverage.

QUESTION OF THE DAY

1 · Vote: Would you support a universal health-care plan?2

The ultimate idea is to expand health-care coverage while reducing cost pressures, in part by giving people more of a financial incentive to be smart shoppers.

Mr. Bush's emphasis on health issues comes as cost and coverage complaints are drawing attention in Washington -- and in state capitols throughout the country. As employers shift health coverage burdens to employees, state governors -- namely Republicans Mitt Romney of Massachusetts and Arnold Schwarzenegger of California -- as well as the new Democratic Congress have paid more attention to the issue, putting new pressure on the president to join the debate.

The examination of health care comes as Mr. Bush looks to define a domestic agenda in the final two years of a presidency that increasingly is being overshadowed by Iraq and hemmed in by newly empowered Democrats. In a recent op-ed in The Wall Street Journal, Mr. Bush listed "affordable health care" among "the biggest issues facing the American people" along with energy security and comprehensive immigration reform. He added "I look forward to working with Congress on these difficult issues." White House spokesman Tony Fratto declined to comment on specific proposals under consideration but said: "The President has said that for all Americans, we must confront the rising cost of care, strengthen the doctor-patient relationship, and help people afford the insurance coverage they need."

While President Bush advocated some health-care changes last year -- an expansion of health savings accounts and computerization of patient records -- they were more modest than what is currently under consideration.

The big new idea this year could involve tax changes around employer-provided plans. While officials said major decisions are still being made, the White House tax proposal likely would cap some taxpayers' ability to exclude employer-provided health care from their income, as part of an effort to broaden availability of health-care insurance.

Currently, health-care benefits aren't subject to federal income tax, no matter how generous the benefit -- a factor many economists have said has contributed to health-care inflation. The Bush administration is considering a change that would tax some executives' "gold-plated" plans and possibly even affect some rank-and-file union members with particularly generous benefits. The savings would be used to pay for tax credits for lower-income people who buy their own health insurance or for state insurance pools, or both. The effect could be relatively small now but could grow over time.

The current policy of excluding employer-provided health insurance benefits from employees' tax returns costs the government more than any other tax policy -- about $900 billion between 2006 and 2010, counting all health-related breaks. That is more than either the mortgage-interest deduction or the various breaks for retirement savings. Thus, even tinkering around the edges of the exclusion could produce large amounts of revenue for subsidizing coverage for lower-income people.

Some of the administration's possible proposals, particularly the changes to the tax code, are likely to meet resistance from Democrats, who worry about further undermining the market for employer-provided coverage and driving up costs for those who remain in the system.

Helping states fix the problem of the uninsured could attract bipartisan support. Democrats said much depends on whether the Bush administration backs up its rhetoric with money. A few Democrats -- as with their Republican counterparts -- are willing to encourage a shift from employer-provided plans to state-sponsored ones.

State insurance pools have begun to appear in states such as Massachusetts in recent years, using funding from the federal government's insurance programs for low-income people, such as Medicaid. The trend has been fueled by looser federal restrictions on how funds from low-income health entitlement programs can be used. Experts have said they expect the administration to continue that in the coming reauthorization of one of the federal programs, the State Children's Health Insurance Program.

Mr. Bush's proposals likely will be the starting point for a Washington debate on health-care coverage plans.

Tomorrow, a bipartisan group including Sen. Jeff Bingaman (D., N.M.) and Sen. George Voinovich (R., Ohio) plans to introduce legislation that would provide grants to states to craft their own plans for helping the uninsured.

DOJ_NMG_0116575

Last week, Massachusetts Sen. Edward Kennedy, who chairs the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, called for eventually expanding Medicare to all Americans, regardless of age, starting with people 55 to 65, and those younger than 20. Currently, Medicare generally guarantees health-care coverage to those age 65 and older.

Political experts have said the focus on health care reflects the effect that soaring costs are having on voters, particularly aging Baby Boomers, who are using more health care and worrying about costs. Polls show that, increasingly, people tend to rank health care among the biggest financial woes they face, says Karlyn Bowman, a polling expert at the American Enterprise Institute.

Unlikely Allies Advocate Healthcare Overhaul (LAT)

By Tom Hamburger And Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, January 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — In a sign of how the political climate is shifting, powerful business interests that once teamed up to defeat Democratic healthcare plans are joining with labor unions and other unlikely allies to advocate extending medical insurance to millions of Americans.

Among the champions of change is the trade group representing the nation's leading health insurance firms. That industry developed the "Harry and Louise" television ad campaign, which helped turn public opinion against the universal healthcare plan proposed by President Clinton and then-First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton in 1994.

So devastating was the defeat that Washington politicians have hesitated to offer comprehensive proposals for change since then. Although Democrats talked of healthcare costs in the 2006 campaign, they have offered only modest proposals despite winning control of both chambers of Congress. Republican governors have offered some of the most ambitious plans recently, but GOP leadership in Washington has been muted.

Now, nongovernmental coalitions of seemingly strange bedfellows are stepping into the vacuum.

Today, the president of the Service Employees International Union will stand with the director of the Business Roundtable, which represents the nation's leading corporations, to announce one campaign to overhaul healthcare.

On Thursday, private health insurance companies will join with doctors' organizations and health-activist groups on the left to announce a plan for universal coverage.

"This week marks a kind of tipping point," said Karen Ignagni, who represents the health insurance industry in Washington. Members of the trade group she now leads — America's Health Insurance Plans — produced the Harry and Louise commercials, in which a middle-aged couple expressed alarm about the prospect of government meddling in their personal decisions about healthcare.

"The health insurance problem has been with us for decades," Ignagni said. "With all these different efforts, you are seeing a consensus emerge that the time for action is now."

Major questions remain about how a healthcare overhaul program would work — including how it would be financed and who would participate. But broad agreement on the need for action is important, because the groups involved might have the political clout and lobbying muscle to push a plan through Congress.

The two plans being announced this week — the details of which were not available — come in the wake of ambitious blueprints for universal health coverage put forward by two prominent Republicans: in California by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and in Massachusetts under Gov. Mitt Romney, who has since left office and is a 2008 presidential candidate

The Massachusetts plan — the only comprehensive state proposal that has been enacted — relies primarily on a requirement that individuals get health insurance. The state redirected funding that had been used to cover hospital care for the uninsured to subsidize health insurance premiums. The plan also levies a token fee on employers that do not provide coverage.

California's plan would rely on a combination of requirements for individuals and new fees — essentially taxes — on businesses and healthcare providers.

Governors from a dozen other states are considering similar proposals.

Now, Democratic constituent groups, including labor and seniors' organizations, are joining with big business to demand a substantive response to the nation's healthcare problem, which has left 46 million people uninsured and has undermined American corporations' ability to compete internationally.

"You take these two events, and you take what's happening in the states, and what you are seeing is a real surge of interest in the issue of health reform, and the feeling that enough is enough about saying that the sky is falling: Let's start to do something to put some answers out there," said John Rother, director of policy and strategy for AARP, the seniors' lobby. AARP is part of both nongovernmental coalitions.

The proposals may embolden Democrats, but party leaders note caution within their ranks. "I think the Democrats are concerned lest they seem too radical," said Rep. Pete Stark of Fremont, chairman of the House health subcommittee. "We've got to win again in 2008, and I don't think we want to come out and talk about universal coverage or anything that sounds like socialized medicine." Stark is author of a plan that would use Medicare as a model to cover the uninsured.

DOJ_NMG_0116576

Andrew Stern, the service employees union leader, has met in recent months with corporate chiefs around the country, urging a joint effort on a comprehensive overhaul.

His goal is to force action in Washington.

Stern said the traditional job-based medical insurance system "simply isn't working."

The broader coalition of insurance companies, doctors and activists on Thursday will present a detailed proposal to expand healthcare coverage to as many Americans as possible — starting with children. Coalition members range from generally conservative groups such as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce to Families USA, a liberal advocacy group that was one of the principal champions of the Clinton healthcare proposal.

After the collapse of the Clinton plan, healthcare moved off center stage in Washington. President Bush has avoided sweeping proposals, focusing instead on tax credits to make insurance more affordable for individuals and small businesses.

Bush has been a strong advocate of health savings accounts, in which people pay out-of-pocket, usually routine medical bills from a tax-sheltered savings account while carrying lower-cost catastrophic insurance for major expenses.

Many businesses have started offering these accounts to employees, but it's not clear whether large numbers of previously uninsured people are signing up.

In the meantime, employer-sponsored coverage has continued to erode. The share of workers covered through their jobs fell from 81% in 2001 to 77% in 2005. Many small and midsize employers no longer offer coverage, and some new businesses deem their employees self-employed contractors responsible for their own benefits.

Government health programs have expanded, but not enough to take up the slack. About 16% of the population is uninsured. Healthcare spending is rising faster than inflation, although the rate of increase has eased in the last few years.

Congressional Democrats, traditionally the leading advocates of expanded coverage, largely have been left on the sidelines in the latest maneuvering. Although many stalwarts, including Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), remain committed to covering all Americans, the party lacks a unified position.

"What we are building up to is a year, 2007, in which a lot of people are willing to discuss the benefits and costs of universal coverage, but I don't think we're going to make legislative headway," Stark said.

One Democratic senator, Ron Wyden of Oregon, is expected to introduce a healthcare bill this week. His proposal — which was unveiled in December and combines Republican and Democratic ideas — would mandate that individuals get their own coverage but require most employers to contribute to the cost.

Groups Unite On Healthcare (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, January 16, 2007

Unusual alliances of interest groups are coalescing to bring a unified front before Congress to spur federal action on healthcare costs and the uninsured.

A series of separately planned announcements this week illustrates an emerging consensus among sectors, such as big business and organized labor, that long have been at loggerheads when it comes to health benefits that they must exert combined pressure on policymakers.

This recognition of common interests is rooted in the fact that employers, workers, retirees, health-insurance companies, healthcare providers and the government all are burdened by healthcare costs that rise faster than inflation and by the expense of providing medical care to people without coverage, representatives of the groups agreed.

In addition, the enactment of a universal healthcare program in Massachusetts, the Democratic takeover of Congress and the march toward the presidential campaign season have emboldened advocates of healthcare reform to jumpstart the debate, said Diane Rowland, executive director of the nonpartisan Kaiser Commission on Medicaid and the Uninsured.

Today, the Business Roundtable, Service Employees International Union (SEIU) and the AARP will launch a campaign they are calling Divided We Fail. The groups intend to put a spotlight on healthcare costs and coverage through this initiative.

“There is pain at all levels at this point,” an AARP spokesman, Mark Kitchens, said. “That’s one of the things that’s different now.”

“There is enthusiasm that maybe now we can really roll up our sleeves and get things done,” the roundtable’s director of public policy, Maria Ghazal, said.

“There is clearly momentum building for fundamental changes to the healthcare system,” SEIU spokeswoman Sara Howard wrote in an e-mail. “For the first time, business, labor and consumers are standing together to address this problem.”

DOJ_NMG_0116577

Since the Clinton administration's effort to enact universal healthcare failed in the early 1990s, Congress has shied away from promoting broad federal actions to address the issues of costs and coverage. The Clinton and Bush administrations, the Republican-led Congress and the two parties' leading presidential candidates instead focused on narrower initiatives.

In the meantime, the private sector has continued to struggle with maintaining adequate health benefits in the face of escalating expenses.

"Business, labor and consumers are all feeling the same stress," Ghazal said. She also noted that surveys of her organization's CEO members have shown healthcare spending to be the No. 1 cost pressure facing large employers.

The three organizations hope to compel Congress and the 2008 presidential candidates to engage in a full debate about the future of the healthcare system. "This is really going to be an enduring effort for us," Kitchens said, one that will extend from this year through the presidential campaign and beyond.

The alliance plans coordinated activities such as town-hall meetings on healthcare issues in key presidential primary states and joint appearances and op-eds by representatives of the three groups, Kitchens said.

"We intend to hold our political leaders accountable for this," Kitchens said.

"Everyone is positioning themselves to try and promote this as an issue that will be a big player in the presidential elections," Rowland said.

A central theme of the Roundtable-SEIU-AARP initiative will be that all players, from employers to workers to the government, have a stake in the success of healthcare reform and that all of these players must do their part, Kitchens said. "We really are going to be stressing solutions and efforts from many different sectors," he said.

Ghazal emphasized that the alliance will not promote a government-managed universal healthcare program. "The foundation of our nation's healthcare system should still definitely lie in the private marketplace," she said.

The business community's belief that the government has to step up is not tantamount to an endorsement of government-run healthcare, Ghazal emphasized. "There's more of a recognition that the government is already paying for more than 50 percent of healthcare," she said.

The Roundtable-SEIU-AARP alliance does not plan to propose a specific set of policy recommendations, Kitchens said. "We don't always see eye-to-eye and we know that," he said.

Significant challenges await any legislative push on healthcare reform that efforts such as these would have to overcome. Strong philosophical disagreements persist between Democrats and Republicans about the appropriate role of government in providing healthcare coverage and resentment lingers from the heated fight over the Clinton plan.

In addition, the 2008 presidential candidates, especially those currently serving in the Senate, will want to highlight their own ideas, which could dampen their interest in making compromises.

Nevertheless, some lawmakers already have taken steps to move healthcare reform forward this year. Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee Chairman Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) held a hearing last week on healthcare coverage and costs that featured some of the same groups launching initiatives this week.

Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) will take to the Senate floor for an hour this morning "in search of [the] missing federal debate on healthcare reform," according to a media advisory, and to promote his own universal-coverage legislation.

Tomorrow, Sens. Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.) and George Voinovich (R-Ohio) and Reps. Tammy Baldwin (D-Wis.), John Tierney (D-Mass.) and Tom Price (R-Ga.) will introduce their healthcare reform legislation.

On Thursday, a group of healthcare-industry organizations, business interests and consumer groups will launch their Health Coverage Coalition for the Uninsured.

The liberal advocacy group Families USA will stand with the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the AARP and associations representing health insurers, doctors, hospitals and other healthcare providers at this event.

The aim of the coalition is "to build a consensus that can be presented to Congress and provide … a set of principles that can inform the national debate on healthcare coverage," a spokesman for AHIP, Mohit Ghose, said. AHIP offered its own plan for expanding healthcare coverage shortly after the November elections.

"It does show a coming-together of varied interests to push for a common goal, which is to increase access to health insurance coverage for millions of people," Ghose said.

State Plans Miss The Point (USAT)

By Don Mccanne

USA Today, January 16, 2007

Americans need more than affordable insurance; they need affordable health care. California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger plans to copy the Massachusetts reform in shrinking the numbers of uninsured people by forcing them to buy stripped down, bare-bones policies.

DOJ_NMG_0116578

With premiums for family coverage now averaging $10,000 a year, the only way that states can make premiums affordable is to strip down the plans, which then forces policyholders to pay out of pocket when they get sick. High deductibles, co-payments and benefit reductions are destroying the financial protection that insurance should provide.

Half of U.S. bankruptcies are a result, in part, of medical illness or medical bills. Three-quarters of Americans who are forced into medical bankruptcy had health insurance at the onset of the illness that bankrupted them. Worse, suffering and death can occur when patients cannot afford the care that their private insurance does not cover.

The big winners in the Schwarzenegger and Massachusetts health plans are private health insurance firms. The new insurance mandates will hand them billions in wasteful administrative fees that do not occur in government insurance programs such as Medicare. Private insurers will continue their cream-skimming, enrolling primarily the low cost, healthy workforce and their families, while leaving the costs of the unprofitable sick and elderly to the taxpayers.

State health programs are interdependent on federal programs such as Medicare, Medicaid and the Veterans Affairs' system, and are regulated by federal laws. The states alone cannot enact the structural changes that would be required to cover everyone and control costs. They are limited to building on the existing system by tweaking it to nominally expand coverage to the uninsured.

Money is not the problem. We already are spending enough on health care to provide high-quality, comprehensive services for everyone. But our inefficient, private-sector insurance bureaucracies have failed and need to be replaced with single-payer national health insurance. Every other developed nation has covered its citizens through some form of non-profit national health insurance.

Don McCanne, M.D., is a senior health policy fellow of Physicians for a National Health Program.

Both Plans Go Too Far. Government Meddling Can't Fix This. (USAT)

By Sally C. Pipes

USA Today, January 16, 2007

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has proposed a $12 billion health care package that he says should be the model for the rest of the country. Forcing people to buy health insurance will not solve the problem of the uninsured, make America healthier or decrease the amount of money we spend on health care. Such schemes will increase taxes, kill jobs and destroy private health care markets. They are also the next logical step on the path to single-payer health care.

"Everyone in California must have health insurance," Schwarzenegger declared. This is already true for automobile insurance, yet up to 25% of the state's residents leave home without it.

In Massachusetts, only four in 10 of those eligible for the totally free Commonwealth Care have signed up. Premiums for the subsidized plans are set as high as 6% of the insured's income, prompting talk of not enforcing the individual mandate.

Politicians justify these plans by alleging unfair cost shifts from the uninsured to the insured. Yet these plans rely on massive cost shifts. In Massachusetts, federal taxpayer money will be shifted to providers. In California, the governor calls for an increase in rates for providers from government insurance and then taxes some of this back with new taxes on physicians and hospitals. This is simply a way to increase taxes on private plans and send the money to government plans.

Schemes based on individual mandates will require new and extreme regulation of the private insurance market. Under California's plan, insurers won't be able to turn down anyone based on health status or age, a policy that causes premiums to skyrocket. In 1993, premiums jumped 500% when New Jersey passed a similar regulation.

Americans are highly conflicted when it comes to health care. We think the quality of the system is poor, yet we praise our individual care. We support universal coverage, but not if it entails any restrictions or costs more. Arnold and company better hope that these sentiments don't apply to California, because the move to universal coverage not only costs more, but will only come from mandates and will arrive with plenty of restrictions.

Sally C. Pipes is president and CEO of the Pacific Research Institute, a health policy think tank.

Burden Set To Shift On Balanced Budget (WP)

By Lori Montgomery And Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

When he takes the House rostrum next week for the State of the Union address, President Bush will list among his goals a balanced federal budget, a shift for a president who has presided over record deficits while aggressively cutting taxes.

Politically, analysts say, the president is calling the bluff of Democrats, who won control of Congress in part by accusing Bush of reckless fiscal policies. While Bush now shares the Democrats' goal to erase the deficit by 2012, the politically perilous work of making that happen -- cutting spending or raising taxes -- falls to the Democratic-run Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0116579

"The Democrats have assailed deficits under President Bush. The White House is telling Democrats to walk the walk," said Brian M. Riedl, a budget analyst at the conservative Heritage Foundation.

Budget experts and economists from across the political spectrum, including some who worked in the Bush White House, say that Bush is unlikely to offer real concessions toward a balanced budget in the plan he delivers to Congress next month.

Still, the administration appears to be stepping away from an economic argument that has worked well for Republicans throughout Bush's presidency: that federal deficits, though at record levels, are not especially large as a percentage of the economy and therefore offer little cause for concern, a view famously encapsulated in 2002 when Vice President Cheney told Paul H. O'Neill, then the Treasury secretary: "Deficits don't matter."

Historically, the deficit is not particularly large. During Bush's presidency, it peaked at $413 billion in 2004, the biggest ever in dollars. At 3.6 percent of economic output, however, it did not approach the historic high, in 1943 during World War II, when the deficit exceeded 30 percent of gross domestic product . Last year, the deficit dropped to $258 billion, or about 1.8 percent of the economy.

But that view ignores some important facts, U.S. comptroller general David Walker said. The government is living far beyond its means, he said, and if not for excess cash in the Social Security trust fund, it would be recording deficits on a magnitude not seen since the recession of the early 1990s. Take away the Social Security money, and the deficit would have been $434 billion last year, about 3.3 percent of GDP, which rose 6 percent in 2005, compared with 2004.

That point is critical, Walker told a Senate committee last week, because the Social Security surplus will begin to shrink in 2009, as the baby boomers start to retire. It is it estimated that the fund will dry up completely in 2017. At that point, the nation's rosy fiscal picture will darken rapidly. Costs for entitlement programs -- Social Security, Medicaid and Medicare -- will explode. Without radical changes in tax policy and retirement spending, the deficit will make up more than 24 percent of the economy by 2050, Walker said.

This month, Bush cited the "challenges" of entitlement spending as a factor in his decision to offer a balanced budget plan. Analysts said forcing the government to live within its means in the short term would lend credibility to the president's campaign to address the entitlement problem during his final years in office.

Bush has given two newcomers, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. and White House Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman, the task of approaching congressional Democrats to look for potential compromises on entitlements. Paulson, a former chairman of Goldman Sachs, has identified the looming crisis as one of his top reasons for joining the administration. Portman, too, has a passion for the issue. Last week, he took part in the "Fiscal Wake-Up Tour" at Ohio State University organized by a variety of groups, including some strong critics of the administration.

Among them was Isabel V. Sawhill, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, who welcomed Portman's participation. Sawhill said she believed Portman and Paulson were responsible for the president's new enthusiasm for deficit reduction.

"I'm quite sure they want to get the word out about entitlements and educate the public. This could be a new way of putting Social Security and Medicare at the top of the agenda," Sawhill said. "I have this sense that these guys like Portman and Paulson have been unleashed."

In an interview, Portman said entitlements factored in to the administration's budget planning. But the primary reason Bush decided to offer a plan for erasing the deficit, Portman said, is "because we can."

When Bush took office in 2001, he inherited a budget from the Clinton administration that was in surplus for the first time in three decades. But the stock market was falling and the economy was sliding into recession. Bush reacted by ushering in huge tax cuts even as the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, prompted a wave of new spending on the military and homeland defense. The budget returned to deficit in 2002, and the deficit peaked two years later.

Since then, an unexpected gusher of tax revenue has flooded the Treasury, driven largely by stratospheric corporate profits. Bush credits his tax cuts with spurring the economy and producing more tax receipts, an argument that has been refuted by many conservative economists and Bush's own Treasury Department.

"We have managed to work our way through some tough budget and economic challenges over the past six years . . . which caused revenue to decline dramatically," Portman said. Now, he said, "the economy is back on its feet and has generated record levels of revenue in the last two years," making balancing the budget a realistic goal for the first time in Bush's presidency.

Budget analysts on the right and left are skeptical. In past years, Bush has proposed spending cuts that the GOP-controlled Congress refused to support. Also, any five-year plan could put off much of the hard work of cutting spending and raising revenue until after Bush leaves office in 2009.

"I get the impression they're trying to beef up his reputation for fiscal responsibility, not by doing heavy lifting and actually targeting programs like farm subsidies, but through rhetoric and projections and changes in rules and things that are easy for a president to propose," said Chris Edwards, tax director at the Cato Institute.

DOJ_NMG_0116580

Portman declined to provide details of the budget request, which is scheduled for release Feb. 5, he said it relies on "very realistic projections" that are "reasonable in the context of both spending and revenues."

Whatever the political benefit of balancing the budget, it remains a difficult task economically and politically. The last time the budget achieved surplus, the economy was enjoying a boom and a wealth-boosting technology stock bubble, as well the "peace dividend" of reduced defense spending that accompanied the end of the Cold War.

Today, forecasts show the economy growing by a moderate 2.4 percent in 2007. War costs, which have topped $500 billion since 2001, are heading higher. In their most recent official projections, the White House and the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office said they expected the deficit to rise in the fiscal year that ends in September.

Politically, the White House and Democratic leaders are far apart. Bush has said he would balance the budget without raising taxes. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said Sunday on CBS's "Face the Nation" that though she wants to make permanent the Bush tax cuts that benefit the middle class, House leaders are considering repealing those that benefit "people making over half a million dollars a year."

By insisting that all of his tax cuts be extended, Bush is inviting a battle with Congress, not a deal, said Gene Sperling, one of President Bill Clinton's chief economic advisers. Sperling noted that Clinton won a balanced-budget deal with a Republican Congress in 1997 by offering to cut Medicare costs.

"When you want to do something serious, you don't change your rhetoric. You send a serious signal to the other side," Sperling said. "Simply insisting that even the most high-income tax cuts be made permanent then projecting vague but steep cuts in domestic programs is not sending that signal."

The Tough Part Is Up Next: How To Pay For Agenda (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, January 16, 2007

Now that they're in power, it's time for the new Democratic Congressional majority to put its money where its mouth is.

And that's going to be tricky, given the austere budget situation under which even they acknowledge they're operating.

Democrats have made a lot of promises — many of which they're trying to fulfill this week in the House by wrapping up their "100 hours" agenda. But Democrats still are hunting for ways to cover the long-term costs of their policy objectives, and they already are finding these offsets hard to come by, especially if they want to avoid allegations that they are the same old "tax and spend liberals" they've always been.

"I don't think there's any question that it's going to be very difficult for Democrats to fulfill their campaign promises without raising taxes to a substantial degree," said House Ways and Means ranking member Jim McCrery (R-La.).

McCrery pointed to this week's expected House vote on a Democratic plan to impose new offshore drilling royalty fees and roll back several tax breaks and subsidies for oil and natural gas companies. The bill is expected to increase revenues by $13 billion, but much of that will be used to pay for research into and incentives to use alternative energy sources.

Democrats say they are targeting the energy industry because of its record-breaking profits in recent years, even as consumers have felt the pinch at the gas pump. But McCrery said, "by increasing taxes on oil and gas companies, you're going to increase the costs for consumers."

The House also will vote this week on a nearly $6 billion plan to cut student loan interest rates in half and increase the amount available under the Pell Grant program. Part of the offsets — a requirement under new House "pay-as-you-go" rules which mandate that any new spending or tax cuts be paid for with cuts elsewhere — include an increase in the fees banks pay for loan consolidations as well as a reduction in some government subsidies collected by banks. It was unclear late last week what the GOP reaction to those proposals would be, but Republicans were scrutinizing the offsets "to see if they're real," noted one senior House GOP aide.

While it's been relatively easy so far for Democrats to find underused or unused pots of money from which to draw, that could end quickly once they start writing their fiscal 2008 budget this spring.

With calls on both sides of the aisle to include the $300 billion-plus cost of the Iraq War in the budget and a bipartisan push to spend upwards of $70 billion this year alone to relieve middle-income taxpayers from the higher rates of the alternative minimum tax, huge chunks of money — that otherwise might be available for, say, closing the "donut hole" in the Medicare prescription drug benefit — will start whittling away.

Even the best estimates for savings from giving Medicare officials the power to negotiate for lower drug prices — $61 billion to $96 billion, according to House Democrats — doesn't come close to the $450 billion projected cost of closing the donut hole — the gap between when beneficiaries get a discount on drugs and when they have to pay 100 percent of the costs out of pocket. Even if drug-negotiating authority creates such savings — a notion the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office discounts — President Bush has threatened to veto the bill.

DOJ_NMG_0116581

Meanwhile, Senate Finance Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) and ranking member Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) announced late Friday $8 billion in small business tax breaks that they want to attach to the minimum-wage increase.

But House Education and Labor Chairman George Miller (D-Calif.) reiterated that House leaders were reluctant to include the tax breaks largely because PAYGO rules require offsets.

Still, Democrats have a number of piecemeal plans for finding all the extra cash they need to deliver on all their election-year promises.

First and foremost, they hope to close the "tax gap" — the difference between what taxpayers actually owe and what actually comes into the Treasury. Some estimates have put the tax gap at nearly $350 billion, but even under the best of circumstances, no one thinks they'd be able to realize all of that money by having the IRS go after delinquent taxpayers.

Besides, closing the tax gap makes Democrats more reliant on the Bush administration's tax enforcement efforts than on the majority's ability to pass legislation. "You have to sell OMB on putting in more resources" to enforcement, Grassley said of the Office of Management and Budget.

Then, there's "tax pork" — not unlike the subsidies for oil and gas companies that Democrats are going after this week. But like all pork projects, every provision in current law has its backer, and fighting off myriad business interests with special provisions in the tax code will be an undeniably difficult task.

"I don't think there's enough tax pork out there, unless they do some really heavy lifting," noted the senior House GOP aide.

But hope springs eternal. As Baucus put it, "I'll put my creative tax team together to find more."

Democrats Seek The Middle On Social Issues (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 15 — The promise may not outlast their political honeymoon, but Democratic Congressional leaders say they are committed to governing from the center, and not just on bread-and-butter issues like raising the minimum wage or increasing aid for education. They also hope to bring that philosophy to bear on some of the most divisive social issues in politics, like abortion.

In their first days in session, Senate Democratic leaders reintroduced a bill that they said was indicative of their new approach: the Prevention First Act, which seeks to reduce the number of abortions by expanding access to birth control, family planning and sex education.

In the House last week, Democrats showcased a vote on expanding federal financing for embryonic stem cell research, which, despite fierce opposition from many conservatives, has won bipartisan support among lawmakers — and voters — who are otherwise divided on abortion.

The mantra, for many Democrats, is the search for common ground. On gay rights, lawmakers and advocates said the most likely legislation in the new Congress would focus on hate crimes and employment discrimination, issues expected to be much less polarizing than the debate over same-sex marriage that was front and center in the Republican Congress.

"I don't think the American people get mad if you say a woman shouldn't get fired from her job because she's a lesbian," said Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts.

Conservatives are skeptical that such a search for common ground is much more than a shift in tactics.

"I can tell you what I expect," said Douglas Johnson, legislative director of the National Right to Life Committee. "I think the Democratic leadership will seek to advance the policy agenda of the hardcore groups but do so under the cover of deceptive rhetorical campaigns."

Whatever the Democrats do, these issues retain their power to divide. Monday is the 34th anniversary of Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court decision recognizing a constitutional right to abortion; it will highlight anew, with a day of marches and protests, the fundamental question of abortion's legality.

But the Democrats' moves toward consensus-building on issues that often resist consensus reflect their effort to adjust to a new political reality. Their majority is slimmer than it was the last time they were in power, especially in the Senate. The country, some pollsters say, has grown more conservative on abortion and other social issues.

And conservatives, by controlling which legislation came to the floor, succeeded in defining the debate over social issues for more than a decade, through votes on same-sex marriage and the procedure opponents call partial-birth abortion, in ways that highlighted the political limits of liberalism.

One measure of how the legislative debate has shifted is that the last time the Democrats were in power, one of the biggest abortion fights was over whether abortions should be covered in the benefit package guaranteed under the Clinton administration's national health insurance plan, which eventually collapsed. Abortion rights leaders focus on far more modest goals today.

DOJ_NMG_0116582

In the past 12 years, Democratic strategists say they have learned some hard lessons. Many said they were dismayed to see the religion gap after the 2004 election, with the Republicans' overwhelming strength among churchgoers and the widespread perception that Democrats were a secular party insensitive to issues of values.

Since then, party leaders say, they have tried hard to connect with those voters, to convince them that, as Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York said, "We are not a bunch of libertines who want to see the superego of society disappear." Some of the new, prominent Democrats in Congress, like Senator Bob Casey of Pennsylvania, are social conservatives, recruited and cited by Democratic leaders as evidence of the party's diversity.

Over the past two years, Representative James E. Clyburn, Democrat of South Carolina, formerly the caucus chairman, now the majority whip, has led a "faith working group" in the House in an effort, Mr. Clyburn said, to get members "more comfortable with these issues and more connected with values voters."

Part of this effort involved broadening the definition of values-related issues, he said, to include economic issues like raising the minimum wage, assisting low-income children with health insurance and shoring up Social Security.

"That's Old Testament Bible, taking care of widows and orphans," Mr. Clyburn said.

Some House Democrats said they had also learned to be more open about their own religious life.

"We, for a very long time, left the definition of ourselves as Democrats to others," said Representative Rosa DeLauro of Connecticut, an abortion-rights supporter and one of 55 Catholic Democrats in the House who signed a Catholic Statement of Principles last year, essentially saying that their faith involved more than their position on abortion. "But I think people finally felt enough. Enough. It's about who we are, where we come from, what our culture and environment has been."

Ms. DeLauro is one of the leaders in the House on legislation that would try to reduce the need for abortion and provide economic support to new parents.

Representative Nancy Pelosi, the House speaker, highlighted her Catholicism in her first week in office, with two high-profile church services in Washington. There have been occasional protests from religious conservatives, challenging the rights of Democrats like Mrs. Pelosi to present themselves as both good Christians and supporters of abortion rights. But Democrats did do better among Catholic voters in last year's elections, carrying 55 percent of their vote in House races, compared with 49 percent in 2004.

In large part, analysts say, that reflects voters responding to the Democrats on Iraq and the economic agenda, another element of the Democrats' common ground strategy, keeping the debate focused on issues of greatest concern to the voters in the middle. "Our first focus is on the meat and potatoes issues that affect all Americans," Mr. Schumer said.

Celinda Lake, a Democratic pollster who advises Congressional leaders, said, "Most swing voters think that these social issues are issues that both sides love to have fights over, but that they don't really have a stake in."

In fact, Democrats, like Republicans, have long had to fight the notion that they are in thrall to the advocacy groups because of these hot-button issues. Republicans clearly took a dip in the polls after their intervention in the right-to-die case of Terri Schiavo, and many strategists say their intense pursuit of a ban on same-sex marriage and other conservative causes ultimately backfired, making them seem out of touch.

Democrats, after 12 years in the wilderness, say they are not likely to repeat those mistakes. But as Mr. Johnson of the right to life committee and other skeptics note, the true test of the Democrats' common ground campaign may not come until there is a major court fight, especially a vacancy on the Supreme Court. When the fundamental debate over the extent of abortion rights is front and center, common ground will be hard to find.

Pit Bulls Vs. Stalwarts In House GOP (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, January 16, 2007

At a recent meeting of the House Republican leadership, members of the new minority party looked around and realized they were entering unfamiliar territory: Only one of them -- Rep. John A. Boehner of Ohio -- had ever served as a member of the minority party on Capitol Hill.

"We're all still finding our way," said Rep. Kay Granger of Texas, the Republican Conference vice chairman.

The power shift has created its own internal struggle among Republicans.

The younger pit bulls want to go after the Democrats quickly and without remorse. Some of the older Republican stalwarts prefer sitting back and allowing new Speaker Nancy Pelosi and her party members to have their moment in the sun and govern accordingly.

DOJ_NMG_0116583

"It's in flux right now as to kind of what direction we take and how we operate now that we're in the minority," said Rep. Patrick T. McHenry of North Carolina.

"There is a group of us who think we have to throw down the gauntlet and be on the offensive from the very beginning in battles from Day One," he said. "That's the only way we are going to get back in the majority. Then there are others who say we need to let them have their time."

Several Republicans confirmed privately that more than two-thirds of House Republicans are favoring a slow approach, while a minority of members think the attacks on Democrats should come rapid-fire.

Already, some say the opposition has been too quiet in allowing Democrats to pass key elements of their initial agenda.

There have been four major votes on Democratic bills since Congress convened under the new majority earlier this month. Of those, 24 Republicans crossed the line to support changes to Medicare, 37 voted with Democrats to expand funding for embryonic stem-cell research, 68 voted to implement more recommendations of the September 11 commission, and 82 Republicans voted for increasing the minimum wage.

Some Republicans privately fumed at these votes and noted that Democrats in the last Congress were far more united against the Republican majority's bills.

"It's the beginning of a long process," said Rep. Tom Cole of Oklahoma, chairman of the National Republican Campaign Committee. "This is their majority, and they have the right, even though I think a lot of their policies have more political utility than practicability."

"We've shown we can work together with Democrats on some issues, but our differences will become progressively clearer," he said.

There is agreement among Republicans that they should focus on the promise of fiscal conservatism that brought them to power in 1994.

"We ought to draw the line in the sand on some of these policy issues," said Rep. Jeff Flake, Arizona Republican. "Some of us tried to do that last week, but it will really start when we have the ability to offer amendments and have a full debate."

Mr. Flake added he thinks "partisanship" has a bad reputation.

"There should be fierce partisan debate," he said. "We need a lot more of it."

Rep. Marsha Blackburn, Tennessee Republican, said a commitment to conservative ideals such as smaller government and low taxes can help her party win again, even if members aren't actually attacking the new Democratic majority.

"It's a matter of looking for the openings," she said. "As a member of the minority, you realize that there are opportunities to affect change. You learn how to go about affecting things when you have neither the gavel nor the megaphone."

But some Republicans are seizing that megaphone.

Mr. McHenry has already gone after the top Democrat in a series of press releases, floor speeches and public appearances. Last week, he pressed Mrs. Pelosi and the Democrats for what he said was hypocrisy in their bill increasing the minimum wage. The bill exempted American Samoa, whose largest employer StarKist Tuna is owned by Del Monte, a company based in Mrs. Pelosi's San Francisco district.

The speaker, who said neither StarKist nor Del Monte lobbied her, announced Friday that Democrats will now make sure the bill applies to all U.S. territories, including American Samoa.

Still, Mr. McHenry in a press release declared "something fishy" was going on and peppered Rep. Barney Frank, Massachusetts Democrat, with questions during a heated exchange on the House floor.

Mr. Frank, who was acting as speaker pro tempore at the time, ultimately refused to recognize Mr. McHenry at the podium, and later said the Republican was trying to "assault" House rules.

Mrs. Granger said Republicans are balancing the treatment of Democrats between holding their feet to the political fire and allowing them some time to bask in the sun.

"Last week was [Nancy] Pelosi's time. She's won the speakership, and it was a historic time that was wonderful to see a woman achieving," Mrs. Granger said last week of the opening session of Congress. "That's an excitement that transcends more than one election."

After the pomp and circumstance ended, she said, "We plan to get down to business."

Senators Will Have To Pay For Their Seats In Skyboxes If Ban Approved (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten And Larry Weisman, Usa Today

USA Today, January 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Senate is moving this week to ban members from accepting free tickets to sporting events to cut ties between Congress and the special interests that provide the seats.

DOJ_NMG_0116584

Lawmakers have long enjoyed seats in luxury skyboxes paid for by lobbyists and corporations, despite a $50 limit on the gifts they can accept. That's because the tickets often bore no prices or were valued at below the gift limit.

The House adopted a ban on expensive sports tickets earlier this month. Melanie Sloan of the liberal-leaning watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington said it was "crazy" that lawmakers "could say a ticket worth thousands was worth $50."

Abe Pollin, who owns the Washington Wizards basketball team and a majority stake in the arena where the Wizards and the Washington Capitals hockey team play, opposes the ban. "Our teams count business from lobbyists as a contributing factor to our bottom line," his spokesman Matt Williams said.

The proposed ban comes in the wake of congressional corruption scandals. Imprisoned lobbyist Jack Abramoff rented suites at several Washington-area arenas. Federal documents show his preferred venues included the Verizon Center, where the Wizards and the Capitals play; FedEx Field, home of the Redskins football team; and Camden Yards, home of the Baltimore Orioles baseball team.

Former congressman Bob Ney, R-Ohio, is to be sentenced Friday for his role in the Abramoff affair. He has admitted trading congressional favors for travel, campaign money and gifts, including the use of Abramoff's arena seats.

In a 2003 e-mail to clients, Abramoff said sports suites were useful. "Attention is captured and relationships are built through bonding that occurs at football games, hockey games or other events," he said.

Abramoff also offered a free trip to the 2001 Super Bowl in Tampa to at least one unidentified lawmaker, court records show.

A free ticket "is just a form of bribe," said Gary Roberts, who directs the sports law program at Tulane University's law school. "You take them to a luxury box at a football game, give them a few beers and chew their ear off. That is the access the public doesn't get."

The Senate's proposed ticket rules would effectively ban lawmakers from accepting expensive tickets to sporting and entertainment events by requiring that tickets reflect their market value. If the ticket lacks a price, it would be valued at the same cost as the highest-priced ticket at the event.

The provision has bipartisan support and is part of larger ethics changes, including restrictions on lawmakers' travel on corporate jets. The new rules for senators probably won't be in place before the Super Bowl in Miami on Feb. 4. The face value of tickets to this year's game is $600 and $700.

The House ban took effect immediately; the Senate measure is part of a bill that includes other changes to lobbying rules.

Some say the issue is overblown. Pittsburgh Steelers Chairman Dan Rooney said his team gives away tickets to local officials, but "there is no quid pro quo involved in it at all." Congress "ought to be worrying about more important things."

Testing Reid's Ethical Limits (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, January 15, 2007

A beaming Harry Reid basked last week in the adoration of the Democratic Party's leading Senate reformers and its nine freshman senators. They extravagantly praised the new majority leader as an exemplar of ethical reform. But within 48 hours, Reid was opposing full transparency of earmarks. This week, Republican reformers will target Reid with an amendment to the senate ethics package.

Sponsored by Republican Sen. Tom Coburn of Oklahoma, the proposal is called the "Reid amendment" because he inadvertently inspired it. Coburn would tighten loose anti-earmark restrictions in the ethics bill by prohibiting senators from requesting earmarks that financially benefit a senator, an immediate family member of a senator or a family member of a senator's staffer.

The proposal follows the revelation that Reid's four sons and his daughter's husband all have been lawyers or lobbyists for special interests. While Reid has declared that they are barred from lobbying for their clients in his office, there is little doubt that they have taken advantage of their close proximity to a powerful senator.

An example is provided by earmarks that have sent millions of federal dollars to the University of Nevada at Reno. Reid's son-in-law, lawyer Steven Barringer, was a paid lobbyist for the university. In general, Republican reformers see Reid as illustrating the nexus between legislators and special interests, in his case mainly real estate, gambling and mining.

Reid is far from the only prominent member of Congress who would be violating Coburn's amendment if it passed. Republican Rep. Bill Young of Florida, a senior member and former chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, secured a $1 million earmark for the development of military body armor -- a project lobbied for by his daughter-in-law. Democratic Rep. Jim Clyburn of South Carolina, the new House majority whip, has been reported by USA Today as pushing through a $2.5 million airport earmark lobbied for by his cousin.

DOJ_NMG_0116585

Sen. Ted Stevens, the senior Republican member of the Senate, has funneled $29 million in earmarks to the Alaska Fisheries Marketing Board, then headed by his son, state Sen. Ben Stevens. Sen. Mitch McConnell, the new minority leader, won a $1.5 million earmark for an underground financial storage depot in his home state of Kentucky that was lobbied for by the wife of the senator's chief of staff.

The "Reid amendment" is only part of a plan by Coburn and a fellow first-term Republican senator, Jim DeMint of South Carolina, to make sure earmark reform is included in new ethical standards. Democratic efforts, particularly in the Senate, have concentrated on the conduct of lobbyists and not members of Congress. Although the version the House passed last week is stronger, the final compromise coming out of a Senate-House conference may barely touch the surface of earmarks.

The Senate version mandates transparency only for the few projects listed in legislation and not those in accompanying reports. That would ignore up to 98 percent of the 12,852 earmarks in the last Congress. Reid launched his career as majority leader with a furious fight to preserve this condition.

Reid moved to table (that is, kill) DeMint's amendment, which would substitute in the Senate ethics package language covering all earmarks as contained in Speaker Nancy Pelosi's House bill. Reid was surprised to fail, 51 to 46, with nine Democrats abandoning their leader. The Senate routine is that when a tabling motion fails, the bill is passed by voice vote. But an obviously distressed Reid took the floor to hold open the vote on DeMint's bill indefinitely, contending that the Democratic-controlled House had acted in haste.

The two leading Senate Democratic reformers, Russell Feingold of Wisconsin and Barack Obama of Illinois, who two days earlier had lavished praise on Reid's ethical leadership, voted against him on the tabling motion. However, of the nine freshman Democrats who also had honored Reid, only two -- Jim Webb of Virginia and Jon Tester of Montana -- voted for transparency. The other seven toed Reid's party line. (Seven Republicans voted with Reid, including Minority Whip Trent Lott.)

Majority Whip Dick Durbin saved Reid further embarrassment Friday by proposing some minor technical change in the DeMint amendment and claiming victory. A tougher test for Democrats will come this week on efforts to remove family -- Reid's and everybody else's -- from the earmark game.

Ethics Fencing In The Senate (NYT)

The New York Times, January 15, 2007

The Senate's promising start in reforming its ethical shortcomings is showing signs of slippage. Senators ducked a worthy amendment that would bar members from putting family members on campaign payrolls, or see kin become lobbyists. The proposal was ruled unrelated to the debate over lobbyist and ethics reforms, which is hardly the case.

Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, insisted that there's no such problem in the Senate. Critics instantly noted that her fellow Californian, Senator Barbara Boxer, paid $130,000 from her campaign funds to her son's political consultant firm. In the House, the campaign kitty of Representative John Doolittle, Republican of California, paid $200,000 to his wife as a designated campaign consultant working at home. Congress's reputation cannot afford more such embarrassments.

As the Senate debate continues, there are key proposals that will test how real all the talk is about reform. Some lawmakers are already trying to water down the proposal of majority leader Harry Reid, which would stop senators from accepting the nearly free use of corporate jets. Opponents on both sides of the aisle are also intent on blocking a measure from Senators Barack Obama and Russell Feingold, which would force lobbyists to disclose the vast campaign funds they routinely raise from corporate donors eager to grease access to lawmakers. The money would still flow, but special-interest bagmen would have to list the take on public record.

Equally vital is the proposal to make lobbyists and their employers regularly disclose their "earmarking" rounds, where lawmakers are induced to pepper money bills with small fortunes in favors without debate or public notice. Lobbyists would have to list the specific earmark they sought, their client and the lawmakers they approached.

Another important measure would force disclosure of who is paying for media campaigns in the name of fake grass-roots politicking. Such shell games could still go on as free speech, but the public could find out who's paying the bill. These measures give senators a much-needed opportunity to prove they are on the side of the voter, not the lobbyist.

Democrats Vow 5-day Workweek... Sort Of (AP)

By Jim Abrams, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 15, 2007

The five-day workweek, an idea alien to congressional culture in recent years, is about to make a comeback. "We are going to work longer hours, we are going to work full weeks, we are going to have votes on Mondays and Fridays," new Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., advised his colleagues at the opening of the new session on Jan. 4.

DOJ_NMG_0116586

Other Americans, from teachers to police officers to factory workers, put in five days a week on the job, Reid said. "Shouldn't we here in Washington, where we do our business in this laboratory we call the Senate, do the same?"

Old habits, of course, are not that easy to kick. The Senate was off the next day, a Friday.

The House under new Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., also is committed to working longer hours. But the chamber was not in session last Monday, when some members attended the national college football championship game in Arizona. This Monday, Congress is closed for the Martin Luther King Jr. holiday.

There also are the occasional interruptions, such as the Republican retreat that will shut down the House on a Thursday and Friday later this month. House Democrats hold their retreat the following week, making two three-day work weeks in a row.

First votes following a weekend are being scheduled late in the afternoon or evening, effectively making the first day of the work week a travel day for many lawmakers.

Nonetheless, the burst of activity is reminiscent of when House Republicans took over in 1995 after the GOP had spent 40 years in the minority. It is a radical break from the recent practice of convening a new session in early January and then immediately taking off until the president's State of the Union address at the end of the month.

Under GOP leadership, the House fell into a pattern where no votes were scheduled until 6:30 p.m. on Tuesday and the last votes were on Thursday afternoon. That way, lawmakers could leave the Capitol on Thursday evening and not return until the following Tuesday.

Republicans argued that their new breed of citizen legislators should spend more time with their families and constituents back home. The abbreviated schedule also made life easier for lawmakers living in California and Hawaii and gave lawmakers more time for fundraising.

The Senate has tended to work somewhat longer hours. But both chambers grew accustomed to lengthy "district work periods," when Congress is in recess.

In 2006, besides being off in January, lawmakers were off a week or more for President's Day in February, St. Patrick's Day in March, Easter in April, Memorial Day in May and Independence Day in July. Then they took off six weeks in August and a month off before the November elections.

According to the office of House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md, the House was in session 102 days last year, fewer than the 110 days of the "do-nothing" Congress when Harry S. Truman was president in 1948.

Congress under Democratic-control still will not be punching the clock for a 9-to-5 schedule.

Hoyer said his plan for most weeks was to hold first votes at 6:30 p.m. on Mondays and work until about 2 p.m. on Fridays. Long holiday recesses may be shortened, he added, although "there is great value to House members being in their districts and talking to their people."

Former House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas, R-Calif., who retired at the end of the last session after 28 years in the House, said five-day workweeks could be particularly tough on West Coast lawmakers.

Democrats, he predicted, might have to come up with a more structured approach, such as two weeks or three weeks of work in Washington and then a week back in the district.

"I'm anxious to see if it can work," he said of the Democratic plan, noting that he had at times been frustrated by workweeks in which he had "36 hours to get things done."

Fred Beuttler, deputy House historian, said today's lawmakers still put in a lot more time on Capitol Hill than did their predecessors. Until the 1930s, when Franklin D. Roosevelt needed Congress around to enact his New Deal legislation, a Congress elected in November frequently did not convene until December of the following year, 13 months after the election.

Abraham Lincoln had to call Congress into a special session in July 1861 to deal with the secession of the South and witness the routing of the Union Army at the first Battle of Bull Run.

In Six Years In Office, One Year At Camp David (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, January 15, 2007

AHappy Anniversary to President Bush and first lady Laura Bush, who have reached their first anniversary in terms of time spent at Camp David. Mark Knoller, CBS White House correspondent and the unofficial archivist for the White House press corps, reports on the CBS Web site that the Bushes took off Friday for their 116th visit to the beautiful presidential retreat and their 365th day there.

Both Bushes, Knoller told us, think he's being unfair in his counting method, because Knoller counts a partial day as a full one. So on Friday, Bush got to Camp David before noon, but it counted as a full day.

DOJ_NMG_0116587

Applying the same method, Knoller reported that Bush's time there "isn't that much." After all, "President Jimmy Carter spent 376 days at Camp David during his single four-year term in office." And Bush will have to ratchet up the pace a bit in the next two years to best President Reagan's record 517 days there.

As for the ranch at Crawford, Knoller tells us that, as of Jan. 1, Bush had spent 405 full or partial days there.Adhere to Party Lines, Or Else . . .

House Republicans may have lost the majority and have the Bush albatross around their ratings, but unlike the Democrats, they still place a priority on party discipline.

Last week, two prominent Republican outliers, Reps. Jeff Flake (Ariz.) and Walter B. Jones (N.C.), lost choice committee posts, apparently for defying their party's positions, according to reports in National Journal's CongressDaily.

Flake says he lost a seat on the House Judiciary Committee because his views on immigration reform -- which include a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants -- weren't in sync with the GOP's. House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (Ohio) said, "There is absolutely no truth to that."

Flake also said Republican colleagues were upset with him because he pushed to cut earmarks, saying his loss of the Judiciary seat was "DeLay-esque retribution for members who speak up."

Meanwhile, Jones, a longtime critic of the Iraq war, said Duncan Hunter (Calif.), ranking Republican on the House Armed Services Committee, passed him over for a key subcommittee leadership post and gave it to someone with less seniority. Jones waxed philosophical about the move: "We have to pay a price, from time to time."Intraparty 'Communication'

Fortunately for reporters -- and perhaps Republicans -- Democrats cannot resist sniping at one another. Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) took to the floor on Thursday to offer this about House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and her colleagues' 100-hour agenda:

"I am happy to see the House doing their 100 hours and moving things along very quickly. I admire and respect that. But having served in that body, I know how quickly they can move things and, frankly, sometimes how much thoughtful consideration goes into matters that are on that House floor."

Ouch!Kurdish Connection?

Former ambassador to Croatia Peter W. Galbraith, testifying last week at a Senate hearing about Iraq, noted that he'd been asked by committee staffers to "clarify my relationship with the Kurdistan Regional Government."

The query probably was sparked by rumors over the years that Galbraith was formally advising the Kurds. His biography is on the KRG's "Kurdistan, The Other Iraq" Web site, which lists him as an "adviser to the Kurdistan Regional Government."

In his testimony, Galbraith said he'd "been friends of the Kurdish leaders and for that matter, other Iraqis, for a very long period of time, but I am not in a paid relationship with the Kurdistan Regional Government."

In an e-mail exchange Friday and Saturday, Galbraith wrote that he hadn't seen the Web site and "to the extent that it implies a formal relationship with the KRG, it is inaccurate." Galbraith wrote that he had been paid by "two Kurdish clients" for four months in late 2003-2004 for "either an educational program on negotiations or conducting a negotiation" -- all outside this country.

"I do not lobby or represent anyone in the U.S.," he wrote, adding that he specifically noted this in his recent book on Iraq and explained there that the KRG has "provided security, accommodation and in-country transportation" when he visits.FDA's Allergic Reaction

Barely sworn in and . . . the Food and Drug Administration has warned freshman Rep. Steven L. Kagen (D-Wis.), a physician, that his old Wisconsin allergy practice was in apparent violation of federal law for manufacturing and selling allergy shots without a valid license.

The FDA sent him a letter Dec. 18 but posted it on its Web site Thursday, saying that Kagen manufactured a variety of ragweed and grass allergen vaccines from commercially distributed pollen and sold the shots to patients at his clinic and in at least 24 other states, the Associated Press reported. Kagen, in a statement to the AP, said he and the FDA were "discussing" the process used by his clinic, "like other allergy clinics," for making customized medications for patients.As the Revolving Door Turns

Moving over . . . administration communications veteran Mark D. Pfeifle, who's worked at the White House, the Interior Department and the Pentagon and also headed the Social Security reform "war room" at the Treasury Department, is headed back to 1600 Pennsylvania Ave. He will be deputy national security adviser for strategic communications and global outreach.

Going private . . . longtime Democratic Hill staffer Paul Braithwaite, who's now executive director of the Congressional Black Caucus and before that was an assistant secretary of labor in the Clinton administration.

Major Farm Bill Divides Lawmakers, Bush (AP)

By Libby Quaid, Ap Food And Farm Writer

DOJ_NMG_0116588

AP, January 15, 2007

Lawmakers begin work on a new multibillion-dollar farm bill at odds with President Bush over whether big changes really are needed.

The two sides are far apart. Just how far, farmers saw for themselves during the American Farm Bureau Federation's recent meeting in Salt Lake City.

"I think the bill could look a lot like what we have now. What I think we're going to end up doing, you could say, is extending the farm bill," Rep. Collin Peterson, D-Minn., chairman of the House Agriculture Committee, told farmers.

Contrast that with Bush's agriculture secretary, Mike Johanns, who said at the meeting that farm programs need an overhaul.

"I will be the first to argue that the 2002 farm bill was good policy for its time," Johanns said. "But the agricultural and economic realities that influenced the development of the '02 farm bill — they simply don't exist."

The farm bill — really a series of federal programs — gives farmers payments and other help to supplement their incomes, support crop prices and manage supplies.

Near $18 billion in public money was spent on these programs last year. The current farm bill, written in 2002, expires at the end of this year.

Congress and the administration disagree mightily on what the new farm bill should look like.

Which side is closer to the wishes of Farm Bureau, the biggest general-interest agriculture group?

Right now, probably the House Agriculture Committee chairman, said Bob Stallman, the organization's president. Johanns advocated massive changes, Stallman said.

"That, frankly, is not what our delegates are saying," he said.

Not that farmers are in lock step.

Illinois delegate Dale Hadden wants changes in farm programs and liked what Johanns said. With the Illinois River just a few miles from Hadden's corn and soybean fields, he ships most of his crop to the Gulf Coast to be exported.

"If we're going to be a player in international trade markets, we need to be sure we don't run into a lot of problems," Hadden said.

Among the disagreements are:

_Trade. The U.S. and other rich countries are under pressure from around the world to reduce their farm subsidies. Conflict over the issue led to the collapse last summer of World Trade Organization talks.

Without an agreement, American farmers face high tariffs and other barriers when they sell crops abroad — and they export a big chunk of their products.

Against this backdrop, Johanns has pushed for change as U.S. farm programs themselves come under fire. The WTO, in a case brought by Brazil, has ruled that some cotton subsidies are illegal. Canada is pursing a complaint about U.S. corn subsidies.

"Now of course the temptation may be to say to the WTO, 'You know what, folks? Take a hike,'" Johanns told farmers.

"Now, surely there are people in this room who grow rice," he said. "Fifty percent of the rice that you grow goes into the international market. Do you want us to ignore the WTO and jeopardize that market?"

Some farmers do want to ignore the trade issue. Johanns drew a smattering of unexpected applause at the idea of telling the WTO to take a hike.

Peterson, too, is disinclined to worry too much about the WTO.

"I want to write a farm bill that's good for agriculture," he said. "If somebody wants to sue us, we've got a lot of lawyers in Washington."

_Cost: There probably will be fewer dollars for farm programs when Congress writes the latest bill. The Democratic-run Congress is insisting on budget cuts to pay for new spending, and Bush has pledged to balance the budget in five years.

Johanns seems to be preparing lawmakers to do more with less. High subsidies, he told Farm Bureau members, do not necessarily equal a strong farm economy.

At the same time, Peterson argues against reducing farm spending. That is a tough sell because the farm bill has cost billions of dollars less than lawmakers thought it would.

Peterson says agriculture somehow should be credited for wise spending. "We feel like we've done our part," Peterson said. "I'm not going to say this is going to be easy, but we feel like we're going to be able to get the resources."

Peterson also wants to include a permanent disaster aid program in the farm bill; Congress has considered drought and hurricane aid separately. But Farm Bureau delegates voted against such a program because they worried it could take money away from other farm spending.

DOJ_NMG_0116589

_Payment limits: Johanns favors ending practices that allow some growers to collect millions of dollars annually above the $350,000 limit on payments.

He has broad support in Congress — except from Southerners, who would feel limits more keenly because their cotton and rice crops, cost more to grow and get higher subsidies.

Peterson said a farm bill cannot pass without support from Southern lawmakers.

"I'm not interested in putting our agriculture friends in the South in trouble. They've got enough problems," he said.

___

On the Net:

Agriculture Department background on the 2002 farm bill: http://www.ers.usda.gov/Features/FarmBill/

Farm Bureau: http://www.fb.org

Democrats Look To Boost Investor Rights (FT)

By Jeremy Grant

Financial Times, January 16, 2007

Signs are emerging of a Democratic effort to boost shareholder rights in the US after a top lawmaker said he planned to hold "informational hearings" on the harmonisation of regulatory systems between the US and Europe.

Paul Kanjorski, the new chairman of the House of Representatives sub-committee on capital markets, insurance and government sponsored entities said "the time is ripe" to examine the issue.

He said if global markets were to grow and mature, "we have to start recognising some international standards".

"It's something I want to pay attention to because one of the things that ties in very closely is investors' rights in corporations. I think Europe has shown that they have a greater investor right concept and it's working fairly well," he said in an interview with the Financial Times.

His call comes after Barney Frank, Democratic chair of the House financial services committee, said last week he planned to pass a bill by the summer that would "legislate greater shareholder involvement in setting CEO salaries". Mr Kanjorski's sub-committee operates under the financial services committee.

He said: "We've got some focus points now that [Mr Frank] is very much interested in executive salary. We're really going to have to look at what rights should the shareholders have, and what is being done in the UK and Europe. We may find out just by adopting some of their systems within our system, if we can create a better control or transparency factor."

European corporate governance experts have called for a better balance between shareholder rights and what they say is excessive use of litigation to settle corporate and boardroom disputes in the US.

The Securities and Exchange Commission is deadlocked over whether to proceed with a proposal allowing shareholder access to company proxies for the purpose of voting board directors – a move that would give shareholders more say in setting executive pay.

Mr Kanjorski, a 12-term Pennsylvania congressman, said his interest was broader than executive compensation. "Let's look fundamentally at whether we have enlarged or protected shareholder rights in this country relative to the rest of the world. There's a push to limit litigation. Maybe if we had better shareholder rights we wouldn't have as much litigation."

He said the US should examine the UK's "principles-based" regulatory regime because there were "certain things over there that they are doing fairly well that we haven't yet adopted in this country".

"From what I understand their regulation is a lot keener. We have a tendency to stovepipe regulatory authority in the United States and they cross lines much more flexibly. They are pre-emptive and we're 'gotcha'. That can be very expensive," said Mr Kanjorski.

Hill Moves To Pull Pensions (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, January 16, 2007

Lawmakers who commit crimes in office may no longer be able to rely on a federal pension to pad their fall from grace.

The House this week will take up a bill by freshman Rep. Nancy Boyda (D-Kan.) that would strip lawmakers convicted of ethics-related offenses of their federal retirement checks.

The Senate on Friday overwhelmingly agreed to add a similar proposal by Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) to that chamber's lobbying reform package.

Boyda spokeswoman Shanan Guinn said the details were still being finalized, but the language is based on a provision from last year's House-passed lobbying bill.

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said Boyda's bill would reach the floor Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0116590

Meanwhile, Senate Democratic leaders are letting the air out of a fight with Republicans over a GOP plan to tighten earmark disclosure rules that threatened to sabotage bipartisan cooperation on the reform package.

The two sides appeared headed for a showdown Thursday when Senate Democratic leaders tried to bury a proposal — offered by Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) — that would bring earmark transparency in the Senate up to the tough standard set in the House earlier this month.

The Democratic leaders tried to kill DeMint's bid with a tabling motion, failed and then objected to adopting it on a voice vote, as is standard in such circumstances. Republicans cried foul, and by Friday, Democratic leaders were trying to forge a compromise, offering a plan to make some technical changes to DeMint's amendment.

The Democratic changes — put forward in an amendment by Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin (Ill.) — broaden disclosure rules for tax-related earmarks and require earmarks to be publicly posted two days before, rather than two days after, they are voted on. The two sides agreed after negotiations to require all earmarks be logged in a searchable, online database.

Democratic aides said their package offered much-needed changes to sew up loopholes in DeMint's plan, but Republicans claimed victory. In a statement, DeMint thanked Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) for "agreeing to do the right thing and be completely transparent with Americans on how Congress spends their money."

Senators will vote on the Durbin and DeMint amendments this evening, but to ensure work on the bill is completed by Friday, Reid moved to cut off debate by filing a procedural motion to invoke cloture.

That move will heighten the urgency for Senators to secure votes on their proposed changes before cloture ripens this week. When the Senate invoked cloture on the ethics reform package last spring, it cut off consideration of some of the more contentious — and for reformers, high-priority — add-ons to the bill, including one aimed at corporate jets.

It was not clear Friday which proposed changes will be made in order this week, a Senate leadership aide said. A pile of amendments awaits Senators returning today from the long weekend. Among likely flashpoints is a proposal by Sen. Bob Bennett (R-Utah) to strip the bill of new transparency rules for lobbyists coordinating "Astroturf" campaigns.

Reform groups sent Senators a letter Friday urging them to reject the amendment — and to approve a raft of proposals designed to beef up the bill. They asked Senators to require lobbyists to disclose campaign checks they bundle for lawmakers, per an amendment from Democratic Sens. Barack Obama (Ill.) and Russ Feingold (Wis.). Lobbyists also should have to list earmarks they request, the groups said, and they should be banned from sponsoring lavish convention parties honoring lawmakers.

Another priority for public-interest groups — a Reid proposal requiring Senators to pay charter rates for flights on corporate jets — could meet resistance, especially from lawmakers from rural states. Reid on Friday announced modifications to the measure, clarifying that Senators still will be allowed to fly their own planes, requesting a study of the impact of the proposed policy on Congressional travel budgets, and requiring disclosure of flights Members make on the private planes. Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), a vocal opponent of the policy, is trying to carve out an exception that would allow Members from rural states to pay only first-class fare in certain instances.

Other changes on deck include a proposal by Sen. Joe Lieberman (ID-Conn.) to create an independent Office of Public Integrity to investigate ethics complaints. Feingold is pushing to broaden the scope of the bill's two-year cooling-off period for staffers and lawmakers-turned-lobbyists and to end access for Senators-turned-lobbyists to the House and Senate gyms and Members-only parking spaces.

And Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) wants to ban lawmakers from sponsoring earmarks that would provide a financial benefit to themselves or family and create a single form for lawmakers to use when requesting the targeted spending provisions.

In addition to OK'ing the Kerry amendment on pensions, Senators on Friday approved a proposal from Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) to increase penalties for lobbyists breaking disclosure rules from $100,000 to $200,000.

Ethics Panels Staffing Up (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, January 16, 2007

The Senate and House ethics committees plan to increase their staffs to police Congress better in the wake of lobbying and ethics reform legislation.

This comes as nongovernmental watchdog groups temporarily back off their demand that Congress create an office of public integrity to crack down on violations.

The watchdogs' lobbyists say opponents of a public-integrity office have long suggested strengthening the committee instead, but the watchdogs say that this would not address the problems plaguing Congress.

Still, the tide is running for extra staff and against an outside panel, and good-government advocates are asking the Senate not to vote on the public-integrity office for fear that it would be rejected in a landslide.

DOJ_NMG_0116591

"If the bill passes we're going to have to beef up the staff of the committee to fulfill the mandate," said Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), vice chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Ethics, referring to expectations that the chamber will pass an ethics and lobbying reform package this week. "There's going to have to be additional staff to do the required training of staff and members."

Cornyn said the panel chairwoman, Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), shared his view that staff increases were needed. A spokeswoman for Boxer did not respond to a request for comment.

On the House side, Rep. Stephanie Tubbs Jones (D-Ohio), the new chairwoman of the Standards of Official Conduct Committee, said she would also hire new staff.

"We received additional dollars and I intend to hire more staff," she commented. "Our committee will hire additional staff to do the work required by the rules."

House Democrats passed ethics reforms as the new Congress opened, including a ban on gifts from lobbyists, restrictions on privately funded travel and a prohibition against influencing private companies — a practice which became known as the K Street Project.

The House mandated annual ethics training for lawmakers, House officers and aides. By Jan. 31 of each year, each House officer and employee is required to file a document certifying participation in ethics training.

The new hires could be used not just for training but also to monitor compliance, such as of a ban on junkets funded by any group that retains a congressional lobbyist.

House leaders boosted the ethics panel's budget from $3.1 million to $4.3 million, nearly 40 percent, at the beginning of the 109th Congress at the request of then-Chairman Doc Hastings (R-Wash.), a Democratic leadership aide said.

This was intended to hire more staff and expand operations, but Hastings and ranking committee Democrat Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.) found themselves locked in a prolonged stalemate over panel rules and staffing as soon as the money was granted, and there is little evidence that the extra money was used, the Democratic aide said.

Tubbs Jones declined to say how much extra money her committee received and did not explain whether her mention of additional funds referred to the 2005 budget boost.

Nongovernmental watchdogs say expanding the ethics committees is a poor substitute for an office of public integrity.

"We think that's the single most important reform," said Gary Kalman, lobbyist for U.S. Public Interest Research Group, "The problem [with the ethics committee] is that you have the inherent conflict of colleagues judging colleagues."

Kalman noted that many companies have outside, independent auditors to ensure that their practices are ethical and legal. He cited Enron Corp. as an example of a lack of independent oversight leading to a major scandal.

"When you have people doing the judging being too close to the people they are judging, you have what you had last year," he said, alluding to the scandals surrounding former Reps. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) and Bob Ney (R-Ohio). "You have a problem and it's not going to be fixed by throwing in a few additional investigators."

Meredith McGehee, policy director of the Campaign Legal Center, voiced similar concerns, saying bigger panel staffs would be a poor substitute for an office of public integrity.

"It's a Band-Aid and not a solution," said McGehee. "The problem here is a peer review process that has lost credibility with the American public. Just adding staff doesn't solve that part of the problem."

But proponents argue that there would be fewer ethics violations to prosecute if lawmakers and aides received more training. There is little support for an office of public integrity. The proposal is so unpopular that advocates such as Kalman and McGehee are hoping that the Senate puts off its consideration until later this year. They say the proposal will fail if it receives a vote this week. Last year only 30 senators voted for the public-integrity office.

Watchdog groups say that if they are given several more weeks, they would have enough time to meet lawmakers, educate them, re-craft the proposal to address concerns, and ultimately build more support.

"We have heard from a number of senators and there might be some changes that would pick up additional votes and ensure that we have a successful vote," said Kalman.

Rules Changes (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

Lobbyists are not the only ones who wine and dine lawmakers and their staff members. Journalists hoping to lubricate sources sit elbow-to-elbow with lobbyists at the same Washington steakhouses and watering holes. And, perhaps inadvertently, the new ethics rules passed by the House require lawmakers and aides to be very careful about letting reporters pick up the tab.

The new rule bars lawmakers and their aides from accepting meals paid for by employees of companies that also pay registered lobbyists. Among others, that includes journalists working for the major television networks, The Wall Street Journal and The Washington Post. The New York Times Company, however, does not employ a registered lobbyist, so its reporters can still pick up the check.

DOJ_NMG_0116592

Ethical Progress (WP)

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

THE NEW SENATE majority leader, Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), has moved to end debate this week on the ethics and lobbying reform legislation the Senate has taken up as its first order of business. This could be a sign of progress toward a good package, but there are numerous legislative land mines on the path to a successful conclusion. As the Senate resumes its consideration of the measure, it's important to ensure an opportunity for an up-or-down vote on critical amendments that would strengthen the reforms.

The first and most important of these is Mr. Reid's amendment on gift and travel rules. Essentially matching a provision approved by the House, Mr. Reid offered an amendment that would require lawmakers to pay charter rates for flights on private planes; under current rules, they only have to ante up the equivalent of first-class fares. Mr. Reid's amendment would also ban members of Congress from taking free meals, gifts and most travel from lobbyists and lobbying organizations, as the House has already voted to do. The Senate should ensure that this important change in Washington business-as-usual becomes part of the final legislation.

But it's not enough. Senators should also take up and pass rules to require lobbyists to disclose campaign contributions they collect -- or "bundle" -- for lawmakers, as Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) has proposed. In addition, if senators are serious about banning gifts, they should include the high-priced parties thrown at conventions to "honor" lawmakers, as Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) has proposed. They should resist a push to strip from the package a requirement that groups disclose how much they spend on "Astroturf" lobbying, or efforts to get the folks back home to contact lawmakers.

Mr. Reid has wisely backtracked on his initial opposition to a requirement for disclosure of a wide array of earmarked pet projects. The earmark disclosure rule pushed by Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) should be part of the final package, but here, too, additional amendments could bolster the impact of the reform. Lobbyists should be required to disclose the earmarks they are pursuing, and for whom, as Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) is pushing. An amendment by Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) to prohibit lawmakers from inserting earmarks that benefit their relatives would end an especially pernicious practice. And senators could do the House one better by going beyond mere disclosure requirements to make it possible, as Mr. DeMint has also proposed, to strip out provisions slipped into conference reports without being approved by either chamber.

Shadow Delegation Toils In Obscurity For D.C.'s Day In The Sun (WP)

By Libby Copeland

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

Among the few perks of being the District's shadow senator is that occasionally someone calls you "senator." Symbolism counts for a lot, since you don't get to vote, you don't get paid and just about nobody has ever heard of you.

Paul Strauss, one of the District's two shadow senators, doesn't get an office in the Senate, but he often hangs out there. If he tried to get onto the Senate floor he would be swiftly ushered away, so he grabs an edge where he can find it, trying to chat up senators in the reception area outside the Senate floor. After a decade in office, he is still like a butler trying to insinuate himself into a family party.

The shadow senator tends to fade into the background. His face isn't familiar from television. Unlike other senators, he doesn't attract knots of people. Strauss, 42, wears a Senate pin that is different from what U.S. senators get to wear but that contributes, he hopes, to a sense that he belongs in these marble halls. On a recent visit, when few people are around, he steps into a senators-only elevator.

Is that allowed?

"Let's see what happens," he says impishly.

The shadow senator takes what he can get. Once, Strauss saw a podium all set up for a news conference, with cameras at the ready, but the senator who'd booked the podium hadn't yet arrived. So he stepped up and began telling reporters about the District's disenfranchisement. Cameramen stopped filming when they realized who he wasn't.

A few years ago, Strauss, a lawyer, got sick of being labeled in the newspaper as an "unpaid" shadow senator. Symbolism again. Since he was paying most of his own expenses anyway, he decided to give himself a salary.

He gets $10 a year.

* * *

The District's three-member shadow delegation, made up of two senators and one representative, exists in a netherworld. They are sometimes confused with Eleanor Holmes Norton (D), the city's delegate to Congress, but unlike her, they're not sworn in at the federal level. They are elected by the people of the District, yet the District gives them no salary and no budget. A good number of D.C. residents don't even know that the District has an elected shadow delegation, or that their role is to lobby for the District's perennial pipe dream, statehood.

DOJ_NMG_0116593

Go to the city's Web site and search for information about the shadow delegation. It's hard to find. When you get there, you'll see that one former shadow's name is misspelled.

The shadow delegation's offices are located in the John A. Wilson Building on Pennsylvania Avenue. On a recent afternoon, their offices were staffed with interns and volunteers recruited by Strauss. First elected in 1996, he became the District's senior shadow senator last fall after the defeat of 80-year-old Florence Pendleton, who served 16 years in relative obscurity.

The two new members of the delegation -- shadow senator Michael Brown (D) and shadow representative Mike Panetta (D) -- have been sworn in the week before and are still settling into their desks. Panetta's city-issued desk phone is not yet working. Brown is considering buying a new computer since he doesn't think the city will be giving him one.

Strauss leaves the Wilson Building and drives his green Chevy Malibu with D.C.-issued "U.S. Senate" license plates over to the Capitol, where he knows that as a courtesy, he will be permitted to park out front in the "Senator Parking Only" area. He stops at the security kiosk.

"What's your name?" asks the officer.

"Strauss. Senator Strauss."

Inside, the man who is a senator in name only goes into the reception area outside the Senate floor, where he tries to get face time with the folks who vote. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), a cancer survivor, walks past.

"Senator Specter really looks better," Strauss says knowingly.

Strauss sees his buddy Myron Fleming, the superintendent of doorkeepers.

"The Democrats are in control now," Strauss reminds Fleming. Then, mostly joking: "If it's all right with you, can I maybe get on the floor and vote on some stuff?"

Fleming smiles and gently ushers Strauss to another part of the room, so he doesn't disturb Specter's conversation.

There are times when it seems as if Strauss might actually be a shadow, as if people might be looking through him. He represents more people than the senators of Wyoming, but when the Senate wants to make changes in the District, he is largely relegated to the role of bystander. He can try to influence legislation by talking to a senator. He can submit a statement.

If he wants to see what's happening on the floor, he has to sit upstairs in the gallery where senators' family members sit. That's where he was during the impeachment proceedings of President Clinton, and when Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist swore in the Senate as a jury, Strauss -- way up high in the gallery -- stood and raised his right hand. He was hoping they'd let him serve.

Now, he waves to Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), but Feingold doesn't see him. He tries to talk to Jay Rockefeller (D-W.Va.), who's on his way to the Senate floor, but the conversation is short. "He was distracted," Strauss explains.

He sees Sen. Joe Biden (D-Del.) in a hallway.

"Senator Biden!"

"Hey, how are you, man, nice to see you," Biden says, stopping briefly, speaking with all the warmth of a politician who may or may not remember a guy's name.

* * *

There is fresh hope this year for proponents of "New Columbia," as the proposed 51st state is sometimes called. Mayor Adrian Fenty mentioned the goal of statehood in his inaugural address this month. And there is the more immediate possibility that Del. Norton could get a full vote in the House in coming months.

On the other hand, Strauss has been this hopeful before.

A good dose of humility helps in this gig, along with a knack for getting attention. Shadow Rep. Panetta, 35, has tried to drum up interest in the statehood cause by campaigning to get RFK Stadium renamed Taxation Without Representation Field and trying to create the District's own Olympic curling team. Shadow Sen. Brown, 53, got signatures for his election petition by approaching the line of cars at the city's vehicle inspection station. When he approached people, clipboard in hand, they thought him a DMV official and obediently rolled down their windows.

On his recent visit to the Capitol, Strauss takes a timeout for lunch in the exclusive Senate dining room. He is greeted warmly by a maitre d' who calls him "Senator Strauss." A member of the staff gives him a hug and he is promptly seated. A waitress automatically brings him his usual, coffee. He sends it back, preferring iced tea.

The dining room is almost completely empty. Strauss surmises that the senators are all at their regular Tuesday policy lunch, to which he does not get invited. But that's okay. He comes here often. He likes it here.

DOJ_NMG_0116594

"These are my constituents," Strauss says, indicating the room full of dining room staff. He turns to the waiter. "Which ward do you live in?"

"Ward 7," answers Melvyn Jordan. "Waiting for the day when we're New Columbia."

Strauss studies the lineup on the the menu.

"They've made some changes," he says.

The Hill's Revolving-Door Rules Don't Work In Both Directions (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

In November, as a lobbyist and strategist for DaimlerChrysler, Dennis B. Fitzgibbons labored to block congressional proposals to mandate the production of more cars that use alternative fuels and to stop the most aggressive efforts to force auto companies to make their vehicles more energy-efficient.

Today, Fitzgibbons is chief of staff to the House Energy and Commerce Committee, the panel charged with deciding whether automakers should be compelled to do either of those things.

Fitzgibbons will be meeting with his old employers soon, and he sees no problem with that. "For anyone in government to say to a company or to individuals that I cannot meet with you is to deny them a constitutional right: the right to petition their government," he said.

That's a surprise. If Fitzgibbons had been in his congressional job and then went to DaimlerChrysler, he couldn't be hitting up his successor so soon. But the rules are different for reverse migrations from K Street to Capitol Hill.

In fact, there are no rules. "There really are no congressional ethics rules that bar a member or a staffer from influencing legislation in a way that would benefit their former client or employer," said Robert K. Kelner, an ethics expert at Covington & Burling, a law firm.

Lots of lobbyists have returned to Congress to work for the new Democratic majority. Former Verizon lobbyist Gregg Rothschild is chief counsel at Energy and Commerce. The chief of staff to the House Rules Committee is Daniel A. Turton, a former lobbyist for Timmons & Co., which represents the American Petroleum Institute and DaimlerChrysler. And two freshman Democratic senators have former lobbyists as chiefs of staff: Sherrod Brown (Ohio), whose CoS is James Heimbach, an ex-lobbyist with Ricchetti Inc. (whose clients include General Motors, Sanofi-Aventis and AT&T); and Claire McCaskill (Mo.), whose top aide, Sean Kennedy, worked for AT&T.

The most jaw-dropping hire from K Street, though, is Matt Gelman. Gelman is senior adviser to House Democratic Whip James E. Clyburn (S.C.) and is, in effect, on loan from Microsoft, where he is director of federal government affairs. He's on unpaid leave for a few months from the software giant and will return after he helps build Clyburn's vote-counting operation.

Government critics are appalled that lobbyists-turned-staffers can assist without restriction the industries that recently employed them. "The issue is whether loyalty to their former employers will impact the decisions they make in their new roles," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington.

Fitzgibbons, Turton and Kennedy, who discussed their situations, don't understand the controversy. They say their time as lobbyists will help them in their new jobs; they now know how Washington works. Besides, they work for their new bosses, not their old ones. "I'm no longer an AT&T person," Kennedy said. "I'm a Claire McCaskill person."

Gelman, on the other hand, has been reined in. According to his agreement with the House Ethics Committee, neither he nor Clyburn's offices can meet with Microsoft during his temporary posting. A Clyburn spokeswoman said the sanction makes sense at a moment when Democrats are holding themselves to high ethical standards.

So why not "Gelman-ize" newcomers and limit their contacts with recent clients? No one on the Hill has given that a thought.Close and Closer on Capitol Hill

If you were worried that your favorite interest group might be sidelined in today's hyper-ethical Congress, relax. Lawmakers are finding ways to stay comfy cozy.

Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) is offering a "Max out package" that allows political action committees to donate $10,000 to his coffers and be treated to special meetings that could include a Napa Valley wine tour, a "private event with up to five guests" or two visits to, well, Minnesota. (Sadly, last week, the Napa leg was canceled.) Rep. Greg Walden (R-Ore.) is selling eight intimate breakfasts with himself for a mere $1,000 per PAC per meal. The "8@8 breakfast series" will have "8 guests max each" and this year will begin at 8:30 a.m. rather than the traditional 8 a.m. "We're letting people sleep in this year," said Shelly Roy, Walden's professional fundraiser.

And the House Conservatives Fund, a PAC that works with the House's hundred-member Republican Study Committee, is planning a Super Bowl party in Miami. For $5,000, a donor gets to go to a "VIP photography session" and a reception the night before the big game.

DOJ_NMG_0116595

Even better: Sen. Craig Thomas (R-Wyo.) is taking donors skiing in Jackson Hole, Rep. Fred Upton (R-Mich.) is offering an evening with rocker Bob Seger, and Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.) is going with contributors to Disney World.Drug Company Hires of the Week

The drug industry, caught in the crosshairs of Congress's new majority, is hiring Democratic lobbyists at a furious pace. The Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America just retained former Bill Clinton aide Joel Johnson of the Glover Park Group. And in recent months, Amgen signed Steve Ricchetti, also a former Clinton aide, and George Crawford, former chief of staff to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). The Biotechnology Industry Organization (BIO) and Merck hired former Clinton staffer Charles M. Brain, and AstraZeneca retained David Castagnetti, an ex-top aide to Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. BIO has also added the law firm Foley Hoag, which has ex-aides to Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.).

FEDERAL DIARY: A Fight Over Fines For Social Security Workers (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, January 16, 2007

It's a generally accepted practice to follow orders from the boss. But a grievance filed by a federal union shows that allegedly doing what the boss says can lead to unexpected consequences.

The grievance protests what the union calls "extreme civil penalties" sought by the Social Security Administration inspector general to punish four employees at an office in Des Moines.

The office supervisor faces a potential fine of $3.5 million, another employee has been assessed a fine of $215,000 and two other employees have been notified that they may be fined more than $100,000 each, according to the National Treasury Employees Union.

Colleen M. Kelley, the union president, said the inspector general's office alleges that the employees used misleading statements or omitted material when helping prepare decisions on whether certain people were eligible for Social Security disability benefits.

According to the union, the employees, who are lawyers, followed the instructions of their boss, an administrative law judge, and took the "general and hypothetical" testimony of a vocational expert in one case and applied it to about 700 other cases.

In all the cases, the administrative law judge granted the disability benefits, the union said. The union does not have the case files but understands the cases involved individuals with conditions that made normal employment difficult, such as a need to alternate between sitting and standing every 15 minutes.

As far as the union knows, there has been no finding by authorities that the repeated use of the expert's testimony was improper or resulted in an inappropriate payment of taxpayer dollars.

Social Security officials have chosen not to respond to the union's allegation that the agency's inspector general has gone too far in targeting the Des Moines employees.

Jonathan L. Lasher, a deputy chief counsel to the Social Security inspector general, invoked privacy laws and said he would not confirm that charges against the employees existed. Mark Lassiter, the Social Security press officer, also declined to comment "since this is a matter involving ongoing litigation."

The Social Security Administration's disability insurance and supplemental security income programs are geared to help people with disabilities but require claimants to meet medical criteria.

Administrative law judges review disability claims and often call in vocational experts to assess whether jobs are available in the community that might accommodate an impaired worker. The judges decide whether to grant or deny a claim, and relay their decision to staff lawyers with instructions on how to write up a ruling and explain why the decision was reached.

In the Des Moines cases, the administrative law judge is deceased, making it difficult to know why he directed the staff lawyers to use the same expert testimony in the 700 cases.

The NTEU speculates that the judge viewed the practice as a way to reduce case-processing time and expenses by hiring one expert to give answers to hypothetical questions and apply those answers broadly rather than hiring a new expert for similar testimony in each of the 700 cases.

The union does not think that any officials in Social Security management viewed this practice as a systematic problem. Kelley noted that the agency had not taken other disciplinary steps against the lawyers in Des Moines.

But Kelley said she thinks the office of Social Security Inspector General Patrick P. O'Carroll Jr. should not be seeking civil monetary penalties under a law that provides a fine of $5,000 for each false statement used in the determination of benefits.

"We think the IG is inappropriately using its authority," Kelley said.

DOJ_NMG_0116596

The union, which bargains on behalf of workers in the Social Security Office of Disability Adjudication and Review, has written Social Security Commissioner Jo Anne B. Barnhart, asking her to protect the employees "from being harassed by the IG for actions taken pursuant to their official duties."

In its grievance, the union said the inspector general had proposed financial penalties "on the theory that the decisions should have specified that the interrogatory responses were obtained in connection with a different case and that the VE [vocational expert] should have been informed that her responses would be used in subsequent cases. These charges are entirely without merit."

The union has not identified the administrative law judge or the employees out of a desire to protect their reputations, a NTEU spokeswoman said.

The issues raised in Des Moines, the union said, call into question the independence of administrative law judges, which is guaranteed in law.

The inspector general's probe creates a potential for conflict between the judges and the employees carrying out a judge's instructions, the union said. For example, the union said, the probe will encourage staff lawyers to second-guess judges and express their reservations in writing. Such second-guessing is likely to slow down the process for resolving disability claims, the union said.

A resolution of the dispute could take months, especially if the matter lands in federal court.

Pelosi's Tuna Surprise (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 16, 2007

Economists of every political stripe agree that a higher minimum wage will cost some low-skill workers their jobs. But don't believe us; just ask Democratic Speaker Nancy Pelosi.

The House last week whooped through an increase in the minimum wage to $7.25, by a vote of 315-116. But, lo, included as part of this boon to the working man was a loophole: The new, higher wage floor applied to all of these United States and its territories -- save for the Pacific outpost of American Samoa. In the immortal words of Congressman Patrick McHenry (R., N.C.), "There's something fishy going on here."

It turns out that American Samoa has a big fish and tuna canning industry, specifically operations run by StarKist and Chicken of the Sea. Both companies are headquartered in California, and StarKist's parent is located in none other than Ms. Pelosi's own San Francisco district. So faster than you can say "middle class squeeze," Democrats rediscovered the eternal economic truth that a higher minimum wage can cost jobs and granted Samoa its reprieve.

They have a good point. In 2004, according to the Department of Labor, Samoan canneries directly employed some 4,800 people, or nearly 40% of the work force. StarKist and Chicken of the Sea would have plenty of other low-wage locations to do their canning. The average hourly wage for the American Samoan canneries in 2004 was about $3.60. In contrast, the average cannery wage in Thailand was 67 cents an hour and in the Philippines 66 cents.

You don't have to go as far as American Samoa to discover other liberals who understand this -- at least when they do the hiring. In 1995, the union-financed lobby, Acorn, sued California seeking exemption from the state's then-$4.25 minimum wage. Acorn argued in its court brief that, "The more that Acorn must pay each individual outreach worker -- either because of minimum wage or overtime requirements -- the fewer outreach workers it will be able to hire." As liberal economist Joseph Stiglitz once wrote: "A higher minimum wage does not seem a particularly useful way to help the poor."

None of this insight will do American Samoa much good, however. Red-faced after her tuna surprise was discovered, Speaker Pelosi announced late last week that she was directing her cannery compadre, California's George Miller, to re-examine whether the bill also should apply to the Pacific island. Maybe the poor Samoan workers who lose their canning jobs can relocate to Thailand.

OTHER NEWS:

A Ticket On A Taurus Grows Into Much More (WP)

By Nick Miroff

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

The Great Virginia Parking Ticket Battle began with a burst of expletives one Saturday morning in October 2000, when Woodbridge resident Robert W. Eberth, a retired Navy captain, found a $35 citation on the windshield of his 1990 Ford Taurus. NO VALID STATE INSPECTION, it said.

DOJ_NMG_0116597

Eberth had been ticketed under Prince William County Code 13-322, mandating up-to-date inspection stickers for vehicles parked on public roads. True, Eberth had allowed the Taurus's registration to lapse. But he was saving the car for his teenage son and had parked it in the private lot of his apartment complex.

Eberth examined the ticket. He cursed a little more. Then he looked up 13-322 on the Internet.

"Something is very wrong with this picture," he said to himself. He checked the box marked "contest."

Over the next six years, representing himself in multiple court battles, Eberth took his parking-ticket dispute all the way to the Virginia Court of Appeals. Last month, he won.

A three-judge panel in Alexandria went even further than Eberth had imagined, ruling that Prince William had no authority to ticket vehicles with expired inspection stickers parked on private -- or public -- property. The ruling by Judge Robert J. Humphreys said state law prohibits only the operation of a vehicle with an expired inspection sticker, casting doubt on whether police anywhere in Virginia can ticket parked vehicles with expired stickers.

Because Prince William's code dates to at least 1965, the ruling suggests that the county has been erroneously citing drivers for more than four decades. Since 2000 alone -- the year Eberth got his first of three tickets -- Prince William has written 29,871 citations under Code 13-322, for fines totaling more than $1 million.

In Prince William, parking enforcement officers have been instructed to stop issuing citations for expired inspection stickers on parked cars. But police in Fairfax and Loudoun counties, as well as other Northern Virginia localities, said they were unaware of the ruling and were still issuing such tickets.

In the meantime, county attorneys in Prince William are scrambling to draft legislation for the General Assembly that would authorize ticketing of parked cars with expired stickers. County residents who have paid such fines won't get their money back. "If they haven't contested, that's the end of it," said Paul B. Ebert, commonwealth's attorney for Prince William.

Eberth's long, tortuous journey from Taurus owner to parking-ticket avenger is a tale of dogged persistence, sheer outrage and crafty improvisation. A Vietnam veteran who is a research consultant with the U.S. Marine Corps, Eberth, 62, is the type of man who keeps military time and has little patience for the vagaries of petty bureaucracy.

"I've led people in combat. I've had guys killed in Vietnam under my command," he said.

Over the years, Eberth has come to see his parking-ticket dispute in the grandest legal terms. It wasn't about the $35. For him, at stake was a larger, constitutional fight against government excess, abuse and violations of the equal-protection clause of the 14th Amendment.

Before he was unjustly ticketed, Eberth's only formal legal training had been a three-hour Navy class on military law. Since then, he has spent hundreds of hours poring over law books, consulting lawyers and scouring the Internet.

"I didn't expect it to take six years," he said, "but I decided I was in it for the long haul."

What Eberth discovered early on was that his biggest challenge would not be getting the ticket dismissed; it would be to get himself convicted so he could appeal to a higher court.

Overturning Prince William's right to ticket uninspected vehicles was never Eberth's goal. His objection, rather, was that his Taurus had been cited while parked in a private lot -- equivalent, he thought, to ticketing a car in a residential driveway.

Through his research, Eberth learned that state law was written to give police access to private roads within developments containing 100 or more residential lots, such as a subdivision with at least 100 home sites. Prince William had enacted a law allowing tickets where there were 100 or more residential units, such as in an apartment building.

The result, Eberth thought, was that police were aggressively ticketing in apartment complexes where "people are least likely to have the resources or the will to get through the rigmarole I went through."

Eberth fought his first ticket from Prince William General District Court to Circuit Court, and then in a retrial. But a county prosecutor finally dismissed the case, saying, Eberth recalled, that he was doing so "out of gratitude" for Eberth's military service. Eberth found himself in the awkward position of objecting to his own acquittal. The judge overruled him; case dismissed.

But Eberth wouldn't quit. He had covered up the Taurus to avoid additional tickets, but after the first citation was dismissed, he removed the cover -- deliberately baiting parking-enforcement officers to cite him again.

He got another ticket Feb. 20, 2002, and, for his purposes, a new ticket to court. Once again, the judge dismissed the citation, Eberth said, out of sympathy for his situation.

"I'd blown a second opportunity," he said.

So Eberth went fishing a third time and was cited again Aug. 25, 2004. That time, he walked into court with a dismissal-proof plan. He plotted to make the case "a test of manhood." When Eberth arrived in Circuit Court, he got right in the prosecutor's face and dared him to proceed.

"I tend to spit a little when I'm animated, so I'm sure he got a full face, too," Eberth said. "I wanted to get him mad."

It worked. Eberth was found guilty, opening his path to the Court of Appeals. His first petition was denied, but on his second try, the court agreed to hear his case. Eberth finally got his day in court in September.

DOJ_NMG_0116598

The decision Dec. 5 by the Court of Appeals invalidated both county codes, drawing distinctions between "operating" a vehicle and "parking" one and distinguishing residential "lots" from "units."

To Eberth, it was anticlimactic. "I've been fighting this for so long," he said. "There's a sense of vindication, but I didn't do a dance or pop open the champagne."

Eberth was still thinking big, and the court didn't engage his constitutional argument, as he'd hoped. "I want to take it to the next step. I intend to pursue this as a violation of the Constitution," he said.

For Prince William, Eberth's quest raised the question of how an illegally enacted code could persist for so long.

"I'm sure people over the years have challenged it," said Ebert, the commonwealth's attorney. "But no one's gone to the trouble of appealing it to the Court of Appeals."

Corey A. Stewart (R-Occoquan), chairman of the Board of County Supervisors, said: "We thank him for pointing out this error. I've got to hand it to him -- he's got determination. I hope he'll get on with his life now."

As for the Taurus, it hasn't been moved in six years. Turned out, his son didn't want it.

"He wanted something that was more the 'in' thing with the crowd at the high school," he said. "He has an SUV."

Choice Of Martinez Sparks GOP Rebellion (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, January 16, 2007

Rebellion is brewing among conservatives on the Republican National Committee over President's Bush's attempt to "impose" Sen. Mel Martinez of Florida as "general chairman" of the party, who favors "amnesty" for illegal aliens.

"I will be voting against Senator Martinez if he is nominated for any chairmanship of the RNC," Tina Benkiser, Texas Republican Party chairman, told The Washington Times yesterday.

Bill Crocker, the elected national committeeman from Texas, says that when the RNC convenes here tomorrow, "Absolutely, I will vote against Martinez."

The conservatives -- one of whom accused the Bush White House of "outsourcing" party leadership -- say the general-chairman post does not exist under RNC rules, which can be changed only at the party's presidential nominating convention.

Unhappy committee members say that, in the past, Republican presidents and RNC leaders have successfully run roughshod over the rules, because the RNC officer presiding over votes at committee meetings have simply overruled points of order and other objections from the floor, with no accredited professional parliamentarians to exercise a check.

This time, the organizers of the rebellion say, their strategy will rely in part on having a parliamentarian present. And violations of Robert's Rules of Order and of the RNC's written rules -- adopted at the 2004 Republican National Convention in New York -- could result in legal challenges.

"I have also requested that the RNC employ the services of an independent certified parliamentarian to assure that breaches of the rules are avoided," North Dakota RNC member Curly Haugland said in a letter sent to all RNC members yesterday. "And I trust that my request will be honored due to the potential need for numerous interpretations of the rules."

Mr. Bush has said he hopes the RNC will elect Mr. Martinez as "honorary chairman" but that title has changed, in Republican Party press releases and conversations with RNC officials, to "general chairman."

Robert M. "Mike" Duncan, a Kentucky RNC member and RNC treasurer, is expected to be elected as the national chairman, with the responsibility of day-to-day management of the committee.

"Every president has the prerogative of naming who runs the national committee," Mr. Duncan told The Washington Times. "The choice is determined by the needs of the party at the time the selection is made."

Arguing precedent, proponents of the arrangement point out that the RNC members went along with President Reagan's desire in 1983 to have his friend, Nevada Sen. Paul Laxalt, voted in as general chairman, even though the rules provided for no such office. The RNC members at the same time elected Frank J. Fahrenkopf Jr. -- an RNC member and chairman of the Nevada Republican Party at the time -- as chairman.

But opponents say that 1983 precedent does not justify another violation of the party's rules.

"I have a hard time understanding the logic," said RNC member Randy Pullen, who is running for Arizona Republican Party chairman in an election at the end of this month. "Just because the RNC did something wrong once before, somehow that justifies doing it again?"

Mr. Pullen pointed out that Mr. Martinez, who served as Mr. Bush's secretary of Housing and Urban Development before winning a Senate seat, is not an RNC member. RNC rebels say the rules are clear that the person who heads the committee must be a member of the committee.

"Outsourcing our leadership at this critical time is not an option," Mr. Haugland said.

DOJ_NMG_0116599

Organizers of the rebellion against the White House domination of the RNC -- as well as other members who haven't decided yet to join the planned public showdown at the RNC's annual three-day winter meeting -- say even before Mr. Martinez became an issue, they expected difficulty in fundraising by the national committee for the 2008 election cycle.

"Martinez aside, the simple fact that the GOP no longer is in the majority in Congress is going to make it more difficult to raise money," said Louisiana RNC member Ross Little.

National committeemen willing to buck the White House on the RNC chairmanship also cite as fundraising obstacles the president's unpopularity, the conduct of the Iraq war, as well as disillusionment caused by the scandals, big spending and ineptitude of Republican leadership in Washington.

The rebels say that electing Mr. Martinez as head of the RNC would make raising money even more difficult because of resentment by the party's rank-and-file small donors over Mr. Martinez's co-sponsorship of legislation to allow millions of illegal aliens to become citizens.

"Martinez's support of [Arizona Sen. John] McCain's immigration bill on amnesty for illegal aliens is causing a lot of concern among our base," said Mr. Pullen. "I happen to know that people -- our $25 and $35 donors -- are writing on the back of our RNC solicitations for donations: 'When you close the border to illegal aliens, we'll open our checkbooks.' "

The Central Committee of the Republican Party in the president's own state of Texas has passed a resolution strongly urging the Texas Republican Party chairman, Mrs. Benkiser, and the two other Texas RNC members to vote against Mr. Martinez.

Report: Sen. Allard Won't Seek 3rd Term (AP)

By Steven K. Paulson

AP, January 16, 2007

Colorado Republican Sen. Wayne Allard said Monday he will not run for re-election in 2008 but will honor a pledge he made in 1996 to serve only two terms.

"Today, I'm announcing that I will honor my term limits pledge to the people of Colorado," he said.

The decision sets up a wide-open race. Allard's seat was once considered safe for the GOP, but Colorado voters have shown a penchant lately for replacing Republicans with Democrats.

Democrats see the race as a chance to pick up another vote in Congress after wresting two House seats and a Senate seat from Republicans the past two years. Republicans hope to stanch a long series of losses, including both houses of the state Legislature and the governor's office.

Democratic Rep. Mark Udall, a popular five-term congressman and son of former Rep. Morris Udall of Arizona, has said he was going to run for the seat whether Allard did or not. Another Democrat who has been mentioned as a potential candidate is Denver Mayor John Hickenlooper.

On the Republican side, former congressman Scott McInnis said he will run if Allard and former Gov. Bill Owens don't.

Owens, a Republican, left office last week after term limits prevented him from running again. McInnis did not immediately return calls Monday.

Another prominent Republican, anti-immigration firebrand Rep. Tom Tancredo, also has been mentioned as a possible candidate. So have Attorney General John Suthers, who said through a spokeswoman it was premature to make a decision about 2008, and John Elway, the former Denver Broncos quarterback.

Allard's political strength came into question in 2006 when Time magazine ranked him as one of the five worst U.S. senators.

Allard's chief of staff, Sean Conway, criticized the Time ranking as "more like a popularity poll" and said it was based mostly on opinion.

Allard Bows Out, Setting Off Skirmish (DENP)

By Anne C. Mulkern And Demetria Gallegos

Denver Post, January 16, 2007

Colorado Republican Sen. Wayne Allard and his wife Joan at the state Capitol building on Monday, January 15, 2007, as Allard announced he would not run for re-election in 2008. (Post / Hyoung Chang)

U.S. Sen. Wayne Allard has announced that he will not seek re-election in 2008, retiring instead after completing his second term in office.

"Today, I'm announcing that I will honor my term limit pledge to the people of Colorado, and not seek reelection to the United States Senate in 2008...I believe a promise made, should be a promise kept," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0116600

Allard's announcement today at the state Capitol touches off a political scramble -- particularly on the Republican side where several people are said to be contemplating a run or are being encouraged to seek the seat.

Among the likely contenders are former U.S. Reps. Scott McInnis and Bob Schaffer and just-departed Gov. Bill Owens, who had said as recently as two weeks ago that he hoped Allard would seek a third term.

On the Democratic side, U.S. Rep. Mark Udall of Eldorado Springs will seek the seat. While others, including Denver Mayor John Hickenlooper, are likely to be mentioned as possible contenders, so far Udall has the field to himself.

Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Littleton, will not seek Allard's seat in 2008, Tancredo spokesman Carlos Espinosa said today. Tancredo encouraged former Rep. Scott McInnis to run.

Tancredo was flying back to Washington D.C. from a trip to Iowa when he learned about Allard's decision. Espinosa said he did not have an opportunity to ask Tancredo why he's decided not to seek the statewide seat. Tancredo has said several times over the last year that he would be interested if Allard decided to retire.

Other mentioned in connection with an open seat are Attorney General John Suthers, who said through a spokeswoman it was premature to make a decision about 2008, and John Elway, the former Denver Broncos quarterback.

Allard's political strength came into question in 2006 when Time magazine ranked him as one of the five worst U.S. senators.

"In a Senate full of ambitious members, Colorado Republican Wayne Allard is so bland that his critics have dubbed him 'Dullard,'" Time said.

The article criticized him for "almost never" playing a major role in legislation despite being a Republican on the powerful Budget and Appropriations committees.

Allard's chief of staff, Sean Conway, criticized the Time ranking as "more like a popularity poll" and said it was based mostly on opinion.

At today's press conference, Allard cited successes and goals accomplished during his time in office. He thanked his staff and supporters and said that his final two years in office will likely be his most productive.

"In an age when promises are cast away as quickly as yesterday's newspaper, I believe a promise made is a promise kept," said Allard. "The people of Colorado placed their trust in me based on my promise to them to serve no more than two terms, and it was very important to me to not dishonor that trust." The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Allard: No Third Term (RMNA)

By .E. Sprengelmeyer

Rocky Mountain News Allard, January 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — Sen. Wayne Allard said today he will honor his term-limits pledge and leave at the end of 2008, creating a replacement fight that should turn Colorado into one of the country's biggest electoral battlegrounds.

"I just didn't think I could back away from the (term limits) commitment. It is a matter of integrity and keeping your commitments. I have never wavered on that," Allard told the Rocky Mountain News.

Appearing with his wife, Joan, at a press conference at the state Capitol, Allard said, "The people of Colorado placed their trust in me based on a promise I made to them and I am honoring that promise. In an age when promises are cast away as quickly as yesterday's newspaper, I believe a promise made should be a promise kept."

Allard, 63, faced friendly pressure from fellow Republicans who wanted him to run again. That's because open-seat contests can be vastly more difficult — and costly — for a party to defend.

But he also was tugged by the promise he made in 1996 to serve no more than two U.S. Senate terms.

The term limits pledge was a relic of the so-called "Republican Revolution" of the 1994 election, when the GOP swept to power promising to change the ways of Washington.

As time passed, some one-time leaders of the movement, including Rep. Tom Tancredo, and others who signed pledges, such as former Rep. Scott McInnis, abandoned their promises in the name of continuing public service. Others, such as former Rep. Bob Schaffer, lived up to their pledge and went home.

In October 2002, when Allard's re-match against Democrat Tom Strickland still was in doubt, it was suggested that the senator was hedging on his term-limits pledge.

"I'm term-limited," Allard said in reaction. "That has always been my position. I've always said I believe in limiting my term. I've stipulated in past campaigns that I believe in term limits, and I've never wavered on it."

He went on to beat Strickland, just as he had in 1996. But in later years, Allard avoided making definitive statements about the term limits pledge, especially after Sen. Ben Nighthorse Campbell's abrupt retirement led to a Republican seat falling into the hands of Democrat Ken Salazar.

"Whoever runs, whether it's me or some (other Republican) candidate who will be running, we'll be facing a tough race in Colorado," Allard said recently. "I've always faced tough races before. ... I'm used to being an underdog."

There's a long list of potential candidates for Allard's seat, including Rep. Mark Udall, D-Eldorado Springs, and various Republicans, such as outgoing Gov. Bill Owens, Tancredo, McInnis and Schaffer.

Even before Allard's decision, the Cook Political Report and the Washington Post political blog had called Colorado's 2008 Senate contest one of the top races to watch.

An anticipated retirement by Allard was one reason, but analysts also point to Democratic gains in Colorado and other Western states.

The 2008 contest will happen in a presidential election year, and some Democrats are urging their party to pick a presidential nominee who reflects Western values. If so, that could give the party's Senate candidate some coat-tails to ride.

Allard has been more folksy than flashy during his 24 years in elective office, starting with eight years in the state Senate, six years in the U.S. House of Representatives and so far 10 years in the U.S. Senate.

"Senator Allard's great political strength was that Coloradans could look at him and say, 'He is like me. He works hard every day.'

And I think there's a commonality between Coloradans and Sen. Allard that we haven't seen many times in elected officials," said Republican consultant Dick Wadhams, who managed Allard's Senate campaigns in 1996 and 2002.

Allard has been a champion of fiscal discipline and traditional social values. That included two unsuccessful bids to pass a proposed constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage.

In recent years, Allard often cast predictable, party-line votes with fellow Republicans, and he was known as one of the more reliable allies of President Bush's White House.

Allies liked to say Allard has been a "work horse" rather than a "show horse" in Congress. Still, Time magazine in 2005 dubbed him "The Invisible Man" and one of the five "worst" U.S. Senators.

Longtime Allard chief of staff Sean Conway dismissed the ranking as "laughable," citing the senator's accomplishments, including cutting years off the schedule for cleaning the former nuclear weapons plant at Rocky Flats; defending the state's military installations from base closings and spearheading the investigation into sexual assaults at the U.S. Air Force Academy.

Allard was the only one from the nine-member state delegation to sit on an Appropriations Committee, a strategic place for securing federal funds for the state. First-term Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Denver, already has expressed an interest in an appropriations seat, although the positions are hard to come by.

But Allard might be remembered just as much for his down-home appeal and affable manner than his legislative record.

Allard played up his roots as a veterinarian and small businessman. He bragged about being a member of the two-person Senate Veterinarian Caucus, and he sometimes examined colleagues dogs in his Senate office.

Meanwhile, he lightened up his policy speeches by lacing them with yarns about his experience running the Allard Animal Hospital back in Colorado.

For example, his appeal for reforming the nation's health care systems included his story about being stuck with a high out-of-pocket expense for surgery after he hurt his back lifting Great Danes and other heavy dogs onto his examination table.

Sen. Allard Says He Will Retire In 2008 (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.) will not seek a third term in the Senate, a decision that creates a ripe pickup opportunity for Democrats in the 2008 election.

Allard has served in the Senate since 1996. He said at a news conference yesterday in Denver that his pledge to serve just two terms was the overriding factor in his decision.

"In an age when promises are cast away as quickly as yesterday's newspaper, I believe a promise made should be a promise kept," he said.

Allard is the first senator to announce he will not seek reelection next year, when Republicans must defend 21 seats and Democrats only 12.

Other Republicans mentioned as possible retirees in 2008 include Thad Cochran (Miss.), Chuck Hagel (Neb.), Pete V. Domenici (N.M.) and John W. Warner (Va.). Tim Johnson (S.D.) and John F. Kerry (Mass.) are considered the most likely Democrats to retire.

Even before his announcement, Allard was regarded as one of the most vulnerable senators next year, in equal parts because of his low-key demeanor and because of Colorado's shifting political landscape.

DOJ_NMG_0116602

In the past two elections, Democrats have taken over the governor's mansion, a Senate seat and two House seats. In part to highlight their success in Colorado and the Mountain West, the Democratic National Committee picked Denver last week as host of its 2008 nominating convention.

Allard's retirement "improves the Democrats' chances significantly because the eventual Republican nominee will not be able to marshal as much resources or local goodwill as an incumbent senator" would, said Colorado-based pollster Paul Harstad, whose firm is handling the survey research for Rep. Mark Udall, the likely Democratic nominee.

Udall is not likely to face a serious challenge in the primary, according to several informed Democrats. The son of the late former congressman Morris Udall (D-Ariz.) has held a Boulder-area congressional seat since 1998, and he has made little secret of his desire to serve statewide.

In 2004, he announced for the seat of retiring Sen. Ben Nighthorse Campbell (R), only to step aside for state Attorney General Ken Salazar (D) less than 24 hours later. At that time, Udall announced he would run for the Senate in 2008, and he has been at it ever since. As of Dec. 31, he had $1.3 million in his House campaign account.

For Republicans, the picture is far less clear. Bill Owens, who left office last week after eight years as governor, is the first choice of many, but he seems disinclined to make the race. Former congressman Scott McInnis has repeatedly expressed interest in a Senate race but has said he would take a pass if Owens decided to run. Former congressman Bob Schaffer ran for the Senate in 2004, losing in the primary to beer baron Pete Coors.

Schaffer said he is interested in the race but is in "no hurry" to make up his mind. "I ran for the U.S. Senate in 2004, and so it isn't any secret that I want to be in the Senate," he added. McInnis did not return a call seeking comment.

Rep. Tom Tancredo, former congressman Bob Beauprez and state Attorney General John W. Suthers have also been mentioned as possible candidates.

Sen. John Ensign (Nev.), chairman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, called holding Allard's seat a "top priority."

Colorado Senator Won't Seek Re-election (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

The Washington Times, January 16, 2007

DENVER -- Sen. Wayne Allard, Colorado Republican, announced yesterday that he would retire from the Senate in 2008 rather than run for re-election, honoring his term-limits pledge, despite party pressure to seek a third term.

"The people of Colorado placed their trust in me based on a promise I made to them, and I am honoring that promise," said Mr. Allard at a press conference at the state Capitol. "In an age when promises are cast away as quickly as yesterday's newspaper, I believe a promise made should be a promise kept."

State and national Republicans had urged the senator to run again, citing the difficulty of defending an open seat, but the 63-year-old Mr. Allard, accompanied by his wife, Joan, said he wanted to uphold the ideal of the short-term "citizen legislator."

"We didn't ever hesitate to think we weren't going to keep that pledge," said Mr. Allard, who has championed proposals to restrict senators to two terms.

His announcement touched off a succession scramble that immediately pushed Colorado into the must-win category for both parties. Each has reason for optimism: state Democrats have enjoyed a winning streak of late that includes the governor's office and control of the legislature, but Republicans still hold the state voter-registration edge.

"One thing about Colorado politics is that the unexpected happens," said Republican political consultant Dick Wadhams, who guided Mr. Allard's 1996 Senate victory.

Mr. Wadhams, who is expected to take over as Colorado Republican Party chairman in March, advised would-be candidates to "get in soon." Democratic Rep. Mark Udall has already taken that advice, indicating that he would run for the seat whether or not Mr. Allard retired.

Other possible Democratic contenders are Denver Mayor John Hickenlooper and Rep. John Salazar, whose older brother, Ken, is the state's junior senator.

At the top of the Republican list would be former Gov. Bill Owens, who left office earlier this month after serving two terms. Mr. Owens had been encouraging Mr. Allard to run for re-election while indicating that he had no interest in the seat himself.

Also being mentioned are former Reps. Scott McInnis and Bob Schaffer, as well as Rep. Tom Tancredo -- although he is exploring a dark-horse presidential bid for 2008.

Mr. Allard served three terms in the House before running for Senate in 1996 after Republican Sen. Hank Brown's retirement. A large-animal veterinarian from rural Loveland, he was regarded as a long-shot even after he won the Republican primary.

DOJ_NMG_0116603

His folksy manner and solidly conservative views struck a chord with voters, and he defeated former U.S. Attorney Tom Strickland 51 percent to 46 percent. Six years later, he defeated the same candidate by the same margin.

Mr. Allard was expected to face a tough re-election battle in 2008, but he insisted that had nothing to do with his decision to retire. "I've never backed away from a challenge," he said.

He cited among his proudest accomplishments the ahead-of-schedule cleanup of the Rocky Flats nuclear-weapons plant; the creation of Sand Dunes National Park and the nation's largest urban-wildlife refuge at the Rocky Mountain Arsenal; and returning to the taxpayers $4.2 million by cutting expenses from his personal office account.

Asked about his plans after leaving the Senate, Mr. Allard noted that he had kept up his veterinary license.

"Senator Allard never lost an election, and he ran as the underdog in every race," Mr. Wadhams said. "He was the most accessible senator I think we've ever had in Colorado. Anybody could show up and ask him anything. He has a special place in Colorado history."

Task Gets Taller For G.O.P. (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

When Senator Wayne Allard, Republican of Colorado, announced Monday that he would not seek re-election, the uphill battle for his party to reclaim the Senate in 2008 became an even steeper climb.

By the numbers, Republicans were already at a disadvantage. Twenty-one Republican seats will be open, compared with 12 Democratic seats. And not having a Republican incumbent on the ballot in a competitive state like Colorado complicates matters for Republicans.

Already, campaign politics is infusing substantive debates on Capitol Hill. Many of the incumbent Republican senators who have stepped forward to oppose President Bush's Iraq policy face re-election. (Senator Gordon H. Smith of Oregon started the trend late last year, followed by others, including Senator Norm Coleman of Minnesota last week.) Even before Mr. Allard's announcement, Colorado was emerging as a gateway to the West for Democrats, who have won the governor's office, two House districts and a Senate seat in the last four years. Those successes helped seal the Democratic Party's decision to hold its 2008 national convention in Denver. And now, the state will be host to one of the most closely watched Senate races in the nation, too.

Population Shifts (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

Census projections analyzed by the firm Election Data Services show that population losses in Louisiana after Hurricane Katrina could cost the state a Congressional seat after the 2010 census. Louisiana is not the only projected loser: seven states in the Northeast and the Midwest would drop Congressional seats as residents migrate to the South and the West, where six states would gain seats. Texas, which has absorbed some Louisiana transplants, would gain two. The trend would seem to be good for Republicans, who have dominated those regions, though Democrats have made inroads. New districts will be drawn by state legislatures.

NRCC's Cole Optimistic About Lost GOP Majority (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, January 16, 2007

Following his party's worst election performance in 30 years, House Republican campaign chairman Tom Cole makes clear that he intends to retake many of the seats swept up in the Democratic wave in November, and he's willing to effect the changes needed to do so.

With the benefit of hindsight and the optimism of someone in the valley of a political ebb and flow, Cole (R-Okla.) dismisses the strategies that failed his predecessors at the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) and expects a different kind of election in 2008.

In an hour-long interview with The Hill, Cole didn't say Republicans would retake the House in 22 months, but it's evident he would be among the last to project surprise if it happened.

He repeats a pair of facts — that Republicans have their largest minority in the last half-century and that Democrats now hold 61 districts that President Bush carried twice — with the frequency of someone who has been delivering the same argument to donors helping to retire the committee's $15 million debt.

His pitch is basically this: All variables equal, Republicans have the edge, and they will take the majority again.

DOJ_NMG_0116604

"Believe me, if we could carry every congressional district that the Republican [presidential] nominee carries … I would take it right now, sight unseen, end of the game," Cole said. "And I would bet you we would have the majority."

Cole said the Republican strategy of localizing the election and, at the same time, trying to peg Democrats in conservative districts with the "San Francisco values" of now-Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) was unsuccessful in 2006 and indicated it wouldn't work in 2008 either.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) was mentioned with Pelosi in some of the "San Francisco values" campaign ads and, as a polarizing figure, would seem ripe for a similar tactic if she wins her party's presidential nomination.

Asked about the Pelosi strategy, Cole laughed.

"Sure worked, didn't it?" he said. "We were trying everything. 'All politics is local, except if Pelosi wins it'll be terrible.' … We were just in a fix."

The "all politics is local" mantra, coined by former House Speaker Tip O'Neill and cited frequently by outgoing NRCC Chairman Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), is clearly out the door along with Reynolds. Cole shies from maxims, but he also emphasizes that there are "435 Americas" and says that national issues interact with local factors in many different ways.

Cole envisions 2008 being more of an issues-based election — one not dominated by a few select issues as 2006 was by ethics and the Iraq war, but a return to the core principles of the two parties. That's a battle he thinks he can win, because while Democrats have 61 Bush districts, Republicans have only seven Kerry districts.

In fact, Cole ventured that Iraq wouldn't be nearly as big an issue in 2008. This represents a sea change for the party, which in each of the last two cycles touted the war effort and brought resolutions forcing Democratic critics to go on the record.

With President Bush's 21,000-troop surge now on the way, whether it succeeds or fails, the number of troops will likely be "substantially reduced" next year, Cole said.

"We are at the phase where the issue is going to come to a head, and we'll see what happens," he said. "But I'm not sure it will dominate the political landscape."

Amid all his planning for the future, though, Cole has a very important issue to deal with right now. The committee's current debt paralyzes other considerations until it's retired.

"The first year of this stuff is not brain surgery; it's raising money and recruiting candidates," said former NRCC Chairman Tom Davis (R-Va.), whom Cole hired to chair the NRCC's executive committee last week.

Cole reports more than $2 million in commitments so far and hopes to take care of the debt by late spring or early summer. Rep. Phil English (R-Pa.), whom Cole beat out to lead the committee, has been tapped to head the debt-reduction effort.

English said the conference has responded with near-unanimity to the needs of the campaign committee, and he credits Cole with creating that unity.

"So far, he's assembled a cracker-jack team of consultants who I think have the capacity to really revitalize the NRCC," English said. "I am extremely encouraged by the reaction I'm getting asking members to reach into their pockets one more time to reduce the debt."

Cole said members have, for the first time, prior knowledge of how much the committee is going to ask them to give and when it would like to have it, rather than constantly hitting members up for cash.

Among other changes, Cole said he and his top staffers will reevaluate the programs the NRCC has used and that they "are going to a do a lot of changing."

Though light on specifics at this point, Cole did say he would like to expand the Strategic Taskforce for Organizing and Mobilizing People program, or STOMP, which transplants Republican supporters from noncompetitive districts into more competitive, neighboring districts.

He also repeatedly emphasizes that the NRCC will no longer help members who aren't helping themselves. He said Republicans would have won two seats in redistricted Georgia if the party hadn't funded these "political welfare candidates." He wouldn't name names.

Cole said it now is apparent that the field of competitive races is much wider than Republicans previously thought. While Reynolds, to the bitter end, stuck by his assertion that there are about three dozen genuinely competitive races, Cole places the number at about double that amount, and as high as 85.

He mostly declined to talk about specific targets, but did mention repeatedly Kansas's 2nd district as a particularly painful loss and made it clear that the roughly half-dozen seats where Republican corruption led to defeat, including former Rep. Bob Ney's Ohio district and former Rep. Mark Foley's Florida district, will top the list.

He expressed confidence in all the incumbents who survived such a tough election and maintained that things will get better for House Republicans before they get worse.

"You get about one of these a generation," Cole said of the Democrats' 2006 win. "We got ours in '94; they just got theirs. I don't think any of us are due for another one of those very soon. But if so, it's our turn next."

DOJ_NMG_0116605

Two Davids Contemplate N.Y. Goliath (RC)

By Josh Kurtz

Roll Call, January 16, 2007

Good as the 2006 elections were for New York Democrats, one of their few disappointments was their inability to oust Republican Rep. Peter King on Long Island.

Despite facing a young, appealing newcomer, Nassau County Legislator David Mejias (D), King cruised to re-election with 56 percent of the vote. It was the closest race he had had in a decade, but it may not have been close enough to guarantee Mejias a second shot in 2008 — or even ensure that Democratic leaders will target King again this cycle.

"I don't know if the situation will be right for Democratic challengers there in 2008," said one high-ranking Long Island Democrat who did not want to be named.

Mejias — should he choose to run — may face some of the same obstacles in this cycle that he had in the previous one.

Still, the 3rd district is competitive in White House elections, and with 2008 being a presidential year, anything could happen. What's more, there is a spirited special state Senate election under way in Nassau County, and if Democrats capture the open GOP seat next month — even though the Senate district mostly lies within Rep. Gary Ackerman's (D-N.Y.) district — it could provide some momentum for King's challenger heading into 2008.

Joe Galante, a Democratic consultant and town chairman on Long Island, said Mejias has much the same profile as the Democratic nominee in the state Senate race, who also happens to be a Nassau County legislator.

Many Democrats believe that if Mejias had entered the 3rd district race earlier last cycle, he would have done better. A 36-year-old lawyer and son of Cuban immigrants, Mejias did not formally enter the race until mid-May 2006, though he managed to raise more than $900,000 in less than six months. King, who is not the most vigorous fundraiser, spent almost $2 million on his victory, though much of that money had been hoarded from his previous noncompetitive campaigns.

"Mejias certainly ran a respectable race, and if he had gotten in sooner, he would have run a whole lot stronger," said Evan Stavisky, a New York-based Democratic consultant.

Mejias' late entry was due in part to the start-and-stop Congressional candidacy of a colleague on the Nassau County Legislature, David Denenberg (D).

Earlier in the spring, Denenberg had announced his intention to challenge King, but he pulled out of the race just days later after discovering he had polyps on his vocal chords.

"You don't want to start a campaign when you're going to be prevented from talking for a month," he explained last week.

Some Long Island political insiders believe Denenberg actually dropped out because he was worried about being disciplined for prior campaign infractions — according to published reports, his law license recently was suspended for three months after a court determined that he had falsely claimed to have witnessed signatures on campaign petitions.

Whatever his reason for pulling out last year, Denenberg said he once again is contemplating a Congressional run — as is Mejias. But neither is going to start organizing early, because both are up for re-election to their local offices this year, and both represent Republican-leaning districts, meaning neither will have an easy race in 2007.

"To just open up a Congressional committee means you're assuming re-election, and I don't want to assume re-election in a district that's 2-to-1 Republican," Denenberg said.

Mejias said he would explore the 2008 race "down the road" but wants to determine what kind of resources national Democrats are willing to invest to defeat King. In 2006, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee touted Mejias' candidacy, but most of the committee's resources in New York were targeted upstate, where Democrats captured three Republican-held seats. Three other upstate GOP incumbents held on by the slimmest of margins.

"We'll see what happens," Mejias said. "A lot of it depends on the priority the national Democratic Party puts on the race."

But whatever tentative steps the two Democrats are taking, there exists a very real possibility that they could be on a collision course again in a 2008 Congressional primary. Denenberg said that the two had spoken before the 2006 campaign and that Mejias had agreed to defer to him. But they have had no such conversations about 2008, he said.

Adding to the intrigue is the fact that the two come from opposing factions in the Democratic Party of Nassau County, which traditionally has been a Republican stronghold. Mejias is close to County Executive Tom Suozzi (D), who had an unsuccessful gubernatorial run last year. Denenberg is aligned with state Assemblyman Tom DiNapoli (D), Suozzi's longtime rival.

Denenberg did not discount the possibility of the two squaring off in a Congressional primary.

"There's good primaries and there's bloody primaries," he said.

He said Mejias' 2006 campaign was driven by Washington, D.C., consultants and fueled by hype from Newsday and The New York Times, both of which broke from tradition and endorsed the challenger over the veteran Congressman.

DOJ_NMG_0116606

But Denenberg also credited Mejias for putting together a solid organization and said he was puzzled that his colleague didn't do better. He said King's surprisingly strong showing gave him pause as he contemplated his own political future.

If Mejias and Denenberg don't run against each other in 2008, they could in 2009, because they also are seen as potential rivals to run for Hempstead town supervisor — a powerful job once held by ex-Sen. Al D'Amato (R-N.Y.) — or even for county executive, if Suozzi chooses not to seek another term.

Despite the potential enmity between Mejias and Denenberg, Stavisky said the fact that two solid local officials are contemplating taking on King has to be seen as progress.

"It's certainly a refreshing change from two years ago, when I don't think anybody was talking about running against Peter King," he said.

"Either Dave is an excellent candidate," Galante agreed.

Still, the confusion on the Democratic side has to hearten the Congressman, who has consistently won despite the swing nature of his district.

"When he's gone," the top-ranking Long Island Democrat said, "that seat is ours."

Iraq Plan Tricky For '08 Aspirants (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence, Usa Today

USA Today, January 15, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush's plan to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq is putting Republican presidential prospects in a bind as they look ahead to a nomination process dominated by party loyalists.

A year before the primaries start, no one knows how Bush's gamble will play out. For now, polls show Republicans are much more likely than the general public to support Bush, the war and the troop increase.

David Woodard, a GOP consultant and a political scientist at the University of South Carolina, says presidential aspirants need to find a middle ground between the demands of the primaries and the general election. "You cannot cut and run on your two-term president," he says. At the same time, "you've got to position yourself away from Bush."

Two hopefuls, Arizona Sen. John McCain and Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, have clear-cut and directly opposing positions. McCain has long said more troops are needed to achieve U.S. goals in Iraq. Brownback says more troops are not the answer.

Former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney are offering muted support. Former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee calls Bush's stance "risky" and "fairly unique to him" and says he doesn't have enough inside information to judge the plan on its merits.

Bush shows no signs of reconsidering. "I fully understand they could try to stop me from doing it," Bush said of Congress in an interview Sunday on CBS' 60 Minutes. "But I've made my decision. And we're going forward."

Though the public overall strongly opposes the Bush plan, 67% of Republicans in a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll this month said they favored committing more troops to Iraq. Only 13% of Democrats and 34% of independents supported the idea. Nearly eight in 10 Republicans said it was not a mistake to send troops to Iraq in the first place; 82% of Democrats and 62% of independents said it was.

McCain has been a leading advocate for a troop increase. He is so identified with the issue that Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards calls Bush's plan to commit 21,500 more troops "the McCain Doctrine."

On Sunday, McCain called Bush's plan "the last chance" for success in Iraq. "This has to work, and I believe it can succeed," he said on CBS' Face The Nation. Last week, asked on CNN about the difference between his views and those of the public, he replied: "I'd rather lose a campaign than lose a war."

Douglas Foyle, an expert on foreign policy and public opinion at Wesleyan University, said the McCain approach is similar to Bush's 2000 campaign refrain that he would do what's right rather than what's popular.

"Being principled and independent is potentially an advantage, politically speaking," Foyle says — but given the way Bush has put it into practice, "that sort of self-description could be a hard sell" for 2008.

Brownback's opposition to additional troops demonstrates independence from Bush but puts him on the same page as white evangelical Republicans, a subgroup that opposed the increase in an AP/Ipsos Poll this month..

Romney sought his middle ground by supporting Bush but stressing the need for measurable goals and his own consultations with generals and troops.

Giuliani said Bush's plan to "clear, hold and build" Baghdad neighborhoods resembled his plan for fighting crime in New York. "You had a low approval rating, but you stood firm," Sean Hannity told Giuliani last week on Fox News Channel. "The key was to analyze these areas correctly," Giuliani said. In Baghdad, as in New York, "you need measures. You need statistics. … If it doesn't work, you've got to put more people in."

DOJ_NMG_0116607

There's a history of presidential candidates trying to hedge their bets on uncertain military actions. Two days after Congress authorized the Persian Gulf War in January 1991, then-Arkansas governor Bill Clinton offered this: "I guess I would have voted for the majority if it was a close vote. But I agree with the arguments the minority made" about giving United Nations sanctions against Iraq more time to work.

Obama, McCain: 2 War Views (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, January 15, 2007

Democratic Sen. Barack Obama, pressing for a phased withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq starting in four to six months, said Sunday that President Bush's announced deployment of 21,500 additional U.S. troops amounts to a policy of "stay-the-course-plus."

Republican Sen. John McCain, supporting the president's new war plan while allowing that he cannot "guarantee success" with it, warned that withdrawing U.S. forces will only lead to "catastrophe."

And the president, facing vocal criticism for his troop deployment among influential members of both parties in Congress and public displeasure, vowed to press ahead regardless of congressional opposition to the increase of forces in Iraq.

"I fully understand they could try to stop me from doing it," Bush said in an interview aired Sunday on CBS News' "60 Minutes." "But I've made my decision, and we're going forward."

While Democratic Senate leaders prepare for a non-binding vote opposing the new war strategy, Obama, the Illinois Democrat promising an announcement "pretty soon" about his plans for a 2008 presidential campaign, was careful Sunday to avoid committing to any vote blocking war funding.

"Those of us who object to what I consider to be a disastrous policy on the part of President Bush have put forward a different approach," Obama said. "If we initiate a phased withdrawal, that provides us leverage to make sure the Iraqis are doing what needs to be done to arrive at a political solution."

The senator's reservations about blocking war spending, voiced during back-to-back Obama and McCain interviews on CBS' "Face the Nation," demonstrate the Democrats' intention to show support for those U.S. troops already in Iraq while opposing deployment of any additional forces.

`What is the option?'

McCain, saying, "I think we can make our case in this debate," added: "The opponents of doing this are obligated, in my view, to tell the American people what the option is if we do leave. ... What is the option? It's catastrophe. ... The bloodletting will increase."

The unfolding war debate between Obama and McCain--two of the highest-profile potential candidates for president in 2008--offers a precursor of the terms of a political conflict that is likely to consume much of the campaign discourse for the long year ahead, particularly as the president pursues an escalation of force in a conflict he allows will require more sacrifice.

Some of the leading potential candidates for the Republican nomination, including former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, are backing Bush's deployment.

"I agree with the president," Romney has said. "Our military mission, for the first time, must include securing the civilian population from violence and terror."

"I believe this is necessary," Giuliani has declared. "The reality is that the strategy now, which we all hope and pray will be successful, is to try and bring about security."

A leading potential candidate for the Democratic nomination, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, and a declared candidate, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, are slamming Bush's deployment.

"The president's Iraq policy has been marred by incompetence and arrogance," Clinton has said.

"The president is profoundly wrong," Edwards has said. "I think escalating the war is a huge mistake."

And while neither Obama nor McCain has made his intentions clear, both were introduced by CBS' Bob Schieffer on Sunday as "two possible presidential contenders in 2008."

Schieffer told them: "My guess is, gentlemen, this is not the last time the two of you will come together to talk about this subject."

With back-to-back interviews, this was not so much a debate between two candidates as it was a laying down of political markers.

"I think the case still needs to be made" for the president's new strategy, McCain said, calling Congress' debate superficial. "This is about a new strategy, of which an increase in troop strength is an integral part."

DOJ_NMG_0116608

Asked about critics labeling an escalation the McCain Doctrine, in a bid to tag the leading Republican contender for the presidential nomination with the war, he said: "I think maybe I could call it the McCain principle--that when I vote to send young men and women into harm's way ... I am committed to seeing it through."

Asked about the looming non-binding vote against the president's war plan, McCain said: "If these people are serious ... then they should vote to cut off ... funding. ... Emotional disapproval I view as purely a political ploy to do further political damage to the president of the United States."

Obama suggested that the debate is not a question of deploying new troops or withdrawing troops today.

"The options are not either total withdrawal or a stay-the-course-plus, which is what the administration is proposing," Obama said. "The specific proposal that I have put forward, which is echoed in the Iraq Study Group, does not call for an immediate and total withdrawal. ... What we have suggested is that we begin a phased pullout."

`We are in the catastrophe'

Obama also said: "One of the things I strongly disagree with [is] this notion that we have future catastrophe to look forward to if we phase down troops," Obama said. "We are in the catastrophe that Sen. McCain talked about now."

Yet Obama, stressing the importance of supporting troops in Iraq, proved reluctant to commit to a vote on blocking funding for Bush's deployment, as Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) has proposed.

Meanwhile, Vice President Dick Cheney joined Bush in declaring they were pushing forward with the deployment.

"You cannot run a war by committee," Cheney said on "Fox News Sunday."

When Bush was asked in the CBS interview whether he believed he had the authority to add troops in Iraq despite opposition from the new Democratic majority in Congress, he said: "In this situation, I do, yeah."

He also said he disapproved of how Saddam Hussein's hanging was handled. Afterward, he watched a video of the execution on the Internet, but stopped before the end because "I didn't want to watch the whole thing."

Bush's Troop 'surge' Shapes 2008 Race (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, January 16, 2007

For most Americans, the nation is enjoying a welcome lull between elections – the '06 midterms just ended and the '08 presidential race is too far in the future to contemplate seriously.

But in reality, the jockeying among hopefuls, and potential hopefuls, is fierce, and no more so than over Iraq, as the Bush administration presses ahead with its plan to boost US troops levels there. For now, the biggest impact is on the nomination races within the parties, but if the Iraq war remains the top issue in November 2008, positions candidates take now could prove central to their chances of winning the Oval Office.

For the Democrats, all eyes are on Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, who is expected to announce her presidential intentions by the end of the month and who has remained cautious in her criticism of the Iraq war. With more overtly antiwar Democrats running against her, at least one of whom could prove strong in the early nomination battles (former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina), the question is whether she will feel pressure to ratchet up her opposition to the war to win over the antiwar Democratic base.

And if Sen. Barack Obama (D) of Illinois decides to run, his approach to the war – so far, like Senator Clinton, staying away from the forefront of antiwar opposition in Congress – could affect how Clinton positions herself. Senator Obama is considered potentially the most formidable threat to Clinton's nomination. Having taken his Senate seat in 2005, he did not take part in the October 2002 vote authorizing the war. Clinton voted yes in that vote, and has yet to repudiate her position clearly.

The danger for the former first lady is that a clear repudiation opens her to charges of flip-flopping and being weak on defense. In the short run, backing a planned nonbinding resolution opposing President Bush's escalation of US involvement in Iraq would be a safe position, analysts say. Beyond that, supporting any measures that would restrict funding for US troops would be riskier.

"That's really the critical point – the cutting off of funds – and that will be the dividing line of the candidates, if it comes to pass," says a Democratic Senate aide. "This is the ongoing Democratic dilemma, which they experienced in Vietnam. There was overwhelming sentiment against the war, however, Democrats became branded as an antiwar party and weak when it came to national security."

Another potential hurdle for Clinton could be the strength in Iowa of a Democratic candidate who has already declared – former Senator Edwards. He has repudiated his 2002 vote for the war, and now does not hesitate to talk about blocking funding for an escalation of troops. Mr. Edwards is well-organized in Iowa, where antiwar sentiment is strong among Democrats. If Edwards beats Clinton in the Iowa caucuses next January – the crucial first nominating contest – and then does well in South Carolina, another base of support for him, that would present a major wrinkle in Clinton's chances.

DOJ_NMG_0116609

On the Republican side, the safe position on Bush's troop escalation in Iraq is to support it – after all, a majority of Republicans still support the president – and the top-tier candidates have fallen in line. But if voters perceive that the US is mired in Iraq by the next election, that firm support could prove the death knell for the Republicans' chances of holding onto the presidency.

The presidential aspirations of Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona, in particular, could live or die by his strong support for the Iraq war and for the addition of troops. He has said as much. For the other top-tier Republican candidates, namely, former New York mayor Rudolph Giuliani and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney, both are on board with Bush's plan for now, but as time goes on, it's possible that it would be politically expedient for one or both to shift to a stance that focuses more on winding down US involvement in Iraq. Senator McCain, who has all along called for a larger US presence in Iraq, cannot make that move.

The politically problematic nature of the war for Republicans is reflected in the fact that one announced candidate – Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas – has carved out a clear position opposing Bush's escalation. Another Republican thinking of running, Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, is also a leading voice in opposition to the escalation.

Senator Brownback's view presents the unusual scenario of a presidential candidate who is courting both the evangelical vote and the antiwar vote among Republicans. But even if Brownback is considered a long shot for the nomination, his voice in the mix could create pressure on Bush and other Republicans from the right.

"There is not much of an antiwar constituency among evangelicals, but like everyone else, there is a growing concern for how the war is being conducted," says John Green, a senior fellow at the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life. "Thus, it will be tough for Brownback to premise his campaign on this issue, but it might be a useful ancillary position if the war's unpopularity grows."

Full HTML version of this story which may include photos, graphics, and related links

Privacy Policy |
Rights & Permissions |
Terms of Service |
Advertise With Us |
Today's Article on Christian Science
www.csmonitor.com | Copyright © 2007 The Christian Science Monitor. All rights reserved.

Our Tunnel Vision (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

Some years ago, I accompanied John McCain to Vietnam. For him, it was yet another trip to the place where he had been a prisoner of war, but for me it was a first. After we visited Hanoi and Ho Chi Minh City (the former Saigon), McCain and the rest of his party went home. A colleague and I stayed behind to visit the famous Cu Chi tunnels. To the Vietnamese, they are a monument to a lesson they taught us. To us, they are a monument to a lesson we never seem to learn.

Experience -- reporting, we call it in my business -- can be vastly overrated. I went to Bosnia and Croatia during the war there and came away convinced that NATO, which was to say the United States, should stay out of that conflict. I was intimidated by the terrain and horrified by the ethnic enmity. I came away with precisely the wrong lesson. NATO went in and ended the killing.

Ducking into the Cu Chi tunnels might be a similar sort of misleading experience, but I don't think so. Suddenly, I was underground, stooped, gasping for air and intolerably hot. I was experiencing -- just for a short while -- the conditions in which the Vietnamese communists lived for long stretches. The tunnels had sleeping quarters, meeting rooms, kitchens, clinics and even operating rooms where surgeons worked in what had to be miserable conditions.

Those tunnels explained to me why the United States lost the Vietnam War. We were fighting people who cared deeply enough about their cause to live underground, to live in ways that no American could even imagine. The Vietnamese communists would do for their cause what no American would do for ours. They won because they believed. We lost because we didn't. We didn't have to.

I keep those tunnels in mind when thinking about Iraq. Just as I could not imagine living in one of them, I could not imagine being a suicide bomber or a member of a death squad -- or killing someone because he was a Shiite or a Sunni. As there was in Vietnam, there is a piece of Iraq -- its culture, it religions, its history -- that we do not understand. This war has lasted longer than we expected not just because we were inept or understaffed or fired the Baathists or discharged the army -- but because we don't understand the country. For instance, an Iraqi government that reacts lethargically to American proposals moved with surprising alacrity to hang Saddam Hussein. Even late in the game, we didn't see it coming.

DOJ_NMG_0116610

Similarly, we did not notice that in all the hoopla just before Hussein's statue in Baghdad's Firdaus Square came down in 2003, the crowd went silent after an American flag was draped over it. The crowd came to life only when the Iraqi flag replaced it. Had we noticed that, we might have learned something about Iraqi nationalism and the fleeting gratitude awarded to liberators. One minute you're a liberator, the next an occupier.

I have some questions. When politicians and commentators detail all that the Bush administration did wrong, I wonder whether any of it really matters. Would things have turned out differently if we had done everything right? Was Iraq so "broken" we never could have fixed it? Was Hussein's despotism an avoidable tragedy, or was it, instead, a tragic necessity? I wonder about all these things. I tend to think now we never could have made it work.

Now, of course, everyone looks like an idiot. Bremer was an idiot and Garner was an idiot and Rumsfeld and Wolfowitz and Cheney and all the generals, with the exception of Gen. Eric K. Shinseki, who called for lots and lots of troops and was sidelined. But these men are not really idiots. They were merely wrong, sometimes on account of arrogance, but they were doing what they thought was the right thing. They simply didn't know what they didn't know. They didn't know a damned thing about Iraq.

I wish McCain had been at the Cu Chi tunnels with me and my colleague. (I'm sure he's been there at another time.) I would like to have seen his face, measured his reaction. He knows Vietnam far better than I do, but as a prisoner -- not as an insurgent in a tunnel. I would like him -- because I do like him -- to consider whether the remedy for Iraq is not more American troops, as he insists, but fewer and fewer . . . and then none at all. Iraq is not Vietnam, but America is still America -- and we still don't know what in the world we're doing.

cohenr@washpost.com

Echoing King In New York, Edwards Calls For War's End (NYT)

By Thomas J. Lueck

The New York Times, January 15, 2007

Former Senator John Edwards was greeted by thunderous applause in Manhattan yesterday when he called for an immediate pullback of troops from Iraq.

"If you are in Congress and you know this war is going in the wrong direction, it is no longer enough to study your options," Mr. Edwards said, addressing about 2,000 people who had filled the sanctuary of Riverside Church for a service honoring the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. He said members of Congress "have the power to prohibit the president from spending money to escalate the war," adding, "Use that power."

Mr. Edwards, the Democratic nominee for vice president in 2004 and now a candidate for president, said yesterday that the government of Iraq must be pressured into taking responsibility for the country's own security.

"The best way for that to happen is for America to make it clear we are leaving Iraq," he said, "and the best way to make clear that we are leaving is to actually start leaving."

Mr. Edwards, who represented North Carolina in the Senate, was the keynote speaker at a memorial service sponsored by Realizing the Dream, a group whose founders include Martin Luther King III.

For some of those who attended, Mr. Edwards's speech may have had added resonance because it was delivered 40 years after Dr. King appeared at Riverside Church to deliver his strongest condemnation of the Vietnam War. In a speech on April 4, 1967, Dr. King described the administration of Lyndon B. Johnson as "the greatest purveyor of violence in the world today."

Mr. Edwards referred to an observation Dr. King made near the beginning of his 1967 address, when Dr. King said, "A time comes when silence is betrayal."

"I believe it is betrayal not to speak out against an escalation of the war in Iraq," Mr. Edwards said, to a standing ovation.

Edwards Echoes King's Anti-war Message (AP)

By Beth Fouhy, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 15, 2007

Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards called on Americans to resist President Bush's planned troop escalation in Iraq, echoing a plea by the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. 40 years ago to end the Vietnam War.

Edwards addressed about 1,200 parishioners Sunday at Riverside Church, a multiracial, politically active Manhattan congregation where King delivered his famous "Beyond Vietnam" speech on April 4, 1967. King was assassinated exactly one year later.

Edwards spoke from the same wooden pulpit King used and was introduced by King's son, Martin Luther King III. The younger King said his father would have admired Edwards' commitment to fighting poverty.

DOJ_NMG_0116611

The former North Carolina senator and 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee touched on poverty issues in his speech, as well as AIDS in Africa, energy independence and a proposed boost in the minimum wage.

But he saved his strongest words for the troop increase in Iraq, invoking King's condemnation of the Vietnam War as a betrayal of American values.

"Silence is betrayal, and I believe it is a betrayal not to speak out against the escalation of the war in Iraq," Edwards said to a sustained standing ovation.

It was a high-profile appearance for Edwards on the home turf of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, the Democratic presidential front-runner who has been decidedly more cautious in speaking out against the war and the proposed troop escalation.

Several of Clinton's allies attended the Edwards speech, including fellow New York Democratic Sen. Chuck Schumer, who has already endorsed Clinton's likely presidential bid.

Clinton spent the Martin Luther King holiday weekend traveling to Iraq and Afghanistan.

Two other Democratic presidential hopefuls, Delaware Sen. Joe Biden and Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd, attended King remembrances in South Carolina. Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who could join the presidential field as early as this week, was observing the holiday weekend with low-key appearances in Chicago.

Underscoring his previous calls for a troop rollback in Iraq, Dodd said Sunday at a memorial service in Greenville, S.C., "It is time now that we say we have done enough."

Edwards, who declared his candidacy in late December, said Americans must not wait for a change in presidential leadership to demand that American forces be drawn down in Iraq. Bush announced last week he would send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq in an effort to stabilize the war-torn country; Edwards has called for 40,000-50,000 to be removed.

"We need to show we are serious about leaving, and the best way to do that is to start leaving," he said to applause.

Edwards voted in 2002 to authorize military action in Iraq, as did Clinton, Biden, and Dodd. All but Clinton have forcefully recanted their votes.

Edwards also called on Congress to withhold funding for the troop increase, echoing a proposal announced last week by Massachusetts Sen. Edward Kennedy. Kennedy's plan has been embraced by some other Democrats, including Dodd, but viewed warily by others who see it as unworkable and potentially harmful to troops already serving in Iraq. Clinton and Obama are among those who have not yet indicated they would support Kennedy's approach.

Are Bill's Friends Hill's Friends, Too? (AP)

By Holly Ramer And Mike Glover

AP, January 16, 2007

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton didn't reveal whether she plans to run for president when she called Anita Freedman a few weeks ago. "I didn't give her a chance," said Freedman, 79, who displays pictures of the Clintons all over her Portsmouth, N.H., home. "As soon as she said, 'Hi, this is Hillary Clinton,' I said, 'Oh, great! Tell me what we need to do.'"

Six years after leaving office, President Clinton still has plenty of friends in New Hampshire and Iowa, the states that traditionally launch the presidential nominating process.

And, many of the folks known as "Friends of Bill" count themselves as "Friends of Hill," as well. Some, like Freedman, a Democratic national committeewoman regarded by many as one of the matriarchs of the New Hampshire party, are eager to rekindle the flame.

Others, though, remain undecided on the 2008 race or have gravitated toward other candidates. It remains to be seen how much of her husband's network of supporters Mrs. Clinton, now a New York senator, can resurrect or what role they would play if she decides to get into the race, as expected.

Over the years since then-Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton dubbed himself "the comeback kid" for surviving a personal scandal to finish second in the 1992 New Hampshire primary, the Clintons have not forgotten local Democratic activists who helped them at that critical juncture.

Time and again they have reached out to those same activists and others in early voting states, inviting them to White House events, appointing them to administration posts, and generally remembering them on holidays, birthdays and at important moments in their lives.

When Freedman's husband was dying in 1995, a White House staffer called almost daily to check on him and President Clinton phoned the hospital.

And, when her daughter died two years ago, both Bill and Hillary Clinton called Freedman.

"They have been very nice to me," Freedman said. "I worked very hard for him, I liked everything he stood for, and still do."

DOJ_NMG_0116612

Surviving the close-quarters combat of a presidential campaign in early voting states like Iowa and New Hampshire, where one-on-one retail politics is the game, undoubtedly forges personal bonds. But maintaining and strengthening those bonds is also smart politics, and both Clintons are superb players.

Though Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin's bid for the 1992 nomination gave Bill Clinton and other Democrats an excuse to skip past the state, he later spent considerable time there as president and went well out of his way to build ties with key players.

Joe O'Hern, for example, was a veteran Democratic staffer comfortably ensconced as the Iowa Legislature's House clerk until Republicans seized control of the chamber in 1994, tossing him out of work. He landed on his feet as the Clinton administration's regional administrator for the Department of Housing and Urban Development in Kansas City.

"There are a lot of people in this state who have very fond memories of the Clinton presidency," said O'Hern, who now heads the Iowa Partnership Office for Fannie Mae. "When you have an eight-year term of a Democratic president the number of people who touch that activity is quite large."

There's little doubt that aura extends to Hillary Clinton, O'Hern said.

Bonnie Campbell is a former Iowa attorney general who was named to run the Violence Against Women office in the Department of Justice after losing a bid for governor in 1994, a post that allowed her to travel often with Hillary Clinton.

"I got a chance to watch her operate on both a national and international level," said Campbell. "She's pretty dazzling."

While nostalgia and personal ties may play to Sen. Clinton's advantage, Democrats stress that it's the quality of the candidate herself that's earned their support.

Nancy Richards-Stower, a New Hampshire attorney, said she'll work just as hard for Sen. Clinton as she did for Clinton's husband.

Richards-Stower recalled her first meeting with Mrs. Clinton at a restaurant where her husband was making his first campaign appearance in New Hampshire. As they climbed a staircase, Mrs. Clinton mentioned how eager she was to campaign for her husband.

"Mrs. Clinton, forgive me, but you've not done a New Hampshire campaign before," Richards-Stower told her. "The people you need to get aboard the campaign are going to want to spend time with your husband, not you."

Clinton responded by pinching a sizable section of her own hand.

"Nancy, my skin is this thick," she said. "If you think that I shouldn't do an event, I'd like you to tell me."

"Of course, the very first event she did was a sellout crowd," Richards-Stower said, laughing at how much she underestimated the wife who would like to become the nation's first female president.

"If Bill Clinton died tomorrow, would Hillary still win? Absolutely," she said. "That's how we were introduced to Hillary, but that's not why we're supporting her."

While not all the activists who labored for Bill Clinton will return for another Clinton campaign, many remain friendly and helpful.

Des Moines lawyer Jerry Crawford, for example, who headed both Bill Clinton's campaigns in Iowa, is backing Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack this time, though he's spoken with Sen. Clinton's advisers to offer his thoughts.

"I have nothing but respect and admiration for Sen. Clinton and she is going to be a force in the Iowa caucuses," said Crawford. "It's a pretty interesting dynamic. You can go whole cycles without seeing a couple where both halves enjoy their own base."

New Hampshire Democratic Party Chairwoman Kathy Sullivan points out that her state has changed considerably since the Clintons first campaigned there.

The current top five Democrats in the state — governor, two members of Congress, the state Senate president and House speaker — were not politically active in 1992, Sullivan said.

"If I'm a presidential candidate, those are the five people I'd want to be talking to," she said. "So I think you can't rely on the old friendships, especially because among those old friends, a number of them have become removed over the years from politics."

Former Keene, N.H., mayor Pat Russell now serves on the state Liquor Commission. Though she had the same first impression of both Clintons — bright, sophisticated and moving in the right direction — she hasn't made up her mind about 2008. And she worries about re-igniting the ethics and personal turbulence of the later years of the Clinton administration.

"From my gut, I just don't know," she said. "I don't want all that stuff to be brought up against her. I'm just afraid the press is going to nail her. I know that sounds like a mother, but I am a mother."

Obama Inches Closer To Announcing (CHIT)

By David Mendell

Chicago Tribune, January 16, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0116613

U.S. Sen. Barack Obama inched closer to revealing his intentions about running for president on Monday, adding a "very" to the "soon" in his assessment about when an announcement will come.

"We will have an announcement very soon," Obama (D-Ill.) told reporters outside St. Mark Cathedral in Harvey after delivering an emotional keynote speech to celebrate Martin Luther King's birth.

Prefacing his address in the church, Obama turned to media crews and declared that he was "not making news today" about a run for the Oval Office.

In recent weeks, Obama has sought advice from a widening circle of political advisers and has hired staff in key states.

Even if many blacks view Obama as the premier political leader, he said that the day of celebration for King would have been the wrong moment to declare whether he will seek the presidency in 2008.

"I didn't want to use this day to indicate my plans because I am humbled by what Dr. King accomplished," he said. "I don't think that whatever my political plans are, [they] are comparable to the heroic struggles that he went through, and I don't want to draw false parallels."

Obama said that he is weighing issues such as his personal safety and loss of privacy but hinted that those matters would not affect his decision.

"Everybody in public life, at this point, has some concerns. The fact that my profile is higher at this point than certainly it was a couple of years ago raises those concerns," he said.

"Finding out that there was a photographer lurking in the bushes when I was playing on the beach with my kids is a source of concern. But that's not going to stop me from doing what I think is best for the country and how I can best serve."

Biden Wants Confederate Flag Off Grounds (AP)

By Jim Davenport

AP, January 16, 2007

Democratic presidential hopeful Joseph Biden said Monday he thinks the Confederate flag should be kept off South Carolina's Statehouse grounds.

The comments by the U.S. senator from Delaware on a day of events celebrating Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s legacy came as a potential Democratic presidential candidate, Sen. Barack Obama, evoked the memory of the slain civil rights leader.

"As I recall, Dr. King wasn't hanging out in Manhattan, Dr. King wasn't hanging out in Beverly Hills," Obama told a King remembrance service in an economically depressed south Chicago suburb.

Introducing Obama, an Illinois senator, the Rev. Jesse Jackson told a crowd at the annual King scholarship breakfast, "it's a long, nonstop line between the march in Selma in 1965 and the inauguration in Washington in 2009."

Screaming admirers managed to get Obama's autograph after he advocated removing troops from Iraq, rebuilding struggling areas such as the suburb of Harvey where he was speaking and increasing civic activism and calling on people, especially fathers, to be better parents.

In Columbia, S.C., more than six years after the Confederate flag was taken down from the Capitol dome, its location in front of the Statehouse remains an issue.

"If I were a state legislator, I'd vote for it to move off the grounds — out of the state," Biden said at an NAACP march and rally at the Statehouse.

Jim Hanks stood across from the South Carolina Statehouse with about 35 Confederate flag supporters.

"We love this flag. We love our heritage," said Hanks, of Lexington.

Some carried signs saying: "South Carolina does not want Chris Dodd," referring to the Connecticut senator who, along with Biden, attended the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People rally at the Statehouse.

On Sunday, Dodd told The Associated Press at a King remembrance service in Greenville that the Confederate flag belongs in a museum.

"I don't think it belongs on the Capitol grounds," Dodd said.

In 2000, as the NAACP began a South Carolina tourism boycott, the flag was flying on the Capitol dome and in House and Senate chambers. Legislators agreed to take the flag down that year, but raised the banner outside the Statehouse beside a Confederate soldiers monument.

Biden expects legislators here will eventually move the flag. Pointing to his heart, he said, "as people become more and more aware of what it means to African-Americans here, this is only a matter of time."

Napolitano's Dilemma (RC)

By David M. Drucker

Roll Call, January 16, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0116614

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a frontrunner for the Republican presidential nomination, could create a dilemma for Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano (D) should he win the presidency in 2008 and leave her the task of appointing his Senate replacement.

Arizona law mandates that the governor replace a prematurely departed Senator — but requires him or her to choose an individual who is a member of the same political party as the departing lawmaker.

This begs the question: Which Grand Canyon State Republican does Napolitano enlist to replace McCain, particularly if she has designs on running for Senate herself in 2010, when McCain's seat is up and she will be termed out of office?

Arizona Democrats speculate that Napolitano — whether for personal political reasons or in response to the pressure she likely would be under from Democrats nationally — would select a capable Republican from among her many high-profile GOP supporters to serve as a caretaker, ensuring that the seat is open in 2010.

One Arizona Democrat who is a close observer of Napolitano said the governor definitely has ambitions not limited to her current job. This Democrat envisions Napolitano serving as a member of the president's Cabinet if a Democrat wins the 2008 election or running for Senate in 2010, when she will be termed out of office.

"I think she'll want to do something," this Democrat said about Napolitano, who is not married and is just 49 years old. "She's got the bug. This is her life."

Napolitano's chief spokeswoman Jeanine L'Ecuyer would say only that the governor is focused on the job at hand, with Democrats in Arizona noting that she has been particularly disciplined when it comes to keeping quiet about her future plans.

However, L'Ecuyer disputed the speculation that Napolitano would place politics above competence should McCain win the presidency next year and she be forced to appoint another Republican to replace him. L'Ecuyer noted that of Napolitano's 28 cabinet members, 13 are Republicans, 13 are Democrats and two are Independents.

"She picks who she thinks is best for the job," L'Ecuyer said. "I can't see any reason why she would approach this any differently."

Garrick Taylor, a spokesman for the Arizona Republican Party, disputed Napolitano's reputation for being a moderate Democrat who emphasizes getting things done over political expediency.

The governor's agenda, Taylor said, has been shaped by an Arizona Legislature controlled by conservative Republicans that has put the brakes on Napolitano's liberal priorities, more than it has by her desire for moderation.

Taylor also took issue with L'Ecuyer's contention that Napolitano would appoint the most qualified Republican to replace McCain in the Senate, should he win the presidency in 2008.

"She would make an appointment that would make the best sense for her political career," Taylor said.

According to Arizona law, whomever Napolitano appoints would have to stand for election in the next regularly scheduled general election contest, if that person wanted to maintain the seat past that point. The winner of that race then holds the seat until the election in which the departed Senator would have been up for re-election.

Because the next general election after 2008 coincides with the end of McCain's current Senate term, the seat would be open in 2010, unless Napolitano's Republican appointee chooses to run for it outright.

If she chose an appointee from among her Republican supporters as some insiders speculate, it's possible this individual could be drafted from her cabinet, if not the group of well-known Republicans who endorsed her 2006 re-election bid.

Among them are former Arizona Attorney General Grant Woods (R) and Jack Jewett (R), a Tucson businessman and longtime member of the state Board of Regents. Current elected officials who backed Napolitano last year include Flagstaff Mayor Joe Donaldson (R) and Phoenix City Councilman Tom Simplot (R).

If Napolitano turned to her cabinet to replace McCain, she'd have 13 choices, including Bill Bell, director of the state administration department; Susan Gerard, director of the state Health Services Department; Don Butler, director of the state Agriculture Department; Pat Chorpenning, director of the state Veterans' Services Department; and Gale Garriott, director of the state Revenue Department.

If Napolitano decides to run for Senate in 2010, most big-name Democrats probably would defer to her. If she doesn't run, Democratic Reps. Gabrielle Giffords and Raúl Grijalva, and state Attorney General Terry Goddard (D) could be candidates.

Gingrich Sees Error In Pull Of Voter Base (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 15, 2007

Newt Gingrich, who is considering a bid for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, says his party's biggest mistake is thinking that the way to a lasting majority is to emphasize its conservative voter base.

Polls show the former House speaker trailing Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani among Republican voters nationwide, but well ahead of former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney. Republicans seeking a strong conservative challenger to Mr. McCain are urging Mr. Gingrich to run.

DOJ_NMG_0116615

Mr. Gingrich is still popular among Republican loyalists, although some say his bruising battles with the Clinton administration in the 1990s have damaged his presidential prospects.

At age 63, the Georgia Republican continues to look to the future. He was asked in an interview with The Washington Times last week about his most important contribution to the conservative movement. He replied: "It is a long way from being done, so I don't know that I can answer that."

Mr. Gingrich blames a flawed strategy for Republicans' loss of a congressional majority that Mr. Gingrich was credited with winning in 1994. He said his party can still build a durable governing majority, but first must abandon the strategy of Karl Rove, the White House political director who has emphasized direct appeals to the party's base.

"A base-motivation party inherently, in the long run, drives away the non-base,"Mr. Gingrich said.

The better way, he says, is to define the opposition on specific issues so that the Democrats are exposed as espousing views shared by a small minority of voters.

If in 2004 Republicans had "defined John Kerry on 53 issues" that Mr. Gingrich identified, only 17 out of every 100 voters would have sided with Massachusetts Democrat on those issues, he said.

Mr. Kerry still "would have gotten 40 percent of the total vote because of the ethnic patterns that you can't break, but he could have become a George McGovern," the Democrat who lost in a landslide to President Nixon in 1972.

Mr. Nixon's re-election margin over Mr. McGovern was 23.2 percentage points. Mr. Bush's 2.5 percentage point margin over Mr. Kerry was the smallest for a victorious incumbent president in U.S. history.

Mr. Gingrich said Republican strategist Lee Atwater helped Vice President George Bush advance to the presidency in 1988 by defining Democratic challenger Michael S. Dukakis as representing a minority of Americans on issues from abortion and flag burning to the death penalty and gun control.

It was Mr. Gingrich's relentless effort to define Democrats as proprietors of a corrupt welfare state that marked his long march to power. He was hailed as a political genius after the 1994 election that ended 40 years of Democratic control of the House. But after Republicans' unexpected losses in the 1998 midterm elections, Mr. Gingrich resigned from Congress.

After another devastating midterm election last year, some Republicans have renewed appreciation for Mr. Gingrich's conservative style. A poll of Republican voters in North Carolina, for instance, shows the former speaker with 29 percent support, compared with 30 percent for Mr. Giuliani, 22 percent for Mr. McCain and 4 percent for Mr. Romney. Mr. Gingrich now talks optimistically about prospects for building a broader Republican base.

"Ronald Reagan understood that arguments should be made where we have huge advantages with virtually all Americans," Mr. Gingrich said. "He was brilliant at avoiding base-narrowing appeals and emphasizing base-broadening appeals."

Mr. Gingrich noted polls showing conservative advantages on values issues such as the Pledge of Allegiance -- "the right to say 'one nation under God' is supported by 91 percent of the American people" -- and "overwhelming" opposition to human cloning.

"Reagan taught us to have a banner of bold colors, not pale pastels," Mr. Gingrich said. "Now we have to propose bold solutions based on those bold colors."

In ’08 Race, Hopefuls Bag Early Support (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, January 16, 2007

The first debates of the 2008 presidential campaign are fast approaching, leaving dark horses and favorites to take their marks and improve their odds with familiar handicappers: fellow politicians.

A single endorsement can hold a high value for candidates, whether formally declared or not, as they craft a strategy for the media and fundraising derby that is a White House bid. Following a week dominated by bipartisan criticism of President Bush’s planned troop increase in Iraq, which Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) has supported, McCain changed the conversation yesterday by naming Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty (R) the national co-chairman of his presidential exploratory committee.

“I think our country needs somebody who can bring this country back together — it’s polarized — and do that without violating core principles or values,” Pawlenty, whose reelection in November was a bright spot for the GOP, told Fox News yesterday.

Republicans will hold their 2008 nominating convention in Pawlenty’s home state, fueling speculation that an alliance with the McCain camp would put the governor on the shortlist for a vice presidential or Cabinet nod. But Pawlenty said yesterday he would remain focused on Minnesota.

Snagging the bona fides of a rising party star such as Pawlenty is one thing, but winning over lawmakers from states with early primaries in 2008 can provide an even bigger boost. Both senators from New Hampshire, where the latest polls show McCain and former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani ahead among Republicans, are staying mum on their allegiances.

DOJ_NMG_0116616

"My focus in the 2008 election is on my race," said Sen. John Sununu (R-N.H.), a top target for Senate Democrats looking to build their majority. "I'm staying focused on my work here."

Still, Sununu said he has not stayed out of the early White House jockeying entirely, befitting New Hampshire's pride in its primary's longtime first-in-the-nation status. The senator — whose father, a former governor, endorsed President Bush in 2000 — said he has met with most of the possible Republican presidential contenders and given them counsel on how to gain entrée to the state's GOP networks.

"I want them to have good exposure to the voters of New Hampshire … to make sure they're heard," Sununu said.

Sununu has allied with McCain in the past on measures from the elimination of Internet access taxes to last year's floor fight over same-sex marriage and the 2005 battle over McCain's amendment to limit abusive tactics used against terrorism suspects. During an MSNBC appearance in October, McCain listed Sununu among fellow senators who would make strong running mates for a likely presidential bid.

Several former aides to senior Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) have backed Mitt Romney's GOP presidential run, but Gregg demurred when asked whether he would be the next to lend counsel to the departing Massachusetts governor.

"Mitt is one of our strong candidates," Gregg said in an interview late last week, adding, "McCain is obviously the favorite right now. … There are a lot of good people I could list." Yet Gregg left little doubt that he would ultimately join the fray: "There's no point in being from New Hampshire and staying out of it."

South Carolina, another early-primary state, has split its Republican senators, with rising freshman Jim DeMint going for Romney and senior Lindsey Graham supporting McCain. In Iowa, Sen. Chuck Grassley (R) has said he will hold off on endorsing until later in the contest, while Democratic Sen. Tom Harkin almost certainly will link up with departing Gov. Tom Vilsack's (D) long-shot bid.

Nevada, a new factor in presidential figuring with its mid-January 2008 caucus, will play host to a series of Democratic candidate forums starting next month. There, however, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), is unlikely to come forward with an endorsement any time soon, given the challenges of steering the closely divided Senate.

National Republican Senatorial Committee chief Sen. John Ensign (Nev.) said he would refrain from giving any colleague his endorsement because of his new post.

No matter where a candidate ranks in early presidential polls, the vocal support of a home-state colleague helps to capture the media's attention. Yet Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) cannot count on Independent Democrat Sen. Joseph Lieberman (Conn.), as Lieberman told MSNBC last Thursday.

Lieberman attributed his decision to stay off the 2008 trail to a desire to focus on the Senate, but Dodd's support for surprise Democratic Senate nominee Ned Lamont during last year's general election race aroused Lieberman's public dismay. No such divisions exist in Delaware, where Sen. Tom Carper (D) will back fellow Sen. Joseph Biden Jr.'s (D) campaign.

"If [Biden] goes for it," Carper said last week, his endorsement will be in the offing. "I think he's serious about running, and I think he'll do a fine job."

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D) can count on home-state Sen. Jeff Bingaman's (D-N.M.) support if he decides to formally enter the 2008 race, as Bingaman has said recently. Sen. Charles Schumer (D) has made a similar promise to fellow New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D), and Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin (Ill.) has enthusiastically called for junior cohort Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) to run.

Perhaps the most potent charm in a successful courtship of one state's delegation, however, is attention to the local political climate. With that mind, Biden and Dodd have augmented their appeal to party organizations in early-primary states by generously giving at the state level.

Biden's Unite Our States PAC dished out $105,000 last cycle to state Democratic candidates and groups in Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada, while Dodd's CHRIS PAC sent $102,750, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. Neither Clinton's nor Obama's leadership PAC made significant state-level donations during the 2006 election season, the center's data showed.

Among Republicans, Romney's Commonwealth PAC has given to GOP committees in 23 West Virginia counties, reflecting awareness of that state's unique and early-peaking online primary vote. Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), billing himself as the true social conservative in the 2008 field, sent $7,000 to political committees in early-primary states.

McCain, however, overpowered his competition with more than $350,000 in contributions in Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Michigan, one of his two strongholds during the 2000 presidential battle, according to the center.

A Dark Horse's War Edge (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0116617

Mike Huckabee, who just stepped down as Arkansas governor, is the brightest star among Republican presidential dark horses.

It's not just because he, like a certain other Arkansan, has ties to a town called Hope, or because he lost 105 pounds and has written a popular diet book. And it's not only because he is mastering a conservative form of triangulation blending religious conservatism with policy pragmatism.

Huckabee, if he chooses to run for president in 2008, has another asset: While front-runners John McCain and Rudy Giuliani have placed large bets on the success of President Bush's Iraq policy, Huckabee has maintained what you might call loyal distance.

This is what Huckabee said in an interview last week when I asked him about the surge: "The honest answer for me is that I'm not subjected to the same piles of military and diplomatic information and intelligence that he has, and I'm going to have to trust that the advice that he's based his decision on as commander in chief is good. I don't honestly know. I hope it's right. I have to hope that, because there are going to be people from my state that are going to be asked to go and make it right."

There was also this: "The president's plan is one that sort of lays it all out there for him. If it works, then thank God, we may have a stable Iraq and we'll finally be able to start a complete turnover to them. If it doesn't, you know he's really put a lot of things at risk, including the lives of young Americans."

The words that stand out are " for him." The president is taking this risk himself, not on behalf of the entire Republican Party. If Republicans want a conservative nominee who has never attacked Bush on Iraq but can still signal a change in direction, Huckabee could be their man.

Huckabee is the Republican to watch, especially if former governor Mitt Romney of Massachusetts doesn't gain traction. Like Romney, Huckabee was a governor and can brag about expanding health coverage in his state (even if Romney's plan was bolder).

But Huckabee is also a Southerner with unassailable Christian evangelical credentials: A Baptist minister, he attended Ouachita Baptist University and was president of the Arkansas Baptist State Convention.

Huckabee makes the case that he was an effective governor who happens to be a serious evangelical, not the other way around. "I'm unapologetic with the conservative evangelicals, and pro-life," he said. "But if people look at my record, what they're going to see is that the focus of my time as governor was education reform . . . transportation . . . health initiatives. . . ."

An aide helpfully interjects "large tax cuts," and after talking about those, Huckabee goes on: "I think the Republicans have got to be engaged in the protection of the environment. We've not been on the front of that. We need to be. From my perspective, that's a position that I ought to have not only as a Republican conservative but as an evangelical. Evangelicals ought to be concerned about the stewardship of the Earth."

If it all works, Huckabee would become The Next New Republican Thing: an affable evangelical who talks about issues that secular and middle-of-the-road voters care about. The potential downside -- "by trying to please everyone, will Huckabee please no one?" -- was nicely captured a couple of years ago by the Arkansas Times, a progressive paper that will be must-reading if Huckabee runs. "Will moderates who like his positions on health care and education be turned off by his uncompromising social conservatism?" the paper asked. There's the rub.

What Huckabee understands better than most Washington-based Republicans is why, with the call-ups of so many National Guard members and reservists, the Iraq war is creating such apprehension, even in the conservative heartland.

"When a person is in a Guard unit, two months ago, he was selling nails in a hardware store or he was a police officer on the beat or he was a schoolteacher. . . . And he's probably a little older, and he has kids, and he's well established in the community. When he's killed, the impact has dramatic effect in that community because they didn't expect that this citizen-soldier was going to be subject to that prospect.

"That's why I think that what we're seeing is that there is very strong support for the soldiers," he concludes, "but there's a lot of angst about the war itself." And that's why a faithful Republican with no ties to Bush's Iraq policy could be very popular come 2008.

Confederate Flag Should Go, 2 Presidential Hopefuls Say (MBSN/MCT)

By Aaron Gould Sheinin

Myrtle Beach (SC) Sun News, January 16, 2007

COLUMBIA, S.C. - The Confederate flag doesn't belong on the State House grounds in South Carolina, two presidential hopefuls said Monday at the King Day at the Dome march and rally.

U.S. Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., told the estimated 5,000 people crowded onto the Capitol's north lawn that the rebel banner is not what the country is fighting for.

DOJ_NMG_0116618

"As a state that has provided so many of your sons and daughters who have served in the military uniform of our country, thank you for your sons and daughters, South Carolina," Dodd said.

"Let me also tell you, they are dying for a country whose symbol is the flag of the United States of America. And in South Carolina, the flag that ought to fly is the flag of the United States of America."

U.S. Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., also spoke at the rally, and said if he were a member of the S.C. General Assembly, "I'd vote for it to move off the grounds, out of the state."

In an interview with The State newspaper afterward, Biden said once people realize how much pain the Confederate flag causes African-Americans, the banner will be moved off the State House grounds.

The NAACP's King Day march and rally began in 2000 to protest the Confederate flag, which at the time was flying atop the State House.

Later that year, lawmakers struck a compromise that lowered it from the dome and raised it on a new flag pole by the Confederate Soldiers Monument at Gervais and Main streets.

The flag has continued to be a political hot potato for Democrats and Republicans. U.S. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., was criticized by fellow Republicans during the 2000 presidential campaign for disparaging the Confederate flag.

For Democrats, however, black voters can make up more than 50 percent of the primary vote, making opposition to the flag an important issue. Both Biden and Dodd referenced the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.'s legacy of tolerance and peace.

"Dr. King brought hope," Biden said. "Not just to black folks, but to white boys like me. He brought hope to a whole generation."

Both senators were well received by the NAACP crowd. But across Gervais Street, Confederate flag supporters were holding a counterprotest. When Dodd and Biden spoke, the flag supporters raised signs that said, "Yankee go home!"

And Biden and Dodd were not the only presidential hopefuls to be mentioned Monday.

When the Rev. Charles White Jr., director of the NAACP's national field operations, invoked the name of U.S. Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., the crowd erupted.

Obama is the freshman lawmaker considering a presidential bid. The son of an African father and a white American mother, Obama has garnered great attention and would likely attract support of many black voters.

Joseph Biden Can Now Strut His Stuff (RC)

By Donna Brazile

Roll Call, January 16, 2007

It used to be hard not to turn off the TV or switch cable channels when Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.) had the microphone. Not this time. As chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Biden has one of the best seats in Congress to help shape and influence America's role in the world. Take the nationally televised hearing last week featuring none other than Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

This was his moment, and for a while I worried that Biden would harken back to the old days when he got "lost in translation." This time, he was prepared and conducted himself like a seasoned statesman. He also got some leading Republicans, such as Sen. Chuck Hagel (Neb.), to air their strong opposition to President Bush's new mission or strategy to stabilize Iraq.

Although this is Biden's moment, he shares it with others running for president. At a time when Congress is preparing to debate the merits of this new (if you can call it different from what has been tried and proved unsuccessful before) strategy, Biden appears ready to push for a "Plan B" — if and when this current strategy fails to produce the outcome the president believes is necessary to declare victory and bring our troops home.

As fresh new troops arrive in Baghdad this week for a mission that remains in flux, the newly emboldened Congress must hold the Bush administration accountable and Biden must continue to press for a sound and effective policy shift. Still, the challenge is for the chairman to spend some quality time with his colleagues to help forge a consensus policy and a way forward, while at the same time continuing to establish his credentials as someone worthy of top-tier candidate status. Although potential rivals surround Biden on both sides of the dais — Hagel and Democratic Sens. Chris Dodd (Conn.), Barack Obama (Ill.) and John Kerry (Mass.) — only he, as chairman, has the opportunity to lead and forge a consensus around an alternative option, or Plan B. Biden's moment won't be judged by how his sound bites play on a given day, as compared with Obama's, Dodd's or Kerry's, but whether, over the coming weeks, he can produce a policy. If so, he leaps to the top tier.

For weeks, Biden strongly and forthrightly has opposed the new troop surge and has provided crucial leadership at a critical time on a matter of great national importance. When others have chosen to equivocate, testing the wind before taking a stance, Biden has shown courage and fortitude in his vocal opposition. For many Americans, who both oppose the surge and care about our troops and the right outcome in Iraq, Biden has an opportunity to strut his stuff and to come out of this process with a new cadre of fans.

DOJ_NMG_0116619

Although Biden's alternative plan for decentralizing/partitioning Iraq did not get any traction from the Iraq Study Group, it did play an important role in the 2006 elections by offering Democrats who opposed both "stay the course" and "cut and run" another alternative to highlight. This at a time when most Republicans and some in the media were quick to say, "Democrats offer no alternative."

With Biden's regular TV appearances and his frank criticism of the administration's terrible incompetence in managing the Iraq War, Biden offered to Democrats and Republicans alike another alternative.

Perhaps the 33-year veteran of the Senate was at his best during the second day, in what is expected to be three more weeks of hearings, when Biden parsed no words and said, "We have tried this kind of escalation twice before, in Baghdad. It failed. If we try it again, it will fail again. ... In all my years in the Senate, I don't think we have faced a more pivotal moment. Failure in Iraq will not be confined to Iraq — it will do terrible damage to our ability to protect American interests all over the world, and for a long time to come."

And he's right. Even the Republicans know he's right. At that same committee meeting, GOP Sens. Hagel, Lisa Murkowski (Alaska), John Sununu (N.H.) and George Voinovich (Ohio) all voiced deep skepticism, if not outright opposition, to the president's plan. Hagel said, "It is not in America's national interest to increase our troop presence in Iraq. The president's strategy will cost more American lives, sink us deeper into the bog of Iraq making it more difficult to get out, cost billions of dollars more, further strain an American military that has already reached its breaking point, further diminish America's standing in the Middle East, and continue to allow the Iraqis to walk away from their responsibilities."

For now, Biden must continue to lead Democrats to help forge a bipartisan consensus on finding a way out of Iraq. It's his committee, along with the Armed Services Committee, that must defend and protect our troops and stop the escalation of the conflict in Iraq.

We all support a stable, peaceful Middle East, but the nation now is looking to Congress to help lead us there without sacrificing more of our troops. And after Congress has paved that new road to stability, it's men like Joseph Biden who will be in a position to go to the voters in those early primary and caucus states and tell their stories.

Donna Brazile, the campaign manager for Democratic presidential nominee Al Gore in 2000, runs her own grass-roots political consulting firm.

Nevada Is Game For '08 Caucuses (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

Los Angeles Times, January 15, 2007

The state's Democrats have unique concerns that 2008 candidates ignore at their peril.

LAS VEGAS — Forget the jokes about caucusing in brothels, or trawling for votes amid the slot machines and blackjack tables along the neon-drenched Strip.

When Democratic presidential hopefuls come calling on Nevada, the real challenge will be the party faithful they find in this independent-minded state, which will host the West's first nominating contest in a little over a year.

Democrats here like guns, loathe taxes and see nature as a source of fun and profit, not a place that some Washington bureaucrat should lock away. And skip the Rust Belt rhetoric about all those manufacturing jobs fleeing to China and Mexico. Economic issues require a different approach in a state that has boomed for the last 40 years.

"If you give the same speech on the economy in Nevada that you give in Iowa, you're going to seem out of touch," said Eric Herzik, who teaches political science at the University of Nevada in Reno.

"A lack of knowledge," he added, "can offend quicker than anything."

Nevada represents the leading edge in a political shift, as the Rocky Mountain West becomes the new battleground in presidential politics. Democrats, hoping to bring a fresh voice to their nominating process and give candidates a head start on the fall campaign, have set Nevada's caucuses for Jan. 19, 2008.

It is the first time any Western state has had so much influence so early: Nevada will go second, after the Iowa caucuses begin the presidential balloting a few days earlier. And if the state's leading Democrats have their way, what happens in Vegas won't stay in Vegas.

"This is seen as a very, very unique opportunity to get the presidential candidates on the record on Western issues and put them in the national arena early," said Billy Vassiliadis, one of Nevada's political power brokers and the impresario behind Las Vegas' sly marketing slogan. "Instead of talking about manufacturing jobs and farm subsidies, we'll be discussing public lands, infrastructure needs, ranching, mining and water, water, water."

DOJ_NMG_0116620

On Saturday, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and national labor leaders announced plans for five candidate forums in Nevada, starting next month in Carson City.

For some Democrats, campaigning here may require them to learn a new way of talking — starting with the pronunciation of the state. It's Ne-VAD-uh, not Ne-VAH-duh, which may seem like a small thing unless you live here.

Beyond that, Nevada is a state with a strong libertarian streak. Burdened with a hostile terrain, it found its salvation in sin: gambling, legal prostitution (outside the metropolitan areas) and quickie marriages and divorces. Although that makes for a broad-minded social policy, it also translates into an aversion toward big government and its costs.

There is no state income tax, no corporate or inheritance taxes and no great affection for Nevada's major overseer, the federal government, which control's 90% of the state's land. That makes the environment, usually a Democratic strong suit, a tricky issue.

"People will say we can't allow species to be exterminated," said Chris Wicker, chairman of the Washoe County Democratic Party in Reno. "But they're not going to march in the street for the desert tortoise."

Other national issues play differently as well. Talk of energy independence focuses on wind and solar power, not corn-based ethanol, which fuels the discussion in the Midwest. It's fine to discuss gun safety — more than one in three Nevada households keep at least one firearm — but don't bring up anything that impinges on gun ownership.

Economic concerns, such as transit, land-use and water policy, stem from Nevada's staggering growth — each month, about 5,000 people move to the Las Vegas area alone. The exact number is uncertain — experts can't keep up — and the political ramifications are also unclear.

Many of the newcomers are Latinos attracted by an abundance of service-industry jobs. But they register to vote in relatively small numbers. Senior citizens also make up a large percentage of new arrivals, but many combine social conservatism with a reliance on big government programs such as Social Security.

"It's a mystery," said Michael Green, a historian who has written several books on Nevada.

The issues are nothing like the challenges that confront fading sections of the Northeast. Danny Thompson, head of Nevada's AFL-CIO, jokes that "the tower crane is the state bird." On a recent day, more than a dozen of the construction towers were visible from Tropicana Avenue, where the Statue of Liberty meets a gargantuan MGM lion on the Las Vegas Strip.

In addition, Nevada has its own set of issues, particularly nuclear waste disposal. For more than 20 years, state politicians have fought the federal government over a proposed radioactive dump at Yucca Mountain, a ridge of volcanic rock and ash about 90 miles northwest of Las Vegas. With Reid leading the fight as Senate majority leader, the only question is how vehement fellow Democrats will be in their opposition.

Gaming — as gambling is called here — is another crucial issue. Any attempt to increase the industry's hefty tax burden, or ban wagering on college sports, would not be welcomed. And candidates stumping in the rural north would do well to appreciate the resentment many feel toward the rapidly expanding, water-guzzling south. (Think San Francisco versus Los Angeles)

"It's more a fight across geographic lines than between the parties," Herzik said.

The state's Democrats face their own challenge in building a caucus system from the desert floor up. (The GOP is still deciding its nominating calendar; some jealous Nevada Republicans would like to push their vote forward to match Democrats' early start.)

Four years ago, about 8,500 Democrats participated in Nevada's caucuses, which fell in mid-February, after the nomination was more or less decided. There were 17 voting sites, or one per county, in a state that sprawls over nearly 110,000 square miles — much of it vast stretches given over to scrub and wild horses.

In 2008, organizers hope to provide about 1,000 voting sites for as many as 100,000 Democrats, with most of the action expected in the population centers of Las Vegas and Reno.

Organized labor helped lure the Democrats to Nevada — the state is one of the few places where membership is growing — and unions are expected to play a major role in the caucuses, even before delivering any endorsements. Thompson said labor hoped to turn out more than a quarter of its 200,000 statewide members and had begun compiling an events calendar so that if visiting candidates want to, say, address a group of seniors, they can find a forum.

The Democrats have hired experienced hands from Iowa to oversee the caucuses, along with a team of national political strategists. The state's gambling industry and other business interests are being tapped to finance the operation. Nobody wants to stumble in the spotlight, or embarrass Reid, Nevada's senior Democrat.

Still, it is unclear how vigorously the Democratic presidential hopefuls will compete. No one is abandoning Iowa or New Hampshire — the leadoff caucus and primary states, respectively — to take up residence in Sparks or Elko. But no one is talking about ignoring Nevada, either. A one-two sweep of Iowa and Nevada could make nationally known candidates such as Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois or former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina unstoppable heading into New Hampshire's primary, tentatively set for three days after Nevada's caucuses.

DOJ_NMG_0116621

Other Democratic hopefuls have their own incentives to do well. For former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, Nevada could provide an important test of strength outside his home state. For New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, Nevada offers a chance to capitalize on his standing as the lone Westerner in the Democratic field.

"The West is crucial for Democrats," said Mike Stratton, a Richardson advisor who served on the committee that retooled the party's nominating calendar. "Candidates will have to understand the Western ethos and they'll have to speak it."

For all Nevada's differences, there are some topics that visiting Democrats will recognize. Immigration has begun to boil as an issue — the state's Latino population has grown by 44% in the last five years. The war in Iraq is a concern. And, like voters everywhere, Nevadans care about jobs, education, affordable healthcare and a comfortable retirement.

"You'll be talking to different people than in Iowa and New Hampshire, no doubt," said Jon Ralston, the state's leading political pundit. "But there are plenty of blue-collar workers in union halls. And, hey, showgirls and blackjack dealers are people, too."

New Orleans Feels Pain Of Mental Health Crisis (USAT)

By Peter Eisler

USA Today, January 15, 2007

NEW ORLEANS — Sixteen months after Hurricane Katrina tore this city apart, a hidden sort of damage is emerging. Local officials see it in reports of suicides, strokes and stress-related deaths. They see it in the police calls for fights and domestic violence. They see it in the long waiting lists for psychiatric care that they have no way to provide.

These days, life in the Big Easy isn't easy at all. Everyone from the mayor to the people staffing the public health clinics sees it: New Orleans is facing an unprecedented mental health crisis — and the city has no way to deal with it.

The obvious problems only fuel the more subtle ones. About half of the city's 450,000 pre-Katrina residents have yet to return, according to the mayor's office, and entire neighborhoods remain filled with boarded-up homes and businesses. For those who have come back, everything is hard, and the challenges seem endless: lining up contractors, getting basic services restored, even finding neighborhood places to buy groceries, clothes and gasoline.

Now, many fear the situation could worsen. "This couple of months is our most critical time period. … New Year's, Mardi Gras, Easter, and if people need (mental health) services right now, there really is almost no place to go," says Kevin Stephens, director of the city Health Department.

"We've got families that have been split up for months, families that lost their homes, crammed in small trailers. … People have lost their jobs, their support system," he adds. "There's a heaviness. And we're seeing a much, much higher incidence of mental illness."

How bad is the situation? The suicide rate in the first four months after Katrina rose almost 300% over pre-storm levels, according to coroner's office statistics. In a survey after the hurricane by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, 26% of respondents said at least one person in their family needed mental health counseling — but less than 2% were getting any. Even now, police data show that emergency calls involving people who need psychiatric treatment continue to come in at a rate about 15% higher than before Katrina.

Stephens and other top officials in the city's ravaged mental health system say their anecdotal experience suggests those numbers reveal only a fraction of the problem. Depression, post-traumatic stress disorder and anxiety are rampant, they say. People with schizophrenia, bipolar disorder and other chronic mental illnesses are unraveling because they can't get the treatment they need.

The city has virtually no capability to respond. In all of New Orleans, only a few dozen hospital beds remain available for inpatient psychiatric services, down from more than 300 before Katrina. A survey last spring, cited in the Journal of the American Medical Association, found only 22 of 196 practicing psychiatrists had returned to the city since the storm.

Stephens' health department hasn't been immune. Staffing has dropped from 300 to about 60, he says. One of his nurses who tended evacuees in the Superdome during the storm is among the suicides.

"It's not the Katrina event that is really hurting us; it's the recovery, the aftermath," Mayor Ray Nagin said in an interview last month with USA TODAY. "Our citizens are under tremendous stress. The pain of what's going on in our community, particularly with our seniors, is unbearable almost."

'Everything is so hard'

Before Katrina, Desiree Johnson had a decent job in the billing department of a local insurance company office. She had a good place to live, plenty of friends and extended family nearby.

"I was just living a normal life," she says.

When Katrina crashed ashore Aug. 29, 2005, almost 10 feet of water filled Johnson's house. She and her family fled, some to Houston, some to Indiana, some to places unknown. They just got on any buses that would take them out of New Orleans.

DOJ_NMG_0116622

Now, Johnson, 41, is living with her grown daughter and infant grandson in a trailer provided by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. It sits in front of her flood-ravaged home on a block of mostly empty buildings. She has no job. Money is tight. She doesn't have a local grocery store anymore.

"There's so much stress," she says. "We still have family members scattered all over. My son's in Texas, my mother's in Indiana, my grandmother's in Mississippi. Every year, we all get together for the holidays, for Thanksgiving, Christmas." This year, for the first time, she says, the family didn't do that.

Even if the family could overcome the costs and logistical hurdles of bringing everyone back, she says, "we don't even have a place to get together. You can't find contractors to fix your house, and the ones you do find, it's hard to make sure they don't rip you off. We don't even have a phone in the trailer."

Around Thanksgiving, Johnson realized she couldn't cope. She looked for help, but there were no doctors left in her neighborhood. Finally, she found her way 7 miles across town to the Chartres-Pontchartrain Behavioral Health Clinic, one of the public mental health clinics that has reopened since the storm. She was diagnosed with depression and put on medication.

She has been coming in regularly since and seeing a counselor. "I never had depression before; I didn't really know what to expect," she says. "I feel a little better."

But "better" is a relative term in Johnson's upside-down world. "It's still hard, everything is so hard," she says. "In my area, there's basically nobody back. It's just us, maybe one person in this house or that house. … Sometimes I still just don't know how we're going to make it. On TV, it looks like our city is OK, but it's not like that."

Facilities stretched thin

Chartres-Pontchartrain is one of only two public health clinics in New Orleans that weren't destroyed by Katrina. Six others have reopened (the last two just came back this month). Four of those are in temporary trailers, and none is fully staffed. Still, because many of the city's privately practicing psychiatrists and psychologists haven't returned — and hospital services for the mentally ill are all but shut down — the clinics are the only option for thousands in the city.

"We're stretched very thin," says Jerome Gibbs, executive director of the Metropolitan Human Services District, the state-funded agency that runs the public mental health system in greater New Orleans.

At the reopened clinics, "we're having trouble with staffing, (and) we have tremendous resource needs. And we're finding that there are large numbers of people who need services that aren't even making it in."

The same pattern is emerging at the few non-governmental clinics that are trying to share the load.

At the Behavioral Sciences Center, an outpatient facility run by the psychiatry department at the Louisiana State University medical school, caseloads are running about double what they were last year, according to Howard Osofsky, chairman of the LSU department of psychiatry. More than 100 people are on waiting lists for treatment.

At least those people have some hope: For the sickest of patients — those needing hospitalization — the problems are worse. Until August, not a single public inpatient psychiatric bed could be found in New Orleans. Since then, the New Orleans Adolescent Hospital (NOAH), an LSU-run psychiatric hospital that usually provides youth services, has converted 20 of its 35 beds to treat adults. Those beds and about 20 others at private facilities are the only ones in the city.

"The lack of beds is a monumental problem — when you have people in crisis and no way to care for them, it strains all of the system," Gibbs says.

Many people who need acute care for mental health problems are sent out of town for hospitalization, sometimes at facilities 100 miles away. That often means more problems later.

"If you have to send someone out of the community for treatment, where you don't have family involved, and you don't have the ability to do follow-up treatment when they get back, you end up with … a lot more follow-up problems," Osofsky says.

Sitting in a wheelchair in her small room at NOAH, Eileen Dorn has trouble seeing herself as lucky. But at least she has a bed, a place to stay, at a time when she knows she can't make it alone.

Dorn, 45, has a long history of severe depression and other mental health problems. Before the storm, she lived with her mother. She survived on Social Security disability payments and spent her days listening to her favorite talk shows on the radio, writing fan mail to the hosts and watching television.

Dorn stayed in the city during Katrina, but she and her mother were evacuated in its wake. Dorn ended up at a Houston nursing home; her mother went to a nursing home elsewhere in Texas, where she remains.

"I was so lonely. I thought that if I came back to a hotel someone would be here to help me figure out how to get a place," she says. "When I came back, I needed a support system, counselors. But I couldn't find anything. It was desperation, frustration. It was terrible panic and fear."

Dorn ended up on the street. Eventually, she was picked up and given one of the 20 inpatient beds that had opened at NOAH. Today, she probably would be sent somewhere outside the city.

DOJ_NMG_0116623

Dorn's ward is far from homey. The walls are bare, paint peeling in places. Her room has a desk and a small single bed. The TV is in the common room.

But it's clean, and the staff is dedicated and friendly, Dorn says. She has spinal problems, which make moving difficult, yet she says she is getting medication, regular counseling and, most important, a sense that she's not alone. "It's been better here," she says. "I still don't know where I'll go after this; I try not to think about it. But I feel safe here. And that's better."

Measuring the demand for mental health services in New Orleans today is difficult. Few records are kept. With only 20% of the city health department's staff having returned since the storm, those who remain are focused on restoring day-to-day services.

Stephens had a staffer review death notices published in the local paper since Katrina. Before the storm, there were fewer than 900 death notices a month, the review found. Now, it's about 1,300 a month, he says.

The next step, still unfinished, is figuring out how many of the deaths are stress-related — suicides, strokes, heart attacks. Stephens says those figures will give him leverage to seek state and federal help. "We know the numbers are up; we think they're way up," he says. "But we don't have good data."

Even without numbers, mental health workers say they know there's a crisis. "We hear anecdotal accounts of hospitals turning away people who come in seeking mental health services because they're not able to treat them," says Mark Townsend, an LSU psychiatry professor who sees patients at NOAH.

Townsend says many people with chronic mental health conditions are coming into hospitals, trying in vain to get medication because their regular psychiatrists have not returned. He's also heard of families bringing loved ones to hospitals for commitment, only to turn away after learning that their relative would be sent out of town.

"It's really hard to capture in words how dire the situation is," Townsend says. "We need help."

51% Of Women Are Now Living Without Spouse (NYT)

By Sam Roberts

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

For what experts say is probably the first time, more American women are living without a husband than with one, according to a New York Times analysis of census results.

In 2005, 51 percent of women said they were living without a spouse, up from 35 percent in 1950 and 49 percent in 2000.

Coupled with the fact that in 2005 married couples became a minority of all American households for the first time, the trend could ultimately shape social and workplace policies, including the ways government and employers distribute benefits.

Several factors are driving the statistical shift. At one end of the age spectrum, women are marrying later or living with unmarried partners more often and for longer periods. At the other end, women are living longer as widows and, after a divorce, are more likely than men to delay remarriage, sometimes delighting in their newfound freedom.

In addition, marriage rates among black women remain low. Only about 30 percent of black women are living with a spouse, according to the Census Bureau, compared with about 49 percent of Hispanic women, 55 percent of non-Hispanic white women and more than 60 percent of Asian women.

In a relatively small number of cases, the living arrangement is temporary, because the husbands are working out of town, are in the military or are institutionalized. But while most women eventually marry, the larger trend is unmistakable.

“This is yet another of the inexorable signs that there is no going back to a world where we can assume that marriage is the main institution that organizes people’s lives,” said Prof. Stephanie Coontz, director of public education for the Council on Contemporary Families, a nonprofit research group. “Most of these women will marry, or have married. But on average, Americans now spend half their adult lives outside marriage.”

Professor Coontz said this was probably unprecedented with the possible exception of major wartime mobilizations and when black couples were separated during slavery.

William H. Frey, a demographer with the Brookings Institution, a research group in Washington, described the shift as “a clear tipping point, reflecting the culmination of post-1960 trends associated with greater independence and more flexible lifestyles for women.”

“For better or worse, women are less dependent on men or the institution of marriage,” Dr. Frey said. “Younger women understand this better, and are preparing to live longer parts of their lives alone or with nonmarried partners. For many older boomer and senior women, the institution of marriage did not hold the promise they might have hoped for, growing up in an ‘Ozzie and Harriet’ era.”

Emily Zuzik, a 32-year-old musician and model who lives in the East Village of Manhattan, said she was not surprised by the trend.

DOJ_NMG_0116624

“A lot of my friends are divorced or single or living alone,” Ms. Zuzik said. “I know a lot of people in their 30s who have roommates.”

Ms. Zuzik has lived with a boyfriend twice, once in California where the couple registered as domestic partners to qualify for his health insurance plan. “I don’t plan to live with anyone else again until I am married,” she said, “and I may opt to keep a place of my own even then.”

Linda Barth, a 56-year-old magazine editor in Houston who has never married, said, “I used to divide my women friends into single friends and married friends. Now that doesn’t seem to be an issue.”

Sheila Jamison, who also lives in the East Village and works for a media company, is 45 and single. She says her family believes she would have had a better chance of finding a husband had she attended a historically black college instead of Duke.

“Considering all the weddings I attended in the ’80s that have ended so very, very badly, I consider myself straight up lucky,” Ms. Jamison said. “I have not sworn off marriage, but if I do wed, it will be to have a companion with whom I can travel and play parlor games in my old age.”

Carol Crenshaw, 57, of Roswell, Ga., was divorced in 2005 after 33 years and says she is in no hurry to marry again.

“I’m in a place in my life where I’m comfortable,” said Ms. Crenshaw, who has two grown sons. “I can do what I want, when I want, with whom I want. I was a wife and a mother. I don’t feel like I need to do that again.”

Similarly, Shelley Fidler, 59, a public policy adviser at a law firm, has sworn off marriage. She moved from rural Virginia to the vibrant Adams Morgan neighborhood of Washington, D.C., when her 30-year marriage ended.

“The benefits were completely unforeseen for me,” Ms. Fidler said, “the free time, the amount of time I get to spend with friends, the time I have alone, which I value tremendously, the flexibility in terms of work, travel and cultural events.”

Among the more than 117 million women over the age of 15, according to the marital status category in the Census Bureau’s latest American Community Survey, 63 million are married. Of those, 3.1 million are legally separated and 2.4 million said their husbands were not living at home for one reason or another.

That brings the number of American women actually living with a spouse to 57.5 million, compared with the 59.9 million who are single or whose husbands were not living at home when the survey was taken in 2005.

Some of those situations, which the census identifies as “spouse absent” and “other,” are temporary, and, of course, even some people who describe themselves as separated eventually reunite with their spouses.

Over all, a larger share of men are married and living with their spouse — about 53 percent compared with 49 percent among women.

“Since women continue to outlive men, they have reached the nonmarital tipping point — more nonmarried than married,” Dr. Frey said. “This suggests that most girls growing up today can look forward to spending more of their lives outside of a traditional marriage.”

Pamela J. Smock, a researcher at the University of Michigan Population Studies Center, agreed, saying that “changing patterns of courtship, marriage, and that we are living longer lives all play a role.”

“Men also remarry more quickly than women after a divorce,” Ms. Smock added, “and both are increasingly likely to cohabit rather than remarry after a divorce.”

The proportion of married people, especially among younger age groups, has been declining for decades. Between 1950 and 2000, the share of women 15-to-24 who were married plummeted to 16 percent, from 42 percent. Among 25-to-34-year-olds, the proportion dropped to 58 percent, from 82 percent.

“Although we can help people ‘do’ marriage better, it is simply delusional to construct social policy or make personal life decisions on the basis that you can count on people spending most of their adult lives in marriage,” said Professor Coontz, the author of “Marriage, a History: How Love Conquered Marriage.”

Besse Gardner, 24, said she and her boyfriend met as college freshmen and started living together last April “for all the wrong reasons” — they found a great apartment on the beach in Los Angeles.

“We do not see living together as an end or even for the rest of our lives — it’s just fun right now,” Ms. Gardner said. “My roommate is someone I’d be thrilled to marry one day, but it just doesn’t make sense right now.”

Ms. Crenshaw said that some of the women in her support group for divorced women were miserable, but that she was surprised how happy she was to be single again.

“That’s not how I grew up,” she said. “That’s not how society thinks. It’s a marriage culture.”

Elissa B. Terris, 59, of Marietta, Ga., divorced in 2005 after being married for 34 years and raising a daughter, who is now an adult.

“A gentleman asked me to marry him and I said no,” she recalled. “I told him, ‘I’m just beginning to fly again, I’m just beginning to be me. Don’t take that away.’ ”

DOJ_NMG_0116625

“Marriage kind of aged me because there weren’t options,” Ms. Terris said. “There was only one way to go. Now I have choices. One night I slept on the other side of the bed, and I thought, I like this side.”

She said she was returning to college to get a master’s degree (her former husband “didn’t want me to do that because I was more educated than he was”), had taken photography classes and was auditioning for a play.

“Once you go through something you think will kill you and it doesn’t,” she said, “every day is like a present.”

Intelligence In The Classroom (WSJ)

By Charles Murray

The Wall Street Journal, January 16, 2007

Education is becoming the preferred method for diagnosing and attacking a wide range problems in American life. The No Child Left Behind Act is one prominent example. Another is the recent volley of articles that blame rising income inequality on the increasing economic premium for advanced education. Crime, drugs, extramarital births, unemployment -- you name the problem, and I will show you a stack of claims that education is to blame, or at least implicated.

One word is missing from these discussions: intelligence. Hardly anyone will admit it, but education's role in causing or solving any problem cannot be evaluated without considering the underlying intellectual ability of the people being educated. Today and over the next two days, I will put the case for three simple truths about the mediating role of intelligence that should bear on the way we think about education and the nation's future.

Today's simple truth: Half of all children are below average in intelligence. We do not live in Lake Wobegon.

Our ability to improve the academic accomplishment of students in the lower half of the distribution of intelligence is severely limited. It is a matter of ceilings. Suppose a girl in the 99th percentile of intelligence, corresponding to an IQ of 135, is getting a C in English. She is underachieving, and someone who sets out to raise her performance might be able to get a spectacular result. Now suppose the boy sitting behind her is getting a D, but his IQ is a bit below 100, at the 49th percentile.

We can hope to raise his grade. But teaching him more vocabulary words or drilling him on the parts of speech will not open up new vistas for him. It is not within his power to learn to follow an exposition written beyond a limited level of complexity, any more than it is within my power to follow a proof in the American Journal of Mathematics. In both cases, the problem is not that we have not been taught enough, but that we are not smart enough.

Now take the girl sitting across the aisle who is getting an F. She is at the 20th percentile of intelligence, which means she has an IQ of 88. If the grading is honest, it may not be possible to do more than give her an E for effort. Even if she is taught to read every bit as well as her intelligence permits, she still will be able to comprehend only simple written material. It is a good thing that she becomes functionally literate, and it will have an effect on the range of jobs she can hold. But still she will be confined to jobs that require minimal reading skills. She is just not smart enough to do more than that.

How about raising intelligence? It would be nice if we knew how, but we do not. It has been shown that some intensive interventions temporarily raise IQ scores by amounts ranging up to seven or eight points. Investigated psychometrically, these increases are a mix of test effects and increases in the underlying general factor of intellectual ability -- "g." In any case, the increases fade to insignificance within a few years after the intervention. Richard Herrnstein and I reviewed the technical literature on this topic in "The Bell Curve" (1994), and studies since then have told the same story.

There is no reason to believe that raising intelligence significantly and permanently is a current policy option, no matter how much money we are willing to spend. Nor can we look for much help from the Flynn Effect, the rise in IQ scores that has been observed internationally for several decades. Only a portion of that rise represents an increase in g, and recent studies indicate that the rise has stopped in advanced nations.

Some say that the public schools are so awful that there is huge room for improvement in academic performance just by improving education. There are two problems with that position. The first is that the numbers used to indict the public schools are missing a crucial component. For example, in the 2005 round of the National Assessment of Educational Progress (NAEP), 36% of all fourth-graders were below the NAEP's "basic achievement" score in reading. It sounds like a terrible record. But we know from the mathematics of the normal distribution that 36% of fourth-graders also have IQs lower than 95.

What IQ is necessary to give a child a reasonable chance to meet the NAEP's basic achievement score? Remarkably, it appears that no one has tried to answer that question. We only know for sure that if the bar for basic achievement is meaningfully defined, some substantial proportion of students will be unable to meet it no matter how well they are taught. As it happens, the NAEP's definition of basic achievement is said to be on the tough side. That substantial proportion of fourth-graders who cannot reasonably be expected to meet it could well be close to 36%.

The second problem with the argument that education can be vastly improved is the false assumption that educators already know how to educate everyone and that they just need to try harder -- the assumption that prompted No Child Left Behind. We have never known how to educate everyone. The widely held image of a golden age of American education when teachers brooked no nonsense and all the children learned their three Rs is a myth. If we confine the discussion to children in the lower half of the intelligence distribution (education of the gifted is another story), the overall trend of the 20th century was one of slow, hard-won improvement. A detailed review of this evidence, never challenged with data, was also part of "The Bell Curve."

DOJ_NMG_0116626

This is not to say that American public schools cannot be improved. Many of them, especially in large cities, are dreadful. But even the best schools under the best conditions cannot repeal the limits on achievement set by limits on intelligence.

To say that even a perfect education system is not going to make much difference in the performance of children in the lower half of the distribution understandably grates. But the easy retorts do not work. It's no use coming up with the example of a child who was getting Ds in school, met an inspiring teacher, and went on to become an astrophysicist. That is an underachievement story, not the story of someone at the 49th percentile of intelligence. It's no use to cite the differences in test scores between public schools and private ones -- for students in the bottom half of the distribution, the differences are real but modest. It's no use to say that IQ scores can be wrong. I am not talking about scores on specific tests, but about a student's underlying intellectual ability, g, whether or not it has been measured with a test. And it's no use to say that there's no such thing as g.

While concepts such as "emotional intelligence" and "multiple intelligences" have their uses, a century of psychometric evidence has been augmented over the last decade by a growing body of neuroscientific evidence. Like it or not, g exists, is grounded in the architecture and neural functioning of the brain, and is the raw material for academic performance. If you do not have a lot of g when you enter kindergarten, you are never going to have a lot of it. No change in the educational system will change that hard fact.

That says nothing about the quality of the lives that should be open to everyone across the range of ability. I am among the most emphatic of those who think that the importance of IQ in living a good life is vastly overrated. My point is just this: It is true that many social and economic problems are disproportionately found among people with little education, but the culprit for their educational deficit is often low intelligence. Refusing to come to grips with that reality has produced policies that have been ineffectual at best and damaging at worst.

Charles Murray is the W.H. Brady Scholar at the American Enterprise Institute. This is the first in a three-part series, concluding on Thursday.

Mr. Ehrlich's Legacy (WP)

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

ROBERT L. Ehrlich Jr., the only incumbent governor to lose his job in the fall elections, begins a new life as a private citizen this week, having spent two decades holding elective office in Maryland as a state lawmaker, a congressman and, for the past four years, chief executive. As governor he compiled a mixed record, distinguished by a number of significant achievements but diminished by misjudgments and self-inflicted wounds.

A Republican, Mr. Ehrlich was defeated in November by a popular Democrat in a solidly Democratic state in an overwhelmingly Democratic year. In other words, his loss was not exactly a personal repudiation, and even in defeat he remained broadly popular with Maryland voters. His appeal is partly a tribute to his charisma, which is of the regular guy, former football captain variety, and partly the result of his good fortune to govern during a period of robust economic growth.

Mr. Ehrlich was friendly to business interests -- too friendly for some tastes -- but hardly dogmatic in his Republicanism. That was evident in his innovative idea of imposing a broad-based fee on households, the so-called flush tax, to pay for upgrades in sewage plants that spill pollutants into the Chesapeake Bay. It was evident, too, in his admirable record of granting pardons and commutations for convicted criminals. For a Republican in a state dominated by Democrats, he appointed plenty of Democrats to positions in his administration.

Mr. Ehrlich's detractors tend to take some of his successes for granted, such as his forging ahead with the highway to connect Interstates 270 and 95 north of the District or enacting legislation authorizing charter schools in Maryland. But in the case of the highway -- the intercounty connector -- the governor had to overcome decades of inertia and political opposition to revive the project and secure the necessary approvals. And in the case of charter schools, he went ahead despite the opposition of some local school boards. Taken together, the fruits of Mr. Ehrlich's pragmatic determination will be more options for Maryland motorists, parents and students.

Still -- and we say this despite having endorsed him for reelection -- in other ways his is a disappointing legacy, tainted by the sense that he could have accomplished more. He was a poor manager of his relations with the legislature, and that sapped what modest political capital he brought to the job. Always ready to personalize political fights, he reveled in partisan conflict when sober dealmaking and restrained rhetoric would have better served his interests.

In valedictory interviews, Mr. Ehrlich has spoken, at times bitterly, about the toxic partisanship that has supplanted what he remembers with nostalgia as the bipartisan comity of his days as a young lawmaker in Annapolis in the late 1980s.

DOJ_NMG_0116627

Unfortunately, he was no small contributor to the partisan venom. In a state such as Maryland, that was a serious miscalculation, and it did nothing to improve his reelection chances. Neither did some of the battles he picked, including futile ones to expand legal gambling in the state, to freeze out a reporter at the Baltimore Sun whom he disliked and to sell off state-owned land to a well-connected developer.

Mr. Ehrlich says there's little he would do differently if he had it to do over again. That means that he's either too stubborn to admit mistakes publicly or that he didn't learn much from four years in office. We hope it's the former.

Rice Arranges Meeting Between Olmert, Abbas (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, January 16, 2007

LUXOR, Egypt -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday she will convene a three-way meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas in the next few weeks to begin discussions on setting up a Palestinian state.

Miss Rice's announcement, made after talks with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak in the southern city of Luxor, came a day after she pledged deeper U.S. engagement in trying to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"I will soon meet with Prime Minister Olmert and with President Abbas to have discussions about the broad issues on the horizon, so that we can ... try and accelerate the 'road map' and to move to the establishment of a Palestinian state," Miss Rice said at a press conference with Egyptian Foreign Minister Aboul Gheit.

The road map is a U.S.-backed and internationally supported peace plan that would lead in three stages to a Palestinian state.

Miss Rice, who is on a Middle East tour, was vague about the timing of the three-way meeting, but a senior State Department official traveling with her said it would most likely take place within three or four weeks.

"This is not just another meeting," the official told reporters on the flight to Luxor from Tel Aviv. The Israelis and the Palestinians "haven't sat down for six years to talk about issues as ambitious as looking at what would be necessary to get a Palestinian state."

Mr. Olmert told lawmakers of his Kadima party in Jerusalem after meeting with Miss Rice in the morning that the trilateral session "will not be a replacement for the bilateral negotiations" with the Palestinians.

Miss Rice said she wanted to use the momentum created by a Dec. 23 meeting between Mr. Olmert and Mr. Abbas but also said she has "no intention of supplanting what is a developing, fruitful channel bilaterally."

"We will see when American presence is needed," she said.

The secretary, who came to the region to rally support for President Bush's plan to send more than 21,000 additional U.S. troops to Iraq, has gone out of her way to assure her hosts that Washington will be more involved in the Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

"I have heard loud and clear the call for deeper American engagement in these processes," she said after meeting with Mr. Abbas at his headquarters in the West Bank city of Ramallah on Saturday. "You will have my commitment to do precisely that."

Miss Rice said the discussions on a Palestinian state will be held "within the context of the road map." But by jumping to the plan's third phase -- Palestinian statehood -- she is effectively bypassing the second phase, which calls for a provisional state with temporary borders.

The moribund first phase called for a halt to Palestinian violence and to Israeli settlement activity. The violence has continued, and Israel's Housing Ministry said yesterday it will build 44 new residential units in Maale Adumim, the largest settlement in the West Bank.

Israeli officials proposed moving quickly to the second phase in the last days of 2006, but Mr. Abbas made it clear to Miss Rice on Sunday that he would not agree to such an interim arrangement, fearing that any temporary borders might become permanent.

Mr. Gheit said he views the Olmert-Abbasmeeting last month and the proposed session with Miss Rice as part of a "stabilization phase" that would set the stage for true negotiations between the two sides.

He also expressed "support" for Mr. Bush's Iraq strategy, which would increase U.S. troop levels to about 153,500, and called on the Iraqi government to increase its own forces and do more to quell sectarian violence.

"We are supportive of that plan, because we are hopeful that [it will] ensure the stability, unity and cohesion of the Iraqi government," Mr. Gheit said.

"We are hopeful that the plan would lead toward the dismantlement of whatever terror organizations, as well as the military militias, that are tormenting the Iraqi scene."

Miss Rice flew to Saudi Arabia last night and is scheduled to visit Kuwait today.

DOJ_NMG_0116628

Rice Plans A Joint Meeting With Mideast Leaders (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And Greg Myre

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

LUXOR, Egypt, Jan. 15 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced Monday that she would call together Israeli and Palestinian leaders within the next month for what she described as a high-level, yet informal, meeting in hopes of pushing along moribund peace efforts.

The announcement was one tangible development to emerge from her visit to Israel and the Palestinian areas. She held talks with Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel early Monday in Jerusalem, a day after a session with the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, in the West Bank city of Ramallah.

"I will soon meet with Prime Minister Olmert and with President Abbas to have discussions about the broad issues on the horizon, so that we can work on the road map to try and accelerate the road map and to move to the establishment of a Palestinian state," Ms. Rice said, referring to the stalled peace plan for the region.

She announced the three-way meeting during a news conference at this Nile resort after consultations with President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt and his foreign minister.

The offices of the Israeli and Palestinian leaders are only about 10 miles apart, but Ms. Rice met separately with the two men, both of whom have been weakened politically. Mr. Olmert's approval ratings are dropping after what many viewed as the clumsy military offensive during the summer to counter Hezbollah attacks from Lebanon. Mr. Abbas is battling for his political survival after the militant group Hamas swept to power a year ago and took control of the Palestinian legislature.

Ms. Rice was pressed to explain reasons for optimism in resolving an Israeli-Palestinian dispute that has defied both Republican and Democratic administrations — and at a time when the region is roiled with conflict.

"Before we say that this is going to end in frustration, let's be glad that after six years and a long time that the parties want to engage in an informal set of discussions about the future between them," Ms. Rice said.

She announced the Israeli-Palestinian talks as she began three days of meetings with Sunni Arab allies in the region — Egypt, Saudi Arabia and the Persian Gulf states — to rally support for President Bush's new military and diplomatic strategy in Iraq.

While Ms. Rice and her senior aides said there was no quid pro quo, Arab governments are eager to show their populations that some progress is being made in resolving Palestinian grievances before they endorse, let alone offer concrete support, to the new Bush administration effort to salvage victory in Iraq.

Ms. Rice spoke several times of how the two sides could discuss a "political horizon" to energize their peace efforts. The Palestinians have used this phrase on occasion to emphasize the need for some sort of timetable for achieving statehood.

American and Israeli officials declined to define what might be viewed in this distant "political horizon." But the new language appears to be an effort to cast talks on the future course of Israeli-Palestinian relations in a hopeful light even before the two sides fulfill specific, intermediate steps required by the internationally agreed "road map" framework to resolve their disputes.

The road map is a 2003 plan backed by the United Nations, Russia, the United States and the European Union that lays out sequential steps to be carried out by Israelis and Palestinians on the way to reaching a final political settlement. Neither side has met its obligations under the plan, which stalled immediately after it was introduced.

In the first phase, Israel is to freeze settlement activity and the Palestinians are to break up militant groups. On Monday, the Israeli government published plans to build 44 additional homes in Maale Adumim, the largest West Bank settlement, just east of Jerusalem.

But officials for all three governments to be involved in the informal meeting said these broader discussions to energize their peace efforts would not be allowed to replace the international "road map" agreement.

"I am very clear that the one thing that you do not want to do is to try to rush to formal negotiations before things are fully prepared, before people are fully prepared," Ms. Rice said. "But that doesn't mean that there can't be progress as we're moving along."

There was no immediate decision about when or where the three-way meeting would take place, or what the agenda might be.

David Baker, an official in the Israeli prime minister's office, said Mr. Olmert and Ms. Rice on Monday "spoke about ways to generate momentum between Israel and the Palestinians."

Ms. Rice's subsequent meetings here with Mr. Mubarak and his senior aides were held along the Nile, not far from the ancient temple complex of Luxor. The ruins date to the greatest era of the pharaohs, but their delicately carved walls and heroic statues have been reshaped over the centuries by designs of other conquering powers — including empires that likewise have fallen to history, including those of Alexander the Great and Rome.

DOJ_NMG_0116629

Ms. Rice's schedule did not allow time for a visit to the site, though.

Joining Ms. Rice at the news conference here, the Egyptian foreign minister, Ahmed Aboul Gheit, acknowledged that his nation shared a regional interest in stabilizing Iraq, and he expressed support for the new Bush strategy.

"We are supportive of that plan, because we are hopeful that that plan would lead to, ensure, the stability, the unity and the cohesion of the Iraqi government," he said.

Big 3-Way Summit? Or Just Another Meeting? (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal.com, January 16, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's delegation announces en route to Egypt that she has agreed with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to hold a three-way summit next month to try to start hashing out the potential parameters of a Palestinian state.

The U.S. touts the deal, struck over breakfast with Olmert, as a breakthrough–the first meeting of its kind in years, says a Rice aide. But others are skeptical. Israeli officials suggest that the meeting is no done deal. Abbas Sunday rejected the idea of crafting a provisional state en route to a final deal.

"This is not just another meeting," says the Rice aide. The aim, he says, "is to energize two partners moving forward." The Olmert talks went overtime, preventing Rice from touring the Temple of Luxor on her Egypt stopover.

Rice, speaking in Luxor, hailed the agreement for three-way talks as an important sign of US engagement, but said this didn't mean that the US is trying to supplant direct talks between Israel and the Palestinians.

The Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Gheit described the talks as a sort of pre-negotiations–and offered to host them "anywhere in Egypt."

Rice To Preside Over Meeting With Israelis, Palestinians (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel And Dion Nissenbaum

McClatchy, January 16, 2007

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia - Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's announcement Monday that she will convene an unusual three-way meeting with Israeli and Palestinian leaders on an independent Palestinian state marks an abrupt shift in U.S. Middle East tactics.

Whether the different approach will bring different results remains to be seen.

Until now, Rice and President Bush have been reluctant to get involved in high-profile peacemaking. Their focus has been on one thing: stopping the violence in the Palestinian territories as a precondition for peace talks.

Now Rice is essentially turning that approach on its head.

The idea, as described by the secretary of state and her aides, is this: Sketching out more clearly what an eventual Palestinian state might look like will make it easier for embattled Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas to take the tough steps needed to get there.

Rice announced Monday in Luxor, Egypt, that she will preside over the meeting with Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in the coming weeks. She flew to Saudi Arabia later for talks with King Abdullah.

Engineering the three-way get-together was a small achievement. But any real progress faces mammoth obstacles and widespread skepticism.

The London-based Arabic-language newspaper Asharq al-Awsat published a cartoon Monday showing Rice straining to pump air in the tire of a car labeled "new strategy." The tire, labeled "peace process," is leaking air through multiple punctures.

More seriously, both Abbas and Olmert are politically wounded, making it difficult for them to stake out bold positions and make the needed concessions.

Aides to Olmert sought to dampen expectations that the meeting, which isn't even being termed a "summit," would produce a breakthrough.

"We're building the confidence to get to negotiations," Olmert spokeswoman Miri Eisin said after the meeting. "There isn't going to be a meeting and, wow, everything is going to be solved. No, no, no. This isn't about substance yet."

Palestinians were more upbeat. Walid Awad, a spokesman for Abbas' Fatah party, welcomed the news. "A meeting with Secretary Rice and Olmert will give it more value, and it will help move the peace process forward," Awad said.

DOJ_NMG_0116630

Rice's announcement is part of Israel and the United States' effort to bolster Abbas. The moderate Palestinian leader's power and authority were undermined a year ago when the hard-line Islamist group Hamas won control of the Palestinian parliament and gained the right to run the Cabinet.

Since then, Israel, the United States and much of the international community have been shunning the Palestinian government until its Hamas leadership renounces its longstanding vow to destroy Israel.

Abbas and Hamas have tried for months to agree on a new government that would accept the international demands. Until the deadlock is broken, it's unlikely that the Bush administration will be able to make significant progress on any negotiations aimed at ending the decades-long conflict.

Rice's new tack is essentially an admission that the old strategy didn't work.

That strategy focused on the long-dormant, U.S.-backed "road map" for peace. But Israelis and Palestinians never got beyond the first phase. That phase called for Palestinians to halt terror attacks against Israel and establish a unified security force and for Israel to dismantle illegal West Bank settlements and halt the expansion of existing settlements.

Rice said she, Olmert and Abbas will "have discussions about the broad issues on the horizon, so we can work on the road map, to try to accelerate the road map and move to the establishment of a Palestinian state."

Part of the U.S. interest in renewing peace efforts lies in its need to get Arab leaders, whose populations sympathize with the Palestinians, to help the United States stabilize Iraq and contain Iran.

Rice got at least rhetorical support on that score Monday from Egypt.

Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit expressed support for Bush's new Iraq strategy and agreed that Iran should stop meddling in Iraq. "Regarding Iran, Egypt reaffirms that no one should interfere in the internal affairs of Iraq," he said.

Nissenbaum reported from Jerusalem.

Mideast Leaders Agree To Meeting (LAT)

By Paul Richter And Richard Boudreaux

The Los Angeles Times, January 16, 2007

LUXOR, EGYPT — Seeking a fresh start for stalled Mideast peace efforts, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Monday won promises from the leaders of Israel and the Palestinian Authority to meet with her next month for their first discussion of a final peace deal in more than six years.

Rice said Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas had agreed to meet for "informal, broad discussions" about the final moves toward a Palestinian state in hopes of injecting new energy into talks that have been in near-gridlock over initial steps.

"The parties haven't talked about these [final-stage] issues for a long time," Rice said after a meeting with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak in this city on the banks of the Nile. "It seems wise to begin this … to really just sit and talk about the issues."

U.S. officials believe that by shifting the focus to what the outcome would look like, they could galvanize a process that has been bogged down for four years in discussion of difficult preliminary issues.

The initiative from Rice, who spent the last three days meeting with Israeli and Palestinian officials, comes at a time of widespread gloom about the prospects for peace. The Bush administration, besieged with problems elsewhere and running out of time, is desperate to show progress.

The goal is to move the two sides toward such "final-status" issues as the shape of the new Palestinian state, the claims of Palestinian refugees to return to sites now in Israel, and the fate of Jerusalem.

New momentum would help build Palestinian support for the moderate, politically weak Abbas, and would encourage Arab governments to provide crucial help to the United States in its efforts to pacify Iraq and contain Iran's influence.

But in a reminder of the difficulties that negotiators face, on the day that Rice met with Olmert, the Israeli Housing Ministry announced plans to expand Maale Adumim, a large Jewish settlement in the West Bank just east of Jerusalem. The ministry plans to build an additional 44 units.

U.S. officials have protested continued building in the West Bank, but Israeli officials defended the decision. They said it would not expand the perimeter of the settlement, and that it was consistent with an agreement reached with then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell before the U.S.-backed "road map" peace plan called for a building freeze.

Saeb Erekat, a veteran Palestinian negotiator, said: "We condemn this step. This undermines efforts by Dr. Rice to revive the peace process and the road map. Israel must choose between building settlements and peace."

U.S. officials remained vague about the goals of the three-way meeting, but a senior official traveling with Rice said the talks would explore "where do we want to go" and develop "some joint understanding of what's in it for each side."

DOJ_NMG_0116631

Israeli officials said they had agreed to the talks, but emphasized that Olmert would continue with bilateral meetings dealing with the nuts-and-bolts issues of the relationship — such as movement and access, funds, prisoners, and violence. Those often-stalled talks have been complicated by conflicts between Abbas' Fatah movement and the militant group Hamas, which now controls the Palestinian government.

"There is no doubt that we must, at the same time, continue the bilateral meetings between us and them," Olmert said after his morning session with Rice.

His remarks reflect Israel's preference to control the pace and scope of any talks with the Palestinians, rather than submitting to third-party oversight.

He told Israeli lawmakers from his Kadima party that if a Palestinian unity government made up of Hamas and Fatah members agreed to the peace plan's conditions — recognition of Israel, renunciation of violence and acceptance of previous accords — then negotiations on a peace settlement could be possible.

Palestinian officials reacted cautiously.

Ahmed Abdel-Rahman, a political advisor to Abbas, said Abbas was ready "in principle" to attend the three-way summit but was waiting for a date and a venue to be agreed on.

Since 2003, U.S. officials have said they were following the blueprint laid out in the peace initiative, which is backed by the so-called Quartet: the U.S., Russia, the European Union and the United Nations. The plan outlines the steps, such as reining in violence by Palestinian militants and halting Israeli settlement construction, that are intended to lead to peace.

Although the peace plan says the parties should concentrate on the next step before them, slowly building toward the major issues dividing Israelis and Palestinians, the new approach would have them simultaneously concentrating on the early issues and later ones.

Some outside experts have urged the Bush administration to begin talking about these later issues. They were last discussed in 2000 when, at the end of his second term, former President Clinton made a last intense attempt to work out the issues between the two sides.

Another advocate of discussing them is Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, who has been promoting a plan along these lines in recent weeks.

She has argued that if the Palestinians are offered a look at how the talks may turn out, producing a state for them, "it will help them do the difficult things they have to do now for stage one of the road map," said one Israeli official, who declined to be identified.

Rice emphasized that the United States remained committed to the peace plan. U.S. officials said they wanted to hold the meeting in the Middle East but had not yet set a date or a location.

Strengthening Abbas has become a priority for the United States since March, when Hamas took control of the Palestinian parliament after elections in January.

Olmert and Abbas held face-to-face talks last month. Though their agreements were hailed by the Americans as a sign of progress, movement has been slow. Olmert agreed to turn over $100 million of the more than $500 million in tax revenue that Israel has collected for the Palestinians, but has not yet done so, Palestinian officials say. They say promises to ease travel restrictions also have not been carried out.

Fawzi Barhoum, a Hamas spokesman, called Rice's visit part of "an American-Israeli plan to support the Zionist occupation and harm the national interests of the Palestinians.

"Hamas and the majority of the Palestinian people are not expecting anything good from these summits," he said.

"The new settlement [housing] in the West Bank is a new slap to everyone who still believes that the Americans are aiming to help the Palestinians," Barhoum said. "It is very strange for the secretary of State to talk about peace while the occupation is carrying out crimes day and night."

Rice Says Planned Mideast Talks Most Ambitious In Six Years (AFP)

By Sylvie Lanteaume

AFP, January 16, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said that a planned summit with the Israeli and Palestinian leaders could herald the most serious Middle East peace effort in six years.

Rice, on a whistle-stop tour of the region aimed at shoring up the ailing "roadmap" peace plan, announced a three-way summit with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas within a month.

"It has been at least six years since they talked about these issues," Rice said at a news conference in the southern Egyptian city of Luxor held jointly with Foreign Minister Ahmed Abul Gheit.

DOJ_NMG_0116632

Speaking after a meeting with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, Rice said the three-way summit would "focus on what would lead to the establishment of a Palestinian state."

No date has yet been set for the summit but a US official said earlier it was expected to take place in three or fours weeks. Abul Gheit said Egypt was ready to host it.

Olmert welcomed the summit but stressed that any Palestinian government involved in peace talks should recognise Israel's right to exist.

"There have not been many summit level meetings after all between the Palestinians and Israelis in the last years," a senior US official travelling with Rice said.

"They haven't sat for six years to talk about issues as ambitious as looking at what would be necessary to get a Palestinian state," the official said on condition of anonymity.

Week-long Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiations took place in January 2001 in the Egyptian Red Sea resort of Taba under the patronage of former US president Bill Clinton.

The last ditch talks -- held in the dying days of Clinton's tenure and before Israeli elections that saw the hawkish Ariel Sharon take over -- failed to yield a breakthrough but are considered to be the closest negotiations ever got to a comprehensive settlement.

"There are a number of issues, some old, some new, that will have to be resolved if there is to be a Palestinian state," Rice said, stressing the meeting would only be a prelude to the resumption of final settlement negotiations.

"I am very clear about one thing we do not want to do, which is to rush the formal negotiations before things are fully prepared, before people are fully prepared," she said.

Abul Gheit said the Palestinian political crisis needed to be contained and contacts resumed between Israel and the Palestinians, in what he described as "a stabilisation phase".

"Then you will start the second phase whereby everything is discussed in relation to the establishment of this Palestinian state," he added.

Rice's diplomatic offensive suffered a blow earlier Monday when Israel invited bids for new Jewish settlement homes in the West Bank even as she was exploring solutions for the region in a meeting with Olmert in Israel.

"Israel must make a choice between peace and settlements. It cannot have both," Palestinian chief negotiator Saeb Erakat told AFP. "It's defying the international community and undermining Secretary of State Rice's peace efforts."

When asked to comment on the bids, Rice's spokesman Sean McCormack said only that there is "no change in our policy."

In Rice's lightning visit to neighboring Jordan late Sunday, King Abdullah II told Washington's top diplomat that concrete progress needed to be made on the peace blueprint if the region was to be spared fresh bloodshed.

"Without tangible, specific steps to activate the implementation of the roadmap in the near future, the cycle of violence will widen," he warned.

In the West Bank town of Ramallah on Sunday, Abbas refused "any temporary or transitional solutions, including a state with temporary borders, because we do not believe it to be a realistic choice that can be built upon."

Rice has made clear since the outset of her tour that she is bringing no US proposals to jumpstart the moribund peace process, saying: "I think no plan can be 'Made in America.'"

Rice is also seeking to promote US President George W. Bush's new policy to quell surging sectarian violence in Iraq with the deployment of 21,500 more troops.

The plan revealed Wednesday has come under fire in many Arab capitals, even among staunch allies in the Gulf, with critics saying it provides a recipe for more sectarian violence in Iraq that could spread elsewhere in the region.

But Abul Gheit offered Egypt's support for the controversial plan.

"We are supportive of the plan ... We are hopeful that plan will lead to the stabilisation of, unity and cohesion of the Iraqi government," he said.

Later, Rice met with Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah outside Riyadh on the latest leg of her regional tour. Their discussions covered "developments on the regional and international scenes, chiefly the Palestinian issue and the situation in Iraq," the official SPA news agency reported.

Rice met the Saudi monarch in a richly decorated desert tent in Rawdat Khraim outside Riyadh, and conveyed to him greetings from US President George W. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney, according to reporters at the scene.

Abdullah, who remarked that Bush's father, former president George Bush, had visited the place, talked for around 10 minutes with Rice before they moved on to dinner, followed by Saudi dignitaries.

On Tuesday, she will hold a joint news conference with her Saudi counterpart Prince Saud al-Faisal and go on to Kuwait.

Rice Announces 3-Way Talks On Palestinian State (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0116633

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

LUXOR, Egypt, Jan. 15 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced Monday that Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas would meet with her for a three-way informal discussion of issues that must be cleared away to establish a Palestinian state.

No date or location has been set for the gathering, but it would signal deepening involvement by the Bush administration in stalled Israeli-Palestinian peace talks at a time when Rice is seeking greater support from Arab leaders in helping to stabilize Iraq.

Rice made her statement after meeting with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak at this ancient city on the Nile. Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit, addressing reporters with Rice, said Egypt supported President Bush's new plan for Iraq.

Rice said she was going "to try to help the parties come together, to look at how they can move through the road map," referring to the U.S.-backed peace plan that was launched, without success, in 2003. In order to establish a Palestinian state, she said, "there are a number of issues -- some old, some new -- that will ultimately need to be resolved."

The road map set out detailed sequential steps that would lead first to an interim state and then a permanent one. But the Israelis and the Palestinians have never managed to get past the first phase, which among other things required the Palestinian government to crack down on anti-Israeli radical groups and Israel to freeze expansion of Jewish settlements in the Palestinian territories.

The road map envisioned fulfilling the first stage before addressing such vexing issues as the precise borders of a future Palestinian state, the status of Jerusalem, and the claim of Palestinian refugees and their descendants of a right to return to homes in Israel that were abandoned in 1948.

The process was further frozen when the radical Islamic group Hamas, which is devoted to the destruction of Israel, last year won legislative elections in the Palestinian territories. Meanwhile, Israel has not met its obligations. On the same day the meeting was announced, Israel's Housing Ministry solicited bids to build 44 housing units in the West Bank settlement of Maale Adumim, which Olmert has declared would be part of Israel under any final deal.

Now, in a shift for the Bush administration, Rice is calculating that dialogue on the end result -- what she calls the "political horizon" -- might loosen the logjam, aides said.

Bush took office in 2001 critical of the intense engagement in the peace process by his predecessor, Bill Clinton, including sketching the final borders of a Palestinian state. Bush's aides suggested that the collapse of Clinton's involvement led to the outbreak of violence known as the second intifada.

"The parties haven't talked about these issues for a long time. It's been at least six years since they talked about these issues," Rice said, referring to Clinton's efforts. "It seems wise to begin this, as what President Abbas has called an informal discussion, to just really sit and talk about the issues."

Bush is already on record on two key issues. To the fury of Arabs, he gave a letter in 2004 to Ariel Sharon, then Israeli prime minister, saying that Palestinian refugees could not expect to return to Israel and that Israel would be expected to retain major settlement blocks in the West Bank.

Israeli and Palestinian officials confirmed the planned meeting, which officials said is likely to be held next month. The deal came about after Rice shuttled between Jerusalem, the Jordanian capital of Amman and Abbas's West Bank headquarters in Ramallah on Sunday and then secured Olmert's agreement Monday morning for the meeting. After talks with Egyptian officials here, she flew to Riyadh for dinner with Saudi King Abdullah.

Rice hopes to use the prospect of renewed U.S. involvement in the Middle East peace process to help win Arab support for the Iraqi government and a campaign to combat the rising influence of Iran. She is to meet with Persian Gulf foreign ministers in Kuwait City on Tuesday.

Both Olmert and Abbas are politically weakened, making prospects slim for the success of their talks. Olmert's approval rating is 14 percent, and Abbas is struggling against the Hamas-led government.

Fawzi Barhoum, a Hamas spokesman, said the planned meeting was "against our Palestinian unity."

"Up to now we have heard nothing about our rights or about breaking the international siege against our Palestinian government," Barhoum said, referring to the international aid embargo imposed on the Palestinian Authority after Hamas unexpectedly won the parliamentary elections. "We do not support this meeting."

Miri Eisin, a spokeswoman for Olmert, described the talks as part of the "pre-negotiation stage" in which issues of substance would not be discussed. "What we're doing is trying to get to a point where each side trusts the other," she said, adding that some of the discussion with Rice will be aimed at determining a role for the United States, as well as for moderate Arab states such as Jordan, in any future negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians.

DOJ_NMG_0116634

Rice's presence at the meeting would mark the first time in four years that the Bush administration has intervened so directly in the long-running conflict. In June 2003, the road map was launched with great fanfare at a summit in Aqaba, Jordan, attended by Bush, Sharon and Abbas, at the time the Palestinian prime minister.

But the Americans quickly found themselves dragged into a tedious discussion about highway checkpoints, settlement construction and prisoner exchanges. The process collapsed a few months later when Abbas quit in a dispute with then-Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

In their first one-on-one meeting, Olmert last month promised Abbas that he would remove some military checkpoints in the West Bank and release $100 million of the more than $500 million in frozen tax revenue that Israel collects on behalf of the Palestinians. But Olmert, who has pledged to strengthen Abbas's political standing as he confronts Hamas, has yet to release the promised funds. And there has been virtually no progress in reducing the Israeli obstacles to Palestinian movement inside the West Bank.

Rice said that Olmert and Abbas were developing a "fruitful channel bilaterally" for such issues and that it was not her intention to insert "an American presence" at every meeting between the two men.

Rice To Hold Three-way Talks With Mideast Leaders (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, January 16, 2007

LUXOR, Egypt — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Monday she would bring the leaders of Israel and the Palestinian Authority together soon for "informal broader discussions" on creating a Palestinian state.

Making good on a pledge she made last year to intensify her involvement in trying to resolve the Arab-Israeli dispute, Rice announced no date or location for the three-way talks and said they were not meant to substitute for other meetings between Palestinians and Israelis.

"There are a number of issues, some old, some new, that will ultimately have to be resolved if there is to be a Palestinian state," Rice said in the ancient Egyptian city of Luxor, where she stopped Monday for talks with Egyptian leaders after two days in Israel and the Palestinian territories. "The parties have not talked about these issues for a long time (and) it seems wise to begin this informal discussion."

U.S. Arab allies and the bipartisan Iraq Study Group have urged a higher U.S. profile on the Israeli-Palestinian front to strengthen pro-U.S. governments in the region and take away a potent tool of anti-U.S. regimes such as Iran's.

But there was skepticism about how much the Bush administration could accomplish in its final two years in office, given its preoccupation with Iraq and the weakness of Israeli and Palestinian leaders.

Joseph Alpher, an Israeli strategic expert who advised former Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak during unsuccessful Camp David peace talks in 2000, said he would have been more impressed if Rice had stayed in Israel for a third day and brought the two sides together now.

"I think she's much more focused on Iraq and Iran" than the Arab-Israeli dispute, Alpher said.

President Bush hosted a summit in Jordan in 2003 with then Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and then Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas that launched a so-called roadmap to Palestinian statehood. There was little U.S. followup, however, and the Bush administration and Israel refused to deal with then Palestinian President Yasser Arafat. The Israelis confined Arafat to his Ramallah headquarters, accusing him of encouraging anti-Israel terrorism.

In 2005, Israel withdrew unilaterally from Gaza. Israeli troops and settlers remain throughout the West Bank.

Abbas was elected president in 2005 following Arafat's death and lacks his predecessor's authority. He was weakened further when the militant Hamas movement won parliamentary elections a year ago.

Abbas met last month with Ehud Olmert, who succeeded Sharon after he suffered a massive stroke in late 2005. The talks focused on taxes and prisoners, not issues involving statehood: the boundaries of a future Palestinian state, the fate of Jerusalem and the status of millions of Palestinian refugees.

Rice said it was important to deal with day-to-day concerns as well as to create a "political horizon" for statehood that could strengthen Abbas.

Also much less popular than his predecessor, Olmert is blamed by Israelis for lackluster military performance in a 34-day war last summer between Israel and the Iranian-backed Lebanese movement, Hezbollah.

Rice confirmed that the Bush administration wants $86 million to equip and train about 30,000 Palestinian security personnel, including Abbas' 3,700-member presidential guard. The money would go for mess kits, uniforms and communication gear. The funding would require congressional approval.

On Sunday, Abbas reiterated his opposition to establishment of a provisional Palestinian state with temporary borders, a possible interim step before a permanent peace can be negotiated with Israel.

DOJ_NMG_0116635

Abbas also complained that IOlmert has failed to deliver on recent promises to release Palestinian prisoners, cut the number of Israeli checkpoints in the West Bank and hand over $100 million in Palestinian taxes Israel has collected.

Hamas, which rejects Israel's right to exist, has been locked in a stalemate with Abbas over formation of a Cabinet. Recent violence between Hamas and Abbas' Fatah movement has killed nearly 40 people.

Hamas has about 6,000 armed men and has vowed to double the force.

Rice Speaks Softly In Egypt, Avoiding Democracy Push (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

CAIRO, Jan. 15 — In the days before Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met with officials in Egypt, the news media here were filled with stories detailing charges of corruption, cronyism, torture and political repression.

Cellphone videos posted on the Internet showed the police sodomizing a bus driver with a broomstick. Another showed the police hanging a woman by her knees and wrists from a pole for questioning. A company partly owned by a member of the governing party distributed tens of thousands of bags of contaminated blood to hospitals around the country. And just 24 hours before Ms. Rice arrived, the authorities arrested a television reporter on charges of harming national interests by making a film about police torture. The reporter was released, but the authorities kept the tapes.

Ms. Rice, who once lectured Egyptians on the need to respect the rule of law, did not address those domestic concerns. Instead, with Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit by her side, she talked about her appreciation for Egypt's support in the region.

It was clear that the United States — facing chaos in Iraq, rising Iranian influence and the destabilizing Israeli-Palestinian conflict — had decided that stability, not democracy, was its priority, Egyptian political commentators, political aides and human rights advocates said.

But the calculus of stabilization is complicated and fraught in a region as fragile as the Middle East, where interests are defined by religion, geography, geopolitics and political opportunism. And it is not at all clear that the new (old) approach will work. The United States is so unpopular in the region now, many here say, that its support is enough to undermine a government's legitimacy with its public.

"The former pressure was an illusion and the lack of any pressure now will push the crisis between the people and their rulers to the edge," said Ibrahim Eissa, the editor of Al Dustoor, a weekly independent newspaper in Egypt that is critical of the government. That eliminates "all false appearances that the Arab regimes are against the United States in defense of their independent sovereignty and that the United States is supporting democracy when it is in strict alliance with the oppressive regimes," he added.

The dynamics of the region have also changed over the years, and it is no longer clear what the payoff is for Washington in return for overlooking rights violations. It is not certain, for example, that the Egypt of 2007 can deliver the kind of influence it once wielded when it was seen as the political and cultural center of the Arab world. Egypt has failed to calm fighting between Palestinian factions, or to help negotiate the release of Palestinian prisoners in exchange for an Israeli soldier held by Palestinian militants.

At the same time, where Washington was criticized in the past for supporting repressive governments, it risks even sharper criticism now because it made such a public commitment to promoting democracy.

Ms. Rice raised the bar herself when she visited American University here in 2005 and said in a speech: "We are all concerned for the future of Egypt's reforms when peaceful supporters of democracy — men and women — are not free from violence. The day must come when the rule of law replaces emergency decrees — and when the independent judiciary replaces arbitrary justice."

Since then, Egypt's government has piled up a long list of repressive actions, including ordering the police to block people from voting in parliamentary elections; delaying local elections by two years; imprisoning an opposition leader, Ayman Nour, on charges widely seen as politically motivated; battling with judges who have demanded oversight of elections; and imprisoning Talaat el-Sadat, a member of Parliament and the nephew of President Anwar el-Sadat, for a year in a military jail after he criticized the armed forces on television.

Recently, President Hosni Mubarak proposed amending the Constitution in ways that would make it easier for Egypt's toothless opposition parties to field candidates for president. But the proposals would ban truly independent candidates from running, limit the role judges play in monitoring elections and permanently outlaw any party with a religious bent.

Perhaps more to the point, the government has done little if anything to improve a climate across the country that discourages participation in opposition politics, many political analysts said.

DOJ_NMG_0116636

"The government has said to us, 'Stop, we are closing all the windows and doors we had opened,' said Hafez Abu Seada, secretary general of the Egyptian Organization for Human Rights.

Three hours north of Cairo, in Kafr Ghamam, a village of about 40,000 people, a small group of men said they had tried to build a following for the Wafd Party, which would seem to be uncontroversial. It is, after all, a legal opposition party and, like other government-sanctioned parties, has virtually no influence.

To win support from the village, the men tried to persuade the government to cover a pit where raw sewage was dumped and to repair a bridge that ran over the pit. But the men said no one would sign a letter to the government requesting the aid because they were afraid to be identified with an opposition party.

"My father threatened to kick me out of the house if I got involved with this party," said Mustafa Ibrahim Abdel Hamid, a 21-year-old in the village.

What are people afraid of? A knock at the door, many people there said. Last month, after a group of party organizers gathered to discuss who would hold which position in the nascent organization, two men who took over leading posts were visited by state security, they said.

"I got scared and I wanted to resign," said one of the men, Al Sayed Muhammad Ibrahim. "I wanted to resign. I have daughters. I don't want any problems. My daughters, my son, my wife, all asked me to resign."

In Luxor on Monday afternoon, the Egyptian authorities organized a news conference with Ms. Rice and Mr. Aboul Gheit.

"I especially want to thank President Mubarak for receiving me and for spending so much time with me to talk about the issues of common interest here in the Middle East," Ms. Rice said. "Obviously the relationship with Egypt is an important strategic relationship — one that we value greatly."

Bush Ally Hopes To Win Over Islamic World (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, January 16, 2007

Lambasted by some as the US's chief propagandist – or as head of its "Muslim outreach" – Karen Hughes has the unenviable task of improving her country's image in the world.

But as a former senior White House counsellor and close friend of George W. Bush, the under-secretary for public diplomacy wields an influence few others possess in Washington.

Having got off to a bad start in mid-2005 when she was pilloried by the US media for having little knowledge of the Middle East, Ms Hughes has maintained a low domestic profile since then, tending to channel her public message to the media of countries she is visiting.

Although not confined to the Middle East, Ms Hughes acknowledges that her most important task is in the Islamic world.

"The number one problem is that the west is seen as somehow being in conflict with Islam," she said in an interview at her State Department office in Washington.

"When I meet Muslim clerics, they are always surprised to hear that the US is also a country of faith . . . They are also surprised to hear that I represent 7m American Muslims who are as free to worship as any other Americans."

Unlike many of her colleagues, Ms Hughes is happy to give interviews to al-Jazeera and has even visited its headquarters in Qatar. Although she says she disputes some of the TV station's journalistic practices, ignoring it is not an option.

Al-Jazeera is by far the most popular source of television news in the Arabic-speaking world.

"When I came here there was an undeclared policy of not talking to al-Jazeera," she said. "It is not an endorsement to talk to them."

Critics say that Ms Hughes' efforts, which include promoting foreign exchanges of students, journalists, military personnel and clerics, are worse than doing nothing at all, since foreigners are as capable of seeing through spin as Americans.

But Ms Hughes' easy access to Mr Bush – she is among his three or four closest confidantes in Washington, having been his communications director in Texas in the 1990s – enables her to tell the president directly what the rest of the world thinks of the US.

Ms Hughes emphasises two themes she says have most damaged America's image in the eyes of the world – perceptions of the mistreatment of alleged terrorist detainees at Guantánamo Bay and elsewhere, and the view that Washington is not doing enough to promote the creation of a Palestinian state.

She says she has frequently conveyed both observations to the US president. Ms Hughes did not mention the war in Iraq. "The toughest thing I've told the president is that he needed to improve the detainee policy," she said. "I felt it was important it was understood that was how we were being seen in the world."

Her goal of disseminating the US message abroad is constrained by the fact that public diplomacy is a low budget priority. In concert with Dina Habib Powell, her Egypt-born colleague, Ms Hughes recently launched a "public relations coalition" to encourage US companies to promote positive images of the US abroad and to fund projects, such as English-language teaching, which assist it.

DOJ_NMG_0116637

Participants included Accenture, Disney, Mastercard, Citigroup and Burson-Marsteller. Part of the object is to get many more foreigners, in particular from the Islamic world, to visit the US.

That means she often beats a trail to the Department of Homeland Security, which has been heavily criticised by private sector groups for its strict post-9/11 visa policy and for the offhand way that many immigration officials treat arriving foreigners.

As a result, many companies and universities now hold conferences outside the US to spare foreign participants the potential humiliation. Likewise, the number of foreign students studying in the US fell after the September 11 terrorist attacks.

"I understand – no customs officer wants to be the one to let a hijacker into the country," she said. "But it is also important to be welcoming. Our most important tool of public diplomacy in the last 50 years has been the [foreign] exchange programme."

Somalia's Transitional Government Shuts 3 Radio Stations (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Jan. 15 — Somalia's transitional government shut three of the country's biggest radio stations on Monday, accusing them of broadcasting incendiary propaganda.

Then, in a show of force, hundreds of government soldiers stormed into the streets of Mogadishu, the capital, as tanks from neighboring Ethiopia, which has been providing military support to the government, chugged through downtown, drawing crowds of onlookers and the occasional rock.

Somalia's government, which declared a state of emergency on Saturday, seems intent on using its newfound powers to crush the seeds of a growing insurgency. On Sunday night, gunmen attacked an Ethiopian convoy, setting off an intense hourlong firefight in one of Mogadishu's ramshackle neighborhoods.

Ethiopian troops last month helped rout Somalia's Islamist forces, which had controlled much of the country, but the Islamists have vowed to regroup underground.

As the days pass, the insurgent attacks grow more frequent and more lethal. The government has not released casualty figures, but Mogadishu residents said more than a dozen people had been killed in gun battles over the past week.

Executives of the radio stations, however, said that was no excuse to force them off the air.

"All we have done is voice different opinions," said Mohammed Amiin, deputy chairman of Shabelle Media Network. "We never expected this to happen."

Abdirahman Dinari, spokesman for the transitional government, accused Shabelle, along with the other stations, of making false reports to stir up the people against the government.

"They said our soldiers were looting the markets and harassing people, which was totally untrue," he said. "They are using the media to undermine the government. They have been doing this for months."

Security officials have summoned station owners to a meeting on Tuesday, and Mr. Dinari said there was a possibility that the stations would soon be back on the air, after they were given a warning.

In a land of rival clans, there is a clan dimension to all this. The owners of both Shabelle and Horn Afrik, another station that was closed down, are members of the Ayr, a branch of the powerful Hawiye clan, and many government officials blame the Ayr for the rising level of violence.

"The Ayr clan is part of the problem," Mr. Dinari said.

The Ayr was closely associated with the Islamist movement, with several top Islamist leaders from the Ayr. Many residents say they suspect that Ayr members are the backbone of the insurgency, though Ayr elders vehemently deny this.

So far, the most intense fighting — and the most intense crackdowns — has been in Ayr neighborhoods, and it is beginning to fuel Ayr resentment.

"We are being harassed simply because of our clan," said Abdi Ali Halaneh, an Ayr businessman who sells building materials in north Mogadishu.

Mr. Halaneh said that many of his friends now wanted to leave Somalia.

"There may be no place for us here," he said.

The government also closed the Mogadishu office of Al Jazeera and a Somali religious radio station, which some people feared could play into the hands of the Islamists.

In the Bakara market, where even the tiniest tin kiosk has a radio, shoppers and shopkeepers moaned and hissed when the music and news turned to static. Many shook their radios.

DOJ_NMG_0116638

Some derided the government and accused it of being hypocritical because, just a few months ago, government officials had criticized the Islamists for not allowing radio stations to play Western music. Now the government was going further by closing the same stations.

"Totalitarian rule has arrived," said Asho Elmi Ahmed, a shopper. "And it didn't take long."

Somalia's Window Of Opportunity (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 16, 2007

Having ousted the Islamic regime, Ethiopia must act quickly to broker peace talks in the war-torn land.

ETHIOPIA HAS DONE its fellow Africans a good turn by ousting the increasingly radical Islamic Courts Union regime in Somalia. And thankfully, Addis Ababa has the wisdom to admit what everyone knows: that the Ethiopians have about 3.3 nanoseconds to get their troops out of xenophobic Somalia before they will be even more hated than the thugs they ousted. Now the question is: Who can bring order to this anarchic land?

The only move as foolish as sending U.S. troops to occupy Somalia would be for the international community to do nothing except watch it slip back into chaos. Somalia, you will recall, is a poster child for failed states. It is a place so violent that the Taliban imitators of the Islamic Courts, with their brutal "justice," were still seen as vastly preferable to the khat-fueled warlord gunplay that made a misery of life in Mogadishu for more than a decade previous. The irony is that the perpetually feuding Somali clans were finally able to unite behind the Islamists — even though most disliked their ideology — because they were so desperate for stability. The challenge is to provide order without a radical Islamist face.

Now that Ethiopia has done the heavy military lifting, U.S. forces are trying to bomb the Al Qaeda leaders who have followed Osama bin Laden's orders to regroup in Somalia. But unilateral fly-by interventions from 30,000 feet are not going to do the job alone.

If the Somalis want to get rid of the Ethiopians — and they do — they must be helped to hammer out a political settlement. The Ethiopians can deliver their allies — the transitional national government — to the bargaining table. The Arab League can bring the moderate clan leaders who backed the Islamists, and without whom no peace can hold in Mogadishu. The African Union can help deliver other factions. The U.N. and permanent Security Council members must use their diplomatic muscle to link reconstruction to a cessation of violence. African Union troops, with or without blue helmets, should then follow. Somalis have had enough strife for a lifetime.

Castro Reportedly In Grave Condition (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 16, 2007

MADRID, Spain -- Ailing Cuban leader Fidel Castro is in "very grave" condition after three failed operations and complications from an intestinal infection, a Spanish newspaper said Tuesday.

The newspaper El Pais cited two unnamed sources from the Gregorio Maranon hospital in the Spanish capital of Madrid. The facility employs surgeon Jose Luis Garcia Sabrido, who flew to Cuba in December to treat the 80-year-old Castro.

In a report published on its Web site, El Pais said: "A grave infection in the large intestine, at least three failed operations and various complications have left the Cuban dictator, Fidel Castro, laid up with a very grave prognosis."

Cuba has released little information on Castro's condition since he temporarily ceded power in July to his brother, Defense Minister Raul Castro, until he could recover from emergency intestinal surgery, prompting much speculation and rumor in the country and around the world.

El Pais' report, which could not immediately be confirmed, was a rare detailed description from a major media outlet about Castro's condition.

The U.S. government had speculated that Castro could suffer from cancer _ a supposition denied by Sabrido. Some U.S. doctors believed Castro was suffering from diverticular disease, which can cause bleeding in the lower intestine, especially in people over 60. In severe cases, emergency surgery may be required.

That idea was supported by El Pais, which reported that its sources said Castro had suffered a bout of the disease.

"In the summer, the Cuban leader bled abundantly in the intestine," El Pais reported. "This adversity led him to the operating table, according to the medical sources. His condition, moreover, was aggravated because the infection spread and caused peritonitis, the inflammation of the membrane that covers the digestive organs."

El Pais said that in December, when Garcia Sabrido visited, Castro had an abdominal wound that was leaking more than a pint of fluids a day, causing "'a severe loss of nutrients." The Cuban leader was being fed intravenously, the report said.

A statement attributed to Castro was released on New Year's Eve saying his recovery was "far from being a lost battle."

Cuban officials told visiting U.S. lawmakers last month that Castro does not have cancer or a terminal illness and will eventually return to public life, although it was not clear whether he would return to the same kind of absolute control as before.

DOJ_NMG_0116639

Venezuela Ends Oil Negotiations (DJ/AP)

Dow Jones/Associated Press, January 16, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela, Jan. 15 — Venezuela will end negotiations with foreign oil companies over how it will take a majority control of their operations along the Orinoco River, the country's oil minister, Rafael Ramírez, said on Monday.

Mr. Ramírez said that "there's no possible negotiation" with the foreign companies, but he said that private companies would be allowed to own minority stakes in lucrative oil projects in the Orinoco River basin.

"Every case will be different," Mr. Ramírez said. "We will have an effective majority control."

The government negotiated last year with the companies about its plans to take majority control of oil operations in the country, but no agreements were reached.

In a speech to Congress last week, President Hugo Chávez said the private companies — BP, Exxon Mobil, Chevron, ConocoPhillips, Total and Statoil — would be given the option to stay on as minority partners.

Mr. Chávez also announced plans to nationalize companies within Venezuela's telecommunications, electricity and natural gas industries.

The government has already taken majority ownership of Venezuelan oil-producing operations outside the Orinoco region through joint ventures controlled by the state oil company.

With New Urgency, U.S. And South Korea Seek Free-Trade Deal (NYT)

By Choe Sang-hun

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

SEOUL, South Korea, Jan. 15 — United States and South Korean officials resumed free-trade talks Monday amid growing skepticism that the two governments can narrow their differences before President Bush's authority to move an agreement quickly through Congress expires.

Success would give Washington its biggest trade deal since the North American Free Trade Agreement a decade ago, while expanding market opportunities for exporters in both countries.

About 2,000 police officers in riot gear stood guard around the Shilla Hotel, where the negotiators met for a sixth round of talks since June. Thousands more were dispatched to parks in the city center, where farmers and factory workers planned large protest rallies. Nine lawmakers opposing the talks began a hunger strike in a tent pitched outside the hotel.

"We have made important progress to date, but we still have a lot of work to do," said Wendy Cutler, an assistant trade representative and the lead negotiator for the United States. She said she was optimistic that a deal could be concluded before President Bush's special trade negotiation powers, known as "fast track" authority, lapsed at the end of June.

Under the fast-track mechanism, President Bush can submit an agreement deal to Congress for a straight yes-or-no vote. An agreement would have to go to Washington by the end of March because lawmakers would need to review it before a vote. After President Bush's authority expires, however, the Congress — now controlled by the Democrats — can place amendments on the trade deal, crippling its chances of speedy ratification.

Thomas Kim, executive director of the Korea Policy Institute, said: "I don't think it's going to happen. There are too many major concessions that would have to be made on both sides, and too many unknown political variables."

The talks stalled over United States requests for greater access for American cars, rice and drugs, and over South Korea's demand that Washington change antidumping rules applied to South Korean steel, cars, computer chips and textiles. Seoul also wants goods produced by South Korean factories in North Korea included in the agreement.

"The more important question probably isn't whether they'll make the deadline," Mr. Kim said, but whether a trade agreement will be reached at all, "and if not, how long will it be before the two governments try again."

If signed, a free-trade deal would add a measure of success to Mr. Bush's embattled presidency, said Usha Haley, professor of international business and director of the Global Business Center at the University of New Haven. A deal with South Korea is central to Washington's strategy of stemming the loss of economic influence in Asia to China.

For South Korea, a deal would mean bigger access for its products in its second-largest export market after China. By exposing the South Korean economy to United States rivals, it would also serve as a catalyst for economic reforms, South Korean officials said.

South Korea is the United States' seventh-largest trading partner, with bilateral trade topping $74 billion a year. An accord could lift American exports to South Korea by $19 billion, while Korean exporters could expect an additional $10 billion in sales in the United States, according to the United States International Trade Commission.

"President Roh Moo-hyun is now entering his final year in office and wants an agreement and its economic benefits to become the legacy of his otherwise disappointing presidency," Ms. Haley said. "Growth is now a very scarce commodity, so the government needs to secure future growth opportunities for the economy. But his unpopularity is also weighing on the trade deal."

DOJ_NMG_0116640

Farmers, labor unions and movie workers, all important segments of support for Mr. Roh's liberal Uri Party, have protested the prospect of a trade deal.

Beijing Vows To Rein In Trade Surplus (WSJ)

By Andrew Batson

The Wall Street Journal, January 16, 2007

BEIJING -- China's leadership is increasingly determined to bring its much-criticized trade surplus under control, as a consensus appears to be building that the imbalance is an economic problem for the country and not simply a political irritant.

Minister of Commerce Bo Xilai, in his first public remarks since China last week reported that its trade surplus surged 74% to a record $177.47 billion in 2006, said reducing that excess will be a top priority for 2007. According to the official Xinhua news agency, he said yesterday that an excessively large surplus isn't beneficial to the economy and noted that China's disputes with the European Union and U.S., its two largest trading partners, have been increasing.

Mr. Bo's new pledge to trim the surplus, delivered at a conference of commerce officials from around the country, is particularly unusual coming from the head of an institution that has long existed mainly to promote the nation's exports. It highlights how the record trade gaps of the past two years have helped shift official thinking from a growth-at-all-costs mentality to one that recognizes growing imbalances.

Because China sells so many more goods to foreigners than it buys from them, the earnings from those export sales have been piling up in its domestic banking system. Economists worry that all that excess cash is pushing up inflation, now running at 1.9%, and contributing to froth in the stock markets and real estate. At the same time, the trade gap is straining relationships with the EU and U.S., which are demanding China allow its tightly controlled currency, the yuan, or renminbi, to strengthen more quickly and take other measures to open its markets to foreign goods and services.

"It won't be easy to solve this problem quickly, but it's important that the issue has been raised," said Zuo Xiaolei, chief economist at China Galaxy Securities in Beijing. "The appreciation of the renminbi by itself won't resolve the issue. And structural economic reform is a slow process."

Because gains in the currency make Chinese goods more expensive, the exporters' lobby has been a powerful voice against exchange-rate moves. In a sign that resistance may be weakening, a research institute run by Mr. Bo's ministry issued a report yesterday finding that gains so far in the yuan have had no obvious impact on China's imports, exports or foreign investment. The report said the currency, which strengthened 2.6% in 2005 and 3.4% in 2006, could gain as much as 5% annually without disrupting trade.

Separately, the Ministry of Commerce said foreign direct investment into China -- money spent to acquire or build up businesses in the country -- dropped 4.1% to $69.47 billion in 2006, from $72.41 billion in 2005. Investment inflows in 2005 were boosted by an unusual number of big-ticket deals as foreign institutions bought into China's state-owned banks.

Spanish Premier Admits Mistakes With Separatists Tied To Bombing (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

MADRID, Jan. 15 (AP) — Spain's prime minister apologized Monday for putting his faith in a Basque peace effort that collapsed in a deadly car bombing in December, but he insisted he was right to have sought negotiations with separatist militants and appealed to his political foes for unity at a time of crisis.

In a speech to Parliament that was often interrupted by jeers and grumbles from conservative lawmakers, Prime Minister José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero did not announce any concrete new measures against the armed separatist group ETA.

He said that police pressure and court trials had continued during the now ended cease-fire with the group, and that such measures would remain. "I want to recognize the clear mistake I made before all Spanish citizens," he said.

Mr. Zapatero, the Socialist leader, who faces a general election in early 2008, appeared at a session of Parliament dedicated exclusively to the government's policy toward ETA in the wake of the bombing, the group's first fatal one since May 2003.

He defended his record and sought to muster support for his government, though the conservatives have called him naïve for seeking to negotiate with what they called a terrorist group that could not be trusted.

The bombing on Dec. 30 destroyed a parking garage outside of Madrid's airport and killed two young Ecuadorean men.

In Spain, Bitter Rift Over Fighting Terror (CSM)

DOJ_NMG_0116641

By Geoff Pingree And Lisa Abend

The Christian Science Monitor, January 16, 2007

from the January 16, 2007 edition - http://www.csmonitor.com/2007/0116/p07s02-woeu.html In Spain, bitter rift over fighting terror For the first time since the 1970s, a major political party decided not to join in an anti-ETA march.

By Geoff Pingree and Lisa Abend | Correspondents of The Christian Science Monitor

MADRID

Two weeks after a bombing by the Basque separatist group ETA brought a fledgling peace process to an abrupt halt, the government of Prime Minister José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero is confronting political strife as vicious as any seen in Spain's three decades of democracy.

Saturday, an estimated 200,000 Spaniards took to the streets to protest ETA's bombing of a multi-tiered parking lot at Madrid's Barajas airport, which killed two workers. But at this anti-ETA demonstration, unlike all others since Spain became a democracy in the 1970s, a major party refused to participate.

The center-right Popular Party denounced the protest as a government attempt to garner support for its strategy of negotiation with the group, sparking criticisms that parties are politicizing the fight against terrorism for their own benefit ahead of upcoming local and national elections.

"It's every Spaniard's civic duty to support the victims and show we're united against violence and terrorism," said Martín Moreno, a computer consultant marching Saturday with his 9-year-old daughter, Sara. "It seems that opposing the government is more important to the Popular Party than fighting ETA, and that's terrible, just terrible. With that attitude, we all lose."

When three hooded ETA members appeared on a videotape aired on Basque television in March to declare a "permanent" cease-fire, many Spaniards harbored cautious optimism that 40 years of separatist violence might finally end. ETA had not launched a fatal attack in over three years, and this, along with the government's own assessment of the group's intentions, led Mr. Zapatero to request and receive permission from Parliament to begin discussions. Although negotiations appeared to have stalled in recent months, the prime minister himself declared on Dec. 29 that within a year the ETA situation would be "better than where we are today."

The following day's bombing, ETA's most materially destructive yet, dashed those hopes.

"I wasn't surprised by the attack," says Professor María Sagrario Morán, author of several books on ETA. "Things were happening, like kale borroka [low-level street violence and vandalism] and the discovery of the weapons cache in France, that also preceded the rupture of [ETA's previous] 1998 cease-fire. You could tell that things weren't going well."

Nevertheless, not all believe the Barajas bombing was meant to demolish the peace process. "In the past, ETA has always given advance notice that it was breaking a truce," says Ignacio Sánchez-Cuenca, an ETA expert at Madrid's Complutense University. "They didn't give warning that the cease-fire was over this time because they didn't think the bomb would kill anyone. So they didn't think of it as a rupture."

ETA did place several warning calls about the car bomb, and police attempted to evacuate the area before it exploded, but two Ecuadorean men sleeping in their cars failed to hear the announcements and were killed.

Batasuna, ETA's political wing, told the press that it had not expected the attack, leading many to wonder about a rift between ETA and Batasuna.

"I'm sure that there's disagreement between them," says Professor Sánchez-Cuenca. "Batasuna has nothing to gain by the attack. And in these kinds of processes, there are always hard-liners and moderates."

But both ETA and Batasuna seemed to agree that the peace process was still in effect. At a press conference on the day of the bombing, Batasuna spokesperson Arnaldo Otegi blamed the government for "not making a single gesture in nine months of truce," and insisted that the peace process remained intact. On Jan. 9, ETA claimed responsibility for the bombing and criticized the government for not upholding its end of the bargain, but insisted that "the permanent cease-fire ... is still in effect."

Within the Socialist Party, there was no such agreement. Zapatero's initial statement that the peace process was "suspended" contrasted sharply with Interior Minister Alfred Pérez Rubalcaba's declarations that it was definitively over, and that "ETA had lost all credibility."

No rift has been as bitter as that between the Socialist government and the Popular Party (PP). Although the PP lent grudging support to Zapatero's investigation into the seriousness of ETA's declared intentions to abandon violence, the party has since renewed its relentless attack on the government for negotiating with ETA.

The PP declined to participate in Saturday's march, says PP senator Ignacio Cosido, because, "It was clear to us that the intent of the demonstration was to support the government in its strategy to negotiate. "There is profound division in Spain over how to end ETA's terrorism," he adds. "Zapatero's plan is to negotiate. The PP's plan is to destroy terrorism." Minister of Labor Jesús Caldera blamed the PP for politicizing the event. "The PP has made a strategic decision to use its absence as a political weapon," he told press at the march. With local elections in May, and national ones in 2008, the stakes are high for Zapatero, who has planted his political fortunes squarely on achieving peace.

DOJ_NMG_0116642

Eoin O'Broin, spokesman for Sinn Fein, says he saw something similar in the early stages of Northern Ireland's peace process. "It's a high-risk game for Zapatero. If he messes this one up, he'll lose the election. But lately his calculations have been made more on electoral projections than on a strategy for peace. [Former British Prime Minister] John Major made exactly the same mistake."

In a speech before parliament on Monday, Zapatero called for a unified antiterrorism policy and admitted that he had made a "clear mistake" in being too optimistic last month when he said that the peace process would be farther along in a year. Popular Party leader Mariano Rajoy, however, was not satisfied with that position. He said Zapatero had lost all credibility, and demanded that the prime minister admit his mistake in negotiating with ETA.

At the march, Celeste Echegaray summed up the feeling of many participants. "This is a time to come together, not a time for political bickering," said the law student. "The parties have politicized the demonstration, but in the fight against terrorism, here in the street, people are united."

France Proposed Merger With Britain In '56 (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 15 (AP) — France's government proposed forming a union with Britain in 1956, and also discussed joining the Commonwealth, the British Broadcasting Corporation reported Monday.

Citing documents in the National Archives, the BBC said Prime Minister Guy Mollet of France had discussed the possibility of a merger between the countries with Sir Anthony Eden, the British prime minister at the time.

That discussion took place on Sept. 10, 1956, when Mr. Mollet visited London, but Sir Anthony rejected the idea, the BBC said.

At the time, France was smarting over the loss of the Suez Canal and Egyptian support for separatists in Algeria and was trying very hard to get British assistance in responding, the BBC reported.

The discussions came to nothing. The BBC said the documents were declassified about 20 years ago but had not been noticed until now.

This Queen Of France Had A Very Short Reign (WT/AP)

By Raphael G. Satter

The Washington Times, January 16, 2007

LONDON -- Could France have been better off as subjects of Queen Elizabeth II?

The revelation that the French government proposed a union of Britain and France in 1956 -- even offering to accept the sovereignty of the British queen -- has scholars on both sides of the channel astonished -- and a lot of Frenchmen spluttering with disbelief and indignation.

Newly discovered documents in Britain's National Archives reveal that 50 years ago Prime Minister Guy Mollet discussed the possibility of a merger between the two nations with British Prime Minister Anthony Eden.

"I completely fell off my seat," says Richard Vinen, a specialist in French history at King's College in London. "It's such a bizarre thing to propose."

Mr. Eden rejected the idea of a union but liked the French proposal to join the British Commonwealth. One document says that Mr. Mollet "had not thought there need be difficulty over France accepting the headship of Her Majesty [Queen Elizabeth II]."

While the two nations -- separated by a narrow body of water called by different names in France and England -- have been bitter rivals since the Middle Ages, the two EU partners now trade tourists rather than prisoners. What animosity remains has been relegated to world culinary name-calling, with the French and British reduced to calling each other froggies and "rosbifs" (or roast beefs).

Proposals for Anglo-French unity are not necessarily new. English royalty claimed the title of "King (or Queen) of France" into the 19th century. Winston Churchill, in a last-ditch attempt to keep France on the side of the Allies in World War II, appealed for a full union of the two nations in June 1940.

The proposals all shared an element of desperation, says Kevin Ruane, a historian at Canterbury Christ Church University in England.

Threatened by an Arab revolt in French Algeria and hobbled by instability at home, France was desperate to maintain its independence from both the Soviet Union and the United States, Mr. Ruane says. Mr. Eden, who fought in France during World War I and spoke the language well enough that the French were not notably offended by his accent, might have seemed particularly approachable to Mr. Mollet, a onetime English teacher.

DOJ_NMG_0116643

But even under all those circumstances, the suggestion that France accept the British queen strikes historians as bizarre, and Frenchmen as unspeakable.

Mr. Mollet was a socialist, and Frenchmen usually regard the execution of King Louis XVI as one of the crowning achievements of the French Revolution. They would have been unlikely to welcome a foreign monarch with open arms, though not necessarily the guillotine.

The Mollet memoirs show nothing about the proposal, says Francois Lafon, a history professor at La Sorbonne in Paris and a Mollet biographer.

A year after Britain turned down France's proposal, the French joined the Common Market, the European Union's predecessor. By the time Britain tried to join seven years later, the tables had turned.

Charles de Gaulle had brought a new order to French political life and improved its international standing, even as Britain's economy stagnated. Mr. de Gaulle vetoed Britain's attempts to join the European Economic Community -- twice.

The documents, which have been declassified for more than 20 years, were found by a British Broadcasting Corp. producer late last month.

Beyond PR At BP (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 16, 2007

Don't expect much sympathy for John Browne now that his tenure as chief executive of BP has been cut short by 17 months. Sorrow certainly wasn't the sentiment expressed by investors, who have sent BP shares up more than 2.2% in London and nearly 5% on Wall Street since Friday's announcement that Lord Browne would leave the oil giant this summer rather than at the end of next year.

Big Oil is one of the most vilified industries among politicians and the press, many of whom would have you believe that running these companies involves little more than deciding how badly to "gouge" gasoline consumers after hurricanes. Lord Browne is paying the price for BP's struggles in recent years, most notably an explosion at a Texas refinery that killed 15 workers, oil spills in Alaska and alleged market manipulation in the U.S.

Then again, Lord Browne didn't help himself by trying to persuade the world that British Petroleum wasn't in the oil biz. In 2000, BP launched its $200 million "Beyond Petroleum" campaign to reshape its image, running ads that shifted emphasis from oil and gasoline to more politically correct fuels. The company is spending $8 billion over 10 years to boost its alternative fuels business.

Yet at about the same time BP embarked on a plan to cut costs at all of its refineries by 25%, according to investigators with the U.S. Chemical Safety Board who are looking into the 2005 Texas City refinery accident. That cost-cutting, the CSB says, undermined routine maintenance that might have prevented the blast. BP has denied the link between cost-cutting and safety, including oil leaks from corroded pipelines. But a report due to be released today by former Secretary of State James Baker is expected to echo these concerns.

Contrast BP's record with that of ExxonMobil, which has been demonized even more than other oil majors for refusing to toe the environmentalist line on climate change. Yet over the past decade it has largely avoided the kinds of troubles that have socked BP. Companies must be free to reduce expenses, and it's impossible to say whether BP shifted too much money from maintenance to PR. What is clear is that BP's shareholders don't like receiving news of an oil spill any more than environmentalists do. An oil company's first obligation is to its oil business.

Car Washes And Genocide (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, January 16, 2007

Genocide may be the worst of crimes, but historically it has also brought out the best in some people.

The Raoul Wallenbergs of 2007 speckle America and the globe. And I don't just mean the aid workers — 13 of whom have been murdered for their efforts in Darfur since last May — but also those ordinary Americans who have united in a grass-roots campaign to try to stop genocide half a world away in Sudan.

President Bush and other world leaders have dropped the ball on Darfur. But that vacuum of moral leadership has been filled by university students, churches and temples, celebrities like George Clooney and Mia Farrow, and armies of schoolchildren.

Their arsenal — green armbands, phone calls to the White House, bake sales to raise money — all seem pallid. How can a "Save Darfur" lawn sign in Peoria intimidate government-backed raiders in Sudan or Chad who throw babies into bonfires?

DOJ_NMG_0116644

Yet, finally, we see evidence that those armbands and lawn signs can make a difference. Last week, the Save Darfur Coalition — the grass-roots organization that puts out those lawn signs — sponsored a trip by Bill Richardson, the New Mexico governor, to Khartoum to negotiate with President Omar al-Bashir.

Sure, it's a little weird when a private advocacy group undertakes freelance diplomacy. But if George W. Bush, Tony Blair, Jacques Chirac and Hu Jintao twiddle their thumbs, then more power to the freelancers.

Mr. Richardson worked out a joint statement in which Sudan agreed to a 60-day cease-fire to allow peace talks to resume, provided the Darfur rebels go along as well. Mr. Bashir also agreed that Sudan would prosecute rapes and stop painting its military aircraft to look as if they belong to the U.N.

The first thing to say is that Mr. Bashir has repeatedly broken his pledges in the past. Count me deeply skeptical about whether it will be any different this time. Mudawi Ibrahim Adam, a Sudanese human rights campaigner, told me he thinks that President Bashir simply made cosmetic concessions in hopes of winning the chairmanship of the African Union later this month.

That said, there may be a path forward here. While U.N. peacekeepers and a no-fly zone are needed, ultimately the only way to end the slaughter is to achieve a peace agreement in Darfur. And that seems more feasible today than it was a week ago.

Most striking, it's clear that the cease-fire was a consequence of all those armbands and lawn signs. Mr. Richardson told me that Mr. Bashir was motivated by concern at the way the killings have been spotlighted by Darfur activists. Mr. Richardson quoted him as saying, "These guys have caused me a lot of damage."

Ken Bacon, who heads Refugees International and accompanied Mr. Richardson, said of President Bashir: "One thing that was very clear was that the Save Darfur movement has gotten under his skin. The vilification of the Khartoum regime in columns and editorials and ads is making a difference."

So cherish this historical moment. The long record of genocide is one overwhelmingly of acquiescence, but this time ordinary citizens are trying to write a different ending.

There are the students at Santa Clara University in California who replicated a mini refugee camp and slept in it. They limited themselves to 1,000 calories a day — because that's what Darfuris are limited to — and donated the savings to aid groups.

Or there's Jason Miller, a California M.D./Ph.D student who in his spare time has become the foremost expert on how investments by foreign companies underwrite the Sudanese genocide. Or Beth Reilly, a stay-at-home mom in Indiana who works on Darfur a little bit every day. Or the legions of schoolkids who organize car washes, and ask for donations in lieu of birthday presents, in hopes of saving other children halfway around the globe.

Sudan's leaders are used to bullying everyone. Jan Pronk, who was the United Nations envoy in Sudan until Khartoum ejected him, reports in his Weblog that a U.N. official recently went to the authorities in Darfur to complain about human rights violations. A Sudanese official retorted: "You better shut up. We can always expel you, as we have proven."

But finally President Bashir is confronting people whom he can't bully. Let's have no illusions about how much more pressure will be necessary to stop the slaughter, but let's also celebrate this moment. Mr. Bashir has blinked, showing that it just may be possible to fight genocide with moral courage and lawn signs.

DOJ_NMG_0116645

Block, Jonathan

From:	Block, Jonathan
Sent:	Tuesday, January 16, 2007 8:09 AM
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Sunday, January 14, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070114.pdf; dojclips070114.doc

This morning's Department of Justice News Clips is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNews' express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, JANUARY 14, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Military Is Expanding Its Intelligence Role In U.S. (NYT) 2
Officials: Pentagon Probed Finances (WP) 5
Pentagon, CIA Check U.S. Suspects' Bank Records (AP) 6
Pentagon Conducting Probes In U.S. (LAT) 7
Deletions In Army Manual Raise Wiretapping Concerns (NYT) 8
Views On Detainee Representation Draw Fire (WP/AP) 9
The Imperial Presidency (WP) 10
Attack On U.S. Embassy Revives Greek Fear Of Terrorism (NYT) 11
Tunisia Says Suspects In Gun Battle Had Blueprints Of Embassies (NYT) 13

Homeland Response:

Stockpiling Waste (WP) 14
Incendiary (WP) 14

War News:

Opposition To Iraq Plan Leaves Bush Isolated (WP) 16
An Uphill Push For Public Opinion On Iraq (NYT) 18
Democrats Feel Free To Defy Bush On Iraq (LAT) 19
Choices Dwindle If Iraq War Plan Fails (AP) 21
Bush Stands By Iraq Invasion (LAT) 22
A GOP Lawmaker Grapples With Troop Escalation (WP) 23
'Surge' Plan Put At Risk By Politics, General Says (WT) 24
Maliki Aides Warm Slowly To Bush's Latest Iraq Policy (NYT/AP) 25
Among Troops And Families, Mixed Reaction To American Expansion In Iraq (NYT) 26
The Goal: Admitting Failure, Without Being A Failure (NYT) 28
Picking Up The Pieces (NYT) 29
Congressional Pushback (WP) 30
Bush's Idle Threat (LAT) 31
He's In The Bunker Now (NYT) 32
Stumbling Around The World (NYT) 34
In Baghdad, A Test Of The Petraeus Principles (WP) 35
Bush's Hail-Mary Pass (WP) 36
The Big Gambit In Iraq (WP) 37
Trapped By Hubris, Again (WP) 38
The Best We Can Hope For (NYT) 40
We're Fighting Not To Lose (WP) 42
A Skeptic's Case For The Surge (WP) 44
The Mess We Left Behind (WP) 45
UN-weary, US Opts For Unilateral Moves Against Iran (AFP) 46
Rice: U.S. Aims To Curb Iran Aggression (AP) 47
Rice Says U.S. Will Defend Its Interest In The Persian Gulf (MCT) 48
Detained Iranians Had Ties To Extremists (WT/AP) 49
Iran Demands Release Of Citizens (BBC) 50
Gunboat Diplomacy: The Watch On The Gulf (NYT) 50
Admiral's Diplomatic Skills Could Prove Crucial (WP) 51
On Iraq, U.S. Turns To Onetime Dissenters (WP) 52
US Military May Join Iraq Against Militia Leaders (BOS) 56
U.S. And Iraqi Forces In The Western Desert Look Toward The Horizon (LAT) 57
Kurdish Brigade Trains To Deploy In Baghdad (AP) 58
Plan Would Add Kurds To Civil War Mix (LAT) 60
War Costs Are Hitting Historic Proportions (LAT) 61
Clinton Expresses Doubt That Iraqis Will Keep Promises (AP) 63
Iraq's Talabani To Visit Damascus (BBC) 64
Losing Iraq, One Truckload At A Time (NYT) 64
Afghan Rebel Chief Sends Fighters To Their Deaths (NYT/AP) 66
Clinton Meets With Karzai, U.S. Troops (WP/AP) 67
Military Slams Bureaucrats Over Afghanistan (WT) 67

Corporate Scandals:

Backlash Against Hardball Tactics (CHIT) 68

Criminal Law:
Attorney General Agrees To Take Duke Case (NYT) 70
At State Level, Official Promises Careful Review Of Duke Case (WP) 71
2 Officers Suspended; Report Was Not Fully Reviewed (NYT) 72
'GANGLAND' G-MAN SENT RAT INTO TRAP (NYPOST) 72
Probe Has Long, Sharp Edge (SPREP) 73
Even At 96, Alleged Mobster Is Not Beyond Reach Of Law (LAT) 74

Civil Rights:
The End Of An Era For Marion County Schools (OCALASB) . 76
Reports: Reviews Rarely Find Fault With Police Use Of Force (AP) 77
Cleveland Police Always Justify Using Force (CLPD) 78
'Shots Fired' (COLDISP) 79
Revival Of Akaka Bill Planned (HSB) 82

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
DEA Reportedly Wants 3 New Offices Along Border (SAEN) .. 83
Once Its Star, Agent Assails ATF (AZREP) 83

Immigration:
Christian Groups Torn Over Illegals (WT) 87

Congress-Administration:
Newly In The Minority, G.O.P. Shows Signs Of Division On Iraq And Domestic Policies (NYT) 88
House GOP Shows Its Fractiousness In The Minority (WP) .. 90
Conservatives See Validation In Fight Over "Pork" (WT) 91
A Discordant Chorus Questions Visions For A Bush Library At Southern Methodist (NYT) 92
The House That Jack Built (NYT) 94
The American Way Of Equality (NYT) 95
A Living Wage We Can Live With (LAT) 97

Other News:
Bush's Proposal For Iraq Adds To '08 Intrigue (NYT) 98
Defiant McCain Back As Maverick (CHIT) 100
Bush's Legacy Vs. The 2008 Election (NYT) 101
"Bad Behavior"? (NOVAK) 103
Obama's Charm Lost On America's Black Activists (LONT) 104
Romney Retreats On Gun Control (BOS) 105
Tancredo In Iowa To Test '08 Bid (DENP) 107
Left Out In '08 (LAT) 107
A Preview Of Arnold's Second Act (LAT) 108
Gov. Attuned To Waning Of Party Loyalty (LAT) 109
Gov. Riley Says No To VP Talk (AP) 111
McCain-Clinton '08? Obama-Hagel? That's The Ticket (WP) 112
Nothing Perks Up A President Like Death (LAT) 113
Rice Backs Mideast Moderates, But Offers No Plan (NYT) .. 115
Rice Begins Push In The Middle East (WP) 116
Rice Aims To Restart Mideast Peace Bid (AP) 118
Rice Set For Key Mid-East Meeting (BBC) 119
Iranian President Visits Venezuela To Strengthen Ties (NYT) 119
Iran And Venezuela Plan Anti-U.S. Fund (AP) 121
Presidents Of Iran, Venezuela Plan $2-billion Project Fund (LAT) 122
Iran And Venezuela Back Oil Cuts (BBC) 123
Argentina Pursues Iran In '94 Blast As Neighbors Court Ahmadinejad (WP) 123
Officials: Abbas Envoys, Hamas Head Meet (AP) 125
Amnesty For Fatah Fighters A Mideast Hurdle (LAT) 126
Kin And Rights Groups Search For Pakistan's Missing (NYT) 127
Southeast Asians Agree To Trade Zone (NYT) 129
Chirac's Party Chooses Nominee Amid Intrigue (WP) 130
Sarkozy To Get Party Nomination At Paris Congress (AFP) .. 132
Spanish Prime Minister Takes Political Heat After Airport Attack By Basque Group (NYT) 133
Climate Trumps Terror In Europe (WT) 134
200 Die In Darfur During Week Of Intertribal Battles (WP/AP) 135
Brazil Gambles On Monitoring Of Amazon Loggers (NYT) .. 136
Don't Ban Your Instincts, Ban Ki-moon (WP) 138

TERRORISM NEWS:

Military Is Expanding Its Intelligence Role In U.S. (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau, Mark Mazzetti
The New York Times, January 14, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0116648

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13 — The Pentagon has been using a little-known power to obtain banking and credit records of hundreds of Americans and others suspected of terrorism or espionage inside the United States, part of an aggressive expansion by the military into domestic intelligence gathering.

The C.I.A. has also been issuing what are known as national security letters to gain access to financial records from American companies, though it has done so only rarely, intelligence officials say.

Banks, credit card companies and other financial institutions receiving the letters usually have turned over documents voluntarily, allowing investigators to examine the financial assets and transactions of American military personnel and civilians, officials say.

The F.B.I., the lead agency on domestic counterterrorism and espionage, has issued thousands of national security letters since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, provoking criticism and court challenges from civil liberties advocates who see them as unjustified intrusions into Americans' private lives.

But it was not previously known, even to some senior counterterrorism officials, that the Pentagon and the Central Intelligence Agency have been using their own "noncompulsory" versions of the letters. Congress has rejected several attempts by the two agencies since 2001 for authority to issue mandatory letters, in part because of concerns about the dangers of expanding their role in domestic spying.

The military and the C.I.A. have long been restricted in their domestic intelligence operations, and both are barred from conducting traditional domestic law enforcement work. The C.I.A.'s role within the United States has been largely limited to recruiting people to spy on foreign countries.

Carl Kropf, a spokesman for the director of national intelligence, said intelligence agencies like the C.I.A. used the letters on only a "limited basis."

Pentagon officials defended the letters as valuable tools and said they were part of a broader strategy since the Sept. 11 attacks to use more aggressive intelligence-gathering tactics — a priority of former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. The letters "provide tremendous leads to follow and often with which to corroborate other evidence in the context of counterespionage and counterterrorism," said Maj. Patrick Ryder, a Pentagon spokesman.

Government lawyers say the legal authority for the Pentagon and the C.I.A. to use national security letters in gathering domestic records dates back nearly three decades and, by their reading, was strengthened by the antiterrorism law known as the USA Patriot Act.

Pentagon officials said they used the letters to follow up on a variety of intelligence tips or leads. While they would not provide details about specific cases, military intelligence officials with knowledge of them said the military had issued the letters to collect financial records regarding a government contractor with unexplained wealth, for example, and a chaplain at Guantánamo Bay erroneously suspected of aiding prisoners at the facility.

Usually, the financial documents collected through the letters do not establish any links to espionage or terrorism and have seldom led to criminal charges, military officials say. Instead, the letters often help eliminate suspects.

"We may find out this person has unexplained wealth for reasons that have nothing to do with being a spy, in which case we're out of it," said Thomas A. Gandy, a senior Army counterintelligence official.

But even when the initial suspicions are unproven, the documents have intelligence value, military officials say. In the next year, they plan to incorporate the records into a database at the Counterintelligence Field Activity office at the Pentagon to track possible threats against the military, Pentagon officials said. Like others interviewed, they would speak only on the condition of anonymity.

Military intelligence officers have sent letters in up to 500 investigations over the last five years, two officials estimated. The number of letters is likely to be well into the thousands, the officials said, because a single case often generates letters to multiple financial institutions. For its part, the C.I.A. issues a handful of national security letters each year, agency officials said. Congressional officials said members of the House and Senate Intelligence Committees had been briefed on the use of the letters by the military and the C.I.A.

Some national security experts and civil liberties advocates are troubled by the C.I.A. and military taking on domestic intelligence activities, particularly in light of recent disclosures that the Counterintelligence Field Activity office had maintained files on Iraq war protesters in the United States in violation of the military's own guidelines. Some experts say the Pentagon has adopted an overly expansive view of its domestic role under the guise of "force protection," or efforts to guard military installations.

DOJ_NMG_0116649

"There's a strong tradition of not using our military for domestic law enforcement," said Elizabeth Rindskopf Parker, a former general counsel at both the National Security Agency and the C.I.A. who is the dean at the McGeorge School of Law at the University of the Pacific. "They're moving into territory where historically they have not been authorized or presumed to be operating."

Similarly, John Radsan, an assistant general counsel at the C.I.A. from 2002 to 2004 and now a law professor at William Mitchell College of Law in St. Paul, said, "The C.I.A. is not supposed to have any law enforcement powers, or internal security functions, so if they've been issuing their own national security letters, they better be able to explain how they don't cross the line."

The Pentagon's expanded intelligence-gathering role, in particular, has created occasional conflicts with other federal agencies. Pentagon efforts to post American military officers at embassies overseas to gather intelligence for counterterrorism operations or future war plans has rankled some State Department and C.I.A. officials, who see the military teams as duplicating and potentially interfering with the intelligence agency.

In the United States, the Federal Bureau of Investigation has complained about military officials dealing directly with local police — rather than through the bureau — for assistance in responding to possible terrorist threats against a military base. F.B.I. officials say the threats have often turned out to be uncorroborated and, at times, have stirred needless anxiety.

The military's frequent use of national security letters has sometimes caused concerns from the businesses receiving them, a counterterrorism official said. Lawyers at financial institutions, which routinely provide records to the F.B.I. in law enforcement investigations, have contacted bureau officials to say they were confused by the scope of the military's requests and whether they were obligated to turn the records over, the official said.

Companies are not eager to turn over sensitive financial data about customers to the government, the official said, "so the more this is done, and the more poorly it's done, the more pushback there is for the F.B.I."

The bureau has frequently relied on the letters in recent years to gather telephone and Internet logs, financial information and other records in terrorism investigations, serving more than 9,000 letters in 2005, according to a Justice Department tally. As an investigative tool, the letters present relatively few hurdles; they can be authorized by supervisors rather than a court. Passage of the Patriot Act in October 2001 lowered the standard for issuing the letters, requiring only that the documents sought be "relevant" to an investigation and allowing records requests for more peripheral figures, not just targets of an inquiry.

Some Democrats have accused the F.B.I. of using the letters for fishing expeditions, and the American Civil Liberties Union won court challenges in two cases, one for library records in Connecticut and the other for Internet records in Manhattan. Concerned about possible abuses, Congress imposed new safeguards in extending the Patriot Act last year, in part by making clear that recipients of national security letters could contact a lawyer and seek court review. Congress also directed the Justice Department inspector general to study the F.B.I.'s use of the letters, a review that is continuing.

Unlike the F.B.I., the military and the C.I.A. do not have wide-ranging authority to seek records on Americans in intelligence investigations. But the expanded use of national security letters has allowed the Pentagon and the intelligence agency to collect records on their own. Sometimes, military or C.I.A. officials work with the F.B.I. to seek records, as occurred with an American translator who had worked for the military in Iraq and was suspected of having ties to insurgents.

After the Sept. 11 attacks, Mr. Rumsfeld directed military lawyers and intelligence officials to examine their legal authorities to collect intelligence both inside the United States and abroad. They concluded that the Pentagon had "way more" legal tools than it had been using, a senior Defense Department official said.

Military officials say the Right to Financial Privacy Act of 1978, which establishes procedures for government access to sensitive banking data, first authorized them to issue national security letters. The military had used the letters sporadically for years, officials say, but the pace accelerated in late 2001, when lawyers and intelligence officials concluded that the Patriot Act strengthened their ability to use the letters to seek financial records on a voluntary basis and to issue mandatory letters to obtain credit ratings, the officials said.

The Patriot Act does not specifically mention military intelligence or C.I.A. officials in connection with the national security letters.

DOJ_NMG_0116650

Some F.B.I. officials said they were surprised by the Pentagon's interpretation of the law when military officials first informed them of it. "It was a very broad reading of the law," a former counterterrorism official said.

While the letters typically have been used to trace the financial transactions of military personnel, they also have been used to investigate civilian contractors and people with no military ties who may pose a threat to the military, officials said. Military officials say they regard the letters as one of the least intrusive means to gather evidence. When a full investigation is opened, one official said, it has now become "standard practice" to issue such letters.

One prominent case in which letters were used to obtain financial records, according to two military officials, was that of a Muslim chaplain at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, who was suspected in 2003 of aiding terror suspects imprisoned at the facility. The espionage case against the chaplain, James J. Yee, soon collapsed.

Eugene Fidell, a defense lawyer for the former chaplain and a military law expert, said he was unaware that military investigators may have used national security letters to obtain financial information about Mr. Yee, nor was he aware that the military had ever claimed the authority to issue the letters.

Mr. Fidell said he found the practice "disturbing," in part because the military does not have the same checks and balances when it comes to Americans' civil rights as does the F.B.I. "Where is the accountability?" he asked. "That's the evil of it — it doesn't leave fingerprints."

Even when a case is closed, military officials said they generally maintain the records for years because they may be relevant to future intelligence inquiries. Officials at the Pentagon's counterintelligence unit say they plan to incorporate those records into a database, called Portico, on intelligence leads. The financial documents will not be widely disseminated, but limited to investigators, an intelligence official said.

"You don't want to destroy something only to find out that the same guy comes up in another report and you don't know that he was investigated before," the official said.

The Counterintelligence Field Activity office, created in 2002 to better coordinate the military's efforts to combat foreign intelligence services, has drawn criticism for some domestic intelligence activities.

The agency houses an antiterrorist database of intelligence tips and threat reports, known as Talon, which had been collecting information on antiwar planning meetings at churches, libraries and other locations. The Defense Department has since tightened its procedures for what kind of information is allowed into the Talon database, and the counterintelligence office also purged more than 250 incident reports from the database that officials determined should never have been included because they centered on lawful political protests by people opposed to the war in Iraq.

Officials: Pentagon Probed Finances (WP)

By Karen DeYoung

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

The Defense Department has used a long-standing authority to acquire the personal financial records of American citizens in military-related criminal and other investigations as part of an expansion of the Pentagon's gathering of counterterrorism intelligence at home, officials said yesterday.

"There are certainly types of information and transactions that are valuable to the department when conducting counterintelligence and counterespionage investigations," said Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman.

Whitman emphasized that although the FBI can compel banks, credit card companies and other private institutions to produce such records by issuing a National Security Letter, the military is authorized only to request that the institutions turn them over.

The CIA has long had similar "noncompulsory" authority, although intelligence officials said that such requests are rare and tend to relate to espionage investigations of the CIA's own officials. The authority was used during the investigation of Aldrich Ames, the CIA operations officer who was convicted in 1994 of spying for the Russians.

The military's expanded use of the records authority was first reported yesterday on the Web site of the New York Times, which said that military officials had made more than 500 such requests since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. Quoting unnamed military intelligence officials, the Times said that the actual number of letters was probably well into the thousands, because a single investigation often resulted in requests to multiple institutions.

DOJ_NMG_0116651

By law, the FBI is charged with conducting investigations of U.S. citizens and with counterterrorism activities in this country.

Domestic intelligence-gathering by the CIA and the military is sharply restricted. In the military's case, such activities have generally involved investigations of direct threats to military installations and personnel in the United States, as well as inquiries into possible criminal activities by uniformed or civilian Defense Department employees.

Under then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, the Pentagon expanded its collection of intelligence within the borders of the United States -- a development that stirred concern among members of Congress and prompted stern criticism and lawsuits from civil liberties advocates.

These efforts are overseen by the Pentagon's Counterintelligence Field Activity agency, or CIFA, which was established in September 2002 by then-Deputy Secretary of Defense Paul D. Wolfowitz.

CIFA is charged with coordinating policy and overseeing the domestic counterintelligence activities of Pentagon agencies and the armed forces. The agency's size and budget are classified, but congressional sources have said that the agency spent more than $1 billion through October. One counterintelligence official recently estimated that CIFA has 400 full-time employees and 800 to 900 contractors working for it.

In written responses to questions from the Senate Armed Services Committee during his confirmation hearing last month, Rumsfeld's replacement, Robert M. Gates, pledged to look "in greater detail" at CIFA's activities.

The agency was criticized in December 2005 after it was revealed that a database managed by CIFA, called TALON, contained unverified, raw threat information about people who were peacefully protesting the Iraq war at defense facilities, including recruiting offices. In August, CIFA Director David A. Burtt II and his top deputy, Joseph Hefferon, resigned in the wake of a scandal involving CIFA contracts that went to MZM Inc., a company run by Mitchell J. Wade. Wade pleaded guilty last February to conspiring to bribe then-Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif).

In his confirmation responses, Gates said that an internal Pentagon review of the program "found procedural weaknesses" and that "steps are underway to correct these deficiencies."

Whitman, in a discussion of the financial-records requests, said that only four U.S. military entities are authorized to ask for them -- the U.S. Army Counterintelligence Center, the Criminal Investigation Service of the Army and of the Navy, and the Air Force Office of Special Investigations.

All of these entities are overseen by CIFA.

Whitman declined to discuss individual cases in which the authority had been used, although one U.S. official who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue said it was utilized in an investigation of a contractor working at the Guantanamo Bay naval facility who appeared to have unexplained income.

In comments attributed to unnamed military intelligence officials, the Times said that the financial records of Capt. James Yee -- a Muslim chaplain at the U.S. military detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, who was charged with aiding prisoners there -- had also been obtained. Espionage charges against Yee were eventually dropped by the government.

The CIA declined yesterday to comment on its use of the financial-records authority. An intelligence official said that the CIA usually asks the FBI to obtain financial records involving U.S. citizens in terrorism investigations because the bureau has the authority to compel cooperation. "There have been a handful of instances, in very rare circumstances over the years, that the CIA has used" its authority to request such records on its own, the official said.

Pentagon, CIA Check U.S. Suspects' Bank Records (AP)

AP, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Pentagon and to a lesser extent the CIA have been using a little-known power to look at the banking and credit records of hundreds of Americans and others suspected of terrorism or espionage within the United States, according to a published report.

"It is our understanding that the intelligence community agencies make such requests on a limited basis," said Carl Kropf, a spokesman for the Office of the National Intelligence Director, which oversees all 16 spy agencies in the government.

DOJ_NMG_0116652

The so-called national security letters permit the executive branch to seek records about people in terror and spy investigations without a judge's approval or grand jury subpoena. Government lawyers maintain the legal authority for such tactics is years old and was strengthened by the Patriot Act.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation, the lead agency on domestic counterterrorism and espionage, has issued thousands of national security letters since the attacks of September 11, 2001.

That has prompted criticism and court challenges from civil liberties advocates who claim they invade the privacy of Americans' lives, even though banks and other financial institutions typically turn over the financial records voluntarily.

The New York Times, in an article posted Saturday on the Internet, said the Pentagon and CIA also have been using their own versions of the letters to aid investigative work.

Congressional officials said members of the House and Senate Intelligence Committees had been briefed on the Pentagon and CIA's use of the letters, the newspaper said.

The vast majority of national security letters are issued by the FBI, but in very rare circumstances they have been used by the CIA before and after 9/11, said a U.S. intelligence official who spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity.

The CIA has used these non-compulsory letters in espionage investigations and other circumstances, the official said.

"It is very uncommon for the agency to be issuing these letters," the official said. "The agency has the authority to do so, and it is absolutely lawful."

A government official, also speaking on condition of anonymity, said one example of a case in which the letters were used was the 1994 case of CIA officer Aldrich Ames, who eventually was found to have been selling secrets to the Soviet Union.

Neither official commented about the extent of possible use by Defense Department agencies, but Pentagon officials defended their use to the Times, saying they were part of a post-September 11 strategy to use more aggressive intelligence-gathering techniques.

Kropf's remarks to the AP did not address specifics of the Times story, which said military intelligence officers have sent letters in up to 500 investigations.

"There's a strong tradition of not using our military for domestic law enforcement," said Elizabeth Rindskopf Parker, a former general counsel at both the National Security Agency and the CIA and dean at the McGeorge School of Law at the University of the Pacific told the Times. "They're moving into territory where historically they have not been authorized or presumed to be operating."

Pentagon Conducting Probes In U.S. (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes, Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

I

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon has been requesting information from financial institutions and telecommunications companies to investigate people within the United States suspected of spying or terrorism, the Defense Department said Saturday.

The little-known practice could raise questions on Capitol Hill about the military conducting domestic investigations, which are traditionally reserved for the FBI. The American Civil Liberties Union said Saturday that the Pentagon activity raised concerns.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said the Defense Department was not spying on random American citizens and was primarily requesting the information in counterintelligence investigations, such as when department officials or contractors were accused of spying.

The Pentagon practice was first reported Saturday evening by the New York Times, which said officials estimated that the Pentagon had asked for the information in as many as 500 investigations over five years.

The CIA has gathered similar information from U.S. companies and other sources, but has done so less frequently, according to U.S. intelligence officials contacted by the Los Angeles Times.

DOJ_NMG_0116653

The information requests are similar to "national security letters" issued by the FBI, which compel institutions to turn over records. The FBI's use of such letters has been controversial, and the American Civil Liberties Union has challenged their use in at least two cases. Congress put new restrictions on the use of the letters when it reauthorized the Patriot Act last year.

Defense officials said Saturday they had used similar letters to request information from financial institutions, telephone companies and credit agencies.

Although they are used in terrorism investigations, Whitman said, the requests have mainly been used in cases of suspected espionage. If a Defense Department employee or contractor appeared to have excessive amounts of money, for example, the Pentagon might use the letters as part of a preliminary counterintelligence probe.

Whitman emphasized that the Pentagon letters requested — but did not compel — banks, phone companies and others to turn over customer information. Although the Pentagon can ask a court to compel the release of those records, Whitman said he was not aware of any requests for court orders.

The Pentagon has been using the letters at least since 2003.

One U.S. intelligence official said the CIA had been "involved in such letters on a very limited basis over the years."

The CIA practice predates the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, officials said. The Justice Department is often involved in the CIA and Pentagon investigations, officials said.

ACLU Associate Legal Director Ann Beeson said the Pentagon and CIA actions raised "serious concerns," in part because of recent disclosures of expanded government spying, such as the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping. She said she wanted to know more about the cases that prompted the information requests.

"There are serious concerns about whether the Pentagon is improperly intruding into the privacy of Americans and improperly conducting domestic intelligence without any legal authorization…. The Pentagon has its own regulations which severely limit their ability to conduct domestic intelligence, and those regulations come out of a strong tradition in this country of opposing military involvement in domestic affairs," Beeson said.

Although the CIA and Pentagon have extensive overseas intelligence-gathering operations, both are tightly restricted from domestic spying. But the Pentagon does perform limited law enforcement work, and each military service has a criminal investigation agency.

Lawmakers have resisted giving the Defense Department the right to force financial companies to reveal information about clients. But the Pentagon has the authority to request information under the Right to Financial Privacy Act, the Fair Credit Reporting Act and the National Security Act, said Army Lt. Col. Brian Maka, a Pentagon spokesman. Whitman said the authority also was derived from the Patriot Act.

Maka said the ability to request transaction information was "invaluable" to the Defense Department "in conducting counterintelligence and counterterrorism investigations."

Defense Department agencies authorized to issue the letters are all criminal or counterintelligence agencies, including the Army Criminal Investigation Command, Naval Criminal Investigative Service, Air Force Office of Special Investigations and Army counterintelligence.

The New York Times reported that one such letter was used in the case of a Muslim chaplain suspected of aiding prisoners accused of terrorism being held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The chaplain was cleared of any espionage charges.

New Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates is expected to take a less aggressive stance toward intelligence operations than predecessor Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Deletions In Army Manual Raise Wiretapping Concerns (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau, Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13 — Deep into an updated Army manual, the deletion of 10 words has left some national security experts wondering whether government lawyers are again asserting the executive branch's right to wiretap Americans without a court warrant.

DOJ_NMG_0116654

The manual, described by the Army as a “major revision” to intelligence-gathering guidelines, addresses policies and procedures for wiretapping Americans, among other issues.

The original guidelines, from 1984, said the Army could seek to wiretap people inside the United States on an emergency basis by going to the secret court set up by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, known as FISA, or by obtaining certification from the attorney general “issued under the authority of section 102(a) of the Act.”

That last phrase is missing from the latest manual, which says simply that the Army can seek emergency wiretapping authority pursuant to an order issued by the FISA court “or upon attorney general authorization.” It makes no mention of the attorney general doing so under FISA.

Bush administration officials said that the wording change was insignificant, adding that the Army would follow FISA requirements if it sought to wiretap an American.

But the manual’s language worries some national security experts. “The administration does not get to make up its own rules,” said Steven Aftergood, who runs a project on government secrecy for the Federation of American Scientists.

The Army guidelines were finalized in November 2005, and Mr. Aftergood’s group recently obtained a copy under the Freedom of Information Act. He said he was struck by the omission, particularly because of the recent debate over the National Security Agency’s domestic surveillance program. President Bush has asserted that he can authorize eavesdropping without court warrants on the international communications of Americans suspected of having ties to Al Qaeda.

Like several other national security experts, Mr. Aftergood said the revised guidelines could suggest that Army lawyers had adopted the legal claim that the executive branch had authority outside the courts to conduct wiretaps.

But Thomas A. Gandy, a senior Army counterintelligence official who helped develop the guidelines, said the new wording did not suggest a policy change. The guidelines were intended to give Army intelligence personnel more explicit and, in some cases, more restrictive guidance than the 1984 regulations, partly to help them respond to new threats like computer hackers.

“This is all about doing right and following the rules and protecting the civil liberties of folks,” Mr. Gandy said. “It seeks to keep people out of trouble.”

Views On Detainee Representation Draw Fire (WP/AP)

By John Heilprin

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

The Pentagon yesterday disavowed a senior official's remarks suggesting companies boycott law firms that represent detainees at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Charles "Cully" Stimson, the deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, said in a radio interview last week that companies might want to consider taking their business to firms that do not represent suspected terrorists.

Legal experts and advocacy groups viewed Stimson's remarks as an attempt to intimidate law firms that provide legal help to all people, even unpopular defendants.

A Pentagon spokesman, Lt. Col. Brian Maka, said Stimson was not speaking for the Bush administration.

Stimson's comments "do not represent the views of the Department of Defense or the thinking of its leadership," Maka said.

Stimson's "shameful and irresponsible" remarks deserve condemnation, said Neal R. Sonnett, a Miami lawyer and president of the American Judicature Society, a nonpartisan group of judges, lawyers and others.

Sonnett said in a statement that Stimson had made a "blatant attempt to intimidate lawyers and their firms who are rendering important public service in upholding the rule of law and our democratic ideals."

Stimson on Thursday told Federal News Radio, a local commercial station that covers the government, that he found it "shocking" that lawyers at many of the nation's top firms represent detainees.

Stimson listed the names of more than a dozen major firms he suggested should be boycotted.

"And I think, quite honestly, when corporate CEOs see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line back in 2001, those CEOs are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms," Stimson said.

DOJ_NMG_0116655

Asked who might be paying the law firms to represent Guantanamo detainees, Stimson hinted at wrongdoing for which some explaining should be done.

"It's not clear, is it? Some will maintain that they're doing it out of the goodness of their heart -- that they're doing it pro bono, and I suspect they are," he said. "Others are receiving monies from who knows where and I'd be curious to have them explain that."

Stimson also described Guantanamo as "certainly, probably the most transparent and open location in the world" because of visits from more than 2,000 journalists since it opened five years ago. However, journalists are not allowed to talk to detainees on those visits, their photos are censored, and their access to the base has at times been cut off.

He discounted international outrage over the detention center as "small little protests around the world" that were "drummed up by Amnesty International" and inflated in importance by liberal news media outlets.

FBI agents have documented more than two dozen incidents of possible mistreatment at Guantanamo. In one, a detainee's head was wrapped in duct tape because he chanted the Koran; in a second, a detainee pulled out his hair after hours in a sweltering room.

In a December court ruling, a federal judge in Washington decried the plight of "some of the unfortunate petitioners who have been detained for many years in the terrible conditions at Guantanamo Bay."

The judge criticized a system in which dozens have been held without charges and cut off from the world for lack of English or knowledge about the law, leaving them no choice but to turn to a fellow prisoner with connections for legal help.

Since the detention center opened, the U.S. military has transferred or released about 380 detainees. Nearly 400 remain.

The Imperial Presidency (WP)

By Dahlia Lithwick

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

Why is the United States poised to try Jose Padilla as a dangerous terrorist, long after it has become clear that he was just the wrong Muslim in the wrong airport on the wrong day?

Why is Washington still holding hundreds of detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, long after years of interrogation and abuse have established that few, if any, of them are the deadly terrorists they have been held out to be?

And why is President Bush still issuing grandiose and provocative signing statements, the latest of which claims that the executive branch has the power to open mail when it sees fit?

I once believed that the common thread here is presidential blindness -- an extreme executive-branch myopia that leads the chief executive to believe that these futile measures are integral to combating terrorism; a self-delusion that precludes Bush and his advisers from recognizing that Padilla is a chump and Guantanamo Bay is just a holding pen for a jumble of innocent or half-guilty wretches.

But it has finally become clear that the goal of these efforts isn't to win the war against terrorism; indeed, nothing about Padilla, Guantanamo Bay or signing statements moves the country an inch closer to eradicating terrorism. The object is a larger one: expanding executive power, for its own sake.

Two scrupulously reported pieces on the Padilla case are illuminating. On Jan. 3, Nina Totenberg of National Public Radio interviewed Mark Corallo, who was spokesman for then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft, about the behind-the-scenes decision-making in the Padilla case -- a case that has lolled through the federal courts for years. According to Totenberg, when the Supreme Court sent Padilla's case back to the lower federal courts on technical grounds in 2004, the Bush administration's sole concern was preserving its constitutional claim that it could hold citizens as enemy combatants. "Justice Department officials warned that if the case went back to the Supreme Court, the administration would almost certainly lose," she reports, which is why Padilla was dragged back to the lower courts. Her sources further confirmed that "key players in the Defense Department and Vice President Cheney's office insisted that the power to detain Americans as enemy combatants had to be preserved."

Deborah Sontag's story on Padilla in the Jan. 4 New York Times makes the same point: He was moved from military custody to criminal court only as "a legal maneuver that kept the issue of his detention without charges out of the Supreme Court."

DOJ_NMG_0116656

This is why the White House moved Padilla from the brig to the high court to the federal courts and back to a Florida trial court: They were shopping for the best place to enshrine the right to detain him indefinitely. Their claims about Padilla's dirty bomb, known to be false, were a means of advancing their claims about executive power. When confronted with the possibility of losing on those claims, they pulled him back to the criminal courts so as not to lose powers they'd already won.

This need to preserve new legal ground also explains the continued operation of the detention center at Guantanamo Bay. Last week marked the fifth anniversary of the camp that -- as then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld claimed in 2002 -- houses only "the worst of the worst." Now that more than half of them have been released (the best of the worst?) and even though only about 80 will ever see trials, the camp remains open. Why? Civil rights groups worldwide and even close U.S. allies such as Denmark, England and Germany clamor for its closure.

But Guantanamo Bay stays open for the same reason that Padilla stays on trial. Having claimed the right to label enemy combatants and detain them indefinitely without charges, the Bush administration cannot retreat from that position without ceding ground. The president is as much a prisoner of Guantanamo Bay as the detainees are. Having gone nose to nose with Congress over his authority to craft stripped-down courts, guaranteed to produce guilty verdicts, Bush cannot call off the trials. The endgame in the war against terrorism isn't holding the line against terrorists. It's holding the line on hard-fought claims to limitless presidential authority.

Enter these signing statements. The most recent of the all-but-meaningless postscripts Bush tacks onto legislation gives him the power to "authorize a search of mail in an emergency" to "protect human life and safety" and for "foreign intelligence collection." There is some debate about whether the president has that power already, but it misses the point. The purpose of these signing statements is to plant a flag on the moon -- one more way for the chief executive to stake out the furthest corners in the field of his desired powers.

Last spring, the New Yorker's Jane Mayer profiled David Addington, Cheney's chief of staff and legal adviser. Addington's worldview in brief: a single-minded devotion to something called the New Paradigm, a constitutional theory of virtually limitless executive power, wherein "the President, as Commander-in-Chief, has the authority to disregard virtually all previously known legal boundaries, if national security demands it," Mayer describes.

Bush administration insiders told Mayer that Addington and Cheney had been "laying the groundwork" for a vast expansion of presidential power long before 9/11. And in 2002, the vice president told ABC News that the presidency was "weaker today as an institution because of the unwise compromises that have been made over the last 30 to 35 years." Rebuilding that presidency has been their goal for decades.

The image of Addington scrutinizing "every bill before President Bush signs it, searching for any language that might impinge on Presidential power," as Mayer puts it, can be amusing, sort of like the mother of the bride obsessing over a tricky seating chart. But this zeal to restore an all-powerful presidency traps the Bush administration in its own worst legal sinkholes. This newfound authority -- to maintain a disastrous Guantanamo Bay, to stage rights-free tribunals and to hold detainees forever -- is the kind of power that Richard M. Nixon could have only dreamed about, and cannot be let go.

In a heartbreaking letter from Guantanamo Bay last week, published in the Los Angeles Times, inmate Jumah al-Dossari writes: "The purpose of Guantanamo is to destroy people, and I have been destroyed." I fear he is wrong. The destruction of Dossari, Padilla, Zacarias Moussaoui, Yasser Esam Hamdi and some of our most basic civil liberties was never a purpose or a goal -- it was a byproduct. The true purpose is more abstract and more tragic: to establish a clunky post-Watergate dream of an imperial presidency, whatever the human cost may be.

Dahlia Lithwick covers legal affairs for Slate, the online magazine at www.slate.com.

Attack On U.S. Embassy Revives Greek Fear Of Terrorism (NYT)

By Ian Fisher, Anthee Carassava

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

ATHENS, Jan. 13 — The anti-Americanism was of a different vintage but still deadly, etched into two somber plaques at the battened-down United States Embassy here. Starting in December 1975, five embassy employees — four Americans and one Greek-American driver — were killed here by November 17, the leftist Greek terrorist group.

DOJ_NMG_0116657

Now, with a new attack on Friday on the embassy — using an unusually potent weapon, a rocket-propelled grenade — Greeks are grappling with deep uneasiness.

Was this a one-time attack?

Or was this just the first break in a new wave of leftist violence in Greece, now given an updated cause — and perhaps some conflicted sympathy among ordinary Greeks — amid worldwide anger against United States actions in Iraq and its broader fight against terrorism?

"The strike against the embassy was powerful, audacious, highly symbolic with an imported weapon," read an editorial in Vima, a leading Greek newspaper. "Unfortunately, terrorism is returning, ready to put its dark and damaging stamp on political developments."

The stakes for Greece are high. After several years of relative stability, any revival of violence here could erase the gains made after the successful dismantling of November 17 before the Olympic Games here in 2004. Those gains are vital and real. Greece's international image has improved, as have relations with the United States. Tourism, the nation's largest money maker, is surging. The number of American tourists has doubled since 2005.

"For the time being, we're calm," said Yannis Evangelou, president of the Hellenic Association of Travel and Tourist Agencies. "This was an isolated, one-off incident by a small group of people who obviously have a bone to pick with the U.S. and its policies."

"It doesn't reflect the views of the general public here," he added. Moreover, he said, "Greece isn't the only country where violent forms of anti-American protests are taking place."

No one was wounded in the attack on Friday, but alarm has been widespread. The damaged United States Embassy sits in one of the most heavily protected and patrolled sections of Athens, home to other embassies and foreign officials as well.

The weapon, too, was not some crude homemade bomb, but a powerful antitank grenade that, experts say, was either bought on the illegal international arms market or from a foreign militant group that may have also trained Greece's new generation of terrorists. It was a Chinese design, the Greek authorities said Saturday, not Russian as earlier identified.

"This is our fear, that they are professionals," said Christodoulos Yiallourides, a professor of international relations at Panteion University in Athens. "They are not a group of leftist young people. They are professionals, and they are following a strategy."

But what they want is still a mystery. Greek officials have not yet accepted the claim of responsibility for the Friday attack by a Marxist group, Revolutionary Struggle. The group released a proclamation of its aims in late 2005 — a grab-bag of complaints against globalization, poverty, the European Union and an American administration waging an unjust "war without borders or territorial or national divisions" against terrorist suspects.

"We will achieve the eradication of these ills only with the overthrow of the existing system in its entirety," the proclamation read.

Mary Bossis, one of Greece's foremost terrorism experts, said Revolutionary Struggle was worrisome because, unlike November 17, it did not seem to have a coherent political plan. Moreover, she said, Revolutionary Struggle and other new leftist groups seem to have ties to crime, both petty and organized, as the use of the rocket-propelled grenade seemed to show.

"It seems that these organizations are not really interested in what people think about them," she said. "They are not overthrowing the government. They are just interested in violence."

She and other experts said the signs of the resurgence of those gropus had been clear for years — and, she and others charged, were not taken seriously enough by the Greek government. Since September 2003, Revolutionary Struggle has claimed responsibility for at least seven attacks, from bombings at a courthouse, bank and police station to an assassination attempt against the culture minister.

"I expect more attacks," Ms. Bossis added.

The question now, analysts say, is how actively the government of Prime Minister Kostas Karamanlis works to prevent other attacks. Some experts said an encouraging sign was the immediate appointment of Stylianos Syros, the former head of the Greek antiterrorist squad credited with taking apart November 17, to lead the investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0116658

The government, considered generally more friendly to Washington than its socialist predecessors, also quickly made clear that it wanted to avoid any deterioration in relations with the American government.

Condemnations sounded across the political spectrum, and a foreign ministry spokesman, George Koumoutsakos, said he was convinced "that neither Greece's relations with the United States, nor the country's international image would be tarnished by Friday's attack."

That all political parties condemned the attack, he said, "proved important and useful."

There seems, too, no small measure of exhaustion with leftist political violence in Greece, which still simmers long after similar groups in nations like Italy and Germany fizzled out.

It appears true despite much irritation with America, from old grievances from American support of the Greek military dictatorship; to the feeling that United States has sided against Greece on issues like Turkey, Macedonia and Cyprus; to anger, widespread around Europe, to American foreign policy since the 9/11 terrorism attacks.

"We are against American policies but not against Americans," said George Krassias, 19, a pilot trainee, driving past the embassy, pocked with a hole from the grenade. "This shouldn't have happened."

Tunisia Says Suspects In Gun Battle Had Blueprints Of Embassies (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

PARIS, Jan. 13 — More than two dozen Islamic extremists involved in a deadly gun battle with the Tunisian police earlier this month had blueprints of foreign embassies and documents identifying foreign envoys as targets, the Tunisian interior minister said Friday.

It was the first official explanation of the firefight since TAP, the state news agency, reported that the police had engaged "dangerous criminals" in a rare shootout south of the capital on Jan. 3, the second violent incident in three weeks.

"Investigations have allowed us to seize quantities of homemade explosives, plans of certain foreign embassies, as well as documents containing the names of certain foreign diplomats resident in Tunisia," said the interior minister, Rafik Haj Kacem, according to the news agency. He did not disclose the countries or people who apparently had been targets.

Islamic extremism has been growing across North Africa, the far edge of a fundamentalist religious trend that is polarizing societies between rich and poor.

While the upper and middle classes in all of these countries are largely modernist, secular and Western-oriented, a religious resurgence among the lower classes — heavily influenced by the fundamentalist Salafi school of Islam practiced in Saudi Arabia — has fueled the rise of Islamic parties from the Islamic Brotherhood in Egypt to the Justice and Development Party in Morocco.

The extremism has produced terrorist threats, and resulted in terrorist attacks, in every country along the southern Mediterranean coast and most European countries across the sea. A bomb in Tunisia's main tourist center on the island of Djerba killed 21 people in April 2002.

Since then, there has been no open threat in the tightly controlled country. But Islamic terrorist activity has long threatened to bleed into Tunisia from neighboring Algeria, where the small but violent Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, or G.S.P.C. as it is known by its French acronym, is fighting for an Islamic theocracy in North Africa.

Those fears were bolstered Friday when the Interior Ministry announced that six members of the group — five Tunisians and a Mauritanian — had crossed into the country from Algeria.

Two Tunisian newspapers close to the government have reported that the group had ties to the G.S.P.C., according to Agence France-Presse.

In December, the Interior Ministry reported that two people had been killed and two arrested in a shootout with the police in Hammam Lif, a suburb of Tunis, the capital.

Then, on Jan. 3, the ministry reported that the police had been engaged in another shootout with the group in Soliman, 25 miles south of the capital, Tunis, killing 12 people and arresting 15. Two security force members were also killed.

DOJ_NMG_0116659

It was not until Friday that the government confirmed widespread speculation that the people involved had been Islamic extremists.

"The intelligence services know these people, their names and their Salafist terrorist tendencies," Mr. Kacem said, according to the TAP news agency.

He said the group was attacked in December with the help of the Army and that those who escaped were eventually caught in the daylong shootout on Jan. 3.

Security in the country was tightened after the two episodes, with diplomats reporting an increase in roadblocks, particularly in the capital's diplomatic quarters.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Stockpiling Waste (WP)

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

STOCKPILING a new anthrax vaccine was supposed to be the signal achievement of Project Bioshield, the government's flagship program to prepare for a biological, chemical or radiological attack on American soil. But last month the Department of Health and Human Services canceled its contract with VaxGen, a biotechnology firm that was supposed to develop the vaccine. The contract turned out to be a huge waste of time and effort.

There were signs that Bioshield was far, far off track long before VaxGen lost its contract. HHS tapped VaxGen for its $1 billion anthrax vaccine contract even though the company was best known for producing a failed AIDS medication, had never created a successful drug and had failed to release satisfactory financial reports, leading to its delisting from the Nasdaq Stock Market. The company repeatedly ran afoul of the Food and Drug Administration, which pulled the plug on human trials for the vaccine.

Nevertheless, accompanied by a drumbeat of bad news about the company's progress, federal contracting officials extended VaxGen's due dates. Now HHS officials insist that VaxGen offered convincing evidence that it could produce a new anthrax vaccine on time when it signed its contract in 2004. It would be more reassuring if those officials admitted mistakes and said that they were trying to figure out where they had gone wrong.

Concern over the $5.6 billion Project Bioshield prompted recent passage of a law that creates a much-needed coordinating office to oversee Bioshield's varied efforts and alters the way the federal government funds anti-bioterrorism research. Its backers claim that these changes will foster effective partnerships between government and industry that can head off disasters such as VaxGen.

Perhaps they will, but Project Bioshield might need a more fundamental reexamination. For example, Bioshield's priorities: Rather than stockpiling a particular vaccine, might it be more effective to redirect much of that money to measures that would help across a range of disasters, such as buying face masks and respirators or enhancing drug production capacity?

Incendiary (WP)

By Warren Bass

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

In an angry polemic, Dinesh D'Souza blames American liberals for the 2001 terrorist attacks.

THE ENEMY AT HOME

The Cultural Left and Its Responsibility for 9/11

By Dinesh D'Souza

Doubleday. 333 pp. $26.95

On Sept. 13, 2001, the television evangelist Jerry Falwell offered a stunned, grieving nation a startling diagnosis of al-Qaeda's motivations. "I really believe," he said on Pat Robertson's show, "The 700 Club," "that the pagans, and the abortionists, and the feminists, and the gays and the lesbians who are actively trying to make that an alternative lifestyle, the ACLU, People for the American Way -- all of them who have tried to secularize America -- I point the finger in their face and say, 'You helped this happen.' "

DOJ_NMG_0116660

At the time, Falwell's analysis was roundly denounced as hysterical and elicited a pointed disavowal from President Bush. But Dinesh D'Souza, a fellow at Stanford's Hoover Institution, has decided, essentially, that Falwell was on to something. The Enemy at Home calls America's culture war synonymous with its war on terrorism and flatly blames the country's left for 9/11. But unlike Falwell and Robertson's outburst at a moment of crisis, D'Souza's is offered in a spirit of cool reflection. The result is the worst nonfiction book about terrorism published by a major house since 9/11, but with the country still facing a serious jihadist threat, it's worth trying to understand D'Souza's own exercise in finger-pointing.

Here's the main argument, such as it is. Why has al-Qaeda targeted America? "Not because of U.S. troops in Mecca," D'Souza writes. "Not even because of Israel. . . . The suicide bombers of radical Islam are not blowing themselves up because they are distressed over the Gulf War of 1991 or because they are in solidarity with the Palestinians." Rather, "what bin Laden objected to was America staying in the Middle East, importing with it the immoral ingredients of American values and culture." That makes the left "responsible for 9/11" because it "has fostered a decadent American culture that angers and repulses traditional societies" and has waged "an aggressive global campaign to undermine the traditional patriarchal family and to promote secular values in non-Western cultures." In sum, "the cultural left and its allies in Congress, the media, Hollywood, the nonprofit sector, and the universities are the primary cause of the volcano of anger toward America that is erupting from the Islamic world."

D'Souza, the author of the bestselling Illiberal Education, has no particular expertise on terrorism, which may explain why he writes twice that there are U.S. troops in Mecca (someone should probably alert Bob Gates) or why he thinks that President Reagan's 1986 airstrikes on Libya "convinced Qadafi to retire from the terrorism trade," despite the bombing of Pan Am 103 by Libyan agents two years later. But D'Souza's inexperience doesn't explain why he so badly misreads bin Ladenist ideology, despite the peppering of jihadist quotes that he uses to lend the book a sense of authority.

Of course, the ascetic bin Laden doesn't like American culture or values, including such far-left ideas as democracy or educating women, but he has a clear politico-religious agenda that's important to take seriously. You'd never know it from reading D'Souza, but bin Laden's February 1998 "Declaration of the World Islamic Front for Jihad against the Jews and the Crusaders" -- the most considered summation of his casus belli -- laid out three main grievances for which al-Qaeda kills. First and foremost comes the post-Gulf crisis deployment of U.S. troops in Saudi Arabia, which are "occupying the lands of Islam in the holiest of its territories" and "using its bases in the peninsula as a spearhead to fight against the neighboring Islamic peoples." Second comes the supposed Crusader-Jewish alliance's "long blockade" of the Iraqis, designed "to destroy what remains of this people and to humiliate their Muslim neighbors." Finally, America's anti-Muslim wars "also serve the petty state of the Jews, to divert attention from their occupation of Jerusalem and their killing of Muslims in it." See anything about Hollywood there?

D'Souza breezes past clearly articulated core al-Qaeda goals (such as toppling the "near enemy," as bin Ladenists call the impious regimes in Saudi Arabia and Egypt) to enlist bin Laden as an ally for D'Souza's side of the American culture wars. But the 1998 declaration bluntly states that "the purposes of the Americans" in their crusades against Islam "are religious and economic" -- not cultural. D'Souza is too busy projecting to really grapple with al-Qaeda's politics, strategy or ideological appeal; it's as if he read Mein Kampf and concluded that its author's main concern was not Aryan supremacy or genocidal anti-Semitism but distaste for Weimar theater.

For a Stanford fellow, D'Souza shows a surprising ignorance of the growing literature on jihadist ideology. One has to ask which is more likely: that such authors as Steve Coll, Lawrence Wright, Peter L. Bergen, Marc Sageman, Jessica Stern, Richard A. Posner and Bruce Hoffman could have scrutinized al-Qaeda ideology and somehow failed to notice that bin Laden's main beef was with America's corrupt cultural left, or that the grinding sound you hear off in the distance is D'Souza with an ax. Or consider the work of another heavyweight, Michael F. Scheuer, the tough-minded founding chief of the CIA's bin Laden unit, who advocates the massive use of the U.S. military as our principal tool for fighting al-Qaeda. (D'Souza, oddly, lumps him in with a bunch of lefties.) "Bin Laden has been precise in telling America the reasons he is waging war on us," Scheuer has written. "None of the reasons have anything to do with our freedom, liberty, and democracy, but have everything to do with U.S. policies and actions in the Muslim world." There's a feisty and interesting debate among terrorism specialists about whether Scheuer has the balances right, but "The Vagina Monologues" isn't high on any serious analyst's list of al-Qaeda grievances.

DOJ_NMG_0116661

In other words, D'Souza's answer to the famous post-9/11 question of "Why do they hate us?" is that it all depends on the meaning of the word "us." In arguing that it's liberals who have brought al-Qaeda's wrath down upon the United States, he vents his indignation largely at his fellow Americans, not the fanatics who've declared it a holy duty to murder us all -- civilians and soldiers alike. Obsessed with a "near enemy" of his own, D'Souza endorses much of the jihadist critique of American society and gives at least a partial moral pass to al-Qaeda and the perpetrators of 9/11. It should go without saying that bin Laden's self-styled fatwas make no distinction between liberals and conservatives. There was a time when Americans at war did not do so either.

As the great social scientist Thomas C. Schelling might have put it, there are two possibilities here: Either D'Souza is blaming liberals for 9/11 because he truly believes that they're culpable, or he's blaming liberals for 9/11 because he's cynically calculating that an incendiary polemic will sell books. I just don't know which is scarier. One has to wonder why his publisher, agent, editors and publicists went along for the ride, and it's hard not to conclude that they thought the thing would cause a cable-news and blogosphere sensation that would spike sales -- a ruckus triggered not despite the book's silliness but because of it. This sort of scam has worked before (think of Christopher Hitchens's gleeful broadside against Mother Teresa or the calculated slurs of Ann Coulter), but rarely has the gap between the seriousness of the issues and the quality of the book yawned as wide. This time, let's just not bother with the flap; this dim, dishonorable book isn't worth it. Â·

Warren Bass is a senior editor at Book World. He served on the professional staff of the 9/11 Commission.

WAR NEWS:

Opposition To Iraq Plan Leaves Bush Isolated (WP)

By Peter Baker, Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

The bipartisan opposition to President Bush's troop-increase plan has proved more intense than his advisers hoped and has left them scrambling to find support, but the White House is banking on the assumption that it can execute its "new way forward" in Iraq before Congress can derail it.

The plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq was virtually guaranteed to provoke a furor in Washington, Bush advisers said, but the storm was exacerbated by the slow, leaky way that the White House reached a decision. The policy review stretched two months after the election and the essence of the plan became known long before Bush announced it, making it a political pi?ata for opponents.

Without Bush making the case for it until last week, resistance hardened, and aides now harbor no hope of winning over Democrats. Instead, they aim mainly to keep Republicans from abandoning him further. Bush invited GOP leaders to Camp David this weekend and will argue his case to the nation on CBS's "60 Minutes" tonight. Vice President Cheney and national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley will also hit the airwaves today.

"We recognize that many members of Congress are skeptical," Bush said in his radio address yesterday, adding: "Members of Congress have a right to express their views, and express them forcefully. But those who refuse to give this plan a chance to work have an obligation to offer an alternative that has a better chance for success. To oppose everything while proposing nothing is irresponsible."

Many Democrats, in fact, have proposed alternatives centered around pulling out troops, an idea Bush flatly rejects. So hopes for a bipartisan consensus after Democrats captured Congress in the November midterm elections have evaporated, and Bush appears more isolated than ever.

"We are headed towards quite a donnybrook in Congress," said former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), co-chairman of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, whose plan for withdrawing combat forces by early 2008 was never fully embraced by Bush or Democrats. "We had hoped that there would be more progress towards a more bipartisan approach."

The White House has downscaled its goals and is playing for time. Advisers resign themselves to a nonbinding congressional resolution condemning the troop increase but want to avoid many Republicans voting for it. Former senator Rick

DOJ_NMG_0116662

Santorum (R-Pa.), who lost reelection, called Bush's plan "a step in the right direction" and said Republicans do not want to walk away from Iraq but are "in full political survival mode" now. "It's very hard, particularly if you're on the ballot in two years, to run on the side of the president on anything to do with the war."

The more serious threat to the White House would be a Democratic attempt to restrict funds for more troops. Bush aides said that current funds are enough to get started, and they are counting on the notion that it will take two months until the supplemental appropriation bill providing more war funds comes to a vote. By then, they said, extra troops will be on the ground and it will be too late for Congress to stop them. And they hope for signs of progress that would let them argue that the plan is working.

"This buys us time," said a senior administration official, speaking on the condition of anonymity to discuss strategy. A political strategist who advises the White House added: "The public responds to progress and to events. Every time they can see real progress -- an election, catching Saddam, whatever it is -- they like it." And so if violence can be tamped down, it could defuse some public hostility.

If that happens, the White House hopes the troop buildup then will succeed in bringing enough stability to Baghdad by August that U.S. forces can withdraw to the city outskirts. And officials said it must be sustained. "By the end of the year, Baghdad's got to look significantly different," said a National Security Council official not authorized to speak on the record.

Democrats believe that Bush made a fundamental mistake. Had he embraced the Iraq Study Group, or even made a show of embracing some of its elements, he could have called the Democrats' bluff about wanting to work together, party strategists said. "That would have really jammed us," said a top congressional Democratic aide.

The study group proposed shifting the U.S. mission to support and training, withdrawing combat forces by early 2008, embedding U.S. troops with Iraqi units, threatening to reduce aid to the Iraqi government unless it makes progress, negotiating with Iran and Syria and reinvigorating the Israeli-Arab peace process. But to the consternation of Democrats, the U.S. troop pullout would not be locked into a strict timetable and would depend on ground conditions.

"This was a real missed opportunity," said Leon E. Panetta, a former Clinton White House chief of staff who served on the panel. "No president can conduct a war without the support of the American people and without the support of the Congress. That's the lesson of history." While some officials saw the report as an opportunity to change course, Panetta said, "I think deep down, they viewed it as a sign of weakness to abide by an outside group's recommendation."

Former senator Alan K. Simpson (R-Wyo.), another panel member, said that Bush's plan is "better than the status quo" but voiced disappointment that he did not agree to talk with Syria and Iran. "Nothing is ever solved by not talking to somebody," he said. Simpson said he was stunned by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's statement that Iran could use talks with the United States to extort concessions. "Where did that come from?" he asked. " What the hell is gained by not thinking of some kind of system to talk? It makes no sense."

Now, since Bush has rejected it, some Democrats have begun touting the Iraq Study Group plan as an alternative despite previous misgivings, attempting to position themselves as bipartisan. "We have all endorsed the Iraq Study Group -- that is our plan," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the House Democratic Caucus. The White House denied that it dismissed the report, noting that the panel said it could support a short-term troop increase to help stabilize Baghdad. The panel "gave a lot of very valuable advice, much of which is incorporated into the president's plan," said White House press secretary Tony Snow.

Philip D. Zelikow, who as Rice's counselor was intimately involved in Iraq policymaking before stepping down recently, said great thought was given to how to satisfy at least some Democrats. "If you were in our shoes, what is the approach that would satisfy the Democrats?" he asked. "That's not an easy question to answer" given the diversity of views within the party.

The policy review showed a lack of discipline unusual for the Bush administration. At first, the White House planned to announce a new plan for Iraq before Christmas. Then, amid serious internal disagreement, it postponed it until mid-January. At the same time, the once-leakproof administration poured out details of the debate, making clear that generals were resisting a troop increase.

For all that, some allies said, the administration was doomed to bipartisan criticism regardless of how it handled the review and presentation. "You've got a Democratic Party that doesn't believe in Bush, doesn't believe in the war," said William Kristol, editor of the Weekly Standard. "You've got a Republican Party that thinks Bush cost them the election. They could have done it better, but I'm not sure it would've made much difference."

DOJ_NMG_0116663

Yet even Kristol, a strong proponent of sending more troops, expressed aggravation at the White House for not showing more urgency about getting Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus dispatched to the region as the new Middle East commander. Asked why it hasn't happened, Kristol said: "Because it's the Bush administration. Maybe you haven't noticed -- they're not the most competent at executing the war."

An Uphill Push For Public Opinion On Iraq (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13 — Bush administration officials, acknowledging that the war in Iraq may get worse before it gets better, face a daunting public relations challenge as the White House pursues its new strategy to quash the insurgents.

After President Bush's address to the nation this week, in which he promoted his strategy to increase the American military presence in Iraq, his aides conceded that more troops would mean more fighting and possibly more grisly televised images.

That prospect will do little to help the administration as it seeks to build public support for an increasing unpopular war.

Even if all goes according to plan, officials conceded in interviews, early signs of progress will do little to compete with continued or worsening signs of strife.

"They need to engage these guys if they're going to make progress, and yet that's probably going to lead to less favorable news," said Thomas Patterson, a professor at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government. "He's in the position of trying to carry a piano upstairs."

Administration officials said that their strategy to quell the violence in Baghdad was in a race against dwindling public patience, but that it was a race they believed they could win. They said in interviews that they factored a potential spike in violence into the plan, and the effect it would have on public opinion.

They described a likely, initial increase in violence as an inevitable down payment for the better images out of Baghdad they hope will come later, and ultimately, more support for the Iraq campaign.

"The president gets it," said a senior administration official involved in the planning. "He knows public opinion is not going to change until those images on the evening news improve." That official said reaching milestones would help, like a show of readiness by new Iraqi forces, or a new law creating an equitable mechanism to distribute oil revenues across the sectarian divide.

But such benchmarks also give war critics in Congress a more clear-cut way to measure failure, said Dennis Ross, a Middle East envoy for President Clinton and for Mr. Bush's father. "It gives you an actual measure by which to say, 'How are they doing: Are these things happening, or not?' " he said. "In an interesting way what the president has done for the first time is to create benchmarks to evaluate the administration's approach."

Even if the economic and political goals in the plan are swiftly achieved, they will only go so far in affecting public opinion as fighting continues: Images from a signing ceremony for an oil agreement are inevitably less compelling than pictures of exploding cars, charred bodies and American war dead.

The complexities are causing no small bit of anxiety for Mr. Bush's allies, chief among them Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican whose support of a troop increase will be judged on its success during his likely presidential bid in 2008.

Senator McCain said in an interview this week that he did not expect to see significant improvement on the ground in Iraq for "at least a couple of months," adding, "I very much worry about the casualties, from the human side to the political side."

The senator, who has harshly criticized the administration's failure to manage expectations in the past, said of the president, "I would hope he would say how tough this is going to still be."

White House officials said that was the plan. "You've heard the president say before that, as commander in chief, one of his most important responsibilities is informing the public about the course of the war," said Kevin Sullivan, the White House communications director. "You'll see an ongoing effort to do that."

DOJ_NMG_0116664

Mr. Bush stopped short of calling for great national sacrifice in his address, something some allies had suggested he do to prepare the public for more rough days ahead. But he did warn, "Our enemies in Iraq will make every effort to ensure that our television screens are filled with images of death and suffering. Yet over time, we can expect to see Iraqi troops chasing down murderers, fewer brazen acts of terror, and growing trust and cooperation from Baghdad's residents."

But for now, Mr. Bush's decision to add troops — despite election results that were widely interpreted as a "no" vote on the war — has been taken as another sign that he is stubbornly going his own way against the public mood, a perception the White House was prepared for, senior administration officials said.

Gambling metaphors were hard to escape this week in the news coverage of the plan, but they applied. The White House calculated that it had to promise a major change to get the public to give its latest new plan a hearing. But it raised the stakes for the administration in the process.

"It's a tremendous gamble — the administration opens itself up to losing control of the policy if it isn't judged as succeeding," said Richard Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations and a former State Department official.

"There's a sense now that, with this, we will have done everything we can."

Democrats Feel Free To Defy Bush On Iraq (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

WASHINGTON — Emboldened by President Bush's deeply unpopular proposal to send more troops to Iraq, congressional Democrats are shedding their wariness about tackling the war and embracing positions once primarily held by the party's most liberal fringe.

Less than two weeks after taking power, party leaders who had promised just an increase in oversight hearings on the war are now talking openly about cutting off funds for additional military operations.

Centrist Democrats are lining up beside longtime antiwar liberals, promising to do everything in their power to stop the president's plans to deploy an additional 21,500 troops in Baghdad and Al Anbar province.

And the war's most passionate opponents in the House, whose last meeting before the midterm election was relegated to a basement room, met last week in one of the grandest rooms on Capitol Hill and drew scores of supporters, television cameras and journalists.

"Ours is now the mainstream position," said Rep. Lynn Woolsey (D-Petaluma), who two years ago saw her resolution calling for the withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq crushed on the House floor. Today, the congressional Out of Iraq Caucus co-founded by Rep. Maxine Waters (D-Los Angeles) has more than 80 members.

Congressional Democrats, suddenly united in their desire to pass resolutions against the escalation, still face challenges in deciding how far to go in what could become a historic showdown between two branches of government over the course of a war. And any move to cut funding may quickly reveal fissures in the Democratic caucus.

The threat to cut off funds for more troops drew a rebuke Saturday from President Bush, who challenged war critics to offer their own plan for Iraq.

"Those who refuse to give this plan a chance to work have an obligation to offer an alternative that has a better chance for success," he said in his weekly radio address. "To oppose everything while proposing nothing is irresponsible."

The Democrats' rapid embrace of what were once minority positions capped an extraordinary week on Capitol Hill as Congress stirred after years of standing by a wartime president.

"It was a wild and woolly week," said Rep. Adam B. Schiff (D-Burbank).

Schiff was one of more than two dozen members of Congress who went to the House floor to condemn the war Thursday. Just one Republican rose to challenge them.

Democrats, who campaigned against the war, seized majorities in the House and Senate last fall largely because of unhappiness with the president's policies.

But when the Democrats returned to Capitol Hill this month, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) and other senior party leaders had planned to focus on a purely domestic agenda.

DOJ_NMG_0116665

They cautiously avoided talk of cutting funding or other measures to compel Bush to change course in Iraq. As recently as Monday, Pelosi had refused to discuss possible legislation to limit an escalation in Iraq.

But the next day, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), in a speech laced with references to the mistakes of Vietnam, announced his intention to introduce a bill that would require the president to seek congressional approval for any troop increase in Iraq.

Within hours, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said he would introduce a resolution the following week condemning any White House plans to send additional troops. Pelosi's office quickly announced that House Democrats would do the same.

By the time Bush addressed the nation Wednesday night, congressional Democrats across the ideological spectrum were rallying to oppose the president.

"We have to take a stand…. We have to do everything we can," said Rep. Ellen Tauscher (D-Alamo), a centrist Democrat who said she wanted to sign on to the House version of Kennedy's bill, which is sponsored by one of her chamber's most liberal members.

Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a decorated Vietnam veteran and longtime military supporter, said Friday that he would use his position as chairman of the House appropriations panel's defense subcommittee to try to block funding for any troop increase in Iraq.

Murtha said he also wanted to force the closure of the controversial military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and put limits on how long military service members could be deployed.

A Pelosi spokesman said the speaker had encouraged Murtha to explore the funding limitations.

The same day, in a mark of how much has changed in Washington, House Republican leaders held a sober meeting to air complaints from their members about the president's plans.

"It was not a typical conference," said Rep. Adam H. Putnam (R-Fla.), choosing his words carefully. Putnam is the No. 3 leader in a caucus that until recently rarely showed public signs of dissent.

By contrast, Pelosi and House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) have urged House Democrats to be aggressive in exploring legislative options for winding down the war, Rep. Stephen F. Lynch (D-Mass.) said.

Some Democrats remain wary of moving too quickly to try to cut funding, and it was unclear whether they could succeed.

Reid must contend with Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), who has said he will try to block a resolution, forcing Democrats to get 60 votes. The Democratic caucus has 51 members.

Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), a fierce war critic who chairs the House Appropriations Committee, said Friday that, because of the complexity of the defense budget, he doubted that Congress would be able to find a way to selectively prohibit spending for a troop buildup.

"I don't know how the hell you do it," Obey said, pointing to the tortuous efforts by Congress two decades ago to limit funding for military operations in Central America.

Bush has signaled that he would not be deterred by congressional opposition. "I made my decision. We're going forward," Bush said in an interview with "60 Minutes" to be broadcast tonight.

But today, the president no longer can count on a Congress of Republicans who are unwavering in their loyalty and Democrats who are cowed by the fear of being labeled weak on defense.

And public support for the president and the war has plummeted. Some polling shows dissatisfaction with Bush's plans has reached 70%.

"The public is so disillusioned," Democratic strategist Mark Mellman said, "that we've gotten to the point where people think the war has actually made us less safe."

And that has made it increasingly safe for Democrats to challenge the White House.

"There definitely is a feeling of liberation," said Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.), a staunch war opponent who was in Congress when it last put limits on an unpopular war more than 30 years ago.

"The question now is not if, but how, we get out of Iraq and when. The whole nature of the debate has changed."

DOJ_NMG_0116666

Choices Dwindle If Iraq War Plan Fails (AP)

By Calvin Woodward, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 14, 2007

If the revamped Iraq war plan fails, it will be time to withdraw most U.S. troops. Or send more in. The United States is seen as having a limited number of options, all grim, if President Bush's "new way forward" hits a wall. The pressure for U.S. disengagement will be immense. Yet a further escalation, however unimaginable now, may not be out of the question.

Few expect helicopters to beat the air over Baghdad in a hasty retreat of the kind that closed the books on America's defeat in Vietnam. The Mideast and its oil are too important.

"We were able to walk away from Vietnam," said Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain, who was a prisoner of war there. "If we walk away on Iraq, we'll be back, possibly in the context of a wider war in the world's most volatile region."

The administration is almost certainly considering fallback options if the latest plan falls apart. Officials are loath to talk about them.

Over two days of intense hearings on Capitol Hill last week, lawmakers raised questions at the margins about a Plan B even as they probed and for the most part attacked Plan A: Bush's move to increase U.S. forces to give Iraqis more time to take control of their own security.

Administration officials, defending a war that many in the U.S. and much of the world thinks is failing already, would not discuss what options will be left if the new approach fails. "Re-evaluate our strategy," Defense Secretary Robert Gates said.

Yet he hinted that the planned troop increase need not take place in its entirety if conditions change. "We are trying to construct this in a way that there are off-ramps," he said, so that "you don't necessarily have to go to the full extent of the buildup."

Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, testified, "You're asking a Marine who's focused on winning whether he has a plan in case he doesn't win."

"Yes," came the response from Rep. Kirsten Gillibrand, D-N.Y.

Pace would not address the question. Nor would he discuss any exit strategy — a "pejorative get-out-of-town" phrase he said he did not like.

But if the plan does not work, he said, "our flow of forces will allow us to modify what we do next."

Bush's plan to add 21,500 more U.S. troops to the 132,000 already in Iraq will add to the stress on a military already overburdened and force longer and more frequent tours of duty on combat troops. An additional escalation would intensify the problem — with no ready solutions on how it would be achieved.

Those who favor Bush's plan and many who oppose it are in striking agreement the consequences will be dire if it flops. Gates echoed the Iraq Study Group in outlining some of the likely results of failure in Iraq. He mentioned:

_Undermined U.S. credibility.

_Risk of a regional conflagration.

_An emboldened Iran.

_A "humiliating" defeat against extremism worldwide.

_A haven for terrorist networks in the heart of the Middle East.

"Should we withdraw prematurely, we could well leave chaos and the disintegration of Iraq behind us," Gates said.

Just as success in the fight against terrorism cannot be marked by a surrender on a battleship — as the administration likes to recall, the way Japan ended World War II — failure cannot be neatly defined in Iraq. Bush set benchmarks, but no timetable for the Iraqi government to meet them. Violence on the street ranges between terrible and worse.

But if a failure that no one can deny comes about, what then?

"I don't know what the administration does at that point," said Ted Galen Carpenter of the libertarian Cato Institute. Bush could propose another escalation or just pull out and take the hit on U.S. credibility, he said.

"This is the foreign policy equivalent of having invested in the stock of Worldcom or Enron," Carpenter said. "The longer you stay, the worse it gets. It's not easy to withdraw. It's just better than staying."

DOJ_NMG_0116667

There is no shortage of suggestions from people who think they have a better idea. Among them are an Iraqi version of the Depression-era Civilian Conservation Corps; mobile fingerprinting devices to track the worst thugs on the street; accelerated reopening of abandoned factories; a greater U.S. effort against al-Qaida in Anbar province, less against the sectarian warriors.

Kevin Ryan, a retired Army brigadier general who specialized in strategy and now is at Harvard, said some U.S. troops should be engaged in training and security no matter what becomes of the bulk of the force.

He said the U.S. should be reducing forces now and settling the remaining troops in for a long haul. "We are sprinting when we should be running a long-distance race," he said, predicting there will be no further escalation.

"Any further surges would just cause more damage to our ground forces' readiness," he said. "Even if you could magically create trained soldiers ... you don't have the equipment."

Failure of the plan also would intensify pressure on the administration to enlist countries of the Middle East in what is left of Iraq's security. Bush might have to bend on his refusal to deal directly with Iran and Syria, but from a position of weakness.

___

Associated Press writers Pauline Jelinek, Robert Burns and Nancy Benac contributed to this report.

Bush Stands By Iraq Invasion (LAT)

By David Savage And Solomon Moore, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

The president acknowledges that some 'decisions have made things unstable,' but says Iraqis owe the U.S.

WASHINGTON — The United States was right to invade Iraq, but choices made after the initial invasion have eroded security in the country, President Bush said in a television interview to be broadcast today.

"I think history is going to look back and see a lot of ways we could have done things better," Bush said in the interview, which will be aired on CBS' "60 Minutes" program.

Questioned about the current instability in Iraq, Bush said, "Well, no question decisions have made things unstable."

But he maintained that invading Iraq in 2003 was the right thing to do.

"My decision to remove Saddam Hussein was the correct decision, in my judgment," he said. "We didn't find the weapons we thought we would find, or the weapons everybody thought he had. But he was a significant source of instability."

"Iraqi people owe the American people a huge debt of gratitude," he said.

Bush's comments come as his new plan to send 21,500 additional U.S. troops to secure Iraq's capital and shore up forces fighting the insurgency in Al Anbar province is attracting sharp criticism from members of Congress.

In his Saturday radio address, Bush also said his new plan could succeed, because "American forces will have a green light to enter neighborhoods that are home to those fueling sectarian violence."

U.S. forces have been restricted by the Iraqi prime minister from operating freely in the Sadr City area that is home to Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr's Al Mahdi militia. But Bush said those restrictions had been lifted and that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki had promised that he would not tolerate interference with security operations.

Bush also challenged members of Congress who were critical of the plan to come up with their own proposals.

"To oppose everything while proposing nothing is irresponsible," he said.

But Rep. Timothy J. Walz, a newly elected Democrat from Minnesota who served in the war in Afghanistan, called Bush's plan "a step in the wrong direction — more of the same at the very time we need a new direction in Iraq."

"We need diplomatic and political solutions in Iraq, not more American troops," he said in the Democrats' Saturday radio address.

Many Iraqi leaders also have attacked the plan.

Sadr has emerged as one of the fiercest critics of the continued American presence in Iraq.

In a news conference Saturday in Najaf, Sadr representative Sheik Abdul Razzaq Naddawi warned Bush "not to commit foolishness" and attack Sadr followers.

If they are attacked, he said, "the Shiites will become an explosive belt."

"Anyone who is attacked must respond," Naddawi said. "In Islam, we must respond."

DOJ_NMG_0116668

In Baghdad Saturday, police patrols discovered 37 bodies, all of the victims middle-aged men apparently killed by gunfire. Some of the bodies showed signs of torture. In southeast Baghdad, a woman was killed by a mortar round.

In the southern Iraqi town of Samawa, police said that gunmen killed three brothers, and that the charred body of an Egyptian employee of the municipal government was discovered in a trash bin.

Three mutilated corpses were discovered in the southern city of Kut, among them that of a beheaded Iraqi soldier. Kut morgue officials also reported that a police officer was killed while traveling home from work.

Gunmen in Samarra, north of Baghdad, killed a prominent Sunni Arab cleric and political party operative in front of his house, and in a separate incident a policeman was shot to death.

David.savage@latimes.com moore1@latimes.com

Savage reported from Washington and Moore from Baghdad. Special correspondents in Baghdad and Kirkuk, Najaf, Kut, Samarra, Samawa and Hilla, Iraq, contributed to this report.

A GOP Lawmaker Grapples With Troop Escalation (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

Rep. Charlie Dent wrestled all week with President Bush's plan to send more U.S. troops to Iraq.

On Monday, the two-term Republican from eastern Pennsylvania told a hometown reporter that it would take "a pretty hard sell" for Bush to win him over. He fretted Wednesday about the Iraqis: "Are they going to be up to the task?" By Thursday evening, 24 hours after Bush's address from the White House library, he was nursing huge doubts and a jumble of emotions.

"I'm very skeptical, I'm very concerned," Dent said wearily, slumping in a leather chair in his office. "What would be the mission of our troops? I'm not sure the president addressed it."

Dent has reason to worry. He won reelection in November by a surprisingly narrow margin against an obscure opponent, and Democrats have no intention of letting him off easily again. Depending on the course of the war, Iraq could prove an even bigger impediment for Republicans in 2008.

Like many of his colleagues, Dent spent much of last week trying to hone a response to Bush's plan. Would he join other vulnerable 2008 Republicans, such as Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Norm Coleman of Minnesota, in throwing cold water on an escalation? Or would he take a more cautious, wait-and-see stance? After speaking with aides, associates and other lawmakers who belong to the Tuesday Group, an alliance of mainstream House Republicans, Dent decided on a blended approach.

"I think we have the obligation to process this a little bit," he said carefully. "But I still think the president has to make a case, a strong case. He's got a lot of selling left to do."

Republican reaction to the troop escalation plan has ranged from lukewarm to hostile. The negative statements that piled up Wednesday night after Bush's speech revealed a deepening political schism between a president whose campaign days are behind him and congressional Republicans who must face voters in two short years.

The GOP resistance first flamed in the Senate. "The most significant thing we saw today are where the Republican senators are who are up for reelection," Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.) remarked Thursday afternoon. But within hours, several Republican letters of opposition were circulating in the House, including one that was sitting on Dent's coffee table as he pondered what to do. House Republican leaders called a meeting Friday morning to allow members to vent, and Bush invited Republican leaders to Camp David this weekend to smooth concerns.

To Democrats, the message from voters in November was clear. "The American people want a change of direction in Iraq," said Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "They certainly did not have in mind a major escalation."

The first test for Dent and other Republicans will come when nonbinding resolutions opposing the surge are taken up in the House and the Senate, possibly later this month. "Congressman Dent is going to be on the front line of having to make that decision," Van Hollen noted.

DOJ_NMG_0116669

Dent caught a break in November. Although he represents a moderate district centered in the Lehigh Valley -- he has dubbed it "Deep Purple" -- Democrats failed to recruit a seasoned candidate to run against him. Instead, Dent faced Charles Dertinger, a little-known county councilman who spent just $66,000 on his grass-roots campaign. Dent spent more than $1 million, but he captured just 53 percent of the vote.

"People thought I was on a fool's errand," Dertinger said wryly. "But the war changed everything. I proved that it could be done."

Dent said little about Iraq during his 2004 campaign, and he spent his early months in Congress reading up on the conflict and talking to colleagues. He took a practical view: We're there, so what next?

In August, the congressman visited Iraq. He traveled to Basra and Kirkuk, toured a power plant under construction, and met with a judge in the Saddam Hussein trial. He spoke with troops from Pennsylvania and to Army Gens. John P. Abizaid and George W. Casey Jr.

His assessment afterward was upbeat. "Ultimately, life is slowly but gradually returning to normal," Dent told reporters. "There is a lot of room for optimism here. There's really no choice but to be optimistic at this point. It's just a matter of patience and will."

Although sectarian violence had been steadily increasing, Dent said he believed the American commitment in Iraq was reaching its peak. Once Iraq had a constitution in place, Dent said he assumed that the United States "would continue in a training role and sometime in 2006, start to draw down a bit." Instead, he said, "the Sunni insurgency went nuclear, and we've pretty much been struggling since then."

As the 2006 midterm elections approached, Dent's strategy was to repeat his successful approach from two years earlier of talking about Iraq as little as possible. "He never said a word during the campaign about the war," Dertinger said.

After his reelection, one of Dent's few expansive statements came in early December, when he offered enthusiastic support for the bipartisan Iraq Study Group report. Weeks later, when rumors of a new White House strategy began to circulate, he was disappointed that the report's numerous recommendations seemed to have been ignored. Dent's first thought upon hearing the word "surge" was that "the time to increase the presence of the force was two years ago."

Like many lawmakers, the congressman speaks to all sorts of people back home -- the contingent of anti-war Quakers he met with earlier last week, friends who served in the military, families of local soldiers.

One person he regularly speaks with is John Brinson, a West Point graduate and local conservative political commentator who owns a chain of fitness clubs in Dent's district. "I'm going to advise him to be quiet about the war and support the president 100 percent," Brinson said. "In fact, I'm going to call him right now and tell him that."

Nancy Tate, coordinator of the LEPOCO Peace Center, which has staged demonstrations at Dent's district office, has castigated the congressman "for being right down the line with Bush." But she said Dent's recent comments suggesting that he may oppose the escalation "are very encouraging."

"The public wants us to be successful," Dent said. "At the same time, their patience is not indefinite."

He doesn't endorse the withdrawal timetable that Tate's group has pressured him to accept, nor does he accept Brinson's lockstep loyalty. "There's a right way and a wrong way to leave, and I think most people understand that," Dent said.

'Surge' Plan Put At Risk By Politics, General Says (WT)

By Philip Sherwell, London Sunday Telegraph

The Washington Times, January 14, 2007

The military architect of the Iraq troop "surge" plan is criticizing the Bush administration, claiming the Pentagon is watering down the proposal for political reasons.

"You cannot try and do this piecemeal. We have to implement the whole package," retired Gen. John M. Keane told the Sunday Telegraph. The former Army vice chief of staff co-authored the "Choosing Victory" strategy paper, the main points of which were adopted by President Bush for his Iraq war plan.

Gen. Keane expressed his alarm after Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates testified on Capitol Hill that the troop buildup was expected to last "a matter of months" -- rather than the 18 months proposed by Gen. Keane.

DOJ_NMG_0116670

Mr. Gates also said the full deployment of 21,500 additional troops, announced by Mr. Bush last week, might not be implemented. He suggested that only two or three of the five brigades proposed for Baghdad could be deployed initially, while the rest are held in reserve.

"That makes no military sense, although it might seem to make political sense," Gen. Keane said. President Bush has been criticized in the past for not listening to the advice of his top generals.

"We need all five brigades in Baghdad as soon as possible. It will take three to four months to clear neighborhoods of death squads and insurgents, and at least the rest of the year to establish proper security for the population," Gen. Keane said. "If you only wanted to stage a clearance operation, you could do that in a few months. But if we left then, the militia would just return as they have in the past."

Mr. Bush's plans have been condemned by Democrats and some Republicans.

Sen. Chuck Hagel, Nebraska Republican, predicted last week that the plan would be "the most dangerous foreign-policy blunder in the country since Vietnam -- if it is carried out."

Some Democratic members of Congress are exploring the possibility of blocking funding for additional troops in Iraq.

In Iraq, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki raised fresh concerns about his commitment to the new strategy when he appointed a little-known officer, Lt. Gen. Abud Qanbar, as his military commander for Baghdad -- despite objections from senior U.S. officers and concerns that he may have sectarian ties.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, who was visiting Baghdad yesterday, sounded a less-optimistic tone than she has in the past about the situation in Iraq. The likely presidential candidate, who supported the invasion, described the situation as "heartbreaking" and said she doubted that the American people thought the U.S. mission could succeed.

Meanwhile, Iraqi insurgents allied to al Qaeda declared Mr. Bush's surge plan a victory and boasted that the extra U.S. troops would give them fresh targets.

Damien McElroy in Baghdad contributed to this article.

Maliki Aides Warm Slowly To Bush's Latest Iraq Policy (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 13 (AP) — Warming from its initial response this week, the Iraqi prime minister's office on Saturday expressed support for President Bush's new war strategy. But it continued to emphasize that the Iraqi government would retain control over all military action in Baghdad, and Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki maintained a public silence on the issue.

Mr. Bush announced Thursday that he would send more than 20,000 additional combat troops to Iraq, with most bound for Baghdad, the capital, in an effort to set up round-the-clock security operations.

Mr. Maliki's government, however, initially gave what appeared to be grudging acceptance of the plan at best. His spokesman, Ali al-Dabbagh, emphasized that the government's ultimate goal was to ensure a permanent withdrawal of American troops. But if the increase would help security for Iraq, he said, "the government, for sure, will not stand against it."

He also asserted Baghdad's right to demand changes. "We will tell the American administration to amend any point that we feel is not suitable," he told reporters then.

On Saturday, however, Mr. Dabbagh's tone was more positive toward the plan, saying that the prime minister saw the new security strategy as representing "a common vision and a mutual understanding between the Iraqi government and the American administration."

He added, "The Iraqi government affirms that security and stability in Iraq is a strategic necessity to the people of the region and the world since terrorism is a threat to everyone."

Mr. Dabbagh reiterated that American forces would be working in support of the Iraqis as they apply Mr. Maliki's new security plan to restore peace in Baghdad, which he announced in a speech on Jan. 6. The prime minister said then that he would fight against "safe haven for any outlaws, regardless of sectarian or political affiliation."

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, the New York Democrat who has opposed Mr. Bush's plans to send more troops, arrived in Iraq on Saturday.

DOJ_NMG_0116671

Senator Clinton was traveling with Senator Evan Bayh, Democrat of Indiana, and Representative John M. McHugh, a Republican from upstate New York. The three, all members of armed services committees, were to meet with Iraqi officials and American military commanders. They also planned to go to Afghanistan.

A sniper killed a policeman walking on a street in the commercial district of Karada in central Baghdad on Saturday, and a bomb in a parked car struck a mixed neighborhood in a western neighborhood, wounding three civilians.

At least five people also were killed in attacks in northern Iraq, including two Iraqi contractors who were checking a bridge in Kirkuk and a Shiite grocery store owner.Mr. Maliki, who outlined an Iraqi-led security plan to Mr. Bush when they met in Amman, Jordan, in November, has argued for Americans to pull out of cities and leave security to the Iraqi Army, which is 80 percent Shiite.

An Iraqi general said this week that the army intended to put nine brigades on the streets of Baghdad, or a total of about 27,000 men.

The military officer said for the most part the Iraqi force would not be directed against the Shiite militias, including the dominant Mahdi Army. The majority of fighting against the Mahdi Army would be left to the Americans in tandem with the Iraqi Special Operations forces.

Among Troops And Families, Mixed Reaction To American Expansion In Iraq (NYT)

By N. R. Kleinfield

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

Cpl. Michael Hubert, 22, will see war for the first time in April. The corporal is part of the infusion of troops being poured into Iraq under President Bush's new plan, and as he weighed his coming departure at Galloping Gertie's, a soldier-thick watering hole outside Fort Lewis, Wash., he was brimming with confidence.

"We're going to go over and change things," Corporal Hubert said.

In eastern Pennsylvania, as Heidi DeBlock absorbed the implications of the president's words during his televised address, she said she felt otherwise: "numb."

"I could write a book about how I feel, but he's O.K. with it," Ms. DeBlock said of her husband, Sgt. Andrew DeBlock. "He says he has a job to do and takes his job pretty seriously."

Mr. Bush's new approach means that Sergeant DeBlock, 41, a member of the New Jersey National Guard (the Blocks recently moved to Pennsylvania from New Jersey), will have his Iraq stay extended by four months.

Sergeant DeBlock, home on a brief break, chose to ignore Mr. Bush as he spoke on television. He busied himself vacuuming the house.

The decision to increase the American military presence in Iraq is being greeted with a blend of optimism and anxiety among American soldiers and their families, those most directly affected by the change. Unlike in Congressional corridors and across the civilian landscape of the country, there seems far more support than outrage, more cheer than cheerlessness, and a hope that maybe this will do it.

At the same time, especially among relatives of National Guard members dispatched to battlefields they never expected to stand on, there is plentiful disappointment and even anger at the prospect of prolonged disruptions in lives that have not been normal for a long time.

The expansion calls for more than 20,000 additional troops, including five active-duty combat brigades, to be sent to Iraq in the next few months. Some National Guard units will have their tours lengthened. The Pentagon has also relaxed the rules for mobilizing Guard members, so that units will return to battle quicker than anticipated.

The fresh troops will include nearly 4,000 members of the Second Infantry Division, Fourth Brigade, a front-line combat unit based at Fort Lewis. They leave in April, about a month earlier than previously planned.

Fort Lewis, the nation's third-largest military installation, has already felt the price and pain of the war. It has had 89 soldiers die in Iraq. A "Word of the Month" is posted at one of the base's exit, succinct wisdom for departing replacements. This month's word is "risk."

DOJ_NMG_0116672

Corporal Hubert, 22, a reconnaissance specialist, said the troop increase made sense. “It seems like they’re really starting to have a stronger focus and to embed troops, which I like to see,” he said. “It’s more aggressive and more supportive.”

Sgt. James Mayotte, an infantry leader in the Fourth Brigade who was visiting Galloping Gertie’s the other morning, was more restrained. “If it works, it’s a great idea,” Sergeant Mayotte said. “I don’t personally like having anyone over there, but if it’s good for the country....”

At Fort Benning, Ga., where several combat units are returning early to Iraq, soldiers generally seemed supportive of the change.

“I think we have to do something about what’s going on in Baghdad,” said First Lt. Jonathon Draper, 28, who has already spent a year in Iraq. “We’ll get the job done, whatever the president says.”

Staff Sgt. Shwon Brooks, 29, who has yet to go to war, said, “I kind of figured it was going to happen, but I thought it was going to be in the summer.”

Sgt. Kyle Cullen finished a deployment to Iraq a year ago and is not happy about returning. “I think sending more troops is not the way to go,” Sergeant Cullen said. “That will just be adding more to get killed.”

Sergeant Cullen enlisted for four years, and said he planned to leave the Army when he returned.

The new approach has a pronounced impact on National Guard members, who must vacate civilian jobs to serve. Protocol had been to limit Guard members’ mobilization to no more than a cumulative total of 24 months every five years, but now reservists who have been deployed within the last five years can be summoned again, though the intention is to keep a new tour to no more than a year.

At the Manor Road Armory in West Brighton, Staten Island, members of the 41st Infantry Division offered competing views.

“I think they should let them all come home; they’re over there for no reason,” said Pvt. Diana Ware, 20. “I know I don’t want to go. I joined the National Guard to go to college.” Private Ware’s goal is to become a nurse.

Specialist Douglas Block, 40, a father of four, saw things otherwise. “The more troops you have, the better it is,” Specialist Block said. “If they would have done this from the beginning, we’d be out of there by now.”

Under the new thrust, various Guard members already fighting in Iraq will remain months longer; they include a reconnaissance unit of the 117th Cavalry of the New Jersey National Guard. Its members had been slated to return by early April, after a year’s service, but now are likely to stay until sometime in July.

Salvatore DelRosario, of Staten Island, whose brother, Sgt. Ronald DelRosario, is in Iraq with the 117th Cavalry, was dispirited by the news. “It all seems for naught,” Mr. DelRosario said. “It would have been nice to have him home sooner, but he’s doing what he wants.”

Ms. DeBlock, the Pennsylvania resident whose husband’s stay will be extended by four months, said — as other Guard families did — that the extended assignments, and the lost income involved, complicated their lives.

Ms. DeBlock has had to battle her heating-fuel company, which wanted cash up front, and her husband’s cellphone provider, which will not let him out of his contract even though he is off fighting a war.

The Minnesota National Guard brigade of Specialist Isaac Pratt, 22, is having its active duty tour extended by about four months. Specialist Pratt called his parents a week ago, excited about coming home soon, only to find out a few days later that everything had changed.

“He’s disappointed,” said his father, John Pratt. “But at the same time, he senses that you can’t just leave Iraqis high and dry over there.”

For parents of children killed in Iraq, the war tears in different ways.

Debi Qualtieri, a registered nurse in Norwalk, Conn., said she always believed in the war, and still does, though her son, Sgt. Jonathan Lootens, of Lyon, N.Y., was killed in Iraq in October.

Ms. Qualtieri said she supported the escalation in troops, and had in fact been hoping for it. “I wish they had done it earlier, having spoken to my son when he was there,” she said. “He thought they needed more troops.”

Annette Brown has supported the war from the beginning, and continues to do so, but with reservations. Her son, Lance Cpl. Donald Brown, a marine, was killed at the end of October, and another son, Kenneth Brown, 24, has served three tours with the Marines in Iraq. He returned home last September.

DOJ_NMG_0116673

Ms. Brown said she agreed with the troop increase "if it would settle things down over there so the guys can come home."

But she does not want Kenneth to be part of it, and when she recently spoke to him, he told her he did not want to go back. Ms. Brown, a bank supervisor who lives in Succasunna, N.J., said, "I told him I'll do whatever I have to so you don't have to go back."

The Goal: Admitting Failure, Without Being A Failure (NYT)

By David Greenberg

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

PRESIDENT BUSH'S speech Wednesday night had to strike a perfect pitch. He had to defend the war that will define his legacy while admitting to enough error to regain credibility with the public. Consequently, commentators are still trying to figure out whether he conceded mistakes, showed regret or intends to change course at all.

In this respect, Mr. Bush's speech follows in that great American oratorical tradition: the presidential mea culpa.

Figuring out how to acknowledge failure without seeming like a failure is a time-honored occupational hazard of politics. But not until the 20th century did presidents govern mainly by mobilizing public opinion through rhetoric, and only with the rise of broadcasting did the celebrated "televised speech to the nation" become a staple of White House damage control.

While these confessions may work in the short term, they rarely work long-term magic. That typically requires a new course of action.

Ronald Reagan, for example, gave a relatively tepid mea culpa in addressing a Senate commission's findings that he hadn't leveled with the public in the Iran-contra scandal.

"A few months ago I told the American people I did not trade arms for hostages," he said in March 1987. "My heart and my best intentions still tell me that's true, but the facts and the evidence tell me it is not."

But President Reagan won praise for taking responsibility, and, more critically, for committing to an overhaul of White House personnel and policy. He renounced the covert wrongdoings of his former aides and eventually struck a landmark arms-control treaty with the Soviet Union.

Another buck-stops-here performance was John F. Kennedy's press conference after the Bay of Pigs, when American-backed Cuban rebels were routed in a bid to overthrow Fidel Castro.

"Victory has a hundred fathers, but defeat is an orphan," President Kennedy said, concluding, "I am the responsible officer of the government."

His popularity soared. Over time, what sealed his reputation was his later calls for a re-evaluation of the cold war and for a nuclear test-ban treaty. Other presidents have failed to capitalize on their dramatic speeches. In March 1968, Lyndon Johnson called a halt to bombing in Vietnam and ended his re-election bid, while vowing to redouble his efforts to achieve peace. But the goodwill faded as he kept the Democratic presidential nominee, Vice President Hubert Humphrey, tethered to a failed strategy until it was too late.

Similarly, in 1992, President George H. W. Bush gained little benefit from his 1992 apology for breaking his no-new-taxes pledge. "I did it, and I regret it and I regret it," he told a newspaper, as he tried to fend off a challenge from Pat Buchanan in the Republican primaries. But Mr. Bush's many reversals — vowing no new taxes, raising them, then recanting — only made him seem fickle and opportunistic, alienating both left and right.

Most tellingly, the master of the confession, Richard Nixon, tried in April 1973 to stanch the hemorrhaging from the Watergate scandal by unloading three of his top aides and declaring a fresh start.

"I was determined that we should get to the bottom of the matter, and that the truth should be fully brought out — no matter who was involved," he said. That turned out to be a lie, and he lost his credibility all over again.

Sometimes, if the public supports a president, he doesn't need to change course at all. When President Bill Clinton acknowledged in August 1998 that he misrepresented his relationship with Monica Lewinsky, Washington pundits said his speech was a disaster. But it turned out that most of the public considered Mr. Clinton's initial show of remorse sufficient and thought the impeachment drive should end. His administration remained popular, while displeasure with the news media rose.

DOJ_NMG_0116674

Of course, some presidents simply acted as if no apology were needed. Dwight Eisenhower refused to admit he'd erred after his administration lied about a U-2 spy plane shot down over the Soviet Union. He withstood sharp criticism and the unraveling of a planned Soviet summit. .

"These activities have their own rules and methods of concealment, which seek to mislead and obscure," President Eisenhower said at a press conference on May 11, 1960. That the most prominent figure pressing for an apology was the Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev certainly made life easier.

Throughout his presidency, Mr. Bush has been faulted for being too stubborn and unwilling to change, admit error or say he's sorry. But owning up to blunders is not always a ticket to forgiveness.

After President Clinton apologized on his 1998 trip to Africa for the American role in the slave trade and for his administration's passivity during the Rwandan genocide, his habit of contrition became a running joke. So much so that at the White House correspondents' dinner that spring, he delivered deadpan apologies for disco, pineapple on pizza and the Susan B. Anthony dollar.

"It did look too much like a quarter," Mr. Clinton admitted. "And that was wrong."

Picking Up The Pieces (NYT)

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

It was surreal how disconnected President Bush was the other night, both from Iraq's horrifying reality and America's anguish over this unnecessary, mismanaged and now unwinnable war. Indeed, most Americans seem far ahead of the president. They understand that what the country urgently needs is for Mr. Bush to chart a way out of Iraq that also limits the chaos that will be left behind.

The president's disconnect goes far to explain the harshly critical reaction of Congress and the public to his plan to further bleed America's overstretched forces by sending some 20,000 additional troops in an attempt to impose peace on Baghdad's vengeful streets. He proposes to do that without any enforceable commitments from the Iraqi government that it will take the necessary political steps that are the only hope for tamping down a spiraling civil war.

There are no really satisfying answers in Iraq, since all of the remaining options are bad. Still, some are notably worse than others, and Mr. Bush has come up with possibly the worst. He would mortgage thousands more American lives and what remains of Washington's credibility in the region to a destructively sectarian Shiite government that he seems unwilling or unable to influence or restrain.

•

Unlike Mr. Bush's views on the American military presence in Iraq, our views have evolved as the evident realities on the ground have changed. At the outset, although we opposed Mr. Bush's invasion, we hoped the United States military could provide enough security to allow an elected government to build the foundations of national unity and eventual democracy.

As it became increasingly clear that Iraqi political leaders had other, less noble intentions, we still hoped that a substantial American military presence could be used to shield innocent civilians from the growing violence, train reliable and professional Iraqi security forces to take over that task, and exert leverage on Iraqi leaders to follow a less divisive and destructive course.

Now, with Mr. Bush unwilling or unable to persuade Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki to take the minimum steps necessary to justify any deeper American commitment, we recognize that even that has become unrealistic. Mr. Maliki gave the latest White House plan an even chillier reception than it received in the United States Congress, boycotting a Thursday news conference in Baghdad announcing it. He apparently would have preferred to see American forces sent to fight Sunni insurgents in western Anbar Province, leaving Baghdad as a free-fire zone for his Shiite militia partners.

But even knowing all that, America cannot simply wash its hands of Iraq and go home. The region's problems, many of them made worse by this war, are unavoidably America's problems as well. For starters, Iraq is in imminent danger of violently breaking apart, driving millions of refugees across its borders — who will bring with them their ethnic grievances, and in some cases their weapons — and potentially unleashing a chain reaction of regional conflicts that could draw in Turkey, Saudi Arabia, Iran and perhaps others as well.

•

DOJ_NMG_0116675

Whatever else happens, Iran has already become more formidable and dangerous. Where it once had a hostile Saddam Hussein on its western border, it now has a friendly Shiite fundamentalist government. Its other longtime enemy, the United States, has had its diplomatic and military clout severely diminished by this war.

The expanding power of a revolutionary, Shiite Iran is profoundly unsettling to the conservative Sunni-led governments in most of the Arab Middle East, which have been America's traditional allies in the region. If the United States is to recoup any of its standing and influence there, it will have to find a way to contain the chaos in Iraq. And it will have to do a lot more to address other concerns of these governments and their people, starting with a genuine and sustained effort to mediate a peace agreement between Israel and the Palestinians.

If Mr. Bush does persist in sending more American troops to Baghdad, despite Congress's amply justified opposition, he will have to establish clear lines of command that assure that those troops can enter the strongholds of the Shiite militias responsible for much of the violence without militia leaders' being tipped off by allies in the Iraqi government.

And so long as any American troops remain in Iraq, Mr. Bush must put serious pressure on Mr. Maliki to support the troops' efforts with a genuine program of national reconciliation. That must include, at a minimum, ridding the police and other security services of killers, torturers and criminals and disarming all sectarian militias.

The government must also assure that Iraqi oil revenues are fairly shared out among the entire Iraqi population. And it must move quickly to offer an amnesty to Sunni insurgents willing to put down their weapons, and narrow the legal restrictions on former Baath Party members so that Sunni professionals can once again fully participate in Iraqi national life.

These benchmarks should be accompanied by fixed timelines. And they must be accompanied with a clear message that the United States is prepared to withdraw its troops if the Iraqis continue to refuse to take responsibility for their own future. Mr. Bush and other American officials need to make clear that as much as the United States will suffer from a complete collapse in Iraq, Iraq's leaders will suffer far worse from the loss of their American protectors.

Mr. Bush should reinforce that message by convening a conference of all of Iraq's neighbors to discuss how they can help stabilize Iraq — and what they can do to contain the wider chaos should it come. With nearly two million Iraqis already seeking refuge, mainly in Syria and Jordan, it is far past time for American officials to begin their own planning and relief efforts.

If Mr. Bush refuses to deliver this ultimatum to Mr. Maliki, Congress will have to do so in his stead. That's not the usual division of labor between the executive and legislative branches, but it is one that Mr. Bush has made necessary by his refusal to face realities. The potential consequences of his failed leadership are so serious that neither the new Democratic majorities in Congress, nor the public at large, can afford the luxury of merely criticizing from the sidelines.

•

So far, Congress is off to an encouraging start, holding substantive oversight hearings and asking probing questions of administration officials for the first time in too many years. Similarly encouraging has been the bipartisan character of this reinvigorated oversight. The Congress should continue asking hard questions. And it must insist on real answers before acting on any new requests for money to support Mr. Bush's plans to send more troops to Baghdad. Congress has the authority to attach conditions to that money, imposing benchmarks and timetables on Mr. Bush, who then would be forced to impose them on the Iraqi government.

One immediate step could be a set of bipartisan resolutions spelling out the broad policy directions Congress expects the president to pursue on Iraq. That would send a useful message to the American people that lawmakers are listening to their concerns, if Mr. Bush is not, and also to Iraq's leaders.

It's now up to Congress to force the president to live up to his constitutional responsibilities and rescue this country from the consequences of one of its worst strategic blunders in modern times.

History will surely blame Mr. Bush for leading America into Iraq, but it will blame Congress if it does not act to push him onto a more realistic path.

Congressional Pushback (WP)

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0116676

THE POLITICAL tempest that has greeted President Bush's latest plan for Iraq is largely of the president's making. Mr. Bush could have forged a bipartisan consensus if he had embraced the military strategy laid out by the Iraq Study Group, which was in keeping with proposals by the Iraqi government, U.S. military commanders and leading members of Congress. Instead, he chose to embrace an option -- the dispatch of additional American soldiers to Baghdad and Anbar province -- that has the support of less than 20 percent of Americans and maybe even fewer Iraqis. It's not even clear that the Iraqi government is entirely on board.

We don't think Mr. Bush went out of his way to pick the battle he now has with the new Democratic-controlled Congress. No doubt he has been convinced that the deployment of more troops is the only way to turn the situation in Iraq around. The White House, however, seems to have undervalued the importance of having broad public support before sending more troops into combat, with the inevitable spike in casualties that will cause. The intense criticism that has come from both houses and both parties in Congress is understandable, and justified.

So are some of the questions raised in congressional hearings at the end of the week. Chief among them is why the president would commit thousands of American soldiers to a pacification mission in Baghdad when success is heavily dependent on the Iraqi government's performance in areas where it has failed repeatedly. Republicans and Democrats alike have asked what the administration's response will be if Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki once again fails to deliver on promises to deploy Iraqi troops, tackle Shiite militias and strike political compromises. They have asked how long the "surge" can go on without overtaxing the Army and the reserves.

For the most part, the answers offered in public by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates have been vague or evasive. But these officials and others have repeatedly pointed out that it will be possible to judge quickly whether the Iraqi government is doing what is needed -- and that those judgments can be made before most of the five additional U.S. brigades are deployed. For example, the three additional Iraqi brigades promised for Baghdad, with an additional 8,000 troops, are supposed to arrive in the capital by the beginning of next month, before 10,500 of the additional American soldiers are dispatched and before the administration's supplemental budget request for funding is submitted to Congress.

In that timing lies the possibility for a constructive response by Congress. Democrats in both the House and Senate are planning votes on nonbinding resolutions that would reject Mr. Bush's new strategy. Some are discussing ways to block the new mission by cutting off funding or attaching crippling restrictions. Neither action would improve the precarious U.S. position in Iraq, and the latter, if pursued to the extent suggested by Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) or Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.), would invite a catastrophe for which Congress would be blamed.

Congress can, however, hold the administration to its promise to test the Iraqi government early and often. If Mr. Maliki delivers on his commitments in the coming weeks, the administration's bet on pacifying Baghdad may begin to look more solid. If the Iraqi government does not perform, then Congress will be well grounded in insisting that Mr. Bush rethink his strategy and suspend new U.S. deployments.

Bush's Idle Threat (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

ON WEDNESDAY, President Bush told the nation that "America's commitment is not open-ended" in Iraq. By Friday, however, the administration was already backsliding. What wasn't open-ended, apparently, was just U.S. support for Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki. When it comes to American boots on the ground, according to Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, the U.S. is in Iraq for the long haul.

Gates put it bluntly in testimony Friday to the Senate Armed Services Committee. "Saying, 'If you don't do this, we'll leave, and we'll leave now,' does not strike me as being in the national interests of the United States," Gates said. As for how long the U.S. will stay, he reckoned, "I think [what] the president had in mind was that we would probably have to be in Iraq to provide help of one kind or another to the Iraqis for quite some time."

This is not what the American people want; this is not what the Iraqi Study Group recommended; and it is not the best way to prosecute a war against the radical Islamists who attacked this country on 9/11. It is, instead, a way to guarantee that the U.S. military will be dangerously overstretched and needlessly vulnerable to sectarian militias in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0116677

Even as the president was delivering his address, administration officials were whispering to reporters (including some for this newspaper) that "simply coming home isn't an option" and that Maliki's days may be numbered. This would, to put it gently, undermine the White House's claim to be pushing toward increased Iraqi sovereignty. To the contrary: It would require ever-greater U.S. responsibility for a post-totalitarian country sliding deeper into anarchy.

If Maliki is shown to be incapable of disarming Shiite militias, it will be because he wouldn't or couldn't rise above civil war. If his government collapses, the only central authority remaining will be the one most resented — America's 150,000-strong fighting force — and prospects for a unity government will be grim. The White House's approach to this plausible scenario is to insist, more loudly by the day, that failure is not an option.

"Failure in Iraq would be a disaster for our future," Bush warned soldiers Thursday at Ft. Benning, Ga. "Radical Islamic extremists would grow in strength…. Iran would be emboldened in its pursuit of nuclear weapons. Our enemies would have safe havens from which to launch attacks. People would look back at this moment in history and say, 'What happened to them in America? How come they couldn't see the threats to a future generation?' That is why we must, and we will, succeed in Iraq."

Unfortunately for Bush, and for the rest of us, "we can't fail" is not a strategy. As painful experience has shown in Iraq, it is a recipe for further failure because it encourages wishful thinking at the expense of realistic planning.

Bush's speech Wednesday offered some small hope that his ultimatum to Maliki had real consequences — that Bush would withdraw U.S. troops "if the Iraqi government does not follow through in its promises." By Friday, it appeared that this was an empty threat. The consequences of Baghdad's broken promises could be greater U.S. involvement in — and greater U.S. responsibility for — an Iraqi civil war.

He's In The Bunker Now (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

PRESIDENT BUSH always had one asset he could fall back on: the self-confidence of a born salesman. Like Harold Hill in "The Music Man," he knew how to roll out a new product, however deceptive or useless, with conviction and stagecraft. What the world saw on Wednesday night was a defeated Willy Loman who looked as broken as his war. His flop sweat was palpable even if you turned down the sound to deflect despair-inducing phrases like "Prime Minister Maliki has pledged ..." and "Secretary Rice will leave for the region. ..."

Mr. Bush seemed to know his product was snake oil, and his White House handlers did too. In the past, they made a fetish of situating their star in telegenic settings, from aircraft carriers to Ellis Island. Or they placed him against Orwellian backdrops shrieking "Plan for Victory." But this time even the audio stuttered, as if in solidarity with Baghdad's continuing electricity blackout, and the Oval Office was ditched, lest it summon up memories of all those past presidential sightings of light at the end of the Iraqi tunnel. Mr. Bush was banished to the White House library, where the backdrop was acres of books, to signify the studiousness of his rethinking of the "way forward."

"I'm not going to be rushed," the president said a month ago when talking about his many policy consultations. He wasn't kidding. His ostentatious deep thinking started after Election Day, once he realized that firing Donald Rumsfeld wouldn't be enough to co-opt the Iraq Study Group. He was thinking so hard that he abandoned his initial plan to announce a strategy before Christmas .

The war, however, refused to take a timeout for the holiday festivities in Crawford. The American death toll in Iraq, which hovered around 2,840 on Election Day, was nearing 3,020 by Wednesday night.

And these additional lives were sacrificed to what end? All the reviews and thinking and postponing produced a policy that, as a former top Bush aide summed it up for The Daily News, is nothing more than "repackaged stay-the-course dressed up to make it look more palatable." The repackaging was half-hearted as well. Not for nothing did the "way forward," a rubric the president used at least 27 times in December, end up on the cutting-room floor. The tossing of new American troops into Baghdad, a ploy that backfired in Operation Together Forward last year, is too transparently the way backward.

"Victory" also received short shrift, downsized by the president to the paltry goal of getting "closer to success." The "benchmarks" he cited were so vague that they'd be a disgrace to No Child Left Behind. And no wonder: in November, Mr. Bush couldn't even get our devoted ally, Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki, to show up for dinner at their summit in Amman, let alone induce him to root out Shiite militias. The most muscle the former Mr. Bring-'Em-On could muster in Wednesday's speech was this: "If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people." Since that support vanished long ago, it's hard to imagine an emptier threat or a more naked confession of American impotence, all the more pathetic in a speech rattling sabers against Syria and Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0116678

Mr. Bush's own support from the American people is not coming back. His "new" Iraq policy is also in defiance of Iraqi public opinion , the Joint Chiefs, the Baker-Hamilton grandees, and Mr. Maliki, who six weeks ago asked for a lower American profile in Iraq. Which leaves you wondering exactly who is still in the bunker with the president besides the first lady and Barney.

It's a very short list led by John McCain, Joe Lieberman, and neo-conservative dead-enders like William Kristol and Frederick Kagan, who congregate at The Weekly Standard and the American Enterprise Institute, the Washington think tank. The one notable new recruit is Rudy Giuliani, who likened taming Baghdad to "reducing crime in New York" without noticing that even after the escalation there will be fewer American troops patrolling Baghdad than uniformed police officers in insurgency-free New York City.

Mr. Kagan, a military historian, was sent by the White House to sell its policy to Senate Republicans. It was he, Mr. Kristol and the retired Gen. Jack Keane who have most prominently pushed for this escalation and who published studies and editorials credited with defining it. Given that these unelected hawks are some of the same great thinkers who promoted the Iraq fiasco in the first place, it is hard to imagine why this White House continues to listen to them. Or maybe not that hard. In a typical op-ed article, headlined "Stay the Course, Mr. President!," Mr. Kagan wrote in The Los Angeles Times in 2005: "Despite what you may have read, the military situation in Iraq today is positive."

Yet Mr. Bush doesn't even have the courage of his own disastrous convictions: he's not properly executing the policy these guys sold him. In The Washington Post on Dec. 27, Mr. Kagan and General Keane wrote that escalation could only succeed "with a surge of at least 30,000 combat troops" — a figure that has also been cited by Mr. McCain. (Mr. Kagan put the figure at 50,000 to 80,000 in a Weekly Standard article three weeks earlier. Whatever.) By any of these neocons' standards, the Bush escalation of some 20,000 is too little, not to mention way too late.

The discrepancy between the policy that Mr. Bush nominally endorses and the one he actually ordered up crystallizes the cynicism of this entire war. If you really believe, as the president continues to put it, that Iraq is the central front in "the decisive ideological struggle of our time," then you should be in favor of having many more troops than we've ever had in Iraq. As T. X. Hammes, an insurgency expert and a former marine, told USA Today, that doesn't now mean a "dribble" (as he ridicules the "surge") but a total of 300,000 armed coalition forces over a minimum of four years.

But that would mean asking Americans for sacrifice, not giving us tax cuts. Mr. Bush has never asked for sacrifice and still doesn't. If his words sound like bargain-basement Churchill, his actions have been cheaper still. The president's resolutely undermanned war plan indicated from Day 1 that he knew in his heart of hearts that Iraq was not the central front in the war against 9/11 jihadism he had claimed it to be, only the reckless detour that it actually was. Yet the war's cheerleaders, neocon and otherwise, disingenuously blamed our low troop strength almost exclusively on Mr. Rumsfeld.

Now that the defense secretary is gone, what are they to do? For whatever reason, you did not hear Mr. Kagan, General Keane or Mr. McCain speak out against Mr. Bush's plan even though it's insufficient by their own reckoning — just a repackaged continuance of the same "Whac-A-Mole" half-measures that Mr. McCain has long deplored. Surely the senator knows that, as his loosey-goosey endorsement attests. (On Friday, he called the Bush plan "the best chance of success" while simultaneously going on record that "a small, short surge would be the worst of all worlds.")

The question now is how to minimize the damage before countless more Americans and Iraqis are slaughtered to serve the president's endgame of passing his defeat on to the next president. The Democrats can have all the hearings they want, but they are unlikely to take draconian action (cutting off funding) that would make them, rather than Mr. Bush, politically vulnerable to blame for losing Iraq.

I have long felt that it will be up to Mr. Bush's own party to ring down the curtain on his failed policy, and after the 2006 midterms, that is more true than ever. The lame-duck president, having lost both houses of Congress and at least one war (Afghanistan awaits), has nothing left to lose. That is far from true of his party.

DOJ_NMG_0116679

Even conservatives like

Sam Brownback of Kansas and

Norm Coleman of Minnesota started backing away from Iraq last week. Mr. Brownback is running for president in 2008, and Mr. Coleman faces a tough re-election fight. But Republicans not in direct electoral jeopardy (George Voinovich of Ohio, Lisa Murkowski of Alaska) are also starting to waver. It's another Vietnam-Watergate era flashback. It wasn't Democrats or the press that forced Richard Nixon's abdication in 1974; it was dwindling Republican support. Though he had vowed to fight his way through a Senate trial, Nixon folded once he lost the patriarchal leader of his party's right wing.

That leader was Barry Goldwater , who had been one of Nixon's most loyal and aggressive defenders until he finally realized he'd been lied to once too often. If John McCain won't play the role his Arizona predecessor once did, we must hope that John Warner or some patriot like him will, for the good of the country, answer the call of conscience. A dangerous president must be saved from himself, so that the American kids he's about to hurl into the hell of Baghdad can be saved along with him.

Stumbling Around The World (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

With Iraq sliding off a cliff, and now tugging another 20,000 young Americans along as well, it's worth wrestling with a larger question: Why are we so awful at foreign policy?

Shirin Ebadi, the Iranian lawyer who won the Nobel Peace Prize, dropped by the other day, and she made the same point with characteristic bluntness. "It amazes me that the U.S., with all its scientific accomplishments, is so shortsighted in its foreign policy," she noted.

It is pathetic. We can go safely to the moon but not to Anbar Province. We can peer into the farthest reaches of the universe, but we fail to notice (until it's too late) that many Iraqis loathe us. We produce movies that delight audiences all over the world, but we can't devise a foreign policy that anybody likes.

And it's not just right-wing Republicans who are the problem. President Bush has been particularly myopic, but Democrats mired us in Vietnam: shortsightedness is a bipartisan tradition in foreign policy. Historically, we are often our own worst enemy.

Iraq is the example of the moment. We invaded, thinking that we would get a pro-American bulwark, cheap oil, long-term military bases and the gratitude of liberated Iraqis. Instead, we fought Iraq, and Iran won.

Speaking of which, look at Iran. In 1953, we helped overthrow the democratically elected prime minister, Mohammed Mossadegh, to achieve a more pro-Western government. That created tensions that led to the Iranian revolution of 1979 and the rise of mullahs with nuclear dreams. If it weren't for our own policies, Iran might well now have a pro-American government.

So why do we act so often against our own long-term interests? There are at least two reasons.

The first is that great powers always lumber about, stepping on toes, provoking resentments, and solving problems militarily simply because they have that capability. One of the great passages of Thucydides records how some 2,400 years ago Athens decided to wipe out the city of Melos because it could.

Likewise, in 1955, when Britain was the dominant player in the Middle East, it formed the Baghdad Pact, a military arrangement intended to protect British interests in the Middle East. Instead, the arrangement inflamed Arab nationalists, strengthened anti-British feeling and contributed to the fall of the Iraqi monarchy in 1958 — and, eventually, to the rise of Saddam.

The second reason is particular to the U.S.: We don't understand the world. The U.S. may owe its existence to prickly nationalist troublemakers like Sam Adams, but (partly because relatively few Americans have lived abroad) we are obtuse about the appeal of prickly nationalist troublemakers elsewhere. Like George III, we empower our enemies.

So what does all this have to do with the price of tea in Baghdad?

Once again the White House is seeking military solutions that are likely to rebound and hurt us. Sending more young Americans into that maelstrom may well have three consequences: inflaming Iraqi nationalism, bolstering Shiite and Sunni extremists alike, and killing more young Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0116680

A U.S. military study in 1999, recently declassified and in the National Security Archive, concluded that even 400,000 American troops might not be able to stabilize a post-Saddam Iraq. The study emphasized the importance of diplomacy to engage Iraq's neighbors.

But President Bush is moving in the opposite direction. Most worrying, he is hinting at engaging Syria and Iran not diplomatically but militarily. We are careering down a road that may ultimately lead to military strikes on Iran — a disaster.

What would a better strategy look like? A good bit like the one advocated by the Iraq Study Group. It would emphasize engaging neighbors, a big push for political compromises within Iraq, steps toward troop withdrawals and an intensive effort to achieve an Israeli-Palestinian peace. (Condi Rice is planning this last effort.)

Would this strategy work in Iraq? No one knows. But such a bipartisan plan might at least bring a bit of healing to the U.S.

Meanwhile, history comes around in other ways. The Rev. Bob Edgar, the general secretary of the National Council of Churches, recalls that as a young congressman in April 1975, he encountered a similar presidential request for a surge of troops. It was a demand by President Gerald Ford for more U.S. forces to stabilize Saigon.

A White House photo captures Ford conferring with two of the architects of that request: senior administration officials named Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld.

In Baghdad, A Test Of The Petraeus Principles (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, the soldier-intellectual chosen by President Bush to provide new leadership in the war in Iraq, got one thing he needed from the president Wednesday night. But what was missing will ultimately be more important than what was provided.

Petraeus, who holds a doctorate from Princeton, is often described as the smartest and most ambitious member of the class of generals and admirals available to Bush. He has been given a rare opportunity to put the theories he has developed as a man of ideas into battlefield practice as a man of action.

Shortly before Bush appointed him to command the multinational forces in Iraq, Petraeus finished assembling a new counterinsurgency training manual for U.S. forces. The manual's opening sections emphasize the importance of political will in avoiding defeat in unconventional warfare:

"Constant reaffirmations of commitment, backed by deeds, can overcome" the perceptions of insurgents and local populations that "a few casualties or a few years will cause the United States to abandon a counterinsurgency effort," the manual states in a passage that could have been the basis for most of Bush's explanation to the nation of a new Iraq strategy. Bush provided the rhetoric of commitment to the struggle that Petraeus says is essential.

But the all-important Iraqi political context for the measured escalation in U.S. forces that Bush outlined remains murky and undeveloped. It falls to Petraeus more than any other individual to fill in the blanks left by Bush.

It is not clear whether Bush is counting on Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's ineffective and corrupt government to pull itself together suddenly and counter the bloody anarchy gripping Baghdad, as most of the president's words were designed to suggest, or if the president in fact expects American forces to take greater control over Iraqi units and their combat operations, as his actions indicate.

The surge of five brigades into Baghdad is supposed to enable U.S. troops to embed themselves in Iraqi units and to be posted overnight or longer in the capital's most violent neighborhoods. This necessarily undercuts Iraqi commanders and turns the emphasis away from the training of new Iraqi units. Bush mentioned training Iraqis as a primary U.S. mission late and glancingly in his speech.

The appointment of Petraeus is another indication of Bush's willingness to go on the offensive and his dissatisfaction with the cautious, bureaucratic approach taken to the Iraqi campaign by Gen. John Abizaid, who is departing as head of Central Command. Abizaid's repeated protestations to Bush and his national security team that military means could provide only 20 percent of what was needed to make Iraq secure wore thin in White House meetings, officials who were there have told me.

DOJ_NMG_0116681

Petraeus, in contrast, highlights the responsibilities of the military in his counterinsurgency blueprint. The manual cogently argues that Western militaries "falsely believe that armies trained to win large conventional wars are automatically prepared to win small, unconventional ones. . . . The military forces that successfully defeat insurgencies are usually those able to overcome their institutional inclination to wage conventional war against insurgents."

Petraeus's determination to take charge of any situation in which he finds himself is a widely noticed characteristic. When he commanded the 101st Airborne Division in the northern Iraqi city of Mosul in 2003, he turned even a routine briefing for visiting officials and journalists into an all-encompassing, riveting overview of how military commanders had to work continually at winning hearts and minds.

But his refusal to cede any authority over Mosul to the region's Kurdish majority or to prepare the way for a new political order there alienated one of Iraq's three major population groups. That experience will reinforce the suspicions among some Iraqis that the surge of new troops under his command is intended to reassert U.S. combat control, at least temporarily.

That may not be a bad thing if there is a strong follow-up to provide a new political context for Iraq and the region. But a conceptual flaw that runs through both Bush's speech and the counterinsurgency manual assembled by Petraeus will make that transition difficult if it is not corrected.

These two documents fail to give sufficient weight to the fact that all insurgency is local, to paraphrase Tip O'Neill's famous dictum about American politics. The Petraeus document does note the need to address "local grievances" and the new precision tools of insurgency, such as suicide attacks. But the strategy Petraeus then lays out echoes many of the counterinsurgency practices formulated in the unsuccessful campaigns of Algeria, Vietnam and elsewhere. In all likelihood, David Petraeus's work to design a successful counterinsurgency has only just begun, and against big odds.

Bush's Hail-Mary Pass (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

During the battle of the Marne in September 1914, France's Marshal Foch declared: "My center is giving way, my right is retreating, situation excellent, I am attacking." His brio is remembered because his tactic worked: It prevented a rout that might have swiftly ended what might not today be known as World War I. But, then, we cannot know that.

The president's Wednesday evening address was without Fochian panache. He surely knows that he cannot know how his new policy will unfold, any more than his critics can have reasonable confidence in the consequences of their alternative policy.

The president is probably wrong in thinking that 17,500 more U.S. troops can clear Baghdad until Iraqi forces can hold it. And he probably is wrong in thinking that economic pump-priming and jobs programs, which are usually disappointing when tried in America, can succeed amid Iraq's anarchy. Besides, Shiites are not torturing Sunnis with electric drills and Sunnis are not beheading Shiites because both sides are suffering the ennui of the unemployed. For Iraqis, ennui is a utopian aspiration.

But the president is right in framing his new policy as a ukase to Iraq's government: We are buying you time, and not much of it, for you to dash to competence concerning security matters. Bush's policy probably will not succeed, but at least we will know what were the parameters of the possible, given the government produced by those Iraqi elections that once were the source of so much U.S. confidence.

The president's gamble is not a larger one than Democrats are making with what they are adopting as a party position. They are right that the "surge" probably will not pull Iraq back from the abyss. But they are wrong to think that their policy is more than a variant of the president's policy: shock treatment for Iraq's government, which is threatened with what, on Thursday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice icily called, with studied vagueness, "the consequences now of nonperformance."

All sides recognize that the status quo in Iraq is untenable. Therefore those -- almost all Democrats and a growing minority of Republicans -- who hope to block the "surge" are really for setting in motion a swift and irreversible process of U.S. withdrawal, in the hope that it will galvanize Iraq's government to military and policy capabilities that U.S. training and subsidies have so far been unable to produce. And if not, Iraq and the region probably will become a cauldron of conflicts with genocidal stakes for the sectarian groups involved.

DOJ_NMG_0116682

Both the president's speech, and the Democrats' response to it, delivered by Illinois Sen. Dick Durbin, contained passages that bordered on the bizarre. The president said, "If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people." But that support was long since forfeited. Durbin called upon Iraq's government to "disband" the militias and death squads. Not destroy, but "disband." How is that supposed to happen? By asking them nicely? "Disband, please, and on the way home, if you see a Sunni (Shiite), give him a hug." The great question is whether Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki will cooperate with crushing the Mahdi Army, which is the instrument of his patron, Moqtada al-Sadr.

Twenty years ago, Ken Livingstone, the (very left-wing) mayor of London, wrote a book titled "If Voting Changed Anything They'd Abolish It." But America's November voting produced Wednesday's change in Iraq policy. Voters did not, however, intend to bring on what is coming: Chechnya in their living rooms -- a spike of high-intensity, high-casualty urban warfare, televised.

Bush and his thoughtful critics, ostensibly at daggers drawn, are actually in agreement on three points. First, the failed policy of the past three years is both militarily and politically unsustainable. Second, any substantial departure from that policy must involve a leap into the dark -- a bet on the future about which no reasonable person can be confident. Third, the nation embarked Wednesday night upon the beginning of the end of U.S. suzerainty in Iraq, where, Maliki has said, with more bravado than plausibility, that by June -- about when the full surge probably will reach Iraq -- his government will be able to handle its security challenges.

Foch's 1914 bravado helped produce the "miracle of the Marne," which was followed by four years of carnage which destroyed empires, including the Ottoman Empire, a shard of which became Iraq. Today, in Iraq, the president's policy -- and that of his critics -- is to hope for a miracle.

The Big Gambit In Iraq (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

With his new Iraq policy, President Bush essentially has written off any prospect of regaining broad support at home for his course of action, in the slender hope of finding the key to military success and political agreements in Baghdad.

It is a huge personal gamble, one that has triggered a debate that may well dominate the final two years of Bush's tenure.

Interestingly, Bush and his critics start from the same premise: The ultimate solution in Iraq is political, not military. In his address Wednesday night, Bush said, "Only Iraqis can end the sectarian violence and secure their people."

That will require concrete steps toward national unification with the Sunni minority and the Kurds that the Shiite-dominated government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has balked at for the past year.

And Bush and his critics share a second premise: that government must be nudged into action -- or Iraq is lost.

The Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan panel headed by James A. Baker III and Lee Hamilton, argued that the most effective signal to Maliki and his associates would be to announce plans for a phased withdrawal of American troops in the first quarter of next year. That policy would have commanded strong support in the Congress elected in November and, if polls are correct, among the American people.

Bush chose another course, arguing that any early pullout or loss of American assistance would lead to "a collapse of the Iraqi government, tear the country apart and result in mass killings on an unimaginable scale."

That does not say much about the viability of that government, but there is certainly a measurable risk that Bush may be right about the consequences.

In any case, he has chosen to send Maliki a very different signal -- more troops under looser terms of engagement, ready to support Iraqi forces in an effort to purge Baghdad of rival Sunni and Shiite militias.

In doing this, Bush has adopted the view of John McCain, Joe Lieberman and the neocons, namely, "The most urgent priority for success in Iraq is security, especially in Baghdad."

But he has claimed to be dealing with the political problem at the same time -- by informing Maliki that "America's commitment is not open-ended" and by reiterating the now-familiar set of steps needed for political progress -- division of oil revenue, constitutional reform, provincial elections and a reversal of de-Baathification-- that the Maliki government has long resisted.

DOJ_NMG_0116683

Bush said that he has Maliki's word that all this will happen -- and that there will be an end to the unspoken policy of targeting Sunnis while protecting Shiite militias. When I asked a National Security Council official why the promise should be taken seriously, after so many disappointments in the past year, he said that the prime minister faces not just external pressure from the United States but also the urgings of "other moderate elements" in his own coalition who are weary of the fighting.

A skeptic would say that Bush has sacrificed the support of moderates at home -- the Republican as well as Democratic lawmakers voicing skepticism about his plan -- for some supposed "moderates" in Baghdad.

For this gamble to work, a lot of implausible things have to happen. Maliki's governing coalition, which includes the party of Moqtada al-Sadr, will have to steel itself to send troops into the neighborhoods controlled by Sadr's own Mahdi Army. Defense Secretary Robert Gates says this will happen, but the promise remains to be tested.

Also unproved is the capacity of the Iraqi army and police force, which are supposed to be "in the lead," with American troops in support, in clearing out Baghdad. The army was disbanded in a reckless decision soon after the fall of Saddam Hussein, and it is only now being slowly rebuilt. The police force is notoriously overrun with sectarian militias.

When Bush draws a picture of Iraqi army and police brigades going "door-to-door to gain the trust of Baghdad residents," he has to hope that those cops aren't regarded as assassins disguised in uniform when they go into Sunni neighborhoods.

And then there are those politicians in Baghdad -- the ones Bush is gambling can find consensus in a country that has known national unity only under a dictator.

Everyone acknowledges that there is no risk-free way of solving the mess in Iraq. Bush has chosen a way that guarantees what was forecast here just a month ago: "a foreign policy and national security debate as consequential as any this nation and its allies have faced since the start of World War II."

Trapped By Hubris, Again (WP)

By Robert G. Kaiser

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

After nearly four years of ineffectual war-fighting, after the collapse of domestic support for President Bush and his policies, after the expenditure of thousands of lives and hundreds of billions of dollars, it no longer seems possible to avoid the grim conclusion: For the United States, Iraq has become another Vietnam.

Fortunately, the overall death toll in Iraq so far, while high, is still smaller than it was in Vietnam. But tragically, the most important difference between the two conflicts may be that defeat in Iraq is likely to produce catastrophic consequences for that nation, its neighbors and the United States, too.

For a gray-haired journalist whose career included 18 months covering the Vietnam War for The Washington Post, it is a source of amazement to realize that my country has done this again. We twice took a huge risk in the hope that we could predict and dominate events in a nation whose history we did not know, whose language few of us spoke, whose rivalries we didn't understand, whose expectations for life, politics and economics were all foreign to many Americans.

Both times, we put our fate in the hands of local politicians who would not follow U.S. orders, who did not see their country's fate the way we did, and who could not muster the support of enough of their countrymen to produce the outcome Washington wanted. In Vietnam as in Iraq, U.S. military power alone proved unable to achieve the desired political objectives.

How did this happen again? After all, we're Americans -- practical, common-sense people who know how to get things done. Or so we'd like to think. In truth, we are ethnocentric to a fault, certain of our own superiority, convinced that others see us as we do, blithely indifferent to cultural, religious, political and historical realities far different from our own. These failings -- more than any tactical or strategic errors -- help explain the U.S. catastrophes in Vietnam and Iraq.

Future historians trying to understand how the U.S. adventure in Iraq went so badly off track will be grateful for the memorandum that national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley wrote to Bush on Nov. 8, 2006, after a visit to Iraq. The "secret" memo was leaked to the New York Times three weeks later.

Hadley began with a candid evaluation of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki: "The reality on the streets of Baghdad suggests Maliki is either ignorant of what is going on, misrepresenting his intentions, or that his capabilities are not yet sufficient to turn his good intentions into action."

DOJ_NMG_0116684

Having been frank about the problem, Hadley then entered a dream world to discuss ways in which it might be solved. He offered his boss an elaborate set of initiatives that should be urged on the hapless Maliki. The first one gives a good flavor of the Hadley plan for success: "Maliki should compel his ministers to take small steps -- such as providing health services and opening bank branches in Sunni neighborhoods -- to demonstrate that his government serves all ethnic communities." Others included compelling Maliki to overhaul his personal staff to make it ethnically diverse, shake up his cabinet and bring in competent technocrats, and insist that all ministers renounce violence in all forms.

How would Bush carry out Hadley's correctives? "We can help [him] in a variety of ways," Hadley wrote. If Maliki thinks he isn't in a position to follow all of the Americans' good advice, "we will need to work with him to augment his capabilities." Among the steps Hadley proposed:

"Actively support Maliki in helping him develop an alternative political base. We would likely need to use our own political capital to press moderates to align themselves with Maliki's new political bloc. . . . Consider monetary support to moderate groups that have been seeking to break with larger, more sectarian parties, as well as to support Maliki himself. . . . Provide Maliki with more resources to help build a nonsectarian national movement."

In other words, the national security adviser told the president 42 months after this disastrous war began that we can still fix it. A few well-placed bribes plus Yankee ingenuity -- pulling this lever, pushing that button -- can make things turn out the way we want them to. There you see the peculiar strain of hubris that led the United States astray four years ago in Iraq, and four decades ago in Vietnam.

Indeed, Hadley's memo is squarely in the tradition of the sublimely arrogant know-it-alls whom journalist David Halberstam memorably dubbed "The Best and the Brightest." These were the men around John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson who, along with Kennedy and Johnson, gave us the Vietnam War: Robert S. McNamara, McGeorge Bundy, Dean Rusk, Walt W. Rostow and the rest. They, too, allowed themselves to believe that the shrewd application of U.S. power -- pulling a lever here, pushing a button there -- could create and prop up an independent, democratic South Vietnam. This was something that had never existed previously -- in that sense, something sadly akin to a multiethnic, democratic Iraq.

Yet in his speech to the nation Wednesday night announcing changes in Iraq policy, the president embraced many of Hadley's proposals. He has extracted promises from Maliki to crack down on Shiite militias and has pushed the prime minister to broaden his cabinet. Bush also took Hadley's advice to increase the number of U.S. troops operating in Baghdad, and to broaden the program that embeds Americans with Iraqi units.

Last week, Bush seemed to threaten Maliki as well: "If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people -- and it will lose the support of the Iraqi people," the president said. The United States has always been good at telling other nations what they have to do, and what will happen if they don't do it.

When things began to go wrong in Vietnam, we helped stage a coup against Ngo Dinh Diem, whom the United States had helped to install as president of South Vietnam. President Dwight D. Eisenhower had once called him Asia's "miracle man." Diem was dumped in 1963. Eight changes in leadership, all involving Washington in one way or another, ended with Nguyen Van Thieu's ascent to the presidency in 1967; Thieu then held on for eight years before being ousted nine days before North Vietnamese troops marched into Saigon. We never did find "the right guy" for Vietnam, to borrow Bush's recent description of Maliki, and there is scant evidence that the man who botched the execution of Saddam Hussein is really the right guy for Iraq, either.

We accomplished a great deal during the 14 years we were actively engaged in South Vietnam. We created an infrastructure for the country, built roads and schools and hospitals, trained hundreds of thousands of troops, figured out how to "pacify" the countryside. As long as U.S. military power was available to neutralize the fighting force of North Vietnam -- whose communist leaders were determined to expel the Americans and reunify their country -- South Vietnam could survive, even prosper.

But we could not create a government or an economy in South Vietnam that could survive without our generous help. When I was leaving Vietnam in August 1970, I wrote in these pages about how we had made the Vietnamese utterly dependent on us. At the time, the Nixon administration's policy was "Vietnamization" -- turning the war over to the South Vietnamese. But the South

DOJ_NMG_0116685

Vietnamese had not shown that they could cope without us. "Even if the policy succeeds," I wrote, "the United States may well be unable to redeem the lives, money and self esteem it invested in the war in Vietnam."

The Vietnamese communists had key advantages that the U.S. side couldn't match: a better army, more determined and more competent leaders, and a political legitimacy that they had earned by expelling the French colonizers. And they were fighting for a unified Vietnam.

Iraq is different. The "enemy" there is not a single group of Iraqis, but nearly all Iraqis, because Iraqis do not share a common definition of their state or a common agenda for its future. This disarray has been compounded by the presence of Islamic fanatics from countries that have seized the opportunity to go to Iraq to try to kill Americans. Polls and reporting by Post correspondents suggest that, overwhelmingly, Iraqis of all factions want U.S. forces to leave.

In the face of chaos, the United States has no reliable ally -- no legitimate political authority that crosses sectarian lines and attracts the loyalty of large numbers of Iraqis. Which Iraqis will risk their lives to promote Washington's idea of Iraq? The army and police defend sectarian, not national, interests, even when they are fighting the same people U.S. troops are fighting.

The Iraqis who would presumably have been most supportive of a modernizing and democratic Iraq -- the secular intelligentsia that thrived in Iraq until the Persian Gulf War -- is now dramatically depleted. Hundreds of thousands of these Iraqis have already fled to other countries, including many doctors, lawyers, academics and other trained professionals. The war has created a vacuum in the upper reaches of Iraqi society.

What's the lesson to be learned? Modesty. Before initiating a war of choice -- and Vietnam and Iraq both qualify -- define the goal with honesty and precision, then analyze what means will be needed to achieve it. Be certain you really understand the society you propose to transform. And never gamble that the political solution to such an adventure will somehow materialize after the military operation has begun. Without a plausible political plan and strong local support at the outset, military operations alone are unlikely to produce success.

Bush's latest initiatives -- like all his earlier ones -- will not produce the desired political result, because Americans cannot accomplish political objectives in Iraq. Americans are outsiders, occupiers, foreigners in every sense of the word. Only Iraq is have a chance of finding a political resolution for their divisions. So now we await the fate of this latest gamble like a high roller in Las Vegas watching a roulette ball in a spinning wheel. We have about as much control over the situation as the gambler has of that ball. The outcome is out of our hands, and it would be foolish to bet that we will like the way the conflict ends.

Robert G. Kaiser, an associate editor of The Post, covered the Vietnam War in 1969 and 1970.

The Best We Can Hope For (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

NOBODY will quibble with President Bush's line Wednesday night that in Iraq, "Victory will not look like the ones our fathers and grandfathers achieved; there will be no surrender ceremony on the deck of a battleship."

Of course, that calls to mind his victory landing on the deck of the carrier Abraham Lincoln off the coast of California in May 2003, which he followed with a speech declaring that, "in the battle of Iraq, the United States and our allies have prevailed."

But let's not digress. Mr. Bush has now scaled back his strategy for victory to a strategy for the best-we-can-hope-for. So, it must be asked, what exactly is the best we can hope for?

"In the best-case scenario, we'll be in Iraq for 15 or 20 years," said Stephen Biddle, author of "Military Power: Explaining Victory and Defeat in Modern Battle." He offers the example of the Balkans, where everyone seems to have forgotten about the United States troops who have been there for years, helping keep a peace brokered in Dayton, Ohio, in 1995.

Under the best result Mr. Biddle said he could imagine, the United States would cajole or force warring Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds to agree to the standard-cookbook negotiated ending to a civil war. There would be some kind of power-sharing deal among the key combatants, yielding an uneasy cease-fire that would have to be policed for a long time by outside peacekeepers, since no warring side would trust another.

Sounds like paradise, doesn't it? Except, Mr. Biddle said, "If I had to bet my house mortgage on a scenario, it wouldn't be on that one."

DOJ_NMG_0116686

Before we get to the outcome on which Mr. Biddle is willing to bet his piece of the American dream, we should, at least, examine the second, optimistic resolution that Iraq experts offer. This is the ending which, they said, President Bush should embrace with both arms — if he can get it.

Remember the Spanish Civil War? The best America can hope for, some experts said, would be for Iraq to turn into today's version of the Spanish Civil War.

For readers without immediate access to Wikipedia, the Spanish Civil War lasted three years, from 1936 to 1939, when the Nationalists, led by Francisco Franco, defeated the Loyalists of the Second Spanish Republic. The death toll was huge — estimates put it between 500,000 and one million. People in just about every European country were passionate about the fight: the Loyalists got weapons and volunteers from the Soviet Union, while the Nationalists received help from Italy, Germany and Portugal.

But, in the end, the Spanish Civil War stayed Spanish. The Europeans sent money and arms and even volunteers, but they didn't let the war engulf the continent. (Probably because the continent was busy getting engulfed in World War II, but let's not be too technical.)

The biggest worry in Iraq is not that Iraq will descend into a civil war — most experts say that is a done deal — but that an Iraqi civil war will not stay Iraqi. The fear is that a civil war will engulf the entire region, with Saudi Arabia and Jordan defending the Sunnis, Iran backing the Shiites, and Iraqi Kurds declaring their independence, a move sure to draw in Turkey, which has its own restive Kurdish population.

"There's a difference between the Saudis providing help and them actually sending in forces; there's a difference between everybody playing in the troubled waters of Iraq and actually allowing it to spread beyond Iraq's borders," said Gideon Rose, managing editor of Foreign Affairs magazine. "Given the alternative, the Spanish Civil War was better than World War I."

The Spanish Civil War script doesn't bode well for Iraq itself. The death toll would be enormous, and Iraqi Sunnis, who make up only about 20 percent of the population, would face particular hardship. But such a war wouldn't become World War III. The United States would eventually pull its troops out, the Iranians would finance the Shiites, and the Saudis would support the Sunnis, but neither neighbor would engage militarily itself.

America's image abroad would suffer a blow, but not a fatal one, and in the end, the United States would still be the sole world power. "That's the best we can expect," Mr. Rose said. "Disaster in Iraq, problems in the Middle East and a several-year period to recover the losses in American foreign policy."

Critics have been unstinting in their disapproval of Mr. Bush's plan to send more than 20,000 additional American troops, mostly to Baghdad, where they will embed with Iraqi brigades.

The idea is that the presence of the American troops will prevent the Iraqi soldiers, who are mostly Shiite, from slaughtering the minority Sunnis. Eventually, the thinking goes, the Sunni population in Baghdad will come to trust the Iraqi soldiers, and reconciliation will happen between Iraqi Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds.

The problem with Mr. Bush's plan, said Vali Nasr, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations, is that it doesn't provide enough American troops to do much more than stay the course, to use Mr. Bush's now-abandoned lexicon. The way Mr. Nasr sees it, 20,000 additional troops is too few to change the dynamic on the ground, but enough to escalate tensions further.

"The best we can hope for is pretty much the same thing we've had for the last year," said Mr. Nasr, author of "The Shia Revival: How Conflicts Within Islam Will Shape the Future." "More of the same for another two years, but keep in mind that it could potentially get much worse."

That worst-case scenario is pretty scary, Mr. Biddle said. In that picture, the United States would pull its troops out of Iraq, the civil war would accelerate, and the Shiites, financed by Iran, would conquer one Sunni village after another, driving the Sunnis over the borders and into refugee camps in Saudi Arabia and Jordan.

There would be a huge refugee crisis in the Sunni Arab countries, where a dispossessed, bitter and highly politicized refugee population would appeal to Saudi and Jordanian rulers to make a last stand for Sunnis in Iraq. But since it would have taken about 5 to 10 years to get to this point, guess who, by then, would have acquired a nuclear bomb?

Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0116687

"In the worst case, you could be looking at a couple of nuclear weapons dropped on major cities — Baghdad, Riyadh, Tehran," Mr. Biddle said.

That possibility makes the one that Mr. Biddle views as most likely seem almost palatable. Here it is:

"We get out, the civil war escalates," Mr. Biddle said. "It's funded by all sides but they don't send their own troops across the border. The war just bumps along for 5 or 10 years and everybody eventually gets so weary that diplomacy finally gets going, and there's a cease-fire, power-sharing deal. During that period, Iraqi oil output crashes, there's huge instability in the region and oil prices rise. And there's a humanitarian catastrophe in Iraq.

"That's not a very happy scenario," Mr. Biddle acknowledged. "But it beats the heck out of nuclear war in the Mideast."

We're Fighting Not To Lose (WP)

By Leslie H. Gelb, Richard K. Betts

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

Iraq is not Vietnam, yet history seems intent on harnessing them together. Three years ago this seemed an unlikely pairing; surely President Bush would not take the United States down the same trail as Lyndon B. Johnson. Yet even though Iraq's story is far from complete, each day raises the odds that the U.S. fate in Iraq could eventually be the same as it was in Vietnam -- defeat.

The differences are clear. The policy consensus over the Vietnam War ran deeper and lasted longer than on the Iraq conflict. While Johnson and his advisers slogged deeper into Vietnam with realistic pessimism, Bush and his colleagues plunged ahead in Iraq with reckless optimism. And in Vietnam, U.S. leaders made most of their mistakes with their eyes wide open, while it is impossible to fathom exactly what the Bush team thought it was doing after the fall of Baghdad.

Twenty-eight years ago, we wrote a book, "The Irony of Vietnam: The System Worked," which argued that although U.S. policy in that war was disastrous, the policymaking process performed just as it was designed to. It seems odd that a good system could produce awful results, but the subsequent declassified documents and the public record showed it to be true. U.S. officials generally had accurate assessments of the difficulties in Vietnam, and they looked hard at the alternatives of winning or getting out.

On Iraq the insider documents are not available, but journalistic accounts suggest that Bush's policy process was much less realistic. The president did not take seriously the obstacles to his goals, did not send a military force adequate to accomplish the tasks, failed to plan for occupation and took few steps to solve the underlying political conflicts among Iraqis.

Despite these different paths, Bush now faces Johnson's dilemma, that of a war in which defeat is unthinkable but victory unlikely. And Bush's policy shift last week suggests that he has come to the same conclusion as Johnson: Just do what you can not to lose and pass the problem on to your successor.

In both cases, despite talk of "victory," the overriding imperative became simply to avoid defeat.

How did these tragedies begin? Although hindsight makes many forget, the Vietnam War was backed by a consensus of almost all foreign-policy experts and a majority of U.S. voters. Until late in the game, opponents were on the political fringe. The consensus rested on the domino theory -- if South Vietnam fell to communism, other governments would topple. Most believed that communism was on the march and a worldwide Soviet-Chinese threat on the upswing.

The consensus on Iraq was shallower and shorter-lived. Bush may have been bent on regime change in Baghdad from the start, but in any case a consensus emerged among his advisers that Saddam Hussein was on the verge of securing nuclear weapons capability -- and that deterrence and containment would not suffice. That judgment came to be shared by most of the national security community. Congress also saluted early on. The vote to endorse the war was less impressive than the Gulf of Tonkin resolution, which passed almost unanimously, but many Democrats signed on to topple Hussein for fear of looking weak.

As soon as the war soured, the consensus crumbled. Without the vulnerability of middle-class youth to conscription, and with the political left in a state of collapse since Ronald Reagan's presidency, the antiwar movement on Iraq did not produce sustained mass protests as Vietnam did by the late 1960s. But the sentiment shows up just as clearly in the polls.

Consensus held longer over Vietnam because few in or out of the government had ever expected a quick and easy resolution of the war. Officials knew what they were up against -- the force of nationalism embodied by Ho Chi Minh, and a succession of corrupt, inefficient and illegitimate South Vietnamese governments. Officials usually put on a brave face, but they understood that Washington was in for the long haul. In the Bush administration, by contrast, a gap opened almost immediately between senior political leaders on one side, and most military and diplomatic professionals as well as the media on the other. The steady optimism of the former in the face of the reporting of the latter quickly undid public confidence in the Pentagon's and White House's leadership.

DOJ_NMG_0116688

By 1968, Johnson understood that victory was not in the cards at any reasonable price, but that defeat would be catastrophic. The war had reached a deteriorating stalemate. If victory were possible, it would require all-out use of military force against North Vietnam, a move that the administration believed ran the risk of war with the Soviet Union and China. If the United States were defeated, however, the dominos would fall, and one of those dominos would be the occupant of the White House. Periodically, top officials concluded that events in Vietnam had taken another turn for the worse, and to prevent defeat they had to dispatch more troops and do more bombing -- and so the steady escalation proceeded without lasting effect on the balance of power in Vietnam.

Constrained against achieving victory or accepting defeat, Johnson and his aides chose to do the minimum necessary to get through each crunch in Vietnam and at home, hoping that something would turn up to save them. In the end, Johnson made the ultimate political sacrifice and declined to run for reelection. But as he announced a halt of the bombing and the offer of negotiations with Hanoi, he also increased the number of U.S. troops in Vietnam. Even as he was leaving office, he had no intention of being "the first American president to lose a war."

By contrast, Bush never had to worry that escalation would bring an all-out global war; the United States is the world's sole superpower. Nonetheless, until last week, he never chose to increase the combat commitment significantly; the "surge" announced last week is but the latest experiment with a temporary increase in forces. At the beginning this was probably because he did not believe more troops were needed to win. As the venture went bad, the volunteer army was stretched too thin to provide an option for massive escalation. But now it is clear that Bush does not believe he can possibly win with anything close to the number of forces currently committed. The president certainly perceives the risks of losing, and at this moment of truth, he is repeating Johnson's decision pattern -- doing the minimum necessary not to lose.

Whatever the similarities in the way Washington dealt with Vietnam and Iraq, there were few similarities between the two wars themselves. Vietnam was both a nationalist war against outside powers -- first the French, then the Americans -- and a civil war. In Iraq, the lines of conflict are messier. The main contest is the sectarian battle between Arab Shiites and Arab Sunnis. The Kurds, so far, are mostly bystanders, while the Americans struggle to back a weak yet balky government they hope can remain a secular alternative.

Combat in Vietnam was a combination of insurgency and conventional warfare, and the conventional element played to U.S. strengths. By contrast, Washington's massive firepower advantages are nullified in Iraq because the fighting remains at the level of guerrilla warfare and terrorism. Iraq is harder for our military than Vietnam was, yet we eventually had 540,000 troops in Vietnam compared with barely a quarter of that number in Iraq. The current U.S. footprint in Iraq is much smaller -- only about one-tenth the density of U.S. and allied forces per square mile in South Vietnam at the height of U.S. involvement, and with an Iraqi population 50 percent larger than South Vietnam's. Consequently, the security situation was never as bad in Vietnam as it is in Iraq today. In Vietnam, Americans could travel most places day and night, while in Iraq it is dangerous to leave the Green Zone. Even Bush's planned 21,500-troop increase will not make a lasting difference if the host government does not become far more effective. As in Vietnam after the Tet Offensive of 1968, the enemy can lie low until we stand down.

In both countries, U.S. forces worked hard at training national armies. This job was probably done better in Vietnam, and the United States certainly provided South Vietnamese troops with relatively better equipment than they have given Iraqis so far. South Vietnamese forces were more reliable, more effective and far more numerous than current Iraqi forces are.

In both cases, however, the governments we were trying to help proved inadequate. Unlike their opponents, neither Saigon nor Baghdad gained the legitimacy to inspire their troops. At bottom, this was always the fundamental problem in both wars. Americans hoped that time would help, but leaders such as South Vietnam's Nguyen Van Thieu and Iraq's Nouri al-Maliki were never up to the job.

Americans have not stopped arguing about Vietnam -- about whether the war could have been won if fought differently, or was an impossible task from the outset, or about who was to blame. Hawks claim that the United States could have won in Vietnam if the military had been allowed to fight without restraint. Supporters of the war in Iraq say that the United States could have prevented the resistance if it had been better prepared for occupation after the fall of Baghdad. Doves in both cases say that the objectives were never worth any appreciable price in blood and treasure.

DOJ_NMG_0116689

After Vietnam, recriminations over failure became a never-healed wound in American politics. Now Iraq is deepening that wound. With some luck, Washington may yet escape Baghdad more cleanly than it did in the swarms of helicopters fleeing Saigon in 1975. But even if the United States is that fortunate, the story of the parallel paths to disaster should be chiseled in stone -- if only to avoid yet another tragedy in a distant land, a few decades down the road.

Leslie H. Gelb, president emeritus of the Council on Foreign Relations, directed the Pentagon Papers Project. Richard K. Betts is director of Columbia University's Saltzman Institute of War and Peace Studies.

A Skeptic's Case For The Surge (WP)

By Michael O'Hanlon

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

President Bush's plan for a surge of American troops in Iraq has run into a brick wall of congressional opposition. Critics rightly argue that it may well be too little, way too late. But for a skeptical Congress and nation, it is still the right thing to try -- as long as we do not count on it succeeding and we start working on backup plans even as we grant Bush his request.

However mediocre its prospects, each main element of the president's plan has some logic behind it. On the military surge itself, critics of the administration's Iraq policy have consistently argued that the United States never deployed enough soldiers and Marines to Iraq. Now Bush has essentially conceded his critics' points. To be sure, adding 21,500 American troops (and having them conduct classic counterinsurgency operations) is not a huge change and may be too late.

But it would still be counterintuitive for the president's critics to prevent him from carrying out the very policy they have collectively recommended.

Similarly, the president wants to move in the right direction on economic reconstruction. For far too long his plans were focused almost exclusively on repairing and rebuilding large infrastructure. The president conceded in a speech in December 2005 that he had placed too much faith in this "Halliburton strategy," yet it has taken more than a year for him to make amends and focus a large part of his economic strategy on the mundane task of creating jobs. This type of policy is unlikely to create the strong and durable underpinnings of long-term Iraqi economic growth. But like FDR's job creation programs of the 1930s, it responds to the political needs of a nation under duress. And it is good security policy in a country where too many angry, disenfranchised, unemployed young men are joining insurgent groups and militias.

Finally, President Bush is rightly telegraphing to Iraqi leaders that they must reach compromises with each other -- on sharing oil revenue, on reining in militias, on allowing those former Baathists without blood on their hands to regain their opportunities to hold jobs in Iraq. He correctly argues that without progress on such matters, there will be no success in the mission and the American people will continue to lose faith in the effort. This stands in contrast to incorrect comments he made as recently as November, during his trip to Vietnam, when he argued that we could fail in Iraq only if we Americans lose our resolve.

In fact, we need a viable Iraqi partner with broad support across sectarian lines, and American policy must strive to help create that partner.

Rather than deny funding for Bush's initiatives, Congress should provide it now -- but only for fiscal 2007 (meaning through September). By that point, or even the August congressional recess, we should know if the surge is showing promise. If it does, Congress could consider continuing its support. If not, the moment will be right to force the president's hand and move to a backup plan.

In their testimony before Congress on Thursday, both Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert Gates acknowledged that within months we should be able to learn much about the Iraqi government's willingness to support this new effort. The plan requires more Iraqi troops and more Iraqi government acquiescence in their unfettered use. In addition, one of the main outside architects of the surge strategy, retired Army Gen. Jack Keane, told NPR on Thursday that if the president's plan works we should see an improvement in the security environment this year. Clearly these statements suggest that we should be able to evaluate the success of the strategy in short order.

DOJ_NMG_0116690

If Bush's plan does not work, what might our new policy be? Taking the Shiite-Kurdish side in Iraq's civil war (the "80 percent solution," as some call it) would probably guarantee the emergence of a sanctuary for al-Qaeda in the Sunni Arab region and, as such, is a bad idea. Similarly, trying to engineer a coup to create a benign autocracy in Iraq would be very difficult to achieve. As Bosnia expert Edward P. Joseph and I have recently argued, building on the ideas of Sen. Joe Biden and Leslie Gelb, something akin to a Bosnia model for Iraq would make more sense. Iraq would retain a loose confederal structure, a small national government and a mechanism for sharing oil revenue equally. But governance and security would be provided primarily by three autonomous regional governments.

Citizens would be given the chance to relocate to places where they felt safe, with the government and the coalition providing protection in the process as well as assistance with new housing and jobs.

If the surge fails, we will need a whole new paradigm for Iraq policy, and it is hardly too soon for Congress to start fleshing out our choices. But for now, Congress should also give the president the money and support that he requests.

The writer is a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution and co-author of "Hard Power: The New Politics of National Security."

The Mess We Left Behind (WP)

By John A. Graham

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

I was a civilian adviser in Vietnam, sent there by the State Department in early 1971 just as U.S. combat troops were starting to go home. I wasn't there to fight, but I soon learned that "noncombatant" didn't mean much in Hu?, the provincial capital 50 miles south of the demilitarized zone where I was posted. A week into my stay, a sniper's bullet whistled past my ear on the main highway. Joe Jackson, the burly major who was driving the Jeep, yelled at me to hold on and duck as he zigzagged to spoil the sniper's aim.

In 1971, the U.S. government did not issue weapons to civilian advisers in Vietnam, even to those of us in dangerous outposts. The reason was not principle, but public relations -- and here begin the lessons for America's war in Iraq.

Sometime in 1969, the White House, faced with unrelenting facts on the ground and under siege from the public, had quietly decided that the United States couldn't win in Vietnam. President Richard M. Nixon and national security adviser Henry A. Kissinger didn't put it that way, of course. The United States was a superpower and could not lose a war to a third-rate nation whose soldiers lived on rice and hid in holes in the ground. So the White House conceived an elaborate strategy to mask the U.S. defeat: Slowly withdraw combat troops over several years, while the remaining Americans would focus on training the South Vietnamese to fight on their own. We gave the South Vietnamese a series of performance ultimatums -- call them benchmarks -- that, if unmet, would trigger full U.S. withdrawal and shift blame to the South Vietnamese for the debacle that would follow. This "Vietnamization" strategy cost at least 10,000 more U.S. lives and countless more Vietnamese ones, plus billions of dollars. And it was rigged from the start.

All but Washington's wildest dreamers knew that the South Vietnamese could not meet our ultimatums -- especially our demand that they create a popular national state strong enough to control the rivalries that had long ripped the country apart. And more years of U.S. training could not possibly make a difference because the core missing element was not South Vietnamese combat or leadership skills -- it was belief in a nation worth fighting for.

To make the drama of Vietnamization work, the pullout had to be gradual and easily explained to the American public. The U.S. training force left behind had to be large enough to provide signs of our commitment on the 6 o'clock news. Pictures of unarmed advisers like me shaking hands with happy peasants would support the fallacy that Vietnamization was working.

The White House hoped that this strategy would keep the house of cards upright for at least a couple of years, providing what Kissinger infamously called a "decent interval" that could hide the U.S. defeat by declaring that the fate of South Vietnam was now the responsibility of the South Vietnamese. If they didn't want freedom badly enough to win, well, we had done our best.

DOJ_NMG_0116691

By June 1971, the 101st Airborne Division, stationed just outside Hu?, had all but stood down from active fighting. It had provided the security that allowed my training/advisory teams and me to continue building schools and roads and training local officials. Even as that protection ebbed, my teams were still expected to go into a countryside that was becoming more dangerous by the day. As the U.S. adviser to Hu?, I was an easy target anytime the Viet Cong might have wanted to take me out. I kept a case of grenades under my bed, slept with an M-16 propped against the bedstead and had a dubious army of four Vietnamese house guards who I hoped would at least fire a warning shot before running away.

On April 27, 1972, North Vietnamese forces swept south across the demilitarized zone, scattering the South Vietnamese army defenders in Quang Tri and pushing south toward Hu?. By early May, the battle line arced 15 miles north and 10 miles west of the city. To the east was the South China Sea and to the south, the road to Danang -- Hu?'s last ground link to the outside world.

More than 200,000 refugees poured into Hu?. Hungry people fought for scraps of garbage and looted homes and shops. Among the refugees were hundreds of deserters from the South Vietnamese divisions shattered in Quang Tri, still wearing uniforms and carrying M-16s. A mob of drunken soldiers torched the main market at Dong Ba. The city's firemen had long since fled, and black smoke hung in a pall over streets now jammed with terrified people and echoing with gunshots and shattering glass. There was nothing we could do but watch the shouting, shoving mass of people stream past us toward the Danang road.

No one knew it at the time, but the battle raging just north and west of Hu? that night -- May 2, 1972 -- was the turning point in the war. If the city fell, the road to Danang would be open to the North Vietnamese army. My three American colleagues in Hu? and I did not believe we would be pulled out in time if the city fell. We knew that any choppers sent to save us would be mobbed by Vietnamese desperate to escape. We're alive because U.S. carrier jets caught the advancing North Vietnamese at daybreak just short of the city walls and all but obliterated them.

For all this, there never really was a decent interval in Vietnam. The pictures on the evening news showed not happy peasants but terror and carnage as Vietnam collapsed.

The pictures from Iraq are no different. The overall strategy seems no different, either. What President Bush wants to do is Vietnamization in all but name. Its purpose is not to win an unwinnable war, but to provide political cover for a defeat, and eventually to blame the loss on the Iraqis.

A temporary surge of troops will make no difference -- except to the Americans and Iraqis who will be killed. Increased training also will make no difference. What the Iraqi military and police need is not just technical skill, but loyalty to a viable central government that is nowhere in sight.

The surge will be reversed. The military force left behind to protect the president's "provincial reconstruction teams" will be drawn down to a bare minimum, further increasing the dangers for the Americans who remain.

Our benchmarks won't be met. As the situation deteriorates, whatever remains of a central government in Baghdad will be even less willing or able to control centuries of sectarian hatreds. The civil war will spiral out of control, giving us the justification we need to get out, blaming the Iraqis for the mess we've left behind.

But the world will know whose mess it is.

John A. Graham, a former Foreign Service officer, served in Vietnam in 1971-72.

UN-weary, US Opts For Unilateral Moves Against Iran (AFP)

By Sylvie Lanteaume

AFP, January 14, 2007

Recent US operations against Iranian interests in Iraq appear to signal a shift by Washington towards unilateral action after growing frustated with slow-moving UN diplomacy.

"We have had a strategy toward Iran, I think, that has been evolving to deal with the serious problems that Iran is causing," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in remarks released Saturday by the State Department.

Rice, who arrived in Jerusalem Saturday at the start of a Middle East tour partly aimed at rallying Arab nations against Iran's influence, defended a US raid Thursday against an Iranian office in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0116692

US troops entered an Iranian office in Arbil and arrested five people suspected to be engaged in anti-US activities. Tehran condemned the operation.

Rice warned that similar actions would be undertaken. "We've done it a couple of times. We're going to keep doing it," she said aboard a plane heading to the Middle East.

In late December, the US military arrested two Iranian diplomats in Baghdad, then released them several hours later.

Faced with lawmakers' concerns in the Democratic-led Congress that Washington could launch a military intervention in Iran, the White House and the Pentagon have been trying to dispel fears and rumors of a conflict with Iran or Syria, after the announcement of a US military buildup in the Gulf.

President George W. Bush, in unveiling his new plan for Iraq, announced Wednesday the imminent deployment of Patriot anti-missile defense systems in the region to defend Washington's allies and support stability in the Middle East.

In addition, according to a senior US military official, Washington will send two aircraft carrier groups to the Gulf in the coming weeks.

US administration officials now describe Iran as the single greatest threat the United States faces in the Middle East.

Rice assured that the US was not giving up on diplomacy in dealing with Iran, particularly on the issue of its nuclear program that Washington suspects masks a weapons program. Iran insists it is for civilian energy production.

"The nuclear problem -- we're going to continue to leave the door open for diplomacy," Rice said in the State Department release.

"But frankly, the process that we went through to get this last (UN Security Council) resolution was -- even though I think the resolution itself is very good, the process was, I think, not really actually helpful because I think it exposed certain splits.

"Fortunately, we were able to bring it back together around an actual resolution," she said.

The US battled for months to overcome resistance from China and Russia to impose sanctions on Iran for its refusal to suspend uranium-enrichment activities.

A Security Council resolution finally was passed on December 23, but the sanctions imposed were far weaker than those sought by Washington.

The first sign that Washington would act alone came from the US Treasury, which has barred two Iranian banks since September and pressured global financial firms to break their ties with Iran.

"We're going to keep designating Iranian banks," Rice said en route to the region.

Rice: U.S. Aims To Curb Iran Aggression (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, January 14, 2007

U.S. raids that President Bush approved against Iranian targets in Iraq are part of broad efforts to confront Tehran's aggression, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Saturday.

"The United States is simply responding to Iranian activities that have been going on for a while now that threaten not just to destabilize the chance for Iraq to proceed to stability but also that endanger our forces," Rice said before meeting with Israel's foreign minister.

Bush approved the strategy several months ago, U.S. officials said, in response to what Washington claims is Iran's support for terrorists inside Iraq and the alleged funneling of bombs to anti-U.S. insurgents.

Echoing other Bush administration figures, Rice said the U.S. does not intend to cross the Iraq-Iran border to attack Iranians.

Five Iranians were detained by U.S.-led forces after a raid Thursday on an Iranian government liaison office in northern Iraq. The move further frayed relations between the two countries.

The United States accuses Iran of helping provide roadside bombs that have killed American troops in Iraq. Also, a bitter standoff already exists over Iran's nuclear program.

Rice told reporters that the Iranian office was not a diplomatic consulate, which would be protected by international treaty.

DOJ_NMG_0116693

The State Department said Friday that U.S.-led forces entered an Iranian building in Kurdish-controlled Irbil because information linked it to Revolutionary Guards and other Iranian elements engaging in violent activities in Iraq.

State Department spokesman Tom Casey said there was no truth to reports that Iran was carrying out legitimate diplomatic activity at the site.

But Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari, a Kurd, contended the Iranians were working in a liaison office that had government approval and was in the process of being approved as a consulate. In Iran, Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said the U.S. raid constituted an intervention in Iranian-Iraqi affairs.

Rice Says U.S. Will Defend Its Interest In The Persian Gulf (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel

McClatchy Newspapers, January 14, 2007

JERUSALEM - U.S. military moves in the Persian Gulf and raids against Iranian installations in Iraq are meant to demonstrate that the United States will defend its interests against an increasingly aggressive Iran, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Saturday.

Rice made her comments as she began a Middle East tour in which she will try to bolster moderate Arab leaders who increasingly are under threat from both Shiite and Sunni Muslim extremists.

The focus of her diplomacy this week shows how far the United States has been forced to change its aims in the region because the war in Iraq has turned out differently than planned.

President Bush, Rice and others predicted the Iraq invasion would spread democracy throughout the Arab world. Instead, Rice now appears to be playing defense against Iran's emboldened leaders.

Following a new policy laid down by President Bush, U.S. military forces this week detained Iranians in two raids in northern Iraq. Washington says it has evidence that Iranian agents are destabilizing Iraq by constructing a deadly class of roadside bombs and backing Shiite militias.

Bush, who issued fresh warnings to Iran in his Wednesday speech outlining his new Iraq plan, has also ordered a second U.S. aircraft carrier strike group to the Persian Gulf and dispatched Patriot anti-missile batteries to American allies in the Gulf.

Some senators have expressed alarm that the moves could represent a widening of U.S. war aims in the strategic Gulf region.

But Rice said the moves were merely a response to Iranian actions.

"The United States has long, historic interests in the Persian Gulf," Rice said at an appearance with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni. "We have always-president after president after president-sought to have a force posture that makes clear we can defend those interests."

Rice meets with Palestinian and Israeli leaders Sunday and Monday in an effort to lay the groundwork for progress in solving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

But she has played down the prospects of quick movement. She told reporters traveling aboard her airplane that, "I'm not coming with a proposal. I'm not coming with a plan" to present to the two sides.

At the appearance with Livni, Rice acknowledged "there are a lot of obstacles" to surmount.

But she said Bush is determined to make progress toward a Palestinian state before he leaves office in two years.

Livni, potentially a future Israeli prime minister, has floated a proposal to flesh out the characteristics of an eventual Palestinian state, in order to strengthen Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas.

Rice did not endorse the idea, but said she was open to considering "all the options."

Complicating Rice's diplomacy is the fact that both Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Abbas are politically weak.

The Bush administration is planning to spend $86 million to train and equip Abbas' security forces, to strengthen him in his power struggle with the militant group Hamas.

Aboard her plane, Rice also told reporters that the United States would not abandon Iraq even if Bush's latest plan fails.

"We're not pulling the plug on Iraq," she said. "I think we'll worry about making Plan A work for now. And obviously, if it doesn't, then you know, we're not going to say, oh my goodness, that didn't work, there's nothing that can be done."

DOJ_NMG_0116694

Detained Iranians Had Ties To Extremists (WT/AP)

By Lauren Frayer

The Washington Times/AP, January 14, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) -- Five Iranians arrested in northern Iraq last week were connected to an Iranian Revolutionary Guard faction that funds and arms insurgents in Iraq, the U.S. military said Sunday.

The five were detained by U.S.-led forces Thursday in a raid on an Iranian government liaison office in Irbil, a city in Kurdish-controlled northern Iraq 217 miles north of Baghdad.

"Preliminary results revealed the five detainees are connected to the Iranian Revolutionary Guard, Qods Force (IRGC-QF), an organization known for providing funds, weapons, improvised explosive device technology and training to extremist groups attempting to destabilize the government of Iraq and attack coalition forces," the U.S. military said in a statement.

"Qods" is the Arabic name for Jerusalem, and a frequent name for political or military factions across the Muslim world.

Tehran denied the five detained Iranians had been involved in financing and arming insurgents in Iraq.

"Their job was basically consular, official and in the framework of regulations," Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini said Sunday during his weekly media briefing. "What Americans express was incorrect and hyperbole against Iran in order to justify their acts."

Hosseini said the Iranian representative office where the five men worked was established in Irbil in 1992 to facilitate the visit of Kurdish businessmen and medical patients from Iraq to Iran.

"Then, both countries agreed to promote it to consular level," he said. "Agreement for formation of the Iranian consulate section was exchanged in the current (Iranian) year."

The United States accuses Iran of helping to provide roadside bombs that have killed American troops in Iraq, and a bitter standoff already exists between the two countries over Iran's nuclear program. Iran has rejected the allegations.

Hosseini accused the United States of resorting to "hostility and conflict toward neighbors of Iraq" because he said the country did not want to acknowledge it had failed to bring stability to Iraq.

"The United States should release all the five persons, prevent possible similar acts and compensate damages," Hosseini said.

Two days after the raid, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said President Bush approved the strategy of raiding Iranian targets in Iraq as part of a broad effort to confront Tehran.

One day before the Irbil raid, Bush delivered a speech outlining a new strategy for Iraq, in which he accused Iran and Syria of not doing enough to block terrorists from entering Iraq over their borders. He specifically blamed Iran for providing material support for attacks on American troops.

"We will disrupt the attacks on our forces," Bush said Wednesday. "We will interrupt the flow of support from Iran and Syria. And we will seek out and destroy the networks providing advanced weaponry and training to our enemies in Iraq."

The U.S. State Department has said American-led forces entered the Irbil facility because information linked it to Revolutionary Guards and other Iranian elements engaging in violent activities in Iraq.

U.S.-led troops would "continue to disrupt logistical support to extremists that originate from outside Iraq," the statement continued. "These initiatives are part of a broader plan including diplomatic efforts designed to support the Iraqi government, protect the Iraqi people, and seek assistance from neighboring nations."

There has been debate over whether the Irbil office where the men were arrested had diplomatic status, and would therefore be protected by international treaties.

Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari, a Kurd, described it as a liaison office that had government approval and was in the process of being approved as an Iranian consulate.

But the U.S. State Department has said no legitimate diplomatic activity was being carried out at the site, and Rice said the office was not a consulate.

"The facility in which the detention took place has been described by various Iraqi officials as an Iranian liaison office, but it did not enjoy the diplomatic status of a consulate according to Iraqi and U.S. officials," the U.S. statement said.

DOJ_NMG_0116695

Iran and the U.S. have had no diplomatic relations since 1979, when militants seized the U.S. Embassy in Tehran and kept 52 people hostage for 444 days.

Iran Demands Release Of Citizens (BBC)

BBC.com, January 14, 2007

Iran has demanded the immediate release of five of its citizens held in a US military raid in northern Iraq, who it says are diplomats.

The five men arrested on Thursday in Irbil are accused by the US military of having targeted Iraqi and US-led coalition forces.

But Iran's foreign ministry says they were "involved in consulate affairs".

Iran also demanded compensation for damage to the Iranian liaison office where the men were seized.

The US military says the men are agents of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards, a group whom the US says is seeking to destabilise Iraq by supplying weapons to insurgents.

The US said the Iranians did not have diplomatic papers.

'Incorrect claim'

"Their activities were legal and in the framework of the law," Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini said in response to the allegations.

"What the Americans claim is incorrect. They want to create a climate that justifies their illegal action," he said.

The raid followed a warning by President George W Bush on Wednesday that the US would take a tough stance towards Iran and Syria, whom he accused of destabilising Iraq.

Tehran vehemently denies the charges.

The Revolutionary Guards unit, known locally as the Pasdaran, is a parallel military force with its own army, air force and navy.

It was set up to enforce and defend the principles of the 1979 Islamic revolution and answers directly to Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

Gunboat Diplomacy: The Watch On The Gulf (NYT)

By John Kifner

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

THE United States Central Command stretches across some of the world's most volatile real estate from Kenya in the southwest through all of the Middle East to Kazakhstan in the northeast. It encompasses two active combat theaters: Afghanistan, which is landlocked, and Iraq, with a tiny uncontested shoreline.

In both, the main fighting is counterinsurgency, largely the task of light infantry like the Marines and the Army's 10th Mountain or 82nd and 101st Airborne Divisions. CentCom, as it is known, has always been run by a four-star general from the Army or Marines.

So why name a sailor — Adm. William J. Fallon — as CentCom's new commander, as President Bush did earlier this month?

One word: Iran.

Admiral Fallon's appointment comes amid a series of indications that the Bush administration is increasingly focused on putting pressure on Iran and, perhaps, veering toward open confrontation. They include the dispatching of a second Navy carrier battle group to the Persian Gulf; a blunt singling out of Iran in Mr. Bush's speech Wednesday night, warning that America will "seek out and destroy the networks providing advanced weaponry and training to our enemies in Iraq," followed by a dawn raid Thursday on an Iranian office in the Kurdish city of Erbil in which five Iranians were seized along with files and computers.

The important thing is that Admiral Fallon is a naval aviator.

Now the ranking officer in the Pacific — the Navy's traditional fief — his résumé includes 24 years of flight assignments beginning with combat in Vietnam and including commanding the air wing on the carrier Theodore Roosevelt in the first Iraq war.

DOJ_NMG_0116696

Iran thus far has been the principal beneficiary of the American enterprise in Iraq, exerting influence over the Shiite parties it nurtured in exile and expanding its own regional prestige. The Iranians' confidence and defiance have been bolstered by the knowledge that American ground forces are stretched near the breaking point in Iraq and Afghanistan.

But introducing more air and sea power, with their long reach, in the gulf could change the military balance and options.

It is classic gunboat diplomacy.

The American naval presence in the gulf is the Fifth Fleet, based in Manama, Bahrain. It usually numbers around 20 ships, capable of putting 15,000 sailors and marines afloat. Its principal component is a carrier battle group, so adding a second will, in effect, double its air and sea power.

A carrier battle group typically consists of a Nimitz-class carrier like the Eisenhower, a floating city so huge one can see the horizon rise and fall without feeling the swell of the sea, and capable of carrying as many as 85 aircraft, along with protective escorts. These usually include two guided missile cruisers, two destroyers, a frigate, two submarines and a supply ship. These smaller vessels could be used for other tasks, like escorting tankers through the narrow Strait of Hormuz, through which much of the world's oil passes, or enforcing sanctions or a blockade on Iran.

The Fifth Fleet also normally has a Marine landing force of 2,200, roughly equally divided between ground troops and air support, aboard three specialized ships that can be used in raids or other operations.

Will this cow the Iranians? Ray Takeyh, an Iran expert at the Council on Foreign Relations, thinks not. More likely, he said, is that "the more radical militants will use this to berate the more moderate" and "the notion of accommodating Western audiences will diminish."

Admiral's Diplomatic Skills Could Prove Crucial (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

When Adm. William J. Fallon -- the nominee to command U.S. forces in the Middle East -- was tasked with resuscitating military ties with China, he took on the challenge with characteristic gusto.

The veteran fighter pilot from New Jersey pushed beyond the standard banquets with Chinese generals to meet younger officers and tour military bases, eventually talking his way into the cockpit of an advanced Chinese FB-7 warplane.

An avid jogger, Fallon, 62, also bypassed conventional sightseeing, setting off for a run through Beijing that surprised his hosts and forced plainclothes agents in suits and leather shoes to tag-team to keep up.

Fallon's path-breaking pursuit of U.S. strategic goals -- shown over the past two years in his dealings with China, Japan, Indonesia and 40 other Asian states as head of the Pacific Command -- is a major factor behind his nomination to replace Gen. John P. Abizaid at the Central Command, Pentagon officials say.

"Fox Fallon is one of the best strategic thinkers in uniform today and his reputation for innovation is without peer," according to a statement this month from Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates recommending Fallon, whose Navy aviator call-sign "Silver Fox" stemmed from his prematurely gray hair.

As the United States sends more troops, warships and aircraft into the Middle East, Fallon would play a critical role diplomatically and militarily in trying to prevent the "regional conflagration" that Gates has warned could ignite if Iraq erupts into full-scale civil war -- and, in particular, to counter any aggression by Iran.

Fallon's selection as the first Navy officer to head the Central Command comes as the United States dispatches a second carrier, the USS John C. Stennis, to the Persian Gulf for the first time since 2003. Dispatching the carrier strike group, which joins the USS Dwight D. Eisenhower, "is an important way to demonstrate U.S. commitment and strength," a senior Pentagon official said last week.

Fallon, who flew F-14 jets in strike missions off the deck of a carrier during the 1991 Persian Gulf War, understands the long-standing role of the Navy in maintaining the flow of Middle Eastern oil through the Strait of Hormuz, officials said.

"Iran is the most powerful military force in the region" apart from the United States, and it has a navy capable of blocking the strait, Abizaid said in September. Iran also has a "substantial" missile force, an army that is training for guerrilla-style attacks, and a "robust terrorist surrogate arm," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0116697

Fallon's selection for a command traditionally headed by an Army or Marine Corps general makes sense militarily, Pentagon officials said, because most of the moving pieces in the region are ships and aircraft, in contrast to the troops engaged in Iraq and Afghanistan. Fallon is likely to focus less on ground-war tactics in Iraq than did Abizaid, who became commander in the immediate aftermath of the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, they said.

"He'll be flying at 30,000 feet, not launching company patrols by the Army," said Frances D. Cook, a former ambassador in the Persian Gulf region and a senior fellow at the Center for Naval Analyses who has worked with Fallon.

With a seasoned Army general in Baghdad, Fallon would focus more broadly on the region. "He's not going to be expected to give Dave Petraeus advice on how to do a sweep of Fallujah. He'll be focused on building relations in the region as he did in the Pacific," said retired Rear Adm. Stephen Pietropaoli, executive director of the Navy League. Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus has been named to replace Gen. George W. Casey Jr. as the top U.S. commander for Iraq in a planned turnover of military leaders in the region.

Indeed, with Gates calling a U.S. military confrontation with Iran a "last resort," analysts said that Fallon's diplomatic skills are likely to be more important than his war-fighting experience when he assumes the Central Command post, his fourth as a four-star commander. "With Iran and the Middle East, you need to establish relations that will not lead to combat. Fallon will be the first to tell you that," said Pietropaoli, who worked under Fallon when Fallon was vice chief of naval operations from 2000 to 2003.

"You are looking for an officer who can pull together the whole political, military and diplomatic mission. . . . He spent a lot of time working sensitive diplomatic issues," said retired Adm. Thomas Fargo, a former chief of the Pacific Command. Fargo and others recalled Fallon's high-profile apology to the families of Japanese who were killed when their vessel, Ehime Maru, was accidentally sunk by a Navy submarine in early 2001.

Confident but not imperious, Fallon combines a tough, unvarnished style with a light touch and a keen interest in other cultures, which makes him highly effective, current and former officials who know him say. "He doesn't wear his rank the way some people do," said Ambassador Derek Shearer, the former U.S. envoy to Finland who began working with Fallon in 1996 when Fallon commanded a battle group during NATO operations in Bosnia.

Fallon, a world history buff, told The Washington Post through a spokesman that he recently finished reading the book "No God but God," by Iranian author Reza Aslan, an advocate of ending religious conflicts between East and West. Fallon had served in the Middle East before, on a joint task force in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, and he recently traveled to Iraq to meet with some of the thousands of U.S. troops deployed there from the Pacific Command.

On Iraq, U.S. Turns To Onetime Dissenters (WP)

By Rajiv Chandrasekaran

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

Timothy M. Carney went to Baghdad in April 2003 to run Iraq's Ministry of Industry and Minerals. Unlike many of his compatriots in the Green Zone, the rangy, retired American ambassador wasn't fazed by chaos. He'd been in Saigon during the Tet Offensive, Phnom Penh as it was falling to the Khmer Rouge and Mogadishu in the throes of Somalia's civil war. Once he received his Halliburton-issued Chevrolet Suburban, he disregarded security edicts and drove around Baghdad without a military escort. His mission, as he put it, "was to listen to the Iraqis and work with them."

He left after two months, disgusted and disillusioned. The U.S. occupation administration in Iraq, the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA), placed ideology over pragmatism, he believed. His boss, viceroy L. Paul Bremer, refused to pay for repairs needed to reopen many looted state-owned factories, even though they had employed tens of thousands of Iraqis. Carney spent his days screening workers for ties to the Baath Party.

"Planning was bad," he wrote in his diary on May 8, "but implementation is worse."

When he returned to Washington, he made little secret of his views. They were so scathing that his wife lost a government contract. He figured his days of working on Iraq were over.

Until a phone call on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0116698

David Satterfield, the State Department's Iraq coordinator, was on the line with a question: Would Carney be willing to go back to Baghdad as the overall coordinator of the American reconstruction effort?

The decision to send Carney back to Iraq -- and to abandon the policies that so rankled him in 2003 -- represents a fundamental shift in the Bush administration's approach to stabilizing the country. Desperate for new approaches to stifle the persistent Sunni insurgency and Shiite death squads that are jointly pushing the country toward an all-out civil war, the White House made a striking about-face last week, embracing strategies and people it once opposed or cast aside.

Indeed, Carney's rushed selection came just days after the administration announced two other key Baghdad appointments from among the ranks of dissenters in 2003: Ambassador designate Ryan Crocker and Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who will take over command of all coalition forces in Iraq.

Crocker, who spent the summer of 2003 helping to form Iraq's Governing Council, left the country frustrated with the CPA's reluctance to reach out to minority Sunnis. Even before the invasion, he wrote a blunt memo for then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell warning of the uncontrolled sectarian and ethnic tensions that would be released by the overthrow of Saddam Hussein.

Petraeus, who spent 2003 commanding the 101st Airborne Division in Mosul, grew dismayed by the heavy-handed tactics fellow military commanders were using to combat insurgents. He also opposed the methods by which Bremer disbanded the Iraqi army and fired Baathists from government jobs. And he chafed at the way reconstruction funds, personnel and decision-making were centralized in Baghdad. The CPA's policies, he said in 2004, should have been "tempered by reality."

It's a view the White House now seems to accept.

The plan unveiled by Bush last week calls for many people who lost their jobs under Bremer's de-Baathification decree to be rehired. It calls for more Sunnis, who were marginalized under the CPA, to be brought into the government. It calls for state-owned factories to be reopened. It calls for more reconstruction personnel to be stationed outside the Green Zone. It calls for a counterinsurgency strategy that emphasizes providing security to the civilian population over transferring responsibility to local military forces.

Carney believes such measures could have been effective three years ago. Today, he worries they will be too little, too late.

During the phone call, Satterfield told him that the new reconstruction effort might not succeed. The two men agreed that if it was to have a chance, Americans would have to work more closely and collaboratively with Iraqis.

To Carney, it suggested "a sense of reality."

"It's certainly different than anything I saw out of the CPA or the aftermath of that," he said. "It seemed a little refreshing, actually."

He paused.

"It's been a long time coming."A Plan in Need of a Leader

Bush and his national security team began working on their new Iraq strategy in earnest shortly after the Nov. 7 midterm elections, which amounted to a rebuke of the president's war policy. They met among themselves. They talked to diplomats and military commanders in Iraq. They conducted a videoconference with Iraq's prime minister. They consulted with retired generals, experts at think tanks and academics.

By late December, the president and his closest security advisers -- Vice President Cheney, new Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley -- had coalesced around the need for more troops in Iraq. They had settled on Crocker to handle political strategy on the ground, replacing Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad. And they had picked Petraeus to take over from Gen. George W. Casey Jr., whom they deemed to be too focused on the handover of responsibility to the Iraqis instead of on restoring peace to Baghdad's strife-torn neighborhoods.

But it wasn't until Monday, when Bush was going over a draft of the address he planned to deliver on television Wednesday, that they confronted the issue of who would coordinate the administration's new economic initiatives for Iraq.

Bush was planning to propose increasing the number of province-level reconstruction teams operating outside the Green Zone from 10 to 18. There would be new efforts to help the Iraqi government improve budgeting and management functions. And, most important, there would be a significant new emphasis on putting unemployed Iraqis to work. The strategy also included an implicit reversal of Bremer's policy on state-owned factories.

DOJ_NMG_0116699

Scores of Americans ensconced in Baghdad's Green Zone would be involved: The U.S. Embassy has an economic section. There's a U.S. Agency for International Development mission. And there's the Project and Contracting Office, which manages reconstruction funded by an $18.4 billion U.S. aid package.

"Who's going to coordinate this?" Bush asked as he read through the economic initiatives, according to two people with knowledge of the meeting.

When Satterfield got back to his State Department office, he told his staff to "give me names."

The next day -- less than 36 hours before Bush addressed the nation -- Satterfield called Carney.Idle Factories, Idle Workers

Before Carney left Iraq in June 2003, he tried one last time to persuade Bremer to rethink his refusal to repair more than a handful of state-owned factories. Iraq's government-run businesses employed more than 100,000 people before the U.S. invasion. To Carney, it was a no-brainer: Fixing the factories would allow thousands of Iraqis to get back to work, not only allowing them to provide for their families, but also keeping them occupied. He knew from his time in other post-conflict societies that the idle and unemployed are the best recruits for insurgencies.

But Bremer and his chief economic adviser, Peter McPherson, didn't want to pour money into inefficient state-run firms. They believed private investors would buy Iraq's government factories and set up new businesses to employ the populace. So they refused to give Carney money to reopen the plants.

The day before he left, Carney sent a note to McPherson titled "Fatal Flaws in Budget Policy towards State-Owned Enterprises." He argued that the CPA was violating the Geneva Conventions by undermining "assets of the Iraqi people." He also accused McPherson of drawing up policy "without adequate Iraqi participation."

"Instead of transparency, with major concerned Iraqi Ministries and academics engaged," he wrote, "the policy seems to be the thinking of a small group in the Coalition Provisional Authority."

"We need to rethink this," he wrote in closing.

Petraeus also opposed the immediate privatization of state-run firms. "What happens when you have privatization is . . . you end up with a hell of a lot less workers in the short term," he told an interviewer in 2004. "If you want to increase unemployment en route to greater employment and greater productivity and greater a lot of other things, that's great, but you've got to survive in the short term."

For almost three years, the policy didn't change. Although the Iraqi government reopened a small fraction of its 148 factories and began operating them at a diminished capacity, the efforts to sell them to private investors were unsuccessful.

When Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, at the time the top U.S. field commander in Iraq, sought to increase production at a state-owned tractor factory south of Baghdad early last year, a State Department official in Baghdad refused to pay for the necessary repairs, even though the rehabilitated facility would have been able to provide employment for many of the 10,000 people who worked there before the invasion. Chiarelli used money from a different program -- for small-scale reconstruction projects -- to fund the construction.

It wasn't until June that the Bush administration began to reevaluate its approach. Paul A. Brinkley, who had recently taken over as deputy undersecretary of defense for business transformation, returned from a trip to Iraq convinced that quelling violence depended on increasing employment. To Brinkley, a former corporate executive, the most effective way to create jobs was to reopen state-run factories.

Brinkley persuaded Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England to authorize funding to repair as many as 200 factories. England's predecessor, Paul D. Wolfowitz, was among the administration officials who opposed resuscitating state-owned firms in 2003.

It's not clear how effective Brinkley's initiative will be. Many of the factories are in dangerous, Sunni-dominated areas of the country. Electricity remains in short supply. Raw materials can be hard to come by. And given the intensity of the sectarian conflict, giving Iraqis jobs may not be enough to get them to put down their weapons.

Even if the odds are slim, the Bush administration wants to give it a try. Brinkley's team is focusing on 10 factories that it thinks could be open and employing more than 11,000 Iraqis by the end of this month.

DOJ_NMG_0116700

"Any counterinsurgency strategy has to have an economic component to it," said Celeste Ward, who spent last year in Iraq as Chiarelli's political adviser. "It might give us a marginal increase in stability by getting some people off the street. You want people to start saying, 'Hey, we're a normal country where people go to work.' "De-Baathification

"This is a big mistake," Carney thought in May 2003, when Bremer told senior CPA officials that he would soon issue an edict prohibiting many former members of Hussein's Baath Party from holding government jobs. The one-and-a-half-page decree, which was drafted in the Pentagon office of then-Undersecretary of Defense Douglas J. Feith, banned anyone who had been in the party's top four ranks; it also banned hundreds of thousands of rank-and-file members from holding senior management positions in government ministries. Bremer's stated goal was to cleanse Iraq's government of the former president's cronies.

Carney and the other Americans tapped to run Iraq's ministries knew that the senior managers in almost all government departments were Baathists. Hussein's government had forced them to join the party, but that didn't mean they all had blood on their hands or that they were all close associates of the former leader. And without them, it would be much more challenging to get the government running again.

With unemployment at more than 40 percent, Carney also knew that anyone kicked out of a government job wasn't going to find work elsewhere. They would be unemployed and angry.

Carney was one of many CPA officials to object. But Bremer refused to soften the policy.

The de-Baathification expert in the CPA's headquarters was Meghan O'Sullivan, then an aide to Bremer and now a deputy national security adviser working on Iraq. Although she voiced initial misgivings, she quickly became a vigorous and uncompromising enforcer of the edict.

From the moment the order was issued, most of Carney's time was devoted to de-Baathification. He held long meetings with the industry ministry's management, first to explain the policy and then to comb through records to identify people who were ineligible for future employment.

"It was a terrible waste of time," Carney said. "There were so many more important things we should have been doing, like starting factories and paying salaries."

After a few months, the CPA began to receive reports that 10,000 to 15,000 teachers had been fired because of the de-Baathification order. In some Sunni-dominated areas, entire schools were left with just one or two teachers.

Bremer eventually concluded that the policy had been applied "unevenly and unjustly." But instead of rescinding his edict, he announced that appeals would be handled by a de-Baathification commission headed by Ahmed Chalabi, a controversial former exile whose informants had helped the Bush administration make the case for war. Chalabi, a Shiite, saw little need to accommodate former Baathists, most of whom are Sunnis.

By the summer of 2004, as the United States was relinquishing sovereignty of Iraq, many officials handling Iraq policy in Washington had concluded that Bremer's initial edict was a mistake. But it was too late for the Americans to do anything other than urge Iraq's Shiite-led interim government to rehire ex-Baathists. The CPA no longer had the power to issue edicts.

U.S. officials in Baghdad and in Washington leaned on the governments of prime ministers Ayad Allawi and Ibrahim al-Jafari, but the country's powerful Shiite and Kurdish leaders were unwilling to embrace the changes sought by the Bush administration. As far as they were concerned, Bremer enacted a sound policy in 2003, and there was little need to change it.

Finally, in 2005, the Shiites and Kurds agreed to reexamine the de-Baathification rules as part of a compromise to get Sunni political parties to support Iraq's new constitution. The agreement called for a revised de-Baathification law to be enacted by parliament.

But that still hasn't happened.

In an attempt to get the process moving, Bush used his televised address last week to call on Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to embrace the reintegration of former Baathists. Maliki told Bush recently that he supports a revised de-Baathification law -- but the issue isn't in the prime minister's hands. It's still with Chalabi.

Chalabi is the chairman of the Supreme National Commission for De-Baathification, which continues to have ultimate authority to decide which ex-Baathists can return to work and which cannot. He has prepared draft legislation that calls for easing some elements of Bremer's policy, but he said parliament has been unable to act on it because a majority of the members of the legislature's de-Baathification committee belong to radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr's political party, which walked out in November to protest a meeting between Maliki and Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0116701

Speaking by telephone from Baghdad, Chalabi said he expects progress "pretty soon."

But he said the law will not contain a key demand of the U.S. government: a sunset clause that would abolish the commission, effectively depriving Chalabi of political influence. He called it unconstitutional.

Chalabi said he heard Bush's call for swift action on the de-Baathification law, but he emphasized that he and his fellow Iraqis, not U.S. officials, are in charge of the legislative timetable.

"We don't feel any pressure," he said.

US Military May Join Iraq Against Militia Leaders (BOS)

By Farah Stockman And Bryan Bender, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 14, 2007

Bush authorization could spark deadly confrontations

WASHINGTON -- US military officials say the Bush administration has given them new authority to target leaders of political and religious militias in Iraq who are implicated in sectarian violence, including the powerful Shi'ite Muslim cleric Moqtada al-Sadr.

Such a showdown, key to Bush's plan to increase the number of US troops in Baghdad, could spark a deadly confrontation with Shi'ite militias, which enjoy widespread popularity in Shi'ite neighborhoods. It could also erode support for the fragile government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who has agreed to the plan.

Senior US and Iraqi officials said last week that Maliki has pledged to confront the militias with the help of additional US troops. But many analysts doubt that Maliki has the will or the firepower to take on Sadr, whose Mahdi Army militia is blamed for much of the tit-for-tat violence in the capital.

In recent months, Maliki and other top Iraqi officials routinely vetoed US raids on Sadr's operations, fearing the reaction of his legion of followers. Maliki's government kept a list of militia leaders who were off-limits to US troops, a senior Pentagon official told reporters in a background briefing in Washington, but now Maliki has agreed that the list would no longer be used.

The officials said the new approach will include pinpoint strikes against top leaders in the Mahdi Army as well as other militias from the Shi'ite majority accused of kidnapping and murdering civilians from the Sunni Muslim minority. They said they would focus on methodical man hunts for key leaders, such as the one in June that killed key Al Qaeda operative Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, rather than full-scale battles.

Pursuing the militias carries significant risks, both for Maliki, a far less popular figure than Sadr, and for the United States, which could be drawn deeper into dangerous urban warfare and an increasingly sectarian conflict.

"Even if the Iraqis had the will -- and that's a big question -- to do something about sectarian violence, it's going to be a very bloody business," said Phebe Marr, a specialist on Iraq's emerging political parties and author of "The Modern History of Iraq."

"This could make Sadr even more popular," Marr said. "He could play this as 'the imperialist Americans are coming to attack me.' "

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Thursday that Sadr must be neutralized.

"The Iraqis are going to have to deal with Sadr," she said, in response to a question. "They're going to have to deal with those death squads, and the prime minister said nobody and nothing is off-limits."

Bush's plan envisions adding 17,500 more US forces in Baghdad -- which would more than double the American military presence there -- to operate alongside about 40,000 Iraqis from the army and police. The joint forces, which will include American units embedded in Iraqi brigades, would take on both Sunni insurgents and Shi'ite sectarian death squads, US military officials said Thursday in a background briefing.

Secretary of Defense Robert Gates told the Senate Armed Services Committee on Friday that Maliki's willingness to allow these joint forces to enter Sadr City and other key neighborhoods in Baghdad is "central to the success of this entire operation."

DOJ_NMG_0116702

Sadr City, a Baghdad slum with an estimated 2 million residents, was named after Sadr's father, a revered cleric assassinated during Saddam Hussein's regime.

But many politicians and military analysts expressed doubt that Maliki would follow through on pledges to support the crack down.

Senators Norm Coleman, a Minnesota Republican, and Bill Nelson, a Florida Democrat, told Rice at a Senate Foreign Relations hearing Thursday that their talks with Iraqi leaders in Baghdad three weeks ago left them with the impression that Iraq's fractured, Shi'ite-dominated government has little interest in stopping sectarian death squads from murdering Sunnis.

"Our mouths about dropped open when the national security adviser, Dr. [Mowaffak] Al-Rubaie, said . . . 'This is not a sectarian war,' " Nelson said.

Indeed, Rice acknowledged to the senators that Maliki's original request, made in the run-up to his meeting with Bush in November, was for US troops to withdraw to the outskirts of Baghdad, leaving the task of handling sectarian militias to Iraqis alone. But Rice said that after extensive talks with US commanders, Maliki eventually agreed to an aggressive US-Iraqi plan to tackle them.

"I think it's become such a critical situation for them that they recognize they've got to take on anybody who stands in their way of bringing population security," she said, in response to a question about whether Maliki could survive a confrontation with Sadr.

Maliki's Islamic Dawa Party is the weakest of the three Shi'ite parties that dominate Iraq's government. Dawa has no militia of its own.

Sadr, on the other hand, is believed to command the loyalty of some 60,000 fighters across Iraq, although specialists differ on how much direct control he exercises over them. His movement is so powerful that some of his followers were allowed to attend the execution of Hussein. They called out Sadr's name as the former dictator was being led to the gallows, a moment captured on a video that was viewed on the Internet around the world.

Sadr's followers control four key ministries and hold 30 of 275 seats in Iraq's Parliament. They cast the deciding votes that brought Maliki to power but suspended their participation in the government to protest Maliki's meeting with Bush in November. Rice said the Iraqi government was functioning without them. But the boycott has left Iraq's Parliament in turmoil. The US military has already gotten a taste of all-out confrontation with Sadr. In 2004 they used aircraft and tanks to drive off his forces from a Najaf cemetery near the revered shrine of Imam Ali. Sadr's movement went quiet for about a year, but then grew stronger, attracting tens of thousands more followers with his nationalist call for a unified Iraq and the withdrawal of US forces.

Sadr's vehement opposition to US troops has only raised his profile among Shi'ites who see his militia -- not American or Iraqi troops -- as their only protection from Sunni insurgents.

Paul Hughes, a retired Army colonel who served as a military strategist in Iraq, warned that Bush's plan to pacify neighborhoods with an overwhelming military presence is designed to fight a classic insurgency, not the sectarian conflict that has swept up thousands of armed civilians.

"There is this real minefield that the United States is going into," he said.

Three weeks ago, thousands of protesters took to the streets in Najaf after US and Iraqi forces killed a top Sadr deputy.

On Friday, Sheik Abdel Razzaq al-Nadawi, a senior official in Sadr's movement, warned that US soldiers who come to Iraq "may return in coffins."

Juan R. Cole, a specialist on Shi'ite Muslims and professor of Middle East history at the University of Michigan, said that Sadr's forces could simply go underground during the US military campaign as they did after the 2004 battle in Najaf.

"At that time, the Shi'ite political elite got together and made the case to [Sadr] that he should lay low or things are going to go badly for him," Cole said. "I think that's what is happening now. I am extremely skeptical that Maliki would be willing to sacrifice one of the few pillars of support that he has. . . . They will lie low until the 'surge' is over and then they will come back out."

U.S. And Iraqi Forces In The Western Desert Look Toward The Horizon (LAT)

By Tony Perry, Times Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0116703

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

The process of turning over responsibility slow, but American soldiers try to prod them into the future.

WEST OF RAMADI, IRAQ — On a sandy promontory overlooking the desert that stretches to Syria and Jordan in western Iraq, U.S. Army officers and Iraqi police officials were discussing the future.

The Americans' concept of the future involved the Iraqis taking responsibility for catching insurgent smugglers and bomb-makers along the two freeways that stretch from the border region to Baghdad.

The future starts now, Capt. Ian Lauer told Iraqi police Col. Jassim Mohammed Ali, who served in the Iraqi army's special forces under the late Saddam Hussein.

"We've got to force them to have confidence," Lauer said. "They'll spend years saying they're not ready."

Ali, a broad-chested veteran of the 1991 Persian Gulf War, insisted that he was ready for the challenge.

"If we see bad people, we will arrest them," he said through an interpreter. "If they fight us, we will show no mercy. If they use one bullet, we will use two. If they use 10, we will use 100."

As part of the U.S. plan to withdraw from Al Anbar province and hand over security duties to the Iraqi army and police force, the Army's Task Force 1-77 Armor is ceding the desolate area 25 miles west of Ramadi to Ali's "emergency response unit," the Iraqi version of a SWAT team.

The unit's troops carry Soviet weapons once used by Hussein's army. They drive Ford trucks supplied by the United States, but they lack body armor and have only rudimentary communications gear.

"Sometimes you feel, 'We're forcing them to do stuff,' and then you think, 'Hey, it's your country,' " said Lauer, commander of the 1-77's Charlie Company. "Even if they had the equipment we have, some would complain."

The process of turning over responsibility to the Iraqis is slow and incremental. For instance, U.S. forces may be turning over freeway security to the Iraqis — a largely symbolic move — but cannot yet give them responsibility for the transport of prisoners on those freeways.

Just minutes after the meeting with Ali and his troops, Lauer's convoy went to an Iraqi police station to pick up a suspected insurgent.

Iraqi police said the skinny 17-year-old had confessed to making bombs and stealing a weapon from a Humvee that had been bombed.

Across Al Anbar, judges and prosecutors have been targeted or intimidated. Many court buildings are a shambles and court personnel are dead, in hiding or have fled the country, officials said. Thus, the chore of detaining the suspected insurgent and shipping him to Baghdad for trial fell to U.S. forces.

In the roundabout world of Iraqi justice, suspects go from Iraqi custody to American custody; then U.S. officials sift through evidence submitted by Iraqi police to determine whether it would be sufficient in an Iraqi court.

Lauer checked the blindfolded suspect for signs of torture and found none.

"I am taking you into American custody," he said. At day's end, the Iraqi was at Camp Ramadi, the nearby U.S. base.

Ali, on the promontory with an icy wind blowing in from Syria more than 100 miles to the west, said that before the Americans came, he was once stationed at Camp Ramadi.

"Hopefully," Lauer said, "you'll be there again someday."

tony.perry@latimes.com

Kurdish Brigade Trains To Deploy In Baghdad (AP)

AP, January 13, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) -- A Kurdish army brigade in northern Iraq is undergoing intensive urban combat training as it readies for deployment in the latest Baghdad security operation and is expected to take on the capital's Mehdi Army Shiite militia, its commander said Saturday.

Meanwhile, three Iraqi generals told The Associated Press that the Iraqi commander who will lead the overall Baghdad security mission was the government's second choice and only got the job after the U.S. military objected to the first officer named to the post by Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki.

DOJ_NMG_0116704

"We will head to Baghdad soon," said Brig. Gen. Nazir Assem Korran, commander of the 1st Infantry Brigade, 2nd Division of the Iraqi army.

"We have 3,000 soldiers who are currently undergoing intensive training especially in urban combat and how the army should act inside a city."

Korran, in the Kurdish northern city of Irbil, said he did not know how the operation would unfold, but said the Defense Ministry in Baghdad had asked his brigade to take part in the security operation along with thousands of other Iraqi and U.S. troops.

The forces were to conduct neighborhood-to-neighborhood searches to clear the city of Sunni Muslim insurgents and local militias such as the Mehdi Army of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. The militia has been blamed for much of the sectarian killing in the past 11 months.

"We are going to confront any terrorist elements or militias. We will confront any outlaws," the general said.

Later in the day, al-Maliki issued his first comment on the new Bush administration plan outlined on Wednesday, declaring it "identical to our strategy and our intentions." President Bush said he would send an additional 21,500 troops to help pacify the capital and other parts of the country. (Full story)

Al-Maliki, however, continued to avoid naming the Mehdi Army as a target of the military operations, disinclined, perhaps, to take on al-Sadr, a key backer of the prime minister.

"Our strategy that aims to control security is based on using force against any outlaws, whatever their background or identity," al-Maliki said in a brief appearance aired on state-run Iraqiya television. Al-Maliki has repeatedly used that kind of formulaic language during his eight months in office, but has routinely blocked American forces from taking on his militia allies.

On Wednesday, Iraqi military officials said al-Maliki had chosen Lt. Gen. Abboud Gambar as commander of the new security plan in the capital, where sectarian bloodshed built to a crescendo at the end of last year, with more than 100 people killed on many days.

The army generals who spoke to AP said al-Maliki appointed Gambar a week ago when he told the nation that a new security plan was to be launched within days.

But al-Maliki never revealed that Gambar would command the operation and has refused since then to confirm the appointment.

The Iraqi generals, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the information had not been officially released, said there had been several candidates from the military to run the new security plan and two names topped the list.

First among the candidates was Lt. Gen. Mohan al-Freiji, but he was quickly vetoed by American officials.

Gambar was second choice after the Americans blackballed al-Freiji, the generals said. Both al-Freiji and Gambar are Shiite Muslims.

The U.S. military did not respond to an AP e-mail asking for verification of the dispute.

"Mohan (al-Freiji) is not flexible at all and cannot be subdued. If he finds something unacceptable, he will never tolerate it. Mohan doesn't take direction at all," one of the generals said. "Abboud is more flexible."

The generals said Gambar, a veteran of the 1980-88 Iran-Iraq war and the 1991 Gulf War, would have two deputies, a Shiite and a Sunni, one on each side of the Tigris river that curls through the center of Baghdad.

Gambar was a brigadier general in the navy during the 1991 Gulf War, one of the generals said. He was captured by U.S. troops on the Kuwaiti island of Fialaka and held prisoner in Saudi Arabia before being freed shortly afterward.

Under Saddam Hussein's rule, military men normally were fired if taken prisoner, but the former president made an exception for Gambar and his brigade because of their brave defense of Fialaka. Gambar, in his early 60s, was decorated by Hussein for bravery.

Gambar will report directly to al-Maliki, who is commander general of the armed forces.

Indicating that the new security plan was near its formal opening, military officials said Saturday that the 4th Brigade of the Iraq army's 1st Infantry Division arrived in Baghdad's southern neighborhood of Rustomiyah. They said the brigade came from Fallujah, west of Baghdad, but refused to give further details.

DOJ_NMG_0116705

Korran, the general in Irbil, said his troops would face a language barrier and rely on translators because 95 percent of the brigade is Kurdish and unable to speak Arabic. Kurds, a separate ethnic group, are largely Sunnis but not Arabs.

His brigade is one of two coming from the Kurdish region. The other will arrive from the northern city of Sulaimaniyah. A third brigade will come from southern Iraq.

"We do not represent any sect or ethnic group," Korran said, adding that he expects to be fighting against "militias in residential areas."Other developments

U.S. raids that President Bush approved and that led to the detention of five Iranians in Iraq are part of broad efforts to confront Tehran's aggression, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Saturday before meeting with Israel's foreign minister in Jerusalem. (Full story)

U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, who opposes Bush's plans to send more U.S. soldiers to Iraq, met Saturday with al-Maliki and the two top U.S. commanders during her first visit to Baghdad in nearly a year. The New York Democrat, who is expected to run for her party's presidential nomination, said she doubted the al-Maliki government would live up to promises it had made about cracking down on violence.

Underscoring the difficulties in taming the violence, at least 48 people were killed or found dead nationwide on Saturday, including a Sunni cleric who was shot to death near his home in Samarra, 60 miles north of Baghdad.

Plan Would Add Kurds To Civil War Mix (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

BAGHDAD — Already a dangerous battleground for an array of forces, Baghdad soon could be flooded with another volatile element: thousands of Kurds from northern Iraq.

As part of President Bush's new strategy for Iraq, 8,000 to 10,000 Iraqi troops will deploy to Baghdad in the coming weeks, American and Iraqi officials said, and as many as 3,600 could be Kurds. It would be the first time such a large number of Kurdish forces have been sent to the capital.

The impending deployment has raised fears among Kurds, most of whom live in a protected autonomous enclave, that they are being dragged more directly into Iraq's bloody and complex civil war.

Most of the fighting in Iraq is between Shiite and Sunni Arabs, but Kurds, most of whom are Sunni Muslims, fear that could change if they are seen as players in the country's main struggle.

"I don't think it's wise," said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish lawmaker in Baghdad. "This is a Sunni-Shiite conflict."

Most Kurdish troops are not acquainted with Baghdad, many speak neither Arabic nor English, and their participation could create an even deeper conflict between Kurds and Arabs, he said.

Large numbers of Kurds mix with Arabs in the Kirkuk and Mosul areas of northern Iraq, and a small number live in the capital, but Arab politicians also question the wisdom of bringing Kurdish soldiers into the conflict.

"I advise the Kurdish people to apply pressure on their leaders to prevent this step," said Mohammed Daini, a lawmaker with a major Sunni bloc. Kurdish forces, he said, "will face firm resistance from both the Sunnis and the Shiites."

Sheik Abdul Razzaq Naddawi, an aide to anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr, agreed that Kurdish troops would not be welcome.

"The Kurds, frankly speaking, consider themselves superior to other Iraqis," he said. "Would they allow troops from the middle or the south to arrive in Kurdistan?" he asked. "Their borders are closed, and they are practically independent."

The idea of using Kurdish troops to quell violence in both Shiite and Sunni neighborhoods of Baghdad originated in backroom talks among the country's main power brokers. With a chance to live their dream of autonomy, Kurdish lawmakers were extremely reluctant to take part in the plan. But Iraqi officials as well as U.S. military and political officials argued that if they failed to participate, it would show their lack of commitment to the nation.

Word of the planned deployment took Kurds by surprise. In their small but prospering northern enclave, they shook their heads over the prospect of getting involved in a conflict that has bedeviled the most powerful army on Earth.

DOJ_NMG_0116706

"If America and the Arabs aren't able to stop Sunnis and Shiites from killing each other indiscriminately, then what use will it be to send in our forces?" asked one Kurd in an online forum.

"We do not need to have our young men getting killed in a civil war between Sunnis and Shiites," read another posting. "They are both our enemies."

Allegiances and neutrality

The Iraqi government has planned for a 50% troop increase in Baghdad, adding the equivalent of an entire division. U.S. and Iraqi officials say two or three predominantly Kurdish brigades will participate.

A U.S. advisor to the Iraqi Defense Ministry acknowledged that language was a concern, but said the problem would be mitigated by the mix of Arab, Kurdish and American troops in Baghdad.

Politicians in favor of the deployment say Kurdish troops are more impartial than security forces currently in the capital.

Khaliq Zenghana, a Kurdish lawmaker, suggested that Kurdish forces could help protect ministries and government institutions, now mostly run as fiefdoms by sectarian militias.

"The Kurds are neutral in that we do not concern ourselves with the Sunnis or Shiites," he said. "That must be understood by the Arabs here in Baghdad: We do not want to come to protect a neighborhood over another one."

However, many Kurdish soldiers are loyal first to leaders of their own ethnic group, even if they wear the uniform of the national army.

The late Saddam Hussein's regime oppressed the Kurds, killing thousands in a military campaign and sowing division between Kurds and Arabs. After the 1991 Persian Gulf War, the U.S. enforced a no-fly zone over semiautonomous Kurdistan.

Although most Kurds are Sunni, they have been natural allies of the Shiites, with both groups fighting Hussein's Sunni Arab-dominated army.

After the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, the historic mistrust between Kurds and Arabs deepened as political groups fought over resources and government posts. Sunni Arabs complained of heavy-handed tactics by Kurdish soldiers who took part in offensives against insurgents in Tall Afar and Fallouja. Also, Kurds and Arabs are locked in a dispute over the future of the oil-rich northern city of Kirkuk.

In Kirkuk, as well as Mosul, Kurdish soldiers wear Kurdish insignia on their Iraqi army uniforms and openly proclaim their desire to annex these ethnically mixed cities to their Kurdish region farther north.

Calling on the militia

Bush and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki have promised that Iraqi security forces will go after Sunni and Shiite gunmen alike. Until now, however, the Shiite-dominated security forces have focused mostly on capturing Sunnis.

The allegiance of Shiite soldiers and policemen often lies with sectarian rather than national leaders. Renegade Shiite security forces have tortured and killed Sunni civilians. Sunni rebels, for their part, have hunkered down in certain neighborhoods, also menacing civilians and fighting off the security forces.

Kurdish officials said that the Americans also have asked for the participation of the Kurdish militia, known as peshmerga, but the request was still being debated in the regional parliament.

Concern about the possible participation of the peshmerga already has been expressed within Sadr's Al Mahdi militia.

"They are doing a good job inside Kurdistan, so they should stay there," said one militiaman who identified himself only as Abu Karrar.

Defense Ministry spokesman Mohammed Askari said the army brigades coming to Baghdad would answer to Iraqi army commanders rather than militia leaders.

Far from the civil war raging in Baghdad, residents in the quiet Kurdish city of Irbil were not enthusiastic about the deployment.

"It's an Iraqi issue and Iraq contains all of us, although I think this will cause problems for Kurds and if there was any possible way not to participate, I would prefer that," said Rezgar Taha, 34.

War Costs Are Hitting Historic Proportions (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

DOJ_NMG_0116707

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

WASHINGTON — By the time the Vietnam war ended in 1975, it had become America's longest war, shadowed the legacies of four presidents, killed 58,000 Americans along with many thousands more Vietnamese, and cost the U.S. more than $660 billion in today's dollars.

By the time the bill for World War II passed the $600-billion mark, in mid-1943, the United States had driven German forces out of North Africa, devastated the Japanese fleet in the Battle of Midway, and launched the vast offensives that would liberate Europe and the South Pacific.

The Iraq war is far smaller and narrower than those conflicts, and it has not extended beyond the tenure of a single president. But its price tag is beginning to reach historic proportions, and the budgetary "burn rate" for Iraq may be greater than in some periods in past wars.

If U.S. involvement continues on the current scale, the funding for the Iraq war — combined with the conflict in Afghanistan and other foreign fronts in the war on terrorism — is projected to surpass this country's Vietnam spending next year.

And the accumulating cost is adding to resistance to President Bush's war policy in Congress as well as in public opinion, even though concern about the cost in human lives, the war's impact on America's place in the world and other such factors loom larger.

Last week, when Bush unveiled his new war plan — which included sending an additional 21,500 U.S. troops to Iraq and launching another effort to provide jobs and public services in Baghdad — the cost issue was raised by Republicans as well as Democrats.

But it had been simmering for more than a year.

Members of Congress have talked relatively little about the war's accumulating price tag because of the human costs, Rep. Zoe Lofgren (D-San Jose) said. "But certainly we're cognizant of it," she said. "When you say for what we're spending in a month in Iraq, you could fully fund and double the science budgets of the United States and come up with a viable alternative to oil, it puts it in perspective."

Even so loyal a Republican as Sen. Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, who chaired the budget committee until the Democrats took control of the Senate this year, criticized the administration's approach to war costs, calling it "without any discipline as to how much is going to be spent."

"They're gaming the system," Gregg said.

At a media briefing before Bush's speech Wednesday night, a senior administration official said the president's plan would entail $5.6 billion in military expenses and $1 billion in reconstruction and other civilian costs.

In the broad landscape of federal spending, those are not huge numbers, though $6.6 billion is more than enough to cover the budgets for all the country's national parks, national forests, historic monuments, protected wetlands and wildlife refuges for a year.

What makes the cost issue increasingly sensitive is not just questions about whether it will buy success but also the fact that the new plan's cost will add to a mountain of bills for earlier military and reconstruction efforts with what many see as little or no positive return on the investment.

Some Republicans, especially fiscal conservatives worried about the deficit, are particularly unhappy because, they say, the president and the Defense Department have refused to address the war's impact on the budget in a straightforward way.

Instead of including war costs in the regular budget, such as the one Bush will send to Congress next month, the administration has been asking Congress for emergency-spending bills that short-circuit many of the usual review procedures for appropriating funds.

"Muting and undermining the legitimacy of the congressional role in funding is, I think, undermining to some degree the commitment to the war effort itself," Gregg said.

The administration says its approach is necessary because it is unable to determine what it will need for the war in the coming fiscal year, which begins each October. Critics say that may have been true early in the war but that by now most costs are predictable far in advance.

DOJ_NMG_0116708

Last year, Congress approved a provision in the annual defense authorization bill calling on the administration to change course and put its request for war funds in regular spending bills subject to full congressional review.

Said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), the provision's author: "Neither the White House nor the Congress is making the tough decisions about how we are going to pay for the ongoing wars. Adding hundreds of billions of dollars that are more conveniently designated as emergency expenditures — so they do not have to be budgeted for along with other national priorities — is only making our fiscal problems that much greater."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) proposed that Congress block Bush's new plan by withholding funds. To date, Congress has not used its power of the purse to limit Bush's prosecution of the war, partly because it doesn't want to seem to deny U.S. troops any needed support.

"If you cut off funding, you're cutting off support for the troops," said Rep. C.W. "Bill" Young of Florida, a top Republican on the House Appropriations Committee. "Whether you support the battle they're involved in or not, the vast majority of the American public is still very supportive of our troops."

During Vietnam, Congress did threaten to limit the use of the defense budget. At one point, for example, it prohibited the use of funds in Cambodia.

But Congress flexed its fiscal muscles only toward the end of the Vietnam War. Bush's war on terrorism is in its seventh year, and at a comparable stage of Vietnam, antiwar lawmakers could muster only a handful of votes for limiting funds.

From the beginning of President Lyndon B. Johnson's troop buildup in 1965 to the fall of Saigon in 1975, the United States spent the equivalent of $662 billion in 2007 dollars, according to the Congressional Research Service. The war in Iraq is harder to measure because its costs tend to be mixed up with those of the war in Afghanistan and Bush's broader global war on terrorism, says Steven Kosiak, director of budget studies at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments in Washington.

Starting with the anti-terrorism appropriation enacted a week after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Kosiak figures the United States had spent $400 billion fighting terrorism through fiscal 2006, which ended Sept. 30.

For fiscal 2007, Congress has so far approved $70 billion. The president is expected to ask Congress for $100 billion more.

Even if the fighting stopped soon, which few expect, the bills would continue to accumulate as the Pentagon pushed to restore what the war had cost in troops and material.

Clinton Expresses Doubt That Iraqis Will Keep Promises (AP)

AP, January 13, 2007

BAGHDAD -- U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton expressed doubt Saturday that Iraq's government would follow through with its promises to secure Baghdad as she met with top Iraqi officials and American commanders.

It was the third trip to Iraq for Clinton, a Democrat from New York who is considering running for president, and comes amid opposition from the Democratic-controlled Congress to President Bush's plans to send in 21,500 more troops to stop the rampant violence.

"I don't know that the American people or the Congress at this point believe this mission can work," she told ABC News in Baghdad. "And in the absence of a commitment that is backed up by actions from the Iraqi government, why should we believe it?"

Noting she had to travel wearing body armor and surrounded by soldiers and security guards, Clinton called the situation in Iraq "heartbreaking."

"This is my third trip here. I've seen the violence and security problems increase, not decrease," she said, calling on Bush to start withdrawing U.S. troops.

"That would really demonstrate to the Iraqis that we don't have an open-ended commitment," she said. "We are not going to be here providing protection for their leaders, which we do. We are not going to be here standing by and trying to be called in from time to time as they see fit. That is not in the cards."

Clinton, who was making a one-day visit to the country, spoke to ABC exclusively after meeting with the two top military commanders in Iraq, U.S. Gen. George Casey and Lt. Gen. Ray Odierno, according to the network.

DOJ_NMG_0116709

She was traveling with U.S. Sen. Evan Bayh, D-Indiana, who opted out of the 2008 race, and Rep. John McHugh, a Republican from upstate New York. They also planned to travel to Afghanistan.

The three, all members of armed services committees, also met with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

"I'm skeptical that the Iraqi government will do what they have promised to do, and that I think is the concern of all of us who have heard this before," she said, referring to earlier security efforts that have failed to stop the sectarian attacks that have been increasing since the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra.

Clinton, who opposes Bush's plans to send more U.S. troops to Iraq, last traveled to Iraq in February 2005 with Sen. John McCain, a Republican presidential contender.

Clinton had planned to meet with the Army's 10th Mountain Division _ which is based in New York and deployed in both Iraq and Afghanistan _ at their base in Baghdad but the visit was canceled due to bad weather, the U.S. military said.

Iraq's Talabani To Visit Damascus (BBC)

By Mike Wooldridge

BBC.com, January 13, 2007

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani is travelling to Syria for the highest level Iraqi visit in many years.

It comes after US President George W Bush accused both Syria and Iran of fuelling Iraq's violence as he announced his new strategy for Iraq.

The US says Syria allows militants to enter Iraq, but Damascus says it is doing all it can to secure its border.

Diplomatic relations between Iraq and Syria were restored last November after a break of more than 20 years.

This visit by President Talabani demonstrates Iraq's balancing act between the United States and a country that Washington prefers to see isolated.

Border security

But between Iraq and Syria, there was also a long period of hostility, going back to the days when the two countries were ruled by competing branches of the Arab nationalist Baath Party.

Syria accused Saddam Hussein's Iraq of inciting riots.

Diplomatic relations were restored just recently, and President Talabani's visit is intended to build on this.

He was in exile in Syria during the Saddam Hussein era.

But beyond the expected signing of agreements, the question is how far the visit will be used to discuss American and Iraqi government concerns about insurgents crossing between Syria and Iraq.

Syria has long said it does all it can to patrol the border.

Losing Iraq, One Truckload At A Time (NYT)

By Luis Carlos Montalvan

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

IN 1901, Gen. Leonard Wood, the American governor of occupied Cuba, wrote an incensed letter to President William McKinley after discovering deep corruption in the island's postal service. "We have gone into Cuba to give these people an example of good government," Wood insisted. "These thefts in the post office are so far the only blot on our record. Our honor as a nation demands that we bring the thieves to trial." He gave his commander in chief an ultimatum: "If it is embarrassing to you to have me persist in this matter, I will resign."

About the only difference between Cuba then and Iraq today is that Wood's intervention resulted in the jailing of the culprits. The level of corruption in the Iraq Security Forces is staggering. The Iraq Study Group found that $5 billion to $7 billion is lost annually to different types of corruption, and yet "there are still no examples of senior officials who have been brought before a court and convicted of corruption charges." The result: "Economic development is hobbled by insecurity, corruption, lack of investment, dilapidated infrastructure and uncertainty."

Yet of the study group's 79 recommendations, only two are much relevant to this problem, and no anticorruption milestones to be achieved were set forth. Having served in Iraq, I find this very disappointing. While I can't of course speak officially for the Pentagon, I can describe what I saw and give my own thoughts on how to improve things.

DOJ_NMG_0116710

The most prominent forms of corruption I saw were Iraqi commanders pocketing the paychecks of nonexistent troops in the Iraqi Army and officers in the police forces, and customs officials abetting the smuggling of oil and precious rebuilding supplies across Iraq's porous borders.

These are vast problems, but some relatively simple solutions could tamp them down considerably.

The greatest amount of corruption in the Iraq military and police forces occurs when payrolls are handed out at the unit level. Because the country doesn't have a functioning banking system that would allow easy money transfers to private accounts, military and security commanders receive large sums of cash every payroll period based on the number and rank of soldiers on their personnel rosters. The endemic problem is that commanders frequently put nonexistent soldiers and security personnel — dubbed "ghosts" by American overseers — on their rosters and pocket their salaries.

It is difficult to overstate how deeply these ghosts hurt the war effort. Most obviously, we have no idea how much of this money is being siphoned off to support tribal and ethnic fighting, and even the insurgency itself.

Also, because hundreds and thousands of ghosts exist at all echelons, many military and police units in the field do not have nearly as many men at arms as they seem to have on paper. Thus the units are often assigned tasks for which they do not have necessary manpower. And when American or other coalition forces are asked to "partner" with Iraqi troops, we have often found that there simply aren't enough bodies to conduct training and missions.

American officials have long been aware of this problem. "The number of trained and equipped security forces does not provide a complete picture of their capabilities and may overstate the number of forces on duty," was the finding of the Government Accountability Office's "Stabilizing Iraq" report last fall. "For example, Ministry of Interior data include police who are absent without leave."

Those of us on the ground discovered this the hard way. When I was with the Third Armored Cavalry Regiment in Nineveh Province in 2005, we tried for months to get the names of all Iraqi security personnel in our sector on the payrolls of the Ministries of Interior and Defense. We were curious because when we tried to assess the effectiveness of the Iraqi Border Police brigade in Sinjar, on the Syrian border, we were told by Iraqi commanders that at least 300 officers were "performing guard duties in Mosul." Mosul is more than 100 miles inside Iraq, so border troops had no business there, if indeed they existed at all.

Similarly, in South Baghdad, we American advisers assigned to the Fourth Brigade of the Sixth Iraqi Army Division had little luck getting a clear read of the brigade's strength. Iraqi commanders repeatedly told us that many of their men were "elsewhere, performing security duties for the Ministry of Defense." The advisers found personnel discrepancies as high as 30 percent in any given unit.

How can we bust the ghosts? Every soldier, police officer and government official is assigned a national identification number for bookkeeping, but so far it has been far too easy for corrupt officials to get numbers for nonexistent people. A better idea would be a universal national identification card for all government and military employees that includes the holder's photograph and fingerprints.

Such cards should be required for any Iraqi to receive his paycheck. Both the distribution of the cards and the payroll-distribution sites should be jointly overseen by coalition and Iraqi officials. There is no reason such a system could not be in place by the end of the year.

It would also help if American advisers embedded with security forces were charged with ensuring that all Iraqis are actually on duty with their assigned units. Should Iraqi commanders refuse to cooperate with their audits, we must insist that the Iraqi government fire them.

The second major source of corruption I witnessed is what I call the "reverse Ho Chi Minh Trails" that facilitate smuggling of Iraqi oil and other resources out of the country. A United States interagency panel reported in November that oil smuggling abetted by corrupt Iraqi customs officials is netting the insurgents $100 million a year, helping to make them financially self-sustaining.

Because most of Iraq is landlocked, almost all goods going in and out pass through 14 land "ports of entry." Smuggling has always been a part of Iraqi life, and was even more so during the last years of Saddam Hussein's rule, because he encouraged it to counteract the embargo on Iraqi oil. Yet, almost immediately after the 2003 invasion, former customs officials from the regime resumed their duties at the ports of entry.

DOJ_NMG_0116711

Later that year, we in the Third Armored Cavalry were given responsibility for the Syrian, Jordanian and Saudi Arabian borders along Anbar Province. In addition to helping create the new Iraqi Border Police force, we set about reforming the customs checkpoints.

At first, this was successful: for example, the border police battalion we trained at Walid, near the conjunction of the Syrian and Jordanian borders, uncovered many attempts to smuggle out large quantities of food, fuel, industrial parts and other goods. Hundreds of smugglers were arrested.

Unfortunately, we left Anbar in early 2004 and corrupt officials in Baghdad soon took away the border police's oversight authority on the grounds that it wasn't their "jurisdictional role to conduct operations that were assigned exclusively to customs officials." American advisers at the national level failed to do anything about this, and things quickly reverted to the corrupt status quo.

The situation at Walid was hardly unique. In 2005 I returned to Iraq with the Third Armored Cavalry, this time to Nineveh Province, to cover the northern section of the border between Iraq and Syria. It soon became clear that the region's port of entry, at Rabiya, was a hotbed of corruption. Not only were customs officials apparently turning a blind eye to smuggling, but they seemed to be directly engaged in it.

And little has changed: last month the American special inspector general for Iraq, Stuart Bowen, reported that the pipelines in the area have been blown up, so the only way to export oil is by road. He noted, "That leaves it vulnerable to smuggling as truckers sell their cargoes on the black market."

How can we shut down this black market? First, we must insist that the Iraqi government replace the customs workers at the 14 land border crossings with a new set of at least 1,400 elite officials jointly selected and vetted by the Iraqi ministries and the coalition forces.

We should supplement this new force with teams of American advisers — soldiers, police officers, customs officials and the like — to ensure that the Iraqis are prepared to do their jobs. And we should create an anticorruption task force of coalition officers with the power to periodically review systemic issues like the Iraqis' recruitment methods, policies governing potential ethical problems and records of internal discipline.

The Iraq Study Group concluded that "the ability of the United States to shape the outcomes is diminishing" and that "time is running out." Those of us who have been on the ground know how true this is. Irrespective of the number and mission of United States forces sent to Iraq, winning or losing will depend in large part on our ability to, in General Wood's phrasing, "give these people an example of good government."

Afghan Rebel Chief Sends Fighters To Their Deaths (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

BAGRAM, Afghanistan, Jan. 13 (AP) — An Afghan insurgent leader operating from Pakistan sent about 200 ill-equipped fighters, some wearing plastic bags on their feet, into Afghanistan, where most were killed in a major battle this week, an American general said Saturday.

The general, Maj. Gen. Benjamin Freakley, said the insurgent leader, Jalaluddin Haqqani, recruited and sent unemployed and untrained men to fight in Afghanistan.

United States forces killed about 130 fighters moving in two groups in Paktika Province in the east late Wednesday and early Thursday, in one of the largest winter battles in Afghanistan since the fall of the Taliban in 2001.

General Freakley said the fighters "were from Jalaluddin Haqqani and we believe, though we don't know exactly where, that Jalaluddin Haqqani is operating from inside Pakistan and sending men to fight in Afghanistan."

Western and Afghan officials accuse Pakistan of not doing enough to stop Taliban fighters using Pakistani soil as a training ground from crossing the border into Afghanistan. Pakistan says it does all it can to stop the fighters.

No officials in Pakistan could be reached immediately for comment.

General Freakley said one of the enemies in the Afghanistan-Pakistan border area is unemployment.

"It is clear to me that some of these men were just either collected in a poor part of a village or perhaps from a madrasa or perhaps from a refugee camp and told to come fight," he said. "The message to the enemies of Afghanistan and the enemies of world peace would be that you can come at us with two people, 20 people, 200 people, 2,000 people, you'll be defeated and your young men will needlessly be killed."

DOJ_NMG_0116712

General Freakley said it was likely the insurgent fighters meant to attack a new military outpost near the village of Marghah that has affected insurgent infiltration routes.

In southern Afghanistan, meanwhile, NATO troops fought insurgents on Saturday in a battle that left one Western soldier dead.

Taliban militants stepped up attacks last year, and insurgent-related violence killed about 4,000 people in the bloodiest year since the American-led coalition ousted the Taliban in late 2001.

Clinton Meets With Karzai, U.S. Troops (WP/AP)

By Jason Straziuso, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan -- U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton ate with U.S. soldiers from New York and Indiana at the main U.S. base in Afghanistan on Sunday before meeting with the top U.S. general in Afghanistan and President Hamid Karzai, officials said.

Clinton, a Democrat from New York who is considering running for president, traveled here with U.S. Sen. Evan Bayh, a Democrat from Indiana, and Rep. John McHugh, a Republican from upstate New York. All three are members of armed services committees.

On Friday, Clinton said she is hearing "increasingly troubling reports out of Afghanistan" and would be searching for "accurate information about the true state of affairs" militarily and politically on her trip.

The Taliban last year launched a record number of attacks, and some 4,000 people died in insurgency-related violence, Afghanistan's bloodiest year since the Taliban was ousted by a U.S.-led coalition in late 2001.

Some 23,000 U.S. troops are stationed in Afghanistan, about half under the NATO flag and half under control of the U.S.-led coalition. Clinton has said she wants to see more troops in Afghanistan, without saying how many.

Her meetings with U.S. military officials and Karzai were closed, and the senator did not make any statements to the media.

The delegation's trip to Kabul comes a day after a visit to Iraq, where Clinton expressed doubt that Iraq's government would follow through with its promises to secure Baghdad as she met with top Iraqi officials and American commanders there.

South of Kabul, a suicide bomber blew himself up near a convoy of foreign construction workers and Afghan soldiers, wounding one civilian, said Mohammmad Asif, a police official.

Qalat is about 220 miles south of Kabul, and Clinton and her colleagues were far from any danger.

Military Slams Bureaucrats Over Afghanistan (WT)

By Sean Rayment, London Sunday Telegraph

The Washington Times, January 14, 2007

LONDON -- A lack of political direction, a shortage of soldiers and "complete disconnection" between Britain's Foreign Office and Ministry of Defense combined to hinder progress in the war in Afghanistan, a report by British military chiefs has concluded.

The document, drawn up by senior officers from the 16th Air Assault Brigade, gives a withering assessment of how decisions in the British government prevented progress against the Taliban and, sources claim, contributed to deaths and injuries among soldiers.

The report, the first official assessment of the conflict, says the operation suffered from a "lack of early political direction."

It concludes that insufficient numbers of soldiers went to fight the Taliban and complains of differences between the Foreign Office and Defense Ministry over counternarcotics policy.

The report, written at the end of last year, is working its way up the military chain of command. It states that the forces sent to Afghanistan could have achieved more and suffered fewer casualties if greater numbers had gone at the start.

DOJ_NMG_0116713

"Lessons learned" from the campaign suggest that if commanders had been given more troops, they would have been able to properly man bases in the notorious towns of Nowzad, Sangin and Musa Qala, where 12 soldiers died between June and September.

Although the report does not specify how many extra troops would have been required, senior commanders say the initial force of 3,500 needed a further 1,000 combat troops, together with extra helicopters and support units.

One senior officer who has seen the report said that with a larger force, Brig. Ed Butler, commander of the 16th Air Assault Brigade, would have had greater flexibility to conduct "rapid reaction operations" against the Taliban and begin "reconstruction in the so-called Afghan development zone."

Troops from the 16 Air Assault Brigade deployed into Helmand, in southern Afghanistan, last May as part of an expansion of the International Security and Assistance Force into the south of the country.

Over a 12-week period, elements of the brigade became embroiled in the most intense fighting since the Korean War.

The troops were involved in dozens of bitter battles with the Taliban during which every weapon system, from the assault rifle to Apache attack helicopters, was used to kill insurgents.

After the deployment was announced last year, John Reid, then the defense secretary, consistently denied that the force was under strength, despite high-level unofficial briefings in which senior officers said that commanders needed extra infantry, helicopters and logistics troops.

A spokesman for the Defense Ministry said, "Extra troops were only requested on one occasion and they were sent. The whole point of a post-operational report is to learn lessons."

Patrick Mercer, a spokesman for the opposition Conservative Party, said: "It was clear all along that not enough troops were being sent and that this was a political and not a military decision."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Backlash Against Hardball Tactics (CHIT)

By Greg Burns, Tribune Senior Correspondent

Chicago Tribune, January 14, 2007

Pro-business interests decry exec prosecution

The government crackdown on corporate crime is coming under pressure to back off amid intense business lobbying and adverse court rulings.

Since the convictions in May of Enron Corp. honchos Jeffrey Skilling and Kenneth Lay, federal authorities have voluntarily stepped away from certain hardball tactics aimed at forcing companies to turn against accused executives.

An even greater retreat could be in the offing as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and other business advocates extend their campaign to reign in what they consider excessive enforcement efforts. On top of that, a string of reversals on appeal has raised fresh doubts about recent government victories targeting criminal fraud among the business elite.

Some close observers sense a tide turning. "Every month that goes by, the pushback seems to gather more steam," says Douglas Berman, a law professor at Ohio State University. "It's a realization the tough-on-crime campaign against white-collar offenders was at risk of being too tough."

On Jan. 5, appellate judges tossed out most of the charges against top executives at Westar Energy, who were accused of looting the Topeka-based public utility in a case dubbed the "Kansas Enron."

Though the Justice Department touted those 2005 convictions as proof that "no boardroom is above the law," Denver's 10th Circuit Court of Appeals found that prosecutors based their sweeping indictment on a "thin legal thread."

As standards shift, even the judge who presided over the Enron trial has conceded that Skilling has a good chance of seeing one count of conspiracy conviction overturned.

While U.S. District Judge Sim Lake ruled that Skilling's 18 other convictions were likely to stand on appeal, some legal experts believe Enron's "smartest guy in the room" may yet win on wider issues. That could lead to a reduction in the 24-year sentence he began serving last month at a low-security Minnesota prison.

DOJ_NMG_0116714

Skilling's attorney, Dan Petrocelli, says softer attitudes toward white-collar crime can only help as he presses for release of his client.

"He's very optimistic, as we are, that he won't be there very long," Petrocelli says.

At Wayne State University law school, white-collar-fraud specialist Peter Henning agrees that Skilling could benefit from new skepticism about "the aggressive use of criminal laws against corporate executives. In these very high-profile cases, there are more reversals. If I were Jeff Skilling, I'd have more hope."

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse says no one at his agency is retreating from aggressive prosecution of corporate fraud. "The numbers certainly don't bear that out," he says. "We remain extremely committed to the prosecution of those in the corporate community who would violate the trust of their employees, of the investing public, or both."

Federal prosecutors have tallied more than 1,000 corporate fraud convictions since Enron's 2001 collapse, and the ongoing investigation into options backdating by pay-hungry executives stands to yield more. But the task has been challenging.

The conviction of Lay, who died July 5, and Skilling came amid defeats in other Enron-related matters, most notably the overturned conviction of Chicago's Andersen accounting firm and the withdrawal of a guilty plea from lead auditor David Duncan. In a related case involving Enron-owned power plants in Nigeria, a group of Merrill Lynch executives saw their convictions reversed in a decision that weakened an element of the fraud statute.

For every duly convicted Bernard Ebbers and Martha Stewart, it seems, a KPMG accountant or Frank Quattrone scores one for the defense.

In a 2006 study tracking some of the most prominent corporate trials, Washington University researcher Kathleen Brickey found "surprisingly mixed results," with juries convicting 18 defendants, acquitting 11 and deadlocking on 15 others. That trial record, which lags well behind the government's success rate in criminal litigation overall, supports the business-lobby criticism that prosecutors were "trying to find crimes where none really exists," the Brickey study noted.

Yet after factoring in guilty pleas, cooperation agreements and retrials, the prosecutors' track record in complex corporate cases improves to "a respectable, if not spectacular conviction rate," Brickey concluded. Even so, the jury is still out on the wisdom of using "individual criminal prosecutions to address systemic corporate fraud," she found.

Some fight whole-firm tack

Meanwhile, business advocates have targeted enforcement aimed at corporations rather than individuals. They tallied a victory in December when the Justice Department put new restraints on prosecutors who were demanding the legal communications of companies under threat of indictment.

The routine practice of forcing those businesses to waive attorney-client privilege as a condition of settlement violates the rights of defendants, critics say. And even the new restraints fail to go far enough in protecting companies from being indicted, they assert.

"We've learned something from Andersen, where thousands of innocent people were ruined," says Hal Scott, a Harvard University law professor who heads a pro-business lobbying group. "You should only prosecute when the whole company is criminal from bottom to top."

Business-friendly activists also aim to roll back elements of the Sarbanes-Oxley anti-fraud provisions, provide more protection for auditors, loosen regulations that discourage the free flow of investment capital and, to hear the Chamber of Commerce tell it, redirect prosecutors to "real" crimes outside the gray areas of corporate decision-making.

"A lot of the cases end up revolving around difficult or ambiguous accounting rules," says David Chavern, a senior vice president at the U.S. chamber. "We have to hope there will be less grandstanding and more focus on real fraud."

To a degree, business lobbyists already have "won this battle," says Russell Mokhiber, of the Corporate Crime Reporter newsletter. "These are real crimes. There's a real need for corporate criminal liability. But the drive by the big business community is to get rid of it, and they effectively have."

Targets hire top legal defense

Since the crackdown began four years ago, the wealth of the typical target has translated into vast legal defense funds that have paid for close scrutiny of corporate prosecutions.

DOJ_NMG_0116715

In the "Kansas Enron" case, the appeal of lead defendant David Wittig was led by Seth Waxman, former U.S. solicitor general and a top Supreme Court litigator. Compared to the more typical drug appeal from a jailhouse lawyer, such star power commands attention from appellate judges, notes Ohio State's Berman.

Although prosecutors in the Westar case convinced a Kansas jury that Wittig and a partner milked the company "for all they could through a pattern of fraud and deceit," that finding was mostly irrelevant, the court ruled. The key legal issue was a narrower one of accounting for company air travel.

The government needed to prove the defendants had concealed their personal use of corporate aircraft from regulators who were entitled to know about it, the court determined. Since prosecutors failed to calculate the numbers correctly, the evidence at trial was insufficient, and most of the case can't be re-tried because of the constitutional protection against facing the same charges twice.

The outcome at Westar supports a Skilling contention that jury instructions in his trial were flawed because they failed to clarify how withholding information about Enron from investors might not be criminal, Petrocelli says.

Beyond that, Skilling took heart from a Dec. 12 decision of the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals that identified "serious frailties" in many of his convictions because of the reversal in the Enron-Nigeria case.

But that same appellate decision raised no specific doubts about five convictions for lying to auditors, and it concluded that Skilling should remain in prison because he is unlikely to win a reversal on all his crimes.

Columbia University law professor Jack Coffee doubts any change in public sentiment will alter the outcome of Skilling's appeal, particularly since the next most prominent corporate criminal--WorldCom's Ebbers--had his conviction and sentence upheld. "The odds are very much against him," Coffee says.

No surprise, Skilling's attorney sees it differently.

"As balance, reason and common sense creep back into the environment ... this will be extremely helpful to his appeal," Petrocelli says.

---

gburns@tribune.com

CRIMINAL LAW:

Attorney General Agrees To Take Duke Case (NYT)

By Duff Wilson

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

RALEIGH, N.C., Jan. 13 — North Carolina's attorney general said Saturday that his office would immediately assume control of the Duke lacrosse sexual assault case referred to him on Friday by the Durham County district attorney.

"I wish I could tell you that this case would be resolved quickly," the attorney general, Roy A. Cooper, said at a news conference here on Saturday afternoon. "Since we have not been involved in the investigation or the prosecution of these cases, all of the information will be new to our office. Any case with such serious criminal charges requires a careful and deliberate review."

The district attorney, Michael B. Nifong, had asked Mr. Cooper to take over the prosecution, citing the conflict of interest he faced from having to respond to an ethics complaint from the North Carolina Bar Association. Mr. Nifong was "very disappointed" at giving up the case, his lawyer, David B. Freedman, said Saturday, but pleased with Mr. Cooper's assignment of two veteran prosecutors.

Defense lawyers and families of the defendants welcomed the news that the case would be in the hands of the attorney general's office.

"We are taking a completely new, fresh look at this case, so anything could happen," Mr. Cooper said. "We are looking at all the facts. Whatever charges, if any, are appropriate, they will be pursued."

Mr. Cooper said his office would obtain the case files next week and then meet with defense lawyers and reinterview witnesses, including the accuser. He said he did not know if a pretrial hearing scheduled for Feb. 5 would have to be postponed.

DOJ_NMG_0116716

Mr. Cooper, 49, a Democrat, is a former legislator who wrote a crime victim's bill of rights. He is serving his second term and has announced plans to run for re-election in 2008.

He assigned James J. Coman, head of the attorney general's Law Enforcement and Prosecutions Division, and Mary D. Winstead of the Special Prosecutions Division, to the case. But Mr. Cooper said he would make the final decisions in the case.

"We accept the case with our eyes wide open to the evidence, but with blinders on for all other distractions," Mr. Cooper said.

From the start, the Duke case has been politically charged by race and class. A black woman hired to strip at a Duke lacrosse team party last March 13 accused three white students of gang rape. Protests erupted, and Mr. Nifong expressed with a certainty that a crime had occurred.

But in the last 10 months, his case floundered as defense lawyers offered time-stamped photographs challenging the stripper's account, prosecution reports highlighting the lack of DNA evidence and inconsistencies in the woman's story. Defense lawyers have insisted that the woman, 28, is a false accuser and have painted Mr. Nifong, 55, as a renegade with political motives.

Sexual offense and kidnapping charges are pending against Collin Finnerty, 20, of Garden City, N.Y.; Reade W. Seligmann, of Essex Fells, N.J.; and David F. Evans, 23, of Annapolis, Md. The three were initially charged with rape, but Mr. Nifong dismissed that charge after the accuser told an investigator she could not be sure what had penetrated her.

At State Level, Official Promises Careful Review Of Duke Case (WP)

By Sylvia Adcock, Special To The Washington Post

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

RALEIGH, N.C., Jan. 13 -- North Carolina's attorney general on Saturday promised a "careful and deliberate review" of the sexual abuse case against three Duke lacrosse players but noted that "anything can happen," even new charges, as his office reviews the evidence.

"Agreeing to accept the prosecution of these cases doesn't guarantee a trial, nor does it suggest a dismissal," Attorney General Roy Cooper said at a news briefing, one day after Durham District Attorney Michael B. Nifong asked Cooper's office to take over the case against the three players accused of raping a 28-year-old stripper at a team party last spring.

He emphasized that his prosecutors will be looking at this case with fresh eyes, and that while the review could lead to dropped charges, it could also lead to new charges or reinstatement of rape charges dropped last month.

"Whatever charges -- if any -- are appropriate would be pursued," he said.

Cooper also said his office would not talk about details of the case while it is reviewing the sexual assault and kidnapping charges against Reade Seligmann of Essex Fells, N.J., Collin Finnerty of Garden City, N.Y., and David Evans of Bethesda.

The takeover of the case comes after Nifong sought to recuse himself, and follows weeks of increasing criticism of his handling of the case. Last month, the North Carolina State Bar charged Nifong with ethics violations.

The new lawyers appointed to the case -- career prosecutors Mary D. Winstead and James J. Coman -- will begin by going through the case files, which will be transferred from Durham to Raleigh.

Cooper also said parts of the case may need to be reinvestigated. "I anticipate that our prosecutors will seek to meet with witnesses, with investigators and with defense attorneys." He said that would probably include re-interviewing the accuser.

The work is likely to mean the rescheduling of a Feb. 5 hearing on the police lineup procedures used by Nifong's office, procedures that defense attorneys characterized as giving the accuser "a multiple choice test in which there were no wrong answers." The defense has also filed a motion to move the trial from Durham.

The case has been portrayed as one of race and privilege, pitting the white lacrosse players against a young black woman. But Nifong's actions and statements have received more attention even as the accuser changed her version of events.

On Dec. 15 it was revealed in court that Nifong and the director of a private DNA testing lab had withheld evidence from defense attorneys.

On Dec. 22, Nifong dropped rape charges against the three, but the defendants are still charged with first-degree sexual abuse and first-degree kidnapping.

2 Officers Suspended; Report Was Not Fully Reviewed (NYT)

By Timothy Williams

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

Two police officers have been suspended without pay for failing to adequately investigate a 15-year-old girl's complaint that a man had tried to kidnap her, the police said yesterday. The man, a paroled sex offender, is now suspected of abducting and raping a 17-year-old girl just two hours after the complaint, the police said.

The officers, who have not been identified by the police, are assigned to the 101st Precinct in Queens, said Paul J. Browne, the Police Department's chief spokesman.

The suspect, Eric McCoy, was arrested on Jan. 3 and has been charged with committing two rapes in Queens in a little more than four weeks. In each case, he posed as a police officer and raped his victims inside motel rooms, the police said.

In the first assault, which occurred on Dec. 4, Mr. McCoy abducted a woman, 27, as she was getting off a bus in Jamaica and forced her to a motel, the police said. In the second episode, the authorities said, Mr. McCoy approached a 17-year-old girl on Jan. 2 in Kew Gardens and identified himself as a "police special investigator." He said he had a gun and took her to a motel where he raped her, the police said.

Hours before the second rape, Mr. McCoy had told a 15-year-old girl that he was a police officer investigating an assault. After showing her a fake badge, he told her to wait inside a laundry. Inside, she talked about the encounter with a woman, who called 911, the police said.

Once the police arrived, Mr. McCoy approached the squad car and told the officers that two girls had been in a fight. When the girl came to the car, they asked whether she had been fighting. They told her to get into the car, drove her to a subway station and told her to go to school, the authorities said.

The officers failed to check whether Mr. McCoy had a criminal record and, apparently, to question others at the scene, the police said. Mr. McCoy was arrested after one victim remembered that he had identified himself as "Investigator McCoy."

'GANGLAND' G-MAN SENT RAT INTO TRAP (NYPOST)

By Erin Calabrese, And Brad Hamilton

The New York Post, January 14, 2007

January 14, 2007 -- It was the FBI's version of a planned hit.

That's what mob turncoat Carmine Imbriale says he faced in 1992 after former G-man Lindley DeVecchio rigged him with a wire and sent him to gather evidence against Gregory Scarpa, the boss of the Colombo crime family.

What Imbriale didn't know, he says, was that DeVecchio - the allegedly corrupt FBI supervisor facing charges he helped Scarpa carry out gangland executions - had tipped off the mobster about Imbriale's deal.

Sending him back on the street meant "I could have been killed at any time," Imbriale told The Post.

"It was amazing I wasn't killed," said the former loan shark, who is in witness protection. "[DeVecchio] had no right letting Greg know about me."

Only a two-week battle with migraines saved him, Imbriale said.

"They came to my house three times to take me out," Imbriale said. "I could not move. I was vomiting and everything."

A hit-team member, Joey Ambrosino, kept trying to draw him out.

"I said, 'Joey, look at me. I was throwing my guts up. I can't walk.' . . . He couldn't get me out of the house."

In a congressional report obtained by The Post - prepared by "G-mom" Angela Clemente, a private mob investigator who aided the DeVecchio probe - an internal FBI document sheds light on how Imbriale was sold out.

Just hours after Imbriale agreed to turn state's witness, DeVecchio got a call from Scarpa, FBI agent Christopher Favo said in the report.

DeVecchio "listened to the caller and then said, 'I don't know what he's saying about you. We haven't even talked to him yet,' " the report says.

The Favo report will likely become a key piece of evidence against DeVecchio in his upcoming trial - and in ex-NYPD Detective Joe Simone's bid to get back his pension.

Simone was blamed for the leaks to Scarpa and was indicted but never tried. Simone says DeVecchio pointed the finger at him to throw off suspicion of himself.

"They treated me like garbage," said the ex-cop.

erin.calabrese@nypost.com

Probe Has Long, Sharp Edge (SPREP)

By Jack Flynn

Springfield (MA) Republican, January 14, 2007

SPRINGFIELD - Thirty-three victories in 34 cases.

Half a dozen public agencies under new management.

Five million in swindled tax dollars being pumped back into a financially depleted city.

Half a decade after it started, Springfield's clean government makeover, courtesy of the FBI, IRS and other federal agencies, just keeps going. Since August, 17 defendants have pleaded guilty to stealing public money earmarked for the poor, sick and homeless.

But behind the flurry of recent prosecutions, the U.S. Justice Department's landmark corruption probe is undergoing its own transformation, with three top investigators leaving the case since August and no high-profile indictments or raids in more than a year.

For the first time since 2003, when indictments began cascading from U.S. District Court here, Springfield's seemingly endless corruption probe appears to be winding down.

Not so fast, says the region's FBI bureau chief, Michael G. O'Reilly.

"Certainly, some of the urgency has drained away with all the success we've had," said O'Reilly, who took over the Springfield office in 2001. "But after terrorism, fighting organized crime is still our No. 1 priority."

Those convicted run the gamut from powerful and well connected - former Police Commission Chairman Gerald A, Phillips, two-term state Rep. Christopher P. Asselin, homeless shelter director Francis G. Keough III - to little-known building contractors, a no-show bakery employee and a convicted sex offender with a patronage job on the city Health and Human Services Department payroll.

Several defendants, including Phillips, were convicted on whittled-down versions of the original charges, and some received probation or short prison sentences. Phillips, ordered to serve 21 months in a Pennsylvania prison, is finishing out the term at a Ludlow pre-release center.

The only outright defeat for prosecutors came in October, when a judge threw out racketeering and bid-rigging charges against a Springfield Housing Authority contractor because the five-year statute of limitations had expired.

Twelve other defendants, including Housing Authority Director Raymond B. Asselin, who resigned in 2003 before being indicted, had already accepted plea deals in the case.

For the moment at least, the investigation seems to be a victim of its own success.

Lead prosecutor Assistant U.S. Attorney William M. Welch II and FBI special agent Susan M. Kossler took promotions in Washington, D.C., and FBI agent Clifford W. Hedges - lead investigator in the corruption probe - has been assigned to other cases in Springfield.

The higher-ups who authorized the investigation are moving on, too. Boston FBI chief Kenneth W. Kaiser was recently tapped for a new post in Washington and the state's U.S. Attorney Michael J. Sullivan is now doubling as acting director of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

In Springfield, several key investigators - including FBI special agent William T. Wittrock and IRS special agent Michael Brin - remain on the case, joined by Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven H. Breslow.

The sudden shift in the probe coincided with Breslow's arrival last summer. A prosecutor in the Brooklyn, N.Y., office, Breslow was transferred here to work with Welch, then wound up with his job and caseload.

For all the turbulence, Kevin O'Regan, a prosecutor and former supervisor of the Springfield U.S. Attorney's Office, said public corruption is still a top priority.

DOJ_NMG_0116719

"These cases have a significant deterrent value," said O'Regan, now working with Breslow on corruption cases. "But equally important is the restoration of the public confidence."

Whatever its future, the investigation has rerouted the power grid of Springfield - from the mayor's office, reclaimed by 79-year old Charles V. Ryan as an honest-government candidate in 2004, to the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority, now run by a new director and reorganized advisory board.

The investigation also created a cottage industry for the region's defense lawyers, and snarled several agencies in red tape for months. Three SHA managers, for example, were suspended with pay in late 2003, reinstated in 2004 and then fired within a year.

To handle its scandal management chores, the PVTA hired four outside lawyers before terminating its staff lawyer, who responded with a lawsuit against the agency.

Northampton defense lawyer John P. Pucci said the immediate future of the probe is difficult to predict, given the secrecy of grand jury investigations and the sheer number cases churned out in the last three years.

"There was no public corruption investigations in Springfield for a very long time," said Pucci, a former federal prosecutor. "So the corruption that was there continued. People were emboldened."

The trial of former mayoral aide Anthony M. Ardolino, his brother Chester J. Ardolino, an ex-police officer, and developer Matthew D. Campagnari, is set for April 4. The trio has pleaded innocent to skimming $700,000 from two downtown bars they owned while Anthony Ardolino was chief of staff for Mayor Michael J. Albano.

No trial date has been set for former Chicopee Mayor Richard R. Goyette, indicted in 2005 for allegedly shaking down a towing contractor for campaign donations.

Conspicuously absent from the legal drama has been Albano, whose tenure at City Hall from 1996 to 2003 attracted the most aggressive federal scrutiny.

After Phillips was indicted in 2003, his lawyer said the FBI was pressuring his client for incriminating information on Albano. But the four-term Democrat was never identified as a target, and his name never surfaced in court documents.

Now living in East Longmeadow, Albano, 56, was in federal court in Boston last month, testifying in a wrongful imprisonment suit by two men who spent three decades behind bars for a killing committed by Mafia hitman-turned-FBI informant.

A member of the Massachusetts Parole Board in the 1980s, Albano said he was pressured by two FBI agents to keep the innocent men behind bars. Both agents were later implicated in an FBI corruption scandal, and one convicted in 2002 of racketeering and obstruction of justice.

Asked about corruption in Springfield last week, Albano changed the subject to Boston.

"I just testified against the FBI and the U.S. Attorney's Office in the biggest civil suit against the government in history," he said.

Asked again about the Springfield case, Albano responded: "I'm awaiting the outcome of that (the Boston) trial."

Even At 96, Alleged Mobster Is Not Beyond Reach Of Law (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

Albert Facchiano may be the oldest person indicted by the U.S.

MIAMI — With his trial on racketeering charges set to begin next month, Albert "The Old Man" Facchiano may be living proof that the only way to leave the mafia is feet first.

Facchiano, 96, is believed to be the oldest person ever indicted by the federal government and would likely be the country's most senior of senior-citizen inmates if convicted and sent to prison for alleged violent service to the Genovese crime family.

A federal grand jury last year issued a six-count indictment of Facchiano and six other South Florida men tied to the New York mob, alleging they ran the mafia's Miami operations and engaged in "a pattern of racketeering activity" that included extortion, robbery, money laundering and loan sharking.

DOJ_NMG_0116720

It is unclear from the Florida indictment whether Facchiano is suspected of actually pulling a trigger or wielding a lead pipe. But a parallel New York indictment of 30 reputed Genovese members specifically accuses the nonagenarian of trying to intimidate or eliminate a witness in the federal government's case against the nation's most powerful crime family.

Facchiano's attorney, Brian McComb, said he was trying to negotiate a plea bargain for his client, whom he describes as having "a lot of medical problems" but still able to participate effectively in his own defense. The accused, who will turn 97 on March 10, is in full possession of his mental faculties "so far," McComb said. "I think this is going to end up being worked out," the lawyer from the Florida Gold Coast city of Stuart predicted.

But the U.S. attorney's office for south Florida reports that its prosecution of Facchiano is on track to begin Feb. 22 in the court of U.S. District Judge James I. Cohn.

"I think the judge gave us sufficient time, and I think he intends to go forward. We're ready to go to trial," said Assistant U.S. Atty. Jeffrey N. Kaplan.

The federal prosecutor said he couldn't comment on whether a plea bargain was underway. He also said the defendant's age was not a matter for consideration, at least at this stage of the case. Kaplan said federal guidelines allude to the issue of a defendant's age or infirmity only in sentencing provisions.

An undercover FBI operation supported by federal tax authorities led to the grand jury indictment in June, which details extensive mob-related activities by the Florida defendants from 1994 to 2006. The FBI wouldn't have brought the charges against Facchiano if it wasn't committed to prosecuting the man despite his age, said the bureau's Miami spokeswoman, Judy Orihuela.

"When they indict someone, they pretty much already know the person's background," she said, suggesting that if age was a consideration, it had been rejected as an obstacle to prosecution.

After a reputed life of crime that began before the Great Depression, Facchiano is no stranger to the inside of the federal prison network. His first conviction, on robbery and fencing charges, stemmed from a 1932 arrest, and he was also jailed for mob activity in 1936 and 1944. His last incarceration, an eight-year stretch on a 25-year sentence for racketeering, ended in 1989.

Jerry Capeci, a mafia historian and operator of the website Gang Land — http://www.ganglandnews.com — mentioned Facchiano last month in his weekly account of mob developments. He quoted from a reported FBI wiretap of another elderly mobster deriding the notion that he and Facchiano could have committed the crimes with which they were accused.

"I tell you, if we pull the trigger, we woulda fell on the floor," alleged Genovese capo John "Buster" Ardito told an associate wearing a wire for the FBI, according to Capeci.

Facchiano is free on his personal recognizance and a signature bond, said McComb. He is living with a daughter in upscale Bal Harbour, and will not speak to the media until his case is resolved, McComb said.

Neither the Federal Bureau of Prisons nor the Justice Department's Bureau of Justice Statistics could say definitively that there are no prisoners as old as Facchiano currently incarcerated. But officials at both offices, as well as McComb, speculated that the 96-year-old was the nation's oldest alleged criminal.

"We don't have that information. We would need a database of every single prisoner incarcerated in the United States and we don't" have one, said Justice Department statistician Paige Harrison. She noted that less than half of 1% of the country's 1.5 million prisoners are older than 55 — the highest age category on which the department keeps statistics — "so if you start getting into 'older than 80' or 'older than 90,' you're talking about really, really small numbers."

If convicted, Facchiano, also known as "Chinky," could confront a prison sentence of as much as 60 years and fines up to $750,000, according to the federal prosecution statement issued at the time of his indictment. Even then, age alone isn't expected to be a factor in determining the length of time he serves.

"There are some jurisdictions that do compassionate releases based on illness, which may be coupled with the age factor," Harrison said. "But they're not going to release anyone simply because they're old."

Advocates of sentencing reform contend there would be little purpose in imprisoning a man of Facchiano's age.

"What benefit is society going to get from incarcerating an individual who is 96 years old? Does he demonstrate a threat to anyone? If the answer is no, the question is whether there are other means of addressing his sentencing other than prison," said Ryan King, policy analyst for the Washington-based Sentencing Project, a nonprofit group that urges alternatives to incarceration in cases with extenuating circumstances.

DOJ_NMG_0116721

"If an individual is elderly and offers less of a threat of escape or other risks, he could be put in a lower-security facility" or allowed to serve his time under house arrest or electronic supervision, King added. "I'm not saying if an individual is found guilty, he shouldn't be given some sort of punishment — the question is, what kind of punishment is appropriate?"

carol.williams@latimes.com

CIVIL RIGHTS:

The End Of An Era For Marion County Schools (OCALASB)

By Joe Callahan, STAR-BANNER

Ocala (FL) Star-Banner, January 14, 2007

Officials expect longstanding desegregation order will end

OCALA - Marion County Public Schools likely will be released from a 28-year-old federal desegregation order Tuesday when they head back to the U.S. District Court in Jacksonville and ask that the order be lifted, according to the School District's attorney.

Department of Justice officials also will ask U.S. District Judge Harvey E. Schlesinger to give Marion County unitary status, meaning it will no longer be under the government's microscope, said Michael W. Kirk, the Washington, D.C.-based attorney representing Marion County.

There are 15,000 school districts in the country and fewer than 3 percent, or 280 districts, are still under court orders, including Marion County. Another 120 districts are affected by individual lawsuits.

Justice officials inspected area schools last year, and Kirk said they seem satisfied. He said Marion's public schools have complied with all requirements, including recruiting minority teachers, balancing of race in schools and stopping student and teacher transfers.

The Justice Department did not return calls for comment.

Kirk said he believes Schlesinger will uphold the school district's request. Tuesday's 10:30 a.m. hearing may only last a few hours.

Kirk said many statistics show progress and an independent review by the Star-Banner indicates Marion County ranks second out of medium-sized Florida school districts (25,000-49,999 students) in the ratio of minority students per minority teacher.

Only Leon County, which had a ratio of 1 minority teacher per 79.3 minority students, was better than Marion County's 93.4, which is roughly the state average.

"That just shows you the effort they have made," Kirk said.

The federal lawsuit, first filed by the federal government in 1978, was modified in 1995 and again two years ago when Marion failed to prove it was in compliance.

The school system has not reached the required 25 percent minority makeup of faculty. However, Justice officials recognize that minorities tend to go to larger districts for better pay.

Minority teachers now total 19 percent of the faculty, which is 50 percent greater than the state average in similar-size districts.

Even during a time when there is an overall teacher shortage, recruiters were still able to sign up 105 new minority teachers for this school year, or 23 percent of all hires.

The court order also required that all elementary school faculties be within 5 percentage points of the 25 percent goal and secondary schools be within 10 percentage points.

Of the 43 schools, all but six met the goals in March, and all the schools were within 15 percentage points of the overall goal.

When it comes to students, 22 of 27 elementary schools, eight of nine middle schools and all high schools were within the racial balance criteria.

DOJ_NMG_0116722

The schools not meeting the goals fall under court exemptions because the schools are considered rural or have been affected by demographic shifts.

Diana Greene, the school system superintendent in charge of making sure conditions of the desegregation order are met, said she is pleased with the progress.

"Everything has been done," said Greene, adding it will be up to the school administration and School Board to make sure they stay on the road after they are declared unitary.

School Board member Sue Mosley said many parents, students and teachers have been affected by the desegregation order, especially when it comes to transfers.

"We have done everything we have been asked," Mosley said. "It will be great when we are lifted out from underneath this."

School Board officials know, however, that they will have to continue operating as if the desegregation order is still in effect. But the lifting of the order will mean some freedom.

"It will finally give us back our autonomy," School Board member Kurt Kelly said. "When it comes right down to it, we will continue in good faith to maintain the intent of the order."

Ron Crawford, the senior Marion County School Board member and chairman, said he is pleased that the order that has been hovering over Marion County is almost gone.

"It's something that has been with us since I started on the board eight years ago," Crawford said. "I am glad this was completed under my watch."

Retired Dunnellon High School Principal Bobby James, however, said that even though Marion County may get unitary status more work still needs to be done.

James, who launched his career in the 1971-72 school year, said he believes school administrators need to make a concerted effort to recruit a proper balance of qualified minority students into honors or advanced placement courses.

"If you really want to truly know if you have an integrated school system, then look at the racial balances in these honors courses," he said. "There are very few blacks or other minorities for that matter. These classes tend to be for the wealthy white kids. That is one area that needs to be looked into."

Crawford said he wasn't aware of such imbalances and urges anyone with concerns to address the School Board.

Meanwhile, Marion Lenon, who retired as an assistant principal at Fort King Middle School last May, remembers when he started teaching in 1971-72 school year.

Lenon was one of the first black teachers to experience integration, an experience he will never forget. Back then, he was assigned to a predominately white middle school.

Lenon, who has seen the school system grow throughout the years, saluted Superintendent of Schools Jim Yancey and Greene for their work in hopes of getting the order removed.

"Mr. Yancey and Diana Greene did an excellent job in stepping up and getting this resolved," Lenon said. "You can't blame them for something that happened that long ago. In fact, they are the ones who wanted to fight to get this off our shoulders."

From 1983 to 1995, not much was done to comply with the desegregation order. Then in 1995, U.S. Justice officials brought Marion County back to court.

But still, not much headway was being made.

When Jim Yancey became superintendent in 2003, he made meeting the conditions of the desegregation order a top priority, and he assigned Greene the job of spearheading the oversight.

"I really do feel we should have been released from the order in 2003," Yancey said, adding the numbers are basically the same now as back then. "We will be glad to get unitary status."

Joe Callahan may be reached at joe.callahan@starbanner.com or at (352) 867-4113.

Reports: Reviews Rarely Find Fault With Police Use Of Force (AP)

AP, January 14, 2007

Internal reviews and grand jury investigations rarely find fault with police officers who fire their guns or otherwise use force in making arrests, newspapers in Cleveland and Columbus reported.

DOJ_NMG_0116723

Departments rarely involve outside reviewing agencies and records often reveal only scant details about the incidents, The Columbus Dispatch and The (Cleveland) Plain Dealer reported on Sunday.

All 4,427 uses of non-deadly force by Cleveland police were ruled justified in a nearly three-year period from 2003 through last September. One case involving an off-duty officer using pepper spray was deemed "inappropriate" but justified, The Plain Dealer reported.

The investigations were done by district supervisors who directly oversee the officers involved - a practice that the U.S. Justice Department warned the city in 2002 could create a conflict of interest.

The Dispatch reviewed 112 police shootings in Columbus from 1996 through 2005. Of those, six ended with rulings that officers violated department policy. One was fired. Franklin County grand juries independently reviewed only the 25 shootings that resulted in deaths. Most 2006 cases are still under review.

The newspapers noted either missing records or a dearth of public information.

About 30 percent of the cases reviewed by The Plain Dealer - after making a database from 238,000 electronic records and 2,000 paper ones including arrests, use of force reports and citizen complaints - were incorrectly logged or had missing records. The department itself was not analyzing data or tracking which officers used force most often.

"How do you look for patterns or trends if you're not even paying attention to it?" said Geoffrey Alpert, who studies law enforcement at the University of South Carolina.

The newspaper said Patrolman Martin Rudin used non-deadly force in 36 incidents, or 12 percent of his arrests over the 44 months reviewed - and the most among the department's 1,600 officers. Rudin also was involved in three shootings from 1990 to 2004. One shooting killed the suspect.

Rudin said he patrols dangerous areas overnight and follows department rules. The police union also defended his record.

"In a perfect world, bad guys would stop and put their hands behind their backs," said Steve Loomis, president of the Cleveland Police Patrolmen's Association. "The reality is they don't. They run, they fight, they spit, they shoot."

Cleveland Police Chief Michael McGrath has ordered officers to keep complete and accurate records and start analyzing data to look for officers who most frequently use force and attract complaints. Police officials also said they would simplify the form officers use to report incidents so fewer mistakes are made while entering data.

Columbus police say the few cases of unjustified shootings show good training for the city's 1,870 officers. Police say suspects threatened officers with a weapon or vehicle in 85 percent of the shootings.

However, the department routinely keeps secret all but the most basic details of the shootings, the Dispatch reported.

Officer James Scanlon, who was involved in two shootings in the 10-year period reviewed, said the department should release more information. He said friends and relatives of the suspects often fill in the gaps with rumor, and officers already under stress then face criticism without a public response from their bosses.

"The brass could be more proactive by coming out with enough to counter some of the misinformation, a few facts that would indicate the officers did what they had to do," Scanlon said. "The facts are always going to benefit us."

Fred Gittes, a Columbus civil-rights attorney and frequent police critic, said a citizen commission to review officers' use of force would boost public confidence.

"Police policing the police doesn't work very well," he said. "And a grand jury isn't a substitute for an independent review. It's all done in secret."

In Cincinnati, where a police slaying of an unarmed black man in 2001 triggered rioting, the department has agreed to use a court-appointed outside monitor to review its traffic stops and use-of-force policies as part of a 2002 settlement of a racial profiling lawsuit.

Cleveland Police Always Justify Using Force (CLPD)

By Gabriel Baird, Plain Dealer Reporter

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, January 14, 2007

Cleveland police supervisors reviewed 4,427 incidents in which police used non-deadly force in the last four years and determined the officers were justified in every case.

DOJ_NMG_0116724

The only way police could rule that every single use-of-force incident was justified, some experts said, was to rubber-stamp rather than to investigate them.

Dennis J. Kenney, a professor at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York who specializes in police use of force, said that either Cleveland's officers are unbelievably well-trained or their investigations are cursory.

His opinion echoed criticism the U.S. Department of Justice leveled against Cleveland police. In 2000, the Justice Department opened an investigation into whether the city's police routinely violated citizens' constitutional rights.

After two years of investigating, they found widespread problems with police guidelines for using force and investigating these incidents.

The chief of the Justice Department's Special Litigation Section lambasted Cleveland police in a 2002 letter, questioning "the competency, thoroughness, and impartiality of use of force investigations."

To avoid the possibility of federal sanctions suffered by other cities, Cleveland police promised improvements.

"The Division of Police made the changes the Department of Justice asked us to make," Chief Michael McGrath said. "They decided we took the appropriate steps."

Still, more than four years later, many of the problems persist.

To reach this Plain Dealer reporter:

gbaird@plaind.com, 216-999-4141

'Shots Fired' (COLDISP)

By John Futty, THE COLUMBUS DISPATCH

Columbus Dispatch, January 14, 2007

Columbus police are stingy with records of police shootings, but reports indicate officers who pull the trigger almost always get it right

Columbus police officers who shoot someone are almost always justified in the eyes of their supervisors.

Most 2006 cases, including two in November in which officers killed suspects, are under review. In 112 shootings from 1996 through 2005, six officers violated division policies, according to records reviewed by The Dispatch. One was fired.

None of the 153 officers was charged with a crime. The 25 shootings that resulted in deaths were reviewed by Franklin County grand juries; nonfatal shootings are rarely reviewed independently as in some other cities.

Police brass say the dearth of unjustified shootings reflects good training and restraint by the city's 1,870 officers. But few people, even within police ranks, know case details or how often officers are cleared because the division is so secretive. It routinely withholds all but basic details. Even officers' names are usually not disclosed until a day or two after the incident.

The division can take years to fulfill simple records requests. To conduct this study, The Dispatch filed its first request for public records more than 2½ years ago.

"I don't believe they are saying enough," said Officer James Scanlon, who was involved in two shootings during the decade and a fatal shooting in 1991, all as a member of the SWAT team. "There is a void."

An analysis of the 112 officerinvolved shootings from the past decade found little evidence to refute that most were justified. The review identified only four cases in which officers fired at a suspect under the mistaken impression that the person was armed. All were ruled justified.

Deadly-force expert Tom Aveni said that statistic "would suggest to me that they are better than the national average. I'd have to say they're doing something right."

Too often, Scanlon said, the information void is filled by misinformation and criticism from friends and relatives of those shot by police. Officers, often traumatized by the experience, face additional stress when they are second-guessed by the public without response from police officials, he said.

"The brass could be more proactive by coming out with enough to counter some of the misinformation, a few facts that would indicate the officers did what they had to do," Scanlon said. "The facts are always going to benefit us."

Lack of information is one of the biggest frustrations for relatives of those who die in police shootings, said Fred Gittes, a Columbus civil-rights lawyer.

DOJ_NMG_0116725

"They are desperately trying to piece things together, but they are operating in the dark," he said. "The police don't even tell the family as much as they tell (the media)."

Officer Jim Gilbert, a 10-year veteran who was involved in a fatal shooting in 2000, was elected president of the local police union last month with a campaign pledge to be a more vocal supporter of officers.

"It is up to the union to step up and speak for the officers involved because the division has shown they're not going to do it," said Gilbert, who heads Fraternal Order of Police Capital City Lodge No. 9.

Deputy Chief John Rockwell said police administrators have no choice but to limit the information released while an officer-involved shooting is under investigation.

"It's a dilemma for us. We want to get information out as quickly as possible, to put people at ease," he said, "but there are concerns about jeopardizing the case."

In response to Dispatch questions raised during interviews for this story, the division began issuing news releases last month to report the outcome of its investigations of officerinvolved shootings.

Similar questions prompted Franklin County Prosecutor Ron O'Brien to say that his office, which presents all fatal officer-involved shootings to a grand jury, will issue news releases to announce grand-jury decisions.

Other communities do more. In Denver, which boasts of the most-open officer-involvedshooting protocol in the country, the district attorney reviews police shootings that injure or kill someone and then issues a letter explaining the case and whether charges will be filed. After an internal investigation, the Denver public-safety manager issues a more detailed report and says whether the shooting followed policy.

"We try to make the process as transparent as possible," said Chuck Lepley, first assistant district attorney. "It's for the protection of the officer as much as anyone."

In Columbus, police have been slow to respond to requests for information from past shooting investigations.

In August 2004, The Dispatch first asked to review the division's investigative files on police shootings, and it took 2½ years for the division to make available all files from 2003 and 2004.

The Dispatch also filed a series of public-records requests in search of a comprehensive accounting of the decade's shootings. Some records from the 1990s no longer exist, including many of the decision letters from the Firearms Board of Inquiry, which reviews shootings by officers.

Aveni, co-founder of the Police Policy Studies Center in Spofford, N.H., said most police officials distrust the news media and resist providing information about officerinvolved shootings.

"There is a mistaken belief that a lot of this stuff will be misconstrued, and that when it appears in the media, it will paint a negative picture of the way police use deadly force," he said.

"Just the opposite is true. Most studies show that the use of force is very judicious and very infrequent."

Deadly force appears to be a last resort for Columbus officers. In 2005, 17 officer-involved shootings occurred — the highest annual total of the decade. That year, one in every 68,548 Columbus police incidents resulted in officers firing shots.

Officers reported using force 2,957 times that year. They fired their weapons in less than onehalf of 1 percent of those cases.

The most fatal shootings by officers during one year in that decade was six, in 2000. That number was matched in 2006, but those cases, along with eight nonfatal shootings, were not included in the Dispatch review because several remain under investigation.

A majority of the people shot at by police during the decade were black, which is in line with the demographics encountered by officers investigating violent crime, officials said.

"High-crime areas have a high population of blacks," said Columbus Police Chief James G. Jackson, who is black.

Of the people shot at by officers during the decade whose identities were available through public records, 64 percent were black, 32 percent white, 2 percent Hispanic and 2 percent Asian.

Of the 25 who died, 12 were white, 11 black and two Hispanic.

Of the 153 officers involved in shootings during the decade, 88 percent were white. The police force is 86 percent white, the safety director's office says.

DOJ_NMG_0116726

Sgt. Dana Winship, a firearms supervisor, said the division strives to provide firearms training for each officer four times a year. In addition to shooting at stationary targets and qualifying with their weapons annually, officers might be sent through a maze where they face pop-up targets that represent threats, other officers or innocent bystanders.

"It's all about decision-making," he said. "Once you have identified a threat, what is your next step? "

Whenever an officer shoots at someone, members of the division's Critical Incident Response Team investigate. The team of 10 experienced homicide detectives and two sergeants was created more than a decade ago.

"It used to be that some of these investigations were done by street lieutenants with very little experience and few resources," said detective James McCoskey, one of the team's founding members. "Some of those investigations got screwed up. We started talking about putting together our most senior investigators (to give) street officers the best investigations we can."

With oversight from the division's internal affairs bureau, the team interviews officers and all witnesses at the scene. Crime-scene and ballistic specialists investigate all shootings, and the coroner's office investigates deaths.

The result is an investigative packet that can number hundreds of pages and goes to the Firearms Board of Inquiry, which comprises three commanders. In fatal shootings, the packet first goes to the prosecutor's office for grand jury review.

Firearms Board members offer an opinion about whether the shooting followed policy. That opinion is reviewed by the officer's chain of command, with a deputy chief making the final decision.

Since 2000, the earliest year for which complete records are available, the average investigation has taken nearly seven months. One case from October 2005 is still being reviewed by the Firearms Board.

It's worse elsewhere. In Cleveland, where the city law director decides whether to file criminal charges, some cases languished so long that the mayor called in a special prosecutor last year to review five shootings, one of them 2 years old.

Columbus police officials say the length of their investigations results from a thoroughness that makes a cover-up unlikely.

"There is so much oversight by so many different units within the division, plus the coroner's office and the prosecutor's office when there is a death," said Paul Denton, a former Columbus police commander who became chief of the Ohio State University Police Department in November. "You'd have to have a large conspiracy to think that anyone could taint an investigation of that type."

Division policy permits officers to use deadly force when they "have reason to believe the response is objectively reasonable to protect themselves or others from the imminent threat of death or serious physical harm."

And case law gives officers much leeway when they shoot because of a perceived threat. The U.S. Supreme Court, in the 1989 Graham vs. Connor decision, ruled that police actions must be judged against how a reasonable officer would act under the same circumstances, "rather than with the 20/20 vision of hindsight."

A 1994 ruling by the 4 th Circuit Court of Appeals said the court "will not second-guess the split-second judgment of a trained police officer merely because that judgment turns out to be mistaken, particularly where inaction could result in death or serious injury to the officer or others."

Gittes, a frequent critic of police misconduct, conceded that most officer-involved shootings are justified.

"Other kinds of force are a much bigger problem," he said. "Officers are more willing to use other kinds of force because the consequences are not as serious."

He is among those who say a citizen-review commission is the only way to ensure public confidence in investigations of deadly force.

"Police policing the police doesn't work very well," he said. "And a grand jury isn't a substitute for an independent review. It's all done in secret."

Division and FOP leaders have opposed a citizen commission, and only a minority of City Council members have expressed interest in the idea.

"I believe it can be a useful tool if done the right way," said Councilman Kevin Boyce. "So far, there hasn't been the right proposal."

Scanlon said the current system is daunting enough that it likely causes officers to hesitate before pulling the trigger.

"In this day and age, the aftermath is in the back of the officer's mind," he said. "They know what they'll go through. You hope that officers put that out of their mind in a deadlyforce situation, but it's always there."

DOJ_NMG_0116727

Rockwell said the restraint shown by officers who find themselves in potentially lifethreatening situations is difficult to measure.

"How many officers could use deadly force and don't? " he asked. "There is no statistic for that."

Revival Of Akaka Bill Planned (HSB)

By Richard Borreca

Honolulu Star-Bulletin, January 14, 2007

The congressman is optimistic about its passage with the new Democratic majority

WASHINGTON » U.S. Sen. Daniel Akaka will again seek passage of a native Hawaiian recognition bill possibly as early as this week, some seven months after a procedural defeat on the Senate floor.

Cheered by his new Democratic majority, Akaka was rounding up signatures of both new and old supporters last week. As soon as he gets what is a politically viable number, Akaka said, he will introduce the so-called Akaka Bill.

"I wanted to drop (introduce) it this week, but there were some members I wanted for co-sponsor," Akaka said Friday.

ON ASSIGNMENT Honolulu Star-Bulletin Capitol Bureau Chief Richard Borreca will be filing reports from Washington, D.C., all this week on Hawaii's congressional delegation as the new Democratic majority in Congress takes power.

Last year, Akaka had the backing of the Democrats, but was not able to get the 60 votes needed to stop a GOP filibuster of the measure and bring it to the floor for a vote.

Haunani Apoliona, Office of Hawaiian Affairs chairwoman, said, "It's good news that immediate introduction will be occurring."

She added: "We look forward to passage early rather than later in 2007. There's a lot at stake for the present and future of native Hawaiians."

Because it is a new piece of legislation this year, the Akaka Bill will have to go back to committee. Akaka said he is confident it will get a good reception at the Indian Affairs committee, because the new Democratic chairman, Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., "is excited about getting the bill passed."

Akaka's timetable is to have the Hawaiian recognition bill clear the Senate by as early as March. It would then have to be approved by the House before it could go to President Bush.

The measure has had a confusing legislative history since it was first introduced by Akaka and fellow Hawaii Democrat Sen. Daniel Inouye in 2000.

The bill, officially called the Hawaiian Government Reorganization Act, would recognize native Hawaiians' status as an indigenous people, and establish a process for official U.S. recognition of a future native Hawaiian representative body.

Akaka said he is optimistic after six years of delays as the bill was rejected or stalled by GOP opponents, and then blocked by a last-minute letter of objections from the Justice Department last year.

"I would say we are better off, and we are in the majority. We will have a better chance working with the majority," Akaka said.

Last year, Akaka and the administration of Republican Gov. Linda Lingle, which also supports the bill, negotiated much of the summer to meet objections from the White House and the Justice Department.

To get the bill to the floor for a vote, Akaka and Lingle had agreed to a series of amendments, which legal consultants said wouldn't change the impact of the measure, but would make it palatable to the GOP administration.

Charles Wilkinson, a University of Colorado law professor, wrote last year that the proposed amendments would still accomplish the bill's purpose.

"Without question, the central thrust of the bill -- especially the overarching goal of establishing a sovereign native Hawaii government, recognized by the United States and assuming responsibility for the significant financial and land resources currently administered by state agencies -- remains completely intact," Wilkinson said in an opinion posted on the OHA Web site.

Opponents have said the Akaka Bill illegally discriminates in favor of one race and would not be constitutional, while supporters say the bill is about the former Hawaiian nation and not an ethnic group.

DOJ_NMG_0116728

Akaka said his plan is to introduce a bill that incorporates the amendments, and that should be more convincing to opponents.

"The bill will include the substitute amendments that the Justice Department and the administration had concerns about," Akaka said in an interview here.

"I think the substitute amendments will show that they had a hand in this and they can't say it is unconstitutional because this bill indicates they just wanted some clarifications and they are in the bill," he said.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

DEA Reportedly Wants 3 New Offices Along Border (SAEN)

By Mariano Castillo, Express-News Border Bureau

San Antonio Express-News, January 14, 2007

LAREDO — Reports that the Drug Enforcement Administration has asked the Mexican government to approve new DEA offices along the border abound, but officials on both sides of the border are keeping mum on the details.

The DEA wants to expand its presence in Mexico by placing agents in offices in the border cities of Matamoros , Nuevo Laredo and Nogales , the Mexico City newspaper Reforma and the Houston Chronicle reported, citing anonymous officials.

“DEA has a very strong relationship with Mexican authorities, but any talk of new offices is premature,” agency spokesman Steve Robertson said. “No decision has been made yet.”

But privately, agents along the border are excited and are following the developments closely, a border law enforcement source said.

The proposed offices would cost about $4.5 million a year and would be staffed by five to seven people each, the Houston Chronicle reported.

If the plan is approved, it would place U.S. agents in an area plagued by drug-related violence for much of the past three years.

Matamoros and Nuevo Laredo are strongholds for the Gulf Cartel, and violence regularly flares up in the region as other criminal organizations battle for the same smuggling routes into the United States.

The DEA already has a large presence in Mexico, with offices in Mexico City, Guadalajara, Hermosillo, Mazatlan and Monterrey . According to the agency, it has 62 special agents, 19 intelligence specialists and two chemists in Mexico.

Citing Mexican diplomatic sources, Reforma reported the U.S. government's request was under review by the offices of Mexico's secretary of foreign relations and attorney general.

But officially, authorities have made no public comment about a request.

At an impromptu news conference in Mexico City on Monday, Mexico's secretary of foreign relations, Patricia Espinosa , said she had no information on the DEA request when asked about it, spokeswoman Amparo Hernandez said.

Hernandez declined to comment beyond what Espinosa told reporters.

News of the planned expansion coincided with a visit to Mexico by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales , who met with his counterpart, Eduardo Medina Mora , on Thursday.

In remarks after their meeting, Gonzales touted the need for expanded cooperation but didn't mention the request for more U.S. agents in Mexico.

“Clearly, Mexico and the United States have a shared responsibility to make our communities safer from the drug traffickers and criminals who are threatening our way of life,” Gonzales said. “Both Attorney General Medina Mora and I wholeheartedly agree that our law enforcement officials must be able to cooperate with one another on a broader scale and in an atmosphere of mutual trust if we are going to be able to turn back the tide of recent violence and crime that so adversely affects us all.”

Once Its Star, Agent Assails ATF (AZREP)

By Dennis Wagner, The Arizona Republic

Arizona Republic, January 14, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0116729

Leaders dispute picture of a bureau run amok

Jay Dobyns is no stranger to dangerous adversaries.

Within days of becoming a sworn agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, Dobyns was taken hostage and shot during a Tucson sting operation.

A year later, he was run over by gangsters in a getaway car.

advertisement

Since then, he has gone undercover to bust bombmakers, murderers, drug dealers, gunrunners and prison thugs. Three years ago, he infiltrated the Hells Angels so completely that he was offered membership in the biker club.

Now, after nearly two decades of service, after being praised by ATF as a hero and earning national awards, the man known as "Jaybird" is battling his most formidable foe yet: his employer.

Dobyns, 45, is one of dozens of current and former agents to allege mismanagement and misconduct in the ATF, a federal agency responsible for enforcing America's gun laws and preventing terrorist bombings. More than a dozen lawsuits, administrative claims, grievances, ATF documents and letters to Congress reviewed by The Arizona Republic accused administrators of betraying their own field investigators and operatives out of arrogance or incompetence.

A 2006 inspector general's report also found that the agency was plagued by poor management and questionable judgment. The ATF director resigned amid the inspector general's investigation. But agents, lawyers and experts say problems persist, and if left unchecked, a troubled agency will continue to spin out of control.

"The public needs to know," said Kay Kubicki, a Detroit attorney and former agent who has represented about 25 ATF employees in cases against the bureau, winning half of them and obtaining settlements in some others. "This has a lot to do with homeland security."

Life undercover, under fire Jay Dobyns is a picture-perfect undercover man.

Tough and profane, he wears a pointy goatee and silver rings on all his fingers. He is heavily tattooed. And he keeps a dark wool cap pulled low to the brow.

All this, even when he is not trying to infiltrate the Hells Angels or take part in some sting operation.

Dobyns, among the most celebrated agents within the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, has lived on the edge from the beginning of his career.

In 1988, 10 days after getting his shield, Dobyns was part of a task force chasing an ex-con on foot. Near a Tucson trailer park, the felon took Dobyns hostage at gunpoint. The rookie agent was dragged into a car as other agents converged.

Dobyns described the incident in Angels of Death, a book published last year. He said it was clear he was going to be killed if he let the crook drive away, and he preferred to die among friends. So he tried to escape and took a bullet in the back as the criminal was gunned down.

"I was lying on the desert thinking, 'I got shot before I even got my first paycheck.' "

Dobyns survived and, one year later, got into another shootout while on duty in Chicago. This time, as described in Angels of Death, he was working a sting on gunrunners. As the takedown began, two suspects leaped into a car and drove directly at Dobyns.

He opened fire, wounding the driver. But Dobyns was still knocked through the air - and back into the hospital.

Claims of abuse In grievances filed with the ATF, Dobyns claimed the agency failed to protect him when he was threatened in the line of duty and then harassed him when he complained about the lack of security. He has submitted a multimillion-dollar claim alleging the bureau ignored death threats against him and his family.

According to a grievance Dobyns filed in May, ATF administrators sought to undermine his credibility by spreading false allegations that he was psychologically unfit for duty and a danger to himself or others. Dobyns alleged in that 83-page record that he was subjected to unwanted transfers, denied security, accused of fraud and blocked from getting a Medal of Valor.

In internal probes, the ATF has dismissed most of Dobyns' complaints.

Dobyns' allegations were lodged first in ATF grievances, followed by complaints to the Justice Department's Inspector General's Office, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and members of Congress. According to those filings, the conflict escalated as Dobyns challenged bosses, complaining up the chain of command.

Other bureau employees, some of whom have similar problems with the ATF, say Dobyns' transformation from hero to scapegoat is just one example of mismanagement that pervades the agency.

ATF Acting Director Michael J. Sullivan declined to speak about Dobyns' complaints, related investigations or allegations about the agency but said he believes the bureau is "working very hard to carry out a mission on behalf of the American people."

Sullivan believes no other federal law enforcement agency provides taxpayers with a greater return per agent when it comes to arrests and convictions. Field agents, he said, make that possible.

Their security "should be one of our highest priorities," Sullivan said. "This is their agency. . . . If there are things that aren't working well, we should know that and do everything we can to correct it."

But Kubicki claimed managers routinely abuse their authority and are more interested in self-promotion than ATF's mission. "There's a saying in ATF: 'Big cases, big problems. Little cases, little problems. No cases, no problems,' " she said. "But you're supposed to do big cases in the federal government."

Others say the ATF, with about 5,000 employees and a $980 million budget, is foundering due to ethical failures, rogue investigations, spending abuses and decaying morale.

Vincent Cefalu of Modesto, Calif., a 20-year agent with grievances pending, recently sent a letter to Sullivan complaining about "unethical practices and widespread distrust."

Cefalu accused administrators of "wasting thousands of man-hours and millions of dollars" because internal investigations are mismanaged.

Billy Queen, a former agent who wrote Under and Alone, a book about his infiltration of the Mongols biker gang, said he retired in 2003 after enduring four years of harassment from ATF administration. Queen said he still loves the bureau but believes it is beleaguered by incompetent bully managers.

Such criticisms are supported, at least in part, by the government. A 173-page inspector general's report faulted former ATF Director Carl Truscott, who resigned in August, for misconduct.

Among the conclusions: Truscott overspent on a lavish new headquarters, improperly used employees to help with his nephew's high school documentary and squandered resources on a personal protection team. Perhaps more telling than that behavior, according to the report, was Truscott's dishonesty and finger-pointing when confronted.

The inspector general's probe was prompted by an anonymous letter written by midlevel managers at the ATF, assailing their boss. In the aftermath, line agents wrote a second letter saying those supervisors were equally guilty of mismanagement.

The condemnations are hardly new. In a blistering 1995 report, Time magazine described the ATF as "the most hated federal agency in America . . . a divided and troubled agency far more likely to abuse the rights of its own employees than those of law-abiding citizens." The overall finding: The ATF's in-house scandals and abuses impaired its law enforcement mission.

ATF missteps Last month, Dobyns' attorney, James B. Reed of Phoenix, filed a $3.3 million claim, preliminary to a lawsuit, with ATF headquarters.

Reed wrote that Dobyns was damaged by over 50 acts of "mismanagement, retaliation, harassment and defamation."

An 83-page grievance submitted in May to Edgar Domenech, ATF deputy director, said the problems started after a series of murder plots against Dobyns by the Hells Angels and other criminal outfits.

The grievance said that after the threats came in, the ATF's Office of Operations Security prepared a risk analysis, placing the danger level at "critical." A list of safety measures was drawn up. Yet, according to Dobyns' filings, administrators disputed the danger and denied protections.

"The ATF Field Division was clearly aware of threats," Dobyns wrote in his grievance. "This apathetic attitude . . . is, at a minimum, malfeasance of their office and a dereliction of their duties."

In one instance, Dobyns claimed, the ATF failed to warn him that a prison inmate had discussed plans to kill him and torture his teenage daughter.

"I have served ATF faithfully for over 19 years," Dobyns wrote. "For this, I have been subjected to a calculated attack by members of ATF management."

DOJ_NMG_0116731

In a Nov. 20 letter to Dobyns marked, "Notice of grievance decision," Domenech said "many parts of ATF failed to maintain open and effective communication with you" regarding threats. He also acknowledged "significant issues in carrying out appropriate risk assessment procedures."

Despite that, Domenech concluded, the mistakes were unintentional, and the bureau had "implemented new policies and procedures to redouble its efforts in this regard."

"Therefore," Domenech said, "the personal relief that you seek . . . hereby is denied."

Dobyns, now on leave from the bureau, declined to publicly discuss details of his case beyond an e-mail statement:

"I have been honored to serve ATF. . . . Unfortunately, a wide gap has evolved between the management of the bureau and its front-line field agents. I have high hopes that our new acting director will be able to close that gap."

"I am now a man without a country," Dobyns added. "I am up against the crime syndicate that I infiltrated and the agency that abandoned me. . . . My family lives in fear."

Sheree Mixell, an ATF spokeswoman, said the bureau does not discuss pending investigations or personnel issues. But she noted that in a 2004 survey by the U.S. Office of Personnel Management, the ATF finished first among federal law enforcement agencies in employee satisfaction.

Bureau's star player For most of his life, Jay Dobyns seemed comfortable living on the edge.

At the University of Arizona, he was a star wide receiver, featured on the cover of the Wildcats team program in 1984.

After playing briefly in the Canadian league and now-defunct World Football League, Dobyns looked for an alternative career. Miami Vice lured him into law enforcement, and he chose the ATF because of its Gonzo-style investigations.

Over 18 years, Dobyns, tough, frenetic and profane, worked the Oklahoma City bombing case and the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. He captured a Mexican drug-cartel kingpin, busted Aryan Brotherhood gangsters and bought hand grenades from the Mexican Mafia.

Finally, he infiltrated the Hells Angels in the Arizona case known as Operation Black Biscuit. Dobyns and several other operatives went underground for 21 months in one of the ATF's largest undercover investigations. It resulted in the indictment of 16 members and associates of the biker club.

But a strange thing happened once the charges got into court. ATF agents and federal prosecutors turned on one another.

Explanations are conflicting. By one account, ATF agents failed to tell the U.S. Attorney's Office about key evidence and informers. By another, prosecutors received the materials but withheld them.

Either way, the case collapsed last year. Most Arizona defendants were set free. The government dropped its key charge that the Hells Angels club is a racketeering enterprise. A Las Vegas trial ended with ignominy when the Hells Angels claimed victory.

ATF embarrassment grew.

And accusations about mismanagement in the agency mounted.

Amid the turmoil, a key informer named James "Pops" Blankenship went public, telling The Arizona Republic that Black Biscuit was a rogue operation. His allegations were followed by a $1 million lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court two months ago, claiming the ATF endangered his life, ruined him financially and misled him about the government's witness protection program.

The bureau has not responded.

Living in fear Today, Blankenship is in hiding and at odds with the ATF.

Dobyns has moved his family and taken an alias. His damage claim listed a new threat allegedly issued by a Hells Angels member awaiting trial for murder. The claim said the inmate wrote jail mail to an associate describing how Dobyns could "end up getting AIDS from a dirty needle and die a slow miserable death . . . (or) he will get a bad dose of steroids, send a blood clot to his brain, have a stroke and be (expletive) retarded." There was also graphic wording about how Dobyns' wife could be tortured.

The damage claim said ATF supervisors learned of that threat just days before Domenech promised reforms yet failed to react appropriately.

"This letter is not mere musing by an incarcerated suspect," wrote Reed, Dobyns' attorney. "(The inmate) has demonstrated the ability, willingness and resources necessary" to have the acts carried out.

DOJ_NMG_0116732

"For an agent who time and again placed his safety and life on the line for his agency, the failure of ATF to take protective measures on that agent's behalf against known, specific and credible threats from known criminals is unacceptable."

Life undercover, under fire Jay Dobyns is a picture-perfect undercover man.

Tough and profane, he wears a pointy goatee and silver rings on all his fingers. He is heavily tattooed. And he keeps a dark wool cap pulled low to the brow.

All this, even when he is not trying to infiltrate the Hells Angels or take part in some sting operation.

Dobyns, among the most celebrated agents within the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, has lived on the edge from the beginning of his career.

In 1988, 10 days after getting his shield, Dobyns was part of a task force chasing an ex-con on foot. Near a Tucson trailer park, the felon took Dobyns hostage at gunpoint. The rookie agent was dragged into a car as other agents converged.

Dobyns described the incident in Angels of Death, a book published last year. He said it was clear he was going to be killed if he let the crook drive away, and he preferred to die among friends. So he tried to escape and took a bullet in the back as the criminal was gunned down.

"I was lying on the desert thinking, 'I got shot before I even got my first paycheck.' "

Dobyns survived and, one year later, got into another shootout while on duty in Chicago. This time, as described in Angels of Death, he was working a sting on gunrunners. As the takedown began, two suspects leaped into a car and drove directly at Dobyns.

He opened fire, wounding the driver. But Dobyns was still knocked through the air - and back into the hospital.

- Dennis Wagner

Reach the reporter at dennis.wagner@arizonarepublic.com or (602) 444-8874.

IMMIGRATION:

Christian Groups Torn Over Illegals (WT)

By Natasha Altamirano

The Washington Times, January 14, 2007

Evangelical Christians say the issue of illegal aliens in the United States often creates a conflict between their allegiance to the Gospels and their loyalty to the government.

"On one hand, they really want to minister to people, but on the other hand, [illegal aliens] have broken the law -- and that's a problem for people," said John Clifford Green, a senior fellow at the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life.

Several conservative Christian groups sent a letter Monday to President Bush asking that his plan to resolve the immigration crisis include strong border security, amnesty for illegals who are related to U.S. citizens and already are in the country and an end to birthright citizenship.

"Whether this will attract majority support among evangelicals remains to be seen," Mr. Green said.

Most evangelicals agree that something needs to be done.

"There's a general acknowledgment that the current system is broken and needs fixing," said the Rev. Richard Cizik, vice president for governmental affairs of the National Association of Evangelicals, an umbrella organization of about 45,000 conservative churches representing about 30 million people. "Our population is growing by leaps and bounds -- often by illegal immigration -- at the expense of those who want to legally enter the country, and that's not right."

The Wheaton, Ill.-based association issued a resolution last October citing the need for secure borders but calling for "immigration reform that reflects human dignity, compassion and justice."

The resolution also cites passages from Scripture admonishing Christians to minister to all people.

"Most evangelicals are caught in between wanting to have responsible border policy with compassion for the alien," Mr. Cizik said. "It makes coming up with a fair balance here very difficult."

At issue, said Mr. Green of the Pew Forum, is a discord between public policy and private action.

DOJ_NMG_0116733

"Some evangelicals say, 'We're in favor of stricter law enforcement, but we're not going to turn in people in our community,' " he said.

Evangelical Christians also have close ties to the Hispanic community in the United States.

"Evangelicals have had so much success evangelizing among immigrants that they have a real sympathy with those communities," Mr. Green said.

Hispanics are one of the fastest-growing segments of evangelical Christianity in America because of high conversion rates in the United States and Latin America and high birthrates among Hispanic evangelicals, said Gaston Espinosa, an assistant professor of religious studies at Claremont McKenna College in California.

"The Latino evangelical community is much more sympathetic to immigration reform ... because a significant percentage of their community is undocumented," said Mr. Espinosa, a specialist on religious trends among Hispanics. "They don't support any sort of proposal that would send them over the border."

There's more consensus on immigration among other faith groups.

The Roman Catholic Church in America traditionally has supported immigrant-friendly policies.

The Virginia Catholic Conference, the lobbying arm of the Catholic dioceses of Arlington and Richmond, supports allowing children of illegal immigrants to attend Virginia's public colleges. The conference also supports localities that wish to establish day-laborer centers for immigrants.

"We provide for the immediate needs for the individual that presents himself or herself," Executive Director Jeff Caruso said. "If someone needs food or shelter, we don't screen for immigration status. We do what Christ asks us to do."

The Jewish Community Relations Council, the lobbying arm of the Jewish community in the Washington region, holds similar policy positions. The council opposes legislation that prohibits illegal immigrants from obtaining public social services.

"Most of our community in Washington can remember when grandparents or great-grandparents came over from Europe and the hostile reason for which they came over," said Debra Linick, a program director who handles Virginia legislation.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Newly In The Minority, G.O.P. Shows Signs Of Division On Iraq And Domestic Policies (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13 — After years of rock-solid party discipline and fealty to President Bush, Congressional Republicans have suddenly fractured in their new role as members of the minority, with some prominently deserting the White House on Iraq and others bolting from their leadership on popular domestic issues.

“We have got a lot of free agents,” said Senator John Thune, Republican of South Dakota, referring to the Republican backlash over the president’s proposal for a troop increase in Iraq.

Facing as much internal party dissension as he has seen since taking office, Mr. Bush invited Republican leaders of the House and Senate to his Camp David retreat this weekend to plot strategy only days after his plan for a troop buildup ran into scorching Republican resistance on Capitol Hill. While Republican unrest about Iraq was the most visible party division, others were starkly reflected in the ease with which House Democrats pushed through initial elements of their 100-hour legislative program with substantial Republican backing.

Only one House Republican opposed changes in ethics rules. Eighty-two Republicans joined Democrats in approving an increase in the minimum wage; 68 Republicans backed the new majority’s measure that puts into force remaining recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission; 48 supported a return to pay-as-you-go budget rules, and 37 endorsed expanded embryonic stem cell research.

The numbers dipped a bit on Friday, when only two dozen Republicans voted with Democrats to allow the federal government to negotiate Medicare drug prices, an issue where Republican free-market ideology clashes with the Democratic vision of the role of government. But in the often-polarized House, crossing the aisle in such numbers on major legislation is rare.

DOJ_NMG_0116734

Equally telling was a little-noticed procedural vote when more than 50 Republicans rejected their party's alternative to the Democratic minimum wage legislation, normally a statement of party loyalty. "I thought it was a sham," Representative Peter T. King, Republican of New York, said of his own party's substitute.

The developments left many wondering whether recent days represented a permanent shift in the relationship between the White House and Congressional Republicans and a long-term weakening of party identity, or whether the combination of the magnitude of the war and the shock of losing the majority has only temporarily altered the terrain.

Democrats were bolstered by the turn of events. "I think we are where the majority of America is, and you are seeing that even on Iraq," said Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the majority leader, who like other Democrats said rank-and-file Republicans were responding to the results from November.

"I think they recognize that the last election was a call for a new direction, and they don't want to get swept away by that," Representative John B. Larson of Connecticut, a member of the Democratic leadership, said.

Leaders of both parties pointed to the president's poor poll numbers, the unpopularity of the war in Iraq and the pent-up demand for some of the legislative proposals pushed by Democrats as the explanation for the Republican splintering.

Representative Adam H. Putnam of Florida, chairman of the House Republican Conference, said he expected some Republicans flirting with Democrats to return to the fold once the new majority got past its opening legislation and moved to tougher issues.

"The Democratic 'Six for '06' agenda was a very well-polled, message-tested agenda," Mr. Putnam said. "We are not surprised at the level of support they are finding. In past changeovers in Congress, people come in with a lot of momentum."

Mr. Putnam agreed, however, that Republicans were feeling much freer to express concern about Iraq. The harsh comments about the troop plan from well-known Republican critics like Senator Chuck Hagel of Nebraska was one thing. But strong statements coming from less prominent Republicans who have been Bush loyalists were quite another.

"We don't need more American troops caught in the crosshairs of a civil war," Representative Ric Keller of Florida, a usually reliable Bush ally, said on the House floor Thursday night as he laid out his opposition to the troop buildup.

Representative Candice S. Miller, a party stalwart from Michigan, said in her response, "I am extremely hesitant to embrace the president's strategy at this point," citing the lack of a timetable for success.

Republican leaders in the House and Senate are still rallying to Mr. Bush. Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the minority leader, this week promised to vigorously fight Democratic efforts to bring up a resolution challenging the buildup even as he conceded the political damage the war has inflicted.

"I think the lack of progress in Iraq was the single biggest issue costing my party the House and the Senate," he said.

Mr. McConnell, one of those who was invited to Camp David this weekend, said they "discussed the need to find bold solutions for other big issues."

He and other Republicans believe their best chance is to keep the party as united as possible behind Mr. Bush in hopes of improving conditions in Iraq, while trying to maneuver Democrats into a position where they are caught between their opposition to the war and backing for troops.

It is not going to be easy. Republicans say the past election is looming large in the minds of lawmakers, with the next one looming even larger for some.

"People are probably still a little skittish from Nov. 7, and they are trying to sort through what the voters were telling us," Senator John Cornyn of Texas, a member of the Republican leadership, said. "Obviously people who are in re-election cycle, particularly in tough places in the country, are going to need a little flexibility."

The only comparable episode where Mr. Bush had encountered such rebellion in the ranks was over the administration's approval of a deal to turn over some American port operations to a Dubai company. The administration was forced to relent on that issue.

But Republican leaders have in the past been able to tamp down most discord, arguing that the fates of the president and Congressional Republicans were inextricably linked. And, particularly in the House, there was also a fear of retribution.

DOJ_NMG_0116735

There were signs this week that the House Republican leadership was not going to tolerate too much dissension when two lawmakers known for challenging the party orthodoxy — Representatives Jeff Flake of Arizona, a critic of pork-barrel spending, and Walter B. Jones of North Carolina, a war opponent — were denied coveted committee slots.

And Republicans have been quietly building their own political case against Democrats, inserting policies popular with swing voters into their procedural alternatives, hoping to spring them later as 30-second advertisements.

Democrats have their own divisions, with some more liberal members of the party urging an aggressive push against spending on the Iraq war. Others view that as a political blunder that could threaten the majority. For now, the party seems willing to focus on symbolic votes against the buildup, leaving the money fight for later.

And leaving Republican leaders confronting the reality that nervous party members, uncertain of Mr. Bush's handling of the war and their own party's legislative appeal, are no longer so tightly bound to the cause.

"Everybody is scared spitless," Mr. Thune, the South Dakota senator, said.

House GOP Shows Its Fractiousness In The Minority (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

House Republican leaders, who confidently predicted they would drive a wedge through the new Democratic majority, have found their own party splintering, with Republican lawmakers siding with Democrats in droves on the House's opening legislative blitz.

Freed from the pressures of being the majority and from the heavy hand of former leaders including retired representative Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), many back-bench Republicans are showing themselves to be more moderate than their conservative leadership and increasingly mindful of shifting voter sentiment. The closest vote last week -- Friday's push to require the federal government to negotiate lower drug prices for Medicare -- pulled 24 Republicans. The Democrats' homeland security bill attracted 68 Republicans, the minimum wage increase 82.

"You're freer to vote your conscience," said Rep. Jo Anne Emerson (R-Mo.), who received an 88 percent voting record from the American Conservative Union in 2005 but has so far sided with Democrats on new budget rules, Medicare prescription-drug negotiations, raising the minimum wage and funding stem cell research. "Or, really, I feel free to represent my constituents exactly as they want me to be."

"Times have changed. I don't want to be someone who they say is too stubborn to change too," said Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), whose 92 percent conservative rating did not stop him from voting with Democrats on the homeland security and minimum-wage bills.

After their stinging defeat in November, Republican leaders in the House had gamely promised to draft procedural motions and parliamentary gambits that they said would split the new majority. With so many new Democrats hailing from moderate-to-conservative districts, even some Democrats saw the pledge as plausible.

In theory, Republicans have made good on their promises. Republicans argued vociferously against Democratic measures over the past two weeks, saying new deficit-control rules would guarantee tax increases, stringent homeland security measures would cripple commerce, and a minimum-wage increase would hurt the economy.

To counter the prescription-drug bill, GOP leaders drafted a parliamentary move that they said would ensure senior citizens' access to local pharmacists and the full panoply of prescription drugs. They tried to beat back the stem cell bill with a popular alternative, a ban on federal funds for human cloning. And they countered the minimum-wage bill with a motion to send it back to be redrafted to include tax breaks and health-insurance benefits for small businesses. On the minimum-wage bill, Republican leadership aides even offered a list of 25 Democrats they could pull over to their side.

The results? Eighty-two Republicans joined a unanimous Democratic front to vote to increase the minimum wage, while 54 Republicans voted against their leadership's counteroffer. Eighteen Republicans defied their leadership by opposing the parliamentary move against stem cells.

DOJ_NMG_0116736

The homeland security bill -- designed to implement most of the remaining recommendations of the commission that examined the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks -- even garnered the vote of Rep. Peter T. King (R-N.Y.), who as chairman of the Homeland Security Committee last year, thwarted one of its central provisions, the screening of all shipping containers heading to U.S. ports.

Some Republicans, such as Reps. Todd R. Platts (Pa.) and Jim Ramstad (Minn.), sided with the Democrats on every major vote. But it was not just closet mavericks.

Last year, Rep. Deborah Pryce (Ohio) was a powerful member of the Republican leadership, responsible for uniting her fractious colleagues behind a single message. After narrowly escaping defeat in November, the swing-district Republican bolted from her party's leadership last year. Last week, she virtually bolted from the party.

With just one exception, Pryce sided with the new Democratic majority on every major bill and rule change that came to a vote in the past two weeks, even voting against her party on a procedural vote, a move considered heretical in the years of GOP control.

The Democrats "deserve the same credit that we got in 1995," when Republicans took control, said Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.). "They've picked up on the really big issues of the day, the ones they won the election on, and the ones that really resonate in Republican districts."

Democratic leaders say even they have been surprised by their margins of victory, but they were always counting on GOP votes. Republicans from swing districts who have been beat up for years over their party-line voting have been liberated by their minority status, said Rep. John B. Larson (Conn.), vice chairman of the House Democratic Caucus.

"They've really been the ones that have been oppressed," he said.

GOP leaders were quick to dismiss the significance of the Democratic winning streak, however. For one thing, the Democrats' opening legislative blitz is being conducted under parliamentary rules that run roughshod over the Republicans, foreclosing any chance to actually amend the bills. But Democratic leaders have promised to give the GOP more latitude once the so-called 100-hours agenda runs its course next week.

For another, the Democrats will soon exhaust their carefully constructed opening list of bills that were designed to appeal across party lines.

"Republican discipline was critically important when we were passing legislation and moving an agenda," House Minority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) said. "The Democrats will soon move from these issues that poll at 80, 90 percent to issues that really matter."

Conservatives See Validation In Fight Over "Pork" (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, January 14, 2007

Republicans sought to burnish their tarnished credentials as foes of pork-barrel projects last week, winning cheers from spending critics but a wait-and-see response from other conservatives and the party's grass roots.

"Like mosquitoes in a nudist colony, Republicans will have more than enough opportunities to show the voters we deserve our conservative brand back by fighting wasteful spending," said Rep. Jeb Hensarling of Texas, chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee. "Our voters are clamoring for us to fight on behalf of taxpayers."

Led by South Carolina Sen. Jim DeMint, conservative Republicans overcame initial opposition from Democratic leaders to a broader definition of pork in a rules change that will require full disclosure from each lawmaker who sponsors so-called "earmark" provisions.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada had wanted a narrower definition of pork, which Mr. DeMint and his supporters said would have only applied to 5 percent of the billions of dollars in pork-barrel spending that Congress approves each year.

After Republicans, with the help of a handful of Democrats, beat back an attempt to table or kill the DeMint amendment, Mr. Reid refused to move to a final vote Thursday -- an attempt that triggered an outcry from Republicans and conservative bloggers.

When the smoke cleared Friday after a bitter two-day exchange of charges and countercharges, Mr. Reid agreed to an "earmark disclosure that is even stronger than what I had originally proposed," Mr. DeMint said.

DOJ_NMG_0116737

It was a strategic victory for Republicans, who had lost the support of many fiscally conservative voters angered by the pork-ridden bills the Republican Congress enacted over the past several years. A number of Republican state chairmen said pork-barrel spending was one of the reasons behind the party's House and Senate losses in November's midterm elections.

"American citizens want to see earmarking come to an end, and now that they have to put their names to it, the real question is, will this stop earmarking? Have we really accomplished much?" said Ron Carey, chairman of the Minnesota Republican Party.

"I think it is going to take more than one specific action to show we are serious about getting back to our bedrock conservative principles," Mr. Carey said Friday. "While this is encouraging, we need to see consistent adherence to conservative values over a sustained period of time before we are going to declare that our Republican leaders have gotten back on track."

Former Pennsylvania Rep. Pat Toomey, president of the pro-tax-cut group Club for Growth, said it was "a solid first step, but by itself it is not enough for the Republicans to re-establish their credentials as fiscal conservatives."

"After all, this is just about disclosure," Mr. Toomey said. "It doesn't actually limit or prevent these kinds of earmarks. That will require the necessary follow-through by Republicans."

Former House Majority Leader Dick Armey, who heads Freedom Works, another conservative grass-roots group, was similarly dubious about what the disclosures would achieve.

"Democrats are not going to get into trouble because of this disclosure because of the public's disposition for pork projects in their Democratic districts. It may diminish Republican pork, but it will not result in any reduction in Democratic pork," Mr. Armey said.

A Discordant Chorus Questions Visions For A Bush Library At Southern Methodist (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

HOUSTON, Jan. 13 — With growing faculty unease over plans to enshrine President Bush's official papers and a policy institute at Southern Methodist University in Dallas, the process of creating the nation's 13th presidential library is off to a familiar start: discord.

On Thursday, 68 theologians, professors and other faculty members present and past, citing complaints about President Bush's "poor marks" on civil liberties, the environment, gay rights and the war in Iraq, sent the university president a letter questioning whether visions of the library were consistent with the school's religious and academic values.

"According to George Bush's closest associates, the half-billion-dollar endowment will be used by the institute to hire conservative scholars to agree to 'write papers and books favorable to the president's policies,' " said the letter calling for a campuswide dialogue on the affiliation.

Starting with Franklin D. Roosevelt, presidents have handed over their records and memorabilia for scholars and the public to study and to memorialize their administrations. But their ever more expensive, privately erected libraries, study centers and museums have been bedeviled by complex disputes over executive orders governing access to the material. Mr. Bush issued his own order in November 2001 that in part granted a former president the right to assert a privilege to keep certain records secret.

His legacy and Southern Methodist's role in preserving and advancing it is now a divisive issue at the 11,000-student university long identified with the Bushes, former residents of Dallas, who are Methodists. Laura Bush graduated from Southern Methodist and sits on the board of trustees.

After years of considering other university partners, a site selection committee announced on Dec. 21 that it was pursuing exclusive discussions with Southern Methodist for a library and museum, and a policy institute reporting not to the university but to a Bush foundation.

The location has not been announced but a likely site is a garden apartment condominium complex bought with a $35 million gift from Ray L. Hunt, a trustee and son of the oil magnate H. L. Hunt. The gift, though matching the largest ever given the university, was not announced at the time. Some evicted tenants have sued.

DOJ_NMG_0116738

At a meeting on Tuesday, close to 150 faculty members raised concerns about the project and formulated what became 35 questions for the university president, R. Gerald Turner, on the relationship between the university and the Bush library and policy center. The questions included, "How would the institute affect the intellectual integrity of S.M.U.?"

Faculty members voiced concerns that the policy center and the university could merge roles, giving administration figures like Karl Rove an academic forum.

Others said security was an issue, a theme that the community has aired in letters to the editor and blogs.

In an e-mail message in December to Mayor Laura Miller of Dallas, Sam Boyd, a longtime neighbor of Southern Methodist, a trial lawyer and a former Green Beret in Vietnam, wrote: "Once completed the $500 million George Bush Library will become the number one (#1) US edifice terrorist target in the world."

A woman in Garland, Deborah Lewis, wrote The Fort Worth Star-Telegram that Dallas was already infamous for the assassination of President John F. Kennedy: "now it probably will be known for honoring the worst president ever."

Indeed the history of presidential libraries is replete with controversy. They are peculiarly American institutions, a vital scholarly resource, a 2004 study by the Center for Arts and Cultural Policy Studies at Princeton found. But it said they have also become "the accepted way to memorialize our presidents and promote an appreciation, some would say exaggeration, of their character, performance and legacy."

Over the years, through battles over the Watergate tapes and other revealing documents, presidents have issued executive orders to limit access to certain records, and to this day, scholars say, it is not clear what material is in the public domain and when.

In the case of Southern Methodist, Dr. Turner will address the faculty letter in an open spring faculty meeting next Wednesday, said Brad Cheves, vice president for development and external affairs.

"It's a call to dialogue," said Mr. Cheves, noting that the signatories numbered less than 10 percent of the 609 active faculty members and 137 retired members. "We continue to believe that a strong majority of the university community is supportive of efforts to receive the museum, library and institute if we're so fortunate to be selected," he said.

The letter, sent by e-mail, was largely identical to an unsigned draft dated Dec. 16, 2006, which mysteriously popped up in university e-mails and was picked up by news organizations.

Susanne Johnson, associate professor of Christian Education at the Perkins School of Theology, a mainstay of the Methodist-owned university, said it had been her doing. The draft was on her computer screen, she said, when her dog climbed on the keyboard and hit "send." "I should have said my dog prematurely sent it but they wouldn't believe it," Dr. Johnson said. "I wouldn't take that excuse from my students."

In the signed letter resent Thursday, Dr. Johnson and her colleagues said there were "at least two irreconcilable visions" of the role of the library. One held it to be "a neutral space" where scholars would pursue "nonpartisan, academic inquiry into his presidency."

"In another vision, the library will be a partisan space," the letter continued. "Going by various terms, such as conservative think tank, institute or policy center, the library will hire conservative scholars to pursue a partisan agenda in favor of the president's policies and programs."

The letter-writers argued for a nonpartisan approach but said they wondered if it could prevail given news accounts of Mr. Bush's affinity for a conservative policy center along the lines of the Hoover Institution on War, Revolution and Peace, which has had a rocky relationship with its liberal-leaning host, Stanford University in California.

Citing an article in The New York Daily News quoting associates of the president calling for an institute to "spread the gospel of a presidency that now gets poor marks," the letter continued:

"The 'poor marks' come from those Americans who question the wisdom of certain attitudes and actions of President Bush during his term in office. Among things they've so named: erosion of habeas corpus, denial of global warming, disrespect of international treaties, alienation of longtime U.S. allies, environmental predation, disregard for the rights of gay persons, a pre-emptive war based on false premises, and other perceived forms of disrespect for the created order and global community."

She and a Perkins colleague, the Rev. Bill McElvaney, professor emeritus of preaching and worship and a former president of the United Methodist Seminary in Kansas City, Mo., first raised questions about the library in an op-ed article last November in the student paper, The Daily Campus. They asked: "Do we want S.M.U. to benefit financially from a legacy of massive violence, destruction and death brought about by the Bush presidency in dismissal of broad public opinion?"

DOJ_NMG_0116739

While many faculty members said they had no problem with a library, Dr. McElvaney said in an interview, "I happen to be concerned about both; either one gives us a permanent Bush presence on our campus."

In convening Tuesday's faculty meeting, Rhonda Blair, president of the faculty Senate and a professor of theater, credited the "thoughtful and challenging" op-ed article of Dr. Johnson and Dr. McElvaney with generating the discussion.

But Dr. Turner in a letter to faculty, staff and students on Jan. 5 made no mention of the two theologians and said that through the Bush library, museum and institute "visiting scholars and dignitaries will be available for interaction who otherwise would not be in residence and accessible to our campus community."

With the Lyndon B. Johnson Library at the University of Texas in Austin and the George H. W. Bush Library at Texas A&M in College Station, if Southern Methodist were chosen for a library, Dr. Turner said, "it would be part of a historic triumvirate of presidential resources in Texas."

The House That Jack Built (NYT)

By Norman J. Ornstein

The New York Times Book Review, January 14, 2007

Like the spot on Lady Macbeth's hand, the Jack Abramoff scandal can't be washed away. Abramoff was sentenced to five years and 10 months on fraud charges, former Representative Bob Ney is scheduled to begin his two-year-plus prison term, former DeLay staff members Michael Scanlon, Tony Rudy and Ed Buckham await their sorry fates (as does Tom DeLay himself) and several other miscreants, including lawmakers, staffers and top administration officials, are praying that the continuing, aggressive investigation by prosecutors will pass them by.

But the revelations are far from over. The House Government Reform Committee reported in late September that Abramoff's billing records showed a robust 485 contacts between Abramoff and his lobbyist team and key White House officials, including 10 or more direct contacts between Abramoff himself and Karl Rove. Subsequently, Rove's top assistant, Susan B. Ralston, who had worked for Abramoff and who accepted a number of high-priced tickets to concerts and sporting events from him while she was in the White House, resigned. Meantime, David Safavian, the former White House chief of government procurement (and Abramoff aide), who had been convicted of false statements and obstruction of justice, was sentenced last October to 18 months in prison.

In the 37 years I have been in Washington, I have known hundreds of lobbyists, including a few (or more) who were shady characters, a number who were empty suits, some who were legends in their own time and many others who were savvy insiders and integral (and constructive) parts of the policy process. None were quite like Jack Abramoff. As the subtitle of "Heist" suggests, Abramoff was a "superlobbyist," a larger-than-life figure who made a fortune while having an outsize impact on politics in Washington and an outsize ego in a town of superegos. He loved to flaunt his wealth and influence. He rose rapidly and fell hard.

Abramoff began his career as an officer in College Republicans, a training ground for future party operatives, where he built enduring relationships with conservative powerhouses like Grover Norquist and Ralph Reed (and where he met Karl Rove). He behaved so badly in that job — his politics were confrontational, his financial practices questionable — that he was denounced and repudiated by Rich Bond, then the chairman of the Republican National Committee.

Abramoff was unfazed. He quickly found his niche in the lobbying world, beginning as a front man for the apartheid regime in South Africa and moving on to represent such upstanding clients as sweatshop operators in the Marianas Islands before hitting the jackpot with Internet gambling companies, Russian energy magnates, and Indian tribes looking out for their casinos, among others. Soon his wealth was such that he opened two high-priced restaurants, started a foundation to support favored causes, bought several ultra-expensive skyboxes at sports stadiums and arenas in Washington, and became a major Republican donor.

How did Jack Abramoff, who earned a law degree but never practiced law, who had no feel for or experience with the legislative process, and who had no obvious area of expertise, become such a huge success? Simple. He was the right guy in the right place at the right time — jumping into the field in 1994, just as the Republicans took the majority in the House of Representatives for the first time in 40 years and eagerly sought to put their own people in positions of influence. A key to those desires was the K Street Project, an effort masterminded by Grover Norquist, Tom DeLay and Rick Santorum, among others, to place conservative Republicans in key positions in law firms, lobbying operations, trade associations and individual company offices. The K Street Project was not just an employment service — the goal was to get trusted people into jobs where they could use campaign cash to help Republicans stay in power while enabling them to live comfortably by sharing in the munificence of the moneyed interests.

DOJ_NMG_0116740

The attitude of the new majority — to the victors go the spoils — meshed perfectly with Abramoff's style. Playing off his conservative, activist politics, his religious beliefs as an Orthodox Jew, his hyperaggressive approach to getting clients and his close relationships with Norquist, Reed and DeLay, Abramoff promised clients a direct link to the most powerful leaders in Congress and, subsequently, in the Bush White House. Eventually, he decided the traditional lobbying practice — charging, like law firms, by the hour — was for chumps. Instead, he demanded huge commissions that represented a cut of the enormous sums a big government could provide his clients. He then went a step further by channeling consulting contracts to associates like Scanlon for enormously inflated fees and splitting the profits through kickbacks.

Of course, the Republicans in power did not invent the idea of putting their own people into lobbying jobs, working out sweetheart relationships with interest groups, conducting shakedowns for campaign cash or parlaying influence into high-priced jobs for themselves when they left office. But the scope and brazenness of Abramoff and of the broader K Street Project were on a wholly different scale from what we had seen during the years Democrats ruled Washington — indeed, from anything in the last century.

If some of Abramoff's misdeeds were known to Washington insiders and reported over the years by regional news media — the Seattle papers when he lobbied for the Marianas for a Seattle-based firm, Preston Gates; The Miami Herald when he moved to buy the local SunCruz gambling boats — they were largely ignored in Washington until 2004, when The Washington Post jumped on the story. One long investigative piece in The Post, on Indian gambling, was the beginning of the end for Abramoff. Since then, there have been many excellent investigative pieces, and a devastating report from the Senate Indian Affairs Committee. Now Peter H. Stone, a veteran reporter with The National Journal who has covered the Abramoff beat for the past two years, has written a short, concise and lively book pulling the Senate findings and the media reporting together to chronicle Abramoff's career and misdeeds.

"Heist" is a one-stop shop for anyone wanting to know what this scandal is all about, why the fuss has been so substantial, what made Abramoff tick and how he succeeded. It follows on the heels of another book that set out some months earlier to do the same thing, "The K Street Gang" by Matthew Continetti of The Weekly Standard. There is substantial overlap, naturally, between the two books, with Continetti providing more detail and Stone a more contemporaneous and concise account.

Both books will make the average reader, even one sophisticated in the ways of Washington, want to take a shower. Of all the miscreants we have had in our lifetimes in American politics — and we have had plenty — few have been more distasteful, amoral or outrageous than Abramoff and his cronies, including Scanlon, Buckham and Reed — not to mention his close friend Tom DeLay. To anyone who cares about our political institutions and their integrity, this story is simply revolting.

But for all the value of a concise account of their misdeeds, what "Heist" is missing is the broader context. Jack Abramoff was not a lone scoundrel — or one of a narrow band of individual scoundrels. He was part of an organized effort to transform Washington, to bend it to the will of one party, with the aim of creating a self-reinforcing loop, where a majority could use its clout to dominate all of Washington, work alliances with moneyed interests who would pay to get their way, provide campaign cash to keep their friends in power and benefit from the majority's policy largesse along the way.

This dynamic will not just disappear with the change in power. Democratic lobbyists are salivating at the prospect of new, huge fees. The candidates' shakedown of lobbyists for campaign cash began literally the day after the November elections. It will take a major reform effort, and steely resolve, to change a town virtually awash in money. We are still waiting for a full or definitive treatment of the new Gilded Age that Abramoff typified — although his own glory days may be over now that he has been sentenced to a long term in a federal pen.

The American Way Of Equality (NYT)

By David Brooks

DOJ_NMG_0116741

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

Income inequality is on the rise. The rich are getting better at passing their advantages on to their kids. Lifestyle and values gaps are widening between the educated and uneducated. So the big issue is: Will Americans demand new policies to reverse these trends — to redistribute wealth, to provide greater economic security? Are we about to see a mass populist movement in this country?

Nobody was smarter on this subject than Seymour Martin Lipset, the eminent sociologist who died at 84 on New Year's Eve. Lipset had been a socialist in the hothouse atmosphere of City College during the 1940s, and though he later became a moderate Democrat, he continued to wonder, with some regret, why America never had a serious socialist movement, why America never adopted a European-style welfare state.

Lipset was aware of the structural and demographic answers to such questions. For example, racially diverse nations tend to have lower levels of social support than homogeneous ones. People don't feel as bound together when they are divided on ethnic lines and are less likely to embrace mutual support programs. You can have diversity or a big welfare state. It's hard to have both.

But as he studied these matters, Lipset moved away from structural or demographic explanations (too many counterexamples). He drifted, as Tocqueville and Werner Sombart had before him, to values.

America never had a feudal past, so nobody has a sense of social place or class-consciousness, Lipset observed. Meanwhile, Americans have inherited from their Puritan forebears a sense that they have a spiritual obligation to rise and succeed.

Two great themes run through American history, Lipset wrote in his 1963 book "The First New Nation": achievement and equality. These are often in tension because when you leave unequally endowed people free to achieve, you get unequal results.

Though Lipset never quite put it this way, the clear message from his writings is that when achievement and equality clash in America, achievement wins. Or to be more precise, the achievement ethos reshapes the definition of equality. When Americans use the word "equality," they really mean "fair opportunity." When Americans use the word "freedom," they really mean "opportunity."

Lipset was relentlessly empirical, and rested his conclusions on data as well as history and philosophy. He found that Americans have for centuries embraced individualistic, meritocratic, antistatist values, even at times when income inequality was greater than it is today.

Large majorities of Americans have always believed that individuals are responsible for their own success, Lipset reported, while people in other countries are much more likely to point to forces beyond individual control. Sixty-five percent of Americans believe hard work is the key to success; only 12 percent think luck plays a major role.

In his "American Exceptionalism" (1996), Lipset pointed out that 78 percent of Americans endorse the view that "the strength of this country today is mostly based on the success of American business." Fewer than a third of all Americans believe the state has a responsibility to reduce income disparities, compared with 82 percent of Italians. Over 70 percent of Americans believe "individuals should take more responsibility for providing for themselves" whereas most Japanese believe "the state should take more responsibility to ensure everyone is provided for."

America, he concluded, is an outlier, an exceptional nation. And though his patriotism pervaded his writing, he emphasized that American exceptionalism is "a double-edged sword."

Political movements that run afoul of these individualistic, achievement-oriented values rarely prosper. The Democratic Party is now divided between moderates — who emphasize individual responsibility and education to ameliorate inequality — and progressive populists, who advocate an activist state that will protect people from forces beyond their control. Given the deep forces in American history, the centrists will almost certainly win out.

Indeed, the most amazing thing about the past week is how modest the Democratic agenda has been. Democrats have been out of power in Congress for 12 years. They finally get a chance to legislate and they push through a series of small proposals that are little pebbles compared to the vast economic problems they described during the campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0116742

They grasp the realities Marty Lipset described. They understand that in the face of inequality, Americans have usually opted for policies that offer more opportunity, not those emphasizing security or redistribution. American domestic policy is drifting leftward, but there are sharp limits on how far it will go.

A Living Wage We Can Live With (LAT)

By Robert Pollin

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

THE UNITED States appears ready to support a national living wage. Last week, the House of Representatives voted to raise the federal minimum wage in three steps to $7.25 an hour as of mid-2009. The Senate is expected to link the raise to tax breaks for business, but passage seems assured. And President Bush has said that he will sign legislation to increase the wage, which would be the first hike since 1997, when the current $5.15 minimum became law.

But Congress shouldn't stop there because $7.25 an hour is not close to a living wage. Adjusted for inflation, it would represent an increase of just about 4% from the current $5.15.

The political foundation of the move to raise the federal minimum wage was built by the living wage movement, which has organized and won victories throughout the country for more than a decade. In November's elections, voters in Arizona, Colorado, Missouri, Montana, Nevada and Ohio passed minimum-wage increases by wide margins. As of February, the minimum wage in 29 states and the District of Columbia, representing nearly 70% of the U.S. population, will exceed the current federal one.

Beyond this, more than 140 municipalities have some version of a living-wage law that mandates a wage from $9 an hour to $11 an hour.

The federal minimum wage peaked in 1968, when its value was about $9 an hour in today's dollars. Although average worker productivity has more than doubled since then, the wage has not kept pace. Typically, as productivity increases, hourly wages can rise without cutting into business profits.

Raising the federal minimum wage too high, or too rapidly, probably would discourage businesses from hiring low-wage workers, as many critics contend. But at what point would it be too high or too fast?

From 2001 to 2005, in the 11 states with minimum wages higher than the federal one, employment growth was slightly faster than in those states with the $5.15 minimum.

Studies on the effects of living-wage laws in L.A. and Boston, which require businesses that have city contracts to pay a certain wage, show that the affected firms continued to hire low-wage workers at basically the same rates as before the wage was implemented.

The story is similar in San Francisco and Santa Fe, N.M., even though their living wage laws have a broader application. In Santa Fe, where the law applies to all businesses with at least 25 employees, job growth in restaurants and hotels, which heavily employ low-wage workers, was 3.2% the year the law went into affect (mid-2004 to 2005).

The Santa Fe ordinance is a model for how Congress might move toward establishing a national living wage of between $9 and $11. It is set up to raise the minimum wage from $8.50 to $10.50 as of January 2008 in three steps. But before each scheduled increase, the city determines whether the previous hike hurt employment. For instance, the wage in Santa Fe reached $9.50 an hour in January only after the city established that employment growth under the $8.50 regime was healthy.

Congress could follow Santa Fe's lead by passing the current proposal, then follow up with legislation that would allow for increases every two years after 2009 if the higher wage did not negatively affect employment growth. The increase in 2011 could raise the federal minimum to $9 an hour, roughly today's low end in many cities.

Further increases could be tied to inflation and average labor productivity. If inflation and productivity trends of the last decade continue, this would translate into a 10% to 12% increase in the federal minimum wage every two years, to $10 an hour in 2013.

Yet even that wage probably would be inadequate in most of the country, so cities and states also would need to adjust their minimums to ensure a living wage. But the idea of raising the minimum wage in line with average productivity and inflation, after taking account of employment effects, should move the country closer to what more and more voters have demonstrated they support and what the economy can provide.

DOJ_NMG_0116743

Robert Pollin Is A Professor Of Economics And Co-director Of The Political Economy Research Institute.

OTHER NEWS:

Bush's Proposal For Iraq Adds To '08 Intrigue (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney, Patrick Healy

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13 — On Friday morning, as the capital was enmeshed in a debate over President Bush's decision to send thousands more troops to Iraq, no one was more obviously searching for an alternate plan than Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, the New York Democrat and likely candidate for president.

Mrs. Clinton was airborne for Iraq, a visit that offered a platform to examine and perhaps alter her views on a war that she once voted to authorize but now criticizes. Asked in a telephone interview from Kuwait whether this trip might lead her to support setting a firm deadline for the withdrawal of all American troops, which would be a change in her position, she responded: "Those are questions that we'll be better able to answer later. Obviously I'll have more to say when I get back."

Around the same time in Washington, Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican and likely candidate for president, threw the White House something of a lifeline during a Congressional hearing (which Mrs. Clinton herself was supposed to attend), vigorously defending Mr. Bush's decision.

"Potentially catastrophic consequences of failure demand that we do all we can to prevail in Iraq," Mr. McCain said.

As the politics of the war continue to shift, no prospective presidential candidates face more intensive scrutiny of their views or greater risk to their ambitions than Mr. McCain and Mrs. Clinton.

Long a proponent of sending more American forces into the fight, Mr. McCain now more than ever is linked to a war that has splintered his party and lost public support.

Viewed with suspicion by elements of her party because she has not explicitly repudiated her October 2002 vote authorizing military action against Iraq, Mrs. Clinton, who was in Baghdad on Saturday, has been trying to shore up her credentials as a critic of the war without exposing herself to charges of indecisiveness or flip-flopping of the sort that so damaged Senator John Kerry in his unsuccessful race against Mr. Bush in 2004.

More than any other single event in recent months, Mr. Bush's call for more troops has not only illuminated the positions taken by Mr. McCain and Mrs. Clinton and the differences between them, but it has also led the field of declared and prospective candidates circling them within their own parties to stake out more clearly defined positions on the war.

Among Republicans, a result has been a deep split suggesting that Mr. McCain will face challenges on the war from fellow Republicans long before he has to worry about Mrs. Clinton and other Democrats. Mitt Romney, the former governor of Massachusetts who had until this week declined to say whether he supported more troops, issued brief remarks supporting the president. Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former New York mayor, also supported it, comparing it to what he did in fighting crime as mayor.

But Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas, who is positioning himself as an alternative to Mr. McCain among conservatives, denounced Mr. Bush's plan, as did Senator Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, who like Mr. McCain is a Vietnam veteran but who long ago broke with the White House over its handling of the war.

Among Democrats, opposition to Mr. Bush's plan highlighted the political threat Mrs. Clinton faces from the left. John Edwards, the former senator from North Carolina who voted for the war in 2002 but who, unlike Mrs. Clinton, later renounced his vote, sent an e-mail message to his supporters urging them to oppose Mr. Bush's action.

Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, who joined the Senate in 2005 and thus escaped the Iraq vote that has come to haunt Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Edwards and Mr. Kerry, used the platform of Senate hearings to lacerate the Bush Iraq policy and affirm his own opposition to the war.

Their actions offered an obvious contrast with those of Mrs. Clinton, who put out a measured statement opposing the troop increase but has stayed away from the Senate vanguard opposing Mr. Bush's latest strategy.

DOJ_NMG_0116744

Still, none of the other potential 2008 presidential candidates have seen their ambitions complicated by the events this week as much as Mr. McCain and Mrs. Clinton have. Their responses to Mr. Bush's actions offered insights into their views on Iraq and the styles they would bring to a presidential campaign.

Mr. McCain embarked on a high-profile television tour announcing his support for Mr. Bush's move. In an interview, he said he would have preferred that the White House send in even more troops, and noted that he had pressed this position on the White House, unsuccessfully until now, for more than two years. It is a position that Mr. McCain and his advisers — and some other Republicans — said could end up destroying his presidential ambitions.

"Friends, advisers, enemies said this could be very damaging," Mr. McCain said. "I can't worry about that, and I'm not going to worry about that."

Some Republicans suggested that Mr. McCain's position could help him, albeit to a limited extent, among conservative Republican primary voters who have been wary of his view on social issues. And, as Mr. McCain's own remarks suggested, his stance fits neatly into his effort over the years to present himself as a politician given to candor even if it means telling voters things they do not want to hear.

Still, by any measure, support for the war could make things extremely difficult for Mr. McCain in a general election if the situation in Iraq does not improve and public opinion in the United States does not shift in favor of continued engagement.

Mr. McCain did not dispute the political risks entailed in the stance he had taken.

"The consequences of failure are more important than a political career," he said. "It could hurt me in a primary and it could hurt me in a general election. This could hurt me in history."

He said he was hopeful that this new Iraq strategy would work but did not know how long it would take, a crucial question in trying to gauge how central an issue this will be as the campaign engages.

In a hint of what next year could be like, Mr. Edwards has taken to calling the Bush proposal an endorsement of "the McCain doctrine," a description that Mr. McCain and his aides have gamely embraced.

"I was glad to see that Romney and Giuliani have come around to embracing the McCain doctrine, as John Edwards would say," said Terry Nelson, the head of Mr. McCain's presidential exploratory committee.

If Mr. McCain has flaunted his unpopular position, Mrs. Clinton has clearly kept a lower altitude as she tries to deal with a barrage of conflicting pressures. Unlike Mr. McCain and Mr. Obama, who were everywhere on television the night of Mr. Bush's speech, Mrs. Clinton simply issued a late-evening e-mail statement saying that based on what Mr. Bush had said, she did not support the increase.

Last year, Mrs. Clinton took a leading role in criticizing Donald H. Rumsfeld, then the secretary of defense, over his management of the war. Over the past two years, she has voted in favor of resolutions calling for a phased withdrawal of troops without setting fixed deadlines.

Even though Mrs. Clinton has never gone as far as Mr. Edwards and Mr. Kerry with a renunciation of her 2002 vote, she has subtly expanded her position recently in recognition, her advisers said, of how much that vote accounted for the resistance to her among some Democrats.

In a little-noticed interview on the "Today" show just before Christmas, Mrs. Clinton made a significant addition to her standard remark about the 2002 vote. Asked if she considered the vote a mistake, she responded: "Obviously if we knew then what we know now, there wouldn't have been a vote, and I certainly wouldn't have voted that way."

The last eight words are new for her.

Some Democrats suggested that Mrs. Clinton's trip this weekend was intended to give her an opportunity to move further away from that vote and against the president's policy.

"I will be spending time with the Iraqi leaders and sitting down and trying to get my own personal assessment of what their intentions are, what do they intend to do to take responsibility for their own security," she said in the interview. "If they're not going to step up and try to bring some stability and end the violence in Baghdad, I don't care how many troops the president sends — it's not going to be successful."

Mrs. Clinton and Mr. McCain have no doubt learned a lesson from Mr. Kerry's problems in 2004 when he appeared to switch his position on the war: that inconsistency may well prove to be a bigger political sin than taking a position out of step with the electorate. Mrs. Clinton's associates have expressed concern that if she tries to switch her views on the war, reflecting what her advisers said was concern, she would appear weak as she campaigned during a time of war to become the nation's first female president.

DOJ_NMG_0116745

Defiant McCain Back As Maverick (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman

Chicago Tribune, January 14, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Sen. John McCain has never spent much time worrying about what other people think.

Five and a half years as a prisoner of war in the nightmarish Hanoi Hilton liberated the Arizona Republican to speak his mind--and not to worry about offending colleagues who might be angry about his campaign-finance proposals, objections to pork barrel projects or crackdown on gifts and meals from lobbyists.

In the latter part of his political life, he has made that trait an almost singular virtue. He propelled his presidential campaign in 2000 aboard "The Straight Talk Express," and he is a top-tier contender to succeed President Bush.

But now his unflinching insistence on boosting the number of troops in Iraq, and his position as one of the president's most vocal supporters of the war, could imperil his White House ambitions, even among the GOP faithful.

"George W. Bush may pay a price in the eyes of history, but John McCain may pay a practical, political price," said Byron Shafer, a political science professor at the University of Wisconsin-Madison.

Bush's plan for a new start in Iraq has been greeted frostily this week on Capitol Hill by Democrats and a number of Republicans, including at least one, Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, who will compete with McCain for the nomination.

Undeterred, McCain--a former Navy fighter pilot, and son and grandson of admirals--won't back off his position to step up the war effort.

"We need troops in the numbers required to do the job, in place for as long as it takes to complete their mission," he told the Senate Armed Services Committee. "It would be far better to have too many reinforcements in Iraq than to suffer, once again, the tragic results of insufficient force levels."

At odds with fellow vets

It is a view McCain has held for more than three years, and one he tried repeatedly to impress upon former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld as well as the president. But it's also a view that puts him at odds with his fellow Vietnam veterans in the Senate--Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), Jim Webb (D-Va.) and John Kerry (D-Mass.).

"I think John sees military force as a way toward a solution in a sense more than I do," said Webb, who has known McCain for 30 years and considers him a friend. "I think that there are limits to the use of military force, particularly in that part of the world."

If the situation in Iraq continues to deteriorate, the nation's frustration with the war could tarnish McCain much as it damaged Republicans at the polls during the midterm elections.

That's something McCain, known for taking controversial stands, refuses to entertain.

"I do not worry about that," he said during a break in the hearings. "I do not worry about it. I do not worry about it. This is too important an issue."

After Bush's address to the nation Wednesday, McCain was similarly emphatic about the intersection of the war and his presidential dreams: "I would much rather lose a campaign than lose a war," he said on CNN's "Larry King Live."

Friends take heart that McCain advocated a change of strategy well before others realized the plan wasn't working.

"Iraq could rub off on McCain in a negative way. But McCain's been right from the beginning saying we need more troops," said Scott Reed, who managed Bob Dole's presidential campaign in 1996. "He supported the Powell doctrine . . . and McCain understands that pulling out and losing would be a disaster in the region and how we're viewed around the world."

Aides to McCain say that taking unpopular stands is nothing new for their boss, and managing the fallout is nothing new for them.

DOJ_NMG_0116746

"All I can tell you is McCain is basing his position on what he thinks is in the best interest of this country," said Mark Salter, the senator's longtime chief of staff. "There's nothing we can do about it, either. It's his position, it's why we admire him , and that's that."

John Weaver, the architect of McCain's presidential operation, said the senator's position on the war has not slowed fundraising or deterred political activists or operatives from joining the campaign.

"We don't worry about it. Is it our job to deal with it? Yes," Weaver said. "At the early stage, it has not kept people from encouraging the senator to run or from signing up and taking leadership positions."

To some degree, McCain has a credibility that comes from enduring torture by his North Vietnamese captors and being kept in solitary confinement for three of his 5 1/2 years in the Hoa Lo prison camp.

"He probably has a level of insulation on this issue that nobody else does on the Republican side," said William Mayer, an expert on the presidential primary process at Northeastern University. "Nobody . . . is going to accuse him of not caring about what happens to American soldiers."

Indeed, McCain has an even more personal stake in how the war is conducted. One son just finished Marine Corps boot camp and is likely to be sent to Iraq. Another son attends the Naval Academy and could wind up in Iraq too.

Nevertheless, McCain remains defiant as he fights to bring in more troops and allow Lt. Gen. David Petraeus to lead a counterinsurgency campaign.

"Those who want us to withdraw within four to six months have an obligation to tell us what they'll do when chaos ensues," said McCain.

He acknowledged that the push in Congress for a non-binding resolution opposing the escalation in Iraq would be a setback for his position. But he offers his opponents a challenge he is certain they will not take.

"The legitimate question is if you feel that strongly that you want to disagree with the president's policy, Congress has a right to cut off funds--why not a resolution to cut off funds?" he suggested. "I think that's a more legitimate way of pursuing this issue, frankly."

Bush's Legacy Vs. The 2008 Election (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

DURING the midterm elections, a question nagged at Republicans who agreed to follow the White House script on the Iraq war: Does the president care more about his legacy than the party's in pushing his course?

By last week, many Republicans on Capitol Hill had come to believe that their interests and the president's may be diverging even wider.

On one end of Pennsylvania Avenue is a president who argues that history will judge him favorably on the war; on the other are increasingly skeptical Republicans who blame the president's stay-the-course strategy for the loss of majority status in Congress and fear that it may cost them again in 2008.

The unusual circumstances of the 2008 election may only aggravate the situation. Congressional Republicans face high stakes, particularly in the Senate, where 21 are up for re-election, compared with just 12 Democrats. And the Democrats have already put targets on senators in the Northeast and Midwest where antiwar sentiment helped Democrats sweep into office.

The president, on the other hand, cannot run again, and has no chosen successor, leaving him unbound to electoral concerns.

Like any president, however, he is concerned with how history will judge him. Mr. Bush has frequently likened himself to Harry Truman, an unpopular president when he left office, but one applauded by history.

"To coin a phrase, he's no Harry Truman," said Robert Dallek, a presidential historian. "Truman is now seen as a near great president because he put in place the containment doctrine boosted by the Truman Doctrine and the Marshall Plan and NATO, which historians now see as having been at the center of American success in the cold war."

"If you ask yourself, what is Bush's legacy, what is there?" Mr. Dallek asked. "What's his larger design to meet the dangers of Islamic terrorism?"

DOJ_NMG_0116747

The parallels, some historians say, are more to Lyndon Johnson.

Robert A. Caro, the Johnson biographer, says that the similarities are striking if you look at newspapers from 1967 as the nation headed into the tumultuous election year of 1968.

"You see this pouring in of the national treasure, this rise in troops against the background of failure," he said. "The opposition to this starts to be expressed more and more on the floor of Congress. You have a president who is unbending in each case."

President Johnson was increasingly concerned about his legacy. He wanted it to be the Great Society, but more and more he feared it would be overwhelmed by failure in Vietnam. "Both presidents seem absolutely convinced that their course is correct," Mr. Caro said. "They both feel that if they're only allowed by public opinion to pursue that course, they will win."

Mr. Johnson faced most of his opposition from within his own party. In 1964, only two senators voted against the Gulf of Tonkin resolution, escalating the American involvement in Vietnam. By 1966, Senator J. William Fulbright, who voted for the resolution, gave a speech at Johns Hopkins University on the arrogance of power, and the next year, Senator Eugene McCarthy announced that he would challenge Mr. Johnson for the Democratic presidential nomination. By 1968, Mr. Johnson announced he would not seek re-election.

Republicans are not close to such an all-out revolt, but their opposition last week was a striking turnaround from just six months ago, when all but one member of the Republican majority in the Senate rejected a plan to begin withdrawing troops within the year.

Seven Republican senators have said publicly that they oppose the president's plan. Many more have said they will wait for more information to make a decision, or have expressed only qualified support; a Washington Times survey late in the week found only 21 of 49 Republicans expressing "unqualified support."

Those opposing the plan include senators facing tough re-elections, like Senator Norm Coleman of Minnesota, who Democrats have already declared one of their top three targets for 2008.

Those who oppose or express reservations about the president's plan say it is not primarily a matter of politics; they question the Iraqi government's commitment to deliver on promises, and have had their doubts reinforced by visits to Iraq and the excruciating pain of calling families who have lost loved ones in the war.

"Politics is lurking beneath the surface but the facts themselves compel, repeat compel, our colleagues to dig deeper," said Senator John W. Warner, the Virginia Republican who is a member, and was recently chairman, of the Armed Services Committee. He says he wants to study the president's proposal before deciding whether to support it.

But they also recognize public opinion.

"Many Republicans, like Americans, are increasingly disappointed in the lack of resolution in Iraq," said Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, who has argued to withdraw, not increase, troops in Baghdad. "The fact that the strategy that the administration has pushed in the past did not work leaves me, and many of us, to ask questions about the president's new strategy."

The split seems likely only to widen. Some lawmakers called to the White House to discuss the plan last week said Mr. Bush did not seem interested in what one called "an exchange of views."

Ms. Collins said she was struck by "how confident he was."

"I think this issue is so thorny and so plagued with uncertainty, and yet he seems so certain," she said.

On the Hill, meanwhile, even those who did support the president's plan in Iraq offered less than the hearty endorsements of the troop surge. Some, like Mr. Warner, said they needed more information before they committed to any increase. At an Armed Services Committee hearing on Friday, Mr. Warner asked the Pentagon to provide results of the war game analyses it has done to evaluate the results of adding more troops.

In the House, as fierce a partisan as Representative Jack Kingston said he was not ready to lend full support, but looked forward to hearings on the plan.

Other Republicans supported the president but emphasized that the commitment in Iraq must not be open-ended — a Democratic refrain. And they argued for the need for benchmarks to evaluate the success of the increase, all of which leaves room for them to peel away from the president if the war does not show more success soon.

DOJ_NMG_0116748

Heading toward 2008, Republicans are no longer expecting the kind of party discipline on the war that they expected in 2006. Instead, party leaders say members must speak their consciences.

"Voters will recognize a phony and a fraud," said Representative Tom Cole of Oklahoma, who is leading the Republicans' 2008 efforts to gain back the majority they lost in the House. "If you believe the president is right you should say so. If you have a legitimate and honest difference with the president, you shouldn't hesitate to draw that difference."

"Bad Behavior"? (NOVAK)

By Robert D. Novak

Robert Novak, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON -- House Minority Leader John Boehner, who had promised last May that "bad behavior" by House Republicans who voted against their leadership would not be rewarded, announced to a party conference Wednesday that reform Rep. Jeff Flake of Arizona was being removed from the Judiciary Committee.

With the change in House control, several Republicans had to be removed from committees. However, Flake was about halfway up the Judiciary panel in seniority, and this was his priority appointment. The decision was made by the Republican Steering Committee, dominated by Appropriations members who resent Flake's vigorous campaign against earmarks.

Boehner later told Flake he was purged because of his verbal attacks on party leaders. Flake was undone by his critical remarks on CBS's "60 Minutes" just before the election.

DEMOCRATIC DISCIPLINE

The House vote Tuesday passing a Democratic-sponsored homeland security bill showed that Republicans are unaccustomed to being in the minority for the first time in 12 years, while the Democrats are exercising iron discipline in the majority.

Although the full Republican leadership attacked the bill as expensive and ineffective, 68 Republicans voted for it while 128 were in opposition. The supporters included such ranking Republican committee members as Reps. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida (Foreign Affairs) and Peter King of New York (Homeland Security).

All 231 Democrats voting were in support of the bill, as Speaker Nancy Pelosi began the Democratic "first 100 hours" of rapid-fire legislation. Pharmaceutical industry lobbyists could not find a single Democratic member against a party plan to force down drug prices. One moderate freshman congressman said he was opposed to the measure but felt obliged to vote for a bill that was in the Pelosi 100 hours as a "leadership issue."

EXPLORER OBAMA

Sen. Barack Obama informed a major Democratic financial contributor that he probably will announce formation of a 2008 presidential exploration committee this coming week, which starts with Martin Luther King Jr. Day Monday.

A political source close to Obama told this column he was not sure the exploratory committee would be named that early but added that probably would happen during the next three weeks. Actual announcement of his candidacy would come later.

A footnote: Obama canceled tentative plans to deliver the keynote address for Martin Luther King Jr. Day ceremonies at Virginia Tech in Blacksburg, Va. University officials speculated that Obama's travel has been temporarily suspended as he approaches the start of his presidential candidacy.

ROMNEY VS. REAGAN

Republican presidential hopeful Mitt Romney's 1994 effort to unseat Sen. Edward M. Kennedy in Massachusetts continues to haunt him. A Democratic blogger named SoThisIsWashington posted a video clip on YouTube of a debate with Kennedy in which Romney deliberately separates himself from Ronald Reagan.

The video, from their campaign debate, shows Kennedy telling Romney that "your economic program" is "the program of Mr. Reagan and Mr. Bush." Romney responded: "Look, I was an independent during the time of Reagan-Bush. I'm not trying to return to Reagan-Bush."

In the same debate, Romney promised to "sustain and support" the Roe v. Wade abortion decision. Romney also was damaged with conservatives by a 1994 letter in which he claimed he was more pro-gay rights than Kennedy.

"DR. MULTIMILLIONAIRE"

DOJ_NMG_0116749

Newly elected Rep. Steven Kagen, a rich allergist who self-financed his campaign in Wisconsin, by his own account taunted President and Mrs. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and presidential adviser Karl Rove during a White House function for new members of Congress in December.

Kagen told a group of activists that after he found himself in the restroom with Rove, he blocked the White House deputy chief of staff's departure by holding the door closed. According to Kagen, he then said: "You're in the White House and you think you're safe. . . . My name's Dr. Multimillionaire and I kicked your ass."

The new congressman said he said separately to both Bush and Cheney: "Thank you for coming to Green Bay. I couldn't have won without you coming." Kagen also said he approached Laura Bush and purposely called her Barbara, the name of the president's mother. Kagen's remarks were reported in "The Scene," published in Appleton, Wis.

Robert Novak is syndicated columnists and editor of the Evans-Novak Political Report

Obama's Charm Lost On America's Black Activists (LONT)

By Tony Allen

Times of London, January 14, 2007

HE is a media darling, a paparazzi target and a source of inspiration for millions of Democrats who dream of retaking the White House in 2008. But Senator Barack Obama, the charismatic African-American who is shaking up the presidential primary race, has not impressed some of America's most powerful black activists.

Civil rights leaders who have dominated black politics for much of the past two decades have pointedly failed to embrace the 45-year-old Illinois senator who is considering a bid to become America's first black president.

At a meeting of activists in New York last week, the Rev Jesse Jackson, the first black candidate to run for president, declined to endorse Obama. "Our focus right now is not on who's running, because there are a number of allies running," Jackson said.

The Rev Al Sharpton, the fiery New York preacher who joined the Democratic primary race in 2004, said he was considering another presidential run of his own. And Harry Belafonte, the calypso singer who became an influential civil rights activist, said America needed to be "careful" about Obama: "We don't know what he's truly about."

The unexpected coolness between the old civil rights guard and the new Democratic hopeful has added an intriguing twist to the budding rivalry between Obama and Senator Hillary Clinton, who hopes to emulate her husband, former president Bill Clinton, in attracting support from black voters.

The importance of the black vote — and the still-potent influence of community leaders such as Jackson and Sharpton — was underlined last week when both Clinton and Obama appeared at different times in New York at a black business conference organised by Jackson's Rainbow/Push Coalition.

Clinton was applauded at a breakfast meeting for her attacks on President George W Bush's economic policies of "tax breaks for the rich". She added: "It is not rich Americans who have made this country great. It is hard-working Americans who have worked hard to lift themselves and their children up."

Delayed by bad weather, Obama turned up in the evening to pay respectful homage to Jackson's presidential bids in the 1980s. "I owe him a great debt," Obama said. "I would not be here had it not been for 1984 . . . for 1988. If I'm on the cover of Ebony (an African-American magazine), it's not because of me. It's because a whole bunch of folks did the work to put me there."

Yet Obama's charm and eloquence have not wooed the old guard.

"They are basically jealous," said a Democratic strategist who has not yet decided which candidate he intends to support. "They've been toiling in the trenches for decades, and along comes this son of a Kenyan farmer and suddenly he's measuring the drapes in the Oval Office."

Sharpton, 52, is widely considered to have no better chance of winning the Democratic nomination than in 2004, when he never amassed more than a few percentage points in the polls but still made a national impact with his barnstorming performances in the televised primary debates.

DOJ_NMG_0116750

When asked about Obama's likely candidacy, the preacher, renowned for outrageous self-publicising antics, shrugged: "Right now we're hearing a lot of media razzle-dazzle. I'm not hearing a lot of meat, or a lot of content. I think when the meat hits the fire, we'll find out if it's just fat, or if there's some real meat there."

Belafonte, who returns to British cinema screens shortly with a small role in Bobby, the new Emilio Estevez film about the assassination of Robert F Kennedy, also cast doubt on Obama's credentials as a legitimate candidate.

"He's a young man in many ways to be admired," Belafonte said. "Obviously very bright, speaks very well, cuts a handsome figure. But all of that is just the king's clothes. Who's the king?" There were contrasting views on the likely impact on Obama's campaign of black competition or criticism. One analyst argued that a Sharpton candidacy would "put Obama on the spot" by forcing him to address awkward civil rights issues such as police brutality and racial profiling that he tends to steer clear of. One Democratic blogger argued that Sharpton was "just what the doctor ordered to keep Obama on the straight and narrow".

Others suggested that Sharpton would help Clinton by dividing black primary voters. In one interview last week, Sharpton warned that Obama could not take the black vote for granted. A strategist pointed out, however, that Obama could emerge as a "model of reason, compared to that blowhard Al (Sharpton)".

Romney Retreats On Gun Control (BOS)

By Scott Helman

The Boston Globe, January 14, 2007

ORLANDO , Fla. -- Former governor Mitt Romney, who once described himself as a supporter of strong gun laws, is distancing himself from that rhetoric now as he attempts to court the gun owners who make up a significant force in Republican primary politics.

In his 1994 US Senate run, Romney backed two gun-control measures strongly opposed by the National Rifle Association and other gun-rights groups: the Brady Bill, which imposed a five-day waiting period on gun sales, and a ban on certain assault weapons.

"That's not going to make me the hero of the NRA," Romney told the Boston Herald in 1994.

At another campaign stop that year, he told reporters: "I don't line up with the NRA."

And as the GOP gubernatorial candidate in 2002, Romney lauded the state's strong laws during a debate against Democrat Shannon O'Brien. "We do have tough gun laws in Massachusetts; I support them," he said. "I won't chip away at them; I believe they protect us and provide for our safety."

Today, as he explores a presidential bid, Romney is sending a very different message on gun issues, which are far more prominent in Republican national politics than in Massachusetts.

He now touts his work as governor to ease restrictions on gun owners. He proudly describes himself as a member of the NRA -- though his campaign won't say when he joined. And Friday, at his campaign's request, top officials of the NRA and the National Shooting Sports Foundation led him around one of the country's biggest gun shows.

Romney says he still backs the ban on assault weapons, but he won't say whether he stands by the Brady Bill. And after the gun show tour, his campaign declined to say whether he would still describe himself as a supporter of tough gun laws.

"He believes Americans have the right to own and possess firearms as guaranteed under the US Constitution," spokesman Eric Fehrnstrom wrote in an e-mail. "He's proud to be among the many decent, law-abiding men and women who safely use firearms. Like President Bush, he supports restrictions on assault weapons, but Mitt Romney has also worked with gun owners and sportsmen to ease the gun-licensing laws in Massachusetts."

Romney appears to be stepping up his efforts to portray himself as a gun-friendly candidate, though some gun-rights activists in important primary states say his past positions will hurt him politically.

On Wednesday, Romney said on an Internet podcast, "The Glenn and Helen Show," that he hopes states would continue to ease regulations on gun owners, and he expressed enthusiasm for guns and hunting. "I have a gun of my own. I go hunting myself. I'm a member of the NRA and believe firmly in the right to bear arms," Romney said.

Asked by reporters at the gun show Friday whether he personally owned the gun, Romney said he did not. He said one of his sons, Josh, keeps two guns at the family vacation home in Utah, and he uses them "from time to time." The guns are a

DOJ_NMG_0116751

Winchester hunting rifle and a Glock 9mm handgun, which Romney uses for target shooting . Romney also described himself as a sportsman who learned to shoot as a boy rabbit hunting in Idaho with a .22 rifle. He fondly recalled shooting quail last year at a Republican Governors Association event in Georgia.

"I . . . had a good time and actually knocked down a couple of birds," he said.

Fehrnstrom said Romney had taken steps to support gun rights as governor, including his signing of an NRA-backed bill last year that reduced a testing requirement on certain pistol-makers before they could sell guns in Massachusetts.

In 2002, even as he was pledging to uphold the state's strong gun laws, Romney still garnered a "B" grade from the NRA.

Also, in 2005, Romney designated May 7 as "The Right to Bear Arms Day" in Massachusetts to honor "the right of decent, law-abiding citizens to own and use firearms in defense of their families, persons, and property and for all lawful purposes, including the common defense."

But perhaps the most significant gun legislation Romney signed as governor was a 2004 measure instituting a permanent ban on assault weapons. The Legislature mirrored the law after the federal assault weapons ban, which was set to expire. According to activists at the time, the bill made Massachusetts the first state to enact its own such ban, and Romney hailed the move.

"These guns are not made for recreation or self-defense," he was quoted as saying. "They are instruments of destruction with the sole purpose of hunting down and killing people."

The bill enjoyed the support of Massachusetts gun owners because it also encompassed several measures they favored -- including a lengthening of the terms of firearm identification cards and licenses to carry. (Asked about the bill Friday, Romney described it as a "consensus measure" and a "positive step.")

But the NRA and many local affiliates do not support assault weapons bans, arguing that the arms are rarely used in crimes and have a legitimate purpose in hunting, target shooting, and self-protection. Romney's signing of that bill, despite its progun provisions, will be problematic politically, activists say.

"Why don't you just not take away [rights] from us?" Michael Thiede, president of the group Michigan Gun Owners, said last week. He said Romney's support for the assault-weapons ban and the Brady Bill will "absolutely" give him friction.

Gerald W. Stoudemire, president of Gun Owners of South Carolina, agreed, saying Romney has been "basically antigun on some issues."

"They're going to be a big scratch on his record," Stoudemire said. "He's going to have to not just get over them, but show a different direction if he's going to pick up voters."

The NRA officials who led Romney around the trade show declined to discuss his positions. "We meet with candidates all over the country at every level," said Chris W. Cox, who heads the NRA's political and legislative work.

Romney's past positions on gun control have also drawn some attention in the blogosphere, though not nearly as much as his statements in support of abortion rights and gay rights. (He's now antiabortion and takes a harder line on gay rights.) "Wait until the 2d amendment crowd gets a hold of Mitt's views on gun control," one blogger wrote on punditreview.com .

Romney was clearly trying to allay such concerns by attending the massive Shooting, Hunting, Outdoor Trade Show and Conference at Orlando's Orange County Convention Center. Romney, joined by his wife, Ann, and trailed by local television stations and a few reporters, chatted enthusiastically with vendors displaying a wide variety of weapons.

"Let's see your shotguns here," Romney said to Michael F. Golden, CEO of the Springfield-based gunmaker Smith & Wesson. Romney's dark suit stood out in a sea of camouflage, but he gamely introduced himself to anyone in his path.

At one booth, he met exhibition shooter Tom Knapp , who gave Romney some hunting advice: When you miss an animal, pretend you did it on purpose, because you want the animal to breed lots of offspring (read: targets).

"That's a great hunting tip!" Romney said with a laugh.

The trade show illustrated the work that lies ahead for Romney in broadening his name recognition. Though many people knew who he was -- "I was just pitching you last night!" one man said enthusiastically -- many others did not.

"Who is that?" a woman at the Crossman gunmaker booth asked quietly after Romney walked away.

"A governor," someone said.

"Where?" she asked.

DOJ_NMG_0116752

"Massachusetts -- may be running for president."

Moments later, a different woman gestured in his direction: "Is that Jeb Bush?"

"No, it's Mitt Romney," Fehrnstrom corrected.

Tancredo In Iowa To Test '08 Bid (DENP)

By Anne C. Mulkern

Denver Post, January 14, 2007

Washington - U.S. Rep. Tom Tancredo is in the key caucus state of Iowa this weekend, assessing whether he should formally announce a bid for the presidency.

"What comes out of this weekend will determine whether or not he sets up an exploratory committee," Tancredo spokesman Carlos Espinosa said Friday.

Tancredo, R-Colo., officially is in Iowa to publicize his book, "In Mortal Danger." But while he's there, he's talking to state Republican leaders.

"Fighting for 3rd place"

Tancredo often talks about running for president as a way to publicize his hard-line views on the immigration issue. If he decides to announce, Espinosa said, it's for that cause and not because he thinks he can win the election.

"Any bid that Tom would put up, it would be fighting for third place," Espinosa said. "Third place would be a huge victory for Tom Tancredo."

Tancredo is eyeing Iowa because, in his view, there are only two Republican front- runners who plan to compete in the caucus there: Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

Iowa also is the first of the Republican presidential caucus states.

"The reality is, McCain is not a very popular guy in Iowa," Espinosa said. "That leaves a very big void in Iowa."

Tancredo objects to McCain's position on immigration reform. McCain was one of the sponsors of the Senate bill on immigration that passed last year. It would have created a guest-worker program and a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants. Tancredo opposes giving any legal status to illegal immigrants.

Press jumps the gun

The Des Moines Register's website Friday reported that Tancredo was announcing a run for the presidency, which Espinosa said isn't true. Reaction to Tancredo's visit to the state, he said, "is being blown way out of proportion."

In addition to evaluating Iowa, Tancredo is also waiting to see whether Sen. Wayne Allard, R-Colo., decides to run for re-election in 2008, Espinosa said. Tancredo has said he's interested in that office.

Left Out In '08 (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

THE GOVERNOR OF the nation's largest state was reelected in a landslide in November, even though his Republican Party is a minority in California. He works with Democrats in a way that offers the rest of the country a model of much-needed bipartisanship. To kick off his second term, he has proposed the most ambitious healthcare and environmental reforms in the country, and he is also committed to a massive reconstruction of the state's infrastructure.

Yet, oddly enough, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is not on the list of potential presidential candidates in 2008.

Why? Because the founders were worried in the 18th century that our fledgling nation might go the way of Poland and be overtaken by a foreign monarchy. Hence the constitutional qualifier that only "natural-born citizens" are eligible for the presidency of the United States.

In their wisdom, however, the Constitution's authors adopted a mechanism for the nation's founding document to be amended. Amendments should be undertaken sparingly, we agree, but it's a good thing that slavery was done away with and that suffrage has been expanded.

And now that we can all rest assured that no foreign monarch is going to move into the White House, it's long past due for this nation of immigrants to amend the Constitution to allow naturalized Americans to aspire to the presidency. This is precisely the type of defining issue — what it means to be American — that the amendment process was designed to address.

DOJ_NMG_0116753

Supporting Schwarzenegger for governor (we did) does not necessarily lead to supporting him for president (we don't — yet). But why should Californians have their governor sidelined from the race? And why can't voters across the country be entrusted to decide for themselves whether the governor of California is sufficiently "American" to earn their vote? It's insulting, really.

Yes, the nation will manage without Schwarzenegger at the helm. But his situation is a reminder of this constitutional flaw. The issue is also important at a symbolic level. It isn't that there aren't enough qualified "natural-born" Americans to run for the highest office in the land, it's that there is an asterisk attached to the citizenship of many great Americans.

Think about it. Someone could come to the U.S. at the age of 2 from Britain or China or Peru, become a citizen, join the military, win a Medal of Honor, cure cancer — but that person would still not be "good enough" for the White House.

One of the exceptional qualities of this meritocratic nation of immigrants is its sense of possibility. Americans like to tell their kids that they can be anything they want to be when they grow up — including president. But for millions of patriotic Americans, the Constitution says otherwise. The idea of citizenship only as a birthright is a decidedly foreign notion. And the idea that voters cannot elect as their leader a naturalized citizen is decidedly undemocratic.

That's why California's representatives in Washington should support a constitutional amendment. If the United States is a nation of immigrants, California is a state of immigrants. And California leaders who want to hold on to the 18th century prohibition against naturalized citizens running for the presidency are not doing a very good job representing their constituents.

We asked every member of Congress representing California two questions: 1) As a Californian, do you think it's fair that our governor can't run for president because he's a naturalized citizen? And 2) Would you support a constitutional amendment to allow naturalized citizens to seek the presidency?

We have posted their answers on our website at latimes.com/opinion.

We realize there are further debates to be had about the exact terms and language of the amendment. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, for instance, does favor such an amendment but wants a 35-year residency requirement for naturalized citizens; Rep. Ken Calvert (R-Corona) would require individuals to have been a citizen for a quarter of a century. But it's remarkable that 18 out of 55 members failed to get back to us on this issue altogether, three refused to comment and 11 others couldn't muster a simple "yes" or "no" answer to these fundamental questions. These include both Democratic senators, Dianne Feinstein and Barbara Boxer. Feinstein reminded us that she had serious concerns about such an amendment the last time the issue was looked at by the Senate Judiciary Committee, but that she would keep an open mind on future proposals. Boxer simply said she'd want to look at the specific language of any proposed amendment before taking a position, but she wouldn't even answer the first question regarding Schwarzenegger's predicament.

The good news is that of those who did give us straightforward answers, 14 members of the House of Representatives said they would support a constitutional amendment, while nine wouldn't. That's a start.

Plenty of members seem to feel like this is a minor issue — Rep. Zoe Lofgren (D-San Jose) says it is not important enough to deal with, and she'd rather see an equal rights amendment to the Constitution. Others may even feel that it is too radioactive against the backdrop of arguments over illegal immigration.

A number of representatives overlook the symbolic importance of the barrier to naturalized citizens, focusing on the fact that we already have a talented pool of people from which to choose a president. Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles) got the bipartisan spirit of our endeavor, saying he'd favor a constitutional amendment to allow naturalized citizens to run for president, "even those I may not support myself." We hope mere partisanship isn't driving the views of others.

In any case, we will persevere in coming months to try to keep the issue on the minds of our representatives, and maybe, as they reflect on what it means to represent this state built by immigrants, we can hear back from more of them.

A Preview Of Arnold's Second Act (LAT)

By Bill Whalen

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

THERE ARE two ways to view Arnold Schwarzenegger's skiing mishap: His fractured femur was a bad break, or it's the latest example of bad luck to befall a newly reelected California governor.

DOJ_NMG_0116754

Hearken back to 1995, the last time a Republican governor began a second term. Pete Wilson underwent surgery on his vocal chords and lost his public voice — and his dream of being president. Gray Davis, a Democrat, experienced an even more painful procedure during the first — and last — year of his second term: a voter recall.

So, odd though it may sound (and as painful as it assuredly is), Schwarzenegger has so far gotten off easy: His voice can still be heard, and he still has his job.

Odd is a good word to describe the governor's coordinates on the political landscape. Schwarzenegger lives in rarified air — an American politician the world knows on a first-name basis. That said, his sky has a ceiling. Term limits will force him to step down in 2011, and the Constitution stands in the way of a presidential run.

That leaves the U.S. Senate as an alternative. Some option. Watch five minutes of C-SPAN2 and you'll understand why that chamber's deliberative style is an awkward fit for a thrill-seeking executive such as Schwarzenegger.

So, time is running out on the governor's political career. And that might explain why his second term is off to such a fast start. It also may explain what kind of politician he truly is.

Will Schwarzenegger get his way on the healthcare front? That largely depends on his interpersonal skills, beginning with his ability to offer lawmakers the right mix of carrots and sticks to keep the reform effort on a steady course.

Those talents were missing two years ago when the governor and Legislature couldn't work out a deal that would have spared California a special election.

If that history repeats itself, healthcare reform could collapse under its own weight — or, worse for California, emerge from the Legislature as a "Franken-fix," a last-minute, slapdash job certain to haunt the next governor.

Schwarzenegger will need the same people skills to repair another fracture on his right — his deteriorating relationship with the legislative wing of the Republican Party. Right now, that relationship is headed from critical condition to "do not resuscitate."

LEGISLATIVE Republicans have every reason to gripe. The governor's most notable "conservative" accomplishments are defensive in nature: He hasn't raised taxes (now debatable, depending on how one interprets the revenue provisions of his universal healthcare plan); he hasn't signed a same-sex marriage law; and he refuses to provide driver's licenses to illegal immigrants. Also, to date, Schwarzenegger's post-partisanship style has consisted almost entirely of him moving left of center and Democratic legislators leaning a little to the right.

There is an underlying irony to his conflict with conservative Republicans. Probably the most appealing idea in the governor's new budget to GOP lawmakers is cutting welfare benefits to encourage recipients to enter the workforce. But the Republicans suffer from a different form of dependency — the urge to whine and complain instead of offering concrete ideas to move forward. Maybe it's what comes from being a political underclass. But it's not productive. And it won't work with an optimist like the governor.

Still, is Schwarzenegger truly a Republican when his ideas aren't well received by party regulars? It's a fair question. And it's worth remembering that Hiram Johnson, the great reformer and Schwarzenegger's first gubernatorial role model, started out as a Republican governor before joining Theodore Roosevelt and the "Bull Moose" Progressive Party after only two years in Sacramento.

Our nonconformist governor may be best described as a "utopian." Schwarzenegger aspires to a pristine environment, economic progress across class lines and healthcare for all. His basis for action is a kind of "political transcendentalism" — a personal belief that within California's political system there exists a spiritual desire that outweighs the worst of partisan urges. Healthcare reform will put that faith to its strongest test.

No one is going to confuse our crowd-loving, glamour-seeking governor with the stark isolation of a 19th century transcendentalist such as Henry David Thoreau — Sun Valley and Walden Pond have little in common.

But it's the latter's writing that strikes a chord. "If one advances confidently in the direction of his dreams, and endeavors to live the life which he has imagined," Thoreau observed, "he will meet with a success unexpected in common hours."

Time will tell if the uncommon politician finds expected success in his next four years.

Bill Whalen, Former Chief Speechwriter For Gov. Pete Wilson, Is A Research Fellow At Stanford University.

Gov. Attuned To Waning Of Party Loyalty (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0116755

By Peter Nicholas

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

SACRAMENTO — Rolling out his agenda last week, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger proudly elevated his eclectic approach to a kind of political doctrine: Republicans and Democrats might be invested in the fight for supremacy, but voters aren't.

Seeing that party loyalties are dwindling, Schwarzenegger is confident that he faces no real repercussions if he disappoints the state's GOP leadership.

Siphoning ideas from both major parties, he remains a Republican by registration, but he is acting, speaking and governing increasingly like an independent. Like a party of one.

In the first week of his new term, Schwarzenegger's moves were nearly impossible to categorize. He was left, right and center all at once, a method he cast as "post-partisan."

He called for scaling back state welfare benefits but also proposed new assessments on business to underwrite his ambitious healthcare plan. The governor wants more money to combat global warming, but also to build new prisons and reservoirs — projects important to Republicans.

"There's something positive for everyone, and there appears to be something negative for everyone," said Lewis Uhler, president of the nonprofit National Tax Limitation Committee.

Schwarzenegger's approach reflects a careful reading of the California electorate. Since 1990, Republican and Democratic party membership in California has dropped, while the proportion of independent voters has climbed.

Independents account for nearly 19% of the electorate today, compared with 9% in 1990. In his Jan. 5 inaugural speech, the governor said that if these trends continue, independents will outnumber each of the major parties in 20 years.

Across a broader swath of the country, analysts have spotted the same pattern.

From 1994 to 2006, Democratic Party registration dropped from 48% to 42%; Republican, from 34% to 33%, according to data compiled in 27 states by Rhodes Cook, author of a northern Virginia-based political newsletter. Independents and those registered to other parties rose from 18% to 25% during those years.

There are no data available for all 50 states.

Schwarzenegger is positioning himself ahead of that onrushing wave, political analysts said.

"He's looking at where the voters are going," said Tony Quinn, co-editor of the California Target Book, which analyzes state races. "He's where the curve is."

Republican Party leaders say they are alarmed. State Sen. Tom McClintock (R-Thousand Oaks), an icon for California fiscal conservatives, said the governor's healthcare proposal involves an unacceptable tax on business.

Schwarzenegger "shattered" a campaign promise that was vital to his reelection, McClintock said.

Does it matter what conservative activists think? Political analysts say no.

Schwarzenegger, after all, captured 91% of the GOP vote when he won reelection. The only statewide offices that Republicans won in the November election were those of governor and insurance commissioner. Even with an incumbent candidate, the GOP lost the secretary of state post.

For the moment, the party's best and perhaps only asset in California is Schwarzenegger.

"The problem with the McClintock wing is that they're in great danger of making the Republicans completely irrelevant to the process," Quinn said. " … They lost. They went to the voters with their ideas, and they weren't the ones who got elected."

One advisor to the governor privately said that Schwarzenegger's new identity is not so much post-partisan as "post-Republican."

With his first term behind him, Schwarzenegger has decided that aligning himself with Republican lawmakers is futile. He tried that in 2005, when he called a special election with conservative goals such as curbing state spending and restricting labor's political clout.

Voters defeated the governor's program, and his approval rating sank to the 30s.

Ever pragmatic, Schwarzenegger saw that pushing a classic Republican agenda was a dead end and that if he was to avoid failure — a Schwarzenegger imperative — he had to adapt.

Those who know him say there's a degree of self-interested calculation in the post-partisan stew.

DOJ_NMG_0116756

"The governor may remain a Republican by name, but from a political standpoint he doesn't see a lot to be gained in terms of promoting his party membership," said Mark Baldassare, a pollster with the nonpartisan Public Policy Institute of California.

Determined to reach the biggest audience possible, Schwarzenegger may be planning to take his message on the road. Aides have said he may travel to New Hampshire and Iowa during the presidential primary season, hoping to become part of the national conversation.

"What he has had to say in the last week has put him back on the national stage, talking about healthcare reform and global warming and post-partisanship," Baldassare said.

"So while he can't run for president, he can certainly position himself as a national political leader by talking about the value of thinking beyond partisanship."

Gov. Riley Says No To VP Talk (AP)

AP, January 13, 2007

MONTGOMERY, Ala. (AP) - Bob Riley adds the title of "two-term governor" on Monday. But with potential presidential candidate John McCain attending the inauguration, Riley is trying to stymie speculation that he wants to trade his new title for "vice presidential candidate" next year.

Riley says he is not interested in running a national campaign in 2008 or leaving the governor's office before the end of his new four-year term.

"This sounds so hokey I hate to even say it, but Alabama truly is positioned to do something that is incredible, and I can't think of a better way to spend four years than to finally be able to make all the education reforms we can, develop a new ethical standard, and watch this state continue to grow in a way it has never grown before," Riley said in an interview.

David Lanoue, chairman of the political science department at the University of Alabama, said Riley does not appear to be an "overly ambitious" politician. But he said, "Politicians are like football coaches. They say they don't want the job until they take it."

Riley and McCain visited U.S. troops in Iraq early last year. Then as McCain's presidential aspirations grew, he donated $10,000 to Riley's re-election campaign and stumped across the state in October to help the Republican governor win a second term.

During that tour, the Arizona senator called Riley a friend and lavished him with the kind of adjectives that politicians like to hear. Reporters asked questions about whether Riley might become a running mate, but both men dodged them.

Speculation popped up again at Riley's victory party on Nov. 7, when some supporters held up signs saying "President" and "2008."

Now, the talk is heating up again with McCain planning to be on the Capitol steps Monday when Riley takes the oath of office for a second term.

"The senator believes Governor Riley has been a strong leader in Alabama that has instituted reform policies that have grown the economy, invested in education and fought to protect families," McCain spokesman Danny Diaz said Friday.

Lanoue said he suspects McCain's main reason for visiting Alabama again is to build support for the state's early presidential preference primary, but the visit gives him another opportunity to get to know Riley.

"Is the vice presidency on McCain's mind when he comes down here? Sure," Lanoue said.

State Democratic Party Chairman Joe Turnham, who lost a congressional race to Riley in 1998, said he believes "the Riley team is looking at national politics."

He said Riley's three terms in the U.S. House combined with his two terms as governor make him an attractive figure, and he would provide geographic balance to a western candidate like McCain or a northeastern candidate like former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani or former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

A Riley resignation to move to Washington would be a boost for Turnham's party because Democratic Lt. Gov. Jim Folsom Jr. would move up to the governor's office.

When reporters bring up presidential politics, Riley tries to quiet the talk by recounting his goals for his new term.

They include, he says:

DOJ_NMG_0116757

-raising Alabama's income tax threshold for a second time.

-removing the state income tax from the first $10,000 of taxable retirement income.

-giving workers a tax break for returning to school to learn new skills.

-providing a tax break to help small businesses provide health insurance to their employees.

-putting distance learning labs and offering at least eight Advanced Placement courses in every Alabama high school, no matter how small or how remote.

"The disparity between the best education and the worst education is just too wide in this state. We have the technology and the know how to level the playing field," he said.

Riley's tax breaks and spending plans would affect taxes dedicated to Alabama's public schools and teachers' pay.

And that means his second term will be similar to his first. He will have regular battles with Paul Hubbert, executive secretary of the Alabama Education Association and vice chairman of the Alabama Democratic Party.

"The governor's agenda is going to have problems with cutting money from schools," Hubbert said.

"When people say this is going to hurt education, it's exactly the opposite," Riley said.

He said the tax breaks will stimulate the economy, create more jobs and provide even more tax revenue for public schools.

When the governor's battles with Hubbert and others are over and his term comes to an end, Riley said he wants to return to his farm in Ashland.

"Politics is exciting and I enjoy it. But the life we had back in Clay County was something that meant a lot to both Patsy and myself," he said.

And is there any interest in moving into the home at One Observatory Circle in Washington when Dick Cheney moves out?

"No," he said.

McCain-Clinton '08? Obama-Hagel? That's The Ticket (WP)

By Lanny J. Davis

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

Imagine this scenario: The country is so deeply divided that the media have color-coded the map of the United States to indicate the partisan chasm -- one color covers the South and most of the border states, the other drenches the North.

As the presidential election year nears, one candidate, a shoo-in for his party's nomination, has an obvious choice for running mate. Yet he also senses the uniqueness of the moment. So he makes a risky decision: He asks a leader of the opposition to run for vice president alongside him, forming the first bipartisan presidential ticket in U.S. history.

This is no fantasy. It's the decision Abraham Lincoln made when, running for reelection in 1864, he asked his Republican vice president, Hannibal Hamlin, to quit the ticket in favor of the highly partisan Democrat Andrew Johnson.

Lincoln's experiment in bipartisanship was tragically cut short when he was assassinated less than a month after his 1865 inauguration. But if ever there was a time to give it a second try, it's now.

Today's national unease and rabid partisanship -- so similar to the circumstances of 1864 -- raise the challenge for someone to form a bipartisan ticket in 2008. The lingering trauma of 9/11, the war in Iraq and the fight against terrorism call for an administration open to bipartisan solutions to the crises that confront the country.

Last year's congressional elections showed that voters are tired of the partisan gridlock in Washington. They want some solutions from liberals and others from conservatives. That's the new politics of our age, as exemplified by Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman's reelection in Connecticut as an "independent" Democrat. Though he has voted mostly with his fellow Democrats over the years, Lieberman is open to both liberal and conservative approaches.

The most important reason for a bipartisan presidency in 2008 is the need to find solutions to the war in Iraq and to avoid delaying the end of significant U.S. involvement over fear of partisan recriminations. Solving the dilemma of Iraq -- how to get U.S. troops out of harm's way in a civil war yet not leave behind a rogue state dominated by terrorists -- will require bipartisan effort and support.

A bipartisan administration is also essential for enacting new taxes. Most responsible political leaders in both parties know -- though few are willing to admit it publicly -- that there is no way to pay for the war in Iraq, even as it winds down, and reduce the deficit while also addressing health care, energy independence, global warming and Social Security other than by raising taxes. Only a bipartisan presidency pushing leaders on both sides of the aisle can make it possible to tackle that issue honestly.

DOJ_NMG_0116758

So how do you put a bipartisan ticket together? Theodore Sorenson, speechwriter for President John F. Kennedy, wrote a book in 1984 describing the various ways it might be done.

The Democratic and/or Republican nominee could do what Lincoln did -- reach out to a leader of the other party as a running mate at the nominating convention. Another scenario, which I prefer, would be for the two parties to nominate their respective tickets and wage a traditional partisan campaign on the issues, so that voters could see each party's approach and weigh their preferences. After the election, the winner would ask his or her vice president-elect to step down (and become, for example, secretary of state) while inviting the defeated presidential or vice presidential candidate from the other party to serve as vice president. This plan would ideally be announced during the campaign -- with the vice presidential candidate agreeing to act as a placeholder on the ticket -- so that the electorate would be aware of the commitment to a bipartisan presidency.

In this scenario, the vice president could be selected after the election by the Electoral College, which would presumably honor the president-elect's request to vote for the president or vice president of the defeated party. Or the selection could occur after the inauguration, with the newly sworn-in vice president resigning and the resulting vacancy filled, under the 25th Amendment, by a majority vote in both houses of Congress. The advantage of this latter method is that it would receive Congress's ratification of the concept of a bipartisan presidency.

In forming his administration, the new president would continue to adhere to the ideal of bipartisanship, selecting a 50-50 Cabinet and choosing judicial nominees on the basis of merit rather than party.

There are any number of provocative possibilities for a bipartisan ticket in 2008. Imagine the buzz if Republican John McCain and Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton committed to making the other vice president in the event that either won the election. Pick any combination of other names in the current field of potential candidates: Democrat Barack Obama and Republican Chuck Hagel; Democrat Joseph R. Biden Jr. and Republican Mitt Romney; Democrat John Edwards and Republican Michael Bloomberg; Democrat Bill Richardson and Republican Rudolph W. Giuliani. Any of these bipartisan pairings, in any permutation, would create a stir -- and a dynamite ticket. (Okay, strike one possible combination -- there's no way we'll see a Clinton-Giuliani ticket, or vice versa; not only does the Constitution forbid it, as they're both from the same state, but their personal chemistry would preclude it, too.)

Will it happen? In the end, political realism will be the determining factor. If it appears that a bipartisan ticket could enhance the chances of victory, and if any party leader embraces the need to make this a reality for the country's sake, then yes, it's likely to happen.

You don't have to go back 143 years to Abraham Lincoln for an example of such a judgment. Less than three years ago, Democrat John F. Kerry reportedly saw the political wisdom in asking McCain to be his vice presidential candidate, even though he knew the idea would be vehemently opposed by the Democratic Party's liberal base, which disagreed with McCain's positions on abortion, the Iraq war and other issues. Though McCain declined the invitation, it seems evident in hindsight that a Kerry-McCain ticket would have had a better chance of picking up an extra state (or turning 75,000 votes in Ohio) to win the 2004 election.

And whether or not either party takes the dramatic step of committing to a bipartisan ticket, there could be one nonetheless. A well-funded group of national political experts from both parties called "Unity '08," led by Republican pollster Douglas Bailey and former Democratic presidential aide Hamilton Jordan, is ready to fill the void and run a third, bipartisan ticket that would be nominated online through a virtual convention.

But I'm betting that such a third ticket won't be necessary, because eitherDemocrats or Republicans -- or both -- will nominate a bipartisan ticket in 2008 or commit to a bipartisan presidency after the election. And I'll wager that if only one of the parties does it, that party will win.

Lanny J. Davis, special counsel to President Bill Clinton from 1996 to 1998, is the author of "Scandal: How 'Gotcha' Politics Is Destroying America" (Palgrave Macmillan).

Nothing Perks Up A President Like Death (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0116759

By David Greenberg

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

WHEN Calvin Coolidge left the presidency in March 1929, having forsworn what surely would have been a reelection romp, he was basking in public adulation of a rare kind. Credited with six years of "Coolidge prosperity," praised for restoring integrity to Washington after the Teapot Dome scandal, admired for avoiding foreign wars, Silent Cal decamped to his native New England a man beloved. Back in Northampton, Mass., reporters peered in his car window, and one tried to enter his bathroom while he was showering.

Just four years later, however, when Coolidge died suddenly from a heart attack, he already seemed a relic. With the Depression and renewed European hostilities, his economic program had come to appear blinkered rather than sensible, his foreign policy self-deluding rather than statesmanlike and his hands-off governing style flaccid rather than prudent. The country had just swept Franklin Delano Roosevelt into office, a man whose ideas Coolidge had disparaged as "socialistic."

"We are in a new era," Coolidge lamented to a friend just before his death, "to which I do not belong." His public image has never recovered.

Coolidge may have been the last American president whose reputation plummeted after his term ended. The national hoopla surrounding the deaths of Richard Nixon in 1994, Ronald Reagan in 2004 and last month — to the astonishment of historians, as well as most other Americans over 30 — Gerald Ford suggests that nothing helps a chief executive's standing with the public so much as his demise.

After all, Ford, notwithstanding his much-celebrated Midwestern decency, will likely escape notice in the next century's history textbooks, except perhaps as the man who let Nixon go free — an act, lest we forget, that also permitted vital "what did the president know" questions go unanswered. Nixon, for his part, was not the internationalist visionary his eulogists canonized but a mean-hearted, power-hungry lawbreaker who thought himself above the Constitution (and one whose foreign policy legacy actually remains mixed).

Reagan, though adored in certain quarters, was deeply reviled in others — loathed as much as the current incumbent for his ultraconservatism, his simple-mindedness and his scorn for the welfare state.

Of course, we shouldn't construe the sonorous eulogies and lofty pronouncements about history's judgment of Nixon, Ford and Reagan as proof of their permanent rehabilitation. De mortuis nil nisi bonum, says a Latin proverb: Of the dead say nothing unless it is kind. Funerals aren't the time for carping — whether to dwell on Ford's fecklessness, Reagan's callousness or Nixon's criminality.

Nonetheless, it certainly appears that leaving office does wonders for one's reputation. Bill Clinton, defying forecasts that the Monica Lewinsky scandal would shape his legacy, has seen his popularity rating rise to 70% since leaving the White House. George H.W. Bush — turned out of office in 1992 with the lowest share of the popular vote of any incumbent since William Howard Taft — now wins kudos from old critics who contrast his multilateralism and wartime restraint with his son's heedlessness. Even Jimmy Carter, a failed president if ever there was one, notched a Nobel Prize 20 years after leaving office — though whether he'll recover from the self-inflicted wound of his latest book, which has been faulted for anti-Israel bias and intellectual dishonesty, remains uncertain.

Going back further, Dwight Eisenhower, once derided for blithely tolerating McCarthyism and Jim Crow, now smiles from the grave as the model of moderation. And John F. Kennedy has weathered three decades of attacks from the left and the right for sins ranging from policy blunders such as the Bay of Pigs invasion to personal failings such as lying about his medical ailments. Yet my students (born in the 1980s) still declare themselves suckers for Camelot.

Why do we venerate our former presidents so much more than our sitting ones? One argument is that when they take up humanitarian causes in their retirement, they gain respect from across the partisan divide. Bush the elder and Clinton were back in the public eye after the 2004 tsunami and again after Hurricane Katrina to raise money for the victims; Carter, for years, has built homes for the poor.

Yet this alone can't explain the trend. Ford saw retirement mainly as a chance to golf. Reagan, even before his Alzheimer's disease worsened, engaged in little public service.

DOJ_NMG_0116760

A more plausible explanation rests not on the presidents but on our expectations of them. Starting in the 1960s, several developments uncorked a new cynicism toward presidents. Television — combined with a newly populist style among politicians — made these once-august figures seem all too human and familiar. With Watergate and the Vietnam War, journalists and the public felt freer to serve up sharp, even vitriolic criticism of the president. And the era's general skepticism toward authority made questioning and mocking our leaders seem as American as the Kentucky Derby.

In this environment, scholars began to wonder if the popular expectations of the office had simply become too great for anyone to fulfill. The federal government now promised Americans a great deal — from vast social programs to consumer and workplace protections to an expanding litany of rights. The president, who embodies the government, was held responsible for delivering more and more: a bountiful economy and efficient services, moral vision and practical policy solutions, ethical leadership and national security without foreign entanglements. The room for error shrank.

But if presidents suffered under burdensome expectations, ex-presidents were another story. The contempt for the individual in the White House obscured an ongoing reverence for the presidential office. Americans have continued to indulge our leaders' posh inaugurations, resplendent mansion and exorbitantly expensive private plane.

We like to imagine former presidents as belonging to an elite club of veteran wise men. Having earned their battle stars and scars, we figure, they now deserve a certain respect. "Saturday Night Live" has even had a running animated bit called the "X-Presidents," which imagines the former chiefs as a gang of superheroes — parodic, but also paying homage to the special role these men hold in public life. Ex-presidents, freed of the demands placed on sitting leaders, can enjoy esteem from citizens while steering clear of controversial topics (Jimmy Carter, take note!) that bring on sniping.

That doesn't mean we should view the upward revisions of ex-presidents' reputations as correct, or final. Our encomiums to former officeholders often reflect nothing more than sentimentalism. We forget the errors of judgment or wrongheaded ideological choices for which we once rightly excoriated them. The appraisal rendered on a president's death is no more reliable than the one delivered during his tenure. Often the post-mortem boom fades: After a brief rise at the time of his death, for instance, Nixon's popularity, as tracked by Gallup, sank back to abysmal levels.

For many months now, George W. Bush has been speaking about Harry Truman — another president, maligned in his own time, whom history has come to treat more charitably for sticking to his guns in the early years of a long, global conflict. And although this comparison strikes most historians of the Cold War as strained, it's perhaps conceivable that someday Bush's successful steps in the war on terrorism will come to be seen as justifying his wrongs.

A more likely outcome, though, is that he'll follow in the steps of Lyndon Johnson — who also failed to end a degenerating war despite mounting popular discontent. For all his achievements, LBJ has emerged as the only postwar president (besides Nixon) who has failed to benefit from the ratings bounce that death or retirement brings.

History delivers few final verdicts. What's important is to maintain a humility about those judgments we offer. When presidents make news for heading up disaster-relief efforts or chairing commissions or being laid to rest, we should bear in mind that some of those whom we consider heroes may soon be remembered as rogues, some sinners as saints, and some men of decency as nullities who just happened to briefly hold the most powerful office in the world.

David Greenberg, A Professor Of Media Studies And History At Rutgers University

Rice Backs Mideast Moderates, But Offers No Plan (NYT)

By Thom Shanker, Greg Myre

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 13 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her Israeli counterpart declared their mutual backing on Saturday for a bilateral diplomatic strategy that would support moderate political leaders across the Middle East, but after a first evening of talks here offered little new to push ahead any agreement with the Palestinians.

Ms. Rice played down expectations for any breakthrough during her travels.

“I expect this trip to really be one in which we have intensive consultations,” she said to open weeklong travels across the Middle East and the Persian Gulf before consulting with allies in Western Europe. “I’m not coming with a proposal. I’m not coming with a plan.”

DOJ_NMG_0116761

The focus of her first two days is to push Israeli and Palestinian leaders to move forward on a number of smaller issues, and then she will speak with other regional allies to try to gather support for President Bush's new strategy for Iraq.

Tzipi Livni, the Israeli foreign minister, said after a meeting with Ms. Rice that the two countries were joined in an "ongoing mutual effort to empower the moderates throughout the region in the struggle against extremism and terror."

Asked to describe whether plans were being drawn to accelerate or skip portions of the long sidelined road map — the 2002 plan backed by the United Nations, Russia, the United States and the European Union that describes sequential measures to be carried out by Israelis and Palestinians to reach a full political settlement — Ms. Livni defended the process as balancing the need to give Palestinians "a political horizon" while cutting "the process into phases."

Ms. Rice sought to describe signs of optimism, especially after recent contacts between Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president, and Ehud Olmert, the Israeli prime minister.

"I think there are openings now that are there as a result of this alignment, there as a result of the obvious desire of Prime Minister Olmert and President Abbas to move forward," she said. "So I think the opening is there, but I can't really judge until I've had a chance to really talk to all the interested parties how we can accelerate the road map, how quickly we can accelerate the road map and how we begin to talk about the political horizon that everybody is interested in.

In Palestinian developments on Saturday, the two main factions, Fatah and Hamas, were again stepping up efforts to form a unity government. The process has going on for months without agreement, and has frequently broken down amid street battles between the rivals.

But envoys for Mr. Abbas have been in contact with Hamas's exiled political chief, Khaled Mashal, who is in Damascus, Syria, Palestinian officials said.

Ismail Radwan, a Hamas spokesman in the Gaza Strip, said this was "one of several Arab and Palestinian efforts to solve the differences."

Mr. Radwan also said he believed that Mr. Abbas and Mr. Mashal were likely to meet relatively soon.

In a related matter, Mr. Abbas traveled from the West Bank city of Ramallah to neighboring Jordan to discuss the political developments with King Abdullah II, who has sought to mediate in the Palestinian infighting. Mr. Abbas returned to the West Bank later on Saturday, and will meet with Ms. Rice on Sunday.

A Palestinian unity government would seek to end the internecine fighting and establish a leadership acceptable to Western countries, which cut off financing after Hamas, the radical Islamic faction, came to power early last year. Hamas controls the current cabinet, though Mr. Abbas also has substantial powers as the president.

Also on Saturday, some 80,000 Palestinian government workers, about half of the total, agreed to end a strike that had lasted for months. Most of the striking workers are from the West Bank, and many are considered sympathetic to Fatah. In Gaza, where Hamas is much stronger, government workers have not gone on prolonged strikes.

The workers were protesting the government's inability to pay wages. The Hamas government has paid salaries only partly and sporadically because of the cutoff of money that previously came from the Western countries and from tax revenues collected by Israel on behalf of the Palestinians.

The government workers are to receive one month's salary immediately, with overdue wages to be paid over the next six months, Palestinian officials said.

Meanwhile, Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, speaking on Palestinian television, said, "The American and Israeli policies seek to push the Palestinian people toward civil war and internal conflict so that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict becomes a Palestinian-Palestinian conflict."

"I call on the Palestinian people and factions, in particular Hamas and Fatah, to halt internal clashes," Mr. Haniya said.

In Washington, the State Department said Friday that the Bush administration would seek Congressional approval for $86 million in "nonlethal assistance" to strengthen branches of the Palestinian security forces directly linked to Mr. Abbas.

Rice Begins Push In The Middle East (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0116762

JERUSALEM, Jan. 13 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice embarked Saturday on a new push for Israeli-Palestinian peace but set modest goals for herself, saying she was coming without a particular plan or proposal but instead wanted to gather ideas from Israelis, Palestinians and key Arab figures in the region.

"If you don't lay the groundwork very well, then it's not going to succeed," Rice told reporters traveling with her. "And I think no plan can be made in America."

Rice appears to be seeking to lower the temperature of a region shaken by the turmoil in Iraq and last summer's war between Israel and the Islamic group Hezbollah. Aides said she wants to use the Israeli-Palestinian issue as a vehicle to dampen historic animosities and perhaps build a common front against the rising threat of Iran.

U.S. officials have encouraged Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to say positive words about a long-dormant Saudi peace plan as well as meetings between Olmert and Palestinian and Egyptian leaders. The sessions are part of an effort to strengthen ties between what Rice calls "mainstream" forces in order to counter extremism. Rice has taken particular interest in the 2002 Saudi peace plan, which held out the prospect of recognition of Israel, in contrast to the vows of Iran and the radical Palestinian group Hamas to eliminate the Jewish state.

Rice is encouraging Israel to take steps to bolster beleaguered Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, such as lifting roadblocks and freeing Palestinian prisoners. The Bush administration is also lobbying Congress for approval of an $86 million package to equip and train security forces loyal to Abbas, who has struggled against Hamas since it won legislative elections last year.

Prospects for peace are hindered, however, because Abbas and Olmert are weak politically, with Olmert receiving only 14 percent approval among those surveyed in a new opinion poll.

After arriving, Rice held a late-night meeting with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni. Rice plans to meet with Abbas on Sunday at his headquarters in Ramallah in the West Bank before traveling to Amman, Jordan, to meet with King Abdullah. She plans to hold talks with Olmert on Monday before traveling to Egypt.

On Saturday, Abbas met in Amman with Abdullah, and Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, a top Hamas official, said in Gaza that Hamas was willing to have "serious" talks with Abbas's Fatah movement about a unity government after days of calm in factional fighting.

"The United States and Israel are working and pushing the Palestinian people into a civil war . . . in order to turn this struggle from a Palestinian-Israeli struggle into a Palestinian-Palestinian struggle," Haniyeh said.

Rice had pressed for the elections that unexpectedly brought Hamas to power, a result that Livni told reporters had made the situation "more complicated and more dangerous." Unlike Fatah, which had ruled the Palestinian Authority since its creation following the 1993 Oslo peace accords, Hamas has refused to acknowledge Israel's right to exist, complicating efforts to forge a comprehensive peace agreement.

Rice told reporters she was hoping to "accelerate" a U.S.-backed peace plan known as the "road map." The plan has been effectively dormant since it was launched shortly before the Iraq invasion.

The road map envisions three stages in the creation of a Palestinian state, but progress is dependent on a series of reciprocal steps by each side, including a crackdown on militant groups such as Hamas by the Palestinian government and a halt to settlement activity by the Israelis. But U.S. officials acknowledge that one flaw of the road map is that it can grind quickly to a halt if either side fails to fulfill one of the steps.

Livni has spoken about finding some way of moving quickly to the second stage of the road map, creating an interim state with provisional borders, as part of a package deal that would resolve Israeli security concerns -- and in turn help bolster Abbas's status among Palestinians. "Part of our responsibility is to give the moderate Palestinians a political horizon while providing the Israelis security," Livni said at a news conference with Rice before their meeting.

Rice, speaking to reporters as she flew to Israel, did not rule out such an approach but expressed caution. "We also have to recognize that there are certain conditions that we're also going to have to be creating on the ground, and we don't want to lose sight of those for a vision that then can't be fulfilled," she said.

Palestinian officials are wary of creating an interim state, believing that it would lock them into a semi-legal status for years. They prefer to go directly to final-status talks on creating a permanent Palestinian state.

DOJ_NMG_0116763

Rice Aims To Restart Mideast Peace Bid (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, January 14, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice explored opportunities Saturday for a fresh start in the stalled effort at a political compromise between Israel and the Palestinians. At the start of a weeklong trip to the region, she warned that an enduring peace cannot be stamped "made in America."

Rice said she did not carry a specific plan and she tried to lower expectations for quick changes. Any progress would require political risk-taking from weakened Israeli and Palestinian leaders, and some resolution to escalating divides in the Palestinian ranks.

One idea on the table is a bold stroke — sketching the rough outlines of an eventual Palestinian state even though that day is far off. Other approaches include finding ways to speed up elements of an existing U.S.-backed peace plan.

"This is a very important and challenging time in the Middle East, but a time that I believe does have promise if we exercise our responsibilities with creativity and with resolve," Rice said before an evening meeting with Israel's foreign minister, Tzipi Livni.

Her references were to new strategies and the underlying commitment to freeze the ruling Islamic Palestinian Hamas faction and others she branded extremists, bent on denying peace and democracy to the rest of the Middle East.

"We are determined to resist their efforts, but also to strengthen the hands of those who wish to resist their efforts," Rice said.

The United States wants to move more swiftly to shore up Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. He is in a power struggle with Hamas and grasping for ways to demonstrate progress. Abbas has told U.S. diplomats he needs to offer Palestinians a vision of a political future that makes the frustrating effort to seek peace with Israel seem worthwhile.

To reward Abbas for standing firm against Hamas, the Bush administration soon will ask Congress to approve $85 million to train and equip Abbas' security forces. Israel supports the plan.

"Part of our responsibility is to give the moderate Palestinians a political horizon while providing the Israelis security," Livni said.

Ahead of Rice's visit to Jerusalem and the Palestinian-controlled West Bank, Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas contended Saturday that Israel and the U.S. were trying to fan the flames of a Palestinian civil war.

Rice also is promoting President Bush's new strategy for the Iraq war to sometimes skeptical Arab allies and asking those nations to do more to help the struggling government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Rice plans to see leaders of Jordan, home to 700,000 Iraq refugees, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait in the coming days, along with diplomats from Persian Gulf states whose governments generally are friendly to Washington.

Most of the Arab states with the most at stake if Iraq falls apart are also those pressing the U.S. to do more to reinvigorate the stalled Arab-Israeli peace process. Several of those Sunni states are alarmed by the rise of Shiite Iranian influence in Iraq and elsewhere.

Although Rice seemed eager to switch focus from Iraq, the Israeli-Palestinian problems may prove equally difficult.

"I'm not coming with a proposal. I'm not coming with a plan," Rice told reporters on the way to the region. She said two things are always true about Middle East peace efforts.

"If you don't lay the groundwork very well, then it's not going to succeed," Rice said. "And I think no plan can be made in America. There are too many important stakeholders and any progress on the Palestinian-Israeli front is going to require all of the parties."

U.S officials are dismayed at the yearlong drift in peace efforts since Hamas won parliamentary elections and now controls the Palestinian Cabinet and Parliament.

Hamas refuses to renounce violence or recognize Israel, leading the West to cut off vital international aid.

Abbas was elected separately and retains his post, but he has limited power. He has been unable to negotiate a compromise unity government with Hamas, but he has improved his international standing.

The U.S. money for Abbas' security services would be a significant vote of confidence because those forces have a troubled history of corruption and rights violations under Abbas' predecessor, the late Yasser Arafat.

DOJ_NMG_0116764

Hamas accuses Washington of trying to provoke a broader intra-Palestinian military confrontation between Hamas and Abbas' Fatah faction, and Hamas points to the money for arms as evidence. Rice stressed that the money would pay for training and other things apart from weaponry, and that it comes with strings attached.

The Palestinians' two main factions have been engaged in a violent power struggle that has claimed 35 lives in recent weeks, although there was reported progress Saturday in secret coalition talks between the two sides.

In the Palestinian-controlled Gaza Strip, Haniyeh called on Hamas and on Abbas' Fatah to halt the violent power struggle.

"Enough, I say enough," he said in a televised speech. "All forms of internal fighting must stop."

In Israel, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has been weakened by allegations of corruption and last summer's Lebanon war that many Israelis believed ultimately undermined their security.

___

Associated Press writers Any Teibel and Steve Gutkin in Jerusalem and Karin Laub in Ramallah contributed to this report.

Rice Set For Key Mid-East Meeting (BBC)

BBC.com, January 14, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is due to meet the Palestinian leader, Mahmoud Abbas, on the second day of a week-long visit to the Middle East.

Ms Rice will see Mr Abbas in Ramallah, a day after saying a "creative" solution is needed to end the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians.

Arab governments are thought to want a greater US involvement in the conflict in return for support over Iraq.

Later on Sunday she travels to Amman for dinner with Jordan's King Abdullah.

She will then meet Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in Jerusalem on Monday.

Ms Rice has admitted that she did not head to the Middle East with any specific plan to end the lingering conflict.

She met Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni on Saturday, and declared her hope that some solution could be found.

"This is a very important and challenging time in the Middle East, but a time that I believe does have promise if we exercise our responsibilities with creativity and with resolve." Extremists

Ms Rice's trip will also take her to a series of Arab capitals in an attempt to drum up support for President George W Bush's new strategy in Iraq.

The BBC's Katya Adler, in Jerusalem, says Arab states have made it clear - if the US wants their support in Iraq it must engage more in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Speaking at a joint news conference with Ms Livni, Ms Rice said they were discussing how to push forward the international peace plan for the Middle East, known as the roadmap.

"It is a time when extremist forces are attempting to make it impossible to have the kind of Middle East in which Israelis and Palestinians and other people of the Middle East can live in peace, and in which democracy can make progress," Ms Rice said.

Correspondents say Ms Rice's comments relate to efforts to shore up Mr Abbas in an ongoing power struggle with the Hamas-led Palestinian government.

"We are determined to resist their efforts, but also to strengthen the hands of those who wish to resist their efforts," she said.

Iraq strategy

Ms Rice's week-long tour will also take in Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait.

Ms Rice has said Arab leaders have every incentive to help as a stable Iraq is also in their interests.

Both President Bush and Ms Rice have said this week that they intend to step up measures against those threatening to destabilise Iraq.

Mr Bush announced an increase in US troop numbers in an effort to defeat extremists and insurgents in Iraq.

Ms Rice has warned that the US would oppose any Iranian or Syrian interference in Iraq, and said the US would not let either country continue activities that endangered American soldiers in Iraq.

Iranian President Visits Venezuela To Strengthen Ties (NYT)

By Simon Romero

DOJ_NMG_0116765

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela, Jan. 13 — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran arrived here on Saturday for talks with President Hugo Chávez, on the first leg of a Latin American visit to enhance Tehran's stature with governments where distrust of the Bush administration already runs deep.

It is Mr. Ahmadinejad's second visit to Venezuela in the past five months, and the two leaders were scheduled to talk about strengthening their economic ties. From here, the Iranian president is to visit Ecuador and Nicaragua, where leftist presidents aligned with Mr. Chavez are taking office this month.

Venezuela's government promoted the visit as an example of Middle Eastern solidarity with Mr. Chávez's opposition to American foreign policy. Venezuela has been a vociferous defender of Iran as the United States steps up efforts to circumscribe Mr. Ahmadinejad's government, most recently through military raids this week on people suspected of being Iranian operatives in Iraq.

The two countries said Saturday night that they would use a $2 billion investment fund to finance projects in Venezuela and Iran, as well as in other countries. In addition, they said they were considering ventures to train teachers and produce manioc starch in Venezuela. Mr. Chávez also said Venezuela and Iran would press for output cuts within OPEC in an effort to push oil prices up from a 19-month low.

State television here showed images of Mr. Chávez embracing Mr. Ahmadinejad and of Iranian cars rolling off an assembly line at a recently inaugurated factory in the city of Maracay. Fifty cadets from Venezuela's naval academy were on hand to receive the Iranian president at the international airport in Maiquetía.

"Welcome, fighter for just causes," Mr. Chávez said in a speech here before the National Assembly, describing Mr. Ahmadinejad as a "revolutionary" and a "brother."

The two countries said Saturday night that they would use a $2 billion investment fund to finance projects in Venezuela and Iran, as well as in other countries. In addition, they said they were considering ventures to train teachers and produce manioc starch in Venezuela. Mr. Chávez also said Venezuela and Iran would press for exporting cuts within OPEC in an effort to push oil prices up from a 19-month low.

Nowhere has Iran's search for allies in Latin America been more fruitful than in Venezuela. The two countries have signed an array of agreements in recent months, pledging to work together here in exploring for oil, building low-income housing and assembling tractors and bicycles, among other ventures.

The tightening alliance with Iran comes as Mr. Chávez pushes for broad changes in Venezuela's political and economic structures. Just this week, Mr. Chávez's government said it would nationalize the entire electricity industry and the country's largest phone company.

Mr. Chávez also announced a plan which, according to some interpretations, would reconfigure municipal governments by replacing them with entities called communal councils. The president's supporters in Congress say the project is inspired by the Paris Commune, the socialist government that briefly ruled Paris in 1871. Critics of the plan, which also includes the construction of entirely new cities in Venezuela's interior, say it would effectively eliminate some of the few elected politicians who remain opposed to the government.

Mr. Ahmadinejad's visit has alarmed Jewish organizations here and elsewhere because of his aggressive talk in relation to Israel. Heinz Sonntag, a prominent Venezuelan sociologist and political commentator, said the visit by Mr. Ahmadinejad was an "affront and an eventual threat to our fellow countrymen who are Jewish."

"The invitation of this personality is the finishing touch on Chávez's announcements this week," said Mr. Sonntag.

Venezuela has a long history of close relations with Middle Eastern countries, dating to the founding of OPEC in Baghdad in 1960 by Venezuela, Iran, Iraq, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, in an effort to keep oil prices high. Mr. Chávez has strengthened those ties through overtures to Iran, and more recently Syria, where Venezuela and Iran have plans to build an oil refinery capable of processing 150,000 barrels a day.

"There is a desire by Chávez to accelerate what he views as a strategic alliance with Iran," said Alberto Garrido, author of "Chávez's Wars," a book recently published here that explores Venezuela's ties to the Middle East. "The Venezuelan left has for decades considered alliances with Muslim countries as one of the ways to create a new civilization through the toppling of American values."

For the time being, Venezuela's relations with Iran have revolved around Mr. Chávez's defense of Iran's uranium enrichment plans, while the two countries deepen their cooperation in oil-related areas. For instance, Venezuela said last month that it would buy four oil tankers from Iran, part of Venezuela's plan to increase its 21-ship tanker fleet through the acquisition of 42 additional vessels.

Iran and Venezuela, the world's fourth- and fifth-largest oil exporters, are also exploring for oil together in Venezuela's Orinoco region. And they have plans for a joint oil trading company, part of an ambition by Caracas and Tehran to price oil in euros instead of dollars in order to weaken the influence of the United States in the international oil market.

Iran seems to have also found a welcome in Ecuador, an oil-exporting country where Mr. Ahmadinejad will attend the inauguration of Rafael Correa, a leftist economist elected president last year. And in Nicaragua, Mr. Ahmadinejad will meet with Daniel Ortega, the former guerrilla leader who assumed the presidency this month.

Iran And Venezuela Plan Anti-U.S. Fund (AP)

By Natalie Obiko Pearson

AP, January 13, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela — Venezuela's Hugo Chavez and Iran's Mahmoud Ahmadinejad — fiery anti-American leaders whose moves to extend their influence have alarmed Washington — said Saturday they would help finance investment projects in other countries seeking to thwart U.S. domination.

The two countries had previously revealed plans for a joint $2 billion fund to finance investments in Venezuela and Iran, but the leaders said Saturday the money would also be used for projects in friendly countries throughout the developing world.

"It will permit us to underpin investments ... above all in those countries whose governments are making efforts to liberate themselves from the (U.S.) imperialist yoke," Chavez said.

"This fund, my brother," the Venezuelan president said, referring affectionately to Ahmadinejad, "will become a mechanism for liberation."

"Death to U.S. imperialism!" Chavez said.

Ahmadinejad, who is starting a tour of left-leaning countries in the region, called it a "very important" decision that would help promote "joint cooperation in third countries," especially in Latin America and Africa.

It was not clear if the leaders were referring to investment in infrastructure, social and energy projects — areas that the two countries have focused on until now — or other types of financing.

Iran and Venezuela are members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, and Chavez said Saturday that they had agreed to back a further oil production cut in the cartel to stem a recent fall in crude prices.

"We know today there is too much crude in the market," Chavez said. "We have agreed to join our forces within OPEC ... to support a production cut and save the price of oil."

OPEC reduced output by 1.2 million barrels a day in November, then announced an additional cut of 500,000 barrels a day, due to begin on Feb. 1. Dow Jones Newswires reported Friday that OPEC is discussing holding an emergency meeting later this month to reduce output by another 500,000 barrels a day. Venezuela and Iran have been leading price hawks within OPEC.

Ahmadinejad's visit Saturday — his second to Venezuela in less than four months — comes as he seeks to break international isolation over his country's nuclear program and possibly line up new allies in Latin America. He is also expected to visit Nicaragua and Ecuador, which both recently elected leftist governments.

Chavez and Ahmadinejad have been increasingly united by their deep-seated antagonism toward the Bush administration. Chavez has become a leading defender of Iran's nuclear ambitions, accusing the Washington of using the issue as a pretext to attack Tehran.

Ahmadinejad, meanwhile, has called Chavez "the champion of the struggle against imperialism."

DOJ_NMG_0116767

U.S. officials have accused Chavez — a close ally of Cuban leader Fidel Castro — of authoritarian tendencies, and National Intelligence Director John Negroponte said recently in an annual review of global threats that Venezuela's democracy was at risk.

The U.S. also believes Iran is seeking to use its nuclear program to develop an atomic bomb. Tehran says its program is peaceful and geared toward the production of energy.

The increasingly close relationship between Chavez and Ahmadinejad has alarmed some Chavez critics, who accuse him of pursuing an alliance that does not serve Venezuela's interests and jeopardizes its ties with the United States, the country's top oil buyer. Venezuela is among the top five suppliers of crude to the U.S. market.

In a speech earlier Saturday, Chavez called for the U.S. government to accept "the new realities of Latin America," as he brushed aside restrictions that limit presidents to two consecutive terms. He vowed to stay in office beyond 2013, when his term expires, saying he would revise the constitution to get rid of presidential term limits.

But Chavez also said in his state of the nation address to government officials and legislators that he had personally expressed hope to a high-ranking U.S. official for better relations between their two countries.

Chavez said he spoke with Thomas Shannon, head of the U.S. State Department's Western Hemisphere affairs bureau, on the sidelines of Nicaraguan President Daniel Ortega's inauguration earlier this week.

"We shook hands and I told him: 'I hope that everything improves,'" Chavez said. "I'm not anyone's enemy."

Chavez prompted a crash in Venezuelan share prices this past week when he announced he would seek special powers from the legislature to push through "revolutionary" reforms, including a string of nationalizations and unspecified changes to business laws and the commerce code.

He also announced plans for the state to take control of the country's largest telecommunications company, its electricity and natural gas sectors and four heavy crude upgrading projects now controlled by some of the world's top oil companies.

He said Saturday, however, that private companies would be allowed to own minority stakes in the lucrative Orinoco River basin oil projects.

The government has already taken majority ownership of all other oil-producing operations in the country through joint ventures controlled by the state oil company. Most companies have shown a willingness to continue investing despite the tightening terms, which have also included tax and royalty increases.

Presidents Of Iran, Venezuela Plan $2-billion Project Fund (LAT)

By Mery Mogollon, Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

CARACAS, VENEZUELA — Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez agreed Saturday to create a $2-billion social investment fund, the latest sign of the deepening ties between their oil-rich, anti-U.S. countries.

The fund will finance projects in their countries and others in Latin America and in Africa. Previous cooperative efforts included building joint-venture cement, tractor and automobile factories in Venezuela.

"We must be comrades in the construction of both our countries," Ahmadinejad said at a ceremony at the Miraflores presidential palace here. "We have the potential of being among the most advanced countries in the world."

All the problems of the world, he said, are the result of "powerful countries that only seek economic benefits and do not value human rights because all they are concerned with is lining the pockets of their multinational companies."

Ahmadinejad's Latin American tour is also to take him to Nicaragua, which last week swore in to office a leftist president, and to Ecuador for the inauguration Monday of leftist President-elect Rafael Correa.

U.S. government officials have expressed concern over closer ties between Iran and Venezuela, citing what it has described as Iran's sponsorship of Hezbollah, the militant group in Lebanon believed to have been involved in the 1994 bombing of a Jewish cultural center in Buenos Aires that left 85 people dead.

Ahmadinejad and Chavez signed 10 other agreements addressing energy, administration and other topics. Chavez said the two countries were undergoing the "same revolution" and would work together to maintain oil prices at current levels.

DOJ_NMG_0116768

"Imperialism won't rest in its effort to weaken us, and one of the strategies is to weaken the price of oil and dominate our reserves," he said. "Our answer will be to defend prices and cut production."

Iran And Venezuela Back Oil Cuts (BBC)

BBC.com, January 13, 2007

The presidents of Venezuela and Iran have called for a cut in oil production by the members of the Opec oil cartel.

Speaking in Caracas, Hugo Chavez and Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said they wanted to co-ordinate the group to reduce the amount of crude oil on the market.

Mr Ahmadinejad is visiting Venezuela at the start of a tour aimed at boosting ties with Latin America.

Venezuela has been a strong ally of Iran in its controversial pursuit of a nuclear power programme.

Mr Chavez welcomed Mr Ahmadinejad to Caracas, calling him a "fighter for just causes, to a revolutionary and a brother".

He said the world oil market was oversupplied with crude, and said Opec should act to stop falling prices.

Both countries are major oil producers and members of Opec.

Venezuela and Iran have also agreed to establish a $2 billion fund for projects across the developing world, he added.

US opponents

While in Latin America, the Iranian president will also meet the leftist leaders of Bolivia, Ecuador and Nicaragua.

Mr Ahmadinejad's talks with some of the US's most vocal critics is likely to alarm Washington, says one of the BBC's Latin America correspondents, Duncan Kennedy.

With his eyes fixed firmly on the Middle East, the last thing President Bush wants is another hostile diplomatic front opening up in his own backyard.

Iran insists that it nuclear programme aims to provide energy

But with the arrival of the Iranian president in the region, that is exactly what some commentators are predicting.

The most worrying alliance for Washington is that being forged between Iran and Venezuela, our correspondent says.

Mr Chavez and Mr Ahmadinejad are expected to sign a series of new trade and economic co-operation agreements.

"Iran and Venezuela are two important allies on a global level, the two countries have important industrial and oil projects, which we will follow up in this trip," Mr Ahmadinejad said ahead of his trip, according to the state-run Irna agency.

Uneasy relations

Washington will be watching closely for any concrete measures or policies that develop - chief among them, any sign of Venezuela pursuing its own nuclear programme in conjunction with Iran.

That would be unacceptable to Washington and would turn what are now uneasy relations between the two states into something much more serious, our correspondent says.

Mr Ahmadinejad will also visit Nicaragua, where Daniel Ortega, the former Sandinista revolutionary, took office this week following his convincing election victory.

The Iranian president will also attend the swearing-in ceremony of President-elect Rafael Correa in Ecuador on Monday.

Ecuador's new president opposes a free-trade agreement with Washington, arguing it is damaging to Ecuadorean industry.

Mr Ahmadinejad is also expected to meet other South American leaders, including Bolivia's Evo Morales, on the sidelines of the ceremony.

Argentina Pursues Iran In '94 Blast As Neighbors Court Ahmadinejad (WP)

By Monte Reel

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

BUENOS AIRES -- As Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad visits Latin America this weekend to strengthen economic and political ties with the region, Argentina's N?stor Kirchner will not be in the line of presidents turning out to greet him.

Kirchner's government has reinvigorated attempts to prosecute Iranian figures for their alleged role in the 1994 bombing of a Jewish community center here, recently issuing arrest warrants for nine former Iranian officials. Among those sought is former president Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, accused of ordering the attack that killed 85 people and injured more than 200.

DOJ_NMG_0116769

The pursuit of Iran has been frustrated over the years by blatant corruption in the Argentine judicial system and accusations of coverups. The latest efforts to resolve the case come as much of the region is expanding relations with Iran, and several of Argentina's regional allies are pledging support for Ahmadinejad's government.

The Iranian leader plans to meet this week with Venezuela's Hugo Ch?vez, Nicaragua's Daniel Ortega, Ecuador's Rafael Correa, Bolivia's Evo Morales and possibly others. They are expected to discuss broadening bilateral agreements, such as the technology-sharing deals that Ch?vez signed with Iran last year.

"Clearly the actors driving all of this are Ch?vez and Ahmadinejad," said Michael Shifter, an analyst with the Inter-American Dialogue, a policy forum in Washington. "Both of them see themselves as global players, and so it's nice for them to build these sorts of alliances and coalitions, which people like Correa and Morales are inclined to join in."

Although Argentina maintains friendly relations with each of those leaders, Kirchner's domestic agenda is driving him in a different direction. For example, he canceled plans to attend Correa's inauguration ceremony Monday after Ahmadinejad announced that he would attend.

The continuing U.S. conflict with Iran complicates matters further: Some critics contend that Kirchner's government has been manipulated by a regionally unpopular U.S. government that wants to use the Argentine court rulings to stir international outrage against Iran.

When one of Kirchner's most loyal and high-profile domestic allies -- former street activist Luis D'Elia -- recently suggested that U.S. and Israeli pressure was fueling Argentina's pursuit of Iran, he was forced to resign from his government post two days later.

For many people in Argentina, the indictments have been a bright spot in a case that has been marred for years by botched attempts to bring the bombers to justice.

"Now at least there is hope, a small light that can be seen in the darkness," said Luis Sergio Grynwald, president of the Argentine-Israeli Mutual Association, the community organization targeted in the attack. "That light hasn't been reached yet, and we'd like it to be bigger, but it's still a light."

The bombing was the second attack on a Jewish target in Argentina. In 1992, a suicide bomber struck the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires, killing 29.

Shortly after the community center blast, then-Argentine President Carlos Menem blamed the attack on Islamic extremists from Iran. Menem was eventually saddled with some of the blame for the derailed investigations that followed: In 2002, a former Iranian intelligence official alleged that Menem, by then out of office, had received $10 million to cover up Tehran's role in the attack. Menem vigorously denied the accusation, but it nonetheless damaged his standing.

The judge investigating the community center bombing -- Juan Jos? Galeano -- was also criticized for undermining the case. He was impeached after being found guilty of misdeeds including paying a defendant $400,000 to testify. He also lost hundreds of hours of wiretap recordings and other evidence.

The only suspects to be tried in the case have been four Argentine police officers and a car thief who were charged as accessories for providing the van used in the bombing. They were acquitted for lack of proof.

Following the judicial missteps, prosecutor Alberto Nisman has been leading a team of investigators dedicated solely to the community center bombing. In late October, Nisman said that his team traced the bombing to a planning session held in 1993 in the Iranian city of Mashhad. He said the motive for the attack had been Argentina's decision to withdraw some of its support for Iran's nuclear ambitions and for its decision to strengthen relations with the United States and Israel.

In November, an Argentine judge said that Nisman's team had provided convincing evidence and issued arrest warrants for the nine former Iranian officials, including Rafsanjani, who was president from 1989 to 1997.

Iran has repeatedly proclaimed its officials had nothing to do with the bombing. In the weeks since Iran said it would ignore the extradition requests, Rafsanjani has maintained a high public profile in Iran, running for a seat in a council of clerics in December.

Even Nisman acknowledges that arresting the suspects is a long shot as long as they stay in Iran. But he insisted that people who criticize his request for the warrants -- particularly those who say he did it solely to bolster the U.S. political case against Iran -- are wrong.

DOJ_NMG_0116770

"Unfortunately, there's an upside-down analysis that's happening here," Nisman said. "Instead of analyzing all of this in terms of the proof we have compiled, people are analyzing the case in terms of political convenience."

Officials: Abbas Envoys, Hamas Head Meet (AP)

By Karin Laub, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 14, 2007

Significant progress has been made in secret coalition talks between the top Hamas leader and envoys of moderate Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, officials from both sides said Saturday, signaling a sudden shift after several weeks of deadly internal fighting.

In another unexpected show of unity, the civil servants' union dominated by Abbas' Fatah movement announced Saturday that it was ending a strike it had launched four months ago to protest non-payment of salaries by the Hamas-led government.

And in Gaza, Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh called on his Hamas movement and on Fatah to halt their increasingly violent power struggle that has claimed 35 lives in recent weeks.

"Enough, I say enough," he said in a televised speech. "All forms of internal fighting must stop."

The secret coalition talks started in Syria two weeks ago between top Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal and two Abbas envoys, independent legislator Ziad Abu Amr and Mohammed Rashid, a former adviser to Abbas' predecessor, the late Yasser Arafat, officials from both sides said.

The two envoys were heading to Damascus on Saturday for another round of talks, the officials said. Abbas is to visit the Syrian capital later this month. If a coalition agreement is reached, Abbas would meet with Mashaal in Damascus, Abbas aides and Hamas officials said.

Moussa Abu Marzouk, deputy head of Hamas' political bureau in Damascus, confirmed the secret talks and said Abbas was expected to meet with Mashaal during his upcoming visit to Syria.

Abbas unexpectedly left for Jordan on Saturday to brief Jordan's King Abdullah II on the developments. On Sunday, he is to be back in the West Bank, to meet with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who is touring the Middle East.

Hamas and Fatah, bitter political rivals, had made repeated attempts in recent months to form a coalition, but talks failed because of disagreements over the political program and control over key Cabinet posts, such as interior, finance and foreign affairs. Hamas balked at international demands that any Palestinian government recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept existing peace deals.

Under the emerging coalition deal, former Finance Minister Salam Fayyad, who is close to Fatah, would return to the job, Abu Amr would be named foreign minister and Haniyeh would remain prime minister, a senior Hamas official said.

Two key sticking points in previous talks — the government's program and who will control most of the security forces — have not yet been resolved.

"We are optimistic today," said Nasser Shaer, the deputy prime minister from Hamas.

It remains unclear whether Hamas and Fatah can end the yearlong political deadlock and reach a power-sharing agreement. Hamas, the winner of parliament elections a year ago, controls the Cabinet and parliament, while Abbas, elected separately, wields considerable power as president.

Last month, in a challenge to Hamas, Abbas threatened to call early election legislative and presidential elections, saying the Islamic militants — hit hard by an international aid boycott — have failed to provide basic services to the Palestinian people. Hamas accused Abbas of trying to bring down an elected government by illegal means, and vowed it would prevent elections from being held ahead of schedule.

Meanwhile, the civil servants' union announced its members were ending a four-month strike. The Palestinian Authority is the largest employer in the West Bank and Gaza, with some 165,000 people on the payroll.

Since Hamas came to power in March, it has only paid partial salaries because of the international aid boycott. The workers ended the strike Saturday without assurances that they would be paid in full. Most of the civil servants already had returned to work before the announcement.

—

DOJ_NMG_0116771

Associated Press Writer Mohammed Daraghmeh contributed to this report.

Amnesty For Fatah Fighters A Mideast Hurdle (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

RAMALLAH, WEST BANK — Kamel Ghannam, a 31-year-old Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade commander, is the kind of battle-hardened veteran that the Palestinian Authority president needs in his often-violent power struggle with Hamas.

But President Mahmoud Abbas can't have him right now because the warrior is on Israel's "wanted terrorists" list. He is hiding to elude an Israeli army crackdown in the West Bank.

Though Israeli officials would like to see Abbas prevail over Hamas and start negotiating a peace deal with him, they doubt he can fully control militants such as Ghannam and prevent them from turning their guns against Israelis.

That is why Israel is reluctant to give Abbas one of the concessions he wants most: to take hundreds of fighters from his Fatah movement off the wanted list and stop trying to kill or arrest them.

The question of whether Israel should grant such an amnesty for one of the two Palestinian factions is an example of how their armed feud has become entangled with the Israeli-Arab conflict, complicating the Middle East diplomacy that U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice resumed Saturday as she arrived in Israel.

While coaxing the Israelis and Palestinians toward peace, the Bush administration is also trying to help Abbas sideline Hamas, the Iran-backed Islamic movement that controls the Palestinian Authority government, resists peace overtures to Israel and is branded by the United States and Israel as a terrorist group.

Rice told reporters on her flight from Washington that she was coming for "intensive consultations" with Israeli and Palestinian leaders but bringing no proposal. She met Saturday with Israel's defense and foreign ministers and was to hold talks with Abbas today and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on Monday.

In a Dec. 23 meeting that U.S. officials helped arrange, Olmert promised Abbas several concessions as the two men began exploring ways to revive full-scale peace talks that collapsed six years ago.

Mood has soured

But the optimistic mood in Abbas' Fatah camp after that meeting has soured. Israel has been slow to keep its promises, and the army has stepped up its raids in the West Bank, seizing more than 20 Palestinians a day over the last week, many of them Fatah members.

Ghannam, the militia commander, has vanished from the streets of Ramallah.

"From what we heard after the meeting, we relaxed a little," he said of Abbas and Olmert's talk. "The leadership told us we could come out of hiding and live normal lives, get jobs and return to our families, but now we find that we cannot do this."

Ghannam spoke at one of several safe houses he uses here. He moves at night from one to another, avoiding the home of his wife and two small children. He feels betrayed.

"The leadership keeps promising things and failing to deliver," he said. "We cannot trust them anymore."

His bitter remarks echo wider criticism that Abbas is weak as a leader and negotiating partner with Israel.

Abbas lacks a solid base within Fatah's splintered ranks, which face a smaller but more disciplined Hamas fighting force. Trying to wrest political control from an elected Hamas government, Abbas has wavered between threats to call new elections and negotiations with Hamas on sharing power.

He risks losing credibility and strengthening Hamas' argument for violent resistance against Israel if he cannot win Israeli concessions through dialogue.

But Olmert is not in a position to deliver much.

Bruised by last summer's inconclusive war in Lebanon and recent corruption scandals, the Israeli leader is unpopular at home and reluctant to take risks. He has yet to make good on his promise to Abbas last month to deliver $100 million in tax and customs revenue that Israel had collected for the Palestinian Authority or to significantly relax travel restrictions for commuters within the West Bank.

Larger issues

DOJ_NMG_0116772

Saeb Erekat, a senior Palestinian official, said Abbas would ask Rice to prod Olmert to move beyond peripheral issues and start negotiating the outlines of an agreement to create a Palestinian state alongside Israel.

Rice discussed such an approach Saturday with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, who said she agreed that the talks with Abbas should "give the moderate Palestinians a political horizon," a vision of what a final settlement might look like, while providing for Israel's security.

But Olmert and Abbas are at odds over the security issue.

In their meeting, Abbas called for a cease-fire in the West Bank, extending one he and Olmert established in the Gaza Strip in late November. Abbas proposed that Israel withdraw its troops from the West Bank and entrust his Fatah movement with the task of keeping the militants on Israel's wanted list disarmed and under control.

Olmert rejected a West Bank cease-fire. But the two leaders agreed to form a joint committee to review the wanted list, allowing Palestinian officials to lobby for amnesty for some. Israel has yet to name its members to the panel.

Such a committee was set up in 2005 after the Palestinians declared a unilateral cease-fire in their conflict with Israel. The panel reviewed the status of about 500 wanted Fatah militants who had agreed to stop their attacks, but the truce broke down and the meetings stopped late that year.

Reviving the amnesty effort "is Abbas' way of recruiting militant elements against Hamas," said Shmuel Bar, a former intelligence officer who is now with Israel's Institute for Policy and Strategy. "He's saying, 'Hamas cannot get the Israelis off your backs, but I can.' "

Israel's wanted list is compiled by its intelligence agency and distributed to the army and the police. The government has not said how many names are on it.

'Quiet' militants

Palestinian officials involved in the 2005 review say many of the Fatah militants who stopped their attacks that year are still pursued in army raids and take up arms against the Israelis only to defend themselves.

The officials say these "quiet" militants who should get amnesty include Ghannam, who swears he has not fired his M-16 rifle at an Israeli in nearly four years, and Rabe Hamed, a militia commander who was wounded Jan. 4 in a bungled Israeli undercover operation to seize him in Ramallah. Hamed escaped and went into hiding, but four Palestinians were killed in the two-hour gun battle.

Abbas condemned the raid, saying it belied Olmert's promises to lower tensions in the West Bank. It was taken as a signal that the Israeli government had "more or less lost control over the army, which will make political agreements impossible to carry out," said Mouin Rabbani, a senior Middle East analyst for the International Crisis Group, a nonprofit think tank based in Brussels.

Israeli officials say they are not enthusiastic about an amnesty arrangement and doubt one would work. They say Abbas is unwilling or unable to control militants either in Hamas or his own Fatah movement who are still intent on sending suicide bombers into Israel from the West Bank.

The army says 187 militants among the thousands seized in the West Bank last year were allegedly plotting suicide attacks.

A senior army official who meets monthly in the West Bank with one of Abbas' security officials said they never act on his requests to arrest Palestinians suspected of violent activity.

"We sit together, drink, eat, and whatever he might say, I know that he's not going to do anything against the terrorists, and he knows that I know it," said the officer. "And so I continue to arrest his people every day, every night, whenever I like to."

The officer and other Israeli officials said the army made it a priority to pursue active militants, not those on old wanted lists, and was not aiming to dismantle Fatah's militia or weaken Abbas.

"We don't blame Abbas personally," said Mark Regev, an Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman, "but there are those in his Fatah structure who remain hands-on terrorist operatives. If he had the ability to discipline his entire military apparatus, if it weren't such a fragmented organization, the sort of operations we do now would be superfluous."

Kin And Rights Groups Search For Pakistan's Missing (NYT)

By Salman Masood

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0116773

RAWALPINDI, Pakistan, Jan. 9 — Amina Masood Janjua has been fighting for some word on the fate of her husband since he vanished from a bus station here in July 2005. In recent months, she and her two teenage sons and 11-year-old daughter have begun a campaign of court petitions, protests and press releases.

More than 30 families of other missing men have joined her, all seeking to locate what they and human rights groups say are hundreds of people who have disappeared into the hands of the country's feared intelligence agencies in the last few years.

The Human Rights Commission of Pakistan, an independent group, estimates that 400 citizens have been abducted and detained across the country since 2001. Amnesty International says many have been swept up in a campaign against people suspected of being extremists and terrorists. But some here also charge that the government is using the pretext of the war on terror to crack down on opponents.

In addition to some with ties to extremist groups, those missing include critics of the government, nationalists, journalists, scientists, researchers and social and political workers, the groups say. Mrs. Janjua says she has compiled a list of 115 missing persons, and says the list could grow as more families gain the courage to come out in the open.

Pakistani officials deny any involvement in extrajudicial detentions or any knowledge of the men's whereabouts.

This week a Supreme Court judge nonetheless ordered the government to speed up the process of finding 41 men listed as missing by Mrs. Janjua and her supporters after the court took up their cases in an unprecedented decision in October.

At the court hearing on Monday, the government acknowledged that it had located 25 of the 41 men listed by Mrs. Janjua, "who are now free," according to Nasir Saeed Sheikh, the deputy attorney general, though it refused to say from where they had been released.

Mrs. Janjua and others said the men were held in detention centers and safe houses of military intelligence, though most of those freed were reluctant to talk about their experiences. Mrs. Janjua maintained that only 18 persons had actually been freed.

Her husband, Masood Ahmed Janjua, 45, an educator and businessman, was not among them. Mr. Sheikh told the court that, according to a report by the Interior Ministry, all intelligence agencies had denied detaining Mr. Janjua.

Mr. Janjua left his home around 9:30 a.m. on July 30, 2005. He was heading to Peshawar in the northwest to attend a religious gathering with a friend, Faisal Fraz, 26, a mechanical engineer from the eastern city of Lahore.

Both had reservations on a 10 o'clock bus bound for Peshawar, but never made it to their destination, according to the families. "Before even reaching the bus stop, somewhere on the way, they were picked up," Mrs. Janjua says.

Relatives of missing persons and rights advocates here say Mr. Janjua and the others are among the many "forced disappearances" or "illegal detentions" that were rare before 2001. In many cases, family members have received no news of the presumed detainees for months and even years.

"Hundreds of people suspected of links to Al Qaeda or the Taliban have been arbitrarily arrested and detained," a report by Amnesty International issued in September said. "Scores have become victims of enforced disappearances; some of these have been unlawfully transferred (sometimes in return for money) to the custody of other countries, notably the U.S.A.," the report said.

"The clandestine nature of the arrest and detention of terror suspects make it impossible to ascertain exactly how many people have been subjected to arbitrary detention or enforced disappearance," it added.

I. A. Rahman, director of the Human Rights Commission of Pakistan, said the government was using the cover of a war on terrorism to flout the law. "Unstable states like Pakistan are taking full advantage of 'war on terror,' " Mr. Rahman said. He said the government was using the antiterror campaign to crack down on its opponents and critics, especially in Baluchistan, where government forces are fighting a nationalist insurrection.

"It is correct that many of those arrested or detained were connected with Al Qaeda or extremist organizations," he said. "But a number of people have been taken into custody whose only crime seems to be that they are nationalists in Baluchistan or Sindh. In Baluchistan, there is no Al Qaeda activity," he said.

In cases that are brought before a court, he noted, a government denial of detention basically closes the case on a habeas corpus petition. "It was only in the end of 2006 that the Supreme Court said the government must find out where are these people," he said.

While many of those missing persons were suspected of having links to extremist or terrorist activities or have been involved in them, many among them were innocent, the relatives maintained.

DOJ_NMG_0116774

Majid Khan, 26, a computer engineer, disappeared from of Karachi, a southern port city, four years ago and is now in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, said his wife, Rabiya Majid. "We don't why he was arrested," she said.

Mrs. Janjua, too, says she has no clue as to why her husband disappeared. The Janjua family lives in Rawalpindi, in the neighborhood of Westridge, a relatively well-off enclave inhabited mostly by active and retired military officers.

Before his disappearance, Mr. Janjua, who holds a bachelor's degree in marine engineering, was working as managing director of a private institute here, the College of Information and Technology. He was also running a travel agency and involved in charity work, his wife said.

"He had no links with any extremist organization," Mrs. Janjua said, though she acknowledged that he worked "off and on" with Tablighi Jamaat. The group characterizes itself as a nonpolitical, nonviolent movement that seeks to spread Orthodox Islam by proselytizing, but it has also come under suspicion by authorities as a potential recruiting ground for extremists.

Since her husband's disappearance, Mrs. Janjua has taken over his business and his work at the college in addition to leading the drive, with the other families, to find the missing. Together they have formed a group called Defense of Human Rights.

In the last week of December, wives, daughters and sisters of dozens of missing men, led by Mrs. Janjua, gathered in Rawalpindi, holding up posters and portraits of the missing men and shouting, "Give our loved ones back."

But their protest was quickly thwarted by the police. The photographs of the missing men were snatched. The posters were confiscated.

Mrs. Janjua's eldest son, Muhammad, 17, was beaten by the police, who removed his pants to humiliate him before they whisked him away in a police van. He was freed that evening but the next morning the image of Muhammad with his baggy trousers pulled down by the police appeared in newspapers across the country. Op-ed columnists and editorials expressed outrage at police "brutality" and sympathy for the missing people's families surged.

Some of those released, like Muhammad Tariq, 35, have returned home. He is one of the few willing to talk. Mr. Tariq acknowledges that he formerly belonged to Jaish-e-Muhammad, a banned extremist group, but says he just gave the group money and was not an active member.

Mr. Tariq, a business owner from Gujranwala in the east who sells iron pipe, was "picked up in broad daylight on June 14, 2004, by around a dozen plainclothesmen and elite police commandos," his father, Nizamud Din, said in an interview.

Mr. Din said he had been unsuccessful in locating his son through the courts, police officials and even the Senate's Standing Committee on Human Rights. "He was portrayed as a big catch — a big terrorist," Mr. Din said.

President Pervez Musharraf even alluded to the case, without mentioning Mr. Tariq by name, in his book "In the Line of Fire" in connection with a failed assassination attempt in December 2003, Mr. Din said.

General Musharraf wrote in his memoirs that a person from Gujranwala gave refuge to Abu Faraj al-Libbi, the No. 3 Qaeda leader. He was arrested in Pakistan in May 2005 and accused of organizing the failed assassination.

"It is all nonsense," Mr. Tariq said. "I have no link. I don't even know Libbi."

Mr. Tariq says he was singled out because in 2003 he briefly put up a family, introduced to him through a friend, of an Arab man who had been arrested in Quetta.

Mr. Tariq, a father of five, stammers while recounting his time in detention.

"For two years, I did not see the sky, the sun or the moon," he said. He said he was kept in a 4 foot by 7 foot cell in this city, was interrogated by Pakistani military officers, mostly about Mr. Libbi, and endured "all kinds of imaginable torture."

He was released Nov. 27 and pushed from a vehicle at night at an intersection near Islamabad. He said he had never been brought before a court. Mr. Din and Mr. Tariq said they believed the release was a result of the pressure from Mrs. Janjua's group and the Supreme Court case.

Mrs. Janjua hopes her husband will return the same way, some day soon. "At every doorbell," she said, "I think he is back."

Southeast Asians Agree To Trade Zone (NYT)

By Carlos H. Conde

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0116775

CEBU, the Philippines, Jan. 13 — The Association of Southeast Asian Nations made progress toward its goal of economic and political integration at a summit meeting here on Saturday, but it was sidetracked by tensions over how to deal with Myanmar, which has come under fire for its poor human rights record.

Leaders of the 10 members of the organization, known as Asean, agreed to establish a free-trade zone by 2015, intensify their fight against terrorism, protect the region's migrant workers and improve their campaign against H.I.V./AIDS. They also agreed to draft a new charter with broad enforcement powers — a break from the 40-year-old group's tradition of consensus and noninterference.

"We want to advance the sense of community in our shared interest to look after each other in terms of justice, economic development and common security," President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo of the Philippines said during her speech at the opening of the meeting.

Mrs. Arroyo emphasized Asean's drive to expand trade, "to create one of the world's greatest trading blocs."

But the group failed to find common ground on Myanmar, formerly Burma. On Friday, China and Russia vetoed a United States resolution in the United Nations Security Council that criticized Myanmar's persecution of opposition groups.

"How are we going to help you if you are not making progress?" Indonesia's president, Bambang Susilo Yudhoyono, told Myanmar's officials late Friday, according to [a news organization].

Nitya Pibulsonggram, Thailand's foreign minister, told reporters on Saturday that Asean should redouble its efforts "to see what we can do to help one another," to give the Myanmar issue what he called "a regional focus" rather than "have it internationalized."

Asean's new charter, which will be drafted this year, is expected to include mechanisms to monitor and enforce agreements among members, along the lines of the European Union's charter.

Two years ago, Asean formed a body called the Eminent Persons Group to create guidelines for the new charter. On Friday, it released a list of 28 recommendations, including the "strengthening of democratic values, good governance, rejection of unconstitutional and undemocratic changes of government, respect of the rule of law, including international humanitarian law, human rights and fundamental freedoms."

In a sense, the charter is a bid to remain relevant as the economic power of China and India grows, something the group itself acknowledged. "While the Asean charter will bring about a long overdue legal framework, Asean must reposition itself," it said in a statement. "It must address the growing challenges and opportunities of regional integration, the major shifts in the Asian landscape brought about by the rise of China and India, and Asia's widening links with the rest of the world." China and India are not members of Asean.

Asean leaders also signed a counterterrorism agreement that, among other things, makes it obligatory for each member country to share information about terrorist suspects and possibly allow their extradition. The accord called on members to disrupt terrorist financing and to train counterterrorism forces.

Southeast Asia is home to some of the world's deadliest terrorist groups, among them Jemaah Islamiyah, which has links to Al Qaeda, and Abu Sayyaf, a group in the southern Philippines.

Asean's members are Brunei, Cambodia, Indonesia, Laos, Malaysia, Myanmar, the Philippines, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam.

Chirac's Party Chooses Nominee Amid Intrigue (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

PARIS -- When Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy is nominated Sunday as the uncontested presidential candidate for the center-right Popular Movement party of President Jacques Chirac, it should be a moment of personal and political triumph, capping Sarkozy's four-year campaign for France's highest office.

But bitter rivalries within the ruling Popular Movement party, or UMP, have left Sarkozy wounded and weakened, political analysts and party insiders say. Even though he is the only person on the party's internal primary ballot, he has not won the endorsement of its heaviest hitters, including Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin, National Assembly President Jean-Louis Debr?, Defense Minister Mich?le Alliot-Marie or Chirac.

DOJ_NMG_0116776

Villepin said last week that he would not even vote for Sarkozy in the primary because he is holding out hope that Chirac will decide at the last minute to run for a third term. When Villepin addressed a meeting of his party's lawmakers after making his comments, he drew a chorus of boos, catcalls and heckling.

"There's so much hatred," said Nicole Bacharan, an analyst at the Institute of Political Studies in Paris. "This should be Sarkozy's moment, but it's not happening for him because his party is split, and he's not getting the momentum from his family that he should."

In fact, some in Sarkozy's camp fear that Chirac could secretly work to sabotage Sarkozy's campaign.

"It's not paranoia -- it's a real possibility," a senior Sarkozy aide said on condition of anonymity. "At the end of the day, we believe Chirac will join Sarkozy. But only at the end of the day. It's a complex relationship. There's a lot of love and hate, admiration and despair."

In the meantime, the aide said, Sarkozy is breaking with tradition and refusing to leave the cabinet while running for president "because the ministry offers a kind of protection for him," leaving him less vulnerable to attack from people inside the government.

Sarkozy, a self-styled reformer who wants to modernize France and reverse its sense of national decline, has broad and enthusiastic support among the party's rank and file, his aides say, and the backing of more than 80 percent of the UMP's 499 lawmakers in the National Assembly and Senate. By late last week, about 60 percent of the party's 340,000 registered members had voted in the primary, most over the Internet. Results will be announced at the party's convention Sunday.

According to recent polls, Sarkozy is in a dead heat with the Socialist Party's nominee, S?gol?ne Royal, 53, in France's two-stage presidential contest. Surveys show that in the first round of voting April 22, which will probably include at least a dozen candidates, Sarkozy and Royal are expected to lead the pack with about a third of the vote each. If both advance to the two-person runoff May 6, polls show each garnering about 50 percent.

After her own tough primary, Royal managed to unify the party around her, at least publicly. But continuing division in the UMP is starting to threaten Sarkozy's candidacy, party insiders say.

The party faithful are saying, "Why on earth can't you stop your division and act in the interest of France?" said UMP Sen. Jo?lle Garriaud-Maylam. "They are really upset and say that if you keep on like this, we're going to abstain."

Political analysts say the heart of the problem dates to 1995, when Sarkozy, who had been considered a Chirac protege and heir apparent, abandoned his mentor and supported a party rival, ?douard Balladur, for president. Chirac won and reportedly never forgave Sarkozy. Today, Villepin, whom Chirac appointed prime minister in May 2005, is widely considered Chirac's favorite to succeed him.

But Villepin, a debonair former diplomat who has never been elected to public office, imploded as prime minister, buffeted first by minority youth rioting outside Paris shortly after he took office, followed five months later by the worst student and labor strike in decades, called to protest an employment bill the prime minister had proposed. His approval rating tanked, killing his presidential hopes.

Chirac's popularity also plummeted. In a poll last week, 81 percent said they did not want the president to stand for reelection.

Nonetheless, Chirac has refused to rule out running for a third term, and Villepin also has kept his options open; under French election law, both men have until March 16 to declare their intentions. Chirac has indicated that he is afraid of becoming a lame duck if he announces a decision not to run too soon, but many analysts believe he wants to leave Sarkozy on tenterhooks.

"At the end, the president will support Sarkozy, but only at the last minute," said Dominique Moisi, a political analyst. "He wants Sarkozy to owe him his victory."

Much of Sarkozy's popularity rests on his opposition to the old statist, Gaullist France that Chirac stands for. In a clear swipe at Chirac, who has overseen an era of deep national despondency, Sarkozy has called for a less imperial presidency and a "rupture" with the past.

DOJ_NMG_0116777

"The 'rupture' is a fresh way of doing things, new methods and new ideas," a senior Sarkozy aide said. "Sarkozy says to France that we cannot afford to continue doing things the same way. We are declining."

Aides say Sarkozy supports affirmative action-style programs to help minorities, favors free market reforms and globalization, wants to improve relations with the United States and believes that France should reduce the number of civil servants and cut its bureaucracy.

"The UMP is getting more and more conservative with Sarkozy, and I think that with him, we'll only get right-wing votes," said Jean-Pierre Grance, a UMP National Assembly deputy from southern France who refused to vote for Sarkozy in the primary, hoping Chirac will throw his hat into the ring.

Political analysts say Sarkozy is also suffering from a fear factor. Some people say they are afraid of him, citing his alleged divisiveness and authoritarianism, and the image of him as the nation's top cop who referred to rioting youths outside Paris in the fall of 2005 as "scum," which some critics say fueled the violence.

"There's something in him that's not reassuring people, and there's something in the people around him that really scares people," said Moisi, the analyst. "He's conquered the party, but he is not conquering the hearts of a sufficient majority of the French people."

"There's a difference between image and reality," a Sarkozy aide responded. "He knows he has an image as a scary guy, and he knows he needs to change it, because it doesn't fit with his nature. He's much more lenient and open than people think."

But the aide said Sarkozy's time as interior minister has had its advantages, too, boosting his image as a serious politician at the forefront of two of the country's biggest issues -- security and immigration. In a poll published Friday in Le Parisien newspaper, 80 percent of those surveyed thought the term "courageous" applied to Sarkozy, 68 percent found him "competent" and 57 percent said he would be "able to reform the country."

Sarkozy To Get Party Nomination At Paris Congress (AFP)

AFP, January 14, 2007

French presidential hopeful Nicolas Sarkozy is set to be nominated as an official candidate by the ruling Union for a Popular Movement (UMP), at a party congress that is intended as a triumphant launch-pad for his election campaign.

Some 50,000 supporters of the interior minister and UMP boss have come to Paris on special train and coach services for a day of fanfare and speeches at an exhibition centre on the capital's ring-road.

Early in the afternoon results will be read out of an internal party ballot to designate a candidate in April's presidential election but there is no doubt about the result because Sarkozy was the only contender. He will then deliver a keynote address to the nation.

Polls show that Sarkozy, 51, a hard-hitting rightwinger who promises a "clean break" from France's past, is the only politician who can prevent Socialist favourite Segolene Royal, 53, from becoming the country's first ever woman president.

However his progress has been hampered by bitter feuding inside his own camp, with President Jacques Chirac and Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin openly keeping alive the chance of an alternative right-wing candidate -- with Chirac possibly seeking a third term.

Sarkozy supporters are hopeful that a corner has been turned in recent days with endorsements from several politicians normally seen as Chirac loyalists. These include former prime minister Alain Juppe, who praised Sarkozy's "capacity for action".

The candidate plans to move swiftly after Sunday's act of consecration from the party, moving straight away into campaign headquarters in central Paris and leaving for Normandy on the first of regular twice-weekly speaking engagements in the provinces.

The first round of France's presidential election takes place on Sunday April 22, with a second round two weeks later between the two front-runners if -- as is almost certain -- no candidate gets an overall majority.

The latest opinion poll, to be published on Sunday in the weekly newspaper Journal du Dimanche, shows that 75 percent of French people think Sarkozy could attract the support of voters from across the entire right-wing spectrum, not just from his UMP, in a second-round election run-off.

DOJ_NMG_0116778

But this is tempered by public concerns about the ambitious, populist interior minister. Fifty-one percent of those questioned in the poll said he "worried" them.

Spanish Prime Minister Takes Political Heat After Airport Attack By Basque Group (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

MADRID, Jan. 12 — At his year-end news conference on Dec. 29, Prime Minister José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero proclaimed that the peace initiative he had started with the Basque separatist movement ETA months before was making progress.

"Are we better off now with a permanent cease-fire, or when we had bombs, car bombs and explosions?" he asked. "This time next year, we will be better off than we are today."

The next morning, a bomb ETA had planted in a Renault van exploded in the five-story parking garage of Madrid's new air terminal, killing two people and causing tens of millions of dollars of damage to Spain's glittery showpiece of modernity.

Instead of bringing the political establishment of Spain together, the attack ripped it apart. It has left Mr. Zapatero more isolated than at any time in his nearly three years in power and sent the country's politicians into a frenzy of finger-pointing and backbiting.

"We don't have a long tradition of democracy, and we're not used to dialogue," said Begoña Lasagabaster, a parliamentary deputy from the tiny Basque nationalist party Eusko Alkartasuna. "Instead, we say to each other: 'I'm right. You're not.' If your enemy is a terrorist organization and you can make your political opponent appear to be close to your enemy, you can gain politically."

Since the attack, the opposition Popular Party has stepped up its criticism of Mr. Zapatero and the dialogue he initiated with ETA, which is listed as a terrorist group by the European Union and the United States, after its announcement of a "permanent cease-fire" last March.

"The government and the prime minister made a mistake in the strategy of their negotiation," Ana Pastor, a senior Popular Party official, said in an interview. "They've got to correct that mistake. They believed in people who kept their pistols nearby."

Interior Minister Alfredo Pérez Rubalcaba called such criticism "politically perverse." He pointed out that the Socialists consistently supported the antiterrorism policies of the Popular Party when it was in power, even after ETA broke an earlier truce. "It never occurred to us to criticize," he said in an interview.

But Mr. Zapatero, who had staked his political reputation on a risky strategy of luring ETA into talks in an attempt to end four decades of separatist violence, has hurt his position by appearing oddly detached since the bombing.

Spain, said Mariano Rajoy, the president of the Popular Party, "is a ship drifting without a rudder."

Although Mr. Zapatero cut short his family vacation and headed back to Madrid immediately after the bombing, it took him five days to visit the vast bomb site. Mr. Rajoy, who lost to Mr. Zapatero in the 2004 election and may run again next year, was there two days earlier.

Even after the bombing, Mr. Zapatero seemed reluctant to end talks with ETA. In his first public statement to the nation on the night of the bombing, he ordered only a "suspension."

The straight-talking Mr. Rubalcaba changed course three days later, saying that the dialogue had been "broken off, liquidated, finished."

After a closed-door meeting with Mr. Zapatero early this week, Mr. Rajoy called a news conference at party headquarters in which he accused Mr. Zapatero of withholding from him information about the bomb attack and failing to lay out a strategy for combating terrorism in the future.

At the same time, Mr. Zapatero's deputy prime minister, María Teresa Fernández de la Vega, held her own news conference in which she accused Mr. Rajoy of turning "a deaf ear" to working with the government in forging a common antiterrorism strategy.

The local Spanish-language CNN channel flipped back and forth between the news conferences, underscoring the political rivalry.

DOJ_NMG_0116779

At a meeting of regional presidents on Friday, Mr. Zapatero made an unfortunate verbal slip, at first referring to the terrorist attack as a "tragic accident," then immediately correcting himself and calling it a "tragic attack."

The opposition Popular Party jumped on him again. Pedro Sanz, the Popular Party president of Rioja, criticized Mr. Zapatero for not apologizing. Manuel Chaves, the Socialist president of Andalucía, shot back that the criticism was "indecent."

The bickering has even filtered down to planning for demonstrations on Saturday called by Spain's large Ecuadorean community and the country's labor unions to mourn the two Ecuadoreans who died in the bombing.

Endless negotiations have occurred throughout the week with the Popular Party, which said it would not participate because it objected to the demonstration's banner, "For Peace and Against Terrorism." The banner also should have called for the defeat of ETA, party officials said.

Ultimately, the Popular Party chose not to take part, the first time a major party has avoided an anti-ETA demonstration since democracy returned to Spain in the 1970s.

[Otherwise, the demonstrations went smoothly, with hundreds of thousands of people marching in Madrid, Bilbao and other cities, mostly in silence and carrying signs with slogans including "For peace — against terrorism," "We are all victims of ETA" and "Peace is the task of all of us."

[But the absence of the Popular Party prompted other slogans as well, including "Absences help ETA" and "Where is Gallardón?" — a reference to the Popular Party mayor of Madrid, Alberto Ruiz Gallardón.]

"The dead are being used for political purposes," said Joffre Pinzón, who is responsible for social affairs for an Ecuadorean citizens' group. "We're talking about the pain that comes from the death of two of our countrymen. How can you have a country with such a high economic level that is so politically immature?"

Some government officials and politicians also find the political bickering unseemly. There are still suspicions that that the center-right party is seeking revenge for its electoral loss in March 2004 by undermining the current government's ability to rule and trying to position itself for national elections in 14 months.

The 2004 election occurred only three days after train bombings by Islamic terrorists in Madrid killed 191 people. At the time, Popular Party leaders said the party was the victim of circumstances, that the Socialist government was illegitimate and that the election was a triumph for terrorists.

"Some people since March 2004 have been using terrorism as a political weapon and that is very dangerous," said Judge Baltasar Garzón, the country's most prominent investigative magistrate, in an interview. "Some people unfortunately want terrorism to be the main plank in election politics. Instead of being united against the terrorists, it gets us fighting among ourselves. It gets us playing the terrorists' game."

Mr. Zapatero is not alone among Spanish leaders in not anticipating an imminent terrorist attack. On March 10, 2004, the departing prime minister, José María Aznar of the Popular Party, boasted in an interview that Spain had enjoyed eight years of "spectacular economic growth" under his leadership and that terrorism "is a lot weaker than it was" when he took office.

The next day, terrorists set off bombs on commuter trains in Madrid, the most deadly terrorist attack in Spain's modern history.

Climate Trumps Terror In Europe (WT)

By Gareth Harding, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 14, 2007

BRUSSELS -- A European Commission proposal to slash greenhouse-gas emissions by the end of the next decade has highlighted a growing trans-Atlantic split over global warming that is further stressed by a recent poll that shows Europeans are more concerned about climate change than terrorism.

In a major package of measures aimed at combatting global warming last week, the European Union's executive arm urged the bloc's 27 member states to unilaterally cut emissions of greenhouse gases, such as carbon dioxide, by one-fifth by 2020 compared with 1990 figures.

It also called on the United States -- which has rejected mandatory curbs on emissions -- and developing countries such as China and India to join it in signing up to a 30 percent reduction in greenhouse gases by the same date.

DOJ_NMG_0116780

"Europe must lead the world into a new -- or maybe, one should say, post-industrial -- revolution: the development of a low-carbon economy," Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso said while announcing the plan in Brussels on Wednesday.

"We have already left behind our coal-based industrial past. It is time to embrace our low-carbon future," he said.

The European Union is currently committed to cutting a basket of six greenhouse gases by 8 percent by 2010, compared with 1990 figures. However, recent data from the European Environment Agency shows this target is unlikely to be reached without additional measures.

The commission says its new goal can be reached if member states improve energy efficiency, accept competition between national energy suppliers, agree to produce 20 percent of their energy from renewable sources such as wind and solar power by 2020 and ensure that 10 percent of gasoline consumed is made from biofuels by the same date.

The commission's plan, which was slammed as "unambitious" by green groups and members of the European Parliament, underlines the radically different approaches to tackling climate change in Europe and the United States.

A poll released by the France 24 TV channel on Jan. 5 showed global warming to be a greater planetary challenge than terrorism in four of the five European countries where the survey was conducted.

In France, for example, 54 percent said the greatest challenge to the planet was global warming, compared with 26 percent who cited terrorism. By contrast, 49 percent of Americans cited terrorism as the biggest threat, while 30 percent mentioned climate change.

Simon Tilford, an analyst at the London-based think tank Center for European Reform, said Americans and Europeans differed over climate change because "in Europe, global warming is accepted as a fact, whereas for a lot of people in the United States, the jury is still out."

However, Mr. Tilford said, attitudes toward global warming were changing in the United States and "whoever wins the next presidential election will take a very different line to the current administration."

In similar polls, such as the German Marshall Fund's annual Trans-Atlantic Trends survey, terrorism has been the No. 1 concern of both Europeans and Americans since the September 11, 2001, attacks in the United States. But global warming has shot to the top of the political agenda in recent months owing in part to former Vice President Al Gore's film "An Inconvenient Truth," stern warnings from scientific advisory bodies and hard-to-ignore evidence that climate change is already happening.

The 10 hottest years since recordkeeping began in Europe have occurred in the past 11 years and the commission's report paints a grim picture of a continent battered by floods in the north and drought in the south if temperatures rise by 3 percent, as some scientists predict.

Nathalie Labalme, an analyst at the Paris office of the German Marshall Fund of the United States, said concern about terrorism was less on the "old Continent" because Europeans have lived with it longer than Americans.

"Because of that, Europeans believe you cannot win the war on terrorism, you can only contain it."

However, the France 24 poll, which was conducted in early December among 12,570 persons in France, Spain, Italy, Germany, Britain and the United States, revealed that Europeans are more worried about the challenge of religious fanaticism than Americans. In Italy, Spain and Germany, it was cited as the No. 1 threat to the planet.

200 Die In Darfur During Week Of Intertribal Battles (WP/AP)

By Mohamed Osman

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

KHARTOUM, Sudan, Jan. 13 -- More than 200 people have died in clashes between ethnic African farmers and nomadic Arabs in South Darfur in the past week, leading the Sudanese government to send emissaries to try to reconcile the tribes involved, officials said Saturday.

The fighting was the latest outburst in a nearly four-year-long conflict that has caused as many as 450,000 deaths and chased 2.5 million people from their homes in Sudan's vast Darfur region, where nomadic tribes and farming communities have long wrangled over access to scarce water.

DOJ_NMG_0116781

The war began when ethnic African rebels took up arms against the Arab-dominated government in February 2003, charging it with neglect. The government is accused of responding by unleashing an Arab militia known as the Janjaweed that has been blamed for the worst atrocities in the conflict. The Sudanese government rejects the allegations.

The latest fighting involved Habania Arab nomads and Falata ethnic African farmers, Justice Minister Mohammed Ali al-Mardhi told the independent newspaper Al-Rai Al-Aam. He said that more than 200 people had been killed over the past week, mainly nomads, and that the government had sent reconciliation missions to try to end the fighting.

"The situation between the two sides remains flammable," he said.

Witnesses who spoke on condition of anonymity for fear of reprisals said the clashes began a week ago in an area south of Nyala when Habania nomads killed nine Falata tribesmen they accused of stealing cows. Habania fighters later attacked a Falata settlement but suffered heavy casualties, the witnesses said.

Sudanese Interior Minister Zubair Bashir Taha appealed to tribal leaders to stop the killing and "resort to the voice of wisdom," the state-run SUNA news agency said.

The government's casualty estimate could not be independently verified because the government has barred foreign journalists from Darfur for months.

The African Union peacekeeping mission deployed in Darfur said it had not investigated the violence. "But we encourage reconciliation missions to avoid this kind of fighting over resources," A.U. spokesman Noureddine Mezni said.

He said the African Union was also aware of separate clashes between other tribes of nomads and farmers that killed 42 people elsewhere in Darfur earlier in the week, according to Sudanese media.

About 7,000 A.U. peacekeepers have struggled to maintain a cease-fire in Darfur since the government and one of the rebel groups signed a peace agreement in May. Khartoum has opposed a U.N. Security Council effort to take over command of the peacekeeping force and bring in 20,000 U.N. soldiers and police officers.

Brazil Gambles On Monitoring Of Amazon Loggers (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

REALIDADE, Brazil — A Brazilian government plan set to go into effect this year will bring large-scale logging deep into the heart of the Amazon rain forest for the first time, in a calculated gamble that new monitoring efforts can offset any danger of increased devastation.

The government of President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, in an attempt to create Brazil's first coherent, effective forest policy, is to begin auctioning off timber rights to large tracts of the rain forest. The winning bidders will not have title to the land or the right to exploit resources other than timber, and the government says they will be closely monitored and will pay a royalty on their activities.

The architects of the plan say it will also help reduce tensions over land ownership in the Amazon, the world's largest tropical forest, which loses an area the size of New Jersey every year to clear-cutting and timbering.

In theory, 70 percent of the jungle is public land, but miners, ranchers and especially loggers have felt free to establish themselves in unpoliced areas, strip the land of valuable resources and then move on, mostly in the so-called arc of destruction on the eastern and southern fringes of the jungle.

But the called-for monitoring of the loggers allowed into the rain forest's largely untouched center will come from a new, untested Forest Service with only 150 employees and from state and municipal governments. That concerns environmental and civic groups because local officials are more vulnerable to the pressures of powerful economic interests and to corruption.

Further, the new system assumes that the world community will also play a part and buy timber only from merchants who are properly licensed and will avoid unscrupulous dealers.

The plan "can be a good idea in places where the situation is already chaotic," said Philip Fearnside, a researcher at the National Institute for Amazon Research in Manaus who recently visited this remote area. "But it's a different story in areas where hardly any logging or deforestation has taken place, where you are actually going to be encouraging the introduction of predatory forces that don't exist there now."

DOJ_NMG_0116782

On paper and in principle, said Stephan Schwartzman, an Amazon specialist at Environmental Defense in Washington, "I think everyone agrees that this system is an improvement over the current situation, which is totally out of control."

But in the end, he added, "everything is going to depend on how it is done and whether the financial and human resources are there to make it work."

Here in this small settlement called Reality, along the rutted Highway BR-319, those resources do not yet exist, as residents have discovered. When outsiders recently appeared to fish out of season, wiping out protected species and killing three manatees, the peasants here went to the authorities looking for help, only to be turned away.

"They told us that we had to be the monitors ourselves, but we don't have the ability to do that," said Antonio Marfoni, a settler. "There's no working phone here, and we don't have the money or the time to be able to take the bus into town to denounce violations."

Last October, during the final debate of the presidential campaign, the opposition candidate, Geraldo Alckmin, called the plan "irresponsible," accused Mr. da Silva of wanting to "privatize the Amazon" and added, "If today there is no supervision, imagine what will happen if you hand it over to the private sector."

Though the environmental movement was one of the founding constituencies of Mr. da Silva's Workers' Party, he made it clear after being re-elected to another four year term that his main goal was to get the Brazilian economy growing at 5 percent a year.

In November, he complained of "all the obstacles I have with the environment" and with "the Indian question," which he said were hindering Brazil's development.

But the proposal's supporters dismiss criticisms as unfounded. Jorge Viana, who is a member of Mr. da Silva's party and was governor of the Amazon state of Acre until Jan. 1, contends that "this is one of the most important initiatives that Brazil has ever adopted in the Amazon precisely because you are bringing the forest under state control, not privatizing it."

"This is a battle Brazil has to win," he added. "There's only one way to save the forest, and that is by using it, responsibly and rationally."

Claudio Langone, executive secretary of the Environment Ministry, said in a telephone interview from Brasília: "Brazil today is losing money due to the illegal exploitation of timber. With this new dynamic of management, legal deforestation and sustainable development, we want to create barriers to predatory advancement and increase the value of the forest."

But some here fear that increased value will bring with it the kind of violence that has struck other more-developed areas of the Amazon.

Ivonete Aparecida Paes, a Roman Catholic nun who is the coordinator of the church's Justice and Peace Commission in this area, said, "Since none of the settlers already here have titles to their tracts, that creates the possibility of greater conflicts over land ownership."

After much debate, it was decided that the leases would run for 30 years. But Paulo Adario, director of Greenpeace's Amazon campaign, said that "some species need 45 years or more to regenerate," and that loggers might thus lack an economic incentive to care properly for a tract that would no longer be theirs when the trees they replaced reached harvestable size.

Already, there are signs of logging interests establishing themselves here. A sawmill opened just down the highway in mid-2005 and was operating at full capacity during a recent visit. Along the highway itself, there is now a clearing in which logs are piled haphazardly, like giant sticks.

"No one has the authorization to cut so much wood, even with a forest management plan," said Leila Mattos, the director of Pacto Amazônico, an environmental group based in Humaitá, the closest town of any size. "I came by here at the beginning of November, and none of this was here. This is more than a year's worth of timber."

In addition, peasant settlers unable to obtain land of their own in Rondonia, a state south of here, have also begun moving up the highway and flocking to the area. Theirs is a pre-emptive action, aimed at establishing themselves on land that may go to logging companies later and thus forcing the government to give them other homesteads in return.

During an interview in Humaitá, Francisco Araujo, the director of the regional office of the governmental environmental agency, said that no matter who ended up in charge of supervising the timber extraction plan, the task would be hard. He complained of a shortage of gasoline and personnel and a lack of police protection for his agents.

DOJ_NMG_0116783

"In reality, these conservation areas were created without very precise field studies," Mr. Araujo said. "Only now are the technicians looking at the problems in the area. The infrastructure is very precarious. There is no equipment or physical base from which to operate, just a shack in which to stay, without a telephone."

In the absence of the needed resources, he said, government policy envisions "a new partnership with society." But those who work most closely with the peasant settlers who are being asked to bear that burden remain skeptical.

"To think that they can monitor violations in the absence of the state is a dream," Sister Paes said. "The Amazon has no tradition of the poor standing up to the powerful. People simply don't know how to do that."

Don't Ban Your Instincts, Ban Ki-moon (WP)

By John R. Bolton

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

Ban Ki-moon, the new U.N. secretary general, has done some unusual things to kick off his tenure. At the recent annual dinner of the U.N. Correspondents Association in New York, for instance, he entertained the guests briefly by singing, to the tune originally written for Santa Claus, his own arrangement: "Ban Ki-moon is coming to town."

On Tuesday, Ban is coming to this town, his first visit since assuming office on Jan. 1. The former South Korean foreign minister has already made it clear that he intends to be a different kind of "SG" from his predecessor. The United States backed Ban for his new post, largely with such a change in mind. Nonetheless, his first few days in office have already raised some questions. The struggle is underway to determine what sort of leader Ban will be: Will the status quo of the U.N. system overwhelm him, or will he follow his instincts and those of his supporters, including Washington?

Consider the following issues:

First, responding to Iraq's recent execution of Saddam Hussein, Ban said that the decision of whether to invoke the death penalty is a matter for each U.N. member state to decide for itself. This provoked howls of outrage from the international high-minded, who over the past decade had successfully encouraged U.N. resolutions opposing the death penalty from the U.N. Human Rights Commission (a body that eventually was abolished because it had only an incidental relationship with human rights). "The U.N. is against the death penalty!" the high-minded complained, arguing that Ban's comments amounted to a retreat from Kofi Annan's public outspokenness for the so-called U.N. position. Shaken by this barrage, Ban partly backed down later, urging the Iraqi government to stay the execution of the two men sentenced to death along with Hussein.

But his first instinct was the right one. The real controversy here is not about the death penalty, but more fundamentally about the proper role of the United Nations itself, and especially of the secretary general. The United Nations as an institution cannot have a legitimate position on a domestic issue such as the death penalty when there is such fundamental disagreement among its sovereign members -- and especially where democratically legitimate governments have different views. To say that the secretary general must mouth the position adopted by a majority of countries in some U.N. body, whether legitimately or not, is a prescription for endless trouble. Were earlier secretaries supposed to declare routinely that "Zionism is a form of racism," as the General Assembly solemnly and overwhelmingly decided in 1975?

According to the U.N. Charter, the secretary general is the institution's "chief administrative officer" -- not its chief moralizer. Those who complain that Ban's comment forfeited the role that Annan so ardently played should understand instead that Annan's proclivities were not ultimately helpful to the world body. If he had spent less time moralizing and more time doing his day job, the United Nations may have been spared the oil-for-food scandal, procurement fraud and widespread sexual exploitation and abuse by its peacekeepers.

Even more problematic than the death penalty debate was another matter Ban raised during his first week on the job. In an interview, he argued that "if the issues with the conflicts between Israel and Palestine go well," other issues, such as Iran and Lebanon, "are likely to follow suit." This position is unquestionably the received wisdom in Turtle Bay, and also reflects the view of Ban's predecessor.

It is unclear whether Ban was articulating his personal view or was merely following the talking points provided by the U.N. secretariat. The idea that Hezbollah's efforts to destabilize and overthrow the democratically elected government of Lebanon might be curtailed or eliminated by progress on the Israeli-Palestinian front is hard to take seriously. Similarly, believing that peace and stability would emerge in Iraq if only those troublesome Israelis could be brought into line is more a matter of faith than of logic.

DOJ_NMG_0116784

Ban's reliance on this favorite U.N. clich?, however, is more than simply a lapse in judgment; it may well reveal his intentions for future involvement in the Middle East, an involvement embodied in the "Quartet," an ungainly occasional gathering of the United States, Russia, the European Union and the secretary general. U.S. policymakers should start working overtime now to correct the misimpression that Ban may have obtained from his briefers. In the even worse case that Ban's comment reflects his own views, the need for corrective action is even more acute.

Much to his credit, Ban has already made history early in his tenure. He announced last week that he will make public his financial disclosure report, the first U.N. secretary general ever to do so -- and something that Annan repeatedly refused to do. Ban has stressed that he wants to restore trust and confidence in the United Nations, which it sorely needs. And although much more must follow to even approximate the recommendations of the Volcker Commission in the wake of the oil-for-food scandal, Ban's disclosure will be a good first step.

Accountability begins with transparency, and within the U.N. system, the secretary general is especially well-placed to lead by example. That Ban's decision was even newsworthy underscores how much work still remains, and how easy it was to start. As a longtime civil servant in South Korea, Ban is likely to offer a short and boring financial report, as one may have also expected from Annan, a longtime U.N. civil servant. In fact, Annan could go a long way toward regaining trust and confidence even now by disclosing his U.N.-era finances.

Finally, Ban also made the courageous decision to call for the resignations of all senior secretariat officials, about 60 altogether, except those chosen with the concurrence of other U.N. bodies. This was a change that Washington had urged, one that can make clear that high-level U.N. jobs are not entitlements, either for the individuals involved or their countries of origin. Because this sort of transitional "cleaning house" is unfamiliar to the U.N. system, U.S. advocacy of the concept raised questions, and Ban's decision to implement it will undoubtedly raise more.

Ban need not accept all of the resignations, although he should accept the vast majority, for the same salutary reason why incoming U.S. administrations bring in new people at the top levels of government. The key is to shake up the secretariat's entrenched baronies, and to let them know that new management is in charge. Although it may not be noteworthy to Americans, Ban's decision on resignations was striking within the United Nations. On the hiring side, he has not made enough appointments to judge whether he is assembling a team with the right stuff -- this obviously warrants close U.S. attention.

No one of these four incidents, nor all of them together, tell the complete story of Ban Ki-moon. Where he has followed his instincts -- deferring to member governments, supporting U.N. reform and demonstrating personal integrity -- he has done well. When he has followed the conventional wisdom inside the U.N. bubble on First Avenue in New York -- on matters of U.N. theology such as the death penalty and the Middle East -- he has not. In Washington this week, the president and others will again have the chance to take his measure.

Based on what we have seen so far, I hope they encourage him to let Ban be Ban.

John R. Bolton, a senior fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, served as U.S. permanent representative to the United Nations from August 2005 to December 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0116785

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, JANUARY 14, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Military Is Expanding Its Intelligence Role In U.S. (NYT)..... 2
Officials: Pentagon Probed Finances (WP) 5
Pentagon, CIA Check U.S. Suspects' Bank Records (AP) 6
Pentagon Conducting Probes In U.S. (LAT)..... 6
Deletions In Army Manual Raise Wiretapping Concerns (NYT).... 7
Views On Detainee Representation Draw Fire (WP/AP)..... 8
The Imperial Presidency (WP)..... 9
Attack On U.S. Embassy Revives Greek Fear Of Terrorism (NYT) 10
Tunisia Says Suspects In Gun Battle Had Blueprints Of Embassies (NYT)..... 11

Homeland Response:

Stockpiling Waste (WP) 12
Incendiary (WP) 13

War News:

Opposition To Iraq Plan Leaves Bush Isolated (WP) 14
An Uphill Push For Public Opinion On Iraq (NYT)..... 15
Democrats Feel Free To Defy Bush On Iraq (LAT)..... 16
Choices Dwindle If Iraq War Plan Fails (AP) 18
Bush Stands By Iraq Invasion (LAT)..... 19
A GOP Lawmaker Grapples With Troop Escalation (WP) 20
'Surge' Plan Put At Risk By Politics, General Says (WT) 21
Maliki Aides Warm Slowly To Bush's Latest Iraq Policy (NYT/AP)..... 22
Among Troops And Families, Mixed Reaction To American Expansion In Iraq (NYT) 23
The Goal: Admitting Failure, Without Being A Failure (NYT) 24
Picking Up The Pieces (NYT) 25
Congressional Pushback (WP)..... 27
Bush's Idle Threat (LAT) 27
He's In The Bunker Now (NYT) 28
Stumbling Around The World (NYT)..... 30
In Baghdad, A Test Of The Petraeus Principles (WP)..... 30
Bush's Hail-Mary Pass (WP)..... 31
The Big Gambit In Iraq (WP)..... 32
Trapped By Hubris, Again (WP)..... 33
The Best We Can Hope For (NYT)..... 35
We're Fighting Not To Lose (WP)..... 36
A Skeptic's Case For The Surge (WP) 38
The Mess We Left Behind (WP) 39
UN-weary, US Opts For Unilateral Moves Against Iran (AFP).... 40
Rice: U.S. Aims To Curb Iran Aggression (AP) 41
Rice Says U.S. Will Defend Its Interest In The Persian Gulf (MCT)..... 42
Detained Iranians Had Ties To Extremists (WT/AP) 42
Iran Demands Release Of Citizens (BBC)..... 43
Gunboat Diplomacy: The Watch On The Gulf (NYT) 44
Admiral's Diplomatic Skills Could Prove Crucial (WP)..... 44
On Iraq, U.S. Turns To Onetime Dissenters (WP) 45
US Military May Join Iraq Against Militia Leaders (BOS) 49
U.S. And Iraqi Forces In The Western Desert Look Toward The Horizon (LAT)..... 50
Kurdish Brigade Trains To Deploy In Baghdad (AP)..... 51
Plan Would Add Kurds To Civil War Mix (LAT) 52
War Costs Are Hitting Historic Proportions (LAT)..... 54
Clinton Expresses Doubt That Iraqis Will Keep Promises (AP) .. 55
Iraq's Talabani To Visit Damascus (BBC)..... 56
Losing Iraq, One Truckload At A Time (NYT)..... 56
Afghan Rebel Chief Sends Fighters To Their Deaths (NYT/AP). 58
Clinton Meets With Karzai, U.S. Troops (WP/AP)..... 58
Military Slams Bureaucrats Over Afghanistan (WT)..... 59

Corporate Scandals:

Backlash Against Hardball Tactics (CHIT)..... 59

Criminal Law:

Attorney General Agrees To Take Duke Case (NYT) 61
At State Level, Official Promises Careful Review Of Duke Case (WP)..... 62
2 Officers Suspended; Report Was Not Fully Reviewed (NYT) .. 62
'GANGLAND' G-MAN SENT RAT INTO TRAP (NYPOST)..... 63
Probe Has Long, Sharp Edge (SPREP)..... 63
Even At 96, Alleged Mobster Is Not Beyond Reach Of Law (LAT) 65

Civil Rights:

The End Of An Era For Marion County Schools (OCALASB)..... 66
Reports: Reviews Rarely Find Fault With Police Use Of Force (AP)..... 68
Cleveland Police Always Justify Using Force (CLPD)..... 68
'Shots Fired' (COLDISP)..... 69
Revival Of Akaka Bill Planned (HSB)..... 71

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
DEA Reportedly Wants 3 New Offices Along Border (SAEN)..... 72
Once Its Star, Agent Assails ATF (AZREP)..... 73

Immigration:
Christian Groups Torn Over Illegals (WT) 76

Congress-Administration:
Newly In The Minority, G.O.P. Shows Signs Of Division On Iraq And Domestic Policies (NYT) 77
House GOP Shows Its Fractiousness In The Minority (WP)..... 78
Conservatives See Validation In Fight Over "Pork" (WT)..... 80
A Discordant Chorus Questions Visions For A Bush Library At Southern Methodist (NYT)..... 80
The House That Jack Built (NYT)..... 82
The American Way Of Equality (NYT)..... 83
A Living Wage We Can Live With (LAT)..... 84

Other News:
Bush's Proposal For Iraq Adds To '08 Intrigue (NYT) 85
Defiant McCain Back As Maverick (CHIT)..... 87
Bush's Legacy Vs. The 2008 Election (NYT)..... 88
"Bad Behavior"? (NOVAK)..... 90
Obama's Charm Lost On America's Black Activists (LONT)..... 91
Romney Retreats On Gun Control (BOS) 92
Tancredo In Iowa To Test '08 Bid (DENP) 93
Left Out In '08 (LAT)..... 94
A Preview Of Arnold's Second Act (LAT) 95
Gov. Attuned To Waning Of Party Loyalty (LAT)..... 96
Gov. Riley Says No To VP Talk (AP)..... 97
McCain-Clinton '08? Obama-Hagel? That's The Ticket (WP)..... 98
Nothing Perks Up A President Like Death (LAT)..... 99
Rice Backs Mideast Moderates, But Offers No Plan (NYT) 101
Rice Begins Push In The Middle East (WP) 102
Rice Aims To Restart Mideast Peace Bid (AP) 103
Rice Set For Key Mid-East Meeting (BBC)..... 104
Iranian President Visits Venezuela To Strengthen Ties (NYT).. 104
Iran And Venezuela Plan Anti-U.S. Fund (AP) 106
Presidents Of Iran, Venezuela Plan $2-billion Project Fund (LAT)107
Iran And Venezuela Back Oil Cuts (BBC)..... 107
Argentina Pursues Iran In '94 Blast As Neighbors Court Ahmadinejad (WP)..... 108
Officials: Abbas Envoys, Hamas Head Meet (AP)..... 109
Amnesty For Fatah Fighters A Mideast Hurdle (LAT) 110
Kin And Rights Groups Search For Pakistan's Missing (NYT).. 111
Southeast Asians Agree To Trade Zone (NYT)..... 113
Chirac's Party Chooses Nominee Amid Intrigue (WP) 114
Sarkozy To Get Party Nomination At Paris Congress (AFP) 115
Spanish Prime Minister Takes Political Heat After Airport Attack By Basque Group (NYT)..... 116
Climate Trumps Terror In Europe (WT)..... 117
200 Die In Darfur During Week Of Intertribal Battles (WP/AP).. 118
Brazil Gambles On Monitoring Of Amazon Loggers (NYT)..... 119
Don't Ban Your Instincts, Ban Ki-moon (WP) 120

TERRORISM NEWS:

Military Is Expanding Its Intelligence Role In U.S. (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau, Mark Mazzetti
The New York Times, January 14, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13 — The Pentagon has been using a little-known power to obtain banking and credit records of hundreds of Americans and others suspected of terrorism or espionage inside the United States, part of an aggressive expansion by the military into domestic intelligence gathering.

The C.I.A. has also been issuing what are known as national security letters to gain access to financial records from American companies, though it has done so only rarely, intelligence officials say.

Banks, credit card companies and other financial institutions receiving the letters usually have turned over documents voluntarily, allowing investigators to examine the financial assets and transactions of American military personnel and civilians, officials say.

The F.B.I., the lead agency on domestic counterterrorism and espionage, has issued thousands of national security letters since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, provoking criticism and court challenges from civil liberties advocates who see them as unjustified intrusions into Americans' private lives.

But it was not previously known, even to some senior counterterrorism officials, that the Pentagon and the Central Intelligence Agency have been using their own "noncompulsory" versions of the letters. Congress has rejected several attempts by the two agencies since 2001 for authority to issue mandatory letters, in part because of concerns about the dangers of expanding their role in domestic spying.

The military and the C.I.A. have long been restricted in their domestic intelligence operations, and both are barred from conducting traditional domestic law enforcement work. The C.I.A.'s role within the United States has been largely limited to recruiting people to spy on foreign countries.

DOJ_NMG_0116787

Carl Kropf, a spokesman for the director of national intelligence, said intelligence agencies like the C.I.A. used the letters on only a "limited basis."

Pentagon officials defended the letters as valuable tools and said they were part of a broader strategy since the Sept. 11 attacks to use more aggressive intelligence-gathering tactics — a priority of former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. The letters "provide tremendous leads to follow and often with which to corroborate other evidence in the context of counterespionage and counterterrorism," said Maj. Patrick Ryder, a Pentagon spokesman.

Government lawyers say the legal authority for the Pentagon and the C.I.A. to use national security letters in gathering domestic records dates back nearly three decades and, by their reading, was strengthened by the antiterrorism law known as the USA Patriot Act.

Pentagon officials said they used the letters to follow up on a variety of intelligence tips or leads. While they would not provide details about specific cases, military intelligence officials with knowledge of them said the military had issued the letters to collect financial records regarding a government contractor with unexplained wealth, for example, and a chaplain at Guantánamo Bay erroneously suspected of aiding prisoners at the facility.

Usually, the financial documents collected through the letters do not establish any links to espionage or terrorism and have seldom led to criminal charges, military officials say. Instead, the letters often help eliminate suspects.

"We may find out this person has unexplained wealth for reasons that have nothing to do with being a spy, in which case we're out of it," said Thomas A. Gandy, a senior Army counterintelligence official.

But even when the initial suspicions are unproven, the documents have intelligence value, military officials say. In the next year, they plan to incorporate the records into a database at the Counterintelligence Field Activity office at the Pentagon to track possible threats against the military, Pentagon officials said. Like others interviewed, they would speak only on the condition of anonymity.

Military intelligence officers have sent letters in up to 500 investigations over the last five years, two officials estimated. The number of letters is likely to be well into the thousands, the officials said, because a single case often generates letters to multiple financial institutions. For its part, the C.I.A. issues a handful of national security letters each year, agency officials said. Congressional officials said members of the House and Senate Intelligence Committees had been briefed on the use of the letters by the military and the C.I.A.

Some national security experts and civil liberties advocates are troubled by the C.I.A. and military taking on domestic intelligence activities, particularly in light of recent disclosures that the Counterintelligence Field Activity office had maintained files on Iraq war protesters in the United States in violation of the military's own guidelines. Some experts say the Pentagon has adopted an overly expansive view of its domestic role under the guise of "force protection," or efforts to guard military installations.

"There's a strong tradition of not using our military for domestic law enforcement," said Elizabeth Rindskopf Parker, a former general counsel at both the National Security Agency and the C.I.A. who is the dean at the McGeorge School of Law at the University of the Pacific. "They're moving into territory where historically they have not been authorized or presumed to be operating."

Similarly, John Radsan, an assistant general counsel at the C.I.A. from 2002 to 2004 and now a law professor at William Mitchell College of Law in St. Paul, said, "The C.I.A. is not supposed to have any law enforcement powers, or internal security functions, so if they've been issuing their own national security letters, they better be able to explain how they don't cross the line."

The Pentagon's expanded intelligence-gathering role, in particular, has created occasional conflicts with other federal agencies. Pentagon efforts to post American military officers at embassies overseas to gather intelligence for counterterrorism operations or future war plans has rankled some State Department and C.I.A. officials, who see the military teams as duplicating and potentially interfering with the intelligence agency.

In the United States, the Federal Bureau of Investigation has complained about military officials dealing directly with local police — rather than through the bureau — for assistance in responding to possible terrorist threats against a military base. F.B.I. officials say the threats have often turned out to be uncorroborated and, at times, have stirred needless anxiety.

The military's frequent use of national security letters has sometimes caused concerns from the businesses receiving them, a counterterrorism official said. Lawyers at financial institutions, which routinely provide records to the F.B.I. in law enforcement investigations, have contacted bureau officials to say they were confused by the scope of the military's requests and whether they were obligated to turn the records over, the official said.

Companies are not eager to turn over sensitive financial data about customers to the government, the official said, "so the more this is done, and the more poorly it's done, the more pushback there is for the F.B.I."

DOJ_NMG_0116788

The bureau has frequently relied on the letters in recent years to gather telephone and Internet logs, financial information and other records in terrorism investigations, serving more than 9,000 letters in 2005, according to a Justice Department tally. As an investigative tool, the letters present relatively few hurdles; they can be authorized by supervisors rather than a court. Passage of the Patriot Act in October 2001 lowered the standard for issuing the letters, requiring only that the documents sought be "relevant" to an investigation and allowing records requests for more peripheral figures, not just targets of an inquiry.

Some Democrats have accused the F.B.I. of using the letters for fishing expeditions, and the American Civil Liberties Union won court challenges in two cases, one for library records in Connecticut and the other for Internet records in Manhattan. Concerned about possible abuses, Congress imposed new safeguards in extending the Patriot Act last year, in part by making clear that recipients of national security letters could contact a lawyer and seek court review. Congress also directed the Justice Department inspector general to study the F.B.I.'s use of the letters, a review that is continuing.

Unlike the F.B.I., the military and the C.I.A. do not have wide-ranging authority to seek records on Americans in intelligence investigations. But the expanded use of national security letters has allowed the Pentagon and the intelligence agency to collect records on their own. Sometimes, military or C.I.A. officials work with the F.B.I. to seek records, as occurred with an American translator who had worked for the military in Iraq and was suspected of having ties to insurgents.

After the Sept. 11 attacks, Mr. Rumsfeld directed military lawyers and intelligence officials to examine their legal authorities to collect intelligence both inside the United States and abroad. They concluded that the Pentagon had "way more" legal tools than it had been using, a senior Defense Department official said.

Military officials say the Right to Financial Privacy Act of 1978, which establishes procedures for government access to sensitive banking data, first authorized them to issue national security letters. The military had used the letters sporadically for years, officials say, but the pace accelerated in late 2001, when lawyers and intelligence officials concluded that the Patriot Act strengthened their ability to use the letters to seek financial records on a voluntary basis and to issue mandatory letters to obtain credit ratings, the officials said.

The Patriot Act does not specifically mention military intelligence or C.I.A. officials in connection with the national security letters.

Some F.B.I. officials said they were surprised by the Pentagon's interpretation of the law when military officials first informed them of it. "It was a very broad reading of the law," a former counterterrorism official said.

While the letters typically have been used to trace the financial transactions of military personnel, they also have been used to investigate civilian contractors and people with no military ties who may pose a threat to the military, officials said. Military officials say they regard the letters as one of the least intrusive means to gather evidence. When a full investigation is opened, one official said, it has now become "standard practice" to issue such letters.

One prominent case in which letters were used to obtain financial records, according to two military officials, was that of a Muslim chaplain at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, who was suspected in 2003 of aiding terror suspects imprisoned at the facility. The espionage case against the chaplain, James J. Yee, soon collapsed.

Eugene Fidell, a defense lawyer for the former chaplain and a military law expert, said he was unaware that military investigators may have used national security letters to obtain financial information about Mr. Yee, nor was he aware that the military had ever claimed the authority to issue the letters.

Mr. Fidell said he found the practice "disturbing," in part because the military does not have the same checks and balances when it comes to Americans' civil rights as does the F.B.I. "Where is the accountability?" he asked. "That's the evil of it — it doesn't leave fingerprints."

Even when a case is closed, military officials said they generally maintain the records for years because they may be relevant to future intelligence inquiries. Officials at the Pentagon's counterintelligence unit say they plan to incorporate those records into a database, called Portico, on intelligence leads. The financial documents will not be widely disseminated, but limited to investigators, an intelligence official said.

"You don't want to destroy something only to find out that the same guy comes up in another report and you don't know that he was investigated before," the official said.

The Counterintelligence Field Activity office, created in 2002 to better coordinate the military's efforts to combat foreign intelligence services, has drawn criticism for some domestic intelligence activities.

The agency houses an antiterrorist database of intelligence tips and threat reports, known as Talon, which had been collecting information on antiwar planning meetings at churches, libraries and other locations. The Defense Department has since tightened its procedures for what kind of information is allowed into the Talon database, and the counterintelligence office also purged more than 250 incident reports from the database that officials determined should never have been included because they centered on lawful political protests by people opposed to the war in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0116789

Officials: Pentagon Probed Finances (WP)

By Karen DeYoung

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

The Defense Department has used a long-standing authority to acquire the personal financial records of American citizens in military-related criminal and other investigations as part of an expansion of the Pentagon's gathering of counterterrorism intelligence at home, officials said yesterday.

"There are certainly types of information and transactions that are valuable to the department when conducting counterintelligence and counterespionage investigations," said Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman.

Whitman emphasized that although the FBI can compel banks, credit card companies and other private institutions to produce such records by issuing a National Security Letter, the military is authorized only to request that the institutions turn them over.

The CIA has long had similar "noncompulsory" authority, although intelligence officials said that such requests are rare and tend to relate to espionage investigations of the CIA's own officials. The authority was used during the investigation of Aldrich Ames, the CIA operations officer who was convicted in 1994 of spying for the Russians.

The military's expanded use of the records authority was first reported yesterday on the Web site of the New York Times, which said that military officials had made more than 500 such requests since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. Quoting unnamed military intelligence officials, the Times said that the actual number of letters was probably well into the thousands, because a single investigation often resulted in requests to multiple institutions.

By law, the FBI is charged with conducting investigations of U.S. citizens and with counterterrorism activities in this country.

Domestic intelligence-gathering by the CIA and the military is sharply restricted. In the military's case, such activities have generally involved investigations of direct threats to military installations and personnel in the United States, as well as inquiries into possible criminal activities by uniformed or civilian Defense Department employees.

Under then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, the Pentagon expanded its collection of intelligence within the borders of the United States -- a development that stirred concern among members of Congress and prompted stern criticism and lawsuits from civil liberties advocates.

These efforts are overseen by the Pentagon's Counterintelligence Field Activity agency, or CIFA, which was established in September 2002 by then-Deputy Secretary of Defense Paul D. Wolfowitz.

CIFA is charged with coordinating policy and overseeing the domestic counterintelligence activities of Pentagon agencies and the armed forces. The agency's size and budget are classified, but congressional sources have said that the agency spent more than $1 billion through October. One counterintelligence official recently estimated that CIFA has 400 full-time employees and 800 to 900 contractors working for it.

In written responses to questions from the Senate Armed Services Committee during his confirmation hearing last month, Rumsfeld's replacement, Robert M. Gates, pledged to look "in greater detail" at CIFA's activities.

The agency was criticized in December 2005 after it was revealed that a database managed by CIFA, called TALON, contained unverified, raw threat information about people who were peacefully protesting the Iraq war at defense facilities, including recruiting offices. In August, CIFA Director David A. Burtt II and his top deputy, Joseph Hefferon, resigned in the wake of a scandal involving CIFA contracts that went to MZM Inc., a company run by Mitchell J. Wade. Wade pleaded guilty last February to conspiring to bribe then-Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif).

In his confirmation responses, Gates said that an internal Pentagon review of the program "found procedural weaknesses" and that "steps are underway to correct these deficiencies."

Whitman, in a discussion of the financial-records requests, said that only four U.S. military entities are authorized to ask for them -- the U.S. Army Counterintelligence Center, the Criminal Investigation Service of the Army and of the Navy, and the Air Force Office of Special Investigations.

All of these entities are overseen by CIFA.

Whitman declined to discuss individual cases in which the authority had been used, although one U.S. official who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue said it was utilized in an investigation of a contractor working at the Guantanamo Bay naval facility who appeared to have unexplained income.

In comments attributed to unnamed military intelligence officials, the Times said that the financial records of Capt. James Yee -- a Muslim chaplain at the U.S. military detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, who was charged with aiding prisoners there -- had also been obtained. Espionage charges against Yee were eventually dropped by the government.

The CIA declined yesterday to comment on its use of the financial-records authority. An intelligence official said that the CIA usually asks the FBI to obtain financial records involving U.S. citizens in terrorism investigations because the bureau has the authority to compel cooperation. "There have been a handful of instances, in very rare circumstances over the years, that the CIA has used" its authority to request such records on its own, the official said.

DOJ_NMG_0116790

Pentagon, CIA Check U.S. Suspects' Bank Records (AP)

AP, January 13, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Pentagon and to a lesser extent the CIA have been using a little-known power to look at the banking and credit records of hundreds of Americans and others suspected of terrorism or espionage within the United States, according to a published report.

"It is our understanding that the intelligence community agencies make such requests on a limited basis," said Carl Kropf, a spokesman for the Office of the National Intelligence Director, which oversees all 16 spy agencies in the government.

The so-called national security letters permit the executive branch to seek records about people in terror and spy investigations without a judge's approval or grand jury subpoena. Government lawyers maintain the legal authority for such tactics is years old and was strengthened by the Patriot Act.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation, the lead agency on domestic counterterrorism and espionage, has issued thousands of national security letters since the attacks of September 11, 2001.

That has prompted criticism and court challenges from civil liberties advocates who claim they invade the privacy of Americans' lives, even though banks and other financial institutions typically turn over the financial records voluntarily.

The New York Times, in an article posted Saturday on the Internet, said the Pentagon and CIA also have been using their own versions of the letters to aid investigative work.

Congressional officials said members of the House and Senate Intelligence Committees had been briefed on the Pentagon and CIA's use of the letters, the newspaper said.

The vast majority of national security letters are issued by the FBI, but in very rare circumstances they have been used by the CIA before and after 9/11, said a U.S. intelligence official who spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity.

The CIA has used these non-compulsory letters in espionage investigations and other circumstances, the official said.

"It is very uncommon for the agency to be issuing these letters," the official said. "The agency has the authority to do so, and it is absolutely lawful."

A government official, also speaking on condition of anonymity, said one example of a case in which the letters were used was the 1994 case of CIA officer Aldrich Ames, who eventually was found to have been selling secrets to the Soviet Union.

Neither official commented about the extent of possible use by Defense Department agencies, but Pentagon officials defended their use to the Times, saying they were part of a post-September 11 strategy to use more aggressive intelligence-gathering techniques.

Kropf's remarks to the AP did not address specifics of the Times story, which said military intelligence officers have sent letters in up to 500 investigations.

"There's a strong tradition of not using our military for domestic law enforcement," said Elizabeth Rindskopf Parker, a former general counsel at both the National Security Agency and the CIA and dean at the McGeorge School of Law at the University of the Pacific told the Times. "They're moving into territory where historically they have not been authorized or presumed to be operating."

Pentagon Conducting Probes In U.S. (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes, Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

I

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon has been requesting information from financial institutions and telecommunications companies to investigate people within the United States suspected of spying or terrorism, the Defense Department said Saturday.

The little-known practice could raise questions on Capitol Hill about the military conducting domestic investigations, which are traditionally reserved for the FBI. The American Civil Liberties Union said Saturday that the Pentagon activity raised concerns.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said the Defense Department was not spying on random American citizens and was primarily requesting the information in counterintelligence investigations, such as when department officials or contractors were accused of spying.

DOJ_NMG_0116791

The Pentagon practice was first reported Saturday evening by the New York Times, which said officials estimated that the Pentagon had asked for the information in as many as 500 investigations over five years.

The CIA has gathered similar information from U.S. companies and other sources, but has done so less frequently, according to U.S. intelligence officials contacted by the Los Angeles Times.

The information requests are similar to "national security letters" issued by the FBI, which compel institutions to turn over records. The FBI's use of such letters has been controversial, and the American Civil Liberties Union has challenged their use in at least two cases. Congress put new restrictions on the use of the letters when it reauthorized the Patriot Act last year.

Defense officials said Saturday they had used similar letters to request information from financial institutions, telephone companies and credit agencies.

Although they are used in terrorism investigations, Whitman said, the requests have mainly been used in cases of suspected espionage. If a Defense Department employee or contractor appeared to have excessive amounts of money, for example, the Pentagon might use the letters as part of a preliminary counterintelligence probe.

Whitman emphasized that the Pentagon letters requested — but did not compel — banks, phone companies and others to turn over customer information. Although the Pentagon can ask a court to compel the release of those records, Whitman said he was not aware of any requests for court orders.

The Pentagon has been using the letters at least since 2003.

One U.S. intelligence official said the CIA had been "involved in such letters on a very limited basis over the years."

The CIA practice predates the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, officials said. The Justice Department is often involved in the CIA and Pentagon investigations, officials said.

ACLU Associate Legal Director Ann Beeson said the Pentagon and CIA actions raised "serious concerns," in part because of recent disclosures of expanded government spying, such as the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping. She said she wanted to know more about the cases that prompted the information requests.

"There are serious concerns about whether the Pentagon is improperly intruding into the privacy of Americans and improperly conducting domestic intelligence without any legal authorization…. The Pentagon has its own regulations which severely limit their ability to conduct domestic intelligence, and those regulations come out of a strong tradition in this country of opposing military involvement in domestic affairs," Beeson said.

Although the CIA and Pentagon have extensive overseas intelligence-gathering operations, both are tightly restricted from domestic spying. But the Pentagon does perform limited law enforcement work, and each military service has a criminal investigation agency.

Lawmakers have resisted giving the Defense Department the right to force financial companies to reveal information about clients. But the Pentagon has the authority to request information under the Right to Financial Privacy Act, the Fair Credit Reporting Act and the National Security Act, said Army Lt. Col. Brian Maka, a Pentagon spokesman. Whitman said the authority also was derived from the Patriot Act.

Maka said the ability to request transaction information was "invaluable" to the Defense Department "in conducting counterintelligence and counterterrorism investigations."

Defense Department agencies authorized to issue the letters are all criminal or counterintelligence agencies, including the Army Criminal Investigation Command, Naval Criminal Investigative Service, Air Force Office of Special Investigations and Army counterintelligence.

The New York Times reported that one such letter was used in the case of a Muslim chaplain suspected of aiding prisoners accused of terrorism being held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The chaplain was cleared of any espionage charges.

New Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates is expected to take a less aggressive stance toward intelligence operations than predecessor Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Deletions In Army Manual Raise Wiretapping Concerns (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau, Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13 — Deep into an updated Army manual, the deletion of 10 words has left some national security experts wondering whether government lawyers are again asserting the executive branch's right to wiretap Americans without a court warrant.

The manual, described by the Army as a "major revision" to intelligence-gathering guidelines, addresses policies and procedures for wiretapping Americans, among other issues.

DOJ_NMG_0116792

The original guidelines, from 1984, said the Army could seek to wiretap people inside the United States on an emergency basis by going to the secret court set up by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, known as FISA, or by obtaining certification from the attorney general "issued under the authority of section 102(a) of the Act."

That last phrase is missing from the latest manual, which says simply that the Army can seek emergency wiretapping authority pursuant to an order issued by the FISA court "or upon attorney general authorization." It makes no mention of the attorney general doing so under FISA.

Bush administration officials said that the wording change was insignificant, adding that the Army would follow FISA requirements if it sought to wiretap an American.

But the manual's language worries some national security experts. "The administration does not get to make up its own rules," said Steven Aftergood, who runs a project on government secrecy for the Federation of American Scientists.

The Army guidelines were finalized in November 2005, and Mr. Aftergood's group recently obtained a copy under the Freedom of Information Act. He said he was struck by the omission, particularly because of the recent debate over the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program. President Bush has asserted that he can authorize eavesdropping without court warrants on the international communications of Americans suspected of having ties to Al Qaeda.

Like several other national security experts, Mr. Aftergood said the revised guidelines could suggest that Army lawyers had adopted the legal claim that the executive branch had authority outside the courts to conduct wiretaps.

But Thomas A. Gandy, a senior Army counterintelligence official who helped develop the guidelines, said the new wording did not suggest a policy change. The guidelines were intended to give Army intelligence personnel more explicit and, in some cases, more restrictive guidance than the 1984 regulations, partly to help them respond to new threats like computer hackers.

"This is all about doing right and following the rules and protecting the civil liberties of folks," Mr. Gandy said. "It seeks to keep people out of trouble."

Views On Detainee Representation Draw Fire (WP/AP)

By John Heilprin

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

The Pentagon yesterday disavowed a senior official's remarks suggesting companies boycott law firms that represent detainees at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Charles "Cully" Stimson, the deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, said in a radio interview last week that companies might want to consider taking their business to firms that do not represent suspected terrorists.

Legal experts and advocacy groups viewed Stimson's remarks as an attempt to intimidate law firms that provide legal help to all people, even unpopular defendants.

A Pentagon spokesman, Lt. Col. Brian Maka, said Stimson was not speaking for the Bush administration.

Stimson's comments "do not represent the views of the Department of Defense or the thinking of its leadership," Maka said.

Stimson's "shameful and irresponsible" remarks deserve condemnation, said Neal R. Sonnett, a Miami lawyer and president of the American Judicature Society, a nonpartisan group of judges, lawyers and others.

Sonnett said in a statement that Stimson had made a "blatant attempt to intimidate lawyers and their firms who are rendering important public service in upholding the rule of law and our democratic ideals."

Stimson on Thursday told Federal News Radio, a local commercial station that covers the government, that he found it "shocking" that lawyers at many of the nation's top firms represent detainees.

Stimson listed the names of more than a dozen major firms he suggested should be boycotted.

"And I think, quite honestly, when corporate CEOs see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line back in 2001, those CEOs are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms," Stimson said.

Asked who might be paying the law firms to represent Guantanamo detainees, Stimson hinted at wrongdoing for which some explaining should be done.

"It's not clear, is it? Some will maintain that they're doing it out of the goodness of their heart -- that they're doing it pro bono, and I suspect they are," he said. "Others are receiving monies from who knows where and I'd be curious to have them explain that."

Stimson also described Guantanamo as "certainly, probably the most transparent and open location in the world" because of visits from more than 2,000 journalists since it opened five years ago. However, journalists are not allowed to talk to detainees on those visits, their photos are censored, and their access to the base has at times been cut off.

DOJ_NMG_0116793

He discounted international outrage over the detention center as "small little protests around the world" that were "drummed up by Amnesty International" and inflated in importance by liberal news media outlets.

FBI agents have documented more than two dozen incidents of possible mistreatment at Guantanamo. In one, a detainee's head was wrapped in duct tape because he chanted the Koran; in a second, a detainee pulled out his hair after hours in a sweltering room.

In a December court ruling, a federal judge in Washington decried the plight of "some of the unfortunate petitioners who have been detained for many years in the terrible conditions at Guantanamo Bay."

The judge criticized a system in which dozens have been held without charges and cut off from the world for lack of English or knowledge about the law, leaving them no choice but to turn to a fellow prisoner with connections for legal help.

Since the detention center opened, the U.S. military has transferred or released about 380 detainees. Nearly 400 remain.

The Imperial Presidency (WP)

By Dahlia Lithwick

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

Why is the United States poised to try Jose Padilla as a dangerous terrorist, long after it has become clear that he was just the wrong Muslim in the wrong airport on the wrong day?

Why is Washington still holding hundreds of detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, long after years of interrogation and abuse have established that few, if any, of them are the deadly terrorists they have been held out to be?

And why is President Bush still issuing grandiose and provocative signing statements, the latest of which claims that the executive branch has the power to open mail when it sees fit?

I once believed that the common thread here is presidential blindness -- an extreme executive-branch myopia that leads the chief executive to believe that these futile measures are integral to combating terrorism; a self-delusion that precludes Bush and his advisers from recognizing that Padilla is a chump and Guantanamo Bay is just a holding pen for a jumble of innocent or half-guilty wretches.

But it has finally become clear that the goal of these efforts isn't to win the war against terrorism; indeed, nothing about Padilla, Guantanamo Bay or signing statements moves the country an inch closer to eradicating terrorism. The object is a larger one: expanding executive power, for its own sake.

Two scrupulously reported pieces on the Padilla case are illuminating. On Jan. 3, Nina Totenberg of National Public Radio interviewed Mark Corallo, who was spokesman for then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft, about the behind-the-scenes decision-making in the Padilla case -- a case that has lolled through the federal courts for years. According to Totenberg, when the Supreme Court sent Padilla's case back to the lower federal courts on technical grounds in 2004, the Bush administration's sole concern was preserving its constitutional claim that it could hold citizens as enemy combatants. "Justice Department officials warned that if the case went back to the Supreme Court, the administration would almost certainly lose," she reports, which is why Padilla was dragged back to the lower courts. Her sources further confirmed that "key players in the Defense Department and Vice President Cheney's office insisted that the power to detain Americans as enemy combatants had to be preserved."

Deborah Sontag's story on Padilla in the Jan. 4 New York Times makes the same point: He was moved from military custody to criminal court only as "a legal maneuver that kept the issue of his detention without charges out of the Supreme Court." This is why the White House moved Padilla from the brig to the high court to the federal courts and back to a Florida trial court: They were shopping for the best place to enshrine the right to detain him indefinitely. Their claims about Padilla's dirty bomb, known to be false, were a means of advancing their claims about executive power. When confronted with the possibility of losing on those claims, they pulled him back to the criminal courts so as not to lose powers they'd already won.

This need to preserve new legal ground also explains the continued operation of the detention center at Guantanamo Bay. Last week marked the fifth anniversary of the camp that -- as then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld claimed in 2002 -- houses only "the worst of the worst." Now that more than half of them have been released (the best of the worst?) and even though only about 80 will ever see trials, the camp remains open. Why? Civil rights groups worldwide and even close U.S. allies such as Denmark, England and Germany clamor for its closure.

But Guantanamo Bay stays open for the same reason that Padilla stays on trial. Having claimed the right to label enemy combatants and detain them indefinitely without charges, the Bush administration cannot retreat from that position without ceding ground. The president is as much a prisoner of Guantanamo Bay as the detainees are. Having gone nose to nose with Congress over his authority to craft stripped-down courts, guaranteed to produce guilty verdicts, Bush cannot call off the trials. The endgame in the war against terrorism isn't holding the line against terrorists. It's holding the line on hard-fought claims to limitless presidential authority.

DOJ_NMG_0116794

Enter these signing statements. The most recent of the all-but-meaningless postscripts Bush tacks onto legislation gives him the power to "authorize a search of mail in an emergency" to "protect human life and safety" and for "foreign intelligence collection." There is some debate about whether the president has that power already, but it misses the point. The purpose of these signing statements is to plant a flag on the moon -- one more way for the chief executive to stake out the furthest corners in the field of his desired powers.

Last spring, the New Yorker's Jane Mayer profiled David Addington, Cheney's chief of staff and legal adviser. Addington's worldview in brief: a single-minded devotion to something called the New Paradigm, a constitutional theory of virtually limitless executive power, wherein "the President, as Commander-in-Chief, has the authority to disregard virtually all previously known legal boundaries, if national security demands it," Mayer describes.

Bush administration insiders told Mayer that Addington and Cheney had been "laying the groundwork" for a vast expansion of presidential power long before 9/11. And in 2002, the vice president told ABC News that the presidency was "weaker today as an institution because of the unwise compromises that have been made over the last 30 to 35 years." Rebuilding that presidency has been their goal for decades.

The image of Addington scrutinizing "every bill before President Bush signs it, searching for any language that might impinge on Presidential power," as Mayer puts it, can be amusing, sort of like the mother of the bride obsessing over a tricky seating chart. But this zeal to restore an all-powerful presidency traps the Bush administration in its own worst legal sinkholes. This newfound authority -- to maintain a disastrous Guantanamo Bay, to stage rights-free tribunals and to hold detainees forever -- is the kind of power that Richard M. Nixon could have only dreamed about, and cannot be let go.

In a heartbreaking letter from Guantanamo Bay last week, published in the Los Angeles Times, inmate Jumah al-Dossari writes: "The purpose of Guantanamo is to destroy people, and I have been destroyed." I fear he is wrong. The destruction of Dossari, Padilla, Zacarias Moussaoui, Yasser Esam Hamdi and some of our most basic civil liberties was never a purpose or a goal -- it was a byproduct. The true purpose is more abstract and more tragic: to establish a clunky post-Watergate dream of an imperial presidency, whatever the human cost may be.

Dahlia Lithwick covers legal affairs for Slate, the online magazine at www.slate.com.

Attack On U.S. Embassy Revives Greek Fear Of Terrorism (NYT)

By Ian Fisher, Anthee Carassava

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

ATHENS, Jan. 13 — The anti-Americanism was of a different vintage but still deadly, etched into two somber plaques at the battened-down United States Embassy here. Starting in December 1975, five embassy employees — four Americans and one Greek-American driver — were killed here by November 17, the leftist Greek terrorist group.

Now, with a new attack on Friday on the embassy — using an unusually potent weapon, a rocket-propelled grenade — Greeks are grappling with deep uneasiness.

Was this a one-time attack?

Or was this just the first break in a new wave of leftist violence in Greece, now given an updated cause — and perhaps some conflicted sympathy among ordinary Greeks — amid worldwide anger against United States actions in Iraq and its broader fight against terrorism?

“The strike against the embassy was powerful, audacious, highly symbolic with an imported weapon,” read an editorial in Vima, a leading Greek newspaper. “Unfortunately, terrorism is returning, ready to put its dark and damaging stamp on political developments.”

The stakes for Greece are high. After several years of relative stability, any revival of violence here could erase the gains made after the successful dismantling of November 17 before the Olympic Games here in 2004. Those gains are vital and real. Greece’s international image has improved, as have relations with the United States. Tourism, the nation’s largest money maker, is surging. The number of American tourists has doubled since 2005.

“For the time being, we’re calm,” said Yannis Evangelou, president of the Hellenic Association of Travel and Tourist Agencies. “This was an isolated, one-off incident by a small group of people who obviously have a bone to pick with the U.S. and its policies.”

“It doesn’t reflect the views of the general public here,” he added. Moreover, he said, “Greece isn’t the only country where violent forms of anti-American protests are taking place.”

No one was wounded in the attack on Friday, but alarm has been widespread. The damaged United States Embassy sits in one of the most heavily protected and patrolled sections of Athens, home to other embassies and foreign officials as well.

DOJ_NMG_0116795

The weapon, too, was not some crude homemade bomb, but a powerful antitank grenade that, experts say, was either bought on the illegal international arms market or from a foreign militant group that may have also trained Greece's new generation of terrorists. It was a Chinese design, the Greek authorities said Saturday, not Russian as earlier identified.

"This is our fear, that they are professionals," said Christodoulos Yiallourides, a professor of international relations at Panteion University in Athens. "They are not a group of leftist young people. They are professionals, and they are following a strategy."

But what they want is still a mystery. Greek officials have not yet accepted the claim of responsibility for the Friday attack by a Marxist group, Revolutionary Struggle. The group released a proclamation of its aims in late 2005 — a grab-bag of complaints against globalization, poverty, the European Union and an American administration waging an unjust "war without borders or territorial or national divisions" against terrorist suspects.

"We will achieve the eradication of these ills only with the overthrow of the existing system in its entirety," the proclamation read.

Mary Bossis, one of Greece's foremost terrorism experts, said Revolutionary Struggle was worrisome because, unlike November 17, it did not seem to have a coherent political plan. Moreover, she said, Revolutionary Struggle and other new leftist groups seem to have ties to crime, both petty and organized, as the use of the rocket-propelled grenade seemed to show.

"It seems that these organizations are not really interested in what people think about them," she said. "They are not overthrowing the government. They are just interested in violence."

She and other experts said the signs of the resurgence of those gropus had been clear for years — and, she and others charged, were not taken seriously enough by the Greek government. Since September 2003, Revolutionary Struggle has claimed responsibility for at least seven attacks, from bombings at a courthouse, bank and police station to an assassination attempt against the culture minister.

"I expect more attacks," Ms. Bossis added.

The question now, analysts say, is how actively the government of Prime Minister Kostas Karamanlis works to prevent other attacks. Some experts said an encouraging sign was the immediate appointment of Stylianos Syros, the former head of the Greek antiterrorist squad credited with taking apart November 17, to lead the investigation.

The government, considered generally more friendly to Washington than its socialist predecessors, also quickly made clear that it wanted to avoid any deterioration in relations with the American government.

Condemnations sounded across the political spectrum, and a foreign ministry spokesman, George Koumoutsakos, said he was convinced "that neither Greece's relations with the United States, nor the country's international image would be tarnished by Friday's attack."

That all political parties condemned the attack, he said, "proved important and useful."

There seems, too, no small measure of exhaustion with leftist political violence in Greece, which still simmers long after similar groups in nations like Italy and Germany fizzled out.

It appears true despite much irritation with America, from old grievances from American support of the Greek military dictatorship; to the feeling that United States has sided against Greece on issues like Turkey, Macedonia and Cyprus; to anger, widespread around Europe, to American foreign policy since the 9/11 terrorism attacks.

"We are against American policies but not against Americans," said George Krassias, 19, a pilot trainee, driving past the embassy, pocked with a hole from the grenade. "This shouldn't have happened."

Tunisia Says Suspects In Gun Battle Had Blueprints Of Embassies (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

PARIS, Jan. 13 — More than two dozen Islamic extremists involved in a deadly gun battle with the Tunisian police earlier this month had blueprints of foreign embassies and documents identifying foreign envoys as targets, the Tunisian interior minister said Friday.

It was the first official explanation of the firefight since TAP, the state news agency, reported that the police had engaged "dangerous criminals" in a rare shootout south of the capital on Jan. 3, the second violent incident in three weeks.

"Investigations have allowed us to seize quantities of homemade explosives, plans of certain foreign embassies, as well as documents containing the names of certain foreign diplomats resident in Tunisia," said the interior minister, Rafik Haj Kacem, according to the news agency. He did not disclose the countries or people who apparently had been targets.

Islamic extremism has been growing across North Africa, the far edge of a fundamentalist religious trend that is polarizing societies between rich and poor.

DOJ_NMG_0116796

While the upper and middle classes in all of these countries are largely modernist, secular and Western-oriented, a religious resurgence among the lower classes — heavily influenced by the fundamentalist Salafi school of Islam practiced in Saudi Arabia — has fueled the rise of Islamic parties from the Islamic Brotherhood in Egypt to the Justice and Development Party in Morocco.

The extremism has produced terrorist threats, and resulted in terrorist attacks, in every country along the southern Mediterranean coast and most European countries across the sea. A bomb in Tunisia's main tourist center on the island of Djerba killed 21 people in April 2002.

Since then, there has been no open threat in the tightly controlled country. But Islamic terrorist activity has long threatened to bleed into Tunisia from neighboring Algeria, where the small but violent Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, or G.S.P.C. as it is known by its French acronym, is fighting for an Islamic theocracy in North Africa.

Those fears were bolstered Friday when the Interior Ministry announced that six members of the group — five Tunisians and a Mauritanian — had crossed into the country from Algeria.

Two Tunisian newspapers close to the government have reported that the group had ties to the G.S.P.C., according to Agence France-Presse.

In December, the Interior Ministry reported that two people had been killed and two arrested in a shootout with the police in Hammam Lif, a suburb of Tunis, the capital.

Then, on Jan. 3, the ministry reported that the police had been engaged in another shootout with the group in Soliman, 25 miles south of the capital, Tunis, killing 12 people and arresting 15. Two security force members were also killed.

It was not until Friday that the government confirmed widespread speculation that the people involved had been Islamic extremists.

"The intelligence services know these people, their names and their Salafist terrorist tendencies," Mr. Kacem said, according to the TAP news agency.

He said the group was attacked in December with the help of the Army and that those who escaped were eventually caught in the daylong shootout on Jan. 3.

Security in the country was tightened after the two episodes, with diplomats reporting an increase in roadblocks, particularly in the capital's diplomatic quarters.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Stockpiling Waste (WP)

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

STOCKPILING a new anthrax vaccine was supposed to be the signal achievement of Project Bioshield, the government's flagship program to prepare for a biological, chemical or radiological attack on American soil. But last month the Department of Health and Human Services canceled its contract with VaxGen, a biotechnology firm that was supposed to develop the vaccine. The contract turned out to be a huge waste of time and effort.

There were signs that Bioshield was far, far off track long before VaxGen lost its contract. HHS tapped VaxGen for its $1 billion anthrax vaccine contract even though the company was best known for producing a failed AIDS medication, had never created a successful drug and had failed to release satisfactory financial reports, leading to its delisting from the Nasdaq Stock Market. The company repeatedly ran afoul of the Food and Drug Administration, which pulled the plug on human trials for the vaccine.

Nevertheless, accompanied by a drumbeat of bad news about the company's progress, federal contracting officials extended VaxGen's due dates. Now HHS officials insist that VaxGen offered convincing evidence that it could produce a new anthrax vaccine on time when it signed its contract in 2004. It would be more reassuring if those officials admitted mistakes and said that they were trying to figure out where they had gone wrong.

Concern over the $5.6 billion Project Bioshield prompted recent passage of a law that creates a much-needed coordinating office to oversee Bioshield's varied efforts and alters the way the federal government funds anti-bioterrorism research. Its backers claim that these changes will foster effective partnerships between government and industry that can head off disasters such as VaxGen.

Perhaps they will, but Project Bioshield might need a more fundamental reexamination. For example, Bioshield's priorities: Rather than stockpiling a particular vaccine, might it be more effective to redirect much of that money to measures that would help across a range of disasters, such as buying face masks and respirators or enhancing drug production capacity?

DOJ_NMG_0116797

Incendiary (WP)

By Warren Bass

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

In an angry polemic, Dinesh D'Souza blames American liberals for the 2001 terrorist attacks.

THE ENEMY AT HOME

The Cultural Left and Its Responsibility for 9/11

By Dinesh D'Souza

Doubleday. 333 pp. $26.95

On Sept. 13, 2001, the television evangelist Jerry Falwell offered a stunned, grieving nation a startling diagnosis of al-Qaeda's motivations. "I really believe," he said on Pat Robertson's show, "The 700 Club," "that the pagans, and the abortionists, and the feminists, and the gays and the lesbians who are actively trying to make that an alternative lifestyle, the ACLU, People for the American Way -- all of them who have tried to secularize America -- I point the finger in their face and say, 'You helped this happen.' "

At the time, Falwell's analysis was roundly denounced as hysterical and elicited a pointed disavowal from President Bush. But Dinesh D'Souza, a fellow at Stanford's Hoover Institution, has decided, essentially, that Falwell was on to something. The Enemy at Home calls America's culture war synonymous with its war on terrorism and flatly blames the country's left for 9/11. But unlike Falwell and Robertson's outburst at a moment of crisis, D'Souza's is offered in a spirit of cool reflection. The result is the worst nonfiction book about terrorism published by a major house since 9/11, but with the country still facing a serious jihadist threat, it's worth trying to understand D'Souza's own exercise in finger-pointing.

Here's the main argument, such as it is. Why has al-Qaeda targeted America? "Not because of U.S. troops in Mecca," D'Souza writes. "Not even because of Israel. . . . The suicide bombers of radical Islam are not blowing themselves up because they are distressed over the Gulf War of 1991 or because they are in solidarity with the Palestinians." Rather, "what bin Laden objected to was America staying in the Middle East, importing with it the immoral ingredients of American values and culture." That makes the left "responsible for 9/11" because it "has fostered a decadent American culture that angers and repulses traditional societies" and has waged "an aggressive global campaign to undermine the traditional patriarchal family and to promote secular values in non-Western cultures." In sum, "the cultural left and its allies in Congress, the media, Hollywood, the nonprofit sector, and the universities are the primary cause of the volcano of anger toward America that is erupting from the Islamic world."

D'Souza, the author of the bestselling Illiberal Education, has no particular expertise on terrorism, which may explain why he writes twice that there are U.S. troops in Mecca (someone should probably alert Bob Gates) or why he thinks that President Reagan's 1986 airstrikes on Libya "convinced Qadafi to retire from the terrorism trade," despite the bombing of Pan Am 103 by Libyan agents two years later. But D'Souza's inexperience doesn't explain why he so badly misreads bin Ladenist ideology, despite the peppering of jihadist quotes that he uses to lend the book a sense of authority.

Of course, the ascetic bin Laden doesn't like American culture or values, including such far-left ideas as democracy or educating women, but he has a clear politico-religious agenda that's important to take seriously. You'd never know it from reading D'Souza, but bin Laden's February 1998 "Declaration of the World Islamic Front for Jihad against the Jews and the Crusaders" -- the most considered summation of his casus belli -- laid out three main grievances for which al-Qaeda kills. First and foremost comes the post-Gulf crisis deployment of U.S. troops in Saudi Arabia, which are "occupying the lands of Islam in the holiest of its territories" and "using its bases in the peninsula as a spearhead to fight against the neighboring Islamic peoples." Second comes the supposed Crusader-Jewish alliance's "long blockade" of the Iraqis, designed "to destroy what remains of this people and to humiliate their Muslim neighbors." Finally, America's anti-Muslim wars "also serve the petty state of the Jews, to divert attention from their occupation of Jerusalem and their killing of Muslims in it." See anything about Hollywood there?

D'Souza breezes past clearly articulated core al-Qaeda goals (such as toppling the "near enemy," as bin Ladenists call the impious regimes in Saudi Arabia and Egypt) to enlist bin Laden as an ally for D'Souza's side of the American culture wars. But the 1998 declaration bluntly states that "the purposes of the Americans" in their crusades against Islam "are religious and economic" -- not cultural. D'Souza is too busy projecting to really grapple with al-Qaeda's politics, strategy or ideological appeal; it's as if he read Mein Kampf and concluded that its author's main concern was not Aryan supremacy or genocidal anti-Semitism but distaste for Weimar theater.

For a Stanford fellow, D'Souza shows a surprising ignorance of the growing literature on jihadist ideology. One has to ask which is more likely: that such authors as Steve Coll, Lawrence Wright, Peter L. Bergen, Marc Sageman, Jessica Stern, Richard A. Posner and Bruce Hoffman could have scrutinized al-Qaeda ideology and somehow failed to notice that bin Laden's main beef was with America's corrupt cultural left, or that the grinding sound you hear off in the distance is D'Souza with an ax. Or consider the work of another heavyweight, Michael F. Scheuer, the tough-minded founding chief of the CIA's bin Laden unit, who advocates the massive use of the U.S. military as our principal tool for fighting al-Qaeda. (D'Souza, oddly, lumps him in with a bunch of lefties.) "Bin Laden has been precise in telling America the reasons he is waging war on us," Scheuer has written. "None of the reasons have anything to do with our freedom, liberty, and democracy, but have everything to do with U.S. policies and actions in the Muslim world." There's a feisty and interesting debate among terrorism specialists about whether Scheuer has the balances right, but "The Vagina Monologues" isn't high on any serious analyst's list of al-Qaeda grievances.

DOJ_NMG_0116798

In other words, D'Souza's answer to the famous post-9/11 question of "Why do they hate us?" is that it all depends on the meaning of the word "us." In arguing that it's liberals who have brought al-Qaeda's wrath down upon the United States, he vents his indignation largely at his fellow Americans, not the fanatics who've declared it a holy duty to murder us all -- civilians and soldiers alike. Obsessed with a "near enemy" of his own, D'Souza endorses much of the jihadist critique of American society and gives at least a partial moral pass to al-Qaeda and the perpetrators of 9/11. It should go without saying that bin Laden's self-styled fatwas make no distinction between liberals and conservatives. There was a time when Americans at war did not do so either.

As the great social scientist Thomas C. Schelling might have put it, there are two possibilities here: Either D'Souza is blaming liberals for 9/11 because he truly believes that they're culpable, or he's blaming liberals for 9/11 because he's cynically calculating that an incendiary polemic will sell books. I just don't know which is scarier. One has to wonder why his publisher, agent, editors and publicists went along for the ride, and it's hard not to conclude that they thought the thing would cause a cable-news and blogosphere sensation that would spike sales -- a ruckus triggered not despite the book's silliness but because of it. This sort of scam has worked before (think of Christopher Hitchens's gleeful broadside against Mother Teresa or the calculated slurs of Ann Coulter), but rarely has the gap between the seriousness of the issues and the quality of the book yawned as wide. This time, let's just not bother with the flap; this dim, dishonorable book isn't worth it. Â·

Warren Bass is a senior editor at Book World. He served on the professional staff of the 9/11 Commission.

WAR NEWS:

Opposition To Iraq Plan Leaves Bush Isolated (WP)

By Peter Baker, Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

The bipartisan opposition to President Bush's troop-increase plan has proved more intense than his advisers hoped and has left them scrambling to find support, but the White House is banking on the assumption that it can execute its "new way forward" in Iraq before Congress can derail it.

The plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq was virtually guaranteed to provoke a furor in Washington, Bush advisers said, but the storm was exacerbated by the slow, leaky way that the White House reached a decision. The policy review stretched two months after the election and the essence of the plan became known long before Bush announced it, making it a political pi?ata for opponents.

Without Bush making the case for it until last week, resistance hardened, and aides now harbor no hope of winning over Democrats. Instead, they aim mainly to keep Republicans from abandoning him further. Bush invited GOP leaders to Camp David this weekend and will argue his case to the nation on CBS's "60 Minutes" tonight. Vice President Cheney and national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley will also hit the airwaves today.

"We recognize that many members of Congress are skeptical," Bush said in his radio address yesterday, adding: "Members of Congress have a right to express their views, and express them forcefully. But those who refuse to give this plan a chance to work have an obligation to offer an alternative that has a better chance for success. To oppose everything while proposing nothing is irresponsible."

Many Democrats, in fact, have proposed alternatives centered around pulling out troops, an idea Bush flatly rejects. So hopes for a bipartisan consensus after Democrats captured Congress in the November midterm elections have evaporated, and Bush appears more isolated than ever.

"We are headed towards quite a donnybrook in Congress," said former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), co-chairman of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, whose plan for withdrawing combat forces by early 2008 was never fully embraced by Bush or Democrats. "We had hoped that there would be more progress towards a more bipartisan approach."

The White House has downscaled its goals and is playing for time. Advisers resign themselves to a nonbinding congressional resolution condemning the troop increase but want to avoid many Republicans voting for it. Former senator Rick

DOJ_NMG_0116799

Santorum (R-Pa.), who lost reelection, called Bush's plan "a step in the right direction" and said Republicans do not want to walk away from Iraq but are "in full political survival mode" now. "It's very hard, particularly if you're on the ballot in two years, to run on the side of the president on anything to do with the war."

The more serious threat to the White House would be a Democratic attempt to restrict funds for more troops. Bush aides said that current funds are enough to get started, and they are counting on the notion that it will take two months until the supplemental appropriation bill providing more war funds comes to a vote. By then, they said, extra troops will be on the ground and it will be too late for Congress to stop them. And they hope for signs of progress that would let them argue that the plan is working.

"This buys us time," said a senior administration official, speaking on the condition of anonymity to discuss strategy. A political strategist who advises the White House added: "The public responds to progress and to events. Every time they can see real progress -- an election, catching Saddam, whatever it is -- they like it." And so if violence can be tamped down, it could defuse some public hostility.

If that happens, the White House hopes the troop buildup then will succeed in bringing enough stability to Baghdad by August that U.S. forces can withdraw to the city outskirts. And officials said it must be sustained. "By the end of the year, Baghdad's got to look significantly different," said a National Security Council official not authorized to speak on the record.

Democrats believe that Bush made a fundamental mistake. Had he embraced the Iraq Study Group, or even made a show of embracing some of its elements, he could have called the Democrats' bluff about wanting to work together, party strategists said. "That would have really jammed us," said a top congressional Democratic aide.

The study group proposed shifting the U.S. mission to support and training, withdrawing combat forces by early 2008, embedding U.S. troops with Iraqi units, threatening to reduce aid to the Iraqi government unless it makes progress, negotiating with Iran and Syria and reinvigorating the Israeli-Arab peace process. But to the consternation of Democrats, the U.S. troop pullout would not be locked into a strict timetable and would depend on ground conditions.

"This was a real missed opportunity," said Leon E. Panetta, a former Clinton White House chief of staff who served on the panel. "No president can conduct a war without the support of the American people and without the support of the Congress. That's the lesson of history." While some officials saw the report as an opportunity to change course, Panetta said, "I think deep down, they viewed it as a sign of weakness to abide by an outside group's recommendation."

Former senator Alan K. Simpson (R-Wyo.), another panel member, said that Bush's plan is "better than the status quo" but voiced disappointment that he did not agree to talk with Syria and Iran. "Nothing is ever solved by not talking to somebody," he said. Simpson said he was stunned by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's statement that Iran could use talks with the United States to extort concessions. "Where did that come from?" he asked. " What the hell is gained by not thinking of some kind of system to talk? It makes no sense."

Now, since Bush has rejected it, some Democrats have begun touting the Iraq Study Group plan as an alternative despite previous misgivings, attempting to position themselves as bipartisan. "We have all endorsed the Iraq Study Group -- that is our plan," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the House Democratic Caucus. The White House denied that it dismissed the report, noting that the panel said it could support a short-term troop increase to help stabilize Baghdad. The panel "gave a lot of very valuable advice, much of which is incorporated into the president's plan," said White House press secretary Tony Snow.

Philip D. Zelikow, who as Rice's counselor was intimately involved in Iraq policymaking before stepping down recently, said great thought was given to how to satisfy at least some Democrats. "If you were in our shoes, what is the approach that would satisfy the Democrats?" he asked. "That's not an easy question to answer" given the diversity of views within the party.

The policy review showed a lack of discipline unusual for the Bush administration. At first, the White House planned to announce a new plan for Iraq before Christmas. Then, amid serious internal disagreement, it postponed it until mid-January. At the same time, the once-leakproof administration poured out details of the debate, making clear that generals were resisting a troop increase.

For all that, some allies said, the administration was doomed to bipartisan criticism regardless of how it handled the review and presentation. "You've got a Democratic Party that doesn't believe in Bush, doesn't believe in the war," said William Kristol, editor of the Weekly Standard. "You've got a Republican Party that thinks Bush cost them the election. They could have done it better, but I'm not sure it would've made much difference."

Yet even Kristol, a strong proponent of sending more troops, expressed aggravation at the White House for not showing more urgency about getting Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus dispatched to the region as the new Middle East commander. Asked why it hasn't happened, Kristol said: "Because it's the Bush administration. Maybe you haven't noticed -- they're not the most competent at executing the war."

An Uphill Push For Public Opinion On Iraq (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13 — Bush administration officials, acknowledging that the war in Iraq may get worse before it gets better, face a daunting public relations challenge as the White House pursues its new strategy to quash the insurgents.

After President Bush's address to the nation this week, in which he promoted his strategy to increase the American military presence in Iraq, his aides conceded that more troops would mean more fighting and possibly more grisly televised images.

That prospect will do little to help the administration as it seeks to build public support for an increasing unpopular war.

Even if all goes according to plan, officials conceded in interviews, early signs of progress will do little to compete with continued or worsening signs of strife.

"They need to engage these guys if they're going to make progress, and yet that's probably going to lead to less favorable news," said Thomas Patterson, a professor at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government. "He's in the position of trying to carry a piano upstairs."

Administration officials said that their strategy to quell the violence in Baghdad was in a race against dwindling public patience, but that it was a race they believed they could win. They said in interviews that they factored a potential spike in violence into the plan, and the effect it would have on public opinion.

They described a likely, initial increase in violence as an inevitable down payment for the better images out of Baghdad they hope will come later, and ultimately, more support for the Iraq campaign.

"The president gets it," said a senior administration official involved in the planning. "He knows public opinion is not going to change until those images on the evening news improve." That official said reaching milestones would help, like a show of readiness by new Iraqi forces, or a new law creating an equitable mechanism to distribute oil revenues across the sectarian divide.

But such benchmarks also give war critics in Congress a more clear-cut way to measure failure, said Dennis Ross, a Middle East envoy for President Clinton and for Mr. Bush's father. "It gives you an actual measure by which to say, 'How are they doing: Are these things happening, or not?' " he said. "In an interesting way what the president has done for the first time is to create benchmarks to evaluate the administration's approach."

Even if the economic and political goals in the plan are swiftly achieved, they will only go so far in affecting public opinion as fighting continues: Images from a signing ceremony for an oil agreement are inevitably less compelling than pictures of exploding cars, charred bodies and American war dead.

The complexities are causing no small bit of anxiety for Mr. Bush's allies, chief among them Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican whose support of a troop increase will be judged on its success during his likely presidential bid in 2008.

Senator McCain said in an interview this week that he did not expect to see significant improvement on the ground in Iraq for "at least a couple of months," adding, "I very much worry about the casualties, from the human side to the political side."

The senator, who has harshly criticized the administration's failure to manage expectations in the past, said of the president, "I would hope he would say how tough this is going to still be."

White House officials said that was the plan. "You've heard the president say before that, as commander in chief, one of his most important responsibilities is informing the public about the course of the war," said Kevin Sullivan, the White House communications director. "You'll see an ongoing effort to do that."

Mr. Bush stopped short of calling for great national sacrifice in his address, something some allies had suggested he do to prepare the public for more rough days ahead. But he did warn, "Our enemies in Iraq will make every effort to ensure that our television screens are filled with images of death and suffering. Yet over time, we can expect to see Iraqi troops chasing down murderers, fewer brazen acts of terror, and growing trust and cooperation from Baghdad's residents."

But for now, Mr. Bush's decision to add troops — despite election results that were widely interpreted as a "no" vote on the war — has been taken as another sign that he is stubbornly going his own way against the public mood, a perception the White House was prepared for, senior administration officials said.

Gambling metaphors were hard to escape this week in the news coverage of the plan, but they applied. The White House calculated that it had to promise a major change to get the public to give its latest new plan a hearing. But it raised the stakes for the administration in the process.

"It's a tremendous gamble — the administration opens itself up to losing control of the policy if it isn't judged as succeeding," said Richard Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations and a former State Department official.

"There's a sense now that, with this, we will have done everything we can."

Democrats Feel Free To Defy Bush On Iraq (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

WASHINGTON — Emboldened by President Bush's deeply unpopular proposal to send more troops to Iraq, congressional Democrats are shedding their wariness about tackling the war and embracing positions once primarily held by the party's most liberal fringe.

Less than two weeks after taking power, party leaders who had promised just an increase in oversight hearings on the war are now talking openly about cutting off funds for additional military operations.

Centrist Democrats are lining up beside longtime antiwar liberals, promising to do everything in their power to stop the president's plans to deploy an additional 21,500 troops in Baghdad and Al Anbar province.

And the war's most passionate opponents in the House, whose last meeting before the midterm election was relegated to a basement room, met last week in one of the grandest rooms on Capitol Hill and drew scores of supporters, television cameras and journalists.

"Ours is now the mainstream position," said Rep. Lynn Woolsey (D-Petaluma), who two years ago saw her resolution calling for the withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq crushed on the House floor. Today, the congressional Out of Iraq Caucus co-founded by Rep. Maxine Waters (D-Los Angeles) has more than 80 members.

Congressional Democrats, suddenly united in their desire to pass resolutions against the escalation, still face challenges in deciding how far to go in what could become a historic showdown between two branches of government over the course of a war. And any move to cut funding may quickly reveal fissures in the Democratic caucus.

The threat to cut off funds for more troops drew a rebuke Saturday from President Bush, who challenged war critics to offer their own plan for Iraq.

"Those who refuse to give this plan a chance to work have an obligation to offer an alternative that has a better chance for success," he said in his weekly radio address. "To oppose everything while proposing nothing is irresponsible."

The Democrats' rapid embrace of what were once minority positions capped an extraordinary week on Capitol Hill as Congress stirred after years of standing by a wartime president.

"It was a wild and woolly week," said Rep. Adam B. Schiff (D-Burbank).

Schiff was one of more than two dozen members of Congress who went to the House floor to condemn the war Thursday. Just one Republican rose to challenge them.

Democrats, who campaigned against the war, seized majorities in the House and Senate last fall largely because of unhappiness with the president's policies.

But when the Democrats returned to Capitol Hill this month, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) and other senior party leaders had planned to focus on a purely domestic agenda.

They cautiously avoided talk of cutting funding or other measures to compel Bush to change course in Iraq. As recently as Monday, Pelosi had refused to discuss possible legislation to limit an escalation in Iraq.

But the next day, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), in a speech laced with references to the mistakes of Vietnam, announced his intention to introduce a bill that would require the president to seek congressional approval for any troop increase in Iraq.

Within hours, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said he would introduce a resolution the following week condemning any White House plans to send additional troops. Pelosi's office quickly announced that House Democrats would do the same.

By the time Bush addressed the nation Wednesday night, congressional Democrats across the ideological spectrum were rallying to oppose the president.

"We have to take a stand…. We have to do everything we can," said Rep. Ellen Tauscher (D-Alamo), a centrist Democrat who said she wanted to sign on to the House version of Kennedy's bill, which is sponsored by one of her chamber's most liberal members.

Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a decorated Vietnam veteran and longtime military supporter, said Friday that he would use his position as chairman of the House appropriations panel's defense subcommittee to try to block funding for any troop increase in Iraq.

Murtha said he also wanted to force the closure of the controversial military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and put limits on how long military service members could be deployed.

A Pelosi spokesman said the speaker had encouraged Murtha to explore the funding limitations.

The same day, in a mark of how much has changed in Washington, House Republican leaders held a sober meeting to air complaints from their members about the president's plans.

"It was not a typical conference," said Rep. Adam H. Putnam (R-Fla.), choosing his words carefully. Putnam is the No. 3 leader in a caucus that until recently rarely showed public signs of dissent.

By contrast, Pelosi and House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) have urged House Democrats to be aggressive in exploring legislative options for winding down the war, Rep. Stephen F. Lynch (D-Mass.) said.

Some Democrats remain wary of moving too quickly to try to cut funding, and it was unclear whether they could succeed.

Reid must contend with Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), who has said he will try to block a resolution, forcing Democrats to get 60 votes. The Democratic caucus has 51 members.

Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), a fierce war critic who chairs the House Appropriations Committee, said Friday that, because of the complexity of the defense budget, he doubted that Congress would be able to find a way to selectively prohibit spending for a troop buildup.

"I don't know how the hell you do it," Obey said, pointing to the tortuous efforts by Congress two decades ago to limit funding for military operations in Central America.

Bush has signaled that he would not be deterred by congressional opposition. "I made my decision. We're going forward," Bush said in an interview with "60 Minutes" to be broadcast tonight.

But today, the president no longer can count on a Congress of Republicans who are unwavering in their loyalty and Democrats who are cowed by the fear of being labeled weak on defense.

And public support for the president and the war has plummeted. Some polling shows dissatisfaction with Bush's plans has reached 70%.

"The public is so disillusioned," Democratic strategist Mark Mellman said, "that we've gotten to the point where people think the war has actually made us less safe."

And that has made it increasingly safe for Democrats to challenge the White House.

"There definitely is a feeling of liberation," said Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.), a staunch war opponent who was in Congress when it last put limits on an unpopular war more than 30 years ago.

"The question now is not if, but how, we get out of Iraq and when. The whole nature of the debate has changed."

Choices Dwindle If Iraq War Plan Fails (AP)

By Calvin Woodward, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 14, 2007

If the revamped Iraq war plan fails, it will be time to withdraw most U.S. troops. Or send more in. The United States is seen as having a limited number of options, all grim, if President Bush's "new way forward" hits a wall. The pressure for U.S. disengagement will be immense. Yet a further escalation, however unimaginable now, may not be out of the question.

Few expect helicopters to beat the air over Baghdad in a hasty retreat of the kind that closed the books on America's defeat in Vietnam. The Mideast and its oil are too important.

"We were able to walk away from Vietnam," said Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain, who was a prisoner of war there. "If we walk away on Iraq, we'll be back, possibly in the context of a wider war in the world's most volatile region."

The administration is almost certainly considering fallback options if the latest plan falls apart. Officials are loath to talk about them.

Over two days of intense hearings on Capitol Hill last week, lawmakers raised questions at the margins about a Plan B even as they probed and for the most part attacked Plan A: Bush's move to increase U.S. forces to give Iraqis more time to take control of their own security.

Administration officials, defending a war that many in the U.S. and much of the world thinks is failing already, would not discuss what options will be left if the new approach fails. "Re-evaluate our strategy," Defense Secretary Robert Gates said.

Yet he hinted that the planned troop increase need not take place in its entirety if conditions change. "We are trying to construct this in a way that there are off-ramps," he said, so that "you don't necessarily have to go to the full extent of the buildup."

Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, testified, "You're asking a Marine who's focused on winning whether he has a plan in case he doesn't win."

"Yes," came the response from Rep. Kirsten Gillibrand, D-N.Y.

Pace would not address the question. Nor would he discuss any exit strategy — a "pejorative get-out-of-town" phrase he said he did not like.

But if the plan does not work, he said, "our flow of forces will allow us to modify what we do next."

Bush's plan to add 21,500 more U.S. troops to the 132,000 already in Iraq will add to the stress on a military already overburdened and force longer and more frequent tours of duty on combat troops. An additional escalation would intensify the problem — with no ready solutions on how it would be achieved.

DOJ_NMG_0116803

Those who favor Bush's plan and many who oppose it are in striking agreement the consequences will be dire if it flops. Gates echoed the Iraq Study Group in outlining some of the likely results of failure in Iraq. He mentioned:

_Undermined U.S. credibility.

_Risk of a regional conflagration.

_An emboldened Iran.

_A "humiliating" defeat against extremism worldwide.

_A haven for terrorist networks in the heart of the Middle East.

"Should we withdraw prematurely, we could well leave chaos and the disintegration of Iraq behind us," Gates said.

Just as success in the fight against terrorism cannot be marked by a surrender on a battleship — as the administration likes to recall, the way Japan ended World War II — failure cannot be neatly defined in Iraq. Bush set benchmarks, but no timetable for the Iraqi government to meet them. Violence on the street ranges between terrible and worse.

But if a failure that no one can deny comes about, what then?

"I don't know what the administration does at that point," said Ted Galen Carpenter of the libertarian Cato Institute. Bush could propose another escalation or just pull out and take the hit on U.S. credibility, he said.

"This is the foreign policy equivalent of having invested in the stock of Worldcom or Enron," Carpenter said. "The longer you stay, the worse it gets. It's not easy to withdraw. It's just better than staying."

There is no shortage of suggestions from people who think they have a better idea. Among them are an Iraqi version of the Depression-era Civilian Conservation Corps; mobile fingerprinting devices to track the worst thugs on the street; accelerated reopening of abandoned factories; a greater U.S. effort against al-Qaida in Anbar province, less against the sectarian warriors.

Kevin Ryan, a retired Army brigadier general who specialized in strategy and now is at Harvard, said some U.S. troops should be engaged in training and security no matter what becomes of the bulk of the force.

He said the U.S. should be reducing forces now and settling the remaining troops in for a long haul. "We are sprinting when we should be running a long-distance race," he said, predicting there will be no further escalation.

"Any further surges would just cause more damage to our ground forces' readiness," he said. "Even if you could magically create trained soldiers ... you don't have the equipment."

Failure of the plan also would intensify pressure on the administration to enlist countries of the Middle East in what is left of Iraq's security. Bush might have to bend on his refusal to deal directly with Iran and Syria, but from a position of weakness.

___

Associated Press writers Pauline Jelinek, Robert Burns and Nancy Benac contributed to this report.

Bush Stands By Iraq Invasion (LAT)

By David Savage And Solomon Moore, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

The president acknowledges that some 'decisions have made things unstable,' but says Iraqis owe the U.S.

WASHINGTON — The United States was right to invade Iraq, but choices made after the initial invasion have eroded security in the country, President Bush said in a television interview to be broadcast today.

"I think history is going to look back and see a lot of ways we could have done things better," Bush said in the interview, which will be aired on CBS' "60 Minutes" program.

Questioned about the current instability in Iraq, Bush said, "Well, no question decisions have made things unstable."

But he maintained that invading Iraq in 2003 was the right thing to do.

"My decision to remove Saddam Hussein was the correct decision, in my judgment," he said. "We didn't find the weapons we thought we would find, or the weapons everybody thought he had. But he was a significant source of instability."

"Iraqi people owe the American people a huge debt of gratitude," he said.

Bush's comments come as his new plan to send 21,500 additional U.S. troops to secure Iraq's capital and shore up forces fighting the insurgency in Al Anbar province is attracting sharp criticism from members of Congress.

In his Saturday radio address, Bush also said his new plan could succeed, because "American forces will have a green light to enter neighborhoods that are home to those fueling sectarian violence."

U.S. forces have been restricted by the Iraqi prime minister from operating freely in the Sadr City area that is home to Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr's Al Mahdi militia. But Bush said those restrictions had been lifted and that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki had promised that he would not tolerate interference with security operations.

Bush also challenged members of Congress who were critical of the plan to come up with their own proposals.

"To oppose everything while proposing nothing is irresponsible," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0116804

But Rep. Timothy J. Walz, a newly elected Democrat from Minnesota who served in the war in Afghanistan, called Bush's plan "a step in the wrong direction — more of the same at the very time we need a new direction in Iraq."

"We need diplomatic and political solutions in Iraq, not more American troops," he said in the Democrats' Saturday radio address.

Many Iraqi leaders also have attacked the plan.

Sadr has emerged as one of the fiercest critics of the continued American presence in Iraq.

In a news conference Saturday in Najaf, Sadr representative Sheik Abdul Razzaq Naddawi warned Bush "not to commit foolishness" and attack Sadr followers.

If they are attacked, he said, "the Shiites will become an explosive belt."

"Anyone who is attacked must respond," Naddawi said. "In Islam, we must respond."

In Baghdad Saturday, police patrols discovered 37 bodies, all of the victims middle-aged men apparently killed by gunfire. Some of the bodies showed signs of torture. In southeast Baghdad, a woman was killed by a mortar round.

In the southern Iraqi town of Samawa, police said that gunmen killed three brothers, and that the charred body of an Egyptian employee of the municipal government was discovered in a trash bin.

Three mutilated corpses were discovered in the southern city of Kut, among them that of a beheaded Iraqi soldier. Kut morgue officials also reported that a police officer was killed while traveling home from work.

Gunmen in Samarra, north of Baghdad, killed a prominent Sunni Arab cleric and political party operative in front of his house, and in a separate incident a policeman was shot to death.

David.savage@latimes.com moore1@latimes.com

Savage reported from Washington and Moore from Baghdad. Special correspondents in Baghdad and Kirkuk, Najaf, Kut, Samarra, Samawa and Hilla, Iraq, contributed to this report.

A GOP Lawmaker Grapples With Troop Escalation (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

Rep. Charlie Dent wrestled all week with President Bush's plan to send more U.S. troops to Iraq.

On Monday, the two-term Republican from eastern Pennsylvania told a hometown reporter that it would take "a pretty hard sell" for Bush to win him over. He fretted Wednesday about the Iraqis: "Are they going to be up to the task?" By Thursday evening, 24 hours after Bush's address from the White House library, he was nursing huge doubts and a jumble of emotions.

"I'm very skeptical, I'm very concerned," Dent said wearily, slumping in a leather chair in his office. "What would be the mission of our troops? I'm not sure the president addressed it."

Dent has reason to worry. He won reelection in November by a surprisingly narrow margin against an obscure opponent, and Democrats have no intention of letting him off easily again. Depending on the course of the war, Iraq could prove an even bigger impediment for Republicans in 2008.

Like many of his colleagues, Dent spent much of last week trying to hone a response to Bush's plan. Would he join other vulnerable 2008 Republicans, such as Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Norm Coleman of Minnesota, in throwing cold water on an escalation? Or would he take a more cautious, wait-and-see stance? After speaking with aides, associates and other lawmakers who belong to the Tuesday Group, an alliance of mainstream House Republicans, Dent decided on a blended approach.

"I think we have the obligation to process this a little bit," he said carefully. "But I still think the president has to make a case, a strong case. He's got a lot of selling left to do."

Republican reaction to the troop escalation plan has ranged from lukewarm to hostile. The negative statements that piled up Wednesday night after Bush's speech revealed a deepening political schism between a president whose campaign days are behind him and congressional Republicans who must face voters in two short years.

The GOP resistance first flamed in the Senate. "The most significant thing we saw today are where the Republican senators are who are up for reelection," Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.) remarked Thursday afternoon. But within hours, several Republican letters of opposition were circulating in the House, including one that was sitting on Dent's coffee table as he pondered what to do. House Republican leaders called a meeting Friday morning to allow members to vent, and Bush invited Republican leaders to Camp David this weekend to smooth concerns.

To Democrats, the message from voters in November was clear. "The American people want a change of direction in Iraq," said Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "They certainly did not have in mind a major escalation."

DOJ_NMG_0116805

The first test for Dent and other Republicans will come when nonbinding resolutions opposing the surge are taken up in the House and the Senate, possibly later this month. "Congressman Dent is going to be on the front line of having to make that decision," Van Hollen noted.

Dent caught a break in November. Although he represents a moderate district centered in the Lehigh Valley -- he has dubbed it "Deep Purple" -- Democrats failed to recruit a seasoned candidate to run against him. Instead, Dent faced Charles Dertinger, a little-known county councilman who spent just $66,000 on his grass-roots campaign. Dent spent more than $1 million, but he captured just 53 percent of the vote.

"People thought I was on a fool's errand," Dertinger said wryly. "But the war changed everything. I proved that it could be done."

Dent said little about Iraq during his 2004 campaign, and he spent his early months in Congress reading up on the conflict and talking to colleagues. He took a practical view: We're there, so what next?

In August, the congressman visited Iraq. He traveled to Basra and Kirkuk, toured a power plant under construction, and met with a judge in the Saddam Hussein trial. He spoke with troops from Pennsylvania and to Army Gens. John P. Abizaid and George W. Casey Jr.

His assessment afterward was upbeat. "Ultimately, life is slowly but gradually returning to normal," Dent told reporters. "There is a lot of room for optimism here. There's really no choice but to be optimistic at this point. It's just a matter of patience and will."

Although sectarian violence had been steadily increasing, Dent said he believed the American commitment in Iraq was reaching its peak. Once Iraq had a constitution in place, Dent said he assumed that the United States "would continue in a training role and sometime in 2006, start to draw down a bit." Instead, he said, "the Sunni insurgency went nuclear, and we've pretty much been struggling since then."

As the 2006 midterm elections approached, Dent's strategy was to repeat his successful approach from two years earlier of talking about Iraq as little as possible. "He never said a word during the campaign about the war," Dertinger said.

After his reelection, one of Dent's few expansive statements came in early December, when he offered enthusiastic support for the bipartisan Iraq Study Group report. Weeks later, when rumors of a new White House strategy began to circulate, he was disappointed that the report's numerous recommendations seemed to have been ignored. Dent's first thought upon hearing the word "surge" was that "the time to increase the presence of the force was two years ago."

Like many lawmakers, the congressman speaks to all sorts of people back home -- the contingent of anti-war Quakers he met with earlier last week, friends who served in the military, families of local soldiers.

One person he regularly speaks with is John Brinson, a West Point graduate and local conservative political commentator who owns a chain of fitness clubs in Dent's district. "I'm going to advise him to be quiet about the war and support the president 100 percent," Brinson said. "In fact, I'm going to call him right now and tell him that."

Nancy Tate, coordinator of the LEPOCO Peace Center, which has staged demonstrations at Dent's district office, has castigated the congressman "for being right down the line with Bush." But she said Dent's recent comments suggesting that he may oppose the escalation "are very encouraging."

"The public wants us to be successful," Dent said. "At the same time, their patience is not indefinite."

He doesn't endorse the withdrawal timetable that Tate's group has pressured him to accept, nor does he accept Brinson's lockstep loyalty. "There's a right way and a wrong way to leave, and I think most people understand that," Dent said.

'Surge' Plan Put At Risk By Politics, General Says (WT)

By Philip Sherwell, London Sunday Telegraph

The Washington Times, January 14, 2007

The military architect of the Iraq troop "surge" plan is criticizing the Bush administration, claiming the Pentagon is watering down the proposal for political reasons.

"You cannot try and do this piecemeal. We have to implement the whole package," retired Gen. John M. Keane told the Sunday Telegraph. The former Army vice chief of staff co-authored the "Choosing Victory" strategy paper, the main points of which were adopted by President Bush for his Iraq war plan.

Gen. Keane expressed his alarm after Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates testified on Capitol Hill that the troop buildup was expected to last "a matter of months" -- rather than the 18 months proposed by Gen. Keane.

Mr. Gates also said the full deployment of 21,500 additional troops, announced by Mr. Bush last week, might not be implemented. He suggested that only two or three of the five brigades proposed for Baghdad could be deployed initially, while the rest are held in reserve.

DOJ_NMG_0116806

"That makes no military sense, although it might seem to make political sense," Gen. Keane said. President Bush has been criticized in the past for not listening to the advice of his top generals.

"We need all five brigades in Baghdad as soon as possible. It will take three to four months to clear neighborhoods of death squads and insurgents, and at least the rest of the year to establish proper security for the population," Gen. Keane said. "If you only wanted to stage a clearance operation, you could do that in a few months. But if we left then, the militia would just return as they have in the past."

Mr. Bush's plans have been condemned by Democrats and some Republicans.

Sen. Chuck Hagel, Nebraska Republican, predicted last week that the plan would be "the most dangerous foreign-policy blunder in the country since Vietnam -- if it is carried out."

Some Democratic members of Congress are exploring the possibility of blocking funding for additional troops in Iraq.

In Iraq, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki raised fresh concerns about his commitment to the new strategy when he appointed a little-known officer, Lt. Gen. Abud Qanbar, as his military commander for Baghdad -- despite objections from senior U.S. officers and concerns that he may have sectarian ties.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, who was visiting Baghdad yesterday, sounded a less-optimistic tone than she has in the past about the situation in Iraq. The likely presidential candidate, who supported the invasion, described the situation as "heartbreaking" and said she doubted that the American people thought the U.S. mission could succeed.

Meanwhile, Iraqi insurgents allied to al Qaeda declared Mr. Bush's surge plan a victory and boasted that the extra U.S. troops would give them fresh targets.

Damien McElroy in Baghdad contributed to this article.

Maliki Aides Warm Slowly To Bush's Latest Iraq Policy (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 13 (AP) — Warming from its initial response this week, the Iraqi prime minister's office on Saturday expressed support for President Bush's new war strategy. But it continued to emphasize that the Iraqi government would retain control over all military action in Baghdad, and Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki maintained a public silence on the issue.

Mr. Bush announced Thursday that he would send more than 20,000 additional combat troops to Iraq, with most bound for Baghdad, the capital, in an effort to set up round-the-clock security operations.

Mr. Maliki's government, however, initially gave what appeared to be grudging acceptance of the plan at best. His spokesman, Ali al-Dabbagh, emphasized that the government's ultimate goal was to ensure a permanent withdrawal of American troops. But if the increase would help security for Iraq, he said, "the government, for sure, will not stand against it."

He also asserted Baghdad's right to demand changes. "We will tell the American administration to amend any point that we feel is not suitable," he told reporters then.

On Saturday, however, Mr. Dabbagh's tone was more positive toward the plan, saying that the prime minister saw the new security strategy as representing "a common vision and a mutual understanding between the Iraqi government and the American administration."

He added, "The Iraqi government affirms that security and stability in Iraq is a strategic necessity to the people of the region and the world since terrorism is a threat to everyone."

Mr. Dabbagh reiterated that American forces would be working in support of the Iraqis as they apply Mr. Maliki's new security plan to restore peace in Baghdad, which he announced in a speech on Jan. 6. The prime minister said then that he would fight against "safe haven for any outlaws, regardless of sectarian or political affiliation."

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, the New York Democrat who has opposed Mr. Bush's plans to send more troops, arrived in Iraq on Saturday.

Senator Clinton was traveling with Senator Evan Bayh, Democrat of Indiana, and Representative John M. McHugh, a Republican from upstate New York. The three, all members of armed services committees, were to meet with Iraqi officials and American military commanders. They also planned to go to Afghanistan.

A sniper killed a policeman walking on a street in the commercial district of Karada in central Baghdad on Saturday, and a bomb in a parked car struck a mixed neighborhood in a western neighborhood, wounding three civilians.

At least five people also were killed in attacks in northern Iraq, including two Iraqi contractors who were checking a bridge in Kirkuk and a Shiite grocery store owner.Mr. Maliki, who outlined an Iraqi-led security plan to Mr. Bush when they met in Amman, Jordan, in November, has argued for Americans to pull out of cities and leave security to the Iraqi Army, which is 80 percent Shiite.

An Iraqi general said this week that the army intended to put nine brigades on the streets of Baghdad, or a total of about 27,000 men.

DOJ_NMG_0116807

The military officer said for the most part the Iraqi force would not be directed against the Shiite militias, including the dominant Mahdi Army. The majority of fighting against the Mahdi Army would be left to the Americans in tandem with the Iraqi Special Operations forces.

Among Troops And Families, Mixed Reaction To American Expansion In Iraq (NYT)

By N. R. Kleinfield

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

Cpl. Michael Hubert, 22, will see war for the first time in April. The corporal is part of the infusion of troops being poured into Iraq under President Bush's new plan, and as he weighed his coming departure at Galloping Gertie's, a soldier-thick watering hole outside Fort Lewis, Wash., he was brimming with confidence.

"We're going to go over and change things," Corporal Hubert said.

In eastern Pennsylvania, as Heidi DeBlock absorbed the implications of the president's words during his televised address, she said she felt otherwise: "numb."

"I could write a book about how I feel, but he's O.K. with it," Ms. DeBlock said of her husband, Sgt. Andrew DeBlock. "He says he has a job to do and takes his job pretty seriously."

Mr. Bush's new approach means that Sergeant DeBlock, 41, a member of the New Jersey National Guard (the Blocks recently moved to Pennsylvania from New Jersey), will have his Iraq stay extended by four months.

Sergeant DeBlock, home on a brief break, chose to ignore Mr. Bush as he spoke on television. He busied himself vacuuming the house.

The decision to increase the American military presence in Iraq is being greeted with a blend of optimism and anxiety among American soldiers and their families, those most directly affected by the change. Unlike in Congressional corridors and across the civilian landscape of the country, there seems far more support than outrage, more cheer than cheerlessness, and a hope that maybe this will do it.

At the same time, especially among relatives of National Guard members dispatched to battlefields they never expected to stand on, there is plentiful disappointment and even anger at the prospect of prolonged disruptions in lives that have not been normal for a long time.

The expansion calls for more than 20,000 additional troops, including five active-duty combat brigades, to be sent to Iraq in the next few months. Some National Guard units will have their tours lengthened. The Pentagon has also relaxed the rules for mobilizing Guard members, so that units will return to battle quicker than anticipated.

The fresh troops will include nearly 4,000 members of the Second Infantry Division, Fourth Brigade, a front-line combat unit based at Fort Lewis. They leave in April, about a month earlier than previously planned.

Fort Lewis, the nation's third-largest military installation, has already felt the price and pain of the war. It has had 89 soldiers die in Iraq. A "Word of the Month" is posted at one of the base's exit, succinct wisdom for departing replacements. This month's word is "risk."

Corporal Hubert, 22, a reconnaissance specialist, said the troop increase made sense. "It seems like they're really starting to have a stronger focus and to embed troops, which I like to see," he said. "It's more aggressive and more supportive."

Sgt. James Mayotte, an infantry leader in the Fourth Brigade who was visiting Galloping Gertie's the other morning, was more restrained. "If it works, it's a great idea," Sergeant Mayotte said. "I don't personally like having anyone over there, but if it's good for the country...."

At Fort Benning, Ga., where several combat units are returning early to Iraq, soldiers generally seemed supportive of the change.

"I think we have to do something about what's going on in Baghdad," said First Lt. Jonathon Draper, 28, who has already spent a year in Iraq. "We'll get the job done, whatever the president says."

Staff Sgt. Shwon Brooks, 29, who has yet to go to war, said, "I kind of figured it was going to happen, but I thought it was going to be in the summer."

Sgt. Kyle Cullen finished a deployment to Iraq a year ago and is not happy about returning. "I think sending more troops is not the way to go," Sergeant Cullen said. "That will just be adding more to get killed."

Sergeant Cullen enlisted for four years, and said he planned to leave the Army when he returned.

The new approach has a pronounced impact on National Guard members, who must vacate civilian jobs to serve. Protocol had been to limit Guard members' mobilization to no more than a cumulative total of 24 months every five years, but now reservists who have been deployed within the last five years can be summoned again, though the intention is to keep a new tour to no more than a year.

At the Manor Road Armory in West Brighton, Staten Island, members of the 41st Infantry Division offered competing views.

DOJ_NMG_0116808

"I think they should let them all come home; they're over there for no reason," said Pvt. Diana Ware, 20. "I know I don't want to go. I joined the National Guard to go to college." Private Ware's goal is to become a nurse.

Specialist Douglas Block, 40, a father of four, saw things otherwise. "The more troops you have, the better it is," Specialist Block said. "If they would have done this from the beginning, we'd be out of there by now."

Under the new thrust, various Guard members already fighting in Iraq will remain months longer; they include a reconnaissance unit of the 117th Cavalry of the New Jersey National Guard. Its members had been slated to return by early April, after a year's service, but now are likely to stay until sometime in July.

Salvatore DelRosario, of Staten Island, whose brother, Sgt. Ronald DelRosario, is in Iraq with the 117th Cavalry, was dispirited by the news. "It all seems for naught," Mr. DelRosario said. "It would have been nice to have him home sooner, but he's doing what he wants."

Ms. DeBlock, the Pennsylvania resident whose husband's stay will be extended by four months, said — as other Guard families did — that the extended assignments, and the lost income involved, complicated their lives.

Ms. DeBlock has had to battle her heating-fuel company, which wanted cash up front, and her husband's cellphone provider, which will not let him out of his contract even though he is off fighting a war.

The Minnesota National Guard brigade of Specialist Isaac Pratt, 22, is having its active duty tour extended by about four months. Specialist Pratt called his parents a week ago, excited about coming home soon, only to find out a few days later that everything had changed.

"He's disappointed," said his father, John Pratt. "But at the same time, he senses that you can't just leave Iraqis high and dry over there."

For parents of children killed in Iraq, the war tears in different ways.

Debi Qualtieri, a registered nurse in Norwalk, Conn., said she always believed in the war, and still does, though her son, Sgt. Jonathan Lootens, of Lyon, N.Y., was killed in Iraq in October.

Ms. Qualtieri said she supported the escalation in troops, and had in fact been hoping for it. "I wish they had done it earlier, having spoken to my son when he was there," she said. "He thought they needed more troops."

Annette Brown has supported the war from the beginning, and continues to do so, but with reservations. Her son, Lance Cpl. Donald Brown, a marine, was killed at the end of October, and another son, Kenneth Brown, 24, has served three tours with the Marines in Iraq. He returned home last September.

Ms. Brown said she agreed with the troop increase "if it would settle things down over there so the guys can come home."

But she does not want Kenneth to be part of it, and when she recently spoke to him, he told her he did not want to go back. Ms. Brown, a bank supervisor who lives in Succasunna, N.J., said, "I told him I'll do whatever I have to so you don't have to go back."

The Goal: Admitting Failure, Without Being A Failure (NYT)

By David Greenberg

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

PRESIDENT BUSH'S speech Wednesday night had to strike a perfect pitch. He had to defend the war that will define his legacy while admitting to enough error to regain credibility with the public. Consequently, commentators are still trying to figure out whether he conceded mistakes, showed regret or intends to change course at all.

In this respect, Mr. Bush's speech follows in that great American oratorical tradition: the presidential mea culpa.

Figuring out how to acknowledge failure without seeming like a failure is a time-honored occupational hazard of politics. But not until the 20th century did presidents govern mainly by mobilizing public opinion through rhetoric, and only with the rise of broadcasting did the celebrated "televised speech to the nation" become a staple of White House damage control.

While these confessions may work in the short term, they rarely work long-term magic. That typically requires a new course of action.

Ronald Reagan, for example, gave a relatively tepid mea culpa in addressing a Senate commission's findings that he hadn't leveled with the public in the Iran-contra scandal.

"A few months ago I told the American people I did not trade arms for hostages," he said in March 1987. "My heart and my best intentions still tell me that's true, but the facts and the evidence tell me it is not."

But President Reagan won praise for taking responsibility, and, more critically, for committing to an overhaul of White House personnel and policy. He renounced the covert wrongdoings of his former aides and eventually struck a landmark arms-control treaty with the Soviet Union.

Another buck-stops-here performance was John F. Kennedy's press conference after the Bay of Pigs, when American-backed Cuban rebels were routed in a bid to overthrow Fidel Castro.

DOJ_NMG_0116809

"Victory has a hundred fathers, but defeat is an orphan," President Kennedy said, concluding, "I am the responsible officer of the government."

His popularity soared. Over time, what sealed his reputation was his later calls for a re-evaluation of the cold war and for a nuclear test-ban treaty. Other presidents have failed to capitalize on their dramatic speeches. In March 1968, Lyndon Johnson called a halt to bombing in Vietnam and ended his re-election bid, while vowing to redouble his efforts to achieve peace. But the goodwill faded as he kept the Democratic presidential nominee, Vice President Hubert Humphrey, tethered to a failed strategy until it was too late.

Similarly, in 1992, President George H. W. Bush gained little benefit from his 1992 apology for breaking his no-new-taxes pledge. "I did it, and I regret it and I regret it," he told a newspaper, as he tried to fend off a challenge from Pat Buchanan in the Republican primaries. But Mr. Bush's many reversals — vowing no new taxes, raising them, then recanting — only made him seem fickle and opportunistic, alienating both left and right.

Most tellingly, the master of the confession, Richard Nixon, tried in April 1973 to stanch the hemorrhaging from the Watergate scandal by unloading three of his top aides and declaring a fresh start.

"I was determined that we should get to the bottom of the matter, and that the truth should be fully brought out — no matter who was involved," he said. That turned out to be a lie, and he lost his credibility all over again.

Sometimes, if the public supports a president, he doesn't need to change course at all. When President Bill Clinton acknowledged in August 1998 that he misrepresented his relationship with Monica Lewinsky, Washington pundits said his speech was a disaster. But it turned out that most of the public considered Mr. Clinton's initial show of remorse sufficient and thought the impeachment drive should end. His administration remained popular, while displeasure with the news media rose.

Of course, some presidents simply acted as if no apology were needed. Dwight Eisenhower refused to admit he'd erred after his administration lied about a U-2 spy plane shot down over the Soviet Union. He withstood sharp criticism and the unraveling of a planned Soviet summit. .

"These activities have their own rules and methods of concealment, which seek to mislead and obscure," President Eisenhower said at a press conference on May 11, 1960. That the most prominent figure pressing for an apology was the Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev certainly made life easier.

Throughout his presidency, Mr. Bush has been faulted for being too stubborn and unwilling to change, admit error or say he's sorry. But owning up to blunders is not always a ticket to forgiveness.

After President Clinton apologized on his 1998 trip to Africa for the American role in the slave trade and for his administration's passivity during the Rwandan genocide, his habit of contrition became a running joke. So much so that at the White House correspondents' dinner that spring, he delivered deadpan apologies for disco, pineapple on pizza and the Susan B. Anthony dollar.

"It did look too much like a quarter," Mr. Clinton admitted. "And that was wrong."

Picking Up The Pieces (NYT)

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

It was surreal how disconnected President Bush was the other night, both from Iraq's horrifying reality and America's anguish over this unnecessary, mismanaged and now unwinnable war. Indeed, most Americans seem far ahead of the president. They understand that what the country urgently needs is for Mr. Bush to chart a way out of Iraq that also limits the chaos that will be left behind.

The president's disconnect goes far to explain the harshly critical reaction of Congress and the public to his plan to further bleed America's overstretched forces by sending some 20,000 additional troops in an attempt to impose peace on Baghdad's vengeful streets. He proposes to do that without any enforceable commitments from the Iraqi government that it will take the necessary political steps that are the only hope for tamping down a spiraling civil war.

There are no really satisfying answers in Iraq, since all of the remaining options are bad. Still, some are notably worse than others, and Mr. Bush has come up with possibly the worst. He would mortgage thousands more American lives and what remains of Washington's credibility in the region to a destructively sectarian Shiite government that he seems unwilling or unable to influence or restrain.

.

Unlike Mr. Bush's views on the American military presence in Iraq, our views have evolved as the evident realities on the ground have changed. At the outset, although we opposed Mr. Bush's invasion, we hoped the United States military could provide enough security to allow an elected government to build the foundations of national unity and eventual democracy.

DOJ_NMG_0116810

As it became increasingly clear that Iraqi political leaders had other, less noble intentions, we still hoped that a substantial American military presence could be used to shield innocent civilians from the growing violence, train reliable and professional Iraqi security forces to take over that task, and exert leverage on Iraqi leaders to follow a less divisive and destructive course.

Now, with Mr. Bush unwilling or unable to persuade Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki to take the minimum steps necessary to justify any deeper American commitment, we recognize that even that has become unrealistic. Mr. Maliki gave the latest White House plan an even chillier reception than it received in the United States Congress, boycotting a Thursday news conference in Baghdad announcing it. He apparently would have preferred to see American forces sent to fight Sunni insurgents in western Anbar Province, leaving Baghdad as a free-fire zone for his Shiite militia partners.

But even knowing all that, America cannot simply wash its hands of Iraq and go home. The region's problems, many of them made worse by this war, are unavoidably America's problems as well. For starters, Iraq is in imminent danger of violently breaking apart, driving millions of refugees across its borders — who will bring with them their ethnic grievances, and in some cases their weapons — and potentially unleashing a chain reaction of regional conflicts that could draw in Turkey, Saudi Arabia, Iran and perhaps others as well.

.

Whatever else happens, Iran has already become more formidable and dangerous. Where it once had a hostile Saddam Hussein on its western border, it now has a friendly Shiite fundamentalist government. Its other longtime enemy, the United States, has had its diplomatic and military clout severely diminished by this war.

The expanding power of a revolutionary, Shiite Iran is profoundly unsettling to the conservative Sunni-led governments in most of the Arab Middle East, which have been America's traditional allies in the region. If the United States is to recoup any of its standing and influence there, it will have to find a way to contain the chaos in Iraq. And it will have to do a lot more to address other concerns of these governments and their people, starting with a genuine and sustained effort to mediate a peace agreement between Israel and the Palestinians.

If Mr. Bush does persist in sending more American troops to Baghdad, despite Congress's amply justified opposition, he will have to establish clear lines of command that assure that those troops can enter the strongholds of the Shiite militias responsible for much of the violence without militia leaders' being tipped off by allies in the Iraqi government.

And so long as any American troops remain in Iraq, Mr. Bush must put serious pressure on Mr. Maliki to support the troops' efforts with a genuine program of national reconciliation. That must include, at a minimum, ridding the police and other security services of killers, torturers and criminals and disarming all sectarian militias.

The government must also assure that Iraqi oil revenues are fairly shared out among the entire Iraqi population. And it must move quickly to offer an amnesty to Sunni insurgents willing to put down their weapons, and narrow the legal restrictions on former Baath Party members so that Sunni professionals can once again fully participate in Iraqi national life.

These benchmarks should be accompanied by fixed timelines. And they must be accompanied with a clear message that the United States is prepared to withdraw its troops if the Iraqis continue to refuse to take responsibility for their own future. Mr. Bush and other American officials need to make clear that as much as the United States will suffer from a complete collapse in Iraq, Iraq's leaders will suffer far worse from the loss of their American protectors.

Mr. Bush should reinforce that message by convening a conference of all of Iraq's neighbors to discuss how they can help stabilize Iraq — and what they can do to contain the wider chaos should it come. With nearly two million Iraqis already seeking refuge, mainly in Syria and Jordan, it is far past time for American officials to begin their own planning and relief efforts.

If Mr. Bush refuses to deliver this ultimatum to Mr. Maliki, Congress will have to do so in his stead. That's not the usual division of labor between the executive and legislative branches, but it is one that Mr. Bush has made necessary by his refusal to face realities. The potential consequences of his failed leadership are so serious that neither the new Democratic majorities in Congress, nor the public at large, can afford the luxury of merely criticizing from the sidelines.

.

So far, Congress is off to an encouraging start, holding substantive oversight hearings and asking probing questions of administration officials for the first time in too many years. Similarly encouraging has been the bipartisan character of this reinvigorated oversight. The Congress should continue asking hard questions. And it must insist on real answers before acting on any new requests for money to support Mr. Bush's plans to send more troops to Baghdad. Congress has the authority to attach conditions to that money, imposing benchmarks and timetables on Mr. Bush, who then would be forced to impose them on the Iraqi government.

One immediate step could be a set of bipartisan resolutions spelling out the broad policy directions Congress expects the president to pursue on Iraq. That would send a useful message to the American people that lawmakers are listening to their concerns, if Mr. Bush is not, and also to Iraq's leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0116811

It's now up to Congress to force the president to live up to his constitutional responsibilities and rescue this country from the consequences of one of its worst strategic blunders in modern times.

History will surely blame Mr. Bush for leading America into Iraq, but it will blame Congress if it does not act to push him onto a more realistic path.

Congressional Pushback (WP)

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

THE POLITICAL tempest that has greeted President Bush's latest plan for Iraq is largely of the president's making. Mr. Bush could have forged a bipartisan consensus if he had embraced the military strategy laid out by the Iraq Study Group, which was in keeping with proposals by the Iraqi government, U.S. military commanders and leading members of Congress. Instead, he chose to embrace an option -- the dispatch of additional American soldiers to Baghdad and Anbar province -- that has the support of less than 20 percent of Americans and maybe even fewer Iraqis. It's not even clear that the Iraqi government is entirely on board.

We don't think Mr. Bush went out of his way to pick the battle he now has with the new Democratic-controlled Congress. No doubt he has been convinced that the deployment of more troops is the only way to turn the situation in Iraq around. The White House, however, seems to have undervalued the importance of having broad public support before sending more troops into combat, with the inevitable spike in casualties that will cause. The intense criticism that has come from both houses and both parties in Congress is understandable, and justified.

So are some of the questions raised in congressional hearings at the end of the week. Chief among them is why the president would commit thousands of American soldiers to a pacification mission in Baghdad when success is heavily dependent on the Iraqi government's performance in areas where it has failed repeatedly. Republicans and Democrats alike have asked what the administration's response will be if Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki once again fails to deliver on promises to deploy Iraqi troops, tackle Shiite militias and strike political compromises. They have asked how long the "surge" can go on without overtaxing the Army and the reserves.

For the most part, the answers offered in public by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates have been vague or evasive. But these officials and others have repeatedly pointed out that it will be possible to judge quickly whether the Iraqi government is doing what is needed -- and that those judgments can be made before most of the five additional U.S. brigades are deployed. For example, the three additional Iraqi brigades promised for Baghdad, with an additional 8,000 troops, are supposed to arrive in the capital by the beginning of next month, before 10,500 of the additional American soldiers are dispatched and before the administration's supplemental budget request for funding is submitted to Congress.

In that timing lies the possibility for a constructive response by Congress. Democrats in both the House and Senate are planning votes on nonbinding resolutions that would reject Mr. Bush's new strategy. Some are discussing ways to block the new mission by cutting off funding or attaching crippling restrictions. Neither action would improve the precarious U.S. position in Iraq, and the latter, if pursued to the extent suggested by Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) or Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.), would invite a catastrophe for which Congress would be blamed.

Congress can, however, hold the administration to its promise to test the Iraqi government early and often. If Mr. Maliki delivers on his commitments in the coming weeks, the administration's bet on pacifying Baghdad may begin to look more solid. If the Iraqi government does not perform, then Congress will be well grounded in insisting that Mr. Bush rethink his strategy and suspend new U.S. deployments.

Bush's Idle Threat (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

ON WEDNESDAY, President Bush told the nation that "America's commitment is not open-ended" in Iraq. By Friday, however, the administration was already backsliding. What wasn't open-ended, apparently, was just U.S. support for Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki. When it comes to American boots on the ground, according to Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, the U.S. is in Iraq for the long haul.

Gates put it bluntly in testimony Friday to the Senate Armed Services Committee. "Saying, 'If you don't do this, we'll leave, and we'll leave now,' does not strike me as being in the national interests of the United States," Gates said. As for how long the U.S. will stay, he reckoned, "I think [what] the president had in mind was that we would probably have to be in Iraq to provide help of one kind or another to the Iraqis for quite some time."

This is not what the American people want; this is not what the Iraqi Study Group recommended; and it is not the best way to prosecute a war against the radical Islamists who attacked this country on 9/11. It is, instead, a way to guarantee that the U.S. military will be dangerously overstretched and needlessly vulnerable to sectarian militias in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0116812

Even as the president was delivering his address, administration officials were whispering to reporters (including some for this newspaper) that "simply coming home isn't an option" and that Maliki's days may be numbered. This would, to put it gently, undermine the White House's claim to be pushing toward increased Iraqi sovereignty. To the contrary: It would require ever-greater U.S. responsibility for a post-totalitarian country sliding deeper into anarchy.

If Maliki is shown to be incapable of disarming Shiite militias, it will be because he wouldn't or couldn't rise above civil war. If his government collapses, the only central authority remaining will be the one most resented — America's 150,000-strong fighting force — and prospects for a unity government will be grim. The White House's approach to this plausible scenario is to insist, more loudly by the day, that failure is not an option.

"Failure in Iraq would be a disaster for our future," Bush warned soldiers Thursday at Ft. Benning, Ga. "Radical Islamic extremists would grow in strength…. Iran would be emboldened in its pursuit of nuclear weapons. Our enemies would have safe havens from which to launch attacks. People would look back at this moment in history and say, 'What happened to them in America? How come they couldn't see the threats to a future generation?' That is why we must, and we will, succeed in Iraq."

Unfortunately for Bush, and for the rest of us, "we can't fail" is not a strategy. As painful experience has shown in Iraq, it is a recipe for further failure because it encourages wishful thinking at the expense of realistic planning.

Bush's speech Wednesday offered some small hope that his ultimatum to Maliki had real consequences — that Bush would withdraw U.S. troops "if the Iraqi government does not follow through in its promises." By Friday, it appeared that this was an empty threat. The consequences of Baghdad's broken promises could be greater U.S. involvement in — and greater U.S. responsibility for — an Iraqi civil war.

He's In The Bunker Now (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

PRESIDENT BUSH always had one asset he could fall back on: the self-confidence of a born salesman. Like Harold Hill in "The Music Man," he knew how to roll out a new product, however deceptive or useless, with conviction and stagecraft. What the world saw on Wednesday night was a defeated Willy Loman who looked as broken as his war. His flop sweat was palpable even if you turned down the sound to deflect despair-inducing phrases like "Prime Minister Maliki has pledged ..." and "Secretary Rice will leave for the region. ..."

Mr. Bush seemed to know his product was snake oil, and his White House handlers did too. In the past, they made a fetish of situating their star in telegenic settings, from aircraft carriers to Ellis Island. Or they placed him against Orwellian backdrops shrieking "Plan for Victory." But this time even the audio stuttered, as if in solidarity with Baghdad's continuing electricity blackout, and the Oval Office was ditched, lest it summon up memories of all those past presidential sightings of light at the end of the Iraqi tunnel. Mr. Bush was banished to the White House library, where the backdrop was acres of books, to signify the studiousness of his rethinking of the "way forward."

"I'm not going to be rushed," the president said a month ago when talking about his many policy consultations. He wasn't kidding. His ostentatious deep thinking started after Election Day, once he realized that firing Donald Rumsfeld wouldn't be enough to co-opt the Iraq Study Group. He was thinking so hard that he abandoned his initial plan to announce a strategy before Christmas .

The war, however, refused to take a timeout for the holiday festivities in Crawford. The American death toll in Iraq, which hovered around 2,840 on Election Day, was nearing 3,020 by Wednesday night.

And these additional lives were sacrificed to what end? All the reviews and thinking and postponing produced a policy that, as a former top Bush aide summed it up for The Daily News, is nothing more than "repackaged stay-the-course dressed up to make it look more palatable." The repackaging was half-hearted as well. Not for nothing did the "way forward," a rubric the president used at least 27 times in December, end up on the cutting-room floor. The tossing of new American troops into Baghdad, a ploy that backfired in Operation Together Forward last year, is too transparently the way backward.

"Victory" also received short shrift, downsized by the president to the paltry goal of getting "closer to success." The "benchmarks" he cited were so vague that they'd be a disgrace to No Child Left Behind. And no wonder: in November, Mr. Bush couldn't even get our devoted ally, Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki, to show up for dinner at their summit in Amman, let alone induce him to root out Shiite militias. The most muscle the former Mr. Bring-'Em-On could muster in Wednesday's speech was this: "If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people." Since that support vanished long ago, it's hard to imagine an emptier threat or a more naked confession of American impotence, all the more pathetic in a speech rattling sabers against Syria and Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0116813

Mr. Bush's own support from the American people is not coming back. His "new" Iraq policy is also in defiance of Iraqi public opinion , the Joint Chiefs, the Baker-Hamilton grandees, and Mr. Maliki, who six weeks ago asked for a lower American profile in Iraq. Which leaves you wondering exactly who is still in the bunker with the president besides the first lady and Barney.

It's a very short list led by John McCain, Joe Lieberman, and neo-conservative dead-enders like William Kristol and Frederick Kagan, who congregate at The Weekly Standard and the American Enterprise Institute, the Washington think tank. The one notable new recruit is Rudy Giuliani, who likened taming Baghdad to "reducing crime in New York" without noticing that even after the escalation there will be fewer American troops patrolling Baghdad than uniformed police officers in insurgency-free New York City.

Mr. Kagan, a military historian, was sent by the White House to sell its policy to Senate Republicans. It was he, Mr. Kristol and the retired Gen. Jack Keane who have most prominently pushed for this escalation and who published studies and editorials credited with defining it. Given that these unelected hawks are some of the same great thinkers who promoted the Iraq fiasco in the first place, it is hard to imagine why this White House continues to listen to them. Or maybe not that hard. In a typical op-ed article, headlined "Stay the Course, Mr. President!," Mr. Kagan wrote in The Los Angeles Times in 2005: "Despite what you may have read, the military situation in Iraq today is positive."

Yet Mr. Bush doesn't even have the courage of his own disastrous convictions: he's not properly executing the policy these guys sold him. In The Washington Post on Dec. 27, Mr. Kagan and General Keane wrote that escalation could only succeed "with a surge of at least 30,000 combat troops" — a figure that has also been cited by Mr. McCain. (Mr. Kagan put the figure at 50,000 to 80,000 in a Weekly Standard article three weeks earlier. Whatever.) By any of these neocons' standards, the Bush escalation of some 20,000 is too little, not to mention way too late.

The discrepancy between the policy that Mr. Bush nominally endorses and the one he actually ordered up crystallizes the cynicism of this entire war. If you really believe, as the president continues to put it, that Iraq is the central front in "the decisive ideological struggle of our time," then you should be in favor of having many more troops than we've ever had in Iraq. As T. X. Hammes, an insurgency expert and a former marine, told USA Today, that doesn't now mean a "dribble" (as he ridicules the "surge") but a total of 300,000 armed coalition forces over a minimum of four years.

But that would mean asking Americans for sacrifice, not giving us tax cuts. Mr. Bush has never asked for sacrifice and still doesn't. If his words sound like bargain-basement Churchill, his actions have been cheaper still. The president's resolutely undermanned war plan indicated from Day 1 that he knew in his heart of hearts that Iraq was not the central front in the war against 9/11 jihadism he had claimed it to be, only the reckless detour that it actually was. Yet the war's cheerleaders, neocon and otherwise, disingenuously blamed our low troop strength almost exclusively on Mr. Rumsfeld.

Now that the defense secretary is gone, what are they to do? For whatever reason, you did not hear Mr. Kagan, General Keane or Mr. McCain speak out against Mr. Bush's plan even though it's insufficient by their own reckoning — just a repackaged continuance of the same "Whac-A-Mole" half-measures that Mr. McCain has long deplored. Surely the senator knows that, as his loosey-goosey endorsement attests. (On Friday, he called the Bush plan "the best chance of success" while simultaneously going on record that "a small, short surge would be the worst of all worlds.")

The question now is how to minimize the damage before countless more Americans and Iraqis are slaughtered to serve the president's endgame of passing his defeat on to the next president. The Democrats can have all the hearings they want, but they are unlikely to take draconian action (cutting off funding) that would make them, rather than Mr. Bush, politically vulnerable to blame for losing Iraq.

I have long felt that it will be up to Mr. Bush's own party to ring down the curtain on his failed policy, and after the 2006 midterms, that is more true than ever. The lame-duck president, having lost both houses of Congress and at least one war (Afghanistan awaits), has nothing left to lose. That is far from true of his party.

Even conservatives like

Sam Brownback of Kansas and

Norm Coleman of Minnesota started backing away from Iraq last week. Mr. Brownback is running for president in 2008, and Mr. Coleman faces a tough re-election fight. But Republicans not in direct electoral jeopardy (George Voinovich of Ohio, Lisa Murkowski of Alaska) are also starting to waver. It's another Vietnam-Watergate era flashback. It wasn't Democrats or the press that forced Richard Nixon's abdication in 1974; it was dwindling Republican support. Though he had vowed to fight his way through a Senate trial, Nixon folded once he lost the patriarchal leader of his party's right wing.

That leader was Barry Goldwater , who had been one of Nixon's most loyal and aggressive defenders until he finally realized he'd been lied to once too often. If John McCain won't play the role his Arizona predecessor once did, we must hope that John Warner or some patriot like him will, for the good of the country, answer the call of conscience. A dangerous president must be saved from himself, so that the American kids he's about to hurl into the hell of Baghdad can be saved along with him.

DOJ_NMG_0116814

Stumbling Around The World (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

With Iraq sliding off a cliff, and now tugging another 20,000 young Americans along as well, it's worth wrestling with a larger question: Why are we so awful at foreign policy?

Shirin Ebadi, the Iranian lawyer who won the Nobel Peace Prize, dropped by the other day, and she made the same point with characteristic bluntness. "It amazes me that the U.S., with all its scientific accomplishments, is so shortsighted in its foreign policy," she noted.

It is pathetic. We can go safely to the moon but not to Anbar Province. We can peer into the farthest reaches of the universe, but we fail to notice (until it's too late) that many Iraqis loathe us. We produce movies that delight audiences all over the world, but we can't devise a foreign policy that anybody likes.

And it's not just right-wing Republicans who are the problem. President Bush has been particularly myopic, but Democrats mired us in Vietnam: shortsightedness is a bipartisan tradition in foreign policy. Historically, we are often our own worst enemy.

Iraq is the example of the moment. We invaded, thinking that we would get a pro-American bulwark, cheap oil, long-term military bases and the gratitude of liberated Iraqis. Instead, we fought Iraq, and Iran won.

Speaking of which, look at Iran. In 1953, we helped overthrow the democratically elected prime minister, Mohammed Mossadegh, to achieve a more pro-Western government. That created tensions that led to the Iranian revolution of 1979 and the rise of mullahs with nuclear dreams. If it weren't for our own policies, Iran might well now have a pro-American government.

So why do we act so often against our own long-term interests? There are at least two reasons.

The first is that great powers always lumber about, stepping on toes, provoking resentments, and solving problems militarily simply because they have that capability. One of the great passages of Thucydides records how some 2,400 years ago Athens decided to wipe out the city of Melos because it could.

Likewise, in 1955, when Britain was the dominant player in the Middle East, it formed the Baghdad Pact, a military arrangement intended to protect British interests in the Middle East. Instead, the arrangement inflamed Arab nationalists, strengthened anti-British feeling and contributed to the fall of the Iraqi monarchy in 1958 — and, eventually, to the rise of Saddam.

The second reason is particular to the U.S.: We don't understand the world. The U.S. may owe its existence to prickly nationalist troublemakers like Sam Adams, but (partly because relatively few Americans have lived abroad) we are obtuse about the appeal of prickly nationalist troublemakers elsewhere. Like George III, we empower our enemies.

So what does all this have to do with the price of tea in Baghdad?

Once again the White House is seeking military solutions that are likely to rebound and hurt us. Sending more young Americans into that maelstrom may well have three consequences: inflaming Iraqi nationalism, bolstering Shiite and Sunni extremists alike, and killing more young Americans.

A U.S. military study in 1999, recently declassified and in the National Security Archive, concluded that even 400,000 American troops might not be able to stabilize a post-Saddam Iraq. The study emphasized the importance of diplomacy to engage Iraq's neighbors.

But President Bush is moving in the opposite direction. Most worrying, he is hinting at engaging Syria and Iran not diplomatically but militarily. We are careering down a road that may ultimately lead to military strikes on Iran — a disaster.

What would a better strategy look like? A good bit like the one advocated by the Iraq Study Group. It would emphasize engaging neighbors, a big push for political compromises within Iraq, steps toward troop withdrawals and an intensive effort to achieve an Israeli-Palestinian peace. (Condi Rice is planning this last effort.)

Would this strategy work in Iraq? No one knows. But such a bipartisan plan might at least bring a bit of healing to the U.S.

Meanwhile, history comes around in other ways. The Rev. Bob Edgar, the general secretary of the National Council of Churches, recalls that as a young congressman in April 1975, he encountered a similar presidential request for a surge of troops. It was a demand by President Gerald Ford for more U.S. forces to stabilize Saigon.

A White House photo captures Ford conferring with two of the architects of that request: senior administration officials named Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld.

In Baghdad, A Test Of The Petraeus Principles (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0116815

Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, the soldier-intellectual chosen by President Bush to provide new leadership in the war in Iraq, got one thing he needed from the president Wednesday night. But what was missing will ultimately be more important than what was provided.

Petraeus, who holds a doctorate from Princeton, is often described as the smartest and most ambitious member of the class of generals and admirals available to Bush. He has been given a rare opportunity to put the theories he has developed as a man of ideas into battlefield practice as a man of action.

Shortly before Bush appointed him to command the multinational forces in Iraq, Petraeus finished assembling a new counterinsurgency training manual for U.S. forces. The manual's opening sections emphasize the importance of political will in avoiding defeat in unconventional warfare:

"Constant reaffirmations of commitment, backed by deeds, can overcome" the perceptions of insurgents and local populations that "a few casualties or a few years will cause the United States to abandon a counterinsurgency effort," the manual states in a passage that could have been the basis for most of Bush's explanation to the nation of a new Iraq strategy. Bush provided the rhetoric of commitment to the struggle that Petraeus says is essential.

But the all-important Iraqi political context for the measured escalation in U.S. forces that Bush outlined remains murky and undeveloped. It falls to Petraeus more than any other individual to fill in the blanks left by Bush.

It is not clear whether Bush is counting on Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's ineffective and corrupt government to pull itself together suddenly and counter the bloody anarchy gripping Baghdad, as most of the president's words were designed to suggest, or if the president in fact expects American forces to take greater control over Iraqi units and their combat operations, as his actions indicate.

The surge of five brigades into Baghdad is supposed to enable U.S. troops to embed themselves in Iraqi units and to be posted overnight or longer in the capital's most violent neighborhoods. This necessarily undercuts Iraqi commanders and turns the emphasis away from the training of new Iraqi units. Bush mentioned training Iraqis as a primary U.S. mission late and glancingly in his speech.

The appointment of Petraeus is another indication of Bush's willingness to go on the offensive and his dissatisfaction with the cautious, bureaucratic approach taken to the Iraqi campaign by Gen. John Abizaid, who is departing as head of Central Command. Abizaid's repeated protestations to Bush and his national security team that military means could provide only 20 percent of what was needed to make Iraq secure wore thin in White House meetings, officials who were there have told me.

Petraeus, in contrast, highlights the responsibilities of the military in his counterinsurgency blueprint. The manual cogently argues that Western militaries "falsely believe that armies trained to win large conventional wars are automatically prepared to win small, unconventional ones. . . . The military forces that successfully defeat insurgencies are usually those able to overcome their institutional inclination to wage conventional war against insurgents."

Petraeus's determination to take charge of any situation in which he finds himself is a widely noticed characteristic. When he commanded the 101st Airborne Division in the northern Iraqi city of Mosul in 2003, he turned even a routine briefing for visiting officials and journalists into an all-encompassing, riveting overview of how military commanders had to work continually at winning hearts and minds.

But his refusal to cede any authority over Mosul to the region's Kurdish majority or to prepare the way for a new political order there alienated one of Iraq's three major population groups. That experience will reinforce the suspicions among some Iraqis that the surge of new troops under his command is intended to reassert U.S. combat control, at least temporarily.

That may not be a bad thing if there is a strong follow-up to provide a new political context for Iraq and the region. But a conceptual flaw that runs through both Bush's speech and the counterinsurgency manual assembled by Petraeus will make that transition difficult if it is not corrected.

These two documents fail to give sufficient weight to the fact that all insurgency is local, to paraphrase Tip O'Neill's famous dictum about American politics. The Petraeus document does note the need to address "local grievances" and the new precision tools of insurgency, such as suicide attacks. But the strategy Petraeus then lays out echoes many of the counterinsurgency practices formulated in the unsuccessful campaigns of Algeria, Vietnam and elsewhere. In all likelihood, David Petraeus's work to design a successful counterinsurgency has only just begun, and against big odds.

Bush's Hail-Mary Pass (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

During the battle of the Marne in September 1914, France's Marshal Foch declared: "My center is giving way, my right is retreating, situation excellent, I am attacking." His brio is remembered because his tactic worked: It prevented a rout that might have swiftly ended what might not today be known as World War I. But, then, we cannot know that.

DOJ_NMG_0116816

The president's Wednesday evening address was without Fochian panache. He surely knows that he cannot know how his new policy will unfold, any more than his critics can have reasonable confidence in the consequences of their alternative policy.

The president is probably wrong in thinking that 17,500 more U.S. troops can clear Baghdad until Iraqi forces can hold it. And he probably is wrong in thinking that economic pump-priming and jobs programs, which are usually disappointing when tried in America, can succeed amid Iraq's anarchy. Besides, Shiites are not torturing Sunnis with electric drills and Sunnis are not beheading Shiites because both sides are suffering the ennui of the unemployed. For Iraqis, ennui is a utopian aspiration.

But the president is right in framing his new policy as a ukase to Iraq's government: We are buying you time, and not much of it, for you to dash to competence concerning security matters. Bush's policy probably will not succeed, but at least we will know what were the parameters of the possible, given the government produced by those Iraqi elections that once were the source of so much U.S. confidence.

The president's gamble is not a larger one than Democrats are making with what they are adopting as a party position. They are right that the "surge" probably will not pull Iraq back from the abyss. But they are wrong to think that their policy is more than a variant of the president's policy: shock treatment for Iraq's government, which is threatened with what, on Thursday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice icily called, with studied vagueness, "the consequences now of nonperformance."

All sides recognize that the status quo in Iraq is untenable. Therefore those -- almost all Democrats and a growing minority of Republicans -- who hope to block the "surge" are really for setting in motion a swift and irreversible process of U.S. withdrawal, in the hope that it will galvanize Iraq's government to military and policy capabilities that U.S. training and subsidies have so far been unable to produce. And if not, Iraq and the region probably will become a cauldron of conflicts with genocidal stakes for the sectarian groups involved.

Both the president's speech, and the Democrats' response to it, delivered by Illinois Sen. Dick Durbin, contained passages that bordered on the bizarre. The president said, "If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people." But that support was long since forfeited. Durbin called upon Iraq's government to "disband" the militias and death squads. Not destroy, but "disband." How is that supposed to happen? By asking them nicely? "Disband, please, and on the way home, if you see a Sunni (Shiite), give him a hug." The great question is whether Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki will cooperate with crushing the Mahdi Army, which is the instrument of his patron, Moqtada al-Sadr.

Twenty years ago, Ken Livingstone, the (very left-wing) mayor of London, wrote a book titled "If Voting Changed Anything They'd Abolish It." But America's November voting produced Wednesday's change in Iraq policy. Voters did not, however, intend to bring on what is coming: Chechnya in their living rooms -- a spike of high-intensity, high-casualty urban warfare, televised.

Bush and his thoughtful critics, ostensibly at daggers drawn, are actually in agreement on three points. First, the failed policy of the past three years is both militarily and politically unsustainable. Second, any substantial departure from that policy must involve a leap into the dark -- a bet on the future about which no reasonable person can be confident. Third, the nation embarked Wednesday night upon the beginning of the end of U.S. suzerainty in Iraq, where, Maliki has said, with more bravado than plausibility, that by June -- about when the full surge probably will reach Iraq -- his government will be able to handle its security challenges.

Foch's 1914 bravado helped produce the "miracle of the Marne," which was followed by four years of carnage which destroyed empires, including the Ottoman Empire, a shard of which became Iraq. Today, in Iraq, the president's policy -- and that of his critics -- is to hope for a miracle.

The Big Gambit In Iraq (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

With his new Iraq policy, President Bush essentially has written off any prospect of regaining broad support at home for his course of action, in the slender hope of finding the key to military success and political agreements in Baghdad.

It is a huge personal gamble, one that has triggered a debate that may well dominate the final two years of Bush's tenure.

Interestingly, Bush and his critics start from the same premise: The ultimate solution in Iraq is political, not military. In his address Wednesday night, Bush said, "Only Iraqis can end the sectarian violence and secure their people."

That will require concrete steps toward national unification with the Sunni minority and the Kurds that the Shiite-dominated government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has balked at for the past year.

And Bush and his critics share a second premise: that government must be nudged into action -- or Iraq is lost.

The Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan panel headed by James A. Baker III and Lee Hamilton, argued that the most effective signal to Maliki and his associates would be to announce plans for a phased withdrawal of American troops in the first quarter of next year. That policy would have commanded strong support in the Congress elected in November and, if polls are correct, among the American people.

DOJ_NMG_0116817

Bush chose another course, arguing that any early pullout or loss of American assistance would lead to "a collapse of the Iraqi government, tear the country apart and result in mass killings on an unimaginable scale."

That does not say much about the viability of that government, but there is certainly a measurable risk that Bush may be right about the consequences.

In any case, he has chosen to send Maliki a very different signal -- more troops under looser terms of engagement, ready to support Iraqi forces in an effort to purge Baghdad of rival Sunni and Shiite militias.

In doing this, Bush has adopted the view of John McCain, Joe Lieberman and the neocons, namely, "The most urgent priority for success in Iraq is security, especially in Baghdad."

But he has claimed to be dealing with the political problem at the same time -- by informing Maliki that "America's commitment is not open-ended" and by reiterating the now-familiar set of steps needed for political progress -- division of oil revenue, constitutional reform, provincial elections and a reversal of de-Baathification-- that the Maliki government has long resisted.

Bush said that he has Maliki's word that all this will happen -- and that there will be an end to the unspoken policy of targeting Sunnis while protecting Shiite militias. When I asked a National Security Council official why the promise should be taken seriously, after so many disappointments in the past year, he said that the prime minister faces not just external pressure from the United States but also the urgings of "other moderate elements" in his own coalition who are weary of the fighting.

A skeptic would say that Bush has sacrificed the support of moderates at home -- the Republican as well as Democratic lawmakers voicing skepticism about his plan -- for some supposed "moderates" in Baghdad.

For this gamble to work, a lot of implausible things have to happen. Maliki's governing coalition, which includes the party of Moqtada al-Sadr, will have to steel itself to send troops into the neighborhoods controlled by Sadr's own Mahdi Army. Defense Secretary Robert Gates says this will happen, but the promise remains to be tested.

Also unproved is the capacity of the Iraqi army and police force, which are supposed to be "in the lead," with American troops in support, in clearing out Baghdad. The army was disbanded in a reckless decision soon after the fall of Saddam Hussein, and it is only now being slowly rebuilt. The police force is notoriously overrun with sectarian militias.

When Bush draws a picture of Iraqi army and police brigades going "door-to-door to gain the trust of Baghdad residents," he has to hope that those cops aren't regarded as assassins disguised in uniform when they go into Sunni neighborhoods.

And then there are those politicians in Baghdad -- the ones Bush is gambling can find consensus in a country that has known national unity only under a dictator.

Everyone acknowledges that there is no risk-free way of solving the mess in Iraq. Bush has chosen a way that guarantees what was forecast here just a month ago: "a foreign policy and national security debate as consequential as any this nation and its allies have faced since the start of World War II."

Trapped By Hubris, Again (WP)

By Robert G. Kaiser

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

After nearly four years of ineffectual war-fighting, after the collapse of domestic support for President Bush and his policies, after the expenditure of thousands of lives and hundreds of billions of dollars, it no longer seems possible to avoid the grim conclusion: For the United States, Iraq has become another Vietnam.

Fortunately, the overall death toll in Iraq so far, while high, is still smaller than it was in Vietnam. But tragically, the most important difference between the two conflicts may be that defeat in Iraq is likely to produce catastrophic consequences for that nation, its neighbors and the United States, too.

For a gray-haired journalist whose career included 18 months covering the Vietnam War for The Washington Post, it is a source of amazement to realize that my country has done this again. We twice took a huge risk in the hope that we could predict and dominate events in a nation whose history we did not know, whose language few of us spoke, whose rivalries we didn't understand, whose expectations for life, politics and economics were all foreign to many Americans.

Both times, we put our fate in the hands of local politicians who would not follow U.S. orders, who did not see their country's fate the way we did, and who could not muster the support of enough of their countrymen to produce the outcome Washington wanted. In Vietnam as in Iraq, U.S. military power alone proved unable to achieve the desired political objectives.

How did this happen again? After all, we're Americans -- practical, common-sense people who know how to get things done. Or so we'd like to think. In truth, we are ethnocentric to a fault, certain of our own superiority, convinced that others see us as we do, blithely indifferent to cultural, religious, political and historical realities far different from our own. These failings -- more than any tactical or strategic errors -- help explain the U.S. catastrophes in Vietnam and Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0116818

Future historians trying to understand how the U.S. adventure in Iraq went so badly off track will be grateful for the memorandum that national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley wrote to Bush on Nov. 8, 2006, after a visit to Iraq. The "secret" memo was leaked to the New York Times three weeks later.

Hadley began with a candid evaluation of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki: "The reality on the streets of Baghdad suggests Maliki is either ignorant of what is going on, misrepresenting his intentions, or that his capabilities are not yet sufficient to turn his good intentions into action."

Having been frank about the problem, Hadley then entered a dream world to discuss ways in which it might be solved. He offered his boss an elaborate set of initiatives that should be urged on the hapless Maliki. The first one gives a good flavor of the Hadley plan for success: "Maliki should compel his ministers to take small steps -- such as providing health services and opening bank branches in Sunni neighborhoods -- to demonstrate that his government serves all ethnic communities." Others included compelling Maliki to overhaul his personal staff to make it ethnically diverse, shake up his cabinet and bring in competent technocrats, and insist that all ministers renounce violence in all forms.

How would Bush carry out Hadley's correctives? "We can help [him] in a variety of ways," Hadley wrote. If Maliki thinks he isn't in a position to follow all of the Americans' good advice, "we will need to work with him to augment his capabilities." Among the steps Hadley proposed:

"Actively support Maliki in helping him develop an alternative political base. We would likely need to use our own political capital to press moderates to align themselves with Maliki's new political bloc. . . . Consider monetary support to moderate groups that have been seeking to break with larger, more sectarian parties, as well as to support Maliki himself. . . . Provide Maliki with more resources to help build a nonsectarian national movement."

In other words, the national security adviser told the president 42 months after this disastrous war began that we can still fix it. A few well-placed bribes plus Yankee ingenuity -- pulling this lever, pushing that button -- can make things turn out the way we want them to. There you see the peculiar strain of hubris that led the United States astray four years ago in Iraq, and four decades ago in Vietnam.

Indeed, Hadley's memo is squarely in the tradition of the sublimely arrogant know-it-alls whom journalist David Halberstam memorably dubbed "The Best and the Brightest." These were the men around John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson who, along with Kennedy and Johnson, gave us the Vietnam War: Robert S. McNamara, McGeorge Bundy, Dean Rusk, Walt W. Rostow and the rest. They, too, allowed themselves to believe that the shrewd application of U.S. power -- pulling a lever here, pushing a button there -- could create and prop up an independent, democratic South Vietnam. This was something that had never existed previously -- in that sense, something sadly akin to a multiethnic, democratic Iraq.

Yet in his speech to the nation Wednesday night announcing changes in Iraq policy, the president embraced many of Hadley's proposals. He has extracted promises from Maliki to crack down on Shiite militias and has pushed the prime minister to broaden his cabinet. Bush also took Hadley's advice to increase the number of U.S. troops operating in Baghdad, and to broaden the program that embeds Americans with Iraqi units.

Last week, Bush seemed to threaten Maliki as well: "If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people -- and it will lose the support of the Iraqi people," the president said. The United States has always been good at telling other nations what they have to do, and what will happen if they don't do it.

When things began to go wrong in Vietnam, we helped stage a coup against Ngo Dinh Diem, whom the United States had helped to install as president of South Vietnam. President Dwight D. Eisenhower had once called him Asia's "miracle man." Diem was dumped in 1963. Eight changes in leadership, all involving Washington in one way or another, ended with Nguyen Van Thieu's ascent to the presidency in 1967; Thieu then held on for eight years before being ousted nine days before North Vietnamese troops marched into Saigon. We never did find "the right guy" for Vietnam, to borrow Bush's recent description of Maliki, and there is scant evidence that the man who botched the execution of Saddam Hussein is really the right guy for Iraq, either.

We accomplished a great deal during the 14 years we were actively engaged in South Vietnam. We created an infrastructure for the country, built roads and schools and hospitals, trained hundreds of thousands of troops, figured out how to "pacify" the countryside. As long as U.S. military power was available to neutralize the fighting force of North Vietnam -- whose communist leaders were determined to expel the Americans and reunify their country -- South Vietnam could survive, even prosper.

But we could not create a government or an economy in South Vietnam that could survive without our generous help. When I was leaving Vietnam in August 1970, I wrote in these pages about how we had made the Vietnamese utterly dependent on us. At the time, the Nixon administration's policy was "Vietnamization" -- turning the war over to the South Vietnamese. But the South Vietnamese had not shown that they could cope without us. "Even if the policy succeeds," I wrote, "the United States may well be unable to redeem the lives, money and self esteem it invested in the war in Vietnam."

DOJ_NMG_0116819

The Vietnamese communists had key advantages that the U.S. side couldn't match: a better army, more determined and more competent leaders, and a political legitimacy that they had earned by expelling the French colonizers. And they were fighting for a unified Vietnam.

Iraq is different. The "enemy" there is not a single group of Iraqis, but nearly all Iraqis, because Iraqis do not share a common definition of their state or a common agenda for its future. This disarray has been compounded by the presence of Islamic fanatics from countries that have seized the opportunity to go to Iraq to try to kill Americans. Polls and reporting by Post correspondents suggest that, overwhelmingly, Iraqis of all factions want U.S. forces to leave.

In the face of chaos, the United States has no reliable ally -- no legitimate political authority that crosses sectarian lines and attracts the loyalty of large numbers of Iraqis. Which Iraqis will risk their lives to promote Washington's idea of Iraq? The army and police defend sectarian, not national, interests, even when they are fighting the same people U.S. troops are fighting.

The Iraqis who would presumably have been most supportive of a modernizing and democratic Iraq -- the secular intelligentsia that thrived in Iraq until the Persian Gulf War -- is now dramatically depleted. Hundreds of thousands of these Iraqis have already fled to other countries, including many doctors, lawyers, academics and other trained professionals. The war has created a vacuum in the upper reaches of Iraqi society.

What's the lesson to be learned? Modesty. Before initiating a war of choice -- and Vietnam and Iraq both qualify -- define the goal with honesty and precision, then analyze what means will be needed to achieve it. Be certain you really understand the society you propose to transform. And never gamble that the political solution to such an adventure will somehow materialize after the military operation has begun. Without a plausible political plan and strong local support at the outset, military operations alone are unlikely to produce success.

Bush's latest initiatives -- like all his earlier ones -- will not produce the desired political result, because Americans cannot accomplish political objectives in Iraq. Americans are outsiders, occupiers, foreigners in every sense of the word. Only Iraqis have a chance of finding a political resolution for their divisions. So now we await the fate of this latest gamble like a high roller in Las Vegas watching a roulette ball in a spinning wheel. We have about as much control over the situation as the gambler has of that ball. The outcome is out of our hands, and it would be foolish to bet that we will like the way the conflict ends.

Robert G. Kaiser, an associate editor of The Post, covered the Vietnam War in 1969 and 1970.

The Best We Can Hope For (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

NOBODY will quibble with President Bush's line Wednesday night that in Iraq, "Victory will not look like the ones our fathers and grandfathers achieved; there will be no surrender ceremony on the deck of a battleship."

Of course, that calls to mind his victory landing on the deck of the carrier Abraham Lincoln off the coast of California in May 2003, which he followed with a speech declaring that, "in the battle of Iraq, the United States and our allies have prevailed."

But let's not digress. Mr. Bush has now scaled back his strategy for victory to a strategy for the best-we-can-hope-for. So, it must be asked, what exactly is the best we can hope for?

"In the best-case scenario, we'll be in Iraq for 15 or 20 years," said Stephen Biddle, author of "Military Power: Explaining Victory and Defeat in Modern Battle." He offers the example of the Balkans, where everyone seems to have forgotten about the United States troops who have been there for years, helping keep a peace brokered in Dayton, Ohio, in 1995.

Under the best result Mr. Biddle said he could imagine, the United States would cajole or force warring Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds to agree to the standard-cookbook negotiated ending to a civil war. There would be some kind of power-sharing deal among the key combatants, yielding an uneasy cease-fire that would have to be policed for a long time by outside peacekeepers, since no warring side would trust another.

Sounds like paradise, doesn't it? Except, Mr. Biddle said, "If I had to bet my house mortgage on a scenario, it wouldn't be on that one."

Before we get to the outcome on which Mr. Biddle is willing to bet his piece of the American dream, we should, at least, examine the second, optimistic resolution that Iraq experts offer. This is the ending which, they said, President Bush should embrace with both arms — if he can get it.

Remember the Spanish Civil War? The best America can hope for, some experts said, would be for Iraq to turn into today's version of the Spanish Civil War.

For readers without immediate access to Wikipedia, the Spanish Civil War lasted three years, from 1936 to 1939, when the Nationalists, led by Francisco Franco, defeated the Loyalists of the Second Spanish Republic. The death toll was huge — estimates put it between 500,000 and one million. People in just about every European country were passionate about the fight: the Loyalists got weapons and volunteers from the Soviet Union, while the Nationalists received help from Italy, Germany and Portugal.

DOJ_NMG_0116820

But, in the end, the Spanish Civil War stayed Spanish. The Europeans sent money and arms and even volunteers, but they didn't let the war engulf the continent. (Probably because the continent was busy getting engulfed in World War II, but let's not be too technical.)

The biggest worry in Iraq is not that Iraq will descend into a civil war — most experts say that is a done deal — but that an Iraqi civil war will not stay Iraqi. The fear is that a civil war will engulf the entire region, with Saudi Arabia and Jordan defending the Sunnis, Iran backing the Shiites, and Iraqi Kurds declaring their independence, a move sure to draw in Turkey, which has its own restive Kurdish population.

"There's a difference between the Saudis providing help and them actually sending in forces; there's a difference between everybody playing in the troubled waters of Iraq and actually allowing it to spread beyond Iraq's borders," said Gideon Rose, managing editor of Foreign Affairs magazine. "Given the alternative, the Spanish Civil War was better than World War I."

The Spanish Civil War script doesn't bode well for Iraq itself. The death toll would be enormous, and Iraqi Sunnis, who make up only about 20 percent of the population, would face particular hardship. But such a war wouldn't become World War III. The United States would eventually pull its troops out, the Iranians would finance the Shiites, and the Saudis would support the Sunnis, but neither neighbor would engage militarily itself.

America's image abroad would suffer a blow, but not a fatal one, and in the end, the United States would still be the sole world power. "That's the best we can expect," Mr. Rose said. "Disaster in Iraq, problems in the Middle East and a several-year period to recover the losses in American foreign policy."

Critics have been unstinting in their disapproval of Mr. Bush's plan to send more than 20,000 additional American troops, mostly to Baghdad, where they will embed with Iraqi brigades.

The idea is that the presence of the American troops will prevent the Iraqi soldiers, who are mostly Shiite, from slaughtering the minority Sunnis. Eventually, the thinking goes, the Sunni population in Baghdad will come to trust the Iraqi soldiers, and reconciliation will happen between Iraqi Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds.

The problem with Mr. Bush's plan, said Vali Nasr, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations, is that it doesn't provide enough American troops to do much more than stay the course, to use Mr. Bush's now-abandoned lexicon. The way Mr. Nasr sees it, 20,000 additional troops is too few to change the dynamic on the ground, but enough to escalate tensions further.

"The best we can hope for is pretty much the same thing we've had for the last year," said Mr. Nasr, author of "The Shia Revival: How Conflicts Within Islam Will Shape the Future." "More of the same for another two years, but keep in mind that it could potentially get much worse."

That worst-case scenario is pretty scary, Mr. Biddle said. In that picture, the United States would pull its troops out of Iraq, the civil war would accelerate, and the Shiites, financed by Iran, would conquer one Sunni village after another, driving the Sunnis over the borders and into refugee camps in Saudi Arabia and Jordan.

There would be a huge refugee crisis in the Sunni Arab countries, where a dispossessed, bitter and highly politicized refugee population would appeal to Saudi and Jordanian rulers to make a last stand for Sunnis in Iraq. But since it would have taken about 5 to 10 years to get to this point, guess who, by then, would have acquired a nuclear bomb?

Iran.

"In the worst case, you could be looking at a couple of nuclear weapons dropped on major cities — Baghdad, Riyadh, Tehran," Mr. Biddle said.

That possibility makes the one that Mr. Biddle views as most likely seem almost palatable. Here it is:

"We get out, the civil war escalates," Mr. Biddle said. "It's funded by all sides but they don't send their own troops across the border. The war just bumps along for 5 or 10 years and everybody eventually gets so weary that diplomacy finally gets going, and there's a cease-fire, power-sharing deal. During that period, Iraqi oil output crashes, there's huge instability in the region and oil prices rise. And there's a humanitarian catastrophe in Iraq.

"That's not a very happy scenario," Mr. Biddle acknowledged. "But it beats the heck out of nuclear war in the Mideast."

We're Fighting Not To Lose (WP)

By Leslie H. Gelb, Richard K. Betts

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

Iraq is not Vietnam, yet history seems intent on harnessing them together. Three years ago this seemed an unlikely pairing; surely President Bush would not take the United States down the same trail as Lyndon B. Johnson. Yet even though Iraq's story is far from complete, each day raises the odds that the U.S. fate in Iraq could eventually be the same as it was in Vietnam -- defeat.

DOJ_NMG_0116821

The differences are clear. The policy consensus over the Vietnam War ran deeper and lasted longer than on the Iraq conflict. While Johnson and his advisers slogged deeper into Vietnam with realistic pessimism, Bush and his colleagues plunged ahead in Iraq with reckless optimism. And in Vietnam, U.S. leaders made most of their mistakes with their eyes wide open, while it is impossible to fathom exactly what the Bush team thought it was doing after the fall of Baghdad.

Twenty-eight years ago, we wrote a book, "The Irony of Vietnam: The System Worked," which argued that although U.S. policy in that war was disastrous, the policymaking process performed just as it was designed to. It seems odd that a good system could produce awful results, but the subsequent declassified documents and the public record showed it to be true. U.S. officials generally had accurate assessments of the difficulties in Vietnam, and they looked hard at the alternatives of winning or getting out.

On Iraq the insider documents are not available, but journalistic accounts suggest that Bush's policy process was much less realistic. The president did not take seriously the obstacles to his goals, did not send a military force adequate to accomplish the tasks, failed to plan for occupation and took few steps to solve the underlying political conflicts among Iraqis.

Despite these different paths, Bush now faces Johnson's dilemma, that of a war in which defeat is unthinkable but victory unlikely. And Bush's policy shift last week suggests that he has come to the same conclusion as Johnson: Just do what you can not to lose and pass the problem on to your successor.

In both cases, despite talk of "victory," the overriding imperative became simply to avoid defeat.

How did these tragedies begin? Although hindsight makes many forget, the Vietnam War was backed by a consensus of almost all foreign-policy experts and a majority of U.S. voters. Until late in the game, opponents were on the political fringe. The consensus rested on the domino theory -- if South Vietnam fell to communism, other governments would topple. Most believed that communism was on the march and a worldwide Soviet-Chinese threat on the upswing.

The consensus on Iraq was shallower and shorter-lived. Bush may have been bent on regime change in Baghdad from the start, but in any case a consensus emerged among his advisers that Saddam Hussein was on the verge of securing nuclear weapons capability -- and that deterrence and containment would not suffice. That judgment came to be shared by most of the national security community. Congress also saluted early on. The vote to endorse the war was less impressive than the Gulf of Tonkin resolution, which passed almost unanimously, but many Democrats signed on to topple Hussein for fear of looking weak.

As soon as the war soured, the consensus crumbled. Without the vulnerability of middle-class youth to conscription, and with the political left in a state of collapse since Ronald Reagan's presidency, the antiwar movement on Iraq did not produce sustained mass protests as Vietnam did by the late 1960s. But the sentiment shows up just as clearly in the polls.

Consensus held longer over Vietnam because few in or out of the government had ever expected a quick and easy resolution of the war. Officials knew what they were up against -- the force of nationalism embodied by Ho Chi Minh, and a succession of corrupt, inefficient and illegitimate South Vietnamese governments. Officials usually put on a brave face, but they understood that Washington was in for the long haul. In the Bush administration, by contrast, a gap opened almost immediately between senior political leaders on one side, and most military and diplomatic professionals as well as the media on the other. The steady optimism of the former in the face of the reporting of the latter quickly undid public confidence in the Pentagon's and White House's leadership.

By 1968, Johnson understood that victory was not in the cards at any reasonable price, but that defeat would be catastrophic. The war had reached a deteriorating stalemate. If victory were possible, it would require all-out use of military force against North Vietnam, a move that the administration believed ran the risk of war with the Soviet Union and China. If the United States were defeated, however, the dominos would fall, and one of those dominos would be the occupant of the White House. Periodically, top officials concluded that events in Vietnam had taken another turn for the worse, and to prevent defeat they had to dispatch more troops and do more bombing -- and so the steady escalation proceeded without lasting effect on the balance of power in Vietnam.

Constrained against achieving victory or accepting defeat, Johnson and his aides chose to do the minimum necessary to get through each crunch in Vietnam and at home, hoping that something would turn up to save them. In the end, Johnson made the ultimate political sacrifice and declined to run for reelection. But as he announced a halt of the bombing and the offer of negotiations with Hanoi, he also increased the number of U.S. troops in Vietnam. Even as he was leaving office, he had no intention of being "the first American president to lose a war."

By contrast, Bush never had to worry that escalation would bring an all-out global war; the United States is the world's sole superpower. Nonetheless, until last week, he never chose to increase the combat commitment significantly; the "surge" announced last week is but the latest experiment with a temporary increase in forces. At the beginning this was probably because he did not believe more troops were needed to win. As the venture went bad, the volunteer army was stretched too thin to provide an option for massive escalation. But now it is clear that Bush does not believe he can possibly win with anything close to the number of forces currently committed. The president certainly perceives the risks of losing, and at this moment of truth, he is repeating Johnson's decision pattern -- doing the minimum necessary not to lose.

DOJ_NMG_0116822

Whatever the similarities in the way Washington dealt with Vietnam and Iraq, there were few similarities between the two wars themselves. Vietnam was both a nationalist war against outside powers -- first the French, then the Americans -- and a civil war. In Iraq, the lines of conflict are messier. The main contest is the sectarian battle between Arab Shiites and Arab Sunnis. The Kurds, so far, are mostly bystanders, while the Americans struggle to back a weak yet balky government they hope can remain a secular alternative.

Combat in Vietnam was a combination of insurgency and conventional warfare, and the conventional element played to U.S. strengths. By contrast, Washington's massive firepower advantages are nullified in Iraq because the fighting remains at the level of guerrilla warfare and terrorism. Iraq is harder for our military than Vietnam was, yet we eventually had 540,000 troops in Vietnam compared with barely a quarter of that number in Iraq. The current U.S. footprint in Iraq is much smaller -- only about one-tenth the density of U.S. and allied forces per square mile in South Vietnam at the height of U.S. involvement, and with an Iraqi population 50 percent larger than South Vietnam's. Consequently, the security situation was never as bad in Vietnam as it is in Iraq today. In Vietnam, Americans could travel most places day and night, while in Iraq it is dangerous to leave the Green Zone. Even Bush's planned 21,500-troop increase will not make a lasting difference if the host government does not become far more effective. As in Vietnam after the Tet Offensive of 1968, the enemy can lie low until we stand down.

In both countries, U.S. forces worked hard at training national armies. This job was probably done better in Vietnam, and the United States certainly provided South Vietnamese troops with relatively better equipment than they have given Iraqis so far. South Vietnamese forces were more reliable, more effective and far more numerous than current Iraqi forces are.

In both cases, however, the governments we were trying to help proved inadequate. Unlike their opponents, neither Saigon nor Baghdad gained the legitimacy to inspire their troops. At bottom, this was always the fundamental problem in both wars. Americans hoped that time would help, but leaders such as South Vietnam's Nguyen Van Thieu and Iraq's Nouri al-Maliki were never up to the job.

Americans have not stopped arguing about Vietnam -- about whether the war could have been won if fought differently, or was an impossible task from the outset, or about who was to blame. Hawks claim that the United States could have won in Vietnam if the military had been allowed to fight without restraint. Supporters of the war in Iraq say that the United States could have prevented the resistance if it had been better prepared for occupation after the fall of Baghdad. Doves in both cases say that the objectives were never worth any appreciable price in blood and treasure.

After Vietnam, recriminations over failure became a never-healed wound in American politics. Now Iraq is deepening that wound. With some luck, Washington may yet escape Baghdad more cleanly than it did in the swarms of helicopters fleeing Saigon in 1975. But even if the United States is that fortunate, the story of the parallel paths to disaster should be chiseled in stone -- if only to avoid yet another tragedy in a distant land, a few decades down the road.

Leslie H. Gelb, president emeritus of the Council on Foreign Relations, directed the Pentagon Papers Project. Richard K. Betts is director of Columbia University's Saltzman Institute of War and Peace Studies.

A Skeptic's Case For The Surge (WP)

By Michael O'Hanlon

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

President Bush's plan for a surge of American troops in Iraq has run into a brick wall of congressional opposition. Critics rightly argue that it may well be too little, way too late. But for a skeptical Congress and nation, it is still the right thing to try -- as long as we do not count on it succeeding and we start working on backup plans even as we grant Bush his request.

However mediocre its prospects, each main element of the president's plan has some logic behind it. On the military surge itself, critics of the administration's Iraq policy have consistently argued that the United States never deployed enough soldiers and Marines to Iraq. Now Bush has essentially conceded his critics' points. To be sure, adding 21,500 American troops (and having them conduct classic counterinsurgency operations) is not a huge change and may be too late.

But it would still be counterintuitive for the president's critics to prevent him from carrying out the very policy they have collectively recommended.

Similarly, the president wants to move in the right direction on economic reconstruction. For far too long his plans were focused almost exclusively on repairing and rebuilding large infrastructure. The president conceded in a speech in December 2005 that he had placed too much faith in this "Halliburton strategy," yet it has taken more than a year for him to make amends and focus a large part of his economic strategy on the mundane task of creating jobs. This type of policy is unlikely to create the strong and durable underpinnings of long-term Iraqi economic growth. But like FDR's job creation programs of the 1930s, it responds to the political needs of a nation under duress. And it is good security policy in a country where too many angry, disenfranchised, unemployed young men are joining insurgent groups and militias.

DOJ_NMG_0116823

Finally, President Bush is rightly telegraphing to Iraqi leaders that they must reach compromises with each other -- on sharing oil revenue, on reining in militias, on allowing those former Baathists without blood on their hands to regain their opportunities to hold jobs in Iraq. He correctly argues that without progress on such matters, there will be no success in the mission and the American people will continue to lose faith in the effort. This stands in contrast to incorrect comments he made as recently as November, during his trip to Vietnam, when he argued that we could fail in Iraq only if we Americans lose our resolve.

In fact, we need a viable Iraqi partner with broad support across sectarian lines, and American policy must strive to help create that partner.

Rather than deny funding for Bush's initiatives, Congress should provide it now -- but only for fiscal 2007 (meaning through September). By that point, or even the August congressional recess, we should know if the surge is showing promise. If it does, Congress could consider continuing its support. If not, the moment will be right to force the president's hand and move to a backup plan.

In their testimony before Congress on Thursday, both Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert Gates acknowledged that within months we should be able to learn much about the Iraqi government's willingness to support this new effort. The plan requires more Iraqi troops and more Iraqi government acquiescence in their unfettered use. In addition, one of the main outside architects of the surge strategy, retired Army Gen. Jack Keane, told NPR on Thursday that if the president's plan works we should see an improvement in the security environment this year. Clearly these statements suggest that we should be able to evaluate the success of the strategy in short order.

If Bush's plan does not work, what might our new policy be? Taking the Shiite-Kurdish side in Iraq's civil war (the "80 percent solution," as some call it) would probably guarantee the emergence of a sanctuary for al-Qaeda in the Sunni Arab region and, as such, is a bad idea. Similarly, trying to engineer a coup to create a benign autocracy in Iraq would be very difficult to achieve. As Bosnia expert Edward P. Joseph and I have recently argued, building on the ideas of Sen. Joe Biden and Leslie Gelb, something akin to a Bosnia model for Iraq would make more sense. Iraq would retain a loose confederal structure, a small national government and a mechanism for sharing oil revenue equally. But governance and security would be provided primarily by three autonomous regional governments.

Citizens would be given the chance to relocate to places where they felt safe, with the government and the coalition providing protection in the process as well as assistance with new housing and jobs.

If the surge fails, we will need a whole new paradigm for Iraq policy, and it is hardly too soon for Congress to start fleshing out our choices. But for now, Congress should also give the president the money and support that he requests.

The writer is a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution and co-author of "Hard Power: The New Politics of National Security."

The Mess We Left Behind (WP)

By John A. Graham

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

I was a civilian adviser in Vietnam, sent there by the State Department in early 1971 just as U.S. combat troops were starting to go home. I wasn't there to fight, but I soon learned that "noncombatant" didn't mean much in Hu?, the provincial capital 50 miles south of the demilitarized zone where I was posted. A week into my stay, a sniper's bullet whistled past my ear on the main highway. Joe Jackson, the burly major who was driving the Jeep, yelled at me to hold on and duck as he zigzagged to spoil the sniper's aim.

In 1971, the U.S. government did not issue weapons to civilian advisers in Vietnam, even to those of us in dangerous outposts. The reason was not principle, but public relations -- and here begin the lessons for America's war in Iraq.

Sometime in 1969, the White House, faced with unrelenting facts on the ground and under siege from the public, had quietly decided that the United States couldn't win in Vietnam. President Richard M. Nixon and national security adviser Henry A. Kissinger didn't put it that way, of course. The United States was a superpower and could not lose a war to a third-rate nation whose soldiers lived on rice and hid in holes in the ground. So the White House conceived an elaborate strategy to mask the U.S. defeat: Slowly withdraw combat troops over several years, while the remaining Americans would focus on training the South Vietnamese to fight on their own. We gave the South Vietnamese a series of performance ultimatums -- call them benchmarks -- that, if unmet, would trigger full U.S. withdrawal and shift blame to the South Vietnamese for the debacle that would follow. This "Vietnamization" strategy cost at least 10,000 more U.S. lives and countless more Vietnamese ones, plus billions of dollars. And it was rigged from the start.

DOJ_NMG_0116824

All but Washington's wildest dreamers knew that the South Vietnamese could not meet our ultimatums -- especially our demand that they create a popular national state strong enough to control the rivalries that had long ripped the country apart. And more years of U.S. training could not possibly make a difference because the core missing element was not South Vietnamese combat or leadership skills -- it was belief in a nation worth fighting for.

To make the drama of Vietnamization work, the pullout had to be gradual and easily explained to the American public. The U.S. training force left behind had to be large enough to provide signs of our commitment on the 6 o'clock news. Pictures of unarmed advisers like me shaking hands with happy peasants would support the fallacy that Vietnamization was working.

The White House hoped that this strategy would keep the house of cards upright for at least a couple of years, providing what Kissinger infamously called a "decent interval" that could hide the U.S. defeat by declaring that the fate of South Vietnam was now the responsibility of the South Vietnamese. If they didn't want freedom badly enough to win, well, we had done our best.

By June 1971, the 101st Airborne Division, stationed just outside Hu?, had all but stood down from active fighting. It had provided the security that allowed my training/advisory teams and me to continue building schools and roads and training local officials. Even as that protection ebbed, my teams were still expected to go into a countryside that was becoming more dangerous by the day. As the U.S. adviser to Hu?, I was an easy target anytime the Viet Cong might have wanted to take me out. I kept a case of grenades under my bed, slept with an M-16 propped against the bedstead and had a dubious army of four Vietnamese house guards who I hoped would at least fire a warning shot before running away.

On April 27, 1972, North Vietnamese forces swept south across the demilitarized zone, scattering the South Vietnamese army defenders in Quang Tri and pushing south toward Hu?. By early May, the battle line arced 15 miles north and 10 miles west of the city. To the east was the South China Sea and to the south, the road to Danang -- Hu?'s last ground link to the outside world.

More than 200,000 refugees poured into Hu?. Hungry people fought for scraps of garbage and looted homes and shops. Among the refugees were hundreds of deserters from the South Vietnamese divisions shattered in Quang Tri, still wearing uniforms and carrying M-16s. A mob of drunken soldiers torched the main market at Dong Ba. The city's firemen had long since fled, and black smoke hung in a pall over streets now jammed with terrified people and echoing with gunshots and shattering glass. There was nothing we could do but watch the shouting, shoving mass of people stream past us toward the Danang road.

No one knew it at the time, but the battle raging just north and west of Hu? that night -- May 2, 1972 -- was the turning point in the war. If the city fell, the road to Danang would be open to the North Vietnamese army. My three American colleagues in Hu? and I did not believe we would be pulled out in time if the city fell. We knew that any choppers sent to save us would be mobbed by Vietnamese desperate to escape. We're alive because U.S. carrier jets caught the advancing North Vietnamese at daybreak just short of the city walls and all but obliterated them.

For all this, there never really was a decent interval in Vietnam. The pictures on the evening news showed not happy peasants but terror and carnage as Vietnam collapsed.

The pictures from Iraq are no different. The overall strategy seems no different, either. What President Bush wants to do is Vietnamization in all but name. Its purpose is not to win an unwinnable war, but to provide political cover for a defeat, and eventually to blame the loss on the Iraqis.

A temporary surge of troops will make no difference -- except to the Americans and Iraqis who will be killed. Increased training also will make no difference. What the Iraqi military and police need is not just technical skill, but loyalty to a viable central government that is nowhere in sight.

The surge will be reversed. The military force left behind to protect the president's "provincial reconstruction teams" will be drawn down to a bare minimum, further increasing the dangers for the Americans who remain.

Our benchmarks won't be met. As the situation deteriorates, whatever remains of a central government in Baghdad will be even less willing or able to control centuries of sectarian hatreds. The civil war will spiral out of control, giving us the justification we need to get out, blaming the Iraqis for the mess we've left behind.

But the world will know whose mess it is.

John A. Graham, a former Foreign Service officer, served in Vietnam in 1971-72.

UN-weary, US Opts For Unilateral Moves Against Iran (AFP)

By Sylvie Lanteaume

AFP, January 14, 2007

Recent US operations against Iranian interests in Iraq appear to signal a shift by Washington towards unilateral action after growing frustated with slow-moving UN diplomacy.

"We have had a strategy toward Iran, I think, that has been evolving to deal with the serious problems that Iran is causing," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in remarks released Saturday by the State Department.

DOJ_NMG_0116825

Rice, who arrived in Jerusalem Saturday at the start of a Middle East tour partly aimed at rallying Arab nations against Iran's influence, defended a US raid Thursday against an Iranian office in Iraq.

US troops entered an Iranian office in Arbil and arrested five people suspected to be engaged in anti-US activities. Tehran condemned the operation.

Rice warned that similar actions would be undertaken. "We've done it a couple of times. We're going to keep doing it," she said aboard a plane heading to the Middle East.

In late December, the US military arrested two Iranian diplomats in Baghdad, then released them several hours later.

Faced with lawmakers' concerns in the Democratic-led Congress that Washington could launch a military intervention in Iran, the White House and the Pentagon have been trying to dispel fears and rumors of a conflict with Iran or Syria, after the announcement of a US military buildup in the Gulf.

President George W. Bush, in unveiling his new plan for Iraq, announced Wednesday the imminent deployment of Patriot anti-missile defense systems in the region to defend Washington's allies and support stability in the Middle East.

In addition, according to a senior US military official, Washington will send two aircraft carrier groups to the Gulf in the coming weeks.

US administration officials now describe Iran as the single greatest threat the United States faces in the Middle East.

Rice assured that the US was not giving up on diplomacy in dealing with Iran, particularly on the issue of its nuclear program that Washington suspects masks a weapons program. Iran insists it is for civilian energy production.

"The nuclear problem -- we're going to continue to leave the door open for diplomacy," Rice said in the State Department release.

"But frankly, the process that we went through to get this last (UN Security Council) resolution was -- even though I think the resolution itself is very good, the process was, I think, not really actually helpful because I think it exposed certain splits.

"Fortunately, we were able to bring it back together around an actual resolution," she said.

The US battled for months to overcome resistance from China and Russia to impose sanctions on Iran for its refusal to suspend uranium-enrichment activities.

A Security Council resolution finally was passed on December 23, but the sanctions imposed were far weaker than those sought by Washington.

The first sign that Washington would act alone came from the US Treasury, which has barred two Iranian banks since September and pressured global financial firms to break their ties with Iran.

"We're going to keep designating Iranian banks," Rice said en route to the region.

Rice: U.S. Aims To Curb Iran Aggression (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, January 14, 2007

U.S. raids that President Bush approved against Iranian targets in Iraq are part of broad efforts to confront Tehran's aggression, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Saturday.

"The United States is simply responding to Iranian activities that have been going on for a while now that threaten not just to destabilize the chance for Iraq to proceed to stability but also that endanger our forces," Rice said before meeting with Israel's foreign minister.

Bush approved the strategy several months ago, U.S. officials said, in response to what Washington claims is Iran's support for terrorists inside Iraq and the alleged funneling of bombs to anti-U.S. insurgents.

Echoing other Bush administration figures, Rice said the U.S. does not intend to cross the Iraq-Iran border to attack Iranians.

Five Iranians were detained by U.S.-led forces after a raid Thursday on an Iranian government liaison office in northern Iraq. The move further frayed relations between the two countries.

The United States accuses Iran of helping provide roadside bombs that have killed American troops in Iraq. Also, a bitter standoff already exists over Iran's nuclear program.

Rice told reporters that the Iranian office was not a diplomatic consulate, which would be protected by international treaty.

The State Department said Friday that U.S.-led forces entered an Iranian building in Kurdish-controlled Irbil because information linked it to Revolutionary Guards and other Iranian elements engaging in violent activities in Iraq.

State Department spokesman Tom Casey said there was no truth to reports that Iran was carrying out legitimate diplomatic activity at the site.

DOJ_NMG_0116826

But Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari, a Kurd, contended the Iranians were working in a liaison office that had government approval and was in the process of being approved as a consulate. In Iran, Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said the U.S. raid constituted an intervention in Iranian-Iraqi affairs.

Rice Says U.S. Will Defend Its Interest In The Persian Gulf (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel

McClatchy Newspapers, January 14, 2007

JERUSALEM - U.S. military moves in the Persian Gulf and raids against Iranian installations in Iraq are meant to demonstrate that the United States will defend its interests against an increasingly aggressive Iran, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Saturday.

Rice made her comments as she began a Middle East tour in which she will try to bolster moderate Arab leaders who increasingly are under threat from both Shiite and Sunni Muslim extremists.

The focus of her diplomacy this week shows how far the United States has been forced to change its aims in the region because the war in Iraq has turned out differently than planned.

President Bush, Rice and others predicted the Iraq invasion would spread democracy throughout the Arab world. Instead, Rice now appears to be playing defense against Iran's emboldened leaders.

Following a new policy laid down by President Bush, U.S. military forces this week detained Iranians in two raids in northern Iraq. Washington says it has evidence that Iranian agents are destabilizing Iraq by constructing a deadly class of roadside bombs and backing Shiite militias.

Bush, who issued fresh warnings to Iran in his Wednesday speech outlining his new Iraq plan, has also ordered a second U.S. aircraft carrier strike group to the Persian Gulf and dispatched Patriot anti-missile batteries to American allies in the Gulf.

Some senators have expressed alarm that the moves could represent a widening of U.S. war aims in the strategic Gulf region.

But Rice said the moves were merely a response to Iranian actions.

"The United States has long, historic interests in the Persian Gulf," Rice said at an appearance with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni. "We have always-president after president after president-sought to have a force posture that makes clear we can defend those interests."

Rice meets with Palestinian and Israeli leaders Sunday and Monday in an effort to lay the groundwork for progress in solving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

But she has played down the prospects of quick movement. She told reporters traveling aboard her airplane that, "I'm not coming with a proposal. I'm not coming with a plan" to present to the two sides.

At the appearance with Livni, Rice acknowledged "there are a lot of obstacles" to surmount.

But she said Bush is determined to make progress toward a Palestinian state before he leaves office in two years.

Livni, potentially a future Israeli prime minister, has floated a proposal to flesh out the characteristics of an eventual Palestinian state, in order to strengthen Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas.

Rice did not endorse the idea, but said she was open to considering "all the options."

Complicating Rice's diplomacy is the fact that both Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Abbas are politically weak.

The Bush administration is planning to spend $86 million to train and equip Abbas' security forces, to strengthen him in his power struggle with the militant group Hamas.

Aboard her plane, Rice also told reporters that the United States would not abandon Iraq even if Bush's latest plan fails.

"We're not pulling the plug on Iraq," she said. "I think we'll worry about making Plan A work for now. And obviously, if it doesn't, then you know, we're not going to say, oh my goodness, that didn't work, there's nothing that can be done."

Detained Iranians Had Ties To Extremists (WT/AP)

By Lauren Frayer

The Washington Times/AP, January 14, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) -- Five Iranians arrested in northern Iraq last week were connected to an Iranian Revolutionary Guard faction that funds and arms insurgents in Iraq, the U.S. military said Sunday.

The five were detained by U.S.-led forces Thursday in a raid on an Iranian government liaison office in Irbil, a city in Kurdish-controlled northern Iraq 217 miles north of Baghdad.

"Preliminary results revealed the five detainees are connected to the Iranian Revolutionary Guard, Qods Force (IRGC-QF), an organization known for providing funds, weapons, improvised explosive device technology and training to extremist groups attempting to destabilize the government of Iraq and attack coalition forces," the U.S. military said in a statement.

"Qods" is the Arabic name for Jerusalem, and a frequent name for political or military factions across the Muslim world.

Tehran denied the five detained Iranians had been involved in financing and arming insurgents in Iraq.

"Their job was basically consular, official and in the framework of regulations," Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini said Sunday during his weekly media briefing. "What Americans express was incorrect and hyperbole against Iran in order to justify their acts."

Hosseini said the Iranian representative office where the five men worked was established in Irbil in 1992 to facilitate the visit of Kurdish businessmen and medical patients from Iraq to Iran.

"Then, both countries agreed to promote it to consular level," he said. "Agreement for formation of the Iranian consulate section was exchanged in the current (Iranian) year."

The United States accuses Iran of helping to provide roadside bombs that have killed American troops in Iraq, and a bitter standoff already exists between the two countries over Iran's nuclear program. Iran has rejected the allegations.

Hosseini accused the United States of resorting to "hostility and conflict toward neighbors of Iraq" because he said the country did not want to acknowledge it had failed to bring stability to Iraq.

"The United States should release all the five persons, prevent possible similar acts and compensate damages," Hosseini said.

Two days after the raid, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said President Bush approved the strategy of raiding Iranian targets in Iraq as part of a broad effort to confront Tehran.

One day before the Irbil raid, Bush delivered a speech outlining a new strategy for Iraq, in which he accused Iran and Syria of not doing enough to block terrorists from entering Iraq over their borders. He specifically blamed Iran for providing material support for attacks on American troops.

"We will disrupt the attacks on our forces," Bush said Wednesday. "We will interrupt the flow of support from Iran and Syria. And we will seek out and destroy the networks providing advanced weaponry and training to our enemies in Iraq."

The U.S. State Department has said American-led forces entered the Irbil facility because information linked it to Revolutionary Guards and other Iranian elements engaging in violent activities in Iraq.

U.S.-led troops would "continue to disrupt logistical support to extremists that originate from outside Iraq," the statement continued. "These initiatives are part of a broader plan including diplomatic efforts designed to support the Iraqi government, protect the Iraqi people, and seek assistance from neighboring nations."

There has been debate over whether the Irbil office where the men were arrested had diplomatic status, and would therefore be protected by international treaties.

Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari, a Kurd, described it as a liaison office that had government approval and was in the process of being approved as an Iranian consulate.

But the U.S. State Department has said no legitimate diplomatic activity was being carried out at the site, and Rice said the office was not a consulate.

"The facility in which the detention took place has been described by various Iraqi officials as an Iranian liaison office, but it did not enjoy the diplomatic status of a consulate according to Iraqi and U.S. officials," the U.S. statement said.

Iran and the U.S. have had no diplomatic relations since 1979, when militants seized the U.S. Embassy in Tehran and kept 52 people hostage for 444 days.

Iran Demands Release Of Citizens (BBC)

BBC.com, January 14, 2007

Iran has demanded the immediate release of five of its citizens held in a US military raid in northern Iraq, who it says are diplomats.

The five men arrested on Thursday in Irbil are accused by the US military of having targeted Iraqi and US-led coalition forces.

But Iran's foreign ministry says they were "involved in consulate affairs".

Iran also demanded compensation for damage to the Iranian liaison office where the men were seized.

The US military says the men are agents of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards, a group whom the US says is seeking to destabilise Iraq by supplying weapons to insurgents.

The US said the Iranians did not have diplomatic papers.

'Incorrect claim'

"Their activities were legal and in the framework of the law," Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini said in response to the allegations.

"What the Americans claim is incorrect. They want to create a climate that justifies their illegal action," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0116828

The raid followed a warning by President George W Bush on Wednesday that the US would take a tough stance towards Iran and Syria, whom he accused of destabilising Iraq.

Tehran vehemently denies the charges.

The Revolutionary Guards unit, known locally as the Pasdaran, is a parallel military force with its own army, air force and navy.

It was set up to enforce and defend the principles of the 1979 Islamic revolution and answers directly to Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

Gunboat Diplomacy: The Watch On The Gulf (NYT)

By John Kifner

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

THE United States Central Command stretches across some of the world's most volatile real estate from Kenya in the southwest through all of the Middle East to Kazakhstan in the northeast. It encompasses two active combat theaters: Afghanistan, which is landlocked, and Iraq, with a tiny uncontested shoreline.

In both, the main fighting is counterinsurgency, largely the task of light infantry like the Marines and the Army's 10th Mountain or 82nd and 101st Airborne Divisions. CentCom, as it is known, has always been run by a four-star general from the Army or Marines.

So why name a sailor — Adm. William J. Fallon — as CentCom's new commander, as President Bush did earlier this month?

One word: Iran.

Admiral Fallon's appointment comes amid a series of indications that the Bush administration is increasingly focused on putting pressure on Iran and, perhaps, veering toward open confrontation. They include the dispatching of a second Navy carrier battle group to the Persian Gulf; a blunt singling out of Iran in Mr. Bush's speech Wednesday night, warning that America will "seek out and destroy the networks providing advanced weaponry and training to our enemies in Iraq," followed by a dawn raid Thursday on an Iranian office in the Kurdish city of Erbil in which five Iranians were seized along with files and computers.

The important thing is that Admiral Fallon is a naval aviator.

Now the ranking officer in the Pacific — the Navy's traditional fief — his résumé includes 24 years of flight assignments beginning with combat in Vietnam and including commanding the air wing on the carrier Theodore Roosevelt in the first Iraq war.

Iran thus far has been the principal beneficiary of the American enterprise in Iraq, exerting influence over the Shiite parties it nurtured in exile and expanding its own regional prestige. The Iranians' confidence and defiance have been bolstered by the knowledge that American ground forces are stretched near the breaking point in Iraq and Afghanistan.

But introducing more air and sea power, with their long reach, in the gulf could change the military balance and options.

It is classic gunboat diplomacy.

The American naval presence in the gulf is the Fifth Fleet, based in Manama, Bahrain. It usually numbers around 20 ships, capable of putting 15,000 sailors and marines afloat. Its principal component is a carrier battle group, so adding a second will, in effect, double its air and sea power.

A carrier battle group typically consists of a Nimitz-class carrier like the Eisenhower, a floating city so huge one can see the horizon rise and fall without feeling the swell of the sea, and capable of carrying as many as 85 aircraft, along with protective escorts. These usually include two guided missile cruisers, two destroyers, a frigate, two submarines and a supply ship. These smaller vessels could be used for other tasks, like escorting tankers through the narrow Strait of Hormuz, through which much of the world's oil passes, or enforcing sanctions or a blockade on Iran.

The Fifth Fleet also normally has a Marine landing force of 2,200, roughly equally divided between ground troops and air support, aboard three specialized ships that can be used in raids or other operations.

Will this cow the Iranians? Ray Takeyh, an Iran expert at the Council on Foreign Relations, thinks not. More likely, he said, is that "the more radical militants will use this to berate the more moderate" and "the notion of accommodating Western audiences will diminish."

Admiral's Diplomatic Skills Could Prove Crucial (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

When Adm. William J. Fallon -- the nominee to command U.S. forces in the Middle East -- was tasked with resuscitating military ties with China, he took on the challenge with characteristic gusto.

DOJ_NMG_0116829

The veteran fighter pilot from New Jersey pushed beyond the standard banquets with Chinese generals to meet younger officers and tour military bases, eventually talking his way into the cockpit of an advanced Chinese FB-7 warplane.

An avid jogger, Fallon, 62, also bypassed conventional sightseeing, setting off for a run through Beijing that surprised his hosts and forced plainclothes agents in suits and leather shoes to tag-team to keep up.

Fallon's path-breaking pursuit of U.S. strategic goals -- shown over the past two years in his dealings with China, Japan, Indonesia and 40 other Asian states as head of the Pacific Command -- is a major factor behind his nomination to replace Gen. John P. Abizaid at the Central Command, Pentagon officials say.

"Fox Fallon is one of the best strategic thinkers in uniform today and his reputation for innovation is without peer," according to a statement this month from Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates recommending Fallon, whose Navy aviator call-sign "Silver Fox" stemmed from his prematurely gray hair.

As the United States sends more troops, warships and aircraft into the Middle East, Fallon would play a critical role diplomatically and militarily in trying to prevent the "regional conflagration" that Gates has warned could ignite if Iraq erupts into full-scale civil war -- and, in particular, to counter any aggression by Iran.

Fallon's selection as the first Navy officer to head the Central Command comes as the United States dispatches a second carrier, the USS John C. Stennis, to the Persian Gulf for the first time since 2003. Dispatching the carrier strike group, which joins the USS Dwight D. Eisenhower, "is an important way to demonstrate U.S. commitment and strength," a senior Pentagon official said last week.

Fallon, who flew F-14 jets in strike missions off the deck of a carrier during the 1991 Persian Gulf War, understands the long-standing role of the Navy in maintaining the flow of Middle Eastern oil through the Strait of Hormuz, officials said.

"Iran is the most powerful military force in the region" apart from the United States, and it has a navy capable of blocking the strait, Abizaid said in September. Iran also has a "substantial" missile force, an army that is training for guerrilla-style attacks, and a "robust terrorist surrogate arm," he said.

Fallon's selection for a command traditionally headed by an Army or Marine Corps general makes sense militarily, Pentagon officials said, because most of the moving pieces in the region are ships and aircraft, in contrast to the troops engaged in Iraq and Afghanistan. Fallon is likely to focus less on ground-war tactics in Iraq than did Abizaid, who became commander in the immediate aftermath of the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, they said.

"He'll be flying at 30,000 feet, not launching company patrols by the Army," said Frances D. Cook, a former ambassador in the Persian Gulf region and a senior fellow at the Center for Naval Analyses who has worked with Fallon.

With a seasoned Army general in Baghdad, Fallon would focus more broadly on the region. "He's not going to be expected to give Dave Petraeus advice on how to do a sweep of Fallujah. He'll be focused on building relations in the region as he did in the Pacific," said retired Rear Adm. Stephen Pietropaoli, executive director of the Navy League. Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus has been named to replace Gen. George W. Casey Jr. as the top U.S. commander for Iraq in a planned turnover of military leaders in the region.

Indeed, with Gates calling a U.S. military confrontation with Iran a "last resort," analysts said that Fallon's diplomatic skills are likely to be more important than his war-fighting experience when he assumes the Central Command post, his fourth as a four-star commander. "With Iran and the Middle East, you need to establish relations that will not lead to combat. Fallon will be the first to tell you that," said Pietropaoli, who worked under Fallon when Fallon was vice chief of naval operations from 2000 to 2003.

"You are looking for an officer who can pull together the whole political, military and diplomatic mission. . . . He spent a lot of time working sensitive diplomatic issues," said retired Adm. Thomas Fargo, a former chief of the Pacific Command. Fargo and others recalled Fallon's high-profile apology to the families of Japanese who were killed when their vessel, Ehime Maru, was accidentally sunk by a Navy submarine in early 2001.

Confident but not imperious, Fallon combines a tough, unvarnished style with a light touch and a keen interest in other cultures, which makes him highly effective, current and former officials who know him say. "He doesn't wear his rank the way some people do," said Ambassador Derek Shearer, the former U.S. envoy to Finland who began working with Fallon in 1996 when Fallon commanded a battle group during NATO operations in Bosnia.

Fallon, a world history buff, told The Washington Post through a spokesman that he recently finished reading the book "No God but God," by Iranian author Reza Aslan, an advocate of ending religious conflicts between East and West. Fallon had served in the Middle East before, on a joint task force in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, and he recently traveled to Iraq to meet with some of the thousands of U.S. troops deployed there from the Pacific Command.

On Iraq, U.S. Turns To Onetime Dissenters (WP)

By Rajiv Chandrasekaran

DOJ_NMG_0116830

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

Timothy M. Carney went to Baghdad in April 2003 to run Iraq's Ministry of Industry and Minerals. Unlike many of his compatriots in the Green Zone, the rangy, retired American ambassador wasn't fazed by chaos. He'd been in Saigon during the Tet Offensive, Phnom Penh as it was falling to the Khmer Rouge and Mogadishu in the throes of Somalia's civil war. Once he received his Halliburton-issued Chevrolet Suburban, he disregarded security edicts and drove around Baghdad without a military escort. His mission, as he put it, "was to listen to the Iraqis and work with them."

He left after two months, disgusted and disillusioned. The U.S. occupation administration in Iraq, the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA), placed ideology over pragmatism, he believed. His boss, viceroy L. Paul Bremer, refused to pay for repairs needed to reopen many looted state-owned factories, even though they had employed tens of thousands of Iraqis. Carney spent his days screening workers for ties to the Baath Party.

"Planning was bad," he wrote in his diary on May 8, "but implementation is worse."

When he returned to Washington, he made little secret of his views. They were so scathing that his wife lost a government contract. He figured his days of working on Iraq were over.

Until a phone call on Tuesday.

David Satterfield, the State Department's Iraq coordinator, was on the line with a question: Would Carney be willing to go back to Baghdad as the overall coordinator of the American reconstruction effort?

The decision to send Carney back to Iraq -- and to abandon the policies that so rankled him in 2003 -- represents a fundamental shift in the Bush administration's approach to stabilizing the country. Desperate for new approaches to stifle the persistent Sunni insurgency and Shiite death squads that are jointly pushing the country toward an all-out civil war, the White House made a striking about-face last week, embracing strategies and people it once opposed or cast aside.

Indeed, Carney's rushed selection came just days after the administration announced two other key Baghdad appointments from among the ranks of dissenters in 2003: Ambassador designate Ryan Crocker and Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who will take over command of all coalition forces in Iraq.

Crocker, who spent the summer of 2003 helping to form Iraq's Governing Council, left the country frustrated with the CPA's reluctance to reach out to minority Sunnis. Even before the invasion, he wrote a blunt memo for then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell warning of the uncontrolled sectarian and ethnic tensions that would be released by the overthrow of Saddam Hussein.

Petraeus, who spent 2003 commanding the 101st Airborne Division in Mosul, grew dismayed by the heavy-handed tactics fellow military commanders were using to combat insurgents. He also opposed the methods by which Bremer disbanded the Iraqi army and fired Baathists from government jobs. And he chafed at the way reconstruction funds, personnel and decision-making were centralized in Baghdad. The CPA's policies, he said in 2004, should have been "tempered by reality."

It's a view the White House now seems to accept.

The plan unveiled by Bush last week calls for many people who lost their jobs under Bremer's de-Baathification decree to be rehired. It calls for more Sunnis, who were marginalized under the CPA, to be brought into the government. It calls for state-owned factories to be reopened. It calls for more reconstruction personnel to be stationed outside the Green Zone. It calls for a counterinsurgency strategy that emphasizes providing security to the civilian population over transferring responsibility to local military forces.

Carney believes such measures could have been effective three years ago. Today, he worries they will be too little, too late.

During the phone call, Satterfield told him that the new reconstruction effort might not succeed. The two men agreed that if it was to have a chance, Americans would have to work more closely and collaboratively with Iraqis.

To Carney, it suggested "a sense of reality."

"It's certainly different than anything I saw out of the CPA or the aftermath of that," he said. "It seemed a little refreshing, actually."

He paused.

"It's been a long time coming."A Plan in Need of a Leader

Bush and his national security team began working on their new Iraq strategy in earnest shortly after the Nov. 7 midterm elections, which amounted to a rebuke of the president's war policy. They met among themselves. They talked to diplomats and military commanders in Iraq. They conducted a videoconference with Iraq's prime minister. They consulted with retired generals, experts at think tanks and academics.

By late December, the president and his closest security advisers -- Vice President Cheney, new Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley -- had coalesced around the need for more troops in Iraq. They had settled on Crocker to handle political strategy on the ground, replacing Ambassador

DOJ_NMG_0116831

Zalmay Khalilzad. And they had picked Petraeus to take over from Gen. George W. Casey Jr., whom they deemed to be too focused on the handover of responsibility to the Iraqis instead of on restoring peace to Baghdad's strife-torn neighborhoods.

But it wasn't until Monday, when Bush was going over a draft of the address he planned to deliver on television Wednesday, that they confronted the issue of who would coordinate the administration's new economic initiatives for Iraq.

Bush was planning to propose increasing the number of province-level reconstruction teams operating outside the Green Zone from 10 to 18. There would be new efforts to help the Iraqi government improve budgeting and management functions. And, most important, there would be a significant new emphasis on putting unemployed Iraqis to work. The strategy also included an implicit reversal of Bremer's policy on state-owned factories.

Scores of Americans ensconced in Baghdad's Green Zone would be involved: The U.S. Embassy has an economic section. There's a U.S. Agency for International Development mission. And there's the Project and Contracting Office, which manages reconstruction funded by an $18.4 billion U.S. aid package.

"Who's going to coordinate this?" Bush asked as he read through the economic initiatives, according to two people with knowledge of the meeting.

When Satterfield got back to his State Department office, he told his staff to "give me names."

The next day -- less than 36 hours before Bush addressed the nation -- Satterfield called Carney.Idle Factories, Idle Workers

Before Carney left Iraq in June 2003, he tried one last time to persuade Bremer to rethink his refusal to repair more than a handful of state-owned factories. Iraq's government-run businesses employed more than 100,000 people before the U.S. invasion. To Carney, it was a no-brainer: Fixing the factories would allow thousands of Iraqis to get back to work, not only allowing them to provide for their families, but also keeping them occupied. He knew from his time in other post-conflict societies that the idle and unemployed are the best recruits for insurgencies.

But Bremer and his chief economic adviser, Peter McPherson, didn't want to pour money into inefficient state-run firms. They believed private investors would buy Iraq's government factories and set up new businesses to employ the populace. So they refused to give Carney money to reopen the plants.

The day before he left, Carney sent a note to McPherson titled "Fatal Flaws in Budget Policy towards State-Owned Enterprises." He argued that the CPA was violating the Geneva Conventions by undermining "assets of the Iraqi people." He also accused McPherson of drawing up policy "without adequate Iraqi participation."

"Instead of transparency, with major concerned Iraqi Ministries and academics engaged," he wrote, "the policy seems to be the thinking of a small group in the Coalition Provisional Authority."

"We need to rethink this," he wrote in closing.

Petraeus also opposed the immediate privatization of state-run firms. "What happens when you have privatization is . . . you end up with a hell of a lot less workers in the short term," he told an interviewer in 2004. "If you want to increase unemployment en route to greater employment and greater productivity and greater a lot of other things, that's great, but you've got to survive in the short term."

For almost three years, the policy didn't change. Although the Iraqi government reopened a small fraction of its 148 factories and began operating them at a diminished capacity, the efforts to sell them to private investors were unsuccessful.

When Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, at the time the top U.S. field commander in Iraq, sought to increase production at a state-owned tractor factory south of Baghdad early last year, a State Department official in Baghdad refused to pay for the necessary repairs, even though the rehabilitated facility would have been able to provide employment for many of the 10,000 people who worked there before the invasion. Chiarelli used money from a different program -- for small-scale reconstruction projects -- to fund the construction.

It wasn't until June that the Bush administration began to reevaluate its approach. Paul A. Brinkley, who had recently taken over as deputy undersecretary of defense for business transformation, returned from a trip to Iraq convinced that quelling violence depended on increasing employment. To Brinkley, a former corporate executive, the most effective way to create jobs was to reopen state-run factories.

Brinkley persuaded Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England to authorize funding to repair as many as 200 factories. England's predecessor, Paul D. Wolfowitz, was among the administration officials who opposed resuscitating state-owned firms in 2003.

It's not clear how effective Brinkley's initiative will be. Many of the factories are in dangerous, Sunni-dominated areas of the country. Electricity remains in short supply. Raw materials can be hard to come by. And given the intensity of the sectarian conflict, giving Iraqis jobs may not be enough to get them to put down their weapons.

Even if the odds are slim, the Bush administration wants to give it a try. Brinkley's team is focusing on 10 factories that it thinks could be open and employing more than 11,000 Iraqis by the end of this month.

DOJ_NMG_0116832

"Any counterinsurgency strategy has to have an economic component to it," said Celeste Ward, who spent last year in Iraq as Chiarelli's political adviser. "It might give us a marginal increase in stability by getting some people off the street. You want people to start saying, 'Hey, we're a normal country where people go to work.' "De-Baathification

"This is a big mistake," Carney thought in May 2003, when Bremer told senior CPA officials that he would soon issue an edict prohibiting many former members of Hussein's Baath Party from holding government jobs. The one-and-a-half-page decree, which was drafted in the Pentagon office of then-Undersecretary of Defense Douglas J. Feith, banned anyone who had been in the party's top four ranks; it also banned hundreds of thousands of rank-and-file members from holding senior management positions in government ministries. Bremer's stated goal was to cleanse Iraq's government of the former president's cronies.

Carney and the other Americans tapped to run Iraq's ministries knew that the senior managers in almost all government departments were Baathists. Hussein's government had forced them to join the party, but that didn't mean they all had blood on their hands or that they were all close associates of the former leader. And without them, it would be much more challenging to get the government running again.

With unemployment at more than 40 percent, Carney also knew that anyone kicked out of a government job wasn't going to find work elsewhere. They would be unemployed and angry.

Carney was one of many CPA officials to object. But Bremer refused to soften the policy.

The de-Baathification expert in the CPA's headquarters was Meghan O'Sullivan, then an aide to Bremer and now a deputy national security adviser working on Iraq. Although she voiced initial misgivings, she quickly became a vigorous and uncompromising enforcer of the edict.

From the moment the order was issued, most of Carney's time was devoted to de-Baathification. He held long meetings with the industry ministry's management, first to explain the policy and then to comb through records to identify people who were ineligible for future employment.

"It was a terrible waste of time," Carney said. "There were so many more important things we should have been doing, like starting factories and paying salaries."

After a few months, the CPA began to receive reports that 10,000 to 15,000 teachers had been fired because of the de-Baathification order. In some Sunni-dominated areas, entire schools were left with just one or two teachers.

Bremer eventually concluded that the policy had been applied "unevenly and unjustly." But instead of rescinding his edict, he announced that appeals would be handled by a de-Baathification commission headed by Ahmed Chalabi, a controversial former exile whose informants had helped the Bush administration make the case for war. Chalabi, a Shiite, saw little need to accommodate former Baathists, most of whom are Sunnis.

By the summer of 2004, as the United States was relinquishing sovereignty of Iraq, many officials handling Iraq policy in Washington had concluded that Bremer's initial edict was a mistake. But it was too late for the Americans to do anything other than urge Iraq's Shiite-led interim government to rehire ex-Baathists. The CPA no longer had the power to issue edicts.

U.S. officials in Baghdad and in Washington leaned on the governments of prime ministers Ayad Allawi and Ibrahim al-Jafari, but the country's powerful Shiite and Kurdish leaders were unwilling to embrace the changes sought by the Bush administration. As far as they were concerned, Bremer enacted a sound policy in 2003, and there was little need to change it.

Finally, in 2005, the Shiites and Kurds agreed to reexamine the de-Baathification rules as part of a compromise to get Sunni political parties to support Iraq's new constitution. The agreement called for a revised de-Baathification law to be enacted by parliament.

But that still hasn't happened.

In an attempt to get the process moving, Bush used his televised address last week to call on Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to embrace the reintegration of former Baathists. Maliki told Bush recently that he supports a revised de-Baathification law -- but the issue isn't in the prime minister's hands. It's still with Chalabi.

Chalabi is the chairman of the Supreme National Commission for De-Baathification, which continues to have ultimate authority to decide which ex-Baathists can return to work and which cannot. He has prepared draft legislation that calls for easing some elements of Bremer's policy, but he said parliament has been unable to act on it because a majority of the members of the legislature's de-Baathification committee belong to radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr's political party, which walked out in November to protest a meeting between Maliki and Bush.

Speaking by telephone from Baghdad, Chalabi said he expects progress "pretty soon."

But he said the law will not contain a key demand of the U.S. government: a sunset clause that would abolish the commission, effectively depriving Chalabi of political influence. He called it unconstitutional.

Chalabi said he heard Bush's call for swift action on the de-Baathification law, but he emphasized that he and his fellow Iraqis, not U.S. officials, are in charge of the legislative timetable.

DOJ_NMG_0116833

"We don't feel any pressure," he said.

US Military May Join Iraq Against Militia Leaders (BOS)

By Farah Stockman And Bryan Bender, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 14, 2007

Bush authorization could spark deadly confrontations

WASHINGTON -- US military officials say the Bush administration has given them new authority to target leaders of political and religious militias in Iraq who are implicated in sectarian violence, including the powerful Shi'ite Muslim cleric Moqtada al-Sadr.

Such a showdown, key to Bush's plan to increase the number of US troops in Baghdad, could spark a deadly confrontation with Shi'ite militias, which enjoy widespread popularity in Shi'ite neighborhoods. It could also erode support for the fragile government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who has agreed to the plan.

Senior US and Iraqi officials said last week that Maliki has pledged to confront the militias with the help of additional US troops. But many analysts doubt that Maliki has the will or the firepower to take on Sadr, whose Mahdi Army militia is blamed for much of the tit-for-tat violence in the capital.

In recent months, Maliki and other top Iraqi officials routinely vetoed US raids on Sadr's operations, fearing the reaction of his legion of followers. Maliki's government kept a list of militia leaders who were off-limits to US troops, a senior Pentagon official told reporters in a background briefing in Washington, but now Maliki has agreed that the list would no longer be used.

The officials said the new approach will include pinpoint strikes against top leaders in the Mahdi Army as well as other militias from the Shi'ite majority accused of kidnapping and murdering civilians from the Sunni Muslim minority. They said they would focus on methodical man hunts for key leaders, such as the one in June that killed key Al Qaeda operative Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, rather than full-scale battles.

Pursuing the militias carries significant risks, both for Maliki, a far less popular figure than Sadr, and for the United States, which could be drawn deeper into dangerous urban warfare and an increasingly sectarian conflict.

"Even if the Iraqis had the will -- and that's a big question -- to do something about sectarian violence, it's going to be a very bloody business," said Phebe Marr, a specialist on Iraq's emerging political parties and author of "The Modern History of Iraq."

"This could make Sadr even more popular," Marr said. "He could play this as 'the imperialist Americans are coming to attack me.' "

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Thursday that Sadr must be neutralized.

"The Iraqis are going to have to deal with Sadr," she said, in response to a question. "They're going to have to deal with those death squads, and the prime minister said nobody and nothing is off-limits."

Bush's plan envisions adding 17,500 more US forces in Baghdad -- which would more than double the American military presence there -- to operate alongside about 40,000 Iraqis from the army and police. The joint forces, which will include American units embedded in Iraqi brigades, would take on both Sunni insurgents and Shi'ite sectarian death squads, US military officials said Thursday in a background briefing.

Secretary of Defense Robert Gates told the Senate Armed Services Committee on Friday that Maliki's willingness to allow these joint forces to enter Sadr City and other key neighborhoods in Baghdad is "central to the success of this entire operation." Sadr City, a Baghdad slum with an estimated 2 million residents, was named after Sadr's father, a revered cleric assassinated during Saddam Hussein's regime.

But many politicians and military analysts expressed doubt that Maliki would follow through on pledges to support the crack down.

Senators Norm Coleman, a Minnesota Republican, and Bill Nelson, a Florida Democrat, told Rice at a Senate Foreign Relations hearing Thursday that their talks with Iraqi leaders in Baghdad three weeks ago left them with the impression that Iraq's fractured, Shi'ite-dominated government has little interest in stopping sectarian death squads from murdering Sunnis.

"Our mouths about dropped open when the national security adviser, Dr. [Mowaffak] Al-Rubaie, said . . . 'This is not a sectarian war,' " Nelson said.

Indeed, Rice acknowledged to the senators that Maliki's original request, made in the run-up to his meeting with Bush in November, was for US troops to withdraw to the outskirts of Baghdad, leaving the task of handling sectarian militias to Iraqis alone. But Rice said that after extensive talks with US commanders, Maliki eventually agreed to an aggressive US-Iraqi plan to tackle them.

DOJ_NMG_0116834

"I think it's become such a critical situation for them that they recognize they've got to take on anybody who stands in their way of bringing population security," she said, in response to a question about whether Maliki could survive a confrontation with Sadr.

Maliki's Islamic Dawa Party is the weakest of the three Shi'ite parties that dominate Iraq's government. Dawa has no militia of its own.

Sadr, on the other hand, is believed to command the loyalty of some 60,000 fighters across Iraq, although specialists differ on how much direct control he exercises over them. His movement is so powerful that some of his followers were allowed to attend the execution of Hussein. They called out Sadr's name as the former dictator was being led to the gallows, a moment captured on a video that was viewed on the Internet around the world.

Sadr's followers control four key ministries and hold 30 of 275 seats in Iraq's Parliament. They cast the deciding votes that brought Maliki to power but suspended their participation in the government to protest Maliki's meeting with Bush in November. Rice said the Iraqi government was functioning without them. But the boycott has left Iraq's Parliament in turmoil. The US military has already gotten a taste of all-out confrontation with Sadr. In 2004 they used aircraft and tanks to drive off his forces from a Najaf cemetery near the revered shrine of Imam Ali. Sadr's movement went quiet for about a year, but then grew stronger, attracting tens of thousands more followers with his nationalist call for a unified Iraq and the withdrawal of US forces.

Sadr's vehement opposition to US troops has only raised his profile among Shi'ites who see his militia -- not American or Iraqi troops -- as their only protection from Sunni insurgents.

Paul Hughes, a retired Army colonel who served as a military strategist in Iraq, warned that Bush's plan to pacify neighborhoods with an overwhelming military presence is designed to fight a classic insurgency, not the sectarian conflict that has swept up thousands of armed civilians.

"There is this real minefield that the United States is going into," he said.

Three weeks ago, thousands of protesters took to the streets in Najaf after US and Iraqi forces killed a top Sadr deputy.

On Friday, Sheik Abdel Razzaq al-Nadawi, a senior official in Sadr's movement, warned that US soldiers who come to Iraq "may return in coffins."

Juan R. Cole, a specialist on Shi'ite Muslims and professor of Middle East history at the University of Michigan, said that Sadr's forces could simply go underground during the US military campaign as they did after the 2004 battle in Najaf.

"At that time, the Shi'ite political elite got together and made the case to [Sadr] that he should lay low or things are going to go badly for him," Cole said. "I think that's what is happening now. I am extremely skeptical that Maliki would be willing to sacrifice one of the few pillars of support that he has. . . . They will lie low until the 'surge' is over and then they will come back out."

U.S. And Iraqi Forces In The Western Desert Look Toward The Horizon (LAT)

By Tony Perry, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

The process of turning over responsibility slow, but American soldiers try to prod them into the future.

WEST OF RAMADI, IRAQ — On a sandy promontory overlooking the desert that stretches to Syria and Jordan in western Iraq, U.S. Army officers and Iraqi police officials were discussing the future.

The Americans' concept of the future involved the Iraqis taking responsibility for catching insurgent smugglers and bomb-makers along the two freeways that stretch from the border region to Baghdad.

The future starts now, Capt. Ian Lauer told Iraqi police Col. Jassim Mohammed Ali, who served in the Iraqi army's special forces under the late Saddam Hussein.

"We've got to force them to have confidence," Lauer said. "They'll spend years saying they're not ready."

Ali, a broad-chested veteran of the 1991 Persian Gulf War, insisted that he was ready for the challenge.

"If we see bad people, we will arrest them," he said through an interpreter. "If they fight us, we will show no mercy. If they use one bullet, we will use two. If they use 10, we will use 100."

As part of the U.S. plan to withdraw from Al Anbar province and hand over security duties to the Iraqi army and police force, the Army's Task Force 1-77 Armor is ceding the desolate area 25 miles west of Ramadi to Ali's "emergency response unit," the Iraqi version of a SWAT team.

The unit's troops carry Soviet weapons once used by Hussein's army. They drive Ford trucks supplied by the United States, but they lack body armor and have only rudimentary communications gear.

"Sometimes you feel, 'We're forcing them to do stuff,' and then you think, 'Hey, it's your country,' " said Lauer, commander of the 1-77's Charlie Company. "Even if they had the equipment we have, some would complain."

DOJ_NMG_0116835

The process of turning over responsibility to the Iraqis is slow and incremental. For instance, U.S. forces may be turning over freeway security to the Iraqis — a largely symbolic move — but cannot yet give them responsibility for the transport of prisoners on those freeways.

Just minutes after the meeting with Ali and his troops, Lauer's convoy went to an Iraqi police station to pick up a suspected insurgent.

Iraqi police said the skinny 17-year-old had confessed to making bombs and stealing a weapon from a Humvee that had been bombed.

Across Al Anbar, judges and prosecutors have been targeted or intimidated. Many court buildings are a shambles and court personnel are dead, in hiding or have fled the country, officials said. Thus, the chore of detaining the suspected insurgent and shipping him to Baghdad for trial fell to U.S. forces.

In the roundabout world of Iraqi justice, suspects go from Iraqi custody to American custody; then U.S. officials sift through evidence submitted by Iraqi police to determine whether it would be sufficient in an Iraqi court.

Lauer checked the blindfolded suspect for signs of torture and found none.

"I am taking you into American custody," he said. At day's end, the Iraqi was at Camp Ramadi, the nearby U.S. base.

Ali, on the promontory with an icy wind blowing in from Syria more than 100 miles to the west, said that before the Americans came, he was once stationed at Camp Ramadi.

"Hopefully," Lauer said, "you'll be there again someday."

tony.perry@latimes.com

Kurdish Brigade Trains To Deploy In Baghdad (AP)

AP, January 13, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) -- A Kurdish army brigade in northern Iraq is undergoing intensive urban combat training as it readies for deployment in the latest Baghdad security operation and is expected to take on the capital's Mehdi Army Shiite militia, its commander said Saturday.

Meanwhile, three Iraqi generals told The Associated Press that the Iraqi commander who will lead the overall Baghdad security mission was the government's second choice and only got the job after the U.S. military objected to the first officer named to the post by Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki.

"We will head to Baghdad soon," said Brig. Gen. Nazir Assem Korran, commander of the 1st Infantry Brigade, 2nd Division of the Iraqi army.

"We have 3,000 soldiers who are currently undergoing intensive training especially in urban combat and how the army should act inside a city."

Korran, in the Kurdish northern city of Irbil, said he did not know how the operation would unfold, but said the Defense Ministry in Baghdad had asked his brigade to take part in the security operation along with thousands of other Iraqi and U.S. troops.

The forces were to conduct neighborhood-to-neighborhood searches to clear the city of Sunni Muslim insurgents and local militias such as the Mehdi Army of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. The militia has been blamed for much of the sectarian killing in the past 11 months.

"We are going to confront any terrorist elements or militias. We will confront any outlaws," the general said.

Later in the day, al-Maliki issued his first comment on the new Bush administration plan outlined on Wednesday, declaring it "identical to our strategy and our intentions." President Bush said he would send an additional 21,500 troops to help pacify the capital and other parts of the country. (Full story)

Al-Maliki, however, continued to avoid naming the Mehdi Army as a target of the military operations, disinclined, perhaps, to take on al-Sadr, a key backer of the prime minister.

"Our strategy that aims to control security is based on using force against any outlaws, whatever their background or identity," al-Maliki said in a brief appearance aired on state-run Iraqiya television. Al-Maliki has repeatedly used that kind of formulaic language during his eight months in office, but has routinely blocked American forces from taking on his militia allies.

On Wednesday, Iraqi military officials said al-Maliki had chosen Lt. Gen. Abboud Gambar as commander of the new security plan in the capital, where sectarian bloodshed built to a crescendo at the end of last year, with more than 100 people killed on many days.

The army generals who spoke to AP said al-Maliki appointed Gambar a week ago when he told the nation that a new security plan was to be launched within days.

But al-Maliki never revealed that Gambar would command the operation and has refused since then to confirm the appointment.

DOJ_NMG_0116836

The Iraqi generals, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the information had not been officially released, said there had been several candidates from the military to run the new security plan and two names topped the list.

First among the candidates was Lt. Gen. Mohan al-Freiji, but he was quickly vetoed by American officials.

Gambar was second choice after the Americans blackballed al-Freiji, the generals said. Both al-Freiji and Gambar are Shiite Muslims.

The U.S. military did not respond to an AP e-mail asking for verification of the dispute.

"Mohan (al-Freiji) is not flexible at all and cannot be subdued. If he finds something unacceptable, he will never tolerate it. Mohan doesn't take direction at all," one of the generals said. "Abboud is more flexible."

The generals said Gambar, a veteran of the 1980-88 Iran-Iraq war and the 1991 Gulf War, would have two deputies, a Shiite and a Sunni, one on each side of the Tigris river that curls through the center of Baghdad.

Gambar was a brigadier general in the navy during the 1991 Gulf War, one of the generals said. He was captured by U.S. troops on the Kuwaiti island of Fialaka and held prisoner in Saudi Arabia before being freed shortly afterward.

Under Saddam Hussein's rule, military men normally were fired if taken prisoner, but the former president made an exception for Gambar and his brigade because of their brave defense of Fialaka. Gambar, in his early 60s, was decorated by Hussein for bravery.

Gambar will report directly to al-Maliki, who is commander general of the armed forces.

Indicating that the new security plan was near its formal opening, military officials said Saturday that the 4th Brigade of the Iraq army's 1st Infantry Division arrived in Baghdad's southern neighborhood of Rustomiyah. They said the brigade came from Fallujah, west of Baghdad, but refused to give further details.

Korran, the general in Irbil, said his troops would face a language barrier and rely on translators because 95 percent of the brigade is Kurdish and unable to speak Arabic. Kurds, a separate ethnic group, are largely Sunnis but not Arabs.

His brigade is one of two coming from the Kurdish region. The other will arrive from the northern city of Sulaimaniyah. A third brigade will come from southern Iraq.

"We do not represent any sect or ethnic group," Korran said, adding that he expects to be fighting against "militias in residential areas."Other developments

U.S. raids that President Bush approved and that led to the detention of five Iranians in Iraq are part of broad efforts to confront Tehran's aggression, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Saturday before meeting with Israel's foreign minister in Jerusalem. (Full story)

U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, who opposes Bush's plans to send more U.S. soldiers to Iraq, met Saturday with al-Maliki and the two top U.S. commanders during her first visit to Baghdad in nearly a year. The New York Democrat, who is expected to run for her party's presidential nomination, said she doubted the al-Maliki government would live up to promises it had made about cracking down on violence.

Underscoring the difficulties in taming the violence, at least 48 people were killed or found dead nationwide on Saturday, including a Sunni cleric who was shot to death near his home in Samarra, 60 miles north of Baghdad.

Plan Would Add Kurds To Civil War Mix (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

BAGHDAD — Already a dangerous battleground for an array of forces, Baghdad soon could be flooded with another volatile element: thousands of Kurds from northern Iraq.

As part of President Bush's new strategy for Iraq, 8,000 to 10,000 Iraqi troops will deploy to Baghdad in the coming weeks, American and Iraqi officials said, and as many as 3,600 could be Kurds. It would be the first time such a large number of Kurdish forces have been sent to the capital.

The impending deployment has raised fears among Kurds, most of whom live in a protected autonomous enclave, that they are being dragged more directly into Iraq's bloody and complex civil war.

Most of the fighting in Iraq is between Shiite and Sunni Arabs, but Kurds, most of whom are Sunni Muslims, fear that could change if they are seen as players in the country's main struggle.

"I don't think it's wise," said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish lawmaker in Baghdad. "This is a Sunni-Shiite conflict."

Most Kurdish troops are not acquainted with Baghdad, many speak neither Arabic nor English, and their participation could create an even deeper conflict between Kurds and Arabs, he said.

Large numbers of Kurds mix with Arabs in the Kirkuk and Mosul areas of northern Iraq, and a small number live in the capital, but Arab politicians also question the wisdom of bringing Kurdish soldiers into the conflict.

DOJ_NMG_0116837

"I advise the Kurdish people to apply pressure on their leaders to prevent this step," said Mohammed Daini, a lawmaker with a major Sunni bloc. Kurdish forces, he said, "will face firm resistance from both the Sunnis and the Shiites."

Sheik Abdul Razzaq Naddawi, an aide to anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr, agreed that Kurdish troops would not be welcome.

"The Kurds, frankly speaking, consider themselves superior to other Iraqis," he said. "Would they allow troops from the middle or the south to arrive in Kurdistan?" he asked. "Their borders are closed, and they are practically independent."

The idea of using Kurdish troops to quell violence in both Shiite and Sunni neighborhoods of Baghdad originated in backroom talks among the country's main power brokers. With a chance to live their dream of autonomy, Kurdish lawmakers were extremely reluctant to take part in the plan. But Iraqi officials as well as U.S. military and political officials argued that if they failed to participate, it would show their lack of commitment to the nation.

Word of the planned deployment took Kurds by surprise. In their small but prospering northern enclave, they shook their heads over the prospect of getting involved in a conflict that has bedeviled the most powerful army on Earth.

"If America and the Arabs aren't able to stop Sunnis and Shiites from killing each other indiscriminately, then what use will it be to send in our forces?" asked one Kurd in an online forum.

"We do not need to have our young men getting killed in a civil war between Sunnis and Shiites," read another posting. "They are both our enemies."

Allegiances and neutrality

The Iraqi government has planned for a 50% troop increase in Baghdad, adding the equivalent of an entire division. U.S. and Iraqi officials say two or three predominantly Kurdish brigades will participate.

A U.S. advisor to the Iraqi Defense Ministry acknowledged that language was a concern, but said the problem would be mitigated by the mix of Arab, Kurdish and American troops in Baghdad.

Politicians in favor of the deployment say Kurdish troops are more impartial than security forces currently in the capital.

Khaliq Zenghana, a Kurdish lawmaker, suggested that Kurdish forces could help protect ministries and government institutions, now mostly run as fiefdoms by sectarian militias.

"The Kurds are neutral in that we do not concern ourselves with the Sunnis or Shiites," he said. "That must be understood by the Arabs here in Baghdad: We do not want to come to protect a neighborhood over another one."

However, many Kurdish soldiers are loyal first to leaders of their own ethnic group, even if they wear the uniform of the national army.

The late Saddam Hussein's regime oppressed the Kurds, killing thousands in a military campaign and sowing division between Kurds and Arabs. After the 1991 Persian Gulf War, the U.S. enforced a no-fly zone over semiautonomous Kurdistan.

Although most Kurds are Sunni, they have been natural allies of the Shiites, with both groups fighting Hussein's Sunni Arab-dominated army.

After the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, the historic mistrust between Kurds and Arabs deepened as political groups fought over resources and government posts. Sunni Arabs complained of heavy-handed tactics by Kurdish soldiers who took part in offensives against insurgents in Tall Afar and Fallouja. Also, Kurds and Arabs are locked in a dispute over the future of the oil-rich northern city of Kirkuk.

In Kirkuk, as well as Mosul, Kurdish soldiers wear Kurdish insignia on their Iraqi army uniforms and openly proclaim their desire to annex these ethnically mixed cities to their Kurdish region farther north.

Calling on the militia

Bush and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki have promised that Iraqi security forces will go after Sunni and Shiite gunmen alike. Until now, however, the Shiite-dominated security forces have focused mostly on capturing Sunnis.

The allegiance of Shiite soldiers and policemen often lies with sectarian rather than national leaders. Renegade Shiite security forces have tortured and killed Sunni civilians. Sunni rebels, for their part, have hunkered down in certain neighborhoods, also menacing civilians and fighting off the security forces.

Kurdish officials said that the Americans also have asked for the participation of the Kurdish militia, known as peshmerga, but the request was still being debated in the regional parliament.

Concern about the possible participation of the peshmerga already has been expressed within Sadr's Al Mahdi militia.

"They are doing a good job inside Kurdistan, so they should stay there," said one militiaman who identified himself only as Abu Karrar.

Defense Ministry spokesman Mohammed Askari said the army brigades coming to Baghdad would answer to Iraqi army commanders rather than militia leaders.

Far from the civil war raging in Baghdad, residents in the quiet Kurdish city of Irbil were not enthusiastic about the deployment.

DOJ_NMG_0116838

"It's an Iraqi issue and Iraq contains all of us, although I think this will cause problems for Kurds and if there was any possible way not to participate, I would prefer that," said Rezgar Taha, 34.

War Costs Are Hitting Historic Proportions (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, January 14, 2007

WASHINGTON — By the time the Vietnam war ended in 1975, it had become America's longest war, shadowed the legacies of four presidents, killed 58,000 Americans along with many thousands more Vietnamese, and cost the U.S. more than $660 billion in today's dollars.

By the time the bill for World War II passed the $600-billion mark, in mid-1943, the United States had driven German forces out of North Africa, devastated the Japanese fleet in the Battle of Midway, and launched the vast offensives that would liberate Europe and the South Pacific.

The Iraq war is far smaller and narrower than those conflicts, and it has not extended beyond the tenure of a single president. But its price tag is beginning to reach historic proportions, and the budgetary "burn rate" for Iraq may be greater than in some periods in past wars.

If U.S. involvement continues on the current scale, the funding for the Iraq war — combined with the conflict in Afghanistan and other foreign fronts in the war on terrorism — is projected to surpass this country's Vietnam spending next year.

And the accumulating cost is adding to resistance to President Bush's war policy in Congress as well as in public opinion, even though concern about the cost in human lives, the war's impact on America's place in the world and other such factors loom larger.

Last week, when Bush unveiled his new war plan — which included sending an additional 21,500 U.S. troops to Iraq and launching another effort to provide jobs and public services in Baghdad — the cost issue was raised by Republicans as well as Democrats.

But it had been simmering for more than a year.

Members of Congress have talked relatively little about the war's accumulating price tag because of the human costs, Rep. Zoe Lofgren (D-San Jose) said. "But certainly we're cognizant of it," she said. "When you say for what we're spending in a month in Iraq, you could fully fund and double the science budgets of the United States and come up with a viable alternative to oil, it puts it in perspective."

Even so loyal a Republican as Sen. Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, who chaired the budget committee until the Democrats took control of the Senate this year, criticized the administration's approach to war costs, calling it "without any discipline as to how much is going to be spent."

"They're gaming the system," Gregg said.

At a media briefing before Bush's speech Wednesday night, a senior administration official said the president's plan would entail $5.6 billion in military expenses and $1 billion in reconstruction and other civilian costs.

In the broad landscape of federal spending, those are not huge numbers, though $6.6 billion is more than enough to cover the budgets for all the country's national parks, national forests, historic monuments, protected wetlands and wildlife refuges for a year.

What makes the cost issue increasingly sensitive is not just questions about whether it will buy success but also the fact that the new plan's cost will add to a mountain of bills for earlier military and reconstruction efforts with what many see as little or no positive return on the investment.

Some Republicans, especially fiscal conservatives worried about the deficit, are particularly unhappy because, they say, the president and the Defense Department have refused to address the war's impact on the budget in a straightforward way.

Instead of including war costs in the regular budget, such as the one Bush will send to Congress next month, the administration has been asking Congress for emergency-spending bills that short-circuit many of the usual review procedures for appropriating funds.

"Muting and undermining the legitimacy of the congressional role in funding is, I think, undermining to some degree the commitment to the war effort itself," Gregg said.

The administration says its approach is necessary because it is unable to determine what it will need for the war in the coming fiscal year, which begins each October. Critics say that may have been true early in the war but that by now most costs are predictable far in advance.

Last year, Congress approved a provision in the annual defense authorization bill calling on the administration to change course and put its request for war funds in regular spending bills subject to full congressional review.

DOJ_NMG_0116839

Said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), the provision's author: "Neither the White House nor the Congress is making the tough decisions about how we are going to pay for the ongoing wars. Adding hundreds of billions of dollars that are more conveniently designated as emergency expenditures — so they do not have to be budgeted for along with other national priorities — is only making our fiscal problems that much greater."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) proposed that Congress block Bush's new plan by withholding funds. To date, Congress has not used its power of the purse to limit Bush's prosecution of the war, partly because it doesn't want to seem to deny U.S. troops any needed support.

"If you cut off funding, you're cutting off support for the troops," said Rep. C.W. "Bill" Young of Florida, a top Republican on the House Appropriations Committee. "Whether you support the battle they're involved in or not, the vast majority of the American public is still very supportive of our troops."

During Vietnam, Congress did threaten to limit the use of the defense budget. At one point, for example, it prohibited the use of funds in Cambodia.

But Congress flexed its fiscal muscles only toward the end of the Vietnam War. Bush's war on terrorism is in its seventh year, and at a comparable stage of Vietnam, antiwar lawmakers could muster only a handful of votes for limiting funds.

From the beginning of President Lyndon B. Johnson's troop buildup in 1965 to the fall of Saigon in 1975, the United States spent the equivalent of $662 billion in 2007 dollars, according to the Congressional Research Service. The war in Iraq is harder to measure because its costs tend to be mixed up with those of the war in Afghanistan and Bush's broader global war on terrorism, says Steven Kosiak, director of budget studies at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments in Washington.

Starting with the anti-terrorism appropriation enacted a week after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Kosiak figures the United States had spent $400 billion fighting terrorism through fiscal 2006, which ended Sept. 30.

For fiscal 2007, Congress has so far approved $70 billion. The president is expected to ask Congress for $100 billion more.

Even if the fighting stopped soon, which few expect, the bills would continue to accumulate as the Pentagon pushed to restore what the war had cost in troops and material.

Clinton Expresses Doubt That Iraqis Will Keep Promises (AP)

AP, January 13, 2007

BAGHDAD -- U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton expressed doubt Saturday that Iraq's government would follow through with its promises to secure Baghdad as she met with top Iraqi officials and American commanders.

It was the third trip to Iraq for Clinton, a Democrat from New York who is considering running for president, and comes amid opposition from the Democratic-controlled Congress to President Bush's plans to send in 21,500 more troops to stop the rampant violence.

"I don't know that the American people or the Congress at this point believe this mission can work," she told ABC News in Baghdad. "And in the absence of a commitment that is backed up by actions from the Iraqi government, why should we believe it?"

Noting she had to travel wearing body armor and surrounded by soldiers and security guards, Clinton called the situation in Iraq "heartbreaking."

"This is my third trip here. I've seen the violence and security problems increase, not decrease," she said, calling on Bush to start withdrawing U.S. troops.

"That would really demonstrate to the Iraqis that we don't have an open-ended commitment," she said. "We are not going to be here providing protection for their leaders, which we do. We are not going to be here standing by and trying to be called in from time to time as they see fit. That is not in the cards."

Clinton, who was making a one-day visit to the country, spoke to ABC exclusively after meeting with the two top military commanders in Iraq, U.S. Gen. George Casey and Lt. Gen. Ray Odierno, according to the network.

She was traveling with U.S. Sen. Evan Bayh, D-Indiana, who opted out of the 2008 race, and Rep. John McHugh, a Republican from upstate New York. They also planned to travel to Afghanistan.

The three, all members of armed services committees, also met with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

"I'm skeptical that the Iraqi government will do what they have promised to do, and that I think is the concern of all of us who have heard this before," she said, referring to earlier security efforts that have failed to stop the sectarian attacks that have been increasing since the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra.

Clinton, who opposes Bush's plans to send more U.S. troops to Iraq, last traveled to Iraq in February 2005 with Sen. John McCain, a Republican presidential contender.

Clinton had planned to meet with the Army's 10th Mountain Division _ which is based in New York and deployed in both Iraq and Afghanistan _ at their base in Baghdad but the visit was canceled due to bad weather, the U.S. military said.

DOJ_NMG_0116840

Iraq's Talabani To Visit Damascus (BBC)

By Mike Wooldridge

BBC.com, January 13, 2007

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani is travelling to Syria for the highest level Iraqi visit in many years.

It comes after US President George W Bush accused both Syria and Iran of fuelling Iraq's violence as he announced his new strategy for Iraq.

The US says Syria allows militants to enter Iraq, but Damascus says it is doing all it can to secure its border.

Diplomatic relations between Iraq and Syria were restored last November after a break of more than 20 years.

This visit by President Talabani demonstrates Iraq's balancing act between the United States and a country that Washington prefers to see isolated.

Border security

But between Iraq and Syria, there was also a long period of hostility, going back to the days when the two countries were ruled by competing branches of the Arab nationalist Baath Party.

Syria accused Saddam Hussein's Iraq of inciting riots.

Diplomatic relations were restored just recently, and President Talabani's visit is intended to build on this.

He was in exile in Syria during the Saddam Hussein era.

But beyond the expected signing of agreements, the question is how far the visit will be used to discuss American and Iraqi government concerns about insurgents crossing between Syria and Iraq.

Syria has long said it does all it can to patrol the border.

Losing Iraq, One Truckload At A Time (NYT)

By Luis Carlos Montalvan

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

IN 1901, Gen. Leonard Wood, the American governor of occupied Cuba, wrote an incensed letter to President William McKinley after discovering deep corruption in the island's postal service. "We have gone into Cuba to give these people an example of good government," Wood insisted. "These thefts in the post office are so far the only blot on our record. Our honor as a nation demands that we bring the thieves to trial." He gave his commander in chief an ultimatum: "If it is embarrassing to you to have me persist in this matter, I will resign."

About the only difference between Cuba then and Iraq today is that Wood's intervention resulted in the jailing of the culprits. The level of corruption in the Iraq Security Forces is staggering. The Iraq Study Group found that $5 billion to $7 billion is lost annually to different types of corruption, and yet "there are still no examples of senior officials who have been brought before a court and convicted of corruption charges." The result: "Economic development is hobbled by insecurity, corruption, lack of investment, dilapidated infrastructure and uncertainty."

Yet of the study group's 79 recommendations, only two are much relevant to this problem, and no anticorruption milestones to be achieved were set forth. Having served in Iraq, I find this very disappointing. While I can't of course speak officially for the Pentagon, I can describe what I saw and give my own thoughts on how to improve things.

The most prominent forms of corruption I saw were Iraqi commanders pocketing the paychecks of nonexistent troops in the Iraqi Army and officers in the police forces, and customs officials abetting the smuggling of oil and precious rebuilding supplies across Iraq's porous borders.

These are vast problems, but some relatively simple solutions could tamp them down considerably.

The greatest amount of corruption in the Iraq military and police forces occurs when payrolls are handed out at the unit level. Because the country doesn't have a functioning banking system that would allow easy money transfers to private accounts, military and security commanders receive large sums of cash every payroll period based on the number and rank of soldiers on their personnel rosters. The endemic problem is that commanders frequently put nonexistent soldiers and security personnel — dubbed "ghosts" by American overseers — on their rosters and pocket their salaries.

It is difficult to overstate how deeply these ghosts hurt the war effort. Most obviously, we have no idea how much of this money is being siphoned off to support tribal and ethnic fighting, and even the insurgency itself.

Also, because hundreds and thousands of ghosts exist at all echelons, many military and police units in the field do not have nearly as many men at arms as they seem to have on paper. Thus the units are often assigned tasks for which they do not have necessary manpower. And when American or other coalition forces are asked to "partner" with Iraqi troops, we have often found that there simply aren't enough bodies to conduct training and missions.

DOJ_NMG_0116841

American officials have long been aware of this problem. “The number of trained and equipped security forces does not provide a complete picture of their capabilities and may overstate the number of forces on duty,” was the finding of the Government Accountability Office’s “Stabilizing Iraq” report last fall. “For example, Ministry of Interior data include police who are absent without leave.”

Those of us on the ground discovered this the hard way. When I was with the Third Armored Cavalry Regiment in Nineveh Province in 2005, we tried for months to get the names of all Iraqi security personnel in our sector on the payrolls of the Ministries of Interior and Defense. We were curious because when we tried to assess the effectiveness of the Iraqi Border Police brigade in Sinjar, on the Syrian border, we were told by Iraqi commanders that at least 300 officers were “performing guard duties in Mosul.” Mosul is more than 100 miles inside Iraq, so border troops had no business there, if indeed they existed at all.

Similarly, in South Baghdad, we American advisers assigned to the Fourth Brigade of the Sixth Iraqi Army Division had little luck getting a clear read of the brigade’s strength. Iraqi commanders repeatedly told us that many of their men were “elsewhere, performing security duties for the Ministry of Defense.” The advisers found personnel discrepancies as high as 30 percent in any given unit.

How can we bust the ghosts? Every soldier, police officer and government official is assigned a national identification number for bookkeeping, but so far it has been far too easy for corrupt officials to get numbers for nonexistent people. A better idea would be a universal national identification card for all government and military employees that includes the holder’s photograph and fingerprints.

Such cards should be required for any Iraqi to receive his paycheck. Both the distribution of the cards and the payroll-distribution sites should be jointly overseen by coalition and Iraqi officials. There is no reason such a system could not be in place by the end of the year.

It would also help if American advisers embedded with security forces were charged with ensuring that all Iraqis are actually on duty with their assigned units. Should Iraqi commanders refuse to cooperate with their audits, we must insist that the Iraqi government fire them.

The second major source of corruption I witnessed is what I call the “reverse Ho Chi Minh Trails” that facilitate smuggling of Iraqi oil and other resources out of the country. A United States interagency panel reported in November that oil smuggling abetted by corrupt Iraqi customs officials is netting the insurgents $100 million a year, helping to make them financially self-sustaining.

Because most of Iraq is landlocked, almost all goods going in and out pass through 14 land “ports of entry.” Smuggling has always been a part of Iraqi life, and was even more so during the last years of Saddam Hussein’s rule, because he encouraged it to counteract the embargo on Iraqi oil. Yet, almost immediately after the 2003 invasion, former customs officials from the regime resumed their duties at the ports of entry.

Later that year, we in the Third Armored Cavalry were given responsibility for the Syrian, Jordanian and Saudi Arabian borders along Anbar Province. In addition to helping create the new Iraqi Border Police force, we set about reforming the customs checkpoints.

At first, this was successful: for example, the border police battalion we trained at Walid, near the conjunction of the Syrian and Jordanian borders, uncovered many attempts to smuggle out large quantities of food, fuel, industrial parts and other goods. Hundreds of smugglers were arrested.

Unfortunately, we left Anbar in early 2004 and corrupt officials in Baghdad soon took away the border police’s oversight authority on the grounds that it wasn’t their “jurisdictional role to conduct operations that were assigned exclusively to customs officials.” American advisers at the national level failed to do anything about this, and things quickly reverted to the corrupt status quo.

The situation at Walid was hardly unique. In 2005 I returned to Iraq with the Third Armored Cavalry, this time to Nineveh Province, to cover the northern section of the border between Iraq and Syria. It soon became clear that the region’s port of entry, at Rabiya, was a hotbed of corruption. Not only were customs officials apparently turning a blind eye to smuggling, but they seemed to be directly engaged in it.

And little has changed: last month the American special inspector general for Iraq, Stuart Bowen, reported that the pipelines in the area have been blown up, so the only way to export oil is by road. He noted, “That leaves it vulnerable to smuggling as truckers sell their cargoes on the black market.”

How can we shut down this black market? First, we must insist that the Iraqi government replace the customs workers at the 14 land border crossings with a new set of at least 1,400 elite officials jointly selected and vetted by the Iraqi ministries and the coalition forces.

We should supplement this new force with teams of American advisers — soldiers, police officers, customs officials and the like — to ensure that the Iraqis are prepared to do their jobs. And we should create an anticorruption task force of coalition officers with the power to periodically review systemic issues like the Iraqis' recruitment methods, policies governing potential ethical problems and records of internal discipline.

DOJ_NMG_0116842

The Iraq Study Group concluded that "the ability of the United States to shape the outcomes is diminishing" and that "time is running out." Those of us who have been on the ground know how true this is. Irrespective of the number and mission of United States forces sent to Iraq, winning or losing will depend in large part on our ability to, in General Wood's phrasing, "give these people an example of good government."

Afghan Rebel Chief Sends Fighters To Their Deaths (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, January 14, 2007

BAGRAM, Afghanistan, Jan. 13 (AP) — An Afghan insurgent leader operating from Pakistan sent about 200 ill-equipped fighters, some wearing plastic bags on their feet, into Afghanistan, where most were killed in a major battle this week, an American general said Saturday.

The general, Maj. Gen. Benjamin Freakley, said the insurgent leader, Jalaluddin Haqqani, recruited and sent unemployed and untrained men to fight in Afghanistan.

United States forces killed about 130 fighters moving in two groups in Paktika Province in the east late Wednesday and early Thursday, in one of the largest winter battles in Afghanistan since the fall of the Taliban in 2001.

General Freakley said the fighters "were from Jalaluddin Haqqani and we believe, though we don't know exactly where, that Jalaluddin Haqqani is operating from inside Pakistan and sending men to fight in Afghanistan."

Western and Afghan officials accuse Pakistan of not doing enough to stop Taliban fighters using Pakistani soil as a training ground from crossing the border into Afghanistan. Pakistan says it does all it can to stop the fighters.

No officials in Pakistan could be reached immediately for comment.

General Freakley said one of the enemies in the Afghanistan-Pakistan border area is unemployment.

"It is clear to me that some of these men were just either collected in a poor part of a village or perhaps from a madrasa or perhaps from a refugee camp and told to come fight," he said. "The message to the enemies of Afghanistan and the enemies of world peace would be that you can come at us with two people, 20 people, 200 people, 2,000 people, you'll be defeated and your young men will needlessly be killed."

General Freakley said it was likely the insurgent fighters meant to attack a new military outpost near the village of Marghah that has affected insurgent infiltration routes.

In southern Afghanistan, meanwhile, NATO troops fought insurgents on Saturday in a battle that left one Western soldier dead.

Taliban militants stepped up attacks last year, and insurgent-related violence killed about 4,000 people in the bloodiest year since the American-led coalition ousted the Taliban in late 2001.

Clinton Meets With Karzai, U.S. Troops (WP/AP)

By Jason Straziuso, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 14, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan -- U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton ate with U.S. soldiers from New York and Indiana at the main U.S. base in Afghanistan on Sunday before meeting with the top U.S. general in Afghanistan and President Hamid Karzai, officials said.

Clinton, a Democrat from New York who is considering running for president, traveled here with U.S. Sen. Evan Bayh, a Democrat from Indiana, and Rep. John McHugh, a Republican from upstate New York. All three are members of armed services committees.

On Friday, Clinton said she is hearing "increasingly troubling reports out of Afghanistan" and would be searching for "accurate information about the true state of affairs" militarily and politically on her trip.

The Taliban last year launched a record number of attacks, and some 4,000 people died in insurgency-related violence, Afghanistan's bloodiest year since the Taliban was ousted by a U.S.-led coalition in late 2001.

Some 23,000 U.S. troops are stationed in Afghanistan, about half under the NATO flag and half under control of the U.S.-led coalition. Clinton has said she wants to see more troops in Afghanistan, without saying how many.

Her meetings with U.S. military officials and Karzai were closed, and the senator did not make any statements to the media.

The delegation's trip to Kabul comes a day after a visit to Iraq, where Clinton expressed doubt that Iraq's government would follow through with its promises to secure Baghdad as she met with top Iraqi officials and American commanders there.

DOJ_NMG_0116843

South of Kabul, a suicide bomber blew himself up near a convoy of foreign construction workers and Afghan soldiers, wounding one civilian, said Mohammmad Asif, a police official.

Qalat is about 220 miles south of Kabul, and Clinton and her colleagues were far from any danger.

Military Slams Bureaucrats Over Afghanistan (WT)

By Sean Rayment, London Sunday Telegraph

The Washington Times, January 14, 2007

LONDON -- A lack of political direction, a shortage of soldiers and "complete disconnection" between Britain's Foreign Office and Ministry of Defense combined to hinder progress in the war in Afghanistan, a report by British military chiefs has concluded.

The document, drawn up by senior officers from the 16th Air Assault Brigade, gives a withering assessment of how decisions in the British government prevented progress against the Taliban and, sources claim, contributed to deaths and injuries among soldiers.

The report, the first official assessment of the conflict, says the operation suffered from a "lack of early political direction."

It concludes that insufficient numbers of soldiers went to fight the Taliban and complains of differences between the Foreign Office and Defense Ministry over counternarcotics policy.

The report, written at the end of last year, is working its way up the military chain of command. It states that the forces sent to Afghanistan could have achieved more and suffered fewer casualties if greater numbers had gone at the start.

"Lessons learned" from the campaign suggest that if commanders had been given more troops, they would have been able to properly man bases in the notorious towns of Nowzad, Sangin and Musa Qala, where 12 soldiers died between June and September.

Although the report does not specify how many extra troops would have been required, senior commanders say the initial force of 3,500 needed a further 1,000 combat troops, together with extra helicopters and support units.

One senior officer who has seen the report said that with a larger force, Brig. Ed Butler, commander of the 16th Air Assault Brigade, would have had greater flexibility to conduct "rapid reaction operations" against the Taliban and begin "reconstruction in the so-called Afghan development zone."

Troops from the 16 Air Assault Brigade deployed into Helmand, in southern Afghanistan, last May as part of an expansion of the International Security and Assistance Force into the south of the country.

Over a 12-week period, elements of the brigade became embroiled in the most intense fighting since the Korean War.

The troops were involved in dozens of bitter battles with the Taliban during which every weapon system, from the assault rifle to Apache attack helicopters, was used to kill insurgents.

After the deployment was announced last year, John Reid, then the defense secretary, consistently denied that the force was under strength, despite high-level unofficial briefings in which senior officers said that commanders needed extra infantry, helicopters and logistics troops.

A spokesman for the Defense Ministry said, "Extra troops were only requested on one occasion and they were sent. The whole point of a post-operational report is to learn lessons."

Patrick Mercer, a spokesman for the opposition Conservative Party, said: "It was clear all along that not enough troops were being sent and that this was a political and not a military decision."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Backlash Against Hardball Tactics (CHIT)

By Greg Burns, Tribune Senior Correspondent

Chicago Tribune, January 14, 2007

Pro-business interests decry exec prosecution

The government crackdown on corporate crime is coming under pressure to back off amid intense business lobbying and adverse court rulings.

Since the convictions in May of Enron Corp. honchos Jeffrey Skilling and Kenneth Lay, federal authorities have voluntarily stepped away from certain hardball tactics aimed at forcing companies to turn against accused executives.

An even greater retreat could be in the offing as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and other business advocates extend their campaign to reign in what they consider excessive enforcement efforts. On top of that, a string of reversals on appeal has raised fresh doubts about recent government victories targeting criminal fraud among the business elite.

DOJ_NMG_0116844

Some close observers sense a tide turning. "Every month that goes by, the pushback seems to gather more steam," says Douglas Berman, a law professor at Ohio State University. "It's a realization the tough-on-crime campaign against white-collar offenders was at risk of being too tough."

On Jan. 5, appellate judges tossed out most of the charges against top executives at Westar Energy, who were accused of looting the Topeka-based public utility in a case dubbed the "Kansas Enron."

Though the Justice Department touted those 2005 convictions as proof that "no boardroom is above the law," Denver's 10th Circuit Court of Appeals found that prosecutors based their sweeping indictment on a "thin legal thread."

As standards shift, even the judge who presided over the Enron trial has conceded that Skilling has a good chance of seeing one count of conspiracy conviction overturned.

While U.S. District Judge Sim Lake ruled that Skilling's 18 other convictions were likely to stand on appeal, some legal experts believe Enron's "smartest guy in the room" may yet win on wider issues. That could lead to a reduction in the 24-year sentence he began serving last month at a low-security Minnesota prison.

Skilling's attorney, Dan Petrocelli, says softer attitudes toward white-collar crime can only help as he presses for release of his client.

"He's very optimistic, as we are, that he won't be there very long," Petrocelli says.

At Wayne State University law school, white-collar-fraud specialist Peter Henning agrees that Skilling could benefit from new skepticism about "the aggressive use of criminal laws against corporate executives. In these very high-profile cases, there are more reversals. If I were Jeff Skilling, I'd have more hope."

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse says no one at his agency is retreating from aggressive prosecution of corporate fraud. "The numbers certainly don't bear that out," he says. "We remain extremely committed to the prosecution of those in the corporate community who would violate the trust of their employees, of the investing public, or both."

Federal prosecutors have tallied more than 1,000 corporate fraud convictions since Enron's 2001 collapse, and the ongoing investigation into options backdating by pay-hungry executives stands to yield more. But the task has been challenging.

The conviction of Lay, who died July 5, and Skilling came amid defeats in other Enron-related matters, most notably the overturned conviction of Chicago's Andersen accounting firm and the withdrawal of a guilty plea from lead auditor David Duncan. In a related case involving Enron-owned power plants in Nigeria, a group of Merrill Lynch executives saw their convictions reversed in a decision that weakened an element of the fraud statute.

For every duly convicted Bernard Ebbers and Martha Stewart, it seems, a KPMG accountant or Frank Quattrone scores one for the defense.

In a 2006 study tracking some of the most prominent corporate trials, Washington University researcher Kathleen Brickey found "surprisingly mixed results," with juries convicting 18 defendants, acquitting 11 and deadlocking on 15 others. That trial record, which lags well behind the government's success rate in criminal litigation overall, supports the business-lobby criticism that prosecutors were "trying to find crimes where none really exists," the Brickey study noted.

Yet after factoring in guilty pleas, cooperation agreements and retrials, the prosecutors' track record in complex corporate cases improves to "a respectable, if not spectacular conviction rate," Brickey concluded. Even so, the jury is still out on the wisdom of using "individual criminal prosecutions to address systemic corporate fraud," she found.

Some fight whole-firm tack

Meanwhile, business advocates have targeted enforcement aimed at corporations rather than individuals. They tallied a victory in December when the Justice Department put new restraints on prosecutors who were demanding the legal communications of companies under threat of indictment.

The routine practice of forcing those businesses to waive attorney-client privilege as a condition of settlement violates the rights of defendants, critics say. And even the new restraints fail to go far enough in protecting companies from being indicted, they assert.

"We've learned something from Andersen, where thousands of innocent people were ruined," says Hal Scott, a Harvard University law professor who heads a pro-business lobbying group. "You should only prosecute when the whole company is criminal from bottom to top."

Business-friendly activists also aim to roll back elements of the Sarbanes-Oxley anti-fraud provisions, provide more protection for auditors, loosen regulations that discourage the free flow of investment capital and, to hear the Chamber of Commerce tell it, redirect prosecutors to "real" crimes outside the gray areas of corporate decision-making.

"A lot of the cases end up revolving around difficult or ambiguous accounting rules," says David Chavern, a senior vice president at the U.S. chamber. "We have to hope there will be less grandstanding and more focus on real fraud."

DOJ_NMG_0116845

To a degree, business lobbyists already have "won this battle," says Russell Mokhiber, of the Corporate Crime Reporter newsletter. "These are real crimes. There's a real need for corporate criminal liability. But the drive by the big business community is to get rid of it, and they effectively have."

Targets hire top legal defense

Since the crackdown began four years ago, the wealth of the typical target has translated into vast legal defense funds that have paid for close scrutiny of corporate prosecutions.

In the "Kansas Enron" case, the appeal of lead defendant David Wittig was led by Seth Waxman, former U.S. solicitor general and a top Supreme Court litigator. Compared to the more typical drug appeal from a jailhouse lawyer, such star power commands attention from appellate judges, notes Ohio State's Berman.

Although prosecutors in the Westar case convinced a Kansas jury that Wittig and a partner milked the company "for all they could through a pattern of fraud and deceit," that finding was mostly irrelevant, the court ruled. The key legal issue was a narrower one of accounting for company air travel.

The government needed to prove the defendants had concealed their personal use of corporate aircraft from regulators who were entitled to know about it, the court determined. Since prosecutors failed to calculate the numbers correctly, the evidence at trial was insufficient, and most of the case can't be re-tried because of the constitutional protection against facing the same charges twice.

The outcome at Westar supports a Skilling contention that jury instructions in his trial were flawed because they failed to clarify how withholding information about Enron from investors might not be criminal, Petrocelli says.

